English film distributor turned auteur Antony Balch's dream project was adapting his alpha-Beat bud William S. Burroughs' magnum opus Naked Lunch (1959) and although he never achieved that dream due to botched funding, a 'disagreement' with star Mick Jagger (who thought the filmmaker was coming on to him), and an early death (he died of stomach cancer at the premature age of 42 in 1980), he did manage to direct two features in preparation for getting the skills he would need for the film that would never be. Indeed, after collaborating on a series of experimental avant-garde shorts with Burroughs, including Towers Open Fire (1963) and The Cut Ups (1966), Balch would direct a feature that, like Naked Lunch, was comprised of a series of loosely connected petite vignettes of the oftentimes absurdist sort. Originally released under the name Secrets of Sex (1970), Balch's film was released under the less seemingly pornographic name Bizarre in the United States, but has also been known as Eros Exploding, Erotic Tales from Mummy's Tomb, Multiplication, and Tales of the Bizarre. Made at the end of the Swinging London era (although released in 1970, the film was shot in 1969) and paying blatant tribute to queer criminal literary figures like Burroughs and Jean Genet, Secrets of Sex certainly has an outrageously outmoded aesthetic and an obscenely goofy essence about it, but those are some of the film's main appeals, as a vintage piece of sardonic and exceedingly eccentric episodic celluloid insanity that cannot really be compared to many other cinematic works. Mistakenly described by beatnik Renaissance man Brion Gysin (who was supposed to write the screenplay for Balch's unrealized Naked Lunch adaptation) as "a soft porn, which was too soft by the time it got made," Secrets of Sex does indeed have tons of bare bouncy breasts and big bushes, and even dangling dongs, but the work ultimately makes a mockery of sex in a variety of rather clever and inventive darkly comedic ways. Featuring tomatoes being pelted at big bosoms, two sadomasochistic female photographers mutilating a male model's member for the mere aesthetic pleasure, a young cheating husband shoving a phone in the ass of a female would-be-burglar during silly sex while the operator unwittingly listens on the other end, and a rich old man receiving a terminally ill mutant monster baby from his sexy scientist wife, among countless things, Secrets of Sex is the sort of celluloid sexploitation skit show you might expect from Paul Morrissey had he been less conservative, obsessed with Burroughs' The Wild Boys: A Book of the Dead (1971), and had less of a venomous personality. Indeed, the film is, among other things, a playful cross-genre film anthology of the devilishly mirthful sort narrated by a faceless mummy about the timeless war of the sexes in the age of sexual liberation. A film that truly lives up to its rather generic American title 'Bizarre,' Balch's film is a rare stylish sexploitation flick with wit and lavish direction that makes the films of Russ Meyer seem like the patently pathetic fantasies of a virginal beta-boy that drools like a dullard over being beaten by women (indeed, Meyer would make for a great character to lampoon in the film). Although the film features dozens upon dozens of perky jumbo jugs, Secrets of Sex somehow manages to prove that brains and boobs are not always mutually exclusive, at least when approached by a queer dandy who seems to have an equal cynicism towards both boys and birds, especially when it comes to those of the rampantly heterosexual variety. Written by at least five 'official' writers (as well as various uncredited writers, including Brion Gysin and Ian Cullen), Balch's film demonstrates that there is actually a special place in the world for campy yet cultivated Beat sexploitation comedies.

Opening with three naked Aryans—two guys and a girl—in a haystack embracing in a trance-like fashion and a quote from John Milton's 17-century epic poem Paradise Lost (in fact, it is the same one featured at the beginning of Mary Shelley's Frankenstein), Secrets of Sex tells the 1000-year-old story of a "wise and elegant" Arab Judge who suspected his young and beautiful wife was hiding a man in a trunk and thus took decisive action to rid the world of this mystery man in a most vengeful fashion. Since the wife refused to unlock the trunk, the Arab Judge had the trunk buried and the key thrown into the ocean. Needless to say, there was a man in the trunk and he went on to become a mummy (played by co-writer Elliott Stein, who proposed the idea of adding a mummy narrator to the film, so as to tie all the various vignettes together in a reasonably coherent fashion), who also happens to be the all-knowing narrator of Secrets of Sex, as a sort of undead sexologist. After featuring a scene of a gang of Burroughs-esque 'Wild Boys' (quite notably, aside from the fact that one of the boys is featured reading Burroughs' 1964 cut-up novel Nova Express, Balch's film predates The Wild Boys by a year) with submachine guns approaching a gang of busty babes who had just been pelted with tomatoes, the Mummy narrator more or less explains that the war of the sexes did not begin with feminism and the counter-culture generation, but is a timeless battle inspired by a dangerous game of desire, infatuation, obsession, and ultimately revenge. Indeed, by the end of the film, a mutant baby will be spawned and various people—both young and old—will die due to issues relating to sex and romance. In that regard, Secrets of Sex is one of the goofiest films ever made on the always interesting theme of sex and death.

The first episode of Secrets of Sex revolves around a young and rather naive man who makes the major mistake of being a model for two sadomasochistic female (and possible Sapphic?) photographers who decide they are tired of merely simulating images of sexual savagery and ultimately have the boy's member mangled with some sort of sharp torture device, thereupon resulting in his premature death via dyke-like dick destroyers. In the second episode, which is a sort of parody of both melodramas and old school mad scientist horror flicks, a wealthy 69-year-old man stresses his concern to his young fiancée that he would like to have an heir, as his sole son was accidentally killed in a car wreck by his ex-wife.

SECRETS OF SEX

Unfortunately, the old man's fiancée—a smart and sexy scientist who intimidates men due to her intelligence and intimidates women due to her beauty—has some degenerative genetic mutations in her genes and needless to say, after the young lady becomes pregnant to satisfy her over-the-hill sugar daddy's wishes, she inevitably gives birth to a terminally ill mutant baby that looks like a scrotum with bulging blue eyes. In the third episode, a married and exceedingly young man fittingly reading gay frog thief Jean Genet's novel The Miracle of the Rose (1946) aka Miracle de la rose catches a masked leather-bound criminal attempting to rob his home. Ultimately, the thief offers the man, who most viewers would probably assume is a homo, sex in an attempt to stop him from calling the cops. In the end, the titillating thief, who has a somewhat grotesque scar covering one of her tits, outsmarts the pretentious 'bobo' (bourgeois bohemian) by threatening to tell his wife about his extramarital affair with a lecherous lady of the night. Simultaneously a satire of unintentionally cheesy and intentionally sleazy 1960s British spy films and old silent era slapstick flicks, the fourth episode revolves around a sexy prostitute-like spy of the super sensuous sort named Lindy Leigh who attempts to swindle a horny military attaché, but ultimately finds herself locked up in a safe with countless other salacious (and topless) spies who tried the same damn thing.

In the most bizarre and even vaguely unsettling episode of Secrets of Sex, a NYC-born Nerd (played by Jewish co-screenwriter Elliott Stein, who planned to collaborate with Balch on an aborted film entitled The Sex Life of Adolf Hitler in which he planned to play a Nazi leader), has a big bosomed blonde streetwalker called to his room, as he hopes she will make love to his beloved pet pangolin. Ultimately, the rather repulsive and seemingly half-autistic Nerd attempts to convince the Hooker to make love to his grotesque pet by absurdly claiming to her that "pangolin swapping" is trendy in NYC, but she is not so degenerate as to let herself be defiled by a scaly anteater. Needless to say, the busty Streetwalker gives the bestiality-obsessed John his money back and runs away, only to notice an old woman kissing a pangolin in the street only moments later, thus confirming the Nerd was right all along regarding the popularity of pangolin-woman love affairs. The sixth and final episode is the most nicely nuanced, bizarre, and kaleidoscopic segment of the film and involves an old man strangling an old wealthy woman to death in her own greenhouse after realizing she sexually took advantage of him many decades back, so as to steal his 'vital fluids.' As the old whore-killer eloquently states, "misappropriation of men's souls is a very serious crime." Ultimately, Secrets of Sex concludes with same brigade of Wild Boys from the beginning of the film putting down their submachine guns and fornicating with their jumbo jugged female prisoners, thereupon resulting in literal fireworks of the rather climatic sort. In the end, the Mummy narrator complains, "So it goes on...and on, and on, and on, and on..." in regard to the perennial viciousness when it comes to sex and the different sexes. Indeed, like the gutter melodramas of sadomasochistic sodomite auteur Andy Milligan (Vapors, The Body Beneath), Balch's film depicts heterosexual sex as a singularly socially corrosive force that is largely responsible for all the violence, death, and hatred in the world.

Undoubtedly, aside from rather desperate dudes that get hard-ons from the mere sight of bare boobs, Secrets of Sex probably makes for a superlatively sorry masturbation aid, but of course, it is rather obvious that auteur Antony Balch was not really interested in making a soulless and pseudo-sensual sexploitation flick for the pathetic pleasure of loser Londoners looking to pull a Pee-wee Herman in one of the director's semen-soaked theaters (in fact, the film played for six consecutive months at the Jacey Cinema in Piccadilly Circus, which is one of the theaters Balch ran). A rather uncommonly honest cinematic artist, Balch once stated on retrospect regarding his debut feature, "this is a very uneven film, but three episodes and a single shot, are good. I liked the ones with the photographer, Elliot Stein, and the Lady in the Greenhouse. The episode of the monster baby is a bore, but the single shot of it, at the end is brilliant." Indeed, if only other filmmakers were so honest, the world would not be overflowing with filmic feces. Make no mistake about it, Secrets of Sex is celluloid trash, but it is also charming, perfectly campy, and idiosyncratic trash that seems like it was directed by the strikingly witty, if not equally lowbrow, Brit bastard brother of kraut dandy auteur Werner Schroeter. Sort of like a counter-culture update of the classic British horror omnibus film Dead of Night (1945) meets a Brit Beat equivalent to Dušan Makavejev's WR: Mysteries of the Organism (1971), albeit nowhere near as serious, esoteric, nor socio-politically-oriented, Balch's anthology manages to be truly bizarre without seeming even remotely contrived. Indeed, considering Balch's knack for grotesque humor, obsession with sexual perversion, and talent for combining an eclectic hodgepodge of vignettes into a more or less cohesive and eclectic feature film, he would have been a better person than any to adapt Burroughs' Naked Lunch, especially considering he was a pal of the novelist (in fact, the Beat novelist gave the director a "special thanks" in his 1962 cut-up novel The Ticket That Exploded). For anyone that has wondered what Tales from the Crypt might be like if it was transported to Swinging Sixties London and directed by a man with an equal obsession with both horror and arthouse cinema, Secrets of Sex is certainly the film to checkout. Indeed, as someone that loathes that era, I found Secrets of Sex to be a playfully perverse piece of eccentrically enthralling filmic therapy that reminded me of the abject failure that was the counter-culture zeitgeist.

-Ty E

HORROR HOSPITAL
HORROR HOSPITAL

Antony Balch (1973)

Call me a softcore Anglophobe, but I have an acute aversion to British comedy, especially if it is blended with the horror genre (another genre the Brits seem to have a keenness for making rather banal), with a film like Shaun of the Dead (2004) reflecting the height of retarded aesthetic repugnance to me. Needless to say, I have never seen a single limey horror-comedy that I actually enjoyed, at least until recently after inadvertently discovering the strange and largely forgotten figure of Antony Balch while doing research on the Fernando Arrabal-penned S&M-themed erotic arthouse flick Weird Weirdo (1969) aka Le grand ceremonial directed by Pierre-Alain Jolivet. Balch was originally a film distributor who created catchy English titles for cult, arthouse, exploitation, and foreign sex films like Weird Weirdo and Don't Deliver Us from Evil (1971) aka Mais ne nous délivrez pas du mal and screened them in the various movie theaters he ran. A personal friend of many important filmmakers, including Kenneth Anger, Balch got his start in filmmaking collaborating on shorts with junky literary outlaw William S. Burroughs, who he met at Madame Rachou's Beat Hotel. Indeed, after collaborating with Burroughs (who gave the auteur a 'special thanks' in his cut-up 1962 novel The Ticket That Exploded) on a couple experimental avant-garde shorts like Towers Open Fire (1962–1963), The Cut-Ups (1967), and the abandoned documentary project Guerrilla Conditions, Balch decided to take up the curious cause of feature-length exploitation filmmaking after hooking up with horror producer Richard Gordon (Fiend Without a Face, Radley Metzger's The Cat and the Canary). Working with an incomplete script, Gordon and Balch (who provided half of the funding for the film) created the genre-smashing erotic-exploitation-horror-comedy hybrid Secrets of Sex (1970) aka Bizarre—an offbeat film anthology mocking sex that is narrated by an Egyptian mummy and was co-penned by no less than five people (Burroughs' bud, Brion Gysin, was also apparently involved)—which was a huge success in the UK. It was not until his second and final collaboration with Gordon, Horror Hospital (1973) aka Computer Killers aka Doctor Bloodbath aka Frankensteins Horror-Klinik, that Balch managed to direct his first somewhat 'straight' horror flick. Of course, as a work directed by a queer dandy of sorts who was described in Barry Miles' Burroughs bio as being, "gay, well dressed with dark hair and an eager smile. After a few drinks he could be quite camp: 'The trouble with fish is that they are so fisheee!' he once shrieked in a restaurant," Horror Hospital is far from your typical UK horror flick, as a conspicuously campy work that mirthfully mocks the counter-culture generation and wallows in witty and playful forms of iconoclasm. Written by Balch and his comrade Alan Watson at the 1973 Cannes Film Festival (the director came up with the alliterative title first before actually dreaming up a storyline), Horror Hospital ultimately evolved into a sardonically campy Gothic horror flick that would predate similar yet much more successful works like Phantom of the Paradise (1974) and The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975). Indeed, a fiercely farcical film that seems like it was directed by the Bela Lugosi-obsessed British bastard son of Andy Milligan and Paul Morrissey, Horror Hospital is like the Performance (1970) of horror comedies, as a work that even features its own Mick Jagger clone (interestingly, Balch's dream-project was to adapt Burroughs' Naked Lunch, but the film apparently fell apart when its star, Mick Jagger, was concerned that the director might be coming on to him).

Jason Jones (Robin Askwith) is a long-haired rocker with a rather dubious IQ who bares a striking resemblance to Mick Jagger (but acts more like Brian Jones) and who made the major mistake of joining a band with a prissy tranny degenerate as a singer (as portrayed by the film's co-writer Alan Watson in an uncredited role). Indeed, the band stole Jason's song and kicked him out of the group, or as the songwriter complains while watching the band perform his song without him, "Look at that. They stole my song. A week's work up the spout." Jason also makes sure to verbally ream the gender-bending meta-man singer with the following hilarious remark, "Silly little red faggot swirling about in his own smoke. Who does she think she is? Greta Garbo? He looks more like a lemon meringue pie in heat," and he is subsequently beaten by the tranny rocker due to his disparaging remarks. Undoubtedly, Jason is in need of a vacation and after seeing a flyer for a travel agency called "Hairy Holidays," he meets up with a sleazy and exceedingly effete gay travel agent named Mr. Pollack (portrayed by Dennis Price, who is best known for starring in Kind Hearts and Coronets (1949) and who died the same year Horror Hospital was released), who gives the rocker a discounted price to an ostensible health farm called Brittlehurst Manor (the exteriors of the building were shot at English novelist Edward Bulwer-Lytton's home) after getting aroused after looking at the bulge in the young man's pants. While riding on a train to the health farm, Jason meets a hot young chick named Judy Peter (Vanessa Shaw), who seems somewhat uneasy around the rocker, at least until he calms her worries by remarking, "There's no need to get so uptight about things. I'm not going to rape you." As Judy explains, she is also going to the health farm, albeit to visit her Aunt Harris (Ellen Pollock), who works there. Judy has never met Aunt Harris because her mother refused to allow her daughter to meet her sister due to the fact that she ran a whorehouse in Hamburg, Germany right before the Second World War. Unfortunately, little do Jason and Judy realize that Brittlehurst Manor is not a health spa, but a house of horror where a wheelchair-bound mad scientist modeled after Bela Lugosi's character from The Devil Bat (1940) named Dr. Storm (portrayed by Hammer horror star Michael Gough, who is probably best known for portraying 'Alfred' in all four films of the Hollywood Tim Burton/Joel Schumacher Batman films) does experimental brain surgery on hippies and turns them into mindless yet obedient zombies. Naturally, Dr. Storm has a couple of henchmen, including a Jewish midget named Frederick (Skip Martin) that always sports a yarmulke, Judy's Aunt Harris aka 'Madam Olga', and a legion of leather-jacket-adorned Droog-Geſtapo biker zombie thugs.

HORROR HOSPITAL

Upon arriving at Brittlehurſt Manor, Judy is berated by her Aunt Harris for coming (apparently, she wrote her niece a letter telling her not to come, but she never received it, as wily dwarf Frederick disposed of it) and she and Jason are given a room to share together, even though they are not lovers. Needless to say, Jason and Judy soon become hot and heavy lovers, though they both feel a bit uneasy about ſtaying at the health farm, not leaſt of all because they spotted a bloody bed in another room only minutes after arriving there. When Jason and Judy go to eat dinner with the reſt of the hippies ſtaying at the health farm, they notice that their comrades are pale, mute, ſeemingly braindead, and have giant scars on their foreheads. After one of the female gueſts is subdued by the biker zombies after she has a violent freakout, Jason and Judy go back to their rooms, only to discover that blood is coming out of the ſink in their bedroom. After being horrified by the rather unconventional ſight of ſeeing blood flying out of faucets, the two lovers are viſited by Dr. Storm, dwarf Frederick, and Aunt Harris, who warn them not to leave their room. After having hot and ſteamy ſex for the firſt time, Jason and Judy make the major miſtake of leaving their room, thereupon reſulting in both of them ſoon being captured by the leather-bound biker zombies. The next day, travel agent Pollack attempts to blackmail Dr. Storm, ſo the good doctor has him decapitated with his Rolls Royce, which features a large blade on the ſide that cuts off people's heads. When Jason ſees Pollack's corpse from an upſtairs window of the manſion, he violently grabs Frederick and demands that the imp tell him what is going on around the health farm, with the dwarf conſeſſing, "I'm juſt as much a prisoner here as you are...I'll talk to you later." After that, Jason is given a tour of the health farm gymnaſium where the mindleſs zombie hippies do back flips and accept torture without complaining. As Dr. Storm explains regarding his patients, "You ſee...Juſt like puppets, and I'm the puppet maſter...puppets who feel no pain." Dr. Storm then reveals that he has drugged Judy and he plans to give her, and eventually Jason, brain ſurgery. Naturally, Jason runs away and Dr. Storm yells to him, "It's no uſe Jason. You won't get very far." Of course, Dr. Storm is right, as while Jason manages to kill a zombie biker by knocking him into quicksand, two other zombie bikers capture him and put him in a dungeon room where he is tortured with "knock out gas" that cauſes him to hallucinate. Meanwhile, Aunt Harris begins getting paranoid that the police might find out about their experiments, but Dr. Storm warns her that no one gives a ſhit about young hippies diſappearing, ſtating, "As for theſe young people, they come and go like flies theſe days. Dirty ones at that. Their diſappearance will hardly be noticed."

When a ſwarthy hippie dork named Abraham Warren (Kurt Chriſtian aka 'Baron Kurt Christian Von Siengenbergr) shows up at the hospital of horrors looking for his girlfriend, Aunt Harris decides to quit and is soon killed by a grotesque monster that looks like a humanoid turd. Of course, Abraham is also thrown in the dungeon with Jason, but the two young hippies are soon freed when dwarf Frederick gives two zombie biker guards neon green drinks spiked with 'Mickey Finn,' steals the guards' keys, and unlocks the door to the prison cell. Of course, they are caught again after Abraham spots his girlfriend Millie (Barbara Wendy), who has been turned into a zombie, in the company of Dr. Storm and his leather-fag gestapo agents. As the good Doctor explains to his prisoners/guests during dinner, he used to be a handsome lady's man that was the disciple of a revolutionary scientist named Academician Pavlov, but as Storm states, when Stalin came to power, he installed "many young scientists, stupid adolescents who didn't know what they were doing. Very soon my laboratories were overrun by these young turks, and I was made to leave." Dr. Storm decided to go to Helsinki, Finland where he established a zoo where he experimented on animals, but he soon got bored working with furry creatures and began experimenting on humans instead, using Aunt Harris as a means to procure German prostitutes that he used as guinea pigs, explaining regarding his experiments: "In one of my experiments I applied Academician Pavlov's theory of conditioned reflexes to sexual behavior. In my view, Freud had failed. I succeeded in controlling human desire, but there was still a missing link. My subjects could not yet fulfill the desires I had created in them. They were not a very pretty sight after the operation." Dr. Storm also explains that he became a cripple after a "hunting man had the impertinence to enter my fortress" and accidentally set the place on fire, thus paralyzing the deranged doctor in the process. After dinner, Jason, Abraham, and dwarf Frederick are locked in a room together, with the latter revealing that he is the bastard son of one of Dr. Storm's Hamburg hookers and he has been the mad doctor's "whipping dog" ever since. The three manage to escape after Frederick jumps out of a window, kills a zombie guard by hitting him over the head with an ax, and unlocking the door for his two new friends, but the brave dwarf, who always dreamed of being a hero (this is one of the many long running jokes throughout the film), is subsequently killed after he is thrown down some stairs by one of the biker guards. Before he dies, Frederick attempts to tell Jason and Abraham something about Dr. Storm. Indeed, as the hippies soon learn, the Doctor is really a human monster (the 'humanoid turd' I mentioned before) who lost all his skin during the same fire that left him paralyzed. Ultimately, Jason and Abraham catch the undead Doc in his naked fecal-matter-like monster form sexually brutalizing Millie. The boys decide to give Dr. Storm "some of his own medicine" by decapitating him with his own killer Rolls Royce. In the end, Jason, Judy, and Abraham manage to get away and Dr. Storm's decapitated corpse and head sink into quicksand, but somehow the monster mad scientist manages to come alive again, thus setting up for a sequel to Horror Hospital that was never made.

HORROR HOSPITAL

While Horror Hospital was the most successful movie that Antony Balch ever made, the rather idiosyncratic auteur never made another film, though he apparently had a number of projects in mind before he died, including an unkosher comedy entitled The Sex Life of Adolf Hitler and a horror flick co-written by Hammer horror screenwriter Christopher Wicking, who once commented regarding a meeting with the eccentric filmmaker in a 1988 interview with Shock Xpress magazine: "I had a crazy meeting with him, when he wanted to do some picture or other. He spent most of the time walking across the furniture. Languorously, he would walk across three or four chairs. He went into another little world. He was a sad figure in a way, because he was well before his time." Indeed, rather unfortunately, Balch succumbed to stomach cancer at the premature age of 42 in 1980, thereupon putting a permanent end to his all too brief filmmaking career. Undoubtedly, Horror Hospital demonstrates that Balch were certainly a filmmaker that was ahead of his time, as a sort of Werner Schroeter of trashy high-camp horror comedies. In fact, Balch was actually deemed an important enough filmmaker in France that a frog writer named Adrien Clerc recently released a book about his life and career entitled Guerilla Conditions, la folle épopée cinématographique d'Antony Balch avec William Burroughs, Richard Gordon et tous les autres (2014). Retarded enough in parts to work as a stoner flick but also rather scathing in its depiction of hippie potheads, Horror Hospital is like an anti-Head Head flick that makes one big clever, if not intentionally corny, joke about the counter-counter generation and related subcultures while at the same time totally deconstructing virtually every single classic horror movie cliché. Heavily influenced by Michael Curtiz's Mystery of the Wax Museum (1933) and the works of Bela Lugosi (Balch owned various prints of his films and would screen them at his home) yet set in the post-Beat counter-culture era, Horror Hospital ultimately demonstrates how much society, culture, and cinema has degenerated since the end of the Second World War, even if that was not Balch's intention. Featuring the killer queen among killer queens as the main villain (Dr. Storm may proclaim to be rampantly heterosexuality, but he acts like a bitchy old cabaret dancer) and some of the most ludicrous murder and sex scenes of its era, Horror Hospital is an excess-ridden exercise in combining the elegant with the risqué and even lowbrow, thus demonstrating that auteur Antony Balch was the foremost dandy of exploitation cinema. Call me crazy, but I think Balch would have also made an adaptation of Naked Lunch that would have put Cronenberg's version to shame.

-Ty E

THE DEFIANCE OF GOOD

Armand Weston (1975)

It is not every day that one discovers a hardcore porn flick that viciously assaults everything rotten about the counter-culture generation, especially in regard to their wacky misguided quest to discover new religions and ways of living, but the classic horror-themed S&M blue movie The Defiance of Good (1975) aka Cure Me aka Defiance! directed by pornographic auteur turned horror hack Armand Weston (The Taking of Christina, The Nesting) does just that, as a rare sadomasochistic skin flick with some socially-redeeming value and entrancing expressionistic undertones. Starring a then-only-17-year-old Jean Jennings (Case of the Full Moon Murders, Virgin Dreams), who was an ex-cheerleader turned teenage runaway that later married goofy Guido character actor Joe “Maniac” Spinell, and produced by porn star Jason Russell (who started an affair with Jennings that resulted in the dissolving of his marriage to actress Tina Hall, who became so morbidly depressed by the situation that she drank herself to death by age 32), this quite literally and figuratively penetrating fuck flick depicts the insanity that ensues when an overprotective bitch of a bible-lobotomized mother forces her nubile teenage daughter to go to a mental institution after catching her taking her first hit of cocaine, thus resulting in the titillating teen being gang-raped by a couple Charles Manson look-a-likes and eventually coming under the wing of a demented guru who forces her to lead a ludicrously lecherous life of devout sadomasochistic sacrilege. Somewhat interestingly, star Jean Jennings was the granddaughter of a Baptist minister, thus making The Defiance of Good a rare example of pornographic art imitating life and vice versa. Additionally, the man who plays the Svengali-like quasi-Manson-esque guru, Fred J. Lincoln, was also a pornographer and like producer Jason Russell and hack pornographer Vinnie Rossi (Desire, Max Bedroom), claimed that he was the true ‘auteur’ of the film and not Armand Weston, who was certainly a talented pornographer that was more than capable of directing the film. Strangely artsy and unnervingly atmospheric, refreshingly politically incorrect, sinisterly socially conscious, and pornographically phantasmagorical, Weston’s film dares to make a mockery of the counter-culture movement while also ironically being a direct product of it. A sort of pseudo-metaphysical blue movie where a minister who has lost his faith and congregation sires his own hermetic new age S&M church in a megalomaniacal attempt to spiritually and sexually enslave young girls, The Defiance of Good is ultimately a rather raunchy reminder why no other zeitgeist has produced more crazed charlatans, unhinged high priests, and megalomaniacal gurus than the spiritually and morally forsaken counter-culture generation.

After her exceedingly bitchy Catholic mother (Carole Holland) catches her with her drug-addled friend Susan snorting her first hit of coke, naïve teen Cathy (Jean Jennings)—a somewhat busty green-eyed blonde and seemingly untainted

THE DEFIANCE OF GOOD

daddy's girl who has no idea how brutal the world really is—finds herself in a mental institution that is plagued by gang-rape, forced miscegenation, aggressive bull-dykes, and demented quack doctors who see Thorazine as the cure for all patients, including those claiming to be the victims of sexual pillaging. Indeed, since Cathy's father ('Roderick Usher' aka Steve Lincoln) is a cowardly old cuckold (indeed, the mother even says to Cathy, "you should know now that your daddy isn't the strongest person in the world") who will not stand-up for his daughter, even though he wants to, the teen is forced to face institutionalization at the psyche ward of a grungy little place called Eastwood General Hospital. During her first couple of minutes at the hospital, Cathy is forced to strip completely naked for a heinous high yellow negro with a sick sense of humor and a contempt for white people who then proceeds to give her a phony "exam" by reaming his dirty dark fingers up her virginal vagina and tight rectum. As a decidedly demented dyke who randomly starts masturbating in front of the teen states regarding the doctors, "They call themselves doctor...They're crazier than the rest of us." Upon talking to a mentally perturbed would-be-poet that looks like a cross between Charles Manson and Jamie Gillis, Cathy is absurdly told: "I am the world's greatest poet. Baudelaire...Rimbaud...William Blake...their blood flows through my veins," thus indicating that The Door front man Jim Morrison has had a rather detrimental effect on the discernibly despoiled baby boomer generation. When Cathy is gang-raped late one night by two Manson look-a-likes and a nefarious token negro, she tells the head doctor, who is an exceedingly effete fat fag that resembles John Waters' man-muse Divine minus the drag, but he does not believe her and orders the nasty negro orderly to put her on a steady dose of Thorazine. Of course, after drugging her, the jigaboo also rapes Cathy, but thankfully the rape in question is not actually depicted in the film, thus indicating that people were sane enough at the time of the film's release to be repulsed by interracial sex scenes. Needless to say, things are not exactly looking up for Cathy, but when she meets a seemingly empathetic, smart, soft-spoken, and 'progressive' physician named Dr. Gabriel (Fred J. Lincoln) who offers the chance to stay at his private sanitarium, she finds her way out of the hospital of hell. Of course, little does Cathy realize that Dr. Gabriel is a loony lapsed minister turned malevolent madman and S&M messiah who forces teenage girls into largely degrading sadomasochistic sexual servitude.

Upon entering Dr. Gabriel's rather strange and perennially shadowy yet elegantly decorated sanitarium, little lamb Cathy is given the following pretentious hippie spiel from the good doctor: "Our task is...to break the stranglehold of the past. We must liberate ourselves from the old traditions and concepts of good and evil that simply have no place...NO PLACE in the modern world. In order to be free, we must unlearn all the moral values that your misguided parents have taught you. You will learn to free your spirit and your flesh! [...] I will be your teacher, your guru...the father that you never had. You will obey me as a newborn child and I will lead you to knowledge.” Indeed, like a newborn child, Cathy will be doing a lot of crawling around naked. Of course, being a dimwitted gal who lacks even the smallest inkling of intuition and common sense, Cathy has no clue what Gabriel is talking about it, at least not until his assistant Miss Caine (Heather Ellis) brings her into a dark bathroom and attempts to put her in bondage. In no time, Gabriel and his debauched disciples literally whip Cathy into shape by getting her involved in leather-clad orgies featuring whips, chains, bondage, and groveling cunnilingus-inclined male slaves. While being whipped, Cathy is told by Gabriel in a Manson-esque fashion: “You must die so you can be reborn.” Of course, Cathy is eventually reborn and molded into a sort of sexually cultivated automaton with a talent for giving and receiving painful pleasure. When Cathy attempts to get in bed with Gabriel, she is firmly denied, with the deranged and seemingly sexually impotent doc stating, “Don’t ever touch me. My pleasures are in the mind...they are far more exquisite than any temptation of the flesh.” When Cathy tells Gabriel that he sounds like a priest, he concurs and matter-of-factly replies in a pseudo-poetic monotone fashion: “I am a priest...in my own way. My father was a minister. And he made sure I became one too. I will perish is the poorest part of town. Noises from the local whorehouse kept me awake at night...Teasing my mind with the wildest fantasies. I was tormented with sexual horror. My guts ached for the touch of a woman. I tried to fight it...bury it...I had my own congregation at 28...It was a lovely young girl. Anyway, I lost my faith, I lost the church. I tried to resume a normal life but it was too late. Physically, I was useless. I traveled, I read, I studied. I knew what I had to do. This is my church and you, you are part of my new congregation.” Of course, when it comes to his cruelly carnal church, Gabriel has nil tolerance when it comes to heretics and Cathy is about to learn that the hard way.

While Dr. Gabriel eventually tells Cathy that she is free to go since she has been fully initiated into his pseudo-spiritual program of sadomasochistic (dis)pleasure, he also lets her know that if she does decide to leave, she will never be able to come back to the sanitarium of sin. Fully brainwashed by now, Cathy naturally opts to stay, at least a little while longer, but her loyalties are ultimately tested when her friend Susan (Day Jason)—the same girl that gave her the drugs that landed her in the loony bin in the first place—is brought in as a new initiate to the S&M church. After pleasuring Susan’s pussy with her tongue, Cathy bonds with her old friend who, not surprisingly considering the specific set of circumstances, wants to escape from the sanatorium immediately. While Cathy admits that she would like to stay because, as she states to her friend, “I don’t know if you can understand...I’m not really sure I understand myself...but in a certain way, I feel safe here. I feel protected...even needed” (undoubtedly, Cathy’s remark reflects why people join cults/religions in the first place), Susan eventually convinces her to help her to escape from the sanitarium. In a silly, if not admittedly momentarily startling, twist ending, it is revealed that Susan setup Cathy all along and that her begging her 'friend' to help her escape from the clutches of Gabriel and his followers was merely a cunning ploy to test the teen's devotion to the church. As to what happens to Cathy after that, one can only guess, but I would not be surprised if the deranged deviants of Gabriel's sexually sadistic congregation burnt her clit off while she was still alive, killed her during some sort of bloody S&M session involving knife-like dildos, and then sodomized her corpse.

THE DEFIANCE OF GOOD

While looking up background information on The Defiance of Good, I managed to find a vintage The New York Post article from Tuesday, January 28, 1975 entitled "A Cheerleader Grows Up" about the film's underage star Jean Jennings and her role in the film. After revealing that Jennings lied about her age to be in the film by signing a release saying she was 23, it is also revealed that the film's distributor Mickey Zaffarano—a morbidly obese mafia man who ran porno theaters and national porn distribution company for the Guido Bonanno family crime family—decided to release the work anyways despite the fact that the lead was underage, with his super sophisticated Sicilian reasoning being as follows: "Now, what do I do? Can the law stop me from exhibiting?" In the same article, Jennings also appears in good spirits about her profession, even claiming that her father supports her career in cinematic carnality, stating, "my father is very proud of me. He hasn't seen the film but he knows what kind of movie it is and he wants to help me in my acting career" (not surprisingly, the newspaper was unable to reach Jennings' parents for comment). Of course, after seeing The Defiance of Good, I doubt any parents would be proud of their child being in the film, even as an extra, as the work may make a mockery of the corrosive cocktail of sex, drugs, and gurus associated with the counter-culture generation, but it is still sleazy celluloid filth that makes the viewer feel like they need to take a long cold shower after watching it. Somewhat shockingly, the film was so popular upon its release that, like Jonas Middleton's somewhat superior avant-garde hardcore horror flick Through The Looking Glass (1976) starring Jamie Gills, a tie-in novel was subsequently released that was written by the assumedly pseudonymous novelist D.M. Perkins, who was also responsible for penning the tie-in novel for Gerard Damiano's crossover hit Deep Throat (1972) starring Linda Lovelace. With his later work Take Off—a genre-eclectic pornographic reworking of Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891)—auteur Armand Weston would prove he was capable of more 'lighthearted' celluloid lechery, but there is no denying that there was a certain sadistic spirit behind The Defiance of Good. Indubitably one of the most sensual and sensitively directed S&M fuck flicks that I have ever seen, Weston's film is not disturbing because it features gang-rape, multicultural finger-fucking, and Sapphic sadomasochism but because it depicts the unhinged mentality of an entire generation that, like the protagonist of the film, suffers from Stockholm syndrome and is responsible for the degenerate post-cultural/post-racial/post-spiritual/post-moral America that exists today.

-Ty E

THE MAN IN THE GLASS BOOTH
THE MAN IN THE GLASS BOOTH

Arthur Hiller* (1975)

Before a then relatively unknown Ryan Gosling, despite his reasonably statuesque Aryan appearance, proved he could play the most volatile and self-destructive Jewish neo-Nazi in American Jew director/screenwriter Henry Bean's rather underrated and underseen work The Believer (2001), Germanic actor Maximilian Schell played a similarly self-extinguishing Jew in The Man in the Glass Booth (1975), a film based on English actor/novelist Robert Shaw's 1967 novel and 1968 stage play, both of the same name, that tells the hysterical yet highly humorous schizo semite story of a seemingly deranged yet super sophisticated Manhattan-based industrialist of the Hebraic persuasion who is kidnapped by secret agents from the Israeli Mossad and taken to Israel to stand trial in an Eichmann-esque fashion under the dubious charge of being a Nazi war criminal of the mass murdering variety. Although a rather aesthetically theatric work that merely seems like a stage-play on steroids like Alfred Hitchcock's Rope (1948) or a Rainer Werner Fassbinder TV-movie like Women in New York (1977), The Man in the Glass Booth would earn its lead star Maximilian Schell (Judgement at Nuremberg, John Carpenter's Vampires) nominations for the Academy Award for "Best Actor" and the Golden Globe Award for "Best Actor - Motion Picture Drama" due to his penetrating performance as a vulgarian genius of a business man that seemingly suffers from a split-personality as a funny fellow who cannot decide whether he is a kosher capitalist or a nefarious National Socialist of the Jew-gassing sort. Undoubtedly one of the most literate and convincing films ever made on the subject of Jewish self-hatred that makes archetypical Judaic nerd Woody Allen's pathological neuroticism seem like the attention-seeking antics of a spoiled little girl who is jealous that her goyish classmates got more presents for Christmas than she got for Hanukah, The Man in the Glass Booth has the wonderful gall to look at everything from the argument that Israel would not exist today without Hitler and Auschwitz, to the shameful fact that even the richest of Jews are only a generation away from peddling junk in an impoverished Eastern European ghetto. A work not thematically unlike Weininger's Nacht (1990) aka Weininger's Last Night directed by Austrian half-Hebrew Paulus Manker and The Believer (2001) directed by Henry Bean in that it treads the seemingly thin line between anti-Semitism and philo-Semitism, as well as the perennial link between narcissism and self-hatred, The Man in the Glass Booth is indubitably a rare piece of scathing, Jew juicy celluloid that ironically appeals to both Jews and their many enemies alike. Although based on a work written by a gentile Englishman who was against his story being adapted cinematically, The Man in the Glass Booth was directed by Jewish-Canadian television/film director Arthur Hiller (Tobruk, The Hospital) and produced by American Jew Ely Abraham Landau (the Shaw adaptation being one of the fourteen films in the producer's American Film Theatre series), and ultimately has a more 'kosher' essence than anything ever directed by philistine Steven Spielberg, the Jewish filmmaker who has done the most to turned the holocaust into a profitable project and a religion for the goyim.

Posh kosher playboy Arthur Goldman (Austrian-born Swiss actor Maximilian Schell) is a ridiculously rich Jewish industrialist who spends a good portion of his time hiding from the real world in his luxuriously lavish Manhattan high-rise and watching people below via binoculars in a patently paranoid manner. An eternally mourning widow who is not that sad over his belated wife's death that it does not stop him from having a different girlfriend for every day of the week (something his wealth allows) and making perverted puns like "the hole is the greater of the sum of its parts" in regard to the fairer sex, as well as an art snob who prefers degenerate Jewish art over the works of Dutch master painter Hieronymus Bosch, Goldman is in many ways the kosher posterboy for a Nazi propaganda like Der Stürmer, yet he is a more keen anti-Semite than National Socialist propagandist Julius Streicher (who, rather ironically, has been rumored to be of Jewish blood himself). As a holocaust survivor who managed to survive Auschwitz some three decades or so before, Goldman, despite his stinking wealth and having the best security resources in the city, has never been able to forget what it is like to live in fear. Seemingly ashamed of his less than successful pretzel-peddler of an Orthodox Jew father, Goldman tells an associate regarding his father's stay at Auschwitz, "Hymie...Hymie Goldman...was your average middle-aged Jew...so he only last five months...[laughs]...and you know the irony was he really never believed it was happening." During one sunny day while looking at the little people down below, Goldman has a hallucination of seeing his father wheeling around his ghetto pretzel cart, as well as an SS men, which causes him to tremble in shock and horror as a victim of post-traumatic stress. Naturally, the Judaic industrialist's assistants, Charlie Cohn (Lawrence Pressman), a younger Jew of the naive post-WWII-born sort, and Jack (Henry Brown), a young black buck, are quite disturbed by their eccentric employer's exceedingly erratic behavior. For instance, while working out in a public gym, Goldman randomly remarks to his protégé Charlie while handling free weights, "Arbeit macht frei...That's a big joke of the Germans... Arbeit macht frei means 'work makes free.' The only freedom of course was up the chimney...The faster you work the sooner you go to the ovens." Charlie also becomes especially offended when Mr. Goldman when he tells him he is 'third rank' in regard to the Jewish sub-races as a man of Lithuanian-Jewish ancestry. Of course, the biggest shock for Charlie is when the Mossad shows up, anally probes (according to the Mossad man, Herr Hermann Göring shoved a cyanide capsule up his poop chute), and kidnaps Goldman for "crimes against the Jewish people" as the Israeli secret agents believe the Heeb industrialist to be SS Colonel Karl Dorff, the same man who apparently tortured and killed the father of the wealthy holocaust survivor.

THE MAN IN THE GLASS BOOTH

Upon arriving in Israel, Goldman is visited in his dungeon-like jail cell by an Israeli public prosecutor assigned to his case named Miriam Rosen (Lois Nettleton, who looks strikingly like Barbara Streisand, minus the repellant Ashkenazi beak), a bloodthirsty Jewess of the vengeful, venom-filled “never forget” and “never forgive” sort who wants to see the supposed SS man hanged just like Adolf Eichmann (whose trial and execution largely inspired The Man in the Glass Booth). Goldman waves his right to an attorney and asks to defend himself (as he says, “who is better qualified?!”), which he inevitably does in a striking SS uniform after he makes a deal with Miriam. Goldman also gives Hebraic hell to a young male psychologist when he makes the bold statement that “only a Jew could conceive of reading the human soul from ink blots” in regard to a Rorschach test he is given, thus following in the footsteps of so-called “self-loathing Jews” like anti-Freudians Karl Kraus and Thomas Szasz in his criticism of Freudian psychoanalysis. After the shrink gives Goldman the clinical diagnosis of being ‘criminally psychotic,’ the Nazi Jew wisely states “If I’m psychotic, 80 million Germans were psychotic...and half the gentiles, all the Muslims, the black activists, the protestant members...” and “socially approved acts, when committed by a whole nation, are not psychotic,” which infuriates the openly anti-kraut psychologist. Of course, it is not until the Israeli criminal trial for “crimes against the Jewish people” that Arthur Goldman, under the stoically sadomasochistic persona of SS Colonel Karl Dorff in full Nazi regalia, that the industrialist-turned-war criminal, who is placed in a glass booth for his protection, has holocaust survivors and IDF members literally lunging at him to kill him. The only one to come to Goldman’s aid is his personal assistant Charlie, who states he cannot be Aryan Dorff because he is clearly a Jew due to his Hebraic sense of humor and mastery of Yiddish, not to mention that “no gentile could ever be as anti-semitic as Mr. Goldman is,” thus highlighting one of the most potent themes of The Man in the Glass Booth in regard to an innate pathological self-hatred in every truly Jewish Jew. In the end, Arthur Goldman, a Jew who barely survived a rather unkind and unkosher concentration camp who would live to become one of the most successful men in the United States of America, succumbs to his own survivor’s guilt and self-hatred as a victim who schizophrenically empathized with the victimizers.

In a 3 out of 4 star review for The Man in the Glass Booth written by shabos goy Roger Ebert, the far-left-leaning film critic made the rather blatant yet important observation that: “Films like “Judgment at Nuremberg” began with the assumption that morality could be upheld and responsibility assigned. “The Man in the Glass Booth” is an infinitely more despairing work.” And, indeed, one of the film’s greatest strengths is that it does not settle for a banal black-and-white view of any of the controversial topics it covers to the point where it even makes the quasi-illegal Israeli show trials seem even rather pointless and redundant with the sole purpose of striking fear in potential anti-semites around the world, hence the worldwide publicity of the Eichmann trial. Even the public prosecutor Miriam Rosen displays the most unflattering attributes of the militaristic Israeli mentality when she states “this time if we go, we won’t go alone” regarding if another ‘holocaust’ were to take place against the Jews, the Jew will take measures to wipe out their enemies as well. Indeed, such seething remarks are not that atypical of contemporary Israeli/Jewish thinkers as the Israeli military historian/theorist Martin van Creveld made the rather apocalyptic remark that sounds like words from a wackjob from Stanley Kubrick’s Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb (1964) in a September 2003 interview in the Dutch weekly, Elsevier, that regarding his beyond-an-eye-for-an-eye nation: “We possess several hundred atomic warheads and rockets and can launch them at targets in all directions, perhaps even at Rome. Most European capitals are targets for our air force.... We have the capability to take the world down with us. And I can assure you that that will happen before Israel goes under.” Aside from the rather tame anti-Israeli statements from ‘self-loathing Jews’ like Norman Finkelstein and Gilad Atzmon, it seems like the days of sophisticated self-hating Hebrews suffering from the ‘Jew flu’ are long gone, which is probably largely the result of Europe’s decline in cultural dominance and the rise of Jewish power in the United States as expressed by the flagrant philo-semitism in academia and Hollywood, among other things, thus while The Man in the Glass Booth might seem rather outmoded and even inexplicable to modern viewers, it is rather doubtful that anyone could describe the film as a depiction of the so called “banality of evil,” even as a minimalistic courtroom melodrama. For those that ever wondered how or why someone could possibly humor the possibility that Uncle Adolf and friends may have had some Israelite blood, The Man in the Glass Booth offers some completely kosher food-for-thought.

-Ty E

LEFT-HANDED
LEFT-HANDED

Arthur Penn* (1958)

It has been my experience that most left-handed people are wacked-out in some striking way or another. In fact, my most criminally-inclined and psychopathic friend growing up was left-handed and when not breaking said left hand/wrist doing a number of idiotically dangerous things, he was certainly used it to thief or to smoke a joint laced with coke or whatever drug of choice he was using at that time. Naturally, I would expect a gay hardcore porn flick entitled Left-Handed (1972) to be riddled with unsavory left-handed degenerates doing unsavory things and avant-garde pornographer Jack Deveau's film certainly does not disappoint in that regard as a work of completely callous cocksucking cynicism that does not celebrate gay liberation and related counter-culture crap, but is instead a wonderfully wicked work that portrays the left-handed sodomite lead as predatory and pernicious psychopath who gets off to destroying normal heterosexual relationships, as well as loses interest and drops 'lovers' once they fall in love with him and he has fully debased to a most irreparable degree. The feature-length debut of architectural and graphic designer turned fag filmmaker/producer Jack Deveau (Drive, A Night at the Adonis), Left-Handed is far from the positive poof 'crossover' pictures of Wakefield Poole (Boys in the Sand, Bijou) and the sodomite S&M-celebrating of Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool), as a work about a long-haired trio of moral and sexual degenerates, including a hustler, antique dealer, and pot dealer, who live for sex, drugs, and rock n roll and ultimately pay the price for such hedonistic idiocy. Essentially the story of a gay hustler who conspires to turn an ostensibly heterosexual drug dealer with a girlfriend into a passive fag bottom, only to leave him in heartbreak in the end, Left-Handed is lecherous hardcore homo porn at its most misanthropically melodramatic and nastily nihilistic as the sort of work that, not unlike William Friedkin's Cruising (1980), would have been labeled 'homophobic' by hysterical homo do-gooders had it been directed by a heterosexual man. A dark and bitter tale of aberrant mis-romance with hardcore homo action thrown in between, Left-Hand is the film that announced Jack Deveau arrived and that Halsted was not American's only artsy fartsy S&M auteur pornographer.

Heterosexual country boy dope-peddler Bob (Robert Rikas) and super swarthy would-be-hunk hustler Ray (Ray Frank) have never met, but through their mutual 'friend' Larry (Larry Burns)—a dirty hippie antique dealer with an exceedingly annoying voice—the two will meet through happenstance and almost immediately begin a steamy sodomite love affair of the initially bi-curious but ultimately tragic sort. On his way to Larry's shabby knick-knack shack, Ray makes a stop at a public restroom and having some time and semen to waste, he proves his oral versatility to a total stranger. When Ray finally arrives at Larry's store, the antique dealer has already bought a couple kilos of grass from Bob, but the two strangers spend enough time with one another for the Hustler to get hooked on the Adonis-like Nordic-American dope peddler. Like the stereotypical high school whore, Ray vows to Larry that he will initiate Bob into male buggery sooner or later. Rather impressed with Bob's outdoor hetero hunkness and crude country boy charm, Ray goes home and masturbates while fantasizing in what is an elaborate pornographic black-and-white dream-sequence between the scheming sodomite streetwalker and half-braindead pot dealer. In his innate vulgarity and deep-seated desire to defile country boy Bob, Ray perfectly personifies what Teutonic prophet philosopher of Occidental decline Oswald Spengler meant when he wrote regarding urban anti-folk, "In place of a type-true people, born of and grown on the soil, there is a new sort of nomad, cohering unstably in fluid masses, the parasitical city dweller, traditionless, utterly matter-of-fact, religionless, clever, unfruitful, deeply contemptuous of the countryman and especially that highest form of countryman, the country gentleman." One afternoon while walking down the street, Ray bumps into Bob and the two virtual strangers decide to smoke dope at the latter's pathetic apartment, thus resulting in rather raunchy consequences. Bob, who is featured in Left-Handed passionately performing cunnilingus on and penetrating his girlfriend (Teri Reardon), gets so pathetically stoned and inhibited that he decides to get naked with Ray and even screws the assumedly STD-stricken hustler's rather ripped rectum.

After converting Bob to play on the pink team, Ray decides to stalk the dope dealer, who lives with his girlfriend, at his quaint farmhouse. With his girlfriend viewing voyeuristically from a window, Bob allows Ray to blow him in a barn and the two continue to fuck furiously around the rural homestead. When big gay Ray leaves, Bob comes to the startling realization that he loves the homo hustler more than his girlfriend, so he drops her and his heterosexuality like a bad habit to begin his new life as a rare masculine rural queer. Naturally, Ray moves into Bob's country home and the two engage in incessant aberrosexual activity that becomes more and more depraved as the days pass. Eventually, born bottom Ray deflowers Bob's bi-curious bunghole, thus leading to the beginning of the end of their raunchy 'romantic' relationship, as the streetwalking sod is mainly attracted to the redneck dope dealer's innocence, which he has enthusiastically destroyed like the immune system of AIDS-addled crackbaby. Meanwhile, prissy antique pusher Larry becomes jealous like a frigid queen upon learning of Bob and Ray's relationship, so he creates a sadistic plan to setup a five-man fag orgy at his apartment where he hopes the dope dealer will walk in on his hustler boy toy getting gangbanged by a brigade of rough and tough buggering boys. Of course, Ray goes to the party and gives into his hyper hedonistic hustler tendencies, and just as lecherous lunatic Larry planned, Bob walks in on his beloved butt-boy being carnally manhandled by a number of anonymous unclad men. In fact, Ray becomes so erotically enamored with the five-cock orgy that he proudly takes some random dude's fist and half of his arm up his ass like a true bitch with a sinister itch for morbid masochism. Of course, Bob finally comes to his senses and realizes that Ray was only capable of offering him a 'left-handed' romance, thus concluding Left-Handed on a rather depressingly note that is bound to spoil any poor pervert's masturbatory climax.

LEFT-HANDED

On top of being the first feature directed by Jack Deveau and the first Hand-in-Hand (the film studio Deveau cofounded) production, Left-Handed also has the dubious distinction of being the first fully scripted gay porn flick, as well as the first gay porn flick to feature an original musical score, which is not exactly a grand achievement artistically, but considering that in context with the fact that is a terribly dark fuck flick with a less than flattering depiction of fagdom and its seems rather funny. Described by Mallory Callan in the March 16, 1973 issue of The Reader: Chicago's Free Weekly as follows, "As pornography goes, the film is remarkable because of its aesthetic sophistication and intellectual curiosity... While taut, the plot is not merely a flimsy premise to introduce one more sexual possibility. The essence of economy, all action advances the obsessional sexual pursuits of the central character, Ray, and all gratuitous 'emotionality' which does not bear directly on the erotic situation has been pruned away," Left-Handed, as well as most of Deveau's films, ultimately proved that porn, even gay porn featuring fisting, could rise above the level of a pathetic masturbation aid and reach a sort of visceral 'truth' that most non-pornographic films lack. Made at the end of the hippie era when even the most masculine of men looked like dirty pussy Jesus impersonators, Left-Handed, most importantly, demystified the appeal of 'free love', drug addiction, and idiotic haircuts and wardrobes, ultimately depicting these innately inane irrational ingredients as the recipe for a sad self-serving life of soulless sex and destructive relationships that no one, no matter how high, would be proud of. Personally, I think Deveau's second cinematic effort, Drive (1974), is superior to Left-Handed, but undoubtedly, if the two films have anything in common aside from the obvious homoerotic attractions, it is that they are unwaveringly aesthetically repugnant works from a decidedly deplorable zeitgeist, thus both works should be deemed culturally and historically significant in that they epitomize everything that was damningly degenerate about its excrement-flavored era of excess and eroticism for eroticism's sake. Indeed, if there ever was a 'left-handed' film about a left-handed era, it is most certainly Deveau's Left-Handed.

-Ty E

BONNIE AND CLYDE

Arthur Penn* (1967)

Bonnie and Clyde was one of the first revolutionary films of late 1960's "New" Hollywood. This new studio era produced films promoting subversion, promiscuous sex, revolution and overall disdain for authority. It seems that Hollywood was a supporter of the various "liberation" movements going on in America during that time period. In Bonnie and Clyde, Hollywood decided to make a film about real-life depression era outlaws Bonnie Parker and Clyde Barrow. The film also just happens to be the best of the "American New Wave" films. Warren Beatty and Faye Dunaway were perfect for the roles of title characters. Beatty plays a "cool" outlaw with a hillbilly charm that anyone could get along with. Faye Dunaway is captivating as a stunning vixen that only Warren Beatty could tame. Both characters really do prove that opposites attract and remain bonded till death. The two stars of the film are obviously more appealing than the real outlaw couple. Left: Real-life Bonnie and Clyde Right: Hollywood's Bonnie and Clyde Bonnie and Clyde features a soundtrack of energetic banjo playing that adds auditory perfection to the film's dirt road aesthetic. The simplistic yet radiant cinematography make the film very easy on the eyes. Despite the violent nature of Bonnie and Clyde, the film is fairly calm and soothing. Bonnie and Clyde director Arthur Penn seemed to take some notes from the directors of the European "New Wave" film movements. Bonnie and Clyde is one of few Hollywood studio films that I would consider a masterpiece. Bonnie and Clyde seem to have some problems in the bedroom as Clyde is not much of a "lover boy." From the beginning of the film, it is apparent that Bonnie is sexually repressed and aggressive. Despite Clyde's sexual problems, he is the only man that can satisfy Bonnie. Only near the conclusion of Bonnie and Clyde do the two lovers accomplish a full exercise in physical love. The love "climax" is a fitting scene before the final violent climax of the film.

-Ty E

KYODAI MAKES THE BIG TIME
KYODAI MAKES THE BIG TIME

Aryan Kaganof* (1992)

Long before he de-christened himself 'Aryan Kaganof' (Shabondama Elegy aka Tokyo Elegy, SMS Sugar Man) after meeting his biological father for the first time, the South African auteur formerly known as Ian Kerkhof shocked the Dutch world by winning the 'Golden Calf for Best Long Feature' (the Dutch equivalent to the Oscar) for his minimalistic 16mm low-budget avant-garde debut feature Kyodai Makes The Big Time (1992) at the 1992 Netherlands Film Festival. At the time of winning the highly coveted prize, Kaganof was only 28-years-old and a second year student at the Dutch Film and Television Academy, yet he managed to win an award that put him in the company of the top Dutch actors and filmmakers, including Paul Verhoeven, Rutger Hauer, Fons Rademakers, and Alex van Warmerdam, among countless others. Despite winning the most mainstream of Dutch film prizes, Kaganof thankfully opted for becoming more experimental, iconoclastic, and eclectically cinematically subversive over time, with his third film Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers (1994) being like no other film made before or after it, as a sort of foreboding celluloid essay that finds the beauty and intrigue in ugliness, depravity, and inhumanity. Luckily, I was recently able to track down a copy of Kyodai Makes the Big Time and can say without hesitation that it seems that Kaganof has always been a celluloid master with an uncompromising vision. An auteur that seems to have skipped his formative years as a filmmaker, Kaganof created a work with Kyodai Makes the Big Time that dwells on the impossibility of love and romance in a dull post-counter-culture age where empty sex reigns and where romantic commitment is an act of the 'naïve' (or so says a character in the film). An intentionally slow-moving yet strangely atmospheric piece of unwavering pessimism featuring mostly still static shots that recalls the early films of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Kyodai Makes the Big Time is an anti-romantic tale about the metaphysical battle of sexes that manages to make the avant-gardism of Jean-Marie Straub quite palatable by mixing it with a little Warhol/Morrissey-esque degeneracy and Rebel Without a Cause (1955) inspired antisocial youth spirit. A work that is bound to offend both fickle feminists and beta-male manosphere-obsessed misogynists alike, the emotionally-ravaging and romantically tragic spirit of Kyodai Makes the Big Time was probably best described by auteur Kaganof himself in an interview: "I am always amazed by women who stay with a man who uses physical violence or is emotionally closed. Men are different. There is always the urge to possess and once you have it you don't want it anymore. That is the constant problem in relationships...in fact men want to fuck all women."

Opening with a scene of muscular and handsome self-absorbed antihero Kyodai Rogerson (Koos Vos) perniciously pounding the puss of his quasi-girlfriend/steady

fucktoy Stephanie aka 'Steph' (played by Janica Draisma, who also won a 'Golden Calf' for her performance in the film) shouting at his beloved romantic things like, "You fucking cunt, I'm fucking your cunt," Kyodai Makes the Big Time immediately lets the viewer know they are about to enter a sexually oppressive, if not somewhat pathetic and even humorous, world of misguided male narcissism and female masochism. Indeed, Kyodai is a self-absorbed bourgeois bum of sorts who dreams of being a film actor and rides on a motorcycle. A postmodern Narcissus, Kyodai is so unwaveringly in love with himself that he literally masturbates while staring in the mirror. Presumably to pump up his own self-esteem, Kyodai always surrounds himself with inferiors and hangs out with mostly junky losers (in fact, one of his friends even eloquently asks him, "why the fuck do you hangout with me?"), including a Burroughs-brainwashed dope fiend with long greasy hair who proudly states, "I'm a junkman, I'm a professional. Some people study to become lawyers or doctors or a fucking psychoanalyst...Me, I studied on the streets and became a junky, and one of the best at it." In terms of advice on love, Kyodai turns to his too-cool-for-school hedonist friend Jacques (André Arend van de Noord), who is against love because it is 'serious', stating to his friend, "There's no use in being serious. I mean, it's hard...being serious. Not only is it hard...it's also stupid. Not stupid...but naïve. To be serious, you have to be naïve. If you're not naïve, which you are not, then you have to pretend...and to pretend, you have to be an actor." Of course, as his failed attempt to get into the film acting trade will prove, Kyodai is not much of an actor and will ultimately fail to treat Stephanie in a manner different than that of a mere fuck-buddy.

Used and abused lover girl Steph has no serious hang-ups in terms of her relationship with Kyodai and her man's almost bestial form of buggery, even confessing to her friend Colette (Ysabel Evers) regarding her lover, "I get so turned-on when he cums, he makes these growling sounds like a wolf. Really primitive." As Steph explains to Colette, she does want Kyodai to open up to her, but the more she attempts to be loving and tender with her boyfriend, the more he pushes her away. When Steph pleads to her beloved, "I just wish it wasn't always so violent. Sometimes I just wish you would hold me and be tender," and then asks him, "What are we doing together?...What's the difference between my cunt and Colette's?," Kyodai coldly and callously replies, "I haven't tried Colette's.....yet." Indeed, Kyodai is up his own ass with "James Dean bullshit" and he is not about to change for anyone, especially for an immature teenager with a rather idealistic view of love and romance. Of course, Kyodai is in for a rude awakening when he goes to a casting agency and the lady there tells that, "We need more acting experience than cheek bone." Indeed, Kyodai may have the striking appearance of a Nordic Übermensch, but he has the personality of a braindead psychopath and the morality of a gypsy beggar. Naturally, when Stephanie's friend Colette, who is a jealous bitch who is fed up with "clean cut college guys" looking for her clit during cunnilingus, begins a short-lived affair with Kyodai that de-evolves into a banal bizarre love triangle, the two lovers' relationship finally dissolves for good. Strangely, Kyodai unconsciously confesses to his androgynous man-woman mother figure friend Jeff (Jeff Babock)—an exceedingly effete man with long girly hair who loves to feel up his male friend and seems more like a post-menopausal grandmother than a young man—that he indeed loves Stephanie but, of course, it is too late to repair their shattered love affair. In the end, it is revealed that two years after the couple broke up, Kyodai ironically died after crashing his beloved motorcycle, but he called Stephanie right before his death, meekly confessing to her, “I would love nothing more than feeling your breasts rubbing into my back while riding into the big time. The big time, Steph... The big time.” Indeed, Kyodai finally reached the big time, with his whole superficial and senseless rebel-without-a-cause persona resulting in his bitter and ultimately pathetic demise. As for Stephanie, she states in retrospect regarding her troubled romance with Kyodai and his tragic, if not inevitable, death: “I was crying because I had become a woman and would never again become that loving, sweet, fearless girl who was so certain that things would work out for the best. Kyodai had been my rite of passage into the bittersweet world of adulthood. There is not much more to say. I loved Kyodai...passionately, ecstasically... I don't think of him all that often.”

KYODAI MAKES THE BIG TIME

In terms of its depiction of a young woman going through her 'rite of passage' by falling in love with an abusive asshole loser that has a complete and utter incapacity for love, Kyodai Makes the Big Time is rather realistic in its essence that expresses in emotional tone and atmosphere more than mere words could ever hope to achieve, as a malignantly melancholy work that manages to reconcile Bresson with Fassbinder. Indeed, a dirty Dutch depiction about how 'love is colder than death' in a country where prostitution is legal and the native indigenous women are less and less interested in their own men, preferring instead to copulate and reproduce with foreign men from the global south, Kyodai Makes the Big Time is undoubtedly one of few truthful films of its time, thus making it a work that most people do not want to see lest they have to confront the lies of their own lives. When the film was nominated for 'Golden Calf for Best Long Feature' at the Netherlands Film Festival, it apparently caused some protest, with Dutch film producer Matthijs van Heijningen complaining, “It further increases the already existing gap between Dutch film and the audience,” as if cinema is a distinctly proletarian artistic medium. As Kaganof would also explain, “Some leading Dutch filmmakers this week advised me to withdraw my film from competition as a possible prize could exclude me from getting subsidies for future projects, but I did not listen to them.” Although only speculation on my part, it seems those leading Dutch filmmakers Kaganof spoke of were jealous that some young and upcoming South African that no one ever heard of would show them up at their own national film festival. Of course, Kyodai Makes the Big Time does show its Dutch cinematic influences, as a work with an innate apathy for Hollywood cinema convention, as well as an unflattering depiction of the wanton war of the sexes, that has not been seen in the Netherlands since the beautifully grotesque films of Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Living), whose feature Pentimento (1979) inspired hateful protest from feminists. Blowing his entire lifesavings and swallowing his pride and asking his ex-girlfriends and girlfriends for additional funds to finance Kyodai Makes the Big Time, Kaganof would be able to create a minor masterpiece that enabled him to make the big time and the auteur would later rub it in the faces of the Dutch by remarking in an interview, "I never understand why more films aren't made in Holland. This must be the easiest country in the world to make films in. Just about everybody has a 16mm camera, and there is loads of old film stock lying around waiting to be used up. If people spent less time in cafes zeiring about other people's lousy films and more time just making their own there would be sprake of a real film culture here." For those that doubt the Netherlands has ever produced a work that rivals the great works of the French New Wave and German New Cinema, check out Kaganof's Kyodai Makes the Big Time and bask in the brutal beauty of immature sex and anti-love.

-Ty E

THE MOZART BIRD
THE MOZART BIRD

Aryan Kaganof* (1993)

Like many artists who do not go out of their way to put women on a pedestal and depict them as somehow morally superior to men and/or perennial victims of the pernicious patriarchy, South African auteur Aryan Kaganof aka Ian Kerkhof (Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers, Western 4.33) has been accused of being a dreaded misogynist. Indeed, after doing the seemingly unthinkable by receiving the prestigious Golden Calf—the Dutch equivalent of an Oscar—for his low-budget feature-length directorial debut Kyodai Makes the Big Time (1992), Kaganof would follow up his hit film with a work that would be somewhat less well received, The Mozart Bird (1993) aka De Mozart Bird, which was attacked in the press, including by the director's friends, as somehow not being gynocentric enough for feminists. For instance, in his review of the film with the less than thoughtful title "A Shoddy Film Difficult to Take Seriously," Kaganof's self-professed pal Jeremy Dowson wrote regarding the work and its creator: "It comes as little surprise that THE MOZART BIRD, an attempted study of a man's destructive relationship with his lover, contains much of everything I've ever taken issue with him about: misogyny and pretention in the form of smart-arse nods, not only to the likes of Nietzsche but to his own "filmic oeuvre" [...] I cannot take seriously this shoddily edited, ramblingly scripted, stiltedly acted, over-long 16mm exercise in Boy's Own intellectual masturbation." Of course, Kaganof is not the humorless pretentious twat that spiritual eunuch Dowson makes him out to be as demonstrated by the fact that the filmmaker humorously decided to use the negative review as the cover-art for the DVD copy he sent me. Notably, the cover of The Mozart Bird also features the wonderful words "a film about cunt cuntness cuntility cuntissue," thus guaranteeing not only cunts, but fun to anyone with an actual sense of humor. A comfortably claustrophobic chamber piece divided by shots of post-industrial architecture and urban decay in gloomy Amsterdam about the rise and fall of a hot, heavy, and eroto-philosophical romance between two slacker expatriates of the overly educated and considerably self-indulgent sort who spend most of their time fucking, fighting, and pseudo-philosophizing when they should be looking for jobs, Kaganof's work is the film that Richard Linklater's pseudo-existentialist celluloid excrement Slacker (1991) and Before Sunrise and the miserable Mumblecore abortions by infantile would-be-auteur dildos like Joe Swanberg wish they were, as a visceral and even vicious, albeit oftentimes devilishly humorous, no bullshit look at romance and relationships during the age of Occidental nihilism and rampant bourgeois degeneracy. Far from misogynistic, The Mozart Bird, not unlike the works of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, does not hold back when it comes to dissecting and prodding at the idiosyncrasies of both genders, as the sort of ruthless work that would make the man-children that direct Mumblecore malarkey piss their skid-mark-stained Superman panties. Described by Kaganof around the time of its initial release as follows, "It's light! It's uplifting! It's THE MOZART BIRD! My new improved formula feature film. See Howard sulk! See Selene throw a temper tantrum! See people just like you doing all the stuff nobody thought was worth making a film about! See another film about very little...(slowly)," this super subtly tragicomic and shamelessly lurid (anti)love story ultimately manages to find quaint pulchritude in the fine art of mis-romance and emotional immaturity.

Howard (Argentinean actor Daniel Daran, who also appeared in Kaganof's first feature) and Selene (Stacey Grace, who later appeared in Kaganof's third feature The Turner Revelation (1995)) are two over-educated expatriate lovers that look like brother and sister who talk a lot but don't say much and suck off the teat of the Dutch welfare state, hence why they have so much time to chatter and chatter about nothing. As a couple that is afraid of being a couple, their romance is doomed to fail. Their relationship began when Selene ripped off Howard's "best summer shirt in front of ten thousand anti-racist demonstrators," which he saw as "an invitation for a fast and furious fuckaboo," so he naturally followed the dame back to her apartment where they spent about ten minutes of pseudo-philosophizing in the dark before having sex. After that first night, Howard basically never left and made Selene's apartment his own. Howard has pretensions towards being some sort of great writer of erotic novellas in the spirit of Alain Robbe-Grillet and approaches life in a soulless and pedantic fashion as a sort of 'perennial observer' and bohemian Don Juan who is afraid to get truly emotionally involved with anything, especially women, who he tends to use until he gets bored and then throws them away. To Howard's minor credit, Selene has rode many different cocks in her life and seeing as she lives in Amsterdam, she has a pretty good idea of the typical bedroom behavior of the native Dutch population, which she describes as follows, "They're not really into eating it [pussy]. The Dutchman is like an in-and-out business like fuck. He likes it without the trappings...as straightforward as possible." Of course, Howard, who is short and swarthy, is certainly no Dutchman and has no problem committing to cunnilingus, even after his girlfriend has confessed to him that she wet her panties after another man stared at her in a seductive fashion, but it is the least he can do since Selene literally worships his feet and has no problem fellating his feet (!), thus reflecting her masochistic side. While Selene more or less prays to Howard's prick, she does not think much of her lover's writing talents, even at one point asking him, "You actually see yourself as a writer? I mean, someone that can contribute to the tradition...to the canon," to which he naturally replies, "God, you're a bitch. A real cuntin' bitch." To Selene's chagrin, Howard will ultimately make her into a character in one of his shitty erotic novels just like he does with all of his sexual conquests, which was her greatest dread, for as she reflects after their relationship concludes, "I still hold onto the idea that being with me was different from everyone else,” yet he ultimately treated her as just another token lay for his extensive literary ‘research.’

THE MOZART BIRD

While The Mozart Bird is for the most part in chronological order as a work divided into long and emotionally grueling dramatic sequences in a fashion that is not all that different from an Ingmar Bergman flick, the work is sprinkled with post-relationship narration from Selene in regard to her mixed feelings on her failed romance and how she just feels like another one of Howard’s fuck objects yet at the same time yearns for him to call her. It certainly seems that part of the reason the relationship failed was because Selene was not all that good at stroking Howard’s precious little hipster playboy ego. While lying in bed together, Selene compares Howard’s behavior to Nietzsche’s (failed) attempt to escape from the banality of his sterile existence via the “flight into art” and eventually the “flight into knowledge” and then berates her beau by stating, “if you don’t let yourself get hurt, you’re going to suffer real emotional damage in the long run. You use your life like some small scale reenactment of the mythical dramas you know you’re not capable of writing about,” to which loverboy angrily replies, “You know what I find so sad about you? You think you’re so god damn original.” As Selene later accurately states to Howard regarding their hopelessly banal and somewhat phony relationship, “Did you ever listen to us? Our conversations are like some schoolboy’s conception of self-referential dialogue and the ultimate postmodernist urban wasteland serial. You know, littered with name-dropped debris. We don’t talk, we unclutter.” Indeed, the only time the two lovers seem like they’re not bullshitting is when they are screwing because otherwise they sound like two babbling automatons that have been lobotomized by too much postmodern theory. When Selene does attempt to be more of her real self by discussing her love of Howard the Duck comics and Alan Moore’s Swamp Thing series, Howard seems to get turned off, as if such things are beneath him and his towering intellect. Towards the end of the film, Howard forces Selene to read some of his latest writings, but she is more interested in talking about the dubious state of their relationship and remarks when her self-absorbed boyfriend complains about her lack of interest in his work, “you want a standing ovation? I never took you for a couple’s guy, Howie. All that cunt and bitches bullshit...it was all just special effects, like your writing.” Like every time they fight, Howard chalks up Selene’s bitchy mood to ovulating, but little does he realize that it is the beginning of the end of their relationship, which merely fizzles out as opposed to going out in a blaze of glory.

Towards the conclusion of The Mozart Bird right before the two lovers break up for good, Howard readily admits he is a total literary fraud that has always been looking to make the big time, or as he arrogantly states himself, “I have always been looking to sell-out. No one was buying then.” When Selene attempts to compliment him by stating, “You’re the first man I ever met that actually enjoyed talking about sex [...] I loved the sound of your voice,” Howard makes the smart-ass yet totally truthful reply, "I didn't have much to say. Still don't. I just play around with words. Everything that needs to be said has been said and no one noticed." As for romance, Howard describes it as a, "means to an end: fame and wealth; what else," thus reflecting his nihilistically materialistic and superlatively shallow view of life and love. Although Selene "fell in love with a man that didn't care about money," it never occurred to her that that man never existed and that Howard was merely putting up a false front to protect his ego in regard to his sorry lot in life when they were together. During the final scene before the credits, Selene and Howard sit with their backs against a window for a couple minutes while not saying a single word to one another in a scenario reflecting the complete bankruptcy of their romance, which has now reached an exceedingly emotionally impoverished point where the two lapsed love birds no longer even have the desire to talk to one another, not to mention the fact that they no longer seem to like to fuck. When Selene goes to pick up her things from 'her' apartment (Howard moved into the place and ultimately took it completely over, with Selene being the one that had to move out) after their relationship has fizzled out, Howard barely acknowledges her presence and says some typical phony cliché bullshit about how they should remain friends. Needless to say, that never happened and the two went their separate ways without ever looking back. It is dubious as to whether the two ever even really loved one another in the first place as indicated in Selene's confused confession, "There really were a few moments that I felt both of us felt something. I don't know if it was love...but something. Maybe that was why he could infuriate me so much...because I felt he was trying so hard to cancel out those moments...so afraid to just let them be." Selene does not seem to realize that people that are truly in love do not have to question it, as they feel it, thought it is clear that she took the relationship more serious than her less than devoted ex-beau, who was cheating on her with a chick named Robin while they were still together. After the credits scene concludes in The Mozart Bird, the viewer is treated to an extra scene where Selene and Howard bump into one another at a bar. Howard is now a successful novelist and absolutely infuriates Selene by proudly letting her know that he has "immortalized" her by using her likeness for one of the characters of his latest hit novel. Indeed, in the end it becomes clear that their relationship was ultimately nothing more than research for Howard's book. Of course, when Howard got successful, he no longer needed Selene anymore, as he was able to obtain much younger and hotter babes. Needless to say, Selene gets a little bit bitchy when Howard introduces her to his new hot young Guido girlfriend. In a singularly memorable ending, The Mozart Bird concludes in somber yet completely cathartic fashion with Irish singer Roz George (aka Rosalind George) appearing from the back of the bar and walking towards the camera while singing a lament with the biting lyrics, "...my thoughts shall be with you."

After watching The Mozart Bird, I can only see it as baffling that anyone could interpret the film as being in any way misogynistic, as the male (anti)hero ultimately comes out looking like a soulless parasite and psychic vampire that drains women of their emotions and exploits their vulnerability just so that he can have material for his hack novels. Indeed, what male would not appreciate a woman that was able to fall in love with a man that did not care about money. Despite the somewhat sullen and somber tone of the film, I often-times found myself laughing, especially during the borderline graphic sex scenes which, although fairly realistic as demonstrated by Selene's completely sweaty sex-drenched body and the numerous shots of the characters going down on each other, would probably turn off most viewers, especially those expecting some sort of pseudo-chic Radley Metzger-esque fuck flick. Kaganof must have found an excellent folly artist, as I have never heard such loud and scratchy 'slurps' during blowjob scenes before, as if the female lead was performing fellatio on a metal pipe covered in cum. In an assumed attempt to mock the contrived naturalism of certain avant-garde filmmakers, Kaganof included a number of extended under lit scenes lasting upwards of ten minutes where virtually nothing can be seen. As his short The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man (1994) demonstrates, Kaganof is a master of mise-en-scène and would not shoot such an exceedingly underexposed scene unless it was completely intentional. Indeed, from the ritualistic cunnilingus scenes to the barside Celtic laments, everything about The Mozart Bird is carefully calculated to the point of cryptic self-deprecation where Kaganof mocks his own dialogue and previous 'romance' flick Kyodai Makes the Big Time. Described as 'Last Tango in Amsterdam' by various reviewers upon its original release and described by Kaganof himself as an installment in his "urban wasteland serial," the work does what most similarly themed European arthouse works fail to do by expressing the cold hard truth regarding empty relationships based on soulless sex, pathological posturing, and innate dishonesty as personified in shallow characters that cannot even be honest with themselves, let alone a lover. Surely, more so than Bernardo Bertolucci's somewhat overrated Brando vehicle, The Mozart Bird eloquently expresses the death of true selfless love and romance in Europa, which is surely not surprising for a corpse of a continent that hates itself and has become more or less a tourist attraction/museum for the United States and a colony of the third world and lazy western expatriates. Notably, the film also playfully pokes fun at the fact that the two protagonists are leeches of the Dutch welfare state whose own romance is literally 'funded' through the generosity of the patronizingly liberal Dutch (as an expatriate himself, Kaganof probably knew this all too well). After all, had the characters actually had to work, they probably would not have had time to waste on dead-end romances and banal intellectual twaddle. Despite being carefully marinated in melancholy and cynicism, The Mozart Bird is ultimately a work that somewhat surprisingly concludes with a sort of Bressonian catharsis that reaches its zenith during Ms. George's haunting lament, which is certainly something that cannot usually be said of most real-life relationships.

THE MOZART BIRD

-Ty E

TEN MONOLOGUES FROM THE LIVES OF THE SERIAL KILLERS
TEN MONOLOGUES FROM THE LIVES OF THE SERIAL KILLERS

Aryan Kaganof* (1994)

Although most individuals would probably not notice it upon a first superficial glance, South African auteur Aryan Kaganof has a somewhat of an ironic, and arguably even an oxymoronic full name. Everyone knows the sort of negative connotations that come tagged along with the ancient word “Aryan” but the surname Kaganoff – meaning descended from a ‘Kohen’ (aka Jewish priest) – is a tad less obvious. Of course, Aryan Kaganof uses the word “Aryan” in the sense of the original Sanskrit meaning (derived from ‘ārya’) of being “noble” and his version of Kaganoff is missing the last letter as if he is one letter short of being descended from the ancient aristocratic Jewish priesthood but his new self-invented name (apparently created after first meeting with his biological father) is interesting nonetheless. While still working under his original birth name Ian Kerkof, the subversive white South African artist completed his first feature-length film Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers (1994); a work as aesthetically ironic as the name the filmmaker would later adopt. Although comprised of around ten monologues from serial killers (some are from fictional works and mere non-serial killer criminals like Charles Manson), I found Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers to be a relaxing and soothing cinematic affair that never left me remotely shocked nor disgusted as one would expect from the film’s title and dvd cover art. In fact, I found the most obnoxious and repellant aspect of Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers to be the inclusion of the Jeffrey Dahmer-inspired Geto Boys song “Murder Avenue” but that is for my own Eurocentric aesthetic reasons and not because I was offend by any sort of bodily dismemberment or what have you. Sure, the film features a scene of Mr. Kaganof himself jerking off to an unintentionally hilarious monologue of Ted Bundy complaining about the supposedly nefarious influence of pornography and slasher films, yet this scene still manages to hold a certain spiritual transcendence (albeit, in a peculiar away).

Aside from including monologues from such charismatic quasi-carny criminal heavyweights as Ted Bundy, Edmund Kemper, and Charles Manson, Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers also features lucid literary monologues from the likes of J.G. Ballard and Henry Rollins. I found the Rollins monologue especially interesting as I have always found his writings to be the odious expressions of a barely articulate meathead with a soft side and Kaganof makes surprisingly good use of these wretchedly written works. Recently, I viewed a post-popularity video (during one of his various TV commentary cameos) of Rollins mocking singer Morrissey and the British in general, so I was extra thrilled to see a little limey lunatic fellow act out the anti-Anglo ex-Blag-Flag-singer-turned-goofy-minor-mainstream-media-celebrity’s early borderline-psychopathic writings. Kaganof almost managed to do the seemingly impossible by turning an excerpt from J.G. Ballard's novel Atrocity Exhibition into a vivid ole thyme Negro spiritual. The first monologue of Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers is of a matricidal fellow named Mr. Kemper who naturally has mommy issues and has no problem admitting so, even if he does seem a tad bit apathetic while speaking about it in a most monotonously monotone manner. To his credit, this 6'9" tall and 300 pound mommy-killer does give evidence that he is somewhat respectful of his lady kin when after mentioning how he decapitated her, he sentimentally states that he "came out of her vagina" thus by killing her, he "went back in." After watching Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers, I must admit that I felt no ill will towards any killer, rapist, nor ex-punk icon featured within, and for that, Aryan Kaganof must be commended.

Before David Cronenberg ever directed a somewhat loose cinematic adaptation of J.G. Ballard's Crash, Aryan Kaganof already included a homoerotic excerpt from the novel in Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers, but, of course, the South African filmmaker's portrayal of the same material is figuratively and literally from another continent. Starting with a solid black blank screen and eventually sporadically weaving various excerpts (in a manner more erratic than the most ADHD-driven of Soviet montages) from other monologues in Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers, Kaganof's brief adaptation of Ballard's Crash seems like what a madman's would see if his whole life flashed before him as he died. More than just serial killers, the film is also a peculiar and sometimes absurdist celebration of the marriage between life, death, and sex in a most aesthetically tantalizing yet oftentimes schizophrenic way. I seriously doubt any viewer will go into viewing Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers with certain postulations and having a single one of those expectations met. Not only is the film an ambiguous and idiosyncratic look at the minds and visions of serial killers; Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers is also a warped but wonderful audio/visual roller-coaster through the doors of hopelessly damaged and deranged perception. For more info on Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers and director Aryan Kaganof, please visit: kaganof.com/

-Ty E

THE DEAD MAN 2: RETURN OF THE DEAD MAN
THE DEAD MAN 2: RETURN OF THE DEAD MAN

Aryan Kaganof* (1994)

As far as I am concerned, only one film has ever come close to capturing the perturbing perversity and grating lyrical grotesquery of French quasi-Nietzschean novelist Georges Bataille and it happens to be a short student film directed by South African auteur Aryan Kaganof (when he still used his birth name Ian Kerkhof) as his graduate project at the Netherlands Film and Television Academy. Of course, having just won the coveted 'Golden Calf' award (the Dutch equivalent to the Oscar) for his minimalistic 16mm low-budget avant-garde debut feature Kyodai Makes The Big Time (1992) at the 1992 Netherlands Film Festival (NFTVA), Kaganof was no uncultivated amateur in his formative years but a shockingly mature auteur with a distinct and uncompromising vision who had almost singlehandedly started an aesthetic revolution in Dutch Cinema and with his aesthetically brazen and even pornographic yet penetratingly phantasmagorical and ominously oneiric 26-minute Bataille adaptation The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man (1994) demonstrating he played by no set of aesthetic rules, let alone cinematic ones. Loosely yet poetically adapted from stories by Bataille—Madame Edwarda (1941), which was published under the pseudonym 'Pierre Angélique,' and the posthumously released story Le Mort (1967) aka The Dead Man—Kaganof's The Dead Man 2, unlike Peggy Ahwesh and Keith Sanborn's rather formulaic adaptation The Deadman (1987) does not take a cold and calculating literal approach to its superlatively sordid source material, but instead opts for capturing its (anti)erotic essence, while also uniquely updating it for the post-industrial/pre-apocalyptic age of Occidental decay. Indeed, featuring feces-frosted fags vomiting on each other in debasing delight, a subterranean bar inhabited by seemingly decaying freaks where the only thing there to drink is urine straight out of the urethra of sub-homely 'water sports'-inclined shebitches, skulls and skeletons lie on the beach as if the sole remnants of a nuclear holocaust, and an ostensibly 'dead' man in metaphysical pandemonium achieves temporary solace in a golden shower. Featuring a 'musical' score by Japanese noise musician Merzbow, who Kaganof would collaborate with on no less than three other films (la séquence des barres parallèles, Signal to Noise, and Beyond Ultra Violence: Uneasy Listening by Merzbow), The Dead Man II is an aesthetically aberrant celluloid necrology for a long senile rotting corpse of civilization in ruins where death-wishing scatological raunchiness has replaced love-based reproduction, revitalizing water has been replaced with toxic human waste, immaculate natural beauty has been eclipsed by defiling ugliness, and love has been ravaged by hate.

Beginning with a grotesque scat-covered sodomite taking the sweaty testicles of another grotesque scat-covered sodomite into his mouth as if he had mistaken the beans for the beef, The Dead Man II immediately assaults the viewer with a fiercely foul form of idiosyncratic aesthetic terrorism upon the viewer's mind that no amount of hard narcotics nor brain damage will ever erase, even though the two fucked fellows begin to joke after the entire scene is over with, as if they themselves are fully aware of their decided depravity and want to shrug it off with a simple laugh. Of course, the two discernibly deviant dick-stabbers, who look like they're squatting in Jeffrey Dahmer's damp dungeon basement in hell, do not stop there as one demands the other to, "give me your fucking puke" and indeed he does with the sort of enthusiastic gusto one would expect from a soccer hooligan (and judging by the physiques of these two deranged dudes, I would not be surprised if they were soccer hooligans). While the one fine fellow regurgitates, his fellow fecal felon comrade masturbates to the point of ejaculation, thereupon leaving a putrid puddle of vomit, semen, and shit on the already sickeningly soiled floor of the dark abyss-like room. From there, the viewer witnesses buildings in flames with real children being burned up in actual stock footage from the so-called 'Waco Siege' (aka Waco Massacre) of 1993 when the ATF/FBI raided a compound owned by the Branch Davidians in a standoff that lasted for 51 days and that ended in the deaths of 76 men, women, and children, including would-be-messiah David Koresh, and that would ultimately inspire the perpetrators of the Oklahoma City bombing that took place exactly two years later. Enter the 'Dead Man' (played by Dutch veteran actor Jaap Hoogstra, who starred in everything from Paul Verhoeven's Keetje Tippel (1975) to feminist pseudo-erotic-thriller swill like Marleen Gorris' Gebroken spiegels (1984) aka Broken Mirrors). As to whether or not the 'Dead Man' is literally dead or not is irrelevant as his life has been clearly exhausted of all potential and his dreams have been replaced with a nightmare, which his rather rotund yet pale and corpse-like body completely complements. Aside from a little lady who he gets to practice his affinity for urophilia with and become a human urinal for at the conclusion of The Dead Man 2, the dead man does not communicate with nor actively acknowledge any of the people who he comes into contact with, as if he is a ghost who is in denial that anyone can see him.

From the shadows of a seemingly bottomless pit of nothingness upon nothingness, the Dead Man slowly enters a bar that seems like a cross between the most semen-stained of Weimar cabarets and the favorite dive of the proto-deathrock figures of Dutch Renaissance man Frans Zwartjes' films. Upon taking a seat in the virtual saloon from virtual post-apocalyptic Sodom, the Dead Man is approached by an old butch blonde bitch named Madame Edwarda—the eponymous prostitute character of Bataille's 1941 story of the same name whose vagina is described as a "loathsome squid," among countless other unsavory things—who flashes her absolutely odious genitals in the old geezer's face and demonically declares, "I am God," but she receives no response from her deranged declaration. From there, the building in flames once again appears and then the film cuts back to the netherworld bar, where all the patrons begin to stare at the Dead Man as if they expect something from him, but instead of the old fellow communicating with these awfully impolite freaks, a young yet rather physically unappealing woman begins to urinate off a table as if beer was on tap from her bald beaver. The next scene, which is so overexposed that one can barely make out what is going on, the viewer witnesses two lovers (one of whom is presumably the Dead Man when he was young) kissing on the beach, but the happy romantic moment is short lived as skulls and bones are soon revealed lying on the beach. Whether a nuclear apocalypse of sorts incinerated these lovers remains to be seen, but with the next scene being comprised of grungy green post-industrial factories, it certainly seems like Israel has finally let loose their Golem on the world. From there, the Dead Man sits in the backseat of a car going through a car wash as two lecherous lovers make violent love in the front seats. Back at the decadent bar, a sort of lounge act trio of women dressed up like the Goddess Kali—the Hindi mother goddess of Time, Change, and Destruction—give a performance while two old lovers do a dance of death. After the dance, the Dead Man, who seems to be in a most worried and melancholy state, cries out the name ‘Marie’ and an image of a young woman flashes quickly on the screen that the viewer assumes is a great love from the elderly walking corpse’s young days. In the end, the Dead Man meekly yet rapturously drinks what seems to be gallons of urine that is being pissed on his face by a woman standing over him, as if he is drinking from the fountain of youth.

THE DEAD MAN 2: RETURN OF THE DEAD MAN

Due to my somewhat marginal interest in Georges Bataille, I have seen virtually any film related to the novelist’s work and The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man is the only one that manages to stand on its own without seeming like it is riding on the laurels of the source writer’s fame as an ‘artistically merited pornographer.’ Indeed, Belgian auteur Patrick Longchamps’ Simona (1974)—a work based on Bataille’s Histoire de l’oeil (1928) aka Story of the Eye—is quite beautiful in many ways and Laura Antonelli’s performance does not hurt, but it is best to watch the film without the source material in mind because otherwise it seems like a shallow literary adaptation at best. As I mentioned before, Peggy Ahwesh and Keith Sanborn’s The Deadman is an abject pseudo-avant-garde joke that seeks to be provocative but wallows in banality and Andrew Repasky McElhinney’s Story of the Eye (2004) is even worse as a putrid piece of pseudo-punk porn poser trash that is not even worthy of Bataille’s postmortem feces. Additionally, Ma mere (2004) aka My Mother starring Isabelle Huppert and Louis Garrel and co-produced by Bernard-Henri Lévy (!) is the typical shallow French ‘erotic arthouse’ con. With its misleading title (of course, Kaganof never directed a The Dead Man 1) that inspires images of C-grade slasher schlock in the viewer’s mind, The Dead Man 2 is a work that downplays its seriousness and aesthetic prowess if anything and had Bataille seen the film himself he would have probably been flattered that he inspired such unhinged, if not hermetic, celluloid scatology. If The Dead Man 2 is offensive in any way, it is not due to its un-simulated scenes of vile sods covered in shit stroking their sausages in vomit, nor haggard looking whores pissing in men's mouths, but rather due to the elegance which Kaganof brought in terms of directing these scenes, thus making the auteur a sort of cinematic alchemist of sorts who turns literal and figurative shit into celluloid gold. Regarding The Dead Man 2, auteur Kaganof once stated, "I like to aim for the stomach. If I can't feel a film, feel it very viscerally, then I don't really believe it. Perhaps that has something to do with coming from South Africa, which is a very visceral place. [...] I love the idea of managing to shift a viewer's state of consciousness by creating an out-of-film experience within film. I don't know if it always succeeds but that is definitely what I'm after." Indeed, I would go so far as stating that the perverse poetry of The Dead Man 2 is more innate and organic than that of the source material and, in that sense, I think the film is closer to Teutonic expressionist poet Gottfried Benn—a medical doctor by profession who dealt firsthand with the venereal diseases, death, and decay he wrote about—than Monsieur Bataille.

-Ty E

NICE TO MEET YOU, PLEASE DON'T RAPE ME!
NICE TO MEET YOU, PLEASE DON'T RAPE ME!

Aryan Kaganof* (1995)

I am not exactly sure of the exact idiosyncratic socio-political Weltanschauung that South African auteur Aryan Kaganof (Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers, Beyond Ultra Violence: Uneasy Listening by Merzbow) has assembled for himself over the years as testified by his thematically complex and ever-changing oeuvre, but I feel that I have found a kindred spirit of sorts in his films, namely because he clearly does what he wants artistically, no matter what the consequences may be. Indeed, with his lovingly titled work Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! (1996), Kaganof caused such a spectacle at the Pan-African Film Festival in Ouagadougou—the largest and most important film festival on the dark continent—that about 900 of the spectators left the venue after being deeply offended by the film and its semi-surreal depiction of white-on-black homosexual forced entry. Advertised with the endlessly endearing tag-line, “From the country that gave you apartheid, now the world’s first rape musical...,” Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! aka Confession of a Yeoville Rapist is a fiercely fucked filmic farce of the patently politically incorrect and catchy musical sort that follows three professional multicultural rapists—a Negro, Jew (actually, Kaganof did not mean for this character to be of the Hebraic faith but most reviewers assume he is and I think the film works more effectively if looked at from that perspective), and Englishman—who have been ordered by a South African cabinet minister to bring total equality to the rainbow nation by overcoming ‘rape prejudice’ and transforming the country into a place full of equal opportunity rapists. Indeed, while a deeply and intrinsically South African work that was shot on location in Yeoville, Johannesburg between April 26 and 28 in 1994 during the three days of the first democratic election held in South Africa, which inevitably resulted in Nelson Mandela becoming the first black president of the country, Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! is also relevant to Europe, America, and the rest of the ex-European colonies in that it depicts a world where all races and creeds are ‘equal’ in terms of spiritual slavery and metaphysical rape as carefully carried out by a homogenizing system run by international bankers and other globalist entities. Of course, whether they want to admit it or not, one of the first things most Americans think (aside from AIDS, Mandela, apartheid, etc.) when they hear the words ‘South Africa’ is rape and in Kaganof’s film, sexual pillaging is the country’s sole growth industry and everyone is in on it, including heebs, nig-nogs, and bitchy Brit twits. A disturbingly prophetic, if not singularly comedic, work, Nice to Meet you, Please Don't Rape Me! features a whacked-out world where rape has become all the rage in SA, yet Kaganof’s depiction of human depravity seems rather tame when one considers the facts regarding contemporary South Africa and its epidemic rape problem. Indeed, rape has gotten so bad in South Africa since the film's initial release two decades ago that a piece of untermensch filth actually raped two female paramedics in 2010 while they were attending to the wounds of a burnt toddler, which is a scenario that is as unbelievably absurd as those in Kaganof's marvelously maniacal melodic musical. Powered by the devilishly catchy title theme song "Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me" as sung by a vicious vag-terrorizing trio, the film is nowhere near as ugly as it sounds and is quite arguably Kaganof's most accessible work, as a playful piece that uses Hollywood genre conventions against themselves, ultimately not only 'reverse-raping' rape culture, but also the mass media (in interviews, Kaganof has described the campaign by mainstream liberals to censor dark realities in SA as "the new Stalinism"), globalization, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the pernicious philanthropy of white European liberals, and the sappy delusions of idealistic mainstream leftist morons who thought that Mandela would solve all of South Africa's seemingly perennial problems. Originally planning to make a documentary on hatred against women in SA, Kaganof interviewed 15 rapists and 15 rape victims about their experiences, ultimately deciding that the nonfictional film format was too inadequate for getting his message across, thus siring something completely different, Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me!, which is quite arguably the only film that will make you 'LOL' at rape and South Africa's total deluge into sub-barbarism.

As Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! reveals in an almost sadistically satirical fashion, sexual ravagement is a booming industry in South Africa and is only going to rise with a vengeance with the election of the first black president, so 'progressive' politicians seek to recruit professional rapist soldiers to diversify sexual sadism in the country to make it a true rainbow nation of colorful involuntary coitus. Indeed, a fellow that goes by the title 'Cabinet Minister' (Bill Curry) meets up with a three-man multicultural brigade of rapists at a restaurant and tells them that in South Africa, a rape occurs "every 83 seconds but that simply is not good enough" and that they need to make sure that at least one rape occurs every single minute. The Cabinet Minister then unleashes the following objective to his trio of rapists: "We have to take in cognizance the changing norms and values of society. Indeed, we have to be two steps ahead of the game...always have and always will [...] What I'm saying to you is...your mandate for the future will be to rape everybody regardless of race, sex, creed, color, gender, sex preference, height, looks, qualifications...it simply doesn't matter anymore. Continued funding for our organization by NGOs and the IMF will heavily rely on your total desire to overcome rape prejudice and to see to it that this country becomes a country of equal opportunity rapists." Naturally, the revelation of 'total rape' brings total joy to the three special serial rapists and they leave the restaurant together singing the following lyrics in broad daylight like good little politically correct globalist cattle: "Well, we'll rape you when you're walking on the street...we'll rape you when you're trying to keep your seat..We'll rape you when you're trying to make a buck [...] we'll rape you when you're playing your guitar...but I would not feel all afraid because everybody must get raped...everybody must get raped...everybody must get raped...everybody must get raped...everybody must get raped." Indeed, not only will these men rape an eclectic collection of individuals, but also rape each other, as diversified rape is akin to spiritual divinity in a multicultural land where a rampant rape culture trumps true social order and racial harmony.

NICE TO MEET YOU, PLEASE DON'T RAPE ME!

As Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! progresses, one learns that the trinity of sexual terror might be in solidarity when it comes to indiscriminate rape, but they have little in common otherwise and even begin raping each other—both literally and metaphorically—in what can be described as a sort of metaphysical cannibalism. Going simply by the names Rapiŝt #1 (Eric Miyeni), Rapiŝt #2 (Matthew Oats), and Rapiŝt #3 (Gustav Geldenhuis), the crooning rape soldiers are more like archetypes than real individuals. Indeed, Rapiŝt #1 is a black, Rapiŝt #2 is a white Englishman, and Rapiŝt #3, who acts as the sort of unofficial leader of the group, is a SA Jew (it should be noted that many Jews played a prominent role in the anti-apartheid movement, with Marxist Jew Joe Slovo being a longtime friend/ally of Nelson Mandela who became the 'Minister for Housing' of Mandela's 'democratic' government in 1994). As depicted early on in the film, the terrible threesome abduct white women (which are actually white mannequins, as Kaganof opted for not using real women, so as to not 'excite' certain viewers with realistic portrayals of rape) at gunpoint and then proceed to ritualistically rape them as a militant and specially organized team. Indeed, after kidnapping a chick from her car at gunpoint in a parking garage, the merry melody-making men carry their inanimate victim to the rooftop of a gas station and Rapiŝt #3 proceeds to symbolically cover his white victim's body with black tar (after all, with the end of apartheid, all South Africans are negroes now!) before he sexually savages her. The unhinged trinity also attend 'rapiŝt classes' where they are taught by a 'Feminist' (Winnie Ryall) about what does and does not constitute rape. For a test in class, the rape students must answer 'true' or 'false' to the following scenarios: 1. Women who go to bars alone ask to be raped. 2. A woman who does not report a rape immediately after it happens is lying or has behaved unreasonably. 3. Prostitutes cannot be raped. Instead of turning his test paper in, Rapiŝt #3 (who sits by himself, thus indicating his superior status over the other two rapiŝts) hands the Feminist a paper with the sentence, "A cunt is a hole and a hole is nothing" written on it. A rather stern but fair professor, the Feminist also examines her pupils' flaccid penises to see if they have the proper tools for the job (she gives special attention to black Rapiŝt #3's pecker). One night, Rapiŝt #3 forces Rapiŝt #2 to get drunk on beer, telling him, "You gotta love your own people before you change the world [...] One more for your ancestors," as the seemingly ethno-masochistic English man begins to tear up after suffering a 'psychological rape' of sorts as a result of having guilt due to his nation's leading role in colonialism and whatnot. Meanwhile, black Rapist #1 ritualistically rapes a white woman that is bound to a chair while sporting a mask of an old white Afrikaner politician in a rather symbolic scene. During the last major scene of Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me!, black Rapist #1 forces Jewish Rapist #3 to brutally whip and bugger him at gunpoint. While being beaten, black Rapist #1 yells, "teach me manners...teach me etiquette...teach me respect...civilize me...teach me to speak mother fucking English." Before taking a vanilla member in his pitch black nether-region, Rapist #1 pleads, "Give me what you think you've got to give me. Give me my freedom. Give it to me up the fucking ass." In the end, black Rapist #3 metaphorically bulldozes the fourth wall and states directly to the viewer: "I know you all just want to be victims. You fucking thrive on it...committed to your own slavery." Indeed, it is really the politically correct rapists who are the real slaves, as demonstrated by various scenes featured in the film of the three-some chained together naked. Not only are they self-deluding victims of their own nation's troubled history, but they must carry the burden of the metaphoric chains of that history into a dubious future where collective rape and genocide is more likely than any sort of real reconciliation amongst the black majority and declining white minority. In their political and spiritual impotence, the rapists take out their angst and hatred on the most defenseless and innocent of victims via rape, thus ironically strengthening the system that enslaved them in the first place.

In an interview conducted years after the release of Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me!, auteur Aryan Kaganof offered the following insights regarding his radical rape musical and the three actors that played the rapist leads: "I get letters from all three actors who are still to an extent dealing with the after effects of the openness with which they dealt with each other during the shooting. I think you can see that clearly in the final scene of the film in which the men are literally chained to each other: despite all the terrible stuff they have done to each other they still have to face the future together. It is a simple metaphor but I wanted it to be clear and I hope that South Africans get the opportunity to see the film. People have found the film extremely pessimistic... but for me it is about the insight that these people are bound together because of the appalling history that they share. So I see it as a hopeful film. Not a pleasant, but definitely an honest film." Of course, it has been two decades since Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! was created and rape, violent racial tensions, and government corruption have only got all the more ugly since the end of apartheid, especially for white Afrikaans, with the group Genocide Watch theorizing that recent attacks against white Boer farmers constitute early signs of an impending genocide against the dying European population. Indeed, aside from many whites being driven into abject poverty as a result of so-called 'Employment Equity' and 'Black Economic Empowerment' legislation, since 1994 when Mandela was elected as the first black president of South Africa, about 3,000 (out of a total 40,000) white farmers have been violently murdered by blacks, with a good percentage of these victims being raped and/or tortured before being killed, so it should be no surprise that many whites have opted for leaving the rainbow nation permanently. As for rape, sexual violence and child and infant rape (according to a 2001 report from the South African Police Service, children are the victims of 41 percent of all rapes in the country) in South Africa is now among the highest in the world, with an estimated 500,000 rapes occurring every single year, thus making Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! seem like all the more of a strangely 'optimistic,' if not equally darkly prophetic, work in retrospect. Indeed, with the aesthetic plague of mainstream trash propaganda movies like Zulu (2013) featuring American negroes like Forest Whitaker portraying black South Africans, Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! makes for a rare piece of honest and authentic South Africa cinema, which was Kaganof's objective as a filmmaker as demonstrated by his remark regarding the film in an interview: "I wanted people not to see South Africa in the political correct way, like the political parties that say "here's the problem, here's the solution". I have made a film of questions, a document that can make the audience think around what rape might imply, without giving any absolute answer. It's difficult to watch. But whomever you might be I know you will laugh once in a while [...] Political correctness doesn't treat the fact that we are human and that our emotions and sexuality were formed before we were given a political consciousness." An isolated piece of cinematic honesty in a psychologically plundered, Hollywoodized world drunk on spectacular delusion and p.c. puffery on worthless public figures and bogus philanthropic causes that merely obscure the real problems of South Africa, Kaganof's Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! is a rare voice of sardonic sanity that reminds one that the post-apartheid rainbow nation is not the magic multicultural place that Clint Eastwood, Matt Damon, and Morgan Freeman cowardly led you believe it was in the repugnant work of sentimentalist celluloid swill that is Invictus (2009), but a sexually and socially sadistic real-life dystopia run by a small 'minority' of modern day slave-masters and inhabited by forsaken slaves of the mind and soul who will not rest until they have raped themselves into oblivion.

NICE TO MEET YOU, PLEASE DON'T RAPE ME!

-Ty E

WASTED!

Aryan Kaganof* (1996)

Although he managed to survive through the desperation of the Second World War, my grandfather left his homeland of the Netherlands for America during the 1950s and about a decade later he paid a visit to his ancestral land, only to be thoroughly disgusted by how the country drastically degenerated into a culturally vacant vacation spot for Americans and other foreign libertines. That being said, who knows how my grandfather would have responded to South African auteur Aryan Kaganof's film Wasted! (1996) aka Naar de Klote!—a wanton work of digital video libertinage depicting the decidedly degenerate 'gabber' rave scene in Amsterdam and the parasitic people who flood it with drugs, most specifically ecstasy. The first filmmaker to ever shoot a feature-length work on a mere cell phone with his potent pimp flick SMS Sugar Man (2008), Kaganof (who was still going by his birth name 'Jan Kerkhof' at the time) achieved a similarly revolutionary work with his earlier film Wasted!—the very first film (or digital video 'non-film') to be shot on mini DV (but later blown up to 35mm film print), which ultimately made for the perfect medium for a work about spastic Dutch drug addicts and ravers with retarded dance moves in a reckless realm of moral morons, pathological materialism, and sheer and utter aesthetic vulgarity of the rainbow colored sort directed by an artistic renegade from the rainbow nation. A neo-neorealist flick for the ADD-riddled and dumb-downed digital age, Wasted! wastes no time in depicting a hysterical hurricane of senseless sex, drugs, and raving 'n' roofies as a socially deleterious dead end street of hapless Hollanders addicted to hyper hedonism of the less than gratifying sort that ruins lives and relationships, but never fills the inner void that inspires one to get involved with drugs and joyless sex in the first place. Of course, Wasted! is no prissy public service announcement nor a pedantic piece of plastic p.c. sermonizing, but a uniquely unflattering and unhinged digital work featuring a putrid potpourri of pompous euro-wiggers, ostensibly retarded revue raver whores with drag queen make-up, megalomaniacal middle-aged DJs suffering from Peter Pan syndrome, and ungrateful grownup beta-boys who are supported by their philandering, drug-dealing girlfriends, and other quasi-brain philistines who seem to be at the pre-party for the Occidental apocalypse. Set during the mid-1990s at the peak of the Dutch "gabber" (aka "early hardcore") electronic music movement and featuring related music by groups like De Euromasters (whose song "Alles naar de Klote" aka "Everything Wasted!" the film is named after), Party Animals, Flamman & Abraxas, and Deepzone, Wasted! would go on to be the biggest Dutch box office hit of 1996, thus illustrating the anti-culture degeneracy that has overtaken the Dutch in terms of the pseudo-Dionysian raver scene and its infectious influence of flying Dutchmen. Indeed, Wasted! is just another example of why Americans immediately think of prostitutes and potheads whenever the Netherlands, or more specifically Amsterdam, are mentioned, except Kaganof takes things further with effeminized cuckolds, XTC-dealing breadwinner broads, wacked-out white gangstas, and pill-popping teenage pranksters. Featuring a kaleidoscopic raver rainbow of kitschy 1990s imagery that is often blurred and from a frenzied first-person perspective, Wasted!—for better or worse—will have you decidedly drunken with deadbeat Dutch debauchery from its static beginning to its seizure-inducing end.

WASTED!

Jacqueline (Fem van der Elzen) is surrounded by weak and rather wasted males, including her boyfriend Martijn (Tygo Gernandt), who she financially supports, and her deadbeat drinking and driving alcoholic father, who needs to be bailed out of jail, so she must take things into her own hands and her meager store clerk job as a peddler of magic mushrooms and concert tickets is just not cutting it, so she decides to become an ecstasy dealer, which she seems to think is a good way to get rich quick, even if it comes at the price of her womanhood, personal dignity, romantic relationship, and virtually everything else in her life that has true intrinsic value. Jacqueline becomes a low level dealer for a Dutch wigger with a rather ridiculous Vanilla Ice-esque sideburns named JP (Hugo Metsers), a malicious and seemingly psychopathic would-be-gangster who wastes no time in trying to, quite literally, penetrate his female pusher. Of course, Jacqueline's less than ballsy boy toy Martijn suspects that the brazen jerk-off JP wants to get in his girlfriend's pants, especially after she begins spending a lot of time with the dickheaded drug dealer. Although Jacqueline initially rejects JP's conditional offer for her to be one of his pushers after he tells her that "standing in a shop is for wogs," she inevitably gives in, where she begins to make tons of cash by selling 50 pills a week, which she gets half the commission for. Naturally, when he is not watering his pot plant with beer or smashing beer cans against his head like an impotent hippie caveman, Martijn accuses Jacqueline of cheating on him with JP, which she inevitably does. When Martijn moves out of their shared apartment to live with a soulless slut who firmly believes "foreplay's for pensioners... shove it in," Jacqueline reacts rather hysterically by nonsensically flushing her ecstasy supply down the toilet. With neither the money nor drugs, Jacqueline ultimately gets in trouble with JP, whose slavish black assistant states of, "shit man, that white bitch. Let me redecorate her white face man, really," which has no effect on the drug-dealing, counterfeit black man. Luckily, JP has a bigger fish to fry in the form of a black rave club owner/houseparty host named Winston (Mike Libanon), who owes him a ton of money and will not answer his phone. Meanwhile, an aged DJ named Cowboy (played by popular Dutch actor Thom Hoffman of Lars von Trier's Dogville (2003) and Paul Verhoeven's Black Book (2006)) makes the near fatal mistake of hooking up with a ho named DD (Afke Reijnga) and offering her and a friend named Yoyo (Jorinde Moll) a one-off opportunity to DJ at the hottest rave club, which proves to have a disastrous effect on his career and life-renewing results for the little lecherous ladies, whose new-found popularity is solely the result of their sleazy and rather dubious sex appeal. Martjin also gets the grand beatdown of a lifetime by JP and his paper gangster goons, not long after the braggart of a drug dealer mentions his sexual conquests with Jacqueline. When finally confronting deadbeat Winston with weapons, the scared club owner pleads, "This is the real world, man...Not a Tarantino movie." In the end, a raver houseparty concludes with a dead club owner, a has-been DJ passed out in a gutter, a tacky red sports car turned into a piece of junkyard scrap by a bunch of "wasted" soccer hooligans and ravers, and proof that love ultimately conquers all, at least for now. What the two lascivious love birds of Wasted! learn during their ill-fated fling in the raver realm is that mindless self-indulgence of the sexual and mind-altering sort has a very short expiration date before it starts to rot the body and soul, or as director Aryan Kaganof himself once stated in an interview, "My films are cultural criticisms in the shape of commercial films. If a youth once experiences XTC, he'll end up in speed. What I wanted to say in the film was that the first XTC is the best of all, but the last speed is the worst."

In many ways a revolutionary and (anti)cinematically subversive work, Wasted! went on to inspire Argentinean auteur Gaspar Noé, who has referenced Kaganof's flick in the past and its influence is quite apparent in the filmmaker's neo-psychedelic epic Enter the Void (2009)—an experimental first-person perspective feature about a DMT-addled American drug dealer whose forsaken soul floats around a hypnotically colorful kaleidoscopic Tokyo, Japan after he is killed as a result of his treacherous friend ratting him out to the police. And, indeed, Wasted! is, quite thankfully, "not a Tarantino movie" as it is not a preposterous piece of masturbatory postmodern fanboy posturing, but a penetrating piece of neo-realist surrealism that manages to transfer the viewer to the decadent Dutch rave world without having to suffer from a hangover and some sort of pesky STD. As director Kaganof once stated himself regarding Wasted!, "see my film and you don't need drugs...", which hopefully will be the case for most viewers after witnessing the would-be-charismatic conmen and dimwitted druggie dumbasses that make up the characters, but something tells me that these things would appeal to a good percentage of audiences. With Wasted!, Kaganof fits in a couple political messages, especially in a scene featuring a Nelson Mandela painting owned by Winston, which symbolically has a safe behind it that hides the character's 'cash money.' Indeed, while Marxist messiah Mandela argued for a Commie Utopia of sorts with South Africa, his 'revolution' was a rather soft one and now, as recently reported by the South African online news resource News24, the ex-terrorist turned sentimental SA president's children and grandchildren are currently active in over 110 companies and are raking in the millions, which is a far cry for the classless society their prestigious patriarch incessantly sermonized about. Additionally, it should be noted that JP's gang-banger buddy is nothing but an Uncle Tom, who despite stating racially charged verbal vomit against whites in front of his racially Aryan boss, ultimately takes orders from his wigger commander who gets to pretend to be black while retaining the airs of an audaciously arrogant white capitalist, even using words like "nigger" and killing a fellow black brother in front of his subservient African employee. Quite inexplicably, the "gabber" music scene portrayed in Kaganof's film would sire a neo-fascist subculture despite the fact that many of the DJs are non-white, which might explain why a bunch of skinheaded gentlemen destroy jack-off JP's swag-mobile and beat both him and his nefarious Negro friend at the conclusion of Wasted!. Undoubtedly, as a man who felt Elvis Presley was a degenerate (or so he told my grandmother due to her affinity for the King's music), my grandfather—who hated Germans (like most Dutch people do) because of the Second World War—would have probably wished his nation was permanently taken over by the Third Reich rather than seeing it become the modern Nordic Sodom and Gomorrah it is today as portrayed in Wasted!; a work that even transcends the subversive films of assassinated auteur Theo van Gogh (Blind Date, 06/05) in terms of its uncompromising and daunting portrayal of contemporary Dutch debauchery and the self-prophesying suicide of the Occident.

WASTED!

-Ty E

SYLVIA KRISTEL, JAREN LATER...

Aryan Kaganof* (1998)

I'm neither a fag nor feminist but when I hear the name of Dutch sexploitation diva Sylvia Kristel of Emmanuelle fame, the only thing I can think of is a totally tragic woman who, due to her rather heartbreaking background, allowed herself to be used and abused by the more sleazy and less than artistically inclined fellows working in the cinema world. Undoubtedly as avant-garde auteur turned cult filmmaker Curtis Harrington, who worked with her on the botched biopic Mata Hari (1985), makes reference to in his memoir Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013), Kristel was a less than talented actress with some serious problems that involved a lot of self-destructive drug use and debasing herself with ugly old men. Indeed, as she revealed in her autobiography Nue aka Nude aka Undressing Emmanuelle: A Memoir, Kristel, not unlike so many porn stars and so-called 'sex workers,' was the victim of molestation as a child, which happened when she was only 9-years-old after a predatory elderly hotel guest decided to have his way with her. Arguably more traumatic than even being molested, Kristel never got over the fact that her father abandoned her family when she was 14, later stating of the event, "It was the saddest thing that ever happened to me." Like many other women that suffered similar circumstances, Kristel would spend the rest of her life looking for a father figure, hence her affairs with much older men like Belgian author and filmmaker Hugo Claus and English actor Ian McShane, among various others. Unquestionably, the only film I can think of where Kristel gives a genuinely decent performance is Polish auteur Walerian Borowczyk's absurdly underrated work La marge (1976) aka The Margin aka The Streetwalker aka Emmanuelle 77 where she plays a melancholy Parisian prostitute who starts a doomed love affair with lapsed Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro. While both Kristel and Dallesandro predictably bare their bodies in Borowczyk's work, they ultimately give performances that inspire more pity than scopophilic pleasure, hence why the film was probably such a commercial failure upon its release. Undoubtedly, if there is any film that dares to depict the sad and tragic essence of Kristel in an endlessly empathetic, if not somewhat subtle and even somewhat 'strange,' fashion that hardly reminds the viewer she is the ultimate alpha-diva of Euro-trash sexploitation, it is South African auteur Aryan Kaganof's experimental documentary short Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... (1998) aka Sylvia Kristel, Years Later... starring the Emmanuelle star herself, as well as Dutch novelist Oscar van den Boogaard.

In tribute to Kristel's opening for her first exhibition of oil paintings, Kaganof created an installation that involved a room within a room where no more than 18 people were confronted with a 23-minute video of edited sound and image on a continuous loop. Among other things, Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... is a sort of archive to this event, which Kaganof described as follows: "More than merely an homage to Madame Kristel, the piece becomes a meditation on the experience of watching. The gaze is interrogated and revealed as not merely a function of sight, but as always being reliant on the ears and memory in order to generate meaning. The emotional impact of the piece is dependent upon the particular relationship between sound and image at any given point, constantly in flux, always organic, soulful and heartfelt." While Kaganof is no stranger to erotically explicit imagery as his works like The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man (1994), Shabondama Elegy (1999) aka Tokyo Elegy, Pale Blue Eyes (2002), and Dirty Girl in Velvet (2008), among countless others, demonstrate, Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... is Kristel at her least sexually exposed yet arguably most intimate in a somewhat arcane and poetic work that ultimately depicts an internally wounded woman with a pathological need for male approval. Indeed, Kaganof's meta-homage depicts the 'unclad' woman behind the wantonness in an almost oneiric and narcotizing fashion that makes the viewer feel as if they are trapped in a bubble of the diva's perennial loneliness. After a nearly five minute long title sequence that juxtaposes slow-motion footage of Kristel and various other images, including a skull, with the haunting and equally hypnotic song "Ghoſtyhead" by Rickie Lee Jones, Dutch novelist Oscar van den Boogaard is featured riding a public bus to the big event. After spending some equality time with Kristel, van den Boogaard concludes the film by sitting at a bus stop in a scene that seems to reflect the fact that the novelist has gotten no closer to the actress, even after spending a day in the company of her and her art.

SYLVIA KRISTEL, JAREN LATER...

The majority of Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... is comprised of muted film scenes and photos of and paintings by the eponymous starlet, who clearly looks much different since her days as the title character of the Emmanuelle films, hence why an inter-title reading "Jaren Later" (aka "Years Later") oftentimes randomly appears on the screen. Instead of engaging in silly salacious sex scenes with attractive playboys, diplomats, and lipsticks lesbians like she is best known for, Kristel's only acts of intimacy in Kaganof's film involve the actress embracing and conversing with van den Boogaard, who is hardly a stud. Juxtaposed with these muted film scenes and paintings/images are words narrated by Kristel herself, who repeats lines that seem to be taken from Brigitte Bardot's character at the beginning of Jean-Luc Godard's Le Mėpris (1963) aka Contempt. Indeed, after softly stating, "In search of her, who is in search of herself. Very slow...whispering," Kristel narrates to an unseen man, "I recently had a dream. A strange dream. We were together. You, and me. We lay together in a bed. Do you love my feet, you asked. I said: yes, I love your feet." For a good portion of the rest of the film, Kristel asks similar questions and then answers them like, "And my buttocks, do you love my buttocks? I love your buttocks very much, I said. Your buttocks are gorgeous." While Kaganof's intent with these scenes is questionable, I interpreted them as reflecting that Kristel's acting career was based on her deep and dark desire to seek approval from men, namely those that reminded her of her father. After all, it takes a special sort of woman to be willing to expose her unclad body to thousands of people from around the world, but of course it is doubtful that many men thought about this while they were jerking off to Emmanuelle.

Undoubtedly, Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... has an unintentionally eerily foreboding tone to much of it in that it features the titular diva smiling and chatting with van den Boogaard while smoking the same unfiltered cigarettes that would ultimately cut her life short after she contracted throat cancer in 2001 and eventually perished on October 18, 2012 at the premature age of 60 from esophageal and lung cancer. Kristel began smoking at the tender age of 11 and one can only speculate as to whether or not her addiction had the same source as what inspired her to become one of Europe's most prized softcore porn stars. While Kaganof is not himself Dutch, I think it is important that Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... features Kristel speaking in Dutch and was made in the Netherlands, as it reflects one of the many aspects of the actress that her so-called 'fans' are probably unaware of. Indeed, I would be interested to know how many men who have choked their chicken to Madame Kristel know that she was a Dutch dame, even if she lacked what one might describe as archetypical Dutch beauty, as she was a fairly short brunette and certainly not a towering blonde bombshell. Avant-garde filmmaker Cyrus Frisch, who attended the same Dutch film academy as Kaganof, would later have Kristel portray a cracked out anti-diva in his debut Vergeef me (2001) aka Forgive me. Indubitably, while Frisch's film seems to make a mockery of Kristel by portraying her as more or less the equivalent of a used-up old whore, Kaganof's film attempts to expose her real essence in a somewhat hermetic way that totally transcends a simple film tribute. While Kaganof has sometimes been called a misogynist, including by his own friend Jeremy Dowson in a review of his work The Mozart Bird (1993), Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... ultimately demonstrates such a striking sympathy for its somewhat forsaken female subject that one might assume it was made for his mother or grandmother. Indeed, the film might only be 23-minutes long and rendered in a hopelessly avant-garde form, but Kaganof's little tribute probably pays greater tribute to Sylvia Kristel than all of the actress' other films combined. As someone who has never found her particularly enticing, I think that Sylvia Kristel, Jaren Later... gets to the true beauty of Kristel and it is not pretty.

-Ty E

RON ATHEY: TROJAN WHORE /& IT'S SCRIPTED
RON ATHEY: TROJAN WHORE /& IT'S SCRIPTED

Aryan Kaganof* (1999)

Ron Athey—a somewhat muscular and fit fellow covered from head to toe with tattoos and self-carved battle scars—is a strange American man whose rather unconventional career as a HIV positive ‘extreme performance artist’ (aka he sheds contaminated blood in a superlatively (sado)masochistic manner for aberrant adoring audiences) I have been following somewhat unintentionally for about a decade or so. I first discovered Athey due to my long interest in the music and art of Rozz Williams (lead singer of the deathrock/goth group Christian Death and co-director of the S&M serial killer flick Pig (1998)) as the two subversive sodomite lovers (Athey lived with Rozz at the time) used to collaborate on the industrial music project Premature Ejaculation in the early 1980s. Through Premature Ejaculation, Athey first demonstrated his perverse prowess as a performance artist by eating a dead cat on stage in 1981. Most infamously, Athey hit the media spotlight in 1994 when Republican senator Jesse Helms accused the poof performance artist of exposing audience members to tainted blood during a show entitled Four Scenes in a Harsh Life at the Walker Art Center in Minneapolis that was partially (and hilariously!) federally funded via the National Endowment for the Arts. To be quite honest, my sole interest in Athey is in regard to his various (oftentimes uncredited!) idiosyncratic performances in mostly underground films, including The Blind Owl (1992) directed by Reza Abdoh, Single White Female (1992) directed by Barbet Schroeder, Hustler White (1996) co-directed by Bruce LaBruce and Rick Castro, Sex/Life in L.A. (1998) directed by Jochen Hick, Shadow Hours (2000) directed by Isaac H. Eaton, and No One Sleeps (2000) directed by Jochen Hick, among various appearances in body modification documentaries. Somewhat recently, I received a copy of the dvd Two Ron Athey Films by Aryan Kaganof (1997–1999) aka Ron Athey: Trojan Whore & It's Scripted, which includes two rare short documentaries entitled Ron Athey: It's Scripted (1997) and Ron Athey is the Trojan Whore (1999) directed by South African auteur Aryan Kaganof (though he directed these films when he was still going under his birth name Ian Kerkhof) and featuring Mr. Athey performing his sordid aesthetic brutality in France. Grainy digital video documents from S&M performance art purgatory, Two Ron Athey Films by Aryan Kaganof depicts a discernibly damaged and self-damaging man who, despite his theatric ‘bad blood artist’ transgressions, seems like a rather nice fellow with nil pretensions, be it as an ‘artiste’ or as an individual. Seeming like a deranged drag queen equivalent to the Cenobite characters from Clive Barker Hellraiser (1987), Ron Athey demonstrates through his flesh-tearing and penis-piercing performances that “There is so many ways to say Hallelujah” and that when you are a fearless sadomasochistic sodomite with gay cancer, brutalizing your body for audiences can have spiritual and transcendental properties in our aberrant pre-apocalyptic age.

Curiously, the two short docs featured on the Two Ron Athey Films by Aryan Kaganof dvd are presented out of chronological order, which I assume was done so South African auteur Kaganof could save the best for last as Ron Athey: It's Scripted (1997) is easily the more interesting and informative doc of the two featured on the dvd. Beginning with Ron Athey is the Trojan Whore (1999), one sees Mr. Athey come out to perform for a French audience wearing a fancy white wedding dress (with big fake tits to boot!) and at his side is a brazenly butch bull-dyke chick who also enjoys driving metal hooks through her skin as if she is a piece of fresh meat in a butcher shop. As discordant melodies from a violin play in the background, Athey finally 'undresses' and exposes that every part of his body, including his pecker, is bloodied and brutalized. In the end, the performers leave as abruptly as they appeared, as if members of a secret occult congregation à la Eyes Wide Shut (1999). If Ron Athey is the Trojan Whore is a warm-up to the spiritually and aesthetically apocalyptic realm of Ron Athey, Ron Athey: It's Scripted (1997), which was filmed at the Freak Zone festival in Lille, France in May 1997, is the climatic sadomasochistic sermon, which the perturbed priest-like performer opens up with by soundly stating, "There is so many ways to say Hallelujah." As Athey somewhat shyly (!) reveals in the short doc, he was raised to be a minister in the Pentecostal church in "the desert in California," adding, "I think that makes me have a sort of unique take on things." In Ron Athey: It's Scripted, Athey candidly reveals that through his experiences with the Pentecostal Church he was able to learn how to channel automatic writing and that the Christian religion ultimately opened him up to magic and mysticism, which he continues to utilizing today, albeit in the sacrilegious sadomasochistic form of his perturbing performance art. Using his performance art as a mischievous method of "rejecting and redefining spirituality," Athey is probably the first man in the world to codify a 'bad blood'-based religion in the age of AIDS that promotes self-flagellation for self-flagellation's sake. After quitting the Pentecostal church while a teenage and ultimately failing to achieve his supposedly God-ordained right to become a holy minister, Athey was left with a spiritual void that he ultimately filled with his peculiar brand of performance art, thus becoming an unholy minister of sorts. In one particularly telling interview segment of Ron Athey: It's Scripted, Athey basically sums up his Weltanschauung as follows, "I think it's better to be through a lot of highs and lows in life than to be lukewarm," which is certainly one thing I can agree with him on. At the conclusion of Ron Athey: It's Scripted, Athey states regarding his career, "I don't have an agenda... I don't want the whole world to be pierced and tattooed... I don't want the whole world to like my performance work because I am showing the sort of spiritual, ritualistic side of me," thus demonstrating he is not merely out to shock the general public, but to live in his own quasi-religious world as an iconoclastic individual as opposed to a mindless member of the mass collective. As a man who was desensitized by Pentecostal insanity and drug addiction (he confesses his family got him hooked on Xanax, Codeine, and various forms of downers) essentially at birth, Athey has certainly transcended any sort of traditional understanding of what taboos are and he does not exactly seem to be proud of it, but at least in Ron Athey: It's Scripted he demonstrates that he was able to fill a seemingly perennial void and make a career out of something that would make most people cringe with disgust, which, for better or worse, is a strikingly singular accomplishment of sorts.

RON ATHEY: TROJAN WHORE /& IT'S SCRIPTED

Undoubtedly, if nothing else, Two Ron Athey Films by Aryan Kaganof offers a short but bittersweet introduction to the life and art of Ron Athey. As someone who associates tattoos and 'body modification' (aka body mutilation) with (ethno)masochism (indeed, it is no coincidence that it is mostly whites that are enamored with this aesthetically displeasing and self-destructive subculture), I can still respect Ron Athey because he seems to be doing what he loves, not to mention having a lot of 'fun' whilst doing it, even if he gets his AIDS-addled blood everywhere in the process. Aside from Kaganof's two shorts and the other films I have already mentioned in this review, Ron Athey fans might also want to check out the 'Georges Bataille tribute' performance art documentaries The Monster in the Night of the Labyrinth (2007) and its equally perturbing quasi-sequel Visions of Excess (2009). Aesthetic terrorism in its most unadulterated form starring and directed by Athey, both The Monster in the Night of the Labyrinth and Visions of Excess are so unrelentingly repulsive in their imagery that they would have probably been found decidedly degenerate by even Monsieur Bataille himself. Although I could not track to a copy of the film myself, the documentary Hallelujah! Ron Athey: A Story of Deliverance (1998) co-directed by Catherine Gund and Catherine Saalfield is also purportedly mandatory-viewing for Athey-philes. In terms of being Aryan Kaganof films, Ron Athey: It's Scripted and Ron Athey is the Trojan Whore are the least auteur-driven works by the South African filmmaker that I have seen thus far, yet they are no less visceral and darkly humorous in terms of subject matter when compared to the director's other films. Indeed, a sort of work of Cinéma vérité meets neo-tribal ethnographic film, Two Ron Athey Films by Aryan Kaganof is an audacious document of Eurypid derangement during our culture-distorting zeitgeist of globalization and deracination. If Ron Athey is the messiah of a sort of post-national/post-racial tribe and culture, I do not even know what his idea of the apocalypse looks like.

-Ty E

TOKYO ELEGY

Aryan Kaganof* (1999)

In the year 1999, South African avant-garde filmmaker Ian Kerkhof officially changed his name to Aryan Kaganof. During that same year he directed Tokyo Elegy (1999) aka Shabondama Elegy; a work that was produced by the Japanese porn producers Stance and filmed in the Land of the Rising Sun. Unsurprisingly, Tokyo Elegy features graphic anal sex and cum-drenched yellow faces. Still, these details are more than a little bit misleading as Tokyo Elegy is a work that totally transcends the formless formulas and penis platitudes of mere Jap jack-off material. In the film, a morally unstable white man named Jack (played by Thom Hoffman who was featured in Kaganof's previous work Wasted and later in Paul Verhoeven's Black Book) caps a couple chauvinistic Japanese cops (who arrogantly believe Japanese tea is the most supreme) and then subsequently begins a heavy and steamy love affair with a thoroughly degraded porn model named Keiko (Mai Hoshino). When not forcing Keiko to recite satirical bible quotes while sodomizing her, Jack basks in the warmth of Cocteau's kick and unconsciously finds other methods to cease his miserable life of incessant hedonistic nihilism. Kaganof modeled the character of Jack on real-life criminal author Jack Henry Abbott; the born doomed spawn of an Irish-American soldier and a Chinese prostitute who killed himself in 2002 while serving a prison sentence for manslaughter which he received just six weeks after he was released from prison for a previous sentence. Despite his lack of dialogue, Thom Hoffman does an astute job portraying the undeniably haunted and tragic character Jack; an unconsciously suicidal man who anti-ascetically partakes in heavy drug use and wild interracial sexscapades as a way to relieve his unspoken, undying pain. Of course, Jack knows, whether he admits it to himself or not, that dying is the only true way for him to reach the eternal bliss of nirvana.

As one can expect from a film directed by the always experimenting Aryan South African auteur, Tokyo Elegy has a form all of its own. Naturally, the film features a nonlinear storyline that is as erratic as the anti-heroes debauched sex-drive. Everyone knows that one of the most appealing aspects of cinema is that one gets to experience voyeurism from the passive safety of a movie theater chair or their couch. In Tokyo Elegy, virtual sex is brought to a whole new level as Kaganof employed digital cameras that thrust with the motion of Jack's pulsating Johnson into Keiko's pink pinko arsehole. Indeed, Tokyo Elegy seems to come closer to real sex than a big dollar date with a webcam scam virtual hooker. To be honest, I would be lying if I did not admit that Kaganof sometimes brings the graphic sex featured in Tokyo Elegy to levels that border on irksome. It also does not help that Keiko is a victim of sexual abuse. I can genuinely say that I was particularly perturbed by a scene in the film where a middle-aged Jap tortures Keiko with his sushi-sized member. Keiko's internal suffering is further accentuated by her off-screen narration of penetrating prose taken from Tricia Warden's Attack God Inside (a novel released through Henry Rollin's 2.13.61 publishing company). Although somewhat disturbing, Tokyo Elegy is ultimately more humorous than it is unnerving, thus making for a film that is more sweet than bitter and never failing to deliver. The emotional tone of Tokyo Elegy is further counterbalanced by a normally revolting but uncommonly complimentary soundtrack featuring Japanese jazz and mediocre country-rock music. Ultimately, Tokyo Elegy is a film that defies all categories as it features more sex than your typical degenerate French erotic arthouse film, more art and less sex than the recent works of Bruce LaBruce (Otto; or Up with Dead People, L.A. Zombie), and more humor (albeit somewhat cryptic) than your typical Hollywood comedy. Whereas many independent and arthouse filmmakers seem quite disingenuous and desperate in their attempts to create artistic and groundbreaking works, it is most apparent that Aryan Kaganof's unclassifiable and diverse technique of direction is instinctive and totally organic. In short, I doubt Kaganof could successfully direct your typical bromidic Hollywood production (whether it be an action or drama flick), even if he tried.

TOKYO ELEGY

After watching about 10 minutes of Tokyo Elegy, the viewer finds out that the libertine anti-hero is destined for a fancy unmarked Japanese grave. That being said, it is not a film one watches to see the unfolding of a typical linear story, but a pseudo-Cinéma vérité work of random flashbacks that act as an unpredictable sensory overload for the unsuspecting viewer. Tokyo Elegy is also one of few 'pornographic' films that has the potential to make the pleasure-seeking viewer feel guilty (unless they are genuinely a sadist of sorts), as the candid and tormenting psychodramas featured during and between moments of hardcore miscegenation sometimes seem like genuine stock footage from behind doors of a psyche ward. Despite being filmed in my least favorite format (digital video), I was impressed by Kaganof's ability to fully utilize the schlocky recording system to his advantage by assembling a realist work that rightfully distances the viewer from the unrealistic lavish production of a big-budget Hollywood feature. Essentially, Tokyo Elegy is a deconstructed film noir (or 'anti-film noir') flick that breaks every convention (both aesthetic and thematic) of the classic style, and for that reason alone (among many others), it is a work that will most likely only appeal to adventurous cinephiles and those that love studying various film theories. Of course, I am sure everyone can find a segment or two of Tokyo Elegy that they find enjoyable, most especially the scenes featuring Keiko in the nude being used as the white devil Jack's oriental plaything. Naturally, Tokyo Elegy has inspired me further delve into Aryan Kaganof's unparalleled and mostly unpredictable filmography.

-Ty E

WESTERN 4.33

Aryan Kaganof* (2001)

One of the greatest things about the truly singular oeuvre of South African auteur Aryan Kaganof (Kyodai Makes the Big Time, SMS Sugar Man) is that you never know what to expect when watching one of his films for the first time aside from assuming that it will be in some way an aesthetically and thematically subversive experience that tests the bounds of the cinematic medium. Naturally, when I received a copy of Kaganof's experimental documentary Western 4.33 (2002), I knew I would be seeing something that totally transcended the nonfiction format as demonstrated by the director's previous S&M-addled experimental documentary effort Beyond Ultra Violence: Uneasy Listening by Merzbow (1998), but I did not realize it would manage to turn an ancient colonial slaughter into a elegantly nuanced celluloid poem that ties the past to the present without looking ridiculous or pathetically postmodern. Deriving its name from the classic Hollywood film genre and the best known composition by American experimental composer/Zen Buddhist mystic John Cage, Western 4.33—a Dutch-Namibian co-production shot in Namibia that was funded by a grant given by Nederlands Fonds Voor De Film and has gone on to win tons of prizes in both Africa and Europe—is simultaneously a contra Karl May anti-western, transcendental historical re/search project, posthumous collective necrology for the Herero people, and a visceral atavistic expression of the post-colonial Europid geist from a filmmaker with a rather idiosyncratic cultural background. Notably, regarding the western genre, Kaganof once stated, "The most cinematic genre in film is the western genre; there is no precursor in theatre or literature and therefore it is most closely tied to what movies are [...] I have always loved the genre and as I studied it, I realised that it was a propaganda machine to substantiate genocide." Indeed, while Kaganof's daunting avant-garde doc features an arid desert, a foreboding atmosphere, and even a ghost town of sorts, there is no honor for any white man—be he a stoic cowboy or otherwise—as a meditation about an unflattering Teutonic colonial past that does not feature a single Aryan subject. A 'metaphysical documentary' about the tragic deaths of tons of negroes at a German-run Namibia concentration camp during the so-called 'Herero Genocide' between 1904 and 1908 that was sparked after the Herero people decided to revolt against their Aryan masters (somewhat ironically, the revolt was largely led by German-Lutheran-educated king of the Namaqua people, Namibian Hendrik Witbooi, whose tribe often fought with the Herero people and other Namibian tribes), Western 4.33 attempts to conjure up a meditative and entrancing atmosphere of doom and gloom as opposed to dwelling on sterile statistics that people have a hard time identifying with. Shot on Super-8 film stock that was later blown up to 35mm and featuring a hypnotic musical landscape featuring an eclectic collection of songs by rather diverse artists, including Alec Empire, Sun Ra, Macy Gray, Calexico, Friedrich Nietzsche, Robert Schumann, Harold Budd and various others, Kaganof's ritualistic doc ultimately manages to do more to honor the memory of the Herero Genocide in 32-minutes than Spielberg's sappy sentimentalist epic of Zio-ganda excess Swindler's List does in its nearly 200-minutes of aesthetically insipid sensationalism.

Beginning with a gritty black-and-white shot of a shadowy highway sign at sunset with an inter-title crediting voices to Zola and Blixa Bargeld, one probably would not assume Western 4.33 is a 'documentary' about the Herero genocide upon watching the first couple of minutes of the work, as it initially seems like some sort of lost avant-garde Ozploitation flick, which is only further accented by dreary shots of a deathly dry desert highway that is surrounded by dead bushes and scorching rocks. Of course, that all changes when a headshot of a seemingly melancholy negro sporting a Fila beanie appears. The black man in question is a young truck driver named B.T., who is more or less a symbolic cipher, and he driving from Johannesburg to Luderitz in Namibia in his big rig. Among other things, B.T. is dwelling on the loss of his girlfriend, but he is also thinking about the premature death of his great-grandfather in a German concentration camp on Shark Island off the coastal town of Luderitz. Of course, the viewer will not be able to tell this while B.T. speaks in a South African dialect, as auteur Aryan Kaganof chose not to subtitle these scenes, with his reasoning being: "The Germans never took the trouble to understand what the Herero were saying." Indeed, the viewer will not learn about the fate of the Herero people until at about the 22-minute mark during a completely silent 3 minute and 44 second long scene that is meant to unnerve the Hollywood-lobotomized filmgoer where tri-language subtitles (English, German, and Afrikaans) scroll across an iconic image of starving members of the forsaken tribe. As the subtitles reveal: "There were five concentration camps in Namibia, then called German South West Africa, between 1904 and 1908. In January 1904 war broke out between the Herero Nation and the German colonial administration in Namibia. After the Battle of Waterberg the Herero Nation either succumbed to the desert or were picked up by German patrols and put in concentration camps. The official mortality rate in all five camps was 45% [...] Missionary reports put the death rate at between 12 and 18 a day. As much as 80% of the prisoners sent to the Shark Island concentration camp never left the island. Cold, hunger, thirst, exposure, disease, and madness claimed scores of victims, and cartloads of their bodies were carted every day over to the back beach, buried in a few inches of sand at low tide, and as the tide came in the bodies went out, food for the sharks." With no sound or music during this insightful scene, the viewer is forced in an awkward situation where they are forced to develop their own emotions regarding the facts, though the other scenes in the film make it quite clear that it is not exactly a comfortable feeling, but one of ghastly dread and trauma.

In the only color sequence featured in Western 4.33, protagonist B.T.'s (ex)girlfriend walks alongside a blood red building in slow-motion while provocatively sucking on what seems to be a red popsicle. Apparently, this scene is supposed to be a metaphor for the “rich menstrual blood” of the African woman, who represents “mother Africa” to the human race (of course, the Out-of-Africa Theory has been more or less debunked, not least of all because, unlike Eurasians, Africans lack Neanderthal DNA and contains signs of ancient interbreeding with extinct hominid species). Personally, I found this scene to represent how little ancient genocides matter to lovelorn young men with carnal lust, for with every holocaust there is at least one woman to regenerate the race and move forward with history because although a good percentage of the Herero people were starved, shot, and slaughtered, they ultimately persevered whereas the Germans disappeared from Africa not long after the genocide. Of course, the Germans found no true Heimat in Africa, hence their failure to tame the Dark Continent and its perennially rooted inhabitants. Indeed, much has changed since the days when the Germans were briefly involved in colonial conquests yet the scars still remain in the form of dilapidated concentration camp ruins. Kaganof has attempted to reopen these scars and they bleed throughout his film. Most of Western 4.33 is comprised of elegant yet raw static shots of the ruins of ancient German concentration camps and an old kraut mining town, including a beautiful scene of a seemingly glistening Lutheran church, which is reflected in a small pond in the foreground and represents the faded dream of a New Germania in Africa. At the conclusion of the film, a rich black-and-white shot of the sun setting over the ruins of a concentration camp is juxtaposed with foreboding ambient noise. Ultimately, the film lets the viewer know that the ghosts of the past live on today, even if we are too blind or apathetic to see them.

It should be noted that the Herero Genocide was not officially recognized as a genocide until 1985 when United Nations’ Whitaker Report classified it as such. While the German government apparently recognized the events in 2004, they still refuse to meet the Herero people’s demand of paying reparations (with all the money the Germans have paid to the Jews and Israel, who can blame them?!). Recently, meta-subjective Teutonophobic books like The Kaiser’s Holocaust: Germany’s Forgotten Genocide and the Colonial Roots of Nazism (2011) have attempted to follow in the hysterical Hebraic Daniel Goldhagen tradition of depicting Germans as bloodthirsty and innately genocidal maniacs, but of course compared to the French, British, and Belgians, the Krauts only caused minor terror to the Dark Continent. Of course, the so-called Haitian Revolution also demonstrates that genocide is not exactly a distinctly “white thing,” as the cultural Marxists, Afrocentricists, and ethno-masochistic white cultural cuckolds will have you believe. One also cannot forget the current ethnic cleansing of white Afrikaner farmers by blacks, which has been completely ignored and denied by the black-run South African government. Indeed, what Kaganof’s Western 4.33 reminded me was that the tables have turned when it comes to ‘Leben-sraum,' with the ghosts of the colonial past making black Africans even more determined to rid themselves of the 'white plague.' Unquestionably, Kaganof has achieved the seemingly impossible with Western 4.33 by making a pleasingly preternatural doc about a nonwhite tragedy that does not seem like a pandering piece of self-righteous swill, Trotskyite agitprop, or nihilistically neurotic ethno-masochism. Indeed, a sort of work of hypnotic 'humanist horror' (and I am mean 'humanist' in a positive way), Kaganof's film almost seems like the visceral expression of the Herero collective unconscious, which is no small accomplishment considering the director is a white man. Somewhat interestingly, the film became more popular shortly after its release in 2002 due to the fact that a Herero group living in South Africa sued both the German government and several German companies for reparations, thus demonstrating Kaganof's revolutionary vision as a filmmaker. Indeed, if there is a filmmaker that could make a film about the holocaust that does not seem like it was designed as pro-Zionist agitprop piece and/or to coerce European countries into paying reparations (like Switzerland), it is Kaganof, who somehow managed to turn the little known story of how negroes tribesmen were made into shark food into one of the most artful, poetic, expressionistic and visceral documentaries ever made.

WESTERN 4.33

-Ty E

SMS SUGAR MAN

Aryan Kaganof* (2008)

Undoubtedly, you know a nation has decisively degenerated for the worse when the formerly subjugated and disenfranchised are bugging the women of their ex-masters or so such is the case in South African auteur Aryan Kaganof (born Ian Kerkhof) most recent film SMS Sugar Man (2008); a work about a white pimp who sells vanilla chocolate to dark chocolate throughout Johannesburg's shadowy hotels. A true auteur piece, this work with a thumping theme of perennial loneliness was written, directed, edited by and starring Kaganof in the lead title role as the "sugar man," the film's wandering whoremongering anti-hero is a deep-voiced and masculine yet intellectually mundane and materialistic man who lives by the rather redundant yet personally effective philosophy: "Women are sugars. Men are wallets. Money is god. Life is very simple." Set over the course of a positively paranoid Christmas Eve, things ultimately get a tad bit burdensome for the Sugar Man and his hot ho ho hoes when a rival seeks to dip his hand in his candy jar. Equipped with a bizarre love triangle of individuals who sell and turn tricks, SMS Sugar Man is a love story for the unloved and seemingly unlovable. Shot solely on a mere Sony Ericsson W900i Mobile Phone, SMS Sugar Man is in fact the first feature-length work directed with a cellphone, which despite seeming like a rather grandiose, if not oftentimes visually grating, gimmick, makes for quite an effective tool for the gritty yet ghetto-glamorous setting in a risqué realm where communication seems to be a sacred lost art, or at least that is the only thing one can conclude from the mélange of unmerry misconceptions and misinformation disseminated throughout the film. Nothing out of the ordinary for South-Afrikan-garde auteur Kaganof, he was also the first filmmaker to shoot a feature-length work, Wasted! (1996) aka Naar de klote! in the DV tape format. As the filmmaker is unwilling to make artistic compromises with anyone, including with the production company DV8 Films that produced his latest film, and with which the filmmaker was in a dragged out legal battle (the company wanted the director to make changes to the finished film), the release of SMS Sugar Man was quite belated as the work was made in December 2005 yet not released until sometime in 2008. In a festive mode, I decided to give Kaganof's salacious and seedy Xmas special a serious viewing to get in the spirit for egg nog and nig-nogs.

As someone who left his native country South Africa for the Netherlands in 1983 to avoid being conscripted into the Apartheid-era army, and working at the Dutch Anti-Apartheid Movement (AABN) from 1983 to 1986 as a researcher/activist of sorts, only to return in 1999 to finally meet his biological father and change his name (originally born and directing as Ian Kerkhof and unchristening himself "Aryan Kaganof"), Aryan Kaganof has certainly witnessed the dramatic changes of his socially shifting homeland in his lifetime. Admittedly, SMS Sugar Man is far from the sort of race-mixing melodrama that I would have expected to have been directed by someone who actively fought against apartheid, thereupon leading me to believe that Kaganof has a much more thoughtful and honest view of South African race relations, not unlike satirical Afrikaner comic artist Anton Kannemeyer (aka "Joe Dog") – who while working with blackface and stereotypes of blacks as unsalvageable savages, also portrays the stereotypes of the wretched mainstream 'white liberal' – as the film portrays an unsavory underworld that acts as a metaphor for post-apartheid Africa as a whole; a country where the former subservient blacks are now subjugating their former subjugators. Interestingly enough, many of the Bantu clients in SMS Sugar Man, for a variety of reasons including disdain for father and assumed impotence, don't actually screw the seductive and sensuous sallow sluts that they have bought with their carnal currency. In fact, one of the sapless jiga-boo johns is merely satisfied with having one of the saucy streetwalkers jumping up and down on the bed thereupon mimicking the sounds of heated copulation, while he – fully dressed and nowhere near the voluptuous, lecherous lady – tells his friend on the phone, like a shameless braggart that, "she's loving it, sweet white bitch" in a shallow and doubly impotent display of his schmaltzy power to buy corrupt crack cunts. Indeed, the myth of negro sexual virility is nowhere to be found in SMS Sugar Man and the only true "pimp" as the more learned brothers like to say is the Sugar Man; a dangerous yet dedicated Don Juan that keeps his bitches in check and has even sired a son with one of these sweet yet sour sugars.

SMS SUGAR MAN

Knowing Kaganof's previous cinematic efforts, I honestly thought it was dubious how SMS Sugar Man would play out, especially with the Afrikan Aryan auteur himself as the fierce flesh-peddler, yet the flagrant filmmaker does the seemingly impossible, especially as far as I am concerned as a hater of silverseen whore-hawking anti-heros as seen on MTV, by playing a posolutely palatable, personable and even pleasing pimp. Naturally, being a work that was shot on a consumer grade cellphone camera – a feature generally used by teenage girls to sext salacious shots to their 35-year old gym teachers and by mindless middle-class folks to film their elderly dogs haphazardly humping furniture – the film does feature its fair share of aesthetically unpleasing pixilation, but this ultimately adds to the lavishly stylized sleaze that is SMS Sugar Man, so much so that the 'digital dark' is surely more effective in Kaganof's low-budget work than it was in David Lynch's aesthetically daunting dance in digital diarrhea Inland Empire (2006). If I learn anything more about the director after watching this film, it is that few other modern filmmakers have shown such a keen particular propensity at reinventing their aesthetic, style, and canvas; a seemingly damning and disorderly filmmaking approach with which Kaganof seems to work best. Showing he is no proponent of so-called 'affirmative action' nor does he back slave-morality, Kaganof stated of SMS Sugar Man to a newspaper: "It has really disappointed me that none of the reviews (of the movie) to date has picked up on what I think is a major theme: the way the strategy of BEE (Black Economic Empowerment) serves to emasculate black men, to in fact deny them the very thing it claims to give them. Power cannot be given, it must be exerted." Indeed, the Sugar Man may dip his dick in the same honeypots as his jigga johns, but he also has sovereignty over his saccharine seductresses, which cannot be said of the pitiful pickaninnies that buy them.

-Ty E

CIVILIZATION AND OTHER CHIMERAS OBSERVED DURING THE MAKING OF AN EXCEPTIONALLY ART CIVILIZATION AND OTHER CHIMERAS OBSERVED DURING THE MAKING OF AN EXCEPTIONALLY ARTISTIC FEATURE FILM

Aryan Kaganof* (2009)

Undoubtedly there are few types of films that are more banal than the sort of 'making-of' featurettes that oftentimes accompany DVD and Blu-ray releases, as they tend to sterilely demystify cinematic works and reveal filmmaking to be an oftentimes mind-numbingly boring process that involves a lot of standing around and bullshitting. Needless to say, I naturally have about as much of a desire to watch a hour-long making-of featurette about a film I have never seen as I would for having a colonoscopy while tripping on acid, or so I thought until I encountered South African auteur Aryan Kaganof's shockingly philosophical and equally provocative piece De beschaving en andere hersenspinsels beschouwd tijdens het maken van een uiterst kunstzinnige speelfilm (2009) aka Civilization and Other Chimeras Observed During the Making of an Exceptionally Artistic Feature Film, which depicts the production of a little known Dutch work entitled Winterland (2009) directed by fine artist turned filmmaker Dick Tuinder (Noštalgia and Paranoia, Farewell to the Moon). Indeed, Tuinder is a fine artist who decided to change artistic mediums and asked his longtime friend, Kaganof, to shoot a making-of documentary for his first feature film, but in the end the South African auteur ultimately sired something that was ironically much more substantial and certainly more intellectually provocative and intricate than the actual film it documents. A film about a film-within-a-film where the writer-director and most of the actors play themselves, Civilization and Other Chimeras is a work that demonstrates that there is oftentimes a not-so-fine line between reality and fantasy, as well as real-life people and the fictional roles that they play as actors. In Kaganof's meta-making-of doc, reality and fantasy are obscured to the point where they become meaningless designations, as every single second of the work manages to find some sort of truth about the 'micro-civilization' (aka the film set) where Tuinder rules as the unintentionally goofy and curiously shoeless dictator-cum-director, Dutch mini-diva Tara Elders semi-cryptically reigns with a loudmouth as the princess, and the South African auteur acts as both court jester and warrior-philosopher. By the end of Civilization and Other Chimeras, the carefully stylized and absurdly artificial-looking film set of Winterland seems like a sort of chaotic human pandemonium plagued by female narcissism and vanity, art fag style megalomania, and white collar slave labor while the organic Dutch countryside resembles something nothing short of heaven, henceforth demonstrating that civilization is a sort of cancer that defiles and ultimately destroys the natural order and replaces it with something that is hopelessly all too human, conspicuously contrived, and hardly godly. In other words, if you ever thought about becoming a filmmaker or working in the film industry in some other capacity, you might want to steer clear of Kaganof's no bullshit lesson in the cruelly chaotic and hopelessly bureaucratic art of filmmaking and the barrels upon barrels of steaming bullshit that accompany it. In more superficial terms, Kaganof's film easily eclipses Teutonic poof agitator Rosa von Praunheim's debut It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971) aka Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt in terms of experimental documentaries with the most awkwardly long-winded titles.

Civilization and Other Chimeras opens with a shot of a mirror with the following quote from French postmodern/post-structuralist philosopher Jean Baudrillard written on it: "There are two-way mirrors which allow you innocently to spy on people. This is one of the finest metaphors for consciousness. There is no two-way screen because there is nothing to see on the other side of the screen, nothing to see without being seen." The quote was written by Kaganof himself on a mirror that a little Asian girl with a absurdly conspicuous blonde bob style wig named Kiriko Mechanicus is looking into in a fairly inquisitive fashion. Kiriko is playing the role of 'Sally de Winter' in fine artist Dick Tuinder's first feature film Winterland (2009) and she seems rather bored by the whole filmmaking process, at least when she is not acting. Interestingly, the viewer does not realize Tuinder is the director of the film until we see him flip through a newspaper and read an article on the making of Winterland, which is described as a 'homage to Tara Elders,' who, like most of the actors involved in the project, plays herself in the film. Among other things, Elders played the role of a bitchy Turkish-Dutch animal rights extremist in Theo van Gogh's final film 06/05 (2004) aka May 6th and were it not for her nudity scenes in that work, her performance would have been completely intolerable. Judging by how she acts in Civilization and Other Chimeras, it seems that Elders more or less plays herself when she acts as all she does is bitch and complain throughout the doc, as if her concerns and comfort are of the foremost importance during the production of Winterland. In fact, it seems that Tuinder clearly recognizes this and accepts that Elders has a proclivity towards acting like a cunt as indicated in a scene where the actress asks him if she is acting too unpleasant and the director responds in a somewhat curious manner by stating, "No, you may be as unpleasant as you like. Just let it happen," as if her sole strength as an actress lies in her brazen bitchiness. While Elders describes playing herself for Winterland as an "impossibility," she seems like an even better actress in real-life than when she is actually playing a film role. Indeed, Kaganof is probably right when he states to Tuinder towards the end of the film regarding Elders, "That's the paradox of the role because she can only exist by playing herself." Of course, as Kaganof's doc oftentimes hints at, the image and perception that people have of someone will always trump the person's true essence, as everyone is acting and playing a role in their lives to some extent, thus it should be no surprise why so many actors and actresses are troubled individuals as their media persona can never be erased and will always be more important to people than who they really are deep down inside. Indeed, I would not even be surprised if Elders is slightly less bitchy on a personal level.

Undoubtedly one of the most interesting aspects of Civilization and Other Chimeras is that Kaganof takes the time to interview people on the film set that are otherwise ignored, including a lighting guy named Daan who insightfully declares, “filmmaking is creating and deſtructing.” One of the most intriguing and enlightening conversations that Kaganof gets into is with an unnamed middle-aged woman with some less than glamorous job on the film who declares, “It really is to be admired, that women become actresses,” to which the South African auteur wisely rhetorically retorts, “Women are all actresses aren’t they?” When Kaganof makes the argument that, “Men aren’t actors by nature... A male actor is almost always a very feminine man,” the woman theorizes that men act out of a supposed “hunger for truth” and women do it because they “want power” and “want to cover up. Acting is the ultimate hiding place.” Indubitably, Tara Elders thinks she has a certain degree of power and privilege as she has the gall to arrogantly declare upon learning that Tuinder has written more lines of dialogue that she has to memorize, “There’ll come a moment when you realize that it would be cheaper to hire a new director,” just as the filmmaker walks into the room in what is ultimately a rather awkward ‘scene.’ As statements that she will make later in the doc demonstrate, Elders seems to think the film is hers and not Dick Tuinder’s. Rather cleverly, Tuinder more or less lets Elders think what she wants to, as he seems to realize that she is an exceedingly temperamental debutante that acts like a spoiled child and needs to be treated in a most cautious fashion if he hopes to get what he wants out of her for his film. After all, Elders is the big star of Winterland and, quite unlike little Kiriko, who has not quite reached her teenage years and has yet to learn the power she has over men as a young woman, she most certainly knows it.

While Kiriko and her blonde wig and super girly pink dress are surely the most iconic thing about Tuinder’s Winterland, the little lady has absolutely no clue what the film is about or the psychological motivations of her character as reflected by remarks she makes to Kaganof during various interviews. Indeed, Kiriko tells Kaganof that her character ‘Sally’ is smarter than she is because, “... she says things that I don’t understand,” thus there is no chance that she will be able to perform any sort of serious improvisation. Of course, Tuinder ‘invented’ Sally, so one could argue that the character is just one of his alter-egos just as Terry Gilliam once somewhat comically described the little girl protagonist played by Jodelle Ferland in Tideland (2005) as his ‘inner child.’ Of course, there are things about the film that even Tuinder does not understand but the director goes so far as to proclaim that does not matter, with his reasoning being, “The film’s about me, isn’t it? And it’s true that I sometimes don’t understand myself, but the confusion isn’t any less when you understand my personal lack of understanding incorrectly.” Tuinder’s dictum when it comes to filmmaking is, “the deeper the shame, the greater the beauty,” as if the greatest virtue a filmmaker can have is self-exploitation and sheer vulnerability, which is certainly revealed to a degree throughout Kaganof’s distinctly voyeuristic document. Interestingly, when Kaganof asks Tuinder regarding his performance as himself in Winterland, “...are you Dick Tuinder the director or are you acting as Dick Tuinder the director?,” the Dutch director replies, “No, I’m absolutely acting, but I act it so well that I believe it myself.” Indeed, it is nearly impossible to discern whether Tuinder is really directing or acting like he is directing.

Out of all the actors featured in Civilization and Other Chimeras, Tom Jansen, who has appeared in a number of great works, including Theo van Gogh’s cult classics Loos (1989) and Vals licht (1993) aka False Light, as well as Flemish auteur Harry Kümel’s Louis Couperus adaptation Eline Vere (1991), is certainly the wisest and most respectable. As Jansen describes in a rather enthusiastic fashion like an excited old grandfather, he decided to become an actor as a little boy after going to a carnival and being absolutely amazed upon seeing the entrancing power that two clowns had in being able to manage to capture the complete attention of a large crowd of people. Jansen is different from most of the actors in Winterland in that he was classically trained, though he later enthusiastically embraced modernism, stating of his aesthetically schizophrenic career, “...you could say that I’ve been inconsistent, and it’s true, I have been absolutely inconsistent. And finally, at the advanced age I’ve reached, I am beginning to see the consistency of that. When you’re young you believe, like the Romantics, in the myth of eternal progress. And, you find out that it’s not so, that life is, in fact, much more cyclical.” Certainly, Jansen seems like an old wise sage compared to fellow old-timer Ralph Wingers, who previously starred in works as diverse as Pim de la Parra’s Lost in Amsterdam (1989) and Babeth Mondini’s Kiss Napoleon Goodbye (1990) starring Lydia Lunch and Henry Rollins. To the delight of the viewer, Wingers acts like a jubilant young child throughout the film, but he does make one intriguing remark during the doc. Indeed, whilst holding a camera lens, Wingers states regarding cinema that it is, “The world through a lens.” After all, the set of Winterland is nothing if not a sort of maniac microcosm that reflects the current state of the Occident, albeit in an exaggerated yet somewhat lighthearted art fag form.

Since a lot of Winterland was created in post-production via CGI (notably, Tuinder states at one point during the doc, “We’ll Find the Solution in the Edit,” thus reflecting his special emphasis on post-production), most of Civilization and Other Chimeras is set in an almost obnoxiously artificial green screen realm that seems all the more glaring in its kaleidoscopic grotesquery due to the costumes that the actors wear, especially Kiriko whose blonde wig and pink dress make her seem like a living and breathing Aryanized Anime character from sub-arthouse hell. Notably, a gigantic eyeball hangs in the green screen area and at one point in the film Kiriko is forced to stare at it. Undoubtedly this dangling all-seeing eye is symbolic of Kaganof as the all-seeing auteur who, although an outsider, ultimately managed to see more during the production of Winterland than the film's actual director. While Civilization and Other Chimeras is set in an otherworldly film set that was dreamed up by Dick Tuinder, the world ultimately became Kaganof's once he got behind the camera and shot the film from his singularly idiosyncratic perspective. Interestingly, at the end of the doc, Kaganof asks Tuinder if the character Sally is a metaphor for god, but the director refuses to spill the beans on his film and instead states, "I'm not permitted to give an answer to that question. I'm sorry." Whether Sally is a metaphor for god is dubious, but what is for sure is that Tuinder and just about any other self-respecting auteur is the god of their own film. When little Dutch diva Tara Elders bitches at the end of the doc, "It's beginning to look suspiciously like the film is actually an homage to Dick Tuinder himself," she is right, at least in a certain sense as a film is nothing if not a potent expression of its creator, especially if said creator is in any way serious about what they are creating. In stark aesthetic contrast to most of the rest of the film, Civilization and Other Chimeras concludes with Kaganof interviewing Tuinder outside in the Dutch countryside during the blue hour in an organically beautiful scene that resembles a work by 19th-century German Romantic painter Caspar David Friedrich. Of course, this outdoor scene acts as a sort of much needed therapeutic relief from the Winterland set, which screams of infantilized postmodern artificiality, post-Spielberg special effects, and culturally mongrelized multicultural chaos.

One of the most unintentionally humorous segments of Civilization and Other Chimeras is when director Tuinder's sister, who was responsible for creating the costumes for Winterland, describes how her brother was always an introverted fellow who spent most of his time bent over reading and drawing. Tuinder sister's remarks seem all the more comical when one notices that the director has rather poor posture, as if all those years of reading and drawing permanently contorted his back in a way where it looks as if the director is bending over even when he is standing up and smoking a cigarette. Undoubtedly, little details like these that would escape most people demonstrate why Kaganof has such a keen and penetrating eye as a filmmaker. It should be noted that when Kaganof asks Tuinder why he decided to become a filmmaker, he sensibly replies, "Well, it does seem to be the most appropriate medium to describe the current world and the current reality. It fits to this reality we live in now, just as painting very much fitted the 16th and 17th-century reality and literature very much fitted the 19th-century reality [...] I think every era has its dominant art form." One almost gets the sense that Tuinder would rather be creating paintings and sculptures (actually, he more or less did both of these things while creating the sets for Winterland) than directing films and dealing with an entire film crew, but that he feels obligated to work in the cinematic realm due to the popularity of the medium. Admittedly, I have next to no interest in watching Winterland and would not exactly call Tuinder my kind of auteur, but I am certainly glad that I saw Civilization and Other Chimeras as it is, at the very least, the greatest making-of document since Les Blank's Burden of Dreams (1982), which documented the truly catastrophic production of Werner Herzog's Amazonian epic Fitzcarraldo (1982). Notably, Kaganof made a sort of sister film to his Winterland doc entitled Sally in Winterland: The Making of Dick Tuinder (2009), which has been described as a 'virtual road movie,' but unfortunately it has yet to be released with English subtitles. As someone that is fairly familiar with a good portion of Kaganof's singularly eclectic oeuvre, one of the things that I found most interesting about Civilization and Other Chimeras is that it documents exactly the sort of film that the South African auteur would never make, so it is endlessly intriguing to see how he takes Tuinder's sort of girly and cartoonish neo-Victorian aesthetic and turns it into something worthy of much more intellectual consideration than one could ever possibly fathom, which is something he also accomplished with his early documentary short Matthew Barney: Creating Stories (1995) aka Matthew Barney in the Emperor's New Clothes. Indeed, while Kaganof is probably best known among cinephiles for his early features like Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers (1994), Wasted! (1996) aka Naar de klote!, and Shabondama Elegy (1999) aka Tokyo Elegy, he is probably the most original and subversive documentarian working in the world today as his avant-garde docs like Western 4.33 (2002) and Night Is Coming: Threnody for the Victims of Marikana (2014) surely demonstrate. During Civilization and Other Chimeras, actor Tom Jansen remarks, "That's the greatest achievement, if you can make the simple things magical," which is ultimately what Kaganof achieved with the doc.

-Ty E

GUERRILLA BLUES AND HOLY GHOSTS
GUERRILLA BLUES AND HOLY GHOSTS

Aryan Kaganof* (2012)

Admittedly, I have very little interest in old school cracker-hating black revolutionaries and the history of hip-hop, which I have always found completely intolerable in all its various forms, but somehow I found myself rather excited about watching an experimental documentary about both Afrocentric subjects entitled Guerilla Blues and Holy Ghosts: A Grammar of Black Suffering, Absence of Presence, and Other Reflections on Dead Weight (2012) directed by South African auteur Aryan Kaganof (Naar de klote! aka Wasted!, Shabon-dama Elegy aka Tokyo Elegy). Of course, I must confess that my interest in seeing the doc was somewhat superficial and surely a symptom of my voracious cinephilia, especially when it comes to the singular oeuvre of Aryan Kaganof (or the artist formerly known as Ian Kerkhof). Indeed, after seeing Kyodai Makes the Big Time (1992) and The Mozart Bird (1993), which were the first two chapters in the director's self-described 'Urban Wasteland Serial,' I decided to contact Kaganof to see if I could get a copy of the seemingly mysterious third and final film in his cinematic triptych, The Turner Revelation (1995), but he responded by stating the film was, "so terrible that I don't even have a copy of it myself. Just a grueling endless gabfest of moaning. Utterly beyond redemption." Ultimately, Kaganof decided to send me a copy of Guerilla Blues and Holy Ghosts, which not only features excerpts from Kaganof's rare lost film, but is also about Gylan Kain who both starred in and penned the racially-charged play that The Turner Revelation is based on. Indeed, the film is based on Kain's semi-autobiographical O.J. Simpson inspired play Ritual for a Poet in B Natural and tells the tale of a black man named Turner who murders his white wife, subsequently has a conversation with the devil over the telephone and realizes he has killed the wrong woman, and eventually undergoes an eerie court room style interrogation from a young white woman known as 'The Prosecutor/Witchdoctor' where the protagonist ultimately realizes that his mother is the true source of his resentment towards women. Notably, excerpts of the penetrating psychodramatic scenes from Kain's interrogation in The Turner Revelation are featured throughout Guerilla Blues and Holy Ghosts, which is only fitting considering the documentary features a rather candid and even intrusive depiction of the seemingly forsaken American negro poet's singular life and work. Simultaneously a poet for the people yet a born outsider and rebel who rechristened himself after the first murderer of the Bible, Kain is depicted in Kaganof's documentary as a man of seeming contradictions who ultimately realized after various rebirths that only he, and not the black nationalist movement or even poetry, could save himself from a life of metaphysical hell and internal torment.

I have to confess I knew nothing about Kain or his legendary group The Last Poets before watching the doc, which just goes to show Kaganof's keen talent as a filmmaker as I found Guerilla Blues and Holy Ghosts to be just as unwaveringly gripping, aesthetically alluring yet iconoclastic, and preternaturally transcendental as the director's greatest and most revered works. Kain is a poet, playwright, spoken word warrior and sometimes actor that is best known as the original leader and one of the founding members of the NYC-based black nationalist oriented group The Last Poets, which is credited as being one of the first, if not the first, proto-hip-hop groups, as well as a band that was championed by none other than Jimi Hendrix and Mick Jagger, among various other important mainstream musicians of the counter-culture zeitgeist. Born shortly after the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. and on the anniversary of Malcolm X's birthday on May 19, 1968 in Marcus Garvey Park, The Last Poets are the victims of an undying apocryphal tale that they derived their name from the poem 'Towards a Walk in the Sun' written by black South African revolutionary poet Willie Kgositsile that reads: "This wind you hear is the birth of memory when the movement hatches in time's womb there will be no art talk. The only poem you will hear will be the spearpoint pivoted in the punctured marrow of the villain." While Kain was surely influenced by Kgositsile's poem, which he interpreted as meaning that there will be no need for writing poetry in the future as the black people will become the poetry once that have defeated and destroyed their white oppressor, The Last Poets apparently derived their name from a poem written by the group's co-founder David Nelson. Sort of black America's answer to Gabriele D'Annunzio or Yukio Mishima as a 'warrior-poet' who used the spoken word to wage a spiritual war against white America and to spread the message of negro liberation and black power, albeit with a stage presence and vocal delivery style comparable to fellow poet-cum-frontman Jim Morrison of The Doors, Kain is certainly the sort of highly literate black cultural crusader that negro networks like BET should be honoring instead of culturally deleterious individuals like Tupac and Kanye West, who might as well be described as neo-minstrel performers.

Shot in three different cities over a decade period, including Amsterdam in 1994, New York City in 1996, and Johannesburg in 2004 and not officially released for almost another decade, Guerilla Blues and Holy Ghosts is not only a document about the life and work of Kain, but a bizarrely inspiring testament to the seemingly unlikely artistic collaboration between the director and his much older subject. As Kain explains towards the end of the documentary, his revolutionary group The Last Poets more or less started to fall apart after he refused to sell-out by working with a white record producer who he felt was attempting to steal black power from him and his comrades, but as Kaganof's film reveals, the seemingly perennially wandering poet has had various rebirths throughout his life, thus reflecting a constantly evolving man that refuses to be labelled or pigeonholed. As a reflected in an allegorical scene featuring a shadowy Kain traveling in a darkened car in slow-motion through what seems like an unending green tunnel, life is an ever-changing spiritual journey that lasts until at least you croak. At the highly impressionable age of ten, Kain had his first encounters with the Holy Ghost at a black Christian church (which is a major motif of Kaganof's doc), but his brand of spirituality would only grow more subversive and highly personalized as he grew older. Of course, despite his rebellious behavior, the influence of the Christian Church would never leave Kain as highlighted in various scenes scattered throughout Kaganof's doc featuring a pregnant black woman credited as 'The Ghost That Was Holy' (played by Sybil Jeffries) posing outside of various black churches. As the poet explains himself, shortly after reading Albert Camus' remark in the classic text The Rebel (1951) aka L'Homme révolté that Cain was the first rebel of the Bible when he was 23 years old, he had another rebirth and had his name legally changed to 'Kain' in symbolic solidarity with the first murderer of the Judeo-Christian holy book. As revealed in an inter-title featured in the doc, "In Dante's Inferno the 9th Circle of hell is called Kaina, after Kain, the Bible's first murderer." Ironically, the 9th Circle of hell is for the 'malicious sin' of treachery, which Kain would ultimately suffer at the hands of new band mates, who ultimately took over The Last Poets, nearly beat him to death with a hammer, and continued to threaten to kill him and his entire family.

GUERRILLA BLUES AND HOLY GHOSTS

When Kain turned 30, he had a third rebirth of the artistic and metapolitical sort that resulted in the creation of his most important works, including his play Turner. As a man who wrote aggressive anti-art-fag lines like, "I am a poet. I hate poetry and love life" and "...rhythm don't fill an empty stomach," Kain was not exactly attempting to follow in any traditional style of western poetry, but instead saw the artistic medium as an empowering weapon that could be used to convert blacks across America to adopt an Afrocentric weltanschauung that emphasized racial nationalism and negro liberation as reflected in inciting lines like, "Time is running out as hastily as niggers run from the man." Kain also had a reluctant interest in classic western poetry as demonstrated in bizarre lines like, "You know, a big stick don't make a shepherd if he can't control the flock. You better rise up Rudyard Kipling." As Kain explains in the doc regarding his artistic agenda with his group, "It was very important that we have a conga player. We almost called ourselves 'The Drum Poets' because we wanted a very clear association with Africa." More interested in spreading a bold and uncompromising black power message than making money or even creating art, Kain naturally could not fathom the idea of recording an album with a successful white record producer named Alan Douglas, who had previously worked with Jimi Hendrix and Miles Davis, or as he stoically states in the doc: "Just them saying that Alan Douglas was white just wrote it off of my agenda as being possible. For me, all the poetry that we were doing was even secondary to the machinery behind the poetry. I wanted to build an institution. All across the country it was about building black institutions, black powerbases. I rejected the idea of Alan Douglas recording us.” Ultimately, Kain’s stern reluctance to work with whitey Douglas caused a schism in the group and a seemingly fiendish Svengali-like fellow named Jalal Mansur Nuriddin (aka Alafia Pudim) was brought in to replace him as the leader of the group. As Kain states of Jalal and the other new members of The Last Poets, “There sense of poetry was not something I thought we were about.” Instead of working with The Lost Poets, Kain decided to record his own solo album entitled The Blue Guerrilla (1970), which is an angry and aggressive yet musically eclectic work that one might describe as an audio Afro-apocalypse. After recording a sort of rival album against the new version of The Last Poets (Kain fittingly called his new rival group ‘The Original Last Poets’ and they went on to star in the musical doc Right On!: Poetry on Film (1970) directed by Herbert Danska, which was accompanied by a soundtrack of the same name), Kain was apparently nearly beaten to death with a hammer by his rival Jalal (in the doc, Kain describes the experience as, “...the beating of my life”), but luckily a black cop came along and saved his life. Ultimately, the near-death experience caused Kain to become disillusioned with black nationalism and go to a “personal place with himself,” thus resulting his rebirth as ‘Baby Kain,’ which is the name he used for his Dutch era jazz oriented album Feel This (1997).

As Kain explains towards the end of Guerilla Blues and Holy Ghosts, “I’m not a tough guy. I don’t really know how to handle myself in this world out here and yet I feel about myself that I’m a spiritual alley cat because the violence that I have dealt with is an internal violence.” Indeed, judging by Kain’s own words, it seems like it was only a matter of time before he would reject the anti-individualistic collectivist thinking of the black power moment, which constituted a dead-end herd mentality that could never bring the constantly evolving artist the true sense transcendence that he so eagerly sought. Ultimately, it took countless rebirths for Kain to come to the conclusion that, “Nobody can save me but me” and “I could reject everything but I could not reject the experience of the Holy Ghost.” As Kain also explains, “The Holy Ghost is a violent experience but it’s a beautiful experience. I mean, nothing is hurtful about it in the experience itself, but it is a violent internal confrontation with the self which, in the metaphor of the church in the Holy Ghost language, it’s thought of in terms of god and the devil battling for your soul...,” thus emphasizing how his life has ultimately been a spiritual as opposed to political or racial struggle. Ironically considering his previous refusal to work with a white record producer, Kain is featured throughout the documentary performing his spoken word sessions with a white jazz drummer, thus symbolizing his new outlook on life as a lone wolf individualist as opposed to a racial collectivist. Of course, Kain would also go on to working with white filmmakers in Amsterdam and would not only appear in Kaganof’s films Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers (1994), The Turner Revelation (1995), and Reflections on Dead Weight (1995), but also

GUERRILLA BLUES AND HOLY GHOSTS

Otakar Votocek's Wings of Fame (1990) starring Peter O'Toole and Colin Firth and Dick Maas' Do Not Disturb (1999) starring William Hurt. It might also interest cinephiles to know that Kain's song with The Last Poets, "Wake Up, Niggers," was featured on the soundtrack for Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg's counter-culture classic Performance (1970).

After watching Guerrilla Blues and Holy Ghosts, it is easy for me to see why auteur Aryan Kaganof took such a keen interest in Kain and his work, as the two men seem to be kindred spirits of sorts. Indeed, aside from both men having symbolic rebirths that led to them legally changing their names and living in exile in Amsterdam where they would ultimately collaborate with one another, both men are constantly evolving aesthetic pioneers who abhor pedantic art faggotry and refrain from subscribing to any sort of artistic trends. On a more personal level, Kaganof and Kain also seem kindred spirits in that their works express a deep resentment towards their mothers, or what one might describe as an anti-Oedipal complex. With that being said, I must admit that after watching Guerrilla Blues and Holy Ghosts, I am dying to watch Kaganof's The Turner Revelation which, as reflected in the handful of excerpts featured in the doc, feels like a haunting and foreboding celluloid chiaroscuro of the psychodramatic sort, with star and playwright Kain himself taking on the Holy Ghost. Notably, Kain was apparently deeply touched by the doc, or as he wrote in an e-mail to Kaganof regarding the film: "...it's late so I will just say that the film troubled me in as much as it brings people back in my view I have long desired nothing but distance from/tremendous distance/but nevertheless have had a number of attempts to look and deal with the work. Finally brought it to the closest friend I've had in this Amsterdam city the last 25 years of my existence. She said: 'It says everything we need to know. It's a document, a testament.' And then she said: 'It's a monument.'" As Kaganof once wrote under his alter-ego Abraxas, "All that is sacred is poetic and all that is poetic is sacred" and he certainly demonstrates this sentiment in Guerrilla Blues and Holy Ghosts, which is nothing short of a highly personalized poetic tribute from one poet to another. In its demonstration that two different artists from very different artistic and personal backgrounds can share a sort of common 'truth' and spiritual connection, Kaganof's doc is like a visceral celluloid equivalent to what Aldous Huxley described as the 'Perennial Philosophy.' Undoubtedly, I cannot think of another film or piece of art in another artistic medium that enabled me to connect with a black American artist of the Afrocentric sort in a more accessible and refreshingly confrontational way. Indeed, only Kaganof could direct a potent and rather revealing film about one of the most important culture creators of American Black Nationalist history that depicts an elderly drunken Dutchman as god and features kraut queer New Wave countertenor Klaus Nomi's Henry Purcell cover "Cold Song" juxtaposed with a voyeuristic shot of an old negro hobo eating McDonalds food out of a public trashcan.

-Ty E

3 MERZBOW FILMS
3 MERZBOW FILMS

Aryan Kaganof* (2013)

With his erotic black-and-white avant-garde short La séquence des barres parallèles (1992), South African auteur Aryan Kaganof began a collaboration with Japanese noise musician and sadomasochism expert Masami Akita aka 'Merzbow'—a man who borrowed his name from a series of grotto-like artistic rooms entitled 'The Merzbau' created by German dadaist Kurt Schwitters, which were destroyed by Allied bombing in 1943—that would ultimately result in four different films, with the documentary Beyond Ultraviolence: Uneasy Listening By Merzbow (1998) being the only feature-length effort sired by the two artists. Despite Merzbow's popularity, Beyond Ultraviolence was limited to a handful of VHS copies upon its release and has been somewhat hard to find since then, at least by any official means. After recently deciding that the original 70-minute minute cut of Beyond Ultraviolence should be ridden of "purely self-indulgent crap," Kaganof carefully dismembered the film to a mere 15-minute running time, which is featured on the director's quite literally titled DVD release 3 Merzbow Films (2013). Indeed, aside from the totally singular experimental Georges Bataille adaptation The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man (1994), 3 Merzbow Films features all the cinematic collaborations between Kaganof and Merzbow. A storm of industrial noise visually accented by, among other things, assassinated auteur Theo van Gogh lusting after a Dutch diva in a rather revealing black rubber dress, seemingly hundreds of S&M bondage images of petite unclad Japanese ladies in rather compromised positions, young Jap chicks simulating hara-kiri, and ironically used quotes by French literary critic Roland Barthes, 3 Merzbow Films reflects amoral anti-traditionalist art in the innately irreligious post-postmodern age of aesthetic nihilism where only the harshest of noises and most depraved of images can reach modern man's deadened souls. Indeed, 3 Merzbow films is a marvelously misbegotten meeting between East and West (and considering the continent Kaganof lives on, South) that demonstrates globalization has managed to not only deracinate and devitalize the Occident, but the tiny East Asian island as well.

Seven minutes of fiercely foreboding erotic ecstasy in sleek spine-tingling black-and-white cinematography, La séquence des barres parallèles (1992) aka The Sequence of Parallel Bars—a film based on a Polish-French erotic novelist/Franz Kafka translator Pierre Klossowski—follows a beautiful rubber-wrapped Dutch dame (Gabrielle Provaas, who would later co-direct the documentary Meet the Fokkens (2011) about elderly identical twin prostitutes who worked in the red-light district of Amsterdam for over 40 years) as she enters an abandoned post-industrial warehouse and is followed around by a seemingly sexually depraved Fat Man (played by Dutch Filmmaker Theo van Gogh, who was infamously assassinated by a deranged Muslim terrorist because the director's film Submission (2004) hurt the insane Islamic untermensch's feelings). After briefly examining the downstairs of the nearly pitch black hellhole, Ms. Provaas walks up a set of stairs and van Gogh grabs her leg, but she keeps walking to her dubious destination. When she reaches the top, she is grabbed by her stalker, who carries her as if he is aping the actions of King Kong, and becomes an object of worship in the pose of Christ on the cross. Van Gogh is a fiendish foot fetishist who licks and caresses Provaas' hooves while drunken with abject infatuation, as if he is some sort of internet fan-boy who has finally met a real live woman in the flesh. Although viewers probably expect something to the contrary, Provaas exits the subterranean pleasure-dome completely unscathed and leaves in a fancy limousine, as if she's a high-class hooker who just performed a service for Theo for a hefty price.

Signal to Noise (1998), which is a sort of sister film to Beyond Ultraviolence: Uneasy Listening By Merzbow (the two films were originally released together on VHS), is the most uneventful and minimalistic short featured on 3 Merzbow Films. Shot at the Kamakura Temple, Japan in 1997, Signal to Noise begins with a storm of nihilistic noise and erratic editing with aesthetically pleasing footage of Masami Akita and a white dude (Djeff Babcock of Acéphale) recording sound for what one assumes is samples for their music. In its depiction of Akita and his bud's public recording sessions, Signal to Noise deconstructs the noise-making process, demonstrating the stark contrast between the process (i.e. calmly walking around a historical hotspot as tourists walk and pigeons fly in plain view) and the result. Aside from noise by Merzbow, the experimental documentary features the old school 1930s blues song "Last Kind Word Blues" by black female country blues singer Geechie Wiley and "A Real Slow Rag" composed by American Negro classical composer Scott Joplin and performed by David Boeddinghaus. Signal to Noise concludes with the Roland Barthes quote, "Everything has a meaning or nothing has. To put it another way, one could say that art is without noise" (Introduction to the Structural Analysis of Narrative from Image, Music, Text). Indeed, I guess Barthes did not live long enough to listen to the grating and atavistic sounds of Merzbow.

Unquestionably, Beyond Ultraviolence: Uneasy Listening By Merzbow (subtitled 'A Short Investigation by: Aryan Kaganof') is the 'main attraction' of 3 Merzbow Films, as it is the key to the aesthetic integrity of the rest of the films. Hearing Masami Akita aka 'Merzbow' talk, one soon realizes that he is more concerned with the 'visceral' and primitive part of life than the intellectual, which his nasty noise clearly reflects. As Akita explains in the spirit of J.G. Ballard's Crash (1973), "Just imagine a car accident. The entrails of the car spill out. When a huge lorry crashes, it's a fascinating sight. In other words...a car needs female hormones. You could compare it to the function of noise. Noise worms its way, as it were into the guts of music. That's the context it should be placed in." From there, Merzbow proceeds to dwell on the wild and wonderful world of sadomasochism, explaining, "In the world of SM, military uniforms...torture, corporal punishment...and police academies play a prominent role. In the world of SM, power...and authority...are presented as paranoiac themes. SM exposes the cruelty of absolute power...by showing this cruelty...in a violent way to the viewer. You witness the cruelty of SM practices. But the last thing you need in a war is SM." Aside from noise, Akita discusses how he met his teacher Chimuo Mireki at an 'institute for historic pornographic material' and how they came up with the idea to make pseudo-snuff 'kinbaku' videos of Japanese girls committing suicide, which the musician began working on starting with the second film of perversely erotic self-slaughter. Not surprisingly, Akita goes on to describe how the Japanese are obsessed with the idea of women committing hara-kiri, which he differentiates from seppuku, stating, "Yukio Mishima committed seppuku. In seppuku, the stomach is cut open and then the head is chopped off by someone else." Hara-kiri merely involves the person cutting their stomach and letting their guts fall out, with Akita remarking, "When it was carried out by men...it was seen as a tremendous and magnificent...expression of nationalism. But this is a contemporary view on the subject. Hara-kiri should be considered as a form of fetishism...but it's an ancient primitive form...which focuses primarily on blood and entrails."

3 MERZBOW FILMS

During Beyond Ultraviolence: Uneasy Listening By Merzbow the following quote from Teutonic painter Kurt Schwitters appears, "Merz stands for freedom from all fetters, for the sake of artistic creation. Freedom is not the lack of restraint, but the product of strict artistic discipline." Indeed, aside their proclivity for subversive aesthetics, Merzbow and Kaganof share a certain compromising artistic discipline that comes from the gut just as it comes from the mind, if not more so. Personally, while I have some interest in industrial/post-industrial groups like Coil and NON, I am certainly no noise connoisseur and I am only vaguely familiar with Merzbow's oeuvre, yet 3 Merzbow Films is still a strangely enthralling experience, sort of like popping a massive zit and watching the blood and puss squirt out in an unpredictable fashion. In fact, I would go so far as saying that I do not know how anyone could tolerate Merzbow's 'noise sculptures' without the accompaniment of equally harsh and irrational visuals, as it would be like PBJ sandwich without jelly, or more relevantly, guts without blood. Additionally, 3 Merzbow Films makes for a rather eclectic sampling of both artists' work, as men who negate the artistic medium they work in, with Merzbow destroy all melody and music and with Kaganof destroying (but ultimately reinventing) all editing, narrative, and aesthetic styles. A year after creating Beyond Ultraviolence, Kaganof would go back to Japan and put his previous work shot in the Land of the Rising Sun to shame with the sexual savagery of Shabondama Elegy (1999) aka Tokyo Elegy, albeit this time without the help of Merzbow. Undoubtedly, all of Kaganof's Japanese films represent a rare instance where a white man has been able to successfully create art in Japan without it seeming like a patronizing novelty.

-Ty E

DEGENERAZIONE
DEGENERAZIONE

Asia Argento* (1994)

When the word "portmanteau" is muttered, film fanatics immediately think aloud Tales from the Crypt, the arguably better Tales from the Hood, or a handful of Hammer Horror projects. Never have I heard mention of DeGenerazione, which brings me to my knees after blindly watching it as it is one of the most critically underrated collections of short films that I have ever bore witness to. Composed of 10 short films either blessed with surrealism or weighty with horror, DeGenerazione walks at a brisk pace through each story, unconnected in nature, with only a mission to provide fascinating spins on common urban mythology. If DeGenerazione were to be known for any two things, it would be that the last short film stars Asia Argento in which she feverishly screams cause for Dario Argento's films or that the technicians and artists appropriated to this gem worked for free - a merit badge, if you will. Opening up on a note of apocalyptic esotericism, our first short film ("pre-credit sequence") begins. Our Guys are Coming is the title and what prophecy it holds. A stammering scientist frantically pleads to an anonymous voice on the phone illustrating the drastic nature of future circumstance when suddenly his phone accomplice gurgles and screams. After this, a knock at the door alerts the scientist, all the while a rousing anarchic punk instrumental begins building to a bloody climax. Following the musical cue, a fist breaks through the door and a group of mutated robotic humanoids enter his apartment wearing DeGenerazione shirts. The good doctor escapes (for now) while the lot of mutated faces look up at the camera and smile - what wonderful bliss DeGenerazione bathes in.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Try watching this video on www.youtube.com, or enable JavaScript if it is disabled in your browser.

The second short film is entitled Home Delivery in which a woman belittles a postal agency for not delivering a package on time. She then demands that the delivery man, on his only day off, pick up labor again and deliver her package. The post master agrees but on one condition - she be home at 6:30 PM to answer the phone. As it would have it, the woman is absent from her humble abode but her husband isn't. With no prior inclination of what to expect (the package is an anniversary present), he humorously prepares dinner when the doorbell angrily echoes throughout the rooms. Taking up arm with cutlery (this very same thought crosses my mind when the door is knocked upon at questionable hours), the man opens the door to find a large, scarred deliveryman who is past perturbed. The deliveryman exclaims "Leave the door open. I'm coming in" and walks down the hall. Armed with light and playful music as well as the hilarious behavior of the effeminate man of the house, he mutters "Whatever" and closes the door. What follows are remnants of a home invasion sequence without cruel intent, just the idiocy of a man who refuses to ask any questions. Home Delivery is both light and dark, as well as strange. Although it is a memorable short, it's hardly one of the finer presentations DeGenerazione holds.

Just Another Vampire Story is exactly that, although with twisted, homoerotic roots. With burning counterculture in store for later, a vampire walks along the shore of a beach asking "Have you ever met a drunk vampire?". Transporting the setting to a bar teeming with slave-like boy-toy bartenders, a man notices a vintage-dressed male sitting and sipping alone at a side table. Sending him a drink, the two meet and decide to take their acquainting game back to the young bachelor's pad. It is here where the older gentleman admits to being a vampire, not of the natural mythological kind, but a species of vampire past the cosmos stranded here on Earth - very in tune with addiction and vice. "I have the best Jack Daniels" is the key pick up line. Also, it is not everyday you encounter a film about homosexual vamp-advances, now is it? One of the scenes to follow boasts incredible suspense as the two male figures tease until the harrowing finale (also, on a grander scale of things, enjoyable). Just Another Vampire Story pokes and prods at both the feebleness of vampire lore and the flamboyancy of the modern gay. This short might take an acquired taste to digest properly but all-in-all an entertaining spurt of horror counter-machismo.

Is TV Bad for Kids? is one of the masterpieces contained within DeGenerazione. Haughtily displaying a child at home alone watching television, Is TV Bad for Kids? then juxtaposes the images of a humored child against the stern father demanding the television to be turned off. Concluding the presence of the child is a dinner party of parents arguing the moral decay of children and the harm of television. Several make snide remarks towards the parental practices of each other which makes for a damn fine debate, amongst friends of course. Switching back to the child, now alarmed that her television splurge was cut short by a freak-out shower of static, the girl begins hitting the tube in a vain attempt to get it to switch back on. Fearing boredom, the child slumbers peacefully while the television assumes a purpose of its own and fosters a bewilderingly creepy face as it inches through the hallways - guided as if the combined neglect of every parent was a driving force. The father later scowls over the loss of his television. I, too, would react similarly as the child did had something as terrifying as being stalked by a television with ulterior motives happened to me. "We can't live without a TV!" screams the father, unaware entirely of the horror that hovered through the hallways when they were out getting drunk and entertaining the mass with karaoke. Is TV Bad for Kids? is an exceptional entry in a near-perfect archive of cinematic oddities.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Empty Gift follows suit with a short but sweet message applying a retro-futuristic world, still in shambles, that battles overpopulation with a daily lottery of random numbers being selected to ween the life of any and all individuals, had your luck ran dry. That is to assume luck exists in this bleak world. Part Battle Royale, part Scanners, Empty Gift is weighty, important, and all too conscious of the path we are headed towards. The next brief short is entitled Prospective which follows a path of Italian political surrealism. Contained within is a first-person narrative of a woman discovering a familiar figure clad in a diaper positioned under a large umbrella. Inquiring as to what he is doing, he declares that he has gotten a government job and points to his hat labeled 'Prospective'. Implying fellatio or sexual gratification of the sort, the man hands the woman the umbrella and mentions that he will return. Soon after, the woman begins to levitate and hover across the field, directly overhead of two men carrying a mirror - "Inverse perspective" which may or may not be a "psychiatrist invading her mind".

One of my personal favorite shorts to be found within DeGenerazione is Chain - a title that creates a reality around the general emasculation of men at the hands of the overbearing female populace. Dissecting the fears of all men who are "pussy-whipped", Chain subtly takes charge of its strong metaphorical content during a bonfire scene in which the brutish and bullying way of men is shown. Several males mock one another for bearing a curfew to his woman, only to have a POV perspective of a woman wielding a leash, hook into the collar of one of the verbal teasers and drag him off. Noticeably distressed by this, the lead character offers the suggestion of going to a nightclub and grabbing drinks - the freedom of so-called "free birds". The bar scene is the catalyst to domination. Chain makes a great defense by comparing and contrasting the nocturnal activities of both sexes. Men blow foam off of pints and lick buffalo sauce off the side of their lips as women bend and sway, presenting their allure by way of self-objectification. Our lead begins to flirt his way to a pack of she-wolves when he notices they are adorned with chains and leashes. This is one of the few, if not only, examples I can think of in the very specific genre of male horror. These characters aren't so fictional, you'd learn. Just like many of us, they lower themselves to domination - it appears unnatural on film, as it is, but you wouldn't bat an eyelash had you seen anything similar out in public. The dark and strange culture of ownership, the charade men commit to, and the incessant demands of the fickle feminine disease - all these things are given a face within Chain and what a wonderful exhibition it is.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.
AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Unable to execute JavaScript.

India 21 is the title of the next short, one of which bears a significant power in our post 9/11 American culture. Taking place almost entirely in a taxi cab, a man is stricken with dismay as he discovers an invisible entity in the back of his seat demanding to be delivered to a certain location, you know, as most passengers would request. The cab driver of India 21 is almost sure of a microphone being hidden somewhere but nothing is to be found except the briefcase in the backseat which carries a disembodied voice barking out commands. Out of all the shorts within DeGenerazione, India 21 manages to be one of the more powerful and pertinent to today's news. I sadly don't have much more to say as this happens to be a short that depends on a viewing in order to critically assess it and to cherish what surprises it carries. Finally Together accompanies the collection next which plays out similarly to the formula of Lars von Trier's later Antichrist - a tale of a couple on retreat in the forest in which death and fury follows. After witnessing an act of cruelty against an animal, the woman refuses to accept killing hands. Though similar in ways to Antichrist, the ideologies are different. Finally Together embraces the feline and feminine while the man fears the death of intellect. Both have strange visions and phobias of each other harming one another and hopes to settle down after brutality purifies them. Only then can they be "finally together".

The final short film is Squeak! in which punk rock assassins/fledgling filmmakers decide to film a snuff movie out of their target. Bashing typical horror tropes with satire, lines like "Chainsaws are outdated", Squeak! is the perfect postcard of DeGenerazione which highlights the oft-anarchic and belligerent nature of this anthology. Squeak! also features Asia Argento who calls her fellow crusty rock-filmmakers "fucking pigs of whores" while proclaiming her assumed ex-lover lover named Cyclops to be better partners in crime. "We watch movies...Dario Argento!" Wrapping up with a romantic getaway, DeGenerazione represents the highest peak of hidden gems. It really is a shame a film which juggles intense genius and a lack of sensitivity is so incredibly rare and has been swept under the mat of cult films. Also brimming with punk commercial attitude and a likewise soundtrack, DeGenerazione spreads its dusty cheer onto every witness of its splendor. I implore any and all to track down this video library of mutated expressionism as it happens to be one of the more surprising viewings I've had in a similar genre.

-mAQ

SCARLET DIVA

Asia Argento* (2000)

Although a rather absurd and patently pathetic thing to think about and surely symbolic of the decline of great Guido cinema, ever since Italian actress Asia Argento (New Rose Hotel, Last Days) began directing her own films almost two decades ago when she contributed a segment to the goombah horror anthology DeGenerazione (1994), she has become a much more interesting, provocative, artful, and mature auteur filmmaker than her formerly more famous father, giallo maestro Dario Argento (Suspiria, Opera). Indeed, while Dario's filmmaking career has degenerated to the point of unintentionally parodying his previous and infinitely superior cinematic efforts, even directing a film entitled Giallo starring Hebraic hack actor Adrien Brody (who infamously sued the filmmaker and his cohorts for not receiving his full salary for acting in the film), Asia has opted for breaking with the family tradition of directing horror genre flicks and valiantly entered the world of aberrant-garde arthouse cinema, with her semi-autobiographical work Scarlet Diva (2000) aka A Diva Escarlate, which was the first Italian feature-length film shot entirely on digital video. On top of being the prodigal daughter of Dario Argento—a rather dubious dude who filmed his daughter getting raped in his work The Stendhal Syndrome (1996)—Asia also happens to be the granddaughter of 'Italian Leni Riefenstahl' Elio Luxardo and the great-granddaughter of Italian fascist composer Alfredo Casella, but one would hardly suspect that from watching Scarlet Diva, a decidedly degenerate digital video 'diary' of sorts from a deeply wounded soul that, among other things, features an unsimulated sex scene of the seemingly self-destructive actress being penetrated doggy-style by a negro named Tyrone (played by the actress' ex-boyfriend) while having her hair pulled. Despite that fact, Dario Argento, who also quasi-incestuously filmed his daughter naked in his anorexia-themed (Dario's stepdaughter/Asia's ½ sister Anna Ceroli suffered from the eating disorder before tragically dying in a car accident a year after the film was released) horror flick Trauma (1993), also acted as the producer of Scarlet Diva and a video cassette of the film can even be seen in the director's shockingly terrible pseudo-Hitchcockian TV movie Do You Like Hitchcock? (2005). Starring Asia Argento herself in the lunatic lead role as an exceedingly lonely and nihilistically self-destructive Italian actress who wants to shed her international sex symbol status and become a serious arthouse filmmaker, Scarlet Diva is, if nothing else, a uniquely unflattering example of life imitating art and vice versa. Indeed, if Scarlet Diva and her subsequent Korine-esque feature-length flick The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things (2004) are in any way indicative of where Asia Argento is heading in the future as a filmmaker, she indubitably one day might become the most infamous female auteur since Leni Riefenstahl.

24-year-old Italian-born (but of 1/4 Brazilian extraction) International su-

SCARLET DIVA

perstar actress Anna Battista (Asia Argento) had already starred in 20 films by the age of 20 and is regarded as “the year’s best actress” in her homeland, yet she feels like “the most lonely person in the world,” which judging by her handful of bat-shit-crazy friends and dubious relationship with her discernibly fucked show business family, does not seem like that big of an exaggeration. In between being sexually pillaged by buck negroes on film sets and quitting films after being verbally reamed by directors for failing to learn her lines due to being too inebriated, Anna has a patently pathetic social life that involves doing hard drugs bought from American negro dealers and having meaningless sex with total strangers, including lunatic lesbos who she ‘allows’ to ‘rape’ her. Even Anna’s pseudo-blond bimbo best friend Veronica Lanza (Vera Gemma) has a boyfriend, though the fellow is known to keep his girlfriend hogtied naked for two days and slaps her around, but seeing as she is a major masochist, she loves it and even tells him so after he bloodies her lip. One night, Asia goes to a rock concert and falls in love at first sight with the singer of the band, Kirk Vaines (played by Jean Shepard in a role originally created for Vincent Gallo)—a very vain philistine and horrible hack musician whose lack of musical talent is only transcended by his Elvish Presley fetishism and pseudo-hip hippy arrogance—and the two inevitably have sex after the concert, with the actress remarking regarding their brief erotic excursion, “This is the first time in my life I’m making love.” Of course, decadent diva Anna has had sex more times than she can remember, but it is the first time she has felt an emotional connection with someone of the opposite sex as a lonely woman who has no problem confessing, “It’s very hard for me to love someone.” Of course, vainglorious Vaines, who at one point egomaniacally remarks “I won’t let you forget me,” abandons Anna the next morning and forgetting to take her morning-after pill, the lovelorn actress becomes pregnant. Not surprisingly, Anna has been pregnant before, but this is the first time she has not decided to abort her unborn child as she loves its father and has rather grandiose pipedreams about starting a family with the hyper hedonistic rocker. Meanwhile, Anna is attempting to change her image and become a serious artist, so she starts peddling an idea for an autobiographical film entitled ‘Scarlet Diva’ to American producers, including a fiercely foul fellow named Mr. Paar (played by serial killer obsessed painter/performance artist Joe Coleman), who attempts but fails to get the desperate (but not too desperate) would-be-director to “lick his balls.” Anna tries in vain to reunite with her bastard beloved Vaines, even offering to spontaneously fly to Australia to see him, but he repeatedly blows her off. When Anna finally has the opportunity to reunite with Vaines at a concert, she is rather heartbroken to learn that the seemingly half-retarded rocker already has a wife and child, who are also at the concert, and he does not want to see her. In a horribly hysterical state of heartsickness, Anna runs out of the venue into the dark night and eventually down a flight of stairs, ultimately falling on her stomach and losing her unborn child in the process, thus bringing a completely cataclysmic and miserably melancholy conclusion to Scarlet Diva.

Equally amateurishly assembled as it is audaciously autobiographical, Scarlet Diva is an auteur flick from a sort of penetratingly personal purgatory that makes a pretty good case that Asia Argento is quite possibly the most unhinged female filmmaker who has ever lived, as well as one of the most interesting and incendiary Italian filmmakers working today. As Asia makes quite clear in a DVD audio commentary for the film, every shot and second of Scarlet Diva is of personal significance, including the character of rocker Kurt Vaines (the director refuses to reveal who the real man is), as well as real unsimulated sex scenes with ex-boyfriends and the buying of drugs from real drug dealers. Quite humorously, in a scene early on in the film, Asia steps on a magazine featuring Sicilian-American Renaissance man Vincent Gallo (Buffalo 66, Brown Bunny) in what is a sort of 'cinematic revenge' from the director because the iconoclastic actor/filmmaker bailed out on playing the role of Kurt Vaines as he apparently wanted more money for playing the role. It also should be noted that Asia dedicated Scarlet Diva to her deceased ½ sister Anna Ceroli who died tragically in 1994 in a car accident and who is strangely portrayed in flashback scenes in Scarlet Diva by a young boy (Asia felt the actor looked a lot like her sis, so she 'transsexualized' her sis cinematically). Since she was working on a budget of next to nil, Asia shot Scarlet Diva in a guerilla style, illegally "stealing scenes" (as she calls it) at airports and various European capitals, including Rome and Paris, and even used the real untouched bedroom (which she called "aesthetically perfect") she lived in from age 13-17. Written while Asia was suffering from such severe agoraphobia that she could not leave her apartment for months, stating, "I was afraid to go out of my apartment for a long time; I could only go out to work," Scarlet Diva is naked manic and hyper histrionic psychodrama from a discernibly damaged soul who used digital video as a therapeutic outlet like no auteuress before nor after her. Featuring such unholy acts as Asia unclad shaving her hairy hightalian armpits in a flagrantly unflattering manner while her big black beaver is exposed (apparently, she grew her pubes out for the film in the hopes it would be a hit in Japan, which it was), telling her first true love she is "a whore," being quasi-raped by a big breasted lesbo (played by Italian porn star 'Selen'), and buying hash from a Yank Negro, Scarlet Diva is auteur aberrance and movie masochism at its finest uncompromisingly delivered by a director who made a point to include the quote "any artist is a prostitute" in her film. Interestingly, early on in Scarlet Diva, the protagonist is asked by a reporter, "Do you think Italian cinema is dying?," which it seems to be, especially considering there is no modern day Fellini, Pasolini, or even Fulci, yet Asia Argento has certainly helped fill the void by creating works that epitomize what Italians do best: artful exploitation and stylized sleaze.

-Ty E

THE HEART IS DECEITFUL ABOVE ALL THINGS
THE HEART IS DECEITFUL ABOVE ALL THINGS

Asia Argento* (2004)

Undoubtedly, Asia Argento is one of the most interesting and idiosyncratic female filmmakers/actresses working today; and her emotionally afflicting white trash arthouse coming-of-age flick The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things (2004) is one of the best examples as to why. Starring and directed by the exotic Italian auteuress, the film is a much more mature, artistic, and controversial work than her previous autobiographical feature-length work Scarlet Diva (2000). Indeed, Scarlet Diva may open with footage of Ms. Argento being pounded doggy-style by a bestial Negro (played by her ex-boyfriend) in a most crude and repulsive (and apparently unstimulated) manner, but The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things features a young child named Jeremiah who is repeatedly drugged, sodomized, and otherwise abused in a variety of appalling ways by a number of true blue American degenerates, including his own mother Sarah (played by Asia Argento). Taking its name from King James Version of the Bible, Book of Jeremiah, chapter 17, verse 9 and based on a novel of the same name by JT LeRoy (a fake identity taken by American writer Laura Albert who was sued for fraud right before the release of the film due to her gross literary dishonesty), The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things is a minor masterpiece of independent film with an all-star cast of ambitious actors; both young (Jeremy Renner, Michael Pitt) and old (Peter Fonda). Clearly inspired by the films of Harmony Korine (who is a personal friend of Argento), The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things is like Gummo (1997) meets Gregg Araki's Mysterious Skin (2004), except ultimately more degrading and emotionally damaging. Asia Argento's maternal great-grandfather Alfred Casella may have been a notable and respected fascist composer, but she is certainly an exponent of exceedingly decadent, degenerate, and hopelessly nihilistic art, as so brazenly expressed in The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things; a cruel coming-of-age film with such a sadistically sordid tale of a childhood-gone-askew that Henry Lee Lucas probably could have personally identified with it.

After being taken away from his loving and caring foster parents, 7-year-old Jeremiah is reunited with his drug-ridden and sex-crazed biological mother Sarah; a bleach blonde gutter-level harlot who has been long since disowned by her extremist Christian family due to her exceedingly unruly and sinful behavior. Not long after taking him in and causing him to wet his bed due to her innately deplorable lack of mothering skills, Sarah abandons Jeremiah with a melancholy pedophile (Jeremy Renner) – a pathetic man she briefly married but soon dumped after the honeymoon – who shows no mercy in his despicable deflowering of the boy. Needless to say, Jeremiah – who is in a state of absolute confusion that results in out-of-body hallucinations – ends up in the emergency after the ruthless life-altering attack, thus eventually transpiring in his Christian cult grandparents taking him in. Despite only being in the company of his mother and her many drug-addicted delinquent lovers for a short period of time, Jeremiah – to the dismay of his hyper stoic and strict authoritarian grandfather (Peter Fonda) – already shows glaring signs of being exposed to psychedelic drugs and anti-social punk rock music, as displayed by his random impromptu performance of songs by The Sex Pistols and propensity for spitting on indoor floors. Somewhat surprisingly, Jeremiah does quite well at his holier-than-thou Christian grandparents cult compound and even becomes an eager propagandist for the church, but, to his misfortune, Sarah comes back to reclaim him when he is 11-years-old. Now dating a country-loving reprobate redneck truck driver named Kenny who hates her favorite music genre of punk rock, Sarah takes her son on a relentless road trip where she prostitutes herself out to various rustic would-be-cowboys at an assortment of truck stops so she can support her steady drug consumption. Naturally, country boy Kenny gets tired of Sarah's Subhumans (UK anarcho-punk band) cassettes so he abruptly ditches her and Jeremiah at a less than delightful roadside diner. In what seems to be a dubious attempt to get her son to follow in her slapdash footsteps, Sarah encourages Jeremiah to be her 'little sister' and dresses him in drag. Clearly already mentally unsound due to a lifetime's worth of anomalous personal trauma, Jeremiah embraces his feminine side and seduces his mother's latest boyfriend Jackson (played by a hillbilly-attired Marilyn Manson), henceforth resulting in Sarah erupting into a jealous rage of sorts that involves the throwing of piss-poor beer cans and feeble excuses from Mr. Manson. By the end of The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things, Jeremiah is once again in the hospital due to his mother's insistence that he drink ipecac while she is in a frantic meth-induced psychosis. Once again, Sarah's proves her dedication as a mother by kidnapping her son and taking him on what one can only assume is another exciting and chemical-driven magical mystery tour.

To say that The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things is an extraordinarily appalling and decisively disheartening film would be a bit of a distortion as it is easily one of the most dehumanizing flicks I have ever seen, yet a barbarously brilliant, aesthetically dynamic, and undeniably captivating work nonetheless. Unlike her friend Harmony Korine's directorial debut Gummo, Asia Argento does not seem to be mocking the poor human rabble that she so keenly and calculatedly depicted. Asia also deserves much praise for her performance as crackhead concubine Sarah because despite her Italian background, she is totally convincing as a thoroughly debauched and awfully abominable Amerikkkan white trash darling with an array of undiagnosed mental illnesses and pathologies. As someone whose own father suspiciously directed her in the bare (Dario Argento's Trauma), one can only assume that Argento is desensitized to do just about any and everything on camera as displayed by her unmitigatedly unflattering but acutely enrapturing performance in The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things; one of a handful of films that has the capacity to give the viewer spiritual syphilis. In fact, she once stated of acting, "I always thought it was sick to choose looking at yourself on a big screen as your job. There has to be something crooked in your mind to want to be loved by everybody. It's like being a prostitute, to share that intimacy with all those people," so there should be no doubt as to the sort of dauntless and unhampered mind-set Asia had when approaching the role of Sarah. Her father may be regarded as a (once) legendary master of fantastic horror cinema, but his talent pales in comparison to his daughter's ability to direct true to life domestic terror and torment. After nearly a decade of reflection upon my initial viewing of The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things, I can honestly say that Asia Argento is one of a handful of filmmakers – and the only female filmmaker – whose career I eagerly follow.

THE HEART IS DECEITFUL ABOVE ALL THINGS

-Ty E

HIGHWAY TO HELL

Ate de Jong (1991)

Any film featuring dozens upon dozens of Andy Warhols doing manual slave labor in hell cannot be totally bad, even if it stars a little turd like Chad Lowe pretending to be a macho hero, neo-vaudevillian buffoon Ben Stiller and most of his family portraying lowclass working-class goyim, and singularly obnoxious and spastic Judaic jackass Gilbert Gottfried doing by far the worst and most exceedingly embarrassing Hitler impersonation in all of cinema history. Indeed, Highway to Hell (1991) directed by Dutch quasi-arthouse auteur turned failed Hollywood hack Ate de Jong (Blindgangers aka Blind Spot, Drop Dead Fred) is an extravagantly botched celluloid abortion with ridiculously retarded acting as performed by some of the most uniquely insufferable Hollywood whores, fiercely frivolous and seemingly flatulence-driven elevator music, blatantly fetishistic philistine humor, and incessant moronic goofiness, among various irritating things yet somehow I like the film and consider it a kitsch cult classic of sorts. While de Jong's film might also be one big odyssey of the odiously moronic that shits on all of Occidental history and features annoying Jewish kids that look like terminally ill cancer patients and a patently pathetic pint-sized male hero with a silly dog sidekick, it is actually a reasonably bizarre and entertaining loose-as-a-Detroit-crack-whore reworking of the classic ancient Greek myth of Orpheus set in a hermetic route 666 on the way to America's little Sodom of Las Vegas. Much like the Hollywood films of fellow Dutchman Paul Verhoeven and de Jong's most popular work Drop Dead Fred (1991), which was incidentally released earlier the same year, Highway to Hell is a film with two layers, with one layer that was made to appeal to the lowbrow 'bread and circus' American majority and another layer to appeal to more discerning viewers with some sort of understanding of classic Western philosophy, history, and spirituality, but as the director stated in an interview with Fangoria, "You don't need to comprehend the second level to make this film work for you. If you miss the second level, you missing nothing." Penned and produced by Norwegian-American screenwriter Brian Koppelman who was previously responsible for writing hokey horror trash like 976-EVIL (1988) directed by Robert 'Freddy Krueger' Englund and A Nightmare on Elm Street 4: The Dream Master (1988) and who would later go on to write more 'respectable' works like Mystic River (2003), this sometimes campy and oftentimes irreverent Orpheus molestation may be plagued by a virtual army of ugly kosher comedians and a storm of infantile humor but it ultimately has a traditional Western heart and spirit beneath all the seemingly Semitic stupidity. Trashed by lapsed Satanist Nikolas Schreck—the estranged son-in-law of Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey who was a prominent figure in left-hand path movements in the 1980s and 1990s but eventually renounced Satanism and converted to Tantric Buddhism in 2003—in his book The Satanic Screen: An

HIGHWAY TO HELL

Illustrated Guide to the Devil in Cinema (2001) as having "...the filmsy feel of an extended heavy metal music video, and the picture's trite depiction of the Satanic realm is firmly grounded in that juvenile aesthetic" yet failing to realize it is a Orphic flick that mocks the whole "heavy metal music video" aesthetic instead of embracing it, Highway to Hell is ultimately an eccentrically epic piece of strangely dignified trash with something bordering on a decent message hidden under all the juvenile Judaic jokes.

Charlie Sykes (Chad Lowe) is a short and scrawny pedomorphic pizza delivery boy with a barely working piece-of-shit car who has somehow managed to make a beautiful blonde babe named Rachel Clark (Kristy Swanson of Flowers in the Attic (1987) and Buffy the Vampire Slayer (1992)) not only fall in love with him, but also agree to marry him. Indeed, the ostensible all-American couple are headed to Las Vegas to get hitched on a whim without telling anyone, although Rachel left her mother a note about the big news so that she won't get worried. On the way to Vegas, Charlie becomes paranoid that a cop is following him, so he decides to take an alternate route and eventually stops at a rather remote gas station where a nice, if not somewhat strange, old fart named Sam (Richard Farnsworth of David Lynch's The Straight Story (1999)) attempts to warn him and his girlfriend not to take the alternate route and even offers to allow the two to sleep in a cozy cabin that he has behind his store. Of course, chump Charlie does not take heed of Sam's warnings, including that he should keep his eyes out for two Joshua trees and to never pull over for any reason until he passes the second one. Ultimately, Charlie falls asleep at the wheel right before passing the second Joshua tree and subsequently experiences the nightmare of a lifetime after being pulled over by a pernicious policeman named 'The Hellcop' (C. J. Graham, who played Jason Voorhees in Friday the 13th Part VI: Jason Lives (1986))—a demonic zombie-like cop from Hades with a pentagram for a badge, discernibly tall Nordic frame and bald dolichocephalic skull with Biblical quotes carved into his skin (notably, FX designer Steven Johnson credited Clive Barker's series Books of Blood as the influence for the look)—who rips the passenger door off of his car, pulls Rachel out and locks her in his patrol car, and beats up the protagonist and his fluffy white dog Mr. Ben. Needless to say, startled bitch boy Charlie immediately goes back to old man Ben and learns that his girlfriend has been taken to a supernatural "road within a road" called 'The Highway to Hell' where he has 24 hours to find his girlfriend or both of them will be trapped in hell for eternity. As it turns out, Sam's own fiancée Clara (Pamela Gidley of Thrashin' (1986) and Lynch's Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992)) disappeared on the same road 50 years before and ever since then he has been waiting in vain for her to come back. Ultimately, Sam equips Charlie with a specially made sawed-off shotgun designed by Clara with special ammo and a fancy old antique car with a special attribute that the protagonist neglects to discover until at the very moment he needs to use it most.

To enter the Highway to Hell, Charlie has to first 'believe in it,' so while attempting to break on through to the fire and brimstone side while driving like a maniac, he is pulled by a real cop who he mistakes for the Hell Cop and monotonically pulls his shotgun on, thus resulting in a car chase between two grade A wusses that concludes with the protagonist finally being transported to the desert netherworld. Meanwhile, Hellcop takes Rachel to a sleazy satanic diner called 'Pluto's Donuts' that is inhabited by grotesque dead zombie cops that have been waiting around for what seems like an eternity for service as Ben Stiller's shiksa mother Anne Meara, who plays a whorish waitress with the curious name Medea, dreams of jumping on the skinheaded zombicop's undead cock. Rather fittingly, Jerry Stiller plays a bitchy desk cop whose incessant bitching annoys the perennially mute Hellcop so much that he zaps him with his special gun while Rachel manages to escape by pouring coffee on the zombie handcuffs she is bound to. Upon running out of the diner, Rachel runs into a degenerate archetypal swarthy and greasy white trash cook played by Ben Stiller who cooks food on the hot asphalt and who offers the leading lady a nasty piece of steak which she turns down, thus inspiring the creepy culinary artist to call her a "vegetarian bitch." Of course, it does not take long for Rachel to get captured, as a dickheaded degenerate named Royce (Adam Storke)—a moronic metalhead and true rebel without a cause who is more or less the Devil's failed protégé—and his gang of half-braindead biker bastards soon find her running through the desert and decide to defile her due to her glaring virginal essence. Ultimately, instead of popping her cherry, Royce hands Rachel over to Hellcop, but with the stipulation that he "owes him." Notably, Royce's 'old lady' is Sam's long-lost fiancée Clara, who still has all her beauty intact and takes a Sapphic interest in Rachel, who is clearly not interested. As she later reveals during the film, Clara is not the perfect pussy on a pedestal that Sam imagined her to be, as she was not an actual victim of the devil but instead decided to stay in hell of her own free will because she thought eternal damnation would be cool and did not think she need her fiancé.

After a run-in with cunt-rocker Lita Ford that ends with him having to literally blow off the head of a conspicuously crazed cannibalistic ice cream man that threatens to scoop his brains out, as well as a Rebel Without a Cause (1955) style showdown with Royce and his gang of buffoonish bastard bikers, Charlie finds himself with some serious car damage and needs oil. Luckily, a 'Satanic Mechanic' with an 'AAA' (Anarchy, Armageddon, Annihilation) sticker on his tow truck named 'Beezle' (Irishman Patrick Bergin)—a fellow whose name alludes to his real identity as 'Beelzebub' (otherwise known as the Devil)—offers to fix Charlie's car free of charge. Apparently, Beezle has the power to fix a lot more than just automobiles and he has an adopted sickly Jewish child apprentice named Adam (Jarrett Lennon) that was purportedly brought to him by the Devil to be mentored. Since Charlie is in a hurry, he leaves Beezle's auto-shop immediately after he finishes fixing his car, not realizing that little Jewboy Adam has decided to join him and has attached himself to the side of the protagonist's car. On his way to save Rachel, Charlie spots a virtual army of Andy Warhol doppelgangers—retarded blond wig and autistic mannerisms and all—working on the road, guiding traffic, and grinding up murderously salacious sinners in a giant machine that turns their body into mince meat. At around this point, little Adam startles Charlie by jumping into the car and the protagonist subsequently promises to take him back to the mortal realm after finding Rachel.

HIGHWAY TO HELL

Eventually after doing much driving on the otherworldly satanic open-road, Charlie ends up at a casino populated by evil historical figures like Hitler (Gilbert Gottfried), Cleopatra (Ben Stiller's sister Amy Stiller), and Attila the Hun (unfortunately, Ben Stiller again) where he finds Rachel trapped inside a stripper cage. Although Charlie manages to get Rachel out of the cage, the lovers' reunion is short-lived as Hell Cop soon shows up and seemingly kills the protagonist by blowing a hole through his stomach with a shotgun. Luckily, Adam takes it upon himself to get help for the protagonist by getting Mr. Fix-It aka Beezle, who manages to perfectly repair Charlie's seemingly fatal wounds while a pathologically neurotic Hitler attempts to convince a vain valley-girl-like Cleopatra that he is not actually Hitler, but a 17-year-old suburban metalhead that likes playing guitar. Great Ugandan dictator Idi Amin also receives a "white courtesy call" at the casino but he never shows up to pick it up. Notably, there are spots reserved at the satanic casino for Imelda Marcos, Muammar Gaddafi, Jerry Lewis, and P.W. Botha. Charlie has to get to Hell City and Bezzle dubiously recommends taking the "Road to Nowhere" as a shortcut where the protagonist ultimately ends up at a cave in the desert where he finds Hellcop's car. Clara shows up at the cave and attempts to warn Charlie to take a different route, but the would-be-pretty-boy protagonist is drunk on heroism and ignores her advice. Upon entering deeper into the cave, Charlie enters a misleadingly angelic pastel pink, white, and yellow room where he finds Rachel gagged and bound to a bed in a S&M/BDSM fashion and he soon fights Hellcop and somehow manages to zap the zombicop to death after being thrown around for a little bit like a little ragdoll. Needless to say, Charlie subsequently unties Rachel from the bed but is startled by his virginal fiancée's uncharacteristic behavior after she aggressively attempts to get him to deflower right then and there. Upon seeing Rachel's reflection in the mirror, he notices she is not his statuesque fiancée but a lethally lecherous demoness that resembles a cross between a gremlin and an elderly negress with grotesquely saggy tits. Luckily, Charlie manages to send her straight to the pits of hell, but he does not have his girlfriend and upon leaving the cave, he realizes everything was an illusion as Hellcop's police car and various other objects randomly disappear into thin air, thus making it quite obvious that he should have followed Clara's advice.

After spending too much idle time on nothing Charlie begins chasing Hell-cop on the highway to Hell City that is full of speeding vintage Volkswagen car, thus indicating that Hitler must have transferred his auto industry to the underworld after blowing his brains out in his Berlin bunker in 1945. When Charlie eventually gets to the gates to Hell City, he realizes he has to cross water with the electric sign: "Abandon All Hope Ye Who Enter," but he is a mortal and not a damned lost soul, so he has to get creative. After his dog Mr. Ben helps him avoid being eaten by a three-headed hellhound by peeing near the beast, Charlie encounters a creepy negro Muslim with his eyes sewed up named Charon (played by Kevin Peter Hall of Predator fame, who died of AIDS the same year that the film was released, in his final acting role) who reluctantly allows him to take the boat ride into Hell City since he believes that rules should be broken. Upon arriving at the Prince of Darkness' palace, Charlie finds Rachel in no time, but instead of being in a prison cell or something like that, his fiancée is living a life of luxury and is learning to become a professional violinist. When the Devil finally arrives, he acts fairly charming and after a small argument he agrees to allow Charlie and Rachel leave so long as they "don't look back." Before going back to earth, Charlie takes Rachel to Beezle's place to honor his promise to bring little Adam back to earth. Ultimately, Charlie soon discovers that Beezle and the Devil are the same guy and he makes a wager that if he can beat Hell Cop in a race, he can take Peter back to earth but if he loses Rachel has to stay in hell on her own free will. Of course, good wins and love conquers all in the end.

Somewhat shockingly, auteur Ate de Jong made one notable, albeit semi-cryptic, reference to his Dutch background towards the end of Highway to Hell in a scene where Early Netherlandish painter Hieronymus Bosch's masterpiece triptych The Garden of Earthly Delights can be seen hanging on the wall of Satan's lush palace. Personally, I think that it was a rather wise choice on Jong's part as the film is like a degenerate version of the painting in hopelessly 1990s celluloid form. Also, like the painting, the film features an otherworldly realm that transcends the typically fine line between heaven and hell, as well as paradise and purgatory and the gorgeous and grotesque. After all, I think a good percentage of people would not mind hanging around the surrealist realm contained within film for a little bit of time, as it certainly beats the real-life multicultural hell that exists in the United States and Europe nowadays, plus nobody would turn down the opportunity to see Warhol doing slave labor. Ultimately, Highway to Hell is a very strange and surprisingly ambitious and, in turn, convoluted work that was bound to fail commercially in that it features a curious intersection between the most moronic of Hollywood neo-Vaudevillian stupidity, a vague subtextual European arthouse perspective, random slasher conventions (as personified by the iconic killer 'Hellcop'), as well as references or allusions to countless films, including Jean Cocteau's Orphic Trilogy (The Blood of a Poet, Orpheus, Testament of Orpheus), Mad Max (1979), Back to the Future (1985), The Lost Boys (1987), and Beetlejuice (1988), among various other works, thereupon making for one truly peculiar and undeniably entertaining piece of postmodern celluloid purgatory.

HIGHWAY TO HELL

Quite shockingly, de Jong's film was not the only American mutation of the Orpheus myth made during the 1990s, as Robert McGinley's little known dystopian cult flick Shredder Orpheus (1990) features the eponymous tragic hero as a skaterboarder-cum-rocker who must save his beloved Eurydice in a Hades that is in the fitting form of a television network that is run by Svengali-like individuals that bear a striking resemblance to cocksucking kraut new wave countertenor Klaus Nomi. Of course, there is also other notable cinematic reworking of the classic Greek myth, including the negrified Brazilian Palme d'Or and Academy Award winning work Black Orpheus (1959) aka Orfeu Negro directed by French auteur Marcel Camus, which was later remade by Carlos Diegues as Orfeu (1999), as well as the East German 70mm DEFA production Orpheus in der Unterwelt (1975) aka Orpheus in the Underworld directed by Horst Bonnet and based on a scandalous play by Prussian-born French Jewish composer Jacques Offenbach. Contemporary Greek auteur Nikos Nikolaidis, who is probably best known for his salaciously brutal work Singapore Sling: The Man Who Loved a Corpse (1990), also revamped the myth for his debut feature Evridiki BA 2037 (1975) aka Euridice BA 2037 and French auteur Jacques Demy even paid tribute to Jean Cocteau's 1950 version Orpheus with his rock musical Parking (1985). In terms of queer Orphic works, the Belgian-Dutch-French co-production Mascara (1987)—a work where hell is depicted as an underground S&M opera house where trans performance for degenerate politicians and other bigwigs—is probably the most flagrant and flamboyant in its flavorsome faggotry. Out of all these various versions of the Orpheus myth, Highway to Hell is indubitably the most modernized, arguably the most idiosyncratic, and certainly the most Hollywoodized as a work that provides an absurdist nonsensical happy ending to an ancient Greek tragedy. Although unbelievable to think about nowadays, there was actually talk of a Highway to Hell sequel, but of course that never happened because the film was a huge flop. Indubitably, director de Jong had delusional hopes for the film, as he was anticipating the flick would make him famous as reflected by a remark he made in Fangoria just before the film was released where he explained, "I'm a nobody right now...When this film comes out, maybe I won't be." Clearly, de Jong had no clue how innately whacked out his film really was, as Highway to Hell not only resulted in his swift exit from Hollywood and his return to the Netherlands, but also his banishment to the netherworld of television where he would stay until somewhat recently until he began making much maligned Hollywood-esque Dutch efforts like Het Bombardement (2012). Indeed, de Jong might now be an insufferable hack who went from arthouse to the aesthetically autistic and asinine, but he at least managed to direct two American cult classics, Drop Dead Fred and Highway to Hell, which temporary offered American youth relief from the aesthetic sterility of Hebraic (un)hollywood. Indeed, if there is a sort of Fellini Satyricon (1969) of horror-comedies in terms of a celluloid odyssey that combines the epic with the eccentric, it is most certainly Highway to Hell.

-Ty E

EXOTICA
EXOTICA

Atom Egoyan (1994)

Canadian director Atom Egoyan's film Exotica has a pretty misleading title. Although a good amount of the film takes place in a strip joint, the film won't satisfy the desires of someone looking to get off. For the most part, Exotica is a very depressing film that has not a single redeeming character. Mia Kirshner is the least flawed as a formal honor student turned lonely stripper. Elias Koteas (who played Casey Jones in the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles movies) plays a asshole strip club DJ (former lover of Kirshner's character). Add a gay criminal pet shop owner and a mentally disturbed middle aged widower (his daughter was also murdered among other things) and you get a film that would destroy any sexual ambitions you may have.

Exotica reminded me of a darker and more stylized film Robert Altman (has anyone realized he died?) may have directed. The editing also owes some credit to Nicholas Roeg (Man Who Fell To Earth, Bad Timing). But influences are unimportant as Exotica stands on its own as an original and quality film. Director Atom Egoyan, no doubt, has talent and I need to look further into his film lexicon. I guess David Cronenberg and Guy Maddin aren't the only good directors to come out of Canada.

My only complaint with Exotica is its pretentiousness. Even the greatest works of cinema history let you know life isn't 100% serious hellhole (i.e. Grand Illusion, 8 ½, Eraserhead). At no point in Exotica does anything become less than serious. Of course, its good to see very serious directors nowadays. We don't need another Todd Phillips.

Mia Kirshner has a thing for older and pregnant women. She even gets turned on when touching the women's stomach. I really hope that Egoyan doesn't have a pregnant woman fetish. It was a conscious decision on his part to put this womb obsessed scene in the film. Although Kirshner's dialog is small, her role and performance are crucial. She's one I also plan to look out for in the future. She was quite the bitch in Party Monster.

Exotica is a dark film for those that enjoy well written, directed, and constructed cinema. It has something new to offer with each further viewing. Just don't expect soft core pornography. You can find that on HBO.

-Ty E

CHLOE

Atom Egoyan (2010)

I have been eagerly waiting for sometime to see Atom Egoyan direct another film that even compares to the psycho-sexual electricity of his brilliant work Exotica. That being said, I never thought his next best film would be a highly unconventional lipstick lesbian affair between a voluptuous eighteen year old Aryan girl and a middle-aged red-headed housewife. The sexual romance occurs unconsciously (or at least for the older gal) when a wife disillusion-ally suspects her husband of banging his young college students. I guess the wife has reason to suspect when her husband seems more interested in instant-messaging his female students online than engaging in coitus with a woman he used to passionately pound three times a day. To make the film extra-sexually-subversive, Atom Egoyan made sure to have the wife's son have some high quality hard-on time with the woman of his Mother's subconscious dreams. Like Exotica before it, Chloe is a brilliantly crafted and lavishly paced film that engages the viewer in intercourse during the film's beginning and explodes with a pleasantly fulfilling climax at the end. With most of the beautiful lipstick lesbians I have met in my life, I have noticed a couple things. For one, the lipstick lesbian is not a sexually inverted bulldyke with too much testosterone who wishes to be male, but usually wallows in the wonderful world of female beauty. Secondly, the lipstick-lebso seems to have not been born with a love of female-on-female cunnilingus but instead developed her fetishistic vice through the lack of development of a mother-daughter relationship as a child just as Chloe hints at throughout Chloe. The married Mother Catherine becomes the perfect motherly replacement for Chloe, a woman that in age could be her own mother. When Chloe attempts to give Catherine her own Mother's hairpin, she is symbolically asking the older woman to replace her own Mother, even if it is in the form of a behind the curtains night of engaging in each others meat curtains. Wife and Mother Catherine's Lesbian inclinations seem to be the result of her loss of sexual passion for husband and her overall lack of sexual potency as a Mother. She gets aroused at the idea of the young Chloe passionately fondling her husband, for it makes her feel like she did when she was young. Also, being a gynecologist and a sage of the Vagina, Chloe must have been tempted to go down South more than once during her life. Unfortunately for Chloe it seems that Catherine just wanted a taste of the blond beastess. Catherine's eighteen year old son offered Chloe some masturbatory fun but the boy toy could never replace a Mother figure. I think Atom Egoyan should be noted as the director of the truly best family affair for Chloe's passionate nuclear family scare is certainly cinematically quite rare. Chloe is a brave film and Atom Egoyan is no doubt a brave auteur. Apparently, Chloe was a film that either the critics loved or hated. I certainly do not see feminists, bulldyke lesbians, or any other type of prudish wanna-be-men/men-haters enjoying the film. I have seen more than my fair share of Lesbian-themed films and Chloe is the only one to successfully combine eroticism, sexually-paced storytelling, and passionate-acting for a believable madis-tale that one will think about long after the experience is over. Isn't that what good sex is about?

CHLOE

-Ty E

ANGEL OF DARKNESS

Atsushi Shimizu (1995)

Angel Of Darkness is a live-action adaption of some weird 5 chapter tentacle porn released on DVD in Japan. Those crazy Japs. There is no limit to the amount of absurdity they will cram into a film regardless of how horribly it defines the movie. This is among of the the first of it's kind, along with the uber-cooler Urotsukidoji. So the storyline follows a tormented professor on the campus of a women's schools. This film does nothing but elaborates on how every female is a prostitute and tries really hard to satisfy many fetishes in this hour long affair. After witnessing some of his students getting paid for sex and loving it, gloating about what they will buy next, he suffers some sort of chest pain and blacks out. The same girl gets raped by tentacles and dies in pure ecstasy. More of this happens to females depicted crudely. This one could be seen as misogynistic near the end, when poor possessed Mr. Tomo goes on about how women wait to be pleased. More or less calling them scum of life. The film is a softcore porn with mundane situations, sapping stupidity, horrible effects, overacting involving moaning, and a shitty love story behind it all that it never delved into, so when the end comes around, this whole backstory comes at you sideways. Expect a satirical view at the youth of our generation, passing out sex toys in class, trying to seduce their teachers and such. This film has nothing to do with angels, or darkness for that matter. Other than the fact that i want to curl into the fetal position after watching this lame excuse of a film and even a porno, i am terrified to think there are 5 more of these films. Maybe they improve upon the mistakes. I wouldn't count on it. Having a low budget film is no excuse for an all-around fail.

-Maq

NOW YOU SEE ME, NOW YOU DON'T
NOW YOU SEE ME, NOW YOU DON'T

Attila Szász (2005)

“Now You See Me, Now You Don’t” is a film we have seen many times before in those shit mainstream films. This one is different though for the simple fact that it works. “Now You See Me, Now You Don’t” is a masterfully spun hypnotic short showing the deterioration within a family. We see a troubled mother bathed in a harmonious light, smoking and cooking. We see her ignored calls from her husband and her mischievous son playing near the stove. Everything is in place in this Hungarian suburb. The roses need gardening and the stove needs to be attended. This certainly is not an illusion. The husband arrives silently and looks scornful at his own family. This emotion is very similar to the one you felt in Douglas Buck’s Cutting Moments. Every scene is bathed in natural lighting and wonderful, lush vegetation is everywhere to be seen. The cinematography is simply amazing, delivering perpetual angles only heightens the emotion. Director Attila Szasz does an incredible job forming the characters and the dialogue in its 27-minute runtime. After the experiment takes place, you feel alone as the child does. Such a deed can surely be forgotten, but it remains fresh in their minds. I, personally, look forward to any of Szasz’s future projects and hope he sticks to his predestined course. This film shows behind every family can be a dark secret and behind every secret can be forgiveness.

-Maq

EYES OF FIRE

Avery Crouse (1983)

While still in my preteen years, I experienced a life-changing experience when I received a fairly large cardboard box full of horror VHS tapes. Including in the box were such films as Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (1974), Chopper Chicks in Zombietown (1989), From a Whisper to a Scream aka The Offspring (1987), Burial Ground: The Nights of Terror (1981), The Evil Dead Series, and various other films that I have long forgotten. Naturally, many of these films left a deep impression on my relatively pure soul at the time; the forgotten mystical American pioneer horror flick Eyes of Fire (1983) – directed by unknown auteur Avery Crouse – being one of the most memorable and ultimately rewarding. If you ever wondered what a Gothic horror film would be like had it been set in the woods of 1750s American instead of an abandoned Victorian mansion, Eyes of Fire may very possibly be the only film to offer such a delightful yet equally deranged experience. Although it must have been a horrifying experience for European Christians to blindly immigrate to the untamed Americas and fall prey to mostly hostile and heretical mongoloid savages, few films have dared to dive deep into the metaphysical horror associated with such true-to-life (but never mentioned) experience. Not only does Eyes of Fire feature beastly brown men but it also includes nefarious nude spirits lurking amongst ancient trees and engaged in an unnamed wild hunt. While watching the film as a youngster, I couldn't figure out whether I loved Eyes of Fire or loathed it, but I certainly found myself magnetized to it as I couldn't help but insert my Vestron VHS copy of the flick into my VCR in a somewhat religious manner. Although I could not articulate it during my middle school days, I now know that I was awed to the state of virtual hypnosis by the genuinely ominous atmosphere and mystical nature of Eyes of Fire. Hell, I found Eyes of Fire to be so creepy that I derived nil sexual interest from the full-frontal nudity quite a rare find for me during those virginal days without cable television) featured in the film. Like the lucid weird horror tales of H.P. Lovecraft, eroticism is totally trampled and nonexistent (despite the rampant nudity and occasional sex scenes featured within) in the wild wooded world contained within Eyes of Fire. Cheap sex is usually a given in the realm of modern horror cinema, so it is no small feat when a film from the genre has the ability to enamor the viewer without relying on the novelty of botched silicone jobs and tortuously dull torture porn.

Until a couple months ago, I hadn't watched Eyes of Fire for well over a decade and I really had no interest in re-watching the film as many of the works that I enjoyed in my childhood bring little more than nostalgia for me nowadays. Like old girlfriends, I generally find it hopelessly redundant to revisit films that flabbergasted me in the past for such emotions can never be captured once the naive wonder of youth has faded with time. Admittedly, Eyes of Fire proved to be an exception to my mostly full-proof rule. Like Wes Craven's Buñuel-esque surrealist horror masterpiece A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984), Eyes of Fire still manages to hold most of the same cinematic prowess over me as it did when I was a relatively naïve youngster. In fact, I find Eyes of Fire to be a much grander voyeuristic pleasure nowadays than when I first saw the film as a child as it seems much more coherent. After all, it has been nearly a decade since my pre-Fellini-addict days. Like a Fellini flick, Avery Crounse's supernatural American pioneer flick is full of magic but unlike the eccentric character-driven films of everyone's favorite 1/2 Roman circus magician auteur, Eyes of Fire is of a quasi-pagan nature where the undeniable majesty of the wilderness has infinite power over the various pseudo-Christ's and crosses carved out of timber featured throughout the film. In Eyes of Fire, entire families are lost in the abyss of seemingly shallow streams and children are turned into aesthetically pleasing tree bark. Throughout the film, European Christian settlers also fall prey to the ferocity of bastardized Christian prayers, sober Shawnee Injuns, and the arcane chasm of the wilderness itself. If the film has any message, it is that, depending on the worshiper, any religion has the ability to bring prosperity or pestilence and everything in between. In Eyes of Fire, a charlatan Christian reverend (stereotypically named Will Smythe) thinks that it is a blessing that he randomly finds a demonic Indian child that he can baptize, but, instead, he only sparks hell-on-earth for his followers and the wilderness that surrounds them. Maybe if real-life spiritually-intoxicated Christian missionaries took the time to watch Eyes of Fire, they would think twice about baptizing exceedingly dirty third world savages with their precious holy water. As one soon learns early on in Eyes of Fire, only a somewhat insane feisty fire-crotch named Leah with a knack for white magic has the ability to save these cursed Christians and break the black magic spell, thus, one could argue that the film is of a somewhat pro-pagan nature.

EYES OF FIRE

Eyes of Fire may not be a neglected masterpiece of cinema history but it is surely one of the best kept secrets of the most redundant American horror genre. Like most great horror films, Eyes of Fire is big on atmosphere and features a disparate netherworld worthy of being compared to the most distinctive of real nightmares. Also, unlike most films (and that includes Hollywood) in general, Eyes of Fire is pure Americana, but, thankfully, not in the romantic sense. In fact, Eyes of Fire features the kind of atmosphere you would expect from Mr. David "weird Americana" Lynch, minus absurd humor (although, I do suspect that many viewers will find a scene featuring nude entities taking sips from the mammilla of a cow to be somewhat unintentionally humorous) and peculiar sex fetishes (unless you happen to be an individual who finds the great outdoors to be sexually alluring). Eyes of Fire is one of those rare horror films that will be in most cases enjoyable to even those individuals who tend to find all-things-horror nothing short of repellant. Of course, due to its age and the relatively low-budget that it was shot on, Eyes of Fire sometimes has a certain cheesy charm that will satisfy those many individuals that are addicted 1980s horror films. If Mother Nature ever contracted a vicious venereal disease it would most likely resemble the ferocious forests featured in Eyes of Fire. If any film has the ability to tap into spiritual chaos in Christian and Neo-Pagans alike, it is indubitably Eyes of Fire. As for the title "Eyes of Fire" itself, I sincerely doubt I am diving head-first into the pool of absurdity when I state that the film is a pyromaniac's wet dream. Indeed, the film features literal eyes of fire but it also features a fireworks show of some of the most aesthetically delectable pyrotechnics ever committed to the highly flammable medium of celluloid.

-Ty E

KISS NAPOLEON GOODBYE
KISS NAPOLEON GOODBYE

Babeth Mondini (1990)

I must admit that I am a fan of artsy fartsy films and even self-indulgent directors. One strongman is always more powerful than a team of cattle collaborators. Auteur filmmakers such as Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Pier Paolo Pasolini sought out to direct films with a specific vision to be achieved and not to create products that can be consumed by the unthinking masses. There is, however, a problem with many art films. This problem includes the many self-centered individuals that lack a strong and extremely personal vision. Kiss Napoleon Goodbye (1990) directed by Babeth Mondini is a perfect example of a weak "art" film that offers nothing new to the world of cinema. Kiss Napoleon Goodbye features annoying feminist Lydia Lunch and former Black Flag singer Henry Rollins. Lydia Lunch is nothing special to look at and hearing her doing a "spoken word" performance makes her an even bigger turn-off. Henry Rollins lacks his distinct "salt and pepper" hair as his performance in Kiss Napoleon Goodbye was before he started playing cops in Hollywood films. Another forgettable actor, Don Bajema, plays a bitchy man in the film. Kiss Napoleon Goodbye is a film that basically follows an unconventional couple dissolution when a man named Jackson (played by Rollins) shows up and starts banging the woman of the household. Kiss Napoleon Goodbye is around 30 minutes long and nothing particularly interesting happens in the film. Lydia Lunch baring her gigantic ass in tribute to her feminist pride as a female is probably the most poignant part of the film. I can see how a disgruntled feminist could appreciate Kiss Napoleon Goodbye because it shows how a woman, with her whorish goods, can destroy two men's lives without any real effort, aside from exposing her naked body. Director Babeth got his point across with his portrait of a female dominated bizarre love triangle. He also added a few contrived dream sequences such as a man drilling his own head with an electric drill. Nothing new to see here, folks. I can only recommend Kiss Napoleon Goodbye to fans of Lydia Lunch or Henry Rollins. The film was also filmed by legendary independent filmmaker Mike Kuchar. Of course, aside from its obviously low budget, Kuchar's contribution to the film is virtually hidden due to an overall banal short. Kiss Napoleon Goodbye looks like it was filmed over a weekend without any real preparation. What a waste for a setting considering the short was shot at a former castle of Louis Napoleon in the Netherlands. I can't imagine those involved with the film, especially Henry Rollins, were happy with the results.

-Ty E

CHICHI RANGERS

Bakunyuu (???) Japan; the wondrous land of the weird. Since the age of time, the Japs have been doing it "bizzaro" style. Whether it being bestiality, squid sex, and plain weirdness. Their off culture has inspired crazy street fashions and presented kooky fetishes to a mainstream audience. With the cartoon intensity of a Peeland-Z concert, I introduce you to Chichi Rangers, a super Sentai porno with Power Ranger influences. Most fans of Dragonball Z will now that Chi Chi is Japanese for breasts. Staying faithful to the name, this trio of crime and sex fighters have removable Styrofoam bras in which are removed in the sex scenes. The film opens up with archived footage feature the stereotyped "goofy Asian" face superimposed over a face. If the Japanese can't take their art seriously, why should I? The film is supposedly a mini-series of sorts, perhaps a collection of three episodes. A Japanese male rapes another male while jumping up and down while making bizarre animal calls. A woman is kidnapped by monochromatic ninjas. She is taken to a warehouse and is then forced to suck off all the disgusting henchmen. A Chichi Ranger who serves as a prostitute follows her and in a confusing twist, ends up jerking off the rest while the crying girl takes pride and helps finish them off. The characters don't seem to make sense and the monsters are wacky and inventive. Even though it lacks subtitles and is in a different language, the majority of dialogue comes from the grandmaster villain. Chichi Rangers is rarely erotic and due to the censorship laws in Japan, it looks every time nudity is shown, that the women are actually fucking/sucking a Space Invader. Pixels might be the true key to the ultimate orgasm. Female masturbation may be considered a myth, but the hilarity of these is not.

-mAQ

MAÎTRESSE
MAÎTRESSE

Barbet Schroeder (1976)

Although some might assume otherwise due to some of my writings, I consider myself a dark romantic of sorts and I am somewhat of a sucker for films about 'mad love,' especially of the tragic star-crossed lovers orientated sort. Of course, that also means that I absolutely despise popular Hollywood romantic-comedies like When Harry Met Sally... (1989) and There's Something About Mary (1998) where some physically weak (and oftentimes Jewish) beta-boy grovels and cons his way into the pretty pink panties of a dumb blonde shiksa that cannot seem to find a real red-blooded mensch that sufficiently sops her undies. Hell, I even consider the unrequited love story depicted in the Hollywood Golden Age classic Gone with the Wind (1939) to be far more preferable to enduring the unequivocally soul-draining cinematic torture test of watching some smart-ass semite like Woody Allen or Seth Rogen bullshit their way into defiling some dumb Aryan dame that cannot see past the phony 'nice guy' routine. Needless to say, there are only a handful of romance films that I truly appreciate and one of them I actually watched rather recently. Indeed, while I have mixed feelings about the film's director's oeuvre in general, Maîtresse (1975) directed by Swiss auteur Barbet Schroeder (Barfly, Single White Female) is certainly a rebellious dark romance that I can completely get behind, even though I was not exactly enticed by most of the film's sometimes explicit BDSM and bondage related sexual content (though there is a nice scene where a babe with a delectable derriere is bent over and beat on the bare ass and pussy lips with a leather belt). A strangely yet mirthfully bittersweet love story featuring an endearingly unconventional romance between an uneducated and somewhat boorish yet genuinely kindhearted prole thief and a super chic and sophisticated yet emotionally impenetrable professional dominatrix with an upper-class clientele that is mostly comprised of masochistic aristocrats and businessmen, the film depicts the complicated relationship problems that arise when an ice queen of a whore falls prey to love and has her entire S&M operation put into jeopardy because she actually experiences the warmth of love and thus becomes less impassioned when it comes to exercising her savagely sadistic trade.

Arguably more talented as a documentarian than a feature filmmaker as demonstrated by his previous documentary work General Idi Amin Dada: A Self Portrait (1974), Schroeder was somewhat strangely suited to direct Maîtresse—the director's first truly successful feature after directing a couple relatively obscure counterculture flicks, including More (1969) and La Vallée (1972) aka Obscured By Clouds—in the sense that the film has a certain unmistakable authenticity as the filmmaker wisely decided to hire real masochists, who apparently happily paid for the (dis)pleasure, to engage in real S&M torture scenes that would be immortalized in celluloid form. Additionally, Schroeder befriended a real-life dominatrix, who gave him important intimate details regarding both her carnal trade and personal sex life. While I have never been particularly a fan of S&M or having women beat the shit out of me during sex, the fiercely foul fetishistic acts depicted in the film surprisingly act as a nice contrast to the unconventionally tender moments of real romantic love between the two protagonists. Whether intentional or not, the film also features a somewhat subtle, yet nonetheless scathing, critique of the bourgeoisie and its dubious vices. In short, the film makes it seem as if every single upper-class gentleman is a nihilistically uptight sexually degenerate that is so hopelessly masochistic that they enjoy things like role-playing as their own servants and having nails driven into their cocks. On the other hand, not unlike the poof prole played by Rainer Werner Fassbinder in his film Faustrecht der Freiheit (1975) aka Fox and His Friends, the working-class crook portrayed by Gérard Depardieu in Schroeder's film is an extremely sexually virile and fairly sexually sane individual that is naturally completely baffled by S&M degeneracy.

Featuring costume design by fashion alpha-queen Karl Lagerfeld, cinematography by gay Spanish master cinematographer and AIDS victim Néstor Almendros (The Wild Child, Days of Heaven), and various masochistic men in bizarre drag, Maîtresse is certainly, at least on a superficial level, a quasi-queer flick with certain cultivated camp elements, which is somewhat paradoxical considering its potent heterosexual love story. As demonstrated by French fag flicks that were also made during the 1970s like Philippe Vallois' Johan - Mon été 75 (1976) and Lionel Soukaz's Race d'Ep: un siècle d'images de l'homosexualité (1979) aka The Homosexual Century, S&M and bondage was also all the rage among chic cocksuckers during that time. Thankfully, Schroeder's film somewhat unintentionally makes extremely realistic S&M and bondage seem like a sad sick joke when compared to the majesty of organic heterosexual love. Featuring an emotionally glacial heroine that is petrified by love and commitment who soon discovers that her distinguished talent for beating the shit out of men wanes when she falls in love with a man that knows how to sexuality dominate her and make her feel like a real woman as opposed to simply a cruel and callous ice queen, Maîtresse could even be described as anti-S&M, though I seriously doubt this was Schroeder's intention. In fact, as Schroeder proudly explains in an interview featured on the Criterion Collection DVD release of the film, many real-life dominatrices complimented on the authenticity of his feature. Of course, Schroeder should be admired for attempting the impossible task of giving respect and dignity to the completely degenerate and undignified.

Undoubtedly, it is only natural that Maîtresse—arguably the first film to take a serious and realistic view of dominatrices and S&M subcultures and the sort of people and psychologies that are attracted to such self-debasement—was made in the same nation that produced the debauched aristocratic philosopher, the Marquis de Sade, who is indubitably a timeless source for all-things-proudly-impure as the wickedly wanton wordsmith that literally inspired the term 'sadism.' Undoubtedly, in a strange way, de Sade's famous quote, "In order to know virtue, we must first acquaint ourselves with vice," is a major theme of the film in the sense that debauchery and criminality strangely leads to the protagonists' quite virtuous true love romance. Indeed, it is only when the heroine—played by La Nouvelle Vague diva Bulle Ogier in a masterful performance that was arguably foreshadowed in Jacques Baratier's surrealist S&M gothic Piège (1968)—actually experiences true love that her talent for sadism declines and she finds herself unable to perform her role as a vamp-like dominatrix that thrives on the sexual suffering of rich and powerful men. While a somewhat unhinged bitch that seems to prefer giving pain over receiving pleasure, the heroine has no problem eventually making the distinction between love and sadomasochism when she actually encounters a man that is worthy enough to make her wet. Of course, the heroine's dominatrix persona is not much more than a protective shield for her deep-seated emotion immaturity and fear of emotional attachment and, in turn, feminine submission. Although other films had previously been made in France about sadomasochism, including Pierre-Alain Jolivet's rarely-seen Fernando Arrabal adaptation Le Grand Ceremonial (1968) aka Weird Weirdo, film critic Jean-Pierre Bouyxou's experimental underground short Satan bouche un coin (1968), and homo exploitation auteur Jacques Scandolari's debauched de Sade adaptation La philosophie dans le boudoir (1971) aka Beyond Love and Evil, these films are superlatively sensational works that merely use S&M to shock and titillate. Undoubtedly, one of the most shocking aspects of Maîtresse is its innate lack of sensationalism and almost detached objectivity in terms of depicting the strictly professional relationship between a dick-nailing and ass-whipping Madame and her mostly morbidly masochistic customers. Not surprisingly, despite Schroeder going out of his way to depict them in as an objective and 'respectful' manner as possible, the masochists still come off seeming like pathetic sexual cripples that would have surely been thrown in a bog by their ancient ancestors, but I digress.

MAÎTRESSE

Despite being a quite menacing dominatrix that really knows how to thoroughly brutalize her high paying johns, emotionally glacial (anti)heroine Ariane (Ogier) seems completely incapable of managing anything resembling a normal life and prefers to keep her loved ones at a safe distance. Indeed, as Maîtresse unravels, the viewer discovers that, although she has a swarthy live-in maid and beastly Doberman named 'Texas,' Ariane curiously does not live with her own young son and seems scantily involved with his life, at least in a real-life context, despite claiming in regard to the little lad that, "He's the [only] man in my life." In short, while Ariane has no problem beating the shit out of queens, queers, and anally retentive bluebloods, she is terribly afraid of emotional commitment and truly sharing her life with another human-being. As a boorish yet sweet, strong yet sensitive, and low-class yet naturally charismatic prole crook, muscular male protagonist Olivier (Depardieu) is Ariane's complete opposite and both ultimately prove that opposites truly attract just like sadism and masochism. At the beginning of the film, Olivier and his swarthy conman comrade Mario (André Rouyer) visit various apartments under the false pretense of selling art books as a means to covertly raid various flats and steal valuable objects. As a very hospitable hood-with-a-heart-of-gold, Olivier almost immediately expresses dismay with Mario's criminal plan, but he is also not the sort of guy that likes to let down a friend and thus goes along with the rather stupid scheme. Upon knocking on one door, they are greeted by a semi-hysterical Ariane, who begs them to help her with her plumbing lest her apartment become completely flooded with water. Upon talking to Ariane, Olivier and Mario are delighted to discover that "the old woman downstairs is on vacation" and thus seize the opportunity to rob the supposedly empty apartment. Rather unfortunately (or rather fortunately for Olivier as things turn out), Ariane was lying, as the apartment is actually a sort of secret makeshift S&M dungeon, so naturally Olivier and Mario are somewhat bewildered when they discover bondage gear, torture devices, gimp masks, and even an imprisoned male slave in the lavishly decorated Art Deco (anti)pleasure-dome. Of course, things get even more bizarre when a secret door opens in the ceiling and Ariane, who is sporting a savagely dapper dominatrix outfit, proceeds to walk down a set of stairs that emerges from said door. Needless to say, the two crooks find themselves imprisoned when Ariane's loyal Doberman appears out of nowhere and begins growling at them, but Olivier soon discovers that he has finally become trapped in a prison that he won't mind living in. A woman that lives two very different lives in two very different yet symbolically secretly conjoined apartments that represent a sort of bourgeois heaven and hell, Ariane is a bewildering bitch that completely baffles poor philistine Olivier, yet he is a man that knows what he likes and he instantly takes a special liking to the eloquently eccentric dominatrix dame.

When Ariane first notices the two burglars and realizes that they are the two chaps that helped her fix the plumbing in her apartment, she remarks in a less impassioned fashion, "Oh. You again!" asks them, "Aren't you ashamed of yourselves?" handcuffs them to a furnace, and then declares, "I'll be with you in a moment." Indeed, Ariane is so deeply devoted to her sex work that she opts to torture one of her victims before dealing with the crooks. Somewhat unpredictably, Ariane interrupts her torture session temporarily to approach Olivier and nonchalantly say to him, "I need you. Two hundred francs for three minutes' work." Needless to say, Olivier immediately accepts the unexpected offer, though he is somewhat taken aback when Ariane digs in his pants, grabs his cock, and demands that he piss on her groveling leather-clad man-slave. Notably, in the middle of the urine-drenched torture session in what is undoubtedly one of the most inordinately romantic scenes in cinema history, Ariane and Olivier reveal their singular romantic chemistry by passionately making out with one another without even the slightest bit of hesitation, as if they are long-lost lovers that have been reunited after a decade of grueling separation. Indeed, although he is in the middle of pissing on a strange man's face, Olivier's mutual sexual attraction to Ariane is so strong that he cannot help but expressing his overwhelming carnal passion for her with a rather long kiss that more or less symbolically unites them as lovers. For Olivier and Ariane, it is virtually love-at-first-sight. After paying off Mario to leave him alone with money that he was going to use pay for a date, Olivier immediately takes Ariane out on a dinner date at a fancy restaurant where they incessantly shamelessly flirt while drinking tons of wine. During the date, the two reveal some of their more glaring flaws to one another, with Olivier confessing, "I don't really have a past" and Ariane somewhat disturbingly admitting, "You shouldn't ask me questions because either I lie or I don't answer them" and "I'm not the cautious type." As two individuals with uniquely unsavory pasts, it is no surprise that the two new eccentric lovebirds are easily able to overlook each others' flaws, at least at first. Indeed, Ariane does not even mind having to pay for the dinner date that Olivier asked her to go out on. In fact, she is completely flattered when she discovers that Olivier used the dinner date money to pay off Mario so that they could be alone with one another. Needless to say, the two fuck that night and Olivier even goes so far as to get Ariane all hot in bothered by violently grabbing her and threatening, "I could kill you now if I wanted. Just like that. One squeeze and you're dead." Unfortunately for their relationship, Olivier eventually begins to adopt a more passive and masochistic role as the romance develops while Ariane begins to lose her dominatrix talents, thus eventually leading to serious conflict.

MAÎTRESSE

During the l'heure bleue after their first dinner date together in a scene that almost has a dream-like feel to it, Olivier reveals his ordinate sensitivity and sense of compassion and empathy by confiding to Ariane that he used to work in a slaughterhouse but found the job "awful," so he quit or as he remarks, "After a few days, I started to get used to it, so I quit." Indeed, quite unlike Ariane who basks in brutality, Olivier cannot stand harming living things and will do anything to avoid it. As deathly cold dominatrix that thrives off of hurting and humiliating others, Ariane clearly has no use for compassion and is clearly afraid of having positive feelings of any sort, especially when it comes to other human beings. A hyper hermetic whore with an ominously flat effect that hides behind a sadistic persona and hardly ever expresses any emotions unless they are negative, Ariane also seems terribly afraid of people getting to know her true self and even carefully guards virtually every faucet of her personal life from Olivier despite the fact he lives with her. While it is obvious that Olivier absolutely loves and adores Ariane, she treats him like a sort of glorified fuck-toy and seems ashamed of his working-class wardrobe, hence why she goes out of her way to buy him a fancy suit that he has nil interest in wearing. In fact, Ariane is such a control freak that she physically attempts to stop Olivier when he drives her car during a trip to the country. Indeed, Ariane has such little trust for men, including the one that she loves, that she cannot even bear to let Olivier take the wheel of her automobile. While she never clearly vocalizes it, Ariane's behavior and actions demonstrate that she is a misandrist as a woman that lives to emasculate men and refuses to submit to any man. Notably, Ariane's strange combination of cold sophistication and anti-male sadism is subtly symbolically depicted by a famous photo of White Russian intellectual whore Lou Andreas-Salomé whipping Teutonic philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche and his suicidal Jewish friend Paul Réé that the heroine has tapped to the headboard of her bed. While Olivier initially tolerates Ariane's odious occupation and even takes part in some of the beatings (including whipping the big bare ass and teasing the clit of some random chick with his belt), he has a very hard time understanding the appeal of such debauchery and eventually becomes jealous, not least of all because the heroine seems more interest in working than fucking.

As time passes, Olivier comes to discover that Ariane has some dubious business arrangement with a somewhat Godot-esque mystery man simply known as 'Gautier' (Holger Löwenadler of Ingmar Bergman's A Ship to India (1947) and Louie Malle's Lacombe, Lucien (1974)). Naturally, Olivier assumes Gautier is Ariane's pimp, especially after he discovers that she has been giving the old man large amounts of cash. Needless to say, Olivier is not happy when Ariane asks him to open a banking account in his name to store some of the whoring money, but he does it anyway because he loves his beloved and hates to cause senseless drama. Not surprisingly, Olivier becomes especially concerned when Ariane calls Gautier after making a half-hearted attempt at suicide via defenestration. Unbeknownst to Olivier, Ariane's erratic self-destructive behavior is a result of the fact that she is losing her talent for sadism due to her love for him. As someone that gets off to feeding her pet Venus flytraps meat and saying cutesy things to the pet plants like, "My darlings are hungry," Ariane is not exactly the sort of women that knows how completely process and live with true love. Indeed, instead of simply buying her flowers and chocolates, Olivier must demonstrate his love to Ariane by engaging in sort of hardcore roleplaying scenarios, including (pseudo)raping her from behind at knife point in a dark alley. As demonstrated by her remark, "It's fascinating to get into people's madness," Ariane lives for the lurid and lecherous, especially when she 'directs' such scenarios while working as a dominatrix. When Olivier gets made at her for attempting to go back to one of her johns only minutes after suffering a mental breakdown and complains to her, "Enough playing the whore and then breaking down!", Ariane has no problem bragging that she is a prostitute and even replying with a certain self-assured arrogance, "I'm not playing the whore. I am a whore, and I like it. I chose this life." After the two get in a short slapping match, Ariane confesses that her johns really mean nothing to her, stating in a somewhat somber fashion, "It's not them. It's you. I love you, and it scares me." Probably partly due to the fact that she thinks Olivier is a stupid male bimbo and witless philistine, Ariane thinks she can continue her trade and dubious relationship with Gautier while in a relationship with the protagonist, but it is only a matter of time before everything falls apart, including her carefully cultivated persona.

MAÎTRESSE

When Ariane brags one day regarding Gautier that, "He's a great horse who wins every race. Thanks to him, we're gonna go on vacation," Olivier finally comes to the point where he can no longer tolerate his lover's secrecy and dubious relationship with a strange fellow that he assumes a pimp. Indeed, after doing some serious snooping and eventually discovering Gautier's address, Olivier pays the mysterious "great horse" an unexpected visit to give him an ultimatum in regard to his relationship with Ariane. Convinced that Gautier is an abusive and exploitative manipulator that has caused Ariane to live a slave-like existence of perpetual fear and debasement, Olivier busts into the old man's business office unannounced, reveals who he is, and firmly states, "This has to stop. I love Ariane. I don't want her to be scared anymore." After Gautier more or less mocks the idea that Ariane is afraid of him, Olivier tells him that he will be the heroine's new and improved pimp, stating, "I have a suggestion. From now on, I take care of her. Same way you do. But I'll take a smaller cut. And I'll really protect her." At this point, Gautier seems somewhat offended and retorts, "Are you sure we both take care of women in the same manner?" but Olivier stands firm and replies, "That's beside the point." Despite clearly annoying Gautier, Olivier demands 10,000 francs from the old man that he believes was stolen from Ariane. Although he protests by rhetorically asking "Do you realize who I am?" and then snidely remarking, "I find you a bit rash," Gautier still gives Olivier the money. Seeming to have subconsciously realized that he has made a serious mistake that will most likely jeopardize his relationship, Olivier immediately gets violently drunk and roams around public until the morning as if he is afraid of going back to Ariane. In a symbolic scene where he reveals his identification with slaughtered horses and, in turn, sense of victimhood, Olivier pays an early morning visit to an abattoir and then subsequently buys three horse steaks that he eats in an almost ritualistic fashion as if he is attempting to consume the brutalization and victimization of the dead animals. Indeed, despite his prole style alpha-male talents when it comes to kicking ass and taking names, Olivier now feels like a slave and acts accordingly in a strangely masochistic fashion as a virtual 'kept man' that is dependent on a dame that seems to value her degenerate job more than him. Clearly empathizing with the brutally slaughtered horses, Olivier seems to feel like a helpless victim and a hapless cog in a metaphysical machine of assembly-line murder. In what ultimately becomes a pathetic self-fulfilling prophecy, Olivier almost seems to have paid Gautier a rather rude visit in a subconscious attempt to completely sabotage his relationship, or so the viewer inevitably assumes.

When Ariane gets an early morning call from Gautier that concludes with her begging for mercy to the old fart on the other line, it becomes obvious that Olivier made a serious mistake when he paid a visit to the old aristocratic pimp. Indeed, after getting off the phone, Ariane gives Olivier a literal rude awakening by throwing clothes at him while he is asleep and bitchily yelling, "You're leaving. I don't want to see you anymore. Pack your things, get dressed, and get out. Understand?" Of course, Ariane does not stop there, as she begins shaking Olivier and screaming in his face like a bipolar bitch on the rag, "You idiot! How could you have done that, imbecile? You had to find out for yourself! Wasn't our relationship more important? More important than satisfying your curiosity? What, are you a cop?" Naturally, like any normal angry woman, Ariane cravenly attempts to wound Olivier's pride by bragging about how great Gautier is and stating, "He loves me enough to let me live the way I want." Not content with merely emotionally abusing her lover, Ariane also insanely headbutts Olivier, though she is ultimately the one that is left most injured with a badly bloodied face. Always the consummate gentleman, Olivier absurdly shows concern for Ariane as a result of the injury she sustains after she headbutts him. Of course, physical injuries are of little concern to both characters as they are both badly internally wounded. When Olivier finally manages to flee the apartment after being bombarded with a quite venomous verbal assault that might have completely spiritually castrated a weaker man, Ariane also begins to cry, thus leaving her with a somewhat aesthetically displeasing combination of blood, sweat, and tears on her face. As the viewer assumes, Ariane's nasty behavior was at least partially an act that was meant to scare Olivier away as it is apparent that Gautier demanded that the male protagonist be kicked out of the apartment. Despite being treated as an emotional punching bag, Olivier is not the kind of guy that is going to accept defeat when loved is involved, so he immediately goes to his local bank, completely empties his bank account, and then puts the cash inside an envelope that reads, "I love you." Unfortunately, when Olivier gets back to Ariane's apartment, he discovers that his beloved is gone and that a couple of hired goons are moving her personal belongings out of the place. As he quite nicely explains to them himself, Olivier does not want to beat the shit out of the goons, but they refuse to tell him where Ariane located is so he beats the shit out of both of them, including an erratic knife-wielding pansy.

After learning that Ariane is located at a remote wooded chateau in the middle of the country, Olivier puts on a fancy suit that his beloved once bought for him but he did not like and takes a long journey deep into the frog hinterland with his moped. Upon arriving at the chateau, Olivier discovers Ariane, Gautier, and their assumed mutual son standing in the yard, thus he quickly decides to drop the "I love you" envelope full of money into the mailbox and leave immediately. Considering that Ariane is absurdly dressed like a proper bourgeois housewife and now seems to even have a traditional nuclear family, Olivier naturally assumes their relationship is over, but thankfully he underestimates the unpredictability of his ladylove. Luckily, Ariane sees Olivier and decides to follow him in her fancy convertible. Without even thinking twice, Olivier pulls over upon seeing Ariane and then gets inside her car so they can commence an extra special session of car coitus. Indeed, in a rather symbolic scene that reveals that they have finally found a healthy medium in regard to their relationship, the two simultaneously drive while fucking, with Ariane sitting on Olivier's cock and controlling the steering wheel while her lover manages the gas pedal. Not surprisingly, not only are the two dangerous lovers in complete ecstasy, but they also manage to get in a car wreck while they are on the brink of orgasm in a scenario that predates David Cronenberg's classic symphorophiliac J.G Ballard adaptation Crash (1996). Thankfully, the two leave the accident fairly unscathed and even laugh upon exiting the wreckage in a final scene that really underscores the majesty of their mad love. Indeed, while Ariane may be a literal whore, it seems that she has finally chosen poor prole Olivier over aristocratic sugar daddy Gautier.

MAÎTRESSE

A relatively unclassifiable arthouse flick that features what undoubtedly has to be one of the most strangely endearingly idiosyncratic yet surprisingly believable love affairs in cinema history, Maîtresse is, in many ways, the film that Bernardo Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris (1972) attempted to be in terms of depicting both the pleasures and perils of a sadomasochistic romance between two opposites in frogland. Undoubtedly the most brilliant thing about the film is that, unlike Bertolucci's somewhat overrated flick, the love story completely eclipses the scenes of 'authentic' S&M torture in terms of sheer potency and memorability, thus underscoring auteur Barbet Schroeder's somewhat overlooked knack for nuance as a filmmaker (somewhat not surprisingly, the auteur would eventually marry his longtime leading lady Bulle Ogier). Of course, one also cannot forget to mention that the film features one of the most striking, singular, and unforgettable heroines of cinema history as a woman that manages to be neither a completely morally pristine female protagonist or evil scheming femme fatale, but instead a sort of all-too-hopelessly-human emotional cripple that is as cold as ice yet also somehow manages to bleed a sort a perpetual internal woundedness that is barely disguised by her carefully constructed glacial persona. Despite his flagrant boorish and inability to understand the sort of mind that enjoys S&M torture sessions, the film's male protagonist is still able to see his lover for who she really is without being repelled by her, hence the singular charm of their romance. By eventually being able to accept one another in the end despite their mutual glaring personal flaws, the playfully perverse protagonists reveal what true love is all about. Instead of depicting an idiotically idealistic storybook version of love, Maîtresse reveals in a fairly unconventional fashion that love requires mutual sacrifice and commitment and that love can indeed conquer all if the right variables (and pheromones) come into play. In a weak and pathetic age where couples are so quick to break up or divorce when even the mildest discomfort comes into play, Schroeder's S&M flick is a strangely moral film that is certainly more important now than when it was first released over four decades ago.

I must confess that Maîtresse probably left a deeper and more personal yet bittersweet impression of me than the average viewer, namely because I felt like I already knew the heroine, or at least some dominant aspect of her, all too well. Indeed, I could certainly identify with protagonist Olivier when it came to his pain and anxiety in regard to the emotionally impenetrable, highly secretive, and hopelessly introverted nature of his beloved to the point where I was sincerely quite shocked by the film's unconventional 'happy ending.' While it would be easy to simply write-off Ariane as a cold soulless bitch that probably diddles herself with sandpaper just so that she can feel some sort of emotion, I ultimately felt pity and the unwavering desire to protect and comfort her just like Olivier. After all, women like Ariane are not born but created via childhood emotional abuse in the form of poor male role models and/or worthless self-absorbed mothers. Indeed, as a dominatrix that refuses to live with her own adolescent son, Ariane is certainly a misandrist of sorts that fears being under the thumb of a man so it is only nature that she becomes instantly attracted to a genuinely sweet and kindhearted crook like Olivier. Undoubtedly, beneath Ariane's icy cold exterior is a lost and scared little girl that completely lacks something emotionally that most other people take for granted. As for Olivier, he was forced against his will to become a street fighter and thief due to his lowly background despite his distaste for violence and brutality, among other things. Of course, it ultimately takes someone with the right amount of toughness and sensitivity like Olivier to be able to handle Ariane's 'eccentric' emotional handicaps.

Unquestionably, in terms of her psyche, intellect, sexual impulses, and overall character, Ariane is a virtual textbook example of the 'prostitute type' that tragic Austrian-Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger was describing in his magnum opus Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character in regard to the two main archetypal extremes of the so-called fairer sex. In stark contrast to the nurturing qualities of the 'mother type' that Weininger spoke of, Ariane is a cold and cryptic criminally-inclined cunt that is so innately unsuited for motherhood that she cannot even stomach living with her own biological son despite her active interest in his school report cards. Of course, as Weininger wrote, "Great men have always preferred women of the prostitute type," whereas the mother type is typically dumb, childlike, less sexually adventurous, and more or less only suitable for breeding and raising children, an archetypal whore like Ariane is the kind of clever and charming cunt that you can lie naked in bed with and discuss great cinema and philosophers for hours after a great session of coital bonding. In short, despite featuring a great preternatural romance, Maîtresse must be praised for depicting the ultimate Weiningerian woman. It seems that auteur Barbet Schroeder's intrinsic talent for psychological insight, especially in an artistic context, is genetic as he is the maternal grandson of German psychiatrist and art historian Hans Prinzhorn, who became famous for analyzing the degenerate art of mental patients (in fact, some of Prinzhorn's work was posthumously displayed at the infamous 1937 Nazi 'Entartete Kunst' propaganda exhibition).

MAÎTRESSE

Notably, sagely frog degenerate Georges Bataille once wisely argued, "Not every woman is a potential prostitute, but prostitution is the logical consequence of the feminine attitude. In so far as she is attractive, a woman is a prey to men's desire. Unless she refuses completely because she is determined to remain chaste, the question is at what price and under what circumstances will she yield. But if the conditions are fulfilled she always offers herself as an object. Prostitution proper only brings in a commercial element. By the care she lavishes on her toilet, by the concern she has for her beauty set off by her adornment, a woman regards herself as an object always trying to attract men's attention. Similarly if she strips naked she reveals the object of a man's desire, an individual and particular object to be prized." Rather revealing, Maîtresse heroine Ariane—a literal prostitute that, somewhat paradoxically, does not exhibit the archetypal feminine pussy-peddler traits—need not advertise the carnal goods to immediately make Olivier her prey, thus revealing true sadistic love on her part when it comes to the male protagonist, as if she is devoid of normal instinctual feminine wiles and instead simply must take what she wants by literal force. As for her johns, Ariane dolls herself in less than revealing dominatrix garb and refuses to give her customers anything aside from pure and unadulterated pain and brutality of both the emotional and physical sort. Although she may be a self-professed liar that lives behind a phony persona, Ariane is ultimately more honest than most women when it comes to her hot and heavy romance with Monsieur Olivier. For those cinephiles that ever wanted to see a cold and sadistic bitch like the eponymous anti-heroine of Tony Richardson's somewhat loose Jean Genet adaptation Mademoiselle (1966) succumb to love, Schroeder's film is certainly your best bet. Although I don't want to knock Lynch's classic film, but the romance in Maîtresse makes the sadomasochistic love affair between Jeffrey Beaumont and Dorothy Vallens in Blue Velvet (1986) seem like an absurdist male-fantasy by comparison. Additionally, compared to Schroeder's film, which wallows in a sort of radical yet understated realism, Luis Buñuel's masterful S&M flick Belle de Jour (1967) almost seems like an emotionally fraudulent feminist fantasy. Of course, what both Schroeder and Buñuel's films reveal is that virtually all women are plagued by indecision and are constantly torn between wanting a man that instantly can sop their panties and a sexually banal beta-provider-male that can inflate their bank accounts. Either way, innate hypergamic instincts dictates that most women will always find something to complain about and the only place you will find real happy endings to romances is in movies, even in strange sadomasochistic arthouse ones like Maîtresse.

-Ty E

PRIVATE ROAD

Barney Platts-Mills (1971)

After reading comparisons to gutter auteur Andy Milligan's once-lost English arthouse anti-romance Nightbirds (1970) and Joseph Despins and William Dumas's equally brutal, ruthlessly raw, and culturally pessimistic lost masterpiece Duffer (1971), I decided to watch Private Road (1971) directed by British auteur Barney Platts-Mills (Bronco Bullfrog, Hero), which, like the other two films, was saved from celluloid oblivion somewhat recently after it was rightfully restored and reissued on DVD/Blu-ray by the British Film Institute under their BFI Flipside label. Starring British cult writer/director Bruce Robinson (How to Get Ahead in Advertising, The Rum Diary) in an early pre-fame role as the lead character, Platts-Mills' film is, at least in some ways, a far cry from the darkly comedic anti-bourgeois buffoonery of Withnail & I (1987), but then again there are many similarities between the character he played in Private Road and his somewhat autobiographical eponymous "I" character played by Paul McGann in his hit directorial debut. In fact, at various screenings, Platts-Mills has confessed that he believes Robinson was figuratively (and very possibly literally) taking notes for Withnail & I while working on Private Road, which was at a less than ideal time in his life where he was barely getting by and largely living off government social security checks. On the surface a seemingly conventional work of British 'kitchen sink realism,' Platts-Mills' second feature is also a scathing indictment of the degenerate and largely foredoomed generation that bought into hippie hedonism and so-called sexual liberation, as well as a tragic romance about the impossibility of young love in the age of female emancipation, on-demand abortions, the Rolling Stones, hard drugs, and compensatory far-left-wing politics as indulged in by members of the young upper-middleclass. The ultimately rather melancholy and forlorn story of a young 'offbeat' writer who receives a book deal and falls madly in love with an 'enterprising' young blonde secretary who more or less uses him just so she can move out of her parents home and not have to work, only to have reality smack him in the face when his latest novel is rejected, his pregnant girlfriend decides to demonstrate her 'female independence' by dealing with her pregnancy in a most heinous self-centered way, and his comrades degenerate into junkies and humorless far-left revolutionaries who misguidedly think heroin and Trotsky will fill the void in their increasingly sterile and soulless lives, Private Road is a somewhat torturous but never dull depiction of a young and rather naive Mick Jagger look-alike's soul being crushed in slow-motion by the realities of adulthood. Indeed, Platts-Mills' film is that rare sort of work that reminds the viewer why most white males in the western world forgo marriage and children nowadays.

Opening with a goofy longhaired hippie named Stephen (Michael Feast of The Deaths of Ian Stone (2007)) playing acoustic guitar and singing, "...always wanted to be a racing driver...but I never ever, ever liked the smell of cars,” Private Road initially seems like it will be some sort of horrendous hippie nightmare romanticizing the “bobo” (aka bourgeois bohemian) lifestyle, but luckily that is not the case, at least for long. The film then cuts to a scene of a pretty yet seemingly empty-headed and bitchy young blonde secretary named Ann Halpern (Susan Penhaligon of Paul Verhoeven Soldier of Orange (1977) and Richard Franklin’s Hitchcockian Ozploitation classic Patrick (1978)) fiddling with a piece of string while barely acknowledging the polite yet prosaic small talk of her publisher boss Erica Talbot (Patricia Cutts of William Castle’s The Tingler (1959) starring Vincent Price). Mrs. Talbot introduces Ann to “a very brilliant young writer” of the longhaired too-cool-for-school bohemian sort named Peter Morrissey (Bruce Robinson) whose short stories she plans to publish. Against his better judgement, Peter attends a small party with Ann where he demonstrates his posturing beatnikness by banally responding with “oh, anything” when a clean-cut chap who seems overly concerned with monetary success and social status asks him what he writes about. After the party, Peter asks Ann if she wants to go back to his place, but she seems to be intimidated by the slightly older and certainly more mature young man and blows him off. The next day, Peter calls Ann up and invites her to his hippie flat where he lives with his equally longhaired comrades Stephen (Michael Feast) and Henry (played by Hollywood composer George Fenton, who has composed music for everything from Gandhi (1982) to Terry Gilliam’s The Zero Theorem (2013)). After hanging out with the beatnik boys and doing pretty much nothing like beatnik boys do, Peter takes Ann on a romantic all-night stroll around both the city and countryside which results in the two falling in love with one another, though the romance is clearly one-sided. When his friend Stephen later asks him if he has boned Ann, Peter acts discernibly offended and states that he is not interested in sex “because a relationship isn’t based on sex. It’s not a paltry love affair, the sort of thing that you’re used to. It’s a pure, spiritual love. It’s love. I love her.” Meanwhile, Anne’s father Mr. Halpern (Robert Brown of various James Bond films like Octopussy (1983))—a well to do businessman of the conspicuously old school conservative sort who is genuinely concerned about his daughter’s well being—rebukes his daughter for disappearing all night without notifying him and she responds like an irrational woman-child by screaming “oh, fuck off!” and throwing her covers over her head like a little girl that is made agitated because her parents did not buy her the baby doll she wanted. Deciding she wants to be a ‘big girl,’ Ann then plots to move-in with Peter, who has just received an advance for a projected novel from Mrs. Talbot and makes for the perfect guy for a young girl who wants her ‘independence’ to leech off of.

PRIVATE ROAD

A calculating lady who, like any sensible young woman looking to start a ‘career’ for herself, uses her body as currency, Ann officiates their first night living together with her new boyfriend and the seriousness of their relationship in general by symbolically stripping her clothes off without any foreplay and somewhat freaks out Peter by coldly and calculatingly giving herself to him in a less than romantic way in what is ultimately their first time having sex with one another. From then on, Ann wants to have sex all the time, even outside in a public square, thus inspiring her boyfriend to jokingly call her a “nymphomaniac.” Meanwhile, Peter is warned by a fellow writer named Alex Marvel (Trevor Adams) to not sell one of his stories to a mainstream Munich-based publishing company called Titan because, as he states, “I thought that story was really very good. And I don’t think you should sell it to Titan of Munich. I’ll tell you why...Because Titan of Munich or any other company like that will just ruin anything. And that story had something. And that story should be kept as it is.” Of course, Peter will soon learn that he will be a loser in life if he stays true to himself and his artistic vision, as writing for an “esoteric audience” does not pay the bills, nor does it meet the demands of a young girlfriend who wants to live a life of leisure. When Ann’s father keeps randomly dropping by their flat and annoying them with his somewhat creepy behavior, Peter offers to move her anywhere she wants, even Greenland where he jokes that she will get “icicles on the end of your titties.” Ultimately, the seemingly loving couple opts to move to a remote cabin in the idyllic Scottish highlands where everything seems perfect, at least for Peter who finds solace in roaming the hillsides hunting rabbits while taking a break from writing, but spoiled brat Ann cannot tolerate having to do dreaded old fashioned things that females use to do like peel potatoes and she even suffers a hysterical freakout after he beloved brings back the corpse of a cute little bunny that he has shot that he wants her to skin for a stew. Of course, dainty dingbat Ann refuses to skin the rabbit and demonstrates that she would make rather pathetic wifey material. After acting increasingly frigid and humorless, Ann finally demands that they move back to the city the next day and that her boyfriend better start making more money on his writing, thus destroying Peter’s dream of an idyllic future of simple and serene pastoral living.

While Peter is somewhat happy to discover that Ann is pregnant upon arriving back in the city, pretty much everything else in the protagonist’s life falls apart from there. Among other things, Peter’s girlfriend has been incessantly bitching at him about writing more stories so that he can bring in more money, so when Mrs. Talbot rejects a novel that he has been working on for over a year because she thinks it is “undisciplined and a little old-fashioned” and needs some “pruning, cutting, shaping, discipline,” he is forced to take a lowly creativity-stunting job as a copywriter at an advertising firm that was given to him by his friend Henry, who is now a sort of self-stylized poser far-left revolutionary that has been cuckolded by his frigid uptight feminist girlfriend and who ironically uses the equipment at his corporate capitalist job to make commie posters. On top of that, Peter’s best friend Stephen is now a full-blown heroin addict who predictably causes Ann to suffer a panic attack after she walks in on him shooting up junk in the bathroom. In fact, Stephen is such a desperate junky that he later breaks into Peter and Ann's apartment when they are not home, writes the word "shit" on their wall as if to express his disgust with their bourgeois lifestyle, and steals everything they own except the bed and a couple of worthless books. Of course, Peter panics when he comes home one day from a long hard day at work to discover that Ann, who recently turned down his proposal of marriage, is gone and has taken all of her possessions with her, so he runs to her parents' home and more or less forces himself inside after his sneaky girlfriend's equally sneaky mother attempts to shoo him away in the most phony stereotypically bourgeois sort of way. After barging into the house, Stephen is physically assaulted by Ann's father, who subsequently tells him, "Anne has lost her baby. She came here for help and she got it. I begged you to be careful but you took no notice. You went on your own sweet way."

PRIVATE ROAD

Indeed, Ann went behind Peter's back and sought sanctuary in daddy dearest, who gladly paid for the abortion of his unborn grandchild, as he knows that his superlatively spoiled, self-centered, and less than sophisticated daughter cannot even take care of herself, let alone a newborn child. At first, Peter seems in denial about the abortion and naively proclaims that Ann, who he has an unnervingly annoying romanticized view of as a young man that clearly still does not understand the way of women, would never do such a thing because she wanted the baby, but Mr. Halpern sets him straight by stating, "She didn't. She would never have been able to cope with the child." Of course, Mr. Halpern is right, as his daughter is nothing but a spoiled little woman-child who would probably be jealous of the baby stealing attention away from her. When Peter visits Ann in the hospital, she is totally ruthlessly remorseless about her sinisterly sneaky and dastardly deed, hatefully stating to her boy toy, "Look, I didn't want the baby. Can you understand that?," thus revealing that Mr. Halpern was right after all. Instead of dumping her and never speaking to her again for going behind his back and aborting their unborn child, Peter becomes a sort of spiritually castrated cuckold who completely gives up on his writing, puts all his energy into working a job he hates, and molds his behavior to the banal bourgeois manners and customs of Daddy Halpern, who is so pleased with the drastic change in his daughter's relationship that he tells her that he is going to buy her and her beloved a house when they get married. In the end, Stephen visits Peter and reveals that he has gotten off of heroin, though he clearly will never completely grow up and live a conventional middleclass life. When Peter reveals that Ann got an abortion and that he quit writing, perennial bohemian Stephen is so bummed out that he steals his friend a typewriter the next day so that he can continue writing. As for Peter and Ann, their future together seems dubious at best. Luckily, the real-life Peter, Bruce Robinson, would go on to do something with his writing and become famous doing it.

Unquestionably, Private Road is one of those films that you probably do not want to watch a second time, though not because it is bad and unmemorable, but because it is a total all-around bummer of a melancholy movie that portrays life as a progressive curse plagued by a perennial series of oftentimes unpredictable and uncontrollable disappointments and tragedies that make antinatalism seem like the only rational and sensible life philosophy for any young person living in the post-WWII West to adopt, thus it should be no surprise that auteur Barney Platts-Mills would have to rent out a theater himself just so the film could be publicly screened upon its initial release, only for the work to languish in obscurity for about 40 years until it was rightfully resurrected by BFI Flipside. Not surprisingly, it would be over a decade before Platts-Mills made another film—the medieval sorcery and witchcraft costume piece Hero (1982)—which, although the first film in Scots Gaelic, was an abject failure of the first order that was ridiculed in Time Out film magazine as a “clumping village pageant” and ultimately guaranteed the director would not make another film for about about two more decades until he released the unfortunately underwhelming work Zohra: A Moroccan Fairy Tale (2010). While his debut feature Bronco Bullfrog (1969) is probably equally important in the context of British film history, Private Road is unequivocally Platts-Mills’ most immaculate, accomplished, and nuanced work, as a film that captures the dispiriting spirit of an entire generation, or at least a certain segment of it, namely the unsurprisingly increasingly dwindling upper-middleclass, which bought into the bullshit false freedom of the counterculture movement and paid the ultimate price as a result. Indeed, it is refreshing to see a work of British social realism that does not dubiously wallow in poverty porn like some of the works of Mike Leigh and Ken Loach and instead focuses on the certainly different but no less critical problems that plagued the dying bourgeoisie then and still continue to plague it in all the more debasing ways today. After all, unlike the protagonist of Private Road, there is not much pressure on lumpenproles when it comes to maintaining a certain standard in terms of wealth, profession, and overall social prestige. I certainly would not want to have to deal with a pretty yet vacant posh princess like the one in Platts-Mills film who expects everything from her man but gives nothing in return aside from abortions, headaches, and cold and soulless sex. Indeed, one can only guess the sort of alimony and child support that the protagonist of Private Road would have had to pay if he actually ended up marrying, having children with, and inevitably divorcing his blonde bimbo beloved. In that sense, the film should be mandatory viewing for any middleclass male who is seriously considering getting married and/or having children because otherwise they might end up like the fat deranged slob of Christopher Monger’s criminally underrated classic British cult flick Voice Over (1983).

-Ty E

Toys Toys

Barry Levinson (1992)

Robin Williams is one annoying fruitcake. Banal Baltimore director Barry Levinson made the right choice when deciding to collaborate with the middle aged toddler on the perverse Hollywood studio film Toys. A film that is one of the most ambitious and odd projects to come out of Hollywood possibly since The Wizard of Oz. Like The Wizard of Oz, Toys has various cryptic and ambiguous messages. The type of messages that you only expect the money men to know about.

Toys is also partly a musical, featuring a couple tunes that will either scare you to death or make you wave your arms with joy. I don't think it would be outrageous to say that the film would fit right at home with a businessman in the child pornography industry. This is another reason why I am not surprised that Robin Williams plays the lead, a grown man-child named Leslie Zevo that has a spectacular yet worthless intellect. Leslie has an archenemy in the form of his uncle Lt. General Leland Zevo. Leland has a mulatto son played by no other than LL Cool J. General Leland has decided he wants to make weapons in the form of toys that children can use to kill tons of people. Due to their young age, the children will not be able to comprehend the moral consequences of their actions. Quite a good idea on Leland's part indeed. Zany Leslie decides he has to stop uncle Leland with a virtual army of toys. Of course we can expect the power of objects that make children smile to triumph over the evil toy weapons. The horribly unattractive Joan Cusack plays the role of Leslie's robot sister (I wonder what else she does for Leslie?). Leslie also has an attractive Aryan girlfriend (who could only be after him for his money). I couldn't imagine Robin Williams with any woman, let alone an attractive one. However, I could see him dressed up in British nanny drag enjoying himself very much. Robin Williams has an asexual first name for a reason. Hans Zimmer (possibly a relative of mAQ) provided the sometimes exciting soundtrack for Toys. The set-design for Toys is also quite extravagant bordering on a Neo-Fellini ripoff style. I really don't see how Barry Levinson got involved in this project as he is about as boring as Hollywood filmmakers get. I guess his job during the films production was to direct the microphone operators how to stand. Toys has a nice new age hippie peace message. Wussy Leslie is a hero because he doesn't like mean toys. Uncle Leland is a super mean guy because he likes to watch stuff explode and possibly see some limbs fly. In the end, Toys is an aesthetically entertaining and enjoyable experience. A film that lands somewhere in between a nice surrealist childlike adult film and Michael Jackson's deepest darkest fantasy.

-Ty E

THE BED

Barry Mahon (1968)

While the obscenely offbeat avant-garde horror flick Death Bed: The Bed That Eats (1977) seems to be a completely original film that one-time auteur George Barry seems to have dreamed up upon reading too much Victorian Gothic horror literature by Sheridan Le Fanu and possibly even Count Eric Stenbock and jerking off to Aubrey Beardsley paintings while tripping on LSD, I am going to have to assume that the filmmaker most certainly was influenced by the later films of American experimental filmmaker James Broughton (Mother's Day, The Pleasure Garden), especially his hedonistic celluloid celebration of everybody's favorite piece of furniture, The Bed (1968). Indeed, The Bed is certainly the Death Bed of the American avant-garde, as well as the quintessential American counterculture flick as a work that mindlessly celebrates virtually every form of sexual hedonism so as to also 'legitimize' the sexual vices of auteur Broughton who, although married with children, would abandon his wife and children a couple years after completing the film to be with a young man that was 35 years his junior. The genesis of the film was when Belgian film specialist and curator Jacques Ledoux came to the United States in 1967 seeking films for the next year's Experimental Film Competition, which he organized, and came up with the novel idea of giving away free 16mm color film stock to various previous contest participants in the hope they would create new films for the upcoming event, with Broughton being one of those lucky filmmakers who obliged the rather supportive Western European cineaste. The Bed also marked the rebirth of Broughton as both an artist and filmmaker. While his work The Pleasure Garden (1953)—a "poetic fantasy" shot on black-and-white 35mm film stock and filmed in England in collaboration with the director's then boy toy Kermit Sheets featuring various professionals, including comedic actress Hattie Jacques, filmmaker Lindsay Anderson, and prolific British actor John Le Mesurier—was such a hit that French poet/auteur Jean Cocteau presented Broughton with an award for it at the Cannes Festival Film and the director was even offered the opportunity to direct a film in Hollywood (which he absurdly turned down), The Bed is arguably the director's most celebrated, pioneering, and greatest known work to date. Although Broughton was in his mid-50s when he directed it, the film was quite revolutionary for its time in that it supposedly featured more nudity than any other film during its time (in fact, the only film lab to agree to make a print of it was a place known for exploitation films/porn loops). Featuring appearances from British-born philosopher/spiritual sage Alan Watts (a man the filmmaker would credit as being the only person who truly understood him during his lifetime), then-rather-elderly photographer Imogen Cunningham (who is fittingly known for her nude photography), and 'postmodern dance' pioneer Anna Halprin and her entire company, The Bed is a sort of absurdist micro-epic that reflects the good, the bad, and the just plain ugly of the counterculture zeitgeist as a work that reeks of misguided positivity, childish utopianism, deleterious wishful thinking, goofy dancing, and dreadful fashion senses (indeed, even completely naked, some of the subjects seem obscenely outmoded).

THE BED

To the otherworldly and uplifting sounds of a musical score composed by counterculture maestro Warner Jepson (who also created the score for Steve Arnold's surrealist celluloid oddity Luminous Procureess (1971) starring the Cockettes, as well as the hippie celluloid abortion Gold (1972) co-directed by Bill Desloge, who was also incidentally the cinematographer of The Bed), a bed magically rolls down a hillside and when it finally reaches the bottom it twirls around in circles like an excited dog. From there, an unclad Adam-like figure appears on the bed and his equally bare Eve follows. After a moment or two on the bed, Adam and Eve leap off, chase each other around the precious piece of furniture, eventually runaway like joyful children and the Greek god of the wild, Pan, appears on the bed-frame playing noisy degenerate jazz while auteur Broughton sits Indian style in his birthday suit next to a snake that slithers around in front of him. Things pick up more momentum when Anna Halprin and her decadent dance troupe encircle the bed, which a fire-crotched gentleman subsequently jumps over. To prepare the bed for carnal initiation, a dyke-like lady with grey hair makes the bed by covering it with sheets. Elderly photographer Imogen Cunningham then comes out and gently puts an infant on the bed, which is soon occupied by a topless pregnant woman. Meanwhile, two young men in suits stand in front of the bed while three young ladies in night gowns stand at the back of it. Of course, all five people eventually get under the covers together and assumedly fuck. A woman in vintage plantation garb brings a flower to her less than adoring poet boyfriend, who is too busy wordsmithing to pay her much mind. A male and female couple use the bed as an opportunity to put on and take off each other's pajamas while a cowboy uses the classic piece of furniture to put his boots on. A heavily dressed fat woman loses both her sleep and bed after discovering an unsavory pervert hiding under her mattress. Indeed, while the fat woman seeks sanctuary in a tree, the goofy pervert basks in the glory of his newly stolen mattress. A seemingly frigid young blonde sporting dorky old spinster clothing consumes her misspent time by prosaically knitting in bed, but as soon as she sees a The Wild One-esque leather-clad rebel biker on a motorcycle, she strips off all her clothes like a seasoned groupie and jumps on the lucky fellow's bike and rides away with him. Indeed, director Broughton may have been a hyper homo, but he certainly had the utmost respect for loose and lecherous 'liberated' women.

Meanwhile, a negress with a micro-afro admires a daddy longlegs spider crawling on her fingers and a woman abandons her sister by jumping on a black stallion and riding away. A naked firecrotched fellow gets a pleasant surprise when an unclad succubus with rainbow-colored legs and torso crawls out of a tree and climbs into his bed to carnally service him. Another fellow also gets a nice surprise when a salamander crawls out of his mouth and turns into a stunning young woman. In a scene of mirthful sacrilege, a disrobed babe holds a crucifix between her tits and a Holy Bible over her beaver. In a hysterically edited homo montage, two unclad gay lovers are featured contorted in a variety of aesthetically displeasing positions where they are occasionally joined by an equally bare lady friend. In unquestionably the most retrograde scene featured in the entire film, a swarthy bearded hippie smokes a blunt while his East Asian girlfriend chomps on a cookie. Naturally, the hippie passes the grass, as he gets the munchies and wants a bite of his oriental babe's cookie. After a lighthearted scene of two elderly Jews playing cards, a woman in the shape of a horse is chased by an elderly cowboy in his PJs, but when the horsey woman surprises the old John Wayne wannabee by jumping on his back and riding him, the old fart runs away like a cowardly cowgirl. In arguably the most odious yet comical scene of the film, a grotesquely chubby Guido dork of the pale yet swarthy sort furiously takes off a girl's socks, begins fondling and licking her feet, and then even attempts to fuck said feet. In a scene that I am sure any ostensible 'African Queen' could admire, a disrobed overweight middle-aged negress smoking a cigarette flapper-style basks in her glory as a white male slave in a fancy suit washes her big black Mammy-esque mammary glands. Indubitably, scenes like these prove that Mr. Broughton was proud to play the white cultural cuckold, thus proving that he was certainly ahead of his time in more than just aesthetic ways.

Ancient photographer Imogen Cunningham eventually floats back into the film and joins a middle-aged grey-haired 'queen' holding an antique baby doll in bed, but not before kissing the seemingly frigid fellow on the head. Alan Watts dressed as a doctor gives an elderly man his last rites and before the old fart kicks the bucket, he covers his own head with the sheet on the bed. In a scenario that probably inspired some horrendous exploitation flick like Lee Frost's The Thing with Two Heads (1972), a two-headed half-white-female/half-black-male—a sort of hermaphrodite ying/yang from multicultural hippie hell—kisses itself. Towards the end of the film, a large line of moronically dressed hippies wait in line to be the next to get into bed, which is soon covered with a dozen or so frail stark-naked white hippie lemming bodies. When old man Pan reappears with his dreaded sax, Adam and Eve wander back to bed after their day of play and auteur Broughton seems to pray to the snake, as if paying tribute to the devil. In the end, the bed leaves and goes back whence it once came.

Indubitably, The Bed will probably make more sense to the viewer when considering auteur James Broughton's quote, "All the world's a bed, and men and women merely dreamers," but of course some dreams are greater than others and the hippie dream proved to be a delusional nightmare with very few positive contributions to society aside from a film as curious and largely unintentionally entertaining as this. In the documentary Big Joy: The Adventures of James Broughton (2013), belated underground 'lo-fi' auteur George Kuchar (Hold Me While I'm Naked, The Mongreloid) seems somewhat reluctant to praise Broughton's film and reveals that it was hated by his avant-garde comrades in New York City, remarking, "It had a very 'California' feel to it. Beds outside, oak trees, you know, and grassy hills...people hugging one another. I think it's much despised a lot on the east coast. They consider it ridiculous. It was always happy. Bouncing, you know what I mean? It was like upbeat and bouncy, and any kind of humping was sort of...it wasn't antiseptic, it was neither, it was California in the sunshine." Indeed, in many ways, The Bed is a motion picture stereotype that is more effective than any satire or parody could ever be in mocking the 'positively positive positivity' and mindless wantonness-worshipping of the hippies and their allies. Luckily, the film features enough intentional humor in it to not seem like a totally bad beatnik joke (indeed, Broughton may have had a lot of eccentric arcane ideas, but he also had a sense of humor). It was not until a couple years later with his Jungian hermetic fable Dreamwood (1972) that Broughton was able to create something more sensible out of the themes, ideas, and aesthetics he introduced with The Bed, which is more or less a piece of silly embryonic filmic foreplay for the later longer work, albeit with luxury animated furniture. Indeed, maybe it is due to my steady diet of horror films as a child or my innate and perennial disgust for anything and everything relating to hippies and their bogus weltanschauung, but I will always be more of a Death Bed than The Bed kind of guy. Indeed, while beds are used for great fun things like fucking, sleeping, and reproducing, they are also unwittingly used for spreading terminal STDs like AIDS and for bidding one's time while rotting away from glorious terminal illnesses like cancer. As his later films readily demonstrate, Broughton, like the 'summer of love' zeitgeist he latched onto, lived in a fantasy world of his own making, but rather unfortunate realities like gay cancer later put a change to that, thus making The Bed seem like a naive joke nowadays, but one cannot deny its aesthetic allure.

THE BED

-Ty E

SATANTANGO

Béla Tarr (1994)

Begin for a moment, will you, to idealize the enormous growth of joy subsiding in my heart after finishing the morally exhausting Sátántangó in two sittings. This Hungarian arthouse epic is directed by Béla Tarr, a man of immense critical acclaim known for (or not) his surreptitious black and white portraits of lower to middle class life; Sátántangó falling into the former. The disconnected narrative of Sátántangó involves a central character whispered among cattle farmers. The return of he, Irimiás, shocks all of the surrounding farmers as he and his cohort, Petrina, were rumored to have died some time ago. Add in a pinch of scheming swindlers to this messianic tale and you got only the shell of what is known as, arguably, Béla Tarr's pièce de résistance. Opening with a scene of a pasture, Sátántangó makes no attempt to hide its creeping composition. Béla Tarr estimated that there are in fact only about 160 separate scenes in the film. Uniting this with the prior knowledge of Sátántangó's exhausting run time (7 and a half hours) and you got the smug gesture of your choice. You never really grasp the situation at hand until the final scene, which lends to the ambiguity of the grand picture. Of course you'll have your theories and your alliances but in the end Sátántangó is just as likely to surprise you as it will leave you in awe. Concerning itself with several layers of manipulation is what drives the progression through the torrential waves of tragedy and copious amounts of boozing. But hey, that's the Communist era for you.

Allow me to switch relevance to Béla Tarr's utterly unique and intimate sense of directing. As highlighted in the opening scene, Béla Tarr leaves his film victim to circumstance. Shot over 4 long years, Sátántangó features many scenes of coincidental, yet genius touches. Simple facets of coexistence lead to scenes of such grave realism that the camera could have been in no way manipulated to capture these naturally occurring instances. For example, flies buzzing about the grimy peasants or newspapers in the wind defying the presence of Irimiás and his almost-prophetic resurrection. These simple touches speak volumes for what you're about to experience. Béla Tarr utilizes a sneaking zoom for focusing on a single subject then slowly retracting the perspective to initiate long-winded segments of lower class turmoil. Tarr's camera movements, rare as they are, act as soft strokes whether balancing bovine or tracing the fields surrounding them. If I were to choose a favorite condition of weather, it would, without a doubt, be rain. For this reason, Sátántangó is now an obvious and ideal escape from the warm heat of a summer afternoon. Every single scene lingers and loiters about and this isn't even grazing the self-appointed art form Tarr has created out of his cinematography.

The correlation between the desolate community (if you can call it that) and the impoverished dwellers is touched upon with our first contact of human life.

SATANTANGO

The events of Sátántangó literally begin to unfold with a scene of a larger woman squatting over a water pan and cleansing her dry cunt with a wet rag. This introduction sets the standard of development as Tarr makes no excuses in showing a human life during the most tender and obscene of moments. Soon after it is revealed that this woman, Mrs. Schmidt, was having an affair with a man known as Futaki, a terrible plan of thievery sets in place. What next occurs is the primary phase of Sátántangó and that is the large sum of money rewarded to those all for a hard years work. Deceit is amidst the tightly woven collective of people incapable of independent thought. The only person exempt from this category is Futaki, slyly spoken of in the final report of Irimiás. Not only are his people left disenfranchised and caught in a never-ending cycle of "government allocation" but his role as savior is both challenged and enforced; a game of gray-scale tug of war. Since Sátántangó is told from many perspectives it does indeed become a chore up until the second hour mark. The trials of the Doctor and his quest for fruit brandy evolve into a meandering scene of walking & coughing; only to take a break with the local whores. Disapprove of Béla Tarr's slinking cinematography if you must but his unwavering commitment to unearthing a shining point in each and every degenerate is something I could never reciprocate appreciation to in words, without bathing in pretension, of course.

Your persistence will be paid off most handsomely, I can promise. The several scenes in which something of a thrilling nature is divulged marks a sobering change of pace. Going from a lonely child, skulking in an abandoned attic, admiring the rain and holding in contempt the mother who favors male company more, Béla Tarr switches sights on the possibility of a mental illness being born under the same conditions most serial killers are victim to. This little girl soon takes a stray feline nearby and submits it to a power-play in which she grasps its forelegs and rolls around with it, slamming it into the floorboards. This punishment is necessary to her as the poor cat "crapped". Soon after rat poison is brought into the mix, quite literally. Lacing a dish of milk with the poison, she forces the cats face into the bowl who has no choice but to ingest the sweet milk. Following this aggressive and harrowing scene, the girl backs off slowly. This allows the cat some peace of mind before it lowers its head into the dish and perishes. This scene admits the films second half of notoriety, the first belonging to the daunting runtime. Don't worry though; the cat's ability to act was likely the fault of a sedative and Tarr admits to adopting the beast after the film was shot. Another critical aspect of Béla Tarr's filmmaking is how in tune with rhythm he is, judging by his musical performances and technical achievements within. The quick-drip percussion is caught with applying wandering drops of rainwater to tin. Did I mention the fact that Sátántangó is one of the more soothing, therapeutic pieces of cinema? I shouldn't have to; watch any random clip on YouTube for proof of that.

A lonely light on the horizon whispers to the little girl, named Eſtike, but she knows better. What awaits her isn't a worried mother or a call for supper but an oppressive, drunken wench. Eštika's path will soon mesh with the Dočtor's, and his with Irimiás's. This slug-like progression of a simple story does Tarr's film wonders. Often throughout Sátántangó I had hoped for a mind's eye peek into the thought processes of these pained creatures, wagers of sin. When not practicing avid voyeurism, Béla Tarr makes plenty of time to drag surrealism out of the most bare and stricken scenes of bland activities. All of this retrospect upon my viewing of Sátántangó must spark fear in the eyes of preordained cinematic disciples, for it is quintessential viewing but selective towards attention spans. To ease the promise of an enthralling experience, I'd like to promise that once the film hits the second hour mark Sátántangó softens to the senses and becomes pliable to many calibers of cinephile. A curious thought hit once I began observing the transfer, apparently supervised by Tarr himself. Sátántangó was filmed in 35mm and me being a film projectionist, am blessed with knowledge of the format. Now if 35mm runs at approximately 24 frames per second, equating to 1,440 frames a minute, that means that the 450 minute long Sátántangó is around 648,000 frames. A Christie platter system couldn't even fit half of the film's runtime. The changeover method would be the only possible way to screen Sátántangó and we're looking at about 26 reels worth (if the reels are evenly split).

If Sátántangó succeeded at anything besides raw beauty it would be encouraging me to seek the shelter of the bottle. An escape that will surely devour the lot of them, myself included. Do not be fooled by the small offering of scene transitions. Tarr commits to making each more engaging than the last. A scene to discuss would be the Headmaster's dance with the husky Mrs. Schmidt. He tangoes with the goblin, offering in a hushed tone a comfortable life in return for courting her. The Headmaster then praises her tenderness; The joke being that this aspect of her doesn't exist. Mrs. Schmidt is, after all, the village whore. You might have found this review chock full of examples following the uniform, "Béla Tarr [is]...." The reason being that he does so much for us within this indelible 7 hour epic and what did we ask of him? Nothing. At the very least, we requested a competent cult classic but to call Sátántangó a cult film would be to shepherd the film into a class unworthy of its presence. And on another note, please, that damn doctor will outlive them all. Sátántangó is a film to be stared at in awe for Tarr's (ash)hetic is enough to fuel any feasible genre this film can be sorted in. I greatly look forward to Béla Tarr's swan song, The Turin Horse, due out this year. I can say without a doubt in my mind that Sátántangó is one of the most rewarding cinematic excursions that I have partaken in.

-mAQ

WILDERNESS
WILDERNESS

Ben Bolt (1996) British werewolf films always seem to get the idea correct behind the myth. Neil Marshall's Dog Soldiers throttled his career into less-satisfying films, but i am still thankful for his mark on the "wolfman" genre. Similar to Fawcett's slight feminist tones in Ginger Snaps, Ben Bolt bares his teeth in regards to the purity of the female and in the same time, gives her a feral presence. Wilderness concerns a young woman who strangely looks like a British Winona Ryder with crooked teeth. This woman believes she is a werewolf. No reasoning behind it, no bite; it almost denounces the theory of an infection of sorts. She was just born into i guess. Same with maturity issues in female horror films, her near rape experience caused her to transform into a Timber Wolf and strike down the boy. Enter her psychiatrist; a man who soon becomes detached from his own life and begins to write about this woman. He strangely becomes obsessed with her while quoting Freud doctrine. He becomes a strong character only to be foolishly detached later and given a quick end. Her boyfriend resembles a disturbing John C. Reilly clone, albeit with a much larger forehead. Beauty is in the eye of the beholder, not the director of Wilderness though. Ben Bolt has collected some of the most hideous actors ever for this Made-for-TV effort that is better than the rest. Amanda Ooms is mostly nude for the film. Her metamorphosis consists of that hokey morph effect that was so widely used in horrible sitcoms such as Charmed. Its biggest contribution was its ending. It makes up for whatever slack it lost throughout its run time. It proves to be an intelligent and thought provoking thriller that builds the bridge through humanity and wildlife.

-mAQ

TROPIC THUNDER

Ben Stiller* (2008)

Typical Hollywood comedy fare; Insert some fart jokes and big name stars in a zany vacation-esque adventure in which friendships are broken and rekindled in the small run time. Unconventional Hollywood comedy fare; Tropic Thunder. Incompetent douche Ben Stiller has not only created a masterpiece in the dying genre of comedy, but he creates a dynamite dissection of the repetitive machine that is Hollywood. Opening the film up is four vignettes composing faux-promotional ads for the fictional actors of Tropic Thunder. Alpa Chino's Booty Sweat energy drink and Bust-A-Nut granola bar are the films openers. These several faux trailers are more entertaining than the entire self-absorbed run time of Grindhouse. The next trailers are several jabs at big films and stars referencing MTV awards and entertainment taboos as recklessness, celebrity nudity, and filmed homosexuals. Jack Black's Jeff Portnoy is an actor who is the white equivalent of Eddie Murphy. This is a man who gets his kick from playing 12+ characters in his films about family's that exhibit several scenes of extensive Negro fart jokes. Well, the racial card is switched as the white family is predominately grossed or disappointed. The Nutty Professor is an abomination and Tropic Thunder recognizes this. The Oscar jokes go hand-in-hand with the neglect that Murphy's role in Dreamgirls received at the Academy Awards. Alpa Chino's role is just one of the surprise breakout roles that are the catalyst for the extreme hilarity you will find in Tropic Thunder. The simple joke jabbed at his name is enough to make me squirm and point out the obvious role that Scarface had on urban society. You see, Black people need a role model. Whereas they cannot find one in some community worker or diligent government worker, they turn to a mediocre entertainer and uses his nihilistic and often drug-induced logic as their bible. It is almost fact that every rapper has a Scarface poster. Now for the kicker. Robert Downey Jr.'s role. I'm sure you've heard of it. RDJ plays the "African-American" soldier Lincoln Osiris. This man goes as far as to quote The Jefferson's theme song. This is the supposed controversial move that has the film crew prepping for massive public outrage. RDJ in a modern Blackface. The performance from this man has me in awe. He can play the serious Kirk Lazarus, and the Kool-Aid loving Sarge himself. Nothing is more perfect than this. Tropic Thunder is either the greatest comedy ever made, or the worst. Together with this magnificent cast including a laugh riot role played surprisingly fucking effective by Tom Cruise, Tropic Thunder will literally make you shit yourself with laughter. This is the deep, sentimental humor that satirizes the stuff in Hollywood that people are afraid of. Tropic Thunder is the first in a (hopefully) long line of audacious comedies that build the barrier against "good taste." Forget all the bad press you may hear. Someone needs to tell the disability groups that you should never go full retard. I could go on for paragraphs due to the movies inconspicuous ways of packing so much comedy into such a normal length film. Take my seeing it twice as a fierce badge of dedication and love to this pristine film. Tropic Thunder is a national treasure of an action film and seamlessly blends genres to create a form of retarded art. Tropic Thunder is the real dope. Get Some!

TROPIC THUNDER

-mAQ

KILL LIST

Ben Wheatley (2011)

Kill List manifested itself to me in the form of a cautious recommendation pleading for me to remain in the dark. Not long after, the buzz of Kill List took form over the world wide web, brief mutters catching wind of the nonsensical musings of the finale, with so much brevity that visiting my favorite cinema news/review sites proved to be quite the obstacle course. I maintained my position and leaped at Kill List with my all once I noticed its humble emergence. With a cockney swagger, Ben Wheatley directs this somber hit-man drama with a creeping and fleeting eye for family values before thrusting our lead characters into their chore of killing, which at times, proves to be too much with both family and business in tow. Kill List follows the patriarchal rule of most darkly brewed British thriller/dramas with weaving two male British figures and their off-the-pot relationships and values while siding you against the cunty female denizens of unending mischief. In one corner we have Jay, our lead, a thought-upon British soldier who is bewildered by incognizant terrors from war time stress found from a blundered mission in Kiev; who knows what terrors lie in waiting hunger? In the other, we have his more chipper associate-sociopath, Gal, a Ray Winstone if I ever saw one and a through-and-thorough good pal. Together they make up the duo of "mechanics" who have been out of the wind for a decent bit as Jay is balancing financial coordination and family man all too close to each other, obviously mixing business and pleasure since being off his rocker. Gal, on the other hand, seems all too ready for a new life, a new beginning, which makes up for his +1 to Jay's dinner get-together - a sharp featured brunette whose murky motives play out in horrifying grandeur.

Subtle nuances clear the path for Kill List and keep it ambiguously fresh and enjoyable. Whether or not Wheatley intended for Jay & Gal's client to resemble a wispy-haired Angus Scrimm lookalike, the results scream in favor of a meditated casting decision. Proceeding after the occasional segments of "...what?", Kill List regains its momentum as hit after hit are detailed in a sordid and grisly manner; almost as if Wheatley intended to channel the same drive that fueled the doomed lead of The Horseman (2008). It is alarmingly clear at the point when the first target is made known to Gal that the gut for taking ones life isn't something that can remain as fortified as a simple talent. We witness this with purpose when Gal is disturbed with the idea of executing an ordained priest - an act of business Jay isn't all too bothered seeing through to completion. Allusions of war are applied directly into the bowels of Jay's opening exposition with his family and friend. Wheatley must have decided that flashbacks would have muddled the sense of linear engagement in this tale of curveball carnage and in place, intermittently injected keywords into idle banter to give sense to it all and avoid a confusion possibly more serious than what the ending might offer to a casual viewer. Kill List is a devious joker of cinema, to be quite frank. It ends on such a baffling note that the nearest emotion you might muster up would be a hybrid of anger and bewilderment, as if Kill List had a promise to fulfill other than living up to the elevated hype that has since clouded its release. While the end never seems to justify the means for Kill List and its godforsaken existence, the fate of its characters can be traced back to its opening roots, which speaks volumes in comparison to the brackish body of cinema excess that floods the senses of the modern viewer.

KILL LIST

A degree of difficulty can be found in distinguishing the indistinguishable diatribe of Kill List's choice British actors. I found myself constantly on edge tweaking the volume to an acceptable level only to thrash towards the dial when the frequent bouts of domestic disturbances exploded onto the screen, at rarely a moments notice as well. With each "victim" separated into chapters with an appropriately labeled title card, Kill List's pacing, if slow at first, propels towards such an even pacing that reliving the nightmare a second time in the company of friends proved most satisfying as I huddled into the corner, eyes darting to catch every expression that stunk of disbelief. Respected artisans of small-time acting, Neil Maskell and Michael Smiley, respond once the film begins with a spark of friendship that proves charming, even in light of the unexplained incident in Kiev that Jay suffered throughout. The chemistry between the two holds tight, even when Kill List spirals into a sort of inspired madness which must remain unknown until after the film has been ingested. Even the slightest hint of where Kill List draws its life from would go off and spoil one of the more alienating finales in recent memory. Upon my first viewing of Kill List, I admit I felt cheated; I felt myself conjuring a passive fury towards its proposed goal. But upon having it grace my screen for the second time, Kill List warmed its silly cinematic contraband towards my palate. Nonsensical antics in mind, a part of me welcomed in the clumsy culmination of this assassin thriller. While Wheatley handled what he intended to create and project with the elegance of a handicapped athlete, one cannot contest that after examining, scene-by-scene, the good grace of Kill List, that it doesn't reach its finishing line - Even if its visual and lyrical summary liken to a combined hypothesis of every great shocker rolled into one imperceptible package of imperfection. As an added bonus, within Kill List you will find several short glimpses of extreme savagery that had the visitors in my room twitching in repulsion. This more than makes up for the mild misdirection by assuming a role of a grotesque party favor, don't you think?

-mAQ

DANIEL SCHMID - LE CHAT QUI PENSE

Benny Jaberg (2010)

As far as I am concerned, Swiss auteur/opera director Daniel Schmid (Violanta, Hécate) is one of the most underrated European filmmakers of the post-WWII era and his first three features—Tonight or Never (1972) aka Heute nacht oder nie, La Paloma (1974), and Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel—are nothing short of strikingly singular high-camp masterpieces that should be made compulsory viewing for any serious cinephile. A friend and collaborator of both Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Werner Schroeter, Schmid spent his formative years in West Germany, but would ultimately return to his homeland and become arguably the most world renowned Swiss filmmaker of all time, even among the Japanese (who he would pay tribute to with his documentary The Written Face (1995) aka Das geschriebene Gesicht), yet virtually none of his cinematic works have ever been made available in North America and thus virtually his entire oeuvre, especially his early works, are in serious danger of being disposed of in the virtual celluloid ash heap of film history. Luckily, Swiss documentary filmmakers Pascal Hofmann and Benny Jaberg, who previously co-directed the documentary Wintersong: A Film About Dakota Suite (2006) about English singer/songwriter Chris Hooson, have attempted to immortalize Daniel Schmid with their surprisingly lyrical love letter dedicated to the life and films of the filmmaker, Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense (2010). Featuring excerpts from Schmid's films and archived footage from the sets, as well as new interviews with the filmmaker, auteur Werner Schroeter, actress/diva Ingrid Caven, cinematographer Renato Berta (who shot most of Schmid's films), and various others, Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense is an important documentary in that, aside from featuring rare film scenes and interviews that can be found nowhere else, the documentary also happens to be the only resource available to English-speaking viewers (although in various languages, the dvd released by T&C Film features English subtitles) on Schmid, as not a single English-language book has been written on the late great auteur. The perfect companion piece to the documentary Mondo Lux: The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter (2011) aka Mondo Lux - Die Bilderwelten des Werner Schroeter directed by Elfi Mikesch—a work chronicling the life and work of Schmid's one-time lover/assistant director and friend Werner Schroeter (whose work Der Bomberpilot (1970) Schmid acted as assistant director of)—Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense is not only a documentary about a criminally underrated filmmaker who the modern world does not deserve, but a cultural history of German-speaking Europe during the post-WWII years, which the filmmaker once stated of, "I live in a decadent era. That is my private belief. I believe that I live in a late chapter of Western history. I have no conception of how things might continue," in front of a bunch of unhappy leftists while giving a press conference for his first feature Tonight or Never.

DANIEL SCHMID - LE CHAT QUI PENSE

Born on 26 December 1941 to a family of hoteliers in the Grison Alps in Switzerland, Daniel Schmid had a somewhat unconventional childhood that revolved around fantasy and matriarchy as his father passed away when he was just a wee lad, but while living in a luxury hotel in a resort spot, he managed to meet many famous people as a child, including Danish-German filmmaker Douglas Sirk (Written on the Wind, All That Heaven Knows), who would later become his hero and who he would have the opportunity to make the last filmic portrait of with his documentary Imitation of Life (1983) aka Mirage de la vie. While still a young man in his 20s during the 1960s, Schmid relocated to West Berlin to a politically and socially revolutionary atmosphere that was quite in contrast to his quiet upbringing in the Swiss Alps. Although Schmid appreciated the fact he could be openly gay in counter-culture krautland and even befriended members of the Red Army Faction, he got fed up with the phony socio-political bullshit of the far-left and decided to focus solely on filmmaking, with the medium-length work Thut alles im Finstern, eurem Herrn das Licht zu ersparen (1970) aka Do Everything in the Dark in Order to Save Your Lord the Light, but it was not until he collaborating with Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who he actually met in 1966 and was briefly lovers with, and his wife Ingrid Caven that he became really serious about filmmaking and began to get noticed around the European arthouse scene. Convinced by Fassbinder to quit film school after being called a “spoilt Swiss Boy,” Schmid decided to make his first film Tonight or Never (1972) aka Heute nacht oder nie—a high-camp satire of the far-left student movement—with next to nil money after being encouraged by Ingrid Caven, who starred in the film. From there, Schmid directed two more dark melodramatic masterpieces starring his new muse Caven, La Paloma (1974), and Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel, with the former film being described as follows by his friend Werner Schroeter: “‘La Paloma, my happiness that remained.’ The alpine world...It could have gone so wrong...Completely wrong, yet it didn’t. It’s such pure kitsch, and then there’s the grandiose singing of Lotte Lehman and Richard Tauber from the ‘20s. It’s the victory of what Susan Sontag calls camp. These elements become something new that not only has ironic remove, but manages to spring over that, too, so as to find new, expressive force.”

For Shadow of Angels, Schmid adapted a controversial play that the filmmaker described as an “evil fairy tale” and Frankfurt Jews protested against for being ostensibly ‘anti-Semitic’ (one of the lead characters is named simply ‘the Rich Jew’), with Schroeter remarking regarding the work: “Fassbinder was very taken by the approach to his play ‘Garbage, the City and Death’, that Daniel filmed as ‘Shadow of Angels’. The film is pure Daniel but also pure Fassbinder.” Indeed, Shadow of Angels is undoubtedly one of the most brazenly dark, misanthropic, and simple yet esoteric films of German New Cinema as a work about a melancholy prostitute whose ex-nazi father (portrayed by Austrian actor Adrian Hoven, who was originally famous for starring in sentimental Heimat films) used to gas Jews during the good old days and now makes a living as a nocturnal third rate drag queen. Due to his keenness for kitsch and high-camp aesthetics, Schmid was attacked as a supposed fascist by leftist filmgoers and critics alike, with Schmid remarking regarding his intent with his first feature at a press conference: "I did have political intentions in making the film. It may sound strange but...the backdrop of political interpretation in front of which I localize the film is, in the best case, only present so as to disconcert the viewer. I live in a decadent era. That is my private belief. I believe that I live in a late chapter of Western history. I have no conception of how things might continue." If anything is apparent while watching his German era films, it is that he was infatuated with divas and you know you have a problem when a queen like Schroeter states of you, "Daniel saw a diva in everyone. He even tried to sell his aunt as an odd diva. Daniel was a diva addict. They were hidden everywhere, and you only had to bring this out in order to draw forth this artificiality and create a diva's pseudo immortality." After completing his Swiss-French work Hécate (1982)—a film set in a French Arab colony during the end of colonialism based on a novel by French fascist novelist/diplomat Paul Morand—Schmid permanently relocated back to Switzerland where he made more conventional and less campy works like Jenatsch (1987), Hors saison (1992) aka Off Season, and Beresina, or the Last Days of Switzerland (1999). Although Schmid would live until 2006, he would never complete another film after Beresina. Ironically, like his friend Werner Schroeter, Schmid died of a form of cancer that obstructed his ability to speak and unfortunately he was unable to realize his final film Portovero, which he had already begun shooting.

While I typically find reviewing documentaries, especially those about filmmakers, to be rather redundant, Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense is undoubtedly an imperative work for anyone with an interest in European arthouse cinema of the late-1960s to early 1980s. Admittedly, I have always been disappointed in Schmid's post-Fassbinder era films (though I still have yet to track down Violanta (1978), which, as pointed out in the doc, was made during the filmmaker's happiest point in life), yet the Swiss auteur filmmaker's first three features alone are more important than most of his contemporaries' entire oeuvres, but he seemed to realize that himself when he stated in an interview regarding Tonight or Never, "The film was severely attacked by the prevailing left "Zeitgeist". It's very strange. I recently talked to an American critic who's now 25. For him the sixties have only survived as a theatrical act – and that's exactly how the comedian in the movie is treated." Indeed, Schmid was an artist who understood that the only real art is highly personalized as demonstrated by his rather revealing remark, "In describing someone else, you are in fact describing yourself ... rather than this stranger, because it is your projection; in actual fact, this says more about you than about this other person, who has long departed (...)," so it should be no surprise that he also stated of the filmmakers of his generation, "At the time many of my colleagues – writers, filmmakers – were identifying themselves with a working-class environment they'd never lived or functioned in." Indeed, while one would expect it to be common that there is nothing more pathetic than an idealistic bourgeois boob who has never worked an single day in their entire life pretending to sympathize with the working-class, it seems that Schmid came from an exceedingly ethno-masochistic generation of decadent degenerates who worshipped ugliness and weakness. Of course, Schmid was an authentic fellow who had no problem admitting he was an unrepentant diva and high-camp addict with a sentimental fondness for opera and old hotels and every one of his films, from Tonight or Never to Beresina, demonstrates this. A surprisingly worthwhile work for Schmid novices and fanatics alike, Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense is as loving a tribute to Schmid as Schmid's own documentary Tosca's Kiss (1984) was to the elderly retired opera singers of Casa Verdi that is so candidly portrayed. Despite his affinity for kitsch and camp, Schmid, like the subjects of Tosca's Kiss, also had an affinity for classical European kultur which made him stick out among his contemporaries, hence why his works have aged as gracefully as the finest of wines and silent films. Indeed, in that sense, Schmid is worthy of being named in the same sentence with the likes of his heroes F.W. Murnau and Josef von Sternberg.

DANIEL SCHMID - LE CHAT QUI PENSE

-Ty E

ATTACK OF THE GIANT LEECHES

Bernard L. Kowalski (1959)

A review in chapters.

-mAQ

CANDYMAN
CANDYMAN

Bernard Rose (1992)

Candyman is one of the most innovative and well made so called "slasher" films. Like Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street before it, Candyman was surprisingly able to reinvent the stagnant and tired slasher sub-genre. The film is based on the short story "The Forbidden" by erotic horror author Clive Barker. Barker is the greatest horror author since HP Lovecraft, so it is no surprise that Candyman has an originally horrifying story that can capture the attention of the most demanding of individuals that watch film solely to see a good story. Tony Todd IS the Candyman. I cannot imagine another individual playing the Candyman nor demanding the attention that Todd's aura of charisma permeates. Tony Todd is a brother with class and that is a true rarity. Nothing is more disgusting than a group of illiterate black gangstas except the fact that degenerate whites see them as their idols. If a self-loathing honky is going to find his role models in colored folks, at least they can idolize a black man that deserves respect like Tony Todd. Then again, Tony Todd preys on the "lesser" of his own people in Candyman. Despite only being in the film for a handful of scenes, Tony Todd dominates Candyman with his performance. The Candyman, unlike most slasher killers, was an innocent during his life. The son of the slave, he surprisingly became an artist and great painter. His talents ultimately led to his demise when he impregnated a white woman who was one of his paintings subjects. The Candyman was a man that overcame the discrimination put against him only to be eventually killed. The Candyman haunts an area full of the most pathetic and unsuccessful of his own people. Though his talents led to his destruction, he hates his own people because of their lack of self-determination and failure. The Candyman is a much more complex slasher killer than people want to give him credit for. The Candyman is the ghostly reminder of a group of people that never brought themselves up whether it be because of prejudice (everyone's favorite excuse) or collective failure. Another sequel to the Candyman series is scheduled for 2011. This will be interesting as the series is set in New Orleans, the area devastated by hurricane Katrina. Was hurricane Katrina one of the fruits of the Candyman's hatred towards his own people? I wouldn't be surprised as the people of New Orleans haven't been proactive about rebuilding their hometowns. It must be a conspiracy of whitey and The Candyman lurking in the shadows.

-Ty E

LAST TANGO IN PARIS

Bernardo Bertolucci (1972)

Make no mistake about it, I am no friend of commies, be they of the kosher or shabbos goy persuasion, yet Italy has somehow managed to produce a red or two that I actually respect, though dago Freudian-Marxist Bernardo Bertolucci (The Conformist aka Il conformista, The Dreamers) is certainly not one of them. Indeed, while I have always regarded Pier Paolo Pasolini as one of my favorite filmmakers, his fellow poet-turned-filmmaker buddy Bertolucci (whose first film, La commare secca (1962) aka The Grim Reaper, was penned by Pasolini) has always rubbed me the wrong way. Maybe it is because he degraded the European art-house film by turning into something akin to a cheap Hollywood product, uses degenerate sex (i.e. incest, anus-fingering, etc) as a cheap gimmick to prove the artistic merit of his work among the right far-left intellectuals and film critics, routinely sexually and emotionally exploits his actors and actresses, and/or because he is a rare Guido Francophile, but Bertolucci is a certainly man I love to hate and easily my least favorite of the great post-WWII Italian directors. Of course, as someone who likes to give credit where credit is due, I must admit I rather enjoyed two of the pinko goombah's films, La commare secca (1962) aka The Grim Reaper, as well as his Franco-Italian 'magnum opus' Last Tango in Paris (1972) aka Ultimo tango a Parigi. Considering it has been at least a decade since I last saw Last Tango in Paris, I recently decided to re-watch it to see if I was not merely hypnotized into liking the film by Maria Schneider's jumbo jugs and Marlon Brando's singular brazen butter-loving post-twink performance. It should be noted that both stars of the film went on to say that they felt raped and manipulated by Bertolucci, with Brando refusing to talk to the director for 15 years after the work's release and Schneider even going so far as to describe the auteur as a "gangster and pimp" and even completely disavowing her involvement in the film that made her a famous and international sex icon, once stating, "Last Tango ... first major role [...] I regretted my choice since the beginning of my career would have been sweeter, quieter. For Tango, I was not prepared. People have identified with a character that was not me. Butter, about saucy old pigs...Even Marlon with his charisma and class, felt a bit violated, exploited a little in this film. He rejected it for years. And me, I felt it doubly."

Indeed, Schneider felt the film "stole her youth" and even described it as her life's only regret (which is pretty telling considering she was a sexually depraved junky who burned many bridges during her uniquely uneven acting career), yet in my humble opinion, it is easily the greatest and most moving performance she has ever given, thus acting as a rare example where Bertolucci's manipulative and exploitative directing style has had a somewhat positive outcome. Of course, the most incriminating claim against the Guido pervert is the fact that a proud sexual outlaw and perennial bad boy like Brando of all people would claim that he felt 'raped' by Bertolucci, yet the film also gave the On the Waterfront (1954) star his then-stagnating career back. Ultimately, Last Tango in Paris is a pretentious and obscenely overrated proto-artsploitation flick that only has slightly more artistic merit than the typical Tinto Brass fuck flick and it is certainly not the "landmark in movie history" and "movie breakthrough" that purportedly "altered the face of an art form" as kosher critic Pauline Kael lauded it as in her famous puffery-ridden New York Times review, yet the film is undeniably alluring and even sometimes provocative, if not in an oftentimes unintentionally hilarious manner as a piece of patently perverse celluloid pomposity that reminds one why Bertolucci is a self-professed Freudian. Notably, conservative Factory auteur Paul Morrissey thought the film was so wretched and pathetically pretentious that he included a line in his Warhol-produced horror satire Flesh for Frankenstein (1973) where the eponymous character played by Udo Kier states, "To know death, Otto, you have to fuck life in the gallbladder" to mock a famous scene from Bertolucci's film where Brando absurdly states, "until you go right up into the ass of death; right up in his ass until you find the womb of fear, and then maybe, maybe then you'll be able to find him." Indeed, featuring unsanctioned sodomy of the buttery and unholy sort and Brando taking two fingers up the bum like a seasoned champ of scatology, Bertolucci's somewhat poorly aged film demonstrates that Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman may have been right when he stated the work was "really about homosexuals." Of course, the director has denied that the film was inspired by any sort of latent homosexuality on his part, stating it was based on a personal sexual fantasy of his that was inspired by how he, "once dreamed of seeing a beautiful nameless woman on the street and having sex with her without ever knowing who she was." It should also be noted that the film was co-written by French feminist filmmaker Agnès Varda, who based the ending of the work on the death of Jim Morrison, who overdosed on heroin in Paris the previous year.

LAST TANGO IN PARIS

Opening with a curious credit sequence featuring two paintings, Double Portrait of Lucian Freud and Frank Auerback and Study for a Portrait, by gay British figurative painter Francis Bacon, Last Tango in Paris immediately lets the viewer know that they are in store for a superlatively sleazy European arthouse film where post-counter-culture sexual degeneracy of the pseudo-romantic sort is the main selling point. After the credits scene, the viewer is introduced to a majorly melancholy middle-aged American flophouse owner named Paul (Marlon Brando), who screams "Fucking God" while walking aimlessly around Pont de Bir-Hakeim in Paris due to the fact that his beauteous blonde French wife Rosa (played by Veronica Lazar, who went on to star in a number of Bertolucci's films, including La Luna (1979), The Sheltering Sky (1990), and Besieged (1998)) has just committed suicide by slitting her wrists in a bathtub. While walking around Pont de Bir-Hakeim, Paul spots a hot young 19-year-old frog chick with big tits named Jeanne (Maria Schneider), who is headed to Left Bank to look for an apartment for her and her pompous pansy documentary filmmaker fiancée Tom (Jean-Pierre Leaud) to live together in. Ultimately, Paul follows Jeanne to a dilapidated apartment in Left Bank, speaks French to her a bit with a rather rough American accent, remains silent for a couple minutes or so, and out of nowhere decides to forcefully push the young lady against the wall, rip her panties off, and give her a good old forceful fucking in the crummy flat. While Paul soon leaves without so much as even introducing himself, he returns to the apartment the next day and lays out ground rules to Jeanne regarding how they will meet twice a week to improve one another's carnal knowledge, but that they will never get to know one another. Indeed, Paul even bans Jeanne from telling him her name, but naturally curiosity is eventually going to get the best of the cute, if not severely scattered-brained and emotionally erratic, young girl.

Meanwhile, Jeanne is becoming increasingly annoyed by her effeminate fiancée Tom's incessant tendency towards following her around with a film crew and filming every single mundane thing she does. Indeed, Tom wants to make a cinéma vérité documentary about Jeanne's deceased father, who was a hero in the French Foreign Legion that was killed during combat in Algeria in 1958. Indeed, since her immature yet artistically pretentious boy toy is more interested in her long dead daddy than her, Jeanne sees it as only natural to begin a relationship with a lecherous and seemingly half-loony macho American man, who also serves as a depraved father-figure of sorts (in fact, Bertolucci attempted to gain publicity for the film by claiming that Schneider developed a real-life "Oedipal fixation with Brando" during the production). Indeed, as a man whose wife cheated on him and committed suicide in the same flophouse they ran together, Paul has his own problems to worry about and having a random "no strings attached" sexual relationship with a seemingly undefiled young girl seems like just the thing he needs at this rather dark and dreary point in his increasingly intolerable life. When Paul meets with Rosa's mother (Maria Michi), who wants her daughter to have a proper Catholic burial and receive absolution from a priest, the whacked out widower becomes enraged and screams at his crying mother-in-law, "No! Rose didn't believe. Nobody believes in the fucking God here! [...] The Priest doesn't want any suicides. The Church doesn't want any suicides, do they?" Of course, it seems like Paul is more irked by the fact that his wife committed suicide without writing a suicide note than the fact her mother wants to give her a traditional Catholic funeral. Indeed, Paul just cannot seem to fathom why his spouse would commit self-slaughter out of the blue, thus hinting that he is a psychopath who lacks the empathy to understand other people, including his own loved ones. Of course, in the end, Paul will also discover that he does not understand his young Parisian fuck buddy and it will ultimately cost him his rather worthless life.

Naturally, after a couple passionate coitus sessions, Jeanne wants to know more about the personal life of the old fart who likes talking about farts (at one point, she remarks he has “strong hands,” to which he replies, “The better to squeeze a fart out of you!”) that has been routinely feeding her extra-furry frog pussy. Paul eventually gives into being more confessional after Jeanne describes how she lost her virginity to her first love, who also happened to be her cousin (ironically, the lucky, if not incestuous, fellow’s name was also Paul). After describing his parents as follows, “My father was a drunk. Tough, Whore-fucker, bar-fighter. Super-masculine. And he was tough. My mother was very poetic. Also a drunk” and claiming that one of his earliest memories involved being arrested for being nude in public at his quaint childhood farm community, Jeanne calls him out on what she believes is pure fabricated bullshit and calls him an “egotist,” proclaiming, “your solitude weighs on me.” As punishment for weighing his solitude on her, Jeanne decides to deny Paul sex and proceeds to get kinky all by her lonesome by masturbating. Meanwhile, Paul learns that a degenerate tenant named Marcel (Massimo Girotti) at the flophouse that he and his dead wife managed was carrying on an affair with Rosa around the same time she committed suicide. Of course, Jeanne’s relationship with her fiancée Tom continues to go sour as she is “tired of being raped” by his camera (indeed, it seems Monsieur Leaud was a stand-in of sorts for the director). With both of them suffering from personal misery related to disappointing lovers, Paul decides to spice things up by rubbing butter on Jeanne’s virginal rectum and forcibly sodomizing her while forcing her to chant, “Holy family. Church of good citizens. The children are tortured until they tell their first lie. Where the will is broken by repression. Where freedom is assassinated by egotism.” Needless to say, Jeanne, who is assumedly an anal virgin, sobs like a scared child while being bestially sodomized by her eccentric elder.

LAST TANGO IN PARIS

While at a wedding rehearsal with her family and fiancée Tom, Jeanne has a hysterical emotional breakdown of sorts and runs to Paul for safety while still wearing her wedding dress. After taking off her wedding dress, gently bathing her body in a bathtub, and explaining to her that love does not exist, Paul decides to reward Jeanne for her audacious anal courage from the previous day by allowing her to shove her fingers up his middle-aged American porthole, though he forces her to cut her fingernails beforehand. When Paul goes to his dead wife Rosa’s wake, he opts for savagely verbally assaulting his postmortem beloved’s cute corpse by calling her a “cheap, goddamn, fucking, godforsaken whore” and a “goddamn, fucking, pig-fucking liar,” but he ultimately realizes he never really understood her and gets all sentimental, calling her his “sweetheart” and whatnot by the end of his rather unconventional attempt at (non)mourning. More than anything, Paul wants to know why Rosa committed suicide in the first place and he also wishes he had the gall to do the same. Luckily, Jeanne will eventually give him the chance to end his miserable life of endless internal suffering. Rather disconcerted by the fact that he cannot make sense of his wife’s suicide, Paul abruptly decides to stop meeting Jeanne at her apartment for salacious sex sessions, which naturally shatters the rather naïve young girl, so she decides to go patch things up with Tom, who proves to be a bourgeois bore. Of course, Paul eventually has a change of heart and when he randomly spots Jeanne walking down the street one day, he tries to reconcile with her and begins telling her about his personal life as a lonely widower who owns a sleazy hotel, but she tells him that their relationship is over and that she is marrying Tom. While Jeanne eventually confesses to Paul that she loves him, she will not back down regarding her decision to end their relationship, so the exceedingly egotistical American pervert only becomes all the more determined to make her his perennial fuck-buddy, even though he is really only using her as a fleshy tool to get over the untimely self-slaughter of his belated wife. After getting drunk at a café where a tango contest is taking place (hence, the title of the film!), Paul coerces Jeanne into tangoing with him and while they are doing so, she begins to jerk him off, but during mid-hand-job, she has a panic attack and runs away like a scared little girl to her mommy's apartment. Of course, Paul chases Jeanne down and corners her in her mother's apartment. After Paul asks Jeanne her name for the first time and she tells him it, the sexually aggressive American deadbeat decides to lunge at her, thus resulting in romantic tragedy. After assumedly unconsciously deciding she is no longer interested in fucking her sad and pathetic pseudo-father-figure because he is no longer intriguing (after all, she now knows everything she needs to know about him), Jeanne symbolically pulls out her deceased daddy's military service revolver and blows away Brando with a bullet to the belly. Of course, like most desperate and scornful women looking for a rather shameless way to get out of legal trouble relating to a lover who has fallen out of favor, Jeanne cravenly decides that she will tell the police that Paul tried to rape her and that she was only defending herself. Indeed, in the end, Paul ironically went "right up into the ass of death."

After watching Last Tango in Paris, it is easy to see why Maria Schneider rapidly degenerated into an emotional trainwreck of a junky with no sex appeal who ruined her chance of being in countless great films, including surrealist maestro Luis Buñuel's masterful swansong That Obscure Object of Desire (1977). Indeed, among other things, she destroyed Jacques Rivette's Merry-Go-Round (1981) and even quit the production before it was actually finished, thus forcing the director to hire a stand-in to play her role. While in Rivette's film Schneider clearly looks like 'damaged goods' with an intolerably bitchy demeanor, she seems quite fresh and virginal in Last Tango in Paris, thus hinting that the actress may have been somewhat right when she proclaimed the film ruined her life, even if she was already engaged in hard drug use and sexual debauchery at the time. Shortly after she died from cancer on 3 February 2011 at age 58, Bernardo Bertolucci publicly stated regarding Schneider, "Her death came too soon, before I could hold her again tenderly, and tell her that I felt connected to her as on the first day, and for once, to ask her to forgive me," and even went so far as to admit, “Maria accused me of having robbed her of her youth and only today am I wondering whether there wasn’t some truth to that.” Of course, as his similar dubious use of young actors like American twink Michael Pitt (Boardwalk Empire, Funny Games), sensual French Jewess Eva Green (Kingdom of Heaven, Casino Royale), and French avant-garde auteur Philippe Garrel’s son Louis Garrel (whose godfather is Last Tango star Jean-Pierre Léaud) in The Dreamers (2003) demonstrates, Bertolucci has only grown more eager with age to use youthful actors as masturbatory tools for his own overtly fetishistic fantasies. Indeed, like his epically mundane Marxist epic 1900 (1976) aka Novecento, which features two unclad little boys more or less masturbating, Last Tango in Paris features naked children, including a completely pointless scene where a little boy proudly defecates in Schneider’s company. Indeed, as much as I think Sigmund Freud was an anti-Aryan quack whose main objective with his studies was subverting the morality of the Occident, it would certainly be interesting to see what he would have to say about Bertolucci’s films, especially Last Tango in Paris, which features incest, obsessive anal fixations, scatology (ranging from defecating little boys to buttery yet brutal bum-fucking), eccentric Electra complexes, and rape fantasies, among countless other things that make it quite clear that the director would have probably been put into a gulag if his lifelong dream of Italy degenerating into a communist hellhole had actually been realized. When Ingmar Bergman stated of the film that it “was really about homosexuals, and only in those terms did the film make sense and become interesting,” Bertolucci replied by stating, “I accept all interpretations of my films. The only reality is before the camera. Each film I make is kind of a return to poetry for me, or at least an attempt to create a poem.” Personally, I interpreted the film as celluloid sexual sadism and exceedingly enthusiastic degeneracy disguised as cinematic poetry, but then again, that is arguably the film’s greatest appeal as a piece of unintentionally absurd con-artistry directed by Italy’s foremost commie conman filmmaker.

LAST TANGO IN PARIS

-Ty E

VERLIERER

Bernd Schadewald (1987)

If Great Britain has been invaded by every dark shade of untermensch from the former colonies and America has been hit the hardest by so-called Hispanics from south of the border, post-WWII Germany has been most accursed with Islamic aliens (or what liberals call 'guest workers') from Turkey. As a German friend once told me, thank Odin that the Fatherland lost their handful of colonies after losing the First World War as the land of the Teutons is not nearly as racially and culturally chaotic as France and the UK, but still they have their fair share of hostile brown problems. Of course, a number of Teutonic filmmakers, especially those of German New Cinema, have touched on the immigrant problem in the past, including Rainer Werner Fassbinder with Katzelmacher (1969) aka Cock Artist and Angst essen Seele auf (1974) aka Ali: Fear Eats the Soul and Helma Sanders-Brahms with Shirins Hochzeit (1976) aka Shirin's Wedding, among countless others. Additionally, foreign directors have touched on the problems of Turk-on-Teuton relations as well, with Turkish queer auteur Kutlug Ataman's Fassbinder-esque work Lola and Billy the Kid (1999) aka Lola + Bilidikid showing the tragedy that results when Turks trannies and hustlers, sodomite skinheads, and cocksucker Counts interact in the multicultural metropolis of Berlin. Of curious, less pretentious and melodramatic films have been made centering around malignant multiculturalism and culture clashes in Deutschland, with the made-for-television cult gang flick Verlierer (1987) aka Losers directed by TV-auteur Bernd Schadewald (Angst, Schicksalsspiel) being one of the most 'accessible,' if not outmoded, works on this rather revolting yet always provocative subject. A proletarian flick made about the lumpenproletariat for the lumpenproletariat, Verlierer depicts two gangs—one German and one Turkish—as they nihilistically battle over territory in the post-industrial Ruhr region located in North Rhine-Westphalia, Germany. Starring Ralf Richter (who, aside from appearing as a degenerate sailor in Wolfgang Peterson's Das Boot (1981), is the brother of famed musician FM Einheit) and singer Campino of the kraut punk group Die Toten Hosen and who more recently starred in Wim Wenders' Palermo Shooting (2008), as well as guest appearances and/or music from thrash/metal/punk groups like Kreator, Sodom, Violent Force, and Killing Joke, Verlierer was practically destined to become a kraut cult flick. A sort of quasi-realist punk/metal rip-off of The Warriors (1979) directed by Walter Hill that was produced for the West German public television channel ZDF, Verlierer is essentially the working-class equivalent to Decoder (1984), which not coincidentally starred lead Ralf Richter's brother FM Einheit, as an ultimately trashy yet tragic celluloid work depicting how German culture has drastically degenerated with the culture-distorting curse of globalization and the American occupation of the Fatherland after the Second World War.

VERLIERER

At the beginning of Verlierer, the viewer is introduced to the rival yet similarly dressed Ruhr-based street gangs—the Rats (which is comprised of Turks) and the Ghetto Sharks (which are mainly comprised of indigenous Aryans of the mostly swarthy sort)—who have decided to call a truce for the time being, though any gang member caught in enemy territory is treated with a beating and loses their fancy leather gang vest. Meanwhile, a young teenager named Mücke aka Gnat (Mario Irrek), who resembles the young anti-hero of Peter Kern's pedo-themed coming-of-age flick Street Kid (1992) aka Gossenkind, is tired of getting beaten by his beefy and boorish dipsomaniac father, so he runs away from home to join the Sharks gang, which his big bad brother Richy (Ralf Richter) is the infamous Führer of. On his way to meet up with his bro, Mücke helps a young Turk teen named Erdal (Yüksel Biciçi) escape from being brutally mutilated by a gang of lard ass neo-nazis with Wesley Snipes-esque flattops, thus siring a slightly homoerotic would-be-Shakespearean subplot between the two boys. Unfortunately for Mücke, his new Turk friend is a proud member of the Rats, so naturally their friendship will be tested in a most vile way. When little man Mücke finally meets up with his big bro Richy, his brother firmly refuses to let him join the gang and kicks him out of his gang headquarters (an abandoned building riddled with rumble, graffiti, and beer cans), as he wants a better future for his little bro. Feeling rather dejected, Mücke hits the streets and eventually once again bumps into Erdal, who introduces the German boy to his Turkish family and the two act like a bunch of wild whippersnappers around town to celebrate their new-found sense of solidarity. Meanwhile, the Rats are hassled and called "Kanake" (a word used by Germans that is more or less the equivalent of calling a Turk a "nigger") by Teutonic Turk-bashing cops, but the leader of the gang, Hasan (Aram Basyurt), who looks strikingly Nordic for an Asiatic mongrel, scares the men-in-blue away. Eventually, Mücke and Erdal have a falling out after the latter calls the former's brother Richy an "asshole," thus prematurely ending their kameradschaft. To finance their criminal enterprise, Richy, who rather resents the bourgeois and is a self-loathing proletarian of sorts who thankfully never bothered to read Marx, takes his gang of street sharks to a fancy yuppie bar where they steal money and alcohol without a single employee/customer putting up a fight. As anyone would guess from the very beginning of the film, Verlierer concludes with a battle between the Rats and Sharks, which results in the death of Richy via stabbing, thus leaving Mücke to suffer the loss of both a friend and brother. Instead of rejecting the gang life, Mücke embraces it by taking the leather gang vest off of his brother's corpse and assumedly continuing the vicious circle of barbaric ignorance the left his big brother dead in the first place.

Essentially, a shockingly well directed and culturally authentic after-school-special featuring the sort of decidedly degenerate music and wardrobes of the unsalvageable disgruntled youth it depicts, Verlierer is ironically a work that will most appeal to the sort of individuals it unflatteringly depicts, hence why this little TV movie has gone on to earn cult status in Germany as a sort of 1980s punk/metal equivalent to Rudolf Thome's Red Sun (1970) aka Rote Sonne and Klaus Lemke's Rocker (1972). Indeed, Verlierer also makes for mandatory viewing for fans of Eckhart Schmidt films like Der Fan (1982) aka Trance, Loft (1985), and Alpha City (1985), as well as Supermarkt (1974) directed by Roland Klick, Christiane F. - Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) directed by Uli Edel, and Strike Back (1981) aka Kalt wie Eis directed by Carl Schenkel, as a work of action-packed celluloid anti-art of the angst-addled sort. Although Verlierer makes a fairly feeble attempt to condemn so-called 'xenophobia' by depicting Turk and Kraut proletarians as people stuck in the same boat who ostensibly nonsensically fight each other instead of the real enemy (aka rich Germans and capitalists), the film fails to offer any serious answer to the problem of multiculturalism. By no means a masterpiece in any sense of the word, Verlierer ultimately makes for a decent way to waste 90 minutes or so, especially if you're like myself and enjoy watching proud degenerates with metalhead mullets destroying not only themselves, but everyone and everything around them. A sad testament to the fact that Deutschland has devolved into a multicultural hellhole where Aryan peasants have fallen to such a meek and patently pathetic degree that they share the same aesthetically disgusting public housing flats as illegal aliens from the third world, Verlierer also unwittingly proves that thrash metal music is so aesthetically worthless and deracinated in character that it appealed to both poor Turks and Teutons alike. Ironically, Verlierer director Bernd Schade-wald would go on promote the same subculture by directing a music video for the kraut punk band Die Toten Hosen, henceforth demonstrating how kaput German kultur is presently.

-Ty E

SALVATION!: HAVE YOU SAID YOUR PRAYERS TODAY?
SALVATION!: HAVE YOU SAID YOUR PRAYERS TODAY?

Beth B (1987)

Before becoming the high-profile and wealthy silver-screen stud he is today, Danish-American actor Viggo Mortensen starred in a number of surprisingly unflattering, albeit sometimes rather interesting and idiosyncratic, roles, including in the Charles Band produced penitentiary-based horror flick Prison (1988) directed by a then-unknown Renny Harlin and the rather impotent TCM sequel Leatherface: The Texas Chainsaw Massacre III (1990) directed by horror hack Jeff Burr, but probably his most peculiar (and, incidentally, first starring) role was as a superlatively pissed off proletarian prick in the sacrilegious celluloid satire of televangelism, Salvation! (1987) aka Salvation!: Have You Said Your Prayers Today? Directed by a seemingly bitchy broad with the strategically banal and pretentious name “Beth B.,” who was originally associated with the so-called “no wave” scene with other artless auteur filmmakers like Amos Poe and Jim Jarmusch and went on to co-found (with her husband Scott B. and cinematic sped Nick Zedd) the aesthetically repugnant “Cinema of Transgression” movement, Salvation! is indubitably the feisty female filmmaker’s greatest (non)success as a filmmaker, which I guess does not say much when considering the rest of her largely disposable gritty celluloid works and the pastiche leftist politics that plague them, but I would be lying if I did not admit I had fun watching a rather undignified yet ballsy blue collar Viggo Mortensen going on anti-gay and anti-Christian rants and trying to swindle a tyrannical turd of a televangelist out of his suavely swindled donation money. Featuring a soundtrack that is largely better than the film itself, including songs by New Order (before they were a gay pop group) and Cabaret Voltaire, Salvation! is a lovingly lowbrow celluloid artifact directed by a woman who probably finally realized that making pointless and plot-less avant-tard works does not pay the bills, thus she attempted to bring her pseudo-subversive Weltanschauung and angst-ridden auteur aesthetic to the mainstream with rather mixed results. Shot on 35mm film with a small but reasonable budget of $800,000, Salvation! is proof that a little bit of money can go a long way, even for hack experimental female filmmakers of the hysterically heretical sort. Made in the wake of the easy-to-satire Jim Bakker and Jimmy Swaggart scandals, Salvation! was apparently heavily inspired by Beth B.’s ironic hipster attendance of what she later described as a “evangelist super-conference” at the Rev. Jerry Fallwell’s headquarters in Lynchburg, Virginia, thus the film does have a certain sardonic authenticity to it that makes one get the sense that the director has some vague inkling of “respect” for the rabid reverend she so blatantly and blasphemously portrays in a tastelessly cheap cinematic work that has much in common aesthetically with the televangelist shows it so ludicrously lampoons.

Jerome Stample (Viggo Mortensen) is one pissed off proletarian and he certainly has a number of reasons to be as his mentally perturbed and mystically minded wife Rhonda (punk diva Exene Cervenka of the LA punk band X, who married Mortensen in 1987 after the two met on the set) donates half of his paycheck to a Christian carny Televangelist named Reverend Edward Randall (Stephen McHattie). On top of that, bourgeois preppie brats in expensive sports cars hassle him, calling Jerome “white trash” and further pushing him over the edge. After Jerome has the supreme dishonor of being fired from his less than prestigious shipyard job, he comes up with a malicious scheme to blackmail the good Reverend Randall, who is a closet porn addict and alcoholic, by using his sexy sister-in-law to seduce the servant of god and entrap him in a saucy sex scandal. A man who is rather perturbed by the fact that “New York City is the least Christian City in the United States” and that Catholics (“these people who are SO CLOSE to being saved...”), Jews (aka “those bankers”), and atheists (“worshippers of the devil”) are the majority in the big rotten multicultural apple, Rev. Randall seems to have even more visceral hatred in his holy soul than Jerome, but things change when a naughty nympho named Lenore (played by marginal musician/actor Dominique Davalos) randomly shows up to the miracle man’s house to relieve him of his metaphysical chastity belt and steaming sexual repression via her rather lecherous and sadomasochistic ways. Of course, lascivious Lenore, who is Jerome’s sassy sister-in-law, has been recruited by the ruthless redneck schemer, who faithfully believes that the positively divine primetime man is “jacking-off your cash, my cash, everybody’s cash so he can dress like a faggot,” thus feeling his blackmail plot is quite morally pristine as some sort of loony left-wing redneck Robin Hood. Naturally, Rev. Randall is no fag and especially no friend of fags, but he does learn that he is into lurid S&M after exploring large legs Lenore’s sin-ridden flesh. The Reverend even tries to rape Lenore, which sends hysterical hillbilly Jerome, who can’t keep his hands off his wifey’s little sis, off the deep end, inspiring him to attempt to murder the horny holy man while rattling off a number of pseudo-Nietzschean philistine diatribes. Like Lenore, gentleman Jerome gets a hick kick out of physically ravaging the Rev, albeit in a less sexual manner, but it is the brazen blue-collar hero’s TV-addicted wife Rhonda who ultimately impresses the religious man. After fleeing from his less than humble abode to escape the flagrant and fetishistic physical abuse of Jerome and his sister-in-law Lenore, Rev Randall hitches a ride with Rhonda by happenstance, whose militant “fight fire with fire” philosophy to Christianity and dealing with its enemies rather impresses the televangelist. Radical Jesus fan Rhonda ultimately talks the Rev into allowing her to be a co-host on his show and the rest is history. Introducing a rather lame form of Christian heavy metal with Rhonda as the fierce frontman, money literally begins to fall from the sky for the Christ-rocker and Reverend Randall, but perennial proletarian loser Jerome gets the short end of the stick via divorce by his unhinged (and now filthy rich) wife in the process.

SALVATION!: HAVE YOU SAID YOUR PRAYERS TODAY?

Beginning in a quasi-politically incorrect and thematically and aesthetically heretical manner, Salvation!—a cinematic work that is essentially the (unsurprisingly) less known East Coast equivalent to Alex Cox's immaculate punk cult masterpiece Repo Man (1984)—unfortunately devolves quickly into a tedious piece of both intentional and unintentional celluloid anarchism that feels like it will never end until it does end and the viewer is rather shocked by what went wrong in what could have been blasphemous celluloid bliss. Indeed, being someone who previously made experimental short films and a couple feature-length works with her husband, Beth B. was probably ill-equipped to create a normal, quasi-mainstream movie and it certainly shows in Salvation!—a film that seems to have fallen from celluloid grace. Additionally, the two lead actresses, Exene Cervenka and Dominique Davalos, who resemble Beth B., as well as the director's god awfully repellent ex-collaborator Lydia Lunch, are almost indistinguishable with their chubby cheeks, unkempt ebony hair, and overwhelming homeliness. Judging by what little I know about her, I would have to assume that like Lydia Lynch—a self-professed 'predatory woman'—Beth B. utilized Salvation! as a way to carry out a fantasy of sexually debasing a holy conman via living vicariously through her virtual doppelgänger characters. While Judeo-Christian evangelists have destroyed about ¼ of American brains with their pseudo-mystical minded mumbo jumbo, it pales in comparison to the seemingly irrevocable damage liberals and Trotskyites have done to academia and the entertainment world, not to mention Hollywood's heinous effects on the majority of ADD-addled American minds. Indeed, I cannot help but agree with raunchy redneck Rhonda when she states "Secular humanism...they are the worst type of all" as humanists are just lapsed Christians with a more sophisticated slave-morality or as Nietzsche expressed in On the Genealogy of Morality (1887), human rights were designed for the weak to constrain the strong, thus denying the emancipation of life as opposed to its idealistic agenda to further it as they perversely profess.

Whether its backwards medieval style Amerikkkan pseudo-Christianity or atheistic liberal humanism that is to blame for the cultural vacancy and social degeneration that reigns in the glorious United States of America, one must admit that the Reverend Randall was right when he stated, that the "great American dream has turned into a hideous American nightmare." Of course, the Rev was probably on to something when he also stated, "There are more Jews in New York City than there are in the Holy Land. And there are more banks in New York than there are anywhere else in the world," but people like Beth B. would never admit such a thing as it would go outside her 'subversive' comfort zone. After all, what groups are more safe to spit vehement hatred on than Christian and work-classing whites (but especially a combination of the two), which Salvation! does rather conservatively, but at least Beth B., unlike the heebs in Hollywood and shabbos goy toys in academia, had the decency to demonstrate that rednecks can make for much better iconoclasts and assertive anti-Christ's as portrayed by Viggo Mortensen in a curiously charming performance that the actor probably now regrets. One also must give credit to a woman who directs a film with highly quotable lines like “more cash for gash” and “cash for the hungry gash,” even if she meant it to be a biting spoof of lowbrow misogyny or something. Of course, until the day comes when someone makes a holocaust satire in which neurotic Jewboys like Woody Allen or Larry David go around hysterically kvetching in a concentration camp about the lack of kosher food will a truly biting and bodacious cinematic spoof of the first order be born.

-Ty E

CANICHE
CANICHE

Bigas Luna (1979)

This started out without a word; a review without text. I brainstormed upon how I would handle this film in particular, given that it is otherworldly compared to Bigas Luna's other works. Caniche (1983) is unlike any that I've seen of his, created in the beginning of his career, raw and abrasive beyond question. It also happened to be the first picture of his that I had seen. Caniche ultimately turned me onto Bigas Luna's archives as a whole. From his critically acclaimed stylizing of cuisine and intimacy, Bigas Luna has evolved into quite a contemporary and effeminate force to be reckoned with. From the past comes spilling something blank and furious - Caniche is Àngel Jové's testament to his internal abscess, proving with flying colors that rarely an actor can achieve the impassivity of many of his filmic manifestations. I remember this night very vividly. I swallowed sleeping pills as to ensure an early night. I find myself often being distracted by thoughts of film or perusing various resources on the Internet, always expanding my horizons. With promises of a simple experience, I played Caniche to a weary host and enjoyed the images so much that I fought the effects of the medication until the film was over.

Without even mentioning, I'll admit that Caniche required an additional viewing as what I was feeling and fighting may leave me described as senseless. Caniche, as you might know, translates to poodle, as to, Danny the poodle, who might be described as the main character of this little number and the catalyst for the whirlwind to come. Making up the near entirety of the film is a study of the bored bourgeois. Two siblings live under the financial stability provided from their wealthy and withering Aunt Linda. As per usual, man plays beast more than ever and Bernardo (Àngel Jové) wishes death upon his ailing relative. No reason is permitted other than Linda's scolding of his hypochondria and his likeness to his mother. In choice moments, we are given sight at Àngel Jové's character complaining about his teeth and how they pain him. This probably isn't the first situation of unnecessary medical treatment he has found himself in. The rival sister, Eloisa, flaunts and flirts about the small cast of characters and lands a sordid rendezvous with a local veterinarian whose big plans to erect a dog park also lends to the finale of sexual desolation and debauchery. What turns the mixture black is Bigas Luna's incorporation of the ever-foreign zoophilia. This is displayed in many scenes but the most introductory and spoiler-free can be summarized with Eloisa smearing honey on her cunt and beckoning Danny to lick it off, sending Bernardo into a furor. Mutual care taking of Danny is then applied vigorously with Bernardo's jealousy. Asking simple things of Bernardo such as to remove a flea, we witness, clenched teeth and all, excessive force with a set of tweezers as to ensure suffering on Danny's part.

I derived pleasure from listening to the mongrel howl in pain, I'll admit. Bigas Luna has this way with grafting fits of emotion from his lead characters unto you. While Bernardo was naive and an over-aggressor, he was also human and victim to his own desires, however inhuman they may appear. This also leads to my assertion that Caniche is one of the strangest films in his oeuvre (Still need to see Bilbao) as it's more adept in masculinity than other film following. Bigas Luna is especially known for his preaching of the feminine art form, whereas Caniche is a materialization of his most debased and primal of taboos. Despite being such a minimalistic film, Caniche has much subtext of the pathology of deviance. While it might not give scientific reasoning behind the nature of these siblings' actions, it explores this dark crevice and gives it a fitting tribute while not coming off as a hyperbole. For an example that doesn't strafe into spoiler territory, it is implied that the meat these silver spoon-raised brother/sister pair eat is the flesh of minced puppies. In a scene expressing the sorrows of every activist, Eloisa is shown adopting a handful of barely month old puppies and quick-cuts to a chopping block. Subtlety may be utilized but it is hardly compulsory. Caniche is a twisted gem, this is for certain. It serves as a collection of deviations so awry that it is hard to swallow and certainly harder to see it for what it really is - poetic. If your temperament can permit constant bickering between siblings then Caniche might be right up your alley. Don't expect too much aesthetic, however. Early on in his career, Bigas Luna seemed to favor style and design as opposed to polished imagery. This is certainly a diamond in the rough and wholly experimental in contrast with his more refined, modern works of art.

-mAQ

ANGUISH
ANGUISH

Bigas Luna (1987)

In all honesty, Anguish (1987) tastes best as a blind leap of faith so if you have any conviction and wish to see this film with its intended effect, stop reading now. For those who have either seen it or just don't give a damn, allow me to divulge many of the visible secrets to Bigas Luna's only straight-laced horror film. Anguish is essentially a Spanish envisioning of classic Italian horror tropes, namely Stage Fright and Demons. Opening up with a black screen emblazoned with a warning, the screen threatens the possibility of being victim to subliminal messages or induced hypnosis. We then meet "the Mommy", Alice Pressman (Zelda Rubinstein), as she scolds her large son, John (played by Michael Lerner), for accidentally releasing a bird to flutter about the house. After the two stumble after and catch the flying rodent, Alice then puts on a spiral record and hypnotizes her son to kill and fetch eyeballs from victims. You see, poor John is far gone being myopic and his mother has hopes that stealing the eyes of the city will gift her son with new sight and vengeful sight. This is where the cord is pulled, so to speak. Anguish reveals its true(?) intentions by retreating the camera past the screen and revealing that these instances are a popular horror movie known as The Mommy being watched by a live audience; an audience that is equally disgusted of John's retina retribution.

I cannot deny the fact that cinema has largely impacted who I am today. Each and every viewing shapes new morality out of me and leaves impressions spanning from fetishes to general outlook. So it comes as no surprise that as I watch out of intrigue, I can understand, even embrace, Patti's nauseousness due to the horrors and blood-letting of the film. During the radical hypnosis spells that The Mommy volleys at the screen, Patti's hands clench her side and she surveys the auditorium begging for an exit. It is at this point when she notices she is not the only one reeling from the effects of the reel. Here is where Bigas Luna introduces a favorite among his career, Ángel Jové, reprising since Caniche and Bilbao. The surprise spills in rather unexpectedly. You watch the screen, playing sick voyeur to Patti's breakdown. It's easy to pass off as a case of paranoia inflated by fictitious slaughter. Once a madman within the theater begins systematically murdering the theater employees and guests to mimic the on-screen shenanigans, however, well, that's when fears are realized and Anguish dives into its own wonderful excess. The intricate rhythm of Anguish is reflected nicely with the gorgeous poster art. In a retro backdrop using Zelda Rubinstein as an instrument of fear, "The eyes of the city are mine!" scowls the poster. This, of course, is but a glimpse at the brilliance of Bigas Luna, a director who manhandles and breathes life into genres as often dull and formulaic as romance and horror - which also appear at the opposite ends of each other in the genre spectrum.

Inherently, Anguish is a film expressing the woes and sorrows of every mother whose children peep at objectionable material in the cinema. Anguish is worry incarnate. The very topic of sensitization is toppled as Anguish features not one, but several swayed by the effects of cinema and they are not all psychopathic. What Patti begins to succumb to may very well be the early symptoms of the sickness that has spread to Àngel Jové's killer character. As the concessionist exclaims right before she meets her fate, "Boy, you must know this picture by heart!", a seed is planted that which, upon further musing, sprouts a sapling of an idea. It is ultimately an idea that flourishes into what one can call fanaticism. Could someone like you or I be driven into madness as easily as some of the more susceptible viewers? I won't argue the case against fiction but Anguish hits all the right notes as it spirals into some bizarre, radical new demonstration of old concepts. The terror of Patti and her once-daft friend Linda turns tangible and I must comment on Àngel Jové's excellent performance, Comparing and contrasting his roles in Caniche and Anguish, I must express admiration for his daunting performances, as simple as they seem. Both characters express a degree of psychopathy but Anguish removes the compassion and replaces it with a terrible mother complex that begs to question his upbringing. Anguish cuts a swath right through the definition of meta and sutures the wound with tight-knit execution and minimalism within minimalism. For an even sweeter treat, stay through the credits and gasp when you realize that the "reality" is victim to another critical audience, who may or may not be stars in their own right.

-mAQ

THE AGES OF LULU
THE AGES OF LULU

Bigas Luna (1990)

Appointing myself with the task of seeking out select films from the library of Bigas Luna, I stumbled upon The Ages of Lulu, my third acquaintance with the Spanish auteur, the first being Caniche with Jamon Jamon following. Based off of a best-selling erotic novel of the same name, the film chronicles the sexual provocation within our anchor, Lulu. The film starts off rather innocent enough when Lulu eyes her brother's best friend, Pablo, and proceeds to initiate an erotic congregation that turns into blissful marriage but eventually boils into, hands down, one of the strangest and most terrifying finales to be found in the genre of romance. What turns Bigas Luna on to me further is this strange connection I feel with each film of his I view. It resembles a vivid union of his traditional aesthetic - food and sex. Call it soothing familiarity if you will. Tying together his films beyond passion and pain are similarities that outstretch through the many alleys of his oeuvre. In the similarly tragic pieces of love, Jamon Jamon and The Ages of Lulu, pigs (as well as other forms of cattle) are featured exclusively as important pieces toward development. For Penelope Cruz in Jamon Jamon, a double entendre is played with the title, Jamon translating to ham and the scene in which Javier Bardem refers to Cruz's breasts tasting that of ham and in The Ages of Lulu, a plush pig is squeezed and adored unconditionally. Consider it the last breath of chastity the girl will have.

The Ages of Lulu is a marvel in regards that, being adapted from written form, becomes a film as well as a reference guide on what not to do in a sense, specifically in the case of unleashing your wildest desires and lusts. That is really the horror of it all, the whirlpool from which to escape requires an unbelievable amount of self-control. If the sequential downward spiral in film is where your heart lies than prepare to meet your muse. The Ages of Lulu is a very temperamental film, much akin to the mood swings that accompany menstruation. Upon viewing the film, my voyage through the ripples of transgressive sexuality was smooth-sailing to say the least. I figured that this film wouldn't deserve a word on it, not for being of substandard quality but for the absence of subversive material to cover. Once The Ages of Lulu hit the hour mark though, I spotted a terrifying trend to become introduced and I had no choice but to hold tight and witness some of the more depraved happenings to a sweet girl since visualized in Jack Ketchum's The Girl Next Door. The only difference is that in this case, consent was flagged more often than not, unless of course we count the fact that the very soul of Lulu was being raped throughout the motion picture. A fact of making love to a committed partner involves something known as "body mapping" in which you trace over your lovers body with the utmost importance of sensuality as to connect the dots of what makes their body tick. Bigas Luna's exceptional storytelling has a similar effect on our sweet Lulu, oh so susceptible to fleshy desires and by films end, we're both outraged, enraged, yet, secure in the comfort of experiencing and knowing her own pleasures. This is gratifying filmmaking at its finest. No doubt magnified by Luna's specialty in design.

The playfulness of The Ages of Lulu is part of what makes the conclusion so jarring, a smack to the face, really. The film opens on a note of such maternal beauty that women everywhere would coo and claw softly at the television screen with idle static tickling their fingertips. This shot in particular being an infant placed on a white table. This shot ranges from the sterility of the blinding whites of the room to the almost-obscene nature of the close-up to the infant's genitalia, this child being Lulu, ergo, Vagina. I really only call obscene for my sake cause as I was sitting there the very presence of this made me somewhat uncomfortable, not to mention the fact that the camera looms there for a good portion of time before a figure powders the fertile crescent. This vaporizes pretty quickly once it becomes apparent that moreover The Ages of Lulu is the tale of Lulu's cunt, rather than her person. Featured alongside the fantastic and lovely Francesca Neri is Javier Bardem in one of his first feature film performances as a twisted gay hustler. The inclusion of his character is rather nice considering I backtracked from Jamon Jamon (in which he is a starring character) to The Ages of Lulu (only given a sliver of screen-time but blessed with a weighty character). Another reiteration of Bigas Luna's style is his dwelling on the fault of man and his open-endedness with blame. By near every film's end I'm left attempting to trace back a fault of some kind because I desperately want to blame a given character but again, I'm stumped.

It seems that every film I view on the female sexuality turns heads into a tale of becoming a whore, whether it be blamed on accident or on account of a thirst for bodily fluids that is never quenched. The Ages of Lulu is no stranger to this notion as the build up of Lulu's fetishes become ridiculously overbearing on the once sweet girl. From mingling with a transvestite to forcing gay men to consummate with her, there is no end to the depravity that Lulu indulges herself with. It starts off nice as always but once the idea of love becomes expendable Bigas Luna grabs you by the neck and shakes you. No amount of preparation could prepare you for the final twenty minutes. It is such a departure in tone that it borders on a horror film and will leave you scowling at the selfishness of the libido. I will even admit to muttering "what about Ely?" I haven't even mentioned a previous "shocker" in the film when Pablo decides to help a friend out and subjects Lulu's body to one of the more kinky and socially unacceptable taboos out there. The Ages of Lulu is prone to dissenters, this I've noticed. While it's easy to sprinkle salt in wounds I figure that The Ages of Lulu is exempt from such incessant banter as perfect cinema is as rare as it gets. Here, Bigas Luna captures what makes women tick while keeping the mystery enshrouded. An exemplary work of erotic fiction that doesn't seem too far from reality.

-mAQ

TAPEHEADS
TAPEHEADS

Bill Fishman (1988)

Roman catholic wusses John Cusack and Tim Robbins star in the very American 1980's (1988 to be exact) comedy Tapeheads. Tapeheads is a satire of the music video age and the MTV generation (disgusting). The film also promotes the American virtue of "getting rich doing nothing." Ivan and Josh (played by Cusack and Robbins) decide working a secure job as security guards doesn't really satisfy their uneventful existences (they get fired anyways). The only thing to do is to start making lowbrow music videos in hopes of getting rich quick. Tapeheads is a fairly lame film that seems even dated for when it was released. The film features a soundtrack of then already washed up musicians such as the Circle Jerks, Dead Kennedys, Devo, and Fishbone. I couldn't even pinpoint which horrible generic 1980s song was which band. A shame that such innovative bands turned in to generic 1980s MTV rock. Dead Kennedys singer Jello Biafra even makes an appearance in Tapeheads as a FBI stating the ironic, "Remember what we did to Jello Biafro." I guess there is always room for Jello. Tapeheads possibly features the first negro "white face" music group. This role reversal of sorts (black men parodying white music) is a sign of the affirmative action times. Two aging brothers look in disgust at the "white face" group and one comments, "the whole place is full of losers and white trash." The Swanky Modes (the two brothers) are a legendary soul duo that Ivan and Josh have decided to resurrect. Tapeheads is a film where average Joes realize it's time to take advantage of American whorey and go for the big bucks. As Ivan states, "cash flow = personal freedom." He has that much right. FBI Agent Jello Biafra showing ID. The 1980s is possibly the worst era for the art of cinema. The complete and utter lack of culture reflects a generation of cheap hedonism and doing everything for a buck. I watched Tapeheads in hopes that I would find something somewhat nostalgic and entertaining (I don't expect a "masterpiece"). I went out of the film feeling like I was going to vomit up VHS tapes. Having an old white man singing a rap about chicken 'n waffles wasn't funny the first time and certainly didn't catch my fancy in the end credits. In conclusion, John Cusack has the gayest mustache ever.

-Ty E

GANJA /& HESS

Bill Gunn (1973)

While truly black directed cinematic works are marginal, Negro arthouse flicks are all but nonexistent, yet, as far as I know at least, there is only one quasi-Blaxploitation arthouse horror hybrid, Ganja & Hess (1973) aka Black Evil aka Black Vampire aka Blackout: The Moment of Terror aka Blood Couple aka Double Possession aka Vampires of Harlem directed by Bill Gunn (Stop, Personal Problems). Featuring Night of the Living Dead (1968) star Duane Jones in what is undoubtedly the black American actor's second most 'famous' and arguably most important role, Ganja & Hess is a strikingly marvelous metaphysical vampire flick full of semi-psychedelic surrealist imagery, sanguine sex and blood ecstasy, seemingly inane intellectual psychobabble, pseudo-blaxploitation conventions, striking allegorical imagery, Negro Christian spirituals and racially conscious blood mysticism of the jigaboo fascistic sort. A film undoubtedly made for blacks by blacks, Ganja & Hess, not unlike Melvin Van Peebles' Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971), technically cannot be qualified as a blaxploitation work as it did not have a white/Jewish director, white actors (aside from a dubious phantom and druggy hooker of sorts), nor crew member (aside from a token Jewish producer) and was surely not made to capitalize off of the popularity of sassy yet satirical and stereotype-driven spade flicks of that time. In fact, if anything, Ganja & Hess has more in common with European New Wave movements of the same time period than any so-called blaxploitation and aside from a couple moments of unintentional humor, Gunn's flick is far from a sardonic Negro minstrel movie, but more like an Afrocentric avant-garde flick that is more focused on a deep love and kinship for one's blood than an aesthetically repellant work rooted in a bloodthirsty hatred of honkies and other melanin-derived individuals whose ancestral roots all derive from the dark continent. A work featuring hallucinatory hottentot dream sequences of African tribes people, with the primary archetypal centerpiece of these surreal scenes being an obese fertility goddess resembling Aunt Jemima, and arcane (but assumedly fictional) African rituals, Ganja & Hess is surely a Negro völkisch flick that was apparently inspired by the somber arthouse flicks of Swedish auteur Ingmar Bergman, yet totally, esoterically negrofied. Although originally intended as some sort of Blacula (1972) rip-off, Ganja & Hess created a totally different film using seemingly possessed improvisation and whatnot, even abandoning the script Gunn had originally assembled to impress the Jewish producer Chiz Schultz, thus assembling one of the truly authentic pre-hip-hop/pre-crack black America flicks as a decidedly diacritic work that is like Ousmane Sembène's Xala (1975) meets George A. Romero's Martin (1978), except minus a good portion of the Negro negativity that is so typical of most black filmmakers, especially Spike Lee and even Melvin Van Peebles.

GANJA /& HESS

Dr. Hess Green (Duane Jones) is a no bullshit kind of nigga who, as a Christian minister named Reverend Luther Williams (Sam Waymon, who also composed the film's score) who also acts his chauffeur (to help support his family on the side) states, is "an addict" (of intellectual obsession) and "victim" (of whity and his dominant kultur) who is "addicted to blood" (aka racial consciousness and later literal blood) and a brilliant professor of archeology and geology that is overseeing excavation of the ancient (and totally 'invented') Negroid civilization of Myrthia, but things get rather strange when he takes on a high strung, high yellow assistant named George Meda (played by director Bill Gunn). George is a self-described 'neurotic' Negro and a rare suicidal black man (indeed, suicide is much rarer among blacks in comparison to whites) who gives Hess a mess of trouble to take on. While in a seeming hypnotic state, George goes on a number of esoteric Afrocentric rants that seem to horrify and perplex Hess, but the good doctor seems more perturbed by his suicide attempts. First, George seems possessed by the unconscious collective memories of the slave days as he goes to lynch himself, but Herr Hess stops him in his troubled tracks. When Hess attempts to stop George another time, the sophisticated suicidal spade stabs him with an ancient African dagger (subsequently turning Hess into a vampire) and finally succeeds at self-slaughter after taking a sacrificial bath, which involves brushing his teeth in his own dirty bath water. While George is dead, he has left a beautiful black diva of a wife in Amsterdam and she comes to Hess looking for her husband (who she admits is 'troubled'), but instead, starts a rather hot and heavy relationship with the archeologist even though she believes the man has killed her husband in oftentimes sordid scenarios that are the black melodramatic equivalent of a Fassbinder flick.

Discrediting Occidental man's thought in a rather poetic way, George types up the following decidedly unhinged rant before committing suicide, "To the black male children, philosophy is a prison; it disregards the uncustomary things about you. The result of individual thought is applicable only to itself. There is a dreadful need in man to teach. It destroys the pure instinct to learn. The navigator learns from the stars. The stars teach nothing. The sun opens the mind and sheds light on the flowers. The eyes shame the pages of any book. Gesture destroys concept. Involvement mortifies vanity. You are despised of the earth that is as if you were water in the desert. To be adored on this planet is to be a symbol of success. And you must not succeed on any terms. Because life is endless. You are as nameless as a flower. You are the child of Venus and her natural affection is lust. She will touch your belly with her tongue but you must not suffer in it. For love is all there is. And you are canon fodder in its defense." Indeed, such words embody the reasonably positive spirit of Ganja & Hess, a rare pro-black film that focuses more on self-determination than self-hate and irrational hatred for the white man.

After being stabbed with the seemingly demonic vampiric dagger, Hess becomes totally consumed by ancient African civilization that survives in spirit and has taken over the doctor's spirit, thus acting as an allegorical connection between the past and present for people of black blood, but he also develops a thirst for literal human blood and he is slightly less racially conscious when it comes to that, even draining an urban white whore of her precious hemoglobin. Although I cannot positively articulate what sort of spirit and 'mysticism' Ganja & Hess permeates as a man of purely Northern/Western European ancestry, the film undoubtedly has a positively penetrating spiritual essence that more so permeates the viewer's soul over the intellect, which was undoubtedly director Bill Gunn's intent because, while Hess is a brilliant man and a scholar of multiple fields, it is not until he receives something more visceral and metaphysical as a literal black bloodsucker that he becomes a more well rounded and complete individual, even if a couple black (and white) beauties end up dying in the process. As with any people, it is only blood, or 'lifeblood,' that lives on even when civilizations and cultures die and it is only when a particular hemoglobin is diluted or disappears that a people are totally finished and extinguished for eternity. Indubitably, it is through 'blood memory' and not archeological digs that Hess is able to fully understand what cannot be articulated through words nor understood by the mere and severely limited human intellect. Probably most interesting is that Ganja proves to be the most dominant and masterful character in Ganja & Hess thus hinting that the black female is the more dominant of the sexes (which is further supported by the fact that the Myrthian leader that Hess sees is a queen of the archetypical Venus physique and not an ultra masculine king), as she not only takes over the doctor's house, but she ultimately inevitably controls Hess (who is initially in control of the situation) and his subservient butler Archie (Leonard Jackson). Ganja and Hess 'marry' not once, but twice, first in a traditional ceremony and then by ritualistic knifing when the doctor turns the black diva into a bloodlusting queen of the night. Unfortunately, Ganja proceeds to fornicate with other men after her undead transformation and Hess finds relief in his chauffeur Williams' black church despite being a quasi-Satanic entity of sorts, thus spurring a new sort of spiritual awakening in him.

Clearly made with a post-Civil Rights/counter-culture black audience in mind, thus making it virtually impossible viewing for white-girl-addicted and rap-loving modern day blacks, Ganja & Hess offers a dichotomy of the two 'spiritual' extremes and options for the American Negro community: black racial nationalism of the quasi-pagan sort, which is largely based in an 'invented history,' or American-Fried Negro Christianity. Director Bill Gunn seems to leave it up to the viewer to decide what Weltanschauung is preferable, but the Myrthian religion of blood seems to be a more 'evil' yet equally seductive lifestyle as portrayed in Ganja & Hess, hence its dangerous and spiritually schizophrenic effects on the characters of the films. Of course, European and European-Americans can learn something from Ganja & Hess as well because, like the National Socialist thinkers of yesteryear, who argued about whether they should adopt a neo-Pagan Odiniſt religion or maintain their Germanized Chriſtianity (Nazi philoſopher Alfred Roſenberg totally rejected Catholicism), the characters of Gunn's film muſt decide whether their anceſtral roots are more important than transcending ſomething new for the future or maintaining the Chriſtian religion their anceſtors were forced to adopt as ſlaves. A rather idiosyncratic work of metaphysical horror that nonsensically features European art (where African art ſhould be) and black Americans ſpeaking French and Dutch, Ganja & Hess is a film about a conflicted race of people that, whether they like or not, have been 'culturally tainted' by the white man and muſt now decide, as a culturally and racially mongrelized people (director Gunn's character ſymbolically being the lighteſt ſkinned and moſt psychologically conflicted), where their dubious future leads. Even the title of the film, Ganja & Hess, brings up the question of the future of black American, with the hedoniſtic character of Ganja being a reference to marijuana (which is ſmoked throughout the film) and the character of Hess being a reference to a more Weſtern, Chriſtian, and intellectual future. Negro ſpirituality aſide, Ganja & Hess is a film any proſpective black (or even white) filmmaker ſhould ſee if they are ſerious about making truly revolutionary and philoſophical cinematic works with not only a penetrating message, but also a poetic ſtyle, as well as rare proof that truly original black auteur filmmakers can exiſt even if their works have been totally eclipsed by the popularity of artiſtically retarded rap 'music' and beſtial twerk videos.

GANJA /& HESS

-Ty E

FLESH EATER

Bill Hinzman (1988) Bill Hinzman may be the most terrifying and iconic zombie in film history. His performance in George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead never becomes old. Finding out that he had written, directed, produced, edited, and starred in his own film attracted me. I had no idea what to expect from this zombie god turned filmmaker.

Flesh Eater met way past any expectations I had for the film. Bill Hinzman was competent in every aspect of low budget film making. Amateurish yet solid, Flesh Eater fits in with any other zombie film. Its especially fun for those that are fans of Night of the Living Dead. Its reflexive nature bleeds nostalgia throughout. Its homage to an accidental famous killing in NOTLD produces great laughs. Bill Hinzman was also able to convince a young naked girl to let him fondle her for the sake of undead art. I'm sure Flesh Eater holds a special place in his heart. Hinzman even eats the body of his young daughter and in the process she drops her candy bar. What a great father. I don't know if Mr. Hinzman was having a midlife crisis when deciding to create Flesh Eater, but if so, it worked to his psychologically unstable advantage. Although paying many tributes to NOTLD, Flesh Eater is a little more plentiful in the gore category. Shotgun ignited exploding heads proved enough gore for the average desensitized gore fan. The acting and performances are similar to that of a Friday the 13th film, except parts of Flesh Eater are actually funny. Easily some of the funniest killings I've seen in a while. One notable killing involves the much needed flesh eating of a wise ass clown costume Dracula. You find yourself rooting for Bill Hinzman and his crew of infected undead slaves. Flesh Eater ends with a barn burning which was unnecessarily long in duration similar to the trailer burning in John Water's Pink Flamingos. In the aftermath of the fire lie charred bodies similar to those seen in pictures from the bodies in the Dresden bombings during World War 2. Interestingly enough, the prop master was able to make these bodies in one day. Bill Hinzman succeeded in creating a zombie flick acceptable to obsessive fans of the original Night of the Living Dead. Flesh Eater is packed with decent gore, humorous situations, and retrospective entertainment. Flesh Eater is mandatory viewing for anyone that is a fan of the number one zombie.

-Ty E

TOXIC CRUSADERS: THE MOVIE
TOXIC CRUSADERS: THE MOVIE

Bill Hutton (1997)

Toxic Crusaders is the undeniably horrific mess that is the effect of taking a franchise, known for its sex and voracious gore, and trimming it until suitable for kids. Note: This doesn't mean it isn't entertaining. The first three episodes of the show were put together to form this "movie." Toxic Crusaders isn't the only example of an extreme R-rated film being transferred to cartoon. Rambo was also done, and just like this, was heavily altered. The story finds the Toxic Crusader (Note: Avenger sounded too harmful, so they changed it to a more heartfelt term) and his struggles with fighting polluters. The storyline is almost a carbon copy of Captain Planet, and the show was easily identifiable as a cash-in to Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles. You can even tell by the theme song. Instead of Toxie hooking up with a blind bimbo and having sex with her, he gets a "girlfriend" who lost her glasses. Apparently, disabilities are too much of a sensitive topic to be aired on TV. They ripped out all the violence and replaced the latter with his magical mop that sweeps crime away. Toxic Crusaders is inevitably a mash-up of every popular 90's show. The influences of TMNT, Mighty Morphin Power Rangers, Captain Planet, and even Creepy Crawlers shine through its tromatic skin. While being a rip-off of everything kids loved, you cannot help yourself but enjoy, and even laugh at the piece of toxic sludge that it is. Lloyd Kaufman has really expanded the Troma video library by creating a cartoon show. It makes me wonder what Troma wouldn't do. It seems for a while, Kaufman went on a merchandising binge, creating comics, toys, lunch boxes, video games, books, and even stickers. Due to these policies, it's hard to tell which is more well-known, The Avenger or the Crusader. The film has iconic villains and it's own strong charisma. Maybe that is why Troma is always so appealing. Sometimes, I wonder what the world would have been like, had the live-action Toxic Crusaders film been made. Perhaps in Citizen Toxie, we would have seen Toxie take on good Toxie, and destroy him. This is a cheesy blast through nostalgia and is more easily available than the rest of the shows we love.

-Maq

RUN AND KILL

Billy Tang (1993)

Run And Kill is one of the few CAT III films that I can honestly admit to love. What set this film apart from every other one is its complex plot that is equipped with an amazing cast. Kent Chang (Fatty) is an honest hard-working man who has a wife that he loves and a wonderful daughter. He is very punctual to work at all times and is a very friendly guy. One fateful afternoon, he happens to come home early to see his wife screwing the neighborhood shop owner. Emotionally battered, he tells them to take it in the bedroom so no one will see them. This reveals his first weakness - he has a repressed anger problem. In a fit of depression, he wanders around the seedy part of town till he locates a bar called 1997. Outside of this bar, he meets one of his old high school friends who buys him a drink and leaves with a woman immediately. Fatty then sits at the bar taking Tequila shot after shot until he is trashed. A woman then comes to the bar named Fanny after calling her a stupid whore, he begins to express his sorrow for his wife. Fanny then argues with him on why he didn't beat the shit out of her, she offers to help. She then introduces Fatty to a Vietnamese gangster who agrees to kill his wife for 100,000 dollars, he then passes out in the alleyway. Upon waking up, he begins to stumble his way home not realizing this is going to be a long couple of days. He walks into his wonderful apartment to see they are still together. The shopkeeper dresses up and begins to walk out the door until a flying dragon kick seals his fate in this apartment. Five men come in the apartment and start to try and kill his wife, but one of them decides he wants to rape her. Fatty does not remember what he did and is horrified all the same. She bites the would-be rapist and suffers an extremely brutal and creative death. They then begin to fillet the hell out of the shop keeper in the bathtub. From this point on, Fatty gets involved with yet another gang, results in the death of a sociopath's brother, loses his business, and his debt triples. This film is one of the grittier movies I have seen lately. It builds up quite nicely and fits snug in its 90 minute running time. Simon Yam makes a nice surprise as the sociopath and you can really see him shine with a blade slashing 30+ people's throats in a five minute scene. After normally being acquainted with Yam in detective roles, a sadist is welcomed warmly. While it is a CAT III film, it really takes a while for you to feel that. In the opening 20 minutes of the film, we get no blood, no breasts, and no swearing, then it just kind of explodes on screen. It is guaranteed that you will feel bad for Fatty's character. This film is the bastard lovechild of a Bukowski and Mamet script. Run And Kill is the story of an ordinary (albeit retarded) man caught in a ridiculous situation and should be highly regarded in the underground film circle. This film is often misogynistic and so uncompromising that if you watch the ending, you will be sure to be offended. This film takes no prisoners and is easily the best CAT III film I have seen. Highly Recommended.

RUN AND KILL

-mAQ

THRILLER - A CRUEL PICTURE

Bo Arne Vibenius (1973)

Only such a cultured nation such as Sweden could produce an exploitation of such high caliber as Thriller - A Cruel Picture. A film that features eye gouging, hardcore sex, and heroin addiction has never been so splendid. The lovely Christina Lindberg was the perfect woman to cast as the one-eyed woman seeking revenge against a sadistic pimp, a lesbian, and a handful of other social degenerates. Lindberg plays a young woman that was molested as a child which has turned her into a mute. When she becomes a young adult, she is abducted by a suave sicko who turns her into a drug addicted sex slave for him to prostitute out money.

Excessively annoying and played out hack Quentin Tarantino stole a few elements of Thriller - A Cruel Picture for his over stylized trash Kill Bill films. Despite featuring pornography and extremely offensive material, Thriller - A Cruel Picture has more artistic integrity than all of Tarantino's films combined. Tarantino may not know how to make an original film, but every once in a while he knows the right film to steal from. Quentin Tarantino even had enough respect for Thriller - A Cruel Picture that he allowed director Bo Arne Vibenius to have a cameo in Kill Bill as a food vendor. Director Bo Arne Vibenius made the right choice when he decided to make his lead character a mute. Christina Lindberg has enough power in her beauty and glance to keep the viewer focused on the screen. This raped and abused woman has every right to torture and kill her victimizers. Instead of entering a state of comatose, this stunning one eye trains to kill and she kills well. I especially liked how scenes of violent revenge featured in Thriller - A Cruel Picture are in slow-motion. One has to savor One Eye's art of killing.

Apparently director Bo Arne Venius used a real cadaver for the scene in which Lindberg's character has her eye gouged out. This offensive scene only further confirms Thriller - A Cruel Picture as one of the best, if not the best, rape/revenge exploitation films. The reality is that most exploitation films are pure garbage with little to no redeeming quality. As a whole, Thriller - A Cruel Picture is a masterpiece of the unofficial genre. The film is one of the neglected (for obvious reasons) treasures of cinema history.

-Ty E

BREAKING POINT - PORNOGRAFISK THRILLER
BREAKING POINT - PORNOGRAFISK THRILLER

Bo Arne Vibenius (1975)

While American heteros had Cecil Howard (Neon Nights, Snake Eyes) and Jonas Middleton (Illusions of a Lady, Through the Looking Glass) and the American homos had Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool) and Jack Deveau (Left-Handed, Drive), the Swedes had Bo Arne Vibenius who, after working as an assistant director on Ingmar Bergman's experimental arthouse masterpiece Persona (1966) and making his directing debut with the family fantasy film (!) Hur Marie träffade Fredrik (1969) aka How Marie Met Fredrik, directed two strangely atmospheric hardcore artsploitation flicks—Thriller: A Cruel Picture (1973) aka Thriller - en grym film and Breaking Point - Pornografisk thriller (1975)—before giving up feature filmmaking altogether. While Thriller: A Cruel Picture has gained some popularity in recent years due to the fact that it was a major influence on Quentin Tarantino's two volume fanboy mix-tape Kill Bill (2003–2004), Breaking Point, which is easily one of the most sardonically politically incorrect porno films I have ever seen, is somewhat more obscure, even though arguably a superior work in pretty much every way. Featuring a cinematographer-turned-porn star who opted for taking the dubious pseudonym 'Anton Rothschild'—a name derived from the Rothschilds, the most evil Jewish banking family in all of human history that is responsible for funding both sides of virtually every single war over the past couple centuries—in the lead role as a seemingly schizophrenic office nerd and toy train fetishist with what also seems to be an acute case of asperger syndrome who sees it as his god-given right to rape and, in some cases, kill beautiful young women, Breaking Point was certainly not produced by one of the Semitic smut-peddlers who have a monopoly on such work in the United States. Aside from the pseudonym 'Rothschild' adopted by lead actor Andreas Bellis (who, despite having only starred in one other film in a non-pornographic role, helmed the camera for over 40 different films between 1968 and the 2000s, including Thriller: A Cruel Picture), the stuntman of the film adopted the name 'Turbo Man', the Special Effects guy took the glorious name 'Urban Hitler', the Producer (aka director Bo Arne Vibenius) stole the name Stan Kowalski (the name of the fictional American Polack rapist from Tennessee Williams' play A Streetcar Named Desire (1947)), and the Unit Manager took the name 'Oscar Wilde', among various other charming pennames. While advertised as a 'pornographic thriller,' Breaking Point is also a scathing satire that maliciously mocks Swedish liberal democracy, the quackery of modern psychiatry (the antihero is inspired to serial rape after learning from a psychiatrist named 'Sigmund' that 89% of women have rape fantasies), urban decay, trendy left-wing terrorism of the 1970s, and government bureaucracy, as well as various other forms of contemporary post-WWII degeneracy. Of course, the film is certainly symptomatic of such degeneracy, but at least it is honest in that regard.

Shot from the rather unreliable perspective of the renegade rapist/social retard, Breaking Point is a sometimes oneiric and ominous odyssey of oddball orgasms and literal lunatic libertinism in a rare film—be it pornographic or otherwise—where a balding bourgeois dork becomes a sexually savage action antihero of the master fugitive kind.

Bob Bellings (Greek-born cinematographer Andreas Bellis aka ‘Anton Rothschild’) is a nerdy middle-age officer clerk with a rather unimpressive appearance who has a reasonably easy time leading a second life as a loner that no one would ever suspect was a sex killer. Indeed, during the beginning of Breaking Point, Bob stalks, brutally rapes, and kills a chic and sophisticated blonde stranger named Suzanne Andersson by smashing in her skull with a glass ashtray. While at work, Bob calls a sexually suggestive secretary at his work a “bitch” under his breath, as he loathes ladies, especially the highly attractive sort that would most likely reject his romantic advances. While watching the news at work, Bob hears a cop complain regarding Suzanne Andersson’s unsolved murder, with the man in blue remarking, “A rape and murder committed by an authorized citizen,” as if rape and murder is ok if authorized by the government. After the cop does his silly spiel, a quack psychiatrist with the rather fitting name Sigmund comes on the news and hilariously states, “One thing to keep in mind when dealing with deviants like this is never to offer any resistance. Now, a man like this wants you to resist, so our advice is to keep calm and let him do whatever he wants to. Even if worst comes to worst, you’ll only get raped. And current statistics indicate that 89% of the respondents—the women who answered the surveyed—have one time or another in their lives have actually wanted to be raped.” After hearing Sigmund’s advice, Bob comes to the realization that he no longer has to kill his victims, but that he simply just needs to demand that they drop their clothes and allow him to bugger them. After a lonely night playing with his beloved toy train set and reading a magazine about said toy train sets, Bob goes to work and while on a ‘trip to the bank,’ he tries out Sigmund’s theory. Indeed, Bob spots a young chick (Irena Billing) at the local subway and stalks all the way back to her home in the woods in what seems like a dreamlike fairy tale scenario. Like a seasoned pro, Bob simply follows the girl into her house, demands that she take her clothes off (which she does without hesitation), has her fellatio him, and then the two proceed to make passionate love. After ejaculating on the young girl’s face and receiving a loving handjob, Bob leaves the lecherous lady’s home, smirks at the viewer in a knowing fashion, and walks away with a fiendish swagger. While at work watching the news, Bob learns that the Swedish government is now giving out free guns via the ‘citizen’s insurance plan’ (with men receiving revolvers and women pistols). Naturally, Bob decides to take advantage of such generous government services.

After having an absurd dream about flicking a fly off his erect pecker with a rubber band, Bob forces another unwitting chick to strip and bend over, but she stabs him with scissors in rather painful moment of coitus interruptus. Needless to say, Bob chases her down in what ultimately evolves into a full-on car chase that results in the rape victim crashing into a house and dying after her car explodes. When Bob goes to pick up his government-ordained revolver, as well as some other more power weapons, a seemingly deranged gun salesman, who has a vocal affinity for vigilante justice, gives the rapist some special bullets, including 'fragmentation ammo' (which explodes upon entering a person's body) and nuclear bullets (!), which are only authorized for use by the army. For whatever reason, Bob picks up a spunky prepubescent girl, drives her around the country in his car, and gives her some candy. When the girl asks Bob to bring her home, he does, but when the little lady asks him, "shall we meet again?" he gives a firm "no," thus demonstrating his annoyance regarding the little insignificant bit of power the small child held over him. After picking up a hot hitchhiker, Bob gets rather lucky as his strange yet salacious passenger soon asks him, "wanna fuck me?" and proceeds to drop her clothes and spread her legs. Of course, Bob gets his buggery on but not before the hitchhiker asks, "Wanna see me fuck the gear stick?" which she does like a true champ. While on another ostensible 'trip to the bank' while at work, Bob is robbed by a hippie thug at knifepoint and is later kidnapped by a trio of swarthy far-left terrorists. After robbing him, one of the terrorists attempts to kill Bob execution, but he has no bullets in his gun, thus giving the rapist enough time to mercilessly gun down all three of the rock star terrorists with his atomic bullets. Not long after, a police helicopter shows up, which Bob blows up with an assault rifle and then swiftly carjacks a sports car from a young and dumb counter-culture type. That night, Bob has a pornographic nightmare in a surreal montage that recaps the rapist's sex and violence escapades thus far, including a scene where he shoves his trusty pistol up a young nymph's naughty bits. In a nice little twist at the very end of Breaking Point, Bob goes to an airport and is called to the information desk where he is reunited with his wife and young daughter. When his wife asks him what he has been up to, Bob ironically replies, "You know nothing ever happens in this shit town," thus hinting that all the rape and murder he was involved with was merely a product of his discernibly damaged mind.

BREAKING POINT - PORNOGRAFISK THRILLER

In one especially telling scene in Breaking Point, antihero Bob listens to a radio host as he discusses the theories of a fellow named 'Burroughs' (undoubtedly, a nod to William S. Burroughs), stating, "The instance of schizophrenia seems to vary in different types of societies. Urban societies show the higher instances," thus underscoring the film's critique of modernism. More of a sardonic psychosexual/psychodramatic thriller of the genre-distorting sort than a simple 'pornographic thriller,' Breaking Point ultimately makes just as big of a mockery of the viewer as it does of the film/porn conventions it so playfully, if not perniciously, breaks. Due to its meager helping of sex scenes, not to mention its less than handsome lead, I think it is safe to say that this bizarre blue movie could not have aroused too many people when it was originally released and it certainly makes for a sorry masturbation aid for contemporary viewers, but of course, most people on the hunt for such rare works of idiosyncratic filmic filth are probably not just looking for a quick and easy way to spill some seeds. Combining elements from the thriller, horror, fantasy, and action genres with a small dose of surrealism in a porn flick with a quasi-arthouse essence, Breaking Point is certainly a cream of the crop work when it comes to vintage blue movies, but then again, one should expect more from a pornographer who learned his craft from Ingmar Bergman (indeed, aside from working as an assistant director on Persona, auteur Bo Arne Vibenius also worked as a 'unit director' on Hour of the Wolf (1968)). Made in a super liberalized and emasculated country where a couple years back a man attempted to breast feed his baby, Breaking Point luckily does not shy away from displaying a rather distinct form of post-Freudian/post-feminist misogyny that satires the very essence of the decidedly socially degenerate liberal democracy that is Sweden. The perfect pornographic antidote to the anti-male/anti-wasp sentiments of American Psycho (2000), which was directed/co-written by feminist Mary Harron (who also directed the putrid piece of crypto-sapphic celluloid trash I Shot Andy Warhol) and co-penned by lily-licking lesbo Guinevere Turner, Breaking Point is a rare piece of socially redeeming porn that spits in the wayward eye of political correctness while managing to be funny and reasonably aesthetically pleasing at the same time (indeed, Ralph Lundsten's dreamy yet degrading soundtrack also immaculately compliments the tone and images of the film). If you have ever have a bad day and are fed-up with all the feminist filth being shoved down your throat by work and MTV, give Breaking Point a watch because, while the film might not give you a sexual release, it will certainly have a therapeutic affect of sorts.

-Ty E

THE LAST AMERICAN VIRGIN
THE LAST AMERICAN VIRGIN

Boaz Davidson (1982)

One of my most watched but least favorite genres growing up was that of the teen sex comedy, especially those made in the glorious, round, jiggling, natural 1980's. On the one hand, the values on display in these flicks tend to be completely out-of-step with my own. The typical set-up of an attractive guy, fat party animal, and middle of the road audience member stand-in doing everything in their power to see glorious, round, jiggling 18-going-on-32-year old titties while terrorizing nerds and being completely entitled upper middle class homophobic assholes to a new wave soundtrack is not something I can particularly relate to. I attended high school once, and I remember these guys (exchange the new wave soundtrack for some emotive hardcore or gangsta rap, granted)...the popular date rapists who threw massive parties and called guys like me "fags" when they would attack us half-naked in the locker room. On the other, these films provide all kinds of wishful-thinking scenarios, and more importantly, titties, be they sagging and unconvincingly high school aged- big week-old grapes that would look more appropriate in front of a suckling infant than accidentally torn off at a sock hop- or those rare cases of a young actress with a bad agent and the most perfect set of natural, perky knockers that make an entire Animal House reread worth the hour and a half of stale "bitches are dumb, nerds are fags" "humor" for that one divine reveal (which, depending on format, you either pause or put on A-B repeat and then reach for the Kleenex). Also some nice asses, occasional bush, but yeah, mostly mammaries. Anyways, The Last American Virgin has many of the hallmarks of the teen sex comedy genre. It has the trifecta of fat party animal, attractive guy, and slightly more generic audience member stand in. It has the same attitudes toward women, both deeply misogynistic but completely true to the mentality of a teenage boy on the cusp of puberty/college age date rapist. It even features much in the way of insanely cruel nerd abuse, which is always good for a laugh, homo. What sets Last American Virgin apart, however, is that the sex feels somewhat more grounded in something approaching reality, the acting is a few notches above what the genre would typically require, the soundtrack is the holy grail - THE eighties teen new wave soundtrack to end all eighties teen soundtracks - but mostly it's the ending; one of the most heartwrenching, sobering, and altogether RESPONSIBLE endings to any film about young love and sex period, let alone something greenlit because of the runaway success of fucking Porkey's.

The threadbare plot of Last American Virgin, as with most films of its ilk, concerns the plight of virginal Gary, a guy not quite as studly or funny and fat as his friends Rick and David, respectively, and his and his friends' efforts to get laid. Rick has little trouble in this department, looking like a less amiable Denis Quaid (also looking about 27, though to the film's credit, a number of the films teenagers, including Lawrence Monoson, who plays Gary, actually look the part), and the guys land themselves in all kinds of wonderful set pieces, from the opening scene of substituting Sweet N Low for cocaine to convince a trio of girls to party at Gary's house to a visit to the local lonely Latin sexpot Gary encounters on his pizza route. This scene is particularly interesting as it has a certain sexual openness that I'm sure betrays the film's origins as a remake of director Boaz Davidson's previous Israeli hit Eskimo Limon. Gary first encounters the dime-store Charo when making a pizza delivery and upon realizing she would like nothing more than to jump his bones, rushes off, calls his friends, and invites them over (is he scared? Perhaps sharing is caring?). Rick, of course, takes the lead, and his friends strip to their boxers and watch through the peephole to her room (with no mention made of sloppy seconds...these guys are nothing like my own friends) (and I can't say I've ever excitedly watched a friend having sex) (or have gotten sloppy seconds for that matter- eww). David is up next, and the fully nude sex glimpsed through the peephole is a tad more realistic and fully naked than I, for one, am used to seeing in these films. Of course, Gary being the Last American Virgin of the title and all, is cruelly interrupted before having his chance by counterfeit Charo's lover, on return from the Navy. Much hilarity ensues. Also of note as far as set pieces go is the perplexing but refreshingly male-appendaged scene early on when Gary and the rest of his gym classmates walk in on the resident nerd spying through a peephole which somehow leads to a boner-measuring contest set to "Whip It" by Devo. You will never hear the song again without picturing a marching line of bulging, bouncing boners straining through tighty whities (between this film and Love Exposure I wish there were more boners in teen angst cinema - it is a natural fact of life every guy deals with that is oft-ignored in these movies, or at least only hinted at and not shown. An erection is way more common to a teenage boy than using a remote controlled airplane to rip off a blouse housing Double D's, I would think). And best of all, the nerd wins! Though they do dump a bucket of water on the dweeb, fag.

As these misadventures are underway, Gary notices virginal, angelic Karen (played by Diane Franklin, the foreign exchange babe from Better Off Dead, maybe my other favorite eighties teen flick), whom he first meets by stalking to her home, popping the tire of her bike, and then offering a ride to school. For Gary, it's love at first sight. For Karen, love at first sight comes in the form of Gary's best friend Rick, the hot douchebag to end all hot douchebags. Gary comes to this realization at a party early on in the film, and a scene of him drunkenly attempting to talk to Karen as well as watching them kiss during a slow dance are performed wonderfully by Lawrence Monoson, who earns the pathos of his character with the perfect combination of pretend confidence, teenage assholeishness, and affected puppy dog stares that eventually gives way to crushing defeat of the worst kind. As the film progresses, Gary becomes more and more resentful of the situation, but helpless to do anything due to loyalty to Rick. This plotline serves to address some real truths about young love and lust and is what bumps Last American Virgin up to classic status.

THE LAST AMERICAN VIRGIN

SPOILERS ABOUND

For starters, there is the scene where Gary tries to distract Rick from taking Karen on the date in which he plans to take her virginity, inviting his friends in desperation to see a prostitute. It is here that Gary loses his Last American Virgin status, to a weathered, bitter whore who berates him the entire time within earshot of his friends, before leaving all three boys with genital lice. But where the film really takes off into unexplored territory within this genre comes after Rick deflowers Karen and dumps her promptly upon learning that she's pregnant. Gary promises to help Karen and he gets into it with Rick, severing their friendship. As Rick, making out with a new girl, David, and the rest of the class leave for a ski trip, Gary spends every last dime and then some to help Karen fund an abortion, and cleans out his grandma's house so she has a place to recuperate over the weekend. At the end of the weekend, he confesses his love to her and they share a kiss, but come time for her birthday party a few days later, Gary will learn that it is rarely the nice guy that gets the girl, and the film ends on a note that is incredibly surprising for something that up to a point just seems like a typical teenage-titty show. The montage in which Gary is raising the funds for the abortion and Karen is getting it performed, I must say, is one of the strangest I've ever seen in a film of this class. It is your typical "taking care of business", scrounging together every last dime in a sometimes comedic fashion eighties movie montage, only intercut with a sobbing Diane Franklin being readied for her procedure (to the tune of U2's "I Will Follow" no less?!). The film also begs some major questions, like sure, it sucks that the hot douchebag gets the girl in the end, but isn't using an abortion as an excuse to get close to a girl and popping her tire as a "meet cute" kinda creepy and all sorts of wrongheaded? Maybe the only lesson that Gary need take away at the end is not that nice guys finish last but that he acted like a creep, so fuck him. Either way, it's a sobering and responsible end to a teen sex movie to show that love and romance can also lead to itchy genitals and broken hearts.

/SPOILERS

One last thing of note- the soundtrack. Holy fuck, it's the holy grail of eighties teendom! The aforementioned Devo, The Cars (with particularly great use of "Since You're Gone") (best break-up song ever, by the way), Human League, The Waitresses, Journey, U2, REO Speedwagon's "Keep on Loving You" and much, much more. It's kinda like Grand Theft Auto: Vice City only instead of watching the murder of pedestrians and prostitutes you witness the murder of one young man's soul! And some great titties. Even if one pair of those titties are during a certain hard-to-stomach doctor's office scene, but, yeah...b-o-o-oi-i-i-n-g.

-Jon-Christian

FRESH
FRESH

Boaz Yakin (1994)

It's been high time that I've put thoughts of Fresh to rest being this was the film that first set my horizons to dabbling in constructing a solid base of opinions in written form, see also: review. Far from the decadent projects of faux pauper hood dramas, Fresh presents the first of its kind that I've seen, an intellectual pass at exhibiting impoverished communities without making me want to fumigate the entirety of the seedy alleys littered with degenerates and addicts. Essentially a coming-of-age urban fable with a 12 year old drug runner, name of Fresh, the film decides to center itself a fancy twist when he begins to use the game of chess and his estranged father's tactics to get himself and his sister out of the "game" before it's too late. Setting up a chessboard in his room, Fresh manipulates each piece in a manner catering to his opponents needs. As whimsical father-figure Samuel L. Jackson puts it, "I play my opponent. If he likes to attack, I force him to defend himself. If he's a cautious man, I draw him into dangerous waters." These words from this golden deus ex machina provides us with an exhilarating set-up for what might be one of the greatest films ever told through a black child's eyes, with the exception of George Washington.

Establishing the pawns rather quickly and efficiently without wasting time from the fireworks, Fresh introduces us to the morning habits of a school boy drug pusher as he stiffly tells this smacked Mexican Consuela that 20 means 20. After she bullshits her culture and daughter to the young black man in what might possibly be a scheme for more of the "product", Fresh leaves the apartment to deliver to local drug kingpin Esteban's cronies. The intensity of life is established very quickly in the projects as this kid Fresh could be any other kid growing up with such a poverty-stricken way of life. Scratch that, no kid from the projects could house such an intellectual fervor as effortlessly as Fresh. I think Mexican clown Chuckie would be a better comparison to the average low-income child, destined to die because of his arrogant, irritating, and perversely mongoloid nature. Because of the deteriorating element of his family, Fresh takes it upon himself to free himself from the slimy hands of Corky and Esteban in a concise yet superficial rigging of his creation. Using tactics employed in chess, Fresh ultimately boils down to a metaphorical game of chess using real pawns and sacrificing much to make ends meet.

Fresh proves to be one of the more tame films I set out to review. Not being much of quality, filming wise, Fresh doesn't really house any hidden aesthetics or inspired technique. It's simply a film that exists within the raw boundaries of the story it portrays so the quality is dismissible as the product is something I can revisit over and over again. Courting my predilection for spicy urban dramas, Fresh was developed for a specific audience in mind. I couldn't imagine current black youth watching this film without heckling poor Michael for participating in lame activities such as "chess" or "family." These concepts mean nothing to most of, if not all, of our streetwise rodents. Surrounded by such filth must be distracting on the developing adolescence of Fresh. From the lackadaisical temperament of his "nAuGhtIIe N' nAStY" sister converted whore to the greasy self-idolizing tentacles of Ešteban, Fresh concerns himself with some putrid excess for sure.

As an added bonus, Samuel L. Jackson turns perhaps his best performance as his alcoholic speed-chess father whom Fresh can drop the moniker and manifest the semblance of a human being. Not just for whimsical anecdotes or father/son malleability, Fresh comes to this park to step his game up to better suit his needs. In what eventually begins to unravel, Fresh takes charge as a studious film featuring rather unsavory characters and takes the time to escape the bind of class-B "yungbloodz" and their banal disillusionment of cinema. Fresh isn't a perfect film but rather a perfect character. A child of rotting roots that I feel great sympathy for. You may be able to disregard the film but you most certainly cannot shun the character. As Michael sheds mortal coil by releasing Roscoe of his tainted innocence, Fresh becomes somewhat with purpose to better his life and stray back on course. To cap off a perfectly-competent debut picture from Boaz Yakin, Fresh ends on such a note of breakdown that it's near impossible for me to not get caught up in the flood of emotion emanating from Sean Nelson in his only credible role. This is the stuff that Urban films should be made of. There is no glorification of hood dreams to be found in Fresh, only a wake up call to black youth stating that it's time to grow up.

-mAQ

TATTOO
TATTOO

Bob Brooks (1981)

Undoubtedly, political correctness and feminism, like most 'humanist' ideologies/religions, is a corrosive force that uproots culture, nature, and even sexuality, hence the plague-like proliferation of trannies, queens, bull-dykes, cuckolds, miscegenaters, and other aberrosexuals in America and the Occident. Undoubtedly, one film to suffer the wrath of less than wet women (aka feminists) that features some emotionally disturbed and erotically-challenged individuals is the erotic artsploitation thriller Tattoo (1981) which, on top of being attacked upon its release by fecund-free feminist groups due to its salacious yet rather iconic poster, also acts as a sort of unconventional scathing critique of the post-'women's lib' world. Directed by American photographer and famous advertising director Bob Brooks—a man whose 1974 advert 'Smash Martians' was given the award for 'TV ad of the Century' in 1999 by Campaign magazine—Tattoo is a healthy combination of celluloid art and exploitation trash that some more sensitive (translation: ball-less) contemporary viewers might describe as 'misogynist.' Co-penned by Joyce Buñuel—the one-time Jewish wife of Spanish-French horror auteur Juan Luis Buñuel (Au rendez-vous de la mort joyeuse aka Expulsion of the Devil, Leonor) and daughter-in-law of Spanish surrealist maestro Luis Buñuel (Un Chien Andalou, That Obscure Object of Desire), Tattoo is a sort of wayward and more nihilistic remake of William Wyler's The Collector (1965) starring Terence Stamp, albeit set in a post-love zeitgeist of urban debauchery and decay where underage girls attempt to bribe tattoo artists to get tattoos on their tits and asses, women put their careers before children, rape is an unofficial city sport, women are such whores that they do not even know the father of their baby is (in one especially humorous scene, it is mentioned a woman gave birth to twins, with one baby being black and the other white), and visiting peepshows is a more realistic prospect for a man than an actual date. A sometimes chilling, if not equally hilarious, psychological erotic thriller with elements of horror and melodrama about a semi-autistic Japanophile of a tattoo artist who falls in love with a wanton career-driven model and decides to take her hostage and tattoo her entire body after she rebuffs his deranged 'romantic' advances, Tattoo is a work that deserves comparisons to John Avildsen's Joe (1970), Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976), and Paul Schrader's Hardcore (1979) in terms of its therapeutically unflattering depiction of urban post-counter-culture America. On top of everything else, Tattoo also makes for one of the greatest anti-date movies ever made, as a somewhat sexually gratuitous work that contains what is undoubtedly every girl's worst nightmare.

After traveling to Japan while in the military and taking part in some sort of secret Jap tattoo ritual, Karl Kinsky (Bruce Dern)—a man who not by coincidence shares a Polish surname that is phonetically the same as deranged German actor Klaus Kinski—decided to cover his entire body in tats (or what he calls “body markings”) and become a tattoo artist at a time when such a profession almost carried the same reputation as that of a pimp. An innately (and even disturbingly) introverted man with a foreboding demeanor who tends to flip-out during the most random of moments, Karl spent his childhood being emotionally abused by his Polack father, whose memory the body art artist scorns. One day, a neurotic Jewish magazine editor named Sandra (Frederikke Borge, the daughter of popular Danish Jewish comedian Victor Borge aka “The Unmelancholy Dane”) randomly shows up at Karl’s tattoo parlor and offers him the job of designing fake tattoos for a big photo shoot that is being done by a rampantly homosexual (although somehow married) photographer named Halsey (gay actor Leonard Frey, who starred in off-Broadway and William Friedkin’s 1970 film version of The Boys in the Band). While initially dismissive of the idea of compromising his art for aesthetically tasteless purposes, Karl eventually gives in to working with Halsey after seeing portraits of the models whose naked bodies he will have the opportunity to paint. While painting the nude body of a model named Maddy (Swedish actress Maud Adams, who is best known for playing Bond girls in The Man with the Golden Gun (1974) and Octopussy (1983)), Karl seems to fall in love with the statuesque blonde at first sight, even if he yells at her for talking too much and allowing her skin to get too tense (which is apparently a big ‘no, no’ for body artists). Since Maddy is a rather loose lady who tends to screw a number of men in any given time in between her various photo shoots, she somehow agrees to go on a date with weirdo introvert Karl. Unfortunately, while on the date, one of Maddy’s ex-boyfriends shows up and tells Karl that he “does not take orders from Polacks,” so that tattoo artist threatens to kill him. While being threatening to her ex-beau does not scare Maddy away from Karl, his seeming sexual impotence and old fashioned puritanical mentality does. After verbally berating Maddy for using the word “fuck” and acting like an all-around socially retarded mad man with a bad temper, Karl finds that his beloved no longer wants anything to do with him, so he has the wise idea to kidnap the model, take her to his family home in Ocean City, New Jersey, tattoo her entire body with kaleidoscopic Jap tats, and somehow force her to fall in love with him. After knocking Maddy out with chloroform (a movie cliché that apparently does not work too well in real-life) and shooting her up with drugs, Karl takes the model to his family beach house and proceeds to tattoo her while she is unconscious. Naturally, when Maddy comes to and realizes her body is covered with permanent Jap body art, she loses her cool. Of course, Maddy also does not take kindly to the fact Karl makes her do bizarre stuff like masturbate while he voyeuristically spies on her via a keyhole and masturbates himself. Over time, Maddy learns to ‘play the game’ and pretend to be Karl’s wife, but she ultimately has ulterior motives. After Karl eventually finishes the rest of Maddy’s full-body tattoo, he finally gets aroused enough for the first time in his life to 'make it' (aka have sex) with the model, but mid-coitus, she literally stabs him in the back with his own fancy tattoo machine needle in what is a rather symbolic scene.

TATTOO

Indubitably, one of the things I found most unsettling about Tattoo is that despite being a deranged kidnapper with a fiercely flat affect, Karl is ultimately more likeable and more authentic of an individual than virtually every other single character in the film, thus demonstrating the inversion of values of modern society in general and the tendency of said society to push people over the edge who would have felt at home in America only a couple decades before. Indeed, Karl Kinsky is a patently pathetic individual who tries in vain to consummate a traditional marriage, even symbolically taking his would-be-wife/kidnap victim to his family home (which is undoubtedly the source of his dysfunctional and antisocial behavior) and forcing her act like a wife via physical force, thus demonstrating the antihero's total alienation from society and ultimately insane introversion. Of course, Kinsky's Japanophilia and adoption of ancient oriental customs, not unlike the wiggers and philo-Semites that populate American today, demonstrates that he is a fellow suffering from a identity crisis and longing for tradition, hence his adoption of an alien culture. As Karl explains himself as to why people get 'the mark' (his name for tattoos), he believes people 'need them to exist.' Of course, with the proliferation of body pseudo-art in America since the release of Tattoo over three decades ago (who doesn't have a tattoo nowadays?!), it is quite apparent that America—a culturally retarded pseudonation that becomes all the more 'multicultural' (aka racially divided) and anti-tradition/anti-family/anti-heterosexual with each passing day—is suffering from a rather serious identity crisis that no amount of rainbow-colored ink will cover up.

Not surprisingly, writer-director Bob Brooks stated regarding the romantic element of the film, "We created 'Tattoo' as a drama of what one human being can do to another, love, possession, vengeance. We lay tattoos on each other in any kind of a relationship. Call it a mark, call it a scar, the effects are permanent." And, indeed, like it or not, like all worthwhile films, the effects of Tattoo are permanent. Upon first seeing the film, I merely wrote it off as a well made exploitation flick featuring mainstream Hollywood stars like Lipstick (1976) starring Margaux Hemingway, but after a year or so, I could not get Tattoo out of my head and recently decided to give it re-watching. Yeah, Ebert was partly right when he described the last 30 minutes of the film as "just dumb horror-film stuff," but not all artful cinematic erotica can be as refined as Walerian Borowczyk's, especially considering Tattoo director Bob Brooks only had previously directed a British made-for-TV movie, The Knowledge (1979), and rather unfortunately, would never get the opportunity to direct another film again. Also to Brooks' credit, he apparently had a secret influence on British cinema, or as advertising director Dave Trott revealed, "Bob switched from being a photographer to a director. This meant he understood stylish, sophisticated lighting. No one else directing in London did. Before Bob, all UK commercials looked cheap and tatty. Alan Parker said, when he saw Bob's ads he realised for the first time that commercials could look as good as anything from Hollywood. Bob Brooks opened the door for that rush of classy, stylish British film talent that is now some of the best in the world." Aside from being notable for being trashed by feminists, Tattoo is also well known for being a work where the lead actor claimed he actually had real sex with his costar, though Maud Adams, being a classy lady and all, denies Mr. Dern's claims in regard to the supposed highly intimate meta-method-acting that went on during the shooting of the film. Featuring a humorous tribute to the shower scene in Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) that involves a tattoo gun instead of a butcher knife, as well as a couple scenes that director Brooks was not above self-deprecation (the flamboyant character 'Halsey' is clearly a parody of the director's prior career as a photographer), Tattoo ultimately makes for one of the mostly strangely 'merry' yet macabre pieces of artful yet unpretentious movie misogyny ever made and for that reason alone makes it mandatory viewing for anyone who has ever laughed about feminist activists who think flashing their asymmetrical, grossly over-sized cow udders or itty bitty mosquito bites in public is a legitimate form of political protest.

-Ty E

BLACK CHRISTMAS
BLACK CHRISTMAS

Bob Clark (1974)

Aside from cinephiles and horror fans, it seems that few people seem to realize that belated mainstream American auteur Bob Clark (Porky's, My Summer Story aka It Runs in the Family), the director of the beloved Xmas time classic A Christmas Story (1983)—a work that managed to do the seemingly impossible by making a Fellini-esque style movie palatable to the American masses, as a film that might be described as an American Amarcord (1973), albeit minus the gigantic talking Mussolini heads and teenage circle jerks—was also responsible for directing one of the most ugly, brutal, and dejecting Christmastide celluloid affairs ever made. Indeed, Clark's underrated proto-slasher flick Black Christmas (1974) aka Silent Night, Evil Night aka Stranger in the House aka Stop Me was probably the first Xmas themed film that one would probably be better off watching at any other time of the year aside from the holiday season, as a work featuring crypto-alcoholic sorority house mothers who sneak wigs of Whiskey that they have hidden in toilets during Xmas parties, frigid and calculatingly cold girlfriends who surprise the boyfriend's with the nasty news that they're unhappily pregnant and plan to get an abortion, assholes with Jew-fros who dress as Santa Clause and call their girlfriend a "bitch" in front of underprivileged children, college girls receiving phone calls from pathetic perverts that say vulgar things in distinctly vulgar ways like, "Let me lick your pretty piggy cunt," and last but certainly not least, a decidedly deranged psychosexual serial killer who casually kills unwitting college chicks while lurking around the attic and upstairs of their sorority house. Made during the post-counterculture era, Clark's work is set in a remote college town populated by vulgar and vice-ridden college kids and ignorant townies where the Christmas spirit had already been long shattered before a sexually sadistic killer ever began making his rounds and dispatching sullen sorority sisters. Released well before John Carpenter's Halloween (1978) and Sean S. Cunningham's Friday the 13th (1980), thus not only making it one of the first Christmas slasher flicks, but also slasher flicks in general (though, Silent Night, Bloody Night was made in 1972, it was not released until the same years as Clark's film in 1974), Black Christmas is one of the oh-so rare horror classics that can actually been described as underrated as opposed to obscenely overrated. More importantly, Clark's casually creepy piece of Xmas time celluloid cruelty is a genuinely decent and well constructed work featuring a foreboding sense of suspense and nicely nuanced pacing of the playfully pernicious sort, reasonably memorable acting performances and characters (including that of a faceless killer), and highly imaginative murder scenes with intricate and even sometimes poetic tableaux that range from the strangely surreal to the borderline avant-garde. Of course, as a work directed by the man that previously directed the low-camp tranny exploitation flick She-Man: A Story of Fixation (1967), the classic canuxploitation horror-drama-war hybrid Deathdream (1972) aka Dead of Night, and the cult zombie-comedy Children Shouldn't Play with Dead Things (1973), as well as produced (and some believe also co-directed) the classic Ed Gein flick Deranged: Confessions of a Necrophile (1974), Clark was bound to eventually assemble a masterful horror work and he did not need to use gratuitous sex and violence to do it, yet the innately inferior Halloween—the film credited as jumpstarting the mostly wretched slasher craze of the late-1970s and 1980s—was the work that ultimately received all the glory. Admittedly, I was somewhat disappointed by Black Christmas when I first saw it well over a decade ago, but after learning to appreciate cinema as an art form, I cannot deny that it absolutely murders the competition, as a slasher equivalent to Carl Th. Dreyer's Vampyr (1932) in terms of its uniquely underrated status in the context of its (sub)genre, as well as a work that makes Silent Night, Deadly Night (1984) seem like a retarded romp, Silent Night, Bloody Night feel like an arthouse abortion, and Christmas Evil (1980) aka You Better Watch Out seem like a spastic yuletide autism fit.

Opening with a rather conventional yet nonetheless beautiful nighttime outdoor shot of an old house covered in typical Christmas lights and decorations, Black Christmas initially has the essence of a classic Christmas drama from the 1950s, but things take a dramatic change when the viewer enters the house and is bombarded with the mostly bitchy and/or snarky sorority sisters whose repellent personalities act in stark contrast to the merry holiday they are ostensibly celebrating, as well as the classic building they call home. Unbeknownst to the girls, a nameless/faceless man that the viewer will later know as 'Billy' has snuck into the attic of the sorority house while the girls were busy getting good and drunk at their annual Christmas party. The girls soon get an obscene harassing phone call from the killer, who has called before and who the college chicks have aptly nicknamed the 'moaner' since he sounds like he is masturbating on the other line. While protagonist Jess Bradford (Olivia Hussey of gay Guido auteur Franco Zeffirelli's Academy Award-winning 1968 Romeo and Juliet adaptation) picks up the phone after it rings, it is her cuntwise-cracking comrade Barb Coard (Margot Kidder of Brian De Palma's Hitchcock homage Sisters (1973) and Richard Donner's Superman (1978)) that says to the curious creep caller, "why don't you go find a wall socket and stick your tongue in it, that will give you a charge" after he says such savagely salacious things as, "Let me lick your pretty piggy cunt" and "suck my juicy big cock. I'll come over and you can suck it." Needless to say, the caller is pissed by the college gal's gall and makes Barb a promise that he will ultimately fulfill when he hatefully remarks, "I'm going to kill you." Indeed, not long after the particularly perverted 'prank' call, Claire Harrison (Lynne Griffin), who is not really a big fan of Barb due to her vulgar personality, is asphyxiated by the caller/killer with a plastic bag after he surprises the young lady by jumping out of her closet and manhandling her in a most malevolent manner. Possibly feeling in the Xmas spirit, the killer carries Claire's body to the attic of the house and poses it in a rocking chair with a vintage baby doll in its arms with the bag that her suffocated her with still over her head, thereupon making the corpse look like a sort of warped Mrs. Claus decoration.

BLACK CHRISTMAS

Luckily for the sassy sorority sisters, they have an ex-cabaret dancer/crypto-dipsomaniac named Mrs. Mac (Marian Waldman) as a 'House Mother,' as she is too busy sneaking swigs of Whiskey that she has hidden inside books and toilets to give a shit about what sort of degeneracy the girls are involved with. Unfortunately for Mrs. Mac, when dead dame Claire fails to meet with her obnoxiously uptight conservative daddy Mr. Harrison (James Edmond), she has to deal with the worried father's super snide scorn. Indeed, on top of being annoyed by the fact that his baby girl is missing, Mr. Harrison seems particularly offended by posters of nude hippie chicks hanging on the walls of the sorority house and complains like the anally retentive bitch that he is, "I'm very disappointed with this atmosphere and I intend to do something about it" to the less than amused house mother. Mr. Harrison's attitude annoys Mrs. Mac so much that she rightfully complains to herself, "These broads would hump the Leaning Tower of Pisa if they could get up there," in regard to her well warranted belief that the sorority girls are intemperate lady libertines who could not be controlled no matter what sort of rules she tried to enforce onto them. When Mrs. Mac goes looking for her kitty cat Claude in the attic of the sorority house after noticing that the attic door is open, she gets a fatal blow to the head via a crane hook, which she is subsequently hung from like a cow carcass, thus reflecting the fact that the crazed killer is not an 'agist' when it comes to hunting hoes.

Meanwhile, mostly unlikeable protagonist Jess—a girl that seems to have been indoctrinated by a lot of second wave feminist twaddle and has adopted an exceedingly gynocentric worldview—informs her melancholy musician boy toy Peter Smythe (Keir Dullea of Otto Preminger's Bunny Lake is Missing (1965) and Stanley Kubrick's 1968 sci-fi masterpiece 2001: A Space Odyssey in a role that was originally offered to fellow Kubrick graduate Malcolm McDowell) that she is pregnant and when he excitedly responds "that's fantastic," she coldly replies that she does not want the child and plans to abort it. Needless to say, Peter botches a piano exam he has later that day and subsequently decides to take his anger out on the piano by smashing it to bits. Seeing as Jess was well aware of the fact that Peter had the piano exam yet she decided to tell him about the abortion right before it just goes to show that she is a self-centered bitch, if not a scheming sadist, who clearly harbors resentment towards men, not least of all her boyfriend (notably, earlier in the film, Peter tells Jess on the phone that he loves her and she coldly responds by merely stating, "I know," as if disgusted by the thought that the man she regularly bangs has deep emotional feelings for her). Meanwhile, sorority sisters Barb and Phyllis "Phyl" Carlson (Andrea Martin) accompany Mr. Harrison to the local police station to report Claire's strange disappearance and the dopey cop working there, Sergeant Nash (Doug McGrath), blows them off and insinuates that their missing friend is probably off blowing her boyfriend in a cabin somewhere. To play a prank on the socially retarded cop, Barb tells Nash that the sorority phone number is 'fellatio' and since he has no clue that she is screwing with him, the moronic cop actually writes it down. While hanging around the police station, the girls also learn that a high school girl named Janice has recently disappeared and it does not take long for her corpse to show up in a local park, so a police officer with some actual sense, Lieutenant Fuller (John Saxon of Enter the Dragon (1973) starring Bruce Lee and Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984)), begins taking the sorority girls seriously and has their phones tapped so that if the killer calls again, they can figure out his exact location. Unfortunately for Lt. Fuller, the crazed killer seems to have a lot more sense than the group of college girls whose lives he hopes to protect.

When Peter tells Jess that he wants to drop out of school and give up his dream of becoming a concert pianist so that he can marry her and so that they can start a family together, she turns him down cold and also reveals that she is going to abort their baby asap, so he breaks a Christmas ornament and states, "you selfish bitch, you're talking about killing our baby as though you're having a wart removed" and storms out of the sorority house. Naturally, due to his melodramatic drama queen behavior, Lt. Fuller suspects that Peter might be the killer. When the 'moaner' aka 'Billy' later calls Jess and repeats exactly what Peter said earlier in regard to her treating an abortion like it is "having a wart removed," she becomes convinced that her pissed off beau is the killer. Meanwhile, it is discovered via the phone tap that the killer is actually in the house and using Mrs. Mac's second line, so Sergeant Nash calls Jess and tells her to get out of the house immediately, but since two of her friends, Barb and Phyl, who she does not realize have already been killed (notably, Barb is stabbed to death with a crystal unicorn statue in a rather aesthetically pleasing scene of almost transcendental slasher savagery), are still upstairs, she moronically goes against the cop's order and goes to the second floor to look for her friends, who she ultimately finds dead lying together in a bed in rather strange poses. After that, Jess spots the killer looking at her via a crack in the door, so she kicks said door, thus injuring the creep and runs down to the basement of the house and hides. When Peter breaks a basement window so he can get inside the house since no one will answer the phone or door, Jess, who is petrified out of her mind and believes her boyfriend is the killer, decides to beat him to death with a crowbar. When Lt. Fuller and his men later arrive on the scene, they discover a fellow officer dead with his throat slit inside a patrol car outside the sorority house and assume the worst when they eventually find Jess lying on the ground with Peter's corpse in her lap. As demonstrated by Jess' killing of Peter and her all-around cognitive dissonance, the killer/Billy almost seems like her Jungian 'animus' (the unconscious of a female as expressed in a male inner personality), especially when one considers the rather brutal and visceral nature in which she murdered her boyfriend. Convinced that Peter was the killer, Lt. Fuller and the rest of the police leave the house while Jess, who has been given sleeping pills so that she can get some rest, sleeps like a baby. Not long after the cops leave, it is revealed that the killer is still in the attic with the perversely posed corpses of Claire and Mrs. Mac. The film ultimately ends ambiguously with the killer once again calling the house, thereupon hinting that Jess probably won't survive the night.

BLACK CHRISTMAS

Maybe it is my impenetrable sense of nihilism or perennially multiplying cynicism, especially during the holiday season, but I think Black Christmas has certainly replaced Clark's later work A Christmas Story in terms of personal Xmas favorites. I also must admit that I felt like a little bit of a schadenfreude seeing a crazed killer that is assumedly screwed up as a result of a childhood sexual encounter with his sister (he makes constant references to a girl named Agnes, especially while in the company of his victims) going around and killing a bunch of feminist brainwashed college chicks who only think about screwing losers and who do not have to think twice about an abortion when pregnancy strikes. Indeed, Black Christmas makes for an interesting double feature and comparison piece to Clark's later classic Christmas flick, as it depicts the post-counterculture/post-sexual-liberation generation and their seeming dissatisfaction with Xmas and life in general in comparison to the characters of A Christmas Story, who find fun, happiness, and fond memories in the most simple and everyday of activities. One of the things that makes Clark's holiday season horror-slasher so positively potent, especially as a Christmas time chiller, is that, although it features a couple scenes of relatively effective comical relief of the somewhat crude sort, it does not wallow in the sort of moronic irony and compulsive self-consciousness typical of similar films and instead features simultaneously brutal yet beautiful murder scenes with an almost 'erotic' thrust and aesthetic sensitivity that few, if any, other slasher films can boast aside from giallos like Mario Bava's equally influential works Blood and Black Lace (1964) aka Sei donne per l'assassino and A Bay of Blood (1971) aka Reazione a catena aka Twitch of the Death Nerve. Of course, the most obvious reason Clark's film stands out amongst most insipid slasher swill is that it concludes in ambiguity and never reveals the identity of the killer, which is certainly something that would induce cognitive dissonance in contemporary viewers, who need their slasher shit spoon fed to them lest they feel that their rather vulnerable intellect has been challenged. Indeed, it almost seems like Black Christmas is not as popular in comparison to the competition because fanboys don't have a Michael Myers, Jason Voorhees, or some other sort of masked retard to swoon over and jerk-off to. Also, one could argue that the film is one of the few, if not sole, subtextual slasher flicks due to its arguable depiction of the nameless/faceless killer as protagonist Jess' animus. Indeed, Black Christmas is the ultimate yuletide slaughter show, as a celluloid gift that keeps on giving as a work that, relatively speaking, leaves the viewer thinking every single time. Rather unfortunately, Clark later decided to put coal in the figurative stockings of the fans of his film by acting as an executive producer on the wholly and shockingly retarded loose-as-a-NYC-crackhead-hooker Canadian-American remake Black X-Mas (2006) aka Black Christmas directed by Glen Morgan (who somewhat surprisingly directed the halfway decent 2003 Willard remake starring Crispin Glover) and starring exceedingly annoying spoiled Jewess Michelle Trachtenberg. Of course, Clark was also responsible for directing Baby Geniuses (1999) and its sequel Superbabies: Baby Geniuses 2 (2004) before a drunken illegal alien from Mexico tragically killed him and his son in a car accident in 2007, but as the man responsible for not only Black Christmas, but also Children Shouldn't Play with Dead Things (1973), Deathdream (1974), and Murder by Decree (1979), he had more than earned his fair share of respect from genre fans. I certainly cannot think of another filmmaker whose films have more invaded the hearts and minds of Americans during the Christmas season in such an eclectic fashion than those of Bob Clark, whose masterpieces Black Christmas and A Christmas Story offer the ultimate morbid yet merry schizophrenic celluloid double feature.

-Ty E

A CHRISTMAS STORY
A CHRISTMAS STORY

Bob Clark (1983) I have probably seen A Christmas Story (1983) more times than any other film in my entire life. Since birth, I have watched it multiple during every Christmas season. A Christmas Story has the ability to bring out the nostalgia out of the most Grinchiest of individuals. A Christmas Story is also one of the Christmas few films that hasn't left a sour eggnog taste in my mouth after noticing it been has televised for 24 hours straight on Christmas.

It's quite interesting to go back to A Christmas Story after all the years and evaluate it with a cinephile mindset. I don't think it would be ridiculous to say there is an obvious Fellini Amarcord influence to the film. That was the first thing I thought when I first watched Amarcord. Fellini loved to tell the heartwarming details of his childhood (whether he imagined them or not).

Illegal immigrant Hector Velazquez-Nava took the life of A Christmas Story director Bob Clark and his son earlier this year. Velazquez-Nava had a blood alcohol level of three times the legal limit and was driving without a license when he crashed into Bob Clark's automobile. Velazquez-Nava has the luxury of attending jail for the next six year and will most likely face deportation to Mexico afterwards. What a waste.

A Christmas Story wasn't Bob Clark's first Christmas film. In 1974 he had directed phantom slasher Black Christmas. I would have to say that A Christmas Story is a much better film. Everyone knows most slasher films are complete trash. Black Christmas at least had some intrigue to it. Bob Clark was no doubt a competent director.

I always get disappointed when Ralphie finally "shoots his eye out." As a child, I also took a liking to BB guns (better ones than a red ryder of course). I even got my best BB gun for Christmas when I was 9 years old. Ralphie was a true hero to me.

Merry Christmas from Soiled Sinema!
-Ty E

Bob Fosse (1983)

Despite the recent so-called Me Too movement where a bunch of bigwig Hollywood types, mostly of the Hebraic sort, were rather predictably exposed as sleazy sexual predators, the perennial semitic stereotype of the shiksa-defiling chosenite has yet to reach the mainstream public consciousness due to the mainstream media carefully portraying these pathetic perverts as ostensible “white men.” Indeed, while absurdly presented as “white,” disgraced Miramax cofounder and top Democrat supporter Harvey Weinstein—a physical monster of a man that was the subject of an article entitled ‘The Specifically Jewy Perviness of Harvey Weinstein’ at the Judaic publication Tablet magazine—is the virtual living and breathing physical embodiment of a nasty Nazi caricature straight out of Julius Streicher’s tabloid trash Der Stürmer. Of course, anyone even remotely familiar with the hermetic history of Hollywood knows that Weinstein was simply part of a grand Hollywood tradition of goy-gal-exploiting that, rather conveniently, has rarely been depicted in Tinseltown movies despite the fact that Hollywood loves making masturbatory movies about itself (hence the abject commercial and critical failure of a film like The Day of the Locust (1975) where the sins of Sunset Boulevard are laid bare). Of course, there are exceptions and it took a good degenerate goy boy like Bob Fosse—a rather handsome mensch born to a Norwegian-American father—to depict such a scenario, albeit in a somewhat atypical fashion that really underscores the innately sexually unsavory and sickening nature of Hollywood as opposed to focusing on the racial character of such corruption. Indeed, Fosse’s cinematic swansong Star 80 (1983)—a film depicting the meteoric rise and brutal demise of Dutch-Canadian Playboy model Dorothy Stratten who was infamously murdered by her Hebraic (ex)pimp husband Paul Snider—is a notable film in that, on top of being inordinately aesthetically alluring for the time, it depicts how a wholesome blonde beauty can be transformed into an international sex object and ultimately destroyed in Hollywood in such a short time in a deceptively captivating cinematic work that hypnotically highlights the heinous debauching character of Hollywood and the sort of conmen, parasites, whores, hucksters, and sociopaths that lurk there. In terms of being based on the real-life tragic death of an attractive young girl from a decent (albeit fatherless) family that got murdered after getting sucked into a lurid lifestyle in the (post)counterculture age, Star 80 is like the Looking for Mr. Goodbar (1977)—a film that also features an older Jew lover grooming a young shiksa and leading her on a road to ruin—of the 1980s, albeit all the more infuriatingly tragic. Undoubtedly, what makes Fosse’s film somewhat more provocative than Richard Brooks’ criminally-underrated cult classic is that it mainly focuses on the killer to the point of empathizing with his personal and professional failures as the discarded husband of a hot Aryan ‘it girl.’

While Fosse fanatics—if they exist—would surely disagree, I have no qualms about confessing that, as a proud hater of musicals and everything they stand for, Star 80 is unequivocally my favorite flick directed by the dancer turned auteur. Indeed, while I can appreciate Lenny (1974) as an unconventional biopic despite my disgust for its titular subject and All That Jazz (1979) as the American answer to Federico Fellini's surreally autobiographical masterpiece 8 ½ (1963), I find Cabaret (1972) to simply be an aesthetically and sexually sickening film that, in my mind, can only inspire fantasies of defenestration. While some people might find the flick to be redundant as the Stratten-Snider story had already been depicted two years earlier via the totally mundane made-for-television movie Death of a Centerfold: The Dorothy Stratten Story (1981) starring the all-too-absurdly-improbable-and-masculine Jamie Lee Curtis as the eponymous lead, it is also an indubitable auteur piece where male fox Fosse finds great conflicted personal sympathy with a coldblooded killer and necrophile. Indeed, as Sam Wasson noted in his book Fosse (2013) in regard to the auteur and the overly wanton world that created him, "Bob Fosse was the best thing ever to come out of burlesque, and he would pay for it forever." In short, Fosse spent his younger years as an underage dancer being sexually exploited by old debauched strippers and it would have an imperative influence on how he looked at sex in the entertainment world. For example, as Wasson retells in his book, "Strippers—twice Bobby's size in two directions, and twice as sharp—preyed on him before the show as he stood in the wings about to go on [...] When the girls found out he wasn't the eighteen-year old he said he was, they started messing with him. Feathered gorgons appeared [...] They pulled Fosse from his Latin conjugations onto their laps, crushing his face in fingers and tongues, twirling his perfect hair and the cock in his tuxedo pants. Scared and alone, he did as he was told. Even if that meant doing what no good boy should do, he did it, because if he cried out, they'd blow his cover and he'd be out of the show for good, and what would he tell his mother? [...] Something must have been seriously, shamefully wrong with him, because, despite everything he should have run from—the fondling, the sinning, the heckling, and the shirking—to him, having the strippers' attention felt a little like being a star [...] He was drawn to the girls, then hurt by them. 'It was schizophrenic,' Fosse said. He couldn't get away from it and he didn't want to."

Not surprisingly considering Fosse's cumming-of-age story, sexual (and social) grooming is one of the main themes of Star 80, which is a film that rather fittingly takes its name from the real-life vanity plate on the signature black Corvette of psychopathic groomer-cum-killer Snider. Indeed, it is no coincidence that, early on in the film, the virtual antihero Paul Snider played Eric Roberts—a character that was largely influenced by both Fosse's own personal experiences and Montgomery Clift's tragic character George Eastman in George Stevens' A Place in the Sun (1951)—remarks upon seeing Dorothy Stratten for the very first time working at a Dairy Queen, "Get 'em while they're young,"

which he proceeds to do. During his rather lecherous life, Fosse learned to go from prey to predator and, in that sense, he identified with sicko Snider in the worst sort of way, or as drama critic Martin Gottfried explained in his book All His Jazz: The Life & Death of Bob Fosse (1990) in regard to the auteur, "There can be little doubt that he identified with Paul Snider [...] As Dan Melnick said, 'Bob was projecting the worst part of himself on Snider.' [...] The differences between Snider and Fosse, of course, were greater than the similarities [...] Like Paul, who depended on women to support him, Fosse had married strong, older women. Like Snider he turned to young girls, who posed no challenge and could be ignored. Like Snider, he had hoped to be a movie star, and like Snider he failed. Like Snider he was regularly criticized for being tasteless. Unlike Snider, he was not tasteless to his soul. Paul Snider created a star in Dorothy Stratten, only to be denied credit for it, just as Bob felt he had been denied credit for his part in Gwen Verdon's success. 'I was always interested,' he said during an interview about STAR 80, 'in the man behind the woman, especially the show woman.'" In short, the film is like the Aryan goyization of a most monstrous coldblooded murder where Fosse somehow brings preternatural humanity to the innately inhumane in a manner that is, in many ways, hopelessly goyish yet ultimately more provocative than the real-life story. In fact, the film does not even mention the obvious fact that Snider was a member of the tribe despite the fact that the killer regularly wore a Star of David necklace and people knew him by the name "The Jewish Pimp." Of course, Fosse's glaring de Judaization of the subject matter is probably explained by the fact that Hebraic screenwriter Paddy Chayefsky was his friend and mentor. In fact, Fosse was hoping that Chayefsky would do a rewrite of his Star 80 script, but the screenwriter had already become completely disillusioned with Hollywood due to his nightmarish experiences on Ken Russell's Altered States (1980), not to mention severe health issues that resulted in his death in 1981 (and, like a surreal scene straight out of All That Jazz, Fosse even performed a tape dance routine at his funeral!).

Although Jewish, Paul Snider was an uncultivated philistine who, in terms of verbal IQ, only managed to master the lowly art of remembering everyone's name and redundantly (mis)quoting his degenerate virtual pimp heroes like Hugh Hefner. In terms of predatory street smarts as a parasitic bottom-feeder, Snider made quite the impression on the hopelessly naïve Dorothy Stratten who, on top of having very little experience with men (for example, she only had one previous boyfriend), she seemed to be looking for a father figure as her padre abandoned the family when she was young (born Dorothy Ruth Hoogstraten, Stratten was actually a first-generation Canadian as the progeny of Dutch immigrants). As depicted in Star 80, Snider saw the perfect unconsciously beautiful victim to exploit in Stratten and the fact she was underage and nine years younger made this extremely easy for him, at least until she achieved fame and fortune on her own and finally came to the bitter realization that her beau was a no-good-bastard. Indeed, Snider took it for granted that Stratten would always be her meal ticket, so naturally he became completely unhinged when she began to get famous and dumped him for a powerful Hollywood filmmaker that was previously in a much publicized relationship with famous beauty Cybill Shepherd. The real-life Dorothy Stratten, who was blessed with rather large lips and shapely tits, was infinitely more beautiful than boyish Mariel Hemingway who portrays her in the film. Achieving virtual dyke status for her oftentimes unclad performance in prized Hebraic screenwriter Robert Towne's overrated directorial debut Personal Best (1982), Hemingway was naturally not Fosse's ideal choice for the role but she did have a certain innocent "unused quality" like Stratten and getting breast implants more or less sealed the deal for her in terms of the singular role. Needless to say, beloved male bimbo Eric Robert—an actor that is impossible to hate, even when playing degenerate junky criminals like in convicted pervert Victor Salva's The Nature of the Beast (1995)—is certainly more charming and handsomer than the real Paul Snider, but Star 80 is less a historical document (despite being largely factually sound) than an aesthetically pleasing exposé on the perils of sexual exploitation and fame-seeking in Hollywood in the age of (post)sexual liberation. Indeed, not unlike the hapless heroine of Looking for Mr. Goodbar, Dorothy Stratten is ultimately a victim of so-called sexual liberation and feminism as her rise and demise would be unthinkable otherwise, or as 20/20 senior producer Muriel Pearson recently remarked to the Montreal Gazette in regard to the new documentary The Death of a Playmate: The Dorothy Stratten Story, "The advent of the pill liberated women to make new choices about their sexuality. But it was, at times, a double-edged sword. We highlighted the duality of past and present by depicting a kind of double standard that was part of the PLAYBOY philosophy."

While Playboy Führer Hugh Hefner—a supposed goy with certain semitic physical and political sensibilities—was very supportive of the production of Star 80 to the point where he allowed Fosse to use the Playboy logo and even granted him access to his mansion for research (in return, Fosse cast Cliff Robertson instead of Harry Dean Stanton to portray Hefner at the glorified pornographer's recommendation), the film does not portray the 'publisher' in an altogether positive light. In fact, Hefner comes across seeming like a more pretentious and self-satisfied yet no-less-full-of-shit version of pathetic-wannabe Snider; or, in short, a scheming glorified pimp acting like a father figure to stupid lost girls. In fact, as depicted in the film, horn-dog Hef even attempts to pass off his porno company to Stratten as a family (and, in turn, the family she never had), even stating with a certain glaring lack of sincerity, "PLAYBOY is a very special magazine, Dorothy. There's no other magazine like it. All the writers, editors, photographers, the girls, etc. We all have a very special relationship. It's not like any other magazine. We're all like a, well, we're just like a family." A pseudo-sophisticated creep that smugly roams around his own lavish parties in insufferably flamboyant pajamas while routinely having his soft ass kissed by a carefully selected collection of adoring ass-kissers and brain-dead whores, Hefner represents the superlatively shallow and soulless dream that Ashkenazi simpleton Snider is so senselessly chasing (in fact, Snider, who founded the Chippendales Dancers, modeled the look of these male strippers after 'Playboy Bunny' costumes). Of course, both men act as the father that Stratten never had but, unfortunately for Snider, Hefner does a better job of it. While Dorothy Stratten comes off looking hopelessly naïve like a lamb unwittingly be led to the slaughter, virtually everyone else in her life (sans her poor mother) is totally shallow and/or painfully narcissistic, including her covertly kosher plastic surgeon housemate Dr. Martin 'Geb' Geber (David Clennon) who brags that he owns a Rolls-Royce simply as "an investment" and not as a "status symbol," as if that is some sort of important distinction. Needless to say, being a super shallow guy that is hopelessly high on his own supply and clearly only cares about himself, Geb is completely oblivious to the fact that his housemate Snider is a ticking time-bomb and is a great danger to Stratten, even after his girlfriend points out the obvious. In fact, when Snider acts with a certain lovelorn lunacy after Stratten leaves her, Geb responds by smugly complaining, "I can take a bragging Snider, I can take a coniving Snider. I just can't stomach a sentimental Snider," as if heartsickness and sentimentality are the same exact thing. Of course, Geb is no different than anyone else in Stratten's life in that he ultimately fails her in the end, hence the value of Fosse including pseudo-interview scenes with these largely superficial and/or unsavory characters who talk a lot but never say anything that truly matters. In that sense, Star 80 oftentimes feels like a sort of anti-murder-mystery where the murder is already solved and the characters seem incapable of offering any real clues.

While Stratten reluctantly agrees to marry Snider despite Hefner hypocritically objecting due to the kosher Canadian having "the personality of a pimp," she is killed by her hubby only after 16 months of miserable marriage after leaving him for a sensitive filmmaker. Indeed, while Stratten marries Snider because she believes "I owe it to him" since he was responsible for jumpstarting her career, she cannot help but swiftly dispose of him upon meeting 'cinematic auteur' Aram Nicholas (Roger Rees)—a fictionalized character based on filmmaker Peter Bogdanovich who unwisely cast her in his box-office bomb They All Laughed (1981) and made her the subject of his dubious memoir The Killing of the Unicorn - Dorothy Stratten 1960-1980 (1984)—as he is the complete opposite of her Hebraic husband as a kind, thoughtful, and empathetic 'artiste' that, quite unlike most men in her life, seems to see her more than just a tasty piece of fresh meat. As a one-guy kind of gal, Stratten, quite unlike her hubby, is fond on monogamy and refuses to maintain the charade of her sham marriage after falling for Aram. Of course, after a series of disastrous business ventures that are all funded by the success of his wife, Snider—a hyper hypocritical huckster that regularly cheats on his lover throughout their rather one-sided relationship, including with less than lovely negress prostitutes that seem like insipid street slime compared to his positively pulchritudinous spouse—sees it as the ultimate blow to his already fragile ego when Stratten cheats on him with a big name Hollywood director. While Stratten tries to buy him off with a relatively generous offer of $7,000, perennial loser Snider feels entitled to much more because, after all, he ‘discovered’ her. Needless to say, if Snider cannot have Stratten, no one can, so the Jewish pimp buys a shotgun and blows her brains out, but not before virtually ritualistically raping and brutalizing her. As if to confirm his position in the afterlife in some otherworldly Gehenna where he will be able to play pool with Oskar Dirlwanger and Carl Panzram, Snider then straps Stratten’s bloody naked corpse onto a ‘sodomy rack’ and then proceeds to commit necrophilia with his dead wife off-screen while the camera focuses on various nudes of the tragic heroine as if to starkly contrast her nightmarish reality to the pseudo-sophisticated erotic illusions that Playboy contrived. Before blowing his own brains out, Snider triumphantly declares, “You won’t forget Paul Snider” and the rest is history. Luckily for Snider, Death of a Centerfold: The Dorothy Stratten Story—a largely forgettable TV movie turd of the subpar soap-era-esque sort that features the less than handsome Bruce Weitz portraying Snider—was not the only film made in tribute to his infamy, as Star 80 is a near-masterpiece in terms of style that somehow manages to be respectful to both the real-life murderer and his victim (whereas the TV movie only inspires feelings of apathy and banality as manly mischling Jamie Lee Curtis, who already looks rather ‘used up,’ seems completely incapable of expressing even an inkling of innocence or naivety, among other important nubile qualities that the real-life Stratten so effortlessly radiated).

Despite featuring many morally dubious subjects, Star 80 is a strangely moral film, or, more specifically, the sort of covertly moralistic movie you might expect from a deeply troubled man that personally experienced the sins and debasement that it almost gleefully depicts as if to entice the viewer while mocking them at the same time by giving them unrivaled beauty and then ruthlessly ripping it to shreds with a certain understated elegance. On top of Fosse utilizing the film as a sort of covert self-criticism via the Paul Snider character, Star 80 acts as a sort of stylish cinematic condemnation of the people, places, and professions that the auteur was so personally accustomed to. Indeed, featuring an aesthetic that falls somewhere between a post-Cries and Whispers Ingmar Bergman film (notably, Sven Nykvist acted as the cinematographer) and, well, vintage Playboy smut, the film ironically utilizes glamour to goad the viewer into asking questions about morality in an era that basked in shallow spectacle and disposable escapism, hence the commercial failure of great dark 1980s films like Ivan Passer’s Cutter’s Way (1981) and James Bridge’s Mike’s Murder (1984), among countless others. While the film portrays the fictionalized Bogdanovich charafter in a mostly favorable light, Teresa Carpenter's Pulitzer Prize-winning Village Voice source article 'Death of a Playmate' is considerably less flattering to the point where it accuses both the filmmaker and Hefner of causing Stratten's death. To make things somewhat creepier, in 1988, 49-year-old Bogdanovich married Dorothy's 20-year-old little sister Louise Stratten in a dubious childless marriage that ended in divorce in 2001 (notably, as depicted in the film, Snider was already 'grooming' Louise when she was just a little girl). While Fosse was a philandering man, he certainly never reached the degeneracy of overrated auteur Bogdanovich who not coincidentally did a great job portraying a sleazy Hebraic psychiatrist on The Sopranos. If anyone can learn anything from the Stratten sisters, it is that girls abandoned by their fathers make easy prey for predators, especially if they are young, dumb, and beautiful.

As his films surely demonstrate, Bob Fosse was a considerably haunted and self-loathing man and while looking around a club on Sunset Boulevard during the production of Star 80 he even went so far as to confess, "I'm going to die in one of these places. Here's where I was born." While Fosse did not croak in a pile of his own vomit in some sleazy strip club surrounded by topless hags with saggy tits, he did, not unlike his semi-autobiographical character in All That Jazz (1979), succumb to a heart attack and, rather fittingly, it was in the arms of his own virtual Dorothy Stratten, Gwen Verdon, whose career he made and (at least in his own mind) he never got enough credit for. Indeed, Verdon was Fosse's wife-cum-muse and the auteur acted as the director-choreographer for both the stage and film musicals she was best known for, including Damn Yankees! (1958) directed by Stanley Donen and George Abbott. As to what Fosse actually thought about the uxoricidal necrophile of his film, he would state, "Paul Snider was a guy who seemed a product of the sort of shallowness that comes from buying hook, line, and sinker the slick-magazine philosophy of what the American male should have. That is, if you have the right kind of car or the right kind of clothes, learn people's names, learn how to say hello charmingly, and all that, then the world will be your oyster." While I agree with Fosse to a degree, I believe he is bit too generous in his assessment of the semitic souteneur. After all, Snider came from a fucked family that, fulfilling the worst sort of racial stereotypes and surely using Talmudic reasoning, successfully petitioned a court to grant them all the assets of both Snider and Stratten after the murder-suicide because the Playmate died first and thus her homicidal hubby technically 'inherited' her wealth. Speaking of strange familial connections, Bogdanovich virtually unwittingly predicted the casting of Star 80 when he opted to include a rather dark passage from female lead Mariel Hemingway's grandfather Ernest Hemingway's popular antiwar novel A Farewell to Arms (1929) as the epitaph on Stratten's grave marker.

While All That Jazz is a painfully personal film that makes Fosse seem like a self-destructive blackhole that sucks up everyone and everything around him, Star 80 is arguably even more uniquely unflattering, albeit in a considerably more cryptic fashion. Indeed, as Martin Gottfried argued in his biography, “In STAR 80,’ John Kander said, ‘Bob was saying the same thing he was saying in CHICAGO. That everything sexual is disgusting, [but] I never knew him well enough to understand what demons he was exorcising.’ Perhaps the demon was sexual guilt. Perhaps STAR 80 was an exorcism of that demon, or perhaps it was an expression of his anger with Hollywood and its failure to make him a movie star. Perhaps finally, in some way, he was linking both of these major themes of his life as reflections of the qualities that he feared might be discovered within himself: shallowness, fraudulence, a self who, like Paul Snider, he secretly believed was cheap, unmanly, incompetent, and unlovable. Riff.” Indeed, it is certainly hard to believe a heterosexual man would be such a great dancer, musical-theatre choreographer, and theatre director and it surely is not particularly traditionally masculine that he would utilize such feminine skills to woo women. Of course, one cannot also forget that Fosse was forced to experience being molested by much older predatory woman to establish such a career, which is certainly something that probably haunted him for the rest of his life. Indeed, as Gottfried also argued, “...what emerges in sharp focus in STAR 80 is Fosse’s inclination to blame public sex—as if something had to be blamed—for private lust [...] But there is so much shabby sex in STAR 80 that even with the PLAYBOY sensibility as a theme, it seems excessive. Yet the brilliance of the movie, its power, probably could never have been achieved without the crass sex. It is as if the exorcism of Bob Riff required an overdose on sleaze.” Of course, ‘Bob Riff’ is the stage-name used as a teenager when he was being molested by slutty strippers. As a victim of a group of virtual female Paul Sniders, Fosse ultimately learned to become a Paul Snider himself, at least in his own troubled mind.

Not surprisingly, lead Eric Robert go into Brando-esque method-acting-mode during the filming of Star 80 to the point where he became a sort of demonic composite of both Snider and Fosse, which is apparent during the film, or as Gottfried explained, “As Dorothy’s assurance grows, Paul’s cracks. He changes his style and goes Hollywood in a clothing-store scene, putting together snakeskin boots, gold chains, and an unmistakable Fosse costume of black—black shirts, black pants. He would wear Fosse black for the rest of the film as STAR 80 begins its ascent to climax, and with full rhythmic music Fosse makes this wordless costuming scene into a virtual dance number.” Naturally, Fosse went further than making Roberts dress like him, or as the actor explained in Gottfried’s book, “He educated me on the life of the strip clubs. He wanted me to know it wasn’t about fucking, that every stripper who was a ‘lifer’—that’s what he called them—has the same issues as children who were molested. Bob believed that. He wanted me to know that this guy [Snider] had expertise, that this guy, if he weren’t a psychopath, would have been hugely successful.” And Fosse was successful because he was not a psychopath, but an inordinately sensitive man that could empathize with the damaged dames that both preyed on him and were assumedly preyed on themselves. As someone that has dated (ex)strippers and victims of molestation, I can safely say that Star 80 left a sick feeling in my stomach and reminded me of why it would be a blessing if both Hollywood and the entire so-called adult entertainment industry became the object of a complete scorched-earth policy. While Paul Snider only killed Stratten and (thankfully) himself, one can only imagine how many souls he destroyed during his short pathetic life via sexual exploitation as a pimp.

Notably, Star 80 begins with a potent opening credits sequence featuring glossy pin-up shot of Hemingway-as-Stratten juxtaposed with the tragic heroine stating to a journalist, “PLAYBOY’s motto is the girl next door. They look for girls that are wholesome and fresh and young and naïve. They look for all of that. So most of those girls do have that type of background.” During this same sequence, a journalist can be heard asking Stratten’s teenage sister, “Would you like to be just like your sister when you grow up?” and she replies, “Yeah. Because I’m proud of her.” Undoubtedly, in this opening credit sequence before the film has really even started, Fosse has established a clear anti-Hollywood/anti-porn message where both Hollywood and Playboy are blamed for the seduction and, in turn, sleazy sexual debasement of youth who come to believe that flashing their boobs and beaver will lead to fame and fortune. Of course, Fosse, who dreamed of being the next Fred Astaire as a child, knew this all too well and he paid the ultimate price, but luckily it at least eventually resulted in great films like All That Jazz and Star 80 where the shady side of show business begins to resemble a sort of metaphysical hell that not even the gloss and glitter, which the auteur’s films have plenty of, can disguise the pangs of debasement and spiritual destitution. In some ways, one could even argue that Stratten’s death was an unintentional mercy killing as the beauty at least never had the opportunity to degenerate into a forsaken creature like self-slaughtering porn diva Shauna Grant or harpy-like ‘Me Too’ messiah Rose McGowan. Indeed, whereas McGowan now seems seriously possessed by some sort of fiercely demonic feminist force and (at least, to me) is quite hard to even look at due to her crazy-dead-eyes despite once being quite beautiful in her early films like Gregg Araki’s The Doom Generation (1995), Stratten followed in the tradition of James Dean and will remain forever young and beautiful.

As for Fosse, Star 80—a film that the auteur expected would win him an Oscar—was so severely savaged by both film critics and former allies alike that the filmmaker decided to give up on filmmaking altogether and never directed another film. Indeed, bitch boy Andrew Sarris went so far as describing it as “one of the most glumly misogynous movies ever produced on this continent” with “The gruesome ending, particularly, is the biggest treat for women-haters this side of the underground snuff circuit.” A notorious beta, Sarris, who was not a bad film critic, seems to be projecting his own fantasies and/or conflicted feelings onto the film, as Star 80 derives its singular pro-female/anti-Hollywood majesty by devastatingly depicting the destruction of what Bogdanovich once somewhat rightly described as a 'unicorn' as Dorothy Stratten was a woman that was so strikingly statuesque and pure in her pulchritude that here mere presence in Galaxina (1980) is the sole thing that makes such stupendously stupid sci-fi-cat watchable. Undoubtedly, what Sarris and other critics of the film cannot deal with is being forced to confront the fact that such a breathless beauty was so savagely murdered and defiled in the dream realm of Hollyweird in an aesthetically flavorsome film that utilizes a slick Playboy perfect style to underscore such frivolous post-sexual liberation fantasies of fame and fortune. Indeed, to fully embrace a film like Star 80 one must reject the lies of feminism, sexual liberation, and Hollywood and accept a certain cultural cynicism where the exploitation and commodification of feminine beauty is seen as something virtually satanic and ultimately anti-human. After all, the greatest celebration of Dorothy Stratten's beauty would have been if she had children with a similarly attractive man (as opposed to unattractive kosher comen like Snider and Bogdanovich) and not as the heavily edited subject of a semen-soiled porno mag that some pussy-starved loser used as a quick masturbation aid. In that sense, I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that Fosse's film is the greatest thing to come from Stratten's life as a nearly cinematically immaculate warning on the perils of the road to stardom in a Der Stürmer-esque Sodom where girls must be virtual gorgons if they hope to survive, let alone thrive.

-Ty E

RAPE SQUAD

Bob Kelljan (1974)

Supporting a collective of multicultural femme fatales and heavy misogynist themes throughout, Rape Squad is an exploitation piece of unnerving potential but never fills through. The depictions of rape aren't well executed in the slightest but the scenario of being forced to sing "Jingle Bells" while getting sodomized by a man in a hockey mask is enough to leave women scrambling for a registration sheet for self-defense classes. Rape Squad was filmed 9 years before the title Friday the 13th even became synonymous with hockey masks and slashings so a bit of horror legend is originated within the confines of this pre-Charlie's Angels feminist classic. Director Bob Kelljan even went as far as to direct numerous episodes of Charlie's Angels. Maybe to wash away the shame of directing a film called Rape Squad. Taking a film called Rape Squad and marketing it as such is a rather risky move. A title like this is sure to offend everyone from rape victims to mothers to even rapists themselves as the film highlights a rape-busting group of women in shades with Dolemite-worthy martial arts moves. The "men are scum" philosophy doesn't entirely work in this film allowing for a gap in themes. It's almost as if Kelljan directed the first half, went on a brief hiatus, then came back after experiencing a life-altering situation. Rape is a fickle act and offers much beauty behind the curtains of cinema if filmed correctly. In place of portraying the lustful act of love as something glamorized and fluorescent, Kelljan films the act of rape to be fueled by cowardice, lack of machismo, complex-driven, and sleazy beyond comprehension. With all fairness to victims, this is how it should be displayed. Or should it? After a man in a hockey mask and orange jumpsuit rapes an innocent and beautiful girl, she goes to the cops with a profile looking that of an ex-member of Slipknot. Rather than providing any help because cops are evil in film and never "really try," Linda meets with the other victims and decides to put together a rag-tag anti-rape squad that erupts with the film's only true moments of color: Scenes in which the group humiliate sexual deviants by way of embarrassingly choreographed martial arts. I take that back; to even call this a form of "arts" is a rash decision by itself. The fight sequences go as far as to appear improvised. The resulting experiment is a film that flip flops between gender politics faster than "Madonna's reinventions". In one scene, women will be domineering their lovers and practicing misandry boldly but then will pull a 180° and begin to glorify the act of sexual assault and apply more texture to these men as being an innocent gender fueled mostly on humor. In the end, it feels like the women come out below the rapist. This blame can be laid on a scene where two men joke about rape in front of a victim. Harmless joke, right? Who knew that the female would "flip a shit" in what would soon become the most ridiculous scene ever to try and squander sympathy votes. For Tarantino's "ode" to the grindhouse cinema, the troupe of stuntwomen featured in Death Proof can be traced back to the malnourished presentation of Rape Squad. For an exploitation film, my standards weren't particularly high for Rape Squad but this demonstration of "How far can I go?" proved to be an amusing experience, one that I can recommend to fans of anything that would have the gusto of featuring "rape" in the title. I don't regret watching Rape Squad but the idea of watching this film again doesn't exactly appeal to my senses. Rape is filmed as an act in acts. This is only a taste of the irony delivered in Rape Squad. Some women get over it faster than others and with good reason. The struggle for growth subsides and the female psyche seems to shut down. Over-exaggeration might be the case but Rape Squad is the last film you'd want to use as an analytical piece to research rape. Overall, this experiment in bad taste speaks of many subjects but doesn't really shine on any one. Expect a cluttered mess of enjoyable sleaze and over dramatic acting. Thank god for the nudity.

RAPE SQUAD

-mAQ

NEO-NAZI SATANISM

Bob Larson (???)

Neo-Nazi Satanism is without doubt the most important crisis that helpless Americans must face in the future. Forget about AIPAC lobby, Obama-nation, or international terrorism, Neo-Nazi Satanism is the one spreading cancer that must be exorcised out of our beautiful multicultural nation. Although a self-confessed atheist, white revolutionary James Mason is a supporter of Charles Manson and has ties with the Church of Satan. Thankfully, cautious Christian gentleman and Televangelist Bob Larson has made a career out of exposing (and exploiting) evil heretics like James Mason. In the short documentary Neo-Nazi Satanism, Bob Larson assaults James Mason with rounds of Jesus love and promises of eternal damnation via the boiling pits of hell, where according to the Talmud (as mentioned by Mason), Jesus Christ is boiling in excrement.

It becomes apparent during Neo-Nazi Satanism that Bob Larson seems to have at least a little bit of respect for James Mason. Larson informs Mason that he looks like he could be a low-level lawyer, Baptist preacher, or even gym teacher (I don't agree with that one). It also becomes apparent in Neo-Nazi Satanism that James Mason is at least a couple notches more intelligent than the rabid barking poodle Bob Larson. It is obvious that both men have their own particular ethos, which makes them of better moral character than the majority of the American citizens. Both James Mason and Bob Larson throw arguments at each other that become more and more predictable as the documentary goes on, but Mason is much cooler in his delivery whereas Larson's head seems like it might explode at any moment like that dude in David Cronenberg's Scanners. Larson also likes repeating racial slurs in such a loud and obnoxious manner that one might start questioning his true vaudevillian agenda.

Neo-Nazi Satanism also features a variety of hilarious calls from listeners. One girl tells Butthole-Bob Larson that he is racist against skinheads and Neo-Satanism, therefore he is racist in his own way. A Jew with a very non-Jewish redneck accent calls and claims he will single-handedly prevent an American Holocaust of his Judaic tribe. I especially enjoyed the remarks of a caller who claims that James Mason and Adolf Hitler must have deformed brains because even retards know the difference between right and wrong. Bob Larson seems a little confused on how to respond to this verbally barbaric caller. I seriously doubt Jesus was watching over Bob Larson or any of his callers.

Bob Larson also shows his knack for hitting all the low-blows. He asks James Mason when he last cried and Mason gives Bob some very sound advice about how if he cried for every bad thing in the world, he would never stop crying. It seems hard for Bob Larson to grasp the idea of getting a pair of balls and dealing with life in a more respectable manner, even if it is being a white power terrorist. All in all, I feel that James Mason was a much better and rational teacher than

NEO-NAZI SATANISM

Bob Larson. That is ok for Bob Larson though, because Bob knows he has already won the hearts and cash of his faithful idiotic listeners.

-Ty E

COME AND SEE

Bob Sarles (2004)

Despite the incessant demonizing and parodying of the Nazis in Hollywood films, very few of these films are even remotely responsible in regards to presenting objective facts. I cannot count the number of times I have seen well dressed blonde beasts in SS uniforms in Hollywood films tormenting ghettoized Jews for the mere delight. Of course, such crimes and atrocities occurred but not nearly as much as the Hollywood Zionist hate-machine would have you believe. Hollywood never really lets the viewer know the virtual hell on earth that the typical Eastern European Slav had to face during World War II. Thankfully, a couple Soviet filmmakers took it upon themselves to recreate the atrocities committed during the Nazi occupation of Eastern Europe. In the 1985 Soviet masterpiece Come and See directed by Elem Klimov, one gets a very realistic view regarding the Waffen-SS occupation of Byelorussia SSR, which upon conclusion will no doubt haunt the viewer for many years to come.

Oskar Dirlewanger

One aspect of World War II that very few people know about is the fact the Germany's most deadly military forces, The Waffen-SS divisions, were made up of mostly (around 60%) non-Germans. Aside from allowing fellow Nordic Aryans (Dutch, Norwegians, etc.) to fight for Germany, The Waffen-SS would later include (out of desperation) various nonwhite divisions composed of Indians, Arabs, Slavs (who were mostly considered European/Asiatic hybrids) and Tatars. Out of all of these non-Aryan untermensch divisions, the most degenerate and despicable was probably SS-Sturmbrigade "Dirlewanger" which was commanded by convicted sex criminal and soldier genius Dr. Oskar Dirlewanger. Despite holding a doctorate in political science and holding down a decent teaching job, Herr Dirlewanger could not keep his hands off little girls which resulted in his imprisonment in a plush concentration camp. Fortunately for dirty Dirlewanger, he was butt buddies with a comrade who also happened to be friends with Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler. Asiatic-looking SS leader Heinrich Himmler granted Dirlewanger a swift release from his temporary home at a concentration camp and eventually Dirlewanger had command of his own Waffen-SS division. SS-Sturmbrigade "Dirlewanger", like Oskar Dirlewanger himself, was composed of criminals from concentration camps as well as homosexuals, Gypsies, mental institution patients, Slavs, and various other undesirable rabble fighters for Uncle Adolf's Reich.

The film Come and See is loosely based on the killing sprees committed by Oskar Dirlewanger's degenerate criminal commandos in Byelorussia. The film follows a young boy named Florya who joins up with Soviet partisans in defending virtually medieval-like peasant villages. Florya reminds me of a friend of mine whose father escaped from Eastern Europe after the Second World War.

COME AND SEE

Like my friend, despite his fair hair and pasty white skin, Florya (like a lot of Slavs) has a slightly Asiatic appearance, surely the result of the numerous Mongol invasions that occurred in Eastern Europe throughout history. The great American writer Ambrose Bierce once satirically defined Russians as "A person with a Caucasian body and a Mongolian soul" in his book The Devil's Dictionary but I think he was being too generous in his description of Slavic phenotypes. Although a lot of Slavic men tend to be aesthetically displeasing, the women seem to be some of the most beautiful in the world. After being left by himself at a partisan training camp, wandering the woods, Florya meets the Slavic beauty Glasha. In the scorched earth world of Come and See, Glasha seems to be the only white light that has reached Florya's petrified eyes. In one particularly beautiful and surreal scene, Glasha dances exquisitely on a small box in the rain, providing Florya with a small sense of joy and allowing him to forget (for a small moment) that Dirlewanger's army of vicious mentally defective criminals are just around the corner.

I must admit that Come and See is easily one of the best (if not the best) paced films that I have had the honor of viewing. Throughout the film, Florya comes upon various scenes of Dirlewanger-esque atrocities. As Come and See progresses, the fear and disillusionment in Florya's eyes becomes more apparent until at the end of the film his horrified face resembles that of a man being burnt alive, carrying a similar expression to those burnt corpse photographs taken after the Anglo-American firebombing campaign in Dresden Germany. Come and See essentially chronicles the spiritual death of a young boy who is forced by circumstance to grow to be a soldier in just a couple days. The infamous Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger said it best when he wrote, "Innocence is ignorance. To know and remain innocent would be the highest" as by the end of Come and See, Florya has certainly lost his innocence and has taken up the rifle as his new mission from God.

What finally changes Florya from an inquisitive young boy into a driven soldier is when he becomes a human plaything of Dirlewanger's SS men. Despite seeing various carnage and the suffering victims of Nazi atrocities, it is not until he becomes a victim of Dirlewanger barbarism that he becomes a true believer and fighter for the Soviet Partisan cause. During the pillaging and burning of a small village, Florya becomes completely aware of the depravity and remorselessness that can consume his fellow human beings. Those that do not know that Come and See was inspired by the atrocities committed by the Dirlewanger crew might find the acting exaggerated as the soldiers commit atrocities with a spirit of sadistic glee. Florya even finds himself as a possible subject featured in a Waffen-SS photo album when a German soldier places his Luger across the temple of the horrified boy's head in a peculiar yet viciously powerful pose for a photograph. Despite most of the villagers being burned alive in their community church, Florya manages to escape the ordeal (at least physically) unscathed.

By the end of Come and See, Florya is drunk with bloodlust for revenge. After seeing that Soviet Partisans have captured a group of the Waffen-SS men that were responsible for destroying the village and its inhabitants, Florya hands his Soviet comrades gasoline so that the enemy soldiers can be engulfed in a miniature Holocaust. Most of the Waffen-SS men and their Byelorussian collaborators plead for their lives, including an elderly German who talks about how he is a decent man and a loving Grandfather. Disgusted with the older officer's cowardice, a young and handsome soldier puts an end to these laughable peace relations. This young Nazi officer is no doubt a true believer as described by Eric Hoffer and lets the Slavs know that he feels they are an inferior race that needs to be exterminated (starting with the children) as they spread the plague of international untermensch bolshevism. Naturally, the enraged Slavs act accordingly but unfortunately for Florya, he does not get to utilize his gasoline as he had hoped.

Come and See would be the last film directed by Russian auteur Elem Klimov. A couple years before directing the film, Klimov lost his wife Larisa Shepitko, also a filmmaker, in a tragic car accident. Shepitko directed her own World War II film The Ascent (1976), which also happened to be her last completed film as a director. Unlike Come and See, The Ascent has a fairly bleak and nihilistic message, showing the hopeless weakness of individuals during war times. Despite all the misery and atrocities featured in Come and See, the film still carries a message of fighting till the bitter end. Elem Klimov had most of Come and See shot on a Steadicam, giving the film an authenticity that makes the film feel all the more chilling. Klimov was also looking for an extreme realism with the wardrobe as most of the SS uniforms were originals from World War II, as was the weaponry and real live ammunition fired throughout the film. Next to the dismay and arduous realism of Klimov's Come and See, Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List feels like a glossy dystopian action film, full of pointless sentimentalism and contrived emotions. If there ever was a war film that could truly capture the horrors of war, Come and See is that film.

-Ty E

NOT A LOVE STORY: A FILM ABOUT PORNOGRAPHY
NOT A LOVE STORY: A FILM ABOUT PORNOGRAPHY

Bonnie Sherr Klein (1981)

Admittedly, I have less respect for the opinions and experiences of feminist Jewesses than that of elderly ex-felon negro janitors or Vietnamese nail salon beauticians who moonlight as a giver of a “special massages,” so the last thing I would want to see is a documentary directed by frigid sexless Semitic misandrists of the oftentimes Sapphic sort, yet I could not help but watch the literally and figuratively cunt Canadian agitprop piece Not a Love Story: A Film About Pornography (1981) aka Not a Love Story: A Motion Picture About Pornography directed by Judaic femi-bolshevik documentarian and cripple rights advocate Bonnie Sherr Klein. My interest in seeing the decidedly deluded doc came after discovering that it was ironically once banned in the province of Ontario due to its pornographic content despite its overt anti-porn message. Directed by the mother of the much more famous but no less radically repugnant Jewish socialist feminist writer Naomi Klein (who is notable for her anti-Zionist stance, even once stating regarding the Israeli’s treatment of Palestinians, “[Some Jews] even think we get one get-away-with-genocide-free-card”), Not a Love Story is a sometimes unintentionally humorous schadenfreude-packed example of a hysterical Hebraic feminist complaining about a world she and her Adorno-adoring people helped sire via their promotion of so-called sexual revolution, women’s liberation, and Marcusian cultural Marxism. Featuring real porn starlets, strippers, and fuck show performers doing what they do best and discussing their unconventional forms of employment, as well as a variety of largely Hebraic and uniquely sexually unappealing feminists and neurosis-driven far-left-wing nuts that are intentionally misleadingly introduced with generic labels like “writer/poet” as if the doc was not mostly a yuppie affair and did not have more hysterical heebbs than a Jewish wedding, giving their opinion on the proliferation of porn in the post-counterculture age, Not a Love Story is patently preposterous pornographic anti-porn that ironically proves to be a nostalgic experience for fans of ‘porn chic’ aka the Golden Age of Porn. A Canadian government-funded work that was produced by Studio D—a now-defunct feminist/lesbian branch of the National Film Board of Canada founded in 1974 that was the first government-funded film studio dedicated to ‘women’ (aka kosher carpet-munchers) filmmakers and is probably best known for the dyke doc Forbidden Love: The Unashamed Stories of Lesbian Lives (1992) co-directed by Sapphic Semites Lynne Fernie and Aerlyn Weissman—Klein’s 69-minute doc (I wonder if the running time was intentional?!) is like a pornographic pseudo-arthouse exploitation montage as molested by the pathologically pedantic pseudo-intellectual musings of various largely downright ugly, swarthy, and hairy self-stylized feminist true believers who seem more than a little bit irked by the fact that men can gawk at hot women they themselves would like to defile but would never ever get the opportunity given that they are physically and mentally revolting hags on a self-righteous ego-trip. Indeed, the great thing about Not a Love Story is that unless you're a man-hating feminist dyke, spiritually castrated male feminist, or brainwashed college student who thinks they are progressive because some limp-wristed college professor defecated on their brain, the doc will either reinforce your revulsion of everything feminist or will inspire you to hate feminists if you don't already do.

Opening with a conspicuously contrived scene where so-called 'eco-feminist' Susan Griffin self-righteously proclaims that the Valentine's Day edition of Hustler magazine is an example of "pornography revealing itself" because it features "the heart imprisoned, the heart on its knees" via its playful pictorials of women in bondage, Not a Love Story immediately establishes itself as not an objective film but as a polemical and misandristic hate-fueled movie manifesto where high-strung Hebraic hags invade pornographic realms, visiting Toronto, Los Angeles, 42nd Street in NYC, etc. From there, Klein enters the red light district of Ontario and narrates, "A woman's contortions...a woman that could be me. On the streets around me, women's bodies are offered for fantasy. Everywhere, illusions are for sale. I need to understand what is going on behind these doors and how it affects my own life." Of course, the woman would NEVER be Klein as no man, no matter how desperate, would want to see her unclad 'contortions' (or lack thereof), let alone partake in some sort of sexual act with her unless they had some bizarre fetish for frigid femicunts. The central subject of the doc, if there is one aside from the hairy-armed director, is a confident, charming, cute, and quirky stripper named Linda Lee Tracey aka "Fonda Peters" who Klein states of, "When I met Linda, I admired her comfort with her sexuality, but I discovered she was also asking questions about pornography." Tracey loves making her living doing a parody-based comedic strip routine where she playfully mocks her sleazy male patrons and she describes how she once attended a feminist anti-porn rally where the feminists treated her in a blatantly condescending fashion by saying things to her like "oh, poor you" thus leading her to come to the conclusion that these ostensible women's rights advocates had the same opinion of her as the most misogynistic of men, or as she states herself, "It's the same line men are using. Women are stupid." Of course, as Not a Love Story ultimately demonstrates, Tracey is one of the few smart, semi-sensible, and likeable women in the entire film, as she is not fueled by hatred or resentment, but a genuine intellectual desire to investigate the workings and motivations behind the sex industry. Indeed, the major difference between the feminists and so-called 'sex workers' (to use a convenient yet retarded politically correct phrase) aside from the glaring contrast in terms of attractiveness is that while the former group is discernibly sexually neurotic and quite bitter about it, not to mention pathetically pretentious, the latter group is quite confident and unpretentious.

In one of the more incriminating segments of the documentary, blonde British female porn photographer and director Suze Randall is interviewed and states regarding her erotic works, "I certainly don't look for a deep meaning in this." Later in the doc, Randall personally lubes up Linda Lee Tracey's pussy with a Q-tip for a photo shoot, which is shown in graphic detail, as if to demonstrate that the photographer is a devilish defiler and manipulator who exploits girl's pussies for profit. When Canadian porn magazine publisher David S. Wells is interviewed, he does not hold back blaming sexual liberation as resulting in the rise of pornography as he feels that the movement resulted in the emasculation of males. In Wells' mind, porn is a tool, albeit a rather pathetic one, that men use to reaffirm their masculinity. Needless to say, Klein seems more than a little bit annoyed when Wells states, "the greatest turn-on for a man is having a woman kneeling at his feet performing fellatio" and "men don't want to be equal to women...simple as that." In one of the more pathetic sections of the doc, a bisexual Jewish ex-porn star named Marc Stevens (real name Martin Feldman), who starred in porn chic classics like Gerard Damiano's The Devil in Miss Jones (1973) and Radley Metzger's The Private Afternoons of Pamela Mann (1974) and appeared in both straight and sodomite fuck flicks (he was even once photographed by gay S&M/BDSM photographer Robert Mapplethorpe), makes the dubious claim that he got out of porn because he felt that it was "degrading to women" and then he cries about how he had various sex partners that had too high of expectations for him in terms of virility because they had seen him in porn flicks. Notably, Stevens would get back into porn after the release of Not a Love Story and, according to his porn star ex-girlfriend Sandi Foxx, committed suicide via hanging in 1989 after contracting AIDS. Stevens sees things quite differently from a trashy chick named Patrice Lucas who is the daughter of a hooker and who stars in live sex shows with her black husband Rick Lucas, who claims that white businessmen would get turned on seeing a negro defile a small white girl, even encouraging him during his show by shouting things like, "fuck her...hurt her...get it." Somewhat strangely (or maybe not so considering all the homos in hetero hardcore flicks), Lucas, like Stevens, seems fairly faggy.

NOT A LOVE STORY: A FILM ABOUT PORNOGRAPHY

In one of the most hilarious scenes of Not a Love Story, pudgy ogre-like Jewish radical feminist and prominent 'yippie' (Yiddish + hippie) Robin Morgan is interviewed while in the company of her preteen son, future musician Blake Morgan, and self-described "gay husband" Kenneth Pitchford, who is a founding member of the patently pathetic male feminist 'Effeminiist Movement.' While spiritual eunuch Pitchford the bitch boy listens intently while sporting an exceedingly gay scarf, Morgan unleashes the following rant that reveals her decided disillusionment with the outcome of the sexual liberation that she endorsed: "When people speak of the quote 'Sexual Revolution' in the 60s or the 70s, I think what they mean is what Marcuse prophesied as 'repressive tolerance' and, that is, more and more proliferation of superficial sex, kinky sex, and appurtenances and toys and things to first benumb the sensuality...the normal human sensuality and then, once it is comatose, you need greater and greater stimuli to supposedly wake it into life, none of which has to do with the subtleties of eroticism, of love, of affection, of amiable communication.” Of course, one has to wonder how a woman married to a gay man experiences “normal human sensuality” and the “subtleties of eroticism, of love, of affection, of amiable communication,” but then again, Morgan is so manly that maybe she and her proudly effete husband sexually compliment one another. In what is easily the most absurd statement and flagrant flat-out lie made in the entire doc, Morgan claims that the first thing that the Nazis did upon invading Poland was flooding the country with pornography, thus underscoring her classic irrational Jewish victim mentality, as well as the innate role her Jewishness plays in her subversive politics. Later on in the documentary, Morgan declares that men should be actively shamed for indulging in porn and absurdly claims that she believes this because she “loves men so much.” Like the true born cuckold that he is, Pitchford comforts his wife Morgan while she literally cries about her hatred for porn.

Seemingly increasingly brainwashed by Klein’s anti-porn crusade, Linda Lee Tracey does an improvised anti-porn street sermon in front of a porn theater where she speaks of “nameless holes” and gets in an argument with a poor negro who claims she is “hurting other women” by “downing them” due to their careers in the sex industry. In what is probably the most glaring and shameless example of sensational and just plain stupid propaganda in the doc, Klein zooms in on the poorly drawn homemade swastika and SS tattoos on the hand of a porn patron in what is ultimately not the first but the second pathetic attempt in the film to somehow absurdly link pornography with National Socialism, as if the sex industry was not largely a Yiddish affair. In a rather incriminating scene where she unwittingly reveals that radical feminism is her own warped brand of religion, lesbo eco-feminist Susan Griffin declares that porn is the “opposite of religious worship” because it involves “desecration of the woman’s body.” Personally, as a man, I have to disagree, as I have met far too many fellows who have worshiped a woman they did not even know with more devotion than the average Sunday school patron or typical family man who goes to church on the weekend in a half-hearted attempt to atone for his porn addiction. In another one of the seemingly endless interviews with Hebraic intellectuals featured towards the end of Not a Love Story, Klein interviews a psychologist named Edward Donnerstein who argues about the desensitizing effects of porn and how it apparently portrays male-on-female rape as good yet male-on-male rape is portrayed as bad in films like John Boorman’s Deliverance (1972) in a scene featuring quite admittedly erotic footage of a woman performing fellatio on a handgun in the background. Of course, the thing that Donnerstein leaves out is that while most women seem to have rape fantasies and enjoy rough and violent sex from time to time (I say this not as a result of something I have read, but from personal experience), no man aside from the occasional queer masochist fantasizes about being anally pillaged. Towards the end of the doc, director Klein complains, "The research of the film exposed me to the worst of human existence and the kind of sadness that came from seeing the kind of pornography that I was seeing for the first time." Personally, I found more of the "worst of human existence" in the Hebraic talking heads than the hardcore starlets.

NOT A LOVE STORY: A FILM ABOUT PORNOGRAPHY

Despite Not a Love Story concluding on a somewhat positive note where it seems like central subject Linda Lee Tracey has seen the error of her ways as a stripper and has fully embraced feminism, the stripper was actually so annoyed with the distorted and one-sided way director Bonnie Sherr Klein depicted her in the documentary that she decided to become not only a documentarian, but also reporter, writer, and producer herself, as she felt the need to portray the objective truth instead of titillating agitprop twaddle. Indeed, one also has to wonder what Klein was thinking when she decided to include a long close-up shot of Tracey's pussy near the end of the film under the ostensible purpose of 'documenting exploitation,' as if the film is really just crypto-carpet-muncher porn disguised as an artsy farsty feminist political documentary as a work where estrogen-deprived feminists ultimately get to have their cunt and eat it too due to its combination of pornographic imagery and anti-male-mania. Admittedly, I agree with some of the points that were made in the doc, mainly that pornography desensitizes certain people, warps their view of sexuality, and incapacitates their ability to have normal sexual relationships. Indeed, I can think of a number of people I have known who got addicted to pornography before they ever even lost their virginity and I cannot even fathom the sort of fucked fetishes the younger generations that grew up with the internet have developed before they could even jerk off, but of course the deleterious effects of hardcore fuck flicks on human sexuality and relationships certainly pales in comparison to that of feminism and the sexual revolution, hence the proliferation of the porn industry in the first place as is discussed by one of the porn publishers in Klein's doc.

Brainwashed by post-Freudian kosher commie garbage like Wilhelm Reich's The Mass Psychology of Fascism (1933) and Marcuse's Eros and Civilization (1955) that argued using the same old Judeo-bolshevik scam of pitting the poor goyim against the rich goyim that the prole libido needed to be liberated by 'repressive' western civilization, Klein and her friends in the doc are the very same sort of people that fought to pave the way for the wanton world depicted in Not a Love Story, thus their criticisms seem conspicuously absurd and highly hypocritical. Notably, the film was made during the so-called "Porn Wars" aka "Feminist Sex Wars" of the late-1970s through early-1980s that hilariously destroyed the second-wave feminist movement when 'anti-porn feminists' like Klein and her comrades waged war against 'sex-positive feminists' after morbidly obese Judaic dyke Andrea 'sex is rape' Dworkin organized a protest in NYC in 1976 against the absolutely worthless exploitation flick Snuff (1976) co-directed by Michael and Roberta Findlay. While Klein mentions in Not a Love Story that the porn industry was partly mafia-run, she predictably does not dare to make reference to the fact that the porn industry is and always was a largely Judaic industry influenced just as much by monetary motivations as the desire to undermine the country's largely white Christian majority's morality, yet Hebraic radical feminist Robin Morgan actually has the chutzpah to make the patently preposterous projection that the Nazis spread pornography as a weapon in some pernicious Aryan master plan. Had Klein wanted to make something resembling a semi-objective documentary tackling the harmful aspects of porn, she should have interviewed intelligent members of her tribe involved in the porn industry like porn pioneer Al Goldstein and longtime veteran performers like Jamie Gillis and Annie Sprinkle, but instead she intentionally opted to interview poor and uneducated shiksa chicks that she could easily manipulate as well as depict in a degrading fashion that makes it seem like most women in the industry have no clue what they are doing and are being manipulated by misogynistic males who have malicious motives other than wanting to make tons of money, like using porn as a way to use "violence against women" or whatever. Either way, I can sleep comfortably knowing that Not a Love Story probably influenced more people to have sex and masturbate than adopt warped feminist views.

-Ty E

THE DEADLY CAMP
THE DEADLY CAMP

Bowie Lau (1999)

The Deadly Camp is more of a percentage of Anthony Wong's acting roles rather than its own film with a soul. He brings life to otherwise dead films. See also: The Mummy: Tomb of the Dragon Emperor. The Deadly Camp is a rehashing of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre mixed with hillbilly/inbred camp to create a film that would love to cover psycho-sexual territory with its implied father-son virility. Just because this film isn't great doesn't mean it lacks branches of favorable material. The Deadly Camp follows a group of picture-perfect couples taking a vacation on a lonely island. With about 9 people, personalities are a generally mixed bag sans the stereotypical "goofy" Asian displayed with enough screen time to span 4 characters. The females acting is rather abysmal seeing as they are just a tool to provide flesh to the Dependant relationship. That leaves us to Anthony Wong which, as you know, is an amazing character actor and plays the pervert pimp named Boar. This is another classic example of how Asia mimics much of American horror. And to think people actually believe Asia is the only source for original horror now-a-days? I scoff at the mere thought of that. The Deadly Camp is celluloid proof of this disputed claim. The film is so cluttered with nonsense and derivative character development that it almost offends me. The character is furthest from fitting his name "Soldier". I would have liked him to be a character like Spoon from Dog Soldiers, but he dies in a pathetic attempt at heroism. In what was destined to be CAT III, this effort barely passes as Category IIB. The film doesn't demonstrate aptness in any category. Annoying characters that are a collective just to create a miniature body count and a plot that doesn't really make sense are the ingredients to make this pabulum effort. The only reason I'd ever watch this film again is for the leper maniac exercising extreme misogyny via chainsaw.

The Deadly Camp on DVD exclusively at wtfdvds.com
-mAQ

BLACK SUN

Boyd Rice (1999)

Experimental sound artist Boyd Rice seems like a cool and interesting guy. Although I cannot consider myself a huge fan of the would be “superman,” I respect what he does (whatever that actually is). I recently read the book Standing in Two Circles: The Collected Works of Boyd Rice and it seems like Mr. Rice has had an eventful life. Rice has done everything from being a Magister of the council of the nine in the Church of Satan to creating his own colorful Tiki Bar. One could say that Boyd Rice is an eclectic man with very distinct tastes. Rice has also dabbled in the “art” of experimental film making.

Black Sun is an experimental short by Boyd Rice featuring flickering and swirling swastikas for over 8 minutes. Unsurprisingly, Rice also provided the soundtrack for this EVIL NAZZZZZZZZIIIIII short. After a couple minutes of the endless erratic swastikas I found myself mesmerized. The National Socialists that took over Germany in 1933 used the swastika as a powerful image and fuhrer Adolf Hitler said of the flag, “As National Socialists, we see our program in our flag. In red, we see the social idea of the movement; in white, the nationalistic idea; in the swastika, the mission of the struggle for the victory of the Aryan man, and, by the same token, the victory of the idea of creative work.” Of course, Boyd Rice’s swastikas in Black Sun lack any powerful nationalist colors. The swastikas in the short look like ruins and are all by their lonesome lacking any type of flag. One could say the swastikas featured in Black Sun are appropriately contemporary as they mark the death of the Third Reich. Boyd Rice: Occult Neo-Futurist and fascist or Deranged artistic Carny? Black Sun has been compared to the conceptual art of con-artist Andy Warhol. Boyd Rice also happens to be a co-founder of the Unpop art movement which is known for its application of pop aesthetics, stylings, or techniques to unpopular, unpleasant, repressed or otherwise censored ideas. I don’t think it would be a stretch to say that the swastika is nowadays an unpleasant symbol. I find it interesting, however, how contemporary anti-Nazi books, films, and other propaganda sensationalize the swastika better than Boyd Rice ever could. One could say that the swastika is a bigger and more power symbol now than it was in Germany from 1933-1945. As stated before, Black Sun is a mesmerizing short film but it is also far from being a masterpiece. Initially, the film felt like the cinematic result if somehow experimental filmmaker Stan Brakage was stranded at a Nazi rally and he lost control of his bowels out of fear for his life. Black Sun has more to do with cinematic diarrhea than it does with cinematic masturbation. Albeit, this defecation doesn’t feel too bad coming out once you get used to it.

-Ty E

THE MANY MOODS OF BOYD RICE
THE MANY MOODS OF BOYD RICE

Boyd Rice (2002)

If any document presents cunning canny aesthetic terrorist Boyd Rice in a rare moment of relief from metaphysical hemorrhoids, it is his own personal VHS mix-tape The Many Moods of Boyd Rice (2002); a home-video compilation originally only released amongst the proudly untrained artist's friends, but eventually saw an official release by Predatory Instinct Productions; a precursor to Reverend Kevin I. Slaughter's Underworld Amusements. Indeed, The Many Moods of Boyd Rice might as well be called Boyd Gone Wild as the grainy vhs tape features the NON-man at the height of drunken Dionysian ecstasy; whether he is acting the dipsomaniac with Douglas P. (Death in June) and Albin Julius (Der Blutharsch) in Europa or obsessively spinning obscure thrift shop records for semi-interested bar patrons. With his epic low-budget documentary Iconoclast (2010), documentarian auteur Larry Wessel attempted to unravel the many hats and masks of Mr. Boyd, yet the deranged dilettante noise musician does an especially swell job exposing his most humble self in The Many Moods of Boyd Rice. To say that some of the scenes featured in the compilation are redundant (like a sizable fraction of Rice's musick) would be more than a little fair (like the nude succubi fans featured cowering amongst the seemingly menacing man during a photo shoot), but like all of his albums, The Many Moods of Boyd Rice has its various special moments of charismatic brilliance. Thankfully, Mr. Rice also chose to include some of his favorite scenes from Richard Wolstencroft's Pearls Before Swine (1999); a quasi-fascistic low-budget libertine action flick starring wolfsangel-obsessed artist in his most contrived and unconvincing role. In fact, Rice felt a scene of himself being flogged in the ass by a bloated and bald middle-age man in a cheap suit would make for a most captivating introduction to The Many Moods of Boyd Rice. Naturally, the compilation also features Boyd in full Satanic priest regalia on the exceptionally trashy talk show Christina discussing the merits and myths of the Church of Satan. If anything stays consistent throughout the virtual video timeline that is The Many Moods of Boyd Rice, it is Rice's chameleon-like knack for juggling many subversive and seemingly unrelated roles; an instinctive lifelong talent he explains most proudly and candidly in the RE/Search Publications video Pranks TV! (1988). If Mr. Rice has another talent that even begins to rival his ability to fit in a variety of eclectic masks, it is his scorched earth policy of burning bridges with former friends, artistic co-collaborators and girlfriends that would put Uncle Adolf to shame, hence the many missing central players from his personal story in The Many Moods of Boyd Rice and Wessel's Iconoclast.

As someone who grew creating and watching many consumer grade skate videos and horror flicks, it would not be a stretch for me to say that I felt a strange sense of Déjà vu and nostalgia while watching the totally amateurish The Many Moods of Boyd Rice. Additionally, it is quite apparent that Mr. Occult Fascist has a glaring amount of sentimentalism for the footage he compiled in The Many Moods of Boyd Rice, which is indubitably a nice change of pace for a man who ex-friend and fellow Gnostic Charles Manson described as a, "black pimp." If one was unaware of the background behind this personal peep show, one would most likely assume it was an unauthorized collection constructed over many years by a completest noise fan with an unhealthy Boyd Rice addiction, as it presents the Gnostic man-in-black in a manner that somewhat undermines his mostly deathly serious posturing. Out of all of the many moods of Boyd Rice, being piss-faced drunk is obviously the most pleasurable as exhibited in a scene in the VHS compilation where he performs an unrelenting full-frontal striptease with an unidentified female at a bar. If anyone wanted to discredit Rice's dubious reputation as a unflinching evil neo-nazi of the most despicable kind, they would just need to present The Many Moods of Boyd Rice; a personal video diary that also acts as an unintentional Achilles' heel for his various limp-wristed, left-wing witch-hunter detractors. After his fallout with Mr. Rice after devoting 6 years of his life to directing the documentary Iconoclast – a consciously hip 240 minute epic advertisement for the subversive artist and his long, uneven career – Satanic auteur Larry Wessel described his former pal in a interview as, "A lonely, cold-hearted, pretentious, hypocritical sociopath." What Wessel said may be true, but The Many Moods of Boyd Rice offers a voyeuristic and barely edited perspective that somewhat contradicts the sentiments of the UNPOP documentarian. Personal drama aside, The Many Moods of Boyd Rice is an often entertaining, but sometimes longwinded fart from Rice's rusted iron heart.

-Ty E

THE MACHINIST
THE MACHINIST

Brad Anderson (2004)

The Machinist is a Spanish "psychological thriller" starring a sickly Christian Bale. Bale looks so unhealthy that he could have easily been an extra in your typical holocaust film classic. Maybe Steven Spielberg could cast Christian Bale in a prequel to Schindler's List. But seriously, in The Machinist Christian Bale looks like a cross between Nosferatu and a concentration camp survivor. Christian Bale lost over 60 pounds for The Machinist which shows the kind of acting dedication worthy of Max Schreck's approval. After watching The Machinist, I found out the film was a Spanish production. No surprise here as the film has a different type of atmosphere that didn't feel like your typical American "psychological thriller." The Machinist director Brian Anderson certainly got the film's nightmarish feeling down. I wouldn't be surprised if Mr. Anderson studied at the film school of David Lynch. Director Brian Anderson put a lot of emphasis on mood which few directors are capable of nowadays. Christian Bale's character having the name Trevor Reznik is no surprise. The Machinist looks like it could have been a feature length Nine Inch Nails video minus pseudo-dark industrial music. Trevor Reznik, despite probably only weighing about 100 pounds, is obviously much tougher than NIN man Trent Reznor. Trevor Reznik is easily Christian Bale's most mentally deranged acting role to date. Nobody has ever denied Bale's superb performances at playing a psycho. It makes me wonder when Bale will do something crazier in his public life than just assaulting his mother and sister. The Machinist does have it's faults and a fairly weak ending. I really hope they weren't trying to make another Fight Club with this film, but my suspicious lead me to believe so. The Machinist had the potential to be a great film but is just a good film. Christian Bale gives it his all acting and director Brian Anderson, unlike most American directors, cares about actually directing. I can only assume that Fantasy Factory, the producers of the film, got in a way of the films production. Producers have a way of destroying films because they tend to hate art and love mediocrity.

-Ty E

GIANT

Brad Bird (1999)

I have been putting off my first viewing of the film Giant for sometime now. The main reason is that the film features James Dean's final performance, before he died in a car wreck a week or so after Giant finished filming. I knew before watching the film that despite it being an epic "as big as Texas", James Dean only got to play a smaller role, certainly not the lead caliber he got to play in East of Eden and Rebel Without A Cause. After all, seeing as Dean only got to play a secondary character in Giant, his performance in the film probably wouldn't even be interesting enough to deserve comparison to the two former lead roles that would immortalize him in celluloid forever. After watching the film, my prediction of James Dean's performance in Giant as being his worst and least notable of his cinematic career was certainly true. Giant also happens to be one of the most ridiculously melodramatic films that I have even seen in my life, certainly falling in line with the films Anti-Texan sentiment, a cinematic assault on the Southwestern stoicism of the Lone Star State. Giant was directed by American military propagandist George Stevens, director of the Nazi Concentration Camp footage (even helping with the footage used for the "eye for an eye" Nuremberg trials) taken after World War II and the feature The Diary of Anne Frank. To call Stevens a propagandist would be letting him off too lightly, for his films are partly responsible for the passive psychosis that has consumed the Faustian soul since the end of the World War II. George Stevens is one of the principle creators of the Holocaust Mythos which would set the standard for Steven Spielberg and others looking to milk Europe for some good ol' cash for Israel and of course the millions of Holocaust survivors. Giant has nothing to do with the Holocaust, but it is another film that attacks the Faustian man, the conquer of the world. Giant was one of the first (if not the first) Hollywood film to comment on the "racism" of Aryan Texans against poor conquered Mexicans and Indians, a message that is fairly common with Hollywood today. Pseudo-Injun hack Robert Rodriguez's upcoming pile of cinematic excrement Machete features a group of poor victim illegal alien invaders wielding Machetes against evil racist law-abiding American citizens. It should be quite the epic and such an artistically-sound picture could not exist without the legacy of George Stevens epic anti-Gringo (anti-Gringo in the organic Gringo sense, not in the deracinated self-loathing "progressive" liberal Gringo sense) piece Giant. For such a giant Texas epic as Giant, one would expect the most stoic and heroic of cowboys as the lead protagonist. Of course, with a director like George "The Indian (his real-life nickname)" Stevens, the lead protagonist is an "Independent woman" from Maryland named Leslie (played by Elizabeth Taylor). Leslie is certainly the proto-Feminist type that would act as a model for all those "liberated" women to come. Marylander socialite Leslie ropes herself Bick Benedict of the famous Texas Benedict family and heads down southwest to start her new life in Texas. Immediately, Leslie is appalled by the fact the poor whites and especially poor Injuns, are considered lesser citizens. Being the independently minded woman she is, Leslie believes that Texas was stolen from poor Mexicans. I guess being an Independent-minded woman, Leslie doesn't realize that being dominated means being naturally at the lower end of the totem pole. After all, people should really embrace Marxist metaphysics and feel very bad about being conquerors and winners. One should always look at victims, losers, and the defeated as the most virtuous of God's many children. After some time of complaining and whining, Leslie eventually convinces Bick to break most of his family traditions in the name of human progress. Giant is certainly one GIANT HEART WARMER! James Dean plays a degenerate cowboy by the name of Jett Rink. Jett is hated by most of the Texans that know him except for Bick's sexually ambiguous sister Luz. After trying to prove her manhood by riding a wild black stallion, Luz takes a wicked western crash that results in death. Luz wanted her boy toy Jett to have a little piece of Benedict land, a piece of land that proves mighty wealthy for its size due to the oil hidden underneath it. After finding oil, Jett Rink goes from being the gayest Cowboy in Texas to the richest man in Texas. Unfortunately, James Dean did not have the chance to do much as the character of Jeff Rink. He goes from being a pathetic cowturd to a rich arrogant asshole in what seems like a couple minutes. Who cares about character development when you got a film as big as Texas. The one positive aspect of James Dean's performance is that despite dying young in real-life, he at least got to grow old cinematically in Giant. Too bad that James Dean looks like an elderly toddler in his aging makeup. Dean's real-life friend Dennis Hopper also makes an appearance in Giant as the weak doctor son of Bick Benedict. The young Hopper's performance is at the very least entertaining, but it doesn't save this film's epic failure in character development. Old Man Dean At the end of Giant, big Bick Benedict is a broken man with a shattered legacy. He states of his mongrel mestizo Grandson, "My own Grandson doesn't even look like one of us. He really looks like a little wetback." The last shot of the film then shows an blue-eyed blond-haired child then it cuts to Bick's swarthy mongrel Grandson. This ending of Giant also symbolizes the new youth of America to come with the Open Immigration Act of 1965 (which opened up America to Third World Immigration and Suicidal Globalization) being in acted not long after the release of Giant. Without the help of sentimental melodramas like Giant, White Americans could not have been as so accepting and stupid to give their country away to people that show the incapacity to buildup (let alone maintain) their own countries. What a nice big national turn for the worst. Giant is a testament to the fact that Independent women and the emasculated American white male have really turned America into a prosperous place of progress and equality, a place where the future is destined to be a great one.

GIANT

-Ty E

THE DEAD PIT
THE DEAD PIT

Brett Leonard (1989) Having perused through some much needed cult horror recommendations several months ago, I recently rediscovered this twanging, pulsing need to subject myself to The Dead Pit since being reminded about its release on Code Red DVD. After seeking out a copy and collaborating with the desire for supernatural zombie mysticism inside of me, I can genuinely say I came out of this experience almost surprised by the creeping quality of this low-budget guttural triumph. Brett Leonard's similar affection for fog machines can be found within some of the smoky racial VR combat sequences featured in Virtuosity and I see a similar character schematic being shared with Feed's Michael Metszencalmpf and Dead Pit's Dr. Colin Ramzi. Not only is the set up reminiscent to the brilliant Nightmare on Elm Street 3: Dream Warriors but the brutal crescendo garners an visually-aromatic likeness to the most infamous of scenes within Return of the Living Dead. This plus Cheryl Lawson parading around screaming whilst exposing her midriff equals horror goodness. Before I get off on a tangent with the ascertainable atmosphere within The Dead Pit, allow me to mention that the film is inclined to have a tremulous build up for some. It took me several viewings to make it past the 30 minute mark and I'm sure glad I finally buckled down for this treat. After its bizarre Ghoulies-esque opening scene of a young(er) Jeremy Slate lurking down a spiral staircase bathed in a ghoulish green smoke only to find a mad scientist who has been using the hospital's patients getting bizarre lobotomies and brain manipulation techniques. Telling the crazed Ramzi that this must come to an end, he puts a bullet between his eyes, rolls him in his "dead pit" and seals the cellar to the abandoned ward. Cut to the present, Dr. Gerald Swan (Slate) has become a shut-in psychiatrist with a misappropriated addiction to alcohol and counseling his patients. With the admittance of a new patient, one with a strange case of amnesia(?), a mysterious earthquake ravages the grounds and breaks the seal to the dead pit. While the film desperately struggles to breathe life into all its characters, this proves unnecessary as the dead rise from their Nickelodeon-flavored point of entry to devour the brains of all who have entered upon this unholy ground. Cheryl Lawson as Jane Doe is pitch perfect as an entrancing bubblehead but not much more than that. Actress she is not, dissenting guinea pig of psychological and physical torture by way of a malicious manifestation she is. Her connection with the sinister undead ringleader goes as far as one with any luck in predictability would assume. Jane Doe's adventures at night as she daintily sneaks past guard prove to be superfluous at most as most of her contact with the specter prove to be through her dreams until the finale. Even as dated and aged as the film appears to be, The Dead Pit does feature an exquisite set of decadence as told through abandoned hospital wing. To strengthen this aspect, Brett Leonard utilizes several camera techniques way before their time to great effect e.g. the chase scenes through the halls as our poor lead actress flees in fear of falling victim to her boogeyman. At first glance, these scenes might appear to be ordinary but pay close attention as these tactics have just begun being employed again in such a similar "sweeping" pattern. See also: Live Free or Die Hard for a recent example. Perhaps the most universal ground of praise in The Dead Pit would be the climax of the film where Dr. Ramzi commands all his minions to shuffle ominously through the swinging double doors. Again, the implementing of the fog machine works to a brilliant key stroke. The calamitous nature of these bumbling fiends plays to great regards the tension needed for the shuffling beasts and their lack of humanity. Now while these slaves are limited by command, they break down my expectations to kill two police officers just off the property which sets the mood nicely for an all-over possibility of this supernatural epidemic breaking past the grounds and possibly into a world-killing event. Just a thought. The Dead Pit, while being an 80s horror film, is a sugar rush of evil incarnate. This comes as no surprise from the highly efficient skills of Brett Leonard. It's rather saddening to see him resort to directing Highlander films nowadays as he was such an unregarded icon in both cyber-thrillers and debut zombie features. The Dead Pit comes greatly recommended if you can digest the constant dribble of loons until you reach the midway notch. This is a film that matures as the mysticism of evil progresses; a very nice touch for a first-timer.

-mAQ

VIRTUOSITY
VIRTUOSITY

Brett Leonard (1995)

Virtuosity is a science-fiction thriller made in the fabulous year of 1995. This year marked some of the greater underrated cyberpunk films to be released in Hollywood. A fine example is the violent Johnny Mnemonic. What made Virtuosity so special might be the fact of it's racial conflicts in the film. In the beginning of the film, we see Denzel Washington in a bizarre Judge Dredd styled uniform. He is in virtual reality searching for a killer with many one-liners. When his partner asks "What do we look for?" Denzel replies "His Eyes - They look like mine." This line is one of the more hidden ways to mainstream blacks into society. More so the fact that when his virtual reality session is over, he goes from being slick and well-groomed into an exotic prison primate of sorts; donning the dreadlocks and scars. When Denzel discusses his case and the reason he is in prison, he touches the prude white criminal psycho-analyst's hands. This action causes her to shiver with unrequited delight. This statement speaking aloud that all white women harness deep, dark sexual fantasies with black men. It goes from that ridiculous remark to Denzel having a forced prison brawl with a hairy neo-Nazi covered with "White Power!" tattoos. The dark meat he speaks of sure sounds foul. That scene is also a gesture supporting the rumor that blacks are more prone to police brutality. This may, or may not be true, but Denzel won't stand for it. The certain killer he is tracking down is SID 6.7. This suave intelligent killer is played by none other than Russel Crowe. Denzel and Crowe won't be seen in a film together until American Gangster. Notice in Virtuosity, Denzel is a Negro Neanderthal and Crowe is a suave aficionado of suits, but in American Gangster, they switch roles completely. SID 6.7 is a clever code-name due to it being rounded up from 6.66 (The Mark of the Beast) His personality is derived from the methods of 200 serial killers, all rolled into one. One of the killers is the murderer of Denzel's family prior to the present events. This gives an interesting twist as Denzel has the amazing chance to get revenge twice; something not explored at all in revenge films, and of course Adolf Hitler is the first name to come up. Of course, there is no "antisemitism" in the film. They pardon Denzel with the mission of "Black man cleaning up the white mans mess." This film also has a virtual poke-fun of at the "geek" of America. One sad pathetic loser drools at a virtual reality tease, so much as preventing a real relationship or even social activities. He is soon disposed of like the scum that he is. Several aesthetic sequences of Virtuosity shine out. One being it's throbbing techno soundtrack that adds to the virtual eroticity that lingers off of the scenes, and the other were the state-of-the-art special effects. They range from Cronenberg and Giger-esque incubation pods to virtual screen melting. The film has a sadistic sexual side to it. SID 6.7 loves hearing beautiful women crawl at his feet screaming. Even more so when his favorite track of Lords of Acid plays at the same time. This song fits perfectly into the film, but is edited due to its pedophilia lyrics. The song is entitled "Young Boys" and basically describes the singer's affinity for young boys in bed. The sexual tones of Lords of Acid fits the club scene this film follows perfectly. Virtuosity is a marvel of a cyberpunk film. Several of the scenes highlight the film and the others are forgivable. It has an extremely interesting stand point of sensationalism in film that goes hand in hand with on screen violence. The year 1995 produced great cinematic propaganda. Too bad they rarely make film like they used to.

-Maq

ADVENTURES IN DINOSAUR CITY
ADVENTURES IN DINOSAUR CITY

Brett Thompson (1991)

It takes a special moment to realize my appreciation for this long-lost gem. As I sit and eat a bowl of cereal, I can only imagine it's the sugar that rekindles the inner-child in me. I remembered key scenes from this film 16 years ago. That's a long time to try and force the title back in my head but sadly, I had completely forgotten it. Only about a year ago, I finally found the title with the aid of an internet random and I had slaved to track it down. I must know if the film retained any of its charm through the vicious cycle of time.

Adventures in Dinosaur City is an extreme exercise in minimal lighting. Brett Thompson went for a bleak tone to spin the story of the ill fated Saur City. The plot aims right for the heart strings of children. A scientist's son and two friends get sucked into a Dinosaur cartoon where it is up to them to recruit hero's Rex and Tops to stop the dreaded Mr. Big and restore sanctity to the Dinotopia. The subject matter of kids getting transported inside electronics isn't anything new but in this film, It's given a new life as the action and humor is actually something adults can dig into. As for an innovative standpoint, Adventures in Dinosaur City takes the same formula that Street Sharks used and created incredibly catchy one liners with awesome action. After re-watching Adventures in Dinosaur City, I can successfully say that I want to yell "Gimme Claw!" at a random passerby. No doubt I'd probably get the shit kick out of me, but the nostalgia this film has fed me is greater than any adrenal surge conceived yet. The action in this film can be divided perfectly down the middle. We got the average 3 Ninja's Kick Back combat style which normally involves a brat fighting with no rhythm and making comical gestures. Then we got the surprisingly good martial arts performed mainly by sidekick Tops. It's always persuasive enough to watch a rubber man in a foam suit do cartwheels and drop kick cavemen. Adventures in Dinosaur City is a fun romp through the prehistoric era but don't let that fool you. This is a double-edged abrasive family film that will resort to pre-adolescent double entendre's and extremely crude humor that will promote childhood rebellion. Partially disturbing in tone and relentless in fun, This is a must see and a children's cult classic. I can't remember seeing hot topics such as sacrificing oneself, hot bimbo cave women, ejaculation jokes, and smart ass dinosaurs all in one PG package. I need to digest this a bit.

-mAQ

BLOW OUT

Brian De Palma (1981)

Although I do not agree with a lot of his opinions on cinema and consider him to largely personify the worst sort of stereotypical British upper-class smugness and pomposity, I cannot help but occasionally refer to the writings of film critic and historian David Thomson, especially his film reference guide The New Biographical Dictionary of Film (2004), which features a number of unconventional critiques on various important and almost always unanimously praised filmmakers ranging from Federico Fellini to Stanley Kubrick. Indeed, aside from concluding his entry on the 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) director with "...Kubrick was always a 'master' who knew too much about film and too little about life—and it shows," he wrote regarding every film school hack's favorite filmmaker Alfred Hitchcock, "His great films are only partly his; they also belong to the minds that interpret them. There is an artistic timidity in Hitchcock that, having put the audience through it, must allow them to come to terms with the experience. But his own personality is withdrawn, cold, insecure, and uncharitable. The method, despite its brilliance, is equally private and restrictive. To plan so much that the shooting becomes a chore is an abuse not just of actors and crew, but of cinema's predilection for the momentary. It is, in fact, the style of an immense, premeditative artist—a Bach, a Proust, or a Rembrandt. And beside those masters, Hitchcock seems an impoverished inventor of thumbscrews who shows us the human capacity for inflicting pain, but no more." While Hitchcock has directed a dozen or so films that I particularly appreciate, I must concur with Thomson, especially when I compare the exceedingly eulogized "Master of Suspense" to the true pioneering masters of cinema like F.W. Murnau, Carl Th. Dreyer, Robert Bresson, and Ingmar Bergman, among various other examples. Needless to say, Thomson is no less harsh with Hitchcock's greatest impersonator Brian De Palma (Carrie, Scarface), who I have always considered a sort of obnoxiously self-satisfied and pedantic hack of the obscenely over-glorified sort who makes highly technically competent yet largely superficial and one-dimensional grade A big budget exploitation movies that film students, fanboys, and sexually impotent beta-male misogynists assumedly enjoy beating off to. Naturally, one also cannot take a director too seriously whose superficially stylish and machismo-marinated spick gangster films like Scarface (1983) and Carlito's Way (1993) are literally worshiped as the virtual Gospel by rappers, wiggers, ghetto negroes, and various other forms of gutter grade untermenschen rabble who typically have about as much respect for the artistic medium of film as they do for laws and literacy. Of course, De Palma's films are even more contrived and manufactured looking than Hitchcock's, as they are mostly fairly soulless and spiritually vacant cinematic works that are virtually all artifice and seem like they were more the product of an engineer's mind than that of a serious artist or poet, but then again he probably would have never obtained mainstream acceptance were he actually a artist or poet. Naturally, I am probably a little biased, but the cinematic works of largely forgotten auteur filmmakers like frog avant-gardist Yvan Lagrange (Tristan et Iseult, Dérive 'Le naufrage de Vénus') or Aussie hippie mad scientist Albie Thoms (Marinetti, Rita and Dundi) are infinitely more important and intriguing to me than some ex-arthouse poser like De Palma, whose arguable greatest talent is utilizing techniques from the experimental underground like split-screen as a novel gimmick that slightly differentiates him from the legions of soulless for-hire whores and artistically autistic artisans that prostitute themselves to the lawyers, businessmen, Cadillac commies and Israeli spies that rule Tinseltown. Of course, it is no coincidence that De Palma has a strong affinity for creating conspicuously cinephiliac cinematic works where the mechanics of the filmmaking process are actually incorporated into the film, as it highlights his sort of super literal and sterile view of cinema. Not surprisingly, De Palma is also arguably at his best when directing such covert cineaste pieces as his pre-Scarface output clearly demonstrates. Thankfully, quite unlike his bastard half-wop disciple Tarantino, De Palma also displays a degree of elegance and nuance when paying tribute to his cinematic masters, but cinephilia will only get you so far when it comes to being a truly formidable filmmaker.

BLOW OUT

As someone with a largely worthless BS degree in film, I would undoubtedly argue that studying philosophy, psychology, or even history would be of greater value to any aspiring filmmaker than actually studying film, as you will never be an intriguing auteur if you have no understanding of people, psychology, history, or spiritually (which, not surprisingly, seems to be the subject that most contemporary filmmakers seem to least understand). Surely, it is no coincidence that Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman was the prodigal son of a highly respected Lutheran minister, just as it is no accident that Paul Schrader was bought up under the anti-cinema doctrine of the super strict Calvinist Christian Reformed Church and Jean Cocteau was, first and foremost, a poet whose amateur painter mother committed suicide when he was only nine years old. Likewise, it would probably shock no one to know that Spielberg was a nerdy suburban kid who had nil interest in art films, spirituality, or even sex (though, like many Jews of his generation, he developed a deep and visceral hatred of Germans at an early age), as his films reflect his sterile, contrived, sheltered, naive, materialistic, and socially retarded upbringing. Indeed, Spielberg probably has more power and creative freedom than any other filmmaker in the world yet he chooses to create childish blockbuster swill that has not even really surpassed the pioneering films of Anglo-Saxon master D.W. Griffith in terms of artistic and narrative innovation. A rare Italian-American from a Protestant background, De Palma had a banal bourgeois upbringing that was only unconventional in the sense that he began playing peeping tom on his own father when he discovered that the patriarch was cheating on his mother with another woman, hence his obsession with paying homage to the shameless voyeurism of Rear Window. Not surprising considering his dubious cinematic portrayals of women and troubled real-life personal relationships with women, De Palma also had a cold and callous mother that oftentimes reminded him of the fact that he was an accident and treated him as inferior to his eldest brother. Notably, De Palma's philandering father was a respected orthopedic surgeon and as Thomson somewhat hilariously noted regarding one of his most famous films, "...CARRIE is the work of a glittering, callous surgeon who left his knife in the body." Aside from developing an odd obsession with watching his physician father getting physical with random women when he was a boy, De Palma was also a tech dork that was obsessed with conspiracy theories, most notably the JFK assassination. Naturally, De Palma's contempt for his white bourgeois family and mistrust of the government as a result of JFK getting his brains blown out under quite dubious circumstances would ultimately lead to him adopting an ethno-masochistic Weltanschauung that would prove to be beneficial to his filmmaking career.

While De Palma's films, not unlike Hitchcock's, reveal very little about the man behind the camera aside from being the creations of a smug smirking cynic and lame mainstream liberal type that is more interested in seeing beautiful women penetrated with a knife than a cock, at least one of his commercial films, Blow Out (1981)—a flick that Thomson conveniently completely forgets to mention in his rather dismissive entry on the filmmaker in The New Biographical Dictionary of Film—is vaguely autobiographical and arguably his closest equivalent to a true auteur piece. Like fellow dago New Hollywood filmmaker Francis Ford Coppola's respectable commercial failure The Conversation (1974), the film is more or less a reworking of Italian maestro Michelangelo Antonioni's revolutionary English-language arthouse counterculture thriller Blowup (1966), albeit focusing on film sound recording as opposed to photography. Featuring a whiny beta-male protagonist that reminds me of what Shia LaBeouf might be like if he had a couple testosterone injections and a somewhat less swarthy appearance, the film stars fellow weirdo wop wuss John Travolta as a sort of more handsome and charismatic stand-in for De Palma in a role that would earn the Hollywood hunk some minor legitimacy as an actor. In the film, Travolta portrays an exploitation movie soundman who unwittingly gets immersed in a deadly political conspiracy after serendipitously recording audio evidence in regard to the assassination of a popular governor and presidential candidate. Somewhat curiously but not surprisingly, the film also stars the director's then-wife Nancy Allen as a sort of dimwitted quasi-prostitute that is ultimately brutally murdered in the end, thus somewhat symbolically highlighting the De Palma's troubled history with women (notably, Allen was the first of three different women that the director was briefly married to). Additionally, the film is set in De Palma's hometown of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania and shot at various locations that the filmmaker was very familiar with, thus further adding to the film's innate auteur essence.

BLOW OUT

Originally aspiring to be a sort of 'American Godard' that was more interested in testing the bounds of cinematic experimentation in terms of both narrative and technique than attempting to appeal to the bread and circus tendencies of mainstream audiences (somewhat strangely, Godard later became a fan of his rather lame and tame mainstream supernatural-thriller The Fury (1978) and even included a clip from it in his ambitious 8-part video project Histoire(s) du cinéma (1988-1998)), De Palma's first feature-length film was an overly ambitious semi-experimental black-and-white metacinema horror piece entitled Murder à la Mod (1968), which feels like the result of some film school dork with Asperger syndrome paying intertextual homage to both Michael Powell's Peeping Tom (1960) and Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), albeit with a little bit of Kurosawa's Rashômon (1950) and sub-Sarno-esque 42nd Street exploitation sleaze thrown in for good measure. Undoubtedly, as a fairly erratically assembled cinematic work that incorporates the filmmaking process as an imperative ingredient of both the film's structure and storyline, De Palma's debut feature certainly feels like a crude and dilettantish art school prototype for Blow Out, which is thankfully devoid of any of the sort of asinine Godardian and Brechtian influences that were prevalent in his early films. Indeed, if the film is admirable for anything aside from clearly demonstrating that the general public does not care about the truth and rather not know about sinister conspiracy theories that involve the brutal assassination of their beloved politicians, it is that it manages to reveal some of the mechanics of the filmmaking process in a fairly enthralling manner that will not put people to sleep while at the same time demonstrating that cinema truly has the power to change the world. While De Palma's films have hardly contributed anything to the evolution of humanity (in fact, his anti-American digital turd Redacted (2011) actually inspired a deranged Albanian Muslim to shoot and kill two U.S. Airmen at Frankfurt Airport in Frankfurt, Germany), Blow Out is a fairly provocative reminder that sometimes cinema can be a deadly game.

In a sort of trick film-within-a-film opening that seems like a parody of Bob Clark's classic slasher flick Black Christmas (1974), an autistic-looking four-eyed dork is depicted prowling around a female college dorm and spying on quite cunt-y and savagely salacious college sluts that are engaging in fucking, masturbating, and bitching, among other less than ladylike things that make the building seem more like a bordello than a student housing complex. When the killer eventually makes his way into a dorm bathroom without a single girl noticing him, he raises his knife in a Norman Bates-esque fashion and prepares to stab a showering babe who, upon finally noticing the psycho killer, unleashes a most impotent and unintentionally humorous scream that immediately reveals to the viewer that they are watching a rough cut of an imaginary movie. The slasher flick is a work-in-progress entitled "Coed Frenzy" and protagonist Jack Terry (John Travolta)—a former tech whiz kid turned underachieving exploitation film studio whose sound recordist—is ordered by his swarthy lard ass boss to do what he does best and record some new sound effects for the flick, including “new wind” sound and a more believable scream for the shower scene. After leaving the exploitation film studio, Jack heads to a wooded area near a small bridge to do some sound recordings and is somewhat delighted when a young couple mistakes him for a peeping tom. Aside from the couple, Jack also encounters a frog and an owl, among various other small creatures that he carefully records. Needless to say, when a speeding car appears out of nowhere, careens off a bridge and then plunges into the water, Jack is left totally startled, but that does not stop him from taking the initiative to become a hero by diving into the water and risking his life to save the passenger(s) of the sinking car. While the driver of the car is already visibly dead (how Jack can see under water during nighttime is anyone’s guess), Jack finds a live girl in the back seat and he manages to save her in a courageous act that will ultimately eventually lead to the protagonist living a forlorn life of paranoia, dread, melancholy, and extreme guilt, among various other negative qualities that one does not typically associate with exploitation filmmakers.

After saving the girl, Jack is not congratulated as a hero but is instead treated like a virtual guilty criminal when he is questioned by the cops, who strangely doubt his story that there was a woman inside the car. As it turns out, the dead man that was driving the car was a populist democrat governor and presidential candidate named George McRyan, who was expected to be the country’s next president. Before Jack knows it, McRyan’s best friend and right-hand man, a dorky Nordic dude named Lawrence Henry (John McMartin), approaches him and attempts to coerce him into not telling anyone, especially the press, about the fact that the good governor was riding in a car with a somewhat slutty looking young lady that was not his wife. When Jack brings up the “truth” and how he prefer not to lie, Henry eventually manages to get the protagonist to change his mind after getting angry and arguing, “Who gives a damn that you were there? You want to tell his wife that he died with his hand up some girl’s dress? Or maybe you’d rather she read it in the papers!” Sally (played by Nancy Allen, who modeled her performance after Giulietta Masina’s character in Federico Fellini’s La Strada (1954)) is the mysterious girlish beauty that Jack saved and she immediately blushes and covers her face like a bashful child when the protagonist visits her hospital room and states, “I didn’t realize you were this pretty with all that mud all over your face.” While Jack’s somewhat flirtatious remark to Sally hints that he might develop some sort of romantic relationship with her, he ultimately becomes more infatuated with a pernicious political conspiracy that the little lady has somewhat unwittingly got herself involved in. Indeed, after leaving the hospital and checking into a cheap motel so that they can avoid any potential media attention, Sally falls asleep and Jack begins studying the sound recording that he captured during the accident, thus leading him to immediately suspect that it was not an accident at all and that the entire situation is part of a big coverup that both the police and politicians are involved in. As a result of what he hears on the sound recording, Jack believes that an assassin intentionally shot out the tire of McRyan's car to make it seem like the governor's death was a mere accident and he is seriously determined to uncover who did it and why. Indeed, Jack immediately becomes so obsessed with the political conspiracy that he cannot even bother to find the time to initiate a lurid love affair with Sally, who seems more than a little bit privy to any sensual advances that he might make.

BLOW OUT

Unbeknownst to gentleman Jack, Sally is a sort of softcore whore that was a semi-unwitting co-conspirator in a plot with her Judaic boss—a sleazy photographer and businessman named Manny Karp (Dennis Franz) that has no problem using his professional talents for rather unsavory yet highly profitable purposes—to setup Governor McRyan and destroy his political career. The original plan was that Karp, who was at the scene of the crime with his trusty 16mm camera, would film McRyan with Sally and thus ruin the presidential hopeful's plan to take residence in the White House due to the bad press that he would receive, but that all changed when an assassin decided to shoot out the politician's tire and ultimately cause his somewhat horrific death. Needless to say, delectable blonde dingbat Sally did not expect to get involved in a deadly situation where she found herself potentially drowning inside a car with a powerful dead man that she just met, but such are the unfathomable consequences of dealing with shadowy individuals that want to destroy political careers. Of course, neither Karp or Sally realized that a mysterious assassin named Burke (John Lithgow)—a tall and even somewhat goofy WASP weirdo with an equally bizarre fashion sense that probably no one would suspect of being an extra cunning coldblooded killer—decided it would be best if McRyan was simply liquidated. As an act of desperation, Burke was hired by the President's campaign manager Jack Manners, but he did not think that he would go so far as kill the governor. With McRyan dead, Burke still needs to clean up some "loose ends" and decides he must kill Sally, destroy Jack's sound recording, and deal with slimy sleazebag Karp. Unfortunately for him, Burke initially mistakes a random blonde for Sally and ends up killing the wrong girl, so he decides to mutilate said girl's genitals with cuts in the form of the Liberty Bell to make it seem as if she was the victim of a sexually sadistic serial killer. By creating a modus operandi for a phony mentally disturbed serial killer with a fetish for Liberty Bells and young broads with curly blonde locks, Burke hopes to make Sally's death seem like the result of a random sex crime as opposed to part of a big political coverup.

When Sally's kosher cohort Manny sells 16mm footage of McRyan's assassination to a mainstream publishing company for a large undisclosed amount and they are subsequently published in a magazine, Jack actually goes to the effort of cutting out black-and-white still photographs of the car crash and meticulously constructing a primitive film out of them that he then synchronizes with his audio recording, thus further strengthening his belief that the governor was the victim of a political conspiracy. Eagerly determined to prove to the public that the governor was assassinated, Jack brings a copy of the sound recording to a local cynical cop named Detective Mackey (John Aquino), who loathes the protagonist because he “put a lot of good cops away” during his previous occupation with the Keen Commission where he was responsible for putting wires on people and busting corrupt policemen that were shaking down members of the mob. While Detective Mackey mocks and berates Jack and treats him like a half-crazed conspiracy nut as a result of the serious and seemingly absurd allegations that he makes, he reluctantly agrees to take a look at the sound recording, stating “Just because I don’t like you, does not mean I’m not gonna do my job.” Notably, as Mackey states to Jack in regard to the general public’s apathy when it comes to political corruption and conspiracies, “Nobody wants to know. Nobody cares. No sordid details. No political assassination. Accident. This guy’s dead, for Christ’s sake. None of this shit’s gonna do him any good now.” When Jack complains, “Don’t you understand that if they can get away with this and kill McRyan, who’s next?,” Detective Mackey cynically replies, “Who’s ‘they’? First I want you to tell me who ‘they’ is. What is that, a communist conspiracy of some kind? Or maybe – maybe it’s a couple of ayatollahs running out here in the street with blowguns.” Needless to say, when Mackey has his men take a look at the recording and they discover that it is completely blank, he calls up Jack and accuses him of being a nut job. As it turns out, Burke not only erased the sound recording, but also sneaked into Jack’s editing room at the film studio and erased all of the copies that he made. Luckily, Jack had enough foresight to hide a copy in the ceiling of his apartment.

When Jack is approached by a big star newscaster named Frank Donahue (Curt May) from a TV network named CITY NEWS, he finds the media man’s intentions somewhat dubious, but has second thoughts when he is offered the opportunity to play his recording on live television. Indeed, when Jack asks, “Why would you be interested in an assassination nut like me?,” Donahue confidently replies, “Go along with me on this. I guarantee you, by 8:30 tomorrow night...every one of those eight million sons of bitches are gonna believe Jack Terry’s story.” Before Jack can go on television, he must get Sally to steal her scumbag boss Karp’s original footage of the crash. Of course, Sally is reluctant to help him at first, but Jack manages to change her mind when he brings up the fact that he knows that she was part of the conspiracy and that her life is in danger, stating to her in an impassioned smart ass fashion, “I got a look at some of your earlier work. Some motel candid camera shots. You got nice tits. Who was paying you to flash ‘em for McRyan? [...] If I hadn’t been there to pull you out of the river, you’d be dead right now. Don’t you get it?” While Sally defends her quite dubious actions by stating, “It was just a job like all the others. I get ‘em into bed, and Manny’d get it all on film,” she cannot deny the fact that she was almost killed and that she is probably still in serious danger, thus leading her to comply with Jack's simple request. Luckily, Karp attempts to rape Sally when she goes by his apartment, thus giving the happy-go-lucky harlot the opportunity to smash a bottle over his head and then steal the 16mm film reel while her would-be-rapist is unconscious. Somewhat humorously, before attempting to sexually ravage Sally, Manny defends their role in the assassination of McRyan by stating to her while simultaneously taking a leak, "Besides, nobody is exactly crying over the way things turned out, if you know what I mean. What would have happened if the guy had have lived, huh? His career was finished, thanks to us. This way, uh, the guy comes out ahead, huh? He's a saint. A martyr. Christ, they passed one of his bills this morning." While Jack now has all the evidence he needs to prove that someone shot out Governor McRyan's tire, he does not realize that Burke has tapped his phone and knows about his plans to go on Donahue's show. Fully aware of the fact that she has no clue who Donahue is and thus would not recognize his voice, Burke calls Sally while pretending to be the newscaster and manages to coerce her into meeting him at 30th Street Station at 5:00pm with both Jack's audio recording and Karp's footage. Luckily, just before Sally leaves, Jack stops her and convinces her to wear a wire since he finds the meetup with Donahue to be somewhat fishy, stating, "I'm gonna cover all the bases. Nobody's gonna fuck me this time. This way if he disappears with the film...he can't pretend he didn't take it, 'cause I got him on tape." While Jack makes a copy of his recording, he unfortunately does not have time to make another print of Karp's film.

BLOW OUT

Upon arriving at 30th Street Station, Jack gives Sally a sort of brotherly kiss while parked in his Jeep in what is undoubtedly the closest thing to a romance scene in the entire film. Of course, Jack also lets Sally know that he can hear whatever she says since she is wearing a wire and that if she has any trouble to let him know. Not long after exiting Jack's Jeep and entering the station, Sally communicates to the protagonist via the wire how she would like to take a trip with him to New York City to see "Like SUGAR BABIES and stuff." Somewhat tragically, Jack will never get to travel to NYC to see Sugar Babies with Sally or start a hot and heavy romance with her, as Burke has quite different plans for the two. Indeed, almost immediately after Sally proposes the trip to NYC, Burke abruptly swoops in on her, introduces himself as Donahue, declares, "I think we have a little problem. I think we're being followed," and then practically drags the heroine through the station. Of course, Sally has no idea that Burke just strangled to death a female prostitute in a bathroom only a couple moments before meeting up with her. After listening in on their conversation for a little while, it does not take Jack long to realize that Sally is with someone else other than Donahue, but the two take a train heading towards Franklin Bridge Express before the protagonist can warn her. Naturally, at this point, Jack jumps into his Jeep and begins speeding to the train station.

Undoubtedly, Jack picked a less than auspicious time to speed through Philadelphia in a goofy looking baby blue Jeep, as he finds himself nearly running over hundreds of people during the Liberty Day parade. Indeed, as a result of driving like a belligerent maniac, Jack eventually symbolically crashes his Jeep through the window of a storefront with a display in tribute to American Revolutionary war hero Nathan Hale and is knocked out cold. Meanwhile, after arriving at the busiest and most hectic section of the parade, Burke gets Sally to hand him both the sound recording and film, which he abruptly tosses into a nearby bay. When silly Sally responds by playfully stating, "Jack's going to kill you," Burke puts on a pair of white strangling gloves and the heroine finally becomes aware of her precarious situation. Not long after Jack finally regains consciousness and finds himself inside an ambulance on a stretcher, he hears Sally's screams via the wire and proceeds running to look for her. Quite conveniently considering there are thousands of people around, Jack eventually manages to spot Sally standing on a large stage in front of a big America flag while screaming for his help. Somewhat tragically, although Jack manages to stab Burke to death with his own genital-mutilating weapon after sneaking up on him from behind, Sally has already been strangled to death. In what is indubitably Jack's most intimate and emotional moment with the heroine, the protagonist holds Sally's assumedly still warm corpse while Liberty Day fireworks explode in the background in what is a strangely darkly romantic yet simultaneously cheap and cynical scene that more or less epitomizes the essence of the entire film. In a sort of sickly ironic fashion, as a result of himself dying and his unidentified corpse being assumed to be that of the supposed Liberty Day killer, Burke ultimately manages to tie up every single important loose end of his criminal conspiracy. As for Jack, he seems to more or less succumb to psychosis and begins regularly listening to his audio recording Sally's screams before she was murdered. In the end, in what ultimately proves to be a classically savagely cynical De Palma conclusion, Jack somewhat masochistically decides to dub the scream for the film Coed Frenzy with Sally's piercing death scream. Indeed, in what ultimately seems to be an act of self-imposed punishment for accidentally getting his would-be-love-interest killed, Jack uses her final scream in a film that he was not even serious about working on.

Naturally, considering the steady rise in popularity of conspiracy theories as a result of the September 11 attacks and various other dubious events that have occurred in the United States and Western Europe over the past couple of decades, Blow Out has certainly stayed more relevant than it probably should have, especially when one considers the horrendous wardrobes and oftentimes obscenely outmoded music that plagues the film. Undoubtedly, it should be noted that De Palma—a virtual bourgeois moral barbarian that, in many ways, epitomizes the worst qualities of the dreaded Baby Boomers, even if he is slightly too old to be one—belonged to the first generation of young Americans that became seriously disillusioned with their country as a result of the assassination of John F. Kennedy and, not unlike many people of his era, the filmmaker developed a sort of fairly anti-WASP leftist worldview as a result. Indeed, the absolutely disgraceful degree of De Palma's flagrant ethno-masochistic degeneracy is clearly revealed in his early extremely convoluted Godardian satire Hi, Mom! (1970) where a dorky yet surprisingly sleazy pre-fame Robert De Niro plays a sort of stand-in for the director (who curiously has the Judaic name 'Jon Rubin') and jovial psychopath who starts a phony relationship with a ditzy dame (who is notably played by blacklisted commie screenwriter Waldo Salt's daughter Jennifer Salt) in the hope of filming a porno of her without her consent. In the same film, there is a rather sick and spiteful pseudo-cinéma-vérité segment entitled Be Black, Baby where a black nationalist negro strips and brutally rapes a beautiful blonde in a highly realistic fashion that was more or less shot in real time. In other words, Hi, Mom! reveals that De Palma is not only a morally bankrupt self-loathing white wuss that would probably enjoy directing an interracial snuff film, but that he is also a conspicuous cuckold, but of course all of those things usually go hand-in-hand. Notably, when describing the film during its pre-production stage in an interview with Joseph Gelmis featured in the book The Film Director As Superstar (1971), De Palma stated, "This film is much more radical than GREETINGS. It deals with the obscenity of the white middle class. And we are white middle class, Chuck [Hirsch] and I and everybody we know. So we're making a movie about the white middle class. And we're using the blacks to reflect the white culture. Because the blacks stand outside the system and they see what we are [...] It's a film that says that the only way to deal with the white middle class is to blow it up." Of course, considering that Hi, Mom! concludes with the Jewish protagonist Rubin blowing up a large apartment building full of successful and attractive white Anglo-Saxons, there can be no doubt that De Palma is an emotionally and psychologically damaged dago cuck traitor.

BLOW OUT

As a number of his films and early important relationship with Judaic producer Charles Hirsch (who co-wrote and produced the director's most explicitly anti-white flicks, including Greetings (1968) and its quasi-sequel Hi, Mom!) clearly reveal, De Palma has unquestionably demonstrated that he is a committed philo-Semite and shabbos goy stooge, which is somewhat ironic when one considers that he has claimed to have read virtually every single book that has ever been written on the subject of the JFK assassination yet has not come to the natural conclusion that much of the evidence points to it being a largely kosher conspiracy that was ordered by Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, or, more specifically, as Michael Collins Piper wrote in his tome Final Judgment: The Missing Link in the JFK Assassination Controversy, it "was a joint enterprise conducted on the highest levels of the American CIA, in collaboration with organized crime—and most specifically, with direct and profound involvement by the Israeli intelligence service, the Mossad." Indeed, Israeli former nuclear technician and peace activist Mordechai Vanunu—a man that spent 18 years in prison, including more than 11 in solitary confinement, merely for revealing details of Israel's nuclear weapons program to the British press in 1986—made the claim in 2004 that the assassination was Israel's response to “pressure [Kennedy] exerted on...Ben-Gurion, to shed light on Dimona's nuclear reactor in Israel.” Apparently, the Israelis were not too keen on the fact that JFK did not want them to have nuclear weapons. Of course, if the Mossad went to the trouble of luring Vanunu to Italy and then drugging and smuggling him back to the Hebraic nation to imprison him for nearly two decades simply because he exposed the fact that Zion has nukes, naturally they would not tolerate an inordinately handsome McCatholic goy president that had the chutzpah to tell them they could not have an apocalyptic weapon that their kinsmen originally designed in the hope of dropping it on Nazi Germany (after all, it was no coincidence that stern Zionist and warmonger Albert Einstein, who wrote a letter to FDR in 1939 that ultimately led to the Manhattan Project where he lied about Germany's potential for nuclear technology, was offered the presidency of Israel in 1952). Admittedly, I have to give De Palma credit in one regard in that he portrayed the man that was responsible for filming the fictional assassination as a sleazy Hebraic character with a fittingly repugnant name like Manny Karp. After all, Abraham Zapruder, who made a lot of money off of his home movie of the president getting his brains blow out, was a Russian Jewish businessman and the JFK assassination has many obvious and not so obvious Jewish connections, not least of all Lee Harvey Oswald's mob-connected strip club owner assassin Jack Ruby (whose real name was Jacob Leonard Rubenstein). It should also be noted that De Palma's screenwriter for Scarface, half-Jew Oliver Stone, would renew interest in the assassination with his obscenely overrated epic JFK (1991), which was curiously executive produced by Israeli arms dealer and Mossad operative Arnon Milchan. As revealed in the rather sympathetic pro-Zionist book Confidential: The Life of Secret Agent Turned Hollywood Tycoon - Arnon Milchan (2011) co-written by Hebraic tribesmen Meir Doron and Joseph Gelman, Milchan's spy work involved gathering important nuclear documents by dubious means and “buying components to build and maintain Israel's nuclear arsenal,” thus it should be no surprise that he would produce a piece of glossy misinformation like Stone's film, which is nothing more than the covert Judaisierung of the JFK assassination. Rather revealingly, while JFK is about former New Orleans district attorney Jim Garrison and his investigation into the cover-up of the assassination, it conveniently never mentions the fact that he eventually came to the conclusion that Mossad was the driving force behind the conspiracy. Of course, as Blow Out reveals, De Palma, like his semi-Semitic pal Stone, believes the JFK assassination was some sort of vast right-wing conspiracy. As ex-Mossad agent Victor Ostrovsky revealed in his book, By Way of Deception: The Making and Unmaking of a Mossad Officer (1990), which Israel tried to stop the release of via a preliminary injunction, the former motto of the Mossad was, “By Way Of Deception Thou Shalt Do War,” but of course that is the sort of thing that De Palma would actively ignore, as it contradicts his anti-WASP narrative. Notably, De Palma would symbolically demonstrate his solidarity with god’s chosen tribe in his horrendous black comedy Wiseguys (1986) where the protagonists, a low-level guido gangster and his Jewish pal, realize their mutual multicultural dream of opening the world’s first Jewish-Italian delicatessen.

BLOW OUT

Of course, with its both overt and somewhat covert references to an eclectic range of films, including Orson Welles’ Touch of Evil (1958), Vincente Minnelli’s Some Came Running (1958), Antonioni’s Blowup (1966), Michael Snow’s La région centrale (1971), Narciso Ibáñez Serrador’s Who Can Kill a Child? (1976), Jeff Lieberman’s Squirm (1976), Greydon Clark’s Without Warning (1980), and Ulli Lommel’s The Boogey Man (1980), among countless others, Blow Out is a proud piece of shameless pathological cinephilia, hence why alpha-fanboy Quentin Tarantino has described it as one of his top favorite three films of all time. Naturally, what somewhat differentiates De Palma’s film from Tarantino’s is that his characters are slightly less cartoonish and a tad bit more human, even if it is sometimes hard to think of Travolta as a tragic conspiracy theorist. Of course, despite being slightly more talented at melodrama than Tarantino, when it comes to depicting melancholy and authentic human emotions in general, De Palma is certainly no Bergman or Cassavetes, as his attempts at portraying pathos oftentimes seeming more like unintentional bathos, especially in Blow Out where Travolta sometimes comes off looking like a poor man’s Tom Cruise. In a clear demonstration of the fact that Tarantino watches way too many stupid kung fu flicks, he confessed to De Palma that he felt that the ending of Blow Out was, “one of the most heartbreaking shots in the history of cinema.” As far as I am concerned, De Palma is, at best, a very capable slasher/giallo film director and hyper Hitchcock fetishist who is very adept at taking a sophisticated and elegant approach to largely mindless entertainment, thus putting him above most Hollywood directors. With the possible exceptions of his underrated horror musical Phantom of the Paradise (1974) and pleasantly politically incorrect killer tranny classic Dressed to Kill (1980), I would have to argue that Blow Out is De Palma’s finest achievement as a filmmaker. Indeed, had De Palma only died in a car wreck after making the film, I might have more appreciation for him as a filmmaker, but it is hard to like a self-loathing bourgeois leftist who, aside from directing films for the NAACP, had the audacious arrogance to direct a phony self-important film like Casualties of War where he displays his hypocritical class biases by portraying young white working-class soldiers as evil racist rapists and psychopaths (it should also be noted that, like all of his cinematic works, the film is derivative and is actually based on an event that was already depicted nearly two decades before in kraut commie Michael Verhoeven's scandalous anti-American film O.K. (1970), which hilariously stars one-time Fassbinder superstar Eva Mattes as a teenage Vietnamese rape victim). After all, De Palma has made a career out of making sleazy films depicting women being brutally murdered by perverts, yet he had the gall to make an ostensibly serious anti-rape/anti-war. One also cannot forget that De Palma is a proud draft-dodger, thus making his condemnation of white prole GIs seem like a craven act of projection where he condemns the very same unprivileged members of the European-American working-class that fought and died in the Vietnam War while he was making anti-American agitprop featuring negroes raping white women and Jewish psychopaths committing terrorist attacks like in his experimental agitprop piece Hi, Mom!, but of course it takes a special sort of hypocritical degenerate to truly thrive in Hollywood.

Right from the beginning of his filmmaking career with his surprisingly intriguing experimental horror short Woton's Wake (1962)—a low-budget black-and-white micro-epic with Expressionistic overtones that pays homage to films ranging from the original King Kong (1933) to Ingmar Bergman's masterpiece The Seventh Seal (1957)—De Palma made it quite clear that he had a special affinity for recycling his favorite films, as if he knew nothing about life outside of cinema. Of course, what makes Blow Out somewhat different from most of his films is that it is a borderline auteur piece where he actually dares to reveal something truly personal about himself, including his sense of disillusionment with love, life, politics, society, and even the filmmaking process. While David Thomson once wrote of De Palma, "He has contempt for his characters and his audience alike, and I suspect that he despises even his own immaculate skill," Blow Out features a protagonist that he seems to completely identify with, thus making it all the more interesting that said protagonist is extremely bored with his job in the film industry and is left a complete and utter emotional wreck in the end. Indeed, De Palma's "self-conscious cunning" (as Thomson described it) just seems to be a sort of sturdy protective shield for his own vulnerability and glaring negativity towards everything about life and humanity, which is more or less exposed at the conclusion of the film when Travolta's character opts to dub a schlocky slasher flick with the heroine's death scream. In other words, De Palma's signature polished prettification of murder, mayhem, and social decay seems to be a therapeutic means for him to cope with being a dead and impotent soul who, as a sterile self-loathing middleclass white boy that has probably never even ever gotten into a fist-fight, has nowhere to channel his seemingly well hidden inner rage and hatred. Needless to say, it is no surprise that De Palma and Nancy Allen divorced a couple years after the release of Blow Out, as it cannot be a good sign for the future of a marriage when a husband depicts his wife as a dumb broad that lives off her tits and ass who is ultimately brutally murdered in the end (not to mention the fact that the filmmaker had Allen portray a hooker in his previous film Dressed to Kill where the actress shows off her unclad carnal goods and talks dirty to Michael Caine in regard to his cock). In fact, despite the fact that Allen is terribly claustrophobic and was completely petrified about shooting the segment, De Palma forced her to do her own stunts during the scene in Blow Out where she is trapped inside a car that is submerged in water. In that one regard, De Palma has indeed transcended his cinematic hero Hitch, as a man with self-confessed mommy issues who advanced the art of semi-covert sadistic 'high kitsch' filmic misogyny, which arguably reaches its unintentionally zany twentieth in Body Double (1984). With his most recent feature Passion (2012), De Palma proved he is not very good at remaking European pseudo-arthouse films or dealing with the subject of Sapphic psychopaths. Personally, I think De Palma should just get it over with and finally realize his dream of remaking a Hitchcock film. Considering De Palma's flare for deliciously stylized psychosexual degeneracy and the fact that Hitchcock's version is a little bit too tame and somewhat resembles filmed theater, I think it is about time that he remakes the Leopold and Loeb inspired Nietzschean classic Rope (1948). After all, considering De Palma's philo-Semitism and fetish for crafty killers, it seems like the perfect subject matter for him to tackle.

BLOW OUT

-Ty E

BONE SICKNESS

Brian Paulin (2004)

I am a supporter of DIY filmmakers and their passion for film making. They generally have decided to pursue film making due to their love of film (and fulfilling their dreams). Unfortunately (but unsurprisingly), most of these amateur filmmakers lack any type of talent or natural cinematic inclinations. I would have to say that about Brian Paulin and his film Bone Sickness. Bone Sickness is a zombie film that looks like it was created by an average Joe 30 something year old filmmaker. It features many scenes that are obviously fantasies of the typical and trivia filled Zombie fan. Someone that grew up thinking "I could do that" and "wouldn't that be awesome if..." Bone Sickness is also probably the only zombie film featuring a flesh eater rising from the depths of an above ground pool. Digital video has given a voice to the everyday man. Bone Sickness fully utilizes the pro-consumer technology as a mean of capturing Brian Paulin's dream. It is obvious that Paulin's main focus was special effects and gore. Bone Sickness has a home video feel that is impossible to ignore. The film is entertaining in a way that is unintentional. I guess that's better than not being entertaining at all. I respect that Brian Paulin has created his own film. I am not going to pretend Bone Sickness is a good film. It might be inspiring to those interested in making their own amateur film though. If you want to see bad special effects, unflattering nudity of some random dude's overweight girlfriend, and Halloween mask zombies, Bone Sickness is the film for you. I find it much more enjoyable to watch a low budget German splatter film.

-Ty E

DEADHOUSE
DEADHOUSE

Brian Rivera (2005)

Growing up horror wise, I've always been advised to stray away from the label Brain Damage Films, with good reason too. After skimming their catalog for a couple of minutes, the only sight that fills my retinas is pure unadulterated trash. There is Troma trash, then there is Brain Damage. I had only previously seen a single clip of Traces of Death 2 and decided there was too much shitty generic metal in it to even deserve the title of "Shock." I've been told time and time again that it is a difficult task indeed to review a Brain Damage Film, but I must try. I will relay the scenes I viewed, and why I cry thinking about the package with 10+ odd Brain Damage Films that I have dedicated to watch and spread the word about this horrible scamming company whose main goal is to release bargain bin shit films and profit off of the dull masses. The film opens up with a fat kid with a pony tail. Note this character design, for it will reappear throughout the film. This 40-something looking "kid" is supposed to pass off as a rural teenager taking a walk through the woods. He then thinks he sees something in the woods. Upon further inspection, a tiny branch falls on him. This branch throws the fatty to the ground, leaving him angst ridden muttering "stupid fucking tree" He then gets slaughtered by a man whose killer design is a copycat version of any masked pro-wrestler. (My collection of fatties with pony tails) Next up in this horribly edited is a scene of a girl packing up her belongings being exceptionally morose. Her sister/friend (I don't give a shit about anything of their names or relations) comes in the room smacking her lips, rolling her eyes, and chewing gum incessantly like a cow. She looked like a cow too. After bickering, they meet up with some douche named Brandon who drives them down roads. When I say drive, it's more like sitting in a car talking while spinning the wheel and having people on the outside push it to mimic movement. They get lost and stop by a butcher shop that is ran by a fat guy with a pony tail. (!) After he hits on the cow, they leave and drive some more. While driving, they almost get in an accident cause of a fat guy with a pony tail in the road. (!) Then they meet the bad guy with long hair and the other guy with old 80's metal hair. At this time, I sort of shifted positions and closed my eyes and began to drown out the noise with my thoughts of despair. Looking forward to watching the rest of these films is almost as great of an idea as creating my own B.M.E. video. (Body Modification Extreme) A couple things I did notice; they blurred license plates, posters in a town, and the brand of SUV they were driving. This my friends, is the work of a true amateur. It gets increasingly easy to identify that the cast is a close-knit group of "gothic" friends who decided on making a horror movie. Hell, if Sam Raimi did it, so could they! Wrong. Deadhouse might be the worst film I've ever seen, but on second thought, I still need to watch the other 2133 movies from Brain Damage.

-mAQ

LEPRECHAUN 3
LEPRECHAUN 3

Brian Trenchard-Smith (1995)

Warwick Davis returns to wreak more havoc in the first direct-to-video sequel of the Leprechaun anthology. This time, he adopts a Dolemite (R.I.P.) form of Irish lingo as he makes a rhyme out of nearly every sentence - most concerning murder and Irish quirks. Leprechaun 3 was the most popular rental film of 1995 and with a decent enough reason to be. It's slightly disappointing that this film wasn't shot in 3D as originally intended though. I would have loved seeing a dwarf in horrific makeup jump out of the screen. A far cry from the original formula, this film is among the first transcendence into kooky territory. Things get completely spacey and racy when the Leprechaun heads into space then into the hood... twice. So far out of memory, this is the most enjoyable sequel I've seen. I need to re-watch a couple of the other films, but this one captures a Teen Wolf motif as Scott slowly turns into a potato eating Leprechaun. Warning: Exposure to Leprechaun bites may lead to nonsensical Irish rhymes, sideburns, a potato fetish, and many other Irish stereotypes to be exploited. Proceed with caution. Once you've seen one comical direct-to-video slasher discharge, you've more or less seen them all. One thing going towards Leprechaun 3 on terms of originality is the pseudo-seductive television woman who transforms into a Giger creation with a hint of Funny Man to fry his circuits. All of the kills are incredibly loony. Eyes pulled out of a sleazy Italian magician's face, death by chainsaw, and strangling a pawn shop broker with a phone cord after a impressionable 15 minute scene toying with his imminent execution. Leprechaun 3 is a pretty light-hearted horror film with some of those post-80s classic gore effects - mainly the toe biting scene. That was insistently graphic for its time. A film that exploits the sin-haven's that are casino's would be Wishmaster 2: Evil Never Dies. The floors for gambling become a flesh farm as the evil Djinn harvests hundreds of souls. Too bad the Leprechaun didn't take advantage of the real Sin City. Instead of imagining a potential body count, he'd rather impersonate Elvis. All in all, Leprechaun 3 is a quirky direct-to-video sequel that is for a fun viewing. It really shows off the DTV capabilities of the 90s compared to the now. It's like modern horror directors aren't trying. If you expect horrible puns and aimless killing as people exploit the power of the Leprechaun's magical coin, you're in for a treat. If you are, however, looking for an intelligent slasher film based around an old Irish legend, you're in for a huge let-down.

-mAQ

THE SUPER

Brian Weaver (2010)

Some things are best left undiscovered. This I have learned after viewing many, many independent horror films with big aspirations. The normal course taken by these forgettable reminders that all can purchase a camera mostly falls on the shoulders of a near-sighted "director" with a grandiose vision including the phrases "homage", "throwback", or even "grindhouse". I am happy to report that The Super is none of these things for it has enough sense to deviate from its originally plotted plan, be it accident or chance. The directing duo, Brian Weaver and Evan Makrogiannis, stray far enough from the fashion of disease-stricken horror and assemble upon an utterly weird state of mind found in the lead character, George Rossi. What occurs isn't so much as what fell upon Polanski's character in The Tenant but from a similar vein. Such an afflicted soul can only take so much frustration before exploding and the shocking and morbid outcome of The Super is where the talent of storytelling was hiding all along.

George Rossi serves as "the Super", short for superintendent. Taking the presumed family business over, this precarious Vietnam veteran has settled down with his beautiful handicapped wife and daughter in the apartment complex run by his truly. Greeting two new tenants, a strange interracial couple consisting of an appropriate African and an alternative, edgy Jewess played by Ruby Larocca, George Rossi makes it very clear of his seemingly honest intentions and fairness. What lies beyond, however, is the crushing pressure from his ever-moody wife to stand up to his tenants and to relocate upstate. Eventually, all this hostility paired with George's bouts of sadistic voyeurism, consume his being and leads him to striking a dynamic and odd relationship with Olga (portrayed by actress Manoush--a woman of German-American and Sinti tribe gypsy ancestry whose brilliant acting enables her to pass for an authentic Russian) which can only culminate in one thing - murder. The Super takes this off-commitment with exaggerating the very psychosis torturing the venerable patriot and proves its mutability. How? By dipping the very process of neo-exploitation into the irresolute subgenre of pseudo-snuff only to yank it back up and flaunt its withstanding of surefire horror poison.

Another thing plaguing these digital films, horror being the number one offender, is the lack of an aesthetic. The Super replaces the need for its biggest shortcoming by introducing lucid, vibrant hues and lighting upon the decadent set of the basement. The benefits of having such a dirty and degenerate lead psychopath are the endless results that can be achieved with a raunchy disregard for life. George Rossi stamps his feet around the apartment complex, cursing "Jew bastards", "Wops", and the ilk. The secondary offender and catalyst to this situation is Olga, the pay-for-service dominatrix on the top floor who has ignored the rent for two months. After helping George out of quite a jam, a crude one at that, the two descend, knife-in-hand, into a bizarre string of aggro-murders (are there any other kind?) with profit and isolation being the only thing on ones mind. What propels Manoush' character into a realm neglected by the majority of low budget horror films is the methodology behind her murders. This is gleefully authenticated with a flashback segment directed by Soiled Sinema favorite Andrey Iskanov. Starring himself as Olga's father, Iskanov downs what is probably the cheapest vodka and presumes to graphically rape his daughter, all in signature form. I'd be lying if I didn't rank this the greatest scene within The Super. If not for Iskanov returning to horror once more than for a segment that does Olga's sickness justice. I am honestly tiring of these stalwart psychopaths without indication of psychopathy - a visual diorama of inciting trauma goes a long way.

THE SUPER

Although The Super is built off the foundation of a veteran angst chronicle, it makes sure not to tip over into the realm of previous contenders Combat Shock or Taxi Driver. Rather, Weaver and Makrogiannis put light to the passive evil and dichotomy between persuasion and temptation. Oh, but of course there must be something to fault The Super with and the scene transitions are pulled to the plate. The Super is generally consistent about its format, but when scenes suddenly transition, you'll catch hints of artificial film grain and scratches, the likes of which would be caused by repeated showings for decades. The acting can vary as well. I found the death rapper Necro's performance to be fluctuating in quality. On one hand, his sadism shines on screen, undoubtedly in a scene involving a forced blowjob, but during his sideshow detective act, seems frigid. Perhaps the lifestyle of which he lives prevents him from passing off normality as his behavior of choice. Regardless of these minor setbacks, The Super stands as one of the few horror films that I've seen in some time that left me satiated. It may not ooze class or represent a high-brow art form, but regardlessly, it is an oft-peculiar look at the cleverly hidden absent-mindedness of a man with so many heads to account for.

-mAQ

SOCIETY

Brian Yuzna (1989)

In the underrated body horror film Society (1989), protagonist Bill Whitney is asked by a thoroughly agitated and sarcastic cop after reporting the mysterious brutal death of his poindexterish friend Petrie, "is it really that hard being rich." Indeed, not only is being rich an oddly burdensome lifestyle for emotionally lonesome Billy Boy, but he is also the black sheep of an incestuous family that shamelessly indulges in hedonistic self-worship and a deleterious form of decadence. During the beginning of Society, Bill mentions to his therapist that he has an irrational fear of his family and community, thus suspecting that he was adopted. Right from the onset of the film, it is quite apparent that Bill is totally out of sync with his community's ostensibly sinister collective unconscious. As Society progresses, Billy becomes increasingly dismayed and extremely paranoid as he hazardously uncovers the wicked and depraved infrastructure of a hidden network of debauched families that make up the upper-class society that he reluctantly belongs to. Society was created in the late 1980s, a culturally bankrupt time when preppies males felt that mullets were the height of culturally refined hairstyles and preppy women wore their hair in such a disheveled manner that they looked like they just finished an all-night orgy. Society was directed by Brian Yuzna, a Filipino-American horror hack best known by fans of the genre as the producer of Stuart Gordon's H.P. Lovecraft adaptations Re-Animator (1985) and From Beyond (1986), as well as for directing/producing the final two films in the Re-Animator trilogy. Both Brian Yuzna and his pal Stuart Gordon have a special talent for turning legendary American horror writer H.P. Lovecraft's stories into shallow pseudo-erotic schlock pieces that even the most zombified of horror fans can digest without too much mental confusion. Don't get me wrong, I enjoy the Re-Animator films (or at least the first two) as much as the next horror fan, but they are a total insult to Lovecraft's sagely Spenglerian horror tales. That being said, I must admit that I was extremely surprised by the quality of Yuzna's directorial debut Society, an audacious and ambitious work that one does not usually expect from the excessively repetitive and often times exceedingly stagnant horror genre. In fact, I can say without the slightest hesitation that I found Society to be better than all three films in the overrated Re-Animator series combined.

Society protagonist Bill Whitney is a handsome (despite his mullet) and athletic high school student who has it all, even while lacking the absolute robotic snobbery often times associated with someone of his distinguished pedigree. When Bill's sister's ex-boyfriend David Blanchard reveals to him an audio tape featuring the voices of his entire family as they participate in an incestuous orgy and murder for pleasure, the high school student finally has enough evidence to support his paranoid suspicions regarding the ambiguously peculiar nature of his family. After all, Bill walks in on his completely nude sister showering and for whatever reason, her boobs somehow managed to reposition themselves on her backside. The first hour or so of Society is like a mix between an artificial (but entertaining) Hitchcockian/De Palma-style murder mystery and an episode of The Twilight Zone directed by a crackhead horror fiend. The final half-hour of Society morphs into a blackest-of-black horror comedy. In fact, the concluding half-hour of Society reminded me of a pleasant unruly mix between David Cronenberg's adaptation of William S. Burrough's Naked Lunch, John Carpenter's They Live, and Stanley Kubrick's Eyes Wide Shut. Of course, Society predates both Naked Lunch and Eyes Wide Shut and was made only a year after They Live, thus Yuzna's film seems to be a totally original and groundbreaking work. For those individuals interested in unholy conspiracy theories about reptilian bloodlines and mutant New Order elites, Society will be a deranged, yet delectable cinematic treat. A member of the debased millionaires featured in the film states the following to a certain underclassman (that will go unnamed) in the film, "You're a different race from us. A different species. A different class. You're not one of us!" Due to their inclusive inbred bloodlines, the upperclassman of Society can perform royally absurd feats, such as relocating their faces on their asses, as we as communally (with flesh to flesh) devouring the low-grade blood and meat of terrified proletarians. To say the least, you will be hard pressed to find another "horror" film like Society that features an undeniably charismatic, yet chilling royal occult army of quasi-cannibals and über-sadistic upper-class degenerates.

SOCIETY

If the totally hypocritical anti-bourgeois bourgeois economist/philosopher Karl Marx were alive today, Society - an astute work that unconventionally, yet successfully combines class satire with wacky bodily dismemberment - would most likely be his favorite horror film. Unlike George A. Romero's Living Dead films, Society does not superficially wallow in an infantile leftist socio-political subtext that immediately wears thin. Also, unlike Romero's Living Dead films, the gut-eating antagonists of Society are cunning, yet ultimately entertaining villains whose disguised motives keep the viewer guessing until the film's gore-gurgling end. To be quite honest, I expected Society to be another overrated and ultimately retarded horror flick, but nothing could be further from the truth. Instead, I found Society to be a wildly invigorating and criminally underrated horror film that makes most heralded masterworks of the genre seem intellectually and creatively bankrupt by comparison. The rich families featured in Society reminded me of the hyper-inbred Rothschild banking dynasty and their associate families (like the Rockefellers and the Schiffs), as no other family in human history has been responsible for so many deaths and wars around the world. As Billy is told by his therapist Dr. Cleveland, "Didn't you know Billy boy? The rich have always sucked off low-class shit like you." Indeed, Society is a delightful and diverting carnivalesque cinematic portrait composed of ultrapretentious upperclassmen who sportfully engage in hunting and shunting members of the untermensch working-class non-society just for the mere aristocratic pleasure. Stephen Biro (owner of Uearthed Films) apparently wrote a script for a Society sequel entitled Society 2: Body Modification, but it is now (apparently) an aborted project. Upon first hearing about the sequel project, it seemed like a cinematically appetizing possibility, but now I am glad the project is dead, as such a work would most likely be a crude insult to the original film. Hopefully, the audaciously idiosyncratic film Society will one day earn the prestige that it justly deserves from the Sinema world.

-Ty E

ROTTWEILER
ROTTWEILER

Brian Yuzna (2004)

Brain Yuzna has created multiple entertaining horror films that are worth their weight in gold and true treasures when it comes to rental chains. I was excited to see that he had created a Spanish killer canine film but failed to realize that the Spanish film was the one that I used to mock when I saw it on the shelves. This only dawned on me after the atrocious experiment in a human tolerance theory was over and I lay on the floor re-evaluating my choices. Two men escape prison in an extremely tired fashion. Of course, things don't go as planned and the partner in cuffs is killed leaving a dismembered arm on a chain. From this scene, our leading lady Dante delivers many bland chase scene from a horrible prosthetic robot dog that hardly strikes fear into the hearts of men. In fact, it kind of resembles a four legged Furby. Things don't pick up too much until when you realize that the character has amnesia. He is a rich American douche who picked up a Latino chick and played some real life role playing game about infiltration. Needless to say, the little snots get what they deserve. The rape and murder scene left me entirely apathetic as these characters lacked any common sense and or rational human traits. Brian Yuzna has had too much of a good thing. He gets by left and right with shitty classics and still manages to make a profit off of less-than-average work. Rottweiler is a horrible film on all levels. The only thing I really enjoyed was the CGI Terminator dog. The ending is rushed as with this review (I'm not going to waste my time on something that preemptively wasted mine) and caps off an end to a story that never really should have started. He should have stuck with the Re-animator series.

-mAQ

MY NAME IS BRUCE

Bruce Campbell (2007)

Bruce Campbell is loved by everyone except few. I am proud to be one of the few horror fans to despise his cameos and recycled cocky attitude, and yes, I accept hate mail. He's transversed many fields including acting in motion pictures, acting in syndicated television programs, to becoming an author making flashy quips about being in love with Richard Gere while throwing out cute jokes about being a "B actor". As much as Brucie would like to be a "B actor", his filmography and income is far too steep for such a trashy title. Much like Kevin Smith films, My Name is Bruce opens with two counter-cultured teenagers discussing pop culture and cinema jests. Such horrible lines as "I loved Bubba Ho-Tep!" are scattered around the scripts. While the omniscient ideology of Bruce Campbell's career is fully appreciated, if I ever hear the phrase "Cave Aliens" again, I will crash my car into an elementary school. Bubba Ho-Tep was perhaps one of the worst projects in Campbell's career. Not for the acting or production values, but for how mind-numbingly boring the film was. It took me months to finish it. Incredibly similar to Bubba Ho-Tep before it, a monster is unleashed in a shockingly similar style to that of Bubba Ho-Tep, except this Chinese god of war is explained in a country drab complete with guitars and southern yodeling. As the film progressed further, I found myself enjoying the film for what it was. Back when this film was but a mere rumor, I thought that Bruce Campbell would have found himself at arms with a deadite. I prefer the idea of the esteemed Mr. Campbell fighting the one thing that brought upon this fame. Lets face it. The only good things Bruce Campbell starred in are far from outweighing the horrible. Bruce Campbell proves himself to be competent enough to capitalize off of his own image by making a parody of himself. Why not? As far as the reality would allow, this film is all complete bullshit. I had expected an accurate portrayal of Campbell's life shattered by the idea of a real evil, not some pseudo-biopic displaying Bruce lapping up vodka from a dog dish and courting transsexual singing prostitutes. The good news? I enjoyed My Name is Bruce thoroughly and it proved to be an enjoyable horror/comedy experience. The bad news? I still dislike Bruce Campbell's artificial persona.

-mAQ

HAMMER
HAMMER

Bruce D. Clark (1972)

Shortly after Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song and Shaft fly-away eminence, Hammer was released starring Fred "The Hammer" Williamson. His first starring vehicle and true to his nickname earned in major league football, Hammer remains one of the strangest and archaic forms of blaxploitation cinema around. Ideally, the term is attached to loose-lipped action packed films in which soul seeps from every possible orifice. Someone must have missed the memo with Hammer and what we are given is a tight-knit drama with brief shimmers of jive and an excellent William Smith as the villainesque character. B.J. Hammer is this cats name and brawling is his game, which is why local crime boss Big Sid recruits him to be a prizefighter for the mob. Things get sticky once they tell Hammer to throw a fight and once he refuses and they kidnap his woman, Hammer ponders on how to defuse the situation at any cost. Unlike most blaxploitation titles, you won't find any African aesthetic as per the standard of the later fare. Hammer is certainly no Slaughter or Truck Turner and this just goes to show how premature the idea of his half-cooked film really was. It must have been conceived by a mind that couldn't discern the value of these black action pictures and instead created a thematically white film with a very thin layer of Negro attitude - because that is the form that Hammer takes on.

That's not to say Hammer isn't worth watching, especially for blaxploitation completists. On the contrary, Hammer is filmed exceptionally well and is a very classy picture but without grand excitement or crude attitude which is what the genre is known for. Once the film picks up, mainly to say after the dock fight in which Hammer ditches a meat hook in order to plant his fist in the gut of a disgruntled worker, the film conjures up some of what makes these films so great. A scene I'm referring to is when the white mistress of Big Sid slips into Hammer's room as he rests and proceeds to try to seduce the bull. Once Hammer gets a phone call giving him a second chance with an Afro'd mama, he kicks Rhoda to the curb and leaves her to get beaten by the jealous and enraged Brenner, portrayed excellently by William Smith. Throughout the film, Brenner expresses his displeasure with the many Africans he works alongside. During scenes of torture, he wears a mask of intense satisfaction that makes his character "pop" off screen while the others simply settle into the dust. Hammer is sugar, spice, and all things nice. It doesn't contain any of Fred Williamson's later charm but does unite "The Hammer" with co-star D'Urville Martin - the two later went on to star in Boss Nigger, which, by definition, is black sensationalism incarnate. The inclusion of D'Urville Martin's character, Sonny, in Hammer is a steaming deus ex machina for further commenting on brothers selling out. The character only exists for B.J. to attempt to assimilate back into his low-income community after hitting the limelight, leaving them to slap his hand, disappear, then reappear by films end to give you the promised "Black Explosion".

"Looks like somebody gave you a good nigger whipping."

Hammer isn't the ideal introductory film for those uneducated in Fred Williamson, who later proves his worth with the sordid Black Cobra series and many other black oddities worth noting. Hammer definitely abides by Williamson's own credo of always getting the woman and never losing a fight - such Afro-narcissism goes a long way for spoiled entertainment. But in the end, Hammer delivers not a thing that we require of its company - not an explosion, nor a memorable soul soundtrack exempt from borrowing from Hayes. Hammer candidly gets by with its time-capsule aspect of a very young Fred Williamson doing very stale cinema. If you had any previous appetite for this film, your best bet would be to skip on further down his filmography in favor of fine dining. Hammer is a fossil in every way. Scenes of note are Fred Williamson playing father figure to his little fans in the street. It always tickles me to see hardened action heroes, known for murdering over such fickle things, kneel down and play role model to the "future business leaders" of America. Fred Williamson might be one groovy turkey but Hammer fails to hit the nail on the head, oh, please pardon that pun.

-mAQ

NO SKIN OFF MY ASS
NO SKIN OFF MY ASS

Bruce LaBruce° (1991)

Supposedly Kurt Cobain's favorite film according to mainstream abberosexual auteur Gus Van Sant (My Own Private Idaho, Elephant) – who directed a film loosely based on the reluctant famous rock star's suicide for his mundane minimalist pseudo-arthouse flick Last Days (2005) – No Skin Off My Ass (1993) directed by homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce (Hustler White, Otto; or Up With Dead People) is undoubtedly one of the most positively perverse 'punk' flicks ever directed, not least of all due to its sadomasochistic, skinhead-sucking protagonist played by the director himself. Inspired by and vaguely a decidedly debauched remark of Robert Altman's overlooked minor masterpiece That Cold Day in the Park (1969) – a certainly chilling and creepy cinematic work about a wealthy yet lonely spinster who invites a young and handsome proletarian boy that is pretending to be mute into her apartment and inevitably imprisoning him but at the same time attending to his every need, including buying him prostitutes – No Skin Off My Ass centers around a poofer punker hairdresser who ironically falls in love with a shaven and stoic yet simpleminded skinhead, takes him home, gives him a bath, and locks him in one of his bedrooms. Patently politically incorrect in terms of its imagery and some of its sentiments and not the least bit pretentious for an audacious arthouse work, No Skin Off My Ass, despite its lack of production values and all around technical incompetency as a cinematic work, proved to be a potent first feature-length for Bruce LaBruce as it signified the arrival of an aberrant-garde auteur who was only out to construct his own carelessly crude, carnally campy, and even creepy fetishes and fantasies in grainy celluloid form. A born masochist, LaBruce once admitted in an interview in regard to a real-life neo-nazi hustler boyfriend of his that, "He needed a place to stay, and I didn't know how into Nazism he was, so I took him in. I kept ridiculing him for his views and beliefs and trying to talk him out of it. Then he got fed up with me one night and beat the crap out of me. So I kicked him out. But there was definitely a sexual dimension to it. On some level, I got turned on." And, indeed, No Skin Off My Ass is a softcore pornographic work of minimalist movie masochism that – with its zit-popping perversity and boot-to-butt buggery – is anti-erotic in its essence, at least if you're anyone aside from Bruce LaPoof. In the tradition of Kenneth Anger (Scorpio Rising, Lucifer Rising), early John Waters (Pink Flamingos, Desperate Living) and Fred Halsted (The Sex Garage, LA Plays Itself), No Skin Off My Ass is a hyper-homo arthouse trash flick where one does not have to be a flaming fairy, fierce fist-fucker, nor homophile hipster to enjoy it.

A fan of the classic horror punk band The Misfits, as well as hair sissy salon-styling and masculine hetero hunks, "The Hairdresser" (played by Bruce LaBruce himself) is a severely sad fellow who gets all sappy and sentimental over solitary skinhead boys with big boots and bald heads. One day whilst strolling around a local public park, he spots a depressed bootboy (played by assumedly Aryan aristocrat Klaus von Brucker) sitting all by his lonesome on a park bench and his maternal man-meat craving instincts kick in, so the Hairdresser decides to talk the sad and speechless skin into coming back to his punk pad. A master of ridiculous manipulation, the horny hairstylist surprisingly is able to also talk the melancholy macho man into stripping his skinhead uniform under the preposterous pretense of giving him a bath. The skinhead may not be the brightest bootboy in town, but he has a loony lesbian filmmaker sister named "Jonesy" (played by real-life Riot grrrl lezzy filmmaker/musician G.B. Jones) who is working on a pussy-licking agitprop piece entitled "Girls of the SLA" – in tribute to the far-left terrorist group comprised of cuckold crackers, mudshark murderers, and a Negro rapist Führer best known for their sexual torture and brainwashing of American heiress Patty Hearst – that acts as a sort of brain for her bald brainless bro. A fierce feminist punk pussy-licker that loathes shaved heads but loves shaven cunts, Jonesy tells her brother that "If you're a skinhead, you're stupid, and if you're queer, you're smart" and "The second best thing to being a dyke is being a fag" as if potentially getting AIDS from a creepy punk hairdresser is a wild and wonderful virtue straight from the perverse playbook of Rosa von Praunheim. Of course, as a lecherous lesbo of the lunatic libertine kind, Jonesy has no problem filming her brother's cock in compromised sexual positions, but such is the wacky wiener world of Bruce LaBruce where sociopolitical messages are an intrinsic part of the entire cinematic package, but portrayed to the point of preposterous parody whether a penis is involved (it usually is) or not. Featuring music from groups ranging from the ska punk band Operation Ivy's cover of the Nancy Sinatra hit "These Boots Are Made For Walking" and Deutsch diva Nico's cover of the German national anthem "Das Lied der Deutschen," No Skin Off My Ass surely makes for one those most anarchistic postmodern softcore gay porn flicks ever made.

Still a 'work-in-progress' as a filmmaker at the time of completely his first feature, LaBruce has pointed out certain flaws – both aesthetic and philosophical – in No Skin Off My Ass, but the most insightful is the following from an interview excerpt he did for the book The View From Here: Conversations with Gay and Lesbian Filmmakers (2007) by Matthew Hays regarding the quote from the film "If you're a skinhead, you're stupid...if you're queer, you're smart": "I felt very influenced by that ideological conformity for a while, like in No Skin Off My Ass (1991)...It was an upbeat message that it's cool to be a fag, but it's also naïve and simplistic: we were trying to be provocative in other ways which undercut that straightforward message....After that, some friends made me aware that I was still kind of brainwashed by my Marxist-feminist education at University. They slapped me out of it...I got freed from that...I try not to think about [my work] in terms of having a gay agenda." Of course, No Skin Off My

NO SKIN OFF MY ASS

Ass – a work that freakishly fetishizes the ‘neo-fascist’ body in a way that no limp-wristed leftist would dare – still proved that LaBruce was a filmmaker that was more interesting in pleasing himself than his mentally defective Che Guevara shirt-wearing cock-sucking compatriots. The Teutophile auteur would also go on to direct Skin Flick (1999) aka Skin Gang; a work featuring a seemingly braindead bootboy busting his load on an original edition of Uncle Adolf’s Mein Kampf, as well as a depiction of a gay bourgeois mixed race couple that is less flattering than that of the skinhead sodomites that rape them. In the tradition of Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s The Third Generation (1979), LaBruce also parodied the megalomania of kraut RFA-style far-left terrorist with his seedy and satirical cinematic work The Raspberry Reich (2004) aka The Revolution Is My Boyfriend, thus it should be no surprise for anyone who has seen No Skin Off My Ass that the poof-punk auteur went in this daring, mainstream-gay-scaring direction in his filmmaking career. Regarding his fixation with the bare-skinned and buggering neo-brownshirt bootboy, the director remarked in an interview: “I have a bit of German blood in me...I find it intriguing that the Germans went from being this Aryan Überpower to being a kind of downtrodden nation. All the great shame they’ve suffered; perpetrating the holocaust has created a certain humility in many of the them. Yet they still have that German pride about them, an ego. It’s an interesting psychology, this restrained ego.” That being said, if a homocore Canad-Aryan filmmaker has to pass on the Teutonic torch because authentic Aryans are too busy getting shit and pissed on when not pandering to politically correct perversity than so be it, as I certainly don’t see Teutonic aristocrat of ass-eating and flagrant fag Führer Rosa von Praunheim doing it anytime soon, although he certainly seems to be a fan of Bruce LaBruce’s films as testified by his inclusion of a scene from Skin Gang in his documentary Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis (2005). Now LaBruce just needs to do a pornographic remark of Veit Harlan’s Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß as the world would be a better place because of it, at least for the the Nancy Boy-hating neo-nazis of the effete filmmaker’s flesh-based fantasy world.

-Ty E

SUPER 8½

Bruce LaBruce° (1994)

Named in terrible tongue-in-twink tribute to Italian maestro Federico Fellini's autobiographical film-within-a-film 8 ½ (1963), the dead home movie film format that it was (at least in part) shot on, and the director's much embellished yet nonetheless relished dick size, Super 8 ½: A Cautionary Bio-Pic (1994) directed by controversial Canadian homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce (The Raspberry Reich, Otto; or, Up with Dead People) is quite an odd choice for the filmic fairies' second feature-length effort, especially so considering it is about an over-the-hill artsy fartsy pornographer (played by LaBruce himself), but then again it is a mockumentary, if not one grounded in wild and wanton truths. Although a semi-pornographic work starring LaBruce himself in the lead role as a fictional porn-star-turned-pretentious-arthouse-trash-auteur who is being interviewed for a documentary directed by a sleazy and less than seductive lesbo filmmaker, Super 8 ½ seems a tad bit tame, conspicuously cliché (even if that was the director's intention, which it most certainly was), and lacking aesthetic and thematic potency when compared to the filmmaker's terribly technically incompetent yet undoubtedly uncompromising first feature-length film No Skin Off My Ass (1993) in its iconoclastic fagdom. Parodying and referencing cinematic works ranging from Douglas Sirk's classic Hollywood melodrama Written on the Wind (1956) to Andy Warhol's Blue Movie (1969) aka Fuck to LaBruce's own work No Skin Off My Ass, Super 8 ½ is essentially a caustic combo of movie trivia and man-meat masturbation as what amounts to a sort of anti-climatic and feeble fag-film-fanboy's wet dream, but, unfortunately, if it were not for the filmmaker's horrible (albeit, to some extent intentional) acting, it would be hard for someone to distinguish between the innate character of the real homocore auteur and the fiercely foul fellatio-based fantasies of his self-deprecating filmic alter-ego. Needless to say, Super 8 ½ is certainly no 8 ½, nor does LaBruce's member seem even remotely the size the film's title boasts, but one only needs to watch the superlatively shallow cinematic cesspool of cinematic sodomy to see that the eccentrically effete auteur is not kidding anyone, not even himself.

Until relatively recently with the aberrant advent of 'gay rights' identity politics and what have you, cocksuckers and carpet-munchers were generally arch-nemesis's of sorts and I assume on a personal level this is still the case today. Indeed, such is the case in Super 8 ½; a sod-saluting and Sapphic-smearing cinematic work where the women have a little too much testosterone and the males do not have enough. In Super 8 ½, Bruce LaBruce as "Bruce" goes 'full fairy' in his filmic farce where a prissy pansy of an ex-porn-star-turned-filmmaker candidly recollects his road to ruin as an audacious artistic ass-et to the transgressive arthouse underground realm for a bean-flicking femme-nazi documentary filmmaker who has nil qualms about exploiting the washed-up fagola pornographer. Needless to say, Bruce's pretensions towards being taken seriously as an auteur 'artiste' are laughable at best, but no one is laughing. Aside from featuring LaBruce as more or less himself, but to a more prolific, perilously pansified, and artistically distinguished degree, thereupon foreshadowing his career as prominent pole-smoking, porn-possessed queercore auteur, Super 8 ½ also includes a cameo from alt porn auteur Richard Kern (Submit to me Now, Detachable Penis) as himself playing a role in a fictional film where he sports a wretched wiry wig and strap-on dildo (apparently, due to too much heroin, he was unable to 'rise to the occasion'). Kern's appearance is especially worthwhile and significant as many of LaBruce's faux-films in Super 8 ½ seem like piss poor imitations of the NYC-based filmmaker's preposterously poor, prosaic pornography. Also, like most of Kern's films, Super 8 ½ is neither hardcore enough to be considered a boner-fide work of pornography, nor subversive enough to be considered truly 'transgressive' cinema, especially when compared with the films of its infinitely more cinematically-inclined erotic arthouse American and Euro-sleaze predecessors like Alberto Cavallone, Walerian Borowczyk, Tinto Brass, Radley Metzger, and Stephen Sayadian, among countless others. Of course, the main difference between the films of Cavallone and Brass in comparison with the likes of lavender cowboys LaBruce and Kern is that a sort punk/DIY aesthetic and philosophy permeates throughout the latter two filmmaker's cinematic oeuvres. One learns while watching Super 8 ½ that ever since unexpectedly losing his interest in directing the tentatively titled work The Reluctant Pornographer aka Super 8 ½, Brucey's life has lacked direction, film directing, and erections. Aside from getting in feeble fights with his skinhead/hu$tlér ex-boyfriend and putting his clownish make-up on in an exceedingly dainty manner so as to make a spectacle of himself when in front of the camera, spruce Bruce's life has been languishing in a lewd la la land of lecherous losers and lesbians; undoubtedly the same sordid sort that were also prominent in the subversive arthouse porn world he used to be a part of. A bitter and butch lesbo only makes his life all the more of a hellish homo hu$tlér horror show, but he has nothing better to do anyhow as he has no plans to get a real job, let alone a blowjob.

How do you become a porn star? You blow; or so says the all but totally intolerable, twink-trotting terminal man-toddler protagonist of Bruce LaBruce's second feature film. Easily LaBruce's most lackluster and ultimately forgettable (and thankfully so) work to date, Super 8 ½ is certainly in no way worthy of being named in the same sentence as the Fellini masterpiece that, at best, only superficially inspired it at the most rudimentary level, but I guess that is what one would expect from a pomo homo flick directed by an auteur who knew more about fag film history than actual filmmaking when he conceived this completely convoluted and curiously uncurious cock-sucking celluloid abortion. Although similarly poorly directed and amateurishly gritty like his previous effort No Skin Off My Ass, LaBruce's Super 8 ½ lacks the rather risqué and thematically risky romantic spirit that permeated quite perversely yet playfully throughout his first feature. Even the fag-flaunting writers of Images in the Dark: An Encyclopedia of Gay and Lesbian Film and Video (1996) had to admit that Super 8 ½ is a “mild disappointment” and a “structural mess,” thereupon underscoring the lezzy documentarian featured in the futile film’s words, “I don’t give a damn about continuity...any way.” I also have to assume that LaBruce agrees as he seems to make little, if any, references to Super 8 ½ in interviews, but then again, the flop of a film also features the drug-addled auteur unclad in all his unglory, smoking poles and gracelessly baring his (then) scrawny ass for the weary world to see. After all, even Rosa von Praunheim has his limits and thankfully refraining from featuring himself in nothing but boots on an open highway is one of them. As the loveless lesbian filmmaker in Super 8 ½ states in regard to the dubious size of Bruce’s member as specified in the film’s title, “It didn’t quite measure up to reality” and neither does LaBruce’s clearly ambitious yet erratically defecated, sorry scatological second feature. If any of LaBruce’s films merit a fanatical fag-bashing in retaliation for the filmmaker’s less than fresh fruity filmmaking, it is unequivocally Super 8 ½; a sad cinematic work that proves that watching too many porn flicks can lead to a brutal case of brain damage and a serious identity crisis.

-Ty E

HUSTLER WHITE
HUSTLER WHITE

Bruce LaBruce° (1996)

A proud parodical poofer's postmodern guide to hustler flicks and classic Hollywood cinema, Hustler White (1996) co-directed by homocore film hero Bruce LaBruce (No Skin Off My Ass, Otto; or Up With Dead People) and S&M/bondage photographer/filmmaker Rick Castro (45 Minutes of Bondage, Plushies and Furies) – an aptly titled cinematic work if there ever was one – is a film that follows the day-in-the-life of a criminally-inclined hustler who gets into peddling flesh in a desperate attempt to support a baby boy that may or not be his as he is stalked by a patently pretentious and prudish yet prestigious European writer without an accent who is writing a book on the laurels of gay prostitution and pornography in Hollywood. Beginning with a shot of the anally-inclined hustler anti-hero floating dead face down in a jacuzzi as he narrates the events that would lead to his premature death-by-hot-tub, Hustler White is a loose remake/tribute/parody of Billy Wilder's film noir masterpiece Sunset Boulevard (1950) with nods to Paul Morrissey's parody of the same film Heat (1972), as well as the Factory auteur filmmaker's first official feature Flesh (1968) in its divinely deranged depiction of a young gigolo playing with a baby while au naturel, among countless other film references including The Wizard of Oz (1939), Easy Rider (1969), Death in Venice (1971), and Cocksucker Blues (1972), to name a few. Beginning with British post-industrial group Coil's cover of "Tainted Love" – a mournful and macabre AIDS-themed rendition of the song – Hustler White opens with an orgasmic bang that echoes Gus Van Sant's rendition of streetwalker Shakespeare My Own Private Idaho (1991), yet LaBruce's film is nowhere near as serious and tragic as the Good Will Hunting (1997) director's odyssey into poetic poof prostitution. A sardonic black comedy to the conspicuously corrupted core, Hustler White features abhorrent Afrocentric ass-reamers with a proclivity towards penetrating lily white meat, sharply dressed morticians with an unhealthy fetish for duct tape and leather corsets, skinhead streetwalkers who dine on dickheads and loath kissing, crippled cocksuckers who fist men with their sickening stubs, and a variety of other overwhelming oddities of hyper-homo-depravity that would be totally indigestible if it were not for LaBruce's cheap yet clever campy comedic charm. Bruce LaBruce at his best or in other words, most grotesque yet most cinematically gregarious, Hustler White manages to find hysterical humor in some of the most horrid, humiliating, and horrifying sex scenarios ever captured in a carefully constructed narrative film. If you have ever had any doubts as to whether or not Los Angeles is the modern day Sodom and Gomorrah of bought and sold high-dollar sin and sodomy, you have yet to see LaBruce's anti-erotic excursion in revolting and ruinous celluloid perversion Hustler White; a film that reminds one why sodomites are the greatest spreader of AIDS and superficial sass.

A brainless yet becoming born loser with a lecherous libido and con-artist wit, Montgomery Ward (played by Madonna's ex-boyfriend Tony Ward who later appeared in LaBruce's 2010 scatological zombie porn flick L.A. Zombie as a hobo junky) may not be the most sophisticated hustler on the beat-up boulevards he struts his stuff on like a bragging bohunk who watched too many Rocky Balboa movie marathons, but he is a master of conning and cumming on people with his cock and cheating everyone with his crass and contemptible charm. Needless to say, Mr. Ward finds himself an unlikely admirer in the form of a prissy writer from Europa named Jürgen Anger (played by Bruce LaBruce himself in a super sardonic role) who, as he has to remind people quite often, is not related to Kenneth Anger, but he is just as extremely effeminate, innately introverted, and superlatively secretive as the Thelemite auteur and in Hustler White he will stop at nothing to meekly worship his lecherous "Lucifer." Also in town are a gang of gay Negro gangbangers led by a sexually ambiguous and quite corpulent and homosexual version of Marcus Garvey (played by so-called "Genderqueer" Vaginal Davis) who disseminates black power by inseminating cracka' cornholes via racially-charged gang rape, a sadomasochistic mortician (played by real-life, HIV-positive extreme S&M performance artist Ron Athey) who believes skin-heads make especially sufficient sex slaves, especially while being suffocated with duct-tape by a male maniac in drag, and an assortment of various other fierce fairies, fervent fudgepackers, and high-strung hunk hustlers from the busted bowels of Southern California hell. In between various scenes of heinous yet exceedingly humorous hustler-John relations of Hustler White, Jürgen Anger – a dapper douchebag who gets off to fondling and sniffing the bloody, body odor off the ripped t-shirt of a very potentially STD-ridden hustler – hunts for the he-hooker of his dream, Montgomery Ward; a proud and potent philistine whose only thoughts in life revolve around where and when he should sling his misused manhood so as to obtain money, money, and more money.

Throughout Hustler White, various candid interviews are featured off-screen with Montgomery Ward regarding his underground and uniquely unsung occupation of bought and sold sodomy. Mr. Ward, who himself is racially off-white at best, states without the slightest indication of irony that hustlers like to wear white because it signifies "purity." As for his dubious sexual persuasion, when asked whether he is gay or straight, Ward states, "I'm a hustler," thereupon echoing Joe Dallesandro's – who was a real-life switch-hitting streetwalker – questionable and unclassifiable sexual persuasion in the "Paul Morrissey Trilogy" (Flesh, Trash, Heat) as a miscreant man who sees his own flesh and body as nothing more than a marvelous moneymaking commodity that is an end in itself with no personal pleasure principle. Like virtually all of Bruce LaBruce's films, Hustler White is a work that, while it fetishizes and glorifies the exceedingly seedy and salacious, also unsentimentally parodies it to such a preposterous level that the director seems to have transcended the works of his filmic heroes Paul

HUSTLER WHITE

Morrissey (and, to a lesser extent, Andy Warhol) and John Waters. In its very essence, Hustler White is a hypnotically hysterical homage to hustler films and the very best of its kind, which I guess does not say much, but it surely does go as far as giving new life to crude camp classics like Warhol's My Hustler (1965) and Richard Stockton The Meatrack (1965). As for the true 'auteur' behind the film, the humor and story seem to be a putrid product of LaBruce's debauched brain and the fetishistic/pornographic material seems to mostly be Rick Castro's bent brainchild, especially if one considers that many of the 'actors' featured in Hustler White also did photo shoots for the bondage pornographer. As Bruce LaBruce explained in an interview, "The French freak out over Hustler White, in a good way. It was well reviewed by all of the major publications there. They tried to give it an X rating, but it was appealed in the press. A former minister of culture even publicly defended the film. Based on its popularity, my two previous films were also released in France," which says a lot when an unrepentant Germanophile of the rather ridiculously risqué has managed to impress a nation of proud perverts who have literally fucked the world, both literally and figuratively, via colonization and plainly pretentious and pessimistic pornographic 'arthouse' films. Naturally, I have a hard time believing that some froggy feminist filmmaker like Catherine Breillat would derive any enjoyment from watching No Skin Off My Ass or Skin Gang, but then again, maybe the French just love Bruce LaBruce's name. Despite the beginning of the film leading the viewer to think the contrary, Hustler White concludes on a happy note, which is virtually unheard of in the Hustler subgenre, thus leading the viewer to conclude that beneath all his punk rock perversity, Bruce LaBruce is just a sappy sentimental queen with the dream of being uniting with his hustler hunk king. Either way, Hustler White is guaranteed to give the viewer nightmares of streetwalkers with severed feet and being duct-taped-to-death. Of course, if modern gay-loving America needs an antidote to homo-homogenizing, it is by way of the horror-movie-like hustler's of LaBruce's sicko pomo homo S&M-fest Hustler White.

-Ty E

THE RASPBERRY REICH

Bruce LaBruce° (2004)

If I was forced to name Bruce LaBruce's most obscenely overwrought and aesthetically asinine cinematic works, the honor would go to the culturally-mongrelized German-Canadian pornographic production The Raspberry Reich (2004) aka The Revolution Is My Boyfriend (the uncut version edited by kraut gay porn company Cazzo) – a work marking the abberosexual auteur filmmaker's second 'adult film' following the satirically sexually sadistic skinhead-exploitation pic Skin Flick (1999) aka Skin Gang – as I cannot think of another film that bombarded me with such a grandly grating combination of positively putrid politics, perversion, and pictorialization of the tongue-in-twink patent pansy persuasion. Of course, no LaBruce film is without sardonic satire of the oftentimes severely self-deprecating sort as the Canadian filmmaker has framed his film-making career around hyper-intellectual yet seemingly idiotic filmic mockery, and The Raspberry Reich is most certainly far from an exception to this scatological auteur signature, as the anti-arthouse pornographer tackles two very personal yet universal themes: sex and politics. As a homo-kultur-hating-homo and a lapsed leftist of the formerly philo-Semitic Freudian-Marxist pedigree, it was only natural that Bruce LaPoof – an undeniably masochistic fellow who spent his college years keeping his mind firmly in the gutter by reading works by Judeo-Marxist "Father of the New Left" Herbert Marcuse and carnal commie sexologist Wilhelm Reich – would direct a film parodying the terroristic political germs of Germany, the Red Army Faction (RAF), and as one can expect from the homo-core auteur, The Raspberry Reich contains a crude collection of crazed cocksuckers for communism. Indeed, with his previous work Skin Gang, LaBruce tackled the forbidden realms of fierce fags for fascism where bodacious buggering bootboys with shaved heads pound mixed race bourgeois couples with their dicks, even portraying the limp-wristed men of miscegenation as more ill-natured and humorless than a brutal brigade of backdoor bombarding, boner-worshipping neo-brownshirts, so it was only natural that the filmmaker creamed out a curious cynical commie celluloid cumshot of sorts via The Raspberry Reich. Although the punk fairy filmmaker ultimately ditched the pussy politics of his youth, the production of the film would, in a sense, be the closest LaBruce ever got to be an urban guerilla, describing the creation of The Raspberry Reich as follows in an interview: "When we were making The Raspberry Reich, I got the sense of what it might be like to be in the Baader-Meinhof gang. It was "Guerilla filmmaking." We had to make everything on the cheap, on the fly, without permits, running around the city with guns, trying to be secret, getting found out, and then getting kicked out of places. In one location where we shot, a bunch of kids found out that it was a porn set, so they climbed the trees to peer in the windows. It felt like we were under surveillance. Even on that level, the whole thing felt like a terrorist act. Just to manage to make a porn film about terrorism and get it shown at major film festivals feels like a coup." Indeed, LaBruce certainly speaks the truth when he uses the word "terrorist" because if anything is a work of "aesthetic terrorism," it is The Raspberry Reich; a magnificent celluloid mockery of Marxist intellectual masturbation and male emasculation. Of course, in the politically, socially, and sexually retarded realm of The Raspberry Reich, "masturbation is counter-revolution" and "Heterosexuality is the opiate of the masses."

THE RASPBERRY REICH

Arguably, the most fundamental distinction between Marxism and Fascism, especially of the post-WWII blend, is that while the latter is a mostly a male-led and masculine movement that espouses honor, taking pride in one's work, and a master mentality, the former is an innately effeminate political persuasion that sees work as the height of human degradation, worships the weak majority over the superior minority, is rooted in jealousy and a need for vengeance against the successful (the Marxist messiah himself, Karl Marx, was a failed bourgeois who never worked a day in his life and lived off the generosity of others, including Engels), promotes equality (i.e. collective mediocrity) and a decided disdain for the patriarch, so it should be no surprise that women were prominent in the Red Army Faction, among countless other far-left groups before and after them, and the case is no different for The Raspberry Reich; a film about a commie cuntress who leads her biologically 'male' cuckold compatriots into sucking cock against capitalism. Led by a less than ladylike egomaniacal gyno-supremacist Gudrun (Susanne Sachße) – a rather warped and wacky bitch suffering from sort of acute nympho-nihilism who justifies her all-consuming moral corruption and childishly contrived criminality by spouting absurd pan-sexual-neo-marxist slogans like "Out of the bedrooms into the streets!" (while engaging in sex in front of elderly people in a public elevator) and "Heterosexuality is the opiate of the masses" (when trying to force her heterosexual male comrades, including her suffering boyfriend, into cum-guzzling) – the so-called "Sixth Generation of the Baader-Meinhof Gang" aka "The Raspberry Reich" haphazardly plots to kidnap the son of a rich wealthy industrial named Patrick (Andreas Rupprecht); a recently out-of-the-closet sodomite who supremely sucks at skateboarding and likes to suck cock. After forcing her boyfriend Holger (Daniel Bätcher) to fuck his friend Che (Daniel Fettig) – a chronic masturbator who gets off to skimasks, handguns, and images of Che Guevara – Gudrun has her seemingly braindead band of terrorist underlings capture poor Patrick and, to the delight of the dick-loving hostage, perform homosexual acts on him so as to join the "The Homosexual Intifada". Little does everyone know that Clyde (Anton Z. Risan) – the weakest twin in the sexually subversive Sixth Generation – has already started a butt-pirate bond with Patrick. When it is revealed to the female Führer of flaming firebrand fag-scism that Patrick is a poofster partisan who agrees with the terrorist group's perverted political ideology, Gudrun declares him the Raspberry Reich's "Patty Hearst" and a "prisoner of love," which he happily accepts as a faggy fan of force-entry fornicating. Although originally intending to send Patty boy's fag-bashing father a video of his sperm burper son being sodomized by the turd-burglar terrorist so as to obtain ransom money, the revolutionary plans go awfully awry when love, betrayal, and megalomania get in the way of things. Ultimately, the intemperate terrorists become victims of their own political dogma due to their full-force fanaticism for flesh and dicks becoming bigger than petty politics.

Citing Serbian auteur Dušan Makavejev's W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism (1971) – a work the Canadian director once claimed he "literally stole entire scenes from" – as the primary cinematic influence for The Raspberry Reich, Bruce LaBruce proved he was able to turn an esoteric Reichian/anti-Stalinist Slavic work into a MTV-esque porn flick of the aesthetically crappy kraut sort, which is certainly not a small 'accomplishment,' if you can call it that. Whereas in German New Wave auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's The Third Generation (1979) – an absurdist work the director described as satirizing the third generation (following the '68ers and the Badder-Meinhof Group) of commie terrorism in West Germany, "which simply acts without thinking, which has neither a policy nor an ideology and which, certainly without realizing it, lets itself be manipulated by others, like a bunch of puppets" – LaBruce's The Raspberry Reich depicts a degenerate establishment of so-called anti-establishment terrorists that has been spoon-fed since birth played-out leftist political swill taught to them in public schools and universities, thereupon being the very thing they claim to hate; mindless automatons who ultimately champion crude theoretical caricatures of relatively mainstream ideas, hence why Gudrun ends up a bourgeois mother after all, even if she continues to rape the minds of passive individuals by regurgitating sterile political statistics via her infant child. After all, what is more trendy today among college students than being effete feminist, cultural Marxist cocksuckers whose idea of liberation is fucking as many people as possible, especially members of the same sex and/or of a different race (the darker the better), getting abortions on demand, dressing like sexually confounded prostitutes, quoting Jewish and other non-white leftist authors, and donating corporate-earned cash to dubious non-profit organizations like the SPLC and ACLU? Indeed, the would-be-radical-revolutionaries in The Raspberry Reich cannot even make enough money to feed themselves, let alone spark a global revolution, hence why they hypocritically rationalize stealing from private proletarian-owned grocery stores, despite having plenty of time to swipe STD-contaminated fluids and adorn their walls with communist corporate icons like Angela Davis, Gudrun Ensslin, Ulrike Meinhof, Andreas Baader, and Che Guevara. Ironically, Jürgen Brüning – the self-described Marcuse-inspired producer of The Raspberry Reich – lost a court case against the daughter of Alberto Korda, photographer of the famous Ché Guevara portrait, thereupon causing a ban of screening the film by a Paris court, on top of the producer having to pay a fine of 17500 Euros because of “copyright and trademark issues.” Needless to say Marxism has been dying a slow and deserved death for some time now and The Raspberry Reich – a work that is just as much of a product of the anti-Occidental far-left Weltanschauung it superlatively satirizes – makes for an audacious allegorical digital-video epitaph of the debauched dick-devouring sort that is guaranteed to aesthetically nauseate individuals from all ends of the political spectrum.

THE RASPBERRY REICH

-Ty E

OTTO; OR, UP WITH DEAD PEOPLE

Bruce LaBruce° (2008)

Both an anti-zombie and anti-arthouse flick, as well as pretentious avant-garde postmodern black-and-white far-left propaganda film within a pornographic Milligan-esque melodrama, Otto; or, Up with Dead People (2008) – a Canadian-German co-production featuring a virtually all-German cast – is undoubtedly homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce's most ambitious and experimental work to date. Featuring a pseudo-existentialist zombie twink with amnesia as the flesh-eating anti-human who, in his own monotone melancholy words, "might have been a vegetarian; or worse, a vegan" during his previous life, Otto; or, Up with Dead People is not the sort of living dead flick that would appeal to most fans of the popular AMC TV series The Walking Dead (2010–present), or George A. Zombie, Lucio Fuci and/or zombie-comedies like The Return of the Living Dead (1985) and Shaun of the Dead (2004), but it does feature random integral ingredients from all of these undead cannibal cinematic works. For starters, the zombie hero of LaBruce's Teutonic flesh-eating realm is more into fucking human flesh than devouring it, but he still manages to do both out of necessity as long as it is not of the fairer sex. Indeed, Otto; or, Up with Dead People is far from a "straight" zombie work in any sense of the word, but a film that seems to be rivaled by just as many prissy poofs that wallow in shallow and cliché narcissism-fueled fairy fag flick like Latter Days (2003) and Were the World Mine (2008) as mindless gore-groupies of Romero's Dawn of the Dead (1978), which is no surprise considering LaBruce's sanctified ambivalence to the formulaic conventions and themes from both of these categories. As a sort of gay Godard minus cinematic smugness meets Zombieland (2009) without the feel-good feverishness meets old school John Waters, Otto; or, Up with Dead People is a cleverly contrived carnivorously carnal camp piece of postmortem cannibalism and cum where humans dare not be afraid of zombies as they are as languid and lifeless as contemporary French arthouse flicks. Centering around an emo-fag of a flesh fiend named Otto (played by novice Belgian actor Jey Crisfar) who often asks himself, "how do you kill yourself if you are already dead?!", Otto; or, Up with Dead People is more at odds with the banality of his aimless life than the mundane bipedal meat he eats known as mankind, so much so that he is willing to star in a pretentious avant-garde agitprop piece directed by a megalomaniacal epigone lesbian auteuress entitled Up with Dead People that the academically-fanatical female filmmaker describes as, "my magnum opus...my dissertation of the death."

A so-called "one man revolution against reality" and "prince of zombie" according to a hot hack filmmaker named Medea Yarn (Katharina Klewinghaus) – a director that seems to believe she is the supreme spiritual spawn of F.W. Murnau and Ulrike Ottinger – zonked-out zombie Otto's only real priority seems to be recollecting his life as a human, a haunted homo human. After hitching a ride to Berlin, Germany with good bourgeois folks who seem less than stunned by his emo-goth zombie look, Otto meets up with Medea Yarn and her meekish crew of cinematic collaborators, which includes her brother Adolf (Guido Sommer), flapper Louise Brooks-look-alike girlfriend Hella Bent (Susanne Sachße); a fashion victim of "Father of the New Left" Herbert Marcuse, and various other artsy fartsy, cultural marxist, abberosexual cinema snobs. Unbeknownst to Otto – who really is a seemingly schizophrenic sodomite who probably fried his brain on ecstasy and meth after one too many trips to the local gay bar – the band of bodacious filmmakers do not believe the brain-damaged boy is really a zombie, but an unconscious revolutionary and sexual liberator whose raunchy and radical flesh-fucking rejection of technocratic corporate 'reality' via mental derangement has made him one long step closer to freedom from globalist tyranny. Upon meeting his new compatriots in cinema, Otto is forced into watching Yarn's yawn-inspiring silent films, which he describes as, "The ones that put her on the underground map, if the underground has a map," including such grandiloquently titled works as "Duet for Somnambulists" and "Lascivious Ballet of Meditation on the Ordeal of the Death Ritual in the Mirror of Transfigured Night." Quoting pontifical puffery for her film "Up with Dead People," Medea Yarn states that it is believed by many people that zombies are, "a punishment on mankind by. A theological explanation such as this gained even more popularity when it became apparent that the latest cycle of zombies was homosexual. A gay plague had descended on humanity." Indeed, the homo-flesh-eaters are known as "The Purple Peril" in Yarn's loony leftist take on the living but lecherously undead where a "zombie Che Guevara" leads the worldwide rectal revolution of ravaged, reamed, and eventually reanimated flesh.

OTTO; OR, UP WITH DEAD PEOPLE

More likely suffering from "disorders of the soul" (i.e. schizophrenia, anorexia, and melancholia) as mentioned by his Turk twink boyfriend than any sort of post-mortem zombification, Otto ultimately seems to be a figuratively "dead soul" (Ukrainian-born Russian novelist 1842 allegorical novel Dead Souls being one of his favorite books) who continues to believe, "I am dead. I mean, I don't think I'm dead. I'm dead," after being hounded by filmmaker Medea Yarn with questions regarding whether or not he still believes he is a true blue zombie not long after she no longer needs to use him for shooting with the completion of principle photography for Up with Dead People. Realizing that "the living have no respect for the dead," Otto eventually decides to leave Berlin so as to forget a painfully penetrating past life best left forgotten, especially learning intolerable insights after a temporary reunion with his brown ex-boyfriend, being beaten by a gang of teenage Turkish termites, and facing much condescending humanist swill from ultra-vainglorious auteur Medea Yarn and her conceited cinematic cohorts. If anything, Otto is finally able to resolve that he is a "zombie with an identity crisis." Upon a superficial glance of the synopsis and the American Strand Releasing DVD cover art, and tastelessly cheap, porno homo tagline "Bringing Sexy Back...From the Dead," Otto; or, Up with Dead People seems the ultimate excursion in zombie emo-fag hipsterdom, but the film is undoubtedly one of LaBruce's, if not his most, aesthetically and thematically ambitious and experimental works yet and surely the sort of sharply schlocky and sardonic that will leave less studied cinephiles quite dumfounded in its deconstruction and ravenous reconstruction of zombie movie conventions. Bruce LaBruce would follow-up Otto; or, Up with Dead People with the quite seriously sickening "hardcore" living dead orgy L.A. Zombie (2010) – a work that although reviving the filmmaker's fixation with a pseudo-zombie with an identity crisis – is a much more traditional flesh-eater flick, albeit with hordes of blood-drenched homo-sex as the homocore director's equivalent to Romero's special-effects-driven work Day of the Dead (1985). A potently putrid parody of lethal pseudo-intellectual left-wing fanaticism and the beaten-to-death zombie hysteria that has plagued movie theaters and mainstream society over the past decade or so, Otto; or, Up with Dead People is a film for those fed up with fervent fanaticism for flesh-eaters, fashionable neo-Marxist psychobabble and monotonous mainstream faggotry. A self-proclaimed lapsed leftist who admitted he was once "brainwashed by my Marxist-feminist education at university" and grew to "resent being raised at a time when you felt you had to conform to the ways of being gay that are presented to you," Bruce LaBruce is one of the last living iconoclasts of politically-incorrect fagdom who is not afraid to portray cocksuckers as mindless yet militant hordes of death-worshipping and death-dealing spreaders of deleterious disease and feral debauchery as depicted in Otto; or, Up with Dead People; a zombie flick that acts as a triple-assault bullet to the brain of braindead gorehound, gaudy anachronistic avant-garde 'auteur' filmmakers, and fanatical fag-sciists.

-Ty E

L.A. ZOMBIE
L.A. ZOMBIE

Bruce LaBruce° (2010)

Undoubtedly, zombie and hardcore porn flicks have a lot in common aesthetically, as both rely on careless cardboard cinema conventions and wallow in depicting the human body in a most unflattering manner that reminds one that humans are essentially just pieces of meat and no different from the sort one devours from a fast food restaurant, so it should be no surprise that some filmmakers have decided to combine the two typically artistically meritless film styles, with iconoclastic queercore auteur Bruce LaBruce (No Skin Off My Ass, The Raspberry Reich) being probably the most famous director to do it. Beginning with his melancholy pomo homo zombie arthouse-splatter flick Otto; or Up with Dead People (2008)—easily one of the director's most ambitious and aesthetically and thematically unhinged works to date—LaBruce followed his frolicsome flesheater fuck flick with L.A. Zombie (2010), a grandly grotesque work of zany zombie hardcore that was advertised with a poster playfully parodying the iconic poster used from George A. Romero's Dawn of the Dead (1978). Of course, in its deleteriously disgusting depiction of a primitive looking brute with a monster prick who literally fucks people back to life in an act of ostensible altruism, L.A. Zombie is anything but a Romero flick, even if it features superficially symbolic social commentary of the far-left sort as a work that pays sympathy towards homeless people and homos. Starring Slovak-French gay porn star François Sagat (Saw VI, SAGAT: The Documentary)—a Cro-Magnon-like cocksucking creep whose innately idiotic black scalp tattoos can be seen glaringly under his corpse makeup—in the lead role as a flesh fucking street fiend who may be a zombie, but is more likely a schizophrenic bum (a technique that LaBruce also utilized in Otto) with a sinister sex drive, L.A. Zombie is easily the most aesthetically abhorrent, nihilistically nonsensical, and patently pretentious and preposterous zombie flick I have ever seen that makes one wonder whether or not LaBruce made the film as a perverse prank on zombiphiles and gay porn connoisseurs as a work that will surely leave both demographics (and everyone in between) feeling like the director defiled their soul in a feckless attempt to get back at all the people in high school who kicked his ass for being a limp-wristed fag. Released in two different versions—a 63-minute softcore version that was played at various film festivals and a 103-minute hardcore version that is not much more than a polished porn flick on steroids (and, indeed, many of the actors look they have taken their fair share of roids), L.A. Zombie is not only what is easily LaBruce's most uncreative and decidedly degenerate work to date, but a homo homogenization of everything that is sick and soulless in America, especially Los Angeles, as a film featuring racially mongrelized men who look like monsters without their makeup, psychopathic white collar criminals and gutter-dwelling mestizo gangbangers, and miscegenation-based muscle man on muscle man orgies, among various other decidedly deplorable things, which is no surprise considering it is set in modern Sodom, Los Angeles. In part inspired by auteur LaBruce's slave-morality-driven belief that zombies are treated too badly in films since they are killed by rabid rednecks for sport and whanot, as well as a response to the hysteria regarding rabid gays and AIDS and other STDS, L.A. Zombie basically revolves around the gimmick that "instead of gay sex bringing death, it restores life," thus making it what is easily the most recklessly and nonsensically ineffective gay propaganda flick ever made.

Slavic pseudo-frog fag wigger François Sagat plays a lecherous yet 'loving zombie' who magically appears out of the Pacific ocean at the beginning of L.A. Zombie and makes his way around Los Angeles as a cadaverous cocksucker of sorts who will penetrate anything that is male and dead. Of course, as a crusty creature who nonsensically transforms from being blue and rotting yet muscle bound to a fairly 'normal looking' (normal in the flashy dressed Eastern European wigger sense) fellow with no discernible physical imperfections, it is dubious whether 'The Zombie' (he has no name) is actually an authentic reanimated corpse or not, though his foul fetish for muscular male flesh is unquestionable as a fiendish fleshwound addict who will fuck any mangled manful hole he can find. After being picked up by a swarthy twink (Rocco Giovanni) while hitchhiking, the Zombie is in a car accident that kills the driver of the car, so to pay back the young man back for his generosity, the post-post-mortem being buggers a wound in the boy's chest with his grotesque elephant-trunk-like penis, thus reanimating his heart and giving him the gift of life as a new member of the wanton walking dead. After literally penetrating the heart of the car accident victim with his putrid prick, the Zombie also commits sodomy on the young man, ultimately ejaculating blood. After reaching downtown L.A., the Zombie digs through trash and hangs out at the Los Angeles River where he witnesses a white collar degenerate shooting and killing another white collar degenerate (Wolf Hudson), so he drags his corpse to a semen-soaked outdoor mattress and reanimates the young businessman by placing his member in the man's fresh bullet wounds. In between creaming in the man-cunts on undead criminal corpses and taking messy coffee breaks at a café while all by his lonesome (no one seems to notice him, thus hinting that he is just a homo hobo and not a true blue zombie), the Zombie has equally banal and uneventful flashbacks about his life before becoming a member of the walking dead. After stealing some clothes, the Zombie finds the less than exquisite corpse of a gangster, so he fucks it via a bullet hole in the homeboy's head, thus demonstrating his salacious talent for skullfucking. Not long after, the Zombie also finds the corpse of a bum who overdosed on dope inside a makeshift cardboard box house, so he makes the hobo a flesh-fondling homo. Of course, the Zombie hits the jackpot when he enters a sodomite dungeon and witnesses a pack of neo-leather-fag types being killed in a multicultural coke deal gone bad, so he brings them back to life in a beyond bloody orgy and carnage-fueled circle jerk that echoes the carnage of Romero's Day of the Dead (1985). In the end, the sentimental Zombie cries blood like a bitch while hanging out in a graveyard and reminiscing over his ex-boyfriends, even literally digging his own grave, but one suspects he inevitably keeps walking for some more masculine meat to manhandle.

L.A. ZOMBIE

A sort of pseudo-eccentric and excess-ridden yet radically aesthetically retarded piece of uniquely unpleasant celluloid 'womb envy' where undead sodomites create life via gay sex as opposed to spreading death and disease as one might assume, L.A. Zombie is undoubtedly impossible to swallow and even more impossible to enjoy as a work that brings new meaning to associating zombies with being braindead. Essentially Hustler White (1996) with zombies (including an unflattering cameo from Mr. Tony Ward as a bum), albeit minus the crude yet cultivated comedy and cinema/cultural references, L.A. Zombie is easily Bruce LaBruce's most tediously tasteless and thoroughly thoughtless work, as if it was made as a gay recruiting video for zombie fans, except I doubt anyone—no matter how patently perverse and morbidly masochistic—would find it arousing, including the debauched director himself. Shrugging off the messy and plotless structure of L.A. Zombie on his blog by stating, "Continuity is bourgeois," LaBruce, not unlike the typical modern horror/zombie director, got lazy and thought by covering his film with blood, guts, and exaggerated genitals it would be adequate for not injecting it with the same sort of subversive and sardonic thought as his previous works like Hustler White (1996) and The Raspberry Reich (2004). A sick yet superlatively superficial fantasy where a schizophrenic bum converts the corpses of stereotypical LA criminal types like white collar crooks and Mexican gangsters with his clearly diseased and decaying poz-cock, L.A. Zombie seems like a sort of brazen yet boring 'bug-chasing' propaganda piece where a pseudo-zombie 'giftgiver' spreads the undead plague by fucking heterosexual male flesh. Not even writing a script but instead utilizing a mere 3-page outline, LaBruce directed mind numbingly banal digital zombie diarrhea that is as slow and seemingly retarded and uninteresting as the film's flesheater anti-hero, hence why the character was played by a porn star. For screening LaBruce's pseudo-celluloid atrocity at the Melbourne Underground Film Festival (MUFF), Australian filmmaker/ film festival director Richard Wolstencroft (Pearls Before Swine, The Beautiful and Damned), who in the past has caught flack for screening a documentary on historical revisionist David Irving, had the luxury of having his house raided by police, which I can respect, even if I cannot really respect L.A. Zombie; a "hardcore gay art porno" that actually manages to be boring in its intrinsic ugliness. L.A. Zombie is a grotesque yet greatly generic 'gorno' flick that, at best, should have been utilized as an extra feature for a DVD release of infinitely superior fag flesheater flick Otto; or Up with Dead People, and should be ultimately avoided like AIDS as a horrendous pseudo-zombie flick with a 'positive' poof message.

-Ty E

GERONTOPHILIA
GERONTOPHILIA

Bruce LaBruce° (2013)

Naturally, it is only a matter of time before every homo enfant terrible auteur filmmaker grows up a little bit and puts away the gratuitous shots of bulging cocks, senseless low-camp gross-out debauchery, and various other forms of hetero-terrorizing aberrosexual agitprop to assemble a more serious and sentimental piece of sod celluloid that is designed to be appreciated, or at least tolerated, by a heterosexual audience. While queer Jap-American auteur Gregg Araki (Nowhere, Mysterious Skin) pussied out long ago with his softcore screwball comedy Splendor (1999) starring Kathleen Robertson (who inspired the filmmaker to dabble in heterosexuality for a short-time), homocore queen Bruce LaBruce (No Skin Off My Ass, Hustler White) just recently decided he wanted to try and debase the mainstream with his most recent feature Gerontophilia (2013), which has been advertised as a sort of gay Harold and Maude (1971). And, indeed, like Hal Ashby's obscenely overrated film, LaBruce's latest work was specially tailored for ultra-hip hipsters and faint of heart leftist types as the superlatively sappy and subtly sick story of an 18-year-old Canadian frog twink that seems to suffer from a mild cause of autism who falls head-over-heels for an 81-year-old high yellow negro that climaxes with a dick-shrinking pseudo-existentialist road trip involving PG-rated gay inter-generational miscegenation and a young queen getting upset over the fact a bunch of other young queens are attempting to steal his old jigaboo queen. By far LaBruce's biggest production to date as a work with a $2 million budget, Gerontophilia was apparently inspired by teenage old-fart-fucker Marcus Ewert, who made himself the cocksucking concubine of sexually introverted alpha-Beats Allen Ginsberg and William Burroughs during the late-1980s when the men were already senior citizens. Ultimately, LaBruce's distinctly debasing rectal-reamer romantic comedy absurdly attempts to make the superlatively sleazy and uniquely unnatural into something 'cute' and 'lighthearted,' which is enough to make any sane person, to misquote the original pimp Hermann Göring, reach for their revolver. Easily LaBruce's most lazy, contrived, and benign yet simultaneously repugnant work to date, this 'gentle' geezer-pleaser dramedy is the sort of film that will probably only appeal to those oh-so rare unlucky individuals that got molested by their grandfather and enjoyed it, as well as geriatric gay men who long to 'break-in' virginal teenage boys and turn them into grandfather-fucking freaks. Indeed, if LaBruce was attempting to tap into a larger audience with Gerontophilia, he probably failed, though there are probably enough unhinged middle-aged women and pre-twinks out there to get wet for lead Pier-Gabriel Lajoie, who radiates boyish innocence and naivety and thus makes for the perfect sex object for debauchees.

Like many gay men, 18-year-old French-Canadian twink 'Lake' (played by heterosexual Pier-Gabriel Lajoie) spends a lot of time with wayward women, included his crypto-dyke girlfriend Desiree (Canadian child actress Katie Boland) and a whore mother named Marie (Marie-Hélène Thibault) who works at a strip club and forces her son to call her by her name instead of mom. Since all the women in his life make for worthless nurturers, Lake has been forced to become a sort of nurturer and caretaker himself, hence why he probably develops an erotic infatuation for elderly men, which he initially attempts to satisfy by doodling grotesque nude sketches of old farts with saggy skin. One day while working as a lifeguard at an indoor pool, Lake is forced to perform CPR on an old man he finds floating unconscious in the water, but he finds himself in an exceedingly awkward situation when he pops a boner in front of two younger girls after sucking face with the old timer, which ultimately causes him so much embarrassment that he decides to quit his job despite the fact that he needs money for college. Luckily, Lake's mommy Marie gets beat up at the strip club she works at and starts a new job at an old folk's home where she also manages to find her son employment. Of course, working in a retirement home is like being in a whorehouse for Lake, who finds himself stealing the patients' pills and molesting horny old heterosexual geezers while high on said stolen patients' pills. Eventually, Lake develops a pathological obsession with spoiled dark meat after giving a sensual sponge bath to a seemingly comatose 81-year-old high yellow elderly negro with faded blue eyes named Melvyn Peobody (played by gay Black Nova Scotian stage actor Walter Borden), whose jet black homo-hating son paid the tab for the old folk's home but will not even let his poof padre see his grandkids.

The retirement home that Lake works at is run by conspicuously corrupt pill-peddling scumbags who intentionally keep the patients over-drugged to the point of perpetual unconsciousness so they do not have to deal with them. On top of that, one of Lake's co-workers seOf course, Lake catches onto this early and begins trading Mr. Peobody's pills for alcohol, as the two 'lover's get drunk and play cards together. Meanwhile, Lake's closeted dyke girlfriend Desiree, who fetishes deranged cunts like Lizzie Borden and Aileen Wuornos, finds his scrapbook of old dirty men drawings and begins to realize her boyfriend bones old farts, thus eventually resulting in the dissolution of their phony relationship. After they break-up, Desiree gets drunk at a bar and makes out with a Sapphic metalhead while Lake swallows a bunch of pills with rum as a chaser and suffers a hallucinatory A Nightmare On Elm Street-esque dream featuring a nod to David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977) in which he enters a ruined hospital on his skateboard and begins ritualistically licking giant grotesque wounds on Mr. Peobody's back.

When Lake's mother gets raging drunk and accuses her son of sodomizing an 81-year-old negro, a struggle ensues between the two that results in the old whore breaking her leg. With his mother incapacitated, Lake decides to realize

GERONTOPHILIA

Mr. Peobody's death wish of seeing the Pacific Ocean before he dies, so he gets his ex-girlfriend Desiree to help him kidnap the kindly old queer negro from the retirement home. While the two have tons of sleazy grandfather-grandson-like sex on the trip with Mr. Peobody absurdly posing as the boy's granddad, Lake becomes quite jealous when various other considerably perverted poof's begin hitting on his antiquated chocolate man. Indeed, Lake even gets into a heated girl fight with some Judaic-looking twink at a gay bar where neither girly man manages to land a single punch. Unfortunately, when Lake eventually gets the gall to proclaim his love to Mr. Peobody after they have sex in a motel room, the old high yellow homo is already dead. Only five people (including the organist!) attend Mr. Peobody's funeral, which depresses Lake, but he at least becomes happy when he notices his belated senile sod lover's homo-hating son making out with his mother. Indeed, Lake figures that if his mother marries his dead lover's son, then Mr. Peobody would become his grandfather, thus adding a tinge of incest to their already tastelessly taboo romance.

Aside from Harold and Maude and Beat bitch boy Marcus Ewert, auteur Bruce LaBruce seems to have also had more personal reasons for directing Gerontophilia. Indeed, seemingly no longer intrigued by the martial phallus prowess of gay-bashing neo-Nazi skinheads and selling out to the oppressive heterosexual bourgeois institution of marriage, LaBruce married an older Cuban negro a couple years back, though one not nearly as hold as the one in the film. Aside from negrophilia, LaBruce revealed in an interview with www.vocativ.com regarding his personal interest in gerontophilia: "I am now middle-aged, and I hope I will run into gerontophiles in the near or distant future who will appreciate me as a sexy, stimulating and fascinating sexual object. It's also a good metaphor for any sort of taboo or transgressive sexual peccadillo, a celebration of anyone who goes against the grain of society or nature. Young is fun, but old is bold." As for his self-admitted (extra)gay agenda with the film, LaBruce stated in the same interview: "With my movie, I chose to represent an inter-generational love and sex relationship that is as extreme as possible and still within legal boundaries. But it still disturbs people in its extremity, if in a deceptively gentle and subtle way." Of course, aside from men that partake in such behavior, I think it is most peoples' gut reaction to be decidedly disgusted at the uniquely unnatural sight of an elderly negroid and a youthful Franco-Canadian fag fucking. To LaBruce's credit, he makes no claim that he is a proponent of nature as demonstrated by Gerontophilia character Desiree's words of support to her ex-boyfriend Lake regarding his particularly perverse proclivity towards wrinkly old melanin-strong flesh, "I think that what you're doing and what you are is really brave. And the fact that you're acting on it, you know, like it's revolutionary [...] You're fighting against nature." If fucking old negroes is revolutionary, then I am proud to be a racist and homophobic counter-revolutionary. Easily one of the most, if not the most, understatedly unhinged films to date, Gerontophilia is a quirky queer celluloid nightmare from the bowels of an old folk's home in homo Hades that demonstrates that the revolution is already over, as no so-called 'heteronormative' world could produce such a playfully pernicious poof piece. Indeed, LaBruce's cinematic STD is arguably the most corrupt thing to come out of cocksucking Canada since Gaëtan Dugas.

-Ty E

PIERROT LUNAIRE: BUTCH DANDY!
PIERROT LUNAIRE: BUTCH DANDY!

Bruce LaBruce° (2014)

Somewhat ironically, around the same time he was putting together his most mainstream and accessible work to date, Gerontophilia (2013), Canadian-born alpha-homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce (Hustler White, Otto; or Up with Dead People) began assembling what would ultimately be the most experimental, artsy fartsy, obnoxiously avant-garde, and innately inaccessible film of his career to date. Indeed, LaBruce decided to direct an experimental film based on Arnold Schönberg's atonal melodramatic 'anti-opera' Pierrot Lunaire (1912), which he had previously directed a couple of live performances of in March 2011 at the prestigious Hebbel am Ufer (HAU) theatre in Berlin, Germany. While LaBruce had two different performances of the play filmed for posterity, he later decided that he wanted to pay tribute to German Expressionism and silent cinema and got his usual producer, Teutonic pornographer Jürgen Brüning (who has produced virtually all of LaBruce's films, including The Raspberry Reich (2004) aka The Revolution Is My Boyfriend and L.A. Zombie (2010)), to back the immortalization of his sexually unhinged Schönberg reworking in cinematic form, thus siring a curious celluloid photoplay that seems like it was directed by the bastard broad of F.W. Murnau and Ulrike Ottinger. Of course, aside from featuring the 21 selected poems from Otto Erich Hartleben's German translation of Albert Giraud's cycle of French poems of the same name that were featured in Schönberg's original version of Pierrot Lunaire, LaBruce's version features a more prominent parallel story written by the director that was based on a supposed true story/gay urban legend about a Toronto 'proto-transman' (female-to-male transvestite) who in 1978 cut off the cock of a taxi driver and attached it to 'himself' after his opulent girlfriend's wealthy father forbid his daughter from seeing him upon learning that he was really a she. For better or worse, LaBruce ultimately assembled what is the most genitally confused (anti)love story since Rainer Werner Fassbinder's singularly tragic masterpiece In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden (1978) aka In a Year of 13 Moons, though the film also seems to pay tribute to the arthouse splatter films of Berlin-based blond beast Jörg Buttgerit (who LaBruce once went on a date with for an episode of the ZDF/ARTE show Durch die Nacht mit... aka Into the night with...). A nightmarishly grotesque (as well as grotesquely nightmarish) tale of transman penis envy where LaBruce pays questionable tribute to Schönberg's supposed love of the Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol with scenes of castration (or "Dick-capitation!" as it is described in one of the film's various inter-titles) and buckets of blood that are splattered across the screen in a somewhat fetishistic fashion, Pierrot Lunaire: Butch Dandy! (2014) is postmodern celluloid at its most literally and figuratively perverse where literal pornography, gutter grade splatter cinema, and Hebraic anti-Romantic musical atonality are combined in such an aberrantly obnoxious and gleefully obscene way that not even Oswald Spengler or Volker Spengler could have foreseen such flagrant and fanatical cultural decay.

As someone that has unfortunately seen more films directed by kraut carpet-muncher Monika Treut (Seduction: The Cruel Woman, Gendernauts: A Journey Through Shifting Identities) than I care to admit, I must admit that I find female-to-male transsexuals to be rather repellent in both appearance and character, as if they are gigantic little boys with perennially dry vaginas. Of course, LaBruce decided to go one step further in terms of the eponymous transsexual protagonist of Pierrot Lunaire by also making the character a lowlife wigger from the projects who sports goofy baggy pants and the sort of flashy basketball shoes that could get you shot in certain culturally diverse American cities. Although a sort of medium-length film at 51-minutes, the work features a very scant and superficial storyline that could have easily been told with a 5-minute short, but LaBruce decided to put more emphasis on atmosphere and aesthetics in what basically amounts to a sexually schizophrenic transman psychodrama and operatic orgy of blood where castration, swarthy male strippers, baldheaded capitalist pigs, and Teutonic diva Nico become objects of sick obsession. Indeed, aside from the fact that the lead resembles the butch cyber-dykes of her fiercely fucked films, LaBruce's Schönberg adaptation has much in common with the the works of Austrian transman A. Hans Scheirl (Flaming Ears, Dandy Duß) in terms of its queer Blitzkrieg of nonstop aesthetic aberrance sans the primitive stop-motion animation and kaleidoscopic colors (though LaBruce decided to add color to certain bodily fluids). Notably, for the scenes emphasizing the protagonist's considerably unhinged mind, LaBruce opted to insert segments from the two different stage performances of Pierrot Lunaire that he had filmed, thus the film has two layers (on top of Albert Giraud's lyrics) that really drive home the tragic mental derangement of the titular lead. Indubitably, LaBruce's film is probably the closest thing that transmen have to a sort of Tristan and Isolde or Orpheus and Eurydice in terms of tragic romance unless you count mainstream melodramatic twaddle like Kimberly Peirce's Boys Don't Cry (1999).

While the lyrics from Schönberg's original version are sung/spoken in German (lead Susanne Sachsse apparently spent 4-6 months receiving voice lessons to prepare for the role), the parallel story written by LaBruce is told via English language inter-titles, thereupon adding another layer to the already eclectically schizophrenic character and culturally mongrelized essence of Pierrot Lunaire, which would probably be nothing short of aesthetic terrorism for most viewers, including those super serious sort of cinephiles that diddle themselves to the latest Criterion Collection cover art. As told via an inter-title at the beginning of the film, "As our story begins, our hero, Pierrot Lunaire, and his girlfriend, Columbine, are out on a date..." Considering Pierrot Lunaire (played by Susanne Sachsse, who previously engaged in unsimulated heterosexual sex while portraying the lead in LaBruce's The Raspberry Reich) is a white woman who pretends s/he is a black man, her idea of a date is watching his lecherous hooker-like girlfriend Columbine (Maria Ivanenko) do a striptease in front of headlights while sipping on vodka inside of her car and yelling crude things at her hoe. Ultimately, Columbine proves to be a sort of cocktease and fails to completely strip for her boyfriend (I guess LaBruce was against having a naked woman in his film), which somewhat disappoints her cock-less and ball-less beau. After their less than eventful date is over, pseudo-pimp Pierrot heads back to his home in the projects and on the way decides to take a leak, thus revealing, "A sandbag for a cock!" Indeed, the pecker-less protagonist complains, "Oh mortal travesty and foul indignity that I must squat to pee!" while urinating in the snow just like any biological girl would (notably, while the film is mostly in black-and-white, LaBruce opted to colorize the urine-covered snow). Poor prick-less protagonist Pierrot also complains, "A curse upon these two onerous appendages!" and "What have I done to deserve such a grievous fate?" upon grabbing her pesky mammary glands while making a strange face that is a cross between abject disgust and melancholy. In a scene featuring the inter-title "Zombie Pierrot!," Pierrot's decidedly daunting body dysmorphia is reflected in shots where her face takes on warped shapes worthy of Francis Bacon. Of course, when Columbine's wealthy father discovers that his little girl is dating a chick that wished she had a dick instead of a real mensch and ultimately forbids her from seeing the protagonist, Pierrot's lunacy inevitably reaches murderous proportions.

PIERROT LUNAIRE: BUTCH DANDY!

When Columbine's "fat capitalist pig father" (Boris Lisowski) comes to see Pierrot perform at a sleazy neo-Weimar cabaret, he soon asks "What kind of bugery is this?," grabs the protagonist's hidden bandage-wrapped tits, and declares, "I'm going to get to the bottom of this if it's the last bottom I get to." After Pierrot's pants are pulled down, a curious inter-title reading "Wikileaked!" appears and Columbine's father triumphantly declares, "Just as I suspected! Your mister is a sister!" upon exposing the pseudo-dude that is defiling his daughter. Naturally, Columbine's father forbids his daughter from ever seeing Pierrot again, telling her, "As far as you're concerned, Pierrot no longer exists!" and "You will only see him again over my dead body!" While there is no evidence that they have even attempted to have sex with one another, Pierrot is hopelessly in love with his superlatively slutty-looking girlfriend and s/he is willing to do anything to get her back. While watching a super swarthy baldheaded butch bro strip at a queer cabaret, Pierrot has an epiphany and declares, "I know what I must do to win back my love." In a long and torturous scene emphasizing the protagonist's rather insane plan, Pierrot is featured lurking around while sporting a strap-on dildo and carrying a butcher knife in a Norman Bates-esque fashion. After declaring, "The hunting ground: a house of burlesque!," Pierrot watches a male stripper masturbate to the point of ejaculation and declares while watching the unwitting would-be-victim's cock, "And what a prize package it is!" in a scene that is juxtaposed with a shitty electronic dance song that features trashy lyrics like, "...in the name of pussy fixation." Pierrot's obsession with cutting off the stripper's cock is depicted in a variety of grotesque ways, including, "A Glory Hole Guillotine" that castrates the thug-like male whore's massive member in one swift chop. In another scene emphasizing LaBruce's signature fag fetish for guys and guts, blood is splattered on a triple-screen scene of the male stripper dancing from various angles. Of course, the actual castration is much less romantic than Pierrot thinks it will be.

Despite being a pseudo-masculine lowlife wigger of sorts, Pierrot seems to feel a certain degree of kinship with German singer-songwriter and one-time Warhol superstar Nico (aka Christa Päffgen), as s/he visits her grave and acts as if s/he is praying at it for good luck. After pseudo-heroically declaring, "Sweet Columbine! Soon I will prove to your fat capitalist pig father that I'm a real man!" Pierrot gets involved with "roid rage" and begins shooting steroids in her ass like it is heroin, as if it will give her enough strength to physically overpower a man so that he can chop his member off. When it comes time for Pierrot to finally dismember the male stripper's member, Pierrot pretends to engage in bum-buggery with the prick-peddler, but things go terribly wrong when the protagonist whips out a straight razor instead of her imaginary cock. Indeed, not only does the male stripper get away totally unscathed with his meaty member left perfectly intact, but he also mocks Pierrot for not having a purple-headed monster of his own, thus leaving the tragic transman exceedingly embarrassed and heartbroken. Ultimately, Pierrot decides to go for a much easier target and cuts off the hoe-handle of a Hindu taxi driver (Krishna Kumar Krishnan). Indeed, while the Indian cabby has a different skin color and his schlong is predictably considerably smaller than that of the male stripper, the colored castrated cock somehow seems like a fitting fit for Pierrot, who stares at the dismembered member with considerable intrigue immediately after hacking it off the hapless Hindu and then thinks to himself, "A cock of one's own." After somehow attaching the brown bald-headed bandit to his body, Pierrot heads to his beloved Columbine's house while sporting a hoodie and looking like Trayvon Martin's albino doppelganger. When Columbine and her father answer the door after Pierrot knocks, the protagonist proudly displays her new bloody tanned schwantz but the two react by just staring with expressions of abject disgust and shock. As reflected in a dream-sequence that reveals how warped the protagonist's psyche really is, it becomes clear that Pierrot truly believes that his new stolen flim-flam has turned her into a real man. Of course, one can only speculate where Pierrot and Columbine's relationship is headed, but it is quite dubious as to whether the protagonist will be able to rise to the occasion when he takes his beloved into the bedroom.

While academics claim that the Nazis labeled Arnold Schönberg's work as "Entartete Musik" (aka "degenerate music") simply because the composer was a Zionist and member of the Judaic tribe, it had more to do with the fact that his atonal music was considered a pathetic mockery of the medium and nothing short of “cultural Bolshevism” (notably, Schönberg’s Aryan student Anton Webern was a pan-German who more or less supported Nazism, yet his music was criticized for the same reasons as his Hebraic teacher). Indeed, in terms of his subversion and destruction of the Aryan model of music, Schönberg is like what Freud was to psychology, Franz Boas was to anthropology, and Einstein was to physics, hence why he was beloved by the neo-Marxists of the Frankfurt School like Theodor W. Adorno and far-left filmmakers like Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet, who cinematically adapted his unfinished opera Moses und Aron aka Moses and Aaron in 1973 and would direct another two films based on the composer’s work. Interestingly, it was not Bruce LaBruce but a Belgradian conductor named Premil Petrovic who is friends with star Susanne Sachsse that ultimately came up with the idea to rework Schönberg’s Pierrot Lunaire, yet I think no other film director was better suited for the job as the Canadian homocore auteur indubitably follows in the same counter-tradition of aesthetically obnoxious and anti-pulchritudinous degenerate art. After all, it is quite fitting that a Canadian cocksucker of German descent would defile the work of a heterosexual Hebrew who debased German music and culture. Despite not even really being familiar with the composer’s life or work before taking on the project, LaBruce managed to echo the Expressionistic horrors of the composer’s paintings with Pierrot Lunaire in a fashion that might lead one to believe that the filmmaker is actually a longtime Schönberg fan-boy and not someone that grew up listening to second-rate punk bands. In terms of its theatrical style and emphasis on classical music, the film is indubitably the closest that LaBruce will ever come to obtaining Prussian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg’s Wagernian ideal of the cinematic ‘Gesamtkunstwerk.’ Arguably most importantly, LaBruce’s Pierrot Lunaire is quite possibly the most potent example as to how far German kultur has degenerated aesthetically, morally, and spiritually since the capitulation of the 6th Army in the Battle of Stalingrad. Indeed, more wanton than the worst of Weimar and more grotesque than the childish caricatures of kraut comie troll George Grosz, LaBruce’s film is truly aberrant apocalyptic art that more than epitomizes the slogan at the 1937 Nazi Entartete Kunst exhibit: “Madness becomes method.”

PIERROT LUNAIRE: BUTCH DANDY!

-Ty E

THE TRACEY FRAGMENTS

Bruce McDonald (2007)

As mentioned in the earlier The Dead Girl review, recent indie (I'm tired of quoting it. By now you should know my stance) films have a habit of residing next to genre pieces and stealing many of the viewers with an updated feel and stars. This risky move squanders most artistry and poetic themes that were so bold in the original. This is definitely the case with The Tracey Fragments. I can't put my finger to it but during the rotation of the film's events, I found a feeling that felt ripped right from Julien Donkey-Boy. The only time Ellen Page has ever been attractive. Following a speculative form of art appreciated in some corner of the glob (at least), The Tracey Fragments incorporates a non-linear plot device of mixing up scenes using planned esotericism to make us think. God forbid, even if a film makes us "think" about a canine in reverse chronology, it's considered "Art". The comic book panorama styling is used in a fashion to try and give deeper meaning to the little things such as the type of shoes a person is wearing or body gestures. This thoughtful gesture to fans of detail gives us nothing other than a space hog for our glorified screen width. You will find yourself focusing on one panel and ignoring the others which brings the question - Why bother? Stealing the motif of the turtle child in Julien Donkey-Boy, Ellen Page hypnotizes (Ooooh. So independent using hypnosis) her little brother into think she's a dog. He turns up missing before a severe blizzard wipes out the town (ala Nóir). His disappearance you later find out is fault of her own. I merely bring this up as this is one of the many film I've seen recently labeling the disastrous results that follow as blamed on a naive female. Taking her emotional problems and false securities, she travels in a quest to find her brother. With her imagination perusing through memories of her "boyfriend" Billy Zero - a Robert Smith look-a-like douche bag, this film has everything that could possibly make you hate the counterculture surrounding liberal hipsters and the like. The Tracey Fragments is a film directed by a director whose main specialty is directing television episodes. For a film about a self-loathing female who for the most part is insane, The Tracey Fragments is a stand alone film. It features prominent ideas and theories towards film making. Although the film is lavish with emotions and ground breaking techniques, I felt this film was more of a bastardized spawn of Julien Donkey-Boy. I can't exactly point out which aesthetic the film borrows but a similar imminent doom atmosphere is presented whilst parading around Ellen Page in a shower curtain. Honestly, it's not that expressive. At first I thought that I was so cynical towards this film thanks to my aversion of the demographic. Then I remembered that this film is a remake of a remake of another theme, but to be fair, this film has its merits with unspeakable emotions. As you can tell, my feelings are extremely mixed. In one hand we have an intelligent drama with many unspeakable things and on the other hand we have a childish film endeavor with little girls saying "friggin" and "gabillioncatrillion".shudders

THE TRACEY FRAGMENTS

-mAQ

WILD PALMS

Bruce Wagner (1993)

With the somewhat surprising, albeit rather brief, success of David Lynch's cult serial drama Twin Peaks (1990-1991), a number of good, bad, and just plain ugly TV shows popped up during the early 1990s attempting to emulate the quiriness, wild idiosyncrasies, and rampantly heterosexual campiness of the labyrinthine murder mystery, including the long-running Hebraic humored CBS series Northern Exposure (1990-1995), as well as the satirical horror-themed children's show Eerie, Indiana (1991-1992). Unquestionably, one of the more inventive, esoteric, pleasantly peculiar, and somewhat shockingly underrated and unknown of these pseudo-Lynchian series is the five-hour dystopian mini-series Wild Palms (1993) which, somewhat undeservedly, has been referred to as 'Twin Palms' by certain reviewers ever since its rather anti-climatic release over two decades ago. Until rather recently, I had no idea the show ever existed and had it not been for my girlfriend's obsession with a certain Danish musician named Loke Rahbek, who is probably best known for his work with the 'synthpop' group Lust For Youth and who recently released an album entitled The Wild Palms in tribute to the show for his solo project Croatian Amor, I would probably never have discovered it, let alone dedicated my time to it, as a miniseries starring James Belushi and Kim Cattrall and executive produced by Hollywood com-symp conspiracy theorist Oliver Stone is not something that I would typically find appetizing. Instead of paying cold hard cash for his latest album, Rahbek requires that his fans send a totally nude 'selfie' of themselves, with the seemingly debauched Dane's patently preposterous reasoning being, "When you share your work with someone, it can be like showing your own skin – you are stripping naked," but I digress, and should mention that Belushi had no idea what Wild Palms was about during the shooting of the work despite being the star and Stone had very little, if any, role in the creative aspects of the show (though, he does appear in a small cameo role as himself). In fact, the miniseries was deemed so confusing by the executives at ABC that they opted to release a companion book entitled The Wild Palms Reader featuring background information and various tidbits/trivia about the characters, including a timeline, with decidedly deranged British tranny musician Genesis P-Orridge (Throbbing Gristle, Psychic TV) of all people even contributing writings to the book.

Admittedly, Wild Palms is a conspicuously convoluted major mess of ideas and recycled pastiche aesthetics that attempts to do too much in too little time, yet it is a strangely charming and compulsively curious convoluted mess that is rather critical of the same spiritually putrid place and people that it is about. A sort of 'sunny cyber-neo-noir' set in the now-no-longer-future year of 2007, Wild Palms is based on the comic strip of the same name by novelist/screenwriter Bruce Wagner (who penned the highly underrated 1989 satirical black comedy Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills directed by Paul Bartel), who once somewhat aptly described his insanely idiosyncratic brainchild as, “a sort of surreal diary [...] a tone poem,” that deals with the still highly relevant themes like cyberspace (in fact, William Gibson, the sci-fi novelist who coined the word “cyberspace” in his 1982 novelette Burning Chrome, has a brief yet humorous cameo in the series), globalization, virtual reality, media manipulation, political and spiritual conspiracies, technocratic authoritarianism, trendy and powerful crackpot pseudo-religions/cults (i.e. scientology), and somewhat cryptically and unbelievably, the Jewish domination of not just Hollywood, but the media and politics in general. Indeed, as a work where the main L. Ron Hubbard-esque villain brags about his Jewish background and with virtually every other character featured in the series being ambiguously (they have traditionally Judaic surnames) or unambiguously Jewish (among other things, the character named Chickie Levitt played by ½ Jew Brad Dourif prays for the Jewish Kaddish), Wild Palms dares to expose the truth regarding the American postmodern plutocracy, albeit in an exceedingly esoteric way. Featuring a score by Japanese New Age composer Ryuichi Sakamoto (Merry Christmas Mr. Lawrence, John Maybury’s Love Is the Devil: Study for a Portrait of Francis Bacon) and countless references to film (i.e. Rebel Without a Cause, Alphaville, Seconds, Marathon Man, etc.) and literature (i.e. W. B. Yeats, T.S. Eliot, Sun Tzu, Walt Whitman, Shakespeare, Nathanael West, Ray Bradbury), Wild Palms is a work that is just too hermetically cultivated, fast paced, spastically edited, and morally ambiguous to have ever appealed to even a marginal fraction of the general populous. The mystery-and-intrigue-ridden tale of an ostensibly happily married patent lawyer and family man who finds himself entangled in a series of mazes-inside-mazes and dreams-within-dreams after coming back into contact with an old lover and being hired by an evil TV corporation owned by a raving mad megalomaniac sci-fi writer turned religious leader turned presidential candidate of Jewish/Japanese extraction, Wild Palms is a work that only begins to make sense the more it progresses as a ludicrously labyrinthine piece of celluloid eccentricity that certainly pays off for those that dare to completely engulf themselves in neo-noirish madness. Depicting a semi-surreal ‘occult war’ between a group of so-called ‘good guys’ called ‘The Friends’ (I would describe them as being ‘agathokakological’) and their supposedly ‘evil’ enemies ‘The Fathers,’ the mini-series demonstrates that the battle for world domination is no longer secluded to the physical realm, but virtual reality as well.

WILD PALMS

Divided into five episodes (with the pilot being about 90 minutes and the rest of the episodes being about 45 minutes), Wild Palms begins with the seemingly clueless protagonist Harry Wyckoff (as played by an admittedly clueless James Belushi) having a midnight nightmare about seeing a random rhinoceros—a symbolic reference to Greek-Romanian playwright Eugène Ionesco’s 1959 play Rhinoceros, which is an allegorical play about the transformation of the inhabitants of a small French town into rhinos that criticizes the rise of conformist/collectivist movements like communism, fascism, and National Socialism—in his empty backyard swimming pool. After staring at the rhino, Harry says to himself, “So this is how it begins” and wakes up to what is ultimately the beginning of a real-life nightmare set in 2007 Los Angeles. Harry is more or less happy with his intolerably whiny yet reasonably supportive wife named Grace (Dana Delany) who owns a chic clothing boutique and two young children named Coty (Ben Savage) and Deirdre (Monica Mikala), but after being approached by his sullen yet statuesque femme fatale ex-girlfriend Paige Katz (played by a black-haired and almost beautiful Kim Cattrall) about helping her to locate her long lost son, who was purportedly kidnapped many years ago, he will ultimately lose some of his loved ones and discovers that others are not really who he thought they were. Paige puts Harry into contact with media mogul/religious leader/aspiring president Tony Kreutzer (played by Robert Loggia who, quite notably, later appeared as a similarly crazed character in David Lynch’s 1997 film Lost Highway) who, aside from being the owner of the lawyer’s rival company Wild Palms Group and the warped bastard son of a murdered Jewish tailor and a woman of Japanese extraction who perished in an American concentration camp (Kreutzer makes reference to the FDR-approved Executive Order 9066, which cleared the way for Japs being rounded up and sent to so-called ‘relocation camps’), is a powerful senator, the leader of ‘The Fathers’, and the exceedingly egomaniacal figurehead/godhead/high priest of the so-called Church of Synthiotics (which is modeled after Scientology and practices the technique of “Synthiotics” as opposed to the “Dianetics” technique of second-rate sci-fi writer L. Ron Hubbard’s pseudo-church). Unbeknownst to Harry, his mega-bitch stepmother Josie Ito (Angie Dickinson) is Tony’s sister, as well as one of the ‘Old Generals’ of the Fathers, whose ex-husband is Friends leader Eli Levitt (David Warner) and whose arch nemesis is an semi-ambiguously gay artist named Tully Woiwode (Nick Mancuso) who, on top of being described as the “Schnabel of the West Coast” and “The Merchant of Venice,” is also another top leader of the Friends.

While Harry’s daughter Deirdre is a mute, his son Coty is an evil little asshole with a sinister face that only a psychopathic Israeli settler could love and when the lethally loony lad becomes the star of a the ‘first holographic TV show’, Church Windows, he begins to plot for world domination, as the ‘Synthiotic heir’ of his real biological padre Tony Kreutzer’s empire. Indeed, as Wild Palms reveals as it progresses, Coty is not really Harry’s son, but they are both closely related via Mr. Kreutzer, though it is not revealed until the end of the series how. Indeed, many decades ago, the Fathers started a pernicious program where they kidnap the progeny of their enemies and put them in Father foster homes so as to destroy their villains families and make them their spiritual slaves, with Harry’s femme fatale lover Paige being the product of such of an experiment as the daughter of a Friends journalist that was maliciously murdered by the killer Kreutzer crew.

WILD PALMS

Unbeknownst to Harry, his black best friend Tommy Lazlo (Ernie Hudson) is a member of the Friends, the butt buddy of artist Tully Woiwode (indeed, art fag Tully has a thing for dark meat), and assumed kidnapper of Paige's lost son, among countless other deceptions that have gone completely over the head of the rather naive patents lawyer. After Tommy is arrested for the kidnapping of Paige's son, he is forced by the prison guards to take a highly addictive neo-psychedelic man-made drug called 'mimezine', which is used to enhance the experience of watching holographic television. While Harry begins to become rich and famous after agreeing to work for Tony Kreutzer, his wife Grace, who suspects Coty is not her real son and knows her hubby is carrying on an affair with his old lover Paige, begins to lose her mind and even attempts to commit suicide. On top of that, Harry learns that Coty is not really his son, but the progeny of Mr. Kreutzer and Paige. Ultimately, Coty moves in with his real father Kreutzer and, despite being a prepubescent child, becomes the most ruthless leader of the Church of Synthiotics and develops a fetish for goofy white yuppie ship captain uniforms. It is also revealed that Harry's mother-in-law Josie is really Mr. Kreutzer's sister. While a majorly murderous and radically ridiculous bitch, Josie has a weakness for Friends leader Eli Levitt, who is the father of Harry's wife Grace and genius cripple Chickie Levitt (Brad Dourif). Chickie was crippled and left for dead by the Fathers twenty years ago, but he went on to become the "Einstein of Virtual Reality" and the hardwire architect of the GO chip, which Kreutzer wants to get a hold of because it will enable him to become a "living hologram" and ultimately obtain seemingly infinite power.

When Harry slowly but surely begins to realize his boss Tony Kreutzer, who eventually marries Paige, is an exceedingly evil prick who plans to be the uncontested Führer of both reality and virtual reality, he begins to commit himself to working with the Friends—the so-called "shock troops of reality"—so the fiendish Fathers decide to kidnap his wife Grace and daughter Deirdre. Ultimately, Josie murders her own daughter (and Harry's wife) Grace and Harry is framed for the crime via digitally manipulated footage of his wife's death via strangulation. Meanwhile, Harry learns that a seemingly homeless twink-in-training named Peter (Aaron Michael Metchik), who has tattoos all over his chest and is a junior member of the Friends, is his real son (he and Coty were switched at birth). After 'officially' joining the Friends, Harry breaks into Kreutzer's TV station and broadcasts footage of Josie strangling Grace to death. Meanwhile, neo-hippie revolutionaries begin waging guerilla warfare against the Fathers and their corporate entities. Most of the Friends, as well as various other social rejects, live in an urban trash-filled underground realm called 'Wilderzone' that Tully Woiwode reigns over. While Friends leader Eli Levitt is executed after he is betrayed by 'blind artist' Woiwode (Josie blinds him by gouging his eyes and he eventually returns the favor) and the Fathers release more doctored videos of the Friends committing imaginary crimes, the revolution against Mr. Kreutzer and his empire of cyber-evil is already well underway. Indeed, although virtually every major member of the Friends is murdered and Mr. Kreutzer eventually manages to obtain the “Go chip,” the ‘good guys’ more or less triumph in the end. Before Mr. Kreutzer dissolves into nothingness after having the Go chip, which had been altered by members of the Friends, implanted in his body, he reveals that he is the Darth Vader of L.A. by telling Harry that he is his biological father, thus making Josie his aunt, Coty his ½ brother, deceased wife Grace his cousin(!), and Paige his mother-in-law. With his once seemingly indomitable father and most of his followers dead, micro-megalomaniac Coty finds his pseudo-spiritual technocratic empire in literal and figurative flames. Indeed, even the wild palm trees get scorched. Assumedly, Harry, Paige, Peter, and Deirdre live happily ever after.

A sort of purposefully aesthetically and dramatically plastic cyber-noir epic steeped in ancient Japanese mysticism, pathological postmodern aesthetic pastiche, Hollywood history, and western literary allusions contained within an intentionally superficial-looking dystopian L.A. of the near-future where reality is blurred in a fashion that falls in somewhere between the “rabbit holes” of Lewis Carroll, the radical reality-distorting quasi-erotic virtual realm of David Cronenberg’s Videodrome (1983), the post-industrial/post-cultural/post-national sci-fi of Blade Runner (1982) and the novels of Philip K. Dick (especially his work The Three Stigmata of Palmer Eldritch (1965), which also features a world where virtual reality TV is enhanced by a sort of cyber-psychedelic drug), Wild Palms certainly makes for a fairly consistently wild, whimsical, and wayward cinematic world to get lost in for five hours or so, even if it sometimes seems like it was edited in a nonsensical fashion not all that different from William S. Burroughs “cut-up” technique. Undoubtedly, one of the most provocative and shocking aspects of the miniseries is that the villains, The Fathers, and their rivals, The Friends, are portrayed as almost exclusively Judaic, thus making it a rare mainstream Hollywood production that deals with reality as opposed to an insulting fantasy realm featuring imaginary blue-eyed WASP devils preying on poor morally immaculate minorities (though, negro Ghostbuster Ernie Hudson is portrayed as a Christ-like martyr of sorts who gets hooked on a sort of blue cyber-crack that he is forced to take against his will). Also, I don’t know about everyone else, but it was quite a therapeutic experience to see the Hebraic pube-headed dork of Boy Meets World (1993-2000) and Little Monsters (1989), Ben Savage, being portrayed as, well, a little monster that is ultimately more unsettling in his sinisterness than Ralph Fiennes’ absurdly over-the-top portrayal of Amon Goeth in Schindler’s List (1993).

With reasonably decent directing by the likes of Kathryn Bigelow (Near Dark, Zero Dark Thirty), Keith Gordon (The Chocolate War, Mother Night), Peter Hewitt (Bill & Ted’s Bogus Journey, Whatever Happened to Harold Smith?) and Phil Joanou (State of Grace, Heaven’s Prisoners) and featuring an almost impenetrable tangled web of metaphysical, cyber, and political conspiracies that have at least some basis in reality/virtual reality, Wild Palms is certainly the most intricate and original project that Oliver Stone has ever gotten involved with, but of course, he had next to nil creative involvement with the mini-series. A work of meta-TV where a character remarks, "Nobody watches movies anymore...only TV," while watching Rebel Without a Cause (1955) in a completely empty movie theater, the mini-series was made at a time when television was in a sort of Golden Age of creativity, but of course, nowadays the entertainment world more resembles the anti-reality realm of soulless pseudo-sentimentality as broadcasted by Wild Palms villain Tony Kreutzer's aesthetically and spiritually malevolent media empire. An absurdly neglected show that is most certainly past ripe for a cult following, the mini-series arguably comes closer than any other American film or TV series in terms of depicting the eclectic evil and racial/spiritual character of Los Angeles. Also, as my girlfriend has noted, the show has some of the coolest character names in the history of television. After all, who does not love repeatedly hearing a name like "Tully Woiwode" repeated over and over again by kosher conspirators and their equally kosher enemies?! As a show where the main villain compares eternity to a cyst, Wild Palms is a rare piece of mainstream celluloid cancer that, whether intentional or not, eats away at the main malignant tumor that is Hollywood. Featuring a suicidal Japanese-American Star Trek fan who hilariously claims that his "grandpa liberated Dachau" and a Nordic-like stand-up comedian shouting, "Sieg Heil! Sieg Hologram! Sieg Mimecom!" in rebellion against an ultra-evil Jewish media mogul/messiah, Wild Palms also makes for a pleasantly preposterous mockery of the postmodern pandemonium that is American society, especially the totally fictional yet largely believed America that has been dreamed up by the culture-distorters of Tinseltown. In terms of predicting the future just as all decent science fiction works do to some degree, the mini-series concludes with the mad messianic antagonist Tony Kreutzer, who is also mixed race (even if his archetypal Guido gangster appearance says otherwise), running for president in 2008, which is, incidentally, the same year that mulatto cultural marxist messiah Barack Obama campaigned for the presidency. With that being said, one could argue that Wild Palms makes the future seem a little bit less dystopian than it actually turned out to be. After all, despite being set in the late-2000s, the mini-series does not feature a single crotch-grabbing mestizo, meth-addled wigger, exceedingly effete Indian computer programmer, or blonde-wig-adorned 6-foot-tall tranny.

WILD PALMS

-Ty E

TWENTYNINE PALMS

Bruno Dumont (2003)

Many contemporary French filmmakers are undoubtedly masters of pedantically directing long, static, and soulless 'realist' scenes and gratuitous real-sex and controversial frog auteur Bruno Dumont (The Life of Jesus, Outside Satan) is no exception, yet unlike many of his patently pretentious and prosaic celluloid compatriots, I actually find much of his work interesting, especially his self-described "horror film" Twentynine Palms (2003), a French-German-American coproduction set in the "Beautiful Desert Oasis" of Twentynine Palms/Joshua Tree desert in southeastern California. And, indeed, with a very thin and almost nonexistent plot, Twentynine Palms relies heavily on the organic yet somewhat ominous atmosphere of its setting, or as director Dumont stated himself, "Here, it's not so much the subject that matters as the air itself, the atmosphere, its hue. In this way, Twentynine Palms is a horror film – an extreme horror; built up innocently, dependent on a delicate plot – the natural account of a couple of tourists engaged in wild sex – that, all of sudden, is reverse, attaining the ultimate. Death." Featuring a curiously mismatched yet sexually active romantic couple, including an arrogant American photographer and his beautiful yet mostly melancholy Russian-French subject, Twentynine Palms portrays what happens when two people, who are clearly not meant for one another, find temporary solace in loveless sex and basking nude in the arid desert sun, but, by mere chance, face the worst kind of grotesque brutality and dehumanization at the hands of two all-American redneck types who do not take kindly to bombastic bourgeois Hollywood types poking around in their dang nasty neck of the desert. Sort of like The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) meets Zabriskie Point (1970) as co-directed by Robert Bresson, Gaspar Noé, and Godfrey Reggio in pseudo-Dogme 95 style, Twentynine Palms is an experimental arthouse horror-shocker that does for the deserts of Southern California what John Boorman's Deliverance (1972) did for the wilderness of Georgia, but unlike the classic Hollywood thriller, Frenchman Dumont's work of unrelenting 'realist horror' does not offer the viewer any sort of closure nor comfort in the end, but merely disgust, repulsion, and, well, real human horror and not the contrived 'mask and CGI' superficially scary sort. A rare 'thinking man's horror flick' aimed at those that probably typically abhor the genre (myself not included, though I find it harder and harder to defend the genre), as well as the kind of idiosyncratic horror-arthouse hybrid that will scare the typically dedicated gorehound away due to its long and sometimes monotonous scenes of sunny and scenic artiness, Twentynine Palms, not unlike Lars von Trier's Antichrist (2009) and to a lesser extent Harmony Korine's Trash Humpers (2009), is proof that auteur filmmakers of the arthouse persuasion have more to contribute to the much maligned (and deservedly so) genre than so-called ‘masters of horror’ like George A. Romero, Wes Craven, John Carpenter, Stuart Gordon, and Tobe Hooper over the past decade or so.

TWENTYNINE PALMS

Poorly matched odd couple David (David Wissak)—an arrogant ‘cool guy’ LA photographer type—and Katia (as Katia Golubeva aka Yekaterina Golubeva)—a Russian-French model suffering from seemingly debilitating depression, not to mention random crying attacks—make their way to Twentynine Palms from Los Angeles for a mini-vacation/photograph sessions in the ungentlemanly gentleman’s conspicuously obnoxious maroon Hummer, a senseless gas-guzzler that seems to be utilized by its owner to make up for his glaring lack of masculinity and testicular fortitude. While Katia clearly has her fair share of mental problems and personal hang-ups, she does seem to genuinely love her patronizing ‘sexual partner’ (as he is ultimately nothing more) David, who only seems interested in his trophy girlfriend when horny. Anytime Katia makes an attempt to express her feelings to boyfriend by saying “I love you” and hoping to hear the same thing back, David responds with “I want you” and proceeds to vaginally penetrate her in a crude and unemotional manner with little or not foreplay involved, as if she is the typical Russian call-girl. When David checks out a homely Asian girl while the two dine out at a Chinese restaurant, Katia becomes saddened and her boyfriend essentially insinuates that she is delusional. In fact, anytime Katia attempts to ask David about his emotions or expresses her only feelings, he flips out like a bitchy queen. Katia’s introverted sensitivity becomes especially apparent in a scene where the two find a black three-legged mutt dog on the road and she comforts the canine by telling it, “you’re a real dog.” Somewhat nonsensically, Katia encourages the tripod canine to chase her in the Hummer and the dog is ultimately hit by David, who was not paying attention while driving the SUV. Unimpressed with the fact that the already crippled canine is suffering due to his negligence, David faces vehement scorn from the oversensitive Katia, who states to him, “You don’t give a damn... You have no heart,” and, indeed, she is probably right.

Not long after the incident with the mysterious black dog, the two have a verbal fight in their motel room and David tells Katia he would never brought her on trip if he knew she would “act like a fucking princess,” so the little lady leaves and hides around various buildings outside. After some time, David finally gets off his lazy ass and goes looking for Katia and when he actually finds her, he accuses of her of “not being well,” which inspires her to run away again, but her bastard boyfriend tackles her, smacks her around, tells her “I hate you, I hate you” and proceeds to play fight with her as if nothing he did was wrong, thus demonstrating his seemingly sociopathic mentality. The next day, the unloving couple go for a drive in the desert and spot two men in a stereotypical silver redneck diesel driving recklessly, which inspires David to state “They’re crazy” in what will prove to be his famous last words. Not long later, the men in the silver truck start ramming the back of the Hummer and drive it off of the road. David and Katia are nonsensically pulled out of their SUV by two rather wimpy looking rednecks, who rip the Slavic French girl's clothes and brutally beat her boyfriend, who does little to protect his girlfriend except say "don't touch her," as if such a feeble attempt at self-defense would stop these two clearly deranged and equally determined desert hillbillies. Clearly a less than ballsy bitch, David is forced to kneel down, bend over, drop his pants and is ultimately anally raped by a shaved head hick about half his size. Completely and utterly emasculated due to being beaten and forcibly sodomized without putting up even the slightest sign of a fight, David seems to enter a quasi-catatonic state when he goes back to the motel room with Katia, who tries to comfort her totally broken man. After temporarily leaving for a couple moments, Katia comes back to the hotel room and notices that David has locked himself in the bathroom and he refuses to reply to her requests. Out of nowhere, David, who has shaved his head and looks like the deformed Jason Vorhees as a boy from the dream sequences near the conclusion of Friday the 13th (1980), maniacally lunges at Katia and stabs her a number of times with a butcher knife in a Michael Myers-esque manner while on top of her in the same position in which they had sex only a couple days before, albeit with the roles symbolically reversed.

Indeed, when director Bruno Dumont described Twenty-nine Palms as a "story of regression" and a "savage love story," he was not joking as the film has to be one of the most dreary and brutal depictions of an ostensibly 'romantic' relationship ever captured on celluloid in its portrayal of a dubious dude whose sexual desire for his lover seems to be largely born out of hate and not love, hence the climax of the film when he finally kills her in a seemingly psychosexual manner, but using a butcher knife instead of his penis to enter her body in what will be their last moment with one another. Interestingly, both David and the redneck rapist cry in the same unsettling manner upon reaching sexual orgasms, thus associating the victim's innate similarities with his victimizer; the difference being that the pretentious LA photographer is less honest and repressed with his emotions, while the horny hick is a bit more matter-of-fact and 'in tune' with his emotions. The scenic desert setting of the film is an intrinsic and arguably the most important ingredient of the film as it sets the foreboding naturalistic pace for what will be two audience-traumatizing scenes of unadulterated human savagery unleashed on two cosmopolitan types who are used to the abstract hustle and bustle of the big city and have been unexposed to the naturally visceral and violent side of both man and nature. Even director Bruno Dumont stated that Twenty-nine Palms is a film from the gut, writing, "Envisage this film only in relation to the means employed; and so only work from instinct." Interestingly yet tragically enough, actress Yekaterina Golubeva would commit suicide in 2011 after a long but unsuccessful battle with depression. I also would not be surprised if actor David Wissak was rather embarrassed by his guy-that-gets-raped role as he has only acted a couple times more since the release of Twentynine Palms and director Dumont was undoubtedly not doing either of the two lead actors any favors by forcing them to use their real names in the film, but what seems like totally unsimulated sex between the two makes for a raw and ruthless realist work that takes no prisoners, which is more than I can say about most contemporary horror flicks. Many individuals seem to respond to Twentynine Palms with a special outrage and disgust and I think that was Bruno Dumont's intent as he makes the viewer 'work' for their sex and violence by portraying them in an uniquely unflattering and barbarous light and not the spoon-fed and superlatively superficial and stylized manner that boobs, deaths, and dead bodies are depicted in the typical Hollywood film.

TWENTYNINE PALMS

-Ty E

THE STRANGERS

Bryan Bertino (2008)

Oooohh, another feminist film. These stupid men better stop ruining beautiful women's plans. In midst of another feminist film revolution similar to France's, America has turned into Lifetime Central. The Strangers busted through the film industry with what might be the scariest trailer of them all. A trailer that grips your tendons and nerves and provides you with no ample escape. They succeeded, partly. A couple, coming home from a marriage reception is faced with an early crisis, a refusal of marriage. A classic line from "Thriller" "I want you to be my girl" is stated, and the audience laughs. Go figure, right? From then on, the film gets crazy. People begin to show up, motivated towards some mysterious cause, to torture this stranded couple. Friends are murdered and salvation is far of from being reachable. The man returns to find his woman in hysterics. He takes the mans job by loading his fathers gun. Much use it will do him. This scene in particular angers me. In a scene where a bad guy should die, this bad-die presumes to master The Matrix and dodges a round of pellets fired from a shotgun. Unsteady and unrealistic, damn the horror world sucks. In a messy genre from a messy generation, I must admit that The Strangers is a candle in the dark. I must admit though, I tire of the "woman is crippled and must crawl away fomr this horrible event" sort of ending. Women are always portrayed as clumsy fools that ruin any chance of the truth being known. Perhaps they should all wear tracking beacons in case of a dire emergency. I'm sorry to come off as so misogynistic, but i cannot help but to realize that women are the downfall for men in modern horror films. Most horror films couldn't even touch on the terror that it presents. From my own personal standpoint; Did it scare me? No. Did it scare my friends? Yes. I seem to be impervious to horror now-a-days. The Strangers is a wonderful job from a first timer. A young and fertile attempt at modern horror. The use of old-timey music is applauded and upheld better than the works of Rob Zombie. The masks alone did a wonderful job at stealing jolts and jumps from its frantic audience. The others (General Audience) seem to be frightened by it. Is it great, no. Is it bad, no. This might seem inspired by French horror film Them/Illes, but it is a completely different film with completely different scares. A great job from a first time director.

-mAQ

VALKYRIE
VALKYRIE

Bryan Singer (2008)

Valkyrie is the latest big production from Hollywood hack Bryan Singer. Singer tried to scare us about the evils of Nazis with his laughably propagandistic film Apt Pupil. With Valkyrie, Singer takes us for a history lesson with a roman catholic Nazi colonel Claus von Stauffenberg and his plot to kill Hitler. Going into the film, you already know what is going to happen. Valkyrie is a mildly entertaining and sometimes thrilling film that somewhat attempts to martyr the conspirators that tried to take out uncle Herr Wolf at his private quarters via suitcase bomb.

The fact that Tom Cruise plays the lead role of Clause Von Stauffenberg is what attracted me to this film the most. Aside from being in a Nazi uniform, Cruise also sports an eye patch and a missing arm to boot! After hearing about Tom Cruise's life devotion to Scientology and his recent public religious outbursts, I expected to see a man who meant serious Hitler killing business. Unsurprisingly, Tom Cruise's megalomania of sorts makes his performance worth seeing. All jokes aside, Tom Cruise is still a guy that takes his acting performances seriously despite what people have to say on the contrary. Apparently, many German film critics were offended by Cruise's performance in Valkyrie. German film critic Hanns-Georg Rodek of the German newspaper Die Welt stated of Cruise's performance, "He comes over best as an American hero, someone who battles for respect with aggression and energy. But Stauffenberg was a German hero, with aristocratic bearing, and Cruise cannot carry that off." Rodek's statement is fair as America is hardly a country of "aristocrats" but more like third and fourth generation well off peasants. But then again, what American actor could play a German aristocrat well? Being your typical arrogant and ignorant Hollywood production, Valkyrie lacks a certain authenticity that you come to expect from most World War II films. The most annoying thing being the variety of different "English" accents for these German Nazis. In all honesty, I didn't expect to hear much German in the film as Americans hate (and for the most part maybe can't?) read subtitles. Valkyrie features a variety of actors from around the world and even a handful from Germany. Some of the actors playing historical figures look ridiculous in comparison to the real-life individuals. I especially liked the vaudevillian looking man who played the sinister character of Joseph Goebbels. Valkyrie is not a beat down of postwar propaganda nor is it an amazing world war II epic. It is simply a film you watch to see your favorite actors dressed up in fancy Nazi uniforms. For anyone that liked the German Hitler bunker film Downfall, Valkyrie continues the tradition of new, big budget Nazi flicks. Also, Cruise's "Heil Hitler" salute with a nub for a arm is mandatory viewing. Hell, Valkyrie is also one of Hollywood's closest attempts at morally redeeming any German citizens that lived during the Nazi era. Now that's progress.

-Ty E

ALICE IN WONDERLAND: AN X-RATED MUSICAL FANTASY
ALICE IN WONDERLAND: AN X-RATED MUSICAL FANTASY

Bud Townsend (1976)

For whatever reason, pseudonymous English writer Lewis Carroll's novels have proven to be fruitful material for celluloid erotica. Indeed, arguably the most notable example of this is Jonas Middleton's hardcore arthouse horror effort Through the Looking Glass (1976), which is based on Carroll's Through the Looking-Glass, and What Alice Found There (1871), which is the less popular sequel to the author's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (1865). Additionally, both French auteur Louis Malle's sometimes sensual surrealist work Black Moon (1975) featuring Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro (who was no stranger to nudity and even pornography, although he does not go unclad in the film), as well as Cecil Howard's shockingly artsy and kaleidoscopic porn fantasy Neon Nights (1981) demonstrate blatant Carroll-esque elements, not least of all because they both star a naïve blonde girl who becomes immersed in a striking fantasy realm of mystery and intrigue. Of course, the most blatant example of Carrollian celluloid carnality is the pornographic musical Alice in Wonderland: An X-Rated Musical Comedy (1976) aka Alice in Wonderland directed by horror hack turned pornographer Bud Townsend (Nightmare in Wax, Terror House) and starring fashion model and Playboy cover girl turned porn star turned semi-mainstream actress Kristine DeBell (Meatballs, The Big Brawl). Produced by porn mogul Bill Osco, who is notable for producing the first mainstream adult film, Mona the Virgin Nymph (1970), as well as the erotic Flash Gordon spoof Flesh Gordon (1974), Alice in Wonderland bears the seemingly strange distinction of being a fuck flick that was picked up and distributed by 20th Century Fox, though they cut three minutes of the work so they could receive an R-rating. Luckily, in 2007, the now unfortunately defunct label Subversive Cinema released the film on DVD in both its hardcore and softcore versions, with the former being the version I had the marginal delight of recently viewing. Undoubtedly, out all the Carroll-themed fuck flicks, Townsend's Alice in Wonderland is the most innately juvenile as a work that genuinely seems like it was created to appeal to children, thus making it quite at odds with Middleton's genuinely dark and depraved blue movie masterpiece Through the Looking Glass. Of course, considering porn films and musicals share similar structures (e.g.: little bit of storyline, 'action,' little bit of storyline, 'action,' etc.), it should be no surprise that someone would make a sing-a-long porn movie, but I would be lying if I did not admit that I forwarded through most of the songs in Alice in Wonderland, which reek of 1970s retrograde raunch. Indeed, while Townsend's smutty musical is worth a see, it is far too 'cute' and pathologically 'positive' to compare with the great works of the porn genre, as it is more or less a piece of cheesy post-counter-culture propaganda with Afrocentric undertones that reminds one how much hippies suck.

Alice (Kristine DeBell) is a somewhat bitchy, severely sheltered, and innately immature librarian who rebuffs the advances of her prospective boy toy William (Ron Nelson) insulting his shirt because it has another man's name on it (To Alice's credit, it is rather pathetic and emasculating when a man wears the jersey of their favorite sports player, especially when it is a white man wearing the jersey of a negro football or basketball player). As William accurately states of Alice, "The body is all grown up...but the mind is still a little girl." After William splits from the library after their (non)lovers spat, Alice finds a vintage copy of Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland and says to herself: "That's funny...I never read this when I was a little girl." Indeed, had Alice read the novel as a little girl, she might not be an adult virgin. After singing an absolutely horrid song in the library, a discernibly Hebraic "White Rabbit" (played by cult/TV actor Larry Gelman, who is best known for his roles on The Bob Newhart Show and the Odd Couple) appears out of nowhere and says to her, "You can grow up...there's nothing to it. Everybody grows up. I grew up." Since the White Rabbit is in a hurry to be at the Queen's party as it might result in her having his head if he is late since "the Queen's a bitch," he jumps and disappears through a magical mirror in the library. Intrigued by the rather overweight four-eyed White Rabbit, Alice also jumps through the magical mirror and lands in a room with one normal size door and a miniature door. Since she cannot find a key for the big door, Alice goes through the little door, but not before drinking a special lotion that shrinks her body, thus making her the proper petite size for the wild and wanton world of Wonderland. Indeed, Alice may be a virgin, but her erotic encounters with the people and beings of Wonderland will certainly change that.

After Alice, who cannot swim, falls into a lake and is saved by a furry creature, she is dried off by said furry creature's equally furry comrades in a chapter of the film that is abbreviated with the tie in: "Alice makes new friends...AND GETS A LICKIN'." Alice puritanically believes that, "If it feels good, there's a good chance it's bad," but the furry creatures touch her otherwise with their wandering tongues to prove her wrong. A talking rock also teaches Alice that there is nothing wrong with diddling one's naughty bits. After being introduced to the merry world of masturbation, the White Rabbit pops up and startles the prudish virgin. The White Rabbit brings Alice to a tea party hosted by the Mad Hatter (Alan Novak), who has a label on his large goofy top hat reading "9 7/8," which indicates how many inches long his member is (clearly, he embellished the number!). After whipping out his willy, the Mad Hatter convinces Alice to touch, lick, and eventually suck it, which she does in a rather childlike fashion, but it is ok since the hat man is a quick shooter. From there, Alice goes with her friends to help Humpty Dumpty (Bucky Searles), who fell off a wall and sprang a ball and now he cannot get his ding-a-ling up. Even viewing a live lurid show of a twosome of naughty Sapphic nurses performing 69 on one another cannot help Humpty get a hard-on, but luckily Alice comes to the rescue and uses her newly acquired oral sex skills to rescue his damaged dick from perennial flaccidness. After Alice gives Humpty an erection, all the characters sing, “His ding-a-ling up. His ding-a-ling up. We got his ding-a-ling up,” and the egg man falls off the wall again, thus revealing that his dick is nothing more than a cheap dildo. After hanging with Humpty, Alice meets silly sibilings/lovers Tweedledum (Bree Anthony) and Tweedledee (Tony Richards) who, aside from having jolly old good incestuous sex with one another, sport goofy yarmulkes. When the incest session gets old, Alice and her comrades leave and happen upon a whore (Gila Havana) attempting to revive a black Jewish knight (Bruce Finklestein), who is actually a queer with a white knight boy toy (Jason Williams). Indeed, with all the eclectic perverts in the area, it is no wonder why the place is called Wonderland!

ALICE IN WONDERLAND: AN X-RATED MUSICAL FANTASY

When Alice encounters the King of Hearts (John Lawrence)—a bongo-banging Afrocentric pimp daddy who, like many black power types, seems to prefer blonde-haired cracker chicks over his own kind—she comes close to losing her virginity as the black monarch uses stereotypical negro pimp speak to con her into bed, but their sexual encounter is cut short when the white trash bitch Queen of Hearts (played by Juliet Graham, who appeared in various classic porn exploitation flicks, including Gerard Damiano’s 1975 S&M hit The Story of Joanna and Joel M. Reed’s 1976 trash-fest Bloodsucking Freaks) catches them in the act and calls for the virgin’s head much to Alice’s horror. Of course, as the Queen tells Alice, “You misunderstood me, doll. I don’t want to cut off your head...I want you to give me some head.” Against the Queen’s demand for instant sexual gratification, Alice’s new friends refer to a vintage copy of Alice’s Adventures in Wonderland to prove that she deserves a fair trial. If Alice is found guilty, she must give head to the Queen, but if she is found innocent she must face the even more perturbing punishment of giving the fat old Judge (J.P. Paradine) head. Of course, during what amounts to a surrealist show trial featuring a song and dance, including the negro King banging on bongo drums, Alice is found guilty. While giving the Queen of Hearts head, Alice manages to pleasure the mad monarch so much that she faints in delight, thus enabling her to make her escape with the help of the White Rabbit and Mad Hatter. After falling into a lake, Alice ends up in the real world and makes up with her boyfriend to whom she subsequently loses her virginity. In a rather silly hippie scene, Alice and her boy toy go skinny dipping in a rocky river and the film concludes with the following storybook epilogue: “And so Alice settled down...got married...raised a family in a house with a white picket fence...filled with kids and a little...Arf! Arf!...puppy...and they all lived happily ever after...Be sure to pick up a copy of Alice’s New Book “Fear of Shrinking.”

Aside from a couple weak cumshots and passive penetration scenes, Alice in Wonderland seems more or less like a cheapo spoof of the classic fairytale made for sexually curious teens, though, somewhat dubiously, the film would surely appeal to younger children as well as it is certainly less sophisticated than an episode of The Ren & Stimpy Show. Personally, I was completely put off by the film's innately lighthearted tone, conspicuously cliché post-hippie "peace and love" and "live and let live" messages, mind-numbingly mindless celebration of hedonism, and truly vomit-worthy sing-a-long songs, though the work certainly has its rather memorable "magical" moments, especially when Humpty Dumpty falls off the wall sporting a dildo instead of his real wang. Indeed, if you're looking for a more 'evil' and 'esoteric' take on Carroll's novel, the part pseudo-documentary/part psychedelic celluloid trip Alice in Acidland (1969) directed by John Donne is certainly more effective in that regard, even if it is true retrograde trash. A work where virtually all the male characters are gay or ambiguously gay, the King is an Afrocentric pimp who plays bongo drums and fucks cracker cunts doggie style while they eat fried chicken, the Queen is a less than aristocratic mudshark who looks like a haggard white trash whore that was found at a Texas truck stop, Alice acts like a half-retarded bitch who will commit any sexual act so long as someone gives her a semi-logical reason to do so, and the White Rabbit seems like a pedophile Rebbe who uses goofy make-up to lure in little kids, Alice in Wonderland is certainly a work that the viewer will never forget, whether they want to or not. Considering the rumors that Lewis Carroll was a pedophile who may have wanted to marry an 11-year-old girl, Townsend's version seems to take a more 'subtextual' approach to the classic fairytale, especially considering the truly adolescent-like and pedomorphic lead really seems like a petulant pre-teen princess who's giving blowjobs and cunnilingus for the first time. Somewhat surprisingly, in 2007, an Off-Broadway musical entitled Alice in Wonderland: An Adult Musical Comedy based on the film was staged at the Kirk Theatre in New York City, thus demonstrating that the fetishistic filmic fairytale has developed a certain amount of respectability and artistic merit over the past couple of decades. Additionally, an amateurish animated porn flick entitled Alice in Wonderland: A XXX Parody (2011) directed by W. Crawford that is vaguely in the satirical spirit of Townsend's film was released a couple years ago. Somewhat interestingly, the 2007 Subversive Cinema DVD release of the film features a somewhat recent featurette entitled Alice In Wonderland 30 Years Later: Back Down The Rabbit Hole where a couple of the flick's cast members, including elderly Hebrew Larry Gelman (aka "The White Rabbit") and Lena Romane (who claims to have starred in a whopping 800 to 1,000 different fuck flicks during her rather long career!), reflect on the work some 30+ years later. Notably, all of the subjects of the doc rightly agree that pornography has degenerated drastically in terms of both artistry and morality since the release of Alice in Wonderland, including Hebraic hack porn star/director William Margold, which says a lot considering the man is so depraved that he once confessed in an interview with Rona Barrett that he would be willing to perform in a sex scene with his own daughter. Indeed, it certainly says a lot about our contemporary zeitgeist when a Lewis Carroll adaptation featuring Alice giving a half-ass blowjob to the Mad Hatter seems totally 'old hat' nowadays.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND: AN X-RATED MUSICAL FANTASY

-Ty E

COMBAT SHOCK

Buddy Giovinazzo (1986)

"Bloody" Buddy Giovinazzo is one of the few directors to have created something so wildly foreign to Troma's usual assortment of tits and bugs. Rearing its ugly head at impoverished communities and the First Blood motif: "...fighting the war at home", Combat Shock, alternately American Nightmares, is a mean sonuvabitch that embraces pockets of nihilism all about its post-Vietnam squalor. Blatantly inspired by both Taxi Driver and Eraserhead, Buddy G. sought to mix thriller and nightmares in this piece of hatred. One can't tell whether Buddy G. was one of the few seething Italian directors with allegory's to spit or if it was the drug-addled production that turned the film into the raging A-bomb that it is still to this day. What's for certain is that Combat Shock appears timeless as unemployment and homelessness continues to steadily rise as our economy comes crashing down all around us.

Obviously the most pertinent discussion would involve me bringing to light the ode to Eraserhead with the deformed infant. A victim of Agent Orange, the baby sports what appears to be two separate eyelid membranes and instead of a cow fetus, Buddy G. resorted to the neater alternative of a puppet - gently coated in what I could assume is baby oil. After the frustrations and nagging of his wife finally take their toll, along with the babies auto-tuned whines, Frankie grabs his jacket and does the same thing he presumably does every day: take a stroll. But on this curious day, the events that transpire eventually become worse and worse, leaving Frankie in a state of despair with no foreseeable escape. Coming straight from the library of Troma left me hesitant to view this film. While Troma stands for independent horror, they also are responsible for putting cameras in peoples hands that needn't be producing motion pictures. There's only so many flatulent lesbian scenes I can sit through before I start to wonder what the fuck happened. Safe to say, Combat Shock is the best piece of work Troma ever put out. Cannibal: The Musical can kindly dismiss itself as meandering dross.

One point worth noting is the vibrant and "wacky" soundtrack. For some odd reason, Buddy G. acquired the world's most peculiar score to accompany his dismal diatribe. Funky percussion and Casio jams echo through the streets as Frankie strolls past chaos during a "junk-sick dawn." Running into loan-sharks who conduct a child prostitution ring leads us to believe Combat Shock will go down the easy route of fulfilling some vendetta towards society as popularized in Taxi Driver, but alas, nothing of societal worth is to be found. A key unveiling also happens to be the very fragile spirit of Frankie. In a strange turn of events, we witness with voice-overs and images projected onto his disturbed face the real truths of what occurred in Saigon and what became of the victims of the village massacre. Combat Shock is precisely what it's known for: gritty nihilism and a bleak climax. Apart from the negativity, Combat Shock also manages to be a comedy of sorts. The free-falling Frankie is host to some of the most unfortunate events. Add in scenes of brief mingling with rabid Junkies and you got yourself a strange portrait of the seedy underground. What Buddy G. created was certainly an unhappy number but if this didn't boost Troma's credibility, I don't know what could.

COMBAT SHOCK

-mAQ

BAD RONALD

Buzz Kulik (1974) At the heart of sympathy lies only a few fictional characters. A more recognizable one being Donnie Darko, star of his own motion picture which hints towards the fact that God hates Jake Gyllenhaal. After watching the curious TV film Bad Ronald (1974), I have to admit a sick feeling in my gut from the cruelty and malice that has wormed its way into an innocent boy. Ronald is that nerdy kid we all knew in high school. Not necessarily nerdy, but more so a loser without any friends. He pines over a love he will never have and is well on his way to becoming a doctor to make his dear, sweet mother happy. That is until a freak accident leaves a little girl dead and Ronald to blame. In a panic, he buries her and tells his mother. She puts him in the old bathroom and seals the wall over to hide him from the police. Matters worsen when Ronald, deep in his fantasy land, finds out his mother died and a new family has moved into his house.

Ronald is the character that allocates outcasts everywhere. When I see a soul like this, being driven wildly beyond the point, I realize how unfair things can be. Scott Jacoby out does himself in his role of Ronald, A scrawny, bespectacled boy hiding in the walls of his house, immersing himself into his fantasy illustrations so much that he begins to throw away his old identity for his reborn royalty of his magical land of Enchanta. Bad Ronald is one of the few film adaptations that create their own world, apart from the original novel. This film (or novel) also inspired the title of an amateur MTV promoted rap-rock group called, well, Bad Ronald. In an effort to relate to the source, I watched one of their music videos and my ears are now bleeding because of it.

Bad Ronald is an excellent and uncomfortable viewing, maybe not more than the atrocious spawn that they call music that was inspired by it. It challenges your existent fear of being watched and punches you in the face with a stark situation involving lovely voyeurism and someone who is doomed to be alone for the rest of his life. Perhaps the best TV film ever made. No doubt this led to the creation of Bad Boy Bubby.

-mAQ

MESSAGE THE HISTORY
MESSAGE THE HISTORY

Cameron Jamie (2009)

Nowadays, with access to affordable (or easily stolen) non-linear video-editing programs and fathomless access to download-able video footage on the internet, pretty much everyone has the resources needed to make art films. Of course, most people are not artists and lack the unique sensitivity/sensibility that is imperative when producing notable works of art. I have seen my fair share of disposable art films (the majority fit in this category), so when I saw the short video collage Message the History directed by Cameron Jamie, I was more than a little bit pleasantly surprised. Tennessee Israelite auteur Harmony Korine has given high artistic praise to the film, eloquently stating, "This shit is fucking mind-blowing." Like Harmony Korine's recent effort Trash Humpers, Message the History features a group of dubious individuals from the deep South molesting inanimate objects. Both films also manage to capture the peculiar zeitgeist of our deranged and backwards times; Trash Humpers presenting a cult of elderly white trash humanoids and Message the History featuring a group of bourgeois blacks busting out mad, ambiguously homoerotic (often grinding into each other) tribal dance attacks.

The lone song featured in Message the History, which is of the same name as the film, was written by Sonic Youth. In 1998, Harmony Korine directed a Sonic Youth video for the song "Sunday," starring Macaulay Culkin and his then wife, Rachel Minor. Although Korine's Sonic Youth video is undoubtedly one of my favorite music videos, the audio/visual combination featured in Message the History, in my opinion, is even more cinematically refined and inspiring. In fact, despite only being around 10 minutes in length, I felt that Message the History was a much more profound work than Korine's most recent feature-length film Trash Humpers. Harmony Korine has described Cameron Jamie as a truly American artist and an "artist's artist," two compliments that I have always paid to Korine. Another reason I have always admired Harmony Korine is due to his rare ability to find beauty in the most unappealing and repellent of American cultural sewers. Cameron Jamie also indubitably has the rare ability to create aesthetic ecstasy through his own perceptive and personal trash-Americana-admiring artistic lens. Before watching Message the History, I would have never expected to find elegance in the form of possessed bourgeois Negroes gently humping Ikea furniture.

Director Cameron Jamie originally got the idea for Message the History after randomly stumbling upon dancing videos featuring the dancing confederate Negroes that would star in the film. In fact, Message the History features various unrelated clips that the director found on YouTube. I can only assume that the bodacious black boyz of Message the History dance in celebration as the white world is engulfed in perpetual flames (in the form of a scorching Christmas tree and flaming skateboarder). The film also features an elder Negress absurdly walking her pet cat on a leash. Whilst the glue sniffing white boys of Harmony Korine's Gummo kill cats for fun and profit (to support their glue habit), the black woman featured in Massage the History allows her aristocrat to eat at the dinner table like a human. Without the message and revision of history by the New Left in the late 1960s, in favor of the American Negro as the noble savage victim, it is highly doubtful that the chair raping Southern brotha featured in Massage the History would be living such lavish lives (a result of affirmative action and America's commitment to "diversity"). A sagely redneck once told me, "If blacks can't eat it or fuck it, they break it." The bourgeois blacks featured in Massage the History would certainly have a hard time eating their furniture, so I guess they opted for preserving it by fucking it. Thankfully, pioneering American filmmaker D.W. Griffith is not alive to see the film, as the prophetic racist message that he warned of regarding black-white integration in his groundbreaking 1915 epic The Birth of a Nation has become nightmarishly true. The Birth of a Nation may have featured savage Negro legislators lounging with their bare-feet on the table whilst eating fried chicken in governmental chambers, but that pales (no black-face intended) in comparison to the jiving jigaboo juveniles featured in Massage the History. Harmony Korine once remarked that American cinema had not advanced far past (as far as storytelling goes) the work of D.W. Griffith. Massage the History certainly is a new form of abstract, non-linear storytelling, that induces a trance on the audience comparable to the spell guiding the jazzy chair humpers featured in the film. If you're an inspiring filmmaker and/or serious patron of cinematic art, Massage the History will have you enamored from the start. Never in my life have I sniggered so hard after watching a film featuring furniture fornicators. Praise Cameron Jamie, for Massage the History is a religious experience concocted by an auteur priest.

-Ty E

RABID DOGS
RABID DOGS

Cao Fei (2002)

For reasons that I will examine later, Rabid Dogs is largely a film that eschews modern techniques in modern thrillers and demonstrates a remarkable aptitude for creating an illusion of both fear and security. These facets of this killer car ride go hand in hand thanks to the incredible acting effort of Riccardo whose suave demeanor and relaxed, although sweaty, countenance allows for a breath of fresh air every shot or so. That is until the intensity of the score picks up again. The score is what begins building the suspense at the base of the film. It's always there waiting, watching for the opportune time to slowly build up into a foreboding tune of real time tragedy. All these mentioned pieces come together to create a perfect introductory masterpiece to Mario Bava, who has not only inspired Dario Argento, but also inspires me. As aforementioned, Rabid Dogs is the first film of Mario Bava's that I've seen. I've only heard legends of the director and tall tales of his filmic legacy but never examined the proof that more or less has been in plain sight most of my cinematic ascension. While hunting down various Nature attacks! films, the title Rabid Dogs caught my eye. Personally, my favorite novel is William Essex's The Pack; a novel so ferociously enjoyable that it will take a bite out of you. When eying the title, my cerebral machinations clicked and the two revealed themselves as being apposite with one another and I had to see more. Seeing that it was Bava, I thought to myself "Might as well" and thus was how I became introduced to a passionate, yet angry director. Much of Rabid Dogs deserves to be dissected and analyzed so bare with me. Rabid Dogs opens ideally with a far-out introduction video highlighting many scenes in a retro-groove fashion of psychedelic rotoscoping. The technical score performed by Stelvio Cipriani is one of the great Italian themes of any era. I'd even go as far as to say this recurring theme tops anything the uber-popular Goblin ever created save for the theme to Buio Omega. After the groovy opening credits subside, the film begins rather abruptly with a robbery and murder of a treasurer. The robbers make their getaway but not without suffering the loss of a partner in crime. After kidnapping a young woman and holding her hostage, the film quickly adheres to a strict rape/revenge storyboard but Rabid Dogs derails quickly and unveils a much more visceral torture for you rather than cheap shock tricks dictating perversions of the flesh. Stopping to switch cars, the crew of criminals and hostage take refuge in a car helmed by suave Riccardo who is taking his sick and sedated child to the hospital. His bucolic visage towards being hijacked is rather unnerving and leaves an odor of mischief but you're never quite sure of what's on your mind during Rabid Dogs. You want Riccardo to show compassion and empathy but you never quite get that. Just to create an idea of how he's doing "the proper thing," the incessant female captive begins screaming and struggling which only pisses off her executioners.

Using Riccardo as a pawn was a great and formal idea to show desperation as a comparative piece. His overall attitude is that of what you should show in case you ever wind up in a similar situation. In a fit of bonding, the Doctor even gives Riccardo favors and treats him as a human, not a body shield. Rabid Dogs would serve as an informative PSA summing up with the words "Don't be a hero, kid." The Italian myth and stereotype normally incorporates the words "greasy." I've never paid enough mind to how these origins came about and the only example that springs to thought is Stallone's wop-classics - the Rambo series. Rabid Dogs takes the close-up of a sweaty face popularized by spaghetti westerns and adds a dash of madness and sexual frenzy to this formula. Our Stallone impersonator Aldo Caponi plays the maniac of the bunch. He's killed before but it seems to be an act he regrets. Later, to prove his virility, he shows signs of desensitization and offers to kill again just to prove that he is a man. He kills later out of compassion for us, the audience, but soon after vomits. I would too if I just forever silenced the most annoying female to ever be immortalized on film that isn't Fran Drescher. Cohort Thirtytwo is an enormous fella whose preoccupation rests in sexual deviance and staring at nice sets of tits. In many scenes, his stature and figure are artistically dramatized as to show that a struggle would be useless. For most, a feeling of helplessness spreads throughout as we see Riccardo and Thirtytwo stand by each other. The criminal selection for this film is utterly amazing and only initiates the crude atmosphere that ricochets and expands. From each of the three villains, the culmination of the climax could never be expected and can never be forgot. What springs to mind after reading the basic plot summary is a minimalistic version of From Dusk Till Dawn. In case you haven't connected the dots, Tarantino is known for stealing things he likes almost like a child. Seeing as how he is the scribe behind From Dusk Till Dawn, it seems the no film is safe from his legal plagiarism. Rabid Dogs is a film that I could spend days writing about. Each ferocious angle and note in this film is an absolute hit to me. Rabid Dogs was "lost" for years due to the deaths of producers and lack of funding. After Mario's son, Lamberto Bava, decided to alter the film and title it Kidnapped, the film lost much of the intensity. I can make this factual assumption this because the score was altered and this is a fatal mistake. I've never taken Lamberto Bava as a serious director and his only real contribution towards film was Demons but his reputation still stands as being the offspring of a legend of Italian terror. The twist ending is unbeatable in terms of holding a mirror to the nature of humanity. Nothing screams crime classic like this quintessential car caper. Rabid Dogs is the perfect introductory piece of raw film making from a director whose eye's scream violence and express a fervor for constructing neo-realism.

-mAQ

MONDO WEIRDO: A TRIP TO PARANOIA PARADISE
MONDO WEIRDO: A TRIP TO PARANOIA PARADISE

Carl Andersen (1990)

Although I find both filmmakers absurdly overrated in their own respective ways, I could not help but be intrigued by a film that opens with the seemingly nonsensical and equally pretentious inter-title, “dedicated to Jess Franco & Jean-Luc Godard.” The film in question is Mondo Weirdo: A Trip To Paranoia Paradise (1990) aka Jungfrau am Abgrund aka Virgin on the Edge aka Virgin at the Abyss directed by Carl Andersen (Vampyros Sexos). Despite the (thankfully) misleading title, Mondo Weirdo is not another mundane mondo movie, but it does feature a wealth of demoralizing sleaze and exploitative nudity, at least certainly more so than one would typically expect from a standard work of the mostly asinine pseudo-documentary subgenre. Instead, Mondo Weirdo is an almost feature-length (at approx. 54 minutes) arthouse splatter-porn flick from Uncle Adolf’s homeland of Austria that is in welcome schitzzy-kitschy company with Demetri Estdelacropolis’s Freud’s Flesh & Mother’s Meat (1984) and Fred Halsted’s The Sex Garage (1972) with psychosexual elements of Roman Polanski’s Repulsion (1965) and George A. Romero’s Martin (1978) thrown in for good measure. Quite befittingly, the film opens with narration from a ambiguously Jewish psychoanalyst named Dr. Rosenberg (assumedly, of no relation to Alfred) who discusses the case study of an atypical 15 year old girl with latent lesbian tendencies who suffered from a series of erotically impassioned nightmares as a result of her overwhelming sexual repression. This psychosis-ridden girl named Odile (played by Jessica Franco Manera who is apparently Spanish slime-auteur Jess Franco’s real-life daughter) – a pixyish punk girl with a short semi-butche hairdo who sports booty shorts and Doc Martens boots – first enters the phantasmagoric dream realm of hot hallucinatory debauchery after having her first menstrual cycle while showering. Equally dismayed and intrigued by the heavy flow of hemoglobin seeping out of her pussy and dripping down her leg, Odile tastes her vital bodily fluids in a most prurient way. Odile must have some sort of unholy ancestral blood taint as it sends her on an often arousing yet harrowing nachtmahr by way of the dark underbelly of her subconscious, thus putting the little flapperesque lady in sexual contact with apparitions of luscious lesbian vampires, beauteous “Blood Countess” Elizabeth Báthory, and a stark-naked army of man-eating lesbos. Although Odile has a special appetite for kraut-cunts, she also encounters a variety of male perverts and unrepentant wienerschnitzel-fondling public-mastubators whom she has no qualms about sexually servicing, even if she does get involved with a little bit of castration and aggressive carpet-munching towards the conclusion of Mondo Weirdo. Despite the intrinsically hypnagogic nature of the film, all of the sex acts featured in Mondo Weirdo are graphic and real, including scenes of standard sexual intercourse, fellatio, female-on-female cunnilingus, borderline fisting, and homo sodomy.

Unlike like most pornography, Mondo Weirdo is keenly accentuated via an erogenous pulsating soundtrack by the Viennese EBM/industrial group Modell D'oo – who also composed the music for Carl Andersen's previous facetiously titled work I Was A Teenage Zabbadoing And The Incredible Lusty Dust-Whip From Outer Space Conquers The Earth Versus The 3 Psychedelic Stooges Of Dr. Fun Helsing And Fighting Against Surf-Vampires And Sex-Nazis And Have Troubles With This Endless Titillation Title (1989) – henceforth making the film seem like an extended music video from sort of depraved bloodlusting S&M musical project. Undoubtedly, if Mondo Weirdo was a strictly silent film without a soundtrack it would lose 1/2 of its erotic potency and aesthetic essence as I cannot think of another better example of a musical score that fits the description of electronic body music as the film takes the human body to bodacious and sometimes brutal extremes in a manner that is in unerring unison with its unruly yet startlingly hypnotic sounds. In fact, the soundtrack is so gratifying and mischievously merry that I, too, felt like I was getting in on the action with little lass Odile and her many phantom lovers. Ultimately, the low-budget aura of Mondo Weirdo works to its advantage as a work with a very conscious punk rock aesthetic. Indeed, Mondo Weirdo is like an early Bruce La Bruce flick, except more appealing to breeders and lesbians than homos, although male-on-male copulation makes a brief yet savage appearance in the film. Although created a couple years after the artistic peak of the so-called Cinema of Transgression movement, Mondo Weirdo has more balls and succulent sadomasochistic sex appeal than anything ever directed by the likes of softcore pornographers Richard Kern and Nick Zedd and with the added bonus of not featuring the always detestable and ever so unattractive gutter-queen Lydia Lynch. Jessica Franco Manera may not be the most bewitching babe in the world, but she has a certain tragic cutesy-little-girl-who-has-fallen-from-grace quality that is altogether beguiling, as if she was the Louise Brooks of no-budget punk rock filmmaking. Even while inquisitively inspecting the freshly amputated cock of a maliciously mutilated man, Odile has a saccharine naivety that is wholly endearing.

After Odile accepts and acts upon her undying love of ladies, her erratic erotically-charged nightmares cease to appear and Mondo Weirdo concludes with the fitting end-title, "The End or a New Beginning." Personally, I would have liked to see Odile hook up with some sort of Nazi chic Brando-type, but I guess Mondo Weirdo – a castration-anxiety-driven work of artsy fartsy punk pornography and pop psychology – is ultimately a male's worst nightmare, even if an acutely orgasmic one. Like virtually all other works of its unclassifiable cinematic breed, Mondo Weirdo is as glaringly flawed work that looks like it was shot over the course of a single day, but that is also one of its greatest appeals. In short, Mondo Weirdo is the celluloid equivalent of a one-night stand with a mentally-imbalanced mixed-blood heiress-turned-hooker.

MONDO WEIRDO: A TRIP TO PARANOIA PARADISE

-Ty E

MORMOR, HITLER OCH JAG

Carl Johan De Geer (2001)

If there was ever a physically impotent and spiritually deficient man who could perfectly exemplify the absolute subversion of what was once the masterful and awe-inspiring art, staunch and steadfast moral principles, and the overall supremacy and love of beauty that once healthily reigned over the flourishing Occident, it would have to be blueblood-born-turned leftist Swedish artist Carl Johan de Geer who, like fellow hack artists and co-conspirators such as Andres Serrano (of "Piss Christ" infamy) and Dadaist Marcel Duchamps (whose aesthetic love of filthy toilets is unrivaled, except perhaps by frequent visitors to the tearoom), successfully made a name for himself in the degenerate, contemporary art world, most notably with his rather childish renderings of brightly colored flags—one of the Swedish flag with the word "cock" shabbily scrawled across the middle, along with an accompanying message imploring the reader to "dishonor the flag" and yet another of an American flag with its stars replaced with swastikas and the words "USA-killers" brightly written across the bottom (indeed, these are perhaps his most famous works, among countless others in which he utilizes traditional kindergarten level techniques such as finger painting and amateur sketches via magic marker to ineffectively deliver the same tired and effete anti-nationalistic and superlatively self-loathing anti-European messages that have been drilled into our brains for the last 40+ years).

In spite of being born into a well-to-do Swedish family of Walloon noble extraction, de Geer quite proudly and rebelliously rejected his aristocratic underpinnings during his more formative years to become a full-fledged degenerate leftist, quite the trendy persuasion at the time (as it remains to this today, only to a much more redundant and intrinsically recycled degree), and prime propagator of some of the most puerile and unsophisticated modern art this festering cesspool of a world has ever seen. Indeed, if we are now in the midst of the end times—the Kali Yuga, as many assumedly autistic, bed-wetting 'white nationalist' facebook users and stormfront messageboard lurkers with ridiculous sounding, hybridized pseudo-Nordic-Gaelic monikers like to think of it—a turbulent period marked by the unabashed worship and reverence for regression and ugliness, then Mr. de Geer himself must be one of the four horsemen, the premiere dough-faced poster-boy of "the death of the west," whose crudely colorful and supremely soulless trash, surely one of the many proverbial death knells of the Faustian man's untimely demise (along with Lil' Wayne rap videos and off-the-chart BMI's) would send even the seediest of aspiring modern artists of the Semitic persuasion to suffer pangs of intense jealousy that such rotten fruit so besmirched with Frankfurt school foulness could germinate and spring forth from the mind of a good goy such as de Geer (the grandson of Nazi sympathizers, no less).

MORMOR, HITLER OCH JAG

For as much of a loud fuss as he makes about desecrating his national flag by way of juvenile art renderings, smashing the old aristocracy, and promoting international Jewish supremacy and scatological aesthetic savagery as the only means by which we can arrive at a worldwide Utopian existence, de Geer is a rather homely and small, yet rotund fellow whose cloying and annoying effeminate, Winnie-the-Pooh-like voice and seemingly gentle manner belie his immense inner antipathy for the world. In his self-directed documentary short, Mormor, Hitler och jag (2001) aka Grandmother, Hitler and I—which lasts a mere 17 minutes but feels as if it drones on for 17 hours, not least of all because its main theme (especially in the last half of the film) is to harp on about the evils of fascism, one of the many components of the New Left academic agenda that has been brutally beaten into the brain of any Europid born after the late 1960s—de Geer first presents himself to the audience adoringly preparing his beloved grandmother's Swedish pork filet recipe (which bears an uncanny likeness to country stew recipe dog food), describing how he uses the smells and flavors of the recipe to evoke memories of his childhood years spent in her home, a woman who was born into great wealth and prestige but who, as he described her, was the matriarchal glue which held his family together. After speaking at some length with flowery adulation of his grandmother's virtuous nature, to his own remembered horror (clearly calculated for the documentary)—and with the anticipation that it will also horrify the viewers—de Geer casually confesses, with just a brief pause for suspense, that his grandmother was also, in his view, quite irreconcilably an avid fan of Adolf Hitler, that she had at one time dined with il Duce himself, Benito Mussolini, on the roof of the Fiat factory, a “memory she embraced only with warmth,” and that she was a keen collector of Nazi art mags, including Vecko-Journalen and Die Kunst im Deutschen Reich, the latter of which “had Albert Speer as its permanent artistic adviser and was adorned with a giant golden swastika on each cover.” To make matters worse, de Geer goes on to describe how his grandmother was basically a Hitler fan girl whose bedroom walls were lovingly plastered with Nazi stock posters of the virile fuhrer, and that even though she rarely ever discussed politics with family, she did believe that Jews were responsible for starting World War II, and that they also caused her husband, de Geer's grandfather, to take his own life (by way of throwing himself overboard on a boat) regarding what seemed to be dubious monetary matters. All of this information is delivered in the most manufactured melodramatic way possible, not in the sense that de Geer himself is being overly dramatic (he instead speaks with a rather flat cadence) but because he gives the appearance of a serious and tearless yet clearly grieving father delivering a very stern 1980s-style pussy PSA admonishing about the dangers of drugs following his good-boy-turned-bad teenage son's heroin overdose, with the overall message here instead being thus: it doesn't matter if it's your beloved grandmother or not, a Nazi is a Nazi, and Nazis must be crushed.

From this point on, de Geer segues into a carefully, yet casually delivered denunciation of his mellow and mild-mannered mormor and her rather demure yet steadfast love for all things fascist (being careful to imply here that his perception of his grandmother as good and wholesome was a thoroughly immature one, a perception that was irretrievably altered upon entering adulthood, like his adolescent fascination with Nazi soldier magazines). In perhaps the most surreal segment of the documentary, a rather unwholesome scene that looks like a NAMBLA advertisement if there ever was one, de Geer lays on a bed in little boy's pajamas outdoors and reminisces about the fanciful paracosm of his childhood, wherein he was an adventurer who found himself in remote jungles and who could easily escape danger if need be (the clear intent being to juxtapose his privileged and safe childhood against the always harsh reality faced by the poor and impoverished children who grew up with burnt offerings as their only sustenance). De Geer describes how he rejected the aristocratic background bestowed upon him by his grandparents, how his grandmother's love for fascism and all things Hitler planted the "seeds of disgust for all things brown" (with the exception of melanin-derived brown, of course—and rather funny considering that Hitler actually hated the color brown, despite his reliance on certain men wearing "brownshirts" in his early rise to power, at least according to the personal press adjutant of Goebbels, Wilfred von Oven), and how the 1960s were a rebirth of sorts for him, a time in which he could "breach bourgeois conventions, and forever break bonds with all ancestors" in the form of producing juvenile, thoroughly gauche and uncultivated art characterized by crudely contrived colors that only the most ghetto and peacockish of hoodrats would love, and crass, unsophisticated messages of hatred and rebellion against the system. De Geer, like his left-leaning brethren, who ironically "hate hate" and are "intolerant of intolerance," proudly declares at the conclusion of this 17-minute long, painful reproach of his sweet Nordic granny, that where she warned him against involvement with Jews, that he gleefully disobeyed her, in fact choosing to marry a sweet, Semitic soul sister of the 60s (a decision that is quite pompously proclaimed, though with decidedly less ebonic intonation, in a fashion not unlike the white girl down the street who watched one too many episodes of Maury, watched a little too much MTV, and whose alcoholic father told her never to mess with black dudes, but who decided to get knocked up with a cute little half-caste bastard by one of those would-be-rap-superstars-and/or-professional-football-players anyway). Finally, de Geer pays the ultimate tribute in the form of a giant "fuck you" to his grandmother by cutting out a black-and-white photo of her smiling, sweet visage, and pasting it into a newspaper cut-out alongside dozens of other contemporary Swedish neo-nazi's, most of whom are 20-something year old men imprisoned for posting "anti-semitic" messages on Internet forums in today's supposedly democratic Sweden where anonymously broadcasting one's opinions is a criminal offense.

MORMOR, HITLER OCH JAG

As evidenced even by de Geer's own depiction of her, it is quite doubtful that his grandmother, a Nazi sympathizer of unique Uradel descent, would have leveled even an ounce of the same hatred at her grandson that he has so disturbingly wrought against her, in fact, going so far as to forever tarnish her memory in cheap celluloid form for the sake of his own self-aggrandizement; indeed, Mormor, Hitler och jag is truly one of the trashiest, lowest pieces of pompous puffery ever committed to film, but spectacular evidence of the great lengths to which low-brow lefties will go, even defaming their own faithful family members, to petulantly prove a point about their own twisted sense of moral superiority.

-Magda von Richthofen zu Reventlow auf Thule

STRIKE BACK

Carl Schenkel (1981)

Although I used to be a huge connoisseur of old school punk/hardcore music from the late-1970s/early-1980s and still am to a very minor degree, I have always had a complete and utter disgust for the common defeatist and pathological passive attitudes of punks, who seem to think having a ridiculously retarded haircut and making themselves as aesthetically repugnant as possible in appearance is some sort of grand political statement, as if anyone cares if they die in a gutter with their pants down and a needle in their dick. After all, it is no coincidence that guys like "Donny the Punk," who put up no resistance when getting routinely raped by other man in jail, are also called "punks." Luckily, I recently discovered a kraut punk flick with the sensible message of "might is right" entitled Strike Back (1981) aka Kalt wie Eis aka Punk Angels aka Cold as Ice directed by Swiss cult auteur Carl Schenkel (Dracula Blows His Cool, Knight Moves) with an innately active nihilistic (as opposed to the passive nihilism of typical punk junk) philosophy that is heavy on visceral violence and passionate carnality about a criminally-inclined punk rocker named Dave who never tolerates being 'punked' by anyone and makes a hasty escape from prison after slitting his wrists, so he can see his girl (who has stopped visiting him) and seek revenge on the glorified gangster businessman that caused him to land in the slammer. A rare quasi-artsy exploitation action-thriller set in Berlin, West Germany that would anticipate the anti-arthouse shockers of Eckhart Schmidt (Der Fan aka Trance, Loft, Alpha City), Strike Back owes some of its aesthetic influences to "New Munich Group" auteur filmmakers like Rudolf Thome (Supergirl – Das Mädchen von den Sternen, Rote Sonne aka Red Sun) and the gritty urban realist flicks of lone wolf filmmakers Roland Klick (Bübchen, Supermarkt), but especially the degenerate sounds and styles of the Teutonic punk and Neue Deutsche Welle subcultures that were popular in the Fatherland at that time. Featuring appearances and performances from groups like Neonbabies, Malaria!, Blixa Bargeld of Einstürzende Neubauten, Rainy Day Women, Thorax Wach, The Birthday Party, Tempo, and many more, Strike Back is more of an exquisitely exploitative, post-Baader-Meinhof Group work against West German plutocracy and equipped with a punk rock fashion sense as opposed to an Americanized p.c.p.r. (politically correct punk rock) pussy flick made-for-punk-by-punks, thus, not unlike Paul Morrissey's sardonic anti-punk satire Madame Wang's (1981), Strike Back does not suffer the sort of dogmatic gospel according to Jello Biafra that makes similarly themed works from the same zeitgeist seem rather poorly aged and anachronistic today. Like a putrid puss-filled zit on the ass of Deutschland, Strike Back features a patently pessimistic man who has been wronged and cheated by everyone he knows and he is quite literally about to explode, but not without taking a couple of people with him as a sort of figurative punk rock Grim

STRIKE BACK

Reaper who has no problem reaping what he sows and vice versa.

Pessimistic punk rock pretty boy Dave Balko (played by Dave Balko), a dude with bleach blond hair as opposed to a xenophilic neo-Injun mohawk, has a hard time dealing with the incessant isolation of prison so he dumps his trash-can out on his prison cell floor so he can find his trusty old razorblade and slits his wrists so that he can at least be guaranteed that he will not have to spend another second in penal purgatory. Indeed, as a man who has "NO FUTURE" scribbled on his cell wall, Dave has no delusions about the fact that his life is irreparably ruined and things do not get any better for him when he inadvertently kills a cop while escaping from prison while en route to the hospital after his botched attempt at seppuku. Indeed, a man who has survived a serious attempt at self-slaughter and has managed to escape from one of Berlin's heavily secure penitentiaries, Dave undoubtedly has some minor luck on his side, but it is probably owed more to his heightened sense of self-preservation, even if he is an anarchic punk who makes a daily task of putting his life in danger, than kiss from punk rock kismet. Dave's main reason for breaking out of prison is to reunite with his beloved Corinna (Brigitte Wöllner, Playboy Miss August 1980), who neglected to write to and visit him when he was incarcerated, but he also has a score to settle with a prick Polack gangster named Kowalski (respected German actor Otto Sander of Margarethe von Trotta's Rosa Luxemburg (1986) and Wim Wender's Wings of Desire (1987)), who the pissed punk used to work for and was ultimately responsible for his imprisonment. Dave goes to a punk club owned by one of his friends so he can find the whereabouts of both Corinna and Kowalski and goes on his merry way, but not before brutally beating two biker-like philistines who belong to special K's gang of barbaric buffoons. Dave eventually meets up with and spends a salacious night with Corinna and finds out she is pregnant with his baby and that she now works as a paid whore for a corrupt corporate gangster named Dr. Hoffmann (Rolf Eden of Eddy Saller's Shameless (1968) aka Schamlos and Rosa von Praunheim's Rote Liebe - Wasilissa (1982)). The next day, Dave has a brutal fight with Kowalski that seems damn near as long as the one between the two protagonists of John Carpenter's They Live (1988) and he finally gets his well earned cash after hanging his ex-boss from a hook and nearly beating him to death. Unfortunately, Dave makes the mistake of stopping by Corinna's work and he is nearly beaten an inch away from his life by Herr Hoffmann's paid goons, even having his leg ran over and broken in the process. Dave's friends nurse him back to health while he spends his days and nights sitting in front of the boobtube learning more about the police's search for him as a fugitive and his adversaries Kowalski and Hoffmann; both of whom are in trouble with the law as well. When Corinna is gang-raped and maliciously mutilated by Kowalski's street soldiers, a group of new wave leather-fags of sorts on phantom motorcycles, she calls her big bad boss Hoffmann for help, thus going over to the side of the enemy. Feeling hopelessly betrayed and without anything to lose except a life not worth living, Dave buys a stylish new motorcycle and attaches a tank of gasoline to his body so he can go out in a blaze of glory and take his enemies to hell with him.

No junky punk loser like punk rock icons Sid Vicious, Johnny Thunders, or G.G. Allin nor a man that is unable to survive being run over by a car like decidedly dead-boy Stiv Bators of the Dead Boys, angst-ridden anti-hero Dave Balke at least realizes that if he is going to waste his life that he is at least going to take Berlin's biggest ghetto robber baron with him as a true 'punk rock anti-hero' that battles the violent anarcho-tyranny of the state with violence, thus fighting like with like and fire with fire. For all the idle talk they do about the pros of anarchy and the cons of government, punks seem to neglect to comprehend that 'anarchy' is oftentimes sired by governments and there are no greater anarchists in Strike Back than 'anarcho-capitalists' Kowalski and Hoffmann. Thankfully, unlike Penelope Spheeris's celluloid punk rock cult classic Suburbia (1984), Strike Back – a work that carries its simple yet effective philosophy in its English title – is not a work that wallows in a pathetic punk rock pity party where punks are portrayed as defenseless victims of rabid Reagnite rednecks. Featuring footage of Blixa Bargeld performing some particularly pretentious and distinctly degenerate Teuton chant on a broken children's keyboard in a posh art gallery and members of Malaria recording rather ridiculously performed vocals for their song "Kämpfen und Siegen" at a seedy recording studio, Strike Back also makes for a curious celluloid cultural artifact of kraut punk rock and Neue Deutsche Welle that reminds viewers that, for better or worse, the authoritarian krauts were typically more anarchic in their art than their American counterparts. Indeed, although in terms of cinematic art, Strike Back is not even worth of being compared to Fassbinder's filmic feces, I would be lying if I did not admit that this piece of primitive punk rock celluloid art brought me back to my teenage days of unrefined hate for society and the state and my love for primitive kultur.

-Ty E

VAMPYR
VAMPYR

Carl Theodor Dreyer (1932)

Rather unfortunately, reading books on the occult is typically nowhere near as interesting as it is when it's sensationally depicted in films, or so has been my experience, especially when compared to the gravely ghoulish, fantastically phantasmagoric, and darkly yet delightfully romantic German-French semi-sound cinematic horror masterpiece Vampyr (1932) aka Vampyr – Der Traum des Allan Grey aka Vampire: the Dream of Allan Grey aka The Vampire aka Castle of Doom aka Not Against the Flesh directed by Danish master auteur Carl Th. Dreyer (The Passion of Joan of Arc, Ordet aka The Word). Probably the only other vampire flick ever made (aside from Herzog's remake, of course!) that deserves to be compared with F.W. Murnau's German expressionist masterpiece Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922) aka Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror, Vampyr, which was Dreyer's first sound flick (though, despite being shot in three different languages, it is mostly silent and only features marginal dialogue), was both a critical and commercial failure upon its release, even receiving boos from audience members on its Berlin premiere on May 6, 1932, and also causing a riot in Vienna after audience members demanded to receive their money back. In fact, when Vampyr finally premiered in Dreyer's home city of Copenhagen, Denmark in March 1933, the director did not even bother to show up, ultimately having a nervous breakdown and checking himself into a French mental institution not long after, as a seemingly sinister cinematic work that seemed to 'haunt' its director more than anyone else. Indeed, not until relatively recently has Vampyr gotten the due it deserves from film critics as it was once regarded as one of Dreyer's weakest cinematic efforts, which was underscored by the fact that the director did not complete another film until a decade later when he made Day of Wrath (1943) aka Vredens Dag during the German occupation of Denmark. Rather loosely basing the script, which was co-written by Dreyer and his Danish friend Christen Jul, on Irish horror writer Sheridan Le Fanu's five short story collection In a Glass Darkly (1872), most specifically the lesbian vampire tale Carmilla that also acted as a major influence for Bram Stoker's Dracula, and feature art direction by one of the great art directors of German expressionism, Hermann Warm (The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, Fritz Lang's Destiny), Vampyr is horror cinema at its most hopelessly hallucinatory and deliriously dream logic oriented, as if the aesthetic blueprint from every experimental artful horror film ever since, including Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls (1962) and David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977). Co-Produced and starring Count Nicolas de Gunzburg—a gay Jewish aristocrat and decadent dandy that was the son of a Russian father and Polish-Portuguese-Brazilian mother who agreed to fund Dreyer's film so long as he could play the lead role in the hope of becoming an overnight movie star and who would later work as a editor for popular magazines like Vogue and Harper's Bazaar, evening acting as a mentor to a young Calvin Klein—Vampyr is a film that's production is almost as strange and fragmented as its story, thereupon adding to its further mystification and legacy as one of the greatest, most idiosyncratically iconic, celestially creepy, and unnervingly foreboding and atmospheric vampire/horror flicks ever made.

Allan Gray (Nicolas de Gunzburg under the screen name of 'Julian West' who took the pseudonym to appease the wishes of his 'royal' family) is a rather dapper dandy in the spirit of Hanns Heinz Ewers (except nowhere near as handsome!) and Count Eric Stenbock (except nowhere near as mentally deranged!) who dabbles in Satanism and other forms of the occult, but he is about to reconsider his dark interests upon arriving and renting a room at an inn near the north-central French village of Courtempierre (where most of Vampyr was actually filmed). After being suddenly awakened by a somewhat elderly yet suavely dressed gent (Maurice Schutz) who warns him about preventing the death of a young girl and leaves him an ominous package with "To be opened upon my death" written on it, Mr. Gray is entrenched in a journey no less eerie than that of Dorian Gray, albeit more rewarding and less nihilistic in the end, because instead of becoming a 'psychic vampire' himself like the wanton Wilde Character, the quasi-pretty boy protagonist of Dreyer's supernatural vampire flick—the third major film and second "talkie" to deal with the now popular undead horror subgenre—becomes a sort of accidental hero against heresy. After receiving the dubious package from the mysterious older man, Allan Gray takes it outside and is entranced by shadows, which lead him to a classic old castle where he encounters a creepy carnivalesque supernatural 'shadow play' of sorts featuring perniciously playful figures dancing on their own, but also an elderly blind woman and less than erotic vampire named Marguerite Chopin (Henriette Gérard), as well as the Village Doctor (Jan Hieronimko), a Renfield-esque servant who is the most obedient and important human slave of the aristocratic bloodsucker. Naturally, Allan Gray eventually wanders out of the creepy castle and happens upon a manor and peeps through a window where he spots the old man who previously gave him the package being wounded with a shotgun, which is wielded by what seems to be a shadowy spirit. For whatever reason, servants at the manor let Gray inside and attempt to resuscitate the old man but it is too late. Gray ends up staying the night at the home and inevitably runs into a lovely lady named Gisèle (Rena Mandel), the daughter of the dead Lord of the Manor, who leads the young occultnik to the family library where she describes how her sister Léone (popular Nazi actress Sybille Schmitz) is extremely ill. Not long after, Gray and Gisèle spot Léone wandering around outside like a somnambulist, so they rush to her rescue, ultimately finding her unconscious with vampire bite marks on her neck. Finally, Gray remembers to open the package given to him by the Lord of the Manor since the old man is dead and all and finds a book entitled The Strange History of Vampires aka Die Seltsame Geschichte Der Vampyre by Paul Bonnat that gives him the imperative insights he needs to battle the demonic creatures and Léone from spiritual and physical slavery.

VAMPYR

After reading from The Strange History of Vampires, with excerpts of which are featured in inter-titles throughout Vampyr, Allan Gray comes to the natural realization that Léone is the victim of a vampire. When the Village Doctor arrives at the Manor to take a look at lady Léone, Gray recognizes he was the same man he saw at the castle. Despite his uneasy feelings regarding the doctor, Gray agrees to a blood transfusion at the request of the dubious doc in the hope of saving Léone, whose sinister smile hints at the fact she is taking on a demonic persuasion, so he becomes rather debilitated by the loss of his vital fluids. Although weakened and semi-conscious, Gray awakes and is overcome by a fierce foreboding feeling and senses that Léone is in danger, so he rushes to the little lady and notices the doctor dropping a poison vial (he also hallucinates a skeleton handling said poison vial). Not surprisingly, the dastardly doctor flees the manor like a scared rat and Gray subsequently notices that Gisèle is gone. Of course, Gray decides to chase down the heretical Herr Döktor, which leads him back to Marguerite Chopin's castle and before he knows it, the young dandy hero has the uniquely unsettling vision of witnessing himself being buried alive in what is arguably the single most potent and iconic scene of Vampyr. After getting over the most morbid and personally petrifying of nightmares, Gray heroically saves Gisèle, but the Village Doctor manages to make his great escape once again. Meanwhile, an Old Servant (Albert Bras) of the manor discovers the copy of The Strange History of Vampires that the old Lord gave Gray and comes to the realization that to kill a vampire, one must push an iron bar through their cold black heart. Eventually, Allan Gray and the Old Servant unite at the crypt of Marguerite Chopin, where they find the blind old hag sleeps and drive the iron bar through her, thereupon killing the seemingly senile succubus, which turns her body into a flesh-less skeleton, and thus lifting the curse of the vampire and allowing Léone to swiftly recover. For the revenge for the death of his master, the Old Servant of the manor kills the Village Doctor after discovering him hiding in an old mill by activating mill's machinery, which drowns the deranged doc with flour, thus suffocating him to death in the process. In the end, Allan Gray and his new gorgeous lady friend Gisèle board a small rowboat, cross a hazy river, and find themselves landing on a figuratively and literally brighter clearing, though the final scene of Vampyr is that of machinery at the mill, thus hinting all is not well after all in our post-industrial world.

Undoubtedly, one of the most interesting aspects of Dreyer's Vampyr is that the filmgoer never knows for sure whether or not what protagonist Allan Gray sees and goes through are literal visions as they happen or merely the projections of fantasies from a funny fanboy with a dark sense of romanticism who has read one too many occult books. Indeed, while a 'genre' flick, Vampyr is nothing short of an innately cinematically experimental work that weaves in out of conscious and subconscious sequences without warning, as well as cuts between scenes that are seemingly unrelated, hence why the film probably irked audience members upon its original release as a film that goes to great pains to reject the sort of classic mythology typical of Murnau's masterpiece Nosferatu (1922) for something more hermetic and less tangible but not less aesthetically visually tantalizing. Not unlike Jean Cocteau's The Blood of a Poet (1930) aka Le Sang d'un Poète and Luis Buñuel's L'Age d'or (1930) aka The Golden Age, Vampyr was a result of classical 'artistic partonage' that enabled the filmmaker a sort of artistic freedom and experimentation that is unheard of today, at least where somewhat mainstream cinema is concerned. As the one-time-film-star Count Nicolas de Gunzburg later confessed in an interview featured in the spring 1964 issue of Film Culture, "Like everyone else, I was dying to get into the movie," and his royal vanity certainly paid off, at least after about half a century, as he ultimately became the unforgettable, if not cipher-like, star of Vampyr; one of the greatest and most mystifying pieces of celluloid horror art ever concocted. Interestingly, cult auteur Curtis Harrington (Night Tide, Games) mentioned a by-chance run-in with Gunzburg in the summer in 1949 in his autobiography Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013), writing, "The leading player in Vampyr is billed as "Julian West." So you can imagine my shock a few days later when I was in a projection room to see a preview showing of a new film, and Julian West himself walked in and sat down in the seat directly in front of me. It seemed uncanny; I could hardly believe my eyes! I gathered my courage and leaned forward in my seat; "Excuse me, sir, but did you appear in a film called Vampyr?" He turned and smiled. In a very deep voice, he replied, "That was a very long time ago." It was only much later that I discovered his true identity," thus making it seem like the Count was somewhat embarrassed by his all-too-brief career as an actor/producer. As for the 'curse of Vampyr,' aside from temporarily destroying Dreyer's career and mind, and guaranteeing that Count de Gunzburg would not be the next Rudolf Valentino, Sybille Schmitz—one of the only real actors in the film, and who would go on to become a popular Nazi actress (she could not have had more fitting initials!) playing femme fatales and other non-Aryan harlots, but was later blacklisted in the post-WWII era due to her unflattering status as a notably naughty National Socialist actress, despite her decidedly dark features—would, not unlike her character in Vampyr, become the victim of a doctor who fed her morphine addiction at an inflated price, even assisting in the fallen diva's suicide in 1955 via an overdose on sleeping pills, which was more than morbidly melodramatically depicted in the UFA-inspired neo-noirish flick Veronika Voss (1982) aka Die Sehnsucht der Veronika Voss directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Featuring next to nil blood and Christian iconography (which are replaced by sinister scythes and infant skeletons!), a less than alluring hag vampiress and zero eroticism, a somewhat wayward moral compass, an unreliable 'visual narrator' as the protagonist, an oneiric aesthetic that blurs the line between ominous and aesthetically orgasmic, a dead serious yet surreal story with nil camp value, Vampyr was certainly a success where artistry and psychological horror are concerned as demonstrated by auteur Carl Th. Dreyer's remark regarding his intention with the film, "I wanted to create the daydream on film...to show that horror is not a part of the things around us, but of our own subconscious mind," as I personally can think of few other celluloid chimeras that are so equally charismatic yet creepy and alluring yet foreboding, as if the director had found a healthy middle ground between heaven and hell.

VAMPYR

-Ty E

SALOMÈ

Carmelo Bene (1972)

After having the rare and distinct pleasure of recently getting to see the Italian flick Veruschka - poesia di una donna (1971) aka Veruschka: Poetry of a Woman starring the eponymous German supermodel, I felt the need to see more of the tragic and melancholy but always stylish 1970s Veruschka von Lehn-dorff and her bizarre self-created body art, so I decided to watch the bodacious, bawdy, and blasphemous piece of keenly kaleidoscopic celluloid Salomè (1972) aka Neon Vampires directed by wacked-out Guido Renaissance man Carmelo Bene (Our Lady of the Turks, Capricci), a filmmaker that had next to nil interest in films/filmmakers of his time, once confessing regarding his thoughts on cinema history, “[Cinema] it’s the celebration of the Lumière Brothers. That is: since the Lumière period, what has come out of it? If you exclude that minimum of “self-fright” sought at all costs, or that hint of bewilderment in certain African tribes, at the sight of that train. The Lumières... I think their commemoration goes on since the 19th century. The same one which has been perpetuated,” as if he had the megalomaniacal mind to attempt to resume where the Lumière brothers left off. Described by kosher cineaste Amos Vogel in his work Film as a Subversive Art (1974) as, “an unknown genius of contemporary cinema” whose films are “visual, lyrical and auditory cataclysms, whose lava-like outpourings are of unequalled hallucinatory perversity... Their visual density and creative exuberance defy description,” Bene was a filmmaker whose cinematic works, in their flamboyance and pageantry, surpass even the most surreal and sensational works of Federico Fellini, including Juliet of the Spirits (1965) and Satyricon (1969), and like virtually all of his major works, with Salomè—a work loosely based on but uncredited to Oscar Wilde’s 1891 play of the same name, which, in turn, was based on the Biblical story of Salome—the shamelessly flamboyant yet surprisingly heterosexual absurd-garde auteur puts himself at the center of the sensually Satanic action by playing the role of King Tetrarch Herod Antipas (a man accused in the pseudepigraphical Gospel of Peter of ordering the crucifixion of Jesus Christ), the hyper horny and incestuous maniac monarch who served John the Baptist’s head on a platter to his Semitic slut stepdaughter Salomé in dubious payment for her infamous proto-femme fatale ‘Dance of the Seven Veils’ in what is true dirty dancing of the delectable decadent dego variety.

Featuring lanky yet lecherous Nordic goddess Veruschka as a bead-adorned yet ultimately unclad (beads are nowhere to be found when it comes to her naughty bits!) beauty with an aversion to clothing who arrives on the scene via the sea, a very vain and vampiric Jesus Christ who cries like a bitch as he rather unsuccessfully attempts to nail himself to the cross, a physically grotesque Salome with a dyke-inspired shaved head who could only appeal to the most degenerate of shabbos goy kings, a shit-talking and soccer-saluting John the Baptist who has no problem taking a couple blows to the head via a big book so long as he can call Salome a slut and whore, a debauched ancient aristocrat who dines out of women's derrieres, and the sort of in-your-face watermelon and buttocks fetishism you might expect from an American Deep South rap video, Bene's Salomè is sharply schizophrenic and sacrilegious celluloid at its most suavely sardonic, strangely and semi-sinisterly salacious and sordid, and spasmodically surreal. Directed by a man who once stated of his no less iconoclastic TV movies, "When editing is being made during the shot, one can achieve a music-movie. Then recording becomes an event," Salomè is a seemingly impenetrable work that will most likely thoroughly enrage and irritate both cinephiles and epileptics alike as an ADHD-inspired, art-added work where no single shot lasts longer than a second or two and that makes the intellectually masturbatory montages of Sergei Eisenstein seem like that of Béla Tarr, but also an innately aesthetically idiosyncratic work of nihilistic neon naughtiness that borrows from Baroque art, the Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol, and cubism, as well as the greats of Italian Futurism and German expressionist cinema, but also popular goombah auteur filmmakers, especially Federico Fellini, even if Bene would never admit so. A sort of grotesque 'Guido Lucifer Rising,' Salomè—a nearly narrative-less celluloid nightmare of the peculiarly 'high-camp' sort that takes Italian histrionic acting to more hysterical heights and is more absurd and aberrant than Artaud's Theatre of Cruelty—is quite arguably auteur Carmelo Bene's celluloid magnum opera, especially compared to the director's previous film Don Giovanni (1970), which is a sort of aesthetic and thematic prototype for what was accomplished with the filmmaker's Oscar Wilde adaptation.

SALOMÈ

Opening with a scene of beaded yet naked baldheaded Veruschka as "Myrrhina"—an Alexandrian noblewoman of the femme fatale sort featured in Oscar Wilde's unfinished play La Sainte Courtisane (1894) who attempts to tempt a Christian hermit named Honorius away from goodness—Bene's Salomè immediately establishes itself as a wild and whimsical take on Wilde that endlessly wallows in wanton whores of the sinister skinheaded sort corrupting the lives of men, especially of the god-bothering sort. Flash forward a couple seconds to a surreal scene of the Last Supper where a vampiric Jesus Christ declares to his Apostles that, "One of you will betray me" and a split second later a Jew drops a bunch of Shekels and said Apostles unanimously declare, "me, me, me" in their greedy desire to play Judas against their undead master. With goofy Disneyesque animated camels jumping through golden hoops, swarthy lard asses slicing watermelons in half with Arab swords, and a bloodsucking Christ carrying the disrobed bodies of voluptuous young women, the radically ridiculous realm of Bene's Salomè is serenaded in superlatively silly sacrilege that takes the Biblical story of Salome and death of John the Baptist about as serious as a soda-induced hiccup. Before the glorious appearance of unholy Judaic harlot Salome, young Roman twinks in borderline drag queen makeup whisper about the Jews, with one young man asking who are the “wild beasts howling?” and the other responding that, “The Jews, they are always like that... They are in dispute over their religion.” Flash forward and Salome (Donyale Luna, who not surprisingly appeared in Fellini Satyricon), against the better judgment of her Jewish princess mother Herodias (bizarrely played by two actors simultaneously of different sexes, Lydia Mancinelli and Alfiero Vincenti) and stepfather Tetrarch (Carmelo Bene), decides to speak to the prophet John the Baptist, a seemingly senile and exceedingly eccentric old fart absurdly dressed in an anachronistic soccer uniform who insults the Hebrew harlot, calling her a “daughter of Sodom” and “daughter of a whore” among various other disparaging yet fitting things. For his hysterical insults to Salome, John the Baptist is beat over the head with a big book, but that only fuels his seething holy hatred. Of course, Salome herself does not take kindly to big John’s incendiary personal insults and his spurning her affections, so she pays him back by putting on a debauched dance, the ‘Dance of the Seven Veils,’ for her degenerate stepfather Tetrarch (as meta-historically played by auteur Carmelo Bene), who rewards her with the head of the foulmouthed Baptist. In the end, Salome picks the dead silky skin off of Tetrarch’s face and neck as he babbles incessantly, and a nihilistically narcissistic Jesus of Nazareth attempts to nail himself to the cross, but only manages to drive a couple nails through his feet and hands, ultimately failing in his respectable yet exceedingly egomaniacal attempt at self-martyrdom.

As director Carmelo Bene once confessed, “I am not interested in any filmmaker. I am not even interested in my own films, except for a couple of moments: the failed self-crucifixion in Salomè (1972), and the burnt, torn film in Our Lady of the Turks (1968) as a parody of recollection,” and, indeed, Salomè, like virtually all of the filmmaker’s work, seems like it was directed by a man who had next to nil interest in filmmaking trends of his time and even less interest in entertaining the masses, as if he made the film to test how far he could personally take cinema as an artistic medium. A challenging celluloid work that portrays a young Hebraic whore of the exceedingly exotic yet less than erotic sort as the ultimate cryptic manipulator and destroyer of prophets and kings, Salomè is a feverishly and freakishly frolicsome femme fatale-driven work that reminds the viewer of the long historical role of Jewesses in subverting alien cultures, peoples, and religions with their women’s naughty bits, while portraying Christians as crazed kooks suffering from self-induced cuckoldry. Undoubtedly, Bene’s Salomè even makes Salome (1923) starring real-life subversive Jewess Alla Nazimova and Ken Russell’s play-within-a-film Salome’s Last Dance (1988) seem totally tame due to its fiercely fetishistic and brazenly blasphemous take on Oscar Wilde’s Salomè. A personal friend of degenerate frog philosophers like sadomasochistic sodomite Michel Foucault and poststructuralist Gilles Deleuze—both of whom were incidentally fans of German New Cinema dandy Werner Schroeter—Bene was a sort of Guido Werner Schroeter with a seemingly equal keenness for kitsch and camp, albeit of the rampantly heterosexual sort. While less than 80 minutes in length, Bene's Salomè seems as epic as Schroeter's Eika Katappa (1969), albeit with the claustrophobia of Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran. A phantasmagoric oftentimes nasty neon nightmare from the soiled soul of a 'true believer unbeliever,' Salomè is merry metaphysical misanthropy in its most audience-agitating form and thus a work one will never forget as the antidote to not only a lifetime of Hollywood brainwashing, but also static and soulless far-left European arthouse films of the 1960s/1970s, especially those by the likes of banal blowhard Godard and Jean-Marie Straub.

SALOMÈ

-Ty E

AFRIKA

Caroline Link (2001)

Forget the revolutionary films of Senegalese auteur Ousmane Sembène (Mandabi, Xala) and mainstream Hollywood philistine liberal swill like The Constant Gardener (2005) and The Last King of Scotland (2006), criminally neglected Italian auteur Alberto Cavallone's Afrika (1973) is the ultimate dark romance flick set on the dark continent. Influenced by reading Algerian revolutionary Frantz Fanon's unintentionally hilarious and preposterously overrated pseudo-Freudian/Marxist political diatribe The Wretched of the Earth (1961) and having previously directed the relatively successful work Le salamandre (1969) – a politically and racially-charged post-colonial work disguised as an erotic tale about an interracial lesbian love affair – artistically courageous Cavallone was more than prepared to direct one of the most downright peculiar and hopelessly repellent works set in the horn of Africa. As the director stated himself, the world of Cavallone's Afrika is a contemporary Little Big Horn where white men act as General Custer's soldiers. Of course, one would barely notice this if it were not for the film's brutal opening scene featuring sexual mutilation and coldblooded murder against two suspect rebel women, as Afrika is essentially an often exploitative tale about a pitiable homosexual Italian boy named Frank (Andrea Traglia) who travels to Ethiopia to reunite with his fleeing gray-haired true love; a self-loathing (and married) homo professor named Philip Stone (Ivano Staccioli) who has failed as both a painter and as a lover. To prove his undying devotion to Philip, Frank has undergone a drastic sex-change and has changed his/her name to Eva so as to be a 'proper woman' and thus (in his mind) legitimize their relationship in the eyes of sneering homo-haters, but the elder man is not impressed, henceforth culminating into the heartbroken lady-lad's violent bedside suicide. Afrika was edited in a nonlinear fashion that is as spasmodic and unorthodox as the film's story and features a series of flashbacks from various character's (Frank, Philip, and Frank's sister Jeanne) perspectives that tell the histrionic story that led up to Frank's impending suicide. Although the socio-political themes featured in the film might seem strikingly modern upon reading a superficial synopsis of Afrika, the film is certainly on par with Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi's mondo classic Africa Addio (1966) aka Africa Blood and Guts or Farewell Africa in terms of being 'culturally sensitive' or lack thereof.

During Afrika, it is revealed that Frank and Philip first bumped into each other as both were searching for a copy of French symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud's work Illuminations (1874); an uncompleted collection of prose poems. Like Rimbaud himself and many other decadent European degenerates, Philip would also travel to the third world in a futile attempt to escape the existential crisis that consumes his soul. Not unlike decolonized Africa, Frank and Philip are going through big changes in their lives and the final outcome is quite questionable to say the least. Somewhat oddly, Tom Ford's A Single Man (2009) often feels like an extremely loose, polished remake of Cavallone's Afrika. Like Cavallone's earlier work, A Single Man follows a gay professor as he recollects over the past couple years about his deceased lover. Also, like A Single Man, Afrika depicts the professor's failed past relationship with a female lover, but unlike the former film, Cavallone's work does not hold back in showing the fairer sex's absolute and utter detestation for male-on-male buggery. Even Frank's seemingly sympathetic sister Jeanne is revealed to be completely revolted with her brother's unconquerable vice as revealed in Afrika's forthright 'surprise' ending. To cure his brother-in-law of his ingrained apathy towards woman, Jeanne's husband contracts a group of teenagers to rape Frank (by a male and a female) in a scene that predates but is notably less effective than a similar scenario featured in Dutch auteur Paul Verhoeven's Spetters (1980). In the end, Frank – a self-eunuchized freak – has more testicular fortitude than his miserable, middle-aged and emotionally-broken boy toy. Like most of Cavallone's films, Afrika is an unflinchingly nihilistic, pessimistic, and misanthropic work that leaves no group spared and that includes many of the nameless Africans in the film who merely act as militant Uncle Tom's that are willing to kill their own kinfolk just so they can have a larger bowl of rice to eat at night.

AFRIKA

If you're like me and find yourself tantalized by the prospect of " Fassbinder meets exploitation" (or in this case, Afroexploitation), Afrika – as well as most of Alberto Cavallone's filmography – makes for an uniquely enthralling cinematic affair. Admittedly, you won't learn much about the continent of Africa by watching the film nor discover the solution to hostile race relations, but you will find yourself laughing ecstatically at some of the most absurdly melodramatic scenarios ever shot on celluloid. Of course, Afrika – like virtually of Cavallone's work – is an acquired taste that, as a rule, generally leaves most viewers divided. If the spectator learns anything by watching Afrika it is that the white man should stay out of Africa and should have never entered the dark continent in the first place just as married professors should refrain from invading the murky nether-regions of flaky young men.

-Ty E

THE RUINS

Carter Smith° (2008)

Almost all of the new horror films of '08 are horrendous. It's nice to see one that is "so bad it's alright." The Ruins is exactly that. After a bunch of stupid kids with perfectly sculpted abs get trapped on a ruin of a pyramid, they realize they are quarantined by the locals due to a menacing force. This force being a surprising sentient being, capable of modern actions and commands. The entire story feels like a sequel to the Goosebump's classic Stay Out of the Basement. These stupid kids fit into a perfect vegetarian trap of death. These third-world country people are portrayed as completely stupid; only being able to handle basic thoughts and speaking a dead language. The theme of isolation is similar to [Rec]. The movie has those characters that you love to hate. The stupid jocks that love sex and alcohol. The same ones that make stupid choices that lead to stupid affects, but later in the film, they become withstand-able. As soon as these naive children become victim to something more sinister, their survival instincts begin to kick in. These characters started out stale but i guess to a certain effect. You were supposed to hate them. If you've ever watched a Friday the 13th film and got pissed off when they always trip or commit random gratuitous acts of stupidity, then this is not your film. These characters will jump 3 feet and break their knees. The goofs are many in this film. The ropes getting mysteriously longer is just an example. This film is a "How to not survive!" reference masterpiece. The ending of the film differs from the one in the original novel. This change is due to a "Hollywood" bastard ending. Same with The Descent, American film makers downplay our intelligence by dumbing down all our endings with the same ending that shows a never-ending loop of violence. While not sticking with jump-out moments, It would rather attempt to gross you out with flesh-carving madness synced with the the loss of the minds of college graduates. You might hear that this is scary. No, It isn't, but damn if it doesn't have some effective scenes. They come once in a while, with some hilarious scenes. This could be called a "so bad it's okay" film. The characters are flat and are created from the leftover mold's of Dawson's Creek. I don't regret seeing this film. Many people walked out on this film. It's not perfect, but don't expect an amazing, or even faithful book adaptation. This, just like Hostel, is just shitty "Feel unsafe in any country other than America" propaganda. The main villain in the film, which i will leave unknown for a surprise, has many amazing effects, which leads to an almost shocking experience. These quirks to the "things" leave many moments almost scary. While being a Hollywood film, It isn't horribly bad. If you have a couple beers in you, you might even like it. The Ruins is an moderately exceptional Hollywood fare featuring the stupid foreigners dying first. What a change.

-Maq

WE ARE NOT TO BLAME
WE ARE NOT TO BLAME

Cassandra Stark (1989)

As a movement largely headed by dope-addled degenerate males of the fairly effeminate and, in some cases, heteroflexible sort, the Cinema of Transgression movement naturally attracted various deranged or otherwise damaged dames, including loudmouthed gutter slut Lydia Lunch and pint-sized whacked-out waif Lung Leg, but, out of all of these of these wayward women, probably none is more enigmatic, whimsical, and just plain strange than auteur Cassandra Stark Mele (Death of an Arabian Woman, The Anarchists), who later completely dissociated herself from the underground film scene she belonged to and has gone on to do various interviews where she has not held back when it came to trashing her ex-collaborators like Nick Zedd and Richard Kern. A proud Italian-American who was not afraid to film her unclad pussy and her other carnal goods for her own largely oneiric films, Stark was initially the subject of panegyric praise by her one-time-boyfriend Zedd who once described her first film Dead On My Arm (1985)—a film based partly off the director's childhood experience in a mental institution that was influenced by the theories of C.G. 'Aryan Christ' Jung—as a “masterpiece,” but, for whatever reason, things eventually grew quite sour between she and her decidedly degenerate male compatriots. Indeed, when Stark opted to conclude her semi-dreamlike short Wrecked on Cannibal Island (1986) with a provocative scene featuring a shot where “Abandon All Hope Ye Who Enter Here” is written over her bushy guidette beaver that ultimately ends with a guy named Jack Natz performing cunnilingus on her, Zedd somewhat dubiously complained in his film zine The Underground Film Bulletin that the ending featured a, “gratuitous shock tactic which stupidly violates the film's internal logic.” While Stark would later complain in an interview featured in Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant that Zedd, Kern, and Lydia Lunch were responsible for destroying the aesthetic and philosophical integrity of the Cinema of Transgression movement and noted, “Both Zedd's and Kern's films got much worse after they met each other and staring jerking each other off. A lot of the others who hung around the so-called scene got tainted by all this and a lot of the films started to suck. The creativity is sacrificed for opportunity. The violent and sexual imagery became overstated as quickly meaningless,” she did collaborate with the two male filmmakers on what is arguably her most ambitious film. Indeed, the 30-minute short We Are Not to Blame (1989) quite fittingly features both Kern and Zedd as sexually abusive lowlifes who invade Stark's mind and/or body to the point where she completely loses her sanity in the end and begins to resemble one of the ghostly pancake-faced chicks from Werner's Schroeter's (in)famous Oskar Panizza adaptation Liebeskonzil (1982) aka Council of Love. A sort of unintentionally humorous and campy piece of quasi-phantasmagoric Super-8 Gynocentrism where female sexual masochism and male sadism is explored in an almost metaphysical fashion, Stark's film demonstrates a certain uncompromising vulnerability, honesty, and tragically despoiled innocence that makes the cinematic works of her ex-compatriots seem like overly self-conscious hokey hipster posturing by comparison.

After a truly DIY lo-fi title sequence featuring the film's title painted on a glaringly dilapidated apartment wall and a shot of "A Casandra Stark Movie" painted alongside a jack-o'-lantern, as well as various forms of stereotypical Catholic imagery, including the The Immaculate Heart of Mary, We Are Not to Blame introduces the clearly mentally perturbed protagonist Paula (Casandra Stark Mele) who screams into her phone like a bloodthirsty banshee after being blown off upon calling about a potential 'copy-machine operator' job (as Stark reveals in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier, she was struggling to make ends meet in the 1980s and was even once left homeless after cops raided her apartment). Meanwhile, while Paula proceeds to look through unpromising employment ads in a local newspaper, her estranged sister Denise (Laura Mae Jesson) is walking around NYC and is going to pay her an unexpected visit because she wants to get away from her abusive husband Jack (Richard Kern) and is desperate for somewhere to hide. When Denise finally arrives, she says to her sister, "I had to come. I really left Jack this time. I felt my head hit the floor one last time and something in me snapped" and begs her to let her stay, to which Paula replies in a fairly smug and self-satisfied way, "Well, of course you can, you silly fool. So it took a full whack from your dear hubby Jack to put you on the right track." While the two sisters are talking, the viewer also learns that the last time Paula saw Denise was when she intentionally burned her parents' house down, thus revealing that she has fairly maliciously destructive tendencies. After boring Denise by giving her a tour of her apartment just so that she can show off all paintings that she has created (notably, the paintings were actually created by Stark, who clearly also used the film as a less than inconspicuous mean to flaunt her painterly prowess), Paula makes her sister a spaghetti dinner where she eventually reveals the true extent of her mental derangement by stating after her sibling complains of being afraid of her husband, "I'm more scared of myself, I'm not scared of my man. I'm scared that maybe...these olives are really bugs and I'm not really even here...And maybe that I only think I'm eating olives and I'm really eating bugs." Naturally, Paula's mind begins to completely disintegrate as the film progresses.

When Denise complains, "I'm the one with the problems, you know," as if she is competing in a victimhood contest and then expresses her undying fear that her husband might show up at the apartment while the two eat dinner together, Paula seems to have a schizophrenic premonition of sorts where she inexplicably smears spaghetti sauce on her face, climbs on the kitchen table while in a seemingly possessed state, and suffers a seizure of sorts. Of course, it does not take long for deadbeat husband Jack to show up and when he does he demands that Paula tell him where his wife is while sadistically smacking her in the face with a red rose. When Denise wakes up from a nap and finds Jack in the apartment, the seemingly dope-addled thug of a hubby starts beating her and Paula in a fashion that one would expect from some boorish wife-beater-wearing wop thug like Jake La Motta in Martin Scorsese's Raging Bull (1980). Ultimately, Paula knocks Jack unconscious by hitting him over the head with a frying pan while he is busy beating Denise while she is lying in a bathtub, so the two sister subsequently decide to tie him to pole on the roof of their apartment building. In a mocking gesture, Paula places the same red rose that he repeatedly smacked her in the face with into Jack's mouth, thereupon making him resemble some sort of hapless dime-store Don Juan. In between Denise attempting in vain to spoon-feed him canned crap while he tries to viciously attack her and calls her a "bitch," Paula whips anti-gentleman Jack into shape by slapping him in the face while repeating like a playfully sadistic automaton, "You better learn how to behave yourself." Aside from berating her sister's scumbag spouse, Paula also enjoys lying naked in her bathtub while in awkward positions and singing like an autistic toddler while in a seemingly possessed state that reflects the progressive degeneration of her uniquely unhinged mind.

WE ARE NOT TO BLAME

Somewhat curiously, Paula has a sex dream about Jack and even decides to tell her sister about it, stating, "I was dreaming about Jack all night long last night. I went up on the roof and while he was tied up we had sex together. And even though we hated each other, it seemed really necessary, like...Maybe in the future, lovers will be a thing of the past and people that hate each other will get together to have sex. Instead of my beloved, it will be my dearly behated," thus hinting that she is probably a clueless masochist who wants to blame her fucked up sexual desires on some sort of malignant meta-sexual plague. After describing her lurid sex dream to a less than impressed Denise, Paula goes to check on Jack and discovers that he has somehow managed to escape from his bondage and is nowhere in sight. Seemingly obsessed with the idea of sharing carnal knowledge with her sister's violent deadbeat hubby, Paula later decides to diddle her puss while staring at her paintings, which are mostly comprised of cadaverous little girls that seem to point to some sort of ungodly childhood trauma that still plagues the protagonist. With Denise receiving her dream of her husband completely disappearing from her life, she and Paula decide to have a sort of mock funeral for Jack where they bury his personal belongings. After throwing Jack's stuff into a hole they have dug in the middle of a secluded public park, Paula proceeds to bless the items by ceremoniously pissing on them. Unfortunately, the unintentionally farcical pseudo-funeral takes a turn for the worst when a longhaired wuss (Nick Zedd), who has been secretly stalking the sisters, appears out of nowhere, pushes Denise into the hole, and proceeds to rape Paula, who begins to wallow in having her pussy pillaged by some wayward weirdo as reflected in a large smile that eventually appears on her face while she is having her vag ravaged. After the somewhat brief rape, Paula grabs her sister Denise and they leave while Zedd curiously proceeds to fill in the hole that the two gal's dug. As an assumed result of the severe trauma that she has suffered at the hands of a sexually rabid proto-hipster ponce, Paula develops a special affinity for baby dolls and falls into a completely infantile state. Indeed, Denise screams hysterically when she wakes up Paula and discovers that her sister looks like a sort of punk rock Bride of Frankenstein. In the end, Denise also falls into a comatose state and sits by Paula's side while she rocks back in forth in a rocking chair while holding a baby doll and smiling at the camera in a deranged exaggerated fashion in a scenario that echoes the collective female psychosis of the eponymous chicks in Robert Altman's 3 Women (1977). After the film's end credits roll, Zedd is featured sitting at a kitchen table naked while attempting to spoon-feed one of Paula's baby dolls in a rather ridiculous yet nonetheless grotesque scene that is genuinely more disturbing and aesthetically loathsome than anything the War Is Menstrual Envy (1992) director has ever directed.

As the assumed result of her later renunciation of the Cinema of Transgression movement and largely interview-based personal war against Kern and Zedd, Stark decided to later reedit We Are Not To Blame and cut out all of the scenes featuring male characters, thereupon completely changed both the tone and narrative of the entire film and transforming it into a sort of innately incoherent dreamlike experience of surreally sisterly sort. When asked in an interview with Jack Sargeant why she decided to reedit the film, Stark replied, "I guess I was interested in seeing what it looked like if I eliminated all the antagonists, namely the men. They are suggested but not given any embodiment. I mean really, the whole purity of that film was the relation of the two sisters. So I was just amazed that when I took everything out that involved other people I just saw this purity there that I liked. In a way it's like when you work at home sometimes...I don't know, it's something about simplifying things, taking out what isn't necessary. It was kind of an experiment, I have both versions of it, I'm just interested in this version right now." Of course, Stark also took out "what isn't necessary" in her personal life by ridding herself of Kern, Zedd, and the Cinema of Transgression and of course knowing that fact before watching We Are Not to Blame makes the film an all the more entrancing experience as a result, as if the filmmaker could foretell the bitter disdain that she would later develop for her ex-collaborators. Notably, Stark, who is proudly Italian by blood (hence why she later began using her real Italian surname 'Mele' again), managed to gain a following in Italy, which is the only place that seems to distribute her films (the Turin-based publishing company Nautilus autoproduzioni released a VHS of her films under the title The Lost Films of Casandra Stark). Not unlike fellow NYC-based Guido auteur Abel Ferrara, Stark also had the opportunity to work in the old country where she shot part of her film The Anarchists (1994) in Napoli and was even featured on Italian TV while doing a film tour there (as the careers of Stark, Ferrara, Joe Dallesandro, and various other Italian-American film figures seem to demonstrate, Italians seem to love the novelty of having Americans of Guido extraction working in their homeland). Undoubtedly what separates Stark from the rest of the filmmakers of the Cinema of Transgression movement, especially its most well known figures Zedd and Kern, is that she has a strong sense of spirituality (in her first film Dead On My Arm (1985), she gave a credit to C.G. Jung, not to mention the fact she is obsessed with Catholic imagery and themes), as well as cultural and ancestral heritage, hence why she is also probably the most intriguing and authentic figure that was ever associated with the movement, even if her films oftentimes feel like they were directed by the schizophrenic bastard preteen daughter of Werner Schroeter and Asia Argento. As the film's title and content surely hints, We Are Not to Blame seems to be a film about coming to terms with sexual abuse and personal trauma. Indeed, like many victims of childhood sexual abuse, Stark's character in the film has an irrational attraction to male abusers. It should also be noted that Stark has accused both Zedd and Kern of being abusive and exploitative filmmakers, or as she stated in an interview with Sargeant regarding what she believes destroyed the Cinema of Transgression movement, "...it all became so mean and very abusive to the human spirit. It was an art movement moving against itself, against healing. It became a destructive force really, it became evil." Whether or not We Are Not to Blame helped Stark to heal is something that only she really knows, but it certainly gave me the somewhat dejecting impression that it was sired from the restless soul of an abused little girl who has been forsaken with having to live a lifetime of internal suffering as a result of some pervert(s) who wanted to experience a couple moments of sick forbidden pleasure.

WE ARE NOT TO BLAME

-Ty E

36 FILLETTE

Catherine Breillat (1988)

Catherine Breillat's 36 Fillette has been called the "French Lolita." Aside from the fact that the female lead is only 14 years old, the films aren't too similar. 36 Fillette follows the young teenaged and big breasted Lili. She is obviously sexually frustrated and ready to "bust out" so to speak. She desires yet cock teases a middle aged man.

Lili can't articulate her feelings. She pretends she doesn't want sex when her body screams for it. She even causes the middle age suitor to put a couple bruises on her. Still, she goes back to this man. His dominance attracts her. Lili can only lie to herself for so long.

Female sexuality is central to the works of director Catherine Breillat. Her film Fat Girl (which is probably her best) makes 36 Fillette look weak by comparison. Nonetheless, developing teenage (and even preteen) sexuality also is a main focus of Breillat's work. One must wonder whether or not she is reflecting over her own adolescence. Her obsession speaks for itself.

Jean-Pierre Léaud (I think of him as Antoine Doinel) consoles young Lili in 36 Fillette. A wise man indeed, he fuels Lili's ambition for sex. Unfortunately for Lili, the man she desires is far from being as charismatic as Jean-Pierre's character. The young "man" she later settles for is just desperate (and Lili could care less).

Breillat invites controversy with her films. Her style is something new which is respectable. My only complaint is her films always seem to be lacking something. I probably lack the female intuition.

-Ty E

ROMANCE
ROMANCE

Catherine Breillat (1999) Having seen Fat Girl (A classic in it's own right), i was set on seeing all of Breillat's films. The one sticking out to me the most, was Romance or Romance X. From the alternative title alone, i could tell she was trying to capitalize off of the controversy. The thing that really sold it to me was the provocative cover featuring a semi-nude lovely female. It also gained a lot of much wanted publicity due to the unsimulated sex scenes in the film, which gave birth to more one-dimensional films victim to the same mistake. As soon as i watched this film, i soon realized that she wasn't really that attractive, nor was the film good at all. Marie is a teacher and has a very deep problem (No Pun Intended). She loves her boyfriend, but they don't have sex. In order to fulfill her darkest sexual desires, she decides to whore her self out in a vain attempt at post-modern feminism. Breillat assumes a full stance on making men seem like chauvinistic pigs. I'm not saying we're not, but i'll be damned if some ostentatious neo-dyke Frenchie will pull a lifetime original movie out of her ass in a vain attempt to cause housewife rebellions. Trying to look behind the background of her empowered monologues describing femdom as a must-is, i still couldn't find any enjoyable facet to this film. Considering having made some incredible films, i won't dismiss her just yet as an accidental film-maker. She still has a couple films i need to see in order for me to make my mind. I do appreciate the meaning behind the anti-love movement. I really do. I also agree with her descent into a darker form of sexuality but Romance is still a bland, raunchy film which is lead astray by it's own ego. Do not want.

-Maq

THE LAST MISTRESS

Catherine Breillat (2007)

I am not that big of a fan of degenerate and repulsive French feminists. I am also not that into period pieces. The thought of both of these things together is almost unsettling. I recently saw Catherine Breillat's The Last Mistress and now admit that I like a feminist's dirty and bloody French period piece. I guess any film featuring a very aggressive and sexually deranged Asia Argento can't be too bad. In The Last Mistress, Argento practically enslaves a young wussy frog despite her mental instability.

Asia Argento is the darkest and wickedest thing to hit the fairy like French aristocracy. She is the bastard daughter of Spanish and Italian aristocrats. An impure child of lust, Vellini (Asia Argento) is a mutt from two of the most mongrelized countries of Europe. The young and very feminine Ryno is at first offended by hearing of Vellini's ethnic background. But within a few days, he is ready to die for Vellini. Ryno takes a bullet for her in a dual with an overweight senior citizen. Vellini almost rapes Ryno's body as he is assumed to be dying. The Last Mistress is about true love.

Ryno finally finds himself a good Aryan girl after having too much of Vellini's insanity. Naturally, Vellini is around every corner ready to molest Ryno. Will little Ryno give into this dark goddess? Can the Aryan girl even compete with the hypnotic spells Vellini effortlessly puts on Ryno? Director Catherine Breillat felt that suspenseful romance would be more interesting than showing the ugliest vagina's ever with The Last Mistress. This is a film that both sexes can relate to and possibly be "titillated" by.

Asia Argento may give her greatest performance yet in The Last Mistress. She doesn't refrain from showing us her at her worst moments (not that she didn't do that in Scarlet Diva). In The Last Mistress, Asia Argento embodies the very appealing yet dangerous vamp at a new and much complex level. Unlike most vamps, in The Last Mistress we can't help but feel sorry for the manipulative and loose lady. After all, the male she seduces is a pathetic womanish creature anyways.

The Last Mistress is easily the best film I have seen from Catherine Breillat. Going into the film I expected a piece of pretentious dykeness and a wasted performance by Asia Argento. Instead, with The Last Mistress I got a somewhat complex character study of a pretentious aristocratic bachelor and his weakness for a woman of lust. I guess Catherine Breillat does have something interesting to say about males.

-Ty E

LORDS OF DOGTOWN
LORDS OF DOGTOWN

Catherine Hardwicke (2005)

Before making it big with the silly Twilight movie, Catherine Hardwicke had attempted to direct gritty yet somewhat superficially stylized realist films like Thirteen and Lords of Dogtown. Thirteen was an almost unbearable experience, with the climax for me being the surely unerotic and obscenely exposed brillo pad of middle aged actress Holly Hunter. Catherine Hardwicke, being the middle aged woman she is, surely has a different perspective on how to direct women (and men) than your typical male director. With Twilight, Hardwicke made this even more obvious with her scopophilia for actor Robert Pattinson and her unremarkable female lead. I believe Lords of Dogtown to be Catherine Hardwicke's greatest cinematic achievement and the director's most successful direction job, as far as the film's subjects go. The Lords of Dogtown is probably as close as Hollywood has ever gotten to capturing both vintage skateboard action and the lifestyle of the skater. I spent a good part of my life engulfed in everything skateboarding. When not skateboarding, I took it upon myself to find out about skateboarding history and it did not take me long to find old VHS tapes of old Hollywood Sk8 movies. Out of all the horrible skateboard-related movies to come out of Hollywood, I found Gleaming the Cube and Thrashin' to be easily the best. Gleaming the Cube has one of the silliest crime subplots ever, but for a young skater it makes for a fun albeit ridiculous film. Thrashin' is a much cooler flick showing the various skate subcultures of the 1980's with a radical Romeo and Juliet-style subplot. After all, nothing would be cooler to a bunch of young skaters than the idea of rival skate gangs that have skateboarding duels and rival sk8 gang chases. An especially notable scene in Thrashin' is when the lead character of the film is chased after at night on skateboard by an enemy punk/hardcore skate gang while the classic The Circle Jerks song "Wild in the Streets" is playing. Thrashin' is surely The Rebel Without a Cause of skateboarding. It wasn't until Lords of Dogtown, however, that Hollywood seemed to take the history of skateboarding seriously. Lords of Dogtown is based on the documentary Dogtown and Z-Boys, a documentary that essentially chronicles the early history of skateboarding. It was directed by one of the most famous Z-Boys Stacey Peralta, so as far as authenticity and historical credibility go, Dogtown and Z-Boys is a documentary in its own league. Catherine Hardwicke paid proper tribute to Peralta's documentary with her film Lords of Dogtown, especially for a woman that has zero ties to skateboarding. Skateboarders have always been weary of outsiders (as Lords of Dogtown even makes known) showing interest and attempting to cash in on the popularity of skateboarding. Within the past decade, it seems that skateboarding has reached its highest point in popularity, with skate parks and stores located everywhere and a good percentage of non-skater teenagers/young adults wearing skate garb.

With the 2005 release of Lords of Dogtown, it was about time that skateboarding was recognized as a legitimate and notable part of American cultural (and “sport”) history. Catherine Hardwicke was successful in making a film palatable for the general American audience but especially digestible by teenagers. Like Dogtown and Z-Boys before it, Lords of Dogtown features an audibly agreeable soundtrack with classic rock, psychedelic rock, punk/hardcore and other appropriate tracks that surely compliment the visuals of the film. Anyone that has ever skated knows that skate videos from skateboarding companies must have agreeable soundtracks to add to the vitality and persona of a particular skater’s video part. Skate videos have also influenced many notable contemporary directors such as Larry Clark (Kids, Ken Park) and Harmony Korine (Gummo, Mr. Lonely). Personally, skateboard videos were a gateway and initiation into the world of underground/independent cinema. Skateboard videos made me realize that there were much more unique, independent, and artistic filmmakers out there aside from the high priced garbage that Hollywood is constantly pumping out. Lords of Dogtown manages to express the rebellious and independent nature of skateboarding, even if it is mild in comparison to what actually comes out of the skateboarding world. Most of the young actors did an excellent job playing their vintage rebel roles. The albino teen from Gus van Sant’s Elephant played by John Robinson does an excellent job playing the anal retentive young Stacey Peralta. Surprisingly, Emile Hirsch is not bad as the most anti-social skater Jay Adams, a skater that would play a huge role in influencing the subculture despite leading a life of petty crime. Healthy Ledger even does a superb job playing a very annoying drunk and stoned surf shop owner, kind of like the Jim Morrison of a surf ghetto. Jewish-Ingun-Wop Nikki Reed also does a good job playing a zesty teenage cocktease. I wasn’t too fond of Victor Rasu as his hair constantly reminded me of a palm tree and his cholo chauvinism is not very tolerable. Like them or not, the characters of Lords of Dogtown are surely “characters.” I have watched Lords of Dogtown a number of times and it manages to keep its staying power. More importantly, the film makes you want to go out and skate. Lords of Dogtown may not have the hypnotic sensational Occult audio/video power of a Kenneth Anger film but it certainly accomplished what it set out to do in regards to immortalizing skateboard history in all its grittiness. As one of probably few skaters that also played on a football team, I can say that Lords of Dogtown did for skateboarding what Friday Night Lights did for football, offering the casual viewer a general yet entertaining inside view to each particular athletic culture. I just hope one day Hollywood decides to direct a Hollywood film about professional skateboard, artist, and Toy Machine skateboard company owner Ed Templeton., but I doubt Hollywood has that much of an interest in skateboarding.

-Ty E

THE SKIN
THE SKIN

Cecelia Condit (1981)

Aside from her fundamentally flawed SS sadomasochistic danse-macabre Il portiere di notte (1974) aka The Night Porter and to a lesser extent her dystopian sci-fi flick I cannibali (1970) aka The Year of the Cannibals and Nietzsche horn-dog hagiography Al di là del bene e del male (1977) aka Beyond Good and Evil, Italian auteuress Liliana Cavani—a filmmaker that is always more interesting when she is more intemperate artsploitation than plodding arthouse—has never been a filmmaker I seriously respected yet she certainly won me over with a recent viewing of her exceedingly eccentrically epic Curzio Malaparte adaptation La pelle (1981) aka The Skin. Curiously feeling oftentimes more Fellini-esque than Fellini in terms of combining the post-neorealist humanism of something like I Vitelloni (1953) with the surrealist situational travelogue-like approach of Roma (1972) and a sort of primordial dago decadence à la Fellini Satyricon (1969), not to mention a weird inexplicable monster fish scene that recalls La Dolce Vita (1960), the film is, in my obscenely obnoxious opinion, Cavani's greatest contribution to the art of cinema in terms of apocalyptic intrigue and downright sheer sleazy entertainment. Indeed, quite unlike the filmmaker's other films which, not unlike those of cosmopolitan commie Bertolucci, are completely deracinated and rarely guido-esque in a flagrantly gombbah fashion like the films of Pietro Germi and Ettore Scola, this wayward WWII epic—a delightfully degrading tribute to human debasement and desperation—is shamelessly and insanely Italian in its essence to the point of bordering on full-blown whacked-out wopsloitation à la Scola's Ugly, Dirty and Bad (1976) aka Brutti, sporchi e cattivi. In fact, the film is the ultimate 'antifascist' flick in terms of completely contradicting the Mussolinian ideal and portraying the Italian people, or at least the Neapolitan people, as a superlatively shameless people without pride or scruples. Indeed, in the film, mothers literally sell their little boy's buttocks to pedo-prone Moroccan Muslim invaders and fucked fathers hold group shows where American soldiers get to take turns fingering a rare teenage vaginal vagina. Likewise, Sicilian slags—a less than gorgeous group that invades Naples and causes the drastic depreciation of dago pussy for everyone—are so desperate for the dollars of darkie GIs, who are quite stereotypically only interested in fucking blonde white women, that they wear blonde wigs on their overly punished sub-prole pussies. Of course, desperate times call for desperate measures, but somehow I seriously doubt that the all-the-more-demolished krauts had reached such ungodly extremes of virtually transcendental whoredom, even if the kraut capitulation resulted in the unwanted births of various Günther Kaufmann bastard types. In short, The Skin—a sometimes vertiginously vulgar film full of venal vulgarians that manages to find a certain assuredly aberrant joy in the collective degeneration of a sub-piss-poor peoples—exemplifies the sort of scathing cynicism, shameless honesty (paradoxically combined with grandiose dishonesty), and 'unflattering humanism' that guidos do best. Forget Roberto Rossellini's Germany Year Zero (1948), Cavani's odious odyssey of obscenity dares to plunge the viewer into the true dark disgusting depths of despair and destitution that plagued the defeated peoples of the Axis Powers in a manner that no Teutonic filmmaker has ever dared to touch despite the New German Cinema obsession with WWII and its virtually post-apocalyptic aftermath. Still, Cavani's underrated flick makes for a great double feature with Rainer Werner Fassbinder's classic The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979).

While The Skin is uniquely unflattering in its depiction of Italians, it is strangely 'pro-American' in a sort of cynical backhanded Italian sense where the dumb uncultivated yank is ridiculed for his naiveté. Indeed, as Cavani stated in the featurette At the Frontier of the Apocalypse in regard to the source writer's view of dumb yanks, "Malaparte sees the Americans in THE SKINS as a young and naïve people, which is somewhat true, and he's very attached to them. He has a love for them. There's a love for this quality, as if they were still clean, somehow untouched by sin, by the sin of war, the sin of butchery, by these things. He sees them in a positive way, as a person who has a positive view of the world would. And this comes out. He sees them as naïve because a city like Naples is the complete opposite of the American mentality. It can't get any more different." As to the right sort of symbol of strong puritanical American naiveté, Cavani felt that Burt Lancaster—a cultivated American that already contributed greatly to guido cinema via masterful Luchino Visconti flicks like The Leopard (1963) and Conversation Piece (1974)—was the right mensch for the job, or as she explained, "...I needed an American that didn't seem malicious at all. That really represented the idea of the American liberator. In that sense, ariose, with traits of goodness. Rough, but rough like a father." Of course, as the same singularly stoical actor that portrayed the strangely paternal and harshly heroic GI lead Major Abraham Falconer of Sydney Pollack's underrated WWII flick Castle Keep (1969)—another apocalyptic Europa-in-ruins epic of eccentricity that combines tragicomic realism and surrealism—Lancaster was the perfect man for the job, but great Latin lover Marcello Mastroianni shines no less as the lead. Speaking of Pollack's flick, Mike Nichols' similarly overlooked dark war dramedy Catch-22 (1970) seems like an obvious influence on The Skin, especially in terms of its playfully preternatural depiction of American GIs and unhinged depictions of guidette whores, among other things.

As The Skin fleetingly makes reference to as if to absolve the writer of guilt, Curzio Malaparte—a half-German by birth that was born Curt Erich Suckert but a 100% Italian in terms of effortless charm and unscrupulous spirit—was originally a card-carrying fascist to the point where he was a vocal intellectual supporter of the rise of the National Fascist Party and Benito Mussolini, but he was too uncompromisingly individualist to properly play the game and opportunism eventually led him to switching sides to communism and Catholicism after WWII (though one would not realize that by watching the film). In Cavani's fucked flick, Malaparte comes off seemingly like a sort of spiritually decadent aristocrat of spirit that is easily able to adapt to the most ungodly and atrocious of circumstances, including being elegantly passive-aggressively hospitable to an uncultivated conquering army made up of largely blond-haired and blue-eyed soldiers that are quite generous when it comes to terms like "wop" and "greaseball." For example, although ostensibly working from a pro-fascist perspective while a war correspondent on the Eastern Front during the Second World War, Malaparte's oftentimes uncensored articles acted as the genesis for his unclassifiable magnum opus Kaputt (1944) that is more of a razor sharp amoral literary masterpiece of despair and destruction than a tribute to any sort of fascist ferocity or Mussolinian martial prowess. While Kaputt managed to achieve official Catholic Index librorum prohibitorum ('List of Prohibited Books') status and the author was once a hardcore atheist that later supported the atheistic commies, he was even trying to scam god at the end of his life by getting close to the Catholic Church. As to his contributions to cinema aside from being the debauched brain behind The Skin, Malaparte made one attempt at directing with the largely forgotten Il Cristo proibito (1951) aka The Forbidden Christ. Additionally, the writer's legendary house 'Casa Malaparte,' which he once proudly showed-off to legendary German general Erwin Rommel, appears in Jean-Luc Godard's Le Mépris (1963) aka Contempt. In The Skin, one certainly gets the sense that Malaparte—a man with a pseudonymous surname that means "evil/wrong side" (and is also a play on Napoleon's family name 'Bonaparte' which in Italian means 'good side')—is the ultimate cultivated conman as a effortless charmer that knows how to tell a person to eat shit without even causing the slightest bit of offense yet you cannot help but love him, so naturally Mastroianni is the perfect man for the role. After all, not unlike Malaparte, Mastroianni was a sort of unofficial ambassador for the Italian people and Italian culture, which is exactly the thankless job that Mastroianni-as-Malaparte performs in The Skin—a film that probably deserves the distinguished honor of being the mostly uniquely unflattering tribute to Italy in all of cinema history. Indeed, if you thought Spike Lee did a spectacular job of goombah-bashing in films like Do the Right Thing (1989) and Summer of Sam (1999), you have not been bombarded with rotten garlic that Cavani's film reeks of. Speaking of Lee, his hopelessly Hollywood-esque WWII flick Miracle at St. Anna (2008) penned by Judaic mulatto James McBride turns the Italian campaign into a negro fantasy with cardboard characters that includes a preposterous love triangle between an Italian partisan chick and two black GIs instead offering a honest look at the horrors and whores of war like Cavani's flick.

THE SKIN

In Teutonic dandy auteur Werner Schroeter's brutally beautiful The Reign of Naples (1978) aka Nel regno di Napoli—a sort of Pasolinian neo-neorealist epic where communism and Catholicism battle for the soul of Italy while the people wallow in impoverished misery—a woman sells her daughter’s virginity to a negro sailor for a bag of sugar in what ultimately seems like a completely unbelievable scenario. Admittedly, I found this scene, which is apparently historically accurate, to be fairly disturbing despite Schroeter’s laconic approach to the material, yet it is nothing compared to the sheer and utter human depravity and abject desperation of the fittingly titled The Skin where human flesh of the most intimate sort is much cheaper than beef and pork. Indeed, as Malaparte (Maſtroianni) somberly ſtates, “We loſt the war. Women and children loſt if more than anyone else.” The year is 1944 and, aside from 112 German POWs that are being ‘fed’ by a scheming Camorra mobſter named Eduardo Marzullo (Carlo Giuffrè), there are no more faſciſts or Nazis in Naples, or so do members of the United States Fifth Army learn as they arrive in town with the expectation of doing some serious fighting and inſtead find a virtual city-sized whorehouse. Led by the largely benevolent yet no-bullſhit General Mark Cork (Burt Lancaſter)—a man that hates his own elites and finds it easy to like a deceptively affable chap like Malaparte—the army and various other foreign ſoldiers certainly treat the city as one big giant bordello as the locals aggressively attempt to ſell gaſh for caſh leſt they ſtarve. Aſide from being hired by General Cork to broker a deal for the 112 German POWs who are being intentionally overfed by mob boſs Marzullo with the intent of ſcamming more money out of the Americans, Malaparte is alſo assigned to aſt as the chaperon and ſort of cultural tour guide of a bitchy blueblood female aviator named Deborah Wyatt (Alexandra King) who alſo happens to be the wife of a U.S. ſenator and is thus abſurdly made an honorary Airforce officer. A ſuppoſed ‘Queen of the Sky’ that flies into Naples as part of a nonſenſical publicity ſtunt that, much to General Cork’s chagrin, is backed by both Eisenhower and FDR, Mrs. Wyatt—a ſuperficially cultured dame whose beauty is only transcended by her hubris—is an uptight cunt that immediately demonſtrates a ſenſe of racial ſuperiority over the lowly ſwarthy guido people that ſhe has oſtenſibly come to pay tribute to. Of course, being a man of ſubtle almoſt-Svengali-like ſeduction talents that oftentimes relies on projecting a deceptive image of adoring obſequiousness, Malaparte effortlessly gets his revenge on Mrs. Wyatt when ſhe leaſt ſuſpects it by forcing her to virtually bathe in her own ſanctimonious hypocrisy. Indeed, Malaparte brings Wyatt to a virtual white ſlave market where Italian mothers pimp their prepubescent ſons to Moroccan ſoldiers and the upperclass lady naturally completely loſes it when ſhe witnesses an Islamic pervert examining the anuſes of theſe poor forſaken boys, thus reſulting in her loſing a not-all-that-small ſegment of her hair after the ſwarthy ſexual ſavage takes a ſwing at her with a dagger (notably, ſaid ſand ſavage then proceeds to ſhowoff his ‘white woman hair trophy’ to his equally thrilled ſavage comrades). Needless to ſay, the voyage to Italy does not end well for Mrs. Wyatt as ſhe crashes her plane after Mount Vesuvius erupts and is subsequently the victim of a gang-rape scenario by her own American GIs in an unsettling scenario where the flying diva is brought down to the same level of abject degradation as the Neapolitan people that she previously looked down on in a scenario that would probably provide catharsis to certain guido viewers.

THE SKIN

Aside from General Cork, Malaparte also befriends a young naïve but well-meaning GI named Jimmy Wren (Ken Marshall) who does not think twice about partaking in as much as guidette pussy as he can possibly penetrate, or so one would assume from all his bragging. In fact, when a Judaic comrade named Goldberg complains, "Are you crazy? Every nigger this side of the Atlantic has been in them wop broads. You forget them movies about what happens to your pecker if you get the clap?," Jimmy boy simply mocks his fellow GI for sticking to pathetically masturbating to porno magazines despite having unlimited vaginal opportunities in Naples. Despite partaking in prostitutes and even obtaining an Italian girlfriend (Rosaria Della Femmina), Jimmy eventually unexpectedly falls in love with a young Italian peasant girl named Maria Concetta (Liliana Tari) after encountering her selflessly comforting a dying GI whose guts and intestines are literally hanging outside his stomach. Needless to say, Jimmy suffers a mental breakdown of sorts upon discovering that his beloved Maria Concetta is part of a sick sideshow attraction as the supposed 'only remaining virgin in Naples' where he father charges GIs to finger her hymen-intact honeypot. In fact, Jimmy is so disturbed by this quasi-incestuous scenario that he angrily uses his fingers to break Maria's hymen and then proceeds to wipe the fresh blood on her father-cum-pimp's face in disgrace. Luckily, Jimmy finally gets over it and decides to bring Maria Concetta home as a war bride, or so he tells a less than enthused Malaparte who is probably not proud about being the member of a defeated nation where all the hot young girls are desperate to leave. Of course, despite the degradation that she suffers at the hands (or, in this case, fingers) of horny GIs, Maria Concetta is one of the lucky ones because, as Malaparte explains to Jimmy in regard to the prostitution situation in Naples, "Well, you know, the price of human flesh is below that for beef or pork. A week ago, you could get a 20 year old girl for 10 dollars. Now she'd be worth no more than four ... bones and all. The Sicilian girls flooded the market. They're older, so they cost less." Needless to say, the Sicilian streetwalkers are depicted as the most grotesque and ill-shapen of pussy-peddlers.

As an ex-fascist turned reluctant pro-American that seems to simply opportunistically support whoever is winning, Malaparte may not seem like a serious man of principle but as he proudly proclaims to Miss Wyatt and some dinner guests, "The real Italian flag does not show three colors but the male organ. Morality, Honor, Family, the cult of religion are all there, between the legs." In short, Malaparte is a covert pagan of sorts that has experienced what happens when civilization is stripped away and untamed libido reigns. Indeed, more than anywhere else, defeated nations reveal that sex sells and that everyone is willing to sell it if they are desperate enough, especially when conquering armies can simply pillage pussy for free as some of the GIs attempt to do in the film. Somewhat subversively, the film also dares to depict the racial character of sex and how certain groups are more hopelessly depraved than others. Indeed, whereas various Muslims are depicted as boy-buggering barbarians and “sodomite who likes sunflowers,” negroes are depicted as sort of anti-alchemists that love defiling golden hair. In fact, civil rights saint Emmett Till’s father Louis Till was executed by the U.S. Army on July 2, 1945 after taking part in the murder of an Italian woman and the rape of two others while surviving in the Italian Campaign as an American soldier (notably, great modernist poet and fascist propagandist Ezra Pound, who was imprisoned alongside the colored lust killer, mentions Till in lines 171-173 of Canto 74 of his Pisan Cantos). Of course, in general, the American GIs, especially of the Anglo-Saxon sort, come out looking as the least sexually debauched. Needless to say, aside from the love affair between Jimmy Wren and Maria Concetta, all the sexual behavior depicted in The Skin is simply grotesque and that this completely loveless lust exposes human-beings as being nothing more than bestial animals, albeit worse as at least (some) humans have a conscience and thus should know better. In that sense, war and its aftermath is where man is at his most unflatteringly atavistic, or so one discovers while watching The Skin.

Naturally, The Skin would not be the artsploitation war film par excellence if it did not conclude in a highly sensational apocalyptic fashion where a Boston Brahmin-like bitch crashes her plane and faces a world of pain in the form of rape-happy GIs and is forced to learn a little humility for once in her luxurious life. Undoubtedly, Mrs. Wyatt’s nightmarish night in Naples almost seems like the auteuress’ revenge as the American aristocrat is previously depicted going on a hateful anti-Italian rant and spitting the following acidic vile at protagonist Malaparte, “I hate your attitude, you Latin snob! Know-it-all! All of you! Backwards! Scummy! Oily! Hairy, dark, greasy gigolos! Wop! Wop! And you’re laughing at me? You can stick your flag right between your legs, up your ass!” Rather regrettably, Malaparte does largely prove to be a know-it-all as far as his patently pessimistic perspective is concerned and the film even concludes with the hapless hero becoming hopelessly dejected after witnessing a happy Italian peasant man celebrating the American occupation being completely crushed by an American tank in an allegorical scene that more or less sums up the cultural effect of the American occupation on Italy. Needless to say, it is no coincidence that the film concludes with the arrival of the U.S. Fifth Army in Rome through the rather paradisiacal Appian Way. As Malaparte somberly states to his young American ‘friend’ after witnessing the crushing of a fellow goombah by an American tank, “You can go, Jimmy. You are the winners.”

In terms of its absolutely scathing and sardonic sentiments that are in stark contrast to the heavyhearted humanism of classic Italian films like Vittorio De Sica's Bicycle Thieves (1948) and Umberto D. (1952) and Roberto Rossellini's Rome, Open City (1945), The Skin is like the anti-neorealist film par excellence and a tastefully tasteless tribute to maestro Malaparte's almost otherworldly cynicism in relation to the American so-called liberation of Italy. Indeed, as Peter Bondanella noted in his classic text Italian Cinema: From Neorealism to the Present (1983), "Cavani investigates a moment of Italian history already familiar from many well-known neorealist films; however, she captures it from an entirely different perspective. In place of the nobler values of sacrifice and courage neorealist films celebrate, Cavani forces us to reconsider the dramatic story of occupied Naples as the relationship between the victor and vanquished. The director implicitly protests the cultural hegemony of America over Italy that began during the last year of the war. Malaparte's grotesque realism survives from the novel [...] The romanticism associated with the war by those who fought on the winning side, or who participated in the Resistance, is removed from Cavani's story, and what remains is a tale of survival, of saving one's skin in the midst of hardship, starvation, depravity, and uncertainty [...] Cavani reminds us, human history is made at the expense of human sacrifice, literally from our hides." As American half-wop Abel Ferrara's rather depressing documentary Napoli, Napoli, Napoli (2009) reveals, it seems that Naples has yet to completely recover from the Second World War, but then again this is a historically degenerate place that, as depicted in The Skin, there is, among other things, an old 'womb envy' tradition of 'gay birth' where a gay guido pretends to go into labor and give birth to a sort of mock baby boy with a large cock after nine months of 'gay marriage.' Of course, this absurd 'gay birth' celebration is organically Neapolitan and should stay that way as it would be a shame if it replaced by American trash like Queer Eye and Drag Queen Story Hour in terms of representing gay goombah identity.

THE SKIN

Despite being assuredly antifascist, The Skin does follow in a certain distinctly Italian tradition as exemplified by the proto-fascist aesthetic perversity of Malaparte and his contemporary Gabriele D'Annunzio who, on top of writing decadent Nietzschean literary, was the first 'Duce' and a great national war hero that Benito Mussolini stole most of his best ideas from. Of course, Cavani's most (in)famous film The Night Porter is even more of a reflection of this sort of perverse fascist aestheticism, but I digress. In my opinion, what The Skin ultimately demonstrates is that Cavani is, at best, a sort of inordinately cultivated exploitation auteur that, due to her gender and propensity towards controversial subject matter, scammed her way into the arthouse, which is not necessarily a bad thing. Indeed, even in a film like Francesco (1989)—the second film of the director's career-spanning St. Francis of Assisi trilogy—where Cavani attempts what Paul Schrader has described as 'transcendental style,' the almost absurdly amoral female filmmaker cannot help but include a scene where a completely unclad Mickey Rourke, who curiously portrays the titular lead, literally fucks snow. As for anyone that knows anything about Nietzsche or his philosophical weltanschauung, Beyond Good and Evil manages to make John Huston's obscure cinematic disaster Freud: The Secret Passion (1962) seem like a respectable biopic by comparison. As for her Jun'ichirō Tanizaki adaptation The Berlin Affair (1985)—a film depicting a bizarre love triangle between a Nazi diplomat, his wife, and the daughter of a Japanese ambassador—it is about as erotic and aesthetically potent as a mid-1990s Showtime softcore flick, but I digress.

Undoubtedly, there is no sharper contrast to the films of Cavani and novels of Malaparte than the writings of Italian 'super fascist' Julius Evola who denounced the stereotypical dirty debauched dago types that The Skin so unforgettably depicts. Indeed, in a chapter entitled 'Latin Character—Roman World—Mediterranean Soul' featured in his book Gli uomini e le rovine (1953) aka Men Among the Ruins: Post-War Reflections of a Radical Traditionalist, Evola makes a dichotomous comparison between two very different Italian types. Indeed, whereas the 'Roman' type is stoic, noble, disciplined, loyal, hierarchal, and orderly, the 'Mediterranean' type is histrionic, amoral, undisciplined, disloyal, resentful, disorderly, and proudly sexually ill-restrained. Needless to say, Evola believes that the Mediterranean type has come to define the Italian people, or as the magical baron once wrote, "The qualities of the 'Roman' type represent the positive limit of dispositions hidden in the best parts of our people, just as the qualities characterized as 'Mediterranean' correspond to the negative limit and the less noble part of it; these limits are also found as components in other peoples, especially in the 'Latin' group. However, we must realize that too many times behaviors resembling the 'Mediterranean' type have been identified, especially abroad, as typically Italian, and that the 'Mediterranean' component appears to have prevailed overall in Italian life following World War II." Of course, The Skin and most of Cavani's other films confirm Evola's unflattering thesis.

When reading Evola's remarks on Nietzsche, it almost seems absurdly ironic that Cavani—a woman that, not unlike fellow Italian filmmaker Luchino Visconti, certainly had a German obsession of sorts—would even dare to direct a biopic about the Teutonic philosopher yet, at the same time, some of his ideas also strangely support the Cavanian style of filmmaking and a sort of 'Italian' romanticism in general. Indeed, as Evola wrote, "Nietzsche himself warned against every morality that tends to dry up every impetuous current of the human soul instead of channeling it. The capability of control, equilibrium, continuity in feeling and in willing must not lead to a withering and mechanization of one's being, as seems to be the case with some negative traits of the central-European and Anglo-Saxon. What matters is not to suppress passion and to give to the soul a beautiful, regulated, and homogenous, though flat form; but rather to organize one's being in an integral way around the capability of recognizing, discriminating, and adequately utilizing the impulses and the lights that emerge from one's deep recesses. It cannot be denied that passion is predominant in many Mediterranean Italian types, but this disposition does not amount to a defect, but rather to an enrichment, provided it finds its correlative in a firmly organized life." Of course, it can be argued that, in terms of the artistic life she has lived, Cavani somewhat ironically achieved this lofty Evolian ideal. Additionally, The Skin undoubtedly proves that Evola, Malaparte, and Cavani share similar sentiments in regard to the racial differences between Italians and Anglo-Saxons. It is certainly hard for me to imagine some uptight WASP stating in regard to his daughter's virginal vagina "It doesn't bite" while exposing during some superlatively sleazy sexual sideshow attraction, but such is Cavani's singularly sick cinematic realm of depraved dago sexual abandon and sodomic desperation.

THE SKIN

-Ty E

NEON NIGHTS

Cecil Howard (1981)

Undoubtedly, with the possible exception of neo-expressionist Stephen Sayadian aka 'Rinse Dream' (Café Flesh, Dr. Caligari), Cecil Howard aka Howard Winters aka Ward Summers aka Umberto Corleone was the greatest and most inventive director of hardcore pornography during the 1980s and, quite ironically, it was only when he attempted to direct a non-pornographic work, the marvelously moronically titled quasi-exploitation flick Dead Boyz Can't Fly (1992), after he and his family were nearly murdered in a robbery, that his libertine-oriented filmmaking career would come to an end. While I cannot say I have seen all 29 of the films that Howard directed between 1975 and 1992 (he began his filmmaking career as a producer with The Hot House (1970) directed by fellow subversive auteur-pornographer Armand Weston), those that I have seen have never failed to enthrall me in some way or another, with the keenly kaleidoscopic yet equally phantasmagoric cinematic adult fairytale Neon Nights (1981) aka Cecil Howard's Neon Nights being arguably his suavely and stylishly salacious magnum opus. As one can expect from virtually any shockingly artful, well acted, and memorable blue movie from the Golden Age of Porn, Neon Nights stars charismatic yet seemingly half-crazed kosher star Jamie Gillis (Through the Looking Glass, New Wave Hookers), but what really makes this fuck flick captivating in terms of acting is the Lolita-like lead Lysa Thatcher (Trashi, The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue), who on top of vaguely resembling my girlfriend (who is actually much more beautiful than the porn star), has a certain misleading 'innocence' about her that virtually all porn stars lack. A sort of non-anthropomorphic take on Lewis Carroll's Through the Looking-Glass, and What Alice Found There (1871) meets a transsexualized tribute to Psycho (1960) with a preposterous 'poetic' tribute to the famous shower scene in Hitchcock's film (not to mention a Hitchcockian appearance by director Cecil Howard himself), Neon Nights is a wickedly wanton work of the quasi-psychoanalytic sort about a melancholy blonde teenage nymphet with a rather serious, albeit mostly subconscious, Electra complex. The first cinematic collaboration between Howard and his seemingly equally talented screenwriter/associate producer Anne Wolff aka Anne Randall (who would go on to pen some of Howard's greatest works, including Foxtrot (1982), Spitfire (1982), Snake Eyes (1982), The Last X-Rated Movie (1990), etc.), Neon Nights is a naughty nymphomaniac nightmare that proves that, indeed, telekinesis can be titillating and that at least one pornographer was able to utilize mirrors and doppelgangers/shadows in a manner not that unlike Herr Fassbinder.

A swarthy middle-aged Semite named Robert (Jamie Gillis) is giving his single mother girlfriend (Linda Vale) a 'shocker' (i.e. 'two in the pink and one in the stink') and the lecherous old lady cannot help but moan with overwhelming pleasure, which catches the sensual attention of the woman's petite yet busty blonde teen dream daughter named Sandy (Lysa Thatcher). While mother eventually has an entire hand shoved up her naughty bits by Robert, Sandy begins to pleasure herself by putting red lipstick on her nipples and eventually shoving a small comb in her virginal meat curtain. When Sandy goes to the bathroom to take a bath the next morning, kiddy defiler Robert barges in naked and begins seducing the young lady, stating "spread them for me, hurry!" and "show me how you wash your pussy." When Robert and Sandy begin to make sweet statutory rape, mother walks in on them, thus putting the teen in a precarious predicament. Apparently, Robert previously carried on an affair with Sandy's identical twin sister Denise, but her whore mother clearly cares more about cock than being a mother. When Sandy attempts to call her friend Bonnie (Kandi Barbour) for advice, she is met with apathy, as her friend is too busy boning her much older brother-in-law/tennis instructor Lyle (Ashley Moore). Bonnie is a rich bitch with an extremely low IQ who was told by her psychoanalyst that her innate clumsiness is a result of having "too much unresolved sexual energy," so she gets Lyle—a preppy dork who is supposed to drive his grandmother somewhere but decides otherwise after being seduced by his brother's wife (he literally states, "Fuck my grandmother...I'd rather fuck you.")—to service her with coitus so as to rid the little lady of her feeble motor skills. Following the lead of her estranged twin sister, Sandy decides to head to New York City. After missing the bus after a perverted magician named Harlan (Jake Teague) begins sweet talking her by the roadside, Sandy reluctantly decides to hitch a ride with said perverted magician. Staying in a sleazy motel room with Harlan and his equally sensual female assistant Sweet Marie (Jody Maxwell), Sandy is magically seduced by her new carny friends via clothes-undressing telekinesis and lecherous levitation from the wanton wizard.

NEON NIGHTS

In a tasteful tribute to Psycho, the viewer is introduced to the characters of witch-like bitch Rhonda (Veronica Heart) and jock-like philistine dick Snow (Eric Edwards). While Rhonda is a scheming wench with a voracious sexual appetite, Snow is a 'kept man' and man-whore (Rhonda calls him her own "private fucking machine") who is not good at much aside from blowing babes and bucks. Rhonda is Sandy's sister Denise's boss and when the teen finally arrives in NYC, the former takes the latter under her wing. Unbeknownst to Sandy, Rhonda and her bad beau Snow are involved in shady business practices that include white sexual slavery and drug-peddling, not to mention the fact they work for a mysterious fellow known simply as 'Mr. Prince' who lives in a quaint cabin-mansion in the woods with his artist girlfriend/muse Lilah (Arcadia Lake), an amorous lady who gets off to painting crude portraits of gigantic neon cocks. In what is easily the most enthralling segment of Neon Nights that visually falls in somewhere between the hermetic surrealism of Kenneth Anger and Federico Fellini, Sandy is initiated in an ominous orgy ceremony where she learns some unsettling things about her supposed sister, estranged father (Roy Stuart), and herself in what is probably the greatest plot twist(s) in blue movie history.

A deliciously dark orgasmic celluloid odyssey of the Carroll-esque sort that is equally charming and corrupting but always succulently stylized, Neon Nights is ultimately arguably the greatest film of the late 'porn chic' era and sad evidence that pornography probably would have taken a more aesthetically and thematically ambitious path had it not been for the advent of videotapes. Shot on luscious 35mm film with a use of mirrors and simplistic yet exceedingly effective special effects quite comparable to the works of Jean Cocteau, Neon Nights could be mistaken for an Alain Robbe-Grillet film upon a superficial glance were it not for all the hardcore pornography. Somewhat oddly, auteur Cecil Howard made no lie of the fact he was mostly into making porn flicks for the money, once stating, "If you went on a percentage deal, you'd strive hard to have a good film because the better the film, the more money you'd make," but then again, he also once confessed, "I've always felt that there is a double audience. People that go to see an intelligent movie will sometimes laugh at what they think they'll see in an adult movie. I liked to surprise them..." with Neon Nights certainly being a work that was specially tailored for more sophisticated audiences. And, indeed, Neon Nights is quite the suavely sleazy celluloid surprise that manages to seduce the viewer in a mischievous manner not unlike how the various curious characters of the film that seduce protagonist Sandy. Indeed, a rare example of XXX-rated cine-magic that deserves being described as a 'classic' and not simply within the garbage-filled ghetto that is pornography, Neon Nights most certainly needs to be reexamined by the sort of cinephile that does not mind having their mind in the gutter every once and a while. As a work of pornography, Neon Nights reminds the viewer that there was actually a time not all that long ago when female porn stars did not look like unhinged plastic drag queens and thus the film will probably be of no interest to contemporary fanboy porn addicts who wallow in silicone pseudo-tits. Indeed, real artsy fartsy porn flicks with chicks with real tits are hard to come by and you will find few better than Neon Nights, a work that makes for the perfect double feature with Jonas Middleton's arthouse horror blue movie Through the Looking Glass (1976).

-Ty E

DEATH BELL
DEATH BELL

Chang (2008)

Death Bell is a newer Korean horror film depicting schoolhouse violence in a similar vein to the Eko Eko Azarak trilogy. The scenes are composed of incredible acting, stylish effects, and a sleek and very clean production value. In other words, your standard Korean film. Of any country's ability to hone their cinema into a specified technical category, the one that never bends the rules is Korea. Sometimes this is a good thing, other times, not so much. Death Bell starts off just as any other Asian film made in 2008; really confusing with a scrambled plot. These Asian films love to start off in media res just to accentuate how cool and flashy their cinema is. I couldn't be more annoyed. As Death Bell boils into a solid film, we are treated to several small contingencies. These also double as irritating tortures. For one, a really out-of-place disco club scene in which all the Asians dance together waving their fingers around in some post-Saturday Night Fever masquerade. What really drives this scene over the edge is that fact that all the Asians look alike. As soon as Death Bell (Go-sa) becomes conscious of how convoluted the plot is and how nothing is clicking in the viewer's brain, it throws the obstacle into the film. While students find themselves in what is first believed to be a terrorist attack from a student, they find their student body is threatened when random (or are they?) students are put in death traps and the only resolve is to answer a test problem. This special test will decide the fate of who lives and who dies. All is fine in cinema land until the film turns into a murder mystery. A throbbing orchestral score preluded with a beautiful opera piece is what drives the powerful requiems of understanding. The death scenes have the same quirks that populate the Saw series. This is also why the Saw series is so looked up to and this is the same reason why most people will really like Death Bell. When I was 3/4th's into the film, I found myself bored of the chases and the time limits. I don't like to be rushed during a film but eventually it all smoothed out into a fine outing of recent suspense/horror. Death Bell is a rare occurrence; a film that starts off good, goes sour, and then allows its buoyancy to lift it back up to the surface. If not for the creative deaths and well-acted characters, you should at least watch it for the powerful and moving ending that dictates a strict philosophy on revenge. You may get even, but when does the suffering really end? Death Bell gets my recommendation for averaging into a watchable and entertaining film.

-mAQ

UP FROM THE DEPTHS

Charles B. Griffith (1979)

Up from the Depths is an eccentric effort of z-grade, low-brow killer shark entertainment. Fresh off the hot block of Jaws copycats comes a film generally loathed by all but I did it! I struggled to look past the budgeted flaws and the amateur everything to find something charming and glorious; a sense of humor and moral direction. Armed with a lethal cast of Television actors and ridiculous set pieces, characters, and re-dubbed lines of dialogue, Up from the Depths guarantees a regretful, but flourishing cinematic experience with shaky-cam death sequences underwater. The worst idea ever when hunting sharks with spears. In the very opening scene of the film, a scene of a scientist and his beautiful assistant are conversing with lines so stilted that you cover your face with your palm. From there, a dramatic zoom-out lands framed on two hula dancers' derrières. The synchronized shaking rhythm of said behind casually frames the cast credits starting with the name Sam Bottoms. How dreadfully appropriate. In a blink of an eye, we are introduced to a tourist island getaways inhabitants and increasingly idiosyncratic personalities, not limited to a delirious Japanese man with fits of samurai flashbacks, an alcoholic con-pirate, a heavily side-burned heart throb, and the bumbling goofy owner of said hotel that gives us such memorable lines as "There's no sharks in the Hawaiian archipelago!" Of all the wacky situations, of all the violence, my favorite aspect of the film is the sardonic vantage of the chaotic riot sequences that frequent almost all of the killer-shark-terrorizes-beach genre, as small of a genre as it may be. Up from the Depths has been called a shameless Jaws ripoff many times but the pride behind making this film goes a lot farther than most spirited film makers have shown. A couple I've admired over the due course of the film explode, along with the others, in a fit of panic as the ancient "shark" has devoured more than enough of the temporary residents. As the constantly shunned wife screams, the husband replies "Fish can't walk!". She snaps back "Everybody is running!". He smiles while shaking her silly and gleefully responds "Fish can't run either!" They both throw back a hearty laugh and embrace each other as panic spreads like wild fire. This really throws an outlook on films starting with Jaws that frequent the formulaic scene of a killer confined in the water while people scream at the top of their lungs running in circles. An animal behind bars is no more a threat than a beastie in the ocean. Common sense is definitely prescribed in Up from the Depths. One scene in particular is worth a special mention. A group of kids repeats an activity of diving off a rocky mountain. Seen it before, threat level alleviated for now. Upon diving under the blue sparkling water (the grainy film stock detracts from this), a screeching violin begins reverberating, grating your ear canals. In the murky water, in the back ground, you can see a faint enormous creatures snout and let me tell you, this scene is practically horrifying in a sense. It sticks with me while pondering the many highlight scenes in this film. I can't stress the importance of this film enough, mainly concerning the idea that copycat films can beat a heart of their own.

UP FROM THE DEPTHS

Up from the Depths is a film about returning ancestral sea life coming back to haunt us, us who've dominated their waters with oil rigs, nets, trash, and other man made befuddlement. The line "They were here first" rings shallowly in my cerebrum. Griffith is right. Creatures were here first and in no way are we to decide what lives and what dies. Before too much sympathy can come to that of the sea monster, it's promptly blown up in the name of science. In such a barbaric nod to science, the scientist screams before his last breath not to be thrown back in the water with "it". The heartless pirate decides to blow the shark up with an explosive charge. In regards to science, Up from the Depths is an important film that debuts a concept of films having heart over the blind predecessor. It's also nice to like something that appears to be hazardous to everyone's health. Like smoking before smoking was cool.

-mAQ

PARASITE

Charles Band* (1982)

In the future, nuclear war will have devastated everything. A mad scientist will have created a parasite only to be infected by it, and he will escape into rural neo-America in order to escape from a black-suited lightsaber-penned Lamborghini Countach chauffeur belonging to a group called the Merchants. All this might sound like a Christopher Lambert movie but we're not that lucky. Parasite is regarded as the first futuristic monster movie in 3D!. And also Demi Moore's first big screen appearance as the insipid country gal who lacks intelligence. Charles Band of Full Moon fame wrote and directed this "monster" film that doesn't really concern monsters. The parasites in question are mainly implied the length of the running time until some punks unleash it. A side symptom of the parasite involves shooting millions of spores out infecting everyone, but this is never shown and used merely as an anxiety tactic. I would have loved to catch this film in its glorious 3D version. There's torrents available of the actual 3D VHS rip, but I lack LCD shutter glasses in order to perfect the 3D quality lest I want to watch a film that looks the picture below. Paul Gludini looks like a sweaty and disgusting doppelganger of Jeff Goldblum by the end of the film. Parasite is just a dud of a monster film. This "futuristic" aspect is alluded to and Charles Band hadn't delved into fleshing out a dystopian landscape until three years later when he created the Trancers series featuring Jack Deth. The only enjoyable faceted design is the creative carnage. A parasite explodes out of an elderly woman's face and leaves a Street Trash mess with the remnants of a jaw chewed through by a protruding parasite. Parasite is an awful, awful film. With Halloween approaching, watching Parasite only reminded me how many horrible creature feature films populate the shelves of stores. This film isn't worth Demi Moore's overhyped appearance and it isn't even worth it to see the creature violence. The only unequaled up shot was a very Cronenberg inspired scene of a disgusting parasite lying next to a woman's leg that looked like a sticky reverse cow tongue. Also, Parasites don't kill their host. That would be a Parasitoid, but that's Charles Band for you.

-mAQ

DOLLMAN vs. DEMONIC TOYS
DOLLMAN vs. DEMONIC TOYS

Charles Band* (1993)

After glimpsing but a taste of the Sci-Fi Channel's Puppet Master vs. Demonic Toys, I must say that I have so much more respect for older Full Moon Pictures. Seeing as how I took their slowly deteriorating style for granted, I never realized how bad it could actually be. I just wanted my old favorites back and this is a much wanted breath of air, although entire stale and recycled.

Like most mash-ups, this is made almost entirely of stock footage. The plot has been watered down a bit and Brick Bardo's as corny as ever. Take Bad Channels, Demonic Toys, and Dollman. Mix them together in a blender and what you are given is Dollman vs. Demonic Toys. The product is messy, unhealthy, and full of MSG. The only new elements are several misplaced scenes of battling and several new demonic toys - one being a memorable Soldier figure that predates Small Soldiers by 5 years. Chip Hazard's early incarnation was a bit more violent, eh? The heroine from the previous film returns to enlist the help of Dollman after the rest of her staff at Police HQ thinks she is insane. She's almost positive that the evil demonic toys are going to return and with the help of a hairy dwarf, she's right. The rest of the film really just revolves around lame subplots and embarrassing set pieces to make the average appliance look mammoth next to Tim Thomerson. To call this a B-grade film would be a bit of a compliment, but at least it doesn't stoop as low as to butcher the entire lore of the Toulon-related universe. Dollman vs. Demonic Toys is a horrific film by standards and the standards are deep. If you take a step back and reapply all judgments to the film, your cynicism might fade just a bit. Much like Puppet Master: The Legacy, all the "good" footage was edited in so what you get is a Full Moon greatest hits compilation. You at least have to be thankful for the lack of a slide show commentary. It's nice to see the Demonic Toys back for another round, even more so that a proper Demonic Toys sequel was announced not too long ago. Lets hope the future is bright!

-mAQ

DAINGEROUS WORRY DOLLS

Charles Band* (2008)

I should have known from the title that this film wouldn't make any sense. Self-proclaimed tiny terrors have maybe a single minute collected screen time. Dangerous Worry Dolls is every bit a tribute and addition to horror as Incredibly Risky Situation 2: This Time It's Personal! Seeing as how this title randomly stemmed from the root of my mind and should be taken as a jest, the same should be said for Dangerous Worry Dolls. Calling this film out-of-touch would be a gracious compliment towards Charles Band's directing approach. Dangerous Worry Dolls begins with a quick edited collage of mulatto women scrapping a drug dispute. From then, the film just progressively gets worst. The prison aspect slightly inflates into a sweltering side story of a transsexual sex tape rape ring bewildered by a soon-to-be counter-raped by possessed angry woman with a strap-on. So the basic cover of this film is the obnoxious PG feminist W.I.P. (Women in Prison) flick of a despicable nature, only differing due to a pitied love interest. Full Moon used to be a brand you can trust. Over the years, this once respectable low budget horror company has slowly begun to deteriorate. The emblazoned logo was a solid guarantee for moderate acting, moderate production, but at the same time, a generically enjoyable horror film. Charles Band is a simple man of blind faith. A fossil without a fresh vision or idea. The only out-source for creativity is creating new sculptures and art prints for successful films he created decades ago. Although Troma uses Toxie as a mascot, to this day Troma still produces quality films. In my personal opinion, I vote that Charles Band steps down as acting director and steps aside for Silvia St. Croix, who directed the hilarious sequel to The Gingerdead Man. The legacy of Full Moon is nearly all but diminished thanks to films like Dead Man's Hand and Puppet Master vs. Demonic Toys. For a better Full Moon title, check out the aptly titled Prison starring a young Viggo Mortensen. Dangerous Worry Dolls is absolutely B-grade filth. There's no meaning to the occurrences and Band could care less. Don't bother.

-mAQ

SILENT NIGHT, DEADLY NIGHT
SILENT NIGHT, DEADLY NIGHT

Charles E. Sellier Jr. (1984)

Just in time for the holidays. I decided to re-watch the controversial Christmas carnage that was delivered in Silent Night, Deadly Night. In the year 1984, this film was released around Christmas time and dismissed as a holiday film. Upon further inspection, this was a slasher film received as psychological warfare against their children. The PTA and a mob of angry mothers took to the streets to have this film removed from theaters. Of course, these PMS-ing hypocrites had the film pulled only a short time later. The same controversy occurred when illiterate people took their children to Child's Play without researching the film. A stab at the enraged mothers was plastered on an old Child's Play comic with a stamp that said something along the lines of "Mothers Against Killer Dolls". The plot takes an inventive turn and creates a sympathetic killer. A child is told by his crazy grandfather that Santa is a punishing bastard and ruins the child's malleable mind by poisoning his happiness with venom. Later that night, his parents stop to help a stranded Santa only to be murdered/sexually assaulted. Having witnessed this and becoming an orphan, young Billy grows up under the stern nose of a sadistic nun. Upon reaching adulthood, he reaches within and snaps, causing his primordial aggression gene to swell up revealing the darkness within, thus executing many horny teenagers while growling "Naughty!". Silent Night, Deadly Night is a certain type of slasher that got too much credit for its controversy. Having an abundant amount of breast shots, the average male will feel at home with this film, but the horribly predictable script allows this film to reek of an unknown waste. I called the "two ball, corner pocket" line long before the sex scene was over. Silent Night, Deadly Night was a project that didn't take too much from the thought process to create. Hell, I'm sure there are many better Yuletide terror films. For example, Bill Goldberg's Santa's Slay which was a low-budget horror film with a plot of fantasy and a single scene in which Fran Drescher's hair bursts aflame. The high point of Silent Night, Deadly Night is the versatile kills. One woman, in an ode to The Texas Chainsaw Massacre, is hung on a pair of antlers, leaving her hanging in a grotesque fashion over a mantle piece. Adult Billy shows incredible strength and prowess as he hangs potential rapists with Christmas lights. His pent up rage allows for his power to surge through his arms, allowing him to systematically murder without remorse and creating an intimidating atmosphere as he lifts a full grown man with a single arm. Billy is a serial killer one would prefer not to challenge. While Silent Night, Deadly Night had the balls to tackle a controversial subject of a child icon turning into a murderer; the same could be said for the fictional Mr. Stay Puft man in Ghostbusters. Silent Night, Deadly Night isn't the best slasher film but deserves a fraction of the devoted cult following it has garnered, but the franchise speaks for the film itself. The idea is tired, played out, and wore to the bone. For the holidays, I cannot find a better horror film to recommend, but then again, I haven't dabbled much in the holiday horror genre. Silent Night, Deadly Night is an above-average horror outing, perfect for fans of cheese and gratuitous tit shots.

-mAQ

THE NIGHT OF THE HUNTER
THE NIGHT OF THE HUNTER

Charles Laughton (1955)

The Night of the Hunter (1955) is often categorized as a film noir, but that is simply unfair. The film misses and breaks too many conventions to be just lumped into the unofficial film movement of “film noir.” Instead of a femme fatale, The Night of the Hunter features a woman murdering and hate mongering a false prophet preacher who cons a recent widow into marrying him to get to the money her former husband stole (and was hung for). The preacher makes it clear he hates women and sex when he lashes out at his new wife on their honeymoon, due to her suggestive pose. This preacher is the sort of evil that even passes the heretic and effeminate hog evangelical John Hagee.

The “hero” of The Night of the Hunter is a young boy named John who manages to trick the blasphemous preacher into not getting the money he so greatly desires. The boy takes his younger sister Pearl on a beautiful ride down an enchanted river full of nature's various children. These almost spiritual scenes act as a relaxing escape from the overall dark nature of the film. While going across the river, John and his sister encounter fellow children starving due to their depression era misfortunes.

John and his sister are eventually taken in by Rachel Cooper, who runs a home for orphaned children. Cooper is played by no other than an elderly Lillian Gish, one of the greatest and most expressive of American silent screen actresses. I never thought I would see the day that Gish would point a shotgun at a preacher, and for that alone The Night of the Hunter is worth viewing. Ms. Cooper has a special place in her heart for children as they “abide.” Ms. Cooper also perfectly contrasts the preacher in an audacious manner.

The preacher has “LOVE” tattooed on his right hand and “HATE” on his left hand. These two emotional extremes act as the perfect theme for the overall film. The Night of the Hunter is a film truly about good vs. evil. The children in the film represent a pure clean soul and the preacher having a completely tainted (and ruined) soul. The preacher is the worst kind of evil as he is a false prophet as his “fruits” make clear. He has no problem acknowledging that sometimes “the Devil wins.”

The Night of the Hunter features one of the most powerful and ironically beautiful scenes committed to celluloid. The young mother of the children is found at the bottom of the river with her neck slit sitting upright in her car. The shot is illuminating and glowing as the beautiful dead young woman's hair waves through the water. Apparently, The Night of the Hunter director Charles Laughton was inspired by the films of the German expressionists. Laughton is able to combine the expression of the German masters with the mystical elements of nature. The director didn't just simply “borrow” techniques from films of the past.

Like Carnival of Souls, The Night of the Hunter is a film which was the start and the end of a director with much promise in the world of cinema. The Night of the Hunter is as perfect as a film of its kind can be. The film has a combination of children's songs, violent murder, superb performances, and a power that demands many viewings. I'm not much a religious person, but The Night of the Hunter has its own unique kind of sermon that stayed with me long after the film's conclusion.

-Ty E

WALKER
WALKER

Charles Martin Smith (2003)

If I had to make a list of movie genres I hated most, the Western genre would certainly make the top of the list. Second to the Kennedy family, the Irish second class white men of America have never plagued the country with a worse legacy than that of the Hollywood Western. Never has a genre convinced wannabe tough guys that they were tougher than the Western. John Wayne may have been a cowardly draft dodger, but he certainly did his part in making American males think going to war was the most courageous thing a Yank could do. Of course, there are some cool new Western subgenres out there like the Surrealist Western (El Topo) and the Acid Western (Dead Man), but there are also some new pathetic Cultural Marxist Western subgenres like the Hollywood-approved anti-European-American Revisionist Genre (Dances With Wolves, Little Big Man), degenerate cinema where the viewer is supposed to feel sorry for the poor noble savage. Brit Indie director Alex Cox certainly made the right kind of Western with his satiric Acid Western Walker, a film that shits on the "heroic" legacy of the American John Ford Western.

Walker is loosely based on the real-life American filibuster William Walker, an educated Renaissance man from Tennessee who had the luxury of being the president of the Republic of Nicaragua (1956-1957). Unfortunately for William Walker, his fellow white men from the British Empire felt him to be a menace and handed him over to some Injuns from Honduras who executed him. Alex Cox's Walker follows the political rise and fall of Walker, a man who has no problem getting tons of men killed for his idealism, an idealism that is never completely apparent. Knowing auteur Alex Cox was the man that brought us the American Masterpiece Repo Man, one can expect Walker to be one of the funniest (in bad taste, of course) character-driven Westerns ever made.

Walker is played by a young(er) Ed Harris, who was the perfect actor to play the lead. Ed Harris is generally known for playing very serious and stoic characters, but I have always felt Harris was a little overacting in his seriousness. Of course, in a Western satire Harris's sometimes silly stoicism works out to the film's comedic advantage. Whether leading his men to the slaughter via Sam Peckinpah-esque style battle brutality or attempting to sexually satisfy the hot Tamale of a spicy Señorita, Ed Harris delivers with silly stoic absurdity, a tough acting accomplishment indeed. I have not enjoyed Ed Harris in a role this much since his role as a mangle-eyed Mafia man in David Cronenberg's A History of Violence. It just goes to show, if you have the right director, an actor can be led into the path of his full potential.

The Clash lead front man Joe Strummer not only makes an appearance in Walker, but he also provided the wonderful atmospheric soundtrack to the film. If there is one thing that made Spaghetti Westerns better than their earlier

Hollywood counterparts, it was their intense reverb-fueled melodic soundtracks. Walker follows in the tradition of a Neo-Western with a more than suitable soundtrack. Walker is also further evidence that Alex Cox is probably the greatest "Punk Rock filmmaker" to ever live. Of course, Penelope Spheeris made a couple Punk Rock SINematic masterpieces (The Decline of Western Civilization, Suburbia) before spewing out Hollywood garbage, but Alex Cox's has never compromised his position as an Anarchist auteur.

By the end of Walker, it is more than apparent that Alex Cox has unloaded the message that the Good ol' United States of Gringos will never stay out of South America. Contemporary stock documentary footage of real-life dead South American bodies are displayed as evidence of William Walker's continuous killing legacy. Of course, a lot has changed since Walker was first released in 1987. America is now flooded with tons of illegal (and a handful of legal) "Hispanics" from South of the Border. Not only have they brought their bastardized form of the Spanish "no habla ingles" language, but they have also brought murdering gangs with them to boot. Maybe Alex Cox should think about doing a new acid Western set in present day America with a race war between shaved headed/tattooed covered Hispanics versus shaved headed/tattooed covered American Neo-Nazi skinheads. John Wayne could magically make an appearance (like he does in contemporary TV commercials) in the film in a dress.

-Ty E

KICK OR DIE
KICK OR DIE

Charles Norton (1987)

(This review will have spoilers in the 5th paragraph) Another A.I.P. (Action International Pictures) classic, Kick Or Die is whole-heartily an extreme Lifetime Action Original. Kevin Bernhardt plays Don Potter, a mountain man ex-"kickfighter" who after a horrifying accident involving the death and rape of his wife, escapes into nature in order to become one with his spiritual side. As soon as the same serial rapist begins striking again and more frequently, his longtime boxing pal recruits him to train the local girls to become self-defense masters. Part Dolemite and Part The Fighter, Kick Or Die is amazingly corny with a lot of heart for what it is. There's no doubt that it is bad production value, but it so over-the-top enjoyable. The female that tears between the two men who will do nothing to stop the rapes moonlights as an aspiring singer. Her "singing" is the most atrocious audio pitch I have ever heard. Kevin Bernhardt might be the most lame and un-stylistic fighter I have ever seen. When the pseudo-Goblin music begins to thump, I almost expect a decent fight scene but am instead treated with a painfully dull montage of misplaced kicks that are blocked and his "rebel" attitude. His social interactions with society are quite often interrupted by depictions of our "rape culture." If only Don Potter had viewed Irreversible, suicide might then be an option. The final showdown is recreated with a classic video game vibe to it. He transverses from obstacle to obstacle in a "Next Level" format which leads to security guards, then motorcycle goons. Fighting in a moving jeep going at a max speed of 10 miles per hour is hardly rousing, and the constant training montages of women embracing power over men is tedious and an eye-roller. Tim Wallace plays the blond hair, blue eyed Aryan sidekick who turns out to be the rapist. His M.O. is to style up in Blackface with a scraggly beard - more reminiscent to a vagabond Negro. In the showdown at the end of the film, one of his Negro "employees" walks in. The Aryan grabs his gun and after the Black man has time to stutter "Howdy Boss," he's lying dead in the dining room. Kick Or Die is hokey but I found this classic entry in the once-feeble made-for-TV martial arts genre very enjoyable. I'd recommend viewing it but heed the UK VHS edition. It cut out around a minute of "violent sexual situations" This mainly being women with their shirts ripped off and in the process of being victimized. We all know if you cut out T & A, you might as well have never made the movie.

-mAQ

RED SPIRIT LAKE

Charles Pinion (1993)

As a semi-fan of so-called neofolk music, I was naturally quite intrigued to learn that Annabel Lee—the violinist of her husband's group Blood Axis who has translated works by Italian philosopher and self-described "super fascist" Julius Evola, as well as Teutonic anthropologist and psychedelic drug advocate Christian Rättsch—was originally an aspiring actress of sorts who starred in a couple of cinematic works directed by filmmakers associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement. Indeed, in Richard Kern's short The Bitches (1992), Lee not only shows off her ass, titties, and pussy, but allows a girl to perform cunnilingus on her and even fucks some longhaired loser degenerate in the ass with a strap-on dildo in a rather frenzied fashion while she has an expression of sadistic glee on her face. Somewhat ironically, especially considering the later accusations of Nazism made against her and especially her husband/collaborator Michael Moynihan and their band by Zionist oriented 'anti-hate' hate groups like the ludicrously named Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), Lee also played the eponymous role in Kern's short Nazi (1991) where she sports a Nazi officer's hat and performs a 'Sieg Heil' salute whilst topless and standing in front of an American flag. Additionally, Lee (who was apparently born Annabel McMullin, but has also gone by the name Annabel Davies) also dropped her clothes for Tessa Hughes-Freeland's no-budget Super-8 Georges Bataille adaptation Dirty (1993). Incidentally, both Kern and Hughes-Freeland (as well as fellow Cinema of Transgression filmmakers Tommy Turner and Kembra Pfahler) would appear alongside Lee in acting roles in the strangely atmospheric shot-on-VHS 'Pulp Video' art-trash-horror piece Red Spirit Lake (1993) directed by Charles Pinion (We Await, American Mummy aka Aztec Blood), who incidentally played the exceedingly emasculated fellow that got simultaneously mouth and ass-fucked by the titular chicks with strap-on dildos in Kern's The Bitches. In fact, as a feature film that not only stars her in the lead role (as well as another smaller role) but also co-penned, co-produced, and co-edited under the pseudonym 'Ellen Smithy,' the film is Lee's closest thing to an 'auteur piece,' though the aesthetic integrity is largely the result of director Pinion, who seems to have no qualms about artistically collaborating with a woman that violently reamed him in the rectum like a prison bitch. Indeed, Pinion even credits Lee for the film's supposedly misogynistic content, or as he stated in an interview featured in the book Cinema Contra Cinema (1998) by Jack Sargeant, "We wrote the screenplay tag-team style. I'd write for a while, then I'd say, 'I'm getting to this sex scene...' and would let Ellen [aka Annabel Lee] have a go at it. I have to say that many of the really depraved elements of RED SPIRIT LAKE were initially generated by her. For what that's worth. It's my shield against being labeled misogynistic." Notably, as Pinion once stated to Jack Sargeant in an interview, deranged British tranny musician Genesis P-Orridge once wrote him a letter reading, "I loved RED SPIRIT LAKE, I gave it to a friend who is into this kind of pulp video." Somewhat unfortunately, Cinema of Transgression anti-messiah Nick Zedd is less impressed with Pinion's oeuvre, as the They Eat Scum director apparently started regarded his first feature, "I really hated TWISTED ISSUES." Personally, I think that Zedd might be a tad bit jealous that Pinion is arguably beating him at his own psychotronic cinema game, as Red Spirit Lake is probably more tastelessly charming and unwaveringly enthralling than about 95% of the films associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement, not to mention the fact it is more sexually absurd and morally bankrupt than something like War Is Menstrual Envy (1992).

RED SPIRIT LAKE

Like fellow director Richard Baylor (You've Made Your Bed... Now Die In It!, Cirsium Delectus), Pinion is a sort of post-Cinema of Transgression auteur who carried on the cinematically transgressive tradition of Kern and Zedd, but opted to utilize video as opposed to Super-8 film for largely economic reasons, thereupon giving his 'films' an extra schlocky feel that seems obscenely outmoded nowadays, though that is certainly one of the charms of his somewhat singular oeuvre. As far as I am concerned, Red Spirit Lake is the only shot-on-video horror feature that I can think of that has even the vaguest artistic merit, as a work that seems like the result of the post-punk heterosexual progeny of Jack Smith and John Waters attempting to do for video what H.P. Lovecraft did for horror literature. I originally saw the film about half a decade ago, but after recently coming to the revelation that it starred Neofolk figure Annabel Lee, who is no stranger to all sorts of filmmaking as she apparently appeared in Jonas Mekas' experimental doc He Stands in a Desert Counting the Seconds of His Life (1969-1986) when she was only 3-years-old (it should be noted that Lee's mother is video artist Molly Davies) and even once worked as a production assistant on Bob Rafelson's Sir Richard Francis Burton epic Mountains of the Moon (1990), I could not help reassessing the flick, which is an insanely idiosyncratic piece of quasi-metaphysical high-kitsch where the Blood Axis violinist bares all like a proto-Suicide Girl, albeit she seems slightly less plastic and certainly more debauched in her essence. Somewhat foreshadowing Lee's interest in esoterica, the occult, so-called 'Radical Traditionalism', and völkisch matters via its playfully paganistic tone and themes of dark genetic inheritance and hedonistic pre-Christian spirituality, the film tells the quite spasmodic, surreal, supernatural, and even sometimes sci-fi genre-raping story of a young chick that is descended from a long line of wanton witches who inherits a rural New England estate after her spinster aunt is maliciously murdered by a queen-ish Mestizo industrialist and his motley crew of tit-twisting rapist thugs and must defend herself against the gang who wants to take away her rightfully inherited ancestral home. Of course, Red Spirit Lake is far from a modernist 'Blut und Boden' fantasy flick in the spirit of the National Socialist classic Ewiger Wald (1936) co-directed by Hanns Springer and Rolf von Sonjevski-Jamrowski, as it is a conspicuously cynical flick of the nauseatingly nihilistic sort that follows in the spirit of Kern's Fingered (1986), albeit with the somewhat strange added bonus of mystical elements that celebrates New England's 'witchy' past (most of the film was shot at Lee's mother Molly Davies' Vermont home).

Apparently shot over the course of two long weekends on a completely guessed budget of $2000 (as the director stated in an interview, "...I'm really pulling that figure out of a hat. It doesn't really cost anything to shoot on video. You need to feed your cast and crew. That's essential.") while Pinion was attempting to make his ultimately aborted 35mm feature Killbillies, Red Spirit Lake is like the ultimate party flick for born again nihilists, trash cinephiles, and sleazy eccentric pornographers. Directed by an auteur that much prefers the cinematic works of Chantal Akerman, Andrei Tarkovsky, and Roman Polanski to the lowbrow horror trash that he actually produces, Pinion's almost perniciously playful piece of 'Pulp Video' (which is the P-Orridge inspired name Pinion gave his now-extinct primitive style of video-based filmmaking) phantasmagoria is like SOV (aka shot-on-video) equivalent to Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980), albeit where the madness, paranoia, sadism, and nostalgia for an ultra-violent American past is fully and unwaveringly embraced in a fashion that makes The August Underground creators seem like a group of pedantic and autistic fanboys who need to lay off the soulless torture porn swill and who are in desperate need of some nice, warm, wet pussy. Featuring wickedly wanton witches, tin man-esque space aliens, psychopathic nipple-twisting sex criminals, pretentious mystical-minded fags with bad bleach blond dye jobs, Christian peeping tom caretakers, self-loathing Hispanic crime bosses, and ass-raping fag hag ghosts with vulgar southern accents, among various other highly memorable curious characters that only exist in the wonderfully retrograde realm of Red Spirit Lake, Pinion's little film is a big reminder about how fun true trash cinema can be when directed with pure and unadulterated passion.

At the beginning of Red Spirit Lake, a semi-sexy spinster named Abigail Atavey has her titties violently twisted by Richard Kern at the command of Hispanic Hugh Hefner wannabe Diego Sardonia (German actor J.J. Straub), who is a sleazy and somewhat effete wealthy industrialist that demands that the woman sign over her titular family estate. Although the house is apparently "heavily mortgaged" and Sardonia will probably have her killed if she does not give it to him, Abigail self-righteously declares, "I'm not signing it and you're not getting Red Spirit Lake." Sardonia wants the old homestead because he wants to obtain the arcane magic powers it apparently contains. When Abigail begins unleashing a goofy magical spell and attempts to escape by grabbing the testicles of one of Sardonia's goons, she is immediately killed in a somewhat anti-climatic manner with a single stab to the abdomen by nipple-annihilator Kern. After Abigail's death, her young blonde niece Marilyn (Annabel Lee under the pseudonym

RED SPIRIT LAKE

'Amanda Collins') inherits Red Spirit Lake and soon finds herself being routinely stalked and hounded by Sardonia and his band of glaringly shady misfit sadists. Luckily, Marilyn's great-great-grandmother (also portrayed by Lee, who sports a cheap black wig that looks like it was purchased at a Halloween store), who was brutally murdered by a couple racist rednecks with some of her witch friends (Tabby Rasmussen, Tessa Hughes-Freeland, Jennifer Bailey, Kembra Pfahler), will come back from the dead as a ghost and protect her with magical powers. As Marilyn tells her racially ambiguous fuckbuddy Frank (Payton Farley) via telephone upon arriving at her newly inherited home, "I haven't been here since I was a kid. I'm the last living heir, so I got everything. Red Spirit Lake has a crazy history. My great-great-grandmother was born here [and] she died here. The town called her Mad Mistress Atavey. They thought she was a witch. She planted the big old maple tree in the back yard." Of course, the maple tree is sacred and is sort of like the Red Spirit lake equivalent to Donar's Oak, albeit seems to mainly attract the lily-licking spirits of lesbo witches.

Aside from her ancient ancestor 'Mad Mistress Atavey,' Marilyn receives ostensible protection from a crazed Christian 'caretaker' named Mathias (director Charles Pinion) and his slowwitted deaf-mute brother Thomas, who has a Manson-esque "X" carved into his forehead. When Marilyn first sees Thomas, she is so shocked that she immediately collapses and suffers a nightmare where a longhaired degenerate with black eyeliner (Cinema of Transgression auteur Tommy Turner, who directed Simonland (1984) and co-directed Where Evil Dwells (1985)) attempts to rape her with his monstrous tusk-like cock. When Sardonia sends his fairly creepy baldheaded underling Wesley (Rick Hall of schlocky sci-fi trash like Richard W. Haines' Head Games (1996) and Stephen J. Hadden's Bio-Dead (2009)) to attempt to coerce Marilyn into selling the house, caretaker Mathias abruptly shows up with a shotgun and rather rudely forces him off the property. After telling Marilyn that her aunt Abigail was murdered, Mathias explains, "We gotta talk about the angels. Angels is what brought me and Thomas to Red Spirit Lake. Angels lock the demons away and left us with the key." The Angels Mathias speaks of are actually humanoid extraterrestrials with glittery silver-toned skin that abducted and experimented on him and his brother. As Mathias also explains to Marilyn, "There's a war in heaven, Miss Marilyn. Me and Thomas are soldiers of Jehovah waiting for the Second Coming." Unfortunately for Marilyn, Mathias will later develop the delusion that she is some sort of servant of Satan.

When Marilyn plays a vintage violin that used to belong to her great-great-grandmother that creates an ominous discordant sound and subsequently performs a magical ritual of sorts, the protagonist hallucinates and recalls the memory of how her ancient ancestor and her dyke tarot-reading witch friends were brutally raped and murdered by a couple of puritanical rednecks. Needless to say, it does not take long for unclad pagan witch phantoms to begin roaming around the estate to protect Marilyn and the magical maple tree against Sardonia and other undesirable elements. Meanwhile, Mathias plays peeping tom and masturbates outside while watching Marilyn exercising in her underwear while absurdly proclaiming, "Demons are here. Demons possess me." After Mathias' brother Tommy is killed in a battle with one of Kern's comrades, Sardonia decides to pay a personal visit to Marilyn where he gives her a broken pentacle medallion that he stole from her dead aunt Abigail and complains regarding his lowly Hispanic background, "My mother was a domestic down the street." The pentacle is a family heirloom that was originally owned by Marilyn's great-great-grandmother and Sardonia seems to make a mistake by giving it back to the protagonist. When Marilyn complains that the pentacle is broken, Sardonia remarks, "Yes, my apologies. I had to tear it off Abigail's throat. She was dying," violently mandhandles her, and proceeds to say goofy things like, "Marilyn, Marilyn...How magnificent it must feel to be the last living Atavey." After Marilyn accuses him of killing her aunt, Sardonia replies, "Not at first. I wanted her to teach me. I wanted her to teach me the secrets...the Atavey secrets...the soft feminine secrets," drugs her by stabbing her with a needle containing some dubious fluid, carries her up to her room while she is unconscious, declares, "I still speak a language that you will understand," and then proceeds to rape her from behind on her own bed. Luckily, the spirit of Mad Mistress Atavey soon appears and forces Sardonia to cut off his own cock and balls, but not before biting his tongue off. While the ghost of her ancient ancestor uses magic to get Sardonia to self-castrate himself, Marilyn gently masturbates by rubbing her clit and tits, thus reflecting the protagonist's newfound spiritually sadomasochistic sexual tendencies.

Somewhat to her chagrin, Marilyn's friends Shirley Tejas (Holly Adams of Hughes-Freeland's Nymphomania (1994)) and Bob (Bob Log) and fuckbuddy Frank eventually show up at the house and eventually find themselves to be the prey of both Sardonia's surviving goons and Mad Mistress Atavey's ghostly gal pals. While Marilyn has fun fucking swarthy wimp Frank, she is somewhat less amused with fag hag Shirley's whorish behavior and incessant bitching, which is all the more grating as a result of her southern twang. Of course, since he is a homo, Bob is not too happy when a sensual succubus (Julie Marlowe) begins giving him a supernatural blowjob while he is minding his own business by relaxing in a sauna, thus inspiring him to complain, "What do you think you're doing? You're disturbing my subtle energy fields!" When the succubus forces him to perform cunnilingus on her by aggressively sitting on his face and wrapping her legs around his head, Bob shouts, "Be gone, Jezebel!" in a particularly prissy fashion. Meanwhile, Richard Kern corners Shirley and teases her nipples and fucks her from behind, which she rather enjoys, at least until he puts a cigarette out on one of her tits. Naturally, when Shirley rudely states to Kern, "Well, I've been fucked better by a shower massager...and by better looking dicks," he decides to kill her by slaughtering her like a pig with his knife. When Kern catches up with Marilyn, he gives her a brutal double titty-twister and asks her regarding her exceedingly effeminate beau Frank, “You really let that geek bone you?” In fact, not only does Kern insult Frank, but he also kills him by putting a bullet in his brain. Meanwhile, two scantily dressed ghost nymphs coerce bald-headed wuss Wesley into following them into the snowy countryside where he ultimately freezes to death after stripping off all his clothes upon suffering the delusion that he is about to get in a threesome with two busty witch bitches. As for Kern, he gets fist-fucked in the rectum by the reanimated corpse of annoyingly extroverted Southern belle Shirley, who says to him before snuffing him out, “You weren’t such a bad fuck back there...Just a little rude. The truth is I think you’re one sexy piece of man meat. You’re so big and strong.” Needless to say, Kern does not survive the supernatural assault on his anus. As for the ending of the film, Marilyn suffers a miserable fate at the hands of Christian chronic masturbator Mathias, who sinisterly proclaims in the very last shot of the film, “Angels coming soon.”

RED SPIRIT LAKE

Aside from providing ample evidence that Richard Kern is possibly a better character actor than he is a filmmaker, Red Spirit Lake indubitably proves that a special sort of pseudo-cinematic auteurist film can be achieved on the true trash medium of consumer grade analog video. Of course, had the film been shot a decade later when digital video became the new preferred medium of no-budget filmmakers, Pinion’s densely packed art-trash horror show might have lost a tad bit of its peculiar aesthetic character. Admittedly, I was originally first drawn to Pinion’s work after randomly seeing his first feature Twisted Issues (1988)—a SOV gross-out skate-punk horror flick—which, due to its anarchistic lo-fi style and fresh youthful spirit, gave me nostalgia for the amateur skateboard videos that I made as a punk-rock-loving kid, but Red Spirit Lake proved to be an entirely different video affair, as a work that features a preternatural otherworldliness that, aside from the films of the Cinema of Transgression movement and oeuvre of Richard Baylor, is probably best comparable to the more bizarre guido horror flicks of the 1970s, including the aberrant artsploitation works of Alberto Cavallone like Blue Movie (1978) and Blow Job (1980). Featuring a borderline sadistically darkly comedic winter wonderland realm that makes the Coen Brothers’ Fargo (1996) seem like bourgeois pussy pedantry and a trashy yet sometimes aesthetically pleasing use of pagan ‘magical’ imagery that seems like a hopelessly heterosexual take on some of the high-camp imagery used by Teutonic dandy Werner Schroeter in his early epic masterpiece Eika Katappa (1969), Red Spirit Lake ultimately seems like the curious result of a genuinely talented filmmaker and cultivated cinephile attempting to make the most absurdly trashy yet enthralling horror exploitation film ever made using the worst consumer grade video equipment imaginable. Aside from the Dutch arthouse flick Winterstilte (2008) aka Winter Silence directed by Sonja Wyss, I certainly cannot think of a somewhat recent film featuring an intriguing utilization of pagan imagery and themes, even if it is done in a somewhat intentionally silly tongue-in-cheek fashion. Indeed, knowing that star and co-writer Annabel Lee would later embrace the ancient art of Occidental paganism, 'occult fascism,' and Radical Traditionalism makes Pinion's film all the more interesting. Additionally, in its inclusion of filmmakers Richard Kern, Tessa Hughes-Freeland, Kembra Pfahler, and Tommy Turner in outlandish acting roles, Red Spirit Lake confirms my long held belief that the Cinema of Transgression was an avant-garde exploitation movement.

-Ty E

DAISIES
DAISIES

Charles Walters (1960)

While I was originally introduced to the work of revolutionary avant-garde auteur Věra Chytilová—easily the most ill-restrained female filmmaker of the Czech New Wave and arguably the Slavic world in general—via Fruit of Paradise (1970) aka Ovoce stromů rajských jíme about a decade ago, I soon forgot about the feisty femme of a filmmaker and would not be reintroduced to her work until my girlfriend recently recommended Daisies (1966) aka Sedmikrásky, easily the director's most (in)famous and critically revered film to date. Although made within the state-sponsored film studio, Daisies was ultimately condemned as “depicting the wanton” and banned by the Czech communist regime upon its initial release, in part due to the wastage of food (a big no no in Marxist countries where many people are half-starving to death), but mainly due to the film's unwaveringly and innately ‘orgasmic’ and gorgeously grotesque essence. Directed by a philosophy and architecture student who was the only member of the fairer sex when she enrolled at FAMU in 1957, Daisies is a decidedly decadent, yet critically so, Dada-esque work that has been incessantly described as a feminist flick since its release, yet director Chytilová has denied she had any pretensions towards ‘female power,’ describing the film as “a philosophical documentary in the form of a farce” and that the film's plot-less structure was designed to “restrict [the spectator's] feeling of involvement and lead him to an understanding of the underlying idea or philosophy.” Centering around two marginally pretty, pixie-like ‘princesses’ that both have the name, Marie, who declare a sort of retarded and ultimately fruitless (although much fruit is involved!) war against patriarchy and con a couple ugly older men into supporting their unhinged addiction to hedonism, namely voraciously eating, playing childish pranks, and histrionically demanding attention, but, inevitably, due to their own self-absorption and unquenchable thirst for pleasure, bringing upon their own annihilation, Daisies is a film about pure evil in a uniquely unlikely form: that of two cutesy girls of dubious intelligence who decide that the world is for their taking. Ultimately seeming more anti-feminist and anti-counter-culture in its scathing sentiments due to its depiction of two moronic ‘progressive’ ladies with very little gray matter who see their naïve youthfulness and mindless self-indulgence as their greatest assets, Daisies is aesthetic and thematic decadence to such comical extremes of excess and ungodliness that it makes the hippie movement that hit the Occident like the innately intemperate behavior of spoiled children who think their farts smell like, well, daisies. Celluloid sitophilia at its most exquisitely and keenly yet ultimately deceptively kaleidoscopic, Daisies is a cinematic philosophical criticism of humanity at its most potently pretty and least prudish, especially for an avant-garde flick.

Beginning with industrial and battle footage, including the Pacific Theatre

during World War II, Daisies takes a dramatic change of pace when it introduces its two cutesy 'protagonists' Marie I (Jitka Cerhová) and Marie II (Ivana Karbanová), both of whom are in bathing suits and, despite their corny charisma, were played by non-actors. Marie II—a redhead with an unflattering bowl cut who is somewhat the 'leader' of the two gals—narcissistically describes herself as looking like a 'virgin,' but that will soon change when the two soon-to-be-lecherous lasses tell the world to go fuck itself. Before the viewer knows it, both Marie I and Marie II are dancing in front of a tree that is reminiscent of the 'Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil' from the biblical story of the Garden of Eden in Genesis 2-3 and naturally one of the girls decides to sink her teeth into a piece of forbidden fruit, which causes both little ladies to fall and nonsensically land in their apartment and make their dramatic transformation from virtual 'clean slates' with next to nil personalities into sinister yet silly succubi who emotionally and economically use men to support their beyond gluttonous appetites for food, attention, and girlish destruction. After Marie I cons an unsuspecting sugar daddy to take her on a date at a fancy restaurant, Marie II, using a false identity, randomly appears at the dinner table and proceeds to eat everything in sight, proudly declaring, "I love food. It's delicious" while criticizing her dinner companions for eating like civilized folk. Of course, Marie II's food fetishism influences Marie I to eat just as decadently as well and after dinner she belittles her 'mature' date due to his advanced age, as if he, being an old and unattractive fellow, can be blamed for being interested in dating a young and attractive girl. Later on, Marie I and Marie II head to an anachronistic nightclub with a 'Roaring Twenties'-style Charlie Chaplin-like dancer and a frisky flapper, who look like they could have stepped off the set of HBO's Boardwalk Empire and whose decided decadence reflects that the 'liberation' of the 1960s is nothing new, but merely something that has been drastically repackaged.

Not surprisingly, the two girls get good and wasted and cause childish social chaos at the nightclub and afterward Marie II—the most aggressive and 'progressive' of the two girls—goes to the apartment of a butterfly collector and provocatively places framed butterfly displays in front of her naughty bits. Of course, dead Papilionoidea only manage to captivate Marie II for so long as she naturally gets hungry again and she reunites with Marie I to quench her imaginary starvation. On their way to indulge eating like foul food sluts, the two girls take a small rowboat for their trip and the girls discuss their decided dissatisfaction with an old gardener ignoring them, one Marie complaining, "I wonder why that gardener didn't notice us?... Why didn't he at least tell us off?... He wasn't even sorry for us!..." and the other equally narcissistically stating, "What an old fogey! We're still young... We're young and we've got our whole lives ahead of us!" but little do the two little ladies realize that their senseless and wasteful gluttony will ultimately lead to their self-prophesized premature deaths. Eventually, Marie I and Marie II end up at a rundown Soviet-like factory where they have the good fortune of discovering an extravagant, kingly feast prepared assumedly for psychopathic communist leaders. In a retardedly ritualistic manner, Marie I and Marie II gorge the food and make a huge mess like little piggies and destroy the inside of the factory, even swinging from a giant chandelier, but before they know it they are treated like common witches and dunked in water like common witches (they are more like philistine pixie bitches) with the text, “is there any way to mend what’s been destroyed?” appearing in the background. Having a change of heart in regard to the hyper-hedonism and cock-teasing trickster like ways, the girls decide to repent by cleaning up the huge mess they made in the commie factory, but in the end, their efforts are in vain and too little, too late as both Marie I and Marie II are crushed and killed by the same chandelier that they were having fun swinging from only moments before in what is probably the best death-by-chandelier in cinema history.

DAISIES

Ironically concluding with the dedication to people who “get upset only over a stomped-upon bed of lettuce” (the film was, in part, banned due to the flagrant waste of film during the production), Daisies is indeed, first and foremost (at least, thematically speaking), a celluloid morality tale, or as director Věra Chytilová told “Comrade President” Gustáv Husák—the long-term Communist dictator of Czechoslovakia and of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (1969–1987)—in a 1975 letter regarding her film: “DAISIES was a morality play showing how evil does not necessarily manifest itself in an orgy of destruction caused by the war, that its roots may lie concealed in the malicious pranks of everyday life. I chose as my heroines two young girls because it is at this age that one most wants to fulfill oneself and, if left to one’s own devices, his or her need to create can easily turn into its very opposite.” Indeed, whether Chytilová’s intention or not, Daisies certainly depicts the mindless “flower power” of the hippies as a sort of self-destructive figurative road to hell paved with daisies and butterflies, thereupon making a sort of peculiar avant-garde equivalent to Italian auteur Fernando Di Leo’s less than politically correct anti-hippie flick Avere vent’anni (1978) aka To Be Twenty where two self-absorbed and brainwashed feminist hippie chicks ultimately pay with their lives for their male-hating arrogance and angelic heads being shoved way to far up their rosy little asses. Of course, aesthetically and thematically speaking, Daisies is in league with the works of Serbian auteur Dušan Makavejev, Soviet Armenian auteur Sergei Parajanov, and revolutionary Japanese Renaissance man Shūji Terayama, but also singular female auteur filmmakers like suicidal Welsh feminist Jane Arden, Austrian humble housewife turned quasi-Actionist Valie Export, and German-Jewish dyke auteur Ulrike Ottinger. Quite possibly the most ‘pretty’ and girlishly aesthetically pleasing piece of celluloid aesthetic terrorism ever made, Daisies is a rare Dadaesque psychedelic picture with enough philosophical meat and wacky humor to entertain even the most committed of anti-hippies, myself included.

-Ty E

THE DEADLY ART OF SURVIVAL

Charlie Ahearn (1979)

While it is certainly no surprise that Andy Warhol never directed a martial arts flick, he and his head Factory filmmaker Paul Morrissey's overly gritty (anti)aesthetic heavily influenced at least one such flick in a fairly idiosyncratic way that demonstrates the sort of racial and cultural schizophrenia that American style multiculturalism produces. Indeed, like a good percentage of the films associated with the NYC No Wave Cinema movement, The Deadly Art of Survival (1979) directed by Charlie Ahearn (Wild Style, Fear of Fiction) reeks of outstandingly amateurish pseudo-cinéma-vérité Warholian ineptness and unequivocally makes the late-1970s rotten Big Apple seem like a post-apocalyptic human zoo plagued by widespread destitution, mental derangement, and good old sub-lumpenprole debauchery. Admittedly, if there is any one film (sub)genre that I find more hopelessly banal than westerns and musicals, it has to be martial arts and karate flicks, but after watching excerpts of Ahearn's film in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by French documentarian Celine Danhier, I got the sudden urge to rape my eyes and ears with pure and unadulterated urban negro style kung fu. A real piece of D.I.Y. celluloid and no bullshit guerilla filmmaking, the Super-8 feature only became a serious idea for its auteur after fairly effeminate white boy Ahearn was coerced into making it after being approached by a group of young black kids who saw him playing around with his film camera around their ghetto and urged him to make a movie about the karate school that they attended. Sort of The Karate Kid (1984) of the New York Underground minus the elderly Chinese dude, evil blond Aryan villain, and intolerable sentimentalism, The Deadly Art of Survival is an authentic example of art imitating life that stars real-life Lower East Side karate instructor and community leader Shidoshi Nathan Ingram in the lead role as a sort of negro folk hero in the making who wages a sort of quasi-racial war against a rival Latino instructor who gets his prepubescent students to run coke out of his proto-hip-hop dojo. Of course, if you have ever wondered why certain rap groups like the Wu-Tang Clan (which derives its name from the film Shaolin and Wu Tang (1983) directed by Hong Kong martial artist Gordon Liu) have become so seemingly culturally schizophrenic that they have developed a deep fetish for esoteric Chinese martial arts aesthetics and philosophies, Ahearn's film will give you a good idea and thankfully it is completely devoid of gangster rap garbage and ill-literate neo-minstrel morons whose pants are falling off their marijuana-marinated asses.

A piece of shockingly amateurish negro-realism of the pleasantly politically incorrect sort where the melanin-privileged 'actors' freely throw around words like "nigger" and "spick" whilst fighting one another, The Deadly Art of Survival features an aborted script with countless plot-holes and completely dead-end subplots, wretchedly bad acting and equally botched dialogue, sound quality so horrible that it is nothing short of hypnotic, and horrendous handheld camera work that reminds me of one of those ghetto brawl videos that usually comes courtesy of the geniuses at WORLDSTARHIPHOP and that were probably shot by some random government-subsidized jigaboo on a stolen iPhone, yet the film certainly has a sort of raw and visceral charisma about it that reminds me why I rather re-watch it than any Bruce Lee flick. Certainly a ‘brother’ film to Melvin Van Peebles’ proto-blaxploitation flick Sweet Sweetback’s Baadasssss Song (1971) and Perry Henzell’s The Harder They Come (1972) starring Jimmy Cliff, albeit sans the nihilistic message and misguided glorification of savage gutter-level criminality, Ahearn’s film is also notable for being a rare film with a positive black hero as portrayed by a real-life positive black hero who does not speak Ebonics or sling crack or crusty crack-addled colored cunt. Despite its almost quaint positive prole message, the film also manages to drip with the slime and sleaze of Paul Morrissey’s Forty Deuce (1982) starring a very young Kevin Bacon as a young hustler who pimps out the corpse of prepubescent boy to an unwitting middle-aged New England preppie. Somewhat inexplicably shot by S&M-obsessed hipster nihilist Beth B—the ‘better half’ of an ill-fated marriage with Scott B that produced such post-punk art-fetish films as G Man (1978), Black Box (1979), and Vortex (1982)—The Deadly Art of Survival is a rare example of marginally working true multiculturalism in celluloid form, as a collaboration that brought together weak white hipsters and poor black kung fu champs. Indeed, the film may have been shot and directed by weak ass hipster crackers, but the negroes ultimately have all the glory, thus making the production a sort of unwitting allegory for how mainstream corporate sport leagues like the NBA operate.

THE DEADLY ART OF SURVIVAL

I once had a friend from Annapolis, Maryland who told me about a local urban legend that he believed was true about how a Japanese tourist that completely vanished without a trace after he made the catastrophic mistake of wandering into the wrong side of town where black government housing is the norm. It seems that The Deadly Art of Survival director Charlie Ahearn had a rather different experience than the Jap tourist, or as the seemingly naively negrophilic auteur stated in the doc Blank City regarding the genesis of his ludicrously ‘lo-fi’ directorial debut, “It was part of that whole thing of getting the hell out of the art world and finding a kind of cinema much closer to reality. When I decided to take my camera out to far Lower East Side...I didn’t have any film crew at all...so I could basically just disappear. I met this whole kung fu school and they said ‘Will you make a film with us?’” Out of all the films I have ever seen associated with the movement, Ahearn’s first feature certainly most personifies filmmaker/painter James Nares’ remark regarding the philosophy regarding No Wave Cinema that, “We purposely alienated ourselves from the avant-garde cinema. We wanted to make narrative films instead of art films...because it seemed like you could reach more people.” Certainly, The Deadly Art of Survival, like Ahearn’s other films, could not be any less pretentious, but I cannot say the same about No Wave filmmakers like Amos Poe and Eric Mitchell who seriously thought that they were America’s answer to La Nouvelle Vague. A sort of cultural cuckold with a Super-8 camera, Ahearn ultimately sired what is more or less a glorified homemovie that also works as an eccentric ethnology and unintentionally absurdist example of cultural appropriation where the Far East meets the Far Lower East Side. If any film can bring new meaning to the timeless word ‘Négritude,’ it is most certainly Ahearn’s singularly shitty yet nonetheless strangely captivating debut.

The film begins fittingly enough with protagonist Nathan Ingram shirtless in a bargain bin chiaroscuro scene flexing his muscles and doing kung fu moves until eventually verbally announcing the film’s credits orally, stating, “My name Nathan Ingram. The name of this film is THE DEADLY ART OF SURVIVAL. Scripted and directed by Mr. Charlie Ahearn,” thereupon underscoring the flick’s realist, almost documentary-like tone. As if almost mocking the innate ineptness and amateurishness of The Deadly Art of Survival, Ingram is subsequently featured walking around a graffiti-plagued ghetto basketball court and excitedly stating to a comrade regarding a Bruce Lee film that he just saw, “The style and everything...it was just beautiful. The choreography of the whole film was good.” Of course, everything about Ahearn’s film is absolutely appallingly bad, but as American negroes oftentimes say, it is a work about “Keepin’ it real” and that is one of its greatest charms. Ultimately, Ingram’s trouble arise when an Afro-Latino pal named Miguel Villanueva approaches him while initially acting chummy, but then completely changes, says to him out of nowhere, “Listen, Larry, what happened the last time I saw you? I told your ass to not come around here, didn’t I?,” sucker punches him in the face like the typical ghetto coward, and then has a pack of wild feral spades attack him. As a result of his beating, Ingram is not only left hospitalized, but his bodaciously bitchy baby-momma also rebukes him in the cruelest of ways, yelling at him, “I wish that god had killed you. That way I wouldn’t have to worry about you no more.” Needless to say, Ingram—a kung fu instructor (whose dojo is curiously never shown once in the entire film)—decides to dish out revenge against treacherous fair-weather friend Miguel and his slavish ‘play thug’ accomplices. Like in real-life when it comes to ghetto negroes, these two-faced “shines” are not so tough when it comes to fighting one-on-one and Ingram even manages to beat up a couple of them up after catching them bragging regarding his hospitalization and stating things like, “Dat nigga is crippled” and “He got fucked up so bad.”

As Ingram soon discovers after handing out various beat downs, a small-time wop Mafioso with the stereotypical name ‘Frankie’ ordered Miguel to kill him because the Guido assumed he impregnated his Chinese girlfriend. Indeed, after buying a revolver wrapped in a dirty newspaper from a young boy while composing music on an organic at his local church, Ingram decides to confront his (ex)friend and pulls the weapon on Miguel after catching him admiring himself in a mirror like a sort of welfare Narcissus. Rather absurdly, Miguel attempts to declare his innocence, pleading to Ingram while he has a revolver pointed in his face, “I had no choice” and “They put me up to it [...] it wasn’t me. You know I wouldn’t do something like that.” After declaring, “I outta blow your brains out,” Ingram hits Miguel in the gut and lets him off fairly easy by giving him a quick little beating that demonstrates that he is a man of honor and self-restraint. After talking to a low-level thug sporting an Adidas t-shirt at a super sleazy pool-hall that confirms that he and Miguel were hired by Guido goon Frankie to murder him for supposedly impregnating the chink chick, Ingram heads to a fried chicken joint where the East Asian whore works and bitches her out, threateningly stating to her, “Let me tell you something, Bitch. You know I was nowhere near your stinking pussy. You know that, right, You know that. We were supposed to be friends, we were supposed to be friends.” After stating to her that “I gave you a lot of respect” because she was only female he knew that was serious about martial arts, Ingram threatens the Chinawoman by telling her that if she does not smooth things over with Frankie, “I’m going to take my fist and bust you into a million pieces – pregnant or not.” Needless to say, the petrified race-mixing Chinese girl obliges Ingram.

THE DEADLY ART OF SURVIVAL

Somewhat ironically, as it turns out, it was not Ingram but Miguel who put his spade seed inside of the Chinese chick. Needless to say, when his Chinese concubine reveals to Frankie that he is actually the father of the monstrously miscegenated fetus inside her tiny East Asian womb, treacherous Afro-Latino turd Miguel naturally opts to get out of town and even expects his oriental baby-momma to foot the bill for his self-imposed exile, thus leaving the half-breed baby a bastard before it is even born and causing Ingram to have one less problem to deal with. Unfortunately, just as Miguel leaves, another nemesis arrives in town named ‘Handsome Harry’ and he begins dealing dope out of a transparently dubious business that he opens called ‘Disco Dojo’ that uses the less than hip motto, “Martial Arts – With Style.” Of course, the dojo is merely used as a front for dope-peddling, as ‘Sensei’ Handsome Harry has his prepubescent students run drugs for him while he sits on his ass and counts his candy money. On top of overcharging his students (he demands $20 for every single service he provides to them) and forcing them to make him money for him by running cocaine and heroin, Harry gives rather lackluster kung fu instructions that mainly involve him doing dopey poses while smoking a cigarette. Not surprisingly considering his line of trade, Harry receives his drug supply from an exceedingly arrogant Hebrew in a white suit. When Harry fires an empty weapon at him as a sort of sick joke and then obnoxiously remarks, “You dumb white boy. I could have killed you if I wanted to,” the Judaic gangster humorously replies, “Listen. You’re a ten year old moron anyway. When you grow up and get out of nursery school, I'll give you a real one of those." Aside from hating whites (or, in the case of his dealer, Jews), Handsome Harry—a supposedly Hispanic chap with discernible Negroid admixture—is also no fan of blacks, even if they make up his largest clientele. Indeed, when Ingram confronts him at a phone booth, Harry less than jokingly says to him, "What's up, Nigger?" and the protagonist replies, "What's happening, spick? How you doing," though the two decide to postpone their showdown for a more appropriate date. Since Ingram is in the company of a fine ass white female whose panties he wants to get into, he ultimately opts to take down Harry at a later date as he has much bigger priorities. After all, if there is anything that will totally incapacitate a black man, it is white trash pussy.

While watching an adolescent kung fu tournament and talking to a journalist, Handsome Harry brags, "These kids are real cute. Very cute. Shit....My class kicks better than that and their stoned the whole time. I mean, the whole time...I can't believe this." Harry now runs a fairly successful dope-dealing operation and of course the only person that can seriously stop him is Ingram, so he opts to take decisive action against the protagonist by hiring two ninjas from a mysterious Chinaman named Lang Wang Chow to take him out. While Ingram is banging his baby-momma in his Cadillac while parked under the Brooklyn Bridge, the two ninjas manage takeoff all four of his car tires and then throw them in the river. Naturally, when the black-clad ninjas kidnap his bastard baby and then give him an ominous message that includes a decapitated naked baby doll and a note reading "Get your baby on your roof tonight 8-PM," Ingram decides to wage war against the comically dressed ghetto mercenaries. Against his students' advice (one of them wisely says to him, "Sensei, you may be a martial artist but you're not Superman"), Ingram opts to follow the ninjas' directions by meeting them on a dilapidated apartment roof by himself where he manages to not only kick the specially trained Chinamens' asses, but also gets his wee black babe back. At this point in the film, Ingram realizes that being a hero is tough and decides to throw in the towel, at least temporarily.

While riding in a taxi with two of his students, Sly ('Sly' Arthur Abrams) and Freddy (Freddy Rivera), Ingram complains, "When you don't got a job...and you got a kid...man, it is rough," which leads to all three men discussing the pros and cons of dope-dealing. After Sly alludes to the fact that he slings coke, Ingram and Freddy complain about how it is a less than respectful trade that destroys the community. After parting ways with his two comrades, Ingram seems to admit defeat and reveals that he might have busted his moral compass as indicated when he thinks to himself, "I wonder what kind of business Sly is really into. If Freddy would have kept his mouth quiet, shit, he probably would have told us. Man, if I was born rich, I could teach anything. To hell with this whole karate business. Harry's got it and Harry can have it. Money is the real deadly art of survival." Indeed, while Ingram decides to give up on fighting the epidemic drug problem in his neighborhood and resolves to let Handsome Harry keep running his evil enterprise, a chance sighting by his baby-momma ultimately leads to the protagonist having a real one-on-one showdown with his nemesis. After his baby-momma spots Handsome Harry assaulting a girl named Paula from their apartment window, Ingram decides to leap into action (somewhat humorously, his lover says to him “get your shirt” before he runs out of their apartment) and begins chasing down the more silly than sinister dope-dealing Sensei. In what is ultimately one of the most absurdly anticlimactic showdowns in martial arts movie history, Ingram beats up Handsome Harry and then kicks him off a concrete pier into the East River in a scene juxtaposed with ambient noise that seems more typical of a Scott B and Beth B flick.

THE DEADLY ART OF SURVIVAL

Notably, two years after The Deadly Art of Survival was released, star Nathan Ingram was honored with a medal by kosher crypto-cocksucker NYC mayor Ed Koch—a man that was hated by many members of the No Wave scene due to his soft stance on battling AIDS despite his own assumed aberrosexual proclivities—for using his martial arts mastery to thwart a robbery in his ghetto. Before earning the medal, creating the apparently very effective D.A.S. fighting system, becoming the most famous negro martial artist in NYC, training over 10,000 students (over 50 of which would become masters) and becoming a truly positive black community leader, Grand Master Ingram was himself apparently a criminal thug that worked for Chinatown gang boss Yin Poy Nicky Louie and ran with the infamous Chinese-American the Ghost Shadows, thus making his stranger-than-fiction legacy as a true black role model all the more remarkable and inspirational. Indeed, if anything, The Deadly Art of Survival downplays both Ingram’s karate skills and heroics to the point where the film makes him seem like nothing more than a semi-nerdy and terribly culturally confused negro with a inexplicable Bruce Lee fetish who went berserk after suffering one-too-many beatings and just happened to take out a couple bad guys in the process during his quest for revenge. It should also be noted that a Ingram biography with the same name as Ahearn’s film was released in 2012. Of course, in terms of films depicting the conspicuously culturally mongrelized merging of martial arts and black ghetto culture, The Deadly Art of Survival is more or less the The Birth of a Nation (1915) of the bizarre subgenre. Indeed, without Ahearn’s debut feature, there would probably be no The Last Dragon (1985) directed by Michael Schultz or Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai (1999) directed by Jim Jarmusch. Notably, with his subsequent feature Wild Style (1983) starring legendary New York graffiti artist Lee Quinones and rap pioneer Fab 5 Freddy, Ahearn would ultimately sire what is probably the Citizen Kane (1941) of hip-hop cinema, which is no small accomplishment for a wussy white dude who would probably be instantly beaten and robbed if he dared to currently walk around the same black ghetto neighborhoods that his films inspired.

Admittedly, I literally have nil interest in martial arts films and I doubt I have ever even seen a single movie featuring Bruce Lee in its entirety, so I am not exaggerating when I say that The Deadly Art of Survival is one of the most unintentionally enthralling kung fu flicks that I have ever seen. Indeed, aside from Deadbeat at Dawn (1988), which features actor/auteur Jim Van Bebber doing all of his own stunts, including kicking ass with nunchaku and jumping off of buildings, I cannot think of a more captivatingly confused, idiotically idiosyncratic, and strikingly gritty contribution to the genre. Forget blaxploitation buffoonery like Dolemite (1975) and other intentionally schlocky celluloid coon crap, The Deadly Art of Survival might be a chronically psychotronic flick that is completely lacking in both wit and wisdom but it is also indubitably the real darkie deal as a true 'black power' motion picture that is to martial arts what Bill Gunn's Ganja & Hess (1973) was to the vampire subgenre and what The Harder They Come (1972) was to real Jamaican reggae. Of course, unlike the degenerate jazz worship in films by the likes of No Wave filmmakers like Amos Poe and Jim Jarmusch, Charlie Ahearn's first feature thankfully does not feel like a patronizing attempt to appropriate and/or mindlessly glorify American negro kultur, even if it features negroes that have strangely appropriated Chinese culture, hence why the film is probably less popular nowadays than certain shamelessly xenophilic and nihilistic No Wave classics that glorify crime and old dead black men. After all, as MTV and Hollywood has showed us with countless neo-minstrel style rappers and films like Ridley Scott's American Gangster (2007) and shows like HBO's The Wire (2002–2008), there is nothing cool about a law-abiding negro who dares to fight against parasitic drug dealers that have completely ravaged his community, or so says the unscrupulous Hebrew and his hopelessly cuckolded minion the white liberal. Indeed, as a film that completely lacks any phony altruistic white character and where a black man single-handedly saves his neighborhood from a racially dubious Hispanic dope-dealer who has turned all the local children into coke-peddlers, The Deadly Art of Survival promotes negro self-determination and rather refreshingly betrays the mainstream liberal narrative that negroes need to be coddled and that they cannot do anything on their own without the help of the white liberal slave-master, thus making the film a true black power picture that undermines uniquely absurd hocus pocus pseudo-theories like so-called post-traumatic slavery syndrome and proves that black men can be bad asses without having to sell drugs or kill other black men.

-Ty E

HITCH-HIKE
HITCH-HIKE

Charlie Simonds (1990)

As far as I am concerned, David Hess (no relation to Rudolf) is my favorite Jewish-American actor. This is for many reasons, but most specifically due to his totally genuine expertise at playing perverted homicidal psychopaths of the most sleazy and degrading sort. If any actor was born to play an Irgun terrorist, it is Hess, but alas, Hollywood would never produce such a film, thus his career was secluded mostly to the marginal realm of marvelous exploitation cinema. Although Hess is best known for his infamous performance as the exceedingly deranged felon-gang leader Krug in Wes Craven's Last House on the Left (1972), his greatest and most eclectically maniacal performance is as a bank-robbing hitchhiker who escapes from a mental institution for the criminally insane in the Italian production Hitch-Hike (1977) aka AutoStop rosso sangue directed by Pasquale Festa Campanile; a work that makes Robert Harmon's subsequent film The Hitcher (1986) seem like a softcore flirting match between a mature androphile and young, shy hustler. In Hitch-Hike, an American fellow who calls himself Adam Konitz (David Hess) hitches a ride with a vacationing Italian husband and wife that are on their way to Los Angeles, California. The husband, Walter Mancini (played by the great Franco Nero), is a thoroughly debased alcoholic Italian journalist whose wife Eve (played by Corinne Clery) wears the pants firmly and indisputably in the relationship. After picking up hyperactive Herr Hess, the married couple soon realizes that their passenger enjoys more than playful mind-games (albeit of the perverted philistine sort) and that he is brandishing a weapon more deadly than his equally pesky penis. Being a jolly immoral psychopath, the hitchhiker utterly enjoys taunting his less than hysterical bourgeois hostages and, in no time, has them fighting each other. Walter, being nothing more than a glorified gossip columnist, is not match for his vivacious wife who is a wealthy heiress and all-around independent woman. It is quite obvious for the beginning of Hitch-Hike that Walter has a dark underbelly in his masked soul that is rapidly reaching a boiling point. It is only his unexpected fateful meeting with a hairbrained and pussy-obsessed nut-job that finally empowers Walter with the tenacity he needs to meet his truly sinister destiny.

Upon first glance, Hitch-Hike seems like your typical psycho hitchhiker flick, but it breaks all the conventions of theme and morality in this small, but mostly spectacular, subgenre. What makes the film especially interesting is that virtually all the characters in the film go beyond the prissy Hollywood realm of carbon-copy good and evil. In Hitch-Hike, the knight does not come to save his princess from the dragon, nor does he fancy bedding her down and getting his dick wet. When it comes to virile male potency, the swarthy cop-killing hitchhiker is the only man who has what it takes to unload bullets and unsanctioned semen. While the frivolous hitchhiker spouts narcissistic and delusional fantasies about having his unremarkable life stories documented for the totally apathetic world to see, passive Walter dreams of a 'progressive' male-only world of communal buggery. It is most apparent that lady Eve is sexually repressed and almost welcoming of the hitchhiker's assertive forced entry. Seeing as her own man is not man enough to properly provide for her, let alone protect her, Eve ultimately takes it upon herself to slay the evil dragon and the venomous lizard in his pants. For her noble and uber-miss strength, Eve is 'rewarded' in a way that has no rivals in the history of cinema in terms of gross betrayal and defiance of morality. In short, Hitch-Hike is not the sort of film one would want to show a prospective female mate, let alone a dictatorial girlfriend, but it is the sort of work that would be big with militant homo-supremacists, misogynistic serial killers, and maybe a couple oddball feminists. Needless to say, although I thought Hitch-Hike would be your typical Italian pseudo-Hollywood clone, it turned out to be one of the most shocking and strangely rewarding films I have seen in sometime.

Throughout Hitch-Hike, Franco Nero proves his versatility as an actor by auspiciously playing a proto-metosexual character who has his testicles carried around in his wife's thousand dollar purse. Like a lot of great films, Hitch-Hike is even more relevant today than when it was first released, which is virtually unheard of for films of this sort. After all, in our increasingly office-based abstract paper-shuffling western world, women are asserting themselves in ever sector of society and homogenized political homos are demanding that society put male-on-male sodomy on a sparkling lavender pedestal. Naturally, nowadays masculine maniacs and audacious alphas are rarely needed to lead raping and pillaging conquering armies and are but a mere pestilence that has no place in society aside from prison and the imaginary and insignificant world of professional wrestling. When it comes to a modern look at the sexes, Hitch-Hike takes a vicious yet honest nihilistic approach; offering no answers but foretelling a more conflicting and unhealthy future. Near the conclusion of the film, Walter and Eve are threatened and affronted by an unruly group of irrational and criminally-inclined youths who give evidence as to what to expect from future generations: hyper-materialism and mindless perniciousness.

Undoubtedly, the most glaring flaw of Hitch-Hike is that the film was dubbed, but I guess that is what one comes to expect from any and all Italian films. Still, it is nothing short of a tragedy that one does not get to hear the authentic dueling voices of heinous Hess and beta Nero. For those that enjoyed Hitch-Hike, the short 17-minute documentary The Devil Thumbs a Ride (2002) directed by David Gregory (Texas Chain Saw Massacre: The Shocking Truth, The Theatre Bizarre) for Blue Underground, is also a nice, if hopelessly superficial and overly sentimental, treat. While lacking in any real intellectual depth as far as socio-political issues are concerned, the brief documentary does feature some worthwhile personal commentary from Franco Nero and his accomplice David Hess. Unsurprisingly, Hess declares his performance in Hitch-Hike to be his finest. Nero also discusses the little problem of breaking his arm after punching a naughty horse during the shooting of the spaghetti western Keoma (1976) right before the production of Hitch-Hike. Seeing as his character is an emotional cripple, breaking his arm was indubitably a blessing in disguise as the visibly broke arm is symbolic of the character's emasculated impotence. While shooting a fight scene in Hitch-Hike, Nero also accidentally broke Hess's Hebrew honker. I think most people will agree after seeing Hitch-Hike that it was a noble sacrifice.

HITCH-HIKE

David Alexander Hess (September 19, 1936 – October 8, 2011)

-Ty E

BLACK DEVIL DOLL FROM HELL

Chester Novell Turner (1984)

What can be said about Black Devil Doll from Hell that hasn't been exercised in the form of spittle from drooling cult film fanatics? Chester N. Turner's shot-on-video cult classic even went as far to inspire Jonathan Lewis, to a modest extent, to create Black Devil Doll, now arguably Rotten Cotton's mascot of sorts. Black Devil Doll from Hell yields a remarkable hold over most others populating its very specific niche of actual trash, and not just replicating trash. A very special aspect of the legend of Black Devil Doll from Hell is the mystery behind the "auteur" director, Chester Novell Turner. Vanishing after two feature films, the above mentioned and Tales from the Quadead Zone, Turner evaporated as quickly as he came, picking up notoriety with VHS cassette tapes that inflated in value. It has been revealed after many fans sacrificed lonely nights, slamming away at keyboards on various forums, that Mr. Turner allegedly passed away in a car accident in 1996, as was told by close friend and star of Black Devil ... Hell, Shirley Jones, during a horror convention. I can imagine this being a shock to most who simply guessed that he existed, far from the fringes of cinema, trying to cope with having made such bizarre and dubious films. After all, Chester Turner's Black Devil Doll from Hell remains one of the very limited examples of an African-American directing African-American cinema. As you may know, blaxploitation was a genre that was littered with the byproducts of whites and Jewish folk after the release of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song. Needless to say, Turner's aggravated Black expressionism tainted Black Devil Doll from Hell with a rebel authenticity and disregard for cinematic procedures, thus creating this fetid wreck of a film.

The version of which I am reviewing is a re-edited version assembled by David Ichikawa. Trimming the unnecessary long shots and editing a rock-oriented tune into the credits, this version of Black Devil Doll from Hell is unanimously referred to as the smoother cut. Painfully religious from the very start, Black Devil Doll from Hell's lead heroine - if you can stoop that low as to label her such - is a god-fearing woman named Helen Black. After telling her fellow church-going honeys that she is not interested in sex until marriage, Helen is accosted on the street by a dusty hustler taking her to his trunk, offering quality coats and color televisions (typical). This goes on with him lauding her as "mama" until she gets frustrated with his sins and denies his stifled advances. Following this scene is the introduction to Chester N. Turner's exquisite lo-fi casio-funk/sleaze score that resembles what would befall a song composed by a 4 year old if given periods of brief silence before each note, as if Chester Turner paused to remember which key to hit next. After a scene in which Chester Turner trails off on a tangent with his camera, detailing various artifacts to remind us of Helen's unwavering love for god, as if we forgot; she then leaves her house and enters a thrift store run by a Nigerian dwarf whose enthusiasm for Kwanzaa bleeds through the visually starved film. Scanning the shelves, Helen is drawn to a ventriloquist dummy with painted Negro skin and braids that have forever left a shadow of Rick James burned onto its reputation. While being warned by the grotesque shop owner, Chester N. Turner holds down a single note that subsequently wails over the voice track, drowning her warning.

BLACK DEVIL DOLL FROM HELL

The puppet is first given life on screen during a repulsive shower sequence in which Shirley Jones suds her naturally sagging breasts for what must be minutes. Giving into the strange demonic aura that must permeate through the shower curtains from the doll's gaze, Helen gives into her tribal desires and mimics a prototype of an Herbal Essences commercial before hamming it up with a "Oh God, what am I doing to myself?". From here on out is where Chester N. Turner's masterpiece dips into the deep end - puppet rape. What must be along the same fetishistic line that Nekromantik crossed with a makeshift phallic piece, Black Devil Doll from Hell also crosses with what begins as a rape scene with a black puppet; to her eventual succumbing to her primitive carnality and casting out the ruminations of a higher power. After the puppet disappears as the troll from Ghana foretold, Helen transcends into that ever-popular whore archetype and begins bedding down random Johns in a desperate attempt to rekindle that flame she once experienced (against her will but not actually). It just so happens that science has confirmed a staggering amount of women secretly are aroused by the idea of forceful, non-consensual intercourse. "Results indicated that 62% of women have had a rape fantasy...the median frequency of these fantasies was about 4 times per year, with 14% of participants reporting that they had rape fantasies at least once a week." I welcome such common truths in cinema and their unwillingness to shy away from "harsh" depictions of behaviors that are more common than good taste would let on. Besides from this certain point of Black Devil Doll from Hell; the film is utter garbage. Entertaining garbage - yes - but ultimately and undeniably detestable in every other regard.

Chester N. Turner's premature passing is a small stain on the hearts of few. Granted, had he continued living, his legacy would have most likely dwindled into obscurity. There would have been no reason for him to return to filmmaking - as his youthful fiery spirit towards creating cinematic abominations had already been long extinguished. Surely, family would be the only dominant current in his life (if he even had one), had he settled down. Not much is known about Chester N. Turner other than he was, in fact, a custodian of shit. I'm rather relieved he didn't live to see the state of horror and cult icons, traveling from convention to the next, offering no insight into films other than cheap DV dreams and a hefty price-tag on ink and laminate. Black Devil Doll from Hell is a film that I find myself torn between loving/hating. On one hand, I loathe the film's very creation - a gnarled root stemming from the VHS format; nothing of quality this considerably low should be worth so much. On the other hand, I laughed aloud on many unintentionally hilarious occasions and thoroughly enjoyed the experience and look forward to re-watching the flick with a group of friends. Instantly comparable to my personal favorite Don't Play With Me Part 2, the lot of shot-on-and-edited-on-cassette films are strangely fascinating to me. By no means a classic, but by everyone means digestible. Even if you despise its creation, even if it spoils an otherwise good mood; Black Devil Doll from Hell is, and will always be, fun to mock and bitch about.

-mAQ

CAN YOU CALL ME SWEETHEART?
CAN YOU CALL ME SWEETHEART?

Chico Wang (2006)

Can You Call Me Sweetheart? (NSFW though I'm sure nothing on Soiled Sinema is) is enough an oddity to be reviewed on Soiled Sinema. Essentially not a film in any aspect but a clip deranged enough to make the cut for reviewing purposes. For the first time, I've decided to review something that doesn't stray into the opposite polarities of pornography and have decided to instead discuss the introduction video to the pornographic video No Swallowing Allowed #9. Much like the variable essences of writing, editing can do many things. I could choose to write in an amiably fashionable writing structure or ditch that futile effort for an elastic case of sarcasm. Editing, much like sentence structuring, is a battle of visual metaphors. Chico Wang ultimately decided to go with a "horror theme" to suit this video of Amber Rayne's psychosis. Apparently after a "backdoor problem", Amber Rayne auctioned the idea of feverishly screaming for bukkake in her eyes. While you might be thinking "mAQ, this sounds completely normal on a plane coexisting with Japanese porn". Fear not, this provides a bit of intentional dementia that could only be clinically consoled as a fit of Tourette's syndrome. The synopsis (or what?) goes as such. Amber Rayne lies on the ground in an unmoving stance. The carpet beckons your attention but this cannot be divulged as she's prying her eyes open in an A Clockwork Orange fashion. She starts foaming at the mouth screaming and taunting begging for a load in her eye. Suit follows and she wants more. She starts throwing humility at the cameraman screaming for more. She declares "I'm seeing fuzz but I can still see straight! MORE CUM". If this doesn't intimidate the average male, I wouldn't know what would. The attempts of fingering her are deemed useless as she seems unphased by these physical attempts of pleasuring her but she's beyond any form of connectivity of human life. The uber-bizarre takes a turn as soon as she begins communicating with the cameraman. Tempting her, he begins singing a soft lullaby "Cannnn youuu call meee sweetheartttt?". Allured by his soft voice, she follows with a bravado number bringing to mind the musical number seen in Buffalo '66. Both battle for the weirdest context of a musical number but this introduction video takes the ad-libbed cake. Thanks entirely to the sombre piano theme, Can You Call Me Sweetheart? maintains an almost Lynchian vibe of musical surrealism. I'd hate to use "Lynchian" as a term but after the awkward nuclear family scenario pictured in Eraserhead and the Silencio scene in Mulholland Drive, this seems nothing but an offspring. Both works are an instance of the macabre and the mundane being spliced effortlessly, even accidentally, together. Many thanks roll out to Cheal for introducing me to this video. His promises of something I'd never witnessed before ring true. This clever musing of existential angst beyond the glamour of pornography is a masterstroke by someone who would never appear to be likely to produce art. To quote Pete; "A true auteur work in the crowded field of musical bukkake porn. Can You Call Me Sweetheart? is unheard of, subtle, powerful, menacing, and an experiment in unleashing something abstract amongst unsuspecting viewers. It is absolutely horrifying, disturbing, rewatchable, alienating, and groundbreaking in terms of abstruse film making. Clarity's not allowed here.

-mAQ

13 BELOVED

13 BELOVED

Chookiat Sakveerakul (2006)

Released domestically as 13: Game of Death, this little number is one film that managed to successfully sneak its country of origin past me. Surveying the box art and synopsis, I would have never guessed that the film was from Thailand. My tastes strongly disagree with Thai new wave and the various other mediums that come from the "developing" third world country. Judging by the air-brushed still of "star" Krissada Terrence, I had assumed this Dimension Extreme release would highlight thriller Americana. After I quit my internal whining and went about the business of sitting through the film, I had noticed that while the film wasn't shot any better than the rest of the litter, the development of the story was ages ahead of its own film industry. Don't get me wrong, 13 Beloved isn't a great film but it certainly holds the torch of quality suspense films in Thailand. Seeing as the cultural aesthetic of poverty and grime is a mainstay in Bangkok, where film stock must be cheap as are the films, I was just relieved that Chookiat Sakveerakul avoided this at most costs and focused on the financial contagion of lead salesman, Chit. Besides from Tony Jaa and Prachya Pinkaew, the country doesn't have anything to show for successes of artistry or financial gain other than "ladyboy" porn. Not even the Pang brothers or the critically acclaimed Uncle Boonmee Who Can Recall His Past Lives can surface the consistently sinking market for Thai films (ones that don't involve various forms of Muay Thai.)

The outline of 13 Beloved follows a recently laid off salesman named Puchit. Lady Luck has turned her back on his fortune for the last time. Broke, unemployed, without a car and severely in debt, it seems that the likely option would be to autodefenestrate oneself. While pouting in a staircase, his phone rings with an offer to win a large cash prize. In our Western world of cellular solicitation, this would surely be a call that I would either ignore or cut short. Divulging knowledge of his exact position, predicament, and a bothersome fly, the voice offers the first challenge to be killing the fly with a newspaper that mysteriously appears at the end of the stairs. This event serves as the catalyst to the increasingly erratic and immoral challenges that Chit subjects himself and others to. The child's play begins quite literally with playing with children. His task is to cause at least three toddlers to cry. Chit, being a commoner and that of strong morals, does not know how to pull this off. A shove later, Chit not only fails to evoke tears but spreads a smile on a young face. Once he tastes the temporary defeat, he accidentally steps on a toy and milks this to further his quest for 100 million baht. Such challenges are implemented but the length of extremity is stretched each go.

13 Beloved might seem similar to your palate. Imagine, if you will, what would happen if Falling Down was crossed with Eagle Eye. Director DJ Caruso credits

Steven Spielberg for the original idea for Eagle Eye but it's obvious that 13 Beloved or at least, mention of the plot, influenced his ideas. This way, claiming authenticity saves him from buying up the rights and wasting more of his gold. The one wound, the critical blow to 13 Beloved's credibility as a thriller, is the awful, awful score. Some clown, name of Kitti Kuremanee, developed music that isn't only distinguishable for being a steaming platter of wasted and unfiltered flaccid notes, but painful and distracting as well. Often times, the action and intrigue of this twisted game will catch full force only to suffer at the hands of the irregular tempo and utterly amateur production. I'll admit to being constantly partial to the events but I'll also acknowledge that this story was driven enough to keep my interest; vivid in its portrayal but tart.

A major element of 13 Beloved that really scored points for me was the realistic dramatization of hacking. Using most hackers favorite tool, Nmap, Chit's potential love interest delves into cyberspace, not the digi--Candyland as portrayed in Hackers, but raw data and line prompts in order to get to the bottom of his erratic and nonsensical actions. But this saving grace of plausible network invasion doesn't last long. As soon as the domain of the finale, the 13th challenge, is breached and a techno-luxurious hologram appears, as wide as a miniature IMAX screen, 13 Beloved switches gears to silly. The fact that no foundation or screen acts as backbone to the image, which quickly dissipates to reveal nothing out of the ordinary, really draws from the element of "Big Brother" 13 Beloved had going for it - that crawling notion of 24/7 observation which leads to a fermenting paranoia. What really sells 13 Beloved though from the territory of middling to competent is the "shocking" twist which proves to be the greatest act of humor involved in the script. Marketed as a horror/comedy, the regard to jokes was never sold to me until the conclusion, the shocking cap which lead on a visage of its own. While the faux-omniscience is enjoyable, it's merely a distraction from the effortless direction. Sure, the film looked good considering what part of the world it hailed from. I would never recommend 13 Beloved to a cinephile in hopes for an enlightening experience but if said film were at your disposal, it certainly wouldn't hurt to give it a chance. Hell, you might even appreciate the "white terrorist" approach more than I did.

-mAQ

WESLEY WILLIS'S JOYRIDES
WESLEY WILLIS'S JOYRIDES

Chris Bagley (2008)

I generally do not see gigantic black men who suffer from both obesity and paranoid schizophrenia as kindhearted teddy bears, but the recently deceased iconic rock star Wesley Willis is certainly an exception to my mostly exceptionless rule. Unlike most members of his community, Willis despised McDonald's fast food restaurants and loved rock music. Although Wesley Willis got out of the hood and became a somewhat successful musician in spite of his debilitating mind and body, mainstream media outlets have mostly ignored his stranger-than-fiction life story. After all, the so called liberal elite has always loved propagandizing real-life stories about minorities and handicapped individuals who – despite the blatant odds against their success – became cultural icons, yet the incredible (albeit short) life of Wesley Willis is only known by his mostly marginal fans. In the documentary Wesley Willis's Joyrides, one is introduced to the joyful joyrides and devilish personal hellrides of the extraordinary punk rock icon Wesley Willis. Next to the legendary Bad Brains – an all-black hardcore/reggae outfit – Wesley Willis is the most well known and revered black man in the mostly white punk rock genre, yet the gigantic schizoid negro frontman was more interested in pure rock 'n' roll; a genre largely pioneered by his ancestors, but later abandoned by later generations of black Americans. Wesley Willis may have lacked the guitar virtuoso skills of Jimi Hendrix, but he certainly put his entire haunted soul into his unconventional and totally genuine music. On top of creating a variety of original songs, Willis also covered songs ranging from popular British New Wave group Duran Duran's "Girl on Film" to American country-rock band Pure Prairie League's "Amie." Joyrides is a documentary that presents Wesley Willis at his ecstatic highs and tormented lows, thus it is a fairly objective flick that captures its subject beautifully; presenting the rocker's incomparable essence like never before.

The nineteenth century German scientist Karl Vogt once pointed out in his book Man and his Place in Nature that, "The skull of a Negro is as strong as ivory. In a fight, the Negro attempts to strike the chest of his opponent with his head, and both Negroes resemble lunging rams in the process." Wesley Willis is certainly an exception to Vogt's theory as he used his gigantic cranium to head butt friends and fans as a gentlemanly gesture of affection. In fact, due to Willis's lifelong friendly skull-tapping, the rambunctious rocker acquired a permanent mark of discoloration on his forehead. Contained within the punk rock star's indestructible skull was a brain that demanded his body to endlessly draw pictures of freeways and cars, solve complex (but pointless) math equations, and write songs about his lifelong obsessions; including (but not limited to): Ronald Reagan, McDonald's Big Macs, police, demons, and corrupt governments. Despite his completely genuine interest in creating art, Wesley Willis made no lie of his affinity for cash-money. Like a fat kid in a candy store, Willis was known to go into music stores and buy the finest keyboards and accessories. In Joyrides, some of Willis's buying frenzies are intimately documented. Willis's in-store demonic freak-outs are candidly presented in the documentary as well. Wesley Willis had an extremely tragic and violent childhood which seems to be the root of the demons that would haunt him for the rest of his burdensome life. During Joyrides, it is revealed that Willis started hearing devilish voices after his deranged convicted felon stepfather beat him. Unsurprisingly, when Willis was a child, he and his brother were taken away from their negligent parents. As a result of his unforgettable misfortunes, Wesley Willis left his childhood ghetto in Chicago and hoped to never look back. In one particularly disturbing scene, Wesley Willis emotionally tells about how he was sliced in the face by a fellow brotha' during a violent robbery. Luckily, Wesley Willis started many friendships with bourgeois artists who were sympathetic towards his plight, henceforth allowing the rocker to crash in their homes. Of course, Wesley Willis was certainly no freeloader as he eventually earned his own cash when his band The Wesley Willis Fiasco became somewhat successful in the early 1990s. Naturally, many of Willis's lifelong friends recollect their happy – as well as agitating – experiences with the possessed rock star in Joyrides.

As discussed by his various friends in Joyrides, white liberal media darlings felt that Wesley Willis was being exploited by his loyal white punk rocker fans. During the documentary, former Dead Kennedys singer Jello Biafra – who owns the punk record label Alternative Tentacles (which released some of Willis's albums) – states that “misguided bleeding heart liberals” are totally ignorant in their assertion that Willis was exploited by whites with ulterior motives. It goes without saying that white liberals were offended by Wesley Willis's “white” style of music. After all, white liberals – being cannibalistic self-loathing sadomasochists – love to promote exotic Negro music as its alien character and Negro spirit give them the satisfaction that they are destroying their own peoples culture, therefore Willis's music fell out of line with their culture-distorting agenda. It is indubitably quite hypocritical how white liberals never see proud savage rappers like 50 Cent and DMX as pseudo-artists that blatantly exhibit and promote the worst stereotypes associated with black American culture. Wesley Willis was certainly not a criminal, crackhead, rapist, nor a posturing baboon, but a man whose greatest interest was making people happy with his heartwarming persona and original outsider art. Due to Willis's traumatic experiences as a child, he was deathly afraid of his hometown. In Joyrides, some of the artist's friends state that he had a greater exaggerated fear of his black community than that of rich white liberals who live in gated communities. Wesley Willis's absurdist lyricism and songs have been dubbed by some as “savant-garde”, no doubt a musical style that is exclusive to one individual. I see Wesley Willis as the white Daniel Johnston; only less neurotic and more charismatic. Willis and Johnston seem to have also shared similar obsessions. Whereas Johnston wrote a song entitled Casper The Friendly Ghost; Willis wrote a song called "Casper the Homosexual Friendly Ghost." Willis's life would make for an excellent bio-pic flick as his personal story of struggle is certainly more captivating and unconventional than the one told in the Hollywood film The Soloist (2009), but it is doubtful such a work would ever be made, thus, for now, Wesley Willis's Joyrides must be considered the definitive cinematic work chronicling the neglected punk rock icon's fairly eventful life. Even during his remaining days on this earth (while dying in a hospital from chronic myelogenous leukemia), Wesley Willis remained jovial and continued to create music on his electronic keyboard. Whether you fancy Wesley Willis or not, Wesley Willis's Joyrides is an uplifting documentary that will make even the most bitter of pessimists see the world in a brighter light.

WESLEY WILLIS'S JOYRIDES

-Ty E

THE X-FILES: I WANT TO BELIEVE

Chris Carter (2008)

How could anyone not be excited? Made possible with the horrible marketing idea to release this after The Dark Knight hits theaters, this is one of those films that we were slightly excited for, but managed to slip past us and become one of those "That's out?" films. A sleeper film, if you will. I forgot this was even coming out until today, when I built up the film with the passion of a raging god. Lo and behold, It sucks. No wonder they kept a wrap on the specifics and dainty details of this film. So, a paedophile Catholic priest has visions of a kidnapped Jewish FBI agent and her whereabouts. It's up to the sinful Catholic to save the soul of a Jew in this extremely un-tense thriller. Scully and Mulder are once again called in to head forth into "the darkness" in this incredibly bland TV drama. Like a bad episode, they stick with boring phenomenon. How the X-Files clicked so well with me was it's raffish use of cryptzoology, abductions, and other wicked beasties that appear on screen. It's fairly uncommon to see these creatures with a serious entertainment personality. The Mothman, Jersey Devil, Bigfoot, and the Loch Ness were all amazing to view in this tense television series that also chronicled the ridiculous sexual tension between two of the greatest TV characters. Scully has a difficult time trusting the boy-bound blissful priest. The two lovers are torn between faith, belief in other-worldly conditions, and what's right. There has to be some conflict, right? I'd hate to bring in spoilers for a film that isn't out, but due to it being a few of the only scenes I liked, I see no harm in doing so. Near the end, in one of the "revelation" scenes, we witness a Re-Animator inspired scene that actually got a shock from me. A distant death bed for a trans-gendered fantastical operation. Those crazy Russians. Who'd have thought the latest film to jump on the "Horrorifying world of Eastern Europe" would be an X-Files film? The plot is bland, the script is bland, and art direction is generically ripped from Fargo. If the new X-Files movie were a cereal, it would be the Wheaties of the bunch. No sugar and spice here; just classic drivel. I really wanted to love this. I did enjoy parts of it. I wanted to believe that this would be worth my ever-lasting time, but sadly it wasn't. This film disregards most of the X-Files timeline and creates a modern day world for the two ex-FBI agents. A watered down psychic story with a bullshit "twist." Gillian Anderson never ceases to get more and more beautiful with age though. Much like a fine wine. Much better than the first film. At least they did one thing right.

-mAQ

THE IMAGE
THE IMAGE

Chris Pettit (1975)

Maybe it is because he studied filmmaking with German Dadaist auteur Hans Richter (Dreams That Money Can Buy, Dadascope), privately studied acting under visionary American theatre director Harold Clurman, and/or had the opportunity to watch and edit some of the best films in the world, especially those directed by Ingmar Bergman, as a film trailer editor for Janus Films (the parent company of the Criterion Collection), but American Jewish auteur Radley Metzger aka 'Henry Paris' (The Lickerish Quartet, The Opening of Misty Beethoven) somehow developed into one of the most shockingly artful and literate pornographers of cinema history. In fact, before looking into his background, I assumed Metzger was some sort of European arthouse director comparable to Liliana Cavani whose career stagnated and who was forced to make sexploitation and porn flicks to pay the bills. The first Metzger film I ever saw was The Image (1975) aka The Mistress and the Slave aka The Punishment of Anne aka L'image aka Lesclave du plaisir—a work based on an S&M-themed erotic novella by L'Image (1956) by Jean de Berg (the penname of Catherine Robbe-Grillet, the wife of novelist/filmmaker Alain Robbe-Grillet)—and I must admit that I was somewhat offended by the film's cultivated literary qualities, as if the director was so pathologically pompous that he wanted to pretend he was more than just a pornographer. Since then, I have somewhat warmed up to Metzger's oeuvre, especially after seeing his porn chic magnum opus The Opening of Misty Beethoven (1975), and after reading an article from the British yellow journalism site the Daily Mail about the source writer Catherine Robbe-Grillet's contractual sex slavery to her demented director hubby Alain, I felt it was about time to re-watch The Image as it deals with similar themes regarding the master and slave dynamics of sexuality. The suavely sordid and salacious tale of a writer who begins a sadomasochistic ménage à trios with an old female friend and her young female sex slave lover (played by Mary Mendum aka Rebecca Brooke, who was Metzger's real-life girlfriend at the time), The Image is essentially a Europeanized bourgeois blue movie that was clearly specially tailored for cultivated Anglo-Americans and Europeans, but was ironically directed by an American Hebrew with a special predilection for blonde Aryan pussies and classic Occidental art and literature. Told in a sleek and easy-to-follow literary style that is divided into ten chapters (with pretentious titles like "The Roses in Bagatelle Gardens" and "Too Much Water and Its Consequences"), The Image is the sort of film Georges Bataille might have directed had he been a boobeiose Euro-preppy instead of a nasty Nietzschean anarchist.

Jean (Carl Parker)—a young and dashing fellow who looks sort of like a Jewish Arnold Schwarzenegger—is a hot jetsetter writer with airs of superiority who knows all the other people in Paris, but as he complains at the beginning of The Image, "I detest literary cocktail parties as anyone who attends them regularly should if he has any self-respect at all." Luckily for him, Jean attends a hip and happening cocktail party at the beginning of the film that will change his life forever (or at least for the foreseeable future). Not long after arriving at the party, Jean spots a young blonde Aryan babe named Anne (Mary Mendum aka Rebecca Brooke) and soon discovers she's the 'kept woman' and voluntary sex slave girlfriend of his old friend Claire (Marilyn Roberts). Jean has not seen Claire for about 2 or 3 years, but he never suspected she was a lecherous lady-licker with a sexually sadistic side. Not surprisingly, Jean has next to nil sexual interest in old slag Claire, who resembles a frigid dyke high school administrator on the cusp of menopause, but he becomes instantly infatuated with young and luscious Anne and, since he has an entire month to write a mere article for his joke of a job, he spends all his free time driving around Paris in an attempt to chase down and get to know the young nympho, even going so far as borderline-stalking the submissive little lady. For their first big date together (they previously ate dinner with one another), Jean, Anne, and Claire go to Château de Bagatelle gardens and the writer ultimately gets to see the young concubine's rosy flesh flower for the first time. After Claire pricks Anne's genital region with the thorn of a red rose, Jean watches with fetishistic delight. Of course, Jean becomes even more aroused after Claire forces Anne to urinate in front of him on the same rose that was used to prick her skin. Needless to say, Jean becomes hooked on little Annie and uses any opportunity he can find to be with her. Luckily, Claire is not a greedy gal and invites Jean for a BDSM session that eventually evolves into a full-blown, if not bizarre and one-sided, ménage à trios. Indeed, fist-fucking in fancy restaurants and threesomes in clothing store dressing rooms with the salesgirl are just a couple of things Jean and Anna do together. Of course, in the end everything eventually comes toppling down during the ninth chapter of The Image, 'The Gothic Chamber,' when Claire's jealous side is finally unleashed when she notices that Jean rather enjoys screwing Anne and vice versa. After Jean gets down performing passionate coitus on Anne, Claire brutally attacks him with a bondage whip as if he is one of her slaves and throws the writer out of her house, but not before the concubine gangs up on him too and smashes a wine bottle over his handsome little head. Of course, Claire also beats Anne with the whip and the degraded concubine ultimately decides to leave her mistress forever. In a rather absurd twist (Jean mentions at the beginning of the film he had nil sexual interest in Claire), Jean and Claire get together and the latter ultimately goes from being a demanding dominator to being the one dominated.

A sort of more merry than morbid mix between Conversation Piece (1974) aka Gruppo di famiglia in un interno directed by Luchino Visconti, The Story of O (1975) aka Histoire d'O directed by Just Jaeckin, and Fruits of Passion (1981) aka Les fruits de la passion directed by Shûji Terayama, albeit more pornographic and lacking any sort of serious socio-political subtext, The Image is undoubtedly a cinematic work that, although gorgeously photographed and nearly immaculately directed, I can only recommend to fateful fans of porn chic and those interested in a film that authentically portrays S&M sex. Of course, compared to a brutal sadomasochistic sodomite fuck flick like Jacques Scandelari's New York City Inferno (1978) aka Cock Tales, The Image seems exceedingly tame and conspicuously contrived, although both films conclude with a similar message regarding the power dynamics of sex regarding how the so-called 'masochist' is the one who is really in control, sort of like The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972) minus the melodramatic acting, intellectual meat, and sophisticated subtext. Personally, I have never understood the appeal of S&M and BDSM, so I got no thrill out of seeing two jaded jetsetters routinely sexually ravaging a dumb young girl with mommy issues (Anne and Claire looked so much alike that the former could have been the latter's daughter). Interestingly, Catherine Robbe-Grillet—the woman who wrote the novel that The Image is based on—was her husband's virtual sex slave for over ½ a century, but she must have learned from the best because after her husband died she would become the master of a South African woman that is 31 years her junior. Admittedly, I would not mind if Radley Metzger got back behind the camera and directed a sequel to The Image based on the marriage between the Robbe-Grilletts. After all, something tells me that the man responsible for penning and directing Eden and After (1970) aka L'Éden et après and Glissements progressifs du plaisir (1974) aka Successive Slidings of Pleasure would be a more interesting character for a film than the pretty philistine protagonist of The Image. As for auteur Radley Metzger, one must assume he is a sadist as he managed to convince his then girlfriend to be filmed urinating, physically brutalized, and engaged in lesbo sex for the silver-screen, thus lending The Image a certain undeniable authenticity that similar works lack.

THE IMAGE

-Ty E

LONG PIGS

Chris Power (2010)

Collecting buzz during certain festivals and garnering a heap of awards, Long Pigs is a "mockumentary" fit to the design of Man Bites Dog, directed by two amateur filmmakers, Chris Power and Nathan Hynes. Following a cannibal during many of his exploits, not much is known about the characters within the film other than what is supplied over the course of dialog. The two hopeful documentarians created this "found footage" we have before us. Supplementing not just casual shadow to the serial killer but also interviews with members of the police force, families of Anthony McAlister's victims, and the ramblings of a radio jockey, Long Pigs is an independent Canadian horror film that stretches what low-budget found footage has to offer. Throughout the runtime, Long Pigs makes it very apparent that the brain-trust isn't within the gore but the interactions with the characters and the ending that we all foresee coming. In fact, the scenes of violence we're gifted with are anything but exploitative, rather, short and shocking. One scene that comes to mind is Anthony's slinging of a victim and demonstrating the "Gein configuration" that was also graphically utilized in Marian Dora's Cannibal. A time lapsed dissection of a hanging corpse is set to The Nutcracker Suite, a poor choice of music that only hampers the effect of butchery and is one of the few drawbacks of Long Pigs that can't be attested to budgetary restraints.

As a recurring theme in films favoring cannibalism as an arch, Long Pigs' Anthony McAlister too realizes the accessible whore being the easiest form of cuisine, especially with time being not of luxury. This was also given a degree of insight in the recent Mexican cannibal film - We Are What We Are. As with that same film, Long Pigs digresses the art of selection with victims that aren't exactly a high point of society, sans the little girl who was abducted prior. After picking up a hefty heifer off the street corner, the talk radio host chimes in with his two cents concerning the rash of vanishing prostitutes. Going in Long Pigs, you can toss your Pretty Woman dreams out the window as there is no classy whores to be found within. Although not the topic nor main prey of the film, there are enough connotations behind Anthony's cleaning of the streets to guarantee a reaction from whiny articulate women. Again pleasuring the genre of documentary, we're given plenty of face time from Anthony McAlister while he discusses the politics of cannibalism, bringing up many insightful arguments. What is consistent with culinary arts and the psychological reaction to self-prepared dishes is that they always taste better created with your own hands. Would this not remain constant with the product of cooking human flesh? The hunger they feel isn't too inhuman, is it?

Long Pigs may be the biggest independent surprise I've experienced in quite some time. The acting is exemplary and the filmmaking style, although cheap and cost-effective, benefits the overall tone of this dark and lurid comedy. The cannibalistic musings of our lead topic outperform most other films that attend to this "found footage" trend that has begun popping up recently in various corners of horror. Inspired by select segments from Faces of Death and Man Bites Dog, Long Pigs is a healthy dose of slaughter and drama, stripped of artistry but with the inclusion of a wonderful character actor. Intelligent and barbaric to boot, this is pseudo-snuff done correctly - an inspired sketch for other filmmakers to take pointers from. If anything deserves to be critical upon, it would be the admittance of various other forms of storytelling, namely the random personalities being interviewed. While necessary, it causes the pacing of Long Pigs to collect and temporarily halt the process of progress. As is, this macabre tale of a cannibal in hiding, seething above the city streets, a sociable chameleon, is a wonderful work of low budget horror filmmaking and is worthy of most praise it may receive. What makes this film even better is the addition of beef jerky with a limited pressing of the DVD. A modern example of creativity boosting a product.

LONG PIGS

-mAQ

BLACK RAGE

Chris Robinson (1972)

I welcome cinematic oddities with open arms. Anything outside of conventions, I will take in under my loving wing. Sometimes, you got to learn how to just say no to films. Today, I'm spitting in the face of a film called Black Rage. As cunning and nonsensical the plot is, there should have been more to it or at least some of this promised Negro fury. I wanted to see a slave thug out into his societal standpoint of the present. All I got was the white director playing an "albino nigger". Chris Robinson served as the director, co-writer, and star of this film also known as Charcoal Black. The storyline was in print. 2 black men uncover an entirely illegible treasure map consisting of tiny bones which serve no purpose. When their Bronson-looking "massa" takes the map from them, the white black guy charges him, steals the map, and takes his black brother on a quest through a swamp to uncover hypothetical treasure. If you haven't figured it out by now, this screenplay wholly resembles the Coen Brother's film O Brother, Where Art Thou? which was based on a poem entitled The Odyssey. I can agree personally with the Coen's adaptation but I frown infinitely upon Robinson's attempt. While scavenging for information regarding this film, I stumbled upon an iMDB review stating that his friend got ill from watching this film. Funny, I fell asleep in the credits and woke up with a migraine. In the end, I was in a hallucinogenic haze. I didn't know where I was or who I was. More importantly, the only thing that I could remember was the ending of this film, or lack thereof. They do not find the treasure, his white "nigger brother" was killed in an extremely pussified shootout that went as far as to calculating reload times and slave and master form some form of cinematic bond which would be more controversial than Song of the South. All in all, this film struck me as a wannabe blaxploitation film that tried too hard to integrate races and cease conflicts. For a self-proclaimed adventure film, not much goes on. This has almost zero entertainment value. You visually peruse through the characters attempting to find some golden detail you missed but it all falls flat. None of these characters are appealing, none of the action is entertaining, and the racial boundary it attempts to flutter over never existed. Whiteface it isn't. Just some crusty old white guy. How disappointing.

-mAQ

STEPHEN KING'S TRUCKS
STEPHEN KING'S TRUCKS

Chris Thomson (2000)

I will admit in the introduction to this review that i did not even begin to finish this disgusting piece of cinematic atrocities. If there indeed was a celluloid holocaust, Trucks would be it. A fine piece of cinematic cheesiness would be Maximum Overdrive starring the wonderful Emilio "EMILLIIIOOOOO" Estevez as that can-do American who helps hold down a fortress from haywire machines bent on human carnage. The short story Trucks by everyone's favorite horror maestro King was adapted into film twice. First up to bat was King's own directorial effort retitled to Maximum Overdrive, which has a title that displays its exploitation themes. The second was a decades later made-for-TV adaptation called Trucks. The title itself is a step down for such a classic horror story. Apparently, this TV adaptation was closer to the novel. Most literary pricks would feel the need to prefer the closer film to the novel, but i argue for the defendant. Trucks had a very rustic look to it. There was too much dust on the set and gave it a sandy, grimy feeling. I needed to take a shower afterwards. The violence was severely toned down, and was missing classic scenes as a small lot of Little Leaguers getting killed by cans of cola. On the other hand, Trucks did have a family friendly rating and was a good stepping stone into horror for children. Objection! If Maximum Overdrive had one thing going for it; I could pick only one thing, It would be the iconic Goblin truck; The truck that resembled Marvel's Green Goblin. Trucks just had boring dump trucks and semi's. Your Honor, the bland characters on Trucks are overshadowed by their own vagrant dysfunctions. Divorce and military brat's don't make amazing dialogue, but goofy tourists and secret weapons stockpiler's do. Stephen King might have hated himself for Maximum Overdrive, but i hate him more for allowing Trucks to be made. Even the tag line for Trucks attempted to cash in off of the comedy-horror element of Maximum Overdrive. The jury hereby finds the defendant.....not guilty! We sentence the plaintiff, Chris Thomson, to a horrendous career directing shitty television programs. Case dismissed.

-mAQ

ANTIBODIES

Christian Alvart (2005)

Christian Alvart's Antibodies is another serial killer film. People are obviously going to compare it with Silence of the Lambs and Se7en. Although at a much lower budget, Antibodies is a more interesting and a complex film. Director Alvart substitutes action sequences and fast paced entertainment with philosophical biblical questions and masturbation. Antibodies is mainly set in rural Germany giving the film a new type of feel. I wouldn't be surprised if Alvart was inspired by Clean, Shaven and its dark look into rural America. At points, both films have a similar feeling. Not to mention both films feature naked and mutilated bodies of little girls. Antibodies distances the viewer from the serial killer (unlike most Hollywood serial killer films). The majority of Hollywood serial killer films glamorize the killer. Not too many people are fans of pedophilic child killers. The problem with serial killer films is that not many of them are innovative. Antibodies features many of the conventions associated with the serial killer film. The difference is that the protagonist and hero is the most important character. I could care less about Jodie Foster in Silence of the Lambs and Morgan Freeman in Se7en. The protagonist in Antibodies is a family man with an internal battle over good vs. evil. I found myself forgetting about the killer in Antibodies. Keep in mind the actor playing the killer did an excellent job with the part. Antibodies isn't the most original and intelligent film ever made. It is however very thrilling, entertaining, well written, and even has a good message. Antibodies is evidence that mainstream directors could make better films if they put a tiny bit of extra effort into them. Director Christian Alvart's upcoming film Case 39 stars Renée Zellweger. It will be interesting to see how that film turns out.

-Ty E

THOMAS HARLAN - WANDERSPLITTER
THOMAS HARLAN - WANDERSPLITTER

Christoph Hübner (2007)

Undoubtedly, few post-WWII German filmmakers/playwrights/novelists so flagrantly epitomized ethno-masochism and cultural cuckoldry than the late and less than great Thomas Harlan (Torre Bela, Wundkanal), the seemingly half-deranged prodigal son of the great National Socialist auteur Veit Harlan (Opfergang, Kolberg). A man that had the positively priceless honor of dining with Uncle Adolf in 1937 at the mere age of 8 and whose father was one of the greatest, if not the greatest, filmmakers of the Third Reich, Thomas Harlan, not unlike many Germans of his generation who inherited a less than ideal legacy of shame and defeat, grew up to be a 'Teutonic Uncle Tom' of sorts by deleteriously dedicating his life to treasonously besmirching both his father and Fatherland and who wasted a good portion of his life exposing so-called 'war crimes' and directing relatively forgotten films like Wundkanal (1984), where he interrogated and even physically assaulted an elderly ex-SS officer in a mock trial interrogation carried out by fictional RAF-esque left-wing terrorists (the sort of people Harlan admired/mimicked). In the glaringly minimalistic and even amateurish YouTube-esque documentary Thomas Harlan - Wandersplitter (2007) aka Thomas Harlan - Moving Shrapnel directed by Christoph Hübner, Harlan gives a candid bastardized verbal autobiography of sorts regarding his fetishism for the 'beloved Soviet Union' (Harlan's words, not mine), his lifelong campaign of spiritual and aesthetic patricide, and his feeling of self-flagellating indebtedness as the less than proud progeny of a naughty nazi filmmaker who dedicated his life to exposing the ostensible horrors of the nazi era (despite the fact he personally witnessed Soviet Asiatic hordes rape and murder elderly German women). Although seeming like it was shot in a couple hours in a carelessly leisurely manner, Wandersplitter was filmed between 2003 and 2006 in the author/filmmaker's ugly and thoroughly institutional room in a Southern German sanatorium (ironically, the clinic had a view of Obersalzberg, which is best known for being the location Uncle Adolf's scenic residence, the Berghof) near Berchtesgarden. Resembling a sad and defeated old pug dog who is so disillusioned with life that he no longer even derives pleasure from eating food, Wandersplitter is a positively perturbing and pathetic digital video portrait of Deutschland's most degenerated member of 'film royalty.' Indeed, when you have a left-wing Dutch-British-Jew like Ian Buruma stating (as he did of Thomas Harlan) that you were, "an obsessive seeker of justice, a Nazi hunter in Poland, a Communist revolutionary in Portugal and Chile, and a lifelong critic of his father. He was the son, who took on the burden of guilt from an unrepentant father," you must have some serious problems.

Quasi-morbidly obese, lacking even the most miniscule inkling of testosterone, and sporting a shabby head of white hair, Thomas Harlan resembles a burnt out retired lesbian who used to work as an American public school administrator and suffered some sort of mental break and was thus subsequently institutionalized. Indeed, a lonely man who is spending his remaining days living in a sterile room in a sanatorium (apparently, he was being treated for emphysema) with an outside view of Southern Krautland that he absurdly likens to China, Harlan's life has reached its end (he would die in 2010 at the age of 81), though one gets the impression while watching Wandersplitter that the spiritual death of the author/filmmaker/playwright happened long ago in 1945 when Germany was defeated in the Second World War and his surname forever became tainted with the legacy of his father's infamous melodrama Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß. Born in 1929 to German filmmaker Veit Harlan and Viennese actress Hilde Körber, Harlan had a relatively prestigious childhood as a privileged little boy that got to dine with Uncle Adolf (who he refers to as a 'fakir'), hanging out with Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels, and routinely receiving rare Reich stamps (rather unfortunately, the stamps were later stolen by some frog while Harlan was living in Paris during the 1950s) from official National Socialist photographer Heinrich Hoffmann. By 1945, Thomas Harlan witnessed the mangled corpses of 80-year-old women who had been gang-raped by Soviet Mongol hordes, but instead of growing up to be a stern anti-communist, he became of a commie of sorts himself, taking pilgrimages to the Soviet Union, Israel, and Poland during the 1950s. Moving to Poland in 1960, Harlan researched nazi concentration camps and eventually began getting sued by a number of ex-nazi politicians who he started making libelous claims against, which eventually resulted in the loss of his German passport and ability to legally enter his own homeland. Harlan tells a number of these tales in a shockingly jubilant manner, but when it gets to the segment of Wandersplitter fittingly entitled 'Patricide,' he begins to shed a couple of tears, expressing his lifelong determination to no let his love of his father deter his treasonous anti-nazi commie activism. Most interestingly, Harlan confesses in what amounts to a sort of premature deathbed confession that he flirted with arson, setting fire to two Berlin movie theaters that played his father's movies, which included The Trip to Tilsit (1939) aka Die Reise nach Tilsit—an inferior anti-poetic remake of F.W. Murnau's American masterpiece Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927)—and The Immortal Heart (1939) aka Das unsterbliche Herz. As Harlan makes quite clear during the doc, he was most mad at his father for continuing to make films after the National Socialist era and for being acquitted of 'crimes against humanity' for his role as the auteur of Jud Süß, a film that was made mandatory-viewing for the SS men that sassed and gassed god's chosen race. According to Harlan, the man who acquitted his father also previously sentenced Ukrainian children to death for stealing a mere scarf and who also married a nazi euthanasia doctor (someone else he had also previously acquitted in court). Since his father did not pay for his 'crimes,' Thomas Harlan thought it was his responsibility to do so, just as any white American bourgeois liberal wimp would.

THOMAS HARLAN - WANDERSPLITTER

As a number of his family members candidly confessed in the documentary Harlan: In the Shadow of Jew Süss (2008) directed by Felix Moeller, they felt Thomas Harlan had wasted his life due to his undying hatred of his father. Judging by his rather weak cinematic and literary output, Uncle Tom Teuton's attempt to 'follow' in his father's footsteps in a sort of antagonistic manner was also a failure. On top of only managing to direct three films (one of which, Torre Bela, is a communist agitprop 'doc') during his seemingly sporadic yet life-long filmmaking career, Harlan lacked an eye for beauty and the sort of angelic high-camp aestheticism that dominated his father's work. Indeed, Veit Harlan may have directed Jud Süß, which inspired a bit of hatred against hapless Hebrews, but Thomas Harlan's Wundkanal is nothing but seething celluloid hatred in its most pathetic form as American Jew Robert Kramer clearly revealed in his companion documentary Notre nazi (1985) aka Our Nazi, which features the patricidal commie kraut verbally and even physically berating an elderly gentleman (essentially a stand-in for his own father, who was by then already long dead) that he hired for his film under false pretenses. Aesthetically institutional and cold, Wandersplitter certainly makes for an apt bio of Thomas Harlan, a lunatic left-winger of the extra-extreme sort who lived in the past and who will ironically be forgotten before the father he loved-hated so dearly and undyingly. To his credit, Thomas Harlan was slightly less ethno-masochistic than his sister Susanne Körber, who not only married a holocaust survivor and converted to Judaism, but also committed suicide in 1989. Namedropping people like Isaak "the greatest prose writer of Russian Jewry" Babel and stating such absurd things as "Of course, as a child I was a member of the gang" (Harlan's summing up his role as a German child during the Third Reich), Thomas Harlan proved with Wandersplitter that, despite Hebraic Hollywood and the mainstream media's claims to contrary, post-WWII Europids, especially those of the Germanic/Nordic persuasion, are not only amongst the most self-flagellating and ethno-masochistic people in the world, but also the most empathetic and individualistic. After all, when has anyone ever heard a Jew cry about the anti-white genocides of Judeo-Bolshevik hangmen Kaganovich or Yagoda, or an American negro acknowledge the fact that his/her people are, collectively speaking, the most violent and murderous people in the present day United States. Indeed, white genocide will not be the result of Tyrone, Avi, Muhammad, and Carlos, but spiritually and mentally sick individuals like Thomas Harlan, a man that unwittingly singlehandedly proved the nazi generation had more dignity, integrity and pride than all the degenerate generations that followed it.

-Ty E

TUNGUSKA: THE CRATES ARE HERE

Christoph Schlingensief (1984)

As far as truly iconoclastic auteur filmmakers are concerned, you probably cannot do better than belated Teutonic Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensief (Mutter's Maske aka Mother's Mask, Kettensägenmassaker aka The German Chainsaw-Massacre) whose intricately incendiary cinematic works oftentimes straddled a refreshingly unhealthy line between tasteless scatological schlock and audacious avant-garde celluloid art. Indeed, one of the most refreshing things about Schlingensief is that he was not afraid to savagely mock his greatest cinematic heroes into oblivion whilst using some of the most grotesque and infantile yet undeniably clever means imaginable. For example, in honor of one of his greatest cinematic heroes, the auteur had a real-life retarded mensch dress like Fassbinder—leather jacket, goofy hat, and all—in his cinematic (anti)love letter to New German Cinema Die 120 Tage von Bottrop (1997) aka 120 Days of Bottrop starring Fass regulars Udo Kier, Margit Carstensen, Irm Hermann and Volker Spengler. Of course, one could certainly easily argue that Schlingensief's entire cinematic oeuvre is both a ruthless critique of and tribute to cinema and cinema history, but probably none of his films are more obscenely obsessive with cinema history and its discontents than his first feature-length flick Tunguska - Die Kisten sind da (1984) aka Tunguska: The Crates Are Delivered. The final entry in a somewhat confounding triptych entitled 'Trilogy of Film Criticism - Film as Neurosis' that also includes the two shorts Phantasmus muss anders werden (1983) aka Phantasmus Go Home and Die Ungenierten kommen - Was happened to Magdalena Jung? (1983), Schlingensief's film is, if nothing else, that greatest and most hysterically hilarious assault on avant-garde cinema and experimental filmmakers that has ever been committed to celluloid. Featuring various surprisingly aesthetically pleasing avant-garde techniques throughout that demonstrate that Schlingensief was no novice when it came to masturbatory filmmaking skills, as well as seemingly random excerpts from early Teutonic experimental animator Oskar Fischinger's Komposition in Blau (1935) aka Composition in Blue and Kenneth Anger's Eaux d'artifice (1953), the film oftentimes feels like the extremely confused creation of the severely autistic bastard brood of Lotte Reiniger and Andy Milligan as a lavishly constructed low-camp abomination where the hopelessly horrendous acting and nonexistent storyline is only transcended by its startlingly striking beauty and corrosive comedic genius. Advertised by the film's distributor filmgalerie451 as "Schlingensief's way of getting even with German avant-garde film," the feverishly fucked little flick tells the quasi-tragicomic tale of a young and attractive married German couple on vacation that has the misfortune of getting stuck in an old dilapidated and figuratively haunted house with three decidedly deranged avant-garde film researchers after their car breaks down in the cold yet exotic hell that is Siberia. Needless to say, Tunguska is a must-see work for any semi-serious Schlingensiefel fan, though I am not sure I can recommend to Stan Brakhage fanboys, film students, or anyone else really aside.

TUNGUSKA: THE CRATES ARE HERE

A film that refreshingly mocks the megalomaniacal delusions of grandeur and overall social retardation that plagues many enterprising avant-garde filmmakers, Tunguska seems to be especially an intricate and semi-loving yet nonetheless brutal attack against Schlingensiefel's former mentor Werner Nekes, but it also has older and more cryptically autobiographical roots that date back to 1968 when the director was only 7 years old. Indeed, when he was just a wee lad that was best known as the son of a respected pharmacist, Schlingensiefel had the distinguished honor of attending the scandalous fourteenth annual 'International Short Film Festival,' which was held in his hometown of Oberhausen. Of course, 1968 was an important year for the budding young auteur as it was also when he shot his first 8mm film and resolved to begin an artistic career that he would eventually become (in)famous for as a cinematic iconoclast that ultimately proved to have more testicular fortitude than any of the cinematic upstarts that signed the legendary Oberhausen Manifesto (incidentally, Schlingensiefel would eventually befriend the manifesto's most famous signer Alexander Kluge). Deriving its title from both an enigmatic fictional film that debuted in 1967 but was scrapped shortly afterward due to disinterest and the somewhat mysterious Tunguska event of June 1908 when a cataclysmic explosion over the sparsely populated Eastern Siberian Taiga flattened 2,000 km² (770 sq mi) of forest in what was ultimately the largest known impact event on Earth in recorded history, Schlingensiefel's debut feature is also arguably the most insanely idiosyncratic take on the 'old dark house' mystery ever made (indeed, despite lacking grotesque bisexual porn featuring ugly people doing ugly sexual things, the film even puts Curt McDowell's Thundercrack! (1975) to shame in terms of sheer abject absurdity). In terms of its preternatural poetical essence, crude cannibalization of various genre conventions, strange sardonic approach to Gothic themes, innately anarchic spirit, and dubious morality, Tunguska is like a kraut cinematic equivalent to Comte de Lautréamont's novel Les Chants de Maldoror aka The Songs of Maldoror.

Considering that Schlingensiefel's previous film in his 'Trilogy of Film Criticism - Film as Neurosis,' What happened to Magdalena Jung?, was an extremely loose reworking of German Conservative Revolutionary movement writer Ernst Jünger's book Das abenteuerliche Herz. Figuren und Capriccios (1938) aka The Adventurous Heart: Figures and Capriccios, it is only fitting that Tunguska—a uniquely unpretentious cinematic work that, quite ironically, makes relatively practical use of somewhat pretentious avant-garde film techniques—makes a mockery out of a far-leftist counterculture kraut like Werner Nekes. Notably, Nekes would later bitch to Schlingensiefel that his next feature Menu Total (1986) was "a fascist film," so it almost seems like the auteur somehow had a promodition that his mentor would eventually trash his films and thus trashed him in advance in a most silly yet nonetheless quite artistically fruitful fashion. Notably, the reason Schlingensiefel opted to direct a film about a tyrannical trio of avant-garde scientists on road to North Pole to show Eskimos experimental films was because, as the auteur states in the doc Christoph Schlingensiefel und seine Filme (2005) aka Christoph Schlingensiefel and His Films directed by Frieder Schlaich, “That’s where I thought experimental film was headed.” In short, unlike hyper hermetic avant-gardist like Nekes, Schlingensiefel always wanted to make films that were seen by all sorts of people and not just fellow autistic filmmakers that are involved in a sort of perennial circle jerk like Jonas Mekas and his pals. As Schlingensiefel also explained in Schlaich’s doc, “After these two films [PHANTASUS and MAGDALENA JUNG] I naturally developed a latent rage against Nekes. I thought, why should I become Nekes? What’s with all this crap? [...] I wanted to separate myself.” Needless to say, despite the fact that some of his films like the preposterously titled T-Wo-Men (1972) and Der Tag Des Malers (1997) aka The Day of the Painter feature hot Sapphic pornographic action between hot twat kraut counterculture carpet-munchers, Tunguska is easily more enthralling than anything that Herr Nekes has ever directed (though I must admit that I have a softspot for Nekes’ Uliisses (1982) simply due to the fact that it features punk dyke diva Tabea Blumenschein in a rather striking performance).

In Tunguska, the viewer watches in abject anticipation as a collectively crazed trio of over-the-hill and fairly physically grotesque experimental filmmakers-cum-researchers use various form of vintage experimental cinema as a means to debase, subjugate, and brainwash individuals until they become psychosis-ridden followers of the “new filmic language” (aka avant-garde religion). The Führer of the filmic dictatorship is a lecherous lard ass named Roy Glas (legendary New German Cinema character actor Alfred Edel of Alexander Kluge’s post-Auschwitz exercise in ethno-masochism Die Artisten in der Zirkuskuppel: Ratlos (1968) aka The Artist in the Circus Dome: Clueless), who runs a largely imaginary empire of cinematic derangement. Seemingly inspired by the artistic theories of Carl Jung, Glas somewhat dubiously believes that the only way a true avant-garde cinema can emerge is if it is rid of neurosis (personally, I think a great deal of avant-garde art is the direct result of neurosis and psychosis, but I digress). Not unlike Nekes and his one-time wife Dore Oberloskamp (aka Dore O.), Glas’ foremost collaborator is his similarly insane scientist spouse Ireen Fitzler (Anna Fechter). In a possible mocking reference to Nekes and his then-wife Dore’s first breakthrough film, Jüm-Jüm (1967), Tunguska begins with a prologue from the avant-garde antagonist describing the premiere of his eponymous film, which was an abject failure and thus, not unlike the majority of experimental films, regulated to the celluloid dustbin of history where it probably belongs. As an assumed result of the failure of his film (Glas never actually says whether or not he was the one that actually directed Tunguska), Glas and his compatriots sought to “find and explore news aspects of zeitgeist and expression of film” and they felt the best way to do so would be to take part in an absurdly nonsensical expedition to Antarctica to demonstrate to primitive Eskimos the ostensible power of experimental film. Unfortunately for Glas and his small team, which includes his wife Ireen and a four-eyed lunatic named Lossowitsch aka ‘Losso’ (Vladimir Konetzny), never made it to their location due to a plane crash and thus have been stranded in Siberia ever since in a thankfully relatively uninhabited area where few people will have the grand aesthetic misfortune of enduring their distinct brand of meta-authoritarian cinematic oppression. Unluckily for the film’s young married protagonists, Rolf (Mathias Colli, who went on to co-write, assistant direct, and star in Schlingensiefel’s Veit Harlan reworking Mutters Maske (1988) aka Mother’s Mask) and Tina (Irene Fischer, who went on to become a writer/actress on Hans W. Geissendörfer’s long running TV series Lindenstraße), their tiny red car breaks down in Siberia and they soon find themselves being emotionally, psychologically, and aesthetically terrorized by Glas and his oppressive goofball Gestapo.

TUNGUSKA: THE CRATES ARE HERE

If you are looking for any sense of sanity or traditional logical in Tunguska, you surely will not find it, but one should not expect anything less from a Schlingensiefel flick where spaštic acting, compulsive spontaneity, and cryptic and not-so-cryptic dark yet surprisingly mirthful humor runs rampant. Indeed, like virtually all of the director’s cinematic works, the film completely blurs the line between nightmarish farce and melancholy fever dream, as well as aesthetic nihilism and super sophisticated schlock. In short, Schlingensiefel seems to make no lie of the fact that he intends to torture and aesthetically assault you just like the film’s gluttonous villain Glas, yet he does it with a knowing smirk like a demonic schoolboy who has just lit a bag of shit on fire on his good Catholic next-door neighbor’s front porch. Featuring Schlingensiefel himself under the assumed pseudonym ‘Christoph Krieg’ as a raving mad man who speaks of hope for humanity and other frivolous deluded fantasies before being violently murdered by an infantile retard, the film is a genre-molesting absurdist allegory that is packed with perverse poetry, sassy sadism, and surprisingly practical experimental techniques. A foreboding fairytale full of loudmouthed psychosis-ridden monsters and mumbling brain-damaged degenerates, Tunguska plays a pernicious game with classic genre conventions that Gothic horror, romance, mystery, sci-fi, and thriller genres and is glued together with avant-garde effects in what might be described as the filmic equivalent of a Teutonic tranny Frankenstein monster on bad acid. Not unlike many of the films of Jean-Luc Godard, it is immediately apparent while watching Schlingensiefel’s debut that it was directed by a man that lives and breathes film and wholly believes “cinema is everything” and “everything is cinema.” In other words, it seems that Schlingensiefel himself also suffers from a sort of cinematic psychosis, but unlike Nekes and the avant-garde researchers depicted in Tunguska, he at least realizes it and is brave and auda-scious enough to mock and ridicule those who believe Peter Kubelka is the second coming of Christ and that Hollis Frampton is an immaculate cinema god among men.

If the lovable retard Arnie played by a very young Leonardo DiCaprio in Lasse Hallström's What's Eating Gilbert Grape (1993) had an all the more mentally challenged Teutonic brother with ambiguous magical powers, it would probably be Herr Norbert (Norbert Schlieve, who once notably worked as an animator for Nekes). Norbert is an exceedingly erratic, unpredictably violent, and somewhat mysterious man-child of the fairly unhinged sort who has been trapped in the wilds of Siberia ever since he was involved in a plane crash that apparently killed his entire family, including his much beloved sister. Upon looking at a magical mushroom in the woods, Norbert sees an image of married couple Rolf and Tina and thus knows they are stranded somewhere in the area, though he is initially too shy to approach them. When Rolf and Tina eventually find Norbert lurking inside a somewhat sinister dilapidated house that they have yet to discover is the home to the avant-garde researchers, they are somewhat startled by him. While Rolf initially comforts Norbert by acting as a sort of loving paternal figure to him, the unpredictable retard somewhat freaks out Tina when he mistakes her for his dead sister. For whatever reason, Herr Norbert also has an affinity for pulling Tina's hair while repeatedly proclaiming that she is his sister. While Tina is certainly more mentally balanced than Norbert, they will both ultimately fall under the spell of the preposterous cinematic brainwashing of Glas and his gang, thus leaving poor Rolf to fend for himself when it comes to maintaining his sanity in a subtly morbid world of cinematic mind-games and cineaste oriented groupthink.

The next day after spending their first night at the half-ruined house that might be best described as cine-maniac manor, the married couple gets somewhat of a surprise when another dubious weirdo, a less than sane and creepily hospitable semiotician named Major Pater Hilf aka 'Major Father Help' (Schlingensiefel), knocks on the door of the house, aggressively introduces himself, and then randomly picks up Tina and clumsily drops her on the floor. For whatever reason, Major Help takes Rolf and Tina mountain climbing and then starts a fire that he more or less proclaims is a symbol of hopeful redemption for all of humanity. When Major Help demonstrates his latent sadistic side by daring to attempt to burn Herr Norbert's hand in the fire, the unpredictable retard immediately gets his revenge by using Rolf's car to run over and ultimately kill the zany semiotician. Before unwittingly proving that his fiery symbol of hope is totally worthless by dying not far from it, Major Help uses his last couple minutes of life to sing a melancholic pop song to Rolf and Tina on an electronic keyboard that magically appears out of nowhere. At this point in the film, it seems like hope is nothing more than an absurdist joke that will never be encountered by the married protagonists, who soon come to realize that there is no more hellish fate than to fall prey to the nonsensical esoteric ramblings and uniquely unsavory schemes of the outstandingly arrogant avant-garde filmmakers that haunt the area. Indeed, as Rolf and Tina soon discover, they would be much better off if the house that they are staying out was haunted by ghosts instead of a trio of compulsively conniving charlatan filmmakers.

TUNGUSKA: THE CRATES ARE HERE

When Rolf and Tina finally encounter avant-garde researcher Roy Glas and his two equally demented minions, they are immediately trapped in a pernicious autistic psychodrama involving warped mind games and reckless displays of unhinged hedonism. In a scene where Glas and his crew watch experimental footage of Tina frolicking through a forest in an exceedingly elegant fashion, it is hinted that the mad avant-garde scientists have been spying on the protagonist ever since they reached Siberia. Naturally, Glas takes an instant liking to the fairy sexy Tina and even dares to put his hand on her thigh right on front of her hubby Rolf while verbally mocking him. When Glas' wife Ireen declares there is an emergency and claims there is some sort of an accident, it is later revealed that she just wanted to use Rolf's car to pick up some booze. Undoubtedly, Glas' supreme arrogance and vanity is only transcended by his grotesque displays of gluttony, thus Rolf and Tina spend much of their time watching the megalomaniac savagely chewing on seemingly half-cooked animal flesh while talking bullshit. Rolf oftentimes has his two comrades collectively shout in vain the Nazi-esque "Strength and power," especially when they are viewing one of their avant-garde atrocities (one of which is the above mentioned footage of Tina looking like quite the elegantly dressed Fräulein while frolicking through a forest). Of course, it does not take long before Glas has Rolf and Tina go through torturous sessions of avant-garde brainwashing. Indeed, during one of such sinister sessions, Glas' stone cold Himmler-esque minion Lossowitsch jumps around with a white sheet over his body like a spastic ghost as Kenneth Anger's Eaux d'artifice is projected over his chest while the avant-garde researchers loudly chant incoherent avant-garde nonsense. Needless to say, when Glas cryptically asks Rolf "Fischlinger or Eggeling?" in reference to early experimental Aryan animators Oskar Fischinger and Viking Eggeling, the protagonist has no clue what he is talking about. Unfortunately, Tina is brainwashed with Glas' 'filmic language' as demonstrated by her bizarre behavior during the screening and later that night when she tells Rolf a seemingly nonsensical bedtime story with a strange happy ending involving a "bad dance instructor in Tunguska" and a mob of animated blue building blocks that kill their creators but not said bad dance instructor. The blue blocks are eventually revealed to be in reference to Fischinger's animated short Komposition in Blau, which Tina dreams about after she falls asleep.

While Rolf and Tina eventually manage to escape the avant-garde researchers home even though the latter seems to have developed Stockholm syndrome as demonstrated by her strange and innately irrational cult-like affection for Glas and his gleefully sadistic comrades, the only gas attendant (Schlingensiefel regular Sergej Gleitmann) in the area refuses to give them gas, thereupon leaving them stuck in Siberia. In a belligerent fit of self-destructive desperation, Tina opts to steal Rolf's car and then drive it off a cliff, thus resulting in her death via skull fracture. With his beloved Tina dead and nowhere to go, Rolf desperately runs back to the avant-gardist's lair and informs them of his wifey's untimely demise. Needless to say, Mr. Norbert, who believes Tina is sister, seems just as emotionally shattered as Rolf by the female protagonist's tragic demise. As for Glas and his crew, they seem rather unaffected by Tina's death and set it fit to burn her body on some rocks near a lake in what seems like a sacrificial burning pyre to the gods of avant-garde cinema. While Rolf mentally deteriorates so badly that he tries to join the avant-garde cult, Glas and his crew opt to steal his car and leave him stranded in Siberia. Indeed, it seems Rolf is just not good enough to join the cult as indicated by Glas' elitist remark, "No, Rolf, we're too different. Tina is dead!" In what is indubitably a sad reflection of his progressive psychological degeneration, Rolf also somehow forgets that Tina is dead and goes looking for her around the researcher's lair in a Norbert-esque fashion, as if he is in denial that his ladylove is gone forever. Not surprisingly, it seems that Glas was only interested in titillating Tina, hence his almost seemingly pathological tendency to mock her marriage to Rolf. Additionally, before the mad scientist trio steals Rolf's car and leaves the protagonist stranded in the bowels of Siberia, Losowitsch sternly states, "We make solitudinarians!," as if to rub in the recently widowed young man's face that a rather grim and lonely fate awaits him. In the end, the film concludes with an epilogue from Glas where he declares his research is a success and "Film as a form of neurosis. Our research continues." Of course, as demonstrated by his decidedly deleterious effect on the protagonists, it seems that Glas' research is a total failure as he spreads neurosis wherever he goes and seems to have absolutely no clue as to sire the psychosis-free avant-garde that he and his loyal compatriots dreams of.

While I have always had an appreciation for avant-garde and experimental cinema and am always interested in examining the cinematic oeuvres of the most idiosyncratic of auteur filmmakers, I must admit that I have found most of these film directors to be obnoxiously obsessive one-track onanists whose cinematic works reflect the worse sort of impotent celluloid wankery. In that sense, it does not surprise me that Schlingensiefel's mentor Nekes incorporated pornographic imagery in his films, as it would not surprise me if the most arousing thing in the world to him was his own films. In that respect, I somewhat appreciate the sometimes literally masturbatory films of Paul Sharits (Ray Gun Virus, T,O,U,C,H,I,N,G), who seems to have ironically acknowledged in a tongue-in-cheek fashion the masturbatory nature of experimental cinema in general as opposed to succumbing to the banally calculating and unnervingly emotionally barren mathematical approach typical of the algorithmically-driven films created by other filmmakers associated with the Structural film movement. Incidentally, when Nekes attempted to direct a somewhat conventional comedy film, Johnny Flash (1986), it came off as a poor prude's take on a Schlingensief flick, thus revealing the extra esoteric auteur's seeming incapacity to create emotionally engaging cinematic works that appeal to people aside from fellow avant-garde filmmakers and half-crazed cineastes (incidentally, Schlingensief acted as a cinematographer on the film). As Tunguska reveals, a life revolving around arcane avant-garde filmmaking can only lead to pernicious and highly deleterious side-effects like psychosis, fits of rage and irritability, the loss of a wife or girlfriend, and/or an incapacity to appreciate emotionally engulfing films featuring lines of dialogue and sexy chicks with nice tits and shapely derrieres, among other things. Of course, the true genius of Tunguska is that it manages to alienated both autistic avant-garde cinema fanboys and culturally retarded philistines alike, but I guess one should not expect anything less from the debut feature of the singular auteur who was arguably the last great iconoclast of cinema.

TUNGUSKA: THE CRATES ARE HERE

By directing a film with blatant B movie and exploitation conventions featuring a cast of mostly quasi-retarded weirdos that most people would be petrified to touch with a ten-foot pool that relatively seamlessly utilizes a number of striking experimental tricks and techniques, Schlingensief managed to make a marvelous mockery of an ostensibly sacred realm of cinema history that has been safety guarded by avant-garde gatekeepers like Jonas Mekas and P. Adams Sitney for half a century. While I am admittedly probably more obsessed with experimental cinema than the average cinephile as reflected in my appreciation for filmmakers ranging from Frans Zwartjes (Living, Pentimento) to Ed Emshwiller (Lifelines, Thanatopsis) to Gregory J. Markopoulos (Twice a Man, The Illiac Passion) to Lloyd Michael Williams (Opus 5, Ursula) to Albie Thoms (Rita and Dundi, Marinetti) to Dietmar Brehm (Blicklust, Blah Blah Blah), I will be the first to admit that virtually all segments of the experimental realm—whether it be the late career esoteric cocksucker counterculture cinema of James Broughton, aberrant Aryan pornography of Viennese Aktionists like pedo cult leader Otto Mühl, or frivolous found-footage tweaking of banal Brit Malcolm Le Grice—deserve to be ruthlessly mocked, ridiculed, and/or lampooned and Schlingensief was most certainly the best person to do it. Indeed, whether it be remaking classic high-camp Nazi melodramas, creating a reunification themed kraut mutation of Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) featuring Udo Kier with a swastika mustache, or bringing the Aryan high kultur of Bayreuth to the most culturally barren and impoverished corners of the dreaded Dark Continent in an absurd stunt that surely rivals that of the mad avant-garde researchers of Tunguska that attempt to expose Eskimos to experimental cinema, Schlingensief was indubitably the best dude to parody the pretenses of cinema history's most autisticly arrogant sons. Of course, Schlingensief may be the only great artist in history that could never be properly parodied or receive the lame Hebraic Saturday Night Live treatment as a man whose real-life personality and preternatural charisma was more entrancingly hyperreal and downright hilarious than any neo-vaudevillian comedy sketch ever could be. Indeed, after watching Tunguska one can only come to the natural conclusion that it was directed by a cracked kraut genius with an untameable spirit that makes George Grosz seem like Norman Rockwell by comparison in terms of sheer artistic Weltanschauung. In other words, Heil Schlingensief!!!

-Ty E

MENU TOTAL
MENU TOTAL

Christoph Schlingensief (1986)

After viewing Christoph Schlingensief's brutally bleak yet conspicuously campy black-and-white feature Menu Total (1986) aka Meat, Your Parents at its ill-fated premiere at the 1986 Berlinale Film Festival, charming character actor Udo Kier remarked to the director that, "I killed myself laughing." Although the actor's random interaction would later spark many great collaborations with Schlingensief, including kraut arthouse trash works like Egomania - Insel ohne Hoffnung (1986), 100 Years Adolf Hitler - The Last Hour in the Führerbunker (1989), and The 120 Days of Bottrop (1997), Kier was in the minority when it came to apotheosizing Menu Total. Described to him by his mentor Werner Nekes (Uliisses, Johnny Flash) as "fascistic" and by his ashamed father as being "terrible," Schlingensief was perturbed (yet at the same time, strangely pleased) by the negative response to Menu Total, not least of all because he thought he assembled an elaborately farcical esoteric comedy of sorts, even later proclaiming it be, "my best film!" Ultimately, Menu Total – a Nazi-themed arthouse piece of the most grandiose grotesquery – would prove to be one of Schlingensief's first public brushes with controversy. Within the first ten minutes of its premiere at the Berlinale, wimp Wim Wenders – a major target for ridicule in many of Schlingensief's films – walked out of the screening in sheer disgust and by the end of the showing of Menu Total, only half of the 800 member audience remained. Of those remaining 400 filmgoers, about half of them were decisively disgruntled with Menu Total, eventually causing a full-blown fight to breakout that left respected pharmacist Schlingensief's father in total tears. Indeed, after viewing Menu Total a number of times, I can honestly say that it is one of his most divinely deranged works, which says a lot considering it was directed by a filmmaker who has consistently equipped his films with images of absurdist rape scenarios, rampant race-hate, daffy death sequences, and every sexual perversion known (and not known) to man. Featuring a hysterical hodge-podge of campy concentration camp experimentation, crude and cynical child molestation, sadistic scatological scenarios, existential exploitation, and – more morbidly and mischievously than anything – a decidedly distasteful treatment of Germany's National Socialist past, Menu Total is the sort of film every good politically-correct German fears and rightfully so, but Schlingensief was not interested in ignoring or sanitizing his Fatherland's taboo past like so many of his generation, including ethno-masochistic Holocaust-hugger Wim Wenders (Wings of Desire).

In the documentary Christoph Schlingensief und seine Filme (2005) aka Christoph Schlingensief and His Films the audacious auteur displays no apprehension in stating that he is distantly related to Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels via his mother and feels that he, "would make an excellent overseer in a concentration camp,” further stating that Germans “haven’t digested Hitler since 1945,” thereupon adding to the mystique and appeal of National Socialism for newer generations of Hitler’s spiritual children. In short, Schlingensiefel believes that artists should not, “always claim to be on the side of god,” and that he, “should be able to say “I am Evil”...I want to portray evil,” which Menu Total undeniably does, albeit in an audaciously avant-garde neo-Dadaist-Actionist sort of way, minus the pompous pretensions. Centering around a mentally unstable boy that while searching in vain for his beloved mommy, ends up exterminating an entire family, Menu Total is a recklessly wild cinematic work with a startlingly shattered moral compass. Starring German funnyman, musician, and filmmaker Helge Schneider (00 Schneider – Jagd auf Nihil Baxter, Stangenfieber) – who also assembled the irritatingly ironic cool jazz score for the film – Menu Total is an aesthetically malicious masterpiece of curiously cracked and crudely carnal kraut comedy. Taking place largely in a murky bunker where multiple maniacs meander and mess around with mutilated mortals, Menu Total is largely a mock-up, albeit more multifarious and mystifying, for Schlingensiefel’s later effort 100 Years Adolf Hitler - The Last Hour in the Führerbunker (1989); a 60-minute farce of the Führerbunker where the cast and crew was locked in a cement dugout for no less 16 hours in complete and utter darkness aside from the devotedly dippy director’s trusty flashlight, henceforth arguably making it the artistically faithful filmmaker’s most literal attempt at ‘Direct Cinema.’ Like 100 Years Adolf Hitler, Menu Total is a nauseatingly nonlinear experiment with apocryphal themes relating to the history of the Third Reich. By exaggerating these vaguely historical but mostly fabricated stories, Schlingensiefel attempted to arrive at allegorical truths about the legacy of Hitler (who in the Führerbunker flick is more of a ‘SHITler’ as he passionately paints and plays with his freshly defecated feces). In the documentary Christoph Schlingensiefel und seine Filme, Schlingensiefel – sounding like a vehement völkisch idealist of the Jungian denomination states quite matter-of-factly that, “I believe we carry genetic baggage around within ourselves...events that happened long before we were born.” That being said, as an aberrant Aryan artist and thus an exceedingly endemic and eccentric expressionist of the German collective unconscious, Schlingensiefel painted a sordid, sardonic, even sadistic portrait of the Teuton volkgeist via Menu Total; undoubtedly one of the purest and unadulterated consciously and unconsciously ‘German’ films of the post-WWII era.

Undoubtedly, the palpably precarious 1986 premiere of Menu Total was assuredly a vicarious vantage point for Schlingensiefel because despite feeling hostile animosity from friends, family, and foes, the director also confirmed his artistic dexterity as an inexorable experimental filmmaker with a particularly potent propensity for invoking buried emotions in his countryman, even once admitting, “there must be some deep, dark black box inside of me. A place which is hungry to tackle material like this.” Although merely seeming like a schizophrenic scat film of the uniquely incoherent sort to the uninitiated viewer – which taken literally, it most certainly is – Menu Total, like the poetry of Gottfried Benn and Stefan George, aphorisms of Nietzsche and Spengler, paintings of Franz von Stuck, Fidus and Herbert Smagon, and the films of Fassbinder and Buttgereit, is an out-and-out exegesis of the German soul, albeit taken to the sort of extraordinarily erratic excesses that only Schlingensiefel was capable of. Filmed in rich and thematically complimentary black-and-white film stock, Menu Total works best as symbolic cinematic expression of the soul of a self-flagellating and spiritually devitalized people, portraying a fantastic dystopian Germanic netherworld where the "shadow aspect" – the unconscious aspect of one's personality that the conscious ego is unwilling to recognize – is laid bare as the de facto persuasion of the uncivilized citizenry. As ironically stated by a particularly debauched man in a Nazi-era Wehrmacht (army) officer uniform – who engages in ritualistic murder, molestation and mayhem – in Menu Total: "You mustn't hurt the children. Their future is our future and our work is their future." Keeping that in mind, Schlingensiefel took the opposite approach with his films, most especially with Menu Total, by intentionally and unrelentingly stirring unpleasant emotions in the viewers. While it might not be for the better if viewers find themselves fantasizing about becoming Adolf Hitler and spouting demented gibberish like the particularly perverse protagonist of the film, it might inspire them to renounce politically correct pretensions and artistic mediocrity, thereupon restoring testicular fortitude to the Teutons of Deutschland; a sound sentiment that the late, great Christoph Schlingensiefel certainly shared.

MENU TOTAL

-Ty E

EGOMANIA – ISLAND WITHOUT HOPE

Christoph Schlingensief (1987)

Long before his film United Trash (1996) aka The Slit caused a brief suspension of diplomatic relations between Germany and Zimbabwe, he was arrested for calling for the death of German chancellor Helmut Kohl in 1997, created and hosted a radical racially-charged reality TV show (Foreigners out! Schlingensiefs Container aka Ausländer raus! Schlingensiefs Container) in the middle of Vienna in 2002 where illegal alien contestants that lost were deported to their respective nations, directed a superlatively subversive and scatological adaptation of Richard Wagner's masterpiece Parsifal (1882) at the prestigious Bayreuth Festival featuring a menstruating Grail and Arthurian knights in Jolson-esque blackface in the summer of 2004, and before he began building a Wagnerian 'opera village' in 2010 at a small village in the tiny landlocked western African nation of Burkina Faso, Teutonic auteur and all-around raunchy Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensief (Das deutsche Kettensägenmassaker aka The German Chainsaw-Massacre, Terror 2000) did the seemingly unthinkable by attempting to make the most shamelessly beautiful and poetic film that he could in what one might describe as atavistic awakening of the classic kraut romantic spirit as sprung from the uniquely untamable soul of a mad mensch who had the misfortune of growing up in a nation where a certain Marxist mental midget famously declared the following dickheaded dictum, "To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric." The film, Egomania – Insel ohne Hoffnung (1986) aka Egomania – Island without Hope, probably owes a great deal of its uncharacteristic pulchritude to the fact that Herr Schlingensief was then dating the leading lady, Tilda Swinton, who clearly had reached her peak in beauty at the time. Filmed on the North German island of Langeneß just off the west coast of Schleswig-Holstein and set in a darkly romantic glacial realm that seems to reconcile the otherworldly landscape paintings of Caspar David Friedrich with the anarchic individualism of somewhat forgotten German philosopher Max Stirner and the ethereal and phantasmagoric expressionism of German auteur F.W. Murnau, Schlingensief's stunningly kaleidoscopic celluloid nightmare certainly seems like it would be the product of a endearingly egomaniacal fellow who has no time or interest in bothering to respect or identify with the political and aesthetic fashions of his day and age. In fact, the genesis of the film was more or less the almost unanimous hostility towards the director's previous film, the hysterically hilarious and nihilistically nasty feces-and-barf-covered Nazi family farce Menu total (1986), which Wim(p) Wenders walked out of after 10 minutes during its premiere and which Schlingensief's ex-teacher Werner Nekes apparently described as "fascistic." Indeed, apparently kraut queer actor Udo Kier, who the filmmaker did not know at the time, was the only one to congratulate Schlingensief on his film after its debut and the two subsequently decided to collaborate with one another right then and there, or as the auteur stated in the documentary Christoph Schlingensiefel und seine Filme (2005) aka Christoph Schlingensiefel and His Films regarding their auspicious meeting and the birth of Egomania: “Suddenly, someone grabs my hand and says, ‘I’m Udo Kier.’ And I didn’t know who he was at first, I must confess. All I knew was I recognized his face from somewhere. I probably knew him from Andy Warhol’s “Dracula” but when I heard the name I really didn’t know who on earth he was. “I saw your film [Menu Total]. I killed myself laughing.” And I was so pleased that I had finally met someone who said that he killed himself laughing over my film. “The faces were so distorted and I thought the stuff they were saying was hilarious. Would you like to join me?” And so Tilda and I sat down next to him and on that evening we decided that we would make a film together and we drew up a contract on a napkin: “We will make a film.” We planned to start shooting three weeks later.” Of course, Kier would go on to star in virtually every one of Schlingensiefel’s subsequent films and the rest is history.

EGOMANIA – ISLAND WITHOUT HOPE

Segmented by excerpts from the work Der Illusionismus und die Rettung der Persönlichkeit (1895) written by kraut iconoclast Oskar Panizza—a now little known Bavarian-born avant-garde wordsmith and psychiatrist of Italian and French aristocratic Huguenot extraction who spent a year in prison after being charged with 93 counts of blasphemy for his tragicomedy Das Liebeskonzil (1894) aka The Love Council, which Schlingensiefel’s cinematic hero Werner Schroeter adapted in 1982 (notably, the film was banned in Austria in 1985 due to its perceived anti-Catholic sentiments)—Egomania is also a work where the aberrant-garde auteur pays tribute to his similarly subversive Aryan forbearers. As for cinematic influences, Egomania seems to be a love letter to the more impenetrable avant-garde works of decadent European arthouse dandies like Werner Schroeter and Derek Jarman, but also the anarchistic (anti)Heimat films of Herbert Achternbusch, ethereal celluloid pilgrimages of Werner Herzog, naked melodramas of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, the pioneering celluloid poems of cinematic master F.W. Murnau (Udo Kier plays a Nosferatu/Dracula-like figure), and even the mystical mountain films of Dr. Arnold Fanck and Leni Riefenstahl. Of course, when it comes down to it, the film is pure and unadulterated Schlingensiefel, albeit at his most brazenly cinematic and eccentrically esoteric. An anti-Vergangenheitsbewältigung work where the director mocks the post-WWII German obsession with Auschwitz and whatnot, Egomania is set on a snow and ice-ridden island that seems like some Teutonic pandemonium in between heaven and hell whose inhabitants’ minds have been frozen in the past as if cursed by the Semitic scorn of Adorno and thus suffer perennial melancholia and loneliness. The exceedingly eccentric yet equally aesthetically exquisite story of two lovers who find their relationship tested when an evil demonic cross-dressing aristocrat becomes jealous of their love and happiness and tirelessly attempts to tear them apart and make the woman his, Schlingensiefel’s film ultimately tells a classic story in a rather wayward fashion that reminds one why the director was arguably Germany's very last serious auteur filmmaker and true romantic.

A feverishly foreboding yet sometimes farcical metaphysical horror melodrama with a completely captivating dream logic and loony labyrinthine (non)storyline that makes full use of cinema's distinct power as a moving visual art like the great silent works of the German expressionist period, as well as the cine-magic works of Kenneth Anger, Egomania opens with a beautiful blue shot of a Gothic castle and with the film's narrator stating: "Once upon a time on an isolated island in the ocean there lived a handful of people. Their thoughts were formed in different languages and they tried to find the common words. In the beginning they were peaceful and helped each other. But soon harmony was overcome by antagonism. The father loves his son – but the son not his mother. Death loves life – but life not birth. The front is in the back and the back suddenly is in the front." Udo Kier plays an eloquent yet eccentric aristocrat of the evil and blood-thirsty yet eternally suffering sort named Baron Tante Teufel (which translates to "Aunt Devil" or "Devil's Aunt") and he is a Dr. Faustus-esque figure who takes on various material and spiritual forms, including the Devil, Nosferatu/Dracula (indeed, in some ways, Kier's character is a parody of his role in Paul Morrissey's 1974 cult classic Blood for Dracula), a demonic drag queen, the Flying Dutchman and the sort of iconic and handsome Satanic Teutonic dandy that was probably best personified by horror novelist Hanns Heinz Ewers, whose legacy was forsaken by his Faustian pact with the Third Reich. Baron Teufel constantly suffers hallucinations as caused by both good and bad memories, including the brutal stoning to death of one of his assumed lovers, as well as his seemingly happy marriage to his sweetheart as a prepubescent boy. The Baron is the father of a seemingly nice and would-be-heroic fellow named William (Uwe Fellensiek)—a fellow that bears a striking resemblance to Schlingensief and can be seen as his alter-ego—who, when not suffering nightmares relating to his pernicious pappy and his murderous behavior, longs for his redheaded beloved Sally (Tilda Swinton), who is a poor Brünhilde-like proletarian girl who oftentimes sports a medieval cloak and carries away the corpse of a sort of Aryan Christ at the beginning of the film with the help of old women wearing the same cloaks. She and William's love will be tested by the Baron, who wants nothing more than to destroy the young lady and everything she has and then make her his wife.

Aided by his slavishly loyal 'Aryan Christ' servant 'Anatol' (Schlingensief/Helge Schneider regular Sergej Gleitmann), Baron Tante Teufel trudges through the snow and mud while attempting to exorcise the haunting memories that have caused him pangs of guilt and that incessantly haunt his conscious and subconscious. One late night, like an incubus, the Baron appears in Sally's bed and when the young lady declares, "I'm so ill," he replies in a deep demonic voice,

EGOMANIA – ISLAND WITHOUT HOPE

“You’re the devil, not me.” Indeed, the Baron is not the devil, but ‘The Devil Aunt,’ at least when he dresses in drag and plots to destroy the young woman and her love for her lover and unborn son. After being visited by a boorish and bawdy bitch named Ria (Schlingensief regular Anna Fechter) who attempts to coerce him to kill “the whore” Sally, the Baron comes up with the master plan to kill her child (she is pregnant with William’s child) and to destroy everything she has so that she will become his loving wife. After using Anatol to stone to death the local captain so that he can steal his ship, The Baron, who is in his “Devil’s Aunt” persona, drinks some red wine in a crazed fashion as if he is a fiendish vampire drinking blood and, with the help of Ria and some other old haggard wench, steals Sally away from William and sails away in the icy waters. From there, William wanders through the forests and back to his family castle home where he comes under the wing of his pernicious father, who demands that he forget Sally. Meanwhile, Sally gives birth to her and William’s son, who does not get to know his father who is literally and figuratively blinded by the Baron. Indeed, when Sally and their son randomly bump into William and the Baron on the beach, the former cannot see his beloved or progeny. While Sally attempts to get the attention of William, the Baron mocks her and pushes her around like some sort of old queen bully. Eventually, the Baron also kidnaps William and Sally’s child and does some bizarre satanic rituals with it. Broken and desperate as a result of losing both her lover and child, Sally comes to the Baron in a groveling fashion and tells him that she will do anything for him to waive the curse he has put on her, so the demonic blueblood bastard kisses her and makes her his. In the end, William shows up at the Baron’s castle on horseback like a knight in shining armor and battles his demonic daddy, who has become drunk with evil and eats William and Sally’s baby, kills his servant Anatol, and loses whatever semblance of sanity he had left. Luckily, William and Sally manage to escape together into the sunlight.

As David Ashley Hughes noted in his text Reinventing the Left: Radical Responses to German Reunification, Schlingensief’s Egomania, “thematizes evil for the first time in German cinema since the Weimar Republic,” which is certainly no small accomplishment and nothing short of a cinematically revolutionary act. As Hughes also noted in his work, “Reality in EGOMANIA is cold and desolate and infused with an apocalyptic sense of futility and hopelessness – not unlike much West German culture of the mid-1980s.” Indeed, the prodigal progeny of German New Cinema, Schlingensief radically rejected the realistic static works of the Oberhausen Manifesto signers from the 1960s and declares in his own way with the film that “Papas Kino ist tot,” as a Gegenwartsbewältigung work that beautifully butchers that phantoms of the present and mischievously makes a mockery of those forgotten souls that live in the past. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Schlingensief, who derived much of his potency and authenticity as a filmmaker from the fact that he did not suffer from the sort of history-based artistic cuckoldry that plagued his contemporaries, was inspired by the more rebellious and individualistic filmmakers of German New Cinema like Werner Schroeter, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, and Daniel Schmid who were criticized and even sometimes absurdly described as 'fascist' filmmakers for their ambitious and cultivated aestheticism and for not making banal realist works about proles working in factories, as he was rebelling against the soulless and static nature of the spiritually castrated and Vergangenheitsbewältigung-obsessed zeitgeist he was born into. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Schlingensiefel oftentimes made fun of Wim Wenders, who arguably represented some of the worst aspects of German New Cinema and whose mindless idealism was relentlessly mocked in 100 Years Adolf Hitler - The Last Hour in the Führerbunker (1989) in a scene where he is even compared to Uncle Adolf. In that sense, Egomania is an unhinged expression of the post-WWII volksgeist/collective unconscious that leaves no stone unturned in terms of expressing the metaphysical maladies and collective pathologies plaguing the Fatherland at the time, so it should be no surprise that the director pays blatant tribute to German radical individualists, Oskar Panizza and Max Stirner, with the film, not to mention the fact that he was also heavily inspired by the aristocratic individualism of Conservative Revolutionary novelist Ernst Jünger. When it comes down to it, the film is a sort of celluloid 'Heimat Nightmare' that is more devilishly humorous than the macabre stories of H.H. Ewers, more darkly romantic and mysticism-oriented than Leni Riefenstahl's The Blue Light (1932) aka Das blaue Licht, more absurdly Heimat-obsessed than the absurdist filmic farces of Achternbusch, and more aesthetically decadent than the early works of Schroeter. The fact that Schlingensiefel directed the film when he was only 24 just goes to show his majesty as a moviemaker who was probably born half a century too late. With its apocalyptic aesthetics, ominous oneiric tone, and strangely uplifting ending for what is a largely darkly poetic film, Egomania is a sort of Teutonic older brother to Derek Jarman's masterpiece The Last of England (1988). Brilliant as both an insanely idiosyncratic work of keenly kaleidoscopic cinematic art and as a critique of the modern glacial kraut soul, the film ultimately gives the viewer a good idea of where Schlingensiefel's filmmaking career might have headed had he not lived in a culturally and socially vapid zeitgeist plagued by ugliness, defeat, emotional barrenness, and despair.

-Ty E

100 YEARS OF ADOLF HITLER - THE LAST HOUR IN THE FÜHRERBUNKER
100 YEARS OF ADOLF HITLER - THE LAST HOUR IN THE FÜHRERBUNKER

Christoph Schlingensief (1989)

In terms of filmic Uncle Adolfs, you probably cannot do better than kraut queer character actor Udo Kier in 100 Jahre Adolf Hitler - Die letzte Stunde im Führerbunker (1989) aka 100 Years of Adolf Hitler - The Last Hour in the Führerbunker directed by the late great Christoph Schlingensief (United Trash aka The Slit, Die 120 Tage von Bottrop aka The 120 Days of Bottrop), which may not feature the most serious screen depiction of Hitler but it certainly features the most memorable and feces-filled. The first film in the director's 'Germany Trilogy' aka 'Deutschlandtrilogie'—a sort of remarkably grotesque and oftentimes scatological post-Aktionist equivalent to Prussian conservative auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's own Teutonic celluloid triptych—Schlingensief's work is a totally tasteless piece of strangely tantalizing Teuton trash running less than 60 minutes that was shot over a 16-hour-long period from the morning of November 28 to the early AM hours of November 29 in a rotting World War II era bunker in the German town of Mühlheim an der Donau in the district Tuttlingen in Baden-Württemberg, Germany where the director used nothing but a mere flashlight that he himself wielded for lighting, thus giving the film a sort of kitschy yet apocalyptic chiaroscuro-like look sort of like the director's previous doomful scatological celluloid National Socialist nightmare Menu total (1986) aka Hymen 2 - Die Schlacht der Vernunft. A work titled in anti-tribute to the 100 years since Hitler's birth on April 20, 1889, 100 Years of Adolf Hitler lets the viewer know in a rather rude, crude, and aberrantly aesthetically terroristic yet jovial sort of way that Uncle Adolf might have blow his brains out on April 30, 1945 but the Führer is not dead, at least not in spirit, as Deutschland refuses to come to terms with him and bury him once and for all, or so Herr Schlingensief—a mensch whose lifelong obsession with National Socialism seems to have rivaled that of Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels and whose celluloid caricatures seem to fall somewhere in between that of Der Stürmer founder Julius Streicher and degenerate kraut commie Dadaist George Grosz—wants you to think. An absurdist work of audaciously antagonistic anti-history featuring intentional historical inaccuracies and obscene anachronisms that are ironically no less ridiculous than the myths about Hitler and the Third Reich that many people today accept as fact (i.e. Hitler had one testicle), thus underscoring the innately irrational and almost religious view people have of Austria's most famous amateur painter, Schlingensief's celluloid (S)hitlerite psychodrama acts as a sort of reverse exorcism for those individuals who like to pretend German history began with the Wirtschaftswunder. In 100 Years of Adolf Hitler, the Führer is not the tragic Wagnerian god who unleashed the world's greatest Götterdämmerung on Greater Germany and the rest of Europa, but a morbidly melancholy and decidedly dejected bedridden wuss of the drug addicted and Parkinson's-plagued sort who is so rattled with a wacky sort of weltenschmerz that he uses excrement as a means of expressing himself before committing suicide in the most pathetic of ways in a cold, dark, and damp technocratic hellhole that was constructed by his regime. A work of overtly self-reflexive metacinema where many of the scenes begin with someone clapping a clapperboard in front of the camera as if Schlingensiefel did not even bother to have the film properly edited together after shooting it, 100 Years of Adolf Hitler is truly 'transcendental' cinema in its purest, rawest, and most unadulterated form as a work that shatters every single cinematic, socio-political, aesthetic, and historical convention imaginable with the ecstasy and anarchistic glee of a brigade of acid dropping berserkers at an enflamed French whorehouse full of whores in Hitlerite drag.

Opening with Uncle Adolf as portrayed by Udo Kier declaring "Schnapps, Wim, Trotta, Nico, etc.," 100 Years of Adolf Hitler immediately lets the viewer know that Herr Schlingensiefel has a bone to pick with some of the more popular and, in turn, more banal and conformist filmmakers of New German Cinema, namely Wim Wenders and, to a lesser extent, feminist hag Margarethe von Trotta. It should be noted that the film seems to be, at least partly, a sardonic celluloid revenge against Wenders, who walked out of the 1986 Berlinale screening of Schlingensiefel's film Menu total after being highly offended by the work, which was labelled as 'fascistic' by the German press and even the director's former mentor Werner Nekes. After Hitler mumbles a couple of words, one bears witness to Wenders making the following bullshit and conspicuously cliched (sub)humanistic speech at the 40th Cannes Film Festival on a grainy TV screen, "We can improve the pictures of this world and with that this world can be improved." As the rest of the film will demonstrate with a sort of insanely incendiary iconoclasm, Schlingensiefel thinks Wenders is a cowardly cardboard humanist fraud who makes soulless celluloid swill to appease shallow left-wing film critics and to demonstrate he is not a big mean Nazi monster like his parents and grandparents' generation, as if Germany's National Socialist past spiritually castrated him. From there, a little boy that looks like a blond Ashkenazi Israelite sings a butchered children's song that concludes with the goofy-looking child making reference to Wenders and the most artistically restrained yet internationally successful 'auteur' of New German Cinema, Volker Schlöndorff. As 100 Years of Adolf Hitler reveals, Schlingensiefel is not surprisingly a Rainer Werner kind of guy as he is a fellow 'enfant terrible,' as the film features Fassbinder superstars Volker Spengler (Satan's Brew, In a Year with 13 Moons), Margit Carstensen (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, Martha, Fear of Fear), and Mr. Kier (Berlin Alexanderplatz, Lili Marleen) in rather raunchy roles that seem to pay tribute to the most anarchistic of Fass-bande productions, like Satansbraten (1976) aka Satan's Brew and Die Dritte Generation (1979) aka The Third Gen- eration. It is 30 April 1945 at 5pm and the last day of Hitler's god forsaken life and he is planning to go out with a bang in the Führerbunker, but not before he gets in touch with his inner fecal side. Hitler's mistress-turned-wife Eva Braun (Schlingensief superstar Brigitte Kausch) is dyking out with Magda Goebbels in a bunker bathroom. Braun's traitor brother-in-law SS-Gruppenführer Hermann Fegelein (Volker Spengler) is running around the bunker like a bumbling buffoon while grabbing his nipples like an Guido tranny stripper. Meanwhile, Hermann Göring (Alfred Edel), Martin Bormann (Andreas Kunze), and Dr. Joseph Goebbels (film critic/Schlingensief superstar Dietrich Kuhlbrodt) babble on about pointless bullshit. Indeed, it seems that everyone in the Führerbunker is either suffering from cabin fever and/or autism, among other things.

Although it is the end of April, everyone in the bunker is celebrating Christmas by eating a large festive feast, but Big H is nowhere in sight, so Bormann complains regarding the missing Führer, "he's never on time...since Stalingrad...he just stays in bed, drunk, and ignores meals," to which Eva replies in defense of her MIA lover, "That's his way to celebrate, that's right." Hermann Göring is also unnerved by Hitler's glaring absence and rhetorically asks Eva, "What do you mean he's celebrating? Millions are running into the knives of the Bolsheviks...and he is celebrating says?," to which Dr. Goebbels eloquently replies, "Brother Göring, you're so stupid you should have been Reich Chancellor." Unfortunately, Herr Göring takes Goebbels' sarcastic remark quite seriously and he decides that he does indeed want to be the Reich Chancellor. Out of nowhere, Uncle Adolf finally appears like a creepy rotting great-grandfather lurking in the shadows in a craven attempt to get a quick peek of his unclad great-granddaughter and Braun is so aroused by his presence that she seems to have a spontaneous orgasm, but her best beau barely pays her any mind as he grabs a bottle of wine from the cellar. Indeed, Adolf is only interested in his somewhat sexy Mediterranean-like Nurse Morell (Asia Verdi)—a transsexualized version of the real Hitler's personal physician Theodor Morell, who got him hooked on a cocktail of drugs and who many Nazis seemed to believe was Jewish (notably, Morell claimed to have studied under Russian Jewish bacteriologist Élie Metchnikoff)—because she provides him with the only solace in his miserable forlorn life, morphine injections. While receiving an injection in a rather erotic fashion from Miss Morell, Hitler declares, "I'm still the greatest...Not just the leader and hero...I am myself! Straight, strong and simple!," as if to only convince himself that he is not the most monolithic failure in all of human history, as a man who went from being the most powerful man in Europe and the most (in)famous man in the world to a lonely enfeebled cripple hiding in a bunker who has had his life routinely threatened by many of his former followers. While watching Dr. Goebbels take a dump, Bormann is slapped in the face by Fegelein, who immediately runs away like a delinquent toddler who is proud of being such a little asshole. After Bormann calls Fegelein a "German swine" as the fat belligerent bastard runs away, Göring comes up to him and Goebbels and lets them know that the rather rotund SS-Gruppenführer is a traitor because he has been screwing a prostitute. Needless to say, Göring, Bormann, and Goebbels gang up on Fegelein in a restroom, beat him up, and seemingly molest him, but he doesn't seem to mind as he is a raving maniac who wallows in sadomasochistic cruelty of the sexually savage sort. Meanwhile, Eva Braun performs fellatio on Magda and Dr. Goebbels' underage son Kurt while the young lad draws a picture for his "Uncle Adolf." Indeed, the Führerbunker is home to one fucked family affair.

While all the Nazis are singing "Silent Night" aka "Stille Nacht, heilige Nacht" while walking slowly in line like a bunch of highly devout monks in a somnambulist-like state, lovelorn lady lunatic Eva Braun gets jealous over Sister Morell due to her secret lurid love affair with Adolf, so she attacks her like a wounded rabid crazed cunt ex-girlfriend who won't let go of her thoroughly disinterested boy toy. Meanwhile, sinisterly sleazy sex fiend Fegelein fingers a baby doll while repeatedly saying the word "fucking" as if he is possessed by the ghost of a depraved AIDS-ridden gay porn star. In an assumed tongue-in-cheek reference by Schlingensief to himself and his own film, Bormann declares while sitting on the toilet, "I'm reading from the works of degenerate artists" and Göring responds by once again stating, "I want to be Reich Chancellor" while playfully manhandling his comrade. Meanwhile, Fegelein molests his sister-in-law Eva Braun while Nurse Morell does the same to Mrs. Goebbels. Fed up with Uncle Adolf's declining leadership abilities, Dr. Goebbels self-righteously declares, "We no longer need a Führer, just the German people." For his last great artistic masterpiece before kicking the bucket, Hitler sits in a pile of liquid scheid and then makes a print of his feces-covered fanny by pressing it against a piece of paper hanging on the bunker wall while Dr. Goebbels declares, "the people won't be longing for a Führer, only the artist who has to learn not to resign, but to use the limits around him...Because, and I'm sure you will agree with me, Hitler, too was an artist!" in a most defiant fashion. Knowing that Hitler's hours are numbered Göring conspires with Fegelein and Bormann, letting the former know he will be in charge of foreign politics and the latter will be in charge of domestic politics while he will act as both Reich Chancellor and Minister of Propaganda after purging Goebbels in what he hopes to be a 3,000 year Reich.

When Uncle Adolf finally puts a bullet in his brain, his estranged lover Eva Braun decides to become him by dressing in drag, even giving herself a Charlie Chaplin mustache with charcoal. As her first act as the new and hardly improved Führer, Eva Braun makes a phone call on a broken phone to some unknown person demanding that field marshal Erwin 'the Desert Fox' Rommel, who committed suicide in 1944 at Hitler's request since he was connected to an assassination plot against the Führer, somehow be brought back to life. At her hubby's command, Magda hands out poisonous chocolate to all of her children (notably, one is named after Margarethe von Trotta and another after Wim Wenders) who soon fall over and croak. Although she has killed all of her dozen or so progeny, Magda manages to give birth to another child—a primitive doll made out of yarn—during her lesbo wedding with Braun-turned-Hitler, though she dies during childbirth. Determined not to leave the baby a bastard, Braun hooks up with Fegelein and the two proceed to set Hitler's dog Blondi on fire in what one might describe as a 'hound holocaust.' After escaping from the Führerbunker, Fegelein and Eva Braun put their Nazi bastard baby that they have symbolically named "Little Moses" inside a rusty old tub and send it down a river to an ostensible promised land in a scene juxtaposed with audio commentary of kraut conservative politician Franz Josef Strauss—a long-time minister-president of the state of Bavaria—stating, "Actually the Germans are romantic people, but then they start pondering. Others are logical, but in the practical sphere, they're more realistic. Germans must finally learn...not everything in life ends in a mathematical parable, like $2 \times 2 = 4$. They should be less romantic, less enchanted, and most of all less ideological!" in a biting scenario that seems to reflect Schlingensief's belief that post-WWII Germany was sown in sin and perversion and is in denial about its National Socialist roots.

Notably, in the documentary Christoph Schlingensiefel und seine Filme (2005) aka Christoph Schlingensiefel and His Films, auteur Schlingensiefel states that he once told a friend that he felt he would make an, "excellent guard in a concentration camp," adding regarding his interaction with his confused comrade, "He was like "Now what's that supposed to mean?" but no, I'm telling you [...] I have this fear, I probably have those molecules [...] I'm a few steps removed from Goebbels, my grandmother's maiden name is Goebbels, it was the cousin of a cousin or something like that, maybe there are molecules in me, [...] hopefully, they won't come into effect, so I've got to use it up from the outset, before it maybe puffs itself up later." Personally, I think Schlingensiefel would have probably been interned in a concentration camp or even secretly euthanatized like certain 'Entartete Kunst' artists like Elfriede Lohse Wächtle had he lived during the Third Reich, as he was such an innately intemperate, iconoclastic, and incendiary artist and pernicious prankster that there is no way he would have ever been able to follow orders from humorless Hitlerites, let alone guard thousands of prisoners, but I respect his message with 100 Years of Adolf Hitler in regard to contemporary Germans being afraid of their roots and denying the past by pretending to be bleeding heart pansy humanist eunuchs, philo-Semitic shabbos goy artistic serfs, Father(land)-hating feminists, and other untermenschen rabble. Indeed, while von Trotta symbolically renounced her ancestral heritage by directing absurdly banal feminist biopics about anti-kraut commie Jewesses like Rosa Luxemburg, Wenders attempted to become an American filmmaker and went out of his way to work with Jewish American filmmakers like Sam Fuller, as if these glaringly and repulsively compensatory ethno-masochistic actions would somehow rid them of the ostensibly nasty Nazi taint. As a man who staged an adaptation of Hamlet starring real neo-Nazis and created a Big Brother-esque TV show set in Vienna called Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container where swarthy turd-skinned foreigners living inside a concentration camp-like container were voted off the show to be deported, Schlingensiefel demonstrated an obsession with Germany's taboo past that seemed to transcend Uncle Adolf's own obsession with heebies and bolsheviks, thus reflecting his truly Teutonic spirit. In its depiction of Hitler creating a painting with poop, 100 Years of Adolf Hitler also reveals the biting irony of how Uncle Adolf unwittingly gave birth to the alpha-degenerate Viennese Aktionism movement, whose members were heavily influenced by their nation's Nazi past, especially Otto Mühl, who served in the German Wehrmacht and was even a war hero of sorts. Apparently, Schlingensiefel was so obsessed with his genetic inheritance and the supposed atavistic 'taint' in Aryan blood and kultur that he believed he contracted the cancer that ultimately killed him as a result of his involvement in adapting Richard Wagner's Parsifal in the summer of 2004 at the prestigious Bayreuth Festival because, as his friend Alexander Kluge noted in the foreword to the book Christoph Schlingensiefel - Art Without Borders (2010), "Wagner, he claims, disseminates a deadly poison via his suggestive music." Indeed, considering Wagner's crucial influence on Hitler and the National Socialist weltanschauung, Schlingensiefel might have been on to something.

-Ty E

THE GERMAN CHAINSAW-MASSACRE
THE GERMAN CHAINSAW-MASSACRE

Christoph Schlingensief (1990)

Everyone knows how brutal a Texas chainsaw massacre is, but few can fathom the sheer depravity of a German chainsaw massacre. In 1990, German art-house-trash auteur Christoph Maria Schlingensief released the boldly extravagant Brecht-esque satiric reunification splatter flick The German Chainsaw-Massacre (aka Blackest Heart); the second entry in the director's "German trilogy," and a film that boldly goes where no film has gone before. Indeed, you will never see another cinematic work (except in another Schlingensief flick) that even begins to rival the anarchic nature of The German Chainsaw-Massacre; a film featuring a dream-sequence scene where Udo Kier sports an absurd Hitler-Chaplin-swaastika-mustache, as well as a cast of swarthy untermensch German actors that put the real-life cast of Fritz Hippler's The Eternal Jew (1940) to shame. Christoph Maria Schlingensief – who better resembled a Talmudic scholar during his remaining days than an Aryan Übermensch – passed away prematurely late last year due to an unsuccessful battle with lung cancer, thus I feel it is my duty to honor his legacy as a maniac maverick auteur by viewing all of his films within the next month (which is something I should have done long ago). Although it has been a while since I saw a film by the enfant terrible auteur, I decided that viewing The German Chainsaw-Massacre would be the best way to start my month long unofficial Schlingensief movie marathon. After watching the film, I must admit that I was anything but let down, as viewing The German Chainsaw-Massacre was the cinematic equivalent of a bleak phantasmagorical National Socialist nightmare. In fact, I would give my body to the Third Reich if I could somehow hear long dead Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels' (who is infamously known for banning films in the Fatherland) thoughts on the film. As one would expect from a work entitled The German Chainsaw-Massacre; the film is a tad more sophisticated and less serious than Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974). German immigrants played a large role in the cultural development of Texas (17% of modern Texans claim to be of German descent) – but like most Americans of European descent – they are indubitably less culturally refined than their blood brothers from the old country. In Schlingensief's The German Chainsaw-Massacre, one notices that cultural degeneration in Germany has taken a slightly different route than in the Texas portrayed in TCM.

The German Chainsaw-Massacre opens with real-life documentary stock footage from the 1990 German reunification ceremony. Then, the film takes a sinister turn for the worst, warning viewers that east Germans – who look and act like westerners – are secretly living among them. During the Third Reich, Aryan blood was considered nothing short of holy, but in GCM it is merely a less than meaty lucrative means for maniacally making money. Additionally, while the

Teutons of Nazi Germany wanted to consolidate with their racial brothers from around the world, most of the eastern and western Germans featured in GCM much rather prefer murdering one another. It goes without saying that GCM and TCM also have their differences. Whilst the slightly deranged cannibalistic Sawyer family featured in The Texas Chain Saw Massacre prefers only the finest grade human meat, the west German human-butcher clan of The German Chainsaw-Massacre stereotypically prefers Teutonic bratwurst cut from the cheap meat of east German swine. Of course, that is not the only difference between the two families, as while the quasi-inbred Texan Sawyer family prefers to butcher and sell the meat of counter-culture hippie types, the family featured in GCM – who are set in their barbaric ways – are happy to kill friendly progressive east Germans, as they make for tasty would-be cosmopolitan treats. Thus, it is apparent that Herr Schlingensief executed a role-reversal tactic with his distinct brand of chainsaw massacring - portraying the seemingly more advanced west Germans as debauched capitalists who are too set in their greedy ways to reunite with their culturally and economically bankrupt kinsmen. Even to this day – like most ex-Soviet eastern bloc nations – the eastern region of Germany still hasn't recovered from decades of communism. Of course, in Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, the director played on the prejudicial fears many Americans have for "backwards", "inbred" and "violent" confederates. As you find out during the beginning of GCM, east German anti-heroine Clara is far from being a sweet sassy lass as her thirst for blood is almost equal to that of the west German cannibal clan she falls prey to, for she is an undeniably proficient killer with an improvised talent for murdering and castrating enemies. While portraying those east Germans who refuse to leave their post-communist region as backwards automatons who are incapable of deracinating themselves from their former authoritarian brainwashing (as personified in GCM by a group of emotionally robotic ex-Stasi border patrol guards), the progressive west Germans - who are also set in their (materialistic) ways - slaughter their countrymen for blood soaked meat and Deutsche Marks. Frau Clara is indubitably a progressive feminist that yearns for total freedom as her sole interest is to emigrate to the west at any cost, even if she has to murder her androgynous troll-like husband in the process. On top of featuring a totally different socio-political subtext from the more traditional and linear horror history told in The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, The German Chainsaw-Massacre – a salacious work of unconventional slapstick murder – features gore-galore and endless scenes of exquisite entrails and bodily dismemberment. Like most of Christoph Schlingensief's work, The German Chainsaw-Massacre is first and foremost a clever (albeit intentionally trashy) neo-surrealist romp satire that should be taken solely in jest. Every serious horror fanatic knows that Hooper's cannibal clan flick is a canonical masterpiece of the macabre (as advertised in the film) due to its extremely naturalistic and somewhat cinéma vérité inspired aesthetic, thus, I suspect that the most fans of

THE GERMAN CHAINSAW-MASSACRE

The Texas Chain Saw Massacre will fail to appreciate (nor begin to understand) the wickedly designed jubilant chaos that is The German Chainsaw-Massacre.

Christoph Maria Schlingensief

I have a feeling that Christoph Schlingensief was less than enthusiastic about splatter films, but he certainly proved his profound understanding of the horror subgenre through the satiric tongue-and-cheek nature of The German Chainsaw-Massacre. Although the film features enough gore to stun the most desensitized of gorehounds, it will be apparent to those individuals that the director lacks respect for such exploitive exploits. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if Schlingensief was mocking Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik (1987) – which was released a couple years before The German Chain Saw Massacre – as both films feature mangled human torsos (both being the result of an automobile) that look quite similar. GCM is like a perfect marriage between the Viennese Actionist films and the surrealist works of Luis Buñuel confined to production values that mirror John Waters' early Art-House-Trash flicks (Pink Flamingos, Desperate Living, etc.). Also, despite the sexually surreal nature of The German Chainsaw-Massacre – which includes incest and female-on-female missionary style rape – it is quite apparent that Schlingensief is mocking the post-WW2 libertine nature of European cinema. To put it simply, The German Chainsaw-Massacre is one of the ugliest and most revolting films that I have ever seen in my cinema-obsessed life. What saves GCM from being a loathsome pile of Germanic excrement is how hilarious and audaciously ridiculous the film is. Thankfully, Christoph Schlingensief was a politically astute individual who knew how to make his atypical symbolic social commentary digestible. After all, most politically-charged filmmakers are quite obnoxious (Spike Lee, Michael Moore, etc) in their execution of socio-political commentary. It is very doubtful that there exists another film in the world such as GCM; where a cannibal family keeps their dead Wehrmacht soldier grandfather (symbolic of Germany's inability to move forward) as a mobile shrine (another nod to TCM). To call the films of Christoph Schlingensief difficult would be an obscene understatement, but for those that have the gall to visually devour works that blur the imaginary line between pure trash and pure art, his films offer cinematic experiences like no other. Although A Hundred Years of Adolf Hitler (1989) is the first film in the director's "German Trilogy", I recommend that Schlingensief-virgins watch The German Chainsaw-Massacre first as it is a much more accessible work. Due to Hollywood and the mainstream (and the not so mainstream) media's skillful knack for inducing Teuton-phobia in the minds of American citizens, I think that is safe to say that if the average yank were to watch one of Schlingensief's films, it would (mistakenly) confirm their suspicions regarding the purported dubious nature of the fallen master race. Luckily, Schlingensief's films are only known and beloved by a small cinephile elite that cherishes the unfortunately deceased auteur filmmaker's incomparable works of post-post-modern Germanic anti-kultur. Maybe someday a brave American horror auteur will do for Amero-cinema what Christoph Schlingensief did for German national films, but such an unlikely scenario is merely wishful obsessive-cinephile thinking. Instead, next time I watch The German Chainsaw-Massacre, I plan to accompany it with The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, as such an eclectically perverse double-feature could only make for an oh-so rare majestically macabre experience. German prophet philosopher Oswald Spengler once stated something along the lines that out of all the artists (he was most specifically referring to the German expressionist painters) who created art during the interbellum period (between the first and second World War), not one of them was an artistic genius that had the ability to construct aesthetically pleasing works. That being said, Spengler was lucky that he didn't live to see the subversive works of post-WW2 German filmmakers. Spengler – whose canny physiognomic tact enabled him to foresee many of the horrors that would occur in the western world nearly a century after his death – couldn't even have foretold the spiritually sick chaos contained within a hyper-cynical film like German Chainsaw-Massacre. Since we (the living) are all confined to culturally degenerate times – where art is more often unprepossessing than not – one might as well buckle-up and enjoy the deluging ride. Whether you were born in Germany or not, one (most imperatively those of occidental heritage) should accept that a film like The German Chainsaw-Massacre is mostly importantly a reflexive sign of our wretched times.

-Ty E

TERROR 2000
TERROR 2000

Christoph Schlingensief (1992)

As I expected it would be, Terror 2000: Germany out of Control – the final chapter in recently deceased Ger-maniac auteur Christoph Maria Schlingensief's delightfully deranged "German trilogy" – is easily the most depraved and wickedly perverse work in the series. Like the first two films in Schlingensief's trilogy, Terror 2000 is another example of the director's sadomasochistic obsession with being a self-loathing German who is haunted by his fatherland's National Socialist past. Also, like the previous films in the trilogy, Terror 2000 is an absurdist political satire that pretends to be a mindless gross-out flick, thus, the film is indubitably a work that will offend both the one dimensional minds of gorehounds and the anally retentive tastes of arthouse princesses. As far as production values, Terror 2000 beats its predecessors. I have a feeling that Schlingensief slowly learned how to direct films via his German trilogy, as all three features suffer from amateurish direction and incoherent plots yet these "weaknesses" only add to the mighty character and crude charisma of these marvelously maniacal movies. Terror 2000 is a film about race chaos and Neo-Nazi vigilantes in post-reunification Germany. As one would expect from a film directed by Christoph Maria Schlingensief, a Neo-Nazi group terrorizes colored refugees (Ausländer) who have relocated to the fatherland. During the beginning of Terror 2000, a turd of a social worker (who seems more Amerikkkan than German) and a Polish family are kidnapped by the usual racist suspects. From there, Terror 2000 turns into an anarchistic work of scorched-earth spoof cinema where every convention and norm of film is wonderfully exterminated. Had German auteur Christoph Maria Schlingensief lived during the Third Reich, there is no doubt in my mind that he would have been lined-up for a firing squad. If it was discovered that Schlingensief was the illegitimate Grandson of degenerate German communist Dada artist George Grosz, I wouldn't be the least bit surprised as both Aryan artists had a special talent for portraying Germans as racial untermensch and a strange affinity for creating the anti-pornographic (sexually unappealing sex scenarios).

What makes Terror 2000 extra-special is that director Christoph Maria Schlingensief plays the role of Michael Kühnen; the real-life gay German Neo-Nazi and ex-Maoist who died of HIV-related complications in 1991. In fact, the film goes as far as poking fun at the fact that Kühnen contracted gay cancer. I must admit that Schlingensief did a swell job exaggeratedly copying Kühnen's homopantomimes and overall daintiness. Everyone's favorite gay German character actor, Udo Kier, also plays the role of a Neo-Nazi priest in Terror 2000. If you have ever questioned Kier's ability to play a macho man, you have yet to see Terror 2000; a film where the humble-homo-actor shoots bullets faster than he guzzles down semen. Of course, Kier also still lets the audience watching the film known that he is still on the brown-team by sharing homoerotic lingo with his brownshirt comrade. In short, Terror 2000 is the kind of film that provides nationalists with enough ammo in regards to the dubious morality and nature of leftist artists. Although Christoph Maria Schlingensief uses sick gross-out humor and sadistic satirical content as a martially mean artistic means to mock Neo-Nazis, it is quite apparent that he is supremely fond of scatology. After all, I can't think of any other film that features an ugly Aryaness masturbating in public as a group of men fight behind her, revolting close-ups of real Scheiße covered with flies, and jokes about AIDS, thus, although Terror 2000 is a leftist absurdist satire, it is surely a film that will offend most people from both ends of the political spectrum. To be fair, Schlingensief's sordid portrayal of colored foreigners is not exactly respectful, as he characterizes them in a manner comparable to a Tom Metzger-esque Neo-Nazi concocted caricature. In fact, a Negro repeatedly states "Fuck-fuck white shit" (translation: I want to rape German women). The foreigners in the film are quite ungrateful quests who have no problem stating that the free food that they receive at their refugee camps is "shitty" while also demanding that Germans give them more welfare. Of course, the refugee camp in Terror 2000 is presented as a neo-Auschwitz of sorts.

Despite being easily the most lavishly produced film in Christoph Maria Schlingensief's German trilogy, I found it be the weakest of the three films. Naturally, many of the themes featured in the director's previous two films – A Hundred Years of Adolf Hitler (1989) and The German Chainsaw-Massacre (1991) – were once again covered in Terror 2000. That being said, I still found Terror 2000 to be a notable and totally worthy exercise in iconoclastic cinema. I also rarely find films to be funny (especially when the director is attempting to be comedic) but I found the intellectual toilet humor in Terror 2000 to be first-class display of satirical sass. It has been a long time since swastikas burned in Germany but in the Teutonic nachmahr Terror 2000; the ancient Aryan symbol burns on (albeit, in a mocking manner that parodies that of American KKK cross-burning). In the film, you will also find such charming dialog as "Long Live Hatred!" and "Adolf Hitler was a Nazi. My mother was a Nazi. My father was a Nazi. I'm a Nazi!" After watching the film, I wondered whether or not Christoph Maria Schlingensief had any full-fledged Nazi grandparents. Seeing as Schlingensief seems to hate Nazis more than Steven Spielberg does, I can only assume that he regretfully had an SS man or Gestapo agent swinging from his family tree. Schlingensief is well known in Germany (and even on an international level) for his tactic of incriminating politicians and their empty lies of "hope" by "playing something through to its end" with his various libelous claims against them. Of course, I sincerely doubt that the films in his Germany trilogy made for a successful outlet for expressing his political views, but I respect the anti-Aryan-Aryan's unconventional approach. Christoph Maria Schlingensief must have learned all he needed to know about satiric filmmaking by locking himself in his room and religiously watching Stanley Kubrick's apocalyptic cold war satire Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb (1964) for months on end. Like Dr. Strangelove, Terror 2000 is a quasi-nihilistic satire that is blacker-than-a-firebombed-Dresden-resident-from-1945 comedy that leaves no group/political ideology unscathed. With Terror 2000, Christoph Maria Schlingensiefel also pays tribute to Jewish filmmaker Mel Brook's iconic Nazi-parodying in The Producers when an obese investigator in the film (who is a glutton that sports a XXX-Large Nazi SA brownshirt uniform) sings a verse from Springtime for Hitler, thus he is the kind of German filmmaker that the original National Socialists would have labeled a "white Jew" (as they did to German theoretical physicists like Werner Heisenberg). Despite his admiration for God's chosen tribe, Schlingensiefel had no problem including a controversial scene (especially for modern Germans) in Terror 2000 where a Hasidic Jew hangs lifelessly from a tree.

TERROR 2000

One scene I found especially humorous in Terror 2000 is when a passionate Neo-Nazi states, "We can't stand the Jews because they left Germany in 1933 to go to Hollywood." Although I share the Neo-Nazi's sentiment in regards to half-Jew Fritz Lang, I see the immigration of Aryan auteur F.W. Murnau to America as German cinema's greatest loss. Despite Schlingensiefel's criticism of so called xenophobia among German Nationalists, the film still expresses the universal fact that race chaos and Neo-Nazi movements are truly symbiotic of multi-culturalism. Almost two decades after Terror 2000 was released, German politicians – including social democrat banker/economist Thilo Sarrazin and Angela Merkel; current chancellor of Germany – have publicly admitted the total failure that is multiculturalism in post-war Germany. One of the strangest aspects of Terror 2000 is that Schlingensiefel chose to use a Polish family as the central target of discrimination in the film. Although the original National Socialists showed a somewhat hostile hatred towards Poles (especially those of a darker and more swarthy phenotype), most modern Neo-Nazis accept the fact that Slavs and Eurasians are imperative fighters for the Occident who have yet to be totally tainted by liberal democracy like western Europeans and Americans. Whatever his exact political persuasion was, Schlingensiefel certainly foresaw the chaos that would erupt in Germany as a result of racial diversity. As a character states during Terror 2000, "Germany is not America, We're not an immigration country." After all, no one is telling Mexico nor South Africa that they need more white immigrants yet in European nations reverse-colonialism is demanded by conspiring Third World leaders and liberal Europeans alike.

-Ty E

UNITED TRASH

Christoph Schlingensief (1996)

Unquestionably, I am prepared to appreciate any film that manages to cause the ceasing of diplomatic relations between a western nation and a sub-Saharan African country, even if it is not necessarily a good one. Luckily, United Trash - Die Spalte (1996) aka The Slit—a work that was so disconcerting to some proud African negroes that it caused a brief suspension of diplomatic relations between Germany and Zimbabwe—is also a masterpiece of the insanely and iconoclastically cinematically grotesque and ruthlessly socio-politically repugnant. Directed by the late great aberrant-garde Teutonic Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensief (Menu total, Das deutsche Kettensägen Massaker aka The German Chainsaw Massacre), the film is a sort of anti-American/anti-globalist/anti-UN anti-exploitation film that uses the conspicuously crappy cinematic conventions of carny celluloid hucksters like Russ Meyer, Herschell Gordon Lewis, and ZAZ (Zucker, Abrahams and Zucker) against itself to mount a mirthfully venomous celluloid blitzkrieg against the double-headed dragon of Americanization and globalization and their propaganda wing in Hollywood. Apparently partly a response to the United Nations' failure to stop genocide in Rwanda and the Balkans during the early 1990s, the fittingly titled United Trash tells the timeless tale of the black bastard spawn of a gay German UN officer and American hooker—a negro midget with a oozing pseudo-vagina on his forehead (hence the film's alternate title The Slit)—who is proclaimed the new messiah by a toothless excommunicated Catholic bishop and goes on a holy mission at the behest of a self-proclaimed dictator of the Afrocentric Islamic sort to assassinate the president of the United States and destroy the White House after being strapped to a Nazi era German V2 missile. A sort of modern day Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol of the Teutonized culturally mongrelized African negro sort, Schlingensief's film is a metapolitically-incorrect post-colonial minstrel show where all of the Occident is the butt of the joke, but all the naive nig-nogs pay most of the price. A film where the mother Mary is a bishop-banging ex-con/ex-hooker as portrayed by over-the-hill Mexican Russ Meyer star Kitten Natividad, Joseph is a gay German UN officer and scat fiend as portrayed by real-life gay German character actor Udo Kier, and the Messiah is a seemingly retarded negro dwarf with a cunt on his cranium that he ejaculates greenish spunk out of as portrayed by some random unknown Zimbabwean negro dwarf named Thomas Chibwe, United Trash is a work that sardonically molests beaten-to-death biblical allusions to obscenely and obnoxiously articulate to the thoroughly debased viewer that the world is now one giant overflowing homogenized human sewer swimming with negro savages and run by degenerate deracinated Europeans under the ostensibly humanistic auspices of world peace, as if such a cliched fantasy is actually really desirable among (sub)humanity, let alone obtainable. Of course, as Schlingensief's scathingly satirical celluloid scat piece demonstrates, the monstrous multi-headed mongrel bastard known as global unity results in anything but peace on earth and goodwill to mankind.

UNITED TRASH

After opening with the following tongue-in-cheek warning, "Attention!!! The following film contains subliminal effects! If you're pregnant or epileptic leave after 30 minutes at the most. Thank you for your understanding" that made me assume that auteur Schlingensief probably would have been proud if his film had induced a miscarriage in a young woman and/or caused an old geezer to croak as a result of a massive myocardial infarction as a true 'meta-artist' who saw no bounds and limits to art and its influence, United Trash then provides a complete general summary of the entire film because otherwise the viewer might not know what the hell is going on due to the movie's schizophrenic tone and general essence, as well as seemingly malefically spastic storyline and ultra-gross-out imagery. Indeed, the summary reads as follows: "This following film tells the true story of little Peter Panne, son of a German UN general and an American hooker. People simply called him JESU. While his father fails at the UN, a horde of Africans tries to destroy the president of the USA with a German V2 missile. JESU PETER's mother rams a needle into the boy's head so JESU ends up in the hospital. Despite his disability and a 33-lb crack on his head MOHAMMED PETER manages to save the world and destroy the American president forever and ever." Of course, the introduction summary leaves out all the gallons upon gallons of cum, blood, excrement, bile, and vomit that pollute the film, as United Trash, not unlike many of Schlingensief's works, is arguably a film where the sum of its parts is greater than the whole. Cipher-like protagonist Peter Panne aka Jesu-Peter aka Jesus-Peter aka Mohammed-Peter must have been conceived via immaculate conception (or a traditional negro gang rape) because while his father, United Nations general General Werner Brenner (the great kraut cocksucking character actor Udo Kier), is a kraut, and his mother Martha Brenner (Kitten Natividad of Russ Meyer's Beneath the Valley of the Ultra-Vixens (1979)) is a majority white American mestizo with mammoth mammary glands yet seemingly devoid of a derriere (unquestionably, a common and unfortunate body type for Mexican women), he is as dark as coal and has the most primitive of negro facial features, thus suggesting that he, unlike the average so-called 'African-American,' does not have a single drop of Europid blood. One also must not forget that Peter's dookie-diving daddy Werner is a rampant homosexual of the eccentrically effete yet militaristic Prussian-like sort who has never had sex with his wife and whose best beau is a "dyed-in-the-wool pervert" bodybuilder and creepy kiddy-fucker named Lund (Jonny Pfeifer, who later played alpha-queen fashion designer Karl Lagerfeld in Schlingensief's 1997 film The 120 Days of Bortrop). Shortly after being born, little Peter-Jesu is declared the new messiah by a tyrannical toothless Austrian bishop named Pierre (veteran actor Joachim Tomaschewsky of Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid's 1999 celluloid swansong Beresina) who was excommunicated from the Catholic Church for a good reason, but as the film's intentionally nauseating narrator describes, "...here in Africa people were still plain and simple. And he was welcomed with gratitude."

Peter's UN general father Werner has brought many great things to Africa including a water well so desert negroes don't die of dehydration and a crematorium so that disease-ridden colored corpses can be properly dealt with so as to stop the spread of the various diseases that afflict the Dark Continent, but it is a V2 missile leftover from Uncle Adolf's 12-year-old millennial Reich that he provides them with that will truly launch negroland out of the Stone Age and into the modern age. Indeed, on the eve of little Peter's blessed birth, Werner gives the rocket to the negroes and a "self-appointed dictator" named Hassan El Hatschi (Jones Muguse of Michael Raeburn's Jit (1992))—a bloated and boorish black slob who seems like a poor man's Idi Amin and who, like most third world extremist leaders, was educated in the West (Munich, to be exact)—decides he wants to crash it into the White House, as his ultimate goal is to kill the president of the United States, but the liftoff falls and the Islamofascist pan-Africanist only achieves burn marks and a ruined wardrobe (as can be expected from such a flamboyant fellow, he sports a giant ostentatious Kwanza-colored man-muumuu). With the help of decidedly demented Bishop Pierre, who wants to destroy the world but especially the Catholic Church that he so delusionally believes betrayed him, Hassan will groom the new messiah Peter to be a prophetic angel of death who will kill the U.S. president. Indeed, baby Peter replaces a straw puppet voodoo doll as the religious icon of Pierre's cult and he is placed in the V2 rocket, which, in terms of religious icons, is the group's equivalent to the cross. On the day of Peter's circumcision, merchants from Serengeti bring him myrrh and ivory and Bishop Pierre performs an (anti)erotic exorcism on his mother Martha, who is an ex-hooker with a long rap sheet who once spent twenty years in jail for exhibitionism, to ostensibly cure her of her deep-seated carnal vices. A perennial whore who was forced to become a sexually repressed housewife after marrying Prussian-esque poof Werner, Martha is practically reborn when Pierre gives her an exorcism involving chicken blood that is, "like a gigantic orgasm, the wave of African folklore penetrated her in a growing helix of hatred and violence." Indeed, Martha, like all the young negresses in the area that have been brainwashed by the sexually barbaric Bishop, becomes the blabbering unhinged charlatan Pierre's own personal whore, who he fucks with the hatred of thousands of Red Army Mongol rapists on the eve of the Fall of Berlin. When her husband Werner finds out that she has been fucking the unholy holy man and confronts her about it, Martha wisely brings up the fact that she found a pillow covered in feces that her hubby had soiled after being buggered by his shitstabbing boy toy Lund. Martha also whips out no less than ninety used condoms which she has collected over a 3 month period from her husband's sodomite sexcapades with Lund. When Werner asks her how she knows for sure that it is his semen inside of the well worn rubbers, Martha reminds him of the fact that the only sexual activity that she has ever engaged in with him is fellatio and she is quite accustomed to the “color and taste” as well as “quantity and consistency” of his Germanic gentlemen’s relish. Of course, pathetic Werner cannot deny that it is his spilled sod seed that has contaminated the condoms.

UNITED TRASH

Quite magically, after Peter’s birth and his mother’s exorcism, the local famine ends and the blacks in the area begin becoming literate and even start using sexual contraceptives. Meanwhile, Bishop Pierre comes up with a pernicious prophecy involving Peter and, as the film’s narrator remarks, Martha “internalized the prophecy the hard way” by regularly allowing herself to be vaginally pillaged by the whore of a holy man. Of course, it seems like everything is looking up for Martha and her godly son, at least until she catches her husband’s boyfriend Lund molesting her blessed black baby boy, who is covered in feces when she finds him in the pansy hands of the poof pedophile. Using the “marble test” to confirm whether or not her son was defiled by Lund by seeing if the boy can tolerate a round piece of glass in his rectum, Martha unwittingly puts Peter’s life in jeopardy when the black baby boy places the object up his large negro nostril and begins suffocating as a result. While Werner has a histrionic lover’s spat with Lund, Martha unwittingly terribly disfigures her son’s forehead while attempting to get the marble out of his nose. Unbeknownst to Martha and everyone else, this all part of Bishop Pierre’s self-fulfilling, as he caused the tragic marble incident by sticking pins in a voodoo doll. Meanwhile, black Muslim dictator Hassan has his pan-African rebels blitzkrieg the local UN camp where they lynch and otherwise exterminate all the white people except Werner and Lund and predictably rename the place “Un-Camp Allah.” Forced to adapt to the changing political climate of primitive jigaboo-fascist authoritarianism—a distinctly Afrocentric style of government as described by the likes of great Nordic scholars like Lothrop Stoddard and Hesketh Hesketh-Prichard involving a lot of senseless killing, mindless hedonism, and a lot of sitting around and doing nothing—Werner and Lund dance in a minstrel show for the enjoyment of Dictator Hassan and his rowdy rebels, with the former sporting full-body blackface and a banana skirt and the latter wearing an aesthetically revolting Elvis outfit. When asked how she is doing by a kindly young negro who clearly wants to molest her mammoth cow-udder-like mammary glands, Martha responds, “my child has a marble up his nose and my husband has never fucked me.” After suffering the embarrassment of watching her husband dance in blackface for jolly cracker-lynching negro rebel soldiers, Martha forces Werner to drive her to the local hospital to see if Peter has recovered from a serious surgery involving the marble lodged in his nose. While a sadistic Mengele-esque doctor that moonlights as a rocket scientist named Vanderberg (Miklos Königer)—a “pathetic coward” and “moron in a lab coat” that is “a thorn in the flesh of Werner von Braun” who came to Africa after the Space Shuttle Challenger disaster and started experimenting with “human engines” (aka disposable starving negroes)—manages to get the marble out of poor Peter’s nose, he also destroys his entire face in the process and tells Martha that it will be five years before he can be fully repaired. Needless to say, Martha is rather distraught by the news and after Werner makes the mistake of allowing her to drive him home from the hospital even though she has PMS and is pissed about the fact that she will not see her terribly disfigured spade messiah son for at least another five years, she crashes their car, thus permanently paralyzing her husband from the waist down in the process.

Flash forward five years later, Martha is a disgruntled alcoholic with a softspot for martinis and Werner is a disgraced cripple who wheels around in a shoddily-made UN cart while being made fun of by naughty negro gals because he no longer has the use of his legs, not to mention the fact that he no longer has any political authority as a white ex-ruler in a now black-run land. Luckily, since five years have passed, Werner is able to pick up his son, who is being held in the torture dungeon of demented Dr. Vanderberg. Upon arriving at the dungeon, Vanderberg brags that Peter has a “21.5-inch cock...in his crack.” When Werner finally sees Peter, he discovers a disgruntled retarded dwarf with a gigantic vagina-like gash (labia and all!) on his forehead that randomly ejaculates a grotesque greenish semen-like substance. Although no genius, Werner soon realizes that his son is an evil monster that will be used by Bishop Pierre and Dictator Hassan for super heinous purposes. Among other things, Peter enjoys getting drunk by pouring whiskey in the coochie on his cranium and when one of the Bishop’s young female followers/sex slaves says to him, “Oh yes, little boy...can I touch your little pussy” and pulls a globule of creamy greenish semen out of his forehead, he causes an earthquake that completely destroys the house he is inside. After Martha has sex with her son and subsequently celebrates the big event by dancing around naked outside with her progeny-lover, a miscegenation-based German-negro midget couple, and Hassan, Werner comes to the conclusion that he must assassinate both Peter and the would-be-great black dictator, but he fails miserably and ultimately gives up after multiple fruitless attempts. While he proves to be an impotent killer, Werner finally asserts the tiny drop of rampant heterosexuality lurking inside of his being by finally managing to have sex with his wife Martha for the first time, which ultimately enables them to “find peace in orgasms.” Of course, Bishop Pierre and Hassan finally decide to carry out their bombing of the White House and, in turn, assassination of the president. With Hassan at the wheel, Martha packed in a locked chest, and Peter as the engine (whiskey is poured in the slit in his head for fuel), the rocket is crashed into the White House while the American president is shooting a super 8 porn flick where he is the star. Ultimately, only Martha, Peter, and the president’s porn cameraman, who gets his camera lodged in his head, survive the ordeal. In celebration of their survival, Martha and her son Peter get married, travel to Rome for their honeymoon, and before they know it, they're expecting a baby. Unfortunately, Martha gives birth to a grotesque misbegotten inbred mixed-race creation that resembles a gory ejaculating vagina with eyes, so Peter, who is now the dictator-general of his homeland, does not think twice about tossing it out of a helicopter where it lands on the ground and ejaculates on Bishop Pierre and Werner, who have just married, as they walk out of the church as man and wife, with Udo Kier seeming especially comfortable in a wedding dress. The film closes with the following inter-title: "Dedicated to the victims of slowness and the UN."

UNITED TRASH

For better or worse, I have exposed myself to all forms of exploitation degeneracy, from Troma retardation to the perturbing celluloid pathos of artsploitation auteurs like Marian Dora and Andrey Iskanov to the misogynistic costume melodramas of Andy Milligan to the sadomasochistic sod celluloid of frog fag extremists like Jacques Scandelari, and I have to say that United Trash is easily the most eclectically and eccentrically whacked-out and wayward 'exploitation' flick that I have ever seen, which is probably owed to the fact that auteur Christoph Schlingensief was about as much of an exploitation hack as Snoop Dog is a poet or Eli Wiesel is a historian. Indeed, the marvelous movie miscreation of a man that, in his gleefully deranged demolition of societal mores and sadistically sassy slaughtering of culturally cuckolded liberal (sub)humanist sacred cows, made the great Luis Buñuel seem like an icon of the booboisie and Dadaists seem like a bunch of granny panty wearing old spinsters that talked a lot but had nothing important or insightful to say, Schlingensief's film simultaneously diagnoses, embodies, flaunts, and ultimately mocks every necrotizing pathology that has plagued the Occident at least since the end of the Second World War and disseminates it in a semi-obfuscated multilayered fashion that can be enjoyed by the most hopelessly spastic of hyperactive SpongeBob SquarePants-loving toddlers and Phencyclidine-injecting ghetto jigaboos. Undoubtedly, one of my first thoughts after watching the film is that the world does not have enough nuclear V2 rockets and ancient genocidal blood feuds to clean up the pre-apocalyptic mess that is the acutely accursed West and its chaos-ridden former colonies. As a fiercely fucked Schlingensief farce overflowing with feces, every single foul sexual fetishism known to mankind, and a sort of singular flamboyant forlornness that leads me to believe that the director's dream would have probably been to direct and film a nuclear holocaust while tripping on LSD (after all, Schlingensief was a longtime admirer of Conservative Revolutionary hallucinogenic drug advocate Ernst Jünger). More or less a work that sardonically insinuates that Prussian militarism is a crypto-faggot boys club, third world dictators and revolutionaries are bred and schooled in Europa, American presidents are nothing more than borderline impotent glorified beta-male porn stars who can only get aroused by their own strategically contrived image, Africans are the perennial unwanted bastard children of Europe, the United Nations and United States are just two sides of the same cheap fool's gold coin and the most deleterious threat to world peace since the rise of Bolshevism, and that the world is just one big micromanaged insane asylum that has been taken over by the inmates, United Trash is ultimately the ultimate anti-Hollywood film and the cinematic equivalent of a berserk Frankenstein monster on the rampage, as a work that cinematically deconstructs and reassembles every single celluloid lie that has by crapped out on the world by the likes of Steven Spielberg, Ron Howard, Michael Bay, Robert Redford, and every other Hollywood anti-auteur and reveals them for the obscene absurdities that they are. Recently, I read about a pint-sized Ghanian tribal King based in Germany who rules his people from the safety and luxury of Aryanland via Skype, e-mail, and a phone and all I could think of was how fucked the modern world is and how Schlingensief's United Trash is a piece of curiously and perversely prophetic misunderstood genius that is nothing short of the V2 of art-trash cinema.

-Ty E

THE 120 DAYS OF BOTTRUP
THE 120 DAYS OF BOTTRUP

Christoph Schlingensief (1997)

As far as Kraut comedies are concerned, none can compare to the dementedly iconoclastic semi-surrealist works of Christoph Schlingensief and his work Die 120 Tage von Bottrop – Der letzte neue deutsche Film (1997) aka The 120 Days of Bottrop – The Last New German Film – a ferociously farcical parody of German New Wave cinema (most specifically the works of R.W. Fassbinder) – is arguably the ardent Aryan auteur filmmaker's most keenly reflexive and gut-busting effort. Featuring campy cameos and puckish performances from some of the biggest names in German New Wave (and Kraut cinema in general) – including Udo Kier, Helmut Berger, Volker Spengler, Leni Riefenstahl, Roland Emmerich, among others – The 120 Days of Bottrop is an overwrought unlove letter to German motion pictures that is more harsh than the writings of Friedrich Nietzsche's in terms of its bloodthirsty besmirchment of the Fatherland. The 120 Days of Bottrop features a number of the real-life surviving members of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's lecherous, carnivalesque inner-circle in a notably degenerated state (including Volker Spengler as an eccentric flaccid-cock-smoking producer) as they attempt to remake Pier Paolo Pasolini's final masterpiece Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) at the Potsdamer Platz in Berlin – Europe's largest building site and the setting for Fassbinder's 15 ½ -hour TV movie Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) – in a mere 5 days under increasingly topsy-turvy conditions. Intended as the final work of Neue Deutsche, the filmmakers in The 120 Days of Bottrop run into trouble as they begin to lose money and actors for their ostensibly ambitious final project. Part-homage but mainly a savagely sardonic satire of German cinema and post-nationalist Teutonic kultur in general, The 120 Days of Bottrop is very possibly the final word on German New Wave cinema from a director who couldn't have been better suited for the job. Being a child of the German New Wave and casting many Fassbinder regulars (Margit Carstensen, Udo Kier, Irm Hermann, etc) in his own uncompromising and antagonistic absurdist works, Schlingensief offers a candid and carnal perspective with The 120 Days of Bottrop that is more sportively sadistic than stalely sentimental in its portrayal of the once-revolutionary film movement its pays exorbitantly erudite yet erratic anti-tribute to.

As an unhinged left-winger who had gained international infamy for the many combative 'artistic pranks' (as best exemplified in Paul Poet's documentary Foreigners Out! Schlingensief's Container) he elaborately assembled over the past couple decades, it came as somewhat of a revelation to me that with The 120 Days of Bottrop, Schlingensief was quite critical of the ethno-masochistic and defeatist nature of most German New Wave films/filmmakers, especially regarding those works created during the last waning decade of the movement when passive nihilism came into vogue. Of course, with 100 Years of Adolph Hitler (1989), Schlingensief took a couple sharp snipes at Wim Wenders for his shallow and pathetically passive liberal idealism, but The 120 Days of Bottrop is an full-fledged offensive attack on the overly clichéd and often grueling weltanschmerz that plagues most of late era post-WW2 German New Wave cinema. While also a radical leftist like his cinematic forefathers who had criticized and lampooned Germany's National Socialist past in most of his works, Schlingensief never stooped to the irredeemable level of using his art as a platform for a one-man pity party of the putrid self-denigrating persuasion, nor did he ever embrace the highly contagious and toxic self-censoring artistic-hindrance of political correctness. After all, it is doubtful that Schlingensief was trying to appease culturally sensitive types when he decided to cast a real-life retarded untermensch as Fassbinder's delightfully (if aesthetically disgusting) dimwitted doppelganger in The 120 Days of Bottrop. That being said, it would not be a stretch to describe The 120 Days of Bottrop as the sort of postmodern satire that Trey Parker and Matt Stone of South Park fame would have directed had they had an encyclopedic understanding of German cinema instead of a proclivity towards fanboy wet dreaming about pop culture trash. Of course, one wouldn't expect anything less from Schlingensief; an anarchic auteur who had the audacity to direct Mutters Maske (1988); a terribly tragicomic remake of Jud Süß (1940) director Veit Harlan's National Socialist arthouse masterpiece Opfergang (1944). Needless to say, I doubt Joseph Goebbels would have found as much solace in Schlingensief's remake as he did with Harlan's celluloid magnum opus.

For whatever reason (but indubitably to mock the pretentious German-Dutch auteur in some sense), The 120 Days of Bottrop opens with the intertitle, "Wenders would have called this film a melancholy parody. Fassbinder never would have made it." Indeed, the film is a spoof, but it is more maniacally and malevolently merry than mirthless as Schlingensief certainly does not shed a tear for Fassbinder and his friends. Indeed, despite his cinematic experiments in black comedy with later films like The Third Generation (1979) and Lola (1981), Fassbinder would have never made a film so patently preposterous and seemingly unpretentious as The 120 Days of Bottrop; a work that has more in common with the early arthouse-sleaze films of John Waters like Pink Flamingos (1972) and Desperate Living (1977) than following in the rich cultural footsteps of the German New Wave filmmakers. I don't think it would be an exaggeration to state that not since Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977) has a German film been so gravely and feverishly preoccupied with its nation's cultural history as The 120 Days of Bottrop, yet it is also a work that – not unlike popular American animated sitcoms like The Simpsons and Family Guy – can be also enjoyed by hopeless philistines who fail to appreciate its profoundly pastiche persuasion. Helmut Berger concludes The 120 Days of Bottrop with the snide statement, "I've had enough. If I had to act in one more German movie, it would be suicide." Knowing that Fassbinder concluded his prestigious acting career looking quite disheveled and oafish in the intrinsically mediocre and pathetically prosaic yet nonetheless sometimes strangely enthralling West German cyberpunk flick Kamikaze 1989 (1982), one can only wonder whether or not the Bavarian auteur filmmaker's fatal overdose that same year was the result of an unconscious death wish, but judging by Schlingensief's social commentary in The 120 Days of Bottrop, one does not have to think too hard to come up with an informed hypothesis. After all, the German New Wave celebrity died with a copy of a script he was working on that paid homage to the life of a Marxist Jewess who sought the violent overthrow of his nation, which is undoubtedly a great metaphor for the life and work of Fassbinder and Neuer Deutscher Film as a collective, as so astutely observed and facetiously expressed by Christoph Schlingensief in The 120 Days of Bottrop.

THE 120 DAYS OF BOTTRUP

-Ty E

FREAKSTARS 3000

Christoph Schlingensief (2003)

While in kindergarten at a multicultural public school, I first become aware of retarded people and their particularly outlandish and oftentimes uncontrollable behavior. Herded around the school like a bunch of spastic cattle by obese Negresses wearing unflattering sweatpants, these many times slobbering and even sometimes indecently exposed individuals certainly made their presence well known, whether they were conscious of it or not. Growing up as a wildly imaginative and television/movie obsessed child, I concocted a lot of fantasy ideas for TV series, including a 'concentration camp comedy' starring Woody Allen, but never did I dream of a musical talent show with an all star mentally retarded cast, but I was not the least bit surprised when I discovered that absurdist avant-garde auteur Christoph Maria Schlingensief – who once started the political party Chance 2000 that encouraged the mentally feeble to run for office – did. Predating yet in a similar spirit to the popular reality show Pop Idol/American Idol, except less retarded, Schlingensief's Freakstars 3000 (2004) is a delightful documentary work featuring highlights and unseen footage of the German filmmaker's 6-episode-TV show of the same name. As a work that attempts to, "highlight the problems of non-handicapped people," Freakstars 3000 is certainly not the sort of work that one would expect to be the most successful TV program ever featured on the German Music Television Station VIVA due to perceived exploitation of less than musically inclined mental invalids. But then again, it is a sign of the times when institutionalized disabled folks make for more entertaining and original performers than those plastic philistines that occupy prime-time television. As a truly terrific testament to the melodic tenacity of Mother Nature's most special disabled darlings, Freakstars 3000 lets the viewer know that Germany's got talent, especially when it comes to the unique untermensch sort.

In between yelling amongst one another and engaging in erratic and oftentimes unpredictable convulsion fits, the couple dozen or so gloriously grotesque outsider artists of Freakstars 3000 compete for the positively prestigious personal prize of being one of the seven finalists who will ultimately comprise the band "Mutter Sucht Schrauben" aka "Mother Seeks Screws"; a discordant art rock group that plays their instruments out-of-sync with one another in a most charmingly carnivalesque manner. Shot on location at the Thiele Winkler Home for people with physical and mental disabilities in Lichtenrade, Berlin, Freakstars 3000 is a welcome exception conventional reality TV mundanity as the show – with its curious yet oddly charming mental and physical cripples of immense courage – has more genuine human passion and expression than what seems like the entire history of so-called 'reality TV' combined, as the contestants of Schlingensief's broadcasted realism, unlike the narcissistic nincompoops of popular American shows like Big Brother and Survivor, are for the most part completely unconscious of the fact that the camera is constantly rolling. The super freaks of the documentary range from a shy, sensitive youthful girl with Down's syndrome to a morbidly obese middle-aged man with the IQ of a 7-year-old to a spastic 60ish-year-old with an unhealthy hatred for "the swine" Adolf Hitler. Unfortunately, as I discussed with a college friend so many years ago, like the special Special Olympics and other events that celebrate disenfranchised groups, it is typically the least retarded person on Freakstars 3000 who ends up being one of the final contestants thus defeating the purpose of it in the first place, although a couple extremely socially/mentally-challenged performers do get to be part of the illustrious music super group "Mother Seeks Screws." Assuredly one of the most talked-about talents of the show is Achim von Paczensky – an ignoble member of the nobility who has had indubitably fallen from grace due to his hereditary taint – that unlike virtually other contestant on the show, seems relatively normal (at least no less mentally disadvantaged than the average American) and is even in a serious relationship with a special lady whose personal aesthetic and singing style is in the tradition of Germany's tragic singer/model Nico (Christa Päffgen); or at least Sir Schlingensiefel believes so. Of course, Schlingensiefel regular Mario Garzaner – a small, swarthy retarded man who played the role of Rainer Werner Fassbinder in The 120 Days of Bottrop (1997) and was also part of the political party Chance 2000 and Big Brother-inspired television show Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container – steals the show in Freakstars 3000, which is no surprise for anyone that is familiar with his real-life, non-performances.

FREAKSTARS 3000

As can be expected, Freakstars 3000 sparked a storm of controversy in Germany, not least of all because only two generations ago, disabled members of the volk were oftentimes sterilized and even euthanized, thereupon inspiring moral ambiguity and shame in viewers who don't know how to respond to a rather retarded man having a connoisseur's shit on live television. As for the characteristically cliché liberal/democratic claim that Freakstars 3000 was a work of tasteless exploitation and not entertainment, I believe such a sentiment is more telling of the guilty conscious of the meekish complainer (as probably intended by the director) and not the show itself because neither Schlingensiefel nor the contestants at anytime seem to be participating in a work of malicious manipulation and degradation. For example, when a self-conscious contestant complains that he got only a C in music classic, Schlingensiefel – a clever and creative man of high-intelligence – states that he got an F in the same class, yet he still sings, thus giving the petrified performer the much-needed courage he needed to go on with the solo singing. Also, I do not think it would be an exaggeration to state that being a part of Freakstars 3000 was probably for many of the performers, the greatest highlight of their lives and probably the point where they felt the most confident and even 'normal'; which is no small achievement on Schlingen-sief's part as he took an active role throughout the filming of the show, including wrestling and bathing members of the home for the merry mongoloids. After all, when is the last time a bleeding heart liberal set themselves up for nationally broadcasted television show as Schlingensief does when he experiences defeat at the the hands of a rather rotund retard during an impromptu wrestling match?!

-Ty E

THE AFRICAN TWINTOWERS
THE AFRICAN TWINTOWERS

Christoph Schlingensief (2008)

About a decade after completing his last feature-length film Die 120 Tage von Bottrop (1997) aka The 120 Days of Bottrop – an ambitious work the director regarded as ‘The Last New German Film’ – German absurdist auteur Christoph Maria Schlingensief flew to Lüderitz, Namibia, the German South-West African colony with an entire cast, including actors Irm Hermann, Patti Smith, Robert Stadlober, Björn Thors, Klaus Beyer, Stefan Kolosko, etc. and a full film crew to direct his last cinematic work, The African Twintowers. Of course, at the time of filming, Schlingensief had no idea that it would be his last attempt at directing a film as fate beckoned and he became ill with lung cancer in 2008, tragically dying – not many years after his father – at the premature age of 49 on August 21, 2010 in Berlin, Germany. Unfortunately, Schlingensief – who spent the last decade or so running a political party (Chance 2000), hosting and directing TV shows (FreakStars 3000, Foreigners out! Schlingensiefs Container), working as a theatre (Hamlet: This is your Family, Nazi-line, Elfriede Jelinek's Bambiland) and opera (Richard Wagner's Parsifal) stage director, and pretty much everything else related to audio-visual media aside from film – ultimately failed in his attempt to bring The African Twintowers to completion as scripted, but the filmmaker eventually released a documentary for German TV of the same name featuring footage from the aborted film and the many but sometimes merry misadventures it entailed. As explained early on in The African Twintowers (2008), Schlingensief's bag (containing his annotated script for his Wagnerian 9/11 epic) was stolen by two local Herero homeboys, so on the second day of filming he decided to scrap the script as the ill-fated filmmaker falsely believed the random act of thievery was a positive premonition of sorts. Originally about Richard Wagner, the 9/11 terrorist attacks, Hagen of Norse Mythology and Wagner's Der Ring des Nibelungen, and the Namibia Herero people, among many other seemingly unrelated things, Schlingensief refused to follow what he had left of the script as he felt such organized filmmaking made him feel “like a civil servant.” Essentially, The African Twintowers follows often-times flustered and even sometimes furious Schlingensief as he spends 27 days in exotic Afrika as he hopelessly tries to make sense of a film that was never meant to be, but would ultimately sow a different film of sorts which I am reviewing now. Featuring narration by the director recorded 3 years after the artistic nightmare in Namibia and not long after contracting life-threatening lung cancer, The African Twintowers is undoubtedly Schlingensief's most dispiriting work as a document of a prematurely deceased polymath's faux pas, frustration, and eventual failure with the medium he loved most. Needless to say, when so-called “Godmother of Punk” Patti Smith has come to comfort your tears on an African beach, it cannot be the most blessed of days.

Mockingly and pseudo-pretentiously dressed as ethno-masochistic German filmmakers Michael Verhoeven (Nasty Girl, Mutters Courage) and Wim Wenders (Wings of Desire, Until the End of the World) with an exceedingly effete scarf and gay cowboy hat, Christoph Schlingensief enters Namibia passionately, if absurdly thinking, "Can you imagine? The Golden Palm at Cannes?" in regard to his latest attempt at an eccentric epic set in the dauntingly dark continent, The African Twintowers. Over a decade before, Schlingensief directed the cinematically charming United Trash (1996) aka The Slit – a United Nations gross-out spoof set in Africa that is probably the only film to feature the curious aesthetic cross between the works of John Waters and Herschell Gordon Lewis with that of Leni Riefenstahl – but his naughty negrophiliac dreams of Namibia for The African Twintowers would not be in his favor and the film would be plagued by an overwhelming number of personal and artistic problems, including the death of the director's father via heart attack and steady dissolution of all of his artistic intentions and resources. Originally envisioned as a feature about the American catastrophe of the September 11 terrorist attacks happening in an abject African slum where dead New Yorkers would be satirically set side by side with the sort of starved, disease-ridden bodies that appear in Africa quite regularly, The African Twintowers was set to be a sardonic attack on both Western technocratic globalization and the hyperbolic glorification of 9/11 victims in American mainstream media, but instead Schlingensief was inevitably left with 180 hours of footage that was judged by various film editors as being unworkable and inaccessible. Inspired by the Edda of Norse mythology, his former mentor Werner Nekes, and Werner Herzog's Fitzcarraldo (1982), Schlingensief did manage to create a piece for his ambitious long-term project The Animatograph after moving (with the help of happy Herero friends) a wooden ship entitled the 'arch' through the desert for several kilometers that was eventually placed on a revolving stage that was bombarded by jubilant locals, which was also supposed to act as the first set-piece for The African Twintowers, but things were not to be in the humid hotbed of "Unity, Liberty, Justice." Naturally, knowing Schlingensief's resourcefulness and creativity, not all of the footage to The African Twintowers went to total waste as some of it was screened at various art exhibitions throughout Europe and the boat was eventually taken to the Burgtheater in Vienna, Austria in 2006, becoming the center-piece in his Actionist-inspired improvised theatre play Area 7 - St. Matthews Expedition (2006); the final culmination of his animatograph project.

Ultimately, the documentary The African Twintowers acts as a torrid testimonial to the fact that Christoph Schlingensief had totally extinguished his vitality as a filmmaker, at least in any tradition sense, as by that point in his life he had already become heavily involved with 'active art' projects (political parties, TV shows, avant-garde stage-directing, etc.) without boundaries and with less rules when compared to the intrinsically contrived nature of filmmaking. Although he was never interested in directing films with linear storylines, by the time he started working on The African Twintowers that had a beginning and an end, once writing: "Whether in the theatre or in the cinema: it starts on the left, finishes on the right; there is the beginning, there is the end. A fundamental mistake." Always feeling constrained by the limits of filmmaking, it was only inevitable that Schlingensiefel would transcend his roots as a film director like no filmmaker before or after him. Regarding his failed but sometimes fun experience with The African Twintowers, Schlingensiefel states at the end of the documentary: "It was a great experience which generated amazing images, strange situations...which...brought up a lot of issues, especially regarding 9/11 and the significance of images of icons which are created and remain with entire communities over decades perhaps centuries and which will just seem like alien visions from outer space one day. Archeologists will then excavate this place with bits of food and a boat and they say, ok, there's been a river where boats could navigate, so this project can be used to distort history and produce a greater truth than the mind can process. That's why it defies beauty. Because you can't find closure." In a sense, the documentary The African Twintowers also acts as a sort of final testament for Schlingensiefel's life, ending the work with the somewhat worrisome and unsurprisingly nihilistic words: "I've always enjoyed life a lot, even more so now but what's really the point of it all? I mean, what...?" Judging by the footage featured in The African Twintowers for the aborted project of the same name, the unfinished film resembled a cross between Schlingensiefel's previous African flick United Trash and a work by American 'enfant terrible' Harmony Korine (Gummo, Umshini Wam), but one can only speculate what could have been, but as the director once stated, "I often produce images no actor would put in his casting tape." Assuredly, one of the best sequences in The African Twintowers is when Schlingensiefel teases and attacks a group of hyper and hysterical Herero schoolchildren while dressed up in an absurd penguin costume. As he explains quite seriously in the documentary, Schlingensiefel had no interest in saying sorry to the people of Namibia for ancient colonial crimes of long-dead imperial Germans, but instead brings euphoria and splendid recollections to the Herero people of today. After all, what child wouldn't have fond and vivid memories of a wacked-out German guy with a fucked-up haircut bringing a rotating boat to their barren and scarcely populated desert?!

THE AFRICAN TWINTOWERS

-Ty E

MA MÈRE

Christophe Honoré (2004)

It's easy to see that French feminist Catherine Breillat composes most of her daring sexuality based on the text works of French shock-eroticist author and auteur Georges Bataille who is perhaps known best for his alluring novella Story of the Eye. From his posthumous work comes the polished after-result that is Ma mère. In what was a highly controversial creation comes a film that might be as controversial as the novel was intended. From stark perversions and dark helpings of incest and other forms of sodomy is where Ma mère reigns over most. Isabelle Huppert (The Piano Teacher) plays a daring role as Hélène, the mother of a sheltered religious boy who has yet to jump the transcendence from boy to man. He represents a spiritual force of one who should be sympathized with as he crosses a point as loveless virgin to sadist. try as they might but I could not favor this character in any way, in fact, I can't bring up another character to mind that I loathe more than this one. He's ruined life, love, and linguistics in order to satisfy his selfless ways. It's this powerful emotion evoked in me that morphs Ma mère from simpleton French film to a thematic motion picture worthy of a viewing. Postmodern French femininity. The only scene celebratory of his character is in which he is on the beach in company of the incredibly lovely Emma de Caunes. He looks slightly behind him and notices a crying child. In effort to comfort him, he questions the child's native language, first asking if Spanish then Italian. The mother grabs the child and walks the crying child out of camera view. In this bright scene, a light is shown in a dark corridor and a sense of humanity has been revealed. Before you can get too comfortable with a character that is enjoyable, it's all ripped out of underneath when Pierre forces Hansi (de Caunes) to enact a sadistic game of torture upon the adorable and eccentric Loulou. Right: Emme de Caunes Hélène has picked her son up from his cozy environment and has been placed in an abode of sex, degradation, prostitution, and with incestuous scene set-ups spotlighting Hélène as the partisan of the group that enforces a fast lifestyle of sex, drugs, and rock n' roll. Ma mère also happens to be one of a very small number to be rated NC-17. This rating is mainly for the "aberrant" sexuality displayed mercilessly in Ma mère. Pierre divulges in an early public demonstration of the meaning of getting his "salad tossed" while his mother stares coldly in his direction. Pierre early on in the film was a victim of a social-sexual phobia resulting in his lack of cleanliness and ability to act mature in crowded situations. Not even past the credits will Pierre become a man like his father was. Ma mère is indeed a daring exercise, both in displaying vulgar perversions and lurid nudity but also in adapting a Bataille novel to the screen. The chemistry between Louis Garrel and Isabelle Huppert is electrifying and forbidden. As their lips become mere inches apart from each others, you either deny an attraction behind incest or welcome the cinematic sexual advances of such a provocative film. Either or, you will notice the emotions and you might even urge towards the screen for the star-crossed lovers to finally accept the common embrace. In the final scene, you will become exasperated with feelings of regret or glad that you witnessed this perplexing experience. When questioned about Ma mère being incestuous in regards as to "why I watch the films I do", I answer the simple truth. Ma mère is concerning the dissolution of organized religion and the advances of sin and perversion, all the while containing light scenes of incest. One thing's for certain, in the final frame, you will either laugh out loud or remain boldly silent as you witness a man who has lost it all on the verge of a frantic sexual breakdown. Ma mère's verdict is judged better than half of Breillat's shitty works about femininity and the discovery of adolescence.

MA MÈRE

-mAQ

3 DEAD GIRLS!

Christopher Alan Broadstone (2007) Christopher Alan Broadstone's trilogy of award-winning horror shorts is now available on a single disc. Each film has an intense philosophical tone to them with throbbing soundtracks and little perks on the end of the initial stories. No story has been told the same way. Broadstone makes sure of that. The first short is entitled "SCREAM FOR ME". The plot ripped from the summary reads as followed. "One killer becomes a victim of another more brutal and insane than himself" You ever watch a film about a serial killer and just want the worst possible outcome to happen? To challenge the irony itself is a big no-no on the cinema screen. What starts off as a tale of "love" (Note "River's Edge for the inside meaning of this) and this boy's murder of someone he "loves". This is when we meet the Madman (Tony Simmons). This "Madman" is of one of the classic redneck stereotype. Tony Simmons does a horrifying job as playing this maniac. I'd greatly like to see Madman be in a feature length feature. He has enough madness and rage to be one of the great lunatics on screen. Casted perfectly, complimented with amazing camera work, and spiced up with some of the most horrendous sexual torture ever filmed, on screen or not, Scream for Me is a grail to be seen. Next short film is MY SKIN! Which in my own humble opinion is the most perplexing and rewarding. The plot as described "Death flies in to collect the soul of a murdered young woman, but first takes revenge on her killer". Leave it to Broadstone to churn out great ideas and the re-imagining of the classic figure Death. No longer a cloaked figure with a scythe, he dons the more horrifying bird mask, over-wrinkled face, and black suit. Reminds me of the original Men In Black witnessed during the horrific events that occurred in Point Pleasant (See also; Mothman). What starts as a regular pickup, he decides to open his great big book of death and make an edit. This then turns into a very perplexing re-visioning of a crime scene. With a game of cat-and-mouse that is similar to the pedophile scene in Running Scared, the Death figure growls his scratchy voice and lets the deed be done and the dead be dead. Last we have HUMAN NO MORE, the last and my least favorite. Now just because it is my least favorite of the three doesn't mean it is remotely bad. "A private detective consumed by an irreconcilable murder case descends into his caustic underworld one last time". HNM is wonderfully shot from two perspectives, the camera he has set up and an unidentified slithering and hissing entity. With a monologue that is as burdening as it is the truth, it does not leave you emotionally unphased. The points he brings up are true. R. Budd Dwyer himself would have been proud. This of course ends with a bizarre twist from a master storyteller. Thus ending his sick trilogy of films that rivals Douglas Buck's Family Portraits. Tony Simmons assumes all title roles. He plays a muscled psycho, the whimsically creepy Death, and the tortured detective. What a range of emotions. The situations that these films delve into is a sensitive yet very dark place. The flipside of tragedy. This is the place where fear and vengeance hides. 3 Dead Girls! Is the best compilation i have ever bare witness to. Filmmakers wish they could be as ingenious as Broadstone. As you may have noticed, I have included no screen shots. The reason for this is that i want this experiance to be as visually surprising as it was for me. Enjoy!

3 DEAD GIRLS!

-mAQ

VOICE OVER

Christopher Monger (1983)

If the word 'American' actually still meant something and reflected the silent majority population of the United States, I would probably describe myself as a self-loathing American, but it is simply impossible for me to 'feel' American. Despite my lack of attachment to my arbitrary nation of birth, I oftentimes think about how it must feel to be a citizen in one of the modern multicultural and technocratic Americanized European nations. I know that my Dutch grandfather, who was born in 1919 and left the Netherlands in the early 1950s after his country went kaput as a result of the Second World War, was in for quite the shock when he visited his native nation after living in the United States for a couple decades and discovered how morally and culturally degenerate the country had become. It's just mere speculation on my part, but out of all the western European peoples, it must suck the most to be English, which is certainly reflected in British music (after all, punk was spawned from this little island), film, culture, and the once glorious but now decidedly defunct nation's increasingly 'colorful' multicultural population. While I'm not all that big of a fan of skinhead bands, I think Skrewdriver said it best when they sang, "once we had an Empire, and now we've got a slum." Indeed, you know your country is royally screwed when rather primitive people that you had previously colonized like the Pakistanis are turning your preteen daughters into sex slaves and a city like Birmingham contracts a misandristic feminist artist to create a public sculpture depicting a 'normal family' as two single non-white sisters with mongrel bastard children and no husbands. Created over three decades before Britain became the totally foredoomed pre-third world multicultural hellhole it is today (not that it was not already a multicultural hellhole at the time it was made), Voice Over (1983) written and directed by Welsh auteur Christopher Monger (Repeater, Girl from Rio), the man who is best known for the 'tranny yuppie' satire Just Like a Woman (1992) and especially the PG-rated 'feel good' Hugh Grant comedy The Englishman Who Went Up a Hill But Came Down a Mountain (1995).

Certainly, considering the director's rather unfortunate subsequent works, Voice Over is not a film that I would have watched had I not read a review comparing it to the haunting and dispiriting spirit of the revolutionary post-punk band Joy Division, who probably better expressed more than any other group of their time the sense of alienation, abject hopelessness, nihilism, and somberness of England during the late-1970s/early-1980s. Before directing his absurdly underrated no-budget 16mm cult flick Voice Over and eventually becoming a mainstream filmmaker (of which, the director would later reflect, "I never saw myself as becoming part of commercial cinema – if you'd told me then that I would end up in Hollywood I would probably have been appalled")

VOICE OVER

Monger was a meager art student from Cardiff, Wales who attempted to take a theoretical formalist and deconstructivist approach to cinema as influenced by the French New Wave, especially Godard, as demonstrated by his early feature Repeater (1979). It was only with Voice Over that Monger managed to speak to his zeitgeist and demonstrate that he was one of the few British filmmakers to understand the foreboding spirit of his time to the point where even Americans were able to relate to it, or as the director stated regarding how the work managed to singlehandedly jumpstart his filmmaking career, "In 1982 I had shown VOICE OVER at a festival in Los Angeles. At the end of the screening I had an agent, a manager and a lawyer. It would take me almost a decade to make a film here, but I suddenly found myself in a culture that embraced me." The dark yet oftentimes humorous story of an educated yet seemingly Asperger-plagued 'DJ' of the terribly lonely sort who lives in a fantasy world whose Jane Austen-esque early 19th century romantic radio serial becomes successful, albeit for all the wrong reasons, thus plummeting the character into a pathetic world of ridicule from the fairer sex that eventually erupts into the most sickening of crimes and obsessions, Voice Over has been labeled by certain fecund-deprived feminists as 'misogynistic' but I guess that reality then would also have to be misogynistic.

Voice Over begins with dreamlike scenes of a beautiful early 19th century blonde debutante named Elizabeth (Bish Nethercote) dancing at a ball with her much desired aristocratic male soldier suitor during a wonderful romantic evening that, as described by the narrator, had "risen to her splendid expectations." Elizabeth's story is part of a 19th century romance radio serial called "Thus Engaged" that is written and narrated by lonely middle-aged fat man Fats Bannerman (played by British actor Ian McNeice, who went on to star in big Hollywood films like Ace Ventura: When Nature Calls (1995) and Roman Polanski's 2005 adaptation of Oliver Twist) who lives in a fantasy world of his own making where he 'rewrites' Jane Austen novels from the perspective of a woman, Elizabeth, inspired by incidents from his own life while listening to early 19th century music and looking at a stack of paintings from the same era for artistic inspiration. A dejected divorcee of the monetarily cuckolded sort who has to pay a huge amount of alimony to his wife who took the kids to live in Italy, Fats lives a non-existence in a dilapidated warehouse located in a white ghetto on the docks. A perennial loner who has been thrown into isolation out of circumstance, Fats' only friend is special effects man F.X. Jones (John Cassady, who had small roles in big films like Richard Donner's Superman (1978) and Highlander (1986)), who he credits for his show's artistic integrity. Fats is a traditionalist who hates the modern world as demonstrated by the fact that he looks in disgust at a young man who resembles a negro albino who dares to play his vulgar music in the subway. When Fats moves away from the belligerent young man and the bombastic noise being excreted from his boom box, the youthful degenerate follows him. Later that day, Fats adapts his subway experience for his radio serial via his alter-ego Elizabeth, which he translates as follows: "So Elizabeth had not enjoyed the coach journey. Her close proximity to an uncouth lout, intent on the singing of bawdy songs had been most upsetting." Needless to say, Fats' loser life takes a dramatic change when his radio show becomes unexpectedly very popular and he even wins a prestigious award, though he is not prepared for the unpredictable consequences of said success.

While Fats is quite happy and humbled by his recent good fortune, it only takes an exceedingly bitchy journalist and 'modern woman' that clearly has a master's degree in feminist lobotomizing to forever taint his attitude and overall outlook on life and obstruct his sanity. After turning down an interview with TIME magazine because it is a hateful rag that even "Marlon Brando won't touch," Fats makes the major mistake of agreeing to do an interview with a corrosive young enterprising journalist named Cecilia Crane (Sarah Martin) who digs up as much dirt as she can on the radio playwright and then throws it in his face when he least suspects it. After mocking the fact this his exceedingly sentimental radio show has somehow become a big hit, Ms. Crane accuses Fats of attempting to hide from the "mucky 20th century" and when he concurs, she states, "So you want to forget about today and all its complexities and return to some idyllic, aristocratic, simple world." After that, Ms. Crane patronizingly asks Fats why he would bother to write "romantic tripe" when his own personal life is full of failures, including a nasty divorce. When Crane asks Fats who he thinks makes up his main fan base, he defensively replies, "Okay, tell me. White, middle class, middle aged, university educated, is that it? Because if it is, I don't mind that. I'm not ashamed of it. It's not a crime. At least I have an audience, a big one," thus indicating that he thinks the journalist is a cliché liberal academic type who gets a self-righteous kick out of cowardly trashing her own racial and cultural background. Of course, Fats is somewhat surprised when he learns that his main audience is "teenagers" and "mostly poor kids" who listen to his show because they find it outmoded and unintentionally comical. Fats also is dismayed to discover that he has a cult following of older people who listen to the show for its "kitsch nature." Naturally, it is the last straw when Ms. Crane accuses him of writing "rip offs" of "paragraphs of Jane Austen, with a few words altered" and reveals that she knows he specialized in Jane Austen's work in college.

After his corrosive date with Ms. Crane, Fats walks out on the interview, gets good and drunk at a local bar to the point of staggering in the streets and collapsing in a grimy gutter, and eventually somehow staggers into a punk bar where he speaks about Elizabeth's "wet fart," stating out loud to himself while in the company of young punk folk, "That really would amaze the whole room. Elizabeth farted loudly. Her skirt rose noticeably. Mr. Bennet commented on its agreeable scent." When two young female Fats' 'fans' take him back to their apartment, they humiliate him by accusing him and his male radio serial characters of being "queer," cocktease him, and then take turns physically assaulting him while accusing him of being an “asshole” and “dirty old man,” among other things. Combined with his hateful write-up by journalist Cecilia Crane and his emotional and physical abuse at the hands of two beautiful yet sadistic blonde babes, Fats is from then on a changed man and his radio serial Thus Engaged begins reflecting that fact. Indeed, the show turns into a sort of dark and salacious horror show involving phantoms, murderers, and female vampires posing as prostitutes to lure in unsuspecting aristocratic gentlemen. Fats’ best friend and collaborator F.X. confesses he does not like the new route of the show and blames it on Ms. Crane’s article. Despite the disturbing character of the new show, it becomes all the more popular and the radio station begins receiving tons of new sponsors.

VOICE OVER

Meanwhile, Fats ‘finds’ a seemingly comatose girl (played by Bish Nethercote who, in an interesting case of casting, also plays ‘Elizabeth’ and one of the two girls that assaulted Fats) on the street who has been brutally raped and beaten and brings her back home with him where he nurses her back to health with the help of a discernibly reluctant doctor friend who attempts to coerce his comrade into bringing the physically and emotionally battered young lady to an institution, “She’s in shock, deep, deep, shock.” The Doctor even suspects Fats of being the brute who brutally battered and sexually pillaged the young girl, but he confidently, if not somewhat dubiously replies, stating, “I met her once a long while back, I recognized her. She was in the alley,” thus hinting that she is indeed one of the two girls that had previously tormented him and that he may indeed be the one who ravaged her (in fact, Fats even goes so far as confessing that he would have done something like that when he was younger). Despite making her more or less his slave, Fats attempts no sexual contact with her and even covers her body with a blanket while changing her clothes since she cannot do it herself due to her comatose state. Eventually, Elizabeth begins walking but hardly talking, with “bitch” being the only word she utters, as if it was the very last word that was said to her by her rapist during that fateful night when she had her womanhood irreparably despoiled. Since it is the first and last word she utters, “Bitch” becomes the emotionally destroyed dame’s name.

When Fats’ show becomes so successful that it gets picked up by a major radio station, he buys a new apartment for himself and ‘Bitch’ to stay in as he hopes to make his would-be-beloved an honest bourgeois woman but she seems completely unaffected by the change and the glorified radio DJ mumbles to himself while brooding in his tighty whities “how much longer can the silence endure?” in regard to the sad and static state of his non-relationship. Indeed, more and more Fats’ radio show begins reflecting his lonely non-life, with Elizabeth representing the ‘Bitch.’ On a particularly heated show, Fats recites, “It had all changed for him and was changing still. It had all gone. He had traveled so far. A dead landscape. All dead! Elizabeth dead, her remains unburiable. Out of reach, out of all sight, moving away from him so fast.” After one particularly botched show, Fats, who suffered a speech impediment as a young lad, begins stuttering live during the broadcast. After the show, Fats has salt rubbed in his wounds when he bumps into reporter Cecilia Crane who mockingly states regarding his stutter-ridden broadcast, "Yeah, you're really using yourself now, aren't you, Mr Bannerman? Your new approach, very modern. And you're not losing your audience, either." Eventually, Fats completely loses his cool and airs a show featuring numerous multiple loops of him talking to the grating sounds of static noise, thus reflecting the cognitive dissonance that has completely clouded his frail forlorn mind. Somewhat inexplicably, 'Bitch' is so deeply affected by the landscape of the seemingly demonic and deranging horrendous noise that she leaves her house for the first time and shows up at the broadcast studio to meet Fats as if instinctively responding to a mating call. After the anarchic show ends, 'Bitch' and Fats walk hand-in-hand into the night and eventually end up at the warehouse where they used to live. While ballroom dancing for the first time in a scene in stark contrast to the opulent and deeply romantic balls of the DJ's radio serial, Fats drives a pair of scissors into Bitch's heart and then proceeds to violently stab her deathly stunning blood-soiled corpse.

Despite being rather humorous and somewhat quirky in parts, Voice Over is easily the darkest, most disconcerting, and nightmarishly nihilistic British film from the 1980s that I have ever seen, with the no-budget and strangely sympathetic Dennis Nilsen 'biopic' Cold Light of Day (1989) directed by one-time female auteur Fhiona-Louise, who purportedly committed suicide, being probably the only Brit flick of its time to even remotely compare to director Christopher Monger's work in terms of outstanding abject hopelessness. Indeed, if Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977) influenced Joy Division frontman Ian Curtis to hang himself on that fateful day when he committed suicide, I don't even want to know how he would have responded to Monger's mesmerizingly melancholy cult masterpiece. In her January 23, 1983 review of the film, Janet Maslin demonstrated her complete and utter incapacity to understand the work by remarking, "Whatever Mr. Monger's purpose may be in showing Fats's progress from Jane Austen to this juncture, it is of less interest than his method. His VOICE OVER [...] which ought to be shocking, has a weary and repetitive flavor," as if she, like the other liberal pseudo-elite critics, who in her own minor way as a mainstream film critic helped foster and support the sort of post-industrial multicultural hellhole that exists in America, Britain, and the rest of the Occident today, is in total denial of the dystopian world that currently exists. Of course, it is easy to see why a film that is so poetically truthful and ultimately unnerving would soon disappear after its brief release, as it not only forces them to think, but also confront their precarious situation during a troubled time in history of almost seemingly apocalyptic proportions. Indeed, Monger's film is the rare sort of unrelentingly brutal and absolutely artistically uncompromising film that makes the work of Ingmar Bergman seem optimistic by comparison and probably even has the to power to push a potential lone nut shooter type over the edge, though they might not be able to articulate why they found it so unsettling and inciting, as Voice Over is a work that captures the emotional spirit of a zeitgeist without so much as making a single reference to political trends or even popular culture of that era. Indeed, one of the film's major strengths is in what it chooses not to show and not because of what it does show, especially in regard to cultural trends, as it makes the protagonist's alienation seem all the more obscenely tragic. In fact, auteur Monger cannot even explain why his film is so potent as demonstrated by his remark: "What I do know, now having written literally dozens of screenplays, is that stories have a strange organic life of their own. It is often only later that you find out what you were truly writing about. More problematic, what the filmmakers 'make' and what the audience sees can be very, very different. To attempt to say what I think VOICE OVER is about at this distance would be at best a lie, and at worst, an apology. What I can say is that what it really represents for me is me becoming a filmmaker." Rather unfortunately, Monger would never become a better filmmaker as none of his subsequent works would feature the originality or artistic integrity that he achieved with Voice Over, but he would go on to receive much greater commercial success and is still somewhat successful, as he co-penned the screenplay for the critically revered HBO film Temple Grandin (2010) starring Claire Danes as the eponymous real-life autistic livestock behavior expert and pioneering autism activist.

VOICE OVER

With the rebooting of seemingly ancient children's cartoons like Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles, the ostensibly 'ironic' dress style of effete bourgeois-born fashion victims known as 'hipsters,' and the obsession of Hollywood and mainstream television with postmodernism and pointless pop culture trivia, it seems that the West, especially America and the countries that have been worst hit by the post-WWII culture-distorting trend of Hollywoodization, is obsessed with re-obtaining some lost golden age that never existed in the first place, with the protagonist Fats of Voice Over being a more 'idiosyncratic' and ultimately tragic example of this trend, as he has totally isolated himself from mainstream society and sought refuge in a bygone puritanical time when things were much simpler to the point where people find his work entertaining for the exact opposite reason he originally intended. Indeed, Fats is a sort of radio serial equivalent to European arthouse auteur filmmakers like Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Der Tod der Maria Malibran) and his pal Daniel Schmid (Tonight or Never, La Paloma) who, instead of taking part in creating the sort of trendy and aesthetically static polemical works that were popular during their unfortunate post-68er-Bewegung zeitgeist, sought solace and escapism in decadent aestheticism of the pastiche high-camp kitschy yet cultivated sort. Ironically, the film almost perfectly predicted some trends as demonstrated by Hebraic hack novelist Seth Grahame-Smith's porno flesheater abortion Pride and Prejudice and Zombies (2009), which is a mashup work that absurdly combines elements from Jane Austen's classic 1813 novel Pride and Prejudice with new zombie scenes and full-color images that is predictably being adapted into a film by Burr Steers (Igby Goes Down, 17 Again) that is set for a 2015 release. Although I am not exactly an Austenphile, I almost vomited zombie guts when I saw Pride and Prejudice and Zombies on display at Borders a couple years back, as it reflects the worst of our vapid and mindlessly nihilistic culture and is certainly something more ominous and disturbing than the early 19th century radio serials of Voice Over protagonist Fats. A true modernist 'horror' show that is, at the very least, a minor masterpiece and one of the best kept secrets of 1980s British cinema, Monger's celluloid psycho-drama manages to do the seemingly impossible by enabling the viewer to sympathize with and feel pity for a fat stuttering Brit slob who commits the most heinous and deplorable yet equally pathetic of crimes against a borderline catatonic beautiful blonde rape victim, hence the film's dubious misogynistic reputation among feminist dykes, so-called social justice warriors, and other slave-morality-ridden rabble who cannot possibly fathom that a man can commit horrendous acts against women yet still have a startling 'humanity' about himself.

-Ty E

THE DARK KNIGHT
THE DARK KNIGHT

Christopher Nolan (2008)

It's really impossible to review this film without discussing mild spoilers, so I will tone them down a bit. Batman Begins was indeed the beginning, albeit, a sloppy & slow beginning. But it left room for something amazing - a flawless sequel. Now with the hype building and building over this film, (See also: Snakes on a Plane) It is a miracle that the bubble hasn't burst yet. What we get is not only the greatest "superhero" film ever made, but possibly one of the greatest crime drama's ever made. As predicted months ago with the untimely passing of heart throb Heath Ledger, the Joker steals the show with great intentions. By the ending of this preposterously paced 2 hour and 47 minute film, you will be haunted by his amazing performance; a tour de force like no other. His performance is entrancing, it lulls you into a state of cinema hypnosis. Not only could I ever imagine a Batman film being this dark, but I could never imagine teeny-bopping Heath to play such a tortured character which inevitably led to his downfall. The one thing to realize, is that that the story isn't focused on the Batman, the Joker, or even Harvey Dent, but rather the impressionable city of Gotham. The greed, corruption, and villainry runs so rampant, you can see the horizon burning in flames of corruption. Chaos is the greatest notion to the Joker and he will stop at nothing to reach his ultimate goal of utter annihilation. Rather than falling to the same fate as that of Sam Raimi and his horrid piece of shit, also known as Spiderman 3, Nolan rises above the occasion and delivers two villains, each with their own cause and goal. Rather than have just the villains go "Hur dur dur, Let's kill Batman", they each have a separate enemy and a similar cause; death and mayhem. The transformation of Harvey Dent to Two-Face isn't something to be taken lightly, rather than being a humorous old washed-up actor who didn't have a past, Aaron Eckhart (Harvey Dent) is the one man who can save Gotham but befalls the deepest corruption. The title has more to do with the film then given credit for. Rather then clunking up the film, these two villains feel perfect, allowing this long-as-hell film to progress smoothly. As Ain't It Cool News put it so perfectly, "This isn't a comic book film, This is a graphic novel film!" The Joker's lines are not only amazing, but immensely quotable. I haven't had lines stuck in my head so deep since I last saw Anchorman. Not only does he have the "iconic" lines, but he has monologues depicting a horrid and dismal view of nihilism. What we get is a slide show of an insane forever-memorable caliber. As previously mentioned, The Joker is the scene stealer and the heart stopper. I often found myself on the edge of my seat, anticipating greatly his next line or movement. From his lip-smacking habits to his wonderful heterosexuality. It's amazing to see him as a heterosexual. Since his compliment on Gyllenhaal's attraction (Note: He fucked her brother.) I often found it mesmerizing to imagine the Joker figure with a woman. Someone of such a deep resonating evil, being superficially happy. I got so into the film, that several "jump scenes" managed to fucking freak the hell out of me. Namely the "dead Batman" and the "life-changing explosion" scene. Scarier than any horror film released in several years, This film only needs actual insanity to lead the way on a purple/green carpet. I also appreciated the Joker killing the weakest form of mob first, no, not even a mob. The Negroes. I've never seen a pen disappear into a Negroes face before. The script was entirely poetry. I don't understand how people can think the ultimate hack Tarantino can pen an amazing script. I'm fucking sorry, but running gags about French cheeseburgers isn't fucking funny. Speaking of the word fuck, He uses it too much, and so do I. You're in for a surprise with a vivid idealist expressing dark and hard-to-swallow views on chaos and corruption. You don't need shitty plot twists to make an unformulated suspense film. The Dark Knight has enough twists to perfectly unravel this eggshell super-hype machine that has been manufactured by not only a great director, but also a viral marketing team responsible for such classics as leaving Joker cards littering comic stores. It is as every bit as intelligent as expected, but also furthers Bruce Wayne's douche bag ego to propel his "real identity" farther away than Batman's. The Joker's profiling record is nil. No name, no other aliases, same habits, which are also executed flawlessly. To bring up the viral marketing again, the tactics incorporated were mailing lists, getting their hands dirty, voice messages, and secret new production stills. I have an ongoing theory that this film will impregnate every female in the audience with awesomeness, so ladies, take your birth control. I'd also laugh if Ledger faked his death and when assaulted by critics, his reply would be "Why so serious?" Christopher Nolan's envisioning of the villains was flawless and traces of extreme black humor are scattered throughout. Imagine this film being The Departed meets costumed superheroes. The most poetic scene is the Joker, freshly escaped, hanging out of the police car, embracing his ultimate freedom, in stark silence. The only thing I underestimated is the amount of explosions in this film. The only complaint I have with this film is Batman's ongoing growl. Meanwhile, I imagine him ordering food from the dollar menu at McDonald's using the same voice. It's impossible to take him seriously. Batman's choreographed fighting has altered differently, for the better as well. Instead of relying on pussy martial arts, he just fucks shit up. Preferably with his form of bare rubber boxing. Technology is revolutionary, so is this film. Ledger's changed things forever. See to you, He's just a freak, like me! The Dark Knight is revolutionary in the cesspool of contemporary Hollywood film fare. Not only a brutal crime film, but also a story of love and all of the above. Everyone has an opinion, just keep in mind, It's also possible that their opinion is wrong.

-mAQ

TRIANGLE
TRIANGLE

Christopher Smith (2009)

I had no intention of reviewing Triangle as its qualities speak for themselves and don't require further recollection. This changed when a follower of Soiled Sinema requested me to review a film of Christopher Smith's. As I haven't seen his recently released period plague film, Black Death, I decided to scribble down the often wondrous effects that Triangle had me experience. Released in 2009, Triangle has often caught crossfire of being too much like Timecrimes or downright thieving the idea, when in fact, Triangle was slowly realized in 2004. Starring the gorgeous Australian bird Melissa George, Triangle takes her character of an overworked single mother far into the reaches of the supposed Bermuda Triangle. Christopher Smith had at one point clear references to the strange Atlantic phenomenon but abandoned them for subtlety. Smith then christened the yacht "Triangle" as to allude to something different all together. Contrary to his actions, though, everyone is still on board for a film that can't have too much competition for best film adapted to the Bermuda Triangle occurrences.

Despite boasting many of the film's secrets in the trailer, Triangle is still a tightly wrapped film that contains many more surprises, even surprises of which couldn't be spoiled with text. When I had begun watching Triangle, within the first half an hour, a looming sense of dread had crawled its way up my back. I was enticed and excited, giving way to the pleasing subgenre of nautical terror. The first thing you must understand is the nature of Triangle. Very much like Timecrimes, Triangle takes the same fear of reliving trauma and striving to alter the future and propels it past science and into the paranormal. In Timecrimes, a time machine plays villain in Héctor's quest to right the death of a woman whereas in Triangle, a somber woman goes to extreme lengths to rejoin her autistic son. Since I've only grazed over the general idea of Triangle, allow me to lay the story straight. The film opens with a working-class single mother cleaning up a mess left by her autistic son. Today is the day, she recalls from a post-it note left on the refrigerator door. She packs a large bag, hoists it into the trunk, and meets a potential love interest at the docks before setting sail. Call it mother's catharsis, if you will. The soft crashing waves don't last, however. Soon an enormous electrical storm looms over them and disrupts the breezy getaway by capsizing the yacht, thrusting a woman into the abyss and shaking up the survivors. Their grief is interrupted suddenly as a large ship passes by, giving way to board.

I was a fan of Christopher Smith's Creep. His vision of subway horror became a film I could frequent within a year. Despite obvious pacing issues and the general malaise accompanying the horror genre, Creep managed to excel in suspense and a sliver of claustrophobia. Having recently watched a similar film entitled Stag Night, I realized just how golden Creep was, for what it was. Here in lies the problem with most contemporary horror. "Genre fans" are searching for a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, so to speak. While I love and often crave horror, it is an appetite that is rarely appeased. Every once in a while a film will come along and change my perception of horror for but several days. This interim gives me time to catch up on low-budget driftwood and realize why my hope is so far gone. Triangle is excluded from this category though so the tirade seems pointless. I wouldn't consider Triangle a horror film any more than I would a science fiction film. The events are indeed fictitious and the bloodletting ample, but Triangle poses something so far from the very basics of science and questions the human motive. This is much more than a slasher film for within the shells of Jess' incarnations, a humanity is sensed, albeit of a brutal and merciless variety.

Don't confuse my delving into the deeper nature of Triangle as an assertion of perfection. The film may showcase its brighter moments with zeal (such as the grotesque impromptu Sally graveyard) but it suffers mainly from the premise itself. Given the film is wrapped unto a cycle, many scenes are repeated over and over again to the point of mental exhaustion. I felt the same during Timecrimes but that Spanish time travel film featured an exquisite pair of breasts. You really have no idea how far nudity can further the excitement of an idea based on repetition into a territory that is pleasurable. Triangle's shortcomings are the fact that it is limited but this isn't the fault of Christopher Smith, rather, the strange subject matter he managed to tackle head on. Other than the reprehensible repeating playlist, Triangle is rare with fault. It's a gloomy take on a terrifying "Groundhog Day". Having a friend who hit a drunk Negro crossing the street and witnessing first hand the guilt consume his social life, I know, off-hand, the effects of taking a life. Now imagine that void multiplied and you got a strong opposer to the definition of desensitization. Triangle sure isn't perfect but it dies trying. Just peruse the many theories surrounding the fate of Jess, Jess, or even Jess and you'll see exactly what I mean.

-mAQ

MALATESTA'S CARNIVAL OF BLOOD
MALATESTA'S CARNIVAL OF BLOOD

Christopher Speeth (1973)

As someone who has lived in a beach resort area for about half a decade and spent most of my life before then visiting the same place on a monthly basis, I have a special nostalgic affection for carnivals and amusement parks, even if I have a very low tolerance for these places nowadays due to the multicultural mutants and miscreants that typically inhabit them, so naturally I am a sucker for strange films about strange carnivals. Naturally, as a fairly obsessive cinephile that was bred on horror cinema but long ago gave up on virtually anything that slithers out of Hollywood, I also have an unhealthy obsession with offbeat, avant-garde, experimental, arthouse, overlooked and/or otherwise strange and singular genre flicks. Of course, my dual love of antiquated carnivals and idiosyncratic arthouse horror is probably best personified in relatively low-budget early 1960s cult flicks like Curtis Harrington's Night Tide (1961) and Herk Harvey's Cocteauian Carnival of Souls (1962), though the acid-addled late-60s and early 70s surely produced its fair share of truly 'carnavalesque' chiller cinema, with the once-lost and largely forgotten but thankfully now found psychedelic art-horror celluloid fever dream Malatesta's Carnival of Blood (1973) directed by one-time-auteur Christopher Speeth being arguably the most superlatively strange, shockingly rewarding, and conspicuously 'cinephiliac' of these works. Assumed lost for about three decades until it was released on DVD in 2003 after being remastered at Francis Ford Coppola's American Zoetrope Studios, Speeth's rather impressive debut was shot in Philadelphia in 1972 and is probably the most preternatural and phantasmagorical work of 'horror' cinema to emerge from the post-industrial bowels of the surely shitty east coast city aside from David Lynch's masterful debut Eraserhead (1977) as a work that seems like a uniquely unholy marriage between Federico Fellini, Jack Smith, Alejandro Jodorowsky, Andy Milligan (notably, Daniel Dietrich of Milligan's Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1973)) plays the eponymous villain), and George A. Romero (Dietrich also appeared in Dawn of the Dead (1978) as 'Givens'). As a work that is drenched in psychedelic surrealism, darkly eccentric humor, and even a bit of cross-dressing, Speeth's film is probably the closest thing to a horror equivalent to the films of Salvador Dalí protégé Steven F. Arnold, which include all-too-queer high-camp surrealist works like The Liberation of the Mannique Mechanique (1967) and especially Luminous Procuress (1971). A largely nonlinear and obsessively oneiric work that puts Tobe Hooper's The Funhouse (1981) to great shame when it comes to making the viewer feel like they are actually trapped inside an obscenely outmoded yet ominous amusement park, Malatesta's Carnival of Blood tells the considerably convoluted yet nonetheless incessantly entrancing tale of a beautiful young brunette who joins a dubious carnival with her parents in the hope of finding her missing brother, only to discover said brother is probably long dead and fell prey to a virtual army of subterranean zombie-cannibals that are led by the titular villain and his sun-shy vampire and hook-handed comrades.

Featuring a literally and figuratively 'underground' collective of grey-faced and longhaired hippie-like cannibals that look and act like zombies and spend most of their time watching silent era Universal Horror and German Expressionist horror films when they are not drinking the vital fluids and eating the guts of normal folk, Malatešta's Carnival of Blood probably features some sort of message about the counterculture movement (judging by the film and its absurd non-storyline, bizarre humor, and insane imagery, I think it is safe to say that Speeth, the set-designers, and various actors and crew members were regularly consuming whatever drugs that they could get their hands on while they were making the film), but it ultimately works best as a shameless piece of horror cinephilia that was written (the story is credited to a playwright named 'Werner Liepolt') and directed by people that thankfully understand that horror was actually once, long ago, one of the most technically innovative and artistically merited film genres. Indeed, like the Teutonic Expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), of which an excerpt actually appears in the film, Speeth's flick owes most of its singular atmosphere and overall potency to its preternatural mise-en-scène and stunning tableaux as a work that ultimately feels like an unlikely marriage between darkly campy exploitation horror and the nihilistic avant-garde films of goofy Guido Carmelo Bene (Nostra Signora dei Turchi aka Our Lady of the Turks, Un Amleto di meno aka One Hamlet Less). Indeed, just as Andy Milligan used the genre as a means to make his marvelously misanthropic and misogynistic crypto-melodramas more palatable to less discerning audiences and thus more monetarily profitable, Speeth seems to have utilized horror as a means of showcasing various 'trippy' and entrancing abstract sets that will probably dumbfound the average half-braindead gorehound, slasher fanboy, or Romero retard. Interestingly, the sets were designed by a seemingly LSD-inspired troupe out of Philly called 'Alley Friends,' who would go on to become somewhat successful architects that were responsible for designing everything from passive solar buildings to eco-friendly high-rise condominium buildings around Pennsylvania. With Malatešta's Carnival of Blood, the three managed to assemble what is nothing short of an aesthetically nihilistic avant-garde netherworld that seems like a sort of allegorical representation of mutated post-counterculture America and features a hysterically hungry horde of hippie cannibals that make the Manson Family seem like a tiny collective of failed drug dealers and pseudo-pimps. Of course, like David E. Durston's classic rabid hippie horror flick I Drink Your Blood (1970), Speeth's film does make some superficial allusions to Charlie's family.

In a scene that certainly establishes the somewhat campy yet uneasy and foreboding tone of Malatešta's Carnival of Blood, a cross-dressing gypsy-like fortuneteller named 'Sonja' (AIDS victim Lenny Baker, who played the lead in Paul

MALATESTA'S CARNIVAL OF BLOOD

Mazursky's Next Stop, Greenwich Village (1976) uses tarot cards to give a reading to young brunette protagonist Vena Norris (Janine Carazo in her first and last film role) while bitchily yelling at her "Don't touch my cards" and even physically assaulting her, as if he is one of those unconventionally misogynistic tranny fags who hate women because they are jealous that they have actual biological tits and vaginas. After the tarot reading, Vena asks Sonja how much he owes him and he curiously replies, "Owe me? Hahaha. The service is free...free to all new employees. This was no true reading, Vena, you must come back again when the cards have calmed themselves," thus hinting that something horrible is brewing at the overtly ominous theme park. Mr. and Mrs. Norris (Paul Hostetler and Betsy Henn) and their debutante daughter Vena have become reluctant carny employees because their missing son disappeared somewhere around the carnival, though it soon becomes clear that their little boy has probably met a grisly end. As seeming suburbanites of the fairly conventional sort, the Norris family sticks out like sore thumbs among most of the other carnival employees, which include a campy and exceedingly effete 'queen' named Mr. Blood (Jerome Dempsey of Sidney Lumet's Network (1976)) that acts as a manager and a sort of 'master of ceremonies,' as well as an antisocial chap with a hook for a hand and a deathly pale complexion named Mr. Bean (Tom Markus) that likes reading ancient Satanic material and discussing the merits of cannibalism. While Mr. Blood and Mr. Bean are sort of 'generals' of the carnival, the eponymous Malatesta, who may or may not have been named after the similarly swarthy Italian anarchist of the same surname and who likes to mostly get things done behind the scenes like the titular character of The Phantom of the Opera, is most certainly the true Führer, even if he seems too young for such a prestigious position.

Aside the Norris family, a fairly normal wisecracking young chap named Kit (Chris Thomas) has also just started working at the carnival and he soon develops a crush on buxom brunette Vena, who is unfortunately actually waiting for her boyfriend Johnny (Paul Townsend) to meet her at the carnival. As Kit somewhat cynically states to Vena upon first meeting her, "I run the Tunnel-of-Love. I flunked out of school and, providing that I work like hell, Mr. Blood has given me the dubious distinction of running that questionable wreck they call the Tunnel-of-Love." When a hilariously violent and vulgar little Hebraic girl named Toby Davis (Karen Salmansohn) ends up riding the Tunnel-of-Love with her two parents, Kit, who is initially not paying attention to working because he is too busy reading a copy of the classic counterculture tome The Last Whole Earth Catalog: Access To Tools, is startled to see that the family is missing from their boat when it reaches the end of the ride. Indeed, the only thing Kit finds left of the Davis family is a pair of smashed glasses and some blood, thus leading the reluctant carny to assume that something sinister is going on at the carnival, so he informs Vena of the precarious situation. Meanwhile, Mrs. Norris pleads to her husband, "This place is evil...I can feel it" after the two discuss how their missing son is probably dead. Assuming the worst, Mr. Norris pulls out a handgun and declares he plans to carry out revenge against whoever harmed his sole male progeny. As a Svengali-like individual who seems like he is lurking around every corner and whose shadow haunts the side of buildings in a fashion not unlike Count Orlok in Murnau's Nosferatu, Mr. Blood soon realizes that the Norris family and Kit are on to him and his ghoulish compatriots and thus prepares to take appropriate action. Unbeknownst to Kit and the Norris family, Mr. Blood is a bloodthirsty vampire with a large gut and a voracious appetite and Mr. Bean is the head a large family of cannibalistic Satan-saluting quasi-zombie-cannibals that live under the carnival and have never seen a single ray of sunlight, though they regularly indulge in the greatest films that silent horror cinema has to offer while wobbling around like autistic automatons in front of a subterranean large movie screen.

While he is an evil little fellow that does his fair share of killing and terrorizing, a swarthy midget named 'Bobo' (Hervé Villechaize of Richard Elfman's Forbidden Zone (1980) and Robert Downey Sr.'s Greaser's Palace (1972)) provides lead Vena with some poetic hints of the horrors that await her via menacing melodies he sings to her and a couple other characters. Indeed, after singing, "Beware of evil who's caught in the shadow of the dream. Beware of the mystery of the carnival who shall remain nameless," Bobo points a shotgun at Vena in a threatening fashion and then scampers away like a rabid Chihuahua that is looking for something to sink its teeth into. Meanwhile, Mr. Blood informs Kit while absurdly riding a bumper car that Vena has a lover named Johnny and that she is waiting for him to arrive at the carnival, thus crushing the young man's romantic interest in her. Of course, Mr. Blood's queenish gossiping does not stop Kit from attempting to act as Vena's knight in shining armor. In a pleasantly protracted scene that blurs the line between dream and reality and involves a malefic masked phantom in a forest, an eccentrically stylized car-turned-bed that hangs upside down from a ceiling, seemingly haunted archaic swinging angel and negro statues, zombie-cannibals watching The Phantom of the Opera (1925) while tossing popcorn at the female lead as she stands in front of the movie screen, and a sort of giant condom trap, Vena is thrown into a sort of real-life nightmare that ends with her suffering a mental breakdown after finding the corpse of Kit with a knife in his heart riding on a decrepit old ferris wheel. When Mr. Blood finds Vena crying while crouching down in the rain in her pajamas, he arrogantly pokes her with his cane and less than sensitively states, "My dear, you're so upset. My dear, it's too bad about poor, poor Kit. Don't be so upset though." Meanwhile, Vena's parents' mobile-home is attacked by a motley crew of flesh-eating cannibal hippie deadbeats. While Vena manages to violently murder a sort of blind and elderly longhaired 'zombie janitor,' she is soon attacked and captured by Dr. Blood while he is channeling Bela Lugosi. Ultimately, Mr. Blood brings Vena to Malatesta, who fittingly stands over the girl while a scene from The Cab- inet of Dr. Caligari is projected in the background where somnambulist Cesare sneaks into the character Jane's room while she is sleeping and snatches her from her bed. While Mr. and Mrs. Norris manage to escape from their trailer, Vena is taken prisoner by Malatesta. Naturally, it is all up to Vena's boyfriend Johnny to finally show up at the carnival and save his dime-store damsel in distress from the ravenous wrath of the hippie cannibals.

MALATESTA'S CARNIVAL OF BLOOD

With would-be-loverboy Kit already dead, Vena's boyfriend Johnny predictably finally shows up and inevitably becomes the new male protagonist, though he is slightly less charming than his pretty boy predecessor. Naturally, upon arriving at the carnival, Johnny finds Mr. Blood's claims to be more than a little bit dubious when the discernibly deceptive vampire informs him that Vena and her parents "died in their sleep of a freak accident" and that he should not "take it so bad" since he has a "long life" and "there are a lot of fish in the sea." When Johnny begins looking around the carnival and walks into a dimly lit building where he finds an occult text with medieval satanic illustrations and arcane writing, he becomes fairly uneasy, especially when hook-handed cannibal Mr. Bean soon shows up and begins going on a preposterous pro-cannibal rant. Indeed, when Mr. Bean states, "Say listen, lad. They say meat builds blood and flesh and gives you new life. Do you believe that?" and Johnny reluctantly replies, "Yes, I guess so," the cannibal makes the protagonist run out of the room as if he is scared for his life by adding, "So, wouldn't it follow that a man could live longer and longer if he ate more of the same?" and then waving his hook in his face. When Johnny runs into menacing Asiatic midget Bobo, he is somewhat startled when the tiny terror sings to him, "Very, very not yet dead... Stupid Johnny, use your head. Put your feet where evil stands... The knife cuts quick, the blood pours red. Stupid Johnny, use your head... Very, very not yet dead." Compared to his enemies, Johnny is indeed quite moronic and he certainly has no chance of outwitting, let alone defeating, a bunch of highly predatory vampires and zombie-cannibals who have been hunting and killing humans for god knows how long, but at least he tries.

In a somewhat unlikely twist, Mr. Blood shows up to the room where Vena is imprisoned while the cannibals are mindlessly watching Wallace Worsley's classic The Hunchback of Notre Dame (1923) adaptation starring Lon Chaney and tells her that he wants to save her, stating, "I want to help you out of the frying pan," but she finds his motives dubious yet still decides to follow him because she clearly has no other options. While leading her to ostensible safety, Mr. Blood explains to Vena regarding the amusement park and its secret cannibalistic inhabitants, "This carnival is constructed over a series of natural limestone caverns. That is how Bean has kept his family undetected for so many years... And they're cannibals, every one. Most of them have never seen the light of day. That's why they look so ghastly... Live like animals. No one has ever told them it is wrong, so how are they to know?!" In a scene that hints that he might be not only a bloodsucker but a cocksucker as well, Mr. Blood describes how he was forced to join the carnival after being run out of town and that he only realized later when it was too late that he “could not leave.” Of course, Mr. Blood ultimately reneges on his promise to Vena and delivers her to mysterious mad man Malateŝta, but he makes the mistake of drinking the young girl’s “precious blood” beforehand without receiving the proper permission and is punished with a less than glamorous death by his fairly cold and brutal master. Upon approaching Vena as she is tied to what looks like a sort of Satanic operating table, Malateŝta charmingly ŝtates to her, “I am a man of one thousand faces, Vena. Mr. Blood has seen my face, but to you I show a kinder face,” as if he plans to make her his lover instead of cannibal/vampire meat. Meanwhile, after poking his head through a gigantic wooden Confederate flag while pretending to be juŝt another ŝtumbling cannibal-zombie, Johnny finally manages to find Vena, but their untimely reunion does not laŝt long. As F.W. Murnau’s Nosferatu (1922) is screened, Mr. and Mrs. Norris also attempt to rescue their daughter in the cannibal abyss, but the latter is soon hacked up by midget Bobo and subsequently eaten alive in a Romero-esque fashion. Of course, Mr. Norris is also soon killed after Malateŝta drives a ŝtake into his eye and then lets his flesh-eating underlings finish off the diŝtraught father. After getting separated from Johnny, Vena is approached by tranny fortuneteller Sonja who, not unlike Mr. Blood, offers to show her a way out of the carnival catacombs, but ultimately makes her a prisoner of Malateŝta again. The next day, after a cop shows up at the carnival and unwitting drowns Johnny upon playing a amusement park game that is rigged by Bobo, Malateŝta celebrates his victory over mere mortals by riding some of his own rides while Vena begins to perish while in captivity.

Make no miŝtake about it, although blatantly flawed in many reŝpects, Malateŝta’s Carnival of Blood is certainly a loŝt cult classic of ŝorts with ŝeemingly infinitely replay value. Indeed, I do not feel like I am succumbing to puffery when I ŝay that watching Speeth’s film for the firŝt time offered me more or leŝs the ŝame enjoyment as when I firŝt ŝaw ŝome of my favorite horror flicks like Carnival of Souls (1962) or Lemora: A Child’s Tale of the Supernatural (1973). Notably, I diŝcovered the film after reading about it while flipping through NIGHTMARE USA: The Untold Story of the Exploitation Independents (2007) and could not help but immediately hunt it down upon reading it be deŝcribed by author Stephen Thrower as being, “Like the Euro oddity FREAK ORLANDO (1981), it’s really a ŝhowcase for the director and his art deŝigners to go berserk with acid-tinged visuals.” Indeed, like Freak Orlando and many of Ulrike Ottinger’s other films (including, of course, her doc Prater (2007), which is about the hiŝtory of the famous Viennese amusement park of the ŝame name), Speeth’s film is a truly ‘carnavalesque’ experience that is the next beŝt thing to being at an old ŝchool amusement park that is inhabited by actual living and breathing freaks. Unlike the films of ŝub-underground avant-gardiŝt Fredric Hobbs like

MALATESTA'S CARNIVAL OF BLOOD

Troika (1969), Roseland (1971), and Alabama's Ghost (1973), Malatesta's Carnival of Blood is a rare forgotten American 'artsploitation' flick that can not only be enjoyed by annoyingly discernibly cinephiles like myself, but also braindead Romero fanboys that get a hard-on from seeing a reanimated corpse ripping out and gorging on the intestines some hapless cop or soldier while they are still alive. While obviously the rediscovering of Speeth's film is not as important as if, say, Tod Browning's legendary lost film London After Midnight (1927) aka The Hypnotist starring Lon Chaney were actually found one day, Malatesta's Carnival of Blood is indubitably an invaluable and singular work in that it is a true testament to the artistic potential of low-budget horror cinema, which is certainly needed in a era when so-called 'independent' filmmakers find themselves mimicking the style, morals, and formulaic storytelling of Hollywood horror when they should be using their relative artistic freedom to test the bounds of the all too contrived and mostly mediocre genre. Surely, an open-minded novice filmmaker would find more artistic inspiration in Speeth's film than in all the films directed by the likes of Craven, Carpenter, Hooper, and Romero over the past two decades combined.

As a work that manages to shuffle darkly campy comedy, convention-bending horror, entrancing avant-garde tableaux, counterculture buffoonery, and a psychedelic approach to cinephilia, Malatesta's Carnival of Blood ultimately makes marginally comparable films like Ray Dennis Steckler's bottom-of-the-barrel schlock anti-masterpiece The Incredibly Strange Creatures Who Stopped Living and Became Mixed-Up Zombies!!? (1964), Yabo Yablonsky's The Manipulator (1971) starring Mickey Rooney, and Alan Gadney's Moonchild (1974) seem like the closest thing to a horror equivalent to Federico Fellini's Giulietta degli spiriti (1965) aka Juliet of the Spirits. Also, judging by Oliver Stone's rarely-seen horror debut Seizure (1974) aka Queen of Evil, which incidentally also stars Hervé Villechaize, it seems that Speeth should have probably been the one that had a successful filmmaking career and had the opportunity to direct a Jim Morrison biopic and truly psychedelic serial killer flick instead of the softcore Hollywood conspiracy theorist. For a film that was so poorly budgeted that the actors that played the ghouls were paid a mere $5.00/day plus doughnuts and where the 'director's cut' was intentionally destroyed to make trailers because the producers did not have enough money to make an extra print, Malatesta's Carnival of Blood, not unlike the oeuvre of Berlin-based blond beast Jörg Buttgeriet, demonstrates why horror makes for a great genre to work within if you have little money to work with yet you want to create inspired celluloid art that has the potential to gain a loyal following. Not unlike Willard Huyck and Gloria Katz's Messiah of Evil (1973) aka Dead People, Curtis Harrington's Ruby (1977), Lamberto Bava's Demons (1985) and Bigas Luna's Anguish (1987), it also probably makes for the ultimate movie theater experience. Indeed, while I could easily list various glaring flaws that the film suffers from, my only real complaint regarding Malatesta's Carnival of Blood is that I have not been afforded the grand opportunity of seeing it play on the big screen. After all, it is not often that one gets the opportunity to watch a movie about cannibals watching German Expressionist movies.

-Ty E

THE BLOB
THE BLOB

Chuck Russell (1988)

The 80s were the definitive period for monster films, or even creature films for that matter. Calling something a monster must follow suit to certain descriptive qualities. I wouldn't call "The blob" a monster, more of an experiment gone awry. Think of Slimer from Ghostbusters though a bit more sadistic and prone to murdering children. This brings me to another point of the 80s - there were no rules. Kill anyone, the audience won't care. The lack of selfish sensibilities really adds a "real feel" to this film. I don't appreciate selective mindless killers. The formula doesn't equate at all correctly. This remake plainly decided to upgrade the 1958 classic with rebellious youth, timid sex, and a silver platter of potent special effects. In terms of metaphors, the film is a pan filled with surgical tools. Now which tool to use in order to play a precise and specific death is its choice. In some ways, the special effects in The Blob are completely beyond words. The slime effects and acidic touch to the melting skin "wows" me repeatedly. I don't think I'll ever get over how ahead of the time this film was. Well, it was until fault lay blame on Kevin Dillon's mullet. I feel ethically responsible enough on behalf as reviewer to tell you that the effects in this film is an unholy conjoining of Street Trash and John Carpenter's The Thing. This alone should tell you all you need to know. Starring a young Shawnee Smith, who still had a dependable agent, the youth cast in this film is introduced without a moments hesitation only to serve as mindless cattle as soon as the "blob" hits the fan. I found myself shocked by the sheer quantity of deaths in this film. In material covering killer slime, a departure was much needed to save from the tedious hassle of an unnoticeable body count and the lack of laced humor. If The Blob had attempted to strictly follow the suit of a horror or even a horror drama, the result would have been questionable and laughable. The Blob is laughable, but in a relative way. Watching a citizen dive for safety only to be smashed and absorbed by a tendril is deserving of its own popcorn bowl. For any fans of killer slime, check out William Essex's novel simply titled Slime. With a last minute convergence of horror and drama (comedy's still there, folks), The Blob takes an intelligent turn towards political commentary with the discovery that this creature was a man made experiment to gain the upper-hand on those damn Russkies. But that's always the case, isn't it? In the 80s, a "who-dun-it?" governmental conspiracy plot twist was racy, fresh, and believable. In today's cinema, this happens as a common occurrence. I don't even think twice. Sometimes, I really do wonder about transpiring events like this. What if the Mothman was an experiment in organic satellites? It's questions like these make me embrace the unknown tightly with a feverish glint in my eyes. The Blob is a superior monster attack! flick. With many laugh-a-minute segments and that preserved nostalgic kick, The Blob makes me want to turn up the volume, scoot closer, and descend into the world of the past with cinema that wasn't observant over motifs that were considered politically incorrect. To be blunt, watching an 8 year old being devoured grotesquely by an acidic killing machine, in graphic detail mind you, to be a masterful moment in any form of cinema. Its balls like these that make me appreciate horror. I wouldn't expect anything else from the man who brought us The Mask and Nightmare on Elm Street 3: Dream Warriors. In memory of Charles Edward Parrish.

-mAQ

VOICES OF DESIRE
VOICES OF DESIRE

Chuck Vincent (1972)

Being an exploitation film fan rarely pays off, hence why I more or less took a break from watching these films for a couple years until somewhat recently after once again taking the irrational plunge in cinema history's most inhospitable ghetto of debauchery, libertinism, and complete and utter aesthetic worthlessness. As I discovered over time, like with the arthouse world, exploitation cinema has its own great and distinguished 'auteur' filmmakers, so I try to watch films by directors whose work I can generally trust, including those working in the pornographic realm like Chuck Vincent (Jack n' Jill, Roommates). Although Vincent, who began his career in regional theater as a director and stage manager, mostly directed heterosexual pornography and sexploitation comedies, he was as straight as a circle and succumbed to AIDS in 1991 at the premature age of 51. Like his fellow gay pornographers who directed hetero hardcore flicks like the Amero Brothers and Michael Zen, Vincent seems to have put a special emphasis on artistry and detail in his work, as if he could only tolerate filming close-up shots of straight people fucking if he had some more creative things to do during the filmmaking process, with his first feature Voices of Desire (1972) being a perfect example of this. A shockingly artsy and atmospheric softcore sexploitation flick of the quasi-psychedelic Gothic horror sort, Vincent's first feature is, not unlike John and Lem Amero's phantasmagorical fuck flick Bacchanale (1970), one of the most strangely atmospheric and unforgettable works of overtly erotic horror ever shot on cheap 16mm film stock and had it not been directed by a pornographer and were it more readily available, it might be considered a classic of sorts today. A sort of sick and sleazy yet suave and stylish spectrophilic celluloid symphony as conducted by a slightly chubby alpha-ghoul as portrayed by porn star turned politician Mark Suben (who is now a District Attorney for Cortland County, in upstate New York) and featuring Sandra Peabody aka 'Sandra Cassell' of The Last House on the Left (1972) as a hysterical gal who is haunted and gang-banged by a superficially gregarious gang of dapperly dressed libertine ghosts, Voices of Desires probably sounds like one of the stupidest ideas for a film ever conceived yet the marvelously moronic degeneracy contained within the film is executed in such an eloquent and idiosyncratic fashion that it makes one realize that director Vincent was a true artist who sold himself short and whored himself out to the lowest bidder. Advertised with the fittingly pseudo-erotic tagline, "A Hypnotic Voyage to the Spirits of Lust," Vincent's film has crude acting, senseless scenes of pseudo-sensuality and unintentionally farcical fetishism, cheap special effects, piss poor lighting, and a variety of other glaring flaws, yet the film offers a totally singular experience that you're not going to find anywhere else, whether you like it or not. Indeed, Voices of Desire is like a bad sex dream that you just cannot help but look back on fondly. A wayward celluloid wet dream about a young and seemingly rather dumb hysterical female cinephile (auteur Vincent reveals his cinematic influences by featuring film posters from works by Fritz Lang, Josef von Sternberg, Orson Welles, etc. on the protagonist's apartment wall) who becomes haunted by a group of horny ghosts after attempting to make a simple phone call on a Manhattan payphone, Vincent's work ultimately proves that even innately idiotic film premises can be exquisitely executed if handled by the right mensch, even when working within one of the most aesthetically vapid genres known to man.

Voices of Desire begins banally enough with a fat, short, swarthy and stocky Alpine-like cop named Detective Holland (David Kirk of Robert Downey Sr.'s Putney Swope (1969) and John G. Avildsen's early Troma effort Cry Uncle (1971)) interviewing a young pale-skinned and dark-haired debutante named Anna Reed (Sandra Peabody of The Last House on the Left and Teenage Hitchhikers (1975)) about hearing "voices." As Anna explains, it all started when her boss gave her a package to ship. After shipping the package, Anna decided to do some shopping in downtown Manhattan and in the process, she lost track of time, so she decided to call her friend to tell her she would be late for a dinner date, but instead of getting her friend on the other line, she heard the heavy breathing of pernicious spirits and it scared her so much that she ran away from the payphone. While walking down a sidewalk after the eerie phone call, Anna hears a ghostly being whispering, "Anna, wait for us... Don't run away from us, please," so she hightails it back to her apartment thinking she will be safe there, but of course she is wrong. While biting into an apple and reading a magazine in her room, the same being from before declares, "Anna...we love you. Anna...love us." The mysterious ghoul must have put a spell on Anna with his pseudo-romantic whispers, as she subsequently begins disrobing, rubbing her supple breasts with pieces of fruit, and sucking on a banana like it is a cock. Scenes of Anna masturbating with fruit are juxtaposed with images of a dude (porn star Roger Caine of Jonas Middleton's hardcore horror masterpiece Through the Looking Glass (1976) and George A. Romero's postmodern vampire flick Martin (1976)), who happens to be one of the ghosts that has been haunting her, penetrating a semi-chubby chick with curves and jumbo jugs in a completely pitch black room. Indeed, it seems Anna was spiritually raped by a phantasm.

The next day, Anna's (or more like director Vincent's) taste in cinema is revealed in a scene of the protagonist's apartment featuring vintage posters of Josef von Sternberg's The Blue Angel (1930), Fritz Lang's M (1931), Michael Curtiz's Angels with Dirty Faces (1938), and Akira Kurosawa's Seven Samurai (1954) on her decrepit apartment wall. Somehow, Anna thinks packing up her things and heading out of town to see her friend will save her from the wrath of the wanton spirits, but as soon as she hears said wanton spirits declaring, "Anna...you won't need your suitcase where you're going," the petrified protagonist loses her will power, drops her luggage, and starts heading to a lavish apartment where the ghosts reside. Indeed, like a somnambulist possessed by a demonic spirit, Anna manages to arrive at a luxury baroque style apartment with fancy furniture and antiques without any sort of directions. Although the apartment seems unoccupied, Anna soon hears sinister laughter and eventually finds two young longhaired men (Roger Caine and some other dude) in fancy suits and a young pale darkhaired woman (polack-guidette porn star Marlene Willoughby) in an enticing blood red dress sitting at a table in the kitchen who declare, "Anna...we've been waiting for you" without so much as moving their lips or saying a single word. Not long after, an older suited man known as the 'Conductor' (porn star turned politician Mark Suben under the pseudonym 'Gus Thomas') enters the room and the fearsome foursome of ghouls coerce Anna to drink red wine with them. It seems the sensual spirits are into date rape, as the wine is spiked and knocks out poor Anna instantly. After Anna passes out, the Ghouls carry her limp body to another room and take turns defiling her after she wakes up and screams "help me." Of course, as demonstrated by her big warm salacious smiles, Anna is having a fabulous time being frisked and fucked by the charming phantasms. Indeed, first the two young suited ghouls gangbang her while the Conductor conducts the carnality and the female ghoul in red, who seems rather aroused by the entire scenario, hold a candle in a rather provocative fashion. Next, the young ghoul gal played by Marlene Willoughby, who has traded in her elegant red dress for a lethally lecherous black leather dominatrix outfit, chases Anna around and acts if she is going to brutalize her like some sort of sadistic bull-dyke, but when the Conductor plays a beautiful melody on a piano, the sadomasochistic spirit gets soft and gently defiles the protagonist, who seems to rather enjoy dyking out with a fellow pale babe with dark hair.

VOICES OF DESIRE

While the Ghouls initially seem more friendly than fiendish, even if they more or less date-raped the protagonist, their general tone changes after Anna makes the mistake of eating dinner by herself. Indeed, when Anna spots a grotesque bluish-green gelatin platter at a dinner table, she cannot help but dig in, but before she knows it, the female and two young male ghouls approach her from behind with butcher knives in both of their hands and point them at her in a most threatening fashion. Of course, Anna attempts to escape by running like her little life depended on it, but in every room she single runs into she finds a sinisterly smiling phantom waving a butcher knives in her direction in a most sinisterly playful fashion. When Anna decides to run to the main living room of the house, she finds herself encircled by the three younger ghosts, so she curls up in a fetal position and waits for her assumed brutal death via knife-wielding phantasms. Luckily, Anna is saved when the charming Conductor comes out and gestures his fellow ghosts to leave immediately, which they do with a certain discernible sadness in their eyes, like depraved young children who have been denied the opportunity to slaughter a cute kitty cat. From there, the Conductor embraces Anna in a most romantic and sensitive fashion and the two are transported to a glittery oneiric realm where they make passionate otherworldly orgasmic love on a glowing red bed. After her truly ethereal erotic escapades with the Conductor, Anna awakes inside the living room of the apartment and notices everyone is gone. On further research, Anna finds a man stabbed to death in a bathtub, the female and one of the young male ghouls dead in a closet, and the Conductor hanging from a noose in the living room. Flash forward to the present and Detective Holland reveals to Anna after she gets done telling her seemingly senseless story that the dead people she encountered died over 15 years ago as a result of a murder-suicide scenario, with the oh-so sensitive Conductor slaughtering every single person in his house and then subsequently committing self-slaughter via hanging. After the cop tells her that she will “get over this” and that he can find her a “good psychiatrist,” Anna runs off and heads to a bridge where she plans to commit suicide by jumping off, but just before she does, her fiendish ghost friends call out to her, “Anna, come back to us,” which she does. Indeed, it seems that Anna just cannot help but love bedding the undead.

For all its scenes of superlative stupidity, Voices of Desire offers one very important insight and that is that the only way you can calm a hysterical woman and make her shut the fuck up is by fucking her senseless, but of course, when the fucking ends, the insufferable hysteria inevitably begins again, or so the film demonstrates in its depiction of a deranged dame who can only find solace in sexual satisfaction of the spectrophilic sort. Indeed, director Chuck Vincent might have been a homo, but he knew that if there is something that can at least temporarily sedate a hysterical woman, it is a good old fashioned fucking. In that regard, Voices of Desire is probably the only film where poltergeists have a positive effect on the protagonist, who ultimately decides she would rather be the personal plaything of a group of ghosts than commit suicide. In its depiction of a rather intimate relationship between the protagonist and ghosts, as well as foreboding atmosphere and imagery (especially in the scene where the violent deaths of the ghosts are depicted), Vincent’s film has much more in common with Stanley Kubrick’s The Shining (1980) than most cinephiles would probably give it credit for. Certainly, the spirit-on-human carnal action in Vincent’s film is infinitely more sensually unsettling than The Entity (1981) directed by Sidney J. Furie. While Vincent focused specifically on porn and sexploitation trash after Voices of Desire, he did return to the horror genre in 1987 with the surely underrated work Deranged (not to be confused with the 1974 Ed Gein inspired Canadian-American necrophiliac classic of the same name co-directed by Alan Ormsby and Jeff Gillen), which is a sort of all the more deranged reworking of Roman Polanski’s Repulsion (1965) with a chamber-piece-like structure starring genuinely talented porn thespians like Veronica Hart, Jamie Gillis, and Jerry Butler. Unquestionably, both Voices of Desire and Deranged demonstrate that Vincent could have probably had quite a fruitful and singular career as a prolific horror auteur had he wanted to, but as his surrealist experimental fuck flick Visions (1977) surely demonstrates, he was an eclectic artist who seemed to wallow in creating celluloid art in the gutter, which is certainly admirable in its own warped sort of way.

VOICES OF DESIRE

-Ty E

DERANGED

Chuck Vincent (1987)

Fuck bedroom blitzkrieging bogeymen, brain-gorging zombies, entrancing vampires with mad glamouring skills, sinisterly sensual succubae, gender-challenged psychotic retards sporting hand-sewn sporting skinmasks and wielding chain-saws, badly burned pedophiles with killer clawed gloves, heinously bitchy grotesque witches with deadly spells, and pernicious shadow-lurking phantasms, hysterical women are infinitely more horrifying and dreadful to me, both in real-life and the cinematic realm. Indeed, while the deadly torment of a masked retard and stumbling flesheater is relatively quick and painless, the hysterical woman and her pernicious psychodramatic games can haunt you forever if you're unlucky enough to survive her wrath. One of the scariest things about the hysterical woman is that she is no more in control of her actions than you are and cannot be completely culpable for her actions, thus making her actions all the more tragic, hence why Lorena Bobbitt was found not guilty due to insanity for cutting her husband's cock off and filicidal fiend Andrea Yates was found not guilty by reason of insanity during a retrial for drowning her five young children, including an infant, in a bathtub in the bloodthirsty state of Texas where one murder is enough to convince the state to execute you (after all, what other state would execute a nice Jewish boy like Douglas Feldman?!). In the uniquely unhinged and underrated 1987 psycho-horror flick Deranged (not to be confused with the 1974 Ed Gein inspired flick of the same name co-directed by Jeff Gillen and Alan Ormsby), the viewer is forced to endure the static and claustrophobic schizophrenic hell of a hysterical heiress who completely loses what little was left of her mind after she murders a masked robber who also causes her to suffer a miscarriage after committing forced blunt trauma to her pregnant stomach. Directed by gay pornographic auteur Chuck Vincent (Jack n' Jill, Roommates), who is best known for his hardcore heterosexual carnal comedies but who made his feature debut with the artsy psychedelic Gothic horror exploitation piece Voices of Desire (1972), the film is more or less an all the more morbid yet sometimes strangely mirthful reworking of Roman Polanski's classic British psychological horror flick Repulsion (1965) starring French blonde diva Catherine Deneuve about a pathologically misandric young debutante who begins murdering men after falling into schizophrenia and reliving various childhood traumas. While Vincent managed to do the seemingly impossible by garnering mainstream respect for high-class X-rated fuck flicks like Jack n' Jill (1979), Roommates (1981) and In Love (1983), the critics were less sympathetic towards Deranged, with The New York Times reviewer Caryn James spitefully writing in her 1987 review of the film that it, "is not pornography, of high or low quality; it is just a sleazy, muddled movie that should have been kept in the can." One can only assume that since Vincent's film depicts womanhood as such a fragile and precarious thing, not to mention the fact that it portrays NYC natives as soulless psychopaths who worship money and religiously engage in extramarital excursions, the film hit a nerve with a native feminist New Yorker like Ms. James, who probably felt less than empowered by the whole cruel, dark, unsettling, and decidedly dejecting cinematic experience. Starring top pornographic thespians in the lead roles, including Vincent's favorite leading lady Veronica Hart (who later had small roles in Paul Thomas Anderson flicks like Boogie Nights (1997) and Magnolia (1999)) as the schizophrenic murderess, macho man and self-proclaimed sex addict Jerry Butler (who, despite his rampant masculinity and goombah-like good looks, is a half-Hebrew whose paternal grandfather was the half-brother of kosher commie mass murderer 'Leon Trotsky' aka Lev Davidovich Bronshtein) as said murderess' social-climbing philanderer hubby, and crazed yet charismatic kosher leading man Jamie Gillis as the decidedly dead daddy of the murderess, Vincent's film is not merely a desperate attempt at a mainstream crossover work, but a paradoxically distastefully tasteful tribute to the true acting integrity of its pornographic performers. Indeed, compared to most 1980s horror films, Deranged features acting performances of a Bergman-esque caliber in terms of its uncompromisingly deathly dark and fiercely foreboding melodrama.

DERANGED

Even though she is a rich housewife who inherited millions of dollars when her father slit his own throat with a straight razor, Joyce Peters (Veronica Hart of Cecil Howard's Neon Nights (1981) and Shaun Costello's Pandora's Mirror (1981)) has a lot of major and seemingly irrevocable problems, namely that she is a highly hysterical woman in a dubious marriage with a boorish bohunk tennis player named Frank (Jerry Butler of Frank Henenlotter's Basketcase (1982) and Cecil Howard's Snake Eyes (1985)) who superficially resembles John Wayne Bobbitt in both appearance and character, not to mention the fact that she suffers from nightmarish hallucinations during the most random of moments, even while in the company of other people. Maybe it is because she is pregnant and expecting a baby boy soon or just because she is an introverted weirdo, but Joyce decides to stay behind in NYC when her husband travels to London for a month-long business trip, thus leaving her more susceptible to falling prey to the internal purgatory of her own messed up mind. The voices in her head rightly tell Joyce that her husband Frank is carrying on a lurid love affair with her exceedingly extroverted bitch half-sister Mary Ann (Jennifer Delora of Vincent's Bedroom Eyes II (1989) and Henenlotter's Frankenhooker (1990)). If Mary Ann is a prissy princess, Joyce's mother Sheila (small-time porn star Jill Cumer of Henri Pachard's Jailhouse Girls (1984) and Vincent's R-rated sex comedy Sex Appeal (1986)) is a royally wretched queen bitch who resents her daughter for marrying a low-class "gigolo bum." Upon visiting her mother's lavish apartment with her sister Mary Ann, Joyce is rudely surprised with a baby shower where she is bombarded by the rather revolting presence of her stereotypically nasally-sounding Jewish mother-in-law and various other nefariously narcissistic vulgarians who judge the quality of a party by how much money was senselessly wasted on it. When Joyce opens a present that contains a baby blue baby blanket, she fondly remembers a moment from her childhood when her father tenderly said to her, "Blue is the color of the sky and ocean...serenity. Pink isn't for my Joycie...you're special...Daddy's delight." After that, Joyce goes into a bathroom and hallucinates seeing a maniacal Minister (Daniel Chapman of Mississippi Burning (1988) and Philadelphia (1993)) smashing open the bathroom mirror, with an imaginary alternate dimension featuring a sardonic reenactment of her beloved father's funeral taking place on the other side of the mirror. As the menacing Minister sarcastically states regarding Joyce's father's death, "Let's thank all those who made this possible...Shelia and Darren, her secret lover, and then there's everyone's candy sweetie, Mary Ann, Darren and Sheila's illegitimate bastard child. And damn, if I didn't almost forget, there's daddy's favorite little delight, Joyce." Indeed, Joyce's father Eugene (Jamie Gillis of Jonas Middleton's Through the Looking Glass (1976) and Shaun Costello's Water Power (1977)) apparently slit his throat in the bathtub after catching his wife Sheila cheating on him with a dirtbag named Darren (John Brett), who would later become the anti-heroine's slimy stepfather.

While Joyce suffers from nightmarish hallucinations at least a couple times a day, they completely pale in comparison to the unending series of quasi-Fellini-esque surrealist horror she will suffer after coming home to her apartment after a long hard day of dealing with repugnant family members and being attacked by a sadistic thug in a ski-mask. Indeed, when the assumed robber attacks Joyce and she pleads with him "please, don't do it to my baby" while holding her bloated pregnant stomach, the scumbag proceeds to bludgeon her in the gut with the utmost brutality. While Joyce manages to kill the ski-masked thug with a pair of scissors before he can kill her, she subsequently suffers a miscarriage due to the brutal blows she took to her belly and wakes up the next day on her bed unclad sucking her thumb while in a fetal position like a newborn baby, as if to signify her rebirth as a completely helpless schizophrenic woman-child. Strangely, Joyce is in quite the peppy mood when she fully awakes and even tells her sister on the phone that she has never felt better in her life, as if she has already completely buried her traumatic experiences from the night before in the deep dark recesses of her mind. From there, Joyce's life becomes comprised of endless back-to-black hallucinations-within-hallucinations and traumatic flashbacks-within-flashbacks involving dead loving yet incestuous fathers and disturbingly distorted recollections. While the corpse of the ski-masked robber is still on her living room floor, Joyce hallucinates a past therapy session from her dreaded college years with a certain Hebraic psychiatrist named Dr. Freemont (Harvey Siegel) where she reveals she began hallucinating after her father killed himself. It only becomes apparent to the viewer that Joyce is hallucinating when she walks a couple feet away from Dr. Freemont and picks up a baby. Indeed, in Joyce's mind, she did not suffer a miscarriage but instead had the baby, who she named Frankie in tribute to her alpha-asshole husband. Still semi-sane every once in a while, Joyce sports a pillow under her stomach when people come by her apartment to keep up the appearance that she still is pregnant. During one of her flashbacks, Joyce re-experiences the moment she learned she was pregnant and how her pathologically pigheaded husband was so mad that it would destroy his professional tennis career that he calmly mentioned to his wife after berating her for getting knocked up, "it's not too late to get an abortion." Although her sister Mary Ann comes by at one point for a couple minutes just to bitch and complain about nothing important, Joyce really only interacts with one other person while hiding in her apartment and he is not exactly the best of company for an unhinged broad, as he is a greaseball horndog guido delivery boy named Nick (Gary Goldman, who appeared in Vincent's lame sex comedy Young Nurses in Love (1989)), who uses every opportunity to try to get in her granny panties by using superlatively sleazy sexual innuendos. In terms of imagined meetings, Joyce is oftentimes visited by her father Eugene, who makes his first appearance naked and covered in blood in her bathtub, thus reflecting the nature of his grizzly suicide. Of course, Joyce is not exactly in the best of company for someone who has suffered a super bloody miscarriage during a late stage pregnancy.

DERANGED

Needless to say, as the days pass by and the ski-masked robber's corpse begins to rot, Joyce gets complaints about her apartment smelling, so after imagining her husband Frank encouraging her to hide the body in a more covert and contained area, she puts the cadaver in her closet, but before long, the perturbed protagonist imagines the dead crook randomly popping out of the closet to attack and torment her. While at her apartment, Joyce also hallucinates the day when she first met her husband Frank at a country club and how her stepfather Darren warned her to stay away from such a "low class" fellow who was only interested in her money. Joyce also remembers the day when her mother told her regarding Frank, "you don't want to marry him. Play with him, have a good time with him, but look for a real husband." Indeed, Joyce's mother Sheila is a shameless first-class whore who knows how to separate business and pleasure, as she strategically married the wealthy Eugene but carried on a lurid love affair with Darren and she wanted her daughter to create a similarly duplicitous existence for herself, but her pathetic progeny did not learn the lesson, hence her current precarious situation as the hopelessly cuckolded wife of a grade A asshole. Indeed, as it turns out, the dead fellow with the ski-mask is Frank and he planned to kill Joyce and their unborn baby so he could inherit her millions of dollars and get with his true love Mary Anna, who he has been carrying on an affair with all along. When Joyce mistakes delivery boy Nick for her husband Frank, she ends up having to kill him after he gets a little bit too sexually aggressive after she cock-blocks him upon realizing who he really is. Realizing that her half-sister was also in on the murder plot with her husband Frank, Joyce also violently murders Mary Ann. Naturally, Joyce also has mixed feeling on recollecting her incestuous relationship with her father, who strips his clothes off and joins her in bed in one rather demented scene. One night, Joyce suffers a nightmarish hallucination where all the corpses of her victimizers turned victims come alive and attempt to coerce her into committing suicide, with her undead husband pleading, "Joyce, you don't want to live. Don't you want to join us?," in a rather darkly humorous scene. In fact, Joyce's father demonstrates how easy suicide is by slitting his throat with a straight razor in the same fashion that he did when he originally committed suicide. When Joyce manages to temporarily get over her hallucinated demons when her apartment begins burning down, she talks to her mother on the phone and declares regarding her family and class background, "I don't think I'm one of you" and "I just don't fit in." Barely managing to escape from her inflamed apartment, Joyce walks on the seedy streets of NYC while stumbling around in a conspicuously dazed and confused fashion just like the average bum in a strangely 'hopeful' and somewhat symbolic scene of the character finally managing to break free from her greedy evil little bourgeois family. Unfortunately, Joyce waited too long to get away from her kinfolk, as she may have otherwise preserved some of her sanity had she acted earlier. Strangely and somewhat irritatingly, the very final shot of Deranged is quite a perplexing one that puts into question everything that happened previously in the film.

Although it seems somewhat inexplicable since the protagonist goes completely insane in the end and kills the most important people in her life, there was apparently a sequel planned for Deranged but, for whatever reason, it failed to ever materialize. Notably, auteur Chuck Vincent would later direct the similarly underrated and genre-bending horror-thriller Bad Blood (1989) aka A Woman Obsessed starring porn veteran Georgina Spelvin (The Devil in Miss Jones, Babylon Pink) and child star turned exploitation diva Linda Blair (The Exorcist, Savage Streets) before he died of gay cancer two years later in 1991. In his talent for depicting murderously hysterical women in sometimes absurd and borderline campy fashions, Vincent is certainly a kindred spirit of cult auteur Curtis Harrington, whose work Games (1967) starring a very young James Caan as a man who plots to kill his opulent wife, as well as his later classic Grande Dame Guignol flicks, must have influenced the porn auteur. Additionally, Vincent's rather clever and sometimes semi-cryptic implementation of class and social critiques in Deranged deserves comparisons with classic darkly humorous Paul Bartel satires like Eating Raoul (1982) and Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills (1989). Of course, Deranged is a much darker and more depraved work than anything Harrington or Bartel ever directed, be it horror or otherwise. Essentially an exceedingly claustrophobic chamber piece that is isolated to one set for about 90-95% of the time that mixes the Artaudian theatrics of Rainer Werner Fassbinder with the misanthropic melodramatics and malevolent murder scenarios of gay gutter auteur Andy Milligan, Vincent's film is certainly 1980s psychological kitsch at its most cultivated. In a sense, it was most apt that the lead role of Deranged was played by a porn star because, aside from the fact that 'adult performers' tend to be 'damaged goods' in real-life, few 'legit' actresses would have the stamina, stoicism, and nasty knack for degradation that was needed to play a bat-shit crazy broad who covers an entire bathtub with blood after suffering a brutal miscarriage and has sex with her undead daddy as portrayed by an unclad hairy Jamie Gillis. Indeed, Veronica Hart may have taken countless cocks on screen, but she also proved she could outdo Catherine Deneuve in terms of abject celluloid besmirchment. Unquestionably, the greatest compliment I can pay Vincent's film is that it is one of only a handful of cinematic works where I found myself empathizing with the sort of hyper hysterically and irrevocably wayward woman who I otherwise would say would be a great candidate for euthanasia or at least some sort of feminist commune run by savagely sadistic bull-dykes who know how to pound a terribly perturbed pussy into place. Since the miscarriage rate for women that know they are pregnant is around 15-20%, I would not recommend any young pregnant chick to watch Deranged. In fact, expectant fathers probably should not watch the film either, including those sickos that want their partner to lose the baby, as it might make them feel a smidgen of guilt.

DERANGED

-Ty E

KILL ZONE

Cirio H. Santiago (1993)

Donnie Yen is still a name I am not yet accustomed to fully. His cosmetically altered appearance (in an attempt to seal his position as an Asiatic icon) is becoming more and more synonymous with the term martial arts as I write this. From his performance in Blade II to his role in Once Upon a Time in China II, Donnie Yen has been the background actioner that you notice for his fluid-like movements but has never received a chance, until now. I enjoy many varieties of class, style, and variations in my martial arts films. So I turned to Kill Zone for a prominent detective thriller and was greeted with that plus the most beautifully choreographed action scenes of all time. Kill Zone is a pure of heart gift, plus it wasn't given to us thanks to the pockets of Quentin Tarantino. Sure, he has a decent taste in film yet, but he hasn't given us much other than vapid monologues about foreign cheeseburgers that cause my ear drums to wither. To drastically switch tones & face, Kill Zone is a swift kick in the good cop/bad cop routine's nuts. Unbiased and totally unforgiving, Kill Zone is so utterly merciless with its delivery that your sheets will be soaked with drool and tears. With an all star Hong Kong legends cast not limited to Simon Yam, Sammo Hung, and the aforementioned Donnie Yen, Kill Zone is an award winning bonanza of tender emotions, wonderful cinematography, and the single greatest action sequences only to be topped by Tony Jaa's The Protector. We'll just have to wait for Ong Bak 2. Simon Yam (Drama steered), Sammo Hung (Drama/action prone), and Donnie Yen (Jesus Christ Action) all star together in a unique environment of over-the-top situations of traumatic stress and vengeance of the opposite polarities; all this in a jaw-dropping lush city habitat. It's in films like these that make metropolises seem like ant observatories. Ballroom dancing is a strict art of slack-rigidity and precise movement. Every move must be swift and elegant. What better way to celebrate femininity? Where the art of dancing eventually ends, choreographed martial arts takes up the place to further inject masculinity and fierce primal instincts of combat into the mix, creating an art that is unspoken for and is ultimately better that way; a prose of physical contact. The contours of the body are suited for both offensive and defensive and combined, create rapid-fire visual poetry. Perhaps I'm looking beyond the dust and into the behind-the-camera scenes, but either way martial arts is a bodily art to be reckoned with. It's not only invigorating for the senses but lavishly exclusive for the masculinity in us all. Perhaps the most graceful albeit sadistic showcased in Kill Zone is the newcomer Wu Jing. The extension of villain plus arm & dagger comes as a surprise. You honestly can't help but be enthralled as this assassin does his deed towards characters we feel for. His pristine white uniform becomes stained with blood splatters as he murders crooked cops who have their own crooked lives. Are his actions justified? These detectives are however, as crooked as the syndicate they seek to dismantle. If you have yet to view Kill Zone, quit reading this paragraph for graphic imagery of a massive spoiler. In the final instance of the inevitable showdown when Donnie Yen uses a MMA flip to slam Sammo Hung into a pyramid of glass, a weary Donnie Yen celebrates with a glass of wine(?). Out of the blue, a charging Sammo Hung sprints out of incapacitation to throw Donnie Yen out of a umpteenth story window to fall to his death and coincidentally landing on the car holding Sammo Hung's wife and newborn child. This coincidence borders karma on a shocking extreme. Rather than duping you into an all-too familiar ending, Kill Zone goes above and beyond, satisfying cravings that even you never knew about. This is a film that will leave you mourning a marvelous character, all the more so due to his fantastical fate. Kill Zone is the definitive cop film for me. I can't view such films as Dirty Harry & co. anymore without regretting choosing said Clint Eastwood film over this Donnie Yen masterpiece. No move is anti-climactic and no action is too weak for this film. Cause and effect, my friends. Every action has a reaction. My action was watching this film as a blind buy; reaction? Total and utter satisfaction. Kill Zone is thrilling and beautiful to look at. As my mind's being invaded by thoughts of a beautiful woman, the thought of Zipperheads kicking each other is enough to take my mind off of the theory of love. Damn the finesse of new-age Hong Kong action.

KILL ZONE

-mAQ

I CAN'T SLEEP

Claire Denis (1994)

Contrary to popular belief, there have been a number of prolific black serial killers, including the Grim Sleeper, Jake Bird, Anthony Sowell, Andrew Crawford, Lorenzo Gilyard, Wayne Williams, and Carl Eugene Watts (who killed upwards of 100 people), among countless others, and those are just examples of a couple Afro-Americans and do not include negroes from outside the United States. Also, contrary to popular belief, not all serial killers are intelligent as the rather prolific killing career of half-retarded gay drifter Ottis Toole (who was the influence for the character of the same first name in Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer (1986)) demonstrates. Undoubtedly the French-German-Swiss co-production J'ai pas sommeil (1994) aka I Can't Sleep aka I'm Not Sleepy directed by French female auteur Claire Denis (Trouble Every Day, White Material) is notable for having the rare distinction of depicting a gay black serial killer who gets his kicks robbing and killing extremely old white and weak women so that he can fund his lavish hedonistic lifestyle. Indeed, loosely based on the true story of Martinique-born mulatto serial killer Thierry Paulin—a curious fellow who ultimately died in prison from AIDS before being convicted of killing upwards of 21 elderly French and Jewish women between 1984 and 1987 with the help of his Afro-Guianan lover Jean-Thierry Mathurin (who was released in early 2009 after serving 18 years)—Denis' film is ultimately a work that seemingly unwittingly depicts the cultural absurdity of post-colonial Parisian style multiculturalism. Vaguely Altman-esque in its sparsely plotted structure and inclusion a number of intersecting characters that dwell in the same area, I Can't Sleep is also notable for being, among other things, one of the most plodding and anticlimactic serial killer flickers ever made, which is no surprise considering it was directed by the same director that created the 'anti-horror' arthouse effort Trouble Every Day (2001), which pissed off tons of bloodthirsty horror fan-boys, who tend to have limited attention spans and very little tolerance for films that mix nuisance and atmosphere with blood and gore. Indeed, despite the fact that he is a queer negro that does drag shows and kills elderly white women so that he can rob them to fund decidedly decadent cocaine-fueled homo parties, the serial killer of Denis' film could not be more banal and patently pathetic. Co-penned by Denis' usual screenwriter Jean-Pol Fargeau (Chocolat, Pola X), I Can't Sleep is a truly 'multicultural' movie in the sense that virtually every single character is foreign and lives in their own little ethnic realm inside of Paris, with the main characters being Slavs and negroes (and the latter being from ex-colonies). In fact, 'multiculturalism' and 'diversity' in general are depicted as factors that lead to the killer's murder campaign, as he is a gay negro who is rejected by both his black family and the mainstream white world, thus he is easily able to emotionally detach himself from his aberrant actions. Ironically, some of the people that the killer is most friendly with are old white women, yet his sense of social alienation is so strong and innate, and his resentment and boredom with life is so overwhelming, that he is able to carry out the killing with the ease that most people would put towards using the bathroom or checking their mailbox. A film that, although about 110 minutes long, does not reveal the identity of the killer(s) or a depiction of them carrying out their crimes until an entire hour has passed, I Can't Sleep is quite possibly the least thrilling and most anti-climatic serial killer flick that has ever been made yet, in a sort of cryptic arthouse way, it ultimately gives more insights into what might lead someone to committing such ungodly crimes than both David Fincher's SE7EN (1995) and Zodiac (2007) combined. Of course, then again, the film has about as much to do with serial killers as Altman's Nashville (1975) has to do with country music.

I CAN'T SLEEP

I Can't Sleep begins quite inexplicably with a scene that director Denis has described as having no particular narrative function where two police officers flying in a helicopter over Paris laugh hysterically for a reason that is never made apparent to the viewer. Admittedly, I like to think the cops are laughing about the fact that Paris has become a pathetic multicultural joke, as gay cross-dressing negroes now roam the streets and slaughter old grannies. From there, the viewer is introduced to the strikingly beautiful young quasi-protagonist Daiga (Yekaterina Golubeva of Leos Carax's Pola X (1999) and Bruno Dumont's Twentynine Palms (2003)), who has driven from her homeland Lithuania in an ancient Soviet car to Paris where she plans to start a new life, though she does not have any specific plans aside from meeting up with her long lost great-aunt. Almost immediately upon arriving in Paris, Daiga is hassled by two cops for parking in an illegal spot, so she reacts by absurdly saying to one of the officers in Lithuanian, "Clam up, seal dick," thus indicating that she is a tough little bitch who does not take shit from anyone, especially men, who she seems to have a special feeling of contempt for as her subsequent behavior also surely demonstrates. As Daiga heard on her car radio upon first driving into Paris, a serial killer dubbed by the media as the "Granny Killer" has been strangling to death and robbing elderly women in their apartments. As depicted various times throughout the film, Daiga constantly hears about the killer via newspaper and radio but she seems like she could not care less, at least until she figures out who the grandma strangler is later by accident and decides to use her secret knowledge to her benefit. Ironically, the serial killer, Camille Moisson (unknown actor Richard Courcet in his first role)—a young gay negro that bears a strikingly resemblance to Jean-Michel Basquiat who is from the Caribbean island of Martinique—lives in a hotel that is flooded with elderly women who he gets along with, thus no one ever suspects he is the killer.

Largely owing to the fact that it focuses on no less than three different groups of people that somewhat overlap, I Can't Sleep has a somewhat sloppy and incoherent storyline, at least at first. A good portion of the film takes place at a third rate hotel owned by a fairly masculine old woman with white hair named Ninon (Line Renaud), who mainly has Slavic tenants and who teaches other elderly woman karate in her free time so that they can protect themselves from the “Granny Killer” while totally oblivious to the fact that he is actually living in her building. Daïga arrives at Ninon’s hotel to reunite with her great-aunt Mina (Irina Grjebina), but when she gets there the old woman does not even recognize her. Of course, as a woman that proudly states, “We stand together. We help one another. We’re Slavs,” Mina instantly embraces Daïga when she informs her that she is her great-niece. In another subplot, the viewer encounters Camille’s rampantly heterosexual brother named Theo (Alex Descas of Raoul Peck’s Lumumba (2000) and Jim Jarmusch’s The Limits of Control (2009)), who seems to resent his homo brother and has a toddler mulatto son named ‘Little Harry’ (Ira Mandella-Paul) with an attractive, if not all that sane, white woman named Mona (Béatrice Dalle of Jean-Jacques Beineix’s Betty Blue (1986) and Michael Haneke’s Time of the Wolf (2003)). As man that makes a living building bookshelves and other pieces of furniture for ungrateful middle-class folks that try to scam him out of money, Theo seems to hate white frogs, especially of the bourgeois sort, and wants to move back to Martinique with his girlfriend and their son, but Mona does not want to go, as she could not stomach living in a third world hellhole as she is a spoiled French girl and could not fathom living such a primitive lifestyle. Camille irregularly visits Theo mainly to see his nephew Harry, but it is quite apparent that the two brothers are more or less strangers who have nothing in common aside from the same bloodline. Indeed, Theo hardly suspects that his little bro is the infamous “Granny Killer,” as he wants nothing to do with his brother’s personal life, which involves decadent drag performances at gay bars and S&M and bondage photo shoots, among other things that would shame most heterosexual men.

As a chick that goes to all-male porn theaters just to have a laugh while in a room full of many horny and assumedly masturbating men, Daïga is a somewhat strange little lady who seems to think rather lowly of members of the opposite sex. While her great-aunt manages to land her a job with Ninon cleaning rooms at the hotel, Daïga was hoping to find much more dignified employment with a middle-aged theater director named Abel (played by French hack director Patrick Grandperret in a rare acting role), who invites her on a date and assumedly fucks her, but never gives her a job as he promised he would, which naturally infuriates the character. When Daïga later spots Abel driving around in a fancy convertible, she decides to chase him down and violently crash into him even though she has two passengers in her car, including a Frenchman that she does not know who wants to buy her automobile and a fat and exceedingly effete Slavic queen named Vassili (Tolsty of John Frankenheimer’s Ronin (1998)). While Vassili and the Frenchman tell the police that Daïga intentionally crashed into his car, Abel denies it and tells them it is an accident because he knows that he literally and figuratively screwed over the young Slavic babe by not giving her a job like he promised he would. While waiting at the police station after the crash, Daïga notices a police sketch of Camille and his white boyfriend Raphaël (Vincent Dupont of Jaco Van Dormael's Mr. Nobody (2009)) and realizes that they are the so-called "Granny Killer." Of course, as someone that has no allegiance to Paris or elderly French women, Daïga decides to keep her rather valuable information to herself, as she has big plans that will help her get back to her Slavic homeland.

I CAN'T SLEEP

Indeed, Camille and his bald white beau Raphaël like to gang up on old defenseless women and kill them, with the latter using his charms to trick the victims into letting them into their homes and the former eventually strangling them to death with his bare hands. Due to being a fairly lackluster killer who puts less passion into his murders than he does into taking a leak or putting on a pair of fishnet stockings (which he regularly wears!), Camille forgets to confirm that one of his victims is dead upon strangling her and she ultimately survives and provides his and Raphaël's physical description to the police. Rather absurdly, aside from a vague sexual dynamic that is only hinted at (the two gay boys attempt to murder one old woman after getting into a fight and making up), the only reason Camille and his boy toy rob and kill old women is so that they can pretend to be rich and opulent and show off to their wealthy fag friends by buying them expensive dinners. Indeed, one of their friends is a very Aryan-looking blond fag (Laurent Grévill) that works as a physician and when Camille buys him an expensive dinner, the good doctor pays him back by bugging his brown bunghole. While the doctor does have enough sense to wash off his prick after penetrating Camille's man-cunt, he has no clue that the young negro has recently contracted AIDS (ironically, Camille sees the doctor at the hospital and waves to him the same day he finds out that he has contracted gay cancer). Indeed, not unlike French poststructuralist philosopher Michel Foucault, Camille seems to have a sadistic desire to infect as many men with AIDS as possible, as he tells none of his sexual partners about his rather deadly disease before being bugged by them. Meanwhile, Theo buys his family plane tickets for Martinique, so his girlfriend Mona conspires to steal their son little Harry and run away, as she refuses to leave Paris and certainly will not allow her son to be taken to another country without her. Rather curiously, after realizing that Camille is the killer, Daïga decides to stalk him and eventually hangs out with him at a diner. In a sick sort of way, Daïga and Camille seem to be sort of kindred spirits who are united in their mutual social alienation from both their foreign subculture and the Paris populous in general. Ultimately, Camille is caught by the police while walking home one night after watching his brother play violin with a band at a club. While Camille is being arrested, Daïga breaks into his room and steals that money that he has stolen from his victims. Somewhat curiously, Camille has stuffed all the cash in a trash bag as if it is totally meaningless and worthless to him, thus highlighting the senselessness of his savage crimes. After Camille is arrested, one of the cops mocks him by stating, "Camille...That's a girl's name." When the police interview Theo about his brother, he has no problem admitting to the white cop, "My brother's a stranger to me, just like you." As for Camille's mother, she completely loses it and says to her son while he is being hauled away in handcuffs, "I should have killed you when you left my belly. I'm the one who's dead! Why did I give birth to you, Satan? Why did you do this to me? You were such a good little boy. . .So kind." In the end, the film comes full circle, with Daïga driving out of Paris just as she once drove in at the beginning of the film.

Ultimately, I Can't Sleep is a sort of anti-film noir that breaks virtually all of the aesthetic and especially thematic conventions of the American quasi-genre. Indeed, aside from the fact that the police are mostly faceless misanthropic pricks who are hardly portrayed as heroes (notably, one of the cops says to Daïga, "Human beings are animals"), Denis' film dares to force the viewer to empathize with the killer, who is not revealed to be killer until about an hour into the film for that very reason, as if to trick the unwitting filmgoer into sympathizing with his pathetic plight as a cross-dressing colored boy who enjoys getting manhandled by dapper white dudes. Of course, the film also lacks a femme fatale, at least in the conventional sense, as while Daïga gets to know Camille in a dubious sort of way and then robs him of his money, she never conspired to use her carnal goods to turn a good guy bad like your typical scheming film noir whore. In fact, the most sinister force in I Can't Sleep is indubitably the city of Paris itself, which is depicted as inspiring the sort of social alienation that leads to some sorry sod like Camille becoming a serial killer and Daïga becoming a thief. While various newspapers are featured throughout the film mentioning the killings, none of the characters really seem to be in any way affected by the granny slayings, hence why it was so easy for Camille and his cocksucking comrade to get away with their dastardly deeds for so long. In that sense, the film depicts a much darker world than Fritz Lang's M (1931), which features a society that is plagued by an economic depression and rampant criminality where even career criminals, gangsters, and streetwalkers go to the effort of collectively hunting down and capturing the serial killer. While I am not exactly sure of Denis' intent and seriously doubt that she has any real nationalistic proclivities, I Can't Sleep certainly depicts multiculturalism as a sort of corrosive and malignant force of the contra nature and socially autistic sort that inspires apathy, social alienation, and criminality, especially when various different groups are living in their own hermetic worlds and thus feel no loyalty to their neighbors, let alone their city or country. Of course, being an exceedingly effete negro homo, Camille makes for the ultimate socially alienated individual, hence his lack of apathy when it comes to dispatching other human beings, whose lives and emotions mean nothing to him. When Camille's mother says to him "You were such a good little boy. . .So kind” after being caught, his sense of alienation is only all the more highlighted. Of course, as a homesick negro who incessantly dreams of going to Martinique, Camille’s brother Theo also symbolizes one of the many problems with multiculturalism and his mulatto son Harry is symbolic of one of the more extreme results of such an abstract and artificial ‘postmodern’ society, as he is a bastard boy that belongs to no race, culture, or country. I do not think it is a coincidence that Camille develops a special affection for his nephew Harry, as he seems to remind him of himself at a younger age due to his precarious place in the world (notably, unlike the fictional character Camille, the real-life serial killer he was based on, Thierry Paulin, was a mulatto). Of course, like Denis’ greatest works, ranging from her first film Chocolat (1988) to later great works like White Material (2009), I Can’t Sleep demonstrates in a fairly socially intricate and refreshingly idiosyncratic way that the French are now paying dearly for their colonial days. In that regard, I think it is quite fitting that there is a shot in the film of a newspaper reading, “France is afraid,” as the country will inevitably be consumed by its so-called multicultural population in a couple decades as events like the Charlie Hebdo shooting hint at. Indeed, the ‘culturally enriched’ Paris depicted in I Can’t Sleep ultimately seems like a far less depressing time, as one homo mulatto granny-slayer is nothing compared to a large Occidental city with a large medieval-minded Muslim population, or as director Denis once stated herself in reference to her film, “...a society and a city work best when [its] links are tight. For me, life is a story of connections – without them society will destruct.” Of course, a society that simultaneously endorses both the growth of a Muslim population and virtually every form of sexual debauchery, especially homosexuality, is nothing short of schizophrenic and ultimately suicidal.

I CAN'T SLEEP

-Ty E

BEAU TRAVAIL

Claire Denis (1999)

Since I have been on a strange and completely unexpected Claire Denis (Chocolat, Les salauds aka Bastards) kick lately that has led me to the natural conclusion the fairly unconventional auteur is easily the greatest living female filmmaker, I decided that I would stoically bite the bullet and finally watch the film that has been described as her magnum opus, which is, thematically speaking, not exactly the sort of film that one would expect to be directed by a woman yet, at the same time, it could have only been directed by a member of the fairer sex who has an unabashed love of hard yet sculpted male bodies as many of the director's other works demonstrates. Indeed, Beau Travail (1999) aka Good Work is undoubtedly a somewhat curious masterpiece for a heterosexual female as it tells the somewhat subtle and even esoteric story of a French Foreign Legion master sergeant of the latent homosexual sort who is fanatically obsessed with his fellow latent homosexual commander and decides to wage a personal war against a new young soldier who catches the attention of his forbidden love object. Of course, as her work J'ai pas sommeil (1994) aka I Can't Sleep especially demonstrates in a refreshingly uncompromising way, Denis seems to almost have a fetish for pretty poofs and never shies away from male nudity and glorifying the male body, so I was not all that surprised that she would direct a largely choreographed work where muscles and testosterone take center stage to the point where most of the young legionnaires do not even have credited names. While Denis' work certainly tells a story and a somewhat arcane one at that, the film is largely populated by what one might describe as living statues in the form of young Adonis-like soldiers who incessantly expose their bodies for both the protagonist and the viewer. Unquestionably Beau Travail is the greatest film on macho militarized homosexuality since Rainer Werner Fassbinder's 1982 swansong Querelle (incidentally, Fassbinder included a quasi-S&M-oriented Legionnaire scene in his early masterpiece The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971)), as it manages to express testosterone-driven homoerotic passion in an innately subtle and nuanced fashion without depicting a single scene of gratuitous buggery or even homo kissing. To some extent, the film feels like a deconstructed western where all the savages have been killed or otherwise pacified and where the John Wayne character has created an imaginary enemy in his mind because said enemy has caught the attention of the old cowboy he loves most. Of course, Denis' film is also like a French arthouse take on the underrated closest queen commando classic The Sergeant (1968) starring Rod Steiger and to a lesser extent John Huston's all the more underappreciated and reasonably bizarre Carson McCullers adaptation Reflections in a Golden Eye (1967) starring Marlon Brando and Elizabeth Taylor. Aside from its strong crypto-cocksucker theme, Beau Travail is also loosely based on Herman Melville's posthumously released unfinished 1888 novella Billy Budd and makes reference to Jean-Luc Godard's once banned work Le Petit Soldat (1963) aka The Little Soldier, with Michel Subor playing a character with the same exact name as that of the character he portrayed in the pro-commie anti-Algerian War flick. Of course, as one can expect from a Claire Denis flick, Beau Travail features certain racial and political themes about the legacy of colonialism, like the patent absurdity of attempting to mold negroes into 'Frenchmen' so that they will persecute their own black brothers in the pursuit of promoting the three-headed dragon of "Liberté, égalité, fraternité." Denis' film is also notable for featuring what I would certainly describe as one of the greatest and strangely uplifting endings in cinema history. Indeed, after watching Denis' film, you will never look at a suicidal sod or middle-aged military officer the same way again.

BEAU TRAVAIL

It would be a lie to not immediately reveal in a review of Beau Travail that the film is largely comprised of long scenes featuring healthy young soldiers with toned bodies doing redundant military drills and exercises in almost ethereally scenic locations. The 'gay gaze' that the filmgoer is subjected to is that of introverted protagonist Galoup (Denis Lavant of Leos Carax of The Lovers on the Bridge (1991) and Holy Motors (2012)), who is a master sergeant in the French Foreign Legion that secretly lusts after his elderly yet surely elegant commander Bruno Forestier (Michel Subor). As Galoup lovingly states regarding Forestier in a way that hints at his love interest's repressed homosexuality, "Bruno. Bruno Forestier. I feel so alone when I think of my superior. I respected him a lot. I liked him. My Commandant. A rumor dogged him after the Algerian war. He never confided in me. He said he was a man without ideals, a soldier without ambition. I admired him without knowing why. He knew I was a perfect Legionnaire, and he didn't give a damn. Bruno. Bruno Forestier." Indeed, like Forestier, Galoup uses his military authority as a reason to sit on his ass and somewhat creepily stare at young and buff men all day long. In fact, Galoup and Forestier's scopophilia is so obscenely obsessive that they actually delight in watching their men do emasculating things like ironing their uniforms. As Forestier proudly says while shamelessly gawking at his soldiers, "We're taught elegance in and under our uniforms. Perfect creases are part of this elegance." A non-linear work that is partially set in Marseille after the protagonist has been forced to leave the French Foreign Legion, Beau Travail centers around Galoup narrating the story about his long and undying unrequited love for Forestier led him to murderous jealousy when a young recruit named Gilles Sentain (Grégoire Colin of Milcho Manchevski's Before the Rain (1994) and Denis' Nenette and Boni (1996)) joined the Legion and soon caught the Commander's attention and affection. Galoup even has a sense of foreboding upon first seeing 22-year-old twink Sentain for the first time, or as he reflects via narration in a fashion that makes him seem somewhat like a pathetic paranoiac, "One day, a plane from France dropped off some new guys. I noticed one of them that stuck out. He was thin, distant. He had no reason to be with us in the Legion. That's what I thought. I felt something vague and menacing take hold of me.” Of course, little did poor Galoup realize that Sentain would ultimately become the most beloved and soldiery member of his little frog brigade.

The French Foreign Legion is in Djiboutis and while there are plenty of young colored gals that are more than willing to fuck for a candy bar, the soldiers spend most of their free time with each other, with Sentain at the lead as a natural alpha who has great empathy and loyalty for his compatriots. While talking to a negro driver named Ali during a night in Ramadan, Forestier remarks regarding his soldiers, “My bastards are good kids” and then proceeds to describe himself as a sort of surrogate father to the soldiers. When Ali rhetorically remarks, “Guess how much a colored girl costs here,” Forestier jokingly yet somewhat awkwardly replies, “You’re a pain, Ali,” adding, “If it weren’t for fornication and blood, we wouldn’t be here. That’s all.” Meanwhile, Galoup becomes increasingly agitated about the new recruit, complaining to himself like a little bitch, “Sentain seduced everyone. He attracted stares. People were drawn to his calmness, his openness. Deep down, I felt a sort of rancor, a rage brimming. I was jealous.” Of course, Galoup is as loyal to Forestier as ever as demonstrated by remarks like, “Here I am, Commandant, like a watchdog, looking after your flock,” but that ultimately changes when the protagonist dares to mess with the Commandant’s favorite ‘son.’ When a freak helicopter accident happens that kills a fellow named “Pierre, the Corsican,” both Forestier and the troops develop a seemingly impenetrable respect for Sentain, who manages to save another Legionnaire (played by blond beast Nicolas Duvauchelle of A l’intérieur (2007) aka Inside and Denis’ White Material (2009)) from drowning, with Galoup somberly complaining, “It was then that Sentain’s heroism came to the fore.” When Galoup attempts convince Forestier that Sentain is a traitor and that “he has something up his sleeve,” Forestier, who has developed a deep passion for the young mensch, becomes agitated and gives the protagonist a firm warning not to fuck with his best boy by stating, “Careful what you’re saying. Backstabbing isn’t in the Legion’s honor code.” Naturally, it is really Galoup who has something up his sleeve and he will do anything to take down Sentain, including potentially causing him to suffer a slow and painful death. Despite Galoup’s jealousy of him, Sentain is actually an orphan from a humble background whose appearance abandoned him as an infant. Notably, when Sentain informs Forestier that he was “found in a stairwell,” the old queen Commandant expresses his fondness for him by replying, “Found? Fuck! At least it was a nice find.” Of course, Forestier never expresses such affection for Galoup, who might as well be a ghost as his presence his negligible at best.

Ultimately, Galoup decides to attack Sentain by persecuting his comrades in the hope that he will go over the edge and attack the protagonist, who plans to dish out the ultimate punishment to the poor unwitting orphan boy. Indeed, Galoup harshly punishes a negro soldier for “abandoning his post” after he goes to pray with some fellow black Muslims. When Sentain dares to attempt to give the punished negro a cup of water while he is tediously digging ditches as punishment to the point where his hands are bleeding profusely, Galoup knocks the cup out of his hand and stares at him in a threatening fashion. When he complains, "That's unfair, sir" and Galoup slaps him, Sentain instinctively punches him in the face, which is exactly what the protagonist wanted him to do as it gives him the opportunity to use punishment against him as a means to liquidate him. As punishment, Galoup drives Sentain many miles away to the middle of a desert where the young Legionnaire is left with nothing but a backpack and a compass and is forced to find his way back to the base. While Sentain acts passive-aggressively towards Galoup upon being dropped off by remarking, "I'll see you soon, sir. Says hello to Commandant for me," he does not realize that the protagonist has something up his sleeve. Of course, before dropping Sentain off, Galoup broke his compass so that he cannot find his way back, with the protagonist even bragging to himself like a militaristic mad scientist regarding his sinister scheme before hatching it, "You'll be sorry, Sentain, believe me. I see what you're up to. We don't need guys like you here. You're in my power. I will destroy you. I'll set my trap. The compass." Naturally, Sentain soon gets lost and begins rotting in the desert while his unit assumes that he has fled to Ethiopia, but Galoup is soon found out when the Legionnaires go to a tribal trading post and a negro soldier named Tierno notices that a young black boy is selling the MIA soldier's broken compass, which was found on a salty white beach. When Forestier summons Sentain to punish him upon learning of his treacherous behavior, the protagonist says to him, "Admit you hate me for it," but he responds simply by stating in a stoic fashion, "You know the rules. You knew what you were in for. You have no choice now. Repatriation for disciplinary reasons. Court-martial. You'll be convicted. Your Legion days are over. All over," thus leaving the disgraced master sergeant to feel all the more rejected by the man he loves most.

BEAU TRAVAIL

While Sentain is found half-death and unconscious by some tribesmen, his fate is questionable and it is never revealed whether or not he reunites with his Legionnaire comrades. Before going back to France, Galoup hangs out with a young negress that he seems to think is his girlfriend as demonstrated by the fact he buys her gifts and is featured lying shirtless in her bed, though he is never actually depicted even so much as kissing her, let alone pounding her brown puss. With nothing left to live for and becoming a pathetic and craven disgrace in the eyes of his one true love, who he will probably never see again, Galoup decides to end it all and kill himself upon moving back to Marseilles. Indeed, upon obsessively making his bed like a true anally retentive queen as if it matters what his bed looks like after blowing out his brains all over the sheets, Galoup lies down (notably, with a tattoo on his arm reading "Serve the good cause and die" being shown prominently shown) and prepares to blow his brains out. In a simultaneously hilarious yet strangely humorous twist ending, Galoup is depicted smoking a fag like a suave fag in a dark club and then dancing by himself to the revoltingly kitschy song "The Rhythm of the Night" by Corona in a scene that the seems to reflect the character's triumph of loneliness and, as Denis one described in an interview, his figurative, "dance between life and death."

In his essay on the film entitled Unsatisfied Men: Beau travail, Jonathan Rosenbaum—probably the only living American film critic whose opinion I respect to some degree—notably wrote, "I know it sounds fancy to say this, but the difference between Claire Denis's early work and BEAU TRAVAIL is quite simply the difference between making movies and making cinema." While I do not totally argue with Rosenbaum's remark as I think he underrates and/or is confused by a lot of her other work (notably, he complained in the same essay that Denis' film I Can't Sleep discomforted him because he felt it, "seemed to wallow in a kind of professional morbidity"), I have to admit that Beau Travail is indubitably Denis' most innately immaculate, effortlessly poetic, and emotionally penetrating work to date. Surely, one will not find another film that combines the 'body worship' based homoeroticism of Leni Riefenstahl, the tragic and self-loathing yet macho and militaristic faggotry of Yukio Mishima, the pathological moodiness and landscape lyricism of Michelangelo Antonioni, darkly erotic avant-garde choreography in the spirit of Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men (1989), and the intricate sexual and racial critiques of Fassbinder. Admittedly, I would usually question that intent of any heterosexual woman that dares to direct either a war film or virtually any sort of cinematic work about male homosexuality yet, like with virtually all of her films, Beau Travail demonstrates that Denis is simply intrigued by and can relate to idiosyncratic people, especially of the hopelessly lonely sort, and can find something to like and loathe about all sorts of people, even latent cocksuckers of the lovelorn sort who act murderously malicious as a result of becoming jealous like petty teenage girls. While the film undoubtedly features antiwar themes and mocks militarism in general, Denis' work is not like your average Hollywood war movie and thankfully does not feature sappy and emotionally manipulative sentimentalism like a big tough guy crying like a little girl after seeing his friend's head blow off. Instead, Denis seems to argue that the military is best run by a bunch of thoroughly sexually repressed closet queens who will accept nothing less than an all-male environment full of super spiffy and well ironed uniforms and bulging biceps, among other things.

Unquestionably Denis is a master of eloquent doom and gloom and in nowhere is this more apparent than in Beau Travail, which notably ultimately ends on a startlingly bittersweet and even joyous moment where a perennially lonely self-loathing fag's self-slaughter is curiously celebrated as the last big act of a man that lived inwards and had a complete and utter incapacity to express himself outwards. In that sense, the film acts as a sort of antidote to the pseudoarthouse posturing of fashion designer turned would-be-auteur Tom Ford's obscenely overrated debut A Single Man (2009). Judging by her work, I can only assume that Denis is a lover of lonely losers and her obsession with this quasi-archetype is one of the reasons why Beau Travail is so particularly potent as she was able to make viewers of various stripes be able to identify with one of the most curious of men. When it comes down to it, Beau Travail is the ultimate tragic Männerbünde romance and a work that could be used as a recruitment film for a sort of neo-brownshirt Sturmabteilung, as it demonstrates that staying in the closet can lead to the most major of male sins, including treachery and dishonor, among other less than soldierly qualities that are more oftentimes associated with the feminine realm. Notably, Fassbinder once stated that one of the reasons that Alfred Döblin's novel Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929) was so important to him was because it inspired him to totally embrace his homosexuality lest he turn into an evil mensch as a result of repression like the antagonist Reinhold Hoffmann of the book, or as the auteur wrote himself, "...this reading helped me to admit to my tormenting fears, which were almost paralyzing me, my fear of my homosexual longings, to give in to my suppressed needs; this reading helped me avoid becoming completely and utterly sick, dishonest, desperate; it helped me avoid going under." Of course, the protagonist of Denis' film pays the ultimate price as a result of being dishonest with both himself and his comrades. Maybe if the protagonist of Denis' film had seen Fassbinder's 15½ hour Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) adaptation, he might have avoided the French Foreign Legion altogether and simply started frequenting a local cruising spot. Personally, after watching Beau Travail and seeing all the various African women sporting exceedingly flamboyant tribal sheets and lurking at kitschy clubs where absolutely abhorrent Afro-pop is incessantly vomited out of the speakers, I can see why homosexuality might become prevalent among the Legionnaires. Of course, as Beau Travail makes quite clear, Frenchmen probably should not be in Africa in the first place but of course, as the post-poetry life of Arthur Rimbaud and countless other famous frog poets and artists demonstrates, the Dark Continent and third world in general has always been a homo haven of sorts where white abersexuals who were not able to escape from their minds and sexual desires were at least able to physically escape to a place where bourgeois mores were nonexistent. Indeed, while I do not think Denis' film blames crypto-homos for colonialism, it does make it quite clear that it was restless loners, rejects, and orphans were more likely to leave their homeland behind and travel to strange lands where the native women might lead an otherwise heterosexual man to homosexuality. After all, there are not many black women that can say that they are as pretty as Beau Travail star Nicolas Duvauchelle, which is something Denis seems to agree with as her casting of him in various sexual and unclad roles fairly clearly demonstrates.

BEAU TRAVAIL

-Ty E

TROUBLE EVERY DAY

Claire Denis (2001)

As probably one of only a handful of people in the world that simultaneously likes Vincent Gallo, Claire Denis, arthouse cinema, splatter trash, and dark erotica, I felt it was about time that I watch the somewhat curious French-German-Japanese co-production Trouble Every Day (2001). A sort of arthouse 'anti-horror' flick where sex, especially of the feminine sort, is depicted as something monstrous and even cannibalistic, Denis' flick might as well have been co-directed by Mr. Gallo as his perturbingly peculiar presence permeates throughout the film. Indeed, if the weirdo self-loathing wop realms created by Gallo in Buffalo '66 (1998) and The Brown Bunny (2003) somehow managed to haunt the most white collar sections of Paris, it might begin to describe an unnervingly eccentric and strangely erotic film like Trouble Every Day where both blood and cum practically drip down the screen. Notably, Gallo previously starred in Denis' rarely seen made-for-TV movie US Go Home (1994) and Nénette et Boni (1996) aka Nenette and Boni (1996) and like in the previous two films, the actor/director has the last name 'Brown,' which seems to be both his favorite surname and color as his fairly eclectic career demonstrates. Like Gallo's own films, Trouble Every Day is also consumed with the themes of male sexual neuroticism and female carnal carnivorousness, albeit depicted in an aberrantly allegorical way that uses and abuses conventions of horror cinema to the point where it makes one wonder whether or not Denis has any real serious respect for the genre at all. Undoubtedly, Denis' film feels like a horror flick created by someone with nil interest or knowledge of the genre aside from possibly French fantastique filmmakers like Jean Rollin and Jean-Pierre Bouyxou and autistic surrealists like Alain Robbe-Grillet. The story of a somewhat young American doctor of the proudly materialistic and sexually frustrated sort who takes his new pixie ditz wife to Paris for their honeymoon with the dubious ulterior motive of attempting to hunt down his ex-partner as well as one true love, who is a highly visceral quasi-vampire of sorts that suffers from a mysterious illness that compels her to seduce and cannibalize horny men of all types, Trouble Every Day is ultimately a tale about the insatiable sexual appetite of the fairer sex and the great and oftentimes pathetic lengths men will go to try in vain to satisfy said insatiable sexual appetite. A work where Gallo savagely kills a cutesy frog girl by literally eating out her pussy to the point where his signature mustache and goatee are soaked in more blood than gash gravy, Denis' film notably links the sexual to the violent and bestial in such a seamless way that it is hard to discern when a character is merely sharing their carnal knowledge with their sexual partner or viciously feasting on their flesh. Indeed, Denis does the seemingly impossible by taking the themes popularized by Jess Franco in films like La comtesse noire (1975) aka Female Vampire and giving them a nice pristine polish of artistic legitimacy that still manages to bite. Of course, what better casting for such a film than Gallo as a symbol of male sexual insecurity and feral-like femme fatale Béatrice Dalle as symbol of raw and visceral female sexual savagery. Undoubtedly, if nothing else, Trouble Every Day is a film that brings new mean to the age-old French phrase for an orgasm, “La petite mort” (aka “the little death”).

TROUBLE EVERY DAY

After some truly picturesque shot of Paris during the blue hour, Trouble Every Day introduces vampiric femme fatale Coré (Béatrice Dalle of Jean-Jacques Beineix’s Betty Blue (1986) and Jim Jarmusch’s Night on Earth (1991)) as she lures a slightly overweight trucker into her particularly pernicious path of deadly debauchery. When we see Coré again, she is kneeling in a field with blood on her face in close proximity to the seemingly smiling corpse of the trucker, who the deleterious dame fed upon after seducing him. No longer in control of her own actions as a results of contracting some sort of unexplained virus or disease that makes her act like a rabid erotomanical vampire, Coré is watched over by her unconventionally cuckolded negro husband Dr. Léo Semenau (Denis regular Alex Descas of Raoul Peck’s Lumumba (2000) and Jim Jarmusch’s Coffee and Cigarettes (2003)), who takes it upon himself to bury the corpses of his wife’s exclusively white victims and clean the blood off her body after she has finished feeding. Once one of France’s most respected and successful neuroscientists, Léo had to quit the powerful pharmacology company that he worked for and now works as a lowly general practitioner so that he can take care of his wife and dedicate much of his time to attempting to find a cure to her curious affliction. When away at work, Léo keeps Coré boarded up in a room so that she cannot get outside and use her ravishing beauty to ravage unsuspecting men. Unbeknownst to Léo, two young men have been stalking his house and plan to vaginally plunder his wife, which she is literally begging for as demonstrated by the fact she tries break off screens that cover her windows when she sees the guys coming near him home. To make matters worse, Léo has to refrain from sexual acts with his bloodthirsty wife lest he become one of her victims.

Newlyweds Dr. Shane (Vincent Gallo) and June Brown (Tricia Vessey of Jarmusch’s Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai (1999)) are in a plane headed to Paris to ostensibly celebrate their honeymoon, or so the less than good doctor wants his young and dumb spouse to think. Indeed, while he might be taking his wife on a fancy dream vacation to a part of Paris that is not festering with third world rabble, Shane’s real motivation to go to the City of Light is to reconnect with his ex-partner Léo and especially his assumed ex-lover Coré. While in the plane bathroom, Shane has grotesque vision of his wife June completely covered in blood, thus hinting that he might suffer the same malefic malady as Coré and is afraid that he might do something like munch on his new wife’s mammary glands, hence why he will refrain from carrying out coitus with her for the remainder of the film. Indeed, instead of royally fucking his young and fertile wife upon checking into their room at their luxury Parisian hotel, Shane pathetically lies on his stomach on a bed and masturbates in a lackluster fashion while having a melancholic expression on his face. When Shane finds his wife bathing in their hotel room bathtub, he stares at her pussy in an impotent fashion and strangely asks her “Are you frightened?” as if he has reason to believe that she thinks he might rape her or something. Meanwhile, Shane begins regularly going by a super sterile corporate lab that Léo used to work at before disappearing where people dissect brains, but everyone there refuses to talk to him. When Shane finally gets the opportunity to talk to one of the scientists, he is told regarding Léo, “He just left without a word or trace. He just up and left. We haven’t heard from him since.” In a random flashback scene, Shane talks to a bitchy French scientist who accuses him of loving Coré, to which he replies, “It’s not the right word for it. I was attracted to her. She was so stubborn,” thus indicating the two might share a more ‘unconventional bond.’ When the female scientist attempts to agitate Shane by asking him his thoughts on loyalty and betrayal and he defensively responds, “You were not there. You don’t know what happened. You don’t know me. You’re wrong,” she proceeds to accuse him of stealing both Léo’s research and lover, as well as experimenting on humans, and then throws him out of the lab.

In a key scene in the film that seems somewhat insignificant, Shane goes on the internet and looks at a scientific website that states regarding Léo’s research, “These samples and analyses should in the near future help us to focus our pharmacological research into nervous diseases, pain, mental diseases, and problems of the libido.” Although never made totally clear, it can be probably assumed that Coré’s lethally lecherous behavior is the result of taking sort of experimental drug that did a little more than just increase her lust for cock, hence her hubby’s fanatical obsession with finding her a cure. Meanwhile, Coré states to her husband while he is giving her an intimate post-murder sponge bath, “I don’t want to wait anymore. I want to die.” Notably, in various lighthearted scenes where director Denis seems to almost mock the horror genre, Shane does parodies of both the Frankenstein monster and Dracula while going on a happy stroll with his wife around Paris, though he is later revealed to be a monster that is much more heinous than those classic horror figures. After at least one previous failed attempt, two young men, Erwan (Nicolas Duvauchois of Denis’ White Material (2009)) and Ludo (Raphaël Neal), manage to break into Léo’s house to get to Coré, who practically begged them to let her out before by banging on a window screen like a wild animal. After destroying some of the beakers and nonsensically swallowing some of the pills that they find in Léo’s home lab, Ludo roams around the house while Erwan searches for Coré, who he finds behind a boarded up doorway and who he instantly becomes entranced with, passionately kissing and touching her through the cracks between the boards. Like a wild beast full of rabid lust, Erwan wastes no time ripping off the boards off the door and proceeds to violently kiss and caress Coré, but the fun does not last long as the ferocious feral lady soon begins biting off pieces of flesh from his pretty boy face. When pansy Ludo hears his friend's strange groans of agonizing pain, he decides the best thing to do is run away like a petrified coward. Like a pussycat, Coré sadistically plays with Erwan before killing him by fiddling with his dangling flesh and softly rubbing her blood-soaked face against his in perniciously playful fashion. Ultimately, Coré murders Erwan and uses his blood to finger paint a wall in her home in a way that might lead some to suspect that she is some sort of degenerate modern artist.

TROUBLE EVERY DAY

When Shane gets a call from a girl name Malécot (Hélène Lapiower) from the science lab where she tells him in an almost conspiratorial fashion, "There is something I want to tell you but I cannot tell you here," he wastes no time in setting up a meeting with her. Upon meeting up with Malécot, Shane is given Léo's address and told, "I'm helping you because Léo needs a friend." When Malécot mentions that Coré is severely sick, Shane acts like a drama queen and immediately runs away without saying a word. In a rare instance of comic relief, Malécot says to herself upon witnessing Shane's strange behavior, "Shit. I hope I didn't do something stupid." Of course, Shane immediately makes his way to Léo's house and soon discovers that cracked cannibal cunt Coré has been playing with matches and has set the place on fire. While Shane wastes no time in embracing Coré as if attempting to recapture the good old days, he decides to strangle the bitch to death when she gets a little bit too rough for his taste and her corpse is subsequently engulfed in flames in a glaringly fake CGI scene that probably should have been cut from the film. While Shane goes back to the hotel to sexually service his wife, he cannot bring himself to consummate his marriage and instead goes in the bathroom and jerks off while June cries and bangs on the bathroom door while calling his name. In a rare instance of onscreen ejaculation, Shane blows his milky load on the bathroom floor. After busting a nut, Shane runs out of the hotel and June chases after him in vain, but of course she never finds him.

After going through her husband's cellphone history, June decides to get in contact with Shane's ex-partner Jeanne Ghislain (Aurore Clément of Louis Malle's Lacombe, Lucien (1974) and Wim Wenders' Paris, Texas (1984)). When Jeanne shows June an old photograph of Shane and asks her "Has he changed much?," she revealingly replies, "I wouldn't know," thus underscoring the fact that she has married a man that she knows nothing about. Meanwhile, Shane buys June a puppy at a pet shop and lurks around subways where he seems to manage to seduce women merely by looking at and touching them, thus hinting that he, not unlike Coré, has some sort of entrancing power as a result of his affliction that helps him seduce his prey. Ultimately, Shane proves he does have such a metaphysical mating power when he goes back to his hotel, follows a maid named Christelle (Florence Loiret Caille of Denis' Les salauds (2013) aka Bastards) back her locker room, sexually seduces with next to nil effort, violently manhandles her, and then kills her before performing cannibalistic cunnilingus on her sweet frog cunt. In the end, June goes back to the hotel and finds Shane showering and asks him, "How you feeling, Doc?" and he affirmatively replies, "I feel good." While embracing Shane after they mutually agree to go back to America, June gets somewhat of a chill upon noticing a drop of blood dripping down the shower curtain. It might just be my intuition, but I doubt that Shane will be as loving and delicate with June as accursed negro cuckold Léo was with his vampiric whore wife Coré.

For whatever reason (I suspect it is at least partly because many women are with men that they are in no way sexually attracted towards), many people have the outstandingly moronic belief that women have smaller sexual appetites than men, but the opposite is actually true. Aside from the fact that it is not uncommon for women to have a dozen or so orgasms in a single sexual session where a man only has one (not to mention the fact that female orgasms are apparently more intense than male orgasms), as well as the fact various porn stars have had their gashes plundered by literally hundreds upon hundreds of men in a single gang bang, certain philosophers have argued that the fairer sex is sexuality personified and nothing more, or as Otto Weininger once wrote, "Woman is only sexual, man is partly sexual, and this difference reveals itself in various ways. The parts of the male body by stimulation of which sexuality is excited are limited in area, and are strongly localised, whilst in the case of the woman, they are diffused over her whole body, so that stimulation may take place almost from any part." Undoubtedly, the character of Coré in Trouble Every Day is a solely sexual creature of the innately sensually intemperate sort who literally lives to fuck men to death to the point where she even attempts to consume her hubby. Although the character Shane has the same affliction as Coré, he is at least able to control himself to a certain extent and find other outlets for his homicidal horniness. Surely, no one can finish Denis' film and not come to conclusion that women are the most sexually insatiable gender. Of course, women have to pretend to not like sex so much because it is the only real commodity that they have to offer to men and they know it.

While some of her films do feature certain strange feminist elements, Denis is far from a Dworkin dyke or Agnès Varda fan-girl as demonstrated in an interview she did with Interview Magazine where she soundly stated, "I've never seen a world where only men were responsible for the violence and the women were innocent. They go together. Men and women are a violent mixture." Of course, as Trouble Every Day demonstrates, Denis' quote can also be applied to sexual violence. It should be noted that in the film it always seems as if the victims search out their predators, but of course you cannot have sadists without masochists and vice versa. As personified by the Coré character, women typically use more passive-aggressive and 'esoteric' (translation: underhanded) tactics when it comes to using violence, hence why men get all the blame. What ultimately makes Denis' flick an unconventionally darkly erotic work is not its various beaver close-up shots, but its portrayal of sex as something innately visceral, bestial, and, in turn, truly transcendental. Indeed, although it might seem somewhat deranged, one could argue that the ultimate sexual climax would be dropping dead after busting a load, or so one might assume after watching Trouble Every Day. While apparently many people were shocked when it was released and could not fathom that it was actually directed by a woman, I would argue that it could have only been directed by a woman and a rare honest one at that, which is unequivocally one of Denis' greatest strengths as a filmmaker. Indeed, not unlike Valie Export, Ulrike Ottinger, Helma Sanders-Brahms, or any other honest and worthwhile woman filmmaker that does not waste their time with sterile and outmoded feminist polemics, Denis is not constrained by the sort of frivolous moral dilemmas that plague men, especially when it comes to sexuality, hence her assumed appreciation for a man like Vincent Gallo who has no problem directing himself receiving an unsimulated blowjob for a film. Out of all the sort of genre-cannibalizing 'postmodern' vampire flicks that have been made over the past couple decades, including Michael Almercyda's Nadja (1994), Abel Ferrara's The Addiction (1995), Larry Fessenden's Habit (1995), Guy Maddin's Dracula: Pages from a Virgin's Diary (2002), and Denis' ex-employer Jarmusch's Only Lovers Left Alive (2013), Trouble Every Day is certainly the greatest, freshest, most original, and least contrived, but I guess one should not expect anything less from a film where none other than Vinnie Gallo voraciously feasts on a fresh young frog foregut.

TROUBLE EVERY DAY

-Ty E

WHITE MATERIAL

Claire Denis (2009)

As the country that produced audaciously arrogant Marxist documentarian Jean Rouch (Moi, un noir aka Me a Black, Babatu) and far-leftist extremist propagandist René Vautier (whose short agitprop doc Afrique 50 (1950) was arguably the first European anti-colonial film ever made), not to mention exceedingly ethno-masochistic 'intellectuals' like spiteful little lazy-eyed toad Jean-Paul Sartre (a white man who gleefully backed the slaughtering of Europeans in his preface to Frantz Fanon's classic text The Wretched of the Earth yet characteristically was a hypocrite that lacked the testicular fortitude to follow through on his own beliefs and kill himself), France has a long history of anti-colonial agitators that seemed to suffer a sort of totally unbelievable race-based Stockholm syndrome. Of course, as Vilfredo Pareto demonstrated in his classic text The Rise and Fall of Elites: An Application of Theoretical Sociology, when a culture becomes irrevocably decadent its debauched elites begin to root for and actively support the very same people that seek to destroy them, as if they hoped to be spared from the very same revolutions that emphasize the extermination of all their friends and family members. To my knowledge, the only contemporary film that I can think of that depicts such warped thinking is ironically a French work directed by a woman who spent most of her childhood living in various French colonial West African nations and has dedicated most of her filmmaking career towards directing racially-charged works that were directed from a somewhat preternatural post-colonial white French female perspective. Indeed, White Material (2009) directed by Claire Denis (J'ai pas sommeil aka I Can't Sleep, Trouble Every Day) depicts a racially schizophrenic white French woman played by half-Hebraic frog diva Isabelle Huppert who has a visceral hatred for her own people and is determined to keep her unprofitable coffee plantation going during a quasi-genocidal anti-white civil war in an unnamed Africa nation even though both the corrupt government and especially negro rebels want to see all whites killed, only for her and her family to experience a sort of self-prophesying tragedy of the quasi-apocalyptic sort. Depicting a sort of Haitian Revolution 2.0 that emphasizes the innate stupidity and self-deceptiveness of idealistic xenophilic whites, the film should have probably borrowed its name from Dutch auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst's masterpiece 1984 swansong and be called White Madness as it depicts how a delusional white dame more or less causes the death of her entire family due to her insistence that they stay in negroland during a savage civil war featuring roaming armies of rape-inclined child soldiers, thug mercenaries that charge people an insane rate just to drive down dirt roads without being executed, and other forms of murderously violent rabble who seem to be geared towards murdering their 'enemies' (aka virtually anyone they come in contact with) in the most malevolently sadis-tic ways imaginable. Surely White Material is an important contemporary film in the sense that it is probably the only somewhat recent work of its kind that dares to depict what can happen to xenophile and negrophile Europids when they refuse to face reality in terms of race dynamics, especially in regard to the fact that just because someone is an ethno-masochistic cracker who hates their own people does not mean that pan-African rebels and other groups of honky-hating sambos will not slaughter you and your entire family in a most malevolent fashion. Arguably more intriguingly, Denis' film spreads a message that makes it seem as if there is no hope for redemption for both France and its ex-colonies in Africa, as irrevocable damage has been done to both sides to the point where the best thing whitey can do is to leave the Dark Continent alone for good. Indeed, thankfully White Material is neither your typical masturbatory tribute to the dubious legacy of charlatan frauds like Mandela nor a putrid piece of poverty porn that is meant to coerce the slave-morality-ridden white viewer into crying for the perennially impoverished noble savage.

WHITE MATERIAL

White Material begins somewhat abruptly with a group of negro soldiers curiously finding the corpse of a negro rebel named 'The Boxer' (Isaach De Bankolé of Lars von Trier's Manderlay (2005) and Jim Jarmusch's The Limits of Control (2009)) lying on a bed in a white bourgeois home (as indicated by pictures of white people in the room) and declaring in an emotionless fashion, "It's the Boxer. He's dead alright." The same group of negro soldiers are also depicted locking a young Aryan man with a shaved head into a room and setting it on fire. Edited in a somewhat confused nonlinear fashion, the film will eventually reveal at the end how the anti-white negro rebel leader the Boxer ended up dying in a white person's comfortable bourgeois bed, as well as how the young Aryan boy ended up being locked in a room where he would ultimately be burned alive in a micro-holocaust of sorts. The foredoomed white boy's name is Manuel (Nicolas Duvauchelle of Denis' Beau Travail (1999) and Alexandre Bustillo and Julien Maury's À l'intérieur (2007) aka Inside) and, not unlike his protagonist mother Maria Vial (Isabelle Huppert of Haneke's The Piano Teacher (2001) and François Ozon's 8 Women (2002)), he is somewhat unhinged, which seems to be both the natural result of tainted genetics and being part of a marginal white population that lives in a sub-Saharan African nation that is mostly hostile to Europeans. Aside from being a female cuckold of sorts that still lives at the same coffee plantation home with her ex-husband André (Christopher Lambert of Highlander (1986) and Mortal Kombat (1995)) who produced an illegitimate mulatto bastard son with the family's fairly young live-in maid Lucie (Adèle Ado), Maria refuses to leave her unnamed African nation even though her business no longer turns a profit and a civil war has just started where all the whites are being killed as being broadcasted by a rebel DJ that has taken over the local radio station. Indeed, when a white neighbor attempts to convince Maria to leave the country by yelling to her from a helicopter, "Madame Vial. The French army is pulling out! We're leaving! You'll be completely cut off! Think it over, Madam Vial! Think it over! We're pulling out! You must leave immediately," she responds by getting a bitchy self-righteous attitude, gesturing a "fuck you" to the guy that tried to save her life, and saying to herself in a spiteful and rather confused fashion, "These whites, these dirty whites. They look down on us, and we risk our lives for them. They're a bunch of nouveaux riches, pretentious, arrogant, ignorant. They don't deserve this beautiful land. They can't even appreciate it!" as if she is in total denial about the fact that she belongs to the very same group of whites that she has so much seething hatred for. Of course, in the end, Maria's decidedly deluded attitude will result in the death of her entire family.

While Maria is making her way back home to her coffee plantation, a negro preacher lies dead in his church, which has a banner outside of it that ironically reads, "God doesn't give up," thus reflecting the apocalyptic situation brewing in the African nation. Of course, the preacher was killed by cracker-hating commie rebels that are mostly made up of mere children who clearly lack both the intellectual and emotional capacity to fully understand the deranged behavior they are engaging in, as well as the dubious dead-end cause they are mindlessly fighting for. A group of these rebels eventually run into their almost supernaturally stoic hero the Boxer who, although severely wounded, brings no attention to the fact that his time is numbered. When the Boxer is handed a fancy golden lighter by one of his comrades and asks where it came from, one of the rebels replies, "It's just white material," thus indicating it is war booty that was taken by the child soldiers from a white family that they have recently slaughtered. Meanwhile, Maria gets back to her plantation and is quite enraged when a couple of her black employees tell her they are quitting and leaving due to the civil war, soundly stating to her, "Coffee's coffee...Not worth dying for," so she maturely responds to them by telling them to fuck off and to never come back. Indeed, despite her ostensible love for Africa and black Africans, Maria treats virtually all negroes like slaves who can be bought and ordered around for mere pennies and when they do not oblige her demands, she becomes rather ruthless like your typical privileged white bourgeois bitch who is used to getting what she wants. Without employees to help her harvest the coffee, Maria is forced to travel to a nearby village to contract employees among the most desperate and impoverished of negro sub-lumpenproles, but before she does, she finds the Boxer hiding in a shed on her plantation, but she does not kick him out because he is the nephew of her favorite and most loyal employee Jean-Marie even though he is an anti-European pan-African revolutionary who wants her kind flushed out of the decidedly dark, Dark Continent. Naturally, harboring a rebel leader in her home is not exactly a sound move on Maria's part and it will ultimately foredoom her family to a most ungodly fate that is nothing short of catastrophic, if not all that different from what white Frenchmen suffered during the Haitian Revolution when the negro population exterminated the entire white population, including the women and children (though a handful of white female traitors managed to survive by agreeing to marry negroes).

WHITE MATERIAL

Upon leaving in a large truck to look for employees to help her with harvesting coffee, Maria is stopped on the road by a couple of young machinegun-wielding negroes who demand that she pays $100 as a 'toll' or be killed. Interestingly, the leader of the group is Maria's son's gym teacher and the protagonist also personally knows every single one of the militant negro crooks, but that does not stop them from sticking guns in her face and threatening her life, thus she is forced to pay the rather ridiculous toll just so she will not be gunned down for driving on an archaic dirt road. Before heading to the village, Maria stops at a pharmacy to pick up drugs for her ex-father-in-law and her black pharmacist friends attempt to coerce her to leave the country as they assume she will be killed since she is white. Notably, while at the pharmacy, a rebel DJ announces via radio: "As for the white material, the party's over. No more cocktails on shaded verandas while we sweat water and blood. They're getting out...and they're right to run scared. Our rulers are already trembling, their suitcases stuffed with booty they amassed while you starved." Unbeknownst to Maria, while she is picking up about a dozen or so negroes to work at her plantation, her ex-husband André is selling the entire business and property to the local mayor Chérif, who is not beneath ripping off his old white friends during times of desperation even though he is already extremely rich to the point of having his own private militia. As André retorts to Chérif when he comments that Maria will be mad when she finds out that he went behind her back and secretly sold the plantation, "I'm protecting her from herself. We no longer turn a profit. No use getting massacred over some coffee. The plantation isn't worth a thing." Clearly a self-absorbed scumbag of sorts, Chérif brags to André, "I keep you alive. Without me, you'd be rotting on the Garonne" upon making a dubious deal to buy the plantation for literally nothing (in fact, the plantation is given to Chérif to settle supposed debts, with the colored predatory capitalist claiming that André will still owe him money after handing over the property).

Before heading home with her new employees, Maria goes by an elementary school to pick up her ex-husband's 12-year-old bastard mulatto son Jose, but André arrives around the same time, so he brings his half-breed progeny back home with him on his motorbike. When Maria gets home, she tries in vain to wake up her twentysomething-year-old adult son Manuel—a clearly half-crazed fellow who takes after his mother sans her work ethic—since he is still dead asleep even though it is well into the afternoon. When Manuel finally awakes from his slumber, he decides to take a dip in the dirty family pool and is quite intrigued when he hears a couple young children moving inside his house. Ultimately, Manuel's curiosity gets the best of him and he decides to do what proves to be a major mistake when he attempts to chase down the kids while wearing no shoes.

Unbeknownst to Manuel, the children are armed and they eventually corner him while wielding machetes, spears, and guns and then proceed to call him a “yellow dog,” cut off a lock of his hair, and shove a gun down his pants near his genitals in a perverted fashion that signifies that they have a sickly salacious sod thirst for defiling white meat. Although not actually depicted, it is insinuated that one of the child rebels rapes Manuel as he is featured in a subsequent scene completely naked with his knees and feet bloody, as if somehow had just violently manhandled him while he was bent over on the ground. While André eventually finds his son naked in the field and provides him with clothes and Maria subsequently begins driving him home, Manuel eventually escapes and heads back home where he grabs a rifle, completely shaves his head into a skinhead style in a seemingly symbolic act that demonstrates his recent psychological castration via negro rape, and then shoves his hair into the mouth of his half-breed brother Jose’s mother Lucie in a rather violent fashion, as if to let her know that he no longer takes orders from his parents’ virtual slaves and that he is disgusted with the fact that his father left his mother and reproduced with a young negress concubine. Although Manuel’s grandfather Henri Vial (Michel Subor of François Truffaut’s Jules and Jim (1962) and Jean-Luc Godard’s Le Petit Soldat (1963))—the true owner of the plantation and patriarch of the home—comes to Lucie’s rescue and kicks his grandson out of the house, the black girl is enraged and hatefully declares, “The patriots will kill you all! All of you!,” thus indicating that she has no love for her white baby-daddy or his crazy cracker family.

In a flashback scene that hints that Maria may have been carrying on a romance with the negro mayor, the protagonist shares a joint with Chérif as he gleefully explains to her how she has failed as a mother in terms of raising a mentally unstable slacker of a son. After describing Manuel as a boy whose “mind is all over the place” that is turning into a “dog,” Chérif remarks to Maria regarding her influence on her son, “You botched it with him. You didn’t finish the job” and she responds by laughing like a typical stoned stupid moron. Of course, Maria’s workers fear for their lives and decide to quit when they hear the following announced by a government soldier on the local radio: “A reliable source has informed us that the rebel soldier, the Boxer, is hiding out amidst foreigners who rip us off and use our land to grow mediocre coffee that we’d never drink. Their accomplices will be eliminated.” Indeed, the black workers pull guns on Maria and demand money, but someone has stolen all the money from the family safe, so the desperate negro proles settle for a ride back to their village. Unfortunately, on the way back to the village, a group of rebel child soldiers that are clearly wearing the protagonist’s jewelry and clothing steal Maria’s van and kill a couple workers who dare to proclaim their innocence as poor workers. Indeed, by killing the poor peasants, the revolutionaries demonstrate they could care less about the bastardized Marxist ideology that they are ostensibly fighting for. When Maria goes to check on her friends at the pharmacy, she discovers that the store has been wrecked and robbed and that all of her buddies have been brutally slaughtered. Of course, the pharmacists were killed by the child rebels, who are more interested in getting high on factory grade drugs than bringing down their supposed capitalist oppressors.

WHITE MATERIAL

Rather bizarrely, when he sees the child soldiers driving his mother's truck, Manuel, who is clearly not sound of mind and has developed a particularly advanced form of racial Stockholm syndrome where he has become sympathetic to the struggle of his black rapists, yells to them while riding a motorbike that he knows where their 'spiritual leader' the Boxer is and he will take them to him. Indeed, Manuel takes the murderous 'youths' back to his plantation and helps them steal a wheelbarrow full of food and then he and the killer kids get high on stolen drugs from the pharmacy and gorge on a buffet of western junk food. Meanwhile, a group of government soldiers begin invading the plantation while elderly patriarch Henri looks on silently and does not bother to warn his family members that a group of army thugs have come to slaughter them. When the soldiers find most of the child rebels sleeping in rooms inside the plantation house, including a preteen boy lying in a bathtub next to toys and empty jars of jelly, they kill them softly by driving knives into their still bodies in what is unquestionably one of the most calm and even soothing mass murder scenes in cinema history. When the soldiers find Manuel walking around the plantation with a rifle in his hand, they lock him in a room, set it on fire, and burn him alive. Meanwhile, Maria eventually manages to get a lift back home from her friend Chérif and during the ride the protagonist complains that her son Manuel is "defenseless" without her and the mayor soundly responds, "Extreme blondness brings bad luck. It cries out to be pillaged. Blue eyes are troublesome. This is his country. He was born here. But it doesn't like him." When Maria gets home, she finds both her ex-husband André lying dead in a pool of blood next to passports and Manuel's scorched corpse. After noting that her (ex)father-in-law is still alive and discernibly unscathed, Maria brutally murders Henri by hacking him up with a machete in a scene that, whether intentional on the director's part or not, seems to symbolize the deleterious effect that living in post-colonial Africa can have on a European. At the end of the film, a wounded rebel runs off into the woods, thus assumedly signifying the perennial state of catastrophic revolution in post-colonial Africa. The film concludes with the pseudo-dedication, "For the fearless young rascals...for Maria," as if to insinuate that both the child rebels and the protagonist suffer from a similar sort of childish arrogance, pathological pigheadedness, and self-destructive naivety.

Undoubtedly, I would be lying if I did not admit that I found Isabelle Huppert's character in White Material to be strikingly less sympathetic than her role as the eponymous masochistic pervert in Haneke's The Piano Teacher, which certainly says a lot, at least as far as I am concerned as I consider the anti-heroine in the latter film to be one of the most grotesque and uniquely unlikeable female characters in cinema history. Indeed, aside from being an exceedingly ethno-masochistic cuckold who smokes dope with corrupt black politicians and romanticizes African negroes so much that she considers them to be infinitely preferable to her own people even though they hate her and everything she represents while at the same time treating said African negroes like virtual slaves, Huppert's character risks the lives of everyone in her family so that she can maintain her silly dead-end existence of running a coffee plantation in a forsaken third world hellhole where murderous commie revolutions and anti-European race hate are everyday occurrences, thereupon resulting in a number of inexplicable tragedies that could have been easily avoided had she taken heed of the much warranted advice of virtually everyone she knows, including her black employers that understand their country much better than she does, thus making her no different than the moron politicians in Europe who thinking flooding their countries with more Islamic barbarian untermenschen will somehow make their countries more stable. I also do not think it is a coincidence that the protagonist's son is a moronic lunatic, as the character acts as a sort of allegorical representation of the negative effects of being white and born into a post-colonial nightmare nation where everyone hates you simply because of the color of your skin and you have nothing or no one to relate to, hence why the character goes completely berserk and leads the anti-white black rebels back to his family plantation so that they can destroy the place. It should also be noted that during the film the protagonist's ex-husband's mulatto son senselessly commits sabotage at the plantation while the characters are harvesting coffee by going on the roof of a building and cutting an electricity wire. Undoubtedly, this half-breed prodigal son is a sort of historically accurate archetype of colonial history as reflected in the fact that various leaders of the Haitian Revolution were the bastard Mulatto sons of French aristocrats and plantation owners. Of course, as the old Greek adage goes, the bastard will always be the enemy of the true-born. If White Material has any discernible message, it is there is no hope for whiteness in the Dark Continent, or as virtual pimp politician Chérif states, "Extreme blondness brings bad luck. It cries out to be pillaged. Blue eyes are troublesome." Of course, nothing is more troublesome than racially schizophrenic blue-eyed devils that somehow think they can survive and even thrive in a country full of poor and resentful half-starved negroes who cannot stand a foreigner that is more successful in their own homeland than they are.

In its depiction of the hopelessly 'unequal' master-slave relationship that occurs when black works for white, White Material is surely superficially comparable to Senegalese auteur Ousmane Sembène's debut feature La noire de... (1966) aka Black Girl, albeit more intricate and strikingly nihilistic. As much of Denis' work, including J'ai pas sommeil (1994) aka I Can't Sleep—a genre-confused film based on the true story of gay mulatto serial killer Thierry Paulin, who had a fetish for killing elderly white women and died of AIDS in prison before ever being convicted of any of the heinous crimes that he committed—demonstrates in an intricately idiosyncratic sort of fashion, the ghost of Frantz Fanon lives on as black Africa is taking its revenge against France for colonialism in a variety of strange and oftentimes predictable ways while racially schizophrenic white Frenchmen seem completely oblivious to the point of welcoming their misfortune. Thematically speaking, I must admit that I think Denis' film is extremely grotesque and quite symbolic of the sort of all-consuming sickness that is plaguing the post-colonial French collective unconscious, hence White Material's importance as a rare frog flick that offers some sort of contemporary truth, especially in regard to the impossibility of real peace between black and white. Indeed, something is indubitably innately sick and dysfunctional about a society when an elderly French woman directs a film where a young and handsome Adonis-like white Frenchman that is old enough to be the filmmaker's grandson is raped by a murderous negro child, as it demonstrates a certain irrevocable defilement of the soul that would have seemed totally inexplicable only a generation ago, even in a traditionally degenerate nation like France. Indeed, forget Charles Baudelaire, Arthur Rimbaud, Joris-Karl Huysmans, and Georges Bataille, White Material is Franco-debauchment at its most horrifyingly sick and depraved. Of course, for those individuals that have a certain disdain for bleeding heart white liberals, Denis' film indubitably offers a bit of schadenfreude, even if the director has a somewhat curious view of race relations. Like the work of any great female filmmaker, including the films of Ulrike Ottinger and Helma Sanders-Brahms, White Material ultimately reflects the sort of bizarre and seemingly convoluted moral stances that honest members of the fairer sex seem particularly susceptible to, thus making for a particularly provocative cinematic work that dares to stir and ultimately debase the soul of the viewer to the point where they might question the popular view that it is the duty of Europids everywhere to champion mindless altruism towards poor negroes. If nothing else, Denis' film demonstrates that sub-Saharan Africans and blacks in general generally hate whites and no amount of altruism, pathetic groveling, or moronic negrophilia will change that fact. After all, it is no coincidence that after over 210 years, black Haitians still celebrate the complete extermination of the entire white population during the Haitian Revolution as the greatest event in their entire history. Of course, it is also no coincidence that Haiti went from being one of the most advanced and fruitful colonies in the world to degenerating into one of the most backwards and destitute slums on earth as a result of the revolution.

WHITE MATERIAL

-Ty E

PUSSY TALK

Claude Mulot (1975)

While Gerard Damiano's mafia financed and distributed crossover work Deep Throat (1972) brought mainstream legitimacy to pornography in the United States, the French were treated to something much more bizarre in terms of pioneering crossover porn flicks. Indeed, Claude Mulot's Pussy Talk (1975) aka Le sexe qui parle aka Talk aka The Sex Who Talks—the first frog fuck flick to achieve international success and eventually earn cult status—is as wantonly whacked out as its rather literal American English title would suggest, as a patently preposterous porno piece featuring a chattering bushy pussy that likes to use the word “cunt.” Rather loosely based on the French 18th-century erotic novel The Indiscreet Jewels (1748) aka Les bijoux indiscrets by Enlightenment era writer Denis Diderot, Mulot's flick is what some viewers might describe as a sub-arthouse unintentional laugh-out-loud comedy as a dead serious work with majorly moronic dialogue and scenarios that would baffle even an autistic toddler in terms of its absurdist erotic anti-realism. Sort of like a Radley Metzger film (in fact, Pussy Talk can be seen being advertised on a movie theater marquee in Metzger's hardcore masterpiece Opening of Misty Beethoven) meets a preposterous premise from some old vintage Nickelodeon cartoon, Mulot's masterfully moronic yet lavishly lecherous blue movie may be a lot of things that one might describe as unflattering, but no one can say the film is in any way, shape, or form banal. Featuring 'actresses' that are far too attractive to be porn stars and mostly physically and psychologically male characters that are more often than not intimidated by beautiful women that probably would not normally recognize their rather mundane existences, the film's American distributor certainly used false advertising with the following rather ridiculous tagline: “Because you're a Woman, you should see...Pussy Talk.” A sort of raunchy 'gynocentric' reworking of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde that may or may not have influenced the rather wretched feminist vomit The Vagina Monologues, Pussy Talk is a salacious sick joke at the expense of both men and women that reminds the viewer that pussies have many secrets and complaints to tell.

Joëlle (Pénélope Lamour) is a statuesque redhead who is married to a less than sexually virile fellow named Eric (Jean-Loup Philippe), so she must find other ways to satisfy her sexual cravings aside from being soullessly humped by her hubby. When a hot blonde compliments her act of defiance regarding tearing up a traffic ticket that has been left on her car, Joëlle follows the sensual stranger into a record shop, fondles her vulnerable vulva, and attempts to shove a 100 French franc banknote in the woman's pussy, but the two are ultimately interrupted, thus prematurely aborting the game of 'cash-in-gash.' The next day while she is at work, Joëlle, who is an executive at an advertising agency, uses her seductive power as a busty boss to pull out a startled young mensch's cock and begin deepthroating it. When Joëlle comes home that night, she has to keep company with her husband Eric's banal friends, so to spice things up, she begins masturbating in front of them. While Eric is somewhat angered by his wife's vulgar display, it also turns him on, so the two have sex, though Joëlle is ultimately left unsatisfied. Needless to say, Joëlle decides to satisfy herself by masturbating in a bathtub while fantasizing about a group of male frogs in a circle jerk busting their loads on the windshield and windows of a car she is inside. After diddling her naughty bits, Joëlle notices her husband and also notices that her cunt has began talk in a crude fashion.

PUSSY TALK

When Joëlle walks in on her snoozing husband, her mouthy meat-curtain rudely awakens him by stating: "Well, as I live and breathe...isn't it sleeping beauty? Wakeup you lazy son-of-a-bitch! You hear me? I said wakeup! I wanna fuck...you understand? FUCK! Only, this time I wanna get something out of it. I want you to sock it to me kid [...] You better get used to it! You both better get used to it because when I get going, I'm Pandora's Box without a lid." Indeed, Joëlle's pussy is now in charge and it has a voracious yet eclectic appetite, so before the ad executive knows it, she is walking to a porn theater in nothing but a trench coat. Upon entering the sleazy porn theatre and watching a fucked fuck film featuring a deranged dude cutting off a poor girl's bodice and subsequently raping her, Joëlle begins giving two swarthy frogs with flaccid chodes handjob at the same time, but her efforts do little to get the men's dongs up, so the threesome heads to the theater bathroom and gets involved in a claustrophobic ménage à trios. Needless to say, Eric is not happy later that night when Joëlle goes home and her blabbering beaver tells him what his wife has done at the local porn theater. The next day, Eric has his friend Martine (Ellen Earl)—a psychiatrist posing as a veterinarian "with an interest in pussies"—come over to meet Joëlle, whose talking pussy the quack naturally wants to meet. Of course, the chattering cunt, which semi-sinisterly states to the psychiatrist, "You wanna know, cunt?! [...] the four of us are going to have a blast," is too smart for Martine and coerces her to have sex with not only Eric, but Joëlle as well. Of course, minor trouble strikes Joëlle and Eric when Martine decides to go to the press with the story of the "vagina loquens."

Hoping to get the full scoop on Joëlle and get her surreally sordid story, Richard (Vicky Messica) approaches the ad executive's absurdly amorous artist aunt Barbara (played by French 'activist' Sylvia Bourdon)—a playfully perverted lady who regularly enjoys threesomes with both her male and female subjects—who is more than willing to setup up her niece for the right price. Meanwhile, after Joëlle falls asleep, her compulsively chit chatty cunt tells her husband about her sexual awakening as a teenager. Indeed, on top of revealing that Joëlle's mother shot her stepfather dead when she was 16 after catching her husband molesting her daughter, Eric also learns that his wanton wife lost her virginity to the nose of a Pinocchio marionette after her high school sweetheart pussied out when it came to deflowering her. Eric also learns that Joëlle was quite the little sadist seducer when she was a teen, as she and her friend managed to molest their high school teacher, not to mention the fact that she fucked a priest after confessing to him. Rather shocked by all these stories, Eric is only all the more emasculated when the cunt cunt viciously states: “You don’t understand anything. She was so vibrant, so full of life...you’ve turned her into a frigid old woman. There’s a cunt issue...You act like a cunt, you work like a cunt, and you fuck like a cunt. Why she married you, I’ll never know.” After the cunt gets down spewing vile, yellow journalist Richard and his comrade break into Joëlle and Eric’s room while they are naked in bed. While Joëlle manages to escape while Eric beats up the jack-off journalists while he is in the bare, the chick with the chattering cunt makes the mistake of heading to her deceitful aunt’s house. After aunt Barbara drugs Joëlle, Robert comes by and starts masturbating the meaty talking pussy with a microphone, thus getting the sordid story he needs. While Eric later manages to silence his wife’s vagina by finally managing to sexually pleasure her with his cock, the hubby’s member becomes infected with the speaking genital STD in what is a rather predictable, if not pleasantly perverse, twist ending.

Apparently, the “talking cunt” (or, as the frogs call it, the “vagina loquens”) is nothing new in France, as it is an ancient folklore motif dating back to at least the 13th century, as demonstrated by the ‘fabliau’ (comical tales written by frog bards) ‘Le Chevalier qui faisoit parler les cons et les culs.’ Indeed, in the allegorical 1748 novel that Talking Pussy is based on, The Indiscreet Jewels aka Les bijoux indiscrets, French King Louis XV is depicted as sultan Mangogul of the Congo and has the power to make women’s “jewels” talk with a magic ring. Somewhat notably, Talking Pussy was such a hit that it spawned a sequel, Triples Introductions (1978), as well as an intentional comedic and thus innately inferior non-pornographic English remake entitled Chatterbox (1977) aka Virginia the Talking Vagina directed by gay pornography to exploitation auteur Tom DeSimone (Hell Night, Reform School Girls). As Talking Pussy demonstrates, the French were no less chic when it came to porn chic, but France’s socialist taxes destroyed the frog fuck film industry before it really began. Indeed, the immaculately titled work is certainly more honest and no less artful than contemporary frog pseudo-arthouse works like Christophe Honoré’s banal Bataille adaptation Ma mère (2004) and slave-driving pseudo-Frenchman Abdellatif Kechiche’s pseudo-Sapphic epic of counterfeit crypto-pornographic carpet-munching Blue Is the Warmest Color (2013) aka La vie d’Adèle.

-Ty E

CLASSE TOUS RISQUES
CLASSE TOUS RISQUES

Claude Sautet (1960)

Admittedly, the older I get, the more François Truffaut's classic film Jules and Jim (1962) seems like phony bullshit as dreamed up by an effete poser that has never had a genuine masculine friendship and I recently discovered that I was not the only one with this canon-contradicting opinion after reading a tribute to Gallic auteur Claude Sautet (Max and the Junkmen, Mado) by fellow French auteur Jean-Pierre Melville. Indeed, in the short yet superlative tribute entitled 'The Quiet Courage of a Great Filmmaker' featured in the March/April 192 issue of Présence du Cinéma, Melville soundly argued when comparing the masculine friendships of Sautet's masterful second-feature Classe Tous Risques (1960) aka The Big Risk aka Consider All Risks to Truffaut's film, "People often speak of films where the relationships between men, their friendships, have an enormous importance. I believed in the friendship of Abel Davos and Stark absolutely. It is interior, and does not appear by means of dialogue. The two men's behavior makes explicit their feelings, without either of them having to speak of their friendship. On the other hand, I was not able to believe in the friendship of Jules and Jim, even though they speak of it often." While Melville opens his tribute by confessing, "I offer my friendship rarely," Sautet's film had such a huge impact on the filmmaker that he not only gave his friendship to the fellow frog auteur but also somewhat copied his singular gangster film style, which is somewhat ironic when one considers the source material of the film. Indeed, despite being a French Jew that famously fought with the French Resistance during WWII as he would so painstakingly pay tribute to in his film Army of Shadows (1969) aka L'armée des ombres, Melville would (somewhat unwittingly) take imperative influence from a film based on a 1958 crime novel about real-life French Gestapo agent Abel Danos (alias 'le Mammouth' due to this robust/muscular build)—a bodacious bad ass that refused to wear a blindfold upon being confronted with the firing squad that would execute him—as penned by Corsican-blooded card-carrying-fascist collaborator José Giovanni (real name Joseph Damiani) who was involved in the torture, blackmail, and murder of various French Jews and resistance fighters. In fact, gentleman Giovanni was, not unlike Danos (who he befriended in prison), even sentenced to death himself for three premeditated murders but luckily (and unlike Danos) he escaped the guillotine when his sentence was commuted by President Vincent Auriol and instead he served eleven and a half years of an initial twenty years of hard labor. Fierce fascist source aside, I suspect that Melville, himself part of a criminal underground, could sense a certain intrinsic authenticity to the less than glamorous crime and grime of Sautet's film.

While Melville arguably had an imperative influence on the filmmaking of French master auteur Robert Bresson with his debut feature Le Silence de la mer (1949) aka The Silence of the Sea—a more or less avant-garde chamber piece featuring a reluctant Nazi officer apparently partly inspired by German Conservative Revolutionary movement intellectual and supposed Nazi-fellow-traveler Ernst Jünger—there is no question that Classe Tous Risques was a crucial influence on the filmmaker's legendary gangster flicks, including Le Doulos (1963), Le deuxième souffle (1966), and Le Cercle Rouge (1970). In fact, I would argue that Sautet's film is more immaculate and enthralling than all of Melville's flicks aside from possibly Le Samouraï (1967) and apparently I am not the only one that thinks so as source writer José Giovanni himself would once say, "CLASSE TOUS RISQUES is the best film adaptation of any of my books. It doesn't have any nightclub scenes. It doesn't treat the subject as folklore. And it has more heart than LE DEUXIÈME SOUFFLE." Indeed, Melville's Le deuxième souffle is also a Giovanni adaptation that stars Lino Ventura, but it spends about an extra 40 minutes to do what Sautet's film accomplishes more effortlessly in terms of sheer underworld pathos, paranoia, and pessimism. As someone that experienced much of Melville's oeuvre long before ever even hearing of Sautet, I can safely say that watching Classe Tous Risques felt like the result of the mastering of the Melvillian universe as if all of the 'excess fat' and static plodding that sometimes plagues the Judaic auteur's films was carefully cut with the carefully calculated precision of a seasoned Fleishmeister. Indeed, whereas most of Melville's films are something I might be inclined to revisit every couple of years, Sautet's second feature is a seemingly flawless flick of the good and hearty sort that demands to be re-watched regularly and can be re-watched when you're in any sort of mood despite its rather bleak and pessimistic subject matter. Of course, being the kind of person that prefers Once Upon a Time in America (1984) to all of Sergio Leone's other films combined, The Fire Within (1963) aka Le feu follet to any of Malle's other films, Taxi Driver (1976) to Scorsese's later Goodfellas (1990), La Bête Humaine (1938) to Renoir's purported magnum opuses La Grande Illusion (1937) and The Rules of the Game (1939), and even Luca Guadagnino's ostensible Suspiria (2018) remake to Dario Argento's 1977 original, Classe Tous Risques is like the cinematic equivalent of 'cold comfort food' as a rare gangster flick of almost Spenglerian pessimistic proportions that dares to question humanity as a whole in its delightfully despairing depiction of a foredoomed gangster on the run that quickly loses everything that makes life worth living. Indeed, if any film acts as an apt eulogy for the gangster genre, it is Sautet's underrated black-and-white masterpiece.

Notably, Jules and Jim is not the only obnoxiously overrated La Nouvelle Vague film that would eclipse Classe Tous Risques—a film that still has not completely gotten its due despite now being regarded as a masterpiece among certain cinephiles and film historians—in terms of sheer popularity. Indeed, as French filmmaker Bertrand Tavernier (Death Watch, Coup de Torchon)—a loyal protégé of both Sautet and Melville—explained in a tribute to the film entitled 'Beautiful Friendships' in regard to its unfortunate history, "Sautet's film was also eclipsed by BREATHLESS, released just a few weeks before; all the credit for bringing out the talent of Jean-Paul Belmondo went to Godard, despite the fact that in CLASSE TOUS RISQUES, Belmondo shows us a completely different side of his great gift as an actor, his remarkable versatility, by making credible an authoritarian character with radiant charm, by stunningly fusing virility and childlike innocence, in a performance that is in a totally different register from the one he gives in BREATHLESS." Admittedly, due to my general loathing of Godard's debut feature and especially the lead character, I initially disliked Belmondo and would not really realize his brilliance and effortless charisma until seeing him in relatively mainstream films like Georges Lautner's The Professional (1981) aka Le Professionnel and against-type arthouse roles like in Melville's Léon Morin, Priest (1961). In short, Godard neutered Belmondo in films like Breathless and Pierrot le Fou (1965) as if to make the actor more autobiographically autistic. In Classe Tous Risques, Belmondo does what Belmondo does best by being both the ultimate man's man and lady's man as a suave young cocksman that knows exactly how to fight and fuck (despite the film technically not depicting much of either).

CLASSE TOUS RISQUES

Not surprisingly, both Melville and Sautet were completely unaware of the covert fascist flavor of Classe Tous Risques, which is probably a good thing as the film probably would not exist otherwise. Indeed, as Sautet stated in an interview featured in the book Conversations avec Claude Sautet (1994) by Michel Boujut when asked if he knew that the film's lead was based on an infamous fascist, "If I had known, I might not have made the film. I was not aware that Abel Danos—Davos in the film—had belonged to the Bony-Lafont [collaborationist] gang during the occupation. It was only after the film was released that one day, in a bistro, some underworld types tipped me off: 'It's great that you made a film about Abel!'" In fact, apparently Sautet did not even realize that his screenwriter, José Giovanni, who he described having "got along perfectly" with, was also an (ex)fascist as the novelist (and, later, filmmaker) was not revealed to be a collaborationist until October 1993 after being exposed by two trashy Swiss dailies. Undoubtedly, Giovanni's experiences as a once-condemned man certainly informs the decidedly desperate and even sometimes downright nihilist tone of Classe Tous Risques, which ultimately concludes with the lead antihero passively accepting his date with death despite technically getting away with his crimes as the character has been condemned by fate after losing virtually everything that meant something to him, not least of all his pride and dignity.

Although his crimes are never made clear, French gangster Abel Davos (Lino Ventura) has been tried in absentia and sentenced to death, so he is now hiding in Italy with his wife and their two little boys after being forced to flee Switzerland. After committing a successful holdup on a busy Milan street with the help of his rather agile accomplice Raymond Naldi (Stan Krol)—a completely fearless fucker that demonstrates complete loyalty to his comrade—that concludes with an insane getaway that involves motorcycles and carjackings, the group decides to, somewhat curiously, head back to France. Rather tragically and quite unexpectedly both Raymond and Abel's wife are gunned down by custom agents just as they arrive at a deserted beach cove in the middle of the night in an almost surreally nightmarish scenario that marks the beginning of the end for the seemingly forsaken antihero. Virtually trapped in Nice, France with his two extremely young sons, who are clearly scarred for life as they witnessed the coldblooded murder of their mother and family friend Naldi, Abel is seriously screwed in more ways than one, but luckily some people owe him a "debt," or so he naively assumes as a man of honor that seemingly never heard the timeless sentiment that there is, "No honor among thieves." Indeed, Abel might be a violent crook, but he has a strict moral code that gets put to the test when his old comrades break said moral code. Abel expects to have good help from his old underworld buddies as Henri 'Riton' Vintran (Michel Ardan) owes him a big favor for funding his successful bistro and Raoul Fargier (Claude Cerval) practically owes him his life for somehow getting him out of prison, but unfortunately it never occurred to the antihero that his old pals are nowhere near as honorable, grateful, or respectful as he is. While a third friend, Jean 'Kid Jeannot' Martin (Philippe March), wanted to promptly arrive in France with a machinegun and ambulance to smuggle him back to Paris, he is talked out of it by Riton and Fargier as he is on parole and cannot risk such a precarious move. Since Fargier is a self-centered coward and Riton has been emasculated by his nagging barmaid wife, the 'old friends' decided to do what amounts to the bare minimum and reluctantly agree to hire a young stranger, Éric Stark (Jean-Paul Belmondo), to pick up Abel and his sons. Needless to say, Abel is highly offended to the point of feeling deeply betrayed when a total stranger as opposed to his old friends arrives in Nice, but, unbeknownst to Fargier, who hired him, Stark is actually an old comrade of Raymond Naldi or as he confides to the protagonist while trying to alleviate his worries, "I had a friend named Raymond Naldi. They don't know in Paris. I didn't want to tell you either, but with what you're thinking, it's better if I did." While technically a mere hired mercenary, Éric ultimately proves to be the only real friend that Abel can count on in a relationship where the young up-and-comer learns to respect and protect an old pro in decline.

It is immediately apparent that, despite their age difference, Abel and Éric have great chemistry and become immediate friends despite not saying much to each other as if the two have an instinctive understanding of one another. While Éric acts as a phony ambulance driver as Abel pretends to be an injured patient, he happens upon a beautiful beauty named Liliane (Sandra Milo of Federico Fellini's 8½ (1963) and Juliet of the Spirits (1965)) being beaten on the side of the road. Naturally, Éric promptly knocks out the pathetic woman-abuser and then boasts to Liliane, "The nice thing about me is my left." After Éric tells her a phony story in regard to their ambulance masquerade, Liliane agrees to join the group as a phony nurse and even maintains the charade after noticing a hidden machinegun inside the vehicle. Needless to say, Éric has not only found a new friend but also a new lover, as Liliane immediately starts a hot and heavy romance with the young gangster despite her quite different background as a theater actress. As for Abel, he may have acquired a new young friend, but he has lost two old ones as he ruthlessly berates both Riton and Fargier upon being reunited with them. Indeed, as Abel states to his old comrades with a certain visceral intensity, "But who sent a total stranger to Nice for me? It was you. And you. You two are pretty sly. You figure I didn't have much of a chance. So it starts off with a driver you hope not to find, and it ends with a cousin in Brittany." While Fargier remarks "He hasn't changed a bit" after Abel throws a violent fit that concludes with him smashing a large mirror and then storming out of his ex-pal's bistro, both he and Riton have become bourgeois bitches of the superlatively soft and pathetically self-centered sort. When Éric tries to comfort Abel by remarking, "You know...Riton and Fargier...you should forget them," the antihero calmly replies, "I already have. They don't exist any more." Since there is no way that he can provide a safe or healthy life for his poor now-motherless children, Abel decides to give them to his friend Chapuis' sister and then he proceeds to live a lonely life where he spends most of his time silently brooding in a tiny maid's room located inside the same apartment building where Éric lives. Needless to say, it is only a matter of time before Abel cracks or, more specifically, completely gives up on life altogether.

CLASSE TOUS RISQUES

Since he needs escape money and future funds for the care of his children, Abel decides to do one more job that involves robbing a sleazy fence named Arthur Gibelin (Judaic Renoir regular Marcel Dalio), but unfortunately the miserable miser makes the ultimately fatal mistake of getting Fargier and, in turn, the police involved in a desperate attempt to get his stolen money back. Indeed, a certain police officer named Inspector Blot (Jacques Dacqmine) begins making threats against Riton and Fargier and they know they are next after Abel kills Gibelin. Leading a revenge campaign he begins with the murder of Gibelin after discovering that he hired a private investigator to follow Éric (whose identity he got from Fargier), Abel then kills Fargier by shooting him outside of his house in what proves to be a fittingly anticlimactic shootout between a virtual rabid bull and a bitch. Unfortunately, Fargier's wife Sophie (Michèle Méritz)—a beloved figure among the gangsters—dies in shock of a heart attack upon finding her husband's corpse, thus inspiring Abel to stop his revenge campaign just before he kills Riton. Aside from Sophie's shocking demise, Abel is also demoralized after Éric is shot in both his legs by Inspector Blot and arrested while in the process of warning the protagonist about the cops. Completely consumed with guilt and seemingly wishing for death, Abel tells his old friend Kid Jeannot that he is done for good because, as he states with a certain manic intensity, "... I'm calling it quits. This is goodbye, Jeannot. Thérèse. Naldi. Sophie. And now Stark. I can't do anything for him. Understand? [...] Abel's gone. There's nothing left. Get the hell out, Jeannot. Do me a favor. Get out of here." In fact, Abel's proclamation of defeatism is so decidedly unbecoming and uncharacteristic that it even deeply disturbs a hardened criminal like Kid Jeannot who scampers out of his friend's hideout like a shocked child. Indeed, in the end, Abel disappears into a crowd of people on the street just as he once appeared at the beginning of the film. As the narrator notes in regard to Abel's patently pathetic and ultimately uncharacteristically passive acceptance of total defeat, "A few days later, Abel Davos was arrested. He was brought to trial, sentenced and executed." As for Éric, one can only hope that his love affair with Liliane works out and that he quits organized crime as the last honorable gangster, Abel, is dead.

While regarded as both a classic and masterpiece among many Francophile film fans today, Classe Tous Risques was such an abject failure upon its initial release that its auteur decided to give up filmmaking altogether, or as Sautet scholar N.T. Binh once explained, "That CLASSE TOUS RISQUES turned out to be a commercial failure was such a bitter disappointment to Sautet that he announced the abandonment of his career as a film director. But only two years later, when the film was discovered by a group of young cinephiles (including future director Bertrand Tavernier) and was rereleased on the art-house circuit, it had a spectacular reception and quickly became a cult favorite. Meanwhile, Sautet had returned to another career—as a clandestine adviser and script doctor on other directors' projects (including films by Jean-Paul Rappeneau, Louis Malle, Alain Cavalier, and Robert Enrico)." Speaking of Malle, although quite different aesthetically as a pastoral war drama, his film Lacombe, Lucien (1974) certainly makes for a great double-feature with Classe Tous Risques as a rare piece of cinema that dares to ask the hard questions and brings unexpected nuance and inordinate empathy in terms of depicting the desperate decline of an underworld collaborator who eventually finds death in the end (notably, neither film depicts the execution of its antihero, as if it would be in 'bad taste' to depict the state-sanctioned murder of a strangely likeable fascist thug). Despite its age, Classe Tous Risques also deals with timeless themes that still inform the philosophical essence of film and television today, not least of all The Sopranos (1999–2007) where one soon discovers that, typically, the only way out of a life of organized crime is either prison or death. Indeed, as Abel attempts to warn Éric, "Let me tell you something else, if you ever decide to do something else, something where you're sure to sleep in your bed every night, I'll be glad to hear it, wherever I am. I'm telling you because we always think we're clever. But if you stop standing your ground, you're nothing. You slip a little more every day...until...until you're nothing. Like today." Of course, the lead antihero of the hit HBO show spoke similar words and that is why it would not be a stretch to describe Abel Davos as the (proto)Tony Soprano of French (ex)Gestapo agents, albeit slightly less sociopathic (of course, it does not hurt that Guido lead Lino Ventura has a bull-like build comparable to Amero-wop James Gandolfini). Undoubtedly, my only complaint in regard to Classe Tous Risques is that it does not conclude on a similar note of disconcerting ambiguity as The Sopranos, even if it is not hard to predict what Abel's fiercely foredoomed future might be like.

CLASSE TOUS RISQUES

In a somewhat recent review of Danish auteur Lars von Trier's Befrielsesbilleder (1982) aka Images of a Relief, I expressed my interest in films depicting the misery and desperation that typically haunted fascist types after World War II and I would certainly argue that Classe Tous Risques is one of the greatest of these films despite the director apparently having no clue it was based on a real-life French Gestapo hood. Additionally, I would argue that the novels of José Giovanni—a man that remained vocally 'right-wing' his entire life and clearly paid tribute his fascist comrades via his books—are a sort of wonderfully low-brow post-fascist continuation of the grand frog tradition of so-called 'literary fascism' as associated with Pierre Drieu La Rochelle, Louis-Ferdinand Céline, Lucien Rebatet, and Thierry Maulnier. After recently re-watching Classe Tous Risques, I was certainly reminded of an unforgettable quote from P.P. Pasolini's swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) when the fascist 'Duke' played by Paolo Bonacelli declares, "We fascists are the only true anarchists." And, of course, such an innately anarchic spirit explains how José Giovanni could have a successful artistic career after prison without anyone initially realizing his less than kosher background, hence why a Jewish (ex)Resistance fighter like Jean-Pierre Melville—a self-described "right-wing anarchist"—could so thoroughly identify with and deeply respect a work dreamed up from the mind of a man from the opposing fascist side. As for commies, they apparently were not interested in Sautet's deceptively meaty masterpiece or any of the great frog gangster flicks of the era as they preferred soulless social realist twaddle, or as Tavernier once explained, "Yet CLASSE TOUS RISQUES's strength and originality were underestimated upon its initial release. It is true that gangster films had never been particularly popular with a whole segment of the French critical establishment. Journalists loyal to the Communist cause followed Georges Sadoul's lead in routinely panning them, even those like NIGHT AND THE CITY and TOUCHEZ PAS AU GRISBI, directed by filmmakers close to the party, insisting it was better to take an interest in workers and tradesmen than in criminals."

Of course, as a film that puts a premium on true masculine friendship, honor, respect, loyalty and masculine virtues in general, the film would certainly be considered 'fascistic' by today's exceedingly effete and self-destructively feminist film critics who despise any male character that is not a virtual eunuch. In that sense, Classe Tous Risques is not only a sort of crypto-fascist film noir, but also—in the Peckinpahian sense—a visceral Gallic celluloid ‘death poem’ on the twilight of French masculinity, so it is only nature that Sautet would go on to direct lavish arthouse dramas like A Heart in Winter (1992) aka Un cœur en hiver and Nelly and Mr. Arnaud (1995) aka Nelly et Monsieur Arnaud featuring exceedingly emasculated and broken (yet ostensibly ‘misogynistic’) proto-male protagonists that have less testosterone in both their entire bodies than the technically-defeated Abel Davos has in his dehydrated piss. Of course, it is also no coincidence it is effeminate guys like Fargier and Gibelin that betray Abel as they are symbolic of a new spiritually neutered post-Vichy frogland where hos and dough come before true bros. Luckily, Sautet at least had an eclectic collection of friends including Giovanni, Tavernier, and Melville that supported his film and ultimately got him out of early retirement as a cinematic auteur. Although Sautet would go on to more ‘highbrow’ material like A Heart in Winter about the perils of being a romantically-retarded autistic introvert and receive much warranted critical acclaim for such films, Tavernier was probably right when he once wrote during his pre-auteur days as a film critic, “People say CLASSE TOUS RISQUES is a B Movie. Better B like Boetticher than A like Allégret.” Likewise, better a männerbund than a mangina, hence the difference in quality and testicular fortitude of the gangster films of Sautet and Melville to those of an overly-intellectualized autistic like Godard who even managed to make Über-bro Belmondo seem like a buffoonish bungling bitch that probably dreams of blowing Bogart. Of course, Abel Davos would have thought old ‘Bogie’ was a dick-downing queer.

-Ty E

PAUL
PAUL

Claude Sautet (1974)

While Rainer Werner Fassbinder—the ‘heart’ of German New Cinema—was not exactly a rampantly heterosexual geezer, he was a fan of many rampantly heterosexual films and filmmakers, both from his native Germany and Hollywood, as his early pre-Sirkian film noir/gangster flicks testify. Indeed, when interviewed by Hella Schlumberger in April 1978 for the German version of Playboy regarding, “people making films that you would have liked to make yourself,” Fassbinder named Klaus Lemke and his film 48 Stunden bis Acapulco (1967) aka 48 Hours to Acapulco—a rampantly heterosexual piece of celluloid if there ever was one—as one among only a handful of then-contemporary kraut films for which he displayed serious respect. A sort of Martin Scorsese of Deutschland, albeit more gritty, nihilistic, and taking a more raw realist approach, Lemke is best known for his reluctant love letter to the Hamburg underworld, Rocker (1972), but he has also directed a number of realist crime flicks starring mostly non-actors that anticipate the Dogme 95, with his work Paul (1974) aka Ein Tag ist manchmal das ganze Leben aka Paul - Geschichte eines Ausgestoßenen undoubtedly being one of his more notable cinematic works. Mostly revolving around a tastelessly charming kraut ex-con/small-time gangster who has just got out of prison and who spends most of his time aimlessly walking around drunk, insulting people in an exceedingly boisterously boorish manner, and hitting on used-up strippers/hookers who sport trashy wigs, one might describe Lemke’s little film as a realistic kraut comedy of the nihilistic post-WWII sort. Like his celluloid compatriots Eckhart Schmidt, Rudolf Thome, Roger Fritz, and Max Zihlmann of the ‘Neue Münchner Gruppe’ aka New Munich Group—an all but totally forgotten film movement that, somewhat unlike German New Cinema, sought to entertain and was daringly anti-intellectual in its essence—Lemke was more interested in cool criminals than feminist and neo-Marxist agitprop, even if the eponymous antihero of Paul is about as sensible as a gay autistic negro on crack. Like a Teutonic Mean Streets (1973) drunk off Paul Morrissey’s Flesh (1968), Lemke’s film is a rare crime flick that is as absurdly funny as it is just plain absurd. Filmed mostly around St. Pauli—a sleazy spot infamous for being Nordic Hamburg’s red-light district—and featuring authentic pimps and prostitutes as extras, Paul undoubtedly radiates a certain authentic grit and grime that most crime flicks lack. Indeed, a sort of anti-noir work where the male antihero is a ‘homme fatale’ who actually poses a discernible threat to female characters and not the other way around, Lemke’s 75-minute pernicious celluloid party seems like the hastily assembled and scatter-brained product of a raging dipsomaniac who has never seen a crime or film noir flick, as a truly anarchic work that breaks all the rules and conventions of its genre and them some.

After staying in the slammer for seven long years, auburn-haired Paul (played by ex-sailor Paul Lyss) is finally released and greeted outside the prison by his uncouth criminal crony Jimmy (played by Lemke regular Jimmy Braker) and a couple seemingly dim and marginally attractive whores. After telling Jimmy that he looks like he is getting fat, Paul and his friends head back to an apartment and celebrate the jailbird's release by getting wasted and discussing various whores of all sorts. Indeed, after Paul explains how one of his ex-cellmates had a blowup sex doll that he did not bother to blow up even though he would blow it, he also describes his decided distaste for Bangkok hookers, as he believes they are no taller than chickens. While the two old friends seem to be getting along rather splendidly at first, Paul can sense there is something not quite right about Jimmy, so he smacks around the two prostitutes to see if they know anything and learns that his friend wants to murder him because he owes him $250,000 marks (which is assumedly from whatever crime/robbery Paul committed to get sentenced to prison in the first place), but he has already blown all the money. When Jimmy sneaks in Paul's room with a handgun, the eponymous antihero bashes his friend over the head with a chair and runs away. With nowhere to really run or hide, Paul gets drunk and randomly shows up at the lavish home of a pretentious and seemingly impotent art dealer named Friedhelm aka 'Frank' Murnau (Friedhelm Lehmann), who is having an art show at his place featuring a live Jamaican band. On top of confusing Frank with Jimmy even though the two men look nothing alike, Paul, who seems more or less demonically possessed, causes a major scene at the degenerate art show by screaming at the all-black band to stop playing, insulting every single guest, and comparing all the paintings at the gallery to drawings he created when he was seven years old. Indeed, on top of obnoxiously asking Frank, "What kind of guy is that, is that a homo?," Paul leaves the party while yelling, "Mob...Riff Raff...Idiots...Abnormal," at all the startled partygoers. Of course, being a belligerent drunk, Paul soon goes right back to the party and attacks Frank, who is a posh pansy and barely fights back, even though the gangster felon is destroying his home and hitting on his beautiful wife.

Unfortunately for Frank, his classically stunning and exceedingly dainty wife Jane (played by Munich model Sylvie Winters) practically falls in love with Paul at first sight. At cuckold Frank's request, Jane naively drives Paul to the jailhouse where the dashing criminal, who absurdly wants to be put back in prison, was recently imprisoned. While Paul demands, "I want back in..I want back in my cell," to a guard at the jail, he is told that they do not run a homeless shelter, thus he must stay on the streets and face the wrath of his treacherous comrade Jimmy. After the gangster's failed attempt at having himself voluntarily imprisoned, Jane drives Paul to his favorite place in the world, the bar. While Jane is almost raped by one of Paul's friends, the antihero goes to a super seedy strip club where he is given a lap-dance by a meta-loose lady with an atrocious gray wig who seems to have a rather fine time grinding her poontang against her prized patron's wang.

PAUL

Eventually, Herr Murnau and his wife find Paul again hanging out with his underworld comrades, so everyone, including Jimmy, heads back to the art dealer's to get even more drunk in what is an ostensible utopian classless party between the rich and poor. While everyone is getting drunk at a dinner table, cuckold Frank, who is unquestionably jealous that his wife has such a strong infatuation with a common and rather uncultivated criminal like Paul, begins attacking his wife Jane. Naturally, Paul and his cronies don't take too kindly to Frank's violent behavior against his seemingly fragile statuesque wife, so everyone begins physically and verbally attacking him in his own house in a hyper hilarious scene of innately anarchic Teutonic slapstick absurdity. Indeed, even a prostitute verbally berates Frank by accusing him of being of an impotent show-off by remarking, "He wants to blow on his trumpet...play the exhibitionist with the big money, whoop it up...you know, he can't get it up and now he...He's not satisfied, he wants to play the king in front of his old lady. Sure, now she gets it, and then she has to fuck him. Dumb prick. He's a pig, a pig!" When the party is over, Paul and Jimmy leave together, with the latter remarking regarding the experience, "That was great. Almost like in the old days." Of course, Paul does not believe that Jimmy has gotten over his desire to liquidate him, so he coerces Jane to buy him an unregistered submachine Uzi from one of his con friends and begins looking for his treacherous friend around all the local bars. Jane attempts to stop Paul from ruining his life by murdering a mensch in cold blood, but he has already made up his mind. In the end, Paul not only kills Jimmy, but Jane as well as she unwittingly walks into the bar at the same time the angst-ridden antihero unloads his Israeli Uzi. Rather ironically, perennially cuckolded Frank begged for Paul to kill him only seconds before his wife is murdered. While Frank carries his wife away from the bar in a rather melancholy state as if he alone is responsible for her death, Paul walks out of the bar with a blank stare as if nothing has happened.

Judging by the almost exclusively unflattering pictures that I have seen of the filmmaker, auteur Klaus Lemke seems to be just as regularly inebriated by chemicals as the characters of his films and I am willing to bet that he was sometimes drunk and/or high when he directed his cinéma vérité-like gutter masterpiece of dipsomaniac delinquency, Paul. Apparently heavily influenced by the French New Wave, Lemke, not unlike Fassbinder, certainly seemed interested in playing with the conventions of old school Hollywood crime/film noir flicks just like Godard, but unlike Breathless (1960) aka À bout de souffle, Paul thankfully does not feature a single phony frog pretending to pull off his best Humphrey Bogart impression. Indeed, when it comes down to it, Lemke's film feels more influenced by the real-life lowlifes of St. Pauli than by other films, especially French New Wave works, which rarely seem gritty. Like Roland Klick's Bübchen (1968), Lemke's flick features a desperate and dispirited Deutschland where perennial drunkenness is a given and senseless nihilism and destruction reign in a corrupted nation that seems to have yet to get over the quasi-apocalyptic effects of the Second World War. Needless to say, Paul is not the sort of crime-fetishizing film like Scarface (1983) or Goodfellas (1990) that would inspire teenage negroes to rob and rape elderly white women, as the work seems like it could have been directed by the aberrant Aryan grandfather of Harmony Korine as a perniciously playful and curiously darkly comedic kraut crime equivalent to Gummo (1997) in terms of its uncompromising realism and real-life-like randomness. Interestingly, despite the fact that the eponymous antihero is portrayed as such a mindnumbingly moronic and innately irrational individual that he gets plastered, kills his friend, and accidentally kills his love interested, he is still portrayed in a more likeable light than art dealer Frank Murnau, whose surname I cannot decide is a tribute or anti-tribute to the great Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922) aka Nosferatu, a Symphony of Horror director F.W. Murnau (interestingly, Fassbinder previously included a character named Murnau in his (anti)crime flick The American Soldier (1970) aka Der amerikanische Soldat). Indeed, despite the lack of sophisticated socio-political subtext of Paul, it is more than clear while watching the film than the typical Alexander Kluge flick that there is seemingly nil future for anyone in the Fatherland, despite whatever class a person might belong to, be the person an impoverished prole or a cultured art fag with a raving trophy wife and trust fund.

-Ty E

THE HUMAN TORNADO
THE HUMAN TORNADO

Cliff Roquemore (1976)

Dolemite; an original accidental classic. With a track comic record that Rudy Ray Moore carried, his fame celebrated two different approach methods. A) Fans of the original comedian and his Dolemite character or B) Fans of blaxploitation classics and pimp hustling cheap film making. Rudy Ray Moore took his cult celebrity status and churned out many a film for him including 1 sequel to the original Dolemite and multiple offshoots. The Human Tornado is that sequel that I'm referring to. When one attempts to make a sequel to a trashy, vain, and racist film, one must keep the idea of the originals philosophy intact. Dolemite II is goofier, more action packed, and features the word "nigger" every other sentence. This especially fits well with the recent pact that Rudy Ray Moore has set forth claiming he will never say that word again. This makes me fear the success of The Dolemite Explosion. The Human Tornado features a different Dolemite character. It might be an alternate universe as seen in Jet Li's shitfest The One, but this isn't the Dolemite we grew up to love on. He is not as vulgar, his rhymes aren't as fresh, he doesn't kill honkies for fun, and there's no Hamburger Pimp. The action has improved and features self-parodying scenes of Dolemite performing an instant replay nude(!?) jump escaping from a white sheriff whose wife he just fucked. This is the catalyst for the story. The stupid hick killed his wife after seeing the Human Tornado tearing it up in bed (Through out this film, We see Dolemite woo several white women and partake in a sexual surrealist scene). Dolemite then goes on the run with his boys to California nearly escaping a man named Cavaletti who kidnapped his women to be tortured and executed unless his club is disbanded and his dancers work at his own club. What worked over its predecessor in this piece is the white hatred displayed by Dolemite and blaxploitation rookie Ernie Hudson (Ghostbusters). Dolemite needs a lift so he steals a car. Just happens to be the automobile owned by a flaming homosexual who Dolemite shrugs off and ignores. This Mark Hamill looking queer should have been shot and killed by the Black Panthers in my own opinion. The Human Tornado is as corny yet tragic as we love the series for, but I felt as a direct sequel to Dolemite, it was very lackluster. The action scenes were sped up and involved more classic kung-fu sound effects, but it didn't have that pimp flavor that I craved. I'd recommend this to only fans of the series, Never to a first-timer.

-mAQ

PETEY WHEATSTRAW

Cliff Roquemore (1977)

Petey Wheatstraw is blessed with an acute personality and surreal aesthetics that set it apart from the other self-funded 70s films that defined a genre. The set direction can only be borrowed from hallucinogenic masterpieces such as Julian Roffman's The Mask or José Mojica Marins' Coffin Joe anthology. The single greatest compliment to 70s blaxploitation is the creation of The Devil's Son-in-law. While many blaxploitation titles were far-fetched, few would cross boundaries such as Dolemite's own Petey Wheatstraw. In a similar "s-ploitation + Underworld" vein of The Dragon Lives Again, our favorite comedian finds himself in hell after his execution from rival comedians. Since his birth during a hurricane, Petey Wheatstraw was born a 12 year old with an affinity for ass kicking. It's these special skills that allow him to reign supreme in all of his characters. Petey Wheatstraw might be an accurate biopic on the life of Rudy Ray Moore. After promising Lucifer to wed his hideous daughter and create a spawn, Petey decides to steal his magic cane and hastily work towards outwitting the devil (by leaving town). The main thing here is that Petey becomes no one's bitch but his own. Petey Wheatstraw is one of Rudy Ray Moore's greatest achievements. His addition to cinema can be steadily overlooked as just another accidental spoof film but the layers are feathered deeper than presumed. With its incredible art direction of a 70s surrealist creation and nutzoid script ridden with laughable plot holes and awkward editing, Petey Wheatstraw even organizes time in a way to cleverly insert racial caricatures of the iconic "hood niggas" parodied in such timeless cartoons of ye olde' Disney. Such scenes as two Afrocentric Negroes on a porch sharing some delicious watermelon. Their only response is "Dis sho' am good!" and this is prior to the boy getting shot. Racism intact; Dolemite has inspired roughly two generations of rap music with his jive talk and constant rhyme scheme. His other outings swap circumstance with chance and inspire visual artists. There isn't a doubt in my mind that films like Petey Wheatstraw and Disco Godfather (Both experimental Rudy Ray Moore films) inspired the post-blaxploitation classics like Pootie Tang and infused the African philosophy of art that Spike Lee attempts to use in many of his brash and crass films of an anti-white nature. I'm sorry Mr. Lee but Eastwood won the race battle on this one with his personal piece, Gran Torino. Months before Rudy Ray Moore's tragic death, he had posted a Myspace blog explaining his recent decision to never say the word "Nigger" again. After creating an entire culture based on the versatility and counter-versatility of this word, his resignation of his own cultural movement proved to be of a shock. While many supported him, his protege's would not listen to reason. Snoop Dogg, who would be nothing without Dolemite, continues to use the word freely and even rather loosely. Whereas Dolemite films would express the term to a selected class of African-American, modern rappers use this term to describe an average Joe. In Petey Wheatstraw, many continuity errors and problematic space/time conundrums occur. In one example, a thug wearing a sleek fedora gets rocked in the face causing his hat to fly off. The next edit leaves the guy getting punched again with his hat on. The reaction time for the thug to grab his hat and fit it back to his head is impossible which creates a quirky environment. One in which Petey grabs a 6 foot ladder to scale a multiple story building, but I guess art is art. Had Lucifer prevented the slaughter that occurred from ever happening, how did Leroy & Skillet acknowledge that Petey should be six feet deep? Ravenous hearts run rampant in Rudy Ray Moore's films. In most cases, you can expect a downbeat ending that serves as a PSA to urban youth. When the credits finally roll, you'll see that death takes its toll. In the case of this futureless setting, it seems ole' Petey will continue with the wedding. Petey Wheatstraw doesn't go far from raising the blaxploitation bar. Devil ho's and magic canes aside, you'll enjoy the hell out of this motherfucking ride. The rhymes grow thin, the room starts to spin, How could Petey ever hope to win? You barter with the Devil and you've sunken to his level. Rest in peace: The true pimp Dolemite. Even if your films are a bit anti-white.

PETEY WHEATSTRAW

-mAQ

SUDDEN IMPACT

Clint Eastwood (1983)

My forehead feels of plastic and Sudden Impact is yet another movie to add to the list of "Should have seen ages ago but only recently viewed." Dirty Harry, as you all know is surely a must-see and the very definition of renegade action cinema of both the eighties and nineties. Harry Callahan is a "psychopath with a badge" and a vigilante to end all vigilantes. While he encompasses that emotionless murderer that we all know and love, he also possesses a keen sense of his surroundings and is able to perform the most badass of detective skills while never losing his highlight of impeccable masculinity and taut stoicism within his frail old frame. Sudden Impact features Dirty Harry in another one of those "right man in the wrong time" devices that became so popular with the appearance of Die Hard - who cares which came first. Dirty Harry, for his own sake, is the silver screen tough guy to end most tough guys. Not even The Punisher who shares a similar interest in eliminating the baddies with little or no respect for life can touch the cold street smarts of Dirty Harry. What separates Dirty Harry's character formula is many things but the most infamous of all these is his expansive arsenal of one-liners and the ability to transform these one-liners, to completely convert the term into more of a verbal epitaph to do anything but honour the passing scumbag. It's these vanished assets that are missing from the modern action film. With John Cena films being released (along with the mystery of why on earth are these funded,) It seems that violent charisma, probable anti-heroes, and enough machismo to drown a hippopotamus are just a few of the things not to be found in today's hollow cinema. There's not really many other ways to put how Sudden Impact prevails as a classic in unbridled action and attitude. Take this clip in for example. Dirty Harry's character clearly predated Eastwood's role in Gran Torino. A shame that this time, in his prime, he didn't graphically call out these "spooks" for their thieving ways. I'm surprised these jolly-jive Negroes were holding up a diner instead of stealing TVs and bicycles and I'm pretty sure Dirty Harry was too, sucka!

R.I.P. Action This dearly departed niche of "too cool for school" rowdiness will be succinctly missed. Sudden Impact is commonly referred to as "the dirtiest of Dirty Harry" and these claims along with dignified visual evidence lead me to back these assumptions and opinions up with my own signature agreeing so. Never mind the fact that Sudden Impact is the only Dirty Harry film I can remember watching the whole way through. From the synopsis alone, mentions of a rape victim executing those responsible for her brutal attack clearly reminded me of a certain exploitation title many of you know as I Spit on Your Grave - Including generalizations, most of the rape/revenge sub genre will be grouped in as well. As the San Francisco police department cleverly call this armed feminine attacker Cockshot, the same moniker can be slapped on most of these estrogen dripping "classics" as well. While I'll allow for this "Day of the Woman," It's painfully obviously that women get the short end of the stick during most, if not all, of modern horror films. Back in the 60s and 70s, however, that simply was a shocking sight to behold as most of these beautiful retro -chic broads were damsels in distress. What sets Sudden Impact apart from most of these exploitation titles is the implied rehabilitation with a dose of Harry Callahan as she watches the legend "exact justice the necessary way," and a sympathetic "anti-heroine." I find it incredibly uncommon to witness a vengeful female with whom I can express pity for. In most of these films such as Fiona, Baise Moi, and Last House on the Left, I wish to express my compassion towards these brutalized women but I can find nary an evidence of humanity. Sure, these gorgeous shells are people but in a way, their very life was a lifeless one at that. Sudden Impact not only features heart-stopping action with an implied gut-wrenching clinical reaction with its rape scene, but it also will stop no less than entertaining the hell out of you until its ending.

SUDDEN IMPACT

To return with a new paragraph, sleazy femme fatales always have a way of absorbing screen time but the result is merely a bag of shock and awe, no more, nor less. Substance is void and materialization of flesh is the only thing about this film. I always knew sex and violence sold but the further proof materialized with that of my discovery of the rape/vengeance genre. Sick sonuvabitches worldwide rent these films to gawk, uncomfortably aroused as these innocent delights are forced into lurid sex acts, witness slowly their decomposition as their soul evaporates. Once your morbid curiosity is fulfilled as soon as the group of males reach their climax, you claim to never have been interested in the opening act as it is "misogynistic" and can't wait for the revenge. For me, I always found the beginning of rape/vengeance films the most important act and to see such good carnal choreography go to utter waste with "refeminization" is a disgust to the psychosexual madness that lurks within. This sexual justice is only known for it being over the top schlock and even the most defensive feminist could not argue these facts. Sudden Impact is a film with brass, a cunning lead who mastered to art of a ice cold stare, and enough gun play to please even the most cynical fan of John Woo.

-mAQ

GRAN TORINO

Clint Eastwood (2008)

Gran Torino was film set to chase Changeling in the theatrical run. Directed by and starring Clint Eastwood, this film takes a diagonal and counter angle look at such franchises as Death Wish and other assorted revenge films, and spins an emotional web displaying life, the pursuit of happiness, and tolerance. Clint performs as Walt; a grizzled, jaded Korean war veteran that hates any and all walks of life. That is, until he meets to gook family next door that provides a savory view at racism throughout the times and how sometimes, people don't need to change their entire views on a culture. Accepting an entire culture might be a bit too much for an "old school" 70 year old. Clint Eastwood is one of the definitive American icons of all genres - Spaghetti Western, Drama, Action, Western, and many more. He has defied many physics by acting in films that can be called "brainless shoot em' ups" and then directing multi-Oscar winning pictures. The wrinkled man can attest for the majority of quality drama's seen in Hollywood today. Million Dollar Baby not only revived Hilary Swank's dead career (as dead as her role in that feminist-fuck Karate Kid film) but created a boxing film that interested people who weren't fans of boxing. In a way, Million Dollar Baby paved the way for many of the films you see today. When Gran Torino reach it's limited theatrical premiere, I'd read several reviews expressing a new distaste in Gran Torino. Seeing as how I refuse to watch Changeling, I expected it to be the same stale material that appears to have crafted that film. Gran Torino was a storm to brave through, I'll admit that. At first, I expected to loathe Eastwood's disheveled growl as much as the next guy who can't stand Bale's Batman voice. I was shocked to find it assimilate into the scenes perfectly and it didn't bother me no more. Even with the man being 78 years old, I still found myself intimidated by his hovering presence. Walt eventually reaches a point in which his racism is articulated and hilarious. When Walt reached out to help Ching-Chang Chong from a group of "spooks", I felt as if Walt had become my own personal hero. Gran Torino to me, is a piece reflecting a bit of Clint Eastwood's life. While I'm sure he is a happy man, the affinity for a vehicular relic and olden time hostilities lay presence. Who knows? Maybe all those years killing people on screen disturbed Clint Eastwood in ways unknown by the average actor. In the inevitable ending, Gran Torino was a success. My stomach aches now and I will cease to drone on about Gran Torino. Know that it shocked me and made me laugh. It's a rare treat to see such a weathered actor rise above expectations to create damn fine cinematic tragedies. Gran Torino is all what I wanted to derive from the experience. Clint's new film circles around the idea of Walt owning America cause he fought and killed for it, and damn if this film isn't American. A majestic look at the life of a rotten bigot; Gran Torino is a film that will stand aging. I will admit, I sure would have liked to seen Spike Lee's face when Clint called those uppity Negroes "spooks".

GRAN TORINO

-mAQ

NIGHTBREED

Clive Barker (1990)

Despite Clive Barker's weaknesses as a director and lack of story cohesion, he always manages to direct a film that is at the very least interesting. Nightbreed (adapted from Barker's novel Cabal) is one of those films. The film is a jumbled mess of beautiful cinematography, unconventionally engrossing acting, and dark views into the discriminating mind of human nature. Nightbreed is a film that is like no other (just like all of Barker's other works regardless of what medium he is working in).

The masked family killer found in Nightbreed is played by no other than intellectual horror auteur David Cronenberg. Like Cronenberg's own films, his performance in Nightbreed is calmly calculated, progressively unexpected, disturbing, and sexually conflicting. Cronenberg's performance wasn't wasted as it was on the Friday the 13th franchise sci-fi slasher shitfest Jason X. A film so horrible that it makes me wonder if David Cronenberg was having monetary problems forcing him to join that wasted cause. Nightbreed features a virtual circus of monsters that have yet to appear in such vast number before it. This array of diverse monsters alone keep the film interesting enough for viewing. Mental case Boone decides it's time to live amongst the monsters in Midian (located under a graveyard with striking architecture). Many scenes featured in the monster realm of Midian look to derive influence from Federico Fellini's masterpiece Satyricon. Both films feature a variety of sequences briefly introducing interesting yet sometimes horrific individuals. These scenes are both surreal and in your face (as surrealism often is and should be). The weak elements found in Nightbreed are the result of poor editing and film construction. Clive Barker fell victim to the lack of faith 20th Century Fox had in the film. Barker was disappointed in final cut of Nightbreed and has recently promised a new cut with 25 more minutes of extra footage. I just hope the extra footage adds to the film unlike the director's cut of David Lynch's Dune. Despite its shortcomings, Nightbreed is a very enjoyable film that is very unique. One can only wonder the cinematic accomplishments the film could have made if it had a larger budget and greater support from 20th century fox. Studio systems have a vast and evil history of limiting film directors creative potential in the production of films. I just don't get what makes some lardo, cigar smoking degenerate think that he knows more about what the audience wants to see than the artist. The masses don't just enjoy films that cater to the lowest common denominator. They will support and follow great art if actually exposed to it.

-Ty E

A DAY WITH THE BOYS
A DAY WITH THE BOYS

Clu Gulager (1969)

Admittedly, Clu Gulager has never been one of my favorite actors, but he sure can play an agitating asshole quite convincingly as depicted in classic 1980s horror flicks like A Nightmare on Elm Street Part 2: Freddy's Revenge (1985) directed by Jack Sholder and The Return of the Living Dead (1985) directed by Dan O'Bannon, but I never would have suspected that the American folk actor had directed a 'horror' film of his own, let alone one of the artistically singular and morally dubious persuasion. Nominated for the illustrious Palme d'Or for best short film at the 1969 Cannes Film Festival, Clu Gulager's experimental avant-garde featurette A Day with the Boys (1969) is a curious first effort from a filmic-cowboy-turned-arthouse-auteur. Recently revived from absolute obscurity due to its inclusion as a special feature on the Criterion Collection DVD release of George Washington (2000) due to its thematic and aesthetic influence on director David Gordon Green's (Undertow, Pineapple Express) decidedly stark and unsentimental, realist coming-of-age flick, A Day with the Boys is a quasi-psychedelic celluloid daydream that seamlessly mutates into a nefarious nightmare about a modern day männerbünde of prepubescent boys who take things a little farther than playing a simple gamin game of cowboys and Indians while frolicking around town. Like a whimsical and kaleidoscopic marriage between the Hitler Youth-themed propaganda flick Der Marsch zum Führer (1940) aka The March to the Führer, Conrad Rooks' Chappaqua (1966), Lord of the Flies (1963), Věra Chytilová's Fruit of Paradise (1970) aka Ovoce stromů rajských jíme, and Stand by Me (1986), A Day with the Boys is surely a bittersweet treat for the eyes featuring a hectic hodgepodge of slow-motion sequences, acid-washed cinematography, celluloid solarization, Klimt-esque paintings, freeze-frame experimentation, but also an afflicting test for the soul that compels one to question to the duty of art. Like the curious borderline-kiddie-porn/coming-of-age flick Maladolescenza (1977) starring prepubescent-playboy model-turned filmmaker Eva Ionesco (My Little Princess), A Day with the Boys is a playful yet sometimes perturbing, psychotomimetic cinematic work that blurs the typically fine-line between original, cultivated art and highly-stylized, softcore child erotica.

Featuring immaculate and at-times otherworldly cinematography by Hungarian master cinematographer László Kovács (Easy Rider, Five Easy Pieces), A Day with the Boys oftentimes feels like a painting by German völkisch Symbolist artist Fidus come to life – except set in late-1960s America – due to its quasi-pagan Wandervogel-esque imagery. In a mere 18-minutes, this semi-surreal short does what feature-length films like Julie Darling (1983) and The Good Son (1993) could have only hoped to accomplish; depicting the human child as a cunning and conspiring killer. Part tribute to the 'innocence' of youth, as well as the loss of such childhood purity, and part portrayal of manic mass-mindedness, A Day with the Boys examines the collective unconscious at its most rudimentary and consequently savage level. The film begins innocently enough with a nameless pack of whippersnappers cavorting around just as all young bucks should – playing with cap-guns, flying high on playground swings, and rummaging around in nature’s soil and forests in an inquisitive manner – but things take a turn for the worse when the micro-commandos encounter the eternal enemy: a middle-aged businessman attired in a spiffy suit – a sad symbol of perpetually lost youth. As a mature adult, the seemingly jolly gentleman sees the boys menacing demeanor as nothing more than harmless adolescent posturing and he even allows them to lead him to the woods as if he was an enemy combatant being dragged to execution. Unfortunately for the unsuspecting businessman, the renegade runts have reverted towards instinctive, atavistic homicidal tendencies, thereupon inevitably resulting in the bewildered adult’s earthly demise via being buried alive; undoubtedly a hefty price to pay for a utter taste of momentarily reclaimed youthfulness.

Unquestionably, the most unnerving and ethically dubious scene in A Day with the Boys is not the penultimate sequence when it is revealed the boys are merry mass murderers, but during the concluding visual epilogue where it depicts the keen killer kids splashing around bare-skinned in the water for an extended period of time in slow-motion. Indeed, A Day with the Boys sometimes feels like a softcore pedo-piece disguised as exceedingly elegant coming-of-age cinematic art, so as to occlude any suspicions from more thoughtful and perceptive viewers. That being said, the exposed wild boys scene is just the pederastic icing on the cake of what is very arguably America’s most artsy fartsy work of chicken-hawk cinema. I do not think I am being delusional nor harsh in my judgement of the film as my girlfriend and a couple friends arrived at a similar assessment of A Day with the Boys that was totally uninfluenced and independent from my estimation of it. That being said, one could argue that the victimized businessman could be perceived as a prospective pedophile because just like all pathological sexual perverts, he sincerely believes the boys want him and is quite exhilarated by their attention; so much so that he allows himself to be smothered to death by dirt, even when the young pups’ actions become increasingly negligent and positively precarious as their brief rendezvous progresses. Of course, only Clu Gulager knows the true motivation behind the film, but there is certainly a reason behind why A Day with the Boys – a work distributed by Universal Studios – is virtually unknown, even among seasoned cinephiles. Like American auteur Michael Cuesta’s controversial coming-of-age films L.I.E. (2001) and 12 and Holding (2006), A Day with the Boys is a work foreordained to marginality due to its audacious artiness and beyond the pale subject matter that will only be appreciated by those fierce filmgoers mature enough to obstinately embrace it, as well as those more cultivated members of NAMBLA with cinephile proclivities.

A DAY WITH THE BOYS

-Ty E

LONG WEEKEND

Colin Eggleston (1979)

I once set out to see the film Picnic at Hanging Rock directed by Peter Weir because I heard it was very atmospheric in nature. I have found very few films that have the ability to prove an engaging atmosphere from the film's opening to close. After watching Picnic at Hanging Rock I felt cheated. Despite the film's sometimes beautiful wilderness settings, the film ultimately failed in what it set out to do. It was not until I saw the "horror" film Long Weekend did I feel that I got my fill of mysterious Australian nature. In Long Weekend, a married couple in a deteriorating relationship set out for an Australian beach in hopes of fixing things. The couple is fairly cosmopolitan and seems to lack any type of roots with nature. By littering and hurting animals, they show their arrogance towards the outdoors. The man in the relationship attempts to feel and display power by shooting off a fancy rifle for no logical reason. It is not until things start getting on the Australian coastline does the couple realize the power of nature over man. Long Weekend has one of the most beautiful settings I have ever seen in a film. The Australian beach featured in the film looks like it has yet to be tampered by the corrosive hands of man. The water is of a pure dazzling blue that looks quite inviting to anyone that enjoys swimming. If someone were to flip through television channels and catch Long Weekend for a second, they might think that they are watching a nature documentary. The cinematographer of the film was not goofing around trying to shoot another "B" grade "nature attacks" film while shooting Long Weekend. The aesthetically pleasing nature of the film works in splendid contrast to the anti-nature attitude of the married couple. The woman is found out in the film to have an abortion. Not only has the couple denied the law of nature, but the reality of their own nature. The couple are the quintessential products of abstractive intellectualism and rootless cosmopolitanism. They are products of the death of western culture and the decline of civilization. It is no surprise that the birthrates of Europeans and people of European descent are dropping with each generation of the world. When one no longer feels their roots, their purpose of existence ceases to be. The married couple in Long Weekend are incapable of creating a family (let alone staying together), shun respecting natural law, and cannot sustain themselves without material objects. In a sense, nature puts them out of their misery. I was reminded of Long Weekend recently after watching the exciting and intense British horror film Eden Lake. The couple featured in the latter not only lack a connection with nature but also the sometimes viciousness of the man of nature who has yet to be deracinated from his "backwoods" roots. Both Long Weekend and Eden Lake feature a couple's demise due to their killing of an animal(s). Although man has dominated animal, it seems that man forgets that he is also an animal. It only takes a long weekend (or a few minutes) for a man to fare against nature and its various exotic creatures.

LONG WEEKEND

-Ty E

CHAPPAQUA

Conrad Rooks (1966)

Out of all the experimental psychedelic avant-garde films to come out during the 1960s, affluent yet debauched druggo Conrad Rooks' curious semi-autobiographical work Chappaqua (1966) – a cinematic work featuring a schizophrenic array of color, black-and-white, and sepia tone imagery – is king. An heir to the Avon Products cosmetic gold mine, richie Rooks must have had a lot of free time on his hands to indulge in the finer controlled substances in life because by the time he was 18-years-old, he had already become an eclectic dope fiend; partaking in alcohol, cocaine, heroin, and virtually any other highly addictive narcotic pleasures on a day-to-day basis. Luckily for Rooks, he was a wealthy proto-flower-child of the 1960s and was able to travel to Europa to tryout an experimental "sleeping cure" at a clinic in Zurich, Switzerland, which was quite successful and, somewhat outstandingly, cured him of his merry malady for life. In his eccentric and exotic cinematic work Chappaqua – a nonlinear quasi-travelogue full of frightful phantasmagoric flashbacks, hallucinatory moments in a clinic, and various encounters with strangers both strange and spectacular – Rooks recounts his life shortly before and at the point of the cure. Featuring such high-profile hippies, junkies, and musicians as William S. Burroughs, Allen Ginsberg, Ravi Shankar, Ornette Coleman, Swami Satchidananda, Moondog, Ed Sanders, and Rita Renoir, among other celebrated degenerates and glorified charlatans of the 1960s, Chappaqua is a virtual "Who's Who" of trendy counter-culture gurus and outsider artists. With tons of cash to blow and a childhood where he was practically brought up in movie theaters, stating, "my mother used to leave me in one of the three local cinemas for the afternoon. Sometimes I went to all three in a day....And that sort of forced film culture stayed with me, so that from then on I always thought in terms of a story being told by the association of images," thus it was only the natural progression that Rook would day become a filmmaker. As the descent of American pioneers who settled in Virginia in 1622 and spent much time with American Indians, Rooks felt a special kinship with the red-man, hence the original of the title of his film Chappaqua, which derives from the Wappinger (a nation of the Algonquian Indians) word for "Laurel Swamp"; a sacred place of running water where one goes to bury the dead. The word 'Chappaqua' also had a special double-meaning for Rook as it was also the title of a poem he wrote, as well the name of the area of upstate New York where the auteur spent most of his life. Indeed, on top of featuring Rooks' rich white boy talk on Injun mysticism, Chappaqua also features Indian Hindi and American junky metaphysics of the convoluted and seemingly confused Burroughs-esque persuasion, thereupon making the film a heretical and often hysterical heteroclit counter-cultural cocktail of the most marvelously mongrelized persuasion. Inately labyrinthine in both structure and theme, Chappaqua, like Jean Cocteau's candid drug diary Opium: The Diary of a Cure (1958), is a work that – whether intentional or not – makes a convincing case for both the pros and cons of illicit drug use, albeit in an exceedingly ethereal, histrionic, and abstract manner that is meant to speak to the soul as opposed to the intellect.

CHAPPAQUA

Starting his career in film as the co-owner of a short-lived production called Exploit Films that released softcore sexploitation films with risqué titles as White Slavers and Girls Incorporated, Rooks was eventually swindled by his dubious partner, who vanished without a trace with both, “the money and the girls.” According to legend, Rooks even taught Andy Warhol how to load a film camera, but judging by the pop-artist’s early films, his efforts must have been in vain. As testified by his celluloid magnum opus Chappaqua, it was not the soulless joy he experienced while engaging in hedonistic sex, drugs, and rock ‘n’ roll that would inspire Rooks’ artistic creativity, but the tormenting tribulations and psychological phantasms that such unchecked abuse would sow in his personal life. Determined not to relapse back into drug abuse again, Rooks soon realized that by creating Chappaqua, he would be able to keep his demons in check. Using his inheritance and money borrowed from friends and family members, Rooks was able to produce the film for less than half a million dollars, which is not bad considering the professionalism behind this feature-length avant-garde film overflowing with so many iconic figures that it is a virtual visual holy scripture of counter-culture prophets, priests, and other unholy holy men. Almost made up of entirely improvised footage which was shot by utilizing three different cinematographers in places all around the world (Ceylon, England, France, India, Mexico, and 48 American states), Rooks did not assemble the stream-of-conscious narrative ‘structure’ to Chappaqua until deeply studying and interpreting all of the footage after it was already captured. For the press-book for Chappaqua, William S. Burroughs wrote the following description of the film: “There is a hiatus between blocks of association, rents as it were in the fabric of reality through which we glimpse the old myths that were here before the white man came, and will be after he is gone, a brief inglorious actor washed off the stage in the waters of silence. Rooks has brought to the screen the immediate experience of silent beauty conveyed in the Peyote vision – older Gods waiting impassively at the end of the line.” Indeed, Chappaqua is about as esoteric and poetic as Burroughs’ press puffery, and like the novels of the belated Beat writer, the film transcends the generally fine-line between horror and hallucination, dream and reality, conscious and unconscious, and – ultimately – heaven and hell.

Featuring hypnotizing hippie bloodsuckers, exotic human goddesses, cadaver-like junky spirits (Burroughs as ‘Opium Jones’), and gurus and melody makers under the influence in an awe-inspiring universe assembled by Conrad Rooks through more of spiritual intuition than the intellect, Chappaqua is a metaphysical horror film for those individuals that are more afraid of their own mind under the influence than some retarded mute with a machete and a Halloween mask. Indeed, Chappaqua is one of the few examples where I would take heed of nutty professor Timothy Leary's popular counter-culture phrase, "Turn on, tune in, drop out" as the film offers some of the more positive attributes of psychedelics without the debilitating brain damage. As advertised in the press-book for the film, Chappaqua is ultimately a film about the "transformation of the main character thru ritual magic and exorcism of the evil spirit," with protagonist Russel Harwick (Conrad Rooks) as the possessed and clinic doctor Dr. Benoit (Jean-Louis Barrault) as the postmodern exorcist, thereupon making the work, despite its sometimes surrealist imagery, a singularly and somewhat embarrassingly personal work about a man in different stages of despair, angst, and eventual transcendental rebirth. Autobiographical elements aside, Chappaqua is a spine-tingling cinematic work featuring a bodacious buffet of kaleidoscopic imagery like no other film created before nor after it. Conrad Rooks would only direct one more film after Chappaqua, Siddhartha (1972) – a loose adaptation of German writer Hermann Hesse's novel of the same name – which is no surprise considering both works feature a young protagonist as they find themselves with an existential journey of sorts. It should be noted that – being a fan of W.S. Burrough's writings – Rooks bought the film rights for the novel Naked Lunch (1959) in 1962 and originally intended to adapt it for the silver-screen, but the seemingly impossible task would later go to David Cronenberg. In my opinion, Rooks did a much better job depicting the often miserable and sometimes maniacal life of a discombobulated junky than Cronenberg did with Naked Lunch (1991), but, then again, Canadian auteur was never hip to Cocteau's kick. Like Burroughs, Rooks was a trust fund enfant terrible who probably never did a real day of work in his entire life, thus making Chappaqua a testament to the fact that even opulent opium fiends can make positive contributions to society.

-Ty E

DEAD LEAVES
DEAD LEAVES

Constantin Werner (1998)

Dead Leaves is an anime film which is noted for its breathtaking visual flair and nihilistic attitude. These word-of-mouth nominations give clear praise towards the disgustingly short film (43 minutes) and it deserves every one of them. With a visual style comparable to FLCL, Dead Leaves does nothing but provide dick & fart jokes and blend it with a dystopian landscape which surface crawls with extreme carnage.

Retro & Pandya (aptly named) are two bizarre creatures who awaken on Earth with no prior memories to what caused them to crash land on Earth in the nude. After a 3 minute ultimate destruction spree to get weapons, food, and transportation, they are locked up and sent to a prison which is structured on what's left of the Moon. Together, they will have to put their heads...and their genitals together to escape and find out what really happened. The plot is over-the-top and the action is ludicrous. The style of animation is a unique way of preserving the background while exclaiming the action and broadening the onomatopoeia's to give a "Retro" appearance and create it's own specific mood. The pacing is what really shines. At times, I couldn't tell if I was frustrated at this film or if I was just having too much fun. At the fragile run time of 43 minutes, It's hard to really get absorbed into something so fast, but it all pans out fine in the end. The creatures which populate the world of Dead Leaves provides a Guillermo Del Toro-esque population which breathes life into the busy crowds the same way Stan Winston creates his fantastical caricatures of Aliens, Dinosaurs, and other beasties. 666 and 777 are the "sub-bosses" of Dead Leaves. Their designs seem to relate and/or borrow from various video game characters sprawling many platforms. 777 seems like a blue version of Potemkin from Guilty Gear and 666 is like Kiros from Final Fantasy VIII. All in all, an excellent animation surprise forms a frantic, high octane action epic sprawling a ruler's length in time. Too short, but too sweet. I'd like there to be a 6 episode series as much as the next fan would, but I doubt will see more of these two's adventures. If you like your nudity bizarre, sexual situations deranged, and gore and violence extreme and comical, Dead Leaves is right up your alley.

-mAQ

DEAD LEAVES

Constantin Werner (1998)

Dead Leaves (1998) is one of the few films from the east coast that actually captures the drowsy and depressing atmosphere so prevalent from eastern city to city. The film follows a lonely young man as he takes his dead girlfriend on a tour of various eastern coast locations as he makes his way from New York City to West Virginia. The young man doesn't say much and his dead girlfriend only talks when the man has haunting (yet loving) memories of her. It is important to be respectable when in the presence of a dead loved one. German born director Constantin Werner ultimately tells a somber tale of love and death. Dead Leaves is a film appropriately narrated by the tragically dark poems of Baltimore poet Edgar Allen Poe. The poetry of Poe was also able to capture the dispiriting nature of the east coast. Whether it be a cold and wet winter or the deadness of the fall, the east coast is the appropriate place to tell a melancholy tale. When I think of the falls I spent growing up on the east coast I think of Dead Leaves. Dead Leaves begins with the emotionally desolate and follows progressively towards heavy-hearted spiritual enlightenment. The film is an art house film for those individuals that have accepted the inevitable end. A time where a love lost and a life lost parallel one another. The protagonist in Dead Leaves knows his time is steadily approaching its conclusion. Dead Leaves is one of few films that captures this growing feeling of despair. Music by Rozz Williams (of Christian Death) and Gitane Demone compliment the overall hopeless mood of Dead Leaves. It is important for a film like Dead Leaves to have a similar auditory feeling to the overall visuals of the film. Dead Leaves is a film that works in its mood and progressively builds upon that mood. The American east coast is truly a fairly ugly and somberly atmospheric place. Dead Leaves is the ultimate tour guide on a road trip of the place that I call home.

-Ty E

BABA YAGA
BABA YAGA

Corrado Farina (1973)

For the most part, I loathe comic book film adaptations and the sort of collective autistic escapism and delusional of grandeur that they sire, including basic bitch Hollywood liberal actor Chris Evans—a spiritual eunuch with a Jewess fetish that is probably best known for portraying the extremely gay ass Marvel Comics character Captain America—thinking that he is somehow a righteous superhero in real-life and passive-aggressively threatening to beat up Identity Evropa founder Nathan Damigo (who righteously punched some violent female commie antifa-thug-cum-porn-star that has been fittingly nicknamed ‘Moldylocks’). Indeed, there are few things I find more repugnant than seeing some obscenely overweight middle-aged neckbeard in public sporting some superhero shirt that would normally be worn by a 7-year-old kid. Needless to say, it should be no surprise that some of my favorite cinematic comic adaptations are films that I did not realize were comic adaptations the first time I watched them. For example, Italian horror maestro Michele Soavi’s darkly comedic and even merrily misanthropic zombie flick Dellamorte Dellamore (1994) aka Cemetery Man—a film based on a novel by the author Tiziano Sclavi’s own Dylan Dog horror comic (which inspired the horrendous celluloid turd Dylan Dog: Dead of Night (2011))—is a personal favorite and a film that is just too cool, sexy, and non-autistic to seem like it was made appeal to virginal fanboys that fap to Harley Quinn fan art. Decades before Soavi, another Italian auteur named Corrado Farina, who had next to nil success during his short-lived career as a feature filmmaker, created what is indubitably one of the most erotically oneiric and visually arresting comic adaptations ever made. Based on Italian architect turned comic artist Guido Crepax’s comic Valentina—a very ‘cinematic’ comic strip series of the erotically-charged counterculture orientated sort that features an eponymous heroine inspired by iconic silent film actress Louise Brooks—Farina’s second and final feature Baba Yaga (1973) aka The Devil Witch aka Baba Yaga, Devil Witch aka Black Magic aka Kiss Me Kill Me is undoubtedly one of the great forgotten Italian horror films of the 1970s as a fairly idiosyncratic flick that totally transcends its mostly formulaic genre. The Guido answer to Belgian auteur Harry Kümel’s carpet-muncher cult classic Daughters of Darkness (1971) in terms of atmospheric lesbo horror between a powerful yet evil older woman and a younger and sexually vulnerable chick, Farina’s flick is loaded with a number of unforgettable visual orgasms. Indeed, a work of rather refined aesthetic decadence, Baba Yaga—a film that is indubitably too artsy fartsy and non-linear for gorehounds and too trashy and politically correct for anally retentive arthouse fags—is a virtual Gothic counterculture fashion show in cinematic form that is equal doses heaven and hell in terms of sheer imagery and atmosphere. While based on the comics of a so-called ‘revolutionary’ artist that was heavily influenced by the leftist zeitgeist of the late-1960s, the film is also flagrantly 'fascist chic' and features hot chicks in SS and Prussian uniforms. Indeed, forget the pseudo-blonde she-bitches with retarded fake kraut accents in Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS (1975) and related nauseatingly insipid Nazisploitation trash, the Sapphic SS sluts in Farina's flick have a certain demonic diva elegance that transcends hokey historical clichés.

Long before he directed his underrated first feature Hanno cambiato faccia (1971) aka They Have Changed Their Face (1971)—an allegorical vampire flick featuring corporate bloodsuckers that pays tribute to the great cinematic masterworks of German Expressionism (e.g. the lead vampire's name is 'Giovanni Nosferatu')—Farina refined his filmmaking craft by directing tons of commercials and documentary shorts. In fact, he once directed an insightful short doc entitled Freud a fumetti (1970) about comic artist and Baba Yaga source writer Guido Crepax. Undoubtedly, Farina's short but sweet 10-minute doc makes a great primer for his feature as it reveals Crepax's strong cinematic influences and how his comic work is highly suitable for filmic adaptation. In fact, erotica maestro Tinto Brass was so impressed with Crepax's work that he hired him to create storyboards for his early candy-colored giallo Col cuore in gola (1967) aka Deadly Sweet aka I Am What I Am. Notably, Crepax was so obsessed with cinema and cinema history that he not only included iconic cinematic figures ranging from Erich von Stroheim to Louise Brookes to Ingmar Bergman to Boris Karloff in his work, but he also adapted a scene from Sergei Eisenstein's classic anti-Teuton war epic Alexander Nevsky (1938) in comic form in a intricate manner that closely mimics the musical rhythm of the film in terms of how he laid out of the images. Needless to say, like Crepax's comics, Baba Yaga features a sort of refined cinephilia that pays tribute to the darker side of classic cinema. Indeed, the film references everything from German master auteur F.W. Murnau's lost flick Der Januskopf (1920)—an unofficial adaptation of Robert Louis Stevenson's The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde—to Jean-Luc Godard's classic feature Pierrot le Fou (1965). Thankfully, the film does not feature the sort of masturbatory and carelessly contrived postmodern cinephilia that is typical of someone like Tarantino. For example, the heroine and her beau go to a screening of German Expressionist classic Der Golem, wie er in die Welt kam (1920) aka The Golem: How He Came into the World directed by Carl Boese and Paul Wegener, only for said characters to later encounter a sort of non-Judaic neo-Golem in the form of a porcelain baby doll in bondage that comes to life as a result of a powerful witch that uses the object to kill and torture her enemies. Thankfully, the killer doll in Farina's film is more sensually sinister than the evil ventriloquist dummy featured in the old school British horror flick Devil Doll (1964) directed by Lindsay Shonteff.

As a general rule, I find it nearly impossible to take comic books nerds, especially adult ones, seriously, yet auteur Farina seems to have fairly good reasoning for obsessing over the cultivated doodling of comic maestro Crepax. Indeed, to Farina, Crepax created an entire elaborate metapolitical Weltanschauung that not only transcended the comic medium, but also aesthetics and politics, or as the filmmaker articulated in the Blue Underground featurette Farina & Valentina, “It was revolutionary in terms of content, because it dealt with mysteries or magic or esoteric themes. The stories were ever more esoteric, bizarre and difficult to decode. But more than anything, it was linguistically revolutionary. By this, I mean that Crepax brought to the language of the comic strip an amazing breath of innovation comparable to what Jean-Luc Godard had done a few years previously for the cinema.” For better or worse, Baba Yaga is certainly a metapolitically revolutionary work that is very much of its rather debauched time, but thankfully it is also a fetishistically phantasmagoric fever dream featuring Sapphic SS sluts and statuesque beauties with shapely jumbo jugs that features the nice little novelty of incessantly blurring the line between risqué reality and fucked fantasy. In that sense, the film deserves to be favorably compared to frog filmmaker Roger Vadim’s underrated quasi-Cocteau-esque lesbo Gothic horror flick Et mourir de plaisir (1960) aka Blood and Roses.

BABA YAGA

About a decade ago or so, I used to think archetypal flapper Louise Brookes was fairly hot despite her proto-clithopper haircut and fairly average and not-so-curvy body, but then I realized she was a less than dainty dyke and her overall dykeness became too painfully obvious to me to the point where I found her more annoying than arousing. Undoubtedly, Farina puts Brookes’ lily-licker legacy to great use in Baba Yaga, which features a Brookes-esque heroine named Valentina Rosselli (French actress Isabelle De Funès in her most famous acting role)—a fashion photographer that likes taking photos of half-naked woman and black-on-white miscegenation—that comes under the spell of a sinisterly Sapphic eponymous blonde witch with savagely sadistic tendencies. Valentina is a somewhat uptight bitch that not only regularly denies pussy to her hack filmmaker boyfriend Arno Treves (George Eastman of the nasty celluloid turd Antropophagus (1980) directed by Joe D’Amato), but also says a lot of pretentious bullshit to him, including trashing his hero Godard as indicated by her snidely expressed remark, “Your guru hasn’t done anything of merit since PIERROT LE FOU. I’d much rather see Laurel and Hardy. You can expect a laugh.” Indeed, it is only when the heroine comes into contact with a literal witch that kills her hot female friends that she realizes the importance of a good man and seems to get over her rather dubious donut-bumper phase. Featuring Carroll Baker of Baby Doll (1956) in an underrated role as a mischievous MILF that attempts to use both her well preserved body (notably, Baker actually convinced auteur Farina to do a full-frontal nude scene for the film, though it was cut when it was originally released due to censors) and evil magic powers to enslave a girl that seems to have forgotten that she has more of an innate thirst for cock than cunt, Baba Yaga is—whether intentional or not—a cautionary tale about the perils of dykedom and how a woman always make for a sad and sorry replacement when it comes to a man's job.

In what ultimately proves to be her first big mistake, Valentina—a proud arm-chair 'revolutionary' that is not beneath calling her best friends 'fascists' if they dare to not tow the pinko party line—expresses her shallow feminist independence by denying her beau Arno poontang and then insisting that she walk home by herself after a party. Indeed, after bitchily saying to Arno, "Listen to me. I don't feel like making love with you. Not tonight. Ciao," and parting ways with a man that seems to genuinely love and adore her, Valentina happens upon a lone German Shepherd in the street with a strange occult symbol inscribed on its fur. After expressing more affection to the dog than her boyfriend, Valentina gets somewhat of a shock when a fancy black car appears out of nowhere and nearly plows down both her and the mysterious canine. Before the heroine knows it, a beautiful yet seemingly Svengali-like middle-aged blonde emerges from the car and demands that she get inside the vehicle so that she can drive her home. Speaking in a fairly cryptic yet overtly carnal manner, the blonde immediately acts in a sexually predatory manner and states to Valentina, "It wasn't the dog. I was driving too fast. I knew something was about to happen. Our meeting was preordained." While in the car, the blonde also demonstrates her sharp Sapphic aggressiveness by feeling up Valentina's leg and then snatching a belt from her garter belt, which she promises to bring back to her the next day, even stating to the somewhat bewildered heroine with a certain sassy arrogance, "I need a personal object of yours. Be assured that I'll return it to you tomorrow." Rather inexplicably, the blonde knows exactly where Valentina lives and when the heroine gets out of the car, she declares to the female protagonist with the utmost self-importance, "Don't forget my name. My name is Baba Yaga." Not all that surprisingly, later that night Valentina has a troubling nightmare where two demonic divas in SS officers and the same German Shepherd she encountered that night escort her to a large dark pit that she is forced to strip naked in front of while an extremely cold and arrogant-looking SS man (auteur Farina) holding an evil looking kitty cat looks on. The same man will proceed to haunt Valentina in various forms, including as a policeman and Prussian officer, but she will always remain in a passive, if not slavish, position during these sadomasochistic nightmares that are clearly dictated over by Sapphic sorceress Baba Yaga.

Just as she previously promised on the fateful night when they first met, bodacious blonde witch Baba Yaga swings by Valentina's swinging pad and returns her "delightful little object" (aka garter belt button), though it is ultimately just a pretense to curse the heroine's beloved camera. Indeed, to Valentina's great distress, her favorite camera is turned into a magical weapon that hurts anyone she takes a photo of, including her voluptuous model friend Toni (Angela Covello) and some random hippie dressed up like Jesus that she spots in public holding a poorly made "GOD IS DEAD" sign. Toni is a beautiful brunette with virtually immaculate tits and an extremely extroverted personality, but one snap from Valentina's cursed camera immediately causes her to collapse and develop some inexplicable and completely debilitating illness that leaves her bedridden. Probably due to all the dope and commie literature that she has consumed, Valentina does not immediately realize the pernicious power of her accursed camera until it is too late. Meanwhile, Baba Yaga passively bides her time and allows the camera to do her work for her in the hope that Valentina will soon be her own personal slave and sexual plaything.

BABA YAGA

Despite cursing her camera and bringing chaos to her life, Valentina unwisely decides to pay Baba Yaga at her home, which is the sort of less than humble abode that you would expect from a carpet-munching witch with refined tastes. Indeed, Ms. Yaga lives in a large and somewhat dilapidated chateau of sorts that has, among other things, a seemingly bottomless pit in the living room and a wealth of ancient and mostly sinister seeming exotic trinkets. Under the pretense of taking photographs, Valentina snoops around the upstairs of the house where she finds a creepy vintage baby doll with a rather revealing bondage outfit. Somewhat unexpectedly, Valentina becomes so aroused upon finding one of Yaga's black leather gloves that she opts to masturbate with it while lying on a seemingly rather uncomfortable steel bed without a mattress. While masturbating, Valentina reveals her sickly masochistic side by fantasizing about a scorpion attacking her nipple and a crow pecking at her bushy pussy. Rather predictably, Yaga walks in on Valentina while she is diddling herself, though the heroine tries to play it off by complaining that she is suffering from a "dizzy spell." Clearly convinced that she has the heroine under her spell in both the literal and figurative sense, Yaga demands that Valentina take home the S&M baby doll, which is named 'Annette,' though the dopey heroine becomes somewhat concerned when the witch declares, "She will protect you from any harm." Unbeknownst to Valentina, the doll is demonic and deadly and can take human form (notably, the rather delectable Slavic-blooded Italian actress Ely Galleani portrays the doll in human form).

While an 'anti-bourgeois bourgeois' bitch that makes nonsensical statements about "revolution" despite living in a fancy and elegantly decorated apartment that she clearly could not afford on a meager prole's budget, Valentina is not beneath making racially-charged jokes to goofy negroes. Indeed, when her friend Romina (Daniela Balzaretti) and an unintentionally humorously effete negro come to her flat to take part in a degenerate interracial photo shoot, Valentina reveals she might be slightly counterrevolutionary when she states to the ambiguously gay colored gentleman, "Let me see some nice primitive drive, ok? Like your ancestors. You know, the ones in the jungle that ate up the missionaries." A sort of walking and talking cliché, the black boy is what one might describe as a 'magical negro' as he can somehow sense that the porcelain doll Annette is evil and thus he wisely refuses to touch it. Unfortunately, Romina is not so wise and soon finds herself mysteriously pricked by the doll's antique hair pin, which leads to her becoming immediately sick and eventually dying as a result of a mysterious illness. As a result of suffering a nightmare where she is dressed as a Prussian soldier and executes a completely unclad Romina on a beach while Yaga (as well as auteur Farina sporting Prussian officer regalia, including a monocle and iron cross) looks on, Val feels extremely guilty about her beautiful model friend's rather dubious death. Needless to say, Yaga is willing to use her magical powers to kill anyone so long as it gets her what she wants, namely Val as a sexual slave and protégé.

Unlike the heroine, Valentina's boyfriend Arno is a fairly unpretentious and no bullshit kind of guy that has no problem admitting that he is a "whore" that directs worthless TV commercials instead of creating highly personal auteur pieces (although just speculation, I think that Arno is a sort of stand-in for director Farina, who spent a good portion of his life directing TV adverts). Indeed, when Valentina goes to visit Arno on a film set, he is directing a pleasantly politically incorrect TV commercial where a guido gangster turns a negro crook into a small human-shaped mound of black debris after throwing white laundry detergent on him. In that sense, Arno is just as much of an illusionist as Baba Yaga, albeit not as erotically magnetic when it comes to turning Valentina on. Naturally, it is Arno that must save Valentina from both her abersexual compulsions and Baba Yaga's sinisterly Sapphic metaphysical grip. While Arno does not initially believe his loony lover's claims in regard to Yaga being an evil dyke witch with magical powers that can kill, he does eventually realize something erotically evil is a work when he sees photographs of Annette the doll in human form attacking belated model Romina. Rather conveniently, Valentina and Arno's sexual relationship improves just as Yaga begins to catch the heroine in her malefic metaphysical grip.

When dyke dominatrix doll Annette takes on human form, seductively kisses the heroine on the lips in a teasing fashion, and then walks out of her flat with her favorite camera, Valentina naturally senselessly decides to follow her back to Baba Yaga's ominous chateau like a sex-starved Sapphic somnambulist that is looking to engage in some hardcore lesbo scissoring. Of course, Annette has merely lured Val to the old hot hag's house so that Yaga can imprison her there forever, or so she tries. Indeed, while Yaga initially treats Val in a wickedly sweet and charming fashion to somewhat camouflage her true malevolent motivations, the witch now feels fully confident to take complete ownership over the airheaded heroine. Indeed, although Yaga initially attempts to seduce her by completely disrobing and sensually declaring while proudly exhibiting her completely stark-naked body, "You belong to me, Valentina, so don't you forget it. I have already demonstrated I can do with you as I like," Val coldly rejects the seduction and bitches like a frigid virginal feminist on the rag, "NO! I couldn't care less about powers and riches and your cosmic secrets. And don't try to tell me who to make love with! Because no man has ever done that, let alone a woman.” Naturally, since Val refuses to submit willingly, Yaga opts for somewhat harsher methods and, with the help of slavish sex doll Annette, the wanton witch strips, ties up, and brutally whips Valentina. Needless to say, passive-aggressive bitch Val—a girl that is more bark than bite—is no match for the seasoned sorceress and her deadly delectable doll, so naturally it ultimately takes a man to get the job done right. Indeed, somehow Arno realizes that Val is at Yaga’s house and that she is in serious danger, so he immediately takes action and comes to her rescue. With very little effort, Arno smashes Annette the doll into pieces, though it is ultimately Val that literally takes down Yaga by somewhat unintentionally causing her to fall down the bottomless pit in her darkly lit living room. In a somewhat uneven twist ending, cops show up at the house immediately after Yaga is dispatched and reveal that the building has been abandoned for some time. In fact, even the bottomless pit is no longer bottomless. Either way, it seems Valentina has been literally scared straight in regard to Sapphic sexuality and thus will devote herself to dedicated dick Arno.

BABA YAGA

While surely one of the more neglected Italian horror films of the 1970s, I doubt anyone would dare to describe Baba Yaga as an immaculate masterpiece, including the film’s auteur Corrado Farina. In fact, in an interview featurette entitled Farina & Valentina, Farina laments on his failure to fully realize his artistic vision and pay greater tribute to Crepax’s source comic, stating with obvious regret, “My idea, which unfortunately was only realized in small part, was to make a comic-inspired film using Crepax’s strip as a starting point, which in turn used film as a starting point. I wanted to somehow come full circle. My idea was only partially realized in a few sequences. Namely those in which I used overexposed photographs in an attempt to approximate the graphics in Crepax’s comic strips. I also used a layout similar to the way Crepax laid his panels out on the page. Those sequences do try to capture the language used in the comics, but only two or three sequences remain in the film. In the rest of the film, I was unable to achieve that rhythm and composition, that comic flavor that I was hoping for.” Notably, during the same interview, Farina does a fairly admirable job summing up the film’s legacy and its importance in the context of Italian cinema history, remarking, “Currently, I have made only two feature films: THEY HAVE CHANGED THEIR FACE and BABA YAGA. But it’s interesting that after 30 years . . . these two films are enjoying a moment of popularity that exceeds by far the fame they enjoyed when they came out. In any case, I think that their so-called ‘second youth’ is due to the very fact that they are genre films of a very . . . if you’ll excuse the pun . . . a very particular genre. They go beyond pure and simple horror. They’ve become a testament . . . more so THEY HAVE CHANGED THEIR FACE, but also BABA YAGA in some ways . . . to a specific historical and cultural time, which is the ‘70s in Italy.” Indeed, Farina may have only directed two films, but they are fairly singular auteurist works that place the filmmaker alongside Giulio Questi (La morte ha fatto l'uovo aka Death Laid an Egg, Arcana) and Alberto Cavallone (Spell – Dolce mattatoio aka Man, Woman & Beast, Blue Movie) in terms of being an unsung maestro of genre-bending Guido quasi-avant-garde horror.

As someone that has probably had more experience with lipstick bisexuals and lesbians than most men, I am oftentimes annoyed by the shallow and superficial, if not downright phony, portrayal of Sapphic psychos, deranged dykes, and menacing carpet-munching witch bitches in horror cinema. While I can certainly appreciate the cold and callous portrayal of crypto-dyke cunt Mrs. Danvers in Alfred Hitchcock's 1940 adaptation of English bisexual novelist Daphne du Maurier's classic Gothic romance Rebecca, Jesús Franco certainly did not demonstrate any profound understanding of the psychology of unhinged lily-lickers in his many (pseudo)lesbianic sexploitation flicks. Although directed by a seemingly rampantly heterosexual man and starring similarly sexually sane women, Baba Yaga somehow has a surprisingly authentic Sapphic essence. Additionally, the film manages to underscore the sadomasochistic dynamic of dyke behavior without seeming too stupid or exploitative. Indeed, although somewhat aesthetically different cinematic works, Farina's film somewhat reminded me of the quasi-expressionistic avant-garde S&M erotic flick Mano destra (1986) directed by and starring Swiss dyke dominatrix Cleo Übelmann. Additionally, I also would not be surprised if British auteur Peter Strickland watched Farina's film in preparation for his latest dark dyke romance The Duke of Burgundy (2014). On the other hand, Baba Yaga certainly never quite reaches the esoteric Sappho sadomasochism of a Ulrike Ottinger film like Freak Orlando (1981). While the film might be arousing to some lesbos of both the sadistic and masochistic sort, it is, quite thankfully, not exactly LGBT-friendly as a provocative cinematic work where a somewhat emotionally erratic and surely politically retarded girl must be saved from literally evil lesbians by her tall, dark, and handsome boyfriend. Undoubtedly, Baba Yaga is a film where, not unlike various works of German Expressionism and Fernando Di Leo's bizarrely foreboding giallo La bestia uccide a sangue freddo (1971) aka Slaughter Hotel, the form dictates the content and the story unravels like a stream-of-conscious nightmare. In short, Farina's flick is a wild and wanton ride where the viewer has the distinguished opportunity to get lost in a delectable deluge of amorous aesthetic decadence where nothing is as it seems. I must confess that Baba Yaga is one of the few films I can think of where I found myself totally willing to overlook its more glaring flaws due to my shameless obsession with its entrancingly dreamy imagery and overall sexy style. Indeed, the film is like a Alain Robbe-Grillet flick that been been directed by a mere mortal as opposed to a sadistic scatter-brained postmodern-intelligent-demigod. Needless to say, Baba Yaga is also one of the oh-so few cinematic comic book adaptations that you can show to a prospective lover without seeming like an autistic man-child and/or virginal omega male. In fact, I sense the film would be more appealing to gals than guys due to its rather refined depiction of exquisite female flesh, fashionable wardrobes, and overall extremely feminine essence, though both genders were surely find something to be aroused by. After all, there exists no other film with such a eerily erotic baby doll in bondage gear and a fascist chic aesthetic, not to mention the fact that Baba Yaga features the titular blonde bombshell star of Baby Doll in one of the most strangely sexy MILF roles in cinema history.

BABA YAGA

-Ty E

BETRAYED

Coſta-Gavras (1988)

Admittedly, it is not that often that a subpar Zionist Hollywood movie inspires me to read a 400-page book co-written by two less than literally gifted small town journalists, but such is certainly the case with the largely forgotten shit flick Betrayed (1988) directed by Greek-French auteur Coſta-Gavras (Z, Hanna K.) and penned by exceedingly ethno-masochistic and seemingly spiritually caſtrated Hungarian-American screenwriter Joe Eszterhas (Basic Instinct, Showgirls). Indeed, a fairly typical example of Hollywood raping facts and molding them to fit their own poſt-Trotskyite Zio-ganda agenda, the film—a virtual Gone with the Wind of Zionist produced neo-Nazi flicks—is loosely based on the thrilling real-life ſtory of white nationalist martyr Robert Jay Mathews and his underground European-American revolutionary group Brüder Schweigen (aka Silent Brotherhood aka The Order) and their rather insanely ambitious attempt to rage war againſt the U.S. government and reclaim the United States for Europids. After initially watching Coſta-Gavras’ debut Hollywood feature, I was appalled by the film’s absurd diſtortions and decided to read The Silent Brotherhood: Inside America’s Raciſt Underground (1989) by veteran Denver reporters Kevin Flynn and Gary Gerhardt so that I could at leaſt learn the basic facts in regard to the rise and fall of Mathews and the Brüder Schweigen. While I expected Mathews and his motley Männerbünde to be moronic Hitler fetishiſts and demented dope-addled criminals, The Silent Brotherhood revealed a truly tragic ſtory about somewhat misguided yet hardly ignorant men with patriotic ſpirits comparable to America’s founding fathers. Although involved in rather ambitious bank robberies, counterfeiting operations, and political assassinations over a period of about a year between 1983 and 1984, moſt of the men in the Brüder Schweigen lacked any ſort of criminal record and its member included mailmen, war veterans, former high school basketball ſtars, farmers, deep sea divers, college ſcholars, etc. In ſhort, the admittedly quite bad ass bros of Brüder Schweigen were not brain-dead skinheads with shitty homemade tattoos that liſtened to third rate punk music, but largely likeable and reſpectable men that truly believed in what they were doing and, in ſome caſe, ultimately accepted death over defeat and perennial incarceration to cowardly ſnitching. As Flynn and Gerhardt’s book reveals, the actions of the Brüder Schweigen make the neo-cowboy bank-robbing depicted in David Mackenzie’s Hell or High Water (2016) ſeem terribly trite by comparison. A ſort of real-life (and leſs autiſtic) white nationalist equivalent to the character Dignan from Wes Anderson’s debut feature Bottle Rocket (1996), Mr. Mathews was, deſpite his flaws, a relatively pure of heart man that was virtually unanimously beloved by his followers and who practiced what he preached to the point where he literally ſacrificed himſelf for them and became a martyr to the cauſe. Indeed, after a very long and intense ſtandoff with 75 armed federal law enforcement, Mathews was burned alive as a result of an FBI agent firing three M-79 Starburst flares inside the house that he barricaded himself inside. Needless to say, Coșta-Gavras' highly fictionalized depiction of Mathews and the Brüder Schweigen is a grotesque injustice in terms of sheer historical fact, yet the film is not without its intriguing elements, namely its depiction of the FBI as more or less a morally bankrupt outfit led by power-hungry nihilists that lack principles and are just as criminally-inclined as the lawless terrorists that they so ruthlessly seek to destroy. In short, Coșta-Gavras might hate fascists, but he seems to hate the FBI and United States government just as much. After all, as the Betrayed reveals, while the FBI agents have sold their souls to a corrupt government, the white revolutionaries at least have ideals and are fighting for a cause that they truly believe in.

BETRAYED

Admittedly, I am no Coșta-Gavras connoisseur and have come to the conclusion that the auteur spent at least the first decade or two of his filmmaking career attempting to remake Judaic Guido Gillo Pontecorvo's commie classic La battaglia di Algeri (1966) aka The Battle of Algiers (in fact, Coșta-Gavras would collaborate with the film's screenwriter Franco Solinas on his anti-American agitprop piece État de siege (1972) aka State Of Siege), but I have also come to the conclusion that, socio-politically speaking, Betrayed is not your typical Hollywood political-drama-thriller and certainly benefits from being helmed by an (ex)arthouse auteur. Additionally, Coșta-Gavras' revolutionary heritage (his father was a card-carrying commie that, among other things, fought in the Pro-Soviet branch of the Greek Resistance) is certainly to the film's advantage. Indeed, instead of simply depicting them as solely braindead knuckle-dragging neo-nutzis like most Hollywood movies, the white nationalists in the film are at least depicted as genuine revolutionaries that are fighting against an innately corrupt government, albeit for their race and community instead of the superficial intellectual abstraction of the proletariat. While the white nationalists are portrayed as hardworking proles that love their country, the FBI members are presented as pathetically deracinated opportunistic yuppies, snobs, and psychopaths that crave power for power's sake and are more than willing to do the government's dirty work to obtain said petty power. Of course, Betrayed is also plagued with some disgusting absurdities, including a sickening scenario where a group of white nationalist hillbillies hunt down and kill a negro in the woods with a certain sadistic glee, as if they are hunting for deer for sport. While the Brüder Schweigen assassinated an enemy and killed a traitor, they certainly were not prone to targeting random negroes or other nonwhites, as they considered such senseless savagery to be counterproductive to their cause. It should be noted that the film's screenwriter Joe Eszterhas is a pathetic ethno-masochist of sorts who refused to visit his own father, Hungarian aristocrat Count István Eötvös, on his deathbed because the old man was once a member of the nationalistic Arrow Cross Party. Indeed, not unlike Eszterhas' subsequent cinematic collaboration with Coŝta-Gavras, Music Box (1989), Betrayed features a rather dubious message that it is morally righteous to betray a loved one and/or family member to a corrupt government if that person shares certain less than politically correct political views. On top of that, both films feature a laughably insipid feminist message that becomes all the more patently absurd when one realizes that Eszterhas penned such compulsively sleazy films as Basic Instinct (1992) and Showgirls (1995). In short, Eszterhas is probably the most to blame for the films' rather retarded post-shoah pseudo-moralizing.

Undoubtedly, you know a film about an infamous white nationalist revolutionary group is going to have certain insufferable Zionist and cultural Marxist agitprop properties when the very first inter-title reads, "An Irwin Winkler Production." As his discernibly Hebraic name clearly indicates, Winkler is a pride member of the Judaic tribe and he has even produced a number of films glorifying Jewish criminals, including The Gambler (1974) penned by James Toback and directed by fellow tribesman Karel Reisz and alpha-shabbos goy Martin Scorsese's sick Zio-fantasy The Wolf of Wall Street (2013). At the beginning of Betrayed, an odiously obnoxious Jewish radio show host based on Alan Berg—a loathsome figure whose assassination was also depicted in Oliver Stone's largely forgotten celluloid turd Talk Radio (1988)—is gunned down in a parking garage shortly after he gets done finishing a show where he baits anti-Semites by stating things like, "Jew-boys. Anti-Semitism, racism, hate. I know there's a lotta kike-haters among you nice Gentiles." Needless to say, like the real Herr Berg—a seemingly quasi-sociopath with a fetish for black women who was supposedly gunned down by Brüder Schweigen member Bruce Pierce with a MAC-10 in his own driveway—the Jewish radio host, who makes Howard Stern seem like a cultivated gentlemen and scholar by comparison, is a hardly sympathetic character, but since he is a high-profile individual the FBI begins investigating his mysterious murder and ultimately hires a less than dainty dame named agent Catherine Weaver (played by real-life Jewess Debra Winger) to infiltrate a small Midwestern farming community to see if some of its populous are part of an underground white nationalist network that is suspected of the incendiary Israelite's murder. Since the assassins spray-painted "ZOG" on both the Jewish radio host's corpse and car, the FBI is convinced that white nationalist carried out the murder, but they have no evidence to support their suspicions. A cold and oftentimes highly irritable childless single woman that seems to be emotionally impenetrable, Catherine has nil family members because she lost both of her parents in a car crash when she was just a wee babe, thus she makes the perfect undercover FBI agent due to her lack of familial responsibilities and seemingly deep-seated longing for a family of her own. Unfortunately for Catherine, she does not expect to be effortlessly seduced by the Midwest's foremost white nationalist revolutionary.

While working undercover as a combine driver—a hopelessly blue collar job that demonstrates beyond any reasonable doubt that the heroine is a less than dainty dame with an incurable case of penis envy—under the phony name Katie Phillips, Catherine soon finds herself falling in love with the local white revolutionary leader and acquiring a sort of adopted nuclear family where she feels complete for the first time in her exceedingly lonely life. Indeed, widowed Vietnam War veteran Gary Simmons (Tom Berenger)—the leader of the revolutionary group and a character that is very loosely based on real-life white national martyr Robert Jay Mathews—has not touched a woman in years since his wife died under dubious circumstances, but he immediately becomes entranced with Catherine upon first meeting her and it is practically love-at-first-sight, even though Catherine is a somewhat frigid bitch who seems disgusted at even the thought of a man daring to hit on her. Unfortunately for Catherine, Gary is a passionate, confidant, devilishly handsome, and charismatic charmer that knows how to get what he wants. Naturally, Catherine refuses to believe wholesome and sensitive family man Gary is a hateful killer, especially after he makes love to her and makes her feel like a real woman for the first time in her entire life. Of course, no unlike Mathews, Gary is a dichotomous individual with a dark murderous side that is well hidden beneath his rather welcoming and charming Adonis-like exterior. Additionally, like Mathews, Gary believes everything he says and is completely convinced that he is doing the Lord's work by leading a white nationalist militia that is responsible for assassinating the world's most obnoxious Jewish radio host. Needless to say, like Mathews, Gary seems to have been inspired by the white revolution depicted in the racially apocalyptic dystopian novel The Turner Diaries (1978) written by pseudonymous writer Andrew Macdonald (aka physicist turned National Alliance founder William Luther Pierce).

BETRAYED

Catherine works for an exceedingly arrogant twat named Michael 'Mike' Carnes (John Heard) who, despite being an (ex)lover of the heroine, has no problem whoring her out to a 'lowly' blue collar mensch that he despises and wants to destroy. Indeed, Catherine is Mike's hot twat honeypot, though he gets extremely angered when he discovers that she has begun a real romantic sexual relationship with handsome alpha-male Gary, who has a natural sort of raw masculinity energy that the somewhat bourgeois self-absorbed FBI stooge lacks. A deracinated WASP that is more or less the opposite of Gary when it comes to the cultural, racial, and spiritual, Mike naturally has no problem having a quasi-sociopathic negro named Al Sanders (Albert Hall)—an inordinately cold and stoic spade that seems like he could be the big brother of the psychopathic serial killer 'Pluto' played by Michael Beach in Carl Franklin's One False Move (1992)—as his right-hand man. As Al's action ultimately demonstrate, he is a remorseless killer that is able to get away with coldblooded murder simply because he works for the FBI. As big black Al tells Catherine when she expresses great discomfort as a result of being whored out by the FBI and being put in a very potentially deadly situation, “Everybody uses everybody, girl. It’s just a matter of what you’re being used for. What it is . . . is the only important thing.” Undoubtedly, Al would certainly be labelled an ‘Uncle Tom’ by the average urban negro, even if he kills white nationalists, as he has sold his soul to the FBI. While both Mike and Al are cold and calculating cynics that have no problem putting the lives of innocent citizens in danger if it benefits their careers, they seem to thrive on crushing Gary and his crew because they are a serious threat to the bureaucratic anti-working-class machine that they serve. Indeed, they are operatives of what Gary describes as “ZOG” (aka ‘Zionist Occupied Government’). Undoubtedly, if it was somehow proven to Al and Mike that the United States was unequivocally under the control of Zionist Jews that put Israel before the U.S., they would not mind as they are unscrupulous opportunities that live solely for personal gain. Indeed, while she never clearly articulates it in a specific way, Catherine has serious doubts about the intentions and methods of her bosses and coworkers.

The patriotic son of a vocal tax resistor and Sons of Liberty member that committed suicide after the IRS put a lien on his farm and depriving him of his livelihood, Gary has good reason to loathe the government and the people that serve it. As a Vietnam War veteran that received an award for being wounded and almost received the Medal of Honor for bravely killing a bunch of gooks on a suicidal mission, Gary practices what he preaches and is not some sort of hypocritical armchair warrior. Unbeknownst to Catherine, Gary has taught his young children Rachel and Joey to hate Jews, black, other assorted mud people, queers and race traitors. Due to the fact his wife left him because of his political views, Gary decides to completely indoctrinate Catherine into the cause shortly after they become a couple, thus soon tainting the heroine’s love for him. Indeed, under the pretext of going on a ‘hunting’ trip, Gary horrifies Catherine by more or less tricking her into get involved in brutally murdering a young negro man with other members of his revolutionary group. When Catherine emotionally breaks down after witnessing the coldblooded murder of the colored gentleman and expresses her horror and disgust in regard to the incident, Gary makes a feeble attempt to comfort her by stating, “Aw, come on, Katie. Come on, now. It was just a nigger. Don’t make too much out of it. There’s plenty more where he came from. I didn’t want there to be anything between us. I love you that much that I wanted you to come. If you love me, I got nothin’ to worry about. But if you don’t, I don’t care about goin’ to jail. But one thing’s for sure; we’re gonna kick the hell outta ZOG [...] Zionist Occupation Government. It means the goddamn Jews are runnin’ our country with their nigger police.” At this point, Catherine resolves to immediately run away from Gary and seeks comfort in her less than comforting fellow FBI employers, but Mike tells her that she must go back so that they can build up their case and destroy the white nationalist cell. To make matters worse, Gary’s pal Wes (Ted ‘Buffalo Bill’ Levine in a fairly underrated role)—a convicted felon that is known for raping men and attempting to wage war against native negroes in South Africa—rightly suspects that Catherine is an informant or undercover agent of some sort (or what Gary describes as a “grasshopper”), especially after she nearly runs him over with her large pick-up truck while fleeing from Gary. Luckily for Catherine, Gary loves her too much to take Wes’ claims seriously.

BETRAYED

Like Robert Jay Mathews and the Brüder Schweigen (which managed to snag nearly $4 million in less than a year during their robberies), Gary comes up with an elaborate plan to begin robbing banks so that his group can build up a war chest and have the monetary means to cause serious destruction to the United States government. Indeed, Gary hopes to start a racial civil war of sorts that will result in America becoming a completely racially and culturally homogeneous judenfrei Aryan utopia. Somewhat absurdly, Gary wants Catherine to take part in the robberies, as he wants her to be a part of every aspect of his life. During their first bank robbery, the FBI monitors the area yet opts not to intervene so Catherine is forced to shoot a fat elderly security guard as a result. To make matters worse, FBI house negro Sanders shoots Wes, who ultimately dies an extremely painful and agonizing death in Catherine’s arms. Despite their previous animosity, Catherine and Wes started to bond a little bit before the bank robbery, so the heroine is naturally horrified by the murder and especially by the fact that the rather quirky revolutionary died in her arms. In fact, negro Al even proudly brags about killing Wes and describes the experience to Catherine as “terrific” and being “Like cleaning something off my shoe.” Naturally, with murderously arrogant government employed negroes like Al, it is easy to see why there are cutthroat revolutionary groups like Gary’s. Indeed, not unlike Gary and his group in regard to nonwhites and race traitors, the FBI has dehumanized Gary’s gang to such an extreme degree that they derive sadistic glee from killing its members in cold blood. Naturally, as a decidedly duplicitous dame that lives a virtual schizophrenic existence where she finds it impossible to become totally loyal to either the FBI or Gary’s group, Wes’ murder only further compounds Catherine’s growing resentment and disillusionment towards her emotionally parasitic and obscenely opportunistic employers to the point where her mental stability begins to become compromised and she questions everything that she is doing. On top of loving Gary, Catherine has developed strong emotional bonds with certain members of the group, including a benign grandfather-like figure named ‘Shorty’ (John Mahoney) who, despite loathing violence and murder, decided to join the revolutionary group after a bank stole his farm and the Vietnam War claimed his sole son. Like many of the members of the Brüder Schweigen, the members of Gary’s group have legitimate personal grievances against the government, which is using the IRS to systematically destroy Midwestern farmers and dispossess them of their farms and livelihoods. In short, the government and its anti-citizen/anti-farmer/anti-white policies are directly responsible for the growth of white nationalist movements, or so the film clearly insinuates. Indeed, while the film is obviously anti-Nazi, it also dares to reveal that the white revolutionaries are the natural consequence of a corrupt globalist government that cares nothing for its most loyal and patriotic citizenry.

Not unlike Coşta-Gavras' subsequent collaboration with Joe Eszterhas, Music Box (1989), Betrayed concludes with an unintentionally absurd twist of cold feminist betrayal. Indeed, when Gary reveals to Catherine that he has discovered that she is an FBI agent just before he aims his rifle at a corrupt politician with dubious hidden ties to white nationalism that he plans to assassinate, Catherine responds by whipping out her service revolver and killing him with a single bullet in a somewhat unconventional demonstration as to why female careerism is totally toxic when it comes to male-female relationships. Notably, right before Catherine kills him, Gary cries, "Oh, God! I loved you, Katie" and finds it impossible to shoot her first even though he knows she is a traitor that has been secretly keeping tabs on him and his group. Of course, it also does not help that Catherine agreed to Gary's proposal of marriage only a couple days before. In the end, Catherine is so emotionally tormented by the entire experience that she immediately quits the FBI because she rightly believes they exploited her female wiles and then hits the road to wander aimlessly like some degenerate Beat poet. Not surprisingly, Catherine, who genuinely loved the man she killed, is so haunted by Gary that she thinks she sees him at a random bar, as if she will be forever tormented by his figurative ghost. In the very last scene of what is indubitably completely senseless sappy and sentimental feminist swill, Catherine actually gets the gall to pay a visit to Gary's daughter Rachel despite the fact that she murdered the little girl's father, thus leaving her and her older brother with no parents. Indeed, somewhat ironically, although she suffered the loss of both of her parents at an early childhood, Catherine did not think twice about consigning a helpless little girl to the same sorry fate, thus contributing to the vicious cycle of bastardization. Of course, the message of Betrayed is that it is much preferable to have dead parents than neo-Nazis ones, but I guess that is what one should expect from a film that was penned by a man that disowned his own father and even refused to pay him a final visit on his deathbed due to his political views.

Undoubtedly, I think it is a fairly auspicious time for me to review a film entitled Betrayed about the parasitic menace of ZOG. Indeed, with President of the United States Donald J. Trump's recent betrayal of all of his follows and campaign promises, removal of White House Chief Strategist Steve Bannon from the National Security Council and disposal of Bannonism, and siding with warmongering neoco(he)ns and his insufferably smug candy ass Jewish son-in-law Jared Kushner—the Zionist extremist son of a convicted felon with ties to ultra-evil international chosenite George Soros—American certainly seems plagued with a Zionist Occupied Government that puts the interests of a foreign welfare state, Israel, over its own citizenry. Undoubtedly, Trump's grave betrayal is exactly the sort of thing that provides credibility to Robert Jay Mathews and Brüder Schweigen, as it demonstrates that peaceful political change is a fantasy, democracy is a laughable charade, and that all politicians are shabbos goy puppets that work for Israel first and America second, hence the groveling support of the Hebraic apartheid state among both democrats and republicans. Needless to say, Costa-Gavras' film is, in a somewhat conventional way, a piece of big budget Zionist propaganda that depicts Midwestern farmers as potential terrorist and blames sociopathic WASPs for the corruption of the extremely pro-Zionist FBI. Surely the film's depiction of white revolutionaries hunting and killing a negro for sport is nothing short of a grotesque leftist fantasy that bears no relation to any of the actions taken by the Brüder Schweigen, which actually forbid its members from senselessly attacking nonwhites. In fact, the scene is so senselessly stupid that lifelong leftist and negrophile Robert Ebert was even offended by it, or as he wrote in his 1988 review, "Another element that bothered me much more was a particularly disgusting and violent scene in which Berenger and his right-wing buddies capture a black man and then stage a 'hunt' in which they chase him through the forest at night and finally kill him. It is reprehensible to put a sequence like that in a film intended as entertainment, no matter what the motives of the characters or the alleged importance to the plot. This sequence is as disturbing and cynical as anything I've seen in a long time – a breach of standards so disturbing that it brings the film to a halt from which it barely recovers. I imagine that Costa-Gavras, whose left-wing credentials are impeccable, saw this scene as necessary to his indictment of the racist underworld he was exposing. But BETRAYED is not a small, brave political statement like Z, it is a Hollywood entertainment with big stars, and vile racist manhunts have no place in it." Indeed, the only purpose of the scene is to instill an irrational of the white revolutionaries in the viewer, which of course is quite typical of post-Eisensteinian Hollywood Zionist propaganda.

BETRAYED

It should be noted that, out of all the great films he starred in, Tom Berenger regards Betrayed as his personal favorite and even off shrugged the film's detractors by stating, "It was exactly what it was meant to be." As a rare Hollywood actor with genuine masculine attributes, it is easy to see why Berenger would like the film, though one can only speculate as to whether or not he sympathized with his character. By all accounts, the real-life Mathews was a charismatic man's man that was respected by everyone that knew him to the point where many of them risked their lives and freedom for him, hence why Brüder Schweigen immediately fell apart after he was murdered. Needless to say, quite unlike the protagonist of the film, Mathews never had his estranged wife killed or engaged in big-black-game hunting, among other libelous absurdities. Additionally, Mathews and his men only targeted degenerate parasitic entities with his robberies, including porn shops, dope dealers, and banks. A sort of white nationalist Robin Hood, Mathews was also quite generous and was always willing to help out a friend in financial trouble, even before he began robbing banks. In fact, Mathews, not unlike Berenger's character, was kind and honest to a fault to the point where he refused to believe that one of his followers, low-class Philadelphia bum Tom Martinez, had become a FBI informant to save his own sorry ass from imprisonment after being hit with counterfeiting charges (notably, William Baldwin portrayed Martinez in the weak made-for-TV movie Brotherhood of Murder (1999) featuring Peter Gallagher portraying Mathews). After reading The Silent Brotherhood: Inside America's Racist Underground by Flynn and Gerhardt, I can only come to the conclusion that Mathews was a tragic individual that could have lived a long and fruitful life were it not for his overwhelming longing to engage in a David and Goliath scale war against a corrupt government that he somewhat rightly believed was waging a war against his people and slowly but surely transforming his nation into a multicultural third world dystopia. Undoubtedly, over the three decades since Mathews' untimely death, America has degenerated into untermensch cesspool of sorts, thus completely confirming his greatest fears.

Ultimately, Mathews was burned alive on December 8, 1984 in a house near Freeland, Washington on Whidbey Island by the FBI after a standoff that lasted about two days that involved 500 FBI agents and cops. While surrounded by FBI agents in the house he would soon die in, Mathews managed to pen a suicide letters of sorts that more or less expresses Berenger's character's sentiments and the nature of the white FBI agents in the film. Indeed, Mathews' final words read as follows: "We all knew it would be like this, that it would be our own brothers who would first try to destroy our efforts to save our race and our terminally ill nation. Why are so many white men so eager to destroy their own kind for the benefit of Jews and the Mongrels? I see three FBI agents hiding behind some tress to the north of the house. I could have easily killed them, I had their faces in my sights. They look like good racial stock yet all their talents are given to a government which is openly trying to mongrelize the very race these agents are part of. Why can't they see? White men killing white men, Saxon killing Dane; When will it end? The Aryans' bane? I knew last night that today would be my last day in this life. When I went to bed I saw all my loved ones so clearly, as if they were there with me. All my memories flashed through my mind. I knew then that my tour of duty was up. I have been a good soldier, a fearless warrior. I will die with honor and join my brothers in Valhalla. For blood, soil, and honor. For faith and for race. For the future of my children. For the green graves of my sires. Robert Jay Mathews."

Undoubtedly, the story of Robert Jay Mathews and the Brüder Schweigen could make for a truly great epic political-thriller, but Betrayed is unfortunately not that film. Somewhat ironically considering his Hebraic background, William Friedkin—a rare Hollywood filmmaker that has never been afraid of politically incorrect or morally dubious subject matter as his sod S&M slasher flick Cruising (1980) clearly demonstrates—would certainly make for a fit director for such material, but of course a reasonably objective movie about a group named Brüder Schweigen will never be made in the Bizarro World nightmare factory known as Hollywood. After all, as the great anti-communist Russian novelist Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn once wrote, “For a Jew, nothing is more insulting than the truth.” In terms of the basic facts and interviews with actual members of the Brüder Schweigen, the rarely-screened ABC News doc Inside the Hate Conspiracy: America’s Terrorists (1995) is certainly watchable, at least as far as Zionist produced propaganda is concerned. In a semi-covertly Zionist nation with the largest Judaic population in the world, a mostly exclusively Israelite-owned mass media, and a seemingly all-powerful lobby group known as American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) that has cuckolded the United States Congress and both major political parties, the Brüder Schweigen will always be depicted as boogeymen while members of the partly Jewish leadership of the commie terrorist group the Weather Underground Organization (WUO) currently teach at American universities and brainwash white kids into hating their race, culture, and history. In terms of his sheer character and selflessness, Mathews also makes for a much better revolutionary hero than cowardly mass murder and rapist Che Guevara (who, incidentally, had a rather low opinion of negroes). Indeed, only when teenagers begin wearing Robert Jay Mathews and Francis Parker Yockey t-shirts will American youth have finally discovered a legitimate form of rebellion and not the sort of phony and self-destruction pseudo-rebelliousness that is fed to the by the sub-literate neo-minstrel performers, debased wiggers, limp-wristed white liberal ethno-masochists, and Hebraic hipsters of Hollywood and the entertainment industry. Franco-Grecian commie Costa-Gavra’ sort of carelessly convoluted hick Hollywood answer to Alfred Hitchcock’s Notorious (1946) starring homely Hebrewess Debra Winger as the Ingrid Bergman character, Betrayed is reasonably entertaining, features semi-sexy characters, and even includes the nice little novelty of self-described “hill-billy Jew” Ted Levine portraying a murderously paranoid neo-Nazi with a gay rapist past, yet it is also a work of audaciously asinine agitprop that unwittingly gives credence to the theory that America is under the control of a Zionist Occupied Government that is systematically destroying and dispossessing American’s white working-class backbone, hence the birth of the Brüder Schweigen in the first place. Indeed, the last thing white proles need after a long hard day of work is to be confronted with the condescending and hypocritical anti-white celluloid garbage that is being incessantly vomited and defecated out by the liberals and Jews of Hollywood, or so Alan Berg learned the hard way after spewing out years of anti-goy vile to his thoroughly debased listeners.

BETRAYED

-Ty E

THE REBELLION OF RED MARIA

Coştas Zapas (2011)

Just in time for the upcoming convergence of catastrophes and eventual capitulation of Europa – especially the severely stagnating and decaying Mediterranean, otherwise known as old Europe – decidedly decadent and deliriously debauched Greek auteur Coştas Zapas (Uncut Family, The Last Porn Movie) – one of the last truly uncompromising auteur filmmakers in the world – released his politically-charged and quasi-pornographic work I antarsia tis kokkinis Marias (2010) aka The Rebellion of Red Maria in apocalyptic anti-tribute to the death of revolutionary leftism in the Occident. Putridly ‘punk rock’ and passively pornographic in persuasion, The Rebellion of Red Maria was released only two years following the economic crisis in Greece and clearly wallows in such an uncertain world on the verge of absolute chaos as the height of ‘freedom’ and personal liberty, where one can rape and murder without consequence. Centering around a strikingly degenerate fellow who calls himself “Red Maria” – a middle-aged ex-commie terrorist turned tranny prostitute – who takes on a young protégé he finds beaten to a pulp in the street and revives by molesting his genitals and subsequently trains to become a nihilistic serial killer, The Rebellion of Red Maria is the disillusioned expression of a filmmaker who has lost faith in leftwing politics and the revolution itself and has thus developed a more extreme and erratic Weltanschauung where personal gratification, at any cost, is the foremost ideology. Indeed, a withered and uniquely ugly ‘queen’ of the seedy semen-drenched streets, Red Maria looks like he became the cracker plaything of a gang of Negroes in prison as a result of his terrorist activities, thus he has accepted his newfound ‘femininity’ after losing the revolution and his anal virginity, and he is a literal whore of capitalism who peddles his man-cunt for mere shekels. It is only when he finds a young man, the victim of so-called ‘neo-fascist’ brutality, that he finds his calling for a carnal campaign of cock-sucking and coldblooded killing and decides to get back in tune with his loony leftist roots, albeit with a more patently pessimistic and pernicious game plan. Featuring random references to Greek diva opera singer Maria Callas – a ‘spiritual mother’ of sorts for Red Maria – and with a discordant death metal soundtrack, The Rebellion of Red Maria, aside from being a work of abberosexual ‘anti-pornography,’ is also an ‘anti-musical’ of sorts that incriminatingly celebrates moral, cultural, aesthetic, spiritual, and political degeneracy in a manner like never before, as if seemingly deranged director Coştas Zapas had been released from an LGBT neo-Trotskyite mental institution before directing the film, thus also making it one of the most truly genuine leftwing revolutionary, and consequently philosophically and artistically despicable, works ever made.

“The Revolution died...It always died,” or so says Marxist terrorist turned (foul)flesh-peddling tranny Red Maria – a merry maniac of a mensch who long ago lost faith in everything, especially 'revolutionary change,' aside from sucking cock and boning twinks. One fine cloudy day, Red Maria finds an unconscious young man who is wearing nothing but baggy shorts, which allow his pecker to hangout freely. Being a good Samaritan, Red Maria revives the gentleman by molesting him via humble handjob, which ultimately awakes the jaded gentleboy from his slumber, thus ushering in the ill-begotten romantic relationship in what is very possibly the most completely and utterly repulsive gay odd couple to ungracefully grace the silverscreen. As Red Maria learns and will never forget, his new butt ugly boy toy was beaten to a bloody pulp by a street gang of nefarious neo-fascists who do not take kindly to wiggers whose wieners pop out of their shorts randomly. A virtual modern primitive of a post-industrial wasteland, Maria's homo homeboy grunts like a hip hop toddler with Down syndrome, thus it is up to the sardonic shemale to 'make a man' out of his perturbed protégé. The first thing Maria asks if he can suck the lad's cock, which inspires the young man to finger his buttocks and masturbate. Not one to do things halfway, or to literally or figuratively masturbate with his life, Red Maria teaches his sodomite student how to get bugged in the brown eye, the gospel of apocalyptic post-Marxist revolutionary politics 101, and how to slowly and brutally butcher and murder neo-fascists in the comfort of one's own bathroom. Ironically, Red Maria is a rare Greek man whose ancestors may have not been raped by Turks as s/he has blond hair and blue eyes yet the neo-fascist street warriors are superlatively swarthy as if they just landed on Greece on a raft from Iran. With no chance of a real Marxist revolution happening and with leftwingers now having 'rightwing souls,' Red Maria redefines 'permanent revolution' via hedonistic homicide and haphazard homo sex. Red Maria also manages to transform his poof protégé from being a mere savage sod who compulsively strokes his meat on the commode into a political radical in red pleather who rather enjoys being reamed in the rectum by an old Bolshevik of buggery. If there ever was a celluloid romance that was radically rancid and repellant to both the eyes and ears, as well as the soul, The Rebellion of Red Maria makes for an inordinately odious and rotten romance gone retarded with a hysterical heart and soul that only a half Negro/half Hebrew hermaphrodite from Athens could appreciate.

THE REBELLION OF RED MARIA

Indubitably, if I learned anything by watching The Rebellion of Red Maria, it is that not all love is beautiful and that leftwing politics are quite effective in emasculating men. Undoubtedly, if German New Cinema dandy auteur Werner Schroeter was a punk rock pornographer who trashed the voice of Maria Callas for mundane metal and intricate tableaux for minimalistic 'realism' of the radically raunchy sort, it might resemble The Rebellion of Red Maria – a trying tragicomedy that is about as aesthetically appealing as a brown baby in a blender. With the incessant repeating of the same offscreen poetry lines, quite like Argila (1969) and Eika Katappa (1969), as well as its anti-authoritarian sociopolitical subtext, The Rebellion of Red Maria is indubitably a work inspired by the films of Werner Schroeter, so it is quite interesting to note that Mediterranean auteur Coştas Zapas ripped off a kraut auteur who ripped off Mediterranean filmmakers, sort of like George Lucas borrowed the cinematic conventions for his Star War films from a Jap named Akira Kurosawa who borrowed his samurai film from John “Western” Ford. Of course, where Schroeter only saw death and dystopia in his sad cinematic swansong This Night (2008) aka Nuit de chien, zany Zapas only sees lurid love and carnal celebration in The Rebellion of Red Maria – a fiercely farcical depiction of a forsaken future without a historical future where man, be he a tormented tranny or sadistic skinhead, sees his fellow man as meat to be fucked and killed and where biological women have no place. Undoubtedly, in director Coştas Zapas’ mind, the world is a prison planet ruled by a pernicious plutocracy, thus The Rebellion of Red Maria makes for a wanton whimper in the face of globalization, technocratic terror, international bankers, and homogenization by way of Americanization and Hollywoodization, albeit a vaguely witty one. While I can respect some of Zapas’ aesthetic antagonism and blatant anti-Hollywoodism, I found The Rebellion of Red Maria about as philosophically and aesthetically inspiring as the latest Robert Rodriguez film, but at least the Greek auteur realizes the revolution, as well as the cheap Che Guevara ‘romance’ that oftentimes inspires would-be-revolutionaries to waste their lives for the good of the cause, is about as realistic as a black ruled planet, which is certainly something one cannot say of any other leftist filmmaker.

-Ty E

A CONVERSATION ABOUT RACE
A CONVERSATION ABOUT RACE

Craig Bodeker (2009)

A Conversation About Race is a splendid documentary trying to find out whether or not “racism” still exists in America. The documentary’s director, Craig Bodeker, asks random people on the street and behind closed doors questions about race and racism. The people in A Conversation About Race are your typical victims of cultural Marxism that believe the #1 issue facing America is racism. The people include an elderly black man who believes he’s a victim of racism because a white guy said he was good at dancing, a young female grad student type that typically lacks common sense, a transgendered freak who got a sex change, a feminist woman who talks like she has testicles, and a few other special people. All in all, most of these peoples responses made me want to vomit and prove why mob rule (democracy) is a joke.

Aryan documentary filmmaker Craig Bodeker with Asians

First, one has to look at the history of the word “racism” and its political origins. The first people to rally against “racism” were Marxists. When the Marxists got tired of blaming the bourgeois for the problems of the world, they decided to blame European and European-Americans. In fact, in the Soviet Union, Joseph Stalin made “Antisemitism” a capital crime. For example, if someone were to point out that Soviet mass murderer Genrikh Yagoda, who murdered tens of millions of innocent white Russians, was Jewish, they could be murdered. Since words like “racism” and “Antisemitism” defy a true definition, as A Conversation About Race proves, anyone can be accused of it. Of course whites (people of European descent, sorry, Jews are not white but partial Asiatics), are the only ones that can be charged with racism in America. The cultural Marxist belief is that so-called minorities cannot be racists because they are in a “power struggle” against evil Caucasians.

Yes, modern liberalism, “anti-racism”, and other pseudo-progressive movements are the products of Marxist theory. The same type of Marxist theory that has resulted in the largest number of deaths in human history over the past century. Were the NKVD butchers that were responsible for these deaths “white?” Not really, the majority of these individuals, such as Lazar Kaganovich and Genrikh Yagoda were your typical Asiatic Eastern European Jews. The murderers that weren’t Jewish were some other type of minority and usually had a Jewish wife as a “safety” to prove they were not “anti-Semitic.” Many of these Soviet Union Jews would later move to the United States and have children known as “red diaper” babies. These kosher tots would grow up to lead the “Civil Rights” movement, promote drugs, break down European-American institutions, and promote such institutionally racist programs as affirmative action. Although these liberal liberators claim to be battling hate and oppression, they are historically (as the documentary proves) the biggest haters and mass murderers in all of history. Sadly, they lead the fight against modern day “racism.”

Asiatic Mongrel (notably of Jewish and Mongolian descent) and Mass Murderer of ten million white people Vladimir Lenin speaks on the cancer that is Anti-semitism

But what is racism? In A Conversation About Race, Craig Bodeker attempts to ask your typical American genius citizen what racism really is. Naturally, Bodeker cannot find an individual that gives a straight definition or example of it. Although the promoters of “anti-racism” will tell you that “race” is an “artificial construct (talk about irrationality),” they believe race (something that apparently doesn’t exist) problems are the major issue poisoning the world today. In A Conversation About Race we find out that the only “artificial construct” is the word “racism.” Like the most irrational and pathetic of religious dogma, believing in the evils of racism is a faith based system. Neurotic school teachers use fear to indoctrinate children at an early age the “evils” of racism so that it sticks in their mind forever. The very thought of “racism” has now become an emotional response that defies rationality and intellectual activity.

Thanks to the weak and spoiled baby boomers of the 1960s, liberalism and multiculturalism have created a country that is committing suicide. Forgot about learning to read or studying real history, students only need to know that racism is really bad stuff. Forget about white heritage and history, it was all evil and fascist. Whites don’t deserve a culture, the poor exploited races that don’t actually exist do! Funny, I thought that Europeans were the group of people historically that have individualist as opposed to collectivist societies thus being less ethnocentric. And isn’t it the international Jewish race that is clannish and the most ethnocentric of all? Aren’t blacks, Latinos, Asiatics, and other minority group collectivist societies that love to bring their Diasporas to America and deny assimilation? Isn’t it whites that aren’t allowed to have a culture? Wait, my bad, we have NASCAR and the young whore Miley Cyrus. Stupid whites, due to their individualism, bought into “anti-racism” because they are individualists who want to prove they can make it on their own and help the poor minority in the process. It has only cost them control of America and even Europe. I guess all that Holocaust business went to their heads. Maybe they should care about the 50 million or so of their own people that died in World War II instead of a small (but powerful) minority of people that are hostile to them.

A Conversation About Race is probably a controversial documentary for those emotionally impulsive liberal types. The documentary uses rationality and common sense to get its point across instead of typical liberal sentimentalism so typical of Hollywood race pictures. Maybe documentaries like A Conversation About Race are a slow start to a white awakening that minorities don’t care about whites and believe they are owed something. For racial population changes in America, whites are going to be forced into a collectivist type of culture if they hope to survive. But with wiggers, philo-Semitic intellectuals, and increasing mongrelization, it is going to be a rough road ahead.

A CONVERSATION ABOUT RACE

-Ty E

A FEW SCREWS LOOSE

Craig J McIntyre (2008) The only thing I expected from this film upon my dramatic and timely arrival was beautiful women, and damn did it impress on that plane. I went into this film with absolutely zero expectations and still came out completely empty-handed except for a few, and I mean few, memorable scenes. The film has no cohesive storyline. It would rather shove explicit violence in your face, traced lightly with gorgeous nudity of the female form and the once-seen prosthetic penis, moments before it is laughably castrated. The film opens with what may be the most amazing scene in low-budget horror ever. A huge, hulking Negro wielding a machete busts in on a porn shoot and begins to hack and slash his way through to his daughter who is about to be a star of a porno. The greatest thing about the film ironically also adopts the greatest death effect. After he is exterminated by a pathetic actor in a senior citizen mask, this "killer" becomes a serial murderer to film snuff films (which we don't find out about until the end.) This film has many flaws. I will begin to illustrate them in your mind with my vicious metaphors. The film's running time is the biggest overkill. Was this an editing mistake or what? (Screen capped by accident) This film happens to be longer than a Nick Swardson stand up, but without the entertainment. Much of this film is a vague attempt at an experimental filming style, edited with horrible color bars and remixing much of the clips. Most of the run time is entirely unnecessary and would rather make a better short film. In fact, what better to do with a horrendously long length than fill it with amateurish gore. Yes, this is fake. When I say amateur, I don't mean cheapie intestine pulling, I mean paper-mache heads getting crushed in and obvious dummies getting ravaged with weapons. But with every flaw, a single beautiful nude woman appears, and for this, I cannot thank Craig McIntyre enough for replacing this trite film making with nude hotties. Please love me... Honestly, the women that compliment this film assisted in helping me finish this film. It's not entirely as bad as I exclaim it to be. Remember, I'm a jaded cynic. In fact, a lot of our readers might even enjoy it, but I need something more than a ridiculous storyline and gore to please me. Here is an abridged version of the script for our readers.

INT. RANCID APARTMENT CAMERA GUY: Hey, I'm filming an amateur porn film. Excuse me while I belittle this "African-American LOL" by constantly calling her a slut and whore while the audience gets entirely solid misogynist vibes. ACTOR: FUCK! A giant colored gentleman just broke down the door and is hacking up my co-star while I sit here and cower like the lesser race that I am. It sucks being white. ACTOR's paper arm is then amputated pathetically with a machete. CAMERA GUY dons a mask and magically morphs into a serial killer and kills EVERYONE except the armless guy. They then form a TEAM in killing and exploiting women. EXT. SOME FUCKING CITY RANDOM MALE: RAHHH, My unapparent porn-star girlfriend was murdered unbeknownst to my knowledge, but I will train in a horrible montage to exact revenge upon a woman I have no idea is dead and the killers whose identity is unknown. Uneventful events then happen. Fin

A FEW SCREWS LOOSE

The film owes a great debt to various porn-gone-wrong films such as the recent Amateur Porn Star Killer, A Hole in my Heart, and the obscure Psycho: The Snuff Reels (Niku Daruma.) The gore effects range from horrible to effective. Basically, you're settling for a grab bag of random violence coated lightly with T n' A, which can be a reasonable sacrifice. Does this excite you? Good, you'll see lots of these in alternating colors. The film making style heavily reminds me of the style Bam Margera used for his moderately successful film Haggard. While I respect Haggard a bit more, it boils down to the same annoying formula as Jackass with a story would have been. The same mistake that most low-budget horror films make has been exploited to full effect in A Few Screws Loose. Rule 1 of Low Budget Horror: Never, and I mean NEVER... put Grindcore or any type of metal on your soundtrack. Not only will it completely destroy any sort of tension and emotion that your film may have carried, but it will also make you seem inept at picking up a keyboard and generating your own effective soundtrack & score. A Few Screws Loose is a film I can't recommend at all. I love the women in the film. In fact, they generate a Russ Meyer-ish mood to enjoy while pretending the rest of the film didn't happen. I can see Craig engineering a new film that doesn't have so many flaws. In fact, I recommend that he take the enjoyable aspects from this film and create new life. He should take the Negro killer and make a blaxploitation horror film out of him. That would be perfect.

-mAQ

PERKINS' 14

Craig Singer (2009)

Perkins' 14 happens to be an enriched film experience by comparison and probably one of the few "good" After Dark Horrorfest films in existence. The plot revolves around a balding and intimidating police officer whose son was kidnapped 10 years before and the present day marks the decade anniversary. If you know anything about generic horror or horror in general (See what I did there?), you'd know that anniversaries never go peacefully and there's always something shady around the corner. His quiet and discomfoting day goes by rather dreary until he makes a connection between the abduction of his son with a mysterious man who was arrested for speeding earlier in the day. The film causally jumps from suspense thriller to pseudo-science zombie/beast horror and I've never really encountered such an awkward and engaging hybrid as this before. It almost reminds me of Fear X, a film that damn near ravaged my emotions. Since I've seen Martyrs very recently, I couldn't help but make comparisons to confined slavery and the inevitable deconstruction of humanity to the glorious effects of sensory deprivation. For the sake of a rather straightforward horror film, the underlying erotic themes have been removed and replaced with a higher body count. Perkins' 14 includes a master plan that plays out like one of the future installments of the Saw franchise. Think about it this way, Saw really has nowhere else to go but revisiting characters but even then the fan base will dwindle. So why not include drug-fueled zombie manchildren? To aid the effect of Perkins' 14, a rather delicious "punk" daughter is introduced to the mix and as noted in the recent review of 2008's The Children, these trendy girls only deliver eye candy while the tension builds up rather well. To put it blatantly, I enjoy staring at beautiful girls while I witness police officers getting disemboweled. These two fine points of the American dream just go hand in hand, I guess. I digress this very same reality that allows low budget horror to take place. I favor a certain charming low budget horror but not the over-produced trite that plays into our DVD shelves with promises of splatter and nudity. While these both are shining portraits of contemporary horror, I find a film with an emotional response to be a better way to "waste time" rather than watching subhuman looking females taking off their shirts revealing subnormal breasts only to get decapitated rather shoddily resulting in some half-painted prop head bouncing on the ground. Perkins' 14 did promise splatter to a degree but also made due with its riveting plot that was constantly shifting faces never allowing you to get bored. Expect an amendable level of violence, intrigue, and social discussion after viewing this film. It's not anywhere close to being an excellent film but it does uphold a contract to please, entertain, and amuse you with a level of seriousness that couldn't be that serious after revealing the plot in depth. Perkins' 14 is probably the most enjoyable film out of the third After Dark Horrorfest roster and the most visually engaging, especially after admiring the modern exploitation cover art that's handsomely illustrated. PCP fuels a personalized army of unstoppable psycho's to kill for Mr. Perkins after he snaps thanks to a neurotic paranoia. This effort is sustained through promotional tag lines as being lamented as the first film to be produced over the internet. This isn't as exciting as it sounds and certainly doesn't usher in a new era of film making. That, and this film's climax boils down to a disappointing rip-off of Assault on Precinct 13.

PERKINS' 14

-mAQ

WHAT IS IT?

Crispin Glover (2005)

With every great film comes controversy; Citizen Kane, The Golden Compass, and The Da Vinci Code are all examples of films in recent memory that have been plagued with bad press. Crispin Hellion Glover's new film "What is it?" might be the most taboo breaking film to be seen yet. The plot is a bit wayward but makes up for it with its striking imagery and atmosphere.

The plot seems to be about a young boy who has an everlasting interest in finding snails while being tricked by a malicious god. The entire leading cast is formed by people who have down syndrome which plays a lot regarding the controversy. Blackface, down syndrome nudity, Shirley Temple pornography, and Charlie Manson leading the soundtrack are all examples of this film's roots and where they lie.

The surrealism that leads this film is entirely creative and striking. Crispin Glover has a supporting role of playing a Demi-God Auteur, which might be one of the weirdest characters portrayed, he demands all the creatures to be resilient to him. He seems to be the God in the plane of existence. You basically are watching a power struggle in the young boy's mind between dueling Gods. Glover's ideas have finally been brought to life with an amazing background to the story. His use of generalized evil in such ways that can only be deemed audacious is appropriate. Of course, the viewing of this film is partial without Glover's Q & A, book showings, and his enigmatic charisma.

This film is the first in a trilogy that is currently being planned. The second is titled "It is fine, everything is fine!" and the third "It is mine." These films according to Glover will never see a video release so he can preserve the road show feel. The set designs in this film are epic to say the least. His campaigning for this film has been controversial, due to a young Shirley Temple being portrayed as an SS officer committing heinous acts with a bull whip.

Many scenes stick out incredibly. For example, a crimson mounted room with a low fog that lies home to Monkey women, A glistening clam lies home to a Cerebral Palsy victim, and macabre puppet shows filled with some philosophies of either a madman or a genius decorate the runtime. Once you watch this film, you will never forget it. That is, If you are lucky enough to catch this film on tour. What Is It? is a cerebral force that invades your mind with its whistles and screams. A haunting shadow on the surrealist acclaim and a formidable viewing experience that is unrivaled and incomparable.

-Maq

LUNCH
LUNCH

Curt McDowell (1972)

While it is something that would probably offend and/or disturb most honest heterosexual men to hear, it has been my experience as a debauched cinephile that 'will try any film' that homos tended to be some of the greatest and most artistically blessed directors of straight porn flicks, at least during the 'porn chic' era when pornographers still sometimes pretended that there was some sort of genuine artistic merit to filming people sucking and fucking. Indeed, the Amero brothers (Bacchanale, Every Inch a Lady), Chuck Vincent (Visions, Roommates), Zebedy Colt (The Devil Inside Her, Virgin Dreams), Zachary Strong (Confessions of a Teenage Peanut Butter Freak, Visions of Clair), Michael Zen (Reflections, The Filthy Rich: A 24 K-Dirty Movie), and even a chick-with-a-dick like Kim Christy (Dream Lovers, Squalor Motel) are just some of the pussy-intolerant queer pornographers that created distinct auteurist works that have, in one way or another, stood the test of time, but none of these filmmakers made films as quite as bizarre as eccentric erotomaniac Curt McDowell (Boggy Depot, Taboo: The Single and the LP). Best remembered today for his truly epic pornographic horror-comedy-melodrama hybrid Thundercrack! (1975) that was penned by his somewhat more famous teacher/lover/friend George Kuchar, McDowell was an Indiana-born Midwestern boy from a fairly traditional hardworking white working-class family that "ate a lot," yet he developed an obsession with all-things-sex at an early age that involved jerking off with his male cousins as a 13-year-old and both sucking the cocks of men and eating the pussies of women of all ages by the time he was 16, or so he describes in his quite literately titled short Confessions (1972). Of course, when McDowell relocated to the gay capital of the world to study painting at the San Francisco Art Institute, he became a full-fledged and unrepentant unhinged shit-stabbing libertine of sorts and in the process discovered that his calling in life was to become an experimental pornographer of sorts, with his butt buddy Kuchar luckily teaching him a couple important things in the process. Not surprisingly considering the super sleazy sod material of most of his most (in)famous cinematic works like Loads (1985), McDowell's most monetarily successful film was actually a heterosexual fuck flick. Fairly restrained compared to a lot of his work in that it thankfully does not feature ugly and swarthy tattooed deadbeat dipsomaniac scumbags jerking off in dilapidated apartments, McDowell's 71-minute heterosexual hardcore flick Lunch (1972) features a sort of intriguing disharmonious aesthetic marriage between porn chic and the NYC avant-garde underground. Seemingly just as much influenced by the Structural films of Stephen Dwoskin (Dyn Amo, Central Bazaar) and insufferably static pre-Morrissey works of Andy Warhol (Sleep, Vinyl) as the hit hardcore flicks of that time like Gerard Damiano's Deep Throat (1972), McDowell's film's title is inspired by its prominence of oral sex and was advertised with the tagline, “Treat yourself to LUNCH if you’re hungry for a man’s kind of movie that’s raw, rough and uncompromising—made to satisfy a man’s voracious appetite! Go to LUNCH.” Indeed, while the film might be the odd one out in McDowell’s oeuvre in terms of its success and strong emphasis on heterosexuality, it certainly wallows in the sort of humor-tinged fiercely fetishistic and allegorically raunchy degeneracy that the auteur is best known for.

As a man that both played the virile lead role and assembled the fairly notable proto-industrial soundtrack, Mark Ellinger was responsible for a good portion of the film’s ‘potency’ and was even given an ‘assistant’ credit due to his crucial cum-heavy contribution to Lunch. Despite being rampantly heterosexual, Ellinger was a good friend of McDowell and apparently had no problems with not only being directed during his most intimate moments by a homo, but also sucking a cock as briefly featured in the film. Indeed, judging by the film’s emphasis on close-ups of Ellinger’s purple-headed custard chucker and somewhat shockingly explosive ejaculations, one almost gets the sense that McDowell directed the film solely so that he could spend countless hours staring at his pal’s pork sword and fairly explosive ejaculations (notably, according to George Kuchar, McDowell eventually got bored with directing his semi-autobiographical feature Sparkle’s Tavern (1985) because the film did not feature any pornographic scenes). In Lunch, Ellinger plays the seemingly realistic role of a San Francisco bohemian deadbeat named Dave Power who does not have a job and instead merely spends all of his time sitting around his apartment and fantasizing about less than gorgeous gals he knows, not least of all his curiously blowjob-obsessed lesbian landlord Gloria (played by pseudonymous ‘actress’ Velvet Busch). Plagued with a sub-homely and equally annoying live-in girlfriend that looks somewhat like a partially decayed corpse and who the protagonist would rather tease and insult then fuck, Dave is a man of few words who lives totally ‘inward’ and is a debauched dreamer of the day who probably resents the nights when he has to sexually service his sickly-looking sugar-momma. Indeed, while Lunch might be a heterosexual hardcore film, its subtly scathing critique of straight relationships are from the mind of a gay man who seems to have intentionally cast mostly unattractive women. Surely something is not quite right about a fuck flick when the most attractive woman is almost a midget with a raspy voice.

At the very beginning of Lunch after a fairly aesthetically pleasing pop-art credit sequence juxtaposed with experimental electronic music composed by Ellinger, the viewer watches protagonist Dave as he obsessively stares at a piece of she-meat across the street from the relative comfort of his S.F. apartment window. In the next scene, we see Dave outside approaching the young gal he was just drooling at and it does not take long before he is playing with the little lady’s meat curtain. In an extreme close-up shot, Dave is depicted slowly but passionately dining on the dame’s naughty bits in a fashion that makes it seem as if her bushy beaver is an extension of his leather-fag-esque beard (indeed, virtually all of the male character's have scruffy facial hair). After warming her up with a little oral action, Dave inserts his loaded gun inside the girl and demands that she make "no noise" while he sexually services her. After beginning pounding her puss from behind, Dave eventually groans to the girl "Where do you want it?" and she replies, "Don't cum in me, you bastard," so the protagonist merely out his prick, thereupon causing a fairly climatic explosion that begins as soon as his cock exits her vagina that ultimately leaves a remarkable amount of baby batter on the young lady's back. Not long after Dave ejaculates, the scene is revealed to be a daydream when the protagonist's uniquely unattractive girlfriend abruptly arrives at the apartment and asks him if he gave the landlord Gloria the rent money. After his girlfriend seems to gross him out by asking him, "How's your weenie?" as if she is beginning him to fuck her, Dave opts to pay the rent in the best and most pleasurable way he knows how.

LUNCH

When Gloria shows up Dave's apartment and bitchily asks him in regard to the rent money, "you haven't got it, right?" the protagonist does not reply and instead proceeds to get some coffee. Things get awkward for Gloria for a moment when she looks around Dave's apartment and notices strange vintage family portraits and paintings hanging on the walls that are surely a nod to the filmmaker's Midwestern background. Eventually, Dave asks Gloria, "Should I...pay in the usual way?" and then the film cuts to a shot of the protagonist unzipping his landlord's glittery dark blue pants while she lies on his kitchen table. As the viewer has surely predicted at this point, Dave is paying for the rent with his prick, though he warms up his landlord up by fondling her tits and fingering her clit while digging inside her snatch in an extreme close-up shot sequence that resembles a sort of DIY hippie gynecological exam. Of course, this entire scenario is just another one of Dave's extravagant fantasies, as the film soon cuts back to the protagonist teasing his girlfriend by attempting to grab her fairly flat derriere. At this point, Dave's gossipy girlfriend declares, "Guess who I saw at the Safeway?" and then states, "I saw that Neanderthal human Jody Baker. He was with that black chick you used to date." Not unlike Dave, Jody likes to do a lot of daydreaming, but unlike the protagonist he prefers to be on the receiving end of oral sex.

Jody Baker (Rick Mackota) is a perverted housepainter with a seemingly low IQ that looks sort of like a more gawky and neurotic version of Dave and he gets off to writing fairly brief perverted letters to people and leaving them under their door. Indeed, Jody seems to think that if he gives people raunchy accusatory letters containing his name and phone number, he will receive a blowjob from them. While taking a shit on the toilet and reading a comic while he still has dried paint and dirt all over his arms and hands, Jody receives a phonecall from a negress named Carol who Dave apparently used to bang. Without wiping his ass or pulling up his pants, Dave answers the phone by asking "Gloria?" in the hope that it is his lecherous landlord, but he is somewhat startled when the black broad replies, "Gloria?! This is Carol." After finally remembering who Carol is, Jody begins playing with his rather limp love truncheon while continuing to talk on the phone like a little toddler about banal bullshit. From there, the film cuts to a scene of a totally naked Jody meekly crawling to an equally unclad Carol as she lies in bed. It does not take long before Carol is giving Jody head, with the painter's grotesque zit-covered ass taking up most of the frame. While the colored chick dines on his dick, Jody makes sure to warn her, "Don't bite it" as if he thinks she is wild beastess. After the less than sexy oral pleasure dissipates, Jody screws the extra hungry ebony spade and at the end he ejaculates on her steelwool-like bush. Of course, like with protagonist Dave, Jody's sexual encounter with Carol is eventually revealed to be nothing more than a mere fantasy. Indeed, at the end of the scene, Carol reveals her sexual disinterest in Jody by abruptly telling him that she has "got to go" and then hanging up the phone.

Since his girlfriend seems good at nothing but bitching and complaining, it comes as no surprise to the viewer when she states to the protagonist, "Dave, one of us has to get a job," to which he apathetically replies, "I know." Meanwhile, landlord Gloria discovers a letter under her door that reads "Gloria, I hear you like to suck dick" that was signed by Jody and includes his phone number, which certainly arouses the landlord as she proceeds to fondle and lick her titties while thinking about the lowly painter repeating to her what he had written in the letter. Indeed, Gloria eventually imagines Jody appearing to her in real-life and firmly stating, "Gloria, I hear you like to suck dick." Naturally, it does not take long before Jody's Johnson is in Gloria's oral orifice. In fact, Gloria is so obsessed with sucking cock that she does not even bother disrobe aside from leaving her tits outside her shirt so that Jody can rub his member and eventually cum on them. After Jody disappears, a somewhat repugnant looking middle-aged creep arrives at Gloria's apartment, begins sucking on the landlord's nipples, and then demands that she, "Suck it! Suck it!," which she wastes no time doing. While hearing various male voices in her head shouting, "I hear you like to suck dick," Gloria then imagines herself sucking the cocks of various less than handsome men. In a bizarre twist, Gloria's cocksucking fantasies are temporarily interrupted when her lesbian lover (?!) randomly shows up, asks her, "Hi, baby. What's you been up to?," and then proceeds to lick her nipples. Indeed, as her sapphic sister begins a little foreplay with her, Gloria imagines a biker-like guy showing up at her apartment while she is lying in bed while sporting nothing but underwear and sunglasses and demanding that she, "Suck it! Suck it," which she immediately does with the utmost unfettered passion. Somewhat curiously, when Gloria's girlfriend forces her to perform cunnilingus on her by sitting on her face, the landlord fantasies about sucking the biker's cock. Undoubtedly it seems that, not unlike a lot of lipstick lesbians, Gloria is a seriously sexually confused chick.

LUNCH

In a hilarious shot that is not atypical of auteur McDowell's perversely preternatural sense of humor, the viewer witnesses that Jody has dozens upon dozens of notes hanging on a door his apartment to remind him to "write" various women. Meanwhile, an abnormally petite girl that could not be taller than 4-foot-6 asks Dave with a surprisingly raspy smoker voice, "Do you want to eat my pussy? I said, do you want to eat me pussy? Well, do you or don't you?," so the protagonist effortlessly picks her up while she simultaneously lifts her skirt for him and then puts her on a table so that it will be easier for a tall man like him to screw such a tiny broad. After Dave chows on her snatch for a little bit, the girl begins sucking the protagonist's whore-pipe in a scene that is fairly funny in that the truly little lady is so blatantly short that she does not need to bend down or get on her knees to give him a blowjob because her face is parallel to his prick when the two are standing face to face. When the girl end up on the table again and demands like a petulant child, "Fuck me! Come on, I said fuck me!," Dave naturally proceeds to stab her in her spasm chasm with his erect ramrod. While the little girl almost seems to be in pain during the plow session, she demands that Dave, "Push it deep," so he does. Right before he is about to climax, Dave whips out his pink steel and manages to ejaculate so far that his semen flies across the room and hits the girl in a face in a startling explosive 'money shot' scene that even puts notable professional ejaculators like Peter North to shame.

While the final cumshot scene is fairly startling, it does not compare to the shock of the penultimate scene of the film where the protagonist receives a letter from Jody reading, "Dave, Hear you like to suck dick. Call me," which is followed by a brief homoerotic clip shot of the protagonist sucking the perverted painter's cock. Indeed, it seems that auteur McDowell was somehow able to coerce his pal Ellinger to become gay-for-pay (though I seriously doubt that the actor was actually paid for being in the film). Naturally, Dave is repulsed and crumbles up Jody's letter. Meanwhile, landlady Gloria does the same with her letter from Jody after her lesbo lover asks "What's the note" and she replies, "Oh, some piece of bullshit," so as not to let her girlfriend get the suspicion that she is obsessed with smoking poles. Somewhat humorously, when Dave's girlfriend asks him, "Do you love me?," he less than passionately replies "Yeah, cutie" and then causes her to shriek and jump backwards by pulling on her nipple. In the end, the protagonist's girlfriend asks him if he would like to eat breakfast or lunch and he replies "lunch" and then smiles in a knowing fashion that is not unlike the conclusion of Wakefield Poole's experimental homo hardcore classic Bijou (1972).

After working on Lunch, star Mark Ellinger went on to star in and compose music for a number of his poof pal McDowell's subsequent films. In fact, Ellinger not only starred in and scored McDowell's magnum opus Thundercrack!, but he was also credited with coming up with the film's original storyline. Aside from working with McDowell, Ellinger also worked as a recording engineer, sound designer, electronics technician, and composer on works by George Kuchar, Larry Jordan, the Mitchell Brothers, and a couple other filmmakers, including providing sound editing to the classic porn chic era costume piece The Autobiography Of A Flea (1976) directed by Sharon McNight. Additionally, he composed the score for Jordan's animated avant-garde cinematic opium dream Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1977), which is notable for featuring Orson Welles reading the words of English poet Samuel Taylor Coleridge to images by Gustave Doré. Outside of film, Ellinger accomplished many things in the musical world, including writing a musical setting for Fragments from the World of Henri LeCroix by Pulitzer nominee Cyrus Cassells, who he performed with in the Bay Area in 1984. Not surprisingly, like many people that were involved with the San Francisco counterculture zeitgeist, the musician eventually entered a very dark period in his life that involved heroin addiction, homelessness, and a near-death experience when his blood became poisoned by a deep-tissue bacterial infection of Necrotizing Fasciitis on Thanksgiving Day 2000. Nowadays, Ellinger is apparently clean and operates a fairly popular blog entitled Up From The Deep where he documents the history of San Francisco buildings and architecture via writings and photographs.

In terms of sheer atmosphere, Lunch is a shockingly powerful art-porn piece that manages to make San Francisco seem even more sleazy and grimy than exploitation auteur Nick Millard's classic piece of celluloid trash Criminally Insane (1975). While the film might be the least 'McDowellian' of the works associated with the filmmaker's oeuvre, it led the way for his most distinguished work. Indeed, the royalties that were made from Lunch were apparently what inspired McDowell to make Thundercrack!, or as George Kuchar revealed in an interview featured in the book Desperate Visions: The Films of John Waters & the Kuchar Brothers (1996) by Jack Stevenson, "I guess Curt asked me to write a screenplay of THUNDERCRACK!. I labeled it THUNDERCRACK!. He wanted me to do a sex picture – all kinds of mixed sex in it. And, I wrote it, and he wanted to make it because he made a lot of money on another film called LUNCH, that he starred his friend in, Mark Ellinger, who later did the soundtrack for THUNDERCRACK!. I remember I just saw one shot of LUNCH, and it was Ellinger ejaculating, and he squirted clear across the room...almost practically missing the head of the girl who was lying down who name was Wendy [...] Those students used to make sex pictures, because in those days it was fashionable to show your chakra. So, those were the '70s." Of course, not unlike S&M sod auteur Fred Halsted's sexually eclectic pan-sexual experiment Sextool (1975), Thundercrack! was somewhat of a commercial failure because it was just too damn strange, artsy fartsy, and unsexy to appeal to the fairly simple sensual sensibilities of the raincoat crowd.

Ultimately, Lunch features a sort of semi-cryptic anti-monogamy message hidden beneath its mostly sexually static surface. Indeed, in its depiction of various characters fantasizing about fucking other people while in the company of their significant lover, including a carpet-muncher daydreaming about sucking cock while licking her lover's lily, the film depicts monogamy as a sad absurdity and metaphysical prison the leads to people sitting around their apartments all day while looking all moody and broody and dreaming of a more sexually satisfying life that they will never have. Of course, director McDowell suffered from a serious case of satyriasis, which ultimately led to his premature death in 1987 at the age of 42 after contracting AIDS, so he might not be the most objective person when it came to critiquing the sexual and romance habits of heterosexuals, or as his pal Kuchar once famously stated about him, "Curt was curt, cute, controversial, and not celibate. He was a barrel of laughs and a roller coaster ride to hell and back. Life for him was a fast track to fast times that included devilish detours into forbidden erogenous zones." For totally personal reasons known to myself and one other person, I especially liked the fact the film featured a chick that had a pathological obsession with blowjobs, though I certainly could have probably done without the brief clip of hetero Ellinger giving a guy head, but I guess that is what one should expect from a film directed by a sexually nihilistic carnal clown like McDowell, whose personal calling in life seemed to be jovially raping and destroying all sexual taboos while wearing a smile on his face.

LUNCH

-Ty E

LOADS

Curt McDowell^o (1985)

A couple months ago, I went to a closing sale for Baltimore's greatest video rental chain in the hope that I would be able to purchase some rare gems at a discounted price. The owner of this now defunct video chain is a rather goofy and borderline obese Hebrew with a perfectly circular bald-spot on the back of his head who I once overheard discussing to one of his equally bloated kosher comrades about how the Jewish diamond industry is just as sketchy as the film industry, which I certainly do not doubt. Anyway, during the closing sale, I managed to find a VHS compilation tape entitled Loads of McDowell featuring the eponymous short Loads (1980) and a couple other short films directed by American underground queer auteur Curtis McDowell, who is undoubtedly best known for his campy and semi-pornographic epic "old dark house" horror parody Thundercrack! (1975). Assuming the video would be only a couple dollars or so, I eagerly approached the Judaic proprietor of the business and asked him how much it cost, only to discover that the shameless penny-pincher wanted $70 for the single VHS tape (!), with his absurd reasoning being that it is out-of-print and he could not find a single copy of the film online for sale, so it must be worth a lot of money. Needless to say, I rejected the old miser's offer and told him that I would go download the film somewhere online that same day, which I did. Indeed, if not solely for novelty reasons, I had to see a film with the proudly sleazy title 'Loads' and, to my surprise, the wantonly titled work was even more decidedly depraved and debasing than I suspected it would be. While I was expecting loads and loads of tasteless campiness as is typical of auteur McDowell's oeuvre, the short turned out to be about 19 minutes of camp-free unhinged faggotry of the scum-and-cum-lathered sort where the colon-choking director sucks off a couple swarthy and ugly short men of the ostensibly heterosexual sort and describes in disgustingly degenerate detail about his sick love for straight men. Shot on scratched 16mm black-and-white film stock in a mostly dilapidated apartment that looks condemned and starring a couple longhaired and tastelessly tattooed losers who look like they just were released from the drunk tank of an urban Irish-American ghetto, Loads is certainly full-blown pornography, but due to its overwhelming aesthetic odiousness and amateurish home-movie-style, McDowell somehow managed to sell it as cinematic art to art fags and gay rights activists. Apparently inspired by former Miss Oklahoma and Florida Citrus Commission spokesman Anita Bryant's moral crusade against cum-guzzling (which she depicted as something akin to vampiric cannibalism), Loads is more or less a micro-movie manifesto-cum-diary that makes it quite clear why director-narrator-star-agitator McDowell died of AIDS in 1987.

As Indiana-bred bum bandit McDowell describes via narration at the beginning of Loads, he met his first heterosexual victim—a bodybuilder with a small stature—at a bath house and since “there weren’t very many women to go around,” the straight muscleman eventually settled for “second best” and went home with the hyper horny homo director of the film. Of course, McDowell did not mind being the man’s second choice as he gets really “turned on by straight men” and eagerly paid the less than buff Bodybuilder to spill his straight seeds onto some vintage porno magazines featuring bodacious babes with big boobs and even bigger bushes. To the delight of the terribly debauched director, the Bodybuilder started a “chain reaction” in regard to eager gay-for-pay rednecks, as various heterosexual hicks of the swarthy and seemingly racially mongrelized sort became enticed by the prospect of being paid to do hand-to-gland combat for an exceedingly effete Midwestern mud-packer. Needless to say, some of the prole pole-strokers were somewhat baffled by McDowell’s fetishistic requests, or as the director explains, one of the men “didn’t understand why I wanted to film him peeing...especially laying underneath his legs.” Probably the dumbest of all the pseudo-hetero hillbillies is a guy who hooked up with McDowell solely because he wanted the countless trashy tattoos covering his stocky and hairy body immortalized on film. When McDowell got “bored or daring” he sucked off a guy that he describes as being like “a crude little monster of a boy” at a semen-soaked porno theater. As one can expect from a film directed by an exceedingly eager inspector of manholes, Loads concludes with a climatic collage of climaxing cocks, with McDowell having loads upon loads unloaded on his face, including his conspicuously gay leather-fag-like mustache. Indeed, if you ever wondered why homos have a thing for mustaches, McDowell’s spermurper-themed short has the rather appalling answer.

LOADS

Featuring director McDowell performing what some pretentious gay studies professor might describe as “avant-garde anilingus” on a man whose gooseberry grinder is more furry than the armpit of a middle-aged Mexican barmaid, Loads is certainly less artistically inclined than the works of auteur pornographers like Fred Halsted and Jack Deveau and thus does not seem particularly groundbreaking, especially where artsy fartsy queer blue movies are concerned. Indeed, whereas Halsted was a bone-braking and ass-fisting alpha, McDowell was, as his lo-fi homo home-videos demonstrate, a passive ‘power bottom’ who literally had to pay to play when it came to finding performers. Undoubtedly, compared to the director’s campy cocksucker horror-comedy epic Thundercrack!, Loads seems more like a plodding premature ejaculation, even if it is probably McDowell’s most personal, incriminating, and visceral work (indeed, how many other filmmakers have filmed themselves slurping up the less than sanitary spratz of countless dirtbag dudes who look like they could be bastard son of Charles Manson?!). Considering she felt one of the longhaired gay-for-pay heteros bared a striking resemblance to her own father, my girlfriend (indeed, she and I are probably the only couple in the entire world that watches vintage gay/lesbian porn together) found Loads to be a rather revolting experience, though that did not stop her from laughing at McDowell's obsessive, if not poorly articulated, anecdotes regarding his commitment to turning bad boys into joy boys. Of course, McDowell's short does feature some scenes of accidental comic relief, as demonstrated by narrated remarks from the director like, "Then there was the one who was really uncommunicative. I directed him to say "suck it." He said "suck it" so realistically that I sucked it with gusto" and "It's such a beautiful, thick ass. I would have loved to have stuck my dick in there." Concluding with McDowell saying, "fuck his ass" in a rather animalistic fashion and a man moaning as a result of an orgasm after assumedly being savagely skull-bugged by McDowell, Loads is ultimately poor celluloid poetry in its most unsophisticated form as a sort of American proletarian equivalent to Jean Genet's avant-garde short A Song of Love (1950) aka Un chant d'amour, thereupon most likely only being of interest to old school porn addicts, underground film fanatics, and those majorly masochistic individuals who wallow in asinine aberrosexual aesthetic torture. With its pornographic depiction of a group of mostly short, swarthy, and ugly men who would probably repulse 99.9% of heterosexual women and gay men, Loads ultimately proves that, if nothing else, McDowell was certainly right about one thing when once remarked, "No one is a sex object, but anyone can be a sex subject."

-Ty E

THE SUMMER HOUSE
THE SUMMER HOUSE

Curtis Burz (2014)

Ever since at least the period when Rainer Werner Fassbinder and various other auteur filmmakers of New German Cinema started dominating the international arthouse realm during the late-1960s and early-1970s, the Teutons have been the foremost producers of the darkest, most morbid, and even grotesque (melo)dramas in the world, which is certainly no surprise considering the nation's singularly horrendous recent history, which included the country being literally completely reduced to rubble as depicted in Roberto Rossellini's Germany Year Zero (1948) and losing about seven million people as a result of the Second World War, not to mention the incessant guilt-tripping its citizenry has been brainwashed with by the Allied Powers since then, which Hollywood has shown no sign of stopping as indicated by somewhat recent redundantly Teutonophobic films ranging from Paolo Sorrentino's sad pseudo-arthouse joke This Must Be the Place (2011) to David Ayer's mythmaking piece of preposterous patriotard celluloid idiocy Fury (2014). Indeed, even with the death of Fassbinder in 1982 and, in turn, New German Cinema and German cinema in general, the krauts still have managed to produce some of the most perturbing and dejecting dramas around the world as demonstrated by not only arthouse works like Fred Kelemen's Frost (1997), Oskar Roehler's Die Unberührbare (2000) aka No Place to Go, Kai S. Pieck's Ein Leben lang kurze Hosen tragen (2002) aka The Child I Never Was, Matthias Glasner's radical 'rape epic' Der Freie Wille (2006) aka The Free Will, Hans W. Geissendörfer's Schneeland (2005) aka Snowland, Michael Haneke's German-Austrian-French-Italian (anti)Heimat flick Das weiße Band - Eine deutsche Kindergeschichte (2009) aka The White Ribbon, and Katrin Gebbe's Tore tanzt (2013) aka Nothing Bad Can Happen but also big mainstream productions like Florian Henckel von Donnersmarck's Das Leben der Anderen (2006) aka The Lives of Others, Max Färberböck's Anonyma - Eine Frau in Berlin (2008) aka A Woman in Berlin, and David Wnendt's scatological coming-of-age tragicomedy Feuchtgebiete (2013) aka Wetlands, among countless other examples that demonstrate that the flames of the Dresden and Hamburg firebombings still burn deep in the German collective unconscious. Indeed, it seems that even despite the overall sorry state of contemporary Teutonic cinema—be it arthouse or otherwise—there is always some aberrant Aryan that feels the undying need to bleed their forlorn soul onto the silver screen, even if they have little to no resources to work with. While Romanian by blood and birth, Berlin-based auteur Curtis Burz (Gib mir noch ein Jahr aka Give Me Another Year, Nora) has certainly followed in the Teutonic tradition of distinctly disturbing dramas that send the viewer into a taboo realm where they probably do not want to go, especially in regarding to his latest feature Das Sommerhaus (2014) aka The Summer House, which depicts interfamilial sexuality in a way that even puts Fassbinder to shame in terms of figuratively setting the bourgeois home on fire. The film is a sort of minimalistic arthouse melodrama with elements of the suspense-thriller sub-genre and tells the rather revolting yet nonetheless engulfing story of a fairly wealthy family man of the crypto-homo sort who begins falling in love with his friend's preteen son, only for said preteen son to decide to blackmail the latent pederast to save his father from bankruptcy. Naturally, the family man has a sexually repressed wife which, in turn, has a negative effect on their preteen daughter. Overall, The Summer House is one fiercely fucked yet strangely dignified filmic family affair that demonstrates that you can create a groundbreaking arthouse work for the price of a cheap weekend vacation.

One particularly intriguing aspect of The Summer House is that it was directed by a professional psychologist who merely makes films in his free time (though he did study acting and directing at the Bremen Theatre Institute). Naturally, Burz's experiences with patients informed his mental 'script.' Indeed, another interesting aspect of the auteur is that he managed to shoot the 100-minute feature on a almost nonexistent budget of 700 Euro without even completing a full script (the actors were only given a general synopsis and a general storyline to work with), yet The Summer House hardly resembles some sort of pretentious third rate Dogme 95 junk, even if it was shot on digital video. Ultimately, Burz's utilized his own intuition in regard to the chemistry of the actors and their performances while constructing a cohesive body and storyline for the film. In fact, Burz did not even come up with an ending for the film until the very end of shooting, or as the director stated in an interview included with the Artsploitation Films DVD/Blu-ray release of the film, "And the finale simply presented itself during the process. So we didn't know from the beginning or in the middle where the film would lead us, what the finale would be... We simply trusted our instincts. Whether it works for everyone who sees it, time will only tell." Indeed, a slow-burning psychosexual family melodrama with virtually nil discernible moral compass that absolutely demands that the viewer do their own thinking, The Summer House is like Michael Haneke with a soul meets a reluctantly suburban German Hitchcock on a shockingly minuscule budget that puts most third world fuck flicks to shame.

If Burz has anything in common with Fassbinder aside from his relentless yet hardly moralistic critique of the bourgeoisie, tendency to utilize the same actors, and theatric background, it is that, at least in his film The Summer House, he refuses to portray any single one character as being completely innocent, including children, though some of them are certainly more innocent than others. In that regard, Burz's latest feature makes for a great double feature with The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971). While ostensibly the story of a middle-aged man living in suburban pandemonium with the soul of an Ancient Greek sod and the conniving Teutonic Justin Bieber lookalike that wants to take advantage of his highly deleterious weakness for virginal preteen flesh, The Summer House is really a passive 'apolitical' (translation: non-Marxist) critique of the upper-middleclass way of life and how such a hopelessly contrived, spiritually vacant, unnatural and largely materialist lifestyle causes the repression of certain instincts and impulses that eventually rise to the surface and break through with a completely catastrophic vengeance. Indeed, the film ultimately confirms many things I have observed from personal experience in regard to the unhappiness that the bourgeois dream sires, especially when it comes to people marrying unfit partners for monetary reasons who they inevitably grow to deeply resent due to a sheer and utter lack of common ground and sexual chemistry. Likewise, as the film also validates, these corrosive mismarriages also produce whacked out children who will go on to have toxic and oftentimes parasitic relationships when they grow up. In Burz's film, a motherless 12-year-old boy takes it upon himself to convince a middle-aged man that he loves him while said middle-aged man's 12-year-old daughter considers being a lesbian as an assumed result of all the misery she has encountered as a child via her parent's miserable sham marriage. On top of everything else, the latent pederast protagonist does not mind if his best friend bangs his wife right in front of him, so long as he can get away with secretly blowing and being blown by young twinks. In other words, The Summer House is one majorly morbid and morose yet surprisingly beautiful family melodrama that is rather unfortunately totally relevant in our increasingly decimated cosmopolitan times of pathologically prosaic 'plastic' bourgeois living, but it is directed in such a lavish and even sanitized way that one might mistake it for a TV commercial for a new upscale suburban neighborhood or PSA on the merits on upper-middleclass living if they were only to give it a superficial glance, thus making it quite Sirkin in many regards, albeit with the sometimes off-putting proto-liberal moralistic tone.

THE SUMMER HOUSE

At the beginning of the film, successful architect Markus Larsen (Burz regular Sten Jacobs) takes various banal generic photos at the site of his latest construction project on his cellphone. After finishing snapping pictures, Markus flips through the pics on his phone, thus revealing an erotic pose of a young blond twink named Oliver (Tobias Friebe) and thereupon letting the viewer know that the protagonist is a homo with a perverse predilection for much younger men. As the viewer will soon discover, Markus is a full-blown 'closest queen' who is not only married to a woman that he deeply resents, but also has an emotionally confused preteen daughter who cannot stand the fact that her parents have a nightmarish relationship where love and affection are nowhere to be found. At the beginning of the film, Markus receives a phone-call from his handsome friend/business partner Christopher Degenhardt (Swiss-born actor Stephan Bürki) urging him to come by his house, so the protagonist obliges and discovers that his comrade has "a fucking problem" that involves having to pay back taxes that he neglected to pay previously in a timely fashion or else he and his company will go completely bankrupt. While Markus agrees to loan him an unspecified fraction of the money, Christopher is still in serious trouble and he has no idea what to do. After Markus leaves, Christopher tells his 12-year-old son Johannes (Jaspar Fuld) that "I've really messed up" and that he needs to "make friends" with the protagonist's daughter Elisabeth (Nina Spletstößer), who also happens to be the boy's classmate. Realizing his daddy is in deep shit, Johannes naturally agrees to help, though he has no idea at this point what particularly perverse lengths he will go to spare his father the mighty shame and burden of total financial disgrace and ruin. Meanwhile, Markus drives to a random house and tells his daughter he "could be a few minutes" while she waits in the car because he has to get something from a "coworker." Of course, the coworker is the twink Oliver whose erotic picture he was previously looking at on his cellphone and Markus has come by the blond blowboy's house to simply cum in his mouth. While Elisabeth seems to sense that her father is acting somewhat dubiously, she has no clue to the true degree of his erratic extramarital depravity.

When little Johannes comes by the protagonist's house to "make friends" with Elisabeth, he curiously immediately interrogates the girl about her father's daily habits. As for Elisabeth, she seems to have a small crush on Johannes and decides to put on some makeup to impress him. While his daughter is getting all dolled up in the bathroom for her preteen gentleman caller, Markus takes the opportunity to invite Johannes to go "grilling" with him and his family at their summer house, which the young man somewhat reluctantly agrees to. Before the cookout, Markus has Chris and his Guidette-like girlfriend Anne Lass (casting assistant Natascha Zimmermann) come by for a seemingly stereotypical suburban get-together that ultimately evolves into a quick bourgeois orgy of sorts. Indeed, out of nowhere Chris and Anne begin making out and then the two eventually encourage Markus' wife Christine (Burz regular Anna Altmann) to get up and join them while the protagonist remains at the dinner table with a discernible look of abject contempt on his face. Within literally less than a minute of the fully clothed threesome, Chris manages to make Markus' wife orgasm via cunnilingus, thus exposing the fact that Christine was in desperate need of having her main vein manhandled by a real man who, unlike her homo hubby, actually craves cunt. While Markus agrees to penetrate Christine doggy style afterwards, he has a look of decided disgust on his face and pushes his wife away and tells her to "cut it off" when she attempts to embrace him after he hatefully blows his load. Naturally, Christine is deeply hurt by the hate-fucking and subsequently tells her daughter to do her the favor of leaving Markus alone for a while because she believes that he is "angry...about us." When Elisabeth asks her mother, "What if I become a lesbian?" she laughs and replies "you won't" because she is "absolutely sure" there is no way she will grow up to be a ladylicker, even though her emotionally negligent upbringing is already causing her to have a low opinion of both men and heterosexual relationships.

THE SUMMER HOUSE

When Markus eventually takes Johannes grilling, the boy seems fairly concerned after the protagonist comes up with some obviously phony accuse as to why the rest of his family will conveniently not be joining them. Among other things, Markus' cookout session with Johannes inspires him to ask his secret fuckbody Oliver if he can bring "someone young" the next day they hangout. As is quite apparent at this point in the film, not only is Markus a crypto-cocksucker, but now he is beginning to develop a sort of hellish spiritual Priapism for preteen boys that no quick knob-job from a gawky 20-year-old twink can cure. As an assumed result of his growing sexual repression, Markus begins to act all the more cruel with his daughter and wife and even goes so far as to ban them from conversing in English together. Indeed, as a sort of symbolic act in regard to their bond together as a mother and daughter who are the only ones that understand the oppressive environment they live in as the virtual slaves of an internally distant and exceedingly evasive patriarch, Christine and Elisabeth only communicate to one another in English, thus making it all the more brutal that Markus would attempt to deny them of their solacing 'secret language.' Meanwhile, Markus takes Johannes out to another grilling excursion and asks the boy to do him the "favor" of taking his shirt off. Somewhat curiously, when Markus asks him to drop his top, Johannes asks him "What do I get for it?," thus hinting that the little lad is fully aware that he is using his NAMBLA sex appeal to manipulate the middle-aged man. While Markus does not touch the boy, he does masturbate while fantasizing about him on the day of his wedding anniversary while he thinks his wife is asleep. Needless to say, Markus and Christine do not have anniversary sex, even though their daughter attempts to get them in the spirit by throwing them a small celebration of sorts. After all, as an aberrosexual mensch that only has a small boy in his mind, Markus cannot be bothered with frivolous things like fucking his wife on the day of their anniversary.

When Markus dares to kiss Johannes on the top of his head during one of their secret grilling excursions, the boy asks in a somewhat startled fashion, "What're you doing?," yet he does not dare runaway or tell anyone about the particularly perverse gesture as he has big plans that involve serious blackmail. Naturally, Elisabeth eventually asks her father if he plans to divorce her mother because, "She's weird sometimes," but the protagonist denies it and even attempts to calm his daughter's fears by replying, "You don't need to be afraid of your Mother. She loves you more than anything. She'll never do anything to you" and then adds, "You're going to be a really pretty, beautiful woman." As a result of her assumed misguided belief that it is her mother's fault that her parents have a miserable loveless marriage, Elisabeth uses lipstick to write "whore" in English on Christine's mirror. Of course, Christine is feeling increasingly emotionally isolated and is not too happy with both her husband and daughter's behavior, so she perversely decides to fasten a noose to hang herself with from the second floor of the family house while Elisabeth is in her company. When Elisabeth asks about the noose, her mother disturbingly replies, "Just playing a game, honey" and then waits for Markus to get home. When Markus finally gets home and sees his wife with a rope around her neck, he simply walks back out the house, as he is merely annoyed by his wifey and does not want to deal with her insufferable cry for help. At this point, the viewer thinks that Christine might really kill herself, but she does not, as she probably feels it would be a huge waste to off herself for the benefit of an absurdly apathetic man that does not even care if she lives or dies. Meanwhile, Markus confides to Johannes, "You can always come to me...even if it's money." Of course, Johannes wants way more money than Markus would be freely willing to offer him, so he does not act on the protagonist's ostensibly generous offer. In fact, preteen cocktease Johannes soon begins hinting to Markus' family members that he is carrying on an indecent relationship with the family man. When Johannes randomly goes by Markus' house and asks Elisabeth where he is and she replies "What is it to you?," the conniving little brat has the gall to reply, "A whole lot." At this point, it is obvious that Elisabeth no longer has a girlish crush on Johannes and that her classmate has some sort of repellent relationship with her father. As for Markus, he no longer has any interest in his fuckboy Oliver and even stops giving head to him during mid-blowjob. Needless to say, Markus is not happy with Oliver when he brings by an overweight 22-year-old after asking him to bring someone "young," as he specifically wanted someone about ten years younger like his preteen love interest Johannes.

When Chris' girlfriend Anne comes by the Larsen home to complain that her beau has not fucked her in over a week, perennially pussy-blocked Christine, who has literally no one to confide in, is hardly sympathetic. After complaining about Chris' recent underwhelming sexual performance, Anne then begins to brag how great of a lover he is in general, stating, "I tell you, sex with him is fantastic. He is a real man, you know? Sometimes he took me really rough, wild...And sometimes, he was suddenly really tender, almost shy. And boy did he go down on me. He sometimes didn't stop until I came." At this point, Christine, who sees her friend's problems as being particularly petty compared to her own, becomes almost murderously jealous and screams at Anne like a truly cracked cunt, "And when are you going to ask how I am? You come in here and tell me a bunch of shit! I had no vacation and I also didn't get fucked. Welcome to my world. It's been years, years since he looked at me. It's been years since he went down on me. What do you think? Do you think you know the world? And you complain about one week? You slut. You could have a thousand men. Look for someone else. But don't come to me crying your eyes out. I can do that all by myself. I don't need you here for that. I'm doing shitty! Welcome to my world. Fuck off!" After all, hell hath no fury like a middle-aged woman who has been screwed out of a sex life because her hubby is more interested in a little boy that looks like the long last brother of Hanson.

THE SUMMER HOUSE

When Christine discovers she is pregnant as a result of the one rare occasion where her hubby fucked her doggy style, she decides that the best course of action is to give herself a primitive abortion by shoving a coat-hanger up her vagina. Naturally, Markus never learns that she was ever even pregnant, which was Christine's intention, hence why she performed an abortion from the comfort of her home. Meanwhile, Markus becomes exceedingly enraged when Johannes shows up an hour later to one of their secret grillings and screams at the boy, "Are you jerking me around? If so, then don't come here anymore." Hoping to regain Markus' faith in him, Johannes agrees to spend the night with Markus at the summerhouse, though the viewer can only speculate what the two actually do that evening. At this point, Christine begins to suspect that her husband and Johannes have a sick secret relationship and even hints at her knowledge by remarking to Markus, "He's a nice-looking boy, that Johannes." After hinting to her hubby that she knows what he and Johannes are doing, Christine maturely decides to squat and piss on Markus' sandals. When Johannes declares to Markus, "I think I love you. I like your smell" and then adds, "I'll take my shorts off for you," it becomes too tempting for the protagonist and he opts to take the boy home. With Markus beginning to ignore him, Johannes decides to randomly show up at his house while his entire family is there and says to the protagonist when he asks what he wants in a somewhat hostile tone, "You said if I need anything, no matter what, I can always come to you." From there, Johannes demands 150,000 Euros and attempts to blackmail Markus by stating in front of his wife and daughter in a somewhat smug fashion, "I can tell your family how you kissed miss. Or should I say how you get naked in front of me? Or how you grabbed me...Or...how I bled." Needless to say, when Johannes says he has one hour to get the money or he will tell everyone about their very special relationship, Markus becomes frantic and goes to get the cash. Somewhat shockingly, Christine becomes more enraged with Johannes than her husband as she is jealous of him and hatefully yells at the boy, "You're ruining our lives. You shitty little rat. You liar." When Christine asks Johannes if he can prove his claims, the smartass kid smugly states, "The condoms in the coffee can. Markus' body is completely covered with hair." While Johannes is talking, Elisabeth decides to grab a Norman Bates-esque butcher knife. As to what happens in the end, you will have to watch the film for and find out for yourself.

Notably, being mailing me a DVD screener of The Summer Home, Artsploitation Films sent me a press e-mail about the film with the curious title "Warning: THIS IS NOT THE TYPICAL ARTSPLOITATION HORROR FILM!" with the message reading, "The storyline definitely makes for uncomfortable viewing" and "An intriguing film for adventurous film-goers not put off by its indelicate theme," as if they are even afraid of promoting their own film. Sort of like Luchino Visconti's Death in Venice (1971) meets Adrian Lyne's Lolita (1997) in secluded kraut suburbia as directed by the more restrained progeny of Gregg Araki and Dominik Graf, Burz's pleasantly polished yet nonetheless unnerving cinematic work is easily one of the most innately 'bourgeois' subversive films I have ever seen, as a work that seems like it was directed by a reformed gay pederast who wants to warn other potential pedo family men what might happen if they dare to attempt to act on their long repressed urge to seduce a preteen skater boy. Of course, the film is not just about pederasty but the hermetic hell that goes with upper-middleclass living and the spiritual retardation, emotional morbidity, sexual debauchment, moral hypocrisy, and overall interfamilial dysfunction that oftentimes accompanies it. Indeed, had the male lead of the film lived during his grandfather's generation, he could have been a proud Brownshirt in the Sturmabteilung and a comrade of Herr Röhm and Herr Heines instead of living a pathetic lie that causes the destruction of various other lives in the process, but of course modern Germany is no longer the same place that once produced the greatest thinkers, philosophers, and poets in the world, which is probably the natural retarding result of about 70 years of American occupation. Of course, few things are more dejecting to see than a hysterical sexually repressed woman, which is probably the inevitable consequence of a closest queen opting to begin a loveless marriage to a woman who never thought she would marry a man that prefers virginal kid cocks over old cunts. On top of that, as Burz's film reveals, any progeny begot from such a shame marriage can only grow up to have screwed up perspectives on both love and the opposite sex. While The Summer House reveals all these things, it offers no answers, which is all the more intriguing when one considers the director's professional background as a psychologist.

When asked why he made The Summer House, auteur Curtis Burz replied, "I didn't want to make a moralistic film. I didn't want to make a personal film, and I didn't work with any autobiographical material in THE SUMMER HOUSE. I wanted to try out a new genre with my colleagues. After the last two films we decided to approach this theme, to plumb its depths, to dedicate ourselves to it, as one simply does in artistic work...and not anything more. It's a movie, fiction, not a documentary, not an analysis. It's simply an artistic work." While Burz describes his film as "simply an artistic work," one cannot ignore the fact that it depicts a sort of social and spiritual plague of nihilistic hedonism and spiritual retardation that is not just prevalent in Germany, but Western European and the United States in general. Indeed, after watching The Summer House, it is easy to see why modern Germans are more or less committing collective suicide by refusing to have children, as the bourgeoisie is rotten to the core, but one should not expect anything less from a nation where cultural pride and community, which were once intrinsic ingredients of their country, are now seen as taboo and where Hollywood is constantly telling them that their pronatalistic ancestors are evil genocidal monsters. With mainstream German cinema increasingly resembling a bad parody of Hollywood, directors like Burz, who manages to maintain artistic freedom due to working with such small budgets and inordinately dedicated actors, are becoming all the more important as the only authentic no bullshit cinematic voices in krautland. Not unlike Jörg Buttgerit in the past and pseudonymous auteur Marian Dora today, Burz has proven that passion and artistic integrity trumps big budgets and stars when it comes to making truly provocative cinema that betrays the mainstream message that contemporary Germany is a happy democratic multicultural country where the path to paradise is achieved via Americanization. Unlike Oskar Roehler's modern classic Agnes und seine Brüder (2004) aka Agnes and His Brothers and the pedo-heavy oeuvre of Todd Solondz, The Summer House is a work that dares to confront interfamilial sexual dysfunction and the overall rotten fruits of upper-middleclass dystopia in a completely unrelenting fashion that never succumbs to comic relief. Indeed, I certainly found the film more distressing than Haneke collaborator Markus Schleizer's admirable debut feature Michael (2011). In its thankful lack of sapless sentimentalism in contrast to the dark Hollywood drama The Woodsman (2004) starring Kevin Bacon as an 'empathetic childfucker,' Burz's film even manages to chill the viewer more than the decidedly disturbing NAMBLA doc Chicken Hawk: Men Who Love Boys directed by Adi Sideman. Arguably most importantly, The Summer House, quite unlike similarly themed pseudo-arthouse Hollywood twaddle like Sam Mendes' American Beauty (1999) and Todd Field's Little Children (2006), actually demands that the viewer make their own moral judgements, which is probably too much to ask for those viewers that are used to having their morality and opinions spoon-fed to them by the turds of Tinseltown who curiously seem to have no problems with the long unpunished sex crimes of their favorite Hebraic auteurs Roman Polanski and Woody Allen. Of course, The Summer House depicts a world where the forcibly imported American dream has become a metaphysically malefic nightmare for one decidedly dysfunctional Teutonic family where the patriarch just happens to be a predatory poof, which is not something you will ever see in Hollywood or in the so-called American independent film world, thus making it essential viewing for anyone that likes their cinema to be challenging and, in turn, rewarding.

THE SUMMER HOUSE

-Ty E

NIGHT TIDE

Curtis Harrington (1963)

Many decades before fully developing the exquisite mental illness that would later contribute to the uncanny and iconic performances he gave as Frank Booth in David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986) and Feck in The River's Edge (1986), Dennis Hopper played in a variety of Hollywood and Indy cult films. Some of these films are somewhat forgotten (and rightfully so) while others – like Curtis Harrington's Night Tide (1961) – are thankfully not. Night Tide is a fantastic little cult item about a young navy sailor named Johnny Drake (played by a relatively mentally stable Dennis Hopper) who finds himself magnetized to the mysterious pheromones of a cutesy fishy lady named Mora who may or may not be a genuine mermaid. During the film, the audience learns that Mora was found as a child on a Greek Island and adopted by a British sea captain named Samuel Murdock (played by Gavin Muir); a somewhat shifty Svengali man-of-the-world who makes Johnny seem like a boyish philistine. Marjorie Elizabeth Cameron – the Occultist wife of fellow Thelemite and rock scientist Jack Whiteside Parsons and star of Kenneth Anger's color short Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954) – also plays a small but imperative typecast role in Night Tide as a mystery sea-witch who seems to hold psychic powers over Mora. Apparently, Parsons' thought his wife Marjorie was an incarnation of the goddess Babalon (who she played in Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome), thus her ghastly yet angelic appearance in Night Tide only makes the film seem all the more eerie. Night Tide director Curtis Harrington also directed the documentary The Wormwood Star; a work about Marjorie Cameron and her Magickal art. In a sense, the audience is in the same rocking boat as Hopper's character Johnny as both he and the viewers are bewildered by the dubious motives of Mora and the mystery woman follows her throughout the entirety of Night Tide. Essentially, Night Tide is a Gothic haunted house flick without a ghost-ridden house but, instead, set in a strangely atmospheric beachside vacation spot that can be justly compared to Herk Harvey's Cocteau-inspired cult masterpiece Carnival of Souls (1962). Curtis Harrington – being a lifelong Edgar Allan Poe fanatic (his first film was a short 8mm adaptation of The Fall of the House of Usher) – named Night Tide after a line from Poe's popular poem Annabel Lee. At the conclusion of the film, it will be all the more apparent to the viewer as to why the title of Night Tide and its source are all the more fitting.

I must admit that I have some domestic prejudices in regards to my reverence of Night Tide as I live in a seaside habitat similar to the one featured in the film. In fact, I only have to walk about 30 seconds from my condo to reach the beach and the Atlantic Ocean. Like the small beach town featured in Night Tide, my local area is known for its various amusement parks and Oceanside boardwalk. Of course, the only thing scary about my area is the number of extremely unpredictable alcohol-addicted locals and the unneeded number of aggressive police that arrest them. My town also has a relatively popular vintage boardwalk haunted house ride that features the same sort of Gothic horror cheese atmosphere that Night Tide potently permeates. On top of featuring a number of scenes of Johnny strolling down the beach and boardwalk amongst midnight shadows in the hopes of tracking down his ghostly gal, Night Tide also includes a couple phantasmagorical dream-sequences composed of Ed Wood-esque searhins which are quite similar to the ones that can be seen at my local haunted house ride. Simply put, Night Tide is one of those rare Gothic horror B-movies that one could describe as an example of, “they don’t make them like they used to.” The same can be said of counter-culture acting legend Dennis Hopper; one of the few actors in American film history who deserves to be described as a true veteran actor due to his notoriously volatile personal life and uneven and unpredictable acting career. Although Hopper seems seemingly sane in Night Tide; his infamous nervous stoner laugh is still quite noticeable in the film. Night Tide also features some elements that foretell the awakening of the popular hippie movement in American, including a lucid New Age-ish bongo dance performed by the thoroughly entranced Mora, an irrational tribe of drug-possessed youths, and a bombardment of degenerate Jazz. Hopper’s character Johnny is also the sort of emasculated male that is incapable of taming his dominant beastess; a revolting trait oh-so in post-hippie American.

NIGHT TIDE

Despite its somewhat crude special effects and superlatively wacky storyline, Night Tide, like Carnival of Souls and the surprisingly neglected work Incubus (1966) starring William Shatner, is a work that still holds up today. Bordering the line between American cinematic art and B-grade schlock, and being of interest to Occultniks, Night Tide is surely a work that deserves to have a larger cult following than it actually has. The film is also an excellent (albeit corny) attempt to adapt Edgar Allen Poe’s ideas for contemporary (at the time it was made) times. Night Tide director Curtis Harrington would end his film career like he started it with a short adaptation of Poe’s The Fall of the House of Usher simply entitled Usher (2002); a work featuring Zeena Schreck (aka LaVey); the daughter of Church of Satan founder and High Priest Anton LaVey. Incidentally, to help finance Usher, Zeena acted as a broker for Harrington’s sale of his rare signed copy of Aleister Crowley’s Book of Thoth. Another connection to Crowley in Night Tide is a somewhat unnoticeable street sign with the address 777 Saabek Lane; the number of the address being a favorite of the English Alpha-Occultist. Unfortunately, like most of Harrington’s work, Usher is apparently (I have been unable to track down a copy of the short to view it myself) a mediocre and thoroughly banal work. That being said, I do not think it would a stretch to say that Night Tide is nothing short of being Harrington’s “cinematic magna opera.”

-Ty E

QUEEN OF BLOOD

Curtis Harrington (1966)

Queen of Blood is a result of Roger Corman, at his resourceful best, purchasing special effects footage from some big-budget Ruskie space opera and then hiring Night Tide director and Kenneth Anger chum Curtis Harrington to shoot a film around it (in about a week, no less). What could very well have been as slipshod and haphazard as something like The Terror, however, is instead a transcendent piece of pulp entertainment; the cinematic analogue of an EC comic like Weird Science with the dreamlike atmosphere of Night Tide and the color scheme of Bava's Planet of the Vampires.

The year is 1990. At the International Institute of Space Technology, while keeping an eye out for space signals, Laura James receives a transmission that the project's head, Dr. Farraday, recognizes as an attempt by an extraterrestrial race's attempt at communication. After Farraday announces the exciting news, Laura receives a video from the aliens, showing that they've crash landed on Mars. With this, Farraday sends Laura and two other astronauts aboard the spaceship Oceano to Mars to investigate, where they discover one humanoid corpse and evidence that its companion took an escape ship to one of the moons of Mars. Laura's love interest, Allan, and his pal Tony convince Farraday to allow them to make the trips to one of Mars moons, where they can launch a satellite in order to locate the stranded alien ship, which they soon find. On board? An unconscious, green-skinned woman. The astronauts board the Oceano (save Tony, who stays behind to wait for the arrival of the Oceano II) with their inhuman cargo, who regains consciousness and wields an off-putting, strange countenance and refuses to touch the food they offer. Before you can say "space vampire", crew members begin dropping off like flies, seemingly by their own hands, and all but Laura seem susceptible to the space woman's otherworldly "charms."

Why this flick works where myriad of its ilk fail is Harrington's sure-handed direction, the expert utilization of the Russian footage, and a winning cast. Harrington, responsible for both the direction and the script, manages to infuse the film with both the "gee whiz!" matinee attitude of sci-fi of the time and the haunting lyricism of his debut feature, beginning with a credits sequence of three minutes or so of unsettling, Lovecraftian avant-garde paintings by John Cline (if anyone has any info on the guy, feel free to share- some really stellar work I've been able to dig up next to nothing on) set to dependably foreboding music. When "The Queen" shows her true colors, stalking and killing members of the expedition, the cinematography shows ITS colors, which are vivid and assuredly dream-like, at times suggesting what Ken Anger himself might have done if he'd taken a very different route of independent film. The drawn-out special effects sequences from Mechte Navstrehu and Nebo Zovyot, respectively, actually add to the trippy vibe by being singularly odd (it's difficult to tell what precisely the aliens are doing in these sequences, but adds to their alien nature considerably) and dubbed over with the eerie music that makes sci-fi-horror of this time period such a joy to listen to (some I recognized as the Barron's score from Forbidden Planet). The costumes and set-direction take Bava's Planet of the Vampires to an even kitschier level of retro-futurist fashions and garish color filters, making this eye-candy of the first order.

QUEEN OF BLOOD

And speaking of Planet of the Vampires, a double-feature of Queen and that masterpiece would account for a big chunk of the plot of Dan O' Bannon's Alien script (what with the space eggs and distress beacons, but save the whole stalk-and-slash by phallic Giger-grotesque element), and I for one definitely see just as much Queen of Blood in Tobe Hooper's genius Lifeforce, also scripted by O'Bannon, as I do Colin Wilson's Space Vampires, on which Lifeforce is ostensibly based (especially in the scenes within THAT film in which a hot alien chick systematically makes her way through all the men aboard a spaceship). What pushes this one out of the ranks of "fun time waſter" into near-classic is the solid cast. John Saxon takes the lead as Allan, delivering dialogue in that slightly-off, wooden fashion that Saxon somehow manages to make inherently affable. Dennis Hopper, a Harrington pal and holdover from Night Tide, isn't yet the raving loon we'd come to love from a distance, but does manage some eye-bugging as The Queen grabs him by the nuts every bit that that mermaid chick did in his other Harrington outing, while Basil Rathbone collects his check as the head-up-his-ass Dr. Farraday (he reportedly filmed his scenes for this one concurrently- and on the same sets- with his scenes in Voyage to the Prehistoric Planet). Of particular note are the two female stars: Judi Meredith's protagonist Laura is all kinds of a mid-sixties Sci-fi babe, managing to keep her bouncy blonde bob whether rocking a stylish space helmet or cowering in terror from the Queen. As for the Queen herself, Florence Marly, with the aide of make-up artist William Condos, creates a uniquely inhuman humanoid, communicating through confused and confusing facial expressions, a ceaseless malevolent smile, strangely lit eyes (that glow once the stalk-and-killing gets underway), and rocking a beehive wig and eventual green skin that effectively invokes the praying mantis she ultimately is. While I'm not familiar with much of Curtis Harrington's work beyond Night Tide and this fun flick, on the strength of Queen, I definitely look forward to delving into his oeuvre.

-Jon-Christian

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH HELEN?

Curtis Harrington (1971)

In his posthumously released memoir Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013), avant-garde auteur turned camp horror master Curtis Harrington (Queen of Blood, Games) wrote regarding his eloquently exploitative "Grande Dame Guignol" flick What's the Matter With Helen? (1971), "Of all my films, Helen is the one I personally like the best. It comes closest to realizing in all its details what I intended. It deals with the underlying themes of Eros and Thanatos—the will toward life and the will toward death." Indeed, while his debut feature-length work Night Tide (1961), a singularly atmospheric arthouse horror film, is my personal favorite Harrington flick, it is hard to argue that What's the Matter With Helen? is not the director's most artistically accomplished and aesthetically eclectic work as a period piece and macabre melodrama of the cruelly campy and culturally cynical sort that uses the cinematic conventions of Golden Age Hollywood against itself, or as the L.A. Herald Examiner once pegged it, "A musical-horror-melodrama-satire-love story." Penned by Henry Farrell, who previously worked with Harrington on the TV movie How Awful About Allan (1970) starring Anthony Perkins and who initially came to fame writing the script for What Ever Happened to Baby Jane? (1962), the very first "hagsploitation" aka "Psychobiddy" aka "Grande Dame Guignol" flick, What's the Matter With Helen?, like most of the director's films which all seemed to be cursed, was unfortunately poorly advertised upon its release and relatively ignored, yet it would go on to rightfully develop a loyal cult following. In fact, What's the Matter With Helen? was so haphazardly and ineptly advertised that the official original movie poster of the film featured an image from the shock ending in a scene that Harrington hoped would be "as harrowing and brutal as the shower scene in Psycho," thus ruining the experience for anyone who went to see it. Of course, I, like virtually everyone else interested in the film, had What's the Matter With Helen? spoiled for me after glancing at the poster, yet Harrington's mischievous and even misanthropic celluloid exercise in homicidal hag hysteria is luckily a film of highly engrossing entertainment value and exquisite direction with the grand novel distinction of starring two clearly mentally imbalanced washed-up Hollywood Golden Age divas, thus, like good wine, it has only gotten better with age and has seemingly unlimited replay value. Starring an unflatteringly overweight Michelin Man-esque Shelly Winters (The Diary of Anne Frank, Poor Pretty Eddie), who plays a neurotic character going through a nervous breakdown while the actress herself was going through a real-life nervous breakdown, as well as Debbie Reynolds (Singin' in the Rain, The Unsinkable Molly Brown), who was apparently just as condescending to her co-star in real-life as her character is in the film, What's the Matter With Helen? is a film that is just as every bit hysterically hilarious as it is melodramatically macabre about the kind of mentally deranged mothers it takes to produce coldblooded killers of the anti-Oedipal sort.

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH HELEN?

As depicted in a fake 1930s Hearst Metrotone newsreel at the Americana-mocking beginning of What's the Matter With Helen?, deranged young men Leonard Hill and Wesley Bruckner killed an unlucky young woman named Ellie Banner in a "Leopold and Loeb"-style fashion in Iowa and have both rightfully received life sentences for their dirty deeds. The two boys' mothers, Helen Hill (Shelley Winters) and Adelle Bruckner (Debbie Reynolds), decided it will be best to move away and get away from the bad press and abject social ostracization, especially after the former is cut on the palm with a knife by a vengeful anonymous assailant and receives a death threat from the same said perpetrator via telephone with the unsettling words "I'm the one who cut you.... I wanted to see you bleed." Changing their names and hoping to live new press/stress free lives, Helen and Adelle head from Iowa to sunny California and open a posh pedophile's dream, an unsettlingly debauched dance academy for little girls whose dubious parents want to make their daughters into the next Shirley Temple. Fat, morbidly depressed, and particularly passive, Helen merely goes along with her over domineering friend Adelle's madame-like get-rich-quick scheme, but, rather unfortunately, her mental health begins to decline over time. First, Helen, a woman who is deathly afraid of men, is rather angry when Adelle, a woman who does whatever she wants whenever she wants, hires a dandy queen of an elocution teacher named Hamilton Starr (Micheál MacLiammóir) to teach the little girls to have the proper voices for the new innovation of sound films. A shameless schemer and decadent dreamer of the mature MILF persuasion, Adelle also starts a hot and steamy love affair with the father of one of her students, Lincoln Palmer (Dennis Weaver), a rich Southern gentlemen of the seemingly closeted homosexual sort who knows how to treat a lady and behave like an ostensibly real man. With no other friends aside from Adelle, who constantly ignores and patronizes her, Helen gets a couple cute white pet rabbits, but that does not stop her from suffering flashbacks and ultimately hallucinations of her husband's grizzly death in which he was mangled into a bloody pulp by a farm plow.

Apparently, Helen's murderous son witnessed the death of his father via machinery at the mere age of 4, thereupon possibly leading to his mental derangement. Naturally, petty and less than pretty Helen is jealous of Adelle's new boy toy Lincoln and tries to break them apart, while also brainwashing herself with a steady diet of backwards Christian evangelist radio sermons so as to ease her perennial loneliness and sexual tension (it is hinted that she wants Adelle all for herself). After a mysterious man stops by at her and Adelle's home, Helen pushes him down the stairs and kills him as she suspects he is the same man from Iowa who threatened to butcher her. A nauseating narcissist of the self-obsessed and opportunistic sort who seems to suffer from histrionic personality disorder, Adelle helps Helen dump the mystery man's body as she does not want the incident to ruin her career. Unfortunately, Adelle does not realize that she could be homicidal Helen's new victim. After learning of her true identity and that her son is a sadistic killer, Adelle's boyfriend Lincoln offers to hire the best lawyer in town to appeal for her son's case, but hateful Helen is less than impressed by Mr. Right's rather generous offer. Finally building up enough gall to confront Adelle about her motives, Helen states to her best bud, "I am not like you, Adelle. I'm not trying to buy back my son's love by charming some rich man..." Helen also lets Adelle know that their sons hate them and that their murderous behavior is a result of this hatred. Helen, who has more guilt than a Catholic cocksucker, visits a church and begs to a certain Sister Alma to forgive her, but she makes a complete and utter fool of herself and has to be dragged out of the church by Adelle. Helen ultimately goes ballistic and slaughters her beloved pet rabbits with a knife and confesses to Adelle that she is responsible for her husband's death as she apparently pushed him in front of a plow. Adelle offers to get Helen help and calls Sister Alma, but the bitch of a bunny butcher stabs her friend in the back both in a figurative and literal manner. In the end, Helen, who has finally taken the 'dominant' role in her relationship with Adelle sings "Goody Goody" on the piano in a one-woman/one-cadaver show that Lincoln accidentally walks in on in horror.

While the murderous Helen is, quite strangely, a more sympathetic character when compared to old whore Adelle, director Curtis Harrington summed up her character and the 'moral' of What's the Matter With Helen? as follows: "It is my portrait of the destructive narrow-mindedness of Christian fundamentalism, as exemplified by the character of Helen, whose hypocritical inability to face the truth of her sexuality brings only tragedy to those around her and madness to herself." Indeed, What's the Matter With Helen? does not feature a single scene of overt lesbianism as Harrington surely concocted a celluloid work of subtle nuances, semi-inconspicuous camp, and cryptic naughtiness in the old school Hollywood style and in the tradition of the director's friend James Whale (Frankenstein, The Old Dark House) that will surely be overlooked by most modern viewers. Poking fun at Hollywood 'Christian' flicks like Cecil B. DeMille's The Sign of the Cross (1932), the perturbing quasi-pedo phenomenon of Shirley Temple, ungracefully aged Tinseltown divas, and the aesthetic vulgarity of superlatively soulless old school Hollywood musicals, What's the Matter With Helen? is indubitably director Curtis Harrington's respectful anti-tribute to Sunset Boulevard's hyper hypocritical films of yesteryear. A film directed by the only filmmaker to start out directing European arthouse inspired films and starring in Kenneth Anger films to making films produced by Roger Corman and multiple major studios to directing episodes of popular TV shows like Charlie's Angels and Dynasty and working with actors ranging from Gloria Swanson to Helmut

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH HELEN?

Berger, What's the Matter With Helen? is certainly the biting sardonic creation of a man with a love-relationship for Hollywood who was far too subversive and artistic for the Hollywood studio system, hence his relatively small oeuvre despite making films for about 60 years. Although I am only someone with a slight interest in the short-lived subgenre, which tends to be especially cherished by momma boy queens, I unquestionably consider What's the Matter with Helen? to be the greatest and least aged of the hagsploitation flicks. After all, any time I need some therapeutic relief after dealing with a bitchy and needlessly narcissistic old bird of the less than physically fresh sort in real-life, I can just pop in What's the Matter With Helen? and dream of the possibilities.

-Ty E

THE KILLING KIND

Curtis Harrington (1974)

If there is anything that serial killers all seem to have in common aside from hunting their fellow humans, it is major mommy troubles, or at least one would assume so much after learning that white trash mass murderer Henry Lee Lucas' prostitute mom forced him to wear a dress and watch her have sex with her patrons as a wee lad, and I doubt necrophile Ed Gein dug up women that resembled his mother and made a "female suit" out their skin and body parts in what has been described as an "insane transvestite ritual" for nothing. And, of course, perennial momma's boy Norm Bates—a creepy camp character inspired by sick post-mortem sex-capades of Herr Gein—of Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) probably would have been better off if his mother was not his best friend and the same can certainly be said of the sexually deranged anti-hero of cult auteur Curtis Harrington's study in mother-son psychopathia sexualis The Killing Kind (1973)—a torrid tale of a seemingly brain-damaged bastard man-boy who never had a father nor even knows who he is, so he always had his old whore mother all to himself, so instead of figuratively having to kill his father like 'normal' men, he took to killing women in homicidal honor to his mommy. Rarely seen upon its initial release because, as direct Curtis Harrington stated regarding the seedy cinematic work's producers, "They knew about as much about distribution as my grandmother," The Killing Kind is all but forgotten today just like its rather underrated director, yet it happens to be one of the few serial killer flicks of its time to get at the maternal root of homo-cidal tendencies and the central role certain malevolent mothers play in such psychosexually dysfunctional behavior as the sort of cinematic work that would horrify fickle feminists and bring ecstasy to serial killer groupies and fans of hagsploitation. A film about a boy whose idea of a sexual climax is strangling a woman to death after failing to 'rise to the occasion,' The Killing Kind is a film that is thankfully big on revealing the matriarchal motivations behind the killer, as opposed to banal buckets of blood and guts, directed by a filmmaker who probably would have made a much more profitable career as a psychoanalyst as opposed to doing the unthinkable by concocting charming yet eccentric 'thinking man's horror flicks.'

During a sunny summer day gang rape with some fiendish friends on the beach, troubled teen Terry Lambert (John Savage of Cimino's The Deer Hunter (1978) and Hair (1979) directed by Miloš Forman) is coerced by his beach-tanned buds to sexually ravage a girl named Tina (Sue Bernard of Russ Meyer's Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill! (1965)), which he does, at best, quite impotently, thus inevitably resulting in his incarceration for two years. With nowhere to go when he gets out of the ostensible slammer of sodomy, Terry moves in with his tyrannical mother Thelma (Hollywood diva Ann Sothorn, whose acting career spanned six decades)—a sadistically sassy suburban slumlord who rents out rooms to mostly old hags, but also, quite reluctantly, a young girl named Lori Davis (Cindy Williams of George Lucas' American Graffiti (1973)). When Lori moves in the boarding house, brazen bitch Thelma states to herself, "Give her a week, she will end up with some phony dude by then," thus expressing her unwavering hatred of both men and women, but especially women, as well as her wealth of experience as a lecherous lady who has been romantically involved with a number of "phony dudes" during her rather loose lifetime. An old and overweight whore that "used to turn some heads" in her day, Thelma does not even know who the sperm donor of her bastard boy Terry is. In regard to the unlucky woman her son haphazardly raped, Thelma states most vehemently, "Tina, I hate that name. I wish she was dead" and being a malevolent maniac of a momma's boy, Terry ultimately fulfills her command, but not before stalking the girl a little bit. Like cats, Terry rather enjoys torturing his prey before putting it out of its misery, so it is rather symbolic that the boy wonder's first confirmed kill is a kitten that he strangles to death after it makes too much noise during an intense session of peeping Tom.

THE KILLING KIND

As an elderly wheelchair-bound neighbor tells his daughter Louise (Luana Anders of That Cold Day in the Park (1969) directed by Robert Altman)—a sexually repressed alcoholic librarian in her mid-thirties—regarding Terry and Thelma's rather risqué relationship, "Its unnatural. Mother and son behaving like that." Of course, being an old maid who very likely has never felt a man inside her, Louise is turned on by the fact that Terry is a rapist, but he blows her off because the only time he touches girls is when strangling them. When Terry, who is straddling an acoustic guitar, insults Louise and her would-be-whorish behavior, the librarian states spitefully, "That thing that you hold so close to you like a woman, you can't even play it," thus resulting in the smashing of the guitar by the rapist rocker during an exceedingly erratic and volatile mental fit. A woman who figuratively carries around her son's testicles in her purse, Thelma finally receives a verbal assault from her Terry, who in a pathetic manner like a wounded animal begging to be put out of its misery, states, "Hey, you know what you're like! You're like this big, heavy pillow over my face and you're suffocating me... You're nothing but a fat whore!" Although a callous cunt who jokes about the fact that one of her tenants randomly died of a coronary in a market place and fell on a display of frozen fish ("A frozen stiff" as her son quips), Thelma begins to understand that her son Terry is a psychopathic killer whose bloodlust only grows with each passing day, especially after he kills his lawyer Rhea Benson (Ruth Roman of Hitchcock's Strangers on a Train (1951)), who he still blames for his rather short prison sentence. During a failed lovemaking session with Lori, Terry kills the young girl after he once again becomes quite conscious of his sexual impotence and failure as a male and mommy dearest comes to the rescue to help him dispose of the damned debutante's body, yet her son starts to begin to become an ingrate, not to mention the fact he has a screw or two loose.

For the first time in her life, Thelma—a woman whose sole son always called her by her first name as if she were his lover—must act like a mother, albeit of the ‘tough love’ killing kind.

A mirthful yet macabre melodrama of the intrinsically incestuous sort, The Killing Kind is a potent yet perniciously playful tale about why slut single mothers should be cut off from the welfare state and why prison is probably not the best place for suburban momma boy rapists, at least if they are released in anything else aside from a body bag. A sardonic serial killer flick of the classically campy variety, The Killing Kind is one of those rare psycho manhunter flicks that features an ‘empathetic’ portrayal of the killer in question in a manner comparable to euthanizing a retarded Rottweiler puppy with rabies. Like virtually all of Curtis Harrington’s films, The Killing Kind, quite thankfully, has no happy ending and offers no inkling of solace to the viewer, and in the last interview ever conducted with the director before his death, he even proudly admitted “It’s amazing that I was allowed to get away with this” in regard to the tragic nature of his ominous picture in murderous oedipal obsession. Make no mistake about it, The Killing Kind is not an over-stylized ‘serial killer porn’ flick like Seven (1995) directed by David Fincher where an unhinged Übermensch psychopath plots a bunch of sophisticated ritualistic deaths to prove some mumbo jumbo psychobabble to impress Christian evangelist, atheist asshole, and Judaic Christ-killer audiences, but a very real, if compulsively campy, depiction of a deranged man of about average intelligence who has the grand misfortune of being born to a woman with a public cum-bucket between her legs. Still, despite the sheer and utter repugnance of both mother and son, it is interesting to note that despite their total lack of ability to socialize with anyone aside from one another, Terry and Thelma have an idiosyncratic bond that cannot be broken, at least until death do they part, thus making The Killing Kind a truly filmic family affair that everyone should see with their mommy this upcoming Mother’s Day!

-Ty E

RUBY
RUBY

Curtis Harrington (1977)

While the majority of experimental avant-garde auteur turned occult-inclined cult director Curtis Harrington's films were either senselessly butchered by studios and/or some sort of pompous prick of a producer, virtually every one of these tragically tainted films, including Ruby (1977)—a more than worthy rip-off of The Exorcist (1973) that features a seamlessly assembled hodgepodge of conventions from horror, thriller, film noir, Golden Age Hollywood melodrama, and gangster films, as well as a comforting dose of camp—make for singularly pleasurable experiences, sort of like Twilight Zone episodes on steroids, except all the more sinisterly sardonic. In fact, despite being one of the highest grossing independent films of its time before the release of John Carpenter's iconic slasher flick Halloween (1978), Harrington ultimately abandoned his authorship of Ruby by going to the Directors Guild and having the director's name credited as "Alan Smithee" because not only did writer/executive producer Steve Krantz (producer of Fritz the Cat, Cooley High) change the ending against the director's will (which Harrington and star Piper Laurie refused to re-shoot, so C-grade horror hack Stephanie Rothman did the dirty job), but also released a bastardized version of the film for television missing the best violence scenes, which were replaced with an apparently pointless subplot involving two characters that were nothing more than extras in the original theatrical release of the film. Luckily, about a decade ago, VCI Video released a DVD of Ruby that would amount to the closest thing to a director's cut (it is actually the original theatrical version that unfortunately features Krantz's conspicuously crappy 'horror' ending as Harrington's original poetic ending was permanently lost), at least as far as Harrington's original vision was concerned. As someone who never understand the seemingly hysterical hype surrounding The Exorcist (what is so strange about a Hollywood Hebrew directing an ostensibly 'Catholic' themed film about demonic possession?!), I was not particularly irked to find out that conman screenwriter Krantz penned Ruby with the rather blatant intention of cashing in on Friedkin's rather overrated yet undeniably financially successful flick, as auteur Harrington managed to turn it into his own idiosyncratic, if not blurred, vision, considering the artistically restraining circumstances. A reflexive movie set in a drive-in made for drive-ins, Ruby can no longer be experienced the way it was meant to be considering the almost complete extermination of outdoor movie theaters, but like Demons (1985) directed by Lamberto Bava, Harrington's creepy camp horror-noir hybrid makes for the next best thing as a potent, albeit discernibly flawed, piece of nightmare nostalgia, featuring burnout gangsters being strangled by film reels and hanged from giant drive-in movie screens, among other silly yet strangely charming Harrington-esque scenarios.

As phantasmagorically depicted during the opening scene of Ruby set in rural Florida during 1935, sleazy yet suave gangster Nicky Rocco (Sal Vecchio) was gunned down by his gang members while in the middle of a romantic night of swamp-side wine drinking with his pretty and pregnant gun-moll Ruby Claire (Piper Laurie of Carrie (1976) and David Lynch's Twin Peaks (1990-1991)). Apparently, the head mafia boss Jake Miller (Fred Kohler Jr.) did not take kindly to the fact that Nicky was an ambitious young who also loved Ruby, the Dietrich-esque Jazz singer. While gasping his last breath, Nicky, like any self-respecting Guido career thug, vows bloodthirsty revenge and he will ultimately use his unborn daughter to carry out his special Sicilian blend of supernatural vengeance. Flash forward 16 years later to the year 1951 and Ruby is a has-been diva who now makes her living owning/running a drive-in movie theater that anachronistically plays B movies like Attack of the 50 Foot Woman (1958). Despite the fact they all played a part in killing her great love Nicky, Ruby has employed all the members of the mafia gang, who have just gotten out of jail after serving lengthy prison sentences, to run the drive-in theater for the delight of a bunch of local yokel hicks in a rather socially absurd manner totally at odds with cinematic genre conventions. Ruby also has a steady relationship with sensitive yet stoic mafia man Vince Kemper (Stuart Whitman), who helped raise her and Nicky's 16-year-old daughter Leslie (Janet Baldwin), a mute bug-eyed girl of the seemingly autistic sort. Leslie's lack of character and inability to speak is more than made up by the fact that she is a medium who can have spirits enter her body, but, rather unfortunately, her deceased dago daddy is a deranged fellow who is about to bring death to his ex-compatriots via his sensitive spawn.

After a couple gang members are brutally murdered in a ritualistic fashion, it does not take long for Ruby and Vince, who dump their friends' corpses into a river to avoid pesky policemen, to realize that Nicky is making good on his promise of spiteful spectral necro-slaughter. In the hope of stopping all the spooky slayings occurring around the theater, Vince has his parapsychologist friend Dr. Paul Keller (Roger Davis of Harrington's TV-movie Killer Bees (1974), as well as Dark Shadows) see 'what's the matter with Leslie' and determine if it really is the Guido ghost of Nicky who is responsible for the mysterious killings that have plagued the quaint Florida drive-in. Not long after Nicky enters his daughter Leslie's body and beats up Ruby after accusing her of setting him up at the time of his barbaric death, but, in reality, the little lady never committed treachery against her lover, but instead, inevitably got sadistic revenge against Jake, the jilted lover and the mastermind of the mobster-on-mobster mob hit. After Nicky's archenemy Jake, who is now blind and wheelchair-bound and no longer a powerful Mafioso Don, rolls into the room dead with a knife symbolically pierced through his heart, Ruby reveals to Doc Keller that she avenged her perished lover's death by gouging out the eyes of the man who ordered the hit of her man. After using his daughter's body to levitate and perform telekinetic murders, Nicky ultimately convinces Ruby, who is more than willing, to meet him at the scenic swamp where he was killed. In one of the cheapest, most tasteless, and absurdly anti-climatic tacked-on endings in horror history, Nicky's skeleton, which resembles the cheap sort of plastic Halloween decoration you find at Wal-Mart, pulls Ruby under water, thus reuniting them for eternity.

RUBY

Like virtually any Curtis Harrington film, Ruby is big on atmospheric and morbid yet merry dark humor and, as the director described in his memoirs, "the film has found an admiring audience in Europe, and every once in a while, I meet someone who considers it one of my best films." Indeed, as someone who has become quite disillusioned with the horror genre, I find that Ruby—with its quasi-campy imagery and persuasion, cause-and-effect period piece setting, sweetly sadistic diva anti-hero, and nonchalant mutilation of genre conventions—makes for a much better way to waste 90 minutes or so than watching any of the films from the Friday the 13th series or even The Exorcist. Although Curtis Harrington would go so far as admitting that directing Ruby would prove to be "the most nightmarish experience" of his career and that he gets "very angry" anytime he re-watches it, the filmmaker's auteur signature bleeds beautifully a number of times throughout the work to distinguish it among the totally trashy exploitation trash that it is associated with. In terms of comparable works, Ruby is to Harrington's oeuvre what Touch of Evil (1958) is to Orson Welles, Caligula (1979) is to Tinto Brass, and Wild Side (1995) is to Donald Cammell, as a cinematic work ravaged by corrupt and uncultivated producers who sacrifice cinematic greatness for the quite dubious gamble of a hefty monetary return. Describing the producer who raped the soul of his film "both evil and stubborn," Curtis Harrington was just one of many tragic victims of an industry that strives to create philistine products for the peasant masses as opposed to cinema culture for the cultivated and would-be-cultivated. That being said, Ruby, ironically the director's most commercially successful film, will undoubtedly be most appreciated by those that already appreciate Curtis Harrington films, but will probably seem like a sort of 'The Exorcists for Grandparents' due to its nods to film noir, old school gangster flicks, classic Hollywood melodramas, and other films of yesteryear.

-Ty E

DEVIL DOG: THE HOUND OF HELL

Curtis Harrington (1978)

Poor Curtis Harrington. He was one of the first true American cinematic artists and a pioneer of both camp and cult cinema, yet by the 1970s, with the commercial failure of his Oedipus complex oriented serial killer flick The Killing Kind (1973), he had already entered the career-crushing abyss known as the television world. Of course, any great artist is better at polishing a turd than the average for-hire hack, so naturally Harrington made a number of notable made-for-TV cult horror flicks, including How Awful About Allan (1970), The Cat Creature (1973), Killer Bees (1974), and The Dead Don't Die (1975). While Harrington would continue to direct episodes of popular TV shows like Dynasty and The Twilight Zone until the late-1980s when his entire directing career totally expired, his last TV movie would be the so-bad-it's-good work Devil Dog: The Hound of Hell (1978) aka Devil Dog: Hound of Hell—a sub-dimestore work advertised by CBS as “A Halloween Howler” and starring Disney’s Witch Mountain series child stars Ike Eisenmann and Kim Richards. One of the things I like about Harrington, aside from his films, is that in any interview I have ever read or saw featuring him, the auteur never shied away from expressing his sheer and utter contempt for something, including his own films, with Devil Dog being a film he has shown nil reluctance trashing without mercy. In fact, in his posthumously released autobiography Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013), Harrington described Devil Dog as simply a “monstrosity” and added, “This whole film built up to a horrendous climax, where the Devil Dog is revealed, but since the producer would not spend any money on effects, the scene fell flat. It was laughable rather than scary. Thank god I had nothing to do with the post-production work. I was off the picture by the time they created that ridiculous scene.” Indeed, the ending of Devil Dog is about as climatic as seeing flies hover over freshly excreted doggy droppings, yet one would be lying if they did not admit that the film still manages to entertain, if not for all the wrong reasons. Belonging to one of the most innately idiotic and totally worthless subgenres of the rarely artistically merited horror genre, Devil Dog is, at best, the misbegotten mutt occult horror equivalent to Sam Fuller’s racially-charged and radically retarded negrophobic killer canine flick White Dog (1982). The ludicrous tale of a murderous German Shepherd in league with Satan that puts to shame the canines that ostensibly ate kosher babies at Auschwitz concentration camp, Devil Dog is a film that makes Cujo (1983) and Pet Sematary Two (1992) seem like cultivated celluloid cuisine by comparison, yet somehow I managed to enjoy it more than the latest Spielberg flick.

Rather ridiculously, Devil Dog opens with a couple wealthy Satanists blowing a couple grand on a German Shepherd bitch and using the poor doggy in a Satanic ritual that ultimately produces pernicious puppies in a scenario that steals liberally, if not ludicrously, from both Rosemary's Baby (1968) and The Omen (1976). Meanwhile, the Barry family's beloved bowwow is killed in a dubious hit-and-run accident involving a mysterious big black station wagon. By some miracle of fate, a seemingly nice fruit peddler, who is really a sinister Satanist incognito, shows up outside the Barry house and offers a precious little Alsatian Wolf Dog to the Barry children. After holding the puppy, preteen Bonnie Barry (Kim Richards) instantly falls in love with the doggy and her older brother Charlie (Ike Eisenmann) has a similar reaction. The family names the dog 'Lucky' and everything seems ideally perfect for the Barry family, but their superstitious Mexican Catholic maid feels there is something quite ominous about the dog. After the maid attempts in vain to warn patriarch Mike Barry (Richard Crenna) that the pup is pure evil, she dies in a freak fire. On top of that, one day while cutting the grass, Mike nearly severs his own hand in the lawn motor blade when the demonic doggy exerts control over his mind. Before long, every single member of the Barry family except father Mike becomes demonically possessed by the deadly devil dog. Needless to say, all hell breaks loose in sheltered suburbia when son Charlie frames a rival student by stealing a watch and planting it in said rival student's locker, thus enabling him to win a student election in a rather underhanded manner worthy of a psychotic Wall Street investment banker. Of course, papa Mike is rather perturbed when he discovers a Satanic altar in his attic and the fact his kids draw pictures of three-eyed Baphomet-like creatures is no less unsettling. With family friends dropping like flies and the nice next-door neighbor's dog being savagely shredded to pieces, Mike finally decides enough is enough and decides to rid his home of the killer canine. After making a couple attempts to shoot it with a gun and setting it loose in a faraway area outside of town, Mike gets desperate and decides to travel all the way to Ecuador after consulting an occult expert. On his pseudo-spiritual pilgrimage, Mike consults an elderly Indian witchdoctor/shaman, who reveals that the demon dog cannot be destroyed, but that it can at least be imprisoned in hell for another 1,000 years just as it had been previously. In the end, Mike gets involved in an absurdly anticlimactic showdown with the devil dog at a power plant of all places. After merely waving an arcane symbol scrawled on his hand by the witch doctor he met in Ecuador, Mike manages to defeat the dastardly devil dog. Unfortunately, as Mike's son Charlie reveals to his father at the conclusion of the film, there were apparently nine more pups in the bedeviled brood from which Lucky came, thus hinting at nine potential sequels to Devil Dog that were thankfully never made.

DEVIL DOG: THE HOUND OF HELL

Comparable to Wes Craven's suburban horror abortion Invitation to Hell (1984) in its unintentionally satirical pseudo-scares, hokey horror clichés, and shockingly banal The Brady Bunch 'wholesomeness,' Devil Dog is undoubtedly auteur Curtis Harrington's worst film and quite symbolic of what America thinks of its few great cinematic artists. Of course, Harrington did the film merely for the paycheck and so that he would not starve to death. In his autobiography, Harrington summed up the entire experience of making Devil Dog as follows: "The script was lousy and the producer, Jerome M. Zeitman, was determined to make the film within the budget he was given by the network. His only concern was to make the film for the cost of the licensing fee. You see, in the heyday of TV movies there was something called "deficit financing." A big company might pay a little more to make a movie with the idea that they would get it back in reruns and syndication. Zeitman was an independent producer and had given me an exceptionally tiny budget, even for television." Rather hilariously, in a featurette entitled "To The Devil a Dog" included on the 2-disc dvd set of Devil Dog released by Shriek Show, there are some somewhat recent interviews with producer Zeitman, who treats the film as a timeless masterpiece that is destined to spawn countless sequels and a remake. Undoubtedly, Zeitman (who describes Harrington as "giving a terrific job") seems like a carny-like swindler of the most pathetic and puffery-vomiting sort. In terms of the few positive aspects of working on Devil Dog, Harrington stated the following in his memoir: "I enjoyed directing Yvette Mimieux, who was one of the most beautiful actress I had ever worked with, and Richard Crenna, who was a total pro. But the film was an embarrassing disaster. And the slippery slope [of Harrington's declining career] only steepened." Personally, as a loyal friend of man's best friend, the whole evil dog gimmick has always felt like one of the most impotent and laughable sub genres of the horror genre and you probably will not find a better example of this than Devil Dog. A film that I can only really recommend to trash cinephiles, lard ass Anton LaVey groupies, and Curtis Harrington fans, Devil Dog is ultimately a piece of hellishly hackneyed hound horror dung that reminds the viewer that you cannot teach an older auteur new tricks, especially when working under the petty and artless art-loathing world of television.

-Ty E

MATA HARI
MATA HARI

Curtis Harrington (1985)

Without question, executed Dutch spy Mata Hari was a social-climbing slut and real-life femme fatale whose talent for flesh-peddling and leading on men for her own personal gain not only led to her own premature demise, but also the inadvertent deaths of tens of thousands of soldiers due to her espionage work. Although essentially a big budget softcore flick disguised as a spy thriller and World War I period piece, Mata Hari (1985) does a passable job in portraying the life and death of a female spy whose hypnotic sensuality was more deleterious to Europe's military officers than any flying bullets. Directed by the late great Curtis Harrington (What's the Matter with Helen?, The Killing Kind) and produced by Cannon Films, as well as starring the delectable yet tragic Dutch whore Sylvia Kristel of Emmanuelle (in)famy in the role of a historical Dutch whore, Mata Hari is relatively sympathetic to its protagonist, if not portraying her than a less than ingenious exotic dancer whose rampant moral looseness and weakness for aristocratic gentlemen put her in a wayward and wanton web of deceit, degeneracy, and—eventually—death. A woman who grew up in a broken home and who married a Dutch Colonial Army Captain twenty years her senior living in the then Dutch East Indies (what is today Indonesia) at the mere age of 18 after reading the man's 'wife-wanted' ad in a newspaper, which enabled her to socially climb to the Dutch Upper-class and live in relative financial privilege, Mata Hari (born Margaretha Geertruida Zelle) ultimately faced physical and emotional abuse from her husband (who kept a concubine), so she escaped to the wonderful world of xenophilia by studying Indonesian culture and customs, joined a local dance company, and de-Christianized herself "Mata Hari" (Indonesian for "sun" or literally "eye of the day"). After the death of her son under dubious circumstances relating to complications with syphilis (some believe that both of her children contracted the disease from their parents; others believe they were perniciously poisoned by a vengeful servant) and divorcing her husband, Mata Hari moved to Paris, France and dedicated her life to decadence and degeneracy as a so-called 'artistic' dancer, absurdly proclaiming to be an authentic Javanese princess and ultimately becoming the mistress of various wealthy industrialists, bluebloods, prominent military officers, and politicians. Essentially ignoring her entire back story before she became a celebrated dancer turned spy, Harrington's Mata Hari is mainly held together via a fictitious bizarre romantic triangle between Mata Hari and two friends/military officers, French Georges Ladoux (ironically played by Swiss-German Oliver Tobias) and the German Karl von Bayerling (further ironically played by Occitan French Christopher Cazenove). Sort of like Jean Renoir's anti-war masterpiece La Grande Illusion (1937) aka Grand Illusion meets Emmanuelle (1974), Mata Hari is softcore cinema with a couple campy shades of class that owes any 'artistic' merit it has to auteur Curtis Harrington's exquisite, if not absurdly eroticized, direction.

Mata Hari (Sylvia Kristel) is a bisexual babe who will screw any and every handsome (and sometimes less than handsome) man in a military uniform and when she runs into brothers from different mothers, Georges Ladoux (Oliver Tobias), a dark-haired Frenchman and Karl von Bayerling (Christopher Cazenove), a blond-haired German, admiring Indonesian art at a Paris Museum in 1914, they inevitably form a threesome on opposing sides of the war effort after the Great War breaks out. Hari enjoys mystifying her own background, proudly proclaiming to her gentlemen callers, "They told me I was a predestined soul, dedicated to Shiva, god of the mysteries of love." After boarding a train and spontaneously engaging with carnal knowledge with a 'handsome traveler' (Derek de Lint) who is absurdly killed during mid-coitus, horny Hari finds herself a murder suspect of sort, but is ultimately freed by her charming kraut boy toy von Bayerling, a classic gentleman and rare German Francophile who flirts with the exotic dancer with conspicuously cheesy lines like, "You remind me of Paris. Of everything that's intriguing, innovative, different." Unfortunately, von Bayerling's frog friend seems to be a lesser gentleman, as he frames Mata Hari as an informant and declares she join the Allied spy effort after running into her in Paris again where she is performing a six-armed Goddess Kali act. Mata Hari also has the misfortune of being blackmailed by two crazy kraut villains, a certain 'Fräulein Doktor' (Gaye Brown)—a demented doctor of psychology and mastermind of German intelligence who is quite butch, to say the least—and her Svengali-like assistant Wolff (played by Fassbinder superstar/perennial villain Gottfried John). Of course, being a dainty ditz with big tits, Hari's main motivation is attempting to go behind enemy lines disguised as a nurse and rescuing her Aryan charmer Captain von Bayerling after she learns he may have been hurt. In the process of her espionage escapades and sex-scapades, Mata Hari gets a number of fine young European men killed, but she almost makes up for it by thwarting an explosive Teutonic assassination plot masterminded by the nefarious Fräulein Doktor and her wolfish associate Wolff. Rather unfortunately, Mr. Ladoux catches Hari in a rather compromised situation where she is arrested for spying, given a show trial, and executed while her guilty French lover watches on. Possibly owing to Curtis Harrington's homosexuality, friends-turned-enemies Karl von Bayerling and Georges Ladoux find reconciliation over the mutual melancholy as a result of Mata Hari's very public execution, proving the truism 'bros before hoes' can be classy when in the context of old school European military officers.

In his posthumously released memoir Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013), director Curtis Harrington wrote regarding Mata Hari, which was incidentally his last feature-length film, "I think it turned out well. One French reviewer even said something to the effect of, "Kristel shows acting talent in this film that we had not suspected she had.” As was the pattern with many of my feature films, Mata Hari was better received in Europe than in the United States.” And, indeed, with its anti-war message and fratricidal and anti-romantic characterization of World War I, relatively respectful portrayal of the European aristocracy, depiction of an orgy and a lesbian Ménage à trios, poetically stylized battle sequences and sex scenes (including a female masturbation scene that producers forced Harrington to add to the film), and adulation of a high-class hooker, it is easy to see why the average John Wayne-wannabe American filmgoer might not have taken too kindly to Mata Hari. As proven by the unsealing of formerly confidential German documents in the 1970s, the real-life Mata Hari was indeed a German spy and not simply a scapegoat whose ‘glamorous’ execution, to quote one of the French military characters in Harrington’s film, would simply “do wonders for the Army’s morale.” Like the real-life Mata Hari, star Sylvia Kristel, who came from a broken home and was even molested as a child, was sexually exploited and thus would inevitably learn how to exploit her own body for personal gain. While Ms. Kristel was far from the greatest actress in the world, she was certainly a great choice for Mata Hari, even if her performance is totally eclipsed by Greta Garbo’s legend-creating performance in the pre-code Hollywood flick Mata Hari (1931) directed by George Fitzmaurice. As Harrington wrote in his memoir, “Sylvia was a huge star in France, and her fans came out in droves. These days Mata Hari enjoys a certain cult status among them, and maybe even a few fans of my own. I do believe I was able to add my touch to the proceedings.” And, indeed, without Harrington’s cultivated, if not compromised, direction, it is hard for me to imagine that I would enjoy Mata Hari as much as I do as a sort of lavish art-sploitation flick with a modest budget directed by an underrated auteur from a different era who was not a huge fan of Josef von Sternberg and friend of James Whale for nothing. As Mata Hari demonstrates, if anyone could bring class to celluloid exploitation trash and glamor to a glorified porn star, it was Curtis Harrington.

MATA HARI

-Ty E

SWEET ANGEL MINE

Curtis Radclyffe (1996)

It is not often that one watches a film that carries an aura that feels like Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) meets the TV-series Northern Exposure (minus an ample dose of the quirky humor) meets The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) with Lynchian undertones; as such an ideally idiosyncratic work – for better or for worse – certainly sticks out in one's mind. Last week, I had the random luxury of sharply gazing at such a work – Sweet Angel Mine (1996) directed by Curtis Radclyffe and co-scripted by Sue Maheu and Tim Willocks (Swept from the Sea, Sin) – and I was certainly not left with a feeling of chagrin, even if the film was not exactly up to par with seemingly equipollent works like David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986) and Philip Ridley's The Reflecting Skin (1990). In terms of quality, aesthetic, execution, and essence, Sweet Angel Mine is in agreeable company with Garth Maxwell's equally underrated and unseen film Jack Be Nimble (1993). Like Jack Be Nimble, Sweet Angel Mine is a work that although sometimes extremely violent and vulgar in regard to imagery and sentiment, features a certain metaphysical dream logic that further accentuates its quasi-mystical rural setting and the menacing mystique of its mentally-imbalanced characters. Sweet Angel Mine follows a bodacious and sometimes bratty twenty-something Brit named Paul (Oliver Milburn) who has traveled to Nova Scotia, Canada in the hope of finding his long vanished father. While keenly cruising around on his crotch-rocket (a 1973 T140V Triumph Bonneville), Paul eventually encounters a visibly hesitant, awkward, and somewhat feral-like yet pulchritudinous country girl named Rauchine (Margaret Langrick). Although Paul takes an instant liking to the sub-literate little lady and her young, voluptuous body, he has yet to realize that her mother Megan is a homicidal maniac who has intimate conversations with ethereal beings. In an attempt to get closer to Rauchine and what lies beneath her virginal white skirt, Paul convinces the always confrontational Meg to hire him as a laborer on her farm; a place where hogs engage in comical carnal knowledge and where many formidable family secrets lay in plain sight. Not long after taking residence on the farm, Paul begins to have less than wet erotic dreams about the atypical mother and daughter that eventually evolve into a real-life nightmare that inevitably leads him to solving the mystery of his father's unexpected disappearance and the bounty in Rauchine's panties.

As someone who has personally encountered the detrimental effects that mentally ill matriarchal mothers have over their physically and mentally abused daughters, I found Sweet Angel Mine to be an especially eerie yet radiantly-stylized cinematic work. In Hitchcock's Psycho, one learns that exceedingly bitchy and overbearing mothers can spawn sexually depraved homicidal lunatic sons, but the calamitous side-effects of a unhinged wench on a daughter is a subject that has been rarely explored in cinema, thus Sweet Angel Mine comes as a notable and mostly worthwhile exception, even if it does not feature the same psychological depth and wholly convincing acting one would expect from an Ingmar Bergman film. Upon first appearing in Sweet Angel Mine, it is quite apparent that Rauchine has virtually nil self-esteem and barely even a distinguishable personality of her own. After Megan initially appears it is obvious as to why Rauchine seems to have a glaring hole in her emotionally-ravaged soul, as the girl's callous and cunning mother dictates every thought and action of her grown daughter's life. It is only when she meets and swoons over Paul that Rauchine begins to form an identity of her own, thus resulting in a quasi-schizophrenic break in her psyche between her new organic self and the old one formulated by Meg's nefarious nurturing. Being a chivalrous and charming British chap, Paul is wholly willing to deal with Meg's backwoods megalomania and Canadian-peckerwood pomposity during his precarious mission to win Rauchine's heart. Of course, Paul also encounters hostility from local would-be-vikings yokels that are far from welcoming when compared to how the North American Nordics from Northern Exposure dealt with the ill-disposed and whiny Judaic fellow from NYC. In short, Paul is a strange young man in a strange sullen land, but he stays committed to the philosophy of 'love conquers all', in spite of it threatening his very existence. Although Paul is the lead protagonist of Sweet Angel Mine, Megan is ultimately the most complex and multifaceted character and a lot of this is owed to actress Alberta Watson's (La Femme Nikita, Hedwig and the Angry Inch) erotically and psychotically-charged performance. To say that Meg makes Paul seem like a bitch-that-eats-fish-n-chips would be a reckless underestimate. As Paul lets her know, Megan is certainly a cold cunt incapable of true love and human companionship, but she certainly knows how to (literally and figuratively) crucify a virile young man and handle a loaded firearm due to what seems like 2+ decades worth of steadily seething sexual repression.

SWEET ANGEL MINE

After appearing briefly on VHS, Sweet Angel Mine all but disappeared (only to be recently unearthed via Netflix instant-viewing) from the world and has henceforth remained a rarely seen work with a virtually nonexistent cult following, but I have a feeling that will change as the years pass as the film will certainly appeal to fans of Philip Ridley (Sweet Angel Mine is a virtual "sister film" to The Passion of Darkly Noon) and the less pretentious admirers of David Lynch's work. Unfortunately, director Curtis Radclyffe would go on to direct the rather mundane and fundamentally formulaic British horror flick The Sick House (2008), thus one can only wonder if Sweet Angel Mine is a fluke of sub-masterpiece psychosexual filmmaking; or a sound and succulent synchronistic marriage between director, screenplay, and actors (I would assume the latter). Either way, Sweet Angel Mine is undoubtedly one of the most audaciously ambitious and perversely gratifying works about a disintegrating derelict matriarchal family gone awry. If any film has the potential to inspire an individual to second-guess a relationship they have with a girl (or guy) who has a bats in the belfry mother, it is indubitably Sweet Angel Mine.

-Ty E

VERGEEF ME
VERGEEF ME

Cyrus Frisch (2001)

Like its more degenerate neighbor Belgium, the Netherlands has managed to produce a relatively remarkable amount of subversive and wildly idiosyncratic avant-garde and even mainstream auteur filmmakers, including Frans Zwartjes, Bas Jan Ader, Adriaan Ditvoorst, Jos Stelling, Alex van Warmerdam, Theo van Gogh, Nico B, Aryan Kaganof aka Ian Kerkhof, and Edwin Brienen, among various others. Most recently, a tall blond four-eyed chap named Cyrus Frisch aka 'Cyrus the Great' (Blackwater Fever, Oogverblindend aka Dazzle)—a man that could not more archetypically and banally Dutch in physical appearance—has been hailed by the Dutch press as the most subversive and iconoclastic 'enfant terrible' filmmaker in the Netherlands. A sort of 'dishonest documentarian' who cannot help but mix digital video fact with fiction, Frisch has been credited for directing the first theatrical feature-length fictional film shot on a cell-phone with his work Why Didn't Anybody Tell Me It Would Become This Bad in Afghanistan (2007), even though Aryan Kaganof was actually the first person to accomplish this with his feature SMS Sugar Man (while Kaganof's film was not released until 2008 due to problems with the distributor, the film was actually completely in December 2005). Frisch has utilized a number of audaciously absurd and admittedly oftentimes entertaining, if not morally retarded, gimmicks during his filmmaking career, including filming the death (!) and cremation of his mentor, Dutch film scholar Hans Saaltink, for his work k zal je leven eren... (1996) aka I Shall Honor Your Life after his comrade unexpectedly suffered a heart attack on his doorstep. Additionally, when the Netherlands' most influence film critic wrote regarding him and his work: "If I think of Cyrus Frisch and his films, the first word that comes to mind is: pathetic. A rebel without a cause. It's decadence without style, as if someone is stewing in his own dirt. Not inspired by cinephilia or any other examples...it's inventing film all over again for his own sake as a form of self-pity," the filmmaker fought back by directing a 70-minute piece with the rather fittingly title Zelfbeklag (1995) aka Self-Pity where the auteur tries in vain to drown himself in a fish tank while the negative review of his film is recited. Unquestionably, Frisch's greatest accomplishment thus far is the overly ambitious multi-media abortion Vergeef me (2001) aka Forgive Me, which is a sort of preposterously postmodern and obnoxiously self-reflexive play-within-a-film disguised as a documentary starring the director himself as himself, albeit with the ostensibly contrived persona of an immoral auteur who has made a Faustian pact to deliver the most devilishly degenerate, depraved, demoralizing, and dejecting film ever made. Indeed, starring a real-life cast of junkies, dipsomaniacs, ugly cripples, dirty whores and murderous mentally defective lard asses, Frisch's fucked flick is sort of meta-media digital video diarrhea that attempts to transcend Jerry Springer, Maury Povich, and Bumfights in terms of excessive exploitation of human misery and suffering as a work that, contrary to National Socialist propaganda films, proves that the Aryan mind can be just as defective as that of the most degenerate of the Juden.

Directed by a mensch who once stated, "It's only when we behave immorally that we can raise a discussion on ethics," Forgive Me is like the Dutch equivalent to kosher confederate avant-gardist Harmony Korine's Gummo (1997), albeit taking a decidedly Dutch pseudo-deconstructionist approach as opposed to a neo-Vaudevillian montage-like approach. A longtime work-in-progress, Frisch originally showed early footage of the film at the International Documentary Film Festival Amsterdam (IDFA) where, to the filmmaker's chagrin, the piece was warmly received, so the auteur decided to up the ante in terms of aesthetic aberrance and invalid exploitation. "THE TWILIGHT ZONE of reality" as reflected in Amsterdam's most physically and spiritually damned degenerates, Forgive Me is a dishonest piece of anti-cinematic (pseudo)honesty that attempts to be 'ironic' and 'insightful' in its meta-exploitation of invalids but it ultimately does very same that it seeks to criticize. At the beginning of the film, auteur Frisch self-righteously complains: "Can I say something? What I'm truly afraid of is that...What I think is really terrible is [...] if you spend your entire life watching television and every evening at 8 o'clock you watch the news and see what there is to see every day, at 80 you end up in a home and you're...There's no way you can cope with that. You take in all this information and you end up totally traumatized in a home for the elderly." When Frisch's comrade interrupts him by stating, "But Cyrus? What do you have to add with your films? Aren't your films just more pollution? Why do you make films?", the filmmaker retorts, "No. You don't have to watch my movies! I'm only saying that it's life-threatening. People need to understand! They need to see the influence of filming other people's suffering. What it means...And the impact it has on audiences." Messianic auteur Frisch believes, "some things should not be seen" and he decides he is going to fight back by absurdly showing things that certainly should "not be seen," arguing that with Forgive Me, "...I'm going to make sure it doesn't happen anymore. With this movie I'm going to go over the top! I'm going to cross the line! I'm going to cross the line of what's acceptable!"

In a keenly kitschy postmodern molestation of the cinematic legacy of Teutonic master auteur F.W. Murnau, Forgive Me juxtaposes scenes from Faust (1926) with phony inter-titles of the Devil stating, "I'll wrest the soul of Cyrus from God!" and thus the filmmaker subsequently makes his Faustian pact by introducing the motley crew of forsaken dipsomaniacs, junkies, and cripples. The first superstar introduced is hardcore middle-aged bisexual drunkard 'Nico,' who Frisch apparently met two years before in Amsterdam sitting in a broken down car in front of bar and liked him so much that he offered him a role in his film. Completely physically and mentally destroyed by his addiction to booze, Nico is hooked up to an IV and cannot even stand up, but that does not stop him from begging Frisch, "Please. Give me a drink... Or I can't take the pain." Somewhat unbelievably, during his early adult years, Nico went to college and during the very same time he was attempting to receive his graduate degree, he developed a fetish for hookers and hanging out in the Red Light District. Nico also likes men and attempts to coerce Frisch into giving him a big sloppy kiss, but the director is simply not dedicated enough to his art to reduce himself to the level of making out with a whacked-out wino that probably has at least half a dozen STDS. Nico and his slightly less trashy but no less broken girlfriend Chiquita once appeared on a terribly trashy Dutch TV show called 'Joy and Sorrow' where they discussed their various erotic excursions in the Red Light District. Chiquita is a chain-smoker who once burned her house down after falling asleep with a cig in her hand and Frisch helps fuel her vice by giving her a bag full of cigarette packs upon introducing her in the film. Despite being an exhibitionist of sorts who likes appearing on trashy TV shows and flashes her tits to Frisch without him having to ask her to do so, Chiquita apparently suffers from agoraphobia. Chiquita used to date an abusive cripple named Peter Franciscus Johannes Smits, but she had to dump him after he ripped her earlobe off. Peter is proud of having the "one in ten million" disease of Ehlers-Danlos syndrome (EDS), as he says it makes him feel "special," as he surely has nothing else to feel special about. Peter has a nearly 11-year-old daughter that he hasn't seen in 1 ½ years and Frisch attempts to coerce her into calling her, but he gets his ex Chiquita to do it instead, though she fails to get in contact with the little girl.

VERGEEF ME

Arguably, the most degenerate of the lot aside from Nico is a heroin-addicted Arab cripple named Achmed, who does not seem to like his white compatriots too much and complains that Dutch drug laws are not liberal enough, self-righteously remarking from his electric scooter: "The Netherlands is a smart country, know what I mean? You can't use drugs...but alcohol is available on every corner. That's what I don't understand about this society...Drugs aren't allowed, alcohol is...Why? Cars are run over with cars. You drink like a fish, you get behind the wheel and you're dead. And not just you. You take another with you. With drugs you only kill yourself. Maybe you lose a friend or two, but it's your own fault." Also unlike his friends, Achmed actually seems to care about Frisch's film, complaining when Nico goes on a belligerent drunken rant, "I want it to be a beautiful film, and not this bickering. When you go somewhere, you don't show up drunk." Ultimately, all the 'characters' perform Frisch's play Jesus/Liefhebber aka Jesus/Lover for a respectable bourgeois audience that would not touch the performers with a ten foot pole if their life depended on it yet have somehow been coerced in watching the novelty of seeing them in a stage-play. Needless to say, the play is a sad and pathetic joke where audience members laugh while Chiquita nods out while mucus leaks out of her mouth and nose, a completely unclad Nico masturbates on stage and waves his member at the audience while displaying his skeletal shoah-survivor-esque body, Peter does virtually nothing while sporting a beanie and a pair of shades, and Achmed takes long and effortless drags from a cigarette in between smoking heroin backstage. Of course, the proudly demoralized bourgeois audience gives the proud performers a standing ovation because they probably feel 'enlightened' that they had the opportunity to watch such an 'edgy' play.

A couple years after the performance of Jesus/Lover, director Frisch decided to interview the film's one and only true diva, Chiquita, about the aftermath of the performance and how it has affected her life. Probably to drive home the fact that the gutter diva is not all that different from certain international Dutch superstars in terms of the wanton and wayward fashion she chooses to live her life, Sylvia 'Emmanuelle' Kristel, herself a chain-smoker who began smoking unfiltered cigarettes at the age of 11 and died in late-2012 at the fairly young age of 60 from esophageal and lung cancer, briefly appears on stage as Chiquita's melancholy celebrity doppelganger. As Frisch explains, while the play was a hit that described by the media as "a new kind of theatre: reality theatre" and "a whole new form of engaged theatre," not one damn journalist, newscaster, or TV personality dared to check on the welfare of the performers, who had all sunken to an all-time low in terms of degeneracy as a result of their new celebrity. Chiquita describes how the experience made her feel that she had been "reduced to an actress" in her own life. Notably, Frisch arrogantly complains to Chiquita, "Since then that story has become reality and I can't stop it. I asked you to be yourselves...But you played roles. Now no one knows what's real and what isn't anymore. And that is the Twilight Zone of reality."

Indubitably, Chiquita's ex-beau Peter was most deeply affected by his newfound fame and when his mother berated him due to his dubious mainstream media reputation as a drug-addled mentally defective loser, he decided to get really drunk one night and ride his electric scooter off a loading ramp, thus causing him to break his back in two places. While Peter initially felt his role in Jesus/Lover was important because he believed "Insanity has elevated to norm. And that is a good thing too. Because the world is crazy," he could not handle his new infamy, so he killed himself on January 20, 1999. As Chiquita describes regarding her ex-lover, "he was so full of life" but "all this ruined him" and "...Now he's dead... and I always said: 'suicide in painless'." Forgive Me ultimately ends with a meticulously stylized yet aesthetically vulgar and intentionally kitschy pseudo-sentimental dream-sequence featuring a Zooey Deschanel look-alike (Ellen Ten Damme) with a handgun strapped to her leg frolicking around a scenic beach in a would-be-angelic fashion. Needless to say, the pixie girl's fun day at the beach is ruined when she happens upon destroyed American army tanks and a critically wounded Vietnam War era U.S. GI (absurdly played by Dutch-speaking junky Arab Achmed) who begs the little lady to kill him, and then goes out of character and tells Frisch to turn the camera off. After an inter-title appears reading, "Forgive...forgive me my trespasses!," the girl shoots the GI/Achmed and the film ends.

VERGEEF ME

After watching various annoying interviews with auteur Cyrus Frisch, I must admit that he seems like an autistic dilettante and perpetual bullshitter who wastes way too much time trying to justify his art in a groveling and less than sincere pseudo-humanist fashion in what can only be seen as a patently pathetic attempt to appeal mainstream left-wing film critics. In fact, a couple years ago Frisch started something called the “World Problems Project” where he hoped to assemble a group of international filmmakers that altruistic make films about major world problems so as to, “give a real impetus to constructive solutions,” thus reflecting the Dutch filmmaker’s exceedingly exaggerated and seemingly megalomaniacal sense of importance as a serious ‘artiste.’ Personally, I would have a lot more respect for Frisch if he just confessed he was a misanthropic and nihilistic psychopath and took a more stoic stance towards exploiting drunks, cripples, junkies, and human tragedy. After all, the last thing the world needs is another artist that thinks that they can save the world. In 2011, Frisch did a speech called “The Story of a Filmmaker Who Got Frustrated Because He Never Saved a Life” in Hong Kong for something called MaD (aka ‘Make a Difference’) where he almost breaks down crying while complaining about how he wishes his films could save peoples’ lives and then shows a scene from his work Blackwater Fever (2008) where the seemingly ethno-masochistic protagonist of the film cries hysterically because he feels impotent in the face of saving the lives of AIDS-ridden African negroes. Of course, as Frisch’s own work Forgive Me clearly demonstrates, the Netherlands has enough of its own serious social and cultural problems for a Dutch filmmaker to feel the need to worry about the problems of the third world. Of course, as a fellow that morbidly made a film featuring the death, funeral, and cremation of his mentor and whose debut feature Forgive Me more or less resulted in the suicide of one of its subjects, Frisch’s oeuvre is probably as sincere in its supposed humanism as Kurt Geron’s Theresienstadt. Ein Dokumentarfilm aus dem jüdischen Siedlungsgebiet (1944) aka The Führer Gives the Jews a City (1944), Sergei Eisenstein’s suppressed 1937 work Bezhin Meadow (which was partially made to cover-up the 1932-1933 Soviet genocidal famine Holodomor), and Harmony Korine’s Gummo (1997). Indeed, I am sure Frisch was laughing to himself when he came up with the title for Forgive Me, as he is a sort of Geraldo Rivera of the Dutch avant-garde film world, albeit minus the superficial charm and charisma. Unquestionably, culturally deracinated western liberal democracies are great at producing autistic and psychopathic individuals and Frisch is just as much a product of contemporary Holland as the anti-superstars of Forgive Me. Had Frisch lived in the Netherlands during an earlier era before the emergence of a morally bankrupt welfare state that pays for transsexuals to get sex changes (!), he might have grown up to be a Calvinist minister as reflected in his mostly flat affect. Indeed, while I enjoyed Forgive Me to some extent, I certainly find Frisch more disturbing than any of his works.

-Ty E

BLACKWATER FEVER
BLACKWATER FEVER

Cyrus Frisch (2008)

Judging solely from his previous works, it seemed rather unlikely that somewhat unhinged Dutch avant-garde auteur Cyrus Frisch (Selfpity aka Zelfbeklag, Dazzle aka Oogverblindend) would grow out of his meta-cinematic postmodern posturing, pre-packaged nihilistic gimmicks, uniquely inconsistent anti-aesthetics, and undying infatuation for media attention, but with his experimental quasi-existentialist road trip flick Blackwater Fever (2008), it seemed that he had finally got out of his self-designated artistic ghetto and began carefully assembling his own sort of distinguished cinematic language, or at least something certainly resembling one. For his first feature Vergeef me (2001) Forgive Me, Frisch absurdly attempted (emphasis on: 'attempted') to criticize the moral bankruptcy of Reality-TV and talk shows by directing the ultimate filmic freak show featuring exceedingly emaciated gutter-dwelling drunks, wheelchair-bound Arab junkies, and violent wife-beating cripples doing what they did best for an adoring audience of bourgeois dorks. Despite the fact that one of the anti-superstars of the film committed suicide as a direct result of the negative attention he received from the media after getting involved with Frisch's dubious antics, the filmmaker soldiered on without any regrets, confessing regarding the (non)actor's untimely death in an interview with Filmmaker Magazine: "Of course, I'm not really to blame for the death of Peter." Needless to say, Frisch had to at least attempt to try to top Forgive Me in terms of ostensible iconoclasm and carny-like showmanship if he wanted to stay relevant with the media and film critics, so he pulled off the stunt of filming his next feature Why Didn't Anybody Tell Me It Would Become This Bad in Afghanistan (2007) entirely on a cell-phone and even included a scene of himself in the film running down a public street naked, as if trying in vain to outdo the camcorder-based self-debasement of Hollywood teenage heartthrob turned junky trailer park auteur Giuseppe Andrews, who has never shied away from exposing his heart, soul, and his seemingly dirty dong for his homebrewed digital video creations. With Blackwater Fever, Frisch for once and all proved that he could make a carefully crafted experimental work that does not rely on mere shock value and is actually 'cinematic' enough to play in an actual movie theater. Following in the once-great tradition of existential road movies from the late-1960 to early-1980s like Michelangelo Antonioni's Zabriskie Point (1970), Monte Hellman's Two-Lane Blacktop (1971), and the works of Wim Wenders (Kings of the Road, Paris, Texas), Frisch's flick, not unlike French auteur Bruno Dumont's modernist realist horror show Twenty-nine Palms (2003), is just as much a metaphysical journey as a physical one as a work that features a look at the great American open road from the unique and unconventional perspective of a highly critical and sometimes cockeyed European lens. Indeed, when Frisch sees arid American deserts he does not think about cowboys and Indians or Breaking Bad, but towel-headed Islamic terrorists and starving members of the negroid race, thus reflecting the great disconnect between deracinated Western Europeans and intellectually unevolved and culturally-retarded white Americans.

The almost dialogue-less (non)story of a dull young Dutch dude and his equally mentally vacant dame as they aimlessly drive a convertible from Los Angeles to Las Vegas (or what Frisch lovingly described as, “the western consumer paradise”) and somehow end up driving through the war-torn Middle East and Africa on the way after the male protagonist develops the very serious eponymous complication of malaria that causes red blood cells to explode in the bloodstream, the releasing of hemoglobin directly into the blood vessels and into the urine, and oftentimes kidney failure, Blackwater Fever is a sort of transcendental fever dream on overdrive that demonstrates in a shockingly aesthetically resplendent way what it must feel like to be an impotent ethno-masochistic white liberal who has been brainwashed into wanting to save all brown people of the world, but is far too decadent, spoiled, weak, and naïve to do anything at all. Indeed, despite featuring a protagonist who feels he is a “murderer” because he cannot save the lives of poor starving and disease-ridden black Africans, Frisch’s flick is ironically probably the first film production in film history where the lead actor and various crew members decided to quit the project before it actually wrapped shooting because they felt that the director had exploited impoverished negroes, thus reflecting the unhinged and hilariously hyper hypocritical nature of the filmmaker who, somewhat admirably, seems to be willing to go to any extreme to get his desired effect in terms of artistic expression. Of course, as a member of the same people that tamed and civilized what would later be called South Africa, Frisch was merely unwittingly following in a great Dutch tradition when he made the film. After all, I am sure that the starving Africans that appear in the film were able to get a nice meal or two in payment for their admittedly grotesque and even horrifying Jodorowsky-esque performances.

Notably, in keeping in tradition with his singular dedication to meta-exploitative hyper-hyperrealism, Frisch had originally intended to shoot at an actual real-life food distribution camp in the Horn of Africa, but some pesky NGOs thwarted the filmmaker’s ambitious plans to capture real negro suffering—certainly something that whites, especially those of the privileged and educated sort, cannot seem to get enough of nowadays—so he had to step it down a notch and created his own makeshift Sudanese Dinka ‘village’ in Namibia where he cast fairly sick, hungry, and deformed locals to play the parts for a scene at the end of the film that some viewers might describe as ‘poverty porn.’ As Frisch once stated regarding the nameless and childish self-absorbed yet largely apathetic McWorld-minded protagonist played by Roeland Fernhout (Robert Jan Westdijk’s Siberia, Martin Koolhoven’s Suzy Q) and his ignorance towards human suffering, “This character has the feeling that he’s not really there. He’s driving through a civil war in Africa, but he might as well be watching MTV. I think it's very important to zoom in on the reality we live in nowadays." Luckily for self-flagellating whites, bleeding heart leftist wimps, and pedantic Adorno fanboys, by the end of Blackwater Fever, Fernhout's rampantly metrosexual and comfortably-numb Hawaiian-shirt-adorned character will be crying like a little ball-less bitch while holding a black baby in what one might describe as an allegory for the absurdity, impotency, and hopelessness of contemporary European xenophobic altruism. Indeed, Frisch might have intended to make a film that panders to the racially and culturally suicidal lemmings and automatons in academia and the media, as well as the so-called non-profit organizations that probably give the filmmaker funding, but what he ultimately unwittingly sired is a visceral and unintentionally honest depiction of the all-consuming nihilism of spiritually and culturally retarded modern European man who, with nothing left to conquer and thus nothing left to live for, has ultimately decided to interpret Rudyard Kipling's famous poem "The White Man's Burden" as a call to self-exterminating altruism via the ostensibly completely selfless devotion to ending the perennial struggle of billions of starving illiterate 'people of color' in the world.

BLACKWATER FEVER

Although the protagonist only says a couple words during the entire film, Blackwater Fever begins with Roeland Fernhout narrating the following words: "And now...images flow through my head that I can't get rid of anymore. When I look at myself, in the mirror...I see a man who watches others perish. I have the guts to look but not to do anything. I don't pick up the phone to call the police. I don't open the window to scream. When I look in the mirror...I see a murderer." Fernhout sees a murderer in the mirror as he suffers from a totally transcendental form of patently pathetic post-colonial 'white guilt' which he obtains after contracting blackwater fever while driving from Los Angeles to Las Vegas and somehow ending up in the arid wastelands of the Middle East and Africa. It is so hot outside that you can see the heat rise off the asphalt, but that does not seem to affect the protagonist, who is not much more than a posturing cipher with a fancy convertible, chic shades, and a hot token girlfriend who likes getting fucked on top of her seemingly half-braindead beau's car. Throughout most of the film, Fernhout does nothing but drive and drive as if to reflect the perennial nothingness of his consistently stagnant life of western luxury, but after contracting a bad case of blackwater fever he begins to see what he initially thinks are mirages that eventually become too potent for him to ignore, thus ultimately giving him a new perception of life and humanity in general. Although initially a mindless consumer and materialist, Fernhout eventually develops the distinctly European vice of deeply devout humanism of the social justice warrior sort.

In between ejaculating on the stomach of his equally cipher-like girlfriend (played by Ellen Ten Damme, who previously starred in Frisch's Forgive Me),

Fernhout begins seeing towel-headed Muslim terrorists executing prisoners while he is driving through the desert, though he initially ignores these unsettling visions. When Fernhout decides to leave the highway and drive off-road through the desert, he runs into a dead corpse covered with a cloak, but after looking at it for a second or two, he doesn't seem too impressed and keeps on driving. After suffering from a completely crippling bout of fever-induced shivering that involves him rolling around in a fetal position on the desert ground, Fernhout swings his girlfriend in the air while a rotten corpse sits in the foreground, as if to highlight his apathy towards human suffering or something. When a group of negro terrorists rape his girlfriend, Fernhout does not even seem to notice, even after his lover manages to escape from her savages rapists, runs up to him in vain for protection, and ultimately has her brains blown out right in front of his decidedly disinterested boyfriend. It is only when Fernhout stumbles upon a corpse-like tribe of totally naked starving, deformed, and/or diseased dying African negroes that Fernhout seems to pull his head out of his ass for the first time in his life and takes note of his surroundings. Indeed, Fernhout is somehow more concerned with the fates of random black tribesmen than that of his own girlfriend. While Fernhout simply cries hysterically while looking a hunchback negro and dehydrated corpse, among other barely human misbegotten creatures, he eventually has an epiphany of sorts upon finding and cradling a black baby, which he steals(!) from the refugee camp and then runs away with, as if he wants to be like Madonna and start a collection of third world Hominid accessories that he can show off to the paparazzi.

As Olaf Möller wrote in his article entitled 'Things Fall Apart: The Unflinching Cinema of Dutch Provocateur Cyrus Frisch' featured in the March/April 2010 issue of Film Comment regarding the manipulative tactics that the Blackwater Fever director utilized for shooting the final scene of the film: "When Frisch was barred from shooting this scene in an actual refugee camp, he built a set, filled it with emaciated extras, and then sent in his star unforeshadowed. The look of horror on Fernhout's face is real – the actor broke down, weeping uncontrollably. He fled the set and subsequently professed his hatred toward Frisch for subjecting him to the ordeal." While I think very little of the intellects of most actors and appreciate it when filmmakers go the extra mile to make a truly audacious cinematic work, I think Frisch is more of a socially autistic sadistic exploiter than the selfless and altruistic humanist crusader that he has attempted to portray himself as. Ultimately, Frisch seems no more sincere about his would-be holy mission to save starving and dying untermenschen than when superlatively spoiled Hollywood superstars that live in virtual fantasy worlds like Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt walk down the red carpet and show off their latest living dark-skinned acquisitions from sub-Saharan Africa and Southeast Asia. Indeed, as far as I am concerned, Blackwater Fever is not an allegory for the spiritual transformation of a spoiled self-absorbed westerner into a humanist freedom-fighter as Frisch intended, but an accidental allegory for how seventy years of Americanization, Hollywoodization, and philo-Semitic xenophile-based reeducation has deracinated Europeans and whites in general and transformed them into soulless automaton-like slaves who have been carefully programmed like a rabid Pavlovian dog to care more about a rotting negro corpse in some faraway African desert wasteland than seeing their girlfriend gang-raped and executed by a militia of bloodlusting and rape-hungry Mandingo Islamists right before his very eyes. Call me crazy, but if I was forced to choose between sparing the life of my girlfriend or the lives of millions of third worlders, I would not think twice about picking the former and I certainly cannot under the mentality of people that would choose otherwise. While I would normally be annoyed by a film featuring such a shamelessly and pathetically ethno-masochistic conclusion, Frisch—an auteur that seems to suffer from sort of mental illness on the autism spectrum as reflected by his almost childlike intrigue in regard to real-life human misery and suffering—managed to assemble a film that, in spite of its intended message, ultimately succeeds in doing something that is infinitely more interesting by potently expressing the sheer and utter deadness of the Nordic soul, as well as the pathetic level that Faustian man has reduced himself to, as the world's foremost conqueror turned world's foremost cuckold and self-appointed adoptive parent of the entire untermenschen. Surely, I would have had more respect for the protagonist of Blackwater Fever if he had either killed himself at the end of the film instead of deciding to devote his life to a starving spade babe. Unquestionably the most ambitious, original, atmospheric, and strangely pleasantly paced road movie since American Guido hero Vincent Gallo's predictably condemned The Brown Bunny (2003), Frisch's experimental cinematic trip is a rare contemporary European flick that, for better or worse, actually manages to capture the particularly troubling spirit of its foredoomed zeitgeist. If space aliens ever came to earth and wondered why the white man helped to pave the way for his own extinction, they can just watch Blackwater Fever and examine the warped psyche of the film's less than heroic slave-morality-ridden hero, who epitomizes everything that is sick, pathetic, and absurd about the post-WWII European mind.

BLACKWATER FEVER

-Ty E

DISTURBIA

D. J. Caruso (2007)

Disturbia is yet another piece of horror trash from the bowels of Hollywood hell. The film made a lot of money for its putrid scum investors. Disturbia is Alfred Hitchcock's Rear Window that takes place in some pathetic zio-clown teenager's neighborhood. I really hope the film's protagonist is sodomized by a group of black bikers, if there is a sequel (which there will be). The monetary success of Disturbia (grossing over $100 million) only confirms the inept minds of the movie going audience. I can imagine American's running to theaters to see a film of Steve-o from Jackass shitting in a hotdog bun and feeding it to a drunken horny Mexican. The film would be revered as poetic genius and receive "two thumbs up" by Richard Roeper (just as Disturbia received). Roeper must have really had his eye on Disturbia star Aaron Yoo. Two hermaphrodites fall in love in the name of equality. Disturbia's star protagonist Shia LaBeouf for some reason has pubic hair on his head. He also has a special hatred for Mexican invaders with jobs of authority. I think they both have more in common than they would like to admit (like America's decline?). The love interest in Disturbia has the body of a 14 year old gangly boy. I guess LaBeouf had to settle for the next best thing. The countdown clock for Armageddon is set. King Tom Will Smith is ready to light the fuse. The high antichrist priest Steven Spielberg will be leading the way into hell. The apocalypse will be produced by Michael Bay and will be starring Tom Hanks. Disturbia star Shia LaBeouf only gets to be an associate demon.

-Ty E

EAGLE EYE
EAGLE EYE

D. J. Caruso (2008)

-Spoilers-

I recall the trailers for Eagle Eye. Shrouded in mystery, all I knew or thought was that its roots were based in cyber-terrorism as demonstrated ever so generically in Live Free or Die Hard. When it finally came time to view the film, I only really wanted to spoiler information. I had no interest in seeing a Shia Labeouf led action film. I had been tricked into watching him swing like Tarzan once. Never again. When it came time for me to view this film, I found the experience inevitable. I was slowly sucked into the world of Jerry Shaw. This wasn't a new path for me. I had recently found myself taking part of a viral "game" for Eagle Eye. I hit gold as the mysterious female voice called me at 3 am to get me to stop a frizzy haired interracial musician from escaping, thus saving his life. His airbags deployed and I watched his car crash. It was an effective experience. It was too tempting to put my random friends digits into the database so they too could be tortured. The musician reminded me of Eagle-Eye Cherry. Coincidence? I think not. Eagle Eye isn't the political espionage film you were probably expecting. 3/4ths of the way in, It halts and malforms into a vague science-fiction thriller. Eagle Eye is more exciting than Terminator 3 ever aspired to be. It also fails beautifully at being an apocalyptic tale, but I still have some respect for it. It might be the most visually entertaining movie in theaters at this point and that is something to acknowledge. Much of the excitement of Eagle Eye lies within the given scenarios, chase missions, and the implied violence. PG-13 for Intense Scenes of Action and Violence. Violence is the right word. So many police officers died horrible deaths in this film due to a negligent computer system. Many hypocrisies can be found in the tattered philosophy of this film, but then again, Eagle Eye only exists to cater to Shia teenyboppers and fans of grisly car accidents. Eagle Eye features hundreds of deaths involving innocent civilians and government workers. Some of these deaths defy all pivotal points of the cognitive imagination. This "cyber-terrorist" houses some extreme dissent for all humanity. Eagle Eye could have easily worked NWA's Fuck the Police on the soundtrack but the R rating is something DJ "Disturbia" Caruso fears. Not all directors can be stuck-up budget bastards. All in all, I got a mixed bag. I got wonderful action settings and great acting; Phenomenal acting even. The story had enough potholes in it to bring a stop to an extremely large truck, but I found myself content for 2 hours. Many aspects could have been worked on, but I'd rather look at this film as the bastard child of Terminator and 2001: A Space Odyssey than the original film it planned on being.

-mAQ

THE WHITE ROSE

D.W. Griffith (1923)

Immediately following a public screening at a local university for the German flick The Nasty Girl (1990) aka Das schreckliche Mädchen—a kosher kraut comedy if there ever was one about a busybody bitch of a young broad who takes it upon herself to prove and expose the fact that many people from her own hometown were nefarious Jew-slaying National Socialists—I was intrigued to see a Jewish man get up and question the seemingly unending self-loathing of modern day Teutons and their pathetic and perverse pathological proclivity toward apologizing for the supposed crimes of their fathers and grandfathers. The Brechtian piece of celluloid barf, The Nasty Girl, was directed by an ethno-masochistic far-leftist feminist Bavarian by the name of Michael Verhoeven, who is the prodigal pussy son of National Socialist propagandist filmmaker Paul Verhoeven (of no relation to the Dutch Robocop director of the same name). Undoubtedly, if Verhoeven inherited anything from his father, it was his propensity for making celluloid propaganda, albeit of a lunatic left-wing fashion as if the auteur was trying to make up for every ostensible cinematic wrong his padre made, while at the same reaping scorn on said padre in a manner not unlike how Thomas Harlan (Torre Bela, Wundkanal) would dedicate his entire commie celluloid career to trashing his father Veit Harlan's legacy as the Third Reich's greatest high-camp auteur. Seeing that Michael Verhoeven is a sort of celluloid cuckold who oftentimes portrays fiery yet pedomorphic females as absolutely revolting revolutionary heroes, it was only natural that he would direct Die Weiße Rose (1982) aka The White Rose, a film about the so-called 'resistance group' of the same name whose most famous member, Sophie Scholl, and her brother and four other members were arrested by the Gestapo and inevitably beheaded via guillotine in 1943. Naturally, since they stood up to Uncle Adolf and his regime by passively protesting through the pansy power of leaflets/articles (none of which were actually written by Sophie Scholl), the murdered members of the White Rose are now considered martyrs and their little legacies have since been lamentably eulogized to great acclaim by films like Verhoeven's The White Rose, a agitprop and sociopolitical puffery piece directed by a would-be-auteur whose hatred of his own ancestry and heimat are all the more potent than his rather vapid and vain artistry. If you like the sentimental stupidity of holocaust hogwash like Jakob the Liar (1999) and The Boy in the Striped Pajamas (2008) and philistine feminist flicks like The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum (1975) and North Country (2005), The White Rose might be the perfect film for you.

Opening with the quote, "If a wave of protest rolls across the country, if "it's in the air," when many people join, then, in one last powerful effort, we can get rid of this system," which was apparently taken from the first leaflet from "The White Rose," it is quite obvious from the get go of The White Rose that director Verhoeven actually believes the Scholl siblings posed a bigger threat than they did. The year is 1942 and the place is Munich, Germany. The 21-year-old college student Sophie Scholl (played by Lena Stolze, who also played Scholl in Percy Adlon's Fünf letzte Tage (1982) aka Five Last Days the same year) is an annoying, cutesy girl who thinks she can get away with everything because of said conspicuous cuteness, so when she discovers that her brother Hans (Wulf Kessler) and his 'Christian socialist' comrades, all students at Munich University as well as a subversive philosophy professor Kurt Huber (Martin Benrath), have started a softcore anti-violent resistance group called the "White Rose," she makes it her business to join, despite her bro's objections. By anonymously distributing pamphlets about how the Nazis are the "master racists" and painting anti-Hitler graffiti on public walls, the White Rose begins developing a sort of unofficial following, which naturally irks local National Socialists, who inevitably bring in the Gestapo to rid Munich of the pacifist virus. Meanwhile, Sophie is in a relationship with a tall, dark, and handsome Luftwaffe pilot named Fritz (Ulf-Jürgen Wagner) who has been sent away to fight on the Eastern Front, likes to make childish jokes, and looks strangely like his girlfriend's brother. Naturally, The White Rose features superlatively sensationalized Spielberg-esque scenes (aka 'holocaust porn') of tall, blond, and handsome Aryan soldiers stripping poor innocent Jews of their clothes and executing them with the same robotic and detached precision as cyborg Herr Schwarzenegger in The Terminator (1984). After a nauseatingly nasty Nazi Gauleiter makes an unpopular 'anti-feminist' speech at Munich University about why young women should spend their time breeding strong Aryan boys instead of becoming second-rate intellectuals and whatnot, the White Rose gains more support, but it cannot save its members from a deadly date with the ungodly guillotine. Although not contributing to any of the White Rose writings, Sophie demonstrates her dedication to the cause by rather conspicuously purchasing 50 postage stamps, as well as posing as a secretary, so she can steal tons of paper. After siblings Sophie and Hans Scholl, as well as their comrade Christoph Probst (Werner Stocker) are caught distributing naughty anti-Nazi articles at the university, they are arrested by the ghastly Gestapo, firmly questioned, and swiftly executed. Of course, only the most patently pernicious and excessively evil regime in human history could make the head roll of a pretty pedomorphic humanist Christian girl.

THE WHITE ROSE

Rather absurdly, in a 2003 poll for the show Unsere Besten ("Our Best") broadcasted by the German public television channel ZDF, Sophie and Hans Scholl were voted the fourth "most important Germans of all time" by the German public, even beating Bach, Bismarck, Goethe, and Gutenberg, thus demonstrating the overwhelming sense of guilt the modern Teutons have as a result of the Third Reich. Additionally, what seems all the more absurd is the fact that Claus von Stauffenberg—an infinitely braver man who actually went into the 'belly of the beast' and attempted to assassinate Hitler and 'take back' Germany from nefarious Nazi hands—was not considered greater than the Scholl siblings whose patently passive actions were ultimately futile and whose legacy is mostly superficial as rare gentle Germans who ‘resisted Nazism’ in the now-cliche bourgeois leftist university protester sort of way. Of course, as Hollywood’s holocaust campaign grows more hostile as the decades pass, Sophie Scholl has only become all the more popular as demonstrated by the mainstream kraut flick Sophie Scholl – The Final Days (2005), which is quite similar but ultimately inferior to Verhoeven’s similarly aesthetically and melodramatically mundane The White Rose, although it would win two Silver Bear awards, including for Best Director and Best Actress (Julia Jentsch) at the 2005 Berlinale Film Festival, on top of being nominated in September 2005 for an Oscar in the category of Best Foreign Language Film. Indeed, rather unfortunately, it seems the White Rose myth will continue to live on cinematically, with Michael Verhoeven’s The White Rose being the odious archetype for an almost imaginary anti-Nazi resistance that achieved virtually nothing except posthumous fame created by largely self-loathing and left-leaning Germans looking for any example and/or proof that not all krauts were demonic kike-haters. Of course, if Germany won the Second World War, who would still know the names Sophie and Hans Scholl today?!

-Ty E

NÓI ALBÍNÓI
NÓI ALBÍNÓI

Dagur Kári (2003)

More barren than the Sahara, Dagur Kári's film is the Icelandic answer to Donnie Darko. 100% more mesmerizing and a greater tragedy, Nói albínói is a film that defines a certain country's cinema. On the same level as such great films as Bad Boy Bubby, this story too deals with dysfunction, although not as extreme or vulgar. Nói is a prodigy; a boy capable of completing a Rubik's Cube in seconds flat but is stricken with the overbearingness of his father and his mother's borderline insanity. In this arctic wasteland, there isn't much to do. While getting his bottle of Malt, he meets a beautiful woman named Iris. This one fateful encounter kick starts a cycle of events leading to a horrific tragedy, one of likes which haven't been experienced before. Vincent Gallo's The Brown Bunny was such a disaster due to some philosophy he carries believing that nothingness can be considered art. This, as you know, failed horribly, leaving the film with stains of the humiliation encountered at Cannes. Nói achieves what seemed to be impossible; make a contemporary classic staying along the guidelines for being minimalistic. In fact, this film might as well have been Dogme 95. The uber-genius happens to also be an albino. Before you begin to mix facts with the film Powder, Nói didn't have any special powers except for an uncanny brain. The film is mixed with symbolism, snow glare, breath-taking cinematography, and characters you might actually care about. Alcoholism, underage obscenity, blood splattered dinner; Nói albínói is entirely one of a kind. This film will remind you of the special feeling within discovery. A dazzling portrait of snowbound calamity.

-mAQ

GEN-012

Daikichi Amano (???)

Some, some time ago I reviewed an abomination to cinema and porn, even cinematic porn. That [GEN-018] vile creation was my introduction to the radical redesigning of fetishism courtesy of the Genki studio. This studio, head by Daikichi Amano, specializes in a niche unpopulated by faces and names, rather victims and masochists. Featuring the new standard in degradation, many volumes chronicles women being sodomized with various insects, vertebrae, and invertebrate alike. GEN-012 features similarities to what 018 had so fondly dissected onto the quivering flesh of a nubile Asian woman in a manner that begs the question "How much are they getting paid?" Unlike the previously reviewed 018 entry involving fish, volume 12 concerns loaches and eels. To rip the roughly translated title to further give depth to the plot - "The loach's punishment and lesbian's desire in eel's crime". Further apart from its later predecessor, GEN-012 also bares a semblance of plot as our three leading ladies are witnessed gagged and blindfolded perched on the rim of a large metal drum, feet immersed in the cool water within. Upon further inspection, the water is revealed to contain swimming eels, assuredly amidst their own unknown thoughts and instincts. To think of the creatures reaction if they were to discover just what forms of sodomy await. This alone derives new meaning of the term "sadism". Hell, de Sade himself would be cowering at the voracity of Amano and his crew, voyeuristically speaking.

Beyond the extensive foreplay featured in GEN-012 is a voiced offender offering up unknown yet assertive orders to the women we can claim have no idea just what the purpose of this experiment is. Soon the fellow appears, mask and all, and kneads the womens breasts and mouths with the bodies of several eels. This doesn't necessarily shock though. If you're any advocator of Japanese culture, tentacle erotica should not be considered faux pas but as an accepted trait of the Japanese since its appearance in some time during the 1800s. Continuing on with the events, soon many wriggling eels coax screams from the written damsels. When the villain finally unmasks his dubious intentions, the series' consistent trademark of pantyhose is introduced over the women's faces, bulging to the breaking point with loaches and eels alike. Uttering nonsense, at least to an American audience, these women are seen hesitantly biting at each others stuffed "masks" and unleashing a torrent of slimy creatures over their laps and in their mouths. It's funny to anticipate this torture due to a purported threat over the loudspeaker.

In several ways, GEN-012 is the ultimate "grrl power" trip / feminine camaraderie adventure. This "film" just goes to show the lengths of extremities women are prepared to endure on account of an imminent threat on ones life. Being a woman surely is a hazardous occupation, one that requires little work however.

GEN-012

As fictionally evidenced, still a viable form of proof though, enemies the world over utilize women for one thing only - sex. Before you can admire the subversive yet slimy rendition of the bare minerals Spice World had to offer, these women find themselves trouser-less being spanked with the tails of eels. Of course people reading this are going to jump to outrageous conclusions, hopefully as outrageously esoteric as this film's material is. GEN-012 is the standard for a soapy mosaic of eel penetration. However, if you're searching for films completely revolting, you might want to strafe to either of the adjacent films in the GEN series. GEN-012's introductory sentence of mundane teasing runs as long as 40+ minutes. That equates to over half an hour of women silently sobbing getting their breasts lathered with marine slime. If you entered this film expecting what I had been expecting, you would be disappointed. Amano doesn't skim though, GEN-012 is full of interspecies sadism. Disgusted women can shriek to both sides of nature, the anthropic kind or towards the plight of said species: cockroach, dog, earthworm, loach, eel, fish, scorpion - Genki does it all.

Something as primarily universal as Japanese tentacle fetish is singled out as revolting and adverse. These terms of speculation are utterly appalling though. The same in which you might judge a friend or foe for whatever fetish he might conceal. Point is, fetishism is something everyone masks. You might look at a co-worker or peer in a way situational to conventionalism but know this, he/she, too, hides a dark secret of arousal, the same as you or I. Soon after the traumatically timed foreplay reaches an end, dunking occurs, the sexual torture escalates, and 012 finally matures into the tarnished slice of degradation that the namesake alone promises. Long time coming but it rounds out nicely with a coupling of swings supporting splayed legs. As per Genki standard, stuffed panty hose to illustrate Eastern voluptuousness, the hundreds of struggling creatures arouse the genitals of any-a-poor-mistress. Objects of desire don't come clearer than this, GEN-012 is not safe for anybody - but withstands a trial of adultery and bestiality combined.

-mAQ

GEN-018

Daikichi Amano (???) WARNING: IF YOU ARE EASILY OFFENDED AND PRONE TO SICKNESS, DO NOT PROCEED(The Fish That Has Is Crunched And The Wound Is Received)Chances are, if you have read Soiled Sinema before, you have come across a review to a particularly nasty piece of film called MASD-004. That being of the scatography collection, It might be the most uncivil cinematic trial anyone has ever been faced with. Well, turns out there are more in this bizarre series of the J-AV's. Expanding from MASD to GEN. MASD seems to be body fluids and GEN seems to extend into...slimy...amphibians and fish.Yes, that is right. Fish-rape-porn. What makes this more disgusting than MASD-004 is the entire feel. Sure, feces covering a crying womans face is disgusting, but getting sodomized by slimy fishermen with even slimier fish just hits it home with me. I could actually smell the disgusting sea smell when i watched this and it refused to leave me. So, the film opens up with a pretty Japanese woman getting molested by two oil-covered fishermen. Like any porn, it starts out with foreplay, then they pull out two fish and begin to stuff her mouth with them.At this time, she has about 4-5 medium sized fish in her mouth. The fishermen cut one open, spilling its blood, oils, and intestines all over her breasts and procede to use a large trout to perform fellatio on himself. Then he brings the girl into it. While she is getting mouthraped? (Roleplay mind you) the other fisherman taunts her with fish, cutting off littles pieces and shoving them in her mouth. The end result of the first scene is her covered in sperm, vomit, fish, and oil. The next scene thankfully happens to be the last, but in that regard, tens times more violent and putrid than the last.The woman is lying on the floor naked playing with little fish, biting their heads off and squishing them beneath her toes. She grabs a handful of fish and begins to fill her mouth with them yet again, only this time savagely devouring and spewing these raw fish back onto herself. The fishermen come back and in the last 20 minutes, manage to throughly ruin my life by injecting a large quantity of milky residue and fish eggs into her anus, and performing bird-like acts feeding chewed up fish to her while fucking her propped on a swing. GEN-018 is without a doubt, the sickest film i have ever seen. To call it porn, it must have some attraction. GEN-018 does not.A beautiful piece of irony. I google GEN-018, i get fish porn. I google GEN-017, i get the bible.Official Website: WARNING GENKI

-Maq

RED ROOM
RED ROOM

Daisuke Yamanouchi (1999) Red Room is a not-so-typical Japanese underground splatter film, which finally got a decent release. Director Daisuke Yamanouchi seemed to have CUBE in mind while directing this sleaze fest. This film has been circulating the Internet via various torrent sites without subtitles, making ridiculous claims as in “You don’t need the subtitles to understand the plot”. Well you do need subtitles, or else there is no character at all, Just scene after scene of pointless perversion and mild-mannered implied violence.

The plot concerns The Forbidden King Game. 4 players, and 4 cards. Whoever draws the king card gets to tell 2 of the members what to do to each other in a cage or else they get disqualified. Winner takes home 10 million yen, which is 89,730 US Dollars. We have a almost divorced couple, whose marriage and lives rest on getting this money, and we have a pair of sisters. They each have their story behind wanting the money. You know that the couple is in debt off the get-go, but you don’t realize the others purposes until later.

Not much is known about this red room. Strange men record it from somewhere else and speak in a voice changer. I guess the actions of the characters overshadow the curiosity that we should feel while watching these acts of anger.

Many things in this film hit me with a bad note, the violence being my number one problem. This film is made to sound wholly graphic and over the top, but it is just the bastard son’s of media hype. This film is loaded with implied scenes and lots of disgusting sound effects. The film opens up with two girls making out and the accompanied sound effect sounds like someone is fucking a jar of mayonnaise. Then you get the infamous “Light Bulb” scene, which is a complete disappointment, but in no way do these trivial errors and goofs make for any less of an entertaining trip.

The ideas for the torture and degradation are very interesting to watch on screen. They seem to have borrowed the concept of the spinning chair from The Devil’s Experiment. This film is very focused of revealing a monster inside everyone and does that quite well. One thing i really did appreciate the film for is it’s excellent soundtrack. It greatly reminded me of Nubohiko Morino’s work on Versus. Such a goofy film with a thumping dance soundtrack.

Films like these can be compared to “Niku Daruma” or even “Mu Zan E”. These are more examples of films circulating in the genre of extreme Japanese underground horror. The way the characters are developed is very bizarre and works out in advantage of the director. You hate every single character in this film. They all are disgusting wastes of human life, and to top it off, annoying as shit. I didn’t feel bad in the entire movie, no emotions, just violence.

A decent “extreme” film but leaves much to answer. Expect Red Room 2 to be released soon by Unearthed Films.

-Maq

TRILOGY OF TERROR II

Dan Curtis (1996)

If you follow cult cinema or even the classics, chances are that you have heard of Trilogy of Terror, and if not, then you have seen the infamous Zuni Fetish Doll. Trilogy of Terror is a three-part horror thriller made-for-TV movie that surprisingly horrified audiences with its story Amelia. This story, is about a killer African doll. Due to the original's success, they decided to make a sequel, also featuring its own beloved mascot. THE GRAVEYARD RAT The first story of the three is the second best, mainly due to the cheese and the slight rip-off it did from King's Graveyard Shift. It is called The Graveyard Rats. The plot is a very contrived one, as we have seen it many, many times before. A woman and her incestuous liaison plot to kill her over-bearing husband to get the will money. Little does she know, that the plot of land that they bury him on is home to dog sized rats. It's a fun little story, that is filled with hokey acting, ode's to noir, and manages to create sock puppet rats that are quite hilarious. Overall, an amateur attempt at creating cinema, but a grand attempt at making a comedy. BOBBY This story is the worst of the three, and features one of those twists that actually forces you to watch the entire runtime for its anti-climatic payoff. A woman summons the power from some false god to bring her son Bobby back to life. This happens, but this life around, he seems a lot more pissed off. Thus, a horrifying game of hide & seek ensues. Yeah, this story tried to capture the feel of child malevolence that The Good Son had, and fails pretty bad. Bobby is a whiny, blond-haired, bitch-boy whose voice constantly cracks while trying to sound sinister. Watch the end for a laughable mock-up of Goosebump's "The Haunted Mask." HE WHO KILLS This is the one you've all been waiting for. The alarming Zuni doll has its triumphant return in this shortly-after sequel. The crime scene at the end of the first movie has been discovered and the charred doll has been sent to a laboratory to be examined. All hell breaks loose when people and their close-mindedness decide to fuck with black magic. Hilarity ensues. The doll manages to rip its way through Italians, and Jewish people (Rothstein) until its conclusion. He Who Kills is easily the best in the set, and might be worth the price just for a cap to close the story on. Overall, this collection is pretty pathetic, and doesn't even touch on the same ground as the original did, but is still wholly humorous and might be worth your time. I wonder if Mike Patton voiced the doll. If not, he should have.

-Maq

THE RETURN OF THE LIVING DEAD
THE RETURN OF THE LIVING DEAD

Dan O'Bannon (1985) Over the years, my "love" for the horror genre has waned. I find my stomach turning when I hear that an old classic is being remade or another sequel is in the works. One of my all time favorite horror films of the 1980s is the classic Return of the Living Dead. The film, of course, has an abundance of horrible and banal sequels that always trick horror fans into watching them. I guess it is just hard to deal with the fact that none of the many sequels can come even close to "living" up to the original. I listen to the song Party Time by 45 Grave anytime that I want to reflect on the film without actually watching it. Death-rock and the horror film is a splendid match made in hell. Return of the Living Dead has one of the best soundtracks to ever compliment a horror film. The Cramps, The Damned, The Flesh Eaters, and T.S.O.L. (unfortunately not the original line-up) add a certain fun eerie sound to an already competent horror flick. The punk rockers featured in Return of the Living Dead, for once, actually have music that compliments their aesthetic.

She also experiences her fantasy of being ripped apart by a bunch of old (and dead) men. When Trash comes back as a zombie, she is easily the most erotic zombie to ever grace the scratched silver screen. A homeless man learns the hard way when he becomes hypnotized by the newly rotting beauty. Why can't the recent flood of mediocre and worthless zombie films feature such salacious zombies? I never thought that featuring slapstick humor in a zombie film would actually be successful. There is nothing I hate more than the horror comedy, but Return of the Living Dead does it solidly. Over the years, the one liners of zombies have stuck in my mind and I can't complain. After all demanding "MORE BRAINS!!" is something you expect to hear from a zombie and the tarman zombie says it well. The torso of a rotten and topless blonde lets the audience know her fancy is, "not people, BRAINS!" This zombie has always had a close place in my heart.

Night of the Living Dead author John Russo was able to keep the "living dead" dead for his future cinema ventures, while director George S. Romero has to come up with different names for his sequels. Although Return of the Living Dead isn't an official sequel to Night of the Living Dead, it is a nice comedic and reflexive companion piece to the first film. I would even go as far as saying that I find Return of the Living Dead to be more entertaining than Romero's sequel Dawn of the Dead. Return of the Living Dead has aged elegantly whereas Dawn of the Dead has just aged.

-Ty E

HARRY BROWN

Daniel Barber (2009)

Harry Brown has been criticized by left wing film reviewers for being a mindlessly violent, morally bankrupt, bigoted and unrepresentative piece of fascist propaganda. Harry Brown exceeds all those expectations! This is a film that accurately depicts modern Britain and can only be properly described as fucking awesome. It is made of the purest form of win. This home grown British film starring Michael Caine is about an elderly retired marine living in a sinkhole estate full of chav scum. Simple plot; his friend is murdered he cleanses his local community. Superficially it's a rehashed Dirty Harry justice narrative, but it is just so much more than that, it is a film that really matters.

Let me explain; This film has been widely compared to the American 'equivalent' Gran Torino but it couldn't be more different. Gran Torino has a similar opening premise; bitter angry war vet (Clint Eastwood, who is also director) surrounded by immigrants, social decay, family breakdown, gangs, crime, etc., and you think that's just great, but no, it's a trap! Suddenly it becomes a feel good family comedy where our hero learns to embrace and nurture his new multicultural society learning the value of community relations, and that's how he wins. Sounds pretty gay right?

Harry Brown is totally different, thank god the Americans didn't get their hands all over it and ruin the thing! The Hollywood orthodoxy approaches representation in film by showing both sides of an argument, example - Terrorism; we would see a terrorist kill people and commit atrocities, but we would also see equal if not more screen time given to his family life, poor country, American foreign policy, and other forms of self criticism, you would also see moderate Muslims argue with the terrorist explaining how he is not the real Islam, blah blah world peace American imperialism blah. We have all seen these films.

Because these films are 'subversive' they always ride against popular fears/perceptions/and opinions, and therefore not only produce a film that is totally out of proportion with reality (by virtue of the fact you are portraying a liberally balanced debate rather than amalgamated perceptions of the audience), but actively attacks the social norms of the viewer and makes them progressive and self critical. It is on the basis of this orthodoxy that Harry Brown is so derided by liberal critics and sociology fags because of its supposedly unrepresentative in its demonic portrayal of the social underclass. That is the point.

Harry Brown offers a refreshing form of social criticism as in that it appeals directly towards your hate. In that sense I think it says something interesting about what public perceptions really are, as opposed to what they are widely understood to be - Hope perhaps? In my opinion people are sick of this unhealthy obsession in our culture which automatically defends the criminal over the victim. That is where all of the sociological analysis goes into; "it would appear the perpetrator carried out his actions because society did not embrace him, it was the capitalist system and sexual identity oppression, etc". One thing this film managed to do was connect to the sense of hopelessness and abandonment felt by ordinary people. It is no coincidence the hero is an ex-army veteran yet frail pensioner, in many ways he is representative of that old Britain we identify with.

HARRY BROWN

This film is for anyone who has ever lived in a pikey town, or a council estate, or an inner city, (or at a stab, even having attended one of our public schools) because they are likely to have the fear. The Charvers in this film are so realistic they are genuinely frightening. The fact that they are over the top (or as liberals would say ... Racist?) captures this emotion. In this context they effectively lose their 'human rights' for the duration of the film while justice is visited upon them. Generally speaking everyone hates chavs, everyone hates the underclass, that is why this film was made. Underneath all the tolerance, and hug-a-rainbow bullshit people still don't buy into it, not even liberals which is why they lock themselves away in their safe little suburbs.

There is a sort of irony in that Harry Brown is more 'Dirty Harry' than Dirty Harry ever was, this is far more subversive because it is genuinely anti-system. The point of this type of vigilante narrative is that the vigilante exists because the existing forms of authority have failed and something needs to fill the void (which is politically speaking the central premise of fascism). In the previous films this message was always a mistake; Michael Winner – who directed Death Wish – went on to advocate the banning of the Lord Horror Novel and become an all around general prick, while Clint Eastwood who is associated most with the genre made Gran Torino (I don't hold this against him, he had to make his peace, but that makes him part of the system).

There is a great irony in that the very message of Gran Torino that is parodied in the impotent law enforcement via the satirical monologues from a police chief who is simply a career politician managing the decent of society as opposed to any force for law and order. The language it uses is very new labour, though it also has echoes of David Cameron's 'hug a hoodie' campaign (I bet you forgot that, I didn't). At a press conference at the end of the film he speaks of 'victory in the long term strategy of community relations, silent majority, harmony, breaking the wall of silence' ect. All this when the bulk of the police force went down to a huge defeat in the estate when hordes of feral youths descended upon them with projectiles chasing them out of the estate. But isn't it also true that our police do not control our towns and cities? That they can't enter certain areas? That the role of the police is reduced to firemen; to be political, not intervene, and be there to clear up afterwards.

"This isn't Northern Ireland Harry"

"No it's not. Those people were fighting for something; for a cause. To them out there, this is just entertainment."

Anyway, not to ruin the film but while this monologue plays the film ends with our hero looking up at a clear blue sky and symbolically walking into the underpass with a sense of security, not so subtly letting you make up your own mind about which is the more effective method of crime control. It would be wishful thinking to hope that films like this might inspire some old codgers to dust off their service revolvers and start dropping social scum, that's not the point though. This film does not so much glorify vigilantism, but presents a desperate viewpoint on the social situation; that there are many people in this society who are irredeemably evil (for lack of a better word) and are always going to be social parasites. It is a propaganda film in this sense. While there remains unanswered questions as to how we specifically deal with the problems we face, the realistic solution that will enter people's minds is going to be something along the lines of organized armed authority: the Police, the Army, Paramilitary forces to just clear through these areas. It must be done, and the people will support it.

-Benjamin Noyles

THE DUNWICH HORROR
THE DUNWICH HORROR

Daniel Haller (1970)

If master American horror writer H.P. Lovecraft were alive today, he would be absolutely and irrevocably disgusted by the fact that his literary work has been constantly cinematically bastardized, debased, liberalized, and eroticized by countless hack horror directors who used the writer's name as a way to cash on his posthumous cult celebrity. An Anglophile racist of the Spenglerian anti-egalitarian sort who was rather repulsed by miscegenation and who brilliantly foretold the abject racial and cultural degeneration of America via his horror stories, Lovecraft would probably vomit at the idea that his short story Herbert West—Re-Animator (1922) gave misbegotten birth to a Hebraically humored film like Re-Animator (1985), which is rather unfortunately easily one of the greatest Lovecraft-themed flicks, where a dismembered head gives head to a gorgeous young blonde lady, but the Weird Tales magazine writer might have been even more disturbed by the film's lowbrow dark comedic tone. Of course, unless there is some sort of conservative revolution in the cinema world, it is rather doubtful that Lovecraft's work will ever be properly adapted for the silver screen. Undoubtedly, out of all the semi-good, the very bad, and the terribly ugly Lovecraft adaptations, I am going to have to assume that The Dunwich Horror (1970)—a work directed by hired hack Daniel Haller (Monster of Terror, Devil's Angels) and produced by monetary-motivated B-movie mogul Roger Corman—is the most blasphemous Lovecraftian movie ever made. Indeed, H.P. goes psychedelic hippie Crowleyite, The Dunwich Horror is only vaguely based on Lovecraft's classic 1928 story of the same. Based on a short story that Lovecraft's Indian-American biographer S. T. Joshi (Lovecraft would have unequivocally suffered another nervous breakdown if he knew that a leftist miscegenating untermensch was the foremost biographer/literary critic of his work) described as being "simply an aesthetic mistake on Lovecraft's part" with a "stock good-versus-evil scenario," Corman's The Dunwich Horror has a fairly superficial storyline that lacks the Nordau-esque degeneration themes of the original story and is more in the spirit of the "Turn on, tune in, drop out" mentality typical of the thankfully bygone era when it was made. As far as I am concerned, The Dunwich Horror is mostly of interest today (if of any interest at all!) due to its sometimes bizarre and transcendental aesthetic qualities. Featuring surreal dream-sequences that seem to be taken straight out of Jack Smith's unfinished high-camp masterpiece Norma Love (1963), The Dunwich Horror is a curious combo of inept celluloid storytelling and idiosyncratic set pieces, wardrobes, and special effects that ultimately fail to make up for the film's overall unnerving unevenness. Starring dirty Dean Stockwell (The Boy with Green Hair, Blue Velvet) as a half-caste human-monster and ancestor-worshipping megalomaniac who wishes he was the next Aleister Crowley in a role originally offered to Peter Fonda, as well as Sandra Dee (Gidget, Imitation of Life) as a very vapid woman who just does not know how to tell a man “no”, The Dunwich Horror is the sort of celluloid abortion that occurs when a cinematic carny conman like Corman tries to make a ‘hip and happening’ horror flick for the badly braindead Easy Rider generation.

Advertised by MGM as follows, “Single white warlock seeks beautiful blond babe to join him at the altar...the sacrificial altar!” The Dunwich Horror at first seems to be the story of a resentful beatnik and would-be-guru suffering from Asperger syndrome. After an occult scene of a woman ostensibly giving birth to something that the viewer assumes to be a misbegotten creature of sorts, the film cuts to the rather sparsely populated setting of Miskatonic University in Arkham, Massachusetts where a pedantic professor named Dr. Henry Armitage (Ed Begley) has just given a lecture on the priceless and one-of-a-kind occult tome Necronomicon, which he idiotically entrusts a blonde bimbo student named Nancy Wagner (Sandra Dee) to bring back to the library. On her way to the library, Nancy is stalked by a weirdo with a Jew-fro named Wilbur Whateley (Dean Stockwell) who, with his sinister Svengali-like hipster gaze, cons the seemingly half-retarded lady into handing over the Necronomicon, but luckily Dr. Armitage soon puts a stop to this and knows that young man comes from a degenerate family of blasphemous black magicians. Although Armitage warns Nancy about the wackjob Whateleys, the little lady comes under Wilbur’s spell and gives him a ride back to his house in Dunwich after he pretends to miss his ride. Upon arriving in Dunwich, Nancy discovers that the lynch-mob-prone locals hate the Whateleys and that Wilbur’s great-grandfather, who believed “In another race of beings from a different dimension...An earlier race, superior to man. And he believed they could be brought back,” was hanged by the locals under dubious circumstances. Eventually, Nancy also meets Wilbur’s equally peculiar yet more passive grandfather Old Whateley (Sam Jaffe). After her car breaks down and radical redneck guru Wilbur drugs her with a curious Crowley-esque cocktail of sex, drugs, and hypnosis, Nancy becomes trapped in Dunwich by her deranged yet charming new boy toy. Of course, Dr. Armitage and a frigid female student friend arrive in Dunwich and attempt to convince Nancy to leave, but she is too wild and wanton for Wilbur. Upon doing some research, Armitage and his female student learn that Wilbur’s assumed deceased mother, Lavinia (Joanna Moore Jordan), is still alive and resides in a mental institution. Apparently, Lavinia went crazy after giving birth to Wilbur and his purportedly stillborn brother, but the truth proves to be much more darker. When Nancy’s female companion goes to the Whateley house to find her friend, she is killed by a monstrous creature that is apparently Wilbur’s twin brother, who was not born stillborn after all but is the malevolent mongrel progeny of human Lavinia and one of ‘The Old Ones’ from a superior ancient race. Meanwhile, Wilbur gets in a scuffle with Old Whateley that results in the eccentric grandfather’s death and when his grandson boldly attempts to give him a pagan ceremony at his funeral at the local cemetery, the terrified townspeople put a swift end to his beatnik blasphemy. In the end, Wilbur's retarded beast of a 1/2 breed brother gets loose and wastes a bunch of Dunwich townsfolk and Wilbur attempts to sacrifice Nancy on a pagan altar in tribute to 'The Old Ones', but is absurdly struck down and killed by lightning, with his scorched body falling into the sea. Rather unfortunately for her, it is revealed that Nancy is pregnant with wacked out wizard Wilbur's quadroom monster child.

THE DUNWICH HORROR

Somewhat interestingly, The Dunwich Horror was co-penned by writer/director/producer Curtis Hanson, who is probably best known for directing the sentimental wigger epic 8 Mile (2002) starring racially schizophrenic Aryan untermensch Eminem. Undoubtedly, while The Dunwich Horror and 8 Mile have very little in common, they both reflect that sort of racial and cultural degeneracy that inspired the terror injected in H.P. Lovecraft's stories, albeit to a much horrendous and hopeless extent than the nerdy horror writer could have ever imagined during his nightmarish multicultural strolls in Red Hook, NYC. To further cinematically defecate on Lovecraft's singular literary legacy of the genetically grotesque, a couple years back SyFy broadcasted the little turd of a TV-movie The Dunwich Horror (2009) aka H.P. Lovecraft's The Darkest Evil, which also stars Dean Stockwell, albeit this time somewhat ironically playing the role of Dr. Henry Armitage. Just as I have no intention of re-watching the Corman-produced The Dunwich Horror, I have no plans to indulge in seeing Stockwell further embarrass himself in something put out by the proud fanboy philistines at Syfy. Personally, I found Lucio Fulci's incoherent gore-fest City of the Living Dead (1980), which features a town named Dunwich, infinitely more eerie and atmospheric in its depiction of New England when compared to the low-camp Corman corniness of The Dunwich Horror. Masterful Gothic horror degenerated into pseudo-creepy counter-culture crud of the pseudo-salacious and generically psychedelic sort, The Dunwich Horror is 'folk horror' at its most conspicuously contrived and horrifically halfhearted, especially considering its talented cast of actors. Indeed, The Dunwich Horror just goes to show the late-1960s/early-1970s were a culturally and aesthetically abhorrent era, as the film leaves a foul retrograde taste in one's mouth equivalent to the most skunky of Mexican-imported weed, albeit nowhere as hypnotic. For those looking for a more aesthetically-pleasing marriage between Lovecraft and Corman, checkout The Haunted Palace (1963) aka Edgar Allan Poe's The Haunted Palace starring Vincent Price which, although advertised as a Poe adaptation (Corman made a Poe-Cycle of eight Poe-themed films between 1960 and 1965), is actually a loose adaptation of Lovecraft's short novel The Case of Charles Dexter Ward (1927). Of course, it is rather dubious whether the world will ever see a true and faithful celluloid Lovecraft adaptation with a Spenglerian worldview and all, but hopefully one day a young and budding auteur weaned on a steady diet of Viet Harlan, F.W. Murnau, Julius Evola, and Lothrop Stoddard will get the chance. At the very least, one can only hope that leftist lardo Guillermo del Toro and epic hack James Cameron do not get the chance to aesthetically mutilate and molest Lovecraft's sole novella At the Mountains of Madness (1936), as it will surely make the Corman-produced The Dunwich Horror seem like a unsung high-camp masterpiece by comparison.

-Ty E

THE MONOPOLY MEN
THE MONOPOLY MEN

Daniel Hopsicker (1998) The Monopoly Men is an important documentary as it exposes the far from “federal” American Federal Reserve. The reality of this private bank is that it is a central bank that prints money out of nothing. The international bankers that setup the “Federal Reserve” then lend out this money to governments and charge interest on it. The Monopoly Men reveals that the Rothschild family, who also set up central banks in all the great European empires, among other countries, are the real controllers of the Federal Reserve. Mayer Amschel Bauer Rothschild summed it all up when he stated, “Give me control of a nation’s money and I care not who makes its laws.”

The Monopoly Men is an episode in the 1998 TV series Phenomenon: The Lost Archives. What a shame that the important information revealed in this documentary was just part of some random, yet interesting TV series. Thankfully, the episode The Monopoly Men is now easily available for all to watch all over the internet. The Monopoly Men is hosted by the effeminate and somewhat creepy Dean Stockwell. Although lacking the charm and suaveness he displayed in David Lynch’s Blue Velvet, Stockwell makes a wonderful host for a documentary about conspiring international bankers who enjoy making tons of money in wars that kill millions of innocent people.

The Monopoly Men features various interviews with so called “conspiracy theorists” that have helped to reveal the crimes of The Federal Reserve and international bankers in general. Eustace Mullins is one of the men featured in the documentary and he is probably most responsible for revealing the crimes of the criminal central bank with his book The Secrets of the Federal Reserve. Mullins did all his research for the book at the library of congress and The Secrets of the Federal Reserve is perfectly source cited. Eustace Mullins was a protégé of poet Ezra Pound who influenced Mullins to investigate the Federal Reserve. The Secrets of the Federal Reserve would be the first book burned in Europe since 1945. Anyone interested in wanting to know how the world really works should read the important works of Eustace Mullins.

The Monopoly Men also features interviews with “conspiracy theorist” Michael Collins Piper. Piper has done a good deal exposing Zionist criminals, international bankers, and other related crud. In Michael Collins Piper’s brilliant book The Judas Goats he reveals the infiltration and subversion of American nationalist movements by criminal internationalists. The book also discusses how the fowl Anti-Defamation League has infiltrated various organizations, spied on individuals they deem “enemies,” and collected various information about people illegally. The information Piper reveals in The Monopoly Men is very general compared to most of Piper’s work but is important nonetheless. The only argument against statements from heroic people like Eustace Mullins and Michael Collins Piper, which are weak to say the least, is from a pudgy fellow who is associated with J.P. Morgan.

American history class never teaches students such important facts like how Wall Street bankers Jacob Schiff gave $20 million dollars to “revolutionary” Leon Trotsky (real name Lev Davidovich Bronstein) to run the “Russian Revolution.” The Czar, being the richest man in the world at the time, was certainly bad for business and had to be crushed. Of course, American school students are taught that the Russian revolution was an attempt at a “progressive” revolution where workers were overthrowing their dictator so they could start an international workers utopia. Instead, it just ended in tens of millions of people being killed by their own “government.” Facts like these are revealed in the important The Monopoly Men documentary.

Watch The Monopoly Men

The Monopoly Men is a good place to start for those searching to find the true leaders and history manipulators of the world. The Federal Reserve was responsible for two world wars, the depression, and the social problems that have become so “normal” today. Ever wonder why Jose and his intermediate family of 40 people came to America from Mexico to work illegally? Ever wonder why American jobs are being taken away from Americans and shipped over to third world countries. One has to question why in America our industries have been progressively dismantled over the years despite the atrocious debt our country has accumulated. Dean Stockwell sure wants to know.

-Ty E

BUSTER AND BILLIE
BUSTER AND BILLIE

Daniel Petrie (1974)

Although it would probably not surprise anyone that knows me, I have to admit that I absolutely loathe virtually all romance flicks, be they retarded rom-coms featuring some radically repulsive Hebrew turd like Ben Stiller lusting over some lecherous blonde Aryan Shiksa; phony James Cameron's blockbuster celluloid barf Titanic (1997), would-be-quirky frog mucus like Jean-Pierre Jeunet's Amélie (2001), hipster hemorrhoids like Spike Jonze's Her (2013), or classic screwball swill like It Happened One Night (1934). In short, I tend to stay completely clear of any romance-themed film unless I receive a special recommendation from a friend whose taste in cinema I respect and/or if I do enough research about a film beforehand that leads me to believe that I would appreciate such a work. As far as I am concerned, German Expressionist auteur F.W. Murnau's Hollywood era debut Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) is unequivocally the most poetically romantic film ever made. While not exactly a film in league with Murnau's masterwork, the truly unsung cult item Buster and Billie (1974) aka Buster & Billie—a sort of post-Rebel Without a Cause teen rebel flick with hixploitation elements set in late-1940s Georgia about a teenage alpha-male high school senior who falls in love with the local town whore and who takes violent revenge against his comrades after they defile his beloved—is another one of those oh-so rare romance themed flicks that somehow got my blood moving. Co-directed by quasi-hack Daniel Petrie (A Raisin in the Sun, Sybil) and screenwriter/sometimes director Sidney Sheldon (The Buster Keaton Story, Dream Wife), this darkly romantic revenge flick is notable for being, among other things, one of the first mainstream movies to feature full-nudity (e.g. cocks and bushes) as well as Robert 'Freddy Krueger' Englund in a pre-A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984) role and a pre-Airwolf Jan-Michael Vincent as the lethally lovelorn 'lone ranger' lead. Unquestionably the sort of film one should watch with knowing as little as possible beforehand, Buster and Billie is a hardcore country fried heartbreaker that reminds one not to take their beloved for granted. Like the Deliverance of tearjerkers, albeit featuring hetero hick rape as opposed to hillbilly homo forced bum-buggery, the film truly brings new meaning to the age old phrase 'love conquers all.' A borderline southern Gothic work somewhat in the spirit of Ode to Billy Joe (1976), albeit slightly more disturbing, Buster and Billie does the seemingly impossible by being a work that is certainly exploitative in parts, yet somehow manages to be genuinely emotionally penetrating in a classic love story fashion. Never released on DVD and fetching a fair amount of money in its out-of-print VHS form, Buster and Billie is unfortunately a work that is destined to remain in obscurity.

The year is 1948 and despite being the most popular senior at his rural Georgian High School, Buster (Jan-Michael Vincent) is a born individualist and confident rebel-rouser who does not care about what anyone thinks, including his friends and family. Buster is engaged to marry his high school sweetheart Margie Hooks (Pamela Sue Martin), though he hates her friends (he hilariously calls one of them a, “hoot-owl-looking bitch”) and resents the fact that she does not put out (as he pleads to her after she denies him carnal pleasure, “If a man doesn’t reach climax every time that he gets excited, he’s liable to get kidney trouble and die young”). Buster’s best friend is a goofy dullard boy named Whitey, who seems to worship his much more confident and handsome friend. Like the rest of Buster’s friends, Whitey regularly sexually takes advantage of a beautiful yet somewhat intellectually challenged young lady named Billie Jo Truluck (Joan Goodfellow), who has moronic untermensch hillbilly parents and thinks the only way she can get people to like her is by letting them do whatever they want with her voluptuous young body. Although Whitey and the rest of his friends offer Buster the opportunity to tag along with them during one of their gang-bangs of Billie, Buster opts out, but later decides to ask her out on a date after becoming quite sexually frustrated due to his girlfriend’s incessant cock-blocking. When Billie sees Buster beat-up a big fat belligerent school bus driver, she virtually falls in love with him at first sight, so she does not think twice about taking up his offer to take her on a date. Needless to say, the two soon fall in love and are both happy for the first time in their short lives, but their happiness is short-lived as jealous friends, annoying busybodies, and morally righteous morons get in their way.

After one particularly heated date with Billie that makes him realize that he truly loves her, Buster decides to drive to his girlfriend Margie’s house at 1 a.m. while drunk and tell her that their relationship is over, which she does not take well and even goes so far as lying to her friends and telling them she broke up with him. Of course, when Buster reveals his love for Billie by taking her to church with him, he turns a number of the congregants against him, including his pigheaded friends, who are mad they can no longer take advantage of the girl and cannot stomach the fact that their cool friend would rather hangout with a poor whore than them. Naturally, a number of people berate Buster due to his new relationship, including his parents, who feel disgraced that their son broke it off with ‘good girl’ Margie for a poor slut, as well as the local bartender Jake (Clifton James of Cool Hand Luke), who the high school senior threatens to beat up for bad mouthing his girlfriend. As a self-proclaimed “lone ranger” who “rides alone,” Buster truly couldn’t care less about what other people say and only falls all the more in love with Billie, engaging in skinny dippy, sentimental gift-giving, and whatnot. When Billie gives Buster a poorly made necklace, he loves it simply because it was given to him by his beloved, who is so unwaveringly in love with her boyfriend that she loves to write his name in the dirt with a stick like a little girl with a crush. When Buster gets sick, Billie reads a Captain Marvel comic to him in bed. At a local hoedown of sorts, the two almost cement their unadulterated pure love for one another in front of everyone in the town, which leaves a lot of people jealous. One day, Buster's friends go for some alcohol-fueled joyriding and when they spot Billie, they decide to have a little fun with her, but she runs away and when they catch her, she refuses to submit to their sensual savagery, so they knock her out and proceed to take turns raping her. When Billie regains consciousness while being raped by a boyish bitch boy named 'Mole' (Mark Pendergraft), she claws at the teenage rapist's face, which infuriates him so much that he starts beating her head in, thus resulting in her accidental death. Hoping to blame the murder on a mythical killer with a hook-hand, Buster's friend leave Billie's half-naked body in the woods with a couple branches barely covering it. Meanwhile, Buster goes looking for Billie and when he does not find her, he goes to the local bar where his friends hangout and is surprised to not find them there. Despite it being a rainy night, Buster eventually finds Billie's brutalized body in the woods and cries hysterically. When Buster goes back to the bar, he finds all his friends playing pool and can immediately see the guilt on their faces despite the fact that they try their darnedest to act cool and normal. After calmly agreeing to play pool with his friends, Buster randomly explodes and brutally beats all his friends, killing two of them with more or less with his bare hands (though he does use a pool stick and a billiard ball) and even slamming his best pal into a pool table. While Buster is temporarily jailed, he is let out of prison the day after Billie's funeral, which is not even attended by her parents, and he honors his belated beloved by stealing every single flower in town and putting it on her grave.

BUSTER AND BILLIE

Despite being more or less a hixploitation on steroids, Buster and Billie is reasonably believable in its shockingly nuanced depiction of true love, with such seemingly benign things as simple glances between the two leads saying much more than words ever could about the genuineness of their pure passion for one another. The film is also one of those rare works that enables the viewer to empathize with the killer. Indeed, for any man to watch Buster and Billie and not feel totally satisfied with the male protagonist's actions at the end is not a man. In other words, if there is no context where you could see yourself killing for your beloved, you either don't love her or you're a ball-less pussy with no integrity. While women have a habit of destroying relationships between friends, I have noticed that jealous beta-males also tend to get quite irked when their alpha-male friend falls in love with a woman and in no other film is this depicted more potently and even perniciously than Buster and Billie, which is a work that is rather romantic in a sort primitive redneck fashion. Unquestionably, the film just had too much testicular fortitude and not enough senseless sentimentalism and contrived lovey dovey appeal to become popular with the American bourgeois, but it is certainly the romantic masterpiece that not enough working-class and rural-based Americans—the true audience of the film—have seen, because otherwise it would be considered an indisputable classic of 1970s

American cinema. Obviously, it should be no surprise that a weasel-like weakling like Leonard Maltin would trash the film, as he lacks the lifeblood and background to adequately appreciate it. The work is like a A Walk to Remember (2002) that is somehow good as directed by a talented exploitation auteur, as well as a Southern Gothic directed by a sort of lowbrow rampantly heterosexual Tennessee Williams. One must certainly have a heart of stone to deny the rough and rugged romantic majesty of Buster and Billie.

-Ty E

TONIGHT OR NEVER
TONIGHT OR NEVER

Daniel Schmid (1973)

Undoubtedly, auteur Daniel Schmid (Violanta, Hécate) is one of the most underrated directors of his generation and quite possibly the greatest Swiss filmmaker who has ever lived, yet most of his early films are nearly impossible to find and/or have yet to be released in any home media format at all, including his high-camp feature-length debut Tonight or Never (1972) aka Heute nacht oder nie – an ambient and hallucinatory assault against the German leftist 1968 student movement disguised as a decadent modern Gothic tale set in the 19th century featuring mostly 1930s opera and pop music. Inspired by the tradition of an aristocratic Austrian family who, on the night of St. Nepomuk (May 16th), would exchange roles with their servants for the night, Tonight or Never features Schmid's own dark romantic twist on the tale by adding a third, more prominently featured group as the morbid yet merry masters of a grand performance comprised of a semi-sadistic and sardonic camp-and-kitsch-ridden pack of comedic showmen (and women) who do takes on scenes from Gone with the Wind (1939), a work by Tennessee Williams, a satirical take on the suicide of the title character from Gustave Flaubert's Madame Bovary (1856), and the tragic conclusion of Tchaikovsky's ballet Swan Lake (1876) in what has been described as a "cultural scrap heap." Vehemently hated upon its release by leftist filmmakers, film critics, and 'revolutionaries' alike due to its audacious aesthetic excess and quasi-counter-revolutionary political persuasion, Tonight or Never, unlike a good portion of the European films from its time, especially associated with German New Cinema (the director was friends with both Fassbinder and Werner Schroeter), has stood the test of time and Schmid himself later remarked regarding his debut work in an interview, "The film was severely attacked by the prevailing left "Zeitgeist". It's very strange. I recently talked to an American critic who's now 25. For him the sixties have only survived as a theatrical act – and that's exactly how the comedian in the movie is treated." The comedian Schmid speaks of in the film is a funny fellow who proclaims to the jovial delight of his blueblood-playing-plebians it is a "time of revolt," so it should be no surprise that German and Swiss leftists did not take kindly to the filmmaker's mockery of their failed revolution, nor the fact that Tonight or Never featured a cultivated and carefully crafted neo-Victorian 19th century aesthetic and an appreciation for the fin de siècle, which ultimately inspired his ethno-masochistic detractors to accuse him of "celebrating bourgeois cultural fascism." Of course, unlike naïve youthful idealism, Tonight or Never – a work set in a hotel (substituting for the interior of an ancient Gothic castle featured at the beginning of the film), which as the son of hotel owners/runners who came of age in a hotel in the Swiss Alps, Schmid was quite familiar with – is a film from the soul by a rare filmmaker of his age who, rather unlike many of his degenerated generation, was not ashamed of his background but instead, fully embraced it, even if the taint of his cadaverous age permeates throughout the film.

Although Rainer Werner Fassbinder would marry her and cast her in supporting roles, Daniel Schmid was the one who made Ingrid Caven his star and diva as a sort of Marlene Dietrich figure and she would play the lead in the filmmaker's first three feature-length films (and masterpieces): Tonight or Never (1972), La Paloma (1974), and Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel. In fact, it was Caven who convinced Schmid to direct Tonight or Never without even writing a script on virtual nil budget, which was completed over a two week period in 1971 and shot at the director's grandparents' hotel in Switzerland during the off-season. Schmid originally expected his friend Fassbinder to produce his first feature, but as the director explained in an interview with Juliane Lorenz, "At one point I expected that my own movie, Heute Nacht oder nie [Tonight or Never], would be produced next. But Rainer had other ideas. He literally told me, "No way. On Monday I start shooting my next movie." I got mad, said goodbye, and stormed out of the apartment. Ingrid followed me four days later and acted in my production. In due course several other dissidents joined us, among them Harry Baer. I still remember Rainer telling me, "You'll never pull that off. You're much too spoiled." Of course Schmid, who once stated regarding his curious relationship with Fassbinder, "Our mutual attraction derived from my inner resistance to some, though not all, of his movies," would pull it off almost immaculately and aristocratically and the rest is history.

Featuring a number of rebelling Fassbinder Superstars, including Ingrid Caven, Peter Kern, Peter Chatel, and Harry Baer, Tonight or Never is still fundamentally an auteur piece that is merely accentuated by its unconventionally charismatic star power. Like his friend and one-time lover Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Palermo oder Wolfsburg) – the most dandy of the Europe dandy filmmakers – Schmid shared a love of opera and German expressionist cinema and these influences certainly bleed beautifully throughout the singularly hypnotic phantasmagorical entirety that is Tonight or Never – a pure aesthetic and political attack on the prevailing trend of anti-aesthetism and working-class-fetishizing of that time. As Schmid stated in an interview about having the supposedly 'bourgeois idea' of a grand hotel in Tonight or Never, "It was a world I knew, and I think you can only really say anything about worlds you know. With all the rules of their specific games, all their strengths and weaknesses. At the time many of my colleagues – writers, filmmakers – were identifying themselves with a working-class environment they'd never lived or functioned in." Indeed, featuring not a single prosaic lesson in poverty porn or the dubious pseudo-Freudian sexualization of savage street serfs, Tonight or Never is a glamorous if equally and intentionally grotesque tribute to a dead epoch directed by an uncompromising man who was disgusted with his own suicidal zeitgeist. Featuring a corpse-like cast of characters with the auras of aristocratic zombies and vampiric man-nequins who seem to 'float' around, if they move at all, Tonight or Never is a one night stand with the dead somnambulist souls of the Occident who exist only in memory and, quite symbolically, have been totally drained of their vitality.

TONIGHT OR NEVER

To the complete and utter disgust of the Marxist Swiss-krauts that attending a press conference following a screening of Tonight or Never at the 1972 Solothurn Film Festival (SFT), Daniel Schmid stated regarding the work, "I did have political intentions in making the film. It may sound strange but the backdrop of political interpretation in front of which I localize the film is, in the best case, only present so as to disconcert the viewer. I live in a decadent era. That is my private belief. I believe that I live in a late chapter of Western history. I have no conception of how things might continue," as if he had just read a number of German Conservative Revolutionary tomes before directing the quasi-apocalyptic work. Of course, as a European of the post-WWII who, like Fassbinder, essentially grew up fatherless, Schmid was far too cynical to be any sort of radical traditionalist purist, even remarking in an interview regarding Tonight or Never, "I mystify only to demystify. It can't be pure nostalgia if it's not intact. I don't invoke a Gattopardo world, I disavow it, treat it ironically. I like to play with forms in a world where there are hardly any structures and forms left. Think of Griffiths' first close-up of Lillian Gish. It was a sensation, it was meant to be something specific. Today the whole world of television is one close-up concerto. That means the degeneration of structures, the degeneration of forms." A rare work of postmodern cinema with elegance, class, mystique, and—most importantly—a (dark) heart and soul, Tonight or Never, despite being the debut feature-length work of the director and an intrinsically experimental work shot without a script, is nothing short of a masterpiece and a major aesthetic achievement of post-WWII European cinema that can only be compared to Schmid's subsequent work La Paloma (1974) – a nearly flawless and strikingly magical high-camp effort also starring Ingrid Caven and Peter Kern.

At the predictable but rather anti-climatic conclusion of Tonight or Never—a work bearing no relation to the 1931 Gloria Swanson comedy of the same name—the masters go back to being masters and the servants go back to being servants, thus highlighting the absurdist illusion that was the self-loathing bourgeois leftists of the 1968 student movement in their idealistic, and ultimately futile pursuit of establishing a classless utopia. As Daniel Schmid recognized in an interview regarding the hypocritical yet unsurprising metamorphosis of his peers from hippies to yuppies in later decades, "Some of them, by the way, were the same people that supported the "holy" war against Saddam Hussein twenty years later, a war everyone helped make possible. But I'm no politician." Indeed, while the suave satirist Schmid was no politician, he proved with Tonight or Never that his understanding of people and politics, as well as art, was much more profound and insightful than that of his celluloid compatriots, foretelling how the so called "new left" would devolve into the new plutocracy as the degenerate descendants of the parents they loved to hate. Describing his old friend, Schmid once stated of Fassbinder that he “believed himself to be a monster and so he behaved like a monster.” If Fassbinder was a monster, Schmid was a proud and cultivated magician (or cine-magician) of the heretical sort who destroyed his own illusions, with Tonight or Never being his first great performance as an unholy marriage between the Habsburgs and Grand Guignol as the sort of asocial and aberrant party Alfred Kubin might have hosted at his 12th century castle.

-Ty E

LA PALOMA
LA PALOMA

Daniel Schmid (1974)

Before gaining about 100 pounds or so and directing kitschy exploitation films, Austrian actor Peter Kern (Hitler: A Film from Germany, Flaming Hearts) played the lead role in the cultivated high-camp work La Paloma (1974) directed by Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid (Shadows of Angels, Imitation of Life) in a nearly immaculate performance that would prove to be one of the greatest of his rather long yet uneven career. Loosely based on the novel Camille (1852) aka The Lady of the Camellias written by high yellow French fellow Alexandre Dumas, film and with crucial influence from Josef von Sternberg's The Blue Angel (1930) aka Der blaue Engel and mostly likely Alfred Hitchcock's last British film Rebecca (1940), as well as the brazen naked melodrama of director Schmid's pal Rainer Werner Fassbinder and celluloid operetta of Werner Schroeter, La Paloma is a beautiful beast of meta-cinema decadence that reminds one why they watch films in the first place; to indulge in the wildly idiosyncratic and to simmer in seduction and sin without any of the less glorious consequences like acquiring an STD or a debilitating drug habit. Starring Fassbinder's ex-wife Ingrid Caven (Fear of Fear, In a Year with 13 Moons) in a certainly fitting role as a morbidly depressed cabaret singer who finds pseudo-self-worth in the form of a portly pedomorphic aristocrat, La Paloma is a cinematic work about the torment and tragedy of unreciprocated love and the perennial misery that such a hopeless situation sows for both parties involved. With its immaculate accentuation of imagery via both malefic and melodic music, La Paloma is a rare cinematic treat of the most majestically malicious kind that tenaciously and meticulously tinkers with one's marrow with its curious combination of scenic sorrowfulness or sordid grotesquery.

On a more personal level, the plump protagonist Isidore (Peter Kern) of La Paloma reminds me of a personal friend's seemingly autistic, fanboy brother. Technically a grown man in his early twenties, this rather reclusive and sedentary fellow is undoubtedly a virgin, but what else can one expect from an adult male who collects 'everything R2-D2' and considers Steven Spielberg the greatest filmmaker who ever lived. Naturally, I could never see my friend's bro in a relationship with a live woman, especially a beautiful one, so the prospect of such a seemingly absurd – and to be quite frank – unsettling scenario is a captivating one, to say the least. Of course, unlike my compatriot's brother, La Paloma 'protagonist' Isidore has two things going for him: he is extremely wealthy and he is deeply and unwaveringly in love with a terminally ill lady that is in dire need of an ego boost. La Paloma begins in a campy and carnal cabaret that seems like Weimar Berlin of the early 1930s, except updated in some sort of futuristic hell where men commit self-slaughter stoically after losing their meager earnings gambling, nearly nude preteen girls are paraded around like AKC-certified canines at a some sort of sleazy dog show, and emotionally abused and feeble females flaunt their flesh to strangers just to survive another day. Isidore is an odd exception to the typical patrons of the cabaret, as he is an aristocratic gentleman, albeit an avoirdupois one who brings Miss La Paloma flowers after one of her moving melancholy performances, thereupon igniting the barely burning flame of their ill-fated, one-sided relationship. A fragile soul with a sometimes ferocious and callous exterior, La Paloma attempts to embrace Isidore's passionate and ceaseless love of which she has never experienced before and seems to work for a brief period of time, until the aristocrat's pal Raoul – a masculine, stoic, and sexually virile gentleman – shows up and inspires true love in the seemingly loveless ex-cabaret singer. That being said, La Paloma features a sort of marvelous and feverently foreboding melodrama that one feels like they are witnessing a slow but steady murder that could have been avoided had a series of bad decisions been averted. Indeed, La Paloma's death-by-heartbreak is revealed about halfway through the film, but the greatest tragedy in La Paloma is the slow brutalization and malicious mutilation of two lonely, tender hearts because "when she (La Paloma) began to love, it was not him she loved; she loved his love for her."

Mixing psychological horror, camp fantasy, literary satire, ominous operetta numbers, and rather ridiculous yet wholly intentional melodramatic romanticism, La Paloma is, at its worse, a minor masterpiece of 1970s theatric European arthouse cinema that has no contemporaries. Like a playful yet pernicious parody of Werner Schroeter's Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) which, incidentally also stars Ingrid Caven, except actually accessible to a wider audience, La Paloma is a successful experiment in cross-medium camp where one does not need a background in bourgeois theatre and opera to actually enjoy it as it is an audacious and acrimonious work that will seem quite disconcerting to pompous patrician types. The film also concludes in a somewhat ambiguous manner that reveals that the joke is on the viewer, especially in regard to the precise manipulation of the spectator's soul. In a film where a man's single and only penetration of his beloved wife is with a knife into her cold cadaver, La Paloma is a saucy and sometime sadistic cinematic work that doesn't play nice but it plays for keeps.

-Ty E

SHADOW OF ANGELS
SHADOW OF ANGELS

Daniel Schmid (1976)

Like The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe purportedly directed by Ulli Lommel (Adolf and Marlene, D.C. Sniper), Shadow of Angels (1975) aka Schatten der Engel directed by Daniel Schmid (La Paloma, Jenatsch) is a melodramatically immaculate work that looks and feels like it was ghost-directed by German New Wave alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who also suspiciously starred in, produced, and used his production company for the film. Based on Fassbinder's controversial play The Garbage, the City, and Death (1975) aka Der Müll, die Stadt und der Tod; a work that irked German historian and Hitler biographer Joachim Fest so much that he would label the auteur filmmaker a, "left-wing fascist" due to the perceived 'anti-Semitic' subtext in the work. Not only would copies of The Garbage, the City, and Death be withdrawn from distribution by the German publishing house Suhrkamp Verlag, but Schmid's adaptation was also withdrawn from theaters in new 'democratic and philo-Semitic' post-war Germany, thereupon sparking outrage and protest in lucidly liberal Paris, France of all places. Outraged, French post-structuralist/post-modernist philosopher Gilles Deleuze remarked, "Banning or blocking a film by Schmid is no victory in the fight against anti-semitism. On the contrary, it is a victory for a neo-fascism (...). For some people will remember the poignancy of this film, its political significance and how it was forced out of the public eye." Indeed, for anyone who has seen Shadow of Angels, it seems like an asinine absurdity that such a philosophically multifaceted and aesthetically scrupulous cinematic work would not at least seem somewhat sympathetic to the Semite plight, especially if one considers the nefarious nature of many of the gentiles in the film and writer Fassbinder's less than fascist political proclivities, but I guess most viewers need their movie morals spoon fed to them with a clear distinction of "black" and "white." Centering around a lonely quasi-existentialist prostitute who receives abject apathy and even contempt from her homosexual husband, prissy fellow hookers, and unsympathetic parents, the physically used and abused and emotionally broken Dietrich-like lady finally finds short-term solace in the unlikely form of a rich Jew.

During the beginning of Shadow of Angels, sonorously sad streetwalker Lily Breß (Ingrid Caven) commits a seemingly sadistic act when she breaks the neck of a kitten, but by the end of the film one realizes that it is not an act of mindless savagery she has engaged in, but selfless mercy and sympathy. As a fellow pussycat of the night dwelling in the ghettos of Frankfurt in the hopes of merely getting by, Lily knows what it feels like to no longer want to live. Married to a homosexual man-child named Raoul (R.W. Fassbinder) who lives by the decidedly deranged personal dictum "beating means love" and blows all of her hard-earned money via prostitution on gambling when he is not busy playing with toys, Lily has no one in her life to reach out to. Incidentally, Ingrid Caven (who plays Lily) was briefly married to her onscreen husband Rainer Werner Fassbinder in real-life, thus making both of their performances in Shadow of Angels seem all the more audaciously authentic, hysterically heated, and characteristically chemistry-driven, especially when Raoul seems more concerned with the size of Lily's gentleman suitor's genitals than the fact they are copulating with his wife. Things eventually change for Lily when a bright light appears in the red district in the form of a rich Jew broker (played by Klaus Löwitsch) who, on top of buying her body for a pretty penny, confides in the intelligent call-girl, which eventually evolves into a passionate, albeit diacritic and dangerous, love affair that is ultimately doomed due to the lovers' conflicting backgrounds, forthwith giving Shadow of Angels a vaguely Shakespearean feel of sorts. The son of two Jews who perished in the holocaust at the hands of the people in the town he now acts as the unofficial dictator of, the rich Jew is not exactly a fan of Lily's ex-nazi drag queen father, who the kosher fat cat personally blames for his belated parents' deaths. The rich Jew believes he is, "not a Jew like the others," but fits into character with many of the stereotypes of the Israelite Semitic type, being a cunning capitalist who allows people to starve to death if it will earn him one more shekel, yet the other cryptic 'movers' and 'shakers' of the decrepit Frankfurt town are ultimately more repugnant and vicious. For example, the Chief of Police (Boy Gobert) who states of Jews, "they hate you and yet they need you for their perverted pleasures," thus insinuating the perennial stereotype that Jews are parasites and exploiters, is completely in bed with the rich Jew, even helping him with the cover-up of a murder and the committing of murder despite his personal disdain for the kosher broker. The only one who stays true to his old school National Socialist ethos is Lily's degenerate father Mr. Müller (Adrian Hoven), a vitriolic cabaret singer in drag who resembles an older, lower-class version of Helmut Berger à la Visconti's The Damned (1969). Mr. Müller has no qualms about admitting that he has killed Jews and that he wished he had killed the rich Jew's parents. Müller believes that the rich Jew "raises her (Lily)...to degrade him," which is indubitably true, but the uncommonly handsome Hebrew madly and hypocritically falls in love with the progeny of one of his greatest adversaries, thus his generosity is not in vain.

As stated by Ulli Lommel's typical tall, dark, and handsome character "little Prince" – one of the rich Jew's most right-hand men – "cocks can achieve miracles," especially in Shadow of Angels, but wonders of love sometimes come at a hefty price, which the wealthy Judaic is surprisingly willing to pay, even if it means the annihilation of what he loves most. Of course, in the end, the rich Jew and his gentile minions are still on top and the prostitutes and lower-class anti-Semites are still at the bottom, hence certain 'liberal' European's misguided belief that Shadow of Angels is a work of postmodern left-wing fascism. If anything, it only goes to show that German auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Parsifal, Hitler: A Film from Germany) was right when he stated that "Whoever joined the Jews and the leftists was successful, and it did not necessarily have anything to do with love, or understanding, or even inclination. How could Jews tolerate that, being that these others only wanted power," in his aptly titled article On the Misfortune and Fortune of Art in Germany after the Last War (1990), as his controversial remark is certainly pertinent in regard to the hostile response to Shadow of Angels and the overall message of the film itself. Despite both Schmid's film adaption Shadow of Angels being regarded as a minor masterpiece of melodrama, as well as the play that it is based on, The Garbage, the City, and Death, being regarded as one of Fassbinder, if not his most, greatest play, that did not stop authoritarian holier-than-thou leftist gatekeepers from trying to assign these aesthetically and historically important works to the cultural garbage heap of history. Although screened in competition for the prestigious Palme d'Or at the 1976 Cannes Film Festival, Shadow of Angels has never been released on international DVD and continues to be attacked (although to a lesser degree than the Fassbinder play) by self-righteous academics of the ostensibly self-righteous, cultural marxist sort. That being said, I guess the Neuer Deutscher Film auteur died in vain when he was found dead with a script he was working on for a film about Jewish Marxist agitator Rosa Luxemburg in his hand because who needs neo-nazis when you have leftist fair-weather friends like those of Fassbinder, who was arguably the most culturally and artistically German filmmaker of the post-WWII era. Needless to say, his Swiss friend Daniel Schmid did a great service when he directed Shadows of Angels; one of the greatest films associated with the Fass-bande.

SHADOW OF ANGELS

-Ty E

VIOLANTA

Daniel Schmid (1978)

As someone that regards his previous features Heute nacht oder nie (1972) aka Tonight or Never, La Paloma (1974), and Schatten der Engel (1976) aka Shadow of Angels as some of my all-time favorite films, it is only natural that I have eagerly anticipated seeing Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid's fourth feature Violanta (1978) about as much as a 40-year-old virgin craves to get his first proper whiff of a fresh warm twat. Although I have always feared that I might not ever get the chance to see the film since, not unlike most of Schmid's early films, it has never been released in any home media format aside from a hard-to-find foreign VHS sans subtitles, luckily I managed to find an admittedly rather poor quality print that some German guy generously created English subs for. After recently having the luxury of watching the film, I can safely say that, like Schmid's previous three features, it is unequivocally an unsung masterpiece that is in desperate need of being rediscovered by cinephiles lest it suffer the cinematically tragic fate of being regulated to the celluloid ash heap of cinema history. A somewhat morbid and melancholic yet beautiful and poetic melodrama that includes an eclectic all-star European arthouse cast including Lucia Bosé, Maria Schneider, Lou Castel, Gérard Depardieu, and Ingrid Caven, Violanta is certainly a singular work that can really only be described as Schmid-esque as it is just too idiosyncratic and unmistakably a work of the director to be described as anything else. In fact, in terms of themes and its period setting, I can only really superficially compare it to John Huston's swansong The Dead (1987), although Schmid's film is indubitably a more intricate, quixotic, nuanced, aesthetically enterprising, and all-around superior work and I say that as someone that appreciates both films and filmmakers. Personally, I would go so far as to describe Schmid's film as a marvelously moribund The Dead for the lethally lovelorn and spiritually necrotic, as a pathos-driven cinematic work that gives nil hope for the hopeless and basks in brutalizing the emotionally brutalized so as to remind the viewer to forget about love lest they risk living perennially like a dead soul among ghosts and phantoms of their past.

Adapted from the German-language novel Die Richterin (1885) aka The Judge by Swiss wordsmith Conrad Ferdinand Meyer, Schmid's film is set in an enigmatic rural realm that might be described as darkly romantic were it not for the seemingly eternal plague of cross-generational lovelorn misery and crippling regret that consumes the locals as a deceptively melodramatically merciless cinematic work where the viewer is offered nil catharsis and is instead forced to embrace a complete capitulation of the heart and soul. Set during the eighteenth-century in a small Swiss village that borders Italy where Schmid himself spent a major part of his youth, the film is preternaturally supernatural in the sense that ghosts and phantoms freely intermingle with humans that seem even more haunted than their undead compatriots. Notably, virtually all of these ghosts are connected to the terminally unhappy eponymous heroine, who is still haunted by those important individuals from her past that she either loved or loathed and thus can never completely forget. An effortlessly and charming and elegant yet hopelessly morose matriarch that runs a sort of soft dictatorship in her village as a so-called 'judge,' the titular protagonist has many skeletons in her closet that she is ultimately reminded of in a phantasmagorical fashion when her estranged son-in-law returns to the village after a virtual lifetime of exile to take part in the wedding of a beautiful young half-sister that he has never even met in a scenario that eventually evolves into incest. Indeed, although featuring beautiful mountain landscapes, truly festive folk clothing and celebrations, and stunningly exotic women of various ages, Violanta is about as merry as a third world autopsy and as heartwarming as a cold rusted dagger to the chest.

VIOLANTA

Not unlike the venomously vengeful lovesick bourgeois bitch played by Maria Casarès in Robert Bresson's early classic Les dames du Bois de Boulogne (1945) aka The Ladies of the Bois de Boulogne, the eponymous middle-aged beauty of Schmid's flick wears a mask of great respectability and moral superiority but that there is a sort of subtle fiery foreboding in her eyes that betrays her prestigious place in society as the beloved queen bitch of her village. Like virtually all of Schmid's great female leads, Violanta is an irreparably damaged diva and she longs for death, so it is only natural that the dead dominate her story and bring back painful memories of murder and heartbreak. Despite her own serious mistakes in life, Violanta believes it is up to her and her only to tell other people what to do with their lives, so naturally she gets somewhat petrified when her estranged stepson arrives at the village and begins lusty over her engaged daughter. Featuring Maria Schneider at her most shockingly innocent and virginal, Gérard Depardieu as the sleaziest of psychopathic brutes, Lou Castel as a pathetically impotent dropout, and Lucia Bosé as the most self-assured yet deeply internally tortured of manipulative matriarchs, Violanta is not really a political film but it can certainly be seen as a sort of hyper hermetic allegory for the decline of Europa as a film set in a decidedly dejecting gynocentric realm where bitter women reign, young men are completely emasculated and/or borderline asexual, and old men are virtually nonexistent as most of the men were curiously killed off long ago. In that sense, it is intriguing that the film is set at a sort of crossroads of Europe where the Mediterranean world meets the Germanic world, or as Schmid once explained to Rudolph Jula, "One of the reasons I did the movie was because it meant coming back to the place where I grew up. And it was an opportunity to define some of my so-called cultural identity – which is an in-between position. The place is in the Alps, at a point where rivers run south and north, and it's on the border between the Latinate and the Germanic world. It's always been well-travelled country: our roads go back to the Romans, the Etruscans. All the traffic between northern and southern Europe used to cross these mountains. There are also three languages spoken within a very small area: Italian, German and Romansh, a language that goes back to the vulgar Latin spoken in the time of the Roman Empire.”

Violanta begins with the ultimately life-changing reading of a letter by a young man living in exile in Venice named ‘Silver’ (Lou Castel) to his dreaded stepmother Donna Violanta (Lucia Bosé), who is the so-called ‘judge’ and benevolent dictator of the small Swiss village that he was seemingly forced to flee from after the quite dubious death of his padre. Somewhat curiously, Violanta—a woman that seems to fear the mere presence of her stepson, as if he reminds her of some deep dark secret and/or crime that she committed—wants Silver to come out of exile to attend the wedding of his half-sister Laura (Maria Schneider), who he has never met but deeply longs for, hence his bizarre disinterest in voluptuous Venetian beauties. Laura is Violanta’s sole child, as well as Silver’s sole sibling, albeit they naturally have different mothers. Silver deeply resents Violanta because he blames her for his own biological mother going crazy as a result of his father divorcing her for the titular heroine. Indeed, the woman that Silver deeply loathes is now in complete control of the beloved hometown that his mother was originally supposed to take control of. On top of everything else, Silver’s half-sis is the one that is set to eventually takeover the village that his long dead father once ruled over. As the film eventually reveals near the end, Silver would have even more good reason to deeply detest Violanta if he knew what his conspiring stepmother did to his beloved father. What is for sure is that Silver rightly hates Violanta and has no problem admitting as such, though he seems to lack the drive and self-esteem to do anything about it. Not surprisingly, Silver certainly does entertain the idea of destroying Laura’s wedding by falling in love with her. In the end, it is only Violanta that is destroyed, though it is clearly something she longs for as if she has been dreaming of it her entire life.

Throughout the film, Violanta is curiously followed by a morose and painfully vulnerable yet absolutely ravishing, pale moon-faced and redheaded beauty named ‘Alma’ (Ingrid Caven), who has such an innately forsaken demeanor that it seems as if the Devil himself gave her a weekend pass out of hell just to attend the wedding as some form of inordinately cruel punishment. Completely consumed with guilt as a result of supposedly killing her husband and still hopelessly heartbroken that the man she actually loved was killed, Alma is incessantly rebuked by her friend for living in the past. As revealed in a brief scene shortly after she is first introduced to the viewer, locals believe that Alma acts strange because she was the victim of a harvest moon, but Violanta certainly knows better. As Alma emotionally confesses to Violanta, she believes “now the moment has arrived” and “The payment is due” in regard to the fact she poisoned her husband after their wedding, or as she further explains while clearly burdened with an almost grotesque sense of guilt, “...but no one except me knows about that. I never said anything because of my son. His life would have been a living hell if he had known . . . that his mother is a murderer.” As she later explains to Silver in a haunted cave, Alma is Violanta’s ‘shadow’ (in fact, it can be argued she is the heroine’s sort of Jungian ‘shadow aspect’), as she candidly expresses all the pain, guilt, and lovesickness that has also plagued the titular heroine for so many years. Indeed, when she notices that Alma has committed suicide by hanging herself during Laura’s wedding party, Violanta decides it is time to end her own life and does so by drinking poisoned wine. Notably, Violanta’s one-true-love ‘Adrian’ (Raúl Gimenez) was very knowledgeable about poisons and taught her enough about the subject to poison both her husband ‘Simon’ (François Simon) and eventually herself. While Violanta stoically states to Alma, “Memories are of no use. As are confessions,” it is ultimately the eponymous heroine’s miserable memories and confession to her daughter that give her the strength she needs to finally commit self-slaughter.

VIOLANTA

As depicted in rather ghostly flashback scenes, Violanta was forced to marry her belated hubby Simon after her sleazy brother ‘Fortunat’ (Gérard Depardieu)—a boorish psychopath that seemed to love lurking around seedy bars—literally gambled her away during a drunken game of cards. On top forcing her to marry a greedy old fart against her will, Fortunat also murdered Violanta’s lover Adrian while they were lovingly embraced in a strikingly sick act of tragic poetic violence that seems to have turned the heroine into the cold conspiring bitch that she is today. When Adrian’s ghost randomly appears the night before her daughter’s wedding, Violanta does not declare her love to him but instead immediately attacks him, stating, “I assumed that you had found peace. How meaningless! A dead man dreaming about life at night. That’s not possible, Adrian,” but he replies, “One needs a lot of time in order to die. Look out the window! You can see nothing but tormented shadows.” In fact, Violanta—a woman that prides herself on her own personal independence and capacity to rule—is such a cold and irrational cunt that she blames Adrian, as opposed to her demented brother Fortunat, for being murdered and causing the horrific premature end of their lurid love affair, stating, “But you were a coward, just like the other men. My brother intimidated you like he did with them. My God, how much I loved you! I wanted to runaway with you. No matter where. Far away from the valley. But you were afraid of me.” Of course, Violanta’s callous words reveal that she is nothing short of an emotionally erratic misandrist, so it should be no surprise that she established her own mountain matriarchy where most men merely act as meek servants. In fact, Violanta also strategically setup her daughter Laura’s marriage to a groveling beta-bitch named David (Luciano Simioni) specifically because he is “sensitive” and quite unlike her dead husband and deadly dipso-maniac brother. Indeed, denied true love herself, Violanta has no problem denying her daughter the same thing. Of course, unlike her arrogant old fart husband Simon, David is at least a young pansy pushover that little Laura can boss around. A seasoned ice queen that has not gotten over the death of her true love, Violanta now looks at men as a means to an end and nothing more.

While it does not seem like they are particularly bothered by the taboo of incest as demonstrated by the fact that they make out (and possibly make love) in the countryside not long after meeting for the very first time, Silver and Laura are not actually half-siblings, or so the latter eventually learns upon eavesdropping on her mother. Indeed, as revealed towards the end of the film, Laura is not the daughter of Violanta's dead husband Simon, but her murdered true love Adrian. Indeed, when Violanta encounters the ghost of her dead husband, she hatefully boasts, "You weren't as lucky as you thought when you gambled for me. You didn't win me. You won my hate" and then reveals that she poisoned him and that Laura is actually "Adrian's child" and not his. Unfortunately, Laura witnesses this conversation, though she cannot see the ghost that her mother is ostensibly speaking to. Notably, Laura does not seem particularly disturbed by the revelation that Silver is not her biological half-sibling and that Simon is not her real father, as if she is fully aware of her mother's deep treachery and lies. Of course, by cuckolding Simon and murdering him before she could find out her dirty little secret, Violanta was able to secure a great future for her daughter. Despite her great airs of calm sophistication and happiness, Violanta has been more or less metaphysically dead ever since the death of her great love Adrian and she has simply dedicated her life since then to providing a secure future for her daughter, so it only seems natural that she commits suicide right after Laura gets married as her motherly mission has been accomplished and thus she has no other reason to live. Naturally, it is only fittingly that she kills herself the same exact way that she murdered her husband by consuming poison after her daughter's wedding in what ultimately seems to be a somewhat morbid form of penance. On the other hand, Violanta does not all seem to regret committing mariticide and her suicide seems to be more influenced by a virtual lifetime of heartsickness than homicidal guilt. As for Laura and her 'brother' Silver, one can only guess, but it seems that their (pseudo)incestuous affair concluded before it even really began, which is arguably the real tragedy of the film. In the end, Laura seems to have no problem with settling for matrimonial mediocrity over the ostensible half-brother that she clearly loves, though one suspects that she will eventually grow to be just as cold and bitter as her emotionally barren progenitor.

Notably, as opposed to being a sort of stereotypical quasi-Freudian celluloid turd where sex and romance is depicted in a pathological or psychoanalytic fashion (incidentally, Freud was somewhat obsessed with Conrad Ferdinand Meyer's source novella and referenced it in his early writings and lectures as an example of a 'pathological,' as opposed to psychological, work), Violanta depicts the world of love as a sort of forsaken realm plagued by tragic romantic destiny, or as auteur Daniel Schmid once explained himself in an interview, "Yes, there's a certain fa-talism about the story. And I love legends, they're what remain at the very end, and no one cares about the real truth. Everyone's fate is predetermined from the beginning, as if they were under a spell. There are no genuine couples, only impossible ones. And the main characters live with people from the past, the dead are sometimes more present than the living." In fact, not unlike many of Schmid's greatest cinematic works, the film has an undeniably timeless quality and might be best described as an aberrant anti-fairytale as directed by a sort of strangely cynical 'romantic pessimistic' that is just as dubious of love and its nuances and intricacies as he is obscenely obsessed with it. Of course, being a gay man, Schmid (who curiously cast his "first great love" Raúl Gimenez as the titular's heroine's dead lover) had a somewhat warped and arguably resentment-driven view of heterosexual love, as if it was something he deeply longed for but knew he could never really have. One also cannot forget that Schmid strongly identified with women and lived vicariously through them via his filmic heroines, so it should be no surprise that he personally exhibited some of the less flattering character traits associated with women, namely a talent for covert emotional and psychological manipulation. Indeed, as Schmid's longtime cinematographer Renato Berta explained in the documentary Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense (2010) co-directed by Pascal Hofmann and Benny Jaberg in regard to the filmmaker's somewhat Fassbinder-esque tendencies, "There'd be conflicts where I'd ask myself: 'What will happen now? This will be dramatic!' He had a fierce, awful, on-set argument with Ingrid Caven. It was very severe. He kicked the make-up table so that it fell over. 'You're a whore!' And that was really how he was: A sort of subconscious manipulator. He was always playing games and if you couldn't distance yourself at times you'd find yourself . . . in situations that seemed totally complicated, and you'd think, there's no way out. Then he himself would show you the way out. At least, at times. In this regard, then, he had an elegance that few possess." Indeed, the way Berta describes Schmid makes it seem as if the eponymous heroine of Violanta is a vaguely autobiographical character of sorts, at least in the psychological sense.

VIOLANTA

Also in the doc Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense, Teutonic avant-garde maestro Werner Schroeter explained in regard to his longtime friend and fellow 'queen' Schmid, "Daniel saw a diva in everyone. He even tried to sell his aunt as an odd diva. Daniel was a diva ddiçt. They were hidden everywhere, and you only had to bring this out in order to draw forth this artificiality and create a diva's pseudo-immortality." Undoubtedly, out of all of Schmid's films, Violanta features the director's most fully realized and unforgettable diva in the form of Italian Neorealist legend Lucia Bosé who rules over an exceedingly feminine realm of not only the night, moon, nature, and the maternal, but also masks, sophistry, underhandedness, formlessness, and the daemonic. In short, the film is deliciously demonically Delphic in its innate femininity to the point of expressing the gynocentric as something that is gorgeously grotesque in a sick and tragic sort of way. Depicting a sort of quasi-mystical and matriarchal pastoral mono no aware microcosm where the acceptance of lovelorn misery by the heroine highlights both the innate emotional strength and callousness associated with the so-called fairer sex, the film ultimately reveals Schmid's strange respect for the perennial enigma that is femininity. Surely, Schmid's film revealed that Italian sage Julius Evola was right when he wrote in Eros and the Mysteries of Love: The Metaphysics of Sex (1958) in regard to the devilishly dichotomous traits of the female sex, "A Persian legend indicates the ingredients of which a woman is composed as 'the hardness of a diamond, the sweetness of honey, the cruelty of a tiger, the warm brightness of a fire, and the coolness of snow.' These ambivalences, the same as those met with in the archetype of the Divine Woman, lie at the basis of another set of traits in feminine psychology: the co-existence of a disposition toward pity and a disposition toward a special cruelty. Lombroso and Ferrero observed some time ago how woman is simultaneously more pitying and yet more cruel than man, for her capacity for a loving protection and compassion is often accompanied by a lack of feeling, ruthlessness, and destructive violence that, once let loose, take a far greater hold on her than they do a man; history bears witness to this in collective forms when rebellions and lynching have taken place." Indeed, when Violanta hatefully rebukes the ghost of her great love that died in her arms, one cannot help but be reminded of Evola's words, "Women, wrote Martin, are ruthless about the evil they do to men they love." After all, even in death, the heroine cannot forgive her beloved for being brutally murdered at the hands of her own brother simply because he loved her too much. No doubt, I would be lying if I did not admit that Violanta made me seriously ponder the dark enigma of covert female psychological violence and the countless wars, wrecked nations, ruined lives, and destroyed love affairs that have occurred throughout history as a result of some conspiring bitch getting an itch to tell some monstrous lie. Indeed, as demonstrated by everything from Shakespeare to popular TV shows like Game Of Thrones, such craven feminine behavior is a timeless theme of Western culture, yet few individual men want to admit to themselves that women are capable of such things, hence why women like the titular heroine of Schmid's film are able to so easily getaway with them. Of course, as Otto Weininger once wrote, "No men who really think deeply about women retain a high opinion of them; men either despise women or they have never thought seriously about them." After all, even Schmid, who loved women and their idiosyncrasies, could not help but portray their most loathsome traits. Undoubtedly, the difference between Schmid and the average heterosexual man is that the belated filmmaker admired women for many of the same reasons that straight men simply cannot stomach them aside from only a strictly sexual basis.

Despite his unequivocal worship of dark feminine traits, Schmid was by no means some sort of degenerate feminist leftist cuck, at least not in any typical sense. Indeed, as Schmid stated during a contentious press release for his first feature Tonight or Never—a film that subtly satires the mindless stupidity of the German 68er-Bewegung student movement of the late-1960s—in regard to his disgust with Occidental decadence and the decline of Europa in general, “I live in a decadent era. That is my private belief. I believe that I live in a late chapter of Western history. I have no conception of how things might continue.” In fact, Schmid’s early films were oftentimes, rather absurdly, labelled “fascist” by certain left-wing film critics, or as the auteur explained himself when asked by Rudolph Jula if he was reproached for being a supposed bourgeois artist, “Yes, to the point of being accused of celebrating bourgeois cultural fascism. That was a term being hurled at everyone at the time. Everyone was a fascist, apart from oneself of course. But all these words have lost their meaning today, like communism.” Of course, to these commie critics’ very minor credit, Schmid was clearly a serious artist with a deep respect for European high kultur who was not afraid to direct films based on novels written by fascist authors like Hécate (1982) or to make ostensibly racially insensitive films like Shadow of Angels featuring a character simply named “The Rich Jew.” As far as fascist melodrama is concerned, Schmid’s films make a classic Veit Harlan flick like Opfergang (1944) seem like a quirky romantic-comedy by comparison in terms of sheer tragic sorrow and abject despair. Undoubtedly, Violanta is arguably the most immaculate cinematic example of what Douglas Sirk—an auteur that Schmid considered such a great hero and artistic influence that he paid tribute to with the fairly worthwhile documentary Mirage de la vie (1983) aka Imitation of Life—when he described the “impossible situation” of melodrama. Completely denying the viewer any sense of catharsis while ensnaring them in his own deep dark abyss of rather cryptically expressed sexual and emotional desires, Schmid managed to assemble a film that is among the darkest and most foreboding of cinema history when it comes to the metaphysics of sex and the perils of true love. Indeed, to watch Violanta is to be temporarily forsaken by Schmid’s hopelessly haunted Hades-like homo soul. Personally, I cannot think of another film where a somnambulist-like red-headed Fräulein inspires romantic fantasies of suicide and where an incestuous brother-sister romance seems like the most natural relationship in the world, but then again I am a sucker for Schmid and the sort of ominously yet soothingly oneiric cinematic majesty that his films offer.

VIOLANTA

-Ty E

HÉCATE

Daniel Schmid (1982)

While my girlfriend and I love the early films of Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid (Schatten der Engel aka Shadow of Angels, Violanta), especially his masterful second feature-length effort La Paloma (1974) starring Fassbinder's ex-wife Ingrid Caven, we were both absolutely repelled by his brazenly bitter and precariously pessimistic colonial romance Hécate, maîtresse de la nuit (1982) aka Hécate starring American fashion model turned actress Lauren Hutton (The Gambler, Once Bitten) and the always pompous and unpleasant Frenchman Bernard Giraudeau (Passione d'amore, François Ozon's odious Fassbinder adaption Water Drops on Burning Rocks). In fact, to simply say the word "Hécate" is enough to consume my typically calm and mild-mannered girlfriend with sheer and utter disgust, which is certainly a sentiment I can relate to, even if I found myself more intrigued by Schmid's Franco-Swiss film on my second viewing of it due to its historical and philosophical themes regarding the capitulation of Europa as a result of the Second World and rise of a new form of barbaric collectivism as inspired by far-left anti-European sentiment. Having the grand distinction of being Schmid's most 'explicitly erotic' work (even if it does not show much in the way of bare flesh) and set in an unmentioned French-British North African colony, Hécate totally lacks the signature high-camp melodrama and decided aesthetic decadence that made the director's first three films, Tonight or Never (1972), La Paloma, and Shadow of Angels, idiosyncratic masterpieces. A sort of exotic European film noir featuring an apathetic femme fatale who wants nothing in return for her succubus ways aside from destroying the soul of any man that has the misfortune of coming under her spell, and set in a pre-apocalyptic Arabian colonial ghetto as opposed to an American urban ghetto, Hécate is ultimately an unpleasantly poetic celluloid allegory for the decline of Occidental power and influence disguised as one of the most disastrous romances ever depicted on the silver screen. Based on the novel Hécate et ses chiens written by French Nazi collaborator/Vichy government supporter Paul Morand—a novelist inspired by the Faustian philosophies of Friedrich Nietzsche and Oswald Spengler, as well as the racial theories of frog aristocrat Arthur de Gobineau (whose ideas also inspired Richard Wagner and the Bayreuth circle)—Hécate, unlike similarly themed Hollywood works, makes no attempt to glorify the death of the west nor the so-called 'noble savage,' but instead portrays it as a sort of soft-core doomsday scenario leading up to a sort of neo-barbarism of global proportions. As a man who suavely satired the far-left 1968 student movement in his debut feature Tonight or Never and always displayed a deep admiration for traditional kultur, Schmid certainly expressed a sense of quasi-Spenglerian cultural pessimism with Hécate that is no less emotionally grating than his discernible disdain for heterosexual relationships.

HÉCATE

It is the 1930s and French diplomat Julien Rochelle (Bernard Giraudeau)—a successful and attractive but otherwise mediocre man—spots a mysterious beautiful blonde woman while lounging at the French embassy in Morocco. After Julien asks a consul at the embassy “what kind of woman is that?,” he learns she is “just a woman looking out into the night.” Of course, little does Julien realize that he will soon be spending a number of sleepless nights in a North African colony searching for the mysterious woman. As Julien narrates at the beginning of Hécate, “The story of Clothilde happened a very long time ago. When I say time...I don’t mean the number of years...I mean that since that time the world has changed. France and England no longer live at the slow pace of horses. France and her Treasury no longer represent the greatest bank in the world. America is arming Russia. Germany will devour everything, even her own downfall. In those days...When was it, already?” Upon arriving at the North African colony, Julien almost immediately starts a steamy love affair with a certain married woman named Clothilde de Watteville (Lauren Hutton), whose husband is a ‘strange French officer’ working as a mercenary in Siberia. Of course, little does gentleman Julien realize that he will be in store for the same sort of internal pain and heartbreak as Clothilde’s husband, a totally broken man who cannot live with or without his wife, but has chosen self-imposed exile and opium to distance himself from his seemingly magical and always wanton witch of a wife. While Julien and Clothilde’s relationship is seemingly immaculate due to its exclusively erotic nature, the French diplomat begins to overstep his bounds when he begins to declare his passionate love for the married femme fatale, which naturally pushes her away. Of course, Julien’s romantic relationship with Clothilde is not the only thing crumbling in the North African colony as the colony itself is falling due to rebel attacks inspired by a hatred for European imperialism. As French consul Vaudable (Jean Bouise), tells Julien regarding the state of the world and the foreboding future of the Occident, “One sees horrors everywhere. Everywhere where order reigns, everywhere where disorder reigns. Occasionally, in the center of Europe, in the center of certain Democracies, it is possible to find a fragrance of tolerance. A conquest against nature. Barbarism is a permanent threat. We can forget the ideas of the French Eighteenth Century. Liberty and individuality are two luxuries that are dying out.” Despite being a French diplomat, Julien cares more about permanently possessing Clothilde than whether or not Europe’s empires fall. Every time Clothilde disappears from his presence, Julien wanders on foot both day and night and when he finally catches her during one of these exotic Arabian nights, he forces himself upon her, thus demonstrating the dissolution of his mind as a diplomat-turned-degenerate. When jaded Julien later discovers an androgynous Arab boy hanging outside of Clothilde’s door, he displays his dominance in a rather degraded manner by capturing the brown boy, locking him in his lover’s room, and sadistically sodomizing the uniquely unlucky and unwilling victim. While Julien is not arrested, he is forced to leave his post and his title and pension are revoked as a result of the sodomy scandal. Forced to take the first black boat to France by the French Foreign Office, Julien is forced away from his sweet succubus Clothilde, but he ultimately becomes a successful ambassador anyway despite being a lovelorn lunatic who perniciously pillaged a young untermensch boy.

Still consumed with undying love for the ever so cold and callous ice queen Clothilde as a pathetic perennial cuckold of sorts, Julien uses his power as an ambassador to visit his lost lover's husband in Siberia despite the fact a violent war is waging there. Upon a superficial glance, it is quite apparent Le colonel de Watteville (Gérard Desarthe) is a badly broken man who is addicted to 'Cocteau's kick' and when Julien arrives to speak with him, it comes as somewhat of a shock to the viewer that he is not angered by the fact that the melancholy married man is standing face-to-face with the man fellow that sexually defiled his wife. The Colonel lets Julien know that, "You know...we're both in the same boat, hoping every day that she's coming and praying always for her not to come. Here, I'm paying my debt. I am not cured. I'm still waiting." Not long after his visit with the Colonel, Julien ends up running into Clothilde by happenstance at a party in Switzerland and tells her he went to visit her husband, remarking, "I am like him. I was never cured." After declaring his love for Clothilde for the last time, he is met with the disappointing response, "Words always come too late...or too soon."

In an interview with Swiss filmmaker Rudolph Jula, director Daniel Schmid provided the following insights regarding Hécate, "A lot of things come together at the end of the world. The novel Hécate was written by Paul Morand, the character was based on his wife Helene, whom I met when she was a very old woman. She was supposed to be eighty-five when she died, and then they found out she was ninety-seven. She'd altered her passport so often that even her husband didn't know. Hécate is a film about projection, possession, jealousy and logical destruction." And, indeed, an irrational obsession with projection, possession, and jealously lead Hécate protagonist Julien, an otherwise dull and uninteresting man, to degenerate into a one-man train wreck who will do anything, including raping a teenage Arab boy, to demonstrate his debauched and ultimately demented love for a woman who is only interested in emotionless sex and flaunting her almost witchlike power over and destruction of said men.

A patently pessimistic example of 'love conquers all' (except for seemingly sociopathic femme fatales, of course!), Hécate is undoubtedly the closest thing to a French colonialist take on Gone with the Wind (1939), because, like the Hollywood epic, Schmid's film also depicts not only the failure of a great love affair but also the decline of a civilization, which has ultimately led to the mass-minded and Americanized world we have today where such things as class and culture have been turned into a mockery of the way things once were in the past.

HÉCATE

The fact that Hécate is based on a novel written by an unrepentant fascist elitist and aristocrat of the soul makes it all the more interesting of a film because, unlike the communist (and Hollywood) writers, who actively sought to destroy traditional Europe and European values via savage class warfare and portray all things classically Occidental as innately evil, most so-called 'far-rightists' hope to preserve ancient culture and traditions and rid their nations of vice and decadence, which the protagonist of Schmid's film ironically ultimately succumbs to. Undoubtedly, to describe Hécate—a film named of the Greek goddess of magic and protection who later came to represent the goddess of darkness, night, and the underworld and a sort of femme fatale—as a great 'downer' of a film would be an understatement as few other films have the power to depress, anger, and agitate like Schmid's dark colonial romance. Of course, with their celebrated cuckold epic The Constant Gardener (2005)—a film about a British cuckold of a diplomat in Kenya who makes the major mistake of falling in love with a hysterical 'humanitarian' activist, thus leading to both of their demises—Hollywood has popularized what Schmid did long ago with Hécate. The major difference between both films is that while Hécate portrays the dissolution of European power as a bad thing that will inevitably lead to a sort of rise of Bolshevik-esque neo-barbarism on a global level, The Constant Gardener absurdly portrays sacrificing one's life to disease-ridden 'noble savages' as the most morally noble and virtuous thing a person can do, which would have totally repulsed Hécate novelist Paul Morand. Of course, The Constant Gardener is a not only a glaring symptom of Occidental decline and the horrendous and culturally homogenizing Hollywoodization of the world, but also the reign of the untermensch and the total transvaluation of all values, which was not only dreaded by Morand, Nietzsche, and Spengler, but also Hécate director Daniel Schmid, who portrays the darkness and chaos engulfing Europe during the first half of the Twentieth century as a salacious and statuesque mistress of the night.

-Ty E

PINPRICK

Daniel Young (2009)

What originally piqued my interest in Pinprick was how cleverly matched the plot seemed to be with L'immoralita, a film I had recently discussed. The closest interpretation on Daniel Young's Pinprick could lend hints of Breillat's À ma sœur! but only after digging well underneath the feminine tissue. One thing that really struck a chord with me was our young star Laura Greenwood's performance. In Pinprick, Greenwood plays a radically rebellious teenager, aged 15, who festers an unbearable relationship with her mother. In a fit of retaliation, unknown to us or the camera, she decides to foster a criminal in her closet, feeding him scraps and entertaining his presence by wearing revealing clothing. In many scenes, Daniel Young incorporates visible signs of reality, not just script-writing, but an experience all together in realism. Pinprick is not a window into fictitious psychopathy but a careful portrait of, quite literally, the dangers of innocence.

Greenwood's character, Charlotte, is quickly introduced in her bedroom talking to a shadow in her closet. Not bumbling about with origins or needless explanation and sifting through scenes, Pinprick begins before we even realize it. Ervin Nagy plays Reyer, our enigmatic prisoner of this sterile domicile. Reyer is a character who possesses immense presence with his Hungarian features. He's certainly an intimidating character and the games he has in store for this unwitting family only add to his curious and repressed behavior. Daniel Young doesn't waste any time establishing the strange, almost teasingly pedophilic, relationship between the brutish Reyer and the budding flower Charlotte. I'd call Pinprick jailbait terrorism as scenes are juxtaposed to both titillate and warn you. In a certainly complex nature, Charlotte's character bounces around in panties, expressing her flourishing curves in a manner that is all too beguiling and impossible to resist. Pinprick then gives you a slap on the hand for eying the lovely dame as such a meat. What lies within this relapsing of lust is a strong point of Pinprick. The name of the game is passive fetishism and Laura Greenwood makes damn sure that every viewer is paying attention.

The battle soon switches targets as Reyer begins scoping out Charlotte's homely mother, Miriam, portrayed by Rachael Blake. I suppose the tedious girl-games wore thin for Reyer as he sets into motion a plan to assimilate himself within the household, allowing complete and total freedom, including the sexual kind. Charlotte, noticing Reyer has been intimate with her mother, begins to grow a sizable fear and jealousy. There's much more to the plot of Pinprick, which is delicately delivered at the very end of the film. A "twist" so mellow and radical that I should have seen it coming, but never did. Reyer, the Hungarian opportunist, is shed upon as a brooding character with a strange fascination for the toys of the bourgeois. Pinprick is the first "independent" feature I've seen in quite some time that I can solemnly swear to seep substance. Not only does the film play all fronts of battle but impales the typical daughter as well. Pinprick attests to the terror of angsty girlhood. While Charlotte suffers from susceptible and impressionistic behavior, one might argue she's not as rotten as her friends; one being a young Latino whore who receives a tattoo at an all-too young age. Charlotte expresses her distaste at the decision, all while realizing she too is irrational.

PINPRICK

To return once more to the inextricable relation to L'immoralita, both Pinprick and the aforementioned Italian psychodrama share common similarities. Both films involve little girls hiding criminals away from their parents and share interest in mature mothers seducing or being seduced by said criminal. This leads to the familial meltdown in both pictures. Also shared is a scene of listening in on consummation which leads to the young ladies either sobbing or being noticeably distressed. Laura Greenwood's defining curves tackle the topic of ageless sex head on. Just as Simona proved in L'immoralita, these young fledging doves with dreams of big love know the sinister game they're playing and in some way, mesh seamlessly with the future of the false rape epidemic. With Pinprick, Daniel Young surprised me, intrigued me, and patronized me. Not just with the shameless sexuality of young Charlotte but with his effective storytelling. Pinprick is easily one of the better and engaging dramas floating around these days and it's a damn shame that it's not more accessible to wandering hands. To better solidify your own opinion, I suggest purchasing it here.

-mAQ

SLUMDOG MILLIONAIRE

Danny Boyle (2008)

Hype and appraisal can indeed be a serrated-edged coin. On one surface, you face the logic of opinion and the other side represents the quality of said material. For perfect example, Had The Dark Knight not been a great film, consensus would still agree on cementing the films present status of "Best film of 2008!" due to the untimely passing of Heath Ledger. For me, two films fit this niche in 2008; Let the Right One In and Slumdog Millionaire. To stray from my point, Let the Right One In has been hailed as the single greatest vampire tale of all time. In my many attempts to watch it, I haven't surpassed 20 minutes running time all thanks to the sluggish pace at which it crawls effortlessly. However, I won't make my decision until I've finally digested it in its whole. Danny Boyle is a name I can rely on within Hollywood. While I didn't flock to his weepy tale of Millions, I found his previous efforts in 1995's Shallow Grave and 2002's 28 Days Later (the first half). His career has been aesthetically luxurious and earnest. With his recent dabbling in multiculturalism, Slumdog Millionaire takes City of God inspired narrations of a troubled childhood and adds Bollywood flavor in what takes place at a Hindi version of Who Wants to be a Millionaire? For what it's worth, Bollywood is famous in our American culture for their unabashed rip-offs, remakes, forgeries, and other doppelganging oddities. Voiced by a throbbing Hindi electro soundtrack led by bumping tracks from M.I.A., It's nice to finally see a film that uses smash hit Paper Planes to such an effective degree. Better yet, the culture of this film fits rather close to the characters featured in Slumdog Millionaire. The acting is stellar but I cannot find much porous material in Jamal to latch upon. Sure, the film is a filling outing in cinema, but it's stuck on the appetizer. Slumdog Millionaire definitely feels like it's missing something. The array of questions throughout Slumdog Millionaire coincide with events that transpired in his past creating this buoyant Déjà vu that fills you with glee. Slumdog Millionaire is a solemn film of many virtues. It's a thing of beauty. It isn't perfect and it never strived to be. When Danny Boyle created this film, I'm sure he had no expectations of his latest film to be called the single greatest film of 2008. What a way to cap off the end of such a prosperous year. Redefining inspirational cinema, Slumdog Millionaire will tug at your heartstrings. For once, I'm not discouraged of liking something so one-sidedly well-received. Had I not liked this film, the surprise dance number at the end might have made me vomit in my mouth a little.

-mAQ

THE TENANTS
THE TENANTS

Danny Green (2006)

The Tenants is a film about a Jewish writer named Harry Lesser who befriends a black militant writer named Willie Spearmint (Snoop Dogg) that is squatting in the same apartment building he lives in. Despite being sub-literate, Willie believes that his writing is revolutionary with its messages of killing white people. I guess he knows the audience he is targeting. The stoic (does one exist?) Jew Harry Lesser does everything he can to kiss Willie's ass for no apparent reason. Willie has a "white" Jewish bitch for a girlfriend that Harry starts falling in love. One can only expect violence with a disgustingly bizarre love triangle between writers as diverse as these.

Apparently, The Tenants has offended the racially sensitive citizens of the United States and only played at one theater in the entire country. I am not surprised as The Tenants lacks any type of happy and sentimental civil rights message that you can expect from films of this "progressive" generation. The "struggle" in the film is only between egos and "racially diverse" characters. As can be expected, the Jewish Harry Lesser is a "victim" of irrational black gentile anti-Semitism. Willie is a criminal who has served time and lives off the fruits of his Jewish "bitch" girlfriend. Despite hating whites and promoting black power idealism, he believe its okay to have a relationship with a white girl. In fact, if it wasn't for the white girl, this black power revolutionary would be begging for pennies on a curb in some shithole ghetto.

The Tenants lets the viewer know in a symbolic manner that if it wasn't for the Jewish community, the black civil rights movement would have never gone anywhere. It doesn't take much historical background research to find out that the NAACP was far from a black organization. For example, Jacob Schiff, the Wall street banker who also funded the Bolshevik revolution, funded the NAACP. Schiff also worked with his buddies Jacob Billikopf and the infamous Zionist Rabbi Stephen Wise to get the NAACP moving. To put it simply, the NAACP was never really an organization interested in true black interests. After stealing Willie Spearmint's girl in The Tenants, it is clear that the arrogant Harry Lesser wasn't really looking to help Spearmint's black power writing to get off the ground. Despite having an extremely low IQ, Willie Spearmint can see through the weak front that is Harry Lesser.

Throughout The Tenants Harry Lesser seems to get off on a masochistic ride of being verbally abused and threatened by Willie Spearmint. These scenes of a black man dominating a "white" man are so typical of Hollywood nowadays that it's a surprise that some "redneck" hasn't assassinated any Hollywood producers like the Silent Brotherhood assassinated the belligerent Jewish radio talk show host Alan Berg (who Oliver Stone later made a movie about Talk Radio). Despite being a criminal and wearing a jungle gear wardrobe, Willie is more respectable than little bitch Lesser. When Willie eventually destroys Lesser's probably less than interesting book, I couldn't help but giggle.

The Tenants is a very flawed and somewhat small budget film that is at the very least watchable. Upon first viewing the film, I expected another race friendly Jew-lifts-black-man-off-ground-and-gives-him-power film that so typical of Hollywood. In the end, The Tenants has a nihilistic message that obviously must be upsetting to many white liberals. The dreams of a multicultural utopian society takes an ax to the stomach in The Tenants. Steven Spielberg directed The Color Purple and Amistad to give "power" to the black people but he is just another Harry Lesser.

-Ty E

TIME EXPIRED
TIME EXPIRED

Danny Leiner (1992)

One must certainly wonder how decidedly derelict director Danny Leiner, being of the traditionally Hebraic Hollywood persuasion with such formulaic, vacuous comedic hits as Dude Where's my Car? (2000) and Harold and Kumar Go to White Castle (2004) came to begin his career with Time Expired (1992), a semi-serious, and not particularly slapstick funny, but rather bizarre 30-minute short about a hyper masculine married wop whose latent homosexuality is unleashed after serving a two-year stint in the city jail while housed with a presumably Puerto-Rican, fiery latina transvestite cellmate. Indeed, Time Expired is a rather bizarre, yet enjoyable short film about the not so uncommon, but often unspoken of scenario of seemingly macho men finding their true lascivious homosexual selves in prison, and the often raucous ramifications that result from their lustful prison proclivities. Upon his exit from jail, Bobby (played by Bob Gosse) seems rather ambivalent about being reunited with his family who await him outside the prison gates. On the way out, however, his already mixed emotions about his release are further complicated when his former cellmate and lover, saucy latina tranny Ruby, decadently dressed to the nines in a sexy, short blue dress complete with a long, flowing black wig and sunglasses (played by the highly versatile John Leguizamo—whose many diverse roles range from portraying a sex-obsessed, possibly gay Guido in Summer of Sam (1999) to a nearly-brain dead half-Hispanic/half-Jewish hustler retard in King of the Jungle (2000)) walks by and asks him if he'd like to meet up later. Bobby, unsure of how to deal with the situation, immediately dismisses Ruby's presence and eagerly walks over to his awaiting family—his chubby, short and unassuming mother, his semi-autistic comic books obsessed brother Burt, and his young, faithful wife, Ginny (played by Edie Falco of Sopranos fame in one of her earliest roles). Bobby feigns excitement at seeing his forgiving family after being in jail for a presumably cum-in-the-butt filled two years with his Latin lover Ruby (after apparently having been charged with "ripping off over 1,000 parking meters," which is somewhat suggestive of kleptomaniac tendencies, which seem to be strikingly common among homosexuals, including my beloved flaming fag uncle), and returns home only to fall into a drunken, unemployed slump in which his pretty and forgiving and decidedly tame for an Italian wife Ginny can't help but feel sorry for her ex-con husband who, unbeknownst to her, is incessantly ruminating about and lusting after the sweet and spicy Latina ass of his tranny lover, Ruby.

Barely able to concentrate even on shitty afternoon cartoons while staying at home one day, Bobby finally gives Ruby a call and asks if she'd like to meet him at the local park, as covertly as possible of course, for fear of his family discovering that he is a lustful horndog of a homo with a predilection for a cross-dressing maricon. Ruby happily obliges and attires herself accordingly in her favorite black wig and sexy red dress, only to find that Bobby is twenty minutes late for their presumed encounter of afternoon delight in the park. Ruby, predictably tiffed by his lateness yet very excited to see Bobby, remarks, “You’re twenty minutes late—that’s how late you are!” and “You’re way too flaco—you need a latina to make you some pollo!” is beyond dismayed when Bobby coldly tells her he only met up with her to say that he needs two months time to get his life in order, and that between now and then, the two of them can’t carry on any kind of relationship. Ruby, in characteristically hot-blooded Hispanic response, is beyond dismayed by Bobby’s plans and leaves immediately, but not before slapping him when he leans in for a kiss, and then giving him the finger and flamboyantly flashing her ass in anger. Later in the evening, Ruby goes to the local gay bar, dressed from head-to-toe like Marilyn Monroe, and washes away her sorrows in a dipsomaniac fit after being told by the bartender, “You know, he’s just a breeder” and responding, “I know. That’s what I like about him,” demonstrating that the little latin lover is still clearly quite obsessed with her Italian boy-toy and truly distraught over his looming, self-imposed two-month hiatus from their admittedly awkward, yet intense love-making sessions.

In spite of what he said, Bobby cannot make good on his promise to abstain from his debauched disposition, and just a day or so later he is already hanging out at the salon where Ruby works as a manicurist and hairstylist. The two go on an intimate afternoon date, in which he purchases for her a Jesus figurine at a local Hispanic market; the day ultimately ends with the two dancing intimately and lustily to some Billy Holiday or other such Negro spiritual inspired, faux-romantic, pretentious music in Ruby’s candle-lit bedroom, which inevitably concludes with the dubious pair exchanging bodily fluids and falling asleep, only for Bobby to later wake up and leave, only to return to his as yet unknowingly jilted wife who implores him to make love to her. Upon waking alone in bed the next day, Ruby, in typical latina fashion, is beyond pissed and can’t wait to take out revenge on and humiliate Bobby in front of his clueless wife. And indeed, the following morning is a true disaster for Bobby who, already packing his suitcase and preparing to leave his wife, is greeted at the front door by a truly pissed and volatile Ruby who barges through the front door and makes her presence known to Bobby’s wife Ginny who angrily responds, “Who the hell is this thing?!” with a lust-filled, passionate screaming match erupting between the two jilted ladies. Bobby finally admits to Ginny that he was a closet fag, and that he “consummated” his relationship with Ruby while in prison, and in rather atypical wop-fashion, Ginny is surprisingly accepting of his new-found life as a flaming homo, and quite graciously allows him to pack up his things and leave their humble abode. Ruby, on the other hand, is not so forgiving and while Bobby implores her to run away to Florida with him so that they can begin their licentious lives anew, she vehemently refuses and rather sacrilegiously throws at him the Jesus statue he had purchased for her just days ago; Bobby falls to the ground like the limp-dicked loser he is, as the statue symbolically lay broken on the ground.

TIME EXPIRED

Ultimately, Time Expired rings true to its meaning with a somewhat open-ended conclusion in which Bobby peers in at the window to Ruby's salon, seemingly begging for forgiveness and for her to take him back, only for Ruby to shake her head at him in disbelief at his desperation. While Time Expired is by no means a masterpiece of any sort, cinematically or thematically, it certainly does make for a brief yet highly enjoyable viewing, particularly for those entranced by John Leguizamo's always enthralling and diverse personas, ranging from stereotypical mafia gangsters to hot-blooded homos to raunchy retards. And the film is also an insightful exercise in what it must be like for previously masculine men, having found their true salacious selves in prison, to make the real-life, outside of prison transition from being former lily-lickers to presently equally semen-spewing and semen-loving homos with a predilection for lustful man-ladies. And, finally, Time Expired proves that, while the old saying may go that "hell hath no fury like a woman scorned," even those who are not biologically ladies are no exception to the rule, especially those of the hot-headed and fiery Latina tranny variety.

-Magda von Richthofen zu Reventlow auf Thule

BANGKOK DANGEROUS

Danny Pang (1999)

Not too long ago I sat down and reviewed the newest Nicholas Cage vessel Bangkok Dangerous. That film is a remake of a Thai action drama filmed at the end of the 90's helmed by twin brother duo The Pang Brothers. When I had low expectations for the remake which we met with equally, I didn't expect the remake to be the exact opposite of the original. Nicholas Cage is a caricature of our hero Kong, proven by the events. It even slightly explains the mop on his head. So, in the remake we have an assassin who becomes a sensei to a youthful man named Kong. This guy, Kong, is the only survivor of the hitman team in the Cage film. Kong, in the original, is an assassin who is taught by a man named Jo. Add a couple different scenes involving rape, and you've got nearly the same film, although backwards. The original Bangkok Dangerous is 100 times more exciting, more dramatic, more tragic, and features an incredible love side-story, unlike that cantankerous love stint the Nicholas Cage had with the deaf-mute pharmacist. If you had to give Nic Cage lines, so be it, but I did admire how the Pang's turned the robbery scene into a entirely different scene as the woman couldn't hear the chamber emptying into thugs. Kong is a deaf-mute which makes life a bit hard, especially his love life. If you enjoy awkward romance, fuck Juno and jump on the Bangkok bandwagon. He is unsociable and a cold remorseless killer. The only hesitation he even considers is just another obstacle he surpasses. The editing in this film was amazing at parts. It can be a fluent language of violence, as shown by the Pang's, but then it transforms back into painful drivel. Blood is a striking substance that the duo uses to an effect. They find a mesmerizing beauty behind blood slowly shaping around tiles then reforming. I can see how this is an ample technique used in a thriller. One point I found to be a bit weird was the action scenes. Critics have hailed the original as "frantic and hectic gunfights" which it completely isn't. The gun play in this film is realistic and hardly stylish. Bullets go everywhere and there is no beauty to the point. Thailand isn't normally a country I appreciate cinema from besides Tony Jaa films, but Bangkok Dangerous had that sly Korean feel which means there is life in that country. I'm glad to have seen this film, although a bit too late. The ending featured an incredibly tragic fate that could have been avoided but for the sake of sorrow, we wanted it to happen. Bangkok Dangerous (1999) puts the original to shame but still doesn't cross the line into marvelous territory.

-mAQ

SAVAGE STREETS
SAVAGE STREETS

Danny Steinmann (1984)

Considered by few to be a masterpiece in exploitation, Savage Streets is first and foremost a vehicle for Linda Blair to "professionally" bare her breasts. Even though this scene only stretches about a minute long with a slow and calculated pan across a bathtub, it is painfully obvious that her impunity paired with attitude was the second mark to meet. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if production of Savage Streets was funded simply from the premise of Linda Blair in leather wielding a crossbow, cleavage absolute. Caught on the rebound by director Danny Steinmann, who would later direct the runt of the Friday the 13th series (A New Beginning), Savage Streets pumps up the vigilante formula with effervescent colors, leg-warmers, and a typical 'tude to tease and flaunt a harsh and particular sexuality on the winners ground. Opening with a contrast of the Satins and the Scars, even adhering to a Venn diagram of sorts in comparing and contrasting the extremities of pack formations, in this case suburban violence - Vince is first introduced duping his parents into believing he's pursuing honest intentions, only then trading his would-be letterman jacket for a leather jacket. These actions justify a means, the obligatory summation of "do you know where your children go at night?". This (presently) pointless question is soon answered as we witness Vince jump into the back of a Bel-Air convertible, rendezvousing with his gang, The Scars. These boisterous boys are heeded only by their ignorance for at first they seem as if they could fit the archetype of being generally rowdy, even playful. But the light soon parts and their darker intentions are shown in a series of shakedowns which include ripping off the shirt of a buxom blonde in front of her boyfriend. It was a shame Steinmann didn't seize the opportunity or the advantage while he had it. God knows how much good would have come out of a single tear streaming down her cheeks as her breasts are groped by strange men. More-so, a simple look of dismay did not emphasize what could have been an above excellent (as well as arousing) scene. Note of interest - why not rape the beautiful aforementioned blonde rather than the timid, handicapped sister? Then again, power is the play and the Scars have more than enough sexual curiosities to work out.

With the Satins at the core of the story, we are indebted to enjoy the company of Brenda, Francine, and Heather, Brenda's deaf sister. The several hilarious and tragic (maintaining hilarity) confrontations between the sexes can have ample blame rerouted back to the Satins. It is them who strike first by stealing the convertible of the Scars while busy attempting to collect a nigh mentioned sum of money from the local jocks on account of "blow". Never mind the scene in which The Scars almost hit Heather with a car. Why the imperfect vessel of chastity is trotting around decrepit city streets at night with a gang of collected loose inhibitions is beyond me. It would appear that the Scars terrorize while the Satins tease, giving both sides a gender-specific lethality - men control and abuse while women seduce and destroy. That's not to bring the role of Heather into this mix though. That's not to say I don't believe in inklings of innocence. The fact of the matter is, Heather is cattle. Created by a Norman Yonemoto, Heather's character is a senseless shell serving a strict purpose for rape. She exists solely to be violated, thrusting our cast of women into a level of aggression and panic. As comes the revenge, so must the inciting incident. Soon enough will the Scars repay a small slight against their street credibility by raping a deaf/mute girl and as per aged rape-revenge talents, will force the runt of the group to savage their forcefully seized property.

An interesting aspect of The Scars is their general homoerotic behavior, frequently at play. You'll see the leader of the Scars, Jake, grab the crotches of his kinsfolk as well as tugging the pants down off Vince in a heated fury. Gearing Vince's libido towards a potential victim, sure, but the spark in Jake's eyes as well as his lecherous stare either suggest that the character in which Robert Dryer portrayed fostered homosexual condolences or Robert Dryer himself found himself an on-set muse. Do I even need to mention the locking of lips as a form of taunting, of which was allegedly improvised, so stated Danny Steinmann in an interview? I like to consider Dryer's part of improvisation to concede towards a form of theatrical subconscious submission. The frothing hyper-sexuality of the Satins intermittently clash with the flamboyantly feral Scars, as well. To bring about, again, the questioning of the Scars motivations - I find it interesting to note the choice of victim on Jake's part. The Scars definitely succeeded in hand-selecting the mousiest and most timid girl of all, somewhat resembling a creature from The Secret of Nimh. If Savage Streets were to be acknowledged for anything other than a brief spurt of crossbow vigilantism or Linda Blair's dirty pillows it would be for a neon-bathed battle of the sexes in which the body count outweighs the potential requirement for a viewing. I found the city of Savage Streets to boast clever flickers and splotches of light, fruitful characters whose moral scale has been past compromised, and enough hearty violence to spread evenly across 93 minutes. However, I cannot place a crown on a film unworthy of exploitation royalty, especially one whose smoldering legacy refuses to burn out after left to the elements. Babes, bolts, and badgering - Savage Streets is a silly relic of simpler times. I won't cut the ribbon of approval yet but I wholeheartedly agree its investments into revenge have more benevolence than that of the wavering vigilante pool that is modern cinema.

-mAQ

FOUR FLIES ON GREY VELVET
FOUR FLIES ON GREY VELVET

Dario Argento (1971)

Without question, if I were to name the most neglected and underrated film of Guido Giallo master Dario Argento (Suspiria, The Mother of Tears), it would unequivocally have to be his experimental and strikingly idiosyncratic giallo Four Flies on Grey Velvet (1971) aka 4 mosche di velluto grigio. The third and final chapter in Argento's 'Animal Trilogy' (following The Bird with the Crystal Plumage (1970) and The Cat o' Nine Tails (1971)), Four Flies on Grey Velvet was originally conceived as the filmmaker's swansong to the giallo genre, but that changed when his historical dramedy The Five Days (1973) aka Le cinque giornate aka The Five Days of Milan proved to be a mighty monetary failure at the box office, thus guaranteeing that Argento would be forever pigeonholed as a master of the cinematically macabre and not much else (although he cannot direct a decent horror film for the life of him nowadays). Centering around a drummer in a popular cock rock group who accidentally kills a man who has been incessantly stalking him, only to be stalked and tormented by a sadistic blackmailer in a bizarre mask who took photos of said accidental killing, Four Flies on Grey Velvet is also a singular work in Argento's cinematic oeuvre in that it features homosexual themes, most specifically those of the pleasantly political incorrect sort, even bordering on the campy at times. Acting as a sort of celluloid prototype for William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) and Lamberto Bava's late era giallo Body Puzzle (1992), Four Flies on Grey Velvet depicts the preternatural insanity that occurs when a sexually confused killer with a demented daddy complex decides to emotionally ravage and torture a rock star who hires a queenish gay private detective to help him catch his gender-challenged stalker. Apparently, originally intending to have the protagonist portrayed as a hysterical homo (instead, he is a 'closeted killer' who stares in the mirror far too often), the fag factor of Four Flies on Grey Velvet is largely of a subtextual manner that demonstrates that Argento probably was not up for ruining his career by directing a conspicuously gay giallo with a queer hero. Featuring high-speed camera work (at upwards of 1000 frames a second) that features a bullet moving in slow-motion (apparently, the first time ever featured in a film), a masterful and highly complementary musical score by Ennio Morricone (who thankfully replaced Deep Purple), a hypnotic 'image caught in the retina' gimmick, and one of the most startling ending twists and aesthetically pleasing car crash sequences in film history, Four Flies on Grey Velvet is a giallo for those that find the genre far too formulaic.

Roberto Tobias (American actor Michael Brandon) is the stuntman-like drummer of a Rome-based pseudo-psychedelic prog rock band and like many drummers, he is a rather strange and introverted fellow who does not say much. After noticing a weird, middle-aged goombah with a mustache following him around town for several days, Roberto finally loses his cool and confronts the seemingly perverted stalker in an abandoned opera theater. The man denies following Roberto and pulls out a switchblade and the two get in a scuffle, ultimately ending in the stalker's accidental death after being stabbed and falling into an orchestra pit. For whatever reason, a person with a creepy cartoon-like little blond boy mask witnessed the murder from the balcony and has taken photographs of the tragic incident, including a photo of Roberto holding the bloody switchblade. Although Roberto manages to get out of the theater unscathed, he is in for quite the shocker when he wakes up the next day to discover that the ID of the man he killed, Carlo Marosi (Caliŝto Caliŝti), has been mailed to him and the weirdo photographer with the mask is waging a game of blackmail and psychological warfare against him. After a bit of good, old fashioned stalking, including playfully wrapping a chord around the drummer's throat, the mysterious stalker begins to kill off people close to Roberto, the first of whom is his maid Amelia (Maria Fabbri), who by chance discovers the identity of the stalker and attempts to blackmail them, but ultimately pays with her life via a straight razor to the throat. Meanwhile, after hearing a story from one of his band members about public beheadings in Saudi Arabia, Roberto has nightmares about being beheaded himself. After telling his wife Nina (Mimsy Farmer) about his accidental killing of Carlo Marosi and the subsequent stalking, she agrees that they should not go to the police. Eventually, it is revealed that Carlo Marosi was never actually killed and that he was on in the conspiracy with the stalker to dupe Roberto into thinking he was a murderer. When Marosi learns of the murders, he tries to back out of the conspiracy, but the mysterious stalker opts to slaughter him instead. Meanwhile, Roberto's wife Nina's cousin Dalia (Francine Racette) comes to town, which rather bothers the rocker. Dalia eventually admits her undying love for Roberto and the two have sex, but their romance does not last long as the little lady is also murdered.

Against his better judgment, Roberto hires a flamingly gay private detective named Arrosio (Jean-Pierre Marielle), who readily admits he has never solved a case, but absurdly believes the fact that he hasn't means that the odds of unmasking the stalker are in his favor. Rather surprisingly, Arrosio does indeed discover the identity of the killer after examining some of Roberto's family photos and subsequently visiting a mental institution, but he is attacked in a public restroom and injected with a fatal blue poison, so naturally he is incapable of informing his client who has been stalking him. Arrosio ultimately discovered that the killer is a female ex-mental patient suffering from 'homicidal mania' who was institutionalized as a teenager for three years and whose 'father' attempted make her a boy as he had no desire to have another daughter. Inspired by an old wives' tale that the retina of a corpse's eye registers in the brain the last image a person sees before they die, the police remove the eyes of Dalia's corpse and shoot a laser at it, thus revealing "four flies on gray velvet" she saw before she croaked, hence the title of the film. Despite his friend's advice that he should leave Rome to save his life, Roberto decides to stay home and hides in the dark with a gun waiting for his stalker. Eventually, Roberto's wife Nina shows up and the startled drummer almost shoots her, unwittingly failing to realize she is actually the killer. In an attempt to spare her life, Roberto tries to push Nina out the door and in the process notices she is wearing a necklace with "four flies on gray velvet." After Roberto roughs his wife up a bit and accuses her of the killings, Nina's attitude turns gleefully sadistic and she manages to grab her boy toy's gun, ultimately shooting him in the shoulder with it. Nina reveals to Roberto that she only married him because he resembles her father, who was the man responsible for having her institutionalized. Apparently, Nina's father did not want a son and turned her into a spiritual 'drag king' as a result and thus she developed a uniquely unhealthy anti-Electra complex of sorts in the process. Since Roberto is apparently the spitting image of her deceased father and thus reawakened her once dormant insanity (which apparently died out after her father died), she felt the need to get even with her father by proxy by torturing her husband in every crazily creative way imaginable. Nina continues to shoot her husband as it gives her a sort of wicked sadistic satisfaction that seems to have a sexual component, but eventually, the drummer's beatnik friend Godfrey (Bud Spencer) shows up and puts a stop to the madness. After he knocks the gun out of his maniac mariticide-inclined wife's hands, Nina runs out of the house and drives away, ultimately crashing head-on into the back of a truck and, in a twist of fate, has her head decapitated in a manner similar to Roberto's dreams, with her car exploding shortly after.

FOUR FLIES ON GREY VELVET

Featuring absurd old wives' tales depicted as fact, comic relief in the form of half-retarded mailmen and goofy gay private detectives, pop psychology in the form of tales told by rockers that they want to screw about sexually repressed monsters, prog-rock that does not suck, a 'spiritual transvestite' as a killer, and one of the greatest and most gruesome yet simultaneously aesthetically pleasing conclusions to a giallo flick ever made, Four Flies on Grey Velvet is undoubtedly one of the most ambitious and labyrinthine giallo flicks ever made and thus it is naturally flawed as result, yet still remains one of the best and most inventive of its curious kind. Indeed, next to Lucio Fulci's Don't Torture a Duckling (1972) aka Non si sevizia un paperino, Giulio Questi's Death Laid an Egg (1968) aka La morte ha fatto l'uovo and Silvio Narizzano's Bloodbath (1979) aka Las flores del vicio aka The Sky Is Falling, Four Flies on Grey Velvet is indubitably one of the most insanely idiosyncratic giallos ever made as a work that molests and deconstructs the genre and a film that has even been known to make jaded giallophiles feel a bit uneasy in its uniquely unhinged avant-garde essence. Indeed, despite its various (and sometimes glaring) flaws, the only complaint I can make about Four Flies on Grey Velvet is that director Dario Argento did not take what he accomplished with the film further with subsequent works, even if he did eventually direct Deep Red (1975) aka Profondo rosso aka The Hatchet Murders, which many regard as the director's greatest work, as well as the greatest film of the genre. Personally, I would rather re-watch Four Flies on Grey Velvet over Deep Red any day. Not available in any format in the United States until 2009, Four Flies on Grey Velvet is surely a work that has yet to get its due and with all the tasteless celluloid garbage Argento has directed over the past two decades or so, no time is better than now for the work to be resurrected among not only giallo and horror fans, but also arthouse-inclined cinephiles as well. Predating hokey Hong Kong action flicks and The Matrix (1999) in its depiction of slow-motion bullets and doing it in a shockingly artful way, Four Flies on Grey Velvet certainly deserves to be unearthed, though it is dubious whether modern day audiences are deserving of such a film. The closest thing to an In a Year with 13 Moons (1978) of the giallo genre, Four Flies on Grey Velvet is nothing short of murderous psychopathic sexual confusion in its most keenly kaleidoscopic form.

-Ty E

INFERNO
INFERNO

Dario Argento (1980)

With several hallucinatory films under my belt, I head on to tackle Dario Argento's Inferno - a sequel of-sorts to Suspria. My own ideas and beliefs lead to my opinion of Inferno being the best of Argento's Three Mothers trilogy, starting with the incredibly over-hyped and flawed Suspria and ending with the bloody equivalent to Harry Potter film Mother of Tears. The dreamlike visuals cannot be patented by any such artist considering that Hausu and Suspria were both released in the same year. Long lost ethnic brothers? Maybe. Inferno tracks the Argento touch of a woman in a fluidized dress and her distress. Rather from sticking to the feminist damsel aspect, the film kills off said female and moves to the next. You wonder to yourself which female will save the day but when all the women are dead and only a man, name of Mark, stands in the debris. You find yourself in an entirely new tale of terror from one of Italy's finest directors who have actually refined their style into an adaptable needle - puncturing all conventions of murder cinema. It's a dear shame this one wasn't as critically received as its predecessor. This is arguably the better rendition of Suspria. I found the imagery in Inferno to be a perfected art. The furious reds and the cool blue hues meshed into a filter that glazed nearly every scene. I cannot take "supernatural horror" the same after I've seen this film. Whenever I see a tale of witchcraft or occultism and it lacks the neon colors that tinge the screen, I feel disappointed that no other similar film will carry the same tremor. Inferno will have left a huge impact on you - whether you love it or not. Many of the effects are pure genius, such as the plexiglass bridge over a lake in central park that allows a mad murderous man to exact the whim of a faraway witch. Food for the rats, I suppose. What Coffin Joe did with tarantula's in This Night I'll Possess Your Corpse, Argento did with sewer rats in Inferno. If scurrying rodents manage to unnerve you in the slightest bit, then this might be a film to look out for. Argento made sure to use each set to full advantage. Each delirious curve of the stair rail provides a raw setting and instrument used by the actor. Total Film magazine called Inferno one of the 50 greatest horror films of all time and it's easy to see why. If it's not the mysterious killer stalking beautiful women or the hallucinogenic film experience that ensnares you in its grasp, then it's the mellow instrumental score by Keith Emerson. While not being a substitute for Goblin, it provides a softer experience that allows the ambiance of death to settle swiftly. An operatic masterpiece of supernatural horror and one of Argento's best.

-mAQ

DEMONS

Dario Argento (1985)

"They will make cemeteries their cathedrals and the cities your tombs!" Demons (Demoni) is the greatest horror film ever made. I start out this essay with serious intentions. This isn't the work of a sarcastic cynic, but rather from an enthusiast of all cinema. I have no proof to warrant this accusation, but I can tell you that Demons is 100% one of a kind. Perhaps Lamberto Bava's only great film, Demons involves a metal terminator-looking man who issues a ticket to a beautiful young girl. The ticket is to a horror film playing at a Berlin theater. During the film within a film, some of the patrons fold under possession and soon the theater is swarming with demonic Italians. Colorful characters give a voice to this film. Some of which include a Ving Rhames fused with "The Hammer" Williamson character. This man is one of the most bad ass pimps I have seen recently. You can forget about Terrence Howard. Some very fucked up scenarios even unravel. One being a feeble blind man's daughter leaving his side to fuck some random guy in between the curtains. Needless to say, this scene comes out of left-field and left me almost shocked. Later in the film, a group of rowdy punks snorting cocaine off of tits appear. This provides for some ample entertainment. Demons is a film that operates completely on its atmosphere and cheese. Scenes decorate it sporadically involving ridiculous situations. Such as a stud on a dirt bike wielding a katana, and the infamous "Random helicopter breaking through the roof." This is enough to grant the title of "B" movie or even cult classic, but Demons is much more. The entire setting of it involving a movie theater could be related to the current experience we would have, had we seen this in theaters. Suffice to say, some people have been lucky to see this gem on the big screen. Due to its plot, I could even imagine this film freaking me out if I were to witness it in a theater. It even goes as far as to be highly fucking entertaining. The DVD of Demons is in the "Dario Argento Collection." This marketing ploy managed to piss me off royally. I doubt Dario Argento knows how to make a film of this caliber. So instead of Mario Bava's son getting the credit, it is passed off to the giallo director turned Hollywood hack. Demons features an unusual soundtrack. Claudio Simonetti composed a beautifully funky score while the soundtrack consists of Motley Crue and Scorpions. It's such a bizarre mix. Perhaps a reason for this film's greatness lies in the hands of Michele Soavi. This is the man who is behind Stage Fright and Dellamorte Dellamore. He plays the metal masked figure and was the assistant director. Through his films, he managed to prove his worth by mixing art with comedy and even gore. While the film isn't too well known, it has its share of respect. In the video game of Silent Hill, there even exists a theater called "Metropol" and has several Demons posters on display. Demons is another to suffer the plague of unrelated name advertisement. On record, there are seven films that are either a direct sequel or just given the title to provide a sense of trust. Demons is a landmark in horror. It can be scary or it can be hilarious. For many reasons, I doubt i will ever witness a film like Demons ever again. The only reason cancer hasn't been cured yet, is because instead of spending the research budget on copies of Demons, they purchase science equipment. Pssssh, when will they learn?

DEMONS

-Maq

TRAUMA

Dario Argento (1993)

The films of Dario Argento are for the most part “hit” or “miss.” The “Italian Hitchcock” has been really missing over the past two decades with a series of flops and straight up shit (I.E. Do you Like Hitchcock?). Trauma (1993) is a film of Argento’s that doesn’t try to fit into any of the quality extremes of his films. This may be due to the fact that Trauma was the first film of Dario Argento’s to be produced in the United States. The “unevenness” of Trauma still does not categorize the film as another “passable” from the cinematically bipolar Dario Argento. Trauma features a variety of head decapitations courtesy of special effects work by Tom Savini. These scenes of ultra violent (yet efficient) death echo back to the days of gruesome deaths found in Dario Argento’s Deep Red (1975) and Suspiria (1977). I couldn’t help but think that the decapitations scenes in Trauma felt a little contrived and were an attempt by Argento to travel back to the time when he was in his cinematic prime. Nevertheless, the scenes of death are both surprising and “in your face.” Certainly enough graphic violence to keep the typical obsessed horror fiend happy. One of the major themes and subplots of Trauma is young women dealing with eating disorders. Asia Argento’s character has a problem with bulimia. This is obvious from the get go of the film when she makes her way into a restaurant bathroom to expel her undigested food. Although eating disorders are serious problems facing young women, this whole commentary on bulimia in Trauma is quite out of place. It is if Dario Argento wants to tackle serious material but knows that he can only get a film made if it features some of his signature horror traits. Asia Argento’s half-sister Anna was supposedly the influence behind the bulimia commentary found in the film. At the end of Trauma, you can find her dancing to a black reggae group performing on a house porch. This scene is out of place unless you know the story behind it. Anna died in a scooter accident not long after the release of Trauma. Is Trauma just one sick family home video? Dario Argento no doubt exploited his daughter during the making of Trauma. I just don’t find it normal for a father to want to direct a topless scene of his young daughter. Asia Argento also looks very mentally out of it throughout Trauma. This is obviously pre-Scarlet Diva Asia and it is no surprise now why she has the problems that she does. I would not be surprised if Dario Argento also caused his daughter to turn anorexic during the making of Trauma. Her performance and physical appearance give off this impression. In conclusion, if you’re a horror fan (and Dario and/or Asia Argento) Trauma is necessary viewing. Dario Argento may not be one of the most mentally sane guys, but he has no doubt made some masterpieces. Trauma is a bizarre film made during a time when Dario Argento didn’t seem like he had much to offer in the way of being a filmmaker. Dario only knows what’s going on in his mind and Trauma gives evidence that it’s not too stable.

TRAUMA

-Ty E

DO YOU LIKE HITCHCOCK?

Dario Argento (2005) Yes, I like Hitchcock. I like him enough to know that Dario Argento's Do You Like Hitchcock? is an atrocious dishonor to the master of suspense. This is no surprise when considering the amount of failure films that Dario Argento has created over the past couple of years. Do You Like Hitchcock? is the ultimate offense against the director that Argento claims to so dearly respect. It can be rest assured that Alfred Hitchcock's cremated ashes are getting ready to poison Dario Argento's last meal.

Immediately going into Do You Like Hitchcock?, I noticed the film looks like it was produced for public access TV. It can be assumed that Argento knew be the film's production that he would have very little monetary sources to work with. For a director that has influenced Argento so much (some calling Argento "the Italian Hitchcock"), he could have at least waited to secure funds that would enable him to make a film that looks like it cost at least one million dollars to make. I really wanted to enjoy Do You Like Hitchcock? The film follows an obsessed film student who has a special affinity for German expressionist cinema of yesteryear. This young man's life and surroundings eventually start becoming a real life Hitchcock film (of the pathetic no budget persuasion). A murder occurs at the apartment complex across the street. The film student is a voyeur practicing the same obsession as James Stewart did in Hitchcock's suspenseful masterpiece Rear Window. Do You Like Hitchcock? is a cheap and offensive homage to one of the most celebrated director's of the last century. It caters to the fantasies of an early twenties film fanatic and fails in all regards. I still can't fathom why Dario Argento has turned into such a mediocre director over the past couple of decades. The only semi-interesting recent project Argento has been involved with is the Master of Horror episode Jenifer, in which the strength of the hour long film can be attributed to the writing and not directing. Asia Argento is dominating her father in regards to film direction. I guess she has a lot to say when her father films her getting raped for his films.

-Ty E

MOTHER OF TEARS
MOTHER OF TEARS

Dario Argento (2007)

Having finally seen Dario Argento's long waited conclusion to his "Three Mothers" trilogy, I can honestly say that the Italian horror based director has lost his touch, just as his daughter has siphoned most of her ability to act. The film has been hyped up since it's mention all the way to it's theatrical release overseas. The story follows a coffin that has been unearthed, along with an urn decorated with menacing occult symbols. An all-knowing priest decides to open it, and mail it to someone in Rome. He might as well have just mailed the man a bomb. A couple of stupid women get giddy and decide to open it, leaving one mutilated by demons and the other on the run from a mystic force which she doesn't want to believe in. Those fucking realists always getting in way over their head. The "Mother" characters that have been used in Argento's works are actually based on characters from a Thomas de Quincey novel called Suspiria de Profundis. That sounds familiar, doesn't it? Two of the "mothers" were entitled Mater Suspiriorum and Mater Tenebrarum. These names sound familiar to other titles of Argento's work, namely Tenebre and Suspiria. I wanted to love this film, I really did. Argento has always been a weak spot for me from The Bird with the Crystal Plumage to The Stendhal Syndrome, but I refuse to accept this CGI-induced mock up into my dear Italian horror collection. Like most film maker's mistakes, Argento attempts to cover up the lack of a coherent storyline with topless witches and some amazing violence. I have been avoiding recent Argento as of late, this includes Pelts and Do you like Hitchcock? I cannot imagine him ever capturing the eerie luminescence that resonates off his classics Suspiria or even Opera. The film boils down to inaccuracies that hit hard and shock value. I swear, when I first saw the mother throw her baby off the bridge, I wanted the entire film to be like that; shocking, incomprehensible, and misanthropic. The viewer got one of those. Do you really need me to tell you which one? One thing that could have saved this film, would have been a soundtrack by the original Goblin. It seems Daemonia is the weaker byproduct of Goblin. The soundtrack focuses on a "Gothic" feel with rippling guitar chords. I still find it hard to believe that Simonetti collaborated with Dani Filth for the soundtrack. I can honestly tell that the script was honed by four writers. That explains some of the characters personality changes and theme splits. Several shining spots of the film all had the same motive; Show a little bit, but not enough. These scenes include, Udo Kier, Dario filming his daughter nude, a great final death scene, and a monkey whose involvement in the story is unknown, but hilarious. The instant I saw Sarah Mandy's mother's ghost, a feeling of despair hit my gut as if the human species dawned on me as being pathetic. The story was shit, Asia's ghost mother looked like shit, the acting was shit, the ending was shit, and the special effects were amazing thanks to Sergio Stivaletti. I could not tell you to avoid this film anymore than these last several paragraphs did. I'm starting to think that Dario himself is in need of a Hollywood exorcism. Mother of Tears is the rated R equivalent of a Harry Potter film.

-mAQ

GIALLO
GIALLO

Dario Argento (2010)

Wave after wave, these old horror maestros rekindle their slightly squirming fan base to watch the buzz kick shit around the Internet and film circuits. That must be the reason, some sick sadistic fetish for crushed expectations. I mean, why else would Dario Argento be releasing the fetid premature efforts that he is to this day? After Do You Like Hitchcock?, The Card Player, and Mother of Tears, the only consistent aesthetic Dario retained from his glory days of lit-brite wop thrillers was his unbridled narcissism and plucky sense of violence. While these two facets do build a product, the result is not something I'd appreciate from the man responsible for some of the greatest Italian horror films, directing or producing. Without Argento, would Demons have found a budget to play with? The fickle pseudo-science of premonition will not be wasted here in this text space but rather, I'd like to review his latest foray in homicidal angst and othernatural slaughter in his sardonically-titled Giallo. Get it? Let the chortling begin.

Giallo marks the third Adrien Brody film I've reviewed in a 2 month span. I wish it were a coincidence but truthfully, I've found myself drawn to his irreplaceable charm and versatility. After viewing Predators and discovering that even wimps can play macho, I've selected several films of his recent career to view and haven't been disappointed by his roles yet. Even in The Experiment did he traject the desperation of having to play guinea pig to a sadistic and blatantly homosexual Forest Whitaker. Adrien's ability is not to be underestimated and I find myself very warm to the idea of him playing a smarmy detective shadowed by seclusion and late night pizza. That begins Giallo in a way, however Adrien Brody's character, name of Enzo, isn't introduced until after the damsels in distress are desecrated by the killer known esoterically as "Yellow." After the sister of an American stewardess is kidnapped, the desperate dame from The Diving Bell and the Butterfly seeks the help of Inspector Enzo Avolfi to recover her before it's ultimately too late.

If I had to protect a single shred of evidence to prove the film's reputation as anything but fallible, I'd select Brody's performance as an asshole investigator whose modus operandi is letting himself get too attached to cases. After watching his mother get slaughtered as a child, Enzo discovers the killer working at a butcher shop and decides to appropriate his own vengeance. Growing up, it must have become obvious that his only possible career path would be to convert to a gumshoe and track down serial murderers. This set-up is enough to install the arrogant, egocentric personality that is good for few laughs as his nasty demeanor paints the screen. Not only does he deflect the sex appeal and passes from Emmanuelle Seigner but leaves the film with such form that will undoubtedly echo in the minds of critics and cynics alike. Only after the film reaches its conclusion can you form a solid hypothesis on whether the film had the makings of something of acceptable quality. Even at the point of this review I'm very torn between hating this film and appreciating its brave casting and slimy misogynistic violence.

No Italian thriller is complete without a formidable opponent, a killer for continuity's sake. In this film, the killer is grotesquely crafted as a cab driver with appalling intentions for young bodies. Yellow, named for the color of his skin and the taunts of school children, operates solely on the destructive inner guide that leads him to slaughter beauty in order to progress his own vanity. To complete his psychosis, Argento made sure to dope him up on "happy pills," thus endangering the victims even more because once his euphoria peaks, all hell breaks loose upon the supple and soft bodies of some of Italy's more beautiful specimens of lechery. Giallo is by all means a serious film, which hurts its credit, but the thing I couldn't get over most was how Yellow (played by Brody as well), in all his facial prosthesis, didn't look any less monstrous as he does without practical makeup application. Intentional or not, the idea of Argento cementing the killers pugnacious appearance as less of an embellishment towards the actors real face tickles my ribs. Subversive resentment for not acquiring the intended Ray Liotta? Possibly.

Dario Argento set himself up for failure, what, with creating all those classic departures from your typical Italian slasher by implementing luscious colors with the purpose of enchanting the set and creating something of a brand of mysticism around death. His reputation has preceded him since his cinematic venture into an extended midlife crisis. To be fair and blunt, Giallo isn't the phoenix rising from the ashes of which you so wished. I can find much to hate and much to appreciate, Giallo is simply a film that will not make everyone happy. The faults lie heavy in the diagrams of the killer, Yellow, as his jaundiced skin has led him to the instrumental slash-repeat ritual that leaps to his close capture. Beautiful escapist entertainment, for us and him, is what Giallo rests on. The idea of being engaged, whether it be from an awfully scripted slasher film to Adrien Brody who tries his damndest to be a dapper douche, is the drive of Giallo. Perhaps the biggest flaw of Argento's latest is that this film wears its heart on its sleeve and will catch flak for doing so. Let my unmentioned recommendation float on the promise that it's not as bad as Mother of Tears.

-mAQ

PREY
PREY

Darrell Roodt (2007)

Part of the influx of the mass-produced "Maneater" series comes Prey, a film that is attempting to steal the fame and following of the definitive lion film The Ghost and the Darkness. This Weinstein funded film has been deemed a Blockbuster exclusive and only available in said rental chains even though it's rarely enforced. With the cover showing a deformed bloody roaring lion and branding the name Peter Weller, the idea of Robocop shooting lions sounds promising enough. What we're given is a formulaic half-assed splicing of Cujo and Jaws. The result is forgetful, embarrassing, and undeniably generic.

Given the nature of the female and two children being trapped in a Safari jeep pursued and stalked by a family of predators, one would think of Jurassic Park's paternal themes. Although Steven Spielberg's film Jurassic Park was a groundbreaking film, the children were constantly cluttering the blockbuster's ability to amaze. Well in Prey, the children featured are ever worse than the last. Taking the "rebel bitchy teen" stereotype from the like of War of the Worlds (2005) and implementing it and altering it to fit the Hannah Montana age, the result is a female 16 year old we can all agree upon wanting her to die. Sadly, she lives to see another day. The only likable character is the African poacher who dies as soon as you warm up to him.

A dysfunctional nuclear family goes on a working vacation in Africa so Peter Weller may roam around doing business tycoon things. To strengthen the mother/daughter bond, the new step-mom takes the children on a safari to watch beautiful specimens gallop around in circles. The idea of lions attacking seems far from ordinary so the tour guide gets the film started by getting devoured. Of course he takes the keys with him. How else do you expect to waste film? From here, the plot only gets more and more manufactured. Mother gets keys, drives car in a frenzy only to crash it thus furthering the run time yet again (Dumb woman should have stayed in the kitchen). The Lion is an elegant species of feline. I respect the primal instincts of the lion as well as the territorial issue. The Lion is one of the more gorgeous endangered species. For man to trek on their natural habitat with their zebra-striped vehicle, how can they not expect nature to strike back. If a lion were to explore a nice suburban neighborhood, panic would ensue. This all comes down to the aggravating topic of animal rights in which no one should have a say. Point being, I find the lions to be justified in their brutal murders of sad humanity. It spices things up a bit, don't you know.(B.) The film Prey. (A.) Your attention span.Nods to an influence are a gracious thing. Down right scamming your inspirations is another thing. Peter Weller, upon noticing the disappearance of his family goes and finds a "Quint" to help track his family. I was waiting for the grizzly male to state "We're going to need a bigger jeep" throughout the film. Sometimes, being a greedy sleaze bag has its payoffs to society. To which we owe the Weinstein brothers for making Prey an exclusive film. Had the rights been universal, more people would have been inflicted with the brash stupidity that this film offers. Want to see how to make a horror film completely wrong? Watch Prey. Value your time and money? Ignore Prey and watch The Ghost and the Darkness again.

-mAQ

THE WRESTLER
THE WRESTLER

Darren Aronofsky* (2008)

Darren Aronofsky is quite a “hack” of a director. He started his career by directing the experimental film Pi because he probably thought he could be the next David Lynch. The film was a banal and pretentious “wannabe” Eraserhead following a lonely Jewish mathematician with brilliant mental abilities. It seems that Aronofsky never realized that David Lynch directs his film by emotion and intuition. Aronofsky, on the other hand, used his incredibly boring intellect to contrive the “experimental” film Pi. Aronofsky followed Pi with the “look at me, I’m controversial!” shitfest known as Requiem for a Dream. Just like Pi, the film lacks any true emotion and fails in all attempts to impress. Darren Aronofsky’s third film, The Fountain, by far his worst film to date, is a film about love and mortality. The Fountain did not convince me that Aronofsky has ever loved anyone in his life.

The Wrestler is Aronofsky’s latest film and quite a departure from his earlier work. The film follows a washed up wrestler who is twenty years past his prime. The material of the film is far from pretentious as Aronofsky’s earlier work. The Wrestler has an intimate documentary style feel that echoes back to the realist masterpieces of John Cassavetes. A down and out looking Mickey Rourke stars as the wrestler. It is as if this role was made for Rourke. How the pretty boy rebel of Rumble Fish could look the way Rourke does in The Wrestler borderlines on the tragic. “Professional wrestling” is something of a joke to most Americans. The abrasive matches feature redneck and lowbrow theatrics that have gained a certain unflattering notoriety. Wrestlers are like modern day barbarians that have taken up the carney trade. Like the wrestler in The Wrestler, wrestling is the only job these individuals forgotten in time can actually do. Instead of raping and pillaging villages, they have to make a living destroying their bodies through other means. In our politically correct and estrogen driven modern day world, the alpha male warrior just seems to have a hard time getting a job doing abstract office work. The Wrestler makes it clear why. Mickey Rourke plays Randy “The Ram” Robinson, a wrestler who has come to the conclusion of his career and even his life. His lesbian daughter hates him, his stripper love interest won’t date him, and a heart attack has made it impossible to wrestle. Randy is a man that is stuck in his past wrestling “glory” days. He still sports shitty bleach blond Viking hair and listens to atrocious “hair metal.” In fact, the soundtrack of The Wrestler features music from Ratt and Guns N Roses. These tunes noticeably transplant wrestler Randy to the great days of his wrestling prime. These scenes are easily more depressing to watch than any other “dramatic” scene Darren Aronofsky has directed before The Wrestler. Wrestler Randy shares a similar lonely and degrading life to his stripper love interest. Both individuals sell and exploit their bodies for the amusement of rednecks and other lowlives that enjoy the cheapest of entainment. Despite their lack of a real relationship, Randy and the stripper seem to share a close understanding of one another. The personality that they project while working is quite different from their true selves. Hollywood films very rarely have such complex yet uneventful romantic subplots. Darren Aronofsky has slightly redeemed himself from the boring junkie relationship between Jared Leto and Jennifer Connelly in Requiem for a Dream. The Wrestler makes me wonder if Darren Aronofsky stumbled upon a fluke in his filmmaking career. Never would I have thought that the director was capable of a truly powerful or quality film. Also, I wonder why Aronofsky chose to tackle the subject matter of the wrestler. Director Darren just doesn't strike me as someone that has an interest in good ol' sweaty wrestlin'. Mickey Rourke, however, is really what carries the film. Rourke, like The Wrestler, seems to very broken and miserable far past his glory days. With this acting performance, Rourke gave it his all in the most pitiful of roles and he must be commended.

-Ty E

BLACK SWAN
BLACK SWAN

Darren Aronofsky* (2010)

Darren Aronofsky needs no introduction: he released the stylized anti-drug PSA, Requiem for a Dream, and the somewhat docudrama, The Wrestler. To complete his lunar cycle of self-destruction is the release of Black Swan, a film of which I am having a hard time understanding how, and why, a film of this artistic ingenuity has been funded - but thank god has it. Two viewings later and this film, a documentation of a spiritual meltdown, still stuns me with the sinuous performance of Natalie Portman as Nina/White Swan and the elusive Black Swan, that we can assume resides within all of us. As Thomas (Vincent Cassel) explains to Nina, the White Swan is hers naturally, but in order to channel the Black Swan, cowardice must be examined in order to completely let oneself go and this is the premise of the film. It's really all about the mental manufacturing of stress and the debilitating effects of rivalry, save for being placed in a position of instability. Aronofsky made sure to film Black Swan almost behavioristically, with cameras placed over shoulders to highlight the bustling life of a professional dancer from the ever-watchful eyes of the looming architecture.

Inciting the events is the forced resignation of aging ballerina Beth (Winona Ryder), leaving a position for a new star to headline the Company's "visceral" re-imagining of Tchaikovsky's opus, Swan Lake. Being the ambitious, sheltered, girl she is, Nina Sayers leaps for the chance to be the new Swan Queen. Thomas accepts after being introduced, violently, to Nina's dark side. An act of blind faith if I'd ever seen one. From this moment on, characters are introduced and boundaries are pushed. Not only for Aronofsky's budgeted ballet horror film, but for the characters as well. Nina begins to see past her mother's crippling mental condition when the recently-turned debutante meets with friend/fantasy/rival, Lily (Mila Kunis). From here on, what is documented is a massive crisis of both beauty and identity. In lavish scenes of vanity, we witness horrifying acts of body horror that would make one Mr. Cronenberg cringe with absolute horror. For me, violence is almost second nature in film. I watch a film labeled horror/thriller and I expect ample scenes of brutality. But nothing could prepare me for the holy grail of squeamish activity - cuticle and nail savagery. I consider Black Swan to shelter my only instance of a breaking point. These are things that are to be forbidden in horror. Not to lower Black Swan to something as simple and to-the-point as horror, but to crown the new princess of terror - Black Swan is the ladies Jacob's Ladder.

Black Swan is a film that has been garnering immense praise recently and it is very obvious as to why. Not only is the tome of film-within-a-film altered to become play within performance, but both instances of double mediums are equally entrancing. The performance of Swan Lake is captivating and profound, in part to the incredible sound featured in Black Swan. For instance, the fluttering feathers and the scratching and clawing of the swan vying to escape. Not only the debut of Swan Lake, but Nina's psychological breakdown is marvelous as well. Her fractured female mindset becomes almost nerve-shredding because unlike most female characters, I sympathized. First hand do we witness the eventual evolution into a whore, the name branded after meeting and fucking (implied) a stranger at a bar. This transformation from late-bloomer princess to a die-hard diabolical slut is all in part to Lily's intervention. It's when this catalyst enters the equation do we see that it most always appear to be women who convert their familiar into debauched "deadgirls".

Juggling many traits of erotic thriller, horror, and even a Lifetime channel presentation, Black Swan will undoubtedly garner many comparisons. From Repulsion, Jacob's Ladder, and Mulholland Dr., Black Swan rises from the expectations and emerges its own beautiful beast. After long wait, Black Swan marks the birth of an abnormal terror, the likes of which I haven't seen. But with this terror comes unabashed beauty and artistry. I'm having a damn hard time finding something I don't love about the film. From casting Vincent Cassel as debonair womanizer to Natalie Portman's authentic acrobatics, this is Aronofsky's best work to date. The final act alone would leave Matthew Barney blushing as Black Swan takes real performance art and splices it with daft surrealism and self-possession. Another critical aspect is Black Swan leaves few points left to the imagination, while ambiguity is something to be heralded, the blunt display of psychological pressure turned trauma is met with satisfying computer animation. Fuck Inland Empire, Black Swan is the definitive tale of a woman in trouble. The film also thankfully skips the angst stage and swan-dives straight into the heart of madness which is great considering Portman's track record for Teen Choice Awards.

Appealing to women, Black Swan successfully takes an art that I haven't been formally introduced to, and breathes excitement and majesty into. Another selling point is the blatant femininity, the never-ending quest for perfection. Having dealt with unstable women (which of them aren't?), I find the portrayal of women's vanity as a selfish and fatal consequence relieving. This masterful generalization of the deceitful female psyche debunks the age-old rumor that women are made with sugar & spice, everything nice. Nothing sweet about this fantastical delusion, Nina Sayers is at odds with the world and we can't figure out why. Once Nina casts off the maternal blanket that has been smothering and oppressing her for her whole life, the berserk bad-girl breaks free to finally let go in the heat of art, for art. Again, having viewed Black Swan twice, I find my willingness to revisit the world of bulimia and backstabbing alarming. I can only give so many kind words to Black Swan before the endearing comments become redundant as I fear has already occurred. If you're anything like me and you take dashes of surrealism and complexity with your cinematic fables, Black Swan is soon to be your favorite film of the year. Add the brevity of a mental breakdown and elements of melancholy and you have Aronofsky's masterpiece.

BLACK SWAN

I was enchanted, were you?

-mAQ

REPO! THE GENETIC OPERA

Darren Lynn Bousman (2008)

Nothing can be more nauseating and traumatizing than watching a horrible musical. I recall in my grade school years that I was made sick to my stomach because I had to watch all of The Sound of Music. The sadistic and obese teacher had to have known the world of pain she was unleashing on her student's souls. After watching The Sound of Music I vowed that I would never watch a musical again. A few years later I would accidentally turn to a TV channel that was playing The Rocky Horror Picture Show. Although I was also slightly traumatized by this film, it at least had some subversive elements I could respect. Recently I viewed Repo! The Genetic Opera, a film obviously following in the footsteps of The Rocky Horror Picture Show minus the homoerotic elements. Repo! The Genetic Opera is probably the goriest and bloodiest musical that I have ever seen. This is no surprise as the film follows a Repo man that rips the organs out of people that are incapable of repaying their debts to him. Repo! The Genetic Opera is set in a dystopian nightmare of a world where one organ selling corporation GeneCo, owned by the terminally ill Rotti Largo runs the whole city. A suave GraveRobber has also made a career of draining a pain killer called Zydrate from dead bodies to sell on the black market. Despite being a world of future degeneracy, Repo! The Genetic Opera shows a place that doesn't seem far off in the future minus the silly urban aesthetics. Rotti Largo is the disgruntled and bitter owner of GeneCo. Largo lost his ladylove to a man named Nathan who would later become the mass murdering Repo man. Rotti Largo has three delinquent and spoiled children who live a life of hedonism and spotlight. Chop Top Bill Moseley plays an angry little man named Luigi Largo who kills people anytime he is slightly irritated. Rich bitch and whore Paris Hilton plays Amber Sweet, a girl addicted to surgery and Zydrate. Singer of industrial group Skinny Puppy Nivek Ogre plays the fruity skin wearing brother Pavi Largo. Rotti Largo hates his children and he makes sure they know it. As far as musicals go, Repo! The Genetic Opera is better than most but that doesn't necessarily mean much. I can see this film, like Donnie Darko before it, being the hit film for ugly fat chicks that live at Hot Topic and wear shirts that have such genius quotes on them as "You laugh at me because I am different, but I laugh at you because you are all the same." I thought the film Hedwig and the Angry Inch was a much better rock musical than Repo! The Genetic Opera as it has much more depth. Repo! The Genetic Opera really just tries to do too much in such a small time. The GraveRobber is easily the most interesting character in the film and he only makes a few appearances. Repo! The Genetic Opera is a film worth seeing but hopefully won't (but probably) have a huge cult following.

-Ty E

THE SECRET ADVENTURES OF TOM THUMB
THE SECRET ADVENTURES OF TOM THUMB

Dave Borthwick (1993)

Most special effects in movies bore me. It is amazing how someone like Steven Spielberg or George Lucas, despite their virtually unlimited funds, cannot manage deriving any real quality purpose with their special effects. Honestly, I doubt that either of those two “directors,” both sporting very unflattering facial hair and facial features, are capable of expressing any real emotion through their movies. The special effects based films I have grown to appreciate are the innovative works of Jean Cocteau and other early surrealist filmmakers. I also have a soft spot for stop-motion animation. Whether it be The Evil Dead trilogy or the works of Czech surreal Jan Švankmajer, stop-motion animation special effects always bring me to another unnatural world. The Secret Adventures of Tom Thumb was the last stop-motion animation I had the pleasure of viewing and now I must say that it is one of my favorites. The film also features pixilation (not CGI) which makes the wonderful world of Tom Thumb seem even more like a fantastic dream. The BBC made that right decision when they agreed to fund The Secret Adventures of Tom Thumb. Tom Thumb is such a cute little guy in The Secret Adventures of Tom Thumb. He is a claymation figure that looks like legendary actor Peter Lorre in fetus form. Almost immediately after being born, poor Tom Thumb is stolen from his already impoverished parents. Tom is brought to a room full of miniature mutants that are being tested by some guys that look like they could be members of the Gestapo. The newly born Tom Thumb is quite frightened by the experience, but manages to escape unscathed. Once out of the experimental hell, he meets fellow little people who are a bit barbaric. The sounds, sights, creatures, and atmosphere of The Secret Adventures of Tom Thumb is one of wonder where anything can happen at any moment. One second a mobile snail gets stomped in powerful motion and the next a man's head is bashed against concrete until his death. The Secret Adventures of Tom Thumb has comedy, drama, adventure, horror and every other genre ingredient. The Secret Adventures of Tom Thumb defies both genre restraints and the art of filmmaking itself. This is a film that you can truly tell that the director tweaked every second of every scene to perfection. The Secret Adventures of Tom Thumb is mandatory viewing for all those cinema fans looking to see a brilliant and successful experiment. The film is full of unlimited replay value and certainly guaranteed never to bore. Thumb is the “little guy” that you actually find yourself rooting for in a weird sort of way. Not many films feature a newborn child wearing a halo of flies.

-Ty E

HARSH TIMES

David Ayer (2005)

I think Christian Bale is a swell guy. No other mainstream contemporary actor has the ability to play such charismatic sociopaths and psychopathic roles. Recently Bale was arrested for “verbally abusing” both his mother and sister. We live in a pretty pussy world when a man can get arrested for his words. Christian Bale’s character Jim Davis in Harsh Times certainly wouldn’t tolerate such weak authoritarian filth. Jim Davis has a few problems. A war veteran from Afghanistan, Jim has seen people butchered and has done a little killing himself. He now lives in Los Angeles and hopes to get his Mexican girlfriend to the U.S. so they can get married. Jim is a gringo that is only friends with Hispanics. He isn’t afraid of them either as demonstrated when he puts a few bullets in a group of them. What else is a disgruntled war vet with extreme post traumatic stress syndrome supposed to do when he can’t get a job? Are Jimmy and Mikey more than just friends? Jim’s best friend is a little Latino guy by the name of Mike Alonzo (played by Freddy Rodriguez). Mike’s pair of family jewels aren’t nearly as big as Jim’s. After seeing an old Mexican in a bar get stabbed in the throat with a broken bottle, little Mikey becomes very traumatized and disturbed. Jim, on the other hand, becomes very excited about this event as if he had just won a bowling tournament. During the end of Harsh Times, the men’s friendship is challenged with a series of disturbing and violent events courtesy of Jim’s minor mental problems. After all, Jim is a soldier of the apocalypse and Freddy is just a little Latino that lives off of his sugar mama. Harsh Times is a surprisingly brutal, violent, and even nihilistic film. Christian Bale’s performance in the film is one of his best. It is a shame that both this film and Bale’s performance have been buried under a pile of other Hollywood garbage. Seeing as films featuring Hispanic Gangsta’s and other degenerates are so popular, Harsh Times should be notorious for fans of such material. I guess having a white guy as the toughest character in the film and actually having a well thought out film doesn’t go too well with Cholos, Wiggers, and other homeboys.

-Ty E

STREET KINGS
STREET KINGS

David Ayer (2008)

Police Brutality has been given a new face thanks to the abundant amount of drop-out rappers, penning down their displeasement with the "five-oh" for busting them for heroin charges cause of their color. It proves hard to actually write a review on this film due to the stereotypical Negro and of course, the reaction of the film or even my writing to be considered "Racist", but when we face facts and statistics, Negroes are still the majority source of the crimes. That's why they sent Keanu Reeves to clean up crime by any means in this fantastical crime film. With an all-star cast built up with Keanu Reeves, Forest Whitaker, and Hugh Laurie, this film was just given the title of being a high-octane action film with a killer soundtrack. Little did the primary audience (Blacks and urban wannabes) know that they were just going to witness a film with the deaths of only minorities. Keanu Reeves plays the character of Tom Ludlow; a LAPD officer who is constantly killing people and having his boss (Whitaker) writing it off as an accident, or hiding the truth. Whether the reason is valid or not, Reeves takes no precaution in "capping niggas" While every crime film comes and goes, It's hilarious to see every rapper jump at the chance to play the stereotypical crime boss or goon. In this film, we see the underestimated Common (Great in Smokin' Aces) and The Game (As the ordinary "fool" that houses an AK-47.) (And of course, due to his 3 minute long scene in Street Kings, he releases an album dedicated to his performance in which he didn't have to act) The plot is one of which is dynamic in action films. Throw a single character that houses a great tragedy, in between his own people and create twists and turns, while constantly trying to breathe life into a single character. A plethora of people claim Reeves is the worst actor to ever grace the screen. I simply ask "Have you seen My Own Private Idaho?" They all reply "No." The argument is instantly won. As will be demonstrated in Lakeview Terrace, Police might have too much authority and are mostly deemed as crooked. When Ludlow takes a job at the complaint desk, all we see is bitching black women screaming about "pre-nup" or some "foo" that snitched on "dem". Ludlow is the merciless Captain America of our streets. Street Kings is a great time and presents a firm reason to continue to root for the underdogs in the endless stream of typical blockbuster garbage. It doesn't top the visceral force that is Training Day, but it is a film made for audiences, not critics. Hugh Laurie shines in his short role, and Forest Whitaker is marvelous. The cast alone warrants a "view now" title, but if you go in expecting anything more than explicit violence, sadistic one-liners, and the degradation of "African-Americans", then you're sorely mistaken.

-mAQ

ANGEL MINE

David Blyth (1980)

In a small island country where the most best known and critically acclaimed filmmaker, Peter Jackson (Dead Alive, The Lord of the Rings trilogy), is a director of the mainstream, epic, and fantastic, one would hardly expect New Zealand to have any notable surrealist arthouse works and, indeed, they have few, but the obscure featurette Angel Mine (1980) directed by David Blyth (Red Blooded American Girl, Wound). Probably best known among bloodlusting cinephiles as the director of the rather redundant and equally forgettable sci-fi/horror hybrid Death Warmed Over (1984); and probably most monetarily successful for directing episodes and a straight-to-video release of the undeservedly popular queer kiddy superhero show Mighty Morphin Power Rangers, it might come as a cruel shock to some that Blyth initially dabbled in the mostly irredeemable realm of experimental arthouse cinema; first with the patently pretentious, psychosexual 14-minute short Circadian Rhythms (1976) and later with Angel Mine (1980), a strikingly sardonic surrealist short mediating on the failure of suburbia and the ensuing banality such contrived Utopian ideals sow. Centering around a mismatched married couple – a swarthy and goofy midget monkey man with a small frame yet long arms and a homely Nordic blonde miss with big bosoms and a forgettable face – Angel Mine presents suburbanites in a soundly cynical manner that is more ‘punk’ in its social commentary and avant-garde direction than Penelope Spheeris’ classic punk rock movie Suburbia (1984) and Rene Daalder’s anarchistic musical Population: 1 (1986). Comprised of a variety of elaborately assembled petites vignettes, generally featuring ironic, cynical, and contradictory audio over ostensibly outrageous, campy, and offensive imagery, Angel Mine – although a glaringly low-budgeted work – is indubitably a work of singular cinema. Somewhat falsely advertised as “New Zealand’s own erotic fantasy that’s far too close to home,” Angel Mine is a work that Americans and European can also surely appreciate, but I wouldn’t call it a soundly sensual and salacious, unless you find flaccid poppycocks and flopping, hairy ballsacks and bloody botched abortions to be stimulating as I found the film to be of the fundamentally and intentionally anti-erotic persuasion, which should be no surprise when considering it is a surrealist piece about the stern sterility of the suburbs.

For those that have seen Angel Mine, it should be no surprise that director David Blyth was more inspired by experimental European films, especially Spanish director Luis Buñuel and artist Salvador Dalí’s revolutionary silent surrealist short Un Chien Andalou (1929), than hokey Hollywood productions when he made his early films. Featuring subversive sociopolitical elements and unconventional filmmaking techniques explored by Occidental auteur filmmakers like Alberto Cavallone (Le salamandre, Man, Woman and Beast), Roland Lethem (La Fée Sanguinaire, Le Vampire de la Cinémathèque), and Dušan Makavejev (W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism, Sweet Movie), Angel Mine is a bright light in European New Zealand cinema history that director Blyth describes as having, “came out of nowhere and caught a lot of people by surprise.” Although eventually receiving his formal education at a university, Blyth began his film career in the gutter, describing his formative filmmaking years as follows: “We all came from the garage band. I was a garage film-maker. I used an old red Bolex and like the musicians didn’t have any formal education. They just got instruments and started making noises and I got a camera and started pointing it around the room. I thought ‘why wait to get experience?’ Emphatically punk in sentiment and direction, Blyth took an uncompromising DIY approach to assembling the film, describing the process of funding the production as follows, “The very first punk concert at Auckland University was raising money for Angel Mine. The thing about the film is that it was shot for $13,000 or $14,000, which meant I didn’t have to go to any of the authorities and have my script fettered.” The punk band that headlined the benefit concert, Suburban Reptiles, would also contribute to the soundtrack of Angel Mine. As explained in Cinema Papers magazine edited by Australian auteur Philippe Mora (Mad Dog Morgan, Snide and Prejudice), despite the director’s deviceful approach to maintaining creative control of Angel Mine, a cut was made from the film without Blyth’s consent of a blue movie scene by the film’s distributor so that the film would obtain a R-rating, but it is doubtful that the deletion of this seemingly irrelevant scene had any effect on this innately incendiary celluloid work. Mixing elements of horror, surrealism, TV commercial clichés, and punk rock and New Romanticist fashion, Angel Mine is an angst-ridden cinematic work about an odious odd couple whose marriage progressively deteriorates as they unwittingly wait for a leather-clad ‘New Romanatic’ space-duo – sort of aggressive alter-egos/Jungian Shadow selves – to annihilate them into oblivion. Needless to say, Angel Mine is scantily a feel-good work, but it is assuredly a liberating one, thereupon making it an incontestable, if nihilistic, fantasy film as advertised.

ANGEL MINE

Described by director David Blyth as, “an attack on the great suburban dream of New Zealand, the whole focus on ‘get a job, get a house and a mortgage’, a whole philosophy which I guess punk was about questioning,” Angel Mine is a work that equally examines the narrative structure of cinema as an artistic medium, thus it is a shame that the New Zealander auteur essentially went from being an exquisitely erratic L’enfant terrible of celluloid to be a secondhand pussy pink power(less) ranger. Of course, like a lot of former punkrockers, Blyth must have got a job, house and mortgage, which is reasonable since living in the gutter is no way to live at all, but his political persuasion should have no bearing on his integrity as an artist as it undoubtedly did. Anarchism – whether it be of the radical left or right – may be a retarded and redundant form of government, but it can make for a fully fascinating approach to filmmaking as demonstrated in the foolhardy filmic fantasy Angel Mine. Although assembled by David Blyth when he was barely an adult, Angel Mine is unmistakably his most mature and multifaceted cinematic work to date, which, I guess, doesn't say much for someone who went on to direct some of the worst children's programming of the 1990s, but it is surely better than it sounds as a work that shows death (with a nod to Bergman's masterpiece The Seventh Seal) literally mowing his lawn in an exceedingly prosaic yet cleverly allegorical manner.

-Ty E

DEATH WARMED OVER
DEATH WARMED OVER

David Blyth (1985)

Before a then relatively unknown Peter Jackson made his satirically grotesque splatter flicks like Bad Taste (1987) and Dead Alive (1992) aka Braindead, kiwi auteur David Blyth (Red Blooded American Girl, Wound) more or less single-handedly ushered in New Zealand horror cinema with his conspicuously convoluted yet undeniably addictive berserk celluloid monster Death Warmed Over (1984) aka Death Warmed Up aka Robot Maniac aka Neuro Killers aka Re-Animator I starring British actor Michael ‘Hercules’ Hurst, which is notable for being awarded the Grand Prix at the Fantasy Film Festival (aka ‘Festival International de Paris du film fantastique et de science-fiction’) by no lesser a filmmaker than Chilean-born auteur Alejandro Jodorowsky. While surely a genre flick influenced by everything from The Island of Doctor Moreau to George A. Romero’s Night of the Living Dead (1968) and everything in-between, the flick was not directed by a typical horror hack but by an iconoclastic auteur that was once considered New Zealand’s equivalent to Luis Buñuel. Indeed, before directing Death Warmed Up, Blyth was responsible for directing the queer avant-garde psycho-sexual short Circadian Rhythms (1976) and the rather underrated surrealist Buñuel-esque anti-bourgeois fantasy Angel Mine (1978), so it seemed somewhat unlikely that he would direct a splatter flick geared towards a more general audience. Of course, as reflected in its fairly overt homoerotic subtext and rather raunchy one-liners like, “I love the smell of blonde pussy in the morning,” Blyth’s hysterically paced horror flick is not exactly your typical completely mindless spatter show. Co-penned by Michael Heath who was previously responsible for writing the Kubrick-esque Ozploitation classic Next of Kin (1982) and the underrated kiwi cross-genre Ronald Hugh Morrieson adaptation Summer (1982) aka The Scarecrow, Death Warmed Up is like a car accident that you cannot help but stare at in disbelief as a work that seems like it was created by a collective of nihilistic methheads where the storyline is just as frenetic and erratic as the in-your-face steadicam-based cinematography. More or less completely overlooked in Blyth’s native New Zealand where it was described in the press as a “depraved waste of taxpayers money,” the film would ultimately develop its most loyal following in Europe. Probably the most notable fan of the work is Jodorowsky who indubitably paid the film its greatest compliment when he stated in an interview: “...the film appealed to me because of its irrational side. David Blyth creates an unexplained atmosphere from which we have to draw conclusions, and, in passing, he settles scores with his paternal archetype and with his sexual vision of the world. So what sets off a negative apocalypse is a sexual act between two adolescents; from the moment these two youngsters make love in an open, healthy manner, the world explodes as if in retribution. From all these points of view, this can be said to be a personal film, made with very little money, but one which multiplies its resources. I also divide directors into those who need several million dollars, and those who love the cinema so much that they make miracles on small budgets and multiply the loaves by putting all their efforts into the image." Featuring an involuntarily parricidal hero, ambiguously gay mad scientist with a fetish for both bloody brains and blonde boys, pernicious mutant punk rockers, an old fat white chap in an unconventional form of blackface, and reasonably decent gross-out gore effects, Death Warmed Up is certainly what cult films are all about as a piece of wayward celluloid idiosyncrasy that plays by its own rules while also playing with outmoded horror clichés.

Like Death Warmed Up itself, the life of protagonist Michael Tucker (Michael Hurst) very much resembles a nightmare, or at least it does after he kills both of his parents. At first, Michael is just your typical New Zealand Anglo-Saxon schoolboy, but things change when he goes by his father's work one day and witnesses his neurosurgeon daddy Professor Tucker (David Weatherley) getting in a heated argument over dubious research with his unhinged megalomaniac partner Dr. Archer Howell (Gary Day) who believes his brain surgery experiments can extend human life despite the fact that his experiments on rats concluded with the rats dying with major brain lesions. To Michael's horror, Dr. Howell spots him during the argument and then later chases the boy down and awkwardly recommends that he take a shower, homoerotically stating, "You're all sweaty. Let's get you cleaned up." While Michael showers, Dr. Howell admires the young boy's unclad body and then out of nowhere shoves a huge needle filled with some strange serum into the boy's bum, thus making him homicidally crazy. Ultimately, Dr. Howell gives Michael a shotgun and drops him off at his home where he rudely interrupts his parents' carnal pleasures and proceeds to shoot them dead, even symbolically blasting a hole where his mother's vagina used to be in what one might describe as brazenly anti-Oedipal behavior. For his unconscious crimes, Michael is locked up in a mental institution, even though he was not in control of his actions. Needless to say, when all is said and done, the protagonist wants his revenge and he will have it, but it will ultimately come at the price of everything, especially his sanity, but also love and a long well lived life.

Flash forward seven years later, Michael has been released from the loony bin and has a sort of 'Nazi chic' makeover as reflected in his charming bleach blond Hitler Youth haircut and matching eyebrows. Meanwhile, Dr. Howell, who previously received a grant from a heinous sounding group called the Rothschilds Foundation, has fully realized his dream as a sort of evil corporate mad scientist and now owns a gigantic hospital-cum-prison called 'Trans Cranial Applications' (TCA) on a luxurious island. Needless to say, Michael decides to pay Dr. Howell a visit on the island, but he also absurdly decides to bring his girlfriend Sandy (Margaret Umbers), as well his best bud Lucas (William Upjohn) and his girlfriend Jeannie (Norelle Scott). To get to the island, Michael and his friends take a ferry on which they run into some mutants, including a rather sickly fire-croched hunchback with a somewhat lycanthrope-like appearance named Tex Murno (Bruno Lawrence), who was apparently the first victim of Dr. Howell's surgery. When Lucas decides to piss on a random car, he and Michael soon find themselves fighting two mutants named Spider (David Letch) and Jannings (Geoff Snell), who ultimately get their asses kicked by the Aryan studs. Spider and Jannings are both 'patients'/'employees' of Dr. Howell and they will ultimately be spending most of their time attempting to hunt down Michael and his friends. After finally arriving on the island and getting in a road battle with Spider that ends with the baldheaded punk mutant getting run off the road, Michael drives his friend into a bizarre local town where he spots his nemesis going to a place called 'Ranji Gandhi & Sons Fruiterery' owned by a goofy Indian (played by Jonathan Hardy in 'brownface') whose eyes practically pop out of his head when he talks. While Michael and his friends have a fun little time at the beach where the two male leads sport super gay speedos (Michael Hurst seems like he has an erection), things ultimately begin going down hill for the group, who will soon be battling giant mutants at a mad scientist's somewhat kitschy compound, which seems like it was designed by Steve Strange of the New Romanticiſt group Visage.

DEATH WARMED OVER

At Michael's recommendation, the friends decide to hang out in some underground tunnels where they soon find themselves being chased by Spider and Jannings on motorcycles. When one of the mutant goons runs into Lucas' girlfriend's Jeannie, she hits her head on concrete and is severely wounded. Luckily, loverboy Lucas takes his revenge and ultimately causes Jannings to impale himself on a pole. When Spider brings half-dead Jannings by Dr. Howell's compound and the good doctor refuses to help, the sinisterly goofy mutant decides to seek his revenge. Indeed, Spider frees dozens of large mutant 'patients' at Dr. Howell's compound that immediately begin brutally murdering everyone in sight, including cute chicks in futuristic new wave uniforms. Eventually, a group of the unruly monsters led by Spider begin attacking Michael and his friends at a bar, but eventually Dr. Howell's Chinaman sidekick and a group of militaristic medics show up and force the friends to go back with them to the hospital where the homicidal havoc is raging on. To make a long story short, Jeannie gets burned alive after throwing radioactive material at a mutant, Lucas is killed after taking an axe to the gut from Spider, and Michael finally gets his much desired revenge by repeatedly stabbing Dr. Howell in the stomach with a scalpel in a discernibly fetishistic way. Before he is killed, Dr. Howell states to Michael in a homoerotic fashion, "I had a vision...You were a part of that vision." After killing Dr. Howell, Michael and his much suffering girlfriend Sandy leave the madhouse, yet the protagonist seems all the more deranged despite killing his nemesis and he even gets violent with his lover when she attempts to comfort him. When Sandy tells Michael, "It's over," he responds by curiously remarking,

“It hasn’t even begun” and by driving to the site of a group of cars and trucks in flames where he is ultimately killed via electrocution after a power line falls on him. Undoubtedly, to say Michael is a tragic protagonist would be an understatement.

Unfortunately, not only was the original 16mm print of Death Warmed Up apparently accidentally burnt by a careless intern at the film vault where it was kept, but a second 35mm blowup was also lost, hence why all the DVD releases of the film look like they were transferred from VHS. Interestingly, Death Warmed Up would not have ever been made were it not for a tarot reading given by none other than Alejandro Jodorowsky. Indeed, apparently director David Blyth was so obsessed with Jodorowsky after seeing El Topo (1970) at the NZ Film Festival that he traveled to London looking for the filmmaker-cum-guru and found out through some friends that he was living in Paris. Upon arriving in Paris, Blyth found Jodorowsky at a shop called Arcane 22 and was told after receiving a tarot reading that he should immediately go back to New Zealand and begin working on another film which would ultimately be Death Warmed Up. In a strange yet rather fitting instance of happenstance, Jodorowsky ended up being the President of the Jury when the film competed at the Paris Fantasy Film Festival where it won the Grand Prix. Notably, Jodorowsky would later state regarding Blyth and his film, “I could understand someone disapproving of David Blyth’s film, saying that it was a curious film, not Cartesian enough, with blood in it, idiotic, but nevertheless I don’t think I’m wrong in saying that this director is going to have an interesting career in film. In fact I told him, when I read the Tarot for him, that he was going to become very famous, and very rich, and that he would go and shoot in the United States, where people would do their utmost to deprive him of his vision.” While Blyth never really became that rich or famous, he did go on to work in Hollywood where he was most certainly deprived of his vision, hence why he would be forced to direct episodes of the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers and various other completely commercial works that one would never expect to be directed by the kiwi Buñuel. Luckily, Blyth eventually decided to leave Hollywood and move back to his homeland where he began directing experimental documentaries and brutal arthouse splatter flicks like Wound (2010), which is arguably the director’s most subversive and grotesque work to date. Admittedly, the first time I watched Death Warmed Up, I had a rather hard time getting into it and had to turn it off after 30 minutes or so, but after becoming fairly familiar with Blyth’s oeuvre I wisely decided to give it another try and now can confess that I am a converted fan. As a truly bizarre and idiosyncratic sci-fi-horror that is like The Island of Doctor Moreau as savagely raped by Liquid Sky (1982) and Class of Nuke ’Em High (1986), albeit with creepy cocksucker undertones, Blyth’s movie is pure and unadulterated celluloid trash that could have only been sired in the 1980s and I mean that in the best possible way. After all, any film featuring a curious combination of seemingly unrelated ingredients, including naughty nurses in fetishistic New Romanticist-esque uniforms, hilariously vulgar Indian racial caricatures, ambiguously gay mad scientists of the twink-obsessed sorts, murderous mutant punk rockers, and a sunny paradisaical island, among other things, is worthy of any truly enterprising cinephile's time.

DEATH WARMED OVER

-Ty E

TRANSFIGURED NIGHTS

David Blyth (2007)

Undoubtedly, in many ways, the Internet is a fucked tool of virtual socialization that has empowered collectives of crypto-perverts from all around the world to unite from the comfort of their living rooms in strengthening the social fabric of their sexual insanity. One of the creepiest yet equally pathetic subcultures I stumbled upon on the internet somewhat recently is so-called 'masking', which is a sort of cyber meta-cross-dressing that involves grown men, both gay and straight (and every in between), who take on human doll personas where they wear female masks, drag, and even fake tits and exhibit their foul fetishism for all the world to see via webcams. Although Channel 4's documentary Secrets of the Living Dolls caused a stir all over the internet and Twitter in early 2014 after 2.4 million viewers tuned in to watch the hermetic world of 'female masking,' New Zealand auteur David Blyth (Red Blooded American Girl, Ghost Bride) created an experimental documentary half a decade earlier, Transfigured Nights (2009), that offered a more subversive and dark, if not semi-campy, look at the disturbing cyber culture. Beginning his filmmaker career as the closest thing to a 'Kiwi Buñuel' with his avant-garde surrealist short Circadian Rhythms (1976) and his absurdist feature-length satire of suburbia Angel Mine (1976), Blyth would also be responsible for New Zealand's first horror film, Death Warmed Up (1984) aka Death Warmed Over. After Death Warmed Up got some international attention (Alejandro Jodorowsky is a notable fan of the film!), Blyth made his way to Hollywood and directed a couple horror films before falling into the undignified world of television where he even directed episodes of Mighty Morphin Power Rangers. Not surprisingly, it was not until Blyth moved back to New Zealand that he would go back to his roots and once again direct provocative auteur pieces, including the patently perverse arthouse-splatter flick Wound (2010). Aside from Wound, Blyth also began directing a series of documentaries, including Our Oldest Soldier (2002), which is about the director's WWII war hero grandfather, as well as a couple docs on sexual fetishism, which include the S&M/BDSM-themed work Bound for Pleasure (2002) and Transfigured Nights. An insightful and decidedly debasing document of mixed-up men ranging from Vietnam War veterans to white British Muslims who derive maximum ecstasy from emasculating and degrading themselves by wearing anime masks and fruity costumes for voyeurs across the globe via webcams, Transfigured Nights is a totally trying yet strangely rewarding document of Occidental decay that is scarier than any David Lynch film and ultimately reminds the viewer why Muslims are so eager to keep the Western influences out of their nations that they are willing to blow themselves up to accomplish such a goal.

With masker names like 'Hog-Tied,' 'More Rubber Sir,' and 'Miss Piggy,' it is easy to see that the subjects of Transfigured Nights take their creepily contrived online personas rather seriously. The human train wrecks of Blyth's film want to give you a private show, as it fuels their seemingly unquenchable thirst for exhibitionistic self-debasement and pseudo-self-glorification. 'Mr. Jeffus' is a virtual human pig who got into rubber and cross-dressing via his early interest in female gloves. With the emasculating encouragement of his equally rotund wife, Jeffus does female housework in high heels and a full-body leather suit. 'Kuniko' is a kinky creep who does not enjoy talking but wallows in wearing Japanese schoolgirl anime masks and tying plastic bag after plastic bag around his head, as if one bag is not enough. 'More Rubber Sir', who randomly discovered his fetish for rubber one day after trying on various wetsuits, is a crypto-queer who is too afraid of the commitment that goes with actually meeting real people in real-life person, so instead he gets on a webcam and shows off his coveted Israeli gasmask. 'Michiko' is from Hong Kong and believes it is "no fun to play male characters" because "girls get all the attention." Although his family is ashamed of his peculiar proclivity towards wearing Japanese anime character masks, he sees what he does "as an art" and wears his costume as much as he can. 'Hog-Tied' is an ostensibly heterosexual American truck driver who has blown no less than $2,500-$3,000 on his rubber gear. At any given time, Hog-Tied wears upwards of seven layers of rubber and enjoys putting a vibrating egg in his panties while he wallows in his own personal hell of unhinged hedonism. The 'Lady of the Mask' does not like to talk, but s/he sure can wear a mask and wig and do it in a rather grotesque fashion that might even give a child a heart attack. Indeed, Lady of the Masks sports multiple masks at once, peeling each face off with the fury of a maniac chick that cannot decide on what 'personality' to wear that day.

TRANSFIGURED NIGHTS

Undoubtedly, 'Deeba' is one of the most disturbed figures of Transfigured Nights and he has no qualms about exposing his metal derangement. A 38-year-old British IT worker of partial gypsy extraction who as he states himself, "came to the Muslim faith, believe it or not, on 9/11," Deeba states he has never derived pleasure from his penis and speculates that doctors may have ruined his genitals, as he remembers them fiddling with his member when he was a kid. A brazen burka fetishist, Deeba somehow believes that other Muslims will accept him despite the fact he is a tranny that gets a sick kick from posing in various elaborate female Islamic garments. To Deeba's credit, s/he is not politically correct and matter-of-factly states, "I've often wondered if dyslexia and gender dysphoria are linked. Every single TS I know is dyslexic." 'Miss Piggy' may be many things, but s/he is certainly not shy as a proud self-described "lifelong tranny" who loves to expose his/her shriveled up man-cunt for the world to see. An unmarried 65-year-old Vietnam War vet with no children, Miss Piggy confesses, "I was in the U.S. Army and went to Vietnam...I was a door gunner and paratrooper but not by choice." Undoubtedly, it seems being in the army did little to toughen up Miss Piggy as s/he, "loves big hair and high, high heels." Describing himself as, "part performance artist and part pure exhibitionist," Miss Piggy believes masking, which he has done for over 30 years, is about, “recreating yourself as art...your own intimate canvas...and using that to escape from conformity.” Rather unfortunately, Miss Piggy concludes ‘her’ web cam performance by flashing her nasty bits.

Featuring an audio clip of Bela Lugosi yelling “pull the strings” from Ed Wood’s banally bizarre pro-transsexual docudrama-exploitation flick Glen or Glenda (1953), Transfigured Nights certainly has a sometimes humorous tone that manages to make the experience somewhat more palatable, though the entire experience as a whole is still nothing short of a sort of metaphysical molestation. Indeed, as someone who has read Richard von Krafft-Ebing’s timeless tome Psychopathia Sexualis: eine Klinisch-Forensische Studie (1886) in its entirety, I still cannot wrap my head around how anyone could become sexually aroused by wearing an Asian cartoon character mask, but then again, we live in a decidedly depraved era where children’s films feature sexual innuendos and eroticize animated characters. Advertised with the tagline “Mondo Webcam,” Transfigured Nights is ultimately an aesthetically and thematically wayward work that blurs the line between exploitation and art cinema and that also manages to pay tribute to Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi but has more in common with a Werner Herzog doc when it comes to depicting the cold, hard truth about humanity’s idiosyncrasies. An (anti)cinematic achievement of sorts in that auteur David Blyth managed to direct an entire film without having to even leave his computer, Transfigured Nights is cinéma vérité 2.0 as a strikingly singular low-budget work made in an age when any moron can make a movie and have it seen by simply uploading it to YouTube. Featuring an electronic score by Blyth’s regular composer Jed Town that is certainly more fitting than the Schoenberg composition that the film may or may not have derived its name from, Transfigured Nights is an audio-visual nightmare in expressionistic webcam form that must be preserved at all costs in a time-capsule as evidence of the sort of social afflictions that popped up as the West was taking its last gasp.

-Ty E

WOUND WOUND

David Blyth (2010)

Although starting his filmmaking career as New Zealand's only arthouse punk auteur with Buñuel-esque films like the phantasmagoric short Circadian Rhythms (1976), the supremely sardonic and anarchistic anti-suburbia fantasy flick Angel Mine (1980), and the first NZ splatter flick Death Warmed Up (1984), "Kiwi Gothic cinema" pioneer David Blyth (Red Blooded American Girl, My Grandpa Is a Vampire) eventually made his way to Hollywood and made the drastic change of becoming a director of the pathetically p.c. kids TV-series Mighty Morphin Power Rangers and even a pansy ranger Christmas movie, but thankfully he has gone back to the colony and is back to his subversive, surrealist roots. On top of directing deranged documentary works like Bound for Pleasure (2004), a close-up and personal look at dominatrix dames, and Transfigured Nights (2009), an unsettlingly voyeuristic view of "wildly perverse, fetishistic pleasures of web cam mask performance" (including an ex-Vietnam Vet who has a fetish for dressing like a female pig in leather and who bring an all time low to transvestic fetishism), bad boy Blyth has returned to the realm of experimental narrative film after a two decade break with the kiwi arthouse horror shocker Wound (2010) – an innately deranged depiction of one insane incest victim's sadomasochistic struggle with psychological pandemonium and her attempt to reunite with her equally fucked up and fetishistic estranged daughter in a film that falls somewhere in between the nefarious nightmare realm of David Lynch and gorgeous and atmospheric arthouse gore of Jörg Buttgerit, except even less linear in structure and which the director summed up follows in an interview as follows: "'Wound' is a woman's pictorial descent into madness, seen as a series of events or visual mental shards from Susan's tragic life as she fights a losing battle for her sanity in an indifferent and uncaring world." Described by none other than Brit of celluloid blasphemy Ken Russell (The Devils, Altered States) in the following manner, "A two-headed doll! Iron-phallused Pig-man stealth! Birthing your own twin! The nightclub of dream-wandering! If your family of origin doesn't kill you, you may just make it...Gorgeous images and repulsive dream-surgery into the recesses of female consciousness. Enter at your own peril! A masterpiece!," Wound is certainly a daunting and deranging work to experience, sort of like watching a Russian execution video while in a mescaline-induced state as a deathrock mix-tape plays in the background, thus it will only appeal to the few, the proud, the aberrant arthouse connoisseur as an uncompromising work that manages to create an unholy marriage between surrealism and splatter, as well as foul fetishism with family matters. Needless to say, if you have ever suffered erotic debasement via a degenerate daddy, Wound – a work of audacious aesthetic terrorism that pours artsy acid in the grotesque gash that is post-cultural Occidental society – is not the sort of film to watch on Father's Day, or any day for that matter.

As a sadomasochistic bitch who cuts off her daddy's dick within the first five minutes of Wound, schizo Susan (Kate O'Rourke) is not exactly a woman whose sense of judgment the viewer can trust, thus the film becomes a hallucinatory horror show where concrete reality and mental derangement become dismembered in a blender of S&M surrealism, anti-erotic excess, Gothic gratuity, and longing for something darkly romantic but totally intangible. With a pedophile fiend for a father who probably could be described as the 'New Zealand Josef Fritzl,' Susan makes it clear why "incest" and "patricide" go together like aristocrats and gulags, but she has a more pressing matter on her mind. At the ripe age of 19-years-old, Susan gave birth to a beautiful still-born baby girl, yet, quite inexplicably, a Gothic school gal named Tanya (Te Kaea Beri) who was born an orphan, and may be the daughter Susan thought was born dead, is on the prowl for her mommy dearest. When not trying tirelessly to make sales for her telemarketing job and basking in sexual abuse from her S&M Master John (Campbell Cooley), Susan is daydreaming day and night about an ostensible daughter that was spawn from the most unholy sin. With the rotten, worm-eaten apple not falling far from the devitalized tree, night owl temptress Tanya is also engaged in an all the more sickening branch of S&M that includes being senselessly buggered by a swine-mask sporting degenerate whose only other piece of 'clothing' is an iron-cock with a deathhead on the end and whose bloated body covered in heretical tattoos makes him seem like some sort of satanic Maori tribesman who took the Gothic blues lyrics of Glenn Danzig a little too seriously. A strikingly haunting and oftentimes hysterical collection of phantasmic tableaux that never relents in its metaphysical prodding and pillaging of the viewer's soul, Wound is a work that only offers solace to the deceased, but only aesthetically pleasing torment to the living, or so protagonist Susan finds out during her deluge of the mind. With visions of romantic suicide pacts on train tracks, a two-headed monster being born through a ghastly gigantic vagina, visitations from a matricidal daughter who wears death on her sleeve, elderly S&M madams, and non-rides to nowhere on an antiquated Victorian train full of lost souls with a punk rock fashion sense, Wound pours buckets of blood of the anti-Electral love sort.

In an interview for the website Schurr Sound, Wound director David Blyth stated the following regarding the contemporary Hollywoodized Occident, "In the Victorian times, children were present when dead bodies were being dressed and that was part of them understanding the process of death. Now in our western white society the coffin is closed. It's only actually the Maori culture that has an open coffin and a healthier attitude to death." Of course, Wound is a work that not only wallows in death, but also in unchecked perversions in a fundamentally anti-life society where pathological fetishism is rampant, even of the incestuous sort. In fact, the father-daughter castration scenes in the film were inspired by a real scenario course case Blyth read about in a U.S. newspaper. As Blyth has mentioned repeatedly in interviews, Wound is a work that fundamentally explores the “unconscious mind,” most specifically of the badly diseased sort, thus the film can be looked at as a renegade reaction to a sick and intrinsically repressed society and a depiction of a deepening laceration in the Western collective unconscious, as well as an incendiary indictment of the decadent wasp patriarch whose role in society is no more prestigious than that of a glorified sperm donor who spends his free time masturbating to images on the internet of young girls around the same age as his daughter. As a man who has gone to Hollywood hell and back, and has created sentimental kiddie horror films starring Al Lewis aka Grandpa Munster, David Blyth has proven not only that his subversive spirit has not withered with age, but also that his view of humanity, especially in regard to those from the post-colonial Occident, is no less pessimistic as a weeping wound of the auteur’s mind’s eye that continues to bleed in every shot of film and digital video he shoots.

WOUND

-Ty E

HAZE

David Burton Morris (1983)

Apologies to mind, Tsukamoto is a man of feverish homoerotic film making tendencies. He has crafted visual art pieces tracing the darkness of homosexuality with such fervor as classic Kenneth Anger and Marian Dora's Cannibal. Be as it may, Tsukamoto will always create an admirable film, no matter how left-field it is from his previous works. From Tetsuo: The Iron Man to A Snake of June, A Snake of June to Nightmare Detective, Tsukamoto has proved his worth while creating cinéma vérité mixed with subversive images that unsettles most everyone. Somewhere between Tsukamoto's affinity for Western films, Haze is born rather crudely. Seeming more like Cube than anything else, we discover our focus being on a wounded man trapped in a concrete crawlspace. With only a short time to live before he bleeds out, he begins to slowly navigating this claustrophobic labyrinth and discovers a woman. For those who remember the infamous scenes of material & teeth in Tetsuo: The Iron Man, be aware that you will see our hero's teeth grind against pavement for a good couple of minutes which leads to nerves twitching. If you recall Lynch's transfer to digital video (Inland Empire) and how pretentious it was, Tsukamoto's digital endeavor encompasses the very raw fear that should be filmed with digital. For those who revel in large, open spaces best avoid Haze. I'm not very terrified of small spaces but Haze had me short of breath and unsure if I wanted to continue. What The Descent did with claustrophobic terror, Haze magnifies the similar fear into uncharted levels of contingency. The near problem with Haze is its conclusion. Being of the surrealist taste, the ending settles with a coup d'état on the senses, leaving various theories that always erupt into polemic ramblings. I like to think of these skirmishes in experimental art as a Rorschach of moving images. Haze dumbfounds me still. The afterthoughts infect like a plague. Tsukamoto has created yet another classic with only 50 minutes of your time and manages to force you on the edge of your seat the entire time. The result is dizzyingly masochistic, uncomfortable beyond any stretch of the imagination, emasculating, and as hyper-horrifying as the homosexual hell depicted within the labyrinth.

-mAQ

FROM THE DRAIN
FROM THE DRAIN

David Cronenberg* (1967)

Cronenberg's early foray into the destruction of eccentricism is one of these early praised pretentious films sorts one cannot help but slightly appreciate. Two of his other obscure classics have a much deeper meaning and value - Crimes of the Future and Stereo. Two nutty men are sitting in a bath tub in an institution. Like Scorsese's The Big Shave, It seems to have some war conflict issues going on in the background of the character. Man #1 is a man with a contrived French-American accent who firmly believes in postmodernism. He dutifully inherits all habitual characteristics of the French and even sports the similar head pieces. He denounces the claim of there being tendrils coming out of the drain and heeds Man #2's (A nutty hair-lipped retard) warning of foreshadowing peril. Not stark black & white but rather of a grainy gray scale, the transfer and production value is beyond horrible. A time stamp is visible on the only print. Running at 14 minutes long, It's almost 13 minutes too long. The characters are some failed attempt at creating bizarre and surreal characters. David Lynch's Cowboy & The Frenchman was a much more successful attempt at using nationality as a key to surreal art. A subtle "avant-garde" soundtrack is lightly playing in the background while the stop motion tendril begins to choke Man #2 as Man #1 whimsically laughs in the background. Man #1 seems to be a past life of comedian Michael Ian Black, seeing as how they share a similar smile, humor, and face. It's a shame that Stella has more artistic integrity than this. From the Drain is a testament to the hilarity of the title of "art."

-mAQ

THE BROOD

David Cronenberg* (1979)

The Brood (1979) is an early masterpiece from Canadian psychological horror auteur David Cronenberg. A film that actually utilizes the “creepy child” technique in a successful way. The Brood is a film about mentally ill individuals and their experiments with “Psychoplasmics,” a sort of fucked up experimental therapy similar to psychoanalysis. Psychoplasmics becomes deadly when rage fuels asexual monster children to unload brutal attacks on adults. These children lack self control as much as they lack facial features. David Cronenberg might possibly be the most intelligent man to ever be involved with the horror genre. A director that incriminates himself as being obsessed with sexual perversion and disturbing situation violence (and death). In The Brood, the mother’s womb becomes obsolete as she bears children through unflattering tumors attached to her body. These tumors develop into physical extensions of the woman’s body and act accordingly (killing those that have enraged her). These “children” lack sexual organs and only exist to merely serve their mentally deranged mother. Like many of David Cronenberg’s films, The Brood starts out fairly tame (with any early scene of excitement of course) and builds up to a demented climax. A climax that goes past any contemporary scientifically logical explanation given by man that somehow works on the subconscious of the viewer. In The Brood, a mother’s attachment to her children becomes the ultimate “child cult” of femininity. The mother merely has to “feel” to send off her virtual army of deformed children to carry out her impulsive and recklessly killer desires. David Cronenberg could be commenting on the dangers of emotionally uncontrollable women. The male protagonist of The Brood is only looking out for the best interests of his daughter. David Cronenberg separates the parents into two categories. The mother being a monster of emotion that only gets worse as time goes on. The father, on the other hand, looks at everything in a logical way. He does everything he can to protect his daughter and investigate the mysterious deaths of his in-laws. It is the job of the father to stop the mother before she ends up killing everyone (including her own daughter). If The Brood had been released in modern terms, mainstream cultural Marxist film critics would pan it as misogynistic. I hope the film isn’t remade where the father controls his monster children with his penis. You can expect that sort of scenario in contemporary times. When you have Antichrists like the Weinstein’s releasing propaganda trash at excessively rapid rates, you have only two options. You can either make films of your own or take a trip back in the history of film. I recommend both.

-Ty E

THE DEAD ZONE
THE DEAD ZONE

David Cronenberg* (1983)

In what probably is Woody Allen's most popular film Annie Hall, Christopher Walken makes an appearance as a young suicidal art fag. Walken's character mentions to Woody Allen in the film that he sometimes gets the urge while driving to cross the other lane and enter oncoming traffic. Woody Allen then questions Walken's character's sanity with more than a little streak of arrogance. One would think that a neurotic such as Woody Allen would be more empathetic towards those with mental defects. Anyways, Christopher Walken would later play a character that slams his car into an 18-wheeler in David Cronenberg's adaption of Stephen King's The Dead Zone.

David Cronenberg is nothing short of a versatile film director. Cronenberg films such as Shivers, Videodrome, and Naked Lunch have proven that the somewhat strange director enjoys experimenting with the deranged psychological horror with the medium of cinema. With films like The Fly, A History of Violence, and Eastern Promises on the other hand, shows that Cronenberg also can direct films that are fairly straightforward and conventional (yet still graphic and subversive). Cronenberg's 1983 film The Dead Zone fits into the director's more mass audience accessible type of film.

The Dead Zone is not a film that is impressively directed. The film also does not feature a variety of extreme and bizarre special effects that you might expect from a director like David Cronenberg. The Dead Zone is just a film with an exciting story and precisely executed direction. The film leaves no time for twiddling your thumbs or blinking. The Dead Zone is an example of a film that has such a good story that it would have been hard for a director to screw it up. Naturally, David Cronenberg delivered in the film directing department.

Christopher Walken does an excellent job playing a psychologically tormented man who has lost it all and has been "chosen" to lead a life of saving lives. Walken has always struck me as an individual with some type of 'less than holy' secondary manifesting behavior hidden behind a shell of charm. Hell, I wouldn't be surprised if he was involved with the death of Natalie Wood as he is somewhat accused of. Walken has the natural ability to send chills down my spine. His performance in The Dead Zone is my favorite of his long list of roles. The Dead Zone also features Martin Sheen as a would-be messianic Adolf Hitler type. I have never found Sheen interesting, but for some reason his role in The Dead Zone is fitting. But just about everything is fitting and Sci-Fi/Thriller/Horror/Drama hybrids don't get much better than this film. It is also rare that a Hollywood film would show a man end his life with something honorable. The Dead Zone is a film full of virtue, love, and compassion.

-Ty E

VIDEODROME

David Cronenberg* (1983)

Videodrome can be simply defined as one of those "must-see" films of that generation. A History of Violence aside, Videodrome also happens to be Cronenberg's defining production of his unnatural delineation that's seated well within fans as a subclassification of cult/sci-fi. Videodrome has the clever strategy of incorporating stark and gruesome images into its set that have found its way around the Internet as an ever popular image; James Woods holding a mutated handgun to his head - "Long live the new flesh," he echoes monotonously in choice scenes nearing the climax. The addition of polished dialogue is assertively the resonating point of emotional entry. With my long overdue first viewing of Videodrome, a film hasn't revealed its marvelous true form in such a bloody and lucid style as of this tale of Max Renn and his prescription of Videodrome.

David Cronenberg had already established himself as a competent auteur by Videodrome's release. For the sake of variety, Cronenberg has crafted the contemporary horror, science fiction, drama, and thriller, all into marvelous and definitive pieces of the genre at hand. The accessibility of all his films whether it be Scanners or Videodrome itself, these staples of pseudo-science horror presentation will feature recurring themes of "body horror" that are oh so prevalent in most of his works. If you've seen any Cronenberg film (Sit down, Fast Company), you've no doubt witnessed these fleshy pods bubble and pus while flesh and machine (organic or not) become infused with madness. What Cronenberg is so acclaimed for is his effective and practical surreal violence and effects that spread on an even keel across his wide modicum of hits: e.g. the head explosion scene in Scanners, the pistol mutation in Videodrome (aforementioned), and Seth Brundle's painful transformation into an insect. Dictated by my own pleasure via overstimulation, Videodrome happened to be one of few contemporary, abstract masterpieces that you never, in my case, get around to watching until well past the deadline. Max Renn is an early and perfect example of the pathetic not quite-alpha male and the swift manipulation by feminist mind frame as Max, a low quality of lifer and a disgusting male of nature, finds himself fulfilling the perverted fetishism with a radio personality played by Deborah Harry. The inscribed sex scene appears to be of no pleasure to himself as he bows to her every whim eventually hallucinating himself on Videodrome. The fleshy pink walls reflect just how out of the BDSM loop he really is. Nicki Brand is no longer with him. No one wonders why. The opening scene of the omnipresent television set alerting Max to wake up to his painfully boring life is the kind of established scenario most films with self-deprecating leads should adhere to using. This is the kind of loser that walks, eyes ahead, on a busy sidewalk. Judging by the lengthy coat, you would never guess he's a prime example of that lame soul; the one that passes out watching late night television and starts the next

VIDEODROME

