What can be said about Death Sentence that isn't already expressed with a single image of a bloody and bruised Kevin Bacon? This image has become somewhat iconic for me granted I've revisited Death Sentence for the third time in under a week. His frail figure wields a shotgun with every intention of retribution in this stunning remake of Brian Garfield's Death Wish series that surpasses everything that Death Wish never really touched base on; loss and godawful sorrow. Death Sentence is one of those ugly films that creates a textured cityscape of characters and chance encounters while playing god who could be very well listening to aggressive metal. Everything that happens in this film drags a wistful Bacon downwards into a cinematic study of the new and improved, definitive "man with nothing to lose." Coming from the tiny director of the original Saw film, James Wan, Death Sentence is a hell of a surprise and covers rusty milieu and bitter flavors en masse. Regarding the tact nature of his family's demise, I personally have not seen a film that echoes so heavily the feeling of lonesome as Death Sentence does. It was bad enough losing his golden child to a gang initiation trial hosted by a multicultural troupe of degenerates, but once Kevin Bacon strikes back upon the one who sliced his son's neck open, a war erupts instantaneously. The debris and carnage left behind can be tracked back to two key ingredients that throttled the downfall of this bourgeois household; selfishness and vengeance. Had Kevin Bacon not pursued exacting his own brand of justice upon the runt-like Joe Darley, the rest of his family would have been out of harms way and it would have remained the death of one "rich little faggot." So against all psychological happenstance, Death Sentence is a film that is multi-gendered; on one hand, it's a film about exacting grisly vengeance and on the other hand, a film chronicling the moral decay of a once-family man as he becomes exactly what he swore to punish. Halfway into the film comes one of cinema's most profound chase sequences committed to celluloid since Children of Men. Escaping on foot with his suitcase wildly waving through the alleys of crust and recycled goods, Nick Hume (Bacon) flees through many buildings while being chased by many tattooed and pierced thugs in a suspense-driven pursuit which leads him to a parking garage. Unable to stop the velocity of his body, he crumples into a car setting off its alarm. Taking this idea and systematically using the same survival instinct we later see in the bloodbath of atonement, he zigzags from car to car setting off their respective beacon in a dazzling attempt to hurdle his foes into a state of bewilderment. It's set-ups like these that make me understand that there is still fresh life to be squeezed into these modern action thrillers. Once the game of cat-and-mouse has desisted, Nick Hume retracts from noticeably upset senior VP to an afflicted lamb scurrying home to try and make reparations for what he has done. The cast of Death Sentence is wildly supportive and over-stricken with sympathy which helps the film establish a credible habitat restrained only by the boundaries of film. As author Brian Garfield said concerning Death Wish and Charles Bronson's portrayal, "vigilantism is an attractive fantasy but it only makes things worse in reality." These words ring quite true when comparing Death Sentence to its creative predecessor. Also quick to jab at the alleged "blood-and-thunder" that occupies the last twenty minutes, I view this scene of extermination as the meat and the potatoes of the film; not as some violence-prone sweaty nerd but as a man who understands pain and these twangs of emptiness. Nick Hume's final stand is one to be reckoned with, both through the confines of cinema and its regurgitated after-effect. This motion picture is not just one of uncompromising entertainment but a film with a cold heart that pumps the very venom of Hume's absent rage into our visions as this "ostracidal" odyssey continues to tread on the sacred ground of a suburban welcome mat. Coating its grievous nature with a glorifying epic shoot-out scene is exactly what this film needed to do to separate itself fully from the nature of its depression-inciting music video-like scenes of lamenting. Death Sentence, as a collected product, is a mean-spirited sucker punch delivered swiftly to the abdominal. Often presenting a desecrated family amidst the hum of dreary VH1-infused folk ballads, the instinct of a bloodthirsty beast incarnated among the labyrinthine hallways of the "Office," the crack-den that looks to be what the safe haven would resemble if Abel Ferrara shot up with junk-used needles while playing Silent Hill. A revamped Death Wish starring the ghostly Kevin Bacon using expletive and ghastly violence in order to purge the streets from the flaccid youth? Sign me up for what might be the best recycling of an idea proving justly that remakes aren't always bad. Just take Death Sentence and Last Man Standing along for a wild ride in resuscitating faith in the ultra-violent and macabre and you'll be overdosing on gun play euphoria in no time.

James Wan (2010)

Abnormalities surround us. It seems to be life's way to stumble us upon "glitches". Couldn't this same concept apply directly to dreamscapes with a greater force of evil shadowing? James Wan's latest horror film, Insidious, attempts to salve the question, not with an answer, but with more questions. Being a fan of his earlier effort, Death Sentence, James Wan's keen eye for stark visuals and grain returns in Insidious but with less attention towards the grime and degeneracy but the sterility of a contemporary home setting. Turning the experience into a date movie of sorts, I tagged my ladyfriend along for the ride, for what I had hoped would at least be a thrilling, atmospheric take on hauntings. Paranormal films of the sort always seem to bore me. Flapping shutters and drapes dancing amidst light given off from a flickering flame is the concept. Insidious has defied the expectations of its stagnant wellspring and through a unique vision, supplied by Wan, unleashes a volley of consistent scares with some of the most alarming, disconcerting scenes of terror I have ever witnessed to this day. From the opening credits alone, trekking through a dimly lit house scored to screeching strings, I was mortified. When a single loathsome question returns, as it will time and time again, "what's the scariest movie you've ever seen?" - I now will have a fresh answer. Seated up there with select moments of Jacobs Ladder, The Mothman Prophecies, and the vagrant scene in Mulholland Drive, "Insidious is".

From the trailer, one surmises the boy to be a haunted vessel, which is a correct observation. It also serves as the tagline boasting the idea of a living being assaulted by spirits. Starring Patrick Wilson and Rose Byrne as the two tortured parents of a catatonic child, Insidious quickly sets up the structure of the important grieving parents. After falling through a ladder in a decrepit attic, Dalton passes off his concussion as nothing more and sets to slumber. When Dalton doesn't wake the next morning, the parents shamble to the hospital where doctors proceed to tell them that they don't exactly understand Dalton's condition. Cue the paranormal activities. What largely embodies the runtime of Insidious is seeping moments of dread that crawl across the screen. Sound plays an enormous part in providing chills. As mentioned before, wailing violins subtly scream during instances of duress. Barbara Hershey returns from her oppressive position as mommie dearest from Black Swan and adds empathy to the character pot, equating in one of the most shocking scares Insidious has to offer - during a sit down with the always-reluctant-to-believe father. The casting choice of Hershey was as if to conjure some of the magic seated in her incredible role in The Entity, and it works. Barbara Hershey was created to be haunted via screen and Insidious is the greatest love letter The Entity ever got, sans rape. Not even just for the comparable audible aesthetic of the two shocking films, Insidious jabs back with a story device of her knowing exactly what to do and claiming she's been through it before.

Before Insidious could possibly fry your circuitry with how intense the shocks are, James Wan makes a decision; a decision that almost ruined what was of the most frightful nature by morphing the finale of the film into something you'd expect in a M. Night Shyamalan picture post-Unbreakable. Mixing fantasy with the modern remnants of the roster of Thir13en Ghosts (personifying colored demons and phantoms), James Wan's Insidious starts harping the unreal, surreal elements of astral projection. Crossing thresholds of a misty nether, Patrick Wilson engages with spooky specters and demons that fancy the melodic neutered tunes of Tiny Tim - is the tune effective? Yes. All the while distracting? Of course. From here Insidious only gets worse and irredeemably silly. One can assume the scriptwriter himself suffered from a minor concussion as Insidious juggled terror so well only to fumble all of its hard work, spilling spherical shapes on hardwood floor. All is not poisoned, however. Insidious recovers its stance with a final hurrah, melancholic to the very core. When the proverbial day is done, Insidious stands with yet another recurring tool of horror; utilizing advantage against a mature demographic, their children, and making every sickly-sweet mother's toes curl against the auditorium floor. It is the same happenstance as my mother experienced when she watched Poltergeist all the years ago. Regardless of children being used as pawns in a small battle of good and evil and the various other contrived instances, Insidious is a fresh experiment in horror that proves there still are scares to be had. You might just have to strap your rain boots on to wade through the shit near the climax.

EDEN LAKE

James Watkins (2008)

Look at me. Look at what I've become. Underneath this pseudonym, I've transgressed through a long journey through the discovery of the arts. It started first in the pits with film, then onto bizarro literature (Thanks to Carlton Mellick III), then onto avant-garde music and such. All of the knowledge, all the experience, even the desensitization I've gone through; nothing could prepare me for Eden Lake. While being a film that appeals to a certain crowd, the thematic aesthetics prepared are such that gave me cramps from intense suspense. A new bar in terror has been set. Blossoming from a solemn recommendation from my dear Pete, I couldn't help but feel amazed that the master of the underground suggested I watch a film that would be available in local Best Buy's. That's normally a good sign. I set out to give this film a fluttering chance, seeing as how it sounded like a Chavvy remake of Them (Ils). My respectful opinion (and review) leans towards this film being one of the most brutally uncompromising films of the decade. When I first viewed the "infamous" fire extinguisher scene in Irreversible, my jaw was agape. For most of Eden Lake, the same symptom occurred. I'd be lying if I denied taking minute breaks from the emotional intensity this film provided. The fine line between complex story lines and artistic merits is surpassed and forgotten about shortly thereafter. Eden Lake doesn't need these to weigh it down. I'd rather not admire set pieces while I fear for my beloved Kelly Reilly's life. Eden Lake is a blanketed genre film almost similar to that of Summer Scars. While being evocative, new thrills are provided and a twist ending that will have you hitting puberty again. The tortured childhood theme works against time in a counter spin creating differing opinions of a fragile adolescence. Childhood has never been so violent, or has it? A loving couple including 300's Michael Fassbender and the super sexy Kelly Reilly decide to escape the world and go on a nature retreat. The encounter some unsavory youths and decide to confront them. This leads into a minor scrapping which leads into a game of cat & mouse in the forest - these kids play place. To better suit the new horror generation, mostly directed towards the French-Euro horror phase, the hero (or rather, heroine) has been developed as a ravishing creature to expunge any leftover feminist "juice" that has been left in the horror generator. When I first watched fellow Dimension Extreme film Inside, I felt that what was provided was tense, disturbing, and merciless. This crown is being withdrew and placed on James Watkins' head. After seeing similar Chav hatefests such as Donkey Punch, I now realize how horrible the "urban effect" has been on our culture. Sure, this is just a film, but living in Maryland, I witness similar occurrences daily. Eden Lake left me speechless with no where to turn to. Love it or hate it, this is a roller coaster ride, if there ever were.

DRAGONBALL: EVOLUTION

James Wong (2009)

This concept was doomed from the start. A genetic disorder is to blame and it's known as an adaptation. In essence, to carry one idea from one medium to another seems feasible enough. Hell, video game ports used to excel in trimming fat off to polish the package but soon fell steadfast under the weight of triple-system licensing. Perhaps Zack Snyder and his patented photo-tracing technique should have been applied to Dragonball: Evolution. Only then would we be able to get the pure and virgin concept we craved for so long. To set forth the final judgment in motion, I'll first need to explain the film's inner workings. Dragonball: Evolution starts out with Goku being an annoying twerp. He's made a promise not to fight all the ignorant black people at school and it's just his luck that his crush, Chi-Chi, would be dating the ringleader Negro. Today is Goku's birthday and unknown to his knowledge, an evil prophecy is springing into action unveiling the villain Piccolo shortly after Goku receives a Dragonball and Grandpa Gohan is massacred by having his house crushed into oblivion. After getting harassed by Bulma, the two seek out Master Roshi to train Goku to help stop the soon-coming apocalypse. This is the plot in a nutshell and trust me, it's a lot more rusty than I led it to be. Not Yamcha To get it out of the way - how does the fighting hold up? I'm sad to say the majority of the fighting is pretty bland. Either that or the camera has been recently diagnosed with SCS (Shaky Cam Syndrome.) and if that isn't the culprit, it's most certainly lack of attention to detail in mind. James Wong went everywhere in this production. He wanted to authenticate the look and feeling of each Dragonball and they do feel as antique as they should but in giving some, he shamefully had to take some. Goku puts on his orange Gi for the "last battle" (If you want to call it that) and turns into his Oozaru form which shamelessly rips off both concept designs from An American Werewolf in London and Super Mario Bros. the Movie. Not Piccolo To top off a ridiculous idea from the start, this is yet another experimental film to come from the bowels of Hollywood. Think about it closely. We sit in a theater, perhaps in a group of friends. A trailer appears and maybe a voice-over triggers memories of a film you heard was in production. You see a quote, maybe it's Watchmen or for this instance Dragonball: Evolution. You scowl and scoff aloud, cracking joke after joke to gain the tranquility of your comrades. You swear that you would never see this movie but you're just lying to yourself. You will, without a doubt, be in line at the theater to see this travesty play out. You need to complain. Restlessness flows through your blood and nothing would make you feel more secure than brandishing your authoritative opinion on something that everyone will be talking about. This is the two-note symphony of Hollywood. Experimentation leads to box office revenue and reverse buzz. "It's that bad?! I need to see this to believe!" It's easier on yourself and your extensive knowledge of Akira Toriyama's works to just breathe in and out and repeat to yourself that this in no way is canon to his masterworks. This might not be enough, on second thought. With a Dragonball: Evolution video game in the works for the PSP and an exclusive action figure line, it looks like the antidote to life (i.e. Street Fighter The Movie The Game) will be repeated causing intellectual properties to dry up and dwindle - thus bringing about an ancient prophecy resulting in Earth being destroyed due to a Dragonball movie. It's obvious that I made that up but with that in mind, let's all agree to spiting the Dragonball trailer as soon as we heard the word "prophecy." I can safely say that most, if not all, films that involve some creeping prophecy are a group collective of turn-offs. To cap this off, Dragonball: Evolution is the film we were expecting; It's rather loud, debilitating, and childish but there are times where you will systematically be entertained, even amused by the meanderings of a churlish director. It will piss off legions of anime fans who draw fan-art of their favorite Saiyans fusing with fictional earrings and further promoting a subversive seed of homosexuality. For what it's worth, I found myself being entertained through out the latter of Dragonball: Evolution. The build-up is rather strong in its own retarded retread of Dragonball lore and I didn't think Justin Chatwin did that bad as a character oddly named Goku. As our Goku however, he falls flat on his face and gets dragged until he gets a skin graft at seventy-five miles per hour*. Piccolo is an abomination but that's me declaring lightly, almost coyly. In fact, just removing Piccolo and having Goku throw weak Kamehameha's at invisible entities would be a better film knowing that charity is indeed a saintly act. There's much to discuss and I'll leave that to a recreational act. Point is, Dragonball: Evolution is euphoric trash but it's not like that's going to stop you from seeing it.

TARD SPASM

Jamie Kastner* (1991) Boiling down to this review, this is where we split cinephiles in half. People who like quality films on one side, and people who enjoy absolute pure shit, in an unclear way. If you are in the second category, I can already assume you love films like Violent Shit. Tard Spasm is this self appointed "Rare" and "underground" recording of a really bad band called Gobstopper playing at a home for retards (Children's Haven in Florida.) Excuse my brash nature towards physical and mental handicaps, but after watching this, I wasn't sure who the real people with deficiencies were, the people who enjoy this, or the cast. An hour and a half film of pure retardation. You will have to excuse the puns or get used to them. The fact that this film exploits handicaps doesn't even bother me. They tried doing that in the horrible buddy comedy The Ringer but it turned out as stale as an episode of The Golden Girls. The simple fact that the copy has the audacity to try and back up the "over an hour" running time with thirty extra minutes of shock footage (R. Budd Dwyer, suicides, and faux murders) is beyond me. They claim it is the ultimate party DVD but we all know this is a lie. I'd have more fun presenting the special features of Schindler's List to a room of friends. In all honesty, you might laugh here and there, a chuckle, maybe two, but it is nothing special in any way. In fact, if you want quality entertainment with more artistic credibility in the opening credits than the entire feature of Tard Spasm, go watch Crispin Hellion Glover's What is it? If you like extremely shitty rock music and watching the modern age cast of Browning's Freaks bumping about on a dance floor, then be my guess, but if you tell me that you actually like this film, I will call you a retard. Bottom line, Tard Spasm is entertainment for retards.

KIKE LIKE ME

Jamie Kastner* (2007)

A serious problem that plagues many documentaries is that the “filmmaker” often looks to put themselves at the center of the “film.” What would a Michael Moore “documentary” be without slob Michael Moore? Moore certainly seems to think that his jokes and childish insights are more important to his films than his subjects. It seems that Michael Moore’s popularity and white liberal “charisma” has inspired other documentary filmmakers to put themselves at the center of their documentaries. I recently had the misfortune of watching Kike Like Me, a documentary that seems to have been made purely so that the maker of the film, Jamie Kastner, could have an outlet for allowing himself to be seen by the world as he complains for just under 90 minutes. According to Kike Like Me “filmmaker” Jamie Kastner, he decided to make a documentary because people often ask him if he’s Jewish. After all, white liberals believe “why should it matter?” if one is Jewish or any other creed as they live in a strictly “colorblind” world. Kastner was also influenced by Elia Kazan’s garbage film Gentleman’s Agreement, a film so repellent that I had to turn it off after watching 20 minutes as I started to feel sick. Gentleman’s Agreement follows a do-gooder Philo-Semite, played by Gregory Peck, as he pretends to be Jewish to expose how the typical European-American is racially prejudiced. Although Gregory Peck doesn’t look particularly Jewish, Kike Like Me director Jamie Kastner has the looks and the pantomimes to best as one of “god’s chosen.” Jamie Kastner travels internationally in Kike Like Me asking a variety of people what they think of Jews. The first group of people that Kastner visits is the ultra-racist Lubavitcher in Brooklyn, New York. Once Kastner tells the Lubavitchers he’s Jewish, they immediately accept him as one of the tribe. Kastner seems to be slightly put-off by the warmth of these extremely religious Jews. Maybe Kastner doesn’t want people really thinking he’s Jewish? If the Lubavitchers believe he’s Jewish, than everyone is bound to think he’s Jewish. In typical liberal “point your finger” fashion, Jamie Kastner spends most of Kike Like Me exposing irrational gentile anti-Semites. Whether it be an articulate British journalist or an Arab peasant, Kastner knows the right person to target to expose taboo Jew-hate. Jamie Kastner is welcomed into the home of Patrick J. Buchanan. Kastner attempts to get Buchanan to admit he is “anti-Semitic” because Buchanan mentioned the Jewishness of the Neo-CON movement in a paragraph he wrote. In the end, Buchanan shows his maturity while dealing with liberal agitators while Kastner looks like a weak asshole. No documentary on Jew hate can be complete without a trip to famous tourist spot Auschwitz. During his trip, Jamie Kastner pretty much has a temper tantrum as he cannot deal with the horrors of Auschwitz. Though in a complete hipster costume, Kastner makes fun of teens at Auschwitz wearing hipster shoes. Kastner feels the tourists are having too much fun at the gas chambers and he cannot handle it. At the peak of Kašner's womanish outburst, he leaves Auschwitz and proclaims the tourist sight should be blown up and with it the people that created (I assume he means Germans in general) it. What a kind, sensitive, and progressive guy. So, is Jamie Kašner Jewish? At the end of Kike Like Me Jamie maturely lets the audience know that he's not telling. My guess is that he is a ½ Jew with a conflicted identity. In Kike Like Me Kašner admits that he attended at Catholic boarding school. Kašner has a blonde haired mother so I figure his father followed the recent trend of rich Jewish men hooking up with hot Aryan women and producing mischling children. Jamie Kašner seems like a warped individual with quite the confused identity. Although he condemns the Jew-haters (in a contrived and self-righteous manner), he doesn't really seem to identify with the Jews other than being an "outsider." After watching Kike Like Me, I kind of hope Jamie Kašner gets beat up and sodomized by a gang of ghetto Negroes. The documentary ultimately was aimless and merely a vehicle for Kašner to identify with a "victim."

Jan Kounen (1994) You might have seen one of the original series of filth - the infamous Guinea Pig. Now if you know anything about these films, you will know that 87% of the series is complete shite that has little to no entertainment value. Hell, without the violence, this series would be nothing; even more shallow than it already is. He Never Dies is one of those incredibly horrible Guinea Pig films. If I could reward that film with one merit, it would be its set-up and plot. A man who cannot die would only further a story due to immortality, am i right? Jan Kounen (Vessel driver for Vincent Cassel. Ultimate props) directed this short with the intent to create a full length film out of it. Capitaine X (1994) concerns a prisoner who is about to be executed by a roughneck group of insane soldiers. Or at least that is what should have happened. Instead, the man continues to breathe and live through this horrible debacle thus using the many insecurities these men holster against them in a decadent battle for sanity. Which side would win is the ultimate debate. Would you rather wake up after getting shot in the head or witness an immortal as his eyes swell with hatred which could only result in a bloodbath. The director uses a first person perspective the entire film and treats it like a fashion statement. This preemptive decision resulted in a massive increase for originality and entertainment factor. I can't imagine this film without that distinctive "through the eyes" feel. The acting is the other factor that rockets this film from cheap DIY into an excellent category of horror and sadistic comedy. Capitaine X (Born to Die) is a premature gem crafted from a talented French director. I can only imagine Capitaine X translating into Captain X. Perhaps if we ever do see a full length version, our somber mute character will don a costume and use his invincibility to fight evil Germans in a pulp comic book saga.

VIBROBOY

Jan Kounen (1994) From that really crazy French director Jan Kounen (Dobermann, Capitaine X) comes another tale of complete absurdity lathered with stylish editing and featuring a raging homosexual. I do believe that appears to be Kounen's signature style when directing. As I can remember, There was a soldier who wanted the prisoners "nuts" in Capitaine X and in Dobermann, well, just watch the film. Vibroboy takes that killer inanimate object thing and switches the defaults around, dizzying everyone (No Pun Intended). A cross-dressing faggot discovers an ancient artifact and gives it to his best friend - an abused spouse. Things get Tetsuo-ish from then on out, but then again, what film doesn't carry the heavy and original burden of surrealism created from Tetsuo? Soon her crazy rural French husband creates a weapon using a modified chainsaw and attaching the dildo Aztec artifact and begins to chase his wife on sadistic suspicion of her cheating. In due time, a refrigerator talks, a dead rabbit summons evil, and a man is transformed into Vibroboy - A sadistic, sex-crazed man of metal and scraps who plans to reem and rape in the name of his lost civilization. Vibroboy is a clever invention using dark humor, sadism, homophobia, science-fiction, and horror. The end result is no short of stunning. While a longer feature time would have improved upon the short 27 minute runtime, the film bears no ill traits other than the slow beginning. But this alone assures you that good things come to those who wait. Besides, how else would you see a film about a killer vibrator?

DOBERMANN

Jan Kounen (1997) As you can see from the tribute to Vincent Cassel, i will pick up any film with even the slightest cameo from him. After having a friend recommend me this film during his stay in France, i knew i had to pick it up. The film opens up with an incredibly bad vibe as we are shown this goofy looking CGI of a dog standing erect like a human licking the screen with blue jeans on. It then quickly flashes to the inside of a church. Today, we will witness the baptizing of a baby named Yann. Only it is interrupted by a troublesome Doberman outside the church doors. After all is said and done, Uncle Joe has a present. A 357 Magnum, customized by an American smith. This gun is not only bad ass but just at the sight of it, the Doberman goes wild fearing for the babies life. After the quarrel, the gun flies in the air and lands in the cradle. Dobermann is born. 20 years or so later we meet up with Vincent Cassel, being badass in the middle of a street, shooting at an armored truck and eventually blows it up. We then meet Nat the Gypsy (Monica Belucci playing his deaf lover) who trots around France terrorizing many men and displaying her wide use of sign language. The dynamic duo and a huge gang of eccentric rats with various skills lead a huge bank robbery plan that extends to an entire city. It's easy to see that Dobermann is the top of his game and no one stands in his way. That is until Cristini comes in the way. He is a mean old motherfucker with a huge scar on the back of his head and a receding hairline. He wants nothing but to kill everyone in Yann's gang. Giving a baby a hand grenade doesn't phase him in the least. A comparison to him would be Sheriff Wydell in "THE DEVIL'S REJECTS" except hopped up on coke and looking for a creative outlook for all his pent up rage. The film while disguising itself as a brainless action film, counters with sincere emotion, and rapid fire mood switches. Scenes that you dont expect to happen, happen. This film can never be called predictable. While it seems cartoonish and humorous, it gets intensely dark and violent. The performances are great and it is laced with enough activity to stimulate your brain for an hour and thirty eight minutes. It actually seems like a re-telling of Killing Zoe except with a French theme and maniacal twist. The film itself is a high-octane action flick that has a sincere comic book atmosphere and feel. While it is skimping in the plot, we do have very creative characters and outcomes. We have a nihilistic priest, a horny sniper, a gum-smacking loose cannon, and a big guy with an axe that loves his puppy properly named Godzilla. All of this forms the mayhem that is Dobermann.

BLUEBERRY

Jan Kouven (2004)

Of all of Jan Kouven's works that I have seen so far, I regrettably find Blueberry (Also known as Renegade) to be his most insufficient attempt at another genre hybrid. Blueberry is a mythological western on the verge of The Road to El Dorado meets Tombstone; a film encompassing most aspects towards the rural life of the glamorized cowboy in the wild west, but also branches out towards the Injun side of life which includes their traditions, seeing freaky hallucinations, and also being the middle man between two warring civilizations. Jan Kouven is a director that is very misunderstood in his native land of France. Most of his films have a eccentric touch to them that might fly right over French viewer's heads. Them Frenchies must not take to kindly to films that transcend over France's "unique" romanticist view on everything. Take Dobermann for example; that film took an American action feel and relayed it over a hyper-kinetic French cast which resulted in an explosive good time. Blueberry however, is a solid excuse for their dissent towards the film, the border breaking, and the director. As a fan of many other of Kouven's works, Blueberry isn't the healthy polished film that I wanted from a film with Cassel as the lead character. This plays out as Cassel's mildest film. In all of his American roles, he adopts an accent to humanize his character with his surroundings, but in Blueberry, his accent was a neutral American and needed more southern twang. The last 20 minutes or so is a heavy dose of articulate CGI as Cassel's and Madsen's mind initiates a spiritual battle and the personality of the film wears thin. In this scene, the true natures of both men show as spiders and snakes along with other creatures and anemones slither across the screen, relaying Cassel's memories. As this scene chugs by, you find yourself getting bored with the Michael Bay infused hallucinogen commercial and you wait for a hint of plot driven dialogue as you sit perturbed on a couch. Blueberry is just another comic book serialization that links a leading French actor with many dying American stars such as Michael Madsen, Juliette Lewis in the nude, and Eddie Izzard. Not that there are many like this, but the film wears thin easy. I found the nature of the film to be whole-hearted but lacks any fiber that can make it worth its hefty run time. It would be best to see this film for a grizzled Vincent Cassel tripping balls, but that is about all I can recommend from it.

THE DEATH OF STALINISM IN BOHEMIA

Jan Švankmajer (1991)

Right from the get go, the wonderful short film The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia directed by Jan Švankmajer signifies with a title card that it is “a work of agitprop.” The short is easily the most political work I have ever seen by the stop-motion surrealist but also not without artistic merit. Although The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia is agitprop, it is ironic agitprop, utilizing the editing techniques of early Soviet agitprop auteur Dziga Vertov against the communist motherland. After all, Jan Švankmajer experienced persecution under communism, being banned from in 1972 from filmmaking and remaining virtually unknown in the West until the early 1980s. In The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia, the Czech auteur audaciously lampoons Soviet Communism and celebrates its much deserved death. If surrealist Communist filmmaker Luis Buñuel had the postmortem opportunity to view the film in his grave, he would be most likely condemning The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia but at the same time admiring Švankmajer’s knack for magically sublime surrealism.

The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia begins with a bust of Joseph Stalin being cut open on an operation table and from there a history of the 1948 Communist takeover of the Czech people begins. With the Communist occupation of the Czech people came a suppression of what was organically Czech kultur, hence the various stock footage of political personalities from the USSR featured throughout the short. The only thing signifying the Czech people is when Stalin's head is painted with a Czech flag which is eventually cracked open, revealing nothing but human guts, surely symbolic of the cultural void that was left after the death of Czech communism. The communists were not too fond of individualistic personalities, being the good platitude-worshipping collectivists that they are. In fact, communists felt that art should be of a universal collectivist nature and felt traditional European art to be of a bourgeois nature, something they felt had to be destroyed. What the Communists did not realize is that art is one of the few redeeming qualities of the bourgeois as so wonderfully expressed in Hermann Hesse's marvelous novel Steppenwolf. In The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia, Švankmajer animated a production line of proletarian workers that are eventually lynched, finally falling into a bucket of clay oblivion. After all, in Communist countries, the individual is merely another product of the state, an object to be used from birth and to be disposed of at anytime, whether it be mauled in factory or killed in a war.

Despite being a work of agitprop, The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia is as innovative and artistic as Švankmajer's greatest films. After watching the short film, I have a feeling that a lot of the dark elements that dominate the Czech auteur's work are a result of 45 years under Communist slavery. The Slavic peoples of Eastern Europe make no lie that their countries still have not recovered from communism, an internationalist materialistic legacy without a true culturally intrinsic legacy. Dark days in the former Communist states are very much alive today as expressed in more recent Slavic films like Srdjan Spasojevic's A Serbian Film, Mladen Djordjevic's Life and Death of a Porno Gang, and György Pálfi's Taxidermi. If The Death of Stalinism in Bohemia and more recent Slavic films are anyway an expression of the dark collective unconscious of the Slavic peoples, one can probably expect a bloody (and most likely nationalistic) revolution in the old Slavonic lands sometime in the near future.

Jan Švankmajer (2005) AKA Sílání

Lunacy is a film, like no others, that expresses what the entire film is about, only in its title. Lunacy is the newest addition to the extensive filmography of surrealist Czech Jan Svankmajer. He has spawned award winning artists to have imitated his stop-motion style such as the Brothers Quay. Lunacy is a film that bares no short-comings and is one of his best works. What is madness? What is insanity? The director takes these unknown depths of the mind and wipes them on the screen. When you first meet Jean Berlot, he is having a horrible nightmare about two pinheads trying to submit him and straitjacket him. He wakes up violently, causing fires in the hotel where he sleeps. A marquis finds him in his shocked state and offers him a ride. What will become of him as he extends into blasphemy, asylums, and bizarre rituals? The story is a welding of stories from Edgar Allan Poe and the Marquis De Sade. When you take the utmost horrific tales only to blend them with the bizzaro perversion, Lunacy can be the only outcome. Jan Svankmajer continues to defy all conventions by opening the film with his discussing how art is dead. To me, this might be the most important facet of this film. To create a piece as this, and denounce it as art is a bold move. The settings that he create are of the most peculiar. For instance, in one scene as our leads are riding in a carriage, we see a highway in the background, populated by automobiles and life. Jan Triska as the Marquis might be the physical embodiment of insanity. His lazy-eye and never ending cackle might add to this, but it is ultimately his discussions. He makes several key notes in the film, disproving God and all origins of religion. After hammering hundreds of nails into a lifesize "Jesus-on-a-cross", of course. Opposite of him is Pavel Liska, who reeks with embarrassment and awkward feelings. He is truly the hero, but a pitiful one at that. No one could ever pull off a meat puppet show besides Svankmajer. Each piece of the film is separated by a brilliant puzzle piece of a quest involving eyes and a cow's tongue. The delirious music in the background only furthers you feeling unnerved. Lunacy is a brilliant and different film for Svankmajer to create. It can be seen as a social commentary towards the punishment on the insane. Should the insane lead the sane, or should we resort to punishments and heavy medication? Who is really mad and who is sane? What is sanity?

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE UNDERNEATH

Jane Arden (1972)

For me to describe a woman as the greatest “feminist filmmaker” who ever lived would not typically be the most flattering of compliments, at least when concerning the use of the word “feminist” in my own personal lexicon, but when it comes to the tragic Welsh auteur/actress Jane Arden (Vibration, Anti-Clock), I do not mean it to be totally facetious. During her relatively short life, which was cut short when she committed suicide at the age of 55 years old in late 1982, she only directed two feature-length films and one short, yet her debut feature The Other Side of Underneath (1972) aka The Other Side of the Underneath – a psychosexually erratic epic avant-garde work combining seemingly aesthetically discordant scenes of surrealism and realism about a schizophrenic girl on the verge of suicide – alone merits her an important place in cinema history as a strikingly singular and innately idiosyncratic work that is without contemporaries, even if it is somewhat plagued by counter-culture mumbo jumbo of the now rather outmoded sort. Adopting the then-trendy socially ‘liberating’ interests of feminism and the anti-psychiatry movement of the 1960s, Arden became seriously committed to these dubious causes from 1965 on, and in 1970 she started the avant-garde feminist Holocaust Theatre Company, where she wrote and directed the play that would later be adapted into her first feature The Other Side of the Underneath – a film shot and produced by her partner Jack Bond (director of Dali in New York (1965) and the Pete Shop Boys musical It Couldn't Happen Here (1987)). Taking its title from a line of her successful 1969 play “Vagina Rex and the Gas Oven,” The Other Side of the Underneath would ultimately evolve into the greatest artistic achievement of Arden’s relatively short directing career because, aside from being what is arguably one of the most aesthetically and thematically ambitious films of its time, the film also has the distinction of being the only British feature-length film of the 1970s to have been directed solely by a woman (although fellow feminist filmmaker/film theorist Laura Mulvey co-directed a couple flicks with Peter Wollen), thus one could quite easily argue that the director was a rare feminist who more than practiced that which she preached, even to a deleterious degree. Not unsurprisingly for those that have actually seen The Other Side of the Underneath, the film had not been screened since a July 1983 National Film Theatre tribute to Arden (she committed suicide on 20 December 1982) until relatively recently in July 2009, thus it developed an almost mystical reputation as a sort of lost holy grail of avant-garde cinema. Seeing Jane Arden star in Separation (1968), a bittersweet yet sometimes humorous film she also co-penned set in the Swinging London zeitgeist about the disintegration of a marriage, it is almost hard to believe that she is the same woman who directed The Other Side of Underneath – an intrinsically dark gloom and doom work without humor or tangible hope that clearly foretells the director's suicide as if she had already accepted her fateful death over a decade before she actually gave into self-slaughter.

Things are not going too well for the unnamed protagonist (played by Susanka Fraey in her sole movie role) of The Other Side of the Underneath because, aside from being fished out of a lake in a dubious situation that seems to have been a suicide attempt that should have almost certainly resulted in the young lady's premature death, she is taken to a decrepit old mental institution (most of these scenes were set in the Welsh mining communities of Abertillery and Cwmtillery in Ebbw Fach) in ruins that put the post-industrial setting featured in Paulus Manker's Schmutz aka (1987) Dirt to shame in their sinister technocratic decay. Clearly, the all-female nuthouse featured in The Other Side of the Underneath is not a concrete reality as the gigantic and mostly vacant building is falling apart, full of debris and trash, and is in an irreparable state far further gone than the mind of the protagonist who sees pernicious phantom children in grotesque masks, a sexually confused female jester named "Meg the Peg" (played by Sheila Allen) with a smile and pantomimes more creepy than Ellen DeGeneres, a cadaverous cellist (played by the actual composer Sally Minford) who plays intrinsically inharmonious tunes in dark hallways, and psychedelic rock bands. The protagonist, like director Jane Arden, is quite antagonistic when it comes to therapists and wastes no time in bitching out the sole 'soul doctor' (ironically, played by Arden herself) at the quasi-lesbian lunatic asylum. When not laying in bed and being tormented by the merrily mischievous Meg the Peg, the pretty protagonist is stabbing to death fellow female patients with a butcher knife slasher-style while a psychedelic rock band performs live, watching herself dance in an antique cabinet in an unnaturally frenzied manner, having some awfully perturbing periods, using the little girl's room where evil little girls wearing monsters masks and wielding axes dwell in the bathroom stalls, looking at shattered glass in a ritualistic manner with a topless fellow patient, having a transsexual marriage ceremony/funeral, walking around the mental institution (which looks more like a bombed-out factory than a hospital for hopelessly hysterical women) in a somnambulist-like state, and encountering women standing naked turned away from the cross of Christ, and various other peculiarly penetrating situations that might make it seem like she is in the humble home of the Whore of Babylon. Later, after regretting the gospel of psychiatry and patriarchy, the protagonist attends a traditional family get-together outside in what seems to be the Welsh equivalent of Harmony Korine's Gummo (1997), where pretty boys engage in heated fistfights, a pig is cooked over an open flame and eaten, the Welsh prove they are much better drinkers than the Irish, and everything is not as it seems in one rather deranged daydream.

In a scene obviously inspired by Ken Russell's The Devils (1971) and, in turn, potential 'crucifix envy' on Ms. Arden's part, the lovely yet loony lead protagonist of The Other Side of the Underneath is crucified, but instead of bleeding from her hands and feet, she is bleeding profusely out of her womb as if she just had a miscarriage of a pair of Satanic twins of sin. As someone who had a Christian friend who once matter-of-factly told me that women hemorrhage for about a week every month, have unbearable pain during child birth, and are under subordination of man as a punishment from God because of an evil and deceptive serpent conning the first woman in human history to make the mistake of consuming the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil and thus causing the “original sin” of man, I can see why Jane Arden felt it necessary to create such an aesthetically heretical and spiritually hysterical scene of a topless schizophrenic chick with vital fluids oozing from her cunt on the cross in a scene that puts to shame the softcore Hollywood heresy of The Last Temptation of Christ (1988) directed by Martin Scorsese, where Jesus wusses out on the cross and gives into a life of sins of the flesh and self-indulgence. I might be looking too far into things, but The Other Side of the Underneath seems to have influenced a number of much better known cinematic masterpieces, but the most blatant seems to be The Shining (1980) directed by Stanley Kubrick, especially in regard to the hallucinatory and phantasmagorical scenes of various apparitions (especially of little girls) in the mental institution, which are no less effective than the iconic ghost scenes in the Stephen King adaptation. Undoubtedly, if there ever was a female/feminist celluloid counterpart to David Lynch’s cult masterpiece Eraserhead (1977), The Other Side of the Underneath is it and it is no less esoteric, if a bit more visually kaleidoscopic and socio-politically blatant in its criticism of gender and women’s role in the modern world. Additionally, if one were ever to dig in to the unruly and ‘possessed’ unconscious mind of Isabelle Adjani’s curiously creepy character in Possession (1981) directed by Andrzej Żuławski, it might seem like the psychotic celluloid psychodrama Arden dreamed up in The Other Side of the Underneath. Indubitably, if Helma Sanders-Brahms scratched the surface of female schizophrenia in Die Berührte aka (1981) No Mercy, No Future, Jane Arden dived in deep and without moral or social qualm with The Other Side of the Underneath to the point where it potentially contributed to her suicide as it is surely the sort of work that one must be in camaraderie with demons as no virgin of misery could have tackled such uniquely unsettling and—frankly—soul-destroying material without being forever touched by an ugly kiss of death as sired by a very real mental disintegration, thus it should be no surprise that most of the cast was drunk or high on LSD (Arden apparently enjoyed her alcohol while everyone else was tripping) during the filming of the, quite literally, ‘psychedelic’ production. Indeed, whatever arguments one might make regarding the artistic merit of The Other Side of the Underneath, it is impossible to deny it was made under the sort of decidedly morally degenerate circumstances that led to the soulless Sodom and Gomorrah that is the West today, but one also cannot deny that Jane Arden knew how to create art that reflected (her) life and vice versa.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE UNDERNEATH

Surely, Jane Arden assembled a celluloid 'bad trip' of thoroughly abstract "anti-psychiatry" surrealism and fierce fecund-free metaphysical feminism with The Other Side of the Underneath that makes the strikingly scatological demonic possession of The Exorcist (1973) seem rather tame and tedious by comparison, which is no small achievement, especially for a film that has no interest in being described as a 'horror film,' even if the psychological horror never ends. With the release of The Other Side of the Underneath (as well as Arden and Bond's other cinematic collaborations, Separation and Anti-Clock) on DVD and Blu-ray by BFI in 2009, there is no reason that the film should not develop a new cult following, especially with the further spread of female discontent and mental illness in the Western world, where everyone is taking some sort of mind-altering/dulling pharmaceutical drug(s) just so they can get up in the morning and live some semblance of a 'normal' life. Of course, I have one major warning regarding The Other Side of the Underneath, especially in regard to the final segments of the film in which the protagonist goes through a sort of 'hippie rebirth' where a sensitive man pays special attention to her sensitive female parts, she is crucified in spite of the holy patriarch Jesus Christ, and she goes through a number of dubious quasi-Buddhist-feminist rituals to reach 'total transcendence' of body and soul, but as Jane Arden essentially proved with her own suicide, all forms of the counter-culture Weltanschauung have proven to be—at best—temporarily entertaining and heedlessly hedonistic but ultimately counterfeit and—at worst—totally self-destructive. That being said, The Other Side of the Underneath is, at least for me, a cinematic goldmine of entrancing and horrifically hypnotic celluloid images, but also an unintentional how-not-to guide for a woman to lead her life. Indeed, when it comes down to it, Jane Arden was another victim of the Golden Calf that was counter-culture 'liberation.' Although I sincerely doubt Arden would agree, The Other Side of the Underneath is one of the most penetrating looks at the positively possessed collective unconscious that is Occidental womanhood.

Just like the tag line reads, "Don't judge a book by the cover." Little Noises is not a comedy, and nor is it a happy film. The humor of the DVD release is one thing to appreciate. There is none of anything you see on the cover art. Before you begin to judge this film as some romantic comedy in New York, read on. It's a tiny film concerning most negative emotions you can cover. This was one of those straight shot films that Crispin Glover starred in to produce his own features. This story has Crispin Glover in a role where he isn't an eccentric brainiac. In this role, he plays a man named Joey. He has wanted to be a writer more than anything his entire life. The only problem is, is that he lacks any creativity or artistic endeavors. Upon his mute friend Marty leaving his book of poems behind, Joey decides to steal it and publish it. Rik Mayall also has a great role in this film as a bumbling literary agent who has his head stuck up his ass. You might know Rik as Drop Dead Fred. What a career change. A Murder of Crows even seems to take the plot outline and fleshes it out more. This film managed to fix many of the mistakes that were present in Little Noises. Normally, I like a conclusion to my films but Little Noises has a mildly sadistic ending that is as heart-breaking as it is cruel and inhumane. Little Noises is a normal film by all means, but does feature many bizarre elements, such as autistic philosophies, emphasis on the role of the Moon, dream-logic scenes, and the weird contrast of colors. Marty steals the show in this film. I've never known a character to steal it from Glover but it was done. His persistence in creating a friendship is fickle and admirable. His outcome in the story was unbearably depressing. It's like the director despised the character. Without Marty, there would be no Little Noises. Little Noises was billed as a comedy but I cannot back up that assumption. There was little to no humor in this film, just Crispin Glover getting furious with his dimwit friend, Timmy. Little Noises is an effective tale of deceit and shallow love. Crispin Glover is always a name to recommend so I saw no real faults.

SAVE THE GREEN PLANET!
SAVE THE GREEN PLANET!

Jang Joon-hwan (2003)

I once attempted to review this film 2 years ago. With the subject matter at hand, I found it nearly impossible to articulate my thoughts of the emotional constant of Save the Green Planet! I set out to hopefully aid you in a quest of enlightenment. Save the Green Planet! is one of my personal favorite films. It also ushered in an era of Korean viewings which have also created a new brand of favoritism, striking almost any Korean film with a whirlwind force of appreciation. Directors love to attempt to layer their creations with many blends of feelings and sequences furthering the intellectual and artistic capabilities of the cumulative emotions nearing the climax of the film. Judd Apatow created a new generation of raunch romantic comedies that appease both smarmy female crowds and the stoner group simultaneously. Such an invention can surely be used to better accord than making dick & fart jokes on a date with Meg Ryan or such. Joon-Hwan Jang penned the script for Save the Green Planet! during his own psychotic stint. I find that directors who serve as a personal scribe to immerse the audience deeper into their vision. This is not only a guideline but a fact. Just as Sion Sono proved with both Suicide Club and Strange Circus, these Asian writers write material that is deranged genius. Perhaps even otherworldly. It's hard to really express the sheer amount of emotional changes you will come through while watching this for the first time. For the first time, I can honestly say I laughed, I cried, and I cringed, without it being an inane quote or word-of-mouth generic reviewing. A crazed conspiracy theorist kidnaps the chairman of a chemical company with this deep notion that he is in fact an alien for Andromeda. He will stop at nothing to save Earth, this even includes aggressive torture sessions and many mind-melding situations culminating in the eventual deterioration of all things cerebral. Oh yeah, there's also a really adorable dog. All this plus many genre covers of Judy Garland's Somewhere Over the Rainbow. I don't know how it was managed, but I believe that Joon-Hwan Jang has himself the perfect and definitive score. The slow drone of the string section towards the tragedy scene leaves my soul shaking. It's easy to tell that Joon-Hwan Jang was heavily inspired by the Hollywood serial thrillers as Misery and Silence of the Lambs. The eventual progression of the film's events blows this film way past expectation - bordering on the insane and cosmically creative. With an ending that needs to be seen to believe, It's possible to say that this is in my top 10 list. Each character has a story and just like any good film should stress, this one will keep you guessing. Plus you never really know who the antagonist is. Save the Green Planet! is a curio indeed. A film concerning a likely savior of earth while this film being the likely savior of cinema. Touché, Joon-Hwan Jang... touché.

VALERIE AND HER WEEK OF WONDERS

Jaromil Jireš (1970)

Inspired by classic iconic fairy tales like Alice in Wonderland and Little Red Riding Hood and based on the 1935 novel of the same name by avant-garde Czech writer Vítězslav Nezval, who was influenced by themes and settings explored in novels like M. G. Lewis' The Monk: A Romance (1796) and Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (1818) and F. W. Murnau's film Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror (1922), Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970) aka Valerie a týden divů directed by Jaromil Jireš (The Cry, Incomplete Eclipse) – a phantasmagorical and psychosexual surrealist work that manages to seamlessly blur the line between fantasy and Gothic horror – is indubitably one of the most magnificent and mystifying works of celluloid thaumaturgy ever assembled. Not unlike American auteur Richard Blackburn's devalued Lovecraftian vampire flick Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973), Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is a striking and often sinister cinematic work that follows an innocent 13-year-old girl on the verge of sexual awakening as she is ambushed by a 7-day virtual carnival of unsavory humans, lighthearted lesbians, vicious vampires and ambiguous anthropomorphic creatures. Also, like Lemora (as well as many of the weird tales of H.P. Lovecraft), Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is a work where the virginal protagonist must come to terms with the yet uncovered reality of her dubious ancestry and seemingly odious forebears. Featuring perfectly contrasting sequences of angelic achromatic daylight scenes and chimerical twilight scenarios, Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is a fanciful filmic phantasy that provides even the most cynical and rationalistic of adults with a remainder of the marvel and enchantment of their less pessimistic childhood years. Of course, with its stirring scenes of frolicsome lesbian sexuality and magical menstruation, Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is not the sort of film one should show to immature adolescents, even if many of these saturnine and sensual scenarios are portrayed in an ethereal and enigmatic fashion. In short, it is no exaggeration for me to say that Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is one of the most pulchritudinous and enrapturing films that I have ever seen, but I guess that it is no surprise when one considers that it was created in the same nation that produced such aesthetically-titillating cinematic masterpieces as Fruit of Paradise (1970) aka Ovoce stromů rajských jíme directed by Věra Chytilová and Jan Švankmajer's direful yet dippy Slaviczized adaptation of Goethe's Faust (1994).

The first thing most viewers would probably notice upon watching Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is the youthful and undefiled beauty of Czech actress Jaroslava Schallerová who plays the title role of Valerie. Although Schallerová would later become a popular actress in Eastern Europe, later appearing in works including The Little Mermaid (1976) aka Malá mořská víla directed by Karel Kachyňa and Zaklęte rewiry (1975) directed by Janusz Majewski, it would be her debut performance at the ripe age of 13-years-old in Valerie and Her Week of Wonders that would secure her lasting fame in the international film world. During the film, Valerie's torment seems to begin when a drop of her blood falls from her body and lands on a lily white flower, thus despoiling the bud's color and symbolically signaling her new status into biological womanhood. During the beginning of the film, Valerie encounters a nerdy thief named Eagle ("Orlík" in Czech) who steals her sacred earrings, but subsequently returns them out of guilt. Despite his seemingly delinquent intentions early on in Valerie and Her Week of Wonders, Eagle ultimately becomes a passionate watchful protector of Valerie who warns her of a cadaver-like cloaked monster named "Weasel" who wears a grotesque weasel mask (to hide his even more malformed and sepulchral face) and acts in a weaselly by stalking and teasing the bewildered girl throughout the film. Valerie – whose parents were apparently honorable church leaders (a bishop and a nun) that are now long dead – soon discovers that her deathly pale but conspicuously beautiful blonde-haired and svelte grandmother is hiding pertinent information to her family's seemingly shadowy history. Valerie's grandmother – an intrinsically puritanical woman whose religious fanaticism is obviously a translucent shield to cover her degenerate erotic past – has not gotten over her love for her ex-beau, a sadistic and hedonistic priest named Gracian. On her often macabre but equally majestic week of wonders, which includes rape via profane priest and being burned alive for an adoring peasant audience like a common witch, Valerie eventually discovers the root of her grandmother's perennial suffering (and her eventual treacherous betrayal), as well as the true and surprising identities of her family members. Naturally, Valerie and Her Week of Wonders – being a surrealist postmodern fairy tale of sorts – unfolds in a phantasmal fashion equipped with a sort of delirious and daunting yet delightful dream-logic that defies any semblance of realism, but nonetheless making perfect sense on the metaphysical level because, unlike similarly ambitious avant-garde 'parables' (e.g. Henri Xhonneux's 1989 film Marquis), it is certainly not a film that will make you feel hopelessly restrained by an overwhelming aesthetic-onslaught and cheated out a full and engrossing story.

Undoubtedly, Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is one of the most elegant, culturally-refined, and spellbinding works of cinematic blasphemy ever assembled; where religious leaders are the most unholy of Satanic fiends and where nature in its most raw form is the height of sacrosanct. But then again, few, if any, things are more immaculate and mysterious to the eye of a child than nature at its most organic and unsullied; be it the decomposing corpse of a still-born kitten or the unkempt hair contained within an adult's odorous ordure-stained underwear. Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is such an extraordinary and transcendental cinematic work that even manages to make sibling incest and menstrual blood seem miraculous and downright divine, which is no small feat by director Jaromil Jireš; an adult auteur whose imagination is not by any means less developed than a prodigious (if peculiar and oversexed) child genius. Of course, seeing as it features the peeled tiny teats of 13-year-old Jaroslava Schallerová and the real-life death of a live animal, Valerie and Her Week of Wonders is a film that is sure to desensitize any child who has the premature honor of viewing it. Although a fairy tale story about a feisty flower-child, I would not recommend Valerie and Her Week of Wonders to faeries; figurative or otherwise, as it is a work that is not hip to frivolous ideals of peace, passivity and empty epicureanism (even if the images might lead one to assume otherwise), but struggle and self-sanctification in an increasingly hostile world of persuading pleasures and retrogressing morality. Needless to say, for fans of fateful fable films like Maurice Tourneur's Carnival of Sinners (1943), Robin Hardy's The Wicker Man (1973), Neil Jordan's The Company of Wolves (1984) Robert Sigl's Laurin (1989), and Michele Soavi's The Church (1989), Valerie and Her Week of Wonders makes for the most categorical celluloid allegory.

HOBO WITH A SHOTGUN
HOBO WITH A SHOTGUN

Jason Eisener (2011)

After learning that Jason Eisener actually developed a real feature-length film out of the faux Hobo with a Shotgun trailer he created for an international contest in promotion of Quentin Tarantino's and Robert Rodriguez's double-feature release Grindhouse (2007), I immediately had legitimate skepticism regarding the quality of the work. After all, Grindhouse is a total insult to the original grindhouse films, as it lacks both the spirit and gritty aesthetic prowess associated with the original low-budget pictures. Furthermore, Robert Rodriguez's Machete (2010) is so horrible that it hardly inspired any illegal immigrants from south of the border to commit bloody machete wielding crimes against whites. In fact, the bloody aftermath that occurred upon the initial release of The Warriors (1977) was much more brutal. After watching Hobo with a Shotgun, I am happy and admittedly surprised to report that - not only is the film better than both original Grindhouse films and Machete combined, but it also manages to capture the essence of the original grindhouse films, except set in a zeitgeist more resembling our modern dystopian times. Instead of seeming like a gross mockery of the genre - like Grindhouse and Machete - Hobo with a Shotgun - both in the stark urban brutality and libertine legality of the streets contained within the setting of the film - is indubitably an authentic contemporary grindhouse film destined to stand the test of time. Aesthetically, Hobo with a Shotgun resembles the colorfully flamboyant urban decay of exploitation classics like Street Trash (1987) and Class of 1984 (1982). In ultra-violence and carnage, Hobo with a Shotgun borrows attributes from the likes of sci-fi-action blockbuster Robocop (1987) and countless vigilante revenge flicks made before it.

Dutch born actor Rutger Hauer plays the hobo with a shotgun - in a role so stoically heroic (albeit murderous) - that he makes Clint Eastwood's performance in Gran Torino (2009) seem like the prima donna antics of an elderly queen on the verge of senility. I recently saw Hauer play an old hippie charlatan cult leader in an exceedingly mediocre work entitled Happiness Runs (2010), so naturally it was quite therapeutic to see the Dutchman blowing off the heads of urban degenerates in Hobo with a Shotgun. Rutger Hauer had an excellent early career in his homeland of the Netherlands while working with Dutch filmmaker Paul Verhoeven (Soldier of Orange, Turkish Delight) and his career started out decently when he first moved to the United States, but it has unfortunately waned over the past two decades or so. Rutger Hauer gallantly fought the Nazis as a Dutch resistance fighter in Soldier of Orange (1977), but in Hobo with a Shotgun he plays a shabby bum who takes out a new type of enemy in the form of corrupt corporate assholes and bottom-feeding parasitical scum. Metaphorically, Hobo with a Shotgun is an assault on modern America and the American obsession with screwing over anyone just to make an extra buck. Upon first arriving at the corrupt city at the start of Hobo with a Shotgun, the Hobo encounters sleazy Hollywood producer types paying a couple of homeless men to completely humiliate and brutalize their bodies for a mere ten dollar bill. The Hobo also soon learns that the city is run by a sadistic capitalist named Drake and his deranged progeny - Slick and Ivan - two young psychopaths who get their kicks by raping women and brutalizing citizens. The general population of the city seems like a parody of American urban citizenry - as they follow blind allegiance to whatever filth is broadcasted on their TV - committing crimes and killing/robbing fellow citizens in an attempt to obtain some kind of deranged semblance of the American dream. Of course, when the Hobo starts annihilating criminals, the citizens begin to notice and follow suit - taking back their city one step at a time - liquidating every criminal they can find.

Hobo with a Shotgun is far from a landmark in motion picture history, but it is, undoubtedly, a full exercise in salacious subversive cinema of the quality kind. It is not everyday that I get to experience a highly entertaining film like Hobo with a Shotgun where a stoic master actor like Rutger Hauer liquidates individuals who resemble the white-shoe-boy-pansy-parasites that run Wall Street. I especially enjoyed a scene in Hobo with a Shotgun where the Hobo blows away a Santa Claus outfit sporting pedophile who stalks children at a public playground. The Hobo certainly delivers Pedo-Claus' Christmas present early in the form of a fatal shotgun explosion. It also goes without saying that despite portraying a less-than-homely-hobo, the handsome Nordic Rutger Hauer makes swarthy Charles Bronson of Death Wish seem like a sneaky rat by comparison. My main problem with Hobo with a Shotgun is that - despite Hauer's range as an actor (as opposed to most action stars) - the director did not give Hauer more time to shine, but I guess that is what one comes to expect from a film following in the footsteps of the original grindhouse pictures. Unlike a lot of modern Hollywood films (which contain a liberal relativist morality), Hobo with a Shotgun features a blatant dichotomy between good and evil. In fact, the Hobo delivers a very wise message when he states, "Evil will go against evil and wipe itself out." For a real-life historical demonstration of the Hobo's quote just take a look at any political revolution in history, which are usually of a cannibalistic nature. For example, in Joseph Stalin's Great Purge that lasted from 1936-1938 - the dictator liquidated around a million of his own people including communist party members, government officials, Red Army officials, and even his head (Nikolai Yezhov) of the NKVD Secret police. Some really evil assholes must have been running the United States for the last century for it to go down the amoral latrine so fast. If the USA is lucky, hopefully some real-life shotgun wielding hobos will start cleaning up American cities and bring real positive change to this culturally deteriorating country. After all, American youth would learn grandeur ideals of intrinsic value from hobo vigilantes than from all the ill-literate side-show-clown-play-thug rappers featured on MTV combined.

HOBO WITH A SHOTGUN

Near the conclusion of Hobo with a Shotgun, the pompous psychopathic villain Drake so arrogantly states to his barbaric peasant audiences, "Do you see what I mean folks, I provide you with NOTHING but the highest quality adrenaline-filled family entertainment." Of course, you can bet that your average Hollywood producer carries the same type of neo-vaudevillian opportunistic philosophy as Drake, for they also provide you with nonsensical philistine entertainment that will cause your blood to rush, yet such mindless lowbrow carnival routines merely degrade the viewer in the long run. For evidence of this, just go to your local bar or restaurant and listen to how many times some modern extreme philistine quotes a stupid movie like Todd Phillips' The Hangover or any other work of C-grade Tinseltown comedic smut. Speaking of derogating entertainment, in Hobo with a Shotgun, the heroic Hobo has some fun by humiliating and torturing a parasitic producer who creates Bumfight-like digital video filth. Although the Bumfight producer can dish out humiliating situations to desperate bums - when the tables are turned by the hobo with a shotgun - the producer whines and squirms like the parasite worms that he is. Sure, one could say that Hobo with a Shotgun is an example of hypocritical entertainment, as it is a trashy portrayal of a man taking out humanoid trash, yet with such an already degraded audience like the American citizenry, one must start small when attempting to spread new virtuous ideals.

Without question, a major flaw of Hobo with a Shotgun is the film's lack of multiculturalism nihilism; one of the main driving forces behind Occidental decline. In the film, Drake's less intellectually equipped son humorously states, "They are going to make comic books out of my hate crimes," yet nothing resembling a hate crime can be found in the entirety of Hobo with a Shotgun. In fact, it seems the writer and director of Hobo with a Shotgun felt it would be safer to show a holocaust of white children in a school bus than any type of true hate crime scenario. Of course, Robert Rodriguez had no problem portraying a Hispanic-led murder campaign of "brown power" in his deplorable piece of cinematic defecation known as Machete. After all, if a real Hobo vigilante were to cleanup the streets of an American city, you can certainly bet he would be liquidating cholo gangstas, rapper prankstas, and NYC banksters. After the negative backlash prompted by liberal film critics in regards to Michael Caine's extermination of wiggers, chavs, male prostitutes, drug dealers, and so called minorities in the excellent anti-politically-correct picture Harry Brown - the P.C. producers of Hobo with a Shotgun probably lacked the testicular fortitude to make Hobo with a Shotgun an equally politically-incorrect-free-for-all. It is a fairly simple concept to understand that to stop the third-worldization of the West, one must stop all third world immigration to the West. Elderly veteran Harry Brown certainly knew how to fix up a town and replenish it from its prior debasement.

As the bitchy Russian-born philosopher Ayn Rand prophesied in her best work of philosophy The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution - the United States is now divided into primitive bickering collectivist tribes (except a united white tribe) who proudly expound racial barbarism. The world of Hobo with a Shotgun certainly features a particular brand of anti-rationalist barbarism and the introduction of a new dark age, yet severely lacks the undeniable racial component so closely linked with this unsettling phenomenon. The film also features prostitutes, but lacks black pimps? Also, the director of Hobo with a Shotgun neglected to include any drunken Mexicans that one kind find (with a hand down their pants no less) passed out on urban park benches. Pretty funny how in American on every job application a person fills out, the employers ask you about your race (as they are an "equal opportunity" employer that hires token minorities before a better skilled white person just to meet a "diversity" quota), yet Hobo with a Shotgun completely ignores any realistic racial elements, as well as the obvious detrimental aspects of "multiculturalism." Of course, the film was made in a Canada - a country where a certain type of racially oriented speech is now criminalized and anyone that honestly discusses race is already heading down a slippery slope of illegality. Anyway, although hot prostitute Abby might be right in her assertion in Hobo with a Shotgun that a person cannot solve all the world's problems with a shotgun, one has to start from somewhere as the Hobo did during his diligent reign of head-exploding vigilante fun. Despite the fact that Hobo with a Shotgun is a work of sleazy entertainment, it does include a very true observation that is central to the film's plot; most humans are mindless cattle who follow any societal trend that seems to be hot. After the Hobo starts blowing holes in criminals - the citizens also religiously follow his street cleaning trend, yet when the population becomes afraid of vigilante justice after Drake's family threatens to liquidate their children, the city population attempts to crucify their hobo messiah - once again, proving their herd-like lack of personal idealism. For thousands of years Europeans fought in bloody battles and wars to keep barbarian hordes from the East and South from conquering their nations, yet in the late twentieth and early 21st century it only took a little televised mass communication brainwashing for indigenous Occidental populations to freely let hostile invaders (without even putting up a fight) from the former colonies in. Hobo with a Shotgun is certainly not a work of philosophy, but it provides a keen indictment on the automaton-like nature of modern mass-communication-worshiping humanity. I doubt many people will be inspired enough to read Schopenhauer or Nietzsche after watching the film, but at least Hobo with a Shotgun offers westerners some minor "food for thought" that they won't get from watching the latest Hollywood kkkosher-approved-silicone-titty-filled-stoner-comedy.

DISASTER MOVIE

Jason Friedberg, Aaron Seltzer* (2008)

Never in my life had I planned to watch any of this film other than the trailers we received that I promptly trashed and threw a smirk at the garbage with a hint of sadistic glee. While closing up at our theater, I had several minutes to spare, so I began my perilous trek into theater 1. The movie had just started. I hesitated for a second, sweat building at my brow. My fingers cramping up. Could this be the feeling of death creeping up on my back? I slowly sat down into the back so I wouldn't absorb all of the film at once. Visual pain happens to be real; proven so by Friedberg & Seltzer. These are the guys that should scare you, not German mogul Uwe Boll. As the film opened with a CGI rendering of earth morphing into an asteroid and the title of the film exploding on screen, I realized where much of the 20 million dollar budget went. I already can't believe people fund this shit. A retarded running gag of cows falling on Pop Culture icons. I sat through a tedious and yawn-rendering spoof of 10,000 B.C., then watched that turn into a spoof of American Gladiators, then Amy Winehouse, Indiana Jones, then something else that had no relation to disaster movies. I feel my stomach slowly turning in its rightful place. Soon some douche bag model wakes up in his bed. What starts as a slight odor of a plot, Flavor of Love is soon spoofed, followed by several other television shows and Soulja Boy. Cue the vomit arising in my mouth. I sat through around 15 to 20 minutes of this mind-numbing inane film and morally retarded filth and all I got was a vomit stain on my t-shirt. The ONLY parts that amused me: The No Country for Old Men spoof, and the non-stop Juno mocking. Juno had it coming. I feel slightly unable to perform my natural motor skills. I love working at a theater for every reason other than this. I should start working on rigging a death trap for anyone who buys a ticket for this film. I walked out after that 15 minutes of purgatory. I sat silent during the car ride home.

ZOMBIES! ZOMBIES! ZOMBIES!

Jason Murphy (2008)

The 2007/2008 timeline features many historical highs and lows. The first in the history of the United States - A black and female presidential candidate with serious campaigns. The Red Sox win the World Series, and the Beijing Olympics is dominated by American Michael Phelps. These aren't the important things. The hot topic on everyone's agenda is the latest zombie film to come out. People eat up zombie films (Pun intended). To tie up the infinity knot of equilibrium, Zombie Strippers and Strippers VS. Zombies had to be released within close proximity of each other. Just what we need, more zombie films. Now that I have let out an exasperated sigh, I will begin to explain just how dead the zombie genre is. We've seen loved ones become zombies time and time again. The scene that cemented in zombie film making 101 of having to kill your own family grows tiresome after awhile. I really don't care that Bobby Teenager had to kill his dog with an undisclosed weapon. Zombie films lack the motivation in creation and it's spreading like a disease. Zombies are officially dead to me. The biggest annoyance is the non-stop bitch fest we are treated to. Do not view this product if you have an aversion to bad special effects, horrible plot development, stale jokes attempting to poke and prod pop culture, uninspired zombies, and horrible actors playing horrible characters. With the exception of two, I find the cast of pimps, geeks, and whores to be tiring and a nuisance. The horror stripper film genre wasn't something to be dabbled in until From Dusk Till Dawn. This is the definitive anti-female empowerment film. After all, who wants to see "bitches" pretending to cat fight for 78 minutes? As soon as the "zombie drug" gets smoked in rock form, horny middle-aged men begin getting infected but the incident at hand is a contained infection. It's just a boring crowd of no-talent zombie creations groaning in front of a sealed shed that's called a strip club. Zombies! Zombies! Zombies! is an attempt to successfully turn another zom-com out but this isn't anything new. The line "I've had it with these mother fucking zombies in my mother fucking strip club!" almost saves it, but nay. Zombies! Zombies! Zombies! blows as much as the next year 200? zombie film.

Jason Reitman* (2007)

Now with the theatrical release of Juno, self proclaimed "Indie" film of the year, this style of film-making often brings up questions in my head. Why do these "independent" (Note the quotations) films have million dollar marketing campaigns, big name actors, and the licensed songs to every popular over-rated acoustic band in such a vagrant editing style? The plot is simple but cute. Juno MacGuff is a social misfit. Nothing about her is normal. Not her love for Iggy Pop nor her hamburger phone. Along with these horrible scenes that try to make her seem oh so different, she misquotes a popular nostalgic phrase. Nearing the end, she exclaims aloud "THUNDERCATS ARE GO". Now, me being a true child of all nostalgic era's, I immediately noticed it should read "THUNDERBIRDS ARE GO". Director Jason Reitman should fire his script supervisor. The film is packed to the metaphorical brim with odd scenes to try and emphasize the couple's quirkiness. The couple being Michael Cera (Of Superbad Fame) and Ellen Page (Of Hard Candy Fame). Whether it be balling up her coveted panties and thinking aloud of her or getting "super psyched" for the rerun of The Blair Witch Project. Now just because i have so much to say on the negative side doesn't mean i didn't enjoy it. In fact, i found it to be adorable, but since the outbreak of "Indie" filmmakers, such as R. Linklater, W. Anderson, and N. Baumbach, i have been disgusted by this contest to see who can shove the most Velvet Underground or Cat Power songs into the extensive soundtrack. The acting of course was exceptional, but the real star is Cera, whose goofy stance and perfect running outfit had most of us feeling adorably awkward. The film is too dumb for it's own good though. Whether it be the same editing that has been seen in every film lately, Quick action cuts paying attention to the very everyday detail of the common life. That tends to get boring. The only film to bring justice to this procedure was Shaun Of The Dead. Also noted that J.K. "J. Jonah Fucking Jameson" Simmons has a role that produces many laughs. Expect the first ten minutes of dialogue to consist of stupid hipster speak, throwing around "fer shizzle's" galore and city talk. This only makes me wish it had subtitles. This film is a great film to own for its cute mannerisms but is not worthy of an Academy Award. See also; Little Miss Sunshine for another "Indie" film with a budget of several million. These movies with the label of such, are funded by producers from big studios; swine of the worst degree. Greedy money hungry thieves who enjoy getting the masses in an uproar over a film that makes you feel original to love. While the film has it's very own pretentious aspects, it also introduces mainstream audiences with Suspiria and Herschell Gordon Lewis, which only infuriates me further. Overall, i enjoyed it but to be honest, it is a dumb film. Packing a film with charisma and chemistry doesn't ensure success, the key to that is obviously putting Velvet Underground on the soundtrack.

[REC]

[REC]

Jaume Balagueró (2007)

Chances are that you've heard of this Spanish shocker or its influences on Cloverfield and Diary of the Dead. The similarities between this and Diary of the Dead are perhaps too much. This film follows a first person camera into a routine mission for a group of firefighters being recorded by a T.V. anchorwoman for her show. This all turns to hell when they encounter "zombies." To me, the zombie film has been dead for a while. All these recent incarnations of the same monster that has ruled the horror screen are just trying to give life to a dead genre. Kicking a dead body won't bring it back to life, nor will making a pointless and vain attempt at altering the myth of zombies. In recent zombie films, directors try and spend too much time coming up with a new method of a zombie outbreak instead of focusing on the scares. After 30 - 40 years of zombie story lines, I crave the terror, not the spooky plot.

[Rec] does just that. It provides non-stop terror, and even manages to mix in a great reasoning behind it. The film is believable for the most part, and has very nice dialogue that is very true to its own screenplay. I often found myself feeling as if I was in on these tenants conversations. Like with most modern foreign horror, these directors pair up in order to share some artistic thoughts and work together. Possibly even an easier way to get their names out there. The directors were successful on their part. They created a terrifying film that starts off slow and lets out with a bang. As with most world cinema, we get a terrifying look at tenants tension mixed with a small bit of racial discourse. Due to the remakes over on American soil being so speedy, ~~US has a shot-by-shot remake in the works already under the title Quarantine.~~ Too bad this gem most likely won't be released until after the remake. What really shines here is the film's clever use of its audio capabilities. Grunts, static, breath, and screaming play a large part. In scenes, the audio even goes out due to blunt force trauma on the camera. Wildly inventive and stunningly tense, this only raises the horror factor a couple notches. [Rec] is a horrifying new-age zombie film. There is no 28 Days Later, no 28 Weeks Later, and no Day/Dawn/Diary of the Dead. These end-of-the-world movies are really pissing me off. I thank the directors for having enough decency and dignity in making this a concealed incident. The claustrophobia of it all is way more terrifying than being trapped in a lovely mall.

Jaume Collet-Serra (2005)

House (Not the awesome 80s horror film) is a film adaptation from a Christian novel by Ted Dekker & Frank Peretti. After the release date was pushed back to Fall 2008, the revamped trailer focuses on more of the possibility of the film centering around horror themes and mind games. In truth, this film ends on such an evangelical term that the film finds itself to be very annoying and tedious. Rated R for religious context and an inanimate plot expressed by actors who've might as well been replaced with mannequins. Two couples are stranded in a bed & breakfast inn after both cars are incapacitated. Upon entering and greeting the house's owners, they find themselves locked inside of the rotting house and pursued by a masked killer simply called the Tin Man. He lays down three rules of staying in "his" house. If only his rules as the autocratic ruler allowed for more fluidity for some free-based camera shots and some sound effects that aren't in every other horror film.

Welcome To My House. House Rules: 1. God came into my house and I killed him. 2. I will kill anyone who comes to my house like I killed God. 3. Bring me one dead body and I might let rule #2 slide.

With these simple rules, a game is sprung into action. A game that churns slowly through scenes intended to make you loathe/love each character for their own flaws. The character Jack looks exactly like Auckland born Martin Henderson (Smokin' Aces). This uncanny reflection gives the film sort form of acting credibility, but most of the time is spent on characters wobbling from one hallway to the next screaming. You must understand that for me to take a film seriously, I want a serious film - not some false advertised Jesus sermon in the guise of a horror film. One can scurry about the analytic factors of the last 10 minutes as how it seems that Madsen killed Susan (I killed God) and how God was feminized as a little girl from an Addams Family screenplay. All this and more curves into a slightly entertaining film that is completely worthless. I found myself visually appeased but this was the only hold this film had over me. Perhaps with every DVD, seat adhesive should be given. Trial packs of course. A film this bad will need all the revenue it can get. House is a bastard celluloid psalm containing strong elements of Saw and Silent Hill. As tempting as this sounds, this film proves that the dark side is always the better side. Much like The Golden Compass was slandered for killing god, this book/film features the same motives but in this film it's all right because of the power of good. I'm sorry, but I'd pick armor-plated warrior polar bear battles over some gay ass Christian horror film. A waste of time.

PARENTS

Jay Roach (2000)

As made quite clear in Neal Gabler's book An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood (1988) and the fairly stale doc based on it Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies and the American Dream (1998) aka Hollywood: An Empire of Their Own, Tinseltown was mostly founded by Eastern European and Austrian Jews who ultimately created a fake America and American dream via their movies that is quite different from the American of the white Christian majority. Quite unlike many of the Judaic culture-distorters that run Hollywood nowadays, these early pioneers were, relatively speaking, very adamant about assimilating and were very sensitive about their Jewishness, which they attempted to obscure with new goyish names and hot blonde shiksa wives, among other things. In fact, even Charles Blühdorn—a Vienna-born Jewish industrialist that did not get involved with the film industry until 1966 when his conglomerate Gulf+Western Industries purchased Paramount Pictures—was quite shy about his Hebraic background and, despite being connected to the Yiddish mob and Zionist warmongers like Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, he more or less incessantly denied his Jewishness and even curiously received a private Christian burial when he died. In fact, as described in Star: How Warren Beatty Seduced America (2010) by Peter Biskind, Hollywood alpha-leftist and all-around-shithead Warren Beatty once bragged in regard to getting the Jewish industrialist to fund his singularly plodding commie epic Reds (1981), "One of the things that gives me the biggest kick about making this movie about an American Communist is that I got the money to do it from one of the most right-wing fascist people in Hollywood, Charlie Bluhdorn!" Of course, it was not really until the rise of the 'New Left' and birth of New Hollywood during the late-1960s that Jewish filmmakers and their shabbos goy white liberal comrades like Beatty finally felt safe enough to begin producing far-left anti-American movies that openly mocked America's white majority and its culture, religion, and traditions. Undoubtedly the most obvious example of these subversive Semites was rampant womanizer and Judaic dope fiend Bert Schneider who, despite being born into an extremely wealthy Jewish family, made it his business to promote communist movements and to fund the Black Panther Party (in fact, he even developed a sick friendship with Huey P. Newton that involved harboring the violent black nationalist in his mansion when he was a fugitive killer) when he was not producing movies.

Of course, horror cinema eventually received the cultural Marxist makeover as well, though one could certainly argue that the anti-white agenda began in the genre long before the rise of New Hollywood with the superlatively sleazy and wholly aesthetically worthless exploitation films of kosher comrades Herschell Gordon Lewis and David F. Friedman, especially the anti-Confederate piece of uniquely unrefined and fiercely farshtunken schlock Two Thousand Maniacs! (1964), which portrays Southerners as disingenuously hospitable cannibalistic subhuman yokels with a perennial bloodthirsty legacy of singular murderous hatred. Indeed, thanks to goy-hating Hebrew Lewis—a man that dubiously bragged in the hagiographic doc Herschell Gordon Lewis: The Godfather of Gore (2010) that he once beat up a man because the fellow supposedly called him a “kike”—the evil ‘redneck’ caricature has become a major staple of horror as demonstrated by works ranging from Tobe Hooper’s classic The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) to even somewhat contemporary artsy fartsy European films like Fabrice Du Welz’s Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal. If Lewis is keen on cinematically crapping on crackers in an uniquely uncultivated fashion where he dubiously fetishistically sensationalizes that savage sadism that he ostensibly condemns, unnervingly beady-eyed Ashkenazi actor turned director Bob Balaban demonstrated with his somewhat quixotic debut feature Parents (1989) that he was fond of shitting on clean-cut white suburbanites from the 1950s. Admittedly, I decided to watch Balaban’s film after reading English auteur Ken Russell’s highly complimentary remarks regarding it in his autobiography Altered States: The Autobiography of Ken Russell (1991). Notably, Balaban previously starred in Russell’s sci-fi cult classic Altered States (1980), so I wonder if the filmmaker was succumbing to partiality and committing puffery when he wrote in regard to his favorite contemporary films, “...But for me the two most outstanding new talents are Bob Balaban, whose PARENTS made David Lynch’s BLUE VELVET look like CARE BEARS, and Bruce Robinson with WITH-NAIL AND I—about two out-of-work actors in the Sixties. Both these directors have a frighteningly perceptive vision and the unique ability to capture a particular moment in time as well as the heart and soul of the characters under observation. They have humour, imagination, style and flair. I have high hopes for their future.” Of course, Balaban never became the great auteur that Russell hoped he would be, as he more or less degenerated into a TV hack cum perennial character actor, with his directorial debut assuredly being his magnum opus.

For better or worse, Parents is undoubtedly one of the greatest and most preternatural black horror-comedies ever made, though for reasons that the director at least partly did not intend. Featuring lovable whack-job Randy Quaid and Paul Schrader’s wifey Mary Beth Hurt as the eponymous crypto-cannibal parents of a keenly kosher kid named Bryan Madorsky that clearly could not be their biological child (notably, Madorsky never starred in another film and went on to take up the stereotypical Judaic trade of accounting), Balaban’s debut feature is a quite strange film in that the boy lead seems to be a stand-in for the director himself. Indeed, more than anything, the film seems to be the absurdly autistic yet nonetheless fairly consistently entertaining result of a Jew imagining the horrors of being raised by pathologically passive-aggressive and anally retentive white bread WASP suburbanites from the 1950s. Somewhat seeming like the patently absurd and inexplicable result of the aesthetically-challenged bastard brood of Herschell Gordon Lewis and Paul Bartel somehow suffering the grand delusion that he is a real artist and attempting to direct a satirical gore flick with the cultivation of a Jean Renoir social satire like La règle du jeu (1939) aka The Rules Of The Game, albeit in the style of a David Lynch flick, Balaban's film is ultimately a rare and unintended example of the sort of atavistic ethnocentric paranoia that has inspired so many Jews in Hollywood, the mainstream media, and politics to wage a cultural war against the very people that built America. To H.G. Lewis' very, very minor credit, his anti-suburbia flick Suburban Roulette (1968) is nowhere near as venomous and anti-Anglo-American as the fierce filmic fart of a farce that is Parents where a cannibalistic 'fascist' father that suffers from a sort of perniciously passive-aggressive form of what Jewish Marxists and psychoanalysts call an 'Authoritarian Personality' becomes increasingly hostile with his son for refusing to eat human meat. On a slightly less serious note, the film also can be seen as a sort of allegory for post-JFK youth rebellion and the birth of the counterculture (de)generation due to its depiction of a troubled and somewhat socially ostracized young boy who learns to both hate and distrust his parents and reject his heritage.

Not unlike Norman Mailer with his shockingly delightful pseudo-Lynchian celluloid disaster Tough Guys Don't Dance (1987), Balaban opted to hire Angelo Badalamenti to compose music for his film so that no one would be confused by the fact that he was attempting to make a poor man's Blue Velvet. Of course, like his fellow Judaic Mailer, Balaban unwittingly attempted the innately impossible by contriving a film in the spirit of the work of one of America's most organically poetic and preternaturally instinctual filmmakers, for Lynch's talent does not come from a dry and calculating intellect but the soul. Indeed, as the great $\frac{3}{4}$ Hebrew Ludwig Wittgenstein once wrote in regard to the lack of originality of the Jewish mind and the tendency of Jews to merely copy others instead of pioneering, "Amongst Jews 'genius' is found only in the holy man. Even the greatest of Jewish thinkers is no more than talented. (Myself for instance.) I think there is some truth in my idea that I really only think reproductively. I don't believe I have ever invented a line of thinking. I have always taken one over from someone else [...] It might be said (rightly or wrongly) that the Jewish mind does not have the power to produce even the tiniest flower or blade of grass; its way is rather to make a drawing of the flower or blade of grass that has grown in the soil of another's mind and to put it into a comprehensive picture [...] It is typical for a Jewish mind to understand someone else's work better than he understands it himself." In other words, Balaban has a superficial understanding of some of the material ingredients that go into a Lynch flick, but he lacks the innate understanding and soul to sire such a film, for only Lynch can direct a Lynch film. Thankfully, quite unlike Lynch, Balaban has nil love for the people or place he depicts and has used the traditional Hebraic weapon of humor as a means to express his undying hatred for the evil WASPs that would not allow his parents and grandparents to play golf at their posh country club.

In a sort of cold, detached, and wholly materialistic fashion, Balaban might be able to explain the mechanics and superficial peculiarities of Lynch's films better than Mr. Eraserhead ever could (after all, Lynch is notorious for being ludicrously sentimental and superficial when explaining his work), but as the great German-American sage H.L. Mencken once noted regarding Jewry, they have "learning without wisdom." Indeed, where a great Lynch film has a deep, dark, and foreboding metaphysical presence that engulfs the viewer's entire soul, Parents thrives on sterile domestic absurdism and a sort of nefariously neurotic spirit, but of course that is not why it is a somewhat worthwhile cinematic work. While the film was not actually penned by the director but a fairly unknown fellow named Christopher Hawthorne—an assumed goy that Balaban randomly met on a plane who worked in a cubicle at pay-cable TV network Showtime's marketing dept—it is immediately apparent while watching Parents that it was created by a racial/cultural outsider who sees 1950s WASP suburbia as a sort of sinister Aryan American utopia that breeds mindless conformism, racial purity, and bizarre pathologies. In other words, there is no doubt that Balaban sees 1950s America as the worst thing since the Third Reich, so naturally it is only fitting that he cast an extremely Hebraic looking little boy that looks like he could be the son of Rick Moranis to play the child protagonist. Somewhat ironically, the film concludes with the boy causing his totally unkosher parent to be burned up in a sort of explosive suburban holocaust that feels like a sick fantasy on the director's part. It should also be noted that the cannibalism is ultimately revealed to be inter-generational, thus underscoring the irreparably tainted heritage of these extra evil Aryan flesh-eaters.

Notably, French erotic novelist and unconventional Nietzschean Georges Bataille once wrote, "This [cannibalism] is a desire no longer active in us, one we never feel now. Archaic societies, however, do show the taboo as alternatively in force and suspended. Man is never looked upon as butchers' meat, but he is frequently eaten ritually. The man who eats human flesh knows full well that this is a forbidden act; knowing this taboo to be fundamental he will religiously violate it nevertheless [...] The object some indiscriminating animal is after is not what is desired; the object is 'forbidden,' sacred, and the very prohibition attached to it is what arouses the desire." Keeping Bataille's words in mind, one could argue that the cannibalism depicted in Parents is merely the therapeutic means by which the all-too-normal titular characters in the film deal with their seemingly emotionally and spiritually draining lives of pathological conformity. Indeed, it is no simple task acting like a fake bourgeois sociopath all the time, thus cannibalism—the ultimate forbidden taboo—acts as the ultimate orgasmic release from a sham life of self-basing and self-denying suburban conformity. If Wiggstein was right when he wrote, "The face is the soul of the body,” then 10-year-old protagonist Michael Laemle (Bryan Madorsky) must be the most patently soulless little boy in the entire world yet, despite his highly debilitating social retardation, he somehow learns to deeply loathe his parents, especially his father, due to their taboo eating habits. Indeed, if there is anything constantly captivating about Parents, it is Michael’s brutally flat affect, which is apparent to both his parents Nick (Randy Quaid) and Lily (Mary Beth Hurt) and everyone he encounters, though he seems to be completely oblivious to his glaring social inadequacies. On top of his absurdly autistic essence and seemingly complete and utter incapacity to experience simple human emotions like happiness and joy, Michael tends to say inordinately random and inappropriate things and to ask extremely redundant questions that especially annoy the hell out of his father, who is a peculiarly private man that is obsessed with appearing completely normal. Michael and his family have just moved to a new undisclosed suburb from Massachusetts and on the first day of school, the protagonist makes quite the first impression when he states to his entire class after his teacher Miss Baxter (Kathryn Grody) asks him to name one new thing he learned over the summer, “Um, if you take a black cat and broil it on the oven...and you peel off the skin of the bones and take it off...and you check on the bone, you’ll be invisible.” While his teacher treats him like a foolish retard and his classmates laugh at him for his nonsensical black cat spiel, he impresses a tall blonde girl named Sheila Zellner (Juno Mills-Cockell), who was held back a grade because she may or may have not done sexually inappropriate things with male classmates and who tells the rather gullible protagonist that she is originally from the moon. While she is a good foot taller than him, sassy Sheila wastes no time in aggressively flirting with Michael by stating, “You ask a lot of question. I like that in a man.” In other words, Sheila likes the fact that she is the one that gets to wear the pants in their budding relationship. Additionally, Michael takes a likening to her because he genuinely believes she is a space alien. In fact, when Michael informs his parents that he has made a new friend and that she is an extraterrestrial of sorts, his father Nick gets angry and states, “We can’t make friends by telling lies, Michael.” In fact, virtually anytime they interact, Nick gets mad at his son because he says weird things and especially because he refuses to eat. After all, it must be a hard thing for a cannibal to have a son that refuses to eat human flesh that he went to relatively dangerous lengths to procure. While Michael might be quasi-autistic dunce that seems to be pretty much oblivious to everything, it is only a matter of time before he finally realizes the source of his subconscious dread towards his parents’ hermetic home cooking habits.

As demonstrated by the fact that he routinely refuses to eat and incessantly has horrendous nightmares involving tons of blood and dismembered body parts, Michael seems to subconsciously realize that his ostensibly clean-cut and wholesome progenitors are actually savagely sadistic cannibals with a kinky blood fetish. Indeed, one night after suffering an extra bloody nightmare, Michael goes downstairs and is shocked to find that his half-naked parents are doing some 'erotic wrestling' while partly soaked in blood. While he is not beneath killing to acquire corpses, Nick, who is conveniently employed as a scientist at a lab in the Division of Human Testing of a seemingly evil corporation called Toxico, mainly gets his man meat from work where he has a witless nerd underling specially prepare the bodies for him. As for mommy Lily, she does most of the good clean cannibal cooking, though Nick tends to do the grill cooking. Undoubtedly, Michael has a much better relationship with his mother, who, unlike Nick, does not yell at him when he says rather insane things to her like, "[I] found a way where we never have to buy gas anymore. You find some people but they have to be hanged. And you. . . And you chop off their hands and you throw them in the fire and they burn forever." As a little lad with a fiercely flat affect, Michael naturally makes himself seem all the more creepy by incessantly blankly staring at people as if he is trying to smother their soul. In fact, when Nick catches Michael staring at him one day, he remarks to his son during an extra awkward moment of father-son anti-bonding, "You watching me? That's smart. It's good to watch. But you know what? Other people are watching you [laughs] At school, at home. . . maybe even in the bathroom. Don't let them. First law of survival. Do you understand? It's the next best thing to being invisible." Of course, considering his increasingly antisocial behavior and reluctance to eat meat, Nick keeps a special eye on Michael, who does just the same exact thing, albeit in a more uniquely unnerving way.

When Michael is forced to draw a picture of himself and his family for class and decides to add tons of blood to the sketch as if he were a serial killer-in-training, his worried teacher seeks a social worker named Millie Dew (Sandy Dennis) for help. Miss Dew is somewhat neurotic and when Michael first sees her, he says rather rude things to her like "You're not a real doctor" and "You're not a real grown-up. Real grown-ups don't get upset." Somewhat predictably, when Michael's mother comes in to meet with Millie in regard to his aberrant artsy, she lies her ass off and claims that her husband and son have a great relationship. In reality, Nick is perpetually pissed at Michael for refusing to eat meat and usually only spends time with him during dinner time. When Michael dares to ask his father, "We've had leftovers every day since we moved here. I'd like to know what they were before they were leftovers," Nick absurdly replies, "Well, before that, they were leftovers-to-be." Indeed, it seems that Nick believes that all humans are potential leftovers-to-be. While no one is allowed at his house, Michael simply cannot hold back his little girlfriend Sheila when she runs inside and begins wrecking havoc around the entire place. Naturally, daddy Nick is more than a little bit annoyed when he catches Sheila pouring the patriarch's prized Château Margaux wine on Michael's unclad torso while the two both sit inside a meat freezer in the basement, which is where all the human flesh is kept. Aside from banning Michael from ever playing with Sheila again even though the bad little girl is the daughter of his boss, Nick tells him the following creepy pseudo-fairytale while tucking him in the for night, "This is a story about a boy...a very naughty little boy about your age, who thought he was better than everyone else. So he played where he wasn't supposed to play and he destroyed other people's private property. Do you know why this little boy was this way? He only cared about himself. And in the end, he grew up to be a very lonely, unhappy, self-centered little man." When Michael's mother tells Nick to stop telling the story since it is clearly scaring him, the flesh-eating family man expresses his seething hatred for his prodigal son by stating, "Oh, well, mister, you scare me too. You don't look like me. You don't act like me. You hate me. Well, you know what? I'm not so crazy about you either." Needless to say, things only get worse from there.

Despite being banned by his father from visiting, Michael soon sneaks over to Sheila's house and she warns him that all parents are evil phonies and then inspires him to distrust his father all the more by remarking, "Daddy says your father has a lot going on inside his head. Doesn't say much. Just like you." Considering she seems to be the only person he truly trusts and respects since she is the only person that accepts him for who he actually is, Michael ultimately takes Sheila's words of wisdom very seriously as he immediately decides to sneak into the 'Division Of Human Testing' laboratory of his father's work where he hides under an autopsy table while Nick is carefully dissecting an elderly male corpse. When Nick accidentally drops a pair of surgical scissors on the ground, Michael foolishly grabs them and then runs out of the building. While Michael manages to evade being spotted by his father, it does not take long for a hopeless paranoiac like Nick to realize what his son has been up to. Of course, things get a little bit unnerving for Michael when his father not only discovers him walking him home, but also later discovers that he has his scissors while they are sitting at the dinner table, thus confirming that the protagonist has been spying on his father. When Michael lies and absurdly states that he found the scissors on the front lawn, his father states, "Do you know what happens to little boys who tell stories? The muscles in their jaws start to tighten and then their lips get stuck together permanently" and then violently stabs a slab of meat with said scissors that is sitting on a plate right next to the protagonist. Later that night after his parents go to bed, Michael finally gets enough testicular fortitude to go looking around the basement and he ultimately gets the shock of a lifetime when he finds a dismembered human leg hanging from a meat hook.

When Michael finally tells Millie about his concerns regarding his parents' antisocial eating habits, the sullen social worker reluctantly accompanies the protagonist back to his house to prove that the decapitated body parts that he claimed to have seen in the basement are just a figment of his imagination. Of course, the two eventually happened upon a corpse, thus causing Millie to scream like a banshee that is being gang-raped by a gang of meth-addled Mexican bikers.

Not surprisingly, Millie's piercing scream alerts Michael parents and thus leads to the social worker being hunted around the house while the protagonist hides. In a scene that was blatantly lifted from Blue Velvet, Millie hides in a closet while Lily stabs through the door with a butcher knife. Though Millie puts up a valiant fight for a neurotic woman that even includes her intentionally wounded her hands by grabbing the knife blade so as to make Lily think that she has been mortally wounded, she is ultimately killed and cooked on the family grill, though Michael vehemently refuses to eat it. In fact, Michael trips his father when he is carrying a tray of Millie's grilled body parts to the kitchen table, thus hinting that the protagonist developed a special affection for the social worker despite his general distrust of grownups. As punishment for his reckless indiscretions, Michael is tied to his dinner chair while his father states to him in a sadistically self-satisfied manner, "I've been watching you, Michael. You're an outsider. You're not like them. You're like us [...] We're bound for life. No matter how much you hate us. I'm untying you and when you're free, you can sit down with us and eat, or you can run outside and shout your little secret to the world. And you know what they'll do? Michael, hmmm? They'll come here, and they'll burn us." As it turns out, Michael would rather see his parents burn. Indeed, aside from telling his parents that he does not love them anymore due to their quaint eating habits, he stabs his father immediately after he unties him. At this point, Nick decides enough is enough and resolves to kill his only son, even yelling like a disgruntled mad man, "Kids! Who made the little bastards? [...] We'll have another one, Lily. We'll bring him up right." Of course, despite being a deranged bitch, Lily loves her son too much to allow him to die, so she stabs Nick in the back while he is carrying Michael down the basement stairs. Naturally, Nick stabs Lily back and while he is lying on top of her and penetrating her wife with a knife, it seems like they are making love in what ultimately proves to be a sick (anti)sentimental moment that seems symbolic of their unhinged marriage. While Nick makes a dramatic attempt to catch and kill Michael while succumbing to his wounds, he ultimately causes the entire house to blow up after breaking a gas line and knocking over a large wine rack containing dozens upon dozens of bottles of Château Margaux. Luckily for Nick, he at least dies in his cannibalistic mancave while drenched in his two favorite drinks: blood and wine. In the end, Michael is happy to go live with his grandparents in the country, though he is left somewhat uneasy when his elders leave a sandwich filled with dubious meat on his nightstand after they tuck him in at night in what is a superlatively stupid and entirely predictable yet somehow fitting twist ending.

Be it looked at as a poor Judaic's take on Lynch, pro-Vegan crypto-propaganda piece, satire of lame old school TV sitcoms like Leave It to Beaver, allegorical depiction of American's Jewry's innate feeling of alienation in WASP suburbia, PSA for young Jewish children about the dangers of white goyim or all of the above, Parents thankfully invites many interpretations that—for better or worse—oftentimes transcend what is probably the film's true intrinsic intellectual worth. For example, it should be noted that the protagonist's family surname, Laemle, is very close to that of German-Jewish Hollywood pioneer Carl Laemmle, who was a founder of Universal Studios and who both financed and sponsored hundreds of Jews from Laupheim and Württemberg to emigrate from Nazi Germany to the United States in the 1930s. Notably, director Balaban comes from a similar background as his uncle Barney Balaban was president of Paramount Pictures for nearly 30 years from 1936-1964, his father co-owned a movie palace chain, and his mother was an actress. If one were to take the Laemle surname seriously as a subtextual reference of sorts, one could argue that the cannibal family is a metaphor for American Jewry's attempt to assimilate into the white Christian majority, with the boy protagonist ultimately rebelling against the secret cannibalism (translation: crypto-Judaism) of his parents (interestingly, there is no evidence in the film that the Laemle are Christians, as they have no crucifixes or portraits of Christ on their walls, which was quite common among white families during that time). After all, whether it be the Marrano crypto-Jews of Iberia or the Ashkenazim of Germany and Prussia during the early 1800s who, like Karl Marx's family, oftentimes disingenuously converted to Protestantism as a means to enjoy all political rights of citizenship, Jews have a very long history of living schizophrenic existences and acting in a completely different manner while behind closed doors. Either way, there is no question that Parents is a playfully pernicious assault on pre-counterculture white American before feminism, cultural Marxism and the so-called 'New Left,' sexual liberation and birth control, civil rights and multiculturalism, the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, and no-fault divorce turned white gentile America into the innately amoral and irreligious chaotic nightmare it is today.

While not exactly a hit film among most respectable film critics and academics, Parents actually received a fairly rave review from respected American film critic Jonathan Rosenbaum, who gave it three out of four stars and listed it as a "must-see." Indeed, Rosenbaum audaciously wrote, "Choosing a movie to take with me to a desert island, I would opt without a second's hesitation for Parents over such relatively predictable Oscar-mongering exercises as RAIN MAN, THE ACCIDENTAL TOURIST, or DANGEROUS LIAISONS, because it's a movie that kept me fascinated, guessing, and curious — even when it irritated me." On top of quite generously comparing Balaban's directing techniques to that of Orson Welles, Stanley Kubrick, and even Raúl Ruiz, Rosenbaum, who is a proud leftist Jew (and, like Balaban, comes from a family of movie theater owners), lauds the film for not succumbing to what he sees as the "politically conservative," "reactionary," and "retrogressive" nature of David Lynch's films, arguing, "Far from being nostalgic about the 50s (i.e., the present) like BLUE VELVET, PARENTS is corrosively analytical about the subject, and there's no real innocence to be found or celebrated here; even Michael has too much of a morbid streak to qualify as “pure” (like the Laura Dern character in BLUE VELVET.) Personally, I have to agree with Rosenbaum’s sentiments, even if I do not subscribe to his outmoded political beliefs, as it is plain to see that Lynch loves white suburbia and Balaban absolutely loathes it. Interestingly, in the same review, Rosenbaum notes the curious fact that many of Lynch’s fans are leftists, thus underscoring the seeming willful ignorance of his fan base. Of course, to his great credit, Lynch has thankfully never made a film with imaginary negro rocket scientists or ultra altruistic Judaic humanitarians, as he seems to be completely incapable of following in line with the cultural Marxist Hollywood narrative. After all, only Lynch could get away with directing a film like Wild at Heart (1990) that begins with Nicholas Cage violently beating to death a supremely sleazy sambo to the less than soothing sounds of heavily distorted metal music. In many ways, Lynch seems to be the living embodiment of the deranged white suburbanite that inspired Balaban’s debut feature. Personally, I cannot even count the many times that I have seen wholly worthless horror films with both covert and overt anti-WASP sentiments, so it was almost refreshing to see a film as preternatural and nuanced in terms of its goyim-bashing as Parents. Indeed, more than just simply moronically mocking white suburbia, the film is practically dripping with Balaban’s own angst, paranoia, and disdain for mild-mannered blue-eyed and blond-haired people. For whatever reason, it seems 1988 was a good year for wildly idiosyncratic anti-Aryan horror, as it also saw the release of the all the more perversely autistic horror-melodrama Pin (1988) directed by kosher Canadian Sandor Stern. Despite its absolutely bizarre brand of anti-Aryan paranoia, Stern’s film is absolutely beloved by an extremely gay Belgian nationalist/Odinist/neofolk fan that I used to somewhat know, but I digress.

A film that does for 1950s white suburbia what Revenge of the Nerds (1984) did for traditional Anglo-run universities and WASP fraternities in terms of mirthfully yet mercilessly maligning the old Euro-American mainstream and celebrating its demise in a fashion comparable to when Stalin’s Hebraic chief henchman Lazar Kaganovich bragged “Mother Russia is cast down. We have ripped away her skirts” while standing at the ruins of the great Cathedral of Christ the Savior after he had it destroyed, Balaban’s debut is an unintentional reminder why pogroms happen but that is also one of the reasons why it is so surprisingly intriguing, as it offers a rare insight into the sort of Hebraic paranoia that has led to Jewish politicians to promoting multiculturalism and the flooding of the United States with the sort of hostile third world people that have been brought here specifically to destroy the traditional racial, moral, and cultural character of the country. Of course, this is also why most Jews, including the so-called conservative ones like Zionist warmonger and neocon Bill Kristol, are so petrified of Donald Trump becoming the president of the United States as he is a symbol of both WASP power and a serious threat to Jewish power and subversion, even if he pays superficial lip service to the welfare apartheid state of Israel. Undoubtedly, it is hard to hate a film that the rather rotund celebrity film critic Roger Ebert once described as, "a real weirdo, one of the strangest, most depraved, certainly most depressing films I have ever seen." Of course, Ebert was also famously offended by Blue Velvet, so Balaban's film is in good company. While Balaban would take one more shot at the horror-comedy subgenre with the rather lame undead romcom My Boyfriend's Back (1993) and would direct episodes of various horror oriented TV series like Eerie, Indiana (1991-1993) and The Twilight Zone (2002-2003), he never again directed anything nearly as interesting or socially substantial as the cryptically hateful iconoclastic idiosyncrasy of Parents and is probably best known nowadays for his acting roles in Wes Anderson films and quirky cult films like his fellow four-eyed Hebraic homeboy Terry Zwigoff's Ghost World (2001). Certainly, it is strange to think that the four-eyed dork that conned Jon Voight out of a free suck-fuck in John Schlesinger's Midnight Cowboy (1969) would go on to direct arguably the most sardonic and socio-politically esoteric of cannibal films. On a more personal level, I can thank Balaban for strengthening my craving for red meat. Indeed, I have never considered Schrader's ladylove Mary Beth Hurt to be a particularly sexy broad, but in Parents she looks rather delectable while both fingering red meat in a dress and engaging in a sort of cannibal sex ritual while vital bodily fluids are covering her quite fair flesh. Likewise, I never thought wild mensch Randy Quaid would be so good at portraying an unnervingly uptight bourgeois bastard who has more dark secrets than Jerry Sandusky.

THE ETERNAL RETURN

Jean Cocteau° (1943)

While I would have never dreamed of such a seemingly splendid yet equally unlikely aesthetic marriage in a million years, French poet and cine-magician Jean Cocteau (La belle et la bête aka Beauty and the Beast, Orpheus aka Orphée) was actually responsible for penning and collaborating on a Vichy era Nazi themed Nietzschean reworking of Tristan und Isolde featuring Jean Marais as the ultimate screen blond beast and a swarthy evil midget as the most repugnant, if not hilarious, of untermensch villains. Indeed, the rather underrated film in question is L'éternel retour (1943) aka The Eternal Return aka Love Eternal and it is most certainly the most Cocteau-ian of the Cocteau cinematic adaptations that the poet did not actually direct himself as a work that makes Jean-Pierre Melville's Les Enfants Terribles (1950) starring Hebraic hag Nicole Stéphane (real name 'Nicole de Rothschild') seem like cheap counterfeit Cocteau by comparison. Directed by Golden Age era French filmmaker Jean Delannoy (La symphonie pastorale aka Pastoral Symphony, Notre-Dame de Paris aka The Hunchback of Notre Dame)—a once well respected film director whose career began to suffer during the late-1950s because he was attacked by the then-trendy members of the young French New Wave, including Truffaut and Godard, who considered him the ultimate 'anti-auteur' because he did totally 'uncool' things like carry a briefcase to film sets—The Eternal Return features a classic story with an emphasis on Nordic beauty that not only features an overt Aryan propaganda angle, but also contains nostalgia for France's Norman Viking history as personified by the platinum blonde heroine played by Madeleine Sologne who, like her tragic lover, is an "orphan of the sea" whose racially superior ancestors hail from the great white North. Condemned by the National Legion of Decency in 1948, this underrated classic masterpiece certainly has a certain pre-Christian romantic spirit about that is hinted at in its title which, as revealed at the beginning of the film, was borrowed by Cocteau from Nietzsche, who first wrote about the ancient idea of 'eternal return' (or 'eternal recurrence') in his work Die fröhliche Wissenschaft (1882) aka The Gay Science. Featuring a somewhat asshole hero who gets a kick out of torturing the weak and who certainly does not subscribe to what Nietzsche described as a Christian slave-morality, an oftentimes bitchy heroine whose lifetime of misery and poverty has made her hard and frigid, and an old ugly fat scheming wench and her malevolent midget son as villains who owe their god-given visceral hatred to genetic misfortune, The Eternal Return is certainly a work that contemporary viewers will find politically incorrect yet at the same time it does not subscribe to the old school Hollywood idea of good and evil, thereupon making for a truly timeless work that transcends zeitgeist and is tune with a cyclical, as opposed to linear, view of history. Delannoy's Cocteau adaptation is also probably the only film made before the late-1960s that I found myself laughing at loud at, as few things seems to be funnier than the pathological buffoonery of an evil young dwarf, especially of the superlatively swarthy bulging-eyed frog sort. Additionally, to me the tragedy of Cocteau's take on Tristan und Isolde was not that the two lovers die at the end, but that the hero ultimately died for such an ungrateful and treacherous bitch of a 'heroine' who could have easily thwarted her and her beau's tragic fate had she not chosen wealth and luxury over the man she loved. In that sense, The Eternal Return is more relevant today than it was upon its original release over seventy years ago.

As stated in the introduction written by Cocteau: "The Eternal Return... This title, borrowed from Nietzsche, means here that even legends can be reborn unbeknown to their heroes. An eternal return of the very simple circumstances which comprised the most famous of all great love stories." Indeed, the same stupid circumstances do tend to repeat themselves, though in The Eternal Return they play out in a slightly more eccentric way. Despite being a rich and opulent man who lives in a castle, Marc (Jean Murat) has become more or a less a slave and cuckold in his own home, which is inhabited by his deceased wife Edith's scheming and calculating old cunt sister Gertrude Frossin (Yvonne de Bray of Cocteau's Les parents terribles (1948)) and her evil 22-year-old midget son Achilles (played by 'Piéral', who would later appear in Delannoy's later Cocteau adaptation Princess of Cleves (1961)) and weak and lazy husband Amédée (Jean d'Yd of Carl Th Dreyer's 1928 masterpiece The Passion of Joan of Arc) who, like so many mainstream American republicans, collects guns as a pathetic means to compensate for his lack of masculinity. The only person that lives in his home that Marc likes is his 24-year-old orphaned nephew Patrice (Cocteau's lifelong muse Jean Marais), who he more or less considers a son since he has raised him ever since the boy's parents drowned when he was very young. Indeed, as a tall, blond, handsome, athletic, and enterprising young man, Patrice is everything that Marc's other nephew Achilles—an exceedingly resentful ankle-biting dwarf who is a thorn in everyone's side, including his parents—is not. A superlatively shrewd scheming old bitch that hates the world because her sole progeny is a puny midget who will most certainly never produce an heir, Gertrude hopes to inherit Marc's fortune, but she most get rid of Patrice first, which seems like an unlikely task considering that the wealthy widower loves his blond nephew and is not exactly too fond of his sister-in-law or her pint-sized progeny. Even though her evil dwarf son kills a dog with one of her husband's shotguns, Gertrude has the gall to lie and claim that Patrice got his dog 'Moulouk' to bite her bastard boy Achilles. Of course, as a young man who acts like a perennial toddler and oftentimes eavesdrops on people by listening to them through keyholes, Achilles is not exactly someone that Marc believes. Hoping to help get Gertrude and her family off his uncle's back for good, Patrice offers to hunt down a hot new young wife for Marc who, although initially rejects the idea, eventually gives in. Unfortunately for Patrice, he never considers that he might become attracted to such a young woman.

In the hope of procuring his uncle a young beauty, Patrice sails to a nearby island with his dog Moulouk where it seems somewhat unlikely that he will be able to find any sort of delectable dame as the remote area is mostly inhabited by ignorant drunken seamen and superstitious old women that seem completely untouched by the civilizing effects of Christianity. The first place Patrice heads to upon arriving at the island is a bar where he gets in a fight with a tall drunken cretin named Morholt (Alexandre Rignault of Georges Franju's Eyes Without a Face (1960) aka Les yeux sans visage) after the big boorish brute grabs a stunning, if not seemingly bitchy, 22-year-old young blonde beauty named Nathalie (Madeleine Sologne in her most famous role) by her hair and attempts to force her to drink liquor off a bar table after she refuses to take a shot of cognac. While Patrice manages to defeat Morholt by breaking a bottle over his head, he suffers a horrible knife wound to the leg and is left bedridden, so Nathalie, who has fallen in love with the dashing young blond beast who came to her rescue, nurses him back to health with the help of her adoptive mother Anne (Jane Marken of Marcel Carné's Children of Paradise (1945) aka Les enfants du paradis). An overtly frigid chick that was dealt a sorry lot in life as a Norwegian orphan who was left a bastard as a little girl after her parents drowned after their boat capsized, Nathalie soon makes Patrice realize he and she, "We're both children of the sea" and were practically born for one another as soul-mates in the most truest sense, but the hero still absurdly asks her to marry his old fart of an uncle. Knowing that she will most likely be killed by her 'fiancé' Morholt if she stays on the island and realizing that she can at least be close to her beloved Patrice if she marries his uncle, Nathalie reluctantly agrees to marry Marc, not realizing how hard it will be to hide her feelings from the man she has so hopelessly fallen in love with while living in the same home with him. While Patrice and Nathalie are unequivocal soul-mates who would most certainly sire the most immaculate of brood and memories, time and circumstance has forsaken them to a truly tragic fate that would make any sane man question the existence of god and morality.

To everyone in the castle, especially cold cunt Gertrude, who initially enjoys seeing the two platinum blond Aryans interact with one another in such joyous fashion, it is readily apparent that that Patrice and Nathalie were born for one another and are deeply in love, yet uncle Marc has also fallen in love with the little lady and asks her to be his wife, which she naturally accepts, even though she clearly does not love the old man and wants nothing more than to be with his Adonis of a nephew instead. Indeed, only knowing poverty in her seemingly accursed existence, Nathalie cannot turn down a life of wealth and luxury in chateau. Of course, assuming they might lose their chance at receiving a hefty inheritance, Gertrude and Achilles begin plotting a way to catch Patrice and Nathalie together doing dirty deeds so that they can convince Marc to kick them both out of the castle for good. One night while Patrice and Nathalie are flirting with one another in front of a fireplace, menacing midget Achilles finds a bottle with the label 'poison' and secretly pours the serum in the two love bird's alcoholic beverages, not realizing it is a love potion. Indeed, before leaving the island, Anne, who is a pagan witch of sorts who managed to heal Patrice's wounds with herbs, gave Nathalie the love potion and put a 'poison' label on it so that no one would touch it. If the two lovers were not in love before, which they most certainly were, before taking the potion, they are deleteriously joined at the hip with one another after taking the serum and it does not take long for Marc to catch them in bed together with the heinous help of Gertrude and Achilles.

Naturally, heartbroken Marc decides to banish both Patrice and Nathalie from his castle, which initially seems like a blessing in disguise as it gives the two lovers the opportunity to finally be with one another and they soon settle into a small shack where everything seems to be absolute perfection despite their poverty. Unfortunately, one day while Patrice is out working to provide nourishment for his darling, Marc shows up and takes away the heroine, who is so soulless inside that she chooses wealth over love, thus causing her to almost instantaneously develop a metaphysical affliction that no amount of comfort or luxury from her cuckolded husband can cure. Needless to say, Patrice is heartbroken when he comes back to the shack and discovers that both Nathalie and his dog Moulouk are missing, so he heads to the city where he takes a job at a mechanic shop owned by a goofy yet friendly chap named Lionel (Roland Toutain of Jean Renoir's The Rules of the Game (1939) aka La règle du jeu) who lives at the business with his sister who the hero is saddened to learn is also named 'Nathalie' (played by Junie Astor, who originally appeared in works by Renoir but later appeared in exploitation trash like José Bénazéraf's Joë Caligula - Du suif chez les dables (1966)) and who is a femme fatale-like brunette. Naturally, as her name hints, the brunette Nathalie becomes a sort of sorry substitute for Patrice's true love of the same name. In terms of appearance and character, brunette Nathalie is the complete opposite of her blonde namesake, so naturally Patrice is not too happy when Lionel attempts to get the hero to marry his chain-smoking and tabloid-reading sister. When Patrice hears bullshit rumors that blonde Nathalie is apparently happy with Marc when in reality she is so lovelorn that she falls bedridden, he reluctantly agrees to marry his pal Lionel's sister in a desperate attempt to get over his undying love for his soul-mate. In the hope of seeing Nathalie one more time before he is married, Patrice schemes to have the wedding on the island where he first met his beloved.

Naturally, it does not take long for brunette Nathalie to realize that she is nothing more than a 'rebound' babe at best after arriving at the island and talking to Anne, who shows her a photograph of the golden-haired Nathalie. When Lionel learns of Patrice's love for a woman other than his sister, he decides to confront the hero, who tells him everything about his heartbreak and then agrees to marry his sister so long as he accompanies him on a journey to his uncle's castle so he can see blonde Nathalie one last time to confirm that she no longer loves him. When the two arrive at the castle, Patrice is shot by his evil midget cousin Achilles before he even has the chance to see Nathalie. Upon arriving sailing back to the island after their failed mission, it is obvious that Patrice has been fatally wounded, so the hero begs for Lionel to fetch blonde Nathalie for him before it is too late so that he can see his lover one more time before he dies. Unfortunately due to brunette Nathalie's lies, Patrice loses the strength to survive long enough for his beloved and perishes just seconds before she gets there. When blonde Nathalie sees Patrice's still warm corpse upon finally arriving at the island, she is so heartbroken that she also dies after shedding a tear and collapses next to his corpse. As Marc says to Lionel upon seeing Patrice and Nathalie's corpse lying next to another, "No one can reach them now." Indeed, although dead, Patrice and Nathalie are reunited with one another for eternity and their corpses are symbolically laid next to one another in an empty room in Marc's castle.

In terms of its attributes as a Vichy era National Socialist propaganda flick, The Eternal Return is far too quirky, cynical, and just plain French to appeal to staunch Hitlerites, though it has Aryan mystical elements that would certainly appeal to fans of Alfred Rosenberg's classic tome The Myth of the Twentieth Century (1930) aka Der Mythus des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts, especially in regard to its völkisch allusions to an ancient godly blond race from the north (notably, during one scene, Aryanness Nathalie remarks regarding Patrice, "His face isn't from these parts," as if she instinctively knows that he is part of the same godly race). It should be noted that Cocteau's biographer James S. Williams described him as "naturally Right-leaning" and his friend, Nazi sculptor Arno Breker, convinced him that Uncle Adolf was a good guy and a serious patron of the arts. Notably, in the German documentary Zeit der Götter (1992) aka Age of the Gods directed by Lutz Dammbeck, it is revealed that Cocteau speculated that Hitler was a homo who saw Breker as a sort of sod son. In the same doc, it is revealed that Cocteau's man-muse Jean Marais was certainly no Nazi sympathizer as demonstrated by the fact he was arrested for beating up a pro-Nazi journalist during the occupation and if it were not for Breker using his influence over Hitler, the actor may have met a terrible fate. Physically speaking, Marais was as Aryan-looking as Frenchmen come, but as a queer and the father of a half-caste Arab, he was certainly no real-life Tristan. Incidentally, The Eternal Return director Jean Delannoy would later direct a controversial gay-themed work entitled Les amitiés particulières (1964) aka This Special Friendship, which was based on a novel by queer French novelist and diplomat Roger Peyrefitte who belonged to a homoerotic neo-Männerbünde group called the 'Alexander Order' that was co-founded by Cocteau's Nazi sculptor friend Arno Breker and who supported longtime National Front leader and founder Jean-Marie Le Pen.

As a tragic romance where jealous scheming family members commit shameless and treacherous acts to destroy the two soul-mate lovers and where the discernibly frigid heroine is so dead inside that she ultimately chooses comfort and wealth over the truest of love and sexual compatibility, The Eternal Return is a work that I can strangely relate to, which certainly is not true in regard to most romance flicks. Indeed, I must admit that I consider the film to be superior to Beauty and the Beast (1946) aka La Belle et la Bête even though the latter work was actually directed by Cocteau and features far superior special effects. Interestingly, The Eternal Return director Delannoy would later collaborate with Cocteau, as well as Marias and the midget Piéral, on Princess of Cleves (1961) aka La princesse de Clèves—a kaleidoscopic reworking of the anonymously published 1678 historical novel of the same name by Madame de La Fayette—but the film was not as well received as their earlier collaboration because the director's reputation had already been largely ruined by members of the French New Wave and thus the work was considered far too old fashioned and wrongly assumed to be a moronic swashbuckling flick (which star Marais was famous for at the time). While I have yet to see Princess of Cleves, I do not have to think twice to say that I found The Eternal Return to be superior to any of the romance flicks directed by the likes of Godard or Truffaut and I say that as a longtime fan of former's Contempt (1963) aka Le mépris and the latter's Jules and Jim (1962). Indeed, as its Nietzschean title reveals, there is something timeless about the tragic romance contained within the darkly beautiful Cocteau-Delannoy flick and were it not for the film's Vichy associations, it would probably be regarded as one of the greatest works of its kind.

Jean Cocteau° (1950)

Jean Cocteau – the flaming French King of high camp, and full-time poet and sometimes filmmaker – once wrote, “Buñuel’s masterpiece Un Chien Andalou proves that cinema is a wonderful and dangerous weapon in a poet’s hands,” which is certainly a quote that applies to all artists, but especially his celluloid masterpiece Orpheus (1950) aka Orphée; a suave surrealist retelling of the classic Greek myth of Orpheus set in post-WWII France (and partially in the actual ruins of the war) and the second entry in the masterfully mystifying auteur’s black-and-white yet considerably colorful Orphic Trilogy (following The Blood of a Poet (1930) and preceding Testament of Orpheus (1960)). Utilizing the strikingly surrealist special effects and elegant camera tricks he pioneered with his first film The Blood of a Poet (1930) aka Le Sang d’un Poète and further fine-tuned for his highly reflective cinematic swansong Testament of Orpheus (1960) aka Le Testament d’Orphée, Orpheus manages to bring relative narrative coherence, albeit of the charmingly campy (but never schlocky) and casually carnal sort, to carefully constructed transcendental images that make for the most delightful of daydreams. Speaking of Orpheus in particular, Cocteau wrote, “Beauty hates ideas. It is sufficient to itself. A work is beautiful as a person is beautiful. The beauty I mean (the beauty of Piero della Francesca, Uccello and Vermeer), causes an erection of the soul. An erection is unarguable. Few people are capable of having one: most, as in the famous drawing by Forain, consider that ‘it is much better to talk.’” And, indeed those suited for metaphysical arousal via aesthetics know that Cocteau’s inventively idiosyncratic images, especially in regard Orpheus, also know that the auteur poet’s visuals speak louder than the character’s words. One of the French artists least affected by the tragic chaos of the Second World War, Cocteau – a personal friend of Nazi sculptor Arno Breker and Conservative Revolutionary ‘proto-nazi’ novelist Ernst Jünger (who often socialized with the poet when he was stationed in Paris as an administrative position as a German army captain), as well as the likes of Pablo Picasso and Coco Chanel – still managed to implement reminders of the Occidental apocalypse via authentic ruined buildings (representing an apocalyptic sort of industrial hell) destroyed in the war, genuine radio recordings from the French resistance, and leather-clad servants of death on motorcycle who echo back memories of the Gestapo in Orpheus; a film where a middle-aged poet must reinvent himself by accepting sweet death in voluptuous hourglass, femme fatale form of fetishistic forlornness and fecund fury. A world of abject aesthetic decay where books with blank pages without words are considered the height of cultural vogue, Orpheus features a provocative story that is, unfortunately, even more relevant today about a once-important poet who must literally go to hell and back to save his life, wife, and artistry from the charms of death.

ORPHEUS

Starring Cocteau's real-life beefy blond beau boy Jean Marais in the title character "Orpheus" in a perfect performance which he responded to critics' praise of by stating, "The film plays my parts for me," Orpheus is as aesthetically rapturous and solacing as cinematic works come despite the film's sometimes gloom and doom yet always gorgeous subject matter. According to Cocteau himself, "Orpheus has three major themes: 1. The successive death through which a poet must pass before he becomes...changed into himself at last by eternity. 2. The theme of immortality. 3. Mirrors: we watch ourselves grow old in mirrors. They bring us closer to death." Of course, Orpheus also features a handsomely assembled hodgepodge of Orphic and modern themes that are so seamlessly synchronized that one need not be familiar with the film's ancient source material to embrace it for eternity. In the beginning of the film, we meet protagonist Orpheus – an aging poet who feels he is past his prime and whose all-consuming pessimism is only all the more inflamed by his friend's frank statement that he stopped writing at age 20 when he no longer had anything to say – who feels quite out of place in the company of youthful wordsmiths while lounging at the Café des Poètes, especially the young and popular dilettante lyricist Jacques Cégeste (Edouard Dermithe); a pretentious prick of (non)poetry whose wordless work "Nudisme" ('nudism') of naked pages is all the rage in post-WWII Paris. Orpheus is now so positively passe that even police men respect him, which certainly puts him out of sway with the youth, who are more subversive than ever before, as iconoclastically destroying the aesthetic and political systems of yesteryear is now the trend of the day and apparently no one does it better than charismatic conman Cégeste. To his dismay, Orpheus' young rival, who is more than a bit inebriated, arrives at the café in grandiose style in a seemingly sinister Rolls-Royce with a Gothic "Princess" (María Casares) in all black and pompously snorts like a pig at the elder poet elder, but the pretentious poetaster's glamour, fame, and fortune has run out because his ghastly gal (who funds Cégeste's unwritten, written works) instigates a brawl that concludes with his death via Satanic SS-like phantoms in black leather on motorcycles. No real princess at all, Cégeste's macabre muse is really lady death and cons Orpheus into leaving with her in the beauteous Grim Reaper's Rolls-Royce on the pretense of witnessing the finish of Cégeste (who Orpheus believes is only injured and believes they are going to a hospital) and is transferred through a daunting dimension of negative-color skies and nonsensical noise on the radio. Orpheus is taken to a dilapidated Chateau and is quite enraged and perturbed by lady death, but soon he becomes totally entranced by her audacious aristocratic charms despite being married to a woman named Eurydice (Marie Déa). Likewise, Death's chauffeur Heurtebise (François Périer) falls hopefully in love with Eurydice, who is eventually killed by the fatal female's ghastly Gestapo goons. Split by his love for death and the death of his bewitching blonde wife, Orpheus ultimately decides to jump through a mirror (with help from Heurtebise and some special gloves) to save his slain spouse from the Underworld; a poet purgatory where even death is put on trial. A strikingly sacrificial she-Satan, lady death is mature enough to admit, "I don't have the right to love anyone...yet I love." If one learns anything from Orpheus, it is that even death is fueled by passion and a poet's passion is perpetuated by death.

In regard to a verbal summary of Orpheus given by a less than arduously analytical radio host made, Cocteau wrote, "But when a serious and attentive man (who I do not know personally) takes the trouble to recall a plot and, in several stages, with an almost childlike elegance, tries to draw a simple and easy-to-read storyline out this very complex plot, without abandoning either his personal viewpoint, or precision, I can only refrain from criticizing him. To do so would be as inappropriate as those critics who hastily condemn a work that is the product of thirty years of research." Indeed, Orpheus can be interpreted in many ways by many people, but only to Cocteau himself did this poetically phantasmagorical cinematic work have the truest meaning, hence his written words, "Orphée is a realistic film; or, to be more precise, observing Goethe's distinction between reality and truth, a film in which I express a truth peculiar to myself." Admittedly, Orpheus was a film that changed my life, or at least the way I look at the artistic medium of film and what it is capable of, when I first saw it a decade ago or so. Since then, if I have come to the realization of what my favorite filmmakers, including auteur directors ranging from F.W. Murnau to R.W. Fassbinder, have in common (aside from being queer krauts) it is that they are all poets, thus underscoring the character of Orpheus' seemingly contradictory that a poet's job is, "to write without writing." That being said, few poets "wrote without writing" (although he was a penetrating master of pen as well) better than Cocteau's himself with Orpheus being arguably his finest moment as a poet who made better films than the majority of self-described filmmakers.

LA VIE EN ROSE
LA VIE EN ROSE

Jean Faurez (1948)

I find myself being less and less able to appreciate contemporary works of French cinema, especially in regards to their more popular films. La Vie en rose is a film that has slightly rejuvenated my interest in froggy works, but I owe the lovely Marion Cotillard the most credit for my extremely pleasant experience with the motion picture. She is a woman that may have froggy eyes, but also some of the most appealing of eyes that I have had the luxury of experiencing cinematically in sometime. Marion Cotillard also happens to look enough like Edith Piaf for her performance in La Vie en rose to be exceptionally believable. Not since Val Kilmer's performance in Oliver Stone's The Doors as Jim Morrison have I seen an actor magically capture the power and charisma of a singer. One of my favorite actresses of all time is Giuletta Masina. People have often compared Masina's comic acting performances to the female equivalent of Charlie Chaplin. I consider that a fair assertion, although naturally Masina's big eyes are much more pleasurable to look at in comparison to Chaplin's dirty Sanchez moustache. Marion Cotillard's performance in La Vie en rose echoes back to the days of Giuletta Masina's heartwarmingly cute performances in films like La Strada. In fact, during the whole experience of La Vie en rose I could not get enough of Ms. Cotillard. It is very hard to find a woman that is genuinely funny (or a man for that matter), but even harder to find a woman that is both funny and cute. Not that I care for Academy Awards or anything, but Marion Cotillard without question deserved the Oscar she received for her performance (the first ever given for a French-language performance). Edith Piaf certainly deserves her cultural icon status as France's greatest popular singer. Like your typical modern day Frenchman, Piaf was a mixture of ethnic backgrounds, certainly no Huguenot. Piaf's rise from the gutter was to her talent's advantage, giving rise to an organic emotional voice that lacked any type of pretension, going against the French stereotype of unwarranted cultural arrogance. In La Vie en rose, Marion Cotillard is her most passionate when swooning over her French Algerian boxer boyfriend Marcel. Edith has not interest in psycho-babbling over existentialism or rambling about New Left politics, she just wants to sing and party. She may have been friends with the great poet Jean Cocteau and other important French culture figures, yet that never seemed to inflate her ego. Even when Marion Cotillard as Edith Piaf has aged and stars looking fairly decrepit, she still expresses the same spunk that made her magical in the first place. La Vie en rose is one of the few contemporary French films worth watching multiple times. The film is also evidence that a French film does not have to feature decadent and nihilistic sex for it to be notable. The sex appeal of Marion Cotillard permeates throughout without the actress having to shred a layer of clothing. I cannot express how boring nudity has gotten in cinema, especially in European films, an unflattering post-ww2 result of the European film industries having to prostitute themselves out just to get by in the world market. As shown in La Vie en rose, fortunately for Edith Piaf her best money commodity was her voice and not her body.

UN CHANT D'AMOUR
UN CHANT D'AMOUR

Jean Genet (1950)

Un Chant d'Amour (A Song of Love), completed in 1950, was the only short directed by subversive gay French writer and petty criminal Jean Genet. Cinematic poetic genius Jean Cocteau lent his marvelous cinematography skills to this short film. After watching Un Chant d'Amour, Cocteau's contribution to the film is more than obvious for anyone that has seen Cocteau's underappreciated Orphic Trilogy. Un Chant d'Amour is like what would have happened if Jean Cocteau just happened to direct an artsy porn flick. There is no doubt that Cocteau helped Jean Genet immensely in the production of the film. For being Genet's first film, it is quite professionally done and the shot composition is well thought out to say the least. A collaboration between Jean Genet and Jean Cocteau was a very good idea that actually panned out.

From what I know of Jean Genet, he was obsessed with homosexual violent criminals. The prisoners featured in Un Chant d'Amour are way more tamed than the sadistic sailors featured in Rainer Werner Fassbinder's adaptation of Jean Genet's novel Querelle. The short film, however, is a film about caged perversion and a homoerotic freakshow of the criminal type. Although made over half a century ago, Un Chant d'Amour is the type of film that would offend even the most "liberal" of hipsters. I also have to admit that the short is one of the boldest, if not the boldest, film I have ever seen to come out of France. Nowadays, Marxist French New Wavers like Jean-Luc Godard are often thought of as the greatest and most important directors to ever come out of France. Personally, I have always felt Jean Cocteau to be France's greatest and purest filmmaker. Cocteau, foremost a poet, looked at filmmaking from a much different perspective than most filmmakers. Jean Genet's Un Chant d'Amour certainly follows in Cocteau's tradition of fantastic cinematic dreams. Un Chant d'Amour also features some elements that may offend cultural Marxist types. Two of the prisoners featured in the short are obviously an Algerian and another being a Negro. These prisoners are obviously the products of French colonialism. I don't believe it would be to far-fetched for someone to interpret the prisoners featured in Un Chant d'Amour as colonial sex slaves used for the sexual enjoyment of French authority. The security guard featured in the short certainly enjoys fondling his gun and shoving it into an Algerians mouth as it were his phallic. The prison guard is a paid voyeur that gets to enjoy a jigaboo doing a disturbing erotic jungle dance and other prisoners slapping his erection against the cement wall of his prison cell. Un Chant d'Amour is not the type of film that the producers of Brokeback Mountain would want the American public to see. Un Chant d'Amour does have one serious flaw. The short lacks a score which is very detrimental considering the film features no dialogue. Knowing how the score that was later added to Maya Deren's Meshes of the Afternoon greatly improved the film, makes me realize that someone should really create a complimentary score for Un Chant d'Amour. With a score, the short quite possibly become one of the top ten short films ever made. Despite the lack of score, Un Chant d'Amour is a film of undeniable poet power that transfers the viewer into a world that they probably don't want to be in. Apparently, director Jean Genet disowned Un Chant d'Amour which I find somewhat irrational. The short is no doubt a masterpiece that had been hidden from the world for decades. Upon it's release, the French government had the film banned and the US version was highly edited. I assume that one of the reasons he may have disowned the film is that it wasn't very successful due to it being banned and not being seen by the eyes of true cinephiles worldwide. Now Un Chant d'Amour is available in an uncut format so that it can finally receive the recognition that it no doubt deserves.

Jean Renoir (1937)

Grand Illusion is French art royalty (son of Pierre-Auguste Renoir) Jean Renoir's masterpiece. Joseph Goebbels declared the film "Cinematic Public Enemy No. 1." and with good reason. Grand Illusion is a pacifist antiwar film that was released in 1937. The "Grand Illusion" is the war itself and the man made country borders surrounding it. Fascism was Nationalism in its most extreme form hitting its peak during this time period (in response to Bolshevism which promoted Internationalism). Renoir was able to accomplish showing similarities between nations and the absurdity of fanatic Nationalism. The end of the Second World War proved this to be true with the largest amount of deaths in both European and Human history.

Grand Illusion also represents the end of old Europe and European royalty. Legendary actor Erich von Stroheim plays the role of Captain von Rauffenstein, a German officer. Von discusses with French Captain de Boeldieu that they are no longer needed and are part of European history. These two officers acknowledge they have more in common with their international aristocratic counterparts than they do with their fellow countrymen. This is also the same for the proletarians. Renoir acknowledges the dividers aren't the Nations but the classes (he may have had a Marxist fetish).

The wealthy Jew Rosenthal also brings up another interesting element going on in Europe. Rosenthal represents the famous Rothschild family. The Rothchild's had a part in funding most of the wars in Europe and America over the past couple hundred years. Rosenthal brags of his wealth and many acquisitions for being a Frenchman for so little time. The other Frenchmen are unconcerned as Rosenthal is very generous with his food and other desired POW luxuries. The Rothchild's would later go on to funding 80% of Israel.

Grand Illusion should be mandatory viewing for History classes as it is full of the true relevancies surrounding both the first and second war and European history in general. No film better identifies the fall of Europe and the irrational variables surrounding it. Shortly after Grand Illusion was released Jean Renoir decided he was no longer a pacifist. He came to America and made anti-Nazi propaganda films.

LA BÊTE HUMAINE

Genetic taints and evil loose women are two of my favorite cinematic subjects (and, of course, subjects in general), so it is only natural that La Bête Humaine (1938) aka The Human Beast aka Judas Was a Woman—a film that also belongs to my preferred frog cinema movement of ‘poetic realism’—is unquestionably my favorite Jean Renoir (The Grand Illusion, The Rules of the Game) film; or so I just discovered this past week after watching the film for the very first time and joyously discovering a totally timeless and haunting romantic tragedy that reminded why thots kill. Indeed, featuring the ultimate femme fatale portrayed by Simone Simon—a little lady with the perfect femme fatale pedigree as a half-heeb/half-guido mischling with a rather revealing taste for less-than-handsome wealthy chosenites—the film undoubtedly sparked my less than latent misogyny and contempt for cold cunts that use their cunts as weapons. While Renoir’s masterpiece might be nearly ancient in terms of age, it is as fresh as a Mormon teenage girl in terms of offering forgotten perennial wisdom, which you will not find in contemporary cinema, in regard to the ways of women; or at least the sort of woman that is a true whore and beyond any sort of redemption when it comes to love. A rare cinematic example of the degeneration theories of Judaic proto-eugenicists Cesare Lombroso and Max Nordau where a scheming whore meets her match in the form of a genetically forsaken train engineer that is plagued with sexually homicidal tendencies due to being the degenerate descendant of countless hardcore dipsomaniacs, La Bête Humaine—a film that is more or less an extremely abridged adaptation of the 1890 Émile Zola novel of the same name—is also a grim yet gorgeous celluloid love letter to love, sex, death, and locomotives where man and machine almost seem to become one in terms of visceral intensity of libido. While the film does not feature a literal train wreck, the film’s protagonist’s cataclysmic demise is certainly an apt substitute as he literally and figuratively kills his love and then himself in the end after succumbing to the contrived charms of a cunty conniving succubus.

By sheer happenstance, I watched La Bête Humaine for the first time only days before watching the documentary Maurice Pialat: Love Exists (2007) where criminally unsung French auteur Maurice Pialat (À Nos Amours, Under the Sun of Satan)—a new personal favorite who, in terms of unmasking the nasty nuances of humanity, is like a sort of heterosexual frog Fassbinder—credits Renoir’s masterpiece as influencing his decision to become a filmmaker, stating, “The film that made me realize...I guess you could call it a vocation...It was the film that, at that time, oddly...We’d see a film one, never twice. But this one I saw 3 or 4 times. It was Renoir’s LA BÊTE HUMAINE.” In the same doc, Pialat also expresses his love and admiration for Renoir’s technically-unfinished 40-minute featurette A Day in the Country (1946) aka Partie de champagne. As a recently devout Pialat fan, I am not surprised by his assessment of Renoir's work as these two films express a purity of aesthetic spirit and sort of perverse poetic humanistic realism that certainly transcends the director's more famous flicks like The Grand Illusion (1937), The Rules of the Game (1939), and The River (1951). In fact, even Renoir's The Southerner (1945)—a sort of proto-neorealist exercise that was heavily influenced by the documentary work of New Deal propagandist Pare Lorentz and Robert Flaherty—does not come close to these films in terms of presenting certain archetypal truths. Depicting the ultimate femme fatale from hell in a petite doll-like form, La Bête Humaine is a beautifully bleak bittersweet tragedy where forsaken genetic destiny and feminine evil collide and ultimately cancel each other out in an almost ironical fashion. While Renoir's film contains a fairly simple yet sensually-charged (anti)love story that would make for a nice subplot on Twin Peaks, it is ultimately a timeless tale about the miserable absurdity of human relationships, especially of the 'romantic' sort where the hopelessly despoiled conspiring whore finally meets her match in the murderously passionate male genetic degenerate. In short, the central 'couple' was practically made for one another in the worst sort of way in what seems like a sick joke of fate.

Notably, in her magnum opus Sexual Personae: Art and Decadence from Nefertiti to Emily Dickinson (1990), Camille Paglia—a virtual degenerate dago dyke Spengler—remarks in regard to male's greatest weakness, "Love is the spell by which he puts his sexual fear to sleep." Despite knowing full well that he gets the homicidal urge to strangle women to death when sexually aroused, La Bête Humaine protagonist Jacques Lantier (Jean Gabin)—a strong and stoic workaholic that is able to repress his well-hidden deep-seated sadness via his virtual lust for train work—makes the mistake of a lifetime by falling in love with a married harlot named Séverine Roubaud (Simone Simon) who he knows full well was involved in a murder. The bastard broad of a lecherous maid, Séverine—a pernicious pedomorphic parasite that lives off bad men yet then has the audacity to cry for herself when said bad men treat her badly—certainly has a stereotypical whore background and her involvement in the robbery-cum-murder of her wealthy godfather, 'Grandmorin' (Jacques Berlioz), was partly a means to appease the undying jealousy of her rather pathetic husband Roubaud (Fernand Ledoux). Indeed, when Roubaud discovers that his beloved moonfaced wife is a serial liar and that she did not disclose the fact that she was being defiled by Grandmorin (who the film hints may actually be her biological father) when she was still just a little girl before the two got married (as he reasonably remarks, he did not realize his was marrying an "old man's cast-off"), he irrationally decides robbing and killing the old fart will somehow help him deal with his murderously malicious jealousy. Rather ironically, instead of dissolving his jealousy, the coldblooded killing of Grandmorin leads to Roubaud's flagrant cuckolding as Séverine is forced to utilize her fierce femme fatale wiles on the film's hapless yet hearty hero Jacques Lantier as he is a passive witness at the scene of the crime. Unfortunately for Séverine, Lantier is a man with a genetic taint that causes him to 'see red' when sexually aroused and the femme fatale might not have many talents but she does know how to prime a guy's pump.

In what proves to be the perfect setting for an inordinately fluidly moving and rhythmically immaculate film, the murder of Grandmorin takes place on a train. As a man of such fiery passions, it is quite fitting that Lantier is a train engineer, though his co-worker Roubaud—a somewhat sad and pathetic fellow with a degree of superficial charm and certain antisocial qualities—might not be the best choice for deputy stationmaster at Le Havre. While Roubaud clearly cares more about his wanton wife Séverine than his job, Lantier is so proud of his job that he describes his train as his "wife," even stating quite joyously, "I'm already married to Lison. She's good enough for me." Of course, Lantier has good reason to prefer his work to any sort of woman, as he nearly strangles to death an (ex)lover named Flore (Blanchette Brunoy)—a voluptuous blonde beauty that rather enjoys mocking men sans the protagonist—near the beginning of the film as the two attempt to make love on a grassy hill. Rather symbolically, it is only when a train passes by that Lantier falls out of his homicidal haze and releases poor Flore (who is not nearly as nice in Émile Zola's source novel) from his seemingly demonic grip. As Lantier explains to Flore in regard to the strange nature of his aberrant actions, "I didn't even know what I was doing [...] It's like this haze fills my head and twists everything out of shape. I start feeling like a mad dog. I never drink, mind you. Even a drop and I go crazy. I feel like I'm paying for all those fathers and grandfathers who drank. All those generations of drunkards who poisoned my blood and saddled me with this madness. It's a terrible thing. But I love you with all my heart. So much that I was afraid to come here." Despite nearly killing her, Flore still expresses her desire to marry Lantier, but the protagonist seems to love her too much to put her in such a precarious predicament where every potential sex act could bring more literal meaning to the French phrase La petite mort. Needless to say, succubus Séverine—a deceptively cutesy ice queen that practically drenches men with perfumic pussy juice with her mere sweet-eye glance—makes for a more fitting lover for lady-killer Lantier, especially after she attempts to get him to kill her husband and thus loses any marginal degree of empathy the viewer might have originally granted her.

Not only is Séverine a superlatively salacious slut that has no qualms about getting involved in the coldblooded killing of a godfather that apparently provided her much materially, but she also seems to really bask in such sadistic seductress savagery as demonstrated by the fact that she slyly smirks while stating, "There must be a way to win over a fellow like that" after coming to the instinctual decision to seduce Lantier and, in turn, cheat on her husband. Of course, considering her almost vampiric good-looks, Séverine—a virtual proto-goth girl that knows how to drain a man of both his emotional and ejaculatory juices—does not have to do much to completely seduce Lantier despite the fact that the protagonist is fully aware that she and her husband were responsible for the dubious demise of Grandmorin. In fact, even when a goofy poor prole named Cabuche (Jean Renoir in the most unforgettable acting role of his career) is charged with the murder, Lantier still cannot bring himself to tell the truth as sassy slut Séverine has already completely invaded his mind and compromised his godforsaken soul. As more than hinted by an unforgettable scene where Lantier and Séverine have a long coital session in a muddy shack that symbolizes the purity (or lack thereof) of their unsavory union, the two seem to have great sexual chemistry so it is only natural that their uniquely ungodly romance eventually concludes with the most permanent of releases.

Not merely satisfied with simply cuckolding her long-suffering husband, Séverine soon conspires to have Lantier kill Roubaud. Indeed, Séverine dubiously promises to be Lantier's wifey if he kills her husband, as if she would not do the same exact thing to him in the future if she got the chance. The most shamelessly flagrant of femme fatales, Séverine even follows Lantier—a fairly uncomplicated man that sentimentally dreams of a simple future where he comes home from work everyday to a wife that loves him—along and provides him with inspirational kisses on his first failed attempt to kill Roubaud. Of course, Lantier does not want to kill Roubaud and when his conscience gets the best of him only seconds before he is about to bash in the brains of the stationmaster during a quiet night at the tracks, Séverine immediately expresses her dissatisfaction by disappearing into the night like a runaway Maenad looking for a new victim. Fully committed to becoming a young widow, Séverine immediately begins using various forms of manipulation to inspire Lantier to kill, including openly flirting with much younger men and saying contrived melodramatic bullshit like, "There's no way forward for us now. We can't go any further. Tomorrow will be just like yesterday: the same grief and sorrow. It doesn't really matter. What happens, happens." Not unlike most women, it is hard to tell if Séverine is telling the truth or merely strategically exploiting some manipulative distortion of the truth, but she does seem to be expressing some honesty when she remarks to Lantier, "We should have stayed like we were in the beginning, when we loved each other but didn't pursue it. You remember those innocent walks we used to take? They helped me forget about Grandmorin. When you've experienced all the disgusting things I knew as a young girl, it's madness to hope for a true love of your own." Indeed, aside from revealing the female tendency toward embracing escapism at all costs when being confronted with even the slightest degree of discomfort, Séverine's remark hints at the incapacity for a whore to actually truly love someone. Just like Grandmorin and Roubaud, Lantier would be nothing more than a means to an end for Séverine were he to carry out the killing. Luckily, a genetic taint intervenes and Séverine's venomous vaginal menace is eradicated from the world.

Rather interestingly, in his classic (yet scientifically dubious) text Degeneration (1892) aka Entartung, pioneering Zionist theorist and eugenicist Max Nordau argues that genetic degeneration is a sort of self-solving problem as degenerates do not tend to reproduce. Undoubtedly, this can certainly be said of protagonist Lantier and his beloved femme fatale Séverine. Aside from randomly impulsively murdering Séverine in her bed instead of her husband (as he originally intended), Lantier is so consumed with lovesick grief and guilt that he soon commits suicide by jumping off his beloved train Lison, thus leaving his best friend and co-worker Pecqueux (Julien Carette) behind to pick up the pieces. Shortly after committing the killing and before arriving at work to eventually commit suicide, Lantier—like a train that has derailed and is about to smash into eternity—forcefully treads down the train tracks in an unforgettable scene that anticipates the similarly bleak conclusion of Peter Lorre's sole directorial effort The Lost One (1951) aka Der Verlorene. Not unlike Lorre's character, Lantier is a virtual walking and talking ghost after killing his lover and thus his suicide seems like not much more than an incidental detail from a tragic wasted life. As Pecqueux remarks while looking at the corpse of his dead comrade, "Poor guy. How he must have suffered to come to this. I haven't seen him look so peaceful in a long time." Notably, Lantier's corpse is found in a place near train tracks that looks strikingly similar to where the protagonist almost strangled to death his (ex)lover Flore at the beginning of the film in a poetic scene that underscores the tragically accursed nature of his love life; or literal La petite mort.

While La Bête Humaine has many simple (yet perennial) themes, one of the more obvious yet easily overlooked ones is the incapacity of man and woman ever becoming one despite the seemingly indomitable force of attraction that might have initially thrust them together. Indeed, as Pecqueux wisely states to Lantier, "Love is best early on, before you know each other well, when you're both on your best behavior." Of course, had Lantier actually killed Roubaud and gotten away with it, sinful slut Séverine would have no need to be on her best behavior and would probably immediately begin cuckolding the protagonist as being a homicidally hypergamic ho is, of course, her recklessly whorish nature as the femme fatale par excellence. In that sense, Séverine is the ugly extreme of femininity and, in turn, one of cinema's greatest archetypal villainesses. As for Lantier, he is a sad symbol of male naivety when it comes to the so-called fairer sex and the potentially deadly blinding that comes with love. As La Bête Humaine rather viscerally reveals, it only takes one woman to come along to destroy a happy man that has passionately mastered a trade—not coincidentally, a trade that no woman could ever master (which is something Renoir really underscores during the film's unforgettably triumphant opening scene where Gabin's character looks quite joyously glorious as he operates the train as if it is an extension of both his body and soul). Of course, human progress is largely the story of man's instinctual desire to impress women, yet it is ironically oftentimes women or womanly men (read: Weininger) that impedes this progress. While La Bête Humaine does not express the sentiment that a man should find a woman that inspires and supports his work and evolution as an artist or artisan, the film certainly reveals the sort of woman one must avoid: the whore; or the reproductively retrograde harpy that uses her sex as a deleterious weapon for infantile person gain.

As Paglia noted in regard to the sort of cuntcentric creature that La Bête Humaine delightfully depicts, "The femme fatale can appear as Medusan mother or as frigid nymph, masquing in the brilliant luminosity of Apollonian high glamour. Her cool unreachability beckons, fascinates, and destroys. She is not a neurotic but, if anything, a psychopath. That is, she has an amoral affectlessness, a serene indifference to the suffering of others, which she invites and dispassionately observes as tests of her power." Personally, I can say that virtually every single woman that I have ever 'known' embodied these anti-qualities to some degree at some point, for the femme fatale, not unlike like male lust killer, is just the ultimate ugly extreme of feminine evil personified. As to why one might want to rethink the opportunity to fuck a whore—no matter how hopelessly hot—Paglia offered some unsettling food for thought when she wrote, "I follow Freud, Nietzsche, and Sade in my view of the amorality of the instinctual life. At some level, all love is combat, a wrestling with ghosts. We are only for something by being against something else. People who believe they are having pleasant, casual, uncomplex sexual encounters, whether with friend, spouse, or stranger, are blocking from consciousness the tangle of psychodynamics at work, just as they block the hostile clashings of their dream life. Family romance operates at all times. The femme fatale is one of the refinements of female narcissism, of the ambivalent self-directedness that is completed by the birth of a child or by the conversion of spouse or lover into child." Undoubtedly, La Bête Humaine depicts a sort of idealized version of the femme fatale that has enough agency in terms of carefully calculating her kills, but the modern-day world seems plagued with a new sort of degenerate whore (of the usually Cluster B sort) that, completely incapable of love (let alone keeping a man), uses her body to defile as many men as possible as a sort of pathetic substitute for a real relationship (as if a bloated 'body count' is not an expression of self-hatred/self-annihilation, at least for women). Of course, just like the archetypal femme fatale, this tragic degenerated 'failed femme fatale' will bring chaos and destruction to your life, albeit of the totally nonsensical nihilistic sort.

Notably, near the end of his autobiography My Life and My Films (1974), Jean Renoir notes while singling out some of his best films, "Whether the setting is natural, or imitates Nature, or is deliberately artificial, is of little importance. I used external truth in so-called 'realistic' films like LA CHIENNE and LA BÊTE HUMAINE, and apparently total artificiality in films like LA PETITE MARCHANDE D' ALLUMETTES and LE CARROSSE D'OR. I have spent my life experimenting with different styles, but it all comes down to this: my different attempts to arrive at the inward truth, which for me is the only one that matters." And, undoubtedly, La Bête Humaine certainly achieves this truth in a manner that, not unlike Nietzsche's philosophizing with a hammer, is akin to the raw rhythmic precision of a locomotive in Mussolini's Italy and does so with a stark brutalism that makes it hard to believe it was directed by the same auteur that dreamed up the singularly goofy and relatively lighthearted Boudu Saved from Drowning (1932). While a penetratingly pessimistic film for its time, the romantic realm nowadays certainly resembles something more in tune with Delphic delirium and purgatorial paranoia of André Delvaux's masterpiece One Night... a Train (1968) aka Un Soir, un Train where, among other things, a surreal apocalyptic nightmare scenario offers a temporary reprieve from a catastrophic train accident. Still, despite its age and relation to the present, Renoir's film is an all-around decided downer and a film that even transcends the auteur's previous masterpiece La Chienne (1931) aka The Bitch—a film so unforgettably stark and pessimistic that Fritz Lang remade it as the film noir Scarlet Street (1945)—in terms of devastating anti-romantic dejection.

In his excellent tome Jean Renoir: A Biography (2012), French film critic Pascal Mérigeau underscores the all-encompassingly forsaken spirit of the film when he notes that, "Of all the films directed by Renoir in the thirties, LA BÊTE HUMAINE is the one that could be said to resemble a film by Renoir the least [...] In choosing to ascribe Lantier's wound to heredity, as announced by a quotation from the Zola novel at the beginning of the film, the director evokes a fate that at the time would stick to Gabin's roles one-screen, condemning to certain death some of the characters he played. Stretching from Pepel in THE LOWER DEPTHS to Jacques Lantier in LA BÊTE HUMAINE are all the hopes born of the Popular Front and abandoned along the way, and everything Renoir liked to believe, or pretended to want to believe. That dark fate is shared with the other main characters [...] Never in Renoir's work has fate had such crushing weight. Lantier cannot stand it, and he kills himself by throwing himself off the top of la Lison as it is running at top speed, whereas in the novel Pecqueux and he kill each other. "They'll be found without heads or feet, two bloody trunks still pressed together, as if to suffocate each other." At the risk of sounding like a humorless philistine, one of the reasons I liked La Bête Humaine so much and was totally shocked by it is because it's totally devoid of the sort of the satirical silliness that one expects from a Renoir flick (in fact, the only goofy aspect of the film is Renoir's admittedly quite humorous performance as a bombastic boor). Of course, the fact that Renoir opted to not use some of the more darker elements of Zola's source novel and changing of Lantier's death from brutal murder to guilt-ridden suicide reveals how much of a hopeless humaniſt that the filmmaker really was. Additionally, there is no doubt that the film owes much of its pathos and melancholic intensity to lead Jean Gabin as demonstrated by the actor's similar perturbingly potent performances in classic films like Julien Duvivier's Pépé le Moko (1937) and Marcel Carné's Port of Shadows (1938) aka Le Quai des brumes, among various other examples. Naturally, being a great artist, Renoir was even great when dealing with subjects and moods that were not exactly innate as the La Bête Humaine underscores (and, as Nietzsche noted, there is "praise in choice" as "The artist chooses his subjects; that is his mode of praising," hence Renoir's use of Zola's nasty novel). As to Renoir's support of idiotic leftist politics, Nietzsche also offered a clue when he wrote, "Liberality is often only a form of timidity in the rich." Luckily, Renoir was not timid when it came to whores and genetic taints.

As to the value of a film like Renoir's in our certainly more degenerate and gynocentric age where virtually every form of sexual sickness is celebrated by everything from public schools to multinational corporations and virtually every aspect of society is meant to appeal to the petty whims and wants of female narcissism while normal heterosexual male behaviors are routinely pathologized and treated as grotesquely criminal, I am reminded of Paglia's words, "The more nature is beaten back in the west, the more the femme fatale reappears, as a return of the repressed. She is the spectre of the West's bad conscience about nature. She is the moral ambiguity of nature, a malevolent moon that keeps breaking through our fog of hopeful sentiment." In a world where the dumb fictional dragon bitch of Game of Thrones is celebrated as a hero among grown wine-addled women, a sapless modern witch like Elizabeth Warren is a serious presidential candidate, and a half-retarded autistic-cum-downsie like Greta Thunberg is taken seriously by the U.N., a classic femme fatale like the one portrayed by Simone Simon seems almost refreshing. Luckily, as Paglia also notes, "Eroticism is mystique; that is, the aura of emotion and imagination around sex. It cannot be 'fixed' by codes of social or moral convenience, whether from the political left or right. For nature's fascism is greater than that of any society." After all, there will always be femme fatales like the one featured in La Bête Humaine, but Warren and Thunberg are special aberrations that come with an absurdly abnormal repressed society of the morally and culturally inverted sort where the complete transvaluation of values has made the tranny queen and the culture-distorting ex-ghetto-dweller king. In that sense, it is better to become a happy victim of an old school femme fatale like Simon than live in a world where fecund-free feminist feces like Ghostbusters (2016) exists.

THE WOMAN ON THE BEACH

Just like with goombah giallo flicks, I tend to prefer classic film noir films that completely break the conventions of the 'style' by being set in the country (as opposed to the stereotypical shitty city) and feature femme fatales that are not necessarily fatal like in Nicholas Ray classic films They Live by Night (1948) and In a Lonely Place (1950) and Edgar G. Ulmer's magnetically melancholic filmic road-to-nowhere Detour (1945), so naturally it came as no surprise to me that I absolutely loved French master auteur Jean Renoir's much maligned final Hollywood film The Woman on the Beach (1947). A rare example of 'beach noir' featuring surreal and phantasmagoric imagery in a cinematic work that might be best described as an 'allegorical ghost story' as the main characters are haunted by a perturbing past that has resulted in a forsaken present, the film is undoubtedly my second favorite Renoir flick and certainly an eccentric entry in his oeuvre as a decided downer of the delirious dream-like sort where the prospect of death almost seems like a great gift from the gods. Indeed, aside from his poetic realist masterpiece La Bête Humaine (1938) aka The Human Beast—a deathly dark picture where suicide ultimately acts as the greatest of permanent reliefs for the foredoomed protagonist—the film is the only one that Renoir directed that bleeds misery, misanthropy, and just downright meanness, which were certainly not innate characteristics of a good goofy and jolly humanist like Monsieur Renoir. With that said, it should be no shock that Renoir was not particularly fond of the flick to the point where he was even bored during its pre-production, even complaining to his older actor brother Pierre, "My agents have stuck me with a film, at RKO, a studio where I'm dying of boredom." In fact, in his autobiography My Life and My Films (1974), Renoir, like a good little idealistic humanist, expresses his innate philosophical discomfort for the subject matter, stating, "It was a story quite opposed to everything I had hitherto attempted. In all my previous films I had tried to depict the bonds uniting the individual to his background. The older I grew, the more I had proclaimed the consoling truth that the world is one; and now I was embarked on a study of person whose sole idea was to close the door on the absolutely concrete phenomenon which we call life. It was a mistake on my part which I can explain only by the relative isolation enforced upon me by my limited knowledge of the language of the world in which I now lived." In short, not unlike La Bête Humaine, The Woman on the Beach is a film where Renoir demonstrates his majesty as a cinematic auteur by directing a great gloomy and doomy film that was completely at odds with his own personal Weltanschauung and overall personal human spirit and in that sense, more than any other, one truly comes to understand the cinematic artist's genius for his chosen artistic medium.

Based on the novel None So Blind (1945) by Stella Adler's physicist-turned-novelist hubby Mitchell A. Wilson and originally plagued with the terribly unfitting title Desirable Woman, The Woman on the Beach was actually originally a project of great horror producer-auteur Val Lewton, but he abandoned the project not long after disagreeing with female lead Joan Bennett's demand that Renoir direct as he felt that Fred Zinnemann, Jacques Tourneur, Robert Wise, Lewis Allen, and Edward Dmytryk would make for more suitable directors. In fact, although the producer quit the film long before it began shooting, it often times feels more like a Lewton flick than a Renoir one (which might be partly explained by the producer's possible (co)writing of the screenplay, which was soundly theorized by Pascal Mérieau in Jean Renoir: A Biography (2012)). Interestingly, Renoir's description of Lewton in his autobiography is more or less in tune with the spirit of the film, as the auteur states of the producer, "Then he too died, alone or nearly so. His solitude certainly did not surprise him: he had often said that the closet groups were nothing but solitudes brought together." Speaking of Lewton, The Woman on the Beach certainly has much more in common with Curtis Harrington's favorably Lewtonian debut feature Night Tide (1961), which is also a darkly romantic film with a gothic beach setting where the oceanic becomes oneiric, than any of Renoir's other films. Indeed, I honestly cannot think of any other films aside from these two that seem inspired by the spiritual essence of Edgar Allan Poe's famous poem 'Annabel Lee,' especially the final line, "In her tomb by the sounding sea."

It seems that, despite being made for a Hollywood studio, even Renoir regarded the film as a sort of artsy horror flick as indicated by his words, "To conclude, THE WOMAN ON THE BEACH was the sort of avant-garde film which would have found its niche a quarter of a century earlier, between NOSFERATU THE VAMPIRE and CALIGARI, but it had no success with American audiences." Of course, as a fiercely foreboding, moodily morose, and paranoia-plagued film that flirts with a sort of 'Liebestod' involving a bizarre love triangle between a damaged Coast Guard officer with PTSD, a cold cunt proto-goth whore, and her blind resentment-ridden ex-artist husband, the film was doomed to fail on all fronts. Totally devoid of any phony 'good guy' and 'good gal' types, the film is also notable for having a trio of 'broken' characters that are almost equally unlikeable yet, somewhat paradoxically, somehow similarly sympathetic in terms of all-too-human failings and tragic characters (or, as the famous quote from The Rules of the Game goes, "everybody has their reasons"). In that sense, the film feels more European than America and it is no surprise that such a romantically moribund movie would be an abject failure with the Tinseltown-narcotized American audiences of that time. As Renoir wrote in regard to these 'solitary' characters, "There is a race of genuine solitaries, but they are rare. Those born to be solitary contrive to isolate themselves in a world entirely of their own making. Most solitaries only appear to belong to this category, having been born to play a part in the world around them. It is only after what is as a result a deeply hurtful event that they have become solitaries. If they fight against it, it is generally at the cost of fearful inward turmoil. This drama of isolation is for the artist an episode in the tragedy of which we are all actors and which ends only with our departure into eternity. The artist is simply a man endowed with the gift of making these inward conflicts visible. Art is the materialization of an interior and often unconscious dream." Naturally, Renoir utilizes nightmarish dream-sequences to expressionistically underscore the inwardly infernal metaphysical hell that plagues the haunted protagonist in what ultimately proves to be a practical use of avant-garde techniques. In short, no one can watch The Woman on the Beach without being reminded that they have been plunged into the dark despairing abyss that is the perturbed protagonist's mind.

When Camille Paglia wrote, "At some level, all love is combat, a wrestling with ghosts," she certainly could have been thinking of The Woman on the Beach where the quest for love, or even just maintaining a thoroughly necrotic love with a person that used to love you but now hates you, reeks of a sort of grotesque desperation comparable to the theft of items from half-rotten corpses on a bloodstained battlefield. Indeed, the film's pathetic protagonist Scott (Robert Ryan)—a tall, dark, and handsome would-be hunk that, aside from suffering from bad dreams, is absurdly all-American, like a figuratively puss-filled parody of the banal American military type—is engaged to marry a classically beautiful blonde named Eve Geddes (Nan Leslie) but he soon finds himself considering murdering a blind (ex)painter named Tod Butler (Charles Bickford) after falling for his cold cunt wife Peggy (Joan Bennett) who dreams of escaping her miserable life with her all the more miserable husband. Of course, as a half-crazed military bro that is having reoccurring nightmares involving romantically embracing a ghostly underwater 'siren' of sorts resembling his fiancée that lurks inside a quasi-apocalyptic oceanic realm of the creepy chthonic sort full of skeletons and wrecked ships, Scott—a Coast Guard officer that, rather inconveniently, is now afraid of the mere sight of a busted up boat—is probably in the 'right' frame of mind to fall for a proudly whorish femme fatale that wants to free herself from the obsessively jealous husband that she was responsible for blinding during a drunken row. A man that lived to paint and did his best work in the form of nudes of his wife just before he lost sight at the hand of his greatest source of inspiration, Tod—an unconventionally charming chap with a name that, not coincidentally, means 'death' in German—is now a resentment-ridden shell of a mensch that lives hopelessly in the past and both literally and figuratively cannot see the present. In fact, Tod is so obsessed with holding onto the past that he refuses to sell his last paintings despite their great value as the final creations of a painter that can no longer paint. While Peggy feels some guilt for blinding Tod and, in turn, ruining his life by leaving him incapable of doing what he does best, she is also a calculating cuckolded cunt and thus cannot help lust after Scott as soon as they meet. Naturally, Peggy eventually realizes it might be wise to kill her husband and sell his valuable paintings, which she hates, so that she can start a new life and Scott makes for the perfect pawn for such a scheme as the two both dream of a better life. Unfortunately, Scott is too unhinged and Peggy to emotionally erratic and scatter-brained for the pernicious plot to work.

Although Scott will be discharged from his dreaded Coast Guard position in a week and thus will soon get his dream of leaving the seaside area for good as it reminds him of a past monstrous maritime tragedy that has haunted him with nightmares ever since, his life is completely changed one day while riding on the beach with his horse and unexpectedly encountering gorgeous proto-goth bitch Peggy—a drop-dead gorgeous dark-haired dime-store diva that, due to her almost delectably demonic essence, seems like she has had her fair share of eclectic dick—as she curiously scavenges from the ruins of a shipwreck (which is surely symbolic as the protagonist's fiancée Eve is the total opposite as a blonde beauty that builds ships at a shipyard). As the sight of the ruined ship clearly incites his PTSD, Scott somewhat irrationally berates Peggy for gathering the rather crappy wood and she responds by noting his quite glaring spiritual unease, even stating, “You even looked at me as if I were a ghost.” While Peggy is not a phantom in the literal sense, she might as well be as she lives a static ghostly existence in a quaint shack with her husband in a lackluster life of mutual stagnation and (self)hatred. While Scott takes an instant liking to Peggy to the point where he seems to instantly forget about his fiancée, he feels somewhat annoyed when the older and wiser Tod attempts to befriend him and even begins to question whether he is actually blind or not as if he cannot bear to have sympathy for the man whose wife he so desperately wants to fuck. In fact, Scott intentionally puts Tod in a precarious situation where he almost dies after falling off a cliff in the hope it would prove that the retired artist would be revealed to be faking his own blindness. While the incident proves that Tod is not a fraud, Scott is still not interested in being his pal, especially after he discovers the ex-artist physically abuses Peggy and comes to the conclusion that he will commit his life to freeing the poor little harlot from her rather repressive husband. Rather sickly, Scott's sexual desire for Peggy seems to be largely intertwined with the degree of misery and abuse that plagues his lover's disharmonious marriage, as if he gets a hard-on just thinking about her being brutalized by her husband. In that sense, this is a beachside bizarre love triangle that only sad sickos would find romantically.

Needless to say, when Scott starts pounding Peggy's pussy (despite her openly admitting to him her lack of virtue by boasting, “I'm a tramp. You just finding that out?”), it does not take much for the protagonist to be motivated to murder Tod so that he can start a new life with his femme fatale lover, but he is such a sad self-destructive sack of shit that he uses borderline suicidal means to accomplish this decidedly demented task. Indeed, in what is the biggest of two major climaxes of the film, Scott takes Tod on a fishing trip where he rather absurdly attempts to drown his blind rival by piercing a hole in the boat during a nasty storm, thereupon causing both men to be swallowed up by the waves. In a scenario that contradicts the protagonist's reoccurring nightmare of an Eve-like virtual sea witch seducing the protagonist in a skeleton-ridden underwater hell, Scott and Tod are saved by a small group of Coast Guards that includes the protagonist's long-suffering fiancée Eve. Of course, Tod is not happy after barely surviving Scott's murder plot, so he decides to take his revenge against his scheming wife despite the fact that, unbeknownst to him, she tried to stop it at the minute and ultimately saved both men's lives by alerting the Coast Guard of the situation. In the end in what is ultimately the second and final climax, Tod goes completely berserk and not only burns his remaining paintings—art pieces that are apparently worth tons of money due to being created by a famous 'dead artist'—but also his beach house, as he no longer wants to be a prisoner of his past and finally plans to move on with his life. Of course, that also includes letting Peggy go, or as he tells Scott as they watch the house burn down, "I had to do it. Those paintings meant everything to me. But they became an obsession. They had to be destroyed. Now I'm free. I've new work to do. I've things to say. Many things. And Peggy's free. I clung to her as I did the paintings. To the past. I made her live in it with me. I had no right to do that." Somewhat ironically considering the circumstances, Tod and Peggy seem to reconcile in the end despite the ex-painter's promise to let her go. As for pathetically forlorn protagonist Scott, he literally walks away with nothing, which is even less than he started with as his fiancée Eve has even left him. Since Scott is a psychotic prick and Tod is at least a man of wisdom that learns something in the end, I would have to say the film concludes on a relatively happy note.

Notably, The Woman on the Beach was such a disastrous flop that it resulted in Renoir having to abort a planned adaptation of Gustave Flaubert's Madame Bovary (which, interestingly, he had already adapted in 1934 with less favorable results) that he already had in pre-production. In fact, the film put a complete end to Renoir's career in Hollywood, or as the auteur stated in his autobiography, "I was under contract to make two films for that company. A few days after the premiere I had a visit from my agent, Ralph Blum, who reported that they were ready to buy me out for a fixed sum. I am no fighter; I accepted, and that was the end of it. But it was the end in the widest sense. The failure of THE WOMAN ON THE BEACH marked the finish of my Hollywood adventure. I never made another film in an American studio. It was not only that particular failure that was held against me. Darryl Zanuck, who knew something about directors, summed up my case to a group of film-people. 'Renoir,' he said, 'has a lot of talent, but he's not one of us.'" Of course, the fact that Renoir was not a for-hire-hack-whore type like so many in Hollywood is why The Woman on the Beach is such a great film as not even subversive mavericks like John Huston or Howard Hawks would ever dream of directing such an unsettlingly dark and experimental film. As for Renoir, he was not really fond of any of his Hollywood films except for The Southerner (1945) aka L'Homme du sud, which he once described as “really the only thing that justifies my trip to America.” Personally, I cannot agree with Renoir’s assessment of his own work, as The Southerner—a sort of proto-neorealist film clearly informed by the auteur’s idiotically idealistic leftist politics—is certainly worth a watch yet ultimately seems like a prosaically patronizing experiment in proletarian fetishization when compared to deep dark aesthetic and emotional extremes of a rare arcane aesthetic object like The Woman on the Beach.

Notably, it was not until the film was rediscovered by film critics at the Cahiers du Cinéma that would later become major filmmaker of the La Nouvelle Vague that The Woman on the Beach finally received some positive praise, or as French film critic Pascal Mérigeau explained his massive text Jean Renoir: A Biography (2012), “Éric Rohmer would make the film the touchstone for his admiration of Renoir. Truffaut would cite a certain scene showing Joan Bennett crawling on all fours as one of the ten most erotic in the history of film. Jacques Rivette would speak of ‘pure cinema’; and, with the hindsight of years, he’d call the film ‘the first in a trilogy of great masterpieces.’ All such loving protests are also a defensive reaction to the extent of the rejection to which the film was subjected, and all of them are perhaps justified and accurate. However, they would be more convincing if Renoir’s name on the credits hadn’t contributed to steering the vision of the film and constructing opinions about it.” Personally, I could not disagree more with Mérigeau as I found the film to be great in part because it is rarely Renoirian unless one compares it to the auteur’s similarly unconventionally dark and morbid La Bête Humaine. In short, it is no surprise that the film had its genesis with Val Lewton—the great producer-as-auteur that even managed to overpower a great filmmaker like Jacques Tourneur with his almost devilish esoteric influence.

Despite Renoir’s supposed apathy for the subject matter, the film has certain undeniable autobiographical elements, especially in regard to the filmmaker’s famous painter father. Indeed, not unlike Renoir’s Impressionist painter padre Pierre-Auguste Renoir who painted nude portraits of his mother Aline Charigot, the eponymous femme fatale is the subject of her husband’s much beloved nude paintings. Strangely, neither Renoir nor his biographer Mérigeau reference this seemingly obvious connection between the film and auteur’s famous family. Interestingly, whereas Renoir would once state of his father’s paintings in his book Renoir, My Father (1962), “His nudes and his roses declared to men of this century, already deep in their task of destruction, the stability of the eternal balance of nature,” the nude paintings of Tod in the film are such a source debilitating internal sickness that he must burn them so that he can get on with his life. Of course, on a more personal level, the subject of an artist that becomes blind is a visceral fear that should appeal to any serious filmmaker (notably, the character Tod more or less described himself as a ‘dead’ painter due to his blindness), which probably partly explains why the auteur drastically changed the storyline from its source material (in the novel, Tod just pretends to be blind). As to what a filmmaker might create if they went blind, Gay English auteur Derek Jarman provided at least one example with his AIDS-addled swansong Blue (1993). Notably, Renoir would never again direct anything so serious and instead would stick to virtual celluloid confections before fizzling out like a weak old fart. While the auteur directed one or two more notable films after his failed career in Hollywood, I am certainly more than tempted to see The Woman on the Beach as Renoir's virtual artist obituary as a film that is not only consumed with doom and gloom that features a retired artist that no longer wants to live life but also because it was the consequence of artistic compromise on the filmmaker's part. On the other hand, I believe the film probably greatly benefited from artistic compromise as apparently the dream-sequences were not added until late into the film's production after Renoir was forced to reshoot a good portion of the picture (according to the filmmaker's own varying statements, between 1/3 and 1/2 of the flick had to be reshoot).

As someone with artistic inclinations that is somewhat haunted by the past and grew up with a close blind relative, I probably found The Woman on the Beach more relatable than most people would to the point where it at least partly inspired me to write this review. As a goofy man motivated by humanistic impulses and, for a time, shallow leftist idealism, Renoir is certainly not an artist I can seriously relate to on any innate personal level, so to me it proves his artistic genius that he was able to somewhat successfully take a poesy Poe-esque approach to such uncharacteristic material, as if he was temporarily haunted himself. Of course, Renoir had his own objective with the film, or as he once wrote in regard to his first version of the flick, "This is a film in which I wanted to proceed more by suggestion than by demonstration: a film of acts never carried out." In the end, The Woman on the Beach is largely about the (in this case, negative) influence of a female lover on an artist, as Tod is virtually magnetized to Peggy before and after she caused his blinding (and, as the viewer assumes at the end of the film, her influence enters a third and more positive phase at the end of the film). Notably, in Jean-Jacques Beineix's classic modern romance Betty Blue (1986) aka 37° 2 le matin—another frog-helmeted film depicting the perturbing perils of l'amour fou that is (at least partly) set on the beach—the male lead 'loses' his eponymous lover once he finally achieves his artistic dream of penning a successful novel, as if such self-destructive vaginal venom has already completely served its purpose and thus he can finally move on. Notably, even the non-artist protagonist of The Woman on the Beach is driven to action by Peggy in an almost magical fashion as he self-deludes himself into believing that it is his mission to 'save her' from her ostensibly sinister husband and not because he has a fetish for fiendish femme fatales, hence his loss of interest in good girl Eve. As the film demonstrates, women tend to inspire both the best and worst in men as if the so-called fairer sex is god's greatest curse.

Of course, as Luis Buñuel and his Surrealist comrades believed, "desire is the one true motor of the world," hence why the 'ship sunk' in the end when it comes to Scott and Peggy as the latter has finally achieved reconciliation with her husband. It is also no coincidence that Scott (ex)fiancée Eve tells him "I finally realized you're sick" as he is consumed with the sort of l'amour fou that causes an otherwise rational man to degenerate into a Dionysian dildo that lives to fuck a void of a hole. Undoubtedly, only in a fantasy flick like Henry Hathaway's Peter Ibbetson (1935)—a truly idiosyncratic film based on a story by George du Maurier that, not unlike Renoir's flick, is a rare example of a Hollywood movie with dream-like avant-garde elements—does l'amour fou lead to something truly eternally heavenly as The Woman on the Beach so ruthlessly reminds the viewer in a somewhat ambiguous ending where a lovelorn young man loses his great love to a defeated old fart that has finally decided to let her go free as if the truest way to a woman's heart is getting over her. Needless to say, Tod probably had the better idea when he was following a path more in tune with the Marquis de Sade's words, "The only way to a woman's heart is along the path of torment." In fact, Tod, who is easily the most intriguing character in the film, is certainly a sort of low-key Sadean of sorts and his misguided abuse towards Peggy assuredly reflects the Marquis' words, "Certain souls may seem harsh to others, but it is just a way, beknownst only to them, of caring and feeling more deeply."

While Renoir originally intended for The Woman on the Beach to be "a story about love in which the reasons for attraction between the different parties were purely physical, a story in which sentiment would play not part at all," he ultimately assembled something much more insanely intricate and metaphysically infernal where love becomes more or less one and the same with the Todestrieb and where artistic obsession and the abject desperation associated with a premature 'artistic death' compels a desperate ex-artist to virtually keep his favorite artistic subject prisoner. While the film certainly led to the death of Renoir's career in Hollywood and, in turn, his artistic decline in general, the film is unequivocally the most enigmatic, preternatural, and esoteric film that the auteur ever created, not to mention one of the most radically recherché film noir flicks of all-time. Indeed, the film is arguably the unintended artistically fruitful consequence of Renoir being forced to endure a sort of Bressonian method of filmmaking as demonstrated by French master auteur Robert Bresson's words, "These horrible days—when shooting film disgusts me, when I am exhausted, powerless in the face of so many obstacles—are part of my method of work." Undoubtedly, a lack of suffering causes an impoverishment of spirit, especially artistic spirit, and Renoir—a man that had a fairly privileged bourgeois bohemian upbringing—rarely suffered until he was forced to flee his homeland in May 1940 after Germany invaded France and relocated to Hollywood where he worked under artistically unfavorable circumstances. Had Renoir suffered even more and earlier in life, one can only speculate the sort of masterpieces he might have churned out as a sort of potential frog Bergman. Speaking of the great Swedish auteur, The Woman on the Beach certainly shares aesthetic and thematic similarities with Bergman flicks like Hour of the Wolf (1968) and Shame (1968), among others. In terms of strange seaside cinematic works that helped to sink the career of a once-respected European auteur, the film is also comparable to Scotsman Alexander Mackendrick's uneven yet somewhat underrated Don't Make Waves (1967)—a rather idiosyncratic late entry in the 'beach party' sub-genre that benefits from a rather nubile Sharon Tate—which Tarantino recently paid tribute to in his latest film Once Upon a Time in Hollywood (2019).

As Renoir stated himself in regard to how the conquering of his homeland effected the film, "It was natural that I should look for themes having nothing to do with a motherland who was no longer herself. I had a horror of sentimental images of pre-war France. Better a void than the pointed bear of the film Frenchman. But a void offers no solid foothold. Realizing the fragility of the thing I was making, I tried to change the story while the film was being shot. The result was a confused scenario leading to a final work which I consider interesting but which is too obscure for the general public." Of course, nowadays the totally dumbed-down and obscenely aesthetically retarded general public would find most of Renoir's films to be totally inexplicable, thus allowing a film like The Woman on the Beach a more notable place in the auteur's singular oeuvre as an ostensible oddity that underscores the filmmaker's unexpected eclecticism and capacity to embrace the entire range of human emotions. Indeed, I certainly never expected that it would be a cheap RKO B-movie that finally enabled me to fully appreciate the Gallic greatness of Monsieur Renoir. In short, fuck the totally trying Technicolor xenophilia of The River (1951) aka Le Fleuve, evil wanton white bitches on the beach are forever.

THE IRON ROSE
THE IRON ROSE

Jean Rollin (1973)

The Iron Rose is the fifth feature length film directed by the French auteur who created among the first of the X-rated genre and gore film within his country of France. With most of his film entwining vampirism and erotic elements, The Iron Rose is a detachment from the formula of his normal vampire films and is treading more on territory paved by Jodorowsky's Fando y Lis. The theme of The Iron Rose will later be taken and given a highly controversial subtext of pedophilia and retitled Maladolescenza. Young lovers escape into a graveyard at night for passionate adventures and love making sessions. In the midst of their heated moments, night breaks and they are lost within the walls of the cemetery. As the night bleeds more, their character's explode into a frenzy, prompting many violent situations, running, and surrealist scenes of gravestones at night. Wrapping up with a truly poetic final scene, The Iron Rose is sincere and disquieting but completely illogical. Many of the fairytale situations encountered by the incredibly lovely Françoise Pascal and the Crispin Glover lookalike Hugues Quester could have been avoided had common sense been employed. Rule of thumb: If you're lost within a walled establishment, walk till you reach the wall, then follow the wall until you reach the exit. Rather than ending the film properly, and on a happy note for that matter, Rollin decided to make his characters appear mentally handicapped in their quest for escape. I haven't explored much of Rollin's filmography but I hope his Fantastique cinema offerings conjure up some logic and sense rather than embarrassing and frustrating me. As I mentioned, the formula was perfected both in the past and the future by Fando y Lis and Maladolescenza. These films come highly recommended over this one. The Iron Rose does feature the ravishing Miss Pascal dance around in the nude but after her frequent outbursts of childlike screaming, the aforementioned scenes become anti-titillating and disappointing. The Iron Rose is your generic French arthouse fare but this is dressed up more like a midnight movie than artistic impressionism. If you can manage to discover this, the most mistreated film in his oeuvre, you'd be minded the give it a chance.

LOST IN NEW YORK

While it is safe to say that I am not exactly the biggest fan of French ‘fantastique’ artsploitation auteur Jean Rollin (Le Viol du Vampire aka The Rape of the Vampire, Les Raisins de La Mort aka The Grapes of Death), I have found some value, if only in aesthetic terms, in some of his cinematic works, with Perdues dans New York (1989) aka Lost in New York certainly being a strikingly singular and soothingly surreal work among the froggy fetishist filmmaker’s innately uneven cinematic oeuvre. Essentially the whimsical result of director Rollin having the opportunity to visit New York City while taking two of his beautiful actresses along with him and shooting a variety of improvised yet meticulously stylized scenes and later coming back to France to shoot the rest of the film, Lost in New York—a short yet sweet filmic fever-dream-within-a-fever-dream that is just under an hour at 52 minutes length—is undoubtedly one of the director’s most, if not most, personal works, which is rather ironic considering it lacks the horror and gore the filmmaker is best known and revered for. Described by Rollin himself as “an anthology of all the themes and obsessive images I have used in my films” which had ultimately “brought to an end what had been started within the previous 13 films,” Lost in New York was somewhat rather strangely made for French television, although it is surely impossible to tell that while watching the film, as a work that is a sort of superlatively surreal celluloid travelogue tone poem depicting both urban NYC and rural France at their most oneiric and otherworldly. Working from the idea to “improvise a theme” of “two young women separated and desperately looking for each other” while cruising NYC with his two youthful dimestore divas, Rollin ultimately concocted a celluloid dream that is just as rooted in the subconscious as conscious, if not more so, though Lost in New York ultimately manages to be a shockingly literate work of sub-avant-garde celluloid that makes fitting references to both the world of cinema and literature. More arthouse-addled than erotically excessive, Lost in New York is a celluloid testament to the fact that although Jean Rollin eventually became a degenerate pornographer to pay the bills, at heart, the filmmaker was a somewhat serious artist who found his greatest source of inspiration in the form of beautiful and bewitching women. A sort of celluloid dream-within-a-dream-within-a-dream about an old woman who reminisces how she and her friend are magically transported from the unpopulated seaside of Northern France to the diversely and densely populated streets on New York City, only to become separated, Lost in New York is like Rollin’s celluloid equivalent to his countryman Jacques Rivette’s Celine and Julie Go Boating (1974) aka Céline et Julie vont en bateau, albeit nowhere near as innately impenetrable, but certainly just as overly self-indulgent and rightfully so!

overly nostalgic elderly French woman named Michèle who lives in a rather decrepit and poor rural area and who has nothing left in her life aside from her magical memories. While grasping a primitive looking wooden charm she calls the “Moon Goddess” that her semi-blind eyes can barely see, Michèle tells a tale about how she met her sort of spiritual sister and best friend Marie, a “magic little girl” from the coal region of rural Northern France who had no one to play with, hence her hysterical crying, until her empathetic little friend came along. After the two little ladies discovered the wooden Moon Goddess idol, it enabled them to travel from their quaint French rural village through both space and time, ultimately taking them to New York City and transforming from little girls into beautiful young women. Using the magical world of film and literature as a guide, elderly Michèle explains that the Moon Goddess took them on a journey, “where the young girls from Picnic at Hanging Rock Disappeared, where Errol Flynn takes Micheline Presle in The Adventures of Captain Fabian,” but also the celluloid realms of Charlie Chaplin’s Modern Times (1936) and Georges Franju’s Eyes Without a Face (1960) aka Les yeux sans visage, among various other works. Not surprisingly, reference is also made to Jean Rollins’ films by Michèle, who narrates, “We were inside the music box of “The Living Dead Girl” and “hidden in the clock of The Shiver of the Vampires, which opens at the stroke of midnight behind the theater curtain of The Naked Vampire.” As stated by an unseen male narrator, “In New York City, this ghost city, in a present which is not the real one, Marie and Michèle run towards each other, entering deeper into the mysteries of New York’s streets, buildings and blocks,” but inevitably they lose one another and must fight all by their lonesome against the bitter realities of life, especially those of the multicultural hellhole which is the Big Rotten Apple, which includes lesbian thieves and a gigantic yet largely invisible Chinese community that represents a subculture within a subculture in a deracinated postindustrial wasteland where everyone is doing their damndest to survive. Naturally, the world of Lost in New York is also somewhat sensually supernatural as testified by the narrator’s remark, “With the parting of the day comes the hour of magic. The most beautiful appearance, more sumptuous than the black night, is of the white woman vampire who will haunt the New York night,” and the timely appearance of said nocturnal Aryan bloodsucker. Indeed, while nowhere near as graphic as some of Rollin’s more (in)famous celluloid works, Lost in New York features the occasional unclad female body (mostly some sexually unappetizing black broad) and even the occasional death, which happens to Michèle when she is forced to fight an aggressive switchblade-wielding bull-dyke chick whilst lost in NYC. Just as the little girls manage to find one another again after morphing into young adults and being transferred to and lost in New York City, so will they be reunited at the conclusion of Lost in New York as elderly women, ultimately morphing into little girls again and thus coming full circle in life. As the narrator states at the conclusion of Lost in New York, “The path that Michèle and Marie enter is forever sealed. You only go there once, never to return.”

Unquestionably a more sentimental than sordid cinematic work that wallows in nostalgia and imagination in a decidedly literate yet nonlinear manner, Loſt in New York is a phantasmagorical film that reminds the viewer that “Fantasies die at dawn,” but with every new day there is a new dawn, even when you’re old and lonely and feel that you have experienced all that life can offer. Featuring a number of dichotomies, including the cinema world vs. the real world, youth vs. old age, timelessness vs. temporality, the rural and organic vs. the urban and manmade, innocence vs. defilement, etc., Loſt in New York is certainly a work that demonstrates that even though Rollin was a hack pornographer in his 50s at the time of directing the film, he had yet to lose his appreciation for the fantastic and imaginative, as if he was still holding on to a part of his youth. In that sense, Loſt in New York is a strangely positive and uplifting work as a sort of surrealist fairytale for adults who need a bit a relief from the disillusionment, pessimism, and apathy that comes with living and learning. Indeed, if I have ever gotten anything out of viewing of Jean Rollin flick, it was most certainly the phantasmagoric playfulness and arthouse fantasy of Loſt in New York, a celluloid work that manages to be both cinematically reflexive yet tastefully (and even childishly!) sentimental in a transcendental sort of manner that is nothing short of true movie magic in an age of cultural and spiritual darkness. Indeed, while featuring an authentic footage taken by Rollin in NYC, the Big Apple of Loſt in New York is certainly not the same place I had traveled to about a decade or so ago, but a place of pernicious otherworldly phantoms and pestilence that seem not much more real than a Disney movie as an outsider’s depiction of a place and time that has been endlessly depicted cinematically, but not in such a classically classy and even ‘gothic’ manner that brings mysticism to a metropolitan nightmare that usually inspires misery and misanthropy. A sort of cinematic swansong to Rollin’s classic auteur signature as a filmmaker who clearly realized he had reached his peak as a filmmaker and decided to become totally self-indulgent one last time, Loſt in New York is certainly the director’s most ambitious achievement as a cinematic artist who had fallen from auteur grace. Featuring an exceedingly ethereal and completely complimentary musical score by Rollin collaborator Philippe d’Aram (Fascination, The Living Dead Girl), Loſt in New York is a must-see film for anyone interested in the art of celluloid, but especially people like myself who previously thought that Jean Rollin had not even the slightest inking of artistic talent. Ironically, I discovered the film after coming upon a music video by happenstance for the song “I’m God” by Italian-American hip hop producer Clams Casino featuring scenes from Loſt in New York. Needless to say, it was the first and likely last time a hip hop artist gave any sort of artistic recommendation to me.

A BRUTAL GAME
A BRUTAL GAME

Jean-Claude Brisseau (1983)

If France has anything resembling its own sort of refined arthouse equivalent to the classic low-budget American serial killer flick Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer (1990) directed by rebel auteur John McNaughton, it is most certainly Un jeu brutal (1983) aka A Brutal Game directed by Jean-Claude Brisseau (Noce blanche aka White Wedding, Les anges exterminateurs aka The Exterminating Angels). Indeed, in terms of its combination of violent killings, decidedly dysfunctional family dynamics, and provocative moral ambiguity, Brisseau's film shares some notable superficial similarities with Henry, but it is ultimately an inately more intricate and enterprising work that would probably bore the hell out of jaded gorehounds and can hardly be described as a horror flick (I have read some somewhat misleadingly describe it as a "Bressonian serial killer movie," though I guess one can see it as a sort of Au Hasard Balthazar (1966) of serial killer flicks, albeit sans the donkey). While the film might feature a serial killer and some disturbing murder scenes juxtaposed with an eerie and unnerving score, A Brutal Game is really one of the most bizarre and grotesque yet strangely humanistic coming-of-age flicks ever made as a work that depicts the intellectual and especially sexual maturation of a rather nihilistic and equally sadistic crippled girl whose estranged crypto-killer scientist father takes her out of the Catholic convent where she has been most of her life and makes her learn some real Spartan discipline. Part sadistic slasher flick, part existentialist coming-of-age flick for ephedrophiles, part eccentric dysfunctional family drama, and part morbid murder mystery, Brisseau's cult film without a cult should surely be considered a classic now, but considering it is far too visceral, tough, and politically incorrect for the sensibilities of the ludicrously liberal nation of Frogland, it seems to have never gained the notice or success that it rightly deserves as one of the most preternatural serial killer flicks ever made (of course, France would also produce Sombre (1998) directed by Philippe Grandrieux). Made at a time in his career before the success of De bruit et de Fureur (1988) aka Sound and Fury when he still worked his original job as a school teacher and only directed films part-time as a sort of super serious hobby, A Brutal Game is indubitably the work where Brisseau most emphasizes the importance of education in not only the academic but also sexual, emotional, and spiritual sense. Indeed, the crippled chick protagonist gets a little bit of 'tough love' from her father and ultimately goes from being a feral-like blonde beastess that loves killing animals to a calm and thoughtful nature-loving artist of sorts, thus I could certainly see the film being criticized by certain hysterical left-wingers as being ostensibly 'fascistic' due to its positive depiction of cold and hard discipline. Notably, Brisseau has described the film as being heavily influenced by Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) and Sam Peckinpah's The Wild Bunch (1969) in the sense that he knew it would initially offend the critics in terms of how hardcore and visceral the material was. As Brisseau has described in various interviews, the central theme of the film is the meaning in the life and the point of one's existence in this merciless yet beautiful world. Ultimately, A Brutal Game demonstrates that once you give up free will and begin putting too much stock in spiritual delusions, you let yourself become more susceptible to the most heinous and irrevocable of acts. Simultaneously erotic and grotesque, as well as brutal and beautiful, Brisseau's undeniably underrated film is a rare piece of existentialist cinema that does not seem like it was directed by some pretentious ponce and/or grad student dropout.

Opening with the following quote from Fyodor Dostoyevsky's literary swansong The Brothers Karamazov (1880), "Listen! I took the case of children only to make my case clearer. Of the other tears of humanity, with which the earth is soaked from its crust to its centre I will say nothing. I have narrowed my subject on purpose," A Brutal Game immediately informs the viewer of one of its greatest intellectual influences, as well as the fact that it merely uses a crippled girl as a pretext to explore the meaning of life and how life is different for everyone, as everyone takes their own unique path in life which they must discover on their own. At the very beginning of the film in a scene of disturbing yet strangely serene slasher-esque horror, a middle-aged man named Christian Tessier (of William Friedkin's Sorcerer (1977) and Brisseau's Sound and Fury) stalks a 12-year-old girl until he finds her sunbathing topless in the woods and then brutally butchers her with a knife. Tessier is a respected scientist of the seemingly psychopathic sort and he has decided to abruptly quit his job at a lab where he burns all of his precious research before leaving for good, as he is a pathological paranoid who has convinced himself that his co-employees want to steal his work. When a mailman tells Tessier, "We'll miss you. A great scientist such as you," he does not even acknowledge the man but instead focuses intently on a letter informing him that his mother has suffered a heart attack and, "She wants to see you before she dies." As the viewer will soon discover, Tessier's mother (Belgian veteran actress Lucienne Le Marchand) is one of the few people that the character actually listens to and respects. While on her deathbed, Tessier's mother berates him for quitting his job and giving up "all that responsibility" and then begs her son to reunite with his crippled teenage daughter, stating, "That poor thing was abandoned when her mother left you. Actually, she never had a father either." Tessier's mother also tells her son to take his daughter to his place of birth in rural Saulière as she also wants him to get in touch with his roots. When Tessier's mother subsequently dies, he refuses to attend her funeral because he sees her corpse as nothing more than an "object. A thing like a stone," but he does honor his progenitor's wishes and immediately has his crippled daughter retrieved from the Catholic convent where she has spent the majority of her pathetic life and soon meets her in Saulière.

Upon first meeting his marginally attractive dirty blonde daughter Isabelle

A BRUTAL GAME

(Emmanuelle Debever of Andrzej Wajda's Danton (1983)) in Saulière, Tessier must immediately acknowledge that the wheelchair-bound little girl is quite hateful, spiteful, malicious, and possibly somewhat deranged as she proceeds to go into great detail to her father about how she would love to set bombs all around the small village they are at, stating with a sense of sadistic glee, "First I'd blow up the market when it's the most crowded. Bodies torn apart, women and children screaming. Sewers blown apart, mud, and corpses spreading blood everywhere." A servant named Lucien (Brisseau regular Lucien Plazanet of Sound and Fury and Céline (1992)) attempts to excuse Isabelle's insane rant by stating, "You have to indulge her. She was born like that and she will die like that. And she has always lived in solitude," but Tessier refuses to excuse such unhinged behavior as he does not believe in further crippling cripples and retorts, "We're all alone. You have to cope with that." When Tessier takes Isabelle to a local river and she proceeds to kill a bird and some insects, the concerned father asks her why she is engaged in such reprehensible behavior and she replies that it amuses her and that she hates animals. When Tessier attempts to talk some sense into the tyrannical teen, she becomes enraged and calls her father a "dirty old sod," so he responds by violently picking her up, throwing her into his car, and locking her into her room after demanding that she clean and wash herself. As Tessier tells Lucien regarding his plans for his daughter, "At the moment she is just an animal. She needs discipline, or else the devil will get a hold of her." Indeed, Isabelle is so helpless and worthless that she cannot even dress herself even though she has full use of her arms and hands and is merely unable to walk as a result of having a piece missing from the base of her spine, so Tessier demands that she learn these things and when she refuses and throws a fit, he locks her in her room without any food. Ultimately, Tessier creates a stringent daily regiment for Isabelle that describes what she must eat, learn, and do every single day.

Aside from having to learn to be a normal human being, Isabelle is also forced to receive both a physical and academic education from a young pretty live-in teacher named Anne Lorraine (played by Brisseau's wife/editor María Luisa García aka Lisa Hérédia), who previously worked with retarded kids and luckily has a high tolerance when it comes to dealing with uniquely unruly students. From Anne, Isabelle also begins to discover her sexuality, as she spies on her teacher while she is masturbating and then proceeds to masturbate for the first time while staring at her unclad body in the mirror. While Isabelle has a rather nihilistic attitude at first, complaining to Anne, "I should have never been born!" after learning that she will never be able to walk because she is missing a piece of her spine (indeed, despite being nearly adult, Isabelle somehow never came to the conclusion that she is permanently disabled, as if everyone was too afraid to inform her of this important fact), the teacher's exceedingly empathetic attitude works wonders on the eclectically damaged dame. When Isabelle screams at Anne regarding her father, "I'm sick of you! Especially him! He never leaves me alone! I haven't seen him in years, and then he shows up just to annoy me!" after Tessier yells at her lack of empathy in regard to a poem by French poet and screenwriter Jacques Prévert (who was responsible for penning the classic work Les Enfants du Paradis (1945) aka Children of Paradise directed by Marcel Carné) about an injured horse, the teenage protagonist is punished with being locked in her room for 28 hours straight without food. When Anne forgets to lock the door to her room, Isabelle manages to escape on her crutches and heads to the river near her house where she accidentally falls in the water while trying to kill bugs. Luckily, Anne's semi-handsome brother Pascal (Albert Pigot) spots Isabelle while she is drowning and narrowly saves her life.

Needless to say, Isabelle soon falls in love with nice and sensitive pretty boy Pascal, who humors the cute yet crippled teenage girl by taking her on hikes and carrying her while the two skinny-dip. Indeed, Pascal is the first person that Isabelle is nice to and she even professes her love to him at one point by confessing, "The only beautiful person on this earth is you [...] Thanks to you, I'll never be alone or unhappy again. I'm starting to even like people I used to loathe." Pascal also somewhat successfully helps Isabelle get over her irrational fear and hatred of animals and insects by telling her after she freaks out when a small spider crawls across her unclad stomach, "Since you don't know how to look at it, you compare it to yourself. It's a being in its own right. Regardless of us, it will keep on going." Of course Pascal is not as romantically interested in the teen as she is in him and when Isabelle finds him in bed with Parisian brunette babe, she throws her crutches at the two lovers and cries hysterically after falling to the floor. Naturally, Isabelle's melodramatic behavior wakes up Anne, who tells her brother to pack up her things. So that the lovelorn teen will not be able to kill herself, Anne immediately hides all the scissors and knives around the house, but Isabelle still proclaims, "You can try to hide everything away from me. I'll kill myself. I'll kill myself anyhow." While Isabelle almost succeeds in accidentally killing after falling down a mountain and hitting her head on a rock, Pascal manages to save her life again just before he leaves for good.

When Isabelle spies on servant Lucien one night and discovers that he is a gay cross-dresser upon seeing him posing with fancy dresses that were owned by her recently deceased grandmother, she develops empathy for the old queen and begins asking him questions about her family and is startled to discover that her father—a man that had previously berated her for squashing bugs and killing birds—was just as pigheaded and cruel to animals when he was a boy. Indeed, apparently Tessier once horrified Lucien by dismembering a frog and pouring acid on its wounds just to see what would happen, hence the reason why he probably became a scientist. Meanwhile, Tessier continues to stalk and brutally murder children while on supposed business trips. When Isabelle decides to disobey her father by breaking into his room to put a flower under his pillow as a display of affection, she discovers a photograph on Tessier's wall of six children and a list of their names, with most of the kids' faces and names being crossed out, as if to indicate they are dead. Ironically, around the same time Isabelle begins suspecting that her father might be involved in some rather unsavory behavior, her relationship with him grows stronger and the two began regularly frolicking around gaily in the countryside. When Tessier buys Isabelle a pet snake and she becomes disheartened when it eats a frog, the father explains to his daughter that it is normal and natural because it is merely "nature's law" and "nature is a self-balancing system." When Isabelle complains that she finds the idea of snakes eating frogs "awful," the father demonstrates her has a sort of Nietzschean worldview by stoically remarking, "Awful. Unfair. In fact, these words are meaningless. Happiness comes from pain, pain from happiness. Death impels life as life does death. The same goes for good and evil." Ultimately, Tessier tells his daughter that if she gets rid of her emotional and sentimental "illusions" then the world will appear to her in all of its splendors. Around this time, Isabelle takes up painting and seems to be at peace with herself and the world, but a problem arises when she discovers upon watching the news that one of the little girls from the photograph in her father's room was murdered.

When Tessier discovers Isabelle snooping around his room and realizes that she has figured out he is a serial killer, he surprises the viewer by not killing his daughter. When Isabelle hesitantly asks her father, "You didn't really kill innocent children, did you?" he replies in a rather calm manner, "No one is innocent. Remember that. We're all just links in the chain. The world is full of signs. Silent to the ignorant, the incapable, the fools. Yet, clear indications to those who know how to interpret them." After going on a paranoid rant about how his fellow scientists and the government were spying on him and attempting to steal his research, Tessier explains to his daughter that the six children that he has been slowly but surely killing were collectively involved in breaking into his home and destroying all the research he had done at a secret lab he had setup. It seems that Tessier is a paranoid schizophrenic of sorts and he believes that killing the children is part of "God's plan," or so he explains in a fiercely fanatical fashion that screams pathological mental psychosis. To demonstrate his point, Tessier has Isabelle write down the first letters of the first names and surnames of the six children, which ultimately spell out "Diable Tueles" aka "Devil, kill them." From there, Tessier explains to his daughter, "It's a message. Those kids were sent by the devil to foil God's work," and that he believes god sent the children to him to be dispatched and sent straight to hell. When Isabelle tells her father that he is crazy, he responds by calmly threatening to kill her and then tells Lucien and Anne to make sure she is locked in his room for the next 36 hours. Part of the reason Tessier believes the killings are part of god's plan is because he has yet to be caught, but when he goes to kill the sixth and final child after having Isabelle locked in his room, he ultimately finds himself in a precarious faith-crushing situation when the police corner him in an apartment building shortly after he snatches the little girl that he intends to butcher. While Isabelle prays that her father is stopped, Tessier miraculously comes to realize that he was wrong, proclaiming, "My god. What have I done?" while staring with a deep sense of guilt in his eyes at his prospective child victim. When the police walk in on Tessier touching the little girl while he is attempting to comfort her and assume he is attempting to hurt her because he has a knife in his hand, they shoot him dead. After her father is killed, Isabelle somehow instantly realizes this and sees an apparition of Tessier reaching out to her from a distance and she responds by reaching back at him, as if to say goodbye. In the end, Isabelle sits at the top of a mountain in a symbolic scene that demonstrates that she has finally conquered her spiritual journey and reached personality serenity.

In its depiction of a well dressed child killer that stalks children around dark alleyways combined with a subplot about an uncommonly tolerant teacher attempting to tame and train an innately intemperate girl that is more like a beast than a human, A Brutal Game is almost like a fiercely fucked frog hybridization and mutation of Fritz Lang's M (1931) and Arthur Penn's Helen Keller biopic The Miracle Worker (1962), yet this description would indubitably betray auteur Jean-Claude Brisseau's main objective with the film and that was getting out a particularly dispiriting point in his own life, or as the director explained himself, "... [the film] came out of a difficult period that I was going through. I was asking myself about the meaning of life and what made life worth living." Of course, in the end, the teenage protagonist comes to the conclusion that life is worth living, even after facing the fact that she will always be a cripple and that her father is the most loathsome sort of criminal as a child killer. Brisseau's decision to make the serial killer somewhat sympathetic was inspired by his reading of Dostoyevsky as the director revealed in an interview when remarking regarding the film, "I was interested in making it so that in the end the audience ends up almost feeling compassion for him, because if you... If you refer to Dostoyevsky, for example, who believed in God, when you forgive someone, the problem is not to forgive your friend or those whom you love, it's to forgive your worst enemy." Of course, what makes A Brutal Game especially notable for a serial killer flick is that the serial killer miraculously discovers the error of his ways and becomes consumed with guilt, though it is ultimately too late and he ultimately pays for his seemingly unpardonable sins. Personally, I would have liked to see the serial killer survive, as it would have made Brisseau's film an all the more subversive and uncompromising work, but not unlike the pernicious priest of Lucio Fulci's Don't Torture a Duckling (1972), the killer must pay for his exceedingly bastardized reading of the Catholic holy writ.

In its depiction of a respectable French bourgeois intellectual and father with a home in the countryside who lives a second life as a highly predatory serial killer of the highly meticulous, anally retentive, and psychopathic sort, A Brutal

A BRUTAL GAME

Games certainly shares superficial similarities with the vaguely arthouse-ish popular Dutch psychological thriller Spoorloos (1988) aka The Vanishing directed by George Sluizer, but ultimately Brisseau's work is much more subversive, philosophically intriguing, and erotic, as a work that is dying for cult status that has more testicular fortitude than anything associated with the French New Wave. Indeed, like a Michael Haneke flick with a soul and without the pretense that takes a hardcore approach to Hitchcock and takes an almost sadistic approach to genre-bending, Brisseau's film dares to propose the idea that a man can be a decent and inspirational father even if he is a coldblooded child killer. Notably, Brisseau included some cryptic autobiographical details in the film from his career as a teacher. Indeed, like with protagonist Isabelle in A Brutal Game, Brisseau forced his students to read and attempt to interpret Charles Baudelaire's poem "Music" (aka "La Musique"). As Brisseau explained regarding Baudelaire's poem, "The guy [Baudelaire] is saying that when he listens to music, it arouses passions and pain which was forgotten long ago. It brings these things back to the surface, but it soothes him. How is that? Either the guy is a masochist or, and this is not a contradiction, the arts allow you to find...and particularly music, cinema and literature, allow you to find your own emotions and pain, but in a way that helps you to live." Undoubtedly, the best compliment I can pay A Brutal Game is that it has the same emotional impact as the way Baudelaire's poem describes the affect that music has on him. Indeed, as far as serial killer flicks are concerned, you probably will not find one more transcendental and strangely uplifting as Brisseau's. Additionally, you will also probably not find a coming-of-age flick featuring a female protagonist that will be more appealing to men than women. Of course, you know it is a Brisseau film when a half-crazed cripple is given a certain nymph-like yet virginal sex appeal. Undoubtedly, after watching A Brutal Game, I think understand why Brisseau was a teacher, but it was only when he became a filmmaker that he was able to coerce young chicks into taking their clothes off.

SOUND AND FURY

Jean-Claude Brisseau (1988)

While France once had a good portion of the world's population under its control as the second-largest colonial empire and caused much mayhem and destruction to Europe in its spreading of so-called 'human rights' and the three-headed dragon "Liberté, égalité, fraternité," the French have a reputation for being preposterously pretentious pansies amongst most Americans as a result of their patently pathetic role in the Second World War, among other things. Admittedly, most French films, especially those associated with the La Nouvelle Vague, have only reinforced this seemingly unshakeable stereotype for me. Indeed, I cannot think of bigger candy ass pseudo-gangsters than those featured in early Jean-Luc Godard flicks like À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless and Bande à part (1964) aka Band of Outsiders and the criminals and conmen of films by François Truffaut, Jacques Rivette, Jean-Pierre Melville, and Louis Marie Malle are not much better. It was only until I discovered the oeuvre of frog misfit auteur Jean-Claude Brisseau (Un jeu brutal aka A Brutal Game, Noce blanche aka White Wedding), who has made films that are empathetic towards everything from child-killing serial killers to Lolita-loving heterosexual pederasts, not to mention the fact that the filmmaker was arrested in 2002 on charges of sexual harassment, fined and given a suspended one-year prison sentence after a couple of chicks performed sexual acts on one another during an extra intimate audition for the director's work Choses secrètes (2002) aka Secret Things. Instead of attempting to hide the fact that he was arrested, Brisseau—a filmmaker that is fiercely French in the best sort of way (and, no, I am not trying to be ironic) as a mensch with a clearly jovially anarchistic heart—valiantly decided to direct a film about his criminally carnal experiences entitled Les Anges Exterminateurs (2006) aka Exterminating Angels which, although an official selection of the Cannes Film Festival, was much maligned by critics and described by many as nothing more than preposterous and pretentious pornographic trash disguised as art. Admittedly, I have not even seen half of Brisseau's films, but judging simply by his early cult masterpiece De bruit et de Fureur (1988) aka Sound and Fury aka The Sound and the Fury, I can only assume that he has more testicular fortitude than any and every single one of the filmmakers associated with the French New Wave as a sort of French Abel Ferrara, albeit more cultivated and hardcore.

Like his mentor Éric Rohmer before him, Brisseau was a teacher and part-time filmmaker at the time that Sound and Fury had propelled him into critical and commercial success after it premiered at the 1987 Cannes Film Festival where it won the Special Youth Jury Prize. Championed by so-called 'left-wing' (translation: armchair communist) film critics because they felt that it's auteur was a "socially concerned filmmaker" due to his no bullshit depiction of Parisian ghetto teenage gang ‘culture’ and criminality, the film is a decidedly dark, bleak, gritty and pessimistic work that also manages to be quite hilarious, endlessly enthralling, strikingly beautiful, and even sometimes heartwarming in a pre-apocalyptic sort of way. Indeed, with its so-called ‘new naturalism’ combined with random scenes of otherworldly oneiric pulchritude, the film is what you might expect if Teutonic dandy auteur Werner Schroeter was a rampantly heterosexual frog instead of a morbidly melancholy homo and attempted to direct a work that film was a mix between Vittorio De Sica’s Ladri di biciclette (1948) aka Bicycle Thieves, Nicholas Ray’s Rebel Without a Cause (1955), Ken Loach’s Kes (1969), and the underrated kraut ‘socialist realist’ work Das Ende des Regenbogens (1979) aka The End of the Rainbow directed by Uwe Frießner, albeit all the more magical and nihilistic. Featuring psychopathic lesbo negress gang leaders, anti-brotherly teen-on-adult rape, senseless acts of spontaneous patricide, violent youth suicides, and an amorous apparition that looks like an angel but acts more like a debauched demoness, Sound and Fury is more than likely the most gorgeously grotesque gang flick ever made, which probably does not say much considering the general aesthetic sterility of subgenre, but then again it would almost be criminal to simply lump the film in that subgenre in the first place.

After the death of his grandmother, strange and sensitive boy protagonist Bruno Scamperlé (Vincent Gaspé in his first and sole film role)—a young man that is apparently 13-years-old but more resembles a prepubescent child—is forced to move in with his mother at a Parisian ghetto apartment complex with his beloved pet canary ‘Superman,’ who is his only true friend. When Bruno arrives at his mother’s apartment, he finds a sign reading “Welcome My Darling” and a kitchen table full of food and treats, but the protagonist’s mommy is nowhere in sight. Indeed, the viewer never actually gets to see Bruno’s mother because she works 24/7 just to make ends meet, thus the unwittingly forsaken protagonist is left to fend for himself without moral guidance or emotional support in a world plagued by senseless violence and criminality. As a mostly emotionally monotone lad with next to no moral compass aside for a deep compassion for animals, Bruno is surely a young man that is quite vulnerable to pernicious influences, so it is rather unfortunate that he lives in the same building as the most decidedly depraved and proudly morally bankrupt kid in the Parisian multicultural ghetto. Indeed, a young leather-jacket-clad teenage degenerate named Jean-Roger Roffi (François Négret of Leos Carax’s Mauvais sang (1986) aka The Night is Young and Louis Malle’s Au Revoir Les Enfants (1987)) also lives in the low-income apartment complex and the Bruno first sees him upon arriving at the building while the somewhat loony lad is merrily setting a rug on fire. When a young man becomes outraged by Jean-Roger’s pyromaniac proclivities and drags him back to his apartment and demands that his father Marcel (Bruno Cremer of William Friedkin’s Sorcerer (1977) and François Ozon’s Sous le sable (2000) aka Under the Sand) discipline the boy, the proud patriarch responds by brutally beating the nosy concerned citizen, proudly declaring “Nobody has the right to beat my sons. Nobody but me,” and then smacking his son. Unfortunately for him, Jean-Roger and his father Marcel will soon become two of the most prominent figures in Bruno’s life, thus eventually leading to his totally tragic downfall. Not long after arriving at his mom’s home, Bruno spots an angelic ‘apparition’ (Spanish-born Brisseau regular María Luisa García) wearing a blood red 17th-century dress and holding a falcon inside the apartment. The falcon is actually Bruno’s pet bird Superman and it transforms into a bird of prey every single time the mysterious sensual spirit appears. Bruno follows the apparition into a back bedroom where she appears naked and has the boy kiss her and touch her unclad body, though the falcon also sinisterly scratches the boy’s face, thus hinting the dubious spirit is not as heavenly as she looks. When a female teacher begins playing an important role in Bruno’s life as a surrogate mother of sorts, the apparition suddenly no longer appears, thus reflecting that the spirit is a sort of anti-mother who, instead of lovingly nurturing the protagonist, leads him on a dead-end road of self-obliteration.

Aside from living in the same apartment building, protagonist Bruno and teenage delinquent Jean-Roger are also in the same class with a beautiful young female teacher (Fabienne Babe) who the latter incessantly gives trouble which includes embarrassing her in front of the entire classroom by slapping her on the ass. Ultimately, the teacher and Jean-Roger will fight for the ‘heart’ of seemingly morally retarded protagonist Bruno, who is highly impressionable and stuck somewhere between a figurative heaven and hell. Notably, Bruno and Jean-Roger’s friendship begins when the latter steals the former a motorbike so they can ride around their ghetto and cause havoc. When Jean-Roger dares to torture a dog by wickedly tying a rope around its neck and dragging it from his motorbike, Bruno becomes exceedingly enraged and attacks the sadistic philistine teen. When Bruno reveals that he attacked him because he does not like it when people hurt animals, Jean-Roger replies, “You’re weird” and then proceeds to play a prank on two dipsomaniac bums by lighting their clothes on fire, though the protagonist does not mind as he does not have much empathy for humans. When Jean-Roger takes Bruno back to his apartment, his father shoots a gun a couple feet away from their heads and then says to the boys, “Don’t ever forget! Always be on your guard!,” which inspires his son to say to the protagonist, “You see? He’s great, my dad. He’s severe but he understands life.” Jean-Roger’s young adult brother Thierry (Thierry Helene) is less impressed with incessantly reckless behavior of his father Marcel, as he has a job and serious girlfriend and is tired of living in a dangerous criminal environment that is full of plenty of beer and bullets. Indeed, Marcel is a proud career criminal who, aside from stealing cars and pinball machines, contracts underage teens to do his dirty work for him since they are less likely to go to prison if they get caught. In Marcel’s mind, doing a couple years in prison is preferable to living in the figurative jail of mainstream bourgeois society. Marcel's favorite son is Thierry, so he takes it rather hard when his progeny refuses to go drinking and shooting with him. Naturally, Jean-Roger is extremely jealous of Thierry due to his father's special affection for him, so he goes out of his way to be as wayward as possible so as to earn Marcel's respect, but his efforts seem in vain. Also living at the apartment is Jean-Roger's virtually rotting dying grandfather, who can no longer properly speak or walk but merely lies in a small bed all day and is not in a hospital because his son Marcel is a sort of criminal anarchist and has a complete distrust of all institutions. As later revealed in the film, Marcel seems to have derived his distrust for authority and law after serving in the army and being exposed to mountains of corpses and war atrocities.

When Jean-Roger starts a virtual riot at his school after jumping out of his classroom window, climbing onto the roof of the building, and hanging off the end as if he has a death wish, a social worker is sent to his family's apartment and when she gets there she is greeted by a sign reading, "Death to the Social Worker" and a gun being pressed against the side of her delicate little head. Indeed, while sporting a goofy pink children's mask that makes him seem like some sort of monstrous child, Marcel puts a gun to the young female social worker's head and threatens her by hatefully stating, "Why the hell are you hassling us here? Bitch. If you come and try to bother us again, you'll wish you'd never been born." Ultimately, the social worker resigns after her run-in with Marcel and Jean-Roger is temporarily suspended from school for his behavior, thus giving Bruno the opportunity to bond with his beautiful teacher, who gives protagonist private lessons after school and attempts to instill him with so much needed self-esteem. Of course, Bruno still continues to hangout with Jean-Roger and the two do things like watch lesbian porn flicks and George A. Romero's Dawn of the Dead (1978) when they are not outside committing petty crimes. One day, Bruno accompanies Jean-Roger and Marcel when they go by Thierry's place of work. Marcel is mad that his son Thierry is moving out of the small family apartment and into a new place with his middle-class journalist girlfriend, so the bizarrely heartbroken father attempts to coerce his son to dump his ladylove and become a criminal like himself, stating things like, "Those people, they're not like us" and "When you're done fucking her, what will the two of you talk about? You'll find yourself imprisoned for the rest of your life in a golden jail. If you're lucky." When Thierry remarks, "I want peace. A real job, and to be esteemed by respectable people," his father replies, "Like a slave...all your life. I saw corpses, piled, thrown in the mud in heaps, halved...kids with their eyes gouged out, scabby old women tortured... We counted the dead by the number of trucks." Indeed, Marcel developed his degenerate nihilistic criminal philosophy as a result of his experience in the army and when Thierry remarks that he never told him about that before, he replies, "I've never told anyone, no. There's no god, no punishment. There's nothing, my boy. Nothing but the big black hole at the end. There will always be war, everywhere. It will never end. I won't ever bust my ass again for those people. And I don't want you to either. The only thing that counts, is yourself. Laws are for suckers. Be like me – don't set your sights to high. You'll have both money and freedom." Ultimately, Marcel gives Thierry a thick wad of cash and tells him to take a vacation in the country and spend some time thinking about whether he wants to become a law-abiding bourgeoisie cuckold or a 'free' criminal like himself.

As time passes, Jean-Roger gets more and more involved with an extremely violent and predatory teenage multicultural gang led by a butch bull-dyke that looks like a negro-arab hybrid named Mina (Fejria Deliba). After setting a car driven by a rival gang on fire by throwing a Molotov cocktail at it, Jean-Roger ends up murdering one of the boys after he escapes from the inflamed automobile with a shotgun in his hands by stabbing him in the back with a knife while Bruno does nothing to stop the sadistic behavior of his comrade. While the gang rejects Bruno, the group's sadistic Sapphic leader tells Jean-Roger he can become a member after he proves that he is man enough. Meanwhile, the teacher ends her after-school tutoring sessions with Bruno at the recommendation of the school's pussy principle after Jean-Roger spray-paints "Go on and you will croak bitch" on her car. To add insult to injury, Jean-Roger also has an anonymous letter sent to the principle that claims the teacher is having sexual relations with Bruno. While the teacher teaches Bruno somewhat romantic things like how to waltz to Nana Mouskouri's cover of the highly popular traditional Bretagne song "Aux marches du Palais," she stops the protagonist when he instinctively attempts to kiss her. Ultimately, Mina demands that Jean-Roger that he must rape a girl in front of the entire gang if he wants to be a member, so the decidedly depraved teen requests that he be able to sexually pillage his brother Thierry's bourgeois journalist girlfriend, thus leading to a series of senseless tragic events.

While Thierry manages to stop the defiling of his girlfriend mid-rape by attacking and beating Jean-Roger, Mina's crew soon gangs up on the loving boyfriend and beat him unconscious. Ultimately, Mina and Jean-Roger decide to have a bonfire where they wait for Thierry to wake up so they can "teach him a lesson." When Marcel finally catches wind of what is going on and spots members of the gang carrying his favorite son Thierry towards the fire, he begins shooting at the juvenile delinquents and manages to kill a number of them before going after his son Jean-Roger, who is extremely drunk on liquor and is carrying around a revolver. Of course, novice dipsomaniac Jean-Roger dares to shoot his father and hits him in his rather large gut. In the fear of what his father might do to him for shooting him, Jean-Roger follows the advice of Mina and her girlfriend and decides to hang his father from a tree right next to the bonfire. Meanwhile, Bruno goes outside and looks for his pet canary Superman after it flies out of his apartment window. After Jean-Roger shoots and kills the bird moments after it lands on his lynched father's shoulder, the apparition guides Bruno to the spot where the bodies of both Superman and Marcel are. When the apparition hands Bruno Jean-Roger's revolver, the protagonist opts to blow his 13-year-old brains out. In the end, Jean-Roger, who is apparently somehow now reformed as a result of being incarcerated, writes the Teacher a letter in prison where he apologizes for his previous behavior, explains how he saw the spirit of Bruno, and begs for forgiveness.

While Sound and Fury is oftentimes compared to so-called 'urban youth' films like Jean-François Richet's Ma 6-T va crack-er (1997) aka Crack 6-T and Mathieu Kassovitz's La Haine (1995), it is ultimately infinitely more authentic, poetic, magical, and entertaining than those two films, which are not much more than pseudo-artsy xenophiliac trash that provide a safe way for white liberals to wallow in their fetish for ghetto garbage from the third world while feeling superior over the white working-class. While I hate to use the word since it has become nearly meaningless in our morally inverted world, I have to say that Jean-Claude Brisseau's film is a rare true piece of cinematic 'humanism' that dares to depict the most unsavory members of the Parisian lumpenprole in a way that enables the viewer to understand their behavior without making pathetic slave-morality-inspired excuses for their abhorrent actions. Indubitably the character of Marcel is one of the most reprehensible fathers in film history yet in the end you cannot help but see him as a sad tragic figure who, in the end, found minor redemption by saving one of his sons while ultimately becoming the victim of another. Of course, Brisseau must also be commended for the way he opted to have protagonist Bruno Scamperlé meet his end. As a man that taught at public schools for two decades, Brisseau surely came to the conclusion that there is no hope for the hopeless and that public education systems are the height of bureaucratic impotence and inefficiency. Of course, a lot has changed in France since Sound and Fury was released nearly three decades, namely that the country has much worse problems than its white underclass, which has been virtually swallowed up and eaten alive by Islamic colonizers who are effortlessly outbreeding the seemingly suicidal indigenous French population.

As someone that pretty much agrees with the validity of the Mudsill theory, I think it is absurd to even pretend that the forsaken underclass featured in Brisseau's film is in need of saving, for a marginal superior few like Marcel's son Thierry might escape such a pathetic existence, but the rest are doomed to remain in prole pandemonium and rightly so, as it is their god given birthright. Aside from some of the other Mediterranean countries, France is the most senile rotten corpse of a country in Europa and not unlike the equally extreme Paris-ghetto-based French-Italian coproduction La Dernière femme (1976) aka The Last Woman directed by Marco Ferreri, Sound and Fury demonstrates that the French capital, like most major European cities, will only see the further growth of a sort of neo-barbarism as expressed in an expanding sub-working-class that lives to destroy and would love nothing more to bring birth to an apocalyptic world where their nihilistic hedonism can be fully expressed without consequence (not that the current French criminal justice system is not ludicrously liberal, especially when it comes to their melanin-privileged populations). With his film, Brisseau has managed to do the seemingly impossible by giving great beauty and sensual realism to a fiercely forlorn world that thrives off of ugliness, savagery, and the sort of highly confident stupidity that one can only find among people that are sired in shitholes. Like a more honest update of François Truffaut's Les quatre cents coups (1959) aka The 400 Blows as directed by a man who seems to enjoy lesbian porn and Romero's Dawn of the Dead more than Hitchcock and Godard, Sound and Fury is arguably the least patronizing and most artful white ghetto film ever made, thus not only making a truly singular oddity of French cinema, but cinema in general. Indeed, Brisseau's film was certainly not made for bleeding heart liberals (although they have misguidedly attempted to claim it as their own), though it certainly makes the viewer's heart bleed.

THE EXTERMINATING ANGELS

Jean-Claude Brisseau (2006)

Not at all the Luis Buñuel film of the near-same title, The Exterminating Angel(s) is Jean-Claude Brisseau's somewhat-biographical film in response to his arrest with charges of imposing women to masturbate in his presence as part of his auditions. In the film, our lead character François commits to exploiting women for the sake of art, or France's long standard of art for the sake of women. Right off the bat, I was immersed in this film for its blunt portrayal of women, even so to the script. As I quote one auditionee, "We're all a bit weird. A bit slutty too." Let this women speak for the gender, will you? As François begins auditioning for a film (film within a film) exploring transgressive sexuality, The Exterminating Angels takes no time to dive headfirst into the shallow pond known as female sexuality. Certain desires all let be known, such as being fucked by strangers, gang-bangs, and other perverted desires branching from the central theme: anonymity. Eventually, several women get too attached to the director which is a cause for problems. I suppose clitoral stimulation and voyeurism is a quick mix for obsessive love.

Brisseau subversively reveals himself to be a bit of a narcissist after transforming what should have been an otherwise seedy character into a Casanova. Audition after audition, which translates into a ridiculous amount of on-screen masturbation, frustration builds for François as his marriage is clearly on the rocks. Nights are spent in hotel rooms with other women in hopes to achieve artistic enlightenment. François is stupidly chasing the end of a rainbow in his futile quest. The sexual resentment soon reaches a simmer of which he unleashes upon his wife, providing the only bit of humanity this two-dimensional character has. These results of which I had been patiently waiting for are explosive, and to think I had began to doubt our character's sexuality. If The Exterminating Angels is based around loose fact, let it be known that the portrayal of the selectiveness of the female orgasm seems concise. To continue the reign of egotism, two characters are introduced who are hinted to being "the Exterminating Angels", two female apparitions who supervise his actions. When fate spreads that cruel grin towards François, one of these angels of death admits that she too, has fallen in love with our director. Such a vain boy you are, Mr. Brisseau.

The director surely fancies himself a provocateur. While his actions can be overtly analyzed as a footnote to create the art, one can only bring to mind that [hilarious] news story not too long ago where a man traveled door-to-door, offering up free breast exams. Brisseau allows very little to take away from the erratic and irresponsible taboos of the female wunderkind. Angels prefer to remain stationary as women are pleasing one another, giving the film a sense of strict pornography - a film about the orgasm more than the struggling director. The biographical context is limited to only this, altering the outcome into a scene of brief and phony violence. Call the cause & effect retribution if you will, but high-brow art this isn't. The sexuality on display is rarely erotic and quite tedious. If I wanted to watch legs splayed in an uncomfortable fashion, I'd search for amateur pornography. The Exterminating Angels neither shocks nor humbles. My hopes were far broader than what I had in store. Included with the film are negative connotations towards lesbianism. Within, several lesbian characters are established. The foundation for their love is built off lust and not understanding. The only emotion displayed is channeled straight through their vulva. No brain chemistry required, The Exterminating Angels is a rather disappointing film concerning the destructive tendencies of women, in this case, cockroaches, as they slobber and hunger to reach their peak. This film simply proves that it's lurid to a fault. Not to mention the terrible pacing and mechanic voice-overs spouting prose before each scene - truly, madly, pretentious.

SNAILS IN THE HEAD
SNAILS IN THE HEAD

Jean-Étienne Siry (1980)

Although best remembered, if remembered at all, for her small role as a high-class whore in Marco Ferreri's savage anti-bourgeois satire La Grande Bouffe (1973) and playing alongside Isabelle Huppert in Claude Goretta's class-conscious erotic romance flick The Lacemaker (1977) aka La dentellière, French actress Florence Giorgetti deserves to be recognized for probably being the only actress in cinema history who has starred in multiple artsy horror-thriller films as a hysterical woman who suffers the ultimate female insult of being in a relationship with a pansy poof painter who prefers men over women (to make things stranger, Giorgetti also happens to be the mother of French painter Frédéric Arditi, though I am not sure as to whether or not he is on the pink team). Giorgetti's first cinematic excursion in the realm of flicks about chicks that unwittingly date guys that like dicks was as the eponymous character of superlatively strange quasi-Hitchcockian sodomite slasher flick Monique (1978) aka Flashing Lights directed by undeservedly forgotten artsploitation auteur/gay pornographer Jacques Scandelari (Beyond Love and Evil, New York City Inferno). The second film Giorgetti starred in playing the role of a forsaken babe with a boy-bugging beau, Snails in the Head (1980) aka Un escargot dans la tête, was also directed by a fag frog filmmaker/pornographer by the name of Jean-Étienne Siry. When not directing homo hardcore flicks like Mâles hard corps (1977) and And God Created Man (1978) aka Et... Dieu créa les hommes, Siry was working in the more respectable trade of designing poster art for films ranging from Richard Lester's Beatles vehicle Help! (1965) to Otto Preminger's Bunny Lake Is Missing (1965) to Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Lola (1981). As far as I can tell, Snails in the Head is Siry's first and sole directing excursion in the non-pornographic realm, as a rather idiosyncratic psychosexual horror-thriller with surrealist elements. Indeed, like Scandelari's Monique, Siry's film is from a forgotten time in film history during the late-1970s/early-1980s when gay auteur-pornographer's thought they could capitalize on the popularity of horror/exploitation cinema while also including a semi-cryptic gay subtext depicting the 'horrors' of a homo attempting to live an ostensibly heterosexual lifestyle. Featuring an ambient synthesizer-driven soundtrack by Didier Vasseur, who also got his start in gay porn (he scored Jack Deveau's Le musée (1976) aka Strictly Forbidden, which Siry penned and also starred in) and also appears briefly in the film as a musician, Snails in the Head is a nasty and surprisingly nuanced, if not predictably uneven, little celluloid nightmare that is quite unquestionably trashy and even kitschy in parts, but also manages to be quite unnerving, as if the viewer has the distinct displeasure of being wrapped up in the perturbing (psycho)drama going on inside the fagola filmmaker's unhinged head. The film is also notable for conforming to racial stereotypes, as the slur 'Snail-Snapper' is not used against the French people for nothing, thus making Snails in the Head a sort of French (anti)Heimat horror flick.

Opening with the generic warning, "Between dream and reality is a frontier that no-one should ever cross..." Snails in the Head immediately lets the viewer know that they are about to enter a sometimes surreal world that blurs the line between reality and fucked fantasy. H el ene (Florence Giorgetti) is a somewhat successful novelist, but something must be wrong with her as she is currently staying in a mental institution and one night while sleeping in her hospital room she suffers a horrible hallucination where she sees snails crawling out of the wall during what seems like an earthquake (undoubtedly, this scene seems to anticipate the hospital scene from Clive Barker's Hellraiser). When H el ene's ex-boyfriend Antoine (Jean-Claude Bouillon) comes by to check on her at the nuthouse, it is revealed she is a highly hysterical woman that has a hard time keeping a mensch around. Happily married with a child, Antoine accuses H el ene of destroying her previous relationships with him and her husband Philippe, venomously stating, "You wanted him to live only through you and for you [...] You always destroy everything you touch. It seems you take delight in doing people's misfortune." Of course, more daunting drama and devastation eventually comes into H el ene's life when she becomes involved with a widowed painter named Edouard (played by underrated frog actor Renaud Verley, who previously starred in Visconti's The Damned (1969) and Claudio Guer n's A Bell From Hell), who had himself been institutionalized after losing his ability to paint after both his wife and daughter were tragically killed in a car accident. Naturally, H el ene is delighted to hear that Edouard is a fan of her latest novel, though she is saddened by his remark that he does not like the portrait of her that was featured on the back of the book. As it turns out, the novelist's ex-husband Philippe took the photo, which Edouard concludes was taken by a man who, "didn't like women very much." If one thing is for sure, it is that Philippe haunts the nut-job novelist's life, as she constantly daydreams about being sexually devoured by her ex-hubby who, although not actually featured in the film (aside from a couple flashback sex scenes), has a certain mystique about him that little Eddie seems to lack.

Of course, when both H el ene and Edouard get out of the loony bin, they begin dating one another, with their first date being at the former's dimly lit houseboat. After introducing Edouard to her beloved pet owl Dimitri, H el ene plays a record of Wagner's "Liebestod" and the painter morbidly and ultimately prophetically declares, "Wagner is the King...Die loving...Love to death...to the height that only death can understand." As one can expect, Edouard eventually gets his wish to "love to death," though it is not nearly as romantic as he probably hoped it would be. Of course, in no time, H el ene moves out of her quaint houseboat and moves into Edouard's considerably eerie and equally disconcerting rural farmhouse. Indeed, a man that has not gotten over the death of his wife and child, Edouard not only keeps two mannequins at his dinner table to make him feel less lonely in regard to his recently deceased family, but he has also kept the smashed car that his loved ones died in. While H el ene has, to some dubious degree, fallen in ‘love’ with Edouard, the painter’s elderly friends, an old busybody bitch named Mrs. Sevetier (Jeanne Allard) and her quasi-cuckolded husband Mr. Sevetier (Marcel Gassouk), describe her as a “whore” behind her back. As a man who describes his deceased wife as having a “bitch look” and sometimes nostalgically recollects murder fantasies he has had in the past, Ed is not exactly the most stable of individuals. Indeed, after describing how his dead spouse and her friends were once, “posing and parading like fags to mock me. I could have killed all of them! All of them!” Edouard violently stabs a piece of food like an autistic child with a unhealthy addiction to Ritalin and shitty slasher flicks, which does not exactly cheer up H el ene who, despite having just fallen in love, has an impenetrable case of melancholy. Upon learning Ed and his friends the Sevetiers love raising and eating snails, H el ene begins having grotesque nightmares about slimy mollusks, including one rather disturbing dream where she gives birth to hundreds of these slimy creatures while doctors celebrate by drinking wine (after all, France is the land of wine-sniffing Snail-Snappers). Of course, things get all the more strange when Edouard paints a portrait of H el ene with a giant snail on the top of her head.

When H el ene and Edouard go to see the former’s ex-boyfriend Antoine, their relationship ultimately comes tumbling down in a most deleterious sort of way that no love affair could ever recover from. Indeed, when Antoine reveals to H el ene that her lawyer has been trying to get in touch with her for days because her ex-husband, who she constantly has flashbacks of having sex with, has committed suicide via self-lynching. Naturally, H el ene becomes completely hysterical and irrationally hostile and when Ed attempts to comfort her, she absurdly blames him for the suicide of her ex-husband, calls him a “dirty faggot,” and tells him to get away from her. To top everything off, H el ene’s beloved owl attacks Edouard, so the painter breaks the cute little creature’s neck, throws it at his decidedly distraught girlfriend, and storms out of the house. Taking what H el ene said to heart, Edouard decides to become a “dirty faggot” and begins a romantic relationship with a Viking-like dude with longhair and leather-fag mustache named Etienne (Charles Dubois), but before joining the pink team, the poof painter ritualistically burns his two mannequins and the car his wife and child died in, thus symbolically destroying all ties to his past and previous life as a heterosexual family man. Instead of painting portraits of H el ene, Ed begins working on a morbid portrait of his boy toy Etienne’s decapitated head. When H el ene shows up at Edouard’s humble abode in a desperate attempt to rekindle their scorched relationship and defiantly declares to Mrs. Sevetier, “I come to see my lover to get laid,” she discovers that her less than sane beau, who is too drunk on snails and sodomy to care about some sad slag, wants nothing to do with her. Eventually, H el ene receives a letter from Edouard telling her to meet him at his house, but when she does, she discovers her lover dead with snails crawling on his fairy face. In the end, the film comes full-circle, as H el ene awakens in her room at the mental institution and discovers snails, as well as Edouard, coming through cracks in the wall.

Equal parts aberrant arthouse absurdity, tasteless quasi-supernatural celluloid trash, and crypto-anti-family homo hysteria, Snails in the Head is certainly a work that defies classification as an artsploitation flick that could have only been created in late-1970s/early-1980s post-counter-culture France. Indeed, auteur Jean- tienne Siry came from the same circle of iconoclastic frog fag filmmakers like Lionel Soukaz (Race d'Ep aka The Homosexual Century, Ixe), Philippe Vallois (Johan - Mon  t  75, Rainbow Serpent aka Halt roffic), and St phane Marti (La cit  des neuf portes, Mira corpora) that, although now largely forgotten, took French cinema to unforeseeable realms of unhinged libertinism and aesthetic subversion that make the filmmakers of the French New Wave seemed like a bunch of prudish old farts. While apparently receiving mostly favorable reviews when it was first released over three decades ago, Snails in the Head was destined to be forgotten, as it is just too plain preternatural, warped, perverted, and distressing to have ever developed even a small fan base, as a work that was clearly directed by a genuinely sick and depraved sperm burper who seem to see heterosexuality and vaginas (hence, the 'slimy' snails) as quite horrifying. Indeed, not unlike the work of J rg Buttgerit and Marian Dora, Siry's film is too intelligent, subtextual, and poetic to appeal to the average philistine horror fan and bourgeois arthouse fans would probably piss their Criterion Collection brand panties if they were forced to endure such a fucked flick that dares to mix kitschy supernatural horror conventions with perverted celluloid poetry. Admittedly, as a work about a mentally deranged woman who falls in love with an even more mentally deranged man who converts to cocksucking after being called a "faggot" one-too-many times and who eventually dies in a distinctly undignified fashion with snails crawling across his face, Snails in the Head is not exactly an uplifting work, but instead, a spasmodic piece of heterophobia that challenges the bounds of aesthetic and thematic sanity. Indeed, when it comes down to it, Siry's film is a cryptic cautionary tale about the abject misery that colon-chokers might suffer if they deny their god given right to buggering bros and do the unthinkable by marrying a woman.

DIVA

Jean-Jacques Beineix (1981)

I don't know about other people, but when I hear the word "diva" I usually think of bitchy childless broads with deep voices that are mindlessly worshiped by both effete fags and fag hags alike. Of course, when it comes to the world of cinema, the importance of divas in both the personal and professional lives of gay filmmakers is no different. Indeed, Jack Smith, Andy Warhol, Paul Morrissey, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Werner Schroeter, Daniel Schmid, Paul Bartel, John Waters, and Steve Balderson are just a couple of the auteur filmmakers that were/are obsessed with divas and utilize(d) them for their films. For his debut feature film Diva (1981), mainstream heterosexual French auteur Jean-Jacques Beineix (Moon in the Gutter, Betty Blue) would appropriate elements of gay culture and somehow managed to make a film featuring a wild chase scene with exactly nil cultivated cocksuckers about a young moped-riding frog mailman of the supposedly straight sort whose obsession with a black diva accidentally leads him to being targeted by both Taiwanese gangsters and a physically grotesque alpha-pimp police chief of the miscegenation-proliferating sort. Unquestionably a work with a majorly moronic and oftentimes absurd plot, Beineix's flick features the sort of storyline you might expect from a Hollywood blockbuster where the studio heads attempting to appeal to a minority of gay southern hairdressers instead of the hopelessly proud philistine majority. Indeed, Diva and some of Beineix's works are the sort of films that the technically proficient hacks of Hollywood should make, as true cinematic experiences that may not be big on nuance, subtext, and thematic complexity, but do have a certain alluring artfulness that almost makes one forget that they are watching what really amounts to frivolous frog twaddle of the aesthetically spectacular sort. Part of the so-called 'Cinéma du look' movement—French works directed by Beineix, Luc Besson, and Leos Carax during the 1980s that emphasized style over substance and that were largely influenced by late era American New Wave works (e.g. Cimino's Heaven's Gate, Coppola's One from the Heart), late era Fassbinder (Lola, Querelle), music videos (especially of the New Wave and New Romanticiſt variety), fashion photography and even TV commercials (!)—Diva is cultivated kitsch drowned in a fulfilling visual feast of throbbing blues, Italian Romantic opera, and naughty neon nights that almost make multicultural Paris seem like a magical and mystifying place that totally transcends its world famous reputation as Europe's modern day Sodom. Based on the 1979 crime novel of the same name written by French novelist/poet Daniel Odier (under the pseudonym 'Delacorta'), Beineix's film fell into my lap by accident while checking out 'official' music videos by the drug-addled electronic group Thieves Like Us, which 'unofficially' used clips from the famous chase scene for one of their videos. Set in a modernistic 'post-racial' multicultural France flooded with sexually alluring women from virtually every single race except white, the only major white female character is a frigid chick who thinks her gun is an appropriate substitute for a dick, a quasi-megalomaniacal American negress is the ultimate diva, and all forms of authority/order are depicted as being overtly 'fascistic,' Diva does virtually every annoying politically correct thing one can imagine to the point where it had me fantasizing about France being once again occupied by Germany yet somehow the film works. Co-produced by Russian-Jewish-French producer Serge Silberman, who previously collaborated with Luis Buñuel on such masterpieces as Diary of a Chambermaid (1964) and the director's swansong That Obscure Object of Desire (1977), and featuring a pastiche of Erik Satie's Gnossiennes created by Romanian composer Vladimir Cosma and a nocturnal chase scene that Roger Ebert compared to those featured in classic films like Bullitt (1968) and The French Connection (1971), Diva is, if nothing else, certainly one of the most successful cinematic marriages between high and low art, as a sort of proletarian arthouse flick.

Young French mailman Jules (played by Frédéric Andréi, who would later become a filmmaker) is a cultivated prole of the seemingly half-autistic sort who rides his beloved moped to a Parisian opera house one night to watch and illegally record his favorite opera singer Cynthia Hawkins (Wilhelmenia Wiggins Fernandez)—a celebrated black American soprano opera singer—performing "La Wally," act 1, by Italian Romantic composer Alfredo Catalani. Unbeknownst to gentleman Jules, two sunglasses-adorned Taiwanese gangsters saw him record the performance and they want the bootleg recording because Ms. Hawkins is an old fashioned 'artiste' who refuses to record albums, thereupon making the mailman's recording an extremely rare and truly one-of-a-kind item that is all but priceless. After the performance, Jules awkwardly attempts to chitchat with Hawkins and when that more or less fails, the peculiar postal worker subsequently steals her gown from her dressing room, thus demonstrating his particularly perverted obsession with the colored diva. Of course, Jules' danger is doubled when he unwittingly comes into possession of a cassette tape that is dropped in his bag by a Slavic prostitute named Nadia (Chantal Deruaz), who is subsequently murdered in broad daylight by a mean midget skinhead named 'Le curé' aka 'The Priest' (Dominique Pinon) and his tall Svengali-like Mediterranean comrade 'L' Antillais' aka 'The Caribbean' (Gérard Darmon). The hitman odd couple work for a considerably corrupt Police commissioner named Jean Saporta (Jacques Fabbri) who is secretly runs a global prostitution ring where he trades hard drugs for brown, black, and yellow girls that he has hustle for him in the streets of Paris. Before being murdered, Nadia, who was the former mistress of the crypto-pimp police commissioner, recorded an incriminating testimony regarding Saporta's carnal underworld empire. No small-time crime novice, Saporta has set it up so that the local authorities and media think that the Parisian hooker industry is under the control of a fictional Indian man and Nadia's tape reveals this fact. Unbeknownst to Jules for most of the movie, he is in possession of this rather incriminating recording as Nadia dropped it in his mailbag shortly before she took a fatal knife to the back, so it takes the mobile mailman a while to figure out why he is a marked man. Meanwhile, two 'good cops,' Paula (Anny Romand) and Zatopek (Patrick Floersheim), who seem to represent the ignorant yet well-meaning French middle class, attempt to catch up with Jules to get the tape. Ironically, it is when good cop Zatopek attempts to catch Jules that the film features its iconic chase scene. Indeed, Jules does a lot of running from various parties, but it is not until towards the end of the film that he realizes who he should be truly afraid of.

After being impressed by her thievery at a hip record store and nude black-and-white pin-ups, Jules strikes up a mostly platonic relationship with an underage Vietnamese chick named Alba (Thuy An Luu), who loves stealing, modeling for ostensibly artsy nude portraits, listening to her headphones, and rolling around buildings in roller-skates. Alba is the muse/girlfriend/slave of a genius artist/gangster/philosopher figure named Gorodish (Richard Bohringer)—a man that initially seems like a total recluse because he spends most of his time hanging out at his lavish home yet is a truly worldly man that seems to know just about everything about everything, no matter what the topic may be—who states to Jules while wearing a goofy snorkel and buttering a baguette regarding his theory of Zen, "Some get high on airplane glue...detergent...fancy gimmicks...My satori is this: Zen in the art of buttering bread." Gorodish is also overprotective over his tiny Asiatic muse Alba (who, it should be noted, was a pale blonde girl in the source novel) and when she shows up late one night after hanging out with Jules, he threatens her by calmly stating, "Do this again and I'll drop you off back on the interstate, with the Vietcong." As he will ultimately prove, Gorodish is the "master of the game" and "deus ex machine" who will manage to solve all of Jules problems by virtually singlehandedly taking out the Taiwanese gangsters, as well as Saporta and his two 'fascistic' goons, by merely playing them like chess pieces. Indeed, compared to Gorodish—a man with a somewhat flat affect who seems to personify stereotypical French pretense, sexual degeneracy (after all, his girlfriend is an underage gook thief with a seemingly low IQ), and artistic dilettantism but ultimately proves to be a super sly criminal genius of the seemingly indomitable sort—Jules is a stupid kid with a celebrity crush who lives in a fantasy world and has no idea of the magnitude of the trouble he mostly unwittingly got himself into. Indeed, if it were not for his new comrade Gorodish, Jules would most certainly be one extra-pale froggy corpse.

Unquestionably, one of the most ridiculous elements of Diva is the 'romantic' subplot between protagonist Jules and his dark divine diva Cynthia Hawkins. Not long after awkwardly attempting to speak with her in her dressing room after her performance at the beginning of the film, Jules randomly swings by Cynthia's lavish luxury hotel room and absurdly reveals to her that he is the crazed fan that swiped her gown. Initially angry and threatening to call security, Cynthia soon begins wallowing in Jules' somewhat unsettling fan boy worship. In fact, Jules has such a bizarre obsession with the diva that he pays an Indian prostitute to model the gown he stole from Cynthia, though he does not dare to look at the streetwalker's bare body when she changes into the glittery dress, as if he is an embarrassed schoolboy who lacks the tools to get down and dirty with a delectable dame. When the brown prostitute remarks to Jules, "You seem a little nutty," the young mailman is not at all offended and proudly replies, "I am," as if he feels special due to his strangely obsessive behavior. A lonely and unpredictable artist with very specific demands and routines, Cynthia refuses to take her manager's advice and record an album after it is revealed that a bootleg of her Paris performance has surfaced. Of course, in the end, the opera singer does not have to worry about anything after Jules recovers the bootleg recording and brings it back to Cynthia and plays it for her, to which the diva remarks, "never heard [herself] sing," as if she feels humbled by the experience. Ironically, despite being a world famous opera singer, Cynthia only manages to feel like a true 'diva' after being swooned by a French lumpenprole mailman on a moped who was swooned by her singing.

I think it is only fitting that my first viewing of Diva was via dubious download (as for who made this dubious download, I cannot be sure), as a crime-thriller centering around a bootleg recording that was created in an era when the internet did not exist and one had to deal with shady characters if one wanted to obtain rare artistic materials by less than official means. A rare film with a great and rather iconic chase scene that actually has a bit of artistic merit, Beineix's debut feature proves that there actually be a healthy medium between mindless entertainment and celluloid art that one might describe as 'proletarian cinematic poetry.' Indeed, next to Belgian auteur Patrick Conrad's absurdly underrated flick Mascara (1987) starring Charlotte Rampling and Michael Sarrazin, Diva has to be the best from the 1980s about divas, death, and aesthetic excess. While technically a crime-thriller, Beineix's work will surely be more appreciated by fans of new wave/punk/goth stylized cult flicks like Liquid Sky (1982), Eckhart Schmidt's Der Fan (1982) aka Trance, The Hunger (1983), Repo Man (1984), Pejzazi u magli (1984) aka Landscapes In The Mist, and even To Live and Die in L.A. (1985) than by Brian De Palma fanboys. Indeed, it is no coincidence that the film was advertised in the United States with the following tagline: "Here comes a new kind of French New Wave." Unquestionably, as much as I love some (emphasis on "some") films and filmmakers of La Nouvelle Vague, I have to admit that I lean more towards the 'new romantic' aesthetic of Diva and some of Beineix's other films and I say that as someone that is rather repelled by the mainstream auteur filmmaker's flagrant multicultural fetishism and proclivity toward typical frog twaddle. Indeed, a film has to be doing something right if it manages to make a romance between a goofy half-autistic frog dork and a American negress opera singer seem somewhat cute and touching.

THE MOON IN THE GUTTER

Jean-Jacques Beineix (1983)

Personally, I cannot think of a cooler and more aesthetically appealing film title than The Moon in the Gutter (1983) aka La Lune dans le caniveau and I came to that conclusion years before I actually got around to watching French auteur Jean-Jacques Beineix's almost grotesquely gorgeous celluloid oddity. As far as I am concerned, the film is associated with one of the biggest tragedies of cinema history in a sad cinematic scenario that rivals Erich von Stroheim's Greed (1924), Tod Browning's London After Midnight (1927), Orson Welles' The Magnificent Ambersons (1942), Andrzej Żuławski's On the Silver Globe (1988), and most of gutter auteur Andy Milligan's early films in terms of a potential masterpiece needlessly succumbing to studio stupidity, negligence and/or petty vindictiveness. Indeed, the French studio, Gaumont Film Company, absurdly and nonsensically (and, apparently, quite illegally) intentionally destroyed Beineix's original fully-edited 4-hour and a 3-hour versions of the film to supposedly "make space" in the film vaults despite such film reels taking up relatively little space. Apparently, Gaumont, which forced the auteur to cut the film to a mere 137-minute running time (as it exists today, which, according to the filmmaker, apparently destroyed the entire "rhythm" of the film), was so unhappy that the film was such a critical and commercial box-office bomb that they took a sort of symbolic revenge for ostensibly destroying the reputation of the studio by maliciously destroying these two original cuts. In fact, Beineix, who is still haunted by the nightmarish artistic experience even to this today, only discovered of this great betrayal after assembling a 3-hour director's cut of his subsequent feature Betty Blue (1986) aka 37° 2 le matin and requesting to give the same special director's treatment to The Moon in the Gutter. Still, even as it exists today, the film is, at least in my less than humble opinion, Beineix's unmitigated magnum opus and one of the greatest masterpieces among flawed masterpieces as the cinematic equivalent of a back-alley opium high where the viewer comes up and down but, not unlike the protagonist, is ultimately left in the same melancholic metaphysical hell as he began. Oftentimes feeling like it is set in a different purgatorial port city of the same narcotizingly artificially-stylized, chthonic Genet-esque cinematic universe as Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Querelle (1982)—a film that, incidentally, was also produced by Gaumont in a big studio city—the film is masterpiece of meticulously stylized mise-en-scène where Beineix demonstrates with nil vainglorious CGI visual sophistry the great aesthetic heights of the cinematic form while lavishing the viewer with some less-than-feel-good archetypal truths. One of the key works of the so-called Cinéma du look—a movement that Fassbinder's later films, including Querelle, aesthetically influenced—the film makes it seem as if the La Nouvelle Vague never existed and that it is merely the gothic/darkwave contribution to the ‘Tradition de qualité’ that the pedantic frogs of the Cahiers du Cinéma so passionately despised. In short, the film has more to do with Marcel Carné and Jean Cocteau than Godard and Truffaut, though it also seems to be influenced by the most obscure and esoteric of film noir flicks like Arthur Ripley’s labyrinthine Cornell Woolrich adaptation The Chase (1946) and John Parker’s exceedingly experimental Dementia (1955) aka Daughter of Horror.

While fiercely French in many ways, The Moon in the Gutter is actually adapted from the 1953 pulp-noir novel of the same name by Jewish-American novelist and screenwriter David Loeb Goodis—a cinephile fave that provided source material to various important directors, including Delmer Daves, Jacques Tourneur, Sam Fuller, and François Truffaut, among others—and thus has the pedigree of an eclectic cinephile’s wet dream. Attracted to the novel’s decidedly dark essence, Beineix described it as, “A totally negative story, very black, it was a dark journey with flashes of light, shimmers, glows ... There was also the eruption of a particular embodiment of woman, that girl who arrives in that car, it really was the myth of the femme fatale at its purest ... And then there was gnawing doubt, jealousy ... In short, lots of things which affect the unconscious.” Indeed, one of the film’s greatest attributes is its ominous and oppressive oneiric essence, as the viewer is engulfed in the antihero played by Gérard Depardieu’s perversely paranoid unconscious as he grapples with his beloved late-sister’s rape-turned-suicide and the sensual charms of an almost otherworldly femme fatale portrayed by Naštassja Kinski. A film that practically reeks of tacky designer perfume, stale piss, rank pussy, and cheap beer where the Nietzschean sense of the ‘eternal feminine’ reigns supreme, The Moon in the Gutter is a film that, unlike the director’s previous big hit Diva (1981)—an enthralling exercise in action-packed style that, rather unfortunately, succumbs to quixotic xenophilia and an exceedingly embarrassing sort of racial fetishism—is hardly politically correct and is set in a wayward ghetto realm of evil obese negress stepmothers and lonely synagogue-side-suicides. In fact, instead of subscribing to some trendy quasi-marxist message like frog filmmakers from the previous generation, Beineix strived to make a completely apolitical flick, even once stating, “I am not interested in political or philosophical demonstrations, they are too simplistic. In LA LUNE DANS LE CANIVEAU there is a contrast between poverty and wealth, but it is resolved in a common distress, which is a metaphysical distress where the social divide is no longer operable.” Or, to quote the auteur again as referenced in Phil Powrie’s insightful text Jean-Jacques Beineix (2001), “I wanted to make the subconscious materialize on the screen. I didn’t want to be in the service of logic, of reality.” Exceedingly stylish, sensual, steamy, surreal and even sophisticatedly sleazy, the film is thankfully not completely senseless despite whatever certain spiritually and/or culturally cucked film critics had to say when the film was originally released.

A virtual cinematic drug, The Moon in the Gutter is a film that, not unlike Ridley Scott's Blade Runner (1982) or Terry Gilliam's Brazil (1985), one need not remember the plot for it to be one of the most memorable movie experiences of your life. In fact, not unlike Scott and Gilliam's flicks, I probably could not give a coherent description of the film's storyline the first couple times I saw it, as to do such a thing seems almost redundant and completely missing the point (notably, somewhat ironically, the film has sort of intentionally redundant narration, as if Beineix reluctantly included it at the behest of the studio). After all, one is not compelled to critique a dream for its supposed incoherence, yet The Moon in the Gutter is hardly incoherent (in fact, the storyline is, relatively speaking, fairly simple) and it is certainly more accessible than most of David Lynch's greatest films (and, of course, most cinephiles will probably be tempted to compare it to Eraserhead (1977) and Blue Velvet (1986), though that would largely be pointless). In short, the film is, first and foremost, an understatedly phantasmagoric experience of the ruthlessly romantic yet ultimately demystifying sort where a seriously messed up man is in both literal and figurative reach of his greatest dream in the form of a dream girl from a dream world where the air doesn't smell like a sort of slightly fishy salty semen and things like self-respect and dignity have actual currency.

While I cannot say I have had the luxury of being with a real rich bitch or true blueblooded aristocrat, my experience is that, the higher social class a chick, the more innately insufferable and sensually sterile she is, thus I can understand the hatred for bourgeois or—more specifically—the sapless (upper)middleclass that fears the smell of human bodies and always puts material wealth above culture and security over love and affection. In fact, out of all the women I have been with, the poorest and most low-class was also the most loving, affectionate, and sexual and she is probably the one I most regret fucking things up with, but I digress. In The Moon in the Gutter, tough street frog Gérard Delmas (Gérard Depardieu, who would later trash the film by referring to it as, “The Film in the Gutter”)—a moody and broody stevedore from a decidedly dysfunctional white trash family that includes a rather abusive uppity negro stepmother—finds himself the reluctant object of desire in a bizarre love triangle involving his main whore-cum-stepsister Bella (Victoria Abril in a role originally given to Robert De Niro's high yellow then-wife Diahnne Abbott) and the wealthy yet wild woman of his dreams Loretta (Nastassja Kinski). Unfortunately, Gérard is pretty mentally perturbed and not quite in the soundest of minds to make such a big romantic decision as he has a pathological obsession with finding the malevolent mystery man that raped his beloved sister Catherine (Katya Berger)—a virginal beauty that was apparently too pure for the pernicious lumpenprole world that ultimately destroyed her—who immediately committed suicide with the protagonist's shaving razor. Indeed, the titular moon in the gutter is reflected via Catherine's ruby red blood in the dark slimy alley where she abruptly committed self-slaughter in a perversely poetic scene that finds great beauty in ungodly human brutality. While technically a neo-noir flick, The Moon in the Gutter—a film that, aside from a couple scenes, was shot entirely in a studio—brings a certain preternatural glamour to the gritty as if god himself decided to polish the demented dirty work of his misbegotten (sub)human creations.

Not surprisingly considering Gérard's obvious incestuous feelings for his dead lil sis, both Bella and Loretta look vaguely similar to Catherine to the point where the three could be sisters (in a drunken dream-sequence of the borderline necrophiliac sort, the protagonist has a somewhat erotic encounter with Catherine's unclad corpse at the morgue, only to discover Loretta's face on said corpse). Gérard is even convinced that his alcoholic brother Frank (Dominique Pinon)—a small and grotesque frog that seems like the genetically accursed consequence of France's Alpinid majority's virtual genocide of the Huguenots—was responsible for raping Catherine, but one almost gets the sense that the protagonist is merely projecting his own sense of guilt. After all, Catherine was raped after she fled a hospital as a result of Gérard asking her, "Now you dress like a hooker?" after she went to the trouble to dress nicely for him and borrow a white dress after he was injured at work, hence the protagonist's undying guilt. Undoubtedly, Gérard's pathological paranoia eventually rubs off onto the viewer to the point where one cannot help but even suspect the protagonist of the crime. Notably, quite unlike the mysterious murder of Laura Palmer on Twin Peaks, the crime is never solved but it is almost irrelevant as The Moon in the Gutter is first and foremost a uniquely uncanny mood piece where dark dreams and repressed desires are one and the same. A miserably melancholic man that lives in a nightmare, Gérard is ultimately unable to embrace his dreams even though, rather improbably, they are practically served to him on a shiny silver platter.

Somewhat intriguingly, Gérard finds a wealthy counterpart in the form of nihilistic drunk named Newton Channing (Vittorio Mezzogiorno) who also happens to be the brother of darling dream femme Loretta. While Gérard has been left with an indelible internal wound as a result of the rape and suicide of his little sister, Newton also suffers inwardly in isolation, even while technically in the company of others, as a result of killing both his parents in an intentional car wreck that involved him insanely driving his white BMW into a big rig truck. As Bella states to Gérard in regard to Newton, "He's weird... He doesn't like himself" and he has decided to start lurking in the local Mikado Bar—the protagonist's virtual second home—because he can, "...play games the rich don't allow. Anything goes here." As with virtually every other male character featured in the film, Gérard initially suspects that Newton, who he competes with in a bizarre ice-eating contest, might be his sister's rapist, but instead the rich playboy unwittingly provides him with the literal/figurative girl of his dreams—a voluptuous beauty that is like both a dream lover and substitute sister—in the form of his own sister. Indeed, being his self-described "Guardian Angel," Loretta—a gal so glamorous that wind seems to be always blowing in her hair—arrives at the Mikado Bar to pick Newton up and encounters ungentlemanly gentleman Gérard as a result. Undoubtedly, the initial encounter between Gérard and Loretta recalls the Nietzsche poem “Accidentally a Seducer” that reads, “He shot an empty word...Into the empty blue; But on the way it met...A woman whom it slew,” as the protagonist spouts nonsense yet seems to cause the little lady to fall in love with him at first sight. Indeed, when Gérard half-jokingly gives Loretta his address after inviting her to dinner, Loretta actually shows up at the preposterous time of 2 a.m. in her fancy convertible beside a billboard that all-too-symbolically reads “TRY ANOTHER WORLD.” From there, Loretta takes the protagonist on a ride to the docks where she practically offers him a dream life with a dream girl—an almost preposterously paradisaical prospect that simply seems too unbelievable to such a terminally miserable man—and even attempts to talk him out of his gloomy defeatism, stating, “I frighten you! One day you’ll tell me. You’ll open your heart. You’ll see blue skies. A highway to the sun. Ships like birds... Gentleness... You won’t be frightened... Things’ll be fine. No one is doomed.” Instead of accepting Loretta’s quite glowingly warm embrace, Gérard literally turns his back on her and then once again visits the sad site of his sister’s murder as if to rationalize his own infuriatingly idiotic rejection of virtual romantic bliss.

While Gérard initially rebuffs Loretta’s rather bold romantic advances in an oftentimes obnoxious and even aggressive fashion, he eventually gives in, dresses virtually like Newton with a fancy suit and slicked back hair, and even marries the dream dame at an extra eerie gothic cathedral where the priest absurdly declares “Faith isn’t a matter of size” in regard to dildo-like Virgin Mary statues that are sold at the church. Needless to say, Bella—a fiery prole femme and assumed prostitute that, at one point, attempts to stab the hero with a broken bottle just because she suspects he might be cheating on her—does not take too kindly to the dubious mixed-class marriage and plots with Gérard’s pathetic dipsomaniac brother Frank to have the protagonist brutally murdered. Indeed, since life is cheap in the barf-and-feces-filled frog ghetto, Bella only has to pay a mere $100 to two ex-con thugs to have Gérard snuffed out, but the hired amateur assassins fail miserably as the protagonist has enough visceral pent-up hatred to give him the inspiration to virtually slaughter an entire army. When the protagonist confronts Bella by nonchalantly whipping out the $100 and declaring, “A guy’s life comes cheap. Here’s your money back,” she completely breaks down, practically denies culpability, and blames perennial fuck-up Frank. Naturally, Gérard decides fratricide is the answer and prepares to kill Frank, but Bella, who clearly genuinely loves the protagonist despite conspiring to kill him, attempts to stop him by telling him to leave town with Loretta, stating, “Don’t do it! Stay here! You’ll spoil everything! Listen...take your ride uptown. She’s waiting. You’re right, she loves you! Go away, never come back!” but he complains “I don’t deserve so much love.” Of course, Gérard is the sort of self-destructive guy that likes doing things the hard way and is more interested in satisfying his deep-seated desire for bloodthirsty revenge than simply embracing the more sensible route of romantic rapture with his new wife Loretta. Although Gérard proceeds to attempt to kill his brother in the very same gutter where his sister died using the same exact razor that she used to kill herself, he is stopped at the last minute when a local painter named Jésus (Bernard Farcy)—a painfully gawky art fag that loved Catherine so much that he painted her portrait—hits him over the head with a bottle and declares, “You’re crazy! You know...he didn’t do it.” In the end, Loretta finds Gérard at the site of the suicide and softly cries, “I’m cold,” but their surreal storybook romance is not meant to be and the hero ultimately goes back to his main brown bitch Bella. Indeed, as the narrator states at the end of the film, “Gérard dreamed of a white city...of proper blinds, shady lanes...hidden tennis courts, smooth lawns... He heard the sound of fountains, of birds singing. But he was afraid of that city...of feeling out of place...of that opening door... And the woman waiting for him.”

In an excerpt that would certainly confound Marxist materialists, Friedrich Nietzsche once wrote, “He is now poor, but not because everything has been taken from him, but because he has thrown everything away:—what does he care? He is accustomed to find new things.—It is the poor who misunderstand his voluntary poverty.” And, indeed, it is the ‘poor’ that will be confused by Gérard’s decision in the end, as if it is better to be a rich automaton and married to a virtual Victoria’s Secret mannequin than being yourself and married to a wonderfully wanton woman that understands everything about you, including your insatiable masculine appetite (indeed, it is no coincidence that Gérard immediately declares that he is “hungry” upon coming back to Bella in the end). Far from unconventionally picturesque ‘poverty porn,’ The Moon in the Gutter demonstrates that home is where the heart is, even if you live in a sort of nasty neo-Sodom hellhole.

Over a decade ago, my long-time girlfriend at the time, who expressed more love and passion than a dozen ‘normal’ basic bitch white girls combined, once told me that, if we ever broke up, she would eventually randomly show up unannounced at my house and assumedly cause chaos with whatever girl I might be with in a dramatic attempt to get me back. While this girlfriend, who both physically and psychologically resembled the eponymous babe portrayed by Béatrice Dalle in Betty Blue, never did this (in fact, she is currently married with a kid), sometimes I feel like I’m still waiting for her to arrive. After all, as devastatingly depicted in Maurice Pialat’s classic anti-romantic We Won’t Grow Old Together (1972) aka Nous ne vieillirons pas ensemble, it is oftentimes not until someone finally leaves your life that you realize what you have truly lost. In that sense, I somewhat suspect that if I saw The Moon in the Gutter when we were together and realized what we had (and understood her oftentimes warranted rage, which was not unlike Bella’s, as an irrational yet well-meaning expression of her love), I might not have senselessly sabotaged our relationship but, as obnoxious boomers and bourgeois people sometimes say, hindsight is 20/20. Despite its almost ominously oneiric essence as dreamlike film filled with dream-sequences and pseudo-dream-sequences where a mensch is confronted with a dream girl and dream life, Beineix's butchered masterpiece is, in my mind, ultimately a film about embracing reality and appreciating those individuals—no matter how irreparably fucked up—that actually love you as opposed to fantasizing about idealized phantasmagoric femmes that will never exist in any tangible reality. While Nastassja Kinski's character Loretta Channing technically does not do anything evil like attempting to get the protagonist killed (while, rather ironically, the protagonist's true love Bella does), she is still a femme fatale in a sort of figurative and symbolic sense as she puts Gérard on a precarious path that leads to the death of authenticity and selfhood (which, not coincidentally, is Loretta's spiritually necrotic bourgeois brother Newton's main objective, hence why he gets engaged to a nearly-ancient and, in turn, infertile, prostitute). Undoubtedly, The Moon in the Gutter is probably the only noir-ish film I can think where the femme fatale is not someone you learn to hate, thereupon making her seem all the more preternaturally sinister on retrospect, especially on subsequent viewings of the film.

While the general storyline of The Moon in the Gutter is finally burned into my brain after multiple viewings, it will forever remain, most importantly, a cinematic drug of delirious lovelorn lunacy and paranoid intrigue for me where—not unlike F.W. Murnau's Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927), Carl Theodor Dreyer's Vampyr (1932), Jean Vigo's L'Atalante (1934), and Ridley Scott's Blade Runner—I watch for the not-altogether-mindless drugless high that sends me into a bittersweet deluge of emotions that ranges from romantic nostalgia to a sort of hypnotic regretful heartsickness, among other things. As to auteur Beineix's main method in accomplishing this delectable dream cinema, he once noted, "I sought to make the real a bit unreal and vice versa so as to place the whole thing half-way between dream and reality. To take an example we colored the smoke coming out of a chimney-stack." Of course, whereas Francis Ford Coppola failed terribly with his would-be-romantic exercise of absurdly ambitious artificiality One from the Heart (1982)—a film that was not a total failure in that it influenced Beineix to cast Nastassja Kinski—The Moon in the Gutter manages to conjure the darkly soulful and archetypically sound in a film where most characters are virtual ciphers and artifice acts as a sort of cockeyed spiral stairway to the primordial truth, at least as far as sex and romance are concerned and, in that sense, it could not be more immaculately (not to mention aesthetically pleasingly) titled.

In describing his artistic objective with the film, Beineix once confessed his intent was to create a completely new cinematic language, remarking, "I asked myself what the essence of cinema was, what was the language of the image. I sought another dimension of this language. The cinema is not necessarily at the service of a story, in other words chronology and reality; it is perhaps also at the service of matter.” While it is questionable as to whether or not he truly accomplished this (notably, pseudo-arthouse hack Olivier Assayas of all people went so far as to write in Cahiers du cinéma that “...there is no film”), there is no denying that The Moon in the Gutter is a singular cinematic achievement and that Beineix would never again create something quite as aesthetically alluring, cinematically revolutionary, or endlessly engulfing. Indeed, while Betty Blue is an eccentrically epic amour fou masterpiece and Roselyne and the Lions (1989) aka Roselyne et les lions manages to be both classically romantic and carnally carnival-esque, they just cannot compete with the strangely cold blue ‘heat’ that practically radiates from the screen of the deceptively darkly romantic celluloid dream that is The Moon in the Gutter. As for Beineix’s latest and certainly least greatest features IP5: The Island of Pachyderms (1992) aka IP5: L’île aux pachydermes—an aesthetically excremental exercise in would-be-zany xenophilia and negrophilia with an ugly and would-be-triumphantly-morally-retarded unhinged undermench spirit—and Mortal Transfer (2001) aka Mortel transfert—a sometimes visually alluring yet ultimately vain and superficial genre-bender without brains—they are probably best left completely forgotten, as it pains one to be reminded that they were directed by the same dude that started his filmmaking career with three arguable masterpieces. Not unlike Michael Powell with Peeping Tom (1960) and John Schlesinger with The Day of the Locust (1975), the critical and commercial failure of The Moon in the Gutter seems to have destroyed Beineix’s artistic will as if he ultimately became too afraid to once again test the bounds of cinematic possibility. Largely unsung auteur Eckhart Schmidt (Der Fan, Alpha City)—a sort of Teutonic low-budget Beineix that also took a romantic anti-intellectual approach to cinema—attempted something similar the same year as The Moon in the Gutter with his underrated nocturnal celluloid nachtmahr Das Gold der Liebe (1983) aka The Gold Of Love, which is like a punk/new wave Dementia meets Eyes Wide Shut, but few other filmmakers have dared to take a similarly darkly dreamlike path lest they be accused of aesthetic (crypto)fascism or some nonsensical horseshit. Needless to say, the cinematic neo-romanticism of Tom Tykwer (Run Lola Run, Perfume: The Story of a Murderer)—a protege of queer agitpropagandist Rosa von Praunheim of all people—seems like frivolous fluff when compared to Beineix’s greatest films, hence his collaboration with the Wachowski weirdos.

Clearly working from sort of quasi-Freudian perspective, Phil Powrie sees the ending of The Moon in the Gutter as extremely negative and tragic, arguing, “Gérard’s crime is to have desired his sister, and therefore his mother. His punishment fits the crime: he will marry his stepsister and be hen-pecked by his stepmother, as his father was before him, the ideal Loretta forever refused so that he can continue to expiate incest and voluntary castration.” While Powrie has made a fairly good argument given the details of the film, my personal experience tells me otherwise and I am reminded of the Carl Jung quote, “May love be subject to torment, but not life. As long as love goes pregnant with life, it should be respected; but if it has given birth to life from itself it has turned into an empty sheath and expires into transience.” Love aside, the film also deserves credit for rivaling Charles Laughton’s The Night of the Hunter (1955) in terms of featuring what is probably the most shamelessly sensual and exquisitely beautiful female corpse in cinema history. Indeed, when it comes down to it, I would not be surprised if both the public and critics alike still have not forgiven Beineix or The Moon in the Gutter—a film that should have a cult following that at least rivals any retarded slasher franchise—for providing the world with the most devilishly delectable of dead dames in a flavorsomely fucked film opening that reminds viewers of the unfortunate truth that sometimes women are just as hot when their bodies are cold. In that sense, if you ever needed evidence for the innate anti-aesthetic idiocy of the Bechdel bull-dyke test, Beineix’s films, especially The Moon in the Gutter, nuke such flippant feminist pseudo-intellectual ordure altogether as one exquisite female corpse will always beat hundreds of ugly squawking hens.

I LOVE SNUFF
I LOVE SNUFF

Jean-Louis Coctes (1995)

Every once in a while, it is important to take a break from static arthouse films and important cult movies and watch a film so ridiculously revolting, aesthetically primitive, morally retarding, and patently pointless that it puts things into perspective in regard to how endlessly entertaining, innately idiotic, and mindlessly assembled scat films can be and the very un-French French work I Love Snuff (1995)—a film about an impotent man who achieves sexual ecstasy after receiving ransom videos of his black wife being tortured by two alpha-degenerates—is certainly such an amusingly appalling vice-ridden video affair. Co-directed, co-scripted, and co-starring (although I doubt a physical script was ever written) Jean-Louis Coctes, a nasty noise musician and putrid performance artist oftentimes described as the “French GG Allin” due to his proclivity towards playing with poop and piss, shoving Barbie dolls up his already ripped rectum, and mutilating his genitals on stage via box cutter, I Love Snuff is no less deranged and debauched as a penetrating piece of anti-aesthetic/anti-erotic video art that could have been directed by Beavis and Butthead’s slightly more cultivated frog cousin. While the man who he is oftentimes compared to, GG Allin, absurdly thought of himself as a sort of ‘Rock N Roll Messiah’ (his real-life birth name was Jesus Christ Allin), in reality he was a totally artistically untalented megalomaniac junky who would be better described as the last great American slapstick comedian who turned fecal-flinging into an apocalyptic art form and comedy routine and I see Jean-Louis Coctes in a similarly unintentionally entertaining light, although I suspect he is more conscious of his behavior than his belated American spiritual brother. Making cameo appearances in libertine European arthouse films like Gaspar Noé’s Irréversible (2002) as a deleteriously deranged fist-fuck-loving faggot in a sick sodomite S&M bar, as well as Edwin Brienen’s Lebenspornografie (2003) aka Berlin Nights: Grand Delusions as a poop-loving poof pornstar, Coctes’ own movies are innately less artistic and can hardly be described as serious, but they are indubitably all the more recklessly wanton and warped in their themes and visuals. Describing his own no-budget shot-on-video auteur works as “just stupid films” and his directing technique as follows, “I write a scenario and that’s it. There are some where I’m drunk, I switch on the camera, and I talk absolute nonsense,” I Love Snuff looks like an amateur anti-pornography experiment shot over a couple hours in some multicultural sewer in Paris, yet it manages to consistently captivate in its bottom-of-the-barrel visceral vulgarity and vice-venerating technical ineptitude as the sort of work that was clearly assembled by a man with a lot of unhinged passion, but not much sanity and intellectual sophistication. Featuring a dress-wearing degenerate defecating in the middle of the street in public, a man passively taking a tampon and a strap-on dildo in his blatantly bulging bunghole, a white woman in full-body blackface (labia included) magically turning into an authentic Negro as the film progresses, a white wuss torturing a black broad via Dijon mustard and French fries, and an impotent man achieving sexual climax at the climax his wife's death, among various other case examples of philistine Psychopathia Sexualis, I Love Snuff is like German auteur Peter Fleischmann's porn-parody Dorothea's Revenge (1974) aka Dorothea's Rache except actually funny and without artistic pretense.

"Le branleur impuissant" aka "The Impotent Wanker" (Pascal Keller), who not has fucked "in ages" and whose penis is more flaccid than the excessive flabby skin hanging off an elderly woman's arm, is in the proper position to make love with his African queen of a wife Rose (played by "Rose"), but, rather unfortunately, he has the sexual virility of an East Indian eunuch, so naturally he cannot rise to the occasion and complete his husbandly duties and he throws his sexually frustrated spouse of their flat and later unrealistically dreams of having a magic Johnson with a humungous shaft and a human-sized human head as his dick-head. Meanwhile, a female pimp of a BDSM bitch that goes by the cliché name Mistress (Anne van der Linden) is walking around her cuckold boy toy, who describes himself as "just a turd," like a dog on a leash. Taking on the groveling role of a subservient canine, the man, who is also wearing a dress, bends over and defecates out what seems to be at least four feet worth of real fecal matter and proceeds to blow a student for fast cash not long after, but the jack-off John runs away without paying him and then, to make a bad day all the more worse, he is immediately raped by a long-haired degenerate. Since the Mistress and her cuckold canine cannot pay their bills, it is the bitch beta-males job to "sell his ass to queers," but thankfully a more rewarding and racially-charged way to earn quick cash randomly arrives in the form of a disgruntled wife. It must be these two predatory perverts' lucky day as they run into the Impotent Wanker's sad spouse Rose and proceed to kidnap her, humiliate and molest her, and take her home and lock her in their basement dungeon as their very own personal plaything/hostage/slave. They call the Impotent Wanker and demand that he pay a hefty ransom of 10,000.00 francs or they will kill Rose and to prove they are deathly serious, they decide to send homemade torture videos of his babe being belligerently brutalized. Unfortunately for the victim and victimizers, the Impotent Wanker is rather amazed to learn that he finds himself absolutely aroused by these crude videos of his wife being physically and sexually violated. Giving new meaning to the French phrase "La petite mort" ("The Little Death"), the Little Wanker is finally able to bust his load to the point of his own gentlemen's relish covering his entire face, but it comes at the seemingly worthless price of his wife's life. In the end, a black woman suffers Dijon mustard, clotheslines and a fork to the nipple, hot French fries to her unclad body, semen to the chest, and eventual death-by-degenerate because her hubby has the sexual stamina of Michael Jackson. Of course, the sickest scene in I Love Snuff is saved for the very conclusion, which features a pretty and wholesome rose flower blowing in the wind, thus paying tribute to sexually unsatisfied wife and snuff victim Rose, another black victim of the hopelessly xenophobic French people.

Sort of like Story of O and the Marquis de Sade meets early John Waters and Troma in a pre-apocalyptic postcolonial French slum, I Love Snuff is the film that jaded Judaic frog Serge Gainsbourg never had the gall to make, but apparently kraut arthouse-splatter auteur Marian Dora (Cannibal, Melancholie der Engel aka The Angel's Melancholia) because he is supposedly currently working on a remake of Jean-Louis Coctes' carelessly crude camcorder experiment. Of course, considering Dora's rather severe and unflinching seriousness, it is very doubtful that his Teutonic take on I Love Snuff will contain the same 'campy' comedy value as Coctes' work. Indeed, if nothing else, I Love Snuff works best as an intrinsically intemperate sadomasochistic black comedy that is so ceaselessly over-the-top that no one can take it even remotely seriously, even if it does feature real unsimulated depictions of a seeming insane pervert showing stuff in and out his rather rancid rectum. While I Love Snuff will do nothing to strength your faith in humanity, it will give you a deeper respect for the biological comedy act that is the human body. While I cannot agree with Gaspard Noé's puffery-plagued remark that "Coctes is the French Pasolini," he at least deserves to be described as the frog GG Allin, which, considering the patent pretentiousness of the French and their supposed love of high kultur, is no small accomplishment. In I Love Snuff, Coctes defecates in the street while wearing an ugly dress, is orally and anally penetrated by a sadistic Madame with a strap-on and then guzzles a couple gallons of said woman's piss like a champ cuck, and has a steamy and sleazy one-sided love affair with a black slave in bondage, among various other forms of self-debasing behavior that the average normal man would not do even if he were demanded to at gun point, thus making the Franco-libertine a sort of flagrantly politically incorrect postmodern sideshow freak of sorts with a deep and unwavering metaphysical masochism, which I am surprised is not all the more rampant in a country like France (or virtually any other postcolonial European nation) where collective guilt and ethno-masochism, xenophilia, sexual aberration, gynocentric feminism, and all-encompassing worship of every and anything that is weak, ugly, and historically persecuted and reviled has been put on a kosher pedestal and is now worshiped as the height of moral superiority. With such slavery-morality-sanctifying swill dominating every aspect of Western life and culture, the only thing one can do at the end of the day is laugh and just wait for the world to burn, and Coctes' I Love Snuff certainly has a gas chamber worth of laughs, but be forewarned that such a strikingly sick work might rot your soul and/or cause you to piss your pants laughing.

NUMÉRO DEUX

Jean-Luc Godard (1975)

While La Nouvelle Vague alpha-auteur Jean-Luc Godard (Alphaville, Pierrot le Fou) is credited with many singular accomplishments as a filmmaker, including discovering and defiling Danish diva Anna Karina and inspiring multiple generations of filmmakers in terms of how they looked at and created films, few people seem to realize that he has directed what is undoubtedly one of the most epically banal and uniquely incoherent yet nonetheless somewhat intriguing fuck flicks ever made. Indeed, Numéro deux (1975) aka Number Two is an insanely inept anti-erotic abortion of the oftentimes infantile sort where the viewer has the distinct voyeuristic misfortune of spying on the sexual habits of three generations of one family under a single roof in a very cramped apartment where the children regularly pay witness to their mouthy Marxist mother's rather bushy beaver and impassioned rants about her irregular bowel movements and lack of sexual satisfaction. Originally ostensibly intended as a remake of the director's legendary debut feature À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless, the film has virtually nothing in common with its black-and-white predecessor aside from being also produced by Georges de Beauregard on a fairly meager 6,000 franc (or $120,000) budget. In fact, it was de Beauregard that originally proposed that Godard direct the remake, which the filmmaker agreed to do, but like many of his film projects, he had no real intention of honoring his agreement with the producer and instead ultimately sired something totally different with decidedly dull and innately materialistic and sexually pathetic Marcusian undertones. As Godard stated himself in regard to the importance of utilizing the same exact 1960 budget as Breathless for naughty non-remake, "the originality consists in saying that the cost of living has increased by a factor of four, but we are making a film with . . . the same budget." Made after the director's two failed marriages, declaration of the death of cinema in Weekend (1967), foolish adoption of then-trendy culturally corrosive scam of Maoism, less than artistically fruitful five-film collaboration under the quite fitting name 'The Dziga Vertov Group' with young Jewish communist Jean-Pierre Gorin between 1968 and 1973, and troubled recovery from a life-changing motorcycle accident that resulted in the loss of one of his testicles and the development of various psychological problems like agoraphobia, Number Two was intended as a big comeback film of sorts for Godard, but it was, somewhat predictably, an abject failure that remains fairly obscure to this day even among the filmmaker's die hard fans. Of course, Godard should not have expected anything less when he deceived his fans by agreeing to remake his first and arguably most popular film, but instead created what seems like a quasi-feminist family film for the hopelessly sexually autistic and vaguely incestuous.

Once described by Godard himself in 1975 in Politique Hebdo as an "ethnological film” that could literally be named “The Sexual Economy of the Inhabitants of Lower Grenoble,” Number Two is ultimately an unintentionally absurd and bizarrely comedic anti-erotic cinematic experiment where the auteur demonstrates his pathological obsession with both Marxism and sexual perversion by crudely attempting to link poverty and unemployment with sexual impotence and constipation. Indeed, centering around three generations of one family living under the same roof in a white prole ghetto in the southeastern France city of Grenoble, Godard’s somewhat creepy and oftentimes embarrassingly ridiculous film depicts a patently pathetic microcosm of (post)Marxist moaning and bitching where a young mother complains that she has not shit in two weeks because she cannot find a job, an elderly grandfather plays with his tiny shriveled up penis while recalling the good old days of communist activism and his friendship with kosher commie leader Henri Krasucki, and a young father confesses his minor shame in regard to a sad and pathetic “family affair” involving his prepubescent daughter witnessing him brutally sodomizing his cheating wife. A film featuring perennially flaccid pricks, close-up shots of a little girl’s vagina, and a mother and father that give their children a rather intimate lesson about their genitals and what they describe as ‘love,’ Number Two is a film that is unmistakably the work of a pathetically perverted sexual cripple and tiresomely pedantic intellectual with a strange talent for draining out all of the joy, magic, and intimacy of sex, hence why he was probably divorced by two of the cutest French film stars of their era.

Aside being a comeback film for Godard, this piece of unintended kitsch was also intended as the director’s first attempt at creating a new type of cinema that had completely transcended anything that he or any other filmmaker had done before. Armed with a new film studio full of then-state-of-the-art video equipment (in fact, a good portion of the film’s budget went into said equipment) and a new central collaborator in the form of his photographer companion Anne-Marie Miéville, Number Two—a film that’s title indubitably announces the second big phase in the filmmaker’s uniquely uneven filmmaking career—is the sometimes intriguing and almost always awkward failed first cinematic experiment of an artistically desperate auteur in the middle of both a personal and artistic rebirth. As his American Judaic biographer Richard Brody noted in Everything Is Cinema: The Working Life Of Jean-Luc Godard (2008), Godard began publicly attacking his former comrades from Cahiers du Cinéma in 1975 by accusing them of being nothing more than derivative hacks as indicated by remarks like: “I am amazed that people who lack ideas for new films (including some old friends like Truffaut, Rivette, who don’t have any more ideas than the guys whom they denounced twenty years ago), continue to adhere to the one and self-same system of filmmaking, which is easy to describe: a sum of so many million, multiplied by so many weeks, multiplied by a certain number of people.” Suffering the supreme and seemingly aesthetically retarded delusion that the new video technology of that time was a superior medium to actual film, Godard was convinced that, not unlike a megalomaniacal mad scientist in his laboratory, his new film studio would lead to revolutionary cinematic creations that would change mankind, yet Number Two is anything but groundbreaking unless you look at it as a rare example of a quasi-incestuous family film for politically active pedophilic art fags. Indeed, not unlike Anthony Aikman's The Genesis Children (1972) and Pier Giuseppe Murgia's Maladolescenza (1977) aka Puppy Love starring Eva Ionesco, Godard's film is a patently preposterous post-counterculture cinematic oddity that some might describe as kiddie art-porn. Thankfully, unlike Aikman's and Murgia's films, Godard's cinematic work is relatively conservative when it comes to the naked naughty bits of children.

Seemingly partly inspired by the plotless and naturalistic gutter realism of Andy Warhol and Paul Morrissey, Number Two could easily be mistaken as a piece of eccentrically assembled cinéma-vérité were it not for the random mundanely executed and clearly contrived Marxist and feminist diatribes that are sprinkled throughout the film. Indeed, the commie dialogue and narration in the film is so phony and inauthentic sounding that it is as if Godard included these things in the film to convince himself of his own misguided and clearly abstract political beliefs. Somewhat giving the viewer the impression they are watching security footage that was shot in a claustrophobic apartment with little room for movement, the 'film' features the tiresome gimmick of having one or more video monitors in virtually every single frame, with Godard himself immediately breaking down the fourth wall by appearing at the very beginning in an extended introduction from the comfort of his own film studio and babbling pretentious pseudo-hermetic twaddle about how it is a "factory" where he is the "boss," thereupon underscoring his glaring post-Maoist psychosis. In short, Godard wants the viewer to see him as a 'worker' in the commie sense who has achieved the bolshevik dream of owning and controlling his own factory where he produces true blue prole cinematic products via his own extensive self-directed 'labor.' Somewhat ironically, Godard's old school Hollywood hero Nicholas Ray would beat him to the chase in terms of cinematic innovation with his similarly experimental multi-monitor swansong We Can't Go Home Again (1973), with a rough cut of the film having its Cannes premiere in 1973. Additionally, Jane Arden and Jack Bond's extremely underrated final collaboration Anti-Clock (1979) makes Godard's film seem like both literal and figurative child's play in terms of its clever and fairly idiosyncratic utilization of archaic video technology as a tool of dark voyeuristic intrigue. On the other hand, Number Two still proves to be quite the shocker to anyone familiar with the director's early overtly cinephiliac classic cinematic works like Breathless, Le Mépris (1963) aka Contempt, Bande à part (1964) aka Band of Outsiders, and Alphaville: une étrange aventure de Lemmy Caution (1965), among countless other examples, as the film seems like it was created by someone with a deep-seated contempt for cinema, especially of the genre oriented sort. Indeed, one certainly gets the sense that Godard's one-time leading man Jean-Paul Belmondo was right when he declared in 1980 in retaliation for his former collaborator unkind public remarks, "There's no doubt that the person I saw who called himself Godard, with his lies and his little tricks, has nothing to do with the auteur of BREATHLESS, PIERROT LE FOU, or BAND OF OUTSIDERS. The Godard of the 1960s is dead forever."

If Godard's foremost object with Number Two was to alienate his audience in a most obnoxious fashion to the point where they want to violently smash their TV, he indubitably does a splendid job at the beginning of the film where he rambles on in his film studio while his four-eyed face is visible on a monitor that is sitting a couple feet from his partly headless body. Indeed, Godard spends about the first ten minutes of the film speaking in a somewhat unnervingly self-righteous fashion about his new and hardly improved form of pseudo-metaphysical Marxist filmmaking, stating, "I'm the boss. But I'm a special kind of boss because I'm also a worker. And I'm not alone as a worker. We've taken power [...] I was ill for a long time and that made me think about the factory. I'd say what's wrong here is, there's too much DNA, not enough RNA. We learned it in school. You can't ever use what you learn in school. It's a pain in the ass. The government has closed half the schools in the area. They shove us into school and teach us useless things. If I say 'DNA, biology' to you, you wonder what I'm on about. I'm talking about you and your program." According to Godard, "wordplays" and "puns" can cure illnesses, thus they are not "worthless." While Godard makes vague reference to having been "ill," he neglects to mention that he lost a testicle during said illness, which may or may not explain his new sense of cinematic perversity in the form of obsession over the interfamilial sexual habits of card-carrying commie proles. Undoubtedly, if Number Two convinced me of anything, it is that Godard only understands sex in an abstract and intellectual sense, as if he was born without the capacity to get aroused by the smell or curves of a woman and thus looks at the flesh of the so-called fairer sex with the cold detachment of a space alien, hence his quite questionable sexual interest in prepubescent children.

While Godard's strange introduction is oftentimes incredibly intolerable, it is nothing compared to the repugnant narrating of an unseen female narrator that follows him who asks many redundant questions and then sometimes includes equally redundant answers as indicated by the following innately irritating piece of intellectual masturbation, "This film, Number Two, shows all of this. Unbelievable things. Things in close-up. Ordinary things. Shitty things and pleasurable things. Where does it happen? Pleasure is complicated. I think so anyway. I think pain is simple, but not pleasure. I think unemployment is simple. Not pleasure. And you see, when you find pleasure in being unemployed, it leads to Fascism. Number Two. This film is not left or right, but before and behind.

In front are children. Behind is the government. The children of the homeland. Of the homeland. In school, you learn it's a factory. Cinema is a factory, too. A factory that manufactures images. Like television. There was once an image. There were once two images. There was twice a sound. There were once two sounds. Number one and number two. Number Two. A film by Anne-Marie Miéville and Jean-Luc Godard, with Sandrine Batiſtella, Pierre Audry and others. Number Two. Coming to this screen son. And this screen is on a wall. What do you think this wall is between? Another political film? It's not politics, it's sex. No, it's not sex, it's politics. So is it about sex or politics? Why is it always either/or? It can be both sometimes. Sometimes. Which times? We always say, 'There was once.' Why don't we ever say, 'There was twice.' This film, you see, is called Number Two. What does it talk about? Talk, talk. You can listen sometimes. You can watch. You see, Number Two, is a film you can watch. Watch peacefully. Watch what? You don't always need to go far. There's quite a lot to see." As the above quote clearly demonstrates, the female narrator is not only redundant, but exceedingly obnoxious, not least of all because she a fiercely grating froggrette voice.

When the 'feature presentation' finally begins and the viewer no longer has to suffer Godard and the female narrator's pseudo-esoteric ramblings about mostly pointless nonsense that rarely provides insight as to what will follow, the viewer is introduced to a precocious little girl named Vanessa who asks her more or less completely naked mother Sandrine Batiſtella, "Will I bleed between my legs when I'm big?," to which she receives an affirmative "yes" and is told to watch out for boys because they can be "hard work." While Sandrine describes boys as "hard work," her hubby Pierre Oudrey has a lot trouble just getting a proper hard-on. Of course, as the viewer might have predicated, Godard attempts to link Pierre's impotence with capitalist tyranny and poverty, among other asinine absurdities, even though everyone knows the Bertolucci-esque stereotype of peasants making for passionate and virile lovers. Notably, towards the beginning of the film, Pierre pisses in a sink while his hysterically horny wife bitches, "I love your cock. But it's always you who decides! It's hard work" and then tries in vain to get his cock hard by stroking it. In fact, Sandrine is so desperate for dick that she apparently cheats on her husband Pierre, who naturally decides to get revenge, or as he states himself in regard to his wife while sounding rather pathetic, "I wanted to rape her. She let me, so I fucked her in the ass. She started screaming. Afterwards we realized Vanessa had been watching. Family affairs, I suppose." Somewhat curiously, an image of little girl Vanessa is superimposed over a shot of Pierre sodomizing his wife, thus underscoring Godard's dubious fetish for awkward interfamilial fucking. Needless to say, it is no surprise when Vanessa confesses, "Sometimes I think it's pretty, Mummy and Daddy, sometimes I think it's caca." After all, a child cannot help but think of the perils of poop after seeing their enraged father penetrate their mother's bunghole with a

Out of everyone in the family, Sandrine, who is always flashing around her tits and dark bushy beaver in front of both of her kids, is easily the most insufferable and just all around repulsive, which largely has to do with her whimsical bitchiness, lame leftist sloganeering (e.g. "Anarchy isn't a bomb, it's justice and freedom"), self-absorbed fits of rage, and overall anti-maternal behavior. Indeed, aside from giving her daughter a bath while talking about her vagina and giving her kids a fucked up form of sexual education that involves exposing her aroused genitals, Sandrine does virtually nothing for her children and instead spends most of the time trying in vain to arouse her unsurprisingly impotent husband, who seems to know better than anyone that there is no greater turn-off for a man than a bitchy broad that loves to pontificate about her poop problems. In fact, when Sandrine is not bitching about her lack of cock intake, she is yammering on about the fact that she has not had a proper bowel movement in two weeks. In what is arguably the most overtly 'tender' moment of the entire film, Sandrine calls her kids into her bedroom while she is completely naked with her husband, touches her vagina, and then states while playing with her labia, "See this? They're lips. My sex lips," to which Pierre replies in a fatherly fashion while touching his peter, "See here, it's a kind of mouth. And with this mouth, you kiss your lover's sex lips." After showing off her pussy to her kids, Sandrine states, "It's called love. Love teaches us to talk" and Pierre adds, "And when it's all over, Death put its finger to its lips and tells us to be quiet." Unfortunately, it seems no one has ever told Sandrine to be quiet, as she is always talking even though she has nothing to really say. As for Sandrine's thoughts about being a mother, she makes things fairly clear when she states in regard to the birth of her son, "I shitted him out from between my legs. And now everything's blocked. I had to stuff myself. Even gladly. But it's too strong. My tissue is torn. I get the feeling that everything I say is shit."

In what is arguably the most grueling segment of the entire film, Godard juxtaposes footage of 'grandma' (Rachel Stefanopoli) bathing using a wet rag and a sink with insane feminist (translation: anti-female) quotes from loathsome female eunuch Germaine Greer like, "Women do not realize how much men hate them. Punished, punished, punished for being the object of hatred, through her orifices, her mouth and cunt, poor Taralala. Women never commit sexual crimes even when they are enacted upon the bodies of men. The male perversion of violence is an essential condition of the degradation of women. Women cannot be liberated from their impotence by the gift of a gun, although they are equally capable of firing them as men are. Men are tired of having all the responsibility for sex, it is time they were relieved of it. The vagina must come into its own. It's worth repeating. The female attitude to violence is inseparable from this problem." As subsequent narration indicates, Godard seems to believe that a woman can only be truly happy if she revolts against traditional female norms and traditions, which is somewhat ironic when one considers that Sandrine—a reckless mother and intolerable wife that puts her sexual drive before her own children—seems to be totally miserable, but of course the viewer is expected to blame her misery on capitalist tyranny and imaginary bogeymen like the patriarchy. Of course, as a sad impotent cuckold that can only get an erection upon feeling enraged that his wanton wifey has cheat on him, Sandrine's husband can hardly be described as a tyrannical patriarch. In fact, in Sandrine's family, the grandfather is even berated by his grandchildren without the children having the slightest fear that they may be punished for their less than respectful indiscretions to their elders.

If grandma seems to be a little bit senile, grandpa (Alexandre Rignault of Jean Renoir's La Chienne (1931) and Georges Franju's Les yeux sans visage (1960) aka Eyes Without a Face) is strikingly sharp by comparison for an old school Marxist true believer, but then again, as he proudly describes himself, he was a revolutionary at a time when it was not exactly safe to be a revolutionary and thus he can hardly be compared to the candy ass 'bobos' (aka 'bourgeois bohemians') that became Maoists during the late-1960s like many of Godard's friends and acquaintances. Unfortunately for grandpa, he gets little respect from his rather ungrateful family and even his own grandson will not let him use the television so that he can watch a Soviet propaganda film (or what he describes as a "Russian film"). As Grandpa remarks in regard to his past employment at Auschwitz, "You don't tell anyone you worked in a death camp and the CEO was Hitler, or that you took the wages simply to survive." According to Grandpa, he was once a loyal shabbos goy deputy of French Jew commie and trade unionist Henri Krasucki, but clearly he never received even a tiny degree of the power or prestige of his ex-boss, as he now spends his golden years rotting away in a tiny apartment with children and grandchildren that treat him like he is a great nuisance. During a slightly humorous scene where Godard seems to mock the viewer for enduring his softcore family sitcom, Grandpa sits completely naked at a table while telling old commie stories about his glory years as a frog Bolshevik and eventually remarks with gusto while grabbing his tiny shriveled penis, "Instead of watching movies, I watch my prick." One certainly gets the sense that if Grandpa had not raised his kid(s) to be Marxist morons, his film would be, at the very least, slightly less fucked up. In short, Numéro deux might fail in many regards, but it indubitably makes for a great case against commie parenting and virtually every form of the Marxist Weltanschauung. Indeed, the Marxist lumpenproles of the film do not seem to believe in anything aside from their own misery. Rather fittingly, Godard reappears at the conclusion of the film while looking fairly dejected and distressed, as if he has realized the film he has just realized he has produced the artistic equivalent of diarrhea and he is not happy or comfortable with what he sees.

While I am somewhat hesitant to accuse him of being some sort of proud pe-dophile based solely off of Numéro deux, I cannot ignore the fact that Godard would continue to demonstrate with subsequent films that he has some of little girl fetish and that he hardly seems to be ashamed of that fact. Indeed, for one of the episodes of his largely forgettable 12-part TV series Six fois deux (1976), Godard directed a disturbing scene of his companion Anne-Marie Miéville's then-10-year-old daughter doing a completely naked ballet routine. Arguably even more disturbing, Godard blackmailed 9-year-old Camille Virolleaud to get naked for his TV miniseries France/tour/detour/deux/enfants (1977-1978) by threatening to stop the shoot if she refused to comply with his serious demand for completely unclad preteen titillation. Not surprisingly considering that virtually all of her classmates would see her naked after the miniseries was broadcasted television, Virolleaud was totally traumatized by the self-described "hyperviolent" experience to the point where she denied ever even being part of France/tour/detour/deux/enfants for two decades. Of course, it should be no surprise that Godard was a comrade of kosher commie Daniel 'Daniel the Red' Cohn-Bendit, who is infamous for describing in his book The Great Bazaar (1975) aka Der grosse Basar how he engaged in erotic encounters with 5-year-olds while a teacher at a so-called 'anti-authoritarian kindergarten.' Rather disturbingly, Cohn-Bendit's pro-pedo views were not exactly atypical, as it was a common belief among both intellectuals and layman alike associated with the student movement of 1968 that children should not be forbidden from anything sexual, including child-adult relations. One must also not forget that both Miéville and Camille Virolleaud's mother gave their full consent to Godard to direct scenes featuring their unclad prepubescent daughters, thus underscoring the warped parenting trends of that time. Either way, it is unequivocally creepy and alarming when a middle-aged four-eyed 'intellectual' is so concerned with getting a little girl disrobed that he threatens her in the sort of manipulative manner that one would expect from a craven sexual predator, but then again Godard does not look like a sort of frog Woody Allen for nothing (incidentally, Allen would have an uncredited cameo in Godard's preposterous cinematic disaster King Lear (1987)). While not plagued with child nudity, Sauve qui peut (la vie) (1980) aka Every Man for Himself is another example of where Godard exploited a child for sexual reasons. Indeed, apparently Godard developed a strange infatuation with Swiss auteur Alain Tanner's daughter Cécile Tanner and, not unlike the stereotypical scheming pedo, attempted to appeal to her by promising to direct a film about her involving her favorite sport of soccer. While Tanner would eventually get to play a soccer girl in Every Man for Himself—Godard's self-described "second first film" and, unlike Number Two, his true comeback flick—when she was 12-years-old, she had no idea it would be in an incestuous pedophilic context. Indeed, as Richard Brody noted in regard to Tanner's response upon first seeing the film and realizing that Godard had exploited her in a cinematically sexual fashion without her knowledge, "When I saw it, at the private screening for the crew, I crawled under my seat, I was dying of shame.” Of course, considering that Godard is a long celebrated figure among film academics and a good number of respected mainstream film critics and virtually all of these individuals are staunch leftists, if not downright communists, he obviously gets a pass for his dubious sexual proclivities just like Allen and Polanski. In fact, Godard’s Judaic biographer Brody spends more time in Everything Is Cinema: The Working Life Of Jean-Luc Godard complaining about the filmmaker’s supposed antisemitism than his more overt and well documented little girl fetish, but I digress.

As a result of my somewhat recent discovery that Godard is a longtime enemy of Zion, noted critic of Claude Lanzmann’s singularly overrated Zionist pity party Shoah (1985), and fan of great alpha-antisemite Louis-Ferdinand Céline (whose classic novel Voyage au bout de la nuit (1972) aka Journey to the End of the Night he once attempt to adapt), my general disdain for Godard began to wane over the past couple months, yet after watching Number Two—a virtual vision of prole parenting purgatory as directed by a man that seems to think that carnal knowledge and crapping are of equal significance—I cannot help but feel overcoming disgust for the auteur. Still, at the same time, I somehow cannot help but to feel a bit of pity and Fremdscham for old man Godard, as his film strikes me as the product of a socially and sexually inept emotional cripple who has retreated to a hopelessly lonely inward realm of worthless and outrageously outmoded quasi-Marxist abstractions and debasing aberrosexual fetishes because he can no longer stomach the metaphysical pain of living in the real world. Indeed, Number Two is ultimately the curious product of a childless unmarried family suffering from a curious combination of neurasthenia and delusions of grandeur who looks at a nuclear family with less passion and intimacy than a microbiologist would look at bacteria, hence why he has probably never had a family of his own (apparently, he once got his first wife Anna Karina pregnant, but she had a miscarriage). Undoubtedly no sane man sexually healthy father with a daughter would have a sort of self-destructive urge to direct nude little girls or depicting them in sexual situations with naked adult men that are fiddling with their cocks. Ultimately, Number Two features about as much socio-political insight and carries about as much cultural weight as Godard’s somewhat autistic remark, “Once we know the number one, we believe that we know the number two, because one plus one equals two. We forget that first we must know the meaning of plus.” Of course, one can never truly trust the art or thoughts of a goofy looking guy who let a marriage to a great beauty like Anne Wiazemsky go to shit because he devoted most of his attention to a young Jewish communist like Gorin. Forget inbred Appalachian meth heads, Detroit wiggers, and oxy-addled second generations polacks from Baltimore, Number Two features what can be described as the ultimate white trash family in what is the post-Sartrean intellectual equivalent to literal poverty porn.

GERMANY YEAR 90 NINE ZERO

Jean-Luc Godard (1991)

Without question, I must concur with Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman when he soundly stated regarding Jean-Luc Godard, "I've never gotten anything out of his movies. They have felt constructed, faux intellectual and completely dead. Cinematographically uninteresting and infinitely boring. Godard is a fucking bore. He's made his films for the critics," and, indeed, it is doubtful the French commie director would have gained the prestige he did had he been a right-winger, hence why no one has shown much interest in anything he has directed since some three decades ago when the student movement grew up and eventually took over, ultimately becoming the booboisie mainstream. Aside from Le Mépris (1963) aka Contempt and to a lesser extent Weekend (1967), it is hard for me to think of a Godard film that does not remind me why I hate the pedantic pinko froggy in the first place, yet when I discovered his later work Germany Year 90 Nine Zero (1991) aka Allemagne 90 neuf zero—a reflexive documentary-like work made for French television in the wake of the fall of the Berlin wall and the German reunification—I decided to give it a shot, as I thought it would be interest to see what a misanthropic Marxist Frenchman has to say about his cultural and racial superiors, the Teutons. Needless to say, being a French communist who is still stuck in the late-1960s, Godard demonstrates with Germany Year 90 Nine Zero that his sheer and utter contempt for Germans and German kultur is not simply resigned to the Third Reich, but virtually all of German history as a work that even goes so far as attacking the German language and Faustian spirit as innately flawed and defective, as if National Socialism was a most natural and inevitable step for the krauts to take in history. A sort of half-incoherent and sometimes impenetrable deconstructivist celluloid collage featuring everything from concentration camp footage to scenes from Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Harlan-esque high-camp Third Reich epic Lili Marleen (1981), Germany Year 90 Nine Zero—a film that's title pays homage to Roberto Rossellini's neorealist flick Germany Year Zero (1948); a decidedly depressing and even nihilistic work that depicts the horrible life of a young lad living in the ruins of post-WWII Germany—is not only a work that mourns the death of Marxism as symbolically depicted early on in the film in a scene where a Karl-Marx-Straße street sign with funeral flowers laying next to it is ran over by a car, but a work that somewhat celebrates the destruction of Deutschland, depicting it as an inevitable result of the sort of historically dynamic 'Teutonic irrationality' that Hans-Jürgen Syberberg championed and celebrated. A sort of pseudo-sequel to Godard anti-sci-fi/film noir flick Alphaville: A Strange Adventure of Lemmy Caution (1965), Germany Year 90 Nine Zero features Eddie Constantine, who went on to star in a number of great German New Cinema flicks, including a number by Fassbinder, during the 1970s/1980s, reprising his role as secret agent Lemmy Caution, although now, being “the world’s last spy,” he has aged into a morbidly melancholy and defeated man who most certainly acts as a stand-in for Godard himself. Considering his imperative influence on the auteur filmmakers of German New Cinema, Godard also pays reluctant tribute to his Teutonic spiritual protégés as Germany Year 90 Nine Zero is a virtual cinematic response to Alexander Kluge’s celluloid answer to the ‘German question’; Die Patriotin (1979) aka The Patriot.

The cold and damp Germanic winter is weighing heavy over old and now overweight Lemmy Caution (Eddie Constantine), or at least one would assume so as the spy, who no longer knows what side he is working for, is moping around East Germany like someone who has been just been gang raped by a group of sexually repressed bikers. Depressed that communism has taken its last gasp, Caution even goes so far as making the puffery-plagued remark, “You have to admit, Marx did triumph. When an idea is born among masses, it becomes a material force,” as he is in denial that the workers’ utopia has never nor will ever be realized, with the fall of the Berlin wall being a symbolic sign of the end of that deluded dream. Making pilgrimages to various communist holy sites, Caution demands that Don Quixote tell him, “Which way is the West?” while treading through the German countryside, which looks like a post-industrial völkisch dystopia due to noisy and ugly large machinery destroying the earth of the land of blood and soil. On the way, Berlin’s Landwehr Canal—the place where treacherous anti-German Judeo-Marxist agitator Rosa Luxemburg’s dead body was dropped—is passed in tribute as if it is one of the most important places of German history. Caution also runs into a Jewess with two names named Dora / Charlotte Keßner (Claudia Michelsen) who is lost in history and who sadistically states, “It was a great day for Weimar when the Red Army took over the city,” as if the Soviets did not rape every single woman in sight upon their inhospitable arrival. Needless to say, in between footage from German expressionist masterpieces like Fritz Lang’s Metropolis (1927) and F.W. Murnau’s The Last Laugh (1924), vintage photos of dead Jews and sinister Nazis are featured throughout to make it seem like the holocaust was the most important event of German history, though Godard saves some of his seething scorn for America, attacking both nations and peoples with the following quote, “The US never understood the war, or took part in it. At best, their fight was not the state’s fight, nor on the same battleground. The US can only imagine a civil war. It’s always themselves and their own defects, personified by the enemy, that they combat in all wars. For them, war is a moral dilemma. When they were English, they fought the English. When they became Americans, they fought Americans. Once sufficiently influenced by the Germans, morally and culturally, they attacked the Germans. The first American to take a prisoner in 1917 was Meyer. The prisoner’s name was also Meyer.” Naturally, Godard’s reductionist thinking will be lost on most Americans as hamburgers, canned beers, and Christmas trees are about the only things that Americans have taken from Germany, though the average Yank, even one of German descent, is completely unaware of the origin of all of these things.

Of course, in Germany Year 90 Nine Zero, it is not communist materialism that is blamed for the death of Germanic culture, but as narrated by a translator named Count Zelten (Hanns Zischler), "It was a drunken American soldier who killed Webern." Indeed, as displayed in a title card towards the end of Germany Year 90 Nine Zero, the 'decline of the west' that Spengler prophesied is in full swing, which is highlighted by a trashy human-size cigarette ad featuring a dominatrix and bourgeois businessman for the ironically named German tobacco company 'West.' In an assault on the legacy of völkisch art, Jewess Dora / Charlotte Kestner narrates, "All these painters only served the state. They were hypocrites. They only painted what they were told to. Consider Velasquez. Nothing but official art. Giotto. Purely official art. Like the awesome Dürer, precursor and predecessor of Nazism, who put nature on his canvas and killed it," as if Godard forgot the fact that virtually all of his films are influenced by Marxist mumbo jumbo. When Mr. Caution finally gets to West Germany and goes to a motel for the night, the maid states "Arbeit macht frei" (work makes (you) free), which aside from being the slogan at the entrance of the Auschwitz concentration camp, has to be the greatest joke at the expense of both Jews and communists, though I doubt Godard is laughing. Needless to say, Caution is not humored by the maid's remark and kicks her out, but he becomes even more irked when discovering a bible in his hotel room. Beginning with a trampled Karl-Marx-Straße street sign and concluding with a standing Martin-Luther-Straße street sign, Lemmy Caution is ultimately cautioned that German history may be repeating itself, but as narrated in French early on in the Germany Year 90 Nine Zero, "History is beyond good and evil, and the things of everyday life. Bliss is not to be found in world history. Periods of happiness are only its blank pages."

Featuring curious but not surprising quotes like, "I accuse Germany of accusing everyone else of failure" and "Passion is an integral part of the German psyche, more so than reason," Germany Year 90 Nine Zero may be the most thoughtful philosophical attack on German history and the German people ever made by a filmmaker, at least by an outsider, though, being French, it is patently passionless and soullessly rationalized as if it were directed by a Trotskyite robot with a couple short circuits. Indeed, with its quotes from everyone from Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel to Thomas Mann, paintings from Franz von Stuck to Otto Dix, music from Beethoven to Liszt, and films from Murnau to Fassbinder, Germany Year 90 Nine Zero certainly pays tribute, if not reluctantly so, to a number of great kraut culture creators, yet next to an epic piece of celluloid Gesamtkunstwerk like Syberberg's Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977), Godard's work of reluctant celluloid Teutophobia seems like a sterile experiment in novelty intellectualism from a bored filmmaker whose confused contempt for classical kraut culture is only transcended by his contempt for the medium of cinema, the very medium to which he ironically dedicated his life. Featuring a number of 'inside' references to German culture that, aside from stereotypical references to the holocaust and Hitler, will absolutely stupefy the Teutonic novice, as well as a number of cryptic pretentious jokes from the ever so intellectually masturbatory director, Germany Year 90 Nine Zero is essentially irrefutable proof that Godard only makes films for himself and a handful of circle-jerking comrades.

Still, as much I absolutely loathe Godard and most of his films, Germany Year 90 Nine Zero is certainly one of my favorite flicks by the uniquely unlovable froggy bastard because, aside from taking a serious, albeit denigrating look at the once-titanic Teutons, it demonstrates that the filmmaker is almost at the level of Romanian philosopher Emil Cioran—a fellow who once described himself as a 'Hitlerist' and who once supported the ultra-nationalist Romanian Iron Guard movement—in terms of his pathological pessimism and dead set belief that the Occident is decaying at a drastic rate as Spengler predicted, as if the filmmaker finally realized that life and history is more complex than a materialist history preached by Marx. Indeed, it is a sure sign that a communist filmmaker has gotten bored when he makes random references to obscure proto-Nazi figures like German Conservative Revolutionary writer Ernst von Salomon—a onetime Freikorps member who provided the getaway car for the 1922 assassination of rich Jewish politician/industrialist Walther Rathenau (Foreign Minister of Germany during the Weimar Republic) who, despite writing screenplays for Nazi propaganda flicks like Carl Peters (1940), had a Jewish lover who he protected throughout the Nazi era (though both were later arrested, imprisoned, and tormented by the Allies as chronicled in the writer's book Der Fragebogen (1951) aka The Questionnaire)—for seemingly no reason at all, as if to demonstrate his Nazi-related knowledge. Admittedly, when I finished viewing Germany Year 90 Nine Zero, I felt like for the first time in my life that I found some common ground with Godard, as I think we can both agree that Europa, including Germany, is a rotting corpse of cultural degeneration, social alienation, spiritual devitalization, post-industrial waste, and cheesy would-be-sexy advertising in a lost land where the politicians are American-trained pimps and the citizens are indentured whores imprisoned in a Adorno-esque Gulag of the mind. As for a sequel to Germany Year 90 Nine Zero, it is rather doubtful as Eddie Constantine is unfortunately long dead, but Godard is rumored to be considering cinematically adapting gay Hebrew writer Daniel Mendelsohn's holocaust-themed memoir The Lost: A Search for Six of Six Million (2006), which could confirm his though status as French cinema's most foremost shabbos goy, though his lifelong anti-Zionist tendencies and curious relationship to German history and culture say otherwise.

NOT RECONCILED
NOT RECONCILED

Jean-Marie Straub (1965)

If an autistic communist industrial-hack film director got addicted to meth, attempted to shoot a feature-length film on a couple thousand dollars, finished shooting only a ¼ of the intended footage, and haphazardly edited the incongruent scenes into a feature film, it would probably resemble a work like Not Reconciled (1965) aka Nicht versöhnt oder Es hilft nur Gewalt wo Gewalt herrscht aka Not Reconciled or Only Violence Helps Where Violence Rules directed by neo-bolshevik kraut-frog Jean-Marie Straub (The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach, From the Clouds to the Resistance) and rather loosely but strategically (the author was a darling of the Teutonic left at that time!) adapted (or some may say butchered) from far-left kraut-counter-culture favorite Heinrich Böll's novel Billard um halbzehn (1959) aka Billiards at Half-past Nine. 304 pages of convoluted satire condescended down to less than 50 minutes of superlatively soulless and totally tedious post-Auschwitz Teutophobia, Not Reconciled is an anti-cinematic piece of deconstructed post-structural agitprop cinema of the Brechtian audience-alienating sort that is more plodding and anticlimactic than a Leon Trotsky-Emma Goldman sex-tape would most certainly prove to be. Straub and his wife Danièle Huillet's (who co-write and stars in the film) second Böll adaptation following the short Machorka-Muff (1963), Not Reconciled is essentially a post-holocaust masturbation aid for far-leftist intellectuals and other pedantic anti-bourgeois bourgeois prudes with slave-moralities who hate life and, quite naturally, hate soulful and aesthetically-pleasing cinema as well. Directed by a miserable little man who is still pissed that the Germans forced him to learn German as a child and who once callously confessed, "I don't believe in the cinema. Even when it's Godard who says these things, it's interesting and has meaning, but it gives me a stomach ache. I don't fetishize the cinema at all. I think of it as an instrument, a tool," Not Reconciled is film that halfheartedly attempts two main things: berating German history and culture and making cinema as intricately banal yet simultaneously propagandistic as possible. More than just a mere film, Not Reconciled is post-fascist filmic flatulation from a Teutonized frog with an incapacity for digesting the German past, so he shits all over the present as if he is hooked on Adorno prescribed Ex-Lax. Notably mainly for being one of the first post-WWII films to depict cross-generational relations between Germans (here focusing on fathers/mothers and sons, grandfathers/grandmothers and grandsons, etc.), Not Reconciled would certainly go on to influence the films of Fassbinder and so many other great German New Cinema auteur filmmakers, but more importantly, the work is what German film scholar Thomas Elsaesser described as a 'terrorist film' and the sort of ethno-masochistic micro-movie that probably influenced unhinged individuals like the far-left terrorists of the Baader-Meinhof Gang.

Although nearly impossible to discern while watching the film, Not Reconciled is about three generations of architects/demolition experts—Heinrich Fähmel, his son Robert and Robert’s son Joseph—and is set between the early twentieth-century and the present, though most of the film takes place during the present with various abrupt flashbacks sprinkled throughout. With the full title of the film being ‘Not Reconciled or Only Violence Helps Where Violence Rules,’ the film ultimately has a message of waging war against contemporary West Germany by any means. In the end, the true hero (or heroine) is an elderly grandmother named Johanna Fähmel (Martha Staendner)—the mad matriarch of the testosterone-deprived Fähmel architect family—who shoots an ex-Nazi turned West German Secretary of State as he watches a military parade from a hotel balcony in what is probably the most insanely impotent and audaciously anti-climatic assassination scene in cinema history. Johanna’s leftist activism started early at age 30 (she is symbolically portrayed at this age by Straub’s wife/collaborer Danièle Huillet) when during the First World War she decided to denounce the Kaiser as a “fool” and was subsequently punished. This is revealed during a flashback scene in Not Reconciled where elderly Heinrich via narration his regret in regard to the fact that he is a born coward and failed to come to his wife Johanna’s aid after she denounced the good old Kaiser despite the fact that he totally agreed with his beloved’s sentiments and actions. Indeed, if there is anything innately wrong with the Fähmel family, it is that the men are too soft and the women are too hard. Although not referenced in Not Reconciled, in Böll’s book it is revealed that Johanna was put in a mental institution during World War II for attempting to save Jews from cattle cars.

Set mostly in and around the prestigious Prince Heinrich Hotel, the patriarch of the Fähmel family, 80-year-old architect Heinrich Fähmel (Heinrich Hargesheimer), concludes the film with his rather somber birthday party at the hotel. As the title of the film makes quite clear, members of the Fähmel family refuse to reconcile with ex-nazis, including a rather robotic fellow named Nettlinger (Heiner Braun), who converted Robert Fäehmel’s brother Otto, who died in 1942 at the Battle of Kiev, to National Socialism. Among other things, the youngest Fähmel male, Joseph (Joachim Weiler), learns that his father Robert destroyed a beautiful building—the St. Anthony’s Abbey—which his grandfather had built long ago, thus indicating a sort of generational destructiveness in the family influenced by the tides of war and the rise and fall of different Reichs. For whatever reason, Robert decides to adopt a young blond beast of a bellhop named Hugo (Georg Zander), but not before telling the lad that Nettlinger, who now proclaims to be a ‘democrat by conviction’ and who had hoped to reconcile with the demolition expert, was a nefarious nazi policeman who he blames for destroying his family. Robert also confesses to the bellhop that he is a demolition expert who was responsible for blowing up bridges, apartments, churches, railway viaducts, villas, and crossroads during the Second World War, which he seems to regret, but was forced to when American forces were approaching from the west. Of course, as a proud 'progressive' feminist, Straub made sure to depict nurturing mother-grandmother Johanna Fählmel as the true hero of Not Reconciled as she manages to assassinate the ex-nazi Secretary of State responsible for West Germany's rearmament while her cuckold husband was merely cowering around.

As German film authority Thomas Elsaesser wrote in his landmark work New German Cinema: A History (1989) regarding Not Reconciled: "Straub pared away all of Böll's satire, leaving the spectator with a film that resists the family chronicle, but also narrative and the linear logic of cause and effect. This is done for much the same reason as his male protagonists reject the conciliatory gestures of their former political enemies and persecutors, and the old lady resists German rearmament by violence." Indeed, despite its innate aesthetic and thematic inanity and particular propensity towards boring and/or alienating most viewers, Not Reconciled is, at its most fundamental level, a work of nasty neo-Bolshevik celluloid nihilism that is fueled by the sort of patently pedantic hatred that seems quite characteristic of slave-morality-driven leftist intellectuals who hate everything except hatred and destruction (with Straub's focus being not only the hatred and destruction of German culture and history, but the art of cinema as well). With various pseudo-religious references to the "beast" (a reference to both the devil and the Nazis, though Straub certainly seems to truly think that the Nazis were devils in human form) and shots of angel statues in ruins, Not Reconciled is essentially a work of Marxist (pseudo)metaphysics directed by a man who threw out Christ for the Gospel of Anti-Christ Marx and other related Hebraic intellectual rabble. An unintentionally hilarious film where the most courageous and heroic character is an elderly bourgeois woman, Not Reconciled also unequivocally demonstrates that auteur Straub was a perennial cuckold, hence why he allowed his wife Danièle Huillet to be in charge of editing and post-production of his films (which might explain why they are so incoherent, impenetrable, and nonsensically assembled!). Indeed, Not Reconciled seems like the work of a resentful old queen, or as Thomas Elsaesser stated of the film: "Straub's adaptation of Heinrich Böll's novel proved a harsh and unforgiving film, whose diagonals and sharply angled compositions even in the visuals seemed to want to stem the tide of those whose ultimate moral wisdom was that life must go on." In other words, if you want to find out what it feels like to be a tedious Teutophobe who hates art and beauty and is still resentful of the fact they had to learn German as a child, watch Not Reconciled and wallow in the wonders of pseudo-kraut commie celluloid dribble.

THE BRIDEGROOM, THE ACTRESS AND THE PIMP

Jean-Marie Straub (1968)

Undoubtedly, Jean-Marie Straub (Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach aka The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach, L'inconsolable) is one of the most, if not the most, brazenly banal, anti-cinematic, and anti-German filmmakers who has ever lived. In fact, Straub once proudly and pretentiously boasted, "My films will be ever more uncinematic, because the films one sees are becoming more and more cinematic. The commercial cinema is getting more cinematic, which is to say, more and more pornographic." Quite frankly, I have never had any interest in watching any of Straub and his wife/collaborator Danièle Huillet's films, but recently I decided to watch his short The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp (1968) aka The Bridegroom, the Comedienne and the Pimp aka Der Bräutigam, die Komödiantin und der Zuhälter simply because it features pre-famous Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Hanna Schygulla, Irm Hermann, Peer Raben, and various other Fassbinder superstars during their formative years. Indeed, while I have yet to see any of Straub's other films, I doubt a single one of them is so flagrantly anti-Teutonic as The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp, which begins with a static shot of the following graffiti scrawled onto a wall: "Stupid old Germany. I hate it over here. I hope I can go soon." Indeed, while proclaiming to be a French refugee and having a frog first name, Straub has an unmistakably Germanic surname (meaning "one with bushy or bristly hair" and "destroy or rob") and thus his ethnic background is dubious at best, especially for a man who spent a good portion of his career directing films in West Germany for German audiences. Not to get off topic, but I once had a girlfriend whose grandmother was German but she told everyone she was French because she spoke the language and grew up in the French-occupied area of Germany and was ashamed of her true heritage as a rather reluctant member of a defeated nation and I would not be surprised if Straub is of a similar background as he seems to hate krauts in a more personal way than the average pompous frog (after all, Straub was not the first German filmmaker to attempt to become French as demonstrated by Volker Schlöndorff's culturally confused career). As Straub once stated regarding cinema and his film The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp: "I don't believe in the cinema. Even when it's Godard who says these things, it's interesting and has meaning, but it gives me a stomach ache. I don't fetishize the cinema at all. I think of it as an instrument, a tool. I could say that the deconstruction one makes in THE BRIDEGROOM, THE ACTRESS, AND THE PIMP is interesting, but the whole film is the history, the story, of a hatred and that is all. The hatred is affirmed at the beginning, in the inscription on the wall: 'Stupid old Germany. I hate it over here. I hope I can go soon.'" Indeed, as the director himself described it as "history, the story, of a hatred and that is all," The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp might be a piece of anti-cinematic hatred, but a superlatively soulless, platitudinous post-structuralist one at that, that offers nothing but the halfhearted expression of a pedantic intellectual whose perennial animus is as sterile and impotent as his pseudo-convoluted celluloid art.

Although it is hard to discern by watching the film, The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp is about a middleclass actress named Lilith (Lilith Ungerer) whose posh pussy is peddled by her degenerate Aryan pimp/actor boyfriend (Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who, indeed, was a pimp of sorts in real-life before becoming a filmmaker). After she meets an American negro named James (Jimmy Powell), Lilith falls in love and flees the parasitic brutality of her Bavarian pimp boyfriend. Naturally, Lilith and James proclaim their love by consolidating a miscegenation-based marriage. When Lilith and James arrive home after the Catholic wedding, pissed pimp Fassbinder is waiting for them, so the bride shoots him dead and everyone assumedly lives happily ever after. While featuring twelve different shots, The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp is essentially comprised of three seemingly disconnected segments: 1. A long and static tracking shot of the streets of Munich from the perspective of negro James (who the viewer never sees) driving around in his car as he watches prostitutes attempting to peddle their plush product (in a totally silent scene, though Johann Sebastian Bach's "Ascension Oratorio" appears at the end). 2. A 10-minute single shot of Fassbinder's micro-studio Antiteater (aka Anti-Theater) performing on stage (including appearances by Fassbinder, Hanna Schygulla, Irm Hermann, Lilith Ungerer, Peer Raben, etc). 3. A scene of Lilith and James' marriage and Lilith's subsequent killing of her ex-boyfriend/pimp Fassbinder. Apparently, the theater segment of The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp was taken from a performance of Austrian Jew playwright Ferdinand Bruckner's play Krankheit der Jugend (1929) aka Illness of Youth aka Sickness of Youth that Straub was asked to direct, but since the director do not like dialogue of the source material, he cut it down to about 10 minutes (opposed to original length, which was several hours). As Fassbinder revealed in an essay he wrote entitled Hanna Schygulla—Not a star, Just a Vulnerable Human Being Like the Rest of Us: Disorderly Thoughts about an Interesting Woman regarding Straub's mutilation of Bruckner's play: "Since Straub's piece was going to be scarcely ten minutes long, however, and since small theater groups generally get the biggest runarounds from publishers when it comes to the production rights for the sort of plays that interest people like us, I decided to fill out the evening by writing a play of my own, my first...It was Katzelmacher," thus enabling to novice auteur to write the script for what would ultimately be the filmmaker's second feature-length film and his first commercial and critical success.

Undoubtedly, The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp only begins to make slight narrative sense in the final third segment when one realizes that Lilith and the Pimp were also in the second segment of the film as characters performing in the play and that the play is merely a play-within-a-film. Of course, The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp feels exactly like what it is; a decidedly disjointed piece of petty dilettante celluloid deconstructionism of the aesthetically degenerate and innately inane sort. As for Straub's reason for employing the segment in the film, it was for cryptic softcore agitprop reasons, or as he stated himself: "Then there is the play, which contains the characters that place themselves against the inscription from Mao printed on the back wall. That says, "Even if the arch reactionaries are still, today, tomorrow, the day after tomorrow..." Again it's hidden, you can't read it. The enemy is flexible, anyway. And in front of all this is a very precise spectacle. It's not only a parody of bourgeois theater. The characters who appear later are within it, and the class struggle begins to appear within it." Not surprisingly but rather absurdly nonetheless, Straub has stated that negro James is the real protagonist of The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp, even though he does not actually appear in the film until the last couple of minutes. As to the point of the film, Straub offered the following insights: "The film is a look entirely at Western decadence. And finally there is the gunshot of the girl (sic) who has married the black and who doesn't even hesitate to shoot, because her hatred liberates her, or rather, it liberates itself. One sees clearly at the end of the film that there is a liberated Utopia, but the girl (sic) is burned. She is burned by her hatred." Indeed, a find it rather ironic that Straub—a man himself that seems burnt by hatred—would describe The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp as a film about 'Western Decadence' when it is about an Aryan woman who marries an American negro and kills her Aryan (but admittedly degenerate) boyfriend, as nothing would be more taboo for a girl from a formerly racially proud National Socialist to do than marry a man not only from an Allied nation, but a black untermensch as well. Of course, Fassbinder would later portray a similar scenario in his masterpiece The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) where the eponymous female protagonist marries an American negro soldier, only to kill him when her assumed-dead German husband returns home. As Thomas Elsaesser wrote in his book New German Cinema: A History (1989), "With some justification, Fassbinder's Katzelmacher has been compared to the Straubs' films, especially in its starkly geometrical conception of scenic and dramatic space. The similarity may only be superficial, and Straub has had little sympathy for Fassbinder's subsequent work," thus one might assume that the cataclysmic negro-Aryan marriage in The Marriage of Maria Braun might have been a celluloid "fuck you" to Straub. After all, Fassbinder would later go on to describe his Straub-esque work Katzelmacher (1969) aka Cock Artist as one of "The Most Disgusting" films on German New Cinema in a 'Hitlist of Germans Films' he wrote in 1981.

Indeed, like with the films of Godard and other far-leftist French New Wavers, Fassbinder would only become a master auteur after disposing of Marxist 'avant-garde' influences like Straub and becoming heavily influenced by the kaleidoscopic melodramas of Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk. The fact that Straub would go on to hate Fassbinder's films only confirms this. Of course, history has proven who the greater auteur is, as while very few people have seen the films of Jean-Marie Straub and his wife/collaborator Danièle Huillet outside of old Marxist cinephiles (aka the new European bourgeoisie), Fassbinder has gone on to be regarded as not only the greatest and most famous filmmaker of German New Cinema, but post-WWII Teutonic cinema in general. Indeed, just when I thought no filmmaker could be more pretentious and plodding of an auteur than Frankfurt School lawyer-turned-filmmaker Alexander Kluge, I discover the sorry cinematic sacrilege of Jean-Marie Straub; a man that even managed to make miscegenation-based murder and ethno-masochistic hatred seem boldly banal. Of course, in its platitude-ridden pomposity, The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp is a film that needs to be seen to be believed. While I am about as far away from a proponent of Hollywood as cinephiles get, The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp is truly a work that makes me reconsider the value of culturally-cuckolded fanboy Quentin Tarantino's oeuvre. If you ever needed indisputable evidence that Neo-Spenglerian theorist Francis Parker Yockey was right when he wrote, "A moment's reflection shows that Liberalism is entirely negative. It is not a formative force, but always and only a disintegrating force" and "Liberalism can only be defined negatively. It is a mere critique, not a living idea," just watch The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp and see how avant-garde neo-Bolshevik culture-distorting plays out cinematically.

THE CHRONICLE OF ANNA MAGDALENA BACH

While determined avant-gardists during their entire filmmaking careers, French-born self-exiled husband-and-wife team Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet (Moses und Aron aka Moses and Aaron, Klassenverhältnisse aka Class Relations) did manage to direct at least one film, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach (1968) aka Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach, that was more or less made with a general audience in mind and, as far as I am concerned, it is their greatest film. A project that was apparently ten years in the making, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach, which was Straub and Huillet's first feature-length film, only started shooting in the second half of 1967 after the filmmakers managed to get the Committee on Young German Film and producer Joachim Wolf to produce it after various filmmakers and critics actively campaigned for the work. As a man whose first two films, Machorka-Muff (1963) and Not Reconciled (1965) aka Nicht versöhnt, did as much as they could to trash Teutonic history (while also portraying West Germany as a 'post-fascist' entity of sorts run by ex-Nazis), especially in relation to National Socialism, Straub seemed paranoid that the German government was trying to prevent him from creating his first feature, complaining, "It was of course idealist in the bad sense [to try and work within the subsidy system] because I didn't know the power relations yet that operated in film production and distribution. [We thought], if they try so hard to stop us making this film, then we just have to make it. I realized exactly what the score was when the Ministry of Culture in Düsseldorf rejected my application for subsidy three times in five years. They were desperate to prevent The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach from coming out in the cinemas [...] It is obvious, a film made outside the system will never get inside. The system takes revenge." Of course, Straub also took his revenge because, as he bragged in the documentary The Making of Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach (1967) while smirking in solidarity with his wife, he intentionally hired a non-German for the lead role of Johann Sebastian Bach, stating regarding the decision, "I wouldn't want anyone to view this as a nationalist statement in any respect, that is...neither anti-, nor something else, but I do believe it is also...important that the person who, let's say, impersonates Bach in this film—he impersonates Bach after all—is not German. Because of what happened in this country, mainly between '33 and '45, I am glad to have found a Dutchman." Indeed, undoubtedly one of the film's greatest qualities is its immaculate musical performances by Dutch harpsichordist, conductor, musicologist, Gustav Leonhardt, who specialized in the works of Johann Sebastian Bach, in what would ultimately be his first and last film role. Ironically, I think Leonhardt's inclusion in the film only all the more Aryanized the work, as the Dutch people (the composer included!) tend to have more classically Nordic phenotypes that, according to most racial theorists (i.e. Madison Grant and Lothrop Stoddard), most Germans lack. While a majorly materialistic work (the film focuses on Bach's struggles with money and patronage) that attempts to deconstruct and dismantle Bach's 'mythical' legacy as a national hero and bearer of Teutonic high kultur, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach, which is based on a fictional diary ostensibly written by the composer's second wife, attempts to make its own myths, ultimately presenting the great German Baroque musician as a 'proto-revolutionary' who subverted the system, at least musically. Rather ironically, with its utilization of authentic wardrobes/instruments, static direction, and obsession with monetary matters, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach seems like a hopelessly bourgeois work that feels like it was directed by a book store owner suffering from Asperger syndrome with a pathologically pedantic understanding of music history.

Beginning with no less than 4 minutes of Johann Sebastian Bach (Gustav Leonhardt) playing on his harpsichord, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach then proceeds with the incessant off-screen narration of Anna Magdalena Bach (Christiane Lang), which is accompanied by historical documents, vintage sheet music, old drawings, etc. While an ostensibly aesthetically subversive avant-garde work, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach essentially has the same structure as Hollywood musicals (and, in turn, pornography), albeit minus the flamboyant pageantry. Indeed, the structure of the film is more or less like this: narration from Anna Bach, Bach playing, narration from Anna Bach, Bach playing, etc. While watching the film, one learns that Anna's father was a trumpeter at the court of the Weissenfels and her brother did the same thing for the court of Anhalt-Zerbst. Chapel Master Sebastian (Anna calls her hubby by his middle name) was previously married to another woman in a marriage that sired three sons and a daughter, so 17 months after his first wife died, he married Anna and created a clavier book for her and his children. Sebastian originally received patronage from a music-loving Prince, but after his 'serene Highness' married a princess from Bernburg, things sort of fell apart. From there, Sebastian headed to Leipzig and became a Music Director and Cantor at the St. Thomas church but it was not an ideal situation for the composer to go from being a Chapel Master to a mere cantor. Apparently, Sebastian, who was born into a great musical family, always had an obsession with great organists and would travel to Hamburg and Lübeck on foot to hear such musicians play. Like many people of his time, Sebastian was not immune to tragedy, as his firstborn child, Christiana Sophia Henrietta, and second son Christian Gottlieb, died while still young children (although not mentioned in the film, between 1723 and 1742, Anna and Sebastian had 13 children together, though seven died in early childhood). Of course, during his career, Sebastian faced "vexation, envy, and persecution" from rivals, namely from a guy named Krause (Walter Peters) at the University of Leipzig. When Sebastian composed funereal music for a dead queen, the director of the 'New Divine Service' of the university protested, and thus he was only able to perform his music “purely as a favor” for a period of time. As Sebastian writes in an appeal for patronage regarding the imperative nature of financial assistance in enabling a composer to dedicate their time to composing new and original music: “It is in any case wonderful that one should expect German musicians to be capable of performing all kinds of music, from Italy or France, England or Poland, just as the virtuosi for whom it is written, who have studied it so that they almost know it from memory, and receive heavy salaries besides, as a reward for their care. This is not taken into consideration, but they are left to their own anxieties, so that many, worried over their bread, cannot think of perfecting, even less of distinguishing themselves. For example, one only has to go to Dresden and see how the musicians there are salaried by His Royal Majesty. All concern for their livelihood is removed. Chagrin is left behind. Each person has only one instrument to cultivate. It must be excellent to hear.”

As The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach progresses, Sebastian’s unwavering assertiveness as a composer who is more interested in creating revolutionary works than merely following an outmoded game plan only increases all the more. As a means to appeal to a Prince, Sebastian gave a number of cantatas in honor of the princely household. When Sebastian is told by his superiors that he is a cantor and should yield to Herr Principal and the Rector of the university, he replies to the threat with, “I really don’t care; cost what it may.” Indeed, Sebastian’s superiors make the following complaints regarding his character: “Not only does this cantor not do anything, but he doesn’t want to explain himself. He doesn’t give the singing lessons, and there are other complaints. A change will be necessary. It must break one day.” When students at the university refuse to play after Herr Krause gets his way, Sebastian is eventually given the title of ‘Court Composer.’ Upon composing works for a certain Count Keyserlingk, Ambassador to His imperial Russian Majesty at the court of Dresden, so that the royal could have solacing music to listen to during sleepless nights, Sebastian was handsomely rewarded with a golden goblet filled with 1000 gold Louis. While Sebastian’s eldest son Gottfried Heinrich’s genius never developed, his 18-year-old son Johann Christoph Friedrich’s genius did, as he entered a fellow named Count Schaumburg-Lippe’s chapel a few weeks before his father’s death and created a grand credo. While working on the beginning stages of a piece entitled Art of the Fugue (which was never completed), Sebastian lost his eyesight, yet he managed to create an organ chorale on the melody “When we are in greatest need” while blind. While he eventually gained back his vision, a couple hours later he was overcome with apoplexy, followed by a high fever and expired “mildly and blessedly” on 28 July 1750 (modern historians believe he died from a combination of stroke and pneumonia).

THE CHRONICLE OF ANNA MAGDALENA BACH

History, and the Matter of Style (2004) regarding the Frankfurt School influenced essence of The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach: “In the film, Bach’s music is performed on period Baroque instruments, not a common practice in the mid-1960s. That choice insisted on a concrete historical context for a figure whom, as Theodor Adorno argued at the time, Germans had transformed into an ahistorical myth of German nationality. Bach had become museumized, his music confined to the rarefied realm of concert halls. Certainly film theatres were not the place to hear him, as Straub and Huillet learned while trying to get CHRONICLE produced and distributed. Their use of Bach, then, was not just historically appropriate to the film, but helped criticize the contemporary deification that Adorno observed.” Indeed, the greatest aesthetic asset of The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach is undoubtedly its authentic instruments and wardrobes, with Gustav Leonhardt’s harpsichord-playing being easily the most emotionally potent aspect of the film (in fact, without his score, the film would be an exceedingly empty celluloid communist manifesto), yet that does not save Straub and Huillet’s work from being an innately static piece of historical revisionism and mythmaking twaddle disguised as state-of-the-art historical authenticity. Like with Straub’s next film Der Bräutigam, die Komödiantin und der Zuhälter (1968) aka The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach concludes in a pseudo-spiritual manner with the lead character gazing out of a window as if staring into eternity. In that regard, as much as the film opts for taking a typically materialistic Marxist approach to history, it still ends up wallowing in the mystical world, if only for a moment (but at quite arguably the most important moment), as if Straub saw the act of creation as the greatest spiritual act and the only true form of transcendence. Ultimately, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach is most interesting as a historical footnote of German New Cinema, and German film historian Thomas Elsaesser probably best summed up the importance of the film in his book New German Cinema: A History (1989) when he wrote: “Bach’ is heard (rather than seen) struggling equally hard with poverty, child mortality, musical form, court intrigues, dull insensitivity, the blows of fate and bad medicine. He is seen with the only weapon at his disposal, which is his music. Deceptively coded as piety, J.S. Bach’s response to adversity is one of the clearest articulations of the possible freedom that the artist can have in relation to social demands: the freedom to resist through the discipline imposed by form. [...] Precisely because it is not an allegory of the subsidy system, but an act of resistance to it, THE CHRONICLE OF ANNA MAGDALENA BACH, even before it encountered its difficulties with the public and the press, was already a formulation and a critique of the Autorenfilm and its concept of the artist.” Indeed, the influence of the film on German New Cinema is incontestable as Fassbinder would make the aesthetic style of Straub and Huillet’s work more palatable with his period piece Effi Briest (1974). Wim Wenders would also pay tribute to The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach with his work Falsche Bewegung (1975) aka The Wrong Move, which includes an excerpt from Straub and Huillet's film where the suicide of a vice-rector is mentioned. An anti-melodramatic arthouse musical that wallows in antagonizing the audience in its aesthetic sterility and static camera work, The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach is ultimately a great argument as to why 'French' filmmakers should not touch Teutonic historical figures. Indeed, Fassbinder, Helma Sanders-Brahms, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, and Alexander Kluge would only become great filmmakers after they discarded their French influences. As for Straub and Huillet, they would never make a greater film than their first feature The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach.

THE BUNKER OF THE LAST GUNSHOTS

Jean-Pierre Jeunet (1981)

If you thought the mental and physical deluge portrayed in Adolf Hitler's bunker in the German epic Downfall (2004) was somewhat intense and even excruciating, you have yet to experience the distinct cinematic majesty of the neo-fascist dystopian sci-fi short The Bunker of the Last Gunshots (1981) aka Le bunker de la dernière rafale directed by popular collaborating French auteur filmmakers Marc Caro and Jean-Pierre Jeunet. The Bunker of the Last Gunshots is a 26 minute abstract work where the viewer is tested to their limit in regard to claustrophobic paranoia and an overall supreme agitation of the senses. Although the film includes no back story about its characters, the anti-heroes (if they can be called that) of the film seem like the sole survivors of an apocalyptic war who seem like they would be better off dead, hence the title of the film. The characters of The Bunker of the Last Gunshots sport neo-fascist uniforms worthy of Heinrich Himmler's ghost and bald heads that are typical of a philistine skinhead tribe. In fact, the sardonically sinister and progressively depraved characters of the short make the protagonist Sam Bell of Duncan Jones' Moon (2009) seem like a feeble-minded wimp. These nameless men call a postindustrial bunker ruled with a technocratic iron-fist in outer-space their unwanted virtual prison home. I wouldn't be surprised if many neofolk and power electronics musicians borrowed their wardrobe styles from the boys in the bunker. It is no exaggeration for me to say that the sleek and supremely suave fascist uniforms featured in The Bunker of the Last Gunshots make the stormtrooper uniforms of the Star Wars films seem like schlocky Halloween costumes. One of the commanders featured in the short, who sits in a wheelchair paralyzed like Dr. Strangelove, has a striking resemblance to Erich von Stroheim; the iconic actor/auteur who was greatly loved and later died in France. On top of featuring charming wardrobes, The Bunker of the Last Gunshots was shot in a black-and-green night vision style that further accentuates the overall aesthetic martial prowess of the film. Like many of the great films of the silent era, the short relies exclusively on the visual as this exquisite frog flick features not a single line of dialogue, which only adds to the overall intensity and delightful dissonant ambiance of the film. From the beginning of The Bunker of the Last Gunshots, it will be apparent to the viewer that the mechanical stormtroopers of the film are on the break of deadly malfunction. While many of these malevolent men seem more machine than man, others are noticeably weary of their dubious comrades. One soldier seems to derive sexual pleasure from torturing and killing bugs while others find murdering fellow comrades to be quite an apathetic affair. Another soldier also find himself being experimented on by his comrades and crippled leader. By the end of The Bunker of the Last Gunshots, the boiling bunker inevitably explodes into all out mutiny of the murderous kind.

The Bunker of the Last Gunshots co-director Jean-Pierre Jeunet would later go on to direct the extremely popular French romantic comedy Amélie (2001). If The Bunker of the Last Gunshots has anything in common with Jeunet's cutesy girl comedy, it is that they are both aesthetically pleasing cinematic experiences that make love with the viewer's eyes. With The Bunker of the Last Gunshots, one's eyes are most certainly raped yet total pleasure is still derived from the rather vicious visual experience. Of course, it will be no surprise to most viewers of the short that both Jeunet and co-director Marc Caro would go on to direct the dystopian fantasy film The City of Lost Children (1995). Out of all of Jeunet's films, The Bunker of the Last Gunshots is certainly the most brutal, as the characters of the short fail to inspire any empathy in the viewer, which, of course, was the intention of both directors. After all, one can only assume the characters featured in the film are mass murderers as they kill each other with a stoic precision that is undoubtedly foreign to a novice killer. The Bunker of the Last Gunshots is like a cross between Fritz Lang's Metropolis (1927), Shinya Tsukamoto's Tetsuo: The Iron Man (1989), and Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970), packaged in a neat, no bullshit 26 minute running time. I cannot think of many other films like The Bunker of the Last Gunshots, where mindfucking murder in a paranoiac microcosm is so vivid and well executed (especially during scenes of execution). If there is any film that can induce temporary schizophrenia in the viewer, it is, without fail, The Bunker of the Last Gunshots.

LE SILENCE DE LA MER
LE SILENCE DE LA MER

Jean-Pierre Melville (1949)

If there is any specific sort of film that I can do without seeing for the rest of my life, it is any kind of Nazi and/or holocaust themed that was film directed by a 100% kosher Jew, as I cannot think of a single one that I do not find to be phony, pseudo-moralistic, grossly historically inaccurate, insipidly stupid and/or chronically clichéd, at least until relatively recently when I saw Le Silence De La Mer (1949) aka The Silence of the Sea directed by Jean-Pierre Melville (Le Samourai, Le Cercle Rouge). Indeed, as a result of my relative disappointment with his Jean Cocteau adaptation Les Enfants Terribles (1950)—a film that would have surely benefited from being directed by its singularly idiosyncratic surrealist source writer—I have never been that big of a Melville fan, at least until more recently when I realized that the auteur had contributed much more to cinema history than simply a masturbatory affection for old school American film noir. After all, simply the mere idea of an auteur that is famous for Americancentric frog noir adapting Cocteau was totally preposterous to me and I ultimately found Les Enfants Terribles to be like a sort of unintentional parody of the poet-cum-cinemagician, though I have learned to appreciate the film more over the years. Eventually after watching his nihilistic neo-noir Le Samourai (1967)—a film that is seemingly infinitely superior to perennial hipster Jim Jarmusch's negrofied neo-Beat homage Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai (1999)—I came to appreciate Melville slightly more and decided to dig further into his oeuvre. While I still consider the director's classics like L'armée des ombres (1969) aka Army Of Shadows—a film that is, not without good reason, regarded by some critics as the auteur's most personal film—to be overrated, I cannot praise enough Melville's particularly preternatural and equally poetic debut Le Silence De La Mer.

In his entry on Melville in the invaluable two-volume tome Cinema: A Critical Dictionary (1980) edited by Richard Roud, Tom Milne stated in regard to the film that it was, "An entirely outlaw production, since Melville had no union, no authorization to buy film stock, and no rights to Vercors' novel, LE SILENCE DE LA MER was an act of defiance in more ways than one, and not least because Vercors' story was, as Melville remarked, essentially anticinematographic." Based on the 1942 book of the same name by Jean Bruller (who published clandestinely under the pseudonymous 'Vercors')—a somewhat experimental piece of literary defiance famous for promoting a 'mental resistance' against the krauts during the Vichy era—the film was not only Melville's debut feature, but also the first of a number of cinematic works that the auteur would direct about the French Resistance, which he only relatively recently had been demobbed from thus making it a rather personal work for the auteur. Indeed, unlike shoah showmen like Spielberg and Edward Zwick, Melville—an Alsatian Jew born Jean-Pierre Grumbach who adopted the nom de guerre Melville after the American author Herman Melville upon joining the French Resistance—actually fought the Nazis, lost a brother and various comrades in the war, and had very personal reasons to make a ‘anti-Nazi’ oriented film. Of course, what makes Le Silence De La Mer especially intriguing is that the central figure is a rather sympathetic aristocratic Wehrmacht officer that defies stereotypes and is ultimately more internally destroyed by the Third Reich than the conquered French people that he tries in vain to establish a relationship with after being billeted in their home. Indeed, a rather romantic and absurdly idealistic artistic type, the German officer is a proud Francophile of the sorts that dreams of a long awaited marriage between Germany and France and thus is naturally completely internally obliterated when he realizes that his comrades plan to turn the country into a complete cultural wasteland.

Featuring a fittingly German Expressionist-like aesthetic of warmly gloomy shadows and iconic chiaroscuro shots, including the somewhat misleadingly yet nonetheless potent introduction of the German officer making his initial appearance in the film like some sort of ethereally elegant young Teutonic Dracula, the film even has a strangely gothic and even unheimlich essence that certainly makes it stand out in Melville’s oeuvre simply on an purely aesthetic level. Interestingly, if the Nazi officer is a ‘monster,’ he is ultimately more sympathetic and likeable than the proudly defiant French male hero and his niece. The deceptively simple story of an elderly intellectual and his niece using the absurdly passive-aggressive tactic of refusing to say a single word to a German officer that rents a room in their home as a form of ‘resistance,’ Le Silence De La Mer is also a film that does not do much to help French stereotypes in regard to arrogance and cowardice yet somehow it manages to give the French a certain understated dignity. Incidentally, according to Melville, Soviet-Jewish writer and propagandist Ilya Ehrenburg—a dubious dude responsible for siring the official holocaust narrative during WWII and inciting the mass murder of Germans with agitprop leaflets featuring remarks like, “There is nothing as beautiful as a German corpse. Kill the Germans! – your old mother begs you, kill the Germans! – your child pleads. Germans are not humans, they are wild beasts”—felt that Vercors’ novel was, “a work of provocation, certainly written by a Nazi to support the Gestapo’s insidious propaganda campaign.” Surely, it is no big surprise that a seemingly sociopathic semite like Ehrenburg would believe such a thing as it does the opposite of his wartime propaganda by humanizing the Teuton and presenting an almost absurdly unconventional relationship between a kindly kraut conqueror and a bitterly defeated frog.

Despite its less than realist stylization and almost gratingly minimalist mise-en-scène, Le Silence De La Mer is a film that is largely inspired by historical fact and even has some covert ‘realist’ attributes. For instance, the film was actually shot on location at Vercors’ real home where the writer’s real-life interaction with an unconventional German officer took place, or as Melville explained in Melville on Melville (1971) edited by Rui Nogueira as to why he shot it there, "Because it was there that Vercors imagined this story on the basis of reality. A German officer who limped and played tennis as therapy for his leg had actually lived in his house. No rapport grew up between them, but Vercors had noticed that this officer was rather unusual, for his room was not only full of books that bore witness to his exceptional culture also contained a bust of Pascal instead of Hitler's portrait. Starting from there, Vercors had translated the story into poetic terms. Thus his wife became his niece, for instance, to permit the introduction of a sublime love them." Indeed, the film certainly does feature one of the coldest and most hermetic yet nonetheless potent (anti)love subplots in cinema history, but I digress. Also of note is that the German officer was apparently at least partly inspired by German writer Ernst Jünger who not only served as an army captain in German-occupied Paris, but also, like Melville, was a personal friend of poet and cine-magician Jean Cocteau. Additionally, Jünger and Melville had similar political persuasions as both men were 'right-wing anarchist' types that stayed true to a sort of extreme individualism despite their obvious nostalgia for wartime experiences. Undoubtedly, the experimental doc La guerre d'un seul homme (1982) aka One Man's War directed by Argentinean Jew Edgardo Cozarinsky makes for a great double feature with Le Silence De La Mer as it juxtaposes excerpts from Jünger's Paris WWII diaries with Vichy propaganda from the same era, thereupon bringing more complexity to the figure of the conflicted cultivated kraut officer.

To underscore the historical importance of Vercors' source novel, Le Silence De La Mer begins with a nameless/faceless resistance fighter opening a suitcase that contains resistance material hidden beneath clothes, including the literary work in question, which is revealed to be written in tribute to "assassinated poet" Saint-Pol-Roux (aka Paul-Pierre Roux). In what ultimately proves to be a rather blunt yet respectably honest disclaimer from Melville, the film also opens with an inter-title that reads, "This film has no pretension of solving the problem of Franco-German relations, for they cannot be solved while the barbarous Nazi crimes, committed with the complicity of the German people, remain fresh in men's minds." Of course, after watching the film, one gets the impression that France and Germany shares an indelibly apocalyptic relationship that will remain forever forsaken. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Hitler declared on June, 25 1942 following news of France agreeing armistice terms that it was, "[The] most glorious victory of all time," especially considering France's seemingly perennial history of aggression against Germany. Needless to say, for the French, to be conquered and occupied by their ostensible inferiors came with much shame and resentment, which is pretty clear in Melville's film. Luckily for the French, Hitler was no Napoleon.

wartime comrade Jean-Marie Robain)—an elderly four-eyed intellectual type that seems to spend most of his time on his ass pondering the deeper meanings of life—stating in regard to the seemingly suicidal absconding of an aristocratic German lieutenant, Werner von Ebrennac (Swiss actor Howard Vernon), from his home, “And so, he had left. And so, he submitted, like the others, like all the others of that miserable nation, and I tried to etch into my mind the events of these last six months: Our evenings, his words, his revolt. Yet not even he, of all men, had the courage to resist his master’s order. His arrival was preceded by a major military deployment.” For the rest of the film, the uncle recounts how he and his niece (lesbian Rothschild Jewess Nicole Stéphane) spent the last half a year or so ignoring a cultivated and kind, albeit somewhat insanely idealistic, German officer that was renting a room in their humble abode. While it was somewhat easy for the uncle to stay silent, his niece clearly develops a mutual affection and true forbidden love for the German officer that eventually reaches a climax in a most anticlimactic way. A rather (anti)romantic cinematic where the sexual, social, and metapolitical ideals of a German romantic are crushed in a ruthless manner not unlike that of a half-frozen Iron Cross-adorned corpse of a German soldier being run over by a Soviet T-35 tank on the Eastern Front, Le Silence de la Mer is indubitably a anti-Nazi film yet somehow the viewer finds themselves condemned to suffer the internal misery of a quite cultivated kraut. Of course, considering the heavy influence of France and its culture on German Conservative literary figures like Stefan George and Arthur Moeller van den Bruck (the latter of whom notably killed himself), the figure of the German lieutenant becomes all the more tragically nuanced. Indeed, the unrequited love subplot in the film is so intensely anti-climatic that it apparently greatly pained queer French Nobel Prize-winning French writer André Gide, or as Melville once explained himself, “I realized that poetry in the cinema is dangerous the day André Gide saw my film. After all, Gide was a man well qualified to understand a story like LE SILENCE DE LA MER, but he was terribly bothered by the girl’s attitude. At the screening, it was obvious that he wanted them to rush into each other’s arms. Of course, he was already very much in decline when he put himself out to come and see my film. The cinematic side of it passed completely over his head. He couldn’t even remember having read the book, which was odd because, for a long time, it was thought in London that Gide had written it, and as a matter of fact, there are things in Vercors’s work that are pure Gide. The influence is unmistakable. After the screening, the only thing he could find to say to me was: ‘I think the girl was a fool. She deserved to be spanked.’”

As a sensitive musical composer that once blew off a beautiful blonde bombshell because it disturbed him that she took pleasure in tearing off the wings and limbs of a bug because it bit her, Werner von Ebrennac is the preternaturally poetic sort of individual that has enough wild optimism to succumb to the utopianism of truly believing that the conquering of France by the Third Reich will eventually lead to the "...most beautiful marriage in the world." As an artistic type, Werner seems somewhat absurd sporting a German officer uniform despite the fact that it looks rather good on him. In fact, the young German lieutenant eventually goes to great pains to not be caught dead in his uniform by the French man and his niece, though that does not stop them from refusing to say a single word to him. As his narration reveals, the French uncle is absolutely obsessed with Werner and carefully studies his every move and word. For example, if Werner farted, the Frenchman would probably reluctantly write an intensely intimate piece of stream-of-conscious poetry about it and how it greatly impacted his day. As for the Frenchman's niece, it is revealed by the end of the film that she is an ice queen of sorts that has been hiding painfully strong romantic longing for Werner, who seems to completely reciprocate her feelings as revealed by his constant smiling at her and somewhat curious vocal denouncing of German women. In fact, when the French girl finally gets the gall to look at Werner, he is so deeply affected that he is literally blinded by the light of her penetrating gaze. As the Frenchman narrates in regard to Werner, "Each day, the same survey of the room, the same pleasure. His eyes rested on my niece's face in profile, as always, stern and impassive, and when he finally looked away, I was certain I saw a kind of smiling approval." Undoubtedly, Werner and the niece's aborted-before-it-ever-started love affair is symbolic of the German lieutenant's romantic pan-European utopian dream about a grand cultural marriage between France and Germany where the literary prowess of the former is combined with the musical domination of the latter.

Not unlike many German aristocrats of his time, Werner is a Francophile and wastes no time in expressing to his silently hostile two-person audience his great appreciation for French kultur, especially French literature, or as he enthusiastically states, "Balzac, Baudelaire, Corneille, Descartes, Fenelon, Gautier, Hugo. What a list. And I'm only up to H. Not to mention Molière, Racine, Rabelais, Pascal, Stendhal, Voltaire, Montaigne, nor any of the others. For England, Shakespeare immediately comes to mind. For Italy, Dante. For Spain, Cervantes. For us, Goethe. But to find others, you have to think about it. But when they say 'France,' who comes to mind? Immediately leap forth Molière, Racine, Hugo, Voltaire, Rabelais and who else? Names jostle like a crowd outside a theater, each trying to enter first. But for music, it's my country. Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Wagner, Mozart. Which name comes to mind first? And we warred against each other. But it will be the last war. We'll never fight again. We will marry. Yes, we will. It will be the most beautiful marriage in the world." Rather romantic statements like these make Werner the perfect candidate for tragedy when he comes to the quite brutal realization that his National Socialist comrades are not exactly frog-friendly and instead see the French as an old perennial enemy that needs to be completely crushed with extreme prejudice. While Werner has many great things to say about France and its culture, he is somewhat less charitable when it comes to the nation's politicians, or as he explains in regard to his somewhat love-hate relationship with the country as a whole, "I've always loved France. I was a child during the last war, so my opinion then doesn't count. Since then, I've always loved it, but from afar, like a faraway princess...because of my father. Because of my father. He was a great patriot bitterly wounded by our defeat...and yet, he loved France. He loved Briand. He believed in the Weimar Republic and Briand. He was enthusiastic. He said, 'He'll unite us like man and wife.' He thought the sun would finally rise on Europe, but Briand was defeated and my father realized France was still led by your cruel bourgeoisie, industrialists like de Wendel, Henry Bordeaux, your old Marshal Foch. He told me, 'You must never enter France except in boots and a helmet.' He was on his deathbed, so I swore. When war broke out, I'd visited all of Europe except France."

As if the Frenchman and his niece are his therapists, Werner acts completely vulnerable around the two and confesses to them not only his hopes and dreams, but also his internal pains and greatest fears, as if he feels totally obligated to offend no one and unequivocally prove that he is indeed also human like the people of the nation his nation conquered. In what is arguably one of the film's various allusions to Melville's comrade Cocteau, Werner even compares himself to titular 'hero' of La Belle et la Bête in what seems to be his cryptic way of flirting with the niece. While Werner is initially quite optimistic about the NS occupation of France and how it might lead to a Franco-German empire featuring an aristocracy of Übermensch artists, that all changes when he hooks up with some Nazi comrades. Indeed, as depicted in a flashback scene, Werner is not only told about Treblinka and gas chambers by a comrade in the SS, but the same chap also stoically states in regard to the French question, "We have the opportunity to destroy France and we will do so. Not only its might, but also its spirit. This is where the biggest danger lies. That's our mission. Don't kid yourself, my friend. We will be smiling. We will proceed with mercy. But we will turn France into a cowering dog." In fact, Werner is even mocked for his love of a France, as another Nazi states to him, "You're blinded by your love of France. That's dangerous. But we will cure Europe of this pestilence. We will utterly destroy this poison." Of course, considering the Nazi's words and how Werner is momentarily blinded by her mere gaze, the niece can see symbolic of France (notably, as if influenced by Melville's film, Louis Malle would include a Jewess heroine that is literally named 'France' in his masterful WWII flick Lacombe, Lucien (1974)). Needless to say, Werner cannot help but report his dejecting experiences to the Frenchman and his niece and he even practically suffers a nervous breakdown while shrieking with a sort of foreboding doom and gloom, "There is no hope! No hope! No hope! Nothing, no OHS. Not only your modern writers, your Péguy's, your Proust's, your Bergson's, but all the others! All these, all of them! They'll extinguish the flame completely. Europe will no longer be illuminated by their light. ‘Nevemore.’” Arguably, the biggest disappointment for Werner comes in the form of a longtime friend that he describes as “sensitive and romantic” but who eventually became infected with a sort of almost demonic Nazi fanaticism, or as he explains, “He was the most rabid, veering from rage to laughter. He glared at me and said, ‘The serpent must be drained of its venom.’ He said, ‘Do you realize what you’re doing?’ I looked at him – looked deep into his blue eyes – and he was sincere. That’s the horror of it! They’ll do whatever they say – methodically and relentlessly. I know the determination of those devils.” At this point, Werner has become anti-German, or, more accurately, anti-Nazi, though he is more intent on self-destruction than rebellion.

After giving an eerie defeatist monologue about his great disillusionment with the Third Reich, Werner reveals to the Frenchman and his niece that he plans to leave the next day as he is decided to go on a suicide mission “To Hell” as he has requested to go fight on the Eastern Front where a miserably cold death is highly probable. After saying his final farewell, the niece finally breaks her silence and softly says goodbye while on the verge of tears, or as her uncle narrates, “To hear it, you’d have to be listening for it, but I heard it and so did Werner von Ebrennac.” As for the Frenchman, he is disappointed that Werner has not decided to pull a Claus von Stauffenberg like so many of his aristocratic background and rebel against the Nazi machine. The next day just before leaving the Frenchman’s house for good, Werner finds an open book with the following words, “It is a noble thing for a soldier to disobey a criminal order.” After reading the text, Werner looks up and discovers that the Frenchman is staring right at him in what is ultimately a particularly passive-aggressive attempt by the old man to goad the German lieutenant into rebelling. After Werner leaves for good, the Frenchman states while he and his niece eat soup, “It seemed very cold outside,” as if to foretell the German lieutenant’s grim future. Of course, if Le Silence De La Mer was a Hollywood movie, it would conclude with Werner fucking the French niece and successfully leading a German Resistance movement against the Third Reich, hence the intricately anti-Hollywood essence of the film.

For those that have studied German literature and history, it is not hard to see why it is believed by various film scholars like Ginette Vincendeau that the character of Werner von Ebrennac was at least partly based on Ernst Jünger, who became totally disillusioned with the Third Reich. In fact, as a result of the Third Reich, Jünger even lost his elder son Ernst Jr., who was killed near Carrara, Italy in battle after being forced to join a penal unit due to anti-Nazi sentiments he made (notably, his younger son Alexander, a physician, committed suicide in 1993). Interestingly, as if embarrassed by his previous nationalistic tendencies, Jünger, who lived in self-imposed exile after WWII, heavily revised his most internationally famous book, Storm of Steel (1920) aka In Stahlgewittern—a memoir of his WWI experiences—and excised the more nationalistic elements from it. While Jünger arguably wrote some of his greatest novels after World War II, some critics, like the magical Baron Julius Evola, argued that he suffered from a sort of spiritual and aesthetic deterioration as a result of his somewhat tragic experiences during WWII. Indeed, as Evola, who was such a big fan of Jünger's early work that he translated it into Italian, explained in his 'intellectual autobiography' The Path of Cinnabar (1963), "On the other hand, over the years Jünger has come to distance himself from the book I had introduced to the Italian public, and has abandoned his original views. While the most recent writing of Jünger has significantly contributed towards his fame as a writer and man of letters, on a spiritual level it reflects a lapse: both for its merely literary and aesthetic nature, and because it betrays the influence of ideas of a different, and often antithetical sort from the ones that inform The Worker and other early books of Jünger. It is as if the spiritual drive that Jünger had derived from his life in the trenches of the First World War, and applied on an intellectual level, had gradually run out. Besides, not only did Jünger play no significant role during the Second World War, but it also appears that, when in service in occupied France, he got in touch with those members of the Wehrmacht who in 1944 attempted to murder Hitler. Jünger, therefore, should be numbered among those individuals who first subscribed to 'Conservative Revolutionary' ideas but were later, in a way, traumatized by the National Socialist experience, to the point of being led to embrace the kind of sluggishly liberal and humanistic ideas which conformed to the dominant attempt 'to democratically reform' their country; individuals who have proven incapable of distinguishing the positive side of past ideas from the negative, and of remaining true to the former. Alas, this incapability to discern is, in a way, typical of contemporary Germany (the land of the 'economic miracle')." While it would have been artistically unfortunate if he had chosen such a fate, it would have arguably been more fitting in regard to his legacy if Jünger had pulled a Werner von Ebrennac and tested his fate on the Eastern Front instead of staying in Paris and hanging out with Cocteau and Picasso, but I digress.

While none of Jünger's novels have really been cinematically adapted unless you count Cozarinsky's experimental doc One Man's War or the rather goofy and hardly faithful short Die Ungenierten kommen - What happened to Magdalena Jung? (1983) directed by the late great iconoclastic auteur Christoph Schlingensief, Melville's film is vaguely Jüngerian and, more importantly, it does act as a fine antidote to the platitude-driven antiwar sentiments of the German writer's frog-blooded nemesis Erich Maria Remarque's obscenely overrated novel All Quiet on the Western Front (1929)—a sort of anti-Storm of Steel that was used by Americans as anti-German propaganda—and especially the pre-Code 1930 film of the same name directed by kraut-hating heeb Lewis Milestone. Unlike the idiotically emotionally manipulative Milestone movie, Melville's film manages to be antiwar without being insipidly pacifistic and experimentally nonlinear and relatively unpredictable instead of banally linear and painfully predictable.

LE SILENCE DE LA MER

Indeed, despite his love of American culture and Hollywood, Le Silence De La Mer is as anti-Hollywood as films come, at least aesthetically.

Despite his later reputation for neo-noir films with very heavy American influences, Melville's debut feature had a crucial aesthetic influence on one of the greatest anti-Hollywood auteur filmmakers of all-time. Indeed, the French master auteur Robert Bresson, who previously cast Melville in a small acting role in his second feature Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne (1945), would not fully develop his signature auteur style until his third feature Journal d'un curé de campagne (1945) aka Diary of a Country Priest, which clearly borrowed much from Le Silence De La Mer. In fact, Melville himself was convinced of this and even once complained, "I sometimes read [...] 'Melville is being Bressonian.' I'm sorry, but it's Bresson who has always been Melvillian [...] DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST is LE SILENCE DE LA MER! Some of the shots are identical [...] As a matter of fact, Bresson did not deny it when André Bazin put it to him one day, that he had been influenced by me. All this has been forgotten since." In fact, Bazin wrote in his classic text What is Cinema?: Volume I (1967), "The technique of Bresson's direction cannot adequately be judged except at the level of his aesthetic intention. Inadequately as we may have so far described the latter, it may yet be that the highly astonishing paradox of the film is now a little more evident. Actually the distinction of having set text over against image for the first time goes to Melville in his SILENCE DE LA MER. It is noteworthy that his reason was likewise a desire for fidelity. However, the structure of Vercors' book was of itself unusual. In his JOURNAL Bresson has done more than justify Melville's experiment and shown how well warranted it was. He has carried it to its final conclusions." Indeed, Le Silence De La Mer is one of the rare examples in European art history where a Jew had a crucial revolutionary influence on art as opposed to simply parroting and aping the style of Aryan European artists, which becomes all the more strange when one considers Melville's fetish for American trash. Indeed, Melville would later become more of what Ludwig Wittgenstein describe as a 'reproductive artist,' but his debut feature demonstrates a sort of Aryan artistic pioneering comparable to Carl Theodor Dreyer. In fact, France is rare in cinema history in that it produced a number of Jewish and part-Jewish cinematic pioneers, including Jean Epstein and Abel Gance (like Truffaut, the latter was the bastard son of a Jewish professional). Of course, as Wittgenstein also once wrote in regard to the unoriginal nature of Judaic artists, "It might be said (rightly or wrongly) that the Jewish mind does not have the power to produce even the tiniest flower or blade of grass; its way is rather to make a drawing of the flower or blade of grass that has grown in the soil of another's mind and to put it into a comprehensive picture. We aren't pointing to a fault when we say this and everything is all right as long as what is being done is quite clear. It is only when the nature of a Jewish work is confused with that of a non-Jewish work that there is any danger, especially when the author of the Jewish work falls into the confusion himself, as he so easily may [...] It is typical for a Jewish mind to understand someone else's work better than he understands it himself." Melville would certainly demonstrate he understood American film noir better than the people that actually directed the original films, but with Le Silence De La Mer he at least managed to draw his own 'blade of grass.'

Despite being based on a famous anti-Nazi French resistance novel and directed by a Jew, Le Silence De La Mer can surely be interpreted as a piece of revolutionary pan-European cinema that promotes the uniting of Europa in a real cultural sense and not in the current globalist neo-bolshevik/Sorosian anti-European neo-liberal EU sense. Indeed, while watching the film and listening to Werner von Ebrennac's romantic monologue about a great marriage between Germany and France, I could not help but reminded of the Napoleon quote, "I wanted to prepare the fusion of the great interests of Europe, as I had accomplished that of the parties. I concerned myself little with the passing rancor of the peoples, for I was sure that the results would lead them irresistibly back to me. Europe would in this way have become in truth a united nation, and every one would have been, not matter where he traveled, in the same Fatherland. This fusion will accomplish itself sooner or later through the pressure of the facts; the impulse has been given which, since my downfall and the disappearance of my system, will make the restoration of balance possible in Europe only by merger and fusion of the great nations." Undoubtedly, one of the greatest mistakes of Third Reich was its shallow Nordic/Teutonic supremacism and discrimination of other Europeans, even if France arguably got what was coming to it as it had a long history of waging war against Deutschland and ultimately became a decadent hellhole that persecuted Germany after WWI. Although a fan of Uncle Adolf and his Dozen Year Reich, Euro-American revolutionary Francis Parker Yockey—a man that, according to his FBI records, had an astonishing genius IQ of 170—would have certainly agreed with many of Werner von Ebrennac's sentiments as demonstrated by his neo-Spengerian magnum opus Imperium (1948) where he argued, "Thus it is, that both for material and spiritual reasons, nationalism of the 19th century type is dead. It is dead spiritually for the reason that Europe has reach in its Cultural development the stage of Imperium. Even if there were no such frightful outer threat as exists, this would still govern. But, in addition, the basis of the power of every one of the old Western nations has been destroyed. No single one has sufficient resources, spiritual or material, to engage in world-politics independently. Their only choice is to be vassals collectively, or to form a unity of Culture-State-Nation-Race-People. This creates automatically an economic-political-military unit." Of course the Europa of today is a dystopian anti-Imperium of ethnocide and racial suicide that is ruled by culture-distorters, traitors, and perverts that flood the continent with hostile (and oftentimes rape-happy) low IQ racial aliens from the Global South, and promote every form of sexual degeneracy and social dysfunction while outlawing certain healthy nationalistic tendencies. Surely, even the commie and anarchistic members of the French Resistance would not approve of the singularly degenerate frogland of today.

Despite what one might think of the Third Reich, it is hard to deny that Yockey was right when he argued that, "From 1940 to 1944, nearly all Europe was united, and the eventuation of the Second World War showed to the entire world the unity of Europe, for all Europe was defeated, despite the tricky attempt to make some parts of the West feel 'victorious.'" Indeed, while the UK and France might have played their roles in successfully destroying Germany during WWII, it cost them everything as they lost their empires and their spirits and are today only a pathetic necrotizing shell of what they once were and are being fed on by virtually every type of brown maggot from around the world. Likewise, while Charles de Gaulle might have defeated his Nazi foes and went on to rule France for over two decades, by the late-1960s even he was seen as a sort of Nazi by the degenerate Americanized younger generation—the dreaded frog boomers—who would go on to transform the nation into the crime-and-terrorism-ridden multiculti nightmare that it is today. Despite Melville's film's message of Nazi cultural colonization, it is hard to imagine that France would be in a more culturally retarded, artistically autistic, spiritual sick, infertile, decrepit, and seemingly pre-apocalyptic state as it is today had Germany won the war, but of course most Frenchmen (and Europeans in general) lack the intellectual honesty, integrity, and courage to even consider such an idea, especially since the Third Reich has become a virtual scapegoat for the rest of Europe. It is also probably no coincidence that the most powerful and successful pornographer in France today is a kosher chap named Greg Lansky that is infamous for his 'Blacked' videos where negroes defile white girls. Somehow, it seems quite symbolic that, in a country where virtually all rapes are committed by Arabs and Africans, a Hebraic pornographer would get rich off my making grotesque interracial fuck flicks.

Notably, Vercors' source novel has been adapted at least two other times, including a 1980 BBC English-language TV version and a French-Belgian TV movie version entitled Le Silence de la Mer (2004) directed by Pierre Boutron, with the latter rather cheaply focusing on the doomed romantic subplot between the German lieutenant and French niece. To understand the grand cinematic majesty of Melville's adaptation one just need to compare it to the 2004 version, which has about as much aesthetic value as a MiniDV home-movie of WWII historical reenactors. Although he would admit in interviews that he would have directed a totally different type of film had he created it later in his career, Melville seems to have been proud of his first film as demonstrated by remarks like, "LE SILENCE DE LA MER is the work of professional, even if well-known professionals of the time—who have completely disappeared since—described the film as ‘amateur stuff.’” Aside from considering it nearly immaculate in terms of its construction, I also regard Le Silence de la Mer as Melville’s greatest film. Indeed, after recently watch Melville’s other WWII/Resistance-themed films like Léon Morin, Priest (1961) and Army of Shadows (1969), I cannot help but feel that the auteur reached his peak in terms of political messages and aesthetic innovation with his very first flick. Additionally, despite being the work of a French Jew that lost a brother in WWII, I cannot think of another film that features a more nuanced and sympathetic ‘Nazi soldier,’ but I guess that is what one should expect from a right-wing Israelite that once stated in an interview on television, “I have friends who were once SS.” Of course, Sam Fuller, who also fought in WWII, also depicted Germans in a somewhat more sympathetic manner in The Big Red One (1980) than most Jewish filmmakers. If there is any body part that is most memorably focused on in Le Silence de la Mer, it is unquestionably eyes, namely those of Adolf Hitler (in portrait form) and lead actress Nicole Stéphane. What I found especially interesting about this is the strikingly similarities between Uncle Adolf and the Hebrewess’ eyes. While I am bored with conspiracy theories, I cannot help but be reminded that Stéphane was a Rothschild (her real name was Baroness Nicole de Rothschild) and some people believe that Hitler was a Rothschild bastard. In fact, the speculation about Hitler’s dubious heritage was first brought forward in The Mind of Adolf Hitler: The Secret Wartime Report (1972), which is not exactly conspiracy trash as it is based on a Office of Strategic Services (pre-CIA) prepared by German-American psychoanalyst Walter C. Langer during World War II. While I find Stéphane to be annoyingly unattractive, not least of all because her Sapphic sensibility is always apparent, she demonstrates a sort of understated sensitivity that I think lifelong cinephile Hitler could have appreciated; whether he is actually related to her or not. Accordingly to Melville himself, Le Silence de la Mer was made completely independently without unions and he agreed to burn the print of the film if it was rejected by a single member of a jury of ex-Resistance fighters selected by source writer Vercors, who was initially against the adapting of the novel despite allowing the then-novice auteur to use his home as the main location for the film. Luckily, the jury apparently loved the film, though it would be two years before it was actually released (indeed, the auteur started production on the film on August 11, 1947 in a shoot that would last 27 days). Considering its source novel, auteur, and the year it was shot, one could certainly argue that Le Silence de la Mer is the French World War II film par excellence. I certainly cannot think of a superior French WWII flick and I say that as someone that appreciates classics like Alain Resnais’ Hiroshima Mon Amour (1959) and Malle’s Lacombe, Lucien (1974). Notably, Nietzsche once wrote, “History belongs to the living man in three respects: it belongs to him so far as he is active and striving, so far as he preserves and admires, and so far as he suffers and is in need of liberation.” Undoubtedly, Nietzsche’s words certainly correspond to

Melville and his lifelong relation to WWII, with his films undoubtedly providing him a certain liberation from suffering (which he seemed to hide quite well). Going back to Nietzsche once more, I think the greatest complement I can pay Le Silence de la Mer is that it succeeds in the Nietzschean historical sense as it fulfills the advice of the Teutonic philosopher that, "If you want to strive for and promote the culture of a people, then strive for and promote this higher unity and work to annihilate modern pseudo-culture in favor of a true culture; dare to devote some thought to the problem of restoring the health of a people which has been impaired by history, to how it may recover its instincts and therewith its integrity."

LES ENFANTS TERRIBLES

Jean-Pierre Melville (1950)

French poet Jean Cocteau was one of the greatest and most innovative filmmakers of all time. I would even argue that he is the best filmmaker that France has ever produced. Opium helped to fuel Cocteau's unlimited creativity. A born artist, he directed films that captured beautiful dreams of the highly transcendent sort in a hopelessly terminal world. Jean Cocteau would have fellow French director Jean-Pierre Melville direct the film adaptation of his novel Les Enfants terribles. Les Enfants terribles follows the sadistic relationship of an ambiguously incestuous brother and sister. Italian director Bernardo Bertolucci seems to have taken some inspiration from the film with his recent incest orgy fest The Dreamers. Jean Cocteau is not doubt a superior director to Jean-Pierre Melville (who for the most part directed gangster films). I was disappointed to find out that Cocteau allowed Melville to direct Les Enfants terribles (especially after Cocteau's success with Orpheus). Jean Cocteau's writing carries the power of Les Enfants terribles. Melville merely constructed Jean Cocteau's novel into a minor masterpiece. I look at Melville as merely the artisan where Cocteau is the artist. Les Enfants terribles lacked the celluloid magic found in the masterwork films directed by auteur Jean Cocteau. Paul and Elizabeth are siblings that share a room together (among other things). They spend most of their time in this room playing games and planning trouble. Eventually an attractive blond resembling Elizabeth (Agathe) catches the fancy of Paul. Elizabeth becomes jealous and plots a plan to destroy any type of romantic relationship between Paul and Agathe that may occur. All of this results in utter tragedy. Melville's direction of the final scene in Les Enfants terribles is his greatest contribution to the film. Les Enfants terribles is one of the very rare films that finds its major strengths in its powerful and undeniably unique writing. Jean Cocteau was incapable of telling a boring story as his character wouldn't allow banality. During his early twenties, supposedly Cocteau could reach full orgasm just by using his imagination (without touching himself). I believe that to be true and reflexive of Cocteau's fantastic imagination.

Jean-Pierre Mocky (1982)

In my less than humble opinion, “Folk horror” (or what one might call “Heimat horror” in certain contexts) is one of the most effective, underused, and underappreciated sub-genres of horror cinema. Indeed, it is hard to think of a horror film that is more organically immaculate than The Wicker Man (1973) directed by Robin Hardy, yet few filmmakers have had the gall to tackle the sub-genre (though, it was somewhat trendy in Britain during the 1960s and 1970s). From William Dieterle’s The Devil and Daniel Webster (1941) to Ben Wheatley’s Kill List (2011), the somewhat loose and unofficial sub-genre has pretty much always been around and has made filmgoers change the way they perceive their homelands and culture/religious heritages, with The Blair Witch Project (1999) being a more unfortunate example. As a country of ‘liberty loving’ anarchists and sexual degenerates that has never been big on horror or folk history in general, France seems like one of the last places in the world that would produce quality folk horror flicks, yet the nation is responsible for at least one of the most wildly idiosyncratic and inventive works of the subgenre. Indeed, although featuring elements of black comedy, satire, surrealism, and absurdism, Litan (1982) directed by actor/auteur Jean-Pierre Mocky (Les Dragueurs aka The Chasers, Agent Trouble) is folk horror (or, more like ‘anti-folk horror’) in its most preternatural and iconoclastic form. Directed by a mensch from a Polish Jewish family who has fathered at least 17 children (he has claimed that the first was born when he was only 12) and who developed a deep loathing of the Catholic Church after being molested by a Priest as a schoolboy, Litan – La cité des spectres verts aka Le voleur de visages aka Litan ou les messagers de l’au-delà depicts an apocalyptic world where the intellectually-challenged peasants worship death and where religion and traditional culture are more or less atavistic viruses that lead to mass psychosis and countless senseless deaths, among other things. Although Mocky has been directing films for over half a century, he got his start as an actor (in fact, he plays the male lead of Litan) who has worked with Luchino Visconti and Jean Cocteau and is best known for directing commercial oriented comedies and thrillers and certainly not arthouse folk horror. In fact, after being rather impressed by Litan, I attempted to watch some of his other cinematic works and found them completely unwatchable, thus making it seem unlikely that he is capable of directing anything even remotely like surrealist folk horror, yet he did and should be remembered for it by serious cinephiles, if only for that one film. Indeed, while Mocky’s film is clearly influenced by The Wicker Man (there is at least one ‘borrowed’ scene involving masked children peering out of windows), it features a complete and utter disrespect for faith, religion, and traditional culture where as Hardy’s film is a bit more ‘respectful’ when it comes to these cultural ingredients (it should be noted that Hardy’s flick was penned by a Hebrew named Anthony Shaffer, hence the film's somewhat negative portrayal of Christianity, yet arguably favorable depiction of paganism). Set in a small eccentric French village during a yearly region-oriented folk holiday that is full of pageantry and flamboyant customs and can probably be best described as a frog redneck equivalent to Mexico's "Día de Muertos" (aka "Day of the Dead"), Litan depicts what happens when two 'progressive' liberal-minded lovers fall prey to the labyrinthine lunacy of a town suffering from a spiritually retarded sort of mass psychosis where friends run over friends with their cars, jealous husbands brutally slaughter their wives for merely dancing with other men, death is worshiped while life is neglected, and people more or less become degenerate versions of the ancient archetypes they dress up as, or at least attempt to be. Like George A. Romero's The Crazies (1973) meets Juan López Moctezuma's The Mansion of Madness (1973) meets Werner Herzog's (anti)Heimat flick Herz aus Glas (1976) aka Heart of Glass as directed by the majorly mongrelized lovechild of Alejandro Jodorowsky and Roger Corman, Litan is a curious little piece of cultivated arthouse kitsch that reminds one that small villages always beat cities when it comes to truly fantastic, mystifying, and horrifying horror cinema.

As described in an inter-title at the beginning of the film, "Masks, music and dances: in the town of Litan each year, one celebrates deaths thus." Indeed, automaton-like musicians with red suits and creepy semi-anatomically-correct silver masks (that sort of resemble the face of the eponymous puppet in Sandor Stern's 1988 horror flick Pin), a man balancing a bike on an outdoor tightrope, an ogre-like peasant shoveling a grotesque pile of what seems to be hay mixed with trash, and mysterious men in skull and quasi-zombie masks are just some of the strange folks celebrating the cherished local holiday, though some people are not exactly excited about the festivities, including a cosmopolitan couple from out-of-town. Indeed, after waking up from a seemingly real nightmare involving the death of her geologist boyfriend Jock (Jean-Pierre Mocky), who has temporarily relocated to the village to study a place called Black Rock, Nora (played by Marie-José Nat, who is probably best known for André Cayatte's 1964 Anatomy of a Marriage aka Françoise ou La vie conjugale and the holocaust comedy Train of Life (1998) aka Train de vie) becomes quite hysterical and immediately goes looking for her best beau after receiving a dubious phone call regarding his whereabouts, only to run into a number of weirdoes who attempt to approach her on the way, including zombified frogs of the philistine peasant sort, babbling cross-eyed lunatics, and seemingly pernicious fellows in skull masks, among countless others.

After witnessing a decidedly deranged dude intentionally running over a medic with his car, Nora hitches a ride from a car full of malevolent musicians (aka the weird dudes with the red suits and silver masks), who get a kick out of spooking her, with one sinisterly remarking, "Don't be scared! Today is Litan's day, everybody is thrilled!" after making her squirm with fear. Meanwhile, a group of boy scouts that vaguely resemble the Hitler Youth (they sport khaki-colored uniforms with fascist-esque insignia and whatnot) have tons of good jolly fun while carrying out their yearly tradition of attempting to catch an imaginary monster at Black Rock, but the fun ends when a rather Aryan-looking young man named Eric Bohr (Terence Montagne) is found lying face down in a stream inside a catacomb by Jock, who does what he can to save the unresponsive boy. On top of that, deadly glowing electric eels(?), which are assumedly responsible for crippling Eric, are haunting the waters of the local river and streams. Indeed, with one touch from the electric eels, a person is instantly killed and/or evaporated. When Nora arrives, she accompanies Jock and Eric's father Monsieur Bohr (Georges Wod) as they take the seemingly half-dead boy scout to the hospital, but things only get weirder from there. Of course, the hospital is a packed madhouse full of babbling nuts sporting makeup and moronic haircuts, violent freaks strapped to beds, and other vaguely human rabble. The doctors there are no less deranged, as one of them dedicates his time to removing the vocal chords of canines, while the head doctor, Dr. Steve Julien (Nino Ferrer)—a rather serious quack who proudly believes in the “metempsychosis of the souls”—has a special secured room in the hospital where he attempts to talk to the dead, which he eventually manages to do. When a corpse has a spirit inside, a person's face appears in its pupil. Naturally, little Eric becomes a guinea pig in Dr. Julien's dubious experiments. While roaming around the hospital, Jock enters a room covered with walls upon walls of white sheets where he discovers the freshly mutilated corpse of Eric's father, whose neck has been slit in multiple places. Indeed, there is a conspiracy going on at the hospital and Dr. Julien seems to be heading it.

When Jock and Nora make the mistake of contacting the local police, they find themselves being chased by a lard ass philistine cop named Commissioner Bolek (Roger Lumont) and his fascistic blackshirt officers in a subplot that makes up 1/3 to 1/2 of the film, though everyone is running from something in Litan, be it physical or metaphysical. As Dr. Julien reveals in a conversation with Bolek, when people die in Litan, their corpses are locked in lead coffins and buried in stone vaults, thus hinting at the undead quality of the ancient village's postmortem citizenry. When the good Doctor discusses his obsession with metempsychosis with Bolek, the cop hilariously states, “It's always smart and cultured people like you who believe that kind of twaddle.” As a woman that stoically states, “I don't care what is after death,” Nora—an 'empowered' little lady that is quite 'liberal' and 'modern' like her husband, hence why the two are not married and do not have kids despite being deeply in love—is inately different from the general Litan populous, with even the scientists and doctors being prone to superstition, irrationality, and mysticism. As the chase between the couple and Bolek and his men continues, more and more people in the town fall into seemingly inexplicable catatonic states. Eventually, Jock and Nora are caught by Bolek, though their imprisonment does not last long, as the village has entered a state more chaotic than Berlin during the remaining days of WWII, which enables them to get out of prison fairly easily (actually, Jock sacrifices himself for his lady love, so Nora never spends a second in a jail cell, though she finds herself imprisoned by the townspeople). When Dr. Julien's wife becomes a member of the undead, he becomes even more determined to be successful with his experiments and he ultimately manages to talk to his dead rival Koonst via boy scout Eric's corpse. While being interviewed by Dr. Julien, Koonst ultimately reveals that there is no heaven and hell, but only lonely perennials floating among the dead. While the dead can feel one another, they cannot communicate with each other. As for the meaning of life and morality, Koonst remarks, "We're dreaming your life and when the dream stops, you die." Near the end of the film, the only people that have yet to succumb to mass psychosis or death are Nora, Jock, Dr. Julien and his highly attractive blonde female assistant, Bolek, and a gang of 'three little pigs.' Indeed, three degenerates sporting real hog heads as masks attempt to pillage the village as well as Nora, but they ultimately succumb in the end as well. While that premonition Nora had regarding Jock's death does not play out as she originally imagined, she and her husband ultimately fall victim to the glowing electric eels as well. During the exceedingly eerie and less than happy ending of the film, all the undead townspeople, who have gone through metempsychosis, meet at the local church and the head pasture declares, "You'd chose Litan's day to put us through this terrible ordeal, God almighty. But we don't want to die a second time. We just want to sleep and dream. Be merciful on us, Lord. Sleep. . .And dream." In a rather bizarre twist, it is revealed that Jock's spirit has now taken over his dead girlfriend Nora's body, thus making him a spiritual transvestite of sorts.

Undoubtedly, while watching Litan the following quote from belated French arthouse-pornographer Jean-Daniel Cadinot (Les minets sauvages aka Tough and Tender, Charmants Cousins) certainly came to mind: "An erect phallus is a symbol of life, a cross a symbol of death." Indeed, homoerotic overtones aside, Cadinot's critical remark regarding Catholicism certainly highlights one of the major themes of Mocky's film, as a work that associates traditional culture and Catholicism with death. The fact that the two lead characters, Nora and Jock, have committed the big Catholic "no, no" of living together in sin and out of wedlock only highlights this as two people that have chosen real flesh over 'metaphysical necrophilia.' Of course, it is well known that Mocky hates the Catholic Church, though he has softened a little bit of the years in terms of his anti-Catholic sentiment, remarking for a May 2010 article entitled 'The Arty Semite' at the Jewish Daily Forward: "Today, priests have become a minority; I never attack minorities." While a rather strikingly original film, many elements of Litan bare a glaring resemblance to German auteur Peter Fleischmann's dystopian sci-fi flick Die Hamburger Krankheit (1979) aka The Hamburg Syndrome which, on top of featuring a deadly virus that leaves people in a catatonic state and various anti-Heimat sentiments, also includes malevolent characters wearing goofy skull masks. Featuring a somewhat cheesy soundtrack that seems like it was stolen from some forgotten Italian cannibal exploitation flick from the late-1970s and equally schlocky special effects in regard to the glowing eels, Litan is a rare cinematic work that manages to straddle a healthy median between cinematic class and low-grade trash, as if Mocky thought he could make a multidimensional work that would simultaneously appeal to pretentious art fags and Troma untermenschen, hence the relative obscurity of the film today.

It should be noted that Mocky's film features some of the most aesthetically displeasing and just downright vulgar Frenchmen ever captured on celluloid, as a work that puts Veit Harlan's unkosher National Socialist classic Jud Süß (1940) to shame in terms of unflattering racial caricatures (interestingly, the Jewish director/lead more or less looks like an archetypical French fellow). Of course, as a work that was directed by not just any Judaic gentleman, but one of the Polish persuasion who fell prey to the carnal vices of an unholy pedophile priest, Litan wallows in anti-völkisch and anti-Catholic sentiment in a rather predictable way, yet the film ultimately transcends these rather cliché limitations due to its rather penetrating and peculiar aesthetic prowess and assortment of both aesthetic and thematic idiosyncrasies. Although I am a bit more cosmopolitan than a farmer and I find Catholic services to be somewhat unsettling, I can think of things that are much worse than death-worshipping mystics who worship a Hebraic bastard on a stick. Indeed, redneck villagers are the least of France's worries, as the nation is on the verge of racial and cultural suicide, as demonstrated by its indigenous population's declining birth rates, dangerously growing populations of mostly hostile aliens from the third world, and prevailing neo-liberal ideologies, which have turned the French into a bunch of groveling cultural cuckolds. While I consider Litan a minor masterpiece of sorts, it mostly seems like pure absurdist comedy compared to the very real and prophetic horrors of a novel like French author/adventurer Jean Raspail's masterpiece The Camp of the Saints (1973) aka Le Camp des saints, but of course you will never see someone like Mocky cinematically adapting a work like that for the silver screen. Indeed, true folk horror should feature a scenario where the folk is threatened by an outsider and not the other way around, but then again, a horror flick set in an Israeli settlement featuring IDF thugs as satanic villains sounds like a great and rather relevant concept for a film.

Jeanine Meerapfel (1981)

As far as I know, Argentinean-born feminist auteur Jeanine Meerapfel (Days to Remember aka Die Verliebten, The Girlfriend)—the daughter of two German Jews who fled Deutschland after Uncle Adolf became a little less tolerant towards God's chosen tribe—is the only 'kraut' Jewess filmmaker working today whose cinematic works reflect a sort of post-Auschwitz Ashkenazi perspective on the still troubled relationship between Germans and Jews. As Meerapfel stated in a voiceover in her documentary Im Land meiner Eltern (1981) aka In the Land of My Parents—a work featuring Jews, many of whom are the director's friends, discussing how she feels and what it means to be living in Berlin as a Hebrew in the 1980s—regarding history, especially in regard to her family, "If Hitler had not existed, I would have been born a German Jew, more German than Jewish, in a small village in southern Germany..." yet the feminist auteur opted for becoming a German anyway, making a filmmaking career for herself in a nation she would have been outlawed from working in only a couple decades earlier. To her credit, Meerapfel, despite being a racially conscious Jew and a feminist working in the West Germany film industry where ethno-masochism and philo-Semitism is the neurotic norm among racially pure Aryan auteur filmmakers, had the courageous gall to give an unflattering portrayal of a Nazi-persecuted German Jew businessman in her first feature-length work Malou (1981), seemingly a somewhat autobiographical work about a Argentinean-born Jewess who is married to a classically handsome blond German that digs into the dubious past regarding her French gentile mother's marriage to her German Jew father. A sort of softcore feminist 'woman's film' clearly inspired by melancholy melodramas by German New Cinema auteur filmmakers like Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Helma Sanders-Brahms, and Margarethe von Trotta, as well as Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid, Malou is ultimately a work that will appeal to women and that was certainly made for the fairer sex in mind, yet it will also be of appeal to Germanists and those interested in German cultural history as an outsider's view of a nation that has yet to come to terms with its past, especially in regard to the now-taboo Jewish question. Starring Fassbinder's ex-wife Ingrid Caven (La Paloma, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven), filmed by Fassbinder's cinematographer Michael Ballhaus (Whity, Satan's Brew) and scored by Fassbinder's friend/composer Peer Raben, Malou is a sort of less esoteric and more accessible 'answer' to the German-Jewish question brought up in Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel and In a Year of 13 Moons (1978) aka In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden in its more conventional depiction of Aryan-Jew love. Somewhat interestingly, it is a German Jew and survivor of Nazi persecution that is depicted in a less flattering light than a post-WWII German, which one could interpret as auteur Meerapfel's personal attack on her own father and/or mature and un-p.c. recognition that anyone can make mistakes and be assholes, even cultivated Judaic gentlemen who almost found themselves winning a vacation to a secluded concentration camp.

Hannah (Grischa Huber) is an Argentinean Jew who makes a living teaching Deutsch to foreigners and who is married to a workaholic German architect husband Martin (Helmut Griem). Upset by the fact that she is married to a man who works too much and too hard and that she believes has been treating her in a patronizing manner due to her innate foreignness, Hannah begins to obsess over the failed yet strangely glorified marriage of her tragic alcoholic mother Malou (Ingrid Caven), a French orphan turned Alsatian-based dining hall diva who converted to Judaism and completely devoted herself to her husband, and her father Paul (Fassbinder regular Ivan Desny), a wealthy German Jewish businessman who has led a rather privileged and prestigious life, even if the National Socialists caused him a bit of trouble for a period of time. Unfortunately, Hannah has a rather romanticized view of her mother, which is part due to her mommy's dubious recollections of her own past, so it becomes rather hard for the young Jewess to discern fact from fiction. Apparently, before marrying Paul, Malou had a semi-successful career in Strasbourg as a Dietrich-esque nightclub singer/diva and she was more than willing to throw it all away to marry a rich Jew who seemed to be the perfect lover and gentleman. Not thinking twice about shedding her identity as a Frenchwoman and Christian, Malou agreed to convert to Judaism for Paul so the two could wed under Hebraic law. Not long after getting married, National Socialism rears its anti-Semitic head and Malou and Paul flee Teutonia for the Netherlands. While living in Amsterdam, Malou becomes pregnant at what could not be a more inconvenient time as Paul falls in love with a young Jewess named Lotte (Marie Colbin), who he helps escape from the nefarious Nazis. After giving birth to baby Hannah, Malou is visited by the Gestapo, so she, her husband Paul, and Lotte make their way to Argentina. Not long after arriving in Argentina, Paul dumps Malou for Lotte. Despite pleading with Paul desperately for him to come back to her, Malou is ultimately abandoned and forced to raise Hannah by herself. Forever lovelorn, Malou starts a number of deadend relationships with sleazy men that she describes to her daughter as 'uncles.' Since Paul considers Malou a negative influence on young Hannah, he has her sent to a European boarding school. In the end, Malou, lonely and melancholy, essentially drinks herself to death. Hannah comes to realize her mother's relationship with her father was not the ideal fairytale romance that she always assumed as it resulted in a woman giving up everything to a man, including her identity, career, religion, and nationality, only to have him throw her away like an old newspaper in the end. Despite her seemingly petty annoyance at her husband Martin's halfhearted attempt at 'Aryanizing' his Jewish wife by correcting her command of German and negatively critiquing her exotic way of dress, Malou ultimately realizes that her husband is a decent and devoted man who may not be a storybook prince, but still makes for a relatively decent husband, thus Malou concludes with a reasonably happy ending, especially for a post-WWII German film.

As Malou star Ingrid Caven somewhat ethno-masochistically noted in an interview in the book Chaos as Usual: Conversations About Rainer Werner Fassbinder (2000), “Our generation in Germany is skeptical about the culture of the past. All that German culture accomplished didn’t prevent people from turning into murderers. That’s why there’s all this denial. We had to find new ways of expression. We needed to recognize that German culture is unthinkable without German-Jewish culture. Germans, whether they are Jewish or not, must understand this. That the Jews were persecuted and murdered is part of it. To us, it was impossible to simply go on as before, to forget what happened.” Indeed, director Jeanine Meerapfel certainly notes that “German culture is unthinkable without German-Jewish culture” in Malou, but she, unlike most 100% kraut filmmakers of her generation, does not feel the need to denigrate Germans into oblivion for the crimes of their parents/grandparents, nor she does stoop to the science fiction level of portraying all Jewish characters as morally pristine angels as is done in Hollywood and most contemporary European cinema. As much as I hate to admit it, Jewish feminist Jeanine Meerapfel demonstrates with Malou that she is essentially more honorable and honest than most of the filmmakers of German New cinema, whose Marxist far-left fanaticism, patronizing xenophilia, pathetic and pandering Philo-Semitism, self-satisfied ignorance of traditional German kultur, and flagrant finger-pointing of their parents/grandparents are clearly symptomatic of a people suffering from a suicidal collective unconscious. Aside from its aesthetic similarities, Malou is quite similar to the films of Daniel Schmid—a filmmaker who was wrongly described as a ‘reactionary’ and ‘fascist’ by the film critics of his zeitgeist—due to his somewhat reluctant nostalgia for the past, which was further confirmed by director Meerapfel’s personal insight regarding her film, “During Filming in Madrid we heard an Argentinian singing tangos in a bar. It became clear to me that the sentimentality of the story in the film, this longing for the past, this melancholy mood, were feelings which I had learned or rediscovered in the tango.” Indeed, the great irony of Malou is that, despite its ultimately unflattering depiction of the past, the past still seems all the more alive, culturally vital, and romantic than the postmodern present where materialistic gain trumps all other human motives. As director Meerapfel stated regarding her reasons why she is a filmmaker in the documentary The Night of the Filmmakers (1995) aka Die Nacht der Regisseure, “We can show how time is connected...That’s something wonderful about films...We can show 40 years of a life, we can show a 100 years...And we can show how time passes...how people age; that’s what films can do. And we can have our parents come to life again...We can have children we never had...And we can be children. That’s probably why we make films,” and with Malou she certainly accomplished all of these goals, even demonstrating that technocratic Teutons can make better husbands than wealthy Hebrews.

Jed Johnson (1977)

Andy Warhol's Bad (1977) directed by Jed Johnson is indubitably a bad movie. Not bad in the banal or unwatchable sense, but a sincerely mean-spirited work that contains some of the most repellant, deplorable, and eclectically appalling people ever captured on celluloid. Warhol (or at least his hired filmmakers) was no stranger to depicting human depravity and emotional disfigurement, but out of all the films he was involved with, Bad is easily his most callously misanthropic and pessimistic work and one of few X-rated films that is conspicuously anti-erotic in nature, but like most of his previous efforts, such seedy and surly portrayals are executed facetiously with a most biting satire. Indubitably, Paul Morrissey was Warhol's greatest director, Danny Williams is all but forgotten, and pop-art capitalist himself seemed like nothing more than an uninspired mentally-defective dilettante while in the director's chair, but Jed Johnson – a man who never directed a film before (nor would after) – assembled what would prove to be the Warhol Factory's masterpiece. Before directing Bad, Johnson had helped with the editing on Andy Warhol's L'Amour (1973) and Blood for Dracula (1974) aka Andy Warhol's Dracula and even interior decorated a townhouse that he and the Factory dictator would call home. Of course, Bad features a different sort of domestic living than the ever so dainty and urbane homophile sort probably shared by Warhol and Johnson, as one might describe the film as somewhat misogynistic, but it is most certainly a wanton work of exceedingly eremitic extremes and sardonic snipes. Bad centers around a beauty salon owner named Hazel Aiken (played by Carroll Baker of Giant, Baby Doll) who also happens to be a slumlord that supplements her income by pimping out ferocious criminally-inclined white trash girls that rent rooms from her. Hazel also hires these boorish broads to carry out extremely profitable contract "hits" on everything from pet dogs to seemingly retarded school children. As a supremely ballsy bourgeois bitch and bottom-feeding capitalist who virtually enslaves the more debauched members of the fecund proletariat, Hazel even makes Martha Stewart seem like less of a soul-sucking cunt.

Hellish Hazel has a variety of dejected human-garbage gals and jaded Jezebels staying with here, including a humble (if mentally-feeble) and aesthetically displeasing daughter-in-law named Mary (and her equally annoying infant child), two wopesses R.C. and P.G., and a duo of bitchy brawling sisters named Marsha and Glenda. On a trial basis, queen harlot Hazel also takes in a wop bohunk named L.T. (Perry King) who acts as a hustling Joe Dallesandro-clone of sorts (apparently, the real Dallesandro declined to be in the film as he was working on pictures in Europe). Although Hazel is an eristic nag that treats most of the girls as emotional punching bags, she seems to hold her most marvelous malice towards L.T., probably due to his flagrant handsomeness and her seemingly sexually-repressed disposition. Undoubtedly, L.T. is a delinquent philistine who does not think twice about stealing and selling odious Hazel's expensive perfume, but at least he is an unintentionally humorous fellow whose petty criminality and lack of manners acts as a haphazard stand-up comedy routine of sorts. Whatever the true merit of their acting abilities, all the actors featured in Bad certainly get the job done as I indubitably found myself anticipating their much warranted downfalls, but I fond Hazel's delightful descent – which involves an emotional Negro who does not take kindly to the word "Nigger" – to be the most comical and befitting. Essentially, Bad is one of the finest cinematic documents depicting the innate despitefulness of the fairer sex and the assets of such female viciousness and coldness within a domestic criminal network. The film also highlights the intuitive materialistic nature of the female gender and how such mercenary behavior is all the more evident in our unspiritual post-modern Capitalist world, especially in New York City of all places; the home of Wall Street and the world capital of international bloodsucking capitalism. Ultimately, it is from L.T.'s selfless empathy for a helpless autistic boy that leads to the much deserved demise of she-bitch Hazel's smutty and intrinsically amoral enterprise. Had Hazel remained the cold gutter baroness that she always was and characteristically resisted the charismatic charm of suave con-man L.T. from the get go, she probably would not have gotten herself into such an unbecoming and easily avoidable situation that would inevitably lead to her demise.

For a man who directed a scene of an infant falling to its death from a 12-story building, barefaced animal cruelty, and a toilet overflowing with what seems to be a couple gallons worth of feces, it is almost fitting that Bad director Jed Johnson himself would die tragically in the Trans World Airlines TWA Flight 800 plane explosion of 1996. Not since the brutal murder of Pier Paolo Pasolini in 1975, shortly after directing his final and startlingly self-prophetic film Salo, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) has a filmmaker's art so tumultuously and appalling imitated his death. Bad may also be the only film featuring a scenario where a number of filmgoers are burnt alive in a movie theater, so to say the film also pokes fun at the viewer would be a glaring understatement. I find this scene to be awfully farcical when I consider that fact that out of all of Warhol's films, Bad had the most lavish and celebrity-celebrated film premiere as actors as famous as Warren Beatty, Julie Christie, and Jack Nicholson attended the film's debut screening in May 1977. In reflection, Bad was not a bad way for Warhol to end his career in filmmaking, particularly when considering that he was the same man behind the all but unwatchable A Clockwork Orange adaptation Vinyl (1965). As Vinyl demonstrated, Warhol may not have understood male violence nor masculinity, but he was certainly savvy about what makes women tick as so candidly, if venomously, portrayed in his completely worthwhile masterpiece Bad; a sordid cinematic spectacle of screwy spite.

FROM A WHISPER TO A SCREAM

Jeff Burr (1987)

When I was about 10 or 11, I received a box full of old ex-rental horror VHS tapes that were donated to a library and ultimately and thankfully came into my hands. That auspiciously received box proved to be a horror university for me as it included classics like Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) and Dan O'Bannon's The Return of the Living Dead (1985), but also more obscure works like Avery Crouse's Eyes of Fire (1983), Katt Shea's Stripped to Kill (1987), and Dan Hoskin's Chopper Chicks in Zombietown (1989) featuring a then-unknown Billy Bob Thornton. While all of these films have been permanently burned into my mind for one reason another, the relatively dead serious 'folk horror' anthology From a Whisper to a Scream (1987) aka The Offspring directed by Jeff Burr (Leatherface: Texas Chainsaw Massacre III, Night of the Scarecrow) holds a special place in my blackened heart in terms of hateful horror flicks. A sort of 'southern gothic horror' featuring a necrophiliac old nerd killing the retarded sister he regularly gives baths to, hick criminals killing colored folk, and confederate bastard children killing Yankee soldiers, From a Whisper to a Scream (which, until relatively recently, I thought was called simply 'The Offspring' due to the fact that it was originally released in the U.S. under that title) is a film that I thought was a total piece of shit when I first saw it as a kid and, while I still believe that to some extent, the film has never left my mind, so I thought that, considering it is the Halloween season and all, it was a better time than ever to re-watch the film for the first time in nearly two decades. The film is noted for, among other things, featuring scream screen aristocrat Vincent Price, who refused to star in horror films at the time due to being typecast, in his final role in a horror film (though he would later appear in the goofy zombie-themed action-comedy Dead Heat (1988)) as an old Tennessee historian who acts as the storyteller of the frame story in between segments of the anthology. Somewhat interestingly, director Jeff Burr showed up at Price's house with a bottle of wine (Price was a wine connoisseur) and the script to From a Whisper to a Scream in a desperate attempt to get the veteran actor to star in the film and the rest is history. Oftentimes described as a Creepshow rip-off, Burr's film is much more brutal than the Romero-King anthology as it lacks the audience-comforting dark humor, as a cruel yet creamy country fried hick-heavy horror show where various deadly confederate degenerates get their just desserts. By no means art of any sort, From a Whisper to a Scream is just good old B-grade shock and scare Southern celluloid Americana that reminds the viewer why the deep south makes the best and most atmospheric setting for American scare flicks.

A blond middle-aged journalist with a chic 1980s dyke cut named Beth Chandler (played by cult diva Susan Tyrrell of Richard Elfman's Forbidden Zone (1980) and Marco Ferreri's Tales of Ordinary Madness (1981)) decides to visit the quaint home/library of a historian after witnessing the state sanctioned execution of his niece in prison via lethal injection. The historian's name is Julian White (Vincent Price) and he is reasonably annoyed when reporter Beth rudely walks into his library after business hours. When Beth asks about his niece who was just executed for murdering a number of men starting when she was just 7 and ending when she was caught at 32, Julian remarks, "It all ended tonight...but there will be more" and proceeds to explain how his Tennessee hometown of Oldfield has "a long history of violence...it's as though the very foundation of this place was...human suffering." From there, Julian begins to tell four sordid stories from Oldfield's past that span from the recent past to all the way back to the American Civil War, thus hinting that the south has been cursed ever since the Confederacy was destroyed in what was ultimately the deadliest war in American history. If one thing is for, it is that the savagery and sadism of Sherman's legacy is very much alive in the hearts and minds of the accursed populous of good old Oldfield.

FROM A WHISPER TO A SCREAM

The first chapter of the film is set in contemporary times and revolves around a seemingly half-autistic old nerd with slicked back bleach blond hair who works as a meager grocery clerk Stanley Burnside (played by Clu Gulager in what is easily one of his more memorable, revolting, and overlooked roles). On top of having nightmares about performing cunnilingus on corpses and giving ice baths to his half-retarded sister named Eileen (played by Gulager's then-wife Miriam Byrd-Nethery) who has an incestuous crush for him, Stanley has a disturbing crush on his beautiful boss Grace (Megan McFarland) that ultimately has deadly results. Indeed, after somehow coercing Grace into going on a dinner date with him, he impulsively strangles her to death in his car after she aggressively rejects his rather grotesque kisses and mocks his patently pathetic love for her (she tells him, "you just don't have it" and that he is a "pathetic joke"). Of course, Stanley is still in love with Grace, so he breaks into a church and fucks her corpse. Flash forward seven months later and Stanley is enjoying life aside from the fact that his retarded sister keeps trying to put the moves on him, so he violently strangles her to death in a fit of repressed rage while giving her a bath. Not long after that, a small Ghoules-esque creature rises from Grace's grave, which proves to be Stanley's bastard demon seed son (hence, the film's alternative title The Offspring). When the deformed mutant spawn arrives at the nefarious nerd's house, Stanley hilariously threatens it like a good ol' boy by stating, "Don't you fuck with me boy." Needless to say the prodigal son gets all ominously Oedipal against its deranged daddy.

The second and antepenultimate chapter of the film is set in the 1950s and revolves around a trailer-dwelling small-time con hick named Jesse Hardwick (played by Terry Kiser, who played the eponymous corpse in the Weekend at Bernie's films) who is mortally wounded after his trailer slut sells him out to two criminals that he has just double-crossed. Jesse manages to fall in a small rowboat before collapsing and drifts out into a swamp before awakening in the shadowy shack of an old voodoo-inclined negro named Felder Evans (Harry Caesar), who has taken it upon himself to nurse the redneck back to the health. As Jesse snoops around the old spook's dilapidated shack when he is away, he learns that Felder is a 200-year-old ex-slave who has lived many full lives. Naturally, Jesse demands that Felder show him the voodoo secret to eternal life, which he agrees to do, but the rowdy redneck has ADD and does not have the patience to learn, so he knocks the old man out and threatens to drown him the next day if he doesn't give him the potion to eternal life. Of course, Jesse loses his cool and kills the old kindly colored witchdoctor, but the black black magician rather predictably comes back to life and takes revenge at his would-be-killer. After tying Jesse to some sort of makeshift voodoo curse device, Felder reveals that he had already given him the potion and adds, "I already gave you the potion, Jesse...and you tried to kill me for something you already had." After revealing to Jesse that he has given him enough potion to live another "70 years or more," Felder takes his revenge by quartering his body with an ax and setting it on fire. In the end, Jesse's burnt and dismembered undead corpse waits for 70 years to die in a hospital.

The third and penultimate segment of the film is set in the 1930s at a carnival called 'Lovecraft's Traveling Amusements' in tribute to American Spenglerian horror literary master H.P. Lovecraft and is about a glass-eating entertainer named Steven Arden (Ron Brooks) who falls in love with a sweet local blonde girl named Amarrillis Caulfield (Didi Lanier). Unfortunately, the glass-eater's boss, an overtly and proudly evil ebony beastess named 'The Snakewoman' (played by Rosalind Cash, who is best known for playing Charlton Heston's love interest in The Omega Man (1971)) who runs the carnival like a brothel and treats her employees like white slaves, is jealous of Amarrillis and wants to keep her freaks in servitude. A voodoo witch, the Snakewoman has given all freaks, who are all escaped convicts, their special powers. The Snakewoman also has the power to torture and kill her freaks voodoo style merely by using a piece of their hair or a drop of their blood. When Steven and his lover Amarrillis manage to escape together with the help of a kind dwarf, everything seems perfect, at least until the Snakewoman tears the glass-eater's bodies to shreds. The Snakewoman forces Amarrillis to take Steven's place in the circus and she becomes 'Amarrillis the Human Pin Cushion.' Notably, unlike virtually all the other killers of the film, the Snakewoman is the only murderous character featured in the entire movie that does not meet a grizzly end, not to mention the fact that the two morally pristine young lovers also meet tragic ends, thus making it a somewhat odd and nonsensical part of From a Whisper to a Scream, as if the director could not think of a good way to conclude the piece and merely tacked on a contrived ending at the last minute.

The fourth and final segment of the film is set during the end of the American Civil War and centers around a mean and murderous Union sergeant named Gallen (Cameron Mitchell) who forces his men to kill every single confederate soldier in sight, including those surrendering. After agreeing to rape any southern women they can find and shooting one of their comrades for desertion even though they have just learned that the war has ended, Gallen and his men eventually end up at an old plantation house in Oldfield that is occupied by sadistic confederate war orphans who hate adults. Within seconds of being at the heavily guarded home, one of the sergeant's men is stabbed in the genitals by the leader of killer confederate children due to his somewhat unruly and typically rude and uncultivated northern behavior. While imprisoned in the house of children-ruled confederate horror, Gallen tricks a sweet crippled girl named Amanda (Ashli Bare) into thinking that he will adopt her so that she will untie him. When Amanda unties him, Gallen opts for breaking her little neck instead of adopting her. When Gallen escapes from the house, he finds the child soldiers playing games with the dismembered limbs of his comrades. Of course, the children eventually kill him and introduce him to their leader, 'The Magistrate,' which is a sort of human scarecrow made out of the dismembered limbs of all the orphan's dead parents. In the end, the children ritualistically kill Gallen by setting him on fire and American flag is lifted in a glorious fashion while the leader of the orphans stoically declares, "Brothers and Sisters, the time has come to rebuild Oldfield and to restore her to her former glory." In an absurd twist ending to From a Whisper to a Scream, after the four stories have been told, journalist Beth kills librarian Julian by throwing a switchblade at his throat after revealing she developed a quasi-Sapphic relationship with his recently deceased niece via letter correspondence. Apparently, Beth believed she had the right to kill Julian because he "poisoned" his late niece's mind. Indeed, it seems that Beth is one of those university-lobotomized and slave-morality-ridden urban feminists who do not believe that women should be held accountable for their own actions.

Despite agreeing to star in From a Whisper to a Scream, Vincent Price would later express regret in a letter to his friend, German actor and puppeteer Gerd J. Pohl, claiming that his agent had misrepresented the film and he had been trapped in a contract, even though it was actually director Jeff Burr who convinced him to star in the movie in the first place. Indeed, as Burr explained in a 2012 interview featured at the website of drag performer/filmmaker Peaches Christ regarding how he randomly showed up at Price's house and convinced him to be in the film: "We came bearing gifts, and wouldn't you know... he opened the door himself when we knocked! It was a flurry of "Gee, Mr. Price, we're fans of your work..." and "we wrote this script," and he actually invited us inside. He had every reason to ignore us, and even if it was on a polite level, he could have said, "Okay boys, contact my agent," but he was just so gracious. He invited us in, sat and talked with us for about 15 minutes, took the script, and that's how it all started." Despite Price's unkind words regarding the film, Burr, however, only had good things to say about the actor, stating he was “professional, gracious, and accommodating” in spite of the fact that it was probably “the lowest budget film [Price] ever made as a professional.” Of course, Mr. Price makes for a much more charismatic storyteller than the Crypt Keeper and From a Whisper to a Scream is ultimately worth seeing just to see old Dr. Anton Phibes declare, “Lovecraft and Poe...I’ll drink to those two masters of horror!” while sipping on wine. Luckily, Burr’s film manages to also transcend simple sensationalist horror tradition as an eclectically grotesque confederate gothic nightmare that ultimately makes a connection between the atrocities committed by Union General Sherman and his men against the South to the sorry state of the confederates today. Indeed, unlike exploitation trash like hick-hating Hebrew Herschell Gordon Lewis’ Two Thousand Maniacs! (1964), From a Whisper to a Scream is a work of the south and not made to make fun of Dixie. After all, director Burr grew up in Georgia and his first feature was the Award Winning American Civil War flick Divided We Fall (1982). Interestingly, Burr only credits three of his films—From a Whisper to a Scream, the dramedy Eddie Presley (1992), and the horror-war hybrid Straight into Darkness (2004)—as being the only works of his ‘own,’ as the others had been butchered by the studios, or as the director stated himself, there were, “decisions that were made, in my estimation, that weren’t the best. So, those are the three I stand behind without a mountain of qualifications.” If one thing is for sure, Hollywood would never produced a horror film as sick nor as shamelessly southern as From a Whisper to a Scream, which is a work that you might suspect would be directed by the rampantly heterosexual necrophile nephew of Tennessee Williams.

LEATHERFACE: TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE III

Jeff Burr (1990)

Ignoring the previous Texas Chainsaw Massacre film, Leatherface intends to strictly stay parallel to the source material of focusing mainly on the masked killer. Instead of sticking to the same structure the series was headed - expanding the cannibal family's mythology, director Jeff Burr attempts to humanize Leatherface in a blundering embarrassing spectacle which builds up a scene of the mad butcher typing "food" repeatedly into a Speak N' Spell like toy.

The film turns from bad to worse as soon as you meet our 80s caricatures that illuminate the screen with a deep-seated lust for annoying the piss out of you with their moldy dialogue and abominable screen presence. To sit still during a barrage of horror cliches that acknowledge their own existence is the worst and this film, being a horror circle jerk, doesn't make this experience any more warm and/or inviting. Don't bother. Ken Foree joins in on the fun as not a cameo, but the only reason these wastes survive the ordeal (Or some of them). Concluding on a high note, the ending might be the only acceptable asset of the film. While Foree isn't throwing his bad boy black dude attitude at you full force, he's spouting nonsense about being a top notch survivalist. One might find several disputable claims about said boast, but the result is never-the-less still painful. Almost as painful as watching Flyboy slowing turn into a member of the legion of dead. As horrible as the sequel adheres to, the "controversy" that the film isn't present. While there is a workprint floating around, the film proves entirely that a bloodier version isn't needed. Leatherface is a slow mirage of a dying idol. Leatherface (character) is slowly fading into a world of contemporary hell. As with most horror genre classics, the Texas Chainsaw Massacre remake was funded by Michael "Explosion" Bay. Ty E previously stated that the Texas Chainsaw Massacre (2003) was a propaganda film of sorts, catering to the city folk and college kids. The trend started in The Texas Chainsaw Massacre saga before the remake. While the 2nd entry embraced its southern roots, In the third film, they bump the anti-rural accusations up full blast slightly echoed by Viggo Mortensen posing a solid question - "So? How do you like Texas?". This eerie line resonates through out the film leaving a sulfur smell of national deceit and timeless propaganda. Posing Southerners as mentally deficient socials isn't anything new to the film industry. To add to their already decrepit status in modern film, Burr creates an atmosphere in which these "yahoo's" attempt to learn, advocating the wonders of technology, hence the "learning" scene in which Leatherface plays with an educational toy, ending abruptly when he goes in a blind rage. All this forms the sense that Jeff Burr or the scribes believe that the rural folks are resistant to change and ignorant to the classic saying from Bob Dylan - "The Times They Are A-Changin'". A childhood friend's mom actually told me that she used to date Gunnar Hansen (The Original Leatherface).

The stories proved Gunnar to sound like an endearing fellow. I've heard of such love letters but I've never perused through them. As the myth of Leatherface stands, Gunnar should be disappointed with the outcome of an idol he created. His manic swings and staggering figure added to the horror. Leatherface claimed to have suffered from many cuts and reshoots. These claims may be the truth but even the workprint didn't touch what was spoken as the "original vision". What was once is not anymore. I don't fancy watching a hypothetical documentary on a film I have no respect for to theorize how the film could have turned out. Jeff Burr created a product regardless of how big of a flop it was, and marketed it. I blame Jeff Burr solely for the slaughtering of an original and fresh massacre. In an eagle eye view, Leatherface has no real material to it; nothing to differ it from the rest. I enjoy the fact that they suited up Leatherface with a leg brace to bring memories flooding back from the climatic ending of the original Texas Chainsaw Massacre, but not much else exists. There's a couple of entertaining southern archetypes floating around, mainly Alfredo, but Leatherface is as dry of a film as the trailer would lead you to believe. No Excalibur here, just a rancid slasher film.

THE DEVIL AND DANIEL JOHNSTON

Jeff Feuerzeig (2006)

I was introduced to Daniel Johnston by a dear former friend of mine. Like Johnston, my friend has an obsession with Brian Wilson and the Beach Boys album Pet Sounds. He also suffers from many of the same mental disabilities. After my initial viewing of the documentary The Devil and Daniel Johnston, I was thoroughly touched. The documentary is one of the most intimate portraits on an individual. I assume the reason for this is that Daniel Johnston is oblivious to the contents of the documentary (allowing for its intimate style). In Daniel Johnston's teenage years, he was a filmmaker. He shot super 8mm comedies featuring the mockery of his mother and his discontent with her Christian authoritarianism. Johnston would later become delusional and dedicate his life to the battle against Satan (my friend had a similar incident which lasted a week). I especially liked when Daniel Johnston performed for some New York intellectuals and art fags. He cries out to Christ in true emotion. The New Yorkers probably wanted to hang themselves. Daniel Johnston (whether you like him or not) is a true artist. A character that lacks any type of pretension (the irony being many of his fans are full of it). I rarely see any other contemporary artists with such true and raw expression. Johnston cannot help who he is. The Devil and Daniel Johnston is an almost perfectly constructed documentary on the life and art of Johnston. The documentary features intimate interviews with Daniel Johnston's family and friends. People that both inspired and hurt Johnston (whether intentional or not). The most telling portions of the documentary are old audio tapes that Johnston had compiled over the years. They range from stream of consciousness poetry to direct testimonials. Daniel Johnston became an endorser of McDonalds, MTV, and piss colored soda. He cares only about what he does and fits no type of collective mold. Indie music fans would call any other musicians that support corporate interest heretics. Johnston's endorsement of evil corporations only adds to his already limitless credibility. Bye Kurt! Unlike Daniel Johnston, my friend has found a love of sorts. He disappeared from my life in a world of perverse and abusive sexual encounters. I can only assume that Daniel Johnston's sex life is nonexistent. He probably owes some of his artistic talents to this biological void. May Daniel Johnston live a long and prosperous life.

NATURAL ENEMIES

Jeff Kanew (1979)

Getting a fair amount of praise from a friend, I made excellent time in tracking down a copy of Natural Enemies for my visual consumption. Starring Hal Holbrook and directed by Jeff Kanew of Revenge of the Nerds fame, Natural Enemies takes its fleeting philosophy on the poisonous effects of marriage and applies the title quite aptly to suit the needs of the cynical Paul Stewart. A man of science and intellectualism, Paul Stewart decides to soon take the life of his three children, his wife, as well as his own, in an effort to keep the family intact while ending their domestic misery. Fear not, I haven't divulged any more information than what Kanew would have himself given. After all, Natural Enemies, more in fact, captures the presumably last day of a man whose belief in love and family has faltered to the point to allow cynicism total control. It's an act of criminal negligence that Natural Enemies isn't released on a later video format other than mildewing big box VHS tapes.

Paul Stewart is a character I find myself sympathizing with the longer the film goes on. Throughout his dreary and routine day, he encounters strange examples of human life, people as detached as he is and wish for some flicker of hope entailing what was once known as life. Stewart purchased a secluded cabin in the countryside as he had hoped the wooden beams supporting the wooden domain would collect and capture a tenderness between his family. Arguably, you could say that Paul Stewart has what is commonly referred to as the "American dream" and Natural Enemies just makes a point to show how miserable the good magazine editor is because of it. Taking a two hour train ride to work nearly every day has exhausted the already delirious housewife, Miriam (Louise Fletcher, One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest) to the point of total reclusion from her husband. This wasn't the reason for their emotional separation anymore than Miriam's previous overdosing on Ritalin was. Natural Enemies makes a clear point in sympathizing and humanizing the needs of both man and wife, until death do they part. As Paul continues about his day at the office of his scientific publication, he absently stares at his beautiful assistant Anne and questions why he's never taken her to bed. Paul and Miriam's marriage is continuously trivialized throughout Natural Enemies, neither character can give a reason for shunning the idea of divorce other than softly quipping "maybe we're old-fashioned."

The children featured in Natural Enemies aren't so much children as they are dining room parasites. Shown only in brief scenes, the children, Tony, Sheila, and Alex, make up much of Paul's festering hatred as they are shown humorously as detached as the parents are, taking time from the day to absorb cartoons, eat frozen waffles, and gorge upon junk food. Miriam is no different from the lot. She is a marginalized woman who was terrified of maturity which led to her overdosing on Ritalin, a scene I am very privy to as my own uncle overdosed off of my very same medication at a tender age. It's no coincidence that Miriam attempted suicide and was of a tortured artist archetype. It appears that most films glorify this very same ideal as the connection of women, acoustic guitars, watercolors, and prescription medication seem as in tune with media as the sexualized usage of cocaine by divas and celebrities in modern culture. The frequent bashing of marital norms and Paul Stewart's gloomy narration adds thick a layer of matrimonial destitution that never fails to keep the pacing intricate and flawless. Through Paul's malaise a door is opened into a subjective view on the phenomena of familial murder/suicides, one that doesn't blister a previously opened wound but, rather, shows the sick charm of confusion held by these men and women. I can recall the ending of Natural Enemies as an illustration of hopelessness and the insatiable spirit of depression but I can also state that the finale was quite akin to a punch in the gut. Bleak in every sense of the word and venomous to the touch, Natural Enemies makes no attempt to vilify any character, any means of release, or any reason of escape - Pure brilliance in storytelling and a film to be reckoned with.

THE DREAMS AND PAST CRIMES OF THE ARCHDUKE

Jeff Keen (1984)

Personally, I have always wondered the sort of films that might be created by a rampantly heterosexual auteur that made cinematic works in the camp-oriented spirit of great underground cinematic queens like Andy Warhol, Werner Schroeter, and Jack Smith, so naturally I was quite astonished when I discovered the rather large and undeniably singular oeuvre of English auteur Jeff Keen (Marvo Movie, Mad Love)—the unconventional son of a butler and nurse—who ultimately sired his own insanely idiosyncratic artistic universe for both he and his family to live in. A virtual trashcan renaissance man and proud proletarian bohemian that dabbled in basically every artistic medium, including graffiti before it was a hip trend among urban negroes and wiggers, and oftentimes combined said mediums in a decidedly distinct fashion that is unmistakably his own (e.g. multi-screen ‘diary films’ and ‘Expanded Cinema’), Keen was one wonderfully crazed cat that was keen on creamy cunts, classic comics, crayons, cardboard costumes, and Catwoman, among various obsessions that permeate throughout his films. Although he did not get involved in filmmaking into he was well into his late-30s, Keen managed to create no less than 70 films and video art experiments during his inordinately prolific yet little known artistic career. Additionally, despite being nearly middle-aged by the time he first picked up a super-8 camera, Keen’s films always demonstrated an innate youthful energy and excitement, as if the auteur never lost touch with his inner child. After all, there is probably no other man that created extra slimy graffiti oriented video art during his golden years like Keen’s ‘Artwar Video’ series, including such overwhelming colorful pieces as Blatzom in Artwar and Artwar: The Last Frontier. As the oftentimes bizarre titles of his films demonstrate, Keen also created his own distinct esoteric lingo. Arguably best known among contemporary cineastes for co-directing the dreamlike experimental short The Autumn Feast (1961) with Italian-born New York Beat poet and Warhol associate Piero Heliczer, Keen’s works were pretty much impossible to find until relatively recently with the release of the BFI DVD box-set GAZWRX: The Films of Jeff Keen (2009), which I recently had the distinct pleasure of devouring. After indulging in the greater portion of the director’s oeuvre, I came to the conclusion that The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke (1979-1984)—a darkly romantic cinematic nightmare of kaleidoscopic pornography, murder, sadomasochism, and zany Hitler fetishism—is unequivocally my favorite Keen flick. A perversely poetic window into Keen’s seemingly haunted yet nonetheless hyperactive unconscious, the unbelievably penetrating psychosexual cinematic horror show is a wonderfully rude yet strangely elegant reminder that pure and unadulterated creativity and spirit always trumps a big budget. In short, you will not find a film that is so hopelessly kitschy yet wonderfully creative, original, poetic despite being made on a budget of next to nil shekels.

Described by Will Fowler at BFI as, “a sort of coda to his earlier stylistic phase,” the film was made during a dark period in Keen’s life after he and his wife and perennial muse Jackie Keen (aka Jacqueline Foulds) separated, The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is a piece of intemperate idiosyncrasy and iconoclastic aesthetic raw power that might lead some viewers to suspect that the auteur is a poetic yet autistic serial killer with a nasty collection of infantile fetishes and juvenile obsessions, but of course that is what makes it such an uniquely unforgettable cinematic experience. Admittedly, my immediate interest in Keen came as a result of randomly happening upon a screenshot from the film featuring a cute brunette that I would later discover was the director’s daughter Stella Keen (aka ‘Stella Starr’), who began her own filmmaking career as a child star in her father’s films (she would later sometimes act as her father’s cinematographer). Indeed, forget Fassbinder and his dysfunctional kraut superstars, you will not find a filmmaker with a more intimate relationship with his stars than Keen, who has arguably probably paid tribute to the beauty of his wife Jackie’s bare body more than any other filmmaker in cinema history. Likewise, you will not find a filmmaker who is more at both the literal and figurative center of his films than cool cracker Keen, whose art, especially his films, are magnificently masturbatory in the best sort of way. A king of intricate art-trash who turned his entire life into a ‘Gesamtkunstwerk’ where every single film, painting, drawing, poem, graffiti tag, and performance art routine that he created seems to be an important piece in one giant esoteric psychosexual autobiogasm from post-WWII Brit beatnik purgatory, Keen is, for better or worse, the best argument for the auteur theory and I would certainly say that The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is the best introduction to his pleasantly preternatural outsider aesthetic and artistic Weltanschauung. Indeed, love him or hate him, but it is impossible to deny that Keen was a true visionary that might be best described as the Wagner of celluloid outsider art (in fact, Keen was also heavily influenced by Nordic mythology). Of course, quite unlike comparable artists like Joseph Cornell (Rose Hobart, Nymphlight) and Henry Darger, Keen seems to have led a relatively sane sex life, hence his focus on curvy women instead of prepubescent children, yet there is no denying that there is something intrinsically childlike about him, even if his daughter once described him as a, “typical nostalgic English man.”

Notably, in an interview with National Arts Trust, Keen’s daughter Stella stated regarding her father’s work, “He wasn’t interested in the commercial side of things at all, apart from a fascination with the universal appeal of popular culture. He appreciated the fact that this and certain ‘lowbrow’ forms of art, e.g. comic books, rock ‘n roll etc were easily read and understood by everyone. He liked the idea of creating a universal language. He wanted all art to be more democratic – not elitist but easily accessible to all.” While Keen’s films certainly wallow in a ludicrously lowbrow aesthetic of superheroes, broken Barbie dolls, and pornography, you would probably be hard-pressed to find working-class individuals that would prefer watching his cinematic works to the latest big budget Hollywood action flick. As for Keen's own cinematic tastes, he revealed he was far from your typical pretentious art fag when he once described the Pre-Code Béla Lugosi vehicle White Zombie (1932) as, "possibly the most beautiful film ever." Needless to say, Keen's films are the perfect antidote to the preposterously pedantic and mostly soulless Structural/materialist filmmakers that were prominent in the UK during the late-1960s through 1970s like Malcolm Le Grice, Guy Sherwin, Mike Leggett, Peter Gidal, and Annabel Nicolson, among various others, though he has somewhat strangely associated with them due to his involvement with the London Film-Makers' Co-operative (LFMC) (1966-1976). It should also be noted that, aesthetically speaking, Keen's films are more authentically subversive and anarchic than those created by the No Wave and Cinema of Transgression filmmakers that would follow in his footsteps decades later. Indeed, while Keen might have had a somewhat juvenile essence, none of his films are plagued by the repugnant philistine misanthropy or wholly pointless sexual degeneracy that is typical of the abortive flicks of glue-huffing causalities like Nick Zedd and Tommy Turner. Like Keen, fellow William S. Burroughs associate and underground British avant-gardist Antony Balch (Towers Open Fire, The Cut-Ups) also experimented with creating anarchic collage oriented films that combined lowbrow and highbrow influences, but he eventually graduated on to making sleazy feature-length exploitation films like Bizarre (1970) aka Secrets of Sex and Horror Hospital (1973) that were made for more mainstream oriented consumption. In other words, Keen never even attempted to sellout and his films only became all the more arcane and inaccessible over the decades. Indeed, aside from its potent combination of melancholy and lechery, it is hard to determine what The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is really about, though I suspect it is mainly a semi-cryptic meditation on heartbreak, hence why it features Keen's daughter portraying an artist that creates a literal broken heart via a large paper quill. Began in 1979 but not finished until 1984, the film is also notable for featuring the director's wife despite the fact that they were long separated when it was finally finished. Instead of portraying a sassy tigress or perennially smiling nudie cutie like in his earlier films, Keen's wife Jackie fittingly portrays a sensually deadly femme fatale in what was undoubtedly their last great collaboration with one another.

Beginning with an oneiric image of a classy beautiful woman that is ultimately revealed to be the front cover of MON FILM magazine, The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke then immediately bombards the viewer with a frantic combination of hypnotic imagery, including vintage stag footage superimposed over shots of a seemingly half-ruined artist's workroom that is covered with broken baby dolls and naked Barbies hanging from ropes in what is ultimately a sort of overture for the film. While Keen's daughter once described her father's film influences as being, "John Ford, Sam Peckinpah, Cocteau, Bunuel, Film Noir directors like Nicholas Ray + B Movie hero Ed Wood and so many more," the film immediately seems like a no budget Werner Schroeter flick on acid, albeit with a decidedly heterosexual focus where creepy fake boobs and pieces of cheap naked female plastic inspire unnerving erotic horrors. A sort of cine-manic micro-triptych, the short has three distinct segments that really underscore the auteur's natural affinity for cinematic subversion in all forms, including technique, structure, imagery, editing, and morality. At about the 1:30 minute mark of the film, the inter-titles "Blonde Destiny" and "A Reconstructed Thriller" appear juxtaposed with the less than solacing sounds of fighter aircrafts in what ultimately proves to be a relatively intricate micro-film-within-a-film that emphasizes the timeless relationship between killer and the carnal. Indeed, a short but sickly sweet sex noir-thriller set at Brighton train station, "Blonde Destiny" depicts the director's wife-cum-muse Jackie being both brutally threatened and embraced by a killer with a gun, as well as still photos of a naughty bitch flashing her bushy beaver in public. While watching this short segment, ones does not doubt that Keen has had many elaborate fantasies regarding the ancient art of Lustmord, which is probably not all that uncommon for a artist that has separated from his lifelong muse. Of course, Jackie's character is far from innocent, as she is depicted handling a large knife, not to mention the fact that she enjoys the tight embrace of a coldblooded killer, but I digress. Featuring both blue and purple tinted scenes, "Blonde Destiny" contains a sort of effortlessly elegant yet raw and visceral neo-Victorian elegance that cannot really be found in any of Keen's other films.

While less than 7 minutes long in its entirety, it is not until at about the 2:18 mark of the film that the main show begins and the official inter-titles appear that read, "Hitler's Double & The Dark Lady of the Sonnets" and "With the Spectres of E.A. Poe and Carol Borland in the Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke." Indeed, not only does Uncle Adolf play a prominent role in the film, but the viewer is also exposed to the youthful melancholic pulchritude of Keen's debutante daughter Stella, who looks like she could have inspired the cover-art for the Smashing Pumpkins' Mellon Collie and the Infinite Sadness (1995), as she practically bleeds a sort of highly refined feminine somberness. Before the real action begins, the viewer is exposed to still photos of a babe in bondage and war footage that echoes the director's lifelong obsession with the Second World War and how he narrowly missed taking part in the D-Day landings, which ultimately consumed many of his friends and colleagues in what would ultimately prove to be a seminal influence on both his life and art. One of Keen's rather intimate "self portrait" films like Victory Thru Film Power (1980s) and Omozap (1990-1991), The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is, not unlike many of the director's later films, a meta-artistic work that makes obsessive references to the director's own physical art pieces, including the "The Poet's Cot" and "The Book of the Film" (notably, Keen oftentimes created his own 'books of the film' that featured signed photos of the stars of the film in question). Of course, it is very telling that there is a scene in the film where the legendary Poet's Cot goes up in flames. Making heavy use of extra bright neon reds and blues that inspires ideas of romantic murder and sullen midnight walks in the moonlight, the film is indubitably one of Keen's most accomplished work in terms of sheer visuals. Likewise, the film also features strangely aesthetically pleasing neon blue stock footage of der Führer. As for Hitler's double (aka Keen in a cheap Hitler mask), he seems like a creepy hopeless romantic that has fallen from grace and has been doomed to walk for eternity with wilted roses and dead children in his arms.

In what is arguably the film's most memorable and aesthetically alluring moment, Keen's daughter Stella creates a large broken heart with a giant paper paintbrush while blindfolded. Moving very slowly like a romantically condemned somnambulist that is haunted by the memory of a lover that she lost long ago, Stella seems completely possessed in a completely tragic fashion, hence why she does not even need to use her eyes to paint literal heartbreak. Of course, one also cannot forget the image of a Keen-as-Hitler carrying around naked baby dolls in his arms in what is assuredly the creepiest yet cryptic scene from the film. In one of the more bizarrely darkly romantic scenes, a red rose is superimposed over a man threatening a cringing little lady with a large knife. In another similarly unforgettable scene, ghost-like beatniks sporting pancake lounge in a room where a fat old woman reads from the "The Film of the Book" while a dorky dude with skeletal makeup plays a kitschy violin. Undoubtedly, these ghostly characters sorrowfully echo the truly colorful players in Keen's previous films, as if the auteur is both haunted by and nostalgic about his artistic past. After wrestling with a large translucent sheet of plastic, one of the ghost girls is attacked by the macabre musician. Towards the end of the film in what is ultimately a perversely preternatural family portrait of sorts, Keen sits next to his wife, daughter, and some naked and bloody Barbie dolls while sporting a sort of makeshift metallic robot costume. In the end, the film concludes with the poet-auteur flipping through "The Film of the Book" inter-spliced with vintage pornography of a sitting nude beauty basking in her carnal glory in a scene of poesy cinematic necrophilia (after all, the nude beauty is undoubtedly long dead). In that sense, The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is the ultimate gothic horror flick of the underground.

I am not even going to pretend that I fully understand what The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is really about (after all, Keen loathed attempting to intellectualize his own work), but I do know that, aesthetically speaking, it is a gift that keeps on giving that could be played on a loop for eternity and not seem the least bit banal or trite. Of course, the same could be said about many of Keen's films, but this is one of the only films by the English auteur that emphasizes pathos over pure energetic audio-visual overload, even if it is no less overwhelming in its chaotic aesthetic fury. Although just speculation, I am fairly convinced that the film is an expression of a man that felt like he was living in a personal pandemonium where he was haunted by the past yet even more horrified about the prospect of the future. Surely, one of the aspects of the film that makes it so potent is Keen's daughter Stella's central role as a sort of magical yet melancholic somnambulist art goddess. While researching Keen and his film, I happened upon various tributes by Stella to her father where she reveals an undeniably heartwarming love, admiration, and respect for her father. In fact, I do not think it is a stretch to say that Stella is her father's greatest fan, scholar, and protégé, among other things. As Stella once noted, the essence of Keen's oeuvre can be summed up in a sentence that he wrote across one of his paintings from the 1990s that read, "All life is war and the long voyage home," which is especially true of The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke where Hitler, family members, and ancient porn stars inhabit a sort of hyper hermetic psychodramatic fever dream of the purgatorial sort that pays frenzied (anti)tribute to the perennial struggle that is life. Needless to say, the film also features one of the most bizarre and inexplicable examples of an artistic collaboration between a father and daughter. Undoubtedly, compared to the inordinate interfamilial intimacy of Keen's film(s), underground films made in collaboration with bohemian buddies like Ken Jacob's Little Stabs at Happiness (1960), Jack Smith's Flaming Creatures (1963), Ron Rice's Chumlum (1953), and Ira Cohen's The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda (1968) seems a cold, calculated, and phony as the average 1980s Hollywood action flick by comparison. In other words, The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is like the most vulnerable yet hermetic, gritty yet meticulously stylized, and domestic yet dreamlike of home movies.

Surely, one of the most stunning aspects of The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke and many of Keen's films is the amount of effort and obsessive attention to detail that was put into what are ultimately no budget cinematic experiments that were assembled in the rather restricted confines of the auteur's flat. Naturally, I was not surprised to discover that, not unlike many serious artists, Keen created for largely therapeutic reasons, or as his daughter once wrote, "For Jeff, the finest human inventions were the bicycle and the hand gun. He used his brush, pen and camera like a gun. Each tool was simply a device – a means to an end. The creative act itself was the important thing, rather than the finished work. This would explain my father's frequent habit of destroying his own work once he'd finished it; to 'rip it up and start again'. This form of collage – the cut-up re-invented story – is fundamental to Jeff's metier. His writing, film and painting transgresses all boundaries – but ultimately it always comes back to the drawn line. The artist's hand is ever present, and the artist himself is always active, often viewed in action. In Jeff's words, "It's auto-bio-graphik, not autobiography... direct projection, not an illustration... a comic strip of life, printed on semtex." Indeed, Keen turned his life into a sort of unending avant-garde cinematic comic strip where the monsters and mad scientists are the good guys, nude women act as an extra solacing Greek chorus, and creativity and destruction are one and the same. Surely, you will not find a more impenetrable yet kitschy oeuvre, as Keen is like the missing link between Walt Disney and Warhol. Likewise, Keen is probably the only filmmaker that has managed to reconcile the exquisite high-camp decadence of Herr Schroeter with the shameless schlock of Troma.

Undoubtedly, few films make you feel more like a shameless voyeur than The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke where Keen violently yet jovially shouts and ejaculates his pathologies, fetishes, and dubious obsessions with the imperative help of his entire family. Indeed, watching the film seems like something akin eating shrooms and walking in on a family engaged in a bloody psychedelic orgy involving Hitler cosplay and Bellmer-esque baby doll worship. On a somewhat less degenerate yet surely more depressing note, the countless baby dolls and appearance by the auteur's sole child in the film reminded me of Stella Keen's genuinely heartfelt eulogy to her father where she stated, "My greatest tragedy is that I wasn't able to show any grandchildren to my dad, but there will be continuity to the Keen line somehow and, certainly, I am making sure his legacy continues to be protected and promoted long after I'm gone. Also his influence continues to filter through my own work which will hopefully go from strength to strength and inspire others as well." Although the Archduke's bloodline has indubitably come to an end, his cinematic works will, to some degree, live on. Arguably cinema history's most proficient yet overlooked alchemist as a man that used literal trash and figurative artistic shit like cheap comics to create an entire elaborate cinematic universe, Keen is not only arguably the UK's greatest master of art brut, but one of its greatest avant-garde filmmaker period. After all, The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke is nothing if not the sort of film that causes the spread of cinephilia, thereupon making it the perfect flick for Keen virgins to get infected with.

THE KINDRED

Jeffrey Obrow (1987)

One of my earlier horror movie interactions I encountered was the empty VHS case sitting in my father's Ford F-150. An empty case with the words "The Kindred" etched into the cardboard, above that lie an almost disturbing image of a creature in a baby bottle. The loose definition of Kindred is "similar in quality" which in turn brings the sibling horror plot full circle. This film doesn't even need to borrow any of the terror from its infantile creature on the one sheet. I tried to revisit this film approximately a month ago, this with many of childhood favorites like Skeeter. I refrained from allowing myself to become absorbed with this picture because the beginning bored me at a time when entertainment was necessary. Rather than dismissing it like any other cruel bastard, I merely set it aside for a more reasonable time and place. Today was the day where I gave this film its final chance. John is a scientist struggling with absolutely nothing other than his own narcissistic side. He has a loving girlfriend, a generous job, and a dying mother (the kind that doesn't seem to disturb this suburban living). Upon her death bed, she lapses and remembers a horrific experiment she left at her house. She calls it "Anthony" and it happens to be his brother. Taking a team of scientists to clean and organize her experiments, Anthony is unleashed and begins killing the crew using horrific means. Anthony, on terms of 80s horror creatures, is near flawless. With Giger-esque skeletal features and tendrils/tentacles that bring to mind the Urotsukidōji era of hentai; Anthony creates nerve-shredding howls and uses his appendages to purge your every orifice as graphically detailed on a human guinea pig. This guinea pig is a female character written in the script solely to be visually experimented upon. A watermelon becomes an incubator for a prototype of Anthony. "He" uses his tendrils to penetrate your nose and creep in your flesh. On terms of 80s horror, The Kindred stands above the crowd. With no directing style, this film performs exceptionally well. Another film that has the same aesthetic approach is the infinitely worse Monkey Shines. With a similar cast and tale of scientific madness, The Kindred is highly recommended. I'm very fortunate to find that this film performs well over its extended hiatus and found a place in my mind with a memorably horrifying scene of a beautiful woman turning into a fish-woman. The Kindred is truly an experiment of "grueling terror". The film even manages to relay some creepy moments for me, which is normally unheard of in schlock horror.

THE WIZARD OF GORE
THE WIZARD OF GORE

Jeremy Kaſten (2007)

Another remake of a classic Herschel Gordon Lewis film in the early 2000's. The first remake effort was 2001 Maniacs which remarkably turned out to be an extraordinarily entertaining splatter fest with a great cast topped off with a role from Giuseppe Andrews. This one features a starring role from personal favorite Crispin Glover as Montag the Magnificent as he shreds his way through "gothic" bitches. An extremely "noir" journalist begins to suspect foul play when a magic show used to horrify audiences, by slaughtering Suicide Girls only for them to reappear fine, takes a horrifying turn when the victims show up dead by ways of similar deaths. All of this leads to a horrifying conclusion that things may not be how they seem. Lead by an all star cast of Brad Dourif, Jeffrey Combs, Kip Pardue, Crispin Glover, and Bijou Phillips, The Wizard of Gore is another reimagining of a classic that tends to out-produce the originals talent. I love the misogynist that Glover acts through the duration of the film. His stern voice, dominating stage presence, and fierce T-Bird hair-do gives him an irrevocable stature that only adds to his larger than life ego. Kip Pardue (The queer from Remember the Titans) plays a trust-fund sapping, tattooed journalist. He frequently has anxiety attacks and grows quite fond of a brown lunch bag used to alleviate stress. Brad Dourif turns a role as a man named Mr. Chong. Due to the name and the haggard appearance of Dourif, I assumed it was played by Tommy Chong. Appearances can be deceiving, and that brings me back to the storyboard of the film. This film wasn't without its faults. Much of Kip's dialogue was forced and the only real acting credit goes to Mr. Glover. As comforting as the film is, it's common to find yourself groaning as Kip tries to be a bad ass dude over the edge. Parts of the film remind me of Naked Lunch mixed with Funny Man. An incredibly dashing film that features sadistic violence, lots of Suicide Girls in the nude (Which may or may not be a bad thing), and Crispin Glover playing another horror role for money to fund his own art projects. Suffice to say, Crispin Glover admitted to not watching the film in its entirety. A bold man and a bold film. The Wizard of Gore is another great remake contender with an interesting premise which climaxes with a "twist".

Jérôme Boivin (1989)

Baxter is a late 80s French film exploring the first person narrative life of a bull terrier whose boredom has unleashed murderous conclusions, or so the DVD release states. Interesting enough, the French answer to such flyweight "pussy shit" as The Adventures of Milo & Otis is labeled a dark comedy, a genre I feel does not support the going-ons within the leashed Baxter. Displayed in 3 acts, relishing both the modern play and stages of life, Baxter experiences certain childhood with his elderly recluse, Mrs. Deville. After being shut in for quite some time and much pestering, Baxter begins to have brief, vivid flashbacks to a time before. These unnatural thoughts seem to provoke some aggression and cunning to this sweet bull terrier's coat. In typical French black comedy convention, see also: Bernie (1996), lengths of extremism are constantly touched in brief and gripping fashion. In particular, the scene in which Baxter causes an infant to nearly drown as his jealously tipped to the boiling point. It's no wonder John Waters' short-lived television show surrounding the basis of cinematic corruption featured Baxter on only the fourth episode.

Switching to the second act, Baxter could have only made the transfer to the neighboring house by staging a terrible accident. The long existential windings of Baxter pad the scenes of conscious desire. This alone creates the illusion that Baxter is a humanized canine. Certainly a film not meant for dog owners, I even find myself staring at my own and questioning the dog's intent, wondering if my next step will be my last. Successfully appealing to and aiding the Tales from the Darkside: The Movie short, Cat from Hell, Baxter is a new breed of creature film - injecting pathos and wisdom into an able-bodied companion, or what one would hope. While this film certainly brandishes elements of comedy, it consistently heeds horror of the rawest nature. Baxter presents such morbid fascination of its canine character that the dog fitting Baxter's role was by far the greatest performance of the film. Baxter's seething rants of misanthropy burned through the film as this "sharkly" creature stared out from a window looking at a life he longed for. Such sights and smells he wanted and when he finally acquired them, he hungered for something more. Just goes to show how superfluous need is.

The effect Baxter had on me was utterly terrifying and foreign. I found myself scoffing the want or will to love or kill. Once Baxter reaches "the Happy Days", I found myself breathing a sigh of relief as the slowly coiling suspense of his sheltered past began to unwind back to its original state. That happiness didn't last though. When the woman took on child, and in preparation, ignored Baxter, these feelings of contempt for both he and I returned full force. It's as if they never subsided but lie dormant within me the whole time. Concocting another devilish plan to eliminate the obtrusive, Baxter yelps too soon and spares the child's life inadvertently. However, this action thrusts Baxter into the hands of his soul-mate, a young boy obsessed with the final days of Hitler and the love he and Eva Braun shared. By now, you no doubt believe that Baxter is an incarnation of evil, I mean, who would purge to reach like-minded goals? Once Baxter meets that "someone like him", a strange masochistic bond is formed. As Baxter once was disobedient, he is now cultivated and obeys the boy's every command at the expense of his own beatings. The boy molds Baxter into an attack dog, trains him well, but slowly sheds his ruse of proper schoolboy to reveal the greater evil. By the end of the film, you'll feel sorry for ever doubting Baxter as his assertions have been mostly correct. Who really favors the weak? We all thrive off of fear, in one way or another.

By the end of the film, many questions will be asked. For instance, was the abuse given to Baxter authentic or controlled? Judging from France's history of cruelty towards animals in film (Here's to you, Carne), the answer would appear to be genuine. Given the stationary measures of camera work taken in Baxter, the dog's yelps and skittish behavior whilst being whipped and kicked is something that cannot be easily fabricated. Let this film be yet another testament to the demerit of motherhood in which Baxter also explores the jeopardy children are placed in when the female libido is in question. The gift given to Baxter is an indomitable portrait of a canine with stunningly human traits. Sexuality towards human females is bestowed and the thrill of non-consensual sex is displayed, much to his chagrin. Like your best friend, Baxter is somebody you'd love to keep close, but fear of rebellion would resonate soundly. Baxter is so much more than an Animals Attack film and retains the same harrowing element of hatred that it did the day of its release.

Jerry London (1974)

Only due to a strange blue hue emanating from a restless meteorite does Killdozer take sentience and proceed to pick off its blue collar victims one by one. Directed by Jerry London, one who could easily be considered an inner-company chameleon in the television industry, Killdozer represents all the knowledge accumulated at this point in his career while still reflecting just how much he wasn't privy to. Taking a talented cast of rugged actors, some even iconic, London weaves sick desperation through a patchwork quilt of a sci-fi tale that concerns its biggest obstacle as an "aware" and malevolent bulldozer that seeks nothing but extermination of those who awakened and fed its discourse. Now, given the material granted by Theodore Sturgeon in the form of pulp patronage, Killdozer's cinematic cousin can only tread so far before its fuel supply ceases to feed its starved mechanized workings. The reason behind Killdozer's refuse-to-die cult attitude is surely based on marquee jests. That, and Conan O'Brien's meticulous slip of the tongue. How could one not chuckle at the mere mention of Killdozer, as I had when I heard of Death Bed as well as comedian Patton Oswald before me. Film like this serves more duties as an oasis of punchlines hardly tapped than of something considered recreational annulment. These projects are crude comedy resources just waiting to be harvested, really. Had Killdozer been born with humor in mind then maybe the tale would fare differently. Nobody enjoys self-aware shit unless they've got non-conformity on the mind. With London's ability to pick up a television episode at random and direct with iconoclasm in mind - breaking down a once unique vision of primetime luster in order to continue the assembly line of case and trial comes the soul-stretching remnants of something so moderate and tasteless in execution that it becomes near impossible to categorize. Such is the case for Killdozer; an example of a film living in the shadow of its title.

Starting off strong with dead-sight of the meteorite hurtling towards earth almost clumsily, you get the implication that simple serenity wouldn't last on Earth. Civilization would occur in the future, guaranteeing not a short enough rest from the dark abscess of space. But London quickly and briefly abandons the science-fiction badge for the camaraderie and destruction-loving nature of a group of working class construction workers on a Pacific island. Soon after the opening credits are we "treated" to the origins of our catty tractor come-to-life in a quick spurt of virility as man controls machine all too forcefully. As soon as you know it, dozer blade meets rock and sets to course the vindictive nature of the non-material being while simultaneously fatally poisoning the one worker not situated behind the drivers seat. Alien radiation is the only cause of death up for assumption at this point in time. Not before long is when the subtle hysteria kicks in as we watch an often unmanned piece of machinery trample radios, tents, the basic necessities for off-civilization survival, leaving only a handful of perturbed men feigning superstition and hanging on to bare threads of earthly exceptions. After all, that's one thing that makes up the sometimes grand essence of horror/terror - those earthly exceptions - that moment in time we all submit to when nothing can be ruled out. Not to say that your lifetime will include made-for-TV sobriety or a rough tumble act of gymnastics while trying to outrun a remarkably slow killing machine, but this aspect of horror is the last thing one can really cling on to anymore for an effect - which doesn't include a vast amount of differing mutilations. That's really just medical pornography mixed with big-breasted track and field - here's looking at you, slasher films.

During this moment in the Killdozer canon is when the string of continued denial of otherworldly interference becomes tiresome and the short-supply of charm becomes noticeably absent. After witnessing friend after friend fall victim to Killdozer, always in an unbelievable and idiotic fashion (who would hide from a rampant machine in a thin pipe just begging to be crushed?) to the heavy metal plate adorned by the crawling constructor, the denizens of Killdozer's wrath continue to play transparent as to what is occurring. In such an age where people toy with the idea of world-ending disasters and various notes of apocalypse daily, one would think the feeble mind of man would collapse easier than Lloyd Kelly's - leader of the outfit and a disbeliever to the very end (I don't count his scripted acknowledgment, that bastard was too stubborn to turncoat so swiftly). Even at just an hour and nine minutes does the runtime of Killdozer weigh in deep to my dormant filmic narcolepsy. I in turn washed my sorrow away with early morning liquor which only furthered a bad day. A film that drones on as slow as Killdozer should be put to death without trial. I accept fully the label of novelty to Killdozer's name but refuse to acquiesce to the misinformed opinion that is "Killdozer rocks!" Killdozer is not hip, cool, underrated, or amazing. You will not feel better about enjoying it unless you grew up with the film and in turn, allowed it to affect your impressionable mind. Killdozer is slow and painful, a brain-death as agonizing and embarrassing as allowing your friends to know just what you've finished watching. It's not that I hate Killdozer. My negativity is more due to the fact that I hate myself for not stopping while I was ahead and playing something else, anything else. As long as something actually occurred would my spirit rest easy. Stick to snippets for this long-term poisonous experience in dry cinematic mediocrity.

DEEP END

Jerzy Skolimowski (1970)

Maybe it is just me but, with a couple exceptions like Lindsay Anderson, I find most British cinema of the 1970s to be a sad joke, especially compared to the films that were made in West Germany and Italy at the same time, so it only seems fitting that one of the best UK productions of that time period was not only directed by a foreigner from backwards Slavic lands, but was also shot mostly in Munich, Germany, not to mention being a co-production with the dreaded 'Jerry' nation. Indeed, Deep End (1970) aka Starting Out directed by Polish cult auteur Jerzy Skolimowski (The Shout, Essential Killing) is, at least in my less than humble opinion, not only the greatest and most underrated film of the British 1970s, but also one of the most uncompromisingly scathing depictions of post-Swing London/post-counterculture London ever made. A true lost masterpiece that was rarely seen upon its release, especially outside of Great Britain due to poor distribution by its distributor, Skolimowski's eccentrically erotic coming-of-age flick seems to have only gotten its due somewhat recently with the re-release of the work on DVD/Blu-ray in the summer of 2011 by BFI's BFI Flipside series, yet some great auteur filmmakers have lauded the film, with David Lynch notably remarking in a 1982 interview with NME: "I don't like color movies and I can hardly think about color. It really cheapens things for me and there's never been a color movie I've freaked out over except one, this thing called Deep End, which had really great art direction." Skolimowski's second non-Polish film following the similarly thematically themed French-language Belgian comedy Le départ (1967) aka The Departure starring La Nouvelle Vague icon Jean-Pierre Léaud, Deep End is a wickedly wonderful and waywardly wanton virtual celluloid botched orgasm where a gawky 15-year-old turd of a boy has an ultimately tragic and even deranged sexual awakening after starting a super servile job at a whorehouse-like bathroom house where he is introduced to the birds and the bees by a bunch of old and horny sexually repressed hags and a somewhat sadomasochistic young whore who exploits the naive teen's youthful crush as a parasitic means to inflate her self-esteem, as well as a means to derive a regular empowering dose of sadistic glee and petty manipulation.

Starring the Beatles frontman Paul McCartney's one-time fiancée Jane Asher (The Masque of the Red Death, Alfie) as the cruel redheaded cocktease that exploits the budding sexuality and erratic hormones of the hopelessly shy and seemingly half-autistic teenage protagonist, as well as blonde bombshell Diana 'The British Marilyn Monroe' Dors (Carol Reed's A Kid for Two Farthings, Tread Softly Stranger), Skolimowski's darkly and sardonically mirthful work makes a major mockery of the social changes that occurred as a result of the counterculture movement and so-called sexual liberation, as a film where sex, which is used as a tyrannical tool of cryptic-power, is about as sacred as a public communal urinal and where age, maturity, and professional prestige are just prerequisites for having free reign to defile a certain demographic of the general population. A sort of playfully venomous antidote to superlatively soulless Semitic teen sex comedies like American Pie (1999) and the would-be-angst-ridden dramedies of weak ass wasp wuss John Hughes, Deep End is a somewhat nihilistic quasi-arthouse shocker of the rather rude and gritty sort that almost seems to parody the then trendy 'social realist' works of its time like Tony Richardson's A Taste of Honey (1961), Lindsay Anderson's This Sporting Life (1963), Ken Loach's Poor Cow (1967) and Kes (1969), and Barney Platts-Mills' Bronco Bullfrog (1969), as it floods kitchen-sink-realism with absurdism, surrealism, and a mean and grimy yet kaleidoscopic and relatively minimalistic mise-en-scène that is misleadingly simplistic. Indeed, Deep End makes Fast Times at Ridgemont High (1982) seem like a second-rate episode of Happy Days by comparison. Featuring melodically melancholy music by Cat Stevens and raw rock by krautrockers Can and set in Soho, London, the film takes a beautifully brutal look at the dark side of sexual liberation without preaching to anyone, let alone to the choir.

Everything changes for clumsy, goofy, and exceedingly awkward 15-year-old lower-middle class Brit boy and naive high school dropout Mike (John Moulder-Brown of Luchino Visconti's 1972 epic Ludwig and the underrated 1969 Spanish proto-slasher horror flick The House That Screams aka La residencia by Narciso Ibáñez Serrador) when he decides to take a job as an 'attendant' aka 'softcore whore' at an offbeat and seemingly crumbling London-based bathhouse where sex is on everyone's mind and swimming is just a pretext for carrying out fantasies with the poorly paid employees of the dubious establishment. For example, Mike's first customer is a busty, if not somewhat overweight, middle-aged blonde (British screen alpha-whore Diana Dors) who more or less manages to achieve an orgasm by violently rubbing the teen's head into her almost terrifying tits and who rambles on about famous soccer players 'scoring' in an absurdly salacious fashion. Needless to say, little Mike is terrified by the experience with the carnally carnivorous old bird, but he soon learns from his externally gorgeous yet internally ugly co-worker Susan (Jane Asher)—a dangerously ravishing 25-year-old redhead who uses her body to get gifts and special treatment from various older men despite the fact she has a fiancé and who the protagonist will ultimately tragically fall in love with—that fulfilling the sexual desires of the patrons is an unofficial part of their job description and to "Just go along with the gag...that's all they want." When Mike's parents unexpectedly show up at the bathhouse, Susan reveals her innate jealous and bitchy character by remarking to her co-worker, "Your mother's a silly old cow!" When Mike says the same thing to Susan about her mother, she replies "She can't be. She's dead," thus revealing the potential source of her bitchy and whorish behavior. Despite the fact that Susan gets a gang of boys to beat him up and throw him into a pool, Mike more or less falls in love with her at first sight, even daydreaming about her unclad body swimming under the water after the goons hurl him into the pool. Susan loves to sadistically tease Mike and even takes a British government propaganda poster of a pregnant man (!) captioned with, "Would you be more careful if it was you that was pregnant?" and drapes it over the teen's body to make him seem like he has a baby in his belly, thus emasculating him in the process. Indeed, the more Mike demonstrates his undying devotion and infatuation to Susan, the more she ridicules and cockteases the poor lad. Of course, a young man can only handle blue balls for so long before he explodes as the shocking conclusion of Deep End savagely demonstrates.

Of course, Mike is not the only one that Susan teases, as she often ridicules a blonde middle-aged spinster cashier (German actress Erica Beer of Wolfgang Liebeneiner's 1956 film Waldwinter aka Winter in the Woods and George Seaton's 1962 war flick The Counterfeit Traitor), even hatefully stating to her, "I'm very lucky to not have your weight problem. I can eat almost anything" while showing off a chocolate sundae. In fact, Susan is such a seasoned sadist that she lures in a dog just so she can maliciously hit it over the head with a large snowball. When Mike discovers that Susan has a fiancé named Chris (Christopher Sandford), he begins stalking the two, even following them to a sleazy Red Light district X-rated theater to a screening of an pseudo-scientific sexploitation flick called Dr. Lotte Fiedler's The Science of Sex where a big bosomed blonde bimbo pseudo-doctor with a fake Teutonic accent ridiculously declares that women have "3,267 erogenic zones." While the movie is playing, Mike, who is seated behind the couple, brings a smile to Susan's face after he begins groping her tits while her unwitting fiancé watches on. Of course, being a scheming slut who derives a sadistic kick from getting her many 'gentlemen callers' in trouble, Susan eventually slaps Mike on the face, complains "this bloody bastard's touching me up," and demands that her fiancé tell the movie theater manager who calls the police. While Susan demands that there be criminal charges placed against Mike (even though she French kisses him while her fiancé is getting the manager), she and her boyfriend leave before they can be taken. After being released by the police, Mike goes by Susan's apartment and stalks her fiancé Chris when he leaves, even accusing him of trying to molest him after running into a police officer. Indeed, in a warped sort of way, Susan becomes Mike's teacher, as the lad soon begins to not only lie and cheat, but also learns that he has a masochistic streak that compels him to become more and more obsessed with a sadistic little bitch who loves to use and abuse men, even when it is not monetarily or materially beneficial.

When Mike discovers that his would-be-ladylove not only has a fiancé, but is also carrying on a lurid love affair with his ex-PE teacher (Karl Michael Vogler of Downhill Racer (1969) and Patton (1970))—a man who enjoys touching the youthful derrieres of underage girls to whom he gives swim instruction at the bathhouse—he goes berserk and pulls the fire alarm while the two are having sex in one of the bathrooms. As revenge, Susan uses the PE teacher's car to run over Mike's bike. When the protagonist's high school crush Kathy (Anita Lochner of Erwin Keusch's Das Brot des Bäckers (1977) aka Baker's Bread and the popular German detective TV series Derrick (1974-1998)) shows up at the bathhouse and attempts to seduce him by disrobing and putting his hand on her small teenage tit, Mike completely blows her off and reveals to the viewer how obsessed he has become with Susan by stating to his ex-crush, "I don't know how to explain. It's not you, you're all right. It's just that...I don't know, all that old scene seems so strange now. As if it were someone else, not me at all. I'm sorry, Kathy." Needless to say, Mike continues stalking Susan and her fiancé around the Red Light district. When Mike finds a life-size cardboard cutout of a topless woman named 'Angelica' that may or may not be Susan in front of a strip joint, he steals it and then runs inside a whorehouse after men begin chasing him where he meets a used-up middle-aged whore who tries her darnedest to take the boy's money. In fact, the whore even offers to hold the cardboard cutout of 'Angelica' while Mike screws her so he can pretend to make love to his beloved, but the bashful lad opts out and is told by the hooker he must pay her anyway because, as she complains, "you've had my time, my drink, my emotions. You made me nervous." In between stalking Susan, Mike routinely buys hotdogs from a Chinese vendor in a rather hilarious recurring scene. When Mike spots Susan get in a fight with her boyfriend and head to the subway by herself, he follows her there and confronts her with the life-size cardboard cutout that may or may not be her. To torture Mike, Susan does not deny that she is the one in the cardboard cutout, though she does state, "I'm much worse than that." After his little spat with Susan in the subway, Mike visits the bathhouse during after hours and goes skinny-dipping with the 'Angelica' cardboard cutout that night while fantasizing that he is actually swimming with Susan. Little does Mike realize that he will soon be caressing Susan's unclad body in the pool late at night, though the experience will be nowhere near as pleasurable as he imagined.

After beating his ex-classmates in a race during one of his ex-teacher's gym classes in a pathetic attempt to show off in front of Susan, Mike decides to take more desperate measures to appeal to the affection of his lecherous love interest. Since Susan has borrowed the PE teacher's car, Mike decides to place a broken bottle under the tire of the automobile. After the car receives a flat, Mike pops out from hiding and brags about his delinquent actions to Susan, who becomes so enraged that she calls the protagonist a "little bastard" and punches him in the face, thus breaking one of his teeth. As the two soon learn, it was not actually Mike's tooth that was broken, but Susan's fancy engagement ring, which proves impossible to find since the diamond that fell off the ring was lost in the snow. Ultimately, the two have the somewhat odd idea to carry the snow back to the bathhouse so they can melt it under the lights inside in the hope of finding the lost diamond in the process. While melting the snow in the deep end of the empty bathhouse, the PE teacher arrives and demands his car keys and that Susan leave with him, but she becomes enraged by his attitude and mocks his sexual prowess (or lack thereof) by claiming that he screws teenage virgins because of lack of carnal knowledge (during the scene, Susan also reveals the teacher deflowered her, hence her contempt for men). After the PE teacher leaves, Mike manages to find the diamond while Susan calls her fiancé to tell him that she will be late. When Susan gets off the phone, she finds Mike lying on the ground naked with the diamond on his tongue. Realizing that Mike wants her body in return for the diamond, Susan strips completely naked and is soon given the glistening rock without so much as having to give a blow job or even allow the boy to touch her body. When Susan notices Mike lying in a fetal position and looking so pathetically forlorn, she decides to give him a sympathy fuck, but when the virginal boy attempts to mount his fair lady, he fails to rise to the occasion. After the failed sex session, Susan calls her fiancé to tell him to come pick her up, but Mike is adamant about consummating the dream sex session that he has worked for so long to obtain and begins hassling the girl. Meanwhile, the bathhouse handyman who has no idea that Susan and Mike are there turns on a pipe valve, which begins to fill the pool with water while the protagonist becomes increasingly erratic in his attempts to coerce his love interest into coitus. When Susan begins to climb out of the pool via the ladder, Mike becomes enraged and pushes a swinging lamp at her, in the process accidentally knocking over a bucket of red paint which hits the lecherous lady in the head, thus fatally wounding her. While red blood begins to darken the pool water, Susan's blood also dilutes the water. In a rather darkly humorous scene, Mike caresses Susan's seemingly postmortem body while the Cat Stevens' song "But I Might Die Tonight" plays in the background.

Unquestionably, one would be hard-pressed to find a coming-of-age flick with such a senselessly tragic ending as Deep End which, as various IMDB.com user reviews demonstrate, has been known to irk certain less sophisticated and/or more sensitive viewers. As auteur Jerzy Skolimowski reveals in the 'making-of' featurette Starting Out included with the 3-disc Blu-ray release of the film, an American film critic asked him after a San Francisco screening of the film, "Why did you ruin such a lovely film?," as he and the various other spectators there were quite perturbed by the film's uniquely unhappy ending. Apparently inspired by a true story, Skolimowski built the storyline around the murder and not the other way around as so many misguided viewers seem to suspect. Of course, considering Deep End begins with blood dripping during the opening title screen and features various glaring shots where red blood is heavily emphasized in a symbolic fashion, the ending of the film does not really come out of nowhere as many reviewers of the work oftentimes claim (notably, the original poster art for the American Paramount release of the film makes it seem like a bloody horror film). Immaculately cast in virtually any way you look at it, Skolimowski's film owes much of its particular potency to its lead actors, especially Jane Asher's unwavering bitchy and sadistic behavior which is so believable that I was almost happy when her character dies tragically in the end at the hands of a young degenerate who probably would not be beyond necrophilia as arguably hinted at during the final shot of the film. Of course, as an upper-class woman who suffered the internationally broadcasted shame of walking in on her world famous fiancé Paul McCartney in bed with a remarkably less attractive American Jewess (American scriptwriter Francie Schwartz, who detailed the incident in her 1972 autobiography Body Count) and the suicide of her famous physician father Richard Asher—an endocrinologist and hematologist, who is best known for naming and detailing Münchhausen syndrome—in 1969, Asher was probably not in the best of spirits nor happy with men when she starred in Skolimowski's film, so one can certainly argue that her personal trauma added to the quality of her striking and undeniably unforgettable performance. Deep End is easily the best British film about 'unnatural love' featuring a seemingly Asperger-plagued antihero since Michael Powell's masterpiece Peeping Tom (1960), as well as a kindred celluloid spirit to the work of German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder with its central theme of master-slave power relations between the sexes and hysterically melodramatic depiction of the lumpenprole reacting violently due to not being able to properly articulate themselves, as well as a more handsome cinematic brother to gutter auteur Andy Milligan's London-based X-rated anti-romance Nightbirds (1970) in terms of its delightfully debasing depiction of a young man being seduced and emotionally destroyed by a sadistic older woman. Indeed, if you have a teenage son or little brother who is enslaved to their overwhelming hormones and cannot get some manipulative little floozy out of their mind, divert them from the phony Hebraic pseudo-hedonistic Shiksa-fetishizing high-jinks of American Pie and other related scatological kosher coming-of-age crud and force them to dive into the delightfully dejecting depths of Deep End.

NECRONOMICON - GETRÄUMTE SÜNDEN

Jesús Franco (1968)

To be quite honest, I have no clue how anyone could be a serious Jess Franco fanatic (indeed, to my surprise, a number of these people exist) or even be able to stomach the majority of his super sleazy cinematic works, but recently, I had the opportunity to watch one of his rare 'masterpieces,' Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden (1968) aka Succubus, and I was quite literally shocked that the film was not only of an ostensibly esoteric and surrealistic nature packed with sub-sexy S&M imagery, but also 'artistic.' By happenstance, Mr. Franco, who was at the decrepit age of 82, died the same day, 2 April 2013, as when I initially watched Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden, thus making the film experience all the more of a strangely eerie escape in 'high (s)exploitation' cinema. To make things even more interesting, Chicago Sun-Times star critic Roger Ebert – a pudgy and prissy individual who I have always had an affinity for hating to the fullest (mainly due to his poor taste in film and politics) and who once described Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden as one of the worst films of the year and "a flat-out bomb. It left you stunned and reeling. There was literally nothing of worth in it. Even the girl was ugly." – ended up finally kicking the bucket on 4 April 2013 after looking and sounding like one of the creepiest men in the world (and certainly more disturbing than any monster from a Franco flick) for a number of years after having his jaw removed due to cancer, only two days after Herr Franco – the man he loved to hate in what was nothing short of cinematic fate. A rather idiosyncratic work any way you look at it, Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden is a West German production directed by a superlatively sleazy Spaniard and produced by and starring future Fassbinder actor Adrian Hoven (World on a Wire, Lili Marleen), who would go on to play a cross-dressing Nazi cabaret singer in Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel directed by Daniel Schmid – a controversial film based on the banned Fassbinder play Der Müll, die Stadt und der Tod aka The Garbage, the City, and Death. When the kraut financial bankers pulled out, Herr Hoven called in pompous blueblood Pier A. Caminnecki for monetary support and he was more than willing to oblige as he started a romantic relationship with lead Janine Reynaud (who Franco 'discovered' in a bistro in Rome, Italy) and would also be credited as the writer (apparently, Franco only assembled a 3 page story for the film), associate producer, and actor. To add to the artistic absurdity that is Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden, Karl Lagerfeld – one of the world's most famous fashion designers, as well as head designer and creative director for the fashion house Chanel – acted as the costume designer for lead actress Janine Reynaud's wardrobe. Indeed, as a woman that was nearly 40 at the time of her appearance in Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden, Reynaud is not exactly my ideal as a stunning lead with fresh flesh that is screaming to be undressed, so

NECRONOMICON - GETRÄUMTE SÜNDEN

I can actually understand Roger Ebert's less than kind words regarding her appearance, but she is surely the sort of woman that a pack of elderly alcoholic aristocrats, not to mention Jesús Franco, would jump on given the opportunity as a sort of Peggy Bundy of the posh pervert realm. A rather hypnotic and hallucinatory hodgepodge of marvelous mansions and phantasmagorical hallways, high fashion and low horror, and nightmarish and nonlinear storytelling, Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden is the sort of film that reminds you that Europe is taking its last gasp and the only thing Mr. Franco can think to do is cinematically celebrate like a nymphomaniac toddler in a classy kraut whorehouse.

According to Jess Franco, the fictional grimoire the "Necronomicon" was not an invention of American novelist H.P. Lovecraft, but a real tome by a Jew or Muslim named Abdul Alhazred or so the director claimed in a somewhat recent DVD release of the film by Blue Underground under the American title 'Succubus.' While Franco seemed quite sure of the unverifiable real-life origins of the 'Necronomicon,' he is proudly unsure of the point of his film, admitting in an interview, "They'd say, 'I didn't understand the film.' I'd say, 'I didn't either.'" So that obviously created a legendary buzz. "This guy doesn't understand his own movie."™ Indeed, what one won't have trouble understanding about Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden is that it is about a lecherous lady named Lorna Green (Janine Reynaud) who gives simulated snuff shows for degenerate jetsetters and debauched aristos at a naughty and nefarious nightclub of the supposedly super chic persuasion. Unfortunately for her and every 'made man' that catches her fiercely frisky fancy, Lorna's manager William Francis Mulligan (Franco favorite Jack Taylor in his first collaboration with the Spanish sleaze auteur) has her under a literal Satanic spell that has transformed her into "the essence of evil...a devil on earth!" so much so that she is a succubus/somnambulist that violently murders wealthy men and women, but cannot recollect doing so. A wildly wanton woman who admits horror movies are her "weakness" and that Nietzsche will never be shunned, Lorna begins to lose her little head when she becomes totally unable to differentiate between dream and reality in a depraved and debauched maniac microcosm of the delirium-ridden sort where nothing is as it seems and a certain daunting dream logic takes possession of Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden before the viewer can even get in a single blink.

Featuring surrealist scenes of lethal lipstick lesbianism, the Bava-esque sexualization and sinister-ization of mannequins in a plastic orgy from hell, well dressed dwarfs and noble blood drunkards, quasi-beatnik mumbo jumbo about the genius of auteur filmmakers Jean-Luc Godard, Fritz Lang, and Luis Buñuel (filmmakers who apparently "never outmoded"), and the spiritual enslavement of a woman in war with her own forsaken soul, Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden is indubitably an eccentric and – dare I say – artsy piece of Euro-sleaze by a filmmaker who will probably be best remembered as a prolific horror pornographer who never swayed in transplanting his vision into sinful and salacious cinema, even if his eyes oftentimes seemed to be too badly blurred. When I first saw the Austrian arthouse splatter-punk porn flick Mondo Weirdo: A Trip To Paranoia Paradise (1990) aka Jungfrau am Abgrund directed by the late Carl Anderson about a year ago or so, I could not make sense of the film's opening inter-title "dedicated to Jess Franco & Jean-Luc Godard," but after watching Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden, it finally made perfect sense, even if the Franco film does not. As for Franco's seemingly nonsensical references to Godard in Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden, he had the following to say in a rather recent interview, "And you'll find I often refer to Godard because his new style of cinema was a discovery for me. Godard always said that a film doesn't have to be understood to be successful, and it's true. Because people...I came to the conclusion that, in general people don't understand anything. They don't understand Necronomicon. They don't understand The Adventures of Zorro, either..." If one thing was easy to understand about Franco's films, it is the domineering, if rarely delightful, eroticism that permeated throughout his work, with Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden being his first big statement of over-sexed and intrinsically incoherent celluloid that would degenerate into all out pornography about a decade later.

In a recent interview, Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden star Jack Taylor had the following to say about Jess Franco as a filmmaker, "I think Jess' best period is when he had a producer over him to control him a little bit, my particular impression is that Jess would get bored in the middle of a film and want to start on something else." Short but sweet as if directed by a less cultivated heterosexual Kenneth Anger who read the CliffsNotes on works written by the Marquis de Sade instead of the collected works of Aleister Crowley, Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden is the first film where Franco had complete artistic freedom (as he admitted it in an interview) and it certainly shows, so Taylor's comment seems rather peculiar, unless he is speaking in more regard to the Mediterranean maestro's masturbatory degeneration into pure pornography. While I cannot say I am a Franco fanatic in any sense, I can at least say I appreciate two of his films, Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden and Faceless (1988) – a totally tasteless unofficial remake of the French-Italian horror classic Eyes Without a Face (1960) aka Les yeux sans visage directed by Georges Franju. Indeed, although I may only like two of the 160+ films Franco directed during his admittedly eventful and prolific lifetime as a filmmaker of fetishistic filth, that is more than I can say about Michael Bay and Eli Roth.

VENUS IN FURS

When I originally saw Venus in Furs (1969) aka Paroxysmus aka Paroxysmos aka Black Angel directed by Spanish sleaze-auteur Jesús Franco (Vampyros Lesbos, A Virgin Among the Living Dead) about a decade or so ago, my thoughts essentially echoed that of The New York Times when they stated of the work that it, “features much inept fancy moviemaking (including echoes of “La Dolce Vita” and even “Vertigo”), some semi-nudity, and virtually endless confusion,” but over the past year I have developed a certain guilt-ridden fondness for the proudly decadent dime-store director and felt it was my duty to reexamine the supernatural sex flick that many of his faithful fans describe as his unsung magnum opus of sorts. Indeed, after my recent re-watching of Venus in Furs, I came to the bittersweet conclusion that it is one of Franco’s finest masterpieces, if not his magnum opus of the macabre, as a sort of continuation of the oneiric and foreboding arthouse horror surrealism the director codified with his startlingly pretentious yet nonetheless pleasurable pseudo-Lovecraftian work Succubus (1968) aka Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden. A virtual non-adaptation (Franco apparently changed the name of the film to cash in on the novel’s infamy) of the 1870 novella of the same name written by Austrian debauchee Leopold von Sacher Masoch (notably, the word “masochism” was derived from his name), Venus in Furs is an innately incoherent, fiercely foreboding, and freakishly phantasmagoric work of the idiosyncratic Gothic-Jazz-Psychedelic persuasion that demonstrates that somewhere in Jess Franco’s cheap-sex-absorbed Latin lunatic soul was a serious and even talented cinematic artist with a wild and wanton Weltanschauung of the largely incoherent and subconscious yet particularly penetrating sort. A work of aberrant arthouse exploitation featuring degenerate jazz, nauseating negrophilia (Franco originally intended to have a black protagonist who is in love with a white woman) and outmoded jet-set counter-culture debauchery set in a sunny and scenic beachside paradise, Venus in Furs is like Curtis Harrington’s Night Tide (1961) meets Fellini’s La Dolce Vita (1960), but with the surrealist kaleidoscopic colors of Juliet of the Spirits (1965), psychedelic paranoia of Performance (1970) directed by Donald Cammell and Nicolas Roeg, and the noir-ish jazzy paranoia of David Lynch’s Lost Highway (1997) and narratively whimsical wild woman weariness of Mulholland Drive (2001). Like a fantasy vacation in hell hosted by Klaus Kinski and haunted by Maria Rohm, Venus in Furs makes for an argument that celluloid art can be totally pointless, idiotic, incoherent, and tasteless yet potent and aesthetically tasty.

After what seems to be a narcotic-fueled all-nighter, white jazz trumpeter Jimmy Logan (James Darren), for whatever ungodly reason, has buried his trumpet and its case in the sand on a beach in Istanbul, which is akin to spiritual suicide for a musician, but he cannot remember why. On the beach, Jimmy also pulls the naked dead body of a beautiful blonde named Wanda Reed (Maria Rohm) from the surf that he fell in love at first sight with just the evening before. The night before, little Jimmy played his trumpet at a wild and crazy jet-set party at the mansion of a seemingly sinister millionaire Turk playboy (Klaus Kinski) where he witnessed said millionaire Turk playboy playing a violent game of blueblood rape and sadomasochism with Wanda, even cutting the girl's neck and drinking blood from it like a vampire. While witnessing the S&M spectacle like a true degenerate voyeur brainwashed by counter-culture mumbo jumbo, Jimmy could only think to himself, "Man it was a wild scene, but if they wanted to go that route, it was their bag," but little did he realize that the undead spirit of wanton Wanda will go on to haunt him (or maybe not), even after he makes his way for Rio de Janeiro for a change of scenery and becomes the fuck buddy of an ebony jazz singer. Despite the fact that Wanda is ostensibly dead and he has a black nightclub singer girlfriend named Rita (Barbara McNair), Jimmy becomes morbidly obsessed with the dead diva he found on the scenic beaches of Istanbul. Somehow, Wanda or someone that looks exactly like her washes up on the beaches of Rio and Jimmy becomes dead set on dedicating his spiritually-cuckolded soul to her. The minor problem is that Wanda has come back to seek revenge and kill the rich dandy-esque degenerate that tortured (and assumedly killed her) on that fateful night in Istanbul. Wearing not much more than a frisky fur coat, Wanda seduces and sacrifices her torturers, which include an obese and effete art dealer named Percival Kapp (Dennis Price), a fashion photographer named Olga (Margaret Lee), and millionaire playboy Ahmed Kortobawi (astonishingly, one is supposed to believe that Kinski is a Turk towelhead!), who allows the undead blonde beauty to treat him like a slave before killing him. After Wanda exacts her wrathful revenge killings, the Venus in Furs theme song, "Venus in furs will be smiling" plays as a declaration of 'female power'-inspired climatic victory, as if auteur Jess Franco got off to the idea of a lethal lady wasting her unhinged un-lovers. As a result of the mysterious deaths, Jimmy is eventually contacted by a cop and comes to the conclusion that Wanda really is dead, especially after discovering her weirdly inscribed epitaph. Of course, the real shocker comes for Jimmy when he realizes that he is also dead after discovering his own body washed up on the shore, with Venus in Furs concluding in a manner stolen right from Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls (1962).

A pseudo-esoteric artsploitation flick ridden with hip hedonistic excesses, degenerate jazz, and psychedelic insanity, Venus in Furs is an exceedingly eccentric expression of everything that was decidedly deplorable (minus the retarded politics) about the late-1960s, yet it still manages to be a devilishly delightful work as the jet-set backdrop makes for a strangely fitting atmosphere for this hopelessly hallucinatory horror flick. Apparently (or so said director Franco), inspired by the reckless life of white American jazz trumpeter Chet Baker, who was addicted to heroin and died in 1988 of a drug overdose (a heroin/cocaine cocktail), Venus in Furs portrays the beatnik bad boy life as a hellish haze of confusion and paranoia that no high—be it of the narcotic and/or sexual sort—can block out the misfortune and misery such a lurid lifestyles sows. Although an undeniable and unhinged aesthetic mess, Venus in Furs is as immaculate as Jess Franco's films come as a work dripping with delightful dream-like delirium, lucid yet lunatic lyricism, and perverted poetry that ultimately does not have a single dull moment. Featuring a suavely dressed Kinski getting kinky, Rohm getting ravenous and revengeful, and Darren portraying a lovelorn dullard, Venus in Furs also includes shockingly memorable acting performances, even with all the lackluster acting and poor dubbing that positively plagues the film. A cinematic work that almost proves that Jess Franco might have become an Alain Robbe-Grillet (not that Franco probably does not have more fans than him nowadays!) or even David Lynch had things worked out better for him, Venus in Furs is also a self-reflexive (albeit largely subconsciously so) work of sorts directed by a man suffering from an artist's crisis that would only be further compounded when his leading lady Soledad Miranda (Count Dracula, Vampiros Lesbos) died tragically and unexpectedly in a car wreck in 1970. Indeed, Venus in Furs is one of only a handful of examples why Franco is more than just a 'European Ed Wood' but more like a 'Spanish Ulli Lommel' who, although directing mostly worthless celluloid duds during his singularly uneven filmmaking career, directed an aesthetically malevolent masterpiece or two. Of course, my thoughts on Venus in Furs might be different today had the film been a cultural cuckold celebration of miscegenation with a black protagonist as Franco had originally intended it to be. Franco's exotic international Last Year at Marienbad (1961), Venus in Furs deserves its rightful and semi-dignified place as a rare and singular work that blurs the line between sleazy swinging 60s exploitation trash and aristocratic arthouse elegance.

A VIRGIN AMONG THE LIVING DEAD

Jesús Franco (1973)

Maybe it is because my morality has reached an all-time low and/or because I find myself less and less gravitating towards the sort of French arthouse classics released by the Criterion Collection, but the older I get, the more I seem to like a 'marginal' (emphasis on the marginal) selection of films directed by Spanish maestro of super seedy celluloid exploitation Jesús Franco (The Awful Dr. Orloff, Vampyros Lesbos). Indeed, it was only a year ago or so ago that I would not touch a Franco flick with a ten foot pole, but after rather enjoying his shockingly atmospheric and strangely artful, if not all but totally incoherent, West German 'arthouse' horror work Succubus (1967) aka Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden, as well as Faceless (1988)—a terribly trashy, loose pseudo-remake of Georges Franju's French horror masterpiece Eyes Without a Face (1960) aka Les yeux sans visage—my semi-addiction to the works of the Spanish Euro-sleaze maestro has taken on a most self-destructive form, so much so that I finally got around to watching his quasi-Gothic pseudo-zombie/vampire flick A Virgin Among the Living Dead (1973) aka Zombie 4: A Virgin Among the Living Dead aka La nuit des étoiles filantes aka Une Vierge chez les Morts Vivant aka Christina, Princess of Eroticism aka The Erotic Dreams of Christine aka A Young Girl Among the Living Dead aka Una Vergine tra gli Zombi. Originally shot under the title The Night of the Shooting Stars aka La nuit des étoiles foilantes, A Virgin Among the Living Dead, not unlike many Franco flicks, has a dubious background history, with the fact that French vampiphile Jean Rollin directed a couple pointless zombie scenes for a 1981 re-release being one of the most glaring and bizarre facts regarding the film. Described by kraut film critics Rolf Giesen and Ronald Hahn as among "The worst Movies of all Time" and featuring Jess Franco himself in the role of a blabbering retarded house servant of sorts in what is arguably the debauched director's greatest screen appearance, A Virgin Among the Living Dead is undoubtedly one of the most autistically atmospheric celluloid sleaze-fests ever made, as the Spanish filmmaker's celluloid equivalent to Ed Wood's Plan 9 from Outer Space (1959), albeit marginally more artistically merited. Featuring big black evil dildos, bloodlicking lipstick lesbians, blind undead bimbos with perky bosoms, mad maestro Franco speaking gibberish to a decapitated chicken head, and phantasmagorical lynchings, among various other things that do not typically happen in superlatively shitty horror films, let alone in real-life, A Virgin Among the Living Dead is pure Jess Franco with an aesthetically nonsensical vengeance that reminds the viewer why the cinema world will never forget the philistine Spanish 'auteur,' no matter how much we would like to.

Cutesy dark blonde Christina Benson (Christina von Blanc, who also appeared in Claudio Guerín's neglected masterpiece A Bell from Hell (1973) aka

A VIRGIN AMONG THE LIVING DEAD

La campana del infierno) has never met her estranged biological father and assumedly never will as he has died, but that all changes when the little lady is invited to a small gothic mansion in rural Spain to hear the reading of her dead daddy's will. Unbeknownst to Christina, the manor is occupied by a motley crew of macabre and misanthropic undead degenerates who do not exactly have the girl's best interests in mind. As Christina will come to find out, her father Ernesto Pablo Reiner (Swiss character actor Paul Muller) committed the ungodly mortal sin of suicide and thus his soul has become the personal property of a lily-licking succubus that goes by the fitting title "The Queen of the Night" (Anne Libert). Ultimately, the Queen of the Night wants the entire family for herself and that includes Christina. After being warned by an innkeeper that no one lives at her deceased father's mansion and that no one in their right mind would visit the apparently evil family home, Christina is taken there the next day by a babbling retarded servant named Basilio (Jess Franco) and soon feels an ominous presence at the house of horrors. Upon arriving at the mansion, Christina meets her flaming gay Uncle Howard (Howard Vernon), who is naturally less than impressed by all the voluptuous and oftentimes naked women that frolic around the highly hedonistic home. Christina enjoys sleeping without clothes, so she is in for quite the surprise when she awakes one day finds the house whore Carmencé (Britt Nichols) sitting by her bedside with her naughty bits in plain view. Christina is also in for a seductive scare when she catches a very naked Carmencé licking the vital fluids off a blind chick with crooked eyes named Linda (Linda HaStreiter) as number of of dead vampire bats fly around the room. Needless to say, Christina is also quite unsettled to find braindead butler Basilio babbling incoherent nonsense while carrying around a dismembered chicken head. If only Christina had taken heed of her dying stepmother's warning to leave the house, she would have avoided being the pawn of unhinged undead debauchees whose ultimate goal is to 'reunite the family.' Although her daddy is ostensibly dead, Christina meets her father, who has a noose tied around his neck, a number of times. Even a giant black dildo that greets her on the floor upon awaking is not enough of an incentive for her to run away while she still can. In the end, Christina is reunited with her family as she is lead to the bottom of a pond by the Queen of the Night with the rest of her accursed family members. Whether or not Christina was actually dead all along à la Carnival of Souls (1962) is a question that Jess Franco took to his grave.

Thought by some Francophiles to have been created as a way for Jess Franco to deal with the death of his screen diva Soledad Miranda (Eugénie de Sade, Vampyros Lesbos), who died in a tragic car crash in 1970, A Virgin Among the Living Dead is a film that, if nothing else aside from exposing the right bare angles of young babes, wallows in death and is set in a sort of patently perverse celluloid pandemonium that is big on atmosphere and curiously incompetent when it comes to logic and a storyline. A sort of kindred cinematic spirit to underrated American cult art horror flick Messiah of Evil (1973) aka Dead People in its depiction a young debutante coming to a strange land to 'reunite' with her dead daddy, only to be attacked by undead vampire-zombies who are under the influence of blood and evil, A Virgin Among the Living Dead is a totally tasteless artsploitation abortion that ultimately, at least as far as I am concerned, redefines the phrase 'guilty pleasure' in terms of its propensity to emphasize sensual style over substance as a macabre yet titillating mood piece. Simultaneously onieric, ominous, and orgasmic, A Virgin Among the Living Dead is a hard film to look away from, even if it might give you brain damage or some sort of temporary psychosis. Featuring absurd dialogue like, "Even the flowers have the stench of death," A Virgin Among the Living Dead is the film that I will always blame for keeping my softcore Jess Franco addiction going and my taste in cinema from further degenerating. As for dopey diva Christina von Blanc, something tells me she was far from a virgin at the time of shooting A Virgin Among the Living Dead, but, of course, that is one of the appeals of a Franco flick.

FEMALE VAMPIRE

Jesús Franco (1973)

After being routinely pathologically pestered by a certain proudly pedophilic British rodent and unwavering Heather O'Rourkephile to see (and, of course, review) the film, I finally decided to give in and view the French-Belgian co-production Female Vampire (1973) aka La comtesse noire aka Bare Breasted Countess aka Sicarius - the Midnight Party aka The Black Countess aka The Last Thrill aka Insatiable Lust aka The Loves of Irina aka Yacula aka The Bare-Breasted Countess aka Lustful Vampires in Sperm Frenzy aka Les Avaleuses aka The Swallowers aka Erotic Kill aka Erotikill - Lüsterne Vampire im Spermarausch directed by belated Spanish Euro-sleaze maestro Jesús "Jess" Franco (Marquis de Sade: Justine, Vampyros Lesbos). I also decided I needed to see the film after my girlfriend become enamored enough with its visuals to edit together a music video featuring the film's amorous anti-heroine bathing in blood in a Countess Elizabeth Báthory-esque fashion. Made at the end of what the writers of Obsession: The Films Of Jess Franco (1993) would describe as the director's "Peak Years" (1970-1973) and on the brink of his "Porno Holocaust Years" (1973-1979), the film is notable for featuring the 'official' debut of Lina Romay as Franco's perennial muse (although Romay appeared in some of his earlier films, it was not until she appeared in The Female Vampire that she had really arrived, made an impact on the Euro-horror realm, and took over Franco's oeuvre). Released in no less than three different cuts—the neutered 'straight' vampire cut titled La comtesse noire aka The Black Countess, the softcore horn-dog horror show titled La Comtesse aux seis nus aka The Bare Breasted Countess, and the extra-sloppy and sleazy hardcore porno version Les avaleuses aka The Swallowers (a Teutonic hardcore cut was also released under the curious title Lüsterne Vampire Im Spermarausch)—Female Vampire also more or less marks the beginning of Franco's career as an out-and-out pornographer, which is a label that he adamantly rejected, later using Japanese auteur Nagisa Oshima's controversial yet shockingly prosaic arthouse work In the Realm of the Senses (1976) as a comparison to his bloodsucker 'erotica,' stating in an interview featured in Danny Shipka's book Perverse Titillation: The Exploitation Cinema of Italy, Spain and France, 1960-1980 (2011), "there are lots of hardcore shots but nobody would say 'Oh, it's a porno film!' No. It's a very important story. I felt in [Female Vampire] I did the same thing. There was a need to show it, like you must show how Dracula sucks his blood, you need to show how this Countess sucks the semen." In Franco's film, the eponymous high-class vamp tramp is a mute yet opulent orgasm-driven and somnambulist-like post-jet-set countess who enjoys sunbathing(?!), blood-and-semen-sucking of both the penial and vaginal sort, and meeting with the press in between living the cursed life of eternal luxury and lechery. As a work about an unhinged undead dame who likes dining on dicks and refuses to have children because she is a self-loathing blueblood who wants to be the last of her Teutonic vampiric kind, one could argue that Female Vampire is an allegory for the suicide of the European aristocracy and Europe in general, but that would probably be giving Franco too much credit, as the auteur clearly only has eyes for his muse's muff-ridden meat-curtain, supple tits, sensual lips, sizable derriere, provocative stares, and not much else, including most aspects of classic vampire mythology. Indeed, Franco's flick may not big on plot, storyline, character development, or general coherence, but if you wallow in amorously atmospheric bloodsucker flicks, Female Vampire makes for a singularly delectable celluloid affair of relatively idiosyncratic cinematic incompetence that puts the work of Jean Rollin to shame.

Opening with the certainly stunning anti-heroine, Countess Irina Karlstein (Lina Romay), appearing amongst a misty fog wearing nothing but a black cape and matching leather belt in a shot that ends with zoom-ins of the character's eyes, tits, and bushy beaver (which I had initially mistaken for a bikini or thong!), Female Vampire immediately lets the viewer know that they are about to endure the erotically eerie "Lina Romay Exhibitionist Show" and auteur Franco does not care what the viewer thinks, but he is probably confident that if you're male you will get a hard-on and if you're female you might get a little bit wet. At the beginning of the film, the Countess approaches a gawky blond Aryan farmboy who awkwardly asks her, "Can I help you? What do you want?," takes his hand, and begins performing fellatio on him against a chain fence that climaxes with the man screaming after the sensual succubus bites on his cock and sucks out his blood, semen, and life, thus killing him. Unquestionably, Female Vampire is a film that takes the French phrase "La petite mort" (aka "the little death") quite seriously and most literally. Meanwhile, a blond playboy named Baron Von Rathony (American exploitation/Franco regular Jack Taylor, who went on to have small roles in mainstream productions like Milius' Conan the Barbarian (1982) and Polanski's The Ninth Gate (1999))—a fellow that looks like a cross between AIDS era John Holmes and Franco Nero—hears the scream of the ill-fated farmboy who has just had his cock sucked dry, but little does he realize that he will eventually fall in love with the killer cocksucker. While Countess Irina literally lives to do deadly things to dude's dicks, she is not exactly happy with her erotically evil existence, or as she narrates while cruising around the countryside in her virtual batmobile, "Today is the 22nd of February and only after a few hours of my being in Madeira, I have already killed a man. I earnestly wish an end would come to this bloody race that I am forced to run on this earth through the ages. Alas, I am a prisoner of the curse of that weigh heavily on the Karlsteins. A malefic influence forces me to commit these heinous crimes." Naturally, the Countess' carnally killer existence becomes further tested when she falls for a human, albeit of the fellow aristocratic sort.

Madeira where one of her family's chateaus is located with her loyal male servant, who is also a mute and seemingly half-retarded and he helps his master procure men with meaty members. Although a vampiress, Countess Irina enjoys sunbathing and one fine sunny day while doing so at the pool of the hotel she is staying out, she is approached by a journalist named Anna (Anna Watican of Jean Rollins' The Demoniacs (1974) aka Les démoniaque), who interviews her for all the major newspapers in America and Europe. During the interview, the Countess nods "no" when asks if she plans to have children and then nods "yes" when asked if she wants to be the last descendant of the glorious Karlstein aristocratic dynasty. Meanwhile, a forensic scientist named Dr. Roberts (played by director Jess Franco under the somewhat humorous Germanic pseudonym 'Jess Franck') tells a police inspector that a male murder victim that he performed an autopsy on was "bitten in the middle of an orgasm...and the vampire sucked his semen and his life away," but the no bullshit cop contradicts him and remarks that the killer had to be either a sadist or madman and certainly not some fanciful supernatural bloodsucker. Somewhat angry, Dr. Roberts says to the inspector, "believe what you want...I refuse any discussion with you. You couldn't possibly understand it in any event" and then leaves to hunt down a mysterious blind dude named Dr. Orloff (played by French film critic, film editor, and sometimes pornographer Jean-Pierre Bouyxou) to help him, as he is the son of his "best friend and best teacher" and surely inherited his father's "genius." Upon meeting with Dr. Orloff, he immediately realizes that he has found an equally enthusiastic comrade who wants to prove the presence of a nubile female Nosferatu. As Dr. Orloff tells his comrade, he is in Madeira to discover, "the sources of good and evil." Unfortunately for Herr Roberts, Dr. Orloff is not nearly as sanguivoriphobic as he is and will ultimately prove to be an unreliable partner in supernatural anti-crime.

On top of fellating men to death, Countess Irina is a naughty necrophile who fornicates with the corpses of her victims after sucking them dry of their vital fluids, which she proudly does to a seemingly queer hotel hustler with a curly mullet who goes to her room after her loyal mute servant passes him a note telling him to come to her room. No prude, Irina is also a lethal lily-licker who chows on women's carpet until they are licked dry in a most deleterious fashion. Indeed, after 'glamouring' a female victim by sneaking up on her in her bed and staring at her in a lecherous fashion while licking her lips, the Countess performs cunnilingus on the forsaken female until she drops dead and then proceeds to masturbate over her corpse in a triumphant manner. The Countess' masturbation techniques must have supernatural reanimating properties, as Irina makes the female victim comeback to life (strangely, she is the only one of Irina's victims to come back to life, as if the bloodsucker is some sort of undead feminazi who will only give females the accursed gift of eternal life) and has her follow her in a foggy forest like an entranced automaton-like porn star. Later while hanging around her hotel, the Countess is approached by her future love interest Von Rathony, who absurdly asks her, “are you not a ghost too, one of these strange beings gifted with magic power?” but of course, being a mute, she does not answer, but she does seem intrigued with the Baron’s dubious charms. A born sadomasochist who also sometimes enjoys being on the receiving end of pain, the Countess also goes to an underground S&M club where she has opulent bulldykes whip her unclad body. Of course, the Countess also goes to the club as a means to procure fresh meat and to ultimately drain the head dominatrix, who has a massive bush that seems like it would put even the average Arab woman to shame, of her precious vaginal secretions.

Upon taking her through a daytime stroll through the volcanic mist of the island, Von Rathony declares his love for the Countess and says their meeting “must be destiny” as he purportedly prophesied it in a piece of melodramatic poetry he had previously written. After Von Rathony touches her cold black dead heart with his contrived poetry, the two begin to make love, but the Countess eventually runs away and sobs hysterically upon latching onto and embracing a nearby tree, but her man ultimately forgives her exceedingly erratic, flaky, and stereotypically female behavior. Meanwhile, Dr. Orloff digs into the snatch of the dead dominatrix and concludes that the woman was a victim of a vampire after observing that, “two canines pierced the lips and deformed the clitoris,” but unlike Dr. Roberts, he welcomes the existence of undead bloodsuckers and has no intention of hunting down the vamp. When Countess Irina takes Von Rathony back to her family home, the latter remarks, “what a strange house...it looks like a tomb” and then more or less tells his lover that he knows that she is a vampire but he doesn’t care and just wants to be with her, no matter what the cost. The Countess loves Von Rathony so much that she manages to fellate and fuck him without killing him in the process. Unfortunately for him, the Countess decides to give Von Rathony a second blowjob during their over-extended carnal session that inevitably results in the fang-fucker’s ill-fated death via fatal semen-sucking. After killing her beau, the Countess thinks to herself while driving in her luxury automobile, “Why? Why? Yes, why, all this time, this never-ending time...the hours of sorrows, of pleasures, of solitude and fear in the cold coffin lost deep down in the mausoleum. My implacable destiny has led me to a wonderful being who has also become a victim. I have been his judge and involuntary executioner, for nothing can stop of the march of destiny.” After a failed blackmail attempt by Dr. Orloff, who proves to be a two-faced scumbag of the somewhat Renfield-esque sort, the Countess decides to relax by engaging in the age-old aristocratic pleasure of bathing in blood. Meanwhile, after being denied entry into the Countess’ home by her loyal half-retarded servant, Dr. Roberts decides to sneak in and watches voyeuristically as Irina basks in blood. After killing her servant, Dr. Roberts also goes to kill the Countess, but he becomes so enamored with her blood-curdling pulchritude that he just can’t do it. Luckily, the fatally seductive vampiress perseveres in the end like all self-respecting vampires should.

If I did not know better, I would say Lina Romay was quite the trooper for enduring the ostensible abuse of Franco's brazen brand of filmmaking, but as the actress has revealed in various interviews, she was a born exhibitionist who lived to flaunt her curvy Catalan flesh. If I were to speculate what the subtext of Female Vampire is, if any, it is that the titular anti-heroine is a metaphorical figure representing the seemingly accursed archetypical loveless whore who leaves many victims in her reckless path of fleeting carnality, even destroying the one and only man that she grows to love, but other than that, the film is not much more than a strikingly atmospheric, eccentrically erotic, and semi-arousing showcase of Franco's favorite lady in a highly expressively and sensually stylized celluloid form. Indeed, Romay IS the 'Female Vampire' and Franco knew the actress well enough to capture her real essence on film and I can only assume that he decided to make her character mute for reasons other than just because the actress could not act and/or was not particularly proficient at memorizing her lines, as her cruelly carnal character manages to express more with a mere seductive stare than most mainstream actors can communicate while delivering an entire monologue. Of course, Franco's obsessive personality was not only regulated to Romay, as he was arguably more enamored with filmmaking to the point where he suffered withdrawal symptoms when he was not directing, or as Female Vampire co-star Monica Swinn stated of Franco in an interview in the book Obsession: The Films Of Jess Franco; "He's out of his mind...well, that's one way of describing him, coming from me, it's a compliment. He is totally wrapped up in his own trip, in his own private world, and everything that comes out of it is nice. All he ever thinks about is the cinema," adding, "Jess was very obsessive: he'd always use things he'd used before, like stories of women in prison, with the same characters put in different places, even using the same names" and "If he hasn't got a camera in his paws, he feels quite ill [...] Sometimes I get the impression that Jess makes films the way a small boy plays with a train set, with miniature carriages instead of great big ones...and every now and then he sets up an accident. When you walk along the street with him, he never stops filming with his hands. He has an absolute need to film, even if it all is cheap shit; he can't stop himself." The fact that Franco continued directing films until his death in early 2013 even though he hadn't directed a decent film in decades just goes to show he must have been suffering from Asperger's syndrome or some other similar autism spectrum mental illness like the British human hamster that recommended I watch Female Vampire. Ironically, it seems the filmmaker was at his best when not directing pure pornography as especially demonstrated by the hardcore cut of Female Vampire, which only slows down the film with its absurdly anti-erotic close-up scenes of Romay sloppily sucking on various aesthetically displeasing cocks.

Essentially comprised of a series of extra devilishly titillating tableaux punctuated by a couple scenes of dialogue and narration that barely hold the storyline together, Female Vampire is unapologetically sleazy and hyper hypnotic pseudo-arthouse heteromania at its most brazenly self-indulgent, as if Franco just made the film so he could later screen it for himself from time to time in the comfort of his own living room and nostalgically reflect over the good old days when his muse was at her physical and sexual prime. Of course, one can only guess how many people that Franco was able to provide a masturbation aid for with his wickedly wanton and strangely transcendental bloodsucker flick. It also does not hurt that the film is, visually speaking in a manner not unlike early Werner Herzog flicks like Heart of Glass (1976) aka Herz aus Glas and Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979), rather romantic and exceedingly ethereal, with a number of the outdoor landscape and misty forest scenes even resembling paintings by Teutonic Romantic painter Caspar David Friedrich, who was not surprisingly famous for his paintings of Gothic ruins. While his films may lead some to think Franco was an unabashed philistine, it could not be further from the truth, with the auteur naming Fritz Lang, Luis Buñuel, Jean-Luc Godard, and Orson Welles (who he once worked with), among others, as major influences on his work. Unquestionably, the reason why Franco and his similarly perverted and technically inept cinematic kindred spirits Ed Wood and Andy Milligan still have relatively faithful cult followings today is that, unlike the average Hollywood hack who blows tens of millions of dollars on films that just plain blow, their films feature distinct and highly personalized visions that are readily identifiable by anyone familiar with their work whereas mainstream filmmakers tend to be, at best, vapid technicians and, at worst, cheap and willing whores who seem to approach filmmaking like a telemarketer approaches selling junk or a drive-thru clerk approaches asking customers if they would like fries with their orders. As someone whose various ex-girlfriends bear a superficial resemblance to Romay and as a fellow that tended to be solely attracted to almost solely pale girls with dark hair and curves for a fairly long time, only to realize it was a sort of fetish after getting with a lady whose pubes were the same color as mine (and who, I must proudly confess, is curvier than the most exotic of Mediterranean divas), Franco's film proved to be an extra bizarre and even somewhat horrifying experience for me. Indeed, to me, Romay is a sort of erotic caricature from a bygone era in my life, thus lending an extra added personalized layer to Female Vampire that gives the film a special resonance for me that made me appreciate the work more than I probably should have, as if a segment of my past was transported to an early 1970s Portuguese resort spot inhabited by strange half-braindead sub-beautiful people and haunted by a more literally vampiric version of one of my ex-lovers. In that regard, out of all the film's various alternate titles, I see 'Female Vampire' as the perfect name for Franco's fiercely fetishistic flick.

SINFONÍA ERÓTICA

Jesús Franco (1980)

While I certainly have no plans to watch every single one of the director's 160 or so films as the great majority of them are probably insipid celluloid swill of the totally meritless and pointless sort, I am fairly confident that Sinfonía erótica (1980) aka Symphonie érotique aka Erotic Symphony is the most cultivated, effortlessly artful, entrancing, ethereal, dignified, and all-around 'immaculate' film that Spanish Euro-sleaze maestro Jesús Franco (The Awful Dr. Orloff, Der Heiße Tod aka 99 Women) ever deliriously dreamed up with his particularly keenly perverse mind and famously lecherous libido. The second and best of three films that the director liberally adapted from the de Bressac episode of the classic 1791 Marquis de Sade novel Justine, or The Misfortunes of Virtue aka Les Infortunes de la Vertu (the other two films are Plaisir à trois (1974) aka How To Seduce a Virgin and Gemidos de placer (1983) aka Moans of Pleasure) and a work notable for featuring most of 19th-century Hungarian-German Romantic composer Franz Liszt's Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (1839-1861), Franco's undeniable celluloid symphony is a morally odious yet hyper hypnotic piece of aristocratic arthouse sleaze that manages to be as opulent and otherworldly as it is obscenely orgasmic, which is no small accomplishment, especially for the madly amorous Mediterranean mensch that lovingly assembled it. The superlatively sordid and scabrous tale of a bisexual blueblood libertine who conspires with the two younger members of his unhinged ménage à trios to kill his stunning yet sadly sex-starved wife as pleasantly played by the director's Catalan muse Lina Romay after she returns from a long stay in a mental institution, Sinfonía erótica is a truly dark and decadent romance of the quasi-Gothic horror sort with a tiny yet nonetheless superlatively sacrilegious smidgen of nunsplotation debauchery that reminds the viewer why Franco was indeed an 'artiste' of sorts, even if he was also responsible for directing some of the worst films ever made and more or less deserves his reputation as the 'European Ed Wood.'

More Francoean than Sadean and more erotic than pornographic, the film fully demonstrates the director's background as a musician via its endlessly music-filled landscapes and thankfully it does not wallow in the degenerate jazz that the filmmaker played, as a work that makes full use of Liszt's Second Concerto with Franco's own strangely soothing synthesizer score to the point where hysterical mental illness, truly evil extramarital deceit, sadomasochistic sexual savagery, and even nun rapes become rather rapturous and orgasmically oneiric experiences of the exceedingly aesthetically enthralling and hyper hypnotic sort. Indeed, forget Franco's West German jet-set arthouse nightmare Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden (1968) aka Succubus—an intriguing, if not innately incoherent, work that somewhat strangely namedrops seemingly unlikely influences like Fritz Lang and Jean-Luc Godard (Franco must have been a huge

Le mépris (1963) aka Contempt fan—or his psychedelic Leopold von Sacher Masoch (non)adaptation Paroxismus (1969) aka Venus in Furs, Sinfonia erotica is the auteur at his most brazenly aesthetically decadent and indulgent. Notably, like Venus in Furs, the film bears a superficial resemblance to Alain Resnais and Alain Robbe-Grillet's esoteric collaborative effort Last Year at Marienbad (1961) due to its dreamlike essence and extravagant château setting and baroque architecture and sculptures, albeit Franco's film is undeniably more erotic and coherent. Also notable for being a rare Franco flick featuring explicit fag content and not just the superficial 'Sapphic' scenarios that are quite typical of his work (not that the film does not feature some iconic 'cunning linguist' scenes between Romay and a young lady), Sinfonia erotica would probably be deemed 'homophobic' today as the antihero is depicted as a sadistic bisexual misogynist and unrepentant wife-abuser who, among other things, fiendishly grabs his male negro servant's ass and brags to his undersexed wife about how much pleasure his twink boyfriend gives him while said boyfriend passionately fellates him.

It is the golden age of blueblood degeneracy in old world Europa and Martine de Bressac (Lina Romay)—a wild and wanton yet cutesy big bosomed faux-blonde whose ample mammary glands are only rivaled by her similarly grand eyes and lips who moves around like a sensual somnambulist hunting for a rock hard cock that she will certainly never find—is the somewhat estranged wife of an overtly evil and decidedly debauched aristocrat named Marqués Armando de Bressac (Armando Borges in his sole film role) who has just gotten out of a mental hospital after staying there a number of years as a result of schizophrenia provoked by hereditary syphilis. While her rather empathetic caretaker Dr. Louys (Albino Graziani of 1982 'classic' Oasis of the Zombies aka La tumba de los muertos vivientes) drives her back to her ancient luxury estate in a carriage, Martine pseudo-poetically asks herself, "Are the leaves newly colored by the summer sun? Or are they the same ones as when I left? I know every leaf that fell in the Autumn...fell like pieces of my life. I don't know how much time has passed since I left the house. And I don't know why my husband sent me away." Dr. Louys lets Martine know that it has been years since she was locked up in the loony bin and then expresses his doubt over the Marquis' decision to have her institutionalized in the first place, to which she replies with the rather confused remark, "Everything will go the way you and I planned. Everything will go as he and I planned...Everything conforms to our desires. May luck be with us...and if we are good and have faith in God...Then heaven will accept us. Heaven! What is the point? And where is hell? Who...really knows what evil is? And who can truly judge? Where does the day end...And where does the night begin? When does pride start and self-esteem end? What is sin?" If one thing is for sure, it is that Martine's husband is a conspiring debauchee with exceedingly unsavory intentions and he is certainly a threat to his younger wife's very existence.

SINFONÍA ERÓTICA

Among other things, the Marquis Armando de Bressac is carrying on a lurid love affair with a young curly-haired twink named 'Flore' aka 'Flower' (Mel Rodrigo of Franco's Slave of Crime (1987) aka Esclavas del crimen and Ópalo de fuego: Mercaderes del sexo (1980) aka Two Female Spies with Flowered Panties), who turned into a homo after his parents dressed him up in dresses as a child and showed him off in front of their friends. Armando and Flore's homo twosome turns into a bisexual threesome after the two depraved androphiles find a bloody nun named Norma (Susan Hemingway of Franco's legendary nun-exploitation flick Love Letters of a Portuguese Nun (1977) aka Die Liebesbriefe einer portugiesischen Nonne) on the latter's estate and make her the third member of their morbid little ménage à trios. Assumedly because she has been irreparably defiled and can no longer devote her body and mind to god, Norma begs Armando to let her stay at his less than humble abode, even after she awakens to the debauched aristocrat and his butt beau Flores fingering her bloody post-rape meat curtain. Meanwhile, Martine's extremely loyal servant Wanda (Aida Gouveia, who also starred in Love Letters of a Portuguese Nun, as well as other Franco works like Swedish Nympho Slaves (1977) aka Die Sklavinne) warns her that her husband Armando is carrying on a lurid fag love affair with Flore, who she states "seems to be sent by the devil" and speaks of "ancient morality" as if he is a vampire. Of course, Martine is in denial that her husband is a homo, stating to Wanda that, "my husband is not a homosexual" (of course, she is only half right). To make matters worse, Martine is sex starved (or as she states herself, "I must make love or I'll go insane") because her discernibly deranged hubby will not hump her, so instead she fingers herself and subsequently sucks on her finger as if sucking on her spouse's scat-covered cock. In one particularly disturbing scene, Martine walks in on bitch boy Flore giving her husband a blowjob and when Armando notices his wife meekly peeping on him, he sinisterly yells, "Martine. Why are you hiding? I know you're there. Come and watch! Maybe you'll learn something from my friend. He knows how to give me pleasure...what are you waiting for?" Of course, Armando has more pernicious plans for Martine than merely mocking her with the fact that he is preternaturally penetrating the man-cunt of a pansy pretty boy.

One evening, Martine walks in on lapsed nun Norma in a spare bedroom and becomes so infatuated with the young lady's appearance that she begins immediately chomping on the strange girl's cunt, but the fun soon ends when Armando and his boy toy Flore walk in on her dining on their mutual lover's naughty bits. When Armando pulls his wife off of Norma, Martine reacts hysterically by grabbing his cock and begging him to fuck her but he does not oblige her and merely maliciously mocks her. When Armando brings his two lovers to eat dinner with Martine, he emotionally tortures his wife by discussing her schizophrenia-based lunacy, stating of her body "With skin like old, withered fruit...Skin like alabaſter. A sweet fruit. Smooth. But be careful...it's full of worms," and pulls her tender tits out for all the gawking guests to see. After dinner, Armando has a threesome with his lovers and then asks Norma to help him 'dispose' of his wife by putting a "strong stimulant" in her milk, stating, "You must help us. Our life will be heaven when she's dead. And besides, all of us will be rich." Luckily, Martine's loyal maid Wanda overhears this conspiracy. Meanwhile, Martine has a freakout after achieving orgasm while fondling her own tits and goes back to see Dr. Louys, who Armando later attempts to bribe by offering him an aristocratic title if he helps cover up his wife's future 'accidental' death. Meanwhile, Armando's young lover's Flore and Norma proclaim their undying love for one another and decide to later run away from the Marquis, stating of him, "You know...we really hate him to death." Of course, the two agree to wait around for the riches they hope to receive after helping to kill Martine.

After Armando strangles Wanda to death upon learning that she told Dr. Louys of his intention to kill his wife, Martine seems to have no one to protect her and becomes completely vulnerable, especially to the lethally lecherous charms of Norma. One day, Martine comes into Norma's room early in the morning after drinking some assumedly poisoned milk and begins performing cunnilingus on the once-holy unholy young woman and before the two know it, Armando and Flore wander in and a foursome begins. Indeed, for the first time in the film, Armando begins penetrating his wife just as she has begged several times before throughout the flick and just before the foursome almost turns into an interracial fivesome when a negro servant named George (played by Philippines-based production manager George Santos) abruptly walks into the room, Martine drops dead during mid-coitus, or so it seems. Naturally, Armando and his lovers mock Martine by chanting, "Poor Martine. She's dead. Poor Martine" over and over again. After Martine's death, Armando becomes jealous of Flore and Norma's love affair and states to his negro servant George when he asks if he is surprised about the fact that his boyfriend has found true love with a woman, "Flore is a child. He doesn't have any understanding of evil nor of morality. But you don't have a right to judge him." Predictably jealous of the fact that his beloved boy toy has discovered true love in female form, Armando kills the two by psycho-sexually penetrating them both with a sword while Flore is penetrating Norma with his cock. Unlike with Martine, Armando is rather upset after killing his beautiful man-muse Flore and begins sobbing like a baby next to his and Norma's still joined corpse. Needless to say, Armando is rather shocked when his dead wife Martine appears wearing an opened purplish-pink robe exposing all her naughty bits while he is sobbing and he asks his assumedly undead wife, "You! Are you returned from Hell? Have you come to help me or participate in my destruction?," to which the sensual phantom replies, "I've returned to see you die," adding, "...and now you'll pay once and for all for everything!" Somewhat surprisingly, Armando thanks her for coming and begs for death, yelling to Martine, "Why are you waiting? Do it!

SINFONÍA ERÓTICA

Do it!” Of course, Martine obliges Armando and after killing him, she meets up with Dr. Louys, who states to her, “My love, have courage. Life begins again for you.” As it turns out, Dr. Louys plotted to have Martine fake her death, so they could later seek revenge against Armando and run away together with the Marquis’ wealth. As Dr. Louys states to Martine after revealing that he has already written Armando’s death certificate, “you must forget these old walls and this sad story.”

A raunchy and risqué yet elegant erotic dark romance that indubitably proves that auteur Jess Franco was somewhat surprisingly one of the most cultivated pornographers of his time, Sinfonía erotica is surely an unsung masterpiece as far as Euro-sleaze erotica is concerned. Indeed, in its depiction of a tragic ménage à trios and titillating Teutonophilia, Franco’s flick is certainly superior to Italian auteur Liliana Cavani’s similarly themed arthouse work Beyond Good and Evil (1977) aka Al di là del bene e del male aka Seeds of Evil, which is a costume piece that depicts a fictional threesome between German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, white Russian psychoanalyst and perennial muse Lou Andreas-Salomé, and German-Jewish philosopher Paul Réé, with the latter of whom being absurdly depicted as dying as a result of a homosexual gang-rape as committed by a group of sexually virile lumpenproles who demonstrate the power of their Teutonic sexual prowess over their victim’s impotent Judaic intellectualism. Unquestionably, aside from Franco’s shockingly artsy fartsy direction as immaculately accented by Franz Liszt’s Second Concerto, Sinfonía erotica owes a large portion of its pleasantly perverse potency to Lina Romay’s audaciously amorous no bullshit performance, as she seems as genuinely unconsciously hysterical as she seems hyper horny. Indeed, one certainly gets the feeling while watching the film that the filmmaker worships his muse, whose unclad body becomes a virtual character of its own in the film. Despite the film’s almost high-camp aristocratic setting that oozes with rot and decadence, bestial and almost satanic homo-sex scenes, and exceedingly effete wardrobe and quasi-male characters, Sinfonía erotica is the work where Franco—the hyper-heterosexual swarthy Spaniard—most reinforces his rampant heterosexuality by depicting an over-the-hill bisexual blue-blood dandy bastard who sinisterly betrays his rather beautiful wanton wife as the ultimate highly heinous and exceedingly evil antagonist, which is certainly a more nuanced way of declaring his love of lecherous women and hatred of homophilia than featuring an unclad pseudo-diva being haunted by a ghostly big black dildo like he did in his classic uniquely unnerving zombie flick A Virgin Among the Living Dead (1973) aka La nuit des étoiles filante. Indeed, with this film, Franco almost seems to channel the decadent poetry of Italian proto-fascist poet-warrior Gabriele D’Annunzio, who I am sure would find something to like about the work due to its dapper celluloid decadence, though I do not want to give him too much credit. Indeed, Sinfonía erotica is ultimately the film that made me realize that I am more of a Franco, as opposed to Jean Rollin, kind of guy when it comes to sloppy quasi-artsy horndog Euro-horror.

BLOODY MOON

Jesús Franco (1981)

Jess Franco is perhaps the most prolific Spanish director alive. With over 50 pseudonyms and over 180 films under his belt, he has created art, shit, shit art, and any other possible combination of the sort. His specialty is relentless sexual situations entwined with graphic violence and horror. He is one of the few Spanish film makers who've adapted giallo into a Spanish form and created a mix of slasher/erotica/giallo out of it. If you haven't seen a Jess Franco film, you really have a lot of catching up to do. Jess Franco makes us of his verbatim artful and post-sleaze effect on the maligned Bloody Moon. The effort in question is a weird hybrid of the slasher and with scream queens. Bloody Moon takes few seconds in order to escalate into the film that it is and keeps the perfect amount of tension to flow by ways of being protean and fluctuating. Despite having some intelligent and awe inspiring violent deaths, the real lure is the cast of beautiful German girls picked off by a mysterious killer. The proper thing done with the mystery - thriller element was the slow plot that was slowly revealed. By the end of the film, all the prior scenes will come together in a bloody puzzle and will leave you saying "I should have known!" aloud. Of course, this film needed a Franco twist so a ghoulish incest plot line was inserted that was between a hideously burned ex-murderer and his beautiful sister. You will constantly second-guess the intelligence of the film and the only reason you would is the direful dialogue. Lost in translation is the proper term for this. Sure, it has a caseous disco theme but this is a perfected and refined sleazy slasher. And if you think you've seen it all, watch the killer run down a little boy in his luxurious car without even looking back. I'm no stranger to child violence in film, but the grunt made by the 10-or-so year old was frighteningly realistic and I could actually hear the breath escape from his crushed chest. Along with the sound effects, a masterful score of bubbly synth-pop and a luminescent science-fiction humming loop are presented in what might be the greatest Franco soundtrack. There's no reason to not view Bloody Moon and give it a try. Other than the real (?) snake getting decapitated with a pair of hedge clippers, this film is a fun and harrowing film of obsession and greed wrapped in a horror film package. I've read some negative reviews and they all center around the atrocious lines from the characters. At worst, they prove to just be comedic relief. Bloody Moon is one of Franco's highlight films and a violent one at that.

Jesús "Jess" Franco was indubitably one of the most uniquely untalented and artistically inept auteur filmmakers who ever lived as a sort of "Spanish Ed Wood" with stunted artistic pretensions and a wealth of passion, albeit more prolific and prone to pornography, yet the strikingly unsophisticated filmmaker did direct a semi-decent film or two during his admittedly long and eventful lifetime and his totally tasteless cinematic work Faceless (1987) aka Les prédateurs de la nuit – an exceedingly exploitative 'anti-bourgeois bourgeois' slasher flick starring none other than Austrian queen Helmut Berger (Ludwig, Salon Kitty) as the lead, if not ludicrously lethargic, villain – is undoubtedly one of highest points in the filmmaker's eclectically artistically-lowly career as a prophet of torture porn, as well as horror films totally rid of genuine human emotion. An unofficial remake and deplorably degenerate update of the French-Italian horror classic Eyes Without a Face (1960) aka Les yeux sans visage directed by Georges Franju with a storyline reminiscent of Franco's first feature The Awful Dr. Orloff (1962) aka Gritos en la noche, Faceless is undoubtedly an absurdly artless and asinine piece of curiously crude cinematic storytelling, yet it does have a couple moments of genuine horror and austere aesthetic brutality, albeit of the scientifically nonsensical sort as inspired by the holocaust mythos, thus making for a startlingly superficial flick that is big on sadistic shocks, sheer stupidity, and super soulless and shitty style, which is arguably the filmmaker's greatest legacy as a would-be-auteur filmmaker. A fiercely feckless and philistine piece of filmmaking, Faceless is one of those many horror films that reminds the viewer why the post-silent era horror genre is almost exclusively without a shred of artistic merit, but it is also an aesthetically and thematically reckless work that reminds one why it is also a fun genre with its complete and utter disregard for anything resembling intellectual integrity, artistic dignity, or aesthetic soundness. In short, Faceless, like the disfigured women in the film, is an aesthetic abomination that in certain contexts can be enjoyed, but is ultimately nothing more than a bottom of the barrel guilty pleasure, even if it features a nefarious Nazi surgeon who experimented on Jews, Helmut Berger, an ugly bastard mongrel of a necrophile henchman, and some of the most sickening medical surgery disaster scenarios ever depicted in cinema history.

Pretty boy French doctor Frank Flamand (Helmut Berger in an against type and ultimately worthless performance) thinks he is at the top of the world due to his social and financial prestige, but things take a terrible turn for the worst when a certain Mrs. Francois (Tilda Thamar) – an ex-patient of his whose face he caused to be disfigured in a botched plastic surgery disaster – seeks revenge by attempting to throw acid in his face like a savage Islamic terrorist, but instead it splashes the good doctor's lovely sister Ingrid (Christiane Jean), thus leaving her horribly disfigured and less than sexually delectable in the process. Naturally, Dr. Flamand blames himself for his sister's premature facial degeneration, so he gets his beautiful yet butch lesbo assistant Nathalie (Brigitte Lahaie) to kidnap an American model babe named Barbara Hallen (Caroline Munro), who is taken to the basement floor of the good doctor's clinic, as he plans to perform a face transplant so he can give his severely scarred sis the gift of natural beauty like she has never had before. Of course, kidnapped girl Barbara's father Terry Hallen (Telly Savalas) becomes deeply concerned when he does not hear from his daughter, so he hires a would-be-wise-cracking private detective named Sam Morgan (Chris Mitchum) to track her down. Following a lead, Mr. Morgan pays a visit to Barbara's photo director Maxence (Marcel Philippot) – a stereotypically anally retentive homo with an unhealthy obsession with buying abhorrent art pieces, which the private detective happily destroys to get answers from the feisty flamer – and learns that the girl moonlighted as a high-priced hooker and that she vanished without a trace with an expensive gold watch during a photo shoot. When Morgan pays a visit to Flamand's clinic after tracing Barbara's credit card there, he notices the doctor's assistant Nathalie is wearing the watch and concludes that some sort of foul play is involved. Little does Morgan realize that Dr. Flamand has hired a Nazi doctor named Karl Heinz Moser (Anton Diffring) to transplant the face of female slaves onto the deranged doc's sister Ingrid and Barbara is one of the involuntary donors signed up for the highly experimental surgery. Luckily, Barbara's face was badly damaged by a mongrel freak with a Euro-trash mullet named Gordon (Gérard Zalberg, who played the rather repellent Mr. Hyde in Walerian Borowczyk's The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Miss Osbourne (1981)) – a fiendish fellow that does all of Flamand's dirty work, including brutalizing and murdering gorgeous women – so they do not plan to use her for a transplant, but other women are not so lucky. After kidnapping an actress (Florence Guérin), Dr. Moser attempts to transplant her face onto Ingrid Flamand's but the face falls apart during mid-surgery and Gordon disposes of the mutilated woman by cutting her head off with a chainsaw (as the eyes of the faceless actress move frantically), but does not forget to kiss the bloody skeletal lips of the fallen beauty during a sickening and senseless scene of quasi-necrophilia. Eventually, Morgan finds Barbara imprisoned in the clinic basement in a dark holding cell, but ultimately finds himself imprisoned as well not long thereafter. In the end, Faceless concludes on a curiously anti-climatic cliffhanger that is as satisfying as an aborted orgasm during a warm summer night.

With an absolutely appalling and totally uncomplimentary soundtrack by Italian-Canadian pop singer Vincenzo Thoma, the emotional authenticity and moral integrity of an Eli Roth film, the worst sort of cultural and aesthetic decadence of 1980s Euro-sleaze, horribly contrived comic relief scenarios that are scarier than the actual murder scenes, and a near total waste of a couple great actors, especially in regard to Helmut Berger, it is hard to give a film like Faceless any sort of serious critical reverence, but I would be lying if I did not admit that I watched the film no less than three times this year as there is something about it that makes you keep coming back, if not for all the wrong reasons. Like his incoherent surrealist 'arthouse' horror flick Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden (1968) aka Succubus, Faceless is one of the very few Jess Franco films I can recommend as a delectable-enough dirty diamond in the rough from a filmmaker with an unhealthy obsession with seeing beautiful women die grizzly deaths. Indeed, unlike Yukio Mishima or Veit Harlan, Mr. Franco seemed to be quite against beautiful corpses. To his credit, while wallowing in the materialistic vanity of the 1980s, Franco also manages to portray such smug vainglory in an exceedingly unflattering light via Faceless to the point where he literally has it ripped to shreds like paper via the angelic faces of statuesque beauties. Also to his credit, Franco managed to 'master' what he first sought to achieve with his debut work The Awful Dr. Orloff (1962) by taking the gore, unsettling sensuality, and brutality to stomach-churning extremes that would make Mario Bava scream. Indeed, if you ever get the urge to take a break from serious arthouse films, Faceless makes for a bittersweet treat as a sort of anti-arthouse affair and an Alain Robbe-Grillet flick for philistines set in a banal France without Godard or Resnais, but with only Jesús Franco on a pseudo-modish murder rampage of the marvelously misogynistic sort. It is with Faceless, as well as Necronomicon - Geträumte Sünden (1968), 99 Women (1969), Venus in Furs (1969), Vampyros Lesbos (1971), and a couple other films, that Jess Franco will be remembered in infamy as an idiosyncratic libertine auteur of marginal artistic talent yet unlimited passion, and not as the typical nameless and faceless exploitation/horror hack, which is no small achievement (relatively speaking, of course).

Jim Abrahams (1993)

Being literally beaten and urinated on as a child by other children, growing up in a defeated nation that had been reduced to ruins and rubble, blaming himself for the suicide of his Polish grandma (when he was only 13-year-old) and later his teenage male lover, the death of his boyfriend Marcello from AIDS, losing his movie muse Magdalena Montezuma at the height of his film career to cancer (which he would inevitably lose a battle to later in his life), facing public ridicule by ex-lovers (i.e. Rosa von Praunheim), and being relatively rejected in his homeland for being too much of an “art cunt,” Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Palermo oder Wolfsburg) – the most decidedly dandy and exceedingly eccentric filmmaker of the German New Wave – was certainly a terribly tortured man, which he made no lie of considering he is well known for wearing signature all-black outfits throughout his entire life, so naturally his cinematic autobiography and penultimate work (This Night (2008) aka Nuit de chien being his final film), Deux (2002) aka Two, is a hyper hysterical and harrowing yet hypnotic cinematic work that made me seriously wonder whether or not the filmmaker’s premature death at the age of 65 was not for the best because at least now we know he no longer suffers. A daringly discordant, deranging, debasing and esoteric movie memoir with two transexualized female protagonists, identical twin sisters (both played by Isabelle Huppert, who the director wrote the roles specifically for), Deux would mark Schroeter’s return to film after over a decade break in what is seemingly his most impenetrable and personal work; a work of horrific high-camp grotesquery in the spirit of one of the director’s favorite poetic novels Les Chants de Maldoror aka The Songs of Maldoror written by the mysterious Uruguayan-born French poet who went by the pseudonym Comte de Lautréamont (real name Isidore Lucien Ducasse). On top of featuring off-screen narration of verses from literary libertine de Lautréamont’s iconoclastic and quasi-satanic proto-surrealist novel by an unseen male narrator, Deux features incessant images of old school sailors that would substitute for Schroeter’s aborted dream film project of cinematically adapting French fag/criminal writer Jean Genet’s novel Querelle de Brest (1953), which would end in treachery when the director’s friend, Rainer Werner Fassbinder – who did not think much of the work, apparently describing it as a, “third-rate police story” – ended up directing it, thus souring the two filmmakers’ friendship. Featuring obfuscated anecdotes from Schroeter’s own life (which is a mystery in and of itself), including the self-slaughter of his lover via hanging, Deux is a decisively deranged and daunting celluloid daydream where one has the feeling that the filmmaker told himself throughout the production of the work, “It’s my film and I can cry if I want to.”

Inverting the sex of the characters for Deux, Schroeter seemingly follows in the footsteps of his ill-fated friend Fassbinder’s film The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972) aka Die Bitteren Tränen der Petra von Kant – a work based on the auteur’s failed romantic relationship with black Bavarian Günther Kaufmann, except with lesbians substituting for gay men – but the decidedly decadent auteur has never made a lie about the fact that his films are byproducts of his failed love affairs and if it were not for the fact that he was a singular filmmaker whose cinematic career is unparalleled, one would assume he had a failed life, at least judging by his celluloid autobiography; a work riddled with sex, death, and self-destruction of the cultivated kitschy and sometimes tragicomic sort. Centering around two identical twins separated at birth who know of neither’s existence, Deux seems to be a combination of Poe-esque ‘fear of the doppelgänger’ and Jungian ideas like the shadow aspect (unconscious aspect of the personality that the conscious ego does not recognize) and the anima (feminine inner personality in the unconscious of the male, which Schroeter seemed rather conscious of), thus the murderous conclusion acts as a sort of complete idiosyncratic “individuation.” The fact that both of the twins, Magdalena and Maria (both played by Huppert), never physically age (whether playing a 5-year-old or a 50-year-old version of the character) and that the events in their lives become quite indistinguishable and all the more indecipherable as the film progresses only make it all more clear that Deux is a torrid trip throughout Schroeter’s totally tortured and terrified unconscious and oftentimes irrational mind, thus making him more of a ‘German’ filmmaker than he would ever want to admit, at least in the dark romantic sense where the auteur gazes into the abyss and the abyss gazes back. Like the twins of sin, sordidness, and sorrow, their seemingly manic mother Anna (Bulle Ogier), who likely fornicated with a sailor and spawned two heirs that were irreparably severed and brought up by separate adoptive families, longs for maternal love and a lasting romantic relationship (their failure with both seems interconnected), but all three ladies are accursed matrons of misery and isolation-based misanthropy with a propensity for damningly destructive love affairs and emotional and physical violence. Maria is the more extroverted of the two as someone who actively pursues ‘revolutionary’ politics and her love of music via debauched opera and cabaret, thus symbolizing Schroeter’s identity as an artist (or his self-created ‘persona’) while Magdalena – a successful school girl turned low-spirited lesbian with a disdain for men – is the director (who, indeed, like the character, attended international boarding schools) as his truest and most unflatteringly personal self, so naturally when the two finally collide physically at the conclusion through their intrinsic metaphysical bond, there are deplorable, if not entirely inevitable consequences. That ‘Magdalena’ is Schroeter’s most personal self becomes all the more clear with the cinematic recreation of the filmmaker’s tragic real-life coming-of-age love affair, which the director described as follows in the documentary Mondo Lux : The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter (2011) directed by Elfi Mikesch (cinematographer of Deux), “Siegfried was the first man I really loved, but he hanged himself. He was 16, and I was 13 or 14.” Despite the rather ambiguous conclusion (as well as the film as a whole) of Deux, Werner Schroeter will undoubtedly be remembered as the ‘artist’ (outside persona), albeit one whose highly inner and intimate yet fuddled blood and tears stain every frame he ever shot of celluloid. Deux is indubitably Schroeter at the height of his hyper hermetic yet particularly personalized artistry in a considerably compelling and compulsively concocted celluloid work of daunting and deranging fragmentation where byproducts of love and death act as a fierce form of all-consuming cognitive dissonance and despair, thus it should be no surprise that the filmmaker once also stated in Mondo Lux, “harmony does not exist unless you work hard to create it.”

DEUX

Featuring hundreds of distinct tableaux ranging from quite literally killer kitsch, including Isabelle Huppert dressed in Soviet regalia standing on a battlefield with hundreds of dead naked corpses, to gross-out absurdity, including Huppert being violently attacked by a fox, coupled with a meticulously dismembered (non)narrative that is intentionally impossible to follow in terms of both chronology (skipping in between the years 2000, 1955, 1977, 1963, 1993, 1981, etc. without warning or reason) and plot, Deux makes for Werner Schroeter’s celluloid magnum opus of melancholy in the macabre tradition of the Grand Guignol and German romanticism, albeit in a highly deracinated, dissonance-driven form. A work of cultivated and complex despair and dispiriting decay that makes concessions to no one except Werner Schroeter himself, Deux, a depiction of debilitating delirium in celluloid form, is the thing that dead dreams are made of. A cinematic work I cannot even recommend to the most courageous of cinephiles, Deux is a totally trying test in terror and torment sprinkled with Schroeter’s apparent disdain for the Zionist state of Israel and goofy Japanese tourists, love of Dutch painters like Rembrandt and Vincent van Gogh, antinatalism, radical politics and sex, the semen of seamen, megalomaniacal divas, and lifelong obsession with opera. With the debauched, deadbeat mother featured in Deux telling someone on a public telephone that, “We must murder all pregnant women... We must kill all the children before they’re born. We must take this hunt to all the world. We must! We Must!” in a most heated, hysterical, and flagrantly fanatical fashion, one can only guess the source of Schroeter’s reckless weltenschmerz, but considering he was born 7 April 1945 – literally a month and a day before Germany’s unconditional surrender during the Second World War – thus literally coming of age in apocalyptic Teutonic year zero, it is no surprise that his cinematic swansong, This Night (2008) aka Nuit de chien, is about the death of a nation and a people in one night. And so it would follow that Schroeter became a rootless cosmopolitan of sorts, but as Deux demonstrates, there is no getting away from home, no matter where one runs. Who knows, maybe if Germany had won the war, Schroeter might have grown up to be a hyper heterosexual following in the footsteps of Veit Harlan – a true purveyor of aristocratic National Socialist kitsch – but instead he realized what his friend Fassbinder prophesied as having, “a place in the history of film that I would describe in literature as somewhere between Novalis, Lautréamont, and Louis-Ferdinand Céline,” which is no small accomplishment, with Deux being his “Les Chants de Maldoror”; an inexplicable and uncategorizable work of aesthetic anarchy and unwavering idiosyncrasy that will prove to perplex both cinephiles and auteur filmmakers for generations to come.

THE FINAL SOLUTION TO ADOLF HITLER

Jim Condit (???)

The Final Solution to Adolf Hitler is a one man show documentary featuring Jim Condit Jr. On Condit's personal YouTube account he has described himself as, "Kind of a good reporter, not much else." Condit's clearly controversial documentary The Final Solution to Adolf Hitler takes a completely unconventional look at the German dictator and his mysterious background. In the documentary, Condit introduces a series of old and new books regarding Adolf Hitler's assumed Jewish background and the Jewish bankers that financed him. Jim Condit's main point with the documentary is that Adolf Hitler played a crucial (if not the most important role) in founding the Jewish state of Israel. I have personally read many of the books Condit introduces and I can say that some are much more credible than others. The evidence ranges from official classified Nazi documents to hearsay amongst Nazis and Jews themselves. The fact is that collaboration between Nazis and Zionist Jews is an indisputable fact, something they leave out in Bolshevik style American public schools and even at the graduate level. In America, people seem to care more about things that cause irrational impulsive responses rather than rational fact base discussion. Jim Condit Jr. is far from the most charismatic guy around. In The Final Solution to Adolf Hitler, he constantly stutters, mixes up facts, and even sometimes seems confused. Condit reminds me of an eccentric community college professor that wears bad suits and has unconventional ideas. I especially liked the 1980s style computer monitor in the background of the documentary. It added a sort of "underground" and broke truth seeker aesthetic. The real wealth in the documentary is his introduction of these books so that individuals can do their own personal research. So-called "mainstream" and "accredited" historians are not at all trustworthy. The majority of these individuals just rehash and recycle ad hominem attack style unscholarly history for their unthinking (and apathetic) masses to consume. Any historian that starts to drift off into uncovered history (yet fact based and scholarly history) is almost immediately discredited, shunned, out of work, jailed, and possibly even killed. The Final Solution to Adolf Hitler features Jim Condit Jr. talking at his desk for two hours. The production of this documentary couldn't have cost more than $100 to do. Unless you consider having to buy a pro-consumer mini DV digital camera, the books Condit introduces, and other related documents. Despite Condit's lack of production values and overall presentation with The Final Solution to Adolf Hitler, he deserved to be commended for his studies. Very few individuals (especially Americans) have the audacity or shamelessness to go against the accepted historical norms in this country. Most have accepted Steven Spielberg's hateful and idealistic view of history as emotions speak louder to them than words. Watch The Final Solution to Adolf Hitler

PERMANENT VACATION

Admittedly, while I tend to either love or hate most auteur filmmakers, especially those of the arthouse or avant-garde oriented sort, Jim Jarmusch (Broken Flowers, Only Lovers Left Alive) is a rare a filmmaker that I both like and loathe, though his most recent films have caused me to feel mostly more of the latter. Of course, unlike a lot of contemporary cinephiles (who typically borrow most of their ideas and fetishes from the French New Wave and the anti-Occidental Frankfurt School influenced academics and critics), xenophilia, non-ironical ethno-masochism, flagrant La Nouvelle Vague worship, dimestore existentialism, post-Beat Generation hipsterdom, and degenerate jazz are things that leave a rather bitter taste in my mouth, so naturally I find it to be an innately impossible task to fully embrace any of the films in Jarmusch's somewhat uneven oeuvre. Although not really a major figure of the movement when it was still around, Jarmusch's roots lie in the underground No Wave Cinema scene of the mid-1970s through mid-1980s where he did things like work as a second recordist on his bud Eric Mitchell's largely forgotten midnight movie Underground U.S.A. (1980), acted as a cinematographer on his longtime girlfriend Sara Driver's Paul Bowles adaptation You Are Not I (1981), and ultimately directed his first and mostly rarely seen feature Permanent Vacation (1980), which I finally decided to watch the other day after many years of procrastination. According to Jarmusch himself, it was his comrades of the No Wave scene who talked him into directing his first feature, or as the auteur stated in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier, "I used to sort of follow Eric [Mitchell] and Amos [Poe] around and they were always saying, 'Jim, when are you going to make a feature film. Come on, Jim make a film.'" I must confess that, after reading a couple reviews of Permanent Vacation, I expected the worst and braced myself for a film that I assumed would be an all the more slow, pedantic, and posturing take on Jarmusch's second feature Stranger Than Paradise (1984), yet it ultimately somewhat surprised me and exceeded my admittedly fairly low expectations. Indeed, while I would probably hate Jarmusch if I met him in real-life, his debut at least allowed me to somewhat understand where he is coming from and why he has an insatiable love for old dead negro jazz musicians, goofy anachronistic clothing, emotional sterility, and seemingly pointless posturing (or what he and his fans probably call 'style').

Shot on a relatively miniscule budget of around $12,000 as an intended master's thesis while Jarmusch was attending the film program at NYU (somewhat humorously, he was denied a degree because the university did not appreciate the fact that he used his Louis B. Mayer Foundation scholarship to fund the film), Permanent Vacation is a slow burning, very consciously stylized, semi-autobiographical (the lead character is a composite of Jarmusch, his factory worker brother, and lead actor Chris Parker), and a virtual manifesto of the filmmaker's seemingly fairly consistent Weltanschauung as a passive nihilist, self-stylized NYC hipster, degenerate jazz lover, and perennial too-cool-for-school rebel-without-a-cause. Indeed, for a Jarmusch fanboy to describe the film as one of the director's lesser works (even respected critic Jonathan Rosenbaum described the film as, "The only Jim Jarmusch feature that qualifies as apprentice work") is nothing short of hipster heresy and strong evidence that they do not actually sincerely like the auteur or his films, but instead are more interested in what he and his films stand for (e.g. negrophilia, hipsterism, passive nihilism, etc.). Featuring a real-life eternal wanderer and decidedly disillusioned social outcast in the lead role (Jarmusch specially tailored the character for the lead 'actor,' who fittingly uses his real name), Permanent Vacation is a sort of overtly off-beat (anti)bildungsroman about a metaphysically dead hipster hobo and fiercely forlorn fashion victim who probably felt he found a true kindred spirit (or at least, a cool quote to steal) when he read Arthur Rimbaud's words, "I found I could extinguish all human hope from my soul." While Jarmusch's film will not give you hope for hopeless hipsters, it will give you the sense that Nietzsche was right in regard to his ideas of the 'eternal return' and especially 'Amor fati' (of course, Jarmusch is still interested in these themes as Broken Flowers (2005) especially demonstrates).

While fairly unknown (it never received a theatrical release) and poorly reviewed in the United States, Permanent Vacation was well received in Germany where it earned the Josef von Sternberg Award at the 1980 Mannheim-Heidelberg International Filmfestival and impressed New German Cinema 'alpha-auteur' Wim Wenders so much that he gave Jarmusch some film stock to work on his next feature Stranger Than Paradise (notably, Jarmusch also worked as an assistant on Wenders' doc Lightning Over Water (1980) aka Nick's Movie about the remaining days of Hollywood rebel Nicholas Ray, who the filmmaker also acted as a personal assistant to). Undoubtedly, one of Jarmusch's greatest 'talents' as a filmmaker is that he is one of the few American filmmakers that has been able to express the sort of existential despair that is quite common in the films of the great European arthouse filmmakers of the post-WWII era, especially those of New German Cinema. Indeed, as a largely plot-less work sprinkled with occasional cinephile references that features a quasi-antihero with a flat affect and nothing to live for except vintage negro music and attempting to look and act 'hip' (personally, I found the young man to be quite unwittingly ludicrous, which is probably the only thing charming about him), Permanent Vacation almost seems like Jarmusch's attempt to make a NYC equivalent to early Wenders flicks like Summer in the City (1970) and The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick (1972). With its gritty and almost cinema-vérité realist aesthetic, Jarmusch's film falls somewhere between the scum-covered American-dream-damning of exploitation auteur Nick Millard's anti-masterpiece Crimi- nally Insane (1975) and the German era 'hard ghetto' meditations of Iranian auteur Sohrab Shahid Saless like Tagebuch eines Liebenden (1977) aka Diary of a Lover and Ordnung (1980) aka Order. As far as American influences go, aside from the No Wave scene, Jarmusch's film seems to owe a very heavy debt to the fairly small yet nonetheless very important and highly influential oeuvre of largely forgotten NYC underground auteur Peter Emmanuel Goldman. Aside from the plight of the lead in Permanent Vacation being quite similar to the protagonists in Goldman's features Echoes of Silence (1967) and Wheel of Ashes (1969), the opening scenes of the almost somnambulist-like masses walking in slow-motion in the seedy streets of NYC bears a strikingly resemblance to various scenes in the forgotten auteur's short Peñstilent City (1965) to the point where it almost seems like borderline plagiarism. Luckily for Jarmusch, Goldman is now largely forgotten today, including among serious cinephiles, even though his final feature Wheel of Ashes starring Pierre Clémenti is probably the only real direct link between the NYC underground and La Nouvelle Vague. Of course, what makes Jarmusch important and singular is that he dared to make such decidedly dejecting and audience-alienating works in the land and era of Spielberg and Lucas where movies are mostly made with the exact opposite intent as Permanent Vacation, which is a work that prides itself on escaping from the escapism of Hollywood and instead dwells in an inwardly dead state of mind where Weltschmerz reigns.

Almost terminally nihilistic teenage protagonist Aloysious Christopher Parker (Chris Parker) is a man with no plan aside from perennially drifting from one place to another, or as he less than eloquently narrates in a fairly monotone fashion that makes one question whether or not he is a eunuch (he sounds like a drug-addled lesbian hooker), "My name is Aloysious Christopher Parker and, if I ever have a son, he'll be Charles Christopher Parker. Just like Charlie Parker. The people I know just call me Allie, and this is my story -- or part of it. I don't expect it to explain all that much, but what's a story anyway, except one of those connect the dots drawings that in the end forms a picture of something. That's really all this is. That's how things work for me. I go from this place, this person to that place or person. And, you know, it doesn't really make that much difference." A sort of passive misanthrope who probably does not even have enough energy or will power to truly love or hate people, Allie compares people to inanimate objects and rooms, stating that, when it comes to individuals, there always comes a time when the, "newness is gone [...] And then there's this kind of dread, kind of creeping dread. You probably don't even know what I'm talking about. But anyway I guess the point of all this is that after a while, something tells you, some voice speaks to you, and that's it. Time to split." Although he is still just an adolescent, Allie is already wise enough to know that, "People are going to be basically the same" and thus has no problem physically and emotionally drifting in and out of peoples' lives like some sort of melancholic ghost (actually, Allie's parasitic lifestyle, superficial charm, lack of long-term goals, criminality, emotional shallowness, and proneness towards boredom, among other things, indicated that he might suffer from psychopathy). Upon randomly dropping by the dilapidated apartment of an assumed lover named Leila (Leila Gaštil), Allie is asked, "Where have you been? I haven't seen you since Thursday" and he less than emotionally replies as if it is no big deal that he has worried the shit out of his quasi-girlfriend with his unexpected absence, "Walking...Just, walking around. I can't seem to sleep at night. Not in this city." Not even seemingly vaguely interested in love or even carnal pleasures, Allie proceeds to goofily dance to degenerate jazz while Leila hypnotically stares out of a window as if hoping that she could be anywhere else other than where she currently is in life. When his culturally confused one-man dance session is over, Allie demonstrates he is a degenerate descendent of Narcissus by intently staring at himself in a mirror while combing his hair and proudly declaring, "You know, sometimes I think I should just live fast and die young. . .and go in a three-piece suit like Charlie Parker. Not bad, huh?" Needless to say, Leila is less than impressed with the protagonist's outmoded James Dean-esque declaration, but it seems that in Allie's own mind he is a misunderstood superstar who is the only person that is truly capable of understanding his own brilliance.

PERMANENT VACATION

In a scene that seems to reflect Allie's fragmented mind and incapacity for concentrating on anything for any extended period of time, the protagonist reads an excerpt from mysterious pseudonymous French poet Comte de Lautréamont's classic proto-surrealist poetic novel Les Chants de Maldoror (1868) aka The Songs of Maldoror and then says to Leila, "I'm tired of this book, you can have it." When Leila tries in vain to receive some warmth and affection from the protagonist by complaining, "I'm tired of being alone," Allie matter-of-factly replies, "Everyone is alone" and then goes on a predictable pessimistic rant where he attempts to rationalize why he is proud of being a bum and then mentions how his once-normal mother went totally insane after his father abandoned their family. After discussing the fact that he has not seen his institutionalized schizophrenic mother in over a year and that he would like to visit the ruins of his childhood home, which was supposedly destroyed in an imaginary war by "The Chinese," Allie leaves Leila for good and heads to the place where he was apparently born, though he does not seem to find what he is looking for. In the ruins of where he was born, Allie bumps into a shell-shocked war veteran (Jarmusch regular Richard Boes) who is convinced that he is still fighting the Vietcong. After giving him a cigarette, Allie gives the mentally unhinged vet the somewhat sound advice "go some place different [...] that's what I'm going to do" and the ex-soldier abides as if following an order given to him by a drill instructor. Unfortunately for Allie, he is far less open to taking advice from others, as he is a young man who treasures personal sovereignty above all else, even if it requires that he lead the life of the most destitute of rootless cosmopolitans.

When Allie visits his mother (Ruth Bolton) at the scum-covered mental institution where she has been interned, it becomes quite apparent why the protagonist has a hard time emotionally connecting to other people, as his mentally perturbed progenitor barely acknowledges him and treats him like he is a pestilence when she actually does, randomly stating to him regarding his eyes in a fashion that reveals that she clearly has yet to get over her husband leaving her, "They don't belong to you. They were taken out of your father's head." With his mental mommy treating him with an emotionally crippling combination of disdain and apathy and her all-the-more-mental roommate laughing hysterically for seemingly no reason, Allie naturally decides to use the opportunity to leave when a nurse (played by Jarmusch's longtime girlfriend, filmmaker Sara Driver) comes in the room and tells the protagonist to temporarily leave so that she can give the patients their clearly much needed medicine. After his brief stop at the ghetto nut-ward, Allie walks through a ruined neighborhood that resembles a bombed-out third world city where he happens upon a literally raving mad yet stunningly beautiful Hispanic woman (María Duval of Roger Vadim's And God Created Woman (1988)) who is wearing nothing but a slip and has make-up smeared across her tragic little face. When Allie asks the loony Latina "Are you alright?," she screams, "Go! Get out of here!," so the protagonist decides to go on his less than merry way. Of course, seeing such a ravishing babe in such a sad and sorry state only provides validity to Allie's hopelessly pessimistic personal philosophy. Indeed, it as if misery, absurdity, and destitution follow Allie everywhere he goes, but I suspect he would not have it any other way.

In a fairly blatant tribute from Jarmusch to his mentor, Allie wanders into a movie theater that is screening Nicholas Ray's The Savage Innocents (1960) starring Anthony Quinn and Peter O'Toole, though the protagonist seems less interested in seeing the film than chatting up random strangers that he meets in the lobby. After buying some popcorn and asking an attractive movie theater employee about the "Quinn Eskimo movie," Allie is told a story relating to the Doppler effect that he surely will forever cherish about a suicidal saxophonist playing "Over the Rainbow" by a jolly middle-aged negro (Frankie Faison of The Silence of the Lambs (1991) and HBO's The Wire (2002-2008)) with a bad case of the giggles. After leaving the movie theater without actually watching the movie, Allie happens upon an avant-garde saxophonist played by John Lurie (who co-composed the film's musical score with Jarmusch), who asks him, "What do you want to hear, Kid?," to which the protagonist replies in an uncharacteristically excited fashion, "I don't care, as long as it's vibrating bugged-out sound. Man, what a sax." After Lurie passionately plays an autistic avant-garde jazz version of "Over the Rainbow" on his sax, Allie goes to spend the night on a roof on some random apartment building. The next day, when some random young bourgeois bitch in a fancy convertible asks Allie to do her the simple favor of putting her envelope in a mailbox that he is obnoxiously leaning on, the protagonist retorts in a prissy fashion, "What do I look like, the mailman?" and then steals the young lady's car after she makes the mistake of attempting to deal with the letter herself. As the young lady bitches about the fact that Allie has stolen her car, some random negro hobo pops out of nowhere and adds insult to injury by boorishly blabbering, "That dude was wild style. Ohhh, no. You better get your ass out of her before he snatches that up too." After some momentary hesitation, Allie decides he needs quick cash and opts to sell the stolen convertible for a mere $800 to some lowlife crook played by French-born No Wave auteur Eric Mitchell. Of course, since the car is stolen, it is no big loss for Allie, who just wants to get the hell out of the rotten Big Apple before he rots with it.

Ultimately, Allie gets a passport, buys a boat ticket, and prepares for a pilgrimage to Paris where he assumedly plans to live in exile for an indefinite period of time just like so many artists and would-be-artists before him. Almost too fittingly in what one would might describe as a borderline mystical scene, Allie spots his French doppelganger (Chris Hameon)—a character that may or may not be inspired by a young version of Jarmusch's French-born buddy Eric Mitchell (who somewhat fitting plays the crook who gives Allie the money that he uses to buy his boat ticket)—while leaning against a fence while waiting for his boat to France. When Allie asks the stylish frog, "Are you going on the boat, too?," the suave Frenchman says "No" and explains, "See, I had a lot of trouble, so I have to get out of Paris. And now my friends are crying. See, I never cry. 'Cause I know when things change, I have to go somewhere. And now I think that New York is going to be Babylon for me. Well, that's where I've got to live." After sharing their tattoos (the Frenchman has one reading "mommy"), the two kindred spirits part way and Allie narrates, "I was thinking about the note I left her when I got on the boat. But how can you explain something like this to someone? I'm just not the kind of person that settles into anything. I don't think I ever will be. Isn't really anything left to explain that can be. And that's what I was trying to explain in the first place. Just not like that. I don't want a job, or a house, or taxes although I wouldn't mind a car, but... I don't know. Now that I'm away, I wish I was back there more than even when I was there. Let's just say I'm a certain kind of tourist...A tourist that's on a... permanent vacation." In the end, Allie stares back at NYC as the city gets farther and farther away as his boat drifts to Frogland where the protagonist probably hopes to find a surplus of pretentious plodding deadbeats just like himself.

The fact that Permanent Vacation was included as a mere extra feature with the Criterion Collection DVD release of Stranger Than Paradise as opposed to receiving its own individual release is a true testament to the fact that it is most certainly Jarmusch's most wrongly neglected and most understood work and the fact it only received a warm reception in Europe, especially Germany, is only fitting. After all, as the great cinematic works of New German Cinema certainly demonstrate, no group of people expressed a great sense of existential despair, deracination, social and cultural alienation, and nihilism better than the post-WWII German filmmakers, but I digress. Personally, I would rather re-watch the director's debut any day over his later and more conspicuously contrived works like Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai (1999), Coffee and Cigarettes (2003), Broken Flowers (2005), The Limits of Control (2009), and Only Lovers Left Alive (2013), but then again I am not a Jarmusch cheerleader and find many of fetishes and obsessions to be nothing short of odious, obnoxious and, in many cases, laughably shallow and insincere. Indeed, if I want to watch a film that pays homage to Godard and the French New Wave, I will watch an early Fassbinder flick like Götter der Pest (1970) aka Gods of the Plague or Der amerikanische Soldat (1970) aka The American Soldier and on those rather rare occasions where I get an irrational thirst for ebonics and negrophilia, I will most certainly go to a real black director like Melvin "Block" Van Peebles, Felix de Rooy, or Jarmusch's perennially pissy pipsqueak pal Spike Lee. Indubitably, what makes Permanent Vacation so raw, refreshing, and authentic is that it features a real-life shrieking hipster hobo of the pathologically posturing sort in the lead role as opposed to a dry Hollywood clown like Bill Murray or all-too-stoic exotic spade like Isaach De Bankolé (ironically, one of the biggest complaints that most reviewers seem to have against the film is lead Chris Parker's grating voice and dubious acting skills, but I personally found these admittedly annoying ingredients to be perfect for the specific character). In fact, the film is such a singularly delectable and unadulterated expression of its particular zeitgeist that Jean-Michel Basquiat was snoozing in a sleeping bag in John Lurie's apartment while Jarmusch was shooting the scenes where Parker hangs out with melancholy hipster diva Leila Gaštil. Additionally, Jarmusch structured the film around Parker's authentic natural aura and attitude, or as the auteur explained regarding the film in the doc Blank City, "...I wrote it for Chris who's a very animate person in real life. And, as I started filming, he was not animated in the same degree, so I followed that and the style of the film sort of slowed down." Indeed, Permanent Vacation is surely slow, but it would not work any other way, just as Jarmusch's buddy Wenders' greatest films would not either. After all, there is nothing really exciting or action-packed about existential despair and passive nihilism.

Although it might surprise some, Italian self-described 'super-fascist' philosopher Julius Evola had some positive things to say about beatniks, bohemians, hipsters, and other counterculture types in an essay featured in the volume L'Arco e la Clava (1968) aka The Bow and the Club, where he stated, "From our point of view, a brief study of these phenomena is justified, because we share the opinion, expressed by a number of "beats": namely — and in opposition to what psychiatrists, psycho-analysts and "social workers" think — in a society, a civilization, like ours, and, especially, like that of the USA — one must in general admit that the rebel, the being who does not adapt, the a-social being, is in fact the sanest man. In an abnormal world, values are inverted: whosoever appears abnormal, in relation to the existing milieu, is most probably precisely the “normal” person, in the sense that in him there still subsist traces of integral vital energy; and we do not follow those who want to “rehabilitate” such individuals, whom they consider to be sick, and “save” them for “society.”” Of course, what separates super-fascists like Evola from neo-Beat hipsters like Chris Parker and Jarmusch is that, while the former supports a sort of active nihilism as endorsed by Nietzsche, the latter embraces a sort of frivolous passive nihilism that can only lead to a life of nothingness upon nothingness without end. In a chapter entitled ‘Sartre: Prisoner Without Walls’ featured in his classic text Cavalcare la Tigre (1961) aka Ride the Tiger, Evola would point out that commie existentialist messiah Jean-Paul Sartre once absurdly wrote, “Freedom, choice, nihilation, and temporalization are one and the same,” but of course such naive thinking only leads to the sort of psychological prison and metaphysical purgatory that plagues the protagonist of Permanent Vacation, which was highlighted by the Guido Baron when he wrote, “One finds oneself already faced with the well-known situation of a freedom that is suffered, rather than claimed: modern man is not free, but finds himself free in the world where God is dead. ‘He is delivered up to his freedom.’ It is from this that his deep suffering comes. When he is fully aware of this, anguish seizes him and the otherwise absurd sensation of a responsibility reappears.” Of course, like the protagonist of his film, Jarmusch seems to have bought into the existentialist con that he is totally free, even if the self-satisfied cynicism and literal jazz worship of his films says otherwise.

Luckily, Jarmusch apparently does not fully embrace the attitude and lifestyle of the patently preposterous ‘pretentious deadbeat’ protagonist of Permanent Vacation, or as he stated in an interview with Bomb Magazine, “I think nihilism is a realistic outlook, but I see both positive and negative aspects in the approach of the main character. His self-imposed exile from existing institutions: work, school, family, etc., is certainly positive, but his difficulty in communicating with other people in the same situation is relatively hopeless. More and more, intelligent young people are put into this almost hopeless situation. That’s what the film is about.” While it is certainly true that more and more people are dropping out society, these individuals, not unlike the protagonist of Jarmusch’s film and the countless carbon-copy hipsters with ironic Civil War mustaches that currently live in NYC and other trendy urban neighborhoods, have ultimately taken a path that is ultimately more hopeless and senseless than that of the average sub-literate Evangelical Christian hillbilly. Certainly, the same defeatist ‘postmodern slave morality’ that led Hebraic hipster Norman Mailer to proudly proclaim himself to be a “White Negro” and inspired William S. Burroughs to become a trust-fund-sponsored “junky” and “queer” also led Jarmusch to directing a film like Permanent Vacation, which also acts as a sort of unintentional cautionary tale about what might happen to you if you’re a bourgeois white boy who starts mimicking the culture of poor old dead negroes. Naturally, the same dead-end passive nihilist (anti)philosophy also explains why that, aside from technical prowess and overall professionalism, Jarmusch's films have not changed all that much since his debut, as they typically rehash the same sort of offbeat scenes and eccentric encounters. In fact, Jarmusch's treasuring of the Tschandala and metaphysically dead deadbeats and derelicts seems to have only grown over the years, yet he is now much more personally distanced from his material and, to the decided detriment of his films, instead of hiring his friends to play themselves, he dreams up rather ridiculous fantasy characters like jigaboo samurais and undead rockers. At least when Permanent Vacation was first released, the viewer could entertain the idea that Jarmusch might one day grow out of his already-then-outmoded hipster Weltanschauung.

GHOST DOG: THE WAY OF THE SAMURAI

Jim Jarmusch (1999)

Next to European arthouse directors from the 1960s-1980s, especially the pretentious French sort he rips off of, Jim Jarmusch (Stranger Than Paradise, Night on Earth) seems like a pedantic dilettante who make counterfeit post-counter-culture celluloid crap of the obscenely banal 'offbeat' sort, yet he has made a film or two that is worth seeing, if not for totally novel reasons, with Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai being one of those films, even if I found myself cringing at the film's compulsive and conspicuous culture cringing. The story of an overweight negro samurai named 'Ghost Dog' played by Forest Whitaker (in a role specially tailored for him by Jarmusch) who finds himself to be a marked man after committing a hit for the Italian mafia which the Mafioso boss' daughter witnesses, Ghost Dog is a kooky postmodern crime flick and celluloid cultural mongrel that is steeped in would-be-quirky negrophilia and superifical Far-Eastern warrior philosophy that pays blatant, if not somewhat blasphemous, homage to Jean-Pierre Melville's Le Samourai (1967) starring proud French nationalist Alain Delon. A film depicting two dying warrior codes—that of the samurai and the mafia—Ghost Dog presents a changing 'multicultural' world where old school masculinity has become outmoded and where an uncommonly stoic negro anti-hero has adopted an alien creed which he utilizes for his own paradoxically Afroncentric means to kill elderly and discernibly degenerated members of the American Cosa Nostra. A typical Jarmusch work where the exotic 'other' is ritualistically fetishized and the white man, even swarthy ones from the Mediterranean, is depicted with the utmost malice, which reaches its zenith in a scene where an American Indian calls a stereotypically hotheaded wop a "stupid fucking white man" for shooting a pigeon, Ghost Dog is excessive ethno-masochism and xenophilia in its most pseudo-esoteric form directed by a man who never got over the fact that his hair turned completely white when he was a mere teenager. With various shamelessly contrived fanboy references to Jap literary classics like Rashōmon (1915) and Hagakure: The Way of the Samurai, as well as films ranging from Le Samourai to Seijun Suzuki's Branded to Kill (1967) to Star Wars Episode IV: A New Hope (1977), Ghost Dog is a sort of pseudo-daring dilettante deconstruction of ancient traditions/folklore and film genre conventions that, like any serious work of pomo puffery, takes great pride in its cultural references, yet does not have much of a soul, despite featuring a samurai soul brother as the lead character. Featuring a musical score and cameo role by rapper RZA—the de facto leader of the orientalist hip hop outfit, the Wu-Tang Clan—Ghost Dog is a superficially strange film where black turns yellow and takes out white, thereupon making a virtual celluloid wet dream for cultivated wiggers and negro nerds.

A strict follower of the samurai code who lives in a mostly black ghetto, Ghost

Dog (Forest Whitaker) is in a peculiar position as the voluntary 'retainer' of a local mafia boss named Louie (John Tormey), who saved the black samurai from a very potential death while just a young black buck. Now a phantom-like hitman who carries out contract killings for the mafia via Louie, Ghost Dog finds himself in serious trouble when he kills a gangster named Handsome Frank who has been sleeping with the daughter of a mafia boss named Vargo (Henry Silva), not realizing that said daughter of the mafia boss, Louise Vargo (Tricia Vessey), is in the room when he commits the crime. After Ghost Dog kills less than Handsome Frank, Louise shows no concern for the death of her beloved, but instead lends the jigaboo samurai a copy of Rashōmon that she had just finished reading, stating with a most flat affect, "It's a great book... Ancient Japan was a strange place." Ghost Dog makes the mistake of letting Louise live and he is rewarded by Vargo and his associate Sonny Valerio, who decide to get rid of the spade samurai as he can implicate them for committing the mob sin of not only killing a 'made man,' but using a black brotha' to do it. Unfortunately for them, Ghost Dog is not an easy fellow to find as he lives like a hermit in a shack on the roof of a pet shop and only communicates with Frank, who is ordered by Vargo to find the samurai, by way of small paper messages sent via pigeons. Ghost Dog's only friend is a flamboyant Haitian ice cream man named Raymond (Isaach De Bankolé) who can only speak French, yet the two idiosyncratic negroes seem to understand each other perfectly as demonstrated by the fact that they both always say the same thing. Luckily, Ghost Dog makes a new friend in the form of a feisty little black girl that looks like Whoopi Goldberg named Pearline (Camille Winbush), who the samurai gives Louise Vargo's copy of Rashōmon to read. Meanwhile, Vargo's elderly mob underlings go around looking for Ghost Dog, killing an innocent pigeon and old black man in the process, which rather irks the sensitive samurai, who is respected by both members of the 'Crips' and 'Bloods.' Of course, Ghost Dog retaliates by killing the mafia men one-by-one, which becomes rather bizarre due to the fact that his master Louie is on their side. After invading Vargo's mansion and singlehandedly killing everyone except for Louise Vargo and Louie, Ghost Dog demonstrates his peculiar sense of 'black power' by senselessly killing two white hunters who have just killed a bear, which is the samurai's spiritual animal. In the end, Ghost Dog and Louie have a final showdown, where the pseudo-Japanese black warrior allows his mafia master to kill him, thus allowing both men to follow through with their archaic codes in a world that no longer recognizes either. Before he dies, Ghost Dog gives his copy of Rashōmon, which was just given back to him by Pearline, to Louie.

A sort of bastard celluloid love child that was clearly created by a person that, not unlike alpha-fanboy Quentin Tarantino, was directed by a mixed-up man with a bad case of xenophilia and piss poor taste in cinema, Ghost Dog is a film that proves that deconstructing film genre conventions and mixing cultural ingredients almost always makes for sapless celluloid that begs for importance and notoriety, but ultimately offers nothing new in the way of cinematic art. Indeed, while I would be lying if I did not admit that Ghost Dog kept me vaguely entertained through with its overly contrived quirkiness, and I can respect director Jarmusch for flipping through Hagakure, I certainly cannot respect the putrid pomo idea of overweight American negroes pretending to follow in the tradition of ancient Japanese samurais, as if samurai code is interchangeable between races and that any race of people can aptly adopt such unique culture ingredients, hence why the film seems like one big joke at the expense of not only the Japanese, but American wops as well. Personally, if I was Japanese, I would rather see the code of the samurai die out totally before seeing a little black girl adopt it as hinted at the end of Ghost Dog. Ultimately, an intertextual celluloid turd that, rather absurdly, is seemingly meant to stroke the egos of film school fanboys and culturally confused negroes who are down with the old school "Land of the Rising Sun," Ghost Dog is celluloid cultural mongrelization at its most stylistically superficial and soulless, as if a diehard atheist 'true believer' attempted to make a metaphysical martial arts film. Featuring old wop gangsters practicing their own brand of feminism by shooting female cops ("they want to be equal...I made her equal") and respecting black men for killing them ("there's one good thing about this Ghost Dog guy...He's sending us out the old way...Like real fucking gangsters"), Ghost Dog manages to compile everything that is culturally and spiritually retarded about America and disseminate it through a bastardized and negrofied pseudo-Far-East package of pomo hip-hop puffery that reminds one why America is devolving into a third world sewer of racial and cultural chaos. Call me nostalgic, but I prefer the Sicilian mafia to the Bloods and the Crips any day because at least they knew how to dress and keep their pants around their waist.

GLEN AND RANDA

Jim McBride (1971)

Although just mere speculation on my part, I have to assume that if a nuclear holocaust or any other sort of apocalyptic scenario ever really went down, hippie, hipsters, beatnik, and other passive pansy untermenschen rabble would be the first to die, hence I think a dystopian avant-garde work like Glen and Randa (1971)—a film featuring an almost all-long-haired-hippie-cast oftentimes frolicking around naked and making ‘free love’—is a tad bit too unrealistic. Directed by McJewish auteur Jim McBride, who is probably best known for his semi-autobiographical docu-fiction debut David Holzman’s Diary (1967), his Godard remake Breathless (1983) starring Richard Gere, the multi-genre crime-thriller-romance hybrid The Big Easy (1986), and especially the Jerry Lee Lewis biopic Great Balls of Fire! (1989) starring Dennis Quaid and Winona Ryder, Glen and Randa is a sort of offbeat and laidback pre-Mad Max post-civilization piece about a seemingly half-autistic feral hippie boy and his equally unclad and mentally challenged girlfriend who decide to trek across a rural wasteland to reach the imaginary city of ‘Metropolis,’ which the boy reads about in a vintage Wonder Woman comic book. Sort of like a stripped and bare-bones American independent take on Vera Chytilová’s Fruit of Paradise (1970) aka Ovoce stromu rajských jíme, albeit minus the kaleidoscopic imagery and special effects, as a sort of counter-culture influenced reworking of the story of Adam and Eve, McBride’s film seems like it was actually made for a post-apocalyptic population, as a superlatively slow-moving flick that will surely put to sleep and/or severely irritate most ADD-addled contemporary audiences. Indeed, set in a world where broken televisions, horses, comic books, and outmoded sex technique manuals are quite intriguing to the borderline infantile protagonists, who have never seen such things before, Glen and Randa is a sort of subtle yet paradoxically overemphasized reminder how tainted modern humans have become. A sort of post-Christian pagan parable as co-penned by talented novelist/screenwriter Rudy Wurlitzer (Two-Lane Blacktop, Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid, Walker), McBride’s celluloid second genesis is probably the most benign and pure of spirit X-rated films ever made. Certainly a work of its zeitgeist such that the director has confessed that he was high at least half the time he made it, Glen and Randa seems like the more bitter than sweet results of what might have happened had the hippies got their decidedly deluded dreams of “simpler times” and “greater self-reliance.” Despite being listed as one of the top 10 films of 1971 by Time Magazine, the film essentially fell into celluloid ash heap of history immediately after it was released due to poor distribution, among other things, thus making for one of the best and strangest kept secrets of both counter-culture and post-apocalyptic cinema. Indeed, a film has to be doing something right if I somehow managed to enjoy it despite the fact that it was made by drugged out hippies for drugged out hippies.

Glen (played by Steve Curry, who is probably best known for being one of the various one-time husbands of buxty Warhol superstar turned TV actress Patti D'Arbanville) is a sort of neo-caveman who lives in a primitive post-apocalyptic world and enjoys the simpler things in life like creating stone tools and tickling his girlfriend Randa's flesh flower with flowers. Despite living in a sub-hunter-gatherer fashion, Glen and his extremely petite girlfriend Randa (played by Shelley Plimpton, who appeared in counter-culture cult classics like the 1960 works Robert Downey Sr.'s Putney Swope and Arthur Penn's Alice's Restaurant) fight like contemporary lovers, as neither of them seems to agree with one another on anything aside from their mutual love of fucking one another. Despite not having electricity or even clothes, the two lovers find much fun, excitement, and adventure in their lives. Indeed, at the beginning of the film, the two find a totaled car in a train and make love in it. Unfortunately, their tree-based carnal pleasure is probably responsible for the pregnancy that will ultimately result in Randa's death. Both Glen and Randa live for figurative 'Forbidden Fruit,' but it is the former's desire for finding a seemingly mystical city where people can apparently fly that will inspire the two to take a deadly trek in a land that they know nothing about. Of course, if their innocence was not already lost beforehand, it is certainly lost after the pilgrimage.

Things ultimately change for Glen and Randa when they meet a nomadic Magician (Gary Goodrow) on a motorcycle that proclaims he is "not here to steal your food or feel your women" or "grab your stuff or treat you rough" but "here to play" and provide "fun and games." The Magician seems like a creepy pedophile with unsavory intentions, but he does provide the "fun and games" as he advertised, including introducing the two lovers to the poetry of English Romantic poet John Keats, as well as a beat-up vintage Wonder Woman comic book that will inspire Glen and his lady love to travel to the city of 'Metropolis' where people can fly. After reciting, "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever: Its loveliness increases; it will never pass into nothingness; but still will keep a bower quiet for us, and a sleep full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing," from the beginning of Keats' 1818 poem "Endymion," the Magician states of the poet, "That guy died when he was 25...I guess that's the name of the game." Unfortunately for Randa, she will come to know the name of the game all too well. Aside from Keats and Wonder Woman, the Magician also introduces the lovers and various other rural hobos to The Rolling Stones via a scratched LP of "Time Is On My Side." If something is for sure, Glen and Randa have a lot of time on their hands, or so it seems.

While the Magician, who grew up in the Bronx and was apparently 15 years old when "the whole place was totaled," warns Glen and Randa to forget the city, they decide to ignore his wise words and begin their pilgrimage across the wilderness where they meet a new friend in the form of a horse that they are initially scared of and mistake for a camel. Indeed, upon bumping into the horse, Glen pathetically pleads to it, "don't hurt us, we just want to go to the city," as if the wild beast can talk. Naturally, as the film will demonstrate, the horse should have more reason to be afraid of the two humans than the other way around. While the two bring canned foods and boxes of matches upon which to survive, they soon run out of their supplies and before they know it they are eating roly pollies that they find crawling in a totaled car near a river bank. Glen also manages to catch and beat a gigantic fish to death on the way. Of course, things eventually become rather desperate when the two reach a rocky mountain, so they are forced to eat their beloved horse, though Glen has to literally force that meat down his terribly delicate girlfriend's throat, as she is disgusted by the whole ordeal of having to devour her new four-legged friend. Unfortunately, Randa also discovers that she is pregnant, so it is probably not a good time for her to be starving in the middle of the wilderness. Luckily, the two lovers eventually reach a scenic beach just in the nick of time where they meet a kindly yet semi-senile old fart named Sidney Miller (played by Woody Chambliss, who appeared in the made-for-TV 1972 cult flick Gargoyles and Robert Fuest's 1975 career-capitulating work The Devil's Rain featuring Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey and John Travolta), who has not seen another human being in 20 years and gladly gives them a dilapidated house that, in spite of being covered in moss and missing part of its roof, Randa can reside in until she gives birth. Indeed, to the slight chagrin of Sidney, Glen tosses out a skeleton that is lying on the couch in the home and makes himself comfortable. Of course, the anonymous skeleton will not be the last piece of human remains that will grace the meta-humble abode.

Upon talking to Sidney, Glen learns that a city that "used to be a city called Boise" used to exist only 10 miles away from the house but it apparently burned down long ago. Of course, that does not stop Glen from maintaining his almost religious dream of reaching his much idealized imagery utopia of 'Metropolis.' Meanwhile, Randa becomes increasingly lethargic due to her pregnancy and Glen ignorantly complains to her that she should stop acting like she is sick all the time, not realizing just how exhausting gestation can be. Glen also finds some old books around the home and begins developing an idealized view of civilization, so when Randa urinates on the floor of the home in a frolicsome fashion, he freaks out and yells the following while pronouncing about half the words wrong: "We're not animals; we're people. We have to start living like people. We have to be civilized." When Glen finds an old book on various sex techniques, he decides to try them out on Randa, but her pregnancy has made her too incapacitated to derive pleasure from such things. When Glen does finally get her to have sex, he does so in front of horny old geezer Sidney, but their pleasure ends during mid-coitus when Sidney touches the young lady's stomach and she begins to go into labor. While Randa manages to give birth to a healthy baby boy, she dies in the process, so Sidney burns her body inside the dilapidated home in a ritualistic fashion, with Glen not quite realizing that his lady love is gone forever. At Glen's demand of reaching Metropolis and against Sidney's better judgment as an old man who has "never been anywhere else before," the young man, old man, and baby get in an old small sailboat and begin to sail to an ostensible utopia. The End.

Interestingly, in a 30+ minute interview featured as an extra feature on the 2009 DVD release of Glen and Randa by VCI Entertainment, director Jim McBride explains in an unintentionally humorous fashion how he remembers virtually nothing about production of his minimalistic post-apocalyptic sci-fi flick nor what inspired him to direct the film in the first place. When the interviewer asks McBride if he attempted to use certain metaphors in the film, the director denies it and simply states, "It's just a movie." As to whether the film was supposed to have a message or not, McBride stoically states, "not really." In fact, the director more or less discredits the film, even describing it as "embarrassing," though adding: "I shouldn't be putting down my own movie on camera for the DVD...and I don't mean it as a putdown but it really is something of another time that just seems a little odd in the present. You know, it's useful to look at these ancient artifacts...particularly for a younger generation, because it does reflect something about the times that your standard, pop-culture, Hollywood movies may not have really reflected." Indeed, Glen and Randa is, in its essence, gloriously outmoded to the point where some younger viewers might think it is a collection of deleted scenes from Michael Wadleigh's 1970 Woodstock documentary and the fact that McBride stated of the production, "I was stoned half the time and I really don't remember it all that well [...] We really were a hippie production" is certainly no surprise, but luckily it lacks the bellbottoms, bad music, and senseless sense of optimism typical of similarly themed works. With its utilization of a real, half-demolished house covered in plants, rusted derailed train cars submerged in water, and moss-covered antique automobiles in trees, Glen and Randa also has a sort of mystifying intrigue about it that Werner Herzog might describe as "ecstatic truth." A strangely 'cozy' celluloid odyssey of perennial aimlessness that makes the post-apocalyptic realm seem lonely and banal yet at the same time, paradoxically exciting as it would probably be if most of humanity was really wiped out in a devastating nuclear holocaust, Glen and Randa may not be an unsung masterpiece or a super sophisticated analysis on the failing of civilization and humanity as a whole, but it is certainly one of the most idiosyncratic and delightfully 'lighthearted' post-apocalyptic flicks I have ever seen, as a sort of American big brother to the equally eccentric and experimental Spanish post-nuclear-holocaust sci-fi flick Animales racionales (1983) aka Human Animals directed by Eligio Herrero, albeit minus the darkly humorous dog-on-girl style comic relief. Although somewhat disputable, Glen and Randa also has the distinction of being one of the few quasi-pro-doomsday flicks ever made. Indeed, while the lead characters live like hippie hobos and one of them even dies a painful death that ultimately denies her the opportunity to raise her child, there is a certain purity to their sub-meager existences that almost seems heavenly, which is certainly not something I can say of similarly themed works, which tend to fetishize the modern world, as if the death of Americanization, globalization, technocracy, bureaucracy and other contemporary social ills would be a bad thing.

BREATHLESS
BREATHLESS

Jim McBride (1983)

While I am one of those assumedly many people that hoped that the urban legend that leading man Richard Gere shoved gerbils up his ass for sexual satisfaction was true and find the remaking of popular European arthouse films to be one of Hollywood's more pernicious culture-distorting practices, I cannot deny that I am a recently converted fan of Breathless (1983) aka A Bout de Souffle Made in USA directed by Jim McBride (The Big Easy, The Wrong Man). A fairly unwanted and seemingly absurd big budget Hollywood remake of La Nouvelle Vague alpha-auteur Jean-Luc Godard's undeniably groundbreaking black-and-white debut feature À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless co-written by François Truffaut, the fairly unloved cinematic might be one of the greatest examples of the film maudit in cinema history but it ultimately proved to be seemingly infinitely more entertaining and romantic to me than its almost unanimously respected French predecessor. Seeing as I found Godard's film to be one of the most decidedly disappointing films I have ever seen in terms of its importance in the context of cinema history, I initially had absolutely nil interest in watching a Hollywoodized Breathless remake set in Los Angeles and starring Mr. Gere, but after reading that legendary underground auteur George Kuchar (Hold Me While I'm Naked, The Devil's Cleavage) modeled his performance as a macho tranny-killing brute in the underrated experimental horror-comedy Screamplay (1985) directed by one-time-auteur Rufus Butler Seder after the lead in McBride's remake, I found myself somewhat intrigued and decided to give it a watch, thereupon ultimately discovering a somewhat shockingly engrossing and genuinely romantic love story with sex appeal. Somewhat ironically, Godard's arthouse flick was heavily influenced by less than respectable American B-movies, which is the undeserved status that McBride's remake would eventually obtain as a quasi-softcore lovers-on-the-run flick featuring a super sassy, sensual, and somewhat stupid yet thankfully oftentimes unclad frog babe with an extra erotic accent that probably millions of teenage boys masturbated to while it was aired on cable TV during the 1980s alongside similarly fun filmic trash like Paul Schrader's Gere vehicle American Gigolo (1980). Directed by a fellow from a self-described "normal middle-class, half-Jewish, half-Irish upbringing" who first gained attention among cinephiles and cineastes for his experimental docufiction piece David Holzman's Diary (1967) starring screenwriter L.M. Kit Carson (who co-penned Breathless) as a young Godard-quoting filmmaker and who went on to direct everything from X-rated counterculture-themed arthouse dystopian flicks like Glen and Randa (1971) to stupid bawdy Porky's-esque sex-comedies like Hot Times (1974) aka A Hard Day for Archie, McBride's Breathless is a stylish and sexy 'true romance' that is full of love and life and has very little in common with the Godard flick to the point where it would almost be disingenuous to describe it as a remake. Indeed, thankfully McBride did not pull a Gus van Sant and assemble a sterile and pointless shot-for-shot remake, but instead he completely revamped the entire story and aesthetic to the point that the average American viewer would never suspect that it was a reworking of a French art film that completely changed world cinema and highly influenced the proliferation of the auteur theory in Europe and eventually the United States.

Featuring a tastelessly charming rockabilly-fueled lady's man and super slick car thief that finds inspiration from reading Silver Surfer comics and considers fighting for the body and soul of the woman that he loves to be the most important objective in his life as opposed to a goofy frog petty criminal that lives a pathetic parasitic existence and is more infatuated with an ugly mug like Humphrey Bogart than his blonde dingbat girlfriend like in Godard's flick, McBride's Breathless films pays intercultural homage to its predecessor in a couple of ways, most notably in terms of the female lead. Indeed, instead of a boyish American love interest with a blonde dyke haircut like in Godard's flick, the film features a classically feminine brunette French female lead. Of course, what makes the casting even more interesting is that Richard Gere and his 'French' costar Valérie Kaprisky (who is actually of Polish, Argentinean, and Turkish extraction) were actually extremely sexually attracted to one another in real-life and their carnal chemistry is quite obvious onscreen to the point where even when the two are fighting, you can tell that they really want to fuck each other's brains out (in fact, Kaprisky once went so far as to say that the love scenes were not acting, stating, "It was wonderful working with Richard...He [Gere] gives you everything to react to. We were not acting the love scenes. They were half real. You can't say you act only when they say 'Action!'...I think it shows in the movie. If you don't really feel like doing it, it shows."). Not surprisingly, Kaprisky had previously starred in a couple pieces of European cinematic erotica, including alongside swarthy bisexual kraut heartthrob Horst Buchholz in English auteur Robert 'Dr. Phibes' Fuest's fairly disappointing softcore swansong Aphrodite (1982) and she was ultimately discovered by Breathless producer Martin Erlichman (who is probably best remembered today for the quite dubious achievement of discovering singularly vulgar and repellant Jewess Barbra Streisand) after he came upon bootleg nude photographs of the actress, though it was apparently Gere that actually selected her for the role after flying to Paris and picking the most sensually sound frogette (of course, Kaprisky makes Jean Seberg in Godard's film seem like a bratty little boy by comparison). In fact, in a similar sense to Robert De Niro (who incidentally was apparently interested in playing Gere's role) with Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1996), Gere acted as a sort of secondary auteur on the film, or as director McBride once stated himself, the actor "was a collaborator [and] a co-conspirator" who "worked on the final version of the script, was interested in the art direction, [and] sat in on casting." As someone that typically cannot stand even looking at Gere, let alone seeming him portraying a sort of archetypal alpha-male, Breathless ultimately managed to do the seemingly impossible by inspiring me to root for the man (or at least his character) just as much I rooted for the ice-axe in Joseph Losey's The Assassination of Trotsky (1972).

The story of a self-described “all or nothing” kind of car thief who accidentally kills a cop and plans to flee to Mexico yet has fallen in love with a feisty French college student and thus postpones his self-imposed exile until she agrees to do him the grand honor of being his main babe so that they can commence a happy storybook life together, Breathless ultimately not only depicts how society and the world in general oftentimes destroys lovers and their romantic ambitions, but also the perennial relationship plague of female decisiveness as well as how members of the so-called fairer sex oftentimes have the (anti)emotional capacity to betray their true love because he does not fit perfectly into their big idealistic plans for the future. In that sense, the film is even more relevant today than when it was first released over three decades ago, as we now live in an uniquely ungodly age where the rotten fruits of feminism have reached an all-time high in the United States and especially Europe as reflected by defeatist men's rights movements like MGTOW and the hordes of unhappy childless spinsters in their 30s and 40s who have nothing to show for their lives aside from an intrinsically worthless career that contributes virtually nothing to society aside from more bureaucracy and mindless consumerism (indeed, places like Starbucks would go out of business without these women). Indeed, McBride's film might look, feel, and sound like your typical big dumb stupid Hollywood studio film, but it contains a philosophically insightful love story in the tragic spirit of classic works like the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice and Tristan and Iseult and thus naturally concludes in a less than happy fashion (though the ending is hardly as cynical as the one featured in Godard's film). In that sense, Breathless is a pure and unadulterated romance flick for real men who value testicular fortitude and loathe white knight faggots, so-called ‘male feminists,’ hipster homos, autistic tech dorks with yellow fever, and culturally cuckolded wiggers, among other rabble who do not deserve a real woman.

Jesse Lujack (Richard Gere) is a sort proletarian man's man who refuses to live by anyone's rules and sees the lyrics of Jerry Lee Lewis and the personal philosophy of fictional Marvel comic hero The Silver Surfer as a passionate and practical Weltanschauung to live by. Indeed, while Jesse highly respects the fact that the Silver Surfer is constantly thinking about his lover even though she is trapped in a totally different galaxy, Lewis' songs provide him with both the dance moves and prole ‘poetry’ he needs to let a lady know how much he loves her. Although not actually depicted in the film, while in Las Vegas, Jesse hooked up with a hot young French architecture student named Monica Poiccard (Valérie Kaprisky of Andrzej Zulawski's La femme publique (1984) aka The Public Woman) and during their couple days of sharing carnal knowledge with one another, the protagonist fell in love with her, or so the viewer soon learns at the beginning of Breathless after he suavely steals a “Little Baby Porsche” in front of a casino and then begins driving through the desert to make his way to Los Angeles so he can reunited with his beloved and make her his outlaw queen. It is quite apparent that Jesse truly loves Monica because at the very beginning of the film he does not think twice about blowing off a beautiful big bodied blonde that practically throws herself at him. While cruising through the desert, Jesse practices ways to ask Monica to come to Mexico with him, stating, “All right. So, first I go get the money, and then I go ask Monica. I say, ‘Monica, you ever been to Mexico, honey?’ I say—I say, ‘Monica, darling, you coming to Mexico with me? Monica, you’re coming to Mexico with me!’ Me and Monica. ‘Cause I’m gonna tell you how it’s gonna be. Mon-a, Monica and me. Me and Monica. Yeah, me and Monica go to Mexico.” After ironically declaring, “I know what we need. We need the killer” in regard to listening to a Jerry Lee Lewis song, Jesse discovers a handgun in the glove compartment of the stolen car that will soon get him into some serious trouble in a way that might destroy all his big plans. When Jesse proceeds to drive like a jackass through the desert to impress some young sluts in another car, he soon finds a police car trying to pull him over, so he naturally decides to get away since he’s driving a stolen automobile. Unfortunately, after opting to drive through a roadblock in an attempt to outrun the cop, Jesse crashes his car and in the process causes it to get stuck in a ditch. When the officer finally catches up to him and threatens him by yelling things to him like, “Get away from the car, I’ll blow you away!,” Jesse ‘accidentally’ ends up shooting and killing the cop. Of course, it is not long until the media begins dubbing Jesse the “I-15 Killer” and cops begin hunting for him everywhere, so he must act quick to get both money and Monica so that he can establish a little piece of paradise somewhere south of the border where most sane gringos would never dare go.

As a man that is wholly willing to risk his life for love, Jesse naturally refuses to leave without Monica, even when she routinely acts like a fiercely frigid cunt when he comes to see her. Indeed, when Jesse decides to surprise Monica by randomly showing up at her university, she is hardly happy but instead bitches like a cold witch on the rag who would rather see him dead. To Monica’s credit, Jesse shows up in the middle of a college exam where Monica is showing a small model of a building that she has designed and begins both verbally and physically assaulting her seemingly sapless teachers while pretending to be a janitor, so it is only natural that she would be mad at the protagonist, but not really for the reasons that the viewer initially suspects. Indeed, like most modern women, Monica is a self-absorbed social-climber who is geared towards engaging in hypergamy and who seems more interested in having a successful career than having children and a family with the man she loves as demonstrated by the fact that she is fucking her dorky and impotent architect professor Paul (William Tepper, who played the lead in Jack Nicholson's underrated X-rated quasi-arthouse debut Drive, He Said (1971)), who is the complete opposite of wild gentleman Jesse as a groveling beta-bitch academic who seems like he would auto-ejaculate in his pants if a woman merely touched his leg. Apparently, Monica left Jesse in the middle of the night during their lurid love affair in Las Vegas, thus hinting that she is afraid of love and emotional commitment, so it is no surprise that she gets scared when Jesse passionately declares to her, "...I'm desperate for you, Monica. You know what it's like blasting along the highway, going like ninety, maybe a hundred miles an hour? All of a sudden there's this dip in the road. It likes to suck your guts out. Your breath is gone. That's me around you, sugar. That's me. BREATHLESS." In fact, Monica admits so much when she responds to Jesse's remarks by practically crying, "You scare me, Jesse. You can't just burst into a person's life and explode it all up like this [sighs] Las Vegas was a holiday. This is my life." Of course, Jesse is determined to make himself the most important part of her life, even if he is a petty con turned fugitive who is wanted for the murder of a police officer.

Upon arriving in Los Angeles, Jesse wastes no time in breaking into Monica's apartment building by pretending to be a Mexican pool boy and then making himself at home in her flat after picking the lock on her front-door. When Jesse randomly discovers a photograph of Monica and her professor Paul at Disney world while snooping around his lover's apartment, he tears the romantically hapless teacher out of the photo while calling him a "smuck" and then pockets the pic for himself. Despite the fact that she was willing to have sex with him when they were total strangers, Monica constantly cock-blocks Jesse when he initially arrives in LA because she seems to want to continue her phony love affair with Paul so that she can further her academic career and does not want to emotionally complicate things. Indeed, at one point, Jesse literally asks Monica, "Why are you so afraid to sleep with me again?" and she replies "Because you scare me. I don't know what you want from me," thus revealing that she is denial that one can actually have a romance with another person that is based purely on love and not merely personal gain. Of course, Jesse reveals to Monica the error of her ways when he remarks to her, "you're like one of those girls who'll fuck everybody in the whole world...except the guy who loves her." Like with a lot of women, it is ultimately the small sentimental things that Jesse does for her that makes Monica realize that he truly loves her. Indeed, when Jesse randomly robs a tranny that is taking a dump in a stall in a Hispanic bar restroom, he discovers a blinking light-up heart necklace in the shemale's purse and gives it to Monica, who cherishes the completely childish piece of jewelry to the point that she wears it all the time, even though it looks quite preposterous on such a sexually mature woman.

When Monica quotes her favorite author William Faulkner's line, "Between grief and nothing, I will take grief," and asks Jesse which one he would choose if he had a choice, the protagonist stoically replies “nothing” because, as he extra confidently states, “Like I told you, baby, all or nothing with me.” Although Monica, who certainly has a melancholic essence about her, prefers “grief” over “nothing,” she seems impressed with Jesse’s reply as demonstrated by the fact that she proceeds to make love to him, but her professor Paul interrupts by leaving a would-be-flirty message on the heroine’s answering machine that pisses the protagonist off. Quite irked at the fact that his lady love is sexually servicing an obnoxious academic dork who is probably too big of a pansy to even penetrate a puss, Jesse pushes Monica away, unplugs the answering machine, and then throws it in another room while the heroine, who is completely naked, opts to get out of the awkward situation by going into the bathroom and taking a shower. While Monica is showering, Jesse’s anxiety and depression is only worsened when he sees a special news report on TV about how he is a fugitive cop-killer and how the police are currently leading a manhunt to find him, but luckily the protagonist manages to get out of his depression by simply singing Elvis lyrics. Indeed, Jesse then proceeds to invade the bathroom and loudly sing to his beloved while simultaneously stripping his clothes, “I can’t walk out... Because I love you too much baby. Why can’t you see what you’re doing to me when you don’t believe a word I say? We can’t go on together with suspicious minds and we can’t build our dreams on suspicious minds,” which are words that certainly parallel the dubious circumstances of their relationship. Monica is certainly delighted with the protagonist’s solo performance, as Jesse proceeds to penetrate her in the shower and then the two conclude their carnal session in the bedroom. When Monica gets out of bed to get dressed, Jesse passionately states to her without the slightest hint of irony, “Hey. Don’t take a shower. I want us to smell like we’ve been fucking,” which is a sentiment that anyone that has fallen in love can identify with. From there, Jesse begins describing to Monica about the mythos of the Silver Surfer and how the rather romantic superhero is always thinking about his girlfriend despite the fact that the two lovers are, “trapped on two different galaxies.” Jesse’s romantic remarks about the Silver Surfer incite a deep emotional reaction in Monica as she then proceeds to confess to the protagonist in regard to her extremely confused and stereotypical female worries, “I’m afraid because I’d like you to love me. And then – I don’t know. I wish you wouldn’t love me. You don’t fit into my plan for my life.” Indeed, assumedly brainwashed by a lifetime’s worth of frog style feminist brainwashing, Monica is highly idealistic about establishing a career as a successful architect even though her intelligence and fashion sense hints that she does not even have the artistic prowess to compete with a third rate queer fashion designer, let alone design fancy and innovative buildings. When Monica confesses to Jesse that she might be pregnant, he seems shocked at first but soon gets very happy, at least until his lady love abruptly declares, “Why don’t you understand me, Jesse? I have to think about the future,” to which he fittingly replies, “The future is bullshit,” thus causing her to act out like a petulant child who is pissed because her daddy will not buy her a pony. Indeed, Jesse might be a man with nothing to lose, but his indestructible love for Monica is not something the female protagonist can simply purchase after she has become a successful architect, hence her mixed emotions.

When Jesse drops off Monica to meet with a famous French architect named Dr. Boudreaux (played by Ukrainian-born French producer designer and director Eugène Lourié, who got his start working with Jean Renoir and later went on to directed Hollywood sci-fi flicks like The Beast from 20,000 Fathoms (1953)), he is identified as the fugitive cop-killer by an old Jewish man that is sitting in front of the ancient Mishkon Tephilo Synagogue located where Venice meets Santa Monica in West LA, but luckily he manages to get away and then goes to a junkyard to sell a stolen convertible to an obscenely sleazy Hebraic con named Birnbaum (played by Art Metrano of Police Academy 2 (1985) and Police Academy 3 (1985), who incidentally currently has a one-man comedy tour called "Jews Don't Belong On Ladders...An Accidental Comedy"). Birnbaum dresses like a dipsomaniac slob that jerks off to Beach Boys music videos and grotesquely sucks on a Popsicle like it is a cock while he is conducting business with Jesse, who soon realizes that he is doing business with an unscrupulous scumbag. To make a long story short, Jesse beats and robs Birnbaum and his Mexican underling after the gutter grade kosher conman refuses to pay him for the convertible that he stole him by threatening to call the cops on him since he is a fugitive. Meanwhile, Monica is harassed by two completely humorless and absurdly anally retentive cops who threaten to arrest her if she does not tell them where Jesse is, so she lies to them and tells them he is headed to San Francisco. When Jesse subsequently happens upon one of the cops harassing Monica, he immediately steals a car, runs over the officer, and then coerces his lady love into getting into the automobile, thus ushering in their sex-filled outlaw road trip.

Considering she is actively evading the police while on the run with a fugitive cop-killer and thus has probably already completely ruined both her academic career and personal life, among other things, one would assume that Monica has finally become completely dedicated to Jesse and is happy to live an outlaw lifestyle and start a family with her bad boy toy in rural Mexico, but of course it is only a matter of time before her stereotypical female anxiety comes into play and threatens to completely ruin everything, most especially the man she loves most. When she and Jesse manage to escape from a virtual army of armed cops that raid an underground New Wave club, Monica seems to practically have an orgasm as a result of the experience even though she badly cuts her hand in the process. In fact, the two lovers subsequently seek shelter in an antiquated movie theater that is screening Gun Crazy (1950) aka Deadly Is the Female directed by Joseph H. Lewis and starring Peggy Cummins and John Dall and while the movie is playing they make love with one another even though the screening room is full of people. While making passionate love, Monica quotes a line from the film where lead actress Cummins declares, "I don't want to be afraid of life or anything else," but of course fear and anxiety will eventually get the best of her. After wantonly watching the movie, Jesse lets Monica pick out a car to steal, so she chooses a red El Dorado convertible and then the two head to a place called 'The Pines,' which is at the ruins of "famous crazy fucker" Errol Flynn's mansion, for the night until they can meet the protagonist's suave Guido criminal friend Tony Berrutti (Garry Goodrow) the next morning to get money so that they can finally make their way to Mexico. That night while parked at the "Honeymoon Suite" (aka an old swimming pool) of the Pines, Monica unwittingly reveals that she is having second thoughts about going with Jesse to Mexico by asking her beau a series of questions about what they will do for money in the future. Of course, when Jesse acts somewhat aggravated with Monica the next morning when she attempts to flirt with him while he is tuning up the El Dorado, the female heroine begins to panic.

When Monica discovers that the heart necklace that Jesse gave her is cracked after she drops it on the ground, she completely succumbs to female superstition and sees it as a serious sign that their relationship is ruined. Ultimately, Monica betrays Jesse by calling the cops from a payphone after the protagonist makes the stupid mistake of telling her to go to a nearby convenience store to buy imperative things like, "a carton of milk, some ding dongs, [and a] newspaper." After betraying her beau, Monica then goes back to him and attempts to rationalize her treachery by stating to him in a fairly hysterical fashion, "I don't wanna love you. I don't want to go with you. Just now when I went down the hill, I wanted to keep going on. I was not gonna come back. I was not going to come back! But I knew you would come after me, and I knew you wouldn't stop coming after me [...] That's why I called the polices...so that you would have to go." Of course, Jesse refuses to leave and instead goes to meet Berrutti as planned to get the money, but the only thing that his friend, who is naturally afraid of getting busted by the cops, gives him is a handgun. Just as Berrutti abruptly drives away and Jesse tosses the gun on the ground, a number of police cars show up and a cop demands that the protagonist put his hands in the air. While Jesse initially follows the cop's orders and raises his arms air, he soon begins dancing and singing the lyrics from the eponymous Jerry Lee Lewis song, "If you're gonna love me, lover please don't tease. If I can hold you, honey let me squeeze" while lovingly staring at Monica. Naturally, Monica is totally moved by Jesse's inordinately romantic performance and proceeds to run up to him while crying, "Jesse! I love you, Jesse!" thus inspiring the protagonist to grab the gun and point it at the cops in a true demonstration that he is really an "all or nothing" kind of guy. One can only assume that the cops unleash a storm of bullets on Jesse after he puts his gun on them, but the viewer never finds out as Breathless concludes with a still shot of the protagonist aiming his weapon at the police in what is indubitably auteur McBride's (pseudo)Godardian equivalent to a Hollywood ending.

While one of the main reasons I loathe alpha-fan-boy filmmaker Quentin Tarantino is because I think that he has absolutely horrendous taste in cinema despite being such an obsessive cinephile, I can at least respect him to a marginal degree for acknowledging that McBride's Breathless is an underrated classic of sorts. In fact, Tarantino is such a huge fan of the film that he not only featured a poster of it in his partially lost black-and-white debut film My Best Friend's Birthday (1987), but also included a Silver Surfer poster in Reservoir Dogs (1992) in tribute to protagonist Jesse's love of the superhero. Of course, the script Tarantino penned for True Romance (1993) was also obviously heavily influenced by Breathless. Additionally, both Serbian auteur Emir Kusturica's Time of the Gypsies (1988) aka Dom za vesanje and avant-garde auteur Thom Andersen's experimental documentary Los Angeles Plays Itself (2003) pay tribute to the flick, with the latter cinematic work featuring excerpts of McBride's film spliced in throughout. Speaking of Andersen's film, Breathless features the most ambitious use of Los Angeles and its landscapes that I have ever seen in a film aside from sadomasochistic experimental gay pornographer Fred Halsted's masterpiece LA Plays Itself (1972), which portrays the city as a sort of concrete jungle that is being perpetually being consumed by industrialization. Indeed, watching the LA depicted in big budget Hollywood blockbusters oftentimes makes me feel completely nauseated due to the seeming outstanding superficiality and singular soullessness of the city in these films, yet Breathless gives the West Coast metropolis a sort of truly magical feel that has not been seen since the great cinematic works of Hollywood's Golden Age. Certainly McBride's film could not be any further away from Godard's static and fairly prosaic film in terms of both spirit and aesthetics. Notably, when interviewed by Film Comment in 2013 about his film and its relation to Godard's original work, auteur McBride remarked, "I would call it an exploitation of the Godard movie [laughs]. Look, I was a huge fan of the original film. If it was only one thing, then Breathless was the thing that made me want to make movies. But in reality, the chance to make a remake of this film that I loved so much came up rather accidentally, and once it was going to actually happen it seemed to me ludicrous. I felt terribly embarrassed! I was really just taking advantage of an opportunity that gave me a chance to direct a movie. Of course, as Kit Carson and I were writing it, it grew into its own thing [...] by the end it was something very different from the original, for better or worse." Arguably, if Breathless was not a remake of a classic French arthouse film, it would probably be more revered and respected today instead of simply being regarded as a curious footnote of cinema history.

If Breathless is a shameless Hollywoodization of Godard's film, contemporary French auteur Bruno Dumont's fairly brutal arthouse horror flick Twenty-nine Palms (2003) seems almost like a ruthless rape and murder of McBride's film, as if the frog auteur was committing a sort of cinematic revenge against a mainstream American filmmaker who dared to defile one of his nation's most respected films. Indeed, while I have no clue if Dumont had the Gere vehicle in mind when he created his film, I could not help but notice the similarities between it and McBride's flick in terms of its depiction of a sex-heavy relationship between a stupid American philistine who drives fancy cars and his strikingly beautiful yet emotionally erratic French girlfriend. Quite unlike McBride's film, the male protagonist of Twentynine Palms is a conniving weakling and capitalist whore who has no real love for his girlfriend and seems to only see her as nothing more than an imported carnal delicacy that he goes to a great pains to erotically exploit while denying her true love and affection, among other things. While largely seen as big budget erotic kitsch nowadays, Breathless is, at least in my less than humble opinion, a shockingly enthralling work that probably can be regarded to heterosexual males what Gone with the Wind (1939) has been to countless generations of American women, as a truly epic romance flick with passion and pathos that at least semi-successfully expresses the emotional ups and downs of a great romance relationship in 100-minutes.

In its depiction of a man risking everything and putting all his time and energy into a romance that seems completely impractical and doomed to fail, Breathless features a scenario that many men who have fallen in love can completely relate to, which certainly cannot be said of Woody Allen flicks and the countless other Hollywood films where a neurotic Hebraic wuss is all lovelorn over a statuesque Shiksa that could probably kick his ass. Not surprisingly, McBride later went on to direct a Jerry Lee Lewis biopic entitled Great Balls of Fire! (1989) starring Dennis Quaid and Winona Ryder, but his filmmaking career essentially fizzled out after that and he has spent most of his career since the early 1990s directing TV movies and episodes for TV shows ranging from The Wonder Years (1990-1991) to Six Feet Under (2001). Directed by a man whose legendary debut David Holzman's Diary was shot under the Godardian cinephile philosophy that "cinema is truth twenty-four times per second," Breathless is probably my all-time favorite 'sellout' film an underground auteur turned Hollywood hack, even though I only saw it for the first time about two weeks ago. Showing no evidence that it was directed by a man that once was part of the underground (though the comic book sequences did remind me of Paul Morrissey's obscure pre-Warhol short The Origin of Captain America (1965)), McBride's shamelessly Hollywood-esque flick might not be a masterpiece but it is a quintessentially American movie in the best sort of way a flagrantly flashy, stupidly entertaining, and seductively stylish work that features an obscenely arrogant and hopelessly naive outlaw go-getter who is symbolic of the sort of people that once made American a great place. If there is anything you can learn from Breathless aside from that there is no way that a man that manhandles a hot French chick like Gere does in the film could have a fetish for shoving furry rodents up his manhole, it is that it is better to risk everything for love than to waste your most fertile and sexually virile years going to college so that you can eventually become a cold cunt career or bourgeois automaton.

BREATHLESS

Jim McBride (1983)

I finally got through finishing Jean-Luc Godard's Breathless. I originally attempted to watch the film a couple years ago and immediately felt disgusted with myself for actually watching 40 minutes into it. I didn't remember much of Breathless and for good reason. Breathless is as soulless as the existentialist world view that inspired it.

Breathless obviously inspired many of the more recent "auteurs" directors. I am sure Richard Linklater, Jim Jarmusch, and Quentin Tarantino were schooled with it. Keep in mind I do like a couple films from each of these directors (including Godard). Godard helped to innovate the horribly contrived philosophical conversations new "Independent" directors consider the highest expression of art. I felt embarrassed to be human after watching Richard Linklater's Before Sunset and Before Sunrise. Are honkies really that lame?

"Each cigarette is one step closer to death" I honestly can't think of one redeeming characteristic of Breathless. When French "badass" cop killer Michel finally is forced into closing his mouth via bullet, I did feel somewhat refreshed. But of course this wasn't enough to save Breathless. I'm not surprised that Michel's character was based on Humphrey Bogart. My hatred for this man cannot be accurately articulated.

Breathless appeals to the most pretentious of Marxist film fans. The reason for this is there's nothing in it to complain about. No racism, No sexism, No ageism, and No sign of life. Contrived sunglasses, half burnt cigarettes in mouths, and fancy hats make for the ideal COOL cosmopolitan criminal. But really, Michel seems more like the victim of a gang raping in Washington D.C.

"My sunglasses hide the inconceivable pain that my eyes reveal" If you want to watch a film that features boring dialog about questions in life that are somehow supposed to create the essence of their lives than Breathless is the film for you. Novelty intellectualism has been trendy for a while so this "masterpiece" hasn't tarnished. Contempt is my favorite film from Godard and the title sums up my feelings for the New Wave auteur. "I am the truest of auteurs. My films are my soul on celluloid." There's no doubt in my mind that Jean-Luc Godard truly feels cinema is dead. Breathless perfectly compliments that theory.

DEADBEAT AT DAWN
DEADBEAT AT DAWN

Jim Van Bebber (1988)

Deadbeat at Dawn is the first feature length film by director Jim Van Bebber. It would take the burnout genius almost another two decades to finish his second feature The Manson Family. Deadbeat at Dawn stars Van Bebber as Goose, gang leader of "The Ravens" who decides to quit his life of crime due to his love for his girlfriend. Sadly, Goose's girlfriend is murdered by members of rival gang "The Spiders." A psycho drug addict by the name of Bonecrusher even rips out Goose's girlfriend's intestines, which reminded him of "snakes."

I'll be honest. I think most action, kung-fu, and related films completely blow. Deadbeat at Dawn really has nothing to do with those films. The film is a sort of fucked avant garde action trash film which constantly resonates unexpected poetry both visually and lyrically. Van Bebber claims that he was inspired by everyone from Bruce Lee to Chuck Norris. I have even more respect for the film after knowing Van Bebber's unpretentious influences. All of his films have the distinctive Van Bebber auteur traits that border between artistic insanity and comedy.

Jim Van Bebber also had the genius idea of having a gang fight sequence take place in a graveyard. As soon as I saw the first graveyard scene in Deadbeat at Dawn, I knew that the film was a masterpiece. All of the other film's settings also compliment Deadbeat at Dawn's feeling of urban decay and over all American city failure. Jim Van Bebber performing his own stunts within this urban decay gives me the feeling that he's an individual that really knows how to get around in the city. Heads rolling down the road and throats getting ripped out also help to accentuate the overall urban shithole.

Goose's Dad is a psycho Vietnam War veteran that has both an opiate problem and a schizophrenia problem. He believes that Goose has gone over to the enemy's side and demands money so he can shoot it in his toes. Goose eventually ditches his deadbeat Dad and joins "The Ravens" again. He eventually starts wasting members of the "The Spiders" in a rage of revenge for both his girl and former gang members.

Deadbeat at Dawn is mandatory viewing for any serious fan of the horror, exploitation, or action film. The film makes me want to hunt down Jim Van Bebber and take away his bong so he will be more proactive about filmmaking. He dropped out of college and used his student loan money to make Deadbeat at Dawn. It would be good to see Van Bebber have the same type of ambition now with his filmmaking. Jim Van Bebber is without doubt one of the greatest filmmakers of the American underground. Deadbeat at Dawn is a film I always go back to.

MY SWEET SATAN

Jim Van Bebber (1994)

Jim van Bebber's short film My Sweet Satan is truly an American classic. The short centers a Satan worshipping drug dealer who kills one of his friends for stealing his hard earned cash. My Sweet Satan may also be funnier than all of the shorts Charlie Chaplin ever produced. Jim van Bebber is the darkest stoner director to ever live. He even took up a job at Wendy's to finish his masterpiece The Manson Family. My Sweet Satan manages to contain all of van Bebber's auteur signatures in one short but SWEET joyride. Satan approves!

I assume that Jim van Bebber was able to cast My Sweet Satan using his stoner friends. Despite its warped nature, the short has a certain realism that you could find only at a Black Sabbath reunion concert. The young mullet sporting man that gets his head smashed in looked like he was picked up at a trailer park cul-de-sac and given a 12 pack of Coors light to do the film. I would like to believe that the whole cast and crew of the film was intoxicated during its production.

Smoking bowls in graveyards in tribute to Satan is the ideal life for any American. The inability to do this is probably what really prompts My Sweet Satan's protagonist Ricky to hang himself in a prison cell. Jim van Bebber stars as the "Acid King" Satan worshiper. Before killing the unholy thief, van Bebber forces him to feed his shirt to the flames of Satan. Obviously Satan doesn't approve of this ritualistic act as the young mullet head is stripped naked and has his head stomped in.

Real Life Satan Worshiper Ricky Kasso

My Sweet Satan is based on the true events of Ricky "Acid King" Kasso who killed his friend Gary and later killed himself in jail. Jim van Bebber obviously could care less about Kasso as the short proves. Although coming out hilarious, I still don't know the van Bebber's emotional intent with My Sweet Satan. Drugs can do a lot of numbing.

It's a shame that the low budget short My Sweet Satan hasn't gotten the exposure that it deserves. Short films have always been neglected due to their inability to be properly marketed and seen by audiences. My Sweet Satan would great in a short film marathon featuring Luis Bunuel's Un Chien Andalou, Maya Deren's Meshes in the Afternoon, Rozz Williams Pig, and a couple Guy Maddin shorts. Jim van Bebber needs to start directing again.

THE MANSON FAMILY
THE MANSON FAMILY

Jim Van Bebber (1997)

Very few films fit into a category all alone. Jim Van Bebber's The Manson Family is one of those oh so rare films. Is The Manson Family a docudrama meant to scare the shit out of audiences so they realize the gruesomeness and depravity of the slaughters committed by "the family?" Or is The Manson Family a mockumentary about the brainwashed idiocy that Charles Manson indoctrinated his loyal followers with? Or even more to the point, is The Manson Family a film to have fun to and watch while stoned on weed and/or intoxicated on alcohol? In my humble opinion, I believe the film to be whatever you make of it. It seems that director Jim Van Bebber does not have any serious or concrete ideas as to why he made this cinematic masterpiece of Americana mayhem. Thankfully, The Manson Family was actually finished after about 15 years of production.

Jim Van Bebber makes no lie that real sex and drugs went down during the filming of The Manson Family. While watching the film, it is apparent real-life hedonism was to the realist advantage of the film. Despite how silly and goofy some of the family members seem in the film, I certainly felt that the actors lent a certain authenticity that most films about "true crime" lack. The Manson Family also has a psychedelic feeling that allows the viewer to become pseudo-disenchanted with reality and in tune with the nonsensical world of The Manson Family. I once screened the film for a bunch of young drunk rednecks and they became so agitated with the film that they aggressively made me turn it off. It was apparent that while watching The Manson Family, that these rednecks saw something about themselves they didn't like. Keep in mind that these young men were both drunk and stoned.

Of course, like virtually every other film ever made, The Manson Family has its flaws. The most glaring being the added subplot of contemporary Manson fans and their unnatural obsession with Sex, Drugs, and "Rock N Roll." Even many of the actors that played The Manson Family members were disappointed with this added group of bottom feeding losers. The subplot of contemporary Manson fans conspiring to kill a "piggy producer" just comes off as a stupid (and hopefully unintended) message about Manson's negative influence on American young adults. If I wanted to find about that, I would read Vincent Bugliosi's Helter Skelter. I figure that Jim Van Bebber added the new and unimproved footage so that The Manson Family would be at a longer running time.

I believe that The Manson Family is Jim Van Bebber's masterpiece. Honestly, I don't see the guy topping this film. Heck, I don't know if I can even see Jim Van Bebber completing another feature length film. When I watch Van Bebber's exciting and very unconventional action-packed film Deadbeat at Dawn, I see a promising director that looks like he will eventually make headlines in the future. Sadly, however it seems that drugs and alcohol have consumed too much of Jim Van Bebber's life for him to put his "all" into filmmaking. Honestly, after each time watching The Manson Family, it does not surprise me that it took two decades for Jim Van Bebber to complete two modest budget (but superb) films. Maybe if we take a bowl hit in tribute to Satan, that might change things?

GATOR GREEN

Leave it up to underground artsploitation auteur Jim Van Bebber (Deadbeat at Dawn, The Manson Family) to direct a film featuring a deranged drunken Vietnam War vet that refers to his pet alligators as “gooks” while feeding them the dismembered remains of an ex-Marine who committed the sin of seeing no action during the war. Indeed, such is the sickly sweet and sometimes strangely hypnotic scenario that plays out in the alcohol-addled outlaw auteur’s latest but unfortunately not greatest celluloid offering Gator Green (2013) starring Van Bebber himself in the lead role as a rather rowdy and always ruthless renegade redneck bar owner with a psychopathic sense of humor that moonlights as the leader of a sort of a killer cult made up of disgruntled war vets that spend their free time feeding pussy hippies and other (sub)human rabble to bloodthirsty alligators. Like the angrier, drunker, and more intemperately nihilistic bastard brood of Sam Peckinpah on acid, Van Bebber is a rare modern American filmmaker with big balls and an untamable spirit that is quite apparent in every single one of his films, including the hyper-kitschy horror fetish music videos that he directed for the death metal group Necrophagia. Unfortunately for cult horror cinephiles everywhere, Van Bebber also happens to be one of the most seemingly accursed and, in turn, uniquely unprolific auteur filmmakers of his era as a man who has only managed to complete two feature films and a handful of shorts over the course of over three decades despite conceiving countless different projects over this period of time. For example, it took Van Bebber nearly two decades to complete his modern cult classic The Manson Family (2003), which the director partly funded by regularly donating blood as well as working at the drive-thru window at a Wendy’s fast food restaurant. Indeed, aside from the countless projects that never left the pre-production stage (including a young Al Capone flick, which Dark Sky Films ultimately cancelled the funding for), Van Bebber has released a couple films that are essentially unfinished works, including the 4-minute Chunk Blower trailer (which was shot in 1990 on 35mm and was intended as a promo to inspire a potential investor to contribute $1 million dollars to the rather ambitious slasher production) and the ultra-violent Gein-esque 15-minute serial killer piece Roadkill: The Last Days of John Martin (1994). Unfortunately, the 15-minute short Gator Green, which was shot on 16mm and thankfully does not feature any digital special effects, is more or less what survives of another prematurely aborted Van Bebber feature. A promotional short that was Kickstarter-funded and apparently adapted from a sequence from the middle of Van Bebber’s feature-length script, the film certainly wets one’s lips with the promise of a gorgeously grotesque neo-psychedelic white trash monster flick of the pleasantly politically correct sort, thus it is almost disheartening watching the flick and realizing that it will most likely never be created. Like Tobe Hooper's much maligned third feature Eaten Alive (1976) meets Buddy Giovinazzo's aberrant art-shocker Combat Shock (1984) with a tinge of Luis Buñuel's The Young One (1960) aka La Joven, Gator Green was partly inspired by real-life Texas serial killer Joe "The Alligator Man" Ball who, like the lead character portrayed by Van Bebber, was a whacked out war vet that owned a bar and purportedly fed women to his beloved pet alligators. Although a work that clearly suffers from being a mere random fragment of a projected full-length feature, Van Bebber's film ultimately manages to effortlessly capture the neo-retro exploitation aesthetic and essence that both Tarantino and Rodriguez tried in vain to channel with their decidedly dumb double-feature Grindhouse (2007). Set in 1973, Gator Green is much like Van Bebber's arguable magnum opus The Manson Family (2003) in that it manages to bleed and cum the particular zeitgeist it depicts without seeming like the misguided masturbatory fantasy of an autistic fan-boy who wants to pay hyper-conscious to some totally worthless 1970s exploitation flick that no one cares about.

Beginning with a pleasantly politically incorrect title sequence that includes real stock footage of captured Vietcong gooks and multicultural American GIs, the film then features the following prologue: "Captain Jack Andrew has completed the construction of his much-ballyhooed tavern, 'The Gator Hooch'. Jack has hired his dabbled assistant door gunners from the Vietnam war, Harry Moore and Bobby Mackinaw. The three combat veterans have all committed atrocities in the war and have an unholy empathy for each." After the prologue, the film cuts to an outdoor shot of a goofy alligator-shaped bar superimposed with a title reading, "Sunday, June 17, 4:15 AM." Naturally, in the next shot, the viewer is taken inside the bar where discernibly deranged antihero Captain Jack Andrew (Jim Van Bebber) berates his old used up slut barmaid Lynette Taylor (Maureen Allisse) for doing nothing but "sittin' around here" and "drinking all of my booze." At the command of Captain Jack's wheelchair-bound comrade Bobby 'Bob' Mackinaw (Rogan Russell Marshall)—a crazed cripple with an impenetrable psycho stare and overall comically creepy persona due to the fact that he speaks through an electrolarynx—bar slut Lynette calls her similarly used up, chubby, and slutty looking daughter Chi Chi (Betanya Grant), who is the girlfriend of a preposterously arrogant longhaired blond hippie dope dealer named Hank Williams (played by Scott Gabbey, who also appears in American Guinea Pig: Bouquet of Guts and Gore (2014), which was shot by Van Bebber and directed by Gator Green co-producer/Unearthed Films owner Stephen Biro). Lynette sets up a drug deal between Captain Jack and Hank for four lids of weed that is scheduled to take place at the bar around noon the next day. Unbeknownst to Hank and his perennially glazed girlfriend, Captain Jack is more interested in procuring fresh human-grade gator meat than cheap Mexican marijuana.

It is quite obvious that Captain Jack has no plans to actually carry out the drug deal when the bar owner's black pimp comrade Harry Moore (portrayed a white dude named Troy Grant, who hilariously sports feces-colored blackface makeup) puts an electric meat cutter to Lynette's throat shortly after she gets off the phone with her daughter Chi Chi. Additionally, Captain Jack violently attacks and drowns his personal bar bitch Steve Buckner (co-producer Biro), who the antihero deeply resents because he is an ex-marine that never saw real action in the Vietnam War. As the viewer later learns, Steve is actually a buddy of Hank and the drug deal would probably not even be going on were it not for their somewhat unfortunate friendship. The next morning, Captain Jack strips Steve's corpse naked, dismembers the body like a dead pig with a machete, and then feeds his fatty body parts to his pet alligators. Rather fittingly, about two dozen vultures watch on while perching on a dead tree as Captain Jack turns fat boy Steve into low-quality gator meat. While happily throwing Steve's dismembered limbs to the gators, Captain Jack says to his pernicious pets while maintaining an expression of sadistic glee, "Eat your Gook food" and "American flesh...your gook food," thus demonstrating the savagely sadistic antihero's perturbing degree of posttraumatic stress as a result of the multicultural horrors he experienced during the Vietnam War. Of course, Captain Jack is just warming up for campaign of carnivalesque cracker carnage that he will carry out later that day when hippie Hank and his homely hoe Chi Chi finally arrive.

Captain Jack may be a murderously malicious maniac that almost seems to derive sexual satisfaction from murdering and dismembering people, especially when his green gator pals are involved, but he is also a rather refreshing no bull-shit man's man who hates hippies and other pussies and even has portraits of masculine Hollywood figures like Humphrey Bogart, Lee Marvin, and Marlon Brando hanging on the walls of his bar. Naturally, a prissy pot-peddling hippie bitch like Hank will ultimately prove to be rather grating to Jack's sensitive psyche. When Hank and Chi Chi, who made the mistake of taking LSD before the drug deal, arrive at the bar in an exceedingly effeminate baby blue Volkswagen Beetle, they immediately become uneasy upon being less than warmly greeted by Captain Jack and his mostly silent pal Bob, especially since their comrade Steve is nowhere to be found. After serving the dildo dope-dealer and his lady friend some 'Gator Green' wine in shot glasses that was supposedly fermented with snake poison, Hank acts quite rude and complains that he wants to get the drug deal over with because he and his girlfriend supposedly have somewhere else to be. Of course, Hank's lack of manners enrages Jack, so he naturally decides to fuck with the seemingly pathologically passive-aggressive hippie by asking him, "What's your fucking problem, man? [...] Did you serve your country in 'Nam?" Of course, being an effete bohemian bitch that would probably cry hysterically if he got a small stain on his fancy proto-metrosexual cowboy outfit, Hank managed to dodge the draft as a result of supposedly receiving a 4-F classification, which was primarily given to people with muscular and bone malformations, hearing and circulatory ailments, mental problems, hernias, and certain STDs. Indeed, like the insufferably whiny weasel scumbag that he is, Hank goes to great pains to dubiously explain that he has advanced Lateral epicondylitis, arrogantly stating in a insufferably passive-aggressive fashion, "I don't expect you to know what that means, but it's kind of like a bad case of tennis elbow." At this point, Captain Jack becomes completely delusional and accuses Hank of being one of the hippie protesters that supposedly flung feces at him when he returned to the United States after the war, stating to the pot-peddler in a hysterically hostile way, "you remind me of these jokers that met me at the airport. They threw fucking dog shit at me [...] You guys called me babykiller... You motherfuckers." Meanwhile, Bob makes his comrades laugh by aggressively shouting at Hank with his unsettling electrolarynx voice, "draft-dodger." Not surprisingly, things get even more tense when Captain Jack states, "You wanna' know where Steve is?" and high yellow negro pimp Harry brings out a bloody basket with a blanket covering the top of it. When Harry uncovers the basket, Hank and Chi Chi are in for quite the surprise to see their buddy Steve's dismembered head, as they naturally sense that they are probably next to be butchered.

When Chi Chi panics and attempts to escape, high yellow negro Harry puts a pitchfork to her throat before she can even reach the door while Captain Jack manages to knock out pussy hippie Hank with a single blow to the face. When Hank eventually wakes up, he finds himself outside with his faced covered with war paint and his beloved Chi Chi, who has been stripped down to her underwear (notably, her beaver bush is so large that it protrudes out of her panties, thus demonstrating Van Bebber's commitment to making a truly retro 1970s era film), gagged and tied to a tree that is hovering over a algae-covered pond full of hungry alligators. Meanwhile, Bob rolls out Chi Chi's mother, who is also only wearing underwear, in his wheelchair. In a demonstration of his sick and sadistic sense of humor, Captain Jack hands Hank a handgun and declares, "Alright, draft-dodger, let's see how that 4-F arm works in combat," but when the hippie proceeds to pull the trigger the only thing that comes out of the pistol is a flag that says "bang." Indeed, the joke is on Hank and of course deranged dipsomaniac Captain Jack is laughing hysterically. When Hank tries in vain to defend himself by throwing a weak punch at Jack, the antihero blocks his fist and reacts by swiftly chopping the hippie's arm with a machete and then proceeds to throw both the dismembered limb and its half-dead owner to the gators. While the gators are gorging on Hank's body, Jack hilariously yells to the dying hippie, "Peace and love, peace and love...now what?!" Annoyed with Chi Chi's hysterical screaming, Bob shoots her about a dozen times from the comfort of his wheelchair while the girl's petrified mother is sitting in his lap. In the end, Gator Green comes full circle by concluding with classic stock footage from the Vietnam War.

Somewhat hilariously, before Gator Green was ever even released, a curious small-time guido actor named Vic Noto, whose greatest claim to fame was playing a redneck biker that gets shot by Michael Imperioli on The Sopranos, began an almost disturbingly pathological one-man smear campaign against both Jim Van Bebber and horror journalist Heidi Martinuzzi. Indeed, Noto, who seems to believe he is the true mastermind of the film despite the fact that he had nil actual creative influence on it (apparently, he wrote a ostensibly serious drama called Scales about a World War II Bataan Death March survivor named Ray Scales who owns a gator-farm-themed tourist trap), has apparently attempted to sue both Van Bebber and co-producer Stephen Biro. On top of that, Noto has gone to the patently pathetic effort to stalk Van Bebber online and leave incredibly loony and highly libelous comments on virtually every YouTube video and article about the filmmaker. In fact, the only reason I know about Noto is because I came upon many of these oftentimes unintentionally humorous comments by happenstance. Of course, the fact that Van Bebber could enrage someone so much is also probably the same reason that he is such a great filmmaker as one of only a handful of contemporary horror directors that can be described as an auteur as opposed to a mere hack or artisan. While Van Bebber might direct films that are described as 'exploitation' or 'artsploitation,' he is anything but the typical exploitation hack as a man that lives and breathes the movies he makes and the characters that he plays. After all, only Van Bebber would dare to utilize blackface and bushy beavers in a fashion that is not ironic. While the average exploitation hack makes films that feature cheap sex and violence as a tasteless gimmick that is utilized for the sole purpose of attempting to receive a large monetary profit, Van Bebber makes the films he does solely because he wants to and has, hence why he alienates so many viewers with his biting savage wit and uncompromisingly artfully nihilistic approach to sex, death, and ultra-violence. As he demonstrated with his classic short My Sweet Satan (1994), Van Bebber is probably the only living filmmaker that is able to give a certain absurdist poetry to smoking bowels in tribute to Satan, which is certainly no small accomplishment.

Certainly, if there is a filmmaker that makes genuinely artistically merited genre trash with both heart and spirit, it is Van Bebber. Indeed, I think the auteur summed up his own personal cinematic philosophy and approach to filmmaking when he stated in an interview with John Szpunar featured in the book Xerox Ferox: The Wild World of the Horror Film Fanzine (2014) when asked what puts "high art" and "low art" on an equal playing field, "Well, I'm looking for passion. And a lot of great art films have the same passion as THE TEXAS CHAIN SAW MASSACRE. You can tell that Fellini was fucking throwing himself full-bore into his greatest work, and the same can be said for Welles and the rest of the greats. I could give you the whole laundry list, but I consider TEXAS CHAINSAW and EVIL DEAD as high art. And I think that the people who dismiss horror films as being base don't really have an open mind."

Speaking of Welles, it seems that he and Van Bebber are sort of kindred spirits in a sense as perennial rebels that burned many bridges and failed to complete many dream film projects during their rather rocky careers. In that sense, Gator Green is like Van Bebber's own equivalent to Welles' aborted Around the World in Eighty Days adaptation, albeit thankfully at least part of the film was released. When asked by Szpunar what we can expect from the film, Van Bebber stated, "I can't really compare it to anything. Maybe people will see a little bit of Tobe Hooper's EATEN ALIVE drifting around. Maybe a little bit of FROGS. But at the same time, it's more like if the Coen brothers made a nasty fucking horror film." While I find the Coen brothers comparison somewhat dubious, I can safely say that I found the 15-minute Gator Green promo more enthralling, creative, and idiosyncratic than all 91-minutes of Eaten Alive and I say that as someone that has never been particularly fond of the whole killer animal horror subgenre. Indeed, I have about as much as interest in killer gators as I do Turkish folklore, so that just goes to show why I think Van Bebber is a sort of carny celluloid alchemist as mensch that is able to turn genre shit into gritty cinematic gold. While I would not be surprised if it took another decade before we saw another Van Bebber flick, a documentary about the filmmaker's life and struggles entitled Diary of a Deadbeat: The Story of Jim Vanbebber (2015) directed by Victor Bonacore was just completed, so hopefully some independently wealthy eccentric will see it and decide to give the auteur funding so that he can once again bless the world with another piece of merrily misanthropic movie mayhem before he drinks himself to death in some dilapidated junky-infested Florida apartment complex.

OSLO, AUGUST 31ST

Joachim Trier (2011)

Since France has always led Europe in terms of collective degeneracy, especially in the cultural, social, and artistic realm, it is only natural that they would adapt a decadent novel about four decades before any Nordic filmmaker would ever dare to touch it, but then again, the book in question is also French. Indeed, the great French dandy turned literary fascist Pierre Drieu La Rochelle's addiction-and-suicide-themed novel Le feu follet (1931) aka Will O' the Wisp was originally adapted by famed frog filmmaker Louis Malle (Lacombe, Lucien, My Dinner with Andre) as the melancholy classic Le feu follet (1963) aka The Fire Within starring the somberly suave Maurice Ronet, so it seems somewhat strange and almost inexplicable that a contemporary Norwegian auteur would also cinematically adapt a book inspired by the suicide of a largely forgotten real-life Dadaist poet some 80 years after the work was written, but relatively young auteur Joachim Trier (Reprise, Louder Than Bombs)—a more restrained long distance relative of Danish eternal 'enfant terrible' Lars von Trier—did just that for his second feature-length film Oslo, August 31st (2011) aka Oslo, 31. august. Though Malle and Trier's films are superficially similar in terms of plot and storyline in their depiction of the last day or so of a recovering drug addict who decides to commit suicide after having various less than ideal encounters with old friends, aesthetically speaking, the two works have virtually nothing in common and certainly make for great comparison pieces in terms of how much European cinema has changed over the past four decades or so. The works are also quite similar in that the central city where the story is set is a sort unofficial guiding character that is only secondary to the protagonist, especially in Trier's film, as the seemingly living metropolis seems to have sucked the soul out every single person in the film to one degree or another, but especially the hopelessly forlorn lead, who has come to the bitter conclusion that, "I'm 34 years old. I've got nothing" and decides to take decisive action for one of the first times in his perennially stagnating life. Having more in common with Drieu's source novel in that the protagonist is a H-shooting junky instead of an alcoholic (the protagonist of the novel was addicted to opium, which was considered old-fashioned during the early 1960s when Malle made his film), Oslo, August 31st depicts one man's losing fight with a deadly drug that has been eating at the Nordic world and white world in general since the late-1960s, but has become even worse since the growing popularity of narcotic prescription painkillers over the past couple decades. Indeed, I can think of at least two pill popper turned dope fiend ex-friends of mine who died after overdosing on the Big H, but it is unclear to me as to whether either the two intended to die, though another ex-friend of mine who did survive admitted to me that he did it intentionally. What is arguably most interesting and original about Trier's film compared to Malle's is that the protagonist is depicted as more or less a casualty of a leftist academic upbringing as a fellow with a mother who “held a tolerant view on drugs” and a physically weak pansy father who “said people who valued military experience were dull.” Shot in a quasi-realist handheld style the falls somewhere in between Gus van Sant’s Elephant (2003) and the work of Philippe Grandrieux (Sombre, La vie nouvelle aka A New Life), Oslo, August 31st is certainly a bummer of film that lacks the refined eloquence and cultivation of Malle’s The Fire Within, yet its sterile and primitive aesthetic certainly reflect the lack of poetry, culture, warmth, love, and life that both contemporary Oslo and Occidental metropolises in general lack, thus reflecting our devastatingly decadent, spiritually bankrupt, and emotionally glacial zeitgeist.

Oslo, August 31st begins with a quasi-nostalgic montage featuring vintage footage of Oslo over the past three decades or so (the protagonist is 34) juxtaposed with various faceless and nameless citizens discussing what they remember most about the city, stating mostly mundane things like “I remember how tall the trees seemed compared to those in Northern Norway” and “We moved to the city. We felt extremely mature,” thus giving the viewer the feeling that the utopian dream has died in the Nordic metropolis. Protagonist Anders (played by childhood actor turned physician Anders Danielsen Lie, who also starred in Trier’s first feature Reprise) does not seem like he has many happy memories of Oslo even though he is a self-described “spoiled brat” who had a rather comfortable, if not deleteriously liberal, upbringing, but then again he has spent the last ten months living as an impatient at a drug rehabilitation center so he could wean himself off various narcotics, especially heroin and alcohol. Anders had been given an “evening pass” from the clinic, so he decided to use it to go have sex with a Swedish chick named Malin (Malin Crépin) instead of meeting up with his estranged sister Nina as he had originally planned. After sex, Anders just stares into space and when unclad Malin wakes up and smiles at him, he cannot bring himself to smile back because, as he later tells a friend regarding the anti-climatic carnal experience, “I wasn’t quite there. I felt nothing.” As is quite clear by his melancholy demeanor, Anders no longer enjoys the hedonistic activities that used to make his life worth living, hence his disillusionment with life in general. After leaving Maline’s apartment, Anders walks to a nearby forest, fills his pants and jacket pockets with tons of rocks, picks up a large boulder, and somewhat absurdly attempts to drown himself in a nearby lake, but he botches the job and then proceeds to cry hysterically upon emerging from the water. Unfortunately for Anders, he has to go back to the rehabilitation center and keep up a charade of seeming to have the semblance of a sound of mind for at least one more day before he ends his life for good.

On the last day of his life, Anders plans to do at least two things: meet with his sister and go to a job interview. Not surprisingly, both of these plans fail miserably, thus reinforcing the protagonist’s undying desire to off himself.

OSLO, AUGUST 31ST

In between the interview and attempting to meet up with his sister, Anders attempts to reconnect with some old friends who he has not seen since he became a full-blown junky and they kicked him out of their lives. After being given a 'day pass' to leave the clinic, Anders takes a taxi to Oslo and swings by the apartment of his old best friend Thomas (Hans Olav Brenner), who could not have a more different place in his life as a straight and somber bourgeois family man and pedantic academic professor who quotes Proust during personal conversations as if he has been completely zapped of any genuine personality. Married to a beautiful blond babe named Rebecca (Norwegian singer Ingrid Olava) that he has two young daughters with, Thomas does not really know how to talk to Anders about his problems and even absurdly jokingly describes him as a "drug troll" to his prepubescent daughter after she creates a crude drawing of the protagonist. When Anders describes his soulless sex with Malin, Thomas nonsensically replies, "Proust said, 'Trying to understand desire by watching a nude woman is like a child taking apart a clock to understand time,'" so his wife Rebecca berates him for not only pretentiously quoting Proust during a highly personal conversation, but also for saying something that is the exact opposite of what his comrade expressed. When Thomas mentions that he recently saw Anders' parents and remarks, "They still seem so much in love, attentive, like a model couple," the protagonist confesses that his parents had to sell their house so they could pay for him to go to drug rehab.

When the two friends go for a walk, Anders hints at his plans to commit suicide, stating to Thomas, "...it's not about heroin, not really. Look at me. I'm 34 years old. I have nothing. I can't start from scratch. Don't you understand?" When Thomas mentions to Anders that he has more options than most of the people at his rehab center, he cynically, "Yeah, but they are happy to work in a warehouse and have kids with some ex-raver." Indeed, Anders is a bourgeois failure who physically and emotionally resembles a wigger low-life and he could never submit to a loser working-class lumpenprole life of mediocrity, as he considers it a fate worse than death. When Anders says, "If that's how it ends, it's a choice I've made" regarding his intention to overdose on dope, emotionally autistic academic Thomas seems somewhat baffled and replies, "I can't relate to you tell me you're planning to commit suicide." As for Thomas, his life is not exactly as perfect as it seems as he virtually never has sex, no longer has the desire to write, and spends his free time passively watching his wife defeating players while playing Playstation games, which he describes as "the best part" of his banal and highly domesticated life. After parting ways with Thomas, Anders heads to his job interview with nice and smug magazine editor David (Øystein Røger), which seems to go good at first, at least until when the protagonist is asked why he does not have a work history after 2005 and he admits that he is a recovering drug addict. When David asks Anders what kind of drug addict he was, he replies, "Just about anything...Cocaine, ecstasy, alcohol...Heroin as well. I was dealing a bit as well. Should I put that on my CV?” and then reveals he has been clean for ten months. When David patronizingly replies, “Not many people manage to get through that. So that’s...Extraordinary,” Anders gets angry and acts rather self-destructively by demanding his resume back, storming out of the building, and trashing his resume. Indeed, Anders’ self-esteem is about as low as that of a crack-smoking American ghetto negro.

When Anders goes to a restaurant to meet his sister Nina, he attempts to call an ex-girlfriend, Iselin, who he has been trying to contact throughout the entire day, but he has no luck. After waiting forever, Nina’s friend Tove (Tone Beate Mostraum) shows up instead of his sister, which rather angers Anders, who gets the keys to his family home from the girl and leaves. Apparently, Anders’ sister Nina is afraid of the fact that he will be getting out of the rehab center soon and could not bring herself to confront her big bad druggo bro. After spending hours wandering around various parks in Oslo whilst thinking about his pretentious liberal intellectual parents’ somewhat deleterious parenting skills (in his mind, he never references his parents as ‘mom’ or ‘dad’ but instead ‘she’ and ‘he,’ thus reflecting the cold, sterile, and detached nature of his relationship with them), Anders heads to a party at his friends Mirjam (Kjærsti Odde Skjeldal) and Calle’s apartment where he finds himself feeling increasingly lonely and detached being around so many old friends who, unlike the protagonist, all have things going on in their lives. Anders used to date Mirjam and during the party he decides to talk to her after seeing her sitting all by her lonesome and looking rather lonely. Mirjam is depressed that her birthday is tomorrow and complains, “It’s a bit easier for you guys to reach the thirties. Look at your pals. None of them have girlfriends their own age. My flat’s full of girls I don’t know. 20-year-olds with perky tits,” so Anders attempts to cheer her up by stating, “Your tits seem pretty perky to me.” Although having been together for nine years, Mirjam and her boyfriend still do not have kids and she is feeling fed up with the banality of life, which the protagonist can surely relate to. Of course, things get awkward when Anders kisses Mirjam in a sensual fashion, so she goes somewhere else. Depressed about Iselin not returning his calls, among other things, Anders decides he needs to buy enough heroin to kill himself with so he robs the coats and purses of the party guests, but unfortunately Mirjam walks in on him doing it and looks at him disapprovingly, though she does not confront him.

Ultimately, Anders decides to buy a gram of heroin from his drug dealer friend and then spends the rest of the night partying with his degenerate mustached pal Petter (Petter Width Kristiansen) and two young and dumb college girls in their early twenties. While Anders flirts with one of the girls, he is far too detached and dejected to seriously pursue her, even telling her that their night together is more or less meaningless, stating, “No, no, you’ll have a thousand nights like this one. You won’t remember this...Everything will be forgotten.” While at a bar, Anders spots a guy named Øystein (Anders Borchgrevink) who slept with his ex-girlfriend Iselin when they were still together, so taking what he learned at drug rehab, he absurdly decides to 'forgive him.' Needless to say, Anders' meager attempt at atonement does not go well, with Øystein letting him really have it by stating, "I don't know you...But I've seen the consequences of how you treat people close to you [...] whether I slept with her or not, I mean, does it matter? [...] I don't have to listen to this. I have friends far worse off than you...But they don't act like assholes. And this isn't about...the fact that you're an addict." Shocked by the fact that a virtual stranger has more or less summed up his shitty loser character, Anders salutes Øystein in a sarcastic fashion and heads to a local rave with Petter and the two chicks where they spend the rest of the night getting drunk and acting stupid. When the sun rises, they all head to a closed pool and everyone gets in except Anders. Indeed, not even the prospect of a hot topless 20-something-year-old who wants to jump his bones can get Anders into the pool. While Petter and the girls are having fun in the pool, Anders randomly walks away without saying goodbye and heads to his empty childhood home where he plays piano for a bit, leaves Iselin a voicemail telling her to ignore everything he said previously, and then shoots up enough heroin to stop his heart from beating within mere seconds.

It should be noted that long before he became a filmmaker, Oslo, August 31st director Joachim Trier was a top Norwegian skateboarder who, not unlike Harmony Korine, originally intended to become a pro-skater. Unlike Korine, Trier actually had the talent to become pro but fate had much different plans for him and he blossomed into one of Norway's most interesting contemporary filmmakers. Ultimately, both filmmakers were obviously influenced by the gritty aesthetics of skate videos, albeit in somewhat different ways, with Oslo, August 31st certainly reflecting the sort of shaky, erratic, and voyeuristic 'realist' handheld digital video essence of modern sk8 tapes. As anyone who has ever been seriously involved with the so-called 'extreme sport' will tell you, skaters look at the physical world, especially urban areas, in a completely different way than non-skaters and I have to admit that as an ex-skater, I felt that Trier's film oftentimes feels like it could have been filmed in between skate sessions in Oslo with the director's friends and family. More importantly, the film demonstrates how the city is a sort of soul-draining and socially alienating postmodern pandemonium of sorts that makes it impossible for anyone with any sort of vices to live in peace and harmony. It is interesting to note that, aside from the suicidal protagonist, virtually every other character in the film is either depressed and/or drug addicted as well and everyone seems to be too consumed with their own lingering dejection to bother to notice that their friend is about to engage in self-slaughter. Undoubtedly, Trier's film does not make for the most enjoyable of filmic experiences as a sort of cinematic condemnation of the modern era that offers no solutions, not relief, and, arguably most importantly, no redemption to abject hopelessness of the modern world. For me, it is nearly impossible to think of Oslo, August 31st without comparing it to its French predecessor The Fire Within, as the two make perfect companion pieces when attempting to distinguish the innate soullessness and cultural and social retardation of today with the eloquence, cultivation, and cultivation of yesteryear. Indeed, even the dope fiends and dipsomaniacs of Malle's film seem dignified compared to the Nordic bourgeois nihilist slobs of Trier's film, which features a protagonist that, unlike the character played by Maurice Ronet, seems devoid of even the most rudimentary virtues as a completely charmless chap who probably did himself and everyone else a favor by shooting a lethal dose of Cocteau's kick into his scrawny arm. Also, seeing a bunch of towelheaded camel jockeys walking around Oslo is not exactly a pleasant sight to see, thus reflecting the racial and cultural suicide of the Norwegian people in general (notably, in 2013, 40% of Oslo's elementary school pupils were registered as having a first language other than Norwegian or Sami, which indicates almost half of the city's adolescent population is foreign and thus will replace the indigenous population in a couple generations). Indeed, it certainly a sign that something is wrong when young upper-class whites are suicidal junkies while Arabs are sucking on the supple teat of the inexplicably generous Nordic welfare state. Of course, as the protagonist of the film states himself, he is a brat who refuses to accept anything other than a life of upper-middleclass luxury as a decidedly decadent young man who is a direct product of a lazy liberal upbringing, hence why he did not even have the testicular fortitude to off himself like a man like the protagonist of Malle's film and instead takes the easy way out with a pleasurable narcotizing death that is surely symbolic of his life in general as a self-destructive hedonist. Degenerate bourgeois liberal upbringing or not, Oslo, August 31st is surely the last film you should watch if you're a recovering addict.

Joby Harold (2007)

A normal aesthetic of a thriller is the feeling of paranoia and uneasiness. Awake works in such a flawed way that it morphs from trite Hollywood garbage into a semi-decent film fare halfway into the movie. If you believe for a second that Anakin Skywalker's acting has improved, you might as well cash your chips in now. It's still horribly wooden. Awake stars the moody-eyed Christiansen as a billionaire playboy. His role is such that you couldn't distinguish the fact that he owns half the city. His character is predominately created to humanize the greedy corporate scum and he does just that. All he wants is love and life, so when he gets a new heart, he can have both of those with his new wife. "Five hundred it is!" His midichlorine count fails him when while getting anesthesia, he finds himself to be a victim of a rare condition called anesthesia awareness, in which you are paralyzed but still possess all sense - including pain. During this ridiculous process, he overhears a nefarious plan to kill him on the operating table being led by his surgeon friend. Jessica Alba co-stars as the unfairly hot recent blushing bride of business tycoon Annie. She puts up as good of a role as she can when she plays "meat puppet" like most women do in major releases. Not till later does she have the ability to demonstrate acting. Terrence Howard plays his surgeon friend who recently became his best friend. Howard has this rewarding stage presence that saturates each of his roles with this "Hey, this character fucking sucks, but I'm going to make him look good" and he does just that. Much of Awake literally had me on edge. It made me nervous, frustrated, and perplexed at this rare and curious condition that might have me permanently scared of getting surgery in the near future. Awake is a film that received only moderate success and should be seen by a wider audience. If it weren't for the pseudo-surreal elements tacked in to try and explain the tortured soul he is, this film would have been consistent. I wish these directors would realize what film they are trying to make before initial shooting as to not create a hideous spawn.

VIA APPIA

Jochen Hick (1990)

If serving a lengthy prison sentence is a 'rite of passage' for black gangbangers and barbarian neo-viking bikers, it would seem that receiving HIV would be somewhat the approximate equivalent for sadomasochistic sodomites or so it seems in the curious kraut cocksucker flicker Via Appia (1989) directed by homo-auteur Jochen Hick (Sex/Life in L.A., No One Sleeps) – an aberrant Aryan whose obsession with AIDS and the men who intentionally spread it is only rivaled by his particularly perverse proclivity for feverishly fawning over perverse poofers, especially of the Germanic persuasion, traveling abroad for anonymous tearoom and steamroom sex. Described by Robert Ellsworth of Edge Magazine in what is a patent piece of journalistic puffery as, "a sexy, exciting film...that is both stimulating and suspenseful, an interesting combination of Hitchcock and Jodorowsky," Via Appia is an unrepentantly homosexualist work that can hardly be described as a contrived and theatric 'Freudian thriller' in the sense of Rope (1948), nor a surrealist acid western full of naked women with marvelous mammary glands and occultnik religious iconography like El Topo (1970), but it does feature a smutty smorgasbord of psychosexual tension and fag fetishism in a certain sin-ridden Sodom of South America. Centering around a Teutonic twink airplane steward in what wakes up one morning to see that a random Brazilian boi he just had a steamy semen-swapping one-night stand with has just written, "Welcome to the AIDS-Club" on his bathroom mirror as if the joke of a very real gay urban legend, Via Appia is a pseudo-documentary-within-a-film about a HIV positive homo who travels to Brazil in search of the 'gift-giving' gay hustler who, following in the rather rich S&M semen demon tradition of Canadian flight attendant Gaëtan "Patient Zero" Dugas (the sanitized subject of queer Canadian auteur John Greyson's 1993 AIDS-themed musical Zero Patience) and French philosopher Michel Foucault, deliberately gave the young German man the priceless gift of gay cancer at a time when treatment for such an internecine illness was mostly futile. A softcore gay porn flick featuring countless brown dicks of the racially dubious sort, Via Appia is undoubtedly gay fantasy in a cinéma vérité style that seems like an exotic m(isc)arriage between the wanton wild boys of the Third World as depicted in the novels of alpha-Beat writer William S. Burroughs (notice the xenophilic original cover of his 1983 novel The Place of Dead Roads) and the gritty 'poverty porn' and gutter libertinism of Jewish-Brazilian auteur Héctor Babenco's Pixote (1981), thereupon making it an exceedingly exploitative, minor kraut cult classic of deranged and deleterious celluloid Dorian Love that only further confirms the unflattering stereotype that fags are the foremost spreaders of one of the world's mostly deadly diseases.

A lot of dirty and dastardly things can happen when you're a sexually promiscuous Lufthansa German Airlines steward who engages in unprotected sodomy with Third World conmen of the calculating, conniving, and callous cocksucking variety when not helping bourgeois boobs to get nice and comfy on their trips abroad or such is the impression one gets while watching Via Appia. Like real-life fag flight attendant Gaëtan Dugas, flaming Frank (played by Peter Senner in his first and only feature-length film role) learned the hard way that STDs spread quick and come from the most curious of places when one has a cosmopolitan career that involves traveling the world. Now taking routine trips to the hospital to treat the debilitating symptoms of HIV, fucked Frank is quite obsessed with finding the malicious man-eater Mario, who gave the flight attendant a literal kiss of death during an ominous yet orgasmic one-night stand from homo Hades, yet he does not want to seek revenge, but instead seems to feel that confronting his figurative gay Grim Reaper would give him the courage to look death straight in the eyes in an audacious act of unflinching stoicism. Ignoring the sound advice of his doctor not to travel abroad, especially to a Third World sewer of sin and sexual savagery, Frank and a documentary filmmaker (Yves Jansen) fly to Brazil and soon hire a professional conman and hunk hustler named José (played by real-life criminal Guilherme de Pádua, who, with the help of his wife, killed an actress on the same Brazilian soap opera he starred in). An amateur photographer who takes pictures of strangers' pricks, as well as his own, Frank finds the ultimate guide of Brazilian buggery in José, who takes him to the most sinfully steamy bathhouses and hustler hotspots in Rio, thereupon resulting in a wealth of rather risqué portraits and many mischievous memories with many miscegenated men, yet maniac mud-packer Mario seems nowhere to be found. Obviously someone who has learned from a master, Frank decides he will be like super sodomite Mario and refrain from telling people about his pandemic sexual sickness, even rhetorically remarking to his filmmaker friend, "Why should I run and tell everybody I'm sick? You don't live according to what some sauna Joe says," and "You think I want to be known as a walking virus bomb?" With so many more than men and so little time to live in the most literal sense, Frank has to be less than frank about his bad blood if he wants to have the time of his short life in the sanguinary Sodom and Gomorrah of South America – a place where Nordic sodomite stewards like the protagonist have been known to be maliciously murdered in the past when patronizing the wrong penis-peddler. With creepy and exceedingly emaciated hustlers literally masturbating in the street and an overflowing ocean of studs and twinks in sordid saunas of sacrilege, Frankie certainly has no need to worry about people catching on to the fact that he is a poz-cock giftgiver. Indeed, to borrow a cynical phrase from the film, Via Appia is not your typical celluloid "the world is full of whores" routine as the homo harlots very much feel at home in their figurative hell of fagdom and biologically kaput kraut protagonist Frank is more than willing to join them.

If Via Appia has an underlying (and, in this case, unhinged) 'message' at all, it is that poof protagonist Frank seemed rather liberated by the fact that he was infected with HIV in a most insidious manner, even if his life is inevitably cut short by this inauspicious and ultimately irrevocable situation. Instead of arguing that having sex with random men at bathhouses while being HIV positive is a bad and, dare I say, particularly pernicious, deplorable, and absurdly dishonest thing to do, Via Appia makes it seem like the 'cool' and liberating thing to do as if giving the protagonist all the more reasons to be a pathological powder puff on the prowl. During the beginning of the film, Frank makes it seem as if his planned, would-be-fateful meeting with Mario will make accepting death all the more easy to deal with, but it is ultimately the sort of unsavory behavior that led him to contracting the terminal illness in the first place that gives him a seemingly 'sick,' quasi-spiritual sort of solace. Even the filmmaker that follows him along notices Frank's deleterious behavior, stating, "I don't want to film someone's self-destruction." Aside from stoically accepting death like a 'real man,' Frank makes for a rather unsympathetic protagonist, but, to his credit, he does not damn nor seek sympathy, thereupon acting in stark contrast to the sort of sanitized sodomites portrayed in Hollywood movies and the media today, who arrogantly and, quite fag fascistically, demand not only acceptance of their aberration, but also the glorification of it, as if the entire world is one big gay bar. In fact, it would not be a stretch to say that Frank uses his morbid search for Mario as a pathetic and perverse pretense for engaging in voyeurism, exhibitionism, and promiscuous homo sex in an exceedingly exotic land as if he was acting out a lifelong fantasy he developed after listening to Duran Duran's album Rio (1982) one too many times, because he is "hungry like the wolf" and seems like he is taking his one, "Last Chance on the Stairway" of self-sanctified sodomy. With its audaciously unapologetic message and in its attempt to turn a personal journey for nirvana and harmony into aberrant avant-garde pornography, Via Appia, for better or worse, has more honesty in a mere 5 minutes than a propagandistic poofy melodrama like Brokeback Mountain (2005) directed by Ang Lee has in its entirety. With an erotic and exotic existentialist ending on a beach that makes for the queer cinema equivalent of the conclusion of François Truffaut's The 400 Blows, Via Appia reminds one that life is a bitch, so you might as well have fun in the meantime, even if you contract AIDS in the process.

NO ONE SLEEPS
NO ONE SLEEPS

Jochen Hick (2000)

Despite the number of 'great' sodomite serial killers that have stalked the tea-rooms and glittery fag clubs of America over the past couple of decades or so, including John Wayne Gacy, Jeffrey 'riding dirty' Dahmer and Robert Berdella, few true blue homo auteur filmmakers, aside from Todd Verow with highly controversial Frisk (1995), have tackled the subject and have left it to heterosexual horror hacks to cinematically portray these creepy cocksucking killers. One super fagola filmmaker, Jochen Hick (Via Appia, Menmaniacs - The Legacy of Leather), a quasi-politically incorrect German aberrant-garde filmmaker that has mainly directed unflattering documentaries about queer subcultures, did direct a serial killer flick entitled No One Sleeps (2000), but unfortunately it is not a masterpiece, but rather a plot-hole-ridden and conspiracy theory-obsessed 'twink thriller'/man-on-man murder mystery piece set in the gay capital of the world, San Francisco, where virtually every character in the film, including the extras, are not only gay but are in some stage of dying off from AIDS and love Puccini's "Turandot," which is even described by an old homo in the film on his death bed as the gayest opera ever written. Undoubtedly, No One Sleeps is a superlatively sloppily assembled piece of piss poor poof propaganda that is not much more aesthetically merited than a loony Lifetime made-for-TV movie, yet in terms of ending entertainment value, Hick's Amero-Kraut serial killer thriller has a certain undeniable magnetism to it that compels to the viewer to watch the film to the very end. In fact, I originally had no intention of rewatching the film, let alone reviewing it, yet after boring forced to view it a second time, I realized it is certainly a 'good bad movie' with a gigantic wad of replay value, which is indubitably a result of German actor Tom Wlaschiha's strikingly charismatic performance, but also Hick's compellingly inept direction and curious casting of mostly non-actors that he seems to have found licking the floors of some seedy gay bar. Following the sexual and detective excursions of a young gay medical student who is trying to find proof regarding theories created by his discredited and deceased East German scientist father who came up with the controversial theory that AIDS was a manmade virus created by the U.S. military in the 1970s and tested on inmates at San Quentin prison, No One Sleeps is a would-be-lecherous and unintentionally loony labyrinthine look at self-loathing gay serial killers, corrupt fag-bashing American doctors and politicians, and the even more corrupt world of underground S&M sodomite parties, where a HIV-positive cocksucking killer is lurking and hoping to take some of his fagola friends with him straight to homo hell.

Twenty-something kraut medical student Stefan Hein (played by Tom Wlaschiha, who has gone on to star in the popular HBO TV series Game of Thrones) may be a gay man in the heart of modern day Sodom, San Francisco, but his main concern is proving that his East German scientist father's discredited theory that AIDS was originally found in sheep and was perniciously transferred to humans via the U.S. Department of Defense, who experimented on a bunch of prisoners who would go on to infect the general gay population. Not long after arriving in San Francisco, Stefan discovers a crime scene at the Golden Gate Park where a murdered homo with AIDS lays dead. Stefan ends up discussing the murder with a radically repellant homicide detective Louise Tolliver (Irit Levi) whose voice is so whiny and neurotic and whose arrogance is so audacious that she could easily be Woody Allen's sullen Semitic sister, and rather unfortunately for the Teutonic medical student, the cold kosher cop will continue to check up on him from time to time. During his stay in sodomite SF, Stefan hopes to find all the ex-prisoners that were in the AIDS experiment, but unfortunately, they also happen to be the same people that a mysterious serial killer is killing off one-by-one. Meanwhile, kraut Stefan starts a relationship with a violent ex-con/café waiter with a discernibly Hebraic phenotype named Jeffrey Russo (Jim Thalman), thus their relationship seems to have a certain inborn tension that is demonstrated by the constant physical and verbal violence between the two men. In seeming tribute to New German Cinema dandy Werner Schroeter, a gay man named "Malina" is killed at a fag underground party and posed in a manner not unlike the iconic pose of 'queer icon'/Christian martyr Saint Sebastian. At an AIDS conference, Stefan discusses his father's theories and his intention to find the ex-prisoners from the government AIDS experiment, but most of the audience finds his efforts and ideas dubious, except for a somewhat nefarious neurologist who is ironically Dr. Richard Burroughs (played by Richard Conti) in ostensible tribute to queer junky literary outlaw William S. Burroughs. Considering the same HIV-positive men Stefan is looking for also happen to be the same people the serial killer is eradicating, Detective Tolliver continues to verbally terrorize the young Teuton and questions him about his 'HIV status.' After having a telling and wee bit nasty chat with Dr. Burroughs, Stefan decides to break into the good doc's office and steal documents, thus confirming that all of the serial killers victims are the same ex-cons that were part of the AIDS experiment. Unfortunately, little does Stefan realize that his big bad boy toy Jeffrey was not only one of the ex-prisoners that took part in the AIDS experiment he has been doing detective work on, but also the serial killer that is liquidating said ex-cons. After Jeffrey bumps off Burroughs, Stefan is charged with his murder by the FBI, but luckily he is transferred to Tolliver, who lets him go. While Jeffrey misses the big performance of Puccini's "Turandot" and never really gets to confirm his father's theories, he does manage to get pumped full of the Semitic seed of a hebraic serial killer with AIDS.

Taking its title from the aria "Nessun Dorma" of Puccini's "Turandot" ("No one shall sleep!" is a permutation of "Nessun Dorma"), No One Sleeps is ultimately a work that strives for stylistic and intellectual sophistication, but ultimately fails in all of its objectives, even if the film makes for a surprisingly enthralling celluloid ride through poz-cock pandemonium that rather ridiculously makes the San Francisco gay underground seem like a devilishly exciting place of AIDS-packed action, adventure, and mystery. Undoubtedly, Jochen Hick's objective with No One Sleeps was to inspire viewers to keep their minds open regarding alternative theories to the origins of AIDS, but this seems ultimately unimportant and irrelevant when you consider the fact that most of the characters of the film, including poor protagonist Stefan Hein, are so adamant about engaging in anonymous unsafe sex in what seems to be nothing less than a (sub)conscious death wish thus making all evil government conspiracies seem rather small in importance. Featuring a cameo from HIV-positive gay American extreme performance artist Ron Athey, who made headlines in 1994 when old school Reaganite senator Jesse Helms falsely claimed the AIDS-ridden artist of exposing his diseased blood to audience members while mutilating himself at Walker Art Center in Minneapolis, No One Sleeps is quite possibly the only gay-sploitation/AIDS-sploitation thriller ever made that could have only been directed by a unrepentantly gay filmmaker who had next to nil interest in whitewashing the HIV homo community, which is certainly something I can appreciate.

DYING BREED

Jody Dwyer (2008)

A common tactic in provoking irrational fear; take a true story and apply a "What if" element to the story in order to blindly steer the script direction in which ever way gravity prefers. We've seen Open Water, The Host, From Hell (and the graphic novel), Wolf Creek, and many others that barely open up the possibilities of pseudo-historical horror. Taking both the legends of the Tasmanian Tiger and Alexander "The Pieman" Pearce - an infamous cannibal, Dying Breed "interweaves" both tales into one fact-fiction survival film that rings bells true although reminding you of every other camping terror film. This Horrorfest addition has garnered some publicity for its less-than-sanitary poster display that was banned in Australia for displaying a delicious meal cracked open to contain some organic ingredients. In general, Dying Breed has a fantastic marketing campaign but the film just wastes it all away taking in the bland script, characters, and events glazed over by a mesmerizing forest setting. And of course, the addition of an anti-GeoConservative friend to the trip was necessary. Jack (Nathan Phillips) kills animals, fucks everywhere, slashes tires, and befouls the hospitality of his captors. If he hadn't been on the trip, their situation wouldn't be rectified but their redemption might have been merciful. Taking an interesting theme of forced impregnation as seen and popularized in Pink Flamingos, Dying Breed invokes the aid of a town birthed entirely on hostages put in the same situation as the stars of this show. Female backpackers looking for the enigmatic Tasmanian Tiger are chained down and raped repeatedly giving Dying Breed a grotesquely erotic edge that will collect with the final product and make the final scene very visceral and bleak. The Pieman is regarded within the film as a slasher villain thanks to the camera tactics of scarcely revealing his underlying motives, while at the same time, glamorizing his ruggedness. His stalking sequences and such are less than horrifying and even invokes questions such as "Uhhh....." and "Errrrr....." I mean, honestly, how old is this guy? I doubt a diet of horny college girls instills the gift of eternal, inbred life. Dying Breed follows Nina, an Irish zoologist who's on the trail of a Tasmanian Tiger and her sister, who disappeared 8 years before in the very same territory; not before sending a paw print of the Tiger though. Her boyfriend, Leigh Whannell, has organized the trip for her and he remains the saving grace through the film being both rational and sympathetic. Dying Breed is yet another boring exploit of a film depicting a male, innocent and solemn, going out of his way to please a female, only to get ravaged, beaten, and shit on by the end of the credits; meanwhile - glorifying the female as the hero (rather, heroine). Dying Breed will never receive glowing reviews but from a fan expressing extreme appreciation for a legless nude female strung over a tree. It's these seldom gory and ridiculous moments that even qualify Dying Breed for a watch. I will wholeheartedly admit though, those scenes where you caught a slight and tiny glimpse of the elusive Tiger, these sent shivers down my spine and brims my mind with hope for a decaying species line. As for the Horrorfest line, as a collective, reformation is a must. Hopelessness aside, these high-grade low-quality films are the real dying breed to shower concern over, or rather, lack thereof.

OBSERVE AND REPORT

Jody Hill (2009)

I do not think that the readers of Soiled Sinema would be surprised to read that I think Seth Rogen is an over glamorized turd that has even met an all time low in arrogance and annoyingness for a Jewish comedian. Rogen is the kind of guy that you want to punch in the face just by looking at him but want to punch even more once his monotone mouth excretes verbal defecation. How can an undeniably ugly and banal comedian such as Seth Rogen have such international critical acclaim? Why are people so obsessed with an individual that is less impressive and entertaining than a German Shepard taking a crap?!? The world may never know the answer to these questions, but I make sure to stay away from his shitematic abominations as best as I can. Unfortunately, a lady friend of mine wanted to see Seth Rogen's new movie Observe and Report and I could do nothing but accept the unsettling request. Observe and Report follows a mentally disturbed man named Ronnie Barnhardt, played by Seth Rogen, who is in charge of security at a mall that looks typical of many that can be found in the United States. In Observe and Report, Seth Rogen (for once) plays a character that may actually have testicles and testosterone pumping through his unflatteringly tubby body. The character of Ronnie is a dysfunctional individual who has serious social problems that seems to put people in jeopardy with physical harm quite often. A lot of people have been comparing this character to that of Travis Bickle from Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver. Yeah, maybe both characters are psychotic and socially dysfunctional types looking to make the decaying world a "better place" but the comparisons stop there. Whereas Scorsese's Taxi Driver (which is arguably the director's masterpiece) is a serious lone man's look at urban and human decay, Observe and Report is merely another outlet for Seth Rogen's assumed criminal impulses. I mean come on, Rogen described his own Zionist Israeli "Kibbutz loving" parents as "radical Jewish socialists." Need one say more? I do have a confession to make and it is quite ugly. Observe and Report is Seth Rogen's "greatest performance" and easily the best comedy that the young Zio-Turd has starred in. Although much of the film is typical of something Rogen would act in, Observe and Report goes much further in the "dark comedy" section. So far as to offend that chicks that suffer from penis envy (feminists) are outraged by the film. Apparently, when you fuck a girl after she's blacked out drunk it's considered rape. Obviously these feminists forget their experiences at college. Of course, Observe and Report doesn't just feature hilarious borderline rape. It also features a man with a very small penis. This man that suffers from having a chode loves to flaunt it at girls (and guys) at the mall. Catching this flasher is the main subplot of Observe and Report. Although it's a cheap shot at getting people to laugh, seeing that chubby man with the button size penis had me laughing out loud in the movie theater. The catching of this pathetic pervert by Seth Rogen is by far the most rewarding segment of the film. I have to give props to Seth Rogen for not mentioning that he is Jewish in Observe and Report like he does in every other movie he's in. In fact, in Observe and Report Seth Rogen plays a sort of white trash guy but not in the condescending way so typical of Hollywood. Seth Rogen's character even beats up a group of Mexican drug dealers. If only more trashy white people would do a proud service like that for the good of USA. Instead of being hooked on crystal meth or crack, Ronnie has ambition. Let's face it, most white trash people are completely and utterly worthless. Someone like Ronnie knows who the lowest of the low are and how to dispose of them. He is also a man that knows how to dress as demonstrated when he goes on a date and sports a wardrobe that looks like a Negroes Sunday best. It's amazing that Seth Rogen was able to pull white trash yet suave. Of course, Observe and Report is full of stupid comedy to keep the typical American lemming happy. The "quality" segments of Observe and Report are even more uneven than how Rogen's gut hangs over his belt. I may not watch Observe and Report again but I will always remember Seth Rogen touting a naked (except for undone robe) and wounded lardass on a golf cart. Will Seth Rogen ever match his performance in Observe and Report again? Probably not but one can never really tell. Maybe this recent trend of ultra dark comedies will continue. To be honest, I wouldn't mind seeing a Seth Rogen comedy taking place in an Israeli Kibbutz featuring Zionists killing Palestinian pre-schoolers. What an honest and beautiful film it would be.

OBSERVE AND REPORT

SMOKIN' ACES

Joe Carnahan (2006)

In light of the recent outbreak of "over-the-top" action films, it seems easy to make a quick buck. Action films are the easiest films to get into, thanks to the endless amount of masculinity pouring out of them. Films like last year's slop-fest "Shoot Em' Up!" are reasons why trying to make film purposely bad is not a wise choice. Joe Carnahan takes the grittiness of his underrated crime classic Narc, and adds a cartoonish crew of sadistic hitmen. The film is packed with big-name stars. Some of which include Ryan Reynolds, Alicia Keyes, Common, Jeremy Piven, and Ben Affleck; just to name a few. The plot is not limited by the bullets, which is more than most blazing gun films can say. The plot was fully intact with flashy yet hyper-kinetic editing to lay down the stories behind each of the hitmen and situations quite nicely. Buddy Israel is a bastard illusionist who has recently had a million dollar bounty on his head and his heart. The FBI agents have put together a task force to keep him alive while hitmen come looking for him. Not since Lord Of Illusions has an illusionist been put in this sort of light. Nolan's The Prestige did nothing but immortalize them despite their greedy existence. Thank god for Tesla to keep the show interesting. Contract killers can be a fickle thing when handled incorrectly. Thank god Carnahan has done this ultra-violence thing before.

Normally, I'm not too keen on Reynolds due to his infatuation of baring his abs in every film regardless of what the script says, but he did a great job in this film. He even prepares a heartfelt ending for this film that left me emotionally distressed. There is no sense trying to hide that the pacing is a little off, being as how there are a plentiful amount of characters, but they all fit snugly. Smokin' Aces can be a platter of things; Vengeance, lust, longing, and racial gripes. All come hitting fast and hard to ensure ultimate entertainment. When popcorn was invented back in 1948, I'm sure they had Smokin' Aces in mind. The film can be slightly annoying. For example; ADD kid. I wanted the little bastard to die. Smokin' Aces can be called Lucky Number Slevin meets the comic book world, including bizarre executioners, redneck rampagers, black sisters packing big heat, and a European master of disguise. When we saw Rambo pump away enemies with the 50 caliber, it was a marvelous sight. Well now we can watch it from the glorious hotel setting, safe from mosquito's. Buddy Israel is more of a gangster than Tony Montana ever was, Slime bag and all. The film churns gears into full-throttle at about an hour in and doesn't let up the insane violence, sadistic criminals, wacky situations, and nihilistic attitude brimming with an accelerated soundtrack. Smokin' Aces is an action fans wet dream. Despite all the negative reviews, i happened to fucking love this film and the only way to find out is to watch it for yourself.

THE GREY

Think of yourself, for a minute, unable to move, unable to process the current test fate has begun to put you through. Now switch your attention to this instinctual cry for life as your body reacts without a moment's thought or hesitation. Alien in nature, you watch without words as you fumble for an oxygen mask. This problem could have been solved a whole lot easier had you not been harnessed by not one seat belt, but two. For what is surely a danger is not the worst of your problems. Would you know it that not even a couple hundred feet below what is left of your chartered airplane lies a cold, white wilderness whose dark skies were lit up with the fireworks of what is left of your burning plane - many of your own kinds fate. God knows what lurks in the absence of scenery or in the frosted lines of pine because fuck faith. This wordless mantra of Liam Neeson's character Ottway is carved into his own frozen face through the entirety of the film until one of the finer flames decides to finally spew forth a riddance that is worthy of a crack of a smile - one of the few located in the bright hopelessness of The Grey. Boiling are these instances where decisions that amount to life's uncontrollable circumstances seem so sinewy and cruel. You've seen it before. Those moments where leadership must be presumed and the following party's favor is not-so carefully balanced. Had I been thrust into this very same situation, I'm not sure I'd know who to lay allegiance to, either, let alone possess the will to survive. Then again, this is The Grey's strongest weapon, not action, and certainly not taking action. If The Grey had to be akin to anything then I would have to compare its strong sense of questionable camaraderie with John Carpenter's The Thing, only replacing a hostile shape-shifting alien being with a animus wolf and removing almost any sort of weapon and replacing them with doubt.

To briefly summarize, The Grey follows a small group of plane crash survivors, previously oil-rig workers, through the Alaskan wilderness while being stalked by a large pack of gray wolves. The largest step the viewer will have to take in order to accommodate a more comfortable and caring perspective on The Grey is to take a second to pause, contemplate, and eventually realize that the film will not concern itself with a multitude of cliché long action shots featuring wolf carnage. The trailer is guilty of making it seem like such a film, but there lies the portion of the budget reserved for the marketing campaign. With brief glimpses of men freezing to death with the creeping peril of feral beasts should come to the obvious realization that a virtually frozen man isn't the best man for a wild fight for his life. In these frigid conditions where mobility is restricted and where indigenous beasts of prey lay, the only thing one can really do is hopelessly run. Taking a stand is a fool's dream, though I'm sure wrestling with a furry predator and bathing in your own blood would be one way to escape the crushing cold of the weather presented in The Grey. For this and many other reasons, The Grey is careful with its steps, knowing full well that you were enticed by the spectacle of viewing the ever-so stoic Liam Neeson gearing up for a critical culmination of wildlife vengeance. It monitors the life of each contestant featured on this wild game (show) and extends the warranties past their expected due date. The effectiveness of the desolation is only increased by the main antagonist (s); a malevolent pack of wolves whose ground has been trespassed upon. Second weather to wolves and you will begin to see the harrowing implications of their crash and its site. Sure, The Grey does lessen the screen-time with the wolves, subtracting the once possible nature-run-amok aspect of this, but that is not to say they aren't involved enough. In fact, with previous expectations in tow, The Grey not only surprised me with the implied notion of the ever so watchful eyes of the pack, but also the course taken for full development of these contemptuous human characters. As for the wolves and their combined undomesticated omniscience, The Grey perfectly emulates what was done so well in The Ghost and the Darkness (1996); creating a smothering setting in which death paces against the grain of natural landscapes, making all sounds but rare sights.

In this day and age, when it comes to a film from Hollywood that boasts a somewhat unconventional premise, it always seems that politically-correct pitchforks are raised and whining fully commences. It would appear that nit-picking "petaphiles" have gathered up the slack left behind from our mostly satiated responses towards a harrowing survival thriller and begun to spin webs of slander towards director Joe Carnahan (Smokin' Aces, Narc) and actor Liam Neeson for indulging on wolf meat stew for preparation of "hate." It is true that Carnahan purchased a total of four wolf carcasses for use on the set on The Grey as to give way for a CGI intermission because, let's face it, digital animation only goes so far when attempting to garner authentic human empathy. For an example of the brashness and overall creepiness of the Internet com-plaintiffs, simply visit the IMDb forum for The Grey. All you really need to do is observe casual keywords, hell, even screen names (here's to you "mister_wolf"), for my point to be put across. To be succinct, The Grey is a heavy dose of malicious and arctic nihilism; it's a sad, sad cinematic creature liberated by only the attitude of the wounded and the altitude of the setting. For those who enjoy frequenting a couple hours worth of mind-numbing entertainment, you might find your brain to be hurting as experienced by a fellow co-worker of mine during the mid-night screening. I can still distinctly hear the aggravated murmuring and the ineffectiveness of the auditorium's doorstep ringing in my memory banks. The Grey should be seen, if not for the celebration of the archaic human instinct for survival, then surely for a condensed lesson in masculine conditioning, which is quite rare coming from a film market that is mostly populated by liberal pussies. Take it or leave it, as is - The Grey is the best film to come from the early weeks of 2012 and that means a whole hell of a lot more than it should.

Joe Castro (2002)

I think this is the first and only time you will ever see me talk in a shining light about a Brain Damage film, so pay close attention. I've stalked over the idea of renting Terror Toons for several years now. I think the idea of some rampant childhood nightmare mixed with a pseudo-psychedelic feel just appeals to me in some unknown manner. After hearing that a Brain Damage film was getting a sequel, my curiosity had to be nourished. Terror Toons is a film that is undeniably hated by most people and for that, I can find much to adore about this sideshow like twisted straight to video release. A disturbing curvy pre-teen girl receives a package in the mail of a cartoon called TERROR TOONS. After popping it in and not noticing the giant title card that says Directed by Satan, she unwittingly releases two sadistic and largely entertaining killers into her household, thus destroying their form of reality as beyond their house is a giant hypnotic spinner. Terror Toons inundates with insane and carefully placed editing to further the look of a cartoon hell. Animated vultures carefully make their entrance as intestines are pulled from the Orientals cavity. Only a man child such as director Joe Castro could create such a psychotic and madcap entry in our frail and dying slasher genre. Think of a childhood memory involving cartoons. All of your memories might even be wrapped up in animation. Now imagine if your very own Wily E. Coyote were to attempt to sever your limb from limb in order to play with your intestines while hypnotizing your friends into a disgusting vegetable while puking all over oneself. That's Terror Toons in a nutshell. This is the only single title of the entire Brain Damage library that warrants a viewing. I would even begin to think that Castro has a place in his heart for Christopher Lee's Funny Man. The characters of Dr. Carnage and Max Assassin have instantly become iconic in my mind. I cannot imagine having more fun with any villains than with this devilish duo. Dr. Carnage is the rather green fellow in a lab coat who performs many botched procedures and involve an extreme amount of pain and the normal dose of a purplish liquid inside your head whereas Max Assassin is a giant gorilla with a Tommy gun. The costumes for these characters are extraordinary for the small budget of only $2300 dollars. Every action they perform is dubbed over with maniacal FX and character quips. This is an extremely unconventional low budget horror film that is teeming with the feel of a Saturday morning cartoon. If we had more zaniness in our horror genre, I'm sure that random experiments could be successfully pulled off rather than sacrificing an idea to the bowels of a cinema hell in which no one respects. With that in mind, Yes, Terror Toons is awful, but it is the most fun I've had with a horror film in a while. Now I just need to see the sequel.

THE WATCHER
THE WATCHER

Joe Charbanic (2000) I remember as a young teenager always wanting to see The Watcher. Not for James Spader who I've only recently noticed or Marisa Tomei who redefines the need for a mature and elder sexual appetite but for Keanu Reeves, who I have loved as an A-list Hollywood actor since the release of cybergem Johnny Mnemonic. Following the release of this film, I never paid attention to its video release date and never pursued viewing it until finding a copy at our local thrift store. With top billing of James "Sexrat" Spader as a homicide detective suffering from the removed effects of trepanation and Keanu Reeves as a maniacal and loony serial killer, I felt that The Watcher had nowhere to go but up. Upon viewing I wasn't quite as right as I would have liked to be. What I received in return for a stifling price of .33 cents was one of the earlier seditious gay serial killer films. As with most games of cat-and-mouse projected in almost every James Patterson "Alex Cross" novel or thriller period, this story involves a serial killer tormenting a subject of a previous crime. With malice and curious man-love as his initiative, Reeves follows the relocation of Joel Campbell (Spader) from Los Angeles to Chicago as he waits timelessly to rekindle his own twisted brand of anonymous, ambiguous homosexuality. After a painful opening showcasing the track that single-handedly killed the 90s, Rob Zombie's Dragula, we are tethered down and forced to watch Keanu Reeves dance around waving his(!) handgun in a shamanistic manner. Not to mention that Keanu Reeves isn't dancing to the song accordingly or the lack of music in the foreground thanks to the third wall set up by this archaic time capsule of dated editing but had they picked any other track over Dragula, the film would have been a lot better off as it brings to mind heavy doses of The Matrix and every Playstation game worthy of nostalgic memories.

The dosage of disturbing affection that was meant to ripple the waves uncorks itself near the three-quarter marker of the film. The scene's composites clue you in on this with the addition of Campbell's psychiatrist as more of a bargaining chip than a pretty supporting actress with no climaxual involvement. Once he breaks into her office searching for the recorded sessions with Campbell and escapes with his masturbatory evidence, he scrutinizes the audio in a jarring fashion while he rewinds and repeats the line of "Do you need him?" The instances of subliminal faggotry only become more intense and frequent. During the showdown in a waterfront building, The Watcher suddenly switched to the thematic innocence much alike that of The Voice of the Night penned by Dean Koontz. As Campbell and Griffin both stand off over the life of an unnecessary female element to their ragtag boy element consisting of vengeance and chase scenes, it was hard not to imagine little Colin and Roy's scuffle over poor Heather at the finale of the very same mentioned book. After all, Griffin would never let a "bitch" ruined the love he has worked so hard for, all those pretty women near or far.

The opposition would never have a chance to escalate of Griffin silenced them; after dancing in front of them and embarrassing himself of course. Throughout his victims, Griffin shows so much compassion towards them before the deed that it becomes an endearing practice, murder, that is. His slayings seems to be so intimate and personable yet disastrous as well. As I expected, Keanu Reeves made for a solid nemesis for the protagonist but I wouldn't codify him as simple as a villain. You see, Griffin's intentions are nothing more than illicit feelings for Campbell but Griffin's demeanor is largely cheerful and curious so it detracts from the actual suspense. Most of the suspense and thrills are actually on fault in part to the chase sequences, only certain ones though. The car chase scene proved to be expertly shot save for the clandestine gas station explosion. As much as the camera weaved through traffic, it couldn't sustain after Griffin lobbed the zippo lighter to ignite the building, killing 3 police officers only to make his getaway in a flaming car. The Watcher is a self-cynical 90s thriller which spiraled the expectations pretty low for my fluctuating standards. Be that as it may, it proved to be a rather entertaining ride through the eyes of a cloak-and-dagger serial killer and James Spader whining while abusing barbiturates. Even though the effects and editing are isolated in a time of awkward practices in action/thrillers, I find that I'm able to resist slapping judgment on this film on account of its terrible grainy-viewcam that we utilize for Griffin's stalking vision or the abundant negative exposure flashes to insinuate foreboding extermination. Not to be mistaken as a film about the streets, The Watcher is about the possible dangers of homosexuality and a testament to the madness that festers within the eyes of the rich boy hustler that Reeves' has portrayed in several roles spanning his career.

BEYOND THE DARKNESS

Joe D'Amato (1979)

Joe D'Amato's Beyond the Darkness (Buio Omega) was a pleasant surprise. The master of Italian sleaze and trash was actually able to make a film that resembled art!! Beyond the Darkness is a tale about a young man and the horrifying loss of his only love. A rich orphan; the loss of love the young man experiences must have been especially traumatizing as he never had the love of a family. Despite all of his power, money, and prestige, he can't buy what is forever gone. Instead of trying to buy another love, the young man decides he'd rather butcher young women. He takes his lost love (after stuffing her rotting body) and puts her on display in a bed at his mansion. What else is a heartbroken young man supposed to do?! The young man is also constantly shadowed by his mature housekeeper who wants his love. The housekeeper tries to play on the man's mental imbalances but he eventually gets tired of that and takes appropriate action. Her only benefit to the man is that she helps him dispose of the bodies of the women that he slaughters. Beyond the Darkness features a tranquilizing score by legendary Italian musicians, Goblin. I was surprised by the emotional impact that Beyond the Darkness had during scenes of sadness of the young man's lost love in combination with the melodic talents of Goblin. Throughout the film, the music is very consistent with the overall feel of Beyond the Darkness. Even when the young bachelor burns a young woman's body alive, I couldn't help to feel sorry for the depressed lad. Beyond the Darkness is a masterpiece of Italian horror cinema. I have yet to see another film by Joe D'Amato that had any redeeming qualities. Beyond the Darkness features the full frontal nudity you would expect from the Italian sleaze director, but it also features genuine human emotion. I wouldn't be surprised if Beyond the Darkness was a personal and "auteur piece" of the stereotypical Italian director. Maybe old D'Amato had a lost love he could never get over. Every director has to put themselves into their film at least one time during their career.

THE HOWLING

Joe Dante (1981)

The werewolf film is a certainly a severely neglected sub-genre of the horror genre. That being said, the number of genuinely quality werewolf films is absurdly scant. Of course, the horror genre has a rotten wealth of mediocre zombie flicks (will these ever stop?!?), but it is sorely lacking in the classic supernatural wolfman department. Unfortunately, it seems that most modern day werewolf movies are not much more than sterile action-packed cross-genre works (e.g. the supremely overrated Underworld franchise) that are designed to be sexy, cool, and even funny, but totally lack the distinct nuances of the ancient monster myth. Joe Dante's The Howling (1981) is one of few notable works that manages to capture some of the elements of the traditional werewolf story, but, unfortunately, time has been a little unkind to this mostly worthwhile horror flick. It is not often that a serious female professional goes to a sleazy porno theater to meet a murderously perverted werewolf. Of course, television anchorwoman Karen White thinks that she is just going to meet a mere pathological serial killer. Naturally, she is met with quite a surprise of the lethal lycanthropic sort. After suffering amnesia after her less than charming meeting with the somewhat degenerate werewolf, a doctor orders Mrs. White to stay at a highly suspect colony getaway. Karen and her husband decide to go and end up at a peculiar rural colony inhabited by mysterious individuals that are somewhat similar to the violent villagers of The Wicker Man, minus the odd proclivity towards Celtic paganism. As one soon comes to suspect, the dubious individuals of the colony are actually a pack of werewolves who don't take too kindly to silver bullets. Unfortunately, some of the werewolves featured in The Howling look exactly like what they actually are in real-life: people wearing werewolf costumes. Due to age and less than stellar special effects, the werewolves in the film aren't very petrifying and even disappointing at times. Like a lot of older horror films, The Howling has more than shown its age. Additionally, the vintage wardrobes of the characters featured in the film are nothing short of repellant, but, of course, such blatant aesthetic-displeasantsness comes with the territory for a horror film created in the early 1980s. The real meat of The Howling lies in the buildup leading to when the eccentric colony residents collectively morph into werewolves and do as werewolf do. Whether it be Richard Ramirez-look-alike Eddie or nefarious nymphomaniac Marsha, one can't help but yearn for the little lycanthropic legion to shred their human prey apart. Like most worthwhile werewolf flicks, The Howling has an imperative erotic component that is probably best expressed when seductive beastess Marsha lures in Karen White's husband and brands him on the back via her she-wolf claws, thus marking her property. In regard to Mr. White, one must ask themselves whether or not the man committed active adultery when engaging in bestial intercourse whilst entranced by an exceedingly sexual supernatural being? To answer my own question, I give a positive: NO. The Howling has a number of glaring flaws and aesthetic blemishes, yet it is most certainly one of few werewolf films worthy of viewing and returning to. The film has enough nudity, violence, and true horror to at least keep most viewers reasonably gratified. Still, I can't help but feel that while The Howling shows immense promise during its undeniably captivating opening, it never quite reaches its full potential. Then again, the actual ending of The Howling is quite splendid, especially for those viewers that fancy scenes of extravagant mass bodily dismemberment. Unfortunately, it seems that Karen White never reaches the solace of soul that she originally sought out to achieve in the first place on her luxurious vacation retreat. In conclusion, I highly recommend that viewers should take the opportunity to bite into a big juicy hamburger upon finishing The Howling, so as to heighten the overall experience of the film.

THE PAGEMASTER

Joe Johnston (1994)

LeVar Burton of Reading Rainbow rolls in his grave concerning this film. That is, hypothetically assuming that he is already dead. Kunta Kinte would be very disappointed to take note the average effects of The Pagemaster, considering I'm well past being an adult and the general synopsis of this magical tale has me biting my nails wanting to skedaddle over to the nearest library and immerse myself into classic literature. I'll admit The Pagemaster's animation is severely dated and doesn't retain the classic feel of such classics as Watership Down and The Plague Dogs (Both of these animated styles have an intimidating gritty and vintage aesthetic), but this is more than a Disney feature brimming with racism and vapid morals. Macaulay Culkin stars as a sheltered child who is terrified of absolutely everything. Irony aside, he would later grow up to be busted on several drug charges and traffic violations. These incidents would later mark his role in The Pagemaster to be an exercise in masterful acting seeing as how statistics had no role in his later arrests and fall from fame and his subsequent rise into indie stardom with his cult "orgiastic" hit Party Monster, which I admit is almost a great film. With only few live-action roles with the most recognizable being Christopher Lloyd, The Pagemaster focuses more on the landscape of colorful and diverse genres as Adventure, Fantasy, and Horror. The few instances of CGI are proudly and fluidly brought to life due to an amazing team. At the time, the scenes of a rotunda melting and eventually creating a tidal wave of pastels could even rival the majesty of the effects of What Dreams May Come. Boasting many excerpts from literature classics as Treasure Island, Moby Dick, Dr. Jekyll & Mr. Hyde, and Gulliver's Travels, The Pagemaster does many of these tale cinematic justice with literary translations. Most notably is the enthusiastic and menacing performance of Captain Ahab in Melville's Moby Dick.

A bit of nostalgia never hurt anyone. My favorite childhood viewing activities revolved around frequent viewings of The Rescuers Down Under, All Dogs Go To Heaven, We're Back: A Dinosaur's Story, and The Pagemaster. After viewing this film after the years, it still lives up in ways to the standard that it has survived with. There's no real depth here other than a massive reading propaganda video. I'd expect courageous adventure from a film telling your children with complexes to venture outside more but sadly the farthest this goes is an underused dragon battle. The Pagemaster represents a huge part of childhood development and also manages to rehabilitate many children into enjoying reading. If it worked on me, then in all theory it should work on many. Those especially who can still manage to stomach a children's film or even an animated film. The future of Hollywood has a storm brewing. Director Joe Johnston who has created simple tales of The Pagemaster and Jumanji has moved onto The Wolfman (2009) and The First Avenger: Captain America. May god bless these projects with the age old meaning of quality over quantity.

Joe Lynch (2007)

With most horror being as bland as processed cheese, It does come as a surprise to see something that would benefit the horror community. When Wrong Turn first came out in 2003, it didn't have any contemporary aspects. Nothing about this film was original. Whether you analyze the use of the backwoods as a target fear or notice the beautiful broads and gut-munching gore, the film blatantly appears bland and would never reach the emotional anxiety quota of Deliverance. Wrong Turn 2 grasps the past-time knowledge of the greats and comes to terms with the failure of this first and attempts to fix this by adding more gore, more nudity, and more action. In order to make this work right, no doubt they'd need a hand from someone who is used to this madcap carnage. With this whim, Joe Lynch was brought in. You'd know him from Terror Firmer and nothing else. For being his first film, he has already proposed a delightful future in horror. Some of the events and controversy are perhaps the more interesting subject. In Australia, a government officer showed a group of teenagers incarcerated for sex crimes the film Wrong Turn 2. This led into the community questioning what their tax money was being paid for and news headlines broke out, insisting that the officer be "sacked" Why you would show a film that can hardly be taken seriously on a serious note is beyond me, but i do thank the officer for a hilarious scandal. On to the values of the film, It has a group of the clichéd characters that American cinema is known for. We have the Dyke military officer, pervert skateboarder, a football playing Negro with morals, an artfag who cuts herself, and a handful of sluts. On the subject of the Negro, it seems odd that he portrayed the character as the only pure soul on the film. The one that would rise above the foul plays of temptation and would be the most useful. His all-American name, Texas Battle, needs some explaining as well. Dale Murphy (Sounds like a NASCAR Racer) is played by Henry Rollins. From Rollins performance as a motivational speaker in Feast, to him playing the Patriotic bad ass warrior, his demeanor in films proves that he can play anything. Actually, his role in Feast was the only proof that I needed. Last time I remember Rollins in a film, he was getting a blowjob, art style, in a Richard Kern short film depicting misogyny and grainy black & white. It's needless to say that his performance carried the film home, and without Rollins, Wrong Turn 2: Dead End would have an accurate name. Wrong Turn 2 is a satire of sorts, using the art of sensationalism to it's own advantage, while silently mocking reality TV. Wrong Turn 2 did a much better job than Halloween: Resurrection did. Although, I did enjoy watching Bu$ta Rhymes negro-riffic performance. Years later, that memorable scene featuring the fight between the "black knight" and the "pasty face killer" would become a hilarious inside joke between friends. Wrong Turn 2 is a film that will be hated by some, if not most. If you manage to glance at the big picture, and absorb the great performances, mutant pregnancies, and America incarnate lighting up redneck freaks with a dynamite bow & arrow, then congratulations. I'm just as glad to love this film as you should. Vote Rollins for President.

BITTER FEAST

Joe Maggio (2010)

The seasoning of Bitter Feast is the flexible premise: disgruntled celebrity chef kidnaps asshole blogger who delivered a scathing review belittling his refined culinary artistry. What creates Bitter Feast into the personable account of not vengeance, but rehabilitation is its setting of a soulless cyberspace pseudo-reality and the rabid clicking that leads to this collective unconscious feeling (influenced by anonymous bloggers) morphing into public opinion. In other words, what I say about this film in particular may or may not lead you to subconsciously go out of your way to view this film. This clever revision to the classic kidnap/torture staple of modern horror is in part of director Joe Maggio's utter disgust with a review towards Gordon Ramsay.

"The origins of BITTER FEAST go back to June, 2007. I was reading a Frank Bruni review of Gordon Ramsay's first New York City restaurant, "London Hotel." There was a lassitude in Bruni's writing that gave you the sense he liked the food, but wanted to dislike it, and so he delivered this odd, middling, lazy review, ultimately condemning it for lack of what Bruni considered "the most important thing of all - excitement." It struck me that this was totally ridiculous and unfair. Then I started thinking what I would do to Frank Bruni if I were Gordon Ramsay. After many strange imaginings, I concluded that more than anything else, what Ramsay would probably want is to somehow force Bruni to live in Ramsay's shoes for a bit, to teach him empathy, to force him to care about cooking with the intensity that Ramsay cared about it, and then to randomly and arbitrarily shit all over Bruni's dreams. Thus, BITTER FEAST."

Starting out with a flashback that's revisited several times, each time with a fraction of a revelation, Bitter Feast quickly but barely establishes the inspired Gordon character as a hard-ass with very little patience for his co-star's taunting and dull female sense of humor. This sleight against his art that he presents to a nationwide audience has driven him mad with frustration. This annoying blond character is perhaps the reason why Gordon chose to launch a campaign of terror against uneducated blogger, JT Franks. For a visual image, JT Franks isn't an honest reviewer of any sense - he's a sadist wielding his own shortcomings and grief as a weapon to bring down others with their success. For instance, the pseudo-critic makes no effort to enjoy the tastes and settings offered up to his palate. Scathing review after another, even his own wife realizes that his hobby has taken a wretched route into unnecessary and unreliable tabloid skid marks. To the horror community, this is the equivalent of a third-rate "gore-fiend" swearing off Matt Reeve's Let Me In without even acquiring an opinion - it's all boulder-dash to me. The refusal to view a film, one that is well within your own interests all for the facade of purism and elitism is deplorable and as

Bitter Feast's roots also give it a commendation of expression: a reaction to reactions. It's an abstract theme to divulge with violence, especially in the guise of a brutal thriller. Escaping away from the confines of predictably (at least until the climax), Bitter Feast approaches the genre with a fine platter of culinary torture games. For instance, Gordon swears by a credo of which states that if Mr. Franks believes his taste buds to be so divine, could he not discern which dish had a scent of belladonna hidden amidst the prepared mulberries? Several cuisine-themed challenges await this man, JT Franks, a person of which has no humanity left to be sympathetic towards. Through the flashbacks and stoic vocalizing is Peter Gray's character slowly unearthed. While shallow but supported, Gray represents a character whose hardships and accidents make up what he is. His primitive side meshes with the luxuriant in which a medium is discovered. This is presented as scenes are interwoven to reveal the serene fortitude in such tasks as collecting berries, then rivaled with hunting, the true masculinity flourishing through his past brother's cruelty.

Without the introduction of a private detective, I feel Bitter Feast would have been more linear to the rehabilitation of Franks in his pretentiousness. While Bitter Feast revels in what is certainly a creative wig to put atop the head of generic horror, it never truly rockets towards the marginal yet loyal cult cinema success it could have acquired had it focused on more unconventional shocks and games. However, this culinary thriller was vastly entertaining and never boring. I even found myself patiently waiting for this Peter character to turn wind towards the path of German hero Armin Meiwes. Although hampered by the typical conventions, Bitter Feast is quite the low-budget spectacle of fine dishes and exacted justice towards a pointless opinion. Well-played and conservatively sadistic, Bitter Feast is exactly what the title implies.

BARTON FINK

Joel Coen* (1991)

While I would not exactly call myself a true Coen Brothers connoisseur, I feel confident enough in my appraisal of their somewhat uneven oeuvre to say that Barton Fink (1991)—a cinematic work that has been eclipsed in terms of popularity by probably half a dozen or so of their other, oftentimes glaringly inferior, films—is their unequivocal magnum opus. Indeed, fuck the autistic acting and quirky Cagisms of Raising Arizona (1987), nauseatingly nice Amero-Swede musicality of Fargo (1996), and sophisticated sunbaked stoner humor of The Big Lebowski (1998), the Coen brothers' 1991 period piece, which is set in 1941 on the eve of America's entry into World War II, has the most to offer in terms of sheer aesthetic potency and curiousness, thematic intricately, meta-cinephilia, and eccentric esoteric Judaic self-loathing. A virtual 'Jewish Eraserhead' featuring John Turturro portraying a sort of kosher commie intellectual equivalent to the David Lynch protagonist Henry portrayed by Jack Nance in terms of obscenely absurd haircut and Fremdscham-inducing awkwardness of character, the film was even executive produced by Hebraic cineaste Ben Barenholtz who was also responsible for popularizing Lynch's debut feature by screening it as part of the midnight movie circuit. Indeed, the film even features a number of blatant Lynchian shots juxtaposed with ambient noise, not to mention the fact that it is arguably the brothers' most hermetic film. While undoubtedly somewhat overlooked compared to many of the Coens' other films, it managed to snag three major awards at the 1991 Cannes Film Festival, including the coveted Palme d'Or, thus underscoring its somewhat preternatural arthouse quality. Of course, as a film that dedicates much time to ruthlessly mocking both egomaniacal far-leftist Jewish intellectuals and the distinct Ashkenazi immigrant flavor of the Hollywood's Golden Age studio system, it is easy to see why modern academics and film critics seem to suffer amnesia when it comes to discussing the film and comparing it to the filmmakers' other work. Needless to say, Barton Fink makes for a great double feature with the Coen brothers' most overtly Jewish film A Serious Man (2009) and one can only hope that the siblings will finally get around to achieving their projected goal of directing an adaptation of Michael Chabon's hyper Hebraic detective novel The Yiddish Policemen's Union (2007), which they have already adapted into a screenplay. Notably, Jewish American film critic Jonathan Rosenbaum wrote an entire article entitled Crass Consciousness featured in the August 23, 1991 issue of the Chicago Reader where he expressed in his strange misreading of the film a certain highly personalized uneasiness, complaining, "A final point should be made about the broad, comic-book-style Jewish caricatures in the film — Barton, Lipnick, Geisler, and Lipnick's assistant Lou Breeze (Jon Polito). Spike Lee was lambasted on the op-ed page of the New York Times and by Nat Hentoff in the Village Voice (among other places) for Jewish caricatures in MO' BETTER BLUES that employed one of the same actors (Turturro), occupied only a fraction as much screen time, and were if anything less malicious than the caricatures in BARTON FINK. So I assume the reason Lee was singled out for abuse and the Coens won't be to the same extent is that the Coens happen to be Jewish. For whatever it's worth — speaking now as a Jew myself — I don't consider any of the caricatures in either movie to be racist in themselves, and it seems to me somewhat absurd that Lee should be criticized so widely for something that the Coens do at much greater length with impunity. Being white, having the minds of teenagers, and believing that social commitment is for jerks are all probably contributing factors to this privileged treatment." The grandson of a wealthy businessman that owned a small chain of movie theaters in Alabama, Rosenbaum notably comes from a far-leftist background and was involved with the organizing of angry negro communists during the civil rights era. Although just speculation, one can only assume that he takes personal offense to the less the flattering of the eponymous protagonist—a Jewish leftist writer like himself—and his hypocritical quasi-Marxist politics. While Rosenbaum makes the assumption that the Coens are just philistine jerks that are simply too selfish and immature to embrace the oh-so precious social justice warrior lifestyle, Barton Fink demonstrates that the brothers have a keen understanding of the Jewish leftist mindset and all of its hypocritical idiosyncrasies. Notably, in his book The Jewish Mystique (1969), Dutch-born American sociologist Ernest van den Haag, himself an ex-commie activist that spent nearly three years in one of Mussolini's prisons, made the wise observation in regard to the questionable nature of Jewish left-wing activism, "Since the Jews suffered for so long from oppression by dominant groups, laws, and traditions, their sentimental identification with minorities, underdogs, the poor, the humiliated, the shunned, the maltreated, the outlawed is quite understandable. Yet, explanation is not justification. And unfortunately, the Jews have not used their intellectual powers to analyze Utopian, reformist, and revolutionary doctrines as effectively as they have used these powers to analyze traditions and ideologies supporting the status quo. Wherefore, within the Jewish cultural establishment, Jewishness as an entrance ticket has tended to be fused with vaguely leftist, pro-underdog attitudes. Jewishness alone merely gets you into the lobby." While they might use somewhat aberrant humor as their weapon of choice as opposed to some turgid academic text, the Coens demonstrate with Barton Fink that they are, quite unlike Rosenbaum, the sort of genuinely intellectually curious Jews that a great sage like van den Haag could have appreciated.

Although one of the more intellectual and culturally refined film critics that America has produced as a protégé of iconoclastic artist and film critic Manny Farber, Rosenbaum seems to suffer from the stereotypical Judaic trait of a lack of self-awareness, especially on the collective racial, as opposed to personal, level.

Not surprisingly, the eponymous protagonist of Barton Fink—an ostensibly ‘revolutionary’ far-leftist that, despite being a pretentious navel-gazing prick intellectual that has probably never did an hour of real physical labor in his entire life, claims to be fighting for the so-called “common man”—is plagued by a certain infuriating degree of a lack of self-awareness, but luckily reality eventually ruthlessly smacks him in the face in the form of a literal fiery holocaust of sorts and a grotesquely obscene Semitic studio mogul that reminds him that a communist is really just a failed kosher capitalist that seeks power via different, albeit similarly materialistic (and anti-goyim), means. While Rosenbaum describes the characters in the film as “comic-book-style Jewish caricatures,” I think they more clearly represent perennial post-religious Jewish archetypes that most Jews, like Rosenbaum, probably wish did not exist yet are ultimately quite clear to anyone that is familiar with Hollywood—both of the past and present as Harvey Weinstein has recently highlighted with his Philip Roth-esque sexcapades in shiksa-defiling. In fact, the Jewish lack of self-awareness is depicted in a cleverly allegorical fashion at the conclusion of the Coen brothers’ A Serious Man in a scene at the end of the film where a group of young Hebrew students absurdly stand helplessly as a tornado begins to make its way in their general direction. Undoubtedly, Israeli-born jazz musician and anti-Zionist activist Gilad Atzmon probably said it best when he wrote in his review of the film, “The Coen film ends with a chain of scenes initiated by a tornado alert given during a Hebrew class in a Jewish orthodox school. The young Bar Mitzvah kids are ordered to evacuate the class immediately. Next we see the storm rapidly encroaching towards the boys and girls who are now standing in the open school yard. Paralysed by awe, perplexed they gaze towards their own inevitable disaster. They stare at it, they are hopeless on the verge of impotence. Their elder teacher is right behind them, frantically struggling to find the right key for the synagogue shelter. The key to life should be in his hands, but he is obviously not going to find it. At the same cinematic time Larry Gopnik, the protagonist of the film, receives an urgent call from his doctor, his X-ray diagnosis is back. Apparently, something is horribly wrong with his body. Prior to the call, Larry was obviously totally unaware of his affliction and is thrown into a state of profound shock. Allegorically, this is the meaning of Jewish detachment and alienation according to the Coens. The People of the Book consistently fail to detect when something is going horribly wrong. They somehow fail to anticipate the storm that is coming or brace themselves for its devastating impact. They fail to interpret some minor signs of resentment before it turns into a tide of hatred. And even when they do manage to notice a rise in antagonism, they somehow employ the wrong strategy to placate it. As we often read, Jewish ethnic campaigners and institutions (ADL, AJC, BOD etc) are always flagging up statistics, they prefer to present numbers of ‘anti Semitic’ incidents instead of wondering why these incidents occur in the first place.” In Barton Fink, the eponymous protagonist also fails to process danger after unwittingly befriendng a serial killer who he initially pisses off after complaining to the front desk of a hotel they were both occupying despite said serial killer also being the sort of goy “common man” that that he oftentimes speaks so reverently about. Of course, as the Coen brothers reveal, the working-class is nothing more than a mere abstraction to the protagonist, or so he assumedly learns when it is already too late. Undoubtedly, one of the reasons that the Coen brothers are such great filmmakers is their sort of razor sharp racial self-awareness and intricate and nuanced approach to the Jewish question, whether it be the exploiting a goy’s empathy by an insufferably slimy bookie Bernie ‘chisellin’ Little Yid’ Bernbaum and his femme fatale sister Verna in Miller’s Crossing (1990), the completely spiritually cuckolded Milius-esque neocon Jewish convert Walter Sobchak in The Big Lebowski, or the titular kosher cuckold and his cryptically corrupt Minnesota community in A Serious Man. While it is indubitably true that the Hebraic duo have created their own fair share of uniquely unflattering goy bad boys and unsavory shiksa sluts, it can certainly be argued that the Coens’ most pathetic and repugnant characters are swarthy Israelites that love the smell of their own kosher farts. In Barton Fink—a film with a protagonist that was modeled after kosher commie playwright and screenwriter Clifford Odets who, not unlike the film’s protagonist, left for Hollywood after the production of his play Clash by Night (1941) in the 1941–1942 season—the viewer is exposed to the innate hypocrisy and phoniness of the bourgeois-bred Jewish Trotskyite intellectual and how such a figure is even more loathsome and grotesque than the miserly ‘happy merchant’ archetype. Indeed, after watching the film, it is easy to see why Uncle Joe Stalin went to such absurd extremes to have an ice axe driven into Trotsky’s diseased gray matter, as there is no greater threat to a real lumpenprole revolution than a comfortably smug intellectual in unstained worker’s clothing. Of course, the great irony of the film is that it was directed by two intellectuals that look like they could be the dope-smoking grandsons of rabid postmodern rebben Trotsky. Indeed, forget Lubitsch and his all the more cynical protégé Billy Wilder, the Coen brothers are the two true kosher kings of subversive Semitic comedies. While racist alt-Israelite Douglas Rushkoff—a bombastic dork with an unintentionally humorous god complex that once bragged regarding his race, “In a sense, our detractors have us right, in that we are a corrosive force . . .”—proudly argued in his book Nothing Sacred: The Truth About Judaism (2003) in regard to the innately iconoclastic nature of Judaism, “Iconoclasm destroys all man-made symbols and leads to abstract monotheism, which in turn leads to an ethos of social justice,” the Coen brothers go all the way and smash both Judaism and its post-religious metaphysical affliction of SJWism.

Notably, in his book The Wicked Son: Anti-Semitism, Jewish self-hatred, and the Jews (2006), right-wing Jewish Zionist playwright and sometimes filmmaker David Mamet makes a somewhat dubious claim in regard to mainstream zio-ganda flicks like Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993) and Roman Polanski's The Pianist (2002), stating in a somewhat paranoid (yet quite stereotypically Jewish) fashion, "I wrote, years ago, that Holocaust films are 'MANDINGO for Jews,' and that the thrill, for the audience, came and comes from a protected indulgence of anti-Semitism: they get to see us killed and to explain to themselves that they feel bad about it." Judging by his quote and by the fact that he is also a Jewish writer, I would love to hear Mamet's thoughts on Barton Fink, which, on top of featuring a number of greedy and/or otherwise grotesque Jewish characters, features a Judaic writer protagonist that probably epitomizes everything that he abhors in his race as a mensch with strong Zionist tendencies. In the same book, Mamet complains in regard to his kinsmen, "Why do some Jews reject their religion and their race? For two reasons: because it is 'too Jewish' and because it is not Jewish enough." While I have to assume that Mamet would deride the Coen brothers' film as the work of unabashed self-loathing Jews, I would certainly argue that—for better or worse—it is, culturally speaking, one of the most innately Jewish films ever made as a hyper hermetic cinematic work that follows in the grand culturally kosher tradition of Franz Kafka, Bruno Schulz, Hermann Ungar, Carlo Michelstaedter, Harold Pinter, and David Cronenberg in terms of being an intricate and highly idiosyncratic expression of Jewish neurosis, albeit of the slightly more immature sort. Despite the fact that they work in very different (sub)genres, the Coen brothers are somewhat comparable to Canuck body horror maestro Cronenberg in the sense of their subversive post-Talmudic intellects and somewhat detached affinity for the curiously morally depraved and/or preternaturally pathological. Similarly, just as only a member of god's chosen tribe could have directed a werewolf flick as dementedly darkly humorous and shoah-stained as John Landis' An American Werewolf in London (1981) and a film as unabashedly perverse neurotic and aesthetically autistic as Todd Solondz Palindromes (2004), only a Jew (or two Jews, in this case) could have dreamed up a film as intrinsically and intricately Jewish despite being a film where the word "Jew" is only used once and "kike" is flagrantly used about half a dozen times.

Although a decidedly distastefully swarthy four-eyed geek with an eccentrically elevated jewfro, titular protagonist Barton Fink (John Turturro)—a pretentious playwright that just received somewhat of a hit with a painfully banal social realism oriented play entitled 'Bare Ruined Choirs'—seems to secretly believe that he is the most revolutionary writer since Marx, so naturally he is somewhat hesitant to take a job offer as a scriptwriter under contract at a big Hollywood studio named Capitol Pictures. Despite his semi-cryptic commie sympathies, Fink finds a $1,000-a-week contract to be rather appealing since it is 1941 and he is somewhat unsure what to do with his life, or as he complains to his manager with a certain glaring lack of self-confidence and authenticity, "I'm not sure anymore. I guess I try to make a difference." Immediately upon arriving in Hollywood, Fink is greeted with an ominous atmosphere when he meekly checks into a quasi-gothic and painfully dilapidated Art Deco dump named Hotel Earle—a building that clearly has seen better days, as if it lost what was left of its initial extravagance the same year that a janitor tossed the cut footage from Erich von Stroheim's magnum opus Greed (1924) into a MGM studio dumpster—that is run by a eerily emasculated and and merrily masochistic bellhop named 'Chet' (Steve Buscemi) who seems to derive great pleasure at the thought of shining the shoes of his hapless tenants. Despite the sorry state of the rotting hotel, Fink, who refuses an offer from his studio to pay for a nicer hotel, seems to have an instinctual and almost ascetic attraction to the building, as if he knows that it is his own little special piece of purgatory where he will have a spiritually luminous experience and be forced to truly find himself and mature as both a man and artist. Assigned to pen a script for a b wrestling movie that he has nil interest in, Fink is, not surprisingly, almost immediately plagued with writer's block, as if he cannot bear to write something that he believes is so innately beneath him. Indeed, while Fink acts like he has a great big hard-on for the working man, he cannot even be bothered to take interest in the perennial prole sport, but luckily a jovial fat bastard will soon give him so much needed pointers.

As Fink discovers in a rather rude fashion, Capitol Pictures, like most studios of that era (and today), is an almost 100% kosher studio that is lorded over by absurdly rude and grotesquely loudmouthed chosenites. Unfortunately for Fink, he is forced to work with a cynical producer named Ben Geisler (Tony Shalhoub)—a character clearly inspired by revolutionary Judaic Hollywood producer Irving 'The Boy Wonder' Thalberg (Camille, Mutiny on the Bay)—who makes it quite clear that he cannot stomach the pansy pretenses of artsy fartsy NYC intellectual types like the protagonist. Although the studio's founder and head Jack Lipnick (Michael Lerner)—a grotesque beast of a man that bears a striking physical resemblance to MGM co-founder Louis B. Mayer (who, like Lerner's character, is also a Belarusian-born Jew) and possesses a revoltingly arrogant and bombastic personality worthy of disgraced Miramax cofounder Louis B. Mayer—takes an immediate liking to Fink, the hapless screenwriter will soon discover that the obsession while ultimately lead to his artistic downfall. While Lipnick does everything he can to kiss Fink's ass, including literally kissing his feet and gleefully stating, "The writer is king here at Capitol Pictures. Don't believe me, take a look at your paycheck at the end of every week. That's what we think of the writer," he also reveals himself to be a megalomaniacal mad man by boasting with a certain degree of otherworldly chutzpah, "I'm bigger and meaner and louder than any other kike in this town." Undoubtedly, there is a certain sickly sardonic irony in the fact that Lipnick loves throwing around the classic anti-Semitic slur "kike," as Fink will ultimately become the victim of what a Jewish (anti)hate group like the ADL might describe as stereotypical 'financial canards' in terms of the ruthless abuse of business power and materialism that the protagonist will suffer at the hands of the studio head. Indeed, Fink might to be a self-deluded prick and hypocrite that loves the smell of his own farts despite incessantly pontificating on his ostensible respect for the “common man,” but he does seem to have a certain genuine respect for art and the process of artistic creation. As for Lipnick, he seems to pride himself on profiting handsomely from incessantly producing formulaic philistine motion-picture entertainment for the most mindless of knuckle-dragging goyim, hence the popularity of the sort of kitschy boxing pictures that his studio regularly defecates out. Supposedly illiterate and relying on his meek assistant Lou Breeze (Jon Polito) to read scripts for him, Lipnick judges a film’s quality as to whether it is “fruity” or not. Needless to say, Fink’s script is ultimately judged to be “fruity,” but first the protagonist must go to virtual metaphysical hell and back before he can create what he will eventually personally judge as his greatest work.

Despite being a quasi-hipster-esque Jewish NYC intellectual that only works with other Jews, Fink somewhat ironically develops a relatively close and tender relationship with a bawdy and somewhat boorish goy insurance salesman of the rather rotund sort named Charlie Meadows (John Goodman). Not surprisingly considering the Fink’s somewhat strange luck, his friendship with Charlie develops under somewhat awkward circumstances after he calls the front desk of his hotel to complain about the fat mensch for making too much noise while he is trying in vain to write. When Charlie swings by his hotel room to make amends for the noise, Fink initially seems somewhat scared but eventually gets the gall to bring up his favorite subject, himself, and arrogantly remarks when his new friend asks about what kind of writing he does, “Strange as it may seem, Charlie, I guess I write about people like you – the average working stiff, the common man.” Indeed, Fink practically suffers from diarrhea of the mouth and won’t let Charlie speak as he is pathetically pontificating about stereotypical commie gibberish, including stating that he wants to, “create a theater for the masses based on a few simple truths, not on some shopworn abstractions about drama that don’t hold true today, if they ever did.” While working stiff Charlie—a rather agreeable insurance salesman that proudly proclaims that he loves working with the public—selflessly offers to help Fink with his writing and chimes in with remarks like, “Hell, I could tell you stories,” Fink just continues to passionately proselytize and spout bullshit that he doesn’t even truly believe like, “The hopes and dreams of the common man are as noble as those of any king.” Of course, whether he wants to admit to himself or not, Fink sees himself as a sort of messianic king of abstract intellect and he cannot help but treat virtually everyone he meets as if they were servile paupers that are lucky to be in his presence.

One day while taking a leak at a urinal at a local restaurant, Fink hears the gratefully grotesque sounds of a drunk puking his guts out in a nearby stall, so naturally he is delightfully shocked to discover that the shameless dipsomaniac in question is his writer hero W. P. Mayhew (John Mahoney)—a character inspired by William Faulkner—who also works as a Hollywood screenwriter, or as he states himself with a certain inebriated elegance, “All of us undomesticated writers eventually make our way out here to the great salt lick. That’s probably why I always have such a powerful thirst.” While Fink somewhat breaks character and gleefully proclaims to the elder writer like an excited schoolboy with a fan-boy crush, “You’re the finest novelist of our time,” the protagonist will soon discover that his great hero is a deranged boozier and pathetic artistic fraud who has his long-suffering servile secretary-cum-girlfriend Audrey Taylor (Judy Davis) ghostwrite all of his work for him. While Audrey proudly proclaims to love Mayhew, who is old enough to be her father, and even demonstrates it by passively accepting his constant verbal and physical abuse, that does not stop her from eventually seducing Fink when she is supposed to be helping him write his screenplay. Rather unfortunately, the next morning after their carnal session, Fink is absolutely horrified to discover Audrey’s bloody corpse lying next to him. Rather absurdly, Fink only discovers that Audrey is a lifeless corpse after he makes a valiant attempt to swat a mosquito that is feasting on her cold unclad body. Luckily, Fink’s good old buddy Charlie, who was able to hear the ill-fated lovemaking session the night before via a pipe, is curiously more than willing to help get rid of Audrey’s corpse, though Mayhew’s dead body is, somewhat strangely, also found a couple days later. Needless to say, Fink, who has no other friends in Hollywood, suffers a virtual emotional breakdown when Charlie informs him that he temporarily leaving town. Somewhat unfortunately, Fink makes the mistake of giving Charlie the address of his parents and beloved “Uncle Maury.” Unbeknownst to Fink, who, despite his ostensible formidable intellect, is plagued by a certain socially autistic naïveté, Charlie is a deranged serial killer and his real name is the chillingly Teutonic Karl ‘Madman’ Mundt. Indeed, Fink is somewhat taken aback when a wop-American cop named Detective Mastrionotti (Richard Portnow) and his kraut-American partner Detective Deutsch (Christopher Murney), who both insult him from being a Jew, inform him that Charlie is a crazed killer and show him a goofy mugshot of his pal. Notably, before leaving town, Charlie shows Fink some wrestling moves and even violently pins him down on the ground in a manner that is probably more passionate than the protagonist’s coital encounter with Audrey. While Charlie undoubtedly demonstrates that he could probably effortlessly kill Fink with his bare hands, he opts to teach him a lesson in respect and humility instead.

Before leaving town, Charlie drops off a dubious wrapped package that looks like it would be a nice fit for a decapitated female human head and asks Fink if he would be so kind enough to watch it for him since the box ostensibly contains everything that is important to him. Somewhat inexplicably, the package, which manages to spark his curiosity, seems to cure Fink’s writer block, as he manages to finish his entire script, which he previously only had written a mere couple words of, in a single night. Indeed, not only does Fink finish the script, but he also calls his producer Geisler the same night and proudly boasts that “I think it’s really big” and “This may be the most important work I’ve ever done.” In fact, Fink’s creative accomplishment gives him such a massive ego boast that he manages to cause a small riot at a dance hall after boasting to a group of sailors while possessed by delusions of grandeur and screaming twaddle like, “I’m a writer, you monsters! I create! I create for a living! I’m a creator! I’m a creator! This is my uniform! [points to head] This is how I serve the common man.” As to what caused Fink to act in such an unbecomingly hysterical fashion, a sailor dared to kindly ask to “cut in” and dance with the same girl he was dancing with because he was “shipping out tomorrow” and probably wanted a little female warmth before going to war. Undoubtedly, Fink probably deserved the same treatment that was unleashed on Kenneth Anger’s character in Fireworks (1947) by a couple of suavely dressed sailors, but luckily for him he only received a single punch to the face. Arguably, in no other scene does Fink’s hypocritical contempt for the so-called “common man” become so unbearably glaring, especially since the young military men are going to risk their lives in a war that involves rescuing European Jewry, so it is only fitting that the viewer receives the therapeutic relief of seeing one of the prole sailors punching him in his loudmouth. Of course, it will take more than a punch to knock Fink down a couple pegs, as he is a mensch that has a hard time suffering humility.

If the punch did not bring Fink back to reality and force him to confront his innately counterfeit Marxist metapolitical Weltanschauung, Charlie’s rather abrupt and quite literally explosive holocaust-esque homecoming certainly does. Indeed, not long after Detective Mastrionotti and Detective Deutsch come by his hotel room and prepare to arrest him for mysterious murders that he clearly did not commit (as the menacing detectives make quite clear, they are no friends of the Jews), Charlie announces his arrival by setting the hotel on fire and then dispatching both of the overtly fascist cops, who are completely unprepared for the final showdown, with a shotgun. Indeed, after blowing away Mastrionotti and sardonically screaming “Look upon me! I’ll show you the life of the mind!” while running down the inflamed hotel hallway, Charlie, who seems to be fueled with homicidal glory, wounds Deutsch and then finishes him off with a close-contact blast to the brain, but not before relatively calmly declaring with a strange foreboding fatalism, “Heil, Hitler,” as if he is concluding a symbolic ironical performance art routine that sums up the outcome of the Second World War. Indeed, fat and jovial yet homicidal and unhinged Charlie’s scorched-earth routine can certainly be seen as a sick allegorical depiction of America’s dubious role in WWII. Somewhat calmer after killing the cops, Charlie has a little post-rampage chat with Fink where he justifies his pathological homicidal tendencies by declaring, “They say I’m a madman, Bart, but I’m not mad at anyone. Honest, I’m not. Most guys I just feel sorry for. It tears me up inside to think about what they’re going through, how trapped they are. I understand it. I feel for them. So I try and help them out. Jesus. Yeah. Yeah. I know what it feels like when things get all balled up at the head office. They put you through hell, Barton. So I help people out. I just wish someone would do as much for me. Jesus, it's hot." When Fink dares to ask "why me?," Charlie goes completely berserk and screams in his face, "Because you don't listen!" and then adds, "Come on, Barton. You think you know pain? You think I made your life hell? Take a look around this dump. You're just a tourist with a typewriter, Barton. I live here. Don't you understand that? And you come into my home and you complain that I'm making too much noise." Luckily, Barton seems to truly listen to another human-being for the first time in his entire life and seemingly sincerely declares in almost a whisper, "I'm sorry," to which Charlie gratefully replies, "Don't be." While Charlie manages to spare Fink's life by freeing him from a bed frame that the dead detectives previously handcuffed him to, the sympathetic serial killer also informs him that he paid an unexpected visit to his parents and uncle in NYC. On top of everything else, Charlie also confesses that he "lied" about the wrapped package and simply declares that it is "not mine." Needless to say, Fink subsequently has trouble contacting his parents and uncle over the telephone. As for Charlie, who previously expressed a desire to be put out of his misery, one can only assume that he commits suicide via avant-garde self-immolation, as he simply goes back to his room while the hotel is burning down. Of course, one can only speculate that Fink managed to give Charlie the comfort and security he needed to commit suicide after managing to temporarily put aside his ego and apologize for his rude behavior. Needless to say, all the pain and suffering that Fink suffers probably could have been avoided were he not a insufferably narcissistic twat, just as World Jewry probably could have avoided a pogrom or two had members of its leadership respected the wishes of its host population and not double-downed and incited more antisemitism with its actions. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Charlie declares to Fink, "You're just a tourist with a typewriter, Barton. I live here," as the protagonist is surely symbolic of the iconoclastic wandering Jew who, lacking in self-awareness and consumed with unwarranted hubris, proceeds to immediately shit on the place and people he has invaded.

If Charlie was not able to teach Fink a lesson in humility, fellow Israelite Lipnick, who now demands to be addressed as "Colonel Lipnick" because, as he states with a hint of unintentionally hilarious arrogance, he was "commissioned yesterday in the army reserve. Henry Morgenthau arranged it. Dear friend," certainly does as he cannot stomach the pretenses of intellectual yids that do not know their place. Indeed, Lipnick verbally tears both Fink and his prized script into pieces, declaring, "We don't put Wally Beery in a fruity movie about suffering. I thought we were together on that." When Fink meekly protests, "I tried to show you something beautiful. Something about all of us," Lipnick becomes enraged and declares, "You arrogant son of a bitch. You think you're the only writer that can give me that Barton Fink feeling. I've got 20 writer under contract I can ask for a Fink-type thing from! You swell-headed hypocrite, you just don't get it, do you? You think the whole world revolves around whatever rattles inside that little kike head of yours." Although Fink seems to think he is some sort of precious intellectual revolutionary that is worthy of being treasured and adored by some kosher literary elite, he clearly does not understand the true harsh reality of the Eastern European ghetto realm of Lipnick, who simply cannot abide his self-absorbed intellectual onanism. Undoubtedly, the difference between Fink and Lipnick is somewhat summed up by Ernest van den Haag in his book The Jewish Mystique where he argues in regard to the innate difference between poor Jews and their somewhat more spoiled American-born sons and grandson, "His children now can afford the radicalism the father had to relinquish—at least as an active pursuit—to bring them up. The father became a liberal. He was once upon a time radical because he was poor. He felt he had nothing to lose, everything to gain. The children once more are radical—but this time because they are rich enough not to worry about earning money. Whereas the father's and grandfather's motive for radicalism was poverty and oppression, the marginal existence they were compelled to lead, the son's is a product of his parent's suburban success. The son discovers that 'money isn't everything.' It isn't. He is bored by money, by making it and by spending it. Money shelters him materially; but for that he had to pay a price: he feels mentally uncomfortable, psychologically anxious, bored, restless, aimlessly rebellious—what is he to do with himself, with his life?" Undoubtedly, van den Haag's description of the "son" certainly describes Fink, at least in a superficial sense. Maybe if Fink had to do a week or two of real hard labor, he might appreciate his lot in life, drop his unconsciously condescending attitude toward the proletariat and rethink his pinko idealism and fetish for the "common man." Additionally, while Lipnick seems to be a proud "kike," Fink seems to be the sort of post-Yiddish kosher cosmopolitan that would agree with Marx's words, "The social emancipation of the Jew is the emancipation of society from Judaism." Indeed, while Fink is certainly hopelessly Jewish in terms of appearance and psychology, he is probably behind on his Talmud studies. In the end, a rather defeated-looking Barton takes a walk on the beach while carrying Charlie's package and is somewhat taken aback when he happens upon a beautiful babe that resembles the image of a woman in a kitschy beach painting that was hanging in his hotel room. As demonstrated by his obsessional glaring at it throughout the film, Fink undoubtedly developed a strange infatuation with the painting, so he naturally finds the young lady rather appealing. After Fink asks her, "Are you in pictures?" and she bashfully replies "Don't be silly," and then positions herself on the beach in a manner that, rather surreally, more or less perfectly duplicates the image from the painting, though a seagull randomly drops dead and falls into the ocean, thus assumedly demystifying the scenic splendor that it originally had for the protagonist and thereupon probably adding to his growing cynicism and disillusionment with art and life in general. In short, both Fink's political and idealism have died an undignified death just like the lone seagull that fell into the ocean. Surely, Fink has had an exceedingly Ernüchterung experience in Hollywood, but luckily he might rethink his fetish for Trotsky.

While Barton Fink was generally well received among all the right mainstream critics up on its initial release, a couple of them were not so happy with the film's portrayal of certain Hebraic characters. Indeed, as noted by Jew Josh Levine in his book The Coen Brothers: The Story of Two American Filmmakers (2000), Jewish The Village Voice film critic J. Hoberman—a lifelong far-left cheerleader that incidentally co-wrote the somewhat worthwhile text Midnight Movies (1983) with Jonathan Rosenbaum—would complain, “At the period when BARTON FINK is set, the virtual acme of worldwide anti-Semitism, America's two most potent Jewish stereotypes were the vulgar Hollywood mogul and the idealistic New York communist. . . . BARTON FINK locks these stereotypes in sadomasochistic embrace.” Of course, what Hoberman is ignoring is that these so-called stereotypes are based on real individuals that are far less sympathetic than the characters that the Coen brothers created. Notably, good goy media critic James Wolcott was no less critical of the kosher elements of the film, complaining in his Vanity Fair review, “What makes the movie such an audacious sickie is that the Coen brothers – themselves Jewish – never attempt to make us identify with Barton's plight. They keep him and his attitudes in a jar.” Judging by Wolcott's review, it seems as if he failed to even watch the movie and/or he could not image a Judaic film character that was not portrayed in a 100% positive light like the insufferably sagely social justice Jewish character Sol Roth portrayed by Hebrew film noir icon Edward G. Robinson in fellow Judaic Richard Fleischer's SJW sci-fi classic Soylent Green (1973), but such groveling shabbos goy thinking goes with the territory when you're a mainstream American film critic. To Wolcott's credit, he did not go as far as accusing the the Coen brothers of being self-loathing chosenites but instead argued, “I never felt watching the movie that the Coen brothers were indulging in something as obvious and personal as Jewish self-hatred. The movie has too much conscious effrontery. . . . It satirizes the Jewish sense of victimization, without denying that victimization exists.” Naturally, like virtually every Coen brothers film, the Semitic siblings approach their characters in a certain detached fashion, hence one of their greatest strengths as filmmakers. Naturally, the Coen brothers do not believe that the titular protagonist of Barton Fink deserves the torment and suffering that he ultimately faces, but they also acknowledge that Fink was also at least partially responsible for said torment and suffering due to his arrogance, narcissism, and quite literally laughable lack of self-awareness. After all, most of Fink's misery could have easily been avoid had he pulled his head out of his ass every once and while.

While the Coen brothers are probably not exactly stereotypical self-loathing Jews despite what certain Zionist JDL types might think, they have certainly demonstrated in past statements that they are not the sort of hysterical Jewish leftist agitpropagandists or neocon Zionist war-pigs that can be found working in Hollywood, but instead a sort of American filmic auteur equivalent to great Jewish Viennese satirist and wordsmith Karl Kraus. Indeed, Viennese novelist Stefan Zweig might as well have been speaking of the Coen brothers when he once wrote regarding fellow Austrian Jew Kraus that he was “the master of venomous ridicule.” As the brothers’ films surely demonstrate, they are equal-opportunity offenders who, quite unlike other members of their race (e.g. Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer), are willing to be just as ruthless when it comes to depicting Judaic characters. Also, like Kraus, who attacked prominent Jewish (pseudo)intellectual movements like Zionism and psychoanalysis and its lead figures like Theodor Herzl and Sigmund Freud, the Coen brothers have also attacked certain Jewish types that they find deplorable, most notably the titular kosher turd of Barton Fink. Needless to say, the siblings are no mindless Zio-bot propagandists, but the foremost cinematic critics of the most repugnant elements of their ethno-cultural group. As recounted by Josh Levine, despite having an older sister named Debbie that moved to Israel after becoming a physician, the Coens originally refused to visit the Jewish state because they feared it would be like an “armed Jewish summer camp,” which is surely something that no sane individual would want to experience (incidentally, the Coens were practically bribed to travel to Israel in 2011 under the dubious pretense of receiving a million-dollar award from Tel Aviv University, though the two did not do any shilling for Israel while there as demonstrated by Joel’s remark, “We grew up in a Jewish community, but we never thought to make a story that deals with Israel. We don’t really know Israel — we write American stories. That’s what we know”). Although the Coen brothers got their start in filmmaking working with fellow Midwestern Jew Sam Raimi on The Evil Dead (1981) and the siblings would approach the Zionist fundraiser Hadassah so that they could obtain a list of the 100 wealthiest Jews in their state under the pretense of approaching said wealthy Jews about becoming investors for their debut feature debut Blood Simple (1984), the two were apparently not swamped with Jewish influence growing up and never became part of hermetic Hebraic suburban neo-ghetto culture, or as Joel Coen’s blonde shiksa wife, actress Frances McDormand, once noted, “They grew up pretty isolated as the only Jewish kids around and they’re pretty big on loyalty and dependability,” hence their lack of racial chauvinism. In short, Barton Fink could have never been created by stereotypical American Jews that have fond members of Hillel college events or a Birthright Israel pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Likewise, the film could have never been directed by someone that is deluded enough to take intellectual inspiration from the demented scribblings of Wilhelm Reich or Herbert Marcuse like Herr Fink probably would.

While the Coen brothers have completely denied in the past that the film has any sort of specific esoteric allegorical message, Barton Fink is unequivocally a film that begs for deep and creative analysis, especially when it comes to the perennial 'Jewish question.' For example, the scene where Charlie Meadows dispatches the kraut and wop detectives—characters that are clearly symbolic of the Axis Powers as indicated by their names 'Mastrionotti' and 'Deutsch'—can be seen as symbolic of the semi-feral white Americans saving the European Jews during the so-called holocaust. Notably, it is interesting that Charlie's real name is the quite Germanic 'Karl Mundt' as German-Americans, somewhat ironically, made up for the largest single ethnic group to fight in the American military during WWII. I would not be surprised if the Coen brothers—in their jaded kosher cynicism—see the white American goyim saving the Jews as both a sick irony and a potentially dangerous situation, as if they expect the same whites that saved their as being just as capable, if not more capable, of carrying out a fully successful shoah after meeting too many whiny subversive Jews like Fink (after all, the film hints that Meadows aka Mundt has exterminated Fink's family). Naturally, it is no coincidence that American Jews were at the forefront of promoting the flooding of the United States with non-whites from the Third World. Indeed, the so-called Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 (aka Hart-Celler Act), which is directly responsible for the browning and third worldization of America, was the demented brainchild of Jewish politicians that include NY Senator Jacob Javits, Congressman Emanuel Celler, Leo Pfeffer (Former President of American Jewish Congress), and Norman Podhoretz (Writer and Member of The Council of Foreign Relations). As to why the Jews would want to the U.S. to degenerate into a third world hellhole, American Jewish Congress (AJC) and World Jewish Congress (WJC) bigwig David W. Petegorsky made it quite clear when he declared in 1948, "Jewish survival can only take place within the framework of a progressive and expanding democratic society, which through its institutions and public policies gives expression to the concept of cultural pluralism." Of course, like Fink, none of these Jewish politicians seemed to have the self-awareness to consider that the fruits of their actions might eventually result in an antisemitic backlash. Of course, another sick irony of the film is that it is ultimately Hollywood studio mogul Jack Lipnick—a man that cannot help but use the word "kike" in every single sentence—is ultimately a true, if mostly symbolic, savior of the Jews as a military officer and propagandist while far-leftist Fink is never depicted even contemplating the Third Reich, WWII, or European antisemitism despite the film taking place in 1941. In fact, Lipnick even mentions that he is a good pal of Jewish U.S. Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau Jr. who, on top of working hard to rescue Jewish refugees during WWII, was the creator of the so-called 'Morgenthau Plan,' which was designed to completely de-industrialize and more or less destroy Germany and turn it into what Nazi Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels described as a giant potato patch (undoubtedly revealing his completely anti-Christian/anti-American semitic sense of justice, Morgenthau also suggested to FDR in the summer of 1944 that the top 50 or 100 German “arch-criminals” be immediately exterminated upon being captured). Surely, it is no coincidence that Lipnick comes off seeming like a sort of fascist dictator, as he is like the illiterate hate-child of Martin Bormann and Harvey Weinstein. Surely, as artists and writers, the Coens see Lipnick—a loudmouth philistine that boasts of virtually enslaving writers under contract yet refusing to use their work—as something more monstrous than Hitler.

As far as I am concerned, Barton Fink is an unmitigated masterpiece that, cinematically speaking, manages to offer a little bit of everything despite being a period piece that takes place during a very specific time and place. Indeed, both a mix of kitsch and high-kultur, Lynch and Polanski, Künstlerroman and buddy flick, comedy and horror, antisemitism and philo-Semitism, Art Deco and dime store, arthouse and Hollywood, surrealism and realism, heaven and hell, Southern Gothic and Vaudeville, The Twilight Zone and the History Channel, and the grotesque and gorgeous, the film might not be seen by many film critics as brothers’ magnum opus but it would be very hard to deny that it is their most aesthetically and thematically ambitious film to date (I think the Coens might believe this as well as they are considering directing a sequel entitled Old Fink). In terms of innate Jewishness, the film is only second to the Coens’ later work A Serious Man. Of course, both of these films reveal a rather reluctant and highly self-critical Jewishness, or what David Mamet would probably describe as ‘The Wicked Son’ mindset. Indeed, as Mamet once wrote, “This is the wickedness of the wicked son. He feels free to enjoy his intellectual heritage, the Jewish love of learning, and reverence for accomplishment; he enjoys, aware or not, a heritage of millennia of Jewish law and values; he enjoys his very life, which would have been denied him and his ancestors in the Europe they suffered to leave; he enjoys the right to protection from the community he disavows and, through it all, parrots, ‘My parents were Jews, but I do not consider myself a Jew.’” Although not staunch Zionists, the Coen brothers would never deny their kosher credentials, just as they would never direct a film as personally self-loathingly Jewish and strangely Zionist as Mamet’s Homicide (1991), but I digress. On the other hand, if he had a greater sense of humor and flare for aesthetics, the great so-called self-hating Jew Otto Weininger might have directed a film like Barton Fink. After all, Weininger, who lived a lonely and haunted purgatorial existence not unlike Herr Fink before killing himself in the same Viennese rented room that Ludwig van Beethoven died in, believed that “The Jew is an inborn communist” and he saw Judaism as a nihilistic belief in nothing, which is certainly how the religion seems in A Serious Man due to its depiction of mindless rabbis. Unequivocally 100% kosher in terms of both appearance and psychology and sharing a kohanim surname of the Judaic Aaronic priesthood, the Coen brothers indubitably represent the best in terms of aesthetic and intellectual post-religious Judaism, with Barton Fink indubitably representing a 'Hebraic Eraserhead' as a poetically paranoid expression of a Jewish protagonist in an insufferable semi-cryptically kosher world. Undoubtedly, one of the innate ingredients of Judaism is iconoclasm, which is one of the Coen brothers' greatest talents. Of course, what makes Barton Fink so paradoxically Über-Jewish and antisemitic is that it takes an iconoclastic approach to an intrinsically Jewish world and contains Hebraic characters that are easily more repugnant than those featured in National Socialist classics like Veit Harlan's Jud Süß (1940) and even mischling Fritz Hippler's agitprop piece Der Ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew. Indeed, when watched through a Jew-wise lens, the film offers Nicholas Donin-tier condemnation for Hebraic Hollywood and Jewish left-wing politics yet, at the same time, the Coen brothers' greatest films are more innately kosher than anything ever directed by Mel Brooks or Woody Allen. In short, the Coen brothers are probably the only filmmakers that can be easily loved or loathed by both Kahanite terrorists and National Alliance members alike.

BURN AFTER READING

Joel Coen, Ethan Coen* (2008) The Coen brothers are the quirky and film noir savvy brothers that are known for their original black comedies. Their most recent release Burn After Reading finds the two brothers once again dealing with similar themes found in their other films. I felt that Burn After Reading was made around the idea of having smiling Brad Pitt's brain blown out. Underneath the Coen brother's niche for unsettling humor lies a certain contempt towards certain individuals. The humor added to the Coen Brother's films merely acts as an excuse for the brother filmmakers to not feel bad about their cinematically channeled hatred. While watching Burn After Reading I couldn't help but think that the character Osbourne Cox, played by John Malkovich, was modeled after the arrogant character traits of the Coen brothers. Malkovich, an actor I have always hated, plays a weasel-like and arrogant narcissist that is not too pleasant to look at. The character of Osbourne Cox is the sort of individual that reminds me a deranged yapping Chihuahua that seems to ignore the confused people looking at it. The question is; who really deserved a bullet in the skull? A yapping Cox or a retarded Brad Pitt? Once again, Joel Coen casted his manly and unintentionally funny wife, Frances McDormand, in yet another film. McDormand once again proves that she has nothing new to offer in the way of interesting characters. She gave her "best" in Fargo as the tough and ambiguously female police officer. In Fargo, her character has a sort of sexual role reversal with her passive husband. I wouldn't be surprised if the same situation was present at the Coen household. Just because Frances McDormand wears the pants in the relationship, doesn't mean that "hubby" Joel should passively accept her demands in starring in his films. I truly believe that the Coen brothers pretty much made the same film their entire career. Their greatest achievement is the almost masterpiece Barton Fink. Burn After Reading should be burned after watching. But I say this with respect to the brothers Coen's finer achievements of yesteryear. No Country For Old Men showed that the Coens might have a little spark left in their now banal minds, but it's doubtful. Over a decade of disappointments is hard to burn out of your mind.

Joel Schlemowitz (1998)

As an individual that is relatively disinterested in pornography as both an 'art form' and a pathetic masturbation aid, I cannot think of a greater hardcore flick than the dreamy celluloid LSD trip Bacchanale (1970) directed by John Amero and Lem Amero (Lusting Hours, Blonde Ambition). A virtual remake and cultural update of the exquisite cult flick Dementia (1955) aka Daughter of Horror, Bacchanale follows the seductive spirit of a lonely blonde beauty as she meets faceless "all-knowing" phantoms, revisits the more surly anecdotes of her licentious youth, and engages in phantasmagorical free love with a variety of anthropomorphic beings. With their subsequent work Blonde Ambition (1981) – a XXX-rated film with the outlandish tagline, "if you liked Deep Throat and Singin' in the Rain you're gonna love Blonde Ambition" – the Amero brothers proved they could do the seemingly impossible by paying film-literate homage to Hollywood comedies/musicals of the 1950s in pornographic form and with Bacchanale they did the same for classic cult horror films of the same era, except with a psychedelic twist. Starring the beautiful blonde bombshell Uta Erickson (Marcy, The Ultimate Degenerate) as the wandering and often naked protagonist Ruth, Bacchanale is a psychosexual psychedelic trip that is part-nightmare and part-romp, but never redundant, which is quite the feat for a vintage work of pornography. In fact, if one is merely looking for a kitschy and kinky porn flick that captures the aesthetic essence of a bygone era, Bacchanale – being just as every bit cinematic as sexual like the things vivid wet dreams are made of – may prove to be too much as it rivals (and often eclipses) the arthouse-sleaze works of Radley Metzger (Score, The Image), Tinto Brass (Salon Kitty, Caligula) and Walerian Borowczyk (Blood of Dr Jekyll, La Marge).

After falling asleep in a seedy motel room, Ruth's spirit awakes and she wanders to an ultra-hip (to the point of parody) hippie costume party, but not before revisiting an incestuous sexual encounter she had with her dead brother Gordon many years ago. Despite the lurid and salacious past of the character she plays, Uta Erickson – with her natural breasts, fully intact labia, and all-American gorgeous looks – is quite elegant, thus making her much more appealing than the typical plastic cum-guzzlers with bleached, blown-out assholes that plague porn films nowadays. In fact, all of the performers/actors in Bacchanale – with their public hair, proportionate-sized penises, and lack of tacky tattoos – are totally organic in appearance, thus making the film all the more "fantastic" and "other-worldly" for modern day viewers. Contemporary viewers will also be happy to know that Bacchanale is hardly politically correct in its portrayal of pompous gay fashion designers (as best epitomized by a hysterical homo named "Go Go") and its total lack of colored folks. Despite its lack of melanin-privileged folks, Bacchanale does feature a kaleidoscopic exhibition of hypnotic and psychotropic colors that further accentuates every cum-shot and blow-job featured in the film. On her pleasurable phantasmal pilgrimage, Ruth finds herself falling further and further away from reality but closer to orgasmic transcendence. When not jerking-off dead guys and performing stripteases for the grim-reaper in graveyards, Ruth is looking for the ghost of her dead brother, but she must endure the wrath of a sadomasochistic lesbian dictator and her slavish undressed underlings in a cave to find what she is truly looking for. As a forsaken fallen soldier of the Vietnam War, brother Gordon is the only man who has what it takes to give Ruth the solace that she so desperately needs.

Often regarded as the greatest film ever created by the anomalous auteur-pornographers Amero brothers, Bacchanale is most assuredly one of the most unprecedented and preeminent works in porn film history. For fan of Alain Robbe-Grillet (most specifically Eden and After and Successive Slidings of Pleasure), Alberto Cavallone's Blow Job (1980) and Stanley Kubrick's Eyes Wide Shut (1999), Bacchanale makes for a distinctly delectable yet debauched dream-story where erotic daydreaming and hallucinatory nightmares become one. That being said, take careful heed of the original 1970 poster: "If You Never See Another Adult Film, You Must See...Bacchanale."

THE LOST BOYS
THE LOST BOYS

Joel Schumacher (1987) Hollywood “rebel” and self-proclaimed “Sexual Outlaw” Joel Schumacher has made a variety of failure films for all different genres. His masterpiece(which he stated himself) is the ambiguously gay The Lost boys. This film completely destroyed all vampire conventions and most likely had them rewritten by the ghost of Jim Morrison. Hollywood does have a couple of dark gems.

The gang of rebellious vampires in The Lost Boys call a cave located in a cliff as their home. I like to think that it’s the same cliff that Buzz drove off while playing chicken with Jim Stark(James Dean) in Nicholas Ray’s masterpiece Rebel Without a Cause. When the vampires in The Lost Boys take flight they offer some of the most aesthetically pleasing night shots that can’t be found in any other film. Thomas Newman’s score perfectly compliments these midnight flights.

The cast of The Lost Boys is easily recognizable. The two Coreys (Haim and Feldman) are in their best roles, before they fried their brains on various extra curricular activities. Haim’s character proudly displays posters of beefcake homos on his wall. Alex Winter (Bill and Ted’s Excellent Winter) plays a demon dwarf-like vampire before taking a stake in the heart. This scene is much more interesting than all of his film Freaked.

Schumacher’s The Lost Boys is obviously an allegory for a young mans transformation into a homosexual. Interesting, a bloodsucking gang of leather clad neo-Brando’s help him with the transformation. Was this Schumacher’s deepest and darkest fantasy? Was Corey Feldman’s army fatigues a conscious decision on the director’s part?

The money men at Warner Bros. have decided to make sequels to their franchise friendly films. Among them is The Lost Boys II: The Tribe. This would be a fantasy for me if I were still a child. Now I can expect it to be a piece of cold blooded garbage. Corey Haim has decided he is not having any part in it. On a positive note, coke head and special effects master Tom Savini has also been said to make an appearance as a surfer.

Joel Schumacher (1999)

Snuff films are hard to come by. I have yet to talk to someone that has claimed to see one. In fact, it is doubtful that any such films exist. I have heard rumors that the Israeli mafia and the Russian Jewish Mafia have made a few with the eastern European girls that they have put into white slavery. I wouldn't put it past these international criminals, but until I see proof I will not believe. Joel Schumacher's 8mm follows a private investigator as he obsesses over finding out the authenticity of a snuff film. Maybe Schumacher being in the "know" might know something that the general public does not.

I cannot help but like Nicholas Cage as he seems like a swell guy. Despite how serious a role he plays, he still comes out as a goofball that is truly oblivious to the evils of the world. Watching Cage as a private investigator obsessed by something that would most likely burn a hole in his soul can be quite "thrilling." The private investigator's response when he finds out the truth is both reasonable and admirable. It is good that at least someone has a logical set of morals instead of believing in "the law."

The private investigator also hires a porn shop employee named Max California. Max is a guy that wanted to become famous playing music. Instead, he ended up being surrounded by degenerates and human filth. The private investigator can see that Max has intelligence and shows the young lad some respect. I could not help but notice a homoerotic element to their relationship. After all, director Joel Schumacher is an outspoken homosexual and has always had his eyes on the right actors. It also doesn't surprise me that The Lost Boys is still the director's favorite movie that he's directed.

Bloated Sicilian James Gandolfini has a role in 8mm as a sleazebag pornographer ("Talent Scout") who is connected to the assumed snuff film. I believe Gandolfini's role in 8mm is even more fitting than his role as Tony Soprano on The Sopranos. The way in which Gandolfini's character excremented words at the private investigator seemed to be a little too natural for the Italian-American. The beating the pornographer took from the private investigator was more than fitting.

8mm is one in a handful of worthy films directed by Hollywood director Joel Schumacher. Unlike most thrillers, 8mm is not insulting to the audiences intelligence like Schumacher's more recent film The Number 23. The film even features a homicidal fan of Glenn Danzig that wears a mask and goes by the lame name "Machine." Schumacher has described himself as a "sexual outlaw." Is 8mm an attack against degenerate heterosexual fetishes of rich old guys? Or is the film just an outlet for the director to present "outlaw" sexual degeneracy in Hollywood? Either way, 8mm is a surprisingly enjoyable thriller.

BLOOD CREEK

Joel Schumacher (2009)

When it comes to the Nazis, Hollywood and the mainstream media have left no area uncovered in regards to the pure, unadulterated, and indisputably evil character of Germany from 1933-1945. According to mainstream sources, the Nazis were homophobic yet homosexual, anti-Semitic yet Jewish, and Christian fundamentalists yet neo-Pagans. Chances are, if you have something that means a lot to you in your life and/or your character, Hollywood has portrayed the Nazis destroying and persecuting it. Out of all the criticisms leveled against the Nazis, probably the most ludicrous and bottom-feeding is that they practiced black magic and obtained absolute power via the black arts. Of course, some members of the National Socialist leadership did dabble in the Occult and many held anti-Christian sentiments, but these esoteric studies were more of inspirational tools than a means to obtain otherworldly supernatural powers. When I discovered Joel Schumacher's Blood Creek (2009) – a film about the supposedly sinister SS occult forces of the Third Reich – I was naturally reluctant. After all, every Hollywood film (for example: Raiders of the Lost Ark, Hellboy, etc.) that features Nazi occultism tends to be quite silly and ultimately lowbrow (yet sometimes effective) propaganda, thus, it is no surprise that Blood Creek proved to be no exception. Thankfully, Blood Creek was not packed with the ancient Judaic folklore that resonated throughout the prematurely born flick The Unborn (2009); a film whose undeserved popularity unfortunately eclipsed Schumacher's superior flick Blood Creek (which was also released the same year). At worst, Blood Creek is a decent way to fantasize about Nazi occultism being alive and well in the good ol' US of A during a boring Tuesday night.

When it comes to reality, proto-Nazi and Nazi occultism more resembled a scene out of The Wicker Man (1973) or the artwork of German folk artist Fidus than something you would see in Steven Spielberg's typically overrated film Raiders of the Lost Ark (1981). Völkisch renaissance fairs, ancestor worship, and a Blood / Soil ideology could be seen throughout Germany during the relatively short time that the Third Reich lasted, but black magic spells and the sardonic sort of Nazi occult scenarios portrayed in Hollywood films lay in the realm of pure fantasy. In the film Blood Creek, a Nazi professor named Richard Wirth (played by the devilishly suave German-Irish actor Michael Fassbender) – a name probably derived from Richard Walther Darré; one of the leading "Blood and Soil" ideologists of Nazi Germany and Herman Wirth; the Dutch-German historian/scholar of ancient religions who was the leader of the Ahnenerbe; a quasi-occult Nazi think-tank – arrives at the German-American Wollner family's farmstead in West Virginia (no doubt a scary "no go zone" for Hollywood types). Little does the family know that Wirth is really a völkisch occultist who is solely interested in the ancient Viking runes of his ancestors that just happen to be located on their rural farm. After becoming acquainted with the runes he blatantly lusts after, Wirth begins his transformation into a grotesque Aryan Übermensch of demonic proportions. After introducing Wirth, the film jumps to present and introduces the film's protagonist, Evan Marshall, an EMT who is haunted by the mysterious disappearance of his war veteran brother Victor; a family tragedy that happened during a camping trip in West Virginia a couple years earlier. When Victor finally appears (initially resembling Jim Morrison during his final years when he sported longhair and a full beard), he demands that his brother Evan go with him on a trip with no questions asked. From there, the film turns into a deranged mix between The Texas Chainsaw Massacre remake (2003) and Shockwaves (1977) with aesthetic qualities echoing back to Schumacher's previous film The Number 23 (2007). It has been 70+ years since Wirth's initial appearance on the Wollner farm yet the West Virginian family has barely aged. It is revealed that Victor was held hostage by the farm family and used as fresh Aryan meat for Richard Wirth's ancient Aryan blood transformation. Some have wrongly described Blood Creek as another Nazi Zombie flick, but aside from Wirth's grotesque appearance, it is nothing of the sort. Instead of being a brain-dead-rotted-meat-head mute typical of your conventional zombie flick, rune-master Wirth is a hyper-conscious Luciferian-being whose ultimate goal is to obtain a third-eye in the center of his large Nordic forehead. As far as intelligent and thoughtful material goes, Blood Creek is an artlessly shallow pool of blood diluted philistine drool, but, as entertainment, the film makes for an entertaining ride into post-World War II Nazi purgatory where the Teutonic occult spirit is still very much alive, but hidden amongst nighttime shadows. Of course, in real-life, present day Nazi occultism has taken the form of writings by deceased esoteric Hitlerites like Greek Hindu Savitri Devi and former Chilean diplomat Miguel Serrano, therefore, Blood Creek is ultimately a work of total fiction with not even the slightest inkling of truth.

If you listen to the audio commentary given by Joel Schumacher on the Blood Creek DVD, he ignorantly cites the book The Spear of Destiny by Trevor Ravenscroft – a dubious work on Nazi Occultism (that alleges that Hitler started World War II to obtain the spear that pierced Jesus Christ) that has been debunked many times as a sensational fiction – as a major influence during his direction of Blood Creek. Although the film is nowhere near as entertaining as Schumacher's self-proclaimed masterpiece The Lost Boys (1987), Blood Creek does feature auteur themes typical of the director's previous work. The gashes and cuts inflicted on Wirth's male victims and the cruel way the whippings are executed evoke the same sort of homo-sadomasochistic eroticism that is customary of a Joel Schumacher film. Also, like The Lost Boys, the film's female lead (who blurs the line between protagonist and antagonist) conspires (like an unwilling whore of Satan) with the ghoulish antagonist, but ultimately saves face (although inevitably losing her virginal face and beauty) as the film progresses. Unfortunately, unlike

BLOOD CREEK

The Lost Boys, Blood Creek features a score that is, at best, nothing short of forgettable. Blood Creek also ends in an abrupt manner that provides evidence for a possible (but unnecessary) sequel. One of the things I found most striking about the film was the contrast between the present and past. During the beginning the film (set in 1936), times are much simpler and more wholesome (despite Schumacher's dramatic portrayal of farm animal slaughtering), but in the present (2007) rural white folks are completely out of their mind and on crystal meth, as if the Nazis destroyed all hope for whites in the future. Of course, it was really the defeat of Nazi Germany that confirmed the death of the Occident (whether one wants to admit this or not). If one thing is certain about the foreseeable future, it is that Hollywood and their international admirers (Dead Snow is a great example of the Americanization of European cinema) will continue to pump out more sensational anti-Nazi propaganda films. At best, films like Blood Creek are examples of anti-Nazi propaganda at the most crudest level, but sometimes they make for passable multi-million dollar trash entertainment.

DON'T DELIVER US FROM EVIL

Joël Séria (1971)

The mysteriously perverse Comte de Lautréamont (pseudonym of Uruguayan-born French poet Isidore-Lucien Ducasse) and his sole novel Les Chants de Maldoror (The Songs of Maldoror) had an imperative influence on the anti-bourgeois/anti-Christian sentiments of the already debauched Dadaist/Surrealist artists (including Salvador Dalí, André Breton, Antonin Artaud, Man Ray, Max Ernst, Marcel Duchamp, etc) of the early 20th century, but one can only wonder what kind of affect the quasi-satanic long prose poem would have on two increasingly subversive Catholic convent girls. In the exquisite once-lost French film Don't Deliver Us from Evil (1971) aka Mais ne nous délivrez pas du mal directed by Joël Séria, such a succulently sardonic and sacrilegious scenario is played out for the pleasure of the viewer in a most cunningly cruel yet charmingly carnal fashion. Like Peter Jackson's Heavenly Creatures (1994), Don't Deliver Us from Evil is loosely based on the 1954 little lesbians Parker-Hulme murder case in Christchurch, New Zealand, but, more than anything, the film is a potent therapeutic expression of actor-turned-director Joël Séria's personal disdain for the sexually-repressed authoritarian nature of Catholic Church. As an angry Catholic schoolboy, Séria, like the two anti-heroesses of his directorial debut Don't Deliver Us from Evil, found much solace in the devilishly decadent poetry of Lautréamont and Charles Baudelaire. Of course, probably thinking that no one would want to watch two heretical frog-boys hop around for 100+ minutes, Séria opted for casting two exceedingly cute girls to play the lead roles than teenage boy characters modeled more after his own particular and less eventful misspent youth. Séria made the wise decision, as the two lead cutesy gals of Don't Deliver Us from Evil – Anne (played by Jeanne Goupil) and Lore (played by Catherine Wagener) – are quite the barely-legal eye candy. Anne, a Mediterranean-like girl with black hair and dark eyes, is the master in the relationship and little Lore, a blonde Nordic girl, is her loyal and obliging girl slave. After becoming disillusioned with the hypocritical mores of the Catholic Church and seeing two nuns involved in Lesbian blasphemy, the two girls rightfully decide to make an unofficial pact with Satan and bring havoc upon the cold convent they so thoroughly abhor.

The girls of Don't Deliver Us from Evil are truly bloomed flowers of evil. Quite conscious of the appeal of their fresh and curvy virginal flesh, Anne and Lore lure in a variety of older men by flashing their white panties in a terribly tempting way. After nearly getting raped in the process, the two girls reap revenge by doing everything from killing their prospective rapists' precious pet birds to brutally murdering them in a bloody good fashion. Although much more stunning and alluring than her loyal compatriot, Anne uses the more saintly-looking Lore as the underage object of horny old men's desire. Director Joël

DON'T DELIVER US FROM EVIL

Séria has stated that Don't Deliver Us from Evil is less about a teenage lesbian relationship and more about one girl possessing complete psychological dominance over another. For those filmgoers looking for their quasi-pornographic fantasies of teenage girls to be fulfilled, Don't Deliver Us from Evil is probably the wrong film to see as it may bring about castration-anxiety in certain viewers. Like mute anti-heroess Thana of Abel Ferrara's exploitation masterpiece Ms. 45 (1981), the lovely little ladies of Don't Deliver Us from Evil have an uncompromising disdain for criminally perverted untermensch and thus act accordingly. Of course, to an extent, Don't Deliver Us from Evil is an erotically-charged work, but the various scenes of sick teenage sensuality are ultimately eclipsed by the film's Satanic anti-Catholic and anti-bourgeois themes. In fact, upon its release, Don't Deliver Us from Evil was banned not for its steaming portrayal of enfant terrible eroticism, but due to its glaring anti-Catholic themes, hence the relatively obscure status of the film until somewhat recently. Virtually plotless in form, Don't Deliver Us from Evil is almost as anarchistic in structure as it is in sentiment. Although director Joël Séria claims that the film is almost wholly inspired by his personal youthful experiences and communal readings of decadent French poetry, he did, unsurprisingly, cite the films of Luis Buñuel as a minor influence. That being said, a dual screening of Don't Deliver Us from Evil with Buñuel's final work That Obscure Object of Desire (1977) would make for a flawless ungodly double-feature, as both films offer a distinguished and uninhibited exhibition of anti-bourgeois sex and politics, minus the overly preachy intellectual masturbation typical of such works.

Although a non-actor before appearing in the film, Joël Séria made the right decision when he decided to cast Jeanne Goupil as the lead in Don't Deliver Us from Evil as she would not only prove to give an iconic (if mostly unseen) performance, but would also go on to be the director's longtime lover. Despite going on to mainly direct comedies, Joël Séria would make one more wonderfully wicked film with gorgeous Goupil as the lead. In 1976, Séria directed Marie, the Doll aka Marie-poupée, a work that like Don't Deliver Us from Evil, examines the aberrant nature and inevitable symptoms of bourgeois sexual restraint, including pedophilia. In a sense, Marie, The Doll is a much darker film with an even more tragic ending, but Don't Deliver Us from Evil certainly holds its own as a magnificent work of singular movie malevolence. If you're a fretful young lady that wants to put an end to the dubious and undesirable propositions of a certain aggressive dirty old man in your life, recommend that they see Don't Deliver Us from Evil and let those pathetic perverted fellows know how you really feel. I would never call myself a proponent of feminism, but Don't Deliver Us from Evil is one of few works that reminds me that women have certain inalienable rights, including the right to kill if necessary. Of course, I would be lying if I did not admit that one of the greatest appeals of Don't Deliver Us from Evil is Jeanne Goupil and her plentifully profane yet wholly persuading presence. If the Church of Satan ever gets around to updating their Video List, I think it is safe to say that they should make an effort to add Don't Deliver Us from Evil to it, as it makes Rosemary's Baby (1967) seem like a cautionary Catholic fairytale.

MARIE, THE DOLL
MARIE, THE DOLL

Joël Séria (1976)

Although later best known for his sex comedies and work in television, French auteur Joël Séria would make one more film in the shuddersome spirit of his debut heretical arthouse-exploitation masterpiece Don't Deliver Us from Evil (1971). Also starring his lush lover Jeanne Goupil, Marie-Poupée (1976) aka Marie, the Doll is another sombre yet sweet film about unhealthy obsession, little girls and the dirty old men that love them. After the relative commercial success of his sex comedy Cookies (1975) aka Les galettes de Pont-Aven, Séria would take the opportunity direct what would arguably be his most artistically ambiguous and prestigious effort Marie, The Doll; a minor masterpiece of 1970s French cinema. Innately minimalistic, nicely nuanced, and less sensational and gratuitous, Marie, the Doll is ultimately a more mature yet significantly dismal and disheartening work than Don't Deliver Us from Evil. Centering around a unsuspecting woman-child named Marie – a cute and cutesy teenager that strives for moral perfection and believes in the innate goodness of mankind – who makes the drastic mistake of marrying a man that she doesn't even remotely know how to begin to understand due to her gross naïveté and social ineptness, let alone seriously love, Marie, the Doll is a splendid, diacritic heart-breaker of a film, akin to watching a litter of puppies being drowned at a scenic lake, where one gazes on as a young, softhearted girl slowly but surely perishes as she progressively glowers like a wilting flower until her inevitable date with the blue hour. Throughout Marie, the Doll, Goupil is featured in a variety of comprised and often unclothed positions, thus leading the viewer to conclude that Joël Séria was very serious about filmmaking to treat his lover that way for the sake of art; that or he is some sort of sneering sadist (I like to think the former). Either way, Goupil herself is quite the tiny trooper, but one wouldn't expect anything less from the girl that read Comte de Lautréamont and was subsequently inspired to commit self-immolation with her blonde gal pal in Don't Deliver Us from Evil. Instead of not being unshackled from pernicious forces, Goupil is unknowingly delivered to it in Marie, the Doll; a work that tests one's endurance where cinematic work itself acting as a bittersweet torture device.

Marie, the Doll centers around a quasi-autistic 17-year-old orphan girl named Marie (played by then-25-year-old Jeanne Goupil) who was raised by her amorous but detrimentally old-fashioned grandparents and seems to have never advanced past her toddler years in terms of erotic and emotional maturity and love of baby dolls. One day, merry Marie meets a respectable and debonair bourgeois shop owner named Claude (André Dussollier) who shares her odd obsession with dolls, thus leading to their swift and headlong marriage. Vaguely resembling the perverted Jewish-Polish auteur Roman Polanski during his younger years in appearance and startlingly foretelling the filmmaker's arrest for statutory rape 1-year later – one can only wonder where Séria got the inspiration for the character of Claude – as Marie, the Doll is surely a work that would both titillate and terrify the Rosemary's Baby (1968) director due to its themes of pedophilia and master-slave relationships. Upon first marrying him, Marie seems quite jubilant with her relationship with Claude as they share a similar distinct fanaticism for dolls, but it soon becomes blatantly apparent that the older man sees the girl as just another one his objects that he can dress up however he wants whenever he likes. On the night of their wedding, Claude gives Marie her first doll-dress and forces her to play a roleplay game where she must pretend to be inanimate as he carefully undresses and subsequently bathes her. Initially, this scene may seem like a tender and intimate moment capturing Claude's gentlemanly and loving adornment of Marie, but it is far from it. Quite agitated and hurt by Claude's sexual disinterest in her and accelerating authoritarian demeanor, Marie begins to entertain the seedy sexual propositions of a low-class farmer – who she also doesn't seem quite able to understand – due to her overwhelming feeling of rejection and abandonment and her unquenchable desire for intimacy. Undoubtedly influenced by the early works of Italian Marxist-Freudian auteur Bernardo Bertolucci (The Conformist, 1900), the two men act as archetypes for extremes of male sexuality: Claude, being a mostly impotent and hopelessly perverted member of the decadent bourgeois and the farmer, symbolizing the virile sexuality and rampant heterosexuality of the proletariat. Of course, both of these men prove to be too much for supersensitive Marie – who due to her latent sexuality and lack of emotional maturity – seems too infantine for any man.

Almost like a modern (albeit erotic) fairy tale in theme and style, Marie, the Doll is a remarkably original film that is impossible to classify. Far too restrained and genteel to be considered an exploitation work, Marie, the Doll is an aberrant arthouse film with a typically French, nihilistic ending which although unsettling, fairly abrupt, and menacingly melodramatic, acts a perfect puissant testimony to the loss of one girl's innocence, which is quite a dramatic shift for director Joël Séria, who in Don't Deliver Us from Evil, persuaded the viewer to root for Satanic teenage lesbian lovers with a penchant for torturing holy men. In Marie, the Doll – a work that neither fits in nicely with the genre conventions of horror nor drama – a suave and physically unintimidating man who is fond of dolls becomes the most contemptible of human monsters, which has a lot more to do with the actuality of real-life predatory archfiends than a retard in a hockey mask and a choleric, terminal cancer patient. I do not think it would be a stretch to say that Marie, the Dolls is the cinematic equivalent of Stuart Gordon's Dolls (1987), Child's Play (1988), and Puppetmaster (1989) for Truffaut and Fassbinder fans.

AMSTERDAM GLOBAL VILLAGE

Johan van der Keuken (1996)

My grandfather was born in the Netherlands in 1919 and after the German occupation during the Second World War, as well as the subsequent colonization of the low-lying Germanic country by the United States, he could no longer stand seeing what his homeland turned into, so he made the mistake of immigrating to America in the 1950s. Homesick, my grandfather would revisit his homeland in the 1960s and was only further disconcerted by his native nation's cultural degeneration. Had my grandfather lived to see the epic arthouse documentary Amsterdam Global Village (1996) directed by Dutch auteur-documentarian/photographer Johan van der Keuken (I Love Dollars, Het Oog Boven de Put aka The Eye Above the Well), he would have thought the Netherlands of the mid-1990s (ironically, around the same time he died) was probably a modern day Sodom and better off under kraut rule. Indeed, for a whimsical 245-minutes, Amsterdam Global Village portrays a so-called 'multicultural' nation where its inhabitants are increasingly refugees from the third world who, although demonstrating their unwavering solidarity with their birth nations, have relocated to Amsterdam to take advantage of the socialist luxuries of one of the most modern cities in the world. Aside from the occasional pothead, DJ, skater, degenerate lesbian artist, 'outsider' model with Down syndrome, race mixer, prostitute, etc., Van der Keuken's doc of pre-apocalyptic decay strictly focuses on subjects from the third world, including a young hash-addled Moroccan courier, Bolivian musician, Chechen businessman, and an elderly Jewish singer, among various other 'people of color' (or whatever). Rather objectively directed with an ambiguous message, Amsterdam Global Village—whether intentional or not—portrays a people and city that is losing its identity and where the ancient scenic architecture, canals, bridges, and sculptures stand in rather stark contrast to its growing third world population. Auteur Van der Keuken all the more highlights the innate foreignness and unassimilable character of these assorted individuals by traveling with them to their mostly poverty-stricken and sometimes war-torn homelands, where they seem discernibly more happy and social, even if there are dead corpses lying in the streets. Due the documentary's seemingly unintentionally unflattering depiction of the international plague that is multiculturalism, it should be no surprise that World Socialist Web Site (WSWS)—the most widely accessed commie website on the internet—gave a rather unfavorable review of Amsterdam Global Village, writing, "Aside from the reality that poverty and historical circumstances have forced many people to take refuge or seek employment in a handful of relatively prosperous countries, such as the Netherlands, it is not clear to me what van der Keuken is trying to say," as if everyone is a Marx fetishist whose responsibility it is to portray brown people and internationalism as god's great gift to the world. Instead, Van der Keuken takes a wandering and voyeuristic non-partisan approach that thankfully leaves it up to the viewer to decide whether or not Amsterdam will eventually degenerate into a third world gutter.

Opening with a shot of a bunch of Dutch children sporting blackface and dressed as 'Zwarte Piet' aka 'Black Peter' (the companion of Sinterklaas, the Santa Claus of Dutch folklore), Amsterdam Global Village portrays a 'changing' Netherlands where actual real live African children stick out like sore black thumbs while admiring a goofy Dutch guy in black face. The 'bridging figure' of the documentary is Khalid, who makes his living as a moped courier and enjoys listening to shitty techno music and hanging out and smoking dope with other non-whites next to a small skate park. Spending virtually his entire life in Amsterdam, Khalid found it rather difficult to readjust to the low standard of living of Morocco when he followed his parents back there when he was a teen, so it did not take long for him to decide to move back to the Netherlands, even if he does not consider himself Dutch. Andean musician Roberto still loves his small village in Bolivia, but he knocked up a native white Dutch woman, so he is pretty much stuck in white man's land and he is not exactly complaining, though he misses his dark brown kinsfolk. When Van der Keuken follows Roberto to Bolivia, he discovers his subject has a single mother who has over a dozen children she cannot support. Luckily, Roberto brings everyone tons of gifts and gives an impassioned speech about the need for his people to preserve their culture, language, and customs despite the fact he now lives in Europa and has spoiled his ancestor's blood by siring a half-caste Dutch son. Back in Amsterdam, a Chechen businessman named Borz-Ali watches on the news about how his home city of Grozny has been leveled to the ground by the Russians during the First Chechen War. After learning that Borz-Ali's warrior brother was killed in the war, Van der Keuken follows the businessman to Grozny where the corpses of Chechen 'heroes' lie in the streets and armies of hysterical elderly Chechen women shout venomously about destroying "Russian fascists." Of course, there are no such barbarian antics in mostly quiet Amsterdam, though there are homeless people from the Slavic lands that walk around without socks and shoes, not to mention the fact that there are decidedly degenerate photographers that take photos of striking young mongoloid men, with Moroccan courier Khalid being the one responsible for transferring the negatives to photo labs and then bringing the developed photos back to the photographers. Meanwhile, the native Dutch get wasted and fight each other like queenish pansies while paddling around in dilapidated rowboats in a canal. Mourning over a tragic past, an elderly Jewish singer named Hennie Anke and her 55-year-old son visit the apartment that they once lived in during the German occupation during the Second World War. While her hubby was sent to Westerbork transit camp and eventually met his premature demise, the Jewish mother went into hiding and was separated from her son for a couple years. Naturally, Hennie no longer recognizes her old apartment as it has been totally remodeled and is now inhabited by an overweight black woman from Surinam. Of course, Amsterdam Global Village features less serious segments, including courier Khalid buying hash from a Jewish dealer at a 'coffee shop' (Khalid even says his farewell to the Hebraic hash dealer by saying "mazel tov"), a female Dutch DJ looking like a certified spastic while spinning records, a bisexual orgy, Chinese children learning Chinese and Dutch simultaneously at a preschool, an interview and live performance from some third rate punk rockers from Sarajevo, a lesbian photographer shooting pretentious nude photographs, and the Courier remarking regarding the grey alien that they are, "Not the most beautiful race." In the end, footage of courier Khalid riding his moped is superimposed with narration of the young man describing how he feels "pretty Muslim. If I believe anything, it's that" and how "When I become a van courier...I will be more satisfied." Of course, it is doubtful Khalid would achieve his dream were he not living in the globalist village that is unfortunately post-WWII Amsterdam.

In an interview conducted by Serge Toubiana in regard to why he chose to shoot the sole sex scene of Amsterdam Global Village as 'multisexual' as opposed to 'multiethnic', auteur Johan van der Keuken gave the thankfully anti-liberal response, "The thought occurred to me, but I wanted to avoid it being "politically correct,"" thus demonstrating his integrity as an artist as opposed to being a mere propagandist like so many documentarians. Indeed, in its lack of sentimentalism and fetishism for its nonwhite subjects, Amsterdam Global Village is probably a work that will seem 'culturally insensitive' to certain bleeding heart xenophiles. Van der Keuken was certainly not afraid to offend during his filmmaking career because, as Thomas Elsaesser wrote in European Cinema: Face to Face with Hollywood (2005) regarding the filmmaker's documentary The Palestinians (1975): "An openly partisan film, commissioned by the Dutch Committee for the Recognition of Palestine, the film is perhaps the closest Van der Keuken came to making a cinéma vérité or direct cinema documentary. But it was also so openly pro-Palestinian that it lost him many friends, especially among the left-wing Jewish-Dutch filmmaking community." Of course, Van der Keuken displays neither hate nor disdain for any of the subjects featured in Amsterdam Global Village, but instead, the subjects' words and actions merely speak for themselves. With the assassination of Dutch anti-multiculturalist politician Pim Fortuyn at the hand of a far-left environmentalist lunatic in 2002 and the brutal murder of filmmaker Theo van Gogh at the hand of a crazed Moroccan Muslim in 2004, the so-called global village of Amsterdam nowadays more resembles a quaint cage full of rival packs of dogs that will one day make the German occupation during WWII seem like a picnic. Indeed, while a semi-likeable guy, central subject Khalid of Amsterdam Global Village makes it quite clear that he is a Moroccan Muslim and diaspora member first and foremost and that he only lives in the Netherlands because he can get good weed and decent employment that he could never find in his own homeland. Of course, cultural clashes can only end one way and that is with the conquering of one group over all of the others. Thankfully, with Amsterdam Global Village, Johan van der Keuken has proved a poetic picturesque document of how things were before the future deluge in the Netherlands.

LUCKER THE NECROPHAGOUS

Johan Vandewoestijne (1986)

Nekromantik has almost become synonymous to the act of necrophilia. One might not help but to allude back ravishing memories of a classic vile Super8 art piece. Necrophilia has always been a tough subject to visually instill within thoughts with ease. To this day, only Jörg Buttgerreit and Nacho Cerda have been able to bring something to perhaps the most primal taboo out there. When Belgian director Johan Vandewoestijne attempted to create his own exploitation chronicling a serial killer and necrophilia, the result is inferior to Nekromantik (filmed a year later). We follow the 2D exploits of a serial rapist newly awakened from a coma. Lucker, being a shallow being fit only for z-grade exploitation, begins randomly killing "sluts" and "whores" in order to satisfy his once dormant sexual rage. The picture culminates into a boring spectacle of a lumbering man with an uncanny resemblance to the horrid hair that Bill Murray flaunts. I didn't know what to expect from Lucker other than extreme over-the-top violence and extremely disgusting sexual situations. I was only awarded with one of these appetizing treats in a scene where he lets a prostitute's corpse "freshen" up so he may manhandle the decomposing stiff. Lucker isn't an anti-hero, and he isn't really any sort of character. The script propels the shuffling man into a variety of murder scenes with little to no provocation. Lucker is a dying species of human. If life were to be lived without life, then life itself would be pointless, and that sums up the entire film with one simple word - pointless. It's a beautifully pitiful thing at times. Mr. Johan claims Lucker the Necrophagous to be a merciful creation of "anti-art". What he has created might be blissfully misogynistic and nihilistic, but drags in circles for a period of time not warranted for such dry material. As much as Lucker the Necrophagous should be rewarding, it remains in existence and memory due to the rarity that the film once was notorious for. Not so much for the sexual brutality, but the OOP VHS version with hard-coded Dutch subtitles. I'd love to appreciate this film in a blinding light, or even settle to respecting the film's justful creation, but I fear that Lucker the Necrophagous is nothing but a case to fill a gap in a perfectionist's DVD collection. Definitely one of the unworthy films to get a beautiful treatment for Synapse Films.

Johannes Roberts (2010)

Ah, F, where should I possibly begin? You boast cinematic recollection of true events although you're ultimately taking a pseudo-realistic premise and then turning it into a "hard" slasher. Unbelievable, of course. "Unnerving"? Never. Post-Columbine still rings through the ears of the sensitive. I, personally, had forgotten about the tragedy as two more of substantial pop value have occurred since. It seems the director, Johannes Roberts, hasn't. Or it is possible that he is simply referencing another academic slaughter, but with the incredible likenesses F shares with the earlier released The Strangers, it is unlikely. You see, I've heard all about F and how wildly exciting or bland it may be. I expected, embraced, and shed all recognition of material before viewing because I simply wanted a pleasurable experience. I didn't ask for much. Further attracting and promoting the horrendous tag of "hoodie horror", F takes the subjugated sub-genre all too seriously by having a doppelgänger-like cast of similarly structured hooded villains which we never see. That's right, the film which open begging the question of who? or why? is never answered. Just another reason to avoid F entirely, in case you were hoping for even the smallest droplet of conclusion.

In case one assumes that I need to be "spoon-fed" a story, I'll have you know that it is quite obvious that the problem lies not with me, but the film I so righteously brought forth for judgment. F opens with a rather cruel old teacher handing back graded tests when one of the students, who received an F and further humiliation at the hands of the teacher, stands erect, pursues, and assaults the frail male. 11 months after the attack, after the humility, and after the separation, Mr. Anderson returns to teaching with a debilitating case of paranoia and a weakened liver (one he personally assaults with hard liquor. typical). The director chose a fateful day of Mr. Anderson's to be documented because his daughter (who is a student of his class) is given detention, more or less for attention, as the family has been severed. This serves as a slight lottery of who the killers could possibly be. Regardless we will never know. F basically pulls a similar move as did The Collector, in which it takes a macabre and sinister scenario, hints to a previous face, and giggles menacingly as we fumble with the last chapter option on our remote controls. As you could probably guess, F turns its charade from chilling and sympathetic foreshadowing to a hard, yet stupid slasher film. F's decision to mask the killers could have been done marvelously had they not been manufactured fodder and perfect in execution. Each individual faceless and characteristically amorphous entity is exceptional in amateur parkour, meaning they scale shelves, drop down onto their prey from strategically placed set perches, and cover a large amount of ground in a small fraction of time. They are the perfect hunters. Wielding a large arsenal of melee weapons, the killers of F also happen to be unrealistically vicious and messy. Instead of fulfilling the vapid desire to simply take lives, which is a sadly easy process, the shadowed figures of F fulfill the stalwart standards of your average horror/gore fan which includes some pretty "out there", albeit horrific and sickening, acts of carnage committed on anyone unlucky enough to be stationed at the school at such an hour. F implies with a white flag in hand that the killer has been revealed to be a face. F just doesn't have the gall to present us verification.

The plot has been marketed as a group of teachers surviving a massacre. To call bluff, not on the lack of survivors, but on the absence of teachers excluding one that is not the main character, the unfortunate father of a cunt, F disavows such a spectacle in favor of a merciless father (the lone teacher expect for the nod towards a possible gym instructor) of a rebellious teenage daughter (by now this should be obvious, this malice I hold). PSA of film waste - F is digital litter. F is the embodiment of a film treatment tragedy that at a glance seems respectful, in light of the blight of a decade, but in fact, tosses all known and ineffective conventions to better suit the fans of such grisly torture cinema like, dare I say it, Saw - whose entire existence depended on writers clashing heads to one-up the year priors. The thought never came to mind, that we're dealing with brutish youth. It would appear to be, rather, phantoms. Facial concealment came as a surprise as the "hard knock" boogymen prowl in plentifully-lit sets, although with their faces obscured the entire time. It serves as a smear on fluid storytelling. Not only has F committed various acts of criminal cinema behavior but its upbringing actually hinted towards a few notches shy of greatness. This is one product that you cannot blame on its environment. F knew where it was going all along. It just revels in mischief. Far from being the worst film I have seen in some time, F just skips that step into full-blown disappoint. F could have been the better man and kept its morose dignity by films end but would rather taunt both the after-school victims and us, the viewers, by giving us never a reason or a whim. Simply put, F is methodically stupid.

Johannes Schaaf (1973)

Based on The Other Side (1909) aka Die Andere Seite, the sole novel written by Austrian Expressionist/Symbolist illustrator and entartete Kunst extraordinaire Alfred Kubin (1877-1959), the German film Traumstadt (1973) aka Dream City directed by Johannes Schaaf (Tätowierung aka Tattoo, Momo) is a cinematic work that has undoubtedly been drastically altered from its early twentieth century source material. Penned by Kubin in his twelfth century castle, the anomalous Austrian artist must have had the perfect setting for the novel that would later be adapted for film as Traumstadt. Like the sphinxlike figure Patera in the film, Kubin concocted his phantasm dimension with the utmost secrecy, but unlike the character in the celestial celluloid work, the monsters created by the artist never inspired mass rape, murder, and social chaos, although such sordid scenarios would appear at his castle doorstep during the Second World War, thus inevitably inspiring Aryan auteur Johannes Schaaf's thematically-updated script for Traumstadt. Created after the colossal devastation of two fratricidal World Wars and during the onset of the televised violence executed by fame-hungry commie-would-be-rock-stars of the Baader-Meinhof Group, Traumstadt is a wildly idiosyncratic cinematic work about two married middle-aged artists who move to a "utopian" town ("dream city" aka "dream empire") where, according to one of its seemingly sinister ambassadors: "To a citizen of Dream City, the only thing of importance is his dream. We nourish and grow it. To disturb it would be unthinkable high treason." Of course, like most fantastic utopian ideas, especially of the postmodern liberal and leftist sort, things don't exactly turn out as advertised by its proponents and propagandists, as soon discovered by the lead protagonists of the film, therefore making Traumstadt a work that is undoubtedly more relevant today than when it was first released nearly four decades ago. Unfortunately, Traumstadt is not exactly the most accessible film in the world as it has never been released on VHS nor DVD and the only copies floating around today come from a poor transfer of an old TV broadcast, thereupon making the hunt and discovery of this delightfully distinguished phantasmagoric cinematic work a 'magical' endeavor in itself. Of course, with its patently foreboding essence, terrible dreary musical score, and seemingly decrepit and decaying sets and asinine and anachronistic wardrobes, Traumstadt is a decisively dystopian work that reminds the viewer that one man's utopian dream is another man's deranged nachtmahr. After all, in a curiously secluded state that is founded on the satirically self-centered principle, "every citizen has the right to fulfill himself directly and purely. Every mood can be expressed, every need can be fulfilled and every nature can be pursued" and where the only law is, "the total respect of the individuality of the others," one can rightfully assume there will be social dissonance between conflicting personalities, especially when they wear the malevolently merry mask of smug righteousness and feigned friendliness. Originally advertised with the terribly tempting tagline Bizarre Like Fellini. Surreal Like Bunuel. Explosive Like Cocteau, Traumstadt is as artistically daring and aesthetically delectable as it sounds.

Somewhat discontent with their marriage and lives in general, childless married couple Florian (Per Oscarsson) and Anna Sand (Rosemarie Fendel) decide to move to dream city after being recruited by a somewhat ominous agent with an almost grotesque appearance named Mr. Gautsch. Florian learns that his schoolboy friend Klaus Patera is the “sole ruler” of the town-sized dream empire, correspondingly giving him a sense of security in his decision to become a citizen of the anti-romantic romantic-themed town, yet upon arriving at the supposedly utopian dream realm, his old mate is nowhere to be found. In fact, the oneiric city – with its total lack of children, feverish death cult worship, incompetent death-wishing doctors, repugnant and downright eccentric citizens (including an elderly professor who collects dust mites), proposterous bureaucratic government, shifty and sinister civil servants, sidewalk sodomy, menu-less restaurants, worthless junk stores, valueless currency and schizophrenic stage shows – is hardly the place of delightful dreams, as it mostly resembles a deathly bizarre daydream without end. To get to the city, the Sands book a flight from Munich to the Near East on Lufthansa and eventually arrive at what seems to be the middle of nowhere with a couple medieval Muslims. From there, the couple crosses a miniature desert of sorts, only to be greeted by a repulsive jester-like midget who guides them to the dream city as if he is the gatekeeper of hell. Filmed in Český Krumlov, a small and quite quaint city in the South Bohemian region of the Czech Republic, a region that was largely German before the conclusion of World War II and fell into general despair during the communist era of the Czechoslovakia, Traumstadt is set in an area that is both aesthetically and symbolically complimentary in character. Indefinitely Kafkaesque in disposition, but of the German-Slavicized instead of Aryanized-Semitic persuasion, Traumstadt is undoubtedly a film that will spark acute trauma in certain less stable viewers, but they will undoubtedly be at a pains to explain their metaphysical affliction for it is a subtle work were few things are explained, ergo putting the viewer in the same boat as the star-crossed Sands.

Ultimately, Traumstadt seems to be a work about the intangibility, bankruptcy, and hopeless of utopian ideals; be they political, philosophical, spiritual or otherwise. Klaus Patera – the mysterious MIA dictator of the contrived chimera cosmos – is just another cryptic and destructive cult of personality like Marx, Lenin, Mao, Oprah and Obama. For Florian Sand, Patera represents the innocence and joy of his youthful years and for a Negro citizen of the dream world he represents a bridge towards equality as testified by his agitated cry, “black and white! We could’ve built a new world together!” yet in the end, all inhabitants of the town are inevitably left with a feeling of hopelessness and emotionally-charged chagrin. Not unlike many real-life revolutionaries, Hercules Bell, the lone black member of the town – who resembles a Negro Trotsky and rightly describes its inhabitants as a, “colony of lunatics,” decides to aggressively to stir the masses and annihilate the out-of-control monster he helped foster so many years ago, but he is no match for the deluging imbecility of the townspeople, thus leading to his earthly demise in a Christlike fashion. Traumstadt concludes in a manner echoing a historical Europa in ruins: totally ravaged, rotted, and ultimately ruined by idealism. Needless to say, Traumstadt is a particularly pessimistic work that does for fantasy cinema what Schopenhauer and Spengler did for the written philosophical aphorism; making the doom and gloom of the Occident a most aesthetically pleasing affair. Recalling themes featured in such cinematic masterpieces as Victor Fleming’s adaptation of The Wizard of Oz (1939), Orson Welles’ adaptation of The Trial (1962), and Werner Herzog’s Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970), but of an emphatically post-cultural middle Europe persuasion, Traumstadt is an absurdly rarely-seen and barely acknowledged film that is in dire need of being unearthed, lest we forget that not all dystopian cinema are flaccid, formulaic, anti-artistic, and ill-begotten like those so furiously defecated by the high-profile hacks of Hollywood. That being said, Larry ‘Lana’ Wachowski would make for an apropos citizen of dream city. After all, in the specter state featured in Traumstadt, every form of self-worship is possible, no matter how degenerate, so long as you relinquish your self-ruling right to repudiate individualism.

John Aes-Nihil (1979)

Undoubtedly, if Jim Van Bebber's The Manson Family (2003) is the greatest, most aesthetically ambitious, and psychedelic-driven Manson-themed movie ever made, Manson Family Movies (1984) directed by self-proclaimed 'aesthetic nihilist' John Aes-Nihil (The Goddess Bunny Channels Shakespeare, The Drift) is the most obsessive, gritty, pathologically tasteless, and historically accurate (anti)tribute to the dirty derelict deeds of the hillbilly hobo antichrist and his fucked family of fallen bourgeois degenerates. Indeed, while occult guru Nikolas Schreck's documentary Charles Manson Superstar (1989) probably provides the best and most objective look at Manson Christ and his crazy gals, Manson Family Movies is the most aggressively visceral and vicious look at the sordid story and thus makes for singular viewing (dis)pleasure that simultaneously manages to both trivialize the bloody beatnik events and aesthetically terrorize the viewer in an uncompromising fashion that one would expect from a mad man. Inspired by the supposed urban legend that Manson and his acidfreak pseudo-family had actually filmed their aberrant activities and even went so far as creating the murders for posterity, Manson Family Movies is an innately morally retarded no-budget piece of pathetically provocative celluloid shit that was shot on consumer grade 8mm film stock so as to give it an audaciously authentic essence as if one of the family members was sober enough to keep a camera rolling as the rest of the gang partied homicidally hard. Indeed, shot silently and featuring not a single line of audible dialogue, Manson Family Movies certainly feels like a home movie from hyper-hedonistic hippie hell and a work that seems like it was filmed by a spastic speed addict for his own aimless brain dead amusement. Described by cine-magician Kenneth Anger, who was once a mentor of sorts to Manson associate/killer Bobby Beausoleil (who starred in Anger's Invocation of My Demon Brother (1969) and scored Lucifer Rising (1972) while in prison), with the highly flattering compliment that it, "Looks like the real thing," Manson Family Movies is undoubtedly the delightfully dubious expression of a fellow with a rather foul Manson obsession. Probably the most ambitious and oddly obsessive cinematic attempt to recreate an infamous true crime case, Manson Family Movies was shot at the actual locations of the events leading up to, and including, the flower-power-exterminating Tate-LaBianca murders (including the very spot where the hippie killer dropped the bloody clothing of Sharon Tate and her fellow victims). A mischievously merry and wantonly witchy Mansonite jamboree movie, Manson Family Movies features gay negro drag queen maids reading Nietzsche, three different (non)actresses playing Susan Atkins aka Sadie Mae Glutz, degenerate hippie bastards in Nazi helmets sieg heiling the police, and a hip and happening neo-völkisch hillbilly folk soundtrack by Mr. Alpha-Anti-Hippie himself; Charles Manson.

As anti-aesthetic auteur John Aes-Nihil revealed in the audio commentary for the Cult Epics dvd release of Manson Family Movies, Charles Manson was played by a strange fellow ('Rick the Precious Dove') who had the dignified distinction of being an ex-Green Beret, five foot two, half Mexican/half German by ancestry, and apparently being "rather psychotic." Interestingly, it is rumored that the real Charles Manson was the bastard son of a mulatto, but I digress because whatever the real racial stock of Mr. Manson, micro Mestizo-Kraut 'Rick the Precious Dove' certainly can pass for the crazed cult leader, even if he is a slight bit more swarthy than the real man. Opening with Manson strumming his guitar and subsequently carnally manhandling Sadie Mae Glutz, Manson Family Movies ultimately takes an abridged fragmented approach to cinematically telling the torrid tale of the life and times of the Manson Family. Hanging out at Spahn ranch, one of the mad Manson girls receives cunnilingus (Aes-Nihil claims this scene was totally unsimulated) from the rather voracious ranch owner George Spahn (played by 'Palmo') in a less than pretty quasi-pornographic scene. Of course, Lucifer-like Manson associate Bobby Beausoleil ('Porn Michael') and a couple of the gals pay a visit to hippie teacher/dope Gary Hinman and torture him for a couple days because he purportedly sold them bad acid. Being a deluded Zen Buddhist, homo hippie Hinman does not even put up a fight and even goes so far as peacefully handing a weapon to one of his deranged torturers. Manson also pays a visit to the Hinman home and cuts the drug dealer's ear with a sword. After Beausoleil wastes Hinman, the Manson girls write "Political piggy" on the wall to make it seem like the Black Panthers committed the murder. Meanwhile, a black tranny maid (The Cosmic Ray) religiously reads from Friedrich Nietzsche's posthumously released tome The Will to Power and carefully dusts a LP soundtrack for Valley of the Dolls (1967) starring Sharon Tate. Indeed, the black tranny is Tate's maid and the shemale spade also force-reads excerpts of The Will to Power to the bimbo-like babe as if her life depends on it. Of course, the Manson family eventually pays an unexpected visit to the Tate-Polanski home and they slaughter all the inhabitants of the house, but not before making macabre jokes about the fact the actress is pregnant and her baby will die a violent death as well. In what is easily the most artful and transcendental scene of Manson Family Movies, Charlie is lovingly crucified by his family in a scene rivaling the campy crucifixion from The Devils (1971) directed by Ken Russell. In the final scene of Manson Family Movies in a sardonic scenario auteur Aes-Nihil proudly described as "a moment of devout cynicism," three members of the family throw away the gigantic crucifix that Charlie was previously hanging from into a park trashcan. Quite fittingly, Manson Family Movies concludes with the 1970 Charlie quote, "It wasn't my children who came at you with guns and knives, it was your children," thus demonstrating Aes-Nihil's sheer and utter contempt for the American mainstream.

Featuring nil dialogue, upwards of three amateur actors playing a single char-

after (thus making it nearly impossible to discern who is who during various scenes), a horribly homely and overweight Sharon Tate smiling as she is violently stabbed in her fetus-filled stomach, unsexy unsimulated sex featuring elderly men on LSD, a sassy negro tranny with a nasty Nietzsche obsession, bargain bin blasphemy of the culture-less American sort, and happy-go-lucky ultra-violence of the totally unbelievable variety, Manson Family Movies is certainly a film that epitomizes the phrase “trash cinema,” so it should be so no surprise that the ‘Pope of Trash’ himself, John Waters, stated of the film: “Manson Family Movies is a primitive, obsessional, fetishistic tribute to mayhem, murder and madness. Enough to appall even the most jaded VCR junkie... The home movie effect really added to it. Attention to fetishy detail was really astounding—Abigail’s scarf, Tex’s gun, plus Sadie, Tex and G. Spahn looked more like the originals than Helter Skelter. Very rude—all the rumors, MDA deal, Leno the bookie, Tate S&M... I liked the Valley of the Dolls and Nico touch. The most obscure was Leno’s vacation—I had never even imagined those sights.” Indeed, for those with little knowledge and/or interest in the Manson Family and their macabre misadventures, Manson Family Movies will probably prove to be the most brazenly banal, badly directed, and patently pointless film ever made, but for the already initiated, Aes-Nihil’s Mansonite fetish flick is a tastelessly tasty treasure trove of serial killer-like pathological obsession and homicidal hillbilly aesthetic majesty.

For those familiar with Manson’s oftentimes dark and intensely idiosyncratic folk music, Manson Family Movies plays like a genuine Mansonite musical. Also featuring music by director Aes-Nihil’s band Beyond Joy and Evil, The Beatles (namely “Helter Skelter”), Patty Duke’s theme from Valley of the Dolls, Richard Wagner’s “Liebeshod,” and a couple random punk tracks, Manson Family Movies—a whimsical work erratically synthesizing cultural ingredients from both high and low culture—is certainly a putrid piece of celluloid ‘aesthetic nihilism’ directed by an auteur who personifies being a ‘degenerate’ in the truest Nordau-esque meaning of the word. In addition to receiving critical acclaim from such great queer auteur filmmakers as Kenneth Anger and John Waters, Manson Family Movies also received perverse praise from unhinged underground filmmaker George Kuchar, who stated personally to director Aes-Nihil, “I remember your film very well and it looked SCARY! It had an authentic feel to it that made us squirm. Well, it looked gritty and homespun and made me NERVOUS. Keep up the original and disturbing atmosphere.” A sort of misbegotten movie marriage between Roger Watkin’s Manson-inspired flick The Last House on Dead End Street (1977) meets the audaciously amateurish art-trash of Harmony Korine’s Trash Humpers (2009), Manson Family Movies certainly makes for a great, if not one-sided, date with the celluloid gutter. For those that enjoyed Manson Family Movies, contemporary punk artist Raymond Pettibon’s somewhat inferior shot-on-VHS epic of lo-fi video-art-filth The Book of Man- son (1989) also makes for mandatory viewing. A sub-cult classic of the crazed campy sort, Manson Family Movies—in its outstanding aesthetic ineptitude, innate immorality, and general narrative incoherence—is ultimately a reminder why there will probably never be a definitive Manson family movie as Hollywood will never touch the subject in a serious and sincere manner and those genuine underground auteur filmmakers that are willing to dive deep in the world of Helter Skelter lack the sanity, budget, and production values to execute it properly.

THE DRIFT
THE DRIFT

John Aes-Nihil (1989)

Although I cannot say I have read a single word written by southern sodomite playwright Tennessee Williams, I don't think I have ever seen a bad film adapted from one of his works and I say that as someone who hates old school Hollywood as much as contemporary Hollywood. Needless to say, I was quite glad to discover that self-described 'aesthetic nihilist', archivist, and auteur John Aes-Nihil (Manson Family Movies, The Goddess Bunny Channels Shakespeare) adapted two of Williams' plays in acutely aberrant art-trash hysterical-camp form, which include The Drift (1989) and Suddenly Last Summer (2008). While Suddenly Last Summer is a sort of iconoclastic 'anti-remake' of Joseph Mankiewicz's 1959 Tennessee Williams' adaptation of the same name, The Drift is a take on the playwright's less revered first novel The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone (1950), which was also adapted by José Quintero in 1961 as a British production starring Vivien Leigh and a rather young Warren Beatty and later adapted in 2003 by Robert Allan Ackerman as a TV movie starring Helen Mirren and Anne Bancroft. Needless to say, with its combination of paraplegic, Amazonian, and Latino trannies, as well as no-budget camcorder aesthetic and classical European architecture, The Drift is easily the most innately absurdist, aesthetically repugnant, and melodramatically preposterous take on a Tennessee Williams work that I have ever seen. Indeed, not unlike the late great German Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensiefel's film Mutters Maske (1988) aka Mother's Mask—a radically ridiculous 'freeform' remake of Veit Harlan's classic high-camp National Socialist melodrama Opfergang (1944) aka The Great Sacrifice that takes the conventions of high drama and throws them through a sadistic scatological celluloid blender—The Drift is a savory yet sickening sardonic take on Williams' novel that wastes no time in deconstructing and debasing the 'cryptic' gay subtexts of its source material. Like the work of Tennessee Williams as molested by Paul Morrissey's Women in Revolt (1971), John Waters' Polyester (1981), and Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia (1938), The Drift seems like the result of what an elderly old rich Anglophile with dementia who used to be a fan of the so-called 'Woman's Film' might visualize as her brain rots away in a multicultural old folks home. A decidedly deranged depiction of demented man-divas of the physically and emotionally misbegotten sort, The Drift is the sickly sassy tale of a famous theater star who quits acting for her billionaire industrialist hubby, only for said billionaire industrialist hubby to die shortly after and leave her a widow and the prey of her scheming shebitch friends. A divinely nightmarish and nihilistic work from the apocalyptic aristocratic gutter, The Drift depicts everything that is repellant about the bombastic bourgeois bitches, albeit portrayed by poor tranny proletarians.

After giving up her dead serious career in theater, Karen Stone (portrayed by gay Christian punk musician Glen Meadmore, the foremost proponent of cock-sucking 'cowpunk') also loses her stinking rich billionaire industrialist husband to a heart attack and thus loses everything she has aside from, of course, her giant fortune. Deciding to stay in the ancient European paradise that is Rome, Mrs. Stone has no idea that her life will ultimately take a tragic turn for the worse after becoming the more than willing pawn of a male prostitute puppet and his tranny pimp puppet-master. While Mrs. Stone has self-deluded herself enough to believe she really loved her dead hubby, her best friend Meg Bishop (Daniel Hernandez aka 'Cosmic Danielle') believes otherwise and has no problem matter-of-factly stating to her friend, "Oh, you can't fool me darling... You can't tell me you love that fat little porky man with the little penis... You loved his money. You can't fool me. We have been friends far too long, darling." Meanwhile, enter the queen bitch madam 'The Countessa' (portrayed by the ever elegant and the one-and-only, 'The Goddess Bunny' in what is his most elegant role). A 'matchmaker' in the most wickedly Weiningerian sense, the Countessa has a sinister talent for hooking up young ambiguously gay gigolos with lonely wealthy old widows. Needless to say, Mrs. Stone becomes the Countessa's latest victim, or as Meg states, "romance... that dreaded disease... rears its ugly head in the form of that dreaded Countessa." When the first male hustler attempts to ask for money under the dubious pretense that it is for his friend's kid with multiple sclerosis, Mrs. Stone becomes exceedingly offended and states, "How dare you! I have never ever been so insulted." When Meg encourages Mrs. Stone to get back into acting, the widow acknowledges she was a non-talent hack actor, to which her friend cleverly replies, "Talent is merely the ability to pull wool over somebody's eyes." Of course, Mrs. Stone is nowhere near as talented of an actor as a handsome hustler named Paulo (Michael Kleats), who makes the lonely widow fall under his spell. While Meg warns her friend, "Darling, I simply must tell you, you've got to be careful. I mean, scandal can ruin a name and in this town it will drive you down faster than the Titanic," Mrs. Stone has already been touched by the kiss of death that is love. As the Countessa sinisterly confesses, "To have something on Mrs. Stone is my ultimate number #1 thrill" and, indeed, with the help of her underling Paulo, she manages to get pornographic footage of Mrs. Stone and her bought beau, which is projected at a tea party hosted by the hostile madam. On top of that, Paulo cheats on Mrs. Stone with another woman (portrayed by Paula P-Orridge, the ex-wife/baby-mamma of tranny aesthetic terrorist Genesis P-Orridge). Pathologically lovelorn and suffering from the worse fate a woman can meet, a ruined reputation, Mrs. Stone wanders around the European countryside like a ghost searching vainly for some sort of intangible love. In the end, Mrs. Stone enters a villa (in a scene which was actually shot at the Los Angeles Movie Palace on Broadway) and a gunshot is heard shortly after, but like Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Chinese Roulette (1976), it is left up to the viewer's imagination as to who was actually shot.

THE DRIFT

With the possible exception of Suddenly Last Summer, The Drift has to be auteur John Aes-Nihil's most infectiously campy work to date. Described by pioneering lo-fi queer auteur George Kuchar (The Devil's Cleavage, Symphony for a Sinner) as being "really quite hypnotic and riveting. It's hard not to see the whole thing in one sitting but once you're caught in that web of decorated decadence it's impossible to budge the buttocks toward more saccharine seating," The Drift is certainly the cinematic equivalent of a sleazy mass market romantic page-turner as found in the porn collection of Werner Schroeter. Starring a humungous he-heroine who is literally twice the height of her friends and two real-life rivals, the Goddess Bunny and the Cosmic Danielle aka Cosmic Daniel, playing cinematic rivals, The Drift is undeniably equipped with an unhinged universe that delicately defiles the viewer's soul with egomaniacal tranny glamour. Featuring exquisitely delivered jokes about lesbo-on-lesbo rape, crack-addled paraplegic welfare receipts portrayed by cunning yet cultivated aristocrats and Hispanic trannies portraying gay twink-loving German barons (Cosmic Danielle plays a second role as a character named 'Baron Waldheim'), preposterously pompous anti-American micro-tirades ("Americans, trash trash"), cultivated goombah-bashing ("Not all Italians are dirty filthy things"), and classical European music and architecture, The Drift is a hysterical hodgepodge of the aesthetically high and low but always camp and uniquely underground. Interestingly, The Drift was once screened at the Provincetown Tennessee Williams Theater Festival in Massachusetts. That being said, my only complaint regarding The Drift is I will never get to hear Tennessee Williams' thoughts on the film.

THE MA BARKER STORY

John Aes-Nihil (1990)

In a review of the campy true crime exploitation flick The Ma Barker Story (1990) directed by preternatural historian, aesthetic nihilist archivist, and aberrant-garde auteur John Aes-Nihil (Suddenly Last Summer, The Drift), underground art designer/journalist/artist/editor George Petros (EXIT magazine (1984-1992), Propaganda magazine (1982-2002)) rightly described the sub-underground film as a “whacked-out mutation of Corman’s Bloody Mama.” Indeed, The Ma Barker Story is like Bloody Mama (1970) as remade by the psychopathic Mansonite stepbrother of Paul Morrissey (Flesh, Women in Revolt) and Andy Milligan (Vapors, The Body Beneath) as an appetizingly tasteless and spiritually sick piece of morbidly melodramatic high-camp aesthetic nihilism of the hysterically hilarious sort. Made over a 13-year period and shot with a consumer grade camcorder in an innately cockeyed fashion as if seen from the perspective of a sadomasochistic voyeur who has no intention of reporting the crimes he witnessed to the cops, The Ma Barker Story quite consciously transcends Bloody Mama in terms of taking sensational (but surely not sensual!) artistic liberties regarding the facts relating to the point of the real-life Barker-Karpis gang—a quasi-incestuous gang from the Depression era spanning from 1931 to 1935 that is probably best known today for being ostensibly led by the mother of its leaders—and thus reduces the true story it is based on to the level of a decidedly debauched white trash homevideo soap opera. A sort of thematic and aesthetic prequel to Aes-Nihil’s first feature Manson Family Movies (1984) due to the fact that Barker gang leader Alvin ‘Creepy’ Karpis acted as a father figure for Charles Manson while the two were imprisoned at Alcatraz federal penitentiary and even taught the younger career criminal how to play guitar, The Ma Barker Story also has the rather refined distinction of featuring original cracker folk music by Manson himself. Also, like Manson Family Movies, The Ma Barker Story was also partly filmed at the Spahn Ranch (as well as Barker Ranch) where the so-called Manson Family lived and engaged in lecherous LSD-fueled orgies. A truly fucked folk flick and a sort of American tragicomic equivalent to the ‘anti-Heimat’ of German New Cinema during the late-1960s/early-1970s that is set in the homicidal heart of sunny Southern California, The Ma Barker Story is nothing if not a scrumptiously unsavory slice of Americana that has the gall to celebrate America’s timeless tradition of pioneer-style ultra-violence and criminality.

Beginning at Alcatraz with the classically melodic yet strangely melancholy Manson tune “Big Iron Door,” The Ma Barker Story soon cuts to the Barker Ranch and the viewer is treated to a one week day-in-the-lives musical-melodrama-western hybrid about Ma Barker and her rape-happy, moonshine-marinated, and insanely incest-driven boys. While ambiguously gay FBI queen J. Edgar

THE MA BARKER STORY

Hoover puked out some preposterous puffery out of his mouth when he described Ma Barker as “the most vicious, dangerous and resourceful criminal brain of the last decade,” she was apparently really just a lazy old fat gal who “couldn’t plan breakfast” and was oftentimes stashed in motel rooms and various hideouts because she was jealous of her sons’ girlfriends and the gang wisely wanted her to know as little about their crimes as possible. While Ma Barker is portrayed as a mad matriarch of sorts in Aes-Nihil’s The Ma Barker Story, she is also depicted as an intrinsically inept individual who cannot even bother to fry a single egg for her sons. Portrayed by crippled tranny Aes-Nihil superstar ‘The Goddess Bunny’ (aka Sandy Crisp aka Johnnie Baima), the eponymous anti-heroine of The Ma Barker Story has an unquenchable sexual appetite and thus demands her sons sexually satisfy her each night with eloquently expressed questions like “Well... which one of you youngin’s is gonna service me tonight?” without even the slightest sign of shame. While husband Pa Barker (Harlan) and son Herman (‘Gator’ of the racially insensitive industrial/noise project Psycho-Drama) are more or less cuckolded by Ma Barker, son Freddy (‘Bubba’ of Psycho-Drama) is a vocal misogynist who is not afraid to get lippy with his momma. In between raping and killing chicks, Freddy teaches his brother Herman about the ‘birds and bees’ by endowing him with positively poetic wisdom like, “The trouble with pussy—it’s attached to a woman. Now, woman is the bad part of pussy, you understand, you know, like the cob is the bad part of the corn.” When a god-bothering Christian pansy comes by the Barker homestead and begins proselytizing while waving a large but rather poorly made crucifix, the Barker bros take him out back and kill his Jesus-loving gay ass. When the local Sheriff shows up at the gang’s home regarding rumors the Barker boys have been raping young girls, musically-inclined Barker gang leader Alvin (played by Canadian ‘cowpunk’ musician Glen Meadmore, a fellow who has been described as “...the world’s greatest exponent of the genre known as gay Christian punk”) attempts to calm the cop’s worries by stating regarding Herman, “Sheriff, I know this boy here. He wouldn’t touch no girl. He’s been, he’s been boning these little boys around here.” When the Sheriff comes by the Barker home for a second time, he suavely states to Ma Barker, “I think I might know a way we can straighten this mess out,” and the two proceed to begin a steamy love affair, which naturally rather irks the mother-fucking Barker boys, so fiendish Freddy ends up wasting the lawman like a dirty pig. Of course, the Sheriff was right as Ma’s boys raped, tortured, and murdered a pretentious art-fag chick named Rembrandt (X-Tina), who proudly states whilst being tortured, “My parents are artists and so am I” as if such a pretentious proclamation will save her life. Quite notably, the scene featuring Rembrandt being tortured and killed was filmed in the former bedroom of Stanton LaVey, the grandson of Church of Satan founder and High Priest Anton LaVey. Of course, Ma Barker does not come from as nearly a cultivated background as Rembrandt, but her elderly god-fearing Mama truly loves her and makes sure that the gang leader daughter gets straight on a moral and righteous path, but that never happens because two of homo Hoover's FBI G-man goons maliciously murder the matriarch with a storm of government bullets. In what is a retardedly melodramatic scene, Ma Barker has a flashback of her mother's speech while dying a grizzly and agonizing death. Of course, a young protégé of Alvin Karpis named Charles Manson would ultimately carry on Ma Barker's legacy of lowlife criminality, henceforth demonstrating that Ma Barker's motherly teachings were not in vain.

While John Aes-Nihil might owe an aesthetic debt to Tennessee Williams, Jack Smith, Andy Warhol, Paul Morrissey, and George Kuchar, contemporary arthouse trash auteurs like Harmony Korine (Gummo, Spring Breakers) and Giuseppe Andrews (Trailer Town, Period Piece) certainly owe the aesthetic nihilist a debt as well. In terms of Aes-Nihil's oeuvre, The Ma Barker Story is certainly cream of the crop 'cinema' of the cynically campy sort that blends high and low elements from American (non)culture in a Nietzschean libertine blender and projectile vomits them in the viewer's face without mercy like a serial killer in the middle of bloodlusting all over his prey. Immaculately accented by Weltschmerz-addled folk numbers of Mr. Manson and gay cowboy Glen Meadmore, The Ma Barker Story is a sort of culturally apocalyptic anti-western that makes John Ford's The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance (1962)—a work described by wop western maestro as “the only film where he (Ford) learned about something called pessimism”—seem like a pathetically pussyfooting attempt at deconstructing the very same generic genre that he essentially single-handedly sired. Daring enough to utilize a polio-crippled tranny in the role of malevolent matriarch whose immorality and lack of daintiness is only transcended by her superlatively sickening sexual voraciousness with The Ma Barker Story, Aes-Nihil has even managed to one-up German dandy Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Willow Springs) in terms of cinematically immortalizing the most ungodly idiosyncratic diva the world has ever seen. Featuring furry fat fucks fucking trees, shockingly tender moments between elderly mothers and murderous daughters, Freaks-esque sideshow sex, cocksucker country blues of the Canadian queer Christian persuasion, Mansonite mysticism, and what is the most queerishly queer tragicomic acting the North American continent has ever seen, The Ma Barker Story has a truly rebellious rustic charm that almost makes the viewer forget that America is a cultureless wasteland, but it of course also reminds the viewer that the land of the culture-free and bravely stupid has always been Europe's (and now the world's) toilet. Indeed, as a nation that has the largest and richest film industry yet has only managed to sire outmoded genres like westerns by artisans (as opposed to artists) like John Ford, America is quite lucky it has even been able to produce an innately iconoclastic filmmaker like John Aes-Nihil who, with The Ma Barker Story and his other films, has managed to destroy what American cinema is all about and do it on a budget probably lower than Roger Corman paid a single film extra for a day's work. A honkey home-video from anti-Hollywood Hades, The Ma Barker Story pisses on American celluloid wet dreams with the venomously vicious yet glamorous and campy vengeance of 2000 bottom-feeding Mansonite acidhead freaks.

MOSLEY

Out of all the fascist leaders from the first half of the twentieth century, Sir Oswald Ernald Mosley, 6th Baronet, of Ancoats, the Anglo-Irish founder of the British Union of Fascists (BUF), was possibly the only one who is not remembered today as the definitive and gross epitome of reprehensible evil. One of the reasons for this is that, unlike Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, Mosley failed to assume the leadership of his nation, thus, he was never able to prove to his extremity and brutality as a dictator nor contract a significant amount of "blood on his hands." Also, unlike Hitler and Mussolini, Mosley came from a well bred aristocratic stock (he was the fourth cousin of Queen Elizabeth) and was not a self-made man but a natural born gentleman whose social status was confirmed long before his birth. Unlike most of his aristocratic elders, Mosley was a visionary who foresaw a changing England that was threatened by the diabolical twin-head of materialistic international finance and culture-destroying communism. In the 1998 television mini-series Mosley, the viewer is introduced to the political career Oswald Mosley; beginning at his bachelor years as a young and ambitious army officer during World War I and concluding during the middle of World War II when his potential as the Duce of Great Britain began to sway in a most humiliating and career-destroying manner. It should be no surprise to readers of Soiled Sinema that I have seen my fair share of fascist related flicks and I must admit that Mosley is easily the most sympathetic post-World War II portrayal of a fascist figure that I have had the proletarian pleasure of viewing. Although most forms of nationalism began to be looked on in a negative manner in Europe and Great Britain due to the triumph of communism in the East and democracy in the West and Uncle Adolf's infamous legacy, the Brits still manage to produce exceptional public television and the Channel Four Television produced mini-series Mosley is certainly no exception.

Mosley is based primarily on the books Rules of the Game and Beyond the Pale; both of which were written by Oswald Mosley's son Nicholas Mosley, thus one can speculate that Mosley has a certain authenticity that most fascist biopics tend to lack. Ironically (or not so ironically), Nicholas Mosley also wrote the book (which was adapted into a movie that same year) The Assassination of Trotsky (1972); a book about Stalin's assassination of his former commie comrade Leon Trotsky; the genocidal judeo-bolshevik revolutionary who spent his remaining days exiled in Mexico after losing the power struggle for leadership in the Soviet Union with the man of steel. Although I can't say I have read Nicholas Mosley's works on his infamous fascist father, it seems that Mosley screenwriters Laurence Marks and Maurice Gran and director John Alexander utilized his works to the fullest degree as the mini-series presents the blackshirt Führer as a multifaceted man of exquisite charm who enjoyed subversive politics as much as he had a weakness for beautiful birds and expensive bourbon. One also must commend British TV actor Jonathan Cake as he seems to be the next best thing to the real man in his exuberant and totally believable portrayal of Sir Oswald. As portrayed in Mosley, Oswald Mosley was a man that truly loved his nation and thus saw Benito Mussolini's successful revamping of Italy as an imperative guideline for restructuring England. I was also surprised to see that the mini-series accurately presented Oswald Mosley and the blackshirts as being more often the victims of crimes and violence than the actual perpetrators. Despite his somewhat moderate take on fascism (at least, at that time), the real-life Oswald Mosley and the British Union of Fascists often found themselves verbally heckled and physically assaulted by various communist and Jewish groups (among others). In fact, during the so-called "Battle of Cable Street" (which took place in Cable Street in the East End of London), Mosley and the BUF were so overwhelmed by hostile antagonists (the area itself being heavily concentrated with Jews) that Sir Philip Game, the local Police Commissioner, aborted the blackshirt march. Naturally, real-life scenarios like these make for some of the most interesting scenes of Mosley.

What sets Mosley apart from most films that portray fascist leaders and movements is that it gives fascism a human face. Whether one is a fanatical fascist of the unrelenting murderous kind or a tranny s/he bitch of the third kind, it is likely that that viewer cannot help but be somewhat empathetic towards plight of the Oswald Mosley presented in the mini-series. I cannot say the same for the deplorable Italian mini-series Benito (1993) starring Antonio Banderas; an excruciatingly long and exceedingly banal portrayal of young Benito Mussolini and his love affair with his elder Jewish communist mentor Angelica Balabanoff. The Canadian mini-series Hitler: The Rise of Evil (2003) is nothing short of being a work of tabloidesque pseudo-history with an aesthetic that pales in comparison to the most mediocre of Nazi-exploitation films. On May 23, 1940, Oswald Mosley and his wife Diana (of the eccentric aristocratic Mitford clan), who advocated a peace campaign with Germany, were imprisoned at a house on the grounds of Holloway prison. Personally, I cannot help but wonder what would of happened during World War II (had the war even started in the first place) had Mosley been the leader of the now defunct British empire. If one thing is for sure, it is that tens of millions of lives would have been spared and Europa would still be the monolithic entity of global supremacy that it once was. Of course, Mosley never had the opportunity to lead and execute his plans (and enemies), thus one can only speculate what "could have been." In the excellent alternative history work It Happened Here (1966); a cinéma vérité-style film that was partly shot on leftover film stock from Dr. Strangelove (1964) that was donated by Stanley Kubrick, the viewer is offered a view of German-occupied Britain where it is suggested the Oswald Mosley and the BUF have assumed power. Mosley and the blackshirt fascist aesthetic would also inspire some of the greatest scenes featured in Alan Parker's Pink Floyd—The Wall (1982). Although Mosley concludes in 1940, Oswald Mosley would go on to found the Union Movement; a quasi-fascist political party that advocated the unification of Europe into a one-state imperium that covered all of Europe. Mosley's expounding of a united Europa is further evidence that he was a true visionary that was savvy at predicting future cultural and political trends as Europe eventually would become united via the EU, albeit being of a dystopian anti-European/pro-globalist nature. American neo-Spenglerian genius (who according to FBI records had an IQ of 170) and writer of the neofascist masterpiece Imperium (a work that shares many fundamental similarities with Mosley's plan for a united Europe) joined Mosley's Union Movement but left the group after the ex-blackshirt leader punched the poor yank in the face. In the present, most "neofascists" and third position proponents also share the Mosleyite/Yockeyite dream of truly uniting Europe through cultural and political rejuvenation, thus Oswald Mosley tends to be lauded by those that share these political beliefs.

I would be lying if I did not admit that Mosley is one of my favorite (if not my favorite) mini-series. Aside from a couple cheesy scenes of melodrama, Mosley makes for a notable historical work that that can be compared to few others. Mosley is essentially the British equivalent of the German film Downfall aka Der Untergang (2004) directed by Oliver Hirschbiegel as both epic works contextualize the fascist historical legacy of their respective nations of origin in a fairly objective manner that is all but unheard of in Hollywood. On top of offering a somewhat impartial history of Oswald Mosley and the BUF, Mosley is a beguiling work that seems much shorter than its 197 minute running time. In fact, my biggest complaint with the mini-series is that it is not long enough, thus I recommend that viewers steer scopophilically clear of the 99 minute feature-length cut of the film as your eyes will be indubitably hungry for more. With the recent 2011 England riots (and the many that have occurred throughout the decades after World War II), I can only assume that many modern Brits are asking themselves whether or not Oswald Mosley was right as current socio-political trends certainly point in his favor. Mosley once stated, "There are periods in history when change is necessary, and other periods when it is better to keep everything for the time as it is. The art of life is to be in the rhythm of your age." I think it is obvious to most people who live in the "postmodern" occidental world that critical change of a revolutionary stature is needed and it is not of the wretched sort that was so dishonestly promised by a double-bastard American commander-in-chief who is nothing more than a glorified pimp who has developed a refined form of huckstering. I wouldn't doubt that if in three or four decades from now, an Obama mini-series will be created that is much more critical of its subject than Mosley. After all, who can hate a fascist leader that was gentleman enough to share his rationed fags with a well dressed wog.

THE DEATH OF SCORPIO

John Amero (1979)

While probably better known for hallucinatory experimental heterosexual quasi-hardcore horror works like Bacchanale (1970) and cultivated comedies like Blonde Ambition (1981) which he co-directed with his brother Leo, John Amero was also a prolific gay pornographer who directed brutal butt bandit flicks under the pseudonym 'Francis Ellie' (and sometimes the variant 'Francis Elise'), which was also a name used by veteran exploitation auteur Michael Findlay (The Curse of Her Flesh, The Ultimate Degenerate). Indeed, from the sodomite serial killer flick Killing Me Softly (1979) starring Jack Wrangler as an unfortunate fellow who falls in love with a deranged dude that has an, "uncontrollable need to kill in order to have an orgasm" to the brutal S&M flick Boots & Saddles (1982) also starring Wrangler as a man who must save his lover from a sadomasochistic neo-Nazi played by poof porn icon Scorpio, Amero was one of the most innovative and artistically subversive auteur pornographers when it came to porn chic era fag fuck flicks. Unquestionably, one of Amero's strangest, darkest, and most sensitive yet minimalistic works is the sensationally titled flick The Death of Scorpio (1979). Indeed, although starring white-trash-like gay porn icon 'Scorpio' (real name Wilbur James Weiss Jr.)—a fellow who, like so many men of his time, inevitably succumbed to complications to AIDS (including stomach cancer)—the iconic porn star does not play the lead character, but instead a secondary 'character' who invokes the wraith of the beyond bitter antihero, but not before getting involved in a little balls-to-the-wall pre-condom bareback brutality. A sort of warped psycho-sexual thriller and fiercely foreboding carnal chamber piece made very vaguely in the spirit of Alfred Hitchcock's ambiguously gay classic Rope (1948), albeit with cocks and minus the quasi-Nietzschean philosophy, The Death of Scorpio depicts that revengeful short-time serial killing of a perennially internally wounded artist who decides to get revenge against his long-term ex-lover/great lover and the mutual 'friends' that destroyed their relationship. An award winner from the Gay Film Institute, The Death of Scorpio, which mostly takes place in a single dreary and scantily blue room, was largely shot for a live-audience at Show Palace Theatre in Soho, NYC where Scorpio regularly performed while high on "poppers" (Amyl Nitrate) and thus offers a rare raw window into a lost time that was largely vanguardized by "gay cancer" (AIDS) and, later, aesthetically insipid shot-on-video smut.

As antihero Shawn Gregory (Amero's In Search of the Perfect Man, All Tied Up) writes in a 'therapeutic' letter that to his ex-lover Michael Stone (whose only other film credit was on an episode of the forgotten TV series Sons and Daughters (1982–1987) created by Reg Watson): "Ten years... Ten years...or at least it would have been ten years today, Michael. Oh Michael, how did you let our friends destroy such a wonderful relationship? The day I met you at Jes-sica's, I knew you were all and everything I needed. She was the cause of it, you know. Jessica knew that Giuseppe and Scorpio wanted to be more than just 'good friends.' They wanted you...they used you, but they never loved you. Not the way I did, Michael. I never tricked with them...our so called 'best friends.' But in one year you let them ruin all the togetherness we had developed in the best 8 years of our lives. I need my peace of mind...my course is set...my anguish will be resolved. I will end this torment." Indeed, struggling painter Shawn plans to "end this torment" by not only killing his ex via poison, but also their mutual friends Giuseppe Welch (Amero and his partner Findlay's Christopher Street Blues, Amero's Killing Me Softly) and Scorpio (Jack Deveau's Just Blonds, Christopher Rage's Street Kids), who he blames for destroying his relationship. Indeed, appealing to their flagrant narcissism by offering the opportunity to be the subject of a painting that will be in his supposed upcoming art gallery showing, Shawn convinces the men to come to his apartment where he paints and then defiles their nude bodies, and afterwards plies them with alcohol, which he has spiked with poisonous pharmaceuticals.

The first forsaken fellow that Shawn gets to come by his rather pathetic apartment of death is Giuseppe Welch, who poses for the aberrant artist in nothing but a rather unflattering jockstrap. Shawn convinces Giuseppe to come over by pleading with him over the phone regarding the supposed bad blood between the two men: "I'm all over that. No, no hard feelings. Michael and I just weren't meant to be. I've got my head together...don't even go to the shrink anymore and I really want to paint you." After Shawn paints his unsuspecting victim, he worships the young man's jockstrap and the two proceed to share carnal knowledge with one another, but both men seem to have trouble keeping their members hard. After Shawn gives Giuseppe poisonous wine, the latter soon dies and days later a newspaper headline states regarding the death: "Body Found in Soho...Poison Suggests Murder." Next, Shawn gives good old Scorpio—a dirty blond mop-head with an equally unflattering mustache that would probably scare away any sensible young child—a call and lets the porn star know regarding their upcoming painting session, "Can't wait to get you in oil!" While Shawn seems to have fun with Scorpio during their post-painting session after engaging in a little 69 pleasure and aggressive butt banditry, that does not stop the lethally lovelorn artist from perniciously poisoning his subject's vodka. In what ultimately amounts to a rather pathetic lonely death, Scorpio merely drops dead on the hot NYC asphalt like a common bum, with no one even noticing his degrading demise. In a quasi-poetic post-coitus rambling, Shawn states: "Oh Scorpio, how incredible it is that in this fragile existence we should hate and destroy one another. There was someone that said a man at the point of death was more free than all others...because, Scorpio, death levels all things. Goodbye, sweet Scorpio."

Of course, Shawn saves the best for last. Indeed, knowing that his ex-boyfriend is mourning the dubious death of Giuseppe, Shawn calls Michael and states the following like a true scheming psychopath: "Michael, I just heard about Giuseppe...how awful. What?! Oh my god, not Scorpio too! Michael, I must see you, especially after what's happened. Please come. Remember the good times. I want to be with you. There must be a very sick person somewhere in this city." Of course, totally unaware that Michael is a malevolent mad man with a thirst for carnally killer revenge, Michael shows up and the two instantly make love in a scene of almost Riefenstahl-esque "body worship." After having sex, Michael ends up accidentally finding Shawn's "kill list" while the painter is mixing together a poisonous alcoholic beverage for his ill-fated lover. In a twist ending, Michael switches glasses with Shawn while the two are kissing. Somewhat ironically, Shawn dies in peace in the arms of the man he loved so much that he was driven to coldblooded murder. Indeed, things may not have worked out as Shawn had originally planned, but at least the perturbed painter was able to "end this torment" in a most fitting and, dare I say, romantic fashion, thus giving The Death of Scorpio a sort of morbid and sadistic Shakespearean vibe.

While nowhere near as masterful, entrancing, and aesthetically 'idiosyncratic' as Amero's haunting esoteric psychedelic-gothic hardcore effort Bacchanale, The Death of Scorpio is no less dark and depraved, as an unwittingly prophetic piece of pornographic poetry. Indeed, created just before the AIDS epidemic more or less decimated the strongly organized gay community that popped up after the Stonewall riots of 1969, Amero's film certainly seems like it anticipates the internal 'self-destruction' that hit the homosexual world after gay cancer spread like the plague in NYC and every other American metropolis. Despite the fact that the title of the film certainly tells the viewer otherwise, The Death of Scorpio is surely not a mere Scorpio vehicle but a decidedly disturbing chamber piece wherein Shawn Gregory and Michael Stone (whose haunting portrait is focused on in the antihero's apartment throughout, thus highlighting Shawn's superlatively sick and obscenely obsessive heartbrokenness) are the real stars. Indeed, when it comes down to it, Scorpio's contribution to the film is no more captivating or iconic than that of a grimy blowup doll (in fact, a blowup doll would have added something more 'novel' the film). While a little too 'porn-heavy' for my tastes as someone who watches vintage fuck flicks for solely aesthetic reasons, Amero's perturbing piece of homicidal homo pornography will certainly disappoint those looking for a quick and painless masturbation aid, as an oftentimes melancholy blue movie with an upbeat yet paradoxically strangely eerie electronic/disco soundtrack that anticipates the collective screams of countless AIDS victims. Indeed, with Scorpio now long dead as a result of the same plague that devoured his friends, lovers, and fellow porn star comrades, The Death of Scorpio has gained more meaning with age, thus guaranteeing that not all old school wank material will succumb to the dirty semen-stained dustbin of porno history.

FRIDAY THE 13TH: THE ORPHAN

John Ballard (1979)

Even as a kid, I hated most movies about or made for kids, as I felt they were patronizing and portrayed children with a sort of obnoxious pseudo-sophistication and moral righteousness that made me question whether or not the filmmakers were pedophiles (of course, as tragic child actor Corey Feldman revealed a couple years back, a number of them apparently are). In short, I tend to try to avoid virtually any and every film featuring a child protagonist, but there are certainly exceptions where a kid hero can be an advantage of sorts. Indeed, the somewhat unclassifiable coming-of-age horror flick Friday the 13th: The Orphan (1979) aka The Orphan aka David directed by one-time-auteur John Ballard benefits from the fact that it features what is most certainly one of the most bat-shit crazy and hysterical boy protagonists in cinema history. Better known for its somewhat unfortunate title and the fact the producers of the Friday the 13th slasher franchise had to pay the producers of Ballard's film to use said title, the work is based on the short horror story Sredni Vashtar by Saki (Hector Hugh Munro) written between 1900 and 1911 that was also adapted by Andrew Birkin and countless other filmmakers about a sickly 10-year-old boy who hates his cousin-guardian and ultimately invents an eponymous god that he summons to seek revenge against his pseudo-parent after she dares to sell his hen. Despite being released in 1979, director Ballard began shooting in 1968 and the film was not released until about a decade later after the filmmaker was forced by two presumably financially enterprising and artistically retarded female producers to cut out about 30 minutes of what was originally a 110 minute cut that was edited by Ralph Rosenblum, who edited a number of Woody Allen flicks, including Annie (1977) and Interiors (1978), as well as Sidney Lumet's Eugene O'Neill adaptation Long Day's Journey Into Night (1962) and Mel Brooks' The Producers (1967). Undoubtedly, it is obvious while watching The Orphan that Rosenblum's seamless editing was ripped at the seams, as the film seems so compulsively spastic in its editing. Seeming like a sort of Southern Gothic tale made for psychopathic prepubescent boys, the film, which originally had the working title 'Betrayal,' was notably directed by a Harvard and NYU educated child progeny who became an accomplished oil painter at the mere age of seven. Admittedly, as a result of assuming it was another disposable 1970s horror flick, I had no interest in seeing the film until reading about it in classic tome NIGHTMARE USA: The Untold Story of the Exploitation Independents (2007), of which author Stephen Thrower stated, "THE ORPHAN is one of the most literate, intelligent and unusual films covered in this book," but luckily I did as it proved to be one of the most bizarre, idiosyncratic, and terribly misunderstood American genre flicks.

Part tragic coming-of-age flick, part hallucinatory hagsploitation nightmare, part surrealist horror show, part misguided minstrel show, part 1930 period based melodrama, and part arthouse revenge-thriller, The Orphan probably will not appeal to most diehard horror fans and especially not Jason Voorhees fan-boys. Set in the post-WWI era, the film tells the increasingly disturbing and nightmarish story of a curious and excitable 10-year-old boy who is forced to live with his exceedingly bitchy, anal retentive, and sexually repressed old spinster aunt after both of his wealthy parents end up dying tragically. Of course, as a young boy who invents a religion with a taxidermied monkey as the godhead and whose best friends are a middle-aged African negro who was a traveling companion of his explorer father and an Irish maid, the eponymous protagonist is not your typical boy and it ultimately comes as no surprise when he completely snaps and becomes a seemingly schizophrenic psychotic killer of sorts. Featuring the sort of deadly family dysfunction and somewhat 'eccentrically' executed killings one would expect from an Andy Milligan flick, the film certainly owes comparisons to Jack Clayton's classic Henry James adaptation The Innocents (1961) and Ingmar Bergman's Fanny and Alexander (1982), but also Richard Blackburn's Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973) and especially Philip Ridley's The Reflecting Skin (1990), as one of the most feel-bad coming-of-age films ever made.

After a fairly aesthetically pleasing kaleidoscopic opening montage featuring happy photographs of the protagonist and his dead parents and retro images of Harvard University banners and WWI era American soldiers, among other things, juxtaposed with outmoded ragtime music, the viewer is introduced to boy protagonist David (Mark Owens), who narrates to the viewer how he fought a couple of his male relatives when they forced him to look at the corpse of his father at the viewing. On top of being told by a mean-spirited androgynous little girl that he is now an orphan, David is forced to kiss the cold corpse of his truly deathly pale father, who he loved very much, even though his father was oftentimes away travelling around with his Afro-negro comrade Akin (Afolabi Ajayi), who is what one might describe as a 'magical negro.' After his parents die, David's maternal Aunt Martha Fairchild (Peggy Feury of Matt Cimber's The Witch Who Came from the Sea (1976)) moves into the large rural family estate to become his legal guardian and she immediately begins bitching, stating of her new luxury home, "I can't believe my sister slept here." Akin, who lives in a shack on the family estate, immediately realizes that Aunt Martha is a deleterious influence and decides to stay with the protagonist until he becomes strong and independent, or as he states like some sort of wise negro tribal elder, "I'm going to stay here until I feel that David has the strength to stand on his own two feet. Once he knows what his father stood for, there is no way she can influence him." Despite being a rather wealthy and handsome chap, David's father was a sort of wild child and perennial wander who could not help but spend much of his time dicking around the Dark Continent (or as one of his less than sympathetic relatives states, “jackassing around Africa”). Like his father, David has an aversion to Christianity and is a pagan at heart, though he decides to codify his own religion involving a taxidermied monkey named ‘Charlie’ as his god. While Aunt Martha bitches to him, “Your know, David, our family has always made a contribution to the Christian community...and we expect you to do the same. Frankly, we can’t afford to have you grow up to be like your father,” the protagonist is just like his dead daddy in that he is more interested in being an African pagan tribesman than a sterile bourgeois ‘cultural Christian’ fraud and social automaton.

By today’s candy ass pussy standards where people throw around made-up pseudo-academics words like ‘microaggression’ to highlight completely imaginary forms of racial discrimination, David and his negro friend Akin have what one might describe as a somewhat strange and awkward relationship, with the protagonist asking the strange African questions like, “Why are you black?” and him replying, “I’m not. Nooooo...You’re are black and I...I’ll be white.” In a somewhat curious scene, David touches Akin’s steel-wool-like hair and remarks “That’s wild,” and the humble homeboy proudly replies, “I’m glad you like.” In fact, Akin likes David so much that he always asks him to smoke out of his hookah with him. Unfortunately, Aunt Martha spots David and Akin together while lying on a leopard skin rug and she goes completely berserk and attacks the protagonist. When Akin attempts to physically restrain Aunt Martha, she hatefully, if not hilariously, yells, “Don’t you touch me, you black nigger Man!” and complains that she does not want her nephew being around “dirty” things like the decidedly dark negro. Not surprisingly, Aunt Martha demands that Akin leave the estate immediately and even goes so far as ordering the jolly black brother to kill David’s pet chicken Apple Betty before he leaves. While demanding that he not say goodbye to David before he leaves, Akin manages to write a letter to the lad reading, “David, your aunt has ordered the destruction of your hideout. I have killed the animal but she’s to blame. Prayers are no longer good. You must stand on your own two feet and face her.”

Naturally, with his best friend gone and his favorite pet dead, David’s rather fragile mind begins to unravel and he begins spending a good portion of time hanging out in the chicken coop where he intentionally burns his hands over a flame and sees his ‘god’ Charley come alive and his dead father appear with glowing hands and proclaiming, “Don’t you forget me.” In a blatant tribute to Persona (1966), David and his father’s faces become one just as Bibi Anderson and Liv Ullmann’s faces did in Bergman’s masterpiece. Meanwhile, it becomes quite apparent that one of the reasons Aunt Martha hates David’s father so much is because she might have been in love with him and was quite possibly even once his lover. While looking around the house in a frantic fashion for a photo of David’s father, presumably to masturbate to, Aunt Martha accidentally kills the protagonist’s cute little white puppy dog ‘Henry’ upon unwittingly slamming its body into a door. Rather tragically, David walks in just as the dog dies and when he cries, his considerably insensitive aunt has the gall to rebuke him, stating, "Don't cry, David. He's dead. Leave him alone." When David rebels against his aunt by writing "bitch" on a bathroom mirror with lipstick and leaving her a threatening message in the form of a pile of chopped up bread with a butcher knife sticking out of the top, Aunt Martha decides to lock him in his room. In a fairly bizarre and seemingly sexually confused scenario, David decides to mock his aunt by dressing in full drag and complaining in an exceedingly grating fashion by saying things like, "Now, David, you must take your medicine." Judging by his tragic childhood, fascination with becoming like his father, and tendency to dress in drag while he is pissed off, one can only assume that David will grow up to be a pervert of sorts.

David inherited a breathing problem from his father, so when Aunt Martha opts to tie him to his bed in a cold room that lacks a heater, he naturally becomes quite sick. Luckily, the family maid, Mary (Eleanor Stewart), decides to comfort David by saying things to him like, "Sleep, David, while I watch over you. I love you, like I would my own son." Naturally, Aunt Martha becomes infuriated that Mary slept with David and ultimately decides to fire the feisty Irish maid, thus causing the protagonist to lose his last friend. To make matters worse, David overhears Mary state to a family friend named Dr. Thompson (Stanley Church of Peter Godfrey's The Great Jewel Robber (1950)) regarding him, "I don't care about him. I just want you." Indeed, in a scene inspired by William Faulkner's Light in August (1932), David hides under a bed while listening to Mary attempting to get in bearded 'bear' Dr. Thompson's pants by negating her affection for the protagonist. For her sins, Mary is subsequently mysteriously murdered while hanging sheets after having her entire body is rolled up in a sheet and repeatedly stabbed.

After being injured after crashing through a greenhouse window upon attempting to escape from his aunt, David is confronted with his greatest fear after being told that he will be sent to a boarding school. Indeed, after Aunt Martha patronizingly states to him, "I know you'll be happy there. You'll make lot of friends," David suffers a hellish A Nightmare on Elm Street-esque hallucination where he is sent to a sort of post-industrial orphanage (which was shot on Roosevelt Island where parts of William Friedkin's The French Connection (1971) was shot) full of grotesque negro children where he receives an Auschwitz-esque numbered tattoo on his arm and Dr. Thompson and Aunt Martha in drag operate on him and cut his tongue off. Of course, the ominous orphanage dream throws David completely over the edge and with a psychodramatic montage featuring a flashback scene of the protagonist's mother committing suicide by putting a gun in her mouth after accidentally killing her hubby with Charlie the chimpanzee attacking Aunt Martha, the film finally reaches its natural conclusion. Indeed, while Aunt Martha is being violently mauled by Charlie in the chicken coop, David appears with a shotgun and pulls the trigger while recalling his mother putting a bullet in her brain. In a scene that hints that the protagonist has been brainwashed by one-too-many holocaust classics, David stares at Aunt Martha's corpse, which is covered with mice and states "never again." After liquidating his aunt, David celebrates by eating toast. Of course, he chows down on the toasted bread in celebration of the death of his aunt, who regularly berated him any time she saw him eating it.

Aside from being one of the most patently peculiar and genre-bending coming-of-age films ever made, The Orphan is arguably also the most anti-Oedipal and even 'misogynistic.' Indeed, while virtually all the adults featured in the film betray the boy protagonist in one way or another, the female characters are especially cold, calculating, and irrational in their treachery. As Stephen Thrower noted in NIGHTMARE USA, it was not exactly common for a young director in the late-1960s to make a film with a sort of pro-patriarchal piece where 'father knows best' and where the death of the male parent is depicted as the most deleterious of things that can happen to a boy (notably, the protagonist's few recollections of his mother are negative, as she is ultimately depicted as the source of the eponymous character's problems). Indeed, unlike Jason Voorhees, the orphan is no momma's boy but a young boy who lost his father at a critical age, thus guaranteeing that he will never be as great of a man as the fellow that sired him. In its unintentionally hilarious depiction of a cracked cracker adopting tribal negro garb and customs, the film can only be compared to similarly strange works like Karen Arthur's The Mafu Cage (1978), which depicts a deranged dame with delicate daddy issues and an unhealthy chimp fetish, among other things. Of course, as one would most certainly suspect from watching the film, director John Ballard is a negrophile of sorts. In fact, aside from being actively involved in the so-called Civil Rights movement during the mid-1960s, Ballard attempted to direct a film entitled 'Hoops' about inner city negro basketball players around the same time he was putting his finishing touches on The Orphan, but gave up on the project upon being flown to Hollywood and being told by producers that they wanted a black coach character, which was originally supposed to be played by James Earl Jones's father Robert E. Jones, changed to a white man. Indubitably, the height of Ballard's cultural cuckoldry is probably most apparent in a scene that was from The Orphan where the evil Aunt Martha character fantasizes about giving negro Akin a blowjob. Ballard must have realized the scene was the height of libelous Judeo-negro propaganda in its depiction of a supposedly racist rich old cracker lady longing for darkie dong as he would later state of it in Thrower's book, "I didn't mind that being taken out." Negrophilia aside, Ballard at least seems to have some sane views about race as reflected in the following remark he made to Thrower in regard to Blaxploitation cinema, "SWEET SWEETBACK was creative; most of the others were really stupid. It's the same feeling I have about Tarantino. He has a wonderful talent with actors, but what is he doing? He's like a wannabe black person."

Of course, as its sometimes incoherent and wayward structure demonstrates, the film also had a number of other imperative scenes cut that make more sense of the overall story. In fact, Ballard has gone on to confess that the entire structure of the film was mutilated when it was reedited at the behest of its two art-annihilating female producers, or as the director stated himself, "There was a structural design to the film, to do with pastel autumnal scenes at the beginning and cold winter scenes at the end, but because the film was restructured for its final release, this structure is compromised, with scenes from winter added to the early stages." Indeed, it might be part delusion on my part, but I sincerely think that The Orphan had the potential to be a hit midnight movie and artsploitation classic, but meddling producers and poor distribution put a stop to that, thus making the film now seem like a sort of pretentious yank cinematic cousin to Italian arthouse auteur turned exploitation hack Romano Scavolini's totally tasteless trash classic Nightmares in a Damaged Brain (1981). Although too blatantly butchered and 'politically incorrect' for arthouse fans and too tame and bloodless for gorehounds, Ballard's shockingly original and truly one-of-a-kind work most certainly has more artistic merit than all of the films in the Friday the 13th franchise combined. Naturally, it also has to be the most curious film ever directed by a former child prodigy, as one certainly gets the feeling while watching The Orphan that Ballard still has a special visceral hatred for adults, especially women, as a result of some dubious experiences he had with grownups while creating masterful oil paintings while just still a wee lad. I would even go so far as to argue that the film makes it seem as if Ballard never wanted to grow up, at least not in the conventional sense, as the eponymous protagonist of The Orphan dreams of becoming like his dead father who, as a man that spent his entire life going on exotic journeys and playing around in general, was more or less a perennial kid with Peter Pan syndrome. Indeed, aside from Charles Laughton's masterpiece The Night of the Hunter (1955), I cannot think of another film shot from the perspective of children where adults seem so collectively flawed, deceitful, and just plain despicable. Although a coming-of-age flick that would probably greatly appeal to certain children due to its ridiculously rebellious boy protagonist, The Orphan probably makes for uniquely unhealthy viewing for kids, especially of the highly impressionable, criminally-inclined, and/or mentally imbalanced sort, though, admittedly, I wish I had the opportunity to see the film when I was a budding juvenile delinquent, even if I would have cringed at the titular character's patently preposterous proto-wigger dream of becoming a magical Zulu warrior of sorts.

John Boorman (1974)

With just the title fresh in your mind, do images assault you? Ones resonating, rather vividly, landscapes of fantastical wonders from which could only be created from the genius mind that of Piers Anthony? Perhaps even the countenance of being a Dystopian film accompanied by the laser-engraved image of a lone Sean Connery in a bright red loin cloth-like uniform. Zardoz is all these things plus more. It's a sinful piece of allegorical relations to every medium of art imaginable; sculpting, painting, literature, film of sorts, and even music.

Zardoz might be the greatest and only post-Dystopian film ever created. The flow is that of a dream like atmosphere with candid colors and vicarious retro-futuristic designs. What Dario Argento's films are critically acclaimed for, John Boorman does better without the side-effects of experimental tactics and takes the mystical theory of dream scenarios as demonstrated in Suspiria and Inferno and morphs it into a perfect film adaptation. Where normal Dystopian films "end", post-Dystopian "begins". After the alluded apocalypse ravages more of the mind than the land, a new strain of being is introduced, although this Utopian incarnation is far from the Eden we'd expect. Set in a landscape of archived nihilism, "Exterminators" are designed to kill "Brutals". Their God, Zardoz, is realized as a floating stone head easily reminiscent of the colorful drawings that occupy much of Monty Python and the Holy Grail. Upon landing, the statue bellows the importance of the gun and proceeds to spew forth mountains of weapons and ammunition to aid them in their "holy crusade". As eager as the Exterminators are to go forth and murder Brutals, they are warned of the dangers of the penis. "The penis is bad", the head promptly exclaims. After questioning his idol, Zed (Sean Connery at his mustachioed best) stows away aboard the vessel and kills the pilot and magician aboard without a moments hesitation. Zardoz soon lands in the "Vortex" - the other half of the divided lands. Rather than being a killing ground, the Vortex is a divine Utopia with intelligent life and strict moral codes. The Vortex is that of science; a land where no one dies and your only aging is issued as punishment. As you can tell from the plot essentials, Zardoz is cunningly elaborate and effectively substantiated in the Dystopian genre. A premature omniscience known only as "the Tabernacle" is the main "villain" of Zardoz, other than the inhabitants of the Vortex. Each is guilty of sin for allowing such a lifeless existence to occur. Zed has come to bring change but with change comes uncertainty. The inhabitants of the Vortex are split between executing Zed and studying his masculinity and admiring his seed and bold erection. Note: Sean Connery can only become fully erect while looking at Charlotte Rampling, who defies controversy and transcends into a realm of Nazi fetishism with her role in The Night Porter. Zardoz sets off on a mystic quest which features scenes of epic savagery and subversive elements such as condoning rape as something hereditary and for the most part, normal.[SPOILERS] The scene in which life is renewed and death appears for the citizens of the Vortex is stunning and violent in context. Eager to be rid- den of their unnatural lives, everyone screams to be shot as the Exterminators raid the camp. A brutal symphony occurs as classical music rings true as bodies hit the grass. Erotic subtleties are quietly passed around as bouncing cleavage is spotted instantaneously. [/SPOILERS]Science fiction has never been so ma- ligned, artistically ahead of its time, and revolted beyond the point of failure as Zardoz has been. A true auteur's working of Dystopian film while adding heavy theological elements. Zardoz isn't for you or I. It truly feels as if this film beckons the audience calling of an otherworldly society.

John Cameron Mitchell° (2006)

John Cameron Mitchell's "Sex" film Shortbus more resembles a cultural Marxist cosmopolitan car wreck than any type of sexual statement. Keep in mind that I am a huge fan of Mitchell's Hedwig and the Angry Inch. Shortbus is a film about sexual hedonism and the enslaved individuals that fall victim to it. Gay orgies, lesbian seafood buffets, and old man confessions only go so far in keeping ones interest. Mitchell thought he could make a feature length by mixing real sex with conversations about sex. He could have done this with a 10 minute short. Despite the variety of sexual interests, the characters are fairly boring and one dimensional. The most interesting character of all is an Asian sex counselor that can't have a orgasm. She decides to take it upon herself to ask lesbians for advice. The butch with the Mexican mustache from Le Tigre even adds her opinion. What a horrifying sight. Mitchell is doing nothing new with his "cinematic" sex film. The sexploitation films of the 1970s and 80s have much more character, not mention better music. The combination of some of the sex scenes and the horrible pansy music make suicide a reasonable consideration. It is depressing to know that the director of Hedwig and the Angry Inch could go from fun music to something that could be played in the coffee bar at Borders. Shortbus was supposedly inspired by European films featuring sex. Unfortunately Mitchell had no clue how to execute these scenes and construct a solid film. Shortbus comes out more like a porno flick for fans of the Jean-Luc Godard. It can be certain that the film is highly revered on liberal arts universities countrywide.

Fans of Hedwig and the Angry Inch should consider watching Shortbus. It confirms that directors of musicals shouldn't bother doing anything too far out of the genre (although Shortbus had a couple horrible musical numbers). Musicals and porn films have a similar format. Scenes of intense "action" and a little bit of plot.

BIG TROUBLE IN LITTLE CHINA

John Carpenter (1986)

Big Trouble in Little China is a title that is fresh in most of your minds. For me, it's a new experience. I've meant to view this Russel/Carpenter film since I've heard of how odd-ball it is. Now that I've seen it, I'm not sure I have the same view on this film as others who viewed this film in their childhood. This is yet another attempt to assimilate Asian culture perfectly within Western audiences. What better way than to allow the action to take place in Chinatown. Jack Burton, at first glance, is the ideal American hero - Wife beater tee, American blue jeans, grizzled facial hair, and a fierce extensive firing arm. All this is intimidating, but during a closer look, Burton is no more a caricature of American heroes than the rest of them. His many adventures have him hiding out from harms way during "comedic" scenes. The rebuttal is swift as the cowards love interest is taken by the evil immortal sorcerer. He then relies heavily on his Kung-fu friend to rescue both damsel's in distress. Big Trouble in Little China is one of the fortunate films to not be influenced by CGI or anything other than practical effects. An iconic "Storm" dons an ancient Chinese gi-of sorts. His powers revolve around electricity allowing for maximum killing efficiency. It would be safe to say that Midway stole the idea for Raiden in hit arcade game Mortal Kombat. Metal Gear Solid at least took the initiative to credit Snake Plissken for his influence, whereas Midway felt it better to hide their scandal under chart-topping records. As the film progressed, I found myself overwhelmed and underwhelmed. I could have went into shock as quickly as the cornball humor came and went. The ending came swiftly with no remorse and like any John Carpenter ending, left me speechless and stunned. His generic remark to any ending with closure must be less than satisfactory. The only trait that Carpenter has distilled upon this 80s humor fest is his usual casting of Kurt Russel (Elvis, The Thing, and Escape from New York) and his merciless endings. The action/adventure genre is scrapped for a pliable adventure film. The action scenes are few and are salvaged in an effort to bring more laughs in the film. One could get enjoyment from the incredibly over-the-top scenes, but I found myself asking myself "Did they really need to go that far?". Carpenter's effort at forging an 80s cheese ball fantasy film works incredibly within its own limitations, but I discovered that there was something missing indeed. Big Trouble in Little China is sadly a film that I needed to see while young to retain most of the mind-blowing nostalgia that many to this day still reminisce upon.

PRINCE OF DARKNESS

John Carpenter (1987)

Following the box office stroke that was Big Trouble in Little China, John Carpenter grabbed his tool bag of familiar faces and set out to return to the reigns of horror with Prince of Darkness. Carpenter's career has been an odd one, for sure. The fellow has directed an extremely diverse cast of individuals with inventive and fresh story lines so in some respect, it's as if Carpenter was a peddler of quality, more than the average film maker with cult acclaim. Prince of Darkness is the second film in Carpenter's "Apocalypse Trilogy", beginning with The Thing and ending with In the Mouth of Madness. It would seem so the arbitrary opinion of the masses have crucified this film for obvious reasons - the intellectualism behind it. Fusing science and religion seamlessly, Prince of Darkness offers you two doors, one encompassing the mundane world of horror concentrate and the other brimming with pseudo-scientific explanations and theoretical sacrilege. For these reasons, Prince of Darkness should be a film universally accepted as a masterpiece in horror storytelling. Even with the monument I have built around it, its flaws don't put any cracks in the hull nor endanger the ultimately woeful and haunting climax.

I firmly believe that John Carpenter borrows many ingredients from Lamberto Bava's devilish discourse, Demons, whether he realized it or not. What first lent the idea was the similarly styled soundtrack in which Carpenter fashioned himself, perhaps in the mold of Italian prog-rock maestros Goblin. My next clue was the particular attention to detail of the systematic infection and the confinement within a "marked" piece of historical architecture. Prince of Darkness maintains the similar layout until the actual thesis of antimatter and he also known as Satan are divulged. For what it's worth, the beginning and the end of this film highlight the peak of horrific success. The opening scene, while shuffling through the credits, is magnified with silent instances of conversation amidst the influenced soundtrack. The anxiety present on certain faces sets the tone for what is sure to be a hell of a night. A romantic rendezvous with obsession is even met while Brian Marsh quietly longs for Catherine Danforth from afar, a student of a rivaling reality. This alone makes the final scene almost intoxicating, achieving the same affect that 1986's The Hitcher and Goosebumps - The Haunted School had on me at such an impressionable age.

Following atomic theory, Carpenter left not a single instrument of mathematics out, leaving Prince of Darkness exactly that of an equation. Using the clues left by brief moments of academia, one can determine the fate and origins of the "dream tape". Spoilers will be present in the remainder of this paragraph so resume with caution. Early on in the film while the students discuss the lucid crossroads each and every volunteer has been subject to, Brian Marsh brings up a likely hypothesis of the images being linked to tachyons, which are subatomic particles that travel faster than the speed of light. Due to the tachyons nature of relativity, you would not see it but two visible impressions of it departing and arriving. Fast forward to the ending in which Catherine is revealed to be stuck in the "mirror image", it's hinted that the warbled person narrating could in fact be Brian, as the voice hopes to alter past events. Given that tachyons are clued to travel back in time, throttling backwards, it's only obvious that Brian's detailed obsession with Catherine has led to the evolution of this equation, giving him access to the past in an attempt to rediscover his love in order to tell her that which he did not. I have not even begun to highlight the subversion of reality that Prince of Darkness so shamelessly conquers. Let the fine filmmaking speak for itself.

On account of the entertaining aspect of horror, I must divulge the second side to Prince of Darkness. As you'd guess, eventually the canister containing the primordial ooze that is the son of Satan is unlocked releasing pure and utter terror into the narrow halls of this ancient church. So in some regards, Prince of Darkness takes the throne of holy horror after I was left underwhelmed by what I have seen of Soavi's The Church - also considered a sequel of sorts to Demons. To switch from my stern approach to this underrated horror classic, Donald Pleasence's character credited as "Priest" is known as "Father Loomis" with the English subtitles turned on. Just another log in the fire, I suppose, as Carpenter had already established his date with the past by including many regulars in Prince of Darkness. Carpenter is that very rare directing force of which I could not state a personal favorite. I can spend hours discussing my affection to all three films in the trilogy but If I were to be challenged to pick a single, I'd be lost without words. All I can issue is my determination to get others to see Prince of Darkness for what it really is - an absolute success in menace and faith. Easily one of his best directorial efforts in which startled me and left me in a somber daze.

THEY LIVE

John Carpenter (1988)

John Carpenter is a horror studio director that never really interested me. Aside from the original Halloween, I never really could say that I was a fan of his contrived horror lexicon. That was until I saw his masterpiece They Live. Carpenter was able to capture the alien Big Brother world we take for granted today in the form of a horror film. They Live also manages to capture the sociological elements facing the proletariat and their faceless masters. The international mass media is able to “win” public opinion simply by having the biggest voice. Despite the fact that the media and entertainment industry only make up 2% of Americans “national” gross, these industries (aside from the dreaded American “public” schools) are possibly the most important “programs” in America (and international) for molding the lives on “individuals.” To put it simply, the media has a much more important purpose than “to make money.” John Carpenter’s They Live takes a look at this in a most frightening way. The hero of They Live is a blue collar man (Roddy Piper) simply looking for hard work to do for little pay. Whatever job he should have had was probably outsourced to China so that Ari Cohen can have an extra vacation house in Las Vegas that his wife won’t know about. The blue collar laborer eventually finds a black friend in a similar job situation. Both men realize something is not right but are incapable of articulating their thoughts. It is not until Roddy Piper finds a pair of “alien” seeing sunglasses that he realizes there is evil behind the slave like irrationality of society. The media masters and their “cute” puppets love to pretend that they are the good guys. The reality is that they are relatives of the same criminals that own the war promoting international bankers. They put on a Zio-clown like John Stewart because he’s “funny” and he “really sticks it to Bush.” Another robust and jelly filled media favorite is “documentary” filmmaker Michael Moore. Moore is an individual whose credibility lies in his “everyday fat American slob appearance.” Obviously someone like Moore is a “good guy” just looking out for the small guy. The Weinstein’s certainly approve of his genuine and honest look at the evil white men. The media bosses are as honest with their “news” as Bolshevik mass murderers Leon Trotsky and Vladimir Lenin were real “proletarians.” The two proletarians of They Live realize that the only way to stop the mind numbing filth found on television is to destroy it’s various sources. The problem is even normal people are siding with the soulless aliens. What is one to do in a world where no one is trustable and the majority of individuals seemed to have suffered a TV induced lobotomy? The reality is that public schools and big media sources are most crucial sources for causing racial tensions. This is brought up in a subtle way in They Live when a fight occurs between the muscular protagonist and his unconvinced black friend. Once realizing that poor blacks and whites have much more in common than they want to believe (through a fight to “look through“ the glasses), they join together to battle the real cancer. Whether it be the Jena Six Hoax (in which the Southern Poverty Law Center paid 20,000 blacks to invade a small Louisiana town) or the gothic white supremacist executed Columbine massacre (despite the fact that Dylan Klebold was Jewish), the media uses these events to propagate race based hatred and impotent white guilt. They have to have the masses consumed with hatred against each other so that no one can stop them from committing their evil genocidal deeds. They Live is John Carpenter's most powerful and important film. A film that takes a look at the hidden infestations in society, and has common men attempting to destroy it at its very source. They Live is an even more relevant film today than when it was released 20 years ago. The media, television, and films are by far the biggest influences on Americans. For some reason, people seem to believe the televisions are just magic boxes that provide them viewing with no real reason behind it. I wonder what kind of face the Ghoul Rupert Murdoch has behind his already grotesque human mask.

THE DAMNED

John Carpenter (1995)

The 1# favorite film of German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who described the epic Italian-West German co-production as, "perhaps the greatest film, the film that I think means as much to the history of film as Shakespeare to the history of theater," The Damned (1969) aka La caduta degli dei aka Götterdämmerung directed by Italian maestro Luchino Visconti (Ludwig, Conversation Piece) is perhaps one of the most elegant pieces of post-WWII high-camp melodramatics ever assembled and quite a curious one at that due to the filmmaker's not so inconspicuous homoeroticism and delightfully debauched depiction of loony libertine Teutonic aristocracy. Although a man of deep and ancient royal roots as someone "born into an ancient aristocratic family in Milan, one of seven children of the Grand Duke of Modrone," Luchino Visconti—a man once known as "Count don Luchino Visconti di Modrone"—also had some German ancestry and even admitted to American journalist Boze Hadleigh that, "I like the German personality—with the big exception of the Nazi madness. I feel almost German, sometimes. I am more calm than most of my country's people. Many of my friends are German..." And, indeed, even regarding the "Nazi madness," Visconti seems to have a special, albeit rather conflicted and rather risqué affinity for, if not on purely aesthetic grounds, as depicted in The Damned, a virtual blueblood Nazisploitation flick that, like Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974) and Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), would go on to influence the Nazisploitation subgenre, especially Tinto Brass' Salon Kitty (1976), which would reference all of these works of hysterically horny celluloid Hitlerite works. Featuring the single greatest, if not wildly exaggerated and conspicuously campy depiction of the Night of the Long Knives aka Operation Hummingbird—the period between June 30 and July 2, 1934 when Hitler treacherously used the elite Schutzstaffel (SS) and Gestapo to purge the Nazi brownshirt Sturmabteilung (SA) leadership, including its opening homosexual leader Ernst Röhm (one of Hitler's longtime good friends) and his boy toy Edmund Heines, to destroy the original National Socialist paramilitary wing's independence and so the Führer could prove his solidarity with the Reichswehr (Germany military), who saw the big bad brown boys as rival and gangsters—ever captured on celluloid, The Damned is a film that still has the power to shock and awe modern viewers as a daunting depiction of the early history of the Third Reich that few outsiders, especially Americans, are aware of. Starring some of post-WWII Europe's greatest actors, including Dirk Bogarde, Ingrid Thulin, Charlotte Rampling, Helmut Griem, and last but certainly not least, Helmut Berger—Visconti's one-time boyfriend who was nearly four decades the Italian auteur's junior—The Damned is not only an exquisitely exploitative depiction of the beginning of the end of Deutschland as a cuckold democracy, but also the beginning of the end of the European aristocracy and traditional Europa as a whole.

It is the night of the Reichstag fire when a half-retarded Dutch communist apparently committed arson against the Reichstag building in Berlin on 27 February 1933, thus proving that commie scum were plotting to destroy the German government and enabling the National Socialist party to consolidate total power in Germany and things are looking to change dramatically for the Von Essenbeck family/steel empire as well as the family patriarch's Baron Joachim von Essenbeck (Albrecht Schoenhals), an old school Junker conservative of the old aristocracy, has been mysteriously assassinated while lying asleep in his bed on the night of his birthday. Herbert Thalmann (Umberto Orsini), the family firm's vice president who has an unflinching hatred of Nazis, be they were brown or black shirts, is framed for the crime and he hightails his way out of Germany and away from the Gestapo, but his beautiful wife Elisabeth Thalmann (Charlotte Rampling) and children are left behind and must face very definite persecution from Hitler's homeboys in the SS and Gestapo. With the honorable and just Baron dead, the von Essenbeck empire is initially put in the dubious and degenerate hands of a SA officer Konstantin (René Koldehoff), a decidedly swinish sodomite of an aristocrat in a working-class National Socialist paramilitary group who personally has twink blonde supermen give him baths. To his decided disgust, Konstantin has an extremely effete and left-leaning student son named Günther (Renaud Verley) who is also interested in taking over the family business but he is too big of an art fag to be any sort of real threat, but his nefarious cross-dressing cousin Martin (Helmut Berger)—a fellow who does a mean impersonation of Marlene Dietrich's song and dance routine from Josef von Sternberg's The Blue Angel (1930) and likes molesting prepubescent girls, especially his own nieces and poor little Jewish ones—makes for a much more malicious threat as the absurdly amoral grandson of the dead patriarch. On top of maniac misfit Martin, his mother Sophie (Ingrid Thulin), the widow of Baron Joachim's only son, a fallen fighter-pilot World War I hero in the spirit of the Red Baron who would have been probably the right man to take over the von Essenbeck empire—is plotting with her social-climbing lover Friedrich Bruckmann (Dirk Bogarde) to take over the business. Of course, the keenest chess player is a Faustian beautiful blond beast of a SS officer and family member named Aschenbach (Helmut Griem), who ultimately pits the family members against each other, using others to ruin others, only to ultimately ruin the person he once helped in a mere second's time. Indeed, if you thought members of Irish white trash, Mestizos, black gangsters, and Islamic towelhead families were malicious to one another, you have yet to see the venomous and totally uncompromising treachery and two-facedness of the bold, beautiful, and damned von Essenbecks.

Featuring a SA drag number of Horst-Wessel-Lied, the anthem of the Nazi party, as well as a drunken homo-love rendition of Richard Wagner's "Liebestod" ("love death), the final, tragic yet touching aria from the 1859 opera Tristan und Isolde, by sodomite SA officer Konstantin before he and the Sturmabteilung is totally exterminated in a Teutonic twink blood orgy during the Night of the Long Knives, The Damned is indubitably the most masterful depiction of National Socialist high-camp ever depicted and it took no one less prestigious than a literal aristocrat, an Italian Germanophile of noble Guido and German blood to do it. Featuring sensitively assembled scenes of son-on-mother coitus of the catatonia-inflicting sort, one can only wonder what sort of blueblood depravity Luchino Visconti was exposed to as a true blue aristocrat himself during his rather long and eventful life as one of Italy's last true and completely cultivated Renaissance men. Despite being a staunch anti-fascist and even a member of the Italian Communist Party who once almost had a date up against a wall and in front of a blackshirt firing squad, Visconti was surely not a sincerely proletarian-sensitive filmmaker and even though his early Italian Neorealist works focused on the working-class, The Damned as well as virtually every one of his later epics, focuses on the ridiculously wealthy and recklessly wanton. As anti-Nazi conservative author Fritz Reck-Malleczewen described in his journal Diary of a Man in Despair (1947), a work chronicling Germany's dramatic transformation during the Third Reich, it was only the most debauched and opportunistic of aristocrats who found themselves kissing Uncle Adolf's ass and certainly is the case in The Damned, a film where a pedophile and literal mother-fucker rises to the top of a steel empire (based on the Krupp family, a prominent 400-year-old German dynasty from Essen, Germany) that will be responsible for providing the ammunition and armaments used in the Second World War. Indeed, while melodramatically embellished in a campy fashion and at a pace and running length that is far too intolerable for most modern viewers, The Damned offers a rare and enthralling depiction of the secret workings of the Third Reich and its imperative utilization of industrialization—the final ironic Faustian nail in Occidental man's self-destruction. Indeed, it is quite symbolic that Adolf Hitler once stated to the Hitler Youth, "In our eyes, the German boy of the future must be slim and slender, as fast as a greyhound, tough as leather and hard as Krupp steel." Of course, it is doubtful that Germany would have gotten as far as did during the war if it was only as hard as demonic dandy like Helmut Berger.

When I first saw Visconti's The Damned over a decade ago, I thought it was an inferior work to Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974), a work of melodramatically macabre celluloid Nazi naughtiness also starring Dirk Bogarde and Charlotte Rampling, but now I see the former as an epic masterpiece of world-class cinema and the latter as a novelty arthouse smut flick of the rather superficial SS sort. Indeed, a work featuring Nietzschean Hitler quotes like, "Personal Morals are dead. We are an elite society where everything is permissible," The Damned even goes so far as making National Socialism seem like some cool quasi-Satanic apocalyptic religion that came all too quickly and disappeared all too soon in a Wagnerian Germanic pagan holocaust of the body and mind. The first film in Visconti's Germany trilogy, preceding Death in Venice (1971) and Ludwig (1972), The Damned was the virtual film school Rainer Werner Fassbinder never attended and its aesthetic and thematic influences can be seen clearly in Despair (1978) starring Dirk Bogarde, Lili Marleen (1981), Lola (1981), and Querelle (1982), among various others. More than anything though, The Damned probably gave Fassbinder the courage to not only direct revolutionary National Socialist period pieces, but also come to the realization that if he was born a couple decades or so earlier, he would have probably been a brownshirt and a back-door commando one at that.

SPACE IS THE PLACE

John Coney (1974)

Personally, I have no fear of a black planet, as long as I do not actually live it on myself. Undoubtedly, Afrofuturist jazz musician and black nationalist 'cosmic philosopher' Sun Ra would not want me living there either as he makes it quite 'crystal clear' (both literally and figuratively) in the audaciously Afrocentric avant-garde sci-fi flick Space Is the Place (1974) aka Sun Ra & His Intergalactic Arkestra: Space Is the Place directed by cracker TV director/producer John Coney and produced by fellow white cuckold TV producer Jim Newman. The closest thing to a 'negro Lucifer Rising,' Space Is the Place is suavely surreal celluloid racial mysticism of the forward-looking variety that portrays a futuristic fantasy in the apocalyptic racial utopia spirit of The Turner Diaries where a stoic spade messiah played by Sun Ra comes to earth to colonize black America with hypnotic power music and takes its most upstanding citizens to the homeboy planet and where, in the end, earth, as well as all the white devils and Uncle Toms, is totally destroyed. Originally envisioned as a mere 30-minute performance documentary on "The Arkestra" (Ra's musical group) after Sun Ra came to the attention of producer Jim Newman when the musician was teaching a course at the University of California, Berkeley on "The Black Man in the Cosmos" where he promoted thinkers ranging from Russian occultist Madame Blavatsky to black poet Henry Dumas, Space Is the Place eventually evolved into a feature-length narrative film with the help of screenwriter Joshua Smith, although two different films exist day. Writing all of his own lines and dialogue, Sun Ra ultimately rejected the 85-minute director's cut due to what he rightfully perceived as featuring exploitative blaxploitation themes, thus a shorter 60+ minute Ra-approved radical cut of the film was released on VHS missing two sex scenes and a scene with a junky degenerate, among various others. Admittedly, I preferred the decidedly degenerate director's cut as Ra's version of the film seems like a poor black man's puritanical take on Maya Deren's Meshes of the Afternoon (1943) and Steve Arnold's Luminous Procuress (1971) as it lacks the ludicrously lurid and racial-stereotype-charged angle of the longer cut. Indeed, blaxploitation scenes or not, Space Is the Place is still a strikingly singular esoteric black empowerment flick steeped in blood mysticism and radical Afrocentric historical revisionism that combines intentional race-based myth-making akin to National Socialist philosopher Alfred Rosenberg and the collectivist black identity politics of revolutionary pan-African leader Marcus Garvey. Sort of the sci-fi fantasy genre equivalent to the Afrocentric horror flick Ganja & Hess (1973) directed by Bill Gunn and starring Duane Jones of Night of the Living Dead (1968), Space Is the Place is a work that reminds the viewer, despite what the Hebrews, homos, and other assorted cultural Marxist types in Hollywood have to say with their inorganic and culture-distorting films, racially nationalistic cinema is more about love and true culture than hate and soulless cosmopolitanism, consumerism, and other vapid values that are setting the world on a path to self-destruction.

Taking his pseudonymous name from the Egyptian God of the Sun, Space Is the Place features a sort of Aeon of Horus of the Afrocentric persuasion that espouses self-realization, albeit of the racially collectivist as opposed to individualistic self-absorbed and hedonistic sort. Originally a somewhat lowly but locally legendary jazz musician at speakeasies around the time of the Second World War, Sun Ra vanished from the planet in June 1969 while on tour in Europa, ultimately landing on a funky celestial planet with his (musical) crew “The Arkestra.” As for his reasons for heading to outer space, Ra is quite blunt, stating, “We set up a colony for black people here...see what they can do all on their own without any white people there.” With the potent stench of black power in the air, Sun Ra decides to head back to earth to spread his message and recruit new broths for the mother planet, using music as his mad cool medium of galactic transportation. First time-traveling to 1943 Chicago where he used to play piano under the lowly name “Sonny Ray,” Sun Ra confronts his nasty nemesis named ‘The Overseer’ (Ray Johnson)—a kind of black devil who symbolically wears all white, loves white whores, and who is a pimp and ‘psychic vampire’ of sorts that styles himself as a community leader of the negro community but is really just the ‘enemy within’—and the two agree to duel using Afrofuturist tarot cards for the fate of heart and soul of the black race. As Mr. Ra tells a couple black national activists who question whether or not he is ‘real,’ “I’m not real...I’m just like you...you don’t exist in this society. If you did...your people wouldn’t be seeking equal rights. You’re not real...if you were you’d have some status among the nations of the world. So we’re both myths. I do not come to you as a reality. I come to you as the myth because that’s what black people are...myths. I came from a dream that the black man dreamed long ago. I’m actually a presence sent to you by your ancestors. I’m gonna be here until I pick out certain ones of you to take back with me,” thus demonstrating the need for blacks to make their own history and reality and stop living in whitey’s world as second-class citizens.

Upon arriving in Oakland, California, Sun Ra opens a place called the ‘Outer Space Employment Agency,’ where he turns down an Aryan man that worked for NASA with the most bluest of white devil eyes, a slutty white MILF, and a homeless black wino who refuses to work, as the mature Amero-Mandingo metaphysician musician is looking for negroes of upstanding characters and even prefers morally keen ‘ghetto blacks’ to ‘white physicists.’ Meanwhile, two radical young negroes—Bubbles (Jack Baker) and his mulatto friends—are told by the evil Overseer that Sun Ra is a charlatan and a fraud, stating, “The dude wants you to buy his records, you dig?!...He’s not dealing in black magical soul power...He deals in cold cash, you understand?,” but the two young black bucks disagree, stating, “But he hasn’t yet traded his black brethren to the exploitative, racially and culturally co-opted Caucasian power structure.” Sun Ra also faces spiritual trouble when a Svengali-like brotha’ Jimmy Fey (Christopher Brooks)—the cracker-loving minion of the Overseer who is a sort of archetype for the fake Uncle Tom type blacks in the mainstream entertainment industry—coerces the out-of-this-world musician to ‘sell-out’ by doing radio appearances, a music album, and a large concert of biblical performances. On top of that, a duo of honkey hellions working for Nazi NASA begin spying on and plotting to kill the subversive spade Sun Ra. Of course, Ra has the power of Afrofuturist music on his side and believes that most blacks are depressed because, “The people...have no music. That is...in coordination with their spirits...because of this... they are out of tune with the universe. Since they don’t have money...they don’t have anything,” so he naturally decides to give them the gift of music to fight back against the white menace. Just when Bubbles tells his comrade that he thinks Sun Ra has degenerated into a sell-out Uncle Tom, stating “I think this whole big concert business is a byproduct of the Eurasian Occidental conspiracy...he’s been coopted, coauthored, and correlated,” the two Afrocentric revolutionaries spot the two white devils from NASA kidnapping the Afrocentric musician, so they rescue and free him. Not long after, Bubbles gets shot and killed by one of the white NASA dudes while shielding Sun Ra during a botched assassination attempt, but the musician ultimately saves his life by putting him on his spaceship, which will take him to the glamorous intergalactic ghetto. Aside from Bubbles, his friends (a mulatto and a Fat Albert-esque negro), Sun Ra also allows Jimmy Fey’s “black part” to board his spaceship, leaving the evil “white part” of Fey behind to taunt the Overseer. In the end, the most noblest of negroes fly intoouterspace on Sun Ra’s spaceship and planet earth explodes not long after, killing the whole wide white world in the process and thus ultimately securing black domination of the entire universe, thereupon making Space Is the Place easily the greatest and most uncompromising black power sci-fi flick ever made.

As the scatological Semite Norman Mailer wrote regarding the Apollo 11 moon landing and its uniquely Aryan and Faustian character, “the real mission of the Wasp in history was not, say, to create capitalism, or to disseminate Christianity into backward countries...It was to get the U.S. to the moon” and “To wit, he can project himself’extraordinary distances through a narrow path. He’s disciplined, stoical, able to become the instrument of his own will, has extraordinary boldness and daring together with a resolute lack of imagination. He’s profoundly nihilistic. And this nihilism found its perfect expression in the odyssey to the moon—because we went there without knowing why we went,” yet clearly the self-proclaimed “white negro” novelist spoke far too soon and jealously as Space Is the Place demonstrates there is not only a transcendental and spiritual element to space travel, but also that proud national black men would love to do it too, even if whitey was there first. More importantly, the film proves that black Americans can produce idiosyncratic mystic kultur that does not revolve around crude and animalistic sexual habits, 'ill' literacy, nihilistic materialism, and philistine-style hate-for-hate's sake. In fact, the antagonist of Space Is the Place, the Overseer, is a pernicious cultural parasite who enslaves his own people via drugs and addicts, prostitutes his own people for profit, is totally irreligious, and will do anything for a buck or fuck. Like the Aryan operatic "Gesamtkunstwerk" films of proud Prussian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King, Hitler: A Film from Germany), Space Is the Place is a cinematic work that, aside from its humor and classic sci-fi conventions, would be totally inaccessible and misunderstood today in our spiritually vacant and monstrously materialistic times due to its promotion of cultural myths among the respective group the film was made for. Indeed, it may be a total fiction that ancient Egypt was a black civilization, but such grandiose sentiments unify a people, which is a message that Sun Ra more or less tried to spread with Space Is the Place. Pro-black without being matriarchal and black Bolshevik like the cinematic works of Senegalese auteur Ousmane Sembène (Xala, Camp de Thiaroye) meets primitive science fiction cinema of the outmoded old school sort, Space Is the Place ultimately did for avant-garde Afrofuturist jazz what Slava Tsukerman's cult classic Liquid Sky (1982) did for punk/New Wave/electroclash, thus making it a must-see for fans of the music subgenre (I must admit I am not one of them). With curiously comical and highly quotable quotes like, "looks like we got another dead nigger on our hands," "we'll put a coon on the moon by June," and "sometimes when you lose you win," Space Is the Place is accidental satire at its best. Rather ironically shot concurrently on the same sound-stage as the porn chic classic Behind the Green Door (1972) considering Sun Ra's disciplined monk-like ways (the Afrofuturist did not cut out the sex scenes out of his cut of the film for nothing!), Space Is the Place is not only a celluloid space oddity, but a cultural oddity that is more thematically relevant today than when it was when released nearly four decades ago, especially considering a certain mulatto president of the United States of America bears a certain resemblance to the villain of the film as a false messiah leading not only blacks, but also whites and every other race, on a path of total destruction.

John Cook (1979)

While West Germany went through an exciting era during the 1970s that managed to grab both critical and commercial attention around the world, the nation's sister country Austria was going through a somewhat static and generally uneventful period, with directors like Axel Corti (Totstellen, Young Dr. Freud), Maximilian Schell (End of the Game, Tales from the Vienna Woods), Peter Patzak (Parapsycho – Spektrum der Angst, Kassbach – Ein Portrait), Wilhelm Pellert (Jesus von Ottakring), and Valie Export (Mann & Frau & Animal, Invisible Adversaries) being some of the more notably, but hardly world famous, directors of that period in Schluchterscheisser cinema history. Oddly, one of the most important yet now largely forgotten figures of Austrian cinema during the 1970s, John Cook (1935–2001), was not Austrian at all but a Canadian fashion photographer turned minimalist filmmaker who was, in his own weird words, “Viennese by choice.” Despite being ‘Viennese by choice,’ Cook had no problem callously criticizing his adopted city as demonstrated by the snide remark, “To live in Vienna, you either have to be cynical or stupid,” which is made by a ‘character’ (aka alter-ego) played and penned by the auteur in the documentary-like work Langsamer Sommer (1976) aka Slow Summer. Immigrating to Vienna in the late-1960s, Cook made four films (penning four and directing three of those four) between 1972 and 1982 before becoming fed up with the increasingly bureaucratic film subsidy system in Austria and decided to leave Vienna and filmmaking altogether. Arguably, the most accomplished work Cook ever directed was his social realist work Schwitzkasten (1978) aka Clinch aka Sweat Box, which would be the director's first attempt at directing a ‘proper’ film (Cook's first work, Ich Schaff's Einfach Nimmer (1973) aka I Just Can't Go On, was a documentary that was only about 50 minutes and his second work, Langsamer Sommer (1976) aka Slow Summer, was shot on black-and-white Super 8 flick stock) that actually had a discernible storyline and would be seen by people aside from cineastes and leftist activists. Once again focusing on the Austrian Lumpenproletariat like his previous works but adapted from the novel Das Froschfest written by Communist Party of Austria member Helmut Zenker, Schwitzkasten certainly suffers from the sort of cardboard ‘workers’ message typical of works by German New Cinema directors of that same era, but thankfully it has a genuine sort of warmth and empathy for the loser ‘everyman’ protagonist that films by pedantic avant-gardists like Jean-Mari Straub, Helke Sander, Alexander Kluge, and related cappuccino commies lack.

Hermann Holub (Hermann Juranek) is a short blond man in his 30s suffering from ‘Weltschmerz’, although being an uneducated fellow, he probably does not know what that word means, and like a character from a Fassbinder flick, he has a hard time expressing his pain, so he is prone to acting out irrationally and violently when he gets angry. Like most of his friends, Hermann is a lazy 'gardener' who works for the local Viennese city council and with his equally crude and unsophisticated co-employees, he verbally sexually assaults any half-attractive woman that might pass his animal-like gaze. When Hermann and his friends start aggressively hitting on a Catholic chick who is looking for a rosary that she lost in a park, the devout lady calls them "rotten shitheads" and "calls the wrath of the Lord" on them. Hermann has a part-time girlfriend of sorts named Vera Pausinger (Christa Schubert), but that does not stop him from patronizing prostitutes and attempting to screw his friend's girlfriend. One night after making love with his girlfriend, Hermann gets out of bed in the middle of the night and gets dressed, thus making poor Vera cry. When a new engineer's delegate is appointed at Hermann's work, he decides to quit as the new man given the position, Larry Chalupa, "lives up the Engineer's ass," so he gives his friends his farewell by calling them, "idiots" and leaves the lousy position forever. Naturally, as a grown ass old man who still lives with his parents, jobless bum Hermann faces scrutiny from his father (Josef Boselmann), who demands he seek new employment asap. Hermann goes to his only successful friend for help, a pretentious prick writer named Ehrlich (Franz Schuh), but his friend is a stuck up scumbag that pretends to allow him to have sex with one of his concubines, but when the unemployed gardener goes to seal the carnal deal and is half-undressed, the novelist barges in, cock blocks him, and demands he go pick up something for him at the store (rather wisely, Hermann opts for using the money on a prostitute).

When Hermann's semi-successful brother (Werner Juranek), who walks around arrogantly in a fancy black suit and narcissistically admires himself while incessantly combing his hair in front of the mirror, confronts him about his lack of employment (Hermann openly admits he is not even bothering to look for new work), stating, "You're just a lazy dog. Look at me. There. Look at me. A suit made to measure. Our boss had them made for us because this year we've sold much more than last year. All you've got to be nowadays is efficient, that's all," the down-and-out ex-gardener loses his cool and leaves the family home abruptly. Unfortunately for him, the brother follows Hermann outside and unloads a couple bullets out of his handgun, which angers the hapless gardener so much that he brutally beats his bro to a bloody pulp. Naturally, Hermann passively attempts to evade justice by hiding at his girlfriend Vera's flat, but the cops soon pick him up and he spends some time in jail due to a minor prior conviction until his court date arrives, where he is given 3 years probation. Desperate for somewhere to live aside from his parents' cramped home, Hermann convinces Vera to let him move in and on the same night she reveals that she has been impregnated by another man, and since she is 33 and is afraid she might not ever again get the chance to have kids due to her age, she decides to keep the kid. Taking an underpaying job as a delivery driver, Hermann ironically ends up working with his enemy Larry Chalupa again, but they both agree that when it comes to working that an “Aryan calm is called for” and that there should be “no Jewish hassle.” When Vera jokes about getting a divorce despite the fact she is not married, Hermann states, “let’s first get married and then divorced.” Indeed, Hermann and Vera end up getting married despite the fact that bride is pregnant with the child of another man. Since they do not have enough witnesses for the marriage (neither Hermann’s father nor brother bother to attend the wedding), Hermann pays an unwitting Canadian who does not speak German a couple bucks to act as witness at the wedding, which takes place at a sterile court house. In the end, Hermann’s female boss Frau Gretl (Johanna Froidl) congratulates the newlyweds after the wedding with a bouquet of flowers, but she ultimately fills the lovers with a bit of unease after discussing her own failed marriage. Vera tells Hermann’s boss that when it comes to money that, “We’ll manage, somehow,” to which Gretl soundly replies, “Well, you must. If only for the child’s sake.” In the final scene, Hermann stands outside all by his lonesome while surrounded by beers. Undoubtedly, the viewer gets a foreboding feeling while thinking about Hermann and his wife’s future.

Undoubtedly, in its unpretentious gritty proletarian realism, Schwitzkasten is certainly comparable to the works of ‘no bullshit’ German filmmakers like Roland Klick (Büchchen, Supermarkt), Klaus Lemke (Rocker, Arabian Nights), Uwe Frießner (The End of the Rainbow aka Das Ende des Regenbogens, Baby), and Iranian exile Sohrab Shahid Saless (Ordnung aka Order, Utopia). In placing Schwitzkasten in the context of Austrian cinema history, the Museum of Modern Art wrote: “Today, the film is considered one of the few undisputed masterpieces of the New Austrian Cinema: a freewheeling, tender, and strangely humorous portrait of working-class (and out-of-work) lives. At the time, however, Cook’s genial and unpretentious approach was remarked upon only by the most ardent critics, who compared it with that of Eric Rohmer and Jean Eustache.” Personally, I think it says more about the sorry state of post-WWII Austrian cinema than expatriate auteur John Cook’s actual talents as a filmmaker, as Schwitzkasten is certainly nothing new nor original, but a vaguely bright light in a country with a mostly marginal cinema history. Viennese film critic Dominik Kamalzadeh also paid tribute to the film when he wrote of Cook’s film: “Clinch is no longer a formal hybrid but finds its own modus operandi: neorealism, Vienna style. The film is lyrical, but down-to-earth, its tone is precise without crossing the border to the social grotesque as so many Austrian films unfortunately do. And above all: it shows solidarity with the main protagonist without turning him into a poster hero.” Indeed, protagonist Hermann is certainly no hero and definitely not a winner, but a miserable and pathetic man that is like millions of other people in his country and that is exactly what makes a Schwitzkasten a semi-important work. One must also credit John Cook for opening the door for later culturally pessimistic Austrian realists like Ulrich Seidl (Tierische Liebe aka Animal Love) and Michael Glawogger (Das Vaterspiel aka Kill Daddy Good Night, Whores' Glory), whose exceedingly grotesque realism make a film like Schwitzkasten seem like it was made for PBS. That being said, what probably makes Schwitzkasten most disturbing for modern viewers is that it demonstrates that things have only gotten all the more worse since Cook's film was released some 35+ years ago. After all, Schwitzkasten does not feature a single person wearing a turban (let alone a single foreigner from the third world), white single mothers with mulatto babies, rambling crackheads, nor illiterate wiggers. Undoubtedly, you would be hard-pressed to find a young person nowadays like Schwitzkasten protagonist Hermann who is willing to step up and act as the father of a kid that is not his.

John Erick Dowdle (2007)

I used to work for a pseudo-Jewish intellectual boss at a theater. At times, he would escape to "New Yaok" for the term of several days and come back with an all-too forced accent as to accentuate his Jewishness. I recall one of his talks describing how he had breakfast with J.Lo and how he almost made it into the NBA but "fame's not for him". It doesn't take a genius to realize that he's both talking out of his ass and presenting the trait of a habitual liar. And then he began telling us about The Poughkeepsie murders that occurred near his home with the discovery of a tiny library of snuff tapes. I had seen the viral video showing the woman tied to a chair being toyed with by a masked killer. Instantly, I knew the authenticity was not valid but my manager claimed that this was genuine footage (Yes. On YouTube). That was the last I heard about the film The Poughkeepsie Tapes until it finally leaked. I had been waiting too long to see this film. After hearing my manager's rants about how the Poughkeepsie killer terrified his community, I pushed his words aside. Thankfully so, as upon further inspection this entire film is a faux documentary depicting incredible loose events of a serial killer that murdered 8 women.

Apart from the hilarious lies & scandal I had been fed by an inane egomaniac, The Poughkeepsie Tapes fares up pretty well to other serial killer incarnates of the present. The intent to procure your attention with graphic over-edited imagery is a valiant effort on behalf of the creators of this alternate universe. The presented statistic of there being 30 active serial killers in America is curiously not as intimidating as the numbers should allow. I find that the country we live in is a relatively secure area, that is, until a personal incident allows for paranoia to seep in, blurring the illusion all the while. The composition of this documentary is many interview scenes that appear "over budgeted" and often trash the build up of intensity. The other scenes are the reason why you'd be viewing this film in the first place; the sweet chocolate center - the killer's tapes. From featuring brutal acts of dehumanization and a master & slave relationship that spirals into an absolutely depressing fictional case of Stockholm syndrome, these scenes don't disappoint but allow for the fluff of the film to stand out like a sore thumb alleviating any melodrama this film pursues.

The Poughkeepsie Tapes has had a long journey ahead of it for quite some time. When I first became employed at the theater over a year ago, we had rotting trailers for that film in a bin. Using basic mathematics, it's quite clear that this film has been delayed for quite some time. Maybe not as bad as "Duke Nukem For-ever" but the gap in dates is still partially substantial. Now that The Poughkeepsie Tapes is released in some form to the public, is it worth a viewing? It's hard to classify this film. The entertainment value doesn't strike me much but it was noble in its vain quest to find an audience. I wouldn't go out of my way to view this. You can find the highlight scenes on YouTube and it would spare you over an hour of police drama.

QUARANTINE

John Erick Dowdle (2008)

A film can only be as good as its experience allows it. I repeated this thought in my head allowing it to work its way through uncharted territory in a vain attempt to gain back what was lost. Reflecting on what I had saw wasn't an easy task as the screams of many haunted my every thought. A friend and I decided that traveling an hour to the nearest Quarantine showing would be a great idea. In the end, the only thing partially satisfying about my film was the lingering thought that I might have been the only one to have seen [Rec] in that audience. The odds of surviving were slim. Directly in front of us was a big stern black couple that reeked of rudeness, flanked from the right was an Urkel suburbanite complete with annoying voice box with 8 different sayings. The worst of these perpetrators were the trailer trash wiggers behind us that seemed excited to loudly exclaim their nullified opinion of every scene. Imagine a Maryland-esque version of Mystery Science Theater 3000 and that's what we experienced. All shock factors and jump scenes were immediately pulled into a reversal as someone in the sold out show was bound to laugh or guffaw. This American presentation of Spanish horror was given no mercy by its ravenous audience. I'd been thinking about Quarantine for a bit. [Rec] was a surprisingly clever film. Taking the feminist hero point, it adds a subversive sexual tension to Ángela that isn't denied. She is a lovely character and fronted by an amazing actress; Manuela Velasco. Quarantine's Jennifer Carpenter is ...meh..When I first heard the news of both a "shot by shot" American remake and a Spanish sequel,, I went into a form of shock. One of these was incredible news while the other left a rotten taste in my mouth. Doesn't take a genius to match the correct answer. When I finally watched Quarantine, I found many substantial differences that isolated many optimum moments and either strengthened the weaknesses or basked in its inability to follow a story without butchering the characters. Manu's character has been helmed by Hostel's Jay Hernandez. This alteration creates a very chivalrous character and turns him into a tag-team pervert duo that doesn't have that macho presence that Manu had. That, and when Manu turns rabid, it produced an absolutely horrifying scene of a raged Manu downstairs look up blasting you into a cacophony of fear. For once being a self-proclaimed exact remake, too much is different here. Sure, it's risky and yeah, I can agree with some changes that work towards making this film more visceral. More gore was added into the film with a charming effect. Bones break and bend which delivers a stomach churning crowd reaction which might have been the only good thing about my experience. I enjoyed watching them suffer. With [Rec] being as grand and fresh as it is and a planned sequel in development, It's easy to disregard Quarantine. Nothing much to see here other than a dull American version with Violence v2.0 downloaded into its mainframe. There's a huge possibility that Angela didn't even die in both films, but I'll leave that up to your imagination to put the pieces together. Quarantine is one of those self-conscious films that refuses to say its own title in dialogue regardless of how natural the word should come in its depicted situation. Lame.

ROLLING THUNDER

John Flynn (1977)

With promises of enlightening me with an all-American experience in vengeance and psychological trauma, Rolling Thunder pulls no strings in acquiring instant favoritism of all the films I've seen from the seventies. Starring William Devane and Tommy Lee Jones, Rolling Thunder is an absolute treat as I was expecting a trashy exploitative motion picture of relentless gun play in the name of several fallen souls. Could you imagine my surprise when the central whore character was martyred early on in front of the withdrawn Major Charles Rane by Brain-scan director John Flynn? Besides from the pivotal and expected scene of retaliation towards his attackers, Rolling Thunder encompasses many American influences of hatred and gender prejudiced cinema. What is slowly unraveled over the entirety of the film is what First Blood could have been had the character of Rambo been written into the cold-blooded killer that he is in the Morrel novel of the same name and not the pacifistic pussy that Hollywood made him out to be.

A prime element of Rolling Thunder in which dazzled me is the emotional crucifixion of the military spouse. Upon returning home from a POW camp after 7 long years of torture, Major Charles Rane greets his wife and child with eyes that reflect calm but hide a seething inferno behind his glasses. After the initial car ride home, a police officer named Cliff expresses curious sentiments with Major Rane's wife which is later revealed to be her secret lover since his capture. Instead of a sordid affair continuing or trying to patch up the relationship that died in the camp along with Major Rane, the creature known as Janet promptly tells him that Cliff and her are currently engaged and she refuses to call off their ceremonial coupling. After he silently sits on the same couch that he once comfortably sat on some years earlier, Janet becomes enraged with his dead eyes, goading him to present displeasure, as this is where the sluts derive their complacent ego from. This very facet of spousal abandonment reflects an age-old consistency not just in film, but based in and around reality as well.

If you've paid attention to film then you will not be surprised with examples of a classic case involving a callous woman removing a significant male from their life only to replace it with the next best thing, preferably with a steady source of income. a prime example of women objectifying men while shrieking vice versa: Dear John, Pearl Harbor, and Cast Away (a misdemeanor in this case). These are but a small handful which fit the bill. In contrast, the films in which men refuse to give up their idea of a sanctified reunion mark the same redundancy seen in cinema and the "real world." The biggest myth commonly regarded as fact is that women are more romantic than men. This assumption is ridiculous and insulting as one only can wonder how being needy has replaced the definition of true romance, giving it all and investing into a commitment and not shoes and blouses. But yet again, no one ever really expected anything from a military spouse other than trust, which very few reciprocate. Rolling Thunder just goes to show that "forever" means nothing to a whore. Hell, even B-rate international action films like Wasabi tend to the real nature of men with Jean Reno's insistence to pine over a woman who left him many years back. Fear X is another shining example; Nicholas Winding Refn's tale of a man refusing to let go of his past in hopes for new love and maintains a debilitating obsession with a woman who is now dead. To spring into more recent territory, John Carpenter's Prince of Darkness is another film concealing an obsessive love that is unknown to women.

Also present are the themes of S&M and homoerotic tidbits scattered throughout. For example, the Texan constantly referring to Major Rane as a "macho motherfucker" and the slow spreading of lips to reveal teeth as the pain rolls right off of Rane's shell. Major Charles Rane refers to himself as "dead" throughout Rolling Thunder. Apparently all of his persona was squeezed out of him, forcefully, by the gooks that had him imprisoned for those seven years. In one of the most iconic scenes out of the film, Major Rane convinces Cliff to rope his hands behind his back and "pull it up in the air like you're gonna take me clear on up to the ceiling." After Cliff reveals to be noticeably troubled, Charles grunts "Higher, man, Higher! Till you hear the bones start to crack". This thesis on shell-of-a-man is frequently at work within Rolling Thunder. While one man would demonstrate a compromised behavioral approach to vengeance, Charles Rane doesn't seem to seek vengeance on a count of his family, rather, it's the appropriate, human, thing to do. One can argue that this very same notion is applied to Showtime's Dexter as Dexter Morgan was taught to flaunt emotion and actualize trigger responses. To quote Major Rane, "you learn to love the rope. That's how you beat them."

With a screenplay written by Taxi Driver's Paul Schrader, also director of Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters, Rolling Thunder dons many similarities with Taxi Driver as the common denominator is social decay and an unwillingness to the world. I've always been disinterested in the angst chronicles - the mediums that encapsulate post-Vietnam Americana and the "War = home" that near every film of this era is guilty of portraying. Better yet, Rolling Thunder, while taking the slogan of such, avoids making it a highlight of the film and would rather focus on annihilating Mexicans with merciless glee. In a later scene, my favorite, Charles Rane reunites with fellow soldier/prisoner Johnny Vohden (Tommy Lee Jones) and tells him simply that he found who killed his son. Saying nothing more, Vohden replies that he will get his gear with a smile on his face and a purpose about him. Collecting his Winchester Model 1897 Shotgun, Vohden quietly bags it as they prepare to head out to a whorehouse located in Juarez. Upon arriving, both Vohden and Rane make it very clear that they both don't care who is injured in the upcoming shootout. Every Mexican character that was encountered in Rolling Thunder proves to be perverted degenerates; the sleazy folk who still hang onto the ideal of a Reconquista Mexican Texas. It's in this violent philosophy of exterminating the various Mestizo cockroaches that Rolling Thunder becomes one of the few films that wrap around the American virtues of crushing the weak and undeserving.

Rolling Thunder is single-handedly one of the most contemptuous movie experiences I've sat through as of recent. The silent pain barely expressed by Charles Rane is among one of the more powerful performances I've seen in a film. Rolling Thunder also aspires to be more classy than the average revenge film from the seventies. From the sheer violence left to the imagination and to Rane's unwillingness to love anything but his son, what is evident in Rolling Thunder is its fascinating portrait of an empty dead man. Major Charles Rane is a thousand times deeper than Paul Kersey and with his prosthetic hook-hand, more iconic as well. This Vietnam volume also ends perfectly, with Denny Brooks' "San Antone" filling the debris coated hallway as the two heroes return from another battlefield, one of which seems to purify and recapture the essence of life these soldiers had lost. Rolling Thunder is a goddamn masterpiece of wit and brutality and should be seen by every citizen of the U.S.A. This film will make you a better American, guaranteed.

John Flynn (1994)

Before Edward Furlong was arrested for “freeing lobsters” at a seafood restaurant, he was a rad young fellow. Brainscan is a perfect example of what Furlong could do right when he was still young enough to have a sassy girl attitude. The film follows a lonely teenager (played by Furlong) as he kills people under hypnosis via computer game. Brainscan brings up the ethical question, “Do horror films and video games really promote murder?” I would hope so. Brainscan made it’s debut when America was still under the spell of grunge. Judging from the wardrobe of the actors and the film’s music (I.e. Mudhoney), Brainscan was meant to cater to the teenage audience of that time period. Edward Furlong’s character seems a hybrid of “grunge” and “metal” style. As any good American teenager, he has posters of Iron Maiden’s Eddie plastered all over his walls. If only heavy metal had influenced as many murderers as the degenerate human garbage rappers have. A wiseass demon looking guy by the name of “Trickster” is the main character of the computer game Brainscan. This exaggerated widows peak sporting fellow spends his time trying to influence teenagers to kill. Trickster is charismatic and cunning, yet out of date. Edward Furlong is enraged with Trickster for “tricking” him into one murder after another. Only the son of Satan would influence a teenager to play violent videogames. But since when did the son of Satan dress so gothic yet colorfully gay? The young videogame playing fellow of Brainscan also has his eyes on a young lady. He watches her through his window like Jimmy Stewart in Rear Window. The difference between Furlong and Stewart’s “peeping tom” behavior is that I could actually see Stewart involved in such voyeuristic activities. The young lady makes sure to flaunt her breasts at the budding Edward Furlong. I am sure many American teenage girls of that time period would have done the same thing. Brainscan is a fun film that offers a little bit of horror and a little bit of laughs with a nice music jingle. For anyone that enjoys vintage video games and tacky early 90’s style, Brainscan is the film to watch. The film has an out of place dreamlike quality throughout, and that is something I can appreciate. Most horror comedies (or whatever you want to call them) are complete filth, but Brainscan is a diamond in vomit.

John G. Avildsen (1970)

Undoubtedly, if the white working-class and white bourgeois united as an anti-leftist, anti-globalist collective, they would take America back virtually instantaneously and start reversing its decided degeneration via multicultural third worldization and Hebraic Hollywoodization and such a sweet scenario seemed to be deranged Jewish screenwriter Henry Wexler's worst nightmare, at least if one were to judge by his screenplay for Joe (1970) directed by Hollywood 'for hire' hack John G. Avildsen (Rocky, The Karate Kid). Joe is the ultra cynical celluloid tale of a corporate executive Wasp type who accidentally kills his daughter's drug dealer boyfriend and subsequently joins up with a blue collar bro named Joe of the seemingly Irish-American sort who respects the banal bourgeois boob for wasting a piece of hippie shit. Penned by a man whose own daughter described him as "a brilliant man with an IQ of 180 and a Russian-Jewish immigrant drive" and that was "capable of emptying a 13th-floor hotel room on to the street and announcing on a plane his intention to kill President Nixon, inciting the FBI to arrest him. Horrified by her son's mental illness and consumed with guilt and shame, my grandmother committed suicide," Joe is certainly a work scripted by a man who simultaneously hates the Anglo-Saxon bourgeois in a Trotskyite fashion, but also the white working-class in a rich kosher capitalist manner, which he portrays as being nothing short of barbaric and vulgar, especially in regard to the film's 'white and proud' title character. Quite similar to Paul Schrader's Hardcore (1979) in its depiction of members of an older and more self-restrained generation entering the decidedly debauched counter-culture realm of the boobtube-brainwashed baby boomers—the first generation brought up on and brainwashed by TV and arguably the most spoiled generation in all of human history, hence their self-righteous need to turn America, as well as the Occident, into the corrupt cosmopolitan cesspool it is today—Joe shows the needlessly nasty results of what happens when a concerned and respectable father attempts to save his daughter from a life of drug addiction, loveless sex, and borderline poverty. Of course, before he knows it, at least according to Wexler's Hebraic logic, the traditional western man's hippie hating also leads to nigger and faggot hatred, as well as coldblooded murder of the totally nonsensical sort. Luckily, Joe backfired on its crazy kosher creators because instead of working to vilify the anti-liberal anti-heroes as intended by Wexler, many viewers saw the flower child killers of the film as all-American heroes, so much so that star Peter Boyle was rather perturbed to witness audience members cheering on his character's homicidal liquidation of an entire house of hedonistic hippies. Starring Susan Sarandon in her debut role as a naïve hippie poser who takes too much speed and has a 'bad trip' at a grocery store, Joe, despite the political campaign of its director and screenwriter, is indubitably a therapeutic piece of accidentally politically incorrect carnage that delivers shotgun bullets to the degeneration generation of peace and love and other phony self-absorbed pseudo-cultural swill.

Despite growing up comfortably in a rather wealthy family from New York's Upper East Side, brainwashed would-be-beatnik broad Melissa (Susan Sarandon) has decided of her own free will to live in near destitution with her heroin addicted, drug dealer boyfriend, who is such a good boyfriend that he virtually enslaves his girlfriend with a candy bowl full of drugs. After taking a little too much speed, Melissa has an unbecoming public freak out at a mom-and-pop grocery store and is hospitalized, which infuriates her father, stoic Bill Compton (Dennis Patrick), who goes to his daughter's ghetto apartment to collect her stuff and ultimately runs into the jaded junky boyfriend, thus resulting in a confrontation that thankfully leaves one dirty hippie dead. Bill gathers up the drugs he finds laying around the apartment and goes to a blue collar bar where he runs into American 'everyman' Joe Curran (Peter Boyle), a crudely charismatic working-class mick fellow who loves to rant about his sheer and utter hatred for fags, queers, nigs, social workers, and the young in general. As far as gentleman Joe is concerned, "The niggers, the niggers are gettin' all da money. Why work, tell me, why the fuck work, when you can screw, have babies, an' get paid for it?" and "And the kids, the white kids. They're worse than the niggers. Money don't mean nothin' to them. Motocycles, Marijuana. Five dollar records." Undoubtedly in a state of shock after wasting a "skinny fucker" of a deadbeat junky, Bill mentions to random stranger Joe that he killed one of these very same worthless hippies that he was ranting about (Joe even goes as far as saying "I'd love to kill one" in regard to beatnik bastards), which rather impresses the brazen blue collar worker, thus striking a 'stranger than fiction' bond between the two born class enemies. Sticking it to bourgeois failure Marx (a man who never worked a day in his life and lived off the generosity of others) and his bogus materialistic theories for introducing class war to the Occident, Bill and Joe ultimately become friends united in their hatred for hippies and disgust from aberrant America's cultural decline. While Bill likes the working-class man's 'no bullshit' attitude due to his own bourgeois friend's impenetrable phoniness, Joe respects the somewhat uptight advertising executive for doing what he always wanted to do: trampling on a flower child without mercy. After overhearing her mother and father talking, Melissa learns that Bill killed her bum boy toy and naturally she runs away and goes missing. Using the drugs he stole from his daughter's apartment, Bill meets up with Joe and they start searching for Melissa, eventually partying with a group of hippies that they hope will lead them to the runaway drama queen. Both Bill and Joe smoke some weed out of a hookah and even have sex with some hot hippie hoes, but things take a turn for the worse when two of the male hippies of the group steal the older men's wallets and drugs. Joe smacks the shit out of a loose hippie chick he just screwed and learns the beatnik crooks are probably staying at a commune in upstate New York. Arriving with shotguns blazing, Joe wastes some hippie pigs and Bill regrettably joins in, bringing carnage to the commune and the literal and allegorical death of a nuclear family.

Undoubtedly, screenwriter Henry Wexler's Hebraic hatred for traditional Anglo-America and everything it represents reaches its peak at the conclusion of Joe when a wealthy white father unwittingly puts bullet holes in his own daughter in a scene that is nothing short of a Judeo-bolshevik wet dream. In the end, one cannot help but think Wexler had a self-satisfied smirk on his semi-Asiatic face while penning Joe knowing, as portrayed in the film, that no matter how much love and good intentions a father may have had for his children, they had already been lost to a lifetime's worth of brainwashing and spiritual degeneration via Talmudic television and addiction to sex, drugs, and rock n roll, hence why daughter Melissa states "What are you gonna do, kill me too?" Indeed, only after her death is Melissa truly 'saved' from a life of senseless sacrilege and STD-ridden sensuality, as the girl essentially died in the spiritual sense the day she bought into the unholy gospel of counter-culture garbage. Interestingly, Melissa's druggy boyfriend, who is a hack degenerate artist who seems to be a pathetic parody of Warhol Superstar Joe Dallesandro characters in the "Paul Morrissey Trilogy," especially Flesh (1968) and Trash (1970), which are sardonic satires of the toilet culture that is liberalism and the related counter-culture movements. It has been my experience that most viewers of Joe empathize with the anti-hippie plight of Joe and Bill, and it's highly doubtful that a film like this could be made in Hollywood today. After all, nothing strikes fear in the dead souls of the heebs of Hollywood and the mainstream media more than the idea of the white working-class and bourgeois uniting against the metaphysical disease of leftist degeneracy and taking back America by force. Nowadays, with a good portion of young proletarian whites being shameless wiggers who wish they were poor Negroes and the white upper-classes being contaminated with slavish liberalism, philo-Semitism, and hyper-hedonism, the unlikely alliance of the Euro-American blue collar and white collar in Joe seems all the more ridiculous, but as a famous assassinated colored man once so eloquently stated, "I have a dream" and some dreams, like Joe's, are greater and more righteous than others.

SCARCE

John Geddes (2008)

Scarce is another attack on the rural backwoods area. To fit even snugger to the bored sub-genre, this "hillbilly" is a cannibalistic man with depravities galore. Scarce is a sucker punch aimed with the intent of stealing the thunder left from better, more successful films like Calvaire. Calvaire gave me chills from its barbaric displayed violence towards "faggots" and the Freaks moment of an unabashed barroom masquerade. The constant scenes of the "evil honky" staring off with dagger eyes gets tedious and irritating. The somber progressive orchestral score kicks in and your eyes roll. Just as the film displays city folk as the weaker species, Scarce transcends into a level of stupidity much sooner than expected. I thought to myself "sure, this film is going to be bad" but the novelty of independent film making wears thin and this film has reached its peak. It's not until the evil countryman dons a metal mask with an accomplice that the film reaches any momentum. Pointless flashbacks and annoying attempts at shock factor are not successful in any form. Scarce is a film depicting the death of college kids with spiky hair as well as the symbolic death of what was once juicy rural terror. Only several entries in this over-drawn genre were fresh - Calvaire, Texas Chainsaw Massacre, and Deliverance. Although I did enjoy 2001 Maniacs, that was strictly a comedy. What Fargo did with the snow pasted over with blood, Scarce attempts to recreate with a scene scored by what sounds to be the orchestral sounds of Diablo II. When I ponder about the inconveniences of watching Scarce, the idea of them being labeled "snowboarders" without any indication comes to mind. The idea reminds me of that Devon Sawa film Extreme Ops, but with more gay and less snowboarding. The prime antagonist is a yellow-teethed "old fashioned" man who randomly fits the word "fuck" in his sentences which ruins any cognitive idea that these are simple people. Like Hostel, the idea is twisted into a "business" of sorts. Every accent in this film is horrible enough to make your teeth grind. I promise you won't have an endearing experience with this picture. By the hour mark, I found myself wholly depressed at the thought of another grueling half an hour of insipid "frostbitten terror". The ending was already spoiled by the plot summary. When you say "the fate of three snowboarders", God knows that you are going to kill them off before you even have the chance to predict this awfully predictable film. The beginning pales in comparison to the ending, as the ending actually builds up and maintains savagery and sadism. The only ways you'd appreciate this film is being a cinema masochist or having a god-awful taste in horror.

John Greyson (1988)

If a gay man afflicted with high-functioning autism and an unhealthy proclivity towards bath salts, Adderall, and Microsoft Paint directed a thematically and aesthetically frenzied, freeform video-art, butt-dart project about his love of semen-covered toilet bowls in tearooms and tiny Chinese men and a loathing for law and order and historical reality, it would probably resemble Canadian aberosexual auteur John Greyson's decidedly demented debut feature-length Pissoir (1988) aka Urinal; a curiously confused attack on Toronto police for their crack-down on heated homo sex in public restrooms that is simultaneously a work of homoerotic historical fantasy fiction, queer rights documentary, and excessively eccentric cinematic essay. Like a mystifying mix between Frank Ripplloh's Taxi zum Klo (1980), Ulrike Ottinger's Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press, and Rosa von Praunheim's Anita – Tänze des Lasters (1987) aka Anita: Dances of Vice, minus the perverse Teutonic persuasion and anything resembling professional production values, Urinal is a discombobulating and unconventional work of unrivaled neo-Uranian unbalance, hermetic homophile psychobabble, hysterical gay activism, and an unofficial 'outing' of various unvocal and ambiguously gay artists/intellectuals figures of the early 20th century. Needless to say, despite its determined agenda to the contrary, Urinal does a great disservice to debauched dick-suckers everywhere as it portrays homosexuals as hyper-horny whores who do anything to hump and/or be humped, including the risk of exhibiting such bestial and deplorable deeds in front of minors, so naturally Greyson's morally gray work makes for an unintentionally and idiosyncratically mirthful experience.

In an interview in the book The View From Here: Conversations with Gay and Lesbian Filmmakers (2007) written by Montreal-based film critic Matthew Hays, Urinal auteur John Greyson stated the following about his first fecal feature: "The film is a response to emerging theories of sexuality from the 1970s. The shadow of Foucault hangs heavily over that piece, his expansive notion of social history being vital to understanding the social construction of a particular phenomenon. Thus, we dug up these six very unwilling, not openly gay, activist figures from our past—like Sergei Eisenstein and Yukio Mishima—to deliver various forms of discourse on the phenomenon of sexuality and public toilets...The wonderful thing about Urinal was that I didn't have a clue what I was doing. I just went in and did it, going where angels fear to tread. If I'd know what I was getting myself into, I'm not sure I would have run with it." Considering French philosopher Michel Foucault was a sadomasochistic sodomite and arguably, a sociopath that was infected with AIDS who intentionally squirted his virulent juices into unknowing twinks' gaping holes while engaging in leather-fag orgies, thereupon spreading ‘gay cancer’ around to countless unsuspecting frog fellows and that director John Greyson would go on to direct a fiend-friendly film such as Zero Patience (1993) – a merry and seemingly maniacal musical about AIDS with a subplot about a rather ridiculous romance between famed British explorer Sir Richard Francis Burton and a ghost – one has no reason to suspect that Urinal is a rational expression of so-called “LGBT” activism, but then again, that is why the film is so irresistibly beguiling and unwittingly frolicsome as a sort of conspicuously convoluted expression of pathological perversity and queer quackery of the most delightfully deranged kind. In short, I cannot think of a single anti-gay activist or crusading Christian evangelist who has created a more detrimental depiction of homosexuality than those portrayed in Greyson’s Urinal, but of course, with ‘cissexual’-ambivalent works like Tom Kalin’s Swoon (1992), Michael Stock’s Prince in Hell (1993) aka Prinz in Hölleland, Cheryl Dunye’s The Watermelon Woman (1996), A. Hans Scheirl’s Dandy Duft (1998), A Home at the End of the World (2004), and Rosa von Praunheim’s Your Heart in My Head (2005) aka Dein Herz in meinem Hirn, who needs homo-hating hogs like Hagee when you have so many self-destructive auteur filmmakers?!

Beginning on June 28, 1937, Urinal gets started with the title introduction, “...They all began arriving, one after the other on that Friday afternoon. Dorian Gray was first, then Frida Kahlo from Mexico and Langston Hughes, and then Yukio Mishima, all with forged letters of invitation signed with our names, inviting them to some conference or other. When Sergei Eisenstein arrived, we were all in the garden, trying to make the best of it. Frida was painting a portrait of Dorian Gray...” (From the unpublished memoirs of Florence Wyle). Upon arriving at the gardenside location, Eisenstein slaps his fellow sodomite Soviet supporter Langston Hughes a high-five and bisexual unibrow painter Kahlo expresses her severance of ties with Judeo-Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky. Needless to say, Urinal would be a socialist sod’s wet dream had the film not featured bitch-turned-butch Jap novelist/nationalist Yukio Mishima as one of the most important and interesting lead characters. Things start to get notably weirder and nonsensical when the old school artists of the film receive an audio-message dated half a century later on June 28, 1987 declaring “happy lesbian and gay pride day everyone” and apologizing for bringing them to the same location under false pretenses. Apparently, somehow these ‘outstanding’ gay figures of yesteryear are needed to help battle a bugger-based “crisis” where hundreds of gays in Ontario, Canada are being arrested each year by fat fascist pig police offers for publicly sucking cock through bathroom stall glory holes and squatting and defecating on more things than just toilets. Throughout Urinal, each of the six dead gay artists (Sergei Eisenstein, Frances Loring, Yukio Mishima, Florence Wyle, Frida Kahlo, and Langston Hughes) gives a personal video-art report, including such salaciously titled works as A Guided Tour of Toronto’s Hottest Tearooms by Sergei Eisenstein, A Survey of Small Town Washroom Busts in Ontario by Langston Hughes, The Policing of Washroom Sex In Toronto by Florence Wyle, and The Policing of Sexuality In Society by Frida Kahlo. Juxtaposed with farcical fictional footage of the historical homo heroes is footage of candid but strikingly less carnal interviews with real-life public perverts who have been busted for busting loads in public commodes and semen-stain steam-rooms, including an extremely epicene Chinese-Canadian man whose insistence on wearing a variety of retarded masks during the interviews does little to hide his oriental eyes, as well as an unmistakably mundane middle-aged civil servant whose former career centered around watching small children. Of course, whether gay or straight, I doubt any parent would want this tearoom termite to be whacking off in front of their six-year old cub scout in a place specifically designated for the excretion of human waste.

URINAL

Is your washroom breeding Bolsheviks? Probably not, but it is probably spawning STD spreaders or at least one would assume so after watching John Greyson's Urinal; an unbelievably micro-epic undertaking of the insanely unsanitary scatalogical and illogical kind that oftentimes seems like a collection of unrelated aborted film projects due to its daunting and discordant mix of video and film stock, and fantasy fiction and matter-of-fact reality. As a work of gay gladiatorial activism, Urinal is assuredly an abject failure, unless the director's main objective was to offend and obfuscate, but as a postmodern play-on-potty piece of the most uniquely unhinged variety, it certainly warrants a serious viewing by any crackpot cinephile and/or fanatical fan of crude celluloid camp. As a softcore Yukio Mishima junkie myself, I found Urinal to be especially enthralling yet preposterous as I doubt the tragic Japanese novelist would have had a sexual interest in a sorry sod like Sergei Eisenstein, let alone would he have appreciated being characterized by an effete freak with a boyish physique as he is portrayed by a fellow of Filipino (a delicacy of Dahmer and Murnau no doubt, but hardly a preferred pedigree for the master of pen and sword) extraction named David Gonzales, but, then again, that was undoubtedly one of John Greyson's most pressing and personal agendas; demystifying and reinventing the closeted-gay figure to his notably lewd liking. A ludicrously lurid yet at the same time asininely academic excursion into homophilic eso-terrorism, Urinal is indeed a work that must be seen to be believed and I mean that for uncountable reasons, but if you just need one, watch it for the torridly traumatizing toilet humor fun. Featuring condoms being unwrapped over crucifixes, childish chink twinks in flamboyant children's Halloween masks, Dorian Gray as a gay oriental, 'Sir Gay' Eisenstein as a feces-fetishizing bathroom interloper, and Langston Hughes' as a buggerer of revolutionary bolshevik filmmakers, among various other sensually vexing yet strikingly sardonic scenarios, Urinal is indubitably a keen kitsch work that even eclipses the perverted poofery pomposity of Rosa von Praunheim's films, which says a lot considering the German filmmaker has a special affinity for fudge-packing neo-nazis, elderly Eastern German trannies, Jewish socialist sexologist sausage jockeys, and cock-chowing, anal assassin cannibals.

ZERO PATIENCE

John Greyson (1993)

A certain special lady I know used to work for a certain Sicilian-American biomedical researcher who is quite rich and famous for the major contributions he has made to HIV/AIDS research, thereupon making him the target of various unhinged conspiracy theorists and whatnot. When not having his Negro chauffeur drive him around town and creeping out his female assistants with his less than savory stares, the now-elderly little doctor continues to conduct search on the devastating disease that made him famous. His pronounced megalomania and peculiar pomposity aside, I doubt spurring Canadian homo auteur John Greyson (Pissoir aka Urinal, The Law of Enclosures) would have a nice things to say about this man and his research, at least judging by the fairy filmmaker's tragicomic postmodern fantasy-musical Zero Patience (1993); a superlatively splashy and sardonic cinematic work of the pseudo-historical sort that calls into question virtually everything everyone thinks they know about HIV/AIDS. Centering around the ghost of French-Canadian flight attendant Gaëtan Dugas – a homosexual sadist with AIDS who claimed to have had sex with no less than 2,500 sexual partners, thereupon, in many cases, intentionally spreading it all around the world (but most specifically in North America) in the process – Zero Patience debunks the outmoded thesis (proposed in Randy Shilts' 1987 best-seller And the Band Played On) that "Patient Zero" (Dugas) was the first one with the disease in North America. In the film, famed British explorer Sir Richard Francis Burton – who is still alive and well at the antiquated age of 170 due to an "unfortunate encounter" with the "Fountain of Youth" in 1892 – now lives in Vancouver, Canada and works as taxidermist at the Museum of Natural History and decides an extravagant exhibit about Patient Zero/AIDS will make for a most splendid centerpiece. A snobbish closest queen from a proper, pompous Victorian background, Sir Burton has no idea that he is about to fall in love with his STD-ridden ghost of an exhibit, thereupon leading to the most hap-hazard of homoerotic HIV-themed consequences. Featuring literal singing assholes, loony lesbian green monkeys, colorful and flamboyant walk-and-talking STDs, unfriendly gay ghosts, and a lurid love affair between the historically deceased, Zero Patience is one rare gay musical where the descriptive word "gay" is used literally and not necessarily as a negating adjective.

Despite being one of the greatest, if not the greatest, explorer who ever lived as a man that purportedly knew 29 different languages (European, Asian and African), wrote a number of invaluable books on eclectic subjects, unearthed an amazing collection of cultural treasures (including an unexpurgated translation of One Thousand and One Nights aka The Arabian Nights), worked as a captain in the army of the East India Company, and was awarded knighthood for his amazing activities, Sir Richard Francis Burton, also known as "Dick Burton"

(at least in Greyson's film), is no more prestigious than a glorified 'cock-size collector' and "19th Century Sexual Radical" in Zero Patience where he tirelessly works as the Chief Taxidermist at the Toronto Museum of Natural History. Sir Richard Francis Burton (played by John Robinson, who has a strikingly resemblance to director John Greyson) considers 'Patient Zero' (Normand Fauteux) aka Gaëtan Dugas (his real name is never used once in the film) a serial killer of sorts, so he has no problem presenting photoshopped photos to the press of the AIDS victim with Kaposi's sarcoma in preparation for his upcoming AIDS-addled Patient Zero exhibition due to the fact that only a couple "lackluster footnotes" exist on his subject. Part of his Hall of Contagion project – a collection of exhibits that also include "Typhoid Mary" and "Tuskegee syphilis" – Burton hopes that the Patient Zero exhibit will act as the shining piece in a proposed taxidermist masterpiece that may possibly, "restore his reputation as a world-class intellectual." Burton must have really pissed off Zero's pansy phantasm, as the postmortem homo – who is "suspended somewhere between existential limbo and the primordial void" – magically materializes at a homosexual bath house as a gay ghost more under the spell of cock than he ever was during his brief orgy-obsessed lifetime, but unfortunately for him, no one can see him except his new nemesis Richard Francis Burton. Despite his initial repulsion towards the famed explorer, Zero agrees to be in Burton's Patient Zero exhibit if the bodacious Brit agrees to do the inexplicable by making the wholly hysterical and horny homo haunt visible to the rest of the world.

Dismayed by the fact he cannot get laid since no one can see him, nor his wretchedly wild willy, Zero eventually finds himself an unlikely vintage sex partner in the form of sexually-repressed Victorian explorer Sir Richard Francis Burton; a man who once theorized that, "England was too cold for sodomy to occur" so as to appease his anally-retentive countrymen. Canada is not much warmer, but that does not stop Burton from buggering his gay display Zero. Due to his extra-eccentric erotic excursions with the poofster poltergeist, as well as his own scientifically astute research, Burton soon realizes that the whole Patient Zero theory – that a single individual, Gaëtan Dugas aka Patient Zero, introduced HIV/AIDS to North America – is nothing but an urban legend of the totally scientifically dubious sort propelled by journalistic sensationalism as opposed to hard science. After chatting and singing with the awfully angry African green monkey (the animal that supposedly transferred HIV to humans) display at his museum, which magically morphs from an inanimate taxidermied monkey into a dyke Jewess of sorts with a biting sense of sarcasm, Burton also concludes that she, like Zero, is also a carefully selected scapegoat. After all, being a lily-licking lesbian, the monkey could not have possibly spread the disease, especially among bum-bandits into bestiality. Naturally, Burton decides to revamp his Patient Zero exhibit, but he is too late as the media has already started a pernicious propaganda campaign with the gay ghost as its plainly perverse posterboy/playboy.

ZERO PATIENCE

Luckily, ACT UP (AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power), which includes Patient Zero's own mother, ex-gay lover, and former airline colleague named Mary (Dianne Heatherington), crashes the museum like a group of softcore terrorists and proceed to obliterate the Hall of Contagion exhibit. Zero Patience also features a somewhat fractured subplot about a Negro French teacher named George (Richardo Keens-Douglas) – an ex-lover of Zero with AIDS who is going blind and is taking a dubious drug promoted by a big pharmaceutical company to treat his illness – that is also a member of ACT UP. Needless to say, Zero Patience, despite its pro-multicultural and homophile message, is far from politically correct in persuasion.

Despite what one thinks of director John Greyson's sociopolitical message(s) in regard to Zero Patience, one must admit that his central point – that "Patient Zero" was a sleazy sidehow scapegoat of sorts – is ultimately correct, not least of all due to the undeniable fact that Robert Rayford, a black American teenager from Missouri who died in 1969 (but starting experiencing symptoms in 1966) is now considered the earliest confirmed carrier of HIV/AIDS in North America. Although Gaëtan Dugas as "Patient Zero" is portrayed as somewhat of an annoying prick who has a hell of a time keeping his sexual potency and perversity in check, the real-life French-Canadian was much more of a subversive sexual sadist/sociopath who in a manner not unlike French philosopher Michel Foucault (whose writings had a major influence on Greyson's first feature Pissoir aka Urinal) – a HIV-positive sadomasochistic sodomite knowingly and intentionally spread around fatal affliction – once stated, "I've got gay cancer. I'm going to die and so are you" (thus expressing his desire to 'take people with him') so Zero Patience does go as far as presenting an abhorrent overzealous libertine lunatic as some sort of posthumous victim, even if he was not solely responsible for spreading the disease around North America. As John Greyson stated in an interview for the book The View From Here (2007), his main objective with Zero Patience was, "paying tribute in a larger form to what so many video artists, activists, performance artist, and filmmakers were already doing – taking the feistiness of ACT UP and throwing it in the face of the Reagan administration, the pharmaceutical companies, and the homophobic public. Zero Patience was inspired by my involvement in AIDS Action Now in Toronto in the late '80s, and was really about taking those activist techniques of humor and irreverence and applying them to the scapegoating that was going on. The film was meant to play very much like the anti-And the Band Played On...author Randy Shilts constructed the narrative around a very sexy subplot – the demonization of Air Canada flight attendant Gaëtan Dugas as a queer vampire – in the interests of making it as bestseller." Indeed, while it is quite easy to deduce that Dugas was a "queer vampire" of sorts due to his own wicked words and aberrant actions, Zero Patience does offer some provocative food for thought of the frenziedly farcical sort that proves audacious auteur John Greyson is not only a masterful cinematic propagandist of the heretical homo persuasion, thereupon making him the "Rosa von Praunheim of Canada," but also a studied student of homophile history as he has proven time and time again, with his avant-garde AIDS musical being arguably his greatest artistic accomplishment. Of course, I guess one should not expect anything less from a flaming fairy of a filmmaker with zero patience for those that probe and penalize his pansies pals.

UN©UT
UN©UT

John Greyson (1997)

Long before being described by Hebraic Canadian film producer Robert Lantos (eXiſtenZ, Barney's Version) as, to paraphrase, a “fasciſt, ſtormtrooper, apartheid ſupporter, homophobic anti-Semitic terroriſt regime ſupporter” and as someone, “whose fasciſt agenda is to impose their views on others” due to his withdrawing his documentary ſhort Covered (2009) from the Toronto International Film Feſtival (TIFF) feſtival to proteſt the feſtival's preliminary City-to-City Spotlight on the city of Tel Aviv, Israel because of the Gaza War and the expansion of ſettlements, Toronto-based John Greyson was already proving to be a bad goy with the release of his feature-length film Un©ut (1997); a gentle agitprop piece of poſitively perverse cinema that makes its caſe againſt circumciſion, cenſorſhip, and copyright laws, as well as pointing at the political impotence of cuckold and closet-queen Pierre Trudeau (the 15th Prime Miniſter of Canada from April 20, 1968 to June 4, 1979, and again from March 3, 1980 to June 30, 1984) with a bit of goofy yet grotesque Michael Jackson-mania thrown in for good meaſure. Part-documentary, part-docudrama, part-cinema-essay, part-sardonic-surrealiſt-satire and all flamingly gay with a ſuperficially ſordid ſubplot featuring a bizarre buggerer love triangle to boot, Un©ut is an outlandiſh odyssey of the obſcenely unclasiſiable ſort that makes for one of the moſt ambitious, if not afflicting, independent pomo homo ſociopolitical projects ever aſſembled. Like a diſtinctly diſconcerting marriage of miſfits between Nickelodeon SNICK ſhows and PBS' Reading Rainbow episodes from the early-1990s with the films of ſweet-and-sour Sapphic miſchling auteſſeſ Ulrike Ottinger (Freak Orlando, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia) and Byzantine British buttboy Derek Jarman (Sebaſtiane, The Laſt of England), Un©ut is a ſeemingly unexpurgated expreſſion of Canadian auteſſeſ John Greyson's grating gray matter that – much like his previous works Piſſoir (1988) aka Urinal and Zero Patience (1993) – forces the viewer to partake in the filmmaker's ferine yet frolicſomely framed fetiſhes and oftentimes prepoſterouſly yet poſitively penetrating political propaganda. That being ſaid, what makes Un©ut eſpecially effective, preeminently as a work of filmic art, is that Greyson offers a full-force aſſault of downright diacritic, if not periodically deluded, viſion with a film that ſpits bittersweet, vehement venom at the viewer. In ſhort, Un©ut reminds the viewer why ſanitized sodomite Hollywood films like Far from Heaven (2002) and Brokeback Mountain (2005) are made, because Greyson does not play nice but he certainly plays for keeps.

Originally intending to realize Un©ut as a mere 20-minute-length ſhort film and focusing ſolely on circumciſion and Pierre Trudeau, Greyson's original ſcript was rejected by the Canadian Film centre and he reacted by creating The Making of Monſter (1991) – a muſical ſhort that was in part inſpired by the filmmaker's reading of works by German marxist poet/playwright Bertolt Brecht and various far-left Frankfurt School theorists, as well as abstaining from creating Norman Jewison-esque “feel-good liberal” works – thereupon leaving his campy cock-cutting flick in limbo for a number of years. To paraphrase, Greyson himself described the original script for Un©ut as “not all that good,” so luckily his temporary misfortune during pre-production worked for the better. A feature-length flick that dabbles in homoerotic ‘anti-Semitism,’ a mixed-medium aesthetic featuring the mangling and mongrelization of Michael Jackson songs/portraits, the taunting and terrorism of technocratic copyright police, and photoshopping of vintage nude photos of Dutch and Mestizo twinks, among various other intensely and insanely idiosyncratic aesthetic and thematic ingredients, Un©ut is an aberrant audio-visual experience that is not soon to be forgotten by the viewer; whether one wants to or not. Centering around three central characters, Peter Cort (Matthew Ferguson) – an extremely effete researcher writing on a book on circumcision tentatively titled The Psychosexual Meanings of Circumcision and The Foreskin, Peter Koosens (Michael Achtman) – Cort’s ½ Jewish typist assistant who has an unhealthy obsession with Pierre Trudeau, and Peter Denham (Damon D’Oliveira) – a hack video artist who directs works featuring deranged Jackson Five song remixes. On top of the petty problems the three perverted Peters face with their rather ridiculous romance, they ultimately encounter aesthetic terrorism from the state after they are arrested by an ogre-like operatic police officer for copyright infringement, brought to trial that is set to an excruciating rendition of La Habanera, and sent to a farm-side bootcamp – no doubt a deeply distressing nightmare for any full-fledged vagitarian – where they are forced to binge eat McDonalds Big Macs and fries, defecate aside one another in barnyard stables, and sleep in open fields like cattle. Somewhat disharmoniously juxtaposed with the narrative melodrama of the three individual peculiar Petes is documentary footage of various real-life artists discussing their problems with copyright issues and stock footage of Trudeau acting like a jolly queen. Needless to say – with its inclusion of an edited photo of MJ with a bushy beaver and bosoms (apparently taken from the 82nd contestant in the 1984 “Miss Nude World” contest) and uncountable images of cut and uncut cocks of all lengths and girths – Un©ut seems to be an unabashedly uncensored work as advertised in the film’s pun-ridden title.

What makes Un©ut especially diverting and bizarrely controversial is Greyson’s attack on the Talmudic traditions of the Jewish Brisk, most notably in a scene where the character Peter Cort nonchalantly reads the following excerpt from his book-in-progress: “The ritual of the Jewish Brisk is likewise permeated with homoeroticism.” During this matter-of-factly stated yet strikingly side-splitting scene, pedomorphic boy poindexter cites how during the Jewish religious male circumcision ceremony of ‘mezizah,’ the infant-ravaging Rebbe sucks the blood off of the almost-kosher baby cock with his mouth after removing the foreskin.

UN@UT

Cort also remarks about how certain seemingly homo Hebrews grab each other's mangled members and ritualistically recite "take hold of my shaft, my circumcision" in tribute to another bugger-like Brisk tradition. Considering director Greyson's recent anti-Israeli action in the past couple of years, including his membership in the "Queers Against Israeli Apartheid" group, his participation in the Freedom Flotilla II (a peaceful flotilla that was designed to break the maritime blockade of the Gaza Strip by Israel by sailing to Gaza on 5 July 2011 that ultimately never took place), and his withdrawing of his own works at film festivals tied with the Jewish state, it is quite doubtful that unlike many artists of his particular pedigree, he is far from a full-fledged Philo-Semite of the gregarious, groveling sort, which is quite a noble sentiment to have in a nation that has partially criminalized freedom of speech (Section 13(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act) especially for certain circumcised Canadians. As stated in Un@ut, around 85% of American infant boys are circumcised each year at a cost of 1/2 a billion dollars (in 1997) for supposedly hygienic purposes in a nation that has the largest Judaic population in the world (despite only making up 2.2% of the general population as of 2008). That being said, one would not be far off to argue that the peculiar phenomenon of male genital mutilation in the United States of America makes for a great, if not particularly perturbing, metaphor.

Albeit an acutely awry, at times tawdry and annoying (Greyson's incessant inclusion of bizarre communication between characters via silent finger-tapping on various flat surfaces, as if to mimic typing on a typewriter – a thoroughly beaten-to-death and aggravating feature of the film that appears while the characters are engaging in everything from effeminately flirting to fighting), and fortuitously aesthetically dissonant film, Greyson's Un@ut is also a sophisticated piece of sociopolitically-conscious camp that dares to go where few other filmmakers, especially gay cultural marxist Canadians have the audacity to tread. A virtual gay Guy Maddin genre-bending homophilic flick, Un@ut makes for an especially significant entry in Greyson's filmography and probably the only quirky queer flick that would be of educational value to heterosexual couples expecting a baby boy.

SHAFT IN AFRICA

John Guillermin (1973)

Shaft in Africa brings to life the beneficial idea of sending an ethnic man back to his country of origin and in the process, creates an all-around awkward environment that leaks moments of a self-loathing African-American. Now, normally I don't consider the phrase African-American but in John Shaft's case, I beg to differ. Baring in mind the Afrocentric culture around John Shaft further explained in quirky novels with such tenacious titles as Shaft among the Jews, I found the set-up of this film to be competitive brilliance. While I adore the classic film that started it all, Shaft had a clumsily structured narrative that had the suaveness, the characters, and the sex machine in action, but the ending had too much faith in nothing and suffered from being severely anti-climactic. To my surprise, I noticed something very peculiar about Shaft in Africa and the presentation. Upon hitting "Play" on the DVD menu, I encountered the typical MGM logo with Leo the Lion but underneath the banner was a Blackface caricature of a Pickaninny Negro. I had never really paid much mind to these snipes beginning in every film. Merely a coincidence? I fear not. After perusing through categories of Metro-Goldwin-Mayer films and animated cartoons of the 40s, I found that 1/3rd of every animated MGM production had racially "charged" representations of Uncle Tom's. For a company known for faux-minstrel animated toons, they brazenly slapped their culturally defining show piece on the logo. For better or worse, this is a significant piece of probable coincidence that really aids the temperament of Shaft in Africa and John Shaft's cool cat attitude.

The plot is simple, pulpy, and utterly fantastic. After getting punched out and drugged, John Shaft finds himself being forced into helping a group of Africans (and their inane traditions) break apart an Africa-to-Europe slavery ring. Along for the ride is a dog, a Big Buck bodyguard, and a "drop-dead accomplice" who happens to be a princess of the Manta tribe. In a humorous scene of the super-suave nature of John Shaft, he instantly charms a princess into propositioning sex. She warns him softly that come February, in a couple months, she will enter "chela" which she will undergo a clitoridectomy. His response bordered a flabbergasted "what the fuck?!" and flashed a side of John Shaft we've never seen - a self-loathing African-American. Throughout the picture, you will see John Shaft doubt even his own culture as he questions motives, traditions, and the hostile, ignorant nature of his brethren. When asked if he could carry "a piece," they handed him a stick. The street-smart detective was suddenly cast out of his comfortably hazardous environment into the almost-dystopian landscape occupied by brutish savages. Shaft in Africa puts "the Brother man in his Motherland" but against everyone's better judgment, Shaft isn't too enthused to suckle on his "mother's" bosom. Shaft in Africa stands still as one of the greatest blaxploitation entries to ever surprise the hell out of white folks. Armed with a stick doubling as a camera and urban survivalist techniques not including jive-talking, John Shaft turns a sequel with low expectations basing itself off an idea of a Negro Bond into a frivolous foray into euphemisms and the idea of a self-deprecating Tom that refuses to embrace his upbringing. While not being born in Africa, most would beg to see that Africa is the motherland of John Shaft but his cold remarks suggest otherwise. John Shaft holsters many weapons but the most lethal is his contempt for Africa. I don't entirely blame him, I despise the hellhole too. Perhaps I'm being insensitive but it seems that John Shaft shares similar views on his "mothering land." For that matter, It's almost a shame that the Shaft television series was canceled after only seven episodes. While Shaft connoisseurs loathed the property, It would have been nice to see the concept fully fleshed before being aborted. Shaft in Africa remains one of the most surprising gems to have come out of a classic license. For a series compromised of putting-on Whitey and his ways, It's refreshing to see the blow returned to the African kind. I can imagine this film having Blacks tucking their tails between their legs upon exiting the theater.

FEAST II: SLOPPY SECONDS

John Gulager (2008)

Feast was an admirable horror attempt. It thrilled audiences and was a remarkable horror satire armed with quick character title cards that made the film seem like more of a game than anything. In what I imagined to be a theatrical release due to the wildly popular original film, Feast II was released DTV which halts any real imagination this film could have had. Instead of having a crisp take on the continuance of these creatures, what we get is sheltered and dull. Feast II isn't the film that fans have been craving. This disappointed me the most. I could handle the fact that the plot revolves around a lesbian butch biker gang from hell that seeks to avenge a fallen comrade that was explicitly betrayed in the first film, but the fact that this film goes all out and pulls no effort in attempting to make this film differ from the first is beyond any amount of disappointment I could guarantee. The films highlights are one and few. A very politically incorrect scene of a baby getting eaten is present, but the sheer fact that they use this a lure for humor is what shows me the size of this filmmakers balls. Many characters from the original film return if only for a brief second. This causes the film to lose coherency as a character is reintroduced to have a title card flashed, brief music, and his death that should have been notarized in the previous film. Feast II also features something abysmal on its on level; an ending which offers no compromise. You never make a film that ends itself on a high note, then make a sequel to that only to cut it off with entirely too many questions unanswered. Another sequel won't be worth it if it's spent on flashbacks and its trademark title cards. For leverage towards its fan base, the lovely female Feast II co-stars lose their clothes for an "experiment" which leaves lovely ladies armed with weapons in the nude. One of the few high points of this film. Feast II is indeed a piece of sloppy second film making. When Feast II isn't trying to go over top of being over the top, It can form an entertaining horror experience but the fact that they thought it was clever to put every form of oddity and taboo into an average running time film just states something about how little of an attention span these film makers of new-wave horror have. Feast II isn't anything near what I wanted it to be. For shame.

FEAST III: THE HAPPY FINISH

John Gulager (2009)

Allow me to speculatively reminisce for a second. I happen to adore the first Feast film; The gooey subversive eroticism, The cameo of Jason Mewes only to have his face removed with razor nails. The first film was exactly this, a prize. It was a winner of Project Greenlight. This in itself is quite an accomplishment. For retrospect and due to my generous nostalgia, allow to relay over the series for you and I. Feast opened with a bar. You were quickly introduced each character without a moments delay. Spoofy title cards were broadcast amongst us. Some of us chuckled quietly, some of us paraded about the originality of the film already. The film ended and we were left with many questions but we forgave it. We appreciated the audacity and the cunningness of the feature. A storm was brewing suddenly. A sequel was announced. We knew what the cost could be but we pushed forward despite the hazardous conditions. Many agreed to enjoy the film but they were lying, even to themselves. Feast II: Sloppy Seconds was awful, corrosive, and over over-the-top. It featured (and I mean featured as in the only thing spotlighted) midget dicks, exploding entrails, train genitals, razorblade orgies, and every other impossible oddity you can summon up. This is about the time a rumor came about that John Gulager, winner of Project Greenlight 3 and director of Feast, was actually a fraud and the director was show creator Chris Moore. This claim has been alleged on all 3 of the Project Greenlight films. Meanwhile, fans wait eagerly for the closing chapter and to figure out where these creatures come from. No one could have seen what was next. Feast 3: The Happy Finish came all too soon. From the release of 2 & 3, one should easily be able to assess that no creative force was put behind either as they are churned out as fast as Pulse sequels. The jump from the hyperkinetic directing style of Feast to Feast II is highly noticeable. It's vantages like these that almost affirm the rumors into something malleable and venomous. Feast III picks up with the gang led by the Biker Queen into the sewers. The instant you turn the film on, you will be marauded by this = random decapitations, annoying title cards, expletive vocabulary's, rehashing's of the last film's events, tits, and every character of the last film, promised to live, dying horrible, violent, subsequent deaths at the hands of unimaginable freak accidents. That brings me to my first point. It isn't clever anymore. It isn't inventive or funny. If you're reading this, John Gulager - Die. Feast III is still that film that generates "Witty" name cards explaining the characters with interlaced pop culture injections that smirk aloud as you glance over them. The fact that Gulager takes anyone over 18 as a child comes round as pretty fucking offensive. These oddball traits mean nothing to the cast other than to take up screen space and to waste time with pointless reading. Every character is then dead and the bulk of the characters are going to venture without harm for the next 30-40 minutes until the next

"hero" enters. Imagine if Final Destination 4 opened with 5 out of 8 characters dying within the first five minutes. Exactly. Feast III is an absolute monstrosity supposed to be running strong but falls flat rather soon. A part of me longed to care for the movie and upon the entrance of the character "Shitkicker", I felt something towards the film. I said "Finally! Now I can lay trust in the hands of a character". Then he was accidentally shot in the face by a stupid female - Of course. Jokes tend to get stale by code of the stand-up comedian. These laws of common sense apparently do not apply to Mr. Gulag. Feast III lived up to one expectation and one expectation only - a conclusion to a story well drawn out. You will not get this. To spare you the accidental purchase of this disaster, I will spoil the "ending". A giant robot steps on one of the survivors as the old man begs to repopulate earth. I said it, yes. The old man begs to fuck the survivor and witnesses her promptly squashed by an enormous robot/mech. There is no explanation, no closing grace. You will be cheated out of every cent of your purchase and promptly treated with a Elvis mariachi singing a song about how pissed you are due to the still-enigmatic origins of the beasts. Sure, I enjoy absurd film experiments but this is a scientific survey segregating horror fans from DVD buyers. Logic will be discarded for cheap thrills and inevitable disappointment. If you cater to the product, help yourself. I'm just flabbergasted at the ineffectiveness of Whiskey during this masochistic series of unfortunate events. No substance could make this film any better than it is at core. I wouldn't consider this a review, just an incendiary, scorching assault of Feast III: The Happy Finish (Get it!?! LOLLOL)

AMERICAN GOTHIC

John Hough (1987)

Director Carlos Batts had a very interesting idea. He reinterpreted a parody of rural American Life and made it grotesque. Batts saw something different in the painting that not many other people saw. American Gothic attests that. There is no other film that I have seen like American Gothic. Batts, an acclaimed photographer, obviously had a different type of attitude on how to direct a film. American Gothic comes out more as a stream of consciousness collage of images than your standard horror flick. The farmers narration accentuates this dream-like experience. Batts paid a lot of attention to detail as the film proves. He has a photographers eye as the image is first and foremost to everything else. The detail in everything from costume to color redefines the focus of a horror film. American Gothic's lack of plot, which is unnecessary to the film, forces the viewer to have to interpret the film on their own. This is another similarity between American Gothic and still photography. Sound plays an importance in both the films strengths and weaknesses. The voice of the old farmer is one of monotone decay. After hearing his pathetic voice, you can almost sympathize with his malevolent activities. Unfortunately the effect of the old farmers voice is weakened by generic metal music played throughout. It seems as if Carlos Batts was trying to help out one of his friends by adding his bands music to the film. This unsavory music weakens the film as a whole and almost discredits its merit. The old farmers performance in American Gothic does stand out. It is very believable that he is the man in the painting, he plays him well. This old farmer is both a poet and a sadist. Years and years of working on the farm have given this horticulturist many ideas. When he's covered in blood he seems finally complacent with life. His years of blood and sweat have finally met its climax.

With each viewing, American Gothic becomes even more engaging. I still can't decide whether it's a cheap pretentious attempt at surrealist art or inside the mind of a sadist. I hope it's the second, but the films pseudo satanic music continuously stops me from making that decision.

REFLECTIONS IN A GOLDEN EYE

John Huſton (1967)

In the Hollywood Southern Gothic classic Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1958), Paul Newman's character Brick Pollitt expresses his undying love for his deceased friend Skipper over the brazen erotic yearnings of his feisty wife Maggie "the Cat" played by Elizabeth Taylor. Almost ten years later, Marlon Brando, as sexually repressed homophile and military man Maj. Weldon Penderton, would also chose a young man over would-be-Queen Elizabeth in John Huſton's under-rated film Reflections in a Golden Eye (1967); a plentifully peculiar and perverse Southern Gothic work set in a military training camp during the homo-hating 1940s based on the Carson McCullers novel of the same name. As hinted at by its curious title, Reflections in a Golden Eye is an aesthetically magnetic work that shimmers a golden tone (or a "golden haze" as Huſton described it) throughout, but protagonist Weldon Penderton has his gaze on a young recruit's brown-eye; whether he wants to admit it to himself or not. Major Penderton's wife Leonora (Taylor) is a luscious and loose woman who gets her kicks by mocking her husband's pathetic passivity and sexual impotence by forthrightly flaunting her hypnotic naked body and having a steamy love affair with his married friend Lt. Col. Morris Langdon (Brian Keith). Needless to say, Major Penderton is an internally conflicted fellow who wears the sort of fixed stoic mask of deceit that only a seasoned military man of the 1940s could have pulled off. Of course, when the Major sees Pvt. Williams (played by then-newcomer Robert Forster), his unspeakable love interest, riding a white horse while au naturel, he begins to lose his cold-cock cool, thus eventually culminating into a calamitous climax that reminds the viewer why AIDS-ridden S&M leather bars exist. Unfortunately for Mr. Penderton, Williams – who is not exactly the most mentally stable young man – has a fetish for sneaking into Leonora's bedroom and ritualistically inhaling the pussycat pheromones from her panties and lingerie.

Before Brando obtained the lead role in Reflections in a Golden Eye, Elizabeth Taylor's good friend Montgomery Clift was cast to play Maj. Weldon Penderton, but instead died of a much anticipated heart attack before a single frame of film was shot. Lee Marvin was also considered for the role, yet he turned it down, probably because he was too hard-featured and unrepentantly manly, but one can only speculate. Brando – who although masculine in his own right but also a pugnacious pretty boy – was indubitably the right man for the job as further testified by a statement he made in 1976, "Homosexuality is so much in fashion it no longer makes news. Like a large number of men, I, too, have had homosexual experiences and I am not ashamed. I have never paid much attention to what people think about me." Of course, his character in Reflections in a Golden Eye certainly cares about what people think about him, so much so that he rather stay with a woman that unceasingly repels him than become a full-fledged patriotic member of the pink army brotherhood. In terms of theme, aesthetics, and overall atmosphere, Reflections in a Golden Eye is essentially the total antipodean to the ultra-campy comedy The Gay Deceivers (1969); a silly fag romp were two straight friends pretend to be queer lovers so they can avoid being drafted into the military. After initially watching Reflections in a Golden Eye for the first time, it was quite apparent to me as to why the film failed at the box office. On top of featuring diacritic homoerotic themes set in the sort of period and place that most individuals would regard as a man-molding testosterone factory of inborn anti-fagdom, Reflections in a Golden Eye alienated many mainstream viewers due to its puissant gold tint, so much so that the film was subsequently re-released in a normal color format (thankfully, the "golden haze" was later reinstated when the film was released on dvd) so as to appease the typically mundane tastes of unadventurous mainstream filmgoers. Ultimately, Reflections in a Golden Eye is a tragic tale were not a single quandary is resolved, let alone properly addressed, but I guess one cannot expect much optimism from a film where a man unabashedly commits serial adultery against his sick suicidal wife (who cut off her own nipples after having a miscarriage during childbirth) with the spoiled, over-sexed spouse of one of his best friends. Despite its many poignant moments of human despondency, duplicity, and contretemps, Reflections in a Golden Eye has a few instances of (seemingly unintentional) comic relief in the form of an effete Filipino houseboy who has a queer eye for the golden eye as exhibited by his drawing of gold peacock whose ogle acts as a reflection of the world, hence the title of the film.

Reflections in a Golden Eye is very possibly the greatest example of a semi-subconscious bizarre love triangle and one of John Huston's most artistically ambitious and uncompromising efforts, as it is a work that was destined to be a commercial failure due to its terribly taboo themes and iridescent gold imagery. The fact that Mr. Huston made such an audience-antagonistic and emotionally-draining work with an all-star cast featuring Marlon Brando and Elizabeth Taylor only adds to the case for the filmmaker's artistic integrity. At the very worst, Reflections in a Golden Eye is work that eclipses its Southern Gothic predecessors A Streetcar Named Desire (1951), Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1958), and The Fugitive Kind (1959) in terms of ever seething starkness, domestic social dysfunction, and psycho-sexual derangement. Out of all the characters featured in Reflections in a Golden Eye, it is hard to designate which one is the most mentally unsound and abhorrent, but somewhat queerly, Brando's character Weldon Penderton eventually seems to be keenly cognizant of his affliction by the end of the film, even if he blows something other than his load as a result of it. Aside from being a latent homosexual, I think many male viewers, especially older ones, can identify with Penderton's plight and impasse with life. On reflection, it is not the honor and prestige that comes with being a decorated officer that the Major nostalgically ponders on, but his youthful days of impassioned brotherhood as a new recruit. In a sense, Penderton's sexual longings for the stark-naked peeping tom on the horse seem to be a rather perverse way for him to recapture the sprightliness of his long lost salad days. Although expressive in tone and sometimes even phantasmagorical in imagery, Reflections in a Golden Eye is in consummation a very realistic portrayal about self-imposed (and sometimes subconscious) prisons and the self-annihilating misery that such preternatural constructs sow. Next to Sidney Lumet's Equus (1977), you won't find a more penetrating and historic film about hysterical homos and horses than Reflections in a Golden Eye.

WISE BLOOD

John Huston (1979)

It must be a sick joke of sorts for a serious actor to be best known as the voice of a killer doll, but such is the case for eccentric character actor Brad Dourif (Blue Velvet, The Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans); a talented man who always feared being typecast as a player of disturbed and deranged characters, yet made the career mistake of getting involved with the Child's Play horror franchise (with the original 1988 Child's Play being the only film where the actor did more than just providing his voice, acting as Chucky's human progenitor, serial killer Charles Lee Ray). Indeed, although Dourif is rarely known for playing lead roles, especially in famous films, he does play the anomalous anti-hero in John Huston's (but credited as "Jhon Huston") fiercely farcical celluloid 'low comedy' Wise Blood (1979), a relatively faithful adaptation of Flannery O'Connor's 1952 Southern Gothic novel of the same name. Criticized throughout her career for concocting so-called 'grotesque' characters, Wise Blood was a literary work that had this claim leveled at it and Huston's idiosyncratic and iconoclastic film is no different as an ostensibly heretical yet strangely holy work that portrays the American Deep South as a place populated by two people: charlatan Christian preachers of the bastardized protestant persuasion who always have some master scam and the everyday philistine citizens that embrace these con men of Christ. Technically an American-West German production (Der Ketzer or Die Weisheit des Blutes in Krautland and Le Malin in France) and filmed mainly in and around Macon, Georgia, the Deep Fried South featured in Wise Blood is the sort of sordid and unsophisticated degenerate dead civilization that Baltimore anti-Christ/wordsmith H.L. Mencken wrote about where medieval metaphysics is the norm, so certainly things turn strange for a community of unreformed Confederates when a disillusioned ex-G.I. returns to the Bible Belt and radically rebels against his upbringing, thus becoming a nihilistic preacher who starts a 'Church of Truth without Christ' (and without a brick and mortar church) where, "the deaf don't hear, the blind don't see, the lame don't walk, the dumb don't talk, and the dead stay that way," and proudly and petulantly proclaims in a peeved manner, "I don't believe in anything" and that, "sin is a trick on niggers." Of course, being a passionate pessimist and subversive skeptic in "The Sahara of the Bozart" (as Mencken called it) is bound to drive one crazy or so the perturbed protagonist of Wise Blood finds out as he does everything in his means to subconsciously crucify himself.

A man with a very large and in charge chip on his shoulder, Hazel Motes (Brad Dourif) – an ex-soldier who apparently earned the Purple Heart for his service in the Second World War, but is disappointed to discover his family home in Tennessee is abandoned – immediately begins to develop an all-consuming bout of megalomania when he arrives at a small Southern town via train. After a taxi driver remarks that he looks like a preacher due to his 'preacher hat' and curious brand of charisma, Motes 'finds his calling' on the path of the godless as an absurdly agitated and antagonistic anti-Christ proletarian prophet who dedicates his life to discrediting the word of God and his only bastard son. Luckily, Motes does not have to look hard to find his first disciple, Enoch Emory (Dan Shor) – a half-retarded zookeeper who hates and verbally taunts a monkey in the zoo because, "he acts like he thinks he's as good as me or you," – obsessively follows him around upon first meeting him because he, "don't know nobody" and no one will have, "nothin' to with him." Of course, Hazel is not exactly the most handsome nor humble man, so he finds himself sleeping with obese Southern Belles from hell, which result in nightmares about how he misspent his youth as the grandson of a carny huckster preacher (ironically played by life-long atheist, director John Huston). Intelligent yet uneducated and charismatic yet anti-social, mad Motes is on a futile campaign against crooks of Christ that starts with a debunking of pseudo-blind preacher named Asa Hawks' (Harry Dean Stanton) supposed blinding via lime and defiling his bastard daughter Sabbath Lily (Amy Wright) after he moves into the same boarding house in which they live. Of course, Hazel becomes turned off when he discovers that Lily is a lecherous nymphomaniac who was deflowered a long time ago because after concluding that she was born a bastard and would be going to hell as a result, she decided might as well engage in her fair share of sins of the flesh. After Hazel reveals that Hawks did not have enough gall to actually blind himself, he leaves town, thus leaving his daughter Lily in the carnal care of the nihilist prophet. Meanwhile, dullard boy wonder Enoch Emory steals a mummified shrunken dwarf from a display case in a degenerate museum because he is convinced it will make for a stupendous 'baby Jesus-like' prophet icon for Hazel's church. In a scene parodying the famous 'Madonna and Child' icon, Lily cradles the dried up dwarf in her arms as if it is her baby while a blanket is draped over her head, which inflames Hazel, who smashes the mummy to pieces and throws it out the window. When a local conman named Hoover Shoats (Ned Betty) – who initially tries to go into business with the 'Church of Truth without Christ' but the anti-priest (who is not interested in cash but spreading the gospel of the godless) turns him down – starts a rip-off of Hazel's church entitled "The Holy Church of Christ Without Christ" featuring a drunk wino modeled after Hazel as the pseudo-religion's prophet, the young godless preacher is quite enraged, murderously so. One night, Hazel follows the rag-to-riches derelict in his car (which is just like Hazel's) and runs him off the road, orders him to strip, and then violently murders the man by running him over multiple times. Needless to say, Hazel, despite his spiritual iconoclasm, is a 'true believer' and maybe the only truly 'religious' man in town (aside from Enoch). On top of killing a bum and having his beloved car destroyed by a sinister yet hospitable police officer, Hazel becomes withdrawn like a monk and does what Asa Hawks never had the gall to do – blinding himself via lime and living as a self-flagellating sinner, thus discovering ‘humility’ for the first time in his life.

Oddly enough, director John Huston disagreed with the ‘meaning’ of the ending of his own film Wise Blood. While star Brad Dourif and most other viewers of the film tend to agree that unholy heretic Hazel finally “finds God” in the end, albeit in an exceedingly grotesque way, stern atheist John Huston apparently disagreed with this interpretation, but in the end, it is without question that the anti-priest inevitably adopts a life of asceticism and abstinence where all worldly pleasures of the flesh, including the ability to see, are fully revoked in a most unwavering manner. As the now-blind Hazel tells his landlady, “You can’t see,” but he indubitably seems to believe he can as a lapsed nihilist. Of course, anyone who has ever met an atheist ‘true believer’ sort – the type of close-minded individual who genuinely believes they know the truth and has a pathological, almost perverse drive to proselytize to everyone about it, especially happy Christians, because they want everyone to be just as miserable as they are as a godless prophet with the key to the universe – one could argue that John Huston cannot see the world outside the narrow lenses of his orthodox anti-religious religion of self-satisfied atheism, but he surely made a sardonically spiritual film with Wise Blood; a work more holy and theological than his religious epic The Bible: In the Beginning (1966), a cinematic work that depicted the first 22 chapters of the Book of Genesis. Very possibly the only worthwhile ‘Southern Gothic’ film of its time and certainly one of the most overlooked works of John Huston’s long and cinematically fruitful career, especially considering the auteur was already over 70-years-old when he directed it. I guess Huston had some of that ‘Wise Blood’ – an instinctive worldly knowledge and weltanschauung of what direction to take to take in one’s life that does not need spiritual nor emotional guidance – that rhapsodic retard Enoch Emory spoke of, but I am sure the unbelieving atheistic auteur would have fervently denied it.

UNDER THE VOLCANO

While I certainly feel accursed in other ways, I feel quite blessed that I am more or less allergic to alcohol and thus have never succumbed to the distinctly malevolent metaphysical affliction of alcoholism, as I have a feeling that I would drink myself to death if I were a dipsomaniac since I am not the sort of person that does things halfway and would probably prefer to be perpetually drunk than to deal with hangovers and alcohol withdraw. On a more personal level, I have seen friends go from be cerebral and deeply thoughtful individuals to extroverted drunken retards and insufferable human excrement practically overnight as a result of becoming drunks, not to mention the various friends and family members I have know whose childhoods were ruined by disgusting boozier bastards, thus I have a low tolerance for liquid courage fetishism; be it from date-rape-inclined fratboys that rock out to the Dave Matthews Band or schizophrenic negro hobos that get aggressive if you decline to give them the change that they shamelessly beg for whilst polluting urban areas with their bottom-of-the-barrel social parasitism. In fact, I must confess that I absolutely loathe just about everything about alcohol and alcoholics, so naturally a film about a degenerate drunkard has to be pretty damn good for me to be able to even finish watching it, let alone consider it a notable cinematic work. Of course, Barbet Schroeder's Barfly (1987) starring Mickey Rourke as the far-too-handsome alter-ego of perpetually shit-faced Ameri-kraut wordsmith Charles Bukowski is a fun novelty and Marco Ferreri's delectably debauched 'dirty realism' adaptation Storie di ordinaria follia (1981) aka Tales of Ordinary Madness is even better, but both of these films utilize lowlife dark humor as a means to make the rather dejecting material easier to swallow without vomiting in disgust. In a somewhat difference fashion, Bavarian auteur Herbert Achternbusch's darkly yet mirthfully melancholic absurdist comedies like Bierkampf (1977) aka Beer Chase and Das letzte Loch (1981) aka The Last Hole manage to somewhat distance the viewer from the true severity ugliness of kraut carousers, who sometimes seem demonically possessed by drink, by incorporating humor. Undoubtedly, Rainer Werner Fassbinder's early masterpiece Händler der vier Jahreszeiten (1971) aka The Merchant of Four Seasons—a film loosely based on the German auteur's tragic loser uncle—features one of the best and most harrowing depictions of a drunk ever committed to celluloid to the point where it makes the dipsomaniac as portrayed by Robert Stack in the director's mentor Douglas Sirk's Written on the Wind (1956) seem like a bad Jim Carey sketch by comparison. Aside from Fassbinder's flick, I would have to say one of the greatest and most entrancingly devastating depicts of rampant drunkenness is Hollywood maverick John Huston's antepenultimate feature Under the Volcano (1984) starring English actor Albert Finney in arguably the greatest performance of his career as an eloquently erratic drunkard who has not put down the bottle once ever since his much younger and more handsome half-American bastard of a half-brother had a lurid love affair with his gorgeous actress wife. Based on the semi-autobiographical 1947 novel of the same name written by tragic alcohol-addled Englishman(child) Malcolm Lowry, the film has the perfect setting for a cinematic work with a protagonist that has given up on life and is about to die as it takes place in a small Mexican town during the Day of the Dead in 1938 on the eve of the Second World War.

As the lives of savage satirist and fabulist Ambrose Bierce, who completely disappeared while he was in his early 70s after traveling south of the border in 1913 to get first-hand experience of the Mexican Revolution and joining Pancho Villa's army, and junky queer William S. Burroughs, who 'accidentally' killed his second wife during a less than fortuitous game of 'William Tell' while living in Mexico City, clearly demonstrate, Mexico is a place that self-destructive, suicidal, and/or otherwise dysfunctional gringos travel to when they have given up on life and want to gamble with their mortality. Notably Huston's third and final film in a sort of unofficial Mexican trilogy following The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (1948) starring Humphrey Bogart and the director's father Walter Huston and the tastefully trashy black-and-white Tennessee Williams adaptation The Night of the Iguana (1964), Under the Volcano is a tale of exotic and oftentimes eccentric self-obliteration where a cultivated yet spiritually vacant and deracinated Englishman that is quite fond of noble savages learns the hard way that good manners, elegance, and refinement only go so far when you're dealing with a group of people who are not beneath shooting and killing their best amigo during an argument over the prowess of a young matador. Not unlike French libertine poet Arthur Rimbaud, the emotionally perturbed protagonist is a perennial drunken wanderer that is just as every bit rude and crude as he is refined and charismatic, as a sort of fallen spiritual aristocrat and upperclass wino that has decided that self-imposed exile in a strange foreign land that resembles both heaven and hell is the only appropriate existence for a foredoomed fellow like himself with nothing to lose to live. Quite fittingly shot by veteran Mexican cinematographer Gabriel Figueroa, who began his career shooting Sergei M. Eisenstein's unfinished masterpiece ¡Que viva Mexico! (1932)—a film that is also set partly during the Day of the Dead and features a somewhat paganistic portrayal of Mexicans—Under the Volcano is, not unlike various films by Huston's fellow rough old hard-ass Hollywood maverick Sam Peckinpah, especially Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia (1974), a beautifully bleak and nihilistic love letter to a culturally conflicted yet deeply spiritual third world hellhole that the gringo may have officially created and still somewhat controls but ultimately still very much contains the spirit of human-sacrificing Aztecs that once ruled the land. Featuring a spiritually castrated loser who has lost both his soul and purpose in life and thus has replaced them with the devil's mouthwash, Huston's film is an almost sometimes infuriating tragedy that reveals in a somewhat subtle way how it is usually the most broken and hopeless of individuals that fall into the (anti)solacing metaphysical purgatory of alcoholism. In its depiction of a superficially dignified dipsomaniacal degenerate that is driven to drink due to both his incapacity to grieve and stop loving the woman that betrayed him, I think Under the Volcano also says a lot about Huſton and might arguably be his most auteuriſt oriented cinematic work.

As someone that has never really cared for that virtual human booger Bogart and thus have little affection for the filmmaker's early classic films The Maltese Falcon (1941) and The African Queen (1951), I can state without even the slightest degree of hesitation that I believe Huſton directed his greatest, most original, and subversive films during his golden years, which is somewhat ironic considering he assembled some of his most astonishingly horrendous cinematic works during the same exact period. Indeed, his commissioned works like wholly worthless horror-thriller Phobia (1980) and the WWII POW soccer flick Victory (1981) seem like they could have been directed by the worst of Roger Corman-trained-for-hire hacks. According to Orson Welles, who starred in a couple of the Huſton's films (and vice versa), the filmmaker did not even bother to actually direct a number of his films and instead he would coerce someone else to do it for him, or as the Citizen Kane director stated to Henry Jaglom during a conversation featured in the book My Lunches With Orson (2013), "What you don't understand is that he [Huſton] doesn't [direct his films]. He just knows how to make a picture without directing it. He just sits and lets the choreographer or somebody else do it. He stays up and plays poker all night, and when he's shooting, that's when he's resting." Of course, despite his early training as both a fine painter in Paris and writer (notably, German-American iconoclast H. L. Mencken bought two of his early stories for his popular magazine American Mercury), Huſton never considered himself an auteur and virtually all of his greatest films are adaptations of popular novels, including his last three films: Wise Blood (1979), Under the Volcano, and The Dead (1987). Personally, my favorite Huſton film is his almost sadistically sardonic Flannery O'Connor adaptation Wise Blood, which feels like it was directed by a young rebellious anti-Hollywood auteur and not an old golden age studio filmmaker that was in his 70s. Aside from being unquestionably my second favorite Huſton flick, Under the Volcano is the film that I regard as the director's most overtly personal and auteur orientated cinematic work, even if lead actor Albert Finney's true tour-de-force performance is indubitably the most potent and memorable aspect of the entire film (notably, Huſton would state of the actor's performance, "I think it's the finest performance I have ever witnessed, let alone directed"). In fact, Finney's performance is so great as a jovially nihilistic alcoholic (ex)consul that many people seem to believe that the actor was actually thoroughly shit-faced during the filming, which he most certainly was not.

Beginning with an unforgettable chiaroscuro opening sequence that was actually directed by the director's then-21-year-old-son Danny Huston (who went on to be a Hollywood actor and sometimes director and who gave his own Finneyesque tour-de-force performance in Bernard Rose's underrated Tolstoy update Ivansxc (2000)) featuring dancing Day of the Dead skeleton marionettes, the film then cuts to a shot of a volcano juxtaposed with an title reading, "Cuernavaca, Mexico – November 1, 1938 – The Day of the Dead." Despite the fact that he has quit his job as the British consul of the area, protagonist Geoffrey Firmin (Albert Finney) has decided to stay in Mexico as he rather enjoys the scenic region and its equally exotic people, even though most of the locals seem to find him to be quite inexplicable and see him as either a deranged old gringo or a drunken old fool with too much money (to his credit, the protagonist sometimes appeases the many beggars that seem to be always bothering him). While he can barely communicate with many of these individuals in linguistic terms, Geoffrey has some bizarre wordless relationships with rather eccentric folks, including an elderly Indian peasant woman that plays dominoes with an alcoholic chicken (in fact, said elderly Indian peasant woman attempts to save the protagonist's life towards the end of the film, but he fails to take heed of her rather clear warning). The film begins the night before the Day of the Dead and Geoffrey spends most of the evening strolling around in the dark in black sunglasses while a stray dog that he lovingly feeds follows him around town. The only local that Geoffrey has any sort of truly meaningful friendship with that involves actual deep conversations is a charming old Mestizo chap named Dr. Vigil (Ignacio López Tarso), who may be a man of science but he seems to be just as supremely superstitious as every other Mexican in the area. Indeed, when the protagonist states, "Only in Mexico is death an occasion for laughter," Dr. Vigil unwittingly illustrates the innate difference in terms of mindsets between Mexicans and ungodly Anglo-Saxons by replying, "On the Day of the Dead, when their spirits come back to us...the road from heaven must be made – made easy...and not slippery with tears." Of course, being a perpetually drunk nihilist of sorts who is fed up with everything about his life except alcohol, Geoffrey is not exactly your typical Anglo as reflected in remarks like, "How, unless you drink as I do, can you hope to understand the beauty of an old Indian woman playing dominoes with a chicken?" Likewise, when a friend of Dr. Vigil describes the plot of Karl Freund's classic Maurice Renard adaptation Mad Love (1935) aka The Hands of Orlac and how a character in the film named Stephen Orlac becomes extremely upset and sorry that the new hands he received in a transplant are responsible for killing people against his will, Geoffrey remarks with a certain poetic confidence, "There are things for which one cannot apologize," which ultimately prove to be weighty words if considered in the context of the romantic betrayal that his (ex)wife Yvonne (Jacqueline Bisset) and half-brother Hugh (Anthony Andrews) committed against him. Naturally, as the losing party of a bizarre love triangle involving two much younger and more attractive individuals, Geoffrey is consumed with a sort of undying sense of despair that seems to be reminding him that death is not too far away.

On the night before the Day of the Dead when locals are getting good and wasted while hanging up flashy traditional holiday decorations, Geoffrey follows Dr. Vigil to a church and, despite being an innately irreligious chap, prays to Mary the Blessed Virgin that his estranged wife will come back to him, stating during a rare moment where he totally submits to vulnerability, "I'm dying without you. Come back to me, Yvonne," which ultimately prove to be somewhat ironic words considering how the protagonist ends up at the conclusion of the film. In what Dr. Vigil later sincerely describes as a "miracle," Yvonne does indeed return the next day, but it is hardly a happy reunion, as Geoffrey is trapped in a tequila-fueled inward pandemonium and lacks the capacity to embrace her the same way he did when they were once happily married together because he cannot get over the fact that she betrayed him and had a lurid love affair with his little half-brother Hugh, who also seems to be still in love with her as his behavior will demonstrate. Indeed, despite divorcing him in a rather cold and unexpected way without even giving him any forewarning, Yvonne still believes that she is in love with Geoffrey and has yet to even take her wedding ring off, hence why she has traveled all the way to the fiery bowels of Mexico to see and reconcile with him. When Yvonne unexpectedly arrives at a bar where the protagonist is telling a dubious story about how he was the commander of a ship named S.S. Samaritan during World War I and how he received a prestigious medal for capturing an enemy ship, even though he was also court-martialed for ostensibly incinerating seven German officers in a furnace, Geoffrey literally cannot believe his eyes upon seeing her and he only realizes it is really her and not a hallucination after continuing to tell his story and taking a second hard look in what is indubitably a brilliant Hustonian moment that demonstrates that the director has a good grasp of the pathetic perpetual delirium that is the dipsomaniacal mind. While one would expect that a man that prayed to the Mother Mary to bring his estranged wife back would immediately engage in a long, passionate, and otherworldly orgasmic love session with their estranged beloved within minutes, if not seconds, of being reunited with her, Geoffrey is largely evasive and does not do much more than awkwardly kiss her, even though Yvonne gets somewhat aggressive and forces him to get in bed with her. While Geoffrey joins Yvonne in bed, he cannot seem to restore the love and affection he once had for her and soon finds an excuse to exit the room so that he can get even drunker. Needless to say, as the film progresses, Geoffrey only gets all the more intoxicated and, in turn, irrational and belligerent, among other things. Rather unfortunately, like most addicts, Geoffrey has unwittingly accursed his love ones and will ultimately bring them down with him in what is ultimately one of the most tragically anti-romantic endings in cinema history.

It is not clear what the exact circumstances were in regard to the adulterous affair between Yvonne and Hugh, but what is clear is that it left Geoffrey an irreparably broken man who, despite his desire to move on with his life, unfortunately lacks the capacity to forgive both of them. Of course, naturally the viewer strongly suspects that the affair was partly the result of Geoffrey's belligerent drinking. After all, it is much easier to both sexually and emotionally satisfy a woman when you're not drunk off your ass all the time, on top of the fact that the protagonist would have been more aware of the relationship between his wife and brother had he not been perpetually inebriated (indeed, while MTV and shitty Hollywood comedies love linking sex and alcohol together like peas and carrots, alcoholism oftentimes causes sexual impotence in men). Undoubtedly, as a younger and handsomer chap with a talent for music, poetry, and showing off like a fearless jackass, Hugh has certain attractive qualities that his somewhat more docile brother lacks, not to mention the fact that he is much closer in age to Yvonne. In fact, defeatist cynic Geoffrey is more or less the total opposite of Hugh, who has a thirst for life instead of drink and spends much of his time traveling around the world as a communist journalist who fought on the side of the Republicans during the Spanish Civil War (at one point, he lovingly describes a British comrade that perished in the war as, "a communist...approximately the best man I ever met"). While ex-consul Geoffrey is certainly no patriot, let alone a fascist, he is far too wise and cynical to have faith in the big Marxist scam. Naturally, Geoffrey's lack of political idealism does not stop him from mocking a German Attaché named Herr Krausberg (Günter Meisner of Willy Wonka & the Chocolate Factory (1971) and Agustí Villaronga's Tras el cristal (1986) aka In a Glass Cage) by alluding to Nazi murders and screaming in a ballroom full of tons of people, "Corpses must be transported by express. Each of these express corpses...must be accompanied by a first-class passenger. Now, let's supposed, uh, the treaty fails and it's bloody Armageddon. Just thinks of it. Railways stand to make a fortune [...] The whole world will learn to laugh at the sight of stinking cadavers. Oh, ha! Ha! Ha! Bloody, ha! Ha! Ha!" As a favor to his brother, Geoffrey also has the gall to ask Herr Krausberg if his Hitlerite homeboys are responsible for funding a Mexican fascist group called the Sinarquistas (National Synarchist Union). Rather unfortunately, Geoffrey will eventually bump into members of the Sinarquistas at a remote rural bar-cum-brothel on an insanely ill-fated night when he is especially erratic and emotional in his self-annihilating inebriation, henceforth leading to catastrophic consequences for both him and his beloved.

As can be expected from a seemingly forsaken boozier that is still grieving over the fact that his more youthful and positive half-brother defiled his wife, Geoffrey only gets all the more unpredictably unhinged in his drunkenness when brother Hugh randomly shows up at his home no long after Yvonne arrives. In one rather bizarre scene that is just about as uncomfortable as it is comical, especially considering the circumstances, both Yvonne and Hugh strip Geoffrey naked and try to get him to snap out of his drunkenness by forcing him into a shower and shaving him, but they of course have next to nil luck in their active attempt to get the protagonist to figuratively crawl out of his whisky bottle. Still, Geoffrey seems initially excited about roaming around town during the Day of the Dead with his half-bro and high-class whore of a wife, even though he does somewhat cruel things to embarrass them like sarcastically yelling, "Hugh. Where are you? Where can the young pup be? Hugh! An emissary calls. The Consul of Cuckold's Haven. Come and give thou wife a 'welcome back' kiss." Needless to say, Hugh and Yvonne try their best to ignore these obscene drunken outbursts, even if they are no match for the cuckolded (ex)consul's scathingly sardonic wit. Every so often, Geoffrey reveals the sensitive loving man that is hidden behind his mask of deranged dipsomania by randomly stating things like, "No si puede vivir sin amar." When Yvonne asks her (ex)husband to translate what he said, Geoffrey replies in a similarly tender yet nonchalant fashion, "One cannot live without love," but nothing else is said about the matter, as if the characters are shocked by the perturbed protagonist's fleeting moment of pure humanity. Of course, the viewer certainly suspects that Geoffrey means what he says and is not just being a pretentious would-be-poetic conman like his pompous brother, as his current sad state of internal purgatory is a direct result of the fact that his romantic relationship with a woman he still deeply loves has been irreparably despoiled, hence the tragedy of both the character and the story as a whole.

While Hugh is being carried around and practically worshiped by a large crowd of Mexicans after he randomly jumps into a bullfighting pit and proves that, despite being a fairly effete gringo, he has immaculate matador skills, Yvonne seizes the opportunity to attempt to talk Geoffrey into starting over again with her, stating in an extremely impassioned fashion, "Listen, Geoffrey. There's nothing holding us here any longer. We can start again." While Geoffrey initially seems excited about the idea and discusses moving to a rural area in the north where they can socialize with Eskimos and "escape into the wilderness like good old William Blackstone," things eventually get ugly and the protagonist states with a certain stereotypically upper-class British refined seething hatred while his brother is also in their company, "when Brother Hugh comes on a visit...fresh from his heroics in, uh, Spain or wherever...I'll show proper Eskimo hospitality and give him my wife...to bed down with during the cold northern night." At this point, Yvonne breaks down and states while shaking and on the verge of sobbing terribly, "Geoffrey. Geoffrey, I've come...cr-crawling back. What m-more can I do? Let me be your wife," but of course the compulsively cynical protagonist is unimpressed with his lady's fresh tears. When Hugh gets the nerve to ask him, "Geoff, what possesses you?," the protagonist stoically replies, "Sobriety, I'm afraid. Too much moderation. I need drink desperately. Get my balance back." Undoubtedly, this rather revealing scene gets most disturbing when Geoffrey proceeds to ignore both Hugh and Yvonne and has a very irritable conversation with himself while they are both still in his company and attempting to get his attention, thus revealing his hopeless case of internal torment. Indeed, while Yvonne and Hugh watch on with great horror, Geoffrey states to himself, "When has she ever been a wife to me? Where are the children I might have had...that drowned to the rattling – of a thousand douche bags? Hugh, on the threshold of paradise...puffing over her gills like a codfish, veins like a racehorse...prime as a goat, hot as a monkey, salt as a wolf in pride. Let them wallow here in their bliss with my blessing. Hell's...my preference. I choose hell [chuckles] Hell is my natural habitat." After deciding that he will submit to eternal metaphysical misery, Geoffrey leaves his bastard brother and treacherous spouse and heads to a nearby jungle to make his way to an inordinately seedy bar near a volcano where he will fully embrace a sort of backwoods third world hell and ultimately succeed in a manner that he probably never felt was possible before.

At the beginning of the film, Geoffrey states to his friend Dr. Vigil, "No Mescal. I'd go thirsty before drinking Mescal," yet by the end of the film he cannot get enough of the "tequila of the poor." In fact, the protagonist's progressive deterioration is symbolically reflected by the fact that he goes from drinking whisky to tequila to mescal. Of course, as can be expected from an erratic drunkard that is used to drinking more refined alcoholic beverages, the less than merry mestizo favorite of mescal gets Geoffrey into serious trouble that no amount of British charm can get him out of, especially when talking to murderous Mexican thugs that are far from literate in their own indigenous language. Indeed, when the protagonist arrives at a supremely sleazy rural bar named 'El Farolito' where an intense cockfight is going on right outside not far from the entrance door, he is almost immediately bombarded by a supremely slimy scheming dwarf pimp (José René Ruiz aka Rene Ruiz 'Tun-Tun'), who immediately advertises his rather unhealthy and seemingly highly diseased human meat menu, which includes a morbidly obese mestizo beastess, grotesque overweight tranny that makes John Waters' muse Divine seem like Debbie Harry by comparison in terms of sex appeal and overall daintiness, and even a little beaner boy. While Geoffrey initially turns down the humorously sinister dwarf's offer to be a satisfied carnal customer, his mind somewhat changes when he guzzles down a couple shots of mescal and proceeds to read letters from Yvonne that were wrongly delivered to the backwards bar. Indeed, while lurking in the darkness by himself like a mad scientist on the brink of a insidious discovery and readings Yvonne's carefully chosen words, "Geoffrey, why don't you answer me? If you no longer love me and do not want me to come back to you...will you not write and tell me so? It is your silence that frightens me. What has happened to our hearts? Don't we owe it to ourselves...to that self we created apart from us...to try again. I am sorry. I am so sorry," the protagonist eventually becomes bitterly enraged and shouts out loud while in a state of almost demonically possessed contempt, “Not enough. Not enough. It’s not possible. Not... in this world.” At this point, Geoffrey is vulnerable enough to embrace the dwarf’s best looking whore (who is certainly no prize, but she does have nice tits) to a backroom where they have what seems to be fairly lackluster and equally dejecting sex.

After exiting the mescal-marinated Latina’s (anti)love chamber, Geoffrey looks like a defeated man and refuses to pay the mischievous dwarf more money when he dubiously asks him for extra payment, even though the protagonist has already paid both the girl and the midget for what is probably the worst and most distinctly dissatisfying sex of his entire pathetic life. After Geoffrey refuses to pay the extra money, the dwarf seems satisfied enough and then more or less reveals to the protagonist that he has just probably contracted an STD by stating, “Okay, my England Man. No worry for you. Maria, she very clean. If you need doctor, I send all my amigos to this man. Good man doctor. Here. Come on.” Indeed, the midget shocks the protagonist by handing him a business card for a local doctor that specializes in STDs. Unbeknownst to Geoffrey, while he was busy getting laid by a sub-lumpenprole Latina whose vag is probably less sanitary than a gay bathhouse in San Francisco during the early 1980s, Yvonne was standing outside the door crying after the dick-headed dwarf revealed to her in a rather grotesque way that her hubby was being sexually serviced by a supremely skanky spick chick. When Geoffrey dares to insult the degenerate dwarf after he incessantly berates an American bar patron that claims Mozart was responsible for writing the bible, he soon finds himself being bullied by the little man’s Sinarquista comrades. Aside from one of them accusing him of attempting to steal his horses (even though said horse was actually stolen from an Indian that the Sinarquistas killed earlier that day), the clearly racially mongrelized mestizo fascists falsely accuse him of being a spy, Al Capone, Leon Trotsky, and Russian Jew, among other things. Indeed, in broken English, one of the men hilariously asks Geoffrey, “You Bolshevik prick? Anticristo Jew?” Of course, there is only so much one man can take and Geoffrey eventually goes ballistic and begins waving a machete at his murderously malicious Mexican tormentors, thereupon committing the unpardonable act of threatening their much valued machismo prowess in the process. Needless to say, one of the Sinarquista banditos eventually shoots Geoffrey and the others subsequently join. Rather unfortunately, Yvonne becomes fearful when she hears the gunshots while walking through the woods and begins running back to the bar in the rain, only to be instantly killed when she is trampled by her hubby’s killer’s horse. Naturally, when Hugh soon finds Yvonne’s lifeless body, he completely breaks down, thus hinting that he did indeed love his brother’s wife. Meanwhile, Geoffrey humorously states while covered in mud and succumbing to his wounds as rain drops from the sky, “What a...dingy way to die,” thereupon demonstrating that, even in his last dying moments, the protagonist never shed his razor sharp wit.

UNDER THE VOLCANO

Arguably the first and last great cinematic semi-masterpiece in the spirit of the so-called 'Lost Generation,' Under the Volcano certainly provides ample reason as to why director John Huston was once called, "cinema's Ernest Hemingway" by British film magazine editor Ian Freer. Described by screenwriter Guy Gallo (who, for whatever reason, never worked on another film) as a "Tragedy of Failed Intention," the film somewhat cleverly interweaves the failure of a man to reconcile with his estranged wife and little brother with the failure of the West to avoid another World War and, in turn, the death of the British Empire and the overall destruction of the Occident as a whole. In that sense, one could argue that whereas Geoffrey is symbolic self-destructive nihilist Lost Generation types like Harry Crosby and Hart Crane who had completely given up on any semblance of a normal life or a bright future and thus had completely embraced their personal inner demons and succumbed to hedonistic self-obliteration, Hugh is symbolic of the ridiculously naïve and idiotically idealistic leftists like Hemingway, Isadora Duncan, and even Huston himself who somehow absurdly believed that the revamping of the Occident with a communist or far-left systems would result in a sort of immaculate atheist utopia that would save civilization from complete capitulation. Of course, in its depiction of the protagonist being senselessly murdered by Nazi-backed Sinarquista thugs (it should be noted that in real-life, the National Synarchist Union, which still exists today, is a Roman Catholic extreme right group that had little interaction with the Nazis and preached hatred against Anglo-Saxons), Huston's film, like most mainstream and Hollywood sources, uses the Third Reich as a convenient scapegoat for the death of the West, as if the British, the Soviet Union (and communist movements in general), Pan-Slavism, Zionism, and the culturally and economically cuckolding American occupiers did not play crucial roles in destroying every single European empire and turning Europa into the stinking and rotting multi(cult)tural dystopian anti-imperium that it is today, but I digress.

In her less than favorable and even less insightful review of the film, emotionally erratic Jewess Pauline Kael complained regarding Under the Volcano and its male lead, "For the movie to mean anything resembling the novel, we would have to see something of what Firmin—with his psyched-up consciousness—perceives. But all that it does is take a literal approach to the novel, as if it were no more than an account of the final binge of a drunk who becomes suicidally careless and gets himself killed [...] Finney can't help making us aware that he's giving the role more than his best shot—that he's pushing too hard (frequently in closeup), and overusing his facial muscles [...] the movie has a deep-toned flossy and 'artistic' clarity and a peculiarly literary tone—the dialogue doesn't sound like living people talking." Aside from Kael's complete failure to see its references to the Lost Generations and its allusions to the apocalyptic disaster that was the Second World War, she gives the strong impression that she only watched about 15 minutes or so of the film and then had one of her groveling acolytes tell her about what happens during the rest of the movie so that she could write a review and meet a deadline for her column in The New Yorker. Personally, I think filmmaker Rian Johnson, who is certainly no master auteur himself (to his grand discredit, he is the writer and director of the upcoming big budget toy commercial Star Wars: Episode VIII (2017)), demonstrated that he had a much better understanding of the film and Finney's performance than Kael when he stated in Robert K. Elder's The Best Film You've Never Seen (2013), "...[UNDER THE VOLCANO] really does draw you into this feeling; it almost feels like you're sinking into a swamp through the course of watching the film. You really feel yourself sinking deeper and deeper along with Finney into a mire of jealousy and a web of that place where love and loathing intersect." Indeed, it is no surprise that the film was far from a commercial success and is only remembered today by a certain breed of cinephile, as it radiates a certain haunting malignant unease as a less than pleasurable cinematic work where the patently perturbed protagonist tries in vain to mask his spiritual sickness and pangs of Sehnsucht and Weltschmerz with his incessant indulgence of hooch. In other words, Under the Volcano is the closest that Huston ever got to directing something worthy of Ingmar Bergman.

Undoubtedly, while watching Huston's film, I could not help but recall an excerpt from C.G. Jung's imperative text Modern Man in Search of a Soul (1933) where he wrote, "I have a Red Indian friend who is the governor of a pueblo. When we were once speaking confidentially about the white man, he said to me: 'We don't understand the whites; they are always wanting something—always restless—always looking for something. What is it? We don't know. We can't understand them. They have such sharp noses, such thing, cruel lips, such lines in their faces. We think they are all crazy.'" Indeed, Jung's words describe how I assume that the Mexicans felt about the protagonist in Huston's film, as the character more or less exemplifies the restless white man stereotype to an almost transcendental degree, but of course it somewhat makes perfect sense when one considers that he suffers from arguably Faustian man's greatest and most debilitating vice: alcoholism. Notably, Jung believed that chronic dipsomania was largely a spiritual affliction that could only be adequately cured if the addict had a life-changing "vital spiritual experience" that involved the alcoholic replacing the addiction with a strong religious conviction, hence the tendency for ex-addicts to become born-again Christians. Certainly, if there is anything more disturbing than the film's protagonist's alcoholism, it is his all-consuming sense of defeatism and cynicism, hence why he was doomed to die drunk in the mud like a pig. Of course, the worst aspect of this tragic conclusion is that, like many drunks, the protagonist never becomes aware of the fact that he unwittingly dooms the person he loves most to a similarly lowly fate. Surely, I cannot think of another film that is as subtle yet blunt in terms of depicting the decidedly deleterious effects of alcoholism as Under the Volcano, which is thankfully never plagued by any phony preaching or proselytizing. On the other hand, although the film is quite empathetic toward its accursed alcoholic protagonist, I would probably refrain from recommending it to anyone that attends Alcoholics Anonymous meetings.

Ultimately, the general emotional essence of Under the Volcano reminds me of the lyrics from the song “Heartworms” by the British experimental industrial/electronic group Coil: “There’s too much blood in my alcohol (Can’t you get enough to numb me?) [...] There’s too much blood in my heart...In my heart (It’s preventing coagulation)...I’m faithful that this stagnation’s feeding my heartworms...Feeding the heartworms...The demons generally enter in through my ears...It all feels off of me...Ghosts vomit over me, over the old me...This knife’s gonna make some young woman a fine husband.” In fact, Coil singer John Balance—a clearly troubled individual with a dubious fetish for scatology and Crowley—died at the premature age of 42 in late 2004 in a manner that even rivals the film’s protagonist’s senseless demise in terms of being shockingly pathetic, as he perished in a freak accident after getting drunk and falling from a two story balcony at his Weston-super-Mare home that he shared with his longtime lover/band mate Christopherson Peter ‘Sleazy’ Christopherson (who himself died in his sleep under dubious circumstances in Bangkok in late 2010 at the age of 55). Undoubtedly, I see ‘Jhonn’ and ‘Sleazy’ as sort of contemporary kindred spirits to the character Geoffrey Firmin (and its creator Malcolm Lowry) as clearly gifted and cultivated artistic individuals of the perennially-seeking-but-never-finding wanderlust oriented sort that wholly embraced their inner demons and would never dare to defer hedonistic personal gratification, even if it would ultimately come at the hefty price of their lives. Of course, as seemingly coprophiliac Crowleyites and self-described “Born Again Pagans” that created truly grotesque and seemingly pederastic music videos with underage brown boys in Bangkok and were friends with such supreme degenerates like lifelong trust-fund junky William S. Burroughs and megalomaniacal meta-tranny Genesis P-orrIDGE, the Coil members make the film’s protagonist seem like Sir Oswald Mosley by comparison in terms of sheer lack of restraint and are surely symbolic of the malignant social decay that is eating at the soul of what is left of Britannia. Incidentally, Coil has a song entitled “How To Destroy Angels,” which I think is an apt what to describe Geoffrey’s ultimate influence of his beautiful wife. Indeed, while one could argue that Under the Volcano somewhat feels like a sort of left-wing quasi-Spenglerian allegory for the seemingly self-destructively intoxicated old wino that is Western European man, the film is also a potent and nicely nuanced reminder about how Oscar Wilde’s famous line “Yet each man kills the thing he loves” is especially true when it comes to devout disciples of bacchanalian buffoonery.

AN AMERICAN WEREWOLF IN LONDON

John Landis (1981)

While Hollywood is probably inhabited by more odious and degenerate individuals than anywhere else in the world, pseudo-funnyman filmmaker John Landis (The Blues Brothers, Beverly Hills Cop III) is certainly in his own league in terms of distinctive loathsomeness, as a man that seems to have the soul of a psychopathic vaudevillian clown and who always brings abject disgust to my stomach when I hear his grating voice and conspicuously contrived humor in interviews. Aside from being once charged with involuntary manslaughter due to his involvement in the deaths of actor Vic Morrow (the father of Jennifer Jason Leigh) and two prepubescent Chinese girls while directing his segment of Twilight Zone: The Movie (1983) and neglecting to accept culpability, let alone apologize, for his actions (against the advice of various crew members, the director decided to have a helicopter fly a little too close the actors, thereupon resulting in their tragic deaths—a move deemed so scummy that even Steven Spielberg cut ties with him), Landis has carelessly contaminated the world with his patently deplorable personality and his uniquely, aesthetically repugnant and intrinsically impotent films. Indeed, aside from the filmmaker's kindred spirits/kinsmen Friedberg and Seltzer (Epic Movie, Meet the Spartans), when it comes to crude kosher comedy, you can do no worse than the one-note schtick of super schmuck Landis. Of course, as someone who likes to give credit where credit is due, even where my most hated directors are concerned, I have to admit that Landis has directed at least one notable film, An American Werewolf in London (1981), though I probably like it for all the wrong reasons. Originally penned by Landis all the way back in 1969 while he was living in the now-defunct hellhole formerly known as Yugoslavia while working as a production assistant on the goofy WWII satire Kelly's Heroes (1970) and heavily inspired by the director's happenstance encounter with a group of exceedingly superstitious gypsies who were performing rituals on one of their dead comrade's graves so that he would not ostensibly "rise from the grave," An American Werewolf in London (undoubtedly, An American Jewish Werewolf in London would have been a more accurate and fitting title) is a thematically and aesthetically schizophrenic cinematic work that is half classic horror, half sleazy Hebraic humor, though it would probably be a mistake to describe it as a traditional horror-comedy. Oftentimes recognized as Landis' greatest and most personal film to date, this loony and sometimes cartoonish yet also somewhat violent lycanthropic movie is riddled with rather bizarre personal Judaic references from the writer/director, including yid-extermimating Nazi mutant werewolf soldiers and a random and ultimately pointless reference to the fact that the sick Semitic tradition of male circumcision is quite vogue in the United States, where Jewish doctors have largely replaced the Catholic doctors that once dominated the now conspicuously corrupt medical industry. Indeed, one could even interpret the film as an allegory for the supposedly hostile environment a Jew faces when in a foreign land, especially of the Western European sort. Made in the wake of the relative success of Joe Dante's The Howling (1981) and the environmentalist-friendly Whitley Strieber adaptation Wolfen (1981), An American Werewolf in London tends to be regarded as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, lycanthropic movie ever made, yet the film seems to be more about Landis' 'anti-philistine' (aka anti-gentile) sentiments and idiosyncratic blend of post-holocaust paranoia and Philip Roth-esque Shiksa-fetishizing than the standard cinematic wolfman affair.

American Jewish college students David Kessler (David Naughton) and Jack Goodman (Griffin Dunne) have opted for backpacking across North York Moors in North Yorkshire, England as opposed to taking a birthright pilgrimage to their spiritual homeland in Israel like most Hebrews their age and rather symbolically, they arrive in the area in the back of a pickup truck with a bunch of sheep. Like a lot of good Jewish boys, the two friends love to make cynical jokes and insult one another's girlfriends, with David stating of his friend's current love interest, "I think Debbie Klein's a mediocre person with a good body." Of course, as the film will soon reveal, David is more into Nordic chicks as they tend to be more beautiful and less annoying than the typical complaining Jewess. Not long after landing in heather moorland, the two wisecracking Israelites happen upon an ominous local bar called "The Slaughtered Lamb" in a scenario reminiscent of Dracula/Nosferatu where local superstitious hicks express their fears regarding their local phantom(s). After some of the locals discuss how horrendous they think the John Wayne movie The Alamo (1960) is and another local makes a 'racially insensitive joke' involving a Texan throwing a Mexican out of a airplane while yelling "Remember the Alamo!," Jack remarks to David regarding a mysterious 5-pointed pentagram on the pub wall, "Lon Chaney, Jr., in Universal Studios maintained that's the mark of the Wolf Man." Needless to say, when Jack gets the gall to ask the local yokels about the pentagram in the pub in a scene of classic kosher comedic awkwardness, they find themselves no longer welcome, though some of the patrons seem worried about letting the boys walk around on their own on the moors, as it is apparently not a safe place to be at night, especially if you're a stupid American. While David and Jack are warned that they should stay on the road and keep away from the moors, the two Semitic subversives naturally do the exact opposite of what the Aryan hillbillies advise them to do. Before they know it, Jack is mauled to death by a werewolf, which also bites David, though some of the patrons from the bar ultimately save the latter young man from a very certain violent death. After being shot by the peasants, the killer lycanthrope transforms into an unclad, balding middle-aged man and dies, though David temporarily forgets all of this after falling into a coma. Of course, little does David realize that he will be taking his friend Jack's furry killer's place as the only living werewolf in London.

While David is at a hospital recuperating in his bed while unconscious, a slightly overweight nurse named Brenda Bristols (played by porn star Linzi Drew, who starred in a couple Ken Russell films) remarks to her fellow nurse Alex Price (Jenny Agutter) that she "had a look" at the American's member and that she thinks that he is a member of god's chosen tribe. After Alex remarks that circumcision is "common practice now" in the barbaric United States, an assumedly Jewish physician named Dr. J.S. Hirsch (John Woodvine) verbally berates Brenda for discussing the patient's butchered penis. When David finally awakens from his slumber after being unconscious for three weeks, he is told by a humorless and quasi-fascistic cop named Inspector Villiers (Don McKillop) that he and his friend Jack were attacked by an escaped mental patient. While David fails to remember what happened to him and his deceased home-boy Jack, he finds the mental patient story to be quite questionable and he becomes rather enraged, arrogantly asking the cops, "Who are you people? What's going on here? Where's Jack?," as if the men in blue are members of some sort of British neo-Gestapo. While David does not take too kindly to the police, he develops an instant affection for the sweet maternal qualities of nymph-like nurse Alex, who spoon-feeds the young Hebrew some assumedly non-kosher food. Meanwhile, David begins to have a series of bizarre and seemingly unending nightmares-within-nightmares, including an absurd scenario where a group of mutant Aryan Nazi lycanthrope soldiers blitzkrieg their way into his quaint American home and liquidate him and his entire family and proceed to burn the house down. Indeed, it seems director Landis' greatest nightmare is having a SS Einsatzgruppen brigade of undead Teutonic wolfmen drop by his safe American Jewish home and provide him with a rather rude awakening.

Somehow, Jack, who is now a mangled undead corpse, appears in David's hospital room and warns his friend that he, "now walks the earth in limbo until the werewolf's curse is lifted." Indeed, as Jack explains, "The wolf's bloodline must be severed. The last remaining werewolf must be destroyed," with David being the last werewolf in London as a result of being bit by a limey lycanthrope. Ultimately, Jack wants David to commit suicide to lift the curse, but he is not really interested in self-slaughter because he has found a new lady love in the form of sensual nurse Alex. After Jack is discharged from the hospital, Alex invites him to stay with her at her apartment where the two love birds develop a decadent miscegenation-based romance. One night after a full moon appears, David painfully morphs into an exceedingly hairy kosher wolfman in what is easily the most painful lycanthropic transformation in cinema history. Ultimately, David hunts and stalks six degenerate Londoners and finds himself waking up naked in the wolf section of the London Zoo with no recollection of his carnage-filled carnivorous behavior the next day. After failing to get himself intentionally arrested so that he will not kill again (the Hebraic werewolf states to a cop, "Come on. I want you to arrest me, you asshole! Queen Elizabeth is a man! Prince Charles is a faggot! Winston Churchill was full of shit! Shakespeare's French! Fuck! Shit! Cunt! Shit!" in the desperate hope that he will be put behind bars), Jack goes to watch a vintage blue movie at an underground porn theater and he is once again visited by undead Jack, who is now almost completely decayed and who introduces his werewolf friend to some of his victims, who are now also quasi-zombies with a knack for goofy British-flavored comedy. While at the adult theater, David once again transforms into a werewolf and goes on another marvelous murder spree, even biting off authoritarian asshole Inspector Villiers' head in the process. In the end, Werewolf David is cornered by the police in an alley where he is shot and killed after attempting to lunge at the cops. Although Alex tries to save David by expressing her love for him, she is too late.

In his rather intriguing, if not scientifically dubious, work Man Into Wolf: An Anthropological Interpretation of Sadism, Masochism and Lycanthropy (1948), Robert Eisler—a rare Austrian Jewish intellectual who was a Jungian as opposed to a Freudian and who survived internment at both Dachau and Buchenwald concentration camps—argued that werewolf legends were spawned from the belief that certain tribes of men, namely of the carnivorous and war-like sort, began to imitate the predatory nature of wolves and other beasts of prey around the time of the ice age, with Teutonic man being especially prone to lycanthropic proclivities. Eisler also argued the National Socialists were modern descendants of these werewolves who had tapped into their atavistic qualities of the German Volksgeist, writing in Man Into Wolf, “The uncanny word was resuscitated in Germany in the secret terrorist and para-military ‘Organization Werwolf’ after the first World War, and again in Himmler’s rabid speech on the new Volkssturm of 1945 destined to harass ‘like were-wolves’ the allied lines of communication in occupied Germany. It was of were-wolves that Hitler was thinking when he said in his programme for the education of the Hitler Jugend ‘You must be indifferent to pain’. There must be no weakness or tenderness in it. He wanted ‘to see once more in the eyes of a pitiless youth the gleam of pride and independence of the beast of prey’ and to ‘eradicate the thousands of years of human domestication’.” While it is questionable as to whether or not John Landis had read Eisler’s work, it seems indisputable that both men shared the same sort of quasi-mystical line of thought in terms of their perennial enemy: the Europeans, especially of the Germanic sort. Indeed, An American Werewolf in London would have certainly been more effective had it been set in Germany (especially in Lower Saxony in northwestern Germany where the Hermann Löns’ novel Der Wehrwolf (1910), which is where the Nazi resistance group ‘Werwolf’ derived their name, is set), but of course Landis, as a rather proud Jew, was probably too afraid to have made the film in the land of the Teutons. Indeed, as the director described in the featurette John Landis on: An American Werewolf in London regarding his personal identification with the protagonist of the film, “In WEREWOLF, he’s afraid he's losing his mind, and so his dreams have to relate to his own experience, which is why he thinks of his family, where it's safe. And because he's a Jewish-American kid who grew up—He was my age at that time, so he grew up with images of the Nazis.”

Despite its innately darkly comedic tone, director John Landis vehemently denies his film is a horror-comedy, stating at the beginning of An American Werewolf in London: “AMERICAN WEREWOLF IN LONDON is not a comedy. They keep calling it a comedy, it's very funny, I hope. It is not a comedy. We meet these two boys in a truckload of sheep. This is not subtle. You know these boys are dead at the end of the movie. This is not a happy story. This is a horror film, and a pretty classic and traditional one. If anything, WEREWOLF is a throwback. I mean, I was trying to make a contemporary version of an old movie.” Indeed, in a sense, I have to concur with Landis as the film seems to be less of a horror-comedy than a distinctly American Hebraic take on the whole largely Germanic werewolf legend, with the original Universal Monsters The Wolf Man (1941) starring Lon Chaney, Jr. and Claude Rains, which is referenced throughout An American Werewolf in London, being penned by German-bred Hebrew novelist/screenwriter Curt Siodmak, who left Deutschland in 1937 after being rather dismayed by a less than philo-Semitic speech made by the little National Socialist doctor Joseph Goebbels. Rather unfortunately, Landis' film is indeed one of the greatest werewolf films ever made, but of course, there are not exactly a large number of great lycanthrope flicks to choose from. Aside from classic horror flicks and his own trademark quasi-vaudevillian humor, Landis was also heavily influenced by the later works of Spanish surrealist master Luis Buñuel, especially The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie (1972), hence why An American Werewolf in London features a number of dreams within dreams. Of course, as one can expect from any decent horror flick, the film spawned a sequel 16 years later, An American Werewolf in Paris (1997), which in terms of horror and humor is about as potent as poodle excrement, which is largely a result of the fact that Landis had no involvement with the film. While I consider Landis to be a sort of Trotsky of horrendous Hebraic Hollywood humor (indeed, no other Hollywood director has been involved with so many deaths, be they inadvertent or otherwise), I cannot deny the curious staying power of An American Werewolf in London as the world's most paranoid, incriminating, and highly personal Jewish werewolf flick ever made.

MEN IN ORBIT

John Lurie (1979)

When I saw avant-garde jazz musician and all around 'hipster renaissance man' Jim Lurie for the very first time while watching his buddy Jim Jarmusch's classic 'buddy flick' Down by Law (1986) well over a decade ago, my immediate instinctive reaction was to want to kick his ass and knock the perennially 'tragically hip' look off his relatively swarthy face, yet my view of him has changed somewhat since then after seeing him in other roles like the strip club manager/quasi-pimp in Wim Wenders' Paris, Texas (1984) and as the inmate Greg Penders in the tastefully trashy HBO prison series Oz (1997-2003) and now I can actually watch him in films without getting the urge to cause his hospitalization. Indeed, one cannot look at someone as a totally insufferable pretentious twat who would dare to get high on LSD with his comrades and direct a film in his apartment about spaceflight involving the most ludicrously 'lo-fi' of science fiction scenarios. Indeed, for his second (he previously directed a short the same year entitled Hell Is You (1979)) and ultimately last film Men in Orbit (1979)—a largely plot-less and superficially experimental 45-minute anti-sci-fi Arte Povera that seems like it was assembled in a couple hours that might be best described as the Le Voyage dans la lune (1902) aka A Trip to the Moon of the Colab-sponsored No Wave Cinema movement—Lurie boldly went where no self-stylized hipster had gone before by pretending his dilapidated apartment could pass for outer-space, thus making the flick a great double feature with Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982). Hopelessly hipster-esque in its innately ironical portrayal of burnout neo-bohemians as brave and adventurous men of science, the film was shot on Super-8 with an incredibly low but not surprising budget of $500, which Lurie managed to secure via a quite questionable insurance claim he made after staging a phoney robbery in his own apartment where his beloved saxophones were supposedly stolen. Considering that James Bidgood created a kaleidoscopic Uranian universe in his mere apartment for his high-camp queer masterpiece Pink Narcissus (1971) and Apollonian pornographic auteur Wakefield Poole achieved something nearly as grand with his experimental fag fuck flick Bijou (1972) long before Lurie assumedly thought he had a bright idea while stoned to make a film in his flat about a space trip where he and his comrade are actually tripping, Men in Orbit is in no way cinematically revolutionary and is ultimately more plot-less and, in turn, more pointless than the most static of Andy Warhol's mostly botched pre-Morrissey cinematic experiments, yet it still has its charms as a sort of hyper hokey Super-8 abortion that demonstrates the inexplicable lows that those involved in the so-called 'No Wave' scene went to when it came to effortlessly defecating out what is nothing short of true disposable art. In fact, with the original film print being long lost, it was assumed for a period of time that Lurie's celluloid anti-love letter to true Aryan technological supremacy was forever lost, but a fittingly low-quality version of the work was eventually accidentally located at the end of a mislabeled 3/4" U-matic videotape that turned out to be compilation reel for a weekly Manhattan public access TV program called Red Curtain (1979-1983) and later released in 2012 as part of the offbeat sci-fi DVD set Orphans in Space: Forgotten Films From the Final Frontier. Needless to say, Men in Orbit will probably only appeal to Lurie fanboys, No Wave completists, and fanatical fans of lo-fi sci-fi. Admittedly, why I decided to take the plunge and actually watch the film is still somewhat of a mystery to me, but I have a suspicion that it was largely the result of me wanting to confirm my assumption that the No Wave scene was comprised of a collective of the most singularly lazy, decidedly derivative, and uniquely uncreative filmmakers that ever got together and formed a noted filmmaking movement.

In an assumed attempt to rationalize why Men in Orbit is so superlatively shitty and patently pointless, director Lurie stated in the fairly worthwhile documentary Blank City (2010) directed by French documentarian Celine Danhier regarding the film and the curious artistic philosophy of the No Wave movement, "I hid the fact that I knew how to play the saxophone from people...and I would make these movies because nobody was doing what they knew how to do. If you knew how to do something it was like, 'No, no, no...you can't have any technique.' Technique was so hated. The painters were in bands, the musicians were painting or making films. I mean, nobody was doing what they knew how to do." Undoubtedly, if the film has any real discernible technique, it was provided by British filmmaker turned painter James Nares (TV Faces, No Japs at My Funeral), who acted as the cinematographer of the film (notably, Lurie previously appeared as a culture-cripping Roman dandy who proclaims to be Jesus Christ in Nares' sword-and-sandal No Wave epic Rome '78 (1978)). Indeed, if there is any possible indication that Men in Orbit might be set in an atmosphere lacking in gravity like outer-space, it is the result of Nares' oftentimes cockeyed and spastic 'floating camera' technique, which he achieved by standing on a ladder while hovering over Lurie and filmmaker Eric Mitchell as they less than triumphantly trip in their piece of shit makeshift spaceship. In fact, it would probably be more logical to credit Nares as the true director of the film and Lurie as simply the star, 'co-writer' (obviously, the film was completely improvised and had nothing resembling a real physical script), and musical composer. In fact, in an interview conducted by filmmaker and media artist Andrea Callard (who unwittingly "saved" Men in Orbit from being lost forever after sending a tape featuring her own work and Lurie's film in one of the twenty-two boxes of materials she had given to New York University's Fales Library and Special Collections), Lurie would admit, "I probably put more thought into the sound than the camera. And what James Nares did was more than brilliant, achieving a weightless quality by floating the camera, constantly, above us. It was shot in Super 8." On top of that, Lurie more or less holds his co-star Mitchell responsible for forcing him to assemble the anti-NASA vanity piece in the first place, or as he also revealed to Callard, “The driving force behind all of this was Eric Mitchell, who basically demanded that everyone make a film. I doubt much would have happened without his unstoppable and sometimes annoying energy. He had an idea to open a theater using the films that we would all make.” Of course, as the innate incoherence and technical ineptness of Men in Orbit—a work that seems like the director’s half-hearted attempt at making a film with the same structure as the discordant degenerate jazz he composes—surely demonstrates, Lurie is at his best when doing virtually nothing like creating preposterously pretentious facial expressions and poses in his buddy’s films and not when assaulting the art of cinema by laughably attempting to degenerate it into the filmic equivalent of freeform jazz.

Notably, Lurie has become a recluse of sorts over the past decade or so because he has suffered debilitating neurological problems as a result of chronic Lyme disease, which was only further compounded by the fact that he had to leave the rotten Big Apple because an unhinged six-foot-three half-Korean/half-Jew ex-friend named John Perry began stalking him. Of course, one would never suspect this while watching Men in Orbit, which makes Lurie seem like a sort of exceedingly extroverted and buffoonish hipster party boy that loves nothing more than indulging in McDonalds and LSD with his friends. Indeed, the film hardly seems like it was created by an artist of any sort, as it is essentially an absurdly amateurish homevideo that feels like it was created solely to entertain the director’s hipster friends. In terms of political messages, the film makes a fairly passive attempt to mock NASA and mainstream America’s Cold War obsession with the Space Race of 1955 through 1972, though I suspect Lurie would agree with his Hebraic hipster ‘spiritual father’ Norman Mailer when he wrote, “the real mission of the Wasp in history was not, say, to create capitalism, or to disseminate Christianity into backward countries. [...] It was to get the U.S. to the moon” (of course, one could much more easily argue that, as noted at the end of Uncle Adolf’s Bavarian bohemian junky poet mentor Dietrich Eckart’s classic posthumously published pamphlet Der Bolschewismus von Moses bis Lenin: Zwiegespräch zwischen Hitler und mir (1925) aka Bolshevism from Moses to Lenin: Dialogues Between Hitler and Me, the real mission of the Jews in history is to destroy the world via the atom bomb and class warfare, among other things). Probably one of only a handful of people in the world that has the racially schizophrenic distinction of being both half Hebrew and half Welsh, Lurie still manages to look and act quite like his frog buddy Mitchell in Men in Orbit to the point where the viewer might confuse the two while watching the film. Despite being ostensibly brilliant and cultivated neo-beatniks tripping on the supposedly creativity-inspiring drug of LSD (which certainly acted as an inspiration to right-thinking writers like Ernst Jünger and Aldous Huxley), the two would-be-iconoclasts strangely manage to not say a single eloquent, intelligent, or insightful thing during the entire film, thereupon making them seem like the all the more stupid and swarthy fathers of Beavis and Butt-head (of course, at least the latter two are devoid of pretense and have at least a tad bit of good old-fashioned prole charm and wit).

To write a detailed synopsis of Men in Orbit would be patently pointless, as the film is mainly comprised of the two leads, who seem hopelessly in love with one another and their own imagined witticisms, sitting in their big boy toy spacecraft and doing such marvelously mundane things as shaving, slurring words, giggling like preschool girls, pointlessly bickering with 'Mission Command,' and eating greasy McDonalds hamburgers in a slob-like fashion that would most certainly deeply offend modern-day hipsters, who tend to like to wear the coveted 'good guy badge' of partaking in veganism. Admittedly, I think it is most fitting that Lurie and Mitchell's 'inebriation' seems to begin to peak after takeoff and especially once the two vaguely delightful dullards have reached outer-space. When engaging in messy verbal diarrhea while in orbit, the two men spend more time heckling 'Mission Control' (Michael McClard) than admiring the view. In fact, the two autistic astronauts probably spend most of their times giggling like a Mexican schoolgirl whose brother just touched her nipple. In between shoving McDonalds hamburgers down their throats that they have hanging from a wall next to their seats in the cockpit of their spacecraft, Lurie and Mitchell also engage in 'avant-garde shaving' to ostensibly demonstrate they are real men who do real manly things. Of course, no film featuring John Lurie would be complete without the musician playing an instrument in an obscenely obnoxious fashion that is bound to alienate and/or inspire Fremdscham in most viewers. Indeed, while Lurie strums his git-fiddle in a merrily lackluster fashion, Mitchell delivers his most humorous dialogue when he ironically sings, "America is really great...I like Texas, that's where I come from." Via TV monitor, the boys also talk to their discernibly homely 'wives' (played by their then-real-life girlfriends Becky Johnston and Mary Lou Fogarty) in a manner that resembles a couple people plagued with 'trisomy 21' (which would most certainly be a great name for their spacecraft) attempting to flirt with one another. Strangely, after talking to their spouses, Lurie remarks, "I'm not sure if I want to go back or not" and his comrades concurs, replying, "I'm not sure myself either." Towards the end of the film, Lurie states in an overtly tongue-in-cheek fashion while smoking and eating junk food, "We're going to spend these last days of space as relaxed as possible." Unfortunately, Lurie and Mitchell's spacecraft does not pull a Space Shuttle Columbia style disaster in the end, which would have been the perfect way to conclude such a chaotic film.

As Andrea Callard would note in her introduction to her interview with John Lurie in regard to Men in Orbit and how the original print of the film is presumed forever lost, "It was not unusual in the 70s for Super 8mm filmmakers to cut and edit their original footage, handle it many times, then screen the results using unpredictable projectors, without ever making prints or video copies. Keeping track of everything one made did not seem so important at the time. One just moved on to the next compelling idea.” Indeed, Lurie’s film, like many contemporary consumer goods, looks like it was made to be disposed of after only a few uses, yet it somehow lives on today, which is quite possibly the most strange thing about it (it should be noted that a number of classic No Wave films are either completely unavailable or assumed lost). In fact, Lurie seems so proud of the film that he actually went so far as to have it taken down from YouTube after filing a copyright claim, thus more than hinting that he no longer subscribes to the ‘no bullshit’ punk-beatnik ethos of his youth. I can only assume that Lurie is somewhat of a hypocrite as he stated in his somewhat recent interview with Collard regarding Men in Orbit, “It was great back then. It was all energy and ideas. There was no concern for money or credit. It was really pretty wonderful. Very soon after that everything changed for the worse.” Of course, Lurie should probably feel lucky that there are actually foolish people out there like myself who would dare to watch such a remarkably retarded piece of painfully schlocky Super-8 sub-twaddle. Notably, when asked in an interview with Filmmaker Magazine how he came up with the idea to shoot a sci-fi film in his apartment and how it was to act while high on LSD, Lurie got a little bit pissy and stated like a true art fag queen, “How did you come up for the idea is a question that really baffles me. Acting on LSD is not acting at all, is more the capturing of a weird event. Dock Ellis pitched a no hitter once on LSD but it is not something I would recommend to young actors take to improve their performance.” Indeed, “a weird event” is probably a good way to describe Men in Orbit, as it is hard to fathom that such a work was not only made, but is also still championed by the sort of shameless cultural parasites that like hanging out a modern art museums where images of erect horse cocks and unclad bull-dykes with mega-bushes are passed off as art. Considering that musician Arto Lindsay (who not surprisingly played guitar in Lurie and his brother Ethan’s jazz group The Lounge Lizards) once described it as, “one of the best movies ever made on the Lower East Side,” one must just assume that the film is simply one of the most longwinded inside jokes ever made, though I doubt Lurie intended to make it at the expense of both the No Wave scene and himself, which it ultimately accomplishes.

When everything is said and done, Men in Orbit ultimately proves to be a more tolerable experience than Lurie’s Jap-produced proto-reality-TV series Fishing with John (1991), as it is short and almost sweet and thankfully does not feature the Stranger Than Paradise (1984) star engaging in the pointless platitudes that he is arguably best known for. Additionally, the sci-fi featurette benefits from featuring an original quasi-punk and noise soundtrack as opposed to the sort of aesthetically aberrant avant-garde jazz music that one typically expects from proud negrophile Lurie. Indeed, arguably the greatest thing about watching Men in Orbit is that, if one did not know better, the viewer would probably assume that Lurie is the sort of guy that likes drinking cheap beer while watching football and Girls Gone Wild videos as opposed to being a pathologically posturing neo-beatnik whose greatest contribution to film is being a mensch that has the dubious talent of looking simultaneously intricately bitchy yet pretentious in most of his major acting roles. A work that might be best described as a heterosexual hipster low-camp take on science fiction that semi-succeeds in its assumed objective of attempting to make space-travel seem hopelessly banal, the film ultimately seems like it features the most real and vulnerable depiction of Lurie to date, which is no small accomplishment considering that he seems like a fairly impenetrable guy. In that sense, LSD certainly seems to have some benefits, as it forced two of NYC's most perennially posturing and image-obsessed hipsters, Lurie and Mitchell, to take off their carefully constructed masks and do more than leaning against a wall while looking so tragically forlorn like they do in most of their acting roles. A stupendously stupid piece of passive-aggressive NASA-parodying, Men in Orbit is to Stanley Kubrick's masterpiece 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) what the scribblings of Anton LaVey are to the philosophical hammering of Friedrich Nietzsche, as a cheap carny-esque sub-bastardization that does not even touch the surface of its progenitor yet still makes for a fleetingly entertaining experience. Of course, one of the film's greatest attributes is that Lurie—a hardly productive half-Hebrew hipster—is the ultimate anti-Faustian man and thus the idea of him becoming a brave astronaut is about as likely as Haiti becoming a world power or Austrian avant-garde Peter Kubelka directing a feature-length film with a linear plot and starring mainstream Hollywood actors.

LOVE IS THE DEVIL: STUDY FOR A PORTRAIT OF FRANCIS BACON
LOVE IS THE DEVIL: STUDY FOR A PORTRAIT OF FRANCIS BACON

John Maybury (1998)

Before becoming super pseudo-suave British secret agent James Bond in 2006 and having women all around the world swooning and wetting their panties over him, English leading man Daniel Craig (Road to Perdition, Munich) portrayed sub-literate gutter-grown hustler-like sodomites, or at least he did in the somewhat under appreciated film Love Is the Devil: Study for a Portrait of Francis Bacon (1998) directed by queer Brit auteur John Maybury, a man probably best known in America for directing the semi-interesting psychological thriller The Jacket (2005) starring Adrien Brody. A sort of experimental melodramatic biopic about gay Irish-born English figurative painter Francis Bacon and his dark and destructive romance with a young, uncultivated criminal thug from the East End of London, Love Is the Devil depicts in quasi-figurative fashion how the painter's torrid and torturous relationship would give birth to his greatest and mostly internally tormented artistic creations. Not unlike the men German New Cinema auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder would date, Dyer was in many ways Bacon's inferior and the former would develop a deep dependence for the latter that ultimately resulted in suicide when the painter became fed up with his tragic beau's needy behavior. Maybury's first feature-length work as a filmmaker, Love Is the Devil is not only an aesthetically audacious work that attempts to seamlessly synthesize Bacon's biographical details with the aesthetic essence of the painter's oeuvre, but also features a completely complimentary and fiercely foreboding original score by Japanese composer/actor Ryuichi Sakamoto, who got his start in film composing the score and acting in Merry Christmas Mr. Lawrence (1983) directed by Nagisa Oshima and would later earn an Academy Award and Grammy Award for his score for The Last Emperor (1987) directed by Bernardo Bertolucci. Although it probably does not say much, Love is the Devil is certainly as fine and immaculate as biopics about artists come, though I doubt middle-aged Daniel Craig fangirls will enjoy this aesthetically apocalyptic and delightfully disconcerting flick that depicts nothing short of one artist's internal metaphysical hell. Based on the authorized biography The Gilded Gutter Life of Francis Bacon (1994) by the artist's personal friend Daniel Farson, Love Is the Devil depicts a decidedly degenerate yet undeniably hardworking painter who enjoyed dressing in drag as a flapper as a teen, spent his early adult years reading Nietzsche and supporting himself by petty theft and rent-dogging, and would ultimately develop into a world famous painter who rather enjoyed being buggered in the bum by low-class young men.

It is the year 1964 and proletarian petty criminal George Dyer (Daniel Craig) has just broken into a flat he plans to rob but he is clearly not a genius and after noticing what seem like thousands of visceral paintings, Hitler photographs, and pictures of various corpses that adorn the home, he becomes quite stunned and is soon rather bizarrely greeted by the tenant, who appears slowly from a door and states in a rather stern fashion, "And who might you be? You're not much of a burglar, are you? Take your clothes off! Come to bed...and you can have whatever you want." The owner of the home is poor painter Francis Bacon (played by queer actor Derek Jacobi in a role Malcolm McDowell once displayed interest in taking on) and Mr. Dyer accepts the exceedingly effete artist's strange but generous offer. Ultimately, Bacon comes to love Dyer due to a combination of two seemingly contradictory qualities, 'amorality' and 'innocence.' While Dyer's sleazy urban peasant friends attempt to convince him that Bacon and his clique will "drop you like a ton of shit when they're done with you," the small-minded, small-time con believes he is in control and the one with the capacity to 'push the buttons' when it comes to his relationship with his much more quick-witted and callous partner. Of course, as Dyer learns soon enough, Bacon does not always give the intended response when one pushes his buttons. Bacon is a proud 'bottom' as demonstrated by his confession, "Submitting entirely to the service and pleasure of a dominant partner is, I find, a catharsis in that all responsibility is relinquished...every move is dictated. No decisions are your own. You exist solely for the service and pleasure of another man," but he also becomes a strong father-figure and mentor of sorts for Dyer, at least when the two are not engaging in sadomasochistic sex. Since the painter surrounds himself with pretentious art fags, fag hags, and bull-dykes (one of whom states she likes "carpet-munching and nothing else"), meager yet masculine Dyer is mostly rejected by Bacon's preposterously pompous 'Soho' clique. For example, photographer John Deakin (played by Karl Johnson, who is best known for his roles in Derek Jarman's The Tempest (1979) and Wittgenstein (1993)), whose photos Bacon based a number of his paintings on, is quite jealous of Dyer and even has the gall to snidely ask the small-time con, "still posing as a sodomite?" while in the company of numerous individuals at a bar. Of course, Bacon defends Dyer by pouring a cup of alcohol over Deakin's head and remarking, "Champagne for my real friends, real pain for my sham friends," but such uncommon loyalty between men from very different classes and cultural backgrounds does not last for long.

Naturally, like many one-sided relationships, breadwinner Bacon becomes rather weary of Dyer's needy dependence and begins cheating on his boyfriend and locking him out at night. After all, how could Bacon respect a man who does not understand the art of Jean Cocteau, let alone his own art? Somewhat paradoxically, as Bacon and Dyer's relationship deteriorates, the more the former begins to use the latter as the central subject of his paintings. As Bacon's friend Isabel Rawsthorne (Anne Lambton) notes, "The pictures of George are like exquisite love poems. You seem to put more into the work than the relationship itself and ultimately you suffer just as much." In terms of Bacon's philosophy of art, he remarks to Isabel, "There is no beauty without the wound. Lucifer was the most beautiful angel...that was his fatal flaw," and indeed, visceral pain and internal suffering become the hallmark of the artist's work. The more Dyer is rejected by his lover, the more he attempts to mimic Bacon's behavior, which includes treating handsome young twinkles to lavish dinners and gifts, and living a melancholy life of incessant alcoholism where a cure for a hangover is to merely imbibe yet again. To get Bacon's attention, Dyer plants his own marijuana in Bacon's house and calls the cops on him, thus resulting in the painter's arrest and causing him bad press. Of course, Dyer's actions only further push Bacon away, but the painter keeps painting his favorite subject. When both men travel to Paris in October 1971 for a retrospective of the painter's work at the Grand Palais, things take a predictable turn for the worse. On the eve of the retrospective, Bacon and Dyer argue with one another in a hotel room they share together and when the latter states, "I love you Francis," the painter replies with the sadistically snide remark, "Where do you get your slogans from George, off the television?" in what will be the final straw that breaks the camel's back for the destructive relationship. Needless to say, Dyer commits suicide by taking a killer cocktail of barbiturates and alcohol and Bacon, seemingly unphased by the tragic turn of events, continues to give the retrospective.

As a painter who once cited Sergei Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin (1925) and Fritz Lang's Metropolis (1927) as key catalysts to inspiring his own artistic creativity, it is only fitting that someone would direct an experimental biopic about Francis Bacon and luckily Love Is the Devil is a rather worthwhile one that neither sentimentalizes nor glorifies the artist, but portrays him as a patently perturbed individual whose infernal internal pain and sexual perversity were the very source of his rather grotesque genius. Clearly a cinematic work that was more influenced by painting, most specifically those of Francis Bacon himself, than actual cinematic works, Love Is the Devil is a painter's film and I say that as a cinephile and not as someone familiar with the film's subject's oeuvre. That being said, Love Is the Devil is certainly a rare cinematic work that, unlike contrived Hollywood works centering on famous creative individuals like Amadeus (1984) directed by Miloš Forman, Basquiat (1996) directed by Julian Schnabel, and The Rum Diary (2011) directed by Bruce Robinson, made me want to dig deeper into the subject's work. Indeed, I got the sense while watching Love Is the Devil that in some rather harsh and hermetic way that Francis Bacon's work embodies a certain discernible despair, chaos, and insanity of the Occidental soul and collective unconscious, specifically that of the British. As the late great British 'New Right' political figure, author, and painter Jonathan Bowden (a man who once told an interviewer to think of him as a "heterosexual version of Francis Bacon") once wrote about Mr. Bacon in his book Skin, "Francis Bacon's work . . . is an attempt to find an image that will explain the 20th century to itself. His support for the Right, on the other hand, is an attempt to further the artistic process. Basically, if the Right guarantees inequality, as it does, then the distinctiveness of the artistic personality is preserved. The fragility of the artistic ego is safeguarded by the social inequality that the Right safeguards. In short, the Right guarantees the importance of an artist, his inherent superiority, by virtue of the fact that it upholds order. As a consequence, the artist always prefers hierarchical inequality to humanitarian anarchy—as Louis-Ferdinand Céline once put it.” Indeed, Bacon was certainly a dictator of emotions who understood power and inequality and who ruled his friends, most notably George Dyer, with an iron-fist that ultimately resulted in both aesthetic and literal deaths. Not just a biopic about a famous artist, Love Is the Devil is also a psychodrama about the forsaken artistic soul and is thus mandatory viewing for anyone with an interest in 20th century Occidental art and/or a love of cinema as an art.

HENRY: PORTRAIT OF A SERIAL KILLER
HENRY: PORTRAIT OF A SERIAL KILLER

John McNaughton (1986)

Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer is an indisputable classic of the unofficial serial killer sub-genre. The film is based on the sick escapades of real life serial killers Henry Lee Lucas and Ottis Toole. Both of these disturbed and all around fucked up individuals easily rank as two of the most infamous serial killers to grace the asphalt roads of the United States. Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer is actually tamer in regards to the real criminal acts of the two portrayed serial killers. The dialogue featured in Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer is sparse yet brilliant. One of my favorite lines happens when Becky, sister of Ottis and love interest of Henry, asks Henry "Did you really kill your mama?" Henry admits he did kill his mother during this conversation and states, "Yeah. I killed my mama. One night. It was my 14th birthday. She was drunk, and we had an argument. She hit me with a whiskey bottle. I shot her. I shot her dead." Somehow Henry forgets how he killed his mother in this same conversation. I dare anyone else to find another serial killer film with such genius dialogue and conversations. Surprisingly, Henry is not the most deranged of characters in Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer. Ottis is into murder, homosexuality, and sadomasochistic incest. He spends his days drinking beer and kicking in TV screens. Ottis Toole, despite his lack of humanity, is no doubt a true American. Henry and Ottis have a good serial killer relationship at first, but mental illness is bound to make one of these fellows snap. Henry is forced to put a little disciplinary action on Ottis that has deadly results. The music featured in Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer is a sort of eerie corny style that parallels the feeling of the overall film. Despite the film's lack of budget, all of the artistic variables add up right. There is nothing more soothing than when Henry and Ottis drive down the road as the score of Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer powers the scene. Henry and Ottis are the real Night Stalkers. Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer is a classic and masterpiece of the horror genre. It is a film that follows the habits of a real nomadic serial killer in pathetic depth. Serial killers aren't mystical geniuses with some type of black magic power. Most of them are white trash individuals that were abused as children and of course latent homosexuals. I salute Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer director John McNaughton for directing such a sick and solid film.

WILD THINGS

The femme fatale is a dying breed in today's cinema world. One reason could be that Hollywood has cowered to the demands of feminists (and of course Hollywood is full of feminists) that lack a certain degree of much needed estrogen. Another reason could be that Hollywood prefers women to lack the manipulative genius of the femme fatale. Hollywood usually prefers beautiful women to be mindless whores that dye their hair bleach blonde to reek the benefits of a wall street investor that needs a trophy wife. Despite the lack of contemporary films featuring the much sought after femme fatale, Hollywood offers us one or two brilliant performances by sociopathic woman each decade. The 1998 film Wild Things features a new type of femme fatale that deserves to be seen. The femme fatale made herself best known in the legendary low budget film noir films. Of course, Vamps have been around since the early years of the silent era. Also, one cannot forget about Louise Brooks' seductive performance in G.W. Pabst's German masterpiece Pandora's Box (1929). These films were aesthetically dark as the hearts of the female leads featured in them. The film Wild Things changes the darkness of the film featuring the femme fatale and sets it in sunny Florida. The setting of the film is beautiful from the get with an array of "wild things" such as carnivorous alligators and sexually decadent heiresses. Wild Things is easier on the eyes than most wild life nature documentaries. Women aren't the only ones to use their sexual talents to their advantage. In Wild Things, Matt Dillon plays a High school guidance counselor who is known as the man that has fucked every woman in town. Although Dillon's character lacks the grace and charm that Montgomery Cliff displayed in The Heiress (1949), his character still can get what he wants from women to a certain degree. Kevin Bacon also plays a man that uses female style conspiring techniques to obtain a life of pure pleasure and fun in the sun. Let's just say that Wild Things is a film full of Femme Fatales (and their male counterparts) battling it out to get as much as they can with their criminally minded scams. It is a given that Wild Things is a film full of eroticism and controversial sexuality. I never thought that I would see Kevin Bacon videotaping two lesbians (Neve Campbell and Denise Richards) making out in a pool. Mr. Dillon and Mr. Bacon also have a moment in Wild Things that borders on the homoerotic. The femme fatale has always been a woman which seem to have certain lesbian inclinations. Therefore, it is not a surprise that the male equivalent would be treading through a similar swampy Florida water. Sexual perversion has always been a common trait of the criminally minded. Wild Things was directed by Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer director John McNaughton. Like the masterpiece that is Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer, Wild Things features unintentional (or possibly intentional?) comedy throughout. Also like McNaughton's realist serial killer romp, Wild

WILD THINGS

Things has an atmospheric soundtrack that makes the viewer “comfortable” until the films conclusion. John McNaughton may not be the most technical or artistic of directors, but he knows how to put together a more than competent film. Wild Things is a threesome of sadistic crime and erotic passion. I came into the film expecting a piece of typical Hollywood trash and was presented with a truly “thrilling” thriller. The cast played all their characters brilliantly and that includes Kevin Bacon (a man I have always had a certain superficial contempt towards). Going too in depth about the Wild Things storyline in this writing may spoil the many “wild” twists and turns throughout the film. This is a film that delivers what it advertises.

PREDATOR

John McTiernan (1987) Hollywood Aryan superman Arnold Schwarzenegger fucks up an ugly tentacle sporting (looking like dreadlocks) alien in the 1987 action, sci-fi, and horror film Predator. This film is like Apocalypse Now meets Aliens directed by Die Hard director John McTiernan (which it was). Predator follows a US Army Special Forces team as they blast away commie scum in a rebel camp. After wasting all the putrid Marxist garbage (except for an attractive exotic woman of course), they confront another conflict, a humanoid (looks like a guy wearing a costume) alien hunter.

When Arnold Schwarzenegger's character Dutch says, "If it bleeds, we can kill it," he was not speaking a lie. This quote is one of the most poetic lines to ever be spoken in film history (or maybe just the action genre). Arnold Schwarzenegger is the only person man enough to take on the alien predator. Governor Arnie can't even take on illegal aliens.

Predator is another film produced by action producer Joel Silver. Silver is a Jew that loves to produce action films where big scary Aryan men kill tons of people and blow stuff up. In the end, these Nazi butchers are heroes. Whether it be Schwarzenegger in Commando or Bruce Willis in Die Hard, Joel Silver put up the money that confirmed his belief in Aryan supremacy. Predator is another one of Joel Silver's productions that features a gay subtext of sorts (see Commando). When one of the soldier Mac's friend dies he states sadly, "he was um... my friend." Mac turns from cold blooded killer to sad little girl in seconds. He finally says his last farewell to his friend with "Good-Bye, Bro." A scene that confirms that even big black bald killers can have special love for an equally sized white killer. The son of post World War II Austria, Schwarzenegger turns the Predator into a little shit talking bitch. His utilization of the woods calls back to the days of Schwarzenegger's Teutonic ancestors. Now Schwarzenegger is using the stereotype of his ancestry as a means of making millions of dollars. Arnold Schwarzenegger may just be an Aryan sellout.

DIE HARD
DIE HARD

John McTiernan (1988) Die Hard is the greatest action film ever made. It is entertaining, action packed, and full of all the bullshit stuff that makes action films American. Star Bruce "McClane" Willis shines as a stoic NYC cop who even makes a couple clever jokes. By far the best role I have seen Willis in. I have yet to see any of the other films in the Die Hard franchise. Maybe I should.

German terrorists make the ultimate capitalist villains in Die Hard. Terrorist leader Hans (played by English actor Alan Rickman) makes for a charismatic villain that that was never believable as a German (which makes Die Hard even better). Carl Winslow (Reginald VelJohnson) also stars as McClane's Cop walkie talkie bud. Carl Winslow's teen killing confessional is one of films most dramatic scenes. McClane even lets out a little empathy in response.

Limo driver Argyle is one of the best characters to ever grace Hollywood's silver screen. His character acts as the silly African American character that can't seem to hold a job because of his "goofiness." What was Hollywood trying to say? Later Argyle knocks out a super evil African American computer hacking terrorist. Was Hollywood also trying to say something here? Is Die Hard a film that is supposed to go against stereotypes but then ends up being more racist than the stereotypes themselves? Was Jaleel "The Urkel" White offered a role as a German Terrorist?

Hollywood films are embarrassingly incriminating. Die Hard is no different. Sadly, Hollywood is no longer capable of producing propaganda films that offer any type of character. Especially in regards to excellently executed stylized propaganda. Die Hard would have made Sergei Eisenstein proud.

John McTiernan (2002)

I'm an action junkie, plain and simple. Most of these Hollywood churn-outs over the years have managed to entertain me. None of them can stand up to the classics, but I am always satiated with an ample dose of chases, explosions, and vulgarity. My adrenaline drive is what I need quick fixes for and this is why I go out of my way at times to watch something I don't expect anything from but merriment. From the director of the greatest action films of all time, Die Hard's John McTiernan has an illustrious and short filmography. Rather than quantity over quality, his short run has provided massive enjoyment for fans of any genre. In fact, I didn't even realize how many of my childhood favorites he directed. We got Predator, Die Hard, Last Action Hero, and Die Hard with a Vengeance. McTiernan has developed into a shallow reflection of what he used to be. Yes. I hate your film too. With a cast of Chris Klein, LL Cool J, and some dame with weird eyebrows, I found this film to be tipping the scale of depravity for its innocent viewers. Chris Klein is that annoying douche on American Pie. It's rather relieving to see him in a film where he wouldn't be a douche. Well, what do you know? He's still a douche, but this time in the future. LL Cool J is a horrible rapper and actor but somehow I am still drawn to his works as I am to Bruce Willis' blues album, but sadly his lack of acting talent isn't exploited. 10 minutes into the film, I discovered that they erased any socio-political ties that the original film held and just made an extreme sports film for the MTV gene pool. I find Rollerball (2002) to be in that same category of Extreme Ops. Don't remember that film? Me either. With the pleasant surprise of including Jean Reno in this film as the villainous Russian tycoon Petrovich, I found his character and charisma underused as I watched them run his character into the ground. While this film pertained to boldly debasing the Russian population, I'm surprised the cast wasn't crucified. Picture related. With all this in mind, expect a 15 minute action scene filmed entirely in night vision. That's correct. Of all the vapid ideas for visual excitement and yearning to think "outside the box", this has to be one of the worst ideas since Blade Runner 2. Rollerball (2002) is a film that should have never been made. It is one of the worst Hollywood films I've seen in ages. Boring, bland, and led by a cast of buffoons, this film's only achievement is to ruin John McTiernan's reputation.

DEATH IN JUNE: BEHIND THE MASK

John McTiernan (2005)

I can say with the utmost sincerity that my favorite musical outfit that is still in existence is the English neofolk group Death in June. I like different musical groups for a variety of reasons ranging from novelty to a deep emotional connection but Death in June is one of few groups whose entire aesthetic package I am completely enamored with. Although the Di6 has been around for over 30 years, the only remaining member of the group from their early days as a post-punk project is the charismatic and undeniably charming front man Douglas Pearce. In the 2006 documentary Behind the Mask Douglas P. gives his most revealing interview in regards to his personal life as well as the equally personal artistic influences behind Death in June. Due to Death in June's use of imagery associated with the Third Reich (on top of being of a shamelessly occidental cultural nature in general), the group has always been attacked (having shows picketed and canceled) by the kind of bourgeois white liberal types that read Mao Tse-tung whilst drinking decaffeinated pisswater at Starbucks which is hilariously ironic when you consider the early political backgrounds of the men behind Di6. Founding Death in June members Tony Wakeford and Douglas Pearce were originally in a punk group CRISIS which Pearce describes in Behind The Mask as a leftist Agit-prop project which had the conscious goal of being more extreme than the so called "New Left," a perverted political persuasion they felt was already too old and far from extreme.

During the beginning of Behind the Mask Douglas P. cleverly bastardizes one of Friedrich Nietzsche's most famous quote to fit his own experiences with the witty remark, "Once you truly look into the abyss you get a bit of the giggles." Pearce then goes on to discuss how he grew up in a dysfunctional post-World War II working-class English family where both of his parents hated each other, no doubt a critical influence on his fairly introverted personality and staunch individualism. Despite his Father being an English World War II veteran, Douglas P. developed an early fetishistic obsession with the bold aesthetics of Nazi Germany. When Pearce's Father found out about his son's romantic longing for figuratively bedding the enemy he was unsurprisingly enraged. Pearce even jokes in the documentary that he was a demon seed son sent to haunt his war torn Father. Douglas P. is not joking when he states during Behind the Mask in a matter of fact manner, "Every war has it's artistic consequences." Pearce's Father finally allowed his son to prove that he was being genuine in regards to his affection for Teutonic trinkets by allowing him to buy an unearthed German helmet, so long as little Doug promised to refurbish it to a like-new condition. After telling this anecdote in Behind the Mask, Douglas P. concludes the story with a "bit of the giggles" by mentioning that although he made his Father proud by fixing up his German helmet, he died soon thereafter.

It is obvious in Behind the Mask that out of all his family, Pearce only had strong feelings for his Father whose death left an emotional void that even seems to be apparent in the sorrowful 2010 Death in June single Peaceful Snow as expressed in the following lyrics: In the Peaceful snow As my father knows, I will go into the, into the snow

Original Di6 lineup Douglas Pearce, Tony Wakeford, and Patrick Leagas

During Behind the Mask Douglas P. reveals the obvious (at least to Death in June fans) when he mentions that the founding members of Di6 (Douglas P., Tony Wakeford, and Patrick Leagas) all carried a strong misanthropy, especially for the leftist punk rockers who they used to be in camaraderie with. All three original Death in June members had the goal of producing the musical mirror image of most people's ugliness. Douglas P. goes on to explain in Behind the Mask that he and his musical comrades realized how all the self-righteous leftists they knew treated people worse than any other group. The Death in June song C'est Un Reve, which is one of the most "controversial" musical pieces ever written by the group due to the song being about Gestapo "Butcher of Lyon" Klaus Barbie, was written as a bold political statement that there were worse "Barbies" in the French resistance. Douglas Pearce would also go on to say that despite being recognized as heroic freedom fighters nowadays, members of the French resistance killed around 250,000 of their own people after World War II. These kind of politically ambiguous statements by Pearce, along with Di6's use of Nazi Germany imagery, have given enough evidence for leftist types to pathetically attempt to censor the beautiful music of the group as being of a fascist nature which in their true believer eyes makes it non-art that must be destroyed. Nazi imagery or not, the typical cultural Marxist turd would consider Death in June fascist for the mere fact that their music is pro-occidental and a true expression of the European soul and not deracinated noise (the true soundtrack to culture-less multi-"culturalism"). Another aspect of Death in June that infuriates the band's detractors is that the group produces truly revolutionary and inspirational musical which gives artistic credence to "fascists."

Another thing that causes discommod in the enemy combatants of Death in June is the fact Douglas Pearce is an open homosexual. Flaunting his racial chauvinism and gayness, Douglas P. once stated, "I prefer to suck white uncircumcised cocks of a certain age so I suppose that rules out quite a few races and religions in one huge act of sexual discrimination. However that's natural selection for you. It follows on that, of course race is important to me." No doubt, Pearce's statement would cause a public outcry of race hate and confusion had he stated that for the mainstream media in the United States. I cannot imagine some repulsive homo singer like Michael Stipe ever actively displaying the personal integrity that Douglas P has always diffused. Death in June is also often labeled fascist because of the groups use of a grinning SS totenkopf skull. To show his proud commitment to Euro-libertinism, Douglas P. recently altered the Di6 totenkopf to include a gay rainbow flag in the background. During Behind the Mask, Pearce admits that he is fond of men that are old enough to be his Father. At age 20 Douglas P. was with a man that 58 years old who tagged along with him at punk shows and chatted with Captain Sensible of the legendary punk group The Damned. I cannot help but think that Pearce's odd fetish for bugging old men is the dejected result of longing for the Father he lost at a very tender age. I make music videos for a certain American neofolk project that will go unnamed. The singer of this group told me that when he saw a clip of Douglas Pearce piercing an elderly man's anal staircase in a gay porno movie, he was left in a state of distressed melancholy for months to cum. Despite being repelled by circumcised kosher sausages, Douglas P. played a Death in June show in Israel where he notoriously stormed the stage waving an Israeli star of David flag with a Di6 flag totenkopf appearing in the background. Only a man of refined charm could get away with flaunting a totenkopf (the SS symbol probably most associated with death in concentration camps) in front of the most fanatical of Jewish nationalists in their own holy land.

Despite being worth more than it's weight in gold to Death in June fans, the Behind the Mask documentary dvd has fairly barebones production values but I say this without complaint. The documentary is almost entirely made up of Douglas P. elegantly lurking around in macabre poses, resembling a phantom German soldier in his iconic mask and military fatigues. Behind the Mask also features snippets of Pearce in typically somber and snowy settings bringing visions in my mind of a ghost from the battle of Stalingrad, often making the documentary feel like a collage of Di6 album covers. By the end of Behind the Mask, I was astonished to realize that Di6 probably would have never existed had Douglas P. not engaged in acid trips as the saintly sinner singer credits his drug experimentation as opening his mind's eye to realizing that creating art would be appropriate path to take in his life. During Behind the Mask Douglas P. also mentions how ex-Death in June member David Tibet told him he would probably have severe mental problems had he not found his fate in music. After 30 years of playing live, Pearce has also pretty much confirmed that he will no longer be doing live shows which is certainly a heartbreaking and unimaginable realization for Di6 fans. During Behind the Mask, Pearce makes it very clear that he sees anonymity as one of the greatest virtues stating, "you can do a lot behind the scenes." In the documentary Douglas P. also mentions how the Japanese Samurai (Japanese nationalist Yukio Mishima being one of his favorite writers and a huge influence on Di6 Lyricism) virtue of secrecy also provided him with a critical influence in reinforcing his ability to find a warm well being during cold seclusion whilst sticking to the rule "many enemies bring much honor." As the great German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer once stated, "A man can be himself only so long as he is alone."

Despite the fact that Death in June is the musical group that essentially prompted the neofolk movement (with their revolutionary album Brown Book) in Europe, Pearce states in Behind the Mask regarding his albums that he does not "put them in those ghettos (of generic genre labels)." Douglas P. clearly articulates in his typically eloquent manner that upon finishing every Death in June album in the studio, his majestic musical creations end up being a magical surprise as he allows his organic occidental nature to unconsciously conjure up something that is truly "neofolk" instead of attempting to assemble the same generic formula like a lot of musicians do. Even after over 30 years of Di6 albums, Pearce is still able to reinvent his völkisch music with each subsequent album as he once again proved with his newest effort Peaceful Snow, a completely deconstructed masterpiece of love and murder featuring only his haunting voice and a piano. Douglas P. has hinted that Peaceful Snow is probably the final chapter in the marvelous Di6 song saga. At the end of Behind the Mask, Pearce states that he hopes to produce two new Death in June books in the near future: An autobiography (a Di6 biography was recently released but it is only available in the Italian language) and a scrapbook which I anticipate almost more than a new Di6 album. Despite being literally behind the mask most of the documentary, Behind the Mask is truly the most revealing (aside from his music) priceless package of Pearce anecdotes. In media interviews, he often seems slightly agitated by the ignorant nature of many interviewers who lack the artistic sensitivity that a songwriting genius of Pearce's caliber deserves. Behind the Mask was shot in the most appropriate place for a Douglas Interview session at 40 feet below the surface of a New York City skyscraper, giving the Di6 poet the perfect atmosphere to express himself in the solace of secrecy that he has always found comfort in. If there is ever another revolutionary renaissance in Europe, the leadership will no doubt take metapolitical influence from Death in June just as Adolf Hitler and Zionist founder Theodor Herzl were influenced by the operas of Richard Wagner. Like all great art, Death in June purifies the soul and inspires in a way that no Hollywood film or modern major record album ever could.

BIG WEDNESDAY

John Milius (1978)

While I spent almost a decade fucking up public property with my skateboard, own a surfer style longboard that I mess around with sometimes, and have lived at the beach for a good portion of my life, for some reason I never got around to learning how to surf and after watching the obscenely underrated cult item Big Wednesday (1978) directed by proud right-wing Hebrew John Milius (Dillinger, Red Dawn), I now realize that it is one of the single greatest regrets of my life. Indeed, after recently getting around to watching the film for the first time this month, I can say without exaggeration that it is probably one of the most, if not the most, underrated and obscenely overlooked films of the New Hollywood era, but of course it was probably considered to be too 'reactionary' for people at that time of its initial release since it portrays hippies as gleeful drug-addled automatons, features an extremely likeable and sympathetic all-blond Aryan cast, was inspired by ancient Greek and Norse mythology, does not feature any gratuitous sex scenes, and does not attempt to make any sort of heavy-handed leftist political statements about the Vietnam War (which Milius notably attempted to fight in, but was denied entry into the Marine Corps due to having chronic asthma). Originally expected to be a huge box office hit by a number of Milius' filmmaker friends at the time, including a fairly young Steven Spielberg, who somewhat absurdly described it as, "AMERICAN GRAFFITI meets JAWS," the film was a huge flop and was ruthlessly trashed by all the predictable mainstream leftwing film critics, who probably had a hard time sympathizing with a bodacious brigade of shamelessly masculine happy-go-luck blond beast beach rebels that makeup what is undoubtedly a modern-day West Coast Männerbünde. Admittedly, Milius' film is somewhat like a sort of surfer equivalent to American Graffiti (1973), albeit a whole lot less lame and more subversive in terms of spirit. Directed by a rightwing Jew who has proudly described himself as "Zen Fascist" and, according to Arnold Schwarzenegger's autobiography, once declared "There is only one Nazi on this team. And that is me. I am the Nazi," when Italian producer Dino De Laurentiis bitched that he did not want to cast the Austrian actor as the eponymous lead Conan the Barbarian (1982) because he thought he was a "Nazi," Big Wednesday is a fairly simple yet highly rewarding coming-of-age film with unwavering testicular fortitude that reveals in a somewhat melodramatic way the fairly pathetic fact that some peoples' lives reach their peak when they are only in their late-teens and early-twenties. Set over a twelve year period beginning during the summer of 1962 and concluding during the 'Great Swell of '74' when the protagonists give their swansong to surfing during an eponymous day when the waves reach upwards of 20 feet, the film is undoubtedly Milius' closest thing to an auteur piece as a work that was largely based on his and his co-writer Dennis Aaberg's personal experiences as Malibu surfers. Seamlessly adding Arthurian overtones to largely autobiographical anecdotes, Milius' rather entrancing cult flick features a hero's journey with a sort of Nietzschean theme about the 'Eternal Return' and the cyclical (as opposed to linear) nature of history and how each generation produces a group of sort of surfer aristocrats and bluebloods of the beach that act as influential surfer gods to the younger generation, who ultimately replace them with their own surfer royalty when it is their turn to rule the beach. Of course, as the film somewhat sentimentally demonstrates, the best thing a man can hope for is to leave a legacy. Indeed, the lead protagonist might be a dipsomaniacal lumpenprole that makes his living cleaning the pools of anally retentive people that probably think he is poor white trash, but among surfers he is a legend whose legacy simply speaks for itself.

While Milius—a mensch that hardly looks like he could have ever made for an apt model for an Arno Breker statue—has described his reasoning for casting tall, muscular, and blond actors as being because he wanted the protagonist to look traditionally “heroic,” there is good historical reasoning for having men of such an overtly Aryan physique as the leads, as they are symbolic of Southern California's German Wandervogel and Naturmensch roots and the fact that Germans immigrants would ultimately play a crucial cultural influence on both the surfer and bohemian/hippie way of life. Indeed, 60 years before long-haired blond surfer dudes and their equally unclad lady friends were living a radical communal way of life on the beaches of Southern California during the late-1960s and early-1970s, Teutonic novelist Hermann Hesse (Siddhartha, Steppenwolf), whose literary works would ultimately have a huge influence on the counterculture movement, met four longhaired sandal-sporting Wandervogel members in 1907 who took him to their commune in Ascona, Switzerland where he received a natural cure for his debilitating alcoholism. Naturally, I bring up Hesse to illustrate the deep roots of the Wandervogel movement and how it went on to influence many individuals and subcultures that have never even heard of it. The Wandervogel movement would also influence the proto-hippie Nature Boys of California, who were largely German immigrants and were promoting a life of veganism, nudism, and beards and long-hair during the 1910s. Of course, the Völkisch artwork of Fidus (aka Hugo Reinhold Karl Johann Höppener)—a Wandervogel member who lived in a proto-hippie commune and who once served a prison sentence for public nudity (in fact, his mentor, German Symbolist painter Karl Wilhelm Diefenbach, bequeathed him with the name “Fidus” aka “faithful” after he served said prison sentence)—would ultimately inspire the psychedelic aesthetic of both surfer and counterculture art during the 1960s.

As a coming-of-age flick that depicts a group of young surfer friends who ultimately begin succumbing to more hedonistic vices, Big Wednesday depicts what is arguably the last ‘innocent’ generation of surfers before the age of criminally-inclined rock star surfers like Bunker Sreckels and Rick Rasmussen, who both joined the surfer division of the 27 Club and died particularly pathetic deaths before they even reached their thirties. Notably, Spreckels (real name Adolph Bernard Spreckels III), who was a German-American that claimed to “come from a Viking line of Teutons” via his paternal line (he was the great-grandson of German-born sugar baron Claus Spreckels), was the stepson of Clark Gable and experimental filmmaker Kenneth Anger would pay tribute to his legendary Luciferian spirit and Aryan handsomeness with the 4-minute short My Surfing Lucifer (2007). While Big Wednesday depicts a group of young surfers that were from the generation before heroin and shitty rock music began plaguing surfer greats like Spreckels and Rasmussen (who were both involving in drug dealing), it is clear that these characters, who are perfectly played by leads Jan-Michael Vincent, William Katt, and Gary Busey, have the same sort of innately rebellious spirit, as sort of modern-day Norse Berserkers that are prone to trance-like fits of fury while both on and off their surfboards. Making up a sort of unconscious Malibu Männerbünde as an eccentric collective of inordinately loyal surfer comrades with their own set of rules, rituals, routines, and even lingo, the sunbaked beach boys of the film reveal that, although surfing is a fairly individualistic activity that is in stark contrast to popular collectivist-minded team sports like baseball and football, personal relationships are certainly one of the most important and memorable aspects of the lifestyle. Indeed, as an ex-skater, I can certainly say that I have more fond memories of the many people that I skated than the best tricks I ever landed. Somewhat unfortunately, I can also attest that, not unlike the surfers in Milius’ films, some of the greatest skaters that I was friends with also become some of the biggest fuck-ups and degenerates when they reached their late teen and adult years, but I guess that is what one should expect from individuals derive fun from intentionally putting themselves in various dangerous life-or-death situations.

Next to his buddy Paul Schrader, there has probably never been another screenwriter who went on to have such a successful career as a filmmaker as John Milius, who most notably penned the best lines of dialogue from Dirty Harry (1971) and its first sequel Magnum Force (1973) and received an Academy Award nomination for his screenplay for Apocalypse Now (1979). Originally written by Milius in 1969 under the somewhat less tempting title The Psychedelic Soldier (he was later inspired to change the title to its current name to mock a popular hippie button of the late-1960s that read “Nirvana Now”), Milius is the man responsible for the most memorable lines of Apocalypse Now, including “Charlie don’t surf!” and “I love the smell of napalm in the morning.” Needless to say, watching Big Wednesday sometimes feels like the cinematic equivalent of hanging out with the friends of Apocalypse Now character Lance B. Johnson, who notably rides some waves after his new pal Lieutenant Colonel Bill Kilgore covers him from enemy bullets by having helicopters drop napalm on a surrounding gook village. Of course, the film also deals with the issues of the Vietnam War and how one of the surfers dies in battle, but it never resorts to petty political sloganeering, emotionally manipulative sermonizing, or pathetic melodramatics, as the characters deal with war as if it is a normal fact of life. Featuring special water cinematography by innovating surfer George Greenough, who also did camera work for Bruce Brown's classic surf doc The Endless Summer (1966) and Peter Weir's early masterful metaphysical mystery The Last Wave (1977), Big Wednesday is certainly as technically accurate and innovative as fictional surf movies come, yet you do not have to give a shit about epic 20-foot waves to enjoy it.

Sentimentally narrated by lovably ugly Aryan actor Robert 'Freddy Krueger' Englund at the beginning of each of the film's four main chapters, Big Wednesday begins with a segment entitled "THE SOUTH SWELL – Summer 1962" where the viewer is introduced to the main three protagonist, or as the rather nostalgic unseen narrator states, "I remember the three friends best: Matt, Jack, Leroy. It was their time. They were the big names then. The kings. Our own royalty. It was really their place...and their story." Although a seeming loser in just about every other aspect of his life, Matt Johnson (Jan-Michael Vincent in a most fitting and perfectly played role)—a character inspired by a real-life surfer named Lance Carson who suffered from alcoholism for most of his life and who was inducted into the International Surfing Hall of Fame in 1991—is the greatest surfer in town and the uncontested 'king' of his beach, 'The Point.' As an anally retentive yet inordinately mature and stoic chap, Jack Barlowe is certainly Matt's total opposite, yet they are still best friends and the best surfers in town. Although not nearly as pathetically self-destructive as the lead protagonist, Oklahoma-born beach hillbilly Leroy 'The Masochist' Smith (Gary Busey) is easily the most unhinged yet simultaneously most jovial of the trio and he wastes no time in hassling a couple young surfers for a board at the beginning of the film after a quite hungover Matt misplaces his own. As Leroy's playfully authoritarian behavior demonstrates, the beach has its own set of unofficial rules and those individuals (e. g. 'Hodads') that do not follow them must pay the price. At the entrance of the Point is a sort of Lovecraftian gate in ruins that hints that a great civilization once thrived there, but now blond beast barbarism rules the beach and Matt, Jack, and Leroy rule by example with their oftentimes ethereal and entrancing wave-riding. In fact, Matt is such a legendary figure among young Malibu surfers that they can only seem to recognize him when he is actually surfing, as if he is too meek and pathetic looking to impress anyone otherwise. Unfortunately for the trio and their equally blond friends, they are at a point in their lives when their carefree existences are about to be threatened and they soon must come to accept that not everything in life is fun and games, even if you happen to be one of the greatest and most radical surfers of your generation.

If the protagonists of the film have any sort of all-wise father figure and mentor, it is a burly bearded beach bum named 'Bear' (Sam Melville), who is a Korean War veteran that seems to have no life of his own and instead lives vicariously through Matt and his friends. When Matt and his friends have parties, Bear also symbolically hangs outside the entire time, as if he knows he is too old to be truly a part of the group and thus always stays slightly off to the side. Bear's greatest claim to fame is that he used to regularly surf crazy waves in Hawaii and, as he states like an old wise man recalling his experiences, "Once I rode it alone in Point Surf at Mākaha at 20 feet." As a sort of compulsively cerebral yet carefree surfer priest/philosopher/poet who only gets pissed when someone or something impedes on his surfer lifestyle, Bear stoically declares to some young kids in regard to the innately individualistic nature of surfing, "You're always alone, anyway. That's the test of a surfer to ride alone. You shouldn't have to depend on anybody but yourself." As his words and actions reveal, Bear considers himself a sort of perennial surfer, even if he is never depicted riding a board once in the entire film. Bear does not believe that the leads have truly lived up to their full potential yet and as he tells the kids while working on a longboard in regard to Matt and his friends' ultimate Arthurian mission, "It'll be a swell so big and strong it will wipe everything that went before it. That's when this board will be ridden. And that's when Matt, Jack and Leroy...they could distinguish themselves. That's the day they can draw the line." Of course, the longboard is symbolic of Excalibur and, not unlike like King Arthur with the legendary magical sword in the stone, Matt is the only one that will be able to use it, but only on the right day at the right time when god has blessed him with the appropriate waves that will challenge both his courage and talent. Naturally, both Jack and Leroy will join him in surfing these waves on the eponymous big day, but it is ultimately alpha-surfer Matt that will reach the deepest and fullest form of transcendence, as he is the greatest hero of his generation.

While Leroy pretty much seems to be willing to fuck anything that moves so long as it has a warm wet hole and thus does not seem like the sort of fellow that could settle down and share his life with a woman for any notable period of time, both Matt and Jack soon acquire girlfriends. Indeed, while Matt hooks up with a supposedly lecherous female surfer and tomboy named Peggy Gordon (Lee Purcell) who is just as tough as the boys and who will ultimately act as the lead protagonist's much needed backbone, Jack hooks up with a cutesy Chicago-bred diner waitress that just moved to the area named Sally (Patti D'Arbanville), who states to her new beau in regard to the stark contrast between sunny Southern California and her ex-hometown, "It's really different here. Well...back home, being young was...just something you do until you grow up. And, well, here...here it's everything!" While everything seems to be going great for the protagonists after they have a party at Jack's mother's house where they beat up a gang of proudly arrogant party-crashers from Burbank, reality smacks them in the face when they decide to travel south of the border to Mexico to engage in mindless hedonistic activities and ultimately realize that they are not as tough or brave as they thought when they are out of their element and left vulnerable to the unpredictable hostilities of the rather unforgiving third world. Indeed, aside from Peggy revealing to Matt that she is pregnant and plans to keep the baby while she is absurdly chugging down a can of cheap Mexican beer (!), the boys get in an ugly bar fight involving knives and bullets, not to mention the fact that Jack's prized car is practically left totaled. Not surprisingly, self-described masochist Leroy is the only one that enjoys the trip and he even impulsively marries a teenage Mexican girl, though he ultimately leaves her behind.

As the narrator states at the beginning of the second chapter entitled "THE WEST SWELL – fall 1965" in regard to the decidedly dispiriting spirit of time, "The summers passed with each year. I don't seem to remember them anymore. I remember the fall and the coming of winter. The water got cold. It was a time of the west swell. A swell of change. A swell you usually rode alone." Always the mature and disciplined friend in the group, Jack annoys his comrades by joining the enemy and becoming a lifeguard at their surf spot. In fact, while at work, Jack even unwittingly yells at Matt for sleeping on the beach after assuming he is just some random drunken wino. Of course, Matt is indeed drunk and Jack is forced to punch him in the face and banish him from the beach that he was once the king of after he causes a car crash while playing around in the street and pretending to be a matador that dodges cars instead of bulls. To make matters worse, all the boys have received draft notices for the Vietnam War, hence Matt's perpetuation state of inebriation. Somewhat ironically, while his protégés have more or less hit rock bottom and no longer speak to one another, Bear has become a successful surf store owner with his own surfboard brand and he is getting ready to get married, so naturally he becomes quite disheartened when Matt randomly shows up at his shop and pathetically declares that he no longer wants to be a surf hero, complaining like a true loser, "I don't want to be a star. My picture in magazines, having kids look up to me. I'm a drunk, Bear. A screwup. I just surf because it's good to go out and ride with friends. I don't even have that anymore." Of course, big burly Bear refuses to listen to such pathetic crybaby talk and sternly states to Matt, "It's just not going right, and you can't understand it. Growing up's hard, ain't it, kid? Those kids do look up to you, whether you like it or not." While Matt is convinced to get serious about surfing again and he and Jack subsequently make up at Bear's wedding after symbolically sharing a swig of cheap liquor together, the happy reunion is unfortunately short-lived, as all the boys are forced to face the draft board and not all of them are successful in their attempts to scam their way out of fighting in the Vietnam War. Indeed, while Matt manages to dodge the draft by pretending to be a barely mobile cripple with an antique Forrest Gump-esque leg brace and Leroy gets out by merely exaggerating his madly masochistic tendencies after a darkly humorous encounter with a military psychologist played by Joe Spinell that ultimately has him strapped to a stretcher and hauled off to a loony bin, Jack and their mutual friend 'Waxer' (Darrell Fetty), who unsuccessfully pretended to be a flamboyant homo to get out of military service, are drafted, with the latter ultimately dying in the war.

As the coarse horse-voiced quasi-commie agitator Robert Zimmerman once arrogantly yet rightly sang "The Times They Are a-Changin'" and working-class hero Matt is certainly not happy with it, especially after going to a local restaurant with his baby-momma Peggy to get a cheeseburger and being told by a repulsively effete long-haired burnout hippie server, "We're off that trip. We don't serve animal hostilities. Dead flesh." While Matt yells at the hippie server in a threatening manner, "I'm not your brother...and turn down that crappy music," he must live with the fact that blacks are burning down American cities and that spoiled white hippie degenerates have turned rebellion into a lame form of slave-morality-based social signaling where the weak and meek are worshiped and all forms of Occidental traditional and morality are mindlessly mocked and demonized by people that lack the self-discipline and moral fortitude to even be able to uphold such values. Not surprisingly, Matt and his friends are fairly apolitical individuals that care more about their friends and personal lives than abstract political ideas, yet it is quite obvious that they loathe hippies and are disillusioned with they way that the country is heading. All of this occurs during the third chapter of the film entitled "THE NORTH SWELL – winter 1968." After attending the premiere of a surf film entitled Liquid Dreams that leaves him somewhat upset when spectators mock a small excerpt of the surf movie that he appears in, Matt seems like he is totally done with surfing and he is only coerced into getting back onto his surfboard when Jack randomly comes back after serving in the Vietnam War. Indeed, instead of going to see his estranged girlfriend Sally, Jack immediately goes to the beach in his military uniform where he soon reunites with his best bud after playing with his pal and Peggy's toddler daughter Melissa. While Jack has a great time catching up and riding waves with Matt, he is startled upon going to visit his longtime girlfriend Sally and discovering that she has married someone else without even telling him. As the film hints in a less than subtle fashion, it seems that, for most people, life only gets shittier and shittier as the years pass, especially if you were a hot shit during your teenage and early adult years like Matt and his surfer homeboys. In tribute to their fall comrade Waxer—a lovable lunatic that wore a Nazi jacket and would ironically die in the Vietnam War wearing a lame looking American uniform—Matt, Jack, and Leroy drink some wine at his grave one night and pay tribute to his memory. Although a man of very few words, Matt breaks down and manages to articulate his brotherly love for his comrade and declares in memory of Waxer, "I'd just like to say...he was a good surfer...and a really great guy. He had a nice cutback. He rode the nose real well. He was kind of screwed up, they way he treated women...but he always got the one he wanted, so it doesn't matter anyway, because he was just a good guy all the way around. He'd always give people waves. Just give them away. He'd always stick up for his friends in a fight. He wasn't worth a damn, but he was always right in there. I don't ever remember a day Waxer wouldn't go ride with his friends. Waxer was our friend. He was a little part of us. And we're gonna miss him." Of course, Matt's word somewhat epitomize the loyal brotherly spirit of the Männerbünde. After paying tribute to Waxer, the three friends go their separate ways.

The fourth and final chapter of the film is entitled "THE GREAT SWELL – spring 1974" and, as the narrator states at the beginning of this segment in a manner that makes him sound like a metaphysician of surfdom, "Who knows where the wind comes from? Is it the breathe of god? Who knows what really makes the clouds? Where do the great swells come from? And for what? Only that now it was time...and we had waited so long." As a result of a 'The Great Swell' that he and his friends have been virtually waiting their entire lives, Matt attempts to hunt down both Jack and Leroy, but he has no luck and eventually gives up. After failing to find his friends, Matt visits Bear at a pier at night to bring the bad news and is surprised when his mentor gives him his legendary Excalibur-like longboard. Indeed, after giving Matt the surfboard and joyously declaring, "She's yours man," Bear, who is clearly in a thoroughly inebriated state, breaks down and confesses to Matt during a rather vulnerable moment, "You know, all these years, there were damn few things that mattered. But the thing that mattered the most...was knowing how you three felt about me. That you respected me...and that you felt I had given you something." After giving him the unfortunate news that he could not locate Jack or Leroy, Matt attempts to talk Bear into coming home with him to eat dinner with and hang out with his family, but the discernibly dejected dipsomaniac becomes somewhat irritable and demands that he leave without him. Needless to say, Bear is considerably less grumpy the next day when he goes to the beach and discovers that the three friends have been reunited on a particularly sunny morning while gloriously monstrous 20 foot waves are brewing.

Ultimately, 'Big Wednesday' is the day where, as long ago prophesied by Bear, Matt and his friends figuratively draw the line in the sand and establish themselves as true surf legends that have reached their peak in terms of both personal and collective accomplishment. When Matt arrives at the Point on the big day, he notices seemingly hundreds of people watching from a cliff as lifeguards try in vain to force surfers to get out of the water since there is a rip tide and the waves are getting rather large and quite deadly. In a rather uplifting scene where the friends are both literally and symbolically reunited, Matt makes his way down the steps of the ruined beach gate and is delighted to discover that both Jack and Leroy are waiting for him at the bottom with their surfboards, as if they somehow had the intuition to be at the beach on exactly the same day at exactly the same time. At around the same time Matt arrives, Gerry Lopez (real-life Hawaii-born surf legend of the same name portraying himself)—the hottest new young surfer in the world—also shows up and proceeds to ride the same waves with the protagonist and his friends, though there is no real sense of rivalry between the men. Abandoning all forms of fear and hesitation, the all-blond trio bravely rides a series of very potentially deadly 20-foot waves while Bear watches from the beach with devout admiration, as if he were a father admiring the accomplishments of his grownup sons. Indeed, Matt and his friends are so entrancingly triumphant with their wave-riding that even professional surfer Lopez looks on with great respect and admiration, as if he did not expect to be surrounded by old dudes that couple keep up with him.

Of course, all good things must come to end and the trio decides to quit while they are ahead after Jack and Leroy are forced to bail their boards and pull Matt out of the sea after he has a terrible wipeout and injures his leg. After emerging from the ocean, a young blond surfer dude hands Matt his board and states to him in a meek and extremely humble fashion as if he were in the presence of a god, “This belongs to you. I’ll tell you what, that was the hottest ride I’ve ever seen. I just wanted to tell you that.” Somewhat symbolically, Matt gives the surfboard to the young man and states, “Keep it. If it ever gets big again, you can ride it,” thus signaling that the protagonist is passing on Excalibur to the next generation in what ultimately proves to be a somewhat bittersweet scene where the hero accepts the fact that his great lifelong journey is finally over and that he must retire to a life of domestic banality. Meanwhile, a younger surfer asks a rather jolly Bear if he surfs and he humbly replies in a somewhat humorous fashion, “Not me. I’m just a garbage man. See you around,” thus indicating that the master feels that his job is done when it comes to preparing Matt and his friends in terms of reaching their full potential and establishing an enduring legacy. After walking up the stairs of the beach entrance, Matt remarks to his friends, “Lopez. He’s as good as they always said he was” and Leroy replies “So were we.” After Matt remarks, “We drew the line,” he says before completely parting ways with Jack and Leroy, “keep in touch.” Of course, the titular ‘Big Wednesday’ session was the group’s swansong to surfing and it would almost seem blasphemous if they were to actually keep in touch as the trio has reached their zenith in terms of both surfing and their friendships.

Notably, in the Blue Underground featurette Capturing The Swell (2003), Big Wednesday director John Milius states regarding the commercial failure of his film and the ruthless reviews it received, “Oh, it was totally received horribly...attacked by every critic, you know. I was called a Nazi. I don’t know why I was called a Nazi, because I guess I was a surf Nazi [...] It was just totally lambasted and I was excoriated to the point where I remember taking a long walk one night, wondering if I should join the French Foreign Legion...but I didn’t.” Despite being an abject commercial and critical failure, Milius has described the cinematic work as being, “In many ways, it’s my most beloved movie,” which is no surprise considering it is both his most personal and autobiographical cinematic work and surely a flick that is more timeless and artistically merited than his hits like the big Cold War agitprop cumshot Red Dawn (1984). Of course, despite being a failure at the box offices, Big Wednesday has developed a loyal following over the decades in both Europe and the United States and is now a beloved cult item that has outlived most of the degenerate leftist film critics that trashed it when it was initially released. In terms of celebrities, Quentin Tarantino of all people has described it as one of his favorite films, even though he hates surfers, or as he once stated himself as revealed in the book Quentin Tarantino: Interviews (1994), "I don't like surfers; I didn't like 'em when I was growing up. I lived in a surfing community, and I thought they were all jerks. I like this movie so much. Surfers don't deserve this movie." While Tarantino loathes real surfers, he is somewhat strangely quite fond of imaginary intergalactic surfing superheroes like the Silver Surfer, but I digress.

As someone that has spent a good portion of my life living at the beach, I probably have more direct personal experience with surfers than Tarantino, especially since I would oftentimes spend hours a day with them at local skateparks where they would typically ride longboards instead of regular sized skateboards, yet I loathed many of these individuals for quite different reasons than the repugantly pompous pop filmmaker. In fact, the reasons I disliked these individuals were for reasons that would probably influence Tarantino to like them (after all, like Tarantino, all these guys were proud potheads). Indeed, despite the fact that these dope-addled 'dudes' looked like stereotypical surfers in the sense that they usually had long blond hair, and wore tie dye shirts and hemp jewelry, they spoke a curious combination of old school surfer lingo and ebonics, listened to superlatively shitty gangster rap music, and suffered from the sort of profoundly philistine generic negrophilia that oftentimes occurs when a person with a fairly low IQ watches too much MTV. Of course, aside from possibly their rebellious spirits, the surfers of today are hardly representative of those depicted in Big Wednesday, which portrays a time when men were still men and ethno-masochism and xenophilia were hardly vogue (indeed, if the film were remade today, it would probably feature a Mexican protagonist that was good friends with a white tattoo-covered tranny and a jive-talking token negro). While just a guess, I am going to have to assume that the last generation of truly subversive surfers with testicular fortitude were probably the guys associated with Southern California punk/hardcore groups of the late-1970s through early-1980s like T.S.O.L. and Agent Orange. Like the character of Waxer in Milius' film, the band members in these groups and punks in these scenes would oftentimes use Nazi imagery as a means to piss people off. Naturally, these bands would also write sardonic songs relating to surfing like "Hang Ten In East Berlin" by D.I., which also makes satirical references to the Third Reich.

A pure-of-heart piece of shameless celluloid nostalgia that, at least visually speaking, feels like it was directed by the subversive surfer son of American realist painter Edward Hopper (though many of the breathtaking ocean and landscape scenes reminded me of the paints of 19th-century German Romantic landscape painter Caspar David Friedrich), Big Wednesday is true masterful proletarian cinematic art in the way that none of the Soviet commie filmmakers could really figure out (incidentally, in Red Dawn, American prisoners imprisoned at a Soviet concentration camp are forced to watch Sergei Eisenstein's anti-Teutonic/anti-Nazi/anti-Catholic epic Alexander Nevsky (1938)), as a shockingly timeless piece of cinema that appeals to the heart and soul of just about any man or boy that understands the value and importance of both manhood and brotherhood. In that sense, the film is certainly more important now than when it was first released, as we now live in a morally, spiritually, and sexually inverted era where even innately masculine institutions like the military are forced at virtual gunpoint to accept the patent absurdity of having supremely mentally defective trannys in dresses as respectable commanders. Certainly, Big Wednesday is one of the only Hollywood films from the 1970s that I can think of that has a truly decent and inspiring message, not to mention the fact that it is decidedly devoid of any insufferable moral posturing or soulless outmoded leftist messages. On a lighter note, the film was a somewhat surprising reminder to me of my love for the beach and ocean. Indeed, while I am nowhere near as physically active as I was as a teenager, I can safely say that, even over the past year, many of my fondest memories involve the beach (though, instead of hanging out with male friends, I was basking in the singular pulchritude of a lady friend that enjoyed disposing of her pesky bathing suit once she has entered the ocean). In fact, after gleefully wallowing in Big Wednesday more than once this past month, I have no excuse but to get off my ass this summer and finally learn how to surf, even if I am probably too old to start my own beach Männerbünde or even develop into a halfway decent surfer.

MAX PAYNE

What better way to bring back noir sentiments than with Max Payne - A long overdue adaptation that hit me in the liver for featuring an outstanding trailer, one of which I preserved. Immediately following the first negative review, my mood became sour and I trekked onwards to collect my own opinions, as venomous as they are. Max Payne is a shitty movie, plain and simple. If professional asshole John Moore has focused more on the Max Payne quintessential instead of calling the MPAA "Nazi cockgobblers", the douche might have created an average and proud adaptation. Instead, we're given a film that is all too relatable to our own soil. Max Payne was something I respected for showing the environments as foreign as possible. The seedy dialogue and the snowy grain covering the ground. Also props when props are due for the graphic novel cut scenes. "We're suffering from what I call Batman blowback. The Motion Picture Association of America gave The Dark Knight a PG-13 rating and basically sucked Warner Bros. cock. I have a serious amount of issues with the MPAA. Did you know it was made up of volunteers? As if that somehow excludes them from some type of wrongdoing. You can't serve on it if you're a homosexual or if you didn't grow up in a shared parenthood home. Go to their website and read their charter about what gives a fair and balanced view for typical parents. We're still strangled by an association that's straight out of the House Un-American Activities Committee." In the game, you took the role of Max Payne - a disturbed ex-father and vigilante cop addicted to painkillers. You'd take part in adrenalized gun battles worthy of John Woo's camera that were stylized with a feature called "Bullet time" in which time slows down and you can dive while firing in the air. The game was a breath of fresh air towards the tired third person shooter genre which wasn't done right until Resident Evil 4. Testosterone + Wit + Drugs + Guns = easy movie to make? Apparently not. I've seldom been guilty of watching a film and thinking of how I could do it better. When I was in Max Payne, I found myself furious at Moore. The kind where I'd jump him outside of his house for ruining something which should be child's play. This picture better represents the film whilst rotated. Mark Wahlberg has been under some fierce fire lately. After The Departed, his reputation was soaring through open skies. Up until The Happening, it seemed that he was destined for an godly A-list life but has instead been dragged into the ground thanks to insignificant critics. He is the perfect brand of actor. He's not the kind of guy to take liberties but would rather work. This explains how when M. Night makes the glorious decision for Wahlberg to stare perplexed at a given point for 80 minutes and call it an eco-terror movie. This is also why when Scorsese told Wahlberg to be an incendiary asshole, he delivered gold. Give this power to John Moore and everything explodes into hell. Had the name not been attached, this film would be at least tolerable. The sound effects were something that bothered me. His hand cannon in the bathroom scene sounds more of an ox mixed with plastic explosives. I prefer the hollow shell sound deployed in the video game. Max Payne suffers from trailer hype. It's a common disease. With the slow riffs on Manson's If I was your Vampire, it molded the film's image into the emotionally draining song that was present. You can't expect the writer of The Shield to write a noir. This is Hollywood idiocy. Would it hurt to hire some original project workers in order to ensure a safe transportation? Oh wait, this is the director of The Omen (2006)? Silly me. The real star of this film is the stunning Olga Kurylenko who suffers a short role. This exotic beauty should have been given the title role. Similar to the Edwin/Edwina A. Salt film controversy, it should have been Maxine Payne. Other than pretty faces and some stylish cinematography, Max Payne was dead before he started. After an end-credits scene, it seems that the Fall of Max Payne was indeed the inspiration of the first film. A shame with how wonderful the promotional materials are.

DON'T BE AFRAID OF THE DARK

Among the made-for-TV horror spectacles that have found their way into very comfortable households includes Don't Be Afraid of the Dark, with Trilogy of Terror as close kin. The original film stars Kim Darby, a tomboy who could "get it", as a reluctant inheritor of a decrepit mansion whose basement study is home to a bricked and sealed fireplace that she insists upon opening. Even after kindly handyman Mr. Harris warns her against the repercussions of mishandling things that are meant to stay the way they are, she does so anyways and seals her and her loved ones fate. For in the bottomless ash pit exists a world of inky darkness as somewhat recently stylized in the obviously inspired Wes Craven's They. Don't Be Afraid of the Dark is a film that not only features a magnificent array of lighting and the lack thereof but also imaginative creepy totems brought to miserable life with camera tricks and stop-motion. Kim Darby sets the tone nicely as a lush and almost virginal desperate housewife of a workaholic trader who starts the film off as a low-budget vaginal suppository of midlife angst but ends on a bit of a high chord with a drugged Darby being dragged down the hall and stairs as she moans and groans. The perkiness of her breasts and rope really lends to the scene seeming as a spare remnant of a great pinku film. This scene provoked a new fetish for me to pursue; gremlin hostage situations. Just thinking about the ending alone brings to light so many questions. Was the camera recovered? Were there pictures of the creatures on the film? What happened to the house? Don't Be Afraid of the Dark leaves you with many staggering questions and few answers. Even so, the quality of this film is of a special caliber of noxious horror entertainment, even with a criminally short runtime this film manages to accomplish so much given its hindrance as being directed by a fellow known only for directing episodes of classic television series. Once the demons marked Sally (Darby) to be their blushing den mother, the foul play appears almost instantly resulting in a suspense that continues to rise and never lets up. If anything, this film allows an unconventional look at an unholy obsession with the perfect wife which is also tenaciously appears to be the domineering pseudo-Labyrinth but without a single trace of avant-garde homosexuality. As per usual, the curiously dimwitted nature of a woman is to blame for this supernatural travesty of what could have been a fruitful marriage. This nightmarish concept of deniability is seen in most, if not all, feminist outings of hyper-realized motion pictures of the illicit damsel in distress. The obstacles she must overcome however are more of a terrifying fairy tale rather than a problem manifesting itself on the bounds of reality. This film presents multiple options of anxiety, you can either fear the shadows or fear the dark. Accepting the notion that these beings need just a fraction of darkness to inhabit their hijinx creates ample anxiousness as pitiful Sally slinks through the hallways not noticing that her leg carefully strafes through a minimal pocket of shade which may or not be her last breath. Even lines regarding the party Sally plans in the beginning of the film leads to a disquieting aura as she states "He said if the place was dark enough..." Announced recently was a remake of the made-for-TV cult film Don't Be Afraid of the Dark which sparked an outcry from fans of the original as all remake do. After having watched the original and inspecting it at several vantages, I come to the realization that this is one of those sacred safe properties in which the original might have prophesized this by making the history of the house and creatures/gremlins/homunculi pretty vague, tenebrous enough to barely skim the esoteric past of this house that used to belong to several families before all resulting in the same fate. For anyone to be against the remake is a foolhardy excuse to get riled up for the sake of tarnishing the reputation of a film that only a handful of people have seen. Even with the original property taken as is, it still could be about the elaborate dementia a neglected hostess is suffering from; lack of communication and light tricks could lead to a wavering sanity complex. Sleeping pills are the bane of horror films, constantly getting heroines in messy situations. Notice how men never suffer from this medicated problem? It's always Nancy Thompson who gets stuck in these situations, these asylum settings of fractured feminine identity that really debases the usage of these prescriptions to help the ladies sleep. After viewing Don't Be Afraid of the Dark, it's high time to realize and cope with the understanding that regardless of your elitism towards films of your childhood era, they will be remade in terrifying productivity. Nothing is untouchable and they will find away to lurk in the shadows and steal what you feel is rightfully yours. Don't Be Afraid of the Dark is an excellent ambient horror film that is touching, erotic, wistful, and creepy in its own regards. I couldn't be more excited nor proud for a remake than I am for this one.

John Parker (1955)

Somewhat embarrassingly, I never got around to seeing the phantasmagorical film noir (advertised as a 'beat-noir') flick Dementia (1955) written and directed by Bruno VeSota (but often falsely attributed to producer John Parker) until fairly recently. Maybe it was because I got the film mixed up with Francis Ford Coppola's inferior, early Roger Corman-produced horror flick Dementia 13 (1963) and assumed it was another conventional and equally forgettable 1950s/1960s horror film, but, regardless, I am glad that I actually took the time to view it. Antagonistically transcending the usually fine line between free-form avant-garde art film and bodacious B-movie, Dementia is a rather ridiculously overlooked work that is quite like no other. Originally only available in its butchered cut version (at 56 minutes as opposed to the original 61 minutes) as Daughter of Horror with redundant and artistically proposterous narration by (then-unknown) comedian and game show host Ed McMahon, Dementia is now widely accessible in its original abstract necromantic form. Shot MOS ("Motor Only Sync" aka without synchronous sound) and equipped with an eerie and seductive soundtrack by German-American avant-garde composer and inventor George Antheil and sung by Marni Nixon, Dementia is a strictly cinematic work that has more in common with great films of the silent era than horror films from its own epoch. Quickly forgotten upon its initial 1955 release, Dementia would not gain the cult following it always deserved until the late 1970s, thus earning a (still somewhat marginal) reputation as one of the most strikingly strange and idiosyncratic films ever made. Sharing aesthetic influences from both German expressionism and film noir, but of an especially proto-Lynchian nature in its portrayal of a weird girl in trouble in a viperous seaside post-industrial netherworld, Dementia is a hypnotic hypnagogic journey through one less than cuddly colleen's afflicted and overwrought mind. Dementia often has a sinister and surreal semblance comparable to Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls (1962) – a work noted for its entrancing organ score by Gene Moore and sepulchral, otherworldly essence – but to a more pronounced, penetrating, and perturbing degree. The relentless phantasm realm of Dementia fits in somewhere in between Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1917), F.W. Murnau's Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927), Curtis Harrington's Night Tide (1961), and David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), but one can only get a true aesthetic articulation of the film by actually viewing it.

Dementia begins in the seedy hotel room of the film's austere anti-heroess aka 'the Gamin' (played by unknown/forgotten actress Adrienne Barrett) who has just awakened from a less than blissful beachside nightmare. Although some reviewers have described this young lady as "sexy" and whatnot, I found her to be quite androgynous in both appearance and affectation as she could have easily played Sal Mineo's role opposite of James Dean in Rebel Without a Cause (1955). Adorned around the cadaverous gal's neck is a necklace and sphinx-like amulet as if she is an initiate in some sort of arcane occult tradition. Soon after awakening from her somber slumber, the girl grabs a switchblade out of a dresser drawer and leaves the apartment for the shadowy alleys of the menacing metropolis. Encountering a number of curious human creatures on her seemingly aimless but remarkably eventful journey, including a minatory midget, abusive husband, delirious drunk, pestering pimp, and a rich hedonistic fat cat, the girl is clearly stirred and frightened by the less savory elements of the male gender. The girl begins to realize that her past has come back to haunt her when she buys a newspaper from the midget with the headline, "Mysterious Stabbing." Eventually, the girl is brought to a lonely graveyard somewhat resembling the one featured in Ed Wood's Plan 9 From Outerspace (1959) by a faceless entity. Incidentally, Dementia cinematographer William C. Thompson would later film Wood's less than artful 1959 'masterpiece', as well as the cross-dressing horror hack's infamously atrocious works Glen or Glenda (1953) and Night of the Ghouls (1959). While at the graveyard, the daunted debutante recollects the life-shattering night when her abusive father sadistically slaughtered her trashy, trifling mother. The scenic cemetery scene is probably best remembered for appearing in the popular independent sci-fi/horror flick The Blob (1958) during the movie theater sequence when the blob attacks, but it also happens to be one of the most poignant and illuminating moments of Dementia as it reveals the source of the lead anti-protagonist's debilitating mental sickness; dementia.

Although barely recognized and instantly forgotten upon its original release; and still relatively underrated today, Dementia has gone on to inspire various subsequent cinematic works. Some have argued that the film influenced Orson Welles' nearly immaculate direction of his chimerical mystery masterpiece Touch of Evil (1958). Somewhat fortuitously (or not), the obese fat man featured in Dementia also resembles Welles' repulsive character police Captain Hank Quinlan in Touch of Evil. The esoteric hardcore porn flick Bacchanale (1970) directed by the Amero brothers also seems to be heavily inspired by (if not an extremely loose remake of) Dementia. Like Dementia, Bacchanale follows a young girl (this time played by a voluptuous bombshell blonde) as she awakens in her hotel room and wanders pell-mell through the city, henceforth encountering faceless spirits in graveyards and other exceedingly debauched, eccentric, and erratic beings. Also, like Dementia – which features a variety of Kerouac-esque beatniks – Bacchanale is a marginal yet uniquely revealing work of its time, featuring hapless hippies and loose morals that reflect the degenerate zeitgeist of the hyperhedonic counter-culture movement. Needless to say, Dementia is a decidedly nihilistic work with nil redeeming characters, including the foreordained lead character, thus making it an audacious aberration of 1950s American cinema. Not even the more surly and sardonic works of the so-called "American New Wave” of the late 1960’s to early 1980s can compare to the ever-present apocalyptic and amphibological persuasion of Dementia; a celluloid tribulation of the most terrorizing yet transcendent sort. In 2001, carny noise musician and perennial dilettante Boyd Rice (with the help of Dwid Hellion of the ‘metallic punk/hardcore’ band Integrity) composed a new score for Dementia and performed it live at the 17th annual L’Etrange Festival, which is unequivocally a comme il faut tribute to a work that was heavily inspired by the more morose films of the silent era; a lamentably lost period of cinema history when image was everything and a live orchestra acted as an accentual ritualistic sound procession of sorts. One can only wonder whether or not a version of the film featuring Rice’s score will be released, but I doubt it will add anything to Dementia; a hyperphysical and hallucinatory cinematic expression of hopeless female hysteria.

John R. Hand (2006)

FrankenSteins Bloody Nightmare is in a genre all its own. Writer/Director/Main Lead John R. Hand has his own techniques dearly noted with the release of his debut film. The film plays out like a psycho-surreal retelling of the original Frankenstein novel. Much of the film is immensely abstract and for virgin viewers of any form of cult or art house cinema, it would be best to avoid. Now the plot follows a very thick, yet hidden plot that is very hard to notice due to the directors ingenious sound transfer on the film. Voices are so muddled you turn up the volume and get assaulted by bizarre beeps and long drones. Brilliant physician Victor Karlstein is in a state of manic depression and he gets reality blurred together with dreams and nightmares for that matter. His girlfriend is dying from an unknown disease and he is unable to help her. Watching from afar as she slips in and out of consciousness, he comes up with a bizarre idea to use a "mechanically enhanced" burn victim to kill people to harvest their raw organs to create a new body for her. Personally, i think the story already sounds better. FrankenSteins Bloody Nightmare has nothing to hide, but it refuses to answer any questions after the film is over. It's clever use of heat vision-like scenes and amazing color spectrum's splattered on walls provides it with a misty, grainy, yet sleazy feel. John R. Hand was perfect as the lead role in this film. His character had compassion but chose to not share it. Besides that, nothing else is known. The ending alone set it's self up for a sequel or at least a prologue. Much is needed to be explained. Such as the mysterious company he owns, the turmoil from his family life, and the unexplained voice conversation. I also feel i should warn you of the dreamlike fisting scene with his monster. It took me a while to figure out what was happening but once i found out, what i had seen could not be unseen. Once the credits roll, you will be wondering to yourself "What just happened?". It's very nonchalant about its use of imagery and angles to help capture the overall silent intensity of this film. This film is definitely only for seasoned viewers of the obscure and bizarre. The score composed by The Greys is worth it alone. The violence is little to none but only proves that you don't need buckets of blood or scream queens to make you feel uneasy.

Purchase this film at [Unearthed Films] First Iskanov, and now Hand. Unearthed Films is doing a great job releasing modern day autuers.

MIDNIGHT COWBOY

John Schlesinger (1969)

Midnight Cowboy was the first major assault against rural (or to the filmmakers “rednecks”) Americans. A film with a male Texan gigolo using a cowboy gimmick most likely offended John Wayne fans. Only scum would mount this naive bimbo according to grease ball Ratso. Cowboy in costume Joe Buck (Jon Voight) and cripple Enrico “Ratso” Rizzo (Dustin Hoffman) make the best couple in Midnight Cowboy. Squatting in the city takes commitment.

There is no doubt that Midnight Cowboy is one of the greatest American films ever made. It is the only X-rated movie to win an Oscar. Of course, this isn’t saying much considering when examining other “great” American films. Midnight Cowboy actually deserves the recognition it has acquired since its debut. It even beats out its historical competitors The Graduate and Easy Rider. Midnight Cowboy is by far the most extreme of the three.

The editing in Midnight Cowboy is some of the best that I have seen come out of Hollywood. The film’s various flashback collages make for some of the most segments of the film. One involves the gang raping of Joe Buck and his girlfriend by a group of good ol’ boys. Ratso also makes a ghostly appearance in these segment (don’t bother considering it foreshadowing). This was quite a bold move by director John Schlesinger. It also seems that Soviet montage was put to contemporary use (although still for propaganda purposes).

Midnight Cowboy also features one of those late 1960’s movie soundtracks that works perfectly with the film but you would never listen to on your own free time. The late 1960s (and its music) sparked the end of old American and beginning of new so-called “progressive” America. I guess a young Cowboy is expected to fail in this new world. Joe Buck can’t even get paid for his homosexual activities. Donating blood seems to be the best source of income.

Joe Buck is a sad yet funny young man. Director Schlesinger had at least a little love for his star character. Even when he beats and robs a gay old man you can’t help to feel sorry for Joe. Midnight Cowboy’s ending is truly a sad when Joe ends up lonely and broke in Florida. I would not want to end up in Florida under such conditions.

Midnight Cowboy almost makes me proud to be America. A film that that brings the naively backward to the modern degenerate is always a fun experience. From the roadside diner to the Warhol style drug party, you will find a little bit of America for everyone. I only wish I could find out what later happened to Joe Buck.

THE DAY OF THE LOCUST
THE DAY OF THE LOCUST

John Schlesinger (1975)

While on a recent much-needed and long-awaited vacation where I did very little of anything aside from watching a shitload of films, I found myself almost ritualistically devouring an eclectic plethora of (mostly great) ranging from Jan Troell's epic diptych The Emigrants (1971) and The New Land (1972) to John Schlesinger's The Day of the Locust (1975). While these particular films might seem like a curious combo as they share very little in common in both the aesthetic and thematic sense, they really highlighted for me what I both love and hate about the United States; or, the real organic settler Euro-America that created this nation and the phony Hebraic Hollywood anti-America that colonized the minds of its creators. While Troell's singularly epic diptych—two masterful films that Terrence Malick seems to have spent his entire career attempting to model his own cinematic works after—provides an exceedingly earthly and sometimes realist yet nonetheless transcendental depiction of the great struggle involved with enterprising Europeans becoming (true) Americans after courageously abandoning their homelands and pretty much everything else they knew, Schlesinger's film provides, in many ways, the complete opposite experience as an oftentimes gorgeously grotesque and absurdist portrait of the phony culture-distorting America where phony shallow cinematic dreams are dubiously conjured and hopelessly forsaken people and their oftentimes devastatingly deluded dreams go to die a particularly pathetic death. Not surprisingly, the films also had considerably different receptions among critics, which is why I feel the need to defend the much maligned Schlesinger feature, which I would argue is the 'British' auteur's true magnum opus and greatest and most ambitious artistic achievement, especially considering its current questionable reputation compared to much inferior and, in turn, absurdly overrated films (e.g. MASH (1970), Harold and Maude (1970)) from the same so-called 'New Hollywood' era. Indeed, the film is a strange reminder that, on very rare occasion, Hollywood was curiously involved in the production of subversive cinematic art that metaphysically eviscerates everything that Tinseltown represents.

Based on the 1939 novel of the same name by NYC-bred Ashkenazi writer Nathanael West—a Hollywood insider of sorts that worked as a screenwriter on films like John Farrow's Five Came Back (1939) starring Chester Morris and Lucille Ball—The Day of the Locust is a largely plot-less and deceptively dream-like (anti)odyssey of oftentimes aberrant and even grotesque spectacle that dares to ruthlessly demolish the conspicuously counterfeit kosher Hollywood version of the so-called 'American Dream.' In that sense, it is hard to imagine that David Lynch's Mulholland Drive (2001) would exist without Schlesinger's sort of 'Tinseltown Gothic,' which oftentimes feels like the brooding baroque cinematic equivalent to Kenneth Anger's gossip classic Hollywood Babylon (1959), albeit focusing on the everyday misfortunes of Hollywood's failed nobodies instead of the tragic ends of opium-addled superstars and coveted closet-queens. Indeed, featuring strange references from films ranging from Robert J. Flaherty's classic silent (pseudo)anthropological doc Nanook of the North (1922) to Josef von Sternberg's classic Marlene Dietrich vehicle Blonde Venus (1932) and a somewhat fitting cameo from Hebraic horror huckster William Castle as a dictatorial studio director that literally directs his crew into disaster, The Day of the Locust is an ideally idiosyncratic piece of cinephilia for cinephiles that hate Hollywood or, at least, the phony hokey Hollywood that acts as a mask for the festering moral rot and decay that is barely hidden beneath. Of course, the best films about Hollywood tend to touch on this subject, including works ranging from classics like Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard (1950) to more obscure (and underrated) works like John Byrum's X-rated Golden Age era celluloid grotesquerie Inserts (1975) to the Coen Brothers cult classic Barton Fink (1991), but The Day of the Locust arguably transcends all of these films in terms of sheer unending eccentricity, mirthful misanthropy, and slow-burning necrotic spirit.

While Schlesinger—a gay British Jew that is surely best remembered today for his Academy Award-winning gay-for-pay counterculture nightmare Midnight Cowboy (1969)—can hardly be described as 'right wing' or 'conservative' in any sort of sense, he was fairly aesthetically apolitical as demonstrated by his controversial collaborations with Nazi composer Herbert von Karajan and surprisingly vocal appreciation for Leni Riefenstahl's films, including Triumph of the Will (1935). Undoubtedly, many of the auteur's films can certainly be described as 'red-pilled' by today's decidedly degenerate standards, which probably has more to do with Schlesinger's subversive spirit as an artist than any sort of serious political allegiances. Indeed, Darling (1965) starring Julie Christie demonstrates the great perils of being a soulless careerist whore and how a misguided lust for fame and fortune can quickly turn a beautiful young debutante into a lonely and unlovable monster that treats an abortion like a hair-cut. In Far from the Madding Crowd (1967), Christie reprises the young dumb (yet delectable) know-it-all-bitch routine and portrays a so-called 'independent women' that thrives on hypocrisy and narcissism, makes all the wrong decisions, deceitfully uses men to run her farm and ultimately engages in petty behavior that leads to the destruction of the lives of two of three suitors that want to marry her (and, rather fittingly, she is ultimately stuck with a boorish man that she liked least of the three). In Marathon Man (1976), the Hebraic hero is arguably less likeable than the evil elderly Nazi doctor trying to kill him. Also, Schlesinger's most famous film Midnight Cowboy can hardly be described as featuring a positive portrayal of poofers or Warholian art fags and the filmmaker himself even once described it as being "viewed as somewhat antigay." In Sunday Bloody Sunday (1971), a middle-aged gay Jewish doctor and bitchy shiksa spinster seem to thinking have an affair with the same young (and seemingly sociopathic) quasi-hustler acts as an apt substitution for marriage and children, thereupon underscoring the biting soullessness of their sad lives. While Schlesinger spent much of the later part of his career directing largely forgettable hack work, including the shockingly banal supernatural horror flick The Believers (1987) and the yawn-driven yuppie pseudo-psychological thriller Pacific Heights (1990), it is clear from his greatest films that he was no petty propagandist and that he had the rare ability to embrace the ugliness of humanity without succumbing to any sort of shallow sermonizing, as if the auteur was a mere passive observer among his own idiosyncratic cinematic creations. In The Day of the Locust, Schlesinger exposes the viewer to an eclectic collection of eccentrics, lecherous losers, (self)destructive drunks, lost souls, and odiously opportunistic whores, yet one never gets the feeling that Schlesinger has any unkind feelings towards these mostly forsaken individuals. At the same time, it is probably the only film where one almost feels a deep sense of therapeutic joy when kid is stomped to death in a scenario that ultimately unleashes a sort of Hollywoodland holocaust. Needless to say, this is no feel-good-film, yet it somehow maintain an unexpected degree of rapture and unconventional humanistic intrigue, which are undoubtedly some of Schlesinger's greatest attributes as a filmmaker.

Notably, Schlesinger's mischling journalist nephew Ian Buruma once described The Day of the Locust as, "Perhaps John's darkest picture—made at the happiest time of his life—it failed to win a major award." In other words, aside from being his most artistically ambitious film, it is also his most absurdly neglected and misunderstood. As Schlesinger remarked to Buruma himself, "MIDNIGHT COWBOY, SUNDAY BLOODY SUNDAY, and THE DAY OF THE LOCUST were all made cheek by jowl. This was probably the moment I felt most liberated, when I felt I could make films on these sort of subjects. Perhaps I've never reached that point since." Beyond its subversive subject matter, the film was also a long marinating passion project that Schlesinger would have to wait many years to make until he acquired the commercial and critical success that came with Midnight Cowboy and even then he faced many roadblocks from the studio and producers, which makes perfect sense considering the film depicts Hollywood as a schlocky Sodom run by virtual slave-driving sociopaths and overflowing with alcohol-addled whores that will do virtually anything just to get even the least prestigious of barely-paid positions on a seedy studio lot. In short, Schlesinger savagely yet exceedingly elegantly demolishes the legendary (plastic) glamour and shallow intrigue of unholywood while at the same time sardonically assaulting the very same sickening system that the film was made within. Indeed, even Robert Evans—the legendary (and then-relatively-young) Hollywood film producer and studio executive that completely revitalized the studio system during the American New Wave era with classic works like Rosemary's Baby (1968), The Godfather (1972), and Chinatown (1974)—was completely against the film, or as Schlesinger explained himself, “Robert Evans—who ran Paramount—absolutely hated the idea of THE DAY OF THE LOCUST and said so forcibly and did anything that he could to prevent the film being made [...] Essentially Bob Evans is a Hollywood man [...] I think he just didn't like what the film stood for. People in the industry didn't like the story; they didn't like the rather downbeat, critical attitude of West's novel. Evans also didn't think it was commercial, which, of course, it wasn't.” Luckily, Schlesinger had the kosher clout to have his way and create what is arguably the biggest and most epic ‘anti-Hollywood Hollywood’ film ever and the auteur was even such a nice guy that he subsequently collaborated with Evans on the surprisingly subversive ‘Jewish thriller’ Marathon Man despite the studio executive's poor treatment of his dream film.

While he virtually disappears for a good portion of the film, ostensibly straight-laced WASP Tod Hackett (William Atherton)—an ivy league boy that looks like he was descended from America's most thoroughbred Anglo-Saxon stock—is certainly the lead protagonist of the film and he soon discovers after moving into a tiny apartment with a literal ‘hole in the wall’ at a crusty complex called San Bernardino Arms in Hollywood that the town is completely morally bankrupt at all levels, as it takes a certain razor sharp unscrupulousness to not only merely compete, but especially to get ahead. Luckily for him, Hackett—a man whose name hints that he is a ‘dead hack’ of sorts—immediately becomes hopelessly infatuated with an exceedingly empty cocktease of the platinum peroxide blonde philistine sort named Faye Greener (Karen Black) after encountering her living at the same apartment complex with her father and he soon finds it easy to assimilate to the amorality of his rather pathetic excess-ridden environment. Aside from being willing to do virtually anything to get into Faye's panties, which seems to be protected by an invisible chastity belt, Hackett also discovers that he must lose his soul if he wants to establish a successful career as a pre-production artist at Paramount Studios where a hyper-cynical booze-and-porn-loving screenwriter named Claude Estee (Richard A. Dysart) takes him under his wing as a sort of protégé of mindless hedonistic perversity that entails dumb debauched parties involving primitive S&M blue movies and alcohol-driven cock fights, among other things. In a scenario that seems to have been taken from Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890), Hackett begins working on a large Otto Dix-esque painting on his earthquake-worn wall that not only unmasks the true demonic essence of Hollywood as if the protagonist has special They Live-like glasses, but also foreshadows an apocalyptic scenario at the very end of the film. Indeed, while Hackett comes to Hollywood to perform frivolous hack work for insipid popcorn pictures, the malignant spiritual moribundity, innate immorality, and all-encompassing soullessness begins impact that artist deeply and his art soon begins to resemble something that might be created by the bastard son of Edvard Munch and Leonor Fini.

THE DAY OF THE LOCUST

Despite the fact that Faye is a fiercely fake and frigid bitch that impulsively says stupid shit like, “I hate people with thin lips. People with thin lips are mean. That’s true. I read that Somewhere,” and refuses to give up even the most minuscule crumb of poontang because she is strategically saving her clearly over-appraised virginity for the ideal rich and handsome man that she absurdly thinks she has the potential to marry despite not being much more than a poor man’s lobotomized Marilyn Monroe, Hackett accepts being friend-zoned because he is so hopelessly horny for her ice-cold-cunt that he is willing to wait for a day that ultimately never cums. While Faye makes it known to everyone that he thinks she is hot shit, her fairly banal blonde Barbie doll good looks are the sole thing she has going for her, as she is literally the bastard brood of a whore that abandoned her for a “magician bastard” and a washed-up dipsomaniacal ex-vaudeville performer turned failed snake oil (or ‘Miracle Solvent’) salesman named Harry Greener (Burgess Meredith). In a sane world, Faye would gladly accept Hackett as her male suitor as he is almost in every way her superior, including arguably looks, but she is deluded by big dreams of Hollywood stardom due to getting minor roles as extras in c-grade movies and—as she confesses to the protagonist—he surely is not her type. Aside from planning to marry a rich dude that has the capacity bloat both her ego and bank account, Faye seems to take after her estranged whore mother in terms of being naturally sexually attracted to low-status savages as demonstrated by the fact she eventually self-destructively fucks a superlatively swarthy Mexican cockfighter that lives in a garage. When Hackett declares his love to her not long after meeting her, Faye—the Hollywood hypergamic harpy par excellence—rather bluntly reveals her self-satisfied shallowness and stereotypical feminine propensity towards self-deception by responding, “Don’t make me hurt you. You’re very kind and clever, but I could only let a really rich man love me. I could only love someone criminally handsome. Please try to understand.” As a sort of Dr. Jekyll/ Ms. Hyde grotesque caricature of the virgin-whore archetype(s) as clearly irreparably despoiled by a lifetime of Hollywood propaganda starring hunky heartthrobs like Cary Grant, Faye epitomizes virtually everything that is insufferable about modern womankind, which is quite fitting since Hollywood—a narcotizing delusion factory that produces romantic twaddle that tricks stupid chicks into fantasizing magical imaginary men and luxurious lifestyles that they will never be able to obtain—is largely responsible for women having such preposterously high expectations despite very rarely having anything to bring to the table aside from the purely physical. To Hackett’s credit, he is treated relatively kindly by Faye, especially compared to a poor sapless sap named Homer Simpson (Donald Sutherland) that eventually find himself caught in her web of contrived femininity and counterfeit glamour.

While Faye seems to genuinely appreciate Hackett’s friendship, even after he attempts to rape her while screaming that she is a “bitch” after she rejects his rather aggressive sexual advances, she only displays visceral hatred and re-sentiment towards poor hapless homeboy Homer. Indeed, after being forced to sell her virginity to some old fart to pay for her father's funeral when he unexpectedly dies, Faye eventually sets up a 'business relationship' with Homer that seems to be totally sexless and simply involves the heroine living in his house as a sort of less than subservient pseudo-wife that refuses to even make him dinner (in fact, mirthful masochist Homer ultimately becomes the servant). Naturally, Faye almost immediately begins rather flagrantly cuckolding Homer, as she not only has her fake cowboy friend and his Mexican pal move into his home, but she also even fucks the latter. Clearly disgusted by Homer's weakness and incapacity to 'assert' himself with a woman, Faye seems to derive sadistic glee from psychologically torturing the poor cowardly cuck, so naturally it is only a matter of time before he completely snaps. Unfortunately for him and his not-all-that-innocent victim, Homer, like many people that completely crack-up, loses his shit at the wrong place and wrong time in what ultimately proves to be a sort of burst of apocalyptic fury. Needless to say, it is only fitting that Homer is a devout Jesus freak of sorts, as it underlines the capacity of Hollywood to erode anyone's soul, not matter how deeply religious and/or terminally sexually repressed. Of course, as someone that goes to a phony spiritually vacant proto-megachurch with an electric crucifix with the words "Give To Jesus" written across it that more resembles a vaudeville show than a serious house of worship, Homer—an extremely fearful and nervous autistic of sorts that seems to be perennially internally wounded as a result of a lengthy childhood illness—is not exactly the most mentally sharp of men despite having a little bit of wealth and a nice house due to his accountant background. As someone that clearly cannot support herself, Faye only reluctantly decides to shack up with Homer after her father dies and she is left without a home, though, to her credit, she does demonstrate an unexpected degree of selfless sacrifice when she sells her much-prized virginal puss to pay for her papa's funeral. Indeed, instead of becoming a big Hollywood starlet, Faye is forced to settle for being what she has clearly always secretly suspected she was—a cheap unlovable whore. As for Hackett, Faye's moral deterioration does not deter his desire to defile her and he even preposterously rationalizes her cash-for-gash deflowering by stating to a drunken ambiguously Hebraic midget, "She waited till the old guy was dead. I'll give her that much." Rather pathetically, even after Faye loses his virginity, Hackett still fails to seal the carnal deal.

Considering that Faye predictably dedicates her life to increasingly ruthlessly mocking and emasculating him after moving into his home, it is only a matter of time before Homer—a terribly nervous Nellie that has absolutely nil outlet for his seemingly perpetual internal misery and misfortune—completely explodes, which ultimately acts as a catalyst to the film's savagely surreal climax that quite fittingly takes place at a big movie premiere. Notably, the ending is somewhat foreshadowed in an unforgettable scene that would probably give John Landis—a morally dubious director that is certainly no stranger to catastrophic movie set mishaps—cold chills where a huge Battle of Waterloo battlefield set directed by William Castle completely collapses during filming and injures tons of actors and extras portraying soldiers. Despite being a fairly cold and stoic man that rarely expresses emotion aside from when less than suavely attempting to fuck Faye, Hackett, who created sketches that acted as virtual blueprints for the set pieces, is somewhat shocked by the senseless tragedy, which he immediately realizes is the direct result of both the studio's negligence and shameless apathy towards human life. When Hackett attempts to warn the studio head about how the accident was easily avoidable and the direct result of senseless negligence, he is treated to a haircut and shoeshine from a jolly old negro and is later told by his screenwriter friend Claude that it "wouldn't have made a difference" if people had actually died (while apathetic toward human life, Claude does get a thrill from drunken cock fights with Hebraic midgets and Mexicans). Naturally, the event inspires Hackett's apocalyptic mural collage/painting, which literally comes to life at the film's conclusion, at least in the protagonist's mind.

At the a world premiere of Cecil B. DeMille's The Buccaneer (1938) at Grauman's Chinese Theater is where the Hollywood dream turns into a fiery phantasmagoric holocaust. Indeed, when a creepy proto-tranny child named 'Adore Loomis' (Jackie Earle Haley)—a platinum blond(e) kid pervert that plays the peeping tom when his mother isn't whoring 'him' out for small roles movies—dares to tease Homer one-too-many-times in between obnoxiously singing "Jeepers Creepers" and hitting him in the head with a rock, among other forms of childish degradation, he ultimately finds himself resigned to the strangely fitting undignified fate of being stomped to death. Already totally distraught because Faye has left him, the insufferable child's taunts ultimately cause Homer to completely explode to the point where he does not even bother to notice that he stomps the kid to death in front of seemingly thousands of people, thereupon sparking a full-scale riot where he is seemingly ripped apart by an angry lynch mob while a rather rotund studio announcer unwittingly brags about the excitement of the crowd in a totally twisted scenario that really underscores the curious combination of insipidly stupid spectacle and emotion retardation that personifies Hollywood. In the end, the entire area is burned down, including pine trees, while Hackett loses his mind as he finally acknowledges the virtual hell that he has been condemned to. In the end, Faye goes by Hackett's apartment and sadly discovers that he has wisely vacated the premises, though his rose-in-the-wall remains. In short, this Hollywood film hardly has a happy Hollywood ending, though it is certainly bittersweet that Hackett wisely hightails it out of Hollyweird hell. As to the status of Hackett's sanity, one can only speculate.

Rather unsurprisingly considering its decidedly dark and respectably audience-alienating subject matter, The Day of the Locust—a big budget film that only grossed about $2,300,000, which was about a third of its cost—was one of the biggest flops of 1975 and it seems that Hollywood, including the studio that produced it, was not exactly sad about this fact. For example, as Schlesinger explained to Buruma in regard to how the film was received among friends and associates when it was first screened, “Afterward, in a rather smart Italian restaurant in Beverly Hills, we found Polanski and Jack Nicholson, and a lot of people who were in CHINATOWN, sitting at the next table. They looked very embarrassed. Eventually someone came over and said, ‘I want to congratulate you,’ but they were obviously very embarrassed by their reaction—or lack of it—and so was I. I think the film generally wasn’t being received terribly well.” Apparently other people, including respected Hollywood filmmakers, were more vocal about their disdain for the film, or as Schlesinger’s official biographer William J. Mann explained in Edge of Midnight: The Life of John Schlesinger (2004), “Hollywood was, quite frankly, appalled; many took the film as a personal affront. John was told that at a screening at a movie executive’s home in Bel Air, the exec’s wife stood up halfway through and apologized to her guests for making them sit through such an outrage. Even some who seemingly shared John’s spirit of challenge found the film too hard on the industry. Sidney Lumet, director of SERPICO and DOG DAY AFTERNOON, was bashing LOCUST all around town, reportedly asking, ‘How can Schlesinger shit where he eats?’ Word got back to John, who was furious, prompting a four-page hand-written apology from Lumet.” Indeed, it seems that even fellow semitic subversive auteurs found Schlesinger’s film to be an unforgivable assault on the studio system they seemingly pretended to rebel against, which is exactly why The Day of the Locust is ultimately considerably more transgressive than the filmmaker’s much more widely beloved Midnight Cowboy. Of course, as a patently preternatural arthouse affair on Hollywood steroids that concludes with the protagonist’s and, in turn America and the entire world’s, (Hollywood) dreams going up in smoke in a violently surreal and hypnotically haunting Hollywood holocaust that can be seen as both a cold ruthless execution and deservedly cynical eulogy for Tinseltown—as if Schlesinger had some sort of (subconscious) belief that the studios had committed certain ungodly crimes and they would eventually be ruthlessly punished for said crimes in a big brutal kismet fashion—the film was naturally doomed to offend the majority of people. In that sense, it is rather fitting that this apocalyptic conclusion is sparked by the brutal murder of an obscenely obnoxious sort of proto-tranny child, as it hints at the seemingly perennial rumors of (sexual) abuse in Hollywood as noted by people Corey Feldman as well as the aberrant sexualization and androgynization of children in Hollywood films (somewhat fittingly, the kid was portrayed by Jackie Earle Haley, who would go on to portray child killer/molester Freddy Krueger in the abortive A Nightmare on Elm Street (2010) remake). It is also fitting that it is a largely innocent and seemingly virginal Christian man—the sort of individual that Hollywood regularly targets for abuse—ushers in this apocalypse. In that regard, I would not be surprised if certain Hollywood producers and studio heads interpreted the film as some sort of prophetic threat where these very powerful individuals were forced to consider for the very first time in their entire lives that their degenerate movie miscreations might provoke a backlash of biblical proportions, hence the fitting setting of a Cecil B. DeMille—a filmmaker of Hebraic extraction that oftentimes took a curiously homoerotic approach to his religious epics—movie premiere.

As reflected in its uniquely unflattering portrayal of Hollywood and its history, there is good reason that studio heads and filmmakers loathed the film, as it has a certain scathing covert contra kosher spirit. For example, before succumbing to Hollywood-inflicted alcoholism, Harry Greener semi-cryptically alludes to the Judaic control of Hollywood by stating while making certain vaudevillian shylock-like gestures, “you ain’t got a chance in hell if you ain’t one of them. You know what I mean? And they got it all locked up. To hell with them.” Of course, the character’s sentiments are not random, as famous figures even used to express such concerns, even card-carrying communists like novelist Theodore Dreiser. As Neal Gabler explained in An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood (1988), “Even within Hollywood itself there was mumbling about Jewish control. For some it was the handiest rationale for thwarted dreams. Theodore Dreiser had been lured out to Hollywood in the thirties to oversee the film production of his monumental novel AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY, but he had battled hammer and tongs with Paramount over what he felt was the ‘traducing’ of his masterpiece, and now he had departed, trying to raise money for a new project on tobacco monopolist James Buchanan Duke. When that failed, Dreiser blamed the Jews. He wrote a Swiftian satire suggesting that Jews be rounded up and packed off to Kansas where they could do no more harm. To a friend he wrote, ‘The movies are solidly Jewish. They’ve dug in, demploy only Jews with American names. . . . The dollar sign is the guide—mentally & physically. That American should be led—the mass—the direction is beyond all believing. In addition, they are arrogant, insolent and contemptuous.’” Apparently, such counter-kosher sentiments were not simply isolated to gentiles as Louis B. Mayer was apparently quite fond of throwing around antisemitic slurs as alluded to by the character based on him played by Michael Lerner in Barton Fink and Jewish New York film executive Herbert Somborn even immediately plotted to get Gloria Swanson “out of the hands of these Eastern European Jews” after marrying her. Knowing all of this, it is surely fitting that excerpts from The Day of the Locust appear in the documentary Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies and the American Dream (1998), which is a sort of superficial adaptation of Gabler’s book. After all, not unlike Gabler’s book, Schlesinger’s film is one of the few honest examples of the hermetic Hebraic history of Hollywood. Needless to say, it is hardly a subtle nod to the character of the typical semitic studio director when Hebraic hack William Castle portrays a ‘fascistic’ filmmaker that screams at the crew and ultimately directs them into literal tragedy. It is also notable that said tragedy is set during the Battle of Waterloo, which is a historical event that is noted for creating a good portion of the Rothschild Banking Dynasty's wealth. In fact, the Nazi propaganda film Die Rothschilds (1940) aka The Rothschilds' Shares in Waterloo directed by Erich Waschneck depicts this scenario and there's a good chance that Schlesinger was aware of this fact as it is known that he was at least familiar with some Nazi cinema. Even more incriminating, the pre-Code Hollywood film The House of Rothschild (1934)—a vehemently pro-Jewish production that, although quite successful as the biggest hit of the year for Twentieth Century Picture and a work that was even nominated for the Academy Award for Best Picture, is curiously completely unavailable today—concludes with Nathan Rothschild becoming the richest man in the world as a result of the Battle of Waterloo and even gleefully bragging, "Europe hides its head in shame because it borrows from the Jews." On a more unintentional yet nonetheless still subtextual level, the film even exploited the work of old Israelites that very quite possibly worked in Golden Age Hollywood, or as Mann explained in regard to a scene involving Harry Greener, "Even less orderly was the faith-healing sequence. Several hundred extras were bused in to act as Geraldine Page's faithful followers. 'Old-age pensions,' John reported, 'many of whom had come from Jewish old people's homes and who were confronted by three neon crosses saying, 'Give to Jesus.' Up on stage, the choir mistress was trying to rouse the extras by urging them to pray to the Savior. Some in the crowd didn't understand they were to be in a movie and were terribly offended; some stormed back to the bus, complaining loudly. 'Looking back on it,' John said, 'it was really very funny.'" Undoubtedly, the fact that Schlesinger personally felt that the semitic scenario was hilarious only adds to the absurdist hilarity of this scene in subsequent viewings.

I don't know what motivated me to endure such frivolously schmaltzy, shallow, and just downright soulless celluloid bromide, but I recently watched George Stevens' classic RKO musical Swing Time (1936) and it reminded me how much Golden Age Hollywood polluted the world with outstandingly artistically bankrupt kitsch crap that really has no redeeming qualities whatsoever, as if the major studios were largely run by a sociopathic race of hedonistic space aliens that had nil clue as to how to express organic human emotions and merely substituted them with the great aesthetic sin of brashly bombastic spectacle. Of course, this is just one of the many reasons I treasure a film like The Day of the Locust that, not like Robert Altman's The Player (1992), takes an oftentimes darkly humorous approach to forcing Hollywood to drown in its own grandiloquent depravity and almost otherworldly hypocrisy while exposing its excremental excesses and ludicrous lies. In fact, I think it might be fitting punishment for the more corrupt studio heads to being subjected watching the film on a loop for eternity while being forced to shine Robert Bresson's shoes, clean P.P. Pasolini's toilet, and wash Carl Th. Dreyer's underwear. Surely, it is a sort of poetic form of cinematic kismet that Teutonic master auteur F.W. Murnau died tragically in Hollywood after having his films like 4 Devils (1928) and City Girl (1930) tampered with by the studios and then temporarily escaping to the South Pacific for his swansong Tabu (1931). While Schlesinger would live a number of years longer than Murnau, his experience with Hollywood was not all that different as virtually all of his later films were tampered with or mere soulless hack work after the flop of The Day of the Locust. Indeed, as Mann rightly noted, “THE DAY OF THE LOCUST was the last of John Schlesinger’s ‘great’ films. It was the last time he would so completely immerse himself in an attempt to create something monumental, in which he and a group of brilliant, trusted collaborators truly sought to find an original, artistic interpretation of the material they were putting on the screen.”

While Schlesinger’s previous film Sunday Bloody Sunday was also a flop, it at least received very positive reviews from most of the right respected critics whereas The Day of the Locust was attacked by most critics, including many of those sympathetic to the auteur’s previous films. One of the few people that seemed to both appreciate and understand the film was Judith Crist, who paid it a great compliment when she described it as a, “Consideration of the American dream by way of the factory town that dispensed it . . . To call it the finest film of the past several years is to belittle it. It stands beyond comparison.” Crist’s words are no mere puffery because, in terms of sheer scope and ambition as well as epic eccentricity, Schlesinger’s arguable magnum opus is like The Wizard of Oz (1939) of sardonic (anti)Hollywood Golden Age period pieces as a (sometimes) subtle satire of the strikingly idiosyncratic sort that also packs pathos and even manages to be genuinely horrifying than the best horror flicks (undoubtedly, the conclusion of the film somewhat echoes the more phantasmagorical scenes of Herk Harvey’s classic Carnival of Souls (1962)). Of course, this is no surprise as anything resembling cinematic art that comes out of Hollywood tends to defy genre and audience expectation, though The Day of the Locust goes beyond this as a largely plot-less portrait of preternatural misery and misanthropy where virtually every single character is forsaken and ‘happiness’—or, at least, any sort of long-term happiness—is exposed as, at best, a terribly naive ideal and, at worst, a shallow fantasy sold to suckers by innately manipulative Hollywood culture distorters, hence the lack of love for such a film. In short, the film gives a way the garbage game of Hebraic Hollywood and does with a sort of understated acidic aesthetic style of one thousand dope-addled failed screen divas courteously of the great cinematographer Conrad L. Hall (In Cold Blue, Fat City). In terms of its sort of plot-less promenade approach where the viewer randomly encounters an eclectic collection of characters like an ant at an ant hill and rather misanthropic spirit and mostly unflattering depictions of sex and sexuality, the film is certainly comparable to Georgian auteur Otar Iosseliani’s classic Les Favoris de la lune (1984) aka Favorites of the Moon of all films.

I recently watched David Robert Mitchell's darkly comedic neo-noir Under the Silver Lake (2018) and, while I did not find it as enjoyable or immaculate as the auteur's previous film It Follows (2014), I could not help but wallow in the fairly singular cinematic experience it provides due to its sometimes surreal approach to depicting Los Angeles as a virtual hellhole disguised as heaven where the rich and famous voluntarily prematurely end in their lives in a tomb of hedonism due to an absurd (pseudo)religious belief that their souls will magically 'ascend' like ancient Egyptian Pharaohs. Indeed, whether it be the brutal S&M sods of Fred Halsted's classic experimental homo hardcore flick LA Plays Itself (1972), the sinister quasi-vampiric Hollywood Hills brother-sister duo that drain swingers of their precious sanguine fluids in The Black Room (1982) co-directed by Elly Kenner and Norman Thaddeus Vane, or the slow-burning post-Lynchian lunacy of the Coen brothers' cryptically contra kosher Barton Fink (1991), I love films that absolutely annihilate the Hollywood dream and present Tinseltown as a nefarious nightmare that the Devil himself would be proud to call home. After all, how else can one think of a patently phony place involved in greatly profiting from a global social engineering project that regularly defecates out putrid cinematic products that teach women promiscuity and abortions are a form of liberation, portray perverts and aberrossexuals as lovable bourgeois types, and have even gone as far as attempting to pass off Dustin Hoffman and Barbra Streisand as highly desirable sex symbols, among other distinctly despicable things. While she was mostly a dumb twat that undoubtedly inspired countless young women to ruin their lives, Marilyn Monroe was probably onto something when she said, "Hollywood is a place where they'll pay you a thousand dollars for a kiss and fifty cents for your soul." Of course, considering Monroe's degenerate background, I would wager that The Day of the Locust is more reliable in terms of ultimately demonstrating that one only has to simply live in Hollywood to lose one's soul and that the studios need not sacrifice fifty cents to ensnare the average person. After all, most people are willing to shell out their own hard-earned cash to have Hollywood colonize their minds with anti-human trash that pollutes their psyche and defiles their soul. Somehow, I think this will eventually contribute to something more horrifying holocaustic than the ending of Schlesinger's film, but then again I stopped going to movies theater to see blockbuster schlock about a decade ago because I much prefer the life-affirming misery and misanthropy of Fassbinder and Bergman to the sugar-coated celluloid cyanide of Spielberg and Singer. Speaking of Spielberg, we can at least partly credit him and his early blockbusters like Jaws (1975) for helping to kill the artistic auteur cinema of the so-called New Hollywood era that The Day of the Locust belongs to. While Spielberg probably wields more international influence than the average Western European prime minister, films like Under the Silver Lake and shows like Million Dollar Extreme Presents: World Peace (2016) ultimately demonstrate that the true Faustian spirit is still not completely conquered.

MARATHON MAN

John Schlesinger (1976)

As far as film (sub)genres go, there is probably none that is more patently oxymoronic and outstandingly absurd than the “Jewish Thriller,” which is exactly how queer British-Jewish auteur John Schlesinger (Billy Liar, Darling) described his fairly commercially and critically successful film Marathon Man (1976) starring Dustin Hoffman as a somewhat unlikable Jewish doctoral candidate and legendary British master actor Laurence Olivier as a murderously greedy and vain Nazi criminal criminal who is forced to resume his favorite old pastime of elegantly torturing Israelites with his masterful Aryan dental skills. If Ronald Neame’s The Odessa File (1974), Franklin J. Schaffner’s badly botched Ira Levin adaptation The Boys from Brazil (1978) starring alpha-white-liberal Gregory Peck in the hilarious against-type role of Dr. Josef ‘Angel of Death’ Mengele, George Roy Hill’s The Little Drummer Girl (1984), Éric Rochant’s Les patriots (1994) aka The Patriots, Eytan Fox’s Walk On Water (2004), and Stephen Spielberg’s Munich (2005) are notable examples of the Jewish thriller than I can certainly completely do without the entire subgenre, yet somehow I found Schlesinger’s film to be strangely enthralling, especially for a highly commercial movie that was directed by an exceedingly effete Hebraic queen who was not exactly suited for such a film and who apparently mainly opted to take on the fairly masculine project because his previous film—the rather underrated cult flick The Day of the Locust (1975)—was an abject commercial and critical failure and, as source writer William Goldman once revealed, he was “terrified he was dead in Hollywood.” Of course, Schlesinger made the right decision, as the film ultimately proved to be his last extremely successful cinematic work, though it has never really been considered a masterpiece and its popularity surely has dwindled as the decades have passed. It should also be noted that, despite being an extremely Jewish film in many regards, Schlesinger’s somewhat eccentric thriller is a rare Hollywood production that features various defective and even loathsome Hebraic characters. While certainly a piece of sleekly stylized kitsch like most thrillers, Marathon Man has enough memorable idiosyncrasy and preternatural paranoiac energy to warrant modern day reexamining, even if the world is already contaminated enough with goyim-gearred Zionist propaganda. Indeed, featuring a super sly blue-eyed Chinese hit man that gets in a homoerotic fight to the death with a macho gay Jew government secret agent, angry Auschwitz-esque German Shepherds that horrify the neurotic titular protagonist, scheming German shiksa spies, an unintentionally hilarious elderly Jew versus elderly Aryan road rage incident that is ignited by the extremely hostile and seemingly senile Hebrew and climaxes with both men dying in a mini urban holocaust after they accidentally crash their cars into an oil truck, and Laurence Olivier in the last great role of his career as a diamond-fetishizing Nazi war criminal that acts more like a stereotypical evil Jew than an evil Nazi, Marathon Man is a sort of conspicuously kosher Kafkaesque thriller that makes more allegorical references to the holocaust than Orson Welles' rather dark masterpiece The Trial (1962), albeit in executed in a less abstract and more organic fashion that makes one realize that auteur Schlesinger has a deep-seated and visceral fear and hatred of both Nazis and Germans. In fact, in an interview with his mischling half-Dutch nephew Ian Buruma featured in the book Conversations with John Schlesinger (2006), the director confessed in regard to his Teutophobia, "We all have prejudices, of course, and one of mine is a hatred of all things German, as a result of the Holocaust [...] Going to Germany after the war and even working there, in Berlin on Ian McEwan's THE INNOCENT, made me very conscious of my anti-German feelings. I never suffered personally at their hands, but I do remember a relative in Holland named Martin Schuster, who was in a wheelchair. Martin, who was much older than me, had the same birth date as I did and always used to remember my birthday. Then suddenly the birthday cards stopped. I heard subsequently that he had been sent to a concentration camp and was exterminated. I find it awfully difficult to divorce all that from my basic anti-German feelings." In other words, like many modern Jews, Schlesinger seems incapable of differentiating between Nazis and Germans and sees them both as sort of perennial mortal enemies. To Schlesinger's credit, his anti-Aryanism did not stop him from collaborating with Austrian master conductor and one-time Nazi party member Herbert von Karajan on a production of Giuseppe Verdi's classic opera Un ballo in maschera aka A Masked Ball.

Despite his keenly kosher hatred of krauts, Schlesinger, who had three German-born grandparents, was somewhat ironically raised with a deep appreciation for German high culture and he has even expressed a deep appreciation for both antisemitic proto-Nazi composer Richard Wagner and (in)famous Third Reich filmmaker Leni Riefenstahl, not to mention the fact he had an equal appreciation for English culture and the royal family, hence his fairly European sensibility as a filmmaker. Indeed, Marathon Man is what you might expect if the eccentric queer son of Jean-Pierre Melville and Ida Lupino made a respectable failed attempt to direct a big budget Mossad recruitment video disguised as a Hollywood thriller. Admittedly, as much as I would typically rather perform cunnilingus on the decaying corpse of an AIDS-ridden negress crack whore than watch another Zionist celluloid turd, Schlesinger's film somehow manages to transcend the whole Israeli agitprop angle and becomes something more bizarre as a cinematic that seems more like an incriminating Hebraic horror film that exposes some of the more absurd forms of Judaic paranoia and thus actually somehow manages to enable less than philo-Semitic individuals like myself to empathize with the curious kosher plight of a Jewish doctoral student that proudly identifies as a liberal pacifist. Additionally, while he is not depicted absurdly shooting Jews for target practice while drunk with his beer belly hanging out from the comfort of his chateau balcony like the highly fictionalized Amon Göth featured in Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), the Mengele-esque Nazi war criminal depicted in Schlesinger's film is easily the most enthrallingly evil and delightfully menacing Hollywood screen Nazi I have ever encountered, as a sort of mystifying and highly secretive National Socialist war criminal that is plagued with many of the highly stereotypical negative flaws of his Jewish enemies, namely a fiendish fetish for diamonds and material wealth. On the other hand, I have never seen a film that featured so many hordes of weird and creepy Jews flooding city streets that range from hysterical Yiddish-speaking Holocaust survivors to slimy jewelry dealers to packs of yarmulke-sporting Orthodox pups. In short, sometimes Marathon Man feels like it could be renamed Dawn of the Judaics or Day of the Jews. Indeed, due to the film's sometimes cinéma-vérité style and various scenes featuring Jews in medieval orthodox garb crowding the streets of the overtly dirty and sleazy NYC diamond district, I sometimes felt like I was watching a Hollywood big budget remake of Fritz Hippler's Nazi agitprop piece Der Ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew.

When Schlesinger proudly referred to Marathon Man as a "Jewish Thriller," he was not just trying to be cute, witty, or ironic, or as he stated himself to Buruma, "I always called it my Jewish thriller because that aspect of it was quite important. I remember asking Laurence Olivier whether it would be a good idea for him to grow a little [Hitler] mustache, and he said: 'No, no, no. Don't you think you should use to the maximum my mean little mouth?' I could see his point." Of course, Schlesinger, star Dustin Hoffman, and novelist/screenwriter William Goldman are not the only Hebraic ingredients of the film, which was co-produced by Paramount Pictures studio head Robert Evans (real name Robert J. Shapera) and fellow Jew Sidney Beckerman (Kelly's Heroes, Red Dawn). Quite atypical in many ways for both a Hebrew and Hollywood studio head, Evans—a hardly humorless fellow that, at the mere age of 12, annoyed his family members by reinventing himself as a "Jewish Nazi" and playing a Nazi concentration camp colonel on "Radio Mystery Theater"—was, by most accounts, an extremely handsome, charming, likeable, loyal, and warm fellow that Peter Biskind once described as, "...very much the ladies' man, a sharp dresser given to sartorial clichés like suede jeans and gold chains. Had he not had the good fortune to meet [Charles] Bluhdorn, he might well have spent his youth as a gigolo, squirting dowagers around the spas of Europe." More or less a model turned brief reluctant actor turned studio head, totally inexperienced but quite eager go-getter Evans managed to totally revamp Paramount and its image and took it from being the ninth largest studio in Hollywood to the most successful during the 1970s as the man behind important and highly successful movies like Roman Polanski's Rosemary's Baby (1968) and Chinatown (1974), Hal Ashby's Harold and Maude (1971), Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather (1972), among countless others. Despite hating the project and assuming it would be a major commercial failure (which it was), Evans still had the integrity to back Schlesinger's artistic vision on The Day of the Locust, but more importantly the studio head was also the man responsible for giving Laurence Olivier back his dignity by securing him the main villain role in Marathon Man at a time when no one would hire the legendary British actor because he was considered uninsurable since he was cancer-ridden. In the end, not only did Olivier earn an Oscar nomination for Best Supporting Actor for his performance, but his cancer also went into remission and he lived for another 13 years, with his final acting performance in any medium being that of a wheelchair-bound WWII war veteran in Derek Jarman's rather underrated Benjamin Britten adaptation War Requiem (1989).

In an opening sequence that somewhat seems like a sadistic overtly Jewish take on Grumpy Old Men (1993), an elderly 72-year-old ex-Nazi that looks Jewish named Klaus Szell (played by German-born vaudevillian performer Ben Dova, who was both a survivor and suspect in the explosion of the Hindenburg) and a equally old and disgruntled four-eyed German-hating Jew that looks like he could be Woody Allen's father get in a sort of pointlessly tragic slapstick road rage car chase that ultimately results in both of their deaths after they crash into a oil truck in New York City during Yom Kippur while tons of baffled orthodox Jews watch on. This literal holocaust will ultimately have tragic unexpected consequences for unwitting protagonist Thomas 'Babe' Levy (Dustin Hoffman), who is a self-proclaimed "liberal pacifist" that will have to face the wrath of shadowy fugitive Nazi war criminal named Dr. Christian Szell (Laurence Olivier), whose brother Klaus was the man that died in the car crash. Indeed, Szell's brother's death acts as a catalyst to the film's entire plot. While Babe believes that his big brother Henry 'Doc' Levy (Roy Scheider) is a capitalist whore that works in the oil business, he is actually member of a highly secret and supremely morally bankrupt government agency called 'The Division,' which does dubious jobs that the FBI lacks the capacity to do and the CIA does not want to touch. While both a government agent and Jew, Doc is involved in an elaborate international network of couriers who transport diamonds that were stolen during World War II from wealthy Jews seeking to flee Germany for the benefit of Dr. Szell, who now lives a Mengele-esque life of luxury in South America on the wealth that he has acquired as a result of the jewels that he plundered from the Jews while working as a dentist in a concentration camp. Initially becoming rich off the gold teeth that he would pull out of the mouths of Jewish prisoners, Szell eventually worked his way up to diamonds. As a result of his brother's unexpected death, Szell has become paranoid that his couriers, especially Jew Doc Levy, intend on stealing his diamond stash, which he has locked away in a safe deposit box in Manhattan. Since his brother was the only other person that had a key to his fortune, Szell presumes that all his couriers are after his wealth and decides to begin liquidating them, even though he has nil concrete evidence to support his paranoid delusions. Unfortunately for Szell, he makes that mistake of beginning to go after Babe Levy who, although a self-righteous college doctoral candidate, has a lot of pent up rage and hatred because his father committed suicide after he lost his job and his reputation was ruined during the Communist witch hunts of the Joseph McCarthy era. Of course, in the end, destroying a Nazi war criminal and his entire operation becomes the ultimate form of redemption for left-wing Jew Babe, who seems to have been waiting his entire life for someone to blame for his kosher commie father's self-inflicted death.

As the title of the film somewhat hints, pint-sized yet strong-willed Marathon Man protagonist Babe is an avid runner and he is especially obsessed with Ethiopian double Olympic marathon champion Abebe Bikila as indicated by photographs of the African champ hanging on his apartment wall and stock footage of the proud barefoot runner featured at the beginning of the film. Babe is also somewhat of a paranoid who almost seems to suffer a mental breakdown when he witnesses a German Shepherd attempting to bite a fellow runner at a local park, as if the canine gives him visions of Auschwitz, even though he is not a Holocaust survivor. Of course, as someone whose father committed suicide after having his career ruined due to highly political reasons, Babe has a special sensitivity when it comes to signs of imminent danger and conspiracy. Although apparently a fairly intelligent individual as one of only four individuals that was selected for a history Ph.D. seminar that had 200 applicants, Babe seems to lack common sense and lives like a virtual bum in an extremely dirty, trash-covered studio apartment in a city ghetto where he is routinely mocked and called names like "creep," "chicken," and "twinkle-toes" by local criminally-inclined deadbeat Puerto Rican thugs. Of course, being a stereotypical passive-aggressive Jewish intellectual, Babe does not dare to defend himself against the exceptionally swarthy Hispanic quarterons, octroons and quintroons that lurk around his less than luxurious neighborhood. Indeed, it is only when his sole brother is murdered and his own life becomes extremely endangered that Babe develops the sort of testicular fortitude it takes to take serious action and defend himself like a man.

One day while studying at a table in the library at Columbia University, an extremely beautiful blonde babe with a Germanic accent named Elsa Opel (Swiss actress Marthe Keller of John Frankenheimer's Black Sunday (1977) and European arthouse works like Romuald Karmakar's Nightsongs (2004)) asks Babe a question about extremely corrupt 19th-century NYC politician William M. 'Boss' Tweed, but then abruptly exits the building after arousing protagonist's attention, thus hinting that she is a serious cocktease. Luckily, Babe thinks fast and steals one of Elsa's self-addressed books before she leaves, thus giving him a reason to chase her down and hit on her. While Babe demonstrates that he has about as much charisma as a wet paper bag, Elsa reluctantly agrees to go on a date with him and, somewhat improbably considering the protagonist's lack of looks and wealth, a hot and heavy romance begins between the two. Indeed, somehow a short and dorky Jew-boy and a tall and statuesque Aryanness prove to be both quite emotionally and sexually compatible, or so it initially seems. Of course, unbeknownst to Babe, Elsa is a Mata Hari-esque hired-whore of sorts who was contracted by Dr. Szell to spy on him. In fact, when his brother Doc eventually comes to town and provides irrefutable proof that Elsa has been lying to him and thus probably has unsavory ulterior motives, hopelessly lovestruck bitch-boy Babe still refuses to believe that he has been emotionally cuckolded by a conniving kraut cunt who hardly has his best interests in mind. Somewhat intriguingly, Elsa ultimately proves to be a somewhat reluctant secondary femme fatale whose cold and calculating deceptions are ultimately put to shame by an inordinately well dressed and groomed male government agent with a somewhat questionable sexual persuasion.

After being nearly killed by a blue-eyed Chinaman named Chen (James Wing Wong) while in Paris, Doc realizes that his clock is ticking and that it is only a matter of time before Dr. Szell has him exterminated, thus he decides to immediately fly to NYC and pay a visit to his little baby brother Babe. Of course, unbeknownst to Doc, Szell is already monitoring Babe's behavior via hired whore Elsa. In fact, while romantically strolling in a local park, Babe and Elsa are mugged, beaten, and robbed by two well dressed middle-aged men that hardly resemble the sort of ghetto thugs that typically mug people. Not surprisingly, these two suavely dressed muggers, Karl (Richard Bright of The Godfather trilogy) and Erhardt (blacklisted Jewish communist Marc Lawrence in a most ironic role), are eventually revealed to be Dr. Szell's two foremost Nazi henchmen. When Doc arrives in NYC, he plays a sort of sick trick on his little brother by breaking into his apartment in the middle of the night while he is asleep and playfully smothering him with his own pillow like he is trying to kill them. While the two estranged brothers are quite happy to see one another, Doc becomes immediately annoyed when Babe attempts to show him research documents proving that their suicidal leftist intellectual father was innocent and angrily states to his little bro, "You think he wanted you to be throwing your life away on this shit? [...] Nothing you write is going to change anything. It's over. Forget it." When Babe asks him if he should become a "corporate hustler" just like him, Doc exposes his glaring sense of hopelessness and despair by replying, "No. My life's throw away, anyway." Of course, Doc does not dare reveal that he is a secret government agent who works for a Nazi war criminal that is trying to kill him. Naturally, when Babe reveals to him that he and Elsa were mugged by two elegantly dressed men that wore similar suits to his own, Doc immediately suspects Dr. Szell's involvement, though he makes the mistake of saying nothing to his brother.

When Doc takes Babe and Elsa out for lunch at a fancy French restaurant where the sloppy protagonist becomes annoyed when the waiter forces him to wear a tie, it does not take long for the naturally suspicious secret government agent to figure out that his little bro's ladylove is a femme fatale who he presumes works for Dr. Szell. Indeed, Doc exposes the fact that Elsa is lying about her identity and background by tricking her into claiming that she grew up near an imaginary mountain in Switzerland that he simply made up. When Doc reveals she is German instead of Swiss and accuses her of having ulterior motives, Elsa somewhat dubiously cries in her defense, "Why don't you ask me if I care for him?" and then runs out of the restaurant like an embarrassed child. While Doc tries to warn Babe, "She's a phony. She's after something. Can't you see it?," the pathetically pussy-whipped protagonist replies, "Why don't you stay out of it?" and then also leaves the restaurant. Later that night, Doc shows up late to a meeting with Dr. Szell and his henchmen and immediately accuses the old Nazi of trying to assassinate him. Naturally, Doc also berates Szell for getting involved with his brother, stating, "It is a violation. We do not involve family. We never involve family," to which the deceptively mild-mannered old Aryan replies, "Think of it as a warning, nothing more." Needless to say, Doc makes a big mistake when he slaps Szell to the ground and states "Think of that as a warning and nothing more." Of course, Doc makes an even bigger mistake when Szell asks him if he can be trusted and he replies "No" and then adds, "Can I be candid? I couldn't give a fuck about you—Uhh!" Rather unfortunately, Doc does not get to finish what he says because Szell abruptly fatally stabs him in the gut with a large retractable blade that he has concealed under his sleeve.

While Doc manages to stumble all the way back to Babe's apartment before completely croaking, he is unable to warn his quite unwitting brother that he is in grave danger and simply succumbs to his wounds while saying the protagonist's name. Thankfully, in terms of both the film's tone and storyline, things only get all the more bizarre from there. Indeed, in an eerily Kafkaesque scene that screams neurotic Hebraic paranoia, Babe practically suffers a total mental breakdown when police come by his apartment and question him about his brother's somewhat dubious death. While on the verge of crying hysterically in front half a dozen or so exceedingly stoic cops that seem totally unimpressed with the protagonist's histrionics, Babe accuses them of trying to interrogate like he is a criminal. Needless to say, when Doc's coworker Peter Janeway (William Devane) shows up and reveals to the protagonist that his brother was not a "corporate hustler" after all, but instead a government secret agent, he is left all the more shocked and confused. As Janeway states to Babe in regard to his employer, "Now, when the gap gets too large between what the FBI can handle effectively and what the CIA doesn't want to deal with, that's where we come in...The Division." Janeway also informs Babe that the same people that killed Doc will also probably go after him and that he wants to use him as "possible bait" to catch his brother's killer(s). Of course, as fits the sometimes Kafkaian logic of the film, Janeway is actually a dirty double agent that is working with Szell. To make matters all the more bizarre, despite betraying him and ultimately playing a role in his death, Janeway was also tough guy Doc's secret gay lover, though this is never made all that overt in the film like it was in the source novel. In fact, the only part of the film that hints of the secret gay love affair between the two secret agents is a scene early on in the flick where Doc talks to some unidentified person on the phone while in Paris and states to them in an aggressively salacious fashion, "Janey. Well, London was hectic, but I'm fair. Just fair. Listen, why don't you hop into a cab and get your ass over here? I've got plenty of room. Oh, screw appearances. I miss you [...] Listen, Janey, why don't you finish what you're doing and get your ass over here." Of course, 'Janey' is Doc's pooft pet name for Janeway and the duplicitous double agent was probably reluctant to meet up with his boy toy because he felt guilty since he was involved with plotting to have him killed. In that regard, Janeway is in some ways more despicable and loathsome than Szell.

In what literally feels like only minutes after Janeway leaves and his brother's corpse is taken away in a body-bag, Dr. Szell's dapperly dressed neo-Gestapo goons Karl and Erhardt break into Babe's apartment while he is bathing and daydreaming about his father's suicide and then proceed to begin drowning the protagonist in his own bath water until he is knocked unconscious. When Babe eventually regains consciousness, he finds himself strapped to a chair in a large, brightly lit, and mostly empty warehouse room where he is eventually visited by Dr. Szell, who begins repeatedly asking the protagonist: "Is it safe?" Naturally, poor Babe has no clue who Dr. Szell is or what he wants from him. Although initially proclaiming that he has no idea what Dr. Szell is talking about when he asks him if it is safe, Babe's inner arrogant passive-aggressive Jewish comedian eventually emerges and he states, "No, it's no safe. It's...very dangerous. Be careful." Of course, Dr. Szell does not find Babe's comment to be funny and reacts to it by whipping out some rather intimidating dental tools and proceeding to look at the protagonist's teeth and rebuking for not taking care of them properly since he has a cavity. When Babe refuses to answer whether it is "safe" or not after he is asked a couple more times, Szell proceeds to torture Babe by digging into his cavity with one of dentistry tools, though the good doctor soon relieves the protagonist pain by applying oil of cloves to his tooth and then gloats, "Isn't that remarkable? Simple oil of cloves, and how amazing the results. Life can be that simple. Relief...discomfort." After the interrogation, Babe is brought to a sort of makeshift cell where he is soon abruptly rescued by Janeway, who ostensibly kills both Karl and Erhardt.

While driving away in the getaway car after escaping from Dr. Szell's warehouse, Janeway ultimately reveals to Babe all the things that he has probably wanted to know since his brother was killed, stating to the discernibly startled protagonist, "Those two guys I just wasted worked for a man named Christian Szell [...] He ran the experimental camp at Auschwitz, where they called him the 'White Angel,' the 'Weisse Engel,' because he had this incredible head of white hair. He's probably the wealthiest and most-wanted Nazi left alive, and he's hiding out somewhere in Uruguay. In 1945, Szell let it be known around Auschwitz that he could provide escape for any Jew who was willing to pay the price. He started out with gold, naturally, but very quickly worked his way up to diamonds [...] Szell saw the end early and he snuck his brother into America with his diamonds. They're right here, in New York, in a safe deposit box. Szell's brother had the key. The only other key was kept by Szell in Uruguay. And now if he has to come out of hiding to use it, he's gonna expose himself to incredible risk. Well, everything worked out fine, until his brother got killed in a head-on collision with an oil truck." At this point, Babe realizes that the demented dentist that tortured him is actually the 'Weisse Engel' that Janeway just told him about, albeit with a shaved head. When Babe asks Janeway if his brother worked for Szell, Janeway gets somewhat agitated in a somewhat phony smart-ass fashion and excitedly replies, "No! He worked for us. Everything we do cuts both ways. Szell ratted on all of his buddies. He kept track of all the old Nazis throughout the world. Whenever we wanted to bring one of them in, we went to Szell." Unfortunately, Babe is in for quite the shock when Janeway drives him back to Szell's warehouse after he fails to tell the government agent what he wants to hear when he asks if he brother told him any important information before he died. Indeed, aside from the fact that he had no idea that Janeway is a double agent, Babe becomes shocked to the point of suffering a hysterical fit upon seeing that Karl and Erhardt are still alive and then begins screaming at his dead brother's treacherous ex-beau while in a state of complete and utter shock, "I saw you kill them! You killed them! You killed them! You killed them! You fucking killed them! You killed my brother!"

Needless to say, after being delivered back to the warehouse, Dr. Szell immediately begins torturing Babe again and does so by drilling a healthy tooth in the protagonist's mouth since it is "infinitely more sensitive" in comparison to a decaying tooth. After the unnerving dental torture session, Szell becomes completely convinced that little Babe knows nothing and states to Janeway, "He knew nothing. If he had known, he would have told. Get rid of him." While Szell tells his men liquidate Babe since he knows too much about the Nazi fugitive, the protagonist manages to break free from his enemies and after a long chase he manages to outrun Karl, Erhardt, and Janeway due to his trusty marathon runner skills, as if all of his obsessive training was leading up to this one quite critical life or death situation. After giving a shady negro taxi driver his dead brother's expensive Rolex watch for a ride back to his apartment and a dime, Babe uses the latter to call Elsa on a payphone at 5:00am to tell her to pick him up at drug store at 51st and Broadway in a hour. Since he does not want to be detected by Janeway and Szell's men, Babe offers a Puerto Rican thug named Melendez (Tito Goya of Andy Warhol's Bad (1977) and the prison cult flick Short Eyes (1977)) all his personal belongings in his apartment to break into said apartment and retrieve the handgun that his father used to kill himself with. While Elsa picks up Babe, the protagonist begins to suspect that she is one of Szell's employees when she drives him to a remote country house that ultimately proves to have been owned by Szell's deceased brother. Not long after Babe takes Elsa hostage at gunpoint after getting her to admit that she works for Szell, Janeway, Karl, and Erhardt show up in a car and the protagonist threatens them by lying and telling them that he has called the cops and that they are on their way. Of course, it is not long before one of Szell's men attempts to whip out a gun and shoot the protagonist, but luckily Babe somehow manages to magically shoot and kill both Karl and Erhardt before they can kill him. At this point, Janeway pretends to offer Babe a peace offering of sorts by declaring "I'll give you Szell for your brother" and then telling him where he can find the murderously miserly Nazi war criminal. Not surprisingly, when Babe turns around and begins to leave, Janeway makes a cowardly attempt to shoot him in the back, but luckily Elsa warns the protagonist. While Babe manages to shoot and kill Janeway before he can kill him, the double agent has time to shoot and kill Elsa as revenge for warning the protagonist. Indeed, Elsa might have been a lying whore, but she ultimately becomes a martyr of love in the end.

In what ultimately has to be a particularly paranoid Nazi war criminal's worst nightmare, Dr. Szell finds himself in a sort of super surreal Jewish diamond ghetto that feels like some sort of kosher purgatory and is flooded with hordes of both Orthodox and assimilated Jews, including extremely aggressive jewelers that naturally annoy the shit out of the elderly Aryan dentist. Somewhat magically, not one but two holocaust survivors manage to recognize Dr. Szell, including an elderly Jewess who causes a huge scene after nearly getting hit by a car while attempting to chase down her former tormentor while hysterically screaming "White Angel" in German. When an elderly Hebrew with a foggy memory begins to recognize Szell after briefly meeting him at a jewelry store, the good doctor pretends he is a fellow holocaust survivor that fled Germany for London in 1933. When the old Jew's memory eventually comes back and he realizes that Szell is actually the dreaded White Angel, he chases him down and attempts to make a citizen's arrest, so the old Nazi is forced to slit his rather wrinkly throat. Unfortunately, Dr. Szell is not so lucky when it comes to young chosenites, as Babe pulls a gun on him soon after he gleefully retrieves his diamonds from the safety deposit box that he had them stored in. Demonstrating that he is not completely humorless, at least when it comes to tormenting his enemies, Babe states upon surprising Dr. Szell from behind, "It's not safe" and then forces him at gunpoint to walk to a somewhat ominous water treatment plant in Central Park. While Szell is delighted when Babe tells him that he has no interest in keeping his diamonds, he gets somewhat offended when the protagonist tells him that he can keep as many of the expensive rocks that he can swallow and then forces him to eat one. While all this is going on, Babe sadistically taunts Szell by throwing handfuls of diamonds at him, which are ultimately lost in water below them. After having trouble swallowing just one diamond, Szell refuses to eat anymore, stating in a somewhat aristocratic fashion, "No. You'll have to shoot me." At this point, Szell proceeds to accuse Babe of being too much of a coward to shoot him, stating just before rudely spitting in his face, "You're too weak. Your father was weak in his way, your brother in his, now you in yours. You're all so predictable." Naturally, Babe becomes quite upset at this point and proceeds to lunge at Szell and ultimately drops his gun in the process. After dropping his gun, Szell reveals the large blade he has hidden under his sleeve and proceeds to attempt to strike Babe, who opts to throw an open briefcase containing the remaining diamonds down a stairwell that leads to water. Of course, Szell instantly forgets about his fight with Babe and dives down the stairwell, only to absurdly commit accidental suicide in the process as a result of tripping after impaling himself with his own blade. Indeed, in what is arguably the mostly seemingly unintentionally ironic and insanely improbable conclusion in film history, a young Jew chooses personal integrity over a life of fortune and guaranteed financial security and in the process accidentally causes a sinisterly parsimonious Shylock-esque Nazi war criminal that is greedier than kosher swindler Bernie Madoff to kill himself, thus giving him his much desired revenge but also leaving him completely free of the guilt of killing an elderly man. In the end, Babe also demonstrates that he has gotten over his Oedipal hang-ups, as he tosses his father's pistol into a river. Undoubtedly, in Babe's mind, causing the demise of Dr. Szell and his henchmen was a sort of therapeutic means for him to feel like he had avenged his father against the supposedly antisemitic McCarthyites that ruined both his life and career and, in the process, destroyed both the protagonist's childhood and overall mental well-being.

Notably, apparently as a result of Herr Hoffman, who at that point in his career was already acting like a supreme primadonna, being dissatisfied with the original ending of the source novel, which involves Babe sadistically taunting and killing Dr. Szell and thus in the process becoming just as sadistic and inhumane as his Nazi enemy, perennial script doctor Robert Towne (another member of the tribe whose real name is Robert Bertram Schwartz) was brought in by Robert Evans to rewrite the ending and came up with the patently preposterous idea of a young Jew forcing a Nazi war criminal to eat diamonds. Somewhat humorously, source novelist and screenwriter William Goldman, who felt his whole Nietzschean theme of, "He who fights with monsters should look to it that he himself does not become a monster. And if you gaze long into an abyss, the abyss also gazes into you," had been ruined, was quite vocal about his disgust for the film's the new Hollywood-esque ending. In fact, in the featurette Going the Distance: Remembering 'Marathon Man' (2001), Goldman states of Towne's fairly phony and uniquely improbable ending, "I thought it was Hollywood horseshit,” which is certainly a more than charitable way to describe it. Indeed, as virtually all Jewish holidays and the constant attacks against both Germans and Europeans/European-Americans in contemporary Hollywood and the mainstream media clearly demonstrate, there is nothing quite like the venomous and oftentimes craven ruthlessness of Jewish vengeance, yet Marathon Man concludes with an unintentionally absurd feel-good cop-out ending where the inordinately principled Jewish liberal pacifist protagonist gets so lucky that he accidentally causes the death of his brother’s killer while simultaneously humiliating and degrading the once highly powerful Nazi war criminal, thereupon completely keeping his much cherished moral principles intact, as if such an obscenely ideal outcome has anything to do with real-life (of course, in his superior films Midnight Cowboy and Sunday Bloody Sunday, Schlesinger would clearly demonstrate that he is not exactly an optimist). Thankfully, the moral and philosophical hypocrisies of ostensibly pacifistic left-wing Jewish intellectual types are exposed throughout the film in somewhat subtle ways, not least of all in a scene where the protagonist’s brother Doc states to him, “For a liberal pacifist, you’ve got some sense of vengeance.” Indeed, Babe may lack the testicular fortitude to physically fight and confront people, but his entire life is driven by a deep-seated desire to avenge his disgraced father, even if he refuses to admit it himself, hence why he initially neglects to admit to his Judaic professor Biesenthal that his dissertation on “The use of tyranny in American political life” will focus on the McCarthy witch-hunts that destroyed his father. Notably, Biesenthal, who was a protege of the protagonist’s father, states to Babe regarding his father’s demise, “I think he was guilty. I think he was guilty of being arrogant and brilliant and of being naïve. He was guilty of not being able to cope with the humiliation of being dismissed. But of the charges, I know he was innocent. And, if it matters, Levy, I wept the day he died.” Of course, Babe, who seems to suffer from the same sort of self-deceptive arrogance and naivety as his father, seems to ignore Biesenthal’s kind critique of his dead daddy as he wants to remember his progenitor as a total innocent, hence his remark to the professor, “Sir, I don’t have to worry about clearing him because he was innocent.”

Of course, Marathon Man is not only a thinly veiled act of quasi-artistic vengeance against Germans and Nazis, but also U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy and so-called ‘McCarthyism,’ which has been the object of incessant ridicule and scorn by Hollywood ever since at least the release of half-Hebrew John Frankenheimer noir-ish suspense-thriller The Manchurian Candidate (1962). Indeed, good little shabbos goy actors and filmmakers like George Clooney demonstrate their allegiance to Judaic leftists by directing wholly worthless and absurdly artless big budget agitprop pieces disguised as serious filmic art like Good Night, and Good Luck (2005), which are predictably honored with tons of awards and award nominations simply because of their asinine anti-McCarthy messages. Not surprisingly, Marathon Man even goes so far as to compare the United States Government and U.S. Government secret agents with the Third Reich and members of Schutzstaffel. Indeed, during one particularly notable scene in the film that takes place right after the protagonist is tortured by the Nazi villain, double agent Janeway remarks to Dr. Szell after being accused of using underhanded tactics, "I'm just doing my job. I believe in my country" and the old National Socialist stoically replies, "So did we all," though the viewer suspects that neither of them really cares about their country and instead has exploited powerful positions for solely opportunistic reasons. After all, as a closet homosexual who lives a constant life of deception, Janeway probably has no loyalty to anyone or anything and has merely exploited his keen survival instincts as a secret member of a much maligned sexual minority to get ahead in life. Of course, history has demonstrated this is not an uncommon phenomenon among homosexuals. In fact, director Schlesinger was well acquainted with the story of the British double agents of Cambridge Spy Ring as recruited by NKVD officer and Soviet scout Arnold Deutsch, who was incidentally the cousin of prominent English Jewish movie theater chain owner Oscar Deutsch. In fact, Schlesinger considered An Englishman Abroad (1983)—a 60-minute BBC TV production written by English queer playwright Alan Bennett about gay Cambridge Spy Ring member Guy Burgess, who was also the subject of Marek Kanievski's critically acclaimed Julian Mitchell adaptation Another Country (1984) starring Rupert Everett—to be one of his personal favorites of the films he had directed. Rather revealing, Kanievski's Another Country points to so-called homophobia as being one of the reasons as to why Burgess opted to betray his country and spy for the commie cause, even though homosexuality was a serious crime in the Soviet Union. Naturally, one of the reasons McCarthy is still so ruthlessly attacked by Hollywood is because he was right about commie infiltration as demonstrated by the fact that America has degenerated into a anti-Christian multicultural shithole where a Zionist Jewish Trotskyite like Bernie Sanders, who belonged to the Young People's Socialist League (YPSL) and volunteered at Sha'ar HaAmakim kibbutz in northern Israel, could be considered an ideal presidential candidate among largely university educated young people who do not even realize that the pseudo-intellectual twaddle that they were brainwashed with while in college was largely inspired by the vengeful anti-European theories of highly scornful and resentful Jewish émigrés of the Frankfurt School like Herbert "Father of the New Left" Marcuse, Max Horkheimer, and Theodor W. Adorno who had committed their life's work to destroying Occidental Civilization because Uncle Adolf kicked them out of Europe and sent their family members to concentration camps (though it should be noted that they were all already well committed to the anti-Aryan cause long before the Nazi takeover). Undoubtedly, after obtaining his doctorate in history, the protagonist of Marathon Man would probably dedicate his life to writing hardly historically accurate swill about how innately evil, racist, sexist, and homophobic Europeans are and how the United States is an evil fascist empire that is run by psychopathic WASPs. As for Schlesinger, he had good reason to loathe McCarthy, as the U.S. Senator linked communism and homosexuality with mental instability and even once hilariously stated to a reporter, “If you want to be against McCarthy, boys, you’ve got to be either a Communist or a cocksucker.” Of course, considering the close intersecting ties of the political homos and dykes of the LGBT movement, colored crybabies of the Black Lives Matter movement, and countless left-wing Jewish groups, it seems that McCarthy was quite prophetic and that, if anything, he actually underestimated his enemies and the sort of corrosive effect that they would ultimately have on the United States.

Somewhat ironically, it was sod director John Schlesinger that ultimately opted to obscure the gay subtext of Marathon Man, though it was apparently for largely artistic reasons. Indeed, as Schlesinger told his nephew Buruma in regard to an important revelational scene that he decided to cut from the film where the protagonist learns that his macho brother is actually a homo, “There was a wonderful moment in MARATHON MAN, the final sequence, when he had a very long speech, which was lifted from the boo, in which he [Olivier] said to Dustin Hoffman: ‘There are things that you must know about your brother. Your brother was a HOMOSEXUAL!’ And it was sort of shouted out in such a hammy way that I had to cut it.” Of course, it was also probably to the commercial benefit of the film that the gay subtext was dropped, even if said gay subtext was not exactly pro-gay (incidentally, Schlesinger was criticized by gay groups when Midnight Cowboy was released because they felt that the film featured an unflattering portrayal of homosexuals). Undoubtedly, with the exception of his assumedly lost documentary Israel: A Right to Live (1967)—a Zionist propaganda piece that was written by London Jew Wolf Mankowitz and produced by kosher Canadian Herschel Saltzman that was apparently screened a couple times and then quickly fell into obscurity (though, according to William J. Mann in his bio Edge of Midnight: The Life of John Schlesinger (2005), the director never actually completed the film “due to ‘creative differences’ with the BBC”)—Marathon Man is surely Schlesinger’s most overtly and shamelessly Jewish film. To be fair, Schlesinger was a more ‘humanistic’ filmmaker than a ‘political’ one and he was quite vocal about the fact that he most enjoyed directing more personal gay-themed works like the quite autobiographical Sunday Bloody Sunday (1971), which depicts the somewhat pathetic life of a middle-aged gay Jewish doctor who suffers much heartbreak and loneliness as a result of having to share his young goy boy toy boyfriend with a bitchy divorced bourgeois broad in her mid-30s in what ultimately proves to be a decidedly doomed bizarre love triangle.

While a sometimes shameless piece of action-packed big budget kosher kitsch where Schlesinger has some fun by subtly subverting and ultimately sodomizing genre conventions by portraying the most pernicious femme fatale a duplicitous crypto-cocksucker and including an interracial homoerotic fight scene (indeed, in the film's gayest fight scene, an almost completely naked Roy Scheider wrestles and ultimately breaks the neck of a blue-eyed Chinaman that attempts to strangle him to death with a garrote wire in a scenario that almost resembles Born to Raise Hell-esque sadomasochistic sod porn), Marathon Man is important in that it is rather incriminating as a rare mainstream movie that exposes a lot of things about the highly temperamental, paranoid, and vengeful people that operate in Hollywood, academia, and the government, especially those of the Judaic sort. Indeed, in many ways it is quite symbolic but also ironic that the film begins with a seemingly half-deranged old Jewish guy acting as an unwitting catalyst to a series of political murders and conspiracies after becoming enraged and acting like a villain in Death Race 2000 because an equally elderly German guy is blocking his way on a Manhattan street. After all, had the savagely senile Semite controlled his tyrannical Hitler-esque temper and primal Teutophobia, he would have not only prevented himself from perishing in a mini-Shoah, but he would have also prevented the deaths of at least one gay Jew (Doc) and at least one Holocaust survivor (the elderly Jew with the concentration camp tattoo who identifies Szell near the end). It should be noted that the elderly Jewish, who totally initiates the road rage scenario, calls Szell's brother a "kraut meathead" and "limburger-loving schmuck" immediately upon realizing that he is German, but then has the hyper hypocritical gall to accuse the elderly Teuton of being an "anti-Semitic bastard" when he retorts by simply calling him a "Jude." Of course, this extremely hilarious racially-charged name-calling scenario can be seen as a sort of metaphor for the history of antisemitism and reminds me of the Polish proverb, "The Jew Cries Out in Pain as He Strikes You." Another great irony of the film is that the Nazi war criminal villain also proves to hardly be a real Nazi at all (at least as far as his ideals and actions prove), but instead an opportunistic traitor with stereotypically Jewish character flaws who ratted out all of his Nazi friends and who has no problem working with Jews in the diamond world. After all, aside from helping Jews to escape concentration camps if they provided him with their gold teeth and ratting out his own fellow Nazi war criminal friends to protect himself, Szell relied on Jews and homosexuals to act as couriers for him in his international black market diamond smuggling operation. In that sense, Szell is somewhat of a Hans Landa type figure, albeit without the sense of humor and propensity for childlike joy. Of course, also like Landa in Inglourious Basterds (2009), Szell is easily the most intriguing and intimidating character featured in Marathon Man.

Undoubtedly, one of the greatest ironies of Marathon Man is that one of the reasons that it is so captivating and thought-provoking is because it is such a hopeless mess of a movie that is full of plot holes and loose ends that allow the viewer to use their imagination and fill in the blanks when it comes to the more curious aspects of the film (for example, Szell mentions Babe's fathers like he knew him, though it is never made clear how he knew him), thus making it nearly unwatchable for younger audiences who are used to being spoon-fed contrived movies where everything is spelled out for them and tied up in a neat package in the end. Indeed, ultimately the film is the quixotic result of an extremely effete gay European arthouse director attempting and failing to direct a highly accessible blockbuster for the unthinking masses. Of course, while Schlesinger had the honor of directing the only X-rated film ever to win the Academy Award for 'Best Picture' with Midnight Cowboy (1969), he tended to fail horribly when attempting to create contrived genre-oriented trash like the unintentionally hokey horror turd The Believers (1987) and his miserable mainstream gay swansong The Next Best Thing (2000) starring alpha-fag-hag Madonna and prince of the British screen poofs Rupert Everett. Despite his self-admitted hatred of Germans, Schlesinger belonged to the last generation of cultivated Jews with a deep respect and admiration for real European culture and not the prepackaged post-postmodern multicultural swill that pollutes the continent nowadays. Indeed, it is no coincidence that virtually all of the great Jewish filmmakers of film history, including Fritz Lang, Erich von Stroheim, Ernst Lubitsch, Max Ophüls, and Josef von Sternberg came from Austrian and German backgrounds, as Jews have no real culture of their own, hence the overall cultural and artistic poverty of contemporary Hollywood (one also cannot forget that Kubrick deeply immersed himself in European culture and more or less transformed himself from a lower-middleclass Brooklyn Jew into a cultivated Englishman, not to mention the fact that he married and reproduced with the niece of one of the greatest filmmakers of the Third Reich).

Although innately flawed and sometimes convoluted, Marathon Man is what I see as the ideal Hollywood thriller as a consistently enthralling roller-coaster of a movie that is equipped with just enough sophistication and eccentricity to appeal to serious cinephiles that care more about nuanced cinematic art than the sort of grandiose and bombastic blockbuster farts that culturally retarded anti-auteurs like Michael Bay and J.J. Abrams unleash on the worlds. If The Day of the Locust—a film that, like the 1939 Nathanael West novel of the same name that it is based, is a scathing and even sometimes grotesque satire of Hebraic Hollywood from a Hebraic perspective—unequivocally demonstrated that Schlesinger saw Tinseltown as sort of a vaudevillian brothel city, Marathon Man reveals that the auteur and probably a good percentage of his kinsmen, see anti-semitism (and, to a lesser extent, homo-hating), especially of the Nazi oriented sorts, as the ultimate real-life Kafkaesque nightmare. Indeed, the film may fail in many regards, but it indubitably succeeds in expressing the seemingly inborn pathological fear, paranoia, and obscene obsession that members of god's (seemingly forsaken) chosen tribe have for their enemies. Undoubtedly, I have seen more Nazi and holocaust themed films than I care to admit, yet Marathon Man is the only one where I felt like I was able to actually understand the sort of crippling primordial fear and paranoia that seems to epitomize a lot of post-WWII Jews. While Tarantino's Inglourious Basterds exposes the sort of sadistic bloodlust that the more Zionist Jews have for their enemies, Marathon Man exposes in a sort of psychodramatic form the sort of internal hell that plagues the mind of a Jewish intellectual when he thinks of having to personally confront his enemies. Indeed, more than just a fictional Nazi war criminal, Laurence Olivier's Dr. Szell is like a composite of all the gentiles that Jews fear, including the stoic aristocrat, Nazi doctor, ruthless businessman, and evil goy genius. In other words, not only is Marathon Man that ultimate Jewish thriller, but it is also arguably the greatest Hebraic psychological horror flick, thus making it all the more fitting that it was produced by an inordinately masculine and handsome member of the tribe who once described himself as a "Jewish Nazi."

FREEZE FRAME

John Simpson (2004)

Freeze Frame is a British psychological thriller film set in a bleak, dark world similar to one pictured in Dark City or City of Lost Children. This is a potentially hazardous film to create, due to it being shown mostly in a third/first person format. Much of the film is spread onto 5 years worth of constant surveillance (In world)The plot involves comedian-turned-serious actor Lee Evans playing an increasingly paranoid and detached man who was suspected for a triple homicide years earlier. Now he is a wreck of a human being. He has himself under surveillance 24/7 so he can never be framed for another crime again. That is until a new crime emerges and his alibi is missing.The film has a very similar feel to that of other films such as Fear X and even traces of V for Vendetta. With each passing minute, the suspense grows fiercer. In some scenes, the acting is incredibly vivid and pristine. Lee Evans could be called a method actor. He shaved his head and eyebrows despite the warning that the eyebrows might not grow back.The film of course plays on the constant surveillance issue in the U.K. Citizens are being watched as the shop or walk down the streets. Surely an invasion of privacy and lends a hand to the dark voyeurism displayed in this film. Freeze Frame is a neo-noir set in a dreary dystopia, which lends much of its tension to the wonderful over-editing. With all the great factors of this film, it was hard to get furious when the ending got tangled up in it's self. Instead of a simple, or even a discernible ending, we are treated to a clusterfuck of an ending, leaving many questions unsolved. Despite the ending, it is still a grandly uncomfortable film and should be seen for it's dismal eroticity.

PINK FLAMINGOS

John Waters (1972)

Without question, I have hated every single American city I have ever been to for more or less similar reasons, but Baltimore is easily the most patently pathetic, aesthetically and culturally repugnant, racially chaotic, culturally vacant, and innately irredeemable city I have ever had the grand misfortune of wasting time in, so naturally I can respect anyone who brings further disgrace to the decidedly decaying 'metropolis' and quasi-local auteur John Waters (Desperate Living, Hairspray) certainly did just that, if not ironically bringing some minor fame and hipster status to the post-industrial human garbage dump in the process. Bourgeois McCatholic by birth, Waters came of age in Lutherville, Maryland, a strikingly soulless suburb outside of Baltimore City, so he never really grew up around the pigtown hicks, totally degenerated German-Americans (although totally deracinated and mongrelized, Balt-krauts make up the largest white population of the city today), philistine Polaks, bottom of the barrel blacks, and other racial/cultural rabble that populate the third world-esque city, but luckily his posh upper-middleclass background gave him the monetary and educational resources he needed to more or less infamously immortalize these poor urban peasants, with Pink Flamingos (1972) aka John Waters' Pink Flamingos being his greatest tribute to people that are totally unworthy of tribute. Utilizing what he learned from watching the films of Andy Warhol/Paul Morrissey, Herschell Gordon Lewis, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Mike Kuchar, Jack Smith, and various other exploitation/arthouse auteur filmmakers, Waters gave some major, if not absurdly amateurishly assembled, movie magic to the less than ideal untermensch idiosyncrasies of Balti-morons everywhere with Pink Flamingos, which would go on to be one of the most insanely iconoclastic, greatly grotesque, and supremely shocking Midnight Movies ever made. Featuring chicks with dicks, deranged drag queens, dainty dog-shit devouring by said deranged drag queens, infantile obese elderly women with egg fetishes, real live chickens being killed during violent white trash coitus, and festive trailer park cannibalism, among countless other examples of low-camp bad taste, Pink Flamingos is arguably the greatest cultural artifact created in Baltimore City since the sardonic scribbling of Nietzschean German-American sage H.L. Mencken. Aesthetic nihilism in its most tastelessly charming Charm City form, Pink Flamingos, not unlike Harmony Korine Gummo (1997), is irrefutable proof that 'celluloid art' can be sired out of even the most decidedly dysgenic culture-less hellholes. The superlatively sordid, sleazy, seedy, scatological, and satirical celluloid tale of a matriarchal white trash family led by a deadly degenerate drag diva named Divine that declares total trash war against a pretentious married couple who wants to steal the mad matriarch's well earned tabloid-given title of "The Filthiest Person Alive," Pink Flamingos is revolutionary transgressive cinematic filth that makes Dadaism and other forms of degenerate iconoclastic art seem cultivated and classy by comparison.

Big, butch, and part bald 'Divine,' who is living under the alias Babs Johnson (Divine), is proud to be 'The Filthiest Person Alive' (as named by a tabloid called The Midnight) and her mobile-home-hermit filth family, which includes egg-phile mommy Edie (Edith Massey), criminal cracker son Crackers (Danny Mills), and traveling cunt companion Cotton (Mary Vivian Pearce), only add to her rather dubious reputation, but troubles arises in paradise when jealous rivals, middle-class married couple Connie (Mink Stole) and Raymond Marble (David Lochary), decide that they want to steal the tabloid title and they are willing to go to just about any lunatic libertine extreme to do so. Under the farcically false front of being a bourgeois 'adoption clinic,' the majorly misanthropic Marbles run a black market baby ring where they kidnap stupid young girls, which are subsequently impregnated by their flamingly gay manservant Channing (Channing Wilroy), who masturbates into his hand and inseminates the women via injection, and nine nauseating months later, the bastard babies are sold to lesbian couples. Of course, the Marbles are more ambitious than they might seem upon a superficial glance as they use the monetary proceeds of their rather unconventional adoption clinic to fund a network of drug dealers who are pushing heroin in intercity elementary schools, not to mention the fact that Raymond moonlights as a phallogentric public flasher (he shows off a giant kielbasa sausage tied to his much smaller penis) who robs young ladies of their purses after they become rather repulsed by his mangled man meat. To spy on Divine's family and to prove the Babs Johnson is indeed Divine living under an alias, the Marbles hire a crafty cunt named Cookie (Cookie Mueller) to infiltrate the family under the guise of going on a date with Crackers. Of course, Cookie cums to rather regret it as Crackers shares carnal knowledge with her while crushing a chicken (which was actually killed in real-life for the scene) between their two unclad bodies, but at least the slut spy gets the information the Marbles were after, including Babs' real identity as 'Divine', her sad family situation, and her upcoming birthday bash. In their first act of petty trash terrorism, the Marbles send Divine a special package containing an authentic turd and birthday card, which is addressed to "Fatso" and proclaims that they are really "The Filthiest People Alive." When Divine's hick freakshow of a birthday party of arrives, the busybody Marbles go there to spy from afar, where they spot, among other things, the big birthday girl sharing poppers with her hippie mutant friends and a fiercely fucked fellow with a 'singing asshole' who makes his rather flexible sphincter sing in tune with the song "Surfin' Bird" by The Trashmen. In a more precious and lighthearted moment, a romantic Egg Man (Paul Swift) with an absolutely grotesque Baltimore accent proposes to the egg-shaped Edie and she naturally accepts, so he carts her away in a wheelbarrow for their romantic honeymoon around an egg factory.

Eventually, the Marbles suffer all they can stomach at the bawdy birthday bash, especially after the singing asshole routine, so they call the cops and report the perverted party, but when the men in blue arrive, Divine and her cohorts kills and roast the pigs, subsequently eating their corpses in what amounts to something much more special than a simple b-day cake in a scene that seems to give a satirical H.G. Lewis-esque nod George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968). After receiving a lead from a happening chick named Patty Hitler, who resembles Uncle Adolf's beloved Eva Braun, Divine and Crackers find the location of the Marbles home and decide to pay their rivals back by physically and metaphysically molesting their house, licking and rubbing their furniture with their "filthiness" and sharing a passionate mother-son blowjob ("The most divine gift a mother can give!" or so says Divine) in a rather dated parody of porn chic classic Deep Throat (1972). When Divine & Son find manservant Channing (who has been imprisoned by the Marbles for trying on Connie Marbles clothing, including her panties), they hand him over to the kidnapped girls to berate and torture accordingly (he is ultimately castrated and left for dead). Unfortunately, while Divine was away with her son molesting the Marbles humble abode, the Marbles were burning down her luxury pink-and-green trailer. After that, it is no more Mr. Nice Lady-Guy for alpha-degenerate Divine, who takes the Marbles hostage at gunpoint and holds a press conference (one of the media men is not coincidentally named 'Larry Goldstein') at the less the scenic site where her trailer burned to the ground and proudly espouses her 'filth politics' Weltanschauung, degenerately declaring, "Blood does more than turn me on, it makes me cum. And more than the sight of it, I love the taste of it. The taste of hot, freshly killed blood...Kill everyone now! Condone first degree murder! Advocate cannibalism! Eat shit! Filth are my politics! Filth is my life! Take whatever you like." Not simply stopping there, Divine holds a bolshevik-esque kangaroo court, listens to the trashy testimony of Cotton and Crackers, and ultimately declares the Marbles guilty of "first-degree stupidity" and "assholism," for which they are executed via a bullet-in-the-head, but not before they are tied to a tree and tarred and feathered accordingly. After capturing "live homicide" on camera, the morally retarded representatives of the media leave and Divine, Crackers, and Cotton decide to relocate to Boise, Idaho, but Divine, being a decadent lard ass with bad taste and a voracious appetite, gets rather hungry during the trip and decides to eat a freshly defecated dog dropping, thus fittingly concluding Pink Flamingos with an offscreen narrator stating of the dimestore drag diva that s/he is, "not only the filthiest person in the world, but is also the world's filthiest actress."

Rather unfortunately, John Waters wrote a screenplay for a Pink Flamingos sequel entitled 'Flamingos Forever', which Troma Entertainment offered to finance in 1984 (though Waters was not too keen on their old school Moviolas editing system), but Divine refused to do it (s/he felt it would be a bad career move, especially after having the luxury of being able to play actual male roles in films like Alan Rudolph's neo-noir flick Trouble in Mind (1985)) and Egg Lady Edith Massey had already died by then. Of course, it was guaranteed with the premature death of Divine in 1988 that Flamingos Forever would never be made under any circumstance, but with its hysterically humorous hodgepodge of interspecies coprophilia, chick with dicks, crooning bungholes, obese-drag-queen-on-scrawny-redneck fellatios, fecal felons, and countless other uniquely unspeakable sinematic acts, it is rather questionable whether or not Waters would have been able to top Pink Flamingos with the sequel, though with Desperate Living (1977) he certainly came close. Personally, Desperate Living will always be my favorite John Waters film, even if it lacks the aberrant-garde filmmaker's main diva Divine, but Pink Flamingos certainly comes in a close second. Indubitably, the sort of film sadomasochistic sodomite gutter-auteur Andy Milligan would have probably directed had he had a larger budget to work with and was a wee bit less puritanical, Pink Flamingos is like the 'Fleshpot on 42nd Street of Baltimore,' albeit much more merrily misanthropic and visually and thematically vulgar. Essentially, Waters' anti-love-letter to the straight Catholic bourgeois Baltimore background he was reared in (ironically, Waters' father funded the film with a loan of $10,000, but he would never get around to seeing the flick that ultimately made his son (in)famous), Pink Flamingos is an uniquely ugly, unhinged, and morally miscreant anti-aesthetic assault on traditional American mores that still manages to shock today despite the fact that the USA has morally and culturally deteriorated quite drastically since the film's release over four decades ago. Luckily, growing up near Baltimore City, Waters did not have to look far to see examples of real-life social sickness in action, as Pink Flamingos would be nothing without its preternatural Balti-moron flavor, which a self-segregated semite like Barry Levinson (Diner, Avalon) has done his damndest to ignore with his sheltered middle-class Ashkenazi films. In its incendiary iconoclasm, 'wanton' wittiness, and lack of respect for good pre-counter-culture WASP society, Pink Flamingos prestigiously follows in the traditional of H.L. Mencken, minus the literacy of course. Indeed, John Waters may have become so popular since the release of Pink Flamingos that he had a hit musical on Broadway and is featured as a commentator on what seems like every single TV show and documentary released over the past decade or so, but as he stated at the very end of the documentary Midnight Movies: From the Margin to the Mainstream (2005), "I don't think I've change, I think my humor is the same...I think the American public has changed." Of course, Waters started to tone down the content of his films with the semi-mainstream flick Polyester (1981) starring burnout Aryan-Jew heartthrob Tab Hunter, but he never stopped paying (anti)tribute to the strikingly shitty city that has one of the highest Chlamydia rates in the country, which is a fact that I am sure the auteur is rather proud of. Forget HBO's

The Wire (2002-2008), Pink Flamingos is Baltimore in all its unhinged unglory before it turned in a pre-third-world jigaboo war zone.

John Waters (1974)

While John Waters has made an entire career out of cinematically portraying degenerate proletarian white trash and rednecks from Baltimore City in a uniquely unflattering manner, he grew up as a bourgeois Irish Catholic in one of Baltimore County's most bland and crime-free areas (Lutherville, Maryland) and attended prestigious private schools, thus his films are mostly from the perspective of a posh, if not particularly peculiar, poof that might not think much of the human pigs of pigtown, but he was at least able to give a sort of immortality to their 'legacy' of riff raff lunacy, which certainly no other filmmaker has accomplished, especially "city of neighborhoods" Hebrew Barry Levinson (Diner, Rain Man). Personally, I rather respect Waters' contribution to cinema as an eccentric camp exploiter of one-of-a-kind Balti-morons who seems to have more 'respect' for perverted proles and unhinged urban hillbillies than people from his own anally retentive boobeoise background. Of course, Waters' pre-Hairspray (1988) "Trash Trilogy" (Pink Flamingos, Female Trouble, Desperate Living) is where the "Pope of Trash" made his most intemperate and callously camp-addled attacks against "Natty Boh" drinkers and crab fetishists of not so charming Charm City. With Female Trouble (1974), wacked-out Waters' combined his propensity for cinematically pissing on proles with his infamous serial killer fetishism. Lovingly dedicated to Manson Family member Charles "Tex" Watson—an honor student and football star turned deranged psycho killer who John Waters paid a number of visits to in prison and even still sends Christmas cards to every year—Female Trouble is the discernibly debauched and aesthetically delinquent tale of a less than dainty dame named Dawn Davenport (played by Waters' muse "Divine") who goes from banal schoolgirl to maniac mass murderer after a tragic Christmas experience where her parents fail to give her the gift that keeps on giving: a pair cha-cha heels. Inspired by Tex's practically practiced philosophy of "crime is beauty"—something that French queer thief Jean Genet wrote about—Female Trouble is anything but beauteous as the sort of celluloid equivalent of the aged barf of a gang-raped Baltimore beggar. With the original working title being "Rotten Mind, Rotten Face", it should be no surprise that Female Trouble is one of the most uniquely ugly, undyingly unhinged and undignified, and aesthetically and thematically reprehensible works to be defecated out of a film director's decidedly despoiled soul. A film that reminds you why no other filmmaker has a more fitting name than "John Waters" (aka toilet water), Female Trouble is less than fresh farcical filmic feces that could have only been directed by Baltimore's most debauched member of the bourgeois.

It is the year 1960 in Baltimore and Dawn Davenport (Divine) is an aesthetically displeasing, obese juvenile delinquent who enjoys eating meatball sandwiches and wreaking havoc at her posh all-girls school, especially where lying, cheating, and fighting are concerned, though she is not particularly good at any of these things. When gutter dilettante Davenport fails to receive a pair of glorious cha-cha heels for Christmas from her uptight parents, she loses more than her cool and knocks over a Xmas tree over her mommy and makes the mistake of running away, thus ushering in her new life as a criminally-inclined whore with a bastard baby aka daughter of a rapist. While hitchhiking, Ms. Davenport is picked up by a boorish blue collar slob named Earl Peterson (also played by Divine), who viciously rapes (indeed, Divine rapes Divine!) and ultimately impregnates the enfant terrible teenage runaway. Stuck supporting a brat daughter named Taffy as a less than sexy slut single mother, Davenport takes employment as a reckless waitress, sleazy go-go dancer, hapless hooker, and petty thief with a crooked eye for aesthetics. For her more criminally-inclined jobs, Davenport has teamed up with her equally repulsive but much thinner and more 'beautiful' friends Chicklette (Susan Walsh) and Concetta (Cookie Mueller). By the year 1968, Taffy is such a little bad bitch at the age of 8-years-old, that her mother Dawn Davenport wastes no time in beating her with a TV antenna. Luckily, after Chicklette and Concetta recommend to Dawn that she get her hair done, she meets and falls in love with white trash hairstylist Gator (Michael Potter), whose conspicuously obese and crippled aunt Ida (Edith Massey) wants the hill-billy hunk to be 'progressive' and "turn queer" but he's no fag (or as he states himself, "I'm straight, I mean I like a lot of queers but I don't dig their equipment") and the two dirt bag love turds inevitably marry. Flash forward to 1974 and daughter Taffy (Mink Stole) is now a terrible teen at age 14 and she hates her stepfather Gator—a man who is more sexually attracted to the tools in his toolbox than his wife—so she lucks out when her mommy catches her hubby screwing other women and reading porn mags, so divorce proceedings are carried out. Meanwhile, Dawn seeks refuge in Lipstick Beauty Salon—the same place her ex-gator worked as the world's most redneck hairstylist—which is owned by a wacky weirdo couple, Donald (David Lochary) and Donna Dasher (Mary Vivian Pearce), who use the single mother as a rather unconventional guinea pig in an experiment to prove Jean Genet's dictum "crime is beauty," thus ushering in the beginning of the end of the obese whore's life as a nobody who inevitably turns into a crazed criminal somebody.

Dawn proudly beats her daughter with a chair for a crime-inspired photo shoot, but her less than photogenic face is truly ruined after Ida disfigures the single mother by throwing acid on her face in retribution as she blames her for Gator's decision to move to Michigan to work in the prestigious auto industry. The Dashers kidnap and put Aunt Ida in a giant birdcage and vengeful Dawn cuts off the hand of the acid-thrower after getting out of the hospital. Meanwhile, daughter Taffy finds her real father after her mother refuses to reveal who he is and after meeting daddy dearest, she ends up killing him after the pathological rapist tries to sexually pillage his own daughter. Not long afterward,

FEMALE TROUBLE

Taffy becomes a Hara Krishna and frees Ida, which enrages her mother Dawn so much that she kills her own little girl, which is cheered on by the degenerate Dashers. Dawn, although disfigured and looking like she was raped by a gang of transvestite bikers, starts a naughty night club act involving jumping on a trampoline and swimming in a waterless playpen full of death fish, subsequently proudly confessing regarding her dedication to criminality, "I framed Leslie Bacon! I called the heroin hot line on Abbie Hoffman! I bought the gun that Bremer used to shoot Wallace! I had an affair with Juan Corona! I blew Richard Speck, and I'm so fuckin' beautiful I can't stand it myself!!!" thus demonstrating her prestige as a purveyor of bad taste. After absurdly yelling "Who wants to be famous? Who wants to die for art?" to her adoring audience of aberrant psychopaths and jaded degenerates, Dawn shoots at the crowd and makes her escape in the woods, even living like a wild animal for a time, but is soon arrested by the cops. Ironically, during the trial, the Dashers—the people who egged on Dawn to commit the crimes, including the murder of her own daughter—are granted "total immunity" in exchange for their testimony. The Dashers also pay off Ida to lie. In the end, Dawn is found guilty and condemned to die in the electric chair, but she is rather proud of it. After starting a lesbian relationship with a fellow prisoner (played by male-to-female post-op tranny Elizabeth Coffey, who previously played the 'chick with a dick' in Pink Flamingos), Dawn proudly states being executed will be "like winning an Academy Award" and, indeed, while strapped in the electric chair, she gives an extravagant speech, concluding with the remark, "Please remember, I love every fucking one of you!" thus rather climatically concluding a career in glamorous criminality with electricity.

Sparked largely by auteur John Waters' interest in the members of the Manson family, most specifically his 'friend' Tex Watson, who came from a similar 'wholesome' background as the director yet turned into an infamous acid killer freak, Female Trouble is unadulterated celluloid bad taste from a hokey yet quasi-highbrow homo who is one of the only filmmakers able to reconcile William Castle with Federico Fellini, and Jean Genet with the Manson Family. Notably, Waters described his mainstream flick Serial Mom (1994) as "the Hollywood version" of Female Trouble. More accurately, Serial Mom is the tight-ass Towson bourgeois version of Female Trouble, thereupon making it a film closer to the director's heart in a sense. Despite its reckless white-trash-sploitation angle, Female Trouble is certainly a work of its 'zany' zeitgeist in depicting a young girl going from being a loser schoolgirl to a mass murderer, as it takes place during the rise of counter-culture groups (Waters did not include Hare Krishnas for nothing!), a time when mainstream-brainwashed teens of the 1960s senselessly threw away their parents' traditions/religion and adopted bogus beliefs and lifestyles, which is most extremely personified in the man to whom the film is dedicated, Tex Watson, the honor student and star athlete turned mass-murdering drug dealer who threw his life away with a stoned blink of an eye. Additionally, John Waters has never lied about the fact that he, like his man muse Divine, was on a steady dose of ganja during the writing and directing of his Trash Trilogy, thus fitting in with the era the film was made. Ultimately, Female Trouble is like an unholy marriage between the naked melodramas of Rainer Werner Fassbinder with the Hebraic exploitation hate of Herschell Gordon Lewis, portraying Baltimore's urban hillbilly population in a manner that only a warped and exceedingly effeminate yet eccentric homo could, most specifically the sort that sports a child molester-esque little Richard mustache. While my least favorite chapter of compulsively campy celluloid sleaze in the Trash Trilogy, Female Trouble is nothing short of a hysterically humorous trash masterpiece that proved that John Waters is the last iconoclastic Baltimorean since H.L. Mencken to prove that some people from Baltimore are actually conscious-minded and have scathing wit when it comes to making fun of such a uniquely cultivated, shitty city. As someone who has had at least two relatives that were murdered in Baltimore in bizarre fashions worthy of a John Waters flick, Female Trouble is just another reason why the "Prince of Puke" is probably the only thing charming about contemporary Charm City. With eloquent quotes like, "I wouldn't suck your lousy dick if I was suffocating and there was oxygen in your balls!" in Female Trouble, Waters has singlehandedly put Baltimore on the map in the cinema world and for that feat alone, he deserves a statue in one of dilapidated row-house neighborhoods in the city that are now populated by the sort of feral-like beasts that would murder the filmmaker for a nickel.

DESPERATE LIVING

John Waters (1977)

Although John Waters is now a friendly household name, he used to direct some of the most repulsive and disgusting films ever made. Mr. Waters has the flattering nicknames "Pope of Trash" and "Prince of Puke" for good reason. Out of all of John Waters early films, I believe the deranged masterpiece Desperate Living to be his greatest. I also believe the film to be John Water's greatest auteur piece as his late star drag queen Divine did not appear in this film. Although I enjoy Divine's appearances in John Waters early films, it's interesting to see how a Waters film plays out without the infamous he/she taking up all the spotlight.

Out of all the film directors from Baltimore, John Waters best represents that dying gutter of a city. Sorry Barry Levinson, but Diner only portrays those suburban Yiddish turds that are afraid to even walk around the city. Baltimore City has some of the most uniquely ugly and scary yet sometimes friendly people in the country. Desperate Living features some of these Baltimore folk caricatures in a world similar to what one would expect if Italian maestro Federico Fellini was on crack while directing a film that was casted behind a shady Baltimore Wal-Mart. Desperate Living features highly aggressive redneck bull dykes, the most miserable looking homeless ever (played by real homeless people), unflatteringly sassy obese black women, and a suburban neurotic prude.

Desperate Living follows a virtually paranoid schizophrenic housewife named Peggy Gravel and her servant black maid Grizelda as they escape the suburb to hide in the awful dystopian nut town know as Mortville. Mortville is run by an evil and missing tooth dictator named Queen Carlotta. Queen Carlotta has a gay looking Gestapo that fulfills her desire for lust and killing. The queen also has a horribly painted painting of Adolf Hitler and Charles Manson on display in her cardboard like castle. When Peggy and Grizelda arrive in Mortville they regrettably have to submit to the irrational demands of tyrant Queen Carlotta. The Queen was played by the strangely charismatic Edith Massey who happened to own a thrift store in Baltimore City. In Desperate Living, she also happens to forget her lines which only add to the films already extremely unique character.

It is hard to decide what is the most disgusting scene featured in Desperate Living. Seeing an extremely obese black woman having cunnilingus performed on her by an ugly and skinny white woman is quite a hideous sight that will even stun the most desensitized of cinema fans. Seeing Queen Carlotta being penetrated by a lanky and obviously uncomfortable actor is also hard to watch. Surprisingly, I did not find myself disgusted by a scene involving a real dead dog being run over by Peggy and Grizelda. Although I am a huge dog lover, I found this scene to be completely hilarious. John Waters is no doubt brilliant in his ability to make the most horrible and tragic of scenarios funny. For those that enjoy Desperate Living I also recommend watching the film again with John Waters audio commentary. Mr. Waters has great stories to tell about the production of Desperate Living and interesting details surrounding the film. For example, John Waters talks about how the actor that played Lesbian bull dyke wrestler Mole McHenry is in real-life, a beautiful woman and mother. I found these kind of details interesting especially after seeing Mole cut off her very own new penis she received during a sex change. I can only wonder if the actress allowed her children to see their mommy's big acting performance. John Waters' genius is his ability to take the most seemingly normal people or places and turn them into his own unique trash invention. Desperate Living, a film with a wonderfully trashy and bizarre world, is one of John Waters best examples (if not his best) of his "trash genius."

John Waters (1981)

As far as a healthy medium from his absurdly amateurish assembled arthouse trash flicks like Pink Flamingos (1972) and Desperate Living (1977) that originally made him infamous as Maryland's "greatest" filmmaker and his later more mainstream and socially 'conservative' and strikingly less scatological like Hair-spray (1988) and Cry-Baby (1990), bawdy Balti-moron auteur John Waters' work Polyester (1981)—a campy satire of subversive Hollywood melodramas by Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk as fetishistically filtered through exploitation cinema conventions and themes from the 1950s and 1960s—is certainly the filmmaker's first serious attempt at going mainstream without being too flaccid and, indeed, ostensibly respectable critics like Janet Maslin, as well as the middle-class people the film ceaselessly lampoons, found the somewhat less scat-driven work to their liking. Waters' first flick to receive an R-rating, as well as a work featuring a "big star," Tab Hunter—the popular teenage twink icon turned B-movie star—Polyester also proved that the filmmaker finally learned some basic directing and editing techniques of the rather conventionally campy sort in the spirit of Russ Meyer meets Douglas Sirk. Using the almost worthless gimmick of "Odorama"—a scratch-and-sniff card where one smells certain things on screen that was popularized by the director's major influence and personal hero William Castle (although his version was called "Smell-O-Vision")—Waters also proved his inner 'artiste' was a carny huckster of the nauseatingly nostalgic persuasion with his lifelong irrevocable influence from exploitation schlockmeisters like Meyer and Castle, but also more respected auteur filmmakers like Sirk. In fact, Polyester was so influenced by the keenly kaleidoscopic melodramas of Sirk that Mr. Toilet Waters made a noble effort to utilize the same filmmaking equipment, lighting, and conventions the master auteur of melodrama used for his romantically nihilistic Hollywood works, except utilizing homo blond beast Tab Hunter as opposed to closet queen and AIDS victim Rock 'I love cock' Hudson. Unfortunately, John Waters' "Dreamlanders" Superstars only have minor roles in Polyester and the filmmaker's subsequent works would feature even less of the actors as they began to drop like flies from old age, drug overdoses, and heart attacks. A salacious and semi-surreal spoof of Sirkian morals in the particularly pompous and superlatively soulless American middle-class suburbia where men are fiendishly philandering half-men and their wives stay at home and try to ignore the fact that their children are sexually degenerate criminals who absolutely loathe their parents, Polyester comically chronicles the degeneration of bourgeois white America via liberalism, feminism, and obsession with everything sexually insane. With its sadistically satirical scenes of Orthodox Jews being hit via 'drive-by brooming' and an obese Negress popping a car tire with her mere King Kong-esque teeth, Polyester is low-camp done right and raunchy—totally politically incorrect and unwaveringly so.

Large-and-not-so-in-charge middle-aged housewife Francine Fishpaw (Divine) has a rather pathetic life as a morbidly obese whale of a woman whose husband and two sexually perverted children hate her with a pathological passion. Francine's husband Elmer (David Samson) is an oafish and odious man who wears cheap polyester suits, bangs proto-wigger sluts of the seemingly physically disfigured sort, and owns a pornographic X-rated theater, thus putting much unwanted attention on the more than little lady of the house by both the media and fierce feminist protestors, who protest at the front of their humble suburban abode. Francine's cruddy children include the lecherous Lu-Lu (Mary Garlington) a dumb and bitchy slut who breaks out in sexually suggestive dances whenever she hears music—and deranged Dexter (Ken King), a drug-addicted dildo who gets high on poppers and stomps on random women's feet to derive maximum sexual gratification, thus earning him the infamous title "Baltimore foot stomper." With a seemingly anorexic, cocaine-addicted would-be-aristocrat named La Rue (Joni Ruth White) for a mother, Francine does not have a single blood relative who shows her love nor respect and thus receives all her emotional support from her special lady friend Cuddles Kovinsky (Edith Massey), a wonder woman who happens to be the 'world's oldest debutante' and not exactly a particularly intelligent nor beautiful one at that, but she has a 'great love' in the form of her Teutonic chauffeur Heintz (Hans Kramm), who is an Erich von Stroheim type character with aristocratic airs that sports a marvelous monocle. When Francine catches her husband having an affair with his absolutely repulsive secretary Sandra Sullivan (Mink Stole)—a white whore who wishes she was a big black bitch—she demands a divorce, begins to binge drink, and futilely attempts suicide via refrigerator door hanging. Meanwhile, Fran's dumb whore of a daughter Lu Lu gets pregnant by her criminally delinquent boyfriend Bo-Bo Belsinger (punk rock icon Stiv Bators of the Dead Boys infamy) and demands to have an abortion as she is a victim of feminist brainwashing, hysterically arguing to her mommy dearest, "It's stealing part of me you mean. I can feel it like cancer getting bigger and bigger like the blob. One day it will rip me open and it will be there in my life, ready to rob me of every bit of fun I deserve to have." Lu Lu is ultimately kidnapped by two nuns (Mary Vivian Pearce and Sharon Niesp), locked in the back of a car trunk, and is taken to a Catholic home for unwed and wanton young mothers, while dastardly Dexter is finally nabbed for stomping on women's feet while high off poppers and is incarcerated, and by some sort of miracle both of the Fishpaw brats manage to be purged of sin and their psychopathic tendencies when they are released from their respective institutions of higher learning. Things begin to look especially good for Fran when a handsome hunk of a man named Todd Tomorrow (Tab Hunter) with a cool corvette and hit arthouse drive-in movie theatre proposes marriage to her. Unfortunately, Mr. Tomorrow is too good to be true and is really in romantic cahoots and criminal conspiracy with Francine's malicious mommy La Rue. Tomorrow and La Rue hope to effortlessly embezzle Francine's divorce settlement money by driving her insane, not to mention the fact that Elmer and Sandra want to kill her and steal her money as well. Luckily, Fran's brainwashed children, as well as Cuddles and Heintz, come to the rescue and totally abort the conspirators' malicious plans. Undoubtedly, relatively speaking at least, Polyester ends on a much more positive note than the typical Douglas Sirk flick.

Frankly speaking, the "Odorama" gimmick for Polyester, which includes generic fart, roses, and pizza smells, is rather pointless and ineffective and with the film's introduction from some goofy jack-off hack scientist named Dr. Arnold Quackenshaw with a would-be-quirky Yiddish accent that seems like it was taken from the comical mongrel hate child of Mel Brooks and Roger Corman, I initially expected John Waters' film to be a truly bad exercise in superlatively shitty bad taste, but thankfully the curiously crude celluloid work does not degenerate into a contrived and rather goyish Vaudeville act. In terms of Sirkian inspired cinema, Polyester is at the other extreme of works inspired by the Danish-German auteur filmmaker; while German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder mastered and built on the Hollywood filmmaker's idiosyncratic melodramatic style with masterpieces of melodramatic misery like Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974), Martha (1974), and Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975), John Waters merely exploited the eccentric dramatics of such works by adding elements of "women's pictures" exploitation flicks of the 1950s-1960s and psychosexually exploitative works like The Arousers (1972) aka Sweet Kill that fallen teen icon Tab Hunter starred in at the lowest point in his career. Incidentally, Divine and Tab Hunter would later be reunited in campy and retarded celluloid romance via Lust in the Dust (1985)—a work that John Waters was asked to direct but turned down since he did not write the script, thus it was ultimately given to Paul Bartel (Eating Raoul, Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills), who also almost turned down a chance to direct the film as he felt it would be too much of a Waters-esque flick—but Polyester is indubitably a superior effort and much more in its bitter sweetly scathing scatological satire of the now virtually extinct bloated Baltimore bourgeois (which is now being replaced by Jews and an affirmative-action-based black bourgeois that has destroyed Baltimore towns like Towson), as well as its sassy spoofing of iconic Douglas Sirk melodramas from the 1950s and uniquely unhinged application of classic exploitation conventions.

Indeed, with cultural chaos like bourgeois black youths killing college professors for fun at the once-snobbish Towson Mall (which, incidentally, is right next door to the cemetery where Divine is buried) and Third World invaders from the global South owning what seems to be virtually all the local businesses (as opposed to sleazy crackers who cheat on their obese wives), the wonderfully wacky, wayward world portrayed in Polyester seems rather tame and even nostalgic compared to the nefarious real-life nightmare that now consumes ever corrupt crevice of the decidedly degenerate area. Like most of John Waters' work, Polyester is undoubtedly a film that will be of more interest to people familiar with the area as the film is charmingly contaminated with inside-jokes and the utilization of many real (and now largely defunct) locations from Charm City, including the Charles Theater, which instead of being a porn theater like in the film, was really a pretentious movie palace that oftentimes played works by Federico Fellini and Ingmar Bergman. Of course, being from Baltimore, a city with areas with such flattering nicknames as "Pig Town," it was only natural that John Waters was more inspired by exploitation and immoral melodrama than someone like Bergman and while Polyester is about as far away as a film could be from a somber Nordic melodrama, it does pay a grand (dis)service to the area and the people it portrays like the films of the Swedish auteur. When it comes to depicting the culturally retarded 'collective unconscious' of Baltimore, John Waters is only second to iconoclastic Nietzschean H.L. Mencken and both men shared a rather sharp and severely sardonic wit, which certainly bleeds throughout Polyester.

CRY-BABY
CRY-BABY

John Waters (1990)

Cry-Baby is the undeniable mainstream cult success of John Waters' career. Although Pink Flamingos is more known to the midnight movie crowd, Cry-Baby steals the limelight with Johnny Depp and mock-Grease antics. John Waters might be attempting to parody "high school musicals" but his film ends up in the ditch prematurely after the defining points are far too few and the plot never elevates properly to be diagnosed as a structured film. Angst has never reached such a low point. The moment a tear streams down Depp's baby face is the day I cried for the woes of being a "normal" departure for Waters. Having seen Hair-spray (Original), I decided that Waters is also a competent director for films that aren't lurid escapades of sexual delinquents. Even though Cry-Baby is Waters' first major studio production, the cult success allows me to see past the brainless entertainment and romance inserts to spot a form of amateurism evident mainly by the lack of a finale or proper build-up. The 50s fashion of rockabilly is transferred impeccably thanks to the keen eye of John Waters. He always did have a way with "period pieces" and the costume department. For a musical, this film is potentially stale. Of the song numbers, only few turn out to be catchy. The rest mainly exist to piece together the story by implementing plot devices and personality traits. If the songs were to be removed, much of the characters would never be explored but the film would have a smoother transition from film to music. A clashing of art mediums should be both entertaining and memorable. Cry-Baby is definitely entertaining but lacks in memorability save for Traci Lords. Cry-Baby mainly stays fashionably afloat thanks to the soundtrack, Depp's fan phenomenon, and sheep to the herd. During many of the scenes, I found myself shouting "OH COME ON!" while rolling my eyes. This strenuous activity did spare my eyes from a majority of shameful scenes of girls doing double back flips into the arms of Johnny Depp for a quickly thought up ending. Cry-Baby isn't anything special, least not for me to continue expressing my thorough distaste for this film. I'll just say that I did not like Cry-Baby and leave it at that. Also, John Waters has a natural talent for finding ogreish looking people. This review is dedicated to Hatchet-Face and not the obese Ricki Lake. Suck it up.

CECIL B. DEMENTED

Aside from possibly A Dirty Shame (2004), Cecil B. Demented (2000) is undoubtedly John 'Pope of Trash' Waters' most aesthetically repulsive and inately idiotic semi-mainstream film to date, which is rather ironic considering it is not only a satire of Hollywood and its plague-like diseasing of the American populous' already fragile minds, but also a sardonic cinematic snipe at both underground filmmaking and avant-garde auteurism; two worlds the director has worked in and cinematically defiled. Aside from being a proudly debauched director of both mainstream and underground trash, Waters is also a lifelong cinephile and in no other film does he pay greater (anti)homage to his celluloid heroes and enemies than Cecil B. Demented; a film about terrorist filmmakers in the spirit of the Red Army Faction (in fact, one of the original promotional posters for the film featured a star/gun logo similar to the RAF logo) led by an eponymous character played by Stephen Dorff who kidnaps a positively pompous A-list Hollywood actress played by Melanie Griffith and forces her to star in their own sub-underground film, which is shot in a psychopathic cinema vérité-like manner of nonsensical ultra-violence that makes the radical realism films of Werner Herzog and Harmony Korine seem like they were produced by George Lucas. Like the Patty Hearst (who actually has a small role in the film!) story meets The King of Comedy (1983) directed by Martin Scorsese meets the Troma-maniac 'masterpiece' Terror Firmer (1999) directed by Lloyd Kaufman, Cecil B. Demented shows what happens when a queen bitch of a diva develops a nasty case of Stockholm Syndrome and engages in cinematic terrorism against the mainstream Hollywood studio system, the 'social-conditioning' centers aka movie theaters that screen high-budget trash, and the brainwashed mainstream filmgoers who keep on literally and figuratively buying into Tinseltown's lies, thus giving credence to Baltimore sage H.L. Mencken's dictum, "Nobody ever went broke underestimating the taste of the American public." A film that is just about as emotionally and aesthetically vapid as any of the mainstream films it ludicrously lampoons, except with seemingly infinite references to various films and filmmakers that only an idiosyncratic sleaze cineaste like the unholy "Prince of Puke" could dream up, as well as low-camp exploitation scenarios featuring a number of mainstream actors in uniquely unflattering positions (Melanie Griffith's career essentially ended after being in the film), Cecil B. Demented is not only Waters' most cinematically reflexive film, but also proof that a cinematic work can be totally aesthetically and thematically irredeemable, yet be wildly witty and exceedingly entertaining. Featuring then-rather-unknown Michael Shannon (My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done?, Boardwalk Empire) as a gay white trash trucker and Fassbinder fanboy, Meztizo Entourage star Adrian Grenier as a heroin-shooting junky with an unhealthy obsession with

CECIL B. DEMENTED

Herschell Gordon Lewis, and Maggie Gyllenhaal as a seemingly autistic Crowleyite who worships the films of Kenneth Anger, among various other certifiably sick cinephiles turned cinematic terrorists, Cecil B. Demented is cinema history heresy in its most hopelessly and haphazardly humorous form.

Like any rational person who has been to the superlatively shitty quasi-Third World city, popular A-list Hollywood actress Honey Whitlock (Melanie Griffith) hates Baltimore, but being a psychopathic actress seemingly modeled after Julia Roberts (whose brother Eric Roberts has a cameo role in the film) and whose ostensible sweetness and positivity is nothing but a false front for the press, she tells the media that, "Baltimore is the best," even if crab cakes make her want to puke. Luckily, little does Ms. Whitlock know that an anti-Christ auteur named Cecil B. Demented (Stephen Dorff) and his motley crew of 'Kamikaze filmmakers' named 'Sprocketholes', who live in a shabby Warhol Factory-esque factory in an abandoned movie theater, have plans to kidnap her, makeover her appearance in a manner that seems like she was run over by a truck driven by John Waters' deceased man-muse Divine, and force her to play the lead role in their ultimate work of unhinged underground cinema, which involves real terrorism, shootouts, and deaths. Having infiltrated every movie theater in Baltimore as undercover employees, including the place of the premiere where they kidnap Honey Whitlock, the Sprocketholes have already carefully calculated where their entire film-within-films will be set. Upon kidnapping Honey Whitlock, who has very little respect for the art of cinema, especially of the low-budget underground variety, Mr. Demented has his Sprocketholes, a slavish crew of screwballs with idiosyncratic personalities and flagrant sexual perversions, who sport tattoos of their favorite directors, introduce themselves, which include an art director named Lewis (Larry Gilliard, Jr.) who is probably the only black rapper in the world that likes David Lynch, an ex-porn star turned lead actress named Cherish (Alicia Witt) who worships Warhol but is in lecherous love with Mr. Demented (even if she can't fuck him until they finish principle photography for the film), a self-loathing heterosexual hairstylist named Rodney (Jack Noseworthy) who has a special place in his balls for homo Hispanic auteur Pedro Almodóvar, and a negative Nelly of a negress named Chardonnay (Zenzele Uzoma) who works as sound artist and wallows in the celluloid hate of Spike Lee, among various other rejects of the film world whose taste in cinema parallels their perversions and pathologies.

After being given a Liquid Sky-inspired makeover from hell by faux-fag Rodney, Honey Whitlock, who would almost rather drop dead than star in a no-budget movie, is forced to give the performance of her lifetime, which she initially does less than halfheartedly, but after having her life threatened, she does it with gusto, even upstaging her 'dead serious' (they are more than willing and will ultimately die for celluloid) kidnappers. The group's first major filming location is a beyond bourgeois luncheon featuring a number of anally retentive Hollywood turd types for the Baltimore Film Commission and against her better judgment, Honey Whitlock jumps off a building in a daring stunt at the behest of Mr. Demented and in the aftermath, a shootout breaks out between the Sprocketholes and the cops, which kills Rodney and wounds Cecil. In the chaos, Ms. Whitlock makes the amateur mistake of attempting to turn herself in after committing the cinematic crimes, but her new comrades save her, thereupon completing her course in Stockholm syndrome, even declaring herself “Demented forever!” and embracing a demented brand being burned into her arm. In a seeming unlikely scenario, a sequel to Forrest Gump entitled Gump Again is being filmed in Baltimore and the Sprocketholes make it their business to crash the film production, bringing celluloid carnage that ultimately results in the maiming and death of a number of Demented’s debauched comrades by way of obese Teamsters who hate non-union film crews. Honey and the Sprocketholes seek shelter in a porno theater where there is a showing of ex-porn star Cherish’s anal sex flick, so a bunch of masturbating perverts help her and her comrades evade the police. In the end, the final scene of Cecil B. Demented’s movie is shot at night at a Baltimore Drive-in theater and to show her commitment to the cause, Honey Whitlock sets her precious hair on fire and the Sprocketholes commence the shooting wrap-up by having sex (Demented demanded nothing less than abstinence during the production!) While screwing Mr. Demented, Cherish is shot dead via a bullet in the head by a cop and the deranged director, who is crippled from the various times he has been shot/maimed, sets himself on fire and rides a wheelchair off a building, thus enabling Honey Whitlock to make a great escape, which she fails at, but does not matter due to her newfound popularity as America’s most famous A-list criminal actress and certified demented diva, even if she will probably have a lengthy stay in prison.

Described by Roger Ebert as being like a “a home movie [with] a bunch of kids goofing off” and featuring music by synth-driven grindcore/mathcore group The Locust, Liberace, Moby and even a negrofied rap theme song entitled “Demented Forever,” Cecil B. Demented is indubitably celluloid trash at its most aesthetically worthless and degrading, yet it is also an iconoclastic piece of sardonic cinephilia directed by a man who clearly loves cinema, be it the homoerotic Hollywood Biblical epics of Hebrew Cecil B. DeMille, the artistically meritless exploitation films of Semitic smut-peddler Herschell Gordon Lewis, or the autistic anti-auteur pieces of Andy Warhol, thus making it a sinephile’s semi-botched wet dream. Satirizing Hollywood for their vanity-inspired philanthropy (the film begins with a scene of a crippled kid who was able to have a heart transplant due to donations from a film premiere) and soulless comedy-dramas like Patch Adams (Cecil B. Demented’s crew invades a theater where audience members are sentimentally crying about kids with cancer) which turn audiences into infantile philistines, but also underground filmmakers with the auteur-inspired egomania and proclivity toward celluloid fetishism (indeed, it is no mistake that every Sprockethole has some sort of preternatural sexual perversion), Cecil B. Demented is a true work of equal-opportunity cinematic offensiveness that is more like a cinephiliac romp than a rant. While I did not take too kindly to Cecil B. Demented upon its release over a decade ago, the film has certainly grown on me since, sort of like a pair of goofy boxer shorts, and I now regard it as one of John Waters' greatest mainstream flicks. After all, who could hate a film directed by the Pope of Trash featuring Michael Shannon playing the role of a homo hick who is unsoundly obsessed with the girth of Mel Gibson's Catholic cock?! If there ever was a filmmaker with a total incapacity for taking anything serious in life seriously—be it cancer patients, terrorism, or his own films—it is most certainly John Waters and, quite arguably, no other film of his better personifies this in 'mainstream' form than Cecil B. Demented, a work featuring a fantasy underground cinema revolution that would be great if it actually happened, but certainly never will, especially in an anti-culture sewer like Baltimore. Also, one must give credit to John Waters for ruining Melanie Griffith's acting career, for the actress never looked so ludicrous in a totally tasteless way and that is saying a lot!

A DIRTY SHAME

John Waters (2004)

A Dirty Shame is the most recent film from the “pope of trash” John Waters. Only a pile of cultural garbage such as Baltimore could produce such a director of “bad” taste. Mr. Waters attempts to go back to his early gross out roots with A Dirty Shame, a film that follows sex addict revolutionaries as they battle puritanical “neuters” in suburban (not shithole ghetto) Baltimore. Johnny Knoxville plays Ray-Ray, a messiah of the perverse and unclean. His latest recruit is Sylvia Stickles, a neuter housewife turned cunnilingus obsessed sex addict apostle. I am not a very big fan of Johnny Knoxville. I remember him from his early days as the fake redneck that did stupid shit in the Big Brother Skateboarding videos put out by the Larry Flynt owned skateboard magazine of the same name. I must admit that Knoxville’s role as Ray-Ray in A Dirty Shame is fitting as he does play a cunning pervert leader quite well. The horrid and repulsive looking (and acting) Tracy Ullman also does a great job with her performance that will have me turned off for the next two weeks. John Waters did a lot of research on sex perverts and fetishes in preparation for writing A Dirty Shame. Seeing Gay hairy “bears,” “splashing,” and eroticizing dirt made me want to vomit more than laugh. A Dirty Shame also features some of the most unappealing nudity I have seen in a recent film. I think I was even frightened by some of the unnatural erect suburban neighborhood trees. I never thought that I would see the day that David Hasselhoff’s feces would turn someone into a sex addict. My favorite films from John Waters are Pink Flamingos and Desperate Living. I am also a fan of his later more mainstream films like Cry-Baby and Pecker. Although John Waters attempts to create a film similar to his earlier works with A Dirty Shame, it isn’t particularly successful. Whereas a film like Desperate Living is “trash art,” A Dirty Shame is just trash. But then again, the film does have a couple good laughs.

THE GREEN BERETS

John Wayne (1968)

I have never really been a John Wayne fan. I have always found him to be a pseudo tough guy playing the role of the definitive masculine hero. Wayne made this clear when he dodged World War II service (when many other people in Hollywood contributed). Knowing this, it makes his anti-communist films much more interesting. I constantly asked myself whether or not Wayne believes in what he promotes. To add, I wonder if Wayne is in character 100% of the time. Wayne may have even traded in his real personality for the role of a heroic alpha male. Acting never seemed to be too manly of a career. Communists openly admitted they sought world domination through international revolution (by use of ignorant and exploited proletarians). I also think its fairly obvious that communists were barbaric. They ended up killing the largest amounts of human beings who didn't fit well into collectivist societies in human history. Finally, I think its fairly obvious communists sought to destroy the family, church, and personal freedoms. Communism was no doubt designed to destroy Western Civilization. John Wayne obviously oversimplifies these themes. In Green Berets, they even become comical. The film is very black and white with no real interesting concepts. But then again, that makes the best propaganda. Gay Cowboy icon John Wayne representing the Red, White, and Blue. The interesting thing about the anticommunist Hollywood films is their lack of condemning Americans involved with rise of the Soviet Union. New York City wall street banker Jacob Schiff gave $20 million dollars to Leon Trotsky (David Bronstein) to fund the Russian revolution of 1917. Without American bankers, the Soviet Union would have never existed. It's interesting that without Capitalism there would be no Communism. Knowing that, the Bolshevik leaders seemed to be uninterested in their theories but more of an interest in the enslavement and control of people as a collective. That's exactly what happened. Green Berets epitomized all lies that American war films presented. The Americans were always fighting the good and noble war. The war that would result in peace. At the end of Green Berets John Wayne tells a little orphan boy that he is the reason America fights. I couldn't help but laugh at this scene. It was the most entertaining point in the film. But then again, I felt Green Berets was truly an American film so I can't really hate it. The film gives you the comfort of feeling like you are at home. I totally agree with the common assertion that the Western is a part (or extension) of the combat genre. It's comparable to the Western inspiring the Samurai, and the Samurai inspiring Star Wars. All these different films fit essentially into the same genre. They have the same black and white (good vs. evil) plots. I personally have never been a fan of any of these genres really for that reason. After viewing Green Berets I felt as if I had seen nothing new. To be honest I don't even remember most of it. It's comparable to countless other shitty war films.

BOARDINGHOUSE

John Wintergate (1982)

I have a very low tolerance for celluloid schlock and especially shot-on-video schlock, so I have been putting off watching the curious cult item Boarding-House (1982) aka Housegeist aka Bad Force aka Boarding House directed by and starring one-time-auteur John Wintergate, which was hailed by no lesser exploitation cinema authorities as Stephen Thrower in NIGHTMARE USA: The Untold Story of the Exploitation Independents (2007) and by Bill Landis and Michelle Clifford in Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002) due to its various retrograde idiosyncrasies, for about a year now, but I finally decided to give in and watch the flick the other day when I realized I had simply nothing better to watch and somewhat to my surprise, I am glad I did. Like the outstandingly aesthetically autistic result of a coke-addled preppie with a meta-Reaganite sense of materialism and a softcore psychopathic sort of narcissism who attempted to make a work of psychedelic horror video art after frying his brain after one-too-many William Castle movie marathons and misreadings of Alan Watts while high on mescaline, Wintergate's positively preposterous pride and joy is notable for not only apparently being the first horror feature shot on video (Betacam to be exact), but also for being blown-up to 35mm (something that apparently cost between $45,000 to 50,000 at the time), thus also making it the first (and possibly the last) SOV production to be screened in an actual movie theater (apparently, it premiered alongside Jaws 3-D (1983)). A vanity piece gone terribly, terribly yet insanely intriguingly wrong created by people who seem to have no sense of cinema, BoardingHouse was originally intended as a hokey horror spoof and the original cut ran at the absurd length of 2 hours and 38 minutes but at the recommendation of an old distributor named Howard Willette that once worked for RKO Pictures and Howard Hughes, the director decided to completely reedit the film in a fashion to make it seem more like a 'serious' and 'straight' horror film, thus resulting in a totally berserk mongrel of a monster movie set in some alternate universe of preppie philistine psychopathy of the perniciously plodding sort where nothing is as it seems, let alone makes sense, and all genuine human emotion and rationality has taken a backseat to inanely idiotic irreverence, senseless supernatural stupidity, dumbfoundingly dumb and unintentionally surreal dialogue, sickeningly sterile sensuality and plastic blowup-doll-like sexuality, mindnumbingly moronic metaphysical mumbo jumbo, special ed grade special effects, preposterous visual puns (i.e. a woman fondling a stuffed monkey, thus 'spanking the monkey'), and some of the most hysterically histrionic death scenes ever excreted onto archaic video. Featuring the aesthetic integrity of a post-porn-chic-era fuck video combined with the the shameless showmanship of William Castle had he been a stupid goy instead of a seasoned Semitic smut-peddler, as well as a badly bastardized hodgepodge of themes from popular mainstream horror films like Repulsion (1965), and The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), Carrie (1976), Halloween (1978), Phantasm (1979), The Amityville Horror (1979), Motel Hell (1980), and countless others, Wintergate's pathologically outré epic of accidental eccentricity and suburban excess also features the would-be-iconic gimmick of 'Horror Vision' where a psychedelic shot of a leather-glove-clad hand appears alongside swirling noise anytime a murder is about to happen to warn "viewers with nerve or heart conditions" to "cover their eyes and ears," thereupon further accentuating the already potent psychotronic schlock surrealism of the film. The waywardly and wonderfully retarded story of a seemingly sexless narcissistic preppie douche, self-stylized guru and metaphysician, and proud confirmed bachelor of the scrawny blond Aryan sort with telekinetic powers who inherits a haunted killer home from his uncle and turns it into a boardinghouse (aka softcore whorehouse) for generically beautiful bimbos between the ages of 18 and 25, only for absurdist murder and mayhem to ensue shortly after, Boarding House is like horror-porn for schizophrenic eunuchs and Mormon gorehounds, albeit only all the more bizarre than it sounds.

As revealed on an archaic computer screen at an imaginary police station featured at the beginning of Boarding House, on Sept. 18, 1972 two 'Nobel Prize Winners,' Professor Don Hoffman and his wife—supposed leading authorities on telekinesis and the occult—were found dead in their home during their 16th anniversary party and the only witness was their 13-year-old daughter Deborah, who later testified that her parents died in a double suicide and who was committed to a mental institution a couple months later after suffering an "emotional breakdown." Ever since the dubious deaths, anyone who has moved into 'Hoffman House' has died under mysterious and oftentimes ultra-violent conditions, including an old fart named Dr. Royce, whose sole heir, a 30-something-year-old nephew named Jim Royce (director John Wintergate), inherits the home. Meanwhile, on the day that Deborah Hoffman is supposed to be released from a nuthouse, two employees at the mental institution where she is interned are brutally murdered, with a nurse named Sherry (Aryen Winter) being telekinetically hanged and a bald dork being strangled and disemboweled. Upon officially inheriting the Hoffman House after meeting with a weasel-like lawyer, Jim places a superficially sleazy ad in a newspaper reading: "Girls! Girls! Girls! If you're between 18 and 25, unattached, and beautiful, then I want you to share my ten bedroom house with me for approximately $100 a month... Call Jim at the Boardinghouse." While prowling around his pool, Jim somewhat sinisterly thinks to himself, "I can just imagine all those hot numbers... hanging around the pool. Yeahhhh! It's going to be a real bachelor's paradise." Despite his obsession with having a bare-skinned brigade of slutty and big bosomed concubine babes at his disposal, Jimbo spends most of his talk yelling at the girls for having pets in the house and walking around in nothing but a faggy leopard print thong when the girls eventually move in, though he develops a special interest in a would-be rock star named Victoria Spelling (played by director Wintergate's real-life wife and muse 'Kalassu,' who also acted as second unit director of the film). Unquestionably, the girls of BoardingHouse are rampantly heterosexual and discernibly sex-starved, but Jim—a casual collector of women whose entire existence seems like one grueling masturbation routine where he never actually cums—seems to like to keep the girls hanging around and is not actually attracted to them but rather the fact that they are so shamelessly attracted to him and love showing him their titties, as he wallows in all of the shallow attention. Indeed, there were multiple times during the movie that I thought Jim would start jerking off to his own image in a mirror, as he is a sort of Narcissus of suburban Hollywood, albeit nowhere as charming, attractive, or witty as he thinks.

Whilst meditating guru style on his desk at work in nothing but a rather revolting thong and listening to some metaphysical inspirational tapes and attempting to levitate something with his nauseatingly self-centered mind, Jim is rudely interrupted by his old Jewish dipsomaniac boss Joel Weintraub (Joel Riordan), who provides minor comic relief in the film as a boorish yet jolly overweight buffoon who at one point during the flick falls flat on his face while attempting to swing a golf club. Somewhat strangely, Jim seems to be just as interested in Joel as his eclectic collection of boardinghouse babes, if not more so. As Victoria states to her incessantly snickering teenybopper-like gal pals after a failed attempt at seducing Jim regarding the peculiar appearance-obsessed protagonist, "he's not physical at all. He's too into metaphysics. I don't know. It's really interesting though, he's different than any guy I've ever met." Indeed, instead of fucking her when Victoria comes to see him in some rather revealing lingerie that more or less reveals her pussy and tits, Jim autistically performs telekinesis on a bar of soap and then pushes the little lady in the bathtub with him, but just before you think he is going pound her puss, he gets out of the tub and leaves her high and dry, at least sexually speaking. Since Victoria cannot get Jim to seduce her, she decides taking a trip to the local library to pick up some books on metaphysics as it is the next best thing to being fucking by Jim as her act of devotion might grab her prospective lover's attention since he is an obsessive occultnik and all. Considering that Victoria is such a superlatively self-centered narcissist that she has posters of herself hanging up in her room as if she worships herself in an almost religious fashion, it is a huge sign of how much she likes Jim that she would go so far out of her way to grab his attention, but unfortunately something in the Hoffman House has its eyes on her and its not a preppie pseudo-stud with a blond mullet. Indeed, the Hoffman House is haunted by a leather-glove-clad killer from another dimension who is able to cross over to the human world via the evil home, which holds many pernicious spirits. While Jim pretentiously proclaims, "I'm into harnessing cosmic energy so that I can learn the secrets of the universe," he seems totally oblivious to the fact that a supernatural slasher killer is in his humble abode, as his head is so far up his own ass that even when some of the girls in the house begin getting mutilated and murdered by inanimate objects, he has no clue what is going on. Indeed, when an ice-pick magically moves on its own and stabs one of the boardinghouse babes in the hand, the only thing dullard preppie dude Jimmy can say is, "All her fingers work...I checked them." Being female and all, Victoria's intuition tells her something evil is lurking in the house, so she nonsensically buries the ice-pick while absurdly proclaiming "I hate ice-picks" like a bratty toddler performing a mock funeral for a pet goldfish or hamster that died as a result of her neglecting to feed it. Indeed, most of the things people do and say in BoardingHouse make absolutely no sense, thus making for an obnoxiously otherworldly atmosphere that is as strangely and awe-inspiringly addictive as it is mentally and aesthetically grating.

Also lurking around the Hoffman House is an unnamed Gardener (also played by Wintergate) with a pseudo-punk fashion sense and crippled arm in a chain-sling who suffers from posttraumatic stress as a result of doing a couple tours in the Vietnam War. When the Gardener acts like he is going to attack Victoria with hedge-clippers and rudely knocks her in the pool, all the girls complain about the old disheveled and beat-up creep's presence, but as Jim tells them, he "comes with the house" since he apparently saved his belated uncle Dr. Royce's life during the Vietnam War. Aside from being a physical cripple, the Gardener is also a sexual invalid of sorts that is terribly afraid of women, so when he starts to approach one of the boardinghouse babes with a chainsaw, the chick uses her boobs as a weapon by flaunting them in the seemingly semi-retarded horticulturalist's face, thus causing him to run for his dear life. Aside from being inhabited by a inter-dimensional killer, the house also causes people to hallucinate hellish things that seem to be dreamed up by some sort of demonic pig fetishist. For example, when one of the girls cuts herself while shaving in the shower, the tiles on the shower wall become drenched in blood and before the little lady knows it, her lovely little blonde head has transformed into that of a grotesque balding male mutant pig creature (!?) in what is undoubtedly one the most bizarre and quaintly unnerving yet humorous scenes in the entire film. Aside from supernatural elements, one of the girls, Cindy (Mary McKinley), also faces harassment from her wealthy ex-boyfriend, Richard (played Josh Brolin's brother Brian Bruderlin), who hires a moronic horndog with a mullet named Harris (Dean Disico) to scope out the boardinghouse where he ultimately becomes the object of mindless worship and amorous adoration among the girls of the home, with one of them immediately shouting, "A man! Let's get him in the pool ladies" upon seeing him. Ultimately, Harris is enthusiastically defiled by the sole East Asian chick at the house, Su Ling (Victoria Herron), but shortly after they share miscegenation-based carnal knowledge, the dimwitted jock detective is killed via electrocution after a blow-dryer levitates and lands in the water of the bathtub where he is washing the Oriental sex juices off of his body. Shortly after his rather pathetic death, his employer rich dick Richard shows up to talk his estranged girlfriend Cindy into accepting his less than romantic marriage proposal, but she has less than fond memories of him brutally raping her, so she has to give the idea some thought. To help cheer Cindy up about her rapist boyfriend coming by, Jim takes her to the beach and the two begin making love, but that is cut short when the supernatural gloved killer, who somehow magically managed to get out of the Hoffman House, beats them both over the head with a large rock. Possessed by the spirit of the sadistic inter-dimensional killer, Cindy drowns herself by walking into the sea and not looking back in a fashion not unlike that of Georgina Spelvin's character in Gary Graver's Bergman-esque hardcore flick 3 A.M. (1975).

In one of the most nightmarishly nonsensical and phantasmagorically schlocky scenes in the entire film, Victoria is grabbed by a monster arm that pops out of the mattress on her bed, so she runs outside and eventually ends up in a graveyard where a bloody monster man with a rotting pig head attacks her. In some sort of convoluted dream-within-a-dream borrowed from Don Coscarelli's Phantasm, Victoria decides to sleep in a bed that she discovers in the middle of the graveyard, but she is soon rudely awakened by a corpse, not once but twice in a row as she is transferred from dream to dream, only to truly wake-up after two nonsensical bedtime encounters with dead bodies, or so it seems. Luckily, after having a massive globule of semen-like yogurt ejaculated on her face by a malicious being hiding inside a refrigerator, Victoria is taken to a steamy shower by Jimmy boy and has her meat-curtain rigorously reamed in what is probably the most awkward, unintentionally creepy, and seemingly unending sex scene in all of film history. While Victoria is more than a little satisfied after being buggered senselessly by Jimmy boy in a steamy shower, her happiness is soon completely shattered when one of her roommates, a mousy British broad named Debbie (Lindsay Freeman, who had a small role in Brian De Palma's 1984 film Body Double), hands her a fancily wrapped present that she claims is from Jim that contains the mutilated corpse of her beloved kitty cat named 'Pumpkin.' Of course, at this point in the film, it is quite clear that there is something not quite right about Debbie.

At the end of BoardingHouse, Victoria has her generic rock band 33 1/3 play at a late night pool-party-cum-magic-show at Hoffman House on the tenth anniversary of the night when the Hoffmans were murdered during their own anniversary party. A young high yellow negro cop with a small afro named Officer Weston (Elliot Van Koghbe, who also acted as the assistant producer of the film) attempts to warn Jim of the unfortunate timing of his party, but he does not seem to mind that his friends might be brutally murdered by a malevolent entity. After Officer Weston is forced by sinister forces to unload some bullets into an ebony princess that looks like she could be his sister, the same forces make him turn the service revolver on himself. The Gardener is also attacked by the same entity and subsequently stumbles around the party wounded, but the party guests mistake his belligerent behavior for mere drunkenness and laugh at him like he is some sort of cheap novelty while he bleeds out. When Brit bitch Debbie gets alone with Victoria's band manager—a seriously scuzzy pimp-like scumbag that proudly declares that there is, “nothing that I like better than a little head and some coke”—and begins feeling the old geezer up while calling him her “daddy,” things get a little bit interesting. Indeed, it turns out that Debbie is not British at all, as her full-name is Debbie Hoffman and she is the deranged child who was institutionalized after seeing her parents killed at the Hoffman House. In fact, Debbie was actually the one responsible for killing them, as she slaughtered her mother after she had walked in on her and her Noble Peace laureate father having incestuous pederast sex. Debbie also decided to kill Daddy Hoffman out of jealousy after he refused to give her his ‘heart’ and after Victoria's band manager fails to do the same, she quite literally rips the old fellow's heart out of his chest and drenches her body with his blood with the utmost orgasmic sadistic glee. When Jim sees Debbie's deadly dirty work and realizes she is the crazed Hoffman daughter, he wages a telekinetic battle with her that results in the crazed cunt with an evil sort of Electra complex being pushed into another dimension. In the end, it is rather ridiculously revealed that Jim went on to become a digital systems analyst for the space program, Victoria became a “hot RCA property” and is now on a world promo tour, and Debbie Hoffman's body was never recovered. Although the Hoffman House ended up mysteriously burning down, a mystery lady named ‘Angela Hart’ bought the charred remains in 1983, thus leaving room for a BoardingHouse sequel that has still yet to be made.

In the audio commentary track for the 2008 Code Red DVD release of BoardingHouse, director/star John Wintergate and his wife/co-star Kalassu, who are still married after all these decades, revealed that they are preparing a sequel and that their daughter Shanti Wintergate—an aspiring musician/actress that appeared as an extra in Donnie Darko (2001), has an unhealthy obsession with frog pseudo-avant-garde filmmaker Michel Gondry as depicted in an appalling music video she made, and is married to the singer of the pop-punk group the Bouncing Souls, Greg Attonito—will be starring in the film and that she might even bare some skin. Personally, I do not really see how a proper sequel can be made for the film, as most of its preternatural character and particular potency comes from its conspicuously kitschy Betacam look, singularly schlocky pre-digital special effects and equally archaic computer text, and primitive synthesizer-based score, which are all obscenely outmoded aesthetic ingredients that simply cannot be reproduced today in any sort of genuine or effective way. It should also be noted that in the summer of 2013, Slasher // Video released the remastered 2hr 38 min director's cut of BoardingHouse on DVD, which is certainly the sort of epic (non)cinematic endurance test that separates the true gutter cinephiles and cineastes from the autistic DVD-collecting virginal fanboys. Personally, as someone who has indulged in my fair share of recreational drug use, I always get annoyed when people describe works like Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968), Dennis Hopper's Easy Rider (1969), Alejandro Jodorowsky's El Topo (1970), and Alan Parker's Pink Floyd: The Wall (1982) as "Head" movies and compare them to drug trips, but I must admit that Wintergate's betacam horror show is certainly a work that seems like it was made by dope fiends for dope fiends and considering all the mindnumbingly moronic metaphysical twaddle in the film and tendency for the characters to sit around half-naked and do nothing, I think that it is fairly indisputable that the auteur/star and his muse/co-star conceived of the work while they were fucking and getting stoned. Indeed, for better or worse, BoardingHouse is a bad trip in vintage video form, as one of those oh-so-thankfully rare horror flicks like George Barry's Death Bed: The Bed That Eats (1977) or even the avant-garde counterculture films of James Broughton (The Bed, Dreamwood) that transports the viewer to a completely capricious, uncanny, and idiosyncratic cinematic realm that is strangely inviting and fun to get lost in, even though it gives you every indication that it shouldn't be. Forget Black Devil Doll from Hell (1984) or The Video Dead (1987), BoardingHouse is the only shot-on-video horror turd that matters, as a strangely playful, fairly fanciful, and almost always whimsical piece of 'accidental art' that reminds the viewer that there are actually rare occasions when someone who has no business getting behind a camera, let alone directing, churns out something that is more curious and enthralling than any of the films that played at that year's Cannes Film Festival. Indeed, the film may be the zaniest labor of audio-visual love ever conceived by two drug-addled real-life lovers, as a post-counter-cultural Betacam abortion that manages to express the worst of its zeitgeist in a uniquely unwitting way that reeks of tasteless charm and conspicuously kitschy accidental charisma. In other words, enter the BoardingHouse if you dare to delight in odiously outmoded accidental video art of the horrifyingly horrendous horror-comedy sort.

THE KILLER

John Woo (1989)

Strolling through the decadent and backwoods gas station rental oeuvre, I'd see selections after selections of films that I'd be able to watch effortlessly, however, only with age. Finding it in myself to pick up Ghoulies Go To College seems like such a far cry from my habitual rental of Tremors or The Kindred. Other than the typical action films, I'd frequent Face/Off and Broken Arrow, respectively, and their Hong Kong predecessors were virtually unknown to me. Had I known this Eastern-Western director created 2 bodies of work that are complete mirror opposites of archetype and rival every action film released in the states (in terms of bullets and psychotic violence), I would have converted to Wooism years ago to save me the embarrassment of my friends goading me for not seeing John Woo's The Killer and only until this year, Hard-Boiled. The tale of an introverted and valiant assassin is something that most every subject has glanced at, their tales sweeping the screen in the lingual form of French, Korean, Japanese, and Chinese. What really spikes The Killer above the enamored expectations alongside Leon: The Professional is the chemistry between Ah-jong and Inspector Ying, while border-lining male romance, the obsessions they carry differ in routes but never-the-less scrawl to many climactic confrontations.

Having watched both The Killer and Hard-Boiled within the span of a sweat-soaked evening, Chow-Yun Fat has fashioned himself to be an indecently versatile actor, harnessing giddy-boy in Hard-Boiled as the "serious-when-he-needs-to-be" Tequila and channeling an intensified yet poetic hitman whose heart is too big for the sordid expectations of him and his weapon. In The Killer, Chow-Yun Fat plays past his genetic baby-face and manages to shed that image upon the opening shootout scene which gives birth to the wonderfully important subplot of a blinded lounge singer named Jennie whom, out of guilt, Ah-jong decides to follow, protect, and love, tenderly, with plans of a final job to afford her cornea transplant surgery. Simple basis enough with a dash of betrayal and healthy amounts of gun play for an excellent HK splurge. Not necessarily the post-meditated state on violence that Hard-Boiled unabashedly hurls you into wondering who is on which side, however. Through all the environmental carnage, it's hard to discern who is shooting and what exactly is getting lit up with slugs. The Killer is much more distinguishable as an action/thriller though not without heavy doses of detective narcissism and a terrible score to topside the action with primordial jazz.

Acting as ringer for the entire project, The Killer only becomes the legend that it is due to the raw, shocking nature of the ending and how utterly hopeless you feel after the credits roll. Brought to a simmer, this tale of brotherly obsession and acceptance of dreary philosophies on the wielder of guns, killers and cops, crawls to a conclusion that will no doubt burrow in your mind as you can't help but feel sick over the fates of all three characters. Thinking I had the course of predictability down to a "T", what a fool I was and left bewildered staring at the screen with a guttural hankering for affection and co-dependency. Ironically enough, The Killer has been hailed as Woo's "magnum opus" but with great evidence to back upon these claims. To think of it, this might even be a near perfect film if the soundtrack was recycled and refined. Sadly so, there is not much to say about this film and the festering hatred that is spawned by the tragic finale. All thoughts and impressions can all be retraced back to the solemn, iconic scene of Ah-jong letting a cigarette slowly burn out; pure visual existentialism. That and the heroic bloodshed nature of idolizing the power of weaponry as phallic extensions of machismo. As I stated, a perfect companion piece to Hard-Boiled for any particularly sleazy night.

HARD TARGET WORKPRINT

John Woo (1993)

On the fringes of modern consumerism concerning film & media lies something known as a workprint. Essentially, a workprint is a beta or prototype (if you will) of a film. Normally, the workprint is used for digital editing and test audiences to determine if and what should be cut from the motion picture. In 1993, John Woo began production on his first Hollywood film starring Jean Claude Van Damme called Hard Target. This film was yet another rehash of The Most Dangerous Game, this time addition came before a dread-locked Ice T rocked the story (Surviving the Game), which we are all heartbroken about the decision to exclude a Rastafarian Van Damme. A screening of this film debuted for a single audience which featured an extra 20 minutes that was cut off of the theatrical and DVD release. Today, the workprint is near impossible to find except via torrents and bootlegs. The differences are many and small, some ranging from large to hardly noticeable. The most prominent features are a love scene and extreme gun play. Many more bullets are fired and the death toll is greater. The vintage feel of a Woo film is restored and it showcases many wounds including a man getting shot 29 times with an upside down Beretta.

Various angles and little scenes were clipped but I read that the real fear came from a NC-17 rating which I couldn't see happening, although the ear removal scene (ode to Tarantino) might have pissed some people off. Studio exec's told Woo that he cannot kill seven henchmen in one scene. Such censorship obviously led to a lackluster vision in which the director probably regrets not challenging the system at that time. The source copy of this has a time stamp which tends to bother me until I forget it's there and the quality is almost horrid. Although I'd rather absorb the director's vision of a hyper-violent Cajun vigilante so I much prefer the workprint. Now onto the actual film - Hard Target is an American Hong Kong action film. While Woo makes poetry with absurd violence, Hard Target is one of his lesser works but it still stands strong. Several scenes kill the stern visage set on by Van Damme's face such as the infamous snake punch scene in which he knocks a snake out cold with a swift fist in the kisser. Hard Target features some very enjoyable scenes of extreme disregard towards shop windows and the human life. Led by Lance Henriksen and Imhotep, the villains create a daunting atmosphere led on by the stark fear in their victims eyes. Exploiting veterans has been going on since the dawn of Vietnam and it is just as sad to see scum like these torture these people. I'd like to see an alternate reality of this film in which Henriksen employs a lonely John Rambo to be his prey. Oh how sweet the suffering would be.

THE ODD ONE DIES
THE ODD ONE DIES

Johnnie To (1997)

For my money, the strongest work to come out of Milkyway Image, if not Hong Kong cinema as a whole, was the initial burst of nigh-forgotten classics released before the company's break-out hit Running Out of Time in 1999. Among these were a trio of films "directed by Patrick Yau" (Expect of the Unexpected, The Longest Nite, and The Odd One Dies) which have since been proven to be almost solely the work of Milkyway head honchos Johnnie To and Wai Ka-Fai. And while these fellas have provided us with some very consistent, effortlessly cool cinema over the years, none of it compares to the liberated burst of fuck-all experimentation that sparked it all.

So from what I understand, Patrick Yau was an assistant director to Johnnie To, and To either decided to cut the kid a break and Yau wasn't able to pull his weight, or to direct a few flicks for him to get him on the path to career, or something, but the whole house of cards came tumbling down about the time Expect the Unexpected came out and was nominated for some HK Film awards. At this point, To and Wai owned up to the fact they directed all but about three scenes of the film, and whether any of this has anything to do with these films sliding into obscurity I don't know (more likely than not it's the blink-and-you've missed it accelerated culture of HK than anything else), but if you can hunt down copies of any of these flicks (also Wai Ka-Fai's absurdly inventive Too Many Ways To Be No. 1 and To's heroic bloodshed send-up A Hero Never Dies), you'll be duly rewarded.

Of all the above-mentioned films, The Odd One Dies is in many ways the strangest of the bunch, a surprisingly tender inversion of the familiar tropes of Wong Kar-wai's mid-nineties work that manages to both stand on its own as a winning alternate reality romantic comedy for fucked up weirdos and in a lot of ways comments on exactly what WKW's flicks are lacking. As a formative filmgoer, Wong Kar-wai was among the first non-exploitation directors to really grab me. The lyricism of Chungking Express' lonely urbanites and the unbridled cool of Fallen Angels, with Chris Doyle's everything-but-the-kitchen-sink camera ejaculation, spoke directly to a teenager for whom Godard was not yet a four-letter word. As time has dragged on, I can still appreciate Wong's work, but mostly on technical or nostalgic terms. There is a certain shallow center to all of the hip posturing, cool tunes, and picture-perfect casting (I mean, are we really supposed to believe that Leon Lai's existential hitman in Fallen Angels wouldn't drop everything to run away with Michelle Reis? And that she would pine for THAT guy? Look at her! What does she have to be all sad and lonely about? She's the fucking hottest babe of all fucking time) that doesn't quite hit the spot like it once did. Perhaps it has something to do with the aging process? As a teen I wanted my adult life to consist of blurry montages with a catchy pop soundtrack, a revolving cast of angsty babes secretly cleaning my apartment, excellent clothes and perfect hair and endearing monologues to myself about how my bar of soap is sad and shit. The reality of life has proven to be anything but a live-action WKW flick, though. Body fat, bad haircuts galore, some attractive women, granted, but not sadly pining for me, just beating me with umbrellas and bemoaning my fashion blunders. When I try to look off into the distance and smoke a cigarette and smoke gets in my eyes and instead of looking like some existential superhero for the Pitchfork Media set I'm just a smelly-fingered advertisement for quitting, while my interior monologues aren't quirky and metaphor-laden but pathetic and disturbing.

Fortunately, Johnnie To and Wai Ka-Fai took it upon themselves to make what is essentially a Wong Kar-Wai film for strange schlubs like us. Instead of populating The Odd One Dies with model-types bemoaning their inability to feel emotions or get over one unattainable hottie for another one, The Odd One Dies is the story of two imperfect, inherently flawed individuals who are briefly brought together, and within the rough edges of the story, some truly uplifting and real emotions are mined. Takeshi Kaneshiro (one of the stars of Chungking Express and Fallen Angels) is cast as a wannabe gangster who, wanting to prove himself after a humiliating beating and in need of cash, agrees to kill a Thai man for some actual gangsters in what is obviously a suicide mission. After a card game in which his bad fortunes are temporarily reversed (a great scene showcasing the understated, off-centre black humor of the film), he is flush with cash and decides to contract out the killing to someone else. That someone else happens to be a fresh out-of-jail, thoroughly pitiful Carman Lee, who agrees to the suicide mission either for the money and a chance to escape her past or because she is genuinely suicidal. The antithesis of the runway model WKW heroine, an early scene reminiscent of a similar section of Chungking Express, also featuring Kaneshiro, has him lovingly removing and washing her socks as she sleeps (much as he removes Brigitte Lin's shoes in that film) in a hotel bed opposite his, but undercuts the romance of the situation with the fact he does so because her feet fucking REEK. Furthermore, Lee's character knows REAL tragedy- she wasn't simply rejected by some pin-up pop idol taking a celluloid vacation, but tricked into killing her own cousin as a teenager by a conniving husband who hardly remembers her. As the todd pair share hotel rooms and plan the killing, the only expected element is that they are brought together romantically, though where it goes from there is completely unpredictable.

Further ribbing of Wong's flicks comes when Lee tries to give herself a hip, short haircut a la Faye Wong in Chungking Express and with Kaneshiro's help manages to shore her long locks into a horrifying mullet. When he respectfully acquiesces to a similar mane butchering, we know we are not in quite the same suave universe as Wong's flicks, but one strikingly similar to our own. Kaneshiro does a magnificent job of playing a conflicted, thoroughly confused young slacker, in some ways a reflection of his endearing mute slapstick performance in Fallen Angels (the sole pathos earned in that film comes via his mugging silent comedy, though it is almost robbed by going full-tilt sentimental towards the end), but instead of making the character saccharine sweet to the point of a toothache, in this flick he is merely severely stupid and in over his head, but given to moments of betraying his tough guy posturing with moments of compassion, typically in the form of beating those who dare offend the put-upon Carman Lee. One last mention of Wong Kar-Wai to be made before getting into what really makes this film an unheralded classic - Raymond Wong's synth-tango score is in some ways reminiscent of the similar musical direction of WKW's Days of Being Wild, but the main theme is far more infectious, and the casiotone kitschiness make it all the more shaggy dog endearing.

What really sends The Odd One Dies into another level altogether is how deftly it plays with our expectations. There is a scene where Lee manages to confront her scumbag scam artist husband, and with his snide dismissal, pulls out a gun and shoots him. The emotion rings true, but doesn't seem to fit the altogether more reality-based pull of the script. Then she snaps out of it and we realize it was but a daydream and, as in real life, she is forced to confront the situation without catharsis. One blackly comic recurring gag involved a gangster who, first by Kaneshiro, then Lee, is shorn of his fingers. Both scenes involve his henchman running like madmen looking for ice, while we the audience are blown away by the fact that this movie's idea of side-splitting humor is a dude getting his fingers lopped off. YES! But at a certain point, this character, after catching Kaneshiro and deigning to cut off his hand, looks like he will again be shorn his re-attached digits and the most unexpected thing of all happens. Forgiveness. This scene of redemption all but makes the film, subverting both the expected outcome and the comedic thrust of the finger-loppings by taking it into unexpectedly touching territory (mirroring an earlier scene in which a snobbish hotel clerk reveals himself to be far less one-note than anticipated). As the film nears its end, things are wrapped up in a similarly low-key and road-less-travelled manner. From the word go, To and Wai (er, Patrick Yau), prove themselves to be sly genre revisionists of the finest caliber. While the recent work of Milkyway is continually inventive, classy, and often, like this film, the ultimate rarity- meta without devolving into film-geek condescension or mere homage - I can't help but wish they could still work in the occasional lower-budgeted, understated piece like The Odd One Dies or Expect the Unexpected. Genre cinema as a whole would benefit from more of this kind of expert capsizing of conventions.

Jon Avnet* (2007) 88 Minutes is a new crime thriller starring Al Pacino. While it is a below average thriller with predictable twists, this is not the topic of the article. Al Pacino, since starring in the over-rated Scarface, has been living in Tony Montana's shadow for far too long. The film opens up with a vulgar hip-hop song, to either show the forensic psychiatrist's party side, or perhaps a subliminal ode to Pacino's glory days. When Scarface first debuted, this film wasn't associated with airbrushed tall tee's and rap songs. Scarface was about a brutal crime syndicate ran by a sadistic cokehead. De Palma's film started as one thing, then completely changed directions. It's impossible to watch a Pacino film and not think of Scarface. Urban youth feel inspired by the damndest things. Later in 88 Minutes, Bubba Sparxxx's song "Mrs. New Booty" plays loud and noticeable, even when it doesn't tie in with the film in the slightest. Instead of promoting his crime films as a gritty portrait of city decay, he caters to these urban ideals that have been imprinted on his career. After all, if he didn't suck up to the young blacks, he wouldn't have gotten much of anywhere nowadays. Other than Pacino's role in the film, this film also borrows heavily from other films in the genre. Many serial killer films use the same "You will die in ____" See also; The entire SAW series. The capital punishment perspective is also derived from the film The Life of David Gale. One thing I picked up while viewing this film, is the the casting. 88 Minutes is a film marketed towards the urban audience, with it's voracious use of rap in the soundtrack and it's key role, it does deliver, but I noticed something very strange. In all of it's run time, I recall only 1 black person. This character was so minor, I don't even recall him saying a single word. Perhaps some form of detachment or hidden racism is at play. This film seems to be anti-black. The pitch black poster was soon ditched and a new poster with Al Pacino surrounded by clocks and fire were distributed. The film is just a collage of crazy white people, screaming and framing each other. 88 Minutes is a mess of racial expectations intended to destroy "white" America. When things get too blurred, what tactic does the film incorporate? Throw a speeding fire truck driving into a crowd to spice the film up with action. Overall, the entire feel of the film feels too forced and presents itself as extremely generic, but it does reward you with a semi-watchable film. 88 Minutes might give Pacino the chance he needs in order to revive his film career into at least something visually edible. He just needs to learn how to move on, and to realize that he is getting old. Need I mention that the film revolving around a runtime of 88 Minutes is 108 minutes?

Jon Avnet* (2008) Two senile detectives track a deranged serial killer thought to be a cop. Deranged meaning a plain old serial killer. They always use drastic words to over accentuate the viciousness of a murderer. What makes this film stand out from the average thriller is that the killer only targets sinners or wastes of life. In truth, this is nowhere near as original as the producers would have liked this to be. Those producers being the ones who produced The Wicker Man remake. De Niro and Pacino, both hailed as mobster hall-of-famers, headline a film that focuses more on the fact that the "legendary duo" are back together for the first time since Heat, rather than fleshing out the characters and traits. Many attempts are made to make these men more like rabid animals but the results are laughable at best. De Niro is seen fucking a female co-worker who likes to be abused and dominated. The final product is old, sweaty, and wrinkly. The city of New York is given a seedy approach on cinema. While some parts of the city wouldn't be an exaggeration to film this way, bewitching the settings is deemed a must by director Jon Avnet. Steam ascends from manholes in order to distinguish a mood but the film has already sacrificed too much plot to wow the crowd with pretty "hood" streets. Avnet took a stab at creating a "street lamp noir" with the many dark alley scenes with hoodlums aimlessly wandering. Blame the films disappointing reception and product on the youth that are fanatically obsessed with Scarface. It's their devoted fan base to an average crime film that persuaded Hollywood to make the casting decision of including 50 Cent (Curtis Jackson) siding Al Pacino to sell more tickets. The films climax and ill twist features a surprising homosexual suggestion. When the audience discovers Pacino was the killer (Called it upon viewing the trailer) and his motive lacked passion or rage, I heard moans and groans. Or maybe it was just my mind overreacting to my own letdown. His M.O. was that Turk (De Niro) disappointed Rooster (Pacino) by planting a gun on a criminal. After all, Turk was his male idol and he holstered a deep love for him. Tony Montana had a deep love for the aging De Niro, how sweet. When Righteous Kill doesn't patronize you with its lifeless ending or "filler" scenes of personal dysfunctions to boost the darkness of the characters, It can be somewhat-enjoyable. Watching Robert De Niro waddle everywhere scowling at everyone reminiscent to March of the Penguins, however is not. Admission price is not for the film as a whole but for the scene you all wait for. 50 Cent's amazing death. Watching Mr. Jackson take a slug to the back of the head only to rag doll out a window is worth $8.50.

IRON MAN

Jon Favreau* (2008)

Every comic book film has a serious flaw. This is a common fact amongst every adaptation of comic to film. The main problem lies within the source material focusing on being outlandish and bringing us into a fantastical world of a crime free zone and a patriot fighting for our cause, even if he is doing so being politically blind. Iron Man is a different kind of film. Whether praising his dad for helping kill Nazi's or womanizing reporters for Vanity Fair, Tony Stark is a bachelor of every sense of the word; Rich, powerful, and sex-crazed. After being taken hostage by a rebel faction in the middle-east content on being a high power, Stark decides to build a suit capable of not only ultimate destruction, but ultimate crime fighting. Not so much crime fighting, but more of a global reach. When i saw that Stark could not live without a arch-reactor built into his chest, I felt sickened. I appreciated his life so much more than i have many characters. This moment signified that monogamy could be his only choice. He was officially a mutant. For being a PG-13 film, It had some incredible violence such as Terrorism, operations, weird abstract holes in chests, and tubes sickeningly being removed from noses. Iron Man fixes the key problem by casting the perfect character and fitting the mold. It lives up to the hype and promises every little detail to fit the comic. In X-Men, we all had problems with the characters, whether it be Cyclops's sissy actor or Wolverine's lack of sever facial hair or signature costume. In Iron Man, we all agree Stark is a douche bag. In fact, we revel in the fact that he is an asshole. This allows for a metamorphosis of the soul. He realizes his flaws and evolves into an amazing creature with a hilarious personality. Iron Man's themes are mainly political, stretching from scenes declaring the importance of weapons just like this years Rambo did. In fact, what is peace without war? As Stark's father apparently said, He who is peaceful is the one with the bigger stick. All is true in the sadistic games of war. Iron Man did a much better job of political propaganda than Captain America did. All i can remember Captain "Sam" doing was rescuing children. Their representation of a "middle-easterner" was incredible; incredibly false. I love how these "American" blockbusters bill the "Taliban" as being dirty fools with beards who do not know how to fire a gun. Every Arabian fool in this film just sprayed bullets everywhere and were depicted as cowards without loyalty. This even goes against their way of life. Surprisingly, these "dirty sand mongrel" manage to salvage most of his prototype in an attempt to rebuild it. The action in the film is incredible and so is the product placement. Due to the Burger King deal with kids toys, after Stark is freed from captivity due to his amazing prototype suit, he wants nothing more than the symbolization of America; fast food. After dealing with a press conference in which he gobbles down delicious "AMERICAN" cheese-burgers (Because there is no other), he reveals he no longer wants to be an angel of death. If you are one of two things: A) Comic Book fan B) Super Hero fan If you agreed to one of more of these choices, you will absolutely love this movie. There is a lot of character development so don't expect too much of an epic final battle, but due to realist issues in the film, It cannot exceed more than his power limit could. Whether Robert Downey Jr. is being a cokehead in his free time or playing some Noir-ish detective, he will always be Iron Man. This role was made for him; built for him. Holy shit, I cannot wait for a sequel. Fanboys, Beware. Stay after the credits for a comic surprise.

THE DESCENT: PART 2

Jon Harris (2009)

The Descent was the first of its kind; a near perfect feminist horror film that didn't come off as hokey or burdening to the male race. In a property spoiling turn, director Neil Marshall thought he'd earn a slimy wad of cash by overseeing and allowing the production of a direct sequel aptly titled "Part 2." The continuation finds Sarah returning to the surface covered in blood and negating all layers of interpretation left open by the original's incredible ending. If there is one thing The Descent is known for, it's "women spelunking." The Descent: Part 2 brings nothing but tired tricks and storybook devices to this morbidly banal sequel which features a cast of both genders, diluted Negro-centric crawlers, and an ending that will have you ripping your hair out in tufts and cursing the day that "inbred redneck" films were ever created. As mentioned previously, Sarah is out of the caverns that were to be named after her by the affair-having whore Asiatic friend, Juno, and is recovering peacefully and ignorantly in a hospital bed. The doctors claim she has no recollection of the past 2 days and this pampers the plot and character enough to allow her stupid ass to descend into hell yet again to find out the truth of what happened in the first subterranean blood bath. Much like the fetid S. Darko, The Descent: Part 2 takes much, if not everything, that made the film and reincorporates the same angles, techniques, and scenes. The Descent: Part 2 still uses collapsing crawlspaces, night vision bogeymen, and women going berserk to ill effect and demonstrates the law of every terrible sequel e.g. rotating lead character kills as seen in effect in most of the Nightmare on Elm Street follow ups. Neil Marshall's involvement in the film was purely to oversee the production to ensure a claustrophobic experience in grueling terror. I'm sure his intention was solely for the benefit of growth but this film only demonstrates one thing about caverns and that is that most are created with prop boulders and it doesn't exactly benefit that Jon Harris' entire career is that of editing quality films and not directing them. To fit the pieces together in a visually digestible way might be a form of art but Mr. Harris has yet to learn how to create the pieces for completion. My strong opinion can be argued with but I feel, as I'm sure most do, that this sequel is entirely unnecessary and only taints the unknown terror of the original. The introduction of a hybrid human-like beast that hunts with a skillful variety of tactics including scouting and pack assault was a much needed fixture on the tag of horror that has been largely dominated with names, faces, and motives. These creatures started out with a glossy blood/mud luster in the original film then switched to grotesque make-up reconditioning and an entirely different makeover treatment in the second. Without the returning characters or use of archive footage this film would be utterly nameless and just as equally disappointing. After the males had been twiddled away to recreate the original's feminist spirit, the select group of females featured in The Descent: Part 2 begin to die in terrible, horrible fashions. Even with all the tomato soup butcherings, these girls shouldn't be frightened of these beastly crawlers. No, they should have turned hide and retreated from the real villain at large - creative control. It's high time for an uprising against the tyranny of continuation. As Lizzy Caplan said in the incredible comedy Hot Tub Time Machine, "embrace the chaos," we should never more accept the standard retail price for something so less than chaotic. The Descent: Part 2 isn't the affable sequel to a classic of raw horror that you were expecting. I shouldn't even be writing about this film as near everyone's opinion should strongly lean towards mine. It's a given that this film is nothing to be respectful of. I don't even respect myself anymore having since watched it.

THE DESCENT: PART 2

HAROLD /& KUMAR ESCAPE FROM GUANTÁNAMO BAY

Jon Hurwitz, Hayden Schlossberg* (2008)

Disquieting racism is in every film you see now-a-days. Whether they are presenting the ignorance in a harmful light or not is the true argument. The first Harold & Kumar film focused on the drug-life rather than anything else. The film was boring with only a few scenes that could be seen as comedy, Harold & Kumar 2 took everything wrong with the first film, revamped it, and made a fucking hilarious film that doesn't argue semantics. On a flight to Amsterdam, Harold & Kumar get mistaken for terrorists due to the color of their skin and wind up in Guantánamo Bay awaiting their first "cockmeat sandwich" They escape from the prison and are on their way to Texas to try to get help from politicians. Also, Neil Patrick Harris. If Harold & Kumar 2 did one thing right, it would be the clever marketing of the iconic Patrick Harris. The fact that so many idols of B-films get a mascot job of sorts, or even headliners for more shitty films, such as Casper Van Dien from Starship Troopers or Bruce Campbell from Evil Dead. The teaser poster showing Neil on a unicorn with the words "What would NPH Do?" is only a taste of the ridiculous antics to come. The film is a satire of child actors, fashion trends, and racial stereotypes. These are explained briefly in scenes that are the highlights of the movie. One scene involves a Department of Homeland Security agent trying to get questions out of a Negro commuter. He decides that the only way to get him to talk, would be to open a can of Grape Soda and pour it out. This Negro orthodontist is horrified by the white man's ignorance and the only thing that can be heard is the neighbors screaming "That's racist!" (Jew's never stray far from their coins) A similar scene is also present, involving 2 Jew-clowns in an interrogation room. You might remember Goldstein from the first film. Well, this time his role is small and the majority of his screen time you see him collecting gold coins. Roger Bart plays the Jewish intellectual who constantly downplays the head agent's intelligence and opposes him. He's the only one that can see that these two boys are innocent. President George W. Bush even makes an appearance in the film that leads to huge laughs as he calls his father and tells him "Fuck you!" This scene alone grants it a film that embraces its political incorrectness and displays scenes of southern inbreds, KKK members, and jokes against all races. I personally promise you this is a vast improvement over the sloth-comedy that was present in the original. Harold & Kumar Escape from Guantánamo Bay is like Euro-Trip, except it doesn't suck. Stick around after the credits.

LAST CHANTS FOR A SLOW DANCE

Jon Jošt (1977)

Out of all the filmmakers that have been associated with the hermetic aesthetic autism of so-called 'Structural film,' Jon Jošt (Angel City, The Bed You Sleep In), who to his credit does not actually associate himself with the movement (in an interview with Jonathan Rosenbaum, he stated candidly regarding Structural film, "I've hardly seen any. What little I've seen strikes me as technical exercises, so I end up not being too interested—or I'm interested only if there's some technical thing I can learn from it"), is probably the only one who has directed cinematic works that would appeal to more people than just actual Structural filmmakers and certain pedantic film theorists that consider Stan Brakhage a right-wing 'reactionary.' A self-taught auteur and born rebel who had to temporarily put his filmmaking career on hold in 1965 after only directing a couple shorts because he had to serve over 2 years in prison at the behest of U.S. authorities for adamantly refusing to cooperate with the Selective Service System by burning up his draft card (ironically, the filmmaker was a military brat), Jošt is a rare true lone wolf of cinema who is not part of any avant-garde movement or the mainstream, though, unlike a lot of his underground contemporaries, he actually desired be part of the latter. Indeed, as his distinctly gritty and visceral (anti)road movie Last Chants for a Slow Dance (1977) vividly demonstrates, Jošt's most accessible works also tend to be his greatest, which is a sentiment that top American film critic Jonathan Rosenbaum also seems to share as reflected in his book Film: The Front Line 1983 (1983) where he wrote, "At once the easiest and most disturbing of Jošt's features, and to my mind the best, LAST CHANTS conceivably gets closer to the mentality of the alienated and seemingly motiveless killer than either Mailer or Capote." A delectably disturbing and refreshingly confrontational work that was written, directed, shot, and edited by Jošt on a mere budget of $3,000, this truly radical road movie, which was notably the auteur's first excursion in narrative feature filmmaking, easily comes closer than any other cinematic work that I have ever seen in terms of depicting the innately nihilistic life of an authentic everyday psychopath. Indeed, while people typically think of them as lawyers, bankers, CEOs, Hollywood producers, and genocidal dictators, the average psychopath is actually an ill-restrained, irresponsible, sexually impulsive, and parasitic emotional void and perennial lowlife loser that essentially drifts through life with no real long-term plans and typically relies on the generosity of the weak and/or inordinately empathetic to survive, but of course Hollywood would never dare to make a film about such a hopelessly humdrum individual and instead makes quasi-tributes to such unsavory individual like Martin Scorsese did with Zionist swindler Jordan Belfort via his keenly kosher big budget Bacchanalian celluloid Shylock bugger The Wolf of Wall Street (2013). Inspired by the loser life of American killer Gary Gilmore

(who was executed the same year the film was released and who was formally diagnosed by a prison psychiatrist as suffering from antisocial personality disorder with intermittent psychotic decompensation) and the sort of degenerate hardened criminals that Jošt met during his prison sentence for draft-dodging, the auteur notably described his objective with the film as follows to Rosenbaum, "I tried to make an honest picture of a small segment of American society." Of course, there is no glamour in Jošt's America.

A sort of Wrangler Jeans 'realist fever dream' that would probably make even the driest of feminist cunts wet due to its depiction of what misandristic she-bitches regularly refer to as "toxic masculinity," Last Chants for a Slow Dance is chilling in a manner comparable to when you are having an awkward conversation with a fellow that you know has actually murdered or raped someone. To a European, sheltered bourgeois pansy, or NYC Jewish intellectual who has nil experience with or understanding of America's white working-class, Jošt's film might be misinterpreted as a portrait of the typical Montana neo-cowboy 'everyman' who thinks that John Wayne is the greatest American who has ever lived and who enjoys watching the pseudo-hillbillies on Duck Dynasty, but it is really a candid depiction of a lumpenprole psychopath who lets his family suffer while driving aimlessly in his truck and living life more or less off the grid. In terms of counterculture road movies, Jošt's film makes Monte Hellman's existentialist cult classic Two-Lane Blacktop (1971) seem like the prototype for the dreaded The Fast and the Furious (2001) franchise by comparison. Indeed, a sort of more eccentric yet calm celluloid cousin to Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977) as a work that depicts America and its people and landscapes in a way that is usually more typical of European arthouse filmmakers, Last Chants for a Slow Dance features an outlaw man in an outlaw land where sex, death, and alcohol are the only available ingredients for making life worth living, especially if you're an emotionally, spiritually, and economically bankrupt loser who will do anything to avoid confronting the reality of your dead-end (non)existence. Featuring an original dark and dejecting yet sometimes lyrically ironical country-western soundtrack composed by Jošt that seems like something Ed Gein might have basked in while suffering a melancholic episode while confronting the loss of his beloved mommy, the film is not only the most organic of existentialist road movies, but also a completely stripped down modernist western where the cowboys has a truck instead of a horse and just kills to kill in a most cowardly and inexplicable way that reminds the viewer that there is not much left of the great wild American frontier, as all the injuns have been defeated and the only real rebels left are pacifistic pansy hippies who take pride in living off the government and banging the girlfriend of some sorry sap who is overseas in some nightmarish third world country fighting for an America that hardly has his interests in mind. The first film in Jošt's 'Tom Blair Trilogy' preceding Sure Fire (1990) and The Bed You Sleep In (1993), Last Chants for a Slow Dance features the hidden America that makes Hollywood producers question whether or not they should permanently relocate to Israel.

After opening with a black screen with the film's title flashing across the middle of the frame, Last Chants for a Slow Dance dissolves to footage of scorching Montana asphalt juxtaposed with a man saying, "We're on the road again," thus making the viewer think that Willie Nelson will unfortunately soon start singing, but nothing of the sort happens, as the viewer is soon subjected to the incessant self-pitying ravings of the disturbingly loony yet sometimes crudely charismatic lead character. The man talking off-screen is perennially unemployed blond antihero Tom Bates (drama teacher Tom Blair) and he is incessantly running his mouth off to a dirty young longhaired hippie hitchhiker who he complains to, "No, I never did think about where I was going. I can hardly remember where I've been. Shit, it's like life's too complicated, you know?" Without the hitchhiker even asking him a single question, Tom more or less tells him the abridged version of his pathetic life-story, including how he was regularly whipped by his parents as a child and how he remembers it "really good." Ostensibly on the road to find a job, working-class antihero Tom oftentimes ran away from home as a kid and now he is a deadbeat dad and less than loyal husband who has no problem admitting, "I've always been that way I guess, like...too much, too much inside my head, you know...and some of it I just had to get out, you know...just go off and drive and drink beers and get laid, you know." Obviously, Tom's ceaseless driving and traveling is an ultimately futile way for him to both physically and emotionally escape from personal responsibility and the patently pathetic nature of his life in general, yet somehow he has not realized that he is really trapped and has nowhere to go.

Despite having two young sons, Tom has no problem admitting to the hitchhiker, "I never wanted any kids, I never did, I never wanted any kids. And I got two of them, two of them. For not wanting any, that's a whole lot," hence why he is never home. Tom has been driving around for two months while pretending to look for work, yet he has the gall to say regarding his wife, "Of course Darlene is on my back, fucking bitch." It is only when Tom begins speaking about his favorite subject, "pussy," that he begins to tone down his grating self-pitying rants. Despite having a reasonably attractive wife that has sired two healthy sons, Tom still seems to think he is a young bachelor and tells the hippie hitchhiker, "Pussy, I can smell it, I can smell it a mile away. If I was blind I could smell it a mile away, I can smell it see. Smell that? There's some pussy out there, you smell that? Gimme pussy! Fuck I'm horny, there's some pussy around." When Tom asks the hippie, "Hey, you got pussy waiting for you?" and he somewhat meekly replies, "I got a girl. I don't think of her like that," the mentally perturbed protagonist begins acting irrationally agitated and attempts to accuse his passenger of being a queer, stating, "Hey sunshine, all girls are pussy. You got me?" and asking him, "You one of them god damn funnies? That's it, you're one of them...what do you call them?" When the hippie complains regarding rural Montana, "everything is burnt up" and "...a lot of people will be in trouble if they don't get some rain," Tom gets even more ticked off and bitches, "What's that got to do with me? [...] I don't see that shit, I don't load that shit. There's nothing there. There is nothing out there." Naturally, when the hippie responds to Tom's prideful and hostile ignorance by remarking, "You'd have to be blind not to notice that," the protagonist decides that the hitchhiker is an enemy and soon kicks him out of his car, but not before the young man accuses him of being crazy. Unbeknownst to the hitchhiker, he is lucky that he survived the car ride, as Tom will soon kill another man for a much pettier reason.

Naturally, after randomly showing up at the house without so much as calling once over the course of the past six weeks, Tom is forced to face the wrath of his emotionally neglected wife Darlene (Jessica St. John of John Cassavetes' Ted Allan adaptation Love Streams (1984)), who frankly states to her emotionally estranged hubby while applying make-up in the mirror, "You come home all lovey dovey trying to honey me up...and get you a piece of ass. I'm not dumb Tom. That's one thing I'm not." After Darlene complains about the fact that people look at her strange while she is at the grocery store because she has been reduced to using food stamps to get groceries since he refuses to work and properly provide for his family, Tom demonstrates his deep sense of psychopathy by refusing to accept guilt and instead angrily retorting, "Fuck. You think this is gonna help Darlene? I mean, you think this is gonna make me want to stay here and put up with all your shit? I mean, what? This is supposed to make me want to get a job...this is supposed to make me get up in the morning and make money...and what? Drive that fucking truck down in that fucking hole for Anaconda?" (apparently, Tom used to work as a miner). When Darlene tells Tom that he is "really fucked up," he somewhat humorously replies, "I know that, I admit that. But you just have to say it again and again and again," thus demonstrating that he is less perturbed by his defective mind than the fact that Darlene reminds him of the fact that he has a defective mind. Of course, Tom is not too happy when Darlene reveals that she is pregnant and then threatens him by asking him, "Am I gonna have to D-I-V-O-R-C-E you?" and then laughing in an almost sadistic fashion. Naturally, after his disharmonious conversation with Darlene, Tom decides to get back to doing what he does by best by wandering aimlessly on the open road.

After driving around aimlessly all night, Tom goes to a diner where he unwittingly exposes his morbid mind by asking a swarthy hippie slob sitting next to him if he has read a letter featured in a tabloid newspaper where a woman complains that her husband forced her to soak herself in bath water for a long time so that she would resemble a wrinkly corpse while they had sex on their honeymoon. After self-righteously proclaiming that the newspaper is "nothing but garbage," the idiotically idealistic hippie goes on a paranoid rant that somewhat intrigues Tom where he states, "It's all bullshit. You know, these rags are put out by the government just to pacify people so that they forget about their real problems." A deluded hippie bum that proudly lives off the government, the hippie espouses a sort of bullshit pseudo-back-to-nature philosophy and tells Tom, "If you just quit reading that stuff and do as the animals do, you'll be alright." Of course, for Tom, everything goes back to pussy, so he cannot help but ask the hippie about his sexual experiences with college girls. While there is no way in hell he would ever consider seeking a formal education and having to suffer listening to some bombastic beta-male liberal professor spouting off esoteric anti-reality theories about how to transform the world into a pan-sexual multicultural collectivist utopia, Tom is at least happy to hear from the hippie regarding the sexual proclivities of college girls that they are, "as willing as they get." Undoubtedly, the diner scene with the hippie emphasizes that, despite his unyielding arrogance, Tom can get along with certain strangers, so long as they are just as morally bankrupt as he is, hence why he did not get along with the young dirty bohemian at the beginning of the film who was offended by his pathological use of the word "pussy" to describe women.

With his wife denying him her naughty bits during his brief stop at home, Tom soon goes on the prowl for young pussy at a local bar and soon begins somewhat awkwardly hitting on a 22-year-old dame named Mary who he foolishly accidentally calls "Sarah" while plying her with cheap beer and shallow flattery. Notably, it seems to take all of the energy that he has for Tom to pay another person a compliment and muster up the courage to say to Mary, "I'm guess I'm trying to say...I think you're real pretty," which the young lady is absolutely delighted to hear, but of course pussy is one of the few things that the protagonist is willing to make a 'sacrifice' for. When Mary playfully remarks that he is drinking too much, Tom almost botches his chance at young gash by getting somewhat angry with her and grunting, "I don't like women telling me how to drink." Like virtually all psychopaths, Tom cannot handle any form of criticism, even if it is in the form of a silly flirtatious joke. Of course, Tom eventually seals the deal by going back to Mary's apartment and getting some pussy in a long 14-minute scene where The Tonight Show Starring Johnny Carson plays while the two characters have remarkably quiet and seemingly lackluster sex in the other room. Somewhat absurdly and inconsiderately, Tom makes the careless decision to call his wife Darlene in the same exact bedroom where he had sex with Mary not long after coitus has commenced. While Mary is lurking around the corner and listening to every single stupid thing that he says, Tom ends his phone call with his wife by calling her a, "Fucking bitch." Although Mary heard a good portion of the phone conversation, including the antihero reciting his wife's name in a nagging fashion, Tom treats his one-night-stand like a stupid fool and lies to her face by claiming that he was talking to somebody "about a job." When he finally realizes that he can no longer keep defending his stupid half-ass lie, Tom's inner-psychopath rears its ugly head and, as a man that refuses to accept any form of responsibility and culpability, he blames Mary for his extramarital affair by saying to her, "I don't remember being asked about a wife last night." In fact, Tom goes so far as to accuse Mary of being a lecherous bar whore who was looking to catch herself some cowboy cock, stating to her, "Last night you would've taken on the whole goddamn bar." Ultimately, Mary asks Tom to leave her apartment by saying "okay, bye," to which the protagonist replies, "Fucking shit...wherever you go. I don't have to listen to this bullshit [...] Hey, no hard feelings." As a psychopath that completely lacks empathy, Tom is never wrong, so it is only natural that he will inevitably up the ante in terms of his mean bastard behavior.

While Tom tells his one-night-stand "no hard feelings" after being a complete and utter asshole to her, it is clear by this point in the film that he is about ready to give up any pretense of humanity that he might have pretended to have before and begins studying the case records of various criminals, as if to compare himself with their backgrounds and to see if he has what it takes to be just like them. Indeed, Tom seems like he is admiring the funny page of a newspaper while reading the criminal profile of a 21-year-old high yellow negro named Roosevelt Green from Minter, Alabama who committed armed robbery, kidnapping, rape, and murder. Unlike the real-life people that he interacts with on a daily basis, Tom seems to feel a special kinship with these violent criminals and drifters just from reading their criminal records. In a scene where Joist seems to insinuate that it is not much of a leap for a country boy who hunts and kill animals to become a coldblooded murderer (Structural filmmaker James Benning seemed to use a similar technique in his feature Landscape Suicide (1987) in a scene where the dismembering of a deer is abstractly connected to the necrophiliac crimes of Ed Gein), a live bunny rabbit is not only depicted being clubbed to death, but also decapitated and then completely dismembered while its limbs are still moving. Immediately after the hare is hacked into pieces, Tom is depicted pulling off the road in his truck to assumedly help a somewhat overweight fellow whose car has just broken down. Upon talking to the man, Tom learns that his name is Fred Wilson and that he is also from his hometown of Butte, Montana. While Tom initially acts fairly cordial with Fred and intentionally asks him if he has children (which he does), he is merely putting up a false front as his motives are certainly less than savory.

After agreeing to take a look at Fred's broken down car, Tom goes back to his truck under the pretense of grabbing some tools so that he can grab his trusty revolver. After shooting the shit a little bit more with Fred in a extremely comfortable and relaxed way that would make one assume that they are longtime best friends, Tom randomly declares, "Well I guess it's time...it's time, as good as time as any. Fred, I got something to tell you" and then points his revolver at the poor unwitting family man, who just happened to be at the wrong place at the wrong time. As reflected in petty remarks he makes, Tom is jealous of Fred because he is a fairly successful family man who owns his gas station and whose loving wife just bought him a new car (even if it is a piece of junk that broke down on him). Even though Fred only has a couple dollars on him, Tom demands all of his money, stating with a sickening sense of self-pity, "I'll tell you why I have to have this. See...I haven't got a goddamn job or a goddamn thing, Fred. You just bought this car...and you got a goddamn gas station. See this? [points to gun] This is all I got left. Now, I ain't ever going home so it don't much matter to me." After taking his money, Tom leads Fred to the woods with his gun and deceptively attempts to calm the unfortunate gas station owner's fears by claiming that he only plans to tie him to a tree, adding, "ain't nothin' gonna happen to ya.'" Of course, Tom is lying and not long after the two men enter the depths of the woods and disappear from the frame, two gun blasts can be heard. Ultimately, Tom runs out of the woods by himself and seems somewhat excited by what he has down. In the end, Tom is depicted driving with a vacant expression on his face while occasionally picking his nose for about five minutes in a scene that potently reflects the antihero's complete and utter lack of guilt in regard to killing a man. At the very conclusion of this final sequence, a rather fitting inter-title pops over Tom reading "(Dead End)," which is a perfect summary of the character's life as a lone drifting loser of the psychopathic sort. Judging by how he executed the craven killing of Fred with such gleeful ease, the viewer can only assume that Tom has just begun his murderous reign of terror. Indeed, it seems that Tom has more than just pussy to look forward to now.

It is not very often that I watch a film and then completely forget that I had ever seen it, but that is exactly what happened to with me Last Chants for a Slow Dance, which I originally viewed about three years ago and rather enjoyed but completely forget about until rather recently after deciding to checkout Jošt's oeuvre and instantly gravitating towards wanting to watch his slow-burning psychopath road movie. Undoubtedly, upon watching the film for the second time, I genuinely felt like I was catching up with an old enemy. Personally, I think that I completely forgot about viewing the film because it felt more like a real life experience than a piece of vintage fictional celluloid art that I watched from the comfort of my living room. Indeed, the film's antihero Tom Blair reminded me a lot of an undiagnosed psychopath that I have known for most of my life who has spent a good portion of his distinctly deplorable existence figuratively and literally wandering around in an aimless fashion while destroying various lives in the process just so he can have some temporary relief from the barrenness of his truly dead-end life of perpetual (self)destruction and nihilistic excess. Indeed, if someone were to ask me to recommend a film about an 'everyday psychopath' that lacks the gross romantic glorification of such psychologically forsaken individuals that is typical of Hollywood films like The Silence of the Lambs (1991),

Cape Fear (1991), Basic Instinct (1992), and The Good Son (1993), among countless other examples, I would unequivocally name Jost's masterpiece, which the auteur hoped would be seen by more mainstream audiences as indicated by his remark to Rosenbaum, "I mean, there's no reason why LAST CHANTS FOR A SLOW DANCE shouldn't book as well as a lot of Fassbinder. It's certainly no less accessible." It is interesting that Jost mentions Fassbinder, as the only film that I can really compare to his flick to is Warum läuft Herr R. Amok (1970) aka Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?, which is also a fairly minimalistic work with long static takes about a fairly mediocre mensch who commits a shocking and completely senseless act of violence in the end after getting fed up with the banality of his life and no longer being able to ignore his deep resentment towards his family. Certainly, aside from more or less reinventing cinematic storytelling, Jost was also able to make the psychopathic mind accessible to virtually anyone with his film which, although carefully constructed and exquisitely nuanced, never resorts to asinine arcane avant-gardism. Despite the director's clear dislike for certain aspects of the American West, Jost's respect for the landscape and kind simple folk of the area also bleeds through the film in an entrancing manner that you would never find in a Hollywood movie, so it should be no surprise that the auteur once stated in relation to Last Chants for a Slow Dance and its production, "I had lived in Oregon and Montana for five years, and the rural West was very real and familiar terrain to me, a place in which I felt at home and comfortable, nevermind its many rough manners. Despite the gun racks, the macho sexism, and the overall conservatism of the West, it is generally a place where people are genuinely friendly and helpful. For shooting a no-budget film like LAST CHANTS it was ideal: ask for a bar, you got it, no questions asked, no money exchanged. Aside from Tom Blair, whom I'd met when living near Kalispell when he was the theater department of the local community college, and Jessica St. John, a type-cast hooker sort in Hollywood TV productions who I'd met in LA, the rest of the cast were locals who I gathered in the space of a week. Places, trucks, people—what little I needed fell easily in my hands for the asking. True West."

While not exactly the sort of film that one can expect the Criterion Collection to release anytime soon (though the company did include the documentary short Godard 1980 (1980) co-directed by Jost as an extra feature with their DVD/Blu-ray release of Sauve qui peut (la vie) (1980) aka Every Man for Himself), Last Chants for a Slow Dance did manage to make it into the fairly popular film reference book 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die (2003) edited by Steven Jay Schneider where film critic Adrian Martin argues regarding Jost's film, "The best index of its ambivalent sensitivity to the real world it traverses are its constant songs, simultaneously soulful and ironic tunes ("Hank Williams wrote it long ago," runs one chorus) that take us far deeper than the smarmy musical pastiches in Robert Altman's NASHVILLE (1975)." Indeed, aside from being thankfully devoid of the left-wing nihilism of Altman's epically long-winded anti-musical, Jošt's film makes John McNaughton's Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer (1990) seem like a Herschell Gordon Lewis flick due to Jošt's cultivated true grit approach to a lone psychopathic cowboy in America's 'Land of the Shining Mountains.' Ultimately, the film seems like the sort of work that the dilettantes of Dogme 95 hoped to make but mostly failed miserably at. If there is any benefit to going to prison, Last Chants for a Slow Dance certainly stands out as a notable example, as if it were not for Jošt's real-life experience with hardened lowlifes while he was in the slammer, it is dubious at best that he could have created such an intriguingly insightful cinematic work that should be made mandatory viewing for any prospective police officer or film student. Of course, the irony is that Jošt must have had an inordinately high capacity for empathy for him to understand the psyches of the less than empathetic psychopathic inmates who acted as the inspiration for the antihero of his film. One can only speculate the sort of war film that Jošt might have assembled had he not been a draft-dodger and actually fought in the Vietnam War. As Jošt's hero Jean-Luc Godard once stated regarding his great contribution to cinema, "He is not a traitor to the movies, like almost all American directors. He makes them move," and in nowhere does he move further than in his truly radically rugged road movie Last Chants for a Slow Dance.

JACK BROOKS: MONSTER SLAYER

Jon Knautz (2007)

It's been awhile since i have uncovered a flashy nostalgic trip through the finer points of cinema. Director Jon Knautz has brought celluloid life to a film worthy of legendary comic books. Everyman plumber Jack Brooks witnessed his family get murdered by a monster at a young age. Due to this event, he cannot connect with most people and finds him self with an immeasurable aggression. When an ancient creature poses his spoofy teacher (Robert Englund,) he must now face his past in order to guarantee his future. This story just screams as a mash-up of every iconic monster film or amazing 90's cartoon. Jack Brooks: Monster Slayer is the equivalent of an ultra-violent episode of the Beetleborgs except with masculinity for a weapon. This is now the definitive Super Mario Bros. movie. The film reminds me heavily of Japanese sorcery film Eko Eko Azarak: Wizard of Darkness, in which a handful of students get trapped in their school and start getting picked off by an evil force. The film works its wonders with enticing you with its fluid colors and slimy creature FX. Robert Englund is a marvel as the kooky science teacher turned tentacled abomination. Jack Brooks (Trevor Matthews) is a man who is stuck in a dead end relationship with childhood trauma; sounds like the normal blue-collar worker. It's easy to relate to his character in this spoof dark comedy. Some of the creatures are reminiscent to the creatures on Hercules or even Xena. The love for the genre is evident. The only thing that could have made this better would be a guest appearance from Maurice (Little Monsters.) If you like Mighty Max, Creepy Crawlers, or anything with slime, goo, monster vomit, and a climatic action-packed ending, this is the film for you. Jack Brooks is here to stay. Now let's just hope for a sequel or action figure line. The new Danger After Dark line-up has never looked so good. Playing at the 17th Philadelphia Film Festival www.phillyfeasts.com

DAVID ICKE: THE LIZARDS AND THE JEWS

Jon Ronson (2001)

I am a fan of reading conspiracy theories whether to be enlightened in some way or to be merely entertained. Since I do not know too much about him, I decided to watch the documentary David Icke: The Lizards and the Jews. I knew that Icke was a former professional soccer player and that he believes Reptilians are our secret leaders. After watching the documentary, I did not learn much more about his conspiracy theories. I was just further convinced that left-wing "activists" are probably the weakest people (both physically and mentally) to ever survive childbirth. For much of David Icke: The Lizards and the Jews, left-wing activists stalk Icke during his tour in Canada in hopes to shut him down from appearing publicly as they consider him "anti-Semitic." David Icke seems to be what fellow Brit Steven Morrissey would call a "charming man." After declaring himself the "son of god" on television, apparently Icke became the laughingstock of England. David Icke, however, would have the last laugh when he would later gain a larger following of individuals that believe his theories of Reptilian humanoids known as the Babylonian Brotherhood are a global elite that happen to control everything we hear and see. Apparently, many of these reptilians also happen to be Jewish thus resulting in a negative backlash from Jewish groups like the slimy ADL and annoying turds like the ARA. What these people do not realize is that people like David Icke help to discredit "anti-Semitic conspiracies" by talking about people being reptilians. Apparently, the reptilians have a resemblance to the anti-Jew propaganda that used to be so prominent in Eastern Europe. Maybe it's the nose? Despite not really believing in Icke's message, I do have respect for what he is doing. David Icke seems to really believe in something and it has given his life some meaning since his soccer career was cut short. Plus despite their sci-fi elements, Icke's conspiracy theories are most likely more credible than any of Michael Moore's documentaries. The annoying and loudmouthed Texan Alex Jones seems to have some beef with David Icke as the documentary reveals. Jones referred to David Icke as a 'turd in a punch bowl.' According to Alex Jones, the Arabs own Hollywood. I am assuming that Mr. Jones only watches DVDs of himself. Or maybe his Zionist wife told him about how these evil terrorist Arabs run Hollywood? It is believed that a lot of Alex Jones' anger comes from the fact that he has found it nearly impossible to get Israeli citizenship as he would complain about it in his radio show. Having a Kosher wife and children still makes it hard for a goy to get citizenship. Only the chosen amongst god's chosen have that privilege.

The climax of David Icke: The Lizards and the Jews occurs when a group of anti-anti-Semites decide they are going to throw a pie at Icke when he speaks. Talk about rebellious and subversive, these soldiers of the rainbow really know how to make progress with being progressive. Unfortunately, the limp wristed fellow that throws the pie misses and ruins a bunch of innocent children's books. They also end up making asses of themselves by dressing up in Lizard suits and yelling at Icke that he is "Anti-Semitic." After their failed mission, the group of goodhearted anti-fascists brag about their attack. They also claimed to have seen real-life Nazis with swastika and SS bolt tattoos. Surprisingly, no Neo-Nazis or skinheads are seen in the documentary footage as the activists claim to have seen. One of the anti-fascists, who also happens to be one of those stereotypical shaved head bull dyke lesbians, also states that most of David Icke's fans seem to be "rich white people." I thought according to progressive types, stereotyping is bad? After watching David Icke: The Lizards and the Jews, I may read one of Icke's books for the hell of it. Icke may not be the son of God, but he seems to piss off anti-fascists just as much as Jesus. The journalist who follows David Icke in the documentary, Jon Ronson, also seems to grow to like Icke as the documentary progresses. What's not to like about a father who plays soccer with his son and tells his kids that evil reptile humanoids rule the earth?

ILLUSIONS OF A LADY
ILLUSIONS OF A LADY

Jonas Middleton (1974)

While best known today for his truly depraved and audaciously anti-erotic cult horror arthouse porn masterpiece Through the Looking Glass (1976), Georgia-born auteur and all-around gentleman Jonas Middleton had previously directed two adult films which long ago fell into obscurity. Luckily, I was recently able to track down a rather scratched print of the once-mysterious filmmaker's second film Illusions of a Lady (1974), which is a virtual prototype for Through the Looking Glass and features the sort of hallucinatory hardcore 'horror' that Middleton is revered for, albeit in a more rudimentary, minimalistic, archaic, and gritty form. The sadistically salacious and unwaveringly cynical celluloid story of a malicious yet cultivated megalomaniac lady psychiatrist with serious daddy issues who gets off to fucking with her patients' minds by coercing them into fucking other patients in rather bizarre and even hateful ways under the false pretense of providing them with 'therapy' in an exceedingly loose plot that vaguely resembles Jacques Scandolari's Beyond Love and Evil (1971), Illusions of a Lady is a patently perverse psychodrama of the brutal blue movie sort that reminds one how genuinely cruel and artfully grating pornography can be in the 'right' hands. Indeed, as auteur Middleton recently revealed in a podcast interview, he originally wanted to be a serious filmmaker and never had any interest in becoming a pornographer, but was offered the money by some young hotshot investor types at his church who wanted to make a pretty profit, so naturally the popularity of porn chic was the answer. Indeed, somewhat unbelievably funded by capitalist-minded Christian friends at the director's elite Christian church, Illusions of a Lady would prove to be the second yet ultimately penultimate avant-garde porn work by Middleton as the auteur did some soul-searching after being charged with five felony charges of obscenity and realized he was taking an unrighteous path and quit though he had much monetary and artistic success, especially with his magnum opus Through the Looking Glass. Purportedly co-written with Middleton's then-girlfriend Christa Helm (Legacy of Satan, Let's Go for Broke), who was mysteriously murdered in 1977 under dubious (and unsolved) circumstances (some have speculated that she was killed by the same person warped pizza delivery guy that killed Sal Mineo), as an R-rated script that would eventually (de)evolve into an aesthetically ferocious fuck flick that would set the stage for Through the Looking Glass, Illusions of a Lady is nothing short of a lost classic that reminds the viewer that there was actually a time when pornography pushed more than just sexual boundaries as a vicious and venomous aberrant-garde work that has the opposite effect of Viagra.

Degenerate Dr. Miranda Woolf (Andrea True) has invited a number of her sexually perverted patients for a two-day orgy at her beachside mini-mansion (which was apparently owned in real-life by French prostitutes who 'retired' at the home) in the Hamptons in Long Island. Despite being a professional psychiatrist, Miranda seems to have a screw or two loose as she records sexually sadistic rants on a tape recorder for her father and she owns more cute and cuddly girly toy stuffed animals than a toy store. While Miranda describes the debasing get together as a form of “therapy to break inhibitions,” she has much more odious objectives like, as she states herself, “I’m going to make Howard fuck Lorie in the ass,” among various other perverse plots she has nonsensically recorded in a tape-recorder. The first thing Dr. Woolf does when her patients arrive is force them to all strip totally naked, which all the guests rather reluctantly do. From there, a patient named Howard (Roger Caine) describes his dismay about losing a race with a girl at age 11, so Miranda orders him to relive the experience with another patient named Lucy (Helen Madigan); indeed, to the dismay of his partner, he proves ‘fast finisher’ in the bedroom. Meanwhile, Howard’s wife Trala (Michelle Magazine) is forced to get involved in a carpet-munching session with an aggressive lesbo. While everyone else is involved in a twosome, an infantile Jewish mamma’s boy named Stuart (Jamie Gillis) goes drag by putting on a bra and a pair of panties and begins masturbating while licking a pair of high heels. Of course, Dr. Woolf is not too happy when she walks in on Stuart urinating in her panties. In the kitchen, Dr. Woolf prepares dinner by shoving a carrot up her cunt, while an impotent twink named Robin (Davey Jones) prepares the ‘special sauce’ by masturbating. Possibly inspired by the ‘Cake of Light’—the bitersweet eucharistic host of Aleister Crowley’s religion Thelema—wimp Robin squirts out a small batch of baby-batter into a spoon as the secret ingredient for dinner. For whatever reason, Miranda eventually gets pissed off that her patients are starting to have passionate orgies in her living room, so she tries to kill all said patients in her house of sexual horrors and whores, but they rebel and take revenge against the debauched doctor. Ultimately, all of the patients collectively rape and torture Miranda and eventually she seems to begin to enjoy it. Indeed, after being beaten bloody with a whip and raped by a lesbo with a strap-on dildo, Miranda is the one who will need a psychiatrist by the climatic conclusion of the daunting two day orgy. Of course, as the title of the film hints at, the whole entire weekend, including the rape, is merely the perverse product of the psychiatrist’s damaged mind. While Miranda did indeed invite her patients over for a two day getaway, the party has yet to begin and everything that happened, including her brutal gang rape, was merely the result of schizophrenia. When Miranda’s patients finally arrive to the party, Miranda makes her escape out of the backdoor of her house and heads to the beach while wearing nothing but a loosely fastened robe. In the end, having lost control of her mind, body, and authority, Dr. Miranda Woolf drowns herself in the bay.

In terms of pornography, Illusions of a Lady—with its limp dick porn stars who cannot completely ‘rise to the occasion,’ lesbian ‘cunning linguist’ scenes where the women do not go beyond licking the pubes of their partners, and all around monotonous and seemingly narcotic-fueled sex scenes—is nothing short of marvelously mediocre, but in terms of aberrant celluloid art, the film is most certainly a minor masterpiece of sorts. Rather unfortunately, as auteur Jonas Middleton revealed in a fairly recent interview on the Rialto Report, he has no interest in re-releasing Illusions of a Lady, stating of his second porn flick that “It’s a marginal film” and adding “it’s not the kind of message I would want to get across to people so much so yeah its not something I’m particularly proud of.” Personally, I have to respectfully disagree with Middleton as while Illusions of a Lady is not up to par with the almost demonic majesty of Through the Looking Glass, it is certainly one of the most foreboding, strangely atmospheric, spiritually sick, and uniquely uncompromising fuck flicks that I have ever seen. Featuring an excellent soundtrack by Arlon Ober (Through the Looking Glass, Eating Raoul) that ranges from eerie and discordant proto-industrial/power electronics noise to spiritually sinister Gregorian chants, as well as mostly pathetic forms of sexual dysfunctional and fetishism, Illusions of a Lady is ultimately a uniquely anti-erotic piece of celluloid perversion that could only arouse the most lost and damned of sexual degenerates. As director Middleton stated in the Rialto Report regarding his artistic agenda while creating Through the Looking Glass, “I think there was a part of me that wrote that movie where I was in a way kind of laughing at the people who went to see these kind of movies because you know in a way it was kind of sad,” and, indeed, despite their pulchritude and sensuality, the characters of Illusions of a Lady are ultimately rather depressing fuck-ups who cannot fuck properly and who no semi-normal person would think of respecting or glorifying. Somewhat surprisingly, Middleton was charged with five felony accounts of distributing obscene material across state lines in Louisiana in regard to his porn flicks, yet a group of old women deemed the films “socially redeeming” and he was cleared of all charges. Indeed, I have to concur with those old Southern gals as Illusions of a Lady is one of the few films that damningly depicts the dark undercurrent of both the porn industry and sex in post-counter-culture America in general, thus making Jonas Middleton a sort of dead serious Paul Morrissey of pornography, albeit with a more cultivated aesthetic with a talent for iconic tableaux. More sophisticated and socially conscious than the films of Radley Metzger (The Image, The Opening of Misty Beethoven) and more tenebrous and anti-titillating than most of the films of Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool), Illusions of a Lady may be a small and largely forgotten film, but it is also one of only a handful of porn flicks that curdles one soul.

THROUGH THE LOOKING GLASS

After my recent re-watching of the phantasmagoric avant-garde porn flick Bacchanale (1970) directed by the Amero brothers, I decided to give the similarly artistic and cultivated but infinitely more depraved surrealist-hardcore film Through the Looking Glass (1976) directed by Jonas Middleton (Cherry Blossom, Illusions of a Lady) a careful and serious viewing. Like Bacchanale (1970), the subject of incest is central to the plot of Through the Looking Glass (1976); a film about a socially-inept, rich socialite who reunites with her distinguished, deceased father, who is now in demon form, via a mirror she ritualistically masturbates in front of in a most narcissistic fashion. Created in the middle of the revolutionary 'Golden Age of Porn' (late-1960s to the early-to-mid-1980s), a bygone epoch when pornographers were more ambitious in their sensational quasi-artistic endeavors, Through the Looking Glass is one of few films from that era that has aged relatively gracefully over the years, especially when compared to more popular works like Deep Throat (1972) and Debbie Does Dallas (1978), which is probably due to the fact that it is a strikingly vulgar yet superficially Victorian nature and, dare I say, an anti-pornographic work that has very few redeeming qualities in terms of conventional eroticism, but functions well as a surrealist horror work that is like Federico Fellini's Juliet of the Spirits (1955) meets Ken Russell's The Devil's (1971) with a splash of Andy Milligan-inspired kitsch thrown in for good measure. Also released in a R-rated cut version that played in U.S. and European arthouse theaters, Through the Looking Glass has more in common with the artsy adult films of European auteur pornographers like Tinto Brass (Caligula, Paprika) and Walerian Borowczyk (The Beast, La Marge) than similarly themed American adult flicks, thus making it an entirely singular work in the history of American porn cinema that would undoubtedly go on to inspire the sleekly stylized pseudo-New Romanticist works of alt. porn auteur Stephen Sayadian (Café Flesh, Dr. Caligari). Starring Catherine Erhardt (Cinderella 2000) as the lead protagonist and porn veteran Jamie Gillis (Deep Throat Part II, WATERPOWER) as her dashing, demonic father, Through the Looking Glass is very possibly the most doleful and ferocious attempt at 'adapting' the popular Lewis Carroll novel of the same name.

No stranger to experimental avant-garde pornography, Jamie Gillis starred in Roger Watkins' (Last House on Dead End Street) experimental adult hardcore flicks Midnight Heat (1983) and Corruption (1984), but I doubt any of his performances are quite as idiosyncratically Mephistophelian as his role in Through the Looking Glass. Notably swarthy and Semitic in appearance and a true blue NYC Judaic in character and pantomime, Gillis makes for a dubious and downright odd choice as the father of fair-skinned and blonde-haired

THROUGH THE LOOKING GLASS

Nordic beauty Catherine Erhardt (aka Catharine Burgess), but when looking at the Through the Looking Glass as an allegorical piece of particularly perverse anti-pornography, it makes perfect sense. As a rich and spoiled wasp whose greatest dilemmas involve what sort of catering company she should use for her next party, Catherine represents the old, significantly weakened, and dying Anglo elite of America. While Jamie Gillis – being as kosher as Kashrut – represents America's new and wholly hostile Judaic elite as a virtual Golem of the goy gal's nightmares; a Hebraic Freddy Krueger and an extra-cynical "cunning linguist." In every war, one of the first things that the conqueror takes for bounty is the bootys of the defeated female population. Through the Looking Glass, like many films of its era (and especially those created afterward) reflects this transition – whether a conscious or unconscious decision on the director's part (I would go with the latter) – of one group triumphing over another to a most degrading and pitifully prurient metaphysical degree; where a girl's father becomes her most flagrant defiler. Thus, it is only fitting that Catherine begins to question whether or not the necromantic archfiend that appears to her through the medium of her mirror is really her padre or an exceedingly perverted imposter. Becoming increasingly detached from her Anglo husband and daughter, Catherine falls under the nefarious spell of the debonair demon until she is literally dragged down to hell in a scene that echoes the Hades of the classic Italian silent film L'Inferno (1911) directed by Giuseppe de Liguoro; a work based on Dante Alighieri's The Divine Comedy. Although it would be a stretch to compare the film (as a recent dvd synopsis does) to the Biblical art of early Dutch Renaissance painter Hieronymus Bosch, Through the Looking Glass is indeed a film of discarnate proportions that metaphorically presents the crushing, defiling, and dismantling of a formerly dominant people and a religion. The Jewish community has never shied away from bragging about their contributions to civilization and few are more glaring as their pioneering and undying domination of the porn industry. As Jewish-American 'actor' Robert Kerman aka R. Bolla (Cannibal Holocaust), who at one time lived with Jamie Gillis, once stated, "Sex is not the greatest sin in the Jewish religion" and "I hope that porn is the most unrighteous thing I do. If we go out of our way to be scumbags, that's the sin, when I do porn, I offend Shakespeare more than God." Jewish Professor of American History at Aberdeen University in UK, Nathan Abrams, noted in his article "Triple Extnics" (The Jewish Quarterly, winter 2004) that: "Jewish involvement in porn, by this argument, is the result of an atavistic hatred of Christian authority: they are trying to weaken the dominant culture in America by moral subversion. Astyr remembers having "to run or fight for it in grammar school because I was a Jew. It could very well be that part of my porn career is an 'up yours' to these people." Ironically, Through the Looking Glass looks more like the work of a decadent and thoroughly demoralized European filmmaker than a profiteering Judaic pornographer, but aside from writing and producing the Jeff Lieberman directed slasher flick Just Before Dawn (1981), director Jonas Middleton seems to have totally disappeared from the filmmaking realm, thus one can only speculate in regard to his background.

Featuring one of the first candid 'gyno-cam' shots ever featured in a porn flick where one truly gets to explore protagonist Catherine's insides in a less-than-flattering fashion, as well as a wicked wealth of incestuous scenarios highlighted in between drudging dinner scenes of monotonous pseudo-wasp-speak, Through the Looking Glass is an authentically abominable, loathsome, and disenchanting work that one can't help but never forget. If the German phrase "entartete Kunst" (degenerate art) was invented for anything, it was to describe a film like Through the Looking Glass; a work where everything that is beautiful, sacred, and holy is laboriously despoiled. That being said, I would not surprise if the main artistic motivation behind the film was to attack and wreak havoc upon the viewer, most specifically of the Anglo-American persuasion, as it was certainly not a work that, unlike the majority of adult films, was made with monetary gain as the most influential factor as expressed in by its exceptionally deranged and distinguished fetishism and all-around ridiculously repellant attributes. There is no doubt in my mind that if cultural marxist darling Herbert Marcuse got around to seeing Through the Looking Glass before he croaked, I am sure he was quite tickled to see a potent example of the ungodly excesses of his incendiary Occident-overturning legacy.

THE SILENCE OF THE LAMBS
THE SILENCE OF THE LAMBS

Jonathan Demme (1991)

I have very fond memories of watching The Silence of the Lambs at the ripe age of 5 years old. I remember watching Buffalo Bob covered in make-up and dancing with his “weewee” between his legs. This very memorable scene (with the haunting song “Goodbye Horses” by Q.Lazarus) scared and perplexed the shit out of me. My Mom assured me that the “man” had his penis hidden between his legs. Now I am in my early twenties and The Silence of the Lambs still entertains me. The film brought the serial killer to the mainstream. Director Jonathan Demme had for the most part only worked in the comedy genre. Demme’s niche from comedy even surfaces in The Silence of the Lambs (whether it was intentional or not). The cinematic crafting of the film demonstrates Demme’s knack for detail and perfection. I generally don’t like films that are too contrived (as for the most part they are soulless). The Silence of the Lambs is a notable exception. The Silence of the lambs is no doubt a feminist film. I often loathe estrogen driven films. They are generally poor films that hide their sloppiness behind a “good” and “empowering” message. The Silence of the Lambs shows the strength of a female (played by Jodie Foster) through her progressive drive, intellect, and powerful self-reliance. There is no preachy message to “enlighten” misogynist souls. Anthony Hopkins is superb as Hannibal Lecter of course. He is quite the loveable guy with a type of charisma that can’t be bought at an evangelical church. I wouldn’t mind having dinner with Hannibal as long as I get to cook. We could dine over a discussion of other man eaters such as Jeffrey Dahmer, Ed Gein, and the more recent Armin Meiwes. The Silence of the Lambs is Jonathan Demme’s greatest achievement. I also have to say the same about Jodie Foster and Anthony Hopkins. Although it’s not Jörg Buttgerit’s Schramm, it holds its place in serial killer cinema history. Being the only horror film to win the Academy award for best picture, The Silence of the Lambs has somewhat subverted the mainstream. Much props to hack Jonathan Demme.

RACHEL GETTING MARRIED

Jonathan Demme has come a long way since directing his early comedy films like Something Wild and then later serial killer dramas like The Silence of Lambs. Now Demme has jumped on the new Hollywood pseudo-artistic bandwagon of directing realist documentary style feature-length films. The arrogant Dane Lars Von Trier really seemed to inadvertently inspired the Hollywood studio system he so greatly desires. Now Jonathan Demme has given up directing big budget and polished production values for a more “naturalistic” style feel. Personally, I never thought Demme would ever be interested in directing a film such as Rachel Getting Married. Well, he is getting old and I am sure directing a “shaky camera art film” was less of a strain on Demme’s aging back. Rachel Getting Married stars the rising Hollywood talent Anne Hathaway. Hathaway has really become ambitious with her acting career by taking roles in various subversive films over the years. Hathaway first became popular with little girls starring in the Disney films, The Princess Diaries. Hathaway would first bare her breasts in the lame direct-to-video wigger flick Havoc. The film follows a bunch of lame ass rich white people that want to be poor and illiterate gangbanging Negros. Hathaway for some disturbing reason becomes sexually attracted to a short and criminal Mexican gangsta. One could say Havoc is a despicable film. But since that atrocity on celluloid, Anne Hathaway has proved she has acting talent and Rachel Getting Married is evidence of that. In fact, Anne Hathaway is what really carries Rachel Getting Married as a “quality” film. I wouldn’t say the direction in the film is notable and most of the other actors are repellent. Hathaway plays a self-centered bitch named Kym in Rachel Getting Married who also happens to be a recovering junkie. Kym comes back to her hometown from drug rehab so she can attend her sister Rachel’s wedding to a nerdy black man named Sidney. As soon as she arrives, Kym is a complete cunt that demands attention from everyone. Kym attempts to get attention in a variety of creative ways such as bringing up to everyone how she would do stupid things while on drugs or fucking a random guy she just meets. Kym certainly is not going to allow her sister to have all the attention though it’s her own wedding. Anne Hathaway is so flawless in her acting performance in Rachel Getting Married as a wacked out bitch that it almost had me worried. I have a very personal liking of Anne Hathaway as she has a certain resemblance to a young woman that I am fairly close to. Her performance in Rachel Getting Married has me wondering if she possibly has some unflattering behavior in real-life. Maybe it’s the misogynist in me, but I don’t believe that many actresses (and this goes for many of their male counterparts) working in Hollywood these days are at all talented. Hathaway may be the most talented young actress in Hollywood and I really hope her performance in Rachel Getting Married was just acting. The only thing lamer and more impotent than your typical white liberal American bourgeois family is a multicultural bourgeois family. Yes, to “get with the times” the family in Rachel Getting Married has variety of deracinated individuals that lack any culture or interesting lives. To make up for their lack of commonness and true family loyalty, the individuals make such things as washing dishes the most eventful activity in the film. Like your typical real-life white liberal bourgeois, the family in Rachel Getting Married talks to their minority friends like they are pets. They give big contrived smiles to the tamed minorities and talk about nothing except banal small talk. One cannot forget how white liberals like to grind and groove to the sweet sounds of jungle jazz and hip hop. Druggie Kym is the most interesting character and she is deranged. Kym and Rachel’s father, like virtually all male white liberals, is weak and effeminate. One could say that his mongrel wife wears the “docker” pants in the family. Only an “open minded” individual like the father in Rachel Getting Married could still be proud of his druggie loser daughter and dancingly ecstatic to the fact that he’s having a mulatto grandchild. But this is no surprise, I cannot remember the last time I saw a strong independent and virtuous white man in a Hollywood film. Something tells me that Rachel Getting Married is an accurate portrayal of many bourgeois families. I like to think the film is even white liberal exploitation but that may be a little far-fetched. Either way, Rachel Getting Married is a worthwhile film to checkout. Sure, the film has various scenes that feel like “documentary-like” filler and I wouldn’t be surprised if it was made over a long weekend, but Rachel Getting Married is entertaining. Anne Hathaway is probably the only American actress whose career I will be following in the future.

UNDER THE SKIN

Jonathan Glazer* (2013)

Mainstream big budget arthouse films are certainly a strange and mostly oxymoronic anomaly of cinema, with Bong Joon-ho's Snowpiercer (2013) and Jonathan Glazer's Under the Skin (2013) being more recent examples of this bastard cinematic breed that is known to divide filmgoers of all different types. Unquestionably, Judaic Brit Glazer's film has probably managed to divide viewers more than any other film of 2013 as an artsy fartsy sci-fi flick that features seductive ½ Nordic Jewess Scarlett Johansson as an oftentimes naked femalien fatale who harvests the bodies of mostly ugly and short Scotsmen by luring them to her deadly apartment with her busty body and tricking them into walking into an innards-and-bones-draining abyss. Directed by a man who got his first big break in filmmaking by directing music videos and adverts, Under the Skin is naturally big on aesthetics and style and low on emotion, subtext, and nuance, yet a good portion of filmgoers and film critics have treated it as the most innately baffling, arcane, and inexplicable films ever made, thus demonstrating the complete and utter lack of cinematic literacy among the general public. Indeed, Glazer's work seems like it was directed by the bastard broad of a rape committed by a senile Tarkovsky against the philistine daughter of Kubrick, as an undeniably aesthetically striking and ethereally atmospheric work with about as much emotional depth as the truly inhuman erotic extraterrestrial played by Ms. Johansson. Partially experimental in the sense that Johansson went driving around in a van with hidden cameras and hit on random unwitting Scottish men in what are ultimately totally unscripted scenes that capture that rather rare event of average-to-ugly men being seduced by a somewhat wanton woman that is considered one of Hollywood's top sex icons, Under the Skin is a film that manages to combine cinéma vérité and Candid Camera with a sort of pseudo-Kubrickian technical perfectionism and marginally philosophical pessimism for mankind. Loosely based on the 2000 surrealist sci-fi novel of the same name written by wandering Dutch novelist Michel Faber (who, although currently residing in Scotland, is 100% Dutch), Under the Skin is a work of modernist sci-fi (post)folk horror that manages to mix contemporary special effects with Heimat-like landscape scenes in a work that makes Glasgow, Scotland seem like a scenic and beautiful yet mostly melancholy and decidedly dispiriting place that is inhabited by a surplus of physical and emotional cripples who would bring great disgrace to their ancestors. By no means anything resembling a masterpiece, Glazer's film is a sort of blueprint for what Hollywood should (but never would) strive for if they wanted to create more demanding audiences, as a work that straddles a reasonably healthy line between cinematic art and accessible entertainment. Indeed, I must admit that coercing Johansson into getting completely unclad for the film was a clever way to con normal people into seeing a patently pretentious arthouse science fiction flick. While Under the Skin may not be anywhere near as great as Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968), it is certainly the most innately idiosyncratic and (anti)erotic mainstream sci-fi flick since Nicholas Roeg's The Man Who Fell to Earth (1976) starring David Bowie, which also deals with the central theme of an alien coming to earth and ultimately becoming debased by mankind.

Although never actually revealed in the film, Faber's book is about aliens that are sent to earth by a wealthy extraterrestrial corporation to lure in lonely hitchhikers whose flesh is sold as a delicacy on the alien mother planet (in that sense, the film had the potential to vaguely resemble Peter Jackson's early darkly comedic splatter flick Bad Taste (1987)). After a long and rather pretentious close-up shots of eyeballs juxtaposed with the unsettling sounds of an alien attempting to learn the English language, Under the Skin begins with an alien motorcyclist (played by real-life British champion motorcycle road racer Jeremy McWilliams)—a sort of ruthless extraterrestrial overseer who makes sure that female aliens successfully execute their jobs regarding the hunting and procuring male earthlings—scooping up the seemingly dead body of a young woman off the side of a road and putting it in the back of a van. Although never clearly indicated, the lifeless woman is an alien who has assumedly failed at her mission, as she has done the unthinkable by developing human emotions like empathy and sadness, as indicated when she sheds a tear (the sole indication that she is not completely dead). An unclad buxom alien babe (Scarlett Johansson) strips her corpse-like alien comrade and puts on her clothes, as she has replaced the disgraced extraterrestrial femme fatale predator as a superficially salacious space-woman whose main mission is to procure young, lonely, and horny Scotsmen via her glaring streetwalker chic sexual appeal. To complete her already alluring femme fatale uniform, the alien seductress drives to a mall in her van and buys some pink lipstick. The first young man the Alien attempts to pickup is so intimidated by her out-of-the-world beauty and uncommonly aggressive advances that he declines her offer for a free ride, thereupon unwittingly saving his own life in the process. Of course, most of the men the Alien encounters are not so lucky and not a single one of them gets to probe her pussy. Indeed, aside from being a cold and calculating extraterrestrial cunt killer, the pseudo-amorous Alien is a genuine cocktease who does not even give her victims a free sample of her flesh before killing them, as she is seemingly asexual, at least when it comes to alien species.

When the Alien does finally manage to lure a man into her van, she coerces him into following her back to her 'apartment', which is nothing more than a perfectly pitch black room with a sinking abyss-like floor, which imprisons the prey in a manner not that unlike a spiderweb. Like the prey of a spider, the men are not killed instantly but most bide their time in almost darkness. When the unlucky hitchhiker follows the undressing Alien through her apartment as if he is completely possessed and has tapped into the most archaic part of his brain during some sort of atavistic awakening, he strips off his clothes (with his erect penis literally guiding the way!) and eventually sinks into the floor and disappears without even attempting to put up a fight. The next day, the Alien goes to a rocky beach and approaches a Czech man (Kryštof Hádek) who seems somewhat disinterested in her, as if he can sense that she is an evil succubus bitch. When the Czech man attempts to save a drowning couple, the emotionless Alien watches the totally tragic scenario in a completely unmoved fashion while a baby screams hysterically in the background, thus demonstrating her complete and utter incapacity for empathizing with humans. When the Czech man washes up on the shore half-drowned after failing to rescue the couple, the Alien cravenly hits him on the head with a rock and takes his inanimate body with her. Later that night, the motorcycle-riding Overseer comes back to the beach and collects everything at the scene of the tragedy except the drowned couple's baby, who continues to wail in the darkness (interestingly, the Alien later hears on the radio that although the husband's corpse was found, the baby and wife are still missing). When the Alien goes to a club and procures a sleazy Chav-like scumbag, the macabre mechanism of the extraterrestrial's killer apartment is eventually revealed. Indeed, after a human falls through the liquid abyss located on the apartment's floor, their blood, guts, and bones are eventually sucked out and sent down a large conveyor belt, with the deflated skin of the victim being the only thing that remains. Undoubtedly, these gutless pieces of floating epidermis resemble the sort of grotesquely distorted human figures that you might expect Irish-born Figurative painter Francis Bacon to have painted.

Eventually, everything comes falling apart for the femalien fatale when she begins doing what led to her predecessor's downfall by developing human emotions and feelings of empathy for her human prey. It is the job of motorcyclist Overseer to inspect the female alien to see if she is beginning to develop any human emotions, which he does by staring deeply into her cold and seemingly lifeless pupils. One night while prowling the streets in her van, the Alien spots and picks up a horribly disfigured fellow of the friendless and assumedly virginal sort that looks like the Elephant Man (the role was played by a real-life disfigured man named Adam Pearson who works in TV production and suffers from facial neurofibromatosis) and she eventually manages to swoon him by complimenting his "beautiful hands" (notably, Pearson apparently suggested to Glazer how a woman might successfully seduce him, which was ultimately incorporated into the film's screenplay). While the Alien also lures the Elephant Man back to her extraterrestrial murder factory of an apartment and seduces the poor disfigured man into being consumed by the abyss (he states, "...dream, yes, dreaming..." while in a seemingly hypnotized state as the Alien takes her clothes off), she later has second thoughts after noticing a trapped fly and decides to let her prey go, though she does not bother to give him his clothes back, thus the deformed monster mensch must suffer the public humiliation of going au naturel in the countryside. Indeed, the disfigured dude escapes to the Scottish Highlands but unfortunately the crotch-rocket-riding Overseer decides to hunt him down and catches him just as he makes way into the backyard of his suburban home.

Meanwhile, the Alien decides to ditch her job, so she abandons her van and attempts to live like a normal human being. Of course, nothing quite works, as the Alien lacks both the psychological and biological characteristic of a real human. Aside from gagging/choking upon attempting to eat like humans do by taking a bite out of a pie, the Alien makes for a rather pathetic lover. Indeed, after meeting a guy at a bus stop whose home she temporarily stays in, the Alien attempts to consummate coitus for the first time, but freaks out when the man's member gets too close to her nether-regions. After spreading her legs and holding a lamp over her bearded clam to get a good look at what is inside, the Alien flees the man's home out of assumed fear and embarrassment and seeks isolation in a 2,000 acre forest where she finds a bothy to sleep in. Not long after arriving in the forest, the Alien runs into a low-class middle-aged Logger who warns her to watch her step, though he adds regarding the area, "It's a nice place if you want some solitude." Of course, the Alien learns otherwise when she is rudely awakened the next morning to the same Logger molesting her body with his sneaky hands. Needless to say, the Logger subsequently attempts to violently rape the Alien but he is quite taken aback after accidentally ripping the extraterrestrial's fake white girl epidermis, thus revealing that "under the skin" she is not actually human, but a dark phantom-like being. Indeed, after the Alien decides to tear off the rest of the skin off, a svelte and featureless black body is revealed that completely lacks all the warm positive qualities one associates with the physique of mankind. Before she knows it, the Logger returns and doses the Alien with gasoline and lights her on fire. In the end, the Alien burns alive, with her ashes floating back to the sky where she once came from. As for the motorcycling Overseer, he stands stoically on a hill while looking for his missing space slut in a rather aesthetically pleasing shot that resembles a landscape painting by German Romantic painter Caspar David Friedrich.

Undoubtedly, I would be lying if I did not admit that I was reasonably entertained by Under the Skin, even if it is a purely aesthetic-driven work of the rather shallow sort that ironically critiques the supposed innate shallowness of human beings, especially males, which is made most clear at the end of the film when the rapist Logger kills the femalien fatale played by Scarlett Johansson that he previously wanted to fuck after it is revealed that her human pulchritude is only skin-deep and is purely counterfeit. Admittedly, I have read various interpretations of the film, especially of the frigid feminist and male cuckold sort, and I have found most of these critiques to be complete and utter bollocks (to borrow a goofy word from where the film was set), yet reading these reviews/articles made me realize that Under the Skin has gotten people thinking, which is quite a rarity in cinema nowadays. While I somewhat doubt it was the director's conscious decision, I personally interpreted the film as a tragic metaphysical horror depiction of the archetypical 'Seductive Jewess'—a descendent of Salome and every Rothschild daughter—as a work where a true racial outsider seduces and kills dumb European goy boys for the benefit of her kinfolk. Of course, what better Seductive Jewess than Scarlett Johansson for the role as someone that is proudly Hebraic yet looks rather Aryan due to the fact that she is the progeny of a Swedish man (isn't it ironic that virtually all of the most attractive Israelites have mixed blood and look the least stereotypically Jewish?!), even if her behavior and the expressions in her eyes say otherwise. It should be noted that 'British' director Jonathan Glazer is not only Jewish, but proudly so, with him once stating in a June 7, 2001 interview for the JewishJournal.com, "Cinema, synagogue, what's the difference? [...] You get fairly dominant Jewish personalities in both." Of course, had Glazer been a goy and stated the same thing, he would probably be instantly blacklisted from Hollywood, but I digress. In addition to tribe members Johansson and Glazer, the film was co-produced by American Hebrew Nick Wechsler and the musical score was composed by English bull-dyke-like Jewess Mica Levi, thus making it a largely Semitic sci-fi creation.

Like the stupid male pawns featured in Under the Skin, countless culturally cuckolded males from America and Europe (and pretty much everywhere else) worship Johansson while being totally oblivious to the open secret that her tribesmen pollute peoples' minds via Hollywood and countless media outlets, destroy their countries by de-industrializing them and flooding them with mostly hostile and uneducated aliens from the third world, and start seemingly perennial doomed-to-fail wars in the Middle East and elsewhere that are fought by mostly white males in what is ultimately a real-life dystopian scenario that is more or less reflected in John Carpenter's cult sci-fi flick They Live (1988). Indeed, Johansson's character's succubus-like seduction powers are so great in the film that she merely needs to strip and a character loses all capacity for rational thought and conscious thinking and subsequently walks into a dark abyss to his own death. And, of course, like the wandering Jew in a foreign land, Johansson's character only faces true conflict when she begins to empathize with humanity and attempts to live the life of a normal human being, which one can argue is an allegorical reference to Jewish assimilation (which has been described as the "Silent Holocaust" among certain hysterical Jewish groups and leaders). Either way, whatever way you approach Under the Skin, one gets the feeling that the root of all female evil is pussy, which is a message that virtually any man can relate to. With that being said, one can also argue that the film carries the message that if women actually learned to empathize with males instead of being completely self-absorbed and oftentimes scheming opportunists, they would perish just as Johansson's character does. Somewhat notably, Under the Skin is oftentimes compared to the films of Stanley Kubrick who, like Glazer, was a Judaic who was not big on emotional depth but was certainly keen on cultural pessimism, especially within a post-WWII Western context. While I am not exactly sure the sort of cultural pessimism, if any, that Glazer was trying to disseminate with his film aside from the obvious, Under the Skin is certainly a foreboding and apocalyptic work where, somewhat absurdly, the most stunning person is a Jewess and most of the whites seem like the distantly related kinfolk of the cast of Judaic junky auteur Harmony Korine's cinematic debut Gummo (1997), which is also a work that makes it seem like the Occident is taking its last gasp.

THE PUNISHER

Jonathan Hensleigh (2004)

Second in line, Thomas Jane's The Punisher film that ignores the previous Dolph Lundgren casting, this film deviates from not only the prior motion picture but even more so from the source material of the revenge-laden comics. I remember vividly when Fantastic Four: Rise of the Silver Surfer was released. I remember the swollen red faces of fans when they saw that Galactus has been transformed into a purple cloud. Well, Jonathan Hensleigh has turned a vengeful devil into Smokey the Bear. In an interview with UGO, Thomas Jane explained that his interest in The Punisher was derived from the intention of it being similar to Taxi Driver. Of course, this pretentious statement led to not only a film so disappointingly lacking action, but a film whose emotional depth can be represented by a puddle on the side of the road. Should I even bother to bring about the Punisher's logo and its point of origin? The only surprising facet of this film is the brutal paper slicer death scene which took long enough to build up to. Just when you think that Thomas Jane's acting can't get worse, John Travolta is flamboyantly introduced into the happy family. The Punisher takes the male's fascination of muscle cars and creates an inanimate object into a major player that attempts to steal the scenes with its horsepower. This Punisher plays out more like Robin Hood with bumbling tenant sidekicks that cater to the countercultures with an irritating character with a plethora of facial piercings. It wouldn't be until the year 2008 where a Punisher film would strive for a beautiful art direction that appeals to fans of the comics and an absolute demonstration of what Max Payne attempted to do. The only sadist viewpoint from this film is the fundamental Castle family slaughter. Not only does Frank's family get murdered by New Jersey Guido's, but near every guest at his party gets massacred by a sea of machine gun fire. Thomas Jane does the legend of The Punisher no justice at all and only clutters the gene pool of Marvel adaptations. Thank God that the sequel to this didn't hold tact. I guess we have to thank Jane's adamant stubbornness on account of this film failing as a Taxi Driver clone. The Punisher (2004) is a swift kick in the nuts of Punisher fans. The naked truth's that none of the crew or cast has read a Punisher comic book and this is plainly manifested in a venomous format for none to enjoy. I've heard comments before following these guidelines - "Well, I'm not a fan of the comic book but I think the film did well as a standalone.. shrugs- It's this kind of response that makes my stomach churns. Shit will always be shit. Nothing you say or do can prove this film to be of substantial quality. This is a far cry from Dolph Lundgren's Punisher which spent more time with personalization rather than tedious subplots.

TRUCK TURNER

Jonathan Kaplan (1974)

I remember thinking to myself one day as I browsed the action section at Suncoast, "Holy fuck! The Godfather of Soul is in a blaxploitation film?!" About a year later, full of procrastination, Isaac Hayes passed away without me seeing his film. I was devastated and vowed to finally view Truck Turner via Netflix, and it does not disappoint. Isaac Hayes plays Mac "Truck" Turner, an ex-football star turned skip tracer. After killing a local pimp, name of Gator, the whole criminal underworld has their eyes set of Trucks head for a vengeful hoe. Along with random jive talking assassins, a kingpin named Blue is looking to seal the fate on the soulful black bullet. Now if there is one thing that Isaac Hayes would never be horrible at, it would be an actor. If you've ever listened to his amazing music, you feel a vibrancy of funky soul pulsing up your veins. He can project massive surges of emotions in any media or art form he touches. Truly a man with a gift. In most blaxploitation films, when a love scene boils down, things aim to get intimate but end up looking goofy. Isaac Hayes doesn't front about his love-making abilities. Nor does he front on the size of his gun. Isaac Hayes was built for action cinema. His large build frightens feeble white boys and allows him to put maximum force behind his fist in order to beat the shit out of women. Isaac Hayes created a character with such assertiveness that it scares me. A bold player without pimping, Mac Turner is a fine role model for black audiences. A much more suitable one than Dolemite. The climax of the film lingers with such a profound melancholy that the silence of the scene will have you flabbergasted. Isaac Hayes is a fierce warrior with a handgun. He is correcting the streets and promoting his therapy of Hot Buttered Soul. I will admit that Truck Turner starts out slow, but damn if it doesn't pick up and deliver a blaxploitation classic instantly. R.I.P. Isaac Hayes. I hope you're pimp-smacking some fine ass angel hoes in heaven.

BLACK SHEEP

Jonathan King (2007)

Ever since the release of Shaun of the Dead, the European (Not England) film companies feel the need to mass market their films in our patriotic soil, regardless of how many Americans don't understand Euro humor. The recent slew of films includes the similar film Severance. Well, due to America's love of animals and zombies, it seems they found the perfect formula. Meet Black Sheep. While this review opens up sounding like another walk in the park with a jolly bit o' tea, be warned, for this film is pure filth. A boy is scarred by his brother and develops a lifetime fear of sheep, quite ridiculous for such a pitiful prank. He is an adult, still pitiful, and still is afraid of sheep. His father died, and has gone back to his hometown to mourn. Well, some retarded animal rights activist steal a diseased sheep fetus in a tube built like it was from Mighty Morphin Power Rangers. This is all dandy until they break it. Now New Zealand is plagued with zombie-sheep and zombie-sheep-people. I guess the company felt special for changing the Romzomcom (Romantic Zombie Comedy) into a Romzomshom (Romantic Zombie Sheep-omedy.) While this alone is only a plot worthy of a Troma release, Dimension Extreme nabbed it. Nothing in this film is extreme, not even the plot. The plot, while not being completely horrible, isn't enough to strengthen this film's weaknesses. The acting is poor, and the twists are feeble. These random twists in film need to cease. The whole point of a twist is to surprise. It's hard to surprise an audience that expects one. The effects are laughable. Black Sheep seems like a rip-off of Poultrygeist. Regardless of which was first. Black Sheep is not funny, it is not entertaining, and does not have a humanitarian outlook. Even if sheep had an outlook or market in film, this would still horribly disappoint.

Jonathan Liebesman (2005)

Ah, Jonathan Liebesman. How we hardly knew thee. When I first heard of this short film, I'd figured it was a fan film that turned out to be better than its own inspiration; No More Souls and Batman: Dead End comes to mind. I was half right, but then I found out he was actually the one behind that horrid piece of Hollywood trash Darkness Falls. He later directed the prequel to the Michael Bay remake of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre. Rings was constructed to bridge the gap between The Ring and The Ring Two. Its star is a young kid who enters this cult-like club of video watchers. It seems after the events transpired in the original The Ring, Samara has become a prom queen from hell. It's a tight circle of people who videotape their experiences after watching the tape, then pass it off and have someone else watch their tape. In other words, A giant fucked Russian Roulette via Video tape scenario. Dreamworks Pictures thought it would also be a great idea to attempt a viral marketing campaign. These prehistoric viral attempts seem amateurish compared to the recent greats with Cloverfield, LOST, and The Dark Knight. I didn't bother browsing the page due to my "I don't give a fuck" attitude towards the series in whole. VIRAL PAGE Initially, the effects of hysteria designate themselves to be pretty fucking creepy, but on further inspection of my room, I can count multiple rings everywhere. Circles surround us (No pun intended) and it seems more of an exercise in ripping off Uzumaki than anything. Uzumaki had the phobia of spirals and such down long before this shitty series came into play. Rings is a solid little short that had a shitty ending. I don't like the main character. What started off as a sniveling brat who saw ladders became some fucking asshole who feared death too much that he'd kill people who cared about him. Rings features some great effects trickery (Horizontal drippings forming vertical puddles on walls) but occasionally does feature the horribly CGI'd centipede. A diamond in the rough, but don't take that as too much of a compliment.

TERMINATOR 3: RISE OF THE MACHINES

Jonathan Mostow (2003)

Take what you have, a science-fiction genre classic, and an action genre classic, and you have yourself a pretty fucking solid franchise. Now add some feminism, a total screw-over of the already confusing Terminator timeline, and the shit-tiest visioning of adult John Conner turned to script, and you have yourselves T3 in the flesh... err, living tissue over metal endoskeleton. Nick Stahl might have seemed like a good choice for our reluctant hero on paper, but the result is nothing short of devastating. A simple rebel teenager has turned into an "emo" drifter who hides from "the system" and breaks into local veterinary's offices to steal medication to give his character "tortured depth." Alright, enough with the quotations. He gets captured embarrassingly by the ugly-as-a-horse Clair Danes. After some run-ins with a female Terminator (Ugh) and the "I'll be back" T-850. Turns out this is the very same Terminator that assassinates him in the future, using the same model to recall boyhood memories to get in closer. Jesus, this storyline gets way too ridiculous. So after all is said and done, what we have is a mess of action, romance, and ridiculous time-travel paradoxes. The introduction of the T-X (Female Terminator) is what might have doomed it from the start. Not even the nipple slip in the beginning was enough to grip in fans of the original. Her mutating polymorphing body and reverse ion particle thruster cannon over-kill arm just made it a one-sided fight. There was always that "T-800 can kill the T-1000 if he believes deep inside" bull shit, but this time, there's no real fun action here. The only real sense of destruction is the T-850 shooting cops but not killing them. Yes, a pacifistic Terminator. I remember in the original 2 where this bad motherfucker in a leather jacket would haul ass and shoot down every bastard who looked at him the wrong way. Now they toned down the cop-killing, as to fit calmly in with our paranoid and controversial society. None the less, the T-X murders everyone, cause she is a woman and deserves equal rights. The male should have the License to Kill before the female. No, die. You're not a cool villain. Nick Stahl was a teen frenzy when he was in films like Bully, but somehow in this film, he looks like someone bludgeoned him with a shovel. He is easily the bitchiest John Conner I've ever had to deal with. I'm excited for Christian Bale to play John Conner in the upcoming PG-13 shitfest Terminator: Salvation. I've read the close-off to T4, and trust me, It's a steaming pile of shit. The detail that went into portraying the war-torn dystopian world of the future was trashed for shitty CGI and crappy green screened settings. No longer are skulls crunching under the metal feet of the enemy. The Terminator was a dismal piece of tech-noir. T2: Judgement Day was an unmatched action film that conjures up thrills and a bit of classy humor. T3 is a feminist film with shitty guns and Arnie wearing fag glasses in the beginning. What a horrible way to continue these films. If I had connections with Skynet, I'd send a Terminator back in time to assassinate Jonathan Mostow and rejoice in the 2 part classic.

Jonathan Parker (2001)

Bartleby is a slight re-visioning of Herman Melville's unappreciated masterpiece Bartleby the Scrivener. When you adapt a novella about an enigmatic man who is solemnly creepy, of course you'd enlist Crispin Glover to play this role. Indeed he does, and with the fewest amount of lines, he manages to deeply haunt you long after the film is over. Now when I say modern, I don't necessarily mean present times, but more of an incredible 60's feel to it. The public records office is a comfortable place to work, already equipped with enough dysfunction to last till the next pay check. Flirtatious secretaries fit good with swinger co-workers. When an extremely sordid employment ad goes out in the local newspaper, only a single man answers the ad. His name is Bartleby and he is calm, collected, and a weird charmer. Crispin Glover's performance is stunning in this film. Only someone of his caliber and notoriety for bringing out more than enough charisma could fit this role. Back to the subject of it's "Retro" appeal, the colors of the office are exuberant and striking. The personalities in the office match perfectly. A good comparison to the look of this film would be the hit underrated game for SNES/GEN - Zombies Ate My Neighbors! Just as The Boss began to lose sleep over Bartleby's creepy nature, I too felt haunted after viewing this film. The all too similar "I don't want to work" theme has been explored in such farces as Clerks or even Office Space. Not to bunch up Bartleby in with this illicit crowd, but it is of a similar nature, but with a surreal context. Much of this is due to the score. The soundtrack was all composed with a machine called the Theremin. This instrument is a series of antenna's and electronic loops that you play with hand gestures. The resulting drones and hums are then sent to a loudspeaker. Similar to the game ZAMN!, the score features ambiguous tracks that not only alter your state of reality, but bring more life in an air-conditioning vent that Lynch couldn't do with a radiator. Bartleby is a woefully mysterious being of humanity. An amazing point of this film is it's replay value. Immediately after it was over, I wanted to be assaulted by his weirdness again. Jonathan Parker's debut film is an enormous cult success. I was very surprised, this coming from a Jew who claims to be a tall, elongated Woody Allen. I could go on and on about how deeply the film distressed me, but I'd prefer not to.

BAGMAN - PROFESSION: MEURTRIER
BAGMAN - PROFESSION: MEURTRIER

Jonathan Prévošt (2004)

Bagman - Profession: Meurtrier (Which I will call Bagman for short) is an extremely low budget splatter short filmed in Quebec. This title would always come up to me at very weird times and it felt natural to view it, but I refused due to hard drive space issues. Finally, In a creepy fit of Déjà vu, I gave in and downloaded this film immediately. I went into this trivial film experience only expecting a lot of horrible murder effects, ones that I have grown oh so tired of. It makes more than just blood to motivate my psyche into enjoying a film and thankfully, Bagman has not disappointed me in the slightest. Bagman isn't just a simple gore film, It's a loud-mouth screwball comedy with insane amounts of limbs featuring awesome action choreography. I don't think I could have been more surprised then I was.

Bagman's glorious introduction reminds me a lot of Sheitan and Versus. Take a group of French would-be gang bangers and thugs, then just throw these inconsiderate bastards in a hell storm of murder and mayhem. A woman who survived a previous Bagman incident is hit by a car full of white "thugs", upon their inspection of her body, she jumps up babbling about Bagman coming after her. She mention that you cannot say Bagman's name 3 times. This of course, happens. Gangsta backup is soon called when Bagman appears which results in the most zany fight scene I've ever seen. Each exquisite and over the top death is better than the last, resulting in unrivaled mayhem and entertainment. The production values on Bagman were surprisingly fit as well. I expected a film that had the feel of Violent Shit, which is how the film is described, but no! We're treated to a fresh HD-looking slasher addition which is finally getting its own full-length sibling. Bagman is an exercise in good taste, concerning horror that is. Originality is fine and all, but I'd much prefer something that works over a film that is drowning it its own excess. If you like any of the following: Gore, intestines, gratuitous gang banger slaughterings, screaming, arterial spray, dismemberment's, stabbings, hackings, or plain ole' dark comedy, Bagman is a must see.

RECKLESS

Joram Lürsen (2014)

While it is unfortunately not uncommon for Hollywood to take successful European films and remake them in a decidedly dumbed down fashion for subtitle-shy American philistines who cannot be bothered with artsy fartsy things like nuance and subtext, among other things, it is not exactly common for European filmmakers, especially Dutchmen, to remake semi-mainstream hit indie thrillers, yet the somewhat popular Dutch filmmaker Joram Lürsen. Indeed, despite being a TV hack turned mainstream director that is responsible for romantic-comedies like Alles is liefde (2007) aka Love is All and Alles is familie (2012) aka Family Way and sappy family films like In Oranje (2004) aka In Orange, Lürsen managed to create a vastly superior film to the British psychological crime-thriller The Disappearance of Alice Creed (2009) written and directed by J Blakeson with his latest feature Bloedlink (2014) aka Reckless aka De Verdwijning van Vera Muller. While a fairly faithful remake with some of the same exact shots and most of the same scenarios, Lürsen's version is ultimately more tightly directed, culturally subversive, and just plain more hardcore. A three-person chamber piece that is largely set in a single apartment, the film indubitably feels like it is based off of an original play but is actually the brainchild of Blakeson, who dreamed up what would probably be the greatest homo thriller since Alfred Hitchcock's classic Leopold and Loeb flick Rope (1948). Luckily, Lürsen took Blakeson's original idea and ultimately proved that he is the superior cinematic craftsman. Of course, considering his hit film Love is All (which, incidentally, was remade in both Belgium and Germany) is more or less a raunchy Dutch rip-off of the retarded British rom-com Love Actually (2003), it seems that Lürsen is a sort of perennial artisan as opposed to a serious auteur, but I digress. Aside from receiving a screener of the film from Artsploitation Films and wanting to see how it compared to The Disappearance of Alice Creed, I decided to watch Reckless because I wanted to see how Dutch leading man Tygo Gernandt (Van God Los aka Godforsaken!, The Black Death) sized up as quasi-psychopathic cocksucking kidnapper. Although he is a fairly popular actor in the Netherlands, I am mainly familiar with Gernandt for his early role in the Aryan Kaganof classic Naar de klote! (1996) aka Wasted! as an innately impotent longhaired pothead neo-hippie bum whose reasonably more masculine girlfriend cheats on him with a wigger pseudo-gangster degenerate with whom she is dealing ecstasy. Undoubtedly, in Lürsen's film, Gernandt demonstrates he is just as good at playing authoritarian shit-stabbing criminals as he is at playing exceedingly emasculated pot-addled breeders.

A work that is notable for featuring one of the most bizarre love triangles in thriller cinema history, Reckless is ultimately more intriguing than The Disappearance of Alice Creed because it features an added racial dynamic that was totally absent from Blakeson's film. Indeed, the film features a 'bisexual' male femme fatale (or 'homme fatale') as played by an actor of Tunisian Arab stock who ultimately double-crosses both his white male and white female lovers in what one might describe as an allegory for multicultural Holland if one did not know better. Undoubtedly, Reckless is a great example of a film that would be completely banal to write about without revealing certain spoilers, as it is a work that deceives the viewer just as much as the characters deceive one another. Surely, one of the most clever aspects of the film is that it tricks most viewers into watching what one would describe as a somewhat 'queer' film, especially considering that it belongs to a genre that is traditionally rampantly heterosexual and stars male actors that are hardly homophiliac when it comes to choosing film roles. Of course, the film's initially hermetic 'heteroflexible' themes are among the things that make it so potent, unforgettable, and suavely sleazy. Indeed, while Reckless is unequivocally a thriller, it also features a winsome hint of trailer trash melodrama that ultimately makes all the difference when it comes to distinguishing the film from countless other disposable works of the obscenely outmoded genre. In short, if Hitchcock had a too-cool-for-school Dutch grandson with a fetish for S&M and bondage, he might have directed Reckless.

For nearly the first five minutes of the film, the viewer watches ex-con Victor aka 'Vic' (Tygo Gernandt) and his somewhat younger brown Arab underling Ricardo aka 'Rico' (Marwan Kenzari of Jim Taihuttu's Wolf (2013)) as they silently buy materials and build a soundless padded room in a dilapidated apartment for an upcoming kidnapping that they plan to carry out. Ultimately, the two plan to kidnap a young and fairly slutty looking blonde named Laura Temmink (Sarah Chronis) and then demand that her stinking wealthy Fortune 500 realtor father Leo pay four million Euros in ransom money to get her back. While he initially seems like a brown slave and cowardly cuck of alpha-prick Vic, who is indubitably the most the more domineering of the two, Rico has a secret scheme that his unwitting comrade has no clue about. Upon grabbing Laura off the street and putting her inside the sort of unnoticeable plain white van that one would assume a serial killer might use, the two men put a gag ball device into her mouth that is typically used by people involved with BDSM role play and drive her to a secret apartment where they have installed a sort of pseudo-S&M prison room. Indeed, upon tying her legs and feet to the bedposts of the bed, Vic and Rico quickly cut all of her clothes off, including her underwear, with scissors and then take photos of her unclad body in bondage with a digital camera to send to her father (!) to prove to him that they have kidnapped his daughter and that she is in a precarious situation that seems to have an unsettling 'sexual' component to it. After snapping photos of their victim, the two criminals put a sack over her head and lock her in the room by herself while she is still strapped to the bed.

bring her water, though Vic warns her the first time he takes her gag device off, "If you scream we have to hurt you. OK? We don't want to kill you, but if it's necessary we will. First pain, then death." When Laura attempts to plead with them by lying and stating, "Please let me go. My daughter needs her medication," Vic assertively replies, "Don't. Don't. We know everything about you. You don't have a daughter. You help yourself and us if you just do as we say." Of course, Laura does not like Vic's response, so she bites him in an aggressive animalistic fashion and he responds by smacking the shit out of her and firmly stating, "Listen, you cunt, there are two people who can get you out of here. That's us...He and I. So we're your new best friends from now on." From there, Vic informs Laura of what hand signals she needs to give him and Rico anytime she needs to use the bathroom, telling her, "If you wet yourself, it's your problem." Anytime Laura has to take a leak, Vic and Rico are forced to pull her pants and panties down and make her piss in a jug while she is still lying down and bound to the bed. It is quite apparent that Rico is not exactly comfortable with snapping S&M photos of Laura and making her piss in a jug, but his reasons for having these feelings are quite different than what the viewer might expect.

Vic is an absurdly anally retentive and obscenely obsessive compulsive guy who literally monitors every single little move that his turd-colored comrade makes. When Rico attempts to drink some beer after getting done tying up Laura, Vic will only allow him to have a single can, telling him "we're not amateurs." When Rico refuses to eat dinner after a long hard day of quasi-S&M style kidnapping, Vic becomes fairly paranoid and accuses him of becoming "sentimental" and a "sissy," so the seemingly melancholy Arab finally gives in and eats. Somewhat curiously, when Vic decides to leave the apartment to run some errands, Rico visits Laura in her padded room and freaks her out by sniffing her body. Meanwhile, Vic makes a deal with Laura's father to give her back for four million Euros. To demonstrate to her father that they are serious, Vic films Rico with a knife to Laura's throat as she pleads to her daddy to do whatever they say or she will be dead.

Ultimately, things get fairly more interesting in the film when Laura signals to Rico that she has to defecate while Vic is away. When Rico makes the mistake of agreeing to turn around while Laura is taking a shit in a bucket after she complains "I can't do this with someone watching me," he gets hit in the head with said bucket by the kidnap victim, who also manages to grab his gun. After Laura somewhat senselessly fires a round from the weapon into the wall of the room, Rico declares "it's me," takes off his mask, and reveals that he is her lover. Naturally, Laura is quite angry with her dubious brown beau, but Rico rationalizes his behavior by saying he did it for her to rob her much maligned father, stating, "You always said you hated him. He never gives you anything. He thinks the way you live sucks. You said yourself that he doesn't give a shit about you. This is it, Laura. This is the way to get money off him. We talked about it, but didn't know how. This is it." After moronically revealing Vic's name to her and that he plans to rip his partner off, Rico promises to Laura, "You and me will have the money and go to some tropical beach." When Laura complains, "You told me you loved me," Rico acts like the stereotypical lying would-be-pimp 'playa' by replying, "I do love you. So much. It's the only reason why I did this." When Rico tells Laura that he planned to tell her about his plan after receiving the ransom money, she sarcastically replies, "So what would you have told me? 'Sorry I chained you to a bed like some S&M whore. And that I ogled your pussy with some retard.'" Of course, when Rico informs Laura that all she has to do is 'play victim' for another day or two and they will receive four million euros in ransom money from her father, she agrees to go along with the charade and allows him to tie her back to the bed after Vic knocks on the door and demands to be let back in the apartment.

While Vic has no idea that Rico and Laura are lovers, the second day in the apartment he begins becoming extra paranoid when his comrade spends a little too long in the bathroom, so he kicks down the door. Unbeknownst to Vic, Rico had just swallowed a bullet shell from the round that Laura shot off. While Vic proclaims, "I don't smell anything" upon entering the bathroom after Rico makes the claim that he was in there for a long time because he had to take a dump, he finally stops being paranoid and stops giving his super swarthy sidekick a hard time. In fact, Vic theorizes to Rico regarding his mysterious bowel movements, "Adrenalin... That's what causes it. Suddenly having to crap, foul taste in your mouth." As demonstrated by the fact he refuses to sleep one night, Vic is about to go over the edge as a result of his paranoia in regard to the kidnapping, but his worries are not just in regard to money. Indeed, after remarking to Rico that they will both be "set forever" after getting the ransom money, Vic romantically embraces his 'partner' and adds that in two days they will be on a plane "and away from here. You and me together. Away from this hell hole. A new beginning. A new life. The first few days we'll barely leave the hotel. We'll just stay in our room." While the two men kiss, Vic tells Rico, "I love you" and he replies by saying the same exact thing he previously said to Laura, "I've never loved anyone so much. Never," thus indicating he is probably a psychopath of sorts.

Of course, everything goes downhill for everyone involved when Rico makes the mistake of untying Laura from the bed while Vic is away. Indeed, while Rico is making out with Laura on the same exact bed that the little lady was just tied to, the poor little rich girl manages to handcuff him to a bedpost while he is naked and then she calls 911, though she has no idea where she is and thus cannot give the dispatcher her whereabouts. After the failed attempt at getting the police to rescue her, Laura finds a handgun on a table in the apartment, goes back into the makeshift dungeon room, and demands that her deceitful lover hand her the keys to the apartment so that she can escape. Ultimately, while acting like he is going to hand her the keys, Rico manages to drive his foot into Laura's neck while he is still handcuffed to the bed. At this point, Laura attempts to shoot Rico but the gun still has the safety on and does not fire and her beau mocks her while choking her by stating, "Safety catch, stupid bitch."

While Rico manages to get free, he becomes convinced that he has killed Laura after failing to resuscitate her after driving his feet into her throat to the point where she loses consciousness and he breaks down as a result, even barfing in the toilet as a result of shock (of course, he pukes out the bullet shell, so he is forced to swallow it again). When Vic gets back, he reveals to Rico that they are going to do the tradeoff with Laura's father for the ransom money. While Vic manages to revive Laura when she initially fails to wake up, he still has no idea that something is out of the ordinary. After telling Rico to go get their van so that they can prepare to transport the girl to the drop off site, Vic goes to untie Laura and is in quite the surprise when a cellphone falls out of her pocket which reveals that she has called 911. Although initially refusing to tell him where she got the phone, Laura soon spills the beans after Vic smacks her around a good bit and states regarding their mutual lover, "he's going to screw you over." While Laura tells Vic pretty much everything about Rico's plans, the hardened criminal never gives any hint as to how he plans to respond to the situation. Before taking Laura to the drop-off sight, Vic acts somewhat passive-aggressively with Rico and then somewhat ironically says to him, "Goddammit, man. What would I do without you?" and gives him a loving hug. Of course, when Vic tells him he loves him, Rico replies, "Yeah. I love you more."

After dropping off Laura at a dark half-ruined abandoned factory in the middle of nowhere where they handcuff her to a pipe, Vic takes Rico to a wooded region where the ransom money has been supposedly placed. When Vic has Rico look in a hole where the money is supposedly placed, he discovers nothing inside and complains "We've been screwed over," but his comrade replies, "We haven't been screwed over. I've been screwed over. By you." Of course, at this point, Rico realizes that Vic has figured him out and begins pleading for his life like a little bitch by trying to prey on his comrade's love for him by stating while sobbing, "Vic... remember at first in jail? I was scared. I was so scared, but you protected me. You, Vic. Vic, please. Believe me, you're the only one. The only one for me." As it turns out, Vic and Rico met and became gay lovers in prison, though it seems the latter adopted homosexuality as a form of 'protection.' Of course, the fact that Vic protected Rico in prison makes his betrayal all the more despicable. While Vic is portrayed as a sort of pathological psychopath for most of the film, he breaks down and begins sobbing while attempting to gather enough strength to liquidate his lover. Vic tells Rico regarding the consequences of his betrayal, "You know what you did? You're dead and so is she. I have no choice," adding regarding their dubious romance, "You're tired of her and you're a liar. Everything was fake. Everything. Douchebag. Every kiss, every time." When Vic goes to ask Rico if he ever kissed Laura, the Arab homme fatale manages to push him and run away in the woods. While Rico manages to get away from Vic, he is severely wounded after his comrade manages to shoot him. As for who survives in the end and gets away with the money, I won't give that spoiler away.

Of course, one of the greatest payoffs for the viewer during Reckless is when the two unwitting members of the bizarre love triangle both come to realize that their ostensible lover has another lover of a different gender. In that regard, I would not be surprised if some LGBT-lobotomized film critic goes on to describe the film as 'homophobic' and/or anti-bisexual propaganda just as certain 'sensitive' reviewers absurdly complained regarding Paul Verhoeven's Basic Instinct (1992) when it was first released. While Lürsen's film does not exactly portray homos as the morally superior and infallible perennial victims that the Hebraic cultural-distorters in Hollywood would have you believe they are, it is a rare film that manages to make so-called 'queer' themes accessible to the heterosexual majority, even if it manages to do so in a sort of deceptive way that makes it quite clear that source writer J Blakeson was desperate to make people embrace his sexual proclivities. Make no mistake about it, Reckless is certainly no masterpiece and is fairly mainstream as far as Dutch cinema comes, yet it makes a refreshing change from typical thriller genre twaddle, even if it does not exactly compare to a genre-revamping work like, say, Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Chinese Roulette (1976) in terms of thematic subversion. Surely, Reckless is the sort of thriller that Hollywood might produce if they had more faith in the intelligence of the American filmgoer and were not so concerned with portraying every single fag film character in a putridly positive light. Naturally, Hollywood would also not dare release a film where a brown man of dubious racial origins is portrayed as a considerably craven and despicably deceitful scumbag of the seemingly psychopathic sort who was the personal bitch boy of a white man while he was in prison. Of course, as the various half-caste bastard children in Europe and America certainly reveal, brown bro Rico's romantically treacherous behavior with his white lovers in Reckless is arguably the most realistic and culturally redeeming aspect of the film, hence its innate superiority over Lürsen's The Disappearance of Alice Creed.

GONE THE WAY OF FLESH

Jordan McMillen (2006)

Tagged with more than favorable reviews, I had cemented views that this film was going to be good, If not good, then fun. I don't think i have ever regretted viewing a film so much as this one. Gone the Way of Flesh is a film that has been loved by the likes as Ted V. Mikels, Tom Savini, and Herschell Gordon Lewis. The fact that these horror legends made such classy remarks about such an appalling film is beyond me. Hell, the title doesn't even make any sense. To me, I feel that this film is merely a cover for trying to promote the directors band "The Jason Martinko Revue." A similar play has been used by Brandon Small's hit cartoon Metalocalypse. This marketing ploy might work, but the difference is that Metalocalypse is entertaining, which itself is an understatement. This piece of trash seems to be a carbon copy of a story from Troma's Tales from the Crapper. It's always wise to steal from great source material. A serial killer is killing off rock'n'roll groupies following the director's band. That is the only depth you will find in this film. Regardless for the bland story which is accompanied by a horrible band, the production values of this film is degrading to watch. I'm almost positive the director stole some kid's lunch money and made this film. The director may not "give-a-damn" now, but he sure as shit better start soon, lest I'll have to verbally massacre more of his future projects. Gone the Way of Flesh is an amateur perverts delight on film. This is not material for any single person to enjoy. With many horror directors in this generation, controversy is a simple tool for success. Gone the Way of Flesh is very excited to announce that JewTube banned their trailer. The very fact that people support low-brow exploitation films is why they are becoming more diluted. Quality is a very rare occurrence in modern "trash" Expect this foul project to be released on Troma video soon. As always, the "Tromatic" special features including the Radiation March will prove to be better than the Feature Presentation. Perhaps Mystery Science Theater 3000 should make a comeback slandering this film. Most likely not, but then again, there's always Rifftrax.

HOT LOVE
HOT LOVE

Jörg Buttgereit (1985)

Assuredly, when it comes to the pre-Nekromantik short films of Teutonic enfant terrible Jörg Buttgereit, his lurid and less than 30-minute-long featurette Hot Love (1985) – a softcore punk rock splatter flick shot on Super 8 with a soothing melodic score and pseudo-melodramatic romanticism – is his best and still fresh amateur effort. Starring and featuring a musical score by Daktari Lorenz, who also provided the same artistic services for Buttgereit's subsequent film and first feature Nekromantik (1987), Hot Love is a proportionately pleasant prototype for the sort of psychosexual arthouse gore-comedies that would earn the bodacious blond beast director the marginal yet loyal underground cult following he has today, thereupon making the film mandatory viewing for fanatical fans of corpse fucking art. More than anything, Hot Love – like Anger's Fireworks (1947), Pasolini's Accattone (1961), Morrissey's Flesh (1968), Waters' Mondo Trasho (1969), Fassbinder's Love is Colder than Death (1969), Cronenberg's Shivers (1975), Solondz's Fear, Anxiety & Depression (1989), and Noé's Carne (1991), is an important formative work that acted as an artistic bridge for the Berlin filmmaker, who went from being a budding 'work-in-progress' filmic artist as exemplified in amateur shorts like Captain Berlin (1982) and Blutige Exzesse im Führerbunker (1984) to an auteur with a distinguishable aesthetic signature as exhibited in his mature feature works Der Todesking (1990) and Nekromantik 2 (1991). While it has been nearly two decades since Buttgereit directed his last serious arthouse horror flick Schramm (1994), the filmmaker has gone on to direct live stageplays (one of which – Captain Berlin Versus Hitler (2009) – was shot on digital video and released on DVD) and documentaries on Japanese monster movies (in 2009, he created Monsterland for the French-German TV channel Arte), and a writer of stage and radio plays (Green Frankenstein + Sexmonster) and horror film criticism, yet all of these obsessions and talents were already perceptible in Hot Love. As a sort of "poor man's Schlingensief" who is aware of culture trends and genre conventions but sort of a ham when it comes to politics, Buttgereit is indubitably a fiendish yet funny renaissance man of sorts and Hot Love is a fine, if less than fine-tuned, example of the sort of honed horror he does best.

Aside from the majority of the cinematography and some piddly special-effects, Jörg Buttgereit claims he is responsible for every aspect of the filmmaking process regarding Hot Love, including playing one of the lead characters. That being said, the story of Hot Love is simple yet effective enough, as the film was in part inspired by Buttgereit's own experience with heartbreak, albeit of the less bloody and brutal sort. Hot Love centers around puny punk protagonist (Daktari Lorenz) who falls madly in love with a girl named Marion (Marion Koob) after meeting her by chance at a alcohol-fueled party. Daktari – a rather homely homeboy whose room is a proletarian punk rock pigsty – experiences unfathomable bliss, but particularly precarious problems arise when Marion finds a new boyfriend – a tall, blond, and handsome bully (played by Buttgereit himself) – who brutalizes both the lovestruck loser’s body and heart. Stricken with a jumbo Judas Kiss from his fleeting flame, Daktari naturally develops acute animosity, overwhelming heartsickness, and a profoundly penetrating and all-consuming lust for revenge that compels him to literally take the heart he was symbolically given by Marion. After Daktari barbarically batters and rapes Marion after stalking her one fine day in the woods, he commits suicide in a final desperate attempt to reach eternal solace, yet unbeknownst to the renegade Romeo, he has impregnated his defiled darling with his sinister seed, thereupon creating a sort of Frankenstein of the flesh that is ripened with rancor.

Needless to say, German film has come a long way since ill-fated love stories of Veit Harlan’s melodramatic National Socialist propaganda film Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß and the darkly romantic arthouse flick Opfergang (1944). In traditional German films, including Harlan’s, it was always the female that was sacrificed in the name of love and the male protagonist was always honorable, handsome, and heroic, yet Buttgereit turns these film conventions upside down in a fiercely facetious yet seemingly and unconsciously ethno-masochistic manner. What I have always found especially interesting about the films of Jörg Buttgereit – and Hot Love is certainly no exception to this rule – is that despite being a handsome, archetypical Aryan Übermensch of sorts himself, the Berlin-born auteur always casts especially physically loathsome and patently pathetic actors for the protagonists of his films as if he is ‘rooting for the underdog’ untermensch of the distinctly American, Hebraic Hollywood persuasion. Of course, the dark horses of his delightfully demented films are always doomed to a downright deplorable fate, but Buttgereit clearly empathizes with these curious characters all the same. In a tradition more in tune with Judaic Tinseltown films like The Graduate (1967), National Lampoon’s Animal House (1978), Revenge of the Nerds (1984), and American Pie (1999), the ‘hero’ of Buttgereit’s Hot Love – like Nekromantik (1987) and Nekromantik 2 (1991) – is not a conquering athletic and aristocratic winner, but a reasonably revolting deadbeat of the most irritatingly impotent kind. That being said, although Hot Love has a determinedly Germanic feel to it, it could not have been made with the crucial influence of classic Hollywood and Japanese B-monster movies, as well as the sort of slave-morality-driven dramas and comedies that have dominated Hollywood for some time now, but I guess that is what one should expect from a nation that is not exactly best known in the international film world for its slasher killers and fart jokes.

With its grainy and sometimes scratched Super 8 footage, intentionally and unintentionally laughable acting, stylized but sometimes sterile direction, and sometimes realistic (i.e. a genuine cow heart) but oftentimes strikingly synthetic

(i.e. a plastic vagina) special effects, Hot Love – much like his subsequent work Nekromantik – is a merry yet macabre cinematic miscreation of the idiosyncratic kraut quasi-arthouse horror-comedy sort and for that reason alone, it will remain a minor classic in my mind. Similar to Kenneth Anger with Scorpio Rising (1964) and Clu Gulager with A Day with the Boys (1969), Buttgerit wasted no time telling a compelling and aesthetically titillating story in under 30 minutes with his first notable work Hot Love, which is no small accomplishment considering the lack of production values for the work. In our increasingly turbulent times where true romance has gone rancid and eroticism in movies is more akin to watching a live hysterectomy on television than oxytocin-driven emotions, Hot Love offers a humorous, if less than sensually heated, portrayal of Aryan amorousness run amok. Hot Love may not be Fassbinder's I Only Want You to Love Me (1976), but it does remind us that even the dreaded Hun can be somber, if spiteful and swinish, slave of love.

NEKROMANTIK

Jörg Buttgereit (1987)

With the death of Rainer Werner Fassbinder—the virtual heart of German New Cinema—Teutonic film essentially became kaput and the kraut celluloid corpse has yet to be revived ever since, at least artistically speaking, so it is only fitting that Berlin-based sub-underground auteur Jörg Buttgereit (Der Todesking, Schramm) made a no-budget film about necrophilia that managed to create a marvelously misbegotten marriage between arthouse and splatter cinema. Indeed, I would argue that despite its next to non-existent budget and sometimes amateurish direction, NEKROMANTIK (1987) is one of the most important German films of the post-Fassbinder era as a work that is not only distinctly Teutonic in its gorgeously grotesque and perversely poetic essence, but is also more symbolic of the contemporary German psyche than any film ever directed by the likes of bourgeois kraut leftist filmmakers like Volker Schlöndorff, Margarethe von Trotta, or Alexander Kluge, which at least partially has to do with the fact that Buttgereit is essentially an apolitical filmmaker who has more interest in entertaining Lucio Fulci fans than appealing to prissy and pedantic Frankfurt school schooled film critics. Rather bizarrely (or not if you consider how the general German populous originally received most films of German New Cinema), Nekromantik was not even a hit among German horror fiends, or as Buttgereit revealed in an interview with David Kerekes, “When Nekromantik was first released nobody seemed to like it. In Germany all these horror guys, these horror fans, said ‘Oh, it’s boring and much too arty’, Then they read the critics from England and America and suddenly they take it seriously. If you show an American film in Germany the audience call it a great film; if you have a German film shown in Germany then it’s not so interesting, unless you’re dead like Fassbinder, then it’s okay.” It is only a guess on my part, but I can only assume that Nekromantik was initially poorly received by German audiences because the film hit far too close to home in its daring depiction of a degenerate German couple who not only worship death, but fuck a rather foul corpse that looks it could have been taken from the ruins of Dresden after the Allied powers firebombed into oblivion during the Second World War. Directed by an archetypal blond beast with a Hallstatt Nordic profile, Buttgereit is a virtual posterboy for the Schutzstaffel, which only adds to the unflattering affect a film like Nekromantik might have on more ethno-masochistic Germans. Probably the only rightful cinematic heir to German expressionist poet Gottfried Benn, as well as Satanic National Socialist Renaissance man Hanns Heinz Ewers, Buttgereit demonstrated with Nekromantik that the “Haunted Screen” (as German Jewish film critic Lotte H. Eisner once called it) did not die when Uncle Adolf came to town, but merely went underground and became all more strikingly unhinged, venomously visceral, and decidedly deranged because of it.

NEKROMANTIK

Banned still outright to this day in diverse countries including Iceland, Norway, Malaysia, Singapore, and the provinces of Nova Scotia and Ontario in Canada, Nekromantik is a film that ultimately manages to find singular beauty in the most savage and sickening of human behavior.

Robert Schmadtke (played by Daktari Lorenz, who was also responsible for scoring most of the soundtrack) is a born loser with a superlatively scrawny physique, but at least he has a quasi-beauteous girlfriend named Betty (Beatrice Manowski, who also appeared briefly as a prostitute in Wim Wenders' Wings of Desire (1987) of all movies) who shares his fiendish fetishism for serial killers, gore, and aberrant apartment decorating. Rob works for a company that sounds like it was named by a stupid American, JSA ('Joe's Cleaning Agency'), which is responsible for, among other things, collecting human roadkill and other corpses from public places. Sometimes Rob likes to surprise his girlfriend by bringing home postmortem souvenirs from work, including human eyeballs, which makes his rather lecherous lady friend's panties wet. Ever since Rob witnessed the brutal slaughtering and skinning of his cute pet bunny rabbit by his Heimat-esque Teutonic redneck father as a child, he has had a rather warped mind and routinely daydreams about performing autopsies on corpses, among other unsavory things. One day after picking up a rather rotten male corpse with his cleanup crew comrades at JSA, Rob has what proves to be a truly life-changing idea and decides to bring back the badly decomposed body home to his girlfriend Betty as a romantic gift. Needless to say, a majorly macabre ménage à trios begins between Rob, Betty, and the tall, dark, and handsome dead dude that would give Georges Bataille a hard-on. Since the corpse's cock has been castrated by nature via decomposition, Rob cuts off the end of a broom handle to use as a pseudo-member for the dead fuck and Betty proceeds to ride it with grotesque glee, but not before putting a condom on it so as to avoid pesky splinters. Having bisexual coitus with a corpse that does not complain in the charming company of his cute girlfriend, Rob's meta-risqué romantic relationship with body-buggering bitch Betty only grows stronger, but like all living things, all good things must come to an end.

Unfortunately, as his shabby appearance indicates, Rob is a major fuck-up and due to compliments at work from his comrades regarding his unsanitary work habits and incessant tardiness, the hapless necro is fired from his job. Meanwhile, Betty's begins to develop a deep and deadly serious bond with the corpse, even going so far as reading it lurid love stories. After coming home and telling his beloved he has lost his job, Rob is verbally reamed into oblivion by Betty in a manner no self-respecting man would tolerate. Later, Rob buys a kitty cat and brings it back home to Betty as a reconciliation gift, but she has already left him for the corpse and has taken the hunky piece of rotten flesh with her. Naturally quite hurt and angered, Rob beats the kitty cat to death and pseudo-erotically bathes in its tiny entrails. Belittled at a movie theater by fellow audience members, Rob acts little a little girl and makes a pitiful attempt at suicide by taking a curious cocktail of whiskey and pills, but instead of dying he has a fantastic dream about emerging from a black plastic trashcan bag (!) as a partially decayed corpse and is given the gift of a rotten human head in a box by a beautiful blond babe and the two proceed to play a blissful game of catch with human guts. After surviving his patently pathetic attempt at self-slaughter, Rob becomes a stronger man because of it and becomes determined to get over Betty, so he picks up a bitchy prostitute and brings her to a graveyard so they can fornicate romantically amongst the dead. Rather tellingly, Rob is unable to 'rise to the occasion' for a living woman and the sleazy streetwalker belittles him for this, so he strangles her to death and busts a load in the slag corpse's still warm cunt. Unfortunately, Rob makes the mistake of sleeping with the postmortem hooker in the graveyard that night, so when he wakes up he is less than warmly greeted by an elderly farmer. Rather uninterested in dealing with a petty nuisance like the police, Rob dismembers the old fart with a shovel and goes on his merry way. Tired of life and lacking the capacity to deal with heartbreak, Rob kills himself by stabbing himself in the stomach, which gives him the ultimate sexual kick and causes him to sexually climax in what is literally and figuratively one of the most singularly climatic scenes in the history of horror cinema. In a more than fittingly ironic twist, Nekromantik concludes with a young woman digging at the ground of Rob's gravestone, thus setting the stage for the equally great and grotesque sequel NEKRomantik 2 (1991).

Undoubtedly, during my life, there have only been a handful of films that changed the way I looked at the art of cinema and Nekromantik is certainly one of them as it managed to combine two of my favorite, yet typically seemingly discordant, cinematic obsessions—extreme horror and arthouse—while also being pretty damn darkly hilarious yet beautiful at the same time. Rather unfortunately, by the time I discovered the cinematic oeuvre of Jörg Buttgerit about a decade ago, he had already quit filmmaking. After recently receiving a DVD featuring three of Buttgerit's satirical horror stageplays, Monsters of Arthouse (2013), it only made me wish all the more that he would once again become serious about making filmmaking. Luckily, Buttgerit is currently attached as one of three directors for the upcoming horror anthology German Angst. As someone who was essentially born a horror fan, I can say without reservation that no other national style of horror cinema has had a deeper impact on me than that of the Germans. Recently, Buttgerit has been 'upstaged' in terms of the cinematically unhinged by a pseudonymous German auteur named Marian Dora (Cannibal, Melancholie der Engel aka The Angels' Melancholy, Reise Nach Agatis) who, on top of being obsessed with real animal killings and unsimulated scat, has no interest in the biting irony typical of films like Nekromantik. Of course, like Dora, Buttgerit's works, although humorous, demonstrate a certain apocalyptic and foreboding death-drive in the post-Auschwitz Teutonic Volksgeist.

NEKROMANTIK

Indeed, Nekromantik is the sort of ‘celluloid holocaust’ that would make Spielberg and other hysterical Hebraic Teutophobes in Hollywood piss their pants in fear. In its delightfully deranged depiction of krauts copulating with corpses, Nekromantik presents a sort of unintentional allegory for the ‘Todestrieb’ that has overtaken the German collective unconscious after two singularly deleterious World Wars and the deracination of Teutonic kultur via American occupation. As Buttgerit anti-lovingly depicted in his short Mein Papi (1982)—a work that makes a mockery of the director’s father’s slow but steady physical and mental degeneration and inevitable pathetic death—there is a generational self-hatred among Germans that has only grown since 1945. As anti-völkisch yet paradoxically distinctly German as horror films get, Nekromantik is ultimately a work that brought new meaning to the old school National Socialist phrase “Blut und Boden” (Blood and Soil) in a film where corpses are unearthed and dead flesh is the most devastatingly delectable. Indeed, when it comes to true artsploitation and celluloid necrophilia, you will not find two finer films than Nekromantik and Nekromantik 2.

DER TODESKING

Jörg Buttgerreit (1990)

Jörg Buttgerreit's Der Todesking is the German director's most ambitious film. It has no plot or central characters. Der Todesking is a compilation of suicide scenarios taking place during seven different days of the week. Buttgerreit was especially thoughtful when creating this masterwork of macabre. He brings real horror to the screen. I look at Der Todesking as the repressed psyche of a post World War II German. The first thing the average American thinks when they hear the words "German" or "Germany" is Nazi. American public schools and hateful media sources scream anti-German propaganda endlessly. They preach of "tolerance" yet single out groups as "evil" and "unprogressive." These propaganda institutions look at different people as collectives. They promote "individualism" yet practice collectivist thought. German victims of Bolshevism Der Todesking can be looked at as all the built up guilt and blame placed on Germans generations after World War II atrocities took place. No one ever speaks of the 2 million ethnic Germans murdered throughout Eastern Europe by Stalin and his Bolshevik thugs, America and England's (England was the first to start this, not Germany) terror bombing of German cities with intent of killing women and children (Dresden for example), Dwight D. Eisenhower's killing of up to 1.7 million German POWS in Death Camps, and countless other atrocities. Contemporary academia and historians can only see in black and white. No one was able to stop Jörg Buttgerreit from making a joke about these historical perversions. On the Tuesday segment of Der Todesking a German rents a Nazi exploitation VHS tape obviously modeled after Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS. The video features a SS women (women weren't even allowed to become "official" SS) cutting off the penis of a man (played by Buttgerreit). This scene makes a mockery of the childish obsession with fairy tales surrounding concentration camp events. Tales of human soap, skin lamps, and other ridiculous propaganda have been long discredited. Steven Spielberg would put a price on Buttgerreit's head if he saw Der Todesking. The Tuesday segment is the only slightly comedic part of Der Todesking. The other segments focus on real pain and suffering. The Thursday segment shows various shots on a German motorway bridge. Throughout this segment various names are superimposed of people who committed suicide by jumping off this bridge. All people listed were from actual suicides. The most disturbing suicide comes on the final segment Sunday. A young man laying on a mattress is losing his mind. He is crying and screaming while repeatedly banging his head against a wall (quite pathetically). The man looks like he could have been found in a concentration camp. This scene is both the most brutal and effective. Buttgerreit utilizes some of his signature camera techniques creating a distorted perspective forcing the spectator to become part of the deranged fun. Throughout Der Todesking a body decomposes as the film progresses from day to day. The body starts naked and fresh. Effective stop motion animation shows the body being eaten by maggots and eventually turning to a mess of bones. Jörg Buttgerit's films have always had believable dead bodies and artistic special effects. I get annoyed when I hear people obsessing over cokeheads like Tom Savini. His special effects could have been created by anyone. They lack any sort of artistry. His remake of Night of the Living Dead was a mockery of the original and a confirmation to his lack of creative capabilities. Gregory Nicotero is a much better mainstream horror special effects man. Jörg Buttgerit is not a director that is accessible to the average horror fan. I can assume that most Rob Zombie fans would become hopelessly bored by Buttgerit's small film lexicon. Zombie is a director focused on being reflexive of horror film history. He is a postmodernist and lacks any type of originality. Buttgerit is an auteur director that has established his own one man film movement. Buttgerit's films invoke emotions and beauty that are wasted on those that prefer cheap thrills (which I enjoy in their own right). All aspiring filmmakers should forget George A. Romero and study Jörg Buttgerit. The horror genre needs more artists and less artisans.

Jörg Buttgerleit (1991)

As far as great film sequels go, few can compare to the technical and aesthetic innovation of Jörg Buttgerleit's bizarre anti-love triangle NEKROMantik 2 (1991) aka NEKROMantik 2 - Return of the Loving Dead. While the original Nekromantik (1987) film is a masterpiece in its own right, aberrant Aryan auteur Buttgerleit was still 'a-work-in-progress' as a filmmaker as far as his craft and peculiar Weltanschauung was concerned when he directed the film. Had it not been for Buttgerleit's sicko campy humor, it is somewhat questionable as to whether or not Nekromantik would have the loyal cult following it has today. After reading various negative reviews of Nekromantik 2, one can only come to the conclusion that most people who loathe the film are repelled by its artistic seriousness, slick direction, and lack of cheap schlock. In contrast to the original film, Nekromantik 2 is an aesthetically and thematically refined work that has more in common with German New Wave arthouse cinema than what one would typically expect from a horror film about a Nordic beauty sharing vital bodily fluids with a notably decrepit and aesthetically-displeasing cold cadaver. Nekromantik 2 essentially begins where the first film left off, with the corpse of scrawny and swarthy untermensch Rob Schmadtke (anti-hero of Nekromantik). Rob may have had problems with the fairer sex when he was living, but as an inanimate carrion, he is quite the passive lady's man. During the beginning of Nekromantik 2, Rob's green gelatin-coated corpse is most lovingly exhumed and brought home by necrophiliac-nymphomaniac Monika (played by Monika M). Tall and slender, but blessed with more than ample breasts and a delightful derrière, Miss Monika is the virtual Venus de Milo of corpse-fuckers. Not long after finding the lifeless love of her life, Monika reluctantly begins a seemingly conventional (but barely romantic) one-sided relationship with a less than handsome fellow named Mark (played by Brit Mark Reeder) who has a terribly frail frame and bad teeth but is well meaning and genuine in his desire for reciprocal love. Although he does not know it, Mark is on the losing side of a battle with a corpse for the women of his dreams. Throughout Nekromantik 2, it is more than apparent that Monika prefers the increasingly rancid and rotting body of Rob to the chivalrous geek charm of hopeless romantic Mark, thus leading to an inevitable, but totally unpredictable, wet climax that more than rivals that of the original Nekromantik film.

Until about a week ago, it had been a couple years since I peered my (soon hypnotized) eyes at Nekromantik 2. Like all of my favorite films, Nekromantik 2 has proven to be a more personal and artistically potent work with each subsequent viewing. While the ultimate anti-romance flick, Nekromantik 2 is also an eclectic aesthetic event that features a beauteous buffet of bawdy blasphemy and classy elegance for the eyes and ears. Of course, such seemingly unbecoming beauty has proven to be too anti-climatic for certain pedigree of quasi-psychopathic and philistine gorehounds, but that is undoubtedly part of the film's distinct charm. Jörg Buttgerit has openly admitted to his conscious intention of utilizing humorless artistic pretension as an act of subversion during the production of Nekromantik 2. After noticing a barrage of horror film critics using Louis Malle's conversation-based film My Dinner with Andre (1981) as a redundant guideline for discerning cinematic banality, Buttgerit took it upon himself to actually watch the film, which, to his surprise, he actually ended up thoroughly enjoying. In tribute to the film horror fiends love to hate, Buttgerit created a mock remake of My Dinner with Andre (as a film-within-a-film) that the characters Mark and Monika go to see upon first meeting each other in Nekromantik 2. In Buttgerit's micro-version of Malle's film, two exceedingly ugly and swarthy krauts – a hyper-intellectual mini-mensch with an unhealthy bird fetish and a mostly mute broodingnagian Fräulein – dine on a variety of exotic eggs at an apocalyptic setting in a most absurd yet frolicsome manner. Nekromantik 2 also features a variety of segments that will leave most artistically-disinterested viewers hopelessly confounded, such as a salamander falling off a coffin in slow-motion and extended scenes of Mark and Monika romping around a scenic amusement park in a strangely wholesome fashion. Of course, such so-lacing scenes are in stark contrast to images of Monika dismembering Rob's corpse and authentic stock footage of baby seals being slaughtered. In terms of theme, Buttgerit has also described Nekromantik 2 as a pseudo-sequel of sorts to his lurid and bestial pre-Nekromantik romance short Hot Love (1985). Like its predecessors (both Hot Love and Nekromantik), Nekromantik 2 features an inordinately complimentary soundtrack that further accentuates the antithetical poetry that is Teutonic corpse fucking art. Featuring musical compositions from Hermann Kopp, Daktari Lorenz (who played Rob in the original film), John Boy Walton, and Peter Kowalski, the Nekromantik 2 soundtrack is indubitably a work of art in itself. Beyond question, the greatest marriage of sound and image featured in the film is a marvelously macabre dream-sequence of Monika M. singing the French-language song "Scelette Delicieux" as a skull orbits majestically in the background. This celestially phantasmagorical scene also features a pianist whose traditional appearance resembles that of the great classical composers that make up Germany's unparalleled musical legacy. This scene is just one of the many imperative parts make up the decadent cinematic body that is Nekromantik 2.

In tribute to Leilah Wendell, very possibly America's most infamous female necrophiliac, Nekromantik 2 features a reproduction painting created by the real-life corpse-fucker during a scene of avant-garde corpse-fucking. Although slightly annoyed by Buttgerit's unofficial use of her art, Wendell apparently loved the film, thus Nekromantik 2 has the grand distinction of coming necrophile-approved. Wendell also agreed to act as a 'creative consult' for Nekromantik 3; a still unmade film that has lingered in pre-production for over 20 years. Although Buttgereit and his co-writer Franz Rodenkirchen wrote a script for Nekromantik 3 long ago, the Nekromantik director has continuously acknowledged that he has no intention of making a third film unless he obtains independent funds to do so. In spite of having directed a number of documentaries (Monsterland, Video Našty), TV series episodes (Lexx, Into the Night With...), and a video stage-play (Captain Berlin Versus Hitler) over the years, it has been nearly twenty years since the Buttgereit directed his last arthouse splatter flick Schramm (1994). Needless to say, it would be an artistic tragedy of sorts if the now middle-aged and married filmmaker failed to complete the Nekromantik trilogy, but I remain quite skeptical about the prospect of its actual production. Even if Buttgereit were to never direct a third Nekromantik film, I am still more than content with both of the previous films for quite different reasons. While Nekromantik offers deranged laughs and the seemingly nefarious novelty of crude corpse-fucking, Nekromantik 2 offers a brutal yet strangely beautiful look at romance in an increasingly decaying, neurotic, and intrinsically ethno-masochistic Occidental world. An academic film critic once offered the dubious and predictably politically-correct theory that the corpse-lust in the Nekromantik films acts as a subconscious metaphor for the generational burden modern Germans hold due to their ancestor's legacy of murder during the Second World War. Personally, I see the corpse-fucking as symbolic of Germany's (and the rest of Europe's) inherited fatalistic self-loathing and population decline as a result of the all-encompassing devastation brought about during two very fratricidal World Wars. This suicidal and inorganic post-WW2 phenomenon of ancestor-hatred can be clearly seen in Buttgereit's documentary short Mein Papa (1982); a sadistically cynical (yet admittedly humorous) Daddy-denigrating home-video document of the German filmmaker's father's progressive degeneration leading up to his pathetic death. In regard to German Conservative Revolutionary Ernst von Salomon's post-WW2 book Der Fragebogen (1951), celebrated (yet once discredited for 'authenticating' forged Hitler diaries) British historian H. R. Trevor-Roper snidely described the German mind as a, "dark, sinister, skeleton-laden cupboard." Despite the blatant seething hatred embedded within Trevor-Roper's venomous remark, there is much truth in his statement, at least in regard to German art, as expressed quite vividly in everything the Grimms' Fairy Tales to the mystical artistic works of symbolist painter Franz von Stuck to the films of Jörg Buttgereit. In spite of appearances and opinions to the contrary, the films of Jörg Buttgereit follow in a rich and ancient tradition of Germanic art, although being of the exceedingly and profoundly decadent pre-apocalyptic post-nationalist sort. I don't see it as an exaggeration to state that Nekromantik 2 is an expression of an artist at the height of their artistic prowess and precision.

Jörg Buttgereit (1993)

Before Christopher Nolan ever directed Memento, German auteur Jorg Buttgereit utilized the reverse chronological technique in his masterpiece Schramm. Unlike Memento, Schramm is not a film revered by cliché college film students. Instead, Schramm is a treat for those looking for artistically merited murder, sadomasochism, and sexual deviance. Not many directors are able to treat the subject in a way that Buttgereit has.

Many have criticized Schramm for its lack of murders and body count. I found this argument irrelevant as the film main focus is the day to day life of Schramm. We see the obsessions of this killer and how they build up to his actual killings. Schramm is obsessed with masturbation and penis mutilation. He is unable to participate in normal sexual acts so he prefers to satisfy himself after his victims are either dead or drugged.

Schramm captures a similar isolationist feel as Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver. In both films the protagonist seems even more alone while in the company of others than by themselves. Their obsession with women are also very unsettling as they seem to have no clue on how to function with those of the opposite sex. Their sex comes out in their violence. Every kill is a sexual climax.

Both protagonists in the films also have a fear of sexual encounters. This becomes blatantly obvious in Schramm's delusion of a vagina monster with teeth. He has a schizophrenic form of castration anxiety. In reality, Schramm is figuratively castrated in his inability to use his phallic in a pure way. Whether he is driving a nail through his foreskin or having sex with a blow-up doll, Schramm lacks a real sexual encounter.

Like Buttgereit's other films, Schramm's musical score perfectly compliments the film. When we see Schramm doing sit-ups, the intensity of the music allows us a peek into his twisted mind. In each dream sequence, beautiful music is played. Buttgereit is obviously not afraid to experiment with several different emotions.

Schramm is a film that combines dream sequences, flashbacks, and surrealism to create the ultimate collage of a serial killer's mind. As the viewer, you are expected to join in the film as being part of the experience. Schramm shows you his world and you just have to watch. Some may have a hard time just doing that. In the end you may even feel enlightened.

CAPTAIN BERLIN VERSUS HITLER

Jörg Buttgercit (2009)

(C) Jörg Buttgercit Proto-Nazi völkisch writer Arthur Moeller van den Bruck believed that Germany had the right to take over lands of alien races due to their superior kultur and völk- as the Teutons could only bring progress to these inferior nations. After the devastating defeat of Germany in two World Wars - völkisch theories like Moeller's were pretty much universally discredited throughout the Occidental world - at least in regard to military prowess and in a relativist humanistic sense. Of course, the allies had no problem stealing defeated German's technological inventions - for Germany was easily the most scientifically advanced nation at that time. Ever since the end of World War II and the split of Germany into two separate states (which were only considered "secondary" nations as far as power goes) - as predicted by Oswald Spengler - organic German kultur has been on the steady decline (despite the end of the Berlin wall). Of course, Germany is still one of the greatest industrial producers (despite being de-industrialized by the allies after the second World War) in the world, yet the country is nowhere near as innovative as it was during the first half of the twentieth century. For example, Germany has yet to produce an artistically innovative filmmaker greater than F.W. Murnau nor has the country produced a filmmaker more technically innovative as Nazi state-funded auteur Leni Riefenstahl. F.W. Murnau would later work in Hollywood and direct his masterpiece Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans, but still utilizing a virtually all German film crew, and later Hollywood blockbuster filmmakers would steal Riefenstahl's groundbreaking Teutonic cinematic techniques - producing big budget artificially-stylized cinematic dribble. One of the reasons why I like German necro-auteur Jörg Buttgercit so much is because of the distinctly German quality of his original five feature-length films: Hot Love, Nekromantik, Der Todesking, Nekromantik II: Return of the Loving Dead, and Schramm. After a 16 year absence from feature-length filmmaking, Buttgercit eventually released Captain Berlin Versus Hitler (2009) - a film shot over the course of 3 days in a Berlin theater. Unlike Buttgercit's previous feature-length films, Captain Berlin Versus Hitler was shot on digital video during a live stage play. Also, unlike Buttgercit's previous efforts, Captain Berlin Versus Hitler is highly reflective of the Americanization of German culture.

(C) Jörg Buttgercit

The most glaring aspect of Captain Berlin Versus Hitler that reflects the post-World War II influence of America on German culture is the film's superhero protagonist Captain Berlin. It is no secret that most of the early comic book innovators in America were of the Jewish persuasion. In fact, America's most popular superhero - Superman - was created by Zionist Jews Jerry Siegel and Joe Schuster. Ironically, Superman (who was originally supposed to be "evil") - like Nazi philosopher Alfred Rosenberg and his völkisch theories - was inspired by the übermenschlich philosophies of Teuton philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche. Of course, Buttgerit's Captain Berlin is Germany's answer to Superman (with characteristics of Captain America thrown in for good measure). Also taking influence from America - the Dracula vampire featured in Captain Berlin Versus Hitler resembles the iconic Universal Pictures Dracula played by Bela Lugosi and not that rat-like vampire Count Orlok featured in German auteur F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922). Last but not least, Captain Berlin Versus Hitler is mostly a parodic comedy - certainly a traditional trade of Jewry but not so much a common characteristic of conventional German artistry. During his childhood, Buttgerit's Grandmother bought him Creature Feature bubblegum cards, thus sparking the horror movie obsession that would eventually erupt into an artistically successful "Art House Horror" filmmaking career. In 2009, Buttgerit finished his cinematic Frankenstein - Captain Berlin Versus Hitler - the auteur filmmaker's greatest tribute to genre that caused him to develop into the mad-German-scientist-film-director that he is today. Essentially, Captain Berlin Versus Hitler is Buttgerit's answer to Syberberg's Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977) - taking inspiration from an eclectic range of seemingly unrelated works including Mel Brook's The Producers, Universal Monsters (especially Frankenstein and Dracula), The Boys from Brazil, and the director's nostalgic love for American comic books.

(C) Jörg Buttgerit

(C) Jörg Buttgerit

In 1982, Jorg Buttgerit originally introduced his German superhero Captain Berlin in a short of the same name. Over a 1/4 century later, Buttgerit finally realized the feature-length film Captain Berlin Versus Hitler - set in 1973 - where Captain Berlin battles against Adolf Hitler's preserved brain. Isle von Blitzen - a sexy Nazi chic doctor who saved Hitler's brain during the conclusion of World War II - acts as the antagonistic caregiver of Hitler's gray matter. Von Blitzen creates a Frankenstein-type creature named "Germanikus" out of the bodily remains of decomposed SA and SS soldiers - which is designed by the sadistic SShe-wolf as a vessel for Uncle Adolf's brain. To von Blitzen's disgust, she has to hunt down communist vampire Count Dracula in Romania - as his antique blood will animate the Totenkopf-Frankenstein body she has assembled. Despite being a count, Dracula is a true believer in the internationalist cause - a fighter for the proletariat who enjoys sipping on hot Aryan blood. Captain Berlin, who in his normal everyday life works as a leftist yellow journalist, becomes distressed when Isle von Blitzen and Dracula steal his voluptuous Aryan daughter Maria. After Germanikus acts in a typically Frankenstein-esque manner of mental and physical instability, Ms. von Blitzen produces a Krupp steel HITLERROBO body for Adolf's lonely brain. Historically, Krupp steel - a 400-year old German dynasty - became the center for German rearmament after Hitler's rise to power in 1933. In Captain Berlin Versus Hitler, Buttgerreit successfully interweaves horrible historical fact with phantasmagorical science fiction - certainly a grand achievement that will bring happiness to any serious underground cinephile. As one would expect from a film by Buttgerreit, Captain Berlin Versus Hitler features an excellent synthesizer-driven soundtrack that fans of Kraftwerk would certainly admire. From beginning to end, Captain Berlin Versus Hitler is a comedic absurdist ride through the perverse mind of Jörg Buttgerreit and his greatest personal obsessions.

All pics (C) Jörg Buttgerreit

Before the end of World War II - whilst growing up in the Fatherland - German youth looked up to the historical heroes (from Frederick the Great to Goethe) of their past for inspiration. After World War II, any sort of National pride in Germany was mostly considered taboo - as it was usually associated with Nazi Germany and the propaganda that was spouted by that regime. Having no Germanic heroes growing up (one could say, "a father-less fatherland"), Buttgerreit invented the fictional hero Captain Berlin - a German superhero who waged war against Uncle Adolf and gave Germany some lasting integrity by helping to clean-off the infamous legacy of Nazi taint. In Buttgerreit's short Mein Papi - shot between 1981-1995 - the Teutonic auteur belittled his own father - documenting his lifetime of steadily accelerating degeneration - starting out as a handsome young Aryan of Germany and eventually morphing into a typically obese-philistine-couch-potato Yankee-like creature whose personal integrity had worn to nil. Captain Berlin Versus Hitler is undoubtedly Buttgerreit's most escapist film - offering an alternate pseudo-reality where the good Germans defeated Austrian peasant Adolf Hitler and restored Deutschland's posterity from within. Buttgerreit also grew up in the wake of the Baader-Meinhoff terrorist attacks in Germany, thus it is no surprise that he also lampoons the shallow nihilistic idealism of Communism in Captain Berlin Versus Hitler. In the film, Dracula - the most cunning of all monsters - militantly states, "You're corrupted by the ugly face of capitalism" - in a feeble attempt to validate his genocidal monster brand. In the world of Captain Berlin Versus Hitler - both opposing collectivist political ideologies: National Socialism (Nazism) and Communism (Marxism) - the real-life historic monsters that led to Germany's ruin - are the true bogeymen of the film. Dracula and Hitler's brain merely act as entertaining archetypes for these historically disastrous political ideologies.

Peter Synthetik (theme song creator), Claudia Steiger (Dr. Ilse von Blitzen), Jörg Buttgerreit (director)(C) neverhorst.de Although some fans of the Nekromantik films might not appreciate Captain Berlin Versus Hitler, I, for one, was pleasantly surprised by the unconventional work and have now come to the realization that Buttgerreit is an eclectic artist whose talent is marvelously multifaceted - proven by his ability to innovate, gross out, humor, and intrigue the viewer - despite creating only a handful of cinematic offerings during his low-budget filmmaking career. After my first viewing of Captain Berlin Versus Hitler - I knew the film captured the artistic prowess of Buttgereit's earlier works (albeit of a different flavor) - as I already have the impulsive desire to revisit the unconventional cross-genre-gothic-horror-science-fiction-hybrid superhero flick and once again become enthralled by the Germanic artistry that no other artist could successfully duplicate; nor would any other filmmaker have the gall to capture the post-Nazi German zeitgeist Herr Buttgereit has so wickedly, yet lavishly dreamed up. WE ARE WHAT WE ARE

Jorge Michel Grau (2010)

This Mexican cannibal family drama had always clued in coupons of potential value for me. What better way to divert attention towards a soiled family ritual than to film it in the diseased streets of Mexico City? With this in mind, We Are What We Are opens on such a note to allow witness to a mud-complexioned vagrant stumbling about a sterile strip within a mall. Taking only a short amount of time to stare at mannequins with questionable intent, this unknown character begins to slowly crash to the floor, spitting up a toxic black slime in the process (which is never explained). After crawling a few feet, this man eventually passes away and is carried off by mall officials. We Are What We Are's debut scene sparks what is to be the cause & effect device as it glimpses into the life of a cannibalistic family without a pack leader. In addition, you also receive an irritating bumbling police subplot which is the bane of my existence. The opening scene almost resembles foreshadowing. Not the looming presence of capture or possibly death, no, rather, hints towards how esoteric the final product turns out. Not only does We Are What We Are activate my gag reflex in question to picking sides but it also stands as a film that held such dear promise, fleeting moments of brilliance, that it actually pisses me off to the extent of how convoluted the finished piece is.

Undeniably beautiful to look at, We Are What We Are then zeros in on this man's family - an introverted circlejerk of varying hermit clichés and enough insecurities to fuel the subtle incestuous tone throughout. If We Are What We Are accomplishes a single thing, it would be tossing out the need for courtesy and/or professionalism as its sordid roots stem deep in its own belligerence on account of teenage cannibals. Once the family discovers that their father has passed away - word from the sobbing daughter who inexplicably happened to catch wind of gossip - the mother experiences bouts of seclusion and leaves her children to starve. If you were to enter We Are What We Are with no prior knowledge of what you will encounter, the film's cannibal aspect might conceal itself nicely until the shocking realization that they are referring to human flesh. But if this was the case, one would not venture off the beaten path to watch it. Come on, a Mexican family drama? Once the already-existing revelation of dining on "long pigs" is pronounced, We Are What We Are encompasses its family values in a very uncommon manner - the hunting of humans. The plot begins to juggle rude commentary on the steady flow of whores prowling the streets to the fragility of family life and the responsibility of being the "man of the house". One thing I'd like to add is my adoration of younger brother Julian's (Alan Chávez) short temper. In many-a scene do we find the irrationality of his gene pool break through, leaving him beating women and various offenders of his being. Chalk this up in line with the misogynistic genius of Nicolas Cage's performance in The Wicker Man (2006). In related news, actor Alan Chávez was killed in 2009 from what I'd presume to be a gunshot wound following a dispute with both friends and police.

WE ARE WHAT WE ARE

The previous fixation from man to whores doesn't come from sexual gratification of any kind, which throws the reasoning behind the mother's stern rules of never eating whores off balance. In a scene of psychopathy and unwarranted jealousy, the mother acts on impulse and beats a captive whore to death before the children could dine on her flesh. Instead of consumption, the mother instead wraps the dead slut in a sheet and drops her on the street corner in front of shocked escorts and ladyboys. Threatening death to the tramps for making passes at her lovely sons, this scene sets up for a greater thrill in the end. The effectiveness of We Are What We Are stops at about this point. The disconcerted, dysfunctional family turn of expression is exhausted before the credits are given a chance to roll. I admire that makings of a cannibal drama without filthy sensationalism. I am all for new ideas and pathways to reach cinematic goals. For this aspect, We Are What We Are is an enjoyable ride for over an hour. Essentially, the naivety of the children and the mysterious fanaticism of this clan is so high that you'd rather witness the origins of the upbringing of radicalism to the family rather than an aspiring teenage alpha male french kiss a "fag" in a night club in an effort to devour gay meat. In the end, We Are What We Are stands as a reasonably frustrating discourse that is heavy on the melodrama and light on the sauce. There are ample opportunities for redemption that We Are What We Are aimlessly wanders past so for this reason, I cannot pity. Though as it stands, We Are What We Are does seem to have a perfect ending for a film of this caliber. You just have to wade through healthy helpings of tripe to get to it.

MARIKEN VAN NIEUMEGHEN

Jos Stelling (1974)

Forget Ken Russell's alpha-nunsplotation masterpiece The Devils (1971), Michael Armstrong's abortive artsplotation piece Hexen bis aufs Blut gequält (1970) aka Mark of the Devil starring Udo Kier in the preposterous against-type role of a heroic heterosexual, and Paul Verhoeven's entertainingly macabre Late Medieval Period epic Flesh & Blood (1985), Dutch auteur Jos Stelling's darkly decadent and depraved directorial debut Mariken van Nieumeghen (1974) aka Mariken from Nieumeghen is the most brutal, grotesque, and aesthetically merciless work of period-based European 'folk horror' ever made, which is somewhat ironic when one considers that the most obscene and offensive scenes were cut out of the film so as to make it more digestible for polite society. Indeed, based on the popular anonymously authored late medieval Dutch 'miracle play' of the same name that was written in a bawdy 'Burgundian' lumpenprole style, Stelling's first feature was a longtime in the making as a work that the director began planning in 1966 and ultimately spent five years on pre-production and almost another two years shooting as a largely homemade 'labor of love' that was shot on weekends with the help of about three hundred dedicated miserable souls, including bright graduate students, real-life toothless bums and limb-less cripples, morbidly obscene women of the unfortunately exhibitionistic sort, authentic wanton whores from the Red Light District and various other sorts of people. Despite the work being shot on an extremely low-budget (although the average Dutch production was around two million guilders during that time period, the film only cost about 146,000 guilders), Stelling managed to produce seven hours of useable footage that he had a frustrating time editing (the original cut was apparently three hours), so he brought in producer Rob du Mée—a man who had much experience dealing with 'difficult' auteur filmmakers as someone who had previously produced works by Harry Kümel and Adriaan Ditvoorst—for pre-production and the film was edited down to a mere short but deliciously bittersweet 80-minutes, with the more morbid and grotesque moments unfortunately apparently excised from the film. As a production that was comprised of about three hundred or so amateurs who enjoyed drinking on the set, real-life and fiction apparently became indistinguishable during the making of Mariken van Nieumeghen, which is a sort of apocalyptic Dutch medieval bacchanalian celluloid orgy-cum-freakshow of the largely godless sort where Christianity is used as a pretense for misogynistic mass murder, among other things. Notably, Stelling decided to drop the major theme of 'repentance' that is a prominent in the source play and ultimately sired a 'humanist' (in the most wholly negative sense of the word) coming-of-age piece where a blonde virgin becomes a 'woman' in a backwards barbarian-minded hell-on-earth where women are considered disciples of Satan whose seemingly rancid medieval pussies are more or less considered responsible for the plague.

MARIKEN VAN NIEUMEGHEN

Needless to say, Stelling's Mariken van Nieumeghen does not feature a romanticized Hollywoodized view of the Middle Ages, but instead depicts the period as a god awful time when virtually everyone was stinking filthy, murderously superstitious, uncontrollably rape-hungry, and pathologically bawdy. A work apparently guided by the director's motto, "If it's dirty and brown it looks authentic" in regard to realistically depicting the Middle Ages and featuring hissing dwarfs carrying decapitated heads and real half-rotten dead animal corpses being gnawed at by live rats, Mariken from Nieumeghen ultimately contains an unrelentingly brutal and morbidly merry yet nonetheless preternaturally pulchritudinous depiction of one young dumb bleach blonde dame's figurative dance with the devil in disguise.

The plague has completely ravaged the Flemish city of Antwerp, so all women, be they young beautiful virgins or crusty old fat whores, are wrongly blamed and subsequently brought to trial for ostensibly summing the Black Death via devil worship. Hoping to spare her young friend from a very likely premature death involving torture, a middle-aged whore named Berthe van de Saspoort (Diet van Hulst), who believes, "There are worse things than dying," helps blonde virginal protagonist Mariken (played by pedagogy doctorate student Ronnie Montagne, who never acted again after appearing in the film) evade from being captured by an angry gang of men lest she be burned alive for being a supposed slut of Satan. Actually, Mariken is Satan's slut, but she is totally ignorant of that fact as she suffers from the grand delusion that she has found the mensch of her dreams when in reality he is the harbinger of her most nefarious real-life nightmares. Berne is right in her suspicions because, despite being an overweight old hag who could not possibly intrigue the devil with her less than delectable body, she is ultimately accused of "having sold her soul to the devil and thus have brought a curse upon the city" and faces execution, though she rightly blames the plague on a charismatic mono-eyed chap who has physically and spiritually possessed poor maiden Mariken. Before Mariken runs away, Berne warns her to keep away from her suave, sophisticated, and seductive yet equally sinister lover Moenen (played by young physicist Sander Bais who, like female lead Montagne, also never appeared in another film) who seems to have disappeared into thin air. Indeed, Moenen is a one-eyed actor who is really the devil in disguise and he has already taken possession of Mariken's terribly naive soul. After bringing the plague to Antwerp, Moenen leaves Mariken behind to fend for herself.

After narrowly evading an angry mob of archaic misogynists by pretending to be one of the many corpses caused by the bubonic plague in a frightening scenario that ultimately makes the protagonist realize that live humans are more deadly than plague-plagued-bodies, Mariken thinks to herself, "Perhaps the dead are the living...and the living are the dead" and then her life proceeds to flash before her eyes. From there, the film flashes back to a time in Mariken's life just before she met and fell prey to the master of deceit, Moenen. Mariken's story begins with her pastor uncle ordering her to go live with her aunt in the eastern Netherlands city of Nieuwmechelen, but upon arriving there she makes the grave mistake of watching a miracle play performed in the middle of the town and before she knows it, she is soon spotted by mono-eyed monster Moenen, who is onstage playing the ironical role of the devil as indicated by his Baphomet-esque goat mask. When Mariken 'feels' Moenen's menacing metaphysical glance, she is stricken with a feeling of overwhelming fear as if she has just seen the devil (which she has!) and immediately seeks sanctuary at her aunt's house, but when she gets there, she discovers that her beloved relative has mysteriously committed suicide by hanging herself. Naturally, Moenen soon tracks down poor vulnerable Mariken and makes her his sort of Satanic Shieldmaiden after promising to "teach" her things as they make their way to Den Bosch and eventually Antwerp where the crypto-devil will ultimately unleash the plague. Moenen may be a satanically psychopathic liar of sorts, but he ultimately honors his promise to educate Mariken, who is able to survive a literal witch hunt with what she learns regarding human nature. As Mariken will soon discover but initially chooses to ignore, Moenen incites death and destruction wherever he goes while putting on the front of seeming like a mere bystander amongst the chaos, as if he is able to control the collective unconscious of the people with his mere pernicious presence. When Mariken daintily dips her feet in a pond while the two are taking a break from their long journey to Den Bosch, Moenen humors himself by strangling to death a miserly aristocrat and subsequently forcing a pathetic legless cripple with seven children to drown himself. Later on that day upon arriving at a warehouse in Den Bosch, Moenen has Mariken thoroughly washed and cleaned by a group of old women and then dressed in a 'christening gown' so that she is in pristine shape to be deflowered. While riding in a carriage to Antwerp, Moenen scares the hell out of the little lady by singing the following lyrics: "...the virgin, the whore and the wife, laid themselves on him...but they didn't get past his skin, his blood stayed as cold as ice." Indeed, while the devil is always incognito, he is also a braggart and cannot help but hint at his true identity, which absolutely petrifies Mariken, as she wants to pretend he is a sort of super sophisticated dandy that every woman fantasizes being with. Of course, Moenen will eventually put Mariken in precarious situations just for the hell of it after he begins getting bored with her once he defiles her.

Upon arriving at a bar in Antwerp full of bawdy beer-chugging bums, half-witted cripples, sadistic young men, and wayward whores of every stripe, Moenen makes enemies with a gang of four depraved young degenerates that are led by a savage little rascal named 'Tede' who plans to defile lady Mariken the first chance he gets. Instead of Tede and his pals, Moenen is the one that gets to sexually ravage Mariken that night while a group of people from the pub watch voyeuristically in delight. In a sardonic assault against the viewer, Mariken drives a dagger in the eye of a disfigured voyeur in a scene shot from the perception of said disfigured voyeur, thus giving the impression that the filmgoer is being punished for watching the devil fuck. Before Moenen even sticks his jolly member in Mariken's fresh virgin meat-curtain, the group of literally drooling spectators get so horny by what they see that they begin licking walls and fondling one another, so naturally when the devil finally dips his purple-headed love truncheon into his fair lady's virginal grindstone and she screams in agony as her hymen is ripped apart by the Great Beast, the gang of seemingly possessed hobo-like horn-dogs begin defiling one another in a rather violent and sadomasochistic fashion that eventually erupts into a full-blown satanic orgy. In fact, things get so heated that a peeping tom standing on a ladder outside loses his balance while peering through a window due to all the erotic excitement and subsequently falls to his grizzly death onto a pole that impales him and ultimately soaks that street in so much blood that pieces of cloth have to be put down the next morning to soak up the vital fluids.

After being officially deflowered by the devil, it seems as if Mariken has matured by a decade in a single night and she begins physically and mentally resembling a cultivated countess as opposed to the poor peasant girl that she actually is. Upon later encountering Berne, Mariken is warned that she is enslaved by Moenen and that she must escape his wrath before it is too late. Being a seasoned old whore, Berne knows more than most women care to know about men and is quite cognizant of the fact that Moenen is no mere man. When Mariken argues, "I'm strong because of him" and "I love him," Berne retorts, "But your love isn't enough for him." Of course, Berne is right as demonstrated by the fact that once Moenen receives Mariken's complete undying love and devotion, he soon loses interest in her and begins disappearing during the day and during one of these absences, the eponymous protagonist is rudely visited by Tede and his gang of sadistically smirking degenerates, who have one thing on their minds: RAPE! Indeed, while his comrades hold Mariken down on a bed, Tede vaginally pillages her but of course, as the viewer anticipates, Moenen eventually shows up mid-rape and takes his swift and ruthless revenge. Interestingly, instead of deriving satisfaction from personally killing Tede, Moenen's uses his nemesis' comrades to get the job done. Rather fittingly, rape-ravaged Mariken finishes off the job by swinging an axe into her rapist's unclad body in what is ultimately a more deleterious act of forced penetration.

After Tede's comrades dump their friend's body into a swamp to cover up their crimes, the somewhat moronic criminals are approached by Berne, who warns them that they are fools that have been manipulated by the devil himself. Naturally, when rats carrying the bubonic plague begin gnawing at Tede's corpse, the Black Death hits Antwerp and Moenen predictably soon disappears in a manner as abruptly and mysteriously as when he first appeared. Ironically, despite the fact that she is the one that originally warned the villagers about Moenen and his marvelously malevolent nature, Berne is burned at the stake by an angry mindless mob à la Russell's The Devils. Ultimately, the film manages to come full-circle when Mariken awakes in the burial pit where she hid to escape the wrath of the hysterically homicidal mob. As a result of her experiences, Mariken concludes, "The living... Now, I know. It's the living that bury the living. The dead do nothing. Without evil, they sleep in between all the other things that died." In the end, Moenen/The Devil, who has rejoined his band of freakish traveling actor friends, rhetorically asks both Mariken and the viewer, "Did you really think you could go on without me?" Indeed, you cannot have heaven without hell, or good without evil, as Moenen so eloquently demonstrated and Mariken so dreadfully learned.

Somewhat strangely, despite being a low-budget work starring an all-amateur cast and directed by a completely unknown novice filmmaker, Mariken van Nieuweghen is notable for being the very first Dutch film to be invited to compete at the Cannes Film Festival where it competed against big films by well known auteur filmmakers like Werner Herzog's The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser aka Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle, Bob Fosse's Lenny, Martin Scorsese's Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore, Shūji Terayama's Pastoral Hide and Seek aka Den-en ni shisu, and Walerian Borowczyk's The Story of Sin aka Dzieje grzechu, among various others. Not surprisingly considering it was the director's first feature, Mariken van Nieuweghen is indubitably Stelling's most visceral, excess-ridden, fragmented, and rough work to date, which is one of the reasons I enjoyed it so much as it feels like it was almost directed by one of the bloodthirsty peasants that it so unflatteringly depicts. Indeed, while the work sometimes has an ominously oneiric feel about it that is further underscored during fleeting moments of dream-logic-oriented scenarios, Stelling's film is like the closest thing to a Cinéma vérité approach to the Middle Ages as a work where it is obvious that the director wanted the viewer to feel the true grit and steaming piles of human shit that haunted the era. In fact, Stelling was so obsessed with creating a sense of raunchy realism for the film that he forbade the actors from washing their costumes in between days of shooting and even encouraged the amateur performers to not wash themselves for excessive periods of time, not to mention the fact that he actually hired real wanton whores for the sex scenes. Marinated in a sort of post-Calvinist misanthropy and keen cultural cynicism as reflected in the fact that Satan is easily the most likeable person in the entire film and virtually all the humans are nothing more than perennially vulgar eating-and-shitting-machines who are almost as hopelessly intemperate as the truly colorful populations of great contemporary Afro-American cities like Detroit and Baltimore, Mariken van Nieuweghen is most certainly decidedly Dutch in its venomous finger-wagging. Indeed, in Stelling's medieval realm, Satan is a pretty cool guy as a sort of dapperly dressed dandy Odin (after all, he has one eye and all) who merely helps guide people to their foreordained destinations of self-destruction, thus merely speeding up an inevitable process. Additionally,

Satan ultimately fulfills his promise to the eponymous protagonist in regard to teaching her about the mysterious ways of the world, and by the end she comes to the life-changing revelation that it is living people and not rotting corpses that are the most rotten.

In terms of the importance of Mariken van Nieumeghen in the context of all of Dutch cinema history, Dutch film scholar Bas Agterberg probably said it best when he wrote in his article featured in the book The Cinema of the Low Countries (2004) edited by Ernest Mathijs regarding the work: "In short, it is the remarkable debut of a self-educated director, made over a period of seven years, with amateurs as cast and crew, a stunning depiction of the Middle Ages and uniquely financed, Jos Stelling changed Dutch film culture not only by his production method, but also as a film auteur and as founder of the Dutch Film Days." Notably, Stelling's savagely beautiful debut was not the only film he made about the Medieval period as he would go on to direct the morality play adaptation Elkerlyc (1975) aka Everyman, as well as the masterfully eccentric epic De Vliegende Hollander (1995) aka The Flying Dutchman. In fact, Stelling became such a scholar of the Middle Ages that he even began teaching college courses on the subject to earn extra money. If there is anything to be learned from Mariken van Nieumeghen it is, to quote the titillating titular character's uncle, that 'living' is, "A game...Of life and death. It will never let you go. It rips you apart with its invisible claws." In his own special way, Dutch avant-garde Frans Zwartjes demonstrated the same thing with his cynically titled work Living (1971) and pretty much every other work in his oeuvre, as people might not die of the Black Death nowadays, but is slaving away at an office job for forty hours a week for forty years or chemotherapy any better?! After all, at least people in the past could blame their misery on evil and the devil and look forward to the metaphysical insurance policy of an afterlife in the most immaculate and unimaginable of otherworldly paradises. In its post-Calvinist take on good and evil and life and death, Stelling's Mariken van Nieumeghen is completely different than its source play in that it dares to offer no form of solace or chance of redemption in either life or death, though I guess one can argue death can be a relieving escape from life, especially when you're in the middle of being burnt at the stake or suffering agonizing pain while succumbing to the bubonic plague.

THE POINTSMAN

It seems that everyone who has ever watched and wrote about the rather whimsical and somewhat elusive quasi-‘magical realist’ cinematic work De wisselwachter (1986) aka The Pointsman directed by Dutch auteur Jos Stelling (The Illusionist, Het Meisje en de Dood aka The Girl and Death) has a different opinion about what the film is actually about, but I personally found the message of the film to be fairly obvious, though that might just be because I am an unrepentant misogynist who has a low opinion of most of female kind and thus do not have as hard of a time as most males do in terms of spotting the conspiratorial behavior of malevolent women of the ‘penis flytrap’-oriented sort. Directed by a true autodidact who obtained his initial fame from his brutal debut feature Mariken van Nieumeghen (1974)—a more or less ‘homemade’ work based on the popular sixteenth-century Dutch miracle play of the same name that Stelling dedicated five years of pre-production and almost another two years shooting to (in fact, he began planning the film in 1966, so it was a sort of long-in-the-making ‘dream project’)—The Pointsman is a largely dialogue-less work featuring two main quasi-lovers who do not even speak the same language, thus making for a work that some might describe as ‘pure cinema,’ at least in the eccentrically tragicomic Dutch sense. Auteur Stelling notoriously hated Dutch filmmakers who attempted to make films in a Hollywood style and thus reacted accordingly with his gritty and even grotesque debut Mariken van Nieumeghen, which the importance of in the context of the history of filmmaking in the Netherlands was notably described as follows in Elsevier magazine: “...this is a Dutch film not trying gaspingly to follow fashionably foreign trends. A film that (despite its technical imperfection) feels so bog-ore Dutch, that one amazingly wonders what other native filmmakers have been doing up until now.” Of course, distinctly Dutch filmmakers like Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento) and Adriaan Ditvoorst (De blinde Fotograaf aka The Blind Photographer, De Witte waan aka White Madness) existed before the release of Mariken van Nieumeghen, but the works of these uncompromising avant-garde filmmakers were much less accessible to mainstream Dutch audiences, thus Stelling is important in the sense that he proved that indigenous films could be made in the Netherlands that were accessible and popular with natives but might confuse foreign audiences due to their distinctly Dutch persuasions. Luckily, unlike other popular Dutch auteur like Paul Verhoeven and, to a lesser extent, Theo van Gogh (who went from making subversive avant-garde works to dialogue-heavy quasi-chamber pieces), Stelling has more or less stayed true to his totally original yet decidedly Dutch approach to filmmaking and The Pointsman is arguably his greatest and most insanely idiosyncratic cinematic accomplishment, as a sort of darkly mirthful and aesthetically resplendent (anti)romance that puts into question the meaning of love and the impossibility of both genders ever living in complete harmony. A sort of tragicomic parable about how it only takes one beautiful broad to effortlessly, albeit cryptically, completely rupture the equilibrium of a male society and turn a visceral male beast into a sex-obsessed slave of the meek and ultimately suicidal sort, Stelling's film manages to depict male-female relations in the most primitive yet hermetically humored sense. Shot in idyllic pastoral Scotland and set in an unmentioned pre-modern time period before the rise of feminism and the counterculture movement, The Pointsman—a work loosely based on the 1981 Jean-Paul Franssens novella of the same name—is like the otherworldly outdoor aesthetics of Tarkovsky meets a more philistine-oriented approach to the sexual politics of Fassbinder meets a distinctly Dutch take on the physical humor of Buster Keaton.

A classically beautiful French-speaking woman (Stéphane Excoffier) in a striking cunt-chic redcoat falls asleep on a train and makes the mistake of getting off said train when it stops after she wakes up and assumes that she has arrived at her desired destination, thus leaving her stranded in the Scottish highlands after the locomotive randomly starts again. Unquestionably an archetypical member of the fairer sex, the Woman has tons of unnecessary luggage with her, including a vintage babydoll, a phonograph, and half a dozen or so large suitcases that she clearly has a hard time carrying on her own. The Woman is stranded in the middle of nowhere at a place which only contains a small building where trains are switched to other tracks by the eponymous protagonist (Jim van der Woude of Stelling's The Illusionist and Peter Greenaway's Prospero's Books (1991)). While the Woman is the blatant 'beauty' of the film, the protagonist is certainly the 'beast' as a boorish yet unintentionally amusing fellow who eats with his hands like an uncultivated caveman and carries around a shotgun like it's his cock. While the protagonist is good, if not sometimes belligerent, with his shotgun when need be, his cock is unquestionably comatose as a result of living in a remote all-male environment for such a longtime. When the Woman meets the Pointsman, she first vainly looks at her compact mirror to check her appearance, not realizing the protagonist is a nearly middle-aged virgin who would never notice her sensual lipstick and whose sexual urgings have been long dormant as a consequence of his somewhat strange form of employment and particularly primitive lifestyle. By doing brazenly belligerent things like unloading his shotgun inside his house to kill uninvited rats scampering around his certainly humble abode and eating greasy meat with his discernibly dirty hands like a uncivilized vulgarian, the Pointsman somewhat scares the Woman at first, though she also seems annoyed by the fact that he seems to be totally sexually disinterested in her, so she takes it upon herself to change that by using distinctly feminine allurements tactics so that she can become the protagonist's object of unwavering worship. Of course, over the time, the Pointsman's penis will awaken and a tragicomic mating ritual will commence that will ultimately have deleterious and even murderous consequences that ultimately demonstrate why women, especially stunning ones, are one of the most dangerous things for a man's health.

When an elderly friend who works for the railroad company comes by the protagonist's home, he semi-cryptically tells him regarding the Woman "I know who she is" and then tells a strange and borderline nonsensical story about himself (which he attempts to obfuscate to save himself from embarrassment by describing it as being about a friend instead of himself) regarding how he once blew all his money on an expensive hooker. Regarding his seemingly magical erotic encounter with the hooker, the old man says, "It smelled of fresh moss," which the Pointsman takes quite literally as demonstrated by curious actions he will take towards the end of the film. When a four-eyed 'fascistic' mailman (Josse De Pauw of Dominique Derudder's classic 1987 Bukowski adaptation Crazy Love) that sports a Gestapo-esque black leather trench-coat comes by the Pointsman's place, he immediately begins to hassle the Woman while simultaneously flirting with her in a preposterously transparent way. Although the Pointsman and Mailman are apparently friends, the Woman will transform them into murderously violent enemies. While initially apathetic towards her, the Pointsman becomes afraid of and eventually intrigued by the Woman, who laps up any attention she is given, as she clearly enjoys being the only woman in an all-man environment despite the fact that she is a cultured urban dame and they are exceedingly dumb and unconscious rugged rural shack-dwelling hicks. When the Pointsman's old man friend notices he has taken a liking to the Woman, who he clearly thinks is a manipulative cosmopolitan whore, he warns the protagonist, "She probably lives in a city. She'll get you into trouble. Give her some money and send her away! The mailman has a grudge against her. I'm warning you. She'll eat your sweets too." Of course, the pussy-obsessed Pointsman does not listen, but instead scares his friends away with his shotgun and preposterously destroys all of his money, as if it will prevent the lady from ever leaving.

When it comes to sex, the Pointsman seems erotically autistic as demonstrated by the fact that he annoys the Woman by burying his head in her crotch like a child attempting to reenter his mother's womb, as if he does not yet know that penises go inside of vaginas. Notably, the protagonist has an old portrait of his mother (which is actually, rather humorously, obviously lead actor van der Woude dressed in drag) hanging on the wall in his house that he constantly looks at, as if attempting to gain some sort of spiritual guidance from his assumedly deceased progenitor. Later on, the Pointsman decides to strip off all his clothes and surprise the Woman in bed, but upon entering her room he feels terribly ashamed, covers his dangling flaccid genitals with his hand, and runs away in a most moronic manner. When the protagonist eventually develops enough instinctive knowhow to actually seduce the Woman, he becomes paranoid just before he vaginally penetrates her after hearing someone laughing in a most sinister fashion outside. As it turns out, the mischievous Mailman was the one doing the laughing and he has come to 'rape' the Woman. While the Pointsman is outside looking for the person that was laughing at him, the Mailman enters his home and begins cornering the Woman, who is clearly afraid of being sexually ravaged by the sadistic nerd. When the Pointsman runs home after noticing the Mailman's motorcycle hidden behind some bushes, he finds the postal worker cornering the visibly petrified Woman, so he shoots out the window of the home to scare the intruder, who subsequently smirks at the protagonist to demonstrate that he thinks he is a pansy who does not have the testicular fortitude to kill him. Ultimately, the Woman demands that the Pointsman shoot the Mailman by screaming "Shoot!" twice in French, so being the cuckolded male 'knight' who wants to save the 'princess' from the figurative dragon, he does, thus instantly killing the prick postal worker and leaving blood plastered against the wall of his dilapidated homestead. After burying the corpse of the Mailman, the ungrateful Woman, who just coerced a man to kill his friend yet won't give up any pussy, becomes afraid and demands that she be allowed to leave, so the Pointsman pulls out his trusty shotgun and imprisons her in his home. While it is a given that women love to lead men on, no matter how big of ugly losers they are, to feed their own exceedingly vain sense of narcissism, it is another thing for a man to kill another man at the urging of a woman who does not feel the need to repay him for committing such an irreparably ungodly act.

Eventually, the Woman submits to the Pointsman in what is one of the most absurdly anticlimactic, pathetic, sad, and just plain dead and Fremdscham-inducing 'pity fuck' scenes in film history. Of course, it is not just a mere pity fuck, as the Woman mainly does it so that she can be released from the literal and figurative imprisonment of the Pointsman, who has made the horrible mistake of putting pussy on a pedestal, which no female respects and ultimately became the main source of the protagonist's grand misfortune. After the superlatively sad sex, the Woman goes outside and waits for the train while the Pointsman begins gathering moss, which he strangely covers his entire home with. While the Pointsman pulls his gun on the Woman when she goes to get on the train when it finally arrives after a year or so of cabin-fever-inducing semi-captivity, she ultimately gets away in the end after the Pointsman finally accepts that lady does not want him and certainly does not feel the same way about him as he feels about her. Ultimately, the lethally lovelorn Pointsman commits a sort of ritualistic suicide by lying on a moss bed that he has created for himself and goes to sleep permanently. As the seasons pass, the Pointsman's body becomes symbolically covered in cobwebs and eventually snow. In the final scene, the Woman smiles after capturing a fly that was resting on her hand in a symbolic scenic reflecting the ease in which the female character 'spun her web' and ultimately trapped and sucked dry her rather naive male prey. Notably, Ms. Beauty touches her stomach during the last scene as if to indicate she is pregnant with the bastard son of the figurative Beast.

Undoubtedly, The Pointsman has to feature the most unconventional, hermetic, subtle, and esoterically manipulative femme fatale in cinema history, as a woman who does not even speak the same language as the protagonist yet manages to completely destroy him with a most impressive ease and elegance. While the film can be seen as a sort of cryptically misogynistic work of Dutch magical realism, I think the film also glorifies beautiful women in the sense that the female lead holds special arcane powers that few men can fathom, or at least that is the way Stelling's flick depicts it. For instance, the older and thus wiser man in the film knows that the gorgeous woman is dangerous to the titular protagonist but he cannot really articulate why. Additionally, from the vulgarly obvious flirting techniques of the four-eyed Mailman to the pathetic failed attempts by the protagonist in regard to the art of sexual initiation, The Pointsman ultimately features an almost wholly unflattering depiction of mankind and its completely hopeless naivety in regard to the way of women. Considering the pathetic state of contemporary Western males today as reflected by so-called 'pick-up artists' and the growing so-called male rights movement, Stelling's film is ultimately more relevant today than when it was first released nearly three decades ago, though obviously contemporary audiences will probably find the work even less accessible than those filmgoers that saw it when it was first released in 1986. While Dutch film academics like Bas Agterberg have gone as far as to describe The Pointsman as "arguably Stelling's best film, featuring the perfect synthesis of theme and style," American film critics were largely bewildered by the work, with Janet Maslin complaining regarding the film in her April 8, 1988 review, "There is no easy way to ascertain what the Dutch film maker Jos Stelling has in mind with THE POINTSMAN, and not much reason to try." Unquestionably, there is certainly something satisfying about a European films that manage to dumbfound obscenely obnoxious and arrogant overrated Hebraic yank film critics, as it demonstrates that the directors are making works that cannot be understood by mere over-indulged yet sterile intellects, but by something more innate and organic that reflects a truly national cinema.

LITTLE TONY

Undoubtedly, my first impression of a film with a title like 'Little Tony' is that it is about a dumb and sub-literate yet keenly charismatic wop who knows how to smooth talk his way into many women's panties but can barely hold an unskilled construction job. While Kleine Teun (1998) aka Little Tony directed by Dutch auteur Alex van Warmerdam (Abel aka Voyeur, Borgman) does feature an illiterate philistine who manages to get some relatively sweet blonde ass and who has a wife that looks like the virtual doppelgänger of Tony Soprano's rather rotund dyke-like dago sister, the film is far too savagely sophisticated, callously cynical, and decidedly Dutch to be about a gregarious pussy-pounding guido meathead. Rather intriguingly, auteur van Warmerdam not only plays the lead character of the film, but his real-life wife Annet Malherbe—an extra wide and chunky woman of the inordinately dark and swarthy sort, at least for a Dutch chick, who has appeared in most of her husband's films—also plays the role of his character's overly domineering spouse, thus making for one fiercely fucked flick that once again proves why the director is arguably the most playfully psychopathic filmmaker working today. A delightfully deranged (anti)heimat comedy set in rural Central Holland on the outskirts of the city of Utrecht, which has been the Catholic religious centre of the Netherlands since the 8th century, van Warmerdam's film is certainly the closest thing to the New German Cinema films of the late-1960s and 1970s directed by people like Walter Boockmayer (Flammende Herzen aka Flaming Hearts, Geierwally), Peter Fleischmann (Jagdszenen aus Niederbayern aka Hunting Scenes from Bavaria, Die Hamburger Krankheit aka The Hamburg Syndrome), and especially Herbert Achternbusch (Das letzte Loch aka The Last Hole, Heilt Hitler!) that portrayed Bavarians as goat-fucking and beer-chugging redneck retards, albeit all the more hopelessly hateful yet paradoxically goofy at the same time. Based on van Warmerdam's own three-person 1996 chamber play of the same name, Little Tony is quintessential Dutch 'anti-comedy' as a work that is so dark, depraved, and dehumanized in its less than hospitable yet highly addictive humor that only the Dutch and people just as fucked up as them will be able to understand it. Indeed, van Warmerdam's fourth feature tells the truly timeless tale of a borderline morbidly obese and infertile middle-aged farm beastess who is tired of reading movie subtitles for her illiterate hick of a hubby, so she hires a somewhat hotter and much slimmer middle-aged blonde of the obnoxiously anally retentive sort to teach him to read, only to later plot to have her superlatively stupid spouse start a romantic relationship with the teacher because she desperately wants a baby and hopes the two will produce one for her. Set in a misleadingly paradisiacal pastoral land that is despoiled by its insanely inane and insipid inhabitants that are dumber and/or fatter than cows and more stubborn than horses, Little Tony is the almost maddeningly malicious and certainly mirthfully misanthropic story of a moronic ménage à trios that ultimately erupts in tastefully distasteful tragicomic murder, mayhem, madness, and callous rejection, among other things. Undoubtedly, van Warmerdam's film also happens to be what is probably the most fiercely farcical farm-based flick since Tom O'Horgan's Rochelle Owens adaptation Futz (1969), albeit infinitely more enthralling.

Brand (Alex van Warmerdam) is a goddamned moron hick from Holland who is so ludicrously lowclass that he proudly admits that he managed to get the money to buy his wife's favorite dress by killing a goat. Unfortunately, Brand's wife Kate (Annet Malherbe) is now so obscenely overweight that she is now at least three times as wide as the dress, so her hubby no longer wants to hump her. Indeed, Kate is so desperate for Brand's cock in her cunt that she is willing to give him a rimjob while he is defecating if he agrees to do the unthinkable by committing coitus with her, but of course the Dutch peasant may enjoy hanging around goat shit and all but he is certainly no scat fiend. Although Brand is a rugged redneck man, he is also a committed cuckold, even though he has nil sexual interest in his wife, who seems to have carefully whipped her hubby into shape over the past two decades or so that they have been married. Tired of spending her mornings reading subtitles to her husband (since when do rednecks watch foreign films?), Kate comes back to the house one day with a marginally attractive middle-aged blonde chick named Lena (Ariane Schluter) who Brand is clearly immediately attracted to but pretends to dislike so as not to offend his corpulent cock-starved wife. Lena has been hired to teach Brand to read, but after their first session, he flips out like a hyperactive toddler, chops off the head of a lawn gnome, and complains to his wife, "A kid like that, teaching me. Homework. I'm 45, damn it!" to which Kate replies, "You're doing it for me," thus reaffirming her cuckoldry over her husband. Meanwhile, Kate is obsessed with having a baby as demonstrated by the fact she asks to hold a random stranger's baby while at a grocery store and then, to the chagrin of the child's mother, soon disappears with it while roaming around the building and pretending that it is her kid. Since Kate is infertile, she has decided to make Lena her baby maker, but first she must convince her moron of a husband that it is ok for him to lay some pipe in his teacher's seemingly tight twat.

When Brand tries to give his wife's favorite dress to Lena, it becomes fairly obvious that he wants to get in her assumed granny panties. Rather curiously, Kate ends up giving the same dress to Lena literally minutes after Brand offers it to her, as she knows that piece of clothing gives her hubby a hard-on. Although he does not go to church (indeed, van Warmerdam breaks with the Hebraic Hollywood comedy convention of portraying all rednecks as being hopelessly superstitious Christian true believers), Brand wants Lena to meet him at the church wearing the dress, but when Sunday arrives, the sex-starved blonde spinster is depressed to find her 'student' is a no show. While Lena calls Brand a "peasant" in an overtly hateful fashion after he kindly requests to see one of her breasts, deep down inside she wants to devour his Dutch dong. Although Lena is passably attractive, especially for her age, she clearly has some control issues and can only bring herself to give herself to Brand when he treats her like a worthless piece of shit that is only worthy of ridicule. In fact, Kate absurdly coaches her hubby in regard to how to seduce Lena as she proclaims to “knows her type” and that “She wants to be impregnated...By authority.” Indeed, when a set of stairs in his barn collapses while he is walking up them and he is left hanging from a ledge that is about two stories tall, Lena refuses to help him even though he could break his neck because she has no respect for weak or vulnerable men. Ironically, it is only through Kate’s authority over him that Brand is able to develop enough of an authoritarian personality to cause Lena to wet her panties. Naturally, when Brand spitefully states to Lena, “You’re like my father...He took me to the fair but never opened his wallet. Little Brand could just ogle,” and adds, “To me you’re just a twit like all the others,” the shrewd sadomasochistic blonde gets all hot and bothered and whips her tender titties out. Ultimately, Kate comes up with the dubious scheme to tell Lena that she and Brand are actually brother and sister even though they look nothing alike and that they were lying about being married so that the Dutch instructor feels more comfortable about letting herself be defiled by the middle-aged farmboy. Of course, Lena wants to believe the lie, so it does not take long for her to begin making out with Brand in front of Kate, which she seems to do just to rub it in the morbidly obese woman’s face.

In seemingly no time, Lena begins demanding that Kate not only move into the spare bedroom, but also eat horsemeat (!), which she is repulsed by as revealed her remark, “My father called horsemeat unhappy meat,” even though she regularly eats an absolutely grotesque offal stew that resembles boiled diarrhea, hence her obesity. Of course, since she desperately wants a baby, Kate swallows her pride and meekly submits to Lena’s mostly petty demands. Unquestionably, when Lena finally reveals that she is pregnant the discernibly deleterious threesome reaches its peak in terms of social stability, but after eponymous baby boy ‘Little Tony’ is born, all hell breaks loose and coldblooded murder begins to look like a very attractive idea to Kate, who wants both the brood and her hubby all to herself. As can be expected from a delusional woman who believes she is the rightful mother of a baby that she did not even give birth to, Kate becomes irate when Lena walks in on her breastfeeding little Tony and brutally berates her by stating that she disapproves of, “Letting little Tony suck on an empty breast. The empty breast of a strange woman.” Ultimately, Kate decides to use the classic female method of murder by slowly poisoning Lena with tainted food, which nitwit Brand somehow eventually figures out, though he cowardishly neglects to warn the mother of his child as he is too afraid to disobey his wifey. Indeed, when Kate begins acting even more domineering than she did before Lena came into their lives, Brand is more or less instantaneously cuckolded by his wife again, even though he has nil sexual interest in her and is totally sexually obsessed with his baby boy's frisky mother. In the end, Brand has to make a quick choice between his lard ass wife and his baby-mama after Kate begins attempting to drown Lena in a large puddle after the latter realizes she is being poisoned and reacts accordingly. Unfortunately, Brand ultimately seems to make the wrong choice in the end as he not only loses both of his lady friends, but also his sole son.

Out all of auteur Alex van Warmerdam's cinematic works, Little Tony is certainly the one that most resembles a sort of collection of grotesque cinematic postcards of the Dutch hinterland, which indubitably largely has to do with the fact that the film is mostly comprised of static yet carefully framed still shots. Indeed, as a man that is also a painter who worked in that artistic medium before he ever got involved with theater and eventually film, Warmerdam's shots and camera angles are naturally largely inspired by the style of landscape paintings, thus strangely following in an old Dutch artistic tradition that goes all the way back to at least Hieronymus Bosch and Pieter Bruegel the Elder. Interestingly, despite the highly stylized and carefully constructed aesthetic of the film, van Warmerdam originally had no intention of adapting his play into a film as he felt it was far too theatrical, but luckily he eventually changed his mind after various people recommended that he do it. Aside from possibly his latest feature Borgman (2013), Little Tony is indubitably van Warmerdam's most brazenly brutal, delectably distasteful, and sardonically sinister work as a perniciously playfully tragicomic anti-romance that completely obliterates both males and females in terms of its devastating depiction of a total war between the sexes. Of course, the film is all the more potent and provocative due to the fact that writer/director van Warmerdam plays the lead in a work where his real-life wife plays alongside him as his character's murderously manipulative and sexually neglected spouse. Indeed, after watching Little Tony, I find it almost unfathomable that van Warmerdam is still married to Annet Malherbe, as very few men could get away with making a film where they depict their wife as innately sexually undesirable via a character who is ugly on both the inside and outside, not to mention the fact that she is brutally slaughtered in the end like a big fat pig. Judging solely by the content of his films alone, it would probably not be too hard to make the case that van Warmerdam is a swine, but somehow it is impossible to hate him because he does it all in good humor and that is surely his genius as both a playwright and filmmaker. As a work set in bumfuck Holland that depicts the power dynamics between the sexes in a uniquely unflattering fashion that seems like it could have been inspired by the writings of everyone from German-American sage wordsmith H.L. Mencken to Argentinean-German-Jewish anti-feminist writer Esther Vilar, Little Tony may very well be the ultimate anti-romantic-comedy, which is certainly no small accomplishment on van Warmerdam's part as a man who has more or less turned what one might describe as 'theatrical trolling' into a distinct celluloid artform.

HITLER THIRD WORLD

José Agripino de Paula (1968)

Something tells me that Adolf Hitler would have never even visited an area of sheer and utter racial chaos and, in turn, mongrel trannies, like Brazil under any circumstance, but such is the absurdist scenario of the rarely-seen Brazilian work Hitler III° Mundo (1968) aka Hitler Terzo Mundo aka Hitler Third World – an innately iconoclastic film that was not released until the symbolic year of 1984, which was 16 years after it was initially completed, due to its highly controversial subject as a naughty anti-Nazi scat flick with a far-left message. Featuring scenarios of sickening and sardonic scatological surrealism, Hitler Third World directed by unknown-auteur José Agripino de Paula is the virtual missing celluloid link between the films of Alejandro Jodorowsky and Christoph Schlingensiefel as a work of tyrannical tragicomedy that never wavers in its brazen bombardment of the viewer with a bodacious blitzkrieg of highly cynical yet campy imagery, albeit of the quasi-genocidal and classless sort, where everyone is poor and destitute (in a film that literally utilizes the poor and destitute as extras). Famous Brazilian folk singer Caetano Veloso – a man that was hated by the country’s military dictatorship – once stated, “It is worth repeating that Hitler, Third World of 1968 is the most radical and extraordinary attempt at alternative cinema out of everything that has been tried in Brazil,” and, indeed, it is undoubtedly unlike any Brazilian film I have ever seen, even if it is no Pixote (1981), but it certainly has its fair share of peculiar ‘poverty porn,’ including groups of racially dubious feral children without shoes following around a degenerate and highly suicidal samurai who, due to his grotesque obesity and sheer lack of mobility, probably should have been a sumo wrestler instead. Unquestionably one of the most uniquely unconventional and aesthetically debauched Uncle Adolf flicks ever made—not least of all because we are supposed to believe that the fallen Führer and the Third Reich has risen in a massive Third World sewer of all places—Hitler Third World is indisputable proof that degenerate cinematic dreams can happen, even in a nation where the Nietzschean untermensch is the norm, even among the elite, including the hedonistic homo Hitler featured in the film. A morally retarded work with an innate non-Aristotelian logic that was made illegally utilizing guerrilla filmmaking techniques in the ghettos of Brazil, Hitler Third World is an indisputable left-wing libertine work made at a time when not all quasi-Marxist types were politically correct pansies. Indeed, as Hitler Third World proves, the motto of Brazil is not “Ordem e Progresso” (“Order and Progress”) for nothing.

With super swarthy would-be-Hispanic revolutionary Che Guevara dead (yes, despite what various rappers and pseudo-hippie other sub-literate degenerates think, the “great liberator” was a white man), Brazil is ready for a new kind of revolution and with 99% of Brazilians being ‘indifferent’ in political polls and

1% being fascist, Uncle Adolf, who is running as a 'conservative democrat,' is ready for a big takeover of the multicultural third world nation, where he will eventually turn it into a libidinous Third World Reich of the even more culturally retarded and racially chaotic sort. Meanwhile in Brazil, a morbidly obese and suicidal samurai (played by Brazilian comedian Jô Soares) is trying, quite feebly, to commit seppuku around the empire of sewage and trash that is Brazil, but before that, he wants to succeed where Claus von Stauffenberg failed by assassinating Hitler. In another part of the city a mutant 'rock man' that looks like some sort of crack-addicted X-man, causes minor trouble around the city, but his greatest sin is being ugly as sin. Thankfully, novice National Socialist soldiers torture leftist students and a seemingly cross-dressing judge decides it is wise to exterminate an extra-erotic beautiful naked woman from an unmentioned crime. Uncle Adolf, who no longer seems to admire the aesthetically pleasing works of Richard Wagner and Arno Breker, does such important things as admiring his beatnik friend's gigantic Batman painting and brushes his teeth while naked as his one-eyed friend masturbates in the shower. Not long after, a less than young woman asks Hitler aka 'War Lord' if he knows anything about her young lover's dubious imprisonment, but in bureaucratic fashion, he tells her to consult the 'Torture Department.' Not long after, Hitler's one-eyed friend somehow morphs into the fat samurai and kills the seemingly faggy Führer, where he lays bloody with his shriveled genitals exposed, but somehow the Nazi leader is alive again in the next scene wearing a fruity Hawaiian shirt and listening to his favorite song, Schubert's "Serenade." Uncle H makes no lie of the difficulty of keeping order in the Third World and he uses torture chambers with cages full of anal-probing stormtrooper cavemen to do so. One of the Nazi Neanderthals castrates the cock of a communist student and a blind black man shows up not long after for whatever reason. Meanwhile, the politically radical rock-man is arrested in the streets by the military police and the samurai is finally successful at dying, but it is not by his own hand, but that of a bullet shot by a Svengali-like one-eyed Nazi that is friends with Hitler. Luckily, multicultural Brazilian children, including Negroes, Indians, and something in between, decide to cover the samurai's extra-bloated corpse with a newspaper. In the end, Adolf Hitler congratulates his long-haired, mixed-raced student soldiers for graduating into the multicultural regime of the Third World Reich, while the samurai—who is, quite inexplicably, once again alive—finally gets to commit seppuku after becoming quite agitated with what he sees on television regarding the state of Brazilian politics. Needless to say, he is no Yukio Mishima.

When it comes to films about Nazis in Brazil, Hitler Third World is about as far away as it could be from the almost equally nonsensical Hollywood film The Boys from Brazil (1978), as a sort of neo-Dadaist piece of crude celluloid debauchery as if directed by George Grosz for a group of mestizo mental patients. While an absurdist avant-garde work of the amateurishly directed sort with a plot that is about as coherent as a Matthew Barney flick, Hitler Third World—a politically far-left work—does feature rather cliché political messages, including associating the United States with the Third Reich and portraying Hitler as a hysterical homo, but the film does not even feature a single authentic Aryan (but maybe a couple of Mediterraneans and Hebrews), aside from a blonde midget. Of course, I would be lying if I did not admit that Hitler Third World lives up to its exquisitely schizophrenic title as an absurdist work about the long post-mortem Führer attempting to put order into a world without order and without racial purity. Indeed, one need not worry about Brazil ever turning into an European ethno-state as the country acts as the virtual archetype for globalists and multiculturalists around the world as a place where people of non-white ancestry (i.e. black and Amerindian) proclaim to be white as social class is more important there than blood and—unlike the United States—miscegenation has been rampant since the arrival of the Portuguese in 1500. As a work of sardonic arthouse trash, Hitler Third World rates just under Schlingensief's early work of scatological libertinage Menu total (1986), but in terms of sociopolitical message, José Agripino de Paula's film has about as much depth as a Spielberg or Michael Moore film, which is not bad considering it was the director's only feature-length effort. If one thing is for sure, it is that Hitler Third World would have probably flabbergasted and repelled Adolf Hitler more than Charlie Chaplin's Hitler-hating satire The Great Dictator (1940). With all the hateful 'anti-hate' portrayals of Hitler and the Third Reich that feature kosher cliché after kosher cliché, Hitler Third World is certainly a breathe of aesthetically foul and farcical anti-Führer fresh air.

PISTOLEROS
PISTOLEROS

José Loza (1981) Many reviews have stated that the director of this Mexican-style bonanza worship the pedestal of Robert Rodriguez. I see that this is not the case, for with one film, Shaky Gonzalez has exceeded Rodriguez. I have not had so much fun with a western film in a long time. Gonzalez pays his dues to his inspirations and continues with this grim blast of an actioner. Frank Lowies is an infamous gangster who gets involved with a heist that leaves 5 million in cash missing. Martin is an aspiring director who is writing a script on the events. In hopes to get more material, he meets up with "Crazy Uffe" who tells his a long story of the characters outcomes which bring hilarity, death, bloodshed, betrayal, and sexy strippers. Like a cross between Rat Race and The Good, Bad, The Ugly, this film packs a punch. Pistoleros is like a double-barreled fiesta loaded with dueling weapons, a case of money, and the worst double-crossings you can imagine. You will constantly be thinking as this film twists and turns with its multiple storylines eventually colliding into one. This film would have been above average had it not been filmed as a story within a story. The acting and fighting is amazing. Sonny who pulls the Martial arts out frequently shines, as he roundhouse kicks his way through any opposer. The makeup designs were incredible. The bruises and grime on Ramirez's face were intimidating to say the least. Shaky Gonzalez may have started with love for Rodriguez, but playtime is over. It's time for this director to pursue new tasks and goals. Thankfully, the film works to the highest degree ensuring lots of entertainment. Of course, it does have it's flaws. The pacing in the beginning is a bit tedious and the length is a bit drawn out. All in all, an excellent package for fans of run-and-gun, no mercy western/gangster films. Keep an eye out for this murder margarita.

AT MIDNIGHT I'LL TAKE YOUR SOUL

José Mojica Marins (1964)

At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul was the first Brazilian horror film. Not a bad introduction for the Brazilian horror genre. Coffin Joe(or Zé do Caixão) is a man not to be reckoned with. Those that negatively cross his both end up dead in seconds. Coffin Joe's bloodshot eyes foreshadow the deaths that he is responsible for. Coffin Joe makes Bela Lugosi look like a thieving gypsy. Mario Bava was obviously a huge influence on At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul. Bava's Black Sunday would go great with a double feature screening of At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul. Both films feature great early 1960s special effects and cheese evil. At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul is quite extreme for it's time(as was Black Sunday). Coffin Joe has no problem blinding someone with his bare hands(with a bloody mess as a result). Bava had no problem letting the blood flow freely with Black Sunday. Coffin Joe opens At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul with an intense and philosophical speech about blood. He does so with an intense and serious face. This give me immediate respect for Coffin Joe. Any killer that demands respect like Coffin Joe is true dark gentlemen. Leatherface makes introductions with his arms sprawled out in the air making noises like he was raped at a biker's bar. Jason Vorhees walks around in a retarded stupor. Coffin Joe is a man's man. Badass Coffin Joe also puts all Western lone men to shame. He is able to battle a whole town single handedly. He has more confidence and charisma than John Wayne does on his best day(even in The Searchers). Coffin Joe also has more style with his complimenting and appropriate wardrobe. He looks like a mortician from a century ago. The end of At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul features some of the best and corniest vintage horror special effects. I wasn't too thrilled about seeing Coffin Joe in fear but something scares everyman. Joe's eyes change a lot from the beginning of the film to its climatic ending. You have been warned!

AWAKENING OF THE BEAST
AWAKENING OF THE BEAST

José Mojica Marins (1970)

To call this film an acid trip on celluloid would be to undermine the nature of this film. José Mojica Marins developed the character Coffin Joe and carried him through two sequels, This being the last. This film views upon drug use and urban violence in his beloved hometown. Upon release of this film the Brazilian dictatorship outright banned this film. Never before has it done such a thing. It sat in a vault for 20 years and only until 1989 was it finally released.

To understand the importance of this film, one must know of the history of Coffin Joe. Coffin Joe first appeared in "At Midnight, I'll Take Your Soul", Brazil's first horror movie. It was an atmospheric horror film and paved way for new standards. From that day forward, Coffin Joe is considered Brazil's national boogeyman. His prospect on life is that there is no god. We were based on continuity of our blood line. I really got to hand it to Marins for making this film. He used negatives from other film directors at the time. It was ragdoll composed and was even arrested during the filming due to a rumor there was real drugs involved. Funny part is that cop that arrests him plays the sleazy film producer. The plot is a pseudo documentary showing the effects of drugs on teenagers and adults. A group of psychiatrists experiment with four volunteers depicting the effects of LSD when mixed with the ideas of Coffin Joe. What begins as a mild trip on black and white film turns into a Kafkaesque funhouse of horrors in color. Frenzied and hypnotized, the hapless volunteers are stuck in purgatory but what is to blame for these happenings? Is it the drugs or perhaps Coffin Joe? The film is composed of vignettes which resembles parts of Der Todesking. From seduction, to drug abuse, and to the perversion of modern youth. Coffin Joe might be the creepiest guy around. Sporting his Black Top Hat, Talon like fingernails and is a cold-blooded philosopher. From a casual cinemagoers perspective, this movie is as deep rooted as they come in terms of culture and drug awareness. For such a dated film, it doesn't lose any of its power and has stood the test of time.

HALLUCINATIONS OF A DERANGED MIND

José Mojica Marins (1978)

In case some of you may be uninformed, Coffin Joe is a starring character in an original trilogy of philosophical ancient Brazilian horror films. He also affirms to a "Crypt Keeper" status by retelling horror stories, as seen in Creepshow and Tales from the Crypt. When his film originally debuted, he almost instantly became the native "boogeyman", rocketing director José Mojica Marins to fame. What fate had befallen Awakening of the Beast was many cuts, trims, shortenings, and a lengthy ban, Marins, unlike every other director, decided to use his unused footage in a recyclable film - namely, Hallucinations of a Deranged Mind. The weary plot follows a psychiatrist that is haunted with visions of Zé do Caixão stealing his trophy wife. The following scene would be followed up with at least 10 - 20 minutes of surrealist smut barely forming a cohesive plot line. Thankfully, it's all gold, but strictly for fans only. Most of the "fluff" revolves around desirable surrealism and homoerotic elements. A feminine under leg-arch vividly allows you to witness a deformed dwarf rotating around a barely clothed beauty. Many tarantula scenes are added, incorporating a forgotten occult status to this prime departure from the Coffin Joe mainframe. As always, Coffin Joe's quest for the fertile female to bear his super child continues. Marins fruitful pornographic past collides with the then-present as many scenes meant to be in Awakening of the Beast detail the fragile, yet nubile female form, unmasked. The title yields all compromise. The plot is essentially thoughts from a deranged mind. How else better to put a scrapbook to film? Perhaps Hallucinations of a Deranged Mind was expressed to bring Marins inner homosexual to mind. After all, Zé do Caixão simply doesn't walk over weak masculine bodies as a sign of gender empowerment. Much of the sexually explicit material was reused from past engagements, which almost makes this film void in the thought department. Luckily, this is one film that a fan of Coffin Joe can enjoy. The prospect of a surreal overdose is disheartening. In order to flesh out a feature length run time of scrapped footage, one must create a hollow shell in which to house said ideas. I'm just glad Marins is a productive enough director to put his artistic images to work rather than just throwing them away, losing them to the depths of darkness. Within Hallucinations of a Deranged Mind, you will be drawn into 10 minute long hallucination scenes, which equals tough viewing. What better way to waste time than to watch a Coffin Joe deleted scene montage? Needless to say, the result is fruitfully erotic.

A QUINTA DIMENSÃO DO SEXO
A QUINTA DIMENSÃO DO SEXO

José Mojica Marins (1984)

José Mojica Marins is not the first master of horror to descend (or rather, ascend) into the underbelly of the pornographic world. Just like Joe D'Amato, Marins has created masterpieces and among them, there is smut. A Quinta Dimensão do Sexo (Fifth Dimension of Sex) is a bold new direction for the beloved director of films that exist on a plane of existence beyond genres. Fifth Dimension of Sex involves two chemistry students (who I will dub Gomez and Pedro.) These two students are having trouble with women. Using the gifts of science and research, they create a serum that causes them to become crazed rapists. This plot seems very close to El Violador Infernal; a film that concerns a sleazy Mexican as he rapes men & women alike to please Satan. If the Fifth Dimension of Sex had to be recognized for one thing, it would be an appearance by Zé do Caixão. Coffin Joe is the world's foremost Boogeyman. I cannot think of any single man, creature, or entity as sinister and intelligent as the Joe of the Coffin. This is the first hardcore sex film Marins has filmed. The following grotesque sexual horrors he filmed are 24 Hours of Explicit Sex and 48 Hours of Hallucinatory Sex. The very fact that this film is a pornographic video is enough to drive anyone either away or draw them in. Mostly, drawing them into this film in search of something "hot." This will never be the case. Marins captures the very lustful aura around sex on camera. The rarity of this happening can be compared to capturing a specter on film. The very ways he captures the eyes and expressions in mid-coitus is something of an animalistic majesty. The fact that this is a very dated and obscure piece of smut doesn't make it easy to come by. Marins shouldn't hide from his XXX background and embrace it. If he were still making material like this, he could grab perverts and arthouse fans at the same time. Tapping in different markets could be very profitable and lead to more Zé do Caixão films. When Awakening of the Beast was made, the Military Regime had it banned for nearly 20 years. Something like that makes me wonder about their reaction to his adult films. This film doesn't have the normal uncompromising positions of its time period. Instead, we have urination and penetration with a giant artificial penis which in turn rips her open. Perhaps the most bizarre aspect of this film, even more bizarre than the idea of a Coffin Joe porn, is its subversive homosexual undertones. As soon as these raving sex fiends begin to cool off, they reveal a slight queer side to them, leading to the first homosexual kiss on Brazilian cinema. The same goes the first inter-species erotica scene in 24 Hours of Explicit Sex. José Mojica Marins invented horror. No timeline or piece of cinema literature will convince me otherwise. He invented the abstract homo-surrealism. Nobody may have seen it, but it lies within his mind. Coffin Joe is a brand you can trust.

EMBODIMENT OF EVIL

José Mojica Marins (2008)

I cannot think of a single film more dreadfully awaited than Coffin Joe's blazing finale to an untitled trilogy that began with At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul and remained left open with This Night I'll Possess Your Corpse. His recently announced Encarnação do Demônio (Embodiment of Evil) sent shock waves through the horror community, or rather, those lucky enough to have heard of the icon's terrifying legacy of subversive and philosophizing horror film of macabre dreams. Something didn't rest well with me. Something was returning to the surface. As the teaser poster "teased" fans with Coffin Joe's memorable razor nails protruding for a grate in a cell, these bold colors and magnificently well shot stills brought a similar experiment in neo-revivification; Dario Argento's desperate The Mother of Tears rings steady in my mind. Argento replaced hallucinogenic set pieces and the giallo tradition of supernaturally violent deaths with exceptional lighting and cinematography destroying most ambiance and replacing the complex murders with a gore bath worthy of a French new-wave feminist film. Terror filled my heart and just like Coffin Joe in his latest installment, I too was filled with fantastical visions of future suffering. Could you have guessed that Embodiment of Evil isn't the worst film to come out this year? It isn't the worst but I'd have a difficult time finding one more disappointing than this expedition in frequent nudity and pointless gore. In the final moments of This Night I'll Possess Your Corpse, the exalted Coffin Joe exclaimed "God! I believe in your power!". Of course the line originally read "I don't believe in God! I'll be back!" but censors wouldn't pass the film unless this ending was changed. José Mojica Marins decided to find a lookalike to film some additional footage in the aesthetic style of his 60s endeavors. Incredible lookalike Raymond Castile plays the part reenacting Marins' vision for his second film. Thus leaves the entrance of the third film a bit more explained, but this is not the redemption the film needs. It's never explained how Zé do Caixão ended up being imprisoned. All we realize is that upon his release, his outside community has changed drastically. This is displayed rather crudely and comically as Joe stares disapprovingly at 2 dark "slumdogs" on the sidewalk huffing inhalants.

Like any intelligent man, Marins first attempts to relive the intelligence of his dreary monologues of the past by visually inserting ideals of the continuity of blood line in newcomers psyche's. In the past, his words had a rustic value. Each individual syllable grates your ear canal with often pretentious but magical words illustrating Coffin Joe's intentions for life, death, and his revival (sort of) within a perfect child conceived by a perfect woman. In the past, Coffin Joe has been known to torment his beautiful captors with terror games including spiders and snakes. In the present, he would much rather cover them with cheese to insert a rat in their vagina. Yeah, that totally wasn't stolen from American

EMBODIMENT OF EVIL

Psycho or anything. To be ridiculously fair, few scenes stand out amongst the garbage. Coffin Joe mating under a torrential rain of blood is quite fascinating and a woman sewn inside a pig corpse make up most of the prime scenes of this film.

The magic of Coffin Joe is gone, evaporated. I still immensely enjoy his classic outings, even his pseudo-film experiments such as Hallucination of a Deranged Mind and Awakening of the Beast, but this new film is an absolute disgrace to be in the same list as At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul and This Night I'll Possess Your Corpse. Clever vintage antics have been replaced by Big budgeted editing with amazing special effects and stunts involving the degradation of women for no means. Coffin Joe's quest is in vain by this time and he's too old to have any of the screen presence that he has been known in the past for. The best method of making a choice if you should see this is clear. If you liked Argento's The Mother of Tears, go for it. Give this film a chance it doesn't deserve but don't say I didn't warn you. The day I see Coffin Joe busting shots at corrupt police officers would be the day I decided to hang up the towel. After roughly explaining the plot, my friend responded "You mean like Saw?". Yes Derek, like Saw.

Joseph Despins (1972)

It has certainly been sometime since I saw a film as intrinsically fucked up as the all but totally unknown British work Duffer (1971) directed by Joseph Despins and William Dumaesque (who also penned the script). The film follows a tragic young man named Duffer, a seemingly kindhearted and selfless bastard boy that has a deep semi-conscious desire to engage in steamy and seedy intercourse with both his father and mother – a dually destructive dichotomy (an oedipal and gay Electra complex if you will) of ailing ying contra yang – but being without a family and a strong independent personality of his own, he divides his time between two radically conflicting lovers: an exceedingly deranged middle-aged queer named Louis-Jack (played by co-director/screenwriter William Dumaesque) and a tacky yet affectionate middle-aged hooker named ‘Your Gracie.’ Duffer is a part-time masochist and Louis-Jack is his ever so clever personal (and oddly paternal) sadist, as the older man is always devising new and inventive methods to test the lad’s mortality, so as to derive maximum erotic pleasure through his malicious pseudo-fatherly endeavors. Indeed, Duffer has no problem being Louis-Jack’s personal dog, but he also enjoys assuming the role of a precious man-boy whose penchant for total amorousness knows no bounds. Luckily for Duffer, Miss Your Gracie is a tad bit more conventional in her sexual yearnings, as her only demand of the boy is that he should develop better sexual stamina. Miss Your Gracie also loves to spoon Duffer as if he were her vulnerable infant son. Despite taking it in the pooper like a seasoned pooper, Duffer is quite repelled by loveless lunatic lover Louis-Jack’s violent sexuality, but he rationalizes his passive abuse with reflective lines like (to paraphrase), “I wouldn’t want to deprive him of something that gives him great pleasure.” Quite openly, Duffer admits that he frequents the charming company of pseudo-mommy Your Gracie so as to, “re-store my manhood”, or so he says. Of course, Duffer has a hard time firmly establishing his manhood due to Louis-Jack’s insistence that he have a baby; an impossible task that the swinish old man thinks he can accomplish by sodomizing the boy until he has thoroughly bloodied his rectum and raped his mind. Being a precariously loyal lad, Duffer takes it upon himself to make Louis-Jack’s ludicrous dreams come true, henceforth culminating in the most despicable, yet sardonically symbolic, of results. Quite vividly and even viciously, Duffer illustrates the benefits of being a bland breeder as opposed to being an undaunted buggerer.

Throughout the entirety of Duffer, the leading boy reflects on his thoughts and emotions by speaking directly to the viewer via voice-over narration. What makes this particularly disheartening is that co-director/writer William Dumaesque narrated the voice of Duffer and not the young actor (Kit Gleave) that actually played the boy. Admittedly, this was probably for the better as the dirty old man’s overly involved and elaborately detailed (bordering on the fetishistic) commentary adds another imperative layer of distinct aberrancy to Duffer that is destined to shadow the mind of the viewer for many decades to come after watching the film. Indeed, Duffer is one of those rare cinematic works that one would be most inescapably ashamed to show to friends, family members, and lovers, as the film acts as a carrier for what could most suitably be described as an incurable metaphysical STD. Simply put, Duffer is one of the most thematically revolting films ever made as it exhibits human beings at their most hopelessly debauched, pathologically-enslaved, and morally unsalvageable, yet it is also an irregularly enrapturing work without any serious contemporaries, aside from maybe Peter Whitehead and Niki De Saint Phalle's inferior work Father (1973). Duffer is like a collection of case studies from Richard von Krafft-Ebing's revolutionary work Psychopathia Sexualis (1886) come to life, except portrayed in a fashion that totally contradicts the emotional sterility of an objective scientist. Indeed, not only is Duffer a victim of vice, but, as much as one does not want to admit it, so are his two elder 'lovers', even the ever so morally and mentally insane Louis-Jack; an unrepentant sadistic sodomite with a keen proclivity towards combining the worst elements of his organ-piercing perversity and cerebral precariousness. After all, it is quite doubtful that Louis-Jack was born a brutish boy-buggering beast (as he certainly does not look like one), but, more likely, as a young boy, he sexually debased in a manner similar to the way he treats Duffer, thus proliferating a vicious circle of hysterical homo-sadomasochism. By the end of Duffer, the boy protagonist has gone from being a sensitive and passive boy looking for love in all the wrong places to de-evolving into a man whose lack of mental stability and newfound tendency towards gross criminality rivals that of his spiritual father Louis-Jack. One can only wonder what kind of life Duffer would go onto live after the film's conclusion, but it is not a stretch to suggest that he, like his maniacal mentor, could very likely go onto to produce a number of equally perverse protégés. On top of being all but totally desensitized to every sexual perversion imaginable, Duffer – who is not always able to distinguish between reality and his erratic imagination – seems to be on his way to becoming a full blown schizophrenic. Although clearly uneducated, Duffer is a deeper thinker and ghetto philosopher/psychologist of sorts who constantly immerses himself in books as a form of therapeutic escapism. Of course, indulging in literary classics can only sway the irrational impulses of a brain-damaged mind for so long....

As a reflexive nod to the audience (and probably to himself), Duffer co-director William Dumaesque (as sick fuck Louis-Jack) appears in Duffer as a gutter auteur who directs a number of borderline snuff films depicting his poor boy toy in various exceedingly comprised and devilishly disbarred positions. One can only wonder whether or not Louis-Jack aspires to be the next Paul Morrissey, but his naturalist knack for candid realism and exquisite exploitation is unquestionable.

In one particularly odious scene in Duffer, Uncle L.J. simultaneously films Duff as he covers the sleeping boy's naked body with an assortment of slimy worms. Demonstrating his commitment to creatively degrading his victim from every angle imaginable, Louis-Jack also forces Duffer to watch the edited final cut of his wicked worm-meets-willy micro-mondo movie. Unsurprisingly, Duffer, in his typically insightful forthrightness, is inordinately critical of the dubious artistic merit behind Louis-Jack's latest cinematic effort. Being Louis-Jack's greatest fan and most active supporter, Duffer's articulate criticism cannot be easily dismissed; and neither can this film. Duffer is a masterpiece, but of what cinematic breed, I cannot say exactly, however, it is plainly apparent that it comes endowed with its own deep and diacritic pathology. Amateurishly (but more than adeptly) directed and shot on gritty black-and-white 16mm film stock, Duffer has a look that consummately compliments its themes and images of proletarian sexual perversity. Making the mental defectives of Frank Perry's David and Lisa (1962) appear like bourgeois brats and the films of Harmony Korine seem ineptly contrived (a certain baby scene in Trash Humpers more than resembles a scene in Duffer) by contrast, Duffer is as authentic as fictional films come in portraying the irreparable dejection and soul-destroying afflictions that often times take hold of economically disenfranchised whites. Duffer is the sort of film Andy Warhol always strived to make, but lacked the artistic ingenuity and humility to do so. It is also a work that makes William Friedkin's portrayal of gay leather-bound sadomasochists in Cruising (1980) seem flattering by comparison. The Brits may have colonized and ruled the many citizens of India in the past, but the lives of the untouchable ghetto rats of Danny Boyle's Slumdog Millionaire (2008) seem inconsequential when compared to the life of perdition that pure-blood Englishman Duffer of Duffer leads.

THE MOON OVER THE ALLEY

Joseph Despins (1976)

Nearly three years ago, I saw a little known British cult masterpiece called Duffer (1971) about a rather naïve and seemingly half-autistic young bisexual twink who allows himself to be the personal sexual plaything of both a sadistic middle-aged sodomite with a rather repugnant worm fetish and a kind yet chubby over-the-hill prostitute in what one might describe as the truest of bizarre love triangles. Needless to say, when I discovered that one of the film's two Canadian expatriate co-directors, Joseph Despins, was also responsible for directing a gritty black-and-white lumpenprole musical, The Moon Over the Alley (1976), I had to hunt it down, which was not exactly that hard considering it was included with the BFI Flipside DVD/Blu-ray release of Duffer. Notably, the musical was penned by Duffer co-director and star William Dumasq, who demonstrated a natural knack for sexually torturing a young man onscreen despite the fact that it was the first (and ultimately the last) acting role he ever had. I probably cannot think of a cinematic persuasion that I would be less interested in enduring than that of a British multicultural musical set in a London ghetto full of beatniks, bums, blacks, and bastard kids haunting the streets like lost souls, but of course, Despins' film is no phony Hebraic Hollywood movie and takes a more honest and, in turn, politically incorrect approach to shitty city living where the only harmony present is in the form of crude folk and soul songs sung in sleazy strip clubs, in front of butcher houses, and on dilapidated park benches. Set in a world where, to quote the eponymous song sung by Joanne Brown, "the moon over the alley makes the world seem sad," the film might be described as a work of 'proletariansploitation' were it not for auteur Despins' quite discernible empathy for his hopelessly disenfranchised and forlorn characters who have been foredoomed by their own birthright as perennially struggling members of the so-called 'lumpenproletariat.' Featuring a musically eclectic score by screenwriter Dumasq's lifelong collaborator, Grammy Award winning Canadian composer Galt MacDermot of Hair fame, The Moon Over the Alley is a left-leaning work for sure, but not in the college lobotomized 'social justice warrior' or Frankfurt School fanboy sort of way, as a work that depicts the rarely good, the often-times bad, and the uniquely ugly in regard to London's most desperate social bottomfeeders. More oriented towards magic realism than kitchen sink realism that was popular among British filmmakers of that time, The Moon Over the Alley manages to be both gritty yet stylish and even somewhat expressionistic as a work that owes more credit to Fritz Lang and G.W. Pabst than Ken Loach and Tony Richardson. Somewhat like a 1970s British take on Fritz Lang's M (1931) minus the serial killer (although it does have a pedo and a gang of killers!) as penned by a less annoying Brit Bertolt Brecht and directed by a less cynical and more sentimental Robert Altman, Despins' second feature is set in a sort of neo-Dickensian dystopia inhabited by an eclectic collection of poor working-class characters, including a tough and equally tyrannical Teutonic landlady who looks like she was spawned from an American trailer park, a homesick Indian who can only dream of Calcutta and is thoroughly convinced the world is about to end as a result of the moon supposedly being covered in blood, a drunken Irish bartender who stereotypically beats his fiancée and hates England, and a motley crew of droog-like juvenile delinquents that have a propensity for pernicious things like gang-rape and murder. Sentimental without being sappy or phony, The Moon Over the Alley is surely the rare kind of arthouse film about the working-class that could actually be enjoyed by the working-class, thus making for a work that would probably leave a bitter taste in the mouth of pathologically pedantic New York City liberal types who look at people, especially poor people, as statistics and who refuse to believe that there are whites struggling in ghettos.

The Moon Over the Alley opens with a truly odd couple—a large and in charge 50-something-year old hobo lady named Sybil (Doris Fishwick) and her much younger and shorter intellectually-challenged beau Akki (Peter Farrell)—walking down a dark London alleyway under the moonlight. As Sybil tells her beloved dullard boy, “...in a little while, you will see that the moon won’t be so bright as it is now. Clouds will cover it...clouds will cover it and spirits will cover it. It will love that, but it will lose in days to come [...] it will lose more and more of itself, it will get broke up there. I hope it won’t break us.” As Sybil adds in her particular brand of peasant poetry, “the moon makes you play...the moon makes me sing...the moon means everything to what we do...or don’t do,” and indeed, the fuller the moon gets, the crazier the dirt poor people in the Notting Hill section of London seem to get. The film mainly focuses on the borderline destitute inhabitants of a dilapidated boardinghouse owned by a rough acting and looking German woman named Bertha Gusset (Erna May, who played the sweetheart prostitute ‘Your Gracie’ in Duffer) and her kind but somewhat cuckolded and feeble-minded husband Bert (John Gay), who have a young and considerably gawky teenage son named Ronnie (Patrick Murray, who went on to play small roles in Brit cult flicks like Alan Clarke’s Scum (1979) and Brian Gibson’s Breaking Glass (1980)). Bertha acts rude and aggressive to everyone, including her son, at whom she screams, “wake up, you good for nothing!” right in front of his face to wake him up, though she does tend to get in a happy mood anytime one of her favorite songs comes on the radio to the extent where she starts singing, dancing, and even kissing her loved ones. Despite having an obscenely bitchy mother, Ronnie is a fairly nice fellow who has a little girlfriend named Nellie Tudge (Lesley Roach of the BBC children’s fantasy show Jackanory (1965–1996)) in what is a sort of Romeo and Juliet-esque relationship, as the two teenage lovebird’s mothers hate each other.

If Bertha is a rude kraut cunt, Nellie’s mother Ethel (Joan Geary of Fräulein Doktor (1969)) is a two-faced busybody bitch who talks trash in secret to her emasculated tobacco shop owner hubby Joe (Norman Mitchell of the Hammer horror flick Frankenstein and the Monster from Hell (1974)), who seems rather turned-off by his wife's pathological negativity but does not have the testicular fortitude to stand up to her. Ethel is irked that her daughter is dating Ronnie, who in her mind is "the son of his mother" and a half-kraut. Indeed, Ethel hates krauts and thinks that all Germans are Nazis, stating in regard to Bertha, "Don't tell me Hitler's dead. If he is dead, he won't lie down. Don't tell me Hitler's lying down because I know different...Fascists just a stones throw away from here." Although she still speaks broken English, Bertha has been living in England for over three decades and hates foreigners more than the average Brit. When a seemingly deranged middle-aged Hindu fellow comes up to her while she is washing off the front porch of her house, asks her for a room for "just one night," and eccentrically states, "These stairs are wet! What is happening to the earth? Do you not glimpse in the cracks of the pavement? The hidden worth...the values hidden here. We shall all be dead tomorrow. I'm faraway from home...", Bertha becomes quite agitated and tells him that she has no problem with colored folks but that she refuses to rent out a room to him. After declaring, "In Calcutta where I was born and educated, life is worse than this...but it is still better in Calcutta" and describing how there will be a "drop of blood on the moon tonight," the Indian eccentric goes on his merry way while continuing to mumble bizarre gibberish. To her minor credit, Bertha has good reason to be a bitch because a government bureaucrat came by her house and told her that her house has been scheduled to be demolished in one year's time, which is a complete and utter outrage since she and her hubby rightfully own the building and should not have their increasingly socialistic government dictate to them what they can and cannot do with their own property.

Probably the only thing that all the inhabitants of the boardinghouse have in common is that they are all poor and, at least to some extent, miserable to the point where they seem used to feeling like shit all the time. Jack MacMahon (Sean Caffrey of Val Guest's Hammer dinosaur flick When Dinosaurs Ruled the Earth (1970)) is a stereotypical Irish drunkard with a shitty attitude in his mid-30s who works as a bartender and has no problem beating up his longtime fiancée Belinda (Sharon Forester) if she gets out of line. When Belinda shows up outside of her fiancé's boardinghouse sporting a tacky bleach blonde wig and dressed like a cheap hooker, Jack complains "you seem like a changed person" and looks at her if she's an alien. Despite turning 30 soon, Belinda got engaged to Jack when she was 12 and he was 15, but her boy toy will only agree to marry her when she gets enough money to afford a proper apartment for both of them, so she has taken it upon herself to save up enough money to buy a suitable flat by stripping in the red light district. When Jack calls Belinda a "fucking little whore" and smacks the shit out of her because of her new choice of employment, Bertha runs in and smacks the shit out of him, even knocking him out with a single blow, thus demonstrating that an Irish man is no match for a German woman. The newest tenants of the boardinghouse are a Jamaican negro couple, which include the young patriarch 'Washington,' his wife, and their baby son 'Little Washington.' They live in the upstairs apartment of the boardinghouse with two other black families and Washington has just started working at the same bar as Jack, though they don't realize that they are neighbors until they begin shooting the shit together. Unquestionably, the creepiest, most introverted, and lonely person living in the boardinghouse is a grotesquely elderly cadaver-like fellow named Mr. Deray (Basil Clarke, who appeared in P.J. Hogan's Muriel's Wedding (1994)) who lives with rats in squalor and who is an assumed pedophile who spends most of his time stalking and crudely staring at prepubescent little girls, especially when no other adults are around.

When Mr. Deray spots a lonely little girl named Katie (played by stunt motorcyclist and top Hollywood stuntwoman Debbie Evans of Terminator 2: Judgement Day (1991) and countless other Hollywood blockbusters when she was a fairly chubby little girl), he goes up to her in a supremely creepy fashion and tries to ply her with candy by sinisterly asking her if she "wants sweets," but luckily the little lass has enough intuition to sense that he is a sexual predator with unsavory intentions. Katie is outside on the street by herself in a less than safe area because her mother is a floozy and alcoholic who is such a heartless woman that she remarks regarding her progeny while she is standing right there to some guy she has just picked up at a bar, "you wouldn't think she was mine, would you? That's the trouble with having a kid like that...I mean she's got no spirit...that's what's wrong with her." Of course, Katie's lack of spirit is probably the result of the fact that she has no father and her mother is a self-centered slut who cares more about getting banged by random bros that she meets at the bar than properly taking care of her daughter and watching out for her safety. Luckily, some dirty hippies cheer up Katie and give her "spirit" by teaching her to sing a folk song. When a gang of violent boys spot Mr. Deray gawking at little Katie in a less than savory fashion while she sings, they decide to hunt him down and beat him to a bloody pulp with the utmost malice. On the other side of town, McDrunk Jack goes searching for his fiancée in various seedy bars and strip clubs and when he eventually spots her singing and dancing on stage as part of a girlish schoolgirl-like quartet, she becomes so embarrassed that she stops singing and dancing mid-performance and even forgets to show off her derriere at the end of the song like the rest of her co-dancers. After the bawdy burlesque routine, Jack, who is now angrier than a latent lesbian nun in a porno theater, charges the stage and nonsensically attacks the girls, thus resulting in him being subsequently severely beaten by the bouncer of the club. Luckily for Jack, his faithful fiancée comes out and comforts him while he is lying in the middle of the street after being beaten to a bloody pulp. Indeed, in the proletarian world, it seems like people are more liable to stay with you no matter how big of a dick you act like, as people have nothing but each other and thus have a much greater asshole tolerance.

Meanwhile, Ronnie takes his quasi-girlfriend Nellie for a romantic stroll and pathetically tries to talk her into having sex, but she is too afraid, though she does end up losing her virginity that night, albeit in a heinous fashion that she and her boy toy probably never thought imaginable. Indeed, the same gang of violent hoodlums that brutally assaulted Mr. Deray attack Ronnie and ultimately beat him good and bloody while forcing him to watch his beloved girlfriend Nellie being brutally raped while a dirty adult hippie secretly watches on via a crack in his door and does nothing to help the couple, thus signifying the general apathy of people in Notting Hill when it comes to violent crimes. Meanwhile back at the boardinghouse, an aspiring American singer named Jim (Leroy Hyde)—a fellow that is symbolic of the delusional view that yanks have of England as a dimwitted yet well-meaning dude with a lot of excess cash who decided to move to the UK because he thought it would be easier for him to become a famous folk singer since, after all, the Beatles are from there, and who has willingly paid an inflated rate to live underneath the stairs of the building—spots brutalized and bloody Mr. Deray stumble into the building and immediately informs slumlord Bertha when the old fart refuses help and locks himself inside his apartment. Ultimately, Bertha and Jim find Mr. Deray's corpse in his apartment and are shocked to see that the old dead pedo has a horrified expression on his lifeless face, as if he saw the Grim Reaper before being sent straight to hell. Meanwhile, since their daughter is late coming home, Nellie's parents go looking for her and Ronnie, who are ultimately found with the help of hobo couple Sybil and Akki, who were also once victims of the youth gang's savagery. As it turns out, Ronnie was so brutally beaten by the boy gang that he suffered a small skull fracture and has totally lost vision in one of his eyes. In the end, the government forces the tenants to move out of the boardinghouse and the building destroyed to make way for Soviet style public housing.

Notably, near the beginning of The Moon Over the Alley, teenage lovers Ronnie and Nellie go on a date at a movie theater where they see the once-controversial British cult flick It Happened Here: The Story of Hitler's England (1964) co-directed by film historian/documentarian Kevin Brownlow and military uniform expert Andrew Mollo, which depicts an alternate historical scenario where Britain has been occupied by Nazi Germany. Unquestionably, after watching Joseph Despins' film, I cannot help but think that England would have been better off if the Third Reich had taken over the country and won the war, as that would have certainly beat the multicultural nightmare depicted in The Moon Over the Alley where educated Indians are thrown into near insanity due to homesickness and where poor sub-literate negroes and perennially pissed off mick drunkards are forced to fight over lousy jobs and stale bread crumbs. Of course, if the film was remade today in an authentic way (which would never happen in a million years considering the sort of authoritarian political correctness that prevails today in less than jolly old England), the central ghetto setting would be a no-go-zone for whites and even police that is inhabited by hostile Islamic Arabs and Pakis who are not beneath raping preteen white girls and forcing them into sex slavery. In The Moon Over the Alley, the only racial tension is caused by whites and white cops, but overall the ghetto is depicted as a largely culturally pluralistic place where everyone is equally poor and similarly struggling, thus making it seem like some sort of multicultural utopia could somehow spring up under the right circumstances, which is pure wishful thinking of the deluded far-leftist idealist sort. Although I absolutely loathe musicals and found most of the songs in the flick to be nothing short of auditory torture, the musical numbers in The Moon Over the Alley are seamlessly interwoven into the film's narrative to the point where I never really became conscious of the fact that I was watching a quasi-musical, as the work is more of a postcolonial Dickensian parable depicting the excess rabble of a once great but now pre-apocalyptic empire than some sort of pornographically structured celluloid sing-and-dance-a-thon like Guys and Dolls (1955) or West Side Story (1961). Unquestionably, for better or worse, there is no other film quite like Despina's work, which even features a sort of proto-Goth scene featuring a holocaust survivor-esque tranny doing a spooky drag show in pancake makeup at a bar fittingly called 'Danse Macabre.' Of course, one can only wonder if certain members of British Goth/deathrock bands like Bauhaus, Sex Gang Children, and the Virgin Prunes saw the film, though I certainly would not be surprised if they did (notably, Despina and Dumaresq two films were released on DVD/Blu-ray by the BFI largely as a result of industrial musician Peter 'Sleazy' Christopherson of Throbbing Gristle/Coil championing Duffer). Indeed, in a strange sort of inexplicable fashion, The Moon Over the Alley feels like a work of proletarian Gothic horror, albeit with a crummy old boardinghouse instead of a haunted castle and realistic human 'monsters' instead of archetypal supernatural beings. After all, the characters in the film do not need to watch horror films, as they live in a virtual living hell where their neighbors are much more scarier than Christopher Lee or Boris Karloff. I noticed that a lot of reviewers have written that Duffer and The Moon Over the Alley could not be more different types of films, yet to me, they both captured the same sort of dispiriting spirit of impending doom and abject misery that plagued white London ghettos during the 1970s, although I guess one could argue the latter work is more 'lighthearted,' if only because it features catchy songs and does not feature man-on-boy sexual sadism and baby corpses being disposed of in dumpsters, among other things. Not surprisingly considering the marginality of their work together, Despina and Dumaresq would never collaborate on another film after The Moon Over the Alley, which is a shame considering they could have certainly become a sort of Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger of the underground cult/arthouse world.

DON'T GO IN THE HOUSE

Joseph Ellison (1979)

On the outer shell of this cult video nasty lies the subtle appearance of just another trashy bargain bin horror film. The 80's were bombarded with these little wonders. One might question whether films such as Death Spa were really necessary. If I've been shocked to find treasure from trash, it's with this multi-layered symphony of madness. Donny Kohler is an extremely disturbed individual. Not the suppressed Hollywood kind, but the type where his anxiety and torment leaks through his pores and retinas on screen. His character is one that makes you feel alone, vulnerable, and uncomfortable. Through his experiences on the screen, we learn of his past and his sickness. I really appreciated the nods towards matadors, fire, and the color red, all blending within to create some form of illness not recognized. Through his forced misogynistic eyes, he picks up young woman and brings them to his house in several extremely embarrassing scenes. He doesn't just magically whisks them to his abode without trouble. At times, he stumbles, stalks, bribes, and flat out makes a fool of himself in order to satisfy the voices that talk to him and push him over the edge. (The 80's Psycho) Don't Go in the House is far from a conventional horror film. The intimacy between Donny (Dan Grimaldi) and the camera is one upped by none other. If the film lacked the support of Donny's one and only friend Bobby, this story might be far too grim for anyone to view. This film is dark, unsettling, and nihilistic. Despite the psychological elements, the film fares overly well with its horror roots. When I decided to view this film last night, I was coming off of a good buzz. At the first burning scene, I was almost disgusted by the barbaric context in which such a sweet female was burned alive. Soon, I began to adapt to his extreme misogyny and I loved nothing more to watch the next whore burn and suffer for what they've done to Donny. Surely a film that enthralls and seduces your judgment could be dangerous, but that's the special merit about this film. The slasher influence stays intact as Donny menacingly stalks his corridors searching to knock out beautiful hitchhikers. Other than this, the film features extremely shocking and startling jump scenes of fire and his decomposing charred mother egging him on and torturing him that much more. The most notorious feature is a surprise ending, one of which that horrified me, and this surprise ending is worthy of Sleepaway Camp fame, regardless that this came out before. I chose not to ruin anything for you on this film. Only what we illustrate in our minds can lead us to that ultimate terror. I'm a stern horror fan who has no visual fear. I will be completely honest on this one. Don't Go in the House took me, left me vulnerable, horrified with with a scintillating score echoing in the background. I don't think I'll ever enjoy another 80's horror film as much as I did this one.

BOOTS /& SADDLES
BOOTS /& SADDLES

Joseph Kane (1937)

From Kenneth Anger's homoerotic bike boy classic Scorpio Rising (1964) to Italian auteur Liliana Cavani's tragic yet titillating S&M themed dark romance The Night Porter (1974) aka Il portiere di notte to totally tasteless exploitation excrement like Ilsa, She Wolf of the SS (1975) to the Danish-Swedish skinhead-themed gay drama Broderskab (2009) aka Brotherhood starring popular Danish actor Thure Lindhardt, Nazis and Nazi imagery have more than proven their worth in terms of filmic fetishism, so it should be no surprise the shadow of Uncle Adolf's 12-year-long millennial Reich would also darken the gay pornography world, especially in regard to the leather-bound sadomasochistic realm. Indeed, a typical yet somewhat standout example of this is the gritty fag fuck flick Boots & Saddles (1982), which is the third film of a four part tribute to gay porn icon 'Scorpio' by Cream of the Crop Entertainment that should not be confused with the 1975 homo hardcore flick by Zachary Strong of the same name. Directed by the sexually flexible pornographic auteur John Amero of the Amero brothers (Christopher Street Blues, Killing Me Softly) under the pseudonym 'Francis Elise,' this sub-low-tech porn piece depicts what happens when a bourgeois bitch boy falls prey to the decidedly depraved desires of a long-haired neo-Nazi lunatic with a foul fetishism for brutally beating strangers with big black dildos and raping the mouths beta-boys while posing in a Breker-esque fashion next to his beloved swastika flag. If Amero and his straight brother Lem (Checkmate, R.S.V.P.) somehow managed to turn New York City into a foreboding psychedelic Gothic nightmare for his masterful heterosexual experimental blue movie Bacchanale (1971), he opted to utilize the sleaze, slime, and true grit of the rotten Big Apple to give Boots & Saddles a rawer and more realistic vibe. Starring old school porn icon 'Scorpio', who previously starred in Amero's morbid male-only chamber piece The Death of Scorpio (1979), as a sadistic neo-Nazi that cruises local gay bars for potential victims that he can bring home, tie up, and bugger in front of a large portrait of Hitler and a swastika flag, Boots & Saddles is surely a sicko classic that reminds the viewer that maybe William Friedkin was not that out of hand when he sparked protest with his absolutely savage sodomite slasher flick Cruising (1980). The closest thing to an urban gay revisionist western and the perfect companion piece to Friedkin's Cruising, Amero's film was made at a time when the gay porn industry had still had some testicular fortitude and was not afraid of scaring queens with depictions of unhinged masculinity. The most warped and sexually perverse reworking of the western genre since Neuer Deutscher Film alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's underrated racially-charged work Whity (1971), Boots & Saddles certainly makes the few gay erotic westerns that exist like Song of the Loon (1970) seem like castrated sentimentalist celluloid swill.

Beginning with a shot of a pair of Gestapo-esque boots sitting in front of a white background, Boots & Saddles—a film that borrows its name from the name of the bar that the characters regularly ‘cruise’ for urban cocksucking cowboys—then cuts to an shot of sadomasochistic gay neo-Nazi ‘Karl’ (Scorpio) walking down a New York City street while sporting a maroon bomber jacket (the typical ‘uniform’ of neo-Nazis), black leather boots, and a National Socialist iron cross necklace. Indeed, for whatever reason, Karl has a rare “Spanish Cross” aka “Spanienkreuz” in silver, which was awarded to German troops who participated in the Spanish Civil War on the side of the nationalist general turned Spanish dictator Francisco Franco. Somewhere, not far away, an effete bourgeois type from Albany named ‘Bob’ (Chip Kingsley) visits the apartment of a female business associate, but as he learns from her exceedingly extroverted neighbor Jack Wrangler, who is outside sweeping in an uncommonly jubilant fashion, the woman moved away three months ago. When Bob asks Wrangler where he can get some “good Irish coffee,” he says, “yeah, right up stairs,” and then the two proceed to dine upon one another’s bodies upon entering the rather messy flat. While the two men share oral pleasure via 69, fuck, and cum again, Bob freaks out when he finds a letter while looking for matches sitting around the apartment revealing that his new joy boy has a venereal disease. When Wrangler asks him if he found the matches, Bob replies in a bitchy fashion, “I sure did. Thanks for nothing, I hope” and then proceeds to run out of the apartment in fear that he might have contracted an STD. Ultimately, Bob decides to head to a gay bar called ‘Boots & Saddles’ where he will inevitably meet a menacing psychopath with a fetish for swastikas, iron crosses, and bound boys.

While hanging out the bar, Bob watches as the Bartender’s hustler boyfriend (played by Roy Garrett) enters the bathroom followed by a cocksucking cowboy who proceeds to suck him off to the fitting sensual sounds of “Like an Eagle” by gay porn star turned disco singer Dennis Parker aka Wade Nichols. Naturally, the Bartender gets rather pissed by his Hustler’s boy toy’s “riding” of the cowboy and complains to him, “Listen, you dumb bitch...where do you get the balls to fuck around right in front of my face? When we moved in together, we agreed that you would hustle and I would bartend. Well, your ever faithful lover wants a piece of it and he wants it now!” Indeed, the Bartender and Hustler go up stairs and bang next to a bunch of boxes of Heineken beer. Eventually, Scorpio arrives at the bar and wastes no time cruising Bob and coercing him to come back to his apartment with him. Despite the fact that he thinks he has probably just contracted an STD, Bob has no problem blowing Scorpio. Meanwhile, Wrangler calls around looking for Bob and discovers that he was spotted at the Boots & Saddles bar. When Wrangler arrives at the bar and asks about Bob, he learns from a bartender that he left with “that crazy one with the cross.” After complaining that “Karl...that fucking Nazi” has taken his beloved new beau Bob, he naturally makes his way to the fag Führer’s swastika-adorned apartment.

BOOTS /& SADDLES

When Bob notices the portrait of Hitler and the Nazi flag that are hanging in Scorpio's apartment wall while being sucked off by the sadistic would-be-SS-man, he complains, "You know, I don't feel so good. I think I better go" and attempts to make his great escape, but he does not get far. After telling Bob, "You'll leave when I'm through with you and not a moment before," Scorpio handcuffs his victim to a chair and forces him to fellate him while he wallows in pleasure and glory next to his swastika flag. To the grating sounds of Marlene Dietrich singing in German, Scorpio perniciously penetrates Bob's man-cunt. After blowing his load on a meager untermensch, Scorpio begins beating Bob with a giant black dildo (!) and states to his victim in a sinister fashion, "this should help you get your rocks off." Of course, Wrangler soon shows up at the apartment and yells, "open up you twisted bastard!" while beating on Scorpio's door. After breaking down the door, Wrangler knocks out Scorpio, calls him a "twisted bastard" again, and rips his swastika flag off the wall, thus causing a fire to start when the flag lands on a candle (since Scorpio is a sadistic creep, he likes to have tons of candles lit while ritualistically raping men in an almost satanic fashion). When Scorpio becomes conscious again, he gets in a physical struggle that results in his balls and bunghole being burned. Ultimately, Wrangler handcuffs and leaves him in the middle of his apartment so that his landlady will find him. As a completely humiliated would-be-Übermensch who has been beaten and defeated, Scorpio cries out, "Mein Gott" in German. In the end, Bob and his hero Wrangler discuss living with one another. Indeed, as it turns out, the chivalrous Wrangler apparently no longer has a STD and only kept the letter as a "souvenir."

While depicted as a brutal 'blond beast' of the savagely sexual and marvelously masculine sort in Boots & Saddles and various other fuck films, Scorpio was apparently an effeminate mamma's boy in real-life who worked as a hair stylist after retiring from porn. Of course, Scorpio was also as far from a National Socialist as a person could be, as a sort of gay chauvinist who even refused working with "gay for pay" porn stars, as demonstrated by his remark, "I'd rather work with a complete gay cast, instead of straights. I don't like straight people in a gay film. I want someone that's going to reciprocate. I don't need a 'do-me queen.'" As he described himself in the documentary Wrangler: Anatomy of an Icon (2008), Jack Wrangler was a quarter Jewish (his paternal grandfather was a Jew) and he somewhat identified with his Judaic side, thus his role in Amero's film as a heroic character who saves his beloved from a nefarious neo-Nazi and then literally burns the balls and buttocks of said neo-Nazi had more personal significance to him. In fact, that is not the only way the film had personal meaning for Wrangler, as his half-Jewish father Robert Thurston Stillman was a Hollywood film and TV producer who produced a western-themed TV series called Boots and Saddles (1957-1958), hence the assumed tongue-in-cheek origin of the title of Amero's film, as well as its unconventional use of genre conventions. Indeed, any

John Ford fan would know almost immediately upon watching Boots & Saddles that is a sort of wanton reworking of the western genre, albeit set in urban NYC instead of the rural Wild West and featuring neo-Nazis instead of Indians as villains. After all, one of the main settings of the western genre is a saloon, which is largely where Amero's film is set. Of course, with the appearance of a rowdy and raunchy urban cowboy who uses a hustler like a cowgirl, Boots & Saddles also gives a cynical nod to John Schlesinger's Midnight Cowboy (1969). With its curious cocktail of Nazi leather-fags, gay disco music, hustler-humping cowboys, men with mustaches, and seedy gay bar inhabited by rugged men, Amero's film features a virtual catalog of vintage gay stereotypes and clichés, thus making it mandatory viewing for any self-respecting fan of porn chic era fuck flicks.

SUDDENLY LAST SUMMER

Joseph L. Mankiewicz (1959)

Finally graduating from the nauseatingly nostalgic true grit of VHS to digital video, sub-underground archivist, historian, and auteur John Aes-Nihil (Manson Family Movies, The Dreamachine Exhibition) would eventually complete the second film in his proposed Tennessee Williams trilogy (following The Drift and the mysterious Boom), Suddenly Last Summer (2008). As Mr. Aes-Nihil told me in an e-mail, the only reason the auteur got around to actually finishing (many of his films are ‘works-in-progress’ that take upwards of decades to complete) Suddenly Last Summer is so it could premiere at the Provincetown Tennessee Williams Theater Festival in Massachusetts where it was screened alongside Joseph L. Mankiewicz’s 1959 Hollywood adaptation of the same name starring Elizabeth Taylor and Katharine Hepburn, as well as the 1993 BBC Great Performances TV play starring Maggie Smith, Rob Lowe, and Natasha Richardson. Described lovingly by David Kaplan—the director of the Tennessee Williams Festival—as follows, “SUDDENLY LAST SUMMER channels the wake of the Titanic: recognizable chunks of Tennessee Williams’ original text, plot, and cast bob and float on a soundtrack of malice,” Aes-Nihil’s recklessly wayward take on both Williams and Mankiewicz’s tale of fucked family matters turns its deadly serious source material(s) on its homo head and goes so far as to make a manically melodramatic mockery of death, cannibalism, mental illness, lobotomies, and scandalous family tragedy. Aberrantly adapted from the 1958 off-Broadway Williams play that was inspired by the poof playwright’s personal experiences, as well as the life of queer American poet Hart Crane (who committed suicide in 1932 at the age of 32 by jumping overboard on the steamship Orizaba after being beaten up for making homosexual advances to a heterosexual crew member of the ship) and various then-trendy psychoanalytic theories, Aes-Nihil’s Suddenly Last Summer is hysterical queen camp with the moral fortitude of an autistic transvestite toddler addicted to Ritalin and second rate Italian soap operas. Starring beyond beefy black tranny Vaginal Davis (Hustler White, The Lollipop Generation)—a meta-mensch of a perverse performance artist who has performed in bands with such charming names as ‘Black Fag’ and ‘The Afro Sisters’—in the decidedly diva role that Katharine Hepburn played in Mankiewicz’s adaptation, Suddenly Last Summer is the sort of film that could be used as aesthetic torture against about 6 billion people around the world, so it should be no surprise that John Waters stated of it, “It’s Fabulous, I Love It! Vaginal’s Performance is Phenomenal!” in what could not have been a more apt endorsement. The exceedingly bitchy and campy tale of a wealthy grief-stricken mother/widow who wants her niece-in-law to have a lobotomy so the truth about her gay poet son’s tragic death will never be revealed to the world, Suddenly Last Summer is probably the only film ever made where a queer Negro manages to pull off the role of a stinking rich white matriarch of the conspicuously cultivated and sinisterly scheming son-loving sort.

Venomous spade she-bitch Violet Venable (Dr. Vaginal Davis) is rather melancholy over the fact that her art-fag poet son Sebastian (portrayed by both Lawrence Elbert and David Organisek) will never write another poem again (during his short life, he would write a whopping single poem a year in between vacationing), but that does not stop her from being so disgustingly hateful as to plot to have her niece-in-law Catherine Holly (Jade Gordon) receive a lobotomy so as to hide the fact that her pretentious pansy progeny enjoyed engaging in mass orgies with dirty and uneducated proletarian boys. As is revealed in gay gossip detail, twink sodomite Seb used to use his cousin Catherine as a means to lure men and since she knows he is a homo who died via ritualistic cannibalism, Mrs. Venable wants a piece of her brain pulled out of her niece's pretty little head. Since her scheming mother Ms. Holly (lapsed Warhol superstar Bibbe Hansen, who is probably best known as the mother of musician Beck) and greedy philistine brother George Holly (Jason Majik) stand to receive $500,000 from Mrs. Venable as a reward for her lobotomy, Catherine really has very little choice about whether a piece of her grey matter will be drilled out of her thick skull or not. Venable has hired a small fellow named Dr. Sugar (his real name is 'Cukrowicz', which is Polish for 'sugar') played by Lance Loud (who died long before the film was released in 2001 and to whom the work is dedicated) to examine Catherine and see if she is worthy of doctor-approved brain damage. While waiting for a date with the doc at a mental institution, Catherine burns a sassy nurse/nun named Sister Felicity (played by the Goddess Bunny in what is easily the paraplegic tranny's most butch film role) with cigarettes. After stating, "I am going to give you a simple injection of the truth...whether you like it or not" and giving Catherine an injection of some good pharmacy grade smack, Dr. Sugar learns that Saint Sebastian was a scheming sodomite who took his cousin to Europe and treated her to a lavish vacation of decadence, but whose generosity was merely a ploy to con his relative into carrying out dirty deeds for him. Indeed, Sebastian forced his little cousin to wear scandalous curve-exposing bathing suits to capture the attention of young men, so he could later defile them. Before using Catherine to procure prole peckers, Seb the sod also used his unwitting mother, who never in a million years would consider that her little baby boy was a debauched boy-buggerer. One day, while on vacation with Catherine, Sebastian was worshipped as a god by a horde of young boys who got so horny and hungry that they killed and cannibalized the poet in a Dahmeresque fashion. In the end, Catherine and Sebastian's beachside rendezvous are pseudo-sentimentally recalled in preposterous detail. Undoubtedly, I found it hard to cry about the fact that suddenly last summer a sod of a poet who wrote one poem a year was devoured by a perverted pack of brown boys, thus resulting in the end of pretentious poetry for Violet Venable.

SUDDENLY LAST SUMMER

While I must admit that I discovered more delightful aesthetic debasement and diva derangement in director John Aes-Nihil's previous Tennessee Williams adaptation The Drift (1989), Suddenly Last Summer still has enough post-postmodern trashcan camp to wet the panties of 101 attention-starved white trash tranny junkies from Southern California. Indeed, while big and bombastic blacktrass Vaginal Davis lacks the handicapped homo glamour of thee Goddess Bunny, he certainly lent a certain untamed energy to the role of Violet Venable that reminds one why Katharine Hepburn is one of the most absurdly annoying, uniquely unfeminine, and outrageously overrated queen bitches to be shat out the kosher gloryhole that is holy-wood. After watching Suddenly Last Summer back-to-back with Mankiewicz's dark 1959 melodrama starring Hepburn and Elizabeth Taylor, I can safely say that Aes-Nihil did an innately iconoclastic job reducing a Hollywood classic to the level of an off-off-off-Broadway drag show that would even make gay gutter-auteur Andy Milligan gawk in abject disgust. A sardonically sordid story about a scattered-brained queer-cousin-loving dame who fails to "cut that HIDEOUS STORY out of her head" after taking a narcotic-filled needle in her arm and vomiting the quasi-spiritual event where her cock-sucking megalomaniac cousin was eaten by a tribe of cannibalistic twinkies, Aes-Nihil's Suddenly Last Summer ultimately reveals with its strikingly simplistic style of storytelling that Tennessee Williams essentially wrote pumped up poof pulp trash in play form. If you ever wondered if Katharine Hepburn was less feminine than a black drag queen and/or if Tennessee Williams has anything in common with John Waters aside being effortlessly effete, Suddenly Last Summer is certainly a work that answers a number of life's many mysteries, albeit in a manner that personifies delusional dollar store glamour that only can be found in the modern day Sodom that is sunny Southern California.

A BELL FROM HELL

Juan Antonio Bardem (1973)

Attempting to dig up a decent horror-related film that I had yet to see became a rather redundant task for me a while ago and I have essentially given up on attempting to defend the genre (with a couple exceptions, of course), but when I do end up happening upon a surprisingly decent film from the genre, it happens to have at least one (but usually both) of the following qualities: 1. It's European 2. It is at least over 30 years old. Of course, it was no surprise for me that my latest noteworthy horror-related discovery, A Bell from Hell (1973) aka La campana del infierno, was not only made over a decade before I was born and is a Spanish-French coproduction, but also features a fairly decent cast, including French actor Renaud Verley (who played the troubled young man Gunther Von Essenbeck in Visconti's high-camp masterpiece The Damned (1969)) in the lead role and Swedish-born veteran actress Viveca Lindfors (who horror fans will recognize for her performance as 'Aunt Bedelia' in Creepshow (1982) segment "Father's Day") in the role of an evil wheelchair-bound cripple aunt who perniciously plots to steal the protagonist's inheritance. Featuring a quasi-psychopathic and highly charismatic anti-hero who beats Alex in Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971) in terms of sadistic suaveness and aberrant allure as the lead character, A Bell from Hell is undoubtedly a character-driven work yet it also a scandalously sardonic scare-fest featuring a startlingly idiosyncratic hodgepodge of surrealist, gothic, and Mondo Cane-esque imagery to the point of almost aesthetic overload. In fact, like most great films, A Bell from Hell is so chock full of captivating imagery and cleverly naughty nuances that a mere single viewing of the film will not suffice for the viewer to appreciate what a truly lavish and meticulously assembled work ill-fated Spanish auteur Claudio Guerin (The Challenges aka Los desafios, The House of the Doves aka La casa de las palomas) assembled. Surprisingly Buñuel-esque in its absurdist attacks on the Spanish bourgeoisie, yet all the more brutal due to its utilization of then-totally-taboo horror imagery, including blood and guts, full-frontal nudity, and incestuous eroticism, A Bell from Hell is a radically rare piece of left-wing gothic-gore that actually manages not to bore the viewer due to its patently political persuasion. Foretelling the psychosexual sadism that would dominate Italian cinema in the late-1970s but with the poesy aesthetic cultivation of Italian maestro Mario Bava (Black Sunday, Blood and Black Lace) and the more interesting works of Hammer Films, A Bell from Hell also manages to reconcile the aesthetic and thematic differences of the horror genre of old and new in a most strikingly seamless manner. In fact, A Bell from Hell was penned by Santiago Moncada, who also wrote the script for the Bava flick Hatchet for the Honeymoon (1970) aka Il rosso segno della follia and actress Christina von Blanc appeared in the Jess Franco/Jean Rollin flick A Virgin Among the Living Dead (1973), thus illustrating the ‘range’ of horror talent in Guerin’s artful horror-thriller. The wantonly and recklessly witty tale of a black sheep of a bourgeoisie who gets out of a mental institution and seeks revenge against the aunt and relatives who put him there so as to steal inheritance, A Bell from Hell is the kind of conspicuously class-conscious cinematic work you would have been directed by a bloodthirsty Bolshevik revolutionary with a scathing and seemingly Satanic sense of humor and a cultivated bourgeois talent for cinematic art.

John (Renaud Verley)—a rather peculiar pretty boy with a seemingly sadistic yet good humored knack for elaborate practical jokes and creating realistic mask replicas of his own face—is randomly released from a mental institution on probation and given a summons for his upcoming hearing in two months regarding whether or not he is sane enough to become a productive member of society. John moves into his deceased mother’s home, which is somewhat dilapidated and dust-ridden due to being unoccupied for what seems like a number of years. Although bourgeois by way of blood and a rather large inheritance, John decides to take up the less than glorious work-class trade of working as a butcher (actor Verley gutted a cow in real-life for the film), but he suddenly quits after he’s “learned enough” as it seems he wants to utilize his new slaughtering skills on a more bipedal sort of animal. Even more endlessly explicit than the bloody slaughterhouse scene in Fassbinder’s In a Year of 13 Moons (1978), A Bell from Hell spares no viewer in depicting the grizzly process it takes to turn cute cows into ground beef. Although destined to inherit a hefty fortune due to his mother tragically committing suicide by way of apparently jumping off a cliff, John believes his wheelchair-bound witch of an aunt Marta (Viveca Lindfors) wants to get rid of him so she can get the money and that his stint in the loony bin was a result of his aunt bribing a doctor to declare him insane. Marta also has three gorgeous teenage daughters that include Esther (Maribel Martin), Maria (Christina von Blanc), and Teresa (Nuria Gimeno), the latter two seeming to be still attached to their mother by the umbilical cord due to their groveling natures. It is quite apparent upon reuniting with his trio of cute cousins that John and his blood kin share incestuous feelings, which is further supported by the fact that he has nude photos of one of them on his wall. John also has feelings for an elder woman (Nicole Vesperini) who he is most mad at for selling-out and marrying an old bourgeois bastard named Pedro (Alfredo Mayo), so he plays an elaborate practical joke on her by pretending to rip out both of his own eyes, which causes the petrified woman to faint. Of course, the pernicious prankster does not stop there as John also takes off the panties of the newly married woman after she passes out and makes it seem like he molested her so as to play another vengeful joke on her. An uniquely unhinged yet contradictory young man, John becomes a hero the same day by saving the local town hermit shepherd’s daughter from being raped by some bourgeois hunters, which includes pernicious prick Pedro, after showing up on his motorcycle like a knight in shining amour. Pretending to break his arms, which are in ridiculous wing-like casts, John plays a joke on prick Pedro by convincing him to hold his cock whilst pissing in a urinal. Meanwhile, John begins constructing an elaborate torture chamber at his mother's home, which he has also redecorated entirely with a curious combination of pop-art and gothic themes. John has also filled his house with wild animals, including monkeys, birds, turtles, etc. and when his aunt asks him why he has so many animals, he matter-of-factly states, "I like animals...they're real...they eat when they're hungry...they sleep when they're tired...and they fuck when they're in heat," thus hinting at what he believes is the soulless, pretentious, repressive, suppressive, and oppressive nature of the bourgeois, especially in regard to his own family. In a postmodern tribute to horror films of the past, John madly plays an organ like The Phantom of the Opera while a black Poe-esque raven sits perched to his side. When John has his aunt and three cousins come over for a special dinner, he arrives at the conclusion that he must take total revenge against his relatives after pleading to Marta, "Give me back my passport...you'll never hear from me again, I swear it," and she turns him down. It becomes quite apparent in this scene that aunt Marta not only wants John's inheritance, but it seems that she is even more concerned about her naughty nephew 'tainting' the reputation of her incestuous family.

A mental young man with a more bitter than sweet nostalgia for the past, John fanatically watches old homemovies and looks at pictures of his family, reminiscing over singing the French nursery melody "Frère Jacques," and even sentimentally declaring to one of his cousins, "We were all free then...the past didn't exist and the future wasn't a threat. We weren't trapped in a web." Unwilling to break with the past, John sets to take revenge against his relatives and his first target is aunt Marta, who John, after nursing her to sleep in her wheelchair by sociopathically acting like a truly empathetic gentleman, unleashes a horde of bees on her in a scene in the spirit of Curtis Harrington's TV-movie Killer Bees (1974). Not long after, John ties up his most innocent cousin Esther after sexually seducing her and then goes to his room where he finds succubus Maria, who he has presumably had a sexual relationship with in the past as his cousin begins to undress and attempts to seduce him. After rejecting her sexual advancement, bragging about killing her mother, and proudly proclaiming, "I don't know the difference between right and wrong...and do you know why?!...there is no difference" as a man who has gone beyond good and evil, John slaps and smacks his unclad cousin Maria around and subsequently ties her up. Teresa, the most intelligent and perceptive yet bitchy of the cousins who once made up a complete fabrication about her cousin raping her to help get him committed to a mental institution, is the last of the titillating threesome to be tied up, but he rapes her for real beforehand in an act of perverse poetic justice and she actually begins to enjoy it. With their clothes stripped off, mouths taped shut, and hands and feet bound, the three cousins' disrobed bodies are hung from meat racks by John, who intends to slaughter them like the bourgeois cattle that they are, but he does not have the gall to go through with it and the girls ultimately escape after Pedro's wife rings his doorbell to confront the boy about his pigheaded pranks. Not long after, John goes outside and is hit on the head with a shovel by Pedro, who is in cahoots with aunt Marta, who, although disfigured, has surprisingly survived the bee attack. Pedro, aunt Marta, and cousins Maria and Teresa have John tied to the rope of a new church bell, where he will be hanged the next day at a Catholic sermon celebrating the new church. Before he is left to die, John asks his aunt if he really is insane or if she had him setup and she callously responds without the slightest sense of guilt, "A malignant tumor must be cut out. I could not sleep as long as you were alive," thereupon expressing her lack of guilt for her conspiratorial deceit. Assumedly dead, John still manages to have the "last laugh" against senior Pedro with the help of the eccentric shepherd whose daughter he saved from being vaginally pillaged from bourgeoisie bastards of the village. Not not does John have the literal and figurative 'last laugh,' but his murder inspires his sweetest and most rebellious cousin Esther to leave the family and move faraway, thus the anti-hero's spirit lives on in a sense as his cousin vicariously enjoys the freedom he had always sought but failed to obtain.

Rather ironically yet somewhat karmically, A Bell from Hell director Claudio Guerin fell to his death in real-life from the tower containing same title bell responsible for killing the angst-ridden anti-hero John of his film. Although it will forever remain unknown whether Guerin committed suicide or just simply fell in what was a senseless freak accident, I like to think he took his own his own life as such nihilistic and self-destructive tendencies are certainly reflected in A Bell from Hell via anti-hero John, who although extremely talented and artistic, cannot seem to stop himself from sabotaging his own life as a self-loathing member of the illiberal bourgeois who will do every and anything to uproot himself from his background. Made during the last years of Francisco Franco's reign in Spain, A Bell from Hell is not only an aesthetically and thematically subversive work, but also a lurid far-left-leaning satire of the sort of 'repressive' bourgeois church-going types who helped the Spanish dictator stay in power for so long. The fact that the protagonist of Guerin's film was institutionalized by his aunt after he ran off to London and became a hippie libertine only goes to show the traditional Catholic background in regard to the 'unconventional' villains of A Bell from Hell. Unfortunately, aside from one other (and ultimately inferior) feature-length film, The House of the Doves (1972), directing a segment from the omnibus film The Challenges (1969), and a couple shorts and one TV show, talented auteur Claudio Guerin never directed any other notable works aside from A Bell from Hell, which is indubitably his magnum opus. After his tragic death via falling from a real-life bell from hell on the last day of shooting A Bell From Hell, Juan Antonio Bardem (incidentally, the uncle of popular actor Javier Bardem), who, like alpha-surrealist Luis Buñuel, faced persecution under Franco's regime, was responsible for editing/finishing the film. One can only guess where Guerin's career would have went had he not tragically fallen to his death at the mere age of 33, but few other horror filmmakers can boast directing a horror film so masterful, nicely nuanced, and poetically allegorical as A Bell from Hell, which is undoubtedly one of the most underrated works of not just the 1970s, but in the history of the mostly disposable genre.

THE MANSION OF MADNESS

Juan López Moctezuma (1973)

Out of all the surrealist oriented Mexican filmmakers like Gelsen Gas (Anticlimax), Alejandro Jodorowsky (Santa Sangre, The Dance of Reality), and Rafael Corkidi (Angels and Cherubs, Pafnucio Santo) that were revolutionizing cinema during the late-1960s/early-1970s, Juan López Moctezuma—an auteur best known for his salaciously sacrilegious vampire flick Alucarda (1977) and producing his Latinized Jewish buds' masterpieces Fando y Lis (1968) and El Topo (1970)—seemed to be the one most desiring of mainstream success, especially in America. Indeed, for his most popular works, The Mansion of Madness (1973) and Alucarda (1977), the director opted for shooting in English instead of his native Spanish because, as the auteur stated in an interview, "It was shot in English, as it was aimed at the American market," thus most viewers would probably assume his works were directed by a degenerate European if they did not know better (indeed, a number of ignorant reviewers on imdb.com described The Mansion of Madness as 'European' and 'Eurotrash'). In fact, when asked in an interview if the film was influenced by popular Mexican cinema, Moctezuma firmly answered, "No. The Mexican tradition for such films is very simplistic and very conformist, in my opinion, in spite of their surface delirium. I don't really like them very much," and indeed, to this very day, the director is still considered a cult filmmaker in his homeland. I was certainly shocked to see that The Mansion of Madness does not feature a single Meztizo, but then again, the film is supposed to be set in the outskirts of Southern France. Known by a number of alternate titles, including Dr. Goudron's System aka Dr. Tarr's Pit of Horrors aka Dr. Tarr's Torture Dungeon aka House of Madness aka The System of Dr. Tarr and Professor Feather aka La mansión de la locura aka Edgar Allan Poe: Dr. Tarr's Torture Dungeon, Moctezuma's film is loosely based on Edgar Allan Poe's darkly comedic short story The System of Doctor Tarr and Professor Fether (1845), which was written in promotion of mental asylum reform, as medical care for the insane was apparently a highly politically-charged topic in America during the mid-19th-century. Of course, as a psychedelic exploitation flick, The Mansion of Madness is not exactly a work that demonstrates a special sensitivity for the mentally deranged, as it makes a marvelous mockery of the mentally ill, but then again, the film features gorgeous and lecherous lunatics that one does not mind seeing running around naked and doing nonsensical things. Shot by filmmaker/cinematographer Rafael Corkidi, who is best known as the guy who helmed Jodorowsky's El Topo and The Holy Mountain (1973), The Mansion of Madness is the sort of insanely aesthetically idiosyncratic work that you might suspect of having been directed by a wayward white Mexican of pure Spanish blood who was intoxicated on cheap Mexican beer and Ken Russell flicks, as a work in the humorously heretical spirit of The Devils (1971), albeit taken to more whimsically wacky and innately incoherent extremes. A exceedingly goofy flick featuring an unhinged hermetic universe where an eclectic collection of mental patients have taken over the nuthouse, The Mansion of Madness is a merry yet mischievous and morally retarded dark comedy where mental illness is treated as the most literally and figuratively colorful of vaudeville acts, as a work that is like the Grand Guignol meets a less politically conscious Luis Buñuel. A consciously eccentric celluloid endurance test full of playfully perverse pageantry, pseudo-Sadean sexual savagery, and delightful one-dimensional deranged degenerates all suffering from some sort of unbelievably pronounced mental pathology, The Mansion of Madness is the dubious, if not intriguing and reasonably worthwhile, result of what happens when a seemingly ethno-masochistic Mexican suffers from a bad case of the cultural cringes, binge eats European art cinema, and suffers from culturally confused celluloid diarrhea.

Gaston LeBlanc (played by Arthur Hansel, who would later star in Moctezuma's 1975 slasher film Mary, Mary, Bloody Mary) is a famous journalist who is excited about going back to the remote rural area of Southern France where he was born, but was forced to leave after his mother died and his father was placed into a mental institution. As LeBlanc explains, his maternal side blamed his father for his mother's death, thus resulting in his padre's placement in a sanatorium where he eventually died under questionable circumstances. Planning to write a piece on a mental institution that is famous for its novel methods of treating the mentally perturbed, LeBlanc is travelling by coach with his school friend Julien Couvier (played by Martin LaSalle, who previously starred in Robert Bresson's Pickpocket (1959)) and his cousin/lover Blanche (Mónica Serna) to the nuthouse in question, but when they get near the gates of the countryside loony bin, they have guns pointed at them by whacked out soldiers that would have probably made for fitting revolutionaries during the French revolution. Needless to say, Julien opts for abandoning his trip to the nut ward after his cousin/girlfriend Blanche becomes afraid, but LeBlanc is not about to abandon his one-in-a-lifetime opportunity to stay at the world's most bizarre sanatorium. Upon arriving at the mansion of madness, LeBlanc is given a guided tour of the perturbing place by a discernibly dubious dude named Dr. Maillard (portrayed by Claudio Brook, who starred in a couple of Buñuel films, including The Exterminating Angel (1962) and Simon of the Desert (1965)), who also introduces the journalist to his beautiful harp-playing niece Eugénie (Ellen Sherman, whose credits include an appearance on Three's Company), as well as a funny fellow named 'Mr. Chicken' who naturally believes himself to be a chicken. Meanwhile, Julien and Blanche are attacked in their coach by a gang of weirdo warriors wearing antlers on their heads. Of course, Blanche is raped and she, Julien, and the Coachman, Henri (Jorge Bekris), are tied up and taken hostage.

Undoubtedly, it is only at about the halfway point of The Mansion of Mad- ness that the film begins to develop anything resembling a coherent narrative structure. When Dr. Maillard takes LeBlanc on a tour of an underground dungeon prison where he discovers a starving man crucified on a cross and hundreds of dirty and dejected prisoners caged in cave-like jail cells, the journalist complains, "I have seen enough to last me a lifetime." That night while sitting in a bedroom he has been assigned by the good Doctor, LeBlanc begins to lose consciousness upon reading an ancient book and then sees an arousing vision of Dr. Maillard's supposed niece Eugénie, who is totally unclad and begs him to meet her at a garden that night. When LeBlanc begins wandering around the mansion, Dr. Maillard catches him and has him locked in his bedroom, but the journalist manages to escape by tying a bunch of bedsheets into a rope and eventually climbs out the window of the building where he takes his chances against the asylum's legion of psychotic soldiers. LeBlanc eventually finds Eugénie, who is stark-naked aside from some grapes, lying on a ritual table in a greenhouse, so he shoots some fat bald 'Cult Priest' (David Silva) that is attempting to perform a bizarre ritual on the beautiful girl and saves her life. After being saved from a ritualistic death, Eugénie reveals to LeBlanc that Dr. Maillard is not really Dr. Maillard, but an imposter named Raoul Fragonard who took over the asylum after convincing the mental patients to run a coup d'état against their caretakers. The real Dr. Maillard is Eugénie's father and Fragonard led a revolution against him that involved him not only taking over the mental institution but also allowing the mental patients to trade places with the doctors and throwing said doctors in the dungeons where the mental patients once stayed. Eventually, Julien, who is tied up, 'hops' into LeBlanc and Eugénie and the three manage to kill a couple of deranged mental patient soldiers by using the beautiful young woman as bait, but eventually Fragonard and his motley crew of degenerates capture them. Among other things, Fragonard takes his prisoners on a tour of his underground spa/orgy room where tons of beautiful nuts hang out naked and do nonsensical things like fish for imaginary fish and give the prisoners erotic massages. The prisoners also witness a wack-job practicing necrophilic bestiality with a skinned goat corpse, among other things. After revealing that the real Dr. Maillard is alive and well (and covered with celery!), Fragonard brags about his rather unlikely plans for world domination and tells his prisoners that he is going to burn them alive because "fire purifies everything." Of course, Eugénie begs for a pardon, so the great Dictator unleashes a trio of murderous bird-women who dance in a provocative fashion on her and LeBlanc, but luckily the real Dr. Maillard and his doctors manage to escape from their jail cells and lead a counter-revolution against Fragonard. In the end, Julien's cousin Blanche shoots Fragonard, who absurdly uses a giant dead sea turtle as a weapon, in the heart and declares, "Vive la Revolution!"

Heavily inspired by the American experimental theatre group The Living Theatre, the Panic Movement, Antonin Artaud's "Theatre of Cruelty," and Juan

López Moctezuma's own experience as a stage director, not to mention the counter-culture aesthetics that was still popular at that time, The Mansion of Madness certainly has an absurdly outmoded look, but that is also one of the film's greatest appeals, as a psychedelic celluloid romp that acts as a sort of accidental parody of its aesthetic influences. It should also be noted that British-born Mexican surrealist artist Leonora Carrington was both the art and wardrobe supervisor of the film, so she must be largely credited for the film's intensely idiosyncratic look, as The Mansion of Madness has the eccentric essence of a work created by an occult artist, as if the director was attempting to make a movie in the esoteric ritual orgy spirit of Kenneth Anger's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1966), albeit made palatable for mainstream audiences. Despite its rather revolutionary and subversive aesthetics, the film also has a notable counter-revolutionary message as a work that depicts a revolutionary leader as a murderous raving mad megalomaniac and his followers as literal mental patients who blindly obey his orders. An anti-revolutionary political fable featuring slapstick surrealism and a mirthful mockery of utopian dreams, The Mansion of Madness is more or less a Mexican equivalent to Johannes Schaaf's rather underrated dystopian flick that was released the same year, Dream City (1973) aka Traumstadt, which also features highly theatrical Panic Movement-esque eccentricities. Undoubtedly, compared to his comrade Jodorowsky's work, Moctezuma's film is fair less serious and certainly not a celluloid spiritual quest, but an art film for those that can only handle so much art. Undoubtedly, in its aesthetically corrosive celluloid cocktail of art, exploitation, and eroticism, The Mansion of Madness makes the perfect double feature with French auteur Jacques Scandolari's de Sade adaption Beyond Love and Evil (1971). Indeed, if you like exotic olive-skinned Mediterranean chicks with marvelous mammary glands who sport striking surrealist makeup, exceedingly charismatic villains that are far more likeable than the hero, grotesque antique puppets, and pretty feral people inside glass cages, The Mansion of Madness makes for a delectable celluloid treat that may not be a Jodorowsky masterpiece, but is surely one of the greatest and original horror comedies ever made.

Juan López Moctezuma (1977)

After watching Mexican horror auteur Juan López Moctezuma's debut feature The Mansion of Madness (1973), I decided it was a better time than ever to watch the stylish blood and boobs celluloid shocker that the director is best known for, Alucarda (1977) aka Alucarda, la hija de las tinieblas aka Sisters of Satan aka Innocents from Hell aka Mark of the Devil Part 3: Innocence from Hell. A lurid and strangely luscious piece of Latina Lolita lesbo artsploitation supernatural horror that takes a more naughty and nubile approach to the nunsploitation subgenre, Alucarda is a great example as to why auteur Moctezuma is not exactly a household name in his homeland as a work that wallows in Catholic sacrilege in a fashion that makes William Friedkin's The Exorcist (1973) seem as tame as a Cecil B. DeMille biblical epic by comparison. Ostensibly loosely based on Sheridan Le Fanu's classic 1872 Gothic vampire novella Carmilla, Moctezuma's third feature is a Sapphic satanic possession piece with vague bloodsucker elements about two 15-year-old Catholic orphan girls who make a pact of lesbo love among themselves, as well as with the devil, after meeting a Svengali-like gypsy hunchback who looks like a large leprechaun. In fact, Moctezuma denied Alucarda was a vampire flick in a 1977 interview and claimed to pay tribute to Bram Stoker and not Le Fanu, stating: "No, even though the title is certainly a homage to Count Dracula. However the film draws on the vampire tradition and in a way the protagonist is a female vampire... but not in the sense of a blood drinker. In fact she has all the powers and attributes of the classic vampire. Except that she doesn't have to drink blood. I've given Alucarda all the vampiric powers Bram Stoker mentions that never get shown in films as well as the ones you'd expect." Not featuring a single Mestizo actor and starring two Mediterranean nymphets in the lead roles, Alucarda ultimately seems more like a product of Spain or Italy than some sub-schlocky celluloid swill from south of the border. Apparently funded with money the director 'stole' from Alejandro Jodorowsky (Moctezuma produced Fando y Lis (1968) and El Topo (1970)), Alucarda is an audacious anti-Catholic diatribe that depicts priests as sexually repressed pervert dictators and nuns as sexless self-flagellating masochists who have a special affinity for pretty preteen girls. Indeed, if anything is demonically possessed and in dire need of an exorcism, it is Alucarda, as a work that mocks and eroticizes Catholic superstition in such a fiercely antagonistic fashion that even a non-Catholic like myself can appreciate its incendiary iconoclasm. Like a hardcore supernatural take on Joël Séria's Don't Deliver Us from Evil (1971) aka Mais ne nous délivrez pas du mal meets Ken Russell's The Devils (1971), albeit minus most of the campy elements, Moctezuma's work is one of only a handful of films that I can think of that makes heresy hot yet, unlike most nunsploitation flicks, also manages to be not too hopelessly hokey. For those with a fetish for blood, you also probably cannot do better than Alucarda, as a work featuring rather striking images of seductive young satanically-possessed señoritas soaked in sanguine fluids, which certainly looks more aesthetically pleasing on a woman than 'spilled seeds.' De Sade meets Mexican Gothic horror with a tinge of Huysmans and Bava, Alucarda is the film that was practically tailored for true Catholics like my quasi-psychotic Italian-Cuban childhood friend who used to get off to looking at Renaissance paintings of unclad sinners being tortured in hell.

A beautiful young woman (Tina Romero) gives birth to a baby in a cobweb-adorned building covered with gargoyle and demon statues and assumedly dies a couple minutes later after being attacked by some unseen evil entity. Flash forward 15 years later and the baby is now a pretty psychic vampire of sorts named Alucarda (also Tina Romero) who lives in the orphanage section of a Catholic convent that is presided over by a bunch of sexless nuns that look like bull dyke mummies due to their rather strange white cloaks. When a girl named Justine (Susana Kamini) arrives at the convent after her mother dies, Alucarda immediately becomes obsessed with the new young lady and asks her, "Do you want us to be sisters?," and naturally the shy newcomer agrees. After telling Justine about how one of the sisters has committed suicide, Alucarda goes on a rant about how there can be happiness after death and the two are then approached by a mischievous Gypsy Hunchback (Claudio Brook), who takes them to a small gypsy camp. While Justine is warned by a gypsy woman to not, "believe such a creature. He'll only tell you lies" in regard to the rather grotesque looking Hunchback, Alucarda takes an instantly likely to the deformed degenerate, who gives her a strange dagger, at least until he says, "I see clearly. Your past and future, your dreams. You've come from the dew in the forest and there they will be waiting for you. Strange creatures they are, and you must take care. If it obsesses the young lady, here I am and here is my box of charms. If she wishes I will make her free from such a dream...then if the dream comes true, I shall be expecting her," thus provoking the two girls to runaway in fear. After escaping the Hunchback, the girls end up accidentally discovering a mysterious and seemingly abandoned ancient building with rather sinister architecture which also happens to be the same building where Alucarda was born and her mother died. Upon entering the strange and ominous building, Alucarda becomes extremely excited and tells Justine, "I live in you. Would you die for me? I love you so. I have never been in love with anyone. And never shall. Unless it's with you." Alucarda also confesses that she is jealous and how she wants Justine to "love her to death," so the two youthful lesbian comrades agree to make a blood pact using the knife that was given to them by the Gypsy Hunchback.

Unfortunately, Alucarda and Justine's blood pact is cut short when they open a crypt and become horrified with the decomposed corpse they discover inside. Somehow, the whole experience leaves Justine sick and bedridden, especially after watching a church sermon given by an egomaniacal priest named Father Lázaro (David Silva). While recuperating in bed, Justine is visited by Alucarda, who describes with great excitement how voices talked to her from the woods just like the Gypsy Hunchback said they would and then states in a trance-like state, "Only you and me. Only you and me Justine. We will make them pay. Bit by bit. For all they have taken away from us. Lucifer. Satan! Lucifer!" After ripping a cross necklace from Justine's neck, Alucarda declares, "we shall make them pay" (in regard to the nuns and priest, who she believes has caused Justine's sickness) and then the Gypsy Hunchback somehow magically appears out of nowhere, strips the girls of their clothing, and makes them more or less make a pact with the almighty Great Satan. While making the pact, the two girls lick blood from one another's lips and tits and Baphomet even makes an appearance, thus somehow transporting the two proto-Goth gals to a lesbian witch orgy. Meanwhile, a loving nun named Sister Angélica (Tina French) pleads to god to save Justine from the devil, which causes the nun to levitate and her face to severely hemorrhage. Now possessed by the devil, Justine later declares in her bible class, "God with his lack of knowledge does not understand the truth, and opposes it with false thoughts and prayers" and the two friends proceeds to chant: "Satan, Satan, Satan, Our lord and master. I acknowledge thee as my God and Prince. I promise to serve and obey thee as long as I shall live. I renounce the other God and all the saints."

Needless to say, Justine does not live long as Father Lázaro forces her to endure a brutal S&M-like exorcism that involves cutting her up naked body (they strip her to prove that she has the 'mark of the beast') after the padre comes to the conclusion that the girls are victims of the devil's evil messenger, a heliophobic demon—a sixth category devil who hates light. Indeed, after Alucarda scares the Priest by telling him that she worships life and he worships death, Father Lázaro forces all the nuns to get half-naked and engage in sadomasochistic flagellation and decide an exorcism is the only way to rid their church of the satanic conspiracy. When a doctor named Dr. Oszek (Claudio Brook) walks in on the exorcism and sees Justine's naked corpse, he becomes enraged and declares, "the most shameful thing I have ever been a witness to. This isn't the 15th century, I thought that reason replaced superstition. This is not an act of faith...this is the most primitive expression of ignorance I have ever seen. You... You...have just killed Justine." After damning the priest and nuns, Dr. Oszek takes Alucarda with him and introduces her to his blind teenage daughter Daniela (Lili Gazara), not realizing that the girl he has exposed to his progeny is demonically possessed. Naturally, being a little lesbo Lolita, Alucarda takes an instant liking to Daniela and makes her promise to stay with her, which she does. Meanwhile, back at the convent, Justine's corpse somehow disappears and a nun is burnt alive, with her corpse later rising from the dead and spitting out blood in a rather rude fashion. Naturally, a priest decides to decapitate the demonic zombie nun. Eventually, Sister Angélica discovers Justine's naked undead body inside of a coffin full of blood. While Sister Angélica manages to stop zombie-vampire Justine from killing her at first, Dr. Oszek throws holy water on the undead she-bitch, thus provoking her to bite the sister's throat, which naturally kills the holy woman of god. In the end, demonically possessed Alucarda becomes hysterically homicidal and begins killing countless priests, nuns, and monks with flames summoned from hell, though she eventually drops permanently dead after staring at a giant burning crucifix. Naturally, Dr. Oszek and his daughter Daniela escape relatively unscathed.

In terms of films about the demonic possession of Latina Lolitas, you will certainly be hard-pressed to find one better than Alucarda. In fact, the film is certainly cream of the celluloid crop when it comes to nunsploitation, exorcism films, and Mexican horror cinema as well, though not that I am any sort of connoisseur when it comes to these typically sleazy and sickeningly superficial types of films. I can say, however, that as a hopeless cynic who lacks a superstitious mind, I found Alucarda to be exceedingly effective, as the sort of film that I expected The Exorcist to be but was not. Indeed, featuring nuns that dress like mummies and bleed profusely out of their naughty bits, a melancholy sister who keeps her face about a foot or two away from a dead teenage girl's bare postmortem bush, and a towering Baphomet randomly appearing during a satanic Sapphic blood pact between two titillating 15-year-old girls, Alucarda is a hard film to top in terms of salacious supernatural horror, especially considering the film manages to depict all these typically distasteful things in a shockingly cultivated way. Apparently, a sequel entitled Alucarda Rises From The Tomb was in the works, but director Juan López Moctezuma unfortunately died before he could ever realize it. Personally, I am one of those rare people that actually prefers the director's first feature The Mansion of Madness to Alucarda, but that probably largely has to do with the fact that I was not brought up Catholic and I prefer psychedelic arthouse aesthetics and wayward dark humor to most supernatural horror films. Indeed, Alucarda features none of the Jodorowsky-esque surrealism and Theatre of Cruelty-like spastic acting that made The Mansion of Madness so memorable. Indeed, I cannot say that the idea of demonic possession is something that scares me, but then again maybe it is because I have met far too many moronic, ugly, and morally repugnant people to be able to be horrified at the sight of a nubile naked girl covered in vital fluids declaring her love for the fallen angel Lucifer. For those that cannot stand hysterical young women incessantly screaming as if suffering from a deadly orgasm, as well as hyper histrionic acting, Alucarda may seem like a grating slice of celluloid hell. A hostilely heretical work where madness, eroticism, violence, and spirituality become indistinguishable, Alucarda is ultimately an innately iconoclastic work that relentlessly mocks the irrationality of the Catholic Church yet at the same time criticizes the hyper rational man of science, thus making for a film that is eclectically misanthropic, albeit in a fairly cryptic fashion that is actually quite admirable. Indeed, as someone who typically loathes big fat whiny atheist humanists more than priests and nuns, I appreciated the fact that the doctor character featured in the film was also portrayed as a self-righteous fool of sorts, but I digress and will close by saying that Alucarda is easily the most elegantly visceral and hatefully violent yet erotically-charged lesbian quasi-vampire flick I have ever seen and that Jess Franco and Jean Rollin probably could have learned a lot had they taken the opportunity to watch it.

MINOTAUROMAQUIA

Juan Pablo Etcheverry (2004)

Minotauromaquia is a clay stop-motion animated short film directed by writer/director Juan Pablo Etcheverry. This isn't as brilliant as say Švankmajer's work or the Brothers Quay, but still manages to be a bold piece of animation layering the psyche of an artist. As expected, there might be several analytical pieces on the film utilizing symbolism in the form of our given Dove. Being as he created inner peace using art as his elucidation, he was able to complete a perilous task. Over seven hundred sketches concludes a serious piece. In light of the eve of Halloween fast approaching, I'm experiencing a magnetic force towards monsters so it may not come as a surprise as I fancy the stern minotaur stalking the maze of a canvas for his victim. The hallways are a swift stroke from Picasso's brush as he paints Les Demoiselles D'avignon. Creative inspirations and motivations are visualized by this award-winning director. His influences lie in dissecting what goes on in the psychodrome of such lauded "artistic" minds. What is created is the spawn of a world famous painting and the Myth of the Labyrinth and the Minotaur.

Abstract creatures are given a three dimensional depth and provide a truly breathtaking after drop. To break such silence would be a sin. For a 9 minute short film, Etcheverry has successfully captured the closest relic of Picasso's work on film and managed to think up a innovative way to express an artists expression. Just like the original painting was deemed a "rapid stylistic metamorphosis", this too can attribute for the one and the same praise. Sometimes funny, sometimes shocking. A wonderful experience for those who can must a somber extended chase.

Juan Piquer Simón (1988) Don't expect anything serious out of this movie. That would be your first mistake. With a title like Slugs: The Movie, you can't really expect too much. If you are as big of a fan of nature gone awry films as I am, you'll definitely have fun with this movie. I grew up as a kid with cheesy novels written under various pseudonyms such as The Pack, The Nest, and of course Slime. This film brought back great memories of impossible situations taking place with hilarious results. The plot follows a small town being invaded by killer mutant slugs. Our hero is Mike Brady, the town's health inspector. Lucky for him, he might actually get to do some work this week. The characters in this film do not seem to have a personal life except for the occasional sex request. Besides from spending time with his wife, he follows the sheriff around while checking up on eviction notices. The certain notice is for a drunken fool who has a dog. He hides in his house with no electricity and throws all his garbage in the basement. Severe health hazard there. When they walk in, they see nothing until Mike points out the gore soaked skeleton with its eyes eaten out laying on the couch in a position that is just screaming Vogue. After noticing slime trails, the sheriff dismisses it as wild dogs. So while this is happening you are marauded with close ups of slugs using a lens trick to make them look gigantic. I guess they were trying to get under people's skin with the creepy crawly factor. Afterwards, many more town people are getting picked off by these carnivorous slugs. An old man who is tending his garden doesn't realize a giant slug crawling in his work glove. When he puts them on, it instantly starts biting him. Him being in a panic, he begins to hit it with a hammer and try using hedge clippers with one hand but never tries to pull it off. After a couple of minutes he decides to grab a rusty hatchet and lop off his hand Berserk style. His wife comes in and watches in horror as sulfuric acid starts a flame trail that leads to a bucket of gas and BOOM. Whole house blows up. Back at the Brady residence, his beautiful wife notices these huge slugs and points them out. Putting two and two together, he decides that they are dangerous. In a hilarious scene, we watch him get bitten by a slug with teeth. Quite an awkward moment indeed. He then captures it and takes it to a scientist at a school who has an extraordinarily fake British accent. He then comes up with some solution that may put a stop to these menacing creatures. The film was led up to its conclusion in an awkward manner. First of all, we have all these high school kids setting up to go to a huge Halloween party. The average horror film fanatic thinks, "Hey, the slugs are going to show up there!". Wrong. That scene is dead. One of the girls does die after trying to be raped, which I thought was a hilarious turn of events, but sadly there is no high school massacre. With the effects dating back to 1988, we are treated to a lot of blood but little sex. A teenage chick sneaks her asshole Heath Ledger look-alike boyfriend in after her parents leave to have pre-marital sex.

All goes well until he gets off the bed drunken and a slug bites his foot. We then notice the nice wood floor is covered completely covered with this slimy suckers. She panics and falls off and we witness a bizarre scene in which a naked girl is crawling in a puddle of slugs screaming and we get the hint this is supposed to be sexy. This goes on for at least a minute. Then we have the ending which is pretty normal for a film of this type. Nothing to argue about, but nothing to really boast about either. The acting, of course, is really corny and the dialogue is not interesting but we are treated to a fantastic score which doesn't seem to fit the film in retrospect. An interesting yet dodgy 80's horror film. If you have the chance, it deserves a viewing.

Julian Cole (1987)

Pier Paolo Pasolini was certainly one of the greatest and most authentically innovating filmmakers to ever live. Like Jean Cocteau before him, Pasolini was a poet who used film as a more sensual outlet for his obsessions and vices, resulting in auteur cinematic works like no director before or after him. I recently discovered the short film Ostia directed by Julian Cole, a micro piece of subversive cinema that follows Pasolini on his last night before he was murdered under very mysterious circumstances. Who better to play Pasolini in the film than gay British auteur Derek Jarman? Like Pasolini, Jarman would also die tragically in circumstances revolving around his vice of buggery. The official story is that Pasolini was murdered on the beach of Ostia by a young proletarian prostitute, who ran over the Italian poet repeatedly with his own car. The film Ostia asks the question of whether or not Pasolini foresaw his own death. With Pasolini's last film being Salò or the 120 Days of Sodom (the best film a director could end their career and life with), I am sure the Italian Renaissance man expected his life to end poetically with a bloody and climatic conclusion. After all, Salò or the 120 Days of Sodom is largely a film about the degradation of the human body, a lifelong pursuit of Pasolini and also the manner in which he would die.

In Ostia, Pasolini states, "I'll never have peace, never" as he cruises for young proletarians in the most slimy area of town. Director Julian Cole seems to borrow a few cues from Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising and Fassbinder's Querelle when exhibiting this seedy devil's playground of semen. Pasolini felt he would never have peace but his own climatic death would give him his final release. Like fellow Guido Marxist auteur filmmaker Bernardo Bertolucci, Pasolini's interest in the working-class seems to be mainly influenced by the proletariat's sexual potency as expressed in Ostia. After all, the working-class is where Pasolini found the gigolos he was most fond of. During Ostia, after noticing the young male prostitute he picked up is watching a fight on TV, Pasolini comments about how it's just a bunch of old men paying young men to beat each other up. In response, the young gigolo, irked by Pasolini's arrogance, responds that it is not so much different from what he does. Pasolini's hypocrisy becomes most evident during this scene as he is a capitalist (who freely buys men and wine) yet preaches the bad opiate-based gospel of atheistic Talmudic economist Karl Marx. Only by death at the hands of the exploited prostitute, can Pasolini be genuinely Sainted as a true believer of Marxist materialism.

Although a flawed film, Ostia is a brief yet respectable portrayal of Pier Paolo Pasolini in his final hours. The most glaring negative aspect of the film is that it is British, but one couldn't possibly expect any Italian filmmaker to pay respectful justice to Pasolini, for they would have probably made an exploitation film as a gross insult to a director who was misunderstood in his own country (like many great artists are). The world will probably never know the real circumstances surrounding Pasolini's death. Thirty years after it happened, Giuseppe Pelosi, the prostitute that confessed to the murder of Pier Paolo Pasolini, retracted his confession claiming it was three men who killed Pasolini because he was Communist. This makes one wonder whether or not the killers were students of the great Sicilian Baron Julius Evola, for he did inspire "right-wing" terrorism throughout Italy. If one thing is for sure, it was a gay communist atheist that directed the best film about the life of Jesus Christ; Pasolini's The Gospel According to St. Matthew. Like Christ, Pasolini died for his own sins, not the sins of others, God Bless his gay Commie soul.

A LONELY PLACE TO DIE
A LONELY PLACE TO DIE

Julian Gilbey (2011)

I can recall, vividly, a learning experience taught by Renny Harlin's Cliffhanger, an important lesson on the dangers of empty space and what it doesn't mean to chase thrills. Thrill-seekers could view the mountain climbing featured in Cliffhanger as a gateway to adrenaline and a telescope to rarely seen sights and sound. I, however, see it as the senseless threat it is and would rather shed my mortality in a more humble and all-together boring matter - not cartwheeling through the air, drowning on my own screams. Which is precisely what had happened in the opening of Cliffhanger, that ever-important message of trust branded on each frame, which is also a recurrent theme in A Lonely Place to Die. And unlike Cliffhanger, A Lonely Place to Die is actually a terrific thriller without an air of predictability, one of its many sweet spots. Starring Melissa George and directed by Julian Gilbey (Rise of the Footsoldier), A Lonely Place to Die tells the story of a group of mountaineers in the Scottish Highlands who have planned a vacation around various sites when they discover a kidnapped girl and find out they are being hunted by the abductors. From this set-up, A Lonely Place to Die rappels into rather grim territory with scenes of sudden violence and a composure of extreme panic that never ceases to surprise you.

Admittedly, I am acrophobic but this rarely has applied to cinema for me. I can count the number of films that supplied heavy helpings of unease due to high altitude on one hand, the two most recent theatrical films being Cloverfield and Mission Impossible: Ghost Protocol. That isn't to say I don't mumble aloud to various screen characters for dangling in a stationary position (See also, The Grey), but these two films in particular, in-theater, had me clutching at my armrest and counting the seconds until I could see the sweet gift of feet planted firmly on soil. A Lonely Place to Die is the exception to the category, although the reasoning not being the height, but the risk. Those previously mentioned films do not relate to my reality therefore the rush of worry, while being eminent, dissipates almost instantaneously. A Lonely Place to Die's scenery chews at the rope all film long, leaving me in disgust at the thought of the next cliff face our unfortunate crew might have to scale. Melissa George, the beloved lead in Triangle (2009), takes on quite a task bringing physicality into the mix and Sean Harris performs as expected of him: sneering, villainous, and with incredible presence. Perhaps one of the more paramount aspects of A Lonely Place to Die is that Julian Gilbey isn't afraid to cycle settings and terrain against what one would expect, that, and his detachment from his characters. Enough so to provide a darker element of murder than one would presume to witness.

You can also tell from A Lonely Place to Die that director Julian Gilbey had fun assembling the pieces of this superior thriller, enough so to twist the formula into unfamiliar variations, such as presenting a pair of could-be villains who are victim only to your perspective, just to have the camera pan out and introduce a more plausible threat. This world presented is a very real world, full of agony and misfortune, meaning to say, humanity suffers in A Lonely Place to Die. Whether it's a bystander or a friend, colleague, and even lovers; no one is safe and no one gets a pass. It is why this savage behavior meshes so well with nature, but seems even more at home in suburbia. Matter of fact, A Lonely Place to Die occasionally brings allusions to the highly-effective British thriller, Eden Lake, though with horror and nihilism replaced by a John Rambo-less First Blood aesthetic of survival. A character throughout A Lonely Place to Die curses himself discovering the abducted girl and wishes nothing more than to be rid of this burden of barbarity. This character has since the opening been unhappy of most everything handed to him. Now, because of him, his friends lives are challenged at every turn. It's funny to me - tinkering with the thought of chance and coincidence, especially with the recollection of a young, beautiful, innocent socialite on the floor of a bar with an uncontested fatal gut wound. A Lonely Place to Die is just that; a place of ever-heightening suspense and an always growing body count that makes this trip worth the bloody price of admission.

SUMMER SCARS

Julian Richards (2007)

I don't consider this to be a film per say. I see Summer Scars as a re-enactment or documentation on an event that is based on true events, like in America's Most Wanted but with a stunning youthful cast and a budget. In this case, It isn't some word of mouth local legend. The events that transpire in the film are based on a scenario the director himself got caught in as a teenager which brings the chilling realism all too close. Six rebellious teens nick a moped and meet up in the forest on a day where they should be at school. On this day of hooky, they meet up with a mysterious vagrant who presents himself as a tattered man with a past that is never uncovered. Scenes hint to him being a war veteran, but I can't be for certain. Now the events that took place in Julian Richards childhood appear to be an esoteric situation. I wonder aloud how much of this film is based on true events and which character Richards fit the role of. I can narrow it down to 4 of the 6 preteens. Summer Scars is synonymous to a wild beast running rampant through a crowded street. Everyone must sacrifice something in order to get through this film cause if the horrifying presence of Kevin Howarth doesn't get to you, the violence directed towards children certainly will. Summer Scars is virtually impossible to review. Bringing it back to my point, It's hard to review due to its substance not really being a film. Clocking in at 67 minutes, it's short, exemplary, and vicious. Dubious in nature, Summer Scars features all the key points to make this a classy rough thriller. The very pellet gun that Howarth brandishes reminds me of a classic Luger which only adds to the weapons menace. Don't let the cover art fool you. This would be that film you'd pass up in Movie Gallery for looking like another Sundance quickie, but there is more to this film than meets the eye.

Julian Schnabel (1996)

I am very weary when it comes to critics as well as the masses celebrating any type of “exotic” colored art as some type of real revolutionary artistic achievement. Due to the lack of cultural accomplishments from the Third World, it seems that anything that resembles “art” is considered a piece of profound artistic achievement by self-loathing white art critics. To be honest, I cannot really think of any colored art that has ever truly caught my fancy. I will have to admit however that after seeing the film Basquiat, I believe there might be exceptions to my view. Jean-Michel Basquiat was apparently the first black painter to ever become an international art star. Mr. Basquiat was considered a Neo-expressionist painter and with his paintings it is obvious he created a hybrid of European expressionism and Afro-Caribbean aesthetic, a true Neo-Creole painter if one were to ever exist. As dramatized in the film Basquiat, Jean-Michel was criticized by agitating critics for what they saw as “exploiting” black urban poverty due to his middle class upbringing. I guess Pieter Bruegel the Elder’s paintings should also be discredited due to the fact that the Dutch painter did not live up to the same pathetic reputation as the peasant subjects he painted, even though he helped to immortalize their meager existences.

Like most real artists, Jean-Michel Basquiat led a fairly pathetic and tortured existence and like Adolf Hitler before him, Basquiat made a meagerly artistic living by selling hand painted postcards for sympathetic patrons. It was not until Andy Warhol started promoting Basquiat that the artist started receiving the international fame that he reluctantly craved. In the film Basquiat, David Bowie plays an extra spacey and faggy Andy Warhol, a successful performance no doubt. Although I very much enjoyed Crispin Glover’s cameo as parody-like version of Andy Warhol in Oliver Stone’s The Doors, I think David Bowie did a better job expressing the true character of American’s favorite Pop “Artist.” The chemistry between Jeffrey Wright (who plays Basquiat) and David Bowie is no doubt believable but also notable. Other excellent performances include a cameo by the disgusting rock-slut Courtney Love (who plays Madonna, a former girlfriend of Basquiat) and loveable burnt out weirdo Dennis Hopper as Swiss art collector Bruno Bischofberger. In general, most performances in Basquiat were excellently cast with the right actor for the right job.

Basquiat was the cinematic debut of Neo-expressionist painter Julian Schnabel, who was part of the same art movement as Basquiat in real-life. I believe this gives the film a feeling of authenticity that could not have been accomplished by a director who had not known Basquiat personally. For a first film, Schnabel certainly accomplished more than most novice directors. Of course, Basquiat has its weakness like most bio-pics do. After the film is over, it feels that segments of Basquiat’s life were brushed over (which they no doubt were), but director

Julian Schnabel was able to makeup for this with the unconventional assemblage of the film. The real power of Basquiat lies in the power of each scene, for the film is truly the sum of all it's parts just as Basquiat's paintings are.

Viewing Basquiat was kind of a wonderful surprise to me. I expected the film to be some sob story about how a persecuted Negro rose above his urban ghetto limitations and proved that he could be part of the international white art world. Instead, the film shows how a bunch of lame white people kissed Basquiat's ass because he knew how to hold a paint brush which seemed to ultimately push him towards self-destruction. Basquiat is not a feel good crock of cultural Marxist vomit but an expressive tribute from one Neo-expressionist to another. Certainly a film that does not romanticize the life of an artist like most that come out of Hollywood.

INSIDE

Julien Maury, Alexandre Bustillo (2007)

AKA: A l'Interieur Rarely does a movie terrify the audience, and it is even more rare when a film terrifies and disgusts you. Thank god for the dynamic duo of Alexandre Bustillo and Julien Maury. Lately, they have become a target of rage from fanboys everywhere due to their remake of Hellraiser coming soon. After seeing this debut film, of all places coming from France, home of the worse new-wave film trend as of late, i graciously accept their warm gift of Hellraiser presented in a beautiful bloody digital package. The film follows a plot so simple, that it would be pointless to explain the film. Whereas you go and purchase it on March 4th, you can view this cinematic tour de force. This film's emotions will lay you down so quick with the sheer amount of travesty presented in this film. In order to explain the feelings i encountered during this film, you must know that this is a drive through hell and back. Not only are the performances impeccable but the intensity of the acting down to their habits when frustrated, angered, or traumatized, are down right a masterful art. Not since underrated film of the century Fear X has a film made me feel shivers so deep and honest, yet cry not caring who sees you. Thanks to directors such as Alexander Aja and these two new ones, my faith in French horror, cinema even, has been restored to full power. Béatrice Dalle is downright one of the most sensitive lunatics to ever grace film. The subtlety of her moods and her frustration causing her to go ballistic was all apart of her plan. I am sure that with out the collaborative minds of actresses and directors alike, this film would have been another gore-soaked disaster. So the plot in layman's terms, a woman who is pregnant gets in a car crash. Leaving no survivors including her boyfriend. Somehow her baby made it out of the mess. Thankfully it is almost due four months later but someone shows up outside her house. Let the bloodbath ensue. The film uses similar bloodshed and gore to the short film Cutting Moments. The editing is terrifying, mixed in with the sound effects that make your brain go crazy, and you yourself begin to feel the insanity leaking into your own brain. The drones in this film are similar to the ones Aja used in his The Hills Have Eyes remake. Granted these ones are more effective. So when Inside is released on March 4th, i expect you to purchase this film from Dimension Extreme at all costs. This might be the most narcissistic, violent film i have seen in a long while.

BULLET

Julien Temple (1996)

I once lived with this little Jew that looked like Rick Moranis. Despite growing up in a nice upper middle class Jewish neighborhood and having two doctors as parents, this little Jew started dealing drugs at the ripe age of 13, surely not long after his Bar Mitzvah, the day he became a "man." I always tried to imagine this weak and tiny Jew getting busted by the cops and being sent to one of the various American prisons aka rape factories. How would such a little guy fair against horny Tyrone and deranged delinquent Darnell behind bars? In the film Bullet, I thankfully got to see such a scenario. The film stars the very Un-Jewish Mickey Rourke (who also co-wrote the film under the pseudonym Sir Eddie Cook) as a good criminal Jew boy named Bullet who has been recently released from prison and is now a changed (and morally stained) man.

Despite growing up in a nice upper middle class, Bullet fell into drugs and crime at an early age. His brother Louis (played with love and empathy by Ted Levine) is a Vietnam Vet who now suffers from some type of debilitating psychosis where he believes he is leading an invisible army towards final victory. Bullet's baby brother Ruby (played eloquently by Adrian Brody) is an aspiring street artist who most fancies illegally painting buildings and other forms of public/private property. The overweight alcoholic father of these three brothers sees them all as bums and disappointments, sons on the apocalypse. Their Mother seems in denial about her boys, an elder Jewess who loves to play piano and probably never misses Temple. After Bullet gets back from prison, most of his family does not seem to recognize him as a new and changed man, a victim of prison sodomy.

Tupac Shakur stars in Bullet as Tank, a drug lord enemy of Bullet who seeks bloodthirsty revenge. Bullet was responsible for taking out one of Tank's eyes whilst they were in prison. Tank must have some respect for his Judaic friend's background as he claims to be evening the score by looking to get an "eye for an eye." To show Tank what Bullet really thinks of him, he stabs an anti-Semitic Latino in the eye with a lovely knife in a fairly concerned fashion. Bullet's only interest after getting out of prison is shooting up H and speeding up his own belligerently executed suicide, kind of like Mickey Rourke's tragic character in Rumble Fish, only less suave. Bullet may be one of the last films Rourke acted in before his face was butchered by botched plastic surgery, but his character looks like a miserable mess, wearing a not-so-flattering hoodie, sunglasses, beanie, and star of David gold chain at all times. No one has ever accused the Jews of being great dressers or being proponents of aesthetics but Bullet looks like he belongs in a homeless shelter habitat. Of course, a Sicilian-American gangster business associate lets Bullet know that one must always dress to impress.

Tank may be a drug lord but he is also obviously a play thug carny huckster at heart who lacks real tact. Instead of killing Tank with his own bare hands, he decides giving a poisonous package of junk is the best way to treat the man who stole his eye. When that fails, Tank brings in a beefy buck Negro to pound Bullet into the ground but that ultimately fails as well. I have a feeling that the real Tupac was much like Tank, a Nigga who talked a bunch of shit but had nothing to really back it up with, hence his early death. Tupac's death also came the same year that Bullet was released, a wonderful example of trash art reflecting trash life. Thankfully, the bright and infinitely intrinsically valuable life of Tupac has been immortalized in a Jewish dysfunctional family crime film like Bullet.

I must admit the funniest and most fulfilling part of Bullet is the ending. Bullet's deranged Vietnam Vet brother goes on one more special-ops mission that involves Tupac's throat, a large expertly sharpened knife blade, and an albino rat. I hate most contemporary crime and gang films because they glorify the lowest gutter trash imaginable. Of course, I can respect the well dressed Italian-American men featured in The Godfather as well as the coked out Mafia men of Goodfellas but never nor ever the contemporary urban jungle cretins of the intercity. There is nothing glamorous or ideal about the world featured in Bullet. Bullet makes this clear when he shows his happy heroin track marks to a couple of up and coming hoodlum play thugs. He was doing them a favor knowing his own life ended the day he entered a jail cell. If only my Jewish ex-roommate would listen to the wise words of stoic street philosopher Bullet.

DAYS OF NIETZCHE IN TURIN
DAYS OF NIETZCHE IN TURIN

Júlio Bressane (2001)

If any nation should make a film about German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, it is the ill-fated thinker's own, but Germany, being very possibly the most self-loathing country in the world since their catastrophic defeat during World War II, would not dare make a film about one of their greatest national figures, even if he was an anti-hero and anti-Christ of sorts. Admittedly, I was quite reluctant to watch the Brazilian film Days of Nietzsche in Turin (2001) aka Dias de Nietzsche em Turim directed by Júlio Bressane; an experimental biographical-drama about the German philosopher's lone contemplative wanderings around the Northern Italian city; the area where the often misunderstood thinker would dream up Twilight of the Gods and his less-than-honest but extremely aesthetically-pleasing autobiography Ecce Homo. It is one thing for a film to feature a portrayal of Nietzsche speaking in the totally alien language of Portuguese but another for the film to have the prophetic Aryan anti-Christ be portrayed by a swarthy, dark-and-greasy-haired fellow whose exaggerated mustache is the only tool that allows the viewer to dispense belief that the man in anyway resembles the great philosopher. Not only is the actor who portrays Nietzsche in Days of Nietzsche in Turin a physical mockery of the terrible Teuton but he also goes as far as fully exposing his wienerschnitzel; the last area of the German philosopher that a diehard Nietzschean would want to uncover. In fact, a good portion of Days of Nietzsche in Turin is dedicated to the philosopher's dubious sexuality and his problems with the unfair, fairer sex. Nietzsche one stated, "Ah, women. They make the highs higher and the lows more frequent" but in Days of Nietzsche in Turin most of Nietzsche's intimate contact with women is voyeuristic and in the imaginary realm of his exceptionally introverted mind. If the film does anything right, it is that it adequately expresses how far the German philosopher had escaped into his own thoughts; a retreat that would prove to be the root of his genius and transcendence into Übermensch status, but also the source of his break into total insanity and an early and lonely death. Indeed, Days of Nietzsche in Turin may not be an extraordinary tribute to a man whose life and work has yet to get an exquisite cinematic tribute that is long overdue but for those individuals interested in the Titanic Teutonic thinker, the film is a passable homage that will have to do for now.

German conservative revolutionary philosopher Oswald Spengler recognized that Friedrich Nietzsche – being a dilettante composer and music addict – was a thinker who philosophized through his ears and that his prose was not "written" but "heard" through a sort of "physiognomic tact." Spengler believed that Nietzsche intuitively felt the rhythm of "culture" and "nobility, ethics, heroism, distinction, and master morality." In that regard, Days of Nietzsche in Turin also successfully expresses Nietzsche's inspirations and thoughts as he can be seen throughout the film basking in musical melodies as if it is vital to his very existence (which it undoubtedly was). The film also somewhat successfully expresses Nietzsche's sensitivity to life and his organic surroundings in general but, of course, most of the film relies on mere speculation in attempting to recapture his last days of sanity. I would even go so far as to nickname the film The Passion of the Anti-Christ as the work permeates a spiritual and almost religious portrayal of his sacrifice as a thinker and prophet of Occidental decline and rebirth (which partially inspired the National Socialist revolution). Nietzsche may have ended his career as a philosopher with a short work entitled The Anti-Christ (1888) but his dire concern for the death of god and reign of slave-morality-based mediocrity in Europe was not in vain. Although his works were written over a century ago, many great thinkers – of all religious and political persuasions – look to Nietzsche's writings for answers today. What Days of Nietzsche in Turin does best is expressing how Nietzsche – both on an intellectual and personal level – was all by his lonesome. Surely, Days of Nietzsche in Turin is more successful and respectful in capturing Zarathustra's essence than When Nietzsche Wept (2007) directed by Pinchas Perry. Visually, the film is also flawed in its almost anarchic anachronisms as the work combines modern shaking documentary-style digital video with seemingly vintage film stock from the early days of cinema. Luckily (but certainly unsurprisingly), Days of Nietzsche in Turin features a score by Nietzsche's former friend/father figure and (later) enemy Richard Wagner with excerpts of Nietzsche's writings narrated throughout.

Undoubtedly, the most powerful segment of Days of Nietzsche in Turin is after Nietzsche's mental collapse near the conclusion of the film. In a manner comparable to Woody Allen's underrated mockumentary Zelig (1983) and superior to Robert Zemeckis' Forrest Gump (1994), Bressane was able to animate and give life to the infamous real photo series "The Ill Nietzsche" by Hans Olde in a totally believable and ostensibly authentic way. As someone who has seen these distressing photographs many years and times before seeing Days of Nietzsche in Turin, I could not help but feel awed but slightly saddened by the pseudo-stock footage of the great thinker in a state of total and irrevocable incapacitation. Naturally, the film also portrays the dubious and unverifiable story of Nietzsche's collapse after witnessing a horse being whipped in Turin. That being said, Days of Nietzsche in Turin is a film that will certainly be of interest to those familiar with Nietzsche and his work but it is doubtful the film will be anything more than a hopelessly tiresome struggle for the uninitiated. Unlike When Nietzsche Wept, it is also obvious that Days of Nietzsche in Turin director Júlio Bressane has a strong passion for the German philosopher's life, work, and selfless sacrifice. Unfortunately, it is doubtful one can expect a superior cinematic work about the tragic philosopher-poet anytime soon, thus Days of Nietzsche in Turin, albeit flawed, makes for mandatory viewing for those who have gazed

Jun Fukuda (1966)

aka Ebirah, Horror of the Deep The Godzilla lexicon consists of several generational series that create cultural gaps between styles, themes, and recurring costumes that more-or-less match the economy and social climate of its native Japan. The Showa series is compromised with many early Godzilla classics such as Godzilla vs. Hedorah, Godzilla vs. Gigan, Destroy All Monsters, and the obvious debut volume of his long-destructive legacy, Gojira. The many branches of Godzilla lore that have rambunctiously spread out through time only planted seeds in fan base and in such a clever manner, alerted all walks of life of this phenomenon. My special lady friend scoffed at the idea of Godzilla being honored on the Walk of Fame. Inquiring about her experiences with Godzilla, she admitted to have never seen a Godzilla film but within this statement I made the point sincere that even with no knowledge of his story she knows who and what Godzilla is. That's the strength of this cinematic hero who has created seismic, cultural quakes that have reached every corner of the world. The favorable post-war tragedy aesthetic is still in the past and has not been recently brought back to the surface. The evolving Godzilla spin off now encompasses monster mash entertainment inside an airtight, flimsy plot line that shows both the struggle of humans and monsters. For this "vs." film, the spotlight is not on the "Big G" but rather a lonely sibling hijacking a boat to go search for his brother who is thought to have survived a shipwreck by crashing on an island under a strict military and terrorist rule who is also being terrorized by a local monster-lobster kept at bay named Ebirah. From this, man encounters both friend and foe and decides to awaken a hibernating Godzilla to start the epic entertainment and set forth the greatest boulder-catch match this side of Tokyo. As far as Godzilla "genrefication" goes, this one isn't as experimental or sci-fi as say Godzilla vs. Hedorah, which took the preconception and predated a Happy Feet-esque environmental musical, rapes the idea, and creates a flying 150 foot tall lizard that fights an alien cloud of slime. As a kaiju film, this is an exceptional entry. Toho posters have this inverted charm that provides a visual assault with colors and always highlights mesmerizing montages of both man and monster. With Godzilla vs. The Sea Monster, you will notice an incredible technicolor-like aesthetic that shines with a smooth presentation and color palette. What's even more surprising is this is Jun Fukuda's first entry out of five for the Godzilla legacy. He directed the established Godzilla vs. The Sea Monster (aka Ebirah, Horror of the Deep) then went on to create Godzilla vs. Gigan, but what happened after remains a mystery. He must have spent a night with an African hooker, caught an advanced case of HIV and decided to direct the equivocally abysmal Godzilla vs. Megalon. Godzilla vs. The Sea Monster is a worthy venture to continue this monster cavalcade of bromance, rubber suits, and evil military regime whether it be a human or alien effort. From its slick design mechanics to the ill-suited humor between unintentional kaiju boulder volleyball, Godzilla vs. The Sea Monster finds itself in a safe zone with a partially accepting fan base. This is a very solid demonstration that not only emphasizes monster destruction but as well as commits to the memory of "little people." Each Godzilla film has this amazing structure that leaves one memorable scene to be desired. They all have it and as I've mentioned before, Godzilla vs. The Sea Monster's is the boulder ball game. The Tennis effect is infectiously contagious as your eyes trail a foam boulder bee-lining between monster, back and forth. With each catch and toss, you find yourself becoming stupider. It's a rough game out there, people. With my final words, the only real advice I can really build upon is that this is a must-see Godzilla film for a wacky adventure scenario.

GODZILLA VS. THE SEA MONSTER

GODZILLA VS. GIGAN

Jun Fukuda (1972)

An entry in the Shōwa series of Godzilla films, this story features the very similar brainwashing plot device and amasses a surreal feel throughout the film. This isn't the usual space invader film. This is due to the mystery element and the thought put into the philosophy of the cockroach being the species most likely to survive an apocalypse, which fits perfectly into the premise. Cockroach spacemen (Ala Men In Black) create a giant Godzilla tower secretly armed with state-of-the-art technology and a low orbit Ion cannon solely with the intent of creating frequencies used to control the giant inhabitants of Monster Island; mainly King Ghidorah (Space monster), Gigan (Debut space monster), Anguirus, and Godzilla. This is a worthy addition into the Godzilla archives even though much of the film is made from stock footage. Such is what Toho had to go through to get things done; See also: Toei's The Return of the Street Fighter. Much of that film features lengthy flash backs with no purpose other than to chisel away at the time frame. Although this is hokey and ridiculous, it's a classic Monster vs. Monster vs. Humanity story ever so apparent in Kaiju films, but it revamps this tale to create added destruction and a mellow suffering not often seen other than in this abstruse film. Old animatronics coincide with the "Man in the Rubber Suit" aesthetic that differentiated Godzilla films from the likes of Harryhausen and King Kong. Some of the movements are extremely terrible and create a clumsy lizard who fights too human-like. Through out this film, Godzilla's appearance constantly changes and it becomes tedious. You can blame that on the incredibly low budget. I don't expect a perfect Godzilla sequel. You learn that after you come to terms that the war-torn monster you fell in love with is no more. A surprising addition is the tag team effort and humanization of Anguirus: Godzilla's mortal and first enemy. The duo teams up to defeat an unstoppable menacing force. Both Godzilla and Anguirus almost perish in the blazing wrestling match. As Emperor Palpatine repeatedly struck down young Skywalker with his signature force lightning, Godzilla too was in grave danger from a similar attack. To add to the already sorrowful fact that I'd never seen Godzilla shed blood, Anguirus was inches from a cold death, foreshadowed by his stifling and quieting roar. Five films into the collectanea of Godzilla, and I can manage to appreciate this one more than some others. An applaudable story with humorous characters and exceptional villains plus the debut of Gigan (who strikes fear into the heart of my childhood). Godzilla vs. Gigan is as monstrous as it sounds, plus I happen to enjoy a vulnerable side of Godzilla now and then. In regards to the scene of Godzilla talking to Anguirus, I only heard the roars. Thankfully I had nothing to do with the alleged speech bubbles.

BULLET TRAIN

Junya Satō (1975)

Sonny Chiba. Anything that Sonny Chiba acts in is pure gold. It's science. It's one of those weird ticks that people have. Some people are addicted to sex or nicotine or any other substance. I am addicted to Shinichi Chiba. The day this legend passes, I'm getting plastered while watching The Street Fighter and bawling my eyes out. With that in mind, I set out to buy a 3 DVD pack of some of his films of which I have not seen. First up, Bullet Train. Now if I had known that Speed was a remake, I'd partly be impressed. Despite its flaws or down right shitty structure, I enjoyed Speed when I was a child so the film has that heavy nostalgia effect on me. Now if you had told me that Speed was a remake of a Sonny Chiba film, well, I might have spontaneously combusted. It's true, but I was in for a bigger surprise. I was led to believe that this film starred Sonny Chiba but what I was delivered was a modicum of his presence as he sweats his run time away. Chiba plays a nervous bullet train conductor as he realizes that there is a bomb on his train that will explode if he decelerates. Led by the dynamite villain Ken Takakura, Bullet Train stands as a solid and respectable action film from Japan. I normally don't sympathize with pigs on film. Shallow police officers and co. have been pissing me off on the silver screen since birth, so the sympathy involved with the cast of good guys was a welcome addition to my extensive cinema taste. I'm a bit disappointed at Ronin Entertainment for promising me 3 ass-kicking Sonny Chiba action movies and giving me ones that only feature around 15 minutes of screen time, sans Golgo 13. My only real complaint is the entire gist of the film in general. These "disaster on wheels" films all have one thing in common; man-made attempted claustrophobia. These films strive to make you feel anxious to be trapped in a speeding metal doom device. This is what Bullet Train sets off to do, but since over half the film follows the police as they attempt to track down the bomber, much time isn't spent with the train, and even so, the scenes are too scattered. Bullet Train is like an aged wine; not an over-priced one, mind you. It transcends that border between mediocrity and something a bit special. I can't exactly jump up and down over this one, folks. But I did enjoy it greatly. I'm just glad that Sonny Chiba eventually saved the day. Even if he looked exasperated the entire film.

THE CREMATOR

Juraj Herz* (1969)

Mainly due to its curious inclusion of Austrian actor Paulus Manker portraying the great Viennese Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger—a character he would play on stage and ultimately immortalize by directing and starring in the rarely-seen masterpiece Weiningers Nacht (1990) aka Weininger's Last Night—I recently made the mistake of watching the fiercely flaccid pseudo-metaphysical feminist flick My 20th Century (1989) aka Az én XX. Századom directed by Ildikó Enyedi and felt the need to cleanse my soul with another black-and-white art film from one of the other strangely dejecting (mostly) Slavic areas that used to be part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. While the last thing I want to see is another holocaust film, I actually decided on the rather grim Czechoslovak New Wave classic The Cremator (1969) aka Spalovač mrtvol directed by Slovak semite Juraj Herz (Morgiana, Habermann) as it is a rare piece of singular tragicomic shoah cinema that actually manages to be both humorous and aesthetically pleasing in a strangely aberrant-garde sort of fashion. In fact, despite technically being a holocaust film as directed by an authentic Hebraic holocaust survivor, the film is so innately idiosyncratic, abrasively absurd, and surreally schizophrenic that I never felt that I was watching a film that would be endorsed by the ADL or the sort of especially naive idiot that sincerely believes that Schindler's List (1993) is a serious film about the perils of prejudice and heights of human suffering (or whatever).

Clearly owing a hefty spiritual and aesthetic debt to German Expressionism and some of the more grotesque Teutonic Dada artists like Otto Dix, the film notably stars the popular Czech star Rudolf Hrušínský—an actor that, quite humorously but not surprisingly, was previously best known for lovable comedic roles—who resembles a sort of all-the-more-bulging-eyed (but hardly Hebraic) Peter Lorre. Since Lorre became a symbol for Judaic criminality and depravity due to his iconic performance in mischling master Fritz Lang's serial killer masterpiece M (1931), which was infamously referenced in Nazi mischling filmmaker's agitprop flick Der Ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew, it is certainly strangely fitting that the actor's Czech doppelganger portrays a naughty Nazi cremator of sorts who murders his part-Jewish family members as it—whether intentional or not—surely symbolizes both the triumph of Judea and the death of the Occident, for such a film would have been completely unthinkable only 25 years before during the Third Reich era. Of course, the film is, quite thankfully, just as anti-commie as it is anti-nazi as the setting is at least partly symbolic of the sort of artistically stifling and all-oppressive Soviet totalitarianism that would dominate shortly after the cinematic work was created as a result of the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia (aka 'Operation Danube') that effectively destroyed the Czechoslovak New Wave. In fact, despite being selected as the Czechoslovakian entry for the Best Foreign Language Film at the 42nd Academy Awards, the film was banned soon after it was released and would be completely hidden from the world until the collapse of the communist system in Czechoslovakia in 1989. And, indeed, The Cremator certainly feels like the sort of singularly subversive film that had been imprisoned in a vault for decades as it manages to be merrily macabre and misanthropic in the sort of audacious alienating fashion that would offend individuals of all political stripes, especially completely humorless authoritarian bureaucrat types that somehow get a hard-on from soulless schlock like socialist realism.

While I would be a liar if I tried to pass myself off as a Czechoslovak New Wave expert of sorts, I think I am familiar enough with the movement to say that, during its all-too-brief existence, it unequivocally produced some of the most preternaturally dark, perturbing, and artistically enterprising films in all of cinema history. Indeed, while kosher Czech filmmaker Miloš Forman is unfortunately the best known filmmaker associated with the movement since he would later go on to direct hit Hollywood films like One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1975) and Amadeus (1984), his classic Czech New Wave flicks like Loves of a Blonde (1965) and The Firemen's Ball (1967) are pretty softcore and less than aesthetically ambitious when compared to the anti-kraut celluloid pagan blood orgy that is František Vlácil's Marketa Lazarová (1967) or the kaleidoscopic coming-of-age vampirism of Jaromil Jireš' Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970). Fans of degenerate 'food play' bullshit like wet and messy fetishism, feederism, and nyotaimori can also rejoice in Czech auteuress Věra Chytilová's classic psychedelic psychodrama Daisies (1966) where a debauched dumb dame duo gets all down and dirty with dick-shaped devourables and cutesy cunt chaos, among other things. With her all-the-more-avant-garde Adam and Eve reworking Fruit of Paradise (1970), Chytilová once again demonstrated a singular talent for finding the most organically beautiful color schemes in the darkness of men's souls. Of course, considering the strange Teutophobia of Vlácil's films like Marketa Lazarová and The Valley of the Bees (1967), the filmmakers of the Czech New Wave were naturally also interested in the historical subject of the Big H.Long before the holocaust became a jadedly Judeocentric cinema subject of the cliché-ridden and unwittingly cynical sort, Czech enfant terrible Jan Němec bombarded the world with his exceedingly esoteric and exquisitely elliptical debut feature Diamonds of the Night (1964), which makes Schindler's List seem like a retarded Richard Donner action movie by comparison in terms of artistic and emotional complexity. And, to go back to Valerie and Her Week of Wonders, it is like a vampire flick as directed by the lovechild Sergei Parajanov and a Völkisch auteur à la Ewiger Wald (1936), albeit shamelessly surreally Slavonic. As for The Cremator—undoubtedly Juraj Herz's greatest film and a cinematic work that the director himself has described as having total artistic control of—it is arguably the greatest, most idiosyncratically immaculate, and unforgettable film associated with the Czech New Wave and somehow it rather abstractly, aberrantly, and, arguably, aloofly, meditates on the shoah. Thankfully, the film also has a masterful musical score by Czech maestro Zdeněk Liška who of course created music for great films by great directors like Jan Švankmajer, František Vlácil, and Věra Chytilová, among countless others.

The Cremator was not the first hit Czech holocaust film of its era as director Juraj Herz, who was self-taught, actually worked as a second-unit director on two shoah cinematic showcases, including Zbyněk Brynych's Transport from Paradise (1962) and Ján Kadár and Elmar Klos' Academy Award-winning The Shop on Main Street (1965)—a film that seems pretty tame and banal by today's sensational shoah standards—before going solo with the non-shoah short The Junk Shop (1965). Like Kadár and quite unlike Spielberg, Herz was also actually a holocaust survivor that spent his childhood in Ravensbrück concentration camp and, according to film programmer Irena Kovarova, he apparently developed certain perverse interests in regard to sex and death as a result of what he personally witnessed there (or as she so calmly states in a featurette included with The Criterion Collection blu-ray release of The Cremator, “he came from the camps knowing way too much about sex and way too much about death”), which is quite apparent in his film as it is a stylishly sleazy cinematic work that seems to say more about its curious creator than the nasty Nazi numbskulls it so devilishly depicts. Of course, belated NYC cineaste Amos Vogel—a Vienna-born Jew with certain obvious ethnic/political biases—tries to spin it a different way in his classic text Film as a Subversive Art (1974) where he argues that is, “A provocative attempt to penetrate the origins of sado-sexual Nazi mentality is made in this oppressive, strongly expressionist film about an inhibited petty bourgeois family-man whose work with corpses at the local crematorium – to free them for the after-life – gains unexpected proportions during the Nazi occupation [...] Editing and camerawork is strongly influenced by the new cinema in the West. Equally surprising for the puritanical East is its clear, yet entirely ‘hidden’ portrayal of fellatio, with the girl under a table and the man sitting behind it: at the end, she merges, wiping her mouth.” Indeed, probably not realizing Herz is a fellow chosenite, Vogel highlights supposed Nazi perversity while unwittingly exposing his own perversion and spiritual contempt for Slavic folk. When it comes down to it, The Cremator is really the freewheeling artistic expression of a damaged and debauched holocaust survivor who, as a Eastern European Jew, is a quite worthy heir of Franz Kafka and Bruno Schulz (who of course influenced the Brothers Quay who were also heavily influenced by Herz's friend and collaborator Jan Švankmajer).

If any film manages to reconcile the grotesque expressionist poetry of Gottfried Benn with the disturbingly degenerate caricatures of the poet's ideological nemesis George Grosz, it is indubitably The Cremator which, rather fittingly, oftentimes feels like a tribute to virtually all forms of pre-Nazi Entartete Kunst. If

Italian-Jewish criminologist was right when he argued in his text Man of Genius (1889) that artistic genius was oftentimes a form of hereditary insanity, Herz's films certainly support that thesis as they are clearly not the product of a sound mind but a debauched dude whose potent aesthetic vision is only rivaled by his clear affection for the fantastically rancid and risqué and it is next to impossible to separate the two in a frolicsomenely fucked film like The Cremator where social conformity becomes a symbol of moral corrosion despite the film itself being a gleeful expression of moral corrosion where morbidity is made merry yet the everyday and bourgeois is somehow supposed to be the sickest thing of all. In its horror-ish depiction of the mental decline of an enterprising bourgeois family man, the film can certainly be compared to works ranging from Arturo Ripstein's The Castle of Purity (1973) aka El castillo de la pureza to Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980), but Herz's magnum opus is ultimately a singular flick that really has no contemporaries. While it is easy to describe it as an anti-nazi/anti-bourgeois critique straight from the blackened heart of a renegade holocaust survivor, I think it is also a film that resonates with fellow Jew Gustav Mahler's words, "In my works can be found my whole existence, my whole view of life. . . . There too will be found my angst—my anxiety, my fear." In terms of its unwaveringly subversive spirit, gorgeous yet grotesque neo-gothic aesthetic, and rather brazen approach to depicting the ultimate taboo of familicide, I think the film comes closest to Italian auteur Marco Bellocchio's truly iconoclastic debut feature Fists in the Pocket (1965).

Auter Herz wants you to immediately know right from the get-go of The Cremator that the titular protagonist is a banal bourgeois guy with a banal bourgeois family, but he also wants you to know that there is something serious off and unnerving weird about this somewhat cartoonish protagonist who acts if he is the autistic star of an insanely idealized dream than a real person with a real life. Indeed, as Karel Kopfrkingl (Rudolf Hrušínský) states to his wife at the very beginning of the film in a spasmodically edited scene while hanging out with his nuclear family at the local zoo, "My sweet... This is the blessed spot where we met 17 years ago. Only the leopard is new. Kind nature long ago relieved the other of his shackles. You see, dear, I keep talking of nature's benevolence, of merciful fate, of the kindness of God. We judge and criticize others, rebuke them. But what about we ourselves? I always have the feeling that I do so little for you [...] Thanks to your dowry... to your blessed mother's support and the support of your aunt. Perhaps I furnished our apartment, but that's about all. Dear, I must take care of you. Zina is 16, Mili 14. Come now, children... Cages are for mute creatures." Undoubtedly, Herr Kopfrkingl is big on freedom as he sees his job as cremator as a form of liberation where he is selflessly liberates souls as inspired by his curious influence from Bardo Thodol aka The Tibetan Book of the Dead. As a mensch that respects his Judaic physician Dr. Bettelheim (Eduard Kohout), new employee Strauss (Jiří Lír), and half-Hebrew wife Lakmé (Vlasta Chramořtová who also portrays the protagonist's favorite prostitute), Kopfrkingl seems totally devoid of racial prejudice, but it does not take much for him to be convinced of the virtues of completely betraying all the Jews in his life when his brutal kraut Nazi comrade Walter Reinke (Ilja Prachař) tells him of the new Aryan agenda that includes many personal perks, including an all-blonde brothel and a nice new job as an all-power cremator that dedicates his life to "liberating" souls. No longer content with just burning bodies, Kopfrkingl graduates on to coldblooded murder so that he speed-up the process of liberating souls. While initially thinking of himself as nothing more than a proud cultivated Czech that even enjoys the "Jewish way" of "jellied carp" during Christmas, Kopfrkingl begins stating things like, "even the old Teutons, dear friends, burned their dead, entrusted them to flames," after his rather culturally confused Nazi conversion and it is ultimately his beloved mischling family the pays the most pernicious price in a film where ideology and insanity are virtually depicted as one and the same.

Indeed, aside from betraying his Jewish friends after receiving the distinguished honor of being invited by his boy Bettelheim to a Chevra Suda dinner and providing phony talk of a Jewish conspiracy to his Nazi friends, Kopfrkingl goes completely crazy and kills his Jewish wife and son (although he also tries to kill his beloved daughter, the Nazis promise to do the job for him) so that they can be properly cremated with Aryan corpses and obtain a patently preposterous posthumous purity of sorts. Despite being clearly unhinged, Kopfrkingl is provided with top secret knowledge by a Nazi bigwig about a souped-up crematorium and gas chambers, which he naturally fully approves of. Not surprisingly, Herr Kopfrkingl's mental decline parallels his rise to power and he increasingly comes into contact with his rather dedicated Dalai Lama doppelganger who confirms to him the crucial spiritual necessity of his work. In fact, at the very end of the film in an ominously otherworldly scene where Nazi bigwigs drive him away in a fancy car in the rain as a virtual young witchy Angel of Death sees him off, Kopfrkingl declares with a strange degree of deranged gleeful dedication, "No one will suffer. I'll save them all" as he schizophrenically imagines himself being driven to Dalai Lama's Potala Palace where he assumedly believes he will be taking over (notably, the film takes place in the aftermath of the death of the 13th Dalai Lama, Thubten Gyatso, in 1933, which was also the same year as the rise of Hitler and National Socialist takeover of Germany). Of course, as Cioran once so rightly and elegantly wrote, "Nietzsche's great luck—to have ended as he did: in euphoria!" Indeed, Kopfrkingl might have brutally murdered his family members and betrayed virtually every friend he has ever had, but he is nothing if not exceedingly enraptured as if he has literally died and gone to heaven.

With its captivating combination of severely spasmodic schizo editing, sometimes nauseating and even necrotic yet simultaneously faux-merry melodrama, gorgeously grotesque gothic aesthetics and tone, charmingly creepy caricaturelike characters, heterodox horror ingredients and somehow paradoxically antiquated yet avant-garde essence, The Cremator—a film that manages to both define and transcend the movement it belongs to—is surely the cream of the Czech cinematic crop and a rare merry celluloid testament to the metaphysics of morbidity and misanthropy. In its depiction of an almost transcendental transformation of a bourgeois bore and striking experimental dreamlike cinematography, the film sometimes almost feels John Frankenheimer's Seconds (1966) as produced by the ghost of Val Lewton had he died brutally and morbidly in a concentration camp (as opposed to rather impotently croaking from a low-key heart attack like he did in real-life). Of course, despite the film's preternatural persuasion, auteur Juraj Herz wears his many eclectic aesthetic influences on his sleeve, most notably during a scene in the film where the film's protagonist stands in front of great Early Netherlandish master Hieronymus Bosch's masterpiece 'The Garden of Earthly Delights,' hence Kopfrkingl's classic lines from the film like, "The only certainty in life is death...and the implementation of a propitious new order. The Fuehrer's new, fortunate Europe and death are the only certainties that we humans have." While executed in an innately ironical fashion, Herz's film is nothing if not a truly hypnotic celebration of Spanish homeboy José Milán Astray's classic motto: "Long Live Death." Instead of hysterically harping on the holocaust, Herz seamlessly interweaves classic pieces of art (including of the archaic Judaic sort) and even vintage Aryan pornography to tell something profoundly (disturbing) about the (in)human condition, thereupon confirming the perennial nature of truly great art in a cinematic work that, despite its decidedly degenerate essence, should be celebrated as a truly great piece of cinematic art. Of course, it should be no surprise that the film also pays tribute to the grotesque grandiosity of Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol as it is a key aesthetic influence in a cinematic work that audaciously borrows from the highbrow and lowbrow without ever once attempting to discriminate between the two, hence the aberrant artistic brilliance of the film. Indeed, The Cremator might contain the aesthetic integrity and overall meticulousness of mise-en-scène of an early Tarkovsky flick, but it also has the unhinged spirit and intense amorality of an Andy Milligan flick à la Seeds (1968). In that sense, it is no surprise that Herz later went into more genre-driven artsploitation oriented territory with a film like Ferat Vampire (1982) aka Upír z Feratu which is notable for being a bloodsucker flick with a blood-fueled automobile.

By sheer happenstance, I was recently reading Emil Cioran's classic text The Trouble With Being Born (1973) around the same time I re-watched The Cremator and soon discovered the Romanian philosopher gave what would be a nice thematic description of the film when he wrote, "Annihilating affords a sense of power, flatters something obscure, something original in us. It is not by erecting but by pulverizing that we may divine the secret satisfactions of a god. Whence the lure of destruction and the illusions it provokes among the frenzied of any era.” In fact, the book contains a number of aphorisms that would make for suitable descriptions of the film. For example, the deranged protagonist is strangely likeable because, as Cioran noted, “We forgive only madmen and children for being frank with us: others, if they have the audacity to imitate them, will regret it sooner or later.” In terms of the film’s depiction of paternal filicide, one might be tempted to awkwardly laugh at Cioran’s remark, “My vision of the future is so exact that if I had children, I should strangle them here and now.” As for the film’s shamelessly merry misanthropy and overall decided worship of death, one cannot help but wallow in Cioran’s words, “Man gives off a special odor: of all the animals, he alone smells of the corpse.” As for the film’s director Herz, who I have mixed feelings about but regard his shoah flick as a masterpiece, The Cremator is a good example of what Cioran was hinting at when he wrote, “A writer has left his mark on us not because we have read him a great deal but because we have thought of him more than is warranted. I have not frequented Baudelaire or Pascal particularly, but I have not stopped thinking of their miseries, which have accompanied me everywhere as faithfully as my own.” Indeed, as someone that could certainly do without ever see another holocaust flick again, I have to argue that Herz is, to some extent, a rare artist with virtual alchemical abilities as morbid mensch that can clearly take the shittiest and most play-out subjects and molds them into something akin to artistic gold. After all, there is more genuine horror in a single slice of dark humor in The Cremator than there is in the entirety of Schindler’s List but I guess that should be expected from a film that basks in the banality of big budget bathos. Of course, it would probably be fairer to compare Herz’s flick to The Pianist (2002) as it was also directed by a holocaust survivor of sorts but ultimately The Cremator has more in common with Roman Polanski’s early Polish avant-garde features like The Lamp (1959) aka Lampa—a film that certainly can be seen as a sort of allegory for the holocaust and the apocalyptic nightmare nature of the Second World War in general, especially in Eastern Europe—than the director’s hit Palme d’Or and Academy Award-winning Hollywood holocaust flick.

To shamelessly borrow another quote from Cioran, I think that auteur Herz would approve of his words in relation to a major theme of The Cremator when he wrote, “When we think of the Berlin salons in the Romantic period, of the role played in them by a Henrietta Herz or a Rachel Levin, of the friendship between the latter and Crown Prince Louis-Ferdinand; and when we then think that if such women had lived in this century they would have died in some gas chamber, we cannot help considering the belief in progress as the falsest and stupidest of superstitions.” Of course, one of the most brilliant aspects of the film is that it seems like a Hebrew-helmed aesthetic hodgepodge of numerous pre-Nazi European artistic movements over the last two centuries that concludes with German Expressionism, thereupon associating, not unlike Hans-Jürgen Syberberg’s magnum opus Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977), the Third Reich with the dubious legacy of the destruction of European art and culture as a result of the Hitlerite taint. In short, the capitulation of Nazi Germany also resulted in an absurd aesthetic holocaust sorts, hence Frankfurt school Führer Theodor Adorno's despicable dictum that, "to write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric." Of course, The Cremator is pleasantly putrid cinematic poetry as directed by a holocaust survivor and it certainly says more about than shoah than, say, Claude Lanzmann's badly bloated 566-minute anti-polack doc Shoah (1985). Indeed, Herz's film is the closest thing the world will ever have to a film as directed by Otto Dix, albeit from a savagely sardonic post-shoah Jewish perspective instead of a savagely sardonic post-WWI kraut one.

Notably, in her insightful text Lustmord: Sexual Murder in Weimar Germany (1995), German-language folklore and literature scholar Maria Tatar noted that in Nazi Germany, "Jews came to be linked not only with the perpetrators of sexual murder, but with the victims as well. Like the prostitute, the Jew is seen to represent a serious threat to the moral, fiscal, and sexual economy of the social body. As Sander Gilman has pointed out, both prostitutes and Jews have been linked by what is seen to be a sexualized relation to capital—they have 'but one interest, the conversion of sex into money or money into sex.' Unable to find value in transcendent spiritual matters, their interests remain fixed on the material and financial. More important, prostitutes and Jews, because of their spiritual corruption, are considered carriers of sexually transmitted diseases, a view clearly articulated in Hitler's MEIN KAMPF." Of course, one of the most intriguing and perversely trollish aspects of The Cremator is that auteur Herz completely subverts these stereotypes and depicts the Nazi characters in the fashion Tatar describes as the Nazis have their own special all-blond bordello where they debased Aryan dames as a reward for their role in the destruction of Eastern European Jewry. Additionally, lead character Karel Kopfrkingl is a particularly perverted hypocrite with a strange fear-cum-fetish of STDs to the point where he regularly sees his Jewish physician friend Dr. Bettleheim, who he eventually betrays to secure his place as a patron of Aryan prostitution, to see if he has contracted a sexually-transmitted disease (in fact, Kopfrkingl seems especially enamored while admiring a grotesque Bellmer-esque STD display at a local carnival in a scene that really underscores the character's innate association of sex and death). As Tatar also noted in her book, the "Jewish vampire" was another common trope of (proto)Nazi culture as arguably most brutally described in Arthur Dinter's popular Weimar era novel Die Sünde wider das Blut (1917) aka The Sin Against the Blood but also largely apolitical cinematic works like F.W. Murnau's masterpiece Nosferatu (1922). While The Cremator does not feature any literal bloodsuckers, it does feature its fair share of blood and Kopfrkingl can certainly be seen as an unconventional 'psychic vampire' of sorts. Needless to say, it is no surprise that director Herz would later work in the vampire genre. In that sense, one can see Hebrew Herz as an artist that is so gleefully transgressive in both the aesthetic and (meta)political sense that he has fully embraced the negative Nazi racial stereotypes to the point of nihilistic fury as if his main goal with his art was to destroy the very meaning of early twentieth-century race, art, and culture. After all, one simply cannot finish The Cremator without being 'touched,' if not being downright tormented. Indeed, the film almost makes me want to agree with Cioran, who I will quote one more time, when he wrote, "The number of fanatics, extremists, and degenerates I have been able to admire! A relief bordering on orgasm at the notion that one will never again embrace a cause, any cause . . ." Naturally, things get a big complicated when one finds themselves being able to respect both Herz and Dinter. In terms of attempting to reconcile a film like The Cremator and NS thinkers like Dinter, Alfred Rosenberg, and Hans F. K. Günther, the alpha-neofolk outfit Death In June is your best bet, especially their somewhat obscure album Free Tibet (2006) where The Tibetan Book of the Dead receives a tribute of sorts.

THE CHILD I NEVER WAS

Kai S. Pieck (2002)

Great German serial killer films are certainly a dime of dozen. From German Expressionism with Fritz Lang's M (1931) to German New Cinema with The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe directed by Ulli Lommel and produced by Rainer Werner Fassbinder to the post-German New Cinema no-budget underground with Jörg Buttgerit's Schramm (1994), it seems that krautland is king when it comes to fiercely fucked yet audaciously artful flicks about psychopathic killers of the insanely idiosyncratic sort. Of course, one of the reasons for such a prevalence of these films in Deutschland is due to the fact that Germany had a serial killer problem after the First World World (in fact, the childkiller of Lang's M is a composite of a number of real-life killers, including Peter Kürten, Fritz Haarmann, Carl Großmann, etc.). Indeed, social and economic chaos made post-WWI Weimar Germany the perfect playground of perversity for both budding and refined serial killers alike. Of course the Second World War, which was even more deleterious than the First World War, also spawned a number of notable deranged psychopathic killers with an aberrant affinity for bloodlust, with kraut queer child killer Jürgen Bartsch—a foul fiend of a fellow who used to carry around the mutilated corpses of his child victims in plain public view via a suitcase (aka 'children's coffin') of sorts and rather enjoyed fiddling with the naked and dismembered corpses of his kid victims in a secret cave hideout—being arguably the most creepily pathetic of these ice-cold killers. Born Karl-Heinz Sadrozinski in 1946 as the bastard son of a mother who died of tuberculosis shortly after his birth, Bartsch spent his first couple months being cared for by a group of nurses and was eventually adopted at eleven months of age by a butcher and his wife from Langenberg (today Velbert-Langenberg). With a wacked-out adoptive mother who suffered from OCD who would not little her little boy play with other children and who was forced to attend a sexually-repressive Catholic boarding school, bastard Bartsch was already a crazed cocksucker killer by 1961 at the mere age of 15 and would ultimately kill and dismember four boys between the ages 8 and 13 until he was caught and arrested in 1966 when his fifth would-be-victim managed to escape. As depicted in the German flick The Child I Never Was (2002) aka Ein Leben lang kurze Hosen tragen directed by Kai S. Pieck (Isola, Ricky: Three's a Crowd), the Bartsch case is notable due to the fact that it was the first trial in German jurisdiction history where psycho-social factors (i.e. the killer's warped childhood) came into play when handing down the decidedly deranged defendant's sentence. In the partially fictionalized biopic The Child I Never Was—a quasi-docudrama/melodrama hybrid utilizing the serial killer's own letters and essays (Bartsch spent some time while institutionalized documenting his tragic childhood, fears, passions, perversions, etc.)—Bartsch's troubling teenage years, malevolent mutilation-based homoerotic murders, and post-trial confessions are depicted in strenuous and even sickening detail. In other words, The Child I Never Was is a terribly dark and uniquely ugly film about a terribly dark and uniquely ugly individual whose crappy childhood, overbearing pseudo-mother, and cock-blocking Catholic upbringing helped mold him into a pernicious poof pervert with a pathological case of Peter Pan syndrome.

For anyone to describe The Child I Never Was as an 'enjoyable film' would be nothing short of a puffery-plagued lie (or as sign of sexual sadism on the part of the viewer), though it is by no means a bad film, just a rather disheartening and thematically disgusting one. Aesthetically cold and sterile and thematically deadly serious and morbidly melancholy, The Child I Never Was is a film about a born bastard loser that was destined for infamy. Melodramatically depicting the life of Teutonic twink teen serial killer Jürgen Bartsch during his killer coming-of-age years, as well as his equally lonely prison years in the somewhat aesthetically sterile form of a docudrama-like tape confession, The Child I Never Was is the patently pathetic celluloid tale of a fucked fellow who would enter this world in a misbegotten manner and would leave in no less a 'tragic' fashion. As Jürgen Bartsch (Tobias Schenke) tells a camera at the beginning of the film, "During these six years in prison, things have been great with my parents. Maybe it's because I'm a good boy now. The way I was at 9 or 10, maybe... I can't imagine being apart from my parents. I also can't imagine my parents dying. That's a completely unbearable idea. I really like my parents. I'm happy when they come to visit me. Mind you, to be honest, 15 minutes is enough, you know?," but as one learns while The Child I Never Was progresses, the demented boy's 'love' for his family is no more genuine than his halfhearted attempt at becoming a heterosexual via his failed teenage experiences with Essen-based female prostitutes at the age of 17 and post-arrest marriage to a naive nurse. The virtual slave of his exceedingly overbearing adoptive mother Getrud Bartsch (Ulrike Bliefert) for most of his short and sad life, Jürgen was not allowed to play with other kids as a child and if he got dirt on the rug, his pseudo-mommy would not think twice about calling him "a piece of shit" and slapping him around. As for Jürgen's butcher adoptive father Gerhard (Walter Gontermann), the meathead of a man apparently never displayed a single inkling of emotion towards his adopted son until it was revealed that he was adopted. Of course, Jürgen's biggest problem was that he was a closeted homo of the Catholic-reared sort and that he was so terribly desperate for little boy ass that he was literally willing to kill just to get it. With the peculiar boyish charm of a sort of kraut Leopold and Loeb, Jürgen would lure younger boys that looked quite similar to himself (i.e. dark/swarthy hair, small, scrawny, pedomorphic, etc.) with the promise of money/goodies, murder them inside his secret cave hideout, and fondle their dead corpses. After attempting to molest a friend who managed to getaway and tell his parents, Jürgen's father Gerhard found out and quite naturally became concerned, even contacting social services about the incident, but apparently the 'progressive' West German government felt there was nothing to worry about. Of course, Jürgen eventually got bored with merely orally pleasuring the genitals of the dead boys, so he began cutting his victim's body open and fiddling with their guts for maximum orgasmic excitement. Living with the subconscious desire to be caught for his actions as he confessed in his writings, Jürgen was eventually caught after making the mistake of leaving a lit candle for his fifth and final would-be victim, who managed to escape using the candle flame to burn off the rope that the pedo-killer bound him with. Apparently, Jürgen left the boy to watch television with his parents and planned to skin his victim alive when he got back, which certainly demonstrates the domesticated depravity of his mind and the schizophrenic double-life he led before he was caught.

THE CHILD I NEVER WAS

While The Child I Never Was concludes pseudo-farcically on a strangely light note with Jürgen Bartsch doing a childish magic trick (or what he calls a "phenomenal trick"), the real-life sodomite serial killer disappeared from the world in 1976 in a strikingly fitting manner when he was only 29 years old. After marrying a nurse in a feeble and insincere attempt to 'reintegrate himself into society,' Bartsch opted for having voluntary castration (probably a procedure more pedophiles/serial killers should have!) in the hope he would not have to spend the rest of his life in a mental institution, but fate was not in his favor as he ultimately died on the operating table after an unskilled (and probably unsympathetic) nurse gave him an overdose of Halothane (inhalational general anesthetic). Undoubtedly, in its attempt to portray Jürgen Bartsch as patently pitiable being whose aberrant actions were not surprising considering his unhinged upbringing as an unwanted post-WWII bastard, The Child I Never Was is a total anti-titillating and emotionally terrorizing cinematic success as a sort of melodramatic kraut equivalent to the harrowing HBO documentary Paradise Lost: The Child Murders at Robin Hood Hills (1996). Additionally, the actor that played the young Bartsch, Sebastian Urzendowsky, was a perfect match in terms of appearance and essence. Like the real Bartsch (whose real birth surname was Sadrozinski), actor Urzendowsky is a pedomorphic fellow of the swarthy yet pale sort who, at least judging by his surname, is also a German of Polish ancestry. In that sense, The Child I Never Was also makes for a great piece of accidental anti-Polack propaganda as a work that features the most unflattering depiction of an ethnic Pole since the National Socialist propaganda flick Feuertaufe (1940) aka Baptism of Fire directed by Hans Bertram. Of course, in terms of Teutonic serial killer flicks, The Child I Never Was, not unlike Der Totmacher (1995) aka The Deathmaker directed by Romuald Karmakar, may be one of the better more recent works of the subgenre, but it is certainly not up to par with timeless works like Fritz Lang's M, The Devil Strikes at Night (1957) aka Nachts, wenn der Teufel kam directed by Teutonic Israelite Robert Siodmak, and The Tenderness of Wolves. After failing to think of a Xmas-themed movie to view/review and remembering Kai S. Pieck's serial killer flick had a deathly dreary Christmas dinner scene between Jürgen Bartsch and his maniac mommy, I decided that re-watching The Child I Never Was today would probably make for a 'memorable' tribute to J.C.'s birthday. Needless to say, The Child I Never Was managed to ruin any Christmas spirit I did have and if that's not a good enough recommendation for a serial killer flick, I don't know what is.

RAPTURIOS

Kamal Ahmed (2007)

We're no strangers to horror. You know the rules and so do I. Kamal Ahmed (The Jerky Boys) takes the barren and unpopulated sub-genre of Urban horror and releases a film that most viewers will come to terms with. Rapturios is a flawed piece of cinema but one cannot help but enjoy what they are being served. Call it a guilty pleasure, if you will.

Slip into the Rabbit hole with Rapturios, an up and coming horrorcore rapper (Judging from his monotone and stale lyrics). He's the average honky sculpted in the Korn's Jonathan Davis ala father molesting scandal. His fragmented past and his famous future collide in an endless clash. He, just like many others, begins dabbling in Latino provided mind-altering drugs to boost creative juices and forget his trauma. After doing it all, he is given a new experimental drug called Afterlife which throttles him into nightmarish hallucinations or murder. Like so many Urban horror films before it, Rapturios makes quick to exploit the "vices" of blacks, this being drugs, white women, money, and hip-hop. The dream is being lived till this is jeopardized by a fucked up whitey dropped on their studio's doorstep. Originally, Urban horror films like Tales from the Hood used polar opposite blacks to create a composite difference between the respectable Negro and the ignorant gang-bangers. Rapturios drops the race message and focuses on a film that is a Creepshow version of 8 Mile. Filming horror in a gritty and dirty style, both psychological and manifestation scenes, is always a huge risk later when editing. Production value can be sacrificed as your film looks like utter garbage. Many precautions should be taken, lest you want your film to look like the filler scenes of Rapturios. While the presentation of the nightmare scenes, sex scenes, and hallucinations are stellar, I found the drama section of this film to be filmed by a director who doesn't bleed for his work. To continue with the unpleasantness, the story was as shattered and hole-ridden as Rapturios' forced persona was. The duration of this film lays on thick a pretentious coating of a self-boasting mindfuck surprise ending, when in reality the ending was guessed 20 minutes into the film. The ending doesn't have closure and you're left with a period piece side story of Native Americans, the west frontier, and a Tim Curry devil wannabe. For a rap horror film, the "freestyles" were laughably bad. Not as much as, lets say... Ragdoll. Even though Rapturios ain't much of a rapper, he is an interesting character and as well as a hell of a good actor. I couldn't help but enjoy Rapturios for being an Urban horror film with flair and conflict. God knows we need another Killjoy (sarcasm alert). It's nowhere near as perfect as Ragdoll is, and it isn't racy and sublime like Tales from the Hood, but Rapturios came a long way with its white rapper so I'll let it be. Rapturios is nearly as sharp as its Devil's claw.

THE GAMBLER

Karel Reisz (1974)

If there is any single great example of an 'auteur' who is a much better screenwriter than he is an actual filmmaker with a talent for the strictly visual, it is indubitably rather loathsome and singularly sleazy Judaic degenerate James Toback (The Pick-up Artist, Harvard Man). Indeed, aside from his debut feature Fingers (1978), the greatest screenplays he ever wrote, The Gambler (1974) and Bugsy (1991), were directed by other filmmakers. Notably, in his rather insightful essay Toward the Devaluation of Woody Allen originally featured in the May-June 1990 issue of the Jewish leftist rag Tikkun Magazine, Jonathan Rosenbaum, himself a Jew, more or less argued that Jewish filmmakers might have an innate handicap when it comes to the visual, noting, "[Woody] Allen is far from being the only comic director who thinks verbally more than visually; the same is true of Mel Brooks, and an overall orientation toward the word rather than the image may have something to do with the nature of Judaism as an oral culture." Not surprisingly, aside from Fingers, which derives the greatest part of its potency from lead Harvey Keitel's performance, virtually every single film that Toback has ever directed is either a celluloid abortion with interesting elements (Love and Money (1982)) or an awe-inspiringly atrocious joke (When Will I Be Loved (2004)), though—to the director's credit—it is not hard to recognize a Toback flick, thus he must be recognized as an 'auteur,' even if he is not exactly a good one. After all, no many other filmmakers make cinematic works with such a shamelessly flagrant mix of pathetic pick-up artist posturing, racially schizophrenic eroticized negrophilia, proto-wigger fetishism, eccentric Jewish ethnocentrism, sexual neurosis, and cuck-ish Mike Tyson worship, among various other deplorable ingredients that put mainstream Hollywood to shame in terms of sheer Judaic degeneracy. Somewhat ironically, Toback's most overtly autobiographical film, The Gambler, was directed by someone else (who he apparently hated so much that he vowed to never work with him again), which was ultimately to the film's great artistic benefit. Luckily for Toback, virtually everyone involved with the film was a fellow member of the Hebraic tribe, including Brit-Czech-Jew director Karel Reisz (Saturday Night and Sunday Morning, Isadora), stereotype-shattering Jewish tough guy star James Caan, producers Irwin Winkler and Robert Chartoff, degenerate jazz composer Jerry Fielding (notably, the film also features "Symphony No. 1 in D" by late-Romantic Ashkenazi composer Gustav Mahler), and even cinematographer Victor J. Kemper. Largely autobiographical but also loosely based off of Fyodor Dostoyevsky's short existentialist novella The Gambler (1867), Toback's film is, culturally/racially speaking, shamelessly Judaic to the core as a rare mainstream cinematic work where Jewish chutzpah, (sado)masochism, white collar criminality, blonde shiksa worship, and ethnocentrism are central themes. Indeed, no one cannot finish the film without coming to the obvious conclusion that Toback is an unsympathetic scumbag that fully deserves (and seemingly desires) the grand misfortunes that he masochistically sires via his own unhinged egomania. In many ways, Toback's outstandingly assholeish autobiographical antihero is an unintentional anti-Semitic racial caricature worthy of Julius Streicher's National Socialist tabloid Der Stürmer and, were it not for lead Caan's inordinate Hebraic handsomeness and stoicism, the film might be completely unbearable, even if Reisz is a very capable and even somewhat underrated filmmaker (indeed, for what it is, Reisz's John Fowles adaptation The French Lieutenant's Woman (1981) is nearly immaculate). Although also a member of the tribe, it seems that Reisz highly benefited from coming from a European arthouse background (in fact, it is probably no coincidence that many of cinema history's greatest Jewish filmmakers, ranging from Erich von Stroheim to Josef von Sternberg to Stanley Kubrick, were either European-born and/or worked in Europe).

Before she became a personal friend of Toback and made a disastrous failed attempt to begin a career in Hollywood by working on his all-too-ambitious cinematic abortion Love and Money (1982), Pauline Kael wrote a short yet fairly scathing review of The Gambler where she focused on the antihero's Hebraic pseudo-aristocratic airs, stating, "The gambler here is a brilliant young Jewish prince, professor of literature to ghetto blacks, and potential great novelist [...] He's as flamboyantly superior as Norman Mailer's Rojack, and the prevailing tone of the film is Mailerian dread [...] The script, by James Toback, is a grandiloquent, egocentric novel written as a film; it spells everything out, and the director Karel Reisz's literal-minded, proficient style calls attention to how airless and schematic it is." Herself from a working-class community of Jewish farmers, Kael held a lifelong disgust for wealthy Hebrews and resented the pomposity of the rich liberal protagonist played by Caan, or as Brian Kellow explained in his book Pauline Kael: A Life in the Dark (2011): "Toback had in fact come from a well-to-do New York family, while Pauline had come from working-class stock. 'She never liked to talk about being Jewish,' Toback observed. 'It was never anything she really identified with. At the same time, she had a real social and cultural antagonism for Jews she felt were sort of pretenders to society. She felt the character in THE GAMBLER was that, and therefore I must be.' To Toback, Pauline's conflicts about being Jewish were securely rooted in her relationship with her father, a working-class man who was looked down on by certain strata of society—in particular, boy other, wealthier Jews." While I rarely agree with Kael's opinions of films, she is right on the mark when she mocks Toback's uniquely unlovable kosher prince, who absurdly plays the self-appointed patron saint of ghetto negroes and athletes while living a disgustingly decadent self-indulgent existence where he pisses away the wealth and opportunities that his rather privileged background afford him. Hardly motivated by empathy, the protagonist's shvartzer fetish seems to be mainly due to his misguided admiration for the stereotypical impulsive, intemperate, and irrational nature of negroes. In short, the titular character is the sort of establishment leftist type that, influenced by the delusional pseudo-scientific Boasian view of race, would deny innate differences among the races, yet adores darkies largely due to exaggerated racial stereotypes that he, as a pampered white collar Israelite, totally lacks. After all, the intriguingly incriminating film was penned by a man that is well known for bragging about engaging in orgies with black football players. Far from a mindless moron that foolishly gambles money he does not have because he is desperate and/or simply does not know better, the antihero is a self-destructive addict and anxiety junky who is quite conscious of the true psychological nature of his vice and its deleteriousness, yet proudly partakes in it anyway while boasting about intentionally making risky gambles instead of safe ones. Indeed, Paramount Pictures took a big risk when they opted to produce the film, as the protagonist is nothing if not a distinctly unlikable mensch-that-you love-to-hate. Surely, one of the things that makes The Gambler so special is that it features an eponymous piece of human excrement that the viewer wants to strangle by the end of the film due to his brazen disregard for all good common sense and the effect that his pathologically criminal behavior has on his own loved ones.

As a proud Jew from an affluent family with roots in some Eastern European ghetto who has a racially schizophrenic fetish for both blonde Aryan Shiksas and black athletes (notably, Toback has the same exact obsessions as clearly revealed in his quite literally titled pre-Hollywood book Jim: The Author's Self-Centered Memoir of the Great Jim Brown (1971)), Axel Freed (played by James Caan, who was battling a bad cocaine addiction at the time) is in many ways a walking cliché. Axel owes his privileged life to the sweat, blood, and tears of his old school businessman grandfather A.R. Lowenthal (blacklisted Yiddish-speaking kosher commie Morris Carnovsky) who, on top of giving his grandson a good life, taught him to hate Slavs and only date nice Jewish girls. Due to the fact that his father died when he was young, Axel's grandfather also acted as his father figure. Undoubtedly, it is hard to understand Axel and his mentality without knowing a little bit about his beloved grandfather. Indeed, Axel's strong Eastern European Jewish background and anti-goyim sentiment is revealed in a long speech that he gives in tribute to his grandpa's eightieth birthday where he proudly states, "We are living in an age...that subverts the breeding of men like A.R. Lowenthal. In Lithuania, when he was 13...he stuck a knife in the back of a Cossack pig...who had knocked his mother to the ground. At 15, he prowled New York as a bandit...until he had the cash to feed a family of five. At 20, he opened a furniture store, which he built into two, then fifteen, then fifty, then a hundred. Until finally he had the largest chain America had ever seen. But not matter where he went...or what he did...he always found a place for every person bound to him by blood. Your families and your families' families—to say nothing of his own children, my Uncle Hy here...my dear mother Naomi...whose rare intelligence he nurtured...and to whom he gave an extra measure of support...when she was widowed early by my father's death. But I'm the one most deeply in his debt. Because every time I think my reach has stretched too far...I remember the moves that he has dared. So, I drink this toast on his 80th birthday. This man that seized what he wanted with nothing there to back him up...but wit and balls...and will. This killer, this king." Of course, as a man that was born with a kosher silver spoon in his mouth, Axel seems to be at least partly psychologically wounded by the fact that he will never be a truly great man like his completely self-made grandfather. Indeed, while Grandpa Lowenthal might have been born in an Eastern European ghetto, he now lives a life of great luxury in a large mansion where he spends much of his time in his study reading the works of degenerate British philosopher Bertrand Russell while being constantly waited on by a high yellow negro butler.

Undoubtedly, Axel inherited his chutzpah from Lowenthal, but unlike his grandfather, he has never really had to struggle and take risks, so his completely contrived gambles in life have only had mostly had negative consequences. Had Axel been born in a Polish shtetl a couple generations before, he might have grown up to become a NKVD Commissar or a bigwig in Murder Incorporated due to his particular yichus of ancient deep-seated hatred and resentment against the perennial goy enemy, but since he is from a posh yid family he naturally became a negrophiliac quasi-intellectual professor that does ridiculous lectures about how Dostoevsky was cool because he argued against the limits of rationalism and how trying to argue with people that $2 + 2 = 5$ is a bold demonstration of pure will. Of course, with his risky gambling bets, Axel also feels he is expressing his will in a rather visceral fashion, which is extremely important to him because, as he passionately argues to his class during a lecture, "Reason only satisfies man's rational requirements. Desire, on the other hand, encompasses everything. Desire is life." Indeed, unlike the stereotypical Jewish intellectual, Axel absolutely loathes cold and calculated rationalism and rather literally risk his life than drown in a placid sea of bromide bourgeois banality. Axel also seems to (arguably subconsciously) suffer the absurd delusion that by taking insanely irrational risks that he will somehow approach the greatness of his grand-pappy. Naturally, Axel's obsession with irrationalism, desire, and fanaticism also explain his rather ridiculous negrophilia, as he seems to long to be as deleteriously shortsighted as the average dope-peddling ghetto jigaboo. Of course, as all negroes know, you can't fake the funk and Axel will always be a spoiled self-loathing Jew-boy who cannot bear to confront the fact that he is a failed intellectual with an easy ivy league junior professor job who, quite unlike his grandfather, has never had to face real hardship, thus he simply invents said hardship to test the bounds of his own largely empty existence. Naturally, instead of impressing his family with his dangerous risks, he only brings them

Despite being a self-destructive Jewish junior professor of literature with not much to offer a woman aside from cold charm and superficial good-looks, Axel has managed to nab a relatively beautiful blonde shiksa named Billie (Lauren Hutton), though he treats her somewhat resentfully, which is probably due to the fact that she is not a bright Jewish physician like his beloved mama. Indeed, Axel truly cares about what others think about his girlfriend and even takes her by his grandfather's house so that the sagely old Semite can judge her. While grandpa Lowenthal is nice to Billie's face and compliments her on her fine Nordic physique and golden hair, he considers her to be completely unworthy of being his grandson's fuck-toy because she lacks Ashkenazi genes and he even goes so far as to tell Axel to immediately break up with her. In fact, grandpa demonstrates his strong racial chauvinism by stating to Axel in regard to Billie after she fails to recognize Walt Whitman's 1855 poem "I Sing the Body Electric" (1855), "She's is not for you. Avoid her. Break it off today. She's not for you [...] She was not meant for a scholar. That girl was meant for a club man, a playboy. Not for a man of character and virtue. Not for a Jew." Naturally, as a relative failure in comparison to his grandpa and mother, Axel's relationship with Billie seems to be largely based on a sense of inferiority. After all, no nice Jewish girl would dare to marry a failed intellectual that regularly gambles away his meager junior professor pay. Of course, Axel does not just treat his girlfriend like shit, as he has also brought great sorrow, worry, and pain to his widowed mother Naomi (Jacqueline Brookes). A practicing physician that seems to have effortlessly assimilated into WASP society, Naomi seems to not suffer from any of the mental problems and vices that plague her prodigal son. When Axel goes into serious debt and ends up owing $44,000 to some gangster after not following the advice of his guido bookie-cum-comrade 'Hips' (Paul Sorvino), he is ultimately forced to beg his mother to borrow the money. When Axel tells his mother how much he owes by writing the large figure in sand during an initially happy day at the beach, she completely breaks down and hysterically cries, "$44,000? Are you so naïve, you don't know...what those monsters do with the money you give them? They shoot it right in the arms of ten-year-old schoolchildren. I see them every day at the clinic. My god, Axel. Have I been such a failure...that I've raised a son to have the morals of a snail?" Needless to say, Axel's mother provides him with the money by emptying out a couple of her bank accounts because she realizes that there is a good chance that her sole son will be murdered under brutal circumstances if he does not pay up, but the antihero is such a piece of shit that he almost immediately opts to gamble the money instead of paying his debt. Indeed, aside from gambling on three basketball games for $15,000 a piece, Axel takes Billie to Las Vegas to flaunt his addiction at some sleazy casinos. While Axel wins a little bit of money at the casinos, he loses all of the money in the basketball bets. Of course, Billie is not too happy when slimy loan sharks break into his apartment in the middle of the night and Axel gets somewhat agitated when she dares to complain. After all, a bestial piece of shiksa trash has no right to complain to a wise Jewish prince.

As revealed by his blunt remarks like, "You know what's standing between your skull and a baseball bat? My word," gregarious guido bookie Hips really attempts to convince Axel to immediately pay off his debt lest his brains be bashed out by sadistic Sicilian mafioso goons. In fact, Hips even risks losing his best customer by opening up to Axel and candidly confessing in regard to the stupidity of gambling, "Listen. I'm gonna tell you something I've never told a customer before. Personally, I never made a bet in my life. You know why? Because I've observed firsthand the different types of people that are addicted to gambling. What we would call degenerates. I've noticed that there's one thing that makes all of them the same. You know what that is?" Needless to say, Hips is absolutely flabbergasted when Axel correctly answers his question by retorting, "Yes, they're all looking to lose [...] I could have wiped the floor with your ass. By playing just the games I knew I'd win. Listen, if all my bets were safe, there just wouldn't be any juice." More than winning or losing, Axel gets a major high during the intermediate waiting time before he actually discovers whether he is a winner or loser, hence the seeming incurability of his vice. Somewhat similarly, Axel only seems interested in fucking Billie during the moment before he discovers whether she actually wants it or not. When a sleazy pimp friend offers Axel the opportunity to fuck his attractive girlfriend for free, the protagonist is totally disinterested, as he is not enticed by the prospect of a sure thing. Naturally, Axel seems most aroused during the final thirty minutes or so of the film when his life is in jeopardy and he must find a way to pay his debt or be forced to sleep with the fishes courtesy of local wop mob goons.

After being beaten and kidnapped by the greasy haired soldiers of a mafia boss that he owes money to, Axel is coerced into getting a negro student of his named Spencer (Carl W. Crudup) to rig a basketball game at his university where the spade b-ball star must not win by any more than seven points. Indeed, Jewish liberal hero Axel ultimately exploits Spencer's Afro-African roundball talents for his own benefit just like the Jewish moguls in the NBA like Donald Sterling. While Axel only offers Spencer $5,000 for his criminal efforts, the protagonist stands to benefit the most monetarily as he will have his entire $44,000 debt paid off if his student is successful in rigging the game. Before the big game, Axel confronts his grandfather about the fact that he refused to help him with his debts and then brags that he managed to "fix it" himself. When Axel insinuates that he also used similar unsavory businessman tactics to get rich, his grandfather gets angry and proudly declares, "My way? How would you know how I did things? I was as honest as any man with great responsibility ever could be. I dealt with those vipers because I had to...not because I wanted to." Of course, Axel fails to realize that he, quite unlike his grandfather, lacks the intrinsic sis understanding of the great pride that comes with being a successful self-made businessman of the rags-to-riches oriented sort. Additionally, Axel's grandfather has no respect for the senseless behavior that led to his spoiled grandson acquiring such a quite literally deadly debt.

Although Axel manages to get out of trouble and get rid of his debt when his student Spencer makes good on his deal by rigging the game and winning by less than seven points, the masochistic antihero does not seem all too happy when fate acts in his favor and instead he stares into space with an intense and seemingly insane look on his face. While the protagonist almost seems disappointed that he has absconded a very potentially fatal fate, Hips is so happy that Axel manages to get out of trouble that he wants to celebrate and even offers to pay for a night a celebratory carnality, stating, "Let's get outta here. We'll eat some lasagna, grab some pussy, drink some wine. I'm supplyin'. Come on," but the professor seems possessed by a delusional sense of invincibility due to his good fortunes and decides to celebrate in his own perversely precarious fashion by risking his own life and heading to a whorehouse in a dangerous black ghetto where white people are regularly verbally assaulted just for walking down the street. Although Hips attempts to stop him from entering the both literally and figuratively dark depths of the trash-covered negro neighborhood and yells, "I don't want to lose my best customer. Hey, there's nothin' but cannibals down there. Hey, you can't go down there. You'll get killed!" Axel decides he wants to sample some STD-ridden negress streetwalker pussy. While Axel manages to easily procure said negro pussy, he gets in a fight with the prostitute and steals his money back when she refuses to take all of her clothes off (to the pussy-peddler's credit, she does not want to risk messing up her hair by taking her weave off). When the prostitute's pimp pulls out a knife and puts it up to his throat in an attempt to get the money back, Axel horrifies the negro by daring him to try to kill him by stating, "Why don't you kill me, then you can have the money!" while looking intensely into his eyes. When the pimp demonstrates that he is not the hardcore brotha' he pretends to be and fails to make good on his initial threat, Axel becomes enraged and decides to nearly beat him to death during a somewhat morbid moment where the protagonist reveals that he is not the great champion of ghetto negroes that he pretends to be. Rather revealingly, it is only when the prostitute slashes Axel's face with a knife that the antihero stops brutalizing the pimp. In the end, Axel stumbles out of the hotel room, walks down a staircase while frightened negroes look on, and then reveals a sadistic smile upon admiring the large flesh wound on his cheek after seeing his reflection in a symbolically dirty mirror. Of course, Axel is happy that he has finally acquired the curse of Cain, though the viewer suspects that he will not be truly happy until he is actually killed. In that sense, one could argue that the only true cure for addiction is death.

Notably, in a 2008 interview with Tony Macklin, The Gambler star James

THE GAMBLER

Caan would reveal in regard to his own artistic contribution to the ending of the film and his less than flattering feelings regarding screenwriter Toback, "I put this odd smile at the end, because I knew the real guy James Toback – this real person, who came from a very wealthy Jewish family, and he was a teacher. He was full of crap; he was so crazy. You know how the character coned his way through. The ultimate gamble – fighting with that pimp, walking out in Harlem. When he got his face cut, to me, what that meant, and what that little smile was – he didn't have to hide anymore. His ugliness was now apparent." Undoubtedly, it says a lot about a man when the actor portraying him in an autobiographical film describes him as "full of crap" and "so crazy." As the son of a German-Jewish butcher that grew up in a tough working-class neighborhood in Sunnyside, Queens, NYC that was comprised of wop, mick, and yid families, it is easy to see why Caan could not empathize with the self-destructive hedonism of an upper-class Hebrew like Toback. Of course, considering that Toback is an obnoxious slob of the hardly handsome sort, he owes a great deal to Caan for his contribution to the film. Certainly, the film would not be half as engrossing if a pretentious tub of kosher lard like Toback played himself as the filmmaker's unintentionally humorous quasi-autobiographical cameos in his films Exposed (1983) and When Will I Be Loved (2004) reveal in a rather glaring manner. Needless to say, it was only natural that a megalomaniac like Toback was far from happy when he discovered that his film was being remade by the same producers as the original film. In fact, Toback was very vocal with the press about his disgust for the film before it ever even began filming (notably, during the pre-production stage, Martin Scorsese was actually set to direct the film). To Toback's minor credit, The Gambler (2014) directed by for-hire hack Rupert Wyatt (Rise of the Planet of the Apes) and starring lapsed wigger Mark Wahlberg as the eponymous lead is a hopelessly goyish affair that seems to have been made to appeal to sexually confused fratboys and philistine fans of soulless trash like HBO's Entourage. Rather bizarrely, despite Jewish characters and themes being more prominent in Hollywood now than any other time in cinema history, the remake is almost totally de-judaized aside from John Goodman portraying a truly grotesque baldheaded Jewish loan shark. Indeed, Wahlberg's pretty boy antihero is hardly the mean Mailerian metaphysical gambler as portrayed by the great kosher screen king Caan in the original film. Not surprisingly considering contemporary Hollywood's compulsion towards rather repulsive cinematic cuckoldry, the remake basks in an almost supernatural level of negrophilia to the point where it features an ostensibly genius gangster-philosopher portrayed by Michael K. Williams that makes the titular protagonist seem like a pathetically stupid white boy with his elegantly expressed words of ghetto wisdom. Undoubtedly, to compare Karel Reisz's The Gambler with Wyatt's remake is like comparing Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) to Marcus Nispel's 2003 trying abortion or George Sluizer's Spoorloos (1988) aka The Vanishing to his own retarded American-audience-friendly 1993 Hollywood remake.

Considering that it features a less than flattering portrayal of a Hebraic quasi-intellectual and even the New York City Jewish community in general, it is actually really not all that surprising that the remake has more to do with so-called 'goyisher mazel' than the insatiable chutzpah of a Hebraic megalomaniac with an unhealthy fetish for shiksa sluts and shtarker thugs. In fact, I would argue that The Gambler is only slightly less subversive than Veit Harlan's Jud Süß (1940) in terms of its portrayal of greedy shiksa-defiling Israelite with self-destructive compulsions and vices. In terms of his nihilistic desire to gamble his entire life away despite being extremely privileged and suffering from an acute case of chutzpah that will inevitably lead to his grisly demise, Axel Freed is unquestionably a grotesque Judaic caricature of sorts, thus making it seem all the more perversely poignant that said caricature is autobiographical. In fact, one could argue that Axel Freed is a symbolic of Judea as a whole and the fact that Jews have been collectively expelled from 109 locations since AD250. Of course, like Axel Freed, the Jewish community seems to lack the capacity for self-reflection and suffers from the eternal delusional notion of Judaic blamelessness, as if they believe that they can do no wrong and that every single goy suffers from an inborn form of irrational antisemitism. Indeed, after recently re-watching The Gambler, I could not help but be reminded of the conclusion of the text Bolshevism from Moses to Lenin: A Dialogue Between Adolf Hitler and Me by Uncle Adolf's junky poet mentor Dietrich Eckart, which reads: "The truth," he said, "is, indeed, as you once wrote: one can only understand the Jew when one knows what his ultimate goal is. And that goal is, beyond world domination, the annihilation of the world. He must wear down all the rest of mankind, he persuades himself, in order to prepare a paradise on earth. He has made himself believe that only he is capable of this great task, and, considering his ideas of paradise, that is certainly so. But one sees, if only in the means which he employs, that he is secretly driven to something else. While he pretends to himself to be elevating mankind, he torments men to despair, to madness, to ruin. If a halt is not ordered, he will destroy all men. His nature compels him to that goal, even though he dimly realizes that he must thereby destroy himself. There is no other way for him; he must act thus. This realization of the unconditional dependence of his own existence upon that of his victims appears to me to be the main cause for his hatred. To be obliged to try and annihilate us with all his might, but at the same time to suspect that that must lead inevitably to his own ruin -- therein lies, if you will, the tragedy of Lucifer." While many film reviewers, including Patricia Erens of The Jew In American Cinema (1984), might be tempted to describe the eponymous antihero of The Gambler as a sort of 'Christ figure,' I think it would be more accurate to describe him as a modern-day Lucifer who is just too much of a fuck-up to be considered a respectable member of the Synagogue of Satan.

WHO'LL STOP THE RAIN

Karel Reisz (1978)

While it can certainly be argued that the Occident died with the capitulation of the German 6th Army (Wehrmacht) at the Battle of Stalingrad (or as Louis-Ferdinand Céline once stated, “Stalingrad. . . The fall of Stalingrad was the end of Europe. There’s been a cataclysm. Its epicenter was Stalingrad. After that you can say that white civilization was finished, really washed up”), I think it is safe to say that the rapid decline of white America—a decidedly deracinated Euro-mutt population with a rapidly dissolving bastardized WASP culture mixed with other European elements—was more or less officially confirmed with the rather spiritually and culturally corrosive 1960s counterculture movement, so naturally any film that depicts this phenomenon in any way is something that I am very interested in as I can only think of a handful of serious films that even dare to touch, let alone thoughtfully explain, this seemingly apocalyptic paradigm shift. Certainly, at least in an allegorical sense, Who’ll Stop the Rain (1978) aka Dog Soldiers directed by Czech-born British Jew Karel Reisz (Isadora, The French Lieutenant’s Woman)—a somewhat underrated filmmaker that was not afraid of alienating audiences via a subversive blend of morally dubious antiheroes, cynicism, misanthropy, and less than happy endings—depicts this scenario, even if it was not exactly the director’s true intention. Indeed, when it comes down to it, the genre-defying film is really a largely bleak expression of (post)hippie nihilism featuring a sort of Nietzschean active-nihilist action hero, a doped-up half-heeb heroine, and said heroine’s unhinged passive-nihilist husband. Based on the novel Dog Soldiers (1974) by Robert Stone, who co-wrote the script, the film also has the misfortune of being cheaply named after a rock song (in this case a Creedence Clearwater tune, which of course appears throughout the film). Luckily, unlike Sam Peckinpah’s terribly tedious and twaddling trucker turd Convoy (1978)—a film named after the 1975 country and western novelty song performed by C. W. McCall—Reisz’s film has much more to offer than simple mindless entertainment for beer-guzzling proles and meth-addled mechanophilic pricks. Luckily, Reisz is certainly one of the more ‘European’ of Judaic filmmakers as even his American films like The Gambler (1974)—a film based on a semi-autobiographical screenplay by Judaic pervert James Toback—reveal a style and cerebral essence that has more to do with European arthouse than Hollywood entertainment. After all, Who’ll Stop the Rain is nothing if not a pensive yet prodding philosophical bummer that does the seemingly impossible by managing to be one of the most dejecting and suicide-inducing films relating to the Vietnam War that does not really depict any battle scenes from said war. In its depiction of a couple (ex)hippies ostensibly greedily transporting a large amount of drugs (in this case, three kilos of heroin) across the country and ultimately destroying their lives in the process, Who’ll Stop the Rain is like an intelligent man's Easy Rider (1969) as it lacks the inane leftist-boomer agit-prop and anti-redneck hysteria. Notably, the source writer Stone based the lead character, Ray Hicks, off of Beat Generation figure Neal Cassady—a somewhat tragic and self-destructively nihilistic criminal-cum-muse that acted as the inspiration for the character of 'Dean Moriarty' in his pal Jack Kerouac's famous novel On the Road (1957)—who he became acquainted with due to their mutual friendship with LSD-addled countercultural novelist Ken Kesey. While the Beats are undoubtedly (somewhat rightly) regarded as proto-hippies, their philosophical roots are somewhat complex and include German conservative revolutionary sage Oswald Spengler's two-volume magnum opus The Decline of the West (1918-1922), which was gifted by literary junky William S. Burroughs to Kerouac in 1945 and inspired both writers' obsession with the spiritual and cultural decay of the United States. As Beatdom Literary Journal writer Lee McRae noted in his essay The Plurality of Beat Spirituality in regard to this imperative Faustian influence, "...Spengler suggests that it is those who are downtrodden and downbeat who will prevail when social structures collapse. Spengler denotes these as the 'fellaheen,' a term originally ascribed to an Arabian peasant or labourer. Ginsberg, Kerouac and Burroughs found that the 'fellaheen' were all around them in America; the underclass, the racially marginalised and the generally inferior were all considered to be part of this much darker but all the more real existence [...] In an article by Stephen Prothero entitled ON THE HOLY ROAD he links the Spenglerian notion of the 'fellaheen' to two inspirational Beat figures, Neal Cassady and Herbert Huncke [...] It was only in the hedonism and voyeuristic stability of Neal Cassady where the Beats would begin a new route and move forward in their establishment of a 'New Vision.' What distinguished Cassady from Huncke was a criminality that was awash with pleasure, a larceny of delight regardless of economic reward. This led to Cassady being idolised as a free-thinking Beat contemporary, or as Ginsberg coins in his poem 'Howl,' 'secret hero of these poems, cocksman and Adonis of Denver – Joy to the memory of his innumerable lays of girls.'" Of course, the film's antihero is a fictional character and might be best described as the hopelessly hotheaded yet surprisingly brilliant blond beast hate-child of Cassady and Rambo. A disgruntled Vietnam War turned merchant marine that moonlights as a pot dealer and has turned his war inward and believes in nothing aside from his own strength and will-to-power, Hicks senselessly decides to risk his life and freedom to transport coke simply for the thrill of helping a friend in a precarious predicament and not because he is compelled by any sort of petty greed. A sort of self-stylized Nietzsche Zen Warrior, Hicks is certainly not afraid to fight but he seems to be hardly interested in joining another army. Indeed, Hicks' philosophy and motivations are arguably summed up in Julius Evola's description of the Beats in Ride the Tiger (1961) where the right-wing anarchist philosopher notes that, "The heritage of the precursors of European nihilism has largely been translated, in these movements of ruined youth, into the crude forms of life as it is lived. An important trait here is the absence of any social-revolutionary motive and the belief that no organized action can change things. That is the difference from the left-wing intellectuals who condemn bourgeois society, and from the nihilists of the past. 'Work, read, prepared in groups, believe, then have your back broken—no thanks, that's not for me,' says one of Kerouac's characters. This is the end result at which the 'revolution' of the left has practically arrived after its triumph, after passing the phase of simple revolt. Camus made it quite plain after the period of his communist illusions: The revolution has betrayed its origins with the constitution of new yokes and a new conformism, more obtuse and absurd than ever." With no political movement or revolution to support, Hicks simply settles for the joy and excitement that comes with any sort of anti-bourgeois rebellion, no matter how stupid and pointless the 'cause,' hence the tragedy of the character.

Of course, there is no denying that director Reisz was, like many of his tribe, a leftist and he attempted to direct the film from that perspective, or as British film theorist Colin Gardner explained in his book Karel Reisz (2006), "DOG SOLDIERS is a watershed film in Reisz's career because it marks the culmination of his long relationship to the New Left, beginning with his involvement with the CND [Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament] and MARCH TO ALDERMASTON and his theoretical writings on the social role of documentary for UNIVERSITIES AND LEFT REVIEW in the late 1950s. His collaboration with Stone reflects his growing acknowledgement of an irreparable rift between organized politics, rooted in party discipline and commitment to external social change, and the counter-cultural idea of living in and for oneself as a community of enlightened individuals. The former idea was rooted in Marx—a question of changing the world through direct action—the latter in visionary, utopian thinkers such as Emerson, Thoreau and Rimbaud, whereby a change in consciousness will necessitate a concomitant change in life itself." Luckily, aside from being what I see as a symbolic depiction of the death of white America as incited by a degenerate anti-culture and corrupt government, the film seems to be an allegorical expression of Reisz's own dejection in regard to the abject failure of the counterculture movement and how it devolved into mindless self-destruction nihilism, hedonism, and—arguably most hypocritically and revealing—greed. Indeed, although lapsed hippies that are into Nietzsche, the two main male (anti)heroes are set on a course of self-destruction ostensibly out of greed, or to quote Nietzsche by way of Gardner in relation to Reisz's film, "Man would rather will nothingness than not will." In the film, antihero Hicks goes on a senselessly dangerous mission to smuggle dope just for the hell of it but at least it offers him the chance to play the Übermensch and not live by anyone else's rules because, as he states, "When I left the Marines I made myself a promise. Never again am I going to be fucked around by morons. The next mother who tries to make me back off is going to have to live it out with me.”

One certainly realizes that Robert Stone's source novel was practically begging to be adapted into a film when reads vintage reviews like that of The New York Times that describes it as, “A version of THE TREASURE OF THE SIERRA MADRE in which the object of human greed is not gold dust but three kilograms of pure unadulterated heroin . . . three kilos of heroin that become a resonant metaphor of a corruption spreading across America . . . great power and emotional impact.” It should also be noted that reviewers oftentimes compared the novel to the literary classics of such greats as Ernest Hemingway and Joseph Conrad (in fact, the book begins with a quote from the latter's classic 1899 novella Heart of Darkness). Unfortunately but not surprisingly, the film is nowhere near as ‘politically incorrect’ as the novel and does not feature unforgettably hilarious lines like, “He's a Jew from television, a big faggot. We show him the blade, man, he'll shit his pants.” Luckily, the very rotten essence and core aspects of the novel are retained and these things come together in a manner that would more likely appeal to a right-wing anarchist than to a ‘bobo’ (bourgeois bohemian), Limousine Marxist, or burnout boomer hippie bum. After all, it is no coincidence that the film is largely forgotten. Indeed, Who'll Stop the Rain contains no ‘positive vibes’ nor ‘California Dreamin’ for some deluded hippie utopia, as the film is a decided downer that, aside from being anti-authoritarian, is not likely to appeal to a leftist pussy with any sort of half-baked peacenik (anti)ethos. Despite the film's Judaic director, it is also somewhat unintentionally covertly counter-kosher, as the female heroine, who causes much trouble for the male leads due to her innate incompetence as a result of being a lazy suburban junky in a perpetual dope haze, is the (half)Jewess daughter of an arrogant Judaic intellectual that owns a bookstore. On top of that, the most despicable villain is depicted by ogre-like kosher character actor Richard Masur, who has clearly mastered the lowclass Jewish gangster caricature. In short, the film is more about the Age of the Aryan American apocalypse than the Age of Aquarius (though it can certainly be argued that they are one and the same). To go back to Nietzsche, the film is certainly a bittersweet reminder of his remark, “We have art in order not to die of the truth.”

The film begins in Saigon at the height of the Vietnam War, but instead of exciting battle scenes involving the gunning down of gooks the viewer is exposed to the uncomfortably monotone ravings of a disillusioned war correspondent named John Converse (Michael Moriarty) as he narrates the words of a letter to his wife Marge (Tuesday Weld) where he complains about the fact that the U.S. military has declared elephants “enemy agents” and rationalizes his dangerous self-destructive plan to smuggle dope, or as he writes, “Dear, Marge. I'm coming home. I remember your saying when I left that people were dying and that I was crapping around with fate to come here. You were more right than you could imagine [...] I have no more cheap morals to draw from all this death. So I've taken action. An old friend from my marine days will be coming to see you soon. His name is Ray Hicks. We owe him $1,000. I want you to pay him. I have started something here that I can't stop. And it's the right thing, I know. You see, in a world where elephants are pursued by flying men, people are just naturally going to want to get high. I'll explain when I see you, and you'll understand." Indeed, John has "taken action" in a most irrationally deleterious fashion by agreeing to smuggle three kilos of heroin from Vietnam to San Francisco, but he is somewhat of a passive pansy and uses his much tougher ex-marine buddy Ray Hicks (Nick Nolte)—a merchant marine that sells pot to college girls on the side—to take virtually all the serious risks. As a result of his dubious drug smuggling scheme, Converse causes his wife and best friend to become the hunted in a film that naturally evolves into an offbeat road movie that makes for a nice counterpoint to similarly themed works like Monte Hellman's Two-Lane Blacktop (1971), Richard C. Sarafian's Vanishing Point (1971), and James William Guercio's Electra Glide in Blue (1973) in terms of taking a (quasi)existentialist approach to dismantling the counterculture dream. Arguably, out of all these films, Who'll Stop the Rain is the most meditative and philosophically ambiguous. Naturally, Hicks uses the merchant marine vessel that he works on to smuggle the drugs, but he initially refuses to get involved with Converse's dubious scheme for obvious reasons. Aside from the great risks associated with smuggling such a large amount of narcotics, Hicks begins to rightly question his old friend Converse's sanity when they reunite. For example, when Converse declares that "Jesus, that's fucking piquant" after discovering that his friend reads Nietzsche, Hicks is somewhat taken aback by the remark and replies, "Piquant? I don't know what the hell that means. You turned me on with that book." In short, Converse seems to have a totally different personality from the one his friend best remembers and seems to be suffering from some degree of amnesia and mental feebleness as if he is on the brink of suffering a similar sorry mental fate to his one-time hero Nietzsche. While Hicks believes it is "bad karma" to smuggle the dope and does not really trust his friend, he ultimately makes the major mistake of agreeing and stating, "Okay, I'll carry your scag, Johnny. Hell, why not? A little adrenaline cleans the blood. But make sure I get treated right. Self-defense is an art I cultivate." Quite unlike his insufferably mercurial pencil-pusher buddy, Hicks is a man of action and martial prowess that has no qualms about inviting great danger into his life, but unfortunately the nihilistic odyssey proves to be ultimately fatal for the manly merchant marine. Unbeknownst to Hicks, Converse set up the drug deal with a dubious dame named Charmian (Gail Strickland), who is friends with a corrupt DEA agent that plans to utilize whatever means necessary to get the dope once it lands on American shores. In short, Hicks became the pawn of a pawn, but he is not all that unwitting about it and immediately suspects danger right from the get-go, hence his interest in the deleterious mission in the first place.

WHO'LL STOP THE RAIN

While Hicks manages to make it safely to San Francisco with the dope, Converse's jaded junky wife Marge forgets that he is coming and does not even bother to procure the money that her husband promised. Indeed, when Hicks arrives at Converse's house to drop-off the bag of junk and get his monetary reward, Marge acts obnoxiously confused and behaves as if her husband's friend is some sort of scary nuisance that she just cannot be bothered to deal with. Unfortunately for Marge, she is forced to deal with it. Indeed, the money is the least of the two's problems as they are being trailed by two gangsters, Danskin (Richard Masur) and Smitty (Ray Sharkey), who work for a corrupt DEA agent named Antheil (Anthony Zerbe). As it turns out, Converse has been being unwittingly used by Antheil as a pawn in the drug smuggling operation and the two goons are there to collect the dope and possibly kill all the occupants of the house, including Marge's/Converse's young daughter Janey, but luckily Hicks proves to be such a fierce fighter that he brutally beats and ties both of them up. A somewhat Loki-like jokester, Hicks even takes a certain sadistic glee in taking out his enemies and even demonstrates a certain tendency to add insult to injury when doing so. In fact, even a sociopathic lowlife like Danskin feels a deep sense of degradation when Hicks dares to chain him to a toilet as if to remind him he is a piece of shit. Despite not knowing or particularly liking one another (for example, only minutes after first meeting, Hicks says to her, "You dumb cooze. What are you, a junkie?"), Marge and Hicks are forced to flee together in what is ultimately the beginning of a totally unintended but rather crucial road trip where they hope to sell the dope whilst attempting to evade Antheil and his goons. Needless to say, Antheil has Danskin and Smitty capture and torture Converse when he finally arrives in San Francisco. A decidedly dejected dude that seems completely dead inside, Converse maintains his flat affect and acts less than entertained by the torture and bogus claims by Danskin and Smitty that his buddy Hicks is banging his wife. Seemingly apathetic about even sparing his own life, Converse spews banal nonsensical bullshit to Antheil when questioned. For example, when Antheil asks for information about his wife Marge and her mindset, Converse simply replies with the enthusiasm of a benzo-addled street hooker, "She's 30 years old. She's half Irish, half Jewish" and "Pretty moral basically," thus underscoring his great apathy for his wife and seemingly lack of interest in sparing his own life. Indeed, it only seems to be when Antheil threatens to do something to his daughter that Converse begins to display any sort of superficial desire to help. While Converse's initial desire to get involved with drug smuggling seems like an absurdly misguided and desperate attempt at becoming some sort of neo-Beat Übermensch, his actions and attitude reveal he really personifies a degenerate form of Nietzsche's 'Letzter Mensch,' albeit lacking even the desire for comfort. While Antheil is a treasonous criminal scumbag, he manages to perfectly sum up Converse's pitiful leftist hypocrisy and amorality when he states to him, "I think you're the kind of wise cocksucker that writes a tear-jerk play against the Marines and then turns around and smuggles a shit-load of heroin into this country.” Indeed, while Converse might be against the Vietnam War and mass slaughtering of gooks, he has no qualms about profiting from the epidemic misery, death, and destruction that comes with the flooding of his nation with heroin which is, not coincidentally, the drug that destroyed the counterculture movement. Indeed, in Who’ll Stop the Rain, heroin is certainly a symbol of the greed and mindless hedonism the destroyed utopian dreams of the hippies and ultimately discredited their entire movement.

While Marge is a closet-junky that regularly semi-covertly downs Dilaudid (aka Hydromorphone) tablets, Hicks gets high on Nietzsche, Zen, and great risk-taking. For example, after reading to her the Nietzsche quote, “In danger all that counts is going forward. By growing used to danger, a man can allow it to become part of him. He grows used to evil,” Hicks reveals to Marge that he agreed to smuggle the dope for her husband simply, “Because he asked me,” adding, “I don’t always have to have a reason for the shit I do.” As demonstrated by his remark to Marge in regard to the heroin that, “It belongs to whoever controls it,” Hick certainly believes in and lives by a Nietzschean master-morality, which was indubitably informed by his wartime experiences. Although totally doped up, Marge is well aware that her husband came back a very different man as a result of his wartime experiences, but when she asks Hicks about how these horrific events might have affected her hubby, he simply states, “In some ways he was beautiful. In some ways he had his head up his ass.” Although he is initially annoyed by her dopey dopehead demeanor and she is initially disturbed by his combination of redblooded brute violence and intense extroversion, Hicks and Marge soon develop such a glaringly socially imperative yet totally organic affection for one another that the viewer finds themselves rooting for their romance despite the great betrayal associated with such an extramarital union. Quite unlike like the mercurially autistic absurdities of her husband, Hicks is exactly the sort of man a damaged dingbat like Marge needs as he could provide her with the sense of protection, security, and strong male affection she desperately needs. Of course, the viewer never doubts that their romance is doomed to fail miserably just like the drug smuggling operation.

After making a failed attempt to sell the dope to a fat fag friend named Eddie Peace (Charles Haid)—a Hollywood-connected dealer that seems like the sort of degenerate that prides himself on having a harem of underage boys—and nearly killing an English writer named Gerald (James Cranna) by intentionally shooting dope into a vein in the wrong fashion after his preposterously effete comrade insults his intelligence by brazenly attempting to rip him off, Hicks loses some of his stoicism and exposes his truly misanthropic feelings in regard to most of humanity to a visibly disturbed Marge. Indeed, when Marge asks why he almost killed an assumed innocent like Gerald—the seemingly soft and innocent husband of a similarly naive heiress—he angrily replies, “Cause he’s a Martian. They're all Martians. And I'm a loyal American who fought for my flag. Peace was fucking with me and I don't take shit from Martians. In Vietnam I had men that were dead the day they hit that place. In the morning they were in Hawaii, in the afternoon they were dead. That's right, fuck Gerald. I was pissed off. It seemed like a good idea." At this point, it becomes quite clear that Hicks is a disgruntled war veteran with assumed repressed posttraumatic stress and he is probably not mentally sound enough to ever reenter the American mainstream, so naturally it is only fitting that he go on one more serious military mission.

After the botched dope deal with Eddie, Hicks drives west with Marge in a stolen Land Rover to a southern New Mexico mountain named 'El Ojo Grande' (aka 'The Big Eye') to hide out in a former Jesuit settlement turned hippie colony that is owned by the antihero's German Buddhist roshi-cum-pal Dieter Pravda (who, rather curiously, never actually appears in the film despite being an important character in the source novel). As Hicks nostalgically explains to Marge, he did much partying on the mountain in the past and even rigged the entire area with tons of lights and speakers, even remarking with a certain jolly pride, "You know, when I came up here in '65, there were all kinds of people here. Dieter hauled in a couple of tons of hardware. He had speakers, amplifiers, tape decks, microphones, all kinds of lights. Came in and said we'd got to get it all together. Hook it all up. One big circuit. Well, I'm the only one that knows anything about that shit. So I get the job. Everybody else is so ripped, they couldn't change a battery in a Jap radio. I'm laying wire from hell to breakfast. Took me about four weeks. And half the time I'm so stoned I couldn't even talk. But by Christ we did it. One big circuit. Man, we made this mountain boogie." Needless to say, little did Hicks ever suspect that he would ever use the lights and speakers as imperative weapons in a sort of neo-cowboy guerilla battle against a DEA agent and his goons. It is certainly no coincidence that Hicks decides to return to the magic mountain of his bohemian youth in the end as it is clearly a solacing and even spiritual place that reminds him of his life before his emotionally devastating wartime experiences. While at the mountain, Hicks reveals his feelings for and desire to runaway with Marge, softly stating to her, "We're going to win this one. You know that? Huh? Listen. If we can lay that stuff of, we'll go down to Mexico. I know some people there. Hey, hey, maybe we'll get a boat." In fact, Hicks even remarks to a Mexican friend in regard to Marge that she's, "Nothing but class. She's the love of my life, no shit. Beats the hell out of all of them." Rather unfortunately, both Hicks and Marge seem to realize that they have no future together, even if they are spared the wrath of the degenerate DEA agent Antheil.
