Undoubtedly, one of the most shocking and unconventional aspects of Brewster McCloud, especially since it was directed by a resentment-driven leftist like Altman, is that it seems to endorse a sort of Nietzschean master morality to the point where a literal 'bird of prey' plays a role in the killing of 100% McAmerican 'lamb' untermenschen. Indeed, the eponymous protagonist has no qualms about literally hunting his prey to achieve his lofty aims while the rest of society at least pretends to be imprisoned in a badly bastardized form of a Christian slave morality. After all, McCloud's actions against his enemies are practically rationalized by the following words from Nietzsche's On the Genealogy of Morality (1887) where the reluctantly Teutonic philosopher notes, "[T]he problem with the other origin of the 'good,' of the good man, as the person of resentment has thought it out for himself, demands some conclusion. It is not surprising that the lambs should bear a grudge against the great birds of prey, but that is no reason for blaming the great birds of prey for taking the little lambs. And when the lambs say among themselves, 'These birds of prey are evil, and he who least resembles a bird of prey, who is rather its opposite, a lamb,—should he not be good?' then there is nothing to carp with in this ideal's establishment, though the birds of prey may regard it a little mockingly, and maybe say to themselves, 'We bear no grudge against them, these good lambs, we even love them: nothing is tastier than a tender lamb.'" Surely, one cannot help but be reminded of Nietzsche's words each time the black raven appears in the film just before one of the protagonist's enemies is strangled. Just as Nietzsche argued that both birds of prey and blond beasts should not be held responsible for supposed 'evil' like murder because their actions stemmed from pure strength and not some sort of malevolent intent, McCloud's actions cannot be judged as simply sinister crimes but instead an expression of aristocratic good and 'will to power.' Not surprisingly, it is only when McCloud abandons his master morality and succumbs to trivial fleeting emotions that he meets his downfall and is destroyed in a scenario that is like Fellini meets ancient Greek Mythology.

Interestingly, when reminded in an interview conducted by David Thompson that he described Brewster McCloud as his personal favorite of all the times he made in a 1976 issue of Playboy magazine, Altman responded, "I think it's probably among the most creative and original films I've done. NASHVILLE is another. But every one I feel that way about has things that I think no one has ever envisaged. And how they got done, I don't know . . ." Indeed, it is certainly a shock that such an iconoclastic and just downright antisocial and misanthropic film was ever released by a major studio like Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in the first place, though it is surely no surprise it was an abject failure that barely played in theaters. Unfortunately, Altman would never come even close to ever directing a film as gleefully subversive and venomously sardonic as Brewster McCloud again, but luckily the late great Teutonic auteur Christoph Schlingensiefel (Egomania – Island without Hope, The German Chainsaw-Massacre) would somewhat follow in his footsteps and direct some of the most mirthfully obscene, whimsically scatological, racially insensitive, and eclectically anarchic films ever made. In fact, Altman's flick probably has the most in common with Schlingensiefel's cinematic oeuvre than any other film(s) in terms of being a surrealist genre-molesting fantasy flick that was certainly not made for kids, even though many kids would surely appreciate its unabashedly scatological approach to ornithology.

BREWSTER McCLOUD

Despite its mostly mischievously jovial tone and sometimes unabashedly juvenile humor, Brewster McCloud is ultimately a rather dark and gloomy film about the incapacity of a young budding Übermensch to prevail in a philistine-ridden dystopia plagued by cornball conformity, buffoonish bureaucracy, senseless sexual infantilism, and socio-political vulgarity. Of course, the titular hero's tragic quest can be seen as a sort of quasi-prophetic allegory for Altman's own life as a rebellious filmmaker reluctantly working within the artistically oppressive realm of Hollywood, thus making it all the more poignant that the film was a total failure. In a somewhat cryptic way, the film also seems to reveal Altman's own insecurities, especially in regard to being an artist and supposed 'genius.' After all, McCloud both literally and figuratively falls hard in terms of realizing his weltanschauung, completing his magnum opus, and achieving true transcendence. In that sense, Brewster McCloud is a fairly devastating film that probably should be seen by any serious prospective artist. Notably, according to Altman's own son Stephen Altman—a production designer that worked on virtually all of his father's films from Come Back to the 5 & Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean (1982) onward—he was an unscrupulous charlatan, huckster, and conman of sorts that emotionally neglected his kids and only really cared about himself and his films. Indeed, as Stephen Altman confessed to Mitchell Zuckoff in regard to his father, "I think he had a fear of being found out that he was just a normal person and wasn't a genius. To me, he was like the typical con man. Like how he would get his movies together and get the people involved. He was like Tom Sawyer painting the picket fence. If the movie was made, and everybody made money, he wasn't a con man anymore, he was just a great director and leader and salesman, you know? If it all falls apart and everybody loses their money, then he's a con man. Most of the time he made it work, so that's why everybody kept hanging around. I mean, if he wasn't successful, most people wouldn't be hanging out with him. No, no, no, we wouldn't be here at all. So that's the way it goes." Indeed, it might be argued that Brewster McCloud is nothing short of a shameless piece of shit-soaked tragicomic con-artistry, yet it is also a genuinely humorous and unforgettable piece of shit-soaked tragicomic con-artistry that makes *M*A*S*H* seem like Hogan's Heroes as far as subversion and iconoclasm is concerned. In terms of a specific message, the film has a number of both glaring and cryptic messages, though I think it is safe to say that Altman's somewhat arcane cinematic work is largely a sort of cautionary tale for young men about the importance of putting one's work and passion(s) before women. After all, Brewster McCloud was directed by a middle-aged man that already had been married three times and had half a dozen kids before he achieved any real sort of artistic prestige or financial success. Had Altman, not unlike his hero Ingmar Bergman, not treated his wives like shit and neglected his children, he almost certainly would not have become a great filmmaker. Unfortunately, as the eponymous protagonist of Altman's film learns the hard way, sometimes you cannot help but put pussy on a pedestal, even if it could mean the spiritual and/or physical death of you, but of course as Nietzsche once famously wrote, "Ah, women. They make the highs higher and the lows more frequent."

-Ty E

THIEVES LIKE US
THIEVES LIKE US

Robert Altman (1974)

As a relatively subversive and iconoclastic 'anti-Hollywood Hollywood' auteur that sometimes took a relatively 'nonchalant' approach to the filmmaking process and was not afraid to completely rework and rewrite screenplays, come up with random endings on the spot while shooting (e.g. California Split), and allowed actors to improvise, Robert Altman (*M*A*S*H*, Nashville) certainly performed a grand yet considerably underappreciated artistically ironic feat with Thieves Like Us (1974), which happens to be both one of his greatest yet most conventional films. Indeed, aside from being a rare Altman film that is fairly faithful to its source material, the flick was made in the wake of the culturally revolutionary success of Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde (1967) when countless other filmmaker also attempted to capitalize off the prestige of the Great Depression era crime-drama as demonstrated by works including (but certainly not limited to) Roger Corman's Bloody Mama (1970), Martin Scorsese's Corman-produced hack exploitation piece Boxcar Bertha (1972), and John Milius' underrated directorial debut Dillinger (1973). While I rather like both Bonnie and Clyde and Milius' somewhat exploitative Dillinger biopic, I have no qualms about admitting that I think Thieves Like Us is easily the greatest and most timeless of the films associated with this neo-retro counterculture subgenre and I say that as someone that would rather fuck Faye Dunaway's half-rotten corpse than even so much as kiss Shelley Duvall's fairly thin lips. Of course, the mostly unattractive cast of Altman's film is one of the many things that makes it so great as a cinematic work that never falls into the 'romantic myth' that makes Bonnie and Clyde seem sometimes so phony, superficially propagandistic, and just plain insipidly Hollywood-esque. Adapted from relatively forgotten writer Edward Anderson's 1937 crime novel of the same name, Altman's film does a noble job recreating the atmosphere and cultural landscape of the decidedly destitute Great Depression era South to the point where it features no traditional score and instead cleverly relies on diegetic music and radio broadcasts to emphasize a pre-TV world when radio was still king. Naturally, as someone born in 1925, Altman had the distinguished advantage of remembering such a world when entire families had not yet collectively succumbed to the soft narcotizing lobotomy that is the idiotic box, which is quite apparent while watching the film. Thankfully, the film also does not feature contrived antiheroes like the Bogart-loving frog of Jean-Luc Godard's À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless that parrot the behavior of Hollywood movie stars, as it is set in a demystified world where even motion pictures do not even seem to exist (even though they did). In short, there is no glamour or crime fetishism in Altman's stark yet strangely beautiful vision of the serenely scenic wasteland that was the 1930s American South.

Undoubtedly, the famous quote from John Huston's classic film The Asphalt

Jungle (1950) that “crime is only a left-handed form of human endeavor” has arguably never been better expressed in a film than in Thieves Like Us where all-too-human flaws, weaknesses, and vulnerabilities are depicted in a soundly sensitively expressed fashion to the point where the viewer cannot help but deeply sympathize with a goofy young hillbilly fugitive that once killed a man during a botched robbery. Adapted from the same name novel that acted as the source of Nicholas Ray’s classic They Live by Night (1949)—a film that Altman somewhat dubiously claimed to have never seen (in fact, Altman claimed that he began preproduction on his film before even realizing that Ray had already adapted the same novel)—the film even manages to be more tender and humanistic than its Hollywood Golden Age predecessor. Indeed, virtually every single character in the film, especially the lead and his lover, is a hapless loser with very bad luck to the point where the viewer can only assume they will meet a very tragic end. Although featuring a glaringly mismatched trio of cross-generational fugitive bank robbers whose rather brazen behavior ultimately leads to their somewhat predictable demise, the film is first and foremost an almost shockingly touching love story about two goofy virginal misfit hicks that happen to fall in love at the most inconvenient of times in what is ultimately a decidedly doomed romance that should last a lifetime but only lasts what seems like a couple months. In terms of the sheer awkwardness of their short-lived romance, leads Keith Caradine and Shelley Duvall bring a refreshingly singular chemistry that, despite their occasional petty verbal bickering, is pure of spirit and in stark contrast to the bloody violence that the film contains. As much as I appreciate Farley Granger as an actor, his portrayal of lead antihero ‘Bowie’ in Ray’s They Live by Night seems somewhat shallow and one-dimensional compared to fittingly gawky Caradine’s iconic performance in Altman’s film. Additionally, quite unlike Duvall, Cathy O’Donnell is just too effortlessly entrancing to portray a silly hick chick with a name like ‘Keechie.’

Admittedly, my initial interest in originally seeing Thieves Like Us was my love of the film’s title and how it inspired by both the classic New Order song of the same name and multinational synth-driven post-punk band of the same name. As absurdly shallow as that sounds, I knew I could count on both bands due to their cinephiliac tendencies (after all, Thieves Like Us tend to pillage great European cult films to make their ‘official’ music videos). After recently re-watching the film, I am pretty much convinced that it is Altman’s most immaculately directed and just downright all-around flawless flick, even if it is also one of his least sophisticated and artistically ambitious. Undoubtedly, the film owes a great deal of its foreboding pastoral pulchritude to French cinematographer Jean Bofferty (Who Are You, Polly Maggoo?, Alain Resnais’ Je t’aime, je t’aime), who Altman hired specifically due to his foreign background and lack of prejudice in terms of shooting in the ‘dreaded’ American South. Not unlike Dutch master cinematographer Robby Müller with films like Wim Wenders’

THIEVES LIKE US

Paris, Texas (1984) and Jim Jarmusch's Down by Law (1986), Bofferty demonstrates a keen appreciation for exotic rural American landscape that is simply nonexistent in most Hollywood films set in similar locations. Indeed, compared to the emphasis on the scenery in Thieves Like Us, Altman's Nashville (1975)—a film that was also penned by Joan Tewkesbury—seems like it could have been filmed on a cheap Hollywood sound stage. Not unlike Stanley Kubrick's underrated 18th-century epic Barry Lyndon (1975), Altman's film rings quite true in terms of the era it depicts and never succumbs to unintentional kitsch or camp like so many Hollywood period pieces. Indeed, you might not exactly find the world depicted in Altman's film to be terribly romantic in the superficial Bonnie and Clyde-esque sort of fashion, but you will be glad you experienced what is ultimately a pleasantly devastating depiction of that particular zeitgeist.

Beginning on a forebodingly rainy day in Mississippi with a slight sense of gleeful doom and gloom in the air, Thieves Like Us introduces two members of the eponymous trio with a fittingly anticlimactic prison escape that involves the characters carjacking a rather rotund and equally dimwitted pothead after a fairly mellow day of extra leisurely prisonside fishing. The youngest yet seemingly most intelligent and seemingly sane of the group, infectiously goofy yet incessantly glowering 23-year-old protagonist Bowie A. Bowers (Keith Carradine) was originally in prison for killing a store clerk during a botched robbery that ruined his entire life. Luckily for him (or rather unluckily as the film eventually reveals), Bowie has teamed up with two veteran middle-aged bank robbers named T-Dub 'Three-toed' Masefield (Bert Remsen) and Elmo 'Chicamaw' Mobley (John Schuck). While T-Dub is an almost disturbingly jolly unrepentant pervert with a fetish for underage female relatives and Chicamaw is an angry drunk and shameless slob, the only vice that Bowers really seems to suffer from is youth and the tragic naivety that oftentimes accompanies it. Although the only member of the gang that was actually convicted of murder, Bowie cannot really seem to stomach death and violence and thus naturally becomes disgusted when Chicamaw proves to be a rather trigger-happy gent when it comes to confronting cops and elderly bank clerks. In fact, Bowie is such a sensitive sweetheart with a hillbilly heart of gold that he spends his first night out of prison as a fugitive befriending a stray dog and sleeping with the yellow beast under a train track in a scene that really underscores that he is a lovable loner that the audience cannot help but happily root for. The day after the gang's less than great escape from prison, Bowie arrives at the home of an alcoholic gas station owner named Dee Mobley (Tom Skerritt) where he first meets the girl he will fall in love with. The teenage daughter of Dee and 'second cousin' of Chicamaw, Keechie (Shelley Duvall) is anything but a charming cutie but, like the protagonist, she is a goofy and gawky redneck dork and thus they make for quite the ideal couple. Indeed, Bowie and Keechie become in many ways the 'perfect couple,' but unfortunately fate intervenes and puts a swift brutal end to the heterodoxically heartwarming romance. At first, Bowie is too shy and inexperienced to properly flirt with Keechie and instead grills her about whether or not she has a 'fella.' Notably, Bowie is so obviously infatuated with Keechie that he seems sincerely shocked when she denies having a beau. Luckily for Bowie, he not only eventually becomes Keechie's fella, but also her first fella as she is a naive virgin that seems like she spent way too much time in a Southern Baptist Sunday school.

When Bowie rhetorically asks the stray dog at the beginning of the film, "You belong to someone? You're just a thief like me," he probably reveals more about himself verbally than at any other time in the film, so it is only tragically fitting that when he decides that he wants to "belong" to Keechie and quit being a thief that he is literally shot down in a most gruesome fashion as if the gods were punishing him for overcoming some sort of ugly archetype that he was never really meant to be. Had he had a more privileged upbringing, Bowie might have grown up to become a community college professor or accountant, but instead he reluctantly embraced a world of crime. Unlike his psychopathic goofballs partners T-Dub and Chicamaw, who do not really seem to understand him in any innate or meaningful way, Bowie actually seems to have the capacity to go straight and lead a relatively normal life. In fact, he seems to desperately long to become thoroughly domesticated and eventually start a family, especially after falling in love with Keechie, but being a fugitive makes it an impossible task. In fact, when Bowie is injured in a car accident, Chicamaw makes their situation seemingly infinitely worse by murdering two cops in cold blood so that they can flee the scene before being recognized as fugitive bank robbers. Somewhat ironically, it is also this same car wreck that leads to Bowie falling in love, as Keechie nurses him back to health when he is injured and eventually joins him in bed where the two new lovebirds demonstrate their keen attraction towards one another by making love no less than two times that night. Indeed, before they even kiss, Keechie demonstrates with the great sensitivity that she treats Bowie's wounds that she loves him.

While Bowie parts ways with his partners after the car accident and buys a secluded cabin for him and Keechie to live in, he is counting on one more big bank robbery score so that he and his beloved can flee the United States to start a new life in Mexico. While the bank robbery goes relatively smoothly aside from Chicamaw impulsively murdering a bank clerk, T-Dub is subsequently killed by the cops while waiting in a parked for his wife outside a seedy motel that he just bought. Additionally, Chicamaw is caught and imprisoned, thus leaving Bowie to fend for himself in a world where he has next to nil friends. Unfortunately, Bowie makes the ultimately fatal mistake of hiding out at a small cabin owned by T-Dub's supremely cunty sister-in-law 'Mattie' (Louise Fletcher), who has a fiercely frigid demeanor as if she has not had a good fuck in well over a decade. Angered by the fact that T-Dub married her underage daughter Lula and holding a perversely petty grudge against the protagonist because he once dared to positively compare her to his mother, Mattie ultimately betrays Bowie and even has him setup to be brutally murdered by the Texas Rangers even though she knows that Keechie is pregnant with his unborn child. Indeed, after a successful attempt to spring Chickamaw from prison, only to kick his partner out of the car and force him to fend for himself in prison garb in the middle of the country when he becomes extremely belligerent, Bowie comes home to an ambush that involves about a dozen Texas Rangers unloading hundreds of bullets on him when he unwittingly enters cabin where he believes his beloved Keechie is waiting for him. Indeed, Bowie becomes the completely unsuspecting victim of an extra deadly trap as a result of a bitter blonde bitch wanting to get even with him over some imaginary wrong.

THIEVES LIKE US

In the end in a scene that is set at least a couple months after Bowie's brutal murder, Keechie is depicted sitting at a train station as she waits for a ride to Fort Worth, Texas. Notably, Keechie states to a woman (played by the film's screenwriter Joan Tewkesbury) sitting beside her in regard to her pregnancy, "I think it'll be a boy. Well, I hope it is. But if it is, he sure will not be named after his daddy, God rest his soul. He crossed me up once too often, lying. He doesn't deserve to have no baby named after him." Aside from speaking fairly coldly and harshly about her dead one-true-love, Keechie lies to the woman and claims that Bowie was a victim of "consumption" and then consumes another Coke, thus revealing her abject embarrassment in regard to the ultra-violent extermination of her beloved. Notably, in a scene earlier in the film where he unwittingly foretells his own legacy, Bowie remarks to Keechie, "Chickamaw was telling me about that lawyer friend of his in Mexico. Hawkins. He didn't believe much in that heaven or hell stuff. Said the only way a man lived on was through his children." Indeed, Bowie may be dead, but his infamous legacy and his great love for Keechie lives on in via his unborn child, even if the mother of said unborn child seems to be attempting to erase his memory. Of course, Bowie's words can also be seen as a sort of warning against the ungodly crime against nature known as miscegenation, as a half-breed that looks and acts nothing like you does not carry on your legacy and might as well be the spawn of a stranger. Racial purity aside, Bowie and his buddies are indubitably authentic examples of the 'white negro' archetype and not the phony sort that Hebraic proto-hipster Norman Mailer romanticized about. Undoubtedly, Baltimore sage H.L. Mencken—a German-American not unlike Altman that seemed to detest WASP lumpenproles—might as well have been describing his opinion of the protagonists of Thieves Like Us when he wrote in his autobiography Happy Day (1940) that, ". . . a great many anthropoid blacks from the South have come to town since the city dole began to rise above what they could hope to earn at home, and soon or late some effort may be made to chase them back. But if that time ever comes the uprising will probably be led, not by native Baltimoreans, but by the Anglo-Saxon baboons from the West Virginia mountains who have flocked in for the same reason, and are now competing with the blacks for the poorer sort of jobs.” Of course, Altman’s film demonstrates that the auteur had slightly more empathy for hicks and hillbillies, especially when one considers that Mencken once wrote, “It requires a conscious effort for me to pump up any genuine sympathy for the downtrodden, and in the end I usually conclude that they have their own follies and incapacities to thank for their trouble.”

In terms of its depiction of ‘coup de foudre,’ especially of a less idealized and more realistic sort, Thieves Like Us really has no contemporaries and makes the lawless love affair between the improbably attractive titular antiheroes portrayed by Warren Beatty and Faye Dunaway in Bonnie and Clyde seem as emotionally and erotically counterfeit as a feminist fuck flick featuring a bunch of sub-attractive girls with blue hair and tacky tattoos. The film also has the distinction of being, aside from Dušan Makavejev’s The Coca-Cola Kid (1985), the world’s longest (anti)Coke commercial as a surprisingly iconic flick set in a world where the sickeningly sugary beverage seems to have replaced water and where ads for the soda have taken the place of political sloganeering (indeed, in Altman’s film the Coca-Cola logo is to the 1930s U.S. what the swastika was to German during the same era). Admittedly, I certainly had the irrational desire to drink a Coke and then rob a bank after seeing the film. Of course, one of the most brilliant aspects of the film is its seamlessly interweaving of relatively lighthearted and touching subjects like youthful innocence and virginal awkwardness with senseless brutality and death as is especially personified by tragic antihero Bowie, who just never had a chance in terms of accomplishing the relatively small goal of starting a family and living a normal life. Notably, even Altman—a somewhat cynical auteur that always preferred to depict a harsh reality over some sort of feel-good banality—found the ending of Edward Anderson’s source novel where Keechie also dies to be such a downer that he opted to change it, or as he explained to David Thompson in Altman on Altman (2006), “In the novel, she dies in the shoot-out at the cabin. The only change I made was that I had her live and put that little coda in the railway station, saying that she survived and went off, pregnant, into the world. It just seemed to me that to kill them both was too brutal of an ending, and I wanted the sense that something from these people continued on.”

While antihero Bowie surely dies a brutal senseless death in the end via covert firing squad, there is certainly something morbidly romantic about it in the sense that the character more or less perished at a true highpoint of his life as a young man that had just fallen in love and impregnated his beloved not long after losing virginity, so it should be no surprise that the film briefly alludes to Romeo and Juliet. Indeed, while he never gets to experience the joys that come with being a father or grandfather, he is spared the pain of growing old, seeing loved ones die, and experiencing the sort of degenerative poor health that accompanies old age. In a sense, Bowie realizes George Bernard Shaw’s goal, “The greatest thing in life is to die young but delay it as long as possible,” as he lives just long enough to spread his seed and sire an heir in between running an infamous, albeit only semi-successful, bank robbing operation. Indeed, science demonstrates that the point of life is to reproduce and in that sense Bowie’s life finds true meaning in the end, thus making Thieves Like Us one of Altman’s least nihilistic films. Indeed, compared to Altman’s previous classic McCabe & Mrs. Miller (1971) where the eponymous dies a rather lonely death alone in the cold bitter snow while his literal whore lover is somewhere else staring into space while high on morphine, the film is a strangely joyous celebration of life and love, albeit set it in a quasi-apocalyptic era of abject misery and poverty.

THIEVES LIKE US

Although I find many of her opinions on film to be patently absurd and reveal that she was a pretty big Americentric philistine for a highly celebrated NYC Jewish intellectual, Pauline Kael—Altman’s greatest and most shameless fan-girl—wrote a fairly insightful review of the film in the February 4, 1974 issue of The New Yorker where she argued, “In other Altman films, there is always something that people can complain about; they ask, ‘What’s that there for?’ In THIEVES LIKE US, there’s nothing to stumble over. It’s a serenely simple film—contained and complete.” In fact, the laid back pace and tone of the film was intentional, or as Altman once explained himself to David Thompson, “I don’t know if you can do this kind of stuff today, taking your time and being so leisurely about it. I don’t know if you could really do it then. But THIEVES had the pace that I think was exactly what it required. If I shot it today, I don’t think I’d have the courage to do it.” Undoubtedly, Kael pays her greatest compliment to the film at the very end of her review where she somewhat soundly argues in regard to the true distinctly American cultural prowess of the film, “For the last two years now, friends of mine have been shouting that Altman must do THE WILD PALMS or AS I LAY DYING; they’ve been convinced that he is the man to bring Faulkner to the screen. Maybe he knew it all along, and maybe he was smart enough to know that he could do it best by using someone else’s material for his text [...] But THIEVES LIKE US is HIS Faulkner novel.” Of course, the great irony is that, despite the filmmaker’s incessant stupid and stereotypical anti-American remarks during his relatively long life as a hopeless generic liberal democrat type, Altman is responsible for creating one of the most timeless pieces of hearty and organic celluloid Americana. Indeed, while the film surely benefited from its foreign frog cinematographer, Thieves Like Us could have only been directed by an authentic American just as cinematic works as diverse as D.W. Griffith’s The Birth of a Nation (1915) and Harmony Korine’s Gummo (1997) could have only been been directed by yanks (even if the latter film is largely inspired by a sort of anti-Europid post-Yiddish psychosis).

Commercially speaking, Altman’s film was, not surprisingly, an abject failure, though apparently it was at least partly the result of the studio’s lack of promotion, or as star John Schuck once stated, “THIEVES was a picture that was so non-mainstream that the studio had no idea how to promote it. They treated it like a bank-robbery movie, which it isn't, of course [...] But it was released and went in a few weeks." Apparently, Altman was rather protective of his film to the point of shouting down talkative audience members during screenings, or as screenwriter and sometimes filmmaker Buck Henry (Heaven Can Wait, First Family) revealed with the following somewhat humorous anecdote, "I met Bob in Cannes. He and Kathryn said, 'Come to a screening of THIEVES.' We went to the screening and he went nuts because people were still milling around and talking when the film started. He stood up and yelled, 'Goddammit, you fucking people. Will you sit down!' Scared the hell out of them—they did." Notably, out of all the books that I have read about Altman featuring remarks from his friends and associates, Buck Henry's handful of remarks in Robert Altman: The Oral Biography (2009) by Mitchell Zuckoff proved to be some of the most unflattering. Indeed, it seems that Henry thought Altman was somewhat of a phony megalomaniac that hypocritically vomited leftist platitudes while ruling as a virtual Dionysian god under his own filmmaking dictatorship, or as quite kosher The Graduate screenwriter explained, "In the back of my head I was always aware that he could turn on a dime if someone said something that really irritated him or had an opinion that didn't make him laugh. I think he had very strict rules of behavior—I would imagine having something to do with his childhood. His rage against the establishment was one or two parts bullshit. Everybody kissed Bob's ass. They realized that he was an important filmmaker—regarded as that around the world. He liked the feeling of being really angry." If Henry is to be believed, it seems that Altman modeled the mean-spirited and belligerent dipsomaniac character Chicamaw played by Schuck after himself. Undoubtedly the least sympathetic of the three titular bank robbers, Chicamaw is a loathsome fat pig and unrepentant copkiller whose aberrant actions ultimately inspire the police to be more proactive in their murderous manhunt. Of course, Altman became a filmmaker instead of a career criminal and it can probably be argued that his negative personal qualities almost certainly benefited him as a cinematic artist, hence a Hollywood film as gloriously morally ambiguous as Thieves Like Us.

Arguably the most understatedly romantic film crime flick ever made, Thieves Like Us is a real shocker in that it actually dares to trade-in the 'romantic myth' of glamorous Depression Era gangsterdom for the inordinate wholesomeness of unspoiled young love in a hopeless world where organic beauty and sensitivity are seen as dire vulnerabilities that one just cannot afford to have. Of course, Altman's heartening depiction of young love seems all the more unlikely when one considers he was a lifelong lady's man that was married no less than three times and was known to be both emotionally and physically abusive with women, especially when he was drunk. In short, Altman was the complete opposite of the film's terminally romantically shy antihero Bowie, thus demonstrating the filmmaker's artistic integrity as man that was willing to give a certain degree of touching humanity to a virginal bank-robber that he had seemingly nothing in common with. Of course, Altman also deserves respect for making a romantic leading lady out of someone as hypnotically homely and anti-voluptuous as Shelley Duvall (in fact, Altman accentuates her particularly preternatural face in a scene where she stares meekly into a distorted mirror). Undoubtedly, James Joyce's famous phrase, "sentimentality is unearned emotion" certainly does not pertain to Thieves Like Us as it is a cinematic work that forces the viewer to submit to the good, bad, and ugly of human existence and it ultimately ends on an almost crushingly un sentimental note that reminds one of the singular coldness of the so-called fairer sex. Surely, if you do not let yourself be completely consumed by the film's characters and their hermetic world of crime and relatively wholesome carnality, you will get little out of it as the flick was certainly not directed by a carny showman that gets a kick out of leading armies of philistines by their noses with cheap visual gimmicks and kitschy melodrama, hence its relative lack of popularity among the masses. Surely, if there is any film that demonstrates in a sort of metapolitical fashion that Mencken—a truly American Nietzschean that was also no fan of FDR's so-called New Deal—was right when he wrote, "Democracy is only a dream: it should be put in the same category as Arcadia, Santa Claus, and Heaven," it is indubitably Altman's tender yet tough tribute to one of America's least flattering eras. To mention Mencken one more time, I think it is safe to say that he might as well have been talking about Thieves Like Us and Altman's oeuvre in general when he wrote, "Nine times out of ten, in the arts as in life, there is actually no truth to be discovered; there is only error to be exposed."

THIEVES LIKE US

-Ty E

3 WOMEN

Robert Altman (1977)

Probably Robert Altman's greatest strength as a director was his intimate interaction with his actors. Altman was a man that certainly expected his actors to give it their all whether it be in the form of a long exaggerated/improvised acting scenes or displays of unflattering and unconventional nudity, the MASH man drained all the talent he could from the actors he directed. If Alfred Hitchcock felt that "Actors are cattle", Robert Altman must have felt his actors were prime cut angus beef meant for the consumption of the most discriminating of cinematic patrons. With the film 3 Women, Mr. Altman wanted to disgust his audience with a couple slabs of rotting and disgusting meat via the repellent homely actresses Shelley Duvall and Sissy Spacek. To their credit, Brian De Palma knew what he was doing when he had Sickly Spacek play the languid lead of Carrie and Stanley Kubrick certainly knew what he was doing when he had Shelley Duvall play the horrendously hysterical wife of a deranged man in The Shining. Robert Altman brought both of those naturally scary women together in 3 Women in a way I have yet to be seen done before. Pretty much everyone has seen the weird girl at school growing up, the kind of loner girl that you catch a sight of trying to indiscreetly (or not so indiscreetly) take sniffs of her underarm or nervously laughing at the boisterous behavior of a group of wild buck Negroes. These peculiar women are usually on an even lower social status level than that of the nerdy guy because at least people try to fuck with geeks guys for the hell of it. Maybe if the ugly girl is lucky, she might catch the fancy of an absurdly ugly sexual deviant who has an interest in defiling her because at least with her, he might be able to get away with whatever he wants. In Robert Altman's 3 Women one loser girl finds her love while starting a job at a depressing old folks home in the form of another loser girl who is a little more socially ambitious. Sissy Spacek plays Pinky Rose, a nice woman-girl who seems very excited about the thought of actually having a female friend. Shelley Duvall plays Millie, the object of Pinky Rose's social desire. Throughout the film, Pinky Rose starts turning into Millie (in character), making for one creature-like union. The third woman in 3 Women is a bizarre freak of a woman who paints fantastic murals in a small abandoned desert community. Despite her lack of character and speech in the film, her sometimes monstrous and grotesque paintings radiate a certain atmosphere that emotionally drives the film. Millie instantly takes a liking to the third woman after seeing her artwork which angers the pseudo-pretentious Pinky Rose. By the end of 3 Women all 3 women become one. Unsurprisingly, the often ambiguous Robert Altman has no concrete meaning for the end of the film. 3 Women has been compared to Ingmar Bergman's Persona for good reason, for both films express a sort of naturalistic horror in the form of females interacting emotionally and unconsciously becoming one in a way. With 3 Women, no one can argue that Robert Altman never made a great horror flick. Robert Altman made a lot of great films with a lot of great acting performances which makes it unfortunate that he is best known for MASH. A film like 3 Women makes MASH look glaringly like the laughably overrated cynical anti-war romp that it is. 3 Women will mostly leave (for better or for worse) a feeling of disgust on the viewer when the film is over, but that sort of disgust is what makes one remember the emotional power of cinema. Even after having nightmares featuring Shelley Duvall in the nude not long after seeing 3 Women, I still feel that I invested my time wisely in viewing the film.

3 WOMEN

-Ty E

STREAMERS

Robert Altman (1983)

Due to both political and aesthetic reasons, I have always had somewhat mixed feelings for American auteur Robert Altman (M*A*S*H, McCabe & Mrs. Miller), but I can at least admit that the majority of his films, including rough early projects like That Cold Day in the Park (1969) and disastrous failures like his (anti)teen comedy O.C. and Stiggs (1987), are at least interesting to some extent. On the other hand, Altman—a sort of experimental anti-perfectionist that loved improvisation and did very little takes who tended to only use screenplays as a general guideline—seemed incapable of directing an immaculate masterpiece and was not exactly an unrivaled master when it came to mise-en-scène and intricate tableaux. Indeed, many of Altman's films resemble glorified filmed theater, so it should be no surprise that some of his most potent (and underrated) films are claustrophobic low-budget chamber pieces, including Come Back to the Five and Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean (1982), Streamers (1983), and Secret Honor (1984), which were more or less made back-to-back during a low period in the director's career after the mixed reception of his big budget musical Popeye (1980) starring Robin Williams when he could no longer find work in Hollywood as a result of being virtually unofficially blacklisted. While many Altmanphiles might disagree, I would certainly argue that Streamers is unequivocally one of Altman's most unnervingly intense, subversive, nihilistic, and perverse films, even if it takes place entirely in one ugly scantily decorated room that resembles the barracks of some ungodly third world death camp. A sort of gay bastard brother film to the first act of Stanley Kubrick's Vietnam War flick Full Metal Jacket (1987), Altman's film is also notable for being a rare cinematic work set during the the Second Indochina War that does not wallow in pseudo-humanistic antiwar clichés and instead focuses on the internal struggles and senseless tragedy that arise in a morose military microcosm as a result of fags, crypto-fags, and heteroflexible colored gentlemen being forced to live with one another. Needless to say, Streamers is a film that, quite thankfully, does nothing to help further the multicultural cause. Quite unlike most mainstream Hollywood liberal potheads, Altman was by no means a pussy, as he was a World War II veteran that flew on more than fifty bombing missions as a United States Army Air Forces crewman on a B-24 Liberator with the 307th Bomb Group in Borneo and the Dutch East Indies (notably, only 30% of crewmen survived thirty missions, yet Altman somehow managed to survive fifty). In short, unlike his whiny liberal (and largely kosher) colleagues, Altman actually earned the right to bitch about the military due to his own personal experience, but with his (anti)war flick Streamers he managed to achieve something that totally transcends petty party politics and superficial pot-addled pro-peace sentiments. While adapted by David Rabe from his 1976 play of the same title, Streamers was a somewhat personal film for Altman, or as he confessed in an interview with David Thompson featured in Altman on Altman (2006), “When I was in US Air Force as a pilot during World War II, I was eighteen years old. There was always the threat of being attacked by the Japanese, though I was never in that kind of situation. But I remember being in a barrack room and sleeping next to somebody I didn’t know, and that can be frightening because you’re not sure of yourself and you try to act the way a bunch of rough fellas do. Being an individual can lead to a lot of problems. The boys in STREAMERS are in a real pressure cooker. Everything is based on fear. It was more about that than Vietnam.” A cinematic work that makes the first act of Stanley Kubrick’s Full Metal Jacket seem like it was directed by Steven Spielberg due to its refreshingly pure and unadulterated essence and refreshingly raw depiction on unfiltered emotional vulgarity and vulnerability, Altman’s exceedingly emotionally erratic Vietnam War era exercise in military barracks bickering and brutality is questionably one of the greatest cinematic examples as to why the auteur was a singular master when it came to dealing with actors (notably, the entire cast won the Best Actor award at the 1982 Venice Film Festival). While Matthew Modine starred in a number of popular Vietnam War flicks, including Full Metal Jacket and Alan Parker’s Birdy (1984), the actor undoubtedly gives his greatest and most memorable performance in Altman’s rarely-seen film.

STREAMERS

Sometimes seeming like a perversely psychosexual poofter-plagued episode of The Twilight Zone where every single character, whether it be a white bourgeois pansy or ghetto negro thug, is sexually neurotic and seems to rate somewhere between a 3 and 6 on the Kinsey Heterosexual–Homosexual Rating Scale, Streamers is ostensibly about how a small group of soldiers deal with the fact that one of their comrades is a flagrant flaming faggot, yet ultimately every single character seems to be a closet case, latent homosexual, or self-loathing sod. Aside from being a meditation on the perils and precariousness of homosocial behavior in a strictly male environment where being a homo is the ultimate sin against masculinity, the film also deals with the stressful anxieties of interracial housing and the seemingly innate impossibility of a black man and white man forming an authentic friendship where racial hang-ups do not come into play. Thankfully far from politically correct in many regards despite having a vague humanistic tone, Altman’s film depicts a socially discordant microcosm where blacks attempt to dissuade other blacks from hanging out with whites and soldiers rather pretend that their comrade is not a cocksucker even though he’s a raging queen that constantly hits on them in the most shameless, albeit somewhat cryptic, of ways. As many of his films, including his most famous cinematic work *M*A*S*H* (1970)—an oftentimes mirthfully morbid movie where a suicidal latent homosexual is ‘cured’ of his sexual perversion after his friend guilt trips a chick into fucking the gayness out of him—clearly demonstrate, Altman had somewhat of a fondness for poking fun at poofs, which probably at least partially explains the absurdly awkward and often offentimes unnerving tone of Streamers. Indeed, the viewer is made to feel just as unsettled as the characters in the film in terms of the oftentimes suffocating and pathologically sexually schizophrenic nature of this fairly minimalistic psychodramatic chamber piece.

Notably, in his October 9, 1983 review of the film for The New York Times, Vincent Canby complained, "STREAMERS, Robert Altman's screen adaptation of David Rabe's tough, bloody, sorrowful stage play, is a maddening movie. It goes partway toward realizing the full effect of a stage play as a film, then botches the job by the overabundant use of film techniques, which dismember what should be an ensemble performance . . . Mr. Rabe's play, one of the major hits of the 1976-77 New York theater season, is confined to a single set, a bleak room in an Army barracks where five soldiers, under the bleary eyes of two boozey old sergeants, are awaiting assignment to Vietnam." I don't know if Canby saw the same film, but Altman's adaptation is indeed set entirely in a single ugly and aesthetically barren room that really underscores the claustrophobic misery and melancholy that plagues the characters in what is ultimately an exquisitely emotionally grotesque ensemble performance piece that really obsesses over the darker side of human vulnerability and the games that people play when it comes to maintaining a generic social identity. Aside from close-ups and a couple tracking shots and signature Altman-esque zoom shots, the film is fairly conservative in terms of its direction and stylization and I can only imagine that it would be painfully slower were it not for the director's very precise techniques, especially in regard to certain character nuances that are highlighted via said filmmaking techniques. Indeed, among other things, Altman forces the viewer to bask in the dread and embarrassment of a hopelessly effeminate gay boy as he buries his head in a pillow like an upset toddler while he is being mocked by his friends due to his unfortunate sexual vices. Likewise, Altman effortlessly demonstrates the sick chemistry of the queer boy and a hyper neurotic ghetto negro by including close-up shots of the two playing an extra repugnant game of gay interracial footsies. In short, Altman subtly exploits many of his signature cinematic techniques to his advantage and makes the viewer feel like another awkward bitch recruit in the most spiritually barren of military barracks. For better or worse, Altman's film is like an aberosexual boot camp in cinematic form.

Streamers begins with a somewhat understated depiction of a slightly shocking scenario where a seemingly gay and Jewish recruit named Martin (Albert Macklin) demonstrates his dissatisfaction with the military by half-heartedly slitting one of his wrists in the bathroom of his barracks. A fellow effeminate fag named Richie (degenerate Jewish pop artist Roy Lichtenstein's gay mischling son Mitchell Lichtenstein) stops Martin from finishing the job and forces him to get help. Of course, instead of simply comforting Martin, Richie also bitches at him in a stereotypical gay queen-ish fashion for being so melodramatic. While barrack mate Billy (Matthew Modine) seems to be rather disturbed by Martin's actions and even offers to help him, his sassy colored comrade Roger (David Alan Grier in a pre-fame role) his hardly moved by the rather lackluster attempt at self-slaughter and gleefully describes it as, "Ain't no thang' but a chicken wing." Despite being members of rival races, wussy white boy Billy and gregarious smooth-talking negro Roger have developed a fairly playful friendship of sorts that oftentimes involves them speculating as to whether or not Richie is an authentic fudge-packing homo. While fairly militant in their condemnation of butt banditry, Billy and Roger strangely agree that Richie is "cute." As men that seem like they might be latently gay themselves, Billy and Roger want to give Richie the benefit of the doubt, but the effortlessly effete queen is obsessed with flaunting his rather refined faggotry and thus naturally does ridiculous things to draw unnecessary attention to himself, including wear a goofy hat that he proudly describes as an "authentic Greek fishermen's cap." Indeed, as his incessant request for movie dates demonstrates, Richie has a crush on Billy, but the latter is in denial about this forbidden crush. As for Billy's sexual proclivities, he seems like a self-loathing closet-case, especially after he tells a long dubious story about he and a supposed pal named 'Frankie' used to scam queers out of money on a regular basis, only for said supposed friend to later become queer as a result of coming to the following absurd rationalization, "What does it matter who does it to you? Some guy or some old broad, you close your eyes, a mouth's a mouth." Naturally, as a cocksucker with a crush, Richie believes that Billy is really the 'Frankie' of the story and even goes so far as asking him. Needless to say, Billy, who is ashamed of the fact that he is a college-educated dork, does not take it too well when Richie accuses him of having a gay past. In fact, Billy becomes so enraged that he yells in Richie's face, "You are really sick, you know that? Your brain is really, truly rancid. You know there's a theory now it's genetic, that it's all a matter of genes and shit like that? You, man. You and the rot that's make out of your feeble fucking mind."

STREAMERS

Aside from the occasional half-ass suicide attempt and drunken buffoonery of certain goofy commanding officers, the boys in the barracks do not really experience problems until a new negro recruit named Carlyle (Michael Wright of Sugar Hill (1994) and HBO's Oz (1997-2002)) from a different unit begins lurking around and causing problems of both the racially and sexually orientated sort. Arguably the most hyper histrionic black character in all of cinema history, Carlyle is a shameless race-hustler, would-be-pimp, depressed dipsomaniac, and sexual degenerate that soon develops an overwhelming desire to sodomize Richie, which naturally disgusts both the white and black characters. While in the company of his fellow brother Roger, Carlyle bitches that his unit is full of "pale boring motherfuckers" who are "short on soul." Carlyle believes that the army is controlled by evil white racists and when Roger notes that the First Sergeant is an authentic negro, he sarcastically replies in a savagely smug fashion, "That's good news, blood. I heard Hitler was a Jew, too." A pathetic bully that always has a bottle of cheap liquor in his hand, guilt-ridden conman Carlyle loves forcing his degeneracy onto other people and he even coerces Roger into drinking by insinuating that he is an 'uncle tom' if he doesn't take a sip. While ostensibly a bad ass nigga, Carlyle makes a pathetic fool of himself the very first day he is there by sneaking into the barracks late at night while exceedingly inebriated and crawling on the ground with a bottle of liquor in his hand whilst crying hysterically, "They are gonna send my fucking ass to fucking Vietnam and kill me." Although he wants people to think he is a tough thug that doesn't take shit from anyone, Carlyle is really an emotionally hysterical neurotic coward that clearly has been severely psychologically damaged as a result of growing up fatherless in a nasty negro ghetto, so it is no surprise that his petty determination to prove he is a bad ass alpha-nigga ultimately has tragic consequences. While Billy and Roger go so far as to describe Richie is "cute" despite their homo-hating sentiments, Carlyle incessantly describes him as a "punk" and almost immediately expresses his desire to fuck said punk. Needless to say, Billy and Roger refuse to see such a uniquely unsavory display of bestial gay miscegenation take place in their barracks, but Carlyle is not exactly the sort of guy that takes no for an answer, especially when it is an issue of getting his 'nut' from a feminine limp-wristed cracker boy that likes reading books about Ingmar Bergman. Despite his fairly belligerent anti-white racism, Carlyle is somewhat willing to critique his own race and even insightfully blames the collective failure of negroes on hyper-emotionalism, stating, "That's my problem. Maybe that's the black man's problem altogether. You ever consider that? Too much feeling. I mean, it's like he too close to everything. You know, too close to his body, his blood. Man, it ain't like he got no good mind or nothing. It's just that he believes in his body." At the same time, Carlyle's anti-fag and anti-white taunting gets so extreme that even meta-wuss Richie gets pissed and makes the racially-charged statement to Billy right in front of the nasty negro, "He's one of them who hasn't come far down out of the trees yet, Billy. Believe me." As the film hints also in regard to the characters' masculinity (or lack thereof), Carlyle's beloved 'blackness' acts as a sort of artificial pseudo-identity that gives him a misguided sense of belonging, even though other negroes don't even seem to like him. Indeed, the initial reason Carlyle begins lurking around the barracks is because he learns a fellow black brother lives there, though he has a hard time actually remembering Roger's name. Somewhat ironically, it is ultimately gay boy Richie that Carlyle develops the closest bond with, thus underscoring the absurdity of his racial prejudices. Of course, as a man with a massive inferiority complex, Carlyle also seems especially excited by the prospect of sexually brutalizing a smart, cultivated, and handsome white boy, hence the sick trend of black-on-white prison rape. After all, people tend to try to defile and/or destroy those things that make them feel a sense of inferiority.

Aside from all the recruits seeming like closet rectum-reamers, middle-aged officers Rooney (Guy Boyd) and Cokes (George Dzundza)—longtime friends that fought in both World War II and the Korean War together—can't keep their hands off one another and seem like old lovers. Incessantly playing games of drunken grab-ass, Rooney and Cokes delight in mocking the admiring young recruits while bragging about their dubious military conquests. For example, Rooney gleefully boasts about how fat fuck Cokes is a “fucking hero” that took out “47 chinky-dinky chinese gooks,” including one sly young slant-eye that was hiding in a spider hole. Coke also recounts how a comrade named O'Flannigan did not get to sing “Beautiful Streamer” (hence the title of the film) as a result of falling to his death due his parachute failing to open after jumping out of an airplane. Unlike the young recruits, the officers seem to love the military lifestyle as if they are part of some degenerate Männerbünde where ‘boys can be boys’ without the nuisance of feminine energy and pheromones, mammary glands, and the scent of warm wet vaginas. Somewhat curiously, Rooney and Cokes also have a tendency to sleep together in the same small room. While Rooney and Cokes only seem to need each other and never once mention the carnal pleasures that they can acquire from members of the opposite sex, Carlyle coerces Roger and Billy into going to “a cathouse that is full of cats” for a little bit of “sex, drugs, danger, danger.” Somewhat ironically, gay boy Richie, who has little interest in the ‘fruit that made man wise,’ ends up paying for the three recruits to patronize the low-budget negress pussy-peddlers. Unfortunately, serious trouble arises when the boys get back and Richie demands that both Roger and Billy leave the barracks so that he can be sodomized by sexually insatiable spade Carlyle. Indeed, as Roger mockingly states, “Richie is one of those white boys that want to get fucked by a nigger.” Of course, the two refuse to allow gay interracial buggery to occur in their barracks and Billy even goes so far to describe Carlyle as a “fucking animal,” to which the hyper horny negro hysterically replies like a savage beast on the verge of murderous impulse, “I want my fucking nut. I want my nut, man! What the fuck you so uptight for, huh? He wants me. This boy here wants me. Richie wants me, man. Who the fuck are you to stop it?”

STREAMERS

Rather predictably, things escalate terribly when Carlyle is denied his opportunity to anally annihilate the queer cracker boy. An unequivocal ghetto child with a special talent for esoteric street (anti)logic, Carlyle gets so enraged when Billy makes a failed attempt to throw a shoe at him that he takes a knife and slashes the palm of the rather naïve young cracker's hand. After falling into a state of shock and hiding in the barracks bathroom for a little bit, Billy makes the ultimately fatal mistake of coming back out and stating in what is ultimately his most potent line of dialogue in the entire film, “Jesus H. Christ. You know what I'm doing? You know what I'm standing here doing? I'm a 24-year-old college graduate—goddamn intellectual type, and I got a knife in my hand, thinking about coming up behind one black human being, and I'm thinking nigger this and nigger that. I want to cut his throat. That is ridiculous, man. I never faced anybody in my life with anything to kill them. You understand me? I don't have a goddamn thing on the line here." Unfortunately, Billy then makes the seriously stupid mistake of dropping the knife and then hatefully yelling in Carlyle's face "sambo." As can be predicted, Carlyle grabs the knife and immediately stabs Billy in the stomach after he calls him "sambo" in what almost seems like an instinctive reflexive response that really highlights the colored character's racial sensitivity. Of course, Carlyle does not stop there, as he also stabs Rooney in the stomach after the poor drunk bastard randomly stumbles into the barracks and threatens to stab him with a broken bottle upon noticing that he has fatally wounded Billy. When the MPs eventually show up after Richie goes for help, both Billy and Rooney are already both dead, though they eventually catch Carlyle, who is covered in the blood of his victims, wandering around the base like a chicken with its head cut off. Completely in denial that he has just brutally murdered two people and more or less ruined his entire life in a matter of minutes, true blue dindu Carlyle rather ridiculously, if not predictably, maintains his innocence and even demands to be immediately released, absurdly stating with a sort of quasi-crackhead ghetto elegance, "Look, I've had enough of this. Listen, all you guys are going to have to be going now, all right? Seriously. Now, if you just kindly remove these cuffs from my hands. Get me a bus ticket home. I've quit the Army. I'm not going to be quit. I have quit the army."

After the corpses are removed and Carlyle is forcibly taken away in handcuffs, both Roger and Richie are forced to stay in the barracks, with the former immediately rebuking the latter for not owning up to being a faggot and, in turn, partially unwittingly igniting the horrific events that took place that night. Indeed, Roger ultimately blames Richie for all the homoerotically-charged mayhem that has occurred. Before the two manage to fall asleep, Cokes, who is drunk as a skunk and has no clue his best bud has just been brutally murdered, sneaks into the barracks and then proceeds to shock the recruits by emotionally breaking down after Roger mentions that Richie is a queer. Indeed, upon seeing Richie sobbing like a little girl that has misplaced her dolly, Cokes attempts to comfort the boy by misguidedly stating, "There's a lot more worse things than being a queer in this world. I mean, you could have leukemia. That's worse. I keep thinking if there was something I could've done, if it was different. If I'd have killed more gooks or more krauts or more dinks—or if I had a wife, I had kids—I never had any. My mother did. She died of it anyway. That if I let that little gook out of that spider hole he was in I was sitting on—I'd let him out now if he was in there. But he ain't. How am I ever going to forget it? That funny little guy." As demonstrated by his confession, it seems one of the reasons that Cokes drinks so much is because he has not gotten over the fact that he barbarically killed a goofy gook boy that reminded him of Charlie Chaplin. In the end, the survivors of the micro-massacre all seem emotionally defeated. Undoubtedly, what makes all of these characters, including unhinged jigaboo Carlyle, seem all-too-human in the end is that they are all slaves of their own distinct fears, vulnerabilities, impulses, and traumas. Indeed, even Carlyle—an insufferable piece of untermensch excrement that practically personifies all of the qualities that whites cannot stand about certain low-class negroes—comes out looking like a tragic victim whose horrific actions were the natural consequence of a lifetime of ghetto negro debasement.

STREAMERS

From the Sacred Band of Thebes in Ancient Greece to the merry Mediterranean adventures of Lord Byron to the sexually sadistic leadership of the Sturmabteilung (SA) Brownshirts, there has always been a curious link between militarism and homosexuality, but in Altman's Streamers there is certainly nothing even remotely romantic about it. Of course, it could be argued that the film is just as much about (post)Puritan America's long history of anxiety and erotic schizophrenia when it comes to all-things-sexual, as none of the characters have a healthy outlook on sex, let alone romantic relationships (which are never even really discussed). On the other hand, despite revolving around homophobic hysteria, the film is also a sort of sick fag fantasy, especially in regard to ghetto negro Carlyle's rather vocal eagerness when it comes to getting his "nut" via an effete boy (indeed, despite what Hollywood tells you, homo-hating is the norm in the black community, thus ostensibly heterosexual negroes that have sex with men prefer to be on the 'down-low'). Aside from the most masochistic of homos and cock-sucking cucks with a fetish for dark meat, the film is also probably the ultimate celluloid anti-aphrodisiac for the majority of gays. Indeed, Carlyle is certainly no twink. Surely, it is doubtful that such a thematically subversive film could be made today, as it features somewhat unflattering depictions of both gays and negroes, as well as naughty words that might cause seizures in the easily triggered. Indeed, aside from depicting blacks as innately racially hysterical and just plain racist (of course, whites are also depicted as such, albeit in a different way), the main gay character is a manipulative masochist that uses a poor ghetto negro as a tool in a feeble attempt to make his ambiguously gay Caucasian crush jealous. Undoubtedly, if anything can be learned from the film, it is that interracial harmony is an absurd communist fantasy and gay men and straight men are from different universes and thus can never be true comrades. In an age where both poor negroes and flamboyant faggots are presented by Hollywood and American public schools as perennial victims and the height of moral superiority, Streamers indubitably makes for an insightful flick that exposes racial and sexual problems that are completely hidden in the mainstream. While Altman might have been a lifelong leftist pothead, but he was not afraid to be politically incorrect and speak his mind. After all, only a couple years later, Altman would direct his badly botched yet nonetheless sometimes entertaining (anti)teen comedy O.C. and Stiggs (1987), which is notable for poking fun at pretentious poofs, deranged Vietnam War veterans, rambling black bums, and even Mariticide, among other things.

Notably, the virtual bible of gay cinema, Images in the Dark: Encyclopedia of Gay and Lesbian Film and Video (1994) by Raymond Murray, features a fairly favorable review of Streamers that reads: "Director Robert Altman utilizes the intensity of the theatrical experience with the opportunities offered through film in this adaptation of David Rabe's award-winning play. STREAMERS is an ensemble piece, set in a claustrophobic Army barracks, featuring four ill-assorted young soldiers waiting for assignments to Vietnam. The men must grapple with their hidden fears and prejudices, which, in turn, generate sexual intolerance, racial distrust and a misunderstanding that leads to violence." While written by a gay left-winger, the review unwittingly exposes the perils of so-called 'diversity' as is emotionally erratically yet somehow elegantly depicted in Altman's film. After doing a little bit of background reading, it seems that most reviewers of the film seem to have completely missed the film's most important insights. Indeed, in his relatively favorable review featured in Time Magazine, Richard Corliss absurdly wrote, "Michael Wright glides through the barracks like a hipster on a death mission," which sounds like he is describing some lame counterculture satire like Altman's own *M*A*S*H*. Personally, I think it would be more accurate to say that whacked-out homo negro Wright demonstrates his murderously mad racial sensitivity to some uptight college-educated cracker prick that committed the dual negro sin of denying him unhealthy STD-ridden sex and calling him "sambo." Despite a lifetime of cultural Marxist propaganda, most people seem to realize on at least a subconscious instinctual level the Orwellian neo-commie slogan 'diversity is our strength' is a grotesque lie that is an insult to all of human history. After all, even Robert D. Putnam—a leftist WASP that is so pathetically deracinated that he actually converted to his wife's religion of Judaism—had to admit in his magnum opus Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community (2000), which he postponed publishing for years because he was afraid to reveal his less than kosher findings, that so-called multicultural has led to the complete and utter destruction of civic, social, associational, and political life (aka 'social capital') in the United States, hence the overall lack of cohesion among the largely isolated white majority and destruction of virtually every American city due to black criminality and white flight. At the most fundamental level, the barracks in Streamers acts as a sort of symbolic microcosm of the socially necrotizing madhouse that is multicultural America, so naturally it is no surprise that the film concludes with completely senseless interracial murder because some poor helpless minority could not handle being called a couple big bad mean words (notably, the made-up phrase 'white fragility' is quite popular among contemporary leftists, which is rather funny since whites, quite unlike blacks and Jews, do not tend to commit violent crimes and/or suffer mental breakdowns as a result of experiencing name-calling or imagined racial insensitivity). Despite the commie lie that people are completely malleable and can be brainwashed and manipulated enough to the point where they magically shed their most intrinsic biological instincts, straight white males will always prefer straight white males, ghetto negroes will always prefer ghetto negroes, and effeminate homos will always prefer effeminate homos, or so one learns while watching Streamers. More sophisticated and nuanced than similarly themed cinematic works like Jack Garfein's The Strange One (1957), John Huston's Reflections in a Golden Eye (1967), and John Flynn's The Sergeant (1968), Streamers is unquestionably flawed but is undoubtedly the sort of Grand Illusion of the rather preternatural self-loathing gay military subgenre. Not unlike his Sam Shepard vehicle Fool for Love (1985), the film is indubitably one of Altman's most underrated flicks and evidence that the auteur was at his most subversive when working with a small budget and away from the constraints of some big Hollywood studio. I certainly cannot think of another rampantly heterosexual American auteur that would have the gall to make an extremely awkward film about the dangers and dilemmas of 'Dorian love,' especially one like Altman that incessantly used fags as a source of comic relief in his films. Indeed, when the time finally arrives when some Jewish tranny or triracial feminist dyke academic gets the gall to attempt to discredit leftist cynic Altman by portraying him as some sort of sinister German-American homophobe with cryptic anti-semitic tendencies (after all, he dared to wage war against the very kosher Hollywood studio system and even directed films featuring grotesque Yid gangsters), I would not be the least bit surprised if they attempted to present Streamers as the virtual Jud Süß of gay war movies.

STREAMERS

-Ty E

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST

Robert Bresson (1951)

I honestly do not know much about the Catholic Church aside from the fact that it is now seems to be controlled by evil antichrist types that seem more interested in phantoms like climate change and the shoah and protecting serial child rapists and other castration-worthy perverts than the teachings of J.C., but I also have to assume that most modern priests are closet homosexuals, pedos, autistic, and/or sociopaths as I cannot imagine any even remotely normal man taking the cloth in our spiritually retarded age. Indeed, I might think Otto Preminger was a culture-distorting piece of shit that was largely dedicated to dismantling traditional white Christian values with his innately subversive films, but I cannot help but feel that his failed epic The Cardinal (1963)—a film inspired by the dubious life of hardcore closet-queen and Baby Doll-hater Cardinal Francis Spellman—exposed some hard truths about the lack of masculine fortitude and hypocrisy associated with the clearly spiritually and morally declining priesthood. Needless to say, I was not prepared to see a film where I came to believe a young wine-addled priest of the socially retarded sort achieves sainthood as is depicted in Diary of a Country Priest (1951) aka Journal d'un curé de champagne—a film based on the 1936 Georges Bernanos novel of the same name—but this cinematic masterpiece was directed by French master auteur Robert Bresson who is one of the few filmmakers that achieved a true sense of the spiritual in cinema, as opposed to simply depicting contrived (yet oftentimes curiously homoerotic) biblical bullshit à la half-chosenite Cecil B. DeMille, and I say that as a largely apathetic agnostic that could not be a believer if I wanted to. While oftentimes associated with the heretically Catholic moral rigor and asceticism of Jansenism, this did not exactly inform the filmmaker's singular aesthetic, or as Paul Schrader—a lapsed Dutch-American Calvinist that has modeled much of his films after Bresson's, especially Pickpocket (1959)—wrote in his groundbreaking text Transcendental Style in Film (1972), “Bresson, the artist, received no aid or comfort from Jansenism; he had to look elsewhere for his aesthetics.” Luckily, Bresson, quite unlike far too many modern filmmakers—both good and bad—looked far beyond the cinematic realm for aesthetic influences.

An anti-modernist that, on an inspirational level, did not give a shit about modern trends—whether they be spiritual, cinematic, or political—Bresson might seem like a right-wing anarchist of sorts to some people (myself included) and his aesthetic interests were neither vogue nor wholly traditionalism, but that is largely why he was such a pleasantly preternatural filmmaker, or as Schrader also wrote, “Bresson cannot be tied down to any one heresy; he is a heretic all his own. His techniques of portraiture come from Byzantium; his theology of predestination, free will, and grace from Jansenism; his aesthetics from Scholasticism. To each tradition he brings the virtues of the other, and to cinema he brings the virtues of all three. Perhaps this is why no religious denomination has ever embraced Bresson's seemingly religious films; they haven't figured out what sort of heretic he is yet." Indeed, religion or not, Diary of a Country Priest is as heretical as films come as a flick that even makes Pasolini's biblical flicks and sardonic (anti)Catholic satires of Luis Buñuel seem like immaturely and inelegantly rebellious pussy posturing by comparison due to Bresson's singular devotion to the strikingly transcendent in a world plagued with the positively putrid and material. As someone that lost 'faith' (or whatever) as a young kid, Diary of a Country Priest at least made me feel like a believer during its 115-minute running-time and even caused me to momentarily consider that there is much more than life and the shitty people in it. One could even say that, not unlike many of Bresson's other films, it is a merrily morbid cinematic work that celebrates death to the point where Christianity—or at least the auteur's splendidly curious version of it—is centered around the worship of death, which is beautifully underscored by the priest protagonist's final dying words after asking for absolution: "What does it matter? All is grace." Indeed, Bresson wants the viewer to know that the body is a temporal prison and thus one should never fear death as life is the real hell. In fact, as Bresson's pitch black yet singularly subtle understated humor reveals, life is largely a sick joke at the expense of the good and sensitive like the eponymous protagonist of the film.

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST

Although Bresson's previous and second feature Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne (1945) is a highly worthwhile dark gothic (anti)romance where a scorned bourgeois bitch played by Spanish beauty María Casares dedicates her life to getting a disturbingly intricate revenge against her ex-lover simply because he falls in love with another woman from a less prestigious class, it was not until his third film Diary of a Country Priest—a cinematic work so precisely and immaculately constructed that it makes most films seem like they are layered with lard—that he created the template for the singular 'transcendental style' that he is best known for. Indeed, one could argue that the film created a complete paradigm shift in the art of filmmaking as it was surely an imperative influence on the filmmakers and intellectuals associated with the La Nouvelle Vague and later American New Wave masterpieces like Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976) and Schrader's Hardcore (1979), yet no filmmaker—be it Michael Haneke, Carlos Reygadas, Bruno Dumont, Dietrich Brüggemann or countless other examples—has come close to capturing Bresson's style or aesthetic rigor. In short, Bresson lives in a world of his own, which is fitting for a man that once wrote in regard to his cinematic philosophy, "The CINEMA did not start from zero. Everything to be called into question." Undoubtedly, Diary of a Country Priest offers the first serious glimpse of the singular Bressonian cinematic world where typical movie ingredients like entertainment, star power, psychological motivation, and sexual magnetism, among other things, are scant, if not totally nonexistent, and a rare spiritual experience in celluloid form is offered to those viewers bold enough to embrace it. Undoubtedly, the film is the first good example of why Schrader was right when he wrote, “Bresson’s characters, his movies, and Bresson himself all become icons. . . . Bresson has transcended himself: he is blazed in mosaics in some moss-grown temple.” Indeed, like most of his cinematic works, it is somewhat hard to believe that a single man conceived of such a film, but of course Bresson was not your typical man or filmmaker as one of the greats in the top tier class of cinematograph masters that includes F.W. Murnau and Carl Theodor Dreyer, among few others.

While only a highly intelligent artistic genius could dream up a film like Bresson’s, it is hardly an intellectual exercise, or as the great frog critic André Bazin once wrote, “If THE DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST impresses us as a masterpiece, and this with an almost physical impact, if it moves the critic and the uncritical alike, it is primarily because of its power to stir the emotions, rather than the intelligence, at their highest level of sensitivity.” Indeed, one would do best to embrace the film like one should embrace death without fear or hesitation as it is a film that bleeds into the soul as it progresses to the point where it feels completely right and hardly dejecting when the young priest—a man that has sacrificed his mind and body for his faith—dies in the end. While the priest technically dies of stomach cancer, which is fitting since he cannot stomach life (not to mention food), one gets the sense that the true source of his death is a spiritual malady and that he is no longer fit for the ‘prison’ of his body. Indeed, there is no doubt from the very first shot of the character that the young ‘Priest of Ambricourt’ (Belgian-born Swiss actor Claude Laydu in his first and most well-known acting role)—a forlorn figure that, not coincidentally, appears framed behind a fence at the beginning of the film in a manner that underscores his status as a virtual inmate in an ‘earthly prison’—suffers greatly with mere existence and is pretty much socially retarded (read: proto-autistic), but he is also a ‘true believer’ and not in the negative pathological sense as he is willing to sacrifice what little health he has to help a small village with an oppressive atmosphere as inhabited by mostly coldhearted and petty people that immediately despise him just due to his mere presence as a character of a sort of simple untainted Dostoevskian good. In fact, even the eponymous donkey of Au Hasard Balthazar (1966) seems to be treated better than the priest as at least the animal is beloved by the kind and innocent but, quite unlike the ass of Bresson’s later film, the young Catholic brother makes it quite clear to the viewer how he feels, though his internal pain always feels like a total necessary part of his journey. In fact, one could say that the young Priest’s faith is ostensibly morbidly masochistic as an anxiety-ridden prole that is incapable of praying who attempts to spiritually counsel people that would rather spit on him and write him threatening anonymous letters demanding that he leave the village (which actually happens), yet there is a certain undeniable nobility and purity in his ‘passion,’ even if it arguably contributes to his seemingly unavoidable premature demise.

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST

While it would not be sensible to describe Diary of a Country Priest as a 'realist' film, there is certainly an inordinate realism of spirit and essence, as if Bresson personally examined the soul of each 'actor' (or 'model' as Bresson would say) to see if they were right for the role. For example, Nicole Ladmiral, who plays a troubled young aristocratic girl that threatens suicide, committed suicide in real-life at the age of 28 by throwing herself under a subway train some years after the film was released (to make matters more morbid, Ladmiral previously provided narration for Georges Franju's abattoir documentary Blood of the Beasts (1949) aka Le sang des bêtes). As for lead actor Claude Laydu, he was borderline brainwashed by Bresson for a year in preparation for the role and he would ultimately take an extreme method acting approach to his 'performance' by living with a group of young priests for many weeks, intentionally starving himself to make himself look ill, and sporting an authentic priest cassock and matching boots. As for the priest protagonist's mentor 'Priest of Torcy,' he was actually portrayed by Bresson's own doctor Adrien Borel who only agreed to do the role so long as he could use a pseudonym (he is credited as 'Andre Guibert' in the film). While the acting might be a tad bit more 'melodramatic' than Bresson's later films where the models just act like virtual somnambulists, Laydu's performance is arguably the most memorable of the auteur's films aside from possibly Nadine Nortier in his subsequent Georges Bernanos adaptation Mouchette (1967) where a poor young girl chooses death over life before she even reaches full womanhood. Indeed, Laydu plays a pathetic priest but you cannot help but respect the passion behind his, well, passion. Another 'realist' aspect of the film is Bresson's utilization of oftentimes grating off-screen noises (e.g. squeaking of a wagon wheel), which helps to subtly intensify the contrast between the everyday and spiritual. Indeed, while Bresson makes great use of chiaroscuro as seemingly influenced by the paintings of Dutch Golden Age painters like Johannes Vermeer and Godfried Schalcken, the film does not utilize special effects or garish pageantry to express the spiritual like so many idiotic Hollywood films. After all, as Bresson once wrote, "It is in its pure form that an art hits hard."

Beginning with a shot of a sign of Ambricourt—a real-life commune in the Pas-de-Calais department in northern France—the viewer arrives just as the new 'Priest of Ambricourt' (Claude Laydu) arrives to the area for his new parish where he soon catches the local rich Count (Jean Riveyre) being a little too intimate with his dejected daughter Chantal's (Nicole Ladmiral) rather beautiful governess. As the rather literal title of the film indicates, the Priest oftentimes writes in his diary and as his first entry reads, "I don't think I'm doing anything wrong in writing down daily, with absolute frankness, the simplest and most insignificant secrets of a life actually lacking any trace of mystery." Undoubtedly, the diary is one of the priest's few sources of solace, as if he needs it to remind himself of his very existence lest him succumb to a sort of self-dissolution. As demonstrated by the fact that the action and drama of the film is oftentimes echoed by his words in what is ultimately a cinematically ingenious use of pleonasm, the protagonist is an honest priest—even maybe too painfully and autisticly so to the point where the viewer is forced to suffer silently with him as he routinely puts himself in the most miserable of situations. When a grumpy old fart named ‘Fabregars’ (Léon Arvel) bitches about having to pay for aspects of his wife’s funeral, the Priest is left completely “distracted,” as if it is the end of the world or something, thereupon underscoring the protagonist’s complete and utter incapacity to deal with everyday assholes. Aside from adults not respecting him, the Priest is also mocked by the children he teaches. For example, a young girl named Séraphita Dumonte (Martine Lemaire) pretends to be keen on the Scriptural basis of the Eucharist to get his attention, but then embarrasses him for the enjoyment of her classmates by mock-flirtatiously stating in regard to the root of her ostensible biblical prowess, “It’s because you have such beautiful eyes.” When the Priest meets his new mentor, the Priest of Torcy (Adrien Borel), the older and wiser brother instantly berates him for being a sensitive pussy by stating, “You young priests! What have you young men got in your veins these days? In my time they made men of the church, leaders of parishes, real masters!” While the Priest of Torcy is certainly somewhat of a resentful old prick, his heart is in the right place and does provide the young priest with helpful dictums like, “Keep order all day long” and “A true priest is never loved.” In the end, the young priest proves to live and eventually die by these words as he is never loved and rarely even liked, but he does earn the respect of some of his most aggressive and cynical detractors.

Although everyone hates the priest, including little kids, that does not stop him from idealistically attempting to inspire his seemingly impenetrable haters with his own special idealistic Catholic philosophy. To the young Priest’s credit, his idealism is pure and his desire to ‘save’ is as equally pure, hence his handful of notable successes. Indeed, the young Priest manages to convince the local Countess (Rachel Bérendt) to get over her deep-seated hatred of god as a result of the premature death of her young son who she practically worships (for example, instead of a rosary and religious paintings, the Countess sports a locket necklace featuring a pic of her dead son and has decorated her room with pics of said dead son). In fact, the Countess is so inspired to let go of her hatred and resume her communion with god after an intense spiritual argument with the young priest, who she initially does not take seriously, that she actually destroys her beloved locket necklace her dead son. In fact, the Countess even writes a heartfelt thank-you letter that concludes with, “I hope I don’t hurt your pride by calling you a child. You are one, and may God keep you so always,” but she soon dies as if her hatred was the only thing keeping her alive. Despite being a sickly wimp, the viewer never doubts the intense sincerity of his words when he sternly warns the countess, “God will break you,” so there is a certain heartwarming irony in her unexpected death, which naturally disturbs her dysfunctional aristocratic family, as if her bodily demise was god's greatest gift. To make matters worse, the Countess' daughter Chantal (Nicole Ladmiral), who hates her mother for being a pathetic cuckquean, hatefully attempts to blame the priest for her death, thereupon further tainting the protagonist's local reputation. While the priest fails in his attempt to get Chantal to give confession, he does somehow magically suspect a suicide letter in her pocket, which he forces her to give it to him and then subsequently burns it without even reading it. Although seemingly half-autistic, the priest was able to read terrible thoughts of suicide in the troubled teenage girl's unsettlingly penetrating eyes and thus acted accordingly without even the slightest hesitation. In what is probably the most humorous moment of the entire film, Chantal tells the Priest, "You must be the devil" after asking for said letter as if she, as the unloved sole surviving child of bitter old blueblood, is shocked that someone could actually feel her great internal pain for the first time in her entire life. In the end, Chantal seems to believe in the Priest's power and when she asks how he was able to do the seemingly impossible by calming her hateful mother, he replies, "A lost secret. You too will find it and lose it in turn, and others will pass it on after you." In the end, the Priest dies but his crucial influence on seemingly hopeless people like Chantal lives on.

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST

Aside from learning from the misery of everyday life, the priest also learns a thing or two from the Priest of Torcy, but even he cannot provide the protagonist with any sort of solace when a certain Dr. Delbende (Antoine Balpêtré) assumedly commits suicide because he "lost his faith" as a result of losing patients due to dubious local rumors. Indeed, as the priest complains in regard to the suicide, "I was in no condition to listen to his confidences just then. They were like molten lead poured on an open wound. I have never suffered so much and likely never will again, even when I die." In fact, the suicide seems to perturb the priest more than when he finally learns that he is dying of stomach cancer, but of course Dr. Delbende committed a mortal sin which is one of the worst things a Catholic can do. Naturally, as the victim of local rumors himself, the young priest certainly sees a kindred spirit Dr. Delbende who even expresses a sort of spiritual kinship to the protagonist before he commits self-slaughter. In fact, the Priest even takes no offense when Dr. Delbende informs him during a medical examination that his poor health is the degenerate genetic consequence of generations of impoverished alcoholics in his family. In that sense, it seems Dr. Delbende is a fan of the writings of Cesare Lombroso and Émile Zola.

Notably, the Priest's only moment of reprieve is when he receives a ride on the back of motorcycle as underscored by the words in his diary, "By some premonition I can't explain, I understood that God didn't want me to die without knowing something of this risk. Just enough for my sacrifice to be complete when it's time came." While a simple motorcycle ride where nothing particularly interesting happens, it is obviously a moment of complete bliss for the protagonist as demonstrated by the shockingly large ecstatic smile on his face. Luckily, before he dies, the priest is able to convince an old friend, Priest Dufrety (Bernard Hubrenne), who has lost the faith and is living in sin with a woman, to hook up with the Priest of Torcy so that he can get back on track with God and the Church. In the end, Priest Dufrety sends the Priest of Torcy a brief letter revealing that the young priest was vomiting up blood before he died and then asked for absolution, but then stated with his last dying words, “What does it matter? All is grace.”

Simply put, I don't give a fuck about Catholic fathers or the Catholic Church, but Diary of a Country Priest made me feel like a believer, especially in regard to the titular protagonist becoming a saint, at least in the spiritual sense. While later filmmakers like Carlos Reygadas and Dietrich Brüggemann have attempted similar things in regard to transcendental, their cinematic works are, at best, mostly deluded expressions of epigonism, especially when contrasted with Bresson's films. Undoubtedly, the same can be said of Paul Schrader's most recent film First Reformed (2017), which is like a more subversive and less spiritually sound Americanized reworking of Diary of a Country Priest where the American auteur reveals more about his own spiritual sickness than any sort of innate understanding of the somewhat mysterious forces that compelled the no less mysterious French master auteur (who, despite revealing his cinematic philosophy in his classic text Notes on the Cinematograph (1975), still remains a largely enigmatic figure). Still, Schrader's film is a worthy watch and one of the best films of 2017, yet it also demonstrates the aesthetic and metaphysical degeneration of cinema since the release of Bresson's masterpiece, as it is clearly the expression of a spiritually lost and emasculated leftist type who no longer believes in himself, let alone the faith of his forefathers. Speaking of Schrader, he provided an important insight into Bresson's true power as a filmmaker in Transcendental Style in Film by contrasting him with Carl Th. Dreyer—one of the few filmmakers on the same level as the French master auteur—and ultimately argues in a manner that makes sense of the titular priest's death in Diary of a Country Priest that, “Bresson, on the other hand, is the artist of the resurrection, the artist of stasis. The cross for Bresson is a means to a resurrected end, and he is careful not to confuse the cross and the resurrection. Like Dreyer, Bresson uses suffering through the prison metaphor (the ‘symbol of the Cross’), but unlike Dreyer, Bresson transforms the prison into a symbol of resurrection. In this manner Bresson is like the Byzantine Christian who, as theologian Henri Daniel-Rops writes, ‘preferred the theology of Glory to the theology of the Cross.’ Suffering for Bresson is never more than a stepping-stone to stasis.” Indeed, the young priest might be barfing up blood in the end, but his premature death, which is not even actually depicted in the film, is among the most joyous, if not the most joyous, in cinema history. Additionally, only in underrated French auteur Maurice Pialat's sort of neo-Bressonian masterpiece Under the Sun of Satan (1987) aka Sous le soleil de Satan—the third and final of three masterpiece films based on a novel by Georges Bernanos (of course, Bresson directed the other two)—comes as close to Bresson's film in terms of successfully depicting a particularly perturbed priest's passion towards sainthood, albeit in a somewhat more fucked fashion.

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST

Notably, in a top ten list of his favorite films, Russian master auteur Andrei Tarkovsky (Andrei Rublev, Solaris) actually ranked Diary of a Country Priest as his #1 favorite film of all-time. While I personally rank Tarkovsky as one of the greatest filmmakers of all-time, I would be lying if I did not admit that I consider Bresson to be the superior auteur and Diary of a Country Priest to be superior to anything that the Russian director ever directed, even if it does not quite compete with the atmospheric aesthetic allure of films like Stalker (1979) and The Mirror (1975). After all, whereas Tarkovsky brings us religious imagery and great pangs of spiritual doubt, Bresson even provides cynical agnostics like myself a sort of cinematic spiritual experience that feels both timeless and perennial as a film that, somewhat inexplicably, feels like it could have been created before the birth of film. As to what separates Tarkovsky from Bresson and other master practitioners of transcendental style like Ozu and Dreyer, Schrader provided a worthy answer when he argued, "To my mind, Andrei Tarkovsky was not interested in the transcendental style per se. He had religious themes, obsessions, and characters. He was austere. He employed distancing devices. But his intent was different. A transcendental guide or guru or film director self-effacingly seeks to escort the respondent to another level of consciousness, a Wholly Other World. The transcendental film director is a 'spirit guide.' Tarkovsky was more interested in passing through the portal himself than he was in escorting his viewer." Indeed, Tarkovsky's The Mirror is one of my favorite films of all-time, but it seems like an experimental exercise in masturbatory nostalgia when compared to Bresson's great '(anti)coming-of-age' flicks like Au hasard Balthazar (1966) and Mouchette (1967). Arguably more importantly, at least to me, Bresson is one of the few filmmakers that, despite the oftentimes deathly dark subject matter of his films, gives me hope as he proved that great timeless and spiritual art could still be produced in the post-Spenglerian age. Indeed, as Richard Roud argued in his excellent text Cinema: A Critical Dictionary (1980) in regard to Bresson's penultimate masterpiece The Devil Probably, "Even though Bresson has painted a dark picture of wasted youth and beauty (Truffaut called it Bresson's most 'voluptuous film'), one came out of the film with a sense of exaltation. When a civilization can produce a work of art as perfectly achieved as this, it is hard to believe that there is not hope for it." Indeed, take that Spengler.

One of the reasons I found Christianity to be so revoltingly impotent as a child is due to the obsession with prayer and the sort of mindless docility and acceptance of misery it inspires, so I could not help but feel quite strongly when the young priest declares, "Never had I felt so violently the revolt of the body against prayer." Instead of praying like a pussy, the priest takes action in, somewhat ironically, an arguably Nietzschean sense and puts both his body and mind on the line while just getting by on cheap wine and stale bread to the point where it results in self-obliteration and he finally escapes from the prison of his body. Indeed, even after getting his terminal cancer diagnosis, the priest does not stop in his seemingly completely genuine acts of Catholic idealism to the point where he gets another priest, who has sinned with a woman and now styles himself as an enterprising intellectual, to replace him in the end. In that sense, the priest is a highly inspirational character like a fanatical artist not unlike Bresson himself. In fact, I could not help but think of Rainer Werner Fassbinder of all people and how the singular workaholic auteur was even working on a Rosa Luxemburg biopic script entitled Rosa L when he overdosed on cocaine and barbiturates. Diary of a Country Priest is not just the passion of a young priest, but also the passion of Bresson who revolutionized cinema in a way that the likes of contemporary pseudo-Bressonian art fags like Bruno Dumont and Gus Van Sant can only dream of.

Undoubtedly, film critic André Bazin probably paid the greatest tribute to the film when he argued at the end of his Cahiers du Cinéma essay on it, "It is hardly enough to say of this work, once removed, that it is in essence faithful to the original because, to being with, it is the novel. But most of all the resulting work is not, certainly, better (that kind of judgment is meaningless . . .) but 'more' than the book. The aesthetic pleasure we derive from Bresson's film, while the acknowledgement for it goes, essentially, to the genius of Bernanos, includes all that novel has to offer plus, in addition, its refraction in the cinema." In short, Bresson accomplished what very few filmmakers do by totally transcending his source material and ultimately demonstrating the true potential of cinema as an artistic medium. In fact, Bresson proved with his rather idiosyncratic Jansenist Weltanschauung and assumed Byzantium and Gothic influences in his adaptation of a 'modern' novel that, despite most movies being mindless trash that is meant to appeal to the lowest common denominator, cinema is the fullest and most advanced art form with the most potential for both aesthetic and thematic evolution. Indeed, while Schrader made a great point when he argued, "Motion pictures were not born in religious practice, but instead are the totally profane offspring of capitalism and technology. If a religious artist in cinema attempts to go back to his origins, he will find only entrepreneurs and technocrats. When the Holy tries to enter into the cinema, the intrinsically profane art, there are bound to be some unusual consequences," he was ultimately underscoring Bresson's singular genius as an artist that brought transcendence to a commercial medium and with Diary of a Country Priest, which somewhat ironically was a commercial success, he created one of the greatest pieces of art of the twentieth-century and one of the rare films that deserves to be revered to the same degree as great Gothic architecture, Byzantine icons, and other great artistic pieces associated with the Occident. While Nietzsche was probably mostly right when he wrote, "The Christian resolution to find the world ugly and bad, has made the world ugly and bad," Bresson's films would have probably at least make him reconsider. After all, as Roud soundly recognized, "By the end of the film, even the non-believer is forced to acknowledge that the little country priest is a saint—whatever that word may mean. His final liberation comes not only from his acceptance of his approaching and painful death, but from the knowledge that his conflicts have not really been with the Countess, or Chantal, or Seraphita, but with himself. And these conflicts are resolved: tout est grâce." Of course, Nietzsche also might a good point when he argued, "What do savage tribes at present accept first of all from Europeans? Brandy and Christianity, the European narcotics.—And by what means are they fastest ruined?—By the European narcotics," but somehow I doubt these savages could embrace the truly Christian Diary of a Country Priest even if they wanted to. After all, the film is the opposite of a narcotic and Europeans, not unlike Bresson, do Christianity best when coming from an ascetic angle as opposed to a pussy proto-humanist prayer version.

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST

-Ty E

MOUCHETTE

Robert Bresson (1967)

Out of all my ex-girlfriends, I can sincerely say that I only regard one as being a genuinely decent and selfless human being, which becomes all the more notable when one considers that she suffered a horribly abusive childhood and could have easily become a horrendous piece of shit like some many other people from similar backgrounds. Luckily for my ex, she is a distinctly beautiful babe with a perfect hourglass shape, more than ample derriere, and nice shapely tits, though she once had extremely poor self-esteem due to abusive family members, especially her exceedingly jealous mother, and thus could not even bask in her own singularly statuesque body. In fact, it was only until I routinely reminded her for a couple years that she actually became fully aware of her positively prepossessing pulchritude, though she never let it go to her head and instead developed an appreciation for feminine beauty in general. For those that do not know her and saw her on the street, this might seem completely inexplicable, especially considering so many modern American women have such bloated senses of self-worth, but such a miserable childhood involving alcoholic parents, including a violent bipolar mother, can certainly warp one's self-esteem, or so I sadly discovered during my relationship with her. While it has been nearly a decade since this specific ex-girlfriend and I broke up, I was recently reminded of her after watching the pastoral tragedy Mouchette (1967)—a film that, like the director's previous masterpiece Diary of a Country Priest (1951), was based on a novel of the same name by French Roman Catholic monarchist Georges Bernanos—directed by French master auteur Robert Bresson (Pickpocket, L'argent), who has indubitably become one of my favorite filmmakers in recent years. Indeed, the film, which was like virtual metaphysical Déjà vu for me, feels like a biographical depiction of my ex as a teenager, albeit set in 1960s bumfuck frogland, as the female lead Nadine Nortier not only resembles my ex in terms of appearance, gestures, and pantomimes, but her experiences and family situation is also eerily similar. Also like the heroine of Mouchette, my ex could be rather rude and crude (indeed, on top of being prone to mooning people for sport and thus exposing her arguable best physical attribute for free, she was not beneath mocking uppity negress aggressors to their faces with monkey sounds and racial slurs). While I certainly will not attempt to argue what is the superior film, I cannot help but admit that my emotional connection to Nortier's character was much stronger and more personal than that of Anne Wiazemsky's character in Bresson's previous (and somewhat similarly themed) masterpiece Au hasard Balthazar (1966). An unrivaled master of what he himself called the 'cinematograph,' Bresson demonstrates a sharp, intuitive, and uniquely unsentimental humanistic respect and empathy for an ultimately quite mean, vulgar, and unkempt teenager girl that no one seems to love or care for aside from her dying mother. Indeed, the eponymous lead is more than a little bit rough around the edges and her pain, misery, and heartbreaking dejection can be clearly read across her youthful yet ultimately terminally tragic face. A filmmaker that best described his own filmmaking style when he declared, "I limit myself to what is indispensable," it should be no surprise that Bresson constructed a film where pretty much every single frame of film and single sound is imperative, as if he somehow was able to capture every crucial moment in the last couple days of a girl that ultimately decided to choose death over life on a virtual whim. In that sense, Mouchette might be best described as an 'emotional autopsy' were it not so much more as one of the great works of truly transcendental cinema.

MOUCHETTE

Although it probably makes me sound like a proper scumbag, the reason I prefer the titular teen of Mouchette to the almost insufferably cutesy chick of Au hasard Balthazar is that I found the passivity of the latter when it came to her incessant victimhood to be somewhat infuriating, even if she was a being of angelic purity. Indeed, not unlike my ex-girlfriend, Mouchette decides to take revenge against the sick and pathetic alcohol-fueled society that uses and abuses her, though most of her actions are indubitably misguided, at least on a superficial level. In fact, the heroine oftentimes does repugnant and even downright sadistic things yet the viewer is able to easily sympathize with her due to Bresson's brilliance as a filmmaker that preferred the natural organic gestures and expressions of a non-actor (or what he called 'human models') to the counterfeit melodramatics, histrionics, and plastic posturing of many professional actors, or as he once wrote, "An actor in cinematography might as well be in a foreign country. He does not speak its language." Clearly influenced by Bresson, Louis Malle—a filmmaker that usually worked with popular actors, including Hollywood stars—followed the lesson of Mouchette by getting a real rural lumpenprole teen to portray the lead in his WWII era Vichy masterpiece Lacombe, Lucien (1974). As both films demonstrate, Bresson was certainly right when he wrote, "Respect man's nature without wishing it more palpable than it is," as the films derive their potency and intrigue through the authenticity of gesture and emotion as expressed by their non-actor leads. Although it is accepted among many film critics, including Charles Barr and Joseph Cunneen, that Mouchette is arguably Bresson's most accessible film, to me it was so much more as it felt like a beautifully bittersweet deluge of Déjà vu due to the female lead's authenticity of facial expressions and gestures, as if I was transported to some past alternate reality where my ex-girlfriend was a 1960s Provençal farm girl that opted to kill herself instead of going on with life. While Bresson made a number of films containing the timeless theme of suicide and thus can be regarded as the unequivocal maestro of self-slaughter cinema, there is really no other cinematic work in film history where the unpardonable sin seems so nonchalantly beautiful and metaphysically sound, though I initially found myself having a hard time detailing specifically why aside from acknowledging its particularly preternatural lack of premeditation. In that regard, the film's lead also reminds me of my ex (who, thankfully, never offed herself).

Undoubtedly, Mouchette clearly demonstrates that Jean-Luc Godard was right when he stated on the frog TV doc Un metteur en ordre: Robert Bresson in regard to his cinematic hero, "If I wanted to characterize Bresson, I said once in an interview that to me he's a Grand Inquisitor, someone who, despite the risk or violence involved, penetrates to the very depths of a human being." Of course, very few people would openly admit that they want to endure head-on the sort of soul-crushing experience that leads a cute teenager girl killing herself in the end. For example, in his entry on Bresson in Cinema: A Critical Dictionary (1980), film scholar and cineaste Richard Roud makes the somewhat dubious complaint, "Indeed, there is something almost sadistic in the way in which the girl is treated, not only by the other characters in the film but by Bresson as well. She is a victim, and he is unable to make anything more of her than that." Aside from his seeming incapacity to discern between sadism and deep empathy, Roud seems to be ignoring that the titular teen expresses free will, albeit in an oftentimes miserably misguided fashion that involves pelting classmates with mud and ultimately committing suicide. While one might be tempted to point to the annoyingly over referenced Nietzsche quote, "Beware that, when fighting monsters, you yourself do not become a monster... for when you gaze long into the abyss. The abyss gazes also into you," in regard to the tragic nature of the character, she expresses slight glimmers of hope just before destroying herself in a playful gesture of self-slaughter that is akin to a silly game. Like me with my ex, the viewer learns to love the film's heroine because of her coarseness, vulgarity, tactlessness, and gross naivety when it comes to confronting her life, thereupon making her suicide all the more heartbreaking yet somehow fitting and even liberating.

At the very beginning of the film, the viewer is introduced to a somber middle-aged woman (portrayed by French novelist Marie Cardinal) in a church that declares, "What will become of them without me? I can feel it in my breast." The woman in question is the titular protagonist's mother and she is terminally ill and thus naturally fears for the future of his poor dysfunctional family. Although barely a teenager, Mouchette has already had to take her dying bedridden mother's place at home and thus must care for her baby brother and clean and cook for her entire family, which also includes her ungrateful deadbeat alcoholic bootlegger father (Paul Hebert) and similarly scummy and swarthy brother. On top of her home life being fairly draining, virtually every other aspect of Mouchette's life is miserable and degrading, especially at school where she has no friends and is tormented by her fiercely frigid teacher. Aside from her dying mother, no one really seems to care about Mouchette, especially not her physically and emotionally abusive father. In short, the little lady heroine lives a life of perpetual misery, torment, and abuse as a child that rarely gets to experience the joys of being a child. In fact, the only time that Mouchette has any sort of reprieve from the sick sad joke that is her life is when she is able to briefly enjoy a bumper car ride at a local fair after a somewhat mysterious young mother randomly gives her a token for said ride. Being ill-equipped to socialize, especially with members of the opposite sex, Mouchette uses crashing her bumper car into that of a young boy's car as a strangely touching means of flirting. Rather unfortunately, the heroine musters up courage and makes an attempt to talk to the boy after the ride, but her deadbeat dipsomaniac dad slaps her in the face just as she invitingly smiles at the lad, who is wearing bourgeois and is probably a sort of dream boy for the heroine. From there, everything goes downhill for the poor little dame.

MOUCHETTE

In Mouchette's pathetic gin-fueled village, there is a sort of sexual rivalry between a swarthy epileptic poacher named Arsène (Jean-Claude Gilbert of Bresson's previous film Au hasard Balthazar) and a somewhat older gamekeeper named Mathieu (Jean Vimenet) because the two are both in love with a somewhat bitchy young barmaid with a blonde dyke cut named Louisa (Marine Trichet). While Arsène is a middle-aged loner that somewhat resembles Mouchette's father in terms of his decidedly dirty deadbeat appearance and overall sleazy character, Mathieu is a respected married man (who just happens to be in love with a woman that is clearly not his wife). One day after wandering into the woods after school and getting lost in a rainstorm that she confuses for a 'cyclone,' Mouchette encounters Arsène during a less than auspicious moment after he wrongly assumes that he has killed his rival Mathieu during a drunk brawl. Rather disturbingly, although Mouchette, whole clearly senses a kindred spirit as a fellow loner that is hated by local, treats the pathetic poacher with inordinate affection, comforts and sings to him when he suffers a rather unnerving seizure, and proudly promises to provide him with an alibi for his ostensible murder of Mathieu, Arsène decides to pay her back by getting her drunk and raping her. While Mouchette initially ruthlessly fights Arsène off when he is attempting to rape her, she eventually embraces her involuntary deflowering by warmly wrapping her arms around him once he penetrates her. Not surprisingly, she later proudly states to Mathieu's wife, "Mr. Arsène's my lover. Ask him. He'll tell you," thereupon underscoring her depressingly misguided view of romance and affection and overall social retardation. Of course, as a young peasant girl that has local boys routinely flashing their cocks at her, Mouchette does not exactly have a healthy background for understanding sex and romance.

While it is somewhat arguable as to what the true catalyst is that leads to her suicide, Mouchette's mother's death certainly does not help and ultimately leads her on a morbidly melancholic road to self-annihilation. Indeed, despite being aware of the fact that her mother has just died, everyone seems to gang up on Mouchette on the day after she loses her sole loving parent, as if she lives in a village occupied by frogland's most sadistic, hateful, and most frigid individuals. For example, her pathetic (non)father calls her a “little hussy” right after he mother dies, henceforth inspiring Mouchette to loudly yell “merde” (aka “shit”) and then wander the village where she is met with unwarranted abuse after abuse from an eclectic range of individuals that includes teenage boys and bitter old farts. On a quest to find her baby brother some milk, Mouchette goes to the local grocery store where the female grocer gives her a croissant and tells her that she is sorry about her mother, but then calls her a “little slut” after the hapless heroine accidentally breaks a bowl of coffee and then post-coital scratches on her chest subsequently become quite noticeable to the bitchy busybody. Upon being randomly invited into gamekeeper Mathieu’s house under dubious pretenses, the man’s wife attempts to get Mouchette to admit that Arsène got her drunk and raped her as the old woman realizes she reeks of gin from the night before, but she refuses to give up her self-described “lover,” thus revealing her sick (yet nonetheless understandable) sense of solidarity with the village’s foremost misfit criminal. After refusing to collude with the gamekeeper and his wife in bringing down her rapist, Mouchette visits an exceedingly elderly woman that almost seems like a sort of female Grim Reaper who engages in ‘ancestor worship’ and proudly declares, “I love the dead. I understand them.” When Mouchette demonstrates her somewhat strange sense of contempt for the old woman by rebelliously grinds mud onto a fancy rug with her oversized clogs, the odd old-timer remains eerily calm and simply states, “Are you asleep? Your heart’s asleep. Don’t wake it too fast. You have time enough.” Clearly not wanting her help, Mouchette hatefully states to the old woman, “You disgusting old thing,” to which she calmly replies, “I only want to help you. You’re being mean. It’s because you can’t understand. There’s evil in your eyes.” Despite her rather rude and hateful behavior, the old woman gives the female protagonist a burial shroud for her mother’s corpse and some dresses. As to why Mouchette is so mean and rude to the old woman, it seems that she fears she will grow up to be an eccentric loner and recluse just like her, thus assumedly giving her just one more reason to commit suicide.

As if being egged on by the universe to off herself, Mouchette witnesses, among other things, the horrific sight of cutesy rabbits being gunned down by local hunters while taking a scenic stroll in the country (notably, the film actually features authentic footage of rabbits being killed and it is surprisingly grisly, thus forcing the viewer to confront the discomfort that the heroine feels). When the heroine reaches a grimly placid pond, she wraps a white muslin dress that the old woman gave to her around her body and then proceeds to roll down a hill in what just seems to be simple innocent childish fun, at least initially. Unfortunately, the final nail in the casket occurs for Mouchette when she attempts to wave to a man on a large tractor and he completely ignores her. After that, Mouchette decides to roll down the hill two more times and on her final attempt she accomplishes her goal of falling into the pond where she drowns in what is indubitably the sereneſt and moſt ſublime depiction of ſuicide in cinema hiſtory. In the end, the film comes full circle with the ſoothing ſounds of “Magnificat” from Italian composer Claudio Monteverdi’s Baroque Psalm composition ‘Vespers for the Blessed Virgin.’ As Bresson ſtated in an interview with Yvonne Baby featured in the March 14, 1967 issue of the newspaper Le Monde in regard to the ſignificance of this composition, “The music isn’t about ſuſtenance or reinforcement; it precedes and it concludes. It envelops the film in Chriſtianity. It was neceſſary.”

MOUCHETTE

While I admittedly found the conclusion of Mouchette to be inordinately beautiful, I also found it to be somewhat heartbreaking for personal reasons as the titular teen juſt as eaſily could have been my ex-girlfriend. Indeed, before we got together, she did quite mindleſſly reckless things like overdose on cough ſyrup during a failed excursion in ‘robo-tripping’ in between getting in fights with her mother that led to her being almoſt literally ſtrangled to death. Luckily, quite unlike the film’s tragic heroine, my ex is now a happily married mother with a child that receives the love and affection she deſerved but never received as a child. Of course, Bresson’s film made me realize that she juſt as eaſily could have ſuccumbed to ſome miſerable, pathetic, and/or pointleſſly tragic fate had circumſtances in her life been ſlightly different. In that ſenſe, Mouchette was eaſily the moſt potent film I have ever ſeen dealing with the ſubject of ſuicide, which of course Bresson was the unequivocal maſter of as also demonstrated by his later works like Une femme douce (1969) aka A Gentle Woman and Le diable probalement (1977) aka The Devil Probably. Of course, the eponymous heroine’s final act is like a poor vulgar country prole equivalent to ‘A Gentle Creature’ in the Doſtoevskian ſenſe (after all, like the real-life ſeamſtreſs that inſpired Doſtoevsky’s titular ſhort ſtory, Bresson’s character is an example of a “meek ſuicide” that “keeps haunting you for a long time”). As Joseph Cunneen rightly noted in his book Robert Bresson: A Spiritual Style in Film (2003), “MOUCHETTE is perhaps the moſt touching of Bresson’s films, and its poetic realism ſucceeds in giving the girl’s ‘ſuicide’ the overtones of liberation. The film is emotionally accessible to a broad public, except for thoſe who are unable to ſee anything but bleakneſs in its ending.” Indeed, arguably the moſt ſhocking aſpect of the film is how unſhocking the ſuicide really is, which is a teſtament to Bresson’s ſingular genius as a genuine humaniſtic artiſt.

Although I have mixed feelings about ſuicide and the integrity (or lack thereof) involved with ſuch a truly permanent act, Mouchette certainly made me rethink it from a philoſophical perſpective. In fact, the film inſpired to revisit E. M. Cioran’s arguable magnum opus A Short Hiſtory of Decay (1949) aka Précis de decomposition, moſt ſpecifically his aphoriſtic eſſay ‘My Heroes’ where he argues, “When we are young we look for heroes. I have had mine: Kleiſt, Karoline von Günderröde, Nerval, Otto Weininger. . . . Intoxicated by their ſuicides, I was certain that they alone had gone to the end, that they drew, in death, the right conclusion from their thwarted or fulfilled loves, from their broken minds or philosophic pain. That a man should survive his passion was enough to make him contemptible or abject in my eyes: which is to say that humanity was superfluous. I discovered in it an infinitesimal number of lofty resolutions and so much compromise with life that I turned away from it, determined to put an end to it all before I was thirty. But as the years went by, I lost the pride of youth: each day, like a lesson in humility, I reminded myself that I was still alive, that I was betraying my dreams among men rotten with . . . life. Exasperated by the expectation of no longer existing, I considered it a duty to cleave my flesh when dawn broke after a night of love, and that it was a nameless degradation to sully by memory an excess of sighs. Or, at other moments, how was one to insult duration further, when one had grasped everything in a dilation which enthrones pride in the very heavens? I thought that the only action a man could perform without shame was to take his life, that he had no right to diminish himself in the succession of days and the inertia of misery. Not elect, I kept telling myself, but those who committed suicide. Even now, I have more esteem for a concierge who hangs himself than for a living poet. Man is provisionally exempt from suicide: that is his one glory, his one excuse. But he is not aware of it, and calls cowardice the courage of those who dared to raise themselves by death above themselves. We are bound together by a tacit pact to go on to the last breath: this pact which cements our solidarity dooms us nonetheless—our entire race is stricken by its infamy. Without suicide, no salvation. Strange! that death, thought eternal, has not become part of our ‘behavior’: sole reality, it cannot become a vogue. Thus, as living men, we are all retarded. . . .”Of course, it is ironically the ‘pride of youth’ that gives the titular heroine of the film the nerve enact felo-de-se with such fierce yet playfully executed finality, though she clearly does not need a deep philosophical argument to off herself, which makes her self-obliteration all the more ‘pure’ and morbidly intriguing (indeed, personally I find the stereotypical ‘bourgeois intellectual suicide’ to be mostly banal, if not downright completely cliché). When Mouchette’s mother warns her just before croaking, “Make sure you never get taken in by lazy workmen or drunks,” not long after she is raped by the most loathsome of drunken deadbeat lumpenproles, it becomes all too painfully clear that her life is already a devastatingly fatalistic disaster and that her future will indubitably be plagued with unending pain, misery, and abuse. Although even somewhat immature for her age as indicated by her cravenly childish bullying of her classmates and preposterously nihilistic displays of fruitless rebellion, the heroine certainly has a certain intuitive wisdom that is beyond her years on a visceral level that not even Cioran—the well educated son of an Orthodox priest who, compared to most Romanians of his era, had a relatively comfortable upbringing—could comprehend, at least not instinctually. Either way, it is impossible to be angry with

MOUCHETTE

Mouchette for her actions.

Undoubtedly, one really realizes the brilliance of Mouchette when one considers that Bresson simply saw it as a sort of experiment or “essai” (aka “exercise”). Indeed, as Bresson confided to Godard in a May 1966 interview featured in Cahiers du Cinéma in regard to his objective with the film, “Instead of a whole group of lives and different characters . . . I want to concentrate, constantly, absolutely, on one face, the face of this little girl, to see her reactions. . . . And I will choose, yes, the most awkward little girl there is, and try to draw from her everything that she will not suspect I am drawing from her. That is what interests me, and the camera will not leave her.” While I have obviously never met Nadine Nortier and was not even born until almost two decades after the film was released, there is no doubt in my mind that Bresson managed to capture her completely organic expressions in all their coarseness, vulgarity, tactlessness, awkwardness and youthful purity. Surely, it is no coincidence that the very first aphorism of Bresson’s rather short yet completely invaluable text Notes on the Cinematographer (1975) is, “Rid myself of the accumulated errors and untruths. Get to know my resources, make sure of them,” as Mouchette, like virtually all of the filmmaker’s great works, does not contain a single false note or second of filler. Indeed, as the film reveals, André Bazin was right when he wrote that Bresson is “concerned not with the psychology but with the physiology of existence,” though it is impossible to not assume things about Nortier’s character’s psychology when confronted with her rather unforgettable physiology.

Although I will not attempt any sort of theological interpretation of Mouchette in regard to the heroine’s suicide, film scholar turned auteur Paul Schrader, who incidentally recently completed his own rather Bressonian film First Reformed (2017), provides a good argument in his sole book Transcendental Style In Film (1972) when he states, “Intertwined with the abjuration of the body in Bresson’s films is the vexing problem of suicide: If the body enslaves the soul, why not destroy the body and be free? St. Ambrose stated the case quite clearly: ‘Let us die, if we may leave, or if we be denied leave, yet let us die. God cannot be offended with this, when we use it for a remedy,’ and Augustine and Aquinas rushed to counter the argument. Marvin Zeman, in an essay on suicide in Bresson’s films, has demonstrated that Bresson, particularly in his later films, has come to associate himself with a radical wing of Christianity (including, among others, St. Ambrose, John Donne, and George Bernanos) which regards suicide as a positive good.” Charles Barr certainly provides support for Schrader’s claim when he argued in his essay on Mouchette featured in the book The Films Of Robert Bresson (1969) that, “Her suicide is right; and Bresson gets from us, certainly, the ‘stock’ responses to such a suicide – pity for her, disgust for those who caused it. But, to go back to the point I started on, he quite excludes the often almost inseparable shallower response, the impulse to despair of the world, but rather to luxuriate in hopelessness, as in Shelley’s lines ‘I could lie down like a tired child / And weep away [this] life of care'. The 'tired child' here does nothing like this." Indeed, in her own dubious way, the heroine achieves transcendence by escaping the seemingly perennial void of her own painfully dead-end earthly existence. If Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn was right when he wrote, "The meaning of earthly existence lies not, as we have grown used to thinking, in prospering but in the development of the soul," one can see why Mouchette chose death over life as she seemed to be foredoomed to a forsaken existence that would have only all the more warped and debased her already rather damaged soul, thus her suicide seems like an act of (seemingly subconscious) self-salvation. Notably, Bresson would even admit in an interview with Napoléon Murat featured in the March 16, 1967 issue of Le Figaro littéraire when questioned about despair in source writer Bernanos' work that, "If there is despair in his work, it's due to an error in the writing, more likely due to poor reading. Even suicide . . . Mouchette's, for example—Bernanos says this in so many words—is not cause for despair. Her innocence, her terror are like those of an animal being tracked. In the film there's a parallel between the game bird and Mouchette. For her, death isn't an end, a finality (Bernanos dixit) but, on the contrary, it's a beginning. She's waiting for a revelation."

At the very end of his interview with Georges Sadoul featured in the March 16, 1967 issue of the French literary publication Les Lettres Françaises, Bresson reveals his surprising sense of humility by remarking in a rhetorical fashion, "I wonder if my films are worth the effort they require." For me, the simple answer to his (non)question is that, in terms of quality, Bresson's films provide a value that is probably worth more than every single film associated with the La Nouvelle Vague combined, as they do the seemingly inexplicable by providing a spiritual experience in celluloid form that will follow (or, some might say, 'haunt') the viewer for the rest of their lives, which is certainly no small accomplishment for any serious artist. After recently revisiting Dead Poets Society (1989)—a film directed by an Australian auteur that I have always had great respect for—my belief that Mouchette features the greatest suicide scene in cinema history has only been reinforced. Indeed, famous for its scene near the end where Robert Sean Leonard's character commits suicide because his uptight father will not allow him to pursue his dream of becoming a theater fag, the famous offing scene in Dead Poets Society ultimately seems like a cheap melodramatic ritual when compared to the transcendental majesty of Bresson's depiction of spontaneous teenage self-termination. Even after writing this long ass review, I feel that words are simply inadequate when it comes to describing the great joyous passion of little Mouchette's suicide, no matter how sick or demented that sounds.

-Ty E

LANCELOT OF THE LAKE
LANCELOT OF THE LAKE

Robert Bresson (1974)

A number of years ago, I started binge-watching various TV series and eventually encountered a new show I never heard of called Game of Thrones. As a fan of HBO original series like The Sopranos, Oz, and Carnivàle and classic epic fantasy flicks like John Boorman's Excalibur (1981), I had no reason to suspect that I would dislike the show and—at least for a couple seasons—I was proven right as I found the mostly-all-European cast and sometimes brutal fight scenes to be rather refreshing compared to most of the xenophiliac crypto-commie crap that passes for popular entertainment. Of course, as someone that was told as a very young impressionable kid by a much older faux-sword-wielding cousin that he was a medieval knight in a former life, the show naturally also had personal appeal for me in the true fantasy sense. Rather unfortunately, over the years, the show has become more and more insanely popular despite its glaring overall declining quality and has become a sort of sports-ball equivalent for craft-beer-fetishizing urban chic hipsters at dive bars as demonstrated by the countless radically retarded reaction videos on YouTube, yet I kept watching the show in the naïve hope that the Night King and his army of undead Aryan Übermensch White Walkers would destroy the entire world in a glorious end-of-the-world showdown where death—and only death—prevails in a truly apocalyptic fashion that concludes with a Säuberung of all of humanity. Of course, being a show penned by two Hebraic hacks that did not have the benefit of relying on source material for the last couple seasons because source writer George R. R. Martin (who, incidentally, recently magically discovered that he was about 1/4 chosenite after a genetic test for the PBS show Finding Your Roots) seems to suffer from perennial writer's block (or, probably more accurately, he seems to have written himself into a corner), the final season is innately idiotic shit and involves a number of patently preposterous and carelessly contrived deus ex machine scenarios, including a virtual little girl inexplicably killing the most powerful supernatural creature in the entire world in what is arguably the most painful cinematic 'ruined orgasm' scenario in all of moving picture history. While coethnic show creators David Benioff and D. B. Weiss—two proud beneficiaries of nepotism that are so severely hated by die hard GoT fans that they are affectionately known as 'dumb and dumber'—try to justify their shitty writing under the guise of 'subverting expectations,' it is clearly motivated to some degree by atavistic racial hatred and contempt, hence its gleeful kabalistic approach to warping and distorting perennial European myths and archetypes (surely, it is nothing short of painfully symbolic that former CIA Deputy Director David S. Cohen, who is the brother-in-law of Benioff, had a cameo on the show). Needless to say, after foolishly enduring such asinine aesthetic terrorism, I felt the need for complete cinematic purification in the form of immersing myself in real European medieval fantasy that is everything that GoT is not and naturally decided on re-watching Lancelot of the Lake (1974) aka Lancelot du Lac directed by French master auteur Robert Bresson (Pickpocket, Au Hasard Balthazar). Unlike GoT, which tries to pass off cheap gratuitous sex and violence and an alien hatred for ancient European archetypes as being brilliantly 'subversive' (undoubtedly, resentment-driven 'culture distortion' is a more apt description), Bresson's film is the real delightfully Delphic deal as a seriously subversive piece of arcane yet assiduous Arthurian cinema that thankfully does not depict an insultingly idiotic fantasy world where dipsomaniacal dwarfs, all-noble eunuchs, foreign savages, and potty-mouthed little girls are the greatest and most heroic moral crusaders and a tiny tom-boy magically defeats literal death in icy anthropomorphic form. Magnificently metaphysically morose and melancholic in its great tragedy, like Christ's still-warm corpse trampled on by a wandering band of money-changers on a humid mosquito-ridden night, the film utilizes the great Occidental myths of the past to depict foredoomed spirit of the present in a manner that can almost be described as Cioranian sans the gleeful cynicism and spiritual sterility.

Whereas Game of Thrones concludes in a manner that is more underwhelming, insipid, and morally retarded than one might expect from the weed-whacked fan fiction of a considerably mentally feeble Moroccan teenage sociopath and was clearly written by sickeningly self-satisfied speds with a clear kosher contempt for their audience where marvelously Michael Bay-esque spectacle is supreme and narrative consistency is, at best, a sad secondary concern, Lancelot of the Lake is a spiritually stark yet deathly devout Arthurian tone poem that basks in the inevitably tragic and depicts knightly battle as appropriately entertaining as a blood-splattered abattoir and as romantic as the cold blue bloated corpse of an unfaithful soul mate. Austerely apocalyptic, the film depicts a somewhat anachronistic realm of deluded desires and dead dreams where people oftentimes pray to god yet he never responds and where the disappearance of the Grail is symbolic of man's moral and spiritual descent. While not romantic in the 'traditional' sense, the film is certainly equipped with a sort of uniquely understated lovelorn pathos as personified by the tragic ill-fated love affair of the eponymous protagonist Lancelot and his beloved mistress Queen Guinevere as they sneak around the shadows like forsaken somnambulists that haven't quite considered that they might already be in hell. Of course, the forlorn dark romance does not stop there as Lancelot's moody and broody men also perish under lamentable circumstances, including his young protégé and best friend Gawain, who tragically dies at the hand of the man he loves yet still manages to express with a certain degree of unforgettable ghostly resonance the last dying words, "my heart is with him." And, despite their glaring flaws and all the more glaringly dejecting demeanors, your heart cannot help but also be with Lancelot and his knights, thereupon making the sting of their brutal demise all the more indelible just as any great Bresson character, no matter how 'model-like.'

LANCELOT OF THE LAKE

Right from the get-go, Bresson establishes an eerily yet exquisitely morbid tone with premonitions of things to come in the form of brutal battle scenes, including the senseless destruction of religious icons, knights being decapitated and taking blades to the genitals, and skeletons (still sporting plate amour) hanging from trees while being pecked at by crows. From there, the film opens with a prologue spelled out in blood-red-letters unfolding on an image of a chalice (aka the Holy Grail) that reads: "After marvelous adventures in which Lancelot of the Lake played a heroic part, the Knights of the Round Table set off in search of the Grail. The Grail was a vessel in which Joseph of Arimathea had gathered the blood of Christ. It was to bestow supernatural power. It was believed hidden in Brittany. Merlin, before his death, pledged the knights to the quest. Merlin had indicated that the quest should be led by Perceval (Parsifal), not by Lancelot. After leaving the castle, the knights were dispersed. Perceval was not seen again. Two years have passed. Decimated, the knights return to King Arthur and Queen Guinevere. They have not found the Grail." After the prologue, the viewer encounters another unsettling premonition where an old woman declares to her assumed granddaughter, "He whose footfalls precede him will die within a year." When the granddaughter points out that she said the same exact thing the previous day, the old woman ominously replies, "It is the same omen for them all." In what ultimately proves to be a less than auspicious scene, Lancelot (Luc Simon), who (quite symbolically) got lost after a disastrous battle that claimed the lives of many of his men, then appears to the old woman and asks for directions so that he can get back to his camp. Of course, things only go downhill from there as the film progresses and Bresson leaves it up to the viewer to speculate as to why the knights could not find the Grail and why Camelot and the Round Table eventually completely fall apart. While Lancelot's treacherous love affair with his beloved king's wife certainly contributes to this, there are other (seemingly much darker) forces involved that hint at a certain collective forsaken state of man, as if all hope and goodness has been extinguished from the world, hence the staying power of Bresson's film in the increasingly spiritually and culturally necrotizing Occident.

I hate to sound like a simple knuckle-dragging mamzer, but arguably the most potent theme of Lancelot of the Lake is the particularly precarious nature of putting pussy on a pedestal, especially in an all-male context, and how a single woman can lead to the destruction of an entire male order, though Bresson apparently had a more romantic view of the situation as indicated by his words, "Lancelot and Guinevere are like Tristan and Isolde without the love potion. A predestined love, a passionate love facing impossible obstacles. This love and its fluctuations provide the movement of the film." Indeed, to quote the GoT character Maester Aemon played by the late great Peter Vaughan (Straw Dogs, The Remains of the Day), "Love is the death of duty," or so the titular antihero and his comrades discover the hard way. For being a patently poorly written show that attempted to pass off the bastardization of classic fantasy conventions as brilliant displays of literary subversion, especially during the last couple seasons, Game of Thrones did have its memorable moments of perennial truth and Maester Aemon's words ultimately inspire the show's hero Jon Snow to more or less save the world by selflessly sacrificing his love and killing his demented dragon bitch lover-cum-aunt who, among other things, used foreign brown hordes to carry out a full-blown genocide of Dresden-esque proportions because her 'feelings were hurt.' In Lancelot of the Lake, the titular hero also decides to sacrifice his love, but it ultimately proves to be too-little-too-late. Notably, as Bresson wrote in an essay entitled 'Torn Between Fidelity and Felony' in regard to the film, "I am a Christian filmmaker. But I have no intention of drawing a parallel between our secularized culture and a previous time when people lived lives of exalted faith. I didn't make LANCELOT to elaborate on a parable. Our hero is aware of his responsibility for the failure to find the Grail; I'm interested in how he is torn between fidelity and felony, love and purity. He's a man crushed by the machine of a destiny shaped by luck and predestination. . . . There is neither conversion nor redemption in my film—unlike some other stories about the Knights of the Round Table. Nonetheless, Lancelot's remorse could be seen as the beginning of atonement. . . . I am absolutely not the Jansenist people sometimes call me. . . . except maybe when it has to do with form." As Bresson's words indicate, he completely subverts expectations and, quite unlike the Hebraic GoT hacks, brings aesthetic honor to his cultural heritage in a largely aesthetically bankrupt age without honor. In that sense, Bresson follows in the footsteps of his Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne (1945) collaborator Jean Cocteau in terms of taking a respectably subversive modernist approach to classic European myths.

Notably once describing the absence of the ever elusive Grail as its "secret engine," Bresson somewhat curiously made the film after deciding to dedicate his career to 'contemporary' cinema as opposed to period pieces, so it is only natural that it is inordinately contemporary in the metaphysical sense. Indeed, as Bresson stated himself, "I think the temptation of modern life was constantly with me; it was brought up by the events in LANCELOT. Even religious faith: How could I forget the current crisis in the Church? I wanted to title the film THE GRAIL, precisely because of the intensity of the Grail's absence throughout the film." Surely, after watching a film as decidedly dispiriting and hypnotically hopeless yet as strikingly transcendental as Lancelot of the Lake, it is no surprise that Bresson followed it up with Le Diable probablement (1977) aka The Devil, Probably where suicide seems to be the only true reprieve from the superlatively spiritually/culturally/politically bankrupt world of (post)modernity. Indeed, in many ways, Bresson's almost intolerably hopeless (anti)Arthurian tragedy foreshadows the suffocating Weltschmerz and despondency that afflicts the characters of the auteur's singularly bleak last couple of films. In other words, although a masterpiece in its own right, Lancelot of the Lake—a fantasy flick that is carefully stripped-down to the bare essentials and mostly glaringly devoid of the escapist elements that typically define fantasy flicks—feels like a sort of imperative cinematic initiation for The Devil, Probably and the auteur's swansong L'Argent (1983).

LANCELOT OF THE LAKE

While probably not Bresson's intent, it is surely strikingly symbolic that Queen Guinevere is portrayed by Laura Duke Condominas, who is the daughter of decidedly degenerate French-American feminist sculptor and sometimes filmmaker Niki de Saint-Phalle. Aside from the fact that Condominas was married to a man that was associated with the Zanzibar Group—a counterculture experimental cinema (micro)movement that was led by alienated (and mostly long-haired) youth not unlike the characters of The Devil, Probably—her mother de Saint-Phalle demonstrated with her incest-driven experimental feature Daddy (1973) a fiercely forsaken spirit that could not be further from the Grail in terms of spirit. Still, despite her madre's debauched essence and association with a bunch of frog hippie weirdos, Condominas could not be more immaculate in her forsakenly lovelorn gloom in Lancelot of the Lake as she manages to keep both Lancelot and the viewer hopelessly leashed to her penetratingly pensive pulchritudinous despite her complete and utter lack of sexually suggestive behavior. Indeed, Condominas' Queen Guinevere ostensibly bleeds purity despite cuckolding her honorable royal husband and, in turn, completely compromising the very existence of the Knights of the Round Table. Of course, to go back to Maester Aemon: "What is honor compared to a woman's love?" While the singularly honorable Lancelot virtually unwittingly unleashes a knightly Ragnarök due to his betrayal, the film makes it almost seem worth it, at least for a second, hence the true timeless tragedy of it all. In that sense, quite unlike most cinema, Bresson's film is as timeless as the ancient parable that inspired it despite its sometimes glaring aesthetic anachronisms.

While Queen Guinevere's infidelity and Lancelot's treachery surely act as the catalyst to the virtually apocalyptic downfall of Camelot, certain feminine tendencies among certain very resentful effete males also contribute to the destruction of the Knights of the Round Table. While Lancelot's betrayal is at least somewhat understandable, his longtime enemy Mordred (Patrick Bernhard)—a cowardly little toad that acts as a central source of chaos inside Camelot—is an innately repugnant creature without even the remotest redeemable qualities and he arguably plays the most crucial role in collapsing the kingdom. When all the Knights went to battle in a tragic event that led to the deaths of many of the members of the Round Table and disappearance of the Grail, Mordred—a sniveling "virgin sword" that cons others into doing his fighting for him—stayed behind with the women. Ostensibly a knight yet seemingly completely unwilling to fight, Mordred undoubtedly makes Queen Guinevere seem look like a naively innocent virgin as far as negative feminine qualities are concerned as he is a prissy yet quite pernicious passive-aggressive narcissist and compulsive coward that, instead of offering Lancelot's friendship, conspires like GoT queen bitch Cersei Lannister to use the most craven of means to destroy the protagonist and takeover Camelot. As even Gawain remarks to Lancelot in regard to Mordred's refusal of peace, "For much lesser affronts, you've drawn your sword and struck at the heart." Needless to say, Mordred believes he has all the ammo he needs to destroy Lancelot when he learns of his affair with Queen Guinevere and he even conspires to have the protagonist assassinated, declaring his followers, "His blood on the floor here will unmask the adulterous traitor." While the assassination plot is an abject failure and Lancelot manages to avert a battle with King Arthur by voluntarily relinquishing his ladylove, Mordred destroys everything by unexpectedly capturing the castle in an apocalyptic battle that concludes with seemingly every single character dying, including the horses. Indeed, in a deceptively ominous forest, men die from blood loss via their genitals while renegade archers pick them off from the comfort of trees. As for Lancelot, he cries out "Guinevere" and then collapses next to a pile of his dead comrades, including his king.

Notably, in the imperative (yet somewhat dated) film resource Cinema: A Critical Dictionary (1980), Richard Roud argues in regard to Bresson's great accomplishment with the film, "Psychologically, the film is his richest—for it is not a simple triangle story. There is also Gawain (Gauvain), who is presented as Lancelot's best friend and also in love with Guinevere—and yet loyal to both Arthur and Lancelot. Between these four characters there is a tension which is all the stronger because it is never clearly defined. Although the film ends in total destruction, there is a kind of transcendent radiance in the relations between the main characters because of the way in which Bresson portrays this birth of desire and a more exalted form of passion. And it is from this struggle that LANCELOT derives its strength and luminosity and that sense of physical and spiritual exaltation that had been absent in Bresson's oeuvre since PICK-POCKET." Indeed, the film leaves the indelible sting that comes with the death of beauty; the beauty of young porcelain-like epicene bodies and a sort of emotional war between true love, true friendship, and honor, hence the true tragedy of it all. In its brazenly brutal climactic depiction of archers killing the knights from trees with the comfort of knowing they do not even have to face their victims, the film also alludes to the Battle of Crécy (26 August 1346), which marked the beginning of the end of knights after the English effortlessly decimated the French with the longbow; or, in short, the death of honor and heroism following the Middle Ages and evolution of technology and, in turn, rise of emotionally detached/dishonorable forms of warfare (notably, such a scenario is not just typical of Occidental cinema, as it is poetically depicted in Japanese auteur Masaki Kobayashi's masterpiece Harakiri (1962) when three Ashigaru contemptibly use matchlock guns to kill the film's protagonist as he stoically commits seppuku). As Roud noted in this regard, "Ostensibly the subject of the film is the self-thwarting love of Lancelot and Guinevere, but it is also—or even more—a film about the end of the Middle Ages. The impossible quest for the Grail has ended in failure, and the impossible dream of an ideal society has also proved unworkable. It is not accident that Bresson ends the film with the slaughter of the knights by foot-soldiers with cross-bows. This may not be historically accurate, but this is not a realistic film. Nevertheless, it presents us with a view of feudal society that is marred by none of the complacency or sentimentality of films like LES VISITEURS DU SOIR." Of course, the death of true belief and spirituality would also follow, hence the disappearance of the Grail.

LANCELOT OF THE LAKE

Since it is probably impossible to gauge the true aesthetic influence of a film as understatedly masterful as Lancelot of the Lake, it almost seems like an act of heretical cinephilia to argue that Bresson was probably somewhat influenced by younger filmmakers, namely Philippe Garrel and his early experimental parables like Le Lit de la Vierge (1969) aka The Virgin's Bed and La cicatrice intérieure (1972) aka The Inner Scar. Of course, Garrel was obviously heavily influenced by Bresson himself and never quite achieved the maturity and influence of the old master who, quite unlike any other filmmaker, demonstrated a unrivaled understanding of younger generations well into his golden years as is especially obvious in The Devil, Probably. One cannot also forget that Garrel was associated with the Zanzibar Group, which Lancelot of the Lake female lead Laura Duke Condominas was also associated with. Undoubtedly, in its beautifully brutal and audaciously anachronistic approach to ancient European myth, Yvan Lagrange's underrated Tristan et Iseult (1972) is insanely idiosyncratically Bressonian in the best sort of way. While utilizing slightly more supernatural elements, Dutch auteur Jos Stelling's debut feature Mariken van Nieumeghen (1974) can almost be described as brutally Bressonian due to its uncompromisingly unflattering depiction of humanity and no bullshit approach to death and destruction. Speaking of Dutch filmmakers, Paul Verhoeven's Flesh+Blood (1985)—a sort of proto-Game of Thrones that subverts classic fantasy archetypes and is full of blood, boobs, and barbarism—is like Bresson meets Hollywood. It is also certainly fitting that Perceval is MIA in Lancelot of the Lake as Éric Rohmer's Perceval (1978) could not be more different than Bresson's film in terms of its absurd artifice, flowery fantasy, and preposterous pageantry.

Notably, in his virtual cinematic manifesto Notes on the Cinematograph (1975)—a tiny book that is certainly worth its weight in gold where the auteur reveals his cinematic ideas and philosophy in aphoristic form—Bresson declares, "Cinematography, a military art. Prepare a film like a battle." Of course, Bresson's words are dually true in regard to Lancelot of the Lake, which also can be described as embodying both the original French military meaning and contemporary artistic meaning of the word 'avant-garde.' Undoubtedly, it is strangely fitting that the Arthurian avant-garde led by the titular lead of the film is exterminated in the end by a more technically advanced group of archers that are fighting in the name of a cowardly traitor as it not only foreshadows the future of Arthurian cinema and (European) cinema as a whole, but the Occident in general; just as it is strangely fitting that gay mischling SS-Obersturmführer Otto Rahn ultimately committed suicide under rather dubious circumstances after his noble yet hopelessly naive failed real-life attempt to find the Holy Grail. While Game of Thrones and the books based on it played at attempting to be 'subversive' in the realm of epic fantasy (it is probably no coincidence that George R. R. Martin was heavily influenced by kosher frog Maurice Druon), they ultimately represent failed exercises of nihilism as less than nobly sired by aesthetically hostile racial aliens that have only contempt (and ultimately nil innate understanding) of the ancient Occidental archetypes they frivolously play with. Indeed, whereas GoT is nothing more than normie entertainment that ultimately proved to excel in little more than execrable escapism in its final season, Lancelot of the Lake represents the apocalyptic state of an ancient myth and ultimately an organic representation the sick soul of Europa.

Indeed, in its depiction of a morosely moribund männerbund that accepts total death before dishonor, the film also celebrates the European spirit in its twilight. Of course, the all-too-pretty long-haired hippie knights with anachronistic fruity lime-green tights more than hint at Occidental decline, but it is better that they accept death in battle than a slow degenerative decline, just as it would be ideal if Europe went out in a Götterdämmerung over the slow and painful humiliation that is the insanely insidious and innately anti-European globohomo game plan of the present where even Nietzsche's Last Man has been totally transcended in terms of pathetic passivity and aberosexuals, hostile alien invaders, and the melanin-privileged have been absurdly morally elevated to the level that knights, war heroes, and great statesmen once were before the latently apocalyptic Americanization of the world. After all, even if a young enterprising Euroid wants to attempt to demonstrate their heroism in battle nowadays, they don't really have any real options aside from fighting for a perennial enemy in a cold and detached war against his own racial/cultural interests in a decidedly dystopian technocratic zionist military comprised of women, illegal aliens, perverts, and other less than knightly elements. Rather unfortunately, to quote Death In June, "IT IS THE FATE OF OUR AGE THAT WE FIGHT IN ISOLATION."

-Ty E

THE DEVIL, PROBABLY
THE DEVIL, PROBABLY

Robert Bresson (1977)

As demonstrated by figures ranging from D.W. Griffith to Federico Fellini to Jean-Luc Godard to Dario Argento, even great filmmakers tend to eventually lose touch with cultural trends and their surroundings in general with old age and thus their cinematic output sometimes severely suffers as a result. As his extremely uneven cinematic swansong We Can't Go Home Again (1973) demonstrates, even truly rebellious filmmakers like great Hollywood anarchist Nicholas Ray—a man that lived in a so-called 'filmmaking commune' with his students when he was already well into his 60s while working as a film professor—that attempt try to keep up with youth trends can fail miserably and just seem incredibly ridiculous. In short, it is oftentimes easy to tell if a film was directed by an old fart even if it was directed by a distinctly talented old fart. Of course, there are certainly notable exceptions like Danish maestro Carl Th. Dreyer, who concluded his long distinguished career with a timeless masterpiece like Gertrud (1964), but I don't think any other filmmaker can really compare compete in terms of singular golden years relevance than French master auteur Robert Bresson. Indeed, Bresson concluded his career with the decidedly dark masterpiece L'argent (1983) aka Money but his penultimate feature Le diable probablement (1977) aka The Devil, Probably is indubitably an unparalleled accomplishment in terms of an elderly auteur managing to depict with great intricacy, nuance, and keen social relevance the darkest aspects plaguing contemporary youth. Directed by Bresson when he was already in his late 70s, the film was considered such a subversive and emotionally brutal youth pic when it was originally released that it was championed by figures ranging from mischling punk pioneer Richard Hell to Teutonic cinematic iconoclast Rainer Werner Fassbinder. In fact, Hell dared to describe the flick as "the most punk movie ever made," but of course that would be selling the film too short. Undoubtedly, Fassbinder, who threatened to quit the 27th Berlin International Film Festival unless it received an award (it ultimately won the Silver Bear - Special Jury Prize), paid the film its greatest compliment when he stated to Christian Braad Thomsen in a 1977 interview that, "Robert Bresson's LE DIABLE PROBABLEMENT ... is the most shattering film I've seen this Berlin Festival. I think it's a major film [...]. [I]n the future—and this world will probably last for another few thousand years—this film will be more important than all the rubbish which is now considered important but which never really goes deep enough[.] The questions Bresson asks will never be unimportant." Indeed, Bresson's film puts forward many imperative, albeit uniquely uncomfortable questions, but luckily the wise old auteur lacks the arrogance and ignorance to try to actually provide answers for them, as The Devil, Probably is an audaciously austere meditation on pre-apocalyptic youthful angst that beautifully bleeds a certain unmistakable Occidental hopelessness as symbolically personified by a passively suicidal lad that lacks even the will power to kill himself yet somehow manages to pull a date with death in the end.

Indeed, fuck Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause (1955), Jean-Luc Godard's Masculin Féminin (1966), Dennis Hopper's Easy Rider (1969), Franc Roddam's Quadrophenia (1979), Fast Times at Ridgemont High (1982), John Hughes' The Breakfast Club (1985), Heathers (1989), and countless other films that acted as virtual cinematic therapy to various generations of self-obsessed teenagers and young adults, old fart Bresson was responsible for making the single greatest and most brutal teen rebellion flick ever made. In fact, even Fassbinder's own rarely-seen teen angst feature Wildwechsel (1973) aka Jail Bait seems as intellectually insipid and sleazy as the crusty kosher comedy American Pie (1999) when compared to the misanthropic majesty of Bresson's somewhat overlooked masterpiece. Of course, unlike Fassbinder, Bresson does not believe humans will be around for anywhere near a couple thousand years from now as it is a staunchly apocalyptic cinematic work that makes it seem as if humanity as a whole is, for better or worse, on its last gasp. While the characters in the film are dressed in an aesthetically vulgar fashion that makes it seem as if they were run over by a psychedelic dump truck driven by Jim Morrison (incidentally, the final scene in the film was shot at the Père Lachaise Cemetery in Paris where The Door singer is buried), The Devil, Probably could not be more relevant in terms of depicting the cultural, social, and moral bankruptcy of the materialistic bourgeois, as well as the various metaphysical afflictions that plague contemporary youth, namely those of the hopelessly deluded and spiritually forsaken left-leaning sort. The sad and pathetic yet audaciously and refreshingly brutally pessimistic story of a passively suicidal quasi-hippie twink dropout that has lost faith in love, religion, science, civilization, politics, and just about everything else that makes life worth living, the film probably features what is arguably the most stoic depiction of a totally senseless tragedy ever committed to celluloid. In terms of sheer artistic fortitude in the face of trendy neo-Marxist bullshit, Bresson's film demonstrates the uncompromising stoicism of a kamikaze fighter pilot just before crashing into a U.S. warship.

If there ever was a film that might possibly influenced failed bourgeois leftist types to refrain from throwing bottles of old piss at elderly Trump supporters and quit Soros-backed commie terrorist groups like antifa, it is indubitably The Devil, Probably where the sheer impotence, phoniness, narcissistic virtue signaling, and dead-end social dysfunction of the so-called revolutionary lifestyle is exposed for the insipidly sick joke that it is in an inordinately elegant fashion that demonstrates Bresson's mastery of his own distinct cinematic language. Indeed, the young long-haired leftists in the film come off seeming like virtual metaphysical zombies that have been foredoomed to wait for the incoming apocalypse while carrying out innately impotent acts of 'intellectual' resistance at the unwitting command of a Joker-esque devil that gets his kicks from seeing the dregs of youth figuratively dig their own graves. Of course, as the great Francis Parker Yockey once insightfully wrote, "A moment's reflection shows that Liberalism is entirely negative. It is not a formative force, but always and only a disintegrating force," hence the signature left-wing tendency to simply break down and virtually never build up. Rather intriguingly, quite unlike his comrades, the protagonist of the film has become disillusioned with leftist politics and would probably agree with Yockey's Spenglerian sentiment, "If pessimism is despair, optimism is cowardice and stupidity. Is there any need to choose between them?" In fact, in the end, the protagonist opts for a Roman-esque suicide as a young man that can no longer be bothered with petty things like neo-Marxist mental masturbation or the distribution of pornography in Catholic churches, as he has opted to swallow the biggest 'black-pill' in an age where his comrades think red flags and chink dictators are cool and that the starvation-diet materialism of Marxism will somehow defeat the consumerist materialism of capitalism. While Bresson's films certainly has strong anti-capitalist themes, it is almost just as critical of the left, especially in regard to how trendy neo-bolshevik political movements have destroyed entire generations of youth and turned them into soulless shells of human beings that only know how to bitch and break things.

THE DEVIL, PROBABLY

While The Devil, Probably effortlessly critiques various aspects of far-leftist political movements, the sexual liberation movement, psychoanalysis and related degenerate bullshit, in a swift and unemotional manner that is comparable to a meth-addled German master gardener attending to weeds, it is very clear while watching the film that Bresson is deeply concerned with the threat of pollution and its central role in the fall of man. In fact, Bresson broke with his own cinematic conventions and dared to include stock footage of pollution in the film to the underscore precarious state of humanity. Despite his fairly negative portrayal of the leftist youth in his film, Bresson had a certain 'pessimistic hope' that the film would somehow inspire a rebellion against such a grim garbage-filled fate, or as he explained in a June 13, 1977 interview with the French weekly news magazine L'Express, "I hope with all my heart that the young will deploy all the power of their youth against the massive forces of demolition that are ravaging the world (for which they will have to pay the price). But it might be too late." Judging simply by his film, which is drenched in a certain preternaturally stoic apocalyptic doom and gloom, I can only suspect that Bresson truly believes in his heart of hearts that humanity is practically kaput and barely even deserves to exist due to what it has done to earth and its innocent non-human inhabitants. Indeed, judging simply by the world depicted in The Devil, Probably, the word 'humanity' can only be taken as a grave insult. As for the devil, he is merely a convenient perennial scapegoat for humanity. Needless to say, the film reveals that Bresson has little hope for the survival of the Occident and the world in general, but as Richard Roud once wisely wrote in Cinema - A Critical Dictionary - The Major Film-Makers (1980) in regard to the great aesthetic irony of the flick, “When a civilization can produce a work of art as perfectly achieved as this, it is hard to believe that there is no hope for it.” I, for one, can certainly not think of another film where the image of a young leftist bitch sobbing becomes such an emotionally poignant experience or where the murder of a suicidal friend by an insanely indifferent dead-eyed junky is depicted with such exceedingly elegant understated brutality. While he would probably disagree with me, Bresson was surely a rare auteur that had a singular talent for great pulchritude in banal ugliness.

Notably, French New Wave maestro François Truffaut once described The Devil, Probably as Bresson’s most “voluptuous film,” which is somewhat curious since the film does not feature much ‘sensual’ imagery aside from an extremely brief titty shot and some covert crotch shots of anorexic dope-addled frog boys in tighty whities. In terms of their boyish physiques and pathetically passive demeanors, these Gallic girly men more closely resemble cum-crusted catamites than the proper revolutionaries and are surely symbolic of the emasculation of post-WWII Europa, especially post-colonial France. Naturally, as sexually dubious individuals that lack most conventional masculine traits, the film’s characters, especially the protagonist, have serious problems when it comes to love and romance. Completely conflicted when it comes to the issue of whether or not he loves both or neither of his two favorite lady friends, the protagonist of the film clearly has not read H.L. Mencken’s wise words, “Love is the delusion that one woman differs from another.” To make matters even more confusing, the hapless hero—a chap that seems totally incapable of truly connecting to anyone, especially his estranged parents—is, for whatever reason, best friends with a similarly emotionally comatose guy that he dislikes who also happens to be banging his beloved girlfriend. In short, the characters cannot even seem to salvage their personal relationships, let alone the dying planet that they believe they are fighting for. In short, these characters focus on the big (and seemingly unsolvable) problems that world is facing as if it gives them a good enough reason in their own deluded minds to ignore their own glaring (and, in many ways, quite fixable) personal problems, which is surely one of the defining traits of the archetypal left-winger.

At the very beginning of the film, we learn that the film’s meta-pessimistic protagonist Charles (played by twink-ish non-actor Antoine Monnier, who is the great-grandson of post-impressionist painter Henri Matisse) is already dead as indicated by two different contradicting newspaper articles that read: “YOUNG MAN COMMITS SUICIDE IN PERE-LACHAISE” and “PERE-LACHAISE ‘SUICIDE’ WAS MURDER.” By the end of the film, the viewer learns that technically both newspaper headlines are correct, though neither really reveals the absurdly tragic circumstances surrounding the young man’s death. After revealing the questionable death of the protagonist, the film cuts to an inter-title reading “SIX MONTHS EARLIER...” and then introduces hermetic world of the exceedingly epicene protagonist Charles and his similarly depressed and socially alienated comrades. Notably, in one of the very first scenes in the film, Charles mocks a self-stylized far-left revolutionary who gives a pathetic speech where he idiotically declares, "I proclaim destruction. Everyone can destroy. It's easy. We can sway hundreds of thousands of people with slogans." No longer impressed by insipid left-wing slogans and mindless acts of destruction, Charles believes "There is no point" and that people that engaged in such mindlessly deleterious behavior are simply "idiots." Charles' best 'frenemy' Michel (Henri de Maublanc), who still believes in left-wing causes, does not approve of the critique and snidely states to Charles, "You want to know everything and end up doing nothing." To Michel's credit, Charles is indeed a major underachiever and pessimistic that seems to regulate most of his time to complaining and fantasizing about suicide. In that sense, Charles is like a much cooler and more sophisticated frog equivalent to the eponymous protagonist of Hal Ashby's Harold and Maude (1971), though he thankfully never succumbs to gerontophilia or discovers happiness via an insufferably spunky elderly proto-hippie holocaust survivor. Aside from their political differences, Michel is in love with Charles' longtime girlfriend Alberte (Tina Irissari) who, unbeknownst to the protagonist, seems to reciprocate his feelings. To make matters even more romantically complex, Charles is also fucking a happy-go-lucky chick named Edwige (Laetitia Carcano), who is being used for nude photos and stupid political acts by the same lame unnamed political revolutionary from the beginning of the film that the protagonist rightly loathes. Indeed, among other things, Edwige engages in inserting pornographic imagery of herself inside holy writings at a local Catholic church where the leftists regularly hangout and harass bishops. For example, a young female revolutionary bitches at the bishop, "You're so civilized, so cultured, you and your bishops. Is that why your music is insipid and your hymns inane? All those words and gestures you invented are so insignificant they're humiliating. God doesn't reveal himself through mediocrity." As if foreseeing the sort of post-spiritual leftist Christian churches that exist nowadays in Europe and pollute the minds of its followers by endorsing the colonization of the continent by young hostile Muslim hordes, another revolutionary remarks, "...like it or not, the Christianity of the future will be without religion." The only thing that Charles seems to enjoy is sex, which is a topic he discusses with an inordinate degree of excitement. Not unlike many people his age, Charles also has a hard time distinguishing between love and lust, though by the end of his short life it becomes clear he only ever really truly experienced the latter.

THE DEVIL, PROBABLY

Notably, the great poesy pessimistic philosopher Emil Cioran once described his adopted hometown of Paris as an "apocalyptic garage," which is a somewhat generous way to describe the aesthetically oppressive, socially alienating, and spiritually necrotizing frog capital that is depicted in Bresson's film. Undoubtedly, Charles might have had second thoughts about suicide were he to have read wonderful insights from Cioran like, “It is not worth the bother of killing yourself, since you always kill yourself too late” and “What saved me is the idea of suicide. Without the idea of suicide I would have surely killed myself. What allowed me to keep on living was knowing I had this option, always in sight... But really, without it I could have never endured life.” Of course, as the film’s senselessly tragic conclusion reveals, Charles lacks the gall and will power to personally pull the tragic and kill himself and thus resigns his fate to one of the most loathsome of barely human creatures. Indeed, were it not for the grotesque morally bankruptcy of his friend Valentin (Nicolas Deguy)—an extra-jaded junky that spends most of his time bedridden when he is not out stealing from churches—Charles would probably not have ended his life so prematurely, as he is far too passive and chronically indecisive to commit such a permanent task. Undoubtedly, one of the most tragic aspects of Charles’ suicide-by-junky is that his entire inner circle is well aware of his psychological decline and morbid obsession with self-slaughter. In fact, when Charles even goes so far as asking his anti-pal Michel, “Do you think I could kill myself?,” he receives the somewhat arrogant response, “Not for a moment. Because if we were really done for, as you say we are, if there really was no hope, I’d still want to live in spite of everything.” Additionally, Charles confesses to a female friend that he made a failed attempt at drowning himself in her bathtub, but she does not seem to take him serious. It is ultimately Charles’ two female lovers that are the most proactive in trying to stop him from committing suicide, but their actions are fairly impotent. For example, when his main girlfriend Alberte receives the horrified shock that Charles is carrying around a small bottle of cyanide in a bag, she simply throws it away but ultimately lacks the strength to confront her beloved about the curious find. In fact, Alberte even finds a rather incriminating scribbling from one of Charles’ journals where he has copied a citation from Fyodor Dostoyevsky’s final novel The Brothers Karamazov (1880) that reads, “When will I kill myself, if not now?,” but she lacks the strength to mention it to anyone aside from her secret lover Michel of all people. Somewhat ironically, it is his semi-secret lover Edwige’s recommendation that Charles see a quack psychoanalyst that leads him on a concrete path to self-annihilation. To Charles’ credit, he makes various small attempts to get over his all-consuming death wish. For example, despite his side relationship with Edwige, Charles decides to ask his longtime girlfriend Alberte if she will marry him and she actually accepts his proposal even though she seems to love Michel more. Notably, almost immediately after agreeing to marry him, Alberte begins crying in bed after sharing carnal knowledge with Charles. As to whether Alberte breaks down because she knows he relationship with Charles is doomed or because she loves Michel more is anyone’s guess, but there is no doubt she is having a hard time living a semi-polyamorous lifestyle. Indeed, like with their impotent left-wing activism, the characters in the film seem to believe that sexual freedom will somehow lead to happiness and some sort of utopia when, in reality, these things have only made them more miserable and disillusioned with life. Needless to say, Charles and Alberte's engagement goes nowhere.

THE DEVIL, PROBABLY

In what is undoubtedly one of the most deceptively ingenious and thematically revealing scenes of the entire film, Charles more or less lays out his entire nihilistic Weltanschauung for a rather repugnant money-grubbing psychoanalyst named Dr. Mime (Régis Hanrion), who obviously has nil sincere interest in curing the troubled young man. Clearly a proponent of quasi-Freudian psychobabble of the neurosis-inducing sort, Dr. Mime—a man whose arrogance is only rivaled by his horribly hidden greed—believes childhood spankings and bad dreams are to blame for Charles' decided disillusionment with life, but as the protagonist tell him himself in a line of dialogue that illustrates the central theme of the film, "But Doctor, I'm not ill. My illness is seeing too clearly." Indeed, as Charles has concluded, no truly sane individual can feel content and happy in a sick and insipid world where baby seals are clubbed to death for profit, communism and its equally odious offshoots have replaced religion, lust is synonymous with love, hippies are considered cool, gender has been erased, being bedridden with heroin withdrawal is a full-time job, and the world faces the very real threat of total nuclear war followed by an atomic winter, but as Cioran once wrote, "Only a monster can allow himself the luxury of seeing things as they are," hence why the protagonist is considered a weirdo even by his best friends and girlfriend(s). When asked by the insufferably supercilious Dr. Mime, "Isn't being right compensation for being alive?," Charles replies, "In losing my life, here's what I'd lose," grabs a crumpled up advertisement from one of his pants pocket, and then absurdly recites with an absurd lack of enthusiasm that really underscores his great disgust for life and modernity, "Family planning, package holidays—cultural, sporting, linguistic. The cultivated man's library. All sports. How to adopt a child. Parent-teacher associations. Education. Teaching 0 to 4 years, 7 to 14 years, 14 to 17 years. Preparation for marriage. Military duties. Europe. Decorations—honorary insignia. The single woman. Paid sick leave, unpaid sick leave. The successful man. Tax benefits for the elderly. Local taxes. Hire purchase. Radio and television rentals. Credit cards. Home repairs. Index-linking. VAT and consumers." Needless to say, Charles does not learn much from the psychoanalyst, at least until he complains in regard to suicide, "Doctor. I don't think I will ever be able to . . . Do the deed. To think I would suddenly stop thinking, seeing, hearing" and Dr. Mime unwittingly gives him the 'cure' he needs by retorting, "That's why the ancient Romans entrusted a servant or friend with the task." Indeed, while Charles might lack the nerve to blow his own brains out, he is at least confident that he has a friend that is unscrupulous enough to do it for him for a meager fee. Somewhat ironically and rather humorously, Edwige convinces Charles' friends that the therapy is a great success after talking on the phone with Dr. Mime while session is still going on.

Due to his unbelievable negligence and clear disinterest in his patient's mental health, Dr. Mime might be best described as a sort of 'passive villain' and a figure that not even anti-Freudian chosenite Thomas Szasz could have dreamed up.

Since there are surely no authentic ancient Romans living in contemporary Paris, Charles must settle for his junky comrade Valentin when it comes to his friend-assisted suicide. While Valentin is a lazy bum that lies in bed all day when he is not robbing church or shooting junk into his scrawny arm, he does become somewhat intrigued when Charles asks him to do a "favor" that is "Worthy of the ancient Romans" and then offers him all of his remaining cash to get the deadly deed done. Before heading to Père Lachaise Cemetery to be voluntarily executed by his most innately iniquitous of comrades, Charles celebrates with a small glass of wine to calm his nerves while Valentin, who clearly has no concern for the life of his friend, maintains a disturbingly dead expression on his greasy frog face. While he initially seems excited about dying, Charles somewhat somberly states while strolling through the graveyard, "I thought at a time like this I'd have sublime thoughts." Indeed, even right before receiving his long awaited dream of dying, Charles is decidedly disappointed with life. When Charles then attempts to start a conversation by stating, "Shall I tell you?," Valentin coldly cuts him off by shooting from behind, thereupon extinguishing the protagonist's life with a single bullet to the head. Undoubtedly, had Charles been hanging out with more high quality friends he would probably still be alive, but of course the devastatingly dejected protagonist was already too irreparably alienated from any person of real value in his life, hence his desperate need to rely of the services of a junky fuck-up. While it might have been more superficially fitting had Charles died next to the gravesite of Rimbaud fan-boy Jim Morrison, Charles body collapses near the grave of French Communist Party (PCF) leader Maurice Thorez in a symbolic scenario that can be interpreted in many ways, though I think that it is safe to say that it reflects the nihilistic navel-gazing, slave-morality-induced moping, and sort of spiritual death that comes with becoming a far-leftist shill. Since left-wing ideologies, especially those of the post-WWII French sort, are oftentimes inspired by sheer resentment, failure, self-loathing, and ethno-masochism, it is ultimately no big surprise that someone like Charles ended up the way he did as he really only followed the next logical step of the trendy political persuasion of his zeitgeist. After all, not even a stoic pessimistic like Bresson could predict that future French leftists would endorse the collectively suicidal path of inviting hordes of Muslims to France that would eventually turn Paris into a virtual third world hellhole where terrorist attacks are a relatively common occurrence, no-go-zones (or what pussy frog politicians call 'sensitive urban zones') are the norm, and a mostly unreported rape epidemic brings new meaning to the classic phrase 'City of Love.'

Borrowing its title from a line in Fyodor Dostoyevsky's final novel The Broth- ers Karamazov (1880), The Devil, Probably arguably has an ironic title as the devil is nothing more than an all-too-convenient scapegoat for humanity; or, more accurately, Beelzebub is simply a reflection of man and only those individuals that are scared of the truth would blame the infernal Führer for the sins of man. Indeed, Cioran probably said it best when he wrote in his classic text Précis de decomposition (1949) aka A Short History of Decay, “Because he overflows with life, the Devil has no altar: man recognizes himself too readily in him to worship him; he detests him for good reason; he repudiates himself, and maintains the indigent attributes of God. But the Devil never complains and never aspires to found a religion: are we not here to safeguard him from inanition and oblivion?” While he might not be anything resembling a devil of any sort, the protagonist Charles is a sort of modern post-hippie Christ of his own suffering who, despite his philosophical purity and relative keen lucidity in regard to the metaphysical affliction of his age, sacrifices himself to the very same post-religious nihilism that made him suicidal in the first place. In that sense, the devil wins in the end. After all, Charles not only commits the unpardonable sin of suicide, but also accepts the ultimate form of defeat in a forsaken world where those virtuous individuals that known better should feel all the more obligated to fight against the devils of the world, even if said fighting is ultimately in vain. Indeed, Teutonic ultra-pessimist Oswald Spengler certainly said it best when he wrote in his short work Man and Technics: A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life (1932), “We are born into this time and must bravely follow the path to the destined end. There is no other way. Our duty is to hold on to the lost position, without hope, without rescue, like that Roman soldier whose bones were found in front of a door in Pompeii, who, during the eruption of Vesuvius, died at his post because they forgot to relieve him. That is greatness. That is what it means to be a thoroughbred. The honorable end is the one thing that can not be taken from a man.” Needless to say, I was not surprised to learn after watching The Devil, Probably that Bresson included the following aphorism in his text Notes on the Cinematographer (1975), “These horrible days—when shooting film disgusts me, when I am exhausted, powerless in the face of so many obstacles—are part of my method of work.” Undoubtedly as a pessimistic artist that struggled to create challenging cinematic works in an era that was surely undeserving of such monumental experiments in cinematic form, Bresson certainly demonstrated a certain Spenglerian greatness.

THE DEVIL, PROBABLY

As for as European degeneracy is concerned, post-'68 France arguably reflects the height of it, thus it is quite fortunate that Bresson—undoubtedly one of the greatest filmmakers that has ever lived—had the gall to assault it with his scathing sardonic wit. Although not coined at the time the film was released, the youth of The Devil, Probably surely suffer from what French New Right figure Louis Pauwels described as “Mental AIDS.” Indeed, as fellow french New Right figure Guillaume Faye once wrote on the subject, “AIDS comes from a retro-virus that destroys an organism's immune system. 'Mental AIDS' is an infection of a psychological nature that affects virtually all the 'elites'—the political class, the media class, show business, the 'cultural' community, 'artists,' filmmakers—inclining them to oppose the interests of their own people and to advocate degenerate values as if they were actually ones of regeneration." Naturally, these ideas are nothing new as revealed by the great Irish poet W. B. Yeats wise words in regard to the degenerative power of leftist politics, "What's equality? – Muck in the yard: Historic nations grow, From above to below." While protagonist Charles of Bresson's film has gone full-blown nihilist yet somehow also finally realizes that his values lack values, the same can certainly not be said of his idiotic comrades. Indeed, these characters somehow think they are working to fix the world by engaging in degenerate sex, destruction for destruction's sake, communism, feminism, and other infantile societal diseases despite the fact that these things are only speeding up the demise of their nation as present-day France (and especially Paris) clearly demonstrates. Like their present-day equivalents, most Parisian youth in Bresson's film lack what the ancient Greeks called 'thymos' and instead are consumed with a sort of wholly corrosive passive-aggressive resentment. As for protagonist Charles, who is clearly more perceptive than his friends, he suffers from a sort of inverted thymos that has caused him to become consumed with so much melancholy and Weltschmerz that he simply cannot bear the pain of living anymore. Needless to say, Bresson was one of the few French filmmakers working during the 1970s that did not suffer from 'Mental AIDS,' hence one of the many reasons why his late period films are so important and singular in the context of all of European cinema history. Notably, not unlike the protagonist of Bresson's film, Spengler believed that the Abendland—the West—was in its final stage of civilization and that urban areas represented this social and cultural decay the most. Indeed, in describing 'The Soul of the City,' Spengler explained with great pessimistic lucidity, "Now the giant city sucks the country dry, insatiably and incessantly demanding and devouring fresh streams of men, till it wearies and dies. ... Primitive folk can loosen themselves from the soil and wander, but the intellectual nomad never. ... Home is for him any one of these giant cities, but even the nearest village is alien territory. ... Even disgust at this pretentiousness, weariness of the thousand-hued glitter, the taedium vitae that in the end overcomes many, does not set them free. They take the City with them into the mountains or on the sea. They have lost the country within themselves and will never regain it outside." While Spengler was a proud German conservative, there is no doubt that protagonist Charles—a young man that literally cannot live with the fact that his estranged father makes tons of money destroying forests—would concur with this sentiment. Although just speculation, I think that simply judging by the ideas disseminated in The Devil, Probably that Bresson would have found a kindred spirit in Finnish deep ecologist Pentti Linkola who, in critiquing the self-described 'religion of death' of democracy, noted in his revolutionary text Can Life Prevail?: A Revolutionary Approach to the Environmental Crisis (2004), “Never before in history have the distinguishing values of a culture been things as concretely destructive for life and the quality of life as democracy, individual freedom and human rights — not to mention money. Freedom here means the freedom to consume, to exploit, to read upon others. All rights, even the most seemingly beautiful — women’s rights, children’s rights, rights for the disabled — only express one thing: ME, ME, ME. Pure selfishness has been given a new name: ‘self-realisation’, now considered the noblest of all morals. Words like responsibility, duty, humility, self-sacrifice, nurturing and care are always spat upon, if they still happen to be mentioned. For all their mistakes, even such recently buried ideologies as fascism and socialism, both of which emphasized communal values and contained restrictive norms, were on a higher ethical level.” While sort of self-stylized leftist quasi-ecologists, the characters of Bresson’s film are unequivocally plagued with the sort of ME-ME-ME democratic disease that Linkola speaks of, hence the complete and utter futility of their cause. Indeed, free love and gay rights seem rather petty and ultimately quite irrelevant in the grand scheme of things when the entire world is virtually in flames.

THE DEVIL, PROBABLY

Notably, Bresson once confessed in regard to The Devil, Probably that, “This film is my most horrifying, but not the most despairing. I wouldn’t call any of my films despairing.” On the other hand, as Joseph Cunneen noted in his text Robert Bresson: A Spiritual Style in Film (2003) in regard to the film, “One needs to remember, in any case, that though Bresson made the movie as a warning against dangerous directions in contemporary society, he is not arguing a thesis or presenting an alternate plan or action. He remains, above all, an artist continuing his research on what cinematography can express in a way that no other art can.” Personally, I found the film quite delightfully despairing and I would not surprise if it had the power to drive certain people to suicide just as Werner Herzog’s similarly darkly humorous and grotesquely tragic Stroszek (1977) proved to be the right film for Joy Division front man Ian Curtis to watch before hanging himself. On the subject on self-extermination and its relation to the film, Cioran provides the following insights, “When we are young we look for heroes. I have had mine: Kleist, Karoline von Günderrode, Nerval, Otto Weininger. . . . Intoxicated by their suicides, I was certain that they alone had gone to the end, that they drew, in death, the right conclusion from their thwarted or fulfilled loves, from their broken minds or philosophic pain [...] But as the years went by, I lost the pride of youth: each day, like a lesson in humility, I reminded myself that I was still alive, that I was betraying my dreams among men rotten with . . . life. Exasperated by the expectation of no longer existing, I considered it a duty to cleave my flesh when dawn broke after a night of love, and that it was a nameless degradation to sully by memory an excess of sighs [...] Even now, I have more esteem for a concierge who hangs himself than for a living poet. Man is provisionally exempt from suicide: that is his one glory, his one excuse. But he is not aware of it, and calls cowardice the courage of those who dared to raise themselves by death above themselves. We are bound together by a tacit pact to go on to the last breath: this pact which cements our solidarity dooms us nonetheless—our entire race is stricken by its infamy. Without suicide, no salvation. Strange! that death, though eternal, has not become part of our ‘behavior’: sole reality, it cannot become a vogue. Thus, as living men, we are all retarded . . .” Judging by Cioran’s words and Bresson’s film, it seems that certain types of suicides have always been reserved for a sort of ‘degenerate spiritual elite.’ Undoubtedly Bresson’s protégé Louis Malle certainly had this romantic view in mind when he put his blood, sweat, and tears into Le feu follet (1963) aka The Fire Within, which is notably adapted from a novel by literary fascist turned suicide victim Pierre Drieu La Rochelle.

When asked by an interviewer at L’Express what he was like as a young man in comparison to the nihilistic youth of his film, Bresson—an extremely private man with a somewhat mysterious past—responded with, “As if I could tell you! Violent? Absolutist? Excessive? Lots of alcohol and tobacco. Now I don’t drink or smoke.” While they are quite different in other ways, I think it is safe to say that The Devil, Probably protagonist Charles is a sort of youthful stand-in for Bresson, as if the auteur was trying to imagine how miserable it would be for him to be a young man during the 1970s. In fact, in an interview with American auteur Paul Schrader featured in his book Transcendental Style in Film (1972), Bresson’s would make an argument for suicide that is quite similar to Charles’, stating that, “there is something which makes suicide possible—not just possible but even necessary: it is the vision of void, the feeling of void which is impossible to bear. You want anything to stop your life. . . .this way of wanting to die is many things: it is a disgust with life, with people around you, with living only for money. To see everything which is good to live for disappear, when you see that you cannot fall in love with people, not only with a woman, but all the people around you, you find yourself alone with people. I can imagine living in disgust with so many things which are against you around you, and then you feel like suicide.” Indeed, while it is easy to see Charles as a spoiled brat with both mommy and daddy issues, his suicide almost seems like an unavoidable bodily reaction, like having a wet dream while still a virgin or belching after eating a greasy chili dog. Either way, Charles was in many ways long dead before the bullet entered his skull. While The Devil, Probably is certainly a singular cinematic that could never truly even be superficially mimicked, it has influenced at least one underrated masterpiece that I can think of. Indeed, aside from featuring the same exact virtually intolerable stock footage of baby seals being beaten to death, De Witte waan (1984) aka White Madness directed by criminally neglected Dutch auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst also revolves around a hopelessly foredoomed suicidal young man that lives off the grid and hangs out with junkies. Both of these films, like both Bresson and Ditvoorst's cinematic works in general, are destined to only be appreciated by a tragically blessed few, but as Cioran wrote in A Short History of Decay, "How could we bear the weight and sheer depth of works and masterpieces, if to their texture certain impertinent and delicious minds had not added the fringes of subtle scorn and ready ironies? And how could we endure the codes, the customs, the paragraphs of the heart which inertia and propriety have superimposed upon futile and intelligent vies, if it were not for those playful beings whose refinement puts them at once at the apex and in the margin of society?" Of course, to admit to being an admirer of The Devil, Probably is to also virtually admit that one fantasies about suicide and the death of civilization, or at least one would expect nothing less from the film's most loyal of proponents. On the other hand, the film can simply be admired for its strangely cozily hermetic depiction of the misspent lives and beauty of youth, thus it can be argued that it follows in the tradition of French Symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud. After all, when Rimbaud wrote in regard to his poetry, "I turned silences and nights into words. What was unutterable, I wrote down. I made the whirling world stand still" he could have been describing what Bresson accomplished with the oftentimes misused artistic medium of film.

THE DEVIL, PROBABLY

-Ty E

THE CREEK

Robert Butler (1984)

I try to approach independent horror with an open mind, taking in all atmospheric qualities and the simple urge to create; this is what starts film off most times. Writer/Director Erik Soulliard takes a very common tale and puts a slightly different spin on it. One thing that amazed me with the film is how similar it was to a novel I had read when I was a child. Author Gary Brandner writes a book about three high school friends who re-unite at their high school at the reunion of the death of a classmate. Note that Gary also wrote the novel that inspired THE HOWLING. So the plot as you may have guessed is basically a retelling of the old friends die hard tale, but with a transparent green-skinned Billy-friend-ghost killing off people or does he? A revenge tale done right for the new generation. The acting starts off pretty amateurish but gets better throughout the running time. Expect a beauty and talent in actress Kathryn Merry as "Angel". While featuring a great ghost character, and a dynamic score that even goes as far as to make you uneasy, this film sets up a nice mood that gets you a little bit tense. It's nice to see a low-budget horror film done right. All you need nowadays is a camera, fake blood, and some women volunteering to bare all for their chance at horror stardom. This film takes the simple rule of re-uniting friends for a night of murder and mayhem. What starts off as a minimalistic old school horror tale turns sour near the end. All credibility just turns over and rots. The duo of Coop and Jesse just seem to get more and more injured while moaning and limping for 20 minutes. It's like watching a true sequel to Jackass (Hospital Visits & Such). The ending doesn't ruin it all. The Creek is still a damn fun and effective horror film to gawk at. Kathryn Merry is worth the price alone. Expect horrible ghost wardrobes as well.

-Maq

CHAFED ELBOWS
CHAFED ELBOWS

Robert Downey Sr. (1966)

As far as films about incest are concerned, especially of the mother-son Oedipal variety, no film takes such an absurdly hilarious and unwaveringly obnoxious approach to the subject than psychopathically sardonic flick Chafed Elbows (1966) directed by Robert Downey, Sr. (Putney Swope, Greaser's Palace). Of course, being mostly comprised of black-and-white 35mm still camera photographs that were developed at the director's local drugstore and being only 58 minutes in length, Chafed Elbows barely qualifies as a film at all and, in terms of technique and direction, more resembles the sort of amateurish photo collages created by little girls and bored moms that have flooded YouTube, thus making it all the more ingenious in its glaring early-1960s NYC ghetto production values. Made on a dime store budget of around $12,000 (I was actually surprised it cost that much to make), Chafed Elbows would go on to be an underground classic and provide credibility to the American 'avant-garde' and cinematic sleaziness and would even share a double bill in 1967 at Bleeker Street Cinema in Greenwich Village with cine-magickian Kenneth Anger's similarly subversive and groundbreaking work Scorpio Rising (1964). Of course, centering around a nervous breakdown-plagued anti-hero who shares carnal knowledge with his mother, gives birth to money, shoots cops, caters potato salad (or at least tries) at bar mitzvahs, and feels that he is entitled to government welfare like any and every self-righteous American deadbeat, Chafed Elbows is from a strikingly different planet than Scorpio Rising as a sort of fiercely fucked Freudian celluloid vaudeville show of the absurdist aberrant-garde sort that must have been a major influence on Downey's debauched racial kinsmen Harmony Korine, whose debut Gummo (1997) features a similarly spasmodic and idiosyncratic collection of seemingly morally insane and stream-of-consciousness skits, pranks, and uncompromising cultural cynicism. A film that satires America just as much as it is a sordid symptom of it, Chafed Elbows attacks everyone from corrupt cops to crackpot psychoanalysts to kosher Jews, as well as filmmaker Andy Warhol and Jonas Mekas, and everyone in between. Indeed, if you ever wanted a jovial antidote to everything you hate about the USA, Chafed Elbows is cinematic iconoclasm and kosher camp at its most hopelessly ill-restrained and incendiary, as if it was directed by Woody Allen's crackhead stepbrother, except actually funny and not whiny nor wimpy.

As one learns during the first couple minutes of Chafed Elbows, perverted proletarian protagonist Walter Dinsmore (George Morgan) not only sleeps side-by-side with his mother (played by Downey's then wife Elsie Downey, who plays ALL the female roles in the film), but also has steamy incestuous sex with her as well. Rather unfortunately, Walter—a rather goofy fellow with a flat affect and not a dime to his name—narrates that he is in the middle of his "annual November breakdown” (although the film, which is in two parts, takes place during his “annual January breakdown”) and all of Greenwich Village will feel his pain and pessimism, whether they want to or not. After going to a doctor, Walter learns he is pregnant and the deranged doc recommends that he, being a man with a mangina, get a hysterectomy, but instead he magically gives birth to 189 ten dollar bills through his knee via cesarean section, which he concludes may be the result of having swallowed a nickel when he was 5 or 6 years old. On his way home from the doctor, Walt walks into a sleazy artist who prices him at $1700.00 and hopes to hang and sell him at a gallery, but it never happens. Not long after, Walter tells his psychoanalyst that his greatest fear is getting his mother pregnant, which is apparently a “common fantasy,” or at least Freud and equally deluded disciples thought. Although there is no doubt that Walter loves his mommy dearest, the hack psychoanalyst also tells her that his sick son “hates women,” which seems to be true as he treats virtually every girl he meets with neurotic disdain, even if he bangs a couple from time to time. Walter also makes his big debut as a cop character in a no-budget art flick destined for the Cannes film festival and has a chat with the lighting man, a patently pretentious would-be-auteur named “Leo Realism” (who claims to be listed in the Yellow Pages under “truth”). In a clear parody of Andy Warhol and his monotonous celluloid turd Sleep (1963), a film featuring a man doing nothing but sleeping for 5 hours, Mr. Realism offers Walter the job of starring in his new arthouse flick “Smoke” where all he has to do is “sit on a park bench for seven hours and puff on a cigarette.” On a lunch break while still in his police uniform, Walter does some slapstick traffic controlling and kills a real cop after he brags about “smashing a junky’s skull in.” On top of screwing his mother, Walter also impregnated his vegetarian cousin Leviticus who self-righteously proclaims she “won’t even eat animal crackers.” After Leviticus proclaims she is knocked up and that he should financially support her, Walter thinks twice and solves his problem by throwing her out a window. Not long after, Walter visits his brother who plans to “beat the system” by starting his own business, an amusement park that he describes as follows: “It is only gonna be open to white people but on the inside, there’s only gonna be black people. I’m going to have rides like Whip the Slave and Lynch a Nigger...lots of black people are going to have jobs and security just ‘cause of me.” Naturally, Walt—a loony loner without a cause—turns his brother down in regard to becoming a partner in his bigot bro’s dream business.

During the second part of Chafed Elbows, Walter lets the viewer know, “I kind of like part two. It’s got a “collagic,” dreamy, angelic quality. It’s one of my favorite breakdowns.” Indeed, the second part of the film actually features a scene in color of a tiny racist gook calling Walter a “thankless, sinful, Caucasian, spineless, Anglo-Saxon, mentally retarded, middle-class heterosexual” and blesses him “in the name of the Dow, the Jones and the Industrial.” Undoubtedly blessed, Walter decides to become a poet and immediately gets to work on his acceptance speech for the Pulitzer Prize and eventually recites the poetic line “My miniskirt and I checked into a motel and as we were getting into bed, we spotted an old Negro looking in the window. Miniskirt said not to worry because he was probably a peeping Uncle Tom” to a civil rights buff and dean at the ‘New School.’ The dean gives Walter the esoteric bit of knowledge that “Trotsky was a Mexican” and that “Hitler is a hairdresser and alive in Los Angeles.” After talking to an anti-liberal black street philosopher, Walter decides to do something more “real” and becomes a rock star, but he doesn’t “feel it” and decides to walk among his people, thus attracting the attention of a bunch of horny teenage girl and, of course, his greatest fan, his mother. Not long after, Walter is hired to “dish out potato salad at a bar mitzvah in Mineola, Long Island,” but he is fired by the owner of the catering business after kicking the potato salad out the truck while passing through Jamaica. Job or not, Walter decides to attend the bar mitzvah anyway and starts a hot fling with a crazy Jewish chick named Rhoda Dendron that he finds hiding under a dinner table. After telling Rhoda that she managed to put a pretty good tremor in his ‘tick-a-roo-roo’ and offering her to put a big kiss-a-wang-wang on her ‘ruby nugget,’ Walter rips the goofy gal’s clothes off, throws the owner of the catering business off a roof for momentarily cock-blocking him, and defiles the nice Jewish girl, but, to the little lady’s dismay, ultimately succumbs to premature ejaculation. After coming home, Walter is happy to discover his slob of a father has drunk himself to death and proceeds to hit his mother on the head with a hammer and assumes he has killed her, but, quite miraculously, she awakens and states quite eloquently, “You can’t kill real love, Walter. Let that be a lesson to ya.” In an exceedingly happy ending to a rather merrily macabre movie, Walter and his mother get legally “peacefulized,” move into a rent-controlled apartment just outside of Manhattan, and eagerly await their first born child and first welfare check.

CHAFED ELBOWS

If any character in film history has truly achieved the “American dream,” it is indubitably loser’s loser and deadbeat’s deadbeat Walter Dinsmore, a man that has the opportunity to indulge in every dream job, including actor, rock star, and money-birther, yet ultimately achieves nothing aside from siring an inbred child and living on the taxpayer’s dime; two uniquely unnatural dreams that only could be realized in the land of the free and home of the brave. What is great about Chafed Elbows is that director Robert Downey, Sr.’s celluloid ‘seething cynicism as celluloid sketch-comedy’ knows no bounds, as he manages to target virtually every segment of the American (and most specifically, early-1960s NYC) populous, including (but certainly not limited too), boorish blue collar workers, pedantic college professors, hypocritical feminists, clannish Orthodox Jews, East Asian megalomaniacs, avant-garde filmmakers, psychoanalysts, monetary motivated practitioners of medicine, soulless newscasters, egocentric Guindos, belligerent bull dykes, and various other groups/individuals ripe for mockery. Not unsurprisingly, Downey even goes so far as mocking the film itself in a scene where a character states “The only thing about these low-budget films is that all the action is behind the camera” and Walter Dinsmore (standing in for Downey) replies “Don’t worry about it. This whole thing will blow over in less than an hour” (Chafed Elbows has a 58 min running time) Undoubtedly, at least as far as I am concerned, Downey has a naughty knack for making hatred and cultural pessimism a pleasantly palatable thing and it is with Chafed Elbows that he was able to realize this to the fullest, even if the film is essentially a sardonic slideshow of human sideshows directed by a man that clearly only knew the most fundamental aspects of filmmaking techniques. Once described in a 1967 interview as being “like a Marx brothers movie that has Lenny Bruce language in it,” Chafed Elbows is pure and unadulterated Hebrew humor (and I mean that in the most ‘positive’ sense, relatively speaking of course) minus the terminal taint of Hollywood philistinism and cultural Marxist hysteria. If you ever wonder what must be going on in someone’s mind to be a Sigmund Freud or a Wilhelm Reich but without having to dig through all the novelty intellectualism and anti-European sentiment, Chafed Elbows—a sort of healthy median between the crappy commie caricatures of George Grosz and the early films of Harmony Korine—makes for a singularly hilarious view at the Oedipal Hebraic psyche and all of its creepily corrupted corners and crevices.

-Ty E

PUTNEY SWOPE
PUTNEY SWOPE

Robert Downey Sr. (1969)

While I couldn't care less if his much more famous son died the same way as his crack smoking and dick-peddling character in Less Than Zero (1987), absurdist avant-garde auteur Robert John Downey, Sr. (Chafed Elbows, Greaser's Palace) directed a low-budget underground film or two that certainly deserves wider audiences, especially in regard to his breakthrough feature Putney Swope (1969), a film shot on a mere $120,000 poverty budget (although some sources say $200,000) that would arguably be the filmmaker's greatest achievement as a director. Sort of like Blaxploitation meets postmodern Judaic vaudeville meets Dada and Luis Buñuel and the Marx brothers on dope, Putney Swope is a wildly idiosyncratic and incendiary comedy that simultaneously satires the morally retarded and philistinism-promoting advertising world, the dying Anglo-Saxon elite (especially on Madison Avenue), corporate corruption and its ability to corrupt anyone regardless of racial persuasion, revolutionary politics (especially of the far-left and black militant persuasion), and black America and its post-Civil Rights political struggle. Far too politically incorrect, eccentrically esoteric, culturally cynical, and audaciously absurd and oftentimes nonsensical for fans of philistine kosher comedies starring Adam Sandler and directed by Judd Apatow, Putney Swope rather strangely owes a good portion of its success to Jane Fonda recommending the film on Johnny Carson's The Tonight Show in 1969. Indeed, unlike a lot of so-called Blaxploitation films, which were directed by Hollywood Hebrews to capitalize on the success of Melvin Van Peebles' Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971), Putney Swope is an experimental arthouse flick that attacks both black and white and, at best, can only be described as proto-Blaxploitation (it predates Van Peebles' film and Shaft (1971)) of the anti-Amerikkkan sort. The strikingly sardonic low-budget celluloid story of a powerless token Uncle Tom black man on the executive board of an advertising firm who anomalously becomes chairman of the board upon a democratic fluke after the original leader literally drops dead, and that was partly inspired by director Robert John Downey, Sr.'s own experience as an advertising executive (he created a commercial for Preparation H of all things, which was rejected by his bosses but later appeared in his 1968 film No More Excuses), Putney Swope depicts what happens when white America devolves morally and ethnically into black America and the racially-charged, jive-ass absurdity that follows in a film that was probably not shot in mostly black-and-white just for financial reasons.

In a striking opening scene that is indubitably a parody of the beginning of Leni Riefenstahl's National Socialist masterpiece Triumph of the Will (1935) aka Triumph des Willens of Uncle Adolf flying in a plane and landing on the ground like God coming down from the heavens, a funny and seemingly faggy 60-something-year-old fellow in fetishistic biker apparel with German iron crosses, totenkopfs, a confederate flag, and Nazi eagle patches (sewed to a leather-fag-esque denim vest) named Dr. Alvin Weasly, apparently one of the most respected motivational researchers in the country, arrives via helicopter and is paid $28,000 by a executive board of an advertising firm for merely providing the insight, "Beer is for men who doubt their masculinity. That's why it's so popular at sporting events and poker games. On a superficial level, a glass of beer is a cool, soothing beverage. But in reality, a glass of beer is pee-pee-dickie." Not long after, the chairman of the board croaks at the end of the table and using the democratic process that bureaucratic wasps like so much and has ultimately led to their wane of power in the USA, the other executives vote who will be the next leader and, magically, lone Negro Putney Swope (played by Arnold Johnson of Sanford and Son fame, who had trouble memorizing lines, so director Robert Downey, Sr. later dubbed his parts) takes control of the advertising firm, thereupon turning it into an absurd Afrocentric advertising company that is aptly renamed "Truth and Soul, Inc." After stealing the advertising idea of a tall and goofy wasp and selling it to a self-described "happy chink" named Wing Soney (Tom Odachi), Swope fires every single white employee (aside from a "token white man," who is paid the least) and replaces them with all blacks of the brutish black power persuasion, including nefarious Negro militants, black Muslims (a naughty Negro named "The Arab" played by Antonio Fargas makes for one of the most interesting characters), high yellow pricks, and statuesque black divas. Indeed, if you thought Anglo-Saxon America was corrupt, you have yet to see the jaded jigaboo jive realm of Putney Swope.

Ostensibly attempting to rid the black community of its vices, Putney Swope ends doing business with alcohol, war toys, or tobacco companies and soon grabs the attention of the President of the United States, a megalomaniacal German midget named Mimeo (played by Pepi Hermine, who also played "The President" in Werner Herzog's Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970)) and his pot-smoking and Jew-hating Kissinger-esque kraut associate Mr. Borman Six (a character played by Lawrence Wolf and a name likely inspired by Nazi leader Martin Bormann and the apparent death of six million Jews during WWII), a fiercely funny man who states, "hey, it's cold in here. Throw another Jew on the fire" as he smokes a joint with the little leader of the free world. Undoubtedly, Putney Swope rules with a brassy black iron fist and he has no problem firing his employees left and right, especially after stealing their ideas from them and claiming them as his own (sort of like how black Afrocentrics claim to have invented imaginary civilizations and pioneered every area of science, technology, art, culture, etc.), but it proves to make for great business, thus making for the perfect cannibalistic capitalist model. Creating commercials featuring the sole Ms. Redneck New Jersey, bodacious black power breakfast cereals, sentimental race-mixing ballads featuring black boys and white girls, psychedelic multicultural chicks with nice tits jumping around topless in an airplane, and a Nazi Borman-mobile with a star of David on the front hood, Swope turns the advertising world into a nihilistic post-Anglo-Saxon Negro nightmare of softcore race-mixing and does so with pointlessly perverse product placement. Naturally, Putney Swope, who constantly changes his dictator look from a militant black panther like Huey P. Newton to a cigar-smoking Fidel Castro to an exceedingly effeminate African tribesmen in a moomoo, eventually runs in to trouble with his homeboys, especially the jihad jigaboo Arab, a “true believer” who considers his boss an unscrupulous and egomaniacal sell-out and sinisterly sleazy traitor to the honkey-hating revolution. A proud brotha’ named Myron X also lets Swope know that he has sold-out and is now “confusing obscenity with originality” in terms of his Russ Meyer-esque advertising campaigns. In the end, everyone one at Truth and Soul, Inc., especially Putney Swope, is more corrupt than the most psychopathic of degenerate wasps, so the Arab decides to take revenge by blowing up all the money at the firm terrorist-style.

PUTNEY SWOPE

If one learns anything from Putney Swope, it is that—regardless of creed, race, and/or ethnicity—capitalism corrupts, especially when the inexperienced slave becomes the master. Interestingly, the original members of the executive board of an advertising firm featured at the beginning of the film are all white (with the exception of a couple Jews thrown in for good measure), with a number of whom being elderly fellows are either asleep, senile, and even dead, thus illustrating the decay of the original Anglo-Saxon elite that originally ruled virtually every crevice of America’s power structure, but has given a good portion of their power away due to feebleness and decay. Ironically, it is also the wasp’s love of democracy, freedom, and law that leads to the very overthrow of the Anglo-Saxon elite, thus making Putney Swope a sardonic yet strikingly realistic depiction of post-Civil Rights America through a maniac microcosm as dreamed up in a delightfully deranged manner by director Robert Downey, Sr. Interestingly, Spike Lee later directed a film very similar in theme and sentiment to Putney Swope entitled Bamboozled (2000). Of course, Spike Lee, who has never been a friend of the Jews, portrays the degenerate corporate elite as racist yet paradoxically Negrophiliac Hebrews, thus one could agree that it is also a satire (as well as update) of the ideas expressed in Judaic auteur Robert John Downey, Sr.’s Putney Swope, a film that spreads the very same stereotypes that the black filmmaker’s flick condemns. Even fellow Israelite Amos Vogel had to admit in his groundbreaking work Film as a Subversive Art (1974) regarding Putney Swope, “In this wild satire of Madison Avenue, nobody – not even blacks, arabs, midgets, or Jews – remains exempt from the director’s corrosive, bizarre humor,” hence the film’s genius and ability to stand the test of time after all these years of politically correct brainwashing. While being a brilliant and brazen work that would never be made in our insanely xenophiliac times, where ‘racial sensitivity’ has reached insane neo-bolshevik levels, Putney Swope does show its age in spoofing events and trends of the late-1960s that many modern viewers would probably have a hard time understanding. Still, Putney Swope is a singular work of biting celluloid iconoclasm that takes no prisoners in reminding one of how America and American filmmakers have turned into a bunch of cowardly cultural cuckolds who are hopelessly brainwashed by the sort of mediocre sentimentalism media that the anti-hero Putney Swope sought out to destroy.

-Ty E

POUND POUND

Robert Downey Sr. (1970)

Probably best remembered nowadays for being the first film to feature kosher coke fiend Robert Downey, Jr. in the childishly charming role of a puppy(!) at the ripe age of 5, Pound (1970) is a relatively forgotten and rarely seen film directed by the mainstream Hollywood actor/comedian's underground filmmaker father Robert Downey, Sr. (Chafed Elbows, Greaser's Palace) that until somewhat recently was assumed to be lost. Rated X due to its naughty language and released on a double-bill with the decadent high-camp Roman epic Fellini Satyricon (1969), Pound was essentially cursed upon its release and would not really reappear until 2005 when Downey found a damaged original 35mm print of the work in his "cameraman's ex-wife's closet," which was in such poor shape that it could not even be run through a film projector, but luckily the print was somehow digitally scanned and restored (though the film has yet to be released on DVD). Luckily, I managed to track down a reasonably decent print of Pound with Hebrew subtitles, which only add to the film's sardonic and superlatively sidesplitting Hebraic humor, and I can happily report that it is nothing short of a cult comedy classic and one of Downey's most audaciously absurd cinematic works. Adapted from an off-off-Broadway play written by the auteur in 1961 entitled The Comeuppance, Pound is the pleasantly politically incorrect tale of over a dozen spastic dogs, a Siamese cat, and penguin that are depicted by humans who wait in vain for someone to adopt them from an animal shelter before they are put to sleep for good. In addition to the absolutely scathing surrealist absurdity of the wayward puppy prison, Pound also features a biting and seemingly random subplot about a David Berkowitz-esque pseudo-negro serial killer that goes by the name "Honky Killer" who goes around killing loving Aryan couples, thus unwittingly prophesying the so-called 'Son of Sam' killings that terrorized New Yorkers during the summer of 1976. Indeed, with its curious combo of mouthy mutts and seemingly a schizophrenic lady-killing serial killer, one might assume that Berkowitz was a fan of Pound. Following in the nihilistic perversity of Chafed Elbows (1966) and the radically satirical racial-hustling of Putney Swope (1969), Pound is like All Dogs Go to Heaven (1989) on speed and acid as directed by an unflinching auteur that could have shown Woody Allen a thing or two about kosher celluloid comedy with true testicular fortitude.

Some supreme wack-job (James Green) with a shotgun, who has been dubbed by the media as the "Honky Killer" due to his perverse propensity for killing white couples and calling media networks while using a fake frog-like black voice, is out on the prowl in NYC, while the only thing a group of dogs in a pound on the other side of town can think of is being adopted and surviving their tragic internment in virtual hound hell. Of course, outside a couple scenes, including some doggy style coitus, the melancholy mutts are depicted by humans of the mostly horny and high strung sort. Indeed, inside and outside of the animal shelter is a dog-eat-dog world and everyone is hungry, whether it be for race hate, rape, or hard drugs. One less than little Dachshund (Marshall Efron) with a Hitler mustache apparently used to deal dope on the outside and swears that, "The only stuff I have is pure cocaine, the greatest sexual drug since Eva Braun." Undoubtedly, the verbally rabid dog is a Mexican Hairless (Downey, Sr. regular Lawrence Wolf), who proclaims "I'm proud to be a Mexican hairless," though another canine accuses him of being a crypto-Jew. Naturally, the lone Siamese Cat (Ching Yeh) is played by a pissy Chinaman with a retarded hairdo who somewhat resembles Japanese cult leader Shoko Asahara. To the annoyance of her fellow doggies, a 'Mutt Bitch' (played by the director's first wife/ Robert Jr.'s mommy Elsie Downey) likes to do grating opera solos, which inspires a male mutt to state, "Now I know why the governor terminated funding for the so-called arts." There's a grouchy, seemingly demented old fart (Stan Gottlieb) who sports a glittery silk robe, and who used to fight but now just talks a bunch of shit fittingly playing the role of an over-the-hill Boxer with more bark than bite. With Antonio Fargas of Putney Swope playing the role of a Greyhound, one should not also be too surprised to see a Black Panther-like political rally going on in the pup pound.

When it comes down to it, none of the dogs really care about each other and merely blabber on about their own problems, fantasies, and desires, which are depicted in surreal Amarcord-esque dream-sequences. When a whiny canine complains, "Why does everyone have to be black or white?... What about the grays?," his criticism goes on deaf doggy ears despite the eclectic collection of pedigrees/non-pedigrees at the pound who could benefit from such a 'humanistic' philosophy. When a young puppy (Robert Downey, Jr.) is brought to the pound, he is soon adopted by a violent jigaboo dope dealer, thus causing the rest of the dogs to realize their days are numbered as they wait with a foreboding feeling of impending doom and gloom. Meanwhile, the Honky Killer kills a loving couple as the boyfriend performs cunnilingus on his girlfriend on a park bench. Eventually, Honky Killer calls the local Police Chief (L. Errol Jaye) and after getting off the phone, the black cop remarks to his white underlings, "Well at least we know he's a brother...but if he is really the Honky Killer, why should he threaten me." In a feeble attempt to ostensibly seek penance for his sins, a deranged doggy confesses that he wishes he could, "find all the creatures I raped and tell them I'm sorry... If they hadn't resisted, I wouldn't have done it," but literally seconds later he attempts to perform involuntary lily-licking on the Mutt Bitch. In the end, all the poor doggies are gassed in an Auschwitz-esque fashion and take a train to the afterlife. As for the Honky Killer, he attempts to kill his wife at the deep end of their drained swimming pool, but a young piano player, who is carrying of an affair with the killer's wife, pops out and stops him. As they say, "Don't shoot the piano player; he's doing the best he can" and of course

POUND

Robert Downey, Sr. was doing the best he could do with Pound.

A work that brings new meaning to the phrase, "Society has gone to the dogs," Pound is an aberrantly allegorical work that somehow manages to make all the multicultural chaos, urban decay, psychopathic serial killers, bitchy black (and not to mention, morbidly obese) government employees (indeed, the manager of the animal shelter is a sort of New Wave Aunt Jemima), degenerate dope dealers, and related metropolitan American filth seem so much more joyous and wonderful. At the website, Robert Downey Jr. Film Guide, the actor summed up his bittersweet feelings on the films as follows: "Dad got a grant to make a film about dogs. He said it would be more realistic if he could have actors interpret what the dogs were feeling ... Pound is about how everyone's basically waiting to die. [My father takes] kind of a dark comedic attitude toward very real issues that some people don't even touch on ... I played a dog in a pound. We were all going to get gassed unless we got taken, so that was our motivation! It was a real art piece ... I couldn't understand why we had to shoot scenes over and over. It was disconcerting and rather boring ... [A crewmember on The Shaggy Dog] came up to me and said, "I used to baby-sit you when your dad was making Pound. I know what it was like back then." And he handed me the slate from Pound which was the first movie I ever made, and it said 3/17/70, so it was literally like 35 years ago. It looked like something the art department had come up with to look like a period collector's item, like Sotheby's from The Fortune. So lately there's been a whole sense of closure." How Robert Jr. went from starting his acting career by playing a puppy in Pound and going on to work with James Toback on a number of films to starring in blockbuster superhero schlock like Iron Man (2008) is anyone's guess, but it might have to do with the fact his filmmaker father exposed him to the wonderful world of drugs (i.e. marijuana) shortly after appearing in his first film role when he was still just a little pup. Of course, while somewhat sophisticated, Pound could certainly qualify as a 'pothead picture' as it would explain Robert Downey Sr.'s nasty knack for endless non-sequiturs, one-liners, and puns, as if a coherent plot would be too much to ask for from a hyper-cynical Semitic stoner. A film that truly epitomizes the genuine spirit of Sephardic Jewess Emma Lazarus' words that adorn the bronze plaque of the Statue of Liberty, "Give me your tired, your poor, Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free, The wretched refuse of your teeming shore. Send these, the homeless, tempest-tossed to me, I lift my lamp beside the golden door!" Pound is the uniquely unflattering allegorical depiction of America in mutt microcosm that reminds the viewer that 'every dog has its day,' at least when it comes to death.

-Ty E

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF

Robert F. McGowan (1924)

Although I still regard him as a somewhat preposterous and pathologically pedantic quasi-autistic frog who ranks among the most overrated filmmakers in filmmaking history, my opinion of Jean-Luc Godard has changed somewhat drastically over the past couple years and I now at least consider him to be a sort of eccentric cinematic genius whose overall oeuvre is not even really truly appreciated or understood by many of the same communist and left-wing dildos that claim to be his greatest proponents. After all, even Godard himself regards one of his most famous and insanely overrated films, Bande à part (1964) aka Band of Outsiders, as nothing more than mere hack work that he created to help his then wife Anna Karina's career, or as the auteur once stated himself in regard to its lack of importance in the context of his entire oeuvre, "That's why I called it 'Bande à part.' It's really apart, it won't change anything, it's a diversion, a Bande à part." Despite the fact that he never stopped creating innovative films or evolving as an artist, many people seem to assume that he stopped being an interesting filmmaker after he finished his apocalyptic dystopian black comedy Weekend (1967 film), fired his regular crew, and began living a more reclusive existence. Although Godard did waste about 12 or 13 years creating mostly worthless Maoist agitprop flicks with kosher communist Jean-Pierre Gorin under the so-called 'Dziga Vertov Group' and tinkering around with building a video studio and experimenting with then-state-of-the-art video technology, he did eventually return to what he described as "cinema cinema" and attempted to reenter the mainstream with a fairly fine flick that he would curiously describe as his "second first film." Indeed, although largely plotless and fairly idiosyncratic, Sauve qui peut (la vie) (1980) aka Every Man for Himself aka Slow Motion was a fairly serious attempt by Godard to get back into the public consciousness and create a film that could be appreciated by more people than just 'bobos' (aka bourgeois bohemians) and socially retarded film dorks. After finally watching the film, I must admit that is indubitably one of Godard's most humorous and accessible works, albeit if not for some of the wrong reasons which largely have to do with self-exploitation and what might be described as 'aesthetic autism.'

Notable for being an embarrassingly personal work for Godard, especially in regard to his early years with his longtime partner Anne-Marie Miéville, the director once described the title as being best translated into English as "Save Your Ass," which makes much sense when one considers the absolutely appalling female lovers and ex-lovers that the insufferably hip and emotionally broken protagonist must put up with while walking around like a sullen bohemian ghost. Don't get me wrong, the overtly autobiographically named protagonist Paul Godard is a too-cool-for-school sack of shit that has incestuous fantasies about his own preteen daughter (who was inspired by Godard's partner Miéville's daughter), regularly calls his daughter and girlfriend a “bitch,” and is just an all around unlikely frog shithead that has next to no redeeming qualities aside from his biting sincerity, yet he still seems to have a tiny inkling more of humanity than the “Les Bitches” that plague his absolutely miserable life. Undoubtedly, one of the reasons I enjoyed the film so much is due to Godard’s unadulterated honesty in terms of demonstrating beyond a shadow of a doubt that he and many of the people in his life are soulless snakes, self-absorbed pieces of elegantly packaged excrement, and intemperate sexual predators with patently pathetic post-Marxist political persuasions who really seem to epitomize everything that is wrong with post-counterculture Europe, especially among the so-called cultural elite (after all, one cannot forget that Godard is considered a national treasure of sorts and that he has been strongly supported by influential leaders like Hebraic socialist Jack Lang, who served as France’s Minister of Culture from 1981 to 1986 and 1988 to 1992).

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF

Notably, the Criterion Collection release of the film included an essay entitled Every Man for Himself: Themes and Variations by Amy Taubin where the misguided gynocentric authoress reveals she has never actually done any serious research on Godard or his personal life by absurdly arguing that the cinematic work is really the director’s “second first film” because he had some sort of life-changing feminist awakening where he realized the errors of the ostensible patriarchal male gaze, but in reality the auteur is a closest misogynist of sorts whose rare feminist posturing is even less sincere than his moronic Maoist phase. In fact, Taubin notes that the only “empathetic connection” in the film occurs between the female protagonists, but any sane non-cucked male will easily realize that the scene in question is nothing more than a stereotypical depiction of the sort of shallow female solidarity that women show for one another against a man that they both happened to have fucked. After all, only a thoroughly brainwashed feminist like Taubin, who once appeared in a film by ultra-feminist Jewess Yvonne Rainer, could describe a film like Every Man for Himself as “erroneously titled” that concludes with the male protagonist dying in the street whilst his daughter and ex-wife walk away in cold indifference (indeed, one can only assume that Taubin believes that Paul Godard’s tragic death was well deserved). Made after the auteur suffered two failed marriages that ended in bitter divorces and causes irrevocable emotional damage that blatantly affected his filmmaking career, Godard’s “second first film” is the disturbing yet nonetheless devilishly humorous expression of a completely disillusioned man that has clearly given up on the prospect of true love and creating a family, hence the director’s lack of children and continued less than monogamous relationship with Míéville, who can hardly compete with Anna Karina or Anne Wiazemsky in terms of sheer elegance or pulchritude, among other things.

Right from the get-go with his debut feature À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless where the male protagonist is killed after his dyke-cut-adorned American girlfriend betrays him by ratting him out to the cops, Godard revealed in what would ultimately prove to be a lifelong theme that the so-called fairer sex has a certain instinctual lack of loyalty and empathy when it comes to members of the opposite sex. In his semi-autobiographical eight feature Une femme mariée (1964) aka A Married Woman that was inspired by his one-sided marriage to Anna Karina, Godard would argue that modern European women lack the capacity for love and monogamy because they have been brainwashed by magazines, movies, and cultural trends that have instilled them with the grand delusion that the ideal 'liberated' woman is more or less a self-worshiping hedonistic whore of the culturally retarded sort who is only interested in her own quest for pleasure and shallow reputation among other vainglorious women that live to model their largely worthless lives after the fantasy worlds created by the homo advertisers of Madison Avenue. Of course, in Masculin Féminin (1966) Godard would demonstrate that most young women are mindless idiots that have the wants and needs of insatiable ADHD-ridden toddlers. Needless to say, Every Man for Himself—a film that was made at a time when Godard had given up on love and pretty much life in general—is no less unflattering in its portrayal of pretty people with pussies. In fact, the film seems to be a sort of rejection of women in general, so it should be no surprise that cultural Marxist wimp Robert Phillip Kolker once described the title of the flick in his book The Altering Eye (1983) as being "...not only sexist but almost the same as Werner Herzog's EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF AND GOD AGAINST ALL." Undoubtedly, only an exceedingly emasculated pansy would describe the title as "sexist," especially considering the film more or less demonstrates that both men and women are responsible for dysfunctional relationships, even if women are inordinately cold and self-consumed beings that have a nasty knack for being able to turn-off their emotions when it is to their personal advantage, especially when men are involved.

In her classic text The Manipulated Man (1971), anti-feminist Jewess Esther Vila expressed a sentiment that Godard would probably agree with when she stated, "Women really are callous creatures – mainly because it is to their disadvantage to feel deeply. Feelings might seduce them into choosing a man who is of no use to them, i.e., a man who they could not manipulate at will." Undoubtedly Every Man for Himself is notable for depicting two very different female protagonists suppressing their feelings towards men in a film that subtly demonstrates that women all have a sort of innate quasi-sociopathic quality that is beneficial to their survival. Indeed, as someone that still seems to love her (ex)boyfriend yet wants to be completely independent and start a career of her own as a writer, Denise Rimbaud (Nathalie Baye) cannot give into her true emotions lest she ruin her dubious professional plans. In a somewhat different and all the more debasing fashion, cutesy yet cunty streetwalker Isabelle Rivière (Isabelle Huppert) has to pretend she fancies fat bald old farts because she makes her living peddling her pussy. In fact, the only character that dares to ever expose any degree of personal vulnerability is male protagonist Paul Godard (French rock musician Jacques Dutronc), who makes one last desperate yet ultimately completely hopeless attempt at the end of the film in what is arguably the most memorable scene of the entire flick to both literally and figuratively 'hold onto' his ex-girlfriend Denise before she leaves him for good. In that sense, Every Man for Himself is undoubtedly Godard's most strangely and unforgettably heartbreaking film.

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF

Divided into three main segments (and a couple sub-segments) that follows three protagonists whose stories prove to intersect in the end, Every Man for Himself is a sort of exceedingly eccentric esoteric romantic-comedy for lovelorn misanthropes and cynics. Undoubtedly, one could also describe the flick as a melodrama for irredeemably miserable intellectuals who have forgotten what it means to truly feel something, especially when it comes to other people. Not unlike Godard, the autobiographical protagonist Paul—a less than sunny sunglasses-adorned jerk-off that somewhat resembles a more refined and anally retentive 1980s era James Spader—is a filmmaker that works at a TV station, loves fiddling with video equipment, and is responsible for using his professional connections to give his (ex)lover a job working in his trade. At the beginning of the film, Paul calls his ex-girlfriend Denise from a hotel while working on a television project and then leaves the building abruptly after telling her that he will be by to see her in an hour. Somewhat hilariously, while Paul is attempting to get in his car, a racially ambiguous male hotel employee declares his love for him and states in a sickly salacious fashion, "I want you to fuck my ass. Fuck me, sir. I've been fucked by half the navy. There's nothing better than a nice little asshole," but naturally the rampantly heterosexual filmmaker turns down the rather needy troglodyte's extra odious request. While Paul is not beneath banging hookers and fantasizing about his flat-chested preteen daughter, he is certainly no rectum-reaming homo. Of course, it is only Paul's bad luck that the only person that wants to fuck him is a disgusting creature that he wants nothing to do with. As far as the viewer knows, the only pussy that Paul is regularly penetrating is that of less than sweet streetwalker Isabelle Rivière, who seems completely incapable of any genuine human affection, let alone love with a man.

When Paul goes to pick up his daughter Cécile (Swiss auteur Alain Tanner's daughter Cécile Tanner) from soccer practice, he talks to her commie coach and asks him in a curiously nonchalant fashion, "You ever felt like feeling her up or fucking her up the ass or something?" In a scene that hints at the director's somewhat less than ambiguous pedophilic tendencies, Paul also complains to the coach, "I think it's unfair that a mother can touch her daughter or son more easily than a father can," thus underscoring the character's somewhat warped logic and busted moral compass (though one must admit that women are typically more likely to get away with child abuse; whether it be sexual or otherwise). As a favor to his ex-girlfriend, Paul attempts to pick up filmmaker and novelist Marguerite Duras from a college, but the old hag seems to be absurdly antisocial and never even makes a single appearance in the film. Since Ms. Duras refuses to speak in front of a class that she is supposed to lecture to at the college, Paul reluctantly stands in for her and states to the class in a vaguely melancholic fashion, "I make films to keep myself busy. If I had the strength, I'd do nothing at all. Because I can't bear to do nothing, I make films. There's no other reason. That's the most honest thing I can say about my work. That goes for me too. As for Ms. Duras, every time you see a truck pass by . . . think of it as the word of a woman passing by." Ultimately, Paul falls to manage to bring Duras to the local TV station where they both work for a planned TV interview, so pissy prima donna Denise reacts by absurdly calling him a "fascist" and smacking the shit out of him right in front of his daughter, thus underscoring the heroine's deep-seated and highly irrational hostility for her ex-beau. That night, Paul eats dinner with his ex-wife and daughter (Paule Muret) and they treat him with bitter resentment like virtually all of the women in his life, so he reacts by calling them "bitches." Of course, the only reason Paul's ex-wife agrees to eat dinner with him is to get her monthly child support check. Not unlike Denise, Paul's ex-wife deeply resents him and has no qualms about letting him know it. Luckily, Paul has enough money that he can pay for a woman that at least tries to pretend that she loves him and his seemingly wandering cock.

As hinted at various points in the film, Denise would not have a career in television were it not for her ex-boyfriend Paul, but now she has it in her mind that she wants to be completely free and is willing to live on a farm in the country and work at a publishing company that is owned by another ex-boyfriend to make a new life for herself. Indeed, over-the-hill debutante Denise—a nasty passive-aggressive bitch that no man should have to suffer—believes that her bicycle will bring her true freedom. While visiting the farm house that she plans to live at, a girl that already lives there states to Denise, "Let me show you something" and then proceeds to drop her pants, bend over with her ass and pussy in front of a line of cows, and proudly declares, "Sometimes they give your ass crack a good lick." Of course, being an emotionally barren woman that seems to lack a sense of humor, Denise is hardly impressed by the rather raunchy and zany quasi-zoophilic display. As Denise confesses to Paul over the phone in regard to why their relationship is a failure and why it must end for good, "People always say – They always say – They say you need someone to lean on. I wanted someone to lean with. We've never really leaned on each other. We never leaned on each other. Something seemed to stop us." Of course, both Paul and Denise are miserable broken individuals that really know how to make an ugly situation even uglier. To Denise's credit, she does not seem to be nearly as innately and irrevocably soulless as Paul's prostitute pal Isabelle, but it seems dubious at best that she could ever maintain anything resembling a healthy relationship. Needless to say, it is a good thing that Denise does not have any children, as she lacks any real nurturing qualities and could only bring great pain and misery to the lives of any progeny she might spawn.

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF

When we first meet pretty pussy-peddler Isabelle Rivière—a sassy bitch that lacks tact who seems to loathe everyone and everything, including men and sex—she is waiting in line for a movie with Paul, who is attempting to be a gentleman by taking her on a date even though he is really only with her to purchase her pink-eye. Not interested in the charade of romantic courting, Isabelle coerces Paul into skipping the movie and just going straight to the fucking. While they are having sex, Paul gets annoyed with Isabelle's blatantly fake moans of pleasures and complains, "stop working so hard" and "stop pretending." Of course, as the viewer soon discovers, Isabelle seems to lack the capacity for any sort of genuine human emotion aside from a vague degree of melancholy to the point where she seems like a rare woman with Asperger syndrome. For whatever reason, all of Isabelle's roommates seem to hate her and are quite glad that she is moving out of their apartment. When Isabelle's sister randomly shows up at the flat and begs for money so that she can bail some friends out of jail, the robot-like prostitute gets a sick idea and offers to be her little sis' pimp despite the fact that she hates pimps as demonstrated by the fact she was roughed up by one while being given the following words of wisdom in regard to her gender, "No one's independent. Not the whore or the typist [...] Only banks are independent, but banks are killers." To make sure her sister has the appropriate carnal goods, Isabelle demands to see her tits and asks if she has a "thick bush." To prepare for the pussy-peddling trade, Isabelle also asks her sister, "Have you ever licked a guy's asshole?" and then remarks, "You'll probably have to. But don't just say yes to everything. What guys like is to humiliate you," thus highlighting her rather misandric view of men. The next day, Isabelle is humiliated by a middle-aged mensch who makes her do a little bit of roleplaying where she pretends to be his daughter, but she fails miserably and is kicked out of the hotel room due to her lack of spirit and emotional authenticity. Luckily, Isabelle bumps into a grade school friend by happenstance who offers her an exceedingly easy job working for a TV station, but she does not even seem marginally interested in pursuing a lucrative career that does not involve allowing strange old men to defile her cunt. Indeed, it almost seems like Isabelle likes being a prostitute because it gives her some exceedingly warped sense of personal sovereignty (of course, such deranged thinking is not uncommon among contemporary feminists, hence the preposterous propensity of certain porn stars and prostitutes to make lame statements about the supposed feminist qualities of their trashy choice of trade).

In a nice little twist towards the end of the film where all three of the protagonists are confronted with one another by mere happenstance, Isabelle shows up to an apartment that she hopes to rent and randomly discovers Paul jumping over a table and tackling Denise in an allegorical scene where the filmmaker makes one last desperate attempt to save his relationship by symbolically breaking through the gap that separates him and his beloved. Of course, Paul's rather sad and hopeless self-described "idea" is a total failure and he confesses, "We want to touch, but we only bruise each other." Needless to say, little misandrist Isabelle is horrified by Paul's final last attempt to save his relationship with Denise and complains, "You're crazy. She looks like she's hurt," to which he humorously replies, "She's got a hard head. She's a banker's daughter. I'm going out for a walk." Not surprisingly, Denise and Isabelle seem to bond over their mutual resentment towards Paul, though the former confesses that it will be hard leaving him, thus revealing that she truly loves him after all even though her extremely harsh words and actions indicate otherwise. In the end, Paul is hit by a car after bumping into his ex-wife and daughter. On top of the fact that she seems totally disinterested in Paul's previous proposal that they see each other more often, the ex-wife makes no attempt to get him help while he lies dying in the street. In fact, Paul's ex-wife even says to their daughter, "it's nothing to do with us" and then forces the little girl to leave while her father assumedly dies in the street. Notably, Isabelle's novice prostitute sister also sees Paul and even seems concerned about him, but her john manages to coerce her into leaving the scene lest the two be spotted by the wrong people. While lying in the street, Paul thinks to himself, "Rather stupidly, I started thinking I'm not dying. My life hasn't flashed before my eyes. I'm not dying . . . I don't feel any . . ."

Admittedly, one of the reasons I found Every Man for Himself to be so (unintentionally) humorous is because it features a number of absurdly awkward slow-motion scenes that make it seem as if Godard is fairly autistic when it comes to cinematically expressing certain human emotions. Godard named this strangely wacky slo-mo technique 'decomposition' and he first employed it in his quasi-pedro TV series France/tour/détour/deux/enfants (1977). Notably, 'decomposition' is even utilized in a seemingly unintentionally hilarious climatic scene when the male protagonist is hit by a car, which becomes all the more strikingly odd when one considers that Godard almost died in the summer of 1972 as a result of terrible motorcycle accident that cost him one of his testicles and contributed to him becoming a social recluse of sorts. Surely, there is no doubt to anyone that has seen Godard's "second first film" that it was directed by a decidedly unhappy and devastatingly disillusioned individual that is haunted by ex-lovers that he believes are 'killing' him. Indeed, while Godard might have a cold and unintentionally humorously smug exterior, it seems that a hopelessly haunted and terminally lovelorn man exists underneath. In a scathing review that she wrote on the film for The New Yorker, obnoxious philistine Jewess Pauline Kael somewhat rightly complained, "I got the feeling that Godard doesn't believe in anything anymore; he wants to make movies, but maybe he doesn't really believe in movies anymore, either." Of course, what Kael seems to fail to realize is that Godard had finally matured and realizes that there was more to life than movies and making silly porno Tarantino-esque movies about movies. Not surprisingly, Godard would later criticize his former friends from the French New Wave due to their formulaic cinephiliac approach to filmmaking, stating, "I am amazed that people who lack ideas for new films (including some old friends like Truffaut, Rivette, who don't have any more ideas than the guys whom they denounced twenty years ago), continue to adhere to the one and self-same system of filmmaking, which is easy to describe: a sum of so many million, multiplied by so many weeks, multiplied by a certain number of people." Indeed, while one can argue that some of Godard's later films are nothing more than badly botched experiments, no one cannot deny that he has not continued to evolve as an artist and create cinematic works that were increasingly more complex and challenging. After all, only an obsessively committed oddball genius of sorts could create something like Histoire(s) du cinéma (1988-1998).

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF

Indeed, instead of being a "film about film" like his "first first film" Breathless, Every Man for Himself is a surprisingly vulnerable and incriminating film about a uniquely unlikable and pathetically perverted man that finally got the gall to expose his particularly preternatural persuasion to the entire world. As Richard Brody described in his biography Everything Is Cinema: The Working Life Of Jean-Luc Godard (2008), Godard did not even write a script for the film but instead created a "video script" that included still photographs of the actors and a voiceover commentary from the auteur where he describes "how I see" as opposed to simply "images of the film, how they will be." Additionally, after hiring Nathalie Baye as the female protagonist (Miou-Miou was originally cast for the role, but opted out when she discovered she would be starring alongside Isabelle Huppert), he convinced her to let him stay at her country home for several days because, as the actress speculates, he "needed to imbue himself with each of [her] gestures." In short, unlike his perennially infantile would-be protégé Tarantino, Godard eventually stopped being a mere cinephiliac fanboy poser and began making films about real-life, most notably his own rather dejecting existence. While Breathless was a big hit that changed cinema history and inspired important film movements ranging from New Hollywood to New German Cinema, Every Man for Himself had a much different fate, including being booed when it was premiered at the Cannes Film Festival in 1980, though the film was a relative commercial success and positively received by many critics at that time. Incidentally, Godard himself would once note regarding the difference between his "second first film" and how he originally approached filmmaking, "With BREATHLESS, I rebelled against all those tired shots with the camera anchored on a tripod, and now I made a film of what I used to think were those awful steady shots." Indeed, say what you will about the content, but Every Man for Himself is seemingly infinitely more immaculate in terms of form than Breathless, which is the rebellious work of an intemperate boy and not a thoughtful man with life experience.

Personally, as someone that initially greatly disliked Godard because I felt his films were too phony and contrived (incidentally, I would later discover that the filmmaker considers some of his most popular films like Contempt (1963) and Band Of Outsiders (1964) to be more or less hack work), I must confess that Every Man for Himself is probably my favorite flick by the auteur. Indeed, in the film we discover that Godard is a bitter, spiteful, and all-around despicable self-pitying twat that patronizes hookers and fancies little girls, but certainly that is more interesting and enthralling to see than the mundane meta masturbation of a sexually challenged film dork like the young immature auteur that directed Breathless, which might be best described as the 'poser film fanboy par excellence.' Of course, one also cannot completely write-off the integrity of a filmmaker who once rejected a special prize from the New York Film Critics in 1995 because, to quote a fax sent by Godard, "JLG was never able through his whole moviemaker/career to: Prevent M. Spielberg from rebuilding Auschwitz." In Every Man for Himself, Godard rebuilt something that is certainly more horrifying than the Auschwitz showers of Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), as the filmmaker presents his life as a sort of perpetual purgatory where he is consumed by gynocentric ridicule and mockery and pangs of lovesick disgrace, isolation, and personal failure. In short, quite unlike the director's early films, no aspiring filmmaker one can watch the flick and seriously see Godard as an admirable hero or cool role model. Still, despite Godard's decided disillusionment with love and women in general, Every Man for Himself manages to express a deep affection for feminine beauty in an understated and nicely nuanced fashion, as if the auteur is almost ashamed to reveal his infatuation with femininity. Certainly, I cannot think of another film where I became so entranced by a woman's hair blowing in the wind as I did with Nathalie Baye's in Godard's film, which I consider amazing on retrospect considering I found her character to be mostly insufferable otherwise. Aside from being a one-man pity part, Every Man for Himself is also a film about the tragedy of still deeply loving a person that you have grown to loathe. Also, the film is a rare cinematic work that manages to communicate the sort of metaphysical affliction that comes with being in love with a person but knowing your relationship with them is hopelessly doomed and that there is nothing you can do about it even though your soul longs to be with them for eternity. In short, Godard's film is the sort of ruthless romcom Woody Allen might direct if he had some degree of testicular fortitude and was less interested in being a smart ass. A portrait of the obscenely grotesque joke that has become Occidental love and romance, Every Man for Himself is a virtual testament to Godard's failure as both a man and lover. Of course, judging by the female characters in the film who somehow manage to be both frigid yet whorish and heartless yet hysterical, it is easy to see why he has thrown in the towel on love. Although Godard might slightly disprove, I must admit that at the end of the film where the male protagonist is dying in the street I could not help but think of José Millán Astray's classic quote, "Death to intelligence! Long live death!"

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF

-Ty E

THE SIN OF JESUS

Robert Frank (1961)

After recently re-watching Polanski's Rosemary's Baby (1968) and reflecting on its smug anti-Christian hatred, I can only feel disgust when thinking about a Jewish writer and/or director attempting to utilize Christian themes, so the last thing that I would want to see is a modernist Jesus flick based on a story by a Christ-hating Judeo-bolshevik and directed by a Hebraic hipster that has a reputation for taking photos that mock white people and glorify negroes. Indeed, even the title of The Sin of Jesus (1961) directed by photographer and sometimes filmmaker Robert Frank (Pull My Daisy, Cocksucker Blues) reeks of a keenly kosher form of contempt for Christianity, yet I must admit that it is still nonetheless a strangely beautiful cinematic parable that seems like the sort of film Ingmar Bergman might have directed had he been temporarily possessed by the spirits of Werner Herzog and Tobe Hooper. Surely a sort of masterful warm-up for the eerily hypnotically haunting depiction of remote rural America as portrayed in singular cinematic works ranging from Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) to Herzog's Stroszek (1977), the 37-minute black-and-white feature is a stark yet oneiric piece of Gothic Americana where auteur Frank reveals a sort of visceral fear and dread for all-things-rural. Based on a short story by Soviet Jewish commie writer Isaac Babel—a notable victim of Joseph Stalin's Great Purge that was shot dead on 27 January 1940 after confessing to being a Trotskyite spy—the film is like a Hebraic hinterland horror film as seen from the perspective of a cosmopolitan Jew with a decidedly disturbed and completely distorted view of white rural Christian America. A film that practically bleeds misery and melancholy in every single frame, The Sin of Jesus is as innately and unkindly unchristian as films come that feature Jesus Christ in a central role. Featuring a weak and sullen yet arrogant and heretical Jesus that pimps out his angels and is so pathetically morbidly depressed that he finds it virtually impossible to look a beautiful big-eyed woman in the face who he eventually begs for forgiveness from, Frank's arguable cinematic magnum opus also features what is probably the most stereotypically Jewish depiction of Jesus in cinema history. Hardly the blond, handsome, and heroic Aryan Christ of European history or a Cecil B. DeMille biblical epic, the eponymous progeny of god in Frank's film does not heal the blind but is himself blind to humanity and human suffering, hence his pathetic pleading for forgiveness to a uniquely unsophisticated woman that finds herself unwittingly killing an angel due to her desperate horniness. Of course, in its condemnation of a deity that causes human suffering, the film is almost cliché in its Jewishness to the point where it reveals that both auteur Frank and source writer Babel have no true understanding of Christianity or Jesus Christ, at least in the emotional sense. Indeed, even the goofy vampiric Christ portrayed by Teutonic queer avant-garde auteur

THE SIN OF JESUS

Michael Bryntrup in his Super-8 epic Jesus - Der Film (1986) is holier than the emotionally comatose loser featured in Frank's film.

Strikingly ravishingly shot in terms of detail to the point where you clearly see a moth succumbing to death in a tattered spider web and mold growing on the walls of a dilapidated farmhouse, The Sin of Jesus is a poignantly pessimistic film where both physical and metaphysical decay ultimately make for a delightfully dejecting combo of the strangely transcendent sort in a film that seems like it was made in tribute to the apocalyptic philosophy of meta-nihilistic lapsed fascist Emil Cioran. Admittedly, I am not all too familiar with the writings of Judaic source writer Babel, but upon doing research on the author it became immediately apparent that he was an inordinately well educated man of many contradictions that, despite being from a wealthy family and receiving a thorough Jewish education that involved extensive study of the Talmud and Hebrew, would go on to support an atheistic communist regime that ultimately made him one of its many victims. When not dabbling in Zionist youth circles and French literary pretensions, Babel found time to befriend Russian peasants, whores, priests, and Cossack soldiers, among various other gentiles that were hardly fluent in Yiddish or Talmud studies. In fact, as his stories reveal, Babel developed a sort of Slavic-based 'noble savage' fetish, which is even apparent in Frank's The Sin of Jesus adaptation, which depicts the horrifically hapless life of a dumb peasant broad that just cannot win in life, even with the help of the ostensibly holiest of interventions. As Maurice Friedberg at the Jewish Virtual Library noted regarding Babel's bizarre gentile fetish, "It is this envy of what he saw as gentile physical strength and absence of moral restraints that caused Babel to create a gallery of Jewish protagonists who bore little resemblance to pathetic Jews described in certain Yiddish literature or to the Zionist dreamers and visionaries in certain modern Hebrew novels [...] Babel's scenes of resplendent Jewish wedding feasts and magnificent funeral processions are reminiscent of the lush canvases of a Breughel." Of course, as his photographs, especially his most famous work The Americans (1958), reveal, Frank also shares this gentile fetish.

Speaking of Pieter Bruegel the Elder, The Sin of Jesus is like the sort of film he might have directed had he been an underground Jewish beatnik filmmaker during the 1960s who was attempting to depict a post-apocalyptic farm where an impoverished philistine Jewess is forced to do manual labor as a result of NYC being wiped out in a nuclear holocaust. Indeed, while the film might feature Jesus and the actors portraying the leads are not all Jewish (Italian-American Julie Bovasso plays the female lead and Greek-American Telly Savalas plays her dead-beat beau), most of them certainly have would could be described as a stereotypical Hebraic appearance, including the angels. Needless to say, a film featuring Jesus, a farm, and hard manual labor could certainly be described as a dystopian scenario for a Jewish beatnik like Frank, so Jonas Mekas might have been right when he stated regarding the film in Movie Journal: The Rise of New American Cinema, 1959-1971, "No, I do not exaggerate much if I say, or rather repeat, that THE SIN OF JESUS will go into film history as one of the most pessimistic films ever made. Its pessimism is its main virtue. 'If your aim is high, it should be you that comes through the most,' says Robert Frank. The Pessimism of the film is his own: It is his own soul that he is revealing, his own unconscious. But we know that when it comes to true creation, it is the most personal art that is also the most universal. Self-expression of an artist is a universal act, it expresses a universal content. The lonely woman's (Julie Bovasso's) accusing and desperate cry in the dark, doomed New Jersey fields is an expression of the desperation of our own existence." Notably, Mekas would pay tribute to The Sin of Jesus in his film diary Loŝt, Loŝt, Loŝt (1976), which features behind-the-scenes footage of Frank directing the film. While Frank's film is certainly a strikingly pessimistic piece of cinema that would probably be unbearable were it not for its consistently potent moments of rural gothic pulchritude and foreboding atmosphere, it is first and foremost an expression of grueling melancholia where the viewer is virtually submerged in the hapless heroine's metaphysical waterfall of tears. Arguably most surprisingly, The Sin of Jesus is a fairly tender cinematic work with a uniquely cold and impenetrable Jesus Christ that has never been seen before or since in cinema history.

As referenced in To Free the Cinema: Jonas Mekas & the New York Underground (1992) by David E. James, François Truffaut somewhat humorously stated in 1961 in regard to The Sin of Jesus after seeing it in a Paris movie theater, "That's the worst movie I've ever seen. I guess I'm just not an original sin boy." Not to undermine the importance of the great half-heeb frog auteur's classic debut feature, but Frank's film contains more visceral sorrow in a single shot than Truffaut's sad autobiographical coming-of-age flick Les Quatre Cents Coups (1959) aka The 400 Blows does in its entirety. Of course, the difference between Truffaut and Frank is the former loved life and the latter seems to loathe it, or at least one would assume after watching his nightmarish pseudo-biblical pastoral parable, which not only condemns god but also could be interpreted as a sort of abstract suicide letter. Naturally, due to being based on a story by Jew Babel, adapted for the screen by a Jew named Howard Shulman, and directed by Jew Frank, the somewhat arrogantly titled film also gives you a good idea as to why the average Jew could never accept Jesus Christ as their lord and savior. Undoubtedly, the Jesus of Frank's film seems like a pathetic beatnik hobo compared to the Übermensch of suffering portrayed by Jim Caviezel in Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ (2004). In short, The Sin of Jesus is a devastating reminder as to why Jews will never forgive Jesus for the perennial curse of living with the unpardonable sin of deicide.

The Sin of Jesus begins depressingly enough with forlorn female protagonist Arina (Julie Bovasso in an uncredited lead role) grudgingly getting out of bed in the morning while her good-for-nothing fat bastard beau Felix (Telli Savales in what was supposedly his first film role) continues to sleep. While Arina spends all day working on the farm and counting eggs, Felix sleeps like a champ as if he would rather be dead than living. As Arina narrates in regard to her lonely and stagnant life, “Months roll by with baby inside. Well . . . Nobody minds. I’m the only woman here.” To convince herself that her pathetic life is somewhat tolerable, Arina thinks to herself, “Oh, it’s good. It’s good. Felix lives with me now . . . that’s good. In that barn. Oh, well. It’s my room.” Needless to say, when Felix’s friend (Philip Sterling)—a degenerate pervert that wastes no time in feeling up the female protagonist—comes by the farm and informs her regarding her bedridden boy toy, “He’s gonna be away for a longtime [...] I’m here now. I’ll be back,” she takes it extremely poorly, as her sole joy in life is crushed. When Arina later attempts to coerce Felix into not leaving by pleading to him in pathetic desperation, he gets physically violent and says nasty things to her like, “I’m sick of you and I’m sick of this place.” Of course, considering the baby growing in Arina’s body is probably not his as indicated in a flashback rape scene involving his friend, it is no surprise that Felix wants nothing to do with her or her unborn babe.

THE SIN OF JESUS

After reaching an all-time low after being left all by her lonesome, Arina is somewhat startled one day when she walks into her dilapidated barn and feels a sort of spiritual presence, or as she states herself, “[It] looks like a church. It is so still. Not a sound. So still. I’m all alone. Alone.” Luckily, before Arina knows it, a rather sullen and gaunt Jesus Christ (Roberts Blossom) appears inside the barn, so she immediately complains to him, “Jesus? Lord Jesus? I’m the girl that works on the farm. He left me. Felix went away. I have his baby. I don’t know what to do. He went away. Felix left me. I’m troubled. Please. Please, can you help me? I’m in trouble. I don’t know what to do.” While Jesus cannot perform the miracle of bringing deadbeat buffoon Felix back, he can perform certain miracles and makes her a special offer, stating like a pawnshop dealer with an unnervingly flat affect, “In heaven, there is an angel named Alfred. He is very unhappy. He wants to return to earth. For four years, I will give him to you as a husband. There’s lots of fun in him, but no seriousness.” Indeed, as the viewer soon learns, Alfred (St. George Brian) is probably the most mirthfully autistic and mindlessly hedonistic angel of cinema history, yet he is ultimately no match for the desperate lechery of pathetically sexually repressed protagonist Arina, who does not consider the extreme sensitivity of the heavenly young man’s otherworldly body. Jesus also informs Arina that there is no chance that she will be able to have a baby with Alfred, but she does not care because she is so excited.

When Jesus comes back a second time, he brings with him a less than angelic collection of multicultural angels that include a couple depressed young Jewesses, a lone negro, a seemingly queer and depressed fire-crotched boy, and a goofy four-eyed Asian, among others. Of course, Jesus also brings Alfred, who is a fairly gawky boy that looks like he would make for a better son than lover for Arina. When Jesus declares, "The Angels have come to be at your wedding," Arina immediately attempts to leave with Alfred, as if she is so desperately horny that she cannot even bother to spare a couple minutes to celebrate her special day with an extremely special supernatural cast of characters. Jesus also makes sure to inform Arina in regard to Alfred's wings that they are, "delicate as a baby's bread. If you don't take them off each night before he goes to bed, you will kill him." Rather unfortunately but not all that surprisingly considering she is a fairly slow-witted woman, Arina seems to be too excited to pay attention when Jesus warns her of autistic angel Alfred's fatally frail wings. After the somewhat kitschy yet nonetheless celestial wedding ceremony where the angels throw feathers and play brass instruments in tribute to the eccentric newlyweds, Arina brings Alfred inside her humble abode and celebrates with him in an otherworldly scene that seems like the female protagonist's idea of heaven. Not surprisingly, Arina forgets to take off Alfred's wings before mounting his otherworldly member, thus resulting in a tragic deadly honeymoon. Undoubtedly, Arina was completely infatuated with her new husband and revealed a sort of radiating glow of seemingly immaculate happiness during their wedding night that was in stark contrast to her previous morbidly melancholy self, so naturally Arina takes Alfred's rather senseless premature death fairly badly. Somewhat provocatively, Arina ultimately blames her own stupidity that led to Alfred's death on Jesus, as if he did not warn her about making sure to take off the angel's wings before fucking him.

The next day, Arina carries Alfred's tattered wings outside to Jesus, who states to her in a benign authoritarian fashion, "As it is on earth, so shall it be with you for this day on" and then calmly berates her for "killing my angel." At this point, Arina becomes irately hysterical and loudly cries out, "Who made me like this? Who made my body heavy like this? Who made my soul lonely and stupid? Tell me! Who made a woman like me?" but Jesus simply looks away and states without even the slightest hint of emotion, "Go back, Irena. There is nothing more to say." When Arina finally goes inside, she holds her womb while recalling a tragic incident when Felix's creepy friend raped her, hence her somewhat mysterious pregnancy and why her (ex)beau probably left her. When Arina goes outside the next day, she yells, "I don't want to know. I don't need any answers" while a rather dejected and guilt-ridden Jesus meekly lurks around the farm. No longer able to tolerate her insufferably lonely life of incessant misery and misfortune, Arina curses the world and especially its creator. In the end, Jesus succumbs to guilt and vulnerability, gets on his knees, and then reveals that he is hardly almighty by pathetically pleading to Arina, "Forgive me. Forgive your sinful god," but she now lacks the capacity for forgiveness and coldly replies, "Me ... forgive him? I can't. I have no forgiveness." Undoubtedly, in Arina's heart, god is now dead.

THE SIN OF JESUS

Undoubtedly, the more I find out about director Robert Frank, the more loathsome he seems, so I think it is only fitting that he is no fan of The Sin of Jesus, which I regard as easily his greatest and most accomplished cinematic achievement. Indeed, in an interview with Jack Sargeant featured in the book Naked Lens: Beat Cinema (1995), Frank would state the film “was not very good” and explain, “Well, it was an Isaac Babel story and the mistake was to take a story and try and make a film of it, but I was learning, you know, because there was no film schools, you had to learn by making stuff.” Aside from his rarely-seen Rolling Stones doc Cocksucker Blues (1972), the rest of Frank’s cinematic oeuvre is either obscenely overrated (e.g. Pull My Daisy), aesthetically autistic (e.g. Me and My Brother), embarrassingly masturbatory (e.g. Conversations in Vermont, The Present), or just plain worthless (e.g. Energy and How to Get It). With his sole mainstream feature Candy Mountain (1987) co-directed by Rudy Wurlitzer, Frank would ultimately get over his obsession with hipster posturing, so naturally I never suspected that he would have directed something worthwhile in his early filmmaking. In fact, as a result of my disappointment with the director’s other films, I was absolutely shocked by how much I appreciated The Sin of Jesus to the point where I am shocked that Frank even directed it. Certainly, female lead Julie Bovasso and cinematographer German cinematographer Gert Berliner—a man best known for his photography—deserve a lot of credit for the film’s aesthetic majesty, as the actress’ performance and the cinematography are certainly the most memorable aspects of the film. Of course, unlike most of Frank’s films, the Jesus parable actually has an actual storyline and talented actors as opposed to posturing beatniks and schizophrenic Hebrews doing nothing. Although just an assumption, I am pretty sure that Frank’s post-holocaust hatred and pathos certainly inspired his uniquely unkindly depiction of Jesus. Naturally, I can see how the film might be embarrassing for the director on retrospect, as it reveals an outstanding arrogance and megalomania in its renouncing of god, but then again that is one of the things that makes it so powerful. Indeed, the film certainly features the sort of Christ-hating that inspired Jews like Babel to become Bolsheviks. In terms of other covertly kosher quasi-metaphysical movies where the lead character arrogantly turns their back on god in the end, Hebraic auteur Michael Tolkin’s debut feature The Rapture (1991) starring half-Hebrews Mimi Rogers and David Duchovny is in many ways quite thematically similar to The Sin of Jesus and the two films certainly make for a great double feature.

Despite my lack of religiousness and my general revulsion towards hypocritical Christ-bashing Jews that never seem to find the time to criticize the various glaringly barbaric aspects of Judaism and the tyrannical genocidal Jewish G-d, I think that it is a sad irony that, out of all of the many J.C. films that have been made, The Sin of Jesus is probably my favorite. Of course, the film is less about Jesus than it is about a lefty Jew’s contempt for the idea of Jesus and what he represents, but that is not why I appreciate it. Indeed, to me, the film unequivocally proves that an artist's work can be appreciated in spite of its dubious political or even metaphysical message. After all, I doubt most fans of Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972) have ever read Moonchild (1923) or would describe themselves as Crowleyites. As an urban Jewish bohemian that was born to a wealthy Judaic family in Switzerland during the Nazi era who once dubiously bitched regarding the supposed antisemitism of a cop in a small Arkansas town, "I remember the guy [policeman] took me into the police station, and he sat there and put his feet on the table. It came out that I was Jewish because I had a letter from the Guggenheim Foundation. They really were primitive," Frank seems like the last person that could create a potent and lasting piece of rural cinematic Americana, yet The Sin of Jesus is simply unforgettable in terms of its sheer imagery, venomous cynicism, throbbing pathos and penetrating pangs of pessimism. After watching Frank's film and noticing its seething rage directed towards god, I could not help but be reminded of Judaic philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein's wise and rather un-Jewish words, "It isn't sensible to be furious even at Hitler; how much less so at God." Of course, the somewhat bizarre thing about The Sin of Jesus is that Frank reveals rage towards a religious figure that he, as a proud atheistic Jew, does not even actually believe in, but then again one could argue that the film is actually an attempt to confront the seeming absurdity of poor, ignorant, and downtrodden peasants being the most likely to have faith in Jesus of Nazareth when they have such horrible, miserable, and accursed lives. In that sense, the film proves to be provocative, if not misguided, but I suspect that it is just really one of the seemingly infinite examples of a Jew rejecting that Jesus was not the long awaited Messiah of the Messianic prophecies. As to how someone that is so poor and unlucky could be religious, Wittgenstein offered an insight when he wrote, "People are religious to the extent that they believe themselves to be not so much imperfect as ill. Any man who is half-way decent will think himself extremely imperfect, but a religious man thinks himself wretched." After all, it takes a certain degree of profound arrogance to, not unlike Frank, condemn a religious figure, especially a creator god, even if you do not believe in said religious figure, but I guess it might be a little different with Jesus, who makes Jews feel culpable for deicide, hence the classic antisemitic slur 'Christ-killer.' Additionally, I would not be surprised if Jews like Frank blame Jesus for pogroms and even the holocaust, not to mention the stereotype of a Hebrew complaining "Where was God?" in relation to said holocaust (in that sense, one could argue that Frank's film is a sort of cryptic-holocaust flick where a Christian acts as a stand-in for a Jew in the denouncing of god). While Hollywood movies and mainstream TV shows never miss an opportunity to mock Christ, The Sin of Jesus seems to be one of the few cinematic examples where a Jew 'attempts' to make some sense of the supposed 'false messiah,' so naturally it should be no surprise that the film wallows in misery, melancholy, and tragic misfortune, as if it is the expression of the Jewish collective unconscious. Either way, Frank's film surely had the opposite result on me as the director intended, as it gave me the urge to learn more about the real Jesus Christ, who was surely not anything like the eponymous melancholy wimp of 'The Sin of Jesus.

THE SIN OF JESUS

-Ty E

THE HITCHER

Robert Harmon (1986)

Rutger Hauer is one of the most intense actors ever to grace the silver screen. Unfortunately, he has never acquired as many roles as he deserves. Dutchman Hauer personifies the ultimate male character. He makes "actors" like Harrison Ford (especially in Blade Runner) and Dustin Hoffman look like the weak males that they really are. Rutger Hauer demands your complete attention in every scene he is featured in. His role as a killer in The Hitcher was a wise choice on the casting directors part. The Hitcher follows a young man and his attempt at escaping the murderous stoicism of Rutger Hauer (as the Hitcher). The hitcher loves to play psychological games with the young man. In a way, the hitcher is turning the young man into a "man." The hitcher forces the young man to develop his killer instinct for survival. Rutger Hauer becomes the teacher that you never asked to have. Antichrist Michael Bay recently produced a blasphemous remake of The Hitcher, a film that I turned off within minutes. It offers the same trash you can expect from most contemporary cheap violence found in the lairs of Hollywood hell. It also features a female heroine to compliment Hollywood's obsession with promoting feminism (not for female rights, but to subvert Western culture). In short, it stinks worse than a pile of homeless vomit. I really wish the young man in The Hitcher took a nice big bite out of the finger he had mistaken for a French fry. Unintentional cannibalism is a trend that really needs to catch on. I am sure there is a surplus of third world meat just waiting to be devoured. Rutger Hauer didn't become a superman by eating cabbage.

In conclusion, The Hitcher is a fun psychological slasher film. I would be lying if I didn't say I admired the ambiguity of the hitchhiker and his various mind games. I didn't have much respect from the young man. He reminded me more of a turd that needed to be flushed. The end of The Hitcher was quite heartbreaking.

-Ty E

SLEEPAWAY CAMP
SLEEPAWAY CAMP

Robert Hiltzik (1983)

Aside from when I saw a number of the A Nightmare on Elm Street films and John Carpenter's Halloween (1978) when I was a little kid and my initial viewing of The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) and its sardonic sequel The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 (1986) when I was in middle school, I cannot think of very many slasher flicks that have ever left any sort of deep impression me, especially after I became a teenage and was no longer impressed by pseudo-mystifying retarded masked killers and bare breasts, though I can think of at least one film from the mostly hopelessly banally formulaic and singularly soulless horror sub-genre that left me, like most first time viewers of the film, quite shocked and even repelled. Indeed, Sleepaway Camp (1983) aka Nightmare Vacation directed by Robert Hiltzik is notable for having one of the most ridiculously shocking and equally repugnant twist endings in all of cinema history and luckily when I first saw the film when I was about 18 no one had already spoiled it for me (in fact, if you have not seen the film and want to, you should probably refrain from reading this review, even though the flick will probably still surprise you even if you know what to expect). While more or less just as tasteless, illogical, ineptly directed and artless as the average stupid disposable slasher turd, the film somehow has lots of character, charm, gallons of venomous gallows humor, and a preternaturally perverse conclusion that is guaranteed to internally wound the legions of LGBT lobotomized lemmings belonging to the forsaken generation known as millennials. Featuring ugly muscular wops in booty shorts that accentuate their genitals, preteen boys doing crude borderline homoerotic things like putting their bare asses in other boys' faces, a goofy minstrel-esque Uncle Tom negro with large frog eyes, creepy gay dream-sequences involving small children and their bourgeois flamer 'fathers,' a superlatively shady and ambiguously Hebraic summer camp owner who is more concerned with losing business than losing campers to horrific deaths, and slutty guidettes that have dedicated their sad little petty lives to making sure that all boys have their eyes on them and no other girls, Sleepaway Camp is a pleasantly offensive and bittersweetly sickeningly piece of pseudo-Freudian slasher trash as directed by a seemingly psychopathic kosher would-be-comedian who uses the horror sub-genre as a means to playfully poke fun of pedos, homos, sluts, dumb wops, buffoonish blacks and various other kinds of people that are easy to make fun of yet are rarely satirized in cinema nowadays because Hollywood is run mostly by culture-distorting cultural Marxist degenerates of the largely Judaic persuasion who want the masses to believe that flooding the United States with third worlders, pretending that all races and genders are equal, and accepting a guy that wants to have his balls chopped and dick turned inside out is normal are all important religious doctrines that will lead the country to becoming some sort of magical utopia where race, sex, and morality have all been transcended in a manner that makes the peak liberal future world depicted in John Boorman's Zardoz (1974) seem outmoded and counterrevolutionary by comparison. Arguably one of the most idiosyncratic elements of the film aside from its singularly shocking ending is its shameless misuse of histrionic melodrama in a manner that reminds the viewer they are watching a film about a bunch of goofy New York City and New Jersey Jews and Guidos and not some boring uptight WASPs like the ones that are mocked in Hebraic Hollywood hack Barry Sonnenfeld's Addams Family Values (1993), thus making the cinematic experience all the more racially insensitive and, in turn, hilarious. Bathed in more (seemingly unintentional) bathos than blood as a distinctly tasteless yet undeniably creative slasher piece where all the victims are murdered in various absurd ways that makes a mockery out of their fairly violent and brutal deaths, Sleepaway Camp is like a disharmonious marriage between the seemingly discordant cinematic sensibilities of veteran Semitic smut-peddler Lloyd Kaufman and an exceedingly emotionally stunted pothead Douglas Sirk.

After a pseudo-omnibus and pointlessly long establishing shot of an abandoned summer called 'Camp Arawak' where a piece of wood reading "For Sale" is nailed to the main sign, the film cuts to a shot of a little boy named Peter and his twin sister Angela play fighting on a boat while their discernibly effete divorced single father John Baker (Dan Tursi) sunbathes like some rich old self-absorbed queen. When a moronic lifeguard who is clearly desperate for pussy foolishly allows a Jewish American Princess named Mary Ann (Alyson Mord) take over the steering wheel after she desperately begs him by saying outstandingly arrogant things like, "I know who to drive these things...My old man's got one twice as big," things get a little bit ugly and reveal why a man should never allow a woman to drive. Indeed, not long after the father and his kids' boat tips over after the poof-like patriarch clumsily loses his balance and causes the entire small sea vessel to flip over, Mary Ann loses control of the speedboat and runs them over, thereupon killing the patriarch and his son, or so it initially seems. Curiously, a random queer named Lenny (James Paradise), who watches while in a state of paralyzed horror when the speedboat mows down the family, screams when he sees the father's corpse floating in the lake, thus hinting that the kid's daddy is a donut-puncher. Flash forward eight years later and the little girl, Angela Baker (Felissa Rose), is now a seemingly autistic teenage girl of the extremely introverted sort who lives with her gregarious guido cousin Ricky Thomas (Jonathan Tiersten) and discernibly deranged aunt Dr. Martha Thomas (Desiree Gould), who is seeing the kids off to summer camp and, for whatever reason, strangely opts to give the kids phony medical documents for a physical, but not before warning the two, "Just be careful not to tell anyone how you got them. Oh, no, no...I'm afraid they would not approve of that at all...even though they know that I am a doctor." Aunt Martha, who dresses like some sort of super chic French lipstick lesbian and seems to suffer from some sort of comorbid Bipolar disorder, is such an exceedingly eccentric woman that she tied a string around her finger to remember to give the kids the medical documents, though it will not be until the end of the film that the viewer discovers the true degree of her derangement.

SLEEPAWAY CAMP

Camp Arawak is owned and run by a dirty old man named Mel Coštic (veteran Jewish actor Mike Kellin, who appeared in Richard Fleischer's The Boston Strangler (1968)) that looks like he could be the debauched brother of pulp auteur Samuel Fuller and seems like the sort of guy that made his fortune illegally peddling porn, pussy, and PCP, among other things. Unbeknownst to Mel, one of his campers this summer is an aspiring sadistic killer who has a fetish for creative killings and does not take kindly to unscrupulous conmen like himself who are not above hiring pedophiles and paying his negro employees a slave wage and treating them like they are retarded farm animals. When Angela and her cousin Ricky arrive at the camp, the perennially passive-aggressive protagonist refuses to both eat and talk, so a nice guido camp counselor of the stoic and muscular yet dumb sort named Ronnie (Paul DeAngelo) asks a morbidly obese slob of a cook named Artie (Owen Hughes) to specially prepare her whatever meal she might fancy in the hope that she will finally eat something. Unfortunately, proudly boorish vulgarian Artie is a repentant pedophile who calls underage girls "fresh chicken" and "baldies," so naturally he seizes the opportunity to try to molest Angela when he takes her in the back of the camp kitchen, but luckily cousin Ricky walks in before he can whip out his pedo prick. Somewhat strangely, not long after he attempts to defile Angela, Artie is critically injured and has all of the flesh on his flabby body horribly burned as a result of a mysterious camper causing a giant pot of boiling water to spill on the hapless hog-like kiddyfucker. Of course, kosher conman Mel is more interested in covering up the incident than the safety of his head cook, so he offers an extra $50 to each of the other cooks, who all happen to be meek acting nonwhites, to keep their mouths shut. As one might expect after seeing what happens to Artie after he attempts to molest the protagonist, every single character that dares to mess with quasi-autistic introvert Angela meets a grisly end, though one is not completely sure until the very end of the film as to whether or not she is actually the killer, especially since her cousin Ricky, who has serious anger problems, is especially protective of her.

Undoubtedly Angela's biggest nemesis at summer camp is a conspicuously cunty guidette slut with a glaringly large head and petite body named Judy (Karen Fields) who is so shamelessly narcissistic that she wears a shirt with her name on it and is jealous of any girl that gets more male attention than her, including creepy introverts like the protagonist. Naturally, Angela makes Judy feel quite uneasy by incessantly staring at her while maintaining an emotionless facial expression that ultimately causes the teenage she-bitch to fly into irrational rages. As is insinuated at the beginning of the film, Ricky and Judy were apparently a romantic item the previous summer, but now that the little slut has the attention of older boys, she has no need for the little lad, who calls her a “bitch” under his breath after she blows him off upon the two being reunited for the first time in a year. Unfortunately for Angela, Judy is best friends with the main female camp counselor Meg (Katherine Kamhi), who also develops a special irrational hatred and resentment towards the ‘passively antisocial’ protagonist. Luckily for Angela, at least a first, Ricky’s sweet and generically handsome yet insufferably banal Aryan friend Paul (Christopher Collet of Michael Apted’s Firstborn (1984) and Marshall Brickman’s The Manhattan Project (1986)), soon develops a crush on her and treats her with an inordinate degree of kindness and respect that she is not used to. In fact, the first time he talks to Angela, Paul manages to get her to speak for the first time in the entire film (she simply says “goodnight,” which causes the would-be-loverboy to jump with joy), but the same night, a mullet-adorned boy named Kenny (soap opera actor John E. Dunn of the long running show All My Children aka AMC) who insulted the protagonist by rather rudely asking her “why are you so fucked up?” is drowned in the camp lake and found the next morning by an agitated counselor with snakes and other creatures on his already rotting corpse. Of course, conman Mel treats Kenny’s death like it is an accident, even though he knows that the teen was a good swimmer. When a group of boys dare to pelt Angela with water balloons from the relative safety of a cabin roof, the leader of the craven culprits, Billy (Loris Sallahain), soon finds himself locked inside a bathroom stall while taking a “wicked dump” where he is soon stung to death by a large swarm of bees in a fashion that recalls Curtis Harrington’s TV movie Killer Bees (1974) after some mysterious killer drops a beehive inside the locked piss-stained makeshift prison cell. Needless to say, the enigmatic mystery killer suffers from an eccentric form of sadism as reflected in the fairly eclectic ways he decides to dispatch his/her victims and the deaths only get all the more absurd as the film progresses.

When Paul makes various attempts to kiss and get physical with Angela and he is routinely rebuffed by the unconventionally shy protagonist for seemingly no reason, he naturally becomes sexually frustrated and soon falls prey to the lustful charms of alpha-slut Judy, who is jealous of the attention that the female lead gets from the ‘nice boy’ and thus takes him into the woods and begins kissing him even though she seems to have no genuine sexual interest in him. While Paul eventually pushes Judy away, the damage is already done as both Ricky and Angela witness his treacherous pseudo-romantic encounter with the resident camp whore. Of course, Paul immediately begs Angela to forgive him, but jealous wench Judy ruins his impassioned apology by revealing to the protagonist that he called her a “prude” due to her unwillingness to take their relationship to a more physical level. Meanwhile, conman Mel, who is more or less hysterical over the fact that reputation of his summer camp business is ruined due to all the recent violent deaths and is thus extremely desperate to discover the identity of the killer, comes to the somewhat dubious conclusion that Ricky—a fairly verbally violent and emotionally erratic young man that loves calling his enemies “cocksuckers” and threatening them in various way—is the mystery murderer and even grabs and attacks the young man and accuses him of the crimes while Amy and Meg proceed throw Angela into a lake. Needless to say, both Judy and Meg do not live long after what they do to Angela.

SLEEPAWAY CAMP

Indeed, Judy dies in what is arguably the most horrific yet fitting death scene when the killer visits her in her cabin while she is all alone, knocks her out, and she proceeds to shove an electric curling iron in her seemingly overused pussy while she is semi-conscious, thus causing the bitchy high school harlot to scream in abject horror as she perishes as a result of her badly burnt baby-chute. Additionally, after curiously agreeing to meet Mel for a romantic dinner despite the fact that he is probably old enough to be her grandfather, cunt counselor Meg is killed after someone literally stabs her in the back while she is showering in preparation for his dubious date with the dirty old man. Needless to say, when Mel, who was hoping to get a piece of young counselor cunt, goes looking for Meg when she does not show up for their planned dinner date and eventually discovers her unclad corpse lying face down with brutal stabs wound on the back, he breaks down and self-righteously declares in regard to Ricky, who he still believes is the killer, “He did it! I had him and I let him go... Please forgive me, Meg. I’ll stop him. I gotta stop him. He won’t get away, Meg. He won’t get away from me again.” Meanwhile, Paul meets up with Angela and pleads with her to give him a second chance and she replies by uttering the famous foreboding line, “Meet me at the waterfront after the social.” Around the same time, four out of six little preteen boys that were responsible for throwing sand at Angela are brutally hacked into pieces in the woods. When Mel finally finds Ricky, he begins brutally beating him to death with his bare hands like a savage rabid ape and then proceeds to attempt to escape from the camp so that no one will discover the deplorable things that he has done. Unfortunately for him, Mel decides to walk by the camp archery target and gets killed after the mysterious murder shoots an arrow into his neck, but not before saying while in a state of paralyzing denial upon observing the identity of the killer, “It can’t be you. It can’t be. It can’t be.” Of course, at this point in the film, it becomes fairly clear that Ricky is not the killer as he has just been beaten within an inch of his life by Mel and could not possibly have caught up with his would-be-killer so soon.

When Paul finally meets Angela at the waterfront, he is predictably excited when she seems to shed her sensual shyness and tells him to take his clothes off so that they can go skinny-dipping together in what one would assume would be a rather romantic late night swim between two virginal lovebirds. When counselor Ronnie and a nice female counselor named Susie (Susan Glaze) go looking for unaccounted campers due to the various string of brutal murders that have occurred that night, they eventually happen upon a completely unclad Angela, who is quietly singing to herself while cradling an equally naked Paul like he is precious little baby. At this point, the film begins getting especially unhinged and Angela has a flashback from eight years before when her crazy Aunt Martha sinisterly stated to 'her' upon adopting her after the death of her father and sibling, "Oh, you're going to enjoy living with us so much. Yes, I know you are! As a welcome home present, I bought you such wonderful new clothes. I just hope that Richard doesn't get jealous that I didn't get him anything. Oh, but then, he is such a dear. I'm sure that he won't mind. You see, I've always wanted a little girl. But, of course, when my husband left... Oh, well, that's all water under the bridge, as I always say. Water under the bridge! But it certainly will be a nice little surprise when Richard comes home to find a little girl in the house. Yes, I've always dreamed of a little girl just like you. I mean, we already have a little boy, so another one would simply not do. No, no, absolutely not. A little girl would be so much nicer, don't you think so, Angela? Angela... such a lovely name." Indeed, in a terrible transsexual twist, Angela is revealed to be not actually Angela but 'Peter.' Indeed, after his father and twin sister died, Aunt Martha forced Peter to assume his sister's identity and take her name, hence the protagonist's reluctance to shower with other girls at the camp and forged medical record, among other various questionable things that do not quite add up until the very end of the film. Since Aunt Martha is a doctor, she probably regularly injected poor Peter with female hormones when he was growing up. After the flashback scene, Ronnie and Susie are startled to see that 'Angela,' who is completely naked aside from blood that is soaked all over her body and is growling like a rabid beast in heat while holding Paul's decapitated head in one hand and a bloody knife in the other, is actually a male and has a swarthy little cock. Ultimately, Ronnie is more shocked about the fact that Angela has a penis and no tits than he is about coming to the revelation that she is actually the mysterious killer and that she has just decapitated Paul with a fairly small knife as demonstrated by the gregarious Guido's remark, "How can it be? My god, she's a boy!" Indeed, unfortunately it seems that Aunt Martha did not have enough skills as a doctor to personally give Angela a full sex change. Of course, the viewer is also more startled about the fact the ostensibly female protagonist has a prick than the fact that (s)he has just killed a very nice and caring young gentleman who would not dare to even harm a fly.

As can be expected for a film that was created on a relatively minuscule budget of $350,000 yet went on to earn $11,000,000 at the box office, Sleepaway Camp was followed by a couple sequels, albeit of the apparently unauthorized sort. Indeed, Sleepaway Camp II: Unhappy Campers (1988) and Sleepaway Camp III: Teenage Wasteland (1989) feature Bruce Springsteen's younger sister Pamela Springsteen as a post-op tranny Angela who has achieved her dream of becoming an ostensible biological woman with a gash yet still has a big enough undying homicidal urge to masquerade as a counselor at a nearby camp so that she can exterminate dumb teenagers in a variety of creatively malefic ways. Instead of the original director Hiltzik, Michael A. Simpson was responsible for directing both of these 'rogue sequels,' which have a sort of somewhat schlocky low-camp tone and are notable for predating both Wes Craven's New Nightmare (1994) and Scream (1996) in terms of being darkly comedic pieces of 'metacinema' that poke fun at the outmoded clichés and conventions of the slasher subgenre. The director of the two unofficial sequels, Michael A. Simpson, apparently wrote a screenplay for a third sequel entitled Sleepaway Camp: Berserk, but it is doubtful that it will ever get made, especially considering he has no rights to the franchise. A third unofficial sequel entitled Sleepaway Camp IV: The Survivor directed by Jim Markovic began production in the early 1990s but was aborted, though the footage from the unfinished film was included with Anchor Bay/Starz Entertainment's Sleepaway Camp DVD boxed set and in 2012 the film was even completed after recycled footage from the previous films was mixed with the new footage in an Ulli Lommel-esque fashion and subsequently released on DVD. After discovering that the original film had such a large cult following, the original Sleepaway Camp director, Robert Hiltzik, who curiously never directed another film after his first, decided to direct the first 'official' sequel. Indeed, while welcomed by fans, Hiltzik's sequel Return to Sleepaway Camp (2008) proved to be an abject disappointment and has next to nil of the charm, charisma, or effective dark humor of the original film. Apparently, Hiltzik also began working on a third 'official' sequel entitled Sleepaway Camp Reunion so as to complete a trilogy, as well as a remake, but hopefully neither of these films will reach past the pre-production stage as the franchise has become even more laughable than the A Nightmare on Elm Street, Friday the 13th, Halloween, and even Leprechaun film series.

SLEEPAWAY CAMP

Undoubtedly, Sleepaway Camp hold a special place in American 1980s horror cinema history alongside William Asher's Night Warning (1982) aka Butcher, Baker, Nightmare Maker and A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy's Revenge (1985), and Robert Harmon's The Hitcher (1986) as a rare sodomite slasher flick that baffles the mostly braindead fans of the horror subgenre. Of course, unlike the other mentioned films, there is nothing ambiguous in terms of the innate gayness of Hiltzik's film, which will surely offend the hell of out preposterously prissy LGBT social justice warrior types due to its uniquely flattering depiction of a homicidal boy who had a gay dad and whose deranged aunt inspired his murderous tendencies after forcing him to become a crypto-tranny when he was still just a little boy. As real-life true crime history like the life of American serial killer Henry Lee Lucas demonstrates, 'Angela' is not the first person who grew up to become a serial killer after his caretaker made him wear dresses. Despite the fact that the film features nil female nudity and is plagued by fairly creepy and/or crude insinuations of random homoeroticism (including a scene where a young boy puts his bare ass in another boy's face) and extra perverse male nudity (aside from the shocking ending, the film also apparently featured a male skinnydipping scene featuring male full-frontal nudity but it was later cut), Sleepaway Camp director Hiltzik is apparently a married father, thus it would not be hard for SJWs to accuse him of being a homo-hater. Somewhat curiously as revealed in an inter-title featured at the very beginning of the film reading, "In Fond Memory of Mom, A Doer," Hiltzik dedicated the film to his mother, which becomes all the more strange to think about when one considers the film's many similarities with Hitchcock's classic proto-slasher flick Psycho (1960).

The ultimate chick-with-a-dick slasher flick, Hiltzik's somewhat sophisticatedly sleazy cinematic work is an assault on the viewer, especially the male heterosexual viewer, who spends a good portion of the movie thinking about what is under the strange female lead's panties, only to discover it is a shriveled flaccid cock, Sleepaway Camp certainly deserves the dubious distinction of being a sort of slasher equivalent of Michael Sarne's botched Gore Vidal adaptation Myra Breckinridge (1970). Indeed, in terms of its bizarre approach to gender-bending and fairly cynical look at humanity, the film is probably the only slasher flick that could be screened as a double feature with Rainer Werner Fassbinder's masterpiece In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden (1978) aka In a Year with 13 Moons, though I think it work best in a double screening with Paul Bartel's underrated Hitchcockian 'trans-slasher' Private Parts (1972), which features a carnally confused killer who is a chick that wished she had a dick. Aside from Bartel's film, other films that feature a transsexual killer whose gender confusion is an innate ingredient of their homicidal rage include William A. Fraker's A Reflection of Fear (1972), Don Gronquist's Unhinged (1982), and Geoffrey 'Romper Stomper' Wright's Cherry Falls (2000) starring tragic Hollywood diva Brittany Murphy. Additionally, Bob Clark's debut She-Man: A Story of Fixation (1967) and Russ Meyer's Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970) provide more absurdist examples of tyrannical transsexual sadism and savagery. Exceedingly Hebraic in its summer camp setting (as films like Dirty Dancing only cryptically hint at, most American Hebrew children go to Zionist summer camps where they are brainwashed into oblivion about the superiority of their race), almost vaudevillian murder gimmicks and lowbrow humor, and post-Freudian sexual perversity, Sleepaway Camp is ultimately like The Burning (1981) with balls and a bad attitude, at least as far as sleazy Semitic slasher flicks are concerned, though thankfully it lacks the involvement of kosher creatures like Jason Alexander and Harvey Weinstein. In its wicked subversion and transsexualization of the played-out 'final girl' trope and decidedly dubious depiction of the victims as 'getting what they deserved,' not mention its depiction of a autistic teenage chick with a prick, Hiltzik's film is ultimately more cleverly transgressive than most of the films associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement, albeit it was clearly constructed to appeal to an unwitting mainstream audience, thus arguably making it all the more subversive. Of course, unlike most slasher flicks, Hiltzik's film is at least partially scary, as nothing would be more horri-fyng to a teenage boy than to taking off a girl's panties and finding a wrinkly cock instead of creamy cunt staring back at them. Naturally, the film would also probably scare the hell out of certain parents and child alike in its particularly perverse 'Primal Scene' (or what Freud called 'Urszene') flashback segment where the mentally perturbed protagonist recalls giggling with his twin sister upon catching their beloved daddy in bed with his lover. Indeed, you know a horror flick is doing something right when you do not know whether or not you should laugh or vomit during scenes that have nothing to do with violent death, dismemberments, etc. Indeed, if there was a slasher that might inspire Bruce Jenner to get the testicular fortitude to go all the way with his patently preposterous post-midlife-crisis tranny charade and make the mistake of a lifetime by getting his cock and balls hacked off, it is mostly certainly Sleepaway Camp, which plainly demonstrates that a chick with a dick is an unspeakable sight that incites a sort of short-term metaphysical affliction in those individuals that are unfortunate enough to witness such a thing.

SLEEPAWAY CAMP

-Ty E

RETURN TO SLEEPAWAY CAMP

Robert Hiltzik (2008)

How could I not drool at the news of a planned Sleepaway Camp sequel? Especially after how disturbing the ending to the original was. The long awaited sequel is finally released and my prying eyes are craving for more inspired camp slashers. How do you think I took it when Robert Hiltzik slapped me in the face with his film? I almost teared up a tiny bit. And to think Isaac Hayes' (Bless your soul) last film was this trife piece of shit. Return to Sleepaway Camp is the most uninspired sequel I've seen. What makes this more of a supreme let-down is the fact that popular horror sites are calling it the film to end all horror films. That might be a little out of context but they might as well had said it.

The film opens up with a character named Alan. He is a bit of a retard and the film uses this as not a plot for sympathy but a tool to make you hate this character, at least I did. Alan is a sniveling little shit full of inane Pre-school insults. His constant bullying has acquired him to be bullied thus sparking a voracious food chain of Big-medium-small. The arsenal of dialogue Alan carries is retarded, plain and simple. I'd hate to use such a generic description, but I do mean "retarded" in the most offensive way possible. After Alan more-or-less calls people doo-doo heads, the killings begin. Several of the cast members are rejoining the story from the previous films after a long hiatus. Hibernation is a deadly force to reckon with. This sequel appears to disregard the two middle films and just initiates what Hiltzik believes are clever kills. Clever being filling someones stomach with gasoline and lighting them on fire. Or giving someone a deep-fryer swirlie. The lot of these kills can be found in any Friday the 13th continuation. Completely devoid of imagination. As opposed to a Listening copy. Smart move, Mr. Hiltzik. During research of the film, I discovered an iMDB thread of a certain poster claiming this to be the best movie ever; a "masterpiece". With a bit of free time, I viewed the profile and found this to be said users only post to the defunct account. This is a similar tactic used by independent horror film directors to promote their film by creating a counterfeit opinion. Return to Sleepaway Camp is a travesty of horror. It struggles to capture that 80s pathos. The only thing Hiltzik managed to create with this unnecessary sequel was a visual surgery on the senses. Robert Hiltzik, I have a message for you. "Your ass stinks."

-mAQ

SHREDDER ORPHEUS
SHREDDER ORPHEUS

Robert McGinley (1990)

While Jacques Demy's Parking (1985) is a rather strange and unfortunately equally kitschy update of Jean Cocteau's classic Orpheus (1950) aka Orphée, it pales in comparison to the otherworldly new wave-ish dystopian decadence of the obscure little cult item Shredder Orpheus (1990), which is easily the most insanely idiosyncratic cinematic reworking of the ancient Greek myth ever made. Indeed, an innately whimsical work that absolutely personifies the phrase, "guilty pleasure," the film even makes Patrick Conrad's high-camp mutation of Orpheus, Mascara (1987), which replaces hell with a fancy tranny-run S&M opera house, seem rather restrained by comparison. While advertised as a sort of brother film to classic goofy 1980s skate flicks like Thrashin' (1986) and Gleaming the Cube (1989) and marketed with the totally 'tubular' tagline, "They're shredding their way to Hell!", Shredder Orpheus is more like Cocteau's Orpheus meets Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982) as directed by someone that is more interested in making a mockery of the New Wave and New Romanticist fashion sense than promoting it as demonstrated by the fact that the heavy-metal-minded protagonist 'shreds' on lead guitar and that the villains look like preposterously dressed fashion victims who look like they graduated from the Klaus Nomi and Steve Strange School of Fashion. Written, directed, produced, and starring a then-rather-young Robert McGinley in what would be his directorial debut, this post-apocalyptic sk8 cult flick may not be comparable to what Orson Welles achieved at 26 with his true auteur piece Citizen Kane (1941), but it is certainly what one might describe as a "hidden gem" or "lost cult classic," as a rather curious and original work that really has no contemporaries. Released by the VHS-only film production and distribution company Action International Pictures (AIP) that was founded by Anglo-Jewish choreographer turned filmmaker David Winters (who, incidentally, directed Thrashin'), Shredder Orpheus was pretty much guaranteed to be forgotten right from the get go, but luckily a bunch of film nerds that are obsessed with the company that distributed it on videotape have given it new life via the internet. Influenced by everything from films like Cocteau's Orpheus and Marcel Camus' Black Orpheus (1959) to old school skate and music subcultures to C.G. Jung's theories on archetypes and featuring a throbbing musical score by an ex-member of the industrial metal group Ministry and half-crazed Hebraic writer, poet, and performance artist Steven Jay "Jesse" Bernstein (who was a comrade of alpha-Beat William S. Burroughs) as a crippled war veteran, belligerent babbling bum, hobo guru, and proletarian philosopher that wheels himself around on a skateboard to get from place to place, Shredder Orpheus is a hysterical hodgepodge of high but mostly low kultur that reminds one how truly aesthetically absurd and fantasy-driven the late-1980s/early-1990s were. Set in a dystopian world where television is literally broadcasted in hell, the film is pure fetishistic fantasy escapism of the rather pleasantly retrograde sort. Indeed, in no other film will you find what could be called, “New Wave Cocteauian Kitsch.”

As narrated by a crippled war veteran named ‘Axel’ (Steven Jesse Bernstein)—a fellow who has to rely on a skateboard for mobility because spending three years fighting in Central American jungles left him without the use of his hips and ripped his nervous system to shreds—while rolling around in dystopian Seattle of Shredder Orpheus, five acres of shipping containers have been used to house the proletarian population in an futuristic hellhole that is called ‘The Grey Zone.’ To pass the time, Axel and his much younger sexually deviant shoplifter skate buddies ‘Scratch’ (Linda Severt) and ‘Razoreus’ (Marshall Reid) regularly leave the zone to see their friend Orpheus’ band ‘Orpheus and the Shredders’ play. Orpheus Hellenbach (played by writer/director/producer Robert McGinley) has a beautiful fiancée named Eurydice (Megan Murphy) and it looks like they have a bright future together, but when an evil executive from an aesthetically terrorist TV station located in hell called Euthanasia Broadcasting Network (EBN) sees the little lady playing a gig on television with her boy toy at a venue called the ‘Club Trash Bin’ and concludes that she is the “key to the heartbeat of the youth market,” he and his equally deathly pale ‘psychic vampire’ cohorts come up with a conspiratorial plan to kidnap her and make her a perennial slave to the nefarious television network. Indeed, after the couple’s wedding where the groom Orpheus is given a rare Gibson guitar that was co-created by Jimi Hendrix and that was designed to be the “ultimate power-chord machine that would alter and elevate human consciousness,” Eurydice is kidnapped and brought to the infernal EBN TV station. Of course, Orpheus chases after his beloved and enters hell where he is momentarily reunited with his deceased parents who now work as virtual slaves whose job is to shred peoples’ memories, which they do with a mere paper shredder. While his father attempts to shred his memory because otherwise he could subject himself to “100,000 years of word processing” hell for not following orders, Orpheus is saved when his mother intervenes, though it comes at the price of losing his memory of his parents in a symbolic scene reflecting the protagonist’s break with his progenitors and maturation to adulthood.

After being coerced into performing with his new haze-generating Hendrix guitar on television by a Svengali-like TV producer that looks like he could be the more stocky little brother of Klaus Nomi and terrorizing the discernibly jaded Goth-like hell inhabitants of hell with his killer guitar shredding, Orpheus is told by the rather dapper Dracula-esque dictator of EBN, Hades (Gian-Carlo Scandiuzzi) and his more empathetic wife Persephone (Vera McCaughan) that he and Eurydice may leave hell and return to the Grey Zone if he manages to walk back home without looking back at his wife. Of course, the entire thing is a trick to bring up television ratings and while Orpheus does manage to get out of the broadcasted hellhole, his beloved princess Eurydice is trapped there forever as a regularly performing slave of the network, thus causing the protagonist to fall into a deep and dark metaphysical prison of internal infernal misery. While Orpheus and his band become all the more popular as time passes, he “doesn’t give a shit” because his undying love and longing for Eurydice only grows all the more with each passing day. After deciding enough is enough after seeing his wife dance on stage with Hades in a scene that resembles an old German expressionist film, Orpheus opts to go on a Wagnerian quest and skates through a killer parking garage to get to hell to save Eurydice.

SHREDDER ORPHEUS

Unbeknownst to Orpheus, who believes he has been given a gift from the gods, the pernicious producer at EBN has supplied him with a demonic haze-blowing skateboard, as Hades and his comrades want the heroic skate rat to come back to their studios so they can improve their ratings. After literally jumping off the Satanic multi-story parking garage with his skateboard and skating through some infernal tunnels, Orpheus eventually arrives in hell where Hades coerces him into playing the sole contestant on a deadly game show where he must choose between two doors: one containing his death and the other containing his beloved Eurydice. Of course the game is rigged and Orpheus soon finds himself being decapitated by a group of chainsaw-wielding she-bitches who resemble members of Gwar after he ends up choosing the wrong door. In a scene clearly ripped from a scene near the end of David Lynch’s Eraserhead (1977), Orpheus’ decapitated head enters the spotlight of a studio floor and Eurydice picks it up and says goodbye to her beloved in a broadcasted scenario that certainly earns EBN record ratings. After the show, the EBN producer carelessly disposes of Orpheus’ head, which ends up in a river and is later found by one of the belated skate-rocker’s young comrades. In the end, the skaters use Orpheus’ skull as a source of meaning in their rather nihilistic lives and regularly perform rituals with it. Indeed, via his skull, Orpheus’ legacy lives on as a sort of timeless skater mythology.

While it probably does not say much, Shredder Orpheus is easily the most sophisticated and intricate skater flick ever made as a work that even makes the skate rat favorite Thrashin’—a reworking of Shakespeare’s Romeo and Juliet meets a punk take on Rebel Without a Cause (1955)—seem rather conventional by comparison. Unquestionably, one of the most interesting things about McGinley’s flick is its seemingly absurd yet somewhat admirable attempt to create a sort of skater mythology as influenced by the theories of C.G. Jung. Indeed, skulls have always been a part of skateboard culture, with the most popular skate company of the 1980s, Powell Peralta, which had a skate team called ‘The Bones Brigade,’ even using one for their iconic logo. In Shredder Orpheus, the skull becomes a positive image as opposed to the negative as it becomes an archetype for valor, courage, artistic integrity, and general heroism. In that sense, the film certainly brings new meaning to the age old expression: “skate or die.” Speaking of Powell Peralta, McGinley would state in a late 2013 interview regarding his influences for the film: "I already mentioned the Cocteau films, but a key inspiration were the Stacey Peralta and the Bones Brigade videos." For whatever reason, McGinley would not direct another feature until almost a decade later when he released Jimmy Zip (1999), which is apparently about a young pyromaniac who teams up with a metal sculptor to wage war against both the art world and criminal underworld. While directed and edited in a fairly conventional 'hack-like' style, Shredder Orpheus is anything but conventional when it comes to its eccentric themes and imaginary, as a sort of satirical dystopian neo-fairytale of the rather anarchistic yet mythmaking sort. Trashed by the fashion keen punk rock fanboys that assembled the resourceful yet insufferably written book Destroy All Movies!!! The Complete Guide to Punks on Film (2010), McGinley's poorly neglected should-be-cult-classic is a work that, somewhat paradoxically, will probably be best understood and appreciated by cinephiles with a special palate for experimental and avant-garde works, as opposed to punk rock philistines and contemporary skaters. Indeed, Shredder Orpheus may feature rather lame old school skater slang and majorly moronic scenes of comic relief, but it is also a piece of tastefully trashy punk poetry. As for the place of the Orpheus myth in the modern day world, director McGinley probably said it best when he stated in an interview regarding his interest in reworking the ancient story: "Usually protagonists in the Hero's Journey stories are warriors, but Orpheus is a unique hero: a transformative artist and musician that could manipulate consciousness as well as animate material objects. I found the music-driven love and death story embodied in the Orpheus archetype irresistible." Indeed, Orpheus is the hero of poets and artists, so it is only natural that Shredder Orpheus depicts hell as a mainstream television network that is run by pale yet swarthy beings that incessantly distort reality and look like they slithered out of the ghettos of Eastern Europe.

-Ty E

ORDINARY PEOPLE
ORDINARY PEOPLE

Robert Redford (1980) Ordinary People is a hopeful film about a Bourgeoisie family with WASP psychosis that is cured by a magical Jewish psychiatrist. The film won four academy awards and was the directorial debut from Robert Redford. Ordinary People is also fairly weak and hollow drama that examines the character conflicts in a typical banal white upper middle class family. The film was most likely so critically acclaimed because of its endorsement of psychiatry and psychoanalysis. The film's protagonist, Conrad, is a quite conflicted character. The order and discipline so commonly associated with people of Conrad's over privileged background is coming to shambles. After the accidental boating death of his universally loved brother Buck (and suffering from survivor guilt), Conrad made the decision to attempt suicide and fails. Once released from a mental hospital, he still is incapable of functioning in his orderly upper middle class background. He eventually starts to see a mysterious psychiatrist Dr. Berger. Dr. Berger uses unconventional and psychoanalytic psychiatry techniques in hopes of rescuing Conrad from his genteel psychosis. We never get to know anything about Dr. Berger's character aside for his brilliant ability to de-racinate a WASP from their pathological roots. He gives no evidence of his true character as he certainly does not want to reveal his own "psychosis." Dr. Berger seems to suffer from a sort of sociopath behavior bent on subversion for subversions sake. He would have made a great disciple under Sigmund Freud. Sigmund Freud was heavily influenced by his contempt for German culture and strong ties to his Jewish background. He considered Germans to be pathological because of their emphasis on gender differences (among other things). He so arrogantly sought to "cure" Germans (referring to them as Aryans) of their "irrational" cultural heritage and norms. Freud further displayed his disdain for Western Civilization when he stated, "We are bringing America the plague" in reference to his introduction of psychoanalysis to the United States. Interestingly enough, Freud refused to ever have himself psychoanalyzed. This is very telling of both his character and agenda. Dr. Berger mirrors Freud in contemporary (or at least for when the film was made) practice.

Ordinary People is one of the more subtle Hollywood propaganda films that I have seen. It lets the WASP upper middle class know that they can cool down with a little help from wacky Jewish psychiatrists. Dr. Berger is a priest of the New World Order. His methods are not to be questioned and he is a producer of crucial psychological results. He encourages weakness and that weakness results in a sort of happy nihilism. By the end of Ordinary People, Conrad has less control over himself than before. The difference is that Conrad is now accepting of his weakness. It has been said many times that psychoanalysis has actually made patients worse due to their consciousness of their own faults and hang-ups. The real question to ask when Ordinary People reaches its conclusion is whether or not Conrad was cured. I highly doubt it.

-Ty E

KIDS
KIDS

Robert Rodriguez (2001)

Kids, Larry Clark's debut film, is still the best film by the perverted director. The film also made a name for Harmony Korine. Korine's cameo in Kids as a drug distributing raver is also a memorable thing to see. I think I would give Korine more credit with the creation of Kids as he introduced Larry Clark to the urban "subculture" featured in the film. In all honesty, Kids is an exploitation film in the truest sense with a slight hint of artistry. I remember becoming interested in Kids at a young age when I heard it was a film featuring skateboarding. When I actually got around to watching the film, I felt both disgusted and humored. I couldn't help but hate the two main wigger skaters, but at the same time find their antics to be retarded poetry. Casper claims to be "the dopest" ghost but really is degenerate filth. It makes one wonder if Justin Pierce, the actor that played Casper, decided to take his own life after realizing his performance in Kids is immortalized forever on celluloid. One also can't forget Harold Hunter, the real-life crackhead and professional skateboarder who rode for Zoo York skateboarding company. Mr. Hunter recently died, but thankfully he too has been immortalized in the film. Harold shows he has no shame when he shakes his dick for a group of white girls and boys. He also couldn't care less if a girl tells him to "stop!" Harold Hunter is better known in the skateboard world for his part in the Zoo York Mix-Tape. Another scene that truly sticks out in my mind is when a group of preteen boys share a blunt together on a couch. They are all lined up by skin color and show their respects to "the savior" Jesus Christ. I couldn't help but think it was odd that Larry Clark had them all touching each other with their shirts off. Mr. Clark is without doubt a borderline pedophile. Larry has even gone as far as to start skateboarding so he can become part of the "youth" subculture. I guess he really cares for children. Kids also made me realize that America is really turning into "the third world." Ever since the film came out over a decade ago, America has had even larger flood of uneducated immigrants. The youth featured in Kids, many of which mongrelized beyond racial recognition, are aimless and worthless. They live to fuck (and produce more unwanted children), get fucked up, and destroy. Destruction seems to really be their only instinct and they do it well. That being said, the only quality these individuals have is their ability to unintentionally entertain. A friend once told me that Kids "burned a hole in his soul" and I couldn't help but laugh.

-Ty E

GRINDHOUSE

Robert Rodriguez (2007) Cannibal Holocaust, I Spit on Your Grave, The Beyond, and Thriller: A Cruel Picture are all films that I hold close to my heart. You can call these films a number of things. This includes exploitation, trash, art, and masterpieces. But please don't call these films "grindhouse." That word has been tainted by Quentin Tarantino and Robert Rodríguez. Once again this duo has proved their contempt for originality and ability to butcher genre upon genre. But this time they have gone too far.

Tarantino and Rodriguez thought it would be cute to make a "grindhouse" double feature. Death Proof and Planet Terror are these fan boys new crime. I originally told myself I wouldn't watch Grindhouse but I gave in. As much as I was bored by Kill Bill and Sin City, I had to see those two butt buddies takes on the "grindhouse" film. Since my hatred runs much more deep for Tarantino, I decided to watch Rodriguez's Planet Terror first. The whole film was a complete piece of trash. This is the only characteristic that it had in common with any "grindhouse" film. But I must admit that I was entertained. It had enough gore and disgusting stuff to keep my interest. I just wish that I could have personally killed the midget El Wray. Rodriguez really must have no idea what makes a bad ass. El Wray may possibly be the weakest, ugliest, and lamest "badass" in film history. I hope this character was a joke. Rodriguez gets off easy with Planet Terror. I just hope that he doesn't think he's an innovative director. He needs to watch other films besides ones directed by Sergio Leone. Tarantino's Death Proof is probably the most embarrassing movie I have seen all year. The rumors of Tarantino frying his brain on ecstasy must be true. Death Proof's dialogue is even more horribly contrived than ever. I have always found Tarantino's dialogue to be boring verbal masturbation and Death Proof's dialogue can't even get up. Tarantino is constantly praised for his dialogue and obsession with creating the anti-film (which he stole from Godard, among other things). He has also been praised as a self trained movie scholar. Too bad Tarantino generally has shitty taste in both film and music. His films are highly reflective of that. Death Proof is another "girl power" flick. Tarantino loves tough girls and women's empowerment. I wonder if Tarantino is funded by the "Bolsheviks of America." The Bolsheviks loved having women being killed in war and cheap death. I was exhilarated when the first car of girls was demolished. Kudos to Tarantino for killing the ones he loves. Tarantino always has a way of mixing death and violence with humor. 99% of the time he fails. For once he accomplished this with the dismemberment of some stoned drug bitches leg via car window. Of course, both Death Proof and Planet Terror features cameos from Tarantino. I don't know why Tarantino would think people are interested in seeing his big chin and hearing his coke driven voice. At least Alfred Hitchcock's cameos were subtle and entertaining. Tarantino wants to put his big tongue in your mouth.

GRINDHOUSE

Spooky Eli Roth also makes an awkward cameo in Death Proof. Tarantino must have realized how much Roth really loves him. Both "directors" should have cut their appearances. Grindhouse also comes equipped with faux trailers of movies inspired by the real grindhouse flicks. Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS was probably the first film Tarantino jerked off to in the theaters. Grindhouse was also made grainy to give it a classic real grindhouse look. I just thought it was lame and cheap (and not in a good way). If Tarantino and Rodriguez love Grindhouse films so much they should have invested money in having the best of them restored. The only thing these guys did was commit celluloid blasphemy.

-Ty E

THE HUSTLER

Robert Rossen (1961)

Paul Newman maybe the ultimate Hustler of Hollywood, a mischling Judaic with an Aryan phenotype and an assertive martial prowess, he could have been a poster boy for the Waffen SS. In the Hollywood Zionist epic Exodus, Newman even plays a Zionist Jew who fools a British military man into thinking he is a fellow British Aryan soldier. Newman, in his undeniable stoicism, cunningly smiles along as the Brit brags about how good his Jew-dar is and how he could conclusively spot a Judaic anywhere. In the classic film The Hustler, the young Paul Newman goes all out in signature hustling style as a young man who shoots pool better than most of his criminal elders. If anything, The Hustler should have been the name of Newman's autobiography. I have no interest in playing/watching pool or going to bars, but The Hustler is a film that I could not navigate my eyes away from. Paul Newman plays a cool cat by the named of "Crazy Eddie" Felson, a man that may not be crazy but he surely has an uncontrollable aura of confidence. It seems Crazy Eddie is more interested in beating the best pool players than taking all their money, a character flaw that results in monetary loss for the young man. It is not until Crazy Eddie meets an older con-man psychopath named Bert that he finally learns to hustle like a true capitalist. Unfortunately for Eddie, Bert also likes to hustle his students as long as it results in monetary gain. Crazy Eddie may be a hustler but he certainly is not the best at hustling the opposite sex. In fact, Eddie's love interest Sarah hustles him when she pays for his food and eventually gives him a place to stay. Sarah is an alcoholic writer who is no doubt Eddie's intellectual superior. Due to her quick wits and flawless intellect, Sarah soon picks up on the fact that Bert is hustling Eddie. The real battle in The Hustler becomes between Bert and Sarah, a duel of psychological warfare that makes the film the intense vintage classic that it is. Out of all the people that Crazy Eddie encounters, it seems he respects his fellow hustler pool players the most. Eddie especially has a soft spot for Minnesota Fats, a fat hustler who despite his fatness has an aristocratic manner. In 1986, Paul Newman reprises his role as Crazy Eddie in the Martin Scorsese film The Color of Money. In this film, Crazy Eddie no longer has the youthful exuberance that he had in The Hustler. In fact, it seems that Crazy Eddie has taken over many of the character traits of the highly despicable Bert. Now almost elderly, Crazy Eddie finds himself a young hotshot pool player to make money off of. I found this to be a reasonable change as Crazy Eddie's world in The Hustler is destroyed and he has finally learned the way of the beast, but I guess that is what one should expect in a parasitical criminal underworld, for the nicest guys always come in last.

-Ty E

ANTS!
ANTS!

Robert Scheerer (1977)

aka "It Happened at Lakewood Manor" (1977) I love, love, love animal revenge trash. Especially when it's made-for-TV fodder that isn't constricted by television actors or cameos or ridiculous inserts of scenes brandishing exclusive footage of ants conspiring out of a kitchen sink. Wait, all these tags fit Ants! perfectly and oh, what a marvelous television film this is. Rather than being dreary, serious, and heavy headed, Ants! takes scenes of actual bodily invasion of tiny insects and makes it somewhat unnerving. Pay mind to the subtle foreign eroticism of the PolyGram video art. Only attacking ants on a screaming girl could bring out the curvaceous assets of this 70s whore.

Ants! starts off suddenly with the horrors of construction and the destruction of a natural environment. Granted, every bit of land is as much a habitat to them as it is to us and critters do invade our home unprovoked so survival of the fittest does exclusively fit here. But only this time they haven't disturbed any innocent thing, they've unleashed a nest of vehement ants that have adopted our insecticides and use it against us in the form of venomous bites. As soon as these scenes of environmental disaster end, another begins of lame character development in which a hippie chick bags a lifeguard by less-than-suave moves that put most pre-pubescent teens to shame. A greedy casino promoter soon plans to purchase the nearby hotel for demolition unbeknownst to the mild-mannered owner. The plot is especially water-thin at birth and only gets diluted more with drab stories of two star-crossed lovers that seek parental blessing. This being said, Lynda Day George plays the heroine and becomes a hindrance at the end. She's told not to move. "Just stay still" they said. "No." she said. This goes back and forth as she twitches with an accelerative fervor that will infuriate the saint in us all. Ants! is a conscientious animal attack! film with scenes that feature creepy crawling spirals of poisonous ants. The deaths aren't glorified or icky, they're simply nerve endings being incapacitated along with screaming. Although, it is a shame to see a young Suzanne Somers die slowly by ant bites. Several scenes allow for a spontaneous influx of entertainment including one that borders irony. In a jab at voyeurism, an onlooking crowd has lethal ants blown all over them thanks to the rescue helicopter above them. As you watch suburbanite after suburbanite screaming, scratching at their flesh to remove the ants, you feel a sort of sadistic satisfaction as if you just quenched an unknown thirst. Only to accompany these fierce attacks is a trippy retro score. Ants! is definitely choice of the litter on terms of cheesy B-fare TNT-style nature attack films. The scenes of ravaging ants is a fun endeavor to be a part of and I find this to be a more believable although embarrassing portion of creature insanity. The ending is played out perfectly as the survivors run up floor by floor to escape the wave of creatures. The final solution also brings similar thoughts akin to Tommy Lee Jones' Volcano, which is good for some surefire laughs. Ants! is a film that can get under your skin in the right mood. Seeing appendages covered entirely in ants even leaves me feeling unsettled. This isn't the greatest I've seen but a surprise appearance from Brian Dennehy made me rather ecstatic. Of course, such trash could only come from the mind that brought us Jaws 3-D.

-mAQ

Laurin
Laurin

Robert Sigl (1989)

While the Germans have had quite arguably a greater impact on horror cinema than any other nation in the world, by the time of the Nazi era, the Teutons had more or less completely abandoned the genre. Indeed, aside from Niklaus Schilling's Nachtschatten (1972) aka Nightshade and Ulli Lommel's Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (1973) aka The Tenderness of Wolves and Werner Herzog's Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979), German New Cinema—the greatest and most important German film movement of the post-WWII era—did not really produce any notable horror films. As conservative auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg argued in his magnum opus Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977), post-WWII Germans felt the need to dispose of their national myths as their nation's entire kultur had been supposedly tainted by Uncle Adolf and his merry men, hence the obsession with far-left politics, revolutionary terrorism, feminism, and other cultural ills among filmmakers associated with German New Cinema. After all, one cannot forget that the greatest Aryan horror novelist of the early 20th century, Hanns Heinz Ewers—a remarkable satanic Renaissance man of sorts who was one of the first people to recognize film as a legitimate artistic medium, penned the screenplay for the first independent film in cinema history, The Student of Prague (1913), and whose 1911 masterpiece horror novel Alraune was cinematically adapted no less than five times (not to mention the fact that the Hollywood Species films are a reworking of Alraune)—was a National Socialist party member and wrote a biographical novel on Nazi martyr Horst Wessel, which was later adapted into the early NS propaganda film Hans Westmar (1933). Luckily, a handful of German filmmakers like Jörg Buttgeriet (Nekromantik, Der Todesking) and Robert Sigl (Schrei - denn ich werde dich töten! aka School's Out, Hepzibah - Sie holt dich im Schlaf aka The Village) decided to create their own new myths in the Teutonic tradition of mystifying angst, with the latter's work Laurin (1989) aka Laurin: A Journey Into Death being arguably one of the greatest and most underrated films of German film history as a visually exquisite cross-genre work with an intricate and labyrinthine plot that is depicted from the innocent perspective of a little girl.

Of course, as a Gothic fairytale-like period piece set in an exotic location (despite ostensibly set in a 19th century German seaside village, the film was actually shot in Hungary) that is like the Czech arthouse vampire fantasy masterpiece Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970) aka Valerie a týden divů meets Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Effi Brieß (1974) meets Lucio Fulci's unconventional giallo Don't Torture a Duckling (1972), Laurin is not your typical horror film, as a work of nearly perfectly paced celluloid elegance of the timeless sort that does not wallow in contemporary postmodern diseases like irony, cynicism, or parody. Indeed, one would never suspect that auteur Robert Sigl was only 25-years-old when he started production on the film, which ultimately earned him the Bavarian Film Award in 1989 for 'Best New Director,' thus becoming the youngest filmmaker to ever earn the coveted prize (he was also nominated for the Max-Ophüls-Award the same year). Directed by a man who once stated, "I hate the Christian church and especially the Pope," Laurin may be rather traditional in terms of aesthetic style and storytelling, but the work has unflinching anti-Christian and even homoerotic undertones despite being a sensitively assembled film where the protagonist is a little girl. Indeed, like Richard Blackburn's lesbian-themed Lovecraftian vampire flick Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973) and Philip Ridley's 1950s-set rural American bloodsucker work The Reflecting Skin (1990), Laurin is a decidedly dark and sexually disturbing neo-fairytale where a child is forced to grow up due to horrifying circumstances that have entered her life relating to death and perversion. Shot in a rural area of Hungary that apparently had not changed in over a hundred years with a mostly all-Hungarian cast, Laurin is an otherworldly Teutonic-Magyar celluloid Nachtmahr of great beauty and cultivated brutality where the hinterlands become a place of mystifying horrors and secretive sexual savagery.

Little Laurin (Dóra Szinetár) is watching her seafarer father Arne (János Derzsi) grab her beautiful mother Flora Anderson's (Brigitte Karner) bosoms from her crib. Not surprisingly, Laurin's grandmother Olga (Hédi Temessy) yells at her son Arne for manhandling his wife in front of their daughter. Of course, the little girl does not mind because she can tell her parents are deeply in love. As a man who is constantly away due to his job, Arne is about to head to the sea once again, but he does not realize that this will be the last time he sees his wife. Before Arne leaves, Flora reveals to him that she is pregnant, which brings the seafarer great joy. Though Arne promises his wife that, "Someday, I will take you along and we'll sail down the river and out into the deep blue sea," fate has different and rather unfortunate plans for the two true lovers. Indeed, not long after seeing her husband off as he sails away to god knows where, Flora spots a man fiddling with the corpse of a young gypsy boy. Incidentally, the same gypsy boy banged on little Laurin's window for help only minutes before, but she was too scared to answer the scared little boy's pleas for help. The next day, a peasant man finds Flora's corpse floating in the water next to the bridge, with a jewelry box that the dead woman's husband had given her shimmering through the water from the bottom of the lake. Grandmother Olga is so angered by Flora's dubious death that she damns god, but little does she realize that one of god's servants' progeny was involved with her daughter-in-law's tragic death. When Laurin goes to look at her mother's corpse at night, she notices a tear trickling down her cold postmortem progenitor's pale yet strangely beautiful cheek. Grandmother Olga attempts to setup Arne with a hot redheaded single mother named Frau Greta Berghaus (Kati Sír) who has a little boy named Stefan (Barnabás Tóth) that Laurin is friends with, but the stoic seafarer refuses to remarry as he still loves Flora. Naturally, Arne eventually goes back to the sea and once again leaves his daughter Laurin and mother Olga helpless.

Laurin

Around the same time Arne leaves, his virtual doppelganger arrives. Indeed, Laurin mistakes the local Pařtor's (Endre Kátay) son Van Rees (Károly Eperjes) for her own father when he arrives on ship. Van Rees is a secretive and seemingly impenetrable man with a somewhat flat affect who becomes Laurin and Stefan's schoolteacher and he seems to develop a special interest in both of them for varying reasons. When Stefan is bullied in class by a couple boys, his mother Greta invites the teacher over for dinner, but on Van Rees' arrival at the house, he overhears the young mother talking with his Pařtor father. It turns out that the Pařtor has been carrying on an affair with Greta Berghaus and Stefan is his bastard son, thus making him Van Rees' half-brother. Van Rees' mother died when he was just a boy and his Pařtor father, who never got over the death of his wife, abused his son during his childhood, hence his disdain for religion and rather peculiar relationship with both his father and young children. While the Pařtor is such a puritanical man that he refuses to have mirrors in house because they are purportedly "instruments of human vanity," that does not stop him from screwing a young woman that, in terms of age, could be his daughter. Eventually, Stefan disappears and Laurin goes looking for her friend, which eventually leads her to theorizing that Van Rees is involved as she finds her missing friend's glasses in the mouth of an evil-looking black wolfdog owned by the Van Rees family. Indeed, in an earlier and rather disturbing scene in the film, Van Rees crudely gazes at his ½ bastard brother Stefan's naked body from an outdoor window, as if turned on by the little lad. Eventually, Laurin finds a secret door in the floor at some ruins near the local church that leads to a purgatory-like basement 'sex dungeon' of sorts where Van Rees takes his little boys. While Van Rees eventually finds Laurin hiding in a closet and states to her in a somewhat sinister fashion, "I don't like having little girls spy on me," the little girl manages to escape his limp-wrist pansy grasp. Of course, knowing that the little girl is aware that he is a pernicious pedophile serial killer, Van Rees stalks Laurin all the way back to her house and intends to kill her slasher-style with a knife. Through a dream-sequence, it is revealed that Laurin's mother actually died by accident after falling off the bridge while attempting to escape from Van Rees upon spotting him carrying the dead gypsy boy. To scare Van Rees, Laurin has the bright idea to wear her dead mother's cloak, thus tricking the killer into thinking he is seeing a ghost of the women whose death he inadvertently caused. Indeed, Van Rees panics upon seeing Laurin dressed in the ghostly cloak, thereupon causing him to fall backwards down some stairs and eventually die in a freak accident after a large nail sticking in the wall enters the back of his skull and penetrates his diseased brain. After Van Rees dies, blood trickles from his eyes as if he is weeping as a result of his miserable childhood and in sympathy for all the children he has killed. As for Laurin, she feels empowered by wearing her belated mother's cloak, especially after using it to kill her mother's killer.

Interestingly, apparently director Robert Sigl received an exceedingly negative response from both students and professors while attending Munich Film Academy due to the homoerotic and even incestuous nature of his films, with his 20-minute short Der Weihnachtsbaum (1983) aka The Christmas Tree being deemed especially offensive due to its supposed depiction of pathological sadomasochistic relationship between a father and son. In an interview with the director featured in the book Caligari's Heirs: The German Cinema of Fear after 1945 (2006), Sigl stated regarding his less than ideal experience at film school and his decisive desire to change his style for his first feature so as to make it more accessible to a more general audience: "I guess some people felt personally offended because of the psychosexual symbolism and theme. In LAURIN, I packaged all this by phrasing it in the psychosexual terms of a fairy tale by the Brothers Grimm, which made it more palatable to a broader audience. This way, it's more subliminal. Because I do want to reach a lot of people, even entertain them. But that doesn't matter much in one's first efforts as a filmmaker; they're usually more about refining one's style anyway. As a matter of fact, an idiosyncratic style doesn't seem to be much in demand these days. Someone like Polanski, Lynch, or Cronenberg would have a hard time if they were starting out today." Indeed, Laurin is like the Brothers Grimm meets Leopold and Loeb as set in a living Caspar David Friedrich painting, which makes for a shockingly aesthetically fruitful combo that can be appreciated by both adults and children alike. While Sigl's first feature Laurin was a hit upon its release and went on to develop an international cult following of sorts, the director has yet to direct anything else nearly as interesting, as if he was perennially jinxed by the greatness of his debut film. Aside from a couple TV movies, including the Scream rip-off Schrei - denn ich werde dich töten! (1999) aka School's Out, which was distributed in the U.S. by Fangoria, Sigl has mainly spent most of career directing miniseries, including the Twin Peaks-esque Stella Stellaris (1993), as well as episodes of popular German TV series like Lexx (1997-2002) and Tatort (1969-current). Apparently, the last episode of Tatort that Sigl directed caused much controversy in Deutschland, as it featured an incestuous sex scene. Why Sigl decided to abandon the glorious path he created with his masterpiece Laurin and went on to direct less mature works is questionable, but at least the director demonstrated for a moment during the late-1980s that somewhere deep down in the German collective unconscious lays the dark legacy of the Brothers Grimm. Sort of like an (anti)Heimat take on Fritz Lang's masterpiece M (1931) in its depiction of a pathetic and mentally perturbed pedophile serial killer, Laurin is undoubtedly one of the sickest celluloid fairytales ever made as a work depicting a man lusting over and assumedly killing his own prepubescent ½ brother, yet Sigl directed the film in such a carefully cultivated, nuanced, and poetic fashion that it never seems like cheap horror trash, thus reminding the viewer why

L A U R I N

Germany is the same nation that produced H.H. Ewers and F.W. Murnau.
-Ty E

THE DEVIL CAME AT NIGHT

Robert Siodmak (1957)

I doubt it would be a stretch to say that, since the birth of cinema, Germany has consistently been the #1 producer of top notch and innovative serial killers flicks, especially of the authentically audacious and bloodcurdling, yet artistically merited sort. Whether it be German expressionism (Fritz Lang's M), the German New Wave (The Tenderness of Wolves), or obscure arthouse splatter flicks (Schramm), few other nations can boast (not that Germany needs nor wants to further the case for their 'bloodstained' history) of such truly visceral and intriguing films about bloodlusting cut-throats. Undoubtedly, Germany's relatively vast history of true crime during and after both World Wars played an imperative role in influencing these films. While some everyday citizens were literally prostituting themselves so as to avert starvation as chaos in the cities reigned during both wars, the circumstances were ripe for German serial killers like cannibal Fritz Haarmann, child/sex killer Peter "The Vampire of Düsseldorf" Kürten, Carl Großmann, cannibal Karl Denke, Nazi stormtrooper sergeant Paul "the S-Bahn murderer" Ogorzow, and retarded peeping tom Bruno Lüdke to evade the law for a more extended period of time. Despite not knowing how many minutes are in an hour, supremely mentally defective serial killer Bruno Lüdke managed to kill upwards of 51 victims, mainly women, during a 15-year stretch of unrestrained sadism that peaked during the most hectic days of the Second World War. Recently, I had the distinct pleasure of viewing the West German film The Devil Came at Night (1957) aka Nachts, wenn der Teufel kam aka The Devil Strikes at Night directed by Robert Siodmak (Son of Dracula, The Killers); a work depicting Bruno Lüdke's ghastly homicidal delinquency amid the pandemonium of WWII-era Germany. Resembling parts of a number of great films created before and after it, The Devil Came at Night is like Fritz Lang's M (1931) meets Roberto Rossellini's Germany Year Zero (1948) meets Ulli Lommel's The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) meets Oliver Hirschbiegel's Downfall (2004), but it is also an original masterpiece in its own right. In short, The Devil Came at Night is a distinctly delectable work that totally transcends formulaic genre classification, yet offers some of the best elements from a number genres/subgenres, including the traditional German World War II film, true crime detective story, film noir, serial killer horror flick, and somewhat traditional melodrama. Personally, I cannot think of a more exciting prospect for a setting for a serial killer running rampant than a National Socialist-era war torn German city during a malefic storm of steel.

The Devil Came at Night follows an apolitical (but highly decorated) military officer turned detective sergeant named Axel Kersten (played by Claus Holm) who aims to profile and inevitably jail a serial killer while somewhat precariously jumping over the many hurdles of the bureaucratic Nazi legal system. After finding out that a low-level Nazi party member is wrongfully accused of murder, Kersten does his research and is eventually led to Bruno Lüdke (who is played in a most impeccable fashion by Mario Adorf); a profoundly idiotic strongman whose savage lack of intelligence is only rivaled by his supremely scant morality. One can only wonder why daft lunatic Lüdke was not conscripted into the Dirlewanger Brigade – a patently delinquent and collectively deranged division of the Waffen-SS that was comprised of mental patients, perverts, and criminals of all colors (including Gypsies and Slavs) – as the strangely proficient daft serial killer may have proven to be a murderous war hero of sorts. On top of being mentally retarded, big boy Bruno is a bodacious braggart who quite eagerly (but somewhat unknowingly) spills his aberrant beans to investigator Alex Kersten. Despite his exceptional performance in implicating and apprehending a much desired serial killer in a hopelessly chaotic and collapsing nation that is facing the very real possibility of absolute annihilation, Mr. Kersten soon learns that if you fail to play by the official National Socialist playbook, there are dire consequences. Despite his lack of mental competency, Bruno quite adamantly cites Nazi Article 51 as an excuse for his gross and unforgivable criminality. Unlike most Nazi-related films, The Devil Came at Night takes a somewhat subtle approach to criticizing the bureaucracy of blood that resonated throughout the Third Reich. Misusing Nazi eugenic ideas, even Bruno, a mentally vapid creature, is able to rationalize his heinous and coldly calculated crimes. To illustrate the absurdity of these laws, a careerist SS-Gruppenführer ('group leader') named Rossdorf (who has a striking resemblance to real-life Waffen-SS Sturmbannführer-turned-Muslim Johann von Leers) cites virtually the same argument as deranged dullard Lüdke in regard to the 'genetic' blameworthiness of the killer.

THE DEVIL CAME AT NIGHT

Although born in Dresden, Germany (despite claiming Memphis, Tennessee for passport purposes), The Devil Came at Night director Robert Siodmak – who was born a Jew – would leave his homeland for Hollywood (after a brief stay in Paris, France) in 1939 due to the rise of National Socialism. During his fruitful career in Hollywood, Siodmak managed to direct 23 films, most specifically a signature style of film noir flicks, including Phantom Lady (1944) and The Killers (1945); which the director earned a 'Best Director' Oscar nomination for. After failing to create acclaimed works outside the film noir style (which was apparently unpopular with the majority of Americans of that era), Siodmak returned to Europa in 1952 and after directing a couple films including an adaptation of Gerhart Hauptmann's 1911 play Die Ratten ('The Rats'), the auteur eventually completed his post-Hollywood masterpiece The Devil Came at Night. Upon viewing the film, I noticed it had a slightly Hollywood film noir 'feel' to it, but I was totally ignorant in regards to the director's transnational background. Generally, I would be most repelled by the prospect of a Hollywood-ized filmmaker directing a European production, but for The Devil Came at Night, the 'Tinseltown tint' works to the film's advantage. After all, one could hardly think of a better setting for a film noir than the dark alleyways and shadowy hallways of steadily dilapidating WWII era urban Germany, aside from maybe the Warsaw ghetto. Like a typical Hollywood film, The Devil Came at Night lacks any sort of domineering artistry as it is most specifically a solidly crafted work that tells a captivating story, and therein lays its greatest strength. The Devil Came at Night is a gripping and grim flick that, like witnessing a real-life stabbing or fatal car accident, echoes in one's mind long after the film has concluded. Although lacking the buckets of blood and fetishistic brutality of a modern Hollywood serial killer films, The Devil Came at Night is fundamentally more sinister and compelling. Maybe David Fincher should have taken notice of the German precision behind The Devil Came at Night when he worked on Zodiac (2007) as he could have easily avoided assembling an overly monotonous test in stagnant banality and derelict dillydallying.

The Devil Came at Night concludes with the phrase, "Wheels shall roll for victory" painted on the side of a train en-route to the hellish, but cold Eastern Front. Essentially, this ironic expression sums up a major theme of the film: the absurdity and futility of stern idealism amongst imminent defeat. In the end, human bodies roll and defeat ascends. For mere political reasons and beside the fact the Third Reich is crumbling, SS officer Rossdorf justifies his mission to have an innocent man executed. Kersten, who is undoubtedly a more talented and intelligent man, selflessly puts his own career on the line to vindicate the wrongly accused. Of course, the innocent man sentenced to death is undoubtedly symbolic of the Holocaust. Although few will admit it today openly, a small segment of the German Jewish population was actively involved in nation-destroying communist uprisings and war profiteering, but the majority would pay for the sins of the few. During The Devil Came at Night, a middleclass Jewess mentions that her once-respected professor husband died at Auschwitz concentration camp. Clearly, this man was not Kurt Eisner – the once infamous (but now memorialized) Jewish ultra-left-wing journalist that led the Communist Revolution that dismantled the Wittelsbach monarchy in Bavaria – but he was killed just the same due to his mere ancestry. Somewhat ironically, Nazi law worked in the favor of mentally defective Aryan Bruno Lüdke for a period of time. In one particularly humorous scene in The Devil Came at Night, Bruno states, "I'm only Bruno, the retard...I am a mental case. FUCK ALL OF YOU", after a cop insinuates that he was involved in a theft. Nazism aside, The Devil Came at Night is a work that highlights the universal failure of human law and order and the unintentional destruction it sometimes begets. Nowadays, we give special legal protection to members of 'victim status' groups because of who they sodomize and the size of their lips, and the entire Occident is beginning to rival Nazi Germany in terms of absurd authoritarian laws. Regardless of politics, The Devil Came at Night was impressive enough on the international level to be nominated for The Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film, which is not bad for a film that portrays the SS saving the Fatherland from a retarded serial killer.

THE DEVIL CAME AT NIGHT

-Ty E

SHUFFLE

Robert Townsend (1987)

Shuffle is an early art film directed by punk auteur Sogo Ishii. The prerequisite for all Ishii films happens to be striking visuals, a blaring punk soundtrack, and at least one outrageous scenario. For these reasons, he is a punk film pioneer up there with Zedd and Kern. He is most known for Panic High School, Burst City, and Electric Dragon 80,000V. Probably galvanizing the lesser film Run Lola Run, Shuffle is a story that is told without words. The actions of each individual is what shines through to you. Meet an unnamed punk shaving his head. The distorted angles and views might represent his displaced emotions. This man murdered his girlfriend and is hunting down the Yakuza who hooked her on drugs. The style of the film is largely what captivates the audience so vividly. The film's heart is a 20+ minute long street chase scene which erupts into a flashback. The parkour-esque environment that this film erupts with is one reason why I enjoy this film so much. The character houses great torture in his eyes as he screams to a detective to stop chasing him. This short was based off a manga entitled Run. When Ishii decided to adapt the work into film, he didn't ask permission to do so. After the film was completed, he projected it to the author and got approval, although he was shunned for his negligence. The story itself owes a debt to early noir. I wouldn't doubt for one second that Shuffle's plot piece inspired the creation of such classic games as River City Ransom and Double Dragon, although being hectic and darker. Shuffle isn't a masterwork. In fact, the film is pretty hard to get through at times, but the ending is where the pact is sealed and fates are decided. An ending worthy of being placed near the beginning of Irreversible and the ending of La Haine. Shuffle is a powerful film, without a doubt, but it is just another Japanese film. We have enough of those already.

-mAQ

HARLIS
HARLIS

Robert van Ackeren (1972)

Out of all the great filmmakers of the 1970s belonging to German New Cinema, Dutch-German auteur Robert van Ackeren (Blondie's Number One, The Last Word aka Der letzte Schrei) is probably the director who stands out most as an unwaveringly rampant heterosexual with a naughty and seemingly nihilistic knack for black humor. Originally a prolific cinematographer who was responsible for some of the most important films of German New Cinema, including Werner Schroeter's Eika Katappa (1969) and Rosa von Praunheim's gritty celluloid agitprop homo-manifesto It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971), as well as Roland Klick's kraut cult classics Bübchen (1968) and Deadlock (1970), van Ackeren would inevitably become a director in his own as the foremost heterosexualist auteur of female-flesh-fetishizing cinema, which is rather ironic considering his past camera work on some of the gayest films of the post-WWII era. Although a proud breeder, van Ackeren was certainly no prude and decadently demonstrated his affinity for lipstick lesbianism with the sardonic and darkly comedic melodrama Harlis (1972) aka The Sensuous Three aka Eine Handvoll Zärtlichkeit starring Fassbinder superstar turned director Ulli Lommel (Love Is Colder Than Death, Blank Generation) and redheaded counter-culture diva Mascha Rabben (Der Bomberpilot, World on a Wire aka Welt am Draht). A sort of snidely satirical Sapphic take on Bob Fosse's Cabaret (1972) meets Werner Schroeter's excess-ridden and history-obscuring take on the Third Reich, Der Bomberpilot (1970), Harlis is the melodramatically ridiculous and sometimes raunchy tale of a cross-dressing and SS-uniform-sporting lesbo cabaret dancer who falls in love with a man for the very first time in her entire life, only to spark jealousy and hatred among her sassy Sapphic cabaret troupe, not to mention an even more deleterious situation with her male lover's brother and sexually-repressed fiancé. Exaggerating the conventions of traditional Hollywood melodramas to the point of sadistic satire with some film noir, Hitchcock, and 'mad scientist'/James Bond villain conventions thrown in for good measure, Harlis is probably director Robert van Ackeren's most accessible and least serious yet paradoxically most idiosyncratic and aesthetically ambitious work to date. While a true blue(balled) heterosexual, van Ackeren has demonstrated a keen interest in ball-crushing cuckoldry, male submissiveness, and sexual sadomasochism and Harlis is certainly no exception in expressing these dubious testicle-terrorizing themes, but unlike most of his subsequent films, the director's Sappho SS S&M comedy makes for a more pleasantly palatable flick due to its lack of seriousness with said themes. A brazen black comedy of the rare hetero-camp variety, Harlis is a film for those who found the Hebraic Teutophobia of Mel Brooks' The Producers (1968) to be about as humorous as a hernia and the camp value of Fosse's Cabaret as being just too plain gay and Liza Minnelli as just too plain unbelievable as a sex icon/diva.

Ulli Lommel, with his signature slicked back jet-black hair, plays a somewhat monetary privileged fellow named Raymond and he is enjoying the view at a lesbian cabaret where two beautiful babes named Harlis (Mascha Rabben) and Pera (Gabriele Lafari) are performing as cross-dressing, finely dressed and butt-darting officers of the infamous Schutzstaffel. Although he does not know, Harlis and Pera are not just dance partners but also longtime sexual partners, so when he goes to meet the girls backstage he is in for quite a surprise when he learns that men are “not in fashion.” Pera wastes no time letting Ray know that she thinks that “men are shit,” but Harlis, who has never displayed an interest in men in her entire life, falls head over heels for the tall, dark, and handsome gentleman. A rather assertive broad with a seemingly unquenchable sex drive, Harlis wastes no time asking Raymond “your place or mine?” so they can get straight to business, which rather shocks the masculinity of the novice lesbo-lover, who remarks “usually it’s the man that asks that.” While Harlis finds sex with Raymond to be nothing less than enjoyable, as a longtime lily-licker, she still needs a woman to fulfill her salacious abberosexual appetite, so she continues to maintain her relationship with her longtime girlfriend Pera. Unfortunately, Harlis has a rather pernicious and stereotypically Hebrew-like (in the Nazi propaganda sense, of course!) brother named Prado (German junky/ex-convict Rolf Zacher) who takes an instant dislike to Harlis (although he secretly wants her all to himself), as well as a pesky and pestering girlfriend/fiance named Ria (Heidy Bohlen) who makes the ultimatum, “You better decide soon. I can’t go on this way much longer...either we get married or I’ll buy out your share.” Raymond’s interest in Ria is solely monetary as the two symbolically own a butcher shop/grocery store business, but he is getting tired of being a bloated bourgeois boob and a romantic relationship with Harlis grants him the perfect great escape from a very potentially dreadful marriage. Of course, when sneaky prick Prado walks in on Harlis and Pera rubbing pussies on Raymond’s bed, he wastes no time tying up the two naked girls in bondage and giving his brother the naughty news. A truly ideal cuckold boyfriend, Raymond forces his bastard brother to untie both girls and really couldn’t care less if his girlfriend is still a committed carpet-muncher, but when Prado tells his brother’s longtime girlfriend Ria about her cheating boy toy’s new lesbo girlfriend, things get ugly for everyone involved. On top of that, Pera makes an ultimatum to Harlis that it is either her or Raymond, so she gives the now-subversive sexual persuasion of heterosexual monogamy a try. Raymond ultimately breaks it off with both his girlfriend Ria and brother Prado and the two odious cast-offs have the brilliant idea to get together (and eventually orchestrate a marriage), in part to spite that ‘little bitch’ Harlis.

Naturally, being a lifelong lesbian, Harlis has some reservations about her newly found quasi-heterosexuality and admits to Raymond, who like a good cuck is applying nail polish to her toenails, that, "My future looks very uncertain now. A man loves a woman who loves women...he tries to teach her to make love like a normal woman but he doesn't succeed...and she loves him except there are complications...and when he finds her in the embrace of another woman...he wants to die because he is so naïve and too sentimental" but also that, "This is the first time I have ever felt fear...because I'm so happy." Of course, Harlis should also fear Raymond's extremely jealous and patently perverted brother Prado as he wants the lipstick lesbo all for himself and he is willing to do just about anything to obtain, including committing a number of ungodly crimes. Among other things, Brother Prado sinisterly stalks Harlis and when he catches her, he rapes her from behind after jamming her head in a car window. And when Raymond tries to comfort her, she says it is too late as the damage has already been done. In a heat of vengeful passion, Ray smacks his pussy brother around like a little girl. While Raymond attempts to make a honest heterosexual real woman out of Harlis, she is still physically and metaphysically enslaved to sourpuss Pera. After having her lesbo crew call in Raymond, Harlis, who is sensually caressing her girlfriend Pera in a provocation fashion, states, "I want you to know the truth about me...I'll never change," which absolutely stuns the emotionally brutalized boyfriend. Thoroughly depressed, Ray makes a pathetic attempt at suicide by poisoning himself like a Hollywood Golden Age diva but Harlis walks in on him before he drops dead. Of course, Ria swoops in on wounded dove Raymond while he is recuperating in the hospital, but the lily-licker-loving mensch rebuffs her and gets back with Harlis. Ultimately, Raymond and Pera agree to share Harlis in a sort of seemingly science fiction Ménage à trios comprised of a heterosexual man, lesbian woman, and novice bisexual. When Raymond, Harlis, and Pera join new couple Prado and Ria to celebrate the odious odd couple's wedding, things get a bit ugly, especially after the groom expresses his undying affection for another woman. Jealous of the fact Raymond has Harlis at least ½ to himself, Prado freaks out on his new fiancé Ria due to her 'normativity,' stating to her with the uttermost contempt, "Yes, that's exactly what revolts me...The fact that you're so ordinary...the fact that you're like all other women...so conventional, so maternal, so virtuous, so industries, so boring...you've got a cash register between your legs." In the end, Prado strangles his bride to death and Raymond, Harlis, and Pera live happily ever after as a novel cabaret act/sexual trio. Harlis concludes with a man from the cabaret audience remarking the famous last words, "what times we live."

HARLIS

Despite winning the prestigious Ernst Lubitsch Award in 1973, Harlis is all but forgotten today, even in its native land of Germany, and has yet to be released in any home media format in the United States. What makes Harlis especially interesting and reflective of contemporary German culture is that director Dutch-Teuton Robert van Ackeren utilized an aberrant assortment of Lubitsch/Mel Brooks/Josef von Sternberg Hebraic humor (with a sprinkling of Hitchcock thrown in for good measure!) to the point where the film seems like a satire of Judaic directed comedies satirizing Germans/Nazis (after all, Hollywood never distinguishes between the two!) and the melancholy score by Gustav Mahler only adds to the maniacal melodramatic absurdity of it all. Of course, Harlis is much darker than the films that it takes influence from as a sort of Über-nihilistic distortion of German history that utilizes Hollywood's own reality-distorting melodramatic conventions against itself in an uncompromisingly cynical way to the point of recalling the grotesquery of the Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol. While director Robert van Ackeren would continue to direct sexually explicit and romantically nihilistic themed films, including his best known work A Woman in Flames (1983) aka Die Flambierte Frau—a film about a bourgeoisie housewife turned high-priced hooker—as well two “Heimatfilm porn” flicks, including Deutschland privat - Eine Anthologie des Volksfilms (1980) and Deutschland privat - Im Land der bunten Träume (2007), where he placed ads in newspapers convincing good patriotic German couples to send him their own homemade porn flicks which he turned into kraut cock-and-cunt compilations, he has yet to direct another film as thematically brazen and sardonic as Harlis. Indeed, forget flabby fanboy Kevin Smith's retarded romantic comedy Chasing Amy (1997), Harlis, at least as far as I know, is the greatest film ever made about what happens when, “A man loves a woman who loves women,” and naturally it does not take itself even remotely serious, even if it features lavish wardrobes, statuesque Sapphos, aesthetically exquisite tableaux. Advertised as “A Larmoyant Comedy,” Harlis provides some of the most charmingly campy fun you will ever have watching rape, suicide, and uxoricide. For those looking for comic relief from the fact that Deutschland and the rest of Occident is a culturally vapid and seemingly apocalyptic multicultural nightmare where women act like men and vice versa, Harlis is probably your best bet as a totally titillating piece of celluloid tragicomedy created at a time when Ulli Lommel was a great leading man and had yet to be regarded as one of the worst filmmakers who had ever lived and New German Cinema diva Mascha Rabben had yet to fall off the face of earth.

-Ty E

A WOMAN IN FLAMES
A WOMAN IN FLAMES

Robert van Ackeren (1983)

In describing the varying types of femininity in his magnum opus Sex and Character: An Investigation Of Fundamental Principles (1903), Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger concluded that the two archetypal extremes of the fairer sex are the “mother” and the “prostitute,” arguing, “Prostitution is not a result of social conditions, but of some cause deep in the nature of women; prostitutes who have been ”reclaimed” frequently, even if provided for, return to their old way of life. . . . I may note finally, that prostitution is not a modern growth; it has been known from the earliest times, and even was a part of some ancient religions, as, for instance, among the Phoenicians.” If the prostitute type is an inborn quality of certain woman, it would most certainly describe the protagonist of erotically-charged sub-arthouse flick A Woman in Flames (1983) aka Die flambierte Frau directed by Dutch-German cinematographer-turned-auteur Robert van Ackeren (Harlis aka The Sensuous Three, Purity of Heart aka Die Reinheit des Herzens). The superlatively salacious story of a childless housewife who leaves her life of relative bourgeois luxury to become a high price call-girl who eventually makes the major mistake of starting clearly a foredoomed relationship with a bisexual hustler who dreams of being a restaurant owner, A Woman in Flames is a decidedly depressing yet strangely jocular and teasing, sin-saluting cinematic work featuring a curious collection of sexual spastics, fucked fetishists, closet queens, fascistic leather-men, cultivated cocksuckers, and other repressed perverts who must patronize prostitutes to get the sort of lurid loving that they so deeply and pathetically long for, but cannot find elsewhere. Like virtually all of debauched director Robert van Ackeren’s sex-obsessed works, A Woman in Flames features weak cuckold men, ‘strong’ and sexually promiscuous women, sadomasochism and eclectic fetishism, and a risqué romance between two troubled yet strangely sexually complimentary lovers. Undoubtedly director van Ackeren’s most popular, successful, and commercial work to date, A Woman in Flames is virtual softcore pornography for leftist intellectuals, feminists, and other members of the vogue kraut bourgeoisie. Featuring passive men that cannot ‘assert’ themselves, aggressive women who use whips as pseudo-phalluses, and a naughty nympho as a sort of high-dollar-whore hero who empowers herself by peddling her puss for cash as opposed to giving it away for ‘free’ to her husband, A Woman in Flames ultimately makes for an absurd look at the human byproducts that have been created by feminist brainwashing, kosher capitalism, and the destruction of traditional genders that came as a result of the Second World War.

Despite living a lavish lifestyle, owning a nice home (courtesy of her husband’s income!), and spending her work-free days listening to records and talking with friends on the phone, Eva (Gudrun Landgrebe) hates being a domestic housewife. After her husband complains about the fact she used his razor to shave her legs, forgot to buy wine, put glasses in the wrong places, and has done virtually nothing all day, Eva freely admits she is the opposite of the ideal wife due to being a horrible cook, a failure at setting the table, an awkward dancer, as well as someone who failed both her driving and medical exams, and a total failure when it comes to learning both math (numbers and formulas make her 'dizzy') and languages. Since her self-absorbed spouse couldn't care less what she says regarding her lack of domestic talents, Eva decides enough is enough and leaves her hubby a goodbye note stating, "I don't love you anymore," and she packs her bags and walks out of the house without him ever noticing. In no time, Eva makes the acquaintance of a madame/female pimp named Yvonne (van Ackeren regular Gabriele Lafari) who teaches the disgruntled housewife everything she needs to know about peddling her flesh, including how the normal work requires that she lay on the bed and spread her legs, and that if a John wants out of the ordinary, it will cost him extra. A failure as a wife who seems to hate all rules and institutions, Eva has a hard time carrying out even the most fundamental aspects of her job, including simply spreading her legs and becoming the passive "love servant" of a bastard of a businessman who expects to get cash for cunt any time he wants. Of course, Eva has yet to find her true calling when it comes to being a sex worker. One night, while hanging out at a ritzy bar, Eva is approached by an effete bisexual gigolo named Chris (European arthouse superstar Mathieu Carrière), who makes a great impression on her after facetiously stating, "Why are you staring at me? I find you vulgar and badly made-up." While the two high-class prostitutes become a couple, problems arise when Chris' sod sugar daddy Kurt (Hanns Zischler) becomes jealous of the happy heterosexual relationship the two have together. Meanwhile, Eva runs into her ex-husband at a bookstore and he demands that she have sex with him one more time, but she naturally turns him down and states in defense regarding her new degenerate profession, "I'm a woman who does men like you a favor. A married woman doesn't take money for it. Unmarried women who live from men are sluts. And when you do it as your profession, you're a whore. And I'll be the best paid whore, because I offer the least."

Of course, once she realizes she derives pleasure from humiliating an anal retentive beta-male (nothing says beta like a white man married to an Asian woman!) by calling him gay and making him wear a woman's apron and lipstick, Eva finds her natural calling as a ball-crushing and fag-flagellating dominatrix. Eva even expresses her love to Chris in a somewhat sadistic manner by telling him that she loves him because his eyes are too blue, his nose is too large, and his mouth is too narrow, but not without finishing him off with a blowjob. Not long after, Eva and Chris rent out a flat together which they use as their own live-in brothel, but naturally problems arise when the two lovers regularly see each other having sex with customers, but to be fair, the lady of the house never screws her

A WOMAN IN FLAMES

Johns, but merely beats the shit out of them, including a brutal scenario where she crushes a man's fingers by stepping on them with stilettos. With the help of cultured colon-choker Kurt, Eva and Chris are even able to pretend to be members of high society while entertaining intellectuals and scholars. Eva even tells some pompous dinner guests that she is writing a thesis on "melancholy and boredom" and Chris purports to be a 'freelance photographer' (his specialty being 'ID photos'). As Chris states, "Eva and I love the same books, the same films and the same music. We think and feel always the same. We are ideal lovers," and, indeed, he is right, but trouble arises when he confesses his dream of opening a restaurant with Kurt. Additionally, a conflict of interest brews when Eva tells Chris she wants to have a daughter (with blonde hair, like when "she was a child"), but when the kind gentleman asks her to marry him, she states she is not the kind of woman that wants to get married. After fighting with Eva over the fact that she gets paid for "disdaining men," Chris goes to a Querelle-like gay bar (incidentally, director van Ackeren played a small role in Fassbinder's 1982 adaptation of the Genet novel) with Kurt and dances like a gay robot to some Kraftwerk-esque synth song. Over time, the bizarre love triangle between Eva, Chris, and Kurt turns into an all out war. Eva attempts to intimidate Kurt by stripping in front of him, which disarms the dandy fairy, but he has a lot of money and Chris needs his sugar daddy so he can achieve his lifelong dream of opening a restaurant. Without asking his girlfriend's permission, Chris uses his and Eva's money, which is in a joint bank account, to buy a restaurant, which inevitably destroys what is left of their relationship. After Eva refuses to kiss Chris, he punches her in the face, douses her with vodka, and sets her on fire with a lit candle, thus turning her into a literal "woman in flames" (or not). In the end, Eva is somehow still alive and empowered by the fact she is an 'independent woman' (or something), even visiting her ex-boy toy Chris' restaurant just to spite him.

Featuring a musical score by Fassbinder's best friend/main composer Peer Raben and a small performance from German dandy auteur Werner Schroeter's muse Magdalena Montezuma as an uptight bourgeois type, A Woman in Flames is technically a work of German New Cinema, but with its too-slick production values, Basic Instinct-esque eroticism, and quite clear appeal to pompous perverts who do a lot of wine-sniffing, A Woman in Flames seems more like a blue movie for impotent bluebloods and upper-middleclass types suffering from a midlife crisis than a serious work of celluloid art. Of course, I am sure there are many bourgeois feminists and cuckolds out there that could come up with a clever argument as to why A Woman in Flames is a piece of socially empowering and sexually liberating work that portrays the ghastly traditional institution of marriage as something worse than prostitution and 'female empowerment' as more important than being with someone you love. Ultimately, A Woman in Flames is a film about marginally attractive individuals with majorly appalling and rather repulsive personalities who inevitably reap what they sow, thus they deserve not even the smallest inkling of the viewer's sympathy. While protagonist Eva of A Woman in Flames flirts with the idea of a having daughter, she knows deep down that she is and will always be a lonely streetwalker with an incapacity for normal love. As Otto Weininger described in Sex and Character, "The prostitute is the great seductress of the world, the female Don Juan, the being in the woman that knows the art of love, that cultivates it, teaches it, and enjoys it," yet Eva goes a step or two further as someone who derives great pleasure from humiliating and torturing men and she does a great job doing it, but she would probably make about as good a mother as Jeffrey Dahmer would make a father. As she demonstrates when she contemptuously tells her lover Chris when breaking off their relationship, "I fell in love with a gigolo... I don't want to grow old with the owner of a restaurant," Eva is the sort of woman who would rather be in a relationship with a capitalist cocksucker with AIDS than be with a clean man who runs a legitimate business. When comparing the sort of men that hookers are attracted to, Weininger argued, "The prostitute, on the other hand, is most attracted by a careless, idle, dissipated man. A man that has lost self-restraint repels the mother-woman, is attractive to the prostitute. There are women who are dissatisfied with a son that is idle at school; there are others who encourage him. The diligent boy pleases the mother-woman, the idle and careless boy wins approval from the prostitute type." Indeed, it is no coincidence that the sort of men Eva gets paid to beat as a dominatrix are rich businessmen and the men she enjoys sharing carnal knowledge with are degenerates who blow old men for money.

With prostitution being made totally legal in Germany in 2002, A Woman in Flames now seems rather outmoded, yet the film is still marginally 'important' in its depiction of how far the Fatherland has degenerated since having 'democracy' forced on it after the Second World War. While Rainer Werner Fassbinder did a much better job with his BRD Trilogy (The Marriage of Marian Braun, Veronika Voss, Lola) in depicting how the chaos of World War II and the subsequent "Wirtschaftswunder" ("Economic Miracle") forced an entire generation of German women to become both literal and/or figurative whores and turned an entire generation of men into cuckolds, betas, and bitches, A Woman in Flames goes a couple steps further in its explicitness as a cinematic work that is more a symptom of the cultural decay it portrays and glorification of prostitution as opposed to a critique of such things. As a filmmaker who would direct two porn flicks, Deutschland privat - Eine Anthologie des Volksfilms (1980) and Deutschland privat - Im Land der bunten Träume (2007), utilizing footage sent to him from couples around Germany who wanted their homemade sextapes forever immortalized, director Robert van Ackeren certainly deserves credit as Deutschland's foremost anti-völkisch pornographer!

-Ty E

FORREST GUMP
FORREST GUMP

Robert Zemeckis (1994)

Robert Zemeckis' Forrest Gump is without a doubt the single most confounding studio blockbuster I've ever seen more times than I would ever dare to count. A child of the nineties, I couldn't wait for the video release to see all kinds of neat special effects that I hardly understood as they didn't involve ripping half of Tom Hanks' face off to reveal a pissed off robot or Lieutenant Dan instantly respawning his legs and running from dinosaurs, but despite the disappointment, watched and re-watched the flick whenever it aired on television because, well, it was an EVENT, just like Schindler's List, one that lazy teacher's would assign essays on for extra credit. It was also one of those staple videos that seemingly every family video library, even those whose only other titles are fitness tapes and Czech tranny porn (both dad masturbation fodder, but only one of which would be hidden in a generic tape cover labeled "Christmas '89"). It was one of those ubiquitous nineties blockbusters that was pervasive in a way that only nineties blockbusters were, spawning a restaurant, endless parodies, catchphrases (how many times have you heard "Run, Forrest, Run!" in YOUR formative years?), and "watercooler discussion." A movie that somehow managed to be something for everyone, while underneath the schmaltz and "humor" and Zelig-like effects work, actually offers a black hole of ideological emptiness. The kind of movie where a mentally retarded manchild from the South stumbles blindly through history with unwavering patriotic stupidity, interacting with characters like black retarded manchild Bubba, crippled Vietnam Vet Lieutenant Dan, and junk-addled child molestation victim-cum-AIDS whore Jenny to prove some ultimately muddled, bewildering message about America. Something that nods to the supposed multi-cultural inclusiveness of the place, while at the same time bowing to time-honored Christian Right notions of finding virtue in ignorance vs. being some goddamn pinko thinking person, and successfully tarring-and-feathering the baby boomer generation as a wanton cesspool of carnality that one can only breeze past if he can "Run, Forrest, Run."

By now the story should be familiar, but I'll rehash it for all five of you who haven't spent a childhood parked in front of this mess. An obnoxious, drawling Hollywood caricature of a mentally challenged person sits at a bus stop, rambling to random passerby the highly improbably details of his life. A more honest film would be just this deluded 'tard telling his ridiculous stories to people who would in turn turn up the volume of their headphones or high tail it to the next bus stop and little else, but in Hollywood, even the most impatient of his audience stands are humbled by stories in which a leg-braced Gump teaches Elvis Presley how to shake his hips, inspires John Lennon's "Imagine", prompts the Watergate investigation, and basically directly or indirectly inspires all of the "major events" of the latter half of the twentieth century. What drives Gump to succeed despite a laughable appearance and a speaking style that takes the worst of Gomer Pyle and pushes it to the edges of the dreaded "full retard"? The love of a good woman, of course, or in this case, a drug addicted, STUDENT PROTESTING (gasp), molestation-victim who will die, of course, for having used drugs, protested, and had sex with characters aside from the drawling retarded guy, or maybe because she finally gives in and has sex with the retarded guy, which some members of the target audience might find a bit icky?

Aside from Jenny, the other female relationship driving Forrest's life is Mama, delivered by Sally Field in likewise drawling hyuk hyuk mode, delivering the kind of quaint, meaningless nuggets of wisdom like "Life is like a box of chocolates, you never know what you're going to get" that seem to go over so resoundingly with American audiences and lobotomy patients the world over. When Mama dies (not of AIDS, but of old age, though she does fuck a school administrator to get Forrest into a regular school when he's a kid, so maybe the slut was asking for it), the saccharine-to-the-point of diabetes Alan Silvestri score kicks in, underscoring that this is a big moment, one of those moments "we can all relate to." Earlier in the film, while heroically serving in Vietnam (and getting shot in the "butt-tocks", President Nixon, hyuck hyuck), Forrest first encounters death via his African-American analogue, Bubba. At this point I could go on and on about the unlikelihood of this friendship, of these two being on the field to begin with, but the entire movie thumbs its nose at actual history or common sense to offer some strange high school history book, "feel good" version of events, while all the while functioning as a horror movie for anyone who doesn't toe the extremely moderate but slightly right of center ideal audience the studio computers no doubt told Zemeckis and co. to tailor the turd to. Seriously, just like any eighties slasher movie, if you're black, you're dead, if you have sex outside of marriage (even if it's symbolic childhood marriage to a dense dunce), dead, if you turn your back on God and actually want to die after a devastating war injury, you will be subjected to your fair share of humiliation and torture until you learn to have faith in Christ, our father, or, excuse me, Gump, the secular Jesus for the nineties.

In other words, this reads like something John Milius would write if instead of being upfront (and badass) about his macho militarism he tried to sneak it in the backdoor, gussying a fatalistic, fascist view of the world with every overplayed song from the baby boomer years, "cute" antics, and lots of that "feel good" crap someone like Milius would have no patience for. But just for a second, imagine a John Milius Forrest Gump... where instead of merely punching that sexist student protester dude (because being a possessive stalker of a woman with significant childhood trauma is okay, but disagreeing with a fairly awful war...tsk tsk), Gump crushes his sternum and douses him in flames, where upon finding Bubba bleeding Gump severs his head and holds it up at Valhalla before finishing off Lt. Dan, no longer a man. Where after decimating the Vietnamese countryside in Ramboesque feats, Gump returns, helps the Watergate burglars get away, and then spends the rest of the film RE-writing history, a sort of right-wing Inglorious Bastards. It would be an uncomfortable, queasily violent film for most, but done with verve and HONEST about its intentions. Is Forrest Gump really the right-wing parable arriving in a big, rainbow colored Trojan horse may of its detractors make it out to be? I think it is a lot more confused and audience-pandering than intentionally political, and after perusing the novel on which the film is ostensibly based, deduce that a lot of the thematic strangeness of the movie comes from both softening the edges of Forrest Gump to the point he is akin to jarheaded Jesus via Rain Man (the character is a bit more similarly retarded in the book and actually curses and is about 240 pounds, for starters) and leaving out some of his more outlandish adventures (NASA, life with cannibals, a pet monkey) so as to ensure Oscar nominations and maximum boomer relatability. This isn't a parable, dammit, this IS America.

FORREST GUMP

As of yet, I've said little about the acting, and there isn't much to say. Suitably loud caricatures amped up to the nth degree so as to compete with the Zelig-esque special effects (and the magical erasure of Gary Sinise' legs). Speaking of Sinise, I quite enjoyed his turn as director/actor in Of Mice and Men, but with Gump, he sold his soul to the Hollywood Beast and can now be seen weekly performing at an Indian Casino near you with the "Lieutenant Dan Band." Robin Wright Penn is suitably worn looking as an AIDS carrier but does little but look glum, worried, or bitter throughout, even when she's 'sposed to be young and an object of infatuation. Oh yeah, she almost commits suicide to "Free Bird." Sweet home Alabama, y'all. Sally Field is deserving of a ball peen hammer to the face. Tom Hanks performance has been so often parodied and is such a part of our pop cultural lexicon that I think it is often difficult to remember just how annoying it truly is. I don't have a kneejerk reaction to the vanilla megacelebrity status of Hanks. He is capable of reliable performances from time to time, and unlike someone, like, say, Julia Roberts, the sole pleasure I derive from his flicks tends not to be imagining him hanging from a meathook in my basement. Forrest Gump is one hell of a blemish, though (one the masses the masses awarded over $677 million bucks to, a fact that doesn't make me want to re-evaluate the film, but humanity as a whole). When watching a superior Hanks flick, like Joe Vs. The Volcano, I always have to try to keep Gump out of my head in a manner akin to breathing slowly and trying to convince vomit not to escape my esophagus.

So gather the family, children up front, and let the history wash over 'em. Learn to toe the line, and make great waves simply by shutting off your brain and running toward success without taking detours to smoke "wacky weed" or question the government. Try not to think too hard about Forrest's suitability in raising the Sixth Sense kid he gets saddled with a few years after his sole sexual experience with Jenny, who marries Forrest then promptly dies for maximum pathos. As Forrest replies to the military recruiter who asks him "Have you given any thought to your future, son?"

"Thought?"

-Jon-Christian

MYSTIQUE
MYSTIQUE

Roberta Findlay* (1979)

Maybe it's the high number of heebs in the hardcore industry and/or because most fuck flicks, like their viewers, tend to be not too cultivated, but Teutophilac pornography seems to be all but nonexistent, unless one counts Nazisploitation, which one might better describe as "yid smut." If there ever was a porn auteur with a crush on kraut kultur, it was the late Roger Watkins (The Last House on Dead End Street, Midnight Heat), whose pornographer pen name 'Richard Mahler' is a dichotomous tribute to Aryan Romantic composer Richard Wagner and Jewish late-Romantic composer Gustav Mahler. Notably, Watkins' dark and nihilistic hardcore flick Corruption (1983) is a loose reworking of Teutonic maestro Wagner's Das Rheingold—the first cycle of the composer's four-cycle Gesamtkunstwerk ("total work of art") opera Der Ring des Nibelungen (1876) aka The Ring of the Nibelung—but the pornographic auteur also liked 'futuristic' kraut music as well. Indeed, Watkins included the electronic Teutonic track "We Are the Robots" by synthpop pioneers Kraftwerk in his first fuck flick Her Name Was Lisa (1980). Less well known is the fact that Watkins penned the script to a lesbian reworking of great German writer Thomas Mann's classic ephhebophile novel Death in Venice (1912), which largely has to do with the fact that the director of the porn adaptation failed to give him any sort of credit for his work. Directed by 'roughie' pioneer and jaded Jewess Roberta Findlay (Take Me Naked, Angel Number 9) under the curious male pseudonym Robert W. Norman, Mystique (1979) is not only the most decidedly degenerate Mann film adaptation ever made, but a rare porn flick that features heavy use of the Mahler song cycle "Kindertotenlieder" (aka "Songs on the Death of Children"). On top of that, the film features cryptic reference to the historical feud between Mahler and Wagner's wife Cosima Wagner (the lead character's name is "Alma" in reference to Mahler's wife, while her love interest turned enemy's name is 'Cosima'). As Watkins, who was apparently bitter after all of these years for what he saw as Findley taking credit for his work, stated in an interview in Headpress 23: Funhouse (2002) regarding his crucial role in Mystique (which he never mentions by name): "...What I did was take Thomas Mann's DEATH IN VENICE and turned it into an old lesbian fashion photographer, dying of cancer, who falls in love with this young woman – she can't be pubescent like in the book. I gave this script to them [Findley and Walter Sears], they read it and said, 'This is really great, Roger. This is really great, but can we ask you something? Rather than have the old lesbian be a fashion photographer, could we have her be a tub player?' [laughs] And they were absolutely serious! I said, 'You can do whatever you like, I don't care. You bought it, it's yours.' I think that is my main Roberta Findlay story." Luckily, Findlay ultimately decided to stay true to Watkins' script and dropped the tuba player idea. The superlatively sordid quasi-Nietzschean

Sapphic tale of a terminally dame of the Apollonian sort who falls in love with a younger dame of the Dionysian sort who makes her live a living hell in between lurid lady-licking, Myſtique is certainly, for better or worse, one of the most perniciously philosophical and ſtrangely cultivated carpet-muncher fuck flicks ever made.

Assumedly not to confuse the raincoat crowd, Myſtique opens with the following narrated ‘artistic warning’ juxtaposed with waves crashing onto a beach: “The makers of this motion picture wish to inform you of the unique nature of this film you’re about to see. We will take you on a journey of mystery. We will reveal to you the secret passion of a woman...A unique woman who lives her fantasies and dreams her realities...Or is the reverse true? You decide.” After the narration concludes, the following lovely little piece from French Symbolist Paul Valéry that my lady friend especially liked appears: “From this infusions of smoky rose...The sea regained its purity...Its usual transparency...Lost was the wine, and drunk the waves! I saw high in the briny air...Forms unfathomed leaping there.” Indeed, before the film even begins, the viewer knows that they are not watching the average frivolous fuck flick, but an oneiric odyssey where orgasms and orgies take a back seat to perverse poetry. The protagonist of Myſtique is an exceedingly melancholy fashion photographer named Alma (Georgina Spelvin of Devil in Miss Jones (1973)) who cannot get over the fact that she had to give up her successful career because she is plagued by some unmentioned Camille-esque ‘wasting away’ terminal illness. As Alma tells her overly concerned doctor (Jake Teague in an absurd old man wig), she has no friends or family because, as she melodramatically states, “my work has been my life.” Under her doctor’s advice, Alma moves to her secluded scenic beach house where she can wither away in relative comfort while fantasizing about her physician pearl-diving and penetrating her under-used puss, among other things. Notably, during one of her various sex fantasies, the doctor busts a sticky load on Alma’s face and tells her, “Now you can sleep easier.”

Alma’s life changes dramatically one day when she spots a dark-haired dame with a red cloak named Cosima (Samantha Fox of Roger Watkins’ Her Name Was Lisa) sitting on a bench on her beachside back-porch. While Alma initially bitches at the sensual stranger for being on her property, she becomes immediately intrigued by Cosima and her ravishing pulchritude, so she apologizes for initial bitchiness and invites her in for some tea. While drinking tea, Cosima complains that the classical music her host is playing is “depressing” and Alma responds by stating, “it should be. It’s Gustav Mahler’s ‘Kindertotenlieder’... ‘Songs about dead children.’” After bitching some more about Mahler’s melancholy music, Cosima remarks to Alma in a dubious way, “You might say I’m an actress of sorts,” so the lapsed fashion photographer invites her to come over later to do a photo shoot, thus ushering in the beginning of their dark and decadent dyke romance. Indeed, the photo shoot is just a pretense so that Alma can get in Cosima's panties and before the two know it, they are engaging in carpet-munching 69 sessions and cunt-on-cunt 'scissoring.' While everything seems great at first, Alma changes the mood of the romance when she asks Cosima, "Do you love me?" and she bitchily responds by complaining, "Does it matter? We made beautiful love...Must I love you?," as if repelled by the idea of monogamous love. Indeed, as her Squeaky Fromme-esque cloak demonstrates, Cosima subscribes to a hyper hedonistic 'dark hippie' weltanschauung and she is rather turned off by Alma's 'airs' of conservative cultivation and introverted hermetic lifestyle, so she decides to change that by inviting some of her degenerate male friends over.

MYSTIQUE

Needless to say, when Alma walks in on Cosima and sees her being penetrated by a criminally-inclined blond hook-nosed philistine named Arthur (Randy West) on her couch, she becomes exceedingly enraged, especially when her young lover asks her "Did you ever taste semen?" after licking up her partner's cum and then brags that it tastes better than her tea. Cosima demands that Alma kick Arthur out of her house immediately, but the young brute soon comes back with an equally barbaric friend named Max (Vaughn Mitchell) to teach the frigid middle-aged woman a lesson. Indeed, the next day while Alma is taking a quiet and relaxing bath, Arthur and Max storm in her bathroom and gang rape her in the tub, with each man showing his meaty member in one of her fleshy orifices. Right after Arthur and Max get done showing Alma a "good time," Cosima walks in while sporting a top-hat and carrying a whip and sadistically remarks, "How cozy...How very fucking cozy. I didn't think you had it in you, my dear. Two men at one time...My, my." Later that night, Alma asks Cosima why she did not help her when she was being raped, but the fetishistic femme fatale denies the rape ever took place and soon convinces her lover that it never even happened. The next day, Alma's doctor comes by to give her some painkillers and compliments her on her taste in music since she is playing a record of Wagner's "Liebestod." As soon as the doctor leaves, Arthur barges in and rudely remarks "you're doctor friend is a fucking geek" while his pal Max steals her painkillers. Annoyed by the soothing Germanic sounds of "Liebestod," Max complains "Cosima is right, this bitch has no taste in music" and smashes the Wagner record, which causes Alma to get so mad that she calls him a "pig." As "punishment" for calling Max a "pig," the two brutal degenerates once again rape Alma while queen bitch Cosima smirks sinisterly.

To demonstrate her complete and utter authority over hopelessly lovelorn Alma, Cosima forces the middle-age broad to be the subject of pornographic photo shoots. On top of that, Cosima uses Alma's wealth to hire a number of pointless "domestics" to ostensibly clean the house, do the laundry, etc. Naturally, Cosima has hired these so-called domestics to satisfy her debauched proclivities. Of course, introvert Alma can't handle that many people being in her house and even ignores Arthur when he hilariously asks her, "Hey bitch, where's the one about the dead babies?," adding, "That one kind of grows on you" regarding the Mahler album. While Alma broods all by her lonesome in her room, various orgies around the house that Cosima 'directs' and photographs while carrying around a whip. When Alma finally gets the gall to confront Cosima and pleads to her, "I love you. Why do you want to torture me so?," she responds by proselytizing in a hippie fashion, stating, "My must learn who you are. You must live your life. You cannot perpetually hide behind your camera. You must be part of life... Otherwise, you do not live. Come... Join us, Alma, join us in the celebration of life. If you want love, you must learn how to give love. Otherwise, you cannot be part of life." Alma responds to Cosima's speech by remarking, "I think I see. I think I'm beginning to understand" and subsequently passively submits to pornographic porn shoots and orgies, thus demonstrating that she has finally embraced her evil girlfriend's Dionysian way of life. In the end, Alma dies after submitting to an orgy and in a bizarre dream-sequence, she says goodbye to her doctor and Cosima, as if to thank both of them for what they have done for her.

Pornography aside, MyStique is certainly a wicked and malevolent little film that depicts gang-rape as an acceptable means to cure an introverted recluse of her social awkwardness, yet it somehow manages to stay true to some of the themes of Thomas Mann's source novel, namely the Nietzschean dichotomy of Apollo and Dionysus. Indeed, in her innate self-restraint and need to live a life of structured beauty, Alma represents the Greek god Apollo while Cosima represents the god Dionysus due to her practice and active promotion of hedonistic excesses. Of course, being a fuck flick, Dionysus certainly triumphs in the end of MyStique, thus subversively reversing the conclusion of Death in Venice. Of course, the film also stays true to Mann's novella in its intertextual utilization of the ideas in Plato's Symposium regarding the connection of erotic love to philosophical wisdom as depicted in the stormy yet ultimately insightful romance between Alma and Cosima. Notably, like Italian maestro Luchino Visconti's Death in Venice (1971) adaptation starring Dirk Bogarde, MyStique also features compositions by Mahler that help to accentuate the overall tone of the film. Despite being directed by Roberta Findlay, the film certainly has the idiosyncratic essence of a Roger Watkins hardcore flick, thus making it all the more absurd that he was not credited for his work. Watkins would have his revenge against Findlay in an interview in Headpress 23: Funhouse where he mocked her one-time husband Michael Findlay's grisly death via helicopter blade decapitation by stating regarding the tragic ordeal, "It's so funny. I think that is hilarious." While I think Findlay is mostly a no-talent hack filmmaker who used her belated ex-husband to further her own career, MyStique certainly demonstrates that she had some talent, especially when having a relatively well written script to work with (notably, Findlay worked more as a cinematographer than as a writer/director, thus her 'talent' seemed to be more in the technical realm). In some way, it seems that the sea had a positive effect on her work as demonstrated by her softcore melodrama The Clamdigger's Daughter (1973) which, like Mystique, has a similarly dark and almost Gothic dream-like atmosphere, as well as a complimentary classical score featuring compositions by Beethoven, Bruckner, and Bach, among others. Unquestionably, if you're one of those oh-so rare individuals that considers themselves both a Germanophile and porn chic era fan like I do, Findlay's flick will surely provide you with a singular and almost inexplicable experience that will make you realize how amazing it is that such an aberrant work got created in the first place, for surely no such film could ever be monetarily successful (apparently, Findlay regarded the film as a 'misfire' of sorts). Indeed, it certainly says something about the dualistic nature of 'Richard Mahler' that he could turn world-class Teutonic masterpieces into some of the seediest, most sadistic, and anti-sexy pieces of celluloid smut ever assembled.

MYSTIQUE

-Ty E

COPKILLER

Roberto Faenza (1983)

Call me anti-Guido but I have never been particularly allured by the mostly cheap scent of stereotypically gritty Italian giallo flicks. Of course, I love such giallo classics as Dario Argento's The Bird with the Crystal Plumage (1970) and Lucio Fulci's odd Catholic-guilt themed work Don't Torture a Duckling (1972) but I generally rather re-watch a Hitchcock classic than put blind faith in an obscure film from the Italian horror-crime-mystery subgenre. Recently, I took a chance on the criminally underrated giallo Copkiller (1983) aka The Order of Death aka Corrupt aka Bad Cop Chronicles #2 aka Corrupt Lieutenant directed by Roberto Faenza and featuring Harvey Keitel and John Lydon aka Johnny Rotten (of The Sex Pistols and Public Image Ltd) in his only starring role. In Copkiller, Keitel and Lydon play a cryptic gay game of back-and-forth homoerotic, sadomasochistic master and slave. Leo Smith (played by Lydon) is a spoiled little boy with nothing to do but confess to Lt. Fred O'Connor (played by Keitel) that he is the sole culprit in a recent string of vehement cop-killings; the most serious and personal offense when it comes to dealing with the men in blue. Immediately upon hearing Smith's confession, O'Connor finds such claims to be nothing short of dubious and intrinsically ludicrous. After all, Smith looks and acts like a relatively harmless Mick fairy from outer-space, thus O'Connor prematurely concludes that the ladylike lad lacks the testicular fortitude to commit such suicidal cop-antagonizing deeds. O'Connor is more concerned by the fact that Smith has been stalking him and has found his secret "Bad Lt." apartment that he shares with his fellow crooked "police partner." After questioning him and bitterly shoving his head in a fully-functional and running oven a couple times, O'Connor decides to imprison Smith in his bathroom and keep him as a barely-clothed personal pet. Naturally, O'Connor is not a totally mean kidnapper as he provides Smith with food via a dog bowl and sympathetically acknowledges to his captive that it is a shame that such a "good looking guy like you, locked-up in a bathroom." To say that Keitel and Lydon have an idiosyncratic, prowling yet strangely affectionate kind of relationship throughout Copkiller would be a gross and naive understatement. The sort of unnatural chemistry the two leads in the film have is the kind that leads to genocide and gang warfare. Simply put, Copkiller may be one of the strangest "buddy flicks" ever assembled.

Right from the beginning, Copkiller is a wonderful filmic present that is quite pleasurable to unravel for those cinephiles that love surprise gifts. Not only does one discover who purported copkiller Leo Smith is but one also discovers that Fred O'Connor is simply not a corrupt cop with a rough exterior. From the get go, one gets the impression that little midge O'Connor is a posturing brute of sorts, but, as recognized by Leo Smith, the lunatic lieutenant has a 'maternal'

COPKILLER

Achilles heel. Although seeming like a weak and harmless pervert, it is quite apparent that limey Leo has something much starker lurking beyond his physically and mentally sickly yet strangely charismatic persona. Initially, it seems as if smiley Smith's aim is to be gang-raped by a precinct of police but his true conspiratorial agenda is not completely revealed until the remaining minutes of Copkiller. Indeed, the film has a couple notable deaths and the killer looks most daft yet delightful in his cop uniform and matching black ski-mask but the real delicious "red meat" of Copkiller is the thoroughly jovial and equally sadistic psychological power-play between Smith and O'Connor. Throughout the film, one is kept wondering who is the craziest partner of this truly odd couple. Of course, stoic O'Connor is the man in the relationship as he personifies the ad hominem-based, cultural Marxist "authoritarian personality" type and Smith is surely more effeminate and conspiring in his constantly unpredictable, passive girlish behavior in the sense outlined by Otto Weininger. In other words, whereas O'Connor is a stern 'man-of-action', Smith is a cold and calculating conniver. Like O'Connor, the viewer unravels who Smith really is as Copkiller progresses yet the more one learns about this truly loco sod, the more confusing his true agenda seems. That being said, Copkiller deserves recognition amongst the greatest of giallo films, but it is also entitled to notoriety as a work that totally transcends the restricting and stereotyped subgenre.

One of the most obvious aspects of Copkiller that makes it stand proudly alone (and relatively unknown) amongst most giallo films is its all-star international cast and New York City setting. Of course, there are some other giallo films that take place in NYC (i.e. Lucio Fulci's The New York Ripper) but Copkiller – unlike any other film of the subgenre – truly manages to capture the violent zeitgeist of the city at that time as if it was directed by Abel Ferrara's homo-serial-killer cousin. If it were not for Copkiller director Robert Faenza's fondness for Marxism, it is doubtful the film would have ever been made as the director was forced to work in the good ol' free USA after his Italian Communist Party-sympathetic work Si salvi chi vuole (1980) was deemed politically incorrect in his homeland. Featuring a musical score by legendary Italian film composer Ennio Morricone, Copkiller permeates a distinct atmosphere that one can only find in the great gritty NYC crime films of the early 1980s, but, at the same time, the film is secluded in a unique "ghetto" all of its own. In a sense, Copkiller is also a "thinking man's slasher film" as one gets to deeply penetrate the hopelessly tainted mind of a coldblooded, psychopathic killer in a most personal way. Although I am sure many cinephiles see Copkiller as an primer and/or unofficial sequel/prequel (as some greedy fellows later tried to market as) to Abel Ferrara's more successful work Bad Lieutenant (1992) starring Harvey Keitel, the film stands fairly well on its own two feet as an unconventional anti-giallo that twists and wonderfully warps all of the rules of the subgenre it barely belongs to. Like William Friedkin's Cruising (1980), Copkiller defiantly (yet more subtlety) enters an area of the gay-world that is most certainly off limits to modern politically correct filmmakers. Although seemingly different, Leo Smith and Lt. Fred O'Connor share a vice that is for them, more naughty than nice, henceforth Copkiller is a work that most significantly enters into the deplorable and forbidden realms of the psyche than the less disturbing physical world of a corrupt cop's secret apartment. If I had to guess John Wayne Gacy's or Jeffrey Dahmer's favorite film, Copkiller would undoubtedly be at the top of the list. Unfortunately, like many Americans, I seriously doubt these two upstanding U.S. citizens had the grand opportunity to watch this lovely piece of cinematic Americana.

-Ty E

THE WICKER MAN
THE WICKER MAN

Robin Hardy (1973)

Probably most favorably described by Film magazine Cinefantastique as being “The Citizen Kane of horror movies,” The Wicker Man (1973) directed by British screenwriter/director Robin Hardy (The Fantasiist, The Wicker Tree) is certainly deserving out its reputation as not only one of the best and most imaginatively idiosyncratic ‘horror’ films ever made, but also one of the best British films ever made period. A sort of thematically and aesthetically audacious anti-Hammer horror flick in its featuring of Hammer icons Christopher Lee and Ingrid Pitt but focusing on themes of old school Celtic paganism as opposed to the sterile old Semite religion of Christianity, The Wicker Man essentially created a new spiritual and cultural cinematic universe as a work that most specifically focuses on pagan sacrifice to the sun-god in a menacing yet mystifying manner that does not resort to Judeo-Christian finger-pointing and pseudo-spiritual mumbo jumbo of the conspicuously contrived New-Age sort. Adapted from the little known David Pinner novel Ritual (1967), which was originally intended as a film treatment for an unrealized work directed by Michael Winner (but was ultimately turned into a novel when Winner declined), The Wicker Man eventually began to evolve into a film when screenwriter Anthony Shaffer (who previously penned Hitchcock’s Frenzy (1972)) and actor Christopher Lee paid Pinner £15,000 (a little over $23,400) for the rights to the novel. Dropping virtually all of the comedic nuances of Pinner’s novel, Shaffer ultimately only used Ritual as a loose basis for the script for The Wicker Man and only came to find the major theme of the film when he “finally hit upon the abstract concept of sacrifice,” which eventually ripened into the iconic wooden ‘wicker man’ statue, hence the film’s title. Spawned from a single sentence in Julius Caesar’s Commentarii de Bello Gallico aka Commentaries on the Gallic War regarding his account of Celtic pagan Druids using towering wicker human-shaped statues for the purpose of human sacrifice by burning it in effigy, the wicker man became arguably the most important ingredient in The Wicker Man, but luckily screenwriter Shaffer, who was ironically Jewish (or not ironic considering the less than flattering depiction of self-flagellating Christ worship in the film), became obsessed with all things Euro-pagan and did meticulous research for the film, utilizing the groundbreaking work The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion (1890) by the Scottish anthropologist Sir James George Frazer as one of his most imperative frames of references. With the reasonably objective research and screenplay by Shaffer, director Robin Hardy was able to assemble one of the most hypnotic, culturally keen, and aesthetically pleasing pieces of celluloid heathenism ever made via The Wicker Man, a celestial and naturally kaleidoscopic cinematic work that manages to cinematically reintroduce the religion of the old Occidental world through the much maligned and oftentimes awfully artless horror genre. Probably the only film to make neo-paganism seem rather romantic and not the simply the delusional make-believe hobby of morbidly obese fanboy degenerates with bad skin who mistake their lack of self-control in regard to eating and sexual fetishism as a religion, The Wicker Man also happens to be the best film ever made about an unwitting fool who is chosen to be king for a day.

Sergeant Neil Howie (Edward Woodward) is a stoic and deeply religious middle-aged Christian who views everything in the world through a narrow Christ lens. When Howie receives an anonymous letter requesting that he go to the Scottish island Summerisle—a remote and quaint but wild and wonderfully scenic Scottish Hebridean island best known for its production of fruit despite its dead volcanic soil—to research the mysterious disappearance of a 12-year-old girl named Rowan Morrison (Gerry Cowper), who apparently disappeared a couple months ago, the lone and seemingly rather lonely cop personally flies there, not realizing that anti-Christ horndog heathenism awaits him there. Upon arriving on the island, Howie instantly realizes there is something off-putting and innately alien about the Summerisle residents, especially considering that no one, not even the girl's own culinary artist mother, seems interested in answering his questions and finding little Rowan Morrison. When taking residence in a bar/inn aptly titled The Green Man Inn run by an exceedingly effete fellow named Alder MacGregor (mime/actor Lindsay Kemp) and his voluptuous and beautiful nymphet daughter Willow (Swedish actress Britt Ekland), he learns that the funny folks of Summerisle do not just enjoy getting drunk and jolly like the average Scotsman, but also having mass orgies in graveyards and grinding their genitals against tombstones. On his first night in the inn, Howie has a rather hard time controlling himself as wanton Willow attempts to seduce him with an orgasmic song and sensuality, but being a man who should have lost his virginity decades ago, he manages to maintain his cool and save his seed. The next day, Howie walks in on the local school teacher Miss Rose (Diane Cilento) stating to her preteen girl class regarding the maypole, "The phallic symbol. That is correct. It is the image of the penis, which is venerated in religions such as ours, as symbolizing the generative force in nature." Naturally, Howie finally realizes that Summerisle is a proudly 'perverse', penis-worshiping pagan island where Christianity has been discarded like a putrid pair of feces-stained underwear, fresh young girls dance unclad around phallic poles for fertility rituals whilst dreaming of spawning sons and daughters, and graveyards feature dried up umbilical cords hanging from trees and headstones are inscribed with such salacious prayers as "protected by the ejaculation of serpents." After discovering a tree (navel skin and all) where Rowan Morrison's corpse is ostensibly buried, Howie pays a visit to a certain Laird (aka Lord) Summerisle (Christopher Lee), who has apparently been expecting the humorless cop. Seemingly holding nothing back, Lord Summerisle tells Howie about the history of the island and how his spiritually progressive Victorian scientist grandfather not only developed new strains of fruit that could survive and thrive in Scotland's brutal climate and volcanic soil, but also introduced the local peasant populous to the old Celtic gods, which the conservative cop finds rather unsettling, but at least the lord grants him the authority to exhume Rowan Morrison's grave. Instead of finding a preteen female corpse, however, Howie is agitated to find a gutted bunny rabbit, which he takes by Lord Summerisle's estate and flings at the neo-Victorian pagan gentleman, accusing him of murdering Rowan Morrison in some bizarre pagan sacrifice.

THE WICKER MAN

After researching some documents and photographs regarding the previous year's harvest and learning the crops—the only source of the island's income—had failed, Howie comes to the natural conclusion that Rowan Morrison is very likely still alive and that the pagan islanders plan to sacrifice her at the annual May Day celebrations so as to ensure a fruitful harvest for the following year. While Howie plans to leave on May Day so he can get more cops and bust the heathens of Summerisle, someone has sabotaged his plane, which fails to take off, so being forced to stay on the island with time of the essence, he decides to look for Rowan Morrison all by his lonesome. After knocking innkeeper MacGregor unconscious and stealing his costume, Howie goes incognito by dressing as "Punch", a central character in the May Day festival. Howie joins up with the rest of the islanders, who are also in costume, and manages to pass off the charade of portraying Punch, even becoming involved in eroticized but ultimately benign sacrifices to pagan gods, but he makes the fatal mistake of blowing his cover when Rowan Morrison is revealed tied to a pole. Quite the dashing hero with a softspot for virginal preteens, Howie knocks out one of the islanders and manages to free Rowan, but she leads him into a well orchestrated trap by taking him through a cave where Lord Summerisle and his merry minions are waiting for him on the other side. Lord Summerisle reveals to Howie that he, being a virginal man who came of his own free will with the authority of the king as a representative of the law, is merely a specially picked pawn in a pagan game and that the entire story of Rowan Morrison being missing was merely a pretense to get him to come to the island. While Howie was right that the Lord Summerisle and his Celtic compatriots were planning to make a human sacrifice for May Day in the hope that the coming year's harvest would be a success, it is he and not Rowan Morrison that will be sacrificed to the sun in a scenario where the "hunter is hunted." As Miss Rose tells the petrified officer, "You are the fool, Mr. Howie...Punch, one of the great fool-victims of history. For you have accepted the role of king for a day. And who but a fool would do that? But you will be revered and anointed as a king." Since Howie ostensibly came of his own free will, is a mature virgin, and has "the power of a king - representing the law," he apparently makes for a distinctly outstanding sacrificial offering to the gods and the best spiritual hope Summerisle has for having a fruitful harvest. Howie essentially tells the Summerisle residents that they are madly superstitious and the crops merely failed because they were not meant to grow on such a cold and infertile island, but they pay him no mind, strip off his clothes, cover him in a special monk-like ceremonial robe, and march him up a cliff with his hands behind his back where the wicker man stands. Totally petrified by the mammoth wicker statue standing before him, which also has various farm animals imprisoned in it, Howie is carried up and locked in the wicker man, where he will ultimately have the rare and dignified honor of dying a 'martyr's death.' After setting the statue ablaze, the pagans sing the medieval English folk-song "Sumer Is Icumen In" while Howie denounces them by self-righteously proclaiming that the Christian god has punished them for the past failed harvest due to the pagan faith and innately deceitful ways. As the wicker man burns, Howie recites "Psalm 23" from the Old Testament and prays to God to not forget him and to save a place for him in heaven. As the wicker man crumbles in flames, taking Howie with it, the final shot of The Wicker Man zooms into the sun that looks over the pagan people as the true harvester of all people and all life. In the end, the pagan cycle of death and rebirth is complete.

Made in the wake of the the popular hippie and counter-culture movements of the late-1960s where certain 'enlightened' individuals hanged up their rosaries and crucifixes and traded them in for New Age mumbo jumbo, including warped and watered down 'feel good' forms of neo-paganism and so-called 'eclectic paganism,' The Wicker Man is assuredly a spiritual slap in the face to posturing occultnik dilettantes and smug bourgeois bookstore witches who thought that by adopting minor elements and rituals of the ancient, more sex and nature friendly religions and disregarding the more unflattering elements of said religions that they could rationalize their self-absorbed hedonism and seem totally cool, chic, and enlightened while doing it. In a reasonably objective manner, The Wicker Man portrays the good, the bad, and the ugly of Celtic paganism without resorting to hocus pocus puffery, ridiculous romanticism, cliché Christian condemnation, or plastic parody, and for that reason alone, the film deserves a special place in cinema history. The only film ever made that is part folk musical, part Celtic völkisch flick, part celluloid 'game' and pseudo-murder mystery, part pagan parable, and part high-class intellectual horror show, The Wicker Man is nothing short of an ideally idiosyncratic cinema masterpiece that makes for a 'magical' marriage between arthouse and mainstream cinema.

Rather unfortunately and cinematically sacrilegiously, a feminist-fueled American remake of The Wicker Man starring Nicholas Cage was released in 2006, but thankfully even the most bottom of the barrel rabble among horror fans found the film to be nothing short of a patently pointless celluloid abortion. Undoubtedly, even more aesthetically tragic, The Wicker Man director Robin Hardy somewhat recently released a so called "spiritual sequel" entitled The Wicker Tree (2011) that I would even go as far as arguing is worse than the patently pathetic 2006 remake. At best, The Wicker Tree seems like a philistine-friendly parody of the original The Wicker Man directed by a man trying to cash in on the legacy of an unrivaled cinematic masterpiece he directed almost four decades earlier. Based on director Hardy's own 2006 novel Cowboys for Christ: On May Day, The Wicker Tree depicts the 'absurdity' that occurs when a group of god-bothering redneck Texan Christian fundamentalists led by a revolting pop singer make the unwitting mistake of travelling to Scotland and attempting to convert heathens who worship the goddess Sulis. While centering on the theme of a metaphysical/physical clash between nature-worshipping paganism and nature-cuckolding Christianity like The Wicker Man, The Wicker Tree shamelessly wallows in cheap and tasteless sex, embarrassing pseudo-kosher comic relief, superficial and superlatively soulless social commentary, and an absolutely asinine aesthetic package that is a total insult to the original 1973 film. Apparently when discussing the mixed reviews The Wicker Tree received, director Hardy attempted to defend the film by stating, "The New York Times's reviewer said it wasn't as gritty as the original Wicker Man, but it's a thousand times better than the remake. I was quite happy with that," but when asked whether he preferred the original 1973 or the "spiritual sequel," the only thing he could say was, "No, I really don't." Of course, Hardy is not fooling anyone, not even himself. To further taint the legacy of The Wicker Man, Hardy is working on a third film entitled The Wrath of the Gods (2015), which will act as the concluding chapter of a totally pointless 'The Wicker Man Trilogy.' Apparently a 'romantic black comedy' based on Twilight of the Gods aka Götterdämmerung, the final part of Richard Wagner's four cycle epic opera Der Ring des Nibelungen aka The Ring of the Nibelung where "the gods get their comeuppance," The Wrath of the Gods will be primarily set in the Shetland Islands (though originally set in Iceland) and focus on Norse mythology. While I cannot say anything good about the 2006 remake nor the 2011 'spiritual sequel,' the neofolk outfit Nature And Organisation led by British musician Michael Cashmore did an excellent cover (featuring Scottish singer Rose McDowall of Strawberry Switchblade on vocals) of the song "Willow's Song" featured in The Wicker Man written by Paul Giovanni (and sung by Annie Ross) for their album Beauty Reaps The Blood Of Solitude (1994), renaming the song simply, "Wicker Man Song." While "Willow's Song" is undoubtedly my favorite song from The Wicker Man, American composer Paul Giovanni, who died from AIDS-related causes in 1990 at the mere age of 57, did an exquisite job with the entire soundtrack, thereupon adding an extra layer to the film's foreboding folkish atmosphere.

THE WICKER MAN

Only vaguely a horror flick (and almost insulting and certainly misleading to describe it as such!), The Wicker Man is nothing short of an amazingly thrilling and titillating piece of celluloid spiritual atavism featuring a charmingly curious esoteric realm that seems like a utopia to some viewers and an unhinged nightmare to others. Despite its Semitic screenwriter, The Wicker Man is as unflinchingly Northern European as films come and a piece of (for some perturbing) purity that reminds one how the world has decidedly degenerated since the abandoning of native paganism, adopting the Judaic desert religion of Christianity, and starting a worldwide campaign against nature. Featuring a practical execution of ideas not unlike those espoused by back-to-nature groups like the German Wandervogel groups, whose ideas were inevitably adopted by the National Socialists in various forms, The Wicker Man is probably most 'horrifying' today in that it makes spiritual blasphemy and sacrificing a virginal Christian cop once a year a small price to pay for living in a truly organic folk community with natural values as opposed to living in the culturally/racially mongrelized and spiritually sick 'multicultural' mainstream where sex and life are meaningless, everything has a price but no value, and an innate and all-encompassing ugliness pervades every aspect of life. A film where not only the protagonist, but also the viewer, is made a fool and king for a day via a mystifying metaphysical murder located on a breathtaking and beautiful island paradise populated by beautiful yet brutal people, The Wicker Man is the closest thing ever made to a Celtic pagan spiritual journey in celluloid form. On top of that, The Wicker Man is also the only film that has the grand distinction of featuring Sir Christopher Lee as a megalomaniac cult leader in völkisch drag in a role, performance, and film that the actor himself would declare the best of his career, which, I, for one, concur with as both a hater of Hammer horror and The Lord of the Rings film trilogy (2001–2003), but also as a fan of both horror and arthouse cinema. Indeed, The Wicker Man is probably the only quasi-musical ever made where one does not feel like they have been raped by a gang of rabid trannies after watching it, but more importantly, it is also one of the most chillingly charming and wickedly bewitching depictions of celluloid blasphemy and spiritual cuckoldry ever made.

-Ty E

WHAT WE DO IS SECRET
WHAT WE DO IS SECRET

Rodger Grossman (2007)

When I found out that a film full of Hollywood “has been” stars was going to be made about the punk legend Darby Crash and his band The Germs, I was disgusted. Hollywood has made enough films distorting the image of rockers (among other historical social figures), but I never thought that sunset boulevard would ever touch upon the short life of junkie fascist punk rocker Darby Crash. To top off this horrendous idea for a film, they decided to cast A Walk to Remember star Shane West as Darby Crash. I doubt Darby Crash was ever a fan of shitty teenage girl romance films.

After viewing the film, I was surprised to find that Shane West was the best thing about it. The young actor had the look of Darby Crash down pretty accurately. Although no one could ever truly impersonate the unique gestures and speech of Darby, Shane West at least gets by. The casting of Rick Gonzalez as Pat Smear was a horrible decision by the casting director of What We Do Is Secret. Smear never had an atrocious “latino (or whatever it’s supposed to be)” accent. I doubt Gonzalez even attempted to recreate the real Pat Smear. Smear is of negro, American Indian, Jewish, and German blood. For some reason, What We Do Is Secret tries to make him out as some cool avant-garde Latino. I guess the flood in third world immigration made having Smear become Latino more interesting for newly arrived “American” audiences.

Darby Crash

Apparently, Pat Smear referred to the cast of What We Do Is Secret as “the baby Germs.” Smear had the job of training the cast how to play The Germs songs for the film. Maybe Pat Smear could have also trained Rick Gonzalez to at least somewhat portray him. That would have required Rick Gonzalez to talk with a sort of gay California drugged out accent. For some reason, I think most Germs fans would have preferred that.

All and all, What We Do Is Secret is a weak film about Darby Crash and The Germs. It is the type of film that might inspire individuals that have never heard of The Germs to look further into the band. For those interested, Penelope Spheeris’ The Decline of Western Civilization is the documentary to checkout if you want to see the real Darby Crash. Also the book Lexicon Devil: The Fast Times and Short Life of Darby Crash and The Germs is something worth checking out. The book spans the same period featured in What We Do Is Secret except much more in depth. That being said, What We Do Is Secret is at best watchable.

-Ty E

NOBODY LOVES ALICE

Roger A. Scheck (2008)

Nobody loves Alice is a full-length debut independent horror film directed by Roger Scheck. The plot follows a very overdone plot of a “I love you so much I’m going to kidnap you” sort of pattern, but with a higher dosage. Alice is an adorably shy new secretary at her new office. She can never seem to find love, so she forces people to love them. How, you might ask? By binding and torturing them of course! I had only a few problems with this disturbing gem and one of them is the length of the film. For a film of this uncomfortable caliber, for my own sanity, should be around 40 minutes. I’d be a liar if I didn’t admit that this film had me on edge for most of its runtime. Nobody Loves Alice can be called the lovechild of May and Misery. The director really seems to have directing down, this being his first film and all. The acting of course is a mixed bag for being an independent. We have our natural talent, and then the lesser works. Alice was a perfect role for the lovely Nitzan Mager. She might seem to have a heart full of gold, but rest assured, this bitch is stone cold. Despite its low budget, the film has some greatly filmed scenes with some realistic bloodshed. The set of the torture room was intense as hell. It must have taken a while to splatter all that blood on the wall and mattress. I only had a few real complaints with this film, one being the stupidity of the characters at random intervals. One second they will have a great idea and do something completely original for the “psycho-chick” genre, only to walk into a room and completely lose their guard. Words cannot describe the tension this film brought out. At times I was giggling at Alice’s cute and shy mannerisms, only to be horrified and distraught five minutes later. Nobody Loves Alice is a physical and emotional ride through relationship hell. I don’t think I will be looking for love anytime soon. This Lifetime movie from hell comes highly recommended.

-Maq

THE RULES OF ATTRACTION
THE RULES OF ATTRACTION

Roger Avary (2002)

The Rules of Attraction is easily the best "college" film. Unlike most college films, the students in this film actually got somewhat of an education. Most college films deal with a pathetic individual who is incapable of doing school work so he schemes a way out of it. The Rules of Attraction skips the school aspect of college and completely goes for the social. The film is an initiation into the world of dark American hedonism full of sex, drugs, and "Rock & Roll." These is the only real education American colleges give. Sean Bateman (brother of Patrick Bateman from American Psycho) is a swell womanizing drug dealer who likes to smoke a lot of dope. He's in love with an ethnic virgin by the name of Lauren who enjoys looking at books full of sexually transmitted diseases. Paul Denton, a suave and stylish homosexual also has his eyes on Sean Bateman. Paul likes Sean because he's a dirty boy and looks like "he can't remember whether he's catholic or not." Obviously The Rules of Attraction features of variety of other sex scenes that aren't exactly to the liking of the main characters. Kevin Arnold from The Wonder Years almost makes an appearance in The Rules of Attraction as a college student shooting heroin in between his toes in his underwear. Mr. Arnold is watching Robert Wiene's German expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari during his trip to opium heaven. The Rules of Attraction director Roger Avary also showed tribute to F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu in Killing Zoe. Avary's love for German expressionism hardly shows up in his actual filmmaking techniques. The Rules of Attraction features a variety of experimental editing techniques which range from innovative to failing. Either way, I much preferred the editing in The Rules of Attraction to most of the Soviet Montage ADHD style editing too prevalent in contemporary films. A lot of the editing also works well as a tool that interacts with the "connections" between the individuals in the story. I especially liked the editing sequences of the shy girl who decides to end her life early. These editing montages recap her earlier appearances in the film which are easy to miss the first time around. The Rules of Attraction is a fairly conventional yet quality film. I find myself coming back to it a couple times a year. I once told a cheerleader that I liked the film and she told me it was depressing. It is about time someone made a serious college film and surprisingly Roger Avary was the man to do it. Finally, a college film that acknowledges all of the rape that happens on campus.

-Ty E

USHER

Roger Corman (1960)

Beginning his eclectic life in subtextual Poe-esque cultish camp horror with the black-and-white 8mm short The Fall of the House of Usher (1942), a work based on the 1839 Edgar Allan Poe short story of the same name that the director created in high school at the youthful age of 14 and would later describe as mere “juvenalia” but would set the tone for all of his work to come, criminally underrated American auteur Curtis Harrington (How Awful About Allan, What’s the Matter with Helen?) would conclude his unparalleled filmmaking career by coming full circle with Usher (2002), a less than 40 minute remake of the very story he adapted as a teenager. In his unfinished, posthumously released memoir Nice Guys Don’t Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013), Harrington describes the influence of Poe’s short story as follows, “‘The Fall of the House of Usher’ was the story that gripped me, held me in thrall as no other story ever had. By the end of it, I was almost gasping for breath and leapt from my chair in an attempt to relieve the pressure on my brain. The horror of the story’s final revelation of the returned corpse totally engulfed my mind and senses. My memory was seared with it, leaving a scar that I would never lose. It was as if I had discovered my soul mate in the world of literature.” And, indeed, as a personal friend and collaborator of cinemagickian/Crowleyite Kenneth Anger who was responsible for some of the cinematography in Puce Moment (1953) and played the character of somnambulist Cesare from the German expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) in Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954), as well as documenting the art of Thelemite and ‘Scarlet Woman’ Marjorie Cameron (who later appeared in Harrington’s first feature-length film Night Tide (1961) as a ‘Water Witch’) in the short documentary The Wormwood Star (1956), among various other occult connections and directing occult themed films, Curtis Harrington was certainly someone who had found solace in the darkness and Usher is certainly no exception to his life of glistening in the shadows. Partially founded by the brokering of his signed copy of Aleister Crowley’s The Book of Thoth : A Short Essay on the Tarot of the Egyptians by ex-Church of Satan members/occultist Zeena (daughter of CoS founder Anton LaVey) and Nikolas Schreck, Usher was Harrington’s first film in nearly two decades since directing the quasi-skinflick Mata Hari (1985) starring Sylvia ‘Emmanuelle’ Kristel and produced by Menahem Golan after suffering a lifetime of having his cinematic works be deleteriously defiled and butchered by sociopathic Hollywood producers and studios, thus the final celluloid work also acts as his last pure artistic statement. Like his original 1942 adaptation of The Fall of the House of Usher, Usher features Harrington playing both leads as the twin anti-heroes, including in drag as Madeline Usher, thereupon expressing his innate ‘femininity’ and homosexuality, a theme he embraced in a similarly macabre manner with his phantasmagorical avant-garde surrealist horror short Fragment of Seeking (1946).

USHER

In Usher, elderly poet twins Roderick and Madeline Usher are certainly the celluloid alter-egos of Curtis Harrington, a filmmaker figuratively taking his last gasp in cinematic form via the poetic deaths of the two siblings who share the same dark soul. Indeed, one could even look at Usher as one of the most lavish and dark home-movies ever made as Harrington shot it in his own strikingly elegant, if not seemingly melancholy, antique and fine art adorned Gothic home, and even counted on his own friends to star in and help create the virtual 35mm obituary. Roger Corman, who directed the most famous cinematic adaptation of The Fall of the House of Usher, House of Usher (1960) and who assigned Harrington to direct Voyage to the Prehistoric Planet (1965) and Queen of Blood (1966), also provided insurance that was needed to shoot in eerie Rosedale Cemetery in Los Angeles for Usher. Featuring a naïve young poet named Truman Jones (Sean Nepita) who has the honor of being invited to the House of Usher mansion to be schooled in life and all its dark crevices and corners and not the sort of pseudo-knowledge taught by reading a bunch of flowery poetry, Usher is a film directed by a sweet and generous, if not ominous old-timer who no longer understands the world he lives in, thus he escaped to the dreadful dream world where the only certainty in life is misery and inevitable loss of said life. Picked up by the Usher Twins' French chauffeur/butler Pierre (Fabrice Uzan), pansy-like protagonist Truman Jones enters the home and life of his dark yet gentlemanly mentor Roderick Usher with almost childish apprehension and naivety. Roderick lets Jones know that he is "not a teacher" but "simply a poet and perhaps not a very good one at that" and that poetry is from the heart, which the artist himself can only know and fully discover and integrate into their work. Jones' first encounter with Roderick's sister Madeline is a rather anti-social one as she does not even acknowledge him as she is apparently in ill health. A true gentleman through and through, Roderick entertains his guest by sharing lunch and wine, playing chess, walking around his pet Rottweiler Lucifer, and messing around with an Ouija board. Naturally, Jones is intrigued by the rather reclusive Madeline and one day she does come by for some outdoor tea with the guest and her twin brother and the siblings discuss poetry, including their critical agreements on the 'dry' scribblings of T.S. Eliot, how W. H. Auden will be nothing more than a footnote in a century, and how "above all, there is Reverdy...possibly the greatest poetry of the twentieth century." Curtis Harrington, a man who learned French while living in Europe during his early adult years, displays his disdain for the idea of poetry being translated when Madeline Usher pretentiously remarks, "when the words are changed, the poem vanishes." And, indeed, the same occurred with the butchering of his films like The Killing Kind (1973) and Ruby (1977) by sinister Svengali producers, which also lead to the partial vanishing of Curtis Harrington's auteur signature as a celluloid poet, which is undoubtedly the most horrific thing to consider when watching his films.

Apparently terminally ill, Roderick Usher tells Jones regarding his twin sister that “The doctor gives her no hope and I’m absolutely terrified.” Unfortunately, it is during their mutual birthday party featuring guests in the spirit of James Whale’s The Old Dark House (1932)—a film that Curtis Harrington saved from being lost forever—that signals the beginning of the end for the Usher twins. Featuring a number of idiosyncratic party guests, including a priest (ironically played by ex-Satanist Nikolas Schreck), a doctor, a butch blonde lesbian poetess (Zeena Schreck, daughter and ‘magical killer’ of Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey), and a couple bloated bluebloods, the birthday party begins merrily with wine and party masks, but apparently Madeline drinks a bit too much aged booze for her age and randomly tragicomedically drops dead during an initially happy dance with the ever so patronizing Mr. Jones. Rather oddly, Roderick initially seems quite youthful and even ecstatic after his dear sister croaks as if he has forgotten they both share the same blackened soul, but then, as Jones states, came that “last night.” On Jones’ last evening at the House of Usher, he receives a spooky telephone call from the ghost of Madeline stating, “Tell Roderick I will be seeing him soon,” and, sure enough, she does and comes adorned with rotten corpse-like flesh and remarkably dainty skeletal hands. A terribly stormy night, Roderick initially wallows in the witchy weather while playing discordant melodies madly on his beloved piano, but Madeline has come back to collect her brother and Jones learns the rather unfortunate truth that the two eccentric elderly twins share not only the same taste in poets and aesthetics, but also the same saturnine soul. After she enters the less than humble Usher abode, Madeline angrily accuses Roderick of burying her alive, but the two ultimately reconcile by sharing a big quasi-incestuous kiss, lips to skull, and are thereupon united for eternity with the forlorn brother’s necessary death. Naturally, Mr. Jones leaves the house with the sunrise, but it is doubtful whether or not he learned anything about poetry, aside that one cannot fake what is innate, especially when it comes to the perennially disheartened hearts of the Ushers, who lived as gloomily yet paradoxically merrily and poetically as they would die as damned yet dandy demon seeds as living and breathing Jungian anima/animus archetypes. Undoubtedly, director Curtis Harrington did not decide to portray both Roderick and Madeline Usher for no reason as they act as allegorical metaphysical reflections of his own sexually ambiguous and internally cadaverous soul.

A true ‘auteur’ piece summing up the dark, foreboding, and transcendental thread that defines director Curtis Harrington’s entire career as an experimental avant-garde filmmaker turned cult horror master, Usher is certainly a work that will be most appreciated by those already rather familiar with the filmmaker’s oeuvre as the final expression of a man who lived and breathed movies, especially of the absurdly melodramatic campy horror variety. Featuring visual and verbal references to Harrington's favorite artists, including the painting "The Kiss" (1907-08) by Austrian symbolist painter Gustav Klimt and the genius of French proto-surrealist/cubist poet Pierre Reverdy, Usher is also a tribute to the aesthetic ingredients that inspired Curtis Harrington to get up in the morning and become one of the most subtly cultivated cinematic artists of the typically artless and uniquely unrefined horror genre. Indeed, considering the desperate poverty-budget circumstances the film was made under, Usher is truly the last testament of an auteur filmmaker whose dreams were too big and idiosyncratic for the likes of the monetary-inclined culture-distorters of Hollywood, yet whose artistic spirit still managed to prevail in the end with one last work of conspicuously campy and creepy celluloid poetry. Compared to his first film The Fall of the House of Usher (1942), which was recently released for the first time on The Curtis Harrington Short Film Collection DVD/Blu-ray combo put out by Flicker Alley, Usher, like great wine (incidentally, Harrington's favorite choice of drink), is the finespun product of maturity and purity. Thankfully, Curtis Harrington died happy knowing that he was able to create one last film free from the constraints of petty producers, writing in his memoir regarding Usher, "I was thrilled with the results. It was, indeed, the film I had intended to make. Nobody had told me what script to write, what scenes to shoot, or how it should be cut. It was truly an heir to my early films."

USHER

A man who lived when films were actually shot on film as opposed to schlocky and seemingly soulless digital, Harrington also remarked at the conclusion of his memoir regarding the dubious future of film, "Just as the development of sound-on-film technology doomed the silent film as a creative medium, now digitization will doom film itself. It is as if the painter's traditional pigments have been replaced by artificial colors that could never match the qualities that made older paintings great. Films can be reproduced on television, or made with digital technology, but a real film is in the magic of refracted light on a screen, of moving shadows." Ironically, most people interested in seeing Usher, as well as Harrington's other elegant work of horror, will have to settle for digital viewing via DVD/Blu-ray, which is a small price to pay to experience the works of a celluloid spiritual son of Edgar Allan Poe, a protege of avant-garde filmmaker/voodoo priestess Maya Deren (Meshes of the Afternoon, Divine Horsemen: The Living Gods of Haiti) and Roger Corman, a personal friend/collaborator of Kenneth Anger, and one of the oh so very few aesthete-minded filmmakers who ever worked in Hollywood and the horror genre. A celluloid swansong from the soul about twins that share one soul directed by a man with a rather conflicted soul, Usher is, as described by personally by Curtis Harrington via his alter-ego Roderick Usher, the product of a macabre mind that had to admit that "I have been suffering from a certain morbidity of the mind. I'm tormented by images of the conqueror worm devouring flesh... That flesh that once gave so much pleasure."

-Ty E

THE INTRUDER
THE INTRUDER

Roger Corman (1962)

Aside from his part as a producer for the early works of auteur filmmakers like Curtis Harrington, Paul Bartel and Monte Hellman, as well as a couple of the films in his 1960s Edgar Allan Poe cycle like The Masque of the Red Death (1964) starring Vincent Price, exploitation mogul Roger Corman is someone I never really cared for, especially considering that the older I get, the more weary I am of schlockmeisters and solely monetary-motivated exploitation hacks. From blaxploitation to hixploitation to piranha-ploitation and everywhere in between, Corman has attempted to capitalize on virtually every social controversy, scandal, stereotype, fad, and phenomenon that has plagued the United States, so it is only natural that he would try to profit off the race-hate of the Civil Rights era and the military-enforced racial integration of the South, which, at least financially speaking, ultimately backfired on the anti-auteur. Indeed, The Intruder (1962) aka The Stranger aka I Hate Your Guts! aka Shame is notable for being, among other things, the only film Corman ever made that lost money, which is a fact Corman would be keen to bring up anytime he was asked about the film. Indeed, as belated celluloid sleaze addict Bill Landis and his wife Michelle Clifford noted in their book, Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002) regarding the reason for the failure of the film, "...not many theaters in his distribution network wanted to play a film that used the word "nigger" every few seconds. Years later, Corman called THE INTRUDER the only film he regretted making." Despite Corman's vocal regrets regarding the film and casting a then unknown William Shatner as the lead (the director apparently blamed the actor for its failure and Shatner even once joked that the film's re-released title I Hate Your Guts! was aimed at him), the sometimes race-hustler would later describe it as his greatest film, which is pretty convenient considering the current socio-political climate, especially considering the fact that the United States has a mulatto president with his own bargain bin brand of pimp-like race-hustling. Starring semi-Nordic-looking Hebrew William Shatner as a fiendish double-talking white nationalist type with the predictable Germanic surname 'Cramer' (which, ironically, is a surname that Jews oftentimes have) who arrives at a fictional southern town via bus to incite racial hatred against poor innocent and defenseless negroes and prevent them from integrating into a white school, The Intruder is based on the 1959 novel of the same name by speculative fiction novelist and screenwriter Charles Beaumont of The Twilight Zone fame and thus reflects the same sort of sensational fantasy filmmaking, even if the film was shot in a semi-gritty pseudo-Fuller-esque fashion that was utilized to make the viewer feel like they were trapped in the backwards confederate realm of sub-literate racist hick bigots of the ultra-untermensch sort. Notably, Corman made such an ass of himself in the southern town where he shot the film, East Prairie, Missouri, that the chief of police of the area kicked him and his crew out. Indeed, seeing how Corman portrays the place and people of The Intruder, it is no surprise that the chief of police threw him out for being a communist, as the film uses Soviet style agitprop à la Sergei Eisenstein's anti-Kulak abortion Bezhin Meadow (1937) to get its misbegotten message across, albeit minus any sort of nuance or symbolism. Still, despite all of its glaring flaws and insanely manipulated cultural Marxist essence, The Intruder is, aside from some of his Poe adaptations, easily the best film Corman ever dumped out of his mixed-up, miserly money-worshipping mind.

Adam Cramer (William Shatner), a handsome Nordic-looking fellow in black sunglasses, gazes at negroes picking cotton from a bus window while headed to the fictional southern town of Caxton where he will attempt to rile up the already 'negrophobic' white majority against the black minority. Ku Klux Cramer works for a group called the 'Patrick Henry Society' (a name clearly taken from the real-life anti-communist conservative group 'The John Birch Society', which, unlike the group depicted in the film, was not critical of Jews) and has the hypnotic charm as well as all-American good looks to easily talk people into following his anti-colored/anti-kosher cause. Upon checking into a hotel, Cramer learns that the people already hate coons after the elderly front desk attendant complains regarding the bellboy, "I swear, I believe that boy's got nigger blood in him somewhere." Cramer also uses his charm to swoon an underage blonde high school girl named Ella McDaniel (Beverly Lunsford), whose grandfather fears "a great big black flood" and asks his granddaughter regarding the forced integration of ten negroes at her school, "What about you, Ella? What do you think about sitting in a room with a bunch of big buck niggers?" Ella's father Tom (Frank Maxwell) is a reluctant liberal journalist and he immediately has a gut feeling that Cramer is an evil conniver who plans to spread hatred and violence in the town. One of the first things Cramer does upon getting in town is meeting with its richest man, Verne Shipman (Robert Emhardt), who almost instantly provides him with money and a corvette to drive, which he uses to impress stupid teen Ella into letting him screw her after he divulges his plan to enforce segregation in the town. While Shipman at first argues with Cramer's plans to destroy racial integration and reinstate segregation as he thinks his methods are illegal, the intruder argues that integration is anti-democratic, stating, "Is it the collective will of the people that niggers should be able to take over the whole world? Because that's what's going to happen." Of course, it is no time before Cramer gets the lynch mob going, as everyone in the area seems to agree that integration is the "greatest wrong the government has ever perpetrated."

Providing complete validation to Gustave Le Bon's classic text The Crowd: A Study of the Popular Mind (1895), Cramer incites a large crowd to attack a car full of negroes after delivering an impassioned speech where he states, "This so-called 'Advancement of Colored People' is now and always has been nothing but a communist front headed by a Jew who hates America and doesn't make any bones about it either. Well, the commies didn't waste a second. They knew only too well, friends, that the quickest way to cripple a country is to mongrelize it. They poured all the millions of dollars that the Jews could get to them to do one thing: desegregation," and declares he is willing to give his life to make sure his country stays "free, white, and American." Rather strangely, the entire mob pussies out after the negro patriarch, who has a mustache similar to Hitler, gets sassy with them. Of course, things get ugly later when Cramer drives Shipman's corvette through "Nigger Town" (the black area of the town) with robe-adorned KKK goons who eventually burn a cross to scare the spooks. After that, Cramer goes back to his hotel room and seduces the 'reformed nymphomaniac' wife of his new 'friend' Sam Griffin, who is a salesman that is out-of-town. Being a salesman, Sam knows Cramer is a bullshitter and confronts Cramer after his wife Vi leaves him after learning from the front desk clerk at the hotel that they fucked the previous night. Cramer also finds himself in trouble when some of his followers blow up a black church and kill the negro pastor, resulting in his arrest, but his followers protest and bail him out. Exceedingly arrogant, Cramer is proud of his arrest, stating, "Never underestimate the value of a jail sentence. Remember Socrates, Lenin, and Hitler." Meanwhile, proto-liberal do-gooder Tom, who has more or less degenerated into a 'white uncle Tom', coerces a young negro teen named Joey Greene (Charles Barnes) to go back to the white high school despite threat of death. When Cramer's followers see Tom walking negro Joe to the high school, they decide to teach him a lesson by beating him so badly that they break a bunch of his ribs, poke out one of his eyes, and cause him serious internal bleeding that leaves him in critical condition at the hospital. Cramer uses Tom's hospitalization as a means of coercing his daughter Ella into making up a lie about being raped by Joey, as he claims it will help her father. Of course, Ella obliges and a lynch mob comes for Joey, but luckily Sam Griffin, who is still pissed that Cramer screwed his wanton wife, saves the day by getting the teenage girl to admit that she lied about the rape. Needless to say, Cramer is revealed to be a lying sociopathic conman to the townspeople and he tries in vain to discredit Griffin by calling his wife a Jew and nigger-fucker, but it is already too late. Demonstrating he is the 'better man,' Griffin gets Cramer, who looks discernibly defeated, to leave town on the next bus. As for Joey, one can only hope that he produced a grandson (who looks like Trayvon Martin) who got even with those evil white folk by impregnating some poor cracker girl, thus completely destroying her bloodline for all of eternity.

THE INTRUDER

Featuring real-life poor grizzled white trash scum and tobacco-spitting porch monkeys as extras, not to mention ominous cross-burnings and bloodthirsty cracker lynch mobs, The Intruder most certainly demonstrates that would-be-auteur Roger Corman really went out of his way to incite racial hatred and controversy while attempting to peddle it off as 'progressive' social realist art. Of course, anyone with half a brain can tell while watching the film that Corman is just about as sincere in his negro-championing as villain Adam Cramer. In the 2007 featurette Remembering The Intruder, Corman would state regarding the film: "I took great creative pleasure in making that film. I was disappointed that it didn't do well commercially but it almost got its money back and I thought, 'Well, I lost a little bit of money but I made a film that was important to me.'" In the same featurette, William Shatner remarked regarding Corman and The Intruder, "He brags about how this is the only film of his that ever lost money... and I think, really, that he deliberately lost money on it, so that he could brag about at least one of his pictures not making money." Even in Alex Stapleton's documentary Corman's World: Exploits of a Hollywood Rebel (2011)—a superlatively sappy and sentimental love letter to the schlockmeister—Corman cries about the failure of the film, while also pretending he is some sort of morally righteous artistic martyr, melodramatically stating in a revoltingly phony fashion: "The picture was a wonderful commercial failure. I started to say a wonderful critical success but I got confused but I'll leave the confusion there because it's all wound up in my mind. It sort of gets me in the stomach when I talk about it." In the same documentary, Corman's brother Gene Corman, who co-produced the film, declares regarding The Intruder, "This is the only film that I don't think we ever made money on yet it was our best film. We were ahead of the time." Rather absurdly, in the same documentary, Corman more or less credits the film for turning him into an 'artiste' and more serious filmmaker, declaring that the work made him "rethink" his "method of making pictures" by learning the "method acting technique" and then proceeds to talk about "text and subtext" like a pedantic community college professor who has never even seen a F.W. Murnau or Ingmar Bergman flick.

With all the recent senseless and animalistic destruction, opportunistic theft and looting, and savage violence committed by hordes of mindless angry self-entitled negroes as a result of a white cop being cleared of killing a violent negro thug from Ferguson, Missouri whose equally degenerate parents have done their damndest to profit off their son's death thus demonstrating that integration is an abject failure, The Intruder seems all the more like a patently absurd and sociopathic manipulative joke. Notably, Corman would even note the failure of multiculturalism and black-and-white race relations in the featurette Remembering The Intruder where he states, "this problem is still with us. It's been partially solved, but it hasn't been completely solved and it will not be completely solved for a long time." Of course, the problem will never be solved, unless you're one of the Hollywood lobotomized automatons who hope to see a future where everyone has a light feces-colored complexion. In The Intruder, every white character, including the protagonist's daughter who presumably sleeps with the 'fascist' villain Cramer on their first date and lies about a poor innocent righteous negro raping her, is portrayed as either moronically evil or terribly flawed to the point of easily succumbing to evil, while the single black character is portrayed as an innocent lamb that just wants to live a simple life in a rotten world plagued with cracker brand racism. Corman also attempts to portray antagonist Cramer's remark that integration was a Jewish plot as patently absurd, but it is an indisputable fact that the NAACP was co-founded by Israelite Henry Moskowitz and that Jew groups like The American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, and the Anti-Defamation League were all central in fighting anti-negro prejudice, and that black groups like the NAACP, the Urban League, the Congress of Racial Equality, and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee received the greatest funding from Hebrews, not to mention the fact that about 50% of the civil rights attorneys in the South during the 1960s were Jews, as were over 50% of the 'Whites' who went to Mississippi in 1964 to eradicate the Jim Crow Laws. Of course, as Malcolm X revealed, Jews, who owned the majority of liquor stores in black neighborhoods, were not doing this out of the kindness of their hearts, but to weaken the white Christian majority and gain the power they wield today. Unsurprisingly, Corman is himself half Hebrew (his paternal grandparents Jacob Corman and Bessie Arst were Russian Jewish immigrants), thus his personal motivations for making The Intruder are obvious. While Corman is oftentimes credited as a 'rebel' who subverted Hollywood, it could not be further from the truth, with The Intruder being one of the most conformist works he ever made, as a work that spreads the very sort of message that the culture-distorters in Tinseltown are all about, albeit having been done in a less sophisticated fashion that was made to appeal to the very people it denigrates. In that sense, Corman may be cinema history's most brazen and shameless yet successful carny huckster, as a sort of west coast Lloyd Kaufman, albeit minus the wit, charisma, and eccentricity.

THE INTRUDER

-Ty E

THE BRUTES

Roger Fritz (1970)

Like with comedies, Germany has never been a big exporter of gritty and ultra-masculine exploitation films, especially the sort someone like spastic fanboy Quentin Tarantino rambles on about, yet one Teutonic actor/auteur, Roger Fritz (Mädchen, Mädchen aka Girls, Girls, Häschen in der Grube aka Rabbit in the Pit) made a couple superlatively sleazy yet shockingly artful quasi-exploitation flicks that certainly deserve attention, with his work Mädchen... nur mit Gewalt (1970) aka Cry Rape aka The Brutes aka Love by Rape being arguably his greatest film. Beginning as a photojournalist who snapped photos for mainstream magazines like Stern and Vogue Paris, Fritz assisted Luchino Visconti with the direction of his segment of the Italian film anthology Boccaccio '70 (1962) and The Leopard (1963) while living in Rome and began acting and making short films in the early 1960s, including his first short Verstummete Stimmen (1961), which won him a German Film Award, as well as a short about the building of the Berlin Wall entitled Zimmer im Grünen (1962), which earned him the official certificate 'Besonders wertvoll' (meaning 'Particularly Valuable', which German auteur Hellmuth Costard mocked by making a quasi-pornographic avant-garde short of the same name in 1968) which is only awarded to German works of extraordinary artistic value. By the late-1960s, Fritz luckily opted to stop appealing to the vogue politics and aesthetics of that zeitgeist and began making violent and sexually nihilistic works, with his first feature Mädchen, Mädchen (1967) aka Girls, Girls, which was co-written by anti-arthouse auteur Eckhart Schmidt (Der Fan aka Trance, Loft) being a success and winning the director's soon-to-be wife Helga Anders (The White Horses TV series, Derrick TV series) the German Film Award for 'Best Performance by a Young Actress.' Although Fritz would go on to star in films directed by Fassbinder like Despair (1978), Lili Marleen (1981), and Querelle (1982), he was a member of the lesser known German film movement 'Neue Münchner Gruppe' aka 'New Munich Group,' which also included his comrade Eckhart Schmidt, Klaus Lemke, and Rudolf Thome. Like Roland Klick (Deadlock, Supermarkt), Fritz would sow hatred and disdain in the dogooder leftist critics with his rape-without-revenge-themed artsploitation flick The Brutes (I use the alternate American title of Mädchen... nur mit Gewalt for sake of convenience in this review), yet the film has a visceral elegance and unadulterated form of nihilistic violence that is surely rarer today in cinema than when the film was released over four decades ago. Described in Variety as follows, "It's the cruelest, most ruthless, inclement, and carnal-manic story to transpire from a German film for a long time. Told with cold, almost clinical detachment, devoid of any "moral message," it still manages to draw a few drops of humanity from a flood of barbarous inhumanity," The Brutes has a sort of fiercely foreboding essence that is hidden deeply in the post-WWII German collective unconscious that films of German New Cinema mostly simply chose to ignore. The twisted Teutonic tale of two friends in their 30s and an underage girl that one of the two men chooses to rape while the other simply prefers psychological torture, The Brutes is a piece of pernicious celluloid poetry featuring Fassbinder actors and a score by Irmin Schmidt of the pioneering krautrock group Can that reminds viewers that not all Germans filmmakers of the 1970s were art fags and neo-bolshevik/feminist provocateurs.

THE BRUTES

Mike (Arthur Brauss, who played the killer eponymous lead of Wim Wenders' most brutal film, The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick) and Werner aka 'Warren' (played by Klaus Löwitsch, who played the James Bond-like lead in Welt am Draht aka World on a Wire, among countless other Fassbinder flicks) are best friends who get a kick out of sexually harassing women, including married ones whose husbands are at work. Undoubtedly, Mike is the alpha of the two friends due to having a far greater intellectual prowess and he has no problem berating Werner, who has a hard time picking up chicks on his own in front of other people. In fact, it seems neither friend can 'rise to the occasion' without the other buddy egging him on, as if they are more aroused by the hyper-masculine camaraderie of it all than getting in between a hot chick's legs. One day, the two friends go go-karting and Werner ends up getting in a little crash with a super suave prick named Jerry (played by Rolf Zacher, who, aside from once being married to Gisela Getty, was a member of the krautrock group Amon Düül II during the early 1970s), who just happens to have four beautiful babes with him. In the end, Warren and Jerry let bygones be bygones and everyone goes to cool down at a bar. Ultimately, it is decided that everyone will go and have a bonfire party at a remote construction site on the outskirts of town, with an underage teen named Alice (Helga Anders) deciding to hitch a ride with the two strange friends. Of course, for whatever reason, Alice's friends never show up and Werner gets it in his mind that he wants to rape her after seeing her skinny-dipping, stating rather bestially to his man Mike, "Aww man, is that a great little body. Man, I'm horny." Mike teases Werner's lack of talent when it comes to the ladies and has no problem stating to Alice, "My dear Alice...Excuse my frankness but would you allow me to bang you tonight?," but she playfully rebuffs his request. Being a virtual child with a grown woman's body, Alice is only interested in playing hide-and-go-seek and the two friends humor her, but Werner has ulterior motives of the sexually savage sort, which Mike encourages. When Alice goes hiding, Mike instigates Werner into raping her, stating, "There she is, get her. Take her. Run, it's your last chance." Needless to say, Werner rapes Alice and Mike gets himself off by driving around in his car and flashing his headlights on the two literally down-and-dirty non-lovers. While Werner sexually pillages Alice, she attempts to fight by slapping her rapist in the face, but that only arouses him all the more, as he smiles at his victim with a sort of unsavory and sadistic glee.

Of course, everything changes in The Brutes after the rape. The next day, Werner seems to be genuinely sorry for what he has done and Alice threatens to tell her father and cops about the incident. In his patently childish defense, Werner yells to Alice, "First you drive a guy crazy and then you start to bawl. You were begging for it, you bitch." From there, Mike begins to play mind-games with Alice, telling her he will personally drive her to the police station and help her file charges. Of course, his ultimate goal is to scare Alice from actually going to the police, as he goes into the humiliating detail about how her naughty bits would be examined by a police doctor for 'vaginal trauma,' how she will have to describe the size of Werner's 'SO' (sex organ), and how she will have to explain to the courts why she decided to get in a car with two strangers in the first place. Needless to say, Mike psyches Alice out and she rethinks about going to the police. Rather bizarrely, Werner begins getting rather infuriated by Mike's emotional cruelty as if he is defending his girlfriend from a random brute, so he throws his bud into a manmade pond. From there, a full-on brawl breaks out and Werner nearly drowns Mike, but Alice ironically convinces him to save his friend from a very certain death. While Mike is unconscious, Werner attempts to rape Alice again after she reluctantly allows him to kiss her, but does a rather pathetic job as it is quite clear he is ashamed of himself. After regaining consciousness and hiding out for a bit, Mike manages to catch Werner at knifepoint and binds his legs and arms, ultimately threatening to castrate him (it seems pedantic intellectual Mike is jealous of Werner's animalistic sexual stamina). Instead, Mike merely stabs Werner in the leg and gives the knife to Alice to cut him loose. In the end, police arrive via helicopter and Alice neglects to mention she was raped, even though the police give her multiple opportunities to do such. In the last scene, the Teutonic threesome drives away together, with Alice now ironically seeming like the most domineering of the trio in the end, thus demonstrating the hermetic power of the feminine touch and the ability of sensitive women to tame rough and tough men of the rapist sort.

Although it is mere speculation on my part, it seems that The Brutes stars Klaus Löwitsch and Arthur Brauss and director Roger Fritz must have had great chemistry with one another as all three of them would go on to star in Sam Peckinpah's Cross of Iron (1977) together. While Löwitsch played one of the more major characters as a soap-hating and knife-loving super soldier Corporal Krüger, Fritz would play a closeted homosexual soldier named Lieutenant Triebig, and Brauss played a SS man named 'Zoll' who has his pecker bitten off by a hungry Bolshevik bitch. Undoubtedly, The Brutes has the some sort of venomously visceral and untamed masculinity, which is unfortunately quite rare in post-WWII German cinema, especially from the young German filmmakers of the early 1970s. Indeed, like Roland Klick's Deadlock (1970), Rainer Erler's Fleisch (1979) aka Spare Parts, and Eckhart Schmidt's Alpha City (1985), Fritz's The Brutes managed to offer some good old martial masculinity in German cinema that was all but castrated by the nation's defeat during the Second World War. While Fritz's feature filmmaking career basically ended after The Brutes and he would only go on to direct TV movies and TV series (though he did direct one more feature, Frankfurt: The Face of a City (1981) aka Frankfurt Kaiserstraße), he would continue acting, with his last role being in Ulli Lommel's major mess Daniel der Zauberer (2004). Currently, Fritz still works as a photographer and did the still photography for Fassbinder's swansong Querelle (1982), about which he also published a book. Despite its hyper-masculinity, there also seems to be a homoerotic subtext to The Brutes that is in a similar vein to Querelle. Of course, it is homoeroticism in the Ernst Röhm sense and not the queenish Werner Schroeter sense. Featuring none of the silly sort of outlandish and cartoonish histrionic overacting that plagues many Italian exploitation films of a similar ilk, The Brutes is a Teutonic psychosexual-thriller with testicular fortitude that makes one wish that there were more Roger Fritzes and Roland Klicks in Deutschland than Margarethe von Trotta and Jean-Marie Straubs, as Tarantino's films would certainly benefit from Aryanism and less Guidoism. Indeed, had Tarantino discovered the films of the New Munich Group, he might have been less prone to racial, cultural, and sexual cuckoldry, but maybe I am just being a tad bit too optimistic. Either way, Roger Fritz's The Brutes is indisputable proof that cinematic rape and violence can be tasteful and even artistically merited if put into the right man's hands.

THE BRUTES

-Ty E

BLOOD AND ROSES

Roger Vadim (1960)

While Bram Stoker's Dracula (1897) is certainly the most famous gothic horror vampire novel ever cinematically adapted as indicated by important cinematic works ranging from F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922) to Tod Browning's Dracula (1931) to Francis Ford Coppola's somewhat uneven Bram Stoker's Dracula (1992), fellow Irishman Sheridan Le Fanu's novella Carmilla (1872) has arguably been responsible for inspiring the most ideally idiosyncratic and erotically-charged of bloodsucker flicks. Indeed, Carl Theodor Dreyer's semi-sound masterpiece Vampyr (1932), Roger Vadim's Et mourir de plaisir (1960) aka Blood and Roses aka Carmilla aka To Die with Pleasure, British auteur Roy Ward Baker's Hammer flick The Vampire Lovers (1970), and Spanish auteur Vicente Aranda's The Blood Spattered Bride (1972) aka La Novia Ensangrentada are all wildly divergent and mostly rather memorable vampire flicks that all happen to be based on the same somewhat ambiguously lesbianic Le Fanu novella. While I personally like all of these films aside from the uniquely idiotic The Vampire Lovers starring Hebraic hoe Ingrid Pitt (undoubtedly, Madeline Smith is much sexier), I have recently become completely obsessed with the imagery of Blood and Roses and I say that as someone that has a generally low opinion of Monsieur Vadim and his rather curious cunt-crazed sub-pornographic approach to filmmaking. In short, I have to concur with the book Rough Guide to Film: An A-Z of Directors and Their Movies (2007) where it says, "After the publication of his autobiography, BARDOT, DENEUVE, and FONDA: MY LIFE WITH THREE OF THE MOST BEAUTIFUL WOMEN IN THE WORLD, Roger Vadim had the gall to complain that his work had been overshadowed by his lovers, and that people had forgotten what a good director he was." As the title of his (second!) autobiography demonstrates, Vadim was indubitably a shameless man (and probably some effete sort of narcissist) that put pussy on a pedestal and cared more about premium grade poontang than creating real quality cinema, though he somehow had some minor talent. As the title of the autobiography also demonstrates, Vadim seems to have nil respect for his second and least known wife Annette Strøyberg—a Danish dame that eventually banged such famous leading man as Vittorio Gassman, Alain Delon, Omar Sharif and Warren Beatty, among others international screen studs—yet she starred in two of his most notable films, including Les Liaisons dangereuses (1959) aka Dangerous Liaisons and of course Blood and Roses.

For those that ever wondered where vexatious French novelist turn cinematic auteur Alain Robbe-Grillet (Trans-Europ-Express, L'Eden et après aka Eden and After) borrowed his entire somnambulist-babes-covered-in-blood aesthetic from, look no further than Vadim's addictively lusciously kaleidoscopic, strangely somberly sensual, and overall gorgeous gothic horror melodrama where covert Sapphic supernatural obsession manages to effortlessly overshadow overt heterosexual incest despite the film's complete and utter lack of overt carpet-munching action. Indeed, forget the classic bean-flicker bloodsucker flicks of Jean Rollin, Jess Franco, and José Ramón Larraz, Blood and Roses is the film that started it all and female vampire Fantastique par excellence. As someone that has never had a particularly big hard-on for the whole lesbo vamp Euro-sleaze routine due to the innate phoniness and insipidity of it all, Vadim's film reminded me that the first is oftentimes the best. Unfortunately, it seems that the film's influence is greater than its overall popularity as a cinematic work that more or less sired an entire horror subgenre yet is not nearly as well known as many of the (largely shitty) films associated with said subgenre. Aside from showing Mario Bava the way and acting as a virtual template for Jean Rollin's entire oeuvre, Blood and Roses was such a big influence of Japanese auteur Nobuhiko Obayashi of Hausu (1977) aka House fame that the auteur's avant-garde short Emotion (1966)—a surprisingly aesthetically pleasing experiment in cinematic wizardry that somehow manages to be just as goofy as it is romantic—begins with a dedication to Vadim's film. Considering that his film Lisa and the Devil (1974) features a death scene that is an obvious homage to the lead vampire Carmilla's death in Blood and Roses, one could even argue that goombah gothic horror maestro Bava virtually owes his entire aesthetic to Vadim's vamp flick. Interestingly but not all that surprisingly considering his track record as a filmmaker that seemed to be most focused on putting his lover(s) on a pedestal, it seems that Vadim himself never intended or expected the film to be anything special, thus underscoring his overall lack of agency as a filmmaker.

BLOOD AND ROSES

While it does not all that surprise me that Vadim was so obsessed with premium grade golden pussy that he was willing to risk his then-budding career for it, it does somewhat surprise me that he seems to have saw Blood and Roses as a sort of worthless gift that he gave to his wife in an ultimately failed attempt to jumpstart her acting career, or as the filmmaker explained himself in Bardot Deneuve Fonda: My Life with the Three Most Beautiful Women in the World (1986) in regard to the quite dubious background of the film, "For Annette's next film, I came up with the idea of having her play a female vampire. In a role of this type her beauty would conceal her lack of experience. I should have gone to an analyst to find out why I was sacrificing my career to fulfill the desires of a Danish beauty that had suddenly imagined she was an actress. After the success of LES LIAISONS DANGEREUSES, I received many offers and could have directed a major international production. But I didn't see an analyst, and in the beginning of 1960, in Rome, I began shooting BLOOD AND ROSES with Annette Vadim, Elsa Martinelli and Mel Ferrer. It was a strange work, a little ahead of its time, but nevertheless well received by some because of its esthetic qualities." Somewhat ironically, Annette Strøyberg—a cutesy blonde that could be mistaken by some as Brigitte Bardot's somewhat moodier doppelgänger—is undoubtedly one of the greatest aspects of the film, as she bleeds lovesick pathos and a certain distinctly feminine melancholy (also, one cannot blame her for wanting her cuckolded hubby to make her a star as the filmmaker previously did just that with Bardot in his once-scandalous And God Created Woman (1956)). While Vadim somewhat admirably confessed that the film was just something that he put together to appease a woman that did not seem much more to him than a poor man's Bardot, it is unequivocally a revolutionary horror film for a number of reasons, not least of all because of its virtual elevation of perennial horror clichés to something strangely artistic. Indeed, aside from creating a sub-genre that would influence everyone from Rollin to the mostly artistically bankrupt Brits of Hammer horror, Vadim's rather romantic celluloid orgasm also predates George A. Romero's Martin (1978) in terms of presenting vampirism as a morbid psychological delusion brought about by some hereditary genetic taint. Luckily, unlike Martin, there is some ambiguity as to whether or not the lead vampire's genetic problems are supernatural or simply psychological. Personally, I think the fact that Blood and Roses is a horror film is of little consequence, at least as far as its positive attributes are concerned. In fact, I have to assume that it would appeal more to fans of Cocteau and Robbe-Grillet than Romero, Carpenter, and Craven fanboys, but I digress.

While Vadim seems to have been rampantly heterosexual to almost a fault, he surely owes some of his greatest gifts to the crucial aesthetic influence of a fellow frog of the proudly cocksucking sort. Indeed, while poet and cine-magician Jean Cocteau might not have ever personally directed a horror flick, Blood and Roses is surely the second best thing as a cinematic work that manages to parrot the pleasantly primitive practical special effects from classic cinematic works like Le sang d'un poète (1930) aka The Blood of a Poet, Orphée (1950) aka Orpheus, and La Belle et la Bête (1946) aka Beauty and the Beast without seeming too ridiculous or shamelessly plagiaristic. Additionally, not unlike Orpheus, Vadim's film features a seemingly seamless mix of ancient European myth and aesthetics with the modern. Simultaneously orgasmically oneiric and lugubriously phantasmagoric, the film straddles a strangely healthy line between wholesome pre-porn exploitation and surrealist pop art, as if Vadim wanted to prove that he could sire the most tastefully trashy film ever made (in fact, I would argue that his greatest attribute as a filmmaker was his special knack for injecting the artless with art and bringing class to the classless). Of course, it pretty much goes without saying that, like any decent Vadim flick, the auteur is completely infatuated by the female lead as if he wanted to prove to the world (and, curiously, to himself) how ravishing and mysterious his wife is. Quite unlike the erotically ebullient Bardot in And God Created Woman, Strøberg has a sort of painfully tragic and morosely mercurial essence that is slowly but surely unleashed on the viewer so when the film reaches its climax it is only natural that she succumbs to a heartbreakingly brutal yet fittingly absurd demise. Despite her lack of experience, Strøyberg seems like she was born to play a virtual human statue in an Ingmar Bergman or Werner Schroeter flick, as she is a painfully pulchritudinous diva that reveals with a mere slight glance much more than words ever could, hence Vadim's seemingly absurd faith in her as an actress despite her lack of experience. While Mel Ferrer is technically the lead, his scenes seem like frivolous filler anytime that Strøyberg exits the screen as she is virtually the entire soul and libido of the film. As for Elsa Martinelli, she seems like a self-conscious little girl when compared to the wantonly wounded womanhood and eerie grace of Strøyberg. While it might sound like puffery, I prefer Strøyberg's performance to that of those given by Bardot, Deneuve, and Fonda in Vadim's much more popular films. Of course, poor little rich girl Fonda would have probably made an even worse vampire than she did as a pinko commie revolutionary. On the other hand, it would be hard to imagine Strøyberg playing the lead in And God Created Woman or Barbarella (1968) as she does not seem like she could be moronically bubbly enough.

BLOOD AND ROSES

Say what you will about the film's weak storyline or glaring lack of character development, but Blood and Roses is a hopelessly hypnotically beautiful film, which is largely the result of Vadim's cinematographer Claude Renoir (as his name hints, he is related to French master auteur Jean Renoir, as his actor father is the nephew of the filmmaker). While it could be argued that the film is an exercise in high-camp kitsch, I sincerely doubt that Vadim was operating with the same mindset as a Werner Schroeter or Daniel Schmid. Indeed, Vadim might have put a premium on cinematic pulchritude, especially where statuesque Aryan women are concerned, but he was working from a strictly (and, some would say, hopelessly) heterosexual perspective. Apparently, the film, or at least its female lead, was even beautiful enough to catch the fancy of alpha-surrealist Salvador Dalí. As Vadim explained in Bardot Deneuve Fonda, "On September 28, BLOOD AND ROSES was shown in Paris. After the rather well-received screening, the guests were invited to a party at Maxim's. It was an unusually brilliant evening. The cream of Paris thought that having supper with a female vampire was great fun. 'I loved your cannibal with such pink skin,' said Salvador Dalí." Of course, the film is practically driven by pinks and especially reds; whether it be a red rose fading to a light pink after being touched by a vamp or a vamp bleeding deep carnal red via her supple bare breasts. As the film's English title certainly hints, certain vital fluids have an erotic energy that transcends semen and natural vaginal lube. As for flowers, they are a symbol of purity and virginity, hence why the vampiress is able to drain a rose of its red with her mere touch.

Somewhat abruptly and unexpectedly the film begins (and ultimately ends) on an airplane destined for Rome with a somewhat unreliable narrator named Dr. Verari (René-Jean Chauffard) as he explains to some similarly insufferably swarthy colleagues the curious tale of a bizarre love triangle of the incestuous

bloodsucking (and covertly bisexual) sort. Indeed, as the good doctor explains, a tall, dark, and vaguely handsome 'Italian' aristocrat named Leopoldo De Karnstein (Mel Ferrer) severely suffered from a complicated situation with his fiancée Georgia Monteverdi (Elsa Martinelli) and Austrian cousin Carmilla (Annette Strøyberg). While his fiancée clearly loves him and looks forward to marrying him, it is clear that Carmilla—a highly sensitive little lady of the somewhat anti-social and aggressive sort—loves him to an even more unsettling degree, as she seems to believe they are soul mates. Although less obvious, Carmilla also seems to have strong sexual feelings for Georgia, though one gets the impression that her sexual interest in her is largely because she loves her cousin and thus desires to sexually dominate the woman that has taken away the man that she so deeply loves. As Dr. Verari describes in regard to the darkly romantic atmosphere of the story, it is "...the most secluded parts of the Roman countryside. It's a place that inspires daydreaming. And melancholy, as well." A bad blonde bitch and proto-goth gal with an affinity for the dark and morbid yet has the rather misleading fair golden complexion of an angel, Carmilla is quite proud of the fact that she is supposedly descended from an accursed bloodline of vampires that, aside from the exception of a gorgeous girl named Millarca, were eventually ruthlessly exterminated with extreme prejudice by local townsfolk. As Carmilla brags in regard to her ancient undead ancestor, who bears a striking resemblance to her as revealed by an old painting, "She was called Millarca. She was a Karnstein from the heyday. She passionately loved her cousin Ludwig von Karnstein. She died before the wedding in Ludwig's arms, who swore her an everlasting love." Dedicated to his deceased cousin, Ludwig built Millarca a special secret hidden tomb in the family abbey, hence why she was the sole member to survive the family vampire massacre. Needless to say, Carmilla sees herself as Millarca and Leopoldo as Ludwig. Rather unfortunately for Carmilla, Leopoldo does not love her nearly as much as Ludwig loved Millarca.

I might be an antisocial sadist of sorts, but I found myself completely and gleefully rooting for Carmilla, even after she 'transforms' into a vampire and begins killing hot young maid girls. While Leopoldo boasts in regard to his family, "We've ceased being vampires since 1775," Carmilla—the only surviving member of the Austrian branch of the family—does indeed adopt a vampiric form of sorts after a big fireworks show that accidentally results in the Karnstein family crypt being opened, thus leading to the anti-heroine wandering in and being possessed by her ancient vampire relative Millarca; or so it seems, at least for most of the film. Indeed, somewhat unfortunately, the film pulls a 'gotcha' towards the end where the dubious narrator Dr. Verari explains to Leopoldo that Carmilla has degenerated into a literally bloodthirsty schizophrenic as a result of her soul-crushing lovesickness for her cousin. When Leopoldo complains in regard to his cousin's deadly love, "I thought she understood. That we can't always live like daydreaming children," the doc explains, "She never stopped dreaming. She didn't want to suffer. So she escaped from herself by neurosis. Traumatism, neurosis, split personality . . . The defeated Carmilla became the uncompromising Millarca; the one who hurt people. When she killed Lisa, she didn't only obey the legend. She also identified herself to the woman you love." Somewhat ironically (or not so considering the film leaves some slight ambiguity as to whether or not she is actually a vamp), Carmilla is killed in a freak accident via a stake to the heart after dynamite is quite conveniently and somewhat symbolically used to destroy the Karnstein family crypt. In the end, the film comes full-circle, albeit with the newly wed Leopoldo and Georgia flying together instead of Dr. Verari and his pals. In a twist, it is revealed that Millarca may or may not have also come to possess Georgia's body.

BLOOD AND ROSES

Rather unfortunately, Blood and Roses has never been released on DVD aside from in Germany in 2014 and this French/German language kraut suffers from an infuriating lack of cool dream scenes that are included in the unfortunately low-quality dubbed EP-speed VHS that was released in the United States by Paramount a very long time ago. Indeed, for example, an iconic scene where Carmilla's shirt becomes magically soaked in blood is inexplicably cut short in the German DVD version, as if kraut audiences could only handle so much blood. Additionally, shots of faded rose petals, which have lost their color due to being touched by a vamp, have been completely excised from the DVD. In fact, I would argue that the American VHS contains an all-around superior cut of the film as the unintentionally goofy character of Dr. Verari is only of minor importance and instead Millarca, who provides the film with its elegantly ominous tone, rather fittingly does both the opening and closing narration. For those that prefer pure literal horror to preposterous psychobabble, the American dubbed VHS is also superior as it confirms that the vampiress Millarca has indeed possessed the female characters. Considering they have already released Vadim's inferior (but unquestionably more popular) film And God Created Woman, one can only pray that the Criterion Collection will spare Blood and Roses from the celluloid dustbin of history and release a nice complete print of the film on Blu-ray, but I am probably being way too optimistic (realistically, I would not be surprised if Kino Lorber eventually released the film as they have already released a couple Vadim films, including the proto-Nazisploitation flick Le vice et la vertu (1963) aka Vice and Virtue, Arthur Schnitzler adaptation La Ronde (1964) aka Circle of Love, and ultra-lame caper The Hot Touch (1981)).

Notably, Vadim actually intended to direct another vampire flick starring his ex-girlfriend Catherine Deneuve, but it was never made because the director put it on hold to direct the somewhat uneven Jeux de Nuit (1980) aka Night Games and for whatever reason never got around to getting back to it (of course, Deneuve would ultimately star in Tony Scott's gorgeous goth chic debut feature The Hunger (1983) starring David Bowie)). As for horror cinema in general, Vadim's only other contribution to the genre was his somewhat lackluster segment from the Edgar Allan Poe omnibus Histoires extraordinaires (1968) aka Spirits of the Dead also co-directed by Louis Malle and Federico Fellini (undoubtedly, Fellini's masterful concluding segment 'Toby Dammit' makes the rest of the film seem pointless by comparison). Always a sort of whore for publicity, Vadim also managed to attach his name to the horror genre by allowing publishers to use his celebrity for the short story collection Roger Vadim présente : Histoires de vampires (1961), which was a French translation of the Italian vampire story collection I Vampiri tra Noi (the same exact collection, which features Le Fanu's Carmilla, was later published in Britain in 1965 by Pan Books under the outstandingly generic name The Vampire). Of course, considering that Vadim was not much of a filmmaker in general, one must give him credit for managing to virtually sire an entire horror sub-genre with a single stand-alone film, but one must also at least partially credit the heroine Annette Strøyberg for the film's potency, as she not only brings a certain sensual melancholy to the experience, but also apparently inspired real-life dread and horror in the auteur, or as Vadim pathetically recounted in Memoirs of the Devil (1976), "Annette had a special knack for disappearing at the most inappropriate moments. She began with a master stroke. I had made ET MOURIR DE PLAISIR for her. It was her own film in a way, her first big part. The producers had organized a gala evening at Maxim's for the premiere. Annette was the star of the evening and seemed happy, surrounded by friends and the press, who had liked the film. Before the champagne sherbet, she got up and left the table. I thought she had left for a couple of minutes, but she did not return. The cloakroom lady told me she had taken her coat. The vampire had vanished into thin air, leaving no message. She had answered her lover's call. I could understand that she lacked the courage to tell me, but not even to stay for the end of the evening, which was my gift to her and for which I had worked so hard—that was graceless of her. Since I don't enjoy drinking when I'm really depressed, I did not have the consolation of drowning my sorrows in liquor." In short, Vadim demonstrates that a filmmaker that puts pussy on a pedestal and dedicates his entire career to glorifying the beauty of his wives is not a man at all, but a cowardly cuck, hence why all of these beauties eventually left him. Of course, one could argue that it takes a true cuck to shamelessly cinematically expose his wife's finer traits to the entire world. Naturally, when one thinks of Vadim, it is hard to think of any other signature auteur qualities aside from his virtual filmic wife-swapping (after all, even Godard eventually learned his lesson in that regard).

Needless to say, I am not the only person that has a low opinion of Vadim's flagrant womanizing and groveling for cunt. Indeed, in the featurette Reflections of Darkness: Del Valle on Kümel, Flemish auteur Harry Kümel—director of the rather resplendent lesbo vampire flick Daughters of Darkness (1971) aka Les lèvres rouges, which was clearly aesthetically influenced by Blood and Roses—states of Vadim and his vampire flick, "It's not as sloppy as ET DIEU... CRÉA

BLOOD AND ROSES

LA FEMME or all the other, harder [films]. He's a sloppy filmmaker. He was not truly a filmmaker, Vadim. He was a womanizer. You can be both, but still, I think his main interest—his main interest in life—was women." In fact, it seems that Kümel believes that Blood and Roses was mainly good due to the cinematographer, or as he explained, "It's a film which I like, but I thought Roger Vadim was always a bit sloppy [...] And Claude Renoir did a lot in that movie. Naturally, if you have a cameraman of the caliber of Claude Renoir—Claude Renoir was one of the—Well, the French had such sensational cameramen. Alekan, who did the wonderful film by Cocteau LA BELLE ET LA BÊTE. Henri Alekan, a wonderful cameraman. The French had a sensational cinema which has been completely destroyed by the nouvelle vague, you know that. It's a complete disaster for Europe, in fact." Undoubtedly, had Vadim not been a somewhat older filmmaker and thus familiar with French cinema's classic 'Tradition of Quality,' Blood and Roses might not have been nearly as aesthetically orgasmic. In terms of frog vampire flicks from around the same era, the underrated black-and-white short Fantasmagorie (1964) directed by Patrice Moliard and starring Edith Scob of Eyes Without a Face (1960) fame seems like what might happen if a nihilistic member of the La Nouvelle Vague attempted to assemble an avant-garde gothic vampire flick that was completely extinguished of the warm blood red erotic vitality and Cocteau-eque pop surrealism that epitomizes Vadim's film. Either way, Blood and Roses seem rather radical in terms of form and atmosphere when compared to The Vampire Lovers, which is based on the same exact Le Fanu novella. As far as I am concerned, the only true spiritual sequel to Vadim's film is Joël Séria's Mais ne nous délivrez pas du mal (1971) aka Don't Deliver Us from Evil—a pleasantly pernicious piece of Baudelairian pastoral folk horror—as a cinematic the celebrates the very same sort of Sapphic evil that the other film less than sincerely attempts to condemn. In short, Séria's film is the sort of cinematic work Vadim might have directed had he been more intelligent and iconoclastic and less focused on whoring out his wife (of course, auteur Séria did whore out his wife Jeanne Goupil for that film and a number of others, but he did it with more artistic integrity). Although not a literal vampire flick, the Teutonic Heimat horror piece Nachtschatten (1972) aka Nightshade directed by Niklaus Schilling is like a morbidly nihilistic yet no less romantic response to Vadim's film where the filmmaker's wife Elke Haltaufderheide—a virtual Annette Strøyberg doppelganger—portrays a sort of metaphysical vampire of sorts that has a talent for effortlessly sapping a man of his energy, though she ultimately rightly succumbs to her own guilt-ridden spiritual sickness. With its blood red roses, hauntingly beautiful rural setting, gothic essence, and lethally lovesick blonde anti-heroine, Nightshade unquestionably owes a heavy aesthetic debt to Blood and Roses.

Undoubtedly, one can understand the film's anti-heroine's romantic plight when considers Arthur Schopenhauer's wise words, "Belief is like love: it cannot be compelled; and as any attempt to compel love produces hate, so it is the attempt to compel belief which first produces real unbelief." Out of her hopelessly impossible love for the male protagonist, Carmilla learns to both hate and embrace a virtual ancestral religion of blood, which is ultimately rather noble in its perversity, hence the poetically tragic nature of the heroine. Indeed, while Carmilla's unwavering dedication to love is decidedly deadly, it also makes her a strangely admirable and sympathetic figure who seems like a lovely angelic creature compared to her all-too-bourgeois family members (to Carmilla's credit, she has seemingly nil interest in money as it is also revealed that she is much richer than her beloved guido cousin). Indeed, when I think of Carmilla, I am reminded of National Socialist Expressionist poet Gottfried Benn's words, "Know this: I live beast days. I am a water hour. At night my eyelids droop like forest and sky. My love knows few words: I like it in your blood." Not unlike the eponymous lily-licking bloodsucker of the David Lynch produced Nadja (1994) directed by Michael Almereyda, Carmilla is a rare example female vampire that can compete with the great male vampires of cinema history in terms of memorability and tragic intrigue. Of course, it was ultimately Monsieur Vadim that was the real victim of the nubile female nosferatu and for that alone, if nothing else, he deserves at least a modicum of reluctant respect for his sacrifice as both an emasculated man and hack filmmaker. While Vadim's marriages and romances were short-lived, Blood and Roses is forever!

-Ty E

LAST HOUSE ON DEAD END STREET
LAST HOUSE ON DEAD END STREET

Roger Watkins (1977)

When Roger Watkin's turned his drug binge into a film, It holds the record for being an instant cult classic. His exploitation film, The Last House on Dead End Street, was another of the misleading titles that point all towards unneeded bloodshed and nudity, when in this film, is not the main point. The film takes an approach of displaying blood as the ultimate payback for the belligerent Terry Hawkins, who was just released from prison. Due to his drug charges, Mr. Hawkins was locked up for some time. Upon being released, he puffs on a cigarette, and sets his horrible plot in motion. For the most part, the film develops like most of the timeless cinema of its age; clunky and gritty. I honestly couldn't be more happy with the finished product. For a film that cost only $800 dollars, It works to advantage entirely. Hell, since Watkins got three thousand dollars, he decided to blow most of it on his amphetamines. The film not only created an exploitation that involved a fanatical blow to the film market and created a venomous main character who wasn't even a good guy. Normally most films pave way for some optimism. After discussing his failed porno films, Terry decides to film a snuff movie, cause that is what people really want to see. His very words sent shivers down my spine, cause, let's face it. If you watched this film, It's because of the violence. "Don't feed the drug-child" As the primary audience, we are catering to this exaggerated whim of Terry. The Last House on Dead End Street could even be prophetic similar to Arthur C. Clarke's work. Besides having the conventional "One good guy and One bad guy," this film tends to show both opposing forces in an evil light. We got the maniacal blood-lusting aspiring film-maker, and we got the Jewish studio representative who refuses to market Terry's work. It has also been recently revealed that ToeTag Pictures is working on a sequel to this film, conveniently after Watkin's death. This plan to put a sequel to a film that needs none, let alone doesn't even carry a proper timeline, is inconceivable. It's almost as bad as ToeTag revealing their plans to make a sequel to The Redsin Tower. The film was originally billed as starring/written/directed by different people, when it was in fact Watkins himself. So when you see that devilish gleam in Hawkin's eyes, you can see the drugs effect on his unstable mind. Perhaps one of the more artful scenes, was in a fetishist's apartment. It shows a married woman being whipped by a hunchback in Blackface. Too bad more sleaze couldn't be like this. The Last House on Dead End Street is a film sumptuous with negative energy. This is a film that breeds the thoughts of economic distrust. The title is deceiving, but don't let it get the best of you. With the conditions of his film making process in mind, It saddens me to think of him as an accidental filmmaker, but until i see proof of substance in his other films, my case stands.

-Maq

THE LAST HOUSE ON DEAD END STREET

Roger Watkins (1977)

About a decade ago or so ago, I watched Roger Watkins' lost Helter Skelter-esque horror-exploitation flick The Last House on Dead End Street (1977) aka At the Hour of Our Death aka The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell aka The Fun House and I was so turned off by the film's absurdly amateurish and carelessly crude 1970s film school aesthetic that I did not even bother finishing it, ultimately shrugging it off as typical overrated cult horror crap that is worshiped by undiscerning fanboys who rate the quality of a film simply by its rarity, but not long after my initial viewing, I re-watched the film while stoned and came to the solid conclusion that it was one of the greatest masterpieces of its unhinged and unkosher kind. That being said, I still regard The Last House on Dead End Street as one of the greatest exploitation/horror flicks ever made as a work that it is second to none in expressing pernicious psychopathy in a sort of exceedingly eerie and atmospheric form. One of the many rip-offs of Wes Craven's excess-ridden exploitation flick The Last House on the Left (1972) that actually manages to be better than the original, The Last House on Dead End Street is a sort of pseudo-snuff arthouse flick of the uncommonly visceral sort directed by a true degenerate and seeming psychopath who, being high constantly during the film's production, spent only $800 of the $3,000 allotted for the actual film and spent most of the remainder on amphetamines. Nearly impossible to see until about a decade ago when the now defunct dvd company Barrel Entertainment released a double-disc DVD of it in 2002, The Last House on Dead End Street was so riddled with urban legends and mystification that no one even knew who actually directed the film until 2000 when Roger Watkins (aka Victor Janos aka Steven Morrison aka Claude Armand, etc.) revealed on an internet messageboard that he was the true auteur of this malicious and macabre no-budget cinematic masterpiece. In fact, not only was it revealed that Watkins was the director, but that he was also responsible for most other aspects in regard to the creation of The Last House on Dead End Street, not only writing, producing, and editing the film, but also acting as the charismatic lead anti-hero. The seemingly semi-autobiographical story of a Manson-like ex-pornographer who gets out of prison after a one year sentence relating to drug charges and nonsensically takes bloodthirsty revenge on society by making snuff films with a band of psychopathic degenerates that he personally banded together, The Last House on Dead End Street was so shocking to viewers on its initial release in 1977 (the film was completed in 1972, but an actress threatened to sue because Watkins included hardcore porn loops of her without permission, so the release was held back) that people thought it was an authentic snuff film, which was an urban legend that the film's sleazy distributor apparently encouraged. A rare American exploitation auteur piece directed by a patently pessimistic and curiously cynical speed addict who would go on to become a nihilistic pornographer, The Last House on Dead End Street, like the so-called Manson Family, is a demented and deranged depiction of the darker side of counter-culture movements as a god awfully grotesque celluloid work with a fiercely foreboding and even apocalyptic atmosphere and nil moral compass. Featuring brutal slaughterhouse scenes that predate those featured in Rainer Werner Fassbinder's dark arthouse melodrama In a Year with 13 Moons (1978) aka In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden and gorgeously grotesque gore scenes that put The Last House on the Left and just about every other exploitation film of its time to shame, The Last House on Dead End Street is indubitably a singular exploitation flick in that it was clearly sired by a misanthropic and even malevolent man with a cold, black heart whose onscreen character and real-life persona seem totally identical.

THE LAST HOUSE ON DEAD END STREET

Charismatic rock-star-like ex-con Terry Hawkins (Roger Watkins) has just gotten out of jail for serving a one year sentence for drug related charges and despite claiming he liked the 'security' of prison, he firmly feels it is his god-given right to seek revenge against society for sending him to the jailhouse, so he comes up with the bright idea to become a snuff film director because, after all, people are terribly tired of simple pornography, so something new and innovative needs to be made. First, Terry gets a cowardly cuckold of a camera man named Bill Drexel (Bill Schlageter as Lawrence Bornman) that he used to shoot porn loops with in the past, but ultimately screwed over after stealing the poor fellow's film. As for criminal cohorts, Terry hires two 'witchy' nihilistic chicks, Kathy Hughes (Kathy Curtin as Janet Sorely) and Patricia Kuhn (Pat Canestro as Elaine Norcross), as well as a crazed cow-fucker of a butcher named Ken Hardy (cinematographer Ken Fisher as Dennis Crawford), to 'play' as active performers in his nasty snuff flick. As for victims, angry angst-ridden auteur Terry cons a movie money man named Steve Randall (Steve Sweet as Alex Kregar), a porn star named Suzie Knowles (Suzie Neumeyer as Geraldine Saunders), and a debauched husband and wife couple, (Edward E. Pixley as Franklin Statz) and Nancy Palmer (Nancy Vrooman as Barbara Amunson), as unsuspecting victims for their snuff flick who they ultimately lure to an abandoned building where they will be meticulously tortured, dismembered, and slowly killed for the snuff flick. Like most people of his degenerate generation, Terry Hawkins, who sports a Zardoz-like mask while in kill mode, is an idiotic idealist of the bodacious beatnik variety who spouts pseudo-rebellious hippie jargon and feels his acts of vengeful viciousness are of a nobly revolutionary variety and thus he does not think twice of sacrificing human beings for his aberrant celluloid art. When the homicidal hippies begin killing, they do it with gusto and positively perverse pleasure as they suffer from delusions of grandeur and counter-culture brainwashing. Among other things, a less than homely topless broad in Terry's crew attaches an animal hoof to her crotch and forces one of the male victims to suck on her pseudo-cock. Terry and the gang also strap the victims to a makeshift operating table and begin operating on the unfortunate individuals, drilling their eyes with electric drills and opening them up and taking their organs, including the intestines, out as if performing a Viennese Actionist-inspired vivisection. In an off-screen voiceover added to the film against Roger Watkins' will (the filmmaker felt it ruined the entire film), The Last House on Dead End Street concludes with the post-script anecdote announcing that Terry Hawkins and his maniac crew were apprehended and jailed for their crimes.

Rather unfortunately, the original Watkins' director's cut of The Last House on Dead End Street, which was titled 'The Cuckoo Clocks Of Hell' (a reference to the nazi-themed Kurt Vonnegut novel Mother Night (1961)) and was a whopping 175 minutes in length, has yet to be unearthed and purportedly the single surviving print might be deteriorating in a New York film lab, thus it is quite doubtful that the world will ever get to see the film as the filmmaker intended it to be. As Watkins revealed in the audio commentary for the Barrel Entertainment release of The Last House on Dead End Street, his assistant Bernie Travis butchered the 78-minute cut of the film that exists today, which rather irked the director. In fact, in the same audio commentary, Watkins states of Travis that he "recently committed suicide... I'm glad to say" and that his suicidal ex-assistant was an, "inept fool" who was simply "juggling imagery around" when he put together the 78-minute cut of The Last House on Dead End Street. Of course, Watkins, who was a protégé of Hollywood bad boy auteur Nicholas Ray (Rebel Without a Cause, They Lived by Night), had a lot to be pissed off and disgruntled about as he ultimately became in real-life what his character Terry Hawkins in The Last House on Dead End Street despised as he made his living in the 1980s directing gritty Taxi Driver-esque porno flicks. After directing the porn flick Her Name Was Lisa (1980) under the pseudonym Richard Mahler, Watkins made his second and final attempt at directing a horror flick with Shadows of the Mind (1980) aka A Heritage of Blood under the pseudonym Bernard Travis, but the production of the film proved to be a horrendous experience for the director and the film itself was nothing short of an abject artistic failure with nil of the grizzly aesthetic idiosyncrasies, foreboding atmosphere, nor nightmarish nihilism of The Last House on Dead End Street. As someone who has seen Shadows of the Mind (which the director himself described as, "a piece of trash"), as well as a number of Watkins' porn flicks like Corruption (1983) and Midnight Heat (1983)—both of which star Judaic porn legend Jamie Gillis—I can state with the utmost confidence that The Last House on Dead End Street is the accursed filmmaker's unrivaled movie magnum opus, even in its present butchered state at 78-minutes.

A radically raw and ravenous horror flick from meth-fueled counter-culture hell featuring white college chicks in Jolson-esque blackface being whipped at decadent jet-set parties, bourgeois degenerates being orally raped via dismembered animal hooves, and a fiercely fucked filmmaker who is more destructively dedicated to creating celluloid art than the eponymous auteur terrorist of John Waters' satire Cecil B. DeMented (2000), The Last House on Dead End Street is an ideally incendiary, iconoclastic, and idiosyncratic artsploitation horror flick from a seemingly authentic psychopath auteur who rather unfortunately never accomplished anything else even remotely as interesting as mental illness and drug addiction apparently took their toll on Mr. Watkins. Wired (and wasting the film production costs) on meth while directing films and recently joking about the suicide of one of his former collaborators in a dvd audio commentary, Watkins was without question a true sleaze-bag of sorts in real-life and whenever I re-watch The Last House on Dead End Street, I cannot help but think the actor/director was acting out a deep dark fantasy when he directed the film and that's arguably the scariest thing about the wonderfully wicked cinematic work. A self-reflexive film-within-a-film where Watkins as Hawkins (in)famously yells, "I'm directing this fucking movie!," The Last House on Dead End Street is a true auteur piece that tested the bounds of morality and one's duty as an artist. Created by a man with next to nil interest in horror/exploitation cinema who once confessed in an interview, "You have to understand that the scariest film of all time to me is Orson Welles' The Trial. I think that's the most horrifying film ever made, not The Last House on Dead End Street, not any splatter film. I was heavily influenced by Un Chien Andalou, by the fact that it could shock and still does," The Last House on Dead End Street was a film that was made at the right place, at the right time, by the 'right' person, and will thus live on to be a holy grail of (unhinged!) underground horror cinema despite the fact its original dubious history has been demystified for over a decade.

THE LAST HOUSE ON DEAD END STREET

A nasty and nihilistic yet charismatic and captivating true no-budget film directed by nasty and nihilistic yet charismatic and captivating individual who, not unlike the character he portrayed in the work, was too far morally gone to make a big name for himself and start a career as a serious auteur filmmaker of sorts, The Last House on Dead End Street is ultimately an extreme celluloid symptom of a country and culture afflicted with a metaphysical disease of the soul. Forget contemporary soulless and tasteless exploitation flicks like the August Underground trilogy directed by fat fanboy Fred Vogel (who was originally supposed to produce an 'authorized' sequel to The Last House on Dead End Street, but luckily Watkins dropped dead before he could authorize an aesthetic molestation of his masterpiece), The Last House on Dead End Street is the real deal as a work of uncompromising, deranged celluloid decadence and visceral vulgarity that no one wants to admit they enjoy, even if it is one of their favorite exploitation flicks (as it is certainly one of mine). Notably, Las Vegas-based exploitation auteur Ron Atkins (Schizophreniac: The Whore Mangler, Mutilation Mile) somewhat recently directed a quasi-sequel/tribute to The Last House on Dead End Street entitled The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell (2011) starring fellow exploitation auteur Jim Van Bebber (Deadbeat at Dawn, The Manson Family) in the role of Terry Hawkins, which is certainly worth checking out if you're a fan of the original fan, but it lacks the unwavering viciousness of Watkins' film and is essentially an ultra-violent psychedelic black comedy from postmodern exploitation hell. Indeed, as its rip-off tagline advertised, The Last House on Dead End Street may be "only a movie!" but it is also probably the only movie that acts as the sort of cinematic equivalent of being spiritually tortured and raped by a counter-culture cult, which is certainly no small achievement on auteur Roger Watkins' part, even if he refused actually taking credit for the film for what was a good portion of his lifetime.

-Ty E

SHADOWS OF THE MIND
SHADOWS OF THE MIND

Roger Watkins (1979)

While best known for his pleasantly politically incorrect Manson-esque quasi-artsploitation horror flick The Last House on Dead End Street (1977) aka The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell, sub-underground auteur Roger Watkins (Corruption, Midnight Heat)—a man that is certainly a top contender for America's most sleazy 'auteur' filmmaker as a drug-addled human trainwreck who used his god-given artistic talent to direct some of the most nihilistic, misanthropic, and pessimistic porno films ever made—would ultimately direct more fuck flicks than horror flicks. In fact, Watkins only directed one other horror flick, Shadows of the Mind (1980) aka A Heritage of Blood, which was credited to the pseudonym 'Bernard Travis' and which the auteur vehemently disowned (in fact, it was not until October 2005 that Watkins owned up to directing the film). Indeed, as Watkins stated in an interview featured in issue #23 of Headpress Journal: "It's a piece of trash. I mean even the porno films I did, I think they are well done for the most part. But this is just inept. It's just an abomination. The stories I could tell about that mess..." Somewhat interestingly, 'Bernard Travis' was not actually a pseudonym created by the actual director but the name of the film's money man, who put his name on the film and who Watkins had much ill will towards, even rejoicing when the man kicked the bucket under tragic circumstances. Indeed, Travis later committed suicide and Watkins would jokingly insinuate that he murdered him, stating regarding his nemesis and his lack of a director's credit for Shadows of the Mind: "Yes, the suicide case. I really scared the shit out of Fenton [the film's producer], because he told me Bernie committed suicide and I said to him "What makes you think it was suicide?" But that guy, Bernie Travis, he put his name down as the director, and that's shit! It's bad enough to steal, but are you going to put your name on shit?! And him and his wife put their names down as the writers. Fine with me, I would never allow my name on that garbage—or even [my pseudonyms] Richard Mahler or Victor Janos for that matter." On top of being the film's financial backer and pseudo-director, Travis was also the husband of the uniquely untalented lead actress of the film, Marion Joyce, who is not exactly easy on the eyes or ears. Indeed, to put it more bluntly, Joyce seems like a typically spoiled, overweight, and all-around grotesque JAP (aka Jewish American Princess). Indeed, probably the most horrifying and disturbing element of the film is Joyce's horrendous Hebraic NYC accent. Indeed, Shadows of the Mind seems to be more or less the banally ugly, patently pointless, and aesthetically odious outcome of Watkins whoring himself to an unkosher backer who wanted to make a film glorifying his innately inglorious kosher wife. Needless to say, the film is quite the disappoint seeing as it is more or less considered a 'lost film' by the marvelously mischievous mensch who brought the world The Last House on Dead End Street. Indeed, aside from a couple striking gore scenarios and flashback scenes that seem like something out of an obscure Czech New Wave flick, the film seems like a poor man's equivalent to those horrendous PG-13 horror-thrillers that are incessantly shit out by Hollywood and are specially tailored to appeal to the low IQs of hormone-ridden teenage girls.

Almost immediately seeming like one of the most hopelessly schlocky Freud-fetishizing pseudo-Hitchcockian flicks ever made, albeit minus the suspense, Shadows of the Mind centers around angst-ridden anti-heroine Elise Halsted (Marion Joyce)—a meta-bourgeois basketcase that is certainly of no relation to S&M sodomite pornographer Fred Halsted—who went crazy at age 12 after witnessing the rather pathetic pondside drowning accident of her father and stepmother, thus resulting in her long-term institutionalization. Now an adult (it is hard to tell how old she is, but she looks like she is at least in her mid-30s, if not older) who has spent most of her life in a loony bin receiving experimental treatment, Elise finds her rather fragile sanity tested when her 'progressive' pill-peddling psychiatrist Dr. Robert Lang (Erik Rolfe) abruptly releases her back into society, thus forcing her to move back to the large family estate where she witnessed her father and stepmother drown. Elise's only living relative is her self-obsessed hot shot Wall Street swindler stepbrother Leland Sayers (G.E. Barrymore)—a prestigiously pompous littler pisser who drives a sports car and has not bothered to visit his stepsister once since her initial institutionalization—and he wants her immediately recommitted so that he can be the sole heir to the family estate. When Leland rudely arrives at the family home in his candy ass sports car, Elise, who seems more than a tad bit socially retarded, refuses to embrace him and yells at him for never visiting her in the nuthouse. When Leland incites the family groundskeeper Andrew (Anthony Frank)—a creepy dude that likes perversely staring at homely young girls and stroking his scythe as if it is his cock (I hate to say it, but Watkins seems to be paying tribute to Carl Th. Dreyer's 1932 masterpiece Vampyr during this scene)—by insinuating that Elise plans to sell the estate thus leaving him out of the job, the pissed off prole worker goes insane and attacks the hysterical little heiress. Needless to say, groundskeeper Andrew is soon slaughtered with his own beloved scythe.

Later that night, Dr. Lang and his much younger and vaguely beauteous fiancée Diana Russell (Bianca Sloane) come by the Halsted estate to spend a quaint evening with Elise and her dickhead stepbrother Robert. Naturally, Elise becomes quite unhappy when Dr. Lang arrives with his fiancée, as she is in love with her doctor yet at the same time sees him as a father figure of sorts, thus causing her to associate Diana with her much hated stepmother, who she blames for her less than ideal childhood and poor papa's premature death. Of course, psychopathic pseudo-playboy Robert—an exceedingly effete little turd that seems like a miserable mix between a meth-addled fag queen and a stereotypically repugnant Jewish stand-up comedian—acts like a first-rate posh prick and makes wisecracks like, "I wonder what the poor people are doing tonight," which demonstrates his nauseatingly annoying narcissism. Needless to say, Dr. Lang is not amused by Robert's glaring arrogance and unwarranted sense of superiority, especially after he hits on his fiancée Diana, so he soon decides to take his babe and leave, but his car fails to start, thus forcing him and his lady friend to stay the night at the Halsted home (which Watkins described as an, "rundown Citizen Kane-like befouled Mansion in Westchester County"). Of course, when everyone goes to sleep, murderously jealous Elise goes on an unhinged murder spree which begins with her stepbrother, whose eye she gouges out, and concludes with the seemingly ritualistic burning of Diana. After managing to lock Dr. Lang in a room, Elise, who has covered her face with clownish make-up that makes her look like a six-year-old drag queen, surprise attacks Diana and repeatedly stabs her in the chest with a butcher knife. From there, Elise drags Diana outside, doses her body with gasoline, and sets her on fire while the unlucky little lady is still alive. As Diana screams in pain while burning to death, Elise laughs maniacally while deriving sadistic glee from the young woman's brutal death. In the end, the only thing that remains of poor Diana is a burnt skeleton and Elise is sent back to the mental institution, though she probably won't enjoy her stay there as much as she did before, as it is quite doubtful that Dr. Lang will want to continue treating her since she burned his fiancée alive and all. After everything is said and done, it is revealed that Elise accidentally caused her father's death while attempting to kill her stepmother when they were riding in a small rowboat in a placid pond. Indeed, after 12-year-old Elise knocked her stepmother into the water by hitting her over the head with a paddle, Mr. Halsted jumped in to save her, thus resulting in both of their would-be-tragic deaths.

SHADOWS OF THE MIND

Despite being less than 80 minutes long, Shadows of the Mind feels like it is well over two hours in length, which probably has to do with the fact it does not show a single murder scene until about 40 minutes in and routinely recycles a number of the same flashback scenes, as if the editor did not have enough footage to work with to edit together an entire feature film, thus he decided to merely reuse the same banal scenes over-and-over again. Indeed, this absolutely appalling quasi-melodramatic horror abortion ultimately seems like an over-extended short film, which probably largely has to do with the fact that auteur Roger Watkins was forced to work with contemptible crew of pretentious NYU film school graduates who tried to lead a mutiny of sorts against the director on the set, thus bastardizing his original artistic vision, or as the auteur stated himself in the Headpress interview: "I learnt something interesting on that set. Here's what I learnt: As I said, I wanted to make films when I was ten. I'm sixteen and I'm good. At twenty-two I'm real good. All of a sudden this asshole Fenton has got me directing this film that I wrote with Paul, and he's hired these assholes out of film school or visual arts who think they know everything and they know fucking nothing. But because they are all friends, they are like gang-ing up on me. "I want this... no, no I want this..." It's just like pulling teeth to get the shot you want, and then when you see it it's not the shot you want anyway [...] Do you know William James? Henry James' brother? He had this saying: 'looking glass self.' You could be the most handsome man in the world, but if everybody around you tells you that you are fucking ugly, you will believe it. I would get all these people who knew nothing and I had to question: "Wait a minute. Do I know what I'm doing? Maybe these eighty-seven jerks out of NYU and out of the School of Visual Arts, maybe they know and I don't know?" I actually went through a sort of crisis which lasted a few months. Then I said, "No, they know fucking nothing!" But it happens." Indeed, aside from its sometimes foreboding tone and its handful of scenes of demented ultra-violence, it is hard to tell that Watkins was the man in the thrift store grade director's seat.

Undoubtedly, the most 'entertaining' element of the film is its shockingly horrendous acting, especially from the pudgy slag lead, who resembles a gigantic autistic toddler who suffered brain damage after taking one-too-many hits of acid. Of course, you know a film is a plodding pile of philistine celluloid shit when the director describes it as follows: "Of course the production is a nightmare: You can actually see the "star" looking for cue cards as she tries to deliver her lines; the crew was an inept bunch of shitheads from NYU, each one of them thinking they were a combination of Welles, Buñuel, and Fellini, No, I take that back, each one of them thinking they were a combination of Michael Winner, Roy Ward Baker and numerous other money making hacks." Rather interestingly, Watkins subsequently directed a dark comedy entitled Spittoon (1981) based on the hellish production of Shadows of the Mind starring the auteur himself as a famous Nazi filmmaker who became famous during the silent era. Unfortunately, Spittoon seems to be impossible to find. Undoubtedly, any film that mocks a work as innately wretched and aesthetically insipid as Shadows of the Mind must be some sort of lost masterpiece. Indeed, maybe if there was a scene in the film where the lead actress was gang raped by some high ass homies from Harlem, Shadows of the Mind might have been more appealing, but ultimately the film is as limp as a veteran porn star's diseased dick.

-Ty E

CORRUPTION
CORRUPTION

Roger Watkins (1983)

Undoubtedly, a multi-film collaboration between underground exploitation auteur turned nihilist pornographer Roger Watkins (The Last House on Dead End Street, Shadows of the Mind) and Hebraic porn chic leading man Jamie Gillis (Through the Looking Glass, Water Power) was a malevolent match made in celluloid hell. Naturally, this uniquely unsavory collaboration ultimately produced two of the world's darkest and most unhinged, mystifying, and nihilistic fuck flicks ever made, which is saying a lot considering that they were made within an quasi-underground industry that is dominated by mostly degenerate and forsaken lost souls who make a living exposing their most sacred moments and body parts. Out of the two films that the mischievous movie men made together, Corruption (1983) and Midnight Heat (1983), the former is undoubtedly the greatest, sickest, and most provocative, as a sort morbid masterpiece of the late porn chic era. Watkins directed both films under the pseudonym 'Richard Mahler' (a somewhat ironic amalgamation of the names Richard Wagner and Gustav Mahler), which indicative of the director's love of classical music, which is also quite clear in Corruption. A 'loose' (and I mean LOOSE) reworking of Teutonic maestro Richard Wagner's Das Rheingold—the first cycle of the composer's four-cycle Gesamtkunstwerk ("total work of art") opera Der Ring des Nibelungen (1876) aka The Ring of the Nibelung—that the director originally hoped would be three hours and more faithful to the source material, Corruption is probably the most wanton and wicked 'Wagnerian' flick ever made as a work featuring an Hebrew born on the same day as infamous Wagnerite Adolf Hitler in the lead role, a prissy porn actress reading a vintage copy of Cosima Wagner's Diaries: 1878-1883, and of course music from Das Rheingold. Needless to say, Watkins' film is certainly more wicked than wanton, as a work that is more likely to inspire the viewer to shoot themselves than their wad. A fucked flick with truly filthy fucking that feels like an unholy marriage between the paranoia-addled labyrinths of Franz Kafka, the unhinged underworld lechery of David Lynch, and the politically incorrect urban nihilism of William Friedkin and Martin Scorsese, Corruption may be an aberrant adaption of Das Rheingold, but it really owes most of its soul-stabbing sensationalism to the sorry socio-political climate of the post-counter-culture era, as a work set in a world where there is not only no such thing as "free love," but only the renouncing of love, and where sex comes at the price of one's soul. Directed by a truly reluctant pornographer who had never seen a porn flick previously and who refused to direct the actual sex scenes, Corruption is a conspicuously corrupt piece of sleazy celluloid featuring 'honorable' businessmen selling their souls, seemingly Satanic Kafka-esque whorehouses run by bitchy Wagnerites, treacherous Gothic top-hat-wearing necrophiles, and ungodly bastard brothers that reminds one that there is indeed such a thing as a cultivated hate-fueled fuck flick. The film also reminds one that the least interesting thing about Jamie Gillis is his circumcised kosher cock, as he barely demonstrates his carnal knowledge in the flick yet it ultimately features the actor at his greatest and most strangely understated.

As stoic lead Mr. Williams (played Jamie Gillis in a role that seems to be modeled after the character Wotan, ruler of the gods, from Wagner's opera) states at the beginning of the film to a gangster named Mr. Franklin (Michael Gaunt), "I believe in business. I believe in honoring my contracts. I believe...without honor...all business becomes quite useless," yet little does the businessman realize that business will ultimately lead to him entering a literally and figuratively dark realm of the sexually taboo and sensually meta-sadistic. Mr. Williams is involved in a dubious business deal with a dubious dude of the seemingly mafioso-oriented sort named Mr. Franklin involving a mysterious suitcase. While Williams half-heartedly claims that he loves his wife Doreen (Tiffany Clark) because she doesn't ask for much (?!), he is completely obsessed with his spouse's little sister, Felicia (Kelly Nichols), who he spies on masturbating. For a major business transaction, Williams makes the seemingly moronic mistake of sending his feeble-minded partner Alan (George Payne) to carry out the truly curious transaction. Little does Williams realize that Alan will betray him and join the other side. Indeed, to carry out the transaction, Alan enters a subterranean whorehouse where the whores, who do not even show the slightest traces of empathy and love, force him to follow their debasing command. Ultimately, Alan will come to the realization that he enjoys power and pleasure over purity and love as a result of his experiences at the semi-surreal brothel. Alan will also come to the realization that he is an exhibitionist and necrophile who gets off to copulating with corpses, especially in front of men who he betrays.

Upon first arriving at the building that Williams has sent him to where he is supposed to carry out some sort of unspecified transaction, Alan encounters a brazenly bitchy receptionist aka "Woman at Desk" (Samantha Fox) who mocks him while flipping through a copy of Romantic maestro Richard Wagner's wife Cosima Wagner's diaries. Alan is told to enter a room where he meets a lingerie-adorned "Woman in Blue" (Tanya Lawson) who tells him to "do nothing" while she fiercely masturbates. Eventually the blue babe commands Alan to, "Come over here and smell my pussy," which he naturally complies with like a good little passive boy. After provocatively stating to Alan, "There's something nice about the smell of a cunt, isn't there Alan? Something exciting...something forbidden. Just watch...Just sit there and watch me fuck myself," the Woman in Blue reveals to the businessman that she is not going to fuck him because she has "given up on men." After Alan is asked if he could give up on women and "rely on nobody" but himself, the Woman in Blue is annoyed by his uncertain answer and tells him, "what you're looking for is beyond that door." In the next room, Alan meets a "Woman in Red" (Marilyn Gee) who tells him to "eat me," which the beta businessman does with a sort of hesitant gusto. Of course, while the red woman gives him a blowjob, she ultimately refuses to give him an orgasm and says, “one more door Alan, one more room” just as he says “I’m cuming.” In the third and final room, Allan meets a “Woman in Black” (Tish Ambrose) who tells him that he must “renounce love” if he wants the thing that all men desire, which is “power.” After agreeing that he will renounce love, the Woman in Black states in a bitchy tone, “Well, come and fuck me.” When the two strangers make (anti)love, the “Woman in Black” seems both bored-to-death and exceedingly annoyed and when Alan is about to cum, she states in a contemptible manner, “don’t cum inside me,” so he busts on her bum instead. When Alan leaves the final hate-fuck session, he finds a suitcase waiting for him. Of course, Alan, who has renounced love (and thus has become like the dwarf Alberich of Wagner’s play, which has been described by kosher commie Theodor Adorno as a “negative Jewish stereotype”), has already made his decision to betray Williams.

CORRUPTION

When Williams goes to meet his low-life quasi-midget criminal brother Larry (Bobby Astyr)—a superlatively swarthy and sleazy guy that puts the “Kosher Nostra” members of Nicolas Winding Refn’s Drive (2011) to abject shame in terms of innate repugnance and moral bankruptcy—at a strip club where the the strippers danced in a seemingly trance-like fashion like somnambulists on crack, he begins to realize the depth of the personal hell that he has gotten himself into. Like his (ex)comrade Alan, Williams is taken by little lunatic Larry through a pandemonium of pernicious perversion where he witnesses lurid lipstick lesbianism, gimp-themed S&M brutality, and even necrophilia. Indeed, while Williams finds the necrophilia so disturbing that he bangs on the door and screams, “Open this fucking door” at the guy fucking the corpse, his bastard ½ brother Larry finds the entire scenario to be rather hilarious. Of course, the necrophile in question is Alan and he now only has contempt for Williams and his pansy second-rate businessman ways. Meanwhile, Williams’ feisty sister-in-law Felicia is kidnapped by one of the leaders of the mafia group that the businessman did business with. As a result of Alan’s treachery, the mafia men never got what Williams promised them, thus they want revenge. While the mafia pig anally pillages Felicia, he sadistically states, “Williams asked us to do his dirty work for him. We knew it was only a matter of time before we owned him. I guess he knew that too...otherwise he wouldn’t have sent that fool Alan on a man’s errand.” Not long after that, Williams’ bastard ½ brother Larry comes in and blows both Felicia and the raging rapist away, or so the viewer assumes (their deaths are not actually depicted). In the end, Williams’ wife becomes a soulless whore (indeed, she acts more or less like the ‘Woman in Black’) and says to her hubby, “You know what I want? I wanna get fucked. Not make love. I wanna just fuck. Think you can accommodate?” Of course, since Williams is more in love with a prostitute named Erda (played by Vanessa del Rio in a role named after an “earth goddess” from Wagner’s opera who warns Wotan of an impending doom), he does not really care that his wife has degenerated into a debauched whore. As the conclusion of the film reveals, Larry set up Williams from the beginning.

On top of being one of the most foreboding fuck flicks I have ever seen, Corruption also happens to be one of the most wonderfully cryptically incoherent, as a lecherously labyrinthine work that seems like Martin Scorsese's Mean Streets (1973) meets Lynch's Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992) as directed by the world's most pernicious Wagnerite pornographer. Indeed, when everything is said and done, it is almost a cinematic tragedy that it is a mere porn flick, as the film shows elements of what could have been a cult masterpiece, especially if Watkins had been able to make the 3 hour erotic epic that he originally intended, as a true pornographic 'Gesamtkunstwerk' would be nothing short of magical. As anyone can tell by reading an interview with him, Watkins was a real lowlife and patent underachiever who wasted his life and artistic talent on drug addiction, so in a way, it was only natural that he become a pornographer. While Corruption is, in many ways, quite anti-erotic, I surely found it more sexually appealing than most blue movies, as the sinister sleaze element certainly equips the work with a sort of debauched danger that most similarly themed films lack, not to mention the fact the film has a certain debauched dream logic that is quite singular, especially compared to similar works. A waywardly wanton and wicked de-Teutonized pornographic adaptation of one of Wagner's most revered works starring swarthy sensual Hebrews, Corruption is a fine aesthetic example as to why Oswald Spengler was probably not nearly as pessimistic as he could have been when foretelling Occidental decline. Indeed, somehow Wagner and circumcised wieners seem like a curious combo.

-Ty E

AMERICAN BABYLON
AMERICAN BABYLON

Roger Watkins (1985)

Before prematurely concluding both his porn and filmmaking career with the apparently forgettable shot-on-video effort Decadence (1988), Roger Watkins aka 'Richard Mahler'—the man who forever delightfully debased the horror realm with his misanthropic work of nefariously nihilistic Mansonite artsploitation The Last House on Dead End Street (1977)—blessed the world of bizarre blue movies with his penultimate piece of eccentric celluloid excess American Babylon (1987) aka Babylon USA, which like Fred Halsted's Sextool (1975), was one of only a handful of porn flicks that was shot on 35mm film stock. A film made to mock the raincoat crowd and Pee-wee Herman types, as well as the banal and equally bored American suburban bourgeoisie that could afford the pricey projectors and film reels to jerk-off in the dark in the privacy of their own basements, Watkins' reluctantly wanton work is positively penetrating anti-porn at its most darkly humorous. Indeed, a piece of mischievously mirthful meta-cinema and porn-within-a-porn-within-a-porn about a basement-dwelling porn addict who watches fuck flicks in a literal raincoat and a motorcycle helmet and his considerably whipped neighbor/'best friend' who calls his conspicuously cunt-y wife 'mother' and is good at taking orders from other people, especially wanton women, American Babylon depicts via a secretly seedy suburban microcosm the pathetic loneliness that oftentimes 'comes' with pornophilia, extramarital affairs, and religious fever. An iconoclastic assault on Christian evangelism, marriage, middle-class living, and porn addiction, Watkins' work is nothing if not a totally and shockingly singular work made on the brink of the death of porn chic, which probably has largely to do with the fact that the auteur had total creative freedom with the film, or as he stated in an interview with David Kerekes featured in Headpress 23: Funhouse (2002): "CORRUPTION and AMERICAN BABYLON are two I had absolute, total control over." A timely work created around the time when the porn industry drastically degenerated into the soulless and malignant smut tumor it is today and started producing plot-less and artless shot-on-video twaddle that was meant to sexually excite the most moronic of debauched dullards and delinquents, American Babylon is a sort of unofficial declaration of the pornographic apocalypse.

Meek 'house husband' Thomas (played by actor/porn star Michael Gaunt, who appeared in everything from the late-1960s BBC children series Jackanory to Lucio Fulci's 1980 classic City of the Living Dead) arrives home calling for his domineering wife Mary (played by Chelsea Balke, who starred in Sharon Mitchell's delightfully titled 1985 work D.O.D.: Dick of Death), but instead finds a sandwich, glass of milk, and note reading, "Honey, Tuesday night is aerobics night. See you after a time. Your loving wife, Mary." Rather annoyed by his wife's absence and her use of the nonsensical non-phrase "See you after a time,” Thomas decides to head over to the house of his small, swarthy, and sleazy neighbor Robert (played by pornographic ‘character actor’ Bobby ‘Clown Prince of Porn’ Astyr), who is a pathetic yet exceedingly arrogant and narcissistic porn addict who spends virtually all of his time watching fuck flicks and denies sexual pleasure to his undersexed wife Joan (Tish Ambrose, who appeared in virtually all of Watkins’ fuck flicks). Indeed, when Joan begins masturbating in an attempt to turn on her horndog hubby, he bitches with a gutter-grade NYC Jewish accent, “Joan, I really wish you wouldn’t do that. It’s distracting. Enough is a fuckin’ nuff’.” Together, Robert and Tom watch vintage black-and-white films together like “Teenage Pigment In Heat” a film by ‘Bernard America.’ An early casualty of porn addiction who lives and breathes amateur blue movies, Robert excitedly describes the poorly directed fuck flick to Thomas as follows: “Get a load of this footage, Thomas. No adult cinema, this. No, no contemporary triple X theater, this is a dirty movie. The screen just literally drips guilt. The debasement is what does it. Look at the cunt. You can’t tell but I know it. It’s just dripping wet and stinks to high heaven.” Indeed, Robert is so enamored with porn that he will not even notice Thomas beginning an affair with his wife Joan right in front of his face.

Spiritual cuckold and human doormat Thomas is indubitably his wife Mary’s little bitch and he has no problem admitting it, even to women who he is cheating on his spouse with. When Thomas fails to drink the milk she left him while she was at aerobics, she complains, “son-of-a-bitch didn’t even drink his milk” and forces him to drink it later, but not before berating him a number of times. When Thomas walks in on Mary, who he lovingly calls ‘mother,’ masturbating, he ruins her orgasm by driving his face into her gash, but he makes up for it by dining on and penetrating her naughty bits. After sex, the two go to bed, but they are both awakened by a phone call from Robert’s wife Joan, who demands that Thomas meet her at 2 pm the next day at a local pizza joint because, as she says to the whipped married man, “I want to suck your cock.” Of course, being a cowardly cuck who can be easily manipulated by any woman, Thomas follows Joan’s orders and soon finds himself receiving head in the lady’s room of the pizza joint, though he complains, “Joan, this is a public restroom. Anyone can walk in here” during the middle of the blowjob. After blowing his load, Thomas, proclaims, “Gee Joan, that was swell. I’d really love to do it again sometime, if it is at all possible,” to which his friend’s wife replies while semen is dripping from her face, “I can’t hardly wait.” Indeed, the next time Thomas comes over to Robert’s place to watch a fuck flick called “Butt Girls in Bondage,” he is treated to a handjob from Joan, whose husband is so hypnotized by the hardcore reel that he does not notice that his “best wife” (indeed, Robert seems to think he has more than one wife) is stroking the pole of his “best friend.” When Robert later walks in on his wife Joan being fucked by a butch bitch with a strap-on while Thomas masturbates nearby while absurdly sporting old school beatnik garb, he does not even notice a thing and goes on to pathetically proclaim how glad he is that he just found his Swiss army knife like the proud man-child that he is.

AMERICAN BABYLON

Unquestionably, American Babylon becomes much more bizarre and intriguingly inexplicable during the last 20 minutes or so. After Robert tells a bogus bullshit story about how he once had an affair with two bisexual sisters that just magically happened to show up in the upstairs bedroom of his home while he was vacuuming downstairs with his beloved Hoover vacuum cleaner (indeed, he seems more aroused by the thought of his vacuum than the two imaginary incestuous sluts he encountered), the film begins to deconstruct. To differentiate between sections of the film, director Roger Watkins opted for shooting the film's main narrative in color and the fictional fuck films that the characters watch in black-and-white. Of course, by the end of the film, the main characters are also depicted in black-and-white, thus rudely demolishing the imaginary 'Fourth Wall' of the film and making the viewer well aware that they are watching a porn flick. Indeed, when the character Robert states to Thomas, "Only a fool would believe a story like that. I mean, think about it," after he fails to differentiate between fact and fantasy, he is really speaking to the viewer from the perspective of auteur Watkins, who seems to have only the bitterest contempt for his audience. During the last 10 minutes or so of American Babylon, a title card for an imaginary film entitled "Menopausal Males in Bondage" (A film by Thomas and Robert) appears and various scenes from the movie appear in an abridged recapping of the entire film, thus forcing the viewer to come to terms with the fact that they have been 'had' by the director and are, not unlike the characters of the film, 'Menopausal Males' in bondage to pornography and impotency. Like Thomas and Robert, the viewer lives their life vicariously through television characters and dope-addled porn stars. Also, towards the end of the film, Thomas' wife Mary shoots her TV with a shotgun after becoming quite agitated with what she sees on the screen, thus suggesting that porn and television are just two heads of the same incapacitating and lobotomizing American beast. In the end, American Babylon concludes with a pop-art-like portrait of Abraham 'Honest Abe' Lincoln, who not only symbolizes America's degeneration since the last century, but also how the nation itself is founded on myths, with pornography itself being a perverse product of this mythmaking.

More than any of Watkins' other films, American Babylon reveals the director's venomous contempt for Christian evangelism, which is most apparent during a scene where the character Robert listens to some carny-like radio preacher and states to his neighbor: "Thomas, I have a theory about these self-appointed sanctimonious radio proselytizers...I think they're all suffering from some massive guilt complex. Somewhere in their seedy little pasts, each and every one of them has committed some heinous act for which they can find no absolution. So what they've done is beat themselves over the heads with it, and after eons of introspection some kind of dark knights of the soul, they have been metamorphosed into what I like to call 'Leapers into the Light.' They are going to beat us over the head with it, buddy, and there ain't no gettin' away." While Watkins has made it quite clear in various interviews that he got involved in the porn industry for monetary reasons, one certainly gets the feeling while watching American Babylon that he also did it to attack the medieval-minded so-called "Judeo-Christian" (itself, an oxymoron) evangelists who have turned America into the great laughing stock of the world.

While Roger Watkins was fairly dismissive of most of his hardcore flicks, he seemed to have a 'soft spot' for American Babylon as revealed in his remark in Headpress 23: Funhouse: "I made that with my own money. I like that film. I can't even find a good tape of it now. I have a bootleg. It's interesting to me; it's about boredom. It's about two men who sit around bored watching pornography. Basically that's it. I kind of like it. I think the last shot is an eight minute static, b&w shot of these two forlorn guys sitting near a window in a bar listening to 'Glory Glory Hallelujah' or something." Although somewhat inaccurately describing his own film (he was known to have drug problems throughout his entire life), Watkins is correct when he states American Babylon is hard-to-find, as even I had to track down a poor quality bootleg copy, which is rather unfortunate considering it is one of the few true masterpieces of porn, not to mention one of the most sophisticated and iconoclastic works that the industry has ever produced, as the sort of fuck flick Godard might have directed had he been a forsaken drug-addled American exploitation auteur. While some might suspect that the title of the film might have been inspired by the scandalous and oftentimes salacious pages of Kenneth Anger's Hollywood Babylon (1959), Watkins revealed otherwise, stating, "There was a porn series that made a lot of money – BABYLON PINK, BABYLON YELLOW, Babylon whatever. AMERICAN BABYLON capitalized on all that, but I had written it in a more imaginative way." Lauded as the "last great adult film to come out of New York," American Babylon is unquestionably the sort of fuck flick that transcends porn ghetto, as one might describe it as one of the most eloquently obnoxious assaults on both the American porn industry and America in general. A work that depicts suburbia as a sort of American pie that is completely rotten inside where the men are either cuckolded automatons or impotent porn addicts and the women are hyper horny undersexed deviants looking to fuck anything and everything that moves, American Babylon innovatively manages to portray what everyone knows but is too afraid to say by using the taboo art of pornography for a practical purpose, which was certainly one of Watkins' greatest talents as a filmmaker. Indeed, Watkins is the only filmmaker I can think of who would have probably made socially keen snuff films were he given the opportunity.

-Ty E

INDEPENDENCE DAY
INDEPENDENCE DAY

Roland Emmerich^o (1996)

Of all the movies I could choose from to represent the United States of America, I would choose the 1996 Roland Emmerich film Independence Day. I do not mean to say that in the sense that Independence Day in any way portrays the traditional values commonly associated with America, nor am I saying that it really has anything to do with America's origins in a political sense. When I say that Independence Day represents America, I mean to say that it represents the sort of sociopolitical direction that America has taken in recent years, in almost every possible way. Perhaps for this reason it is fitting that the film has proven to be so culturally relevant, and in some ways, it could be a landmark for the new attitude of America's future generations. It would be folly to insinuate that Independence Day has anything to do with the zeitgeist of the American people of today. Rather, as it stands now, it is actually total propaganda. The plot of the movie establishes itself very simply enough: when extraordinarily large spaceships begin to loom over the atmosphere of Earth, people speculate on their presence before realizing that they contain an entire alien race that goes from planet to planet, wiping out all available resources and then moving on. The aliens have no homeland of their own, require massive amounts of subsistence, and they are dangerous, so the war is on. There are three basic thematic elements to Independence Day that bring about a sense of cohesiveness in its cryptic message. Namely, they are multiculturalism, hedonism, and perhaps most importantly, the triumph of Jewish intellectualism over puerile European brutality. All three of these ideas interweave with each other quite fluidly, so it is important to delineate the well-hidden measures of this film's very ambitious agenda.

Maybe the strangest part about the multicultural aspects present in the film has to do with a sense of post-Communist paranoia one gets from this blockbuster. Within the first few minutes of the film, a Sky news broadcast is shown with a caption that establishes it as "Soviet central news." The Soviet Union fell in 1991 and the era of perestroika had come and gone by this point, but nevertheless it is alive and well in the mind of Emmerich and writer Dean Devlin. There is also a map of Russia later in the film where St. Petersburg is referred to as "Petrograd" (that particular name of the city was only used from 1914-1924), and other Russian words on the same map are horribly misspelled. It could have been out of thematic necessity that these decisions were made. The blatant and conscious message of the film has to do with setting relatively minor disputes in favor of uniting for a common good, so these quick shots speak volumes for the imaginary political climate that characterizes the film. In another shot, the Arab nations and Israelis are working together to assemble a militia. There is actually a montage of countries around the world, near the end of the film, receiving messages in morse code about an upcoming invasion on the aliens, and so a sense of teamwork is given through the urgent behaviors of each country's people. As stated, even the "enemy" countries such as Russia and China are in on the act. But the message of the film has very little to do with global unity. It has a lot more to do with United States hegemony, especially since the morse code they are receiving has to do with America's great plan and no one else's. Keeping consistent with the entire multicultural agenda, this sort of global harmony has to be guided by a dominating force. The other countries, regardless of their weapons, technology, and accomplishments, are operating under the American plan with very little influence of their own. It is quite obviously no mistake that the great comeback on the aliens takes place on July 4th, but to call this merely nationalistic propaganda would mischaracterize the depth of the film's agenda.

Another interesting part of the film is its glorification of the degradation of traditional American values and its emphasis on "if it feels good, do it." The chief example for this is in the character of Jasmine Dubrow (Vivica A. Fox), the woman Captain Steven Hiller (Will Smith) wants to marry. Jasmine lives in a very expensive-looking home in the suburbs, she has an illegitimate child who seems very well-adjusted, a successful military soldier wants to marry her, and she also just so happens to be a stripper. It seems as though this issue would cause at least some strife in the subplot. After all, both conventional wisdom and numerous professional studies state that most women working in the sex industry are either addicted to drugs or have had very traumatic past sexual or family experiences and need therapy, or both. Nevertheless, this is a relatively unimportant issue for the film. In the one single scene that seriously addresses the issue, the First Lady misunderstands what Jasmine means when she says she is a "dancer," so Jasmine clarifies. The First Lady says, "Oh, I'm sorry," to which Jasmine replies, "I'm not. It's good money."

In addition to the unnecessary risqué elements to the film, there is also perhaps an even stranger sort of component to this message of discouraging personal responsibility. Many anti-tobacco organizations cite Hollywood as having a "pro-smoking" agenda in its movies due to the many supposedly garish demonstrations of actors smoking cigarettes and cigars. Independence Day manages to qualify for such a complaint in that it actually glorifies the smoking of cigars. Throughout the film we see Hiller planning victory cigars for the two different air strikes he goes on against the aliens, and he even manages to convince the straight-laced David Levinson (Jeff Goldblum) to share a smoke with him after the film's climax where the aliens are officially destroyed. One of the very last lines in the film involves Levinson looking at the cigar and saying, "I could get used to it." I would say it is fairly rare to see a film pander to the tobacco lobby so blatantly as to make the characters show such a non-ironic vocal appreciation for smoking. In some ways it is almost admirable to see a film so intentionally backwards in its values.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

It is important to know that the idea for Independence Day was concocted at Emmerich's sister-in-law's child's bar mitzvah when a rabbi asked Emmerich and Devlin what they would do if they woke up to find an alien spacecraft the size of the city in the sky. Given the subtle elements of dichotomizing Jewish intellectualism with gentile boorishness that seems to enshroud the film, it is safe to say that the place of the film's conception had to have left a profound indention on the execution of the film itself. Throughout Independence Day, the recurring themes of Jewish greatness play a role in plot advancement while non-Jews are treated as complacent go-to men and/or broad-shouldered fighters who rely more on gut instincts than intellectual analysis. These concepts are most importantly exemplified through the Levinsons, David and his father Julius (Judd Hirsch).

Before examining the Levinsons, the two other characters of Jewish origin bear examination for the messages they help contextualize. Harvey Fierstein plays a character named Marty who serves simply as comic relief for the first part of the film. While he is meant to be laughed at for his overbearingly flamboyant behavior, there is an undercurrent of empathy and altruism in his behavior. The main impetus of his presence is him frantically trying to call his relatives and loved ones (even his doctor in the Hamptons) to warn them of an impending alien attack. More interesting than Fierstein's minor role, however, is in the other Jewish character Captain Jimmy Wilder (Harry Connick Jr.). Before the fighting begins, Wilder curiously gives a humorous speech in homage to the Reverend Jesse Jackson, a fierce proponent of liberal multiculturalism. Wilder is Hiller's good friend in the Air Force, and apparently he is the best gunman out of all of them as only he is able to target one of the smaller alien ships. Several of the other fleet members are killed by the aliens and the mission is aborted. Wilder decides to outrun the aliens, or something to that effect, and dies in the process. Now, while the previous deaths do not seem to affect Hiller in the slightest, when Wilder gets shot down, Hiller emits a loud, classic, "Nooooo!" that seems to devalue the previous casualties by placing all the emphasis on the one fighter of noticeably Jewish origin who dies. While it bears mentioning that Hiller and Wilder do have an established friendship, there is camaraderie between all of the soldiers during the mission briefing that seems to suggest a group unity. One can only wonder if the implications run any deeper than the mere mourning of a fallen friend, especially in a military context where emotions would normally be suppressed as a survival technique.

Beyond the ambiguous ideas of Jewish superiority that the smaller roles present in terms of morality and ontological importance, the main Jewish-focused themes develop as a result of the intellectualism behind David and Julius Levinson who both essentially carry the plot of the film. While there are very minor drawbacks to their personalities, such as David's tendency to get airsick or both of their incessant argumentativeness and nagging, both characters are nearly flawless in their actions. Out of all the radio analysts working for the government, David Levinson is the one random schmoe who manages to discover that the aliens are exploiting Earth satellites to relay messages back and forth. This sets up the Levinsons' vital importance to the plot. When they go off to warn the president (Bill Pullman) using high-tech gadgetry for David to contact his estranged wife who just happens to be the advisor for the president, they are allowed to escape with him on a private jet. There, Julius Levinson continues to further the plot by accusing the government of hiding a crashed alien spacecraft in Area 51, which the secretary of defense confirms despite even the president's dismissal of the idea. The entire notion of an old Jewish man instinctively knowing about Area 51 whereas the actual President of the United States does not is Independence Day's best achievement by far. Here, the viewer is treated to a showcase of conspiratorial activity in a highly secretive organization that the president is clearly too incompetent to even be aware of. What are the implications of this? When the president marvels to Julius of such cryptic activities, Julius simply responds, "You don't think they'd spend $20,000 on a hammer, $30,000 on a toilet seat, do you?"

The absurdity gets stronger when David actually speaks to the Area 51 scientists who have been observing this alien spacecraft for decades. Apparently the presence of the mothership has repowered the spacecraft, allowing a few days of serious analysis regarding what each button and switch on the main console does. Nevertheless, the scientists are baffled by the computer code that the ship displays on a monitor of some sort. When David Levinson points out in mere seconds that it is most probably an alien code to facilitate the coordination of their ships, as if it requires any kind of serious depth to see this, the main scientist replies, "You're really starting to make us look bad." In addition to this nonsensical exchange, another one occurs later on where Julius randomly tells David he might catch a cold, which inspires David with the revelatory idea of uploading a virus onto the alien mothership. Of course, the idea is met with initial skepticism despite its obvious effectiveness. The most interesting aspect of all of this is that even the secretive underground government organizations prove to be just as worthless and incompetent as the mainstream ones. Apparently, the government in all of its various forms can benefit immensely from that certain Jewish je ne sais quos.

The film, by this point, has featured David trumping all of the various government-appointed radio analysts by identifying the exploitation of Earth satellites, Julius making a fool of the president by yelling about Area 51, David demeaning the purpose of the Area 51 scientists by recognizing something as simple as alien communication frequencies, and David coming up with the groundbreaking idea of implanting a virus into the alien mothership, which no other government official was able to come up with. But let's explore the treatment of gentiles in the film. One of the most offensive examples is in Russell Casse (Randy Quaid), a Vietnam veteran who supposedly has imagined his own abduction by aliens due to post-traumatic stress disorder. As a crop duster, he is uninspired, unhappy, an alcoholic, and the target of verbal ridicule from his own friends. But when the alien mothership arrives, he is able to assert himself by latching onto his intended role in life, not as a crop duster, but as a tactical killing machine employed by the U.S. Government. Clearly, as the film shows, he is unintelligent and incompetent. Even when he tells the commanding general about his experience of being abducted by aliens, he is greeted with condescension. It is only appropriate that he is the martyr who winds up sacrificing his own pathetic life to destroy the mothership at the end.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

This sort of idea of “returning to your purpose in life” is also explored in the president. Throughout most of the film, he speaks in the sort of whispery, grunty voice that Bill Pullman is known for, with few exceptions. When he finally gives a rabble-rousing speech right before the final attack, however, the whisperiness of his voice is completely gone. He is now a man with purpose, and that purpose is to be a demagogue that promotes violent warfare. Earlier in the film, he makes the strategic blunder of trying to nuke the mothership, the consequences of which go strangely unexplained. Perhaps to make this wrong right, the President himself decides to become one of the fighting masses, so he volunteers to go into a ship and fight himself. He even acknowledges to the general that his true role is as a fighter, not a strategic leader of any kind.

To make the split between gentiles and Jews even more abundantly clear, literally the only form of Christianity that is represented in Independence Day comes about halfway through the film, where an insane paranoid extremist is sitting on top of a pile of rubble, yelling about the apocalypse while pointing to his bible. Near the end of the film, Julius Levinson is sitting in a multicultural circle, warmly reciting a Jewish prayer in Hebrew. When the newly-fired Secretary of Defense says, “I’m not Jewish,” Julius replies, “Not everyone’s perfect.” To the average viewer, this joke would merely be seen as a playful quip and nothing more. With a careful eye, however, this joke actually represents one of the very consistent themes that constantly directs the film. Fighting against the repressive yoke of gentile control, the two Jewish characters manage to intellectually muscle their way out, strategically guiding the gentiles into the right path and using their manpower to save the planet.

There is nothing contradictory about any of the messages in this film. Rather, they fit together very appropriately. The elements of hedonism, multiculturalism, and Jewish superiority combine to form a message advocating what appears to be a Cultural Marxist Globalized McWorld of sorts. This kind of subtle propaganda comes straight from the Free Love Era of the 1960s, molested by a jingoistic neoconservative undercurrent, and put right out for the consumption of the American working class. But what kind of lesson can we derive from a film as technically calculated and devoid of artistic merit as this? Well, as David Levinson shows, the way to defeat the oppressive forces is by using pure information that he injects into a virus. Rather than relying on violence and gunplay, he uses information to ripen the aliens for defeat. It is through this intellect more than anything that David manages to save the world. All information can be used a virus, even Independence Day itself, and if this movie is to be remembered by anyone at all twenty or thirty years in the future, it should be for this reason alone.

-Blind Lame OKB

GODZILLA
GODZILLA

Roland Emmerich° (1998)

To esoterically credit the enigmatic, illustrious Otis Heterosexual, Godzilla (1998) is a largely entertaining film with great performances meaning only Jean Reno is the survivor of this thespian Western kaiju film. Another relic on exhibit are those 90s CGI effects that look rustic by today's standards and tiny Iguana monsters running around, slipping on gumballs, all the while, the Benny Hill theme plays in your head to a certain French extent. Roland Emmerich is a Hollywood trash icon of disaster films, most notably Independence Day, the upcoming 2012, and The Day After Tomorrow. Hailing from Western Germany, this fool has brought us many explosive summer blockbusters but they all lack any form of serenity. At long last, Emmerich seeks to fix this fatal flaw in popcorn films but buttering Godzilla down with that similar tragedy mercy-execution scene that was also visited to a purer effect in King Kong. First understand that this film is an instant action classic of sorts and the casting decision of Jean Reno is to blame. In regards to his performance, It seems that Mr. Reno finally was able to mix his Elvis impersonation perfectly in context while making fun of Western civilization. His roles normally revolve around pro-France outlaws or self-loathing Frenchman. As seen in Flushed Away when telling his squad to make like the French, his team responded swiftly with a bold "We surrender!" Now for Jean Reno's credibility, this native Moroccan action star has worked himself out as a hero to me and I graciously enjoy every single film he has ever appeared in. Yes, even The Pink Panther. So it comes as no surprise to me that I thoroughly enjoyed Godzilla for what it was; Jean Reno driving away from a rabid lizard. Jean Reno is Godzilla's muse and without him, this film would be complete shit for the most part. Godzilla must be seen in a post-Cloverfield atmosphere. It's intended this way with extreme cause. With Cloverfield fresh in my mind, Godzilla's action scenes came as a great nostalgic surprise to me. Enjoying the premature viral advertising of Godzilla, I found the chase scenes to be thrilling and the design of Godzilla to be fundamentally important to the American monster genre. For a PG-13 monster film, I noticed the light-hearted scenes to be followed with the implied ravaging of French agents as being especially dark for the set tone of Godzilla. Like most films depicting a crisis looking to be averted by military action, Godzilla revels in its own excess with corny Military humor and renegade hero soldiers. Kevin Dunn will later move on to play the exact same smartass role in Small Soldiers and Transformers. Godzilla is, as we all know, a hulking reptile on two legs with a series of dorsal plates that magnify (seemingly) radiation to lend power to his atomic breath. When given the rights to this film, the US studios agreed a simple restriction on Godzilla: keep the spirit of Gojira intact. As we can see here, Roland Emmerich completely shat all over their requests, the spirit, and the creature itself. Rather than being seen as a monster, Godzilla is sympathized by Ferris Bueller as an animal suffering from maternal instincts. The idea of A-sexual capabilities definitely adds an obstacle and a precious 30+ minutes but ultimately fails in producing favor from an unsure audience. While most film coming from angry directors is brandished with a rebellious air of nihilism, Emmerich is the kind of angry director that gets heated by his work being critically maligned so he placed spoof characters of Siskel & Ebert as to shut them up. As expected, Godzilla went on to get "Two thumbs down."

Godzilla is a film that deserves the aberrant reaction that has been anchored in by bandwagon buffoons. I can't decide what is worse; the fact that Emmerich admitted to not liking the Godzilla films or the dialogue and casting of Simpsons regulars. Godzilla will never win the heart of the community but might find a hearty home in the eyes of cult film enthusiasts. It's one thing to enjoy a "bad" movie every now and again but to appreciate a film based on its reverse reception is ridiculous. Rebelling against rebellion will ultimately counter counterproductivity. In a way, I enjoyed the Godzilla film for the enthusiastic destruction of a playground known as New York but other than that, this film is carried on the shoulders of Jean Reno. I don't think I could handle sitting through this film for another 4 years though. Consider Roland Emmerich a provocateur of the present age.

-mAQ

THE PATRIOT
THE PATRIOT

Roland Emmerich° (2000)

As one of 26 signatories to the Oberhausen Manifesto of 1962, which marked the 'official' launch of the New German Cinema aka Neuer Deutscher Film against "Papas Kino," auteur Alexander Kluge – a Frankfurt school lawyer turned filmmaker who traded trades at the recommendation of Theodor W. Adorno (who, in turn, introduced Kluge to Fritz Lang, thus enabling Kluge to work as an assistant on the 1959 The Tiger of Eschnapur and learn the tricks of the trade from one of the masters) – acted as a sort of 'father figure' filmmaker for the fellow filmmakers of his generation, including Rainer Werner Fassbinder, thus inevitably resulting in the omnibus film Germany in Autumn (1978) aka Deutschland im Herbst; a politically-charged work featuring film contributions from eight Teuton directors (including Kluge, Fassbinder, Edgar Reitz and Volker Schlöndorff) responding to the dubious deaths of far-left terrorists belonging to the RAF aka Baader-Meinhof gang, who had purportedly committed suicide in a heavily secure prison, as well as the future of Germany as a whole. With his segment for Germany in Autumn, Kluge would introduce the character of Gabi Teichert (Hannelore Hoger); a historian of Hessian history and proud Aryaness who attempts to dig deeper and deeper (both literally and figuratively as an amateur archeologist with a spade and as a studied scholar and history teacher) into Germany's past so as to discover 'positive' secrets from 2000 years of Teutonic history. Gabi Teichert would also be the lead protagonist in Kluge's subsequent film The Patriotic Woman (1979) aka Die Patriotin aka The Patriot – an anti-climatic and anti-melodramatic drama-documentary hybrid utilizing a constructivist method of montage as a means to distance the viewer from tragedy, action, and, well, entertainment – which follows a proud German patriot and 'dreamer of the day' who slowly but surely falls into an abyss of bitter disappointment where she comes to learn through trial and error that, whether she wants to admit it to herself or not, there is no definitive German history, but an inherent antagonism between public and personal history. A special lady who takes an "interest in all the dead of the Reich," including those who fought for the Third Reich, and who fanatically believes that, "the material for advanced history lessons isn't positive enough because our German history isn't positive enough either," hence her personal crusade to change that, Teichert is ultimately upstaged by the historical lessons of a dead 'talking knee' (inspired by Bavarian author/poet Christian Morgenstern's marvelously morbid poet "The Knee") that used to belong to an unfortunate fellow named Corporal Wieland, who belonged to the ill-fated 6th Army (the first German field army to be totally destroyed in WWII) of the Wehrmacht and who fell at the battle of Stalingrad on January 29, 1943, but as narrated in the film, all that was left of the fallen fellow was, "nothing more than a knee. It is not a tree, it is not a tent, nothing else.” A cinematic work directed by a German man who was born in 1932 and thus remembers the Third Reich, as well as his hometown and family home being blown to bits by British bombers during the Second World War, The Patriot is an ostensibly guilt-ridden celluloid work that, quite undoubtedly, shamelessly and aesthetically sterilely wallows in Kluge’s Jewish mentor’s super absurd remark that, “Writing poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric,” but at least the director has the gall to admit that there is no such thing as a definitive account of history.

In a somewhat recent interview from 20 February 2012 entitled “I am a patriot of the 20s”: An Interview with Alexander Kluge” conducted by Candace Wirt, Kluge stated the following regarding his film The Patriot (1979) and being a ‘collector’ of history like Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm (who appear in the film): “A poet is always a collector. You have to find something. You do not have to invent reality, but to find reality. In the 30s and 40s, there was the Holocaust in our country. It is necessary to dig for the reasons and to dig deeper and deeper and deeper. You can’t carry on with the poetry of ancient times. You have to find these ancient times. Where are the roots of criminal behavior? And then there may also be roots for the remedy.” Indeed, while I am rather surprised that Kluge thinks of himself as a poet, I am not the least bit shocked that the Holocaust is his frame of reference and inspiration for analyzing history, as if all moments in German history were leading up to a genocidal racial holy war against foreign peoples whose influences on the Teutons has been mostly rather recent (basically, a couple centuries). An eternal ethno-masochist who was, quite involuntarily, one of ‘Hitler’s children,’ being from the generation that knew nothing but National Socialism, at least until 1945 when his nation was reduced to nothing more than a “Tot Reich” of rubble and regret, Kluge has assembled a work with The Patriot that, more than anything, basks in the personal misery of German history, albeit in an ironically intentionally mundane and monotone sort of way, as envisioned by a deleterious deconstructivist auteur of the anti-Occidental Frankfurt school persuasion who firmly associates films with a “magical” (i.e. being entertaining) quality as being of a manipulative National Socialist persuasion. A fiercely fragmented film directed by a man who is clearly more obsessed with the dead than the living, The Patriot intentionally establishes a deep divide between the spectator and the film’s protagonist by using abrupt voice-over narration (from Kluge himself), documentary and vintage footage, silent film style inter-titles, paintings by Caspar David Friedrich, a poster from the anti-Polish National Socialist propaganda film Heimkehr (1941) aka Homecoming directed by Gustav Ucicky (who is ironically believed to be the bastard son of Austrian symbolist painter Gustav Klimt), and even archetypal images from Hindu cosmology, as a means to illustrate the subjectivity and complexity of history, as well as to deter too much empathy for Gabi Teichert, but especially her cause for a patriotic pro-German history. Like Teichert, who wants to “change history” and attempts to do so by attending SPD (Social Democratic Party of Germany; a rather unlikely place to find individuals fond of German history) political conventions and doing illegal archeological digging to find positive raw 'historical material,' only to be disappointed in the end, the viewer must come to terms with the fact that the land of the romantics, thinkers, and philosophers is not so romantic, but barbaric and even philistine, with its history of dehumanization and death of its populous at the hands of the state, but also, as narrated by Kluge, that, "At the time of this emperor [Napoleon I], the scholars Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm dug intensively into German history. They dug and dug and unearthed the fairy tales. Their content: how a people deals with its wishes over a period of 800 years," thus resulting in some 'positive' aesthetic byproducts. Of course, in contemporary Germany, it seems that Auschwitz has replaced Grimm's fairy tales, just as defeat, guilt, and self-hatred has replaced a national conscious and kultur. In The Patriot, there is no 'volkgeist,' but instead, the expressions of an over-intellectualized dead soul whose fear of national identity is no less grand than his hostility toward celluloid beauty, because as a shabbos goy and Frankfurt school victim, Kluge is one of those individuals who personify Albert Camus' words, "Those who lack the courage will always find a philosophy to justify it," of which anti-Aryan academic, antagonistic ausländer, and all-around agitator Adorno happily provided to him.

THE PATRIOT

Indeed, The Patriot is undoubtedly a film that must be seen multiples times to be digested properly, but that presupposes that it is a cinematic work that is worth seeing in the first place, which is dubious at best, unless you happen to be a 'true believer' whose doctrine is that somewhere in proximity with the 'New Left,' or someone who wants to understand how the contemporary, ethno-masochistic German artistic/academic thinks and feels. At the conclusion of The Patriot, Kluge even went as far as pure obfuscation of meaning, stating in regarding to a scene of the 'talking knee' speaking in the dead language of Latin that, "When the knee speaks Latin, I do not at all assume that anyone understands that, at least not anyone who interests me as a viewer," thus highlighting (if one does their homework), in a needlessly esoteric way, a time when knowledge of history was restricted to a small minority of individuals. Of course, today history has been 'democratized,' at least to some extent (but certainly not in Germany and many other European nations where it is a criminal offense to disagree with certain elements of 20th century history, especially the sort that Kluge has spent his life and career dwelling on), but as demonstrated by protagonist Gabi Teichert of The Patriot, who, "was sure the material for history lessons at the advanced level was deficient," people tend to believe the version of history they want to believe, or at least the version of history that has been beat into their brain since birth because, after all, no one enjoys cognitive dissonance. Although, as narrated in The Patriot that, "It's hard to present a patriotic version of German history," things would be quite different if Germany had won the Second World War, as it is quite doubtful that the "The Holocaust" would still be described as the most horrible and tragic event in human history, as it is today as a result of the victor's version of history becoming the 'official' history of the Second World War. Probably not. If Germany had won the war, the Holocaust (which would undoubtedly not be called "The Holocaust"; with the phrase itself not being actively promoted until the mid-1970s by American/Israeli Zionist circles) would probably be portrayed as a noble and necessary campaign against a hostile enemy, if mentioned at all, but few are willing to question the subjectivity of history, not even Alexander Kluge. If The Patriot does anything of value, it is opening up the viewer's mind to the complexity and indefiniteness of history in a variety of both personal and political ways. For example, early on in The Patriot, documentary footage of British bomber pilots who, "have not learned anything definite about Germany. They have just expertly shot up the country for eighteen hours. Now they are returning to their quarter to sleep," but they are quite proud of the fact that "Total 950 Kaput Krauts" (i.e. they killed 950 Germans) despite their lack of understanding of German people, kultur, and history because their context for 'understanding' the country's history is that of defeating an enemy nation and not understanding it on any personal or 'objective' academic level. Of course, Kluge, who personally experienced the terror bombings of the British, sees that particular history from a totally different perspective.

In the end, the closest the viewer ever gets to personally 'knowing' Gabi Teichert is by seeing her naked body from the perverted perspective of a peeping Tom with insomnia, thereupon underscoring the voyeuristic and scopophilic quality of cinema itself. Rather absurdly, Ms. Teichert, being a virtual victim of patriotic psychosis, sees the peeping Tom's actions as "contemporary research" and not all that different from her own as a historical researcher, thus baffling the viewer with her rather odd perspective on being the victim of a unsavory sexual degenerate who rapes women with his eyes via binoculars. In short, at least as far as The Patriot is concerned, 'perspective is everything' when it comes to history. At the end of The Patriot, it is revealed that, "Every New Year's Eve, Gabi Teichert reflects on the 365 days had. The hope remains for improving the material for advanced history in the coming year," even if, "The Hessen Culture Ministry wants to abolish history altogether. And combine it with geography and government to make 'social studies'."

As Corporal Wieland states in The Patriot, "In the name of the dead of Germany and the 6th Army, I'd now like to express my principle views. If everyone can speak, so can I. A dead knee sees things a bit differently. For example, Bismarck, who is said to have made history...Often I'm asked where I learned so much. It's a mistake to think that the printed matter in libraries is related to history. We, the dead and their parts, are history. Every cell that doesn't want to die knows everything, from the beginning right to the very end. Only the quarrelsome brain doesn't. We dead cells know everything and have reason to. The resurrection of the dead, and who really wants to die, presupposes a thorough knowledge of history. Basically I'm a historical expert. Other dead colleagues refer to me as the 'Father of Accuracy,' but he also later admits, "Note that a knee strides forward in principle. Over 2,000 km to Stalingrad, it bends and stretches every half metre, directed by an obstinate brain that's still there and has no more to say. Some say I use the word 'principle' too much. Quite right. It's a habit I picked up from Corporal Wieland's brain. I always said 'principle' when it was under pressure. I myself have no principles, just a firm will to survive." Holocaust survivor, novelist, and Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel certainly has principles, but one can only wonder what account of history his circumcised member has to tell or at least the members of his racial kinsmen, at least judging by the original Yiddish version of his novel Night (1955) where the writer reveals that certain concentration camp survivors ran off to "fargvaldikh dayshe shikses" ("rape German shikses" aka "impure German women") so as to seek Jewish revenge for aggressive Nazi antisemitism. That being said, if one were to use Kluge's The Patriot as a guide for interpreting history, one can only guess the historical value of films like Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993) and Saving Private Ryan (1998), but something tells me that the director's friend/mentor Theodor W. Adorno had already made up his mind on such historical matters and would give the films his full approval, at least judging by his rather subjective and exceedingly emotional quote, "Writing poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric." If Kluge considers himself a poet and his film The Patriot is, in turn, a work of celluloid poetry, I guess then, at least going by Adorno's logic, the filmmaker is a kraut barbarian.

THE PATRIOT

Even in his self-loathing, Alexander Kluge was still able to reveal, if only to a minor extent, the taboo historical truth in terms of Germany's collective suffering during the Second World War, which Hollywood has never and will never acknowledge, and for that alone, he deserves some minor praise. During a segment of The Patriot featuring documentary footage of bomber pilots dropping bombs on a German city and burning buildings during a literal "Holocaust" (burnt offering) scenario, the voice-over narrator states: "Let us not forget that sixty thousand people burned to death in Hamburg." Although the historical record shows that more Germans than Jews died in the Second World War, not to mention the millions that died after the war during Stalin's expulsion of ethnic Germans from Eastern Europe and the starvation of German POWs by various allied nations, who is willing to acknowledge it?! Until Germany and other European nations come to terms with less than comforting aspects of their own histories and rediscover their roots, Europa will continue to decay until all that is left is a 'multicultural,' alien-conquered corpse and one does not need to be a patriotic philistine to acknowledge this truth.

-Ty E

10,000 BC

Roland Emmerich° (2008)

Movies like 10,000 BC just absolutely disgust me. I can just imagine director Roland Emmerich sitting in his lair and counting his gold coins that he suckered out of American audiences hands. He knows that the audience is braindead and whatever crap he makes people will see. 10,000 BC features some of the most hideous mongrelized people I have ever seen in my life. Why anyone would want to see these people in a movie is beyond me. 10,000 BC is another one of those hollow epics that pretend to be reflecting history. Warlords wouldn't wait days to rape their victims. Savage soldiers still practice gang rape regularly. I guess that virtual savages featured in the film had a moral code that they placed a firm commitment on. Roland Emmerich proved his disdainful hatred towards reality with his pluralistic propaganda "piece" Independence Day. The only white character in 10,000 BC was killed. He is an old man hidden behind colorful tattered rags to give him a "larger than life" power. When the savage protagonist kills the man it confirms that old man's power is an illusion. Emmerich's reason for this scene is to promote riots in American cities and the destruction of "whity". After the white man is killed, all the savages go ape shit and start killing like crazy. Emmerich portrays them as impulsive yet "noble" animals. 10,000 BC even fails at it's attempts in showman special effects. The CGI mammoths were pathetic to say the least. A lady friend I know was disappointed in the lack of saber -toothed tigers. She felt the savages should have been ripped to pieces by the tiger. The only exciting scene in 10,000 BC was when the hideous "old mother" finally kicks the bucket. It was only appropriate on Emmerich's part to finally put old mother out of her aesthetically unpleasing misery. When American high school students get their education history lessons from Hollywood fantasies, the world will crumble. May Roland Emmerich lead the citizens of the world into hell.

-Ty E

BÜBCHEN
BÜBCHEN

Roland Klick (1968)

The subject of deranged children and childkillers oftentimes makes for radically ridiculous and absurdly nonsensical films, especially when treated in a straight and serious fashion with a cheap, contrived, and oftentimes sentimental pseudo-moralistic message tacked on at the end, but at least one cinematic work that I know of, the Western German flick Bübchen (1968) aka Little Boy aka Der kleine Vampir aka The Little Vampire directed by lone-wolf auteur Roland Klick (Deadlock, Supermarkt), manages to handle this uniquely unsettling subject in a fashion that neither preaches a superficial social message, nor treats it in a less than serious and stoic manner yet still manages to be unwaveringly enthralling in its depiction of the seemingly everyday human child as a coldblooded killer. Rather unpopular with film critics in West Germany upon its release due to its uncompromising lack of a then-vogue far-left social critique and Trotskyite finger-pointing, Bübchen is a sort of neo-realist 'horror' flick minus genre conventions that gives the audience a cinéma vérité-like view of the seemingly chaotic post-WWII German lower-middleclass and how such a seemingly typical yet innately dysfunctional community deals with the tragic mysterious disappearance of a cute little 2-year-old blonde girl. Apparently inspired by a true story Roland Klick read about in the newspaper, the filmmaker managed to pen the script for Bübchen in a mere 16 hours and planned to shoot in black-and-white. Luckily, the film was shot in color as it manages to capture the grim and colorless, foreboding Teutonic post-industrial wasteland it portrays, where all the adults spend all their time getting drunk and the children are always involved in some barbaric feral-like activity that often results in the senseless destruction of something or other. Like Ulli Lommel's serial killer masterpiece Tenderness of the Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe and many films of German New Cinema—a nationalist film movement Roland Klick was typically an aesthetic and sociopolitical opponent of—Bübchen is essentially a 'horror-of-personality' work mostly shot from the perspective of the prepubescent perpetrator, thereupon making it all the more disconcerting. Sort of like Baby's Day Out (1994) as directed by TCM-era Tobe Hooper meets Michael Haneke's Benny's Video (1992), although never plodding and infinitely more cinematically entertaining, Bübchen portrays a drastically degenerating Deutschland where parents are more occupied with beer cans in their hand than their children, thus they can only panic and create cockeyed theories about 'sexual predators' when a wee baby disappears.

9-year-old Teutonic preteen Achim (Sascha Urchs) is not like other children, especially boys, to the point where he lies to his friends so as to avoid actually hanging out with them. Seeming to suffer from Asperger syndrome with schizoid tendencies and consistently maintaining a fiercely flat affect, Achim

pathologically plays with a toy monkey on a rope and seems to prefer the indoors to the outdoors and personal privacy to playing with others kids his age. When his parents make the mistake of allowing a ditzy pixie bitch of a teenager girl named Monika Behm (Renate Roland)—a girl that looks a cross between title character of Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970) and Bjork with an androgynous boyish fashion sense borrowed from Twiggy—to watch Achim, as well as his baby sister, it ultimately results in what will be the most terrible day of their lives. Unbeknownst to Achim's parents, Monika is a slutty and superlatively self-centered girl who has no qualms about ditching the kids she is supposed to be babysitting to be sexually manhandled by a young man much older than herself. Like the pathetic segment of Mondo cane (1962) featuring a bunch of decidedly drunk krauts drowning in their sorrow in the Reeperbahn Strasse of Hamburg, Achim's parents, especially his father (Sieghardt Rupp), are loser boozers who manage to keep a semblance of lower-middleclass normality, but it all comes crashing down via the painful death of their child that no amount of alcohol will numb. After the parents leave the house and babysitter Monika follows not long after to fornicate in a car with her mechanic boyfriend Otto Borowski (Jürgen Jung), Achim decides to take a couple seemingly innocent photographs of his baby sister, but not longer after the boy has the bright idea to place a plastic bag over the helpless girl's head, thus leading to her premature death via rather sickening soricide. Wasting no time to take full advantage of his lack of adult supervision, Achim also plays 'peeping Tom' and watches his babysitter Monika and her much older boy toy Otto screwing in a purple car, which the boy subsequently enters and steals the babysitter's bra as a souvenir. When Achim's parents come home, they soon notice that their baby daughter is missing and the calculating child killer offers to help support the ultimately futile cause to find his sister. Meanwhile, Monika, who does not want anyone to know she is a teenage tramp who only cares about herself, denies she ever left the home, but soon police get involved and the holes in her personal testimony are exposed. The cold and calculating Achim strategically makes up a lie that he saw a shady young man with a purple car on the day of his sister's appearance, which ultimately makes Monika's boyfriend Otto, who owns a similarly colored car, a suspect. Of course, this leads the police to realizing that Monika was screwing Otto in his automobile when she was supposed to be watching Achim's sister. Monika's father Erich Behm (Hubert Suschka), who accepts and oftentimes even seems to relish the fact his daughter is a little floozy, comes to the natural conclusion that Achim was probably involved with his sister's disappearance and tell the children's parents such. Not wanting to accept the fact their child is probably a deranged little dude, which is quite obvious to anyone looking at the seemingly soulless and monotone fellow, Achim's parents kick out the Behm family, who happened to be their best friends. Of course, Achim's father, who probably knows his son better than anyone else, investigates the local junkyard where the boy plays and where Monika got laid, where he discovers the blanket-draped corpse of his only daughter. Instead of going to police and accepting responsibility for what happened, the man gets rid of his baby girl's body, but his son finally gives into pressure and admits the crime to police detectives. Of course, when Achim is taken to where he dumped his sister's corpse, the body is nowhere to be found due to his father's dubious disposing of it in a coal mine shaft. In the end, the illusion of middleclass normality is restored to the German town and a less than proud father must forever live with the fact that his son is the cold-blooded murderer of his very own sister. After everything is said and done, Achim, who has a similarly emotionless stare to matricidal mass murder/child killer Adam Lanza, seems not even the least bit affected by what he has done, but seems all the more dangerous due to successfully getting away with the most sickening sort of crime.

BÜBCHEN

Like Clu Gulager's kaleidoscopic arthouse horror short A Day with the Boys (1969) and both cinematic adaptations of William Golding's Lord of the Flies (1954), Bübchen went where few films have gone before nor after by portraying the seemingly innocent child as a killer, but unlike the other three cinematic works, Klick's realistically creepy kraut 'coming-of-age' flick never attempts to blame anyone for the prepubescent perpetrator's dubious mental state, which is thankfully never explained nor intellectually dwelt upon, but simply portrayed in as objective a manner as possible. Still, in its sort of then-contemporary anti-Heimatfilm depiction of blue collar Germans as boorish beer-binging bastards who avoid uncomfortable realities at any cost, Bübchen is certainly a quasi-crypto condemnation of a nation that, not unlike a number of Fassbinder's flicks, especially The Merchant of Four Seasons (1972) and Jail Bait (1973) aka Wildwechsel, portrays a working-class people that are both unable to handle their emotions and especially the truth, so they simply act out in rather irrational and ultimately deleterious fashions, albeit in Klick's flick, things go back to 'normal again,' thus making it all the more unnerving. An unflinchingly fucked celluloid family affair for the tradition-less and unguided post-Nazi generation, Bübchen is a look at the Teutonic collective conscious through the maniacal microcosm of a deranged demon seed whose act of killing his own baby sister was no more significant to him than pulling a weed.

Hoping to direct his acid western Deadlock first, Roland Klick described in the documentary Das Kino des Roland Klick (1997) aka The Cinema of Roland Klick how he got around to directing Bübchen as follows, "For a while I was Fellini's gopher, I was desperate, and drove to Rome. I tried to get a hold of myself there, and got to work with Fellini on "Satyricon." And it was there that I imagined the "Bübchen" story. Which is a small story, really. And the small scope of the story reflects my own modest means, in a way." Indeed, with its gritty lower-middleclass 'Germanic' realism and rather documentarian-like perspective, Bübchen is not only about as far away as one could get from Fellini's big budget's myth-driven surrealist works, but also director Roland Klick's own much more popular counter-culture cinematic works like Deadlock, Supermarkt, and White Star. Indeed, Bübchen is like a work of German New Cinema, except with a much bigger soul, if not a decidedly despairing one, which is rather ironic since the work was apparently not given its proper due and actually never received the popularity it deserved until it was re-released under the misleading title Der kleine Vampir aka The Little Vampire. As Klick stated regarding critics' initial panning of Bübchen yet its subsequent popularity as a work that, unlike many left-leaning works of German New Cinema, has stood the test of time, "That's the way it was...Purely for the reason that the film had classical aesthetics, told a simple story...It is told psychologically, too. The character's actions are very palpable. But it didn't interpret it in a socially critical way. It didn't point an accusing finger. And all of that was out of fashion, so to say, back then. But that's why my films are still popular today." A film by Dutch-German cinematographer-turned-filmmaker Robert van Ackeren (Blondie's Number One, A Woman in Flames), who also shot important and artistically groundbreaking films directed by Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Salome) and Rosa von Praunheim (It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives), Bübchen is a nearly immaculate anomaly among German cinema by a kraut cult filmmaker who managed to make a sort of accidental hybrid between the (anti)Heimatfilm and German New Cinema, except making it highly palatable for both proletarian and pretentious art fags alike, something that Austrian auteur Michael Haneke has yet to accomplish in all of his career of trying. If you ever wanted to watch the sort of celluloid work that realistically portrays the sort of kid that kills, there is probably no better example than Bübchen, arguably 'un-German' German auteur Roland Klick's most distinctly 'German' film.

-Ty E

DEADLOCK
DEADLOCK

Roland Klick (1970)

As probably anyone who regularly reads this site knows, I have a general apathy towards Westerns of most persuasions, so any film that I do happen to like from this absurdly anachronistic and outmoded genre tends to be of the convention-extermimating, cowboy-less, and aesthetically antagonistic, acid and/or arthouse sort and the West German, psychedelic Western Deadlock (1970) directed by Roland Klick (Supermarkt, White Star) is certainly not the sort of cowboys and Indians movie your slaphappy grandpappy watched to get inspired to kill krauts during the Second World War. With endorsement from surrealist Acid Western master Alejandro Jodorowsky, who stated, "DEADLOCK is fantastic. A bizarre, glowing film," it has the backing of a man who essentially raped and deconstructed the genre, but unlike El Topo (1970), Klick's film is not shrouded in esoteric symbolism and messianic-like self-glorification. As a filmmaker who once vehemently stated, "We're not supposed to make films like Alexander Kluge for the fine people in the ivory tower!" and someone who was disdained in his homeland by fellow filmmakers and film critics due to his intrinsically action-packed and anti-intellectual works, Klick was striving for something more 'subconscious' (his admitted initial approach when creating a film) and adventurous with his films and Deadlock does just that, but with a completely corrupted, counter-culture flare as if directed by a German working-class Donald Cammell. Although ostensibly set in Mexico on the border of California, Deadlock was actually filmed in Negev Desert, Israel during the chaotic aftermath of the Six-Day War in a rather rare case where a film set was a virtual battlefield, which Klick described as follows, "DEADLOCK...was one big incredible adventure. There had just been a war...They were still there, barrels pointed! Jordan was over here, Israel was over there...The mountains were full of cannons. And right between all that, in no man's land, was our shooting location...We were really shooting right between two fronts! The whole venture...also because there wasn't much money..an incredible adventure...I think this power really translated to the adventure onscreen. It's a film of its own!" And, indeed, love it or loathe, Deadlock permeates an all-powerful, transcendental atmosphere that is somewhere in between Arcadia and the apocalypse as if Werner Herzog were attempting to remake Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972) as a Western, but decided to drop all the Thelemic/Crowleyite imagery and replaced it with a sun-washed babe named Mascha Rabben in a border-less abyss of desert decay. Featuring a highly complementary musical score by early krautrock group Can, Deadlock is a völkisch work of the psychedelic anarchist sort that proves that at least one kraut auteur was able to more than competently adopt the Western genre in an Aryan acidhead form, thereupon making Roland Klick the virtual Fidus of post-WWII Teutonic filmmaking, yet with an agile spirit no less impressive than Austrian adventurist auteur Luis Trenker. A particularly penetrating piece of 'scorched earth' celluloid, Deadlock lets the viewer know that sometimes sun-worship can blur one's vision and mind, and can even cause sadism-stirring sunburn. Needless to say, John Wayne and John Ford would find themselves in hell (if they aren't already there) were they to view Klick's Deadlock – a positively potent post-totenkopf 'trip' ironically set in the Hebraic holy land.

A young American killer named Kid (kraut cult actor Marquard Bohm of Rote Sonne (1970) aka Red Sun and Fassbinder's Beware of a Holy Whore (1971)) with a bullet in his arm lies dying in a barren and arid Mexican desert with a total population of three people. He and his comrade Anthony "The Old Killer" Sunshine (Scotsman Anthony Dawson of Hitchcock's Dial M for Murder (1954) and Dr. No (1962)) carried out a robbery that earned them a million dollars cash, but while making a would-be-great escape, Kid was shot in the arm and he believes his callous co-conspirator may have done the shooting, thus he fled to a depopulated desert via train-hopping where he believed no one would possibly look for him, but rather unfortunately, someone does find him during a moment of complete and utter vulnerability. While lying unconscious, Kid is discovered by a goofy guido-like fellow named Charles "The Rat" Dump (German-Italian actor Mario Adorf of The Tin Drum (1979) aka Die Blechtromme and Fassbinder's Lola (1981)) who noticed the young man's Mauser (the same model used to build Han Solo's blaster in Star Wars) and briefcase full of tons of cash. Mr. Dump is about to smash Kid's skull in with a boulder and take the money and run, but the lanky, longhaired youth begins to move and the potential murderer has second thoughts. Dump – a rather pathetic and cowardly dolt with somewhat of a kind, albeit crude and corrupted, heart – takes the Kid back to his shack-like home. Dump conspires how he can take over the cash, but as a blatantly broken man who makes the baseless claim that he is in charge of the law of the land as a representative of the "North American Mining Company," which is clearly dead as the desert soil, he is clearly no match for the Kid, nor his pernicious partner Sunshine. A 'poor man's Clint Eastwood,' albeit more gritty and ugly, Sunshine is a stoic sadist who is looking for the Kid, so he can get the cash, but the lad and his new partner Mr. Dump are waiting for an inevitable showdown with a rather unpredictable outcome where one winner takes all. Dump may be the master of his derelict desert domain, but he also has a sexually repressed and belligerently bitchy old lady named Corinna (Betty Segal) – an erratic ex-prostitute with saddlebags for thighs that no one wants to screw anymore, hence her perverse proclivity towards flashing her grotesque racks of spoiled meat at Kid – and their salacious and super sensitive yet seemingly stupid spawn, a stunningly statuesque daughter named Jessy (Mascha Rabben) who is a naughty nymphomaniac that roams around his humble abode like a dog in heat. Dump's personal dump of a home used to be an "Oasis in the Desert" with a wild whorehouse stock full of tasty meat and sand-side gambling, but the only thing left now is a couple dreary and dilapidated buildings and signs that constitute a desert ghetto and seem like a degenerate, ghost town version of Madame Kate's pussy-peddling enterprise in East of Eden (1955) directed by Elia Kazan and starring James Dean. When Sunshine finally shows up, he tries to get doofus Dump to lure the Kid into a treacherous trap, but the tables are inevitably turned as the ex-pimp does not know how to keep his 'cool' and makes a number of failed attempts at coldheartedly killing and conning the old killer, which will ultimately cost him his life in the end. Naturally, jackass Dump is no match for the two robbers as he has the decided disposition of a hyper-horny donkey with rabies. While Sunshine meticulously tortures Dump in a variety of ways, including using him for target practice and chasing him with his own beaten up truck, the Kid gets ready to make his move for the money in a battle between old school 'cool' and new school 'cool.' In Deadlock, the will to power and the struggle for survival go hand in a world of abject isolation of both the physical and psychological kind.

DEADLOCK

An aggressive 'lone wolf' at aesthetic civil war with the arthouse auteur filmmakers of New German Cinema, Roland Klick offered cinematic works that did not bore nor patronize the proletarian viewer, but instead offered instinctual, anti-intellectual cinema with hearty meat and bones that made stylish celluloid art and social controversy palatable for the masses, without making any artistic compromises in the process. In the documentary Das Kino des Roland Klick (1997) aka The Cinema of Roland Klick, Klick stated the following in regard to the perceived lack of 'German' character of his films, "And now the question would be: What is German? Why do films look German?...In essence, films look German for the following reason: They don't take the risk of the unknown, of the unexplained, hence: of the magical, which is constructed by the imagination. They have the tendency to over-explain every element. Not only verbally, but also visually...I choose these locations subconsciously, at first...I'm a big fan of secrets." And indeed, Deadlock is steeped with an innate mystifying character from the bloody beginning to the even bloodier end. A marvelously metaphysical work, although of the nihilistic and nefarious sort, Deadlock brings a soul to a badly beaten-to-death genre that, quite ironically, was only able to obtain artistic merit when it was imported to a foreign continent, with Klick's Western being one of the furthest away in spirit from the likes of Irish-American propagandist John Ford. While borrowing thematic and aesthetic attributes from Spaghetti Westerns by dirty dago auteurs like Sergio Leone and Sergio Corbucci, Deadlock is its own beast and a blond one at that, dancing in the face of death and embracing human darkness, heart and soul, in the bitter yet ultimately stoical end. While Klick has been besmirched and condemned by his fellow countrymen for the perceived lack of 'German' character of his films, I would argue that Deadlock more than assertively permeates the forlorn Faustian spirit of the 6th Army (Wehrmacht) Stalingrad, but especially the Afrika Korps, as a rare work of post-WWII Teutonic cinema with an uncompromising masculinity and testicular fortitude of a seasoned soldier as opposed to the accepted defeat of an effete 'auteur' sitting in an ivory tower. Most importantly, at least philosophically speaking, Deadlock is not a work that meekly wallows in pity, defeat, and forgiveness, but, on the contrary, is a renegade piece of relentless and poetic celluloid barbarism and Teutonic irrationalism that reminds the viewer to "never forget" that life is a war and those not strong enough or willing enough to accept it are better off dead.

-Ty E

SUPERMARKT
SUPERMARKT

Roland Klick (1974)

While I appreciate the fact that the auteur filmmakers of German New Cinema opted for creating revolutionary cinematic works that were thematically and aesthetically antagonistic against "Papas Kino" and Hollywood, I would be lying if I did not admit that I have complete and utter respect for anti-intellectual auteur Roland Klick (Bübchen, White Star) for rebelling against his more cultivated and philosophical countrymen by creating gritty action films that remind viewers that not all krauts had their testicles stomped in after the Second World War. While his anarchistic psychedelic western Deadlock (1970) will always be my favorite work of truly brutal celluloid grit from the avant-garde action auteur Klick, his subsequent cinematic work Supermarkt (1974) – a fierce and unflinching flick centering around a fucked teen rebel who lives on the streets of Hamburg and who gets involved with dubious smalltime crooks, jaded journalists, posh poofs, and less than pretty prostitutes – is no less enthralling with its gusty guerrilla style direction, suave subversiveness, and decidedly busted moral compass. Described by its distribution company filmgalerie451 as being, "Between 'The French Connection' and 'Rebel Without A Cause', 'Supermarket' is rightfully regarded as a cult classic of German cinema," Supermarkt is indeed an uncompromising crossbreed between action-packed nihilism and sexually and morally confused teen rebellion that does to action-crime flicks and the city of Hamburg – a place that seems to have only superficially recovered from the firebombings it experienced during the Second World War – what Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel directed by Daniel Schmid did for campy and morbid melodrama and the seemingly shitty city of Frankfurt. A more immaculate yet no less brassy depiction of the unruly criminal subcultures of Hamburg as portrayed in Klaus Lemke's cult flick Rocker (1972), Supermarkt depicts a spiritually and socially devitalized post-industrial hellhole where both criminals and everyday citizens are colder than death, posh pederasts pay top dollar for teenage twinkles and homely hookers peddle their putrefied pussies to support their forsaken bastard children, love is not even worthy of being described as an illusion, and journalists are more interested in hanging out with outlaws than their wives and work. Featuring groundbreaking cinematography from Jošt Vacano, who would later provide his talents to Das Boot (1981) directed by Wolfgang Petersen and Robocop (1987), as well as virtually every other Paul Verhoeven flick, Supermarkt is arguably the first film to feature Steadicam-style camera work despite predating the release of the official Steadicam by two years, thus making for a hypnotic form of action cinema that throws the viewer into a Teutonic ghetto of erratic ecstasy and audaciously afflicting angst. If Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981), which director Roland Klick was originally supposed to direct before he was fired by producer Bernd Eichinger, had a filmic big brother that was not addicted to heroin, it is most certainly Supermarkt – a crusty yet charismatic celluloid story from the seedy city streets that treats aimless crime as a crude yet compulsory way of life.

Willi (played by non-actor Charly Wierzejewski in his first film role) has a wayward way of life as a handsome yet homeless teenage-rebel-by-default who must do whatever he needs to survive while dogging Hamburg cops and much more corrupt criminals, including thieving and prostituting himself to despicable degenerates of the independently wealthy sort. During the beginning of Supermarkt, Willi runs away from the police for what seems to be no reason at all as he has committed no crime, but he is arrested any way and he and another teenage troublemaker make a getaway from the crowded police station, almost running over a cop with a stolen car in the process, thus ushering in the Weltschmerz-ridden anti-hero's life as a feral-like fugitive of the law. To make ends meet, Willi has united with a highly manipulative middle-aged career criminal named Theo (Walter Kohut) who devises a pathetic scheme where the boy pretends to be a hustler and lures in wealthy homosexuals so the twosome can beat and rob them. Of course, being a rather empathetic fellow for a criminally-inclined teenage thug, Willi botches the plan and allows the John to escape and ends up brutally beating Theo in the process. The same homosexual (Hans-Michael Rehberg) offers Willi a ride in his car and the teen makes the mistake of accepting it and is ultimately sadistically sodomized by the affluent fairy who lives in an art-adorned manor with his Mommy. When Willi later attempts to collect the money he earned for reluctantly allowing the prick of a poofster to anally penetrate him, things go wrong when the fudge-packer makes the fatal error of belittling the boy due to his blatant lack of social prestige, henceforth resulting in the fickle fairy's gruesome death. Although playing wide receiver on the pink team, Willi falls in love with a less than pretty prostitute named Monika (Fassbinder graduate Eva Mattes) who sports a tasteless blonde wig and a greasy pizza face full of unflattering zits. Although Willi's willy fails to 'rise to the occasion' during an intimate moment with Monika, the prostitute loves the young hoodlum because he treats her little boy in a fatherly fashion and she has yet to meet another man that displays such gentlemanly behavior. Willi is also helped by an idealistic journalist named Frank (Michael Degen) whose wife resents the boy and the oddly obsessive interest her husband shows to him, but the young mensch cannot completely trust the career scribbler as a teenage murderer and fugitive of the law who is on the run, so he seeks sanctuary elsewhere. A radically romantic lady's man, Willi hatches a master criminal plot with the philistine thug Theo to rob a supermarket's money transporter, but with the cops circling in on him and with a drunken and conspiring moron for a partner, the outlaw youth does not exactly have luck on his side, but he does have a stalwart spirit and an unconquerable will to survive.

Due to the seething hatred and criticism he received from his fellow German filmmakers and film critics, anarchic Aryan apostate auteur Roland Klick has remained a marginal figure of cinema both in his homeland and abroad, which is quite ridiculous considering he created highly accessible cinematic works like Supermarkt that do the seemingly impossible by bringing art and poetry to a terribly tactless genre that has traditionally been the celluloid equivalent of junk food. Breaking countless conventions of the outmoded genre, Supermarkt portrays a fellow whose crude criminality is a result of circumstance and not a contrived sort of action-hero courage, and who experiences the ultimate form of denigration and emasculation via anal penetration by an opulent queen who in his bourgeois arrogance, even tries to get out of paying the gay-for-pay anti-hero, thereupon demystifying the "rebel" archetype in the process. Indeed, as someone who is willing to risk his life for a girl he seems to have no desire to fornicate with, Willi is like a fallen saint in a post-industrial Sodom and a Teutonic teenage Travis Bickle who is willing to sacrifice everything (not that he has much, aside from his earthly life to spare) so that a bastard baby boy and his streetwalker of a mother can live a relatively normal life, even if it is with stolen money earned in a robbery that results in a freak death or two.

SUPERMARKT

If one were to go by Supermarkt as a frame of reference, it is quite obvious that director Roland Klick would have churned out a superior and all the more seedy film had he been the one to direct Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo as planned as opposed to for-hire, semi-hack Uli Edel (Body of Evidence, Der Baader Meinhof Komplex), but instead, the auteur has only gone on to direct a couple more disappointing features, including the excess-laden punk flick White Star (1983), which was ultimately sabotaged by its cokehead star Dennis Hopper's incessant searches for nose candy, and a number of TV movies for US networks under a pseudonym. It seems that, like his enemies from German New Cinema, Klick can no longer procure the funds he needs to make films, so maybe it is about time he visits a supermarket.

-Ty E

WHITE STAR

Roland Klick (1983)

According to mainstream cultural critic/film historian Peter Biskind in his classic Hollywood Babylon-esque book Easy Riders, Raging Bulls: How the Sex-Drugs-and Rock 'N Roll Generation Saved Hollywood (1998), cinematic counter-culture auteur/actor Dennis Hopper (Easy Rider, The Last Movie) was snorting about three grams of cocaine, chugging around 30 cans of beer, as well as mixing it with marijuana and Cuba libres, at the height of his deranging drug addiction, which certainly had a somewhat artistically fruitful (he starred in a number of great foreign/cult flicks) yet mentally and economically draining effect on his career. During around the time of his most excessive drug debauchery, Hopper starred in two German films, The American Friend (1977) aka Der amerikanische Freund directed by Wim(p) Wenders and the relatively forgotten kraut cult flick White Star (1983) directed by Roland Klick, which has the dubious distinction of being the last film the coke and alcohol-addled actor starred in before he disappeared into the Mexican desert in a high post-hippie haze, was arrested, and finally entered rehab, where he would arguably emerge stronger than ever, subsequently delivering masterful performances in Tim Hunter's River's Edge (1986) and David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986). Partially artistically sabotaged by Hopper's coke-inspired incessant tardiness, decidedly debilitating drug withdraw, consistent forgetting/botching of dialogue, and all-around belligerent behavior as a real-life "tortured maniac" playing a cinematic "tortured maniac," White Star as an unfinished, finished product was ultimately summed up by director/producer Roland Klick as follows, "The film has many great scenes, but its compactness creates too much pressure because we only shot all the big scenes. But other scenes belong in there as well." Unfortunately, Hopper's highs and lows were not the only thing that corrupted Klick's artistic vision as B-movie carny huckster producer Roger Corman—a man known for butchering films, including nonsensically adding scenes from one unrelated and adding them to another and committing a sort of shameless cinematic plagiarism—unfortunately bought the U.S. distribution rights for White Star, cut over twenty minutes of footage, inexplicably added concert scenes of the punk band TSOL from Penelope Spheeris' Suburbia (1984), dubbed some of Hopper's dialogue, and re-titled the film Let It Rock. Aside from turning White Star into an aesthetic and thematic hatchet job that is barely recognizable from what Klick originally released with his German cut, Corman somehow managed to change Hopper's character from being a sleazy music manager into a reporter investigating the punk rock scene. Luckily the original cut of White Star, which was shot in English and features a virtually all-American cast despite being set in Berlin, was released in Germany on DVD by filmgalerie 451, but, rather unfortunately, those few Americans who have seen Klick's flick have only seen it as the careless celluloid abortion know as Let It Rock. Originally intended to be a relatively decent sized budget production starring a number of big stars, including Jane Birkin, White Star would ultimately only feature Hopper, as well as horror/cult veteran David Hess (The Last House on the Left, Hitch-Hike), and a supporting cast of literal GIs from the U.S Army theater from Berlin, thus making for a culturally mongrelized celluloid work that, although undeniably entertaining, lacks the power of kraut lone-wolf auteur Roland Klick's previous feature-length efforts Bübchen (1968), Deadlock (1970), and Supermarkt (1974) and would ultimately mark the unofficial end of the filmmaker's career as one of Germany's rare 'masculine' and arthouse-antagonistic filmmakers.

WHITE STAR

A synth-pop musician named Moody Mudinsky (Terrance Robay in his first and sole film role)—a mild mannered and unpretentious young man who has yet to be corrupted by the sex, drugs, and money typical of the music world—has just quit his band The Purple Rats and has gone solo, but he makes the mistake of teaming up with a has-been music producer named Kenneth Barlow (Dennis Hopper), an American, and the purported son of a WWII era American spy who acted as the touring manager of the Rolling Stones in the 1960s, but who has fallen to the dubious and groveling level of becoming an "ordained minister" in the so-called Sun City Unification Church and wants to make a comeback in the modern-day Tangerine Dream-flavored music world, despite his pathological propensity for living in the past. Moody is now Barlow's 'White Star,' so it is only natural that the two will collaborate on a debut solo album entitled 'White Star.' Barlow is willing to use every and any dirty and degenerate trick to make his musician client a star and himself rich, and begins by paying his fucked and fiendish swarthy friend Frank (David Hess) to smash up a couple shop windows thereby creating a contrived punk riot at Moody's debut solo show that ultimately wipes out four city blocks, but proves to also make for good publicity. Sticking to the age old truism "There is no such thing as bad publicity," Barlow (who gets his own ass kicked in the process) has his faithful friend Frank stir another punk riot in a recording studio, hang up countless flyers around Berlin for an imaginary "White Star" concert tour and then destroys said flyers with red paint (with the painted threat "Kill Moody"), and stage an assassination against his star which ultimately gets an adoring fan killed. Moody's negro friend George, who runs a fittingly titled recording studio called 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' confides to his honky pal that "Barlow sold you down the river...Your his White Star." And indeed, as a squeaky clean 'All-American'-like kraut with blond hair, blue eyes, and not a single dirty thought in his mind nor any sort of moral taint, Moody makes for the perfect prey for perennial bad boy Barlow, who himself admits, "I haven't changed man...The times have changed...The fucking times have changed." When he and Moody are late for a press announcement due to bad traffic, Barlow states the eloquent humanistic words, "God damn, what we need is a god damn good depression so these fuckers couldn't afford fucking cars."

In no time, Barlow has defiled Moody's mind and body with his superlatively shady business and publicity tactics to the point where the aspiring synth-pop star/musician finds himself pissing on a hospital floor during a press opportunity where he is really supposed to be cheering up the young girl who was accidentally shot as a result of his manager's beautifully botched assassination attempt. Of course, the female fan with a bullet in her brain dies and so does Moody's newly acquired popularity, thus he decides to finally tell bastard Barlow, "We gotta split up, you are killing me man," which is certainly no exaggeration. In the end, Moody fails to "show them" he "can do it again" as a sleaze-bag who may fit in the late-1960s drug dealer-like manager, but is certainly not the sort of man that should be managing rock-antagonistic synth-pop groups who play a more traditionally 'European' and non-Blues/American negro inspired style of music.

Much like Bloodbath (1979) aka The Sky Is Falling directed by Silvio Narizzano and Out of the Blue (1980), White Star is a sort of unromantic antidote to the druggy counter-culture swill Dennis Hopper played a major part in glorifying with his absurdly overrated directorial debut Easy Rider (1969). Unfortunately, unlike Bloodbath and Out of the Blue, the latter of which the actor also acted as the director of, White Star suffered severely from Hopper's life-consuming cocaine addiction, or as director Roland Klick stated himself regarding the actor, "As we began, cocaine started to become an issue. He started to really flip out if he didn't have any or couldn't get any. He'd turn into this animal. And occasionally he'd turn up absent... We would wait all day for Hopper to show up for two hours in a state where we could shoot something... This time pressure led us to cut more quiet scenes of the film." Of course, when it comes to the actual scenes where Hopper, hopped on coke, actually showed up to shoot and that are actually featured in White Star, no one would doubt for a second that the character he is 'playing' is a cracked conman who is long past his glory days and is now nothing more than an absurd walking-and-talking anachronism who would have probably been better off dying from an overdose during the late-1960s-early-1970s like many of his cocaine cowboy compatriots. If nothing else, White Star manages to demystify the supposed magic of rock n roll, as well as the entertainment industry in general, by portraying it as a conspicuously corrupt and monetary-motivated degenerate pseudo-dream-factory that has just as much a corrosive and debauching effect on its clients as it does to adoring music fans. While Hopper's character Barlow incessantly describes his rather naive client Moody as the "damn future," his belligerent bullshit is routinely exposed by nauseatingly nostalgic statements he makes, like how his clients from the 1960s "were real stars. There were real stars." Apparently describing White Star as, "The emotionally most demanding film I've ever made, and therefore the most dangerous one - for me," Hopper was arrested in Mexico shortly after the film's production and finally went to rehab, where he would thankfully, unlike his character in Klick's film, emerge victoriously from his debauched drug psychosis and ultimately give some of the greatest and most iconic performances of career in films like River's Edge (1986), Blue Velvet (1986), and Paris Trout (1991), among various others. Unfortunately, director Roland Klick, who White Star star David Hess, himself an American Jew, once somewhat backhandedly described as being, "a dreamer inside a German – not an easy thing to be!," never recovered from his experience with the Hopper vehicle and he would go on to become a for-hire American TV hack who, probably ashamed of how desperate his career had become, directed a number of TV movies for US network stations under a pseudonym that has yet to be revealed. Still, for those that enjoy the Americanized punk and Kraftwerk-inspired films of German auteur Eckhart Schmidt like cinematic kraut cult classics like Der Fan (1982) aka Trance, Loft - Die neue Saat der Gewalt (1985), and Alpha City (1985) that portray a Berlin and a music scene that no longer exist, White Star makes for worthy enough way to waste 90 minutes or so because, after all, how could a very high Dennis Hopper, as well as a Svengali-like Hebrew like David Hess, in an American-fried Teutonic flick not be anything less than recklessly entertaining?! In short, White Star is a decent enough celluloid high for Hopperheads, if not a slightly impure one.

WHITE STAR

-Ty E

THE BLOODTHIRSTY FAIRY

Roland Lethem (1969)

Sophisticated and worthwhile fairy flicks are doubtlessly hard to come by because – let’s face it – miniature flying nymphs are mostly of interest to little girls and sexually frustrated middle-aged wiccans and not many other people. The conspiring female fays on HBO’s True Blood are somewhat tolerable due to their seductive sex appeal, but their baroque male counterparts certainly put to shame those real-life effete estrogen-driven fellows who feel it is a bold political statement to wear nothing but pink thongs at homo-rights parades. Additionally, the sort of little winged imps featured in the British film Photographing Fairies (1997) directed by Nick Willing are about as appealing as CGI fireflies due to their miniscule size, lack of character, and seemingly asexual nature. It was not until I saw the Belgian arthouse-exploitation short The Bloodthirsty Fairy (1968) aka La fée sanguinaire directed by Roland Lethem (La Ballade des amants maudits, In Memoriam Alfons Vranckx) that I felt I found the superlative and definitive fairy flick, albeit of the lavishly lecherous and preternatural avant-garde persuasion. As a student of early surrealist master filmmakers such as Jean Cocteau and Luis Buñuel and Japanese auteur directors like Seijun Suzuki and Ishirō Honda, Lethem is certainly a filmmaker with imperative and contradistinctive influences, thus his cinematic works are – quite unsurprisingly – strikingly singular and ostensibly original accomplishments in a class all of their own. With the aesthetically and thematically merciless and incendiary poetic 15-minute short The Sufferings of a Ravaged Egg (1967) aka Les souffrances d’un oeuf meurtri (1967) – in a fashion worthy of Georges Bataille at the height of his demiurgic depravity – the Belgian auteur proved that maggots in postmortem vaginas make for sapient symbolic social commentary against the Catholic church. With his admittedly sometimes repetitive but undeniably hypnotic thaumaturgical 22-minute short Le Vampire de la Cinémathèque (1971), Lethem turned his camera on fellow Belgian physician and mathematician Joseph Plateau’s 1832 invention of the phenakistoscope (an early animation device made from a spinning disk) to create an optical illusion of an exquisite and statuesque lady degenerating into a hideous archetypical witch. Out of all of his curiously corporeal cinematic efforts, The Bloodthirsty Fairy seems to be his most erotically potent yet venomously vulgar, as well as politically and thematically transgressive work. In short, Lethem’s fairy tale makes the less-than-erotically-charged films of Richard Kern (You Killed Me First, Fingered) seem like failed pastiche experiments in softcore dandy dilettantism by comparison.

During the beginning of The Bloodthirsty Fairy, a relatively young intellectual who resembles a stereotypical late-1960s pretentious French leftist twat notices a barrel on his front doorstep that was recently delivered by two swarthy-looking hippie bastards. Upon opening the seemingly humdrum barrel, the man discovers a beautiful unclad woman submerged in water inside. Not long after making this particularly stunning discovery, the comely human-sized fairy without wings emerges from the barrel and begins performing beguiling gestures, much to the noticeably intrigued pundit's delight. In no time, the young intellectual finds himself turning into a hopeless romantic and impulsive philistine of sorts, giving the fairy sensual bubble baths while gently massaging her feet in a dainty manner, but little does he know that his quasi-supernatural Madonna is a brassy black-hearted butcher in the spirit of the soulless darling from Hanns Heinz Ewers' Alraune with a keen and unquenchable addiction to politically-motivated bloodlust. On top of beating police to death in a most jubilant manner just for kicks and choking nuns into purgatory before finding her latest gentleman suitor as depicted in a series of flashbacks in The Bloodthirsty Fairy, the pitiless puck also has pernicious plans for her new infatuated Romeo. As someone who initially thought that Jörg Buttgerit made totally commensurately prodigious cinematic works, I think I have to change my assessment of the aberrant Aryan auteur after discovering the works of Roland Lethem, most specifically The Bloodthirsty Fairy. Packed with equal doses of iconoclastic beauty and brusque yet seemingly comical brutality, The Bloodthirsty Fairy – much like the works of blond beast Buttgerit – is a rare work that can be enjoyed by both thoroughly desensitized/deranged gorehounds and adventurous arthouse cinema addicts.

THE BLOODTHIRSTY FAIRY

The Bloodthirsty Fairy also features a political subtext that was somewhat lost on me due to my version of the Belgian film's lack of English subtitles. Essentially, the perturbed member-dismembering pixie seems to be a lone wolf anarchist (another possible nod to Bataille) of sorts as she collects the castrated cocks of famous/infamous assassinated political leaders ranging from Civil Rights Christ Martin Luther King, Jr. to American Nazi Party Führer George Lincoln Rockwell (whose Aryan-American member is noticeably uncircumcised) to apartheid-advocating South African Prime Minister H.F. Verwoerd. Unfortunately, the genital-gnawing fairy was unable to eunuchize Henry Kissinger, thus his special kosher Johnson jar remains empty, but one must admit that this fierce fay has quite the eclectic and prestigious political penis pile!

-Ty E

THE LITTLE GREEN MAN

Roland Lethem (2013)

Unquestionably, Roland Lethem (La Fée sanguinaire aka The Bloodthirsty Fairy, Les Souffrances d'un oeuf meurtri aka The Sufferings of a Ravaged Egg) is one of the most anarchistic and hopelessly ill-restrained auteur filmmakers that Belgium has ever produced, which is saying a lot considering he is from the same country that spawned the curiously coprophagia-crueted celluloid nightmare Vase de Noces (1974) aka Wedding Through aka The Pig Fucking Movie. Indeed, from the cutesy cock-castrating pixie bitch of The Bloodthirsty Fairy to the anti-Catholic Cocteau-esque approach to maggots in rotting cunts in The Sufferings of a Ravaged Egg, Lethem is certainly a wonderfully mad mensch who knows how to get a subversive cinephile's attention and luckily, despite being an old geezer in his 70s, he still manages to direct iconoclastic and totally original films featuring beautiful young babes being sexually brutalized. Indeed, for his latest film, Le petit bonhomme vert (2013) aka The Little Green Man—an absurdly fucked and fiercely fetishistic yet farcical 11-minute short about a cute chick's daunting date with a rather romantic cacti—Lethem demonstrates that he has not gone soft over the past couple of decades, even if the film lacks the graphic depictions of bloody cunts and castrated cocks that inspired foremost American cineaste Amos Vogel to pay tribute to the auteur in his classic text Film as a Subversive Art (1974). Dedicated to the memory of Japanese 'pinku eiga' auteur Kōji Wakamatsu (Go, Go, Second Time Virgin, Ecstasy of the Angels)—another aberrant-garde filmmaker who liked to make films about nubile little girls being used and abused in a variety of highly imaginative and eclectic ways—Lethem's little slice of celluloid lunacy is a short but sweet piece of playfully pernicious perversity that somehow manages to be simultaneously humorous, erotic, and exceedingly absurd. It also happens to be probably the only film where a woman performs coitus with a talking cactus.

Valérie (Vanja Maria Godée) is a crypto-horny French-speaking Belgian babe in her 30s who seems to like plants more than people and one would guess from her flagrant bitchiness that she might be more than a little bit sexually starved. While at a plant nursery, Valérie is asked by an employee if she needs help but she says nothing and looks at the well meaning fellow as if he is the world's single biggest asshole. When Valérie spots a beautiful bouquet of flowers, she becomes so enamored with the sight and smell of the plants that she rubs her face into them as if it is a nice and savory crotch. Of course, Valérie naturally becomes especially intrigued when she spots a small white phallic-like cactus. When Valérie picks up the cactus and hears some unseen person say "you're so beautiful," she becomes so startled that she pricks her finger on one of the plant's thorns. When she hears the same seemingly invisible fellow say "you smell so good," Valérie looks around and eventually realizes that the small white phalliclike cactus is actually talking to her. After the cactus introduces himself as “the little green man” and proceeds to hit on Valérie, she gets quite bitchy and makes the following heartless threat to the rather charming cacti, “it looks like you want me to mash you like a dirty little crap. All it takes is a good squashing with my heel.” Of course, the ‘Little Green Man’ is a sort of Don Juan of cactuses and he eventually coerces Valérie into dropping her panties and sitting on top of his thorny head. While Valérie cries like a little girl while riding the cactus, complete ecstasy is written all over her face. Valérie is also fed bullshit by the cactus about how they are going to have a baby together like, “It’s gonna be a wonderful baby” and “our great child.” As it turns out, the Little Green Man is more interested in stealing Valérie’s panties than having a mongrelized human-cactus hybrid baby with her.

THE LITTLE GREEN MAN

Aside from its cute, if not unflattering, depiction of the innate passive-aggressiveness of the ‘fairer sex’ and the tendency of women to say “no” when they really mean “yes,” The Little Green Man features no great revelations or insights about mankind, but it is quite eccentrically erotic and manically mirthful as a work that is certainly in the spirit of auteur Roland Lethem’s earlier works, albeit more lavishly directed. In terms of a cinematic equivalent to some sort of salacious activity, the film is like a ‘blow and go’ as a short but sweet and highly sensual affair that lasts about 10 minutes. While I was somewhat disappointed that Lethem did not opt to show the Aryanness lead’s post-cactus-coitus meat curtain (after all, he showed the eponymous ‘red cunt’ in Le Sexe Enragé aka The Red Cunt), the film is ultimately more potent due to the fact that it does not show anything aside from the sadomasochistic delight on protagonist Valérie’s face as she moves in and out of the prickly plant pecker. For Belgian cinephiles, it should be noted that veteran actor Jean-Louis Sibile (Wait Until Spring, Bandini, A Promise) makes a somewhat cryptic cameo in the film. Ultimately, The Little Green Man owes a large part of its potency to Vanja Maria Godée’s performance. Despite the fact that she had only appeared in one other short film before appearing in The Little Green Man, Godée demonstrates in Lethem’s film that she is an unrivaled master at simulating mounting a cactus and certainly more believable than 99% of the top female porn stars when pretending to derive pleasure from the seemingly unpleasurable. After watching Lethem’s work, I will certainly never look at cacti in the same way again. For those couples that use ultra ribbed condoms, The Little Green Man is probably a film you might want to steer clear of, but then again, I am sure that the short will inspire some debauched little dame to stick something sharp and prickly inside herself that might leave scars (or worse).

-Ty E

BAD BOY BUBBY

Rolf de Heer (1993)

Finally, the lines of bad taste and extreme nihilism have been crossed without squandering the quality of a film. I have seen countless films trying to jump on the sadistic bandwagon, by throwing globs of blood and taboo situations in their film trying to bring about a new Gummo. All of their efforts are in vain, and only makes the director look intellectually challenged. Director Rolf De Heer not only creates a film that will sicken you with its clueless sadism, but will also throw you in a world we have seen all our life, but in a new perspective. Nicholas Hope (Scooby Doo & Anacondas: The Hunt for the Blood Orchid) plays Bubby. Bubby is a 35 year old socially challenged man-child who learns only through imitation and deranged experimentation. His mother resembles the egg lady from Pink Flamingo's and using her sternness, she coerces Bubby into having sex with her. She has raised him into believing the outside world was filled with poisonous gas and he should never leave. All this changes when his pop comes home. The film involves a two room decrepit apartment, which is covered in stains and cracks in the wall. De Heer had over thirty cameramen shooting the scenes to give it a discovery look; sort of like Aladdin's bravado "A Whole New World." The film is potentially a Fish out of Water comedy mixed with the malignancy that leaks from Harmony Korine's films. One potentially avant-garde method used in this film are the microphones sewn into Hope's wig, to record the sound as if it were being heard. The film is not merciful in its actual depicted cruelty towards a cat. This may be flagged as a horrible thing to do, I agree, but I cannot deny that it built up the mood and character to an extreme degree. The character essentially grows up in a hostile environment with sexual indecency, degeneracy, and violence. Through his act of imitation, he becomes a better person. Bubby can also be seen as a messianic character, suddenly reborn into a new world where he changes things using a power he was unaware, much like he is of his surroundings. Bad Boy Bubby is a visually striking film lit up with vibrant colors expressing an unmistakable doom containing non-stop aggression and cinematic diseases in the first half an hour, then morphs into something beautiful; an important film that features amazing musical performances and a truly wrenching experience. An unforgettable masterpiece of dark humor.

-Maq

ALEXANDRA'S PROJECT
ALEXANDRA'S PROJECT

Rolf de Heer (2003)

Spoiler Alert. Discusses key plot elements within.

If there is one universal character trait of the opposite sex that I absolutely loathe, it is their instinctive talent for conspiring. I believe this cryptic female weapon is also the reason why many women hate one another as they are always suspicious as to the true intentions of fellow members of the same sex. In the 2003 film Alexandra's Project, I was exposed to one woman's well-thought-out sadistic conspiracy against her own husband. The film was directed by Dutch-Aussie auteur Rolf de Heer, a director whose film Bad Boy Bubby both repulsed and engrossed me. It was clear to me after watching 10 minutes of Bad Boy Bubby that Rolf De Heer is one of few modern filmmakers with a very original and distinct vision, so original that I cannot think of many filmmakers with comparable work. Like Bad Boy Bubby, Alexandra's Project shows the complete psychological deterioration of a man as he is both physically and mentally beguiled by a wicked woman.

In the beginning of Alexandra's Project, we are introduced to Birthday boy Steve and his seemingly perfect nuclear family. Steve's wife Alex seems a bit mouse-like and timid but she does not give any evidence that she is a psychopathic wench. It is also apparent that the household and everything within it are from the fruitful fatherly labor of Steve. When he goes to work, Steve is exhilarated to find out that he is being promoted, on top of receiving a nice birthday party from his co-workers. Little does Steve realize that his wife is putting the finishing touches on her life destroying birthday present to him. When Steve comes home, he is distressed to find the locks on his security system have been changed (but the door is left open) and that his family is nowhere to be found. Steve eventually notices a birthday wrapped VHS tape which he immediately opens and inquisitively begins to watch on the lone TV sitting in front of him. The tape begins with his wife Alex and two kids wishing him happy birthday. Early on during the video, Alex soon tells her kids to leave so that she can give her husband a less than graceful striptease that is never finished. Leaving Steve most likely only partially aroused (similar to their marriage), Alex begins giving her pitiless present of psychological warfare.

After going on a bitchy tirade about feeling like an objectified woman (some college Feminist studies class probably warped her mind), Alex pretends to blow her brains out with an unloaded handgun. By this point Steve is noticeably disturbed by Alexandra's erratic estrogen-driven behavior. Alex then begins to provocatively fondle her own breasts, eventually feebly attempting to pierce a needle through them. With her nipples hard, it becomes obvious that Alex is aroused by the sadistic behavior that she has emotionally tortured her husband with. Alex then makes up an extravagant lie that she has breast cancer and most likely only has a 50-50 chance of surviving the ordeal. Eventually, the cutthroat cunt reveals that she is leaving Steve with their children (who love their father dearly), making sure that he will never see them again. This is quite revealing of the self-worship that is womanhood. Despite acknowledging that both Steve and his children love each other a great deal, Alex is willing to destroy her children's lives just to quench her soulless thirst for petty vengeance. Despite the fact that Steve has devoted his entire life to his family, not mention the fact he provided them with luxuries that the majority of women in the world wish they had, Alex ruins her loyal husband's (and her children's lives) life just because she feels objectified and assumes Steve has cheated on her. Alex's irrational behavior is typical of the female slave-morality. Due to the fact she is afraid of her husband talking over her, Alex allowed all her hatred to boil up until she is able to gain enough gall to go beyond his back and plot a sadistic conspiracy to destroy him.

Despite complaining about feeling like a personal fuck-toy for her husband, Alex was able to save up enough money to escape from Steve by prostituting herself while he was working. One of Alex's pussy patrons is the next door neighbor, a hairy and overweight man (who Steve dislikes) that screws Steve's wife canine copulation style on the birthday present video. Alex's self-degradation to escape degradation is a great example of slave-morality inspired female logic. Maybe if Alex had been born over a century ago when women actually had to do somewhat hard work (when home appliance technology did not exist like it does today) around the house and watch 10 kids, she would not suffer from bipolar female neuroticism that plagues women of the western world today. Without modern technology (accessible video cameras and prison-like security systems), Alex would have never been able to carry out her somewhat elaborate project against her husband. Where Mike Haneke only accomplished banality with Benny's Video, a film about a boy losing touch with reality via the virtual reality of his video camera, Rolf de Heer cleverly delivered a film that shows that one's life can be ruined and family destroyed merely by watching a home video. After watching Alexandra's Project, even the least misogynistic of males will find themselves (at least temporarily) infuriated at the 'fairer' sex.

-Ty E

BLUTIGER FREITAG
BLUTIGER FREITAG

Rolf Olsen (1972)

Although few people will admit it, especially pretentious ‘socially conscious’ cinephiles (aka armchair neo-Marxists who blow their loads to the films of Godard and Straub), sometimes totally trashy exploitation films tell you more about a zeitgeist than the most critically revered and ostensibly intellectually sophisticated of arthouse works. Indeed, when it comes to films of the 1970s depicting the far-left terrorism that almost threw West Germany into a civil war, I think that the curious Kraut-Guido co-production Blutiger Freitag (1972) aka Bloody Friday aka Violent Offender aka Freies Geleit oder die Geiseln sterben exudes a less biased and more accurate depiction of the spirit of the times than most of the works directed by the likes of celebrated leftist auteur filmmakers like Volker Schlöndorff, Margarethe von Trotta, and Alexander Kluge. Co-directed by Austrian-born actor turned Aryan exploitation hack Rolf Olsen—a jack of all celluloid trades who had directed virtually every type of trash film, including crap kraut comedies, softcore ‘report’ flicks, racially insensitive mondo movies, and even children’s films—Bloody Friday is vaguely socio-politically conscious filmic filth of the exquisitely exploitative sort that is like the comsymp agitprop piece The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum (1975) as directed by the asshole bastard son of Alfred Vohrer (one of the main directors of the Edgar Wallace franchise by Rialto) and some goombah exploitation hack like Umberto Lenzi. Indeed, tastelessly exploiting popular issues in West German during the 1970s like the far-left terrorism of the Red Army Faction/Baader-Meinhof Gang, so-called ‘xenophobia’ (especially in regard to the “Gastarbeiter” aka “guest worker” phenomenon), latent Nazism, and capital punishment in regard to terrorists, Olsen’s film ultimately takes a refreshingly cynical approach to issues that filmmakers associated with German New Cinema took deadly serious. Featuring rampant anti-Guido sentiment, gratuitous canine killings, toddlers carrying around live hand grenades, psychopathic criminals complaining about hemorrhoid problems, frigid bull-dykes in suit jackets who suffer mental breakdowns after being carnally manhandled by macho men, bank robbers robbing wussy multicultural American GIs, small-time capitalist whore venders peddling hotdogs at crime scenes, everyday citizens calling for the gassing of criminals, and psychedelic montages juxtaposing images of hairy pussies and slaughtered animals, Bloody Friday may not be up to par with the sardonic insanity of Fassbinder’s black comedy crime flick The Third Generation (1979) aka Die dritte Generation, but it is certainly a wild and wicked, as well as slightly artful and oftentimes hilarious, celluloid ride with a busted moral compass that makes a marvelous mockery of national tragedy.

Prisoner Heinz Klett (played by Raimund Harmstorf, who is best known for playing the Nietzschean villain Wolf Larsen in the German 1971 Jack London adaption Der Seewolf aka The Seewolf) is a psychopathic career criminal of the neo-Viking sort with long hair and a beard who looks like he walked off the set of Klaus Lemke's kraut cult classic Rocker (1972) who manages to escape from a Munich court house after brutally beating two elderly cops in a bathroom. Indeed, after complaining to the old cops, "Look, do I shit here or in court?," Heinz is allowed to enter a bathroom stall where he manages to receive a handgun via a window with the help of his criminal compatriots Luigi Belloni (Gianni Macchia) and Stevo (Totò Mignone). After exiting the stall, Heinz waves his weapons at the elderly cops and a struggle breaks out that leaves both old lawmen beaten to a bloody pulp. While Heinz and Luigi manage to escape from the court house unscathed, their comrade Stevo is caught and taken into custody. Luigi is a Gastarbeiter from Italy who works at a gas station where he constantly faces anti-Guido sentiment from rude asshole krauts with bad attitudes, but he does not care too much because he is engaged to a rather beautiful blonde Aryan babe named Helen aka Heidi Hofbauer (played by Christine Böhm, who would later star in Jacques Demy's 1979 romantic period piece Lady Oscar), not to mention the fact that he thinks he is about to get rich via a planned bank robbery. Due to her goombah boyfriend, Helen faces persecution from some of her co-workers, with one complaining, "I tell you it's that Italian. When Helen met him that's when her big problems started." To the bitchy co-worker's credit, Helen is involved in a bank robbery plot with her fiancé Luigi and hotheaded lunatic Heinz, who is the untermensch 'mastermind' of the plan. When Helen's AWOL fugitive soldier brother Christian (portrayed by actor/singer Amadeus August, who is best known for playing the protagonist of the 1971 French-German swashbuckler TV series Quentin Durward)—a reasonably morally pristine young man who just happened to accidentally kill one of his commanders—shows up to see his lovely little sister, Heinz attempts to coerce him into getting involved in the bank robbery after starting a fist fight with the man and realizing he is pretty tough and can be put to good use. Luigi also attempts some goombah smooth-talking on Christian, arguing regarding their dubious economic future, "Where else are we going to get rich, in Italia?! Or spending a lifetime making chocolates in Germania?! In America where the niggers and whites are fighting?! They say heaven helps those that help themselves." While Christian initially declines, he eventually decides to join up after his sister reveals that she is pregnant and that she needs all the financial help she can get, as one can hardly raise a family with her lover Luigi's undignified job as a gas station attendant. Of course, little does Christian realize that he, his sister, and the rest of the conspirators will die like rabid dogs.

To get the appropriate intimidating weapons and ammunition to rob a bank, Heinz and his motley crew of lumpenprole misfits first rob a group of American GIs, thus accidentally resulting in one unlucky yank's death. While pigheaded degenerate Heinz believes that his bank robbery scheme is immaculate, he ultimately fails to take a number of considerations in mind, though he has some marginally clever ideas, like attempting to frame bourgeois-bred far-left terrorist for the crimes, remarking to Luigi, "We gotta get hold of one of those supped up sports cars. We gotta make it look like the job is the Baader-Meinhof Gang." Indeed, as a true gutter-dwelling proletarian without a cent to his name, Heinz knows that the Baader bunch are just a bunch of failed bourgeois pretty boy and girl pansies who cannot match his majesty in terms of raw working-class criminality. When the Heinz and his crew eventually get around to robbing the bank, they are in for quite a surprise when the alarm is sounded and 'safety grills' cover the windows and doors, thus locking the crooks and their hostages inside the building. Of course, the group takes all the bank patrons hostage, including a hot yet annoying and moronically morally self-righteous chick named Marie Lotzmann (played by Gila von Weitershausen, who previously appeared in Louis Malle's 1971 flick Murmur of the Heart as a prostitute), who happens to be the daughter of a wealthy grocery store owner. Naturally, Heinz decides to jack-up the ransom from a mere $500,000 to $1 million after learning that his hot hostage's daddy is a rather rich dude. Naturally, the hostage situation sires a media frenzy of sorts, with newscasters, hotdog vendors, opportunistic politicians and police officers, and bored everyday citizens all taking advantage of the dire situation in their own different yet equally parasitic ways. Meanwhile, as Christian begins to develop a quasi-romantic relationship with sermonizing rich bitch Marie, Heinz is getting drunk on liquor and attempting to get his hostages drunk with him. Of course, things go wrong for the group when a small boy accidentally gets a hold of one of Christian's grenades and pulls out the pin, as a cop dives on the explosive shortly after and is brutally killed as a result of the explosive detonating on his stomach. While the dead cop's actions were rather nonsensical (there was no real reason for him to throw himself on the grenade, as no one was around him when it exploded), the media portrays the officer as a righteous martyr who saved the lives of countless people. After one of the female hostages dies unexpectedly as a result of a stress-induced heart attack, the gang decides to let the children and old men go, but naturally the young and sexy hostages must stay, so dashing twink Christian provides them with his company as a way to protect them from his compatriots, especially deranged dipsomaniac Heinz.

BLUTIGER FREITAG

When Heinz's gang finally has the ransom money delivered to them by the police, they make their getaway to a secret hideout and bring two of the female hostages, Marie and a lipstick lesbian named Dagmar Neuss (Daniela Giordano), with them as insurance. When a cop catches the gang picking up Helen at their hangout, Luigi is severely crippled after being bitten by a police dog and thus the cop and canine are subsequently murdered by the crew as retribution. When the gang finally gets to their main hideout in the Bavarian woods, everything begins to fall apart, especially after Heinz murders dyke Dagmar after she insults his sexual performance after voluntarily agreeing to having wild sex with him. Indeed, the late night carnal session is so nightmarish for gynecentric gal Dagmar that she has psychedelic hallucinations of bushy vaginas and bloody slaughtered cattle in a gorgeously grotesque montage that is easily the most artsy fartsy and visually striking scene of Bloody Friday. When Christian learns that Heinz has killed the lipstick lesbian, he becomes enraged and smashes a piece of firewood over the gang leader's rather thick skull, which ignites a scuffle between Luigi and Helen that results in the former's accidental death via firearm. Indeed, things get so tragic for the gang that Helen unwittingly kills her goombah baby-daddy. The next day, borderline-good-guy Christian saves rich girl Marie's life by letting her go, even though he never actually got the opportunity to make love with her. Not long after that, a virtual army of police blitzkrieg the gang's hideout and immediately shoot pregnant Helen dead, so her brother Christian naturally flips out and begins unloading ammo on pigs, but he is soon shot down as well. While Heinz lasts the longest, he is also gunned down in a glaze of (in)glory, ironically collapsing on the ransom money that he risked his life to earn. In the end, the film concludes in a contrived pseudo-moralistic manner with the following Napoleon Bonaparte quote: "Crime is as contagious as the pest. No one can commit one without having to pay for it..."

At the very beginning of Bloody Friday, an inter-title appears warning the viewer: "The events in this film are based on actual facts. For obvious reasons, certain details and names have been changed but not in any endeavor to distort the truth." In the sense that is based on a true story, largely revolves around a darkly humorous media-circus-plagued bank robbery, and features goofy Guido villains, Olsen's film is like the Dog Day Afternoon (1975) of crime-oriented krautploitation flicks (somewhat shockingly, Olsen's film actually predates the Sidney Lumet flick by 3 years). Of course, despite being ostensibly based on the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, the film is innately exploitive any way you look at it, yet it is ultimately more effective than a film like The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum, as it shows that the criminals are just as moronic as the cops and that the masses, like virtually all masses, don't know shit about anything (though it is pretty hilarious when an elderly man calls for the gassing a killers). Indeed, despite its concluding Napoleon quote, Bloody Friday is nasty unadulterated celluloid nihilism that laughs in the face of the troubled Teutonic zeitgeist that it so degenerately depicts. Unlike most Euro-exploitation flick, the film is also vaguely 'artsy' at points and even features some arthouse stars, including ditzy dame Renate Roland, who got her start playing the negligent teenage babysitter in Roland Klick's Bübchen (1968) and would later appear in Fassbinder's TV mini-series Eight Hours are Not a Day (1972-1973). Speaking of Fassbinder, Olsen's film strangely covers a number of the same major themes and forms of allegorical imagery that would that alpha German New Cinema auteur would incorporate in his films, including the proletarian crime world (i.e.

BLUTIGER FREITAG

Love Is Colder Than Death, The American Soldier), terrorism (i.e. Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven, The Third Generation), lesbian-based misandry (i.e. The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant), xenophobia (i.e. Katzelmacher, Ali: Fear Eats the Soul), capitalism-inspired working-class rage and resentment (i.e. I Only Want You to Love Me), and slaughterhouses (i.e. In a Year of 13 Moons).

For whatever reason, gay American actor Lee Payant—a man whose greatest claim to fame was dubbing the eponymous role of the 1960s TV serial The Adventures of Robinson Crusoe in English and being the long-term boyfriend of black American actor/musician Gordon Heath—was responsible for directing part of the English cut of the film, though the exploitation flick does not feature any overt homoerotic content. Somewhat notably, there is a scene or two in Bloody Friday where the camera hovers over Heinz's tight leather pants to emphasize the size of his man-meat, as if to demonstrate that he has both literally and figuratively big balls, but also possibly to appeal the poof sensibility of pansy co-director Payant (who would never direct another film). Indeed, Heinz exudes rampant heterosexuality of the majorly macho yet dangerously violent sort in a somewhat cliché and stereotypical fashion that is not atypical of the ultra-macho antagonists of Tennessee Williams' plays. Indeed, like the characters in Williams' work (i.e. Stanley Kowalski in A Streetcar Named Desire), Heinz is a character that is both condemned and cryptically glorified due to his boorish and even bestial masculinity. Unquestionably, Bloody Friday is a rare German action-crime flick that dares to depict true Viking-esque all-balls masculinity in a patently politically incorrect fashion, and for that reason alone makes it more exciting than anything that has ever been directed by the likes of von Trotta and Kluge. An aesthetically pernicious piece of reasonably polished yet rather visceral psychotronic kraut cinema, Bloody Friday is not only proof that Aryans can make good exploitation films, but also that there can sometimes be a 'healthy' and highly entertaining median between pure cinematic trash and socially conscious auteur cinema.

-Ty E

FANTOM SEDUCER

Roman Nowicki (2005) If you have visited XploitedCinema.com before, chances are you have come across a series from Roman Nowicki called Fantom Kiler. Despite from having ripe spelling difficulties, the films manage to provide a very hallucinatory soft-core horror porn with some great scenes and many busty librarians who wander in the woods only to have their wardrobe conveniently removed due to tree branches. Well, in this film series, he takes a similar theme but instead of wonderful visuals, he decides to substitute the soft-core for hard-core. Fantom Seducer is now a full-scale porno with less of a glassy and polished feel and more of a lustful approach; completely disregarding the only artistic integrity it had. So instead of following a linear plot, the Fantom is now a demon that moves from women that have denied the host. So it seduces these women with his lust. As great as this sounds, it doesn't work for what it is. It should have focused on being one of the two. Not a half-assed horror/porn hybrid. This is no Slaughter Disc, mind you. Roman was always notable for his effective score in the Kiler trilogy, but in this outing the music is just embarrassing. Not much can really be said about Fantom Seducer that isn't already obvious. It's a bad porn with beautiful women. As genius as this sounds, it's too bland for it's own good. Don't expect a color saturated slasher film cause you will be sorely disappointed.

-Maq

ROSEMARY'S BABY
ROSEMARY'S BABY

Roman Polanski (1968)

Since I have never been particularly superstitious, even as a young child, I am not too fond of supernatural horror films involving the devil, demons, demonic possession, and related ungodly ingredients that are oftentimes painfully cliché, generic, and just plain downright banal when depicted cinematically by the mostly atheistic and Zionist unbelievers of unholywood. Indeed, I find nude scenes of bloated Jewess Lena Dunham to be infinitely more horrifying than a demonically possessed Linda Blair stabbing her jailbait snatch with a crucifix in William Friedkin's classic William Peter Blatty adaptation The Exorcist (1973). Likewise, I find it simply impossible to find little dude Damien of The Omen (1976) to be even remotely ominous, but I would not be surprised if Judaic director Richard Donner has a certain unsettling feeling when he thinks of Anglo-Saxon children, as he certainly would not be the first or the last Hebraic filmmaker to direct a film where a cute Nordic kid is supposed to be the personification of absolute evil. Undoubtedly, the most blatant and famous example of a Jewish filmmaker mocking white Christians and their beliefs is indubitably Rosemary's Baby (1968) directed by Roman Polanski and based on the best-selling horror novel of the same name by fellow chosenite Ira Levin. Produced by Hebraic carny-like schlockmeister filmmaker William Castle (House on Haunted Hill, The Tingler) and made under the guidance of Judaic Paramount Pictures executive Robert Evans (real name Robert J. Shapera), the classic horror film is as kosher as a Jewish wedding in terms of the most important people behind it, which makes perfect sense when one considers that it is about an overly sweet and sensitive yet oftentimes awfully annoying Catholic girl that literally gets fucked by the devil and inseminated with his sinister seed. Starring insufferable archetypical white liberal moron Mia Farrow—a woman that should probably go down in history as the originator of the grotesque virtue-signaling-based Hollywood trend of adopting child of different races from around the world as if they are accessories—with the sort of vomit-worthy hipster chic dyke haircut that is quite typical among bourgeois leftist feminist bitches nowadays, the film is almost like a parable about the nefarious (post)counterculture influence of Jews on the seemingly hopelessly naive and impressionable white middleclass, especially young and dumb WASP debutantes, but that does not mean it is not a virtually immaculate horror classic that it is probably the best that the (sub)genre has to offer.

Until yesterday, the last time I saw Rosemary's Baby was nearly a decade ago with an ex-girlfriend, who is incidentally currently pregnant (quite unlike Farrow's character, there is no way she could give birth to anything resembling a demon child), so naturally my thoughts on and appreciation of the film has changed somewhat over the past ten years or so. Notable for being Polanski's first adaptation of a novel and not an original story made in collaboration with his longtime co-writer Gérard Brach, the film might be looked at as the director's first piece of for-hire hack work were it not so readily apparent that he put himself completely into the film's screenplay and seemingly immaculate direction (notably, male lead John Cassavetes, who butted heads with Polanski throughout the production, would later state regarding the director, "You can't dispute the fact that he's an artist, but yet you have to say ROSEMARY'S BABY is not art."). Although it might be fucked up to say on retrospect, the film feels so innately and even smugly 'evil' that it almost seems like an act of twisted fate that his wife Sharon Tate and unborn child were brutally murdered by members of the so-called Manson Family not long after its release (at the very least, this fact only adds to the film's potency). While people have accused Polanski of being a crypto-Satanist of sorts despite his glaring nihilistic sympathies, Rosemary's Baby is certainly a rare film where the viewer finds it hard to root for the all-too-sweet Catholic girl protagonist when the Satanic antagonists are so much more charming, worldly, elegant, and mild-mannered. In fact, Ethan Mordden would go so far to argue in his classic text Medium Cool: The Movies of the 1960s (1990), "Even worse, because she is powerless, is the heroine of Roman Polanski's ROSEMARY'S BABY (1968), who drives the public into crazes with her dithering and wondering. All praise to Mia Farrow for fulfilling the director's intentions—for he obviously does not want us to identify, even sympathize with, Rosemary, one of the film's very few characters who is not a full-fledged ghoul. Farrow winces, whines, and withers, but she can't stand up and say no [...] Polanski is rooting for the devil. A year before the infamous Rolling Stones concert at Altamont and the climax of rock-as-demonism, the director says, this is what the times favor; this is where we have landed. We like the darkness. We sing the monster." Not surprisingly, in 2003 Judaic source writer Ira Levin would complain in regard to his belief that the film and his source novel inspired religious fanaticism, "Lately, I've had a new worry. The success of ROSEMARY'S BABY inspired EXORCISTS and OMENS and lots of et ceteras. Two generations of youngsters have grown to adulthood watching depictions of Satan as a living reality. Here's what I worry about now: if I hadn't pursued an idea for a suspense novel almost forty years ago, would there be quite as many religious fundamentalists around today?" Of course, Levin's remark reeks of the sort of repugnantly smug Jewish leftist anti-Christian arrogance that has turned academia, various art movements, and 'Western' culture in general into what might be best described as a putrid rotting dead horse that needs to be, at the very least, buried deep in mountains of manure. While the film makes brief reference to Nietzsche in a scene where titular female protagonist looks at a magazine with a cover that reads, "Is God Dead?," the German philosopher did not delight in the prospect as he was afraid that it would lead to collective nihilism and ultimately the death of the Occident.

ROSEMARY'S BABY

After recently re-watching the film, it was apparent to me that Rosemary's Baby is almost a satire of irrational Christian fears as written and directed by someone that seems like they would smile at the prospect of a devil defiling a pedomorphic Catholic girl, but I guess one should not expect anything less from a filmmaker that has a self-confessed affection for much younger women and thus can personally relate to such displays of ungodly carnality. Indeed, ultimately in the end, the cutesy yet unintentionally kooky female protagonist learns to 'love the devil' (or at least his half-human bastard son) and the Satanists prevail and proudly declare, "God is dead! Satan lives!" in great megalomaniacal triumph. Of course, such a scenario is probably quite satisfying to Jews who believe that Christians think of them as 'Christ-killers.' In fact, the only thing that could make the film more immaculate in terms of its elegantly executed contempt for Christendom is if it was produced by a studio named the Synagogue of Satan. Whilst one could argue that the film is poking fun at old school 'antisemitic' tropes about Jews using Christian babies for satanic rituals, it is quite obvious that Polanski takes great glee in depicting these stylishly sinister scenarios. In that sense, Levin is not too far off when speculating that the film influenced Christians to get more militant, as Rosemary's Baby is, in many ways, more incriminating regarding the sinister influence on Hebraic Hollywood than even the most sophisticated of white nationalist oriented propaganda pieces. Of course, the fact that Church of Satan founder Anton Szandor LaVey—a Jewish carry that plagiarized a good portion of his atheistic philosophy of self-worship from the writings of Russian Jewess Ayn Rand—made up an enduring myth that he worked as both a technical consultant for the satanic rituals and acted in an uncredited cameo role as Satan only adds to the film's satanic Jewish cred.

The virtual stereotype for the helpless white bourgeois princess, Rosemary Woodhouse (Mia Farrow) made her first big mistake when she married a scheming swarthy hack actor named Guy (John Cassavetes) that absurdly believes that acting in television is where "the artistic thrill" is at, thus underscoring his insincerity and lack of values and moral principles. Of course, Guy is more of a con-artist than an artist but his young wifey is too much of an airheaded sweet-heart to realize that. Quite unbeknownst to the tragically naïve protagonist, her sleazy hubby is willing to play cuckold to the devil himself just so that he can get his acting career started. Notably, at the beginning of the film, Rosemary and Guy are depicted making love in the most soulless and mechanical fashion imaginable as if it were a chore in a scene that really highlights the sorry sham that is their marriage, but I guess one should not expect anything less in a glaringly mismatched relationship where the wife resembles a sort of androgynous Virgin Mary and the husband seems like a terribly desperate and morally bankrupt Jewish used car salesman with a tendency towards banging intoxicated guidettes. Against the sound advice of her ambiguously gay ex-landlord Hutch (Maurice Evans)—a queen-ish fellow that curiously writes "stories for boys" yet seems to lack any interest in any traditionally masculine subjects—Rosemary and her husband move into an apartment complex with the unflattering nickname ‘Black Bramford’ with a dubious history that includes Victorian cannibal sisters, devil worshipers, and mysterious dead infants wrapped in newspapers, among other things that people do not typically associate with a perfect bourgeois apartment building. Not long after moving in, Rosemary is excited to befriend a gorgeous goombah babe named Terry Gionoffrio (Victoria Vetri under the pseudonym ‘Angela Dorian’ in a small role where she humorously complains that people think she looks like Victoria Vetri), only to find her new gal pal not long after with her blood and brains splattered across concrete as a result of a dubious suicide that involved her falling seven floors from a Bramford apartment window. Terry was an ex-junky that was taken in by Rosemary’s exceedingly eccentric elderly neighbors Minnie (Ruth Gordon) and Roman Caštevets (Sidney Blackmer) who supposedly treated her as the “child they never had.” Of course, as the viewer eventually speculates, Terry was originally the Caštevets’s choice for the carrier of Satan’s half-human spawn, but now that Rosemary has moved in they have a much better choice for Satan’s female cattle. After all, Terry’s drug and STD ridden body was surely not fit to produce the ungodly spawn of the Prince of Darkness. Somewhat strangely, Rosemary is not too disturbed when Minnie—a perniciously pushy little pipsqueak bitch that openly admits that she never takes no for an answer—gives her a supposed good luck charm containing a dubious herb named ‘tannis root’ that Terry was wearing when she died horrifically under questionable circumstances. Despite being repulsed by the putrid smell of tannis root, Rosemary is a good little follower and agrees to wear the antique necklace, at least until she realizes that it is really a satanic good luck charm of sorts that really contains a evil fungus called ‘Devil’s Pepper.’

While his wife Minnie is the worst extreme of the nagging and perennially scheming Jewish mother (even though she is technically not a mother), Roman is an elegant quasi-Svengali-like old fart that knows how to play the game when it comes to manipulating people, especially to the benefit of his infernal god, though he is not afraid to express his anti-Christian sentiments. Indeed, Roman somewhat disturbs Rosemary not long after they meet by stating things like, “No Pope ever visits a city where the newspaper are on strike” and “You don’t need to have respect for him [The Pope] because he pretends that he is holy.” Still, as a confused lapsed Catholic that has bad memories regarding frigid old nuns, Rosemary seems like easy prey for Roman’s heretical influence. When Rosemary’s rather wise pal Hutch randomly meets Roman, he immediately becomes suspicious of him, especially due to his, “pierced ears and piercing eyes.” Rather sadly, Hutch is the only person that seems to truly have Rosemary’s best interests in mind, but he is no match for the manipulative majesty of Roman, aggressive scheming of Minnie, or overbearing bullshitting of Guy. Like Rosemary, Guy wants to have children, albeit for the totally wrong reasons. Of course, as the film reveals, Rosemary could not have picked a worst time to have her first child. While Rosemary believes that her first pregnancy has been planned by her and Guy, Roman and Minnie have already hatched a pernicious well thought out plan to have her procreate with Beelzebub. When Guy lands a respectable acting role as a result of the original actor going blind under mysterious circumstances, he becomes inordinately overjoyed and absolutely delights Rosemary by telling her that he wants to have a baby. Unbeknownst to Rosemary, Guy has made a pact with Castevets to allow Satan to fuck and impregnate her in return for a successful acting career. Indeed, Guy is such a pathetic narcissist that he made a deal to become Satan's cuckold in return for the shallowest of careers. There is no doubt that Guy does not truly love Rosemary, who seems to be completely blind to this lack of love, at least at first. As his tasteless choice of trade and phony charismatic personality hint, Guy loves himself and only himself and he certainly has no qualms about making a quasi-Faustian pact that involves sacrificing his wife's fresh womb to be a demonic baby incubator the Devil himself to advance his acting career. In fact, the morning after he has Rosemary drugged and raped by Satan, he lies to her and states that he fucked her in her sleep, even jokingly describing it as, "Kinda fun in a necrophile sort of way." To make sure that Rosemary was properly knocked out so that Satan could penetrate her Catholic cunt without even the slightest bit of resistance, Guy forced her to eat chocolate mousse that was drugged by Minnie even though she complained it had a "chalky under taste." While Rosemary remembers being defiled by something inhuman, she ultimately rights off the satanic rape as merely a bad dream even though her body is covered in claw marks as if someone roughly violated her during sex. Needless to say, Rosemary's incessant refusal to ever say "no" to the satanic conspirators becomes increasingly aggravating to the point where the viewer eventually finds it nearly impossible to sympathize with her plight. Indeed, not unlike the stupid rich WASP college student that buys into all the propaganda of largely Jewish cultural Marxists, feminists, LGBT agitators, and other scum, Rosemary hardly deserves pity as she is a feeble-minded individual that is a mindless traitor to both herself and her ancestral faith.

ROSEMARY'S BABY

Undoubtedly, one of the most overtly Jewish aspects of the film is that Rosemary is coerced by the Castevets into going to see an arrogant satanic obstetrician named Dr. Abraham Sapirstein (Ralph Bellamy) after she gets pregnant. Aside from developing a compulsion to eat raw meat, Rosemary suffers great stomach pain after getting pregnant and suspects something is extremely wrong, but super smug semite Dr. Sapirstein arrogantly discounts her complaints and endorses her drinking a strange cocktail that is prepared by Minnie of all people instead of taking normal pregnancy vitamins. Like with virtually every evil character she encounters, Rosemary seems to have next to nil intuition into the true insidious nature of Dr. Sapirstein until it is much too late, which is rather depressing since she is a genuinely nice and trusting little lady that, to her ultimately rather tragic detriment, seems to be willing to give virtually anyone the benefit of the doubt. Indeed, Rosemary does not realize that the Castevets are members of a witch coven until she has unwittingly caused her homey Hutch to fall into a coma and eventually croak as a result of having a spell put on him by the elderly Satanists. Clearly realizing that he might be a threat to their satanic agenda, Roman put a spell on Hutch not long after first meeting him. Before croaking, Hutch managed to procure an antique book entitled All Of Them Witches that reveals that Roman is from a satanic family and that his name is really an anagram for his real Satanic name 'Steven Marcato.' To add insult to injury, Roman names Rosemary's half-breed demonic child 'Adrian' in tribute to his infamous bigwig Satanist father Adrian Marcato, who has an entire chapter dedicated to him in All Of Them Witches. While Rosemary makes a desperate attempt to convince another Jewish obstetrician named Dr. Hill (Charles Grodin) into helping her give birth lest her child be stolen by satanic conspirators, the good doctor naturally does not believe her rather wild and fantastic story and thus betrays her by informing Guy and Sapirstein about her whereabouts. Surely one of the most sinister Judaic characters in cinema history, Sapirstein even dares to blackmail Rosemary by threatening to have her committed to a mental institution if she continues to complain about a satanic conspiracy against her. In short, Rosemary—a genuinely sweet and sensitive girl that could make for a truly devout Christian were she not married to a scumbag and mixed up with such malevolent characters—is no match for any of the Satanists in terms of sheer will power, intellect, and moral bankruptcy. In the end, Rosemary is horrified to discover that her baby, which she was told was dead, has the eyes of Satan, yet Roman manages to coerce her into being the demonic being's mother in what ultimately proves to be a wickedly warped twist ending where Satan is glorious and a sweet and sensitive young Catholic girl learns to love her satanic bastard progeny that was sired via ritualistic phantasmagoric rape. Of course, this scenario ultimately not much different from the one depicted in Judd Apatow's Knocked Up (2007) where singularly obnoxious Judaic lard ass Seth Rogen portrays a Hebraic slacker that proudly engages in Rassenschande with a blonde Shiksa portrayed by Katherine Heigl.

Not surprisingly, Rosemary's Baby is a favorite film among many real-life 'Satanists,' including the Church of Satan, which officially endorses the film in the eponymous book The Church of Satan by Magistra Blanche Barton as approved by the pseudo-church's founder Magus Anton Szandor LaVey. Additionally, LaVey's estranged son-in-law Nikolas Schreck—a one-eared Satanist turned Tantric Buddhist that is probably best known as the frontman of the goofy pseudo-deathrock group Radio Werewolf—highly praised the film in his book The Satanic Screen: An Illustrated Guide to the Devil in Cinema (2001) where rightly noted, "The film is remarkably free of the clichés that marred previous films of Satanism. To cite only one of the most obvious examples, Castavet's coven are not bloodthirsty fiends slaving to commit blood sacrifices.” In his book, ex-Satanist Schreck also makes it quite clear that, despite the claims of both various Christian and Satanic groups to the contrary, the film was not the product of genuine devout Satanists, or as he states himself, “ROSEMARY’S BABY became a kind of blueprint for the occult renaissance of the late 1960s, quite unintentionally placing the Hollywood seal of approval on the Black Arts. Putting the cart before the horse, both occultists and Christians of different stripes have looked in the film for hidden magical messages and authentic Satanic lore. Rumors have spread that the film-makers must have sought technical advice for ‘real’ Satanists to imbue the film with such seeming authenticity.” While I have made fun of Schreck in the past, I certainly cannot deny that he probably said it best when he noted regarding the importance of the film in the context of satanic cinema a whole, “The impact of ROSEMARY’S BABY on the Satanic cinema can hardly be overestimated. Its popular success moved the Devil from the margins of the film world to the centre, directly inspiring a tidal wave of diabolical movies that surged around the world for a full decade after its release. One of those rare films that transcends its original beginnings as simple escapist entertainment, it was elevated by its mysterious inner force into its own dark myth. ROSEMARY’S BABY was fortuitously released at exactly the right time, capitalizing on and helping to create the sixties occult revival that it will always be associated with.” While Kenneth Anger is the undoubtedly the greatest occult filmmaker to have ever lived, Polanski certainly deserves the credit for bringing overt left-hand path themes to the mainstream (though Val Lewton surely made a valiant attempt with The Seventh Victim (1943), which was clearly a major influence on Rosemary’s Baby).

ROSEMARY'S BABY

Aside from being noted by some, including ex-Satanist Schreck, as a sort of allegory for the birth of the Age of Satan (or what Thelemites like Anger describe as the Aeon of Horus), Rosemary’s Baby is also (in)famous for supposedly being a cursed movie, namely due to the Manson Family brutally murdering auteur Polanski’s pregnant wife Sharon Tate and unborn child. Aside from that, the film’s Polish musical composer Krzysztof Komeda died in 1969 of more or less the same illness (haematoma of the brain) that the film’s character Hutch died after having a spell put on him by the Satanists. Of course, Mia Farrow’s entire post-Rosemary’s Baby life seems to be at least somewhat cursed in various ways. Indeed, aside from the fact that she was married to a purported pedo and had a sick brother that was a convicted gay child molester, Farrow, whose then-hubby Frank Sinatra notably divorced her because she refused to quit Polanski’s film, would later star in a number of rip-off films ranging from Richard Loncraine’s virtually totally unknown UK-Canadian production The Haunting of Julia (1977) aka Full Circle to the dreadful The Omen (2006) remake where she demonstrates a nasty knack for unintentional self-parody. While in Rosemary’s Baby Farrow seems like a genuinely pure and virgin-like beauty that is no match for a coven of evil conniving witches, Farrow would go on to seem like the archetypal psychologically decrepitude white liberal pseudo-intellectual whack-job, hence her dubious marriage to a patently pathetic physical specimen like neurotic Hebraic dork Woody Allen.

Undoubtedly, if I were to pick a song that I believe best sums up the spirit of seemingly accursed auteur Roman Polanski and his films, especially Rosemary's Baby, The Fearless Vampire Killers (1967), and The Ninth Gate (1999)—all cinematic works where evil prevails in the end—it would be “Sympathy for the Devil” by the Rolling Stones, even if it is not exactly the sort of song that he would use in one of his films. Indeed, while Polanski’s films reveal that he has extremely pessimistic existentialist tendencies, they also demonstrate that, at least allegorically speaking, he has no problem sympathizing with the plight of Satan, but I guess one would not expect anything less from a Polish Jew that personally witnessed the worst of the Kraków Ghetto as a child and whose mother died in Auschwitz concentration camp, not to mention the fact that he was forced against his will to pose as a Roman Catholic lest her be found out as a Jew and sent to a concentration camp like both of his parents. Of course, not unlike Satan in Rosemary's Baby, Jewish outsider Polanski impregnated a blonde Aryan beauty, thus making the murder of said blonde Aryan beauty and the dead half-Jewish fetus seem all the more bizarre on retrospect, as if the auteur had been punished by god for his bold cinematic sins. As someone that is not particularly religious, I somehow find the bizarre metaphysical implications of Rosemary's Baby to be surprisingly intriguing, especially considering that even a carny huckster like William Castle—a man that thrived like no other in terms of being a shameless cinematic smut-peddler—felt severe guilt in regard to producing the film, even writing when his hit satanic flick was receiving Academy Awards, “All my life I had yearned for the applause, approval and recognition of my peers and when the awards were being passed out, I no longer cared. I was at home, very frightened of ROSEMARY’S BABY.” On top of feeling guilty about the spiritual influence of the film, Castle also suffered kidney failure shortly after it was released. To Castle’s credit, the horror films that he personally directed like The Tingler (1959) and even his swansong Shanks (1974) are fun and hokey with cartoonish depictions of good and evil and surely not works that celebrate Satan, so it almost seems sickly absurd that he was involved with producing a film that is nothing short of Satanic cinema par excellence. While there is ample evidence to argue that Rosemary's Baby is a sort of dark crypto-comedy at the expense of Christian true believers, there is denying that it has a singular dark and ominous essence that has yet to be rivaled by any other film. Undoubtedly, it is one of those oh-so rare films that, although I come back to it every couple years, I cannot exactly say that I am a true fan even though I believe that is one of the most subversive, immaculate, and artistically merited that has ever come out of Hollywood. While Polanski once stated, “I no more believed in Satan as evil incarnate than I believed in a personal god; the whole idea conflicted with my rational view of the world," his sins, life of artistic and monetary success yet strange misfortune, and films certainly seem to contradict this. Indeed, one could also argue that working in Hollywood caused Polanski to lose his soul, or as David Thomson noted in his trusty film reference book The New Biographical Dictionary of Film regarding the auteur's inexplicable decline as a cinematic artist with an unmistakable style, "Once upon a time, it would have seemed impossible for Polanski to stagnate. Yet it has happened. DEATH AND THE MAIDEN and THE NINTH GATE did not seem to belong to him, whereas, once, he had put his stamp on anything and everything. This liberty has not enriched him. There has been no talk of a return to America; and no hint of that music not having to be faced. In Paris, Polanski seems disconsolate, a thumb-twiddler. And while time passes, the mood for his best films is nearly forgotten." Don't get me wrong, I enjoyed Macbeth (1971) and to even some extent The Pianist (2002), but the somewhat flawed The Tenant (1976) aka Le Locataire seems to be the director's last display of unadulterated artistic integrity. As for Rosemary's Baby, it might be adapted from the novel of an obscenely overrated mainstream horror novelist, but it is pure Polanski in a darkly comedic misanthropic sort of fashion that, for better or worse, reminds viewers why people used to oftentimes oftentimes associated Jews and Judaism with Satanism. In other words, I am not surprised that the film was directed by an inordinately artistically gift holocaust survivor.

ROSEMARY'S BABY

-Ty E

THE BLIND FLY

Romano Scavolini (1966)

Unquestionably, Romano Scavolini is one of the more curious cases in post-WWII Italian cinema. While best known nowadays for his vicious video nasty slasher flick Nightmare in a Damaged Brain (1981) aka Blood Splash aka Nightmare and his Gothic psychedelic giallo Un bianco vestito per Marialé (1972) aka Spirits of Death aka A White Dress for Marialé, Scavolini spent his early career making highly experimental celluloid poems of sorts that would probably bore his art-allergic horror fans to death. Indeed, with his avant-garde short Ecce Homo (1967), Scavolini anticipated the sort of collage videos that are a favorite among YouTube users, albeit using it for postmodern agitprop purposes, juxtaposing Biblical Renaissance paintings with modern images of war, consumer products, and surgery. Whether Scavolini borrowed the title for Ecce Homo from Friedrich Nietzsche's 1908 autobiography of the same name or from the words of Pontius Pilate in the Vulgate translation of John 19:5 is questionable, but if one thing is for sure, it is that the director's first feature A mosca cieca (1966) aka The Blind Fly aka Ricordati di Haron aka Blind-Man's Buff, which was described as a masterpiece by none other than Italian futurist/fascist poet Giuseppe Ungaretti, depicts a dispirited world of doom and gloom where God is dead and the 'last man' reigns supreme. Vaguely inspired by Albert Camus' novel L'Étranger (1942) aka The Stranger, The Blind Fly is a little piece of black-and-white cultural pessimism that follows a strange and mostly soulless character who steals a gun out of a car, pushes away his loving girlfriend, ponders on fear and mathematics with friends, and ultimately decides to shoot at a crowd of strangers headed to a soccer stadium on a sunny Sunday afternoon. Despite being made in the same country that gave the world Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), Alberto Cavallone's Blue Movie (1978), Ruggero Deodato's Cannibal Holocaust (1980), the strangely gorgeous gore of Lucio Fulci, the horror porn works of Joe D'Amato (i.e. Erotic Nights of the Living Dead aka Le notti erotiche dei morti viventi), and the histrionic theatric iconoclasm of Carmelo Bene (Don Giovanni, Salomè), among countless other examples, The Blind Fly was considered so obscene by the Italian board of censors that it was (and still is) banned in Italy and has never had a commercial screening, or as auteur Scavolini stated himself in an interview with www.splattercontainer.com, the work was, "metaphorically burned at the stake by three censorship commissions and by the State Council" due to its perceived blasphemy, pornography, and irrational violence. Made over a year period of random filming after producer Enzo Nasso (who went on to produce Scavolini's work The Dress Rehearsal (1968) aka La prova generale) gave the director a bunch of 16mm film stock (which the director described as being, "decaying, almost unusable scraps"), The Blind Fly was originally a whopping 6 hours long, but Scavolini decided to cut down the film to about an hour and focus on the curious character of a metaphysically dead murderer named 'Carlo' who decides to waste some random people as a rather irrational way of dealing with the fact that he is a heartless void merely wandering this earth who is consumed with nothingness upon nothingness. Described by auteur Scavolini as a "Beckettian movie" and featuring anti-urban/anti-modernist quotes from French symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud, The Blind Fly is certainly the kind of rare film that might push the wrong person over the edge, as a film that "shows the absence of God in our society" (which, according to Scavolini, is the best description of the work and how Catholic intellectuals described the film) and offers no sense of solace, but instead, a nightmare of naked nihilism that reminds the viewer why old Europa is on its last gasp.

THE BLIND FLY

Beginning with a shot of two men laying on the ground as if they are dead, The Blind Fly almost instantly establishes a sense of absurdism, unease, and tragicomedy. The antihero of the film is Carlo (Carlo Cecchi) and aside from his girlfriend (Italian diva Laura Troschel) and a couple friends, he is completely alone in the world, though his loved ones are also beginning to compound his loneliness, as he finds it harder and harder to relate to them. After horsing around with a friend, stealing a pistol he spots in an unlocked car, and buying a newspaper, Carlo goes back to his dungeon-like room and seems to contemplate many things, including suicide, as demonstrated by the fact that he puts the barrel of the gun he has stolen to his forehead. In flashbacks, we see Carlo is having trouble with his girlfriend because after the two make love, he sulks while sitting at the end of the bed, as if disgusted with the ordeal and his incapacity for reciprocating love in a meaningful way. When Carlo meets a friend, he learns the following 'mathematical' formula: "Five is killed by Six but Five killed Four. Every number...Any number...kills the previous number just to be killed by the following number [...] One is always a victim. It's the destiny of the first ones...to be victims." Carlo seems to be rather appreciative of his arithmetic-inclined friend's pessimism, as demonstrated by his remark to him, "I feel safe with you. You're always so peaceful." Indeed, Carlo is proof that misery loves company. After making love with his girlfriend, Carlo kicks her out of bed, but not before remarking, "You look at me like...like I was an old, impotent man," which she of course denies (but, as Carlo states, he "sees it" in her eyes). Indeed, Carlo is so dead inside that he has nil interest in sex, complaining to his beloved, "I told you I did not feel like making love to you." When his girlfriend asks him why he never asks her whether or not she loves him, Carlo calls her "stupid" and an "idiot" and proceeds to chase her away in a rather nasty fashion. While randomly sitting by himself at a table in the city, an old man comes up to Carlo and goes on about how he noticed him staring at a young couple. The old man also tells Carlo that the young lady belonging to the couple he was staring at could feel his penetrating eyes on her, as if his hatred had metaphysical powers. Most importantly, the old man tells Carlo that he can tell he is upset by the way he holds a cigarette. Like most activities he is involved with, Carlo goes to a local fair all by his lonesome and plays a game where he shoots a toy gun, which is juxtaposed with shots of him gunning down random strangers. When Carlo meets up with another friend, he confesses he is scared and proceeds to put his gun to the back of his comrade's head while asking if he feels fear. Juxtaposing scenes of a soccer game with shots of Carlo killing random strangers who are heading to the stadium where said soccer game is taking place, the viewer soon realizes that the antihero has completely lost it for good. After a seemingly schizophrenic montage featuring Carlo running away frantically from the scene of the crime, random dead bodies with animated quasi-psychedelic special effects, Carlo running up to and hugging his girlfriend, and the antihero grabbing his head while in a seemingly majorly melancholy state, the following inter-title pops up: "Standing Still – Alone – Being Defeated – Never – Samuel – It Never Begins – It Never Ends." Before going on a murder rampage, Carlo is asked by a friend why he is carrying a gun and he simply responds with, "I need it." Indeed, Carlo needed to kill in a last ditch effort to see if he had any capacity for emotions, namely guilt, but it is dubious whether or not he found what he was looking for upon committing the unpardonable act.

While auteur Romano Scavolini has cited Samuel Beckett as having the biggest philosophical influence on The Blind Fly, I found the utilization of segments from libertine poet Rimbaud's Illuminations (1874) to be the most effective in summing up the overall tone of the film, with the excerpt being as follows: "I am an ephemeral and not at all too discontented citizen of a metropolis which is believed to be modern because every known taste has been avoided in the furnishing and the exteriors of the house, as well as in the layout of the city. Here you cannot point out the trace of a single monument to the past. Morals and language have been reduced to their simplest expression, in short! These millions of people who have no need to know each other carry on their education, their work, and their old age so similarly that the course of their lives must be several times shorter than the findings of absurd statistics allow the peoples of the continent. Thus, from my window, I see new apparitions roaming through the thick and endless coal-smoke – our woodland shade, our summer's night! – new Furies, in front of my cottage which is my country and my whole heart since everything here is like this; Death without tears, our active daughter and servant, a desperate Love and a pretty Crime whimpering in the mud of the street." Virtually completely silent aside from strategically placed music of the mostly discordant sort (though some German classical music is thrown in for good measure) and a couple lines of dialogue between characters, The Blind Fly is ultimately a severely suffocating, claustrophobic, alienating, and dejecting work that expresses through what is nothing short of raw cinematic poetry the metaphysical crisis of 'modern man' (very much in the Jungian sense) and his lack of culture and community in a technocratic world of abstraction, deracination, and godlessness. Indeed, aside from Louis Malle's adaptation Pierre Drieu La Rochelle The Fire Within (1963) aka Le feu follet, which follows a lonely alcoholic who tries to find a reason not to commit suicide, and Wim Wenders' Peter Handke adaptation Die Angst des Tormanns beim Elfmeter (1972) aka The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick, which follows an emotionally dead soccer goalie who kills a movie theater cashier for seemingly no reason, The Blind Fly is certainly the most effective cinematic depiction of abject hopelessness and despair in an emotionally glacial metropolitan society of anti-organic mediocrity that I have had the distinguished honor of seeing. Undoubtedly, The Blind Fly is easily auteur Scavolini's most dangerously intimate work, so it should be no surprise that the director warns on his official website that "it is an hectic film not to be liked by the grand public." Described by filmmaker/cinema connoisseur Gideon Bachmann (who appeared in a couple Fellini flicks and directed the documentary Ciao, Federico! (1970), which features a behind-the-scenes look at Fellini Satyricon (1969)) as follows, "It is the first all-filmic, all-musical film from modern Italy constructed like a musical composition, moving in movements like a sonata, broken up into chords like variations on a theme, and finally expressive primarily through the images it stimulates in the mind, it is essentially a cry of anguish in a world of emotional voids, a cry of solitude," The Blind Fly is ultimately a peturbingly penetrating reminder of the power of cinema as an artistic medium if in the right hands, as Scavolini's film is a virtual declaration of intolerable existential crisis and homicidal tendencies, which he was thankfully able to release in a creative way via the art of film.

THE BLIND FLY

-Ty E

NIGHTMARE IN A DAMAGED BRAIN

Romano Scavolini (1981)

While Guido filmmaker Romano Scavolini (Un bianco vestito per Marialé aka Spirits of Death, Savage Hunt) was once such an innovative and audacious filmmaker that the great Italian fascist poet Giuseppe Ungaretti described his first feature, A mosca cieca (1966) aka The Blind Fly aka Ricordati di Haron, as a masterpiece, for whatever inexplicable reason, he decided to irreparably taint his artistic reputation and became a genre hack of sorts who directed (sub)mainstream giallo, slasher, Poliziotteschi, action, and war flicks. Indeed, due to Scavolini's artistic transgressions, he is best known nowadays as the man who directed the rather nasty and gratuitously violent and bloody slasher flick Nightmare in a Damaged Brain (1981) aka Blood Splash aka Nightmare aka Schizo aka Cauchemars à Daytona Beach, which was banned as a 'Video Nasty' in the UK due to its tasteless marketing gimmicks, which included a vomit bag and a competition to guess the weight of a fake brain in a jar. An Italian-American coproduction that actually does not suffer from poor dubbing and dirty dagos pretending to be American Anglos, Nightmare in a Damaged Brain is certainly a rare slasher flick with actual style and elegance that is unfortunately eclipsed by its silly slasher clichés, moronic moments of comic relief, and prominence of child actors. Advertised with the cheap tagline, "If You Were Terrified By "Dawn of the Dead" & "Friday the 13th" You Must See Nightmare!", the film is also notable for irking American Guido special effects man Tom Savini, who threatened to sue over the fact that he was credited as the "Effects Director" on posters and old video prints of the film. While Savini denies he was the effects man (claiming to be a mere 'consultant' instead) and even went so far as describing the film as a "piece of shit" (even though the film is clearly better than at least half the stuff he has worked on during his rather uneven and uniquely artistically unmerited career), auteur Scavolini told one of the writers at retroslashers.net in 2007 that the From Dusk till Dawn (1996) star had ulterior motives and was indeed responsible for the effects, remarking, "He denied being involved in the making of Nightmare's special effects for various reasons; mainly because he wanted more money if his name was used – as it was, at the beginning, in the poster of the film. But I know at least two other reasons, mainly psychological, but I will not release them to anyone." Whatever the truth of the matter is regarding Savini and his questionable statements, it is indisputable that another special effects man on the film, Les Larrain (aka Lorrain aka Loraine), killed himself shortly after working on Nightmare in a Damaged Brain. Featuring Grand Guignol-esque violence and gore, a genetic (as well as Oedipal) explanation for homicide, and a cracked killer who is always suffering from unintentionally hilarious seizures where it seems as if his mouth is overflowing with cum, Nightmare in a Damaged Brain is a truly nasty video nasty that demonstrates that auteur Scavolini went from a sort of cultivated celluloid nihilism that quoted Rimbaud and Beckett as depicted in The Blind Fly to a savage philistine nihilism that wallows in blood, visceral hatred, and pointless heavy metal style misanthropy.

NIGHTMARE IN A DAMAGED BRAIN

George Tatum (played by Baird Stafford, who starred in only one other film, Scavolini's Vietnam War flick Dog Tags (1988)) is an Aryan American nutcase who spends his days and nights being strapped to a chair in a straitjacket and being force-fed anti-psychotics in a mental institution. Indeed, among other things, George has been diagnosed with the following afflictions (as featured on an archaic early-1980s computer monitor): schizophrenia, mild amnesia, homicidal, dream fixation, and seizures. As Nightmare in a Damaged Brain slowly but surely reveals as the film progresses in dream-sequences that the mental patient suffers from, George viciously slaughtered both of his parents with an axe while he was still just a wee lad after walking in on his parents engaging in BDSM. Thinking his mother was beating his father (who was bound to the bed while getting said beatings), little George decapitated his mommy with an axe, fetishistically butchered the rest of her headless body, and then proceeded to drive his rather brutal weapon of choice into his sexually debauched daddy's astonished face. Now, George has a family of his own and after becoming the main human guinea pig in a dubious study involving a highly secretive experimental drug, he is magically declared sane and gets the opportunity to leave the nuthouse and reunite with his estranged family. While George is suppose to go to a halfway house, his damaged dome tells him to go elsewhere. Before heading to Daytona Beach, Florida where his family lives, George decides to stalk the slimy semen-and-scum-covered streets of 42nd Street in New York City where he checks out the peepshows, including one where a woman in a phone booth pleasures herself with a dildo for the viewer's pleasure, but the unhinged family man suffers from a major seizure and fails to bust a load. After his peepshow mishap, George stalks a chick all the way back to her house, slits her throat while she is on the phone, drives his knife into her gut as if he is thrusting his cock in her cunt, and then whispers to his victim, "I'm sorry."

Meanwhile, in Daytona Beach, George's (ex)wife Susan Temper (Sharon Smith) is messing around with her Hebrew hippy boyfriend Bob Rosen (played by cinematographer/sound man Mik Cribben, who originally worked on dark porn chic flicks like Armand Weston's The Defiance of Good (1975) and Cecil Howard's The Final Sin (1977)) on his small yacht. Although a hysterical single mother who is quite incompetent when it comes to disciplining her three children and giving them affection, Susan is quite hysterical when it comes to her kids and interrupts coitus with Bob (who complains, "Oh, come on. Woman... You're torturing me! I have needs... I'm a human being... I've got feelings") to check up on her kids and learns that her son C.J. (C.J. Cooke) is ostensibly severely injured. Of course, C.J. is a scheming prankster who is quite desperate for his worthless mother's attention and while claiming to have been stabbed, he merely covered his t-shirt with ketchup and made up an unbelievable story. As punishment for crying wolf, C.J.'s mother berates him and sends him to his room for the rest of the day. When C.J. scares his babysitter Kathy (Danny Ronan) by putting on a giant monster costume, the teenage girl threatens to quit and tells Susan that her son is "evil." In what is probably the 'classiest' scene in slasher cinema history, boyfriend Bob makes a passing reference to Michelangelo Antonioni's Blow-Up (1966). Meanwhile, George makes various futile attempts to call his family to tell them to get out of their house, as he cannot stop himself from killing them if they are there when he arrives. George also calls his Doctor and complains, "I'm stronger than the pills," but the Doc ultimately does not get there in time. First, George kills a neighbor girl named Candy (Candy Marchese) and ties her corpse to a chair in the attic of the Temper home, which C.J. and Kathy find. Eventually, George comes to the Temper home as if he is Michael Myers while sporting C.J.'s monster mask (thus Kathy assumes that it is merely C.J. playing another prank) and proceeds to kill everyone in sight. After strangling the babysitter's boyfriend to death and then brutally killing Kathy with a hammer, George heads to C.J.'s room and begins breaking down the door with his hammer. Luckily, C.J. is just as homicidal as his father and blows daddy dearest away with a revolver. When Susan comes home and sees her estranged husband's corpse on the ground, she screams, "That's my husband... That's my husband!," as if it is a big surprise. In the end, C.J. arrogantly sits in a police car and winks at the camera. Luckily, Scavolini opted for not making a worthless sequel.

Unquestionably, Nightmare in a Damaged Brain is a classless, tasteless, and conspicuously corrupt piece of cracked celluloid, yet due to its strangely soothing yet foreboding musical score, elegantly executed murder montages (sorry, Eisenstein!), and striking unhinged gore, it manages to stand out amongst most slasher swill. The fact that Tom Savini hates the film somehow makes me appreciate it even more, as it is quite at odds with the political correct super negro gore of counter-culture auteur George A. Romero. Featuring the sort of Freudian pop psychology typical of similarly less appreciated slasher flicks like Richard Franklin's Patrick (1978) and Ulli Lommel's The Boogeyman (1980), Nightmare in a Damaged Brain is certainly better directed than any of the Friday the 13th films and makes most of the entries in the Halloween franchise seem like hokey hogwash. Indeed, for fans of Mediterranean slasher classics like Mario Bava's A Bay of Blood aka Twitch of the Death Nerve and Juan Piquer Simón's Pieces (1982), Nightmare in a Damaged Brain makes for mandatory viewing. A work that embraces ancestral heritage (the whole "the apple does not fall far from the tree" deal) and marvelously mocks the parenting skills of single mothers, Nightmare in a Damaged Brain thankfully does not fall in line with the contemporary pansy p.c. approach to horror filmmaking, even if it portrays blond beasts butchering babes and whatnot. For those that question Romano Scavolini's talent as a filmmaker, just checkout his work The Blind Fly and wallow in the mind of an existentialist killer and forget you ever saw Nightmare in a Damaged Brain.

NIGHTMARE IN A DAMAGED BRAIN

-Ty E

THE DEATHMAKER

Romuald Karmakar (1995)

While truly subversive kraut cinema essentially went kaput with the tragic, if not predictable, death of Rainer Werner Fassbinder and, in turn, German New Cinema in general, in 1982, a handful of Teutonic filmmakers have attempted to keep up the struggle for truly aesthetically and thematically subversive celluloid that does not bend over for the culture-distorters of Hollywood. Indeed, aside from figures like the late, great scatological multi-media Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensief (Mutter's Maske, The German Chainsaw Massacre) and Berlin-based blond underground beast Jörg Buttgerreit of NEKRomantik (1987) sub-fame, there are not too many Fritzes nowadays who have been pushing the bounds of cinematic sanity, though a certain punk-spirited filmmaker named Romuald Karmakar (Die Nacht singt ihre Lieder aka Nightsongs, Das Himmler Projekt aka The Himmler Project) directed a film about an infamous real-life serial killer named Fritz Haarmann aka "Vampire of Hanover"—a meta-sadistic sodomite with an unquenchable thirst for twink flesh who bugged and butchered no less than 27 of what he described as "joy boys" between 1918 and 1924, though he claimed to have murdered "somewhere between 50 and 70" victims—that, although reasonably subversive in many regards, managed to receive a reasonable amount of commercial and critical prestige upon its initial release nearly two decades ago. Based on the story of a cannibalistic cocksucker that has inspired no less than two masterpieces of German cinema, including Fritz Lang's M (1931) and Ulli Lommel's Fassbinder-produced The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe starring and penned by Kurt Raab, The Deathmaker aka Der Totmacher is a truly Teutonic work directed by a contemporary subversive kraut auteur who, whether intentionally or not, ultimately pays tribute to his cinematic heritage with another film about Herr Haarmann. Released on dvd in the United States under the title Monte Hellman presents The Deathmaker (notably, director Karmakar directed a short fanboy-like doc on Hellman in 1988 entitled Hellman Rider), Karmakar's decidedly demented and even sometimes darkly humorous theatrical quasi-docudrama largely owes its potency to actor Götz George (Tatort, Schtonk!)—the son of great German silent era actor Heinrich George (Fritz Lang's Metropolis, Berlin-Alexanderplatz), who went on to star in a number of National Socialist classics directed by Veit Harlan like Jud Süß (1940) and Kolberg (1945), and was starved to death in a Soviet death camp—who plays the eponymous lead role as a whacky and even goofy gay serial killer who suffered from a major case of erotophonophilia and who, among other things, used to whack off the man-meat of young boys and flush them down his toilet. Indeed, a dialogue-heavy work that is based on the transcripts of the interrogation of sod serial killer Fritz Haarmann and mostly set in a single interrogation room that was directed by a fellow clearly influenced by Prussian conservative auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg as demonstrated by his experimental documentary The Himmler Project (2000) aka Das Himmler Projekt where German Manfred Zapatka actor spends about 3 hours reading a speech given by Reichsführer of the Schutzstaffel (SS) in 1943, The Deathmaker is certainly a work that will probably bore to death most mainstream serial killer movie fetishists who think Hannibal Lecter is a cool dude and regard David Fincher's Se7en (1995) as an unmitigated masterpiece, for Karmakar's audaciously anti-climatic film demands audience participation as an intellectually playful, if not patently perverse, piece of aesthetically audacious celluloid that, in terms of aesthetics, falls somewhere in between the theatric techniques of philo-Semetic kraut commie poet/playwright Bertolt Brecht and the politically-charged works of Reinhard Hauff (Mathias Kneissl, Stammheim - Die Baader-Meinhof-Gruppe vor Gericht). As director Karmakar said himself about the film, The Deathmaker evokes "the motto of Immanuel Kant's enlightenment," as a morally and politically ambiguous work where both the pre-Nazi German state and the sodomite serial killer are simultaneously put on trial, with the filmgoer acting as a judge who must do the seemingly unthinkable by using their own mind and thinking for themselves when it comes to interpreting the dastardly deeds of Haarmann in the context of post-WWI/pre-Hitler Deutschland.

THE DEATHMAKER

The year is 1924 and a somewhat uptight and rather humorless psychology professor named Dr. Ernst Schultze (Jürgen Hentsch) has been summoned to Göttingen to interview and interrogate Hanover-based cannibalistic sodomite serial killer Fritz Haarmann (Götz George) to see if the clearly crazed criminal is mentally fit enough to stand trial for the murder, postmortem molestation, mutilation, and cannibalization of some 27 young boys and twinkles between 1918 and 1924. Due to his background as a police informant, Haarmann has not only gained infamy for maliciously murdering countless young and desperate boys on the fringes of society, but also because he was unwittingly protected by the police while he was at the height of his homo-style homicide campaign, thereupon siring an international scandal that has shaken all of depression era kraut society to the already semi-decayed core. Upon first interviewing Haarmann, Dr. Schultze attempts to gauge the killer's intelligence and educational background and comes to the realization that he is dealing with someone who seems to be borderline retarded and semi-autistic, as it takes the tastelessly charming killer forever to figure how many 100 marks one needs to have 1,000 marks, thus demonstrating his pathetic sub-elementary-school-level education. Indeed, Haarmann himself even admits that the military did not want him because he was listed as an "invalid" (in fact, he was imprisoned around the time that World War I began). Like a lot of homos, Haarmann resents and fears his father, stating regarding his old man, "Even as a little boy I had to work. That's why I couldn't stand him! And he always yelled at me, "You scarey-pants!" I couldn't help shitting my pants. I didn't want to!" When Dr. Schultze attempts to get the sick yet strangely happy-go-lucky literal man-eater to confess that he is a cannibalistic murderer by asking him what sort of meat he uses when making bouillon soup (of course, the secret ingredient is Aryan boy beef), Haarmann evades the question, but it does not take him long to act like a belligerent braggart who takes great pleasure in describing his defiling and dismemberment of various "joy boys." In fact, Haarmann gets so comfortable while talking with the psychologist that he begins hitting on a discernibly shaken Stenographer (Pierre Franckh), who is responsible for transcribing all of the interviews. Indeed, while massaging a piece of paper as if it is a man's bare body, Haarmann stares fiendishly at the noticeably unnerved Stenographer and even attempts to flirt with him in a rather vulgar fashion, but his low IQ and lack of cultivation makes him seem like a pathetic, if not pernicious, fool.

As Haarmann explains while laughing in a rather jovial fashion, he cut his victims' stomachs open with a knife and let their bowels fall out. Aside from selling their mensch meat on the black market, the cannibalistic colon-choker found a variety of disturbingly creative ways to dispose of his victim's body parts, including throwing fingers into a local river (when asked by young boys what he was doing, Haarmann said he was "feeding the fish") and flushing genitals down toilets, but not before cutting them into 3 or 4 pieces, which the killer painstakingly describes as a somewhat hard thing to do due the squishy nature of guy gristles. While not exactly a genius, Haarmann has a rather humorous sense of humor, especially when he rhetorically asks regarding the Professor, "...he knows everything, but keeps asking?," after getting annoyed with Dr. Schultze's pedantic persona and insufferably sterile academic arrogance. When one of Haarmann's escaped victims, Fürsorgezögling Kress (Marek Harloff), swings by the interrogation room to identify the serial killer, the 'Butcher of Hanover' denies knowing him because the boy, who apparently has a major case of scabies, denies they partook in mutual masturbation, as the killer always engaged in this aberrant act with his joy boys. Although having a fiancée that he apparently occasionally had sex with, Haarmann's true love is a young degenerate named Hans Grans, who sold the possessions of his boy toy's victims on the black market, and when Dr. Schultze proposes that the boyfriend should be executed for his dubious involvement in the murders, the saddened serial killer comes to his defense by stating, "he's still young and careless." In fact, Haarmann even momentarily cries when describing the ostensible 'innocence' of his breechloader beau. When asked by the Professor if he has any last requests, Haarmann replies, "A nice cheese sandwich, a nice cup of coffee...and a nice cigar. When we've finished our coffee, we can go. But don't touch. They should say that Fritz Haarmann...went to the scaffold...with colossal, fearless, military courage! Then I'll give a little speech." Towards the end of their interview, Haarmann attempts to talk the Professor into releasing a book based on their interview sessions, declaring, "This book'll make you a millionaire! You'll see. When the trial comes up it'll be a hit. Even in 100 years!" Additionally, the opportunistic lust killer also declares that the Stenographer should also get a "suit" for "working so hard" on transcribing the interrogation and that his boyfriend Hans should get "a few marks, too," for helping with 'solving' the murders. Before their last interview session concludes, Haarmann breaks down and declares that he wants to get to know his executioner because he firmly believes that the hangman, "mußt'n get in contact with commies." While sobbing like a little baby, the severely sullen serial killer also asks Dr. Schultze in a rather desperate fashion, "But you will come back before my head's chopped off?," to which the Professor replies, "Yes, I will come back." Indeed, in the end, it seems that Haarmann has managed to even charm Dr. Schultze, though the quite putridly pedantic Professor would never actually admit it.

THE DEATHMAKER

Winning the Deutscher Filmpreis (the highest and most prestigious film award) for "Best Feature Film," "Best Direction," and "Best Actor" at the 1996 German Film Awards, as well as earning star Götz George the Volpi Cup at the Venice Film Festival and being chosen as Germany's official submission to the 69th Academy Awards for Best Foreign Language Film, The Deathmaker is by no means the typical small and soon forgotten arthouse vanity piece as its various prizes and seemingly unlikely American release certainly prove, thus demonstrating the German public has not been completely mentally colonized and lobotomized by the neo-vaudevillian real-life villains of cinematic vulgarity in Hollywood. Rather unfortunately, aside from a couple somewhat notable exceptions like Der Freie Wille (2006) aka The Free Will directed by Matthias Glasner, Ein Leben lang kurze Hosen tragen (2002) aka The Child I Never Was directed by Kai S. Pieck, a couple films directed by Oskar Roehler (Agnes and His Brothers, The Elementary Particles) and some of auteur Karmakar's subsequent works, German cinema has not really evolved much since the release of The Deathmaker, especially when compared with the great masterworks of German New Cinema created during the 1970s and early 1980s by truly revolutionary auteur filmmakers like Fassbinder, Herzog, Syberberg, Schroeter, Sanders-Brahms, etc. It should be noted that The Deathmaker is also a work of metacinema that pays tongue-in-cheek tribute to the great Haarmann films of the past, as demonstrated by a random scene in the film where the boy-buggering butcher antihero narcissistically remarks, "Me, too, now! I've even made it into the movies! I'm in cinemas all over the world! China, Japan," after the Professor expresses his doubts that the killer is a great man like Napoleon, thus demonstrating the nearly century-long obsession the cinema world and the general public has had with serial killers.

On top of somewhat subtly commenting on the fact that Haarmann was one of the first celebrity serial killers whose crimes were glorified, romanticized, and bastardized by the Weimar press (indeed, from Lang's M to a best-selling 2007 Hanover Tourism Board calendar featuring a caricature of the killer, Haarmann has unquestionably been immortalized for his harrowing homo-cidal deeds), The Deathmaker also somewhat feebly and rather dubiously attempts to establish a link between Haarmann and National Socialism. Indeed, aside from mentioning the fact that the serial killer lived across the street from a Jewish temple, the eponymous antihero makes various seemingly nonsensical anti-communist and anti-Semitic statements throughout the film, especially during a scene where he states the following in a decidedly deranged fashion while absurdly comparing himself to Jesus Christ: "The Jews yelled, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" Now they're yelling at me like that. I never did them any harm, the communists. It must've been the same back then." While not exactly glamorizing Haarmann in a manner comparable to Hannibal Lecter in The Silence of the Lambs (1991), it should also be noted that he is easily the most interesting and likeable character in the entire film because, while Dr. Schultze acts like a humorless and self-righteous dick and the Stenographer is not much more than a skittish automaton-like cipher, the Lustmord-obsessed lunatic is a rather piteous and emotional fellow who clearly suffered his fair share of abuse and social alienation during his all-too-short life. Indeed, not unlike American aberrosexual Aryan serial killer Jeffrey Dahmer, who was a rather lonely fellow who confessed in various interviews that he ate his victims as a warped means to get close to them and "keep a part of them," Fritz Haarmann was a pathetic figure who longed for acceptance and friendship (at one point in the film, he mentions that no one would be his friend because, "I used to shit my pants"), so it is only ironic that it was only when he serially raped, killed, and devoured young boys that he gained the grand reputation in society he so eagerly craved. Undoubtedly, auteur Romuald Karmakar's greatest accomplishment with The Deathmaker is deconstructing the myth of Haarmann's sinister legacy, as a work where one more or less gets to spend an evening with the beast himself. A sort of over-extended yet understated tribute to the underworld trial scene at the conclusion of Fritz Lang's M as directed by the bastard punk rocker son of Brecht, Hauff, and Syberberg, Karmakar's wicked little wonder film is, quite unlike most of the plastically polished works that are defecated out of Deutschland nowadays by solely monetary-motivated studios, a rare piece of legitimate Teutonic kultur that ultimately proves that German cinema is not actually completely dead like one of Haarmann's tragic twink victim, but merely hibernating until a time comes when a more deserving audience is born. Of course, The Deathmaker is more of a condemnation of society than anything else, as it would be pure aesthetic blasphemy to create a classically beautiful work during our spiritually sick zeitgeist, hence why the film was set during the Weimar era.

-Ty E

MANILA
MANILA

Romuald Karmakar (2000)

Although just mere speculation based on a lifelong obsession with cinema and over a decade of studying film, I am going to have to assume that Germans are easily the most cinematically besmirched, reviled, and mocked people in cinema history, with Hebraic Hollywood doing the majority of this beaten-to-death post-WWII Teutophobia (of course, anti-German sentiment goes back at least to the time of the First World War, with Hollywood playing a central role in the hate-campaign against those evil 'Huns'). Indeed, from chief rabbi of the celluloid holocaust Steven Spielberg to infantile toilet-humor comedies like Dodgeball: A True Underdog Story (2004) and Brüno (2009) to philo-Semitic pseudo-arthouse fag Wes Anderson, Hollywood has every angle of kraut-bashing covered, so it seems absolutely unnecessary that German filmmakers themselves would wallow in Germanophobia, yet such filmmakers exist as demonstrated by various directors associated with German New Cinema from the late-1960s to the early-1980s, with Volker Schlöndorff being one of the major pioneers of the so-called 'anti-Heimat' (aka 'anti-homeland' film) sub-genre. Of course, like any so-called 'progressive' nation, Deutschland has received its fair share of untermenschen immigrants from the global south, especially of the Turkish and/or Muslim sort, including a number of filmmakers like Sohrab Shahid Sals (Utopia, Hans - Ein Junge in Deutschland), Kutlug Ataman (Lola and Billy the Kid aka Lola + Bilidikid), and Fatih Akin (The Edge of Heaven, Head-on), who have all paid back their host nation with celluloid Hun-hating. Unquestionably, one of the more curious cases of 'Teutophobia' (if it can even be called that) inside of Germany is the work of contemporary arthouse auteur Romuald Karmakar (The Deathmaker aka Der Totmacher, Nightsongs aka Die Nacht singt ihre Lieder) who, although German by way of birth (he was born in Wiesbaden) and culture, is the racially schizophrenic progeny of an Indian man and a French woman (though one would not be able to tell this by looking at him, as he looks like some sort of Nordic/Mediterranean mix). Of course, as his first feature The Deathmaker (1995)—a work clearly inspired by Fritz Lang's M (1931) and possibly Ulli Lommel's Fassbinder-produced masterpiece The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe—demonstrates, Karmakar clearly considers himself a part of some sort of Teutonic cinematic heritage, albeit a mostly unflattering one filled with sodomite serial killers, genocidal Nazis, and majorly melancholy bourgeois degenerates. Influenced by the revolutionary auteur filmmakers of German New Cinema (in fact, he once worked as an assistant to Bavarian absurdist artist Herbert Achternbusch on the 1989 film Mix Wix) and punk rock, Karmakar has assembled a striking and reasonably subversive oeuvre that has given him a mostly deserved reputation as one of the few interesting and provocative contemporary German filmmakers. Starting with the amateur feature Eine Freundschaft in Deutschland (1985) aka A Friendship in Germany, which features the director playing Adolf Hitler, Karmakar has also demonstrated a lifelong obsession with Teutonic history and kultur, but of course, it is of mostly the dark and negative sort.

Undoubtedly, more than any of the director's other films, Manila (2000) demonstrates Karmakar's love-hate relationship with German history. Promoted with the totally tasteless tagline, "No Matter How Far You Travel, You'll Always Be a Bastard!," the film was almost unanimously trashed by German film critics and filmgoers upon its release to the point where Karmakar apparently felt the need to personally apologize for the film when introducing it at German film festivals. Indeed, as Elke de Wit wrote regarding the film for the Central Europe Review: "The verdict of every single person that I spoke to about MANILA (2000) at the 51st Berlinale was negative. The film was described as boring, predictable, portraying stereotypical Germans and bringing nothing new [...] my suspicions were further aroused when Karmakar virtually apologized for his film as he introduced it to the audience. He said that he did not know why it had been treated so disparagingly by everybody and that he had never intended to offend anyone. He had simply wanted to tell the story of all these individuals." Indeed, depicting a group of Germans stuck at a crowded Philippine airport as a bunch of loud, boorish, brash, vain, prideful, racist, homophobic alcoholic-addled kraut neo-colonialist perverts who sexually and financially exploit yellow people and act with an unwarranted sense of superiority, Manila is certainly more intricately anti-Teutonic than a piece of xenophiliac pseudo-arthouse hipster trash like Wes Anderson's The Darjeeling Limited (2007) where a smartass young American Hebraic hipster type tells off some loud, fag, and ugly elderly German tourists, as if American Jews are the world's foremost patrons of civility. Of course, as a work featuring Fassbinder superstar Margit Carstensen (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven) and Edgar Wallace star Eddi Arent playing himself (and even performing a mock murder mystery), as well as popular contemporary Germany actors like Sky du Mont (Derrick, Kubrick's Eyes Wide Shut), kraut comedian Herbert Feuerstein, Martin Semmelrogge (Das Boot, Derrick), and Jürgen Vogel (Rosenstraße, The Free Will aka Der freie Wille), Manila is a work that wallows in Teutonic cinema history of both the cultivated and kitschy sort. It should also be noted that the film was co-written by German novelist Bodo Kirchhoff, so he certainly deserves some of the blame for the film's Teuton-trashing. A sort of intentionally claustrophobic tragicomedy featuring kraut-cock-loving Jewesses, unsavory sub-Aryan sex tourists, prosaic Jew-pandering school teachers, and pseudo-suave psychopathic airline managers all trapped with one another at a Philippine airport as they wait while in an increasingly agitated state to get back to the Fatherland, Manila unwittingly reveals why traveling aboard can ironically lead to one adopting more nationalistic views.

MANILA

Beginning with footage on a television of a seemingly half-crazed and flaming gay Filipino Christian preacher demanding that his followers “bow your heads” to the “lord” while crying in a creepy fashion, Manila instantly gives the viewer the feeling that the Philippines is a rather culturally and spiritually confused nation due to various Occidental influences. Of course, the Spanish are gone, but now other Europeans, including the Germans, use the Southeast Asian island as their own personal playground. The bourgeois krauts at Manila airport are less than happy as there is a delay for their flight, so they must pass the time by getting drunk and mingling with one another. The guy in charge of the airport, Jochen Osterfeld (Sky du Mont), is a pseudo-charming psychopathic prick that has the gall to ask his hot archotypically Aryan blonde flight attendant named Kerstin (Nina Heimlich), “are you menstruating again?,” after he becomes offended by her tone of voice. Married teachers Regine (Margit Carstensen) and Knut Görler (Peter Rühling) no longer enjoy one another’s company, so the latter begins chatting with an extroverted fellow on the brink of old age named Walter (played by Michael Degen, who previously starred in Roland Klick’s kraut cult classic Supermarkt), who has married a native named Maribel (Chin Chin Gutierrez) and proudly states of his financially beneficial marriage arrangement, “He who marries a Filipina, also marries a whole Philippine village.” Walter is going back to Germany to bury his lifelong comrade Kurt who he met while just a child in the ‘Volkssturm’ (A militia setup during remaining days of WWII comprised of underage boys and old men) and who was a tough man that survived everything, including malaria, but ultimately succumbed to a foul filipina’s deadly diseased snatch. Walter also credits his dead friend Kurt for cleaning up the Philippines by remarking, “It used to be a real nut house before. The lowest level, fags, transvestites...all mixed up. But then Klaus came and cleaned it all up.”

Naturally, brainwashed liberal educator Regine takes some offense to Walter’s remarks and states regarding herself and her semi-cuckolded husband Knut, “We don’t think like that, Mr. Walter. We are both teachers. German and History. And when we for example were in Prague or Warsaw...we knew exactly what that meant. Not only Hradschine...but also Heydrich. Not only ghetto, but also Brandt.” Unluckily for Regine, Knut begins to take a special likening towards alpha-male Walter as he makes him feel more like a real mensch. Meanwhile, a creepy looking kraut named Herbert (played by Manfred Zapatka, who read a 3-hour Heinrich Himmler speech for Karmakar’s 2000 experimental documentary Das Himmler-Projekt aka The Himmler Project), who looks like an older, fatter, and more alien-like version of Conan O’Brien, and his much younger cousin Rudi (Jürgen Vogel) begin chatting up a German-speaking Jewess named Elizabeth (played by mainstream Hollywood actress Elizabeth McGovern, who has starred in everything from Robert Redford’s Ordinary People to Kick-Ass) whose parents fled Deutschland in 1937 but decided it was ok to comeback to the country when charismatic crypto-commie West German chancellor Willy Brandt won the glorious Noble Peace Prize. Herbert is such a patent pig that he makes his introduction to Elizabeth by letting her see a piece of paper with the name "Heike" written on it and then subsequently revealing that it is his wife's name and that it was "written by a pussy" (indeed, apparently the pathetic guy paid a Filipino prostitute a pretty penny to put a paintbrush in her pussy). When Rudi remarks to Elizabeth, "That's interesting, I never spoke to a Jewess..." and Herbert retorts, "There aren't many left in our country anyway...Don't get me wrong," the Jewess replies to them by strangely stating, "I get you right, don't worry. We're all not kosher." After revealing her seemingly ethno-masochistic fetish for Aryan men, Elizabeth recites poetry that acts as a major theme of the film: "A German at home...that's an ideal world and for that reason not very interesting [...] A German far away from home...that's always a small, open wound."

In a feeble attempt to appease the increasingly agitated German passengers, airport manager Jochen Osterfeld brings out old school German star Eddi Arent as entertainment and proudly states that the man has starred in 28 Edgar Wallace films (Rudi corrects him by stating, "In 29, you fag!"). To keep them entertained, Arent plays out a mock murder mystery in the middle of the airport and boorish bastard Herbert is fittingly named as the killer after the actor uses Thomas Mann's classic 1912 novel Death in Venice as a clue. Meanwhile, a degenerate Austrian would-be-pimp pervert named Franz (Martin Semmelrogge), who has a pathological obsession with showing off his prized "redwing shoes" and lurks around the bathroom as if he owns the place, attempts to hook up various German tourists with Filipino prostitutes and even shows nerd Knut photographs of filthy-looking Flip gashes, to which the teacher remarks regarding his wife's 'Casa Vulva', "Regine's does look different." Although it is never made clear who she actually is, a Filipino janitor that resembles an obese 12-year-old American Indian boy named Mercy (Ces Quesada) is constantly at Franz's side and she seems to take pride in the fact that she is with the most spastic, degenerate, and seemingly half-autistic Austrian in all of the Philippines. Meanwhile, Herbert becomes agitated while talking to his cousin Rudi about his wife and it is soon revealed that the angry kraut is secretly receiving a blowjob from a Filipino under the table, as if receiving oral sex makes him all the more angry and hateful. Of course, eventually everyone at the airport notices Herbert's indiscretion and Jewess Elizabeth sardonically remarks while alluding to the holocaust regarding the unsavory scenario, "If Buchenwald had seen more of that, the Germans would be better off now." Since he did not get to finish what he began with the flip flirtina cop-all, Hotheaded Herbert opts for going solo and unloading his sub-Aryan seed in the bathroom and fucked Franz, who seems to be on the verge of suffering a cataclysmic autistic fit, follows him and goes completely crazy, accusing him of owing him money for hooking up with a prostitute (for whatever reason, Franz seems to think both Filipino women and the airport bathroom are his own personal property). While furiously masturbating, Herbert begins to weep while Franz continues to pound on the bathroom stall in an increasingly fanatical and spasmodic fashion. After everything is said and done, Hebert busts a load in the toilet and Franz's fat untermensch lady friend leaves him, but not before calling him a "cheater" and a "pig." At the other end of the airport, Knut's wife Regine, who is quite mousy and hopelessly introverted, starts a conversation with Walter's young Filipina wife Maribel about how she and her husband fought for 20 years to set up a memorial for the Jews, "so the remembrance of the holocaust should not fade," as if the so-called Shoah is not thrown in German peoples' faces 24/7. Meanwhile, hyper horny kraut Rudi manages to get his miscegenation on with Jewess Elizabeth, thus hinting that there might finally be peace between Germans and Jews. At the end of the film, all the German passengers get together in a dichotomous scene depicting the two extremes of German kultur; as what starts with Knut conducting an imaginary orchestra devolves into a beer-hall sing-a-long song worthy of the drunkest of brownshirts. The scene becomes all the more significant when one considers what director Karmakar once said regarding the film: "I see this film as one great human orchestra. It was my task to write the score so that it didn't degenerate into a cacophony, but produced a melody in five bars or acts." Of course, in the end, the Germans finally make their way back to Deutschland, but not before leaving their irreparable mark on the Southeast Asian island.

MANILA

A rare German 'dramedy' that is not totally retarded, completely unfunny, and aesthetically insipid like Good Bye Lenin! (2003) and countless horrendous Til Schweiger films, Manila is ultimately a rare film that attempts to depict both the good and bad regarding the German people without resorting to too many cliché kraut stereotypes (of course, the film features many of the typical stereotypes, but also features a couple of new ones as well). Indeed, a work of cultivated krautsploitation directed by a man who seems more influenced by Brecht than Russ Meyer, Karmakar's quasi-chamber-piece (or 'neo-Kammerspielfilm') is softcore Teutophobia with a bittersweet heart that, unlike the cinematic works of an adamant anti-kraut like Spielberg, features next to nil ill will to the Teutons, but instead merely pokes fun at their supposed quirks and idiosyncrasies in a rather playful, if not sometimes borderline pernicious, fashion. That being said, I can practically imagine Karmakar during pre-production of the work driving around in his car while blasting Rammstein and dreaming up scenarios for the film. More than anything, Manila—with its large cast of curious characters, long scenes of dialogue, and somewhat minimalistic laidback style—seems like an aberrant Aryan take on the theatric yet naturalistic and mostly plot-less films of American auteur Robert Altman (Nashville, Short Cuts). While not exactly as good as Karmakar's minor masterpiece Deathmaker, Manila is unquestionably infinitely more interesting than Spielberg's similarly themed Tom Hanks vehicle

The Terminal (2004). With its overt and not so overt references to the holocaust and cast of mostly homely (if not sometimes downright ugly) krauts, not to mention the fact that the film received a considerably negative backlash in Germany, Manila is a film that should have inspired some new young German auteur filmmakers to direct films that more adequately depict their countrymen just as the laughably horrendous Hollywood miniseries Holocaust (1978) inspired Edgar Reitz and various other filmmakers of German New Cinema, who wanted to take their history and heritage back from foreign hands, to create their own masterpieces, but it seems that contemporary Germany has a serious void when it comes to serious auteur filmmakers. Notably, not one of the characters featured in Karmakar's film seem like they have the capacity to be a great Sturmbannführer, but then again, none of the characters seem like they have what it takes to be a great artist like an F.W. Murnau or even a Max Ernst either, as if the Fatherland is out of geniuses and only has rich boorish assholes who only know how to consume as opposed to produce. While World War II was certainly quite dsygenic for Germany, I do not believe the land of poets and thinkers has completely degenerated into a post-völkisch technocratic nightmare of banal bureaucrats and beer-bellied buffoons. With that being said, I think communal viewings of Manila and readings of Nietzsche might be more beneficial to the next generation of German film students than analyzing Sergei Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin (1925) and learning the latest 'cutting-edge' techniques from industrial filmmakers in Hollywood. Indeed, a somewhat wicked work of kraut constructive criticism as created by a racial outsider, Karmakar's film is proof that, in some small way, members of the Ausländer community can contribute to society, even if it is virtually always in a 'negative' way.

-Ty E

SCHIZOPHRENIAC: THE WHORE MANGLER
SCHIZOPHRENIAC: THE WHORE MANGLER

Ron Atkins (1997)

Schizophreniac: The Whore Mangler is an all American comedy more than anything. Schizophrenic Italian-American Harry Russo and his doll have a bone to pick with the world. Mr. Russo has decided to dedicate his life to killing dirty whores and dressing in drag. Russo doesn't give a shit about anyone or anything. He is also unaware that he is one of the greatest comedians alive.

Schizophreniac was shot on video but director Ron Atkins made sure to provide extremely offensive material to make up for the lack of production values. The actor that played Harry Russo, John Ginacaspro, gives off one of the most insanely passionate performances that one could expect from a low budget film. I wouldn't be surprised if Ginacaspro took pointers from Robert De Niro's performance in Taxi Driver. Harry Russo almost makes Travis Bickle look like a bitch.

Schizophreniac isn't the first film dealing with a mentally unstable Italian-American man that has mother issues. William Lustig's Maniac featured Joe Spinell as Frank Zito in a female hating frenzy. The difference between Schizophreniac and Maniac is that Ginacaspro goes for psycho comedy whereas Spinell wanted to portray the certifiably insane. Harry Russo certainly mangles some naked whores while achieving hate filled gratification. Frank Zito, on the other hand, attempts to fit in society and ultimately fails horribly as his brutal woman killing confirms.

There is no shortage of violence and nudity in Schizophreniac. Harry Russo especially likes to get naked (unfortunately) when wearing lipstick and a Twisted Sister style wig. The ways in which Russo aggressively talk and act are poetic to say the least. It is the kind of poetry that you would expect to see in the alley of the ghetto section of little Italy. Actor John Ginacaspro is obviously one of those types of characters you meet in real life and never forget.

I am a supporter of real independent and low budget filmmaking. As can be expected, most low budget films are complete shit. Ron Atkin's Schizophreniac is an exception to the afflicted world of extremely low budget filmmaking. When you have a star like John Ginacaspro and a director with an eye for entertainment like Ron Atkins, it is hard to go wrong.

-Ty E

THE CUCKOO CLOCKS OF HELL

Ron Atkins (2011)

When I heard about the film The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell (2011) directed by Ron Atkins, an exceedingly trashy apocalyptic work featuring lunatic-leads of truly obscure cult cinema, Terry Hawkins (the anti-hero of Roger Watkins' 1977 cult masterpiece Last House on Dead End Street that was played by Watkins himself) played by Jim Van Bebber (director of Deadbeat at Dawn and The Mansion Family) and Harry Russo (the anti-hero of Ron Atkins' Schizophreniac: The Whore Mangler and Necromaniac: Schizophreniac 2) played by John Giancaspro, I was a tad bit skeptical of such an ambitious movie scenario, especially considering the film was shot in digital video; a medium in stark contrast to the gritty 16mm film used for its extremely influential predecessor Last House on Dead End Street. I initially watched The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell at 4am on a Thursday night, which turned out to be a wholly surreal and hypnotic (if thoroughly mentally deranging), but strangely pleasurable, sort of scenario, which proved to be just as power on subsequent (and more mentally cognizant) viewings. After all, hearing Jim Van Bebber incessantly yelling, "NIGGER" whilst giggling like the maniacal midget 'Hombre' from Werner Herzog's classic Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) is even a delightfully idiosyncratic experience for such a fundamentally contra politically correct individual like myself. While The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell is unsurprisingly a tribute to the Schizophreniac films and, most specifically, the late Roger Watkins' sole masterpiece Last House on Dead End Street, the film is also an unhinged libertine homage to the iconic American film The Wizard of Oz (1939), featuring apish white-men in monkey masks and a wicked bitch witch with suave neo-psychedelic style. Although featuring a plot, the individual segments of The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell, which range from frenzied quasi-vaudevillian comedy acts to mock-snuff footage, are ultimately more significant than the whole. After a brief lover's spat upon initially meeting in Las Vegas, Terry Hawkins and Harry Russo, a virtual Beavis and Butthead from Hell, become unwaveringly loyal comrades of carnage and search for the mysterious "Nigger of Cause" whilst following the magnificent "Nigger Brick" road. On their magical mystery tour for the unholy desert grail, the two playful psychopaths rape Jewish bitches, humorously hail Uncle Adolf, malevolently murder negro-like monkey-men, and share plenty of laughs, among many other splendid activities.

Aesthetically and thematically, The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell is easily Ron Atkins' greatest and most ambitious accomplishment as a filmmaker. While the film does feature a number of realist home-video-style scenes that Atkins is well known for, The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell also features a storm of potent picturesque outdoor scenes as Hawkins and Russo cruise the Nigger Brick Road, as well as a number of colorful skits of Giancaspro performing as a variety of quotable personas, ranging from a stereotypical china-man to an abortion-venerating pseudo-Dracula. If Atkins goal was to infuse The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell with the aura and atmosphere of a truly trashy post-apocalyptic scenario, he indubitably succeeded, as I felt like I was watching a film discovered in a trailer park time-capsule left from some imaginary second American Civil War. Undoubtedly, the vigorously violent (yet hilarious) racial hatred that permeates throughout The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell would be a major catalyst for such a scenario. During The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell, Watkins candidly describes his transformation from being racially apathetic to a staunch and unrepentant racist. In such fanatically politically-correct times, the mainstream proclivity towards 'racial sensitivity' seems to have only fanned the flames of race-hate in a country that now has its first mulatto president. In my most humble opinion, the greatest achievement of The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell is providing a therapeutic outlet for those individuals that find themselves increasingly intolerant of so called tolerance and repelled by the putrid stench of pc-swill. While featuring a wealth of brutal rape and kindred-spirit killings, The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell is ultimately an unconventional "post-modern" comedy that is highly conscious of both obscure cult cinema and America's most critical (and unspoken) domestic issues.

THE CUCKOO CLOCKS OF HELL

While filming Last House on Dead End Street, director Roger Watkins was consistently high on amphetamine. Although he spent about $3000.00 on the drugs that would fuel his film direction and infamous performance as Terry Hawkins, Watkins only spent around $800.00 on the actual production of Last House on Dead End Street, which is undoubtedly a great achievement on his part. Jim Van Bebber has also admitted that he had partaken in mind-altering substances during the production of The Manson Family (2003), so it is only befitting that he would later play the role of Terry Hawkins in The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell. I can only hypothesize that the same, somewhat reckless, recreational activity went on during the making of The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell as such subversive behavior is merely part of a long and grand tradition of cult filmmaking. I must commend Ron Atkins for The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell considering that not only is it his movie Magnum opus, but it is also a worthy and canonized tribute to Last House on Dead End Street and the filmmaker's late friend Roger Watkins. Not merely parroting the legacy of its predecessor, The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell is Last House on Dead End Street seen through the lens of Ron Atkin's own distinct and pleasantly peculiar universe. In short, The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell is mandatory-viewing for any true fan of cult films, especially those individuals that don't get yeast infections from hearing wonderful words like "chink" and "spick."

Roger Michael Watkins (September 17, 1948 – March 6, 2007)

Throughout The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell, the character of Terry Hawkins continuously looks on with a smirk at the loony antics of Harry Russo in gleeful approval. I believe that is how Roger Watkins would have responded to The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell had he lived long enough to see it.

-Ty E

TREMORS
TREMORS

Ron Underwood (1990)

It's a lot easier to scare someone to put them in a quasi-realistic scenario. That might even be the reason why they decided to let the events of one of America's greatest horror films unfold upon rural America. Two Jack-of-all-trades everymen get caught up in a parasite warfare underneath the ground. Creatures with the potential ability to travel under dirt at high velocities begin to devour people from the ground. The very concept of rednecks facing paranormal danger isn't anything new. It's been shown in Chris Carter's The X-Files and even Men In Black (MIB.) These figures of life get grabbed from underground and gobbled up by giant worms. I must be honest, the creature design is nothing short of amazing. It's a shame when you realize the point of the film was to build suspense on the monster's physical features, yet the poster brandishes its huge face. What a buzz kill. Kevin Bacon plays the main redneck. He is the smart ass one with the wit and flowing locks. Due to films attacking every superstition or abnormal fear, Ron Underwood decided to expand the old "Don't step on a crack, You'll break your mother's back" scene and turn it into a nightmare, whereas the only place you are safe at, is on a rock in the middle of nowhere. A similar film element is also found in Critters. Why does Hollywood hate the country so much? Tremors is a horror comedy. What's so rare about this one, is that it is actually funny. A reckless hero is found in Michael Gross, who plays Burt. Burt is the guy we always laugh at. the one who has an obsession with cleaning and collecting guns he never uses. Well now, It looks like he might have a chance to enter some guerrilla warfare in his own backyard. The film might as well give step-by-step instructions on how to create a home-made bomb. Walter Chang is the local nut job oriental who owns the convenience store. What a stereotype, eh? Using his insanity in a speech, he dubs the creatures "Graboids." Yet another hint that the rural parts don't exactly teem with intelligence. Tremors is yet another great film which is bogged down by a horrible franchise of several sequels and a syndicated television series. While the 2nd film being nearly as entertaining, It loses most of the charm that the first film carried like a medallion.

-Maq

FUTURE-KILL

Ronald W. Moore (1985)

After watching horror film after horror film, you find less and less that you want to comeback to. Many are forgettable or at the very least have no type of replay value. Its not that they are bad films, but you get all you can out of them after just one viewing. This is especially true in regards to more obscure and unknown horror flicks. After watching Future-Kill, directed and co-written by Ronald W. Moore, I felt I had found something that I could pop into my DVD player anytime and watch. Not that it is the greatest film ever made or in any way artistically merited. Future-Kill is just a fun film that you can watch with your friends anytime. It has just enough laughs and gore to keep a group of people happy. Don't let the cover artwork by H.R. Giger deceive you. Future-Kill is faraway from being in the darkly erotic nature of Giger's work. Instead what you get is a mixture between National Lampoon's Animal House, The Warriors, and a very slight hint of David Cronenberg. Future-Kill's antagonist Splatter has a couple sexual problems for perv Freudians out there. Future-Kill was directed in 1985, around the time that the American Hardcore punk scene started to die out. The mutants in the film seem to represent that subculture both politically and aesthetically. The frat boys represent that typical naive American looking to have fun and not give a shit about anything or anyone else. One of the things that makes Future-Kill so interesting is the interaction between the frat boys and the mutants. This interaction makes for a fun survival flick in the middle of a man made zoo; the city. Gore and killing are abundant in Future-Kill but not exclusive to the rest of the film. The combination of all elements of the film is what makes Future-Kill enjoyable. With its combination of synthesizer based music, cyberpunk wardrobe, cheap boob shots, and unapologetically lame jokes, Future-Kill keeps you interested throughout. Future-Kill is a great flick for anyone out there looking to add something new to their DVD collection. At the very least you won't be disappointed. Its full of 80's nostalgia for those born in the era of the 8 Bit NES system and synthesizer based music. I'm sure Future-Kill can be fit into a marathon viewing of The Evil Dead, Dawn of the Dead, Fast Times at Ridgemont High, and Maniac.

-Ty E

DIE BETTWURST
DIE BETTWURST

Rosa von Praunheim° (1971)

Undoubtedly, there are few things more banal than leftists, oftentimes themselves (failed) members of the petite bourgeoisie, complaining about the bourgeoisie (i.e. non-poor white heterosexual gentiles), but when approached by the right person in the right context, it can sometimes be accomplished in a successful manner that does not inspire one to blow their brains out. Indeed, utilizing his own aged aunt in the leading role where she essentially plays herself in a performance that is clearly largely improvised, Berlin-based auteur Rosa von Praunheim (City of Lost Souls, Anita: Dances of Vice) was able to create a satire of the bourgeoisie with his first feature-length narrative film Die Bettwurst (1971) aka The Bolsters, a campy and culturally cynical work that playfully assaults the so-called institution of marriage in its devastatingly dopey and kitschy depiction of an ostensible 'romance' between a woman well into her middle-age and an emotionally hysterical, high-strung, and flamingly faggy 30-year-old homosexual. An assault on both the bourgeoisie and closet cocksuckers disguised as a campy no-budget sitcom with next to no plot, Die Bettwurst is somewhat 'gentle' for a Rosa von Praunheim film as it features next to nil nudity, gross-out scenarios, sexual perversion, or blatant poof agitprop as it was made before the director declared his war against heterosexuality with the celluloid manifesto It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971). Starring von Praunheim's real-life aunt Luzi Kryn—a slightly chubby chipmunk-like woman who loves attention and hates men—playing herself in a rather ridiculous performance where she constantly looks directly at the camera to make sure it is following her every move, as well as gigolo-turned-actor Dietmar Kracht, who died under mysterious conditions in 1976 after downing a bottle of whisky and jumping in a lake, Die Bettwurst features one of the most pleasantly annoying odd couples of cinema history as a sort of platinum blonde Bonnie and Clyde of bad bourgeois bad taste in what amounts to the director's hetero-hating thoughts on marriage. Featuring the aesthetic and melodramatic prowess of an odiously outmoded 1970s soap opera had it been directed by John Waters' kraut cousin, Die Bettwurst is ultimately a rare celluloid critique of marriage and the middleclass that has a certain hokey humanity to it that reminds viewers how futile it is for certain homosexuals to understand heterosexual marriage and monogamy, as if suffering from a sort of spiritual autism. Directed by a man who once admitted a sense of relief when his auteur archenemy Rainer Werner Fassbinder—the master of naked Teutonic melodrama and alpha-auteur of the German New Wave—overdosed in 1982, Die Bettwurst signaled the arrival of German New Wave's closest thing to a queer Troma-like exploitation filmmaker.

As a single middleclass woman well into her middle-age years who lives a rather sedentary and passionless existence incessantly hiding herself in her apartment and striking vogue poses for no one but herself, Luzi Kryn's favorite pastime is complaining about petty problems, including three 'problems' (wrong color, wrong spelling of maiden name, and wrong font style) regarding a gravestone that she bought for her deceased mother, one of the few people she had to talk to in life and someone she certainly modeled her own mundane life after. One day while strutting like a gay peacock down a shipyard in all black, including black leather, blatantly gay Teutonic twink Dietmar Kracht runs into mature floozy Luzi, who immediately berates him for being so careless as to drop money on the ground, arrogantly describing the stranger as "grossly negligent." Before they both know it, the two 'fall in love' at first sight, telling each other their life stories. Dietmar confesses he has always lost things since he was a young child due to his 'terrible nervousness,' but luckily he is a kleptomaniac so anything he loses he makes up for in the end. Originally from Mannheim, Dietmar sounds like a flaming Boris Becker and discusses his personal history to Luzi as if every moment of it was nothing short of a trying tragedy. Losing his mother at the mere age of 15 over 15 years ago in the Netherlands from uterine cancer, Dietmar finds a sort of 'mother' figure in Luzi, who can relate as her own mommy just died. More important, Dietmar, as a hyper homo of the pathologically narcissistic and absurdly superficial sort, loves Luzi's platinum hair, telling her, "You have hair like my mother. And like me," but, of course, the little lady loves wearing wigs as demonstrated by the fact that she is sporting a different one in every single scene of Die Bettwürst.

Growing up in the Red Light district of Mannheim where he cavorted with criminal hoodlums and wanton whores, Dietmar, who has really screwed up teeth that give a pretty good idea of the poverty his life has been plagued with and a rather scrawny physique despite his propensity for showing it off via short shorts, decided to make his escape to the Northern German city Kiel, which proved to be a good investment as that is where he met Luzi, a mature middle-class woman old enough and desperate enough to accept a proletarian poof as her beloved boy toy. A hysterical and histrionic woman who proves to be a constant source of unintentional humor, Luzi has no problem admitting she hates men as she stabbed one of her ex-boyfriends and caused another to attempt suicide, but luckily Dietmar has changed that and vice versa. Typically having to find refuge in sluts from the red district due to the fact that bourgeois girls would literally sneer at him due to his 'common' background, Dietmar finally finds 'true love' and happiness in Luzi and learns to become a productive member of the TV-worshiping, shopping-loving lower middle-class. In a rather absurd 'love scene' of the heavy petting puffery-ridden sort, Dietmar confesses his love for Luzi's breasts, eyes, hair, 'everything' and how he would kill himself without her, which the little lady loves hearing. Naturally, Luzi wallows in the attention, thus confirming their imaginary status as soulmates. After having what is assumedly hot and steamy coitus, Dietmar confess his past life as a petty criminal, how he spent time in prison, which scared him straight, and his fear that his old friends are looking for him, but Luzi promises to protect him in her bourgeois dreamworld where no bad guy could possibly appear. Luzi ultimately teaches Dietmar how to live the proper middle-class life, which includes warm and sensual showers, passionate vacuuming, gardening, cooking, watching every color TV program (“theater of late”), celebrating Christmas gift-giving with a plastic tree, and dancing at subpar restaurants. Unfortunately, trouble arrives in paradise when Dietmar’s old mafia comrades kidnap Luzi, but the heroic boyfriend wastes no time (aside from a bit of crying, panting, and stammering) in hunting down the goons and shooting one of them with a gun on a beach, thus saving his beloved lover as a neurotic knight in shining armor. In the end, after being absurdly helped by one of the mafia hoodlums into a small plane, Dietmar and Luzi flee for paradise.

DIE BETTWURST

Taking its name from a sausage-shaped neck pillow—an unflattering symbol of mundane middleclass comfort if there ever was one—that Luzi gives Dietmar for Christmas, Die Bettwurst is a cynical camp anti-celebration of the kraut bourgeois that, somewhat paradoxically, manages to give a soul, albeit a superlatively schlocky one, to the seemingly soulless, which auteur Rosa von Praunheim would ultimately do in a much different context for homos, hustlers, homely hags, and other human rabble with his subsequent films. Die Bettwurst was followed by one official sequel, Die Berliner Bettwurst (1975), which also starred Luzi Kryn and Dietmar Kracht, but considering the latter of whom died in a mysterious drowning accident, what could have evolved into a full on sitcom considering both of the film’s popularity, ultimately died prematurely. Although, it should be noted that in von Praunheim’s ‘erotic’ campy cannibal-themed short Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? (1999), the director’s aunt Luzi Kryn would reprise her role as the absurdly annoying woman who demands that men (most specifically, gay porn star Jeff Stryker) worship her. In terms of kraut cinema and cultural history, Die Bettwurst is assuredly a sad sign of how Teutonic cinema has degenerated since F.W. Murnau, himself a homosexual, and Leni Riefenstahl because, while the former two promoted German culture and traditions, Rosa von Praunheim’s film mocks Aryan culture, particularly that of the middle-class, into oblivion, ultimately portraying the gay lifestyle and even prostitution as preferable to bourgeois life. Though, to be fair, von Praunheim would later berate middle-age bourgeois faggots in his agitprop work It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971), portraying them as pernicious parasites who take in young twinkles and glamor them with their wealth and knowledge of culture. The closeted gay character played by Dietmar Kracht of Die Bettwurst is basically summed up in the following quote from the documentary, “As the gays are being despised by the square as ill and inferior, they try to become more square to remove their guilty feeling with an excess of bourgeois virtues. They are politically passive and act conservative in gratitude for not being beaten to death. Gays are ashamed of their sexual orientation, for they were told for centuries what hogs they are. Therefore they escape from that horrible reality into the romantic world of kitsch and ideals. Their dreams are dreams of clossies, dreams about a man, at whose side they are being released from the adversities of every day life into a world that only consists of love and romance. Not the homosexuals are perverse, but the situation, in which they have to live in." Of course, whatever situation von Praunheim may be in, he will always be perverse and his first feature Die Bettwurst demonstrates that he is a fellow who finds ordinary lifestyles perverse, thus the film acts as a sort of window into the homo soul where traditions like Christmas and strolls in the park are treated with the utmost malice, which is certainly more respectable and honest than mainstreaming propaganda faggot trash like Will & Grace.

-Ty E

IT IS NOT THE HOMOSEXUAL WHO IS PERVERSE, BUT THE SOCIETY IN WHICH HE LIVES

IT IS NOT THE HOMOSEXUAL WHO IS PERVERSE, BUT THE SOCIETY IN WHICH HE LIVES

Rosa von Praunheim° (1971)

Despite its ludicrously longwinded title, the groundbreaking underground homophobic flick It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971) aka Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt directed by Germany's most hysterical auteur queen – the always rabble-rousing Rosa von Praunheim (Tally Brown, New York, A Virus Knows No Morals) – is not exactly the most flattering tribute to the Fatherland's sodomite subculture, but more of a condemnation of how these gay boys tend to live their lives; strutting, sucking, and fucking with not a care in their minds, except how well they dress, dance, and debate petty cultural sentiments. No stranger to hostile homosexualist controversy, but instead, a perverted provocateur who loves to wallow in it, von Praunheim attached the taunting tagline, "This is our Holocaust, New York City is our Auschwitz, Ronald Reagan is our Hitler" to his documentary Positive (1990) and launched a libelous account against fellow German New Wave queer Rainer Werner Fassbinder with his shamelessly sensational documentary Fassbinder's Women (2000) aka Fassbinder Was the Only One for Me: The Willing Victims of Rainer Werner F, yet the pseudo-aristocratic auteur also proved that he could also lash out at his own sexual compatriots with It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse...; a work that is what modern political Zionist founder Theodor Herzl's political tract Der Judenstaat (1896) was to international Jewry. While Herzl's purported to have an answer to the Jewish question, prissy von Praunheim ultimately proposes in his documentary that, "Let's work together with the blacks and women's liberation. Get involved politically. Being gay is not a career"; a strategy that seems to have been militantly followed by mainstream gaydom if one were to go by the fact that America has its first homophiliac, mulatto president. Indeed, It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse... is indubitably a gritty celluloid pity party with vindictive victimhood sprinkled throughout, but it is also a call to cock-sucking arms that condemns the individualistic homosexual for not adopting a collectivist quasi-bolshie-buggerer stance.

Part pseudo-docudrama and part filmic manifesto, It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse... follows a novice homo named Daniel (Bernd Feuerhelm) as he endures a rite of passage of anal penetration of sorts in his new hometown of gay Berlin. Unschooled in the unofficial laws and mores of proper sodomite society, Daniel has no inkling as to the emotional and physical abuse that he will endure at the hands of more aggressive and predatory elder gays. Although attempting pseudo-matrimony with a more experienced sexual invert named Clemens (Berryt Bohlen), the relationship only lasts a mere four months, thus leaving Daniel emotionally vulnerable to packs of bestial leather fags, rich old queens, and other assorted narcissistic poofers with unsavory intentions. Eventually, Daniel begins to learn the tricks of the cock-teasing trade, henceforth becoming one of the hottest twink bachelors in Berlin-Gaydenberg and securing a job at a hip gay bar, but it will take him a lot of random sexual encounters in bars, tearooms, and drag shows to realize there is more to homosexuality than pompous haircuts and backroom blowjobs. In It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse..., von Praunheim describes quintessential gay marriage as a poor and rather pathetic imitation of heterosexual marriage where mutual duties are replaced by idealistic and totally unrealistic love that is really about 'self-love' and idol worship. Inevitably, the homosexual wedlock falls apart because of self-centeredness and mutual competition. Due to their innate megalomaniacal self-worship, many homosexuals are doomed to, "loneliness, and a vast void...cluttered with new imaginary and vain dreams." It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse... even goes as far as stating of gay men that, "they are stuck at an infantile level," thus concurring with the theory that some homosexuals merely never reached sexual maturity, hence their proclivity towards the same sex aka fucking one's self. While the 'leather fag' is presented as the gay subculture whose, "masculinity is damaged the most," the repellant flaming queen is portrayed as the most honest homosexual, if to a most exaggerated and society antagonistic degree. Needless to say, It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse... is the sort of 'politically incorrect' vintage portrayal that mainstream propagandists from various so-called "LGBT" special interest groups would absolutely disdain and condemn, had the film been released recently.

Undoubtedly, Rosa von Praunheim is the most infamous/famous gay activist filmmaker in German history and very possibly in the entire world, thereupon making It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives mandatory for serious cinephiles and queer kultur aficionados alike. With its positively piss poor cinematography, mundane melodrama, and inciting off-screen narration, this undeniably interesting (if for all the wrong reason!) and curiously captivating work makes for an oddball cinematic odyssey that is akin to being an active voyeur in early 1970s Berlin seedy sodomite scene, except without having to deal with all the real-life effete drama. Due to its less than graceful direction, rather contrived scenarios, and overall absurdly awkward aesthetic and thematic essence, It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse... oftentimes feels like a cracked cross between a cultural anthropologist documentary and a Mondo Cane movie that is poorly patched together with an assertive narrated political rant. Of course, as expressed in the film, von Praunheim would be the first to admit that the supposed artistic superiority of the homosexual is an old wives' tale as aesthetic interest is merely a way to make the miserable homo's life more endurable, so one must not look down on the activist auteur for the creative ineptitude of It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse...; a work that will make you laugh, cringe, wince and feel embarrassed due to its unabashedly honest projection of homosexual lifestyles. If Rosa von Praunheim has a single greatest attribute as a filmmaker, it is his Aspergers-like audaciousness as a patently peculiar propagandist of perversity and his early work It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse... is certainly no exception.

IT IS NOT THE HOMOSEXUAL WHO IS PERVERSE, BUT THE SOCIETY IN WHICH HE LIVES

-Ty E

TALLY BROWN, NEW YORK

Rosa von Praunheim^o (1979)

I don't know what it is about fags and loud, bossy, and belligerent fat chicks, but they seem to go together like puke and whisky. Of course, with the homo-homogenizing LGBT propaganda machine, it seems every cutesy ditz bitch in high school nowadays wants her own pet poof friend as demonstrated by recent trash pseudo-quirky queer teen comedies like G.B.F. (2013). Long before fags made for trendy accessories for heterosexual chicks, there existed depraved women known as fag hags—typically lecherous, masculine, and repugnant women of the morally retarded sort—who were in solidarity with homos, as kindred corroded spirits of sorts. Undoubtedly, probably no other filmmaker in cinema history has had such an affinity for the most repulsive and grotesque of fag hags than kraut aberrosexual agitator Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Your Heart in My Head), who got his start pushing vulgar old women into low-camp films when he opted for casting his own aunt as the dubious lover of a young hustler in his first feature Die Bettwurst (1970), which spawned the sequel Berliner Bettwurst (1973) and the short quasi-sequel Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? (1999). While Lotti Huber (Anita: Dances of Vice aka Anita – Tänze des Lasters, Affengeil)—an old Der Stürmer-worthy Jewess who was a cabaret dancer during the Weimar era—was arguably von Praunheim's 'greatest' discovery in terms of wayward overweight women, American Jewess Tally Brown certainly held her own in terms of audacious anti-beauty as a degenerate diva of debauchery. Indeed, with his documentary Tally Brown, New York (1979), which offers a telling cinematic portrait of Tally, von Praunheim managed to receive the German Film Award in Silver for 'Outstanding Non-Feature Film' in 1979. To von Praunheim's credit, Tally Brown, New York is a priceless work for those interested in underground cinema of the 1960s, as the eponymous subject starred in various films directed by Andy Warhol and Gregory J. Markopoulos. Indeed, appearing in the lost Warhol/Smith collaboration Batman Dracula (1964) and Markopoulos' homosexualized feature-length Aeschylus adaptation The Illiac Passion (1967), Brown certainly solidified her place in cinema history, even if she does not seem to understand the magnitude of her contributions. A big woman that some might mistake as a big man in drag, Tally Brown was a classically trained singer who opted for a life of nocturnal debauchery instead of opera and decided to become what she described as the 'white Billie Holiday,' ultimately becoming one of the first 'white' jazz singers to perform at negro strip joints and degenerate venues in Las Vegas. In von Praunheim's Tally Brown, New York, Brown discusses how much she loved working for the mafia, being a friend of tragic tranny Candy Darling, and smoking dope for over two decades without feeling the slightest inkling towards dependency.

Beginning with a shot of giant sign with the film's title, Tally Brown, New York immediately lets the viewer know that they are about to encounter a star diva of sorts, but of course, being a Rosa von Praunheim film, it is not a woman that any heterosexual man would ever want to screw, even while they are drunk. In what is unquestionably a great way to make an introduction, Tally first appears in the documentary singing a cover of David Bowie's hit song "Heroes", but she changes up the lyrics a little bit and adds her own line, "I...I can be a bitch so you stay stoned all the time but were lovers and that is a fact" and concludes the song in German (Bowie also did a version of the song in German entitled "Helden"). The kind of gal that would have enjoyed being featured in Kenneth Anger's Hollywood Babylon, Tally is quite candid about her life, but it still seems like a lot is left out of the doc, as one can only cram so much material in a 90 minute film. Growing up in a Jewish neighborhood of NYC populated by Teutonized Hebrews who escaped Uncle Adolf's National Socialist Germany, Tally was born to a man in real estate but she seems somewhat evasive about her upbringing, stating to von Praunheim after he asks about her childhood, "How did I grow up? Like everyone else!", as if it was an intrusive question. An innately cosmopolitan individual, Tally talks with great joy about how NYC is such a great and constantly changing place where immigrant communities come in, build up a neighborhood, and then another immigrant group comes in and continues the cycle of multicultural malignancy. Proudly proclaiming, "I sing city song," Tally considers herself an "urban creature" who cannot survive outside of urban areas, confessing, "The country can kill me. I'm just a city child."

TALLY BROWN, NEW YORK

Taking her first serious blues singing job at a black strip bar in Boston, Tally proudly states her favorite venues were the "most rauchiest ones." Eventually, Tally made her way to Las Vegas where she did all-night shows from 7pm to 7am each day. In terms of what she liked most about Vegas, Tally describes how she was thrilled to see women selling their jewelry and men selling their wives for gambling money. Although she never made it big in Hollywood, Tally remarks regarding her love for Hollywoodland, "Well...I don't want you to take this personally Rosa, but the thing I love best about Hollywood is that they give you little things that make life endurable." While living in the courter of New Orleans, Tally believes she got a "European felling" without actually going to Europa. After discussing how she has been using drugs for two decades without getting addicted (though a couple of her ex-boyfriends apparently went insane due to their affinity for narcotics), gay and seemingly autistic actor Taylor Mead (The Flower Thief, Taylor Mead's Ass)—the 'first underground film star'—rambles on about how he names all of his pet cats after Tally, absurdly proclaiming, "There's probably no more beautiful woman in the world than Tally Brown." As for her underground acting career, Tally describes how she was 'tripping' for four days on a Warhol production, not realizing she was being filmed, even describing herself as looking like a "petulant baby whale" in the finished film. The ultimate flagrant fag hag, Tally wastes no time proclaiming her undying love for lurking in gay bath houses. In one of the more unintentionally humorous scenes of the documentary, Tally's East Asian painter ex-boyfriend states, "Well, I must confess, I never saw someone quite like Tally...and what startled me was, here was someone who was completely unconcerned with her weight...physical weight in the conversation sense...but was completely sensuous and beautiful." With fellow Warhol superstars like Candy Darling, Ondine, and Mary Woronov, Tally also starred in the Lloyd Kaufman co-produced slasher flick Silent Night, Bloody Night (1974) where she took advantage of gorging on fake blood (aka chocolate syrup). Towards the end of the documentary, Divine does a drag show to a Kraftwerk song. In the end, Divine seems like the 'greater' of the two divas, though Tally could be her big sister.

Undoubtedly, Rosa von Praunheim has always been more proficient at making documentaries than narrative films and Tally Brown, New York is certainly one of his more serious docs, thus making it mandatory viewing for anyone with an interest in the homo-supremacist auteur. If nothing else, von Praunheim's documentary is one of the greatest portraits of a real live fag hag ever made. While the overweight over-the-hill fag hag is probably the most odious breed of human creatures to ever populate the earth aside from big bloated bull dykes, Tally Brown, New York manages to portray the eponymous subject in a quasi-poetic way that even manages to do the unthinkable by even radiating an inkling of class. Indeed, Tally is certainly more tolerable than von Praunheim's scatological Semitic superstar Lotti Huber, whose mere presence in films like Anita: Dances of Vice is probably enough to induce vomiting in more sensitive viewers. Tally Brown, New York is also notable in that Tally gives a strangely endearing tribute to her tranny friend Candy Darling—probably the only shemale that could pass for a female—who died of lymphoma on March 21, 1974, aged 29 and wrote in a letter to Andy Warhol right before she died, "Unfortunately before my death I had no desire left for life... I am just so bored by everything. You might say bored to death. Did you know I couldn't last. I always knew it. I wish I could meet you all again." One of the last films Darling starred in before s/he died was a film directed by von Praunheim's ex boy toy Werner Schroeter, Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran. While Darling was deathly depressed with life, Tally Brown seemed to love to live, or at least that is certainly the impression one gets while watching Tally Brown, New York, a documentary that redefines the word 'diva' for a generation fed on negrophilia, fast food, and dope.

-Ty E

CITY OF LOST SOULS
CITY OF LOST SOULS

Rosa von Praunheim° (1983)

If a cracked kraut queen attempted to remake Paul Morrissey's Warhol tranny superstar satire of feminism and so-called 'women's liberation' Women In Revolt (1971) and shot it in late-cold war Berlin with a loony far-left punk pro-chicks-with-dicks angle, it might begin to describe City of Lost Souls (1983) aka Berlin Blues aka Stadt Der Verlorenen Seelen directed by less than humble homo-supremacist auteur Rosa von Praunheim (Horror Vacui, Anita: Dances of Vice). Described by one viewer as a sort of 'Hedwig and the Angry Inch (2001) in reverse,' City of Lost Souls is a black comedy 'maniac musical' that follows an American-born anti-communist tranny (played by real-life transsexual musician Jayne County) who eventually becomes a rock 'n' roll star in East Berlin via her autobiographical hit "I Fell in Love with a Russian Soldier," among various other things in an intentionally grotesque trash-camp celluloid work with a fiercely foul flavor in the spirit of the early pre-Hairspray (1988) works of John Waters and films starring the Cockettes like Tricia's Wedding (1971) and Elevator Girls in Bondage (1972). Not just an innately idiotic celluloid sleaze-fest in the spirit of the "third sex" (the phrase is mentioned in the film a number of times) theories of decidedly debauched German-Jewish sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld, whose life Praunheim would later depict in the just-plain-bad biopic The Einstein of Sex: Life and Work of Dr. M. Hirschfeld (1999), City of Lost Souls is thankfully a perversely politically incorrect work of sleazy celluloid iconoclasm that features a Harlem-born black tranny being verbally assaulted by the word "Nigger" by a Jewish boy in a yarmulke, an American-born Jewess 'erotic trapeze' artist who finds love in the form of a woman-beating grandson of a Nazi war hero, a self-loathing Peter Berlin-wannabe American homo who promotes the virtues of the Auschwitz death camp motto "Arbeit macht frei" ("work makes (you) free"), and another yank Jewess who comes to Deutschland in the hope of dissolving her bitter holocaust-inspired Teutonophobia, only to learn she hates the krauts even more after actually meeting some real ones. Set mostly in a raunchy West Berlin-based fast food restaurant called "Hamburger Köni-gen" (Hamburger Queen) that is run by a real-life big bosomed pre-op black tranny and diva-with-a-dick named Angie Stardust (Hard Women, Die Alptraumfrau) as himself/herself, City of Lost Souls is a mostly plot-less poof piece that is driven by its sexually subversive star power as opposed to anything resembling a discernible storyline. Shot over the course of six weeks mostly in auteur Rosa von Praunheim's assumedly semen-soaked basement, City of Lost Souls is celluloid camp at its most intrinsically intemperate and iconoclastic, thereupon making it one of the director's 'greatest' and most genuine works.

Busty big black transvestite Angie Stardust had a rather horrendous child in Harlem as a man-woman whose father tried to beat her 'femininity' out of her as a boy, but she eventually managed to escape and become “the first black transsexual” at such prestigious clubs in New York City as 82 Club (a pre-Stonewall drag queen revue Jayne County later performed at). To escape racism, Angie came to Berlin and runs both the “Hamburger Queen” restaurant, as well as the “Pension Stardust” boarding house, which is occupied by a number of sex-craved trannies, high-strung homos, and related sex fiends. New to Berlin and the Pension Stardust is a feisty American Jewess ‘erotic trapeze’ artist named Judith Flex and her crippled bleach-blond American-Aryan partner Tron von Hollywood. Judith and Tron are proud to say, “I love Germany...Germany is beautiful...It’s so clean...The bus is always on time,” upon first arriving, thus demonstrating their peculiar ‘National Socialist’ romance of the divided ex-Nazi nation. Tron also proudly states, “My grandmother used to say “Work makes you free!” (“Arbeit macht frei”),” thereupon demonstrating his ‘fascistic’ upbringing. Not long after Tron’s spiel about the merits of Deutschland, a little lad in a yarmulke sings, “Ten little niggers went across the Rhein...One fell in the water then there were but nine...,” which naturally upsets big black Angie, who states, “Stupid, this little monster! I’ve got nothing against kids, but I’ve been here 13 years. People haven’t progressed. They don’t consider the past, the shit they caused. We have feelings too!,” which undoubtedly reflects director Rosa von Praunheim’s conviction that ‘everyday fascism’ still reigns in the Fatherland.

Also featured in City of Lost Souls is a voodoo Negro named Gary who practices black magic and gives witchcraft therapy to gay naked krauts. A homo Negro tranny named Joaquin La Habana, who is Angie Stardust’s protégé, spends a lot of time giving blowjobs to the pickles at the Hamburger Queen. A male nurse turned transman named Tara O’Hara, who pisses off her fellow tranny roommate Loretta (Lorraine Muthke) by bringing too many men by the apartment, is the femme fatal diva of the Pension Stardust. After running into a fellow American Jewess who discusses her overwhelming hatred of krauts, Judith Flex starts a romantic relationship with a German who beats women and who takes her to the ruins of Arno Breker statues and old Nazi monuments and who has no problem admitting, “My grandfather was a Nazi...My father was 19 when the war ended, and was in the Nazi guerrilla movement against the occupation, Werwolf.” Judith responds to her new boy toy’s confession by stating, “you know, I’m Jewish. I think my grandfather is also a bit Nazi. Of course, not Nazi, but everything must be Jewish...Who’s Jewish, what’s Jewish, and I can only be with Jews there...The same thing, you know?,” thus demonstrating the girl’s hatred of Zionism and her belief it is one in the same with National Socialism. After the Nazi boy asks if they can still be together due to their adversarial ancestries, Judith proudly proclaims, “We’re modern. Maybe in Berlin, a cosmopolitan city, we have a chance,” and the two odd couple begins to kiss with a sort of wacky sci-fi noise playing in the background, which gives a good idea what director von Praunheim thinks of heterosexual relationships. Meanwhile,

CITY OF LOST SOULS

Lila (Jayne County) discusses with Angie Stardust how she got pregnant by a commie Russian and how she wants to abort the baby, declaring “Just because I like to get fucked by Russians don’t mean that I want to have their children” as an unproud “communist fucker.” The father of the unborn child was a Russian recruiter from the East German GDR and Lila ended up killing him during their sex-capades. Ultimately, lily white turncoat Lila, who was brought up a good anti-communist Reaganite in the United States, decides to go to the east and becomes a big star with her hit song “I Fell in Love with a Russian Soldier” and even has the opportunity to sing for the Red Chairman. Singing live in East German TV, Lila is absurdly standing on a stage featuring portraits of Karl Marx and Lenin and a large ‘hammer and sickle’ (☒) in the background. After receiving a police order to leave Germany ASAP, Gary goes insane and starts a fire in the Pension Stardust, which erupts into a hellish homo orgy that kills both the black magician and twink Tron. Distraught her friends and apartment are gone forever, Angie Stardust sings a short melancholy ballad, but City of Lost Souls ultimately ends on a positive night with a performance from Jayne County at Hamburger Queen.

Described somewhat cynically and derogatively in The Queer German Cinema (2000) by Alice Kuzniar as, “little more than a vehicle for a group of transvestites to parade themselves through dance and song within a loosely concocted narrative about the employees at a “Burger Queen” restaurant. At its premiere the film was not even watched by the audience but accompanied at party where the celebrating actors again could star as themselves,” City of Lost Souls is indubitably a playfully prissy and perverse portrait of nasty tranny (and homo) narcissism directed by one of the most narcissistic filmmakers who has ever lived (be they gay or otherwise), yet it does make for a scathing assault of the American philistine view of Germany and the Second World War. Early on in the film, Judith Flex and Tron become agitated about having to wait so long for getting visas, arrogantly proclaiming, “but we’re Americans!,” in regard to the fact they have to wait just as long as Palestinians and Turks in line. The anti-American kraut fellow working at the visa office retorts to the two arrogant Americans by stating, “Who cares... You must follow the rules. Oh, you Americans! You think you won the war! You didn’t!,” henceforth demonstrating the delusion of most Americans that they singularly won the Second World War, yet were incapable of defeating communism and even allied with the Red menace, thus giving Eastern Germany to the Soviets. Undoubtedly inspired by the cult flick Elevator Girls in Bondage (1972) starring the psychedelic theater troupe the Cockettes in its depiction of proletarian transvestites attempting to make it in a sexually depraved ghetto, City of Lost Souls ‘Germanizes’ the experience in the form of a pinko commie cocksucker poof piece that, aside from its less than seductive song and dance pieces, will appeal to homos and heteros alike in its satirizing of not only both homos and heteros, but also American anti-communism and East German kraut communism. Featuring naked negroes sporting ghoulish Ronald Reagan masks, transvestites masturbating chair legs and sucking off pickles, negro black magicians reading William L. Shirer's error-ridden tome The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich (1960), kraut cops discussing the need to rid the Fatherland of blacks, black men eating watermelon and practicing voodoo, and Judaic erotic trapeze artists nearly falling to their deaths, City of Lost Souls is lurid and sordid celluloid libertinage at its most eccentrically excess-ridden and pseudo-extravagant as Rosa von Praunheim's sort of (anti)love imported love letter to his nation and city of birth. Since the release of City of Lost Souls, some of the stars of the film have met grizzly, almost camp-like ends because while Tron von Hollywood died of AIDS in the early 1990s, tranny Tara O'Hara, who also contracted gay cancer (but did not die from it), was found beaten to a bloody pulp in a Tiergarten Women's bathroom and layed in a hospital in a coma for a couple weeks before the doc took her off life support. Luckily, Rosa von Praunheim has managed to immortalize their lives via City of Lost Souls, a film that makes transvestism seem like a sunny and surreal from of scatological schizophrenia.

-Ty E

A VIRUS KNOWS NO MORALS
A VIRUS KNOWS NO MORALS

Rosa von Praunheim° (1986)

Jokes about AIDS, especially in regard to gay men, have basically become a favorite pastime among American youth, at least when I was growing up, yet leave it to kraut queer auteur and annoying gay activist Rosa von Praunheim (Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity, Your Heart in My Head) to have been the first person to dare to make a black comedy musical about gay cancer in all its society decaying glory. Created at a time when HIV positive homos were dropping like flies from the decidedly deleterious disease, A Virus Knows No Morals (1986) aka Ein Virus kennt keine is a compulsively campy and morally diseased renegade romp about the AIDS epidemic, its self-destructive victims, and those professional individuals who profited in some sort of way, be they yellow journalists, demented doctors, or gay fag-exploiting sauna owners. A Virus Knows No Morals was ultimately the first and only redeeming chapter in an unusually uneven tetralogy of AIDS themed films directed by von Praunheim, which was followed by an intolerably serious and sentimental documentary trilogy that includes, Silence = Death (1990), Positive (1990), and Fire Under Your Ass (1990), the former two of which focus on AIDS activism in NYC and the latter of which, which was never completed/released, centers on AIDS in the director's hometown of Berlin. Without question, A Virus Knows No Morals is the most aesthetically idiosyncratic and idiotic, enthralling, and least preachy/prissy of the von Praunheim AIDS flicks as a somewhat neglected kraut cult exploitation masterpiece that makes an unwaveringly sardonic and scathing indictment regarding everything related to what was once described as "Gay Related Immune Deficiency"(GRID). An aesthetically putrid assault on idiotically idealistic far-left revolutionaries, pernicious penny-pinching physicians, 'bug-chasers' and 'gift-givers', hack journalists, fag-bashing moms, and homos and homo-haters of all stripes and colors, A Virus Knows No Morals is fag self-exploitation at its most flagrantly loony and just plain weird, even starring director Rosa von Praunheim as a sodomite sauna owner who makes tons of money off homos catching STDs at his own business. A morally and aesthetically reckless work that proves that the abberosexual agitator actually has a self-denigrating sense of humor that does not involve licking the taint of the pansy p.c. police, A Virus Knows No Morals is depraved celluloid camp at its most aesthetically criminally contagious as a sort of cinematic equivalent to AIDS that breaks down cinema themes and conventions until the spectator cannot back down and is forced to wallow in filmic filth.

As Rosa von Praunheim's character states at the beginning of A Virus Knows No Morals, "I'm Rudiger Kakinski, sauna owner. I earn plenty on the gays, who spend long nights of pleasure in my sex club. My lover is Christian. He studies church music. He loves me very much, but I must always remind him that I can't love just one. Sex means to me freedom with many," but unfortunately he has AIDS, which his wimpy Christ-bothering boy toy seems to tolerate rather well given the fact that the disease was pretty much a death sentence in 1985. Also featured in the absurdiest HIV positive celluloid hell that is A Virus Knows No Morals is a certain "Prof. Dr. Blood" (Maria Hasenäcker), a seemingly sociopathic virologist and plague expert, who rather enjoys giving nonsensical safe-sex demonstrations using dildos and contaminated semen, saliva, urine, and blood. Itching to catch the latest contaminated cocksucker story is Carola Shurksh (Eva-Maria Kurz), a superlatively shameless and sleazy reporter for a tabloid called the 'Purple Pages' who is rather adamant about taking photos of babies with AIDS for the latest headline of her newspaper. No less insane than Shurksh is Ms. Tomalik-Samenkorn (Ina Blum), a perverted psychotherapist who "believes AIDS, her specialty, is psychosomatic" and who "loves sex. There, her specialty is bisexual men." Her bisexual male nurse boyfriend Karl Kolle (Thilo von Trotha) is a "revolutionary of the old school" (i.e. 1968 German student movement) who, after sabotaging an AIDS educational video screening, declares, "This is an action of the ASI! The Army of the Sick and Impotent. Down with the reactionary medical asses. We demand humane treatment and psychological care for AIDS victims. The AIDS revolt will destroy the fascist medical regime." Quite the odd couple, Tomalik-Samenkorn declares to her bent boy toy Karl Kolle, "I want a child from a gay before they die out" and then literally proceeds to jump his bi-bones. Clearly deranged, comrade Kolle declares, "The AIDS victims are the proletariat of tomorrow. The world revolution of bodies and viruses will spell the definitive doom of capitalism," while in mid-coitus with his lunatic lover. Rejected by his mother due to his HIV positive status and denied sex by his Christian lover, bourgeois bitch boy businessman Rudiger Kakinski begins to lose his sanity, though he couldn't care less about helping to make his semen-drenched sauna STD-proof as he will not even put a condom vending machine in as it is bad for business because, after all, it is a well known fact that safe sex is not cool among hip homos. In the hope of coming to terms with his disease, Kakinski goes to psychotherapist Tomalik-Samenkorn, who wears an absurd blond wig for whatever reason while working (yet maintaining her long brunette hair while fucking), and she waves a mini coffin around him and tells the HIV positive sauna victim to essentially accept death like a man as a gift from God. Meanwhile, while rather stoic and even seemingly happy about his boyfriend's HIV positive status, Kakinski's Christian boyfriend Christian is totally devastated upon learning he is positive, but luckily nurse Karl Kolle takes him aside and teaches him the far-left political virtues of being a positive poofster. Not letting a little thing like AIDS let him down, Rudiger gets into anonymous tearoom sex in a semi-surreal scenario that resembles a parody of a bad horror flick as one would expect to have been directed by the late, great celluloid scat-meister Herr Schlingensiefel.

A VIRUS KNOWS NO MORALS

Meanwhile, deranged journalist Carola Shurksh goes incognito as a poorly disguised homosexual male and invades a fag-frequented pissoir while sporting a large veiny strap-on dildo and runs into her prodigal poof son, who is cruising for anonymous sex, thus ushering in the end of their seemingly macabre mother-son relationship. Meanwhile, Dr. Blood and an associate named Dr. Hablesword head to Central Africa where dandy negroes eat fried chicken with fancy white gloves to study the origin of AIDS and the natives' apparent 'sex problems', which makes for an interesting journey because, after all, as the demented doc states, "One hears thrilling things about these savages. There are even whispers of cannibalism. At any rate, the natives supposedly ingest the long-tailed monkey, and thereby infect themselves." While immersed in her study of AIDS monkeys, Dr. Blood does not realize she is being banged from behind by a tranny-like African tribesman and before she knows it, a HIV positive primate has infected her with gay cancer. Meanwhile, cracked commie revolutionary Karl Kolle shows up at Kakinski's Sodom-like sauna in a Grim Reaper costume, accusing the owner of being a "rotten exploiter of gays. Getting rich while the people here get AIDS" and that his "filthy shop is a kind of extermination camp!" and proceeds to rob all these queer queens of their precious jewelry as a sort of radical red Robin Hood of the Red Plague. Meanwhile a couple nurses at the local AIDS clinic get bored and one confesses, "I can't get over that Rock Hudson was gay. I was such a fan." To exterminate their boredom, the nasty nurses bet which AIDS patient will drop during the night, with one stating, "Let's roll the dice. Who'll kick the bucket first. The jigaboo on 2, the needle freak on 4, or the fat assfucker on 6. I bet a bottle of champagne" and another nurse complaining, "If the Lord doesn't take at least three in the night, I'm underworked." Meanwhile, Kainski somewhat comes to terms with his HIV positive status, even though his friends are dropping dead like flies, while strolling all by his lonesome in a graveyard where the diseased-ridden corpses of his comrades lay buried, confessing, "Maybe only the weak die from it, and the strong live on. I want to live. I'll beat the disease. Tomorrow they'll find a cure. The disease still makes me horny. I fuck now only with positives. The doctors try to forbid us that, too, claiming we always risk new infection. But sex is life, and I believe in life." Rather unfortunately, Kakinski's boyfriend Christian is not nearly doing as well as he is on his death bed and cocksucker karma reaches jaded journalist Shurksh at the hospital after a delirious and half-deranged AIDS patient with a death wish infects her with AIDS by sadistically stabbing her in the derriere with a tainted needle. Psycho psychotherapist Tomalik-Samenkorn also contracts AIDS from her gay nurse boyfriend Kolle and attempts to spread the deadly disease by pawing her positive puss on the streets for free. In the end, every character in A Virus Knows No Morals contracts AIDS and the film takes on a vague Night of the Living Dead-esque tone as all of Deutschland is ravaged with the deleterious disease that was just once thought of as 'gay cancer' and the HIV positive populous is shipped to a quarantine island called 'Hell Gay Land.' Luckily, Bolshevik neo-bolshevik nurse Karl Kolle sort of saves the day, at least for a small period of time.

Rosa von Praunheim's audacious attempt to satirically turn the AIDS epidemic into an exaggerated "Deutscher Herbst"-like scenario where the Fatherland is on the verge of civil war and turning into a neo-fascist police state and utilizing horror, sci-fi, and exploitation conventions to do so, A Virus Knows No Morals ultimately makes for one of the director's most accessible yet paradoxically most iconoclastic works. Indeed, unlike most of von Praunheim's films, A Virus Knows No Morals has a distinct aesthetic and thematic essence similar to kraut arthouse cult flicks of the late-1980s/early-1990s directed by underground auteur filmmakers like Jörg Buttgerit (Nekromantik, Schramm) and Christoph Schlingensief (United Trash, The 120 Days of Bottrop). In fact, A Virus Knows No Morals 'star' Eva-Maria Kurz would later appear in Buttgerit's Der Todeskung (1990) and Nekromantik 2 (1991), as well as Schlingensief's Das deutsche Kettensägen Massaker (1990) aka The German Chainsaw Massacre and Terror 2000 - Intensivstation Deutschland (1994), thus adding to von Praunheim's seemingly unlikely kraut cinema cult cred as born agitpropagandist who is one of the most, if not the most, well known gay activist filmmaker who has ever lived. Although rather jadedly jovial throughout, A Virus Knows No Morals also makes for a just plain bizarre cinematic work that will make even the most debauched of viewers cringe in disgust at the film's lunatic libertinage and bodacious bad taste, as if von Praunheim was attempting to make his most patently offensive work ever, which he indubitably accomplished. After all, Rosa von Praunheim is even hated by his fellow gays for his flagrant fear-mongering regarding safe sex and AIDS activism and A Virus Knows No Morals is certainly a far cry from the sickeningly serious 'scared straight' style agitprop that plagues his subsequent AIDS-themed documentaries Silence = Death (1990) and Positive (1990). Filmed utilizing non-actors in a guerilla-style of filmmaking that would ultimately influence homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce, among countless others, A Virus Knows No Morals also has the peculiar distinction of featuring the curiously amateurish cockeyed camera angles, unhinged urban grit, white trash camp, and horrific depictions of heterosexual sex that were the signature style of AIDS-addled exploitation auteur Andy Milligan (The Body Beneath, Fleshpot on 42nd Street), thereupon making it a worthy and rather unsung masterpiece of exploitation cinema that gives rare artistic merit to the mostly negated niche 'genre.' Of course, A Virus Knows No Morals would inspire other AIDS-themed black comedy musicals, the best of which being Zero Patience (1993), though Canadian auteur John Greyson's sodomite sermonizing, which transcends that of von Praunheim's, is rather off putting to say the least. Indisputable proof that Rosa von Praunheim knows no morals even if he has spent entire lifetime tell other people and organization, especially of the poor persuasion, what to do, A Virus Knows No Morals is a window into a diseased soul that, although ridiculously entertaining, is probably not good for one's health.

A VIRUS KNOWS NO MORALS

-Ty E

ANITA: DANCES OF VICE

Rosa von Praunheim^o (1987)

Despite his lifelong cinematic campaign to make the world a more cocksucker-friendly place to live where all social mores are molested and murdered and sexual perversions are welcomed, kraut queer auteur Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity) seems to think pre-Nazi Weimar Republic Germany was a sort of hyper-hedonistic homo heaven on earth that was superior to modern day fag-friendly Germany, or so one would ultimately assume while watching his pleasurable perverse postmodern German neo-expressionist work Anita: Dances of Vice (1987) aka Anita – Tänze des Lasters, a work that depicts the present as a colorless realm of repression that literally and figuratively institutionalizes the perverted and preternatural and the past as a magical and kaleidoscopic world where libertinism is king and any and every sort of superlatively sordid debauchery is welcomed. In part based on the short and eclectically self-destructive hedonist life of androgynous cabaret dancer/actress/writer Anita Berber (1899-1928)—a wildly wanton woman who was addicted to no less than seven drugs, but was popular and iconic enough to have her likeliness painted by “Neue Sachlichkeit” (New Objectivity) painter Otto Dix, which was later featured on a 1991 German postage stamp—as well as her gay husband/dancing partner, Sebastian Droste, Anita: Dances of Vice, which features a dichotomous film-within-a-film, portrays the blandness of the modern kraut culture and cinema by portraying what happens when a senile, morbidly obese, and elderly old crank cunt goes around telling people she is real-life femme fatale Anita Berber and displays her fat ass in public, thereupon resulting in her institutionalization and her escape into the imaginary psychosis-ridden realm of expressionism. Following up what he started with Horror Vacui - Die Angst vor der Leere (1984)—a satirical neo-expressionist flick featuring collective cult gang rapes that would earn the director the Los Angeles Film Critics Award for “best experimental film” in 1985—Anita: Dances of Vice would ultimately become one of Rosa von Praunheim’s most internationally revered films as a sort of lurid love letter to the great films of German expressionism with abstract inter-titles and all, as well as an aesthetically audacious response to German kultur and cinema of the past and postmodern attack on the banality and sterility of Teutonic kultur today. Featuring ugly penises with venereal diseases (something that von Praunheim is most certainly accustomed too!), somewhat explicit sex of the hairy-bush-fingering sort, physically degenerated derrieres, exquisite suicides, exceedingly eccentric old women that look like drag queens and young men that look like muscular lesbians, lunatic ladies quoting the Gospel according to Saint Marx via the Communist Manifesto, real-life burn victims kissing fictional celluloid Anita Berbers, and various other strikingly scathing and scatological yet aesthetically pleasing scenarios,

ANITA: DANCES OF VICE

Anita: Dances of Vice is a somewhat singular work from Rosa von Praunheim's oeuvre in that it is proof that he is capable of more than just amateurishly assembled abberosexual agitprop. Of course, considering Anita: Dances of Vice was shot by lesbian cinematographer Elfi Mikesch, who also shot some of dandy auteur Werner Schroeter's best and most visually stunning films, including Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King and Deux (2002) aka Two, one cannot give von Praunheim all the credit for his thematically sickening yet charismatically kaleidoscopic tribute to early-twentieth-century kraut vice, especially of the debauched dyke-fest sort.

While passionately preaching, "I won't undress, you pigs! I'm an artist, not a whore! Pigs!" to a small audience of strangers, absolutely odious old-timer Frau Kutowski (von Praunheim's 'degenerate diva' Lotti Huber)—a grotesquely Judaic unladylike lady of the lascivious sort who would have made a standout specimen for National Socialist propagandist Julius Streicher's naughty Nazi tabloid newspaper Der Stürmer as the height of Hebraic hideousness—proves otherwise during the first couple minutes of Anita: Dances of Vice. After making an obscene ass of herself by proudly displaying her bloated yet baggy bare ass in public for mocking Berliners to see, deranged elderly dame Frau Kutowski, a flagrantly loony lady well past both her physical and mental prime who seriously believes she is the long dead cabaret dancer Anita Berber, is arrested and is swiftly sent to a nuthouse where her deleterious dementia is all the more strengthened by the sterile scenery. While the real world crazy cunt Kutowski lives in a banal black-and-white nachtmahr of the seemingly postmortem sort, the mental patient manages to transfer herself back to the late-1920s by imagining her nurse (played by Ina Blum) as her young self/Anita Berber and that her doctor is her gay boy toy/rival Sebastian Droste (Mikael Honesseau). When not escaping into her esoteric fantasies of romantic suicides, onieric-like opium hazes, fingering a feisty Fräulein's bearded clam, and mocking her satanic dandy dancer partner Droste (a fellow that has no problem admitting, "I hate women and I love men"), cuckoo Kutowski gropes female nurses' genitals and verbally assaults fellow inmates by declaring "A better future. What do I care about the future? I live for the moment, Rosa Luxemburg. The world's an ass, and we're its farts. Each of us stinks in his own way. That's the spice of life!" after a hysterical hag of an Marxist inmate declares, "the words of the Communist Manifesto: 'Socialism or the plunge to barbarism! For a better future!'" Meanwhile, angry Aryan men are plotting for the destruction of Weimar degeneracy and looking for a new Führer with a firm fist, who will ultimately be Adolf Hitler, a man that will put a swift end to cabaret debauchery and German expressionist cinema. Luckily, Anita Berber will die of tuberculosis in 1928, thus never getting to meet Uncle Adolf. While on her death bed, Anita Berber is told by a priest that "Only faith can save you now," which the debauched diva responds to by eloquently stating, "Who says 'ass' has got to say 'hole'." Luckily, Frau Kutowski has a much more fortunate fate and simply leaves the loony bin, assumedly living the rest of her remaining years in relative comfort.

An idiosyncratic piece of equally iconic and iconoclastic cinema, Anita: Dances of Vice manages to find a (un)healthy aesthetic/thematic medium between old school German expressionist films in the spirit of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) and Algot: Tragedy of Power (1920), the latter of which Anita Berber's partner Sebastian Droste appeared in, as well as classic Hollywood hagsploitation flicks like What Ever Happened to Baby Jane? (1962) and Curtis Harrington's What's the Matter With Helen? (1971) and the Isadora Duncan biopic The Loves of Isadora aka Isadora (1968) directed by Karel Reisz. A sort of celluloid equivalent to the dubious thesis proposed in kosher commie film critic Siegfried Kracauer's book From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film (1947)—a work that argues a link between the escapist/expressionist/nightmarish nature of films of the Weimar era and the rise of Nationalism Socialism—Anita: Dances of Vice, to the homo-supremacist filmmaker's credit, still manages to be one of director Rosa von Praunheim's least politically-charged celluloid works in that not unlike films of German expressionism, emphasizes aestheticism over agitprop. That being said, Anita: Dances of Vice and Horror Vacui are two of only a handful of German New Cinema films that will appeal to fans of German expressionism, even if the film can in no way compare to the silent masterpieces of F.W. Murnau and Fritz Lang. A conspicuously camp molestation of German expressionism with a geriatric gay gal as the decidedly depraved pseudo-diva lead, Anita: Dances of Vice is as close as auteur von Praunheim has come to paying (anti)homage to his Fatherland, especially during a scene in the film when the vulgarian anti-hero proudly proclaims "Berlin is the capital of sin and I am her queen." Of course, the real queen of Anita: Dances of Vice is radical rectum-reamer Rosa von Praunheim himself, a man so obnoxious and aberrant that he is even hated by many of his cocksucking compatriots in both German New Cinema (Fassbinder included!) and 'gay rights' activism. Considering von Praunheim's poofer-style political militancy, I do not think it would be a stretch to say that von Praunheim would have more likely been a member of the National Socialist SA brownshirts—a group whose leadership was littered with homos, including its rather rotund leader Ernst Röhm—as opposed to a German expressionist filmmaker, which is supported by the fact that the director's real father may have been an SS commander or Nazi photographer as revealed in the auteur's documentary Two Mothers (2007) aka Meine Mütter - Spurensuche in Riga. Even in his homage to "great nude star Anita Berber," Praunheim is unable to avoid the fact that his hero Anita lived a short depraved life of venereal disease, cocaine and alcohol addiction, self-exploitation and malignant melancholy, thus making National Socialism seem like the only natural response to the wanton Weimar Republic she so perfectly exemplified, a patently putrid place that is not all that different from the entire Occidental world today. Maybe if we are lucky, von Praunheim will direct a sequel to Anita: Dances of Vice with an aesthetic style in the spirit of National Socialist masterpieces Triumph of the Will (1935) and Olympia (1938) featuring an elderly descendent of Anne Frank who believes she is world-class diva Leni Riefenstahl.

ANITA: DANCES OF VICE

-Ty E

POSITIVE

Rosa von Praunheim^o (1990)

Undoubtedly, German homosexual supremacist auteur Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity) has always been better at being an audacious agitpropangdist than a narrative filmmaker, as demonstrated by his first early celluloid manifesto It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971), a work that manages to enrage both homos and heteros alike in its uniquely unflattering depiction of kraut cocksucker subcultures. Not surprisingly, in the 1980s Praunheim became obsessed with AIDS and began churning out eclectic works about gay cancer, starting with the deranged satirical musical A Virus Knows No Morals (1985) aka Ein Virus kennt keine. A couple years after the release of A Virus Knows No Morals, von Praunheim started an AIDS documentary trilogy, which includes Silence = Death (1990) aka Die Aids-Trilogie: Schweigen = Tod - Künstler in New York kämpfen gegen AIDS, Positive (1990) aka Die Aids-Trilogie: Positiv - Die Antwort schwuler Männer in New York auf AIDS, and Fire Under Your Ass (1990), the latter of which the director never released for whatever reason. Out all the films in von Praunheim's partially aborted AIDS trilogy, the second documentary Positive—a work chronicling New York City's gay community's hysterical response during the rise of gay cancer during the 1980s that depicts how pissed off homos (and later lesbians) organized themselves and took matters into their own hands after they felt the government was doing little to help them—is undoubtedly the most politically-charged, 'important', and ultimately mundane work that essentially depicts how the deadly disease was largely responsible for spawning the powerful LGBT community in the United States today. Rather unconventional for a von Praunheim documentary, Positive is a rare doc where the debauched and attention-starved director is seeming invisible as he had the late NYC-based HIV-positive journalist/filmmaker Phil Zwickler—a man who attempted to promote safe-sex via condom-core porn flicks depicting contraceptives as sexy—act as the producer and host of the film. Advertised with the absurd tagline "This is our holocaust, New York City is our Auschwitz, Ronald Reagan is our Hitler," Positive, being a NYC-centered work, is also a fairly Philo-Semitic work featuring a number of homo Israelites, including novelist Larry Kramer, lesbian activist/novelist Sarah Schulman, and gay activist/professor Arnie Kantrowitz, as they hysterically attempt to described the silence regarding the AIDS epidemic as having parallels to the Nazi holocaust, especially indicting former mayor of New York City Ed Koch, himself Jewish and believed to be a closest homo, as allowing tons of poofs to perish as a result of his supposed apathy and political inaction. A work that attempts to blame politicians and the Christian right for the fact that fags were dying off because they were practicing promiscuous unsafe sex in tearooms and whatnot and, quite naturally, obtained AIDS as a result, Positive is ultimately a work that shows the roots of how the so-called LGBT community got so out of touch with reality and demanded they be treated as special citizens and make Christians and other religious people recognize the fact they loved sucking diseased cocks. Unfortunately, Positive is nowhere as interesting as it sounds as a work that is essentially nothing more than an overextended celluloid whine-fest of the agitated abberosexual variety.

POSITIVE

Beginning with the peculiar introduction of HIV-positive host/producer New York filmmaker and journalist Phil Zwickler, who discusses his worries and concerns about allowing a weirdo like Rosa von Praunheim (who he describes as making “voyeuristic and nightmarish films”) exploit him for a film, Positive immediately starts to lose some steam as a work that is ultimately one long and sentimentalized poof propaganda piece. One of the most focused on subjects of the documentary is playwright/novelist/gay activist Larry Kramer, who proclaims, “I’m sick of guys who can only think with their cocks” in an emotionally erratic manner and discusses how his anti-tearoom novel Faggots (1978) was inspired by the fact that he was pissed at a lot of his fellow poofs for being in the cocksucker closet, namely former mayor Ed Koch. Originally called “Gay related immune deficiency” (GRID), AIDS hit the gay community like the plague in the early 1980s and as singer/songwriter/AIDS activist Michael Callen (who later appeared in small rolls in films like Philadelphia (1993) and John Greyson’s AIDS musical Zero Patience (1993)), who lists a long laundry list of STDs he has, describes in detail, like many of the subjects of Positive, how becoming HIV positive totally changed his life and how he spent a good portion of the rest of his life promoting AIDS awareness via protest and aesthetic propaganda. Avant-Garde singer/composer Diamanda Galás, whose sole brother Philip-Dimitri Galás died of AIDS, also weighs in with her two cents, describing how as someone from a long tradition of dirge singers, she declared a sworn oath against the person(s) responsible for the death of her beloved brother. Naturally, Galás hardly holds her brother to blame for the promiscuity that led to his premature demise and like most of the people in the documentary, she is talking about the federal government and politicians, and joined Larry Kramer’s group AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) when she speaks of her sworn oath. Indeed, if nothing else, Positive is largely about gays ‘acting up’ against the government, which has indubitably become a tyrannical tradition among the queer community since the release of the documentary.

Featuring dubious tributes to gay icons/AIDS victims like gay pornographer-turned-filmmaker Arthur J. Bressan, Jr. (Daddy Dearest, Buddie) and homo BDSM photographer Robert Mapplethorpe, Positive is not exactly a work that depicts the AIDS-ridden community in a positively ‘positive’ light, but instead as a bunch of whiny perverts who expect the government to be responsible for their reckless and irresponsible behavior, as if politicians forced them to have unprotected anal sex with ten guys a night in a slimy, semen-soaked public bathroom. It should be noted that filmmaker Arthur J. Bressan, Jr. glorified pederasty in his film Abuse (1983), a rather mundane melodrama about an abused boy who chooses to be in the company of a gay documentary filmmaker as opposed to his violent parents. Basically, Praunheim's Positive employs the same sort of logic-bending message as Bressan's Abuse by blaming others for certain gay men's own sexual weaknesses. With curious quotes from protestors like "the government has blood on its hands," "killed by Koch," and "hands off Stonewall, liar," Positive portrays a pathologically prissy and pissed poof community that demands the majority be concerned with the self-induced problems of a sexually subversive minority who is responsible for being the biggest spreader of AIDS in the world. Ultimately, virtually all of the subjects featured in Positive, especially hysterical Hebraic homo Larry Kramer, are radically repellant characters who are exceedingly hard to emphasize with. While Positive would probably be revered as one of Rosa von Praunheim's most important works among cultural critics in the gay community, I found it to be one of his least artistically ambitious and entertaining works, as if it was directed by some TV hack from MTV. Only recommended to Rosa von Praunheim's completists, gay agitators, and those interested in seeing how the queer community became so politically powerful and shockingly arrogant, Positive is ultimately a piss poor poof propaganda piece with stupid sentimentalist overtones that lacks the sort of obscenely outrageous and provocative essence typical of a von Praunheim work. That being said, I doubt Positive prevented anyone from becoming HIV-positive as the typical tearoom demon semon would probably have a hard time getting through this asinine piece of would-be-audacious and flagrantly Philo-Semitic agitprop, thus this deluded doc should be totally written-off as a sociopolitically nasty byproduct of HIV hysteria of the heeb far-left sort as directed by a culturally cuckolded kraut.

-Ty E

SILENCE = DEATH
SILENCE = DEATH

Rosa von Praunheim° (1990)

I probably should not admit this, but I have a certain amount of respect for kraut queer auteur Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity) in terms of his undyingly subversive approach to both his life and filmmaking, even if I find him to be a remarkably repellant individual who probably would have deserved what was coming to him had he been an artist and activist during the Third Reich era (ironically, as revealed in his own documentary Two Mothers (2007), von Praunheim might be the bastard son of the infamous SS-Standartenführer Rudolf Lange who, among other things, apparently liquidated 250,000 people in a little less than six months). Like with any auteur filmmaker that interests me, I have gone to the effort of attempting to track down any and every von Praunheim flick that I can find, but only a tiny fraction of his 80+ film oeuvre (which includes shorts and documentaries) is actually available, especially in terms of his works that actually feature English subtitles. Not unlike his kraut cocksucker arch-nemesis Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who he made the remarkable documentary Fassbinder's Women (2000) aka Fassbinder Was the Only One for Me: The Willing Victims of Rainer Werner F about, von Praunheim is a rather prolific filmmaker who seems to make films faster than people can see them, but unlike the tragic Querelle (1982) director, he actually got the opportunity to work in the United States at various different times in his career. Of course, while Fassbinder would have probably opted to work in Hollywood (where von Praunheim would eventually direct the short Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? (1999) starring all-American bisexual porn star Jeff Stryker) in tribute to his love-hate relationship with Golden Age works from Tinseltown, von Praunheim has spent most of his time focusing on New York City for largely socio-political reasons that have little to do with actual filmmaking, as it is a cultural epicenter of AIDS activism and gay life. Indeed, as Fassbinder once criticized about him in an article in tribute to their mutual dandy-like friend Werner Schroeter, "Rosa von Praunheim, a man who is so progressive, whose consciousness is so liberated from all our bourgeois longings that he actually believes he alone has the right, almost a monopoly, to use the film medium to reflect his or anybody else's homosexuality," and that is certainly quite apparent in the director's aborted documentary 'AIDS trilogy' that he made in collaboration with Phil Zwickler between 1989 and 1990 in New York City during the height of the gay cancer epidemic.

It should be noted that von Praunheim's AIDS trilogy is actually part of a tetralogy that also includes the low-camp Schlingensief-esque HIV satire A Virus Knows No Morals (1986) aka Ein Virus kennt keine, but von Praunheim never finished or released the final film Fire Under Your Ass (1990) aka Die Aids-Trilogie: Feuer unterm Arsch - Vom Leben und Sterben schwuler Männer in Berlin, which takes a look at how the epidemic effected the filmmaker's hometown of Berlin. While I saw the first film in the trilogy, Positive (1990) aka Die Aids-Trilogie: Positiv - Die Antwort schwuler Männer in New York auf AIDS, a couple years ago, it was not until recently that I saw the first doc, Silence = Death (1990) aka Die Aids-Trilogie: Schweigen = Tod - Künstler in New York kämpfen gegen AIDS, which is indubitably the most superlatively subversive, defiantly grotesque, and aberrantly artistic of the films as an overtly wayward and compulsively confrontational work that takes a look at various HIV-positive NYC-based artists and their works as they lament on living with an innately incapacitating disease that has turned them into the most odious and grotesque of social outcasts, or so they describe while criticizing their various enemies of the heterosexual Christian right (or what Iranian-born American experimental playwright, sometimes filmmaker, and AIDS victim Reza Abdoh once affectionately described as the 'Tight White Right'). Indeed, Silence = Death is an unrepentant and sometimes unhinged homo-hate agitprop piece where prominent sexually introverted artists like eventual AIDS victim David Wojnarowicz and Beat writer turned NAMBLA member Allen Ginsberg demonstrate their undying contempt for the U.S. government, which the former unequivocally blames for the AIDS epidemic, as if Ronnie Reagan put a gun to his head and made him give head to a stranger in some seedy public bathroom. Needless to say, von Praunheim's decidedly debasing doc is nothing like your contemporary piece of sanitized sod celluloid, which typically depicts gays as happy-go-lucky upstanding citizens who just want to be accepted and just happen to like cocks instead of cunts yet somehow magically manage to contract AIDS and various other STDs more often. In other words, the fierce fags of Silence = Death do not care if your grandma likes them and openly admit they would love nothing more than to destroy powerful homo-hating churches and politicians, especially Wojnarowicz, who seems to hate just about everyone aside from fellow queers with AIDS. Indeed, you know the subjects of a documentary are somewhat crazed when proud pedo poet Allen Ginsberg seems like the most rational and sane one.

Without even a credit sequence or title scene, Silence = Death abruptly begins with a stereotypically loudmouthed and flamboyant Guido-like poet named Emilio Cubeiro sitting in his ugly and rather dilapidated apartment and going on a heated rant about how he was diagnosed with AIDS six weeks ago and how he has a "gut feeling" that "someone caused this," even speculating that he is a victim of some sort of CIA germ warfare program against poofs. After complaining about how he hates feeling like a victim and how he recently saw a group of well dressed young Republicans chanting at a group of gay protestors, "You people got AIDS because you fucking deserved it," Cubeiro randomly whips out a small revolver and declares, "I've always been a person that lived by the sword in the sense that you're gonna die [...] the same way you lived. I've always been an asshole in one sense, so there's no better way to go out, I don't think. Let me see what you think of this [...] now, I really want you to take a look at my asshole." From there things get ugly and Cubeiro drops his pants, bends over in front of the camera, puts the revolver in his rectum, and then pulls the trigger, thus resulting in a large amount of oily liquid shit to gush out of his AIDS-ridden anus in a patently preposterous Marian Dora-esque 'performance art' routine that would surely alienate any sane heterosexual viewer from supporting the gay cause. After Cubeiro's mock suicide by bullet through the bung hole, shots of his rather 'ghetto' apartment are juxtaposed with a recording of his unintentionally hilarious Lydia Lunch produced album Death of an Asshole (1989), which features the rather ludicrous line: "...to fuck death is to master death...you give it orders, you tell it when to cum. You see, death is your slave even when it is your master." Indeed, von Praunheim's Silence = Death seems to fetishize AIDS in a decidedly deranged way that makes it seem like dying from gay cancer is the ultimate 'orgasm,' as well as a post-Stonewall 'rite of passage' that only the most hardcore of homos experience.

SILENCE = DEATH

Undoubtedly, the real 'star' of von Praunheim's doc is perennially amateurish painter, photographer, writer, filmmaker, performance artist, and AIDS activist David Wojnarowicz, who succumbed to gay cancer two years after the film was released and who would probably not be remembered today and celebrated by all the right people were it not for his brazenly bombastic aberrosexual activism and the specific nature of his untimely death. As Wojnarowicz explains, he used to hide in the cocksucker closet, which enabled him to, "enjoy something about this self-silence, self anonymity where I could travel across America, hitchhike in a car where I'm picked up by a cop who, if he knew what I thought for two seconds, would shoot me on the road," but because of the AIDS epidemic and the death of his lover, Warhol groupie and photographer Peter Hujar, he has become aggressively vocal about his homosexuality and blatantly blames Christian churches, politicians, and the government for the outbreak, as if it is a 'fascistic' disease that punishes gays for their sexual proclivities (when, in reality, the epidemic is a direct result of the anti-mores promoted by the so-called sexual liberation movement and Marcusean 'new left'). As his autobiographical books and 'biopic' Postcards from America (1994) directed by Steve McLean reveal, Wojnarowicz, not unlike many gay men that don't seem overtly effeminate, was routinely sexually abused as a child and even became a dick-peddler during his teenage years. In terms of the fact that he knows that he is going to very likely succumb to his illness soon, Wojnarowicz reveals that he does not believe in any sort of afterlife and somewhat cynically states, "...when you die, you become fly food and somehow that is comforting," as if he longs to rot and decay. As he aggressively declares during one of his various rather hostile histrionic rants, Wojnarowicz does not want a memorial when he dies, but instead he wants his friends to drop his emaciated corpse onto the front steps of the White House in a gesture that would reflect his belief that, “these are the people that are responsible for my death.” Indeed, Wojnarowicz does not believe that his lethally lecherous behavior is at all responsible for the fact that he is going to die as indicated by his rather ridiculous remark, “It’s not my sucking dick that is responsible for my death, or my getting fucked in the ass, or any of these things. These people, at this point, are responsible for my death because their inactivity and their total gesture of silence after eight years of this.” Personally, if I peddled my prick to strangers or regularly reamed anonymous rectums in piss-and-shit-drenched public restrooms, I would most certainly consider it my own fault if I contracted AIDS and died, but I guess I am an unenlightened heterosexual homophobe who does not understand the wayward wonders of a self-destructive sexual pathology.

Somewhat humorously, Hebraic homo poet Allen Ginsberg credits the fact that he is fucked by supposedly ‘heterosexual’ men instead of fellow slutty ‘queens’ like himself that he does not have AIDS. Notably, Ginsberg reveals that he is regularly tested for AIDS because he does not want it on his conscious if one of his self-described “much younger” lovers contracts the disease from him. Unlike Wojnarowicz, who was as debauched as they come as an ex-hustler and tearoom queen, Ginsberg at least expresses a degree of self-responsibility as opposed to simply blaming everything on the Christian Right and government. Of course, to be fair, Ginsberg confesses that he oftentimes has a ‘hard time’ getting an erection because, being an overweight Israelite who has probably never exercised in his entire life, he has to take blood pressure pills, so his sex life was probably not as prolific as a younger man like Wojnarowicz. According to Ginsberg, humanity itself is like HIV, as he states, “the planet itself has AIDS” due to all the pollution. Personally, I find Ginsberg’s poetry to be the literary equivalent of AIDS (after all, Ginsberg’s bud William S. Burroughs did not speak of ‘word viruses’ for nothing), but I digress. In von Praunheim’s Silence = Death, Ginsberg becomes a rare voice of reason who, as far as the viewer can judge from what he says, is doing his part to prevent the spread of the most deadly phenomenon in the gay community since the Night of the Long Knives. To Wojnarowicz’s marginal credit, one gets the impression that after his boy toy Hujar succumbed to HIV in 1987, he became all the more nihilistic and self-destructive, as if he was trying in vain to spite the entire world by screaming that he is a terminally ill faggot and he is proud of it. Of course, I’m sure Fräulein von Praunheim could appreciate such pure and unadulterated megalomania, hence why Wojnarowicz probably ultimately became the main subject of the doc.

Unquestionably, Silence = Death reaches its zenith in terms of unadulterated aesthetic grotesquery towards the end when Wojnarowicz’s degenerate amateurish short A Fire in My Belly—a work featuring ants crawling across crucifixes and other similarly juvenile and silly things that attempt to offend but only bore or annoy—is juxtaposed with the song “This is the Law of the Plaque” by Greek-American avant-garde singer/composer Diamanda Galás, whose own playwright brother Philip-Dimitri Galás perished as a result of AIDS. A good portion of the doc is dedicated to showing off paintings and drawings by AIDS-ridden artists like Rafael Gamba, Keith Haring, and Peter Kunz, with the latter of whom being depicted in an exceedingly emaciated state on what seems to be his deathbed. Although all these artists have very different styles, what all their paintings seem to have in common aside from being hopelessly 'modern' yet primitive in persuasion is a sort of less than subtle synthesis of sex and death, thus making it seem like their actual deaths from the most deleterious of STDs would be their true magnum opuses. Not unlike his subsequent AIDS trilogy documentary Positive, Silence = Death is notable for a von Praunheim doc in that the filmmaker did not find a way to incorporate himself in it in a rather obnoxious and narcissistic way like he typically does, yet it still somehow manages to be just as innately subversive and radically repellent as his other works, as if the queen of kraut queer cinema went out of his way to work with the most vulgar HIV-positive artists that he could find. It might interest cinophiles to know that 'lo-fi' experimental film maverick Mike Kuchar (Sins of the Fleshapoids, The Craven Sluck) acted as the film's cinematographer, which might explain the exceedingly and almost proudly amateurish essence of the film as if the work was shot in the seediest basement in Sodom with Andy Warhol's camera and leftover film reels and with forsaken soul of 'flaming' filmmaker turned intentional AIDS casualty Jack Smith (Flaming Creatures, Normal Love) acting as a sort of spiritual adviser.

SILENCE = DEATH

Ultimately, Silence = Death is an (anti)nostalgic gay celluloid archive created at a time when sod artists were still actually subversive and not interested in becoming like their banal bourgeois heterosexual enemies by demanding that they be allowed to get married and adopt starving negroes from some AIDS ravaged nation in Africa, among other things. Indeed, in my opinion, AIDS was not just one of the worst things to happen to gays because it killed them like flies, but also because it inspired the cocksucker community to align themselves with their perennial enemies, lesbos, and become politically active in the most pathetic and obnoxious victim-mentality-based way imaginable, thereupon seemingly killing their true contribution to society as pioneering artists and cultural subversives as opposed to being infantile narcissists who somehow think parading around in public in pink thongs and little girls fairy wings is somehow a demonstration of some sort of pride. Indeed, if great fag filmmakers like Fassbinder and Pasolini were alive today, I am sure they would cringe upon hearing the vomit-worthy acronym 'LGBT.' While the title of Silence = Death is in reference to the belief that if homos kept silent about their homosexuality and the AIDS epidemic then many more homos would die as a result of lack of public awareness and, in turn, government inaction in regard to the gay plague, queers cannot shut their mouths nowadays even though they have nothing of value to say and they never will as the new gay mainstream is a plastic pre-packaged pseudo-identity that has never sired a single Jean Cocteau, Ludwig Wittgenstein, W.S. Burroughs, Kenneth Anger or even von Praunheim, not to mention the fact that it's automaton-like members are more banal than the most soulless of David Matthews Band loving frat-boys, albeit they dress ten times worse. If you want to sample the old school homo world before it became vogue to smoke poles and flaunt social justice warrior credentials, checkout von Praunheim's doc and bask in the lost glory of true gay grit of the deadly, demented, and diseased sort.

-Ty E

I AM MY OWN WOMAN
I AM MY OWN WOMAN

Rosa von Praunheim° (1992)

As far as I know, I Am My Own Woman (1992) aka Ich bin meine eigene Frau directed by aberrosexual agitpropagandist and all-around gay agitator Rosa von Praunheim (Die Bettwurst, A Virus Knows No Morals) is the only biographical film ever made about the life and times of an East German tranny. Additionally, it is also probably the only Brechtian docudrama ever made about a tranny, be they German or otherwise, thus making it seem like a film that would only appeal to a bourgeois art fag in art school, yet it also happens to be one of von Praunheim's most mature, if not patently propagandistic, works as a rather sentimental work from a rather unsentimental and very scatological kind of guy. Based on the 1992 autobiography of the same name by Charlotte von Mahlsdorf (born Lothar Berfelde), who survived both the Nazis and Stasis and appears as 'herself' in the film, Praunheim's decadent yet perversely dignified PBS-esque quasi-documentary depicts the stranger-than-fiction story of a born-tranny who, among other things, killed his National Socialist leader father with a wooden stirring stick(!), was almost raped by hordes of semi-Asiatic Soviet soldiers after being mistaken for a woman, became the man-muse of a degenerate Prussian aristocrat, opened up a popular phony antique museum full of factory-made everyday items, was awarded with the Order of Merit of the Federal Republic of Germany, and somehow managed to find a very special place in two different authoritarian worlds where men in dresses are more than just a little bit frowned about. Taking a rather bizarre and meta-reflexive approach to the documentary format as a sort of documentary/docudrama/narrative film hybrid of the pathologically Brechtian sort, I Am My Own Woman not only features two actors portraying the subject during 'her' younger years, but also Charlotte von Mahlsdorf him/herself, who constantly interrupts scenes of episodes from her exceedingly eccentric life to explain, among other things, how they are exact reproductions of what happened in his/her real-life. A hermetic history of homo kraut underground and beyond, Praunheim's critically revered doc demonstrates that the malignant debauchery of the Weimar era was not merely an isolated phenomenon of Teutonic history, as sexual degeneracy in the Fatherland has always existed, albeit it was mostly regulated to the underworld in the past. Centering around a seemingly benign but ultimately mischievous and semi-psychopathic creature who passive-aggressively got what s/he wanted whenever she wanted just like so many other calm and calculating women, von Praunheim's film is interesting in that it proves beyond a shadow of a doubt that von Mahlsdorf had an innately bourgeois broad brain and was not simply some sexually confused wack-job like Buffalo Bill from The Silence of the Lambs (1991). While just as patently perverted as the director's previous works in many different ways, I Am My Own Woman marked the beginning of a more serious, sentimental, and controlled von Praunheim who had unofficially taken on the job of being Germany's foremost gay anthropologist, ethnologist, and documentarian. A bizarre Oedipal tale where the subject literally kills his father, but instead of wanting to make love to his mother, he wanted to be her instead, I Am My Own Woman is a work that has to be seen to be believed (and, indeed, it is certainly hard to believe some of von Mahlsdorf's curious anecdotes, as they read more like a Teutonic tranny The Twilight Zone than historical fact).

As Charlotte von Mahlsdorf states at the beginning of the film, "My life's ideal is the Gründerzeit period (1880-1900) and I've made my dream come true. For over 30 years my furniture collection has been housed here at my Gründerzeit Museum in Mahlsdorf. I live here like a woman at the turn of the century." Von Mahlsdorf attributes his/her obsession with the Gründerzeit era to her beloved anti-Nazi granduncle whose house s/he was born in. As someone who confesses that, "Even as a child I liked to dust and clean," it should be no surprise that von Mahlsdorf got her first job at an antique shop in 1942 while still just a teenage boy (as portrayed by Jens Taschner). A self-described "transvestite," von Mahlsdorf found solace in staying with his aunt, who was a transsexual bull-dyke who had no problem walking around in public wearing men's clothing during the Nazi era. Ultimately, von Mahlsdorf became aware that he was not the only man who felt like a woman when his aunt introduced him to Jewish sexologist Dr. Magnus Hirschfeld's book The Transvestites aka Die Transvestiten, which he read religiously when not being buggered by a hyper horny stable boy. While von Mahlsdorf found much love and support in his Sapphic aunt and granduncle (who warned him of "brown-shirted criminals" like his father), he faced virtual hell-on-earth at his family home in the form of his Nazi leader Papi (Utz Krause), who the protagonist describes as "absolute evil" and who whipped his son's bare ass in a homoerotic fashion for playing with dolls. When von Mahlsdorf's father gave him the ultimatum that he either chose between him or his mother, the momma's boy decided to take decisive action and brutally beat his father to death with a wooden stirring tool and, as a result of his actions, he was sent to Tübingen for a psychiatric examination by a certain Doctor Ritter and ultimately sentenced to four years in a reformatory in 1945. Luckily for the twink tranny, Nazi Germany was losing a war, so he managed to get out of the reformatory early, though he faced much danger while walking around the destroyed streets of Berlin, which were being bombed by Soviet dive bombers and stalked by hardcore National Socialists who were looking to lynch traitors and deserters. In fact, Von Mahlsdorf was also almost executed for being a supposed deserter, but a Nazi officer saved his life at the very last minute. Needless to say, as a child of war, von Mahlsdorf had to grow up fast. In other words, he had to be his 'own woman' and like most desperate women, he used his body to advance his sorry lot in life.

When not dodging the advances of Red Army rapists (during one scene in the film, a Russian goes to rape him, but cries, "Impossible! German women have cocks!" after lifting his dress and getting a nice little surprise), von Mahlsdorf (as depicted by von Praunheim dude-diva Ichgola Androgyn) was helping deliver pigs at a swine farm and giving transvestite balls at Friedrichsfelde Castle, which was in a state of disrepair before the Teutonic tranny helped fix things up in 1946. Apparently, the "crème de la crème of the Prussian aristocracy" held tranny balls at the castle over a century before von Mahlsdorf ever showed up, thus proving that Prussia always had its own esoteric poof world. Eventually, von Mahlsdorf became the extra loyal 'servant girl' and sex object of a rather round WWI officer named Herbert von Zitzenau (Robert Dietl) in a relationship that would span about a decade until the debauched aristocrat predicted his own death in 1957 after entering a hospital and ultimately subsequently succumbing to a fatal heart attack. As the no-bullshit transvestite states regarding her innate attraction to fat old farts, "I've always been erotically drawn to older men. It's the same for me as many women: one feels protected." From von Zitzenau, von Mahlsdorf learned much about homosexual history during the Kaiser's time, as well as a series of S&M-style sexual role-playing games he would later use with his "Lebensmensch" Jochen (Rainer Luhn), who he met in a public restroom. Mahlsdorf's relationship with Jochen lasted for 27 years until the latter's death in 1987. In 1959, Mahlsdorf began what he would be best remembered for by opening a Gründerzeit era museum at a 200 year house called 'Mahlsdorf' manor, hence his pseudonymous aristocratic name. Of course, the Stasi attempted to takeover von Mahlsdorf's business and by 1974 it got so bad that he began giving away his antiques to friends, lest they fall into cold commie hands, but in the end s/he persevered and won her personal war against the bolshevik beast.

I AM MY OWN WOMAN

In the late 1980s, von Mahlsdorf hired two bull-dykes to help him run his museum and one of them describes how she, "almost choked to death laughing" upon meeting the elderly tranny. As Mahlsdorf describes, "like all women in East Germany who turned 60, I got my pension and was able to visit the West for the first time in many years," but being the year 1988, the transvestite would be saddened to discover that all except one of her former lovers that lived in the West were already dead. During the late-1970s, von Mahlsdorf starred in various East German movies and TV shows in small bit roles as transvestites, but her proudest accomplishment was starring in the first (and ultimately last) gay East German film, Coming Out (1989) directed by cult auteur Heiner Carow, who is best known for his work The Legend of Paul and Paula (1973) aka Die Legende von Paul und Paula. As von Mahlsdorf states, "The 9th of November, 1989, was not only the premier for the film COMING OUT, it was also the day of "coming out" for all of East Germany." Indeed, the Berlin Wall finally opened up so that East Germans could freely travel to the west and vice versa without being molested by Stasi guards. Of course, with capitalism eventually hitting the Stalinized East, von Mahlsdorf found herself unable to pay the bills and had to sell many of her precious antiques which, as s/he states herself, were irreplaceable. Indeed, rather ironically, after 30 years resisting the Stasi, the ostensibly democratic German government managed to annex her Gründerzeit Museum. On top of that, a group of 70 or so neo-nazis crashed von Mahlsdorf's "First gay-lesbian spring party for East and West since the Wall" and beat up all her friends, including women, without scruple. In the end, von Mahlsdorf tries to establish a link between the old National Socialist regime and gutter-dwelling neo-Nazi skinheads, as if they are at all comparable in any meaningful way. Of course, von Mahlsdorf is a simple-minded person and sees anti-gay as anti-gay and nothing more.

At the very end of I Am My Own Woman, Charlotte von Mahlsdorf declares while warmly smiling while in the company of her best friends, "I am a totally happy person." Unquestionably, I believe her as von Mahlsdorf seems like a rather happy-go-lucky person throughout the film, but I found some parts about her story to be somewhat dubious as all the pieces of the tale fit together a little bit too perfectly. Indeed, despite there being a scene in the film where the teenage von Mahlsdorf is asked by a doctor why he hasn't joined the Hitler Youth and s/he responds, "Because it doesn't interest me," in real-life he was indeed once a member of the Hitler Youth and joined the group in 1942 just like all boys his age did at that time (after all, it was the law and the boys had no choice, so it is odd that von Praunheim would lie about this). To von Mahlsdorf's credit, s/he was not the good little politically correct type who meekly cowered to the truly fascistic dogma of the LGBT crowd, as s/he caused a controversy that lost her many supporters at a Berlin lecture on 12 March 1997 after remarking: "That lesbians and gays can't have children is after all quite natural. Nature too seeks out what it can use, what can reproduce and what can't. If we look at it like that, if lesbians and gays did have children, then we'd have a lot more unemployed people today." Undoubtedly, if I learned anything from watching I Am My Own Woman, it is that gays and even transvestites always have a special and important place in society, even if they live in a culture that is purportedly homophobic. Additionally, as von Mahlsdorf's relationship with WWI officer Herbert von Zitzenuw proves, homosexuality was more or less openly accepted in Germany among even the Prussian aristocracy, which certainly is at odds with the mainstream cultural Marxist narrative that Germany is a historically homo-hating and fag-bashing nation. Of course, I Am My Own Woman is not the only documentary that von Praunheim has made about a transvestite, as he later directed a 50-minute film entitled Der rosa Riese (2008) aka The Pink Giant about tranny rapist serial killer Wolfgang Schmidt (now known as Beate Schmidt) aka "The Beast of Beelitz" aka "Pink Giant" who sexually abused and murdered 5 women between the ages of 34 to 66 years old and even killed a 3 month old baby by slamming it against a tree stump. Indeed, by comparing the subjects of I Am My Own Woman and The Pink Giant, it becomes quite apparent that transvestites come in various shapes and forms, with some being sweet old ladies like Mrs. Doubtfire and others being murderous psychos like Buffalo Bill. Of course, the gay mainstream wants you to believe all old transvestites are like von Mahlsdorf and Mrs. Doubtfire. As I Am My Own Woman reveals, you do not need the Pink Gestapo to be your own woman if you're a transvestite.

I AM MY OWN WOMAN

-Ty E

NEUROSID: 50 YEARS OF PERVERSITY

Rosa von Praunheim° (1995)

New German cinema spawned a lot of full-fledged, and oftentimes faggy, narcissists, but hysterical homo-supremacist Rosa von Praunheim (The Einstein of Sex: Life and Work of Dr. M. Hirschfeld, Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis) – the uncrowned queen of queer low-kitsch and flaunting big dicks – indubitably takes the cum-layered cake for being the most conceited cocksucker if there ever was one. Unlike his enemy Rainer Werner Fassbinder and their mutual friend Werner Schroeter – both of whom also played for the pink team, if not more reservedly so – von Praunheim directs films that almost exclusively focus on himself and his own sexual vice (with a couple of fierce females thrown in for good measure), so much so that his mission has been to not only offend those horrid heteros, but also his fellow gays, in part due to his incessant propagandizing of AIDS-related and safe-sex (i.e. pro-condom) issues as a sort of self-pointed fag Führer of the exceedingly embarrassing and annoying sort. With his early and unintentionally hilarious and ludicrous campy docudrama and virtual poofer political manifesto It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971), von Praunheim – then only a princess of priss and pestering – demanded that young homos get out of the tearoom and leather fag bar and take to the streets to unite with their eternal enemy, lily-licking lesbos, along with other marginalized groups (i.e. non-whites) as is quite the norm today in U.S.A., and to demand politics power and representation. Again, in the early 1990s after directing one of the first films about AIDS A Virus Knows No Morals (1985), prancing Praunheim took to the streets of NYC demanding recognition of the AIDS epidemic among gays and directed a gay cancer trilogy (Positive, Silence = Death, Fire Under Your Ass). Von Praunheim also proved his propensity towards putrid pomposity in 1991 by “outing” and wrongly outing various German celebrities on the TV show Explosiv - Der heiÙe Stuhl as hidden homos. Of course, no one probably knows his intrinsic negligent narcissism and pestiferous perversity better than Rosa von Praunheim himself as depicted in his manic mockumentary Neurosid - 50 Jahre pervers (1995) aka Neurosid: 50 Years of Perversity; a largely autobiographical work that was advertised with the relatively reasonable plea of puffery: “John Waters meets Orson Welles in this gay Citizen Kane!”

Who Shot Rosa von Praunheim? or so drives the mystery behind Neurosid: 50 Years of Perversity; a work that also acts as a saucy and sadistic summary of the decidedly depraved director’s life and filmmaking career up until that point. Indeed, it is easy to see how after imploring an audience at the premiere of his new film to, “excuse me for my fame. Excuse me for my beauty. Excuse me for my artistic talent,” one would want to do devastating bodily harm to Rosa von Praunheim and thereupon put an end to his aberrant art and broadcasted self-worship,

NEUROSID: 50 YEARS OF PERVERSITY

so it should be no surprise that the suspects of the shooting are wide and vast and personal and impersonal. Another problem arises when the self-deprecating yet self-deceiving dick-sucking director's body goes immediately missing after the shooting, thus giving Neurosid: 50 Years of Perversity the feel of a sordid yet significantly satirical political-thriller. In the rather unlikely tradition of Orson Welles' Citizen Kane (1941), a sleazy homo-hating TV journalist named Gesine Ganzmann-Seipel (played by Désirée Nick, German Roman Catholic theologian, cabaret artist, comedian, actress, and mother to a bastard son of Prince Heinrich Julius of Hanover) to dig up the dookie-covered scoop on von Praunheim's positively perverse personal life, henceforth steadfastly scouring the terribly tainted "blood and sperm" of his troubled STD-ridden romances, atypical artistic relationships, and the infinite reasons why the world hates the AIDS-absorbed anarchic auteur of morally and aesthetically bankrupt lunatic lechery. As a manic mensch who admitted to being sexually aroused by and attempting to seduce his own father as a boy, found his first true love while giving away tricks in a turd-tinged tearoom, directed quasi-pornographic films using burn victims, forced his poor students to film him having sex with men while acting as a guest film professor for a San Francisco-based workshop he 'taught' in 1977, married a beautiful woman solely to receive a 15,000 mark government subsidy given to German newlyweds so he could fund his first films, and a sexual maniac who earned the title of "Traitor of the Year" in a prominent German newspaper Bunde, it is no surprise that Gesine discovers a letter written sent to von Praunheim stating: "To the chief of the gay and lesbian sows and swine...in Berlin, Rosa von Praunheim. You damned gay and lesbian swine...are due for slaughter. It's your fault that people...are due for slaughter. It's your fault that people...are infected with the AIDS disease...due to your ass-fucking and so on. We're almost...the same as the SS under our idea, Adolph Hitler. Such as you must be 100% gassed to death." Of course, Fräulein Gesine discovers a lot more unflattering things about von Praunheim, not least of all his savage sodomite sexual spirit and apparently rectum-ripping member (not that he does not expose it a number of times in the film), his vehement verbal fag-bashing of fellow flaming fairies, and – most of all – his mind-numbingly nauseating narcissism. Needless to say, although Neurosid: 50 Years of Perversity purports to being a biting satire of the asshole-assaulting auteur, the film also acts as the perfect publicity for his career and a virtual advertisement for his more memorable cinematic works, including appearances from actors and excerpts from Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971), Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts (1979), Horror Vacui (1984), and A Virus Knows No Morals (1985), among a number of others.

Naturally, a lot has changed in Rosa von Praunheim's life since the release of Neurosid: 50 Years of Perversity, not the least of all the life-changing revelation that the mother who thought he needed counseling to cure his gayness and the father he always wanted to fuck were not really his biological parents at all after his then 94-year-old adoptive mother, Gertrud Mischwitzky, finally told him the tormenting truth in 2000. Since then, von Praunheim has directed the documentary Two Mothers (2007) aka Meine Mütter - Spurensuche in Riga which revealed that he was born in a prison that his birth mother – who was fond of black market goods and sexy SS commanders – was imprisoned in and that his real father may have been a notorious Nazi photographer. They say hysterical women produce hysterical homos, so it should be no surprise that von Praunheim's Nazi nympho harlot of a mother inevitably had a mental breakdown and was institutionalized where she died under dubious circumstances not much later. Additionally, for all of his hating of National Socialism, I think that is quite likely that Ms. von Praunheim would have been a beer-boozing and cum-guzzling SA brownshirt had he lived during the era leading up to the Third Reich because like the the avant-gay auteur, the leaders of the Sturmabteilung, including the leader and co-founder Ernst Röhm and his poofer pretty boy deputy Edmund Heines, enjoyed fighting in the streets and brutal barebacking, so much so that homosexual Jewish-German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld (who, incidentally is a hero of von Praunheim's, to the extent that he directed the biopic The Einstein of Sex in tribute) apparently had a number of incriminating medical dossiers on the National Sodomites. Of course, von Praunheim also went on to direct the documentary Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis to expose the hidden history of homo Hitlerites, as well as contemporary leather Führers and head-giving skinheads. Needless to say, with all of von Praunheim's cinematic excursions in erotic eccentricity and crude camp carnality, it is about time that he updates Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity; a work that – although making for the perfect introduction to the flaming filmmaker's curiously quaint and queer oeuvre – now seems quite outrageously outmoded. After all, at the time of filming Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity, von Praunheim only had 60+ friends who died of AIDS and had yet to make a film (Your Heart in My Head (2005)) about cock-chomping cannibals. That being said, maybe the fierce fudge-packing filmmaker should wait until he acquires AIDS before revamping Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity, but then again, Rosa von Praunheim is no Derek Jarman.

-Ty E

CAN I BE YOUR BRATWURST, PLEASE?
CAN I BE YOUR BRATWURST, PLEASE?

Rosa von Praunheim° (1999)

For his just-under-30-minutes short Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? (1999), Berlin-based bad boy buggerer auteur Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Your Heart in My Head) returned to his low-camp cult roots, albeit Americanizing and Christmasizing it in the process in what amounts to a softcore cannibal Christmas special of the hopelessly hokey Golden Age Hollywood homage variety. A rare Rosa von Praunheim narrative flick shot in English in Los Angeles, Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? has the grand degenerate distinction of featuring mostly-gay American porn star Jeff Stryker (Jamie Loves Jeff, Zombie 4: After Death)—a meaty moron of a man who had his member immortalized via the “Jeff Stryker Cock and Balls” dildo (apparently, the pseudo-cock made headlines when Stryker and the manufacturer of the item litigated for the rights to its likeness as part of the porn star’s “intellectual property”)—as he dreams his way through American history, bumping into Marilyn Monroe and turning into German expressionist master auteur F.W. Murnau, among various other wacky things. Also featuring von Praunheim’s real-life aunt Luzi Kryn, who starred in the director’s first hit cult flick Die Bettwurst (1971) and its sequel Berliner Bettwurst (1975), Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? is also a fucked ‘family affair’ of sorts that climaxes with a curious Christmas feast of the cock-chopping and limb-licking persuasion that reminds one why porn stars, hustlers, and hunks are always referred to as ‘meat’ and nothing much more. Produced by Regina Ziegler, whose creative relationship started with von Praunheim when she helped with Die Bettwurst and produced its sequel Berliner Bettwurst, Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? is essentially a micro-sequel to the original Bettwurst films, or as stated at Zieglerfilms.com, “Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? bears all the earmarks of a consummated trilogy: a kinky, ribald, diverting, hilarious Erotic Tale. And not a moment too soon, for it was the last screen appearance of the nonagenarian Luci Kryn.” Apparently, the co-star of Die Bettwurst and Berliner Bettwurst, bitchy blond twink Dietmar Kracht, made a failed attempt at swimming Lake Havel one night, therefore a true sequel never could have been made, thus Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? offers something quite different and all the more psychopathically comedic and senselessly scatological. Produced as part of Regina Ziegler’s Erotic Tales—a multi-volume series of sexually-charged shorts directed by master auteur filmmaker’s from around the world, including Ken Russell, Bob Rafelson, and Nicholas Roeg—Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? is a short and sick depiction of a sexually and racially eclectic collective of cannibals, including everything from negro trannies and leather-fags to bitchy little girls and latina midgets, who all want a piece of Jeff Stryker’s meatrack.

Opening with the off-screen narration from a German-born hotel owner

(Karl-Heinz Teuber) stating quite jollily, "Christmas... is a feast of love and food but we had no idea whom to eat this year. We didn't care about gender or race or age. We were open-minded and tolerant but we hated bad food. All the club members in our little family hotel had agreed on a special test... Only our fantasies could decide whether someone was just a piece of meat or really perfect for the main course. This time we only want the very best and we prayed and prayed he would come along in time," Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? then introduces porn star Jeff Stryker, who has just arrived in Hollywood via bus and walks by a building with iconic movie stars like Charlie Chaplin, Clark Gable, James Dean, John Wayne, Marilyn Monroe, etc. painted on it. The first thing Stryker does after arriving in Los Angeles is bumping into a girl on rollerblades who dreams of licking blood off his muscle-bound body. After the rather bizarre run-in with the ravenous roller-girl, Stryker heads to a hotel and is hypnotized by its kraut owner who warns him, "And if you're not a good boy, you will get German discipline" before showing him to his room. Not long after, Stryker becomes JFK and has a dreamy bedroom date with a Marilyn Monroe clone straight out of Nicholas Roeg's Insignificance (1985), but being gay, he turns her down for sex. Next, Stryker goes on a dream date with the Hotel Owner's elderly mother Lucy (von Praunheim's aunt Luci Kryn) and she has him go pick her up some Christmas items, including German sausage, but on the way back he runs into a big black buck leather-fag of the high yellow persuasion, who dreams of having a faggy married bourgeois life with the cracker cocksucker that revolves around yappy American Eskimo dogs and complaining at dinner like a nagging house wife. After an earthquake, Stryker loses consciousness and before he knows it, he dreams of a busty blonde masseuse (Sirena Irwin, who acts as the voice of Mrs. SpongeBob of SpongeBob SquarePants), who the porn star tells "I do have an oversized enlarged organ" after she asks if he has any muscle problems. Indeed, in terms of dialogue alone, Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? is not much more than a softcore porn flick, albeit of the aberrant-garde variety.

After his rough erotically-charged massage with the masseuse, Stryker goes on a date with a Hispanic chick in a debauched guided tour of Hollywood in a hearse, where the driver shows places where star actors died and/or got busted for sex crimes. Inspired by Kenneth Anger's dubious anecdote from his tabloid masterpiece Hollywood Babylon (1959) told by the creepy tour guide, Stryker imagines himself as German master auteur F.W. Murnau (Nosferatu, a Symphony of Horror, Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans) dying in a car accident after a sexual mishap involving giving his 14-year-old Philippine servant driver a blowjob. The tour guide describes how Murnau's death was a tragedy as the director could have potentially directed a sequel to his masterpiece Nosferatu (1922) entitled Nosferatu II: Going Down for the Count were it not for his tragic premature death. Later that day, Stryker is approached by a terribly hungry little girl who bites his arm and runs away like a wild animal and immediately after, a black tranny named Vaginal Davis dreams of licking whipped cream off the porn star's toes. After taking a shower in a scene where Rosa von Praunheim gets to show off his film's star's meat, Stryker receives a curious phone call from Mexican midget Selene Luna (Firecracker, My Bloody Valentine 3D), who fantasizes about the sexual athlete washing her car. After all his odd encounters with the many eclectic perverts around Hollywood, Stryker is invited to a Christmas feast by the Hotel Owner. When Stryker arrives, he runs into all the perverted people he had met previously that day and it is declared "A Christmas miracle" by said perverts, and before he knows it, the Midwestern meatrack is laying on the dinner table and being covered in disgusting and grotesque neon-colored sauces. Before chowing down, the Hotel Manage declares, "Dearest friends and club members... And as you all know WE ONLY EAT WHAT WE LIVE; isn't that right?! We believe in the beauty of human nature and with that in mind, I would like to propose a toast. Will you all please raise your glasses to human nature." After that, Stryker's body parts are eaten by his new friends, with little latina Selene Luna chewing on his exaggerated wiener and the Hotel Owner eating his eyes, but an earthquake puts a stop to the La Grotesque Grande Bouffe and the porn star wakes up, realizing it was all a dream. While sunbathing poolside at the hotel, Stryker is served giant sausages by a young twink waiter, who asks him: Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please?

CAN I BE YOUR BRATWURST, PLEASE?

A sort of strikingly stupid and scatological Sunset Boulevard (1950) meets Paul Morrissey's Heat (1972) made in the style of the Grand Guignol and pre-Hollywood John Waters, Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? is a sexually aberrant and sardonic film of the killer kitsch cannibal variety that wastes no time in associating the human body and sexual subversion with a sort of natural cannibalism that is not only to be practiced, but celebrated. Essentially, the film glorifies and 'takes ownership' of the age old Christian libel of associating homosexuality with cannibalism, thereupon making Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? a satirical cinematic platter of poof political incorrectness that is bound to offend more high-strung homos and provide great propaganda for the infamous Westboro Baptist Church. Of course, director Rosa von Praunheim did not stop his interest in camp cannibalism with Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? as he followed up the work with the macabre low-budget melodrama Your Heart in My Head (2005) aka Dein Herz in meinem Hirn, a nasty bit of digital video diarrhea funded with German government tax money that is loosely based on the life and times of real-life German cannibal Armin Meiwes. Around the time he was making Your Heart in My Head, von Praunheim admitted he had been studying cannibalism for over 20 years, stating regarding his interested in the Meiwes case, "What interests me is the gay aspect and that it's also about sado-masochistic experiences." In an interview he did with the www.advocate.com regarding cannibalism and Your Heart in My Head, Praunheim stated, "I don't know if it will shock people. People tend to react with disgust on the one hand and curiosity on the other. We always say I love you so much I could eat you,” and, indeed, “I love you so much I could eat you” is essentially the main theme of Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please?, though the director seems to mistake love with sleazy sex and fetishism, which is certainly an apt way to describe homosexuality. That being said, gay porn star Jeff Stryker made the perfect star of Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? as his greatest talent is being a piece of high dollar meat on display who is respected more for his cock and carnality than his character and creed. Not exactly Fred Halsted’s vision of Los Angeles, Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? is essentially Jeff Stryker plays himself for the pleasure of perverts everywhere. A film that will undoubtedly be more of interest to Troma and cult movie fans as opposed to queenish fanbois of Queer as Folk, Can I Be Your Bratwurst, Please? is also probably the most unwaveringly depraved and morally intemperate Christmas-themed film ever made, even making slasher Santa flicks like Christmas Evil (1980) and Silent Night, Deadly Night seem tame by comparison, though it makes for a great double-feature with Silent Night, Bloody Night (1974), which features Warhol Superstars, homo-auteur Jack Smith (Flaming Creatures, Normal Love), and Tally Brown, the latter of whom von Praunheim directed a documentary about entitled Tally Brown, New York (1979). A patently pun-possessed piece of prepubescent-minded celluloid perversity, Can I Be your Bratwurst, Please? ultimately makes for a rancid raspberry dessert of thematically ‘cocky’ and aesthetically cannibalistic celluloid culinary art that tastes repulsive going in and leaves a bad aftertaste, yet is still unforgettable nonetheless.

-Ty E

NORTH FACE
NORTH FACE

Rosa von Praunheim° (1999)

After discovering the 2008 German mountaineering film North Face, based on a true story involving a team of mountain climbers (two Bavarians and two Austrians) that attempted to climb North Face of the Eiger mountain in 1936, I immediately went to the local library and rented a copy. I was intrigued to see how modern German filmmakers would handle the historical relationship mountaineering had in promoting German national pride for the government of the Third Reich. After all, before the National Socialists ever established total power, the "Mountain film" was very popular in Germany. In fact, the Third Reich's greatest propagandist (not to mention, greatest female filmmaker in film history), Leni Riefenstahl, started her cinema career by starring in Arnold Fanck's The Holy Mountain (1926). Upon viewing The Holy Mountain for the first time, I was spellbound by the Nordic mysticism and völkisch aesthetic of the film. Before initially viewing North Face, I wondered if the film would somehow echo back to the Teutonic spirituality of the original German mountain films. After watching North Face, I can honestly say that my hunger for organic German cinema (not the globalist films that are considered "German" cinema nowadays) was fulfilled.

One of Adolf Hitler's most imperative goals (as outlined in Mein Kampf) was to unite all Germanic people around the world. In North Face, two Germans and two Austrians unite to climb the Eiger as a symbolic act of pan-German unity. Two years after the 1936 mountaineering expedition featured in North Face took place, Germany annexed Uncle Adolf's homeland Austria; which was no surprise considering 99.73 percent of Austria's welcomed the Third Reich. Unlike most modern German films about the Third Reich, North Face is not completely drenched in defeatist apologies for Nazism. Instead, the film focuses on the strong wills of the individual mountain climbers. In fact, the two German mountaineers, Toni and Andi, decide to quit the German Wehrmacht (army) after they are denied leave for their expedition. Mountaineering, unlike most popular team sports like Football and Basketball, is a true expression of the Faustian spirit. European man, the Faustian man, has always had the instinct to conquer nature and the world. In an undeniable display of bravery and nobility, the mountaineers featured in North Face are willing to risk their lives just to be the first to conquer the North Face of Eiger.

The Italian philosopher Julius Evola once wrote a book (Mediations on the Peak) on his mountaineering experiences. Baron Evola saw mountain climbing as a metaphor for a spiritual quest. Although in agreement with Evola's inspiring mountaineering philosophy, I believe that mountain climbing can be a spiritual quest in itself. Very few recreational physical activities are comparable to mountaineering, where the individual has to be completely in tune and at the behest of nature. As so wonderfully portrayed in North Face, one wrong move in mountain climbing can result in instantaneous death. I can only imagine the gratifying and life affirming feeling that climbing to the top of a mountain would bestow upon a person. That being said, I really have to give praise to North Face director Philipp Stölzl and the courageous cast/crew of the film. North Face does not feature a "videogame aesthetic" and humdrum CGI special effects like most modern day action-adventure films. When watching North Face, it was hard for me to fathom the fact that the filmmakers were able to create a movie that takes place mostly on a genuine snow and ice-covered mountain. On top of the dangerous and laborious camerawork featured in the film, the actors utilized the original mountaineer equipment used in the 1930s. The cinematic adventure featured in North Face makes 127 Hours feel like a trip to a plastic Hollywood playground by comparison. I certainly cannot imagine any Tinseltown filmmaker or actor taking a death-defying Faustian gamble just to create a breathtaking film like North Face. It is no coincidence that the same country that produced Werner Herzog and his mesmerizing film Fitzcarraldo, also produced North Face.

I have no problem admitting that I have always had little interest in action and adventure films, including films involving mountaineering. To be quite honest, I had no grand expectations for North Face, as I expected it to be another cheap and shallow action-adventure film, except with Nazis. After watching this adrenalin-driven mountain climbing picture, I consider it a worthy tribute to the German mountain films of yesteryear. North Face may not have a happy ending tacked on like your typical Hollywood movie, but the sorrowful conclusion is quite fitting when you put the film in historical context. Like the protagonists featured in North Face, the Third Reich may have failed but the German people gave it their all and fought to the irreconcilable end.

-Ty E

FASSBINDER'S WOMEN
FASSBINDER'S WOMEN

Rosa von Praunheim° (2000)

As revealed in the book The Queer German Cinema (2000) by Alice Kuzniar, agitprop-oriented queer kraut auteur and all-around homo-agitator Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Horror vacui) was apparently quite relieved when his nemesis Rainer Werner Fassbinder—the true heart of German New Cinema and arguably the most important Teutonic filmmaker of the post-WWII era—dropped dead from a drug overdose in 1982 at the premature age of 37. Indeed, while von Praunheim is probably the most important and influential figure of German Queer Cinema, Fassbinder was the most important figure of German cinema in general, hence the former's undying jealousy. While still alive, Fassbinder made it quite clear that he was no fan of von Praunheim either, ultimately remarking regarding his enemy in an article he wrote in defense of Werner Schroeter (von Praunheim's ex-boyfriend): "Rosa von Praunheim, a man who is so progressive, whose consciousness is so liberated from all our bourgeois longings that he actually believes he alone has the right, almost a monopoly, to use the film medium to reflect his or anybody else's homosexuality." Of course, many things can be said of von Praunheim, but being a total 'pansy' is not one of them, at least as a filmmaker, as he had the gall to make what is probably the best documentary ever made about his rival Fassbinder's personal life, Fassbinder's Women (2000) aka Für mich gab's nur noch Fassbinder - Die Glücklichen Opfer Des Rainer Werner F aka Fassbinder Was the Only One for Me: The Willing Victims of Rainer Werner F. As von Praunheim would state regarding his ex-enemy Fassbinder and his decision to make a documentary about him, "Fassbinder, I knew him when he was starting out, and I couldn't like him. I was jealous of him, envious, and I never liked melodrama. It was only after his death that I really became aware of his qualities. I was fascinated by his wild life – contrast with bourgeois dramas – and his courage to live out the most extreme situations." For Fassbinder's Women, von Praunheim managed to interview most of Fassbinder's closest friends, acquaintances, and collaborators and dig up some new gossipy gay dirt about the dead film director. Needless to say, Fassbinder's Women reveals a man that was no less complex, melodramatic, erratic, deleterious, and paradoxical than his films. Indeed, converting ostensibly heterosexual comrades to cocksucking, causing countless men/women to fall in love with him for the mere narcissistic pleasure, and turning friends on to drug addiction are just a couple things you will learn about R.W.F. while watching von Praunheim's tell-all scandal-ridden doc. While not featuring a single frame nor excerpt from any of Fassbinder's films, Fassbinder's Women is also loaded with countless rare photographs of the filmmaker in his natural habitats, which range from leather-fag S&M bars to nude beaches, thus making the documentary essential viewing for any serious fan of R.W.F. and his wayward celluloid 'Weltanschauung.'

In terms of all the many beautiful ladies in Fassbinder's life, actress Irm Hermann was apparently "the woman that probably loved him most" as demonstrated by the fact that she financially supported him when he was a nobody, took out a life-destroying loan for his first film, and even attempted to prostitute herself for the filmmaker. Nowadays, Hermann, who typically played bitchy and sexually repressed women in the filmmaker's films, finds great joy in just visiting Fassbinder's grave and reminiscing over the not-so-good days. As a lesser known Fass-bande actress, Ursula Strätz, happily states, "Fassbinder was the only one for me," which is a sentiment that most of her contemporaries seem to also share. Indeed, apparently Fassbinder "loved being loved," even if he was apparently incapable of reciprocating said love and spent his entire filmmaking career obsessing over the innate inequality that comes with virtually all romantic relationships. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Fassbinder's first feature film was entitled Love is Colder Than Death (1969). On top of having a short-lived love affair with his future musical composer Peer Raben, Fassbinder managed to convert his assistant director/actor/right-hand man Harry Baer, who originally intended to get married and have kids, to homosexuality during a trip to Paris. Indeed, the portrait of Fassbinder that appears in Fassbinder's Women is that of a hysterical hyper-asshole and self-consumed control-freak, but as the director's one-time cameraman Michael Ballhaus (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, The Last Temptation of Christ) stated regarding his working relationship with the filmmaker, "My attitude has always been that if someone is good they can get away with it. I'd rather work with someone complex and brilliant, like Fassbinder or Scorsese, who aren't so nice, than with someone who is nice but boring." Additionally, Fassman's main leading lady Hanna Schygulla goes so far as even stating that "in a way it was like living in a fascist regime" in terms of working with him, but at the same time he also tended to bring the best out of people and pump up their self-esteem. Of course, Fassbinder just as easily could break someone as demonstrated by the tragic suicides of two of his three great loves. While called "Fassbinder's Women," the documentary is just as much about the men in Fassbinder's life as the title is more of a campy ironic reference to the fact that the filmmaker gave all his male friends/collaborators female nicknames (i.e. Harry Baer was 'Ilse,' Ballhaus was 'Sonja,' Peter Berling was 'Mummy,' etc.). Indeed, while most of the people in the doc seem to agree that Fassbinder was more or less predominately homosexual in persuasion, he also needed a woman in his life like most heterosexual men do, hence his short-lived marriage to actress Ingrid Caven (who only appears in the doc via telephone) and later relationship with film editor Juliane Lorenz (who is now the head of Fassbinder Foundation, which is the foremost promoter of the filmmaker's work). Undoubtedly, if anything is for sure, it is that Fassbinder was not only less gay than Rosa von Praunheim, but also a greater filmmaker, hence why the latter went on to direct a documentary about the former. On the other hand, Fassbinder once paid 'tribute' to von Praunheim by naming a female character in his avant-garde gangster flick The American Soldier (1970) 'Rosa von Praunheim.'

FASSBINDER'S WOMEN

While missing important actors/actresses from the filmmaker's life like Margit Carstensen (who apparently backed out of the doc at the last minute), Barbara Sukowa, Ulli Lommel, Günther Kaufmann, Gottfried John, and a couple others, Fassbinder's Women is easily the most insightful, informative, and incriminating documentary I have ever seen on the belated Bavarian bad boy auteur. For instance, Fassbinder's ex-wife Ingrid Caven revealed that the filmmaker somehow managed to 'assert himself' on her, remarking, "He was like a normal man. He really tried. He even screwed me. I think he'd made up his mind to do it. I don't know how much he enjoyed it. He did what he had to do. It was amazing. I don't think he forced himself." One also learns that, quite ironically, it was Fassbinder's 'right-hand man' and assistant director Harry Baer that ultimately acted as the courier of cocaine that would take the filmmaker's life. One also gets to see Brigitte 'Mother Küsters' Mira—who despite being ½ Jewish, got her start in acting playing a villain in the Nazi propaganda series Liese und Miese and who Fassbinder made an unlikely film star with Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) aka Angst essen Seele auf—describe how the filmmaker's Arab boyfriend El Hedi ben Salem (who played Mira's lover in Ali) would act like a wild animal when he was drunk (he would ultimately stab three strangers while inebriated). Of course, the subjects of the documentary also discuss how Fassbinder contributed to the deaths of two out of three of his great loves, El Hedi ben Salem and Armin Meier, as both of the men committed suicide after the filmmaker became bored with them (the filmmaker tended to date people that were his inferiors). Undoubtedly, out of all the subjects featured in Fassbinder's Women, Irm Hermann seemed the most empathetic regarding the filmmaker, stating of his life and seemingly inevitable premature death, "I don't know how things are judged in the next world, but I think he'd already been through hell on earth, despite all his fame. He was punished enough. I don't think you have to suffer twice. He suffered enough." If one thing is quite clear to the viewer after watching von Praunheim's Fassbinder's Women, it is that all those who worked with Fassbinder (with the possible exception of cinematographer Michael Ballhaus and already established stars like Jeanne Moreau), virtually none of them would go on to greater prestige and success after the filmmaker died. As Brigitte Mira confesses in the documentary regarding Fassbinder's imperative role in her acting role, "If he were still here, I'd have had better opportunities. In an interview recently I was asked what I wanted and I said 'An Oscar.' But I could get one only if Rainer were alive. I'm sure of that," thus demonstrating the actress' undying faith in the filmmaker's craft after all these years. Indeed, as a man who turned seemingly bimbo-like blonde bombshell Barbara Valentin (who was dubbed by the press as a "German Jayne Mansfield" despite the fact she was Austrian) into a serious and somewhat respected arthouse actress and who made an illiterate Moroccan laborer like El Hedi ben Salem into a memorable movie star, Fassbinder must have been doing something right. Of course, more than anything, Fassbinder's Women reminds one of all the unmade films the world has been cheated out of as a result of Fassbinder's tragic and senseless premature death.

-Ty E

THE EINSTEIN OF SEX
THE EINSTEIN OF SEX

Rosa von Praunheim° (2000)

Undoubtedly, out of the many good, bad, and ugly films directed by queer kraut agitpropagandist Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity), the debauched director's pseudo-docudrama The Einstein of Sex: Life and Work of Dr. M. Hirschfeld (1999) aka Der Einstein des Sex—a work depicting the life and times of pioneering Jewish German sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld—is one of the Berlin-based filmmaker's most deathly serious yet aesthetically and cinematically flaccid works. Sort of like a lurid and lecherous Lifetime movie with a couple softcore sex scenes and semi-grotesque genital-mutilating surgery scenes, The Einstein of Sex is quite possibly the most absurd tribute to a ridiculous figure ever made, as von Praunheim's sort of perverse poof tribute to a leftist Hebrew subversive who, while exceedingly gay in the extra-effeminate sort of way and dedicating his life to legalizing homosexuality in the Fatherland, had a rather banal sex life and seemed more interested in coldly examining the warped genitals of hermaphrodites and collecting ancient dildos, or at least one would assume after viewing this desperately debauched yet stupidly serious docudrama. Had National Socialist Germany won the Second World War, it is very doubtful that people would know the name Magnus Hirschfeld today for obvious reasons, but since the Occident has drastically degenerated into a gigantic Weimar Republic of sorts as a whole, he is now revered as a Sodomite God among certain curious circles like the so-called 'queer community' and has been described as "the first advocate for homosexual and transgender rights" due to his special affection for fags. Herr Hirschfeld also has a minor connection to cinema history in that he co-wrote and had a cameo in the silent flick Different From The Others (1919) aka Anders als die Andern, a work revered today for being one of the first films to feature a positive depiction of homosexuals and that would act as the basic plot inspiration for Victim (1961) starring Dirk Bogarde, which has the grand distinction of being the first film to feature the word "homosexual." A seemingly senseless piece of scatological sentimentalism, mindless homo Heeb worship, and childish condemnation of fag-bashing National Socialists who had the audacity to destroy Hirschfeld's sexual 'research' institute, burn his books, and force the good doctor into exile, The Einstein of Sex is just as innately idiotic in its message as the films of celluloid Shoah saint S. Spielberg, but what makes von Praunheim's film different is that it is so amateurishly directed and curiously nonsensical in its construction that it is ultimately a work of accidental queersploitation. In fact, considering that it is essentially a work of fiction where von Praunheim totally invented events, incidents, and motivations regarding the life and work Hirschfeld, The Einstein of Sex is not much more reliable as a work of history regarding its subject than Ilsa, She Wolf of the SS (1975) is regarding the reality of Nazi concentration camps.

In Rosa von Praunheim's mind, Magnus Hirschfeld developed his affinity for championing sexual perversion after his father, who was a respected physician, congratulated him as a prepubescent boy for drawing pictures of wild animals having sex. When Hirschfeld (played by Friedel von Wangenheim, who co-wrote the film, in what would be his first and last film role) came of age and went to school for medicine to become a physician, he was absolutely offended by the fact that his professor would describe a pederast as a degenerate, so he tells his friend that he wants to become a sort of Bolshevik of medicine and that together, "We can change everything. We can change this university. We can change the whole world." Hirschfeld's friend thinks he's deranged so their friendship ends, but luckily he meets a disgraced Austrian aristocrat named Baron von Teschenberg (Gerd Lukas Storzer) who caused a scandal when he was caught giving a blowjob to a soldier and was disinherited by his family, so he becomes the doc's loyal assistant. Meanwhile, Hirschfeld starts the Scientific Humanitarian Committee to defend the rights of homos, trannies, and other sexual misfits and drafts a petition to overturn Paragraph 175 to legalize homosexuality, ultimately managing to get over 5000 people to sign it, including Hermann Hesse, Rainer Maria Rilke, Albert Einstein, Richard von Krafft-Ebing, Gerhart Hauptmann and countless others, but the law is never overturned in the physician's lifetime. Hirschfeld also passively butts heads with masculine homosexual activist Adolf Brand (played by blond-haired German Jew Ben Becker) who has nothing but sheer and utter disdain for effeminate gays and glorifies the masculine heroism of ancient Greeks, telling the Yiddish doc regarding his poof patients and overall efforts, "Those creatures are neither man nor woman, and you lump such wretched stepchildren of nature together with these blossoming, glorious boys. We don't need a doctor who spends his time in brothels and privies examining the underpants of Jews with three anuses." Of course, being a sodomite socialist Semite, Hirschfeld has a very different view on things and will do anything to deracinate and subvert traditional German society, as exemplified in his diagnosis of a pansy patient, "Congratulations. As you suspected, you are clearly same-sex inclined. I prescribe repeated visits to the Adonis Dance Club. There you'll meet others like yourself. Fall in love, be happy. Stay away from public toilets, limit the amount of intercourse and avoid depraved people." Despite devoting his life to Hirschfeld, Baron von Teschenberg is incapable of getting the doctor to have a sexual/romantic relationship with him, so after being blackmailed by a hustler, he decides to commit suicide.

Throughout The Einstein of Sex, Dr. Hirschfeld becomes involved in various forms of queer quackery, including transplanting 'heterosexual testicles' bought on the black market to homosexual men in the hopes of changing their sexual orientation. Of course, in Rosa von Praunheim's mind such scientific stupidity is somewhat successful as demonstrated by a young colon-choker's remarks after receiving hetero-testicles that, “My body now longs for a woman, but my soul still cries out for a man.” With the wraith of Wotan brewing in the collective unconscious of Deutschland, Hirschfeld is beaten by evil anti-Semites and has his work described as “Jewish Pig Asshole-Intellectualism” by a young man attending one of his lectures. Meanwhile, after untying a string wrapped around a tranny named Dorchen’s dick (Tima die Göttliche), he obtains a homo housewife of sorts in the form of said Transman, whose job is to clean and maintain his new Institut für Sexualwissenschaft (Institute for Sexual Research) building in Berlin. Although well past middle-aged, Hirschfeld finally fucks more than just antique toys and begins a sadomasochistic sexual relationship with a young follower named Karl Giese (Olaf Drauschke). To the sheer and utter heartbreak of kosher twink Giese, Hirschfeld leaves the Institute for Sexual Research and travels abroad, where he starts a sexual relationship with a young oriental twinkie. From the comfort of movie theaters, Hirschfeld watches newsreels of the National Socialist takeover, the destruction of his sex institute, and the burning of his books. In the end, Giese commits suicide, Dorchen disappears, the Institute for Sexual Research is destroyed, and Hirschfeld takes exile in Paris, France where he tries in vain to start a new sex institute and dies a rich and fat man.

THE EINSTEIN OF SEX

While Hirschfeld’s cocksucking campaign died with the rise and rule of National Socialism in Germany from 1933-1945, the debauched doctor’s work ultimately paid-off in the long run as demonstrated by the simple fact that a film like The Einstein of Sex could be made in Germany, not to mention the fact that a good percentage of post-WWII filmmakers, including Rosa von Praunheim, but also Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Werner Schroeter, Ulrike Ottinger, Monika Treut, Jochen Hick, Frank Ripploh and countless others, are/were homosexuals/lesbians. Not only was the anti-homo-sex provision Paragraph 175 abolished entirely in 1988 (where it was fully revoked in 1994 after the German reunification) in Germany and the legalization of gay prostitution, among other aberrant things, in the Fatherland since Hirschfeld’s death, but the physician’s ideas of a “third sex” and collective gay effeminacy have essentially become the norm in not only Germany/Europe, but also North America as well, where ‘gay’ has turned into a MTV-fabricated prepackaged pseudo-culture that revolves around such worthless garbage as Lady Gaga, Will & Grace, raunchy race-mixing, cultural Marxism, victim politics, and bourgeois gay marriage. As The Einstein of Sex one-dimensionally depicts, Adolf Brand—a Stirnerite anarchist who published the masculine homosexual periodical Der Eigene (“The Own”), which promoted völkisch artists like Fidus (Hugo Reinhold Karl Johann Höppener) and nationalist/proto-nazi writers like Hans Blüher, as well as the founder of the Wandervogel-like Gemeinschaft der Eigenen (GdE), which promoted German unity and a sort of warrior creed of Sparta—promoted a form of gaydom that is virtually not existent today which valued and championed masculinity, heroism, and the resurrection of the Germanic Männerbund that totally rejected Hirschfeld's view of the gay male as a third sex, but even went so far as arguing that homosexual men were more masculine. Of course, Rosa von Praunheim portrays Adolf Brand in a negative light in The Einstein of Sex, depicting him as an abhorrent anti-Semitic megalomaniac, but in reality he represented a distinct culturally German view of homosexuality whereas Hirschfeld represented a leftist Jewish view that has gone on to dominate the Occident world as a result of Germany's defeat during the Second World War. It is worth noting that Otto Weininger, an Austrian Jewish philosopher, who would go on to influence Ludwig Wittgenstein and Hans Blüher, argued in his once-highly influential work Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character that Jewishness and femininity are one in the same, thus making Hirschfeld's view an alien creed that has subverted gay, as well as heterosexual, European culture and turned it into a putrid pile of poofer degeneracy. Of course, Weininger's theories do not seem that out of line when one looks at popular figures like Woody Allen, Jerry Seinfeld, Steven Spielberg, and Richard Simmons, and see that the Jewish race is severely lacking in testosterone.

Indeed, Hirschfeld was the 'Einstein of Sex' in that while today many German sexologists, like Adolf Brand, have been largely forgotten, the Hebraic physician has been sainted by Philo-Semitic sodomites and his ideas, like those of fellow perverted Judaic Freud, have entered and flourished in the mainstream of society, even if the name Magnus Hirschfeld is, quite thankfully, not exactly a household name. Undoubtedly, The Einstein of Sex is Rosa von Praunheim's most Philo-Semitic and politically correct work to date as a piece of absurdly aesthetically repellant and conspicuously kitschy pseudo-docudrama with a nauseating sentimental score, shockingly wooden acting, and prosaic direction that is only marginally saved from total worthlessness as a cinematic by work by its handful of scenes of accidental comical relief involving Hirschfeld screwing his sex toy antiques, Nazi violence, and the when good gay doctor is attacked by the character Adolf Brand, who states such eloquent things as, "Love between men is love between heroes. Down with sissies, fairies, nellies and queens." Undoubtedly, von Praunheim should stick to directing warped agitprop documentaries and aberrant-garde camp comedies as The Einstein of Sex feels like it was directed by an autistic psychopath trying in vain to mimic genuine human emotion. If I did not know better, I would have thought someone cut director Rosa von Praunheim's balls off just like Hirschfeld did to his patients as The Einstein of Sex lacks more testicular fortitude than a gang of Indian eunuchs.

-Ty E

MEN, HEROES, AND GAY NAZIS
MEN, HEROES, AND GAY NAZIS

Rosa von Praunheim° (2005)

Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis is a captivating and sometimes hilarious documentary that would offend both members of GLAAD and the German National Democratic Party (NPD). Gay Nazis (both historically and contemporarily) are not a group that Holocaust promoters want people to know about. It is just not a good thing to advertise these taboo facts when trying to gain sympathy and money for “discriminated” groups. Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis makes the claim that 10%-15% of German Neo-Nazis are homosexuals. German filmmaker and gay rights activist Rosa von Praunheim directed this documentary that MTV doesn't want you to see.

The Neo-Nazis featured in Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis are for the most part very nice guys. Director Rosa von Praunheim stated of the subjects featured in the documentary, “Some may be shocked that I do not take a stand in my film and do not portray gay neo-Nazis as monsters, but as people living their lives in dramatic contradiction.” Thankfully, von Praunheim didn't cower to the mainstream pressures of “condemning” the gay Nazis as deranged monsters. Instead, he allows the viewer to simply observe statements by the pink Nazis so you can make up your own mind about the material. I am sure one of the gay Neo-Nazis really offends viewers when he mentions that liberals love multiculturalism because they don't have to travel to fuck people of different races. Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis also goes into detail about some of the original Nazi members that were openly gay. SA leader Ernst Röhm was notorious for heavy drinking and sending off storm troopers to stomp in the faces of communists. Sadistic homosexual Edmund Heines, Röhm's deputy in the SA, is said in the documentary to have had set-up his own special concentration camp so he could torture and kill victims for pleasure. Maybe Holocaust museums should think about putting up displays featuring Heines and his barbarous legacy.

Edmund Heines Apparently Nazi regalia and costumes are really big in the gay community in a nonpolitical way. The documentary features a skinhead discussing how some homosexuals enjoy role playing where one partner plays the “Nazi” and the other plays the “Jew” during a rape scenario. Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis also features a gay group registered by the government that dresses up in military clothing and has outdoor orgies. It's hard not to laugh during these segments of the documentary. Especially when it features a young skinhead simulating masturbation as he reads Mein Kampf. Men, Heroes, and Gay Nazis is an interesting documentary that proves that truth is always stranger than fiction. Whether it be a Neo-Nazi that was jailed for years just for disputing details regarding the Nazi Holocaust in Nazi Germany or a Neo-Nazi that hates Islamic foreigners because they are homophobic, the documentary features a wealth of thought provoking and unconventional material. Rosa von Praunheim proves that all gay rights activists aren't just whiny weaklings that further propagate gay stereotypes. Maybe one day historians will finally find conclusive evidence regarding Adolf Hitler's questionable sexuality. Would the gay rights groups blame his actions on being persecuted?

-Ty E

YOUR HEART IN MY HEAD
YOUR HEART IN MY HEAD

Rosa von Praunheim° (2005)

The real-life true crime story of gay kraut cannibal Armin Meiwes—a man who butchered, killed, and ate a voluntary victim, including his penis, that he met on the internet—has inspired popular culture in a manner not seen in the miscegenation-based man-eating of American blond beast Jeffrey Dahmer, including the popular song “Mein Teil” (which reached second place in German music charts after its release) by Teutonic industrial group Rammstein and the title of untermensch American degenerate Marilyn Manson’s album Eat Me, Drink Me (2007) but, more importantly, it inspired a number of films, especially in the Fatherland. Undoubtedly, the most mainstream, totally worthless, and pathetically politically correct film based on the cannibal case is Grimm Love (2006) aka Rohtenburg, which was initially banned in Germany after Armin Meiwes complained the film infringed on his “personal rights.” Of course, the most brutal and aberrantly artsy cinematic take on the Meiwes case is the splatter-arthouse flick Cannibal (2006) directed by Marian Dora, a relentlessly unhinged piece of putrid, anti-politically correct poetry that was also banned in Deutschland that obsessively attempted to reconstruct the actual events that took place between the cannibal and the man whose cock he chomped on. Aside from possibly Fassbinder superstar Ulli Lommel’s Diary of a Cannibal (2007), a deplorable piece of digital diarrhea set in Los Angeles featuring a heterosexual flesh-eating couple as opposed to a homo one, Your Heart in My Head (2005) aka Dein Herz in meinem Hirn directed by hysterical homo-supremacist Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Horror Vacui) is the loosest and most fictitious take on the Armin Meiwes case. A no-budget digital work oftentimes shot from the perspective of the sexually aberrant anti-hero and his trusty camcorder, Your Heart in My Head is a crudely assembled piece of campy cannibal melodrama featuring two strikingly ugly and lethally lonely kraut cocksuckers who are too afraid to suck each other’s cock yet ultimately find temporary solace and romantic companionship in vorarephilia, at least until one of the two men bleeds out and the other carries his decapitated head around like a little girl clutching a much cherished baby doll. A depressing and pathetic tale about two rather depressing and pathetic middle-aged men well past their prime who see dining on one another as the only way of finding ‘light’ in a world plagued by all-encompassing deadness, Your Heart in My Head has the grand distinction of being probably the only truly ‘serious’ gay cannibal melodrama ever made, which would have been probably better handled in Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s hands were he still alive, but Rosa von Praunheim adds a certain fiercely faggy flare to the film that makes it undeniably entertaining, if not endearingly autistic and aesthetically obnoxious and even revolting.

Achim Grenz (Martin Molitor) is a divorced and unemployed middle-aged

school teacher and neurotic Norman Bates-esque momma's boy of the latently homosexual sort who has no one to talk to or confide in, so he talks to himself via camcorder. Unlike Armin Meiwes, who lived in a village in a large and dilapidated ancient home, Achim lives in a small suburban home in Spandau, Berlin, a place he lovingly describes as "the kingdom of the dead" that is full of "dead people, dead cars, dead streets, dead bushes...everything is dead." Under the pretense of socializing over chess, Achim invites a high school teacher named Peter Mack (Martin Ontrop) to his house. Upon their first visit, Achim finds Peter's behavior to be "a bit rough," especially after he ironically describes the color his home as follows: "Doesn't it make you think of a butcher shop and things like pigs cut in half, dripping?" Achim kicks Peter out, but later he comes back and apologizes, thus ushering in the beginning of their uniquely unhinged and mostly sexless romantic relationship. Achim likes Peter so much that he immediately introduces him to his overbearing yet disabled mother Anna Lisa (also played by Martin Molitor), who is clearly a lonely sexually repressed bitch who seems to be the source of her son's innate passivity, misery, and sheer and utter lack of testicular fortitude. Although no friend of man's best friend, Achim is given a dog named Gina by Peter. When Achim kills the canine, Peter locks him in his own basement but the door was never really locked and the deranged dog-slayer spends three entire days in a virtual domestic dungeon because he was too cowardly to even attempt to try and open the door. Seemingly trying in vain, Peter attempts every shady tactic he can think of, including physical and verbal violence, to make a man out of perennial cuckold Achim. As Peter tells Achim, "There's nothing wrong with a craving for meat. Men need protein." Despite his repulsion in regard to his cowardice, Peter remarks to Achim's mother regarding her son, "I like him so much; I could eat him alive," but, of course, the roles are ultimately reversed when the wimpy middle-aged untermensch finally develops enough gall to go more than balls deep. After pretending to castrate his own cock, Peter begins to show weakness in front of Achim after it is revealed that he is a homeless transient who has lost everything and is no longer a school teacher as he claimed, but just a perverted bum who likes to talk a lot of shit. Peter inevitably convinces Achim to cut off his peter and ultimately kill and eat him because he believes that "to be eaten is to be holy...to be revered...highly honored..." and being a homeless latent homo, he no longer has anything less to lose. After Peter chugs some liquor and takes some pills, Achim turns him into a eunuch and then a corpse and later decapitates and performs an amateur embalming of his body. After his own mother also dies due to his own neglect, Achim, who has gone through some warped ritualistic transformation due to his cannibalism, proudly declares to his camcorder, "At last I'm my own master. No carping mother, no dominating asshole friend." With Peter's guts in his formerly weak stomach and his head carefully placed in a cardboard box, Achim decides to take a fabulous trip down South, thus beginning his new life as a man with a sort of cannibalistic confidence that he did not have previously.

YOUR HEART IN MY HEAD

Probably even more so than the absurdly melodramatic Jeffrey Dahmer biopic Dahmer (2002) starring Jeremy Renner, Praunheim's Your Heart in My Head dares the viewer to empathize with an exceedingly pathetic and lonely man who dares to eat the flesh of another man as a drastically desperate way to feel both 'empowered' and close to someone for the first time in his life. Undoubtedly one of the most melancholy yet strangely campy depictions of post-WWII Germany ever made, Your Heart in My Head certainly is quite effective, if not rather ridiculous for a no-budget flick with a humble home-video aesthetic that looks like it was shot over a mere weekend amongst friends. One must give director Rosa von Praunheim credit where credit is due as the film was condemned by conservative politicians from Armin Miewes' hometown, including Axel Wintermeyer, a Christian Democrat representative in the state parliament, who described Your Heart in My Head as "glorifying a perverse criminal" and stated that the film's title is "hard to beat for tastelessness," which is no small insult in a country where prostitution is legal and small sex toys are sold in coin machines in subway and bus stations. Originally advertised as a "mix of grotesque, thriller, and documentary... a gruesome comedy" by the North Rhine-Westphalia Film Institute, which partially funded the film to the disgust of many German taxpayers, Your Heart in My Head—a work that is essentially an autistic melodrama with a tinge of sexually sadistic splatter scenes—represents an all time low in terms of aesthetics in the land of thinkers and poets, but the Armin Miewes case is as well, as both reflect a spiritually sick nation longing for vitality. If Your Heart in My Head can be described as a 'horror' flick, it is only in the völkisch sense in its dreary depiction of modern urban Germany as a cultural graveyard of alienation and sexual perversion where physical and emotional ugliness is adulated. Indeed, it is no coincidence that anti-hero Achim describes his hometown as the "Kingdom of the Dead" and if an alpha-degenerate like auteur Rosa von Praunheim understands this, one can only speculate that the Fatherland has a truly forsaken future.

-Ty E

TWO MOTHERS

Rosa von Praunheim° (2007)

Believe it or not, quite fittingly, kraut queer filmmaker and all-around gay agitator Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity) is the bastard son of a whore who was spawned like a literal born criminal in prison, or so one learns while watching his rather personal documentary Meine Mütter – Spurensuche in Riga (2007) aka Two Mothers – The Search Began in Riga. Indeed, until his adoptive mother, Gertrud Mischwitzky, told him otherwise in 2000 not long before she died, von Praunheim never even remotely suspected that he was adopted, let alone the seemingly forsaken progeny of a Nazi whore criminal who mysteriously died in a mental institution as a result of supposed ‘chronic diarrhea’ in 1946. In Two Mothers, von Praunheim not only chronicled his strenuous and seemingly futile search for the identity of his biological parents, but also the history of Eastern Europe, especially Riga, Latvia, during the German occupation, the expulsion of Germans from Eastern Europe and the dissolving of Prussia, and of course the holocaust. With the documentary, von Praunheim has achieved something he has never achieved before by making a film that is more or less a fag-free affair that can be enjoyed by the entire family. In other words, the doc is the one von Praunheim flick that will not cause your grandmother to suffer a massive heart attack, as a documentary featuring various elderly grandmas and great-grandmas sentimentally discussing the past. On top of revealing that von Praunheim has come a long way since he was fittingly begotten in a National Socialist jail, Two Mothers also paints a portrait of Eastern Europe that is quite eerie, as a sort of cultural graveyard that never recovered from its de-Germanization and subsequent Sovietization. Among other things, von Praunheim learns during his ancestral quest that his mother was from the Prussian town of Pyritz, which was built in the early 1200s and destroyed in February 1945 by the Red Army. Indeed, believe it or not, Aryan alpha-berrosexual von Praunheim actually gets in touch with his inner ‘Heimat’ in Two Mothers. The doc also has its moments of unintentional humor, especially when the director incessantly asks researchers and historians if there is any chance that he is Jewish, as if his goofy kraut appearance does not blatantly tell otherwise. Of course, instead of learning that he is a member of god’s chosen tribe, von Praunheim discovers that there is a good chance that he is the prodigal progeny of one of the most murderous commanders of the SS Einsatzgruppe. Indeed, Two Mothers is certainly a fucked filmic family affair, but it is also quite touching in its own post-apocalyptic Heimat sort of way. Undoubtedly, more than anything, the doc reveals that an entire people can be destroyed in one single generation, with von Praunheim—a mensch who is the direct product of the chaos of the Second World War and who considers himself to be a member of an international queer nation as opposed to the German nation—being the most blatant symbol of this degeneration.

TWO MOTHERS

Opening with home movie footage of auteur Rosa von Praunheim (real name Holger Mitschwitzky) celebrating the 96th birthday of his adoptive mother Gertrud Mischwitzky, Two Mothers immediately gives the viewer the feeling that, despite the director's degenerate behavior as a poor public figure who has dedicated a good portion of his career to directing aberrosexual agitprop, he has a fairly good relationship with the woman who raised him. In 2000, von Praunheim's adoptive mother revealed to him that she adopted him from a German orphanage in Riga, Latvia where his adoptive father, who was in the navy, had been stationed. Probably thinking he could make a great film while also learning about the woman that gave birth to him in the process, von Praunheim heads to the Slavic city for the first time in 63 years to discover who his real biological mother was, though he has very little information to work with and one historian describes his search as being like attempting to find a needle in a haystack. Since most public records were destroyed during the chaos of the Second World War, it is rather unlikely that von Praunheim will find any leads, yet after a researcher randomly discovers a near-ancient receipt for diapers for a baby named Holger Radtke, the filmmaker soon sets his eyes on the photograph of a curious woman that gave birth to him over 60 years ago for the first time in his life. As it turns out, the director's biological mother is a woman named Edith Radtke and she apparently was a real-life femme fatale of sorts who was the mistress of many powerful men, including a famous Nazi photographer named Max Ehlert, a business manager (who she apparently was engaged to), and a commander of an Einsatzgruppe unit who loved whoring and drinking. As for von Praunheim's mother's current whereabouts, she apparently died in a nuthouse in 1946 after suffering chronic diarrhea, which ostensibly led to her death via heart muscle degeneration. Not surprisingly, it is revealed that the woman that signed off on Radtke's death certificate was well known for her use of euthanasia and would typically list the cause of death as a heart attack anytime she had someone exterminated. A victim of electroshock therapy, Radtke was probably not in the most peaceful state of mind when she perished under rather dubious circumstances.

While on his odyssey to discover the origins of his mother and her family, von Praunheim spends almost just as much time researching the fate of the Jews during the Second World War, especially in Riga and the Baltic region in general. Among other things, the director hooks up with an eccentric and oftentimes gratingly annoying left-wing researcher named Anita Kugler, who is best known for writing the book Scherwitz: Der jüdische SS-Offizier (2004) aka Scherwitz: The Jewish SS Officer, which details the truly stranger-than-fiction story of a Jewish SS officer named Fritz Scherwitz who commanded a concentration camp(!) and has been described as a sort of 'Semitic Schindler' due to his protection of his fellow Hebrews during his reign as a kosher Nazi, though he was arrested after the Second World War for his apparent involvement in the execution of three Jews.

As for Herr von Praunheim's potential genetic links to the big H, the director may have been the progeny of one of two Einsatzgruppe commanders, which include Franz Walter Stahlecker and Rudolf Lange. While Stahlecker was killed by Soviet partisans in early 1942 (over 8 months before von Praunheim born), Lange—a man whose greatest claim to infamy is that he apparently liquidated 250,000 people in a little less than six months—disappeared sometime in late-February 1945, thus making it more likely that the latter man is the filmmaker's father. Additionally, as described in the doc, Lange was known for “whoring around” and Praunheim's mother was a whore.

At the conclusion of Two Mothers, von Praunheim asks himself regarding the identity of his biological father: “Do I really want to know?” In the documentary Rosakinder (2012) aka Rosa's Children—a tribute to the filmmaker directed by five of his former students, including Tom Tykwer, Julia von Heinz, and Chris Kraus—von Praunheim opts out of seeing if he is related to an infamous SS man. Indeed, filmmaker Chris Kraus (Vier Minuten aka Four Minutes, The Poll Diaries), who also appears in Two Mothers as well, may be related to his ex-teacher via his SS officer grandfather, but von Praunheim did not have the gall to find out for sure by taking a DNA test, as if discovering he is the bastard boi of a much hated Hebrew hunter will somehow turn him into an evil Nazi butcher overnight or something. Undoubtedly, it would be the ultimate irony of genetic fate if it was discovered that von Praunheim—a man whose pseudonymous name is in reference to the pink triangle that cocksuckers had to where in concentration camps—is the son of one of the Schutzstaffel's foremost slaughterers.

Although I almost hate to say it, Two Mothers gave me a newfound respect for Rosa von Praunheim. Indeed, while the doc dwells way too much on the holocaust, the director also uncovered important yet highly neglected pieces of the history that is rarely talked about, especially in the United States. For example, the director learns that his family was the victim of Soviet mass theft after interviewing a stoic old-timer named Ekkehart Wendorff, who was born on a 600-year-old estate in Pyritz, which is where von Praunheim's mother was originally from. Like much of what used to be called Prussia, Pyritz fell into Slavic hands after WWI and was physically destroyed by the Red Army in February 1, 1945, with the German population being subsequently expelled and forced to fend for their own in the west. Interestingly, Wendorff states regarding theft of his hometown: “The expulsion of Germans from the eastern territories remains a crime and an injustice. I'm not going to say, “That's fine, just keep the land.” If the politicians ever say that, then we deserve reparations. I always say, “A half-truth is a total lie.” The German empire never fell.” Towards the conclusion of Two Mothers, von Praunheim attends a ‘Pyritz Heimat’ reunion where he meets his exceedingly elderly aunt and cousin. To von Praunheim's credit, despite the fact that his relatives and the people of Pyritz are ‘god-fearing’ and rather nationalistic, the filmmaker pays them great respect and seems to appreciate their culture and customs. One can only fathom how von Praunheim would have turned out had he been raised by his biological parents in Pyritz. Indeed, everyone knows the stereotype of gay men having cold mothers and as a man whose mother disposed of him immediately after he was born, von Praunheim might owe his signature sexuality to the lack of nurturing he received as an infant (notably, Fassbinder's boyfriend Armin Meier and sod serial killer Jürgen Bartsch were also illegitimate children who were deprived of affection as infants). Indeed, one would never suspect from a baby pic of von Praunheim featured in Two Mothers that he would grow up to be a rampantly homosexual colon-choking chauvinist who would have gay sex in front of his students and direct films about cocksucker cannibals. Indeed, the one thing I kept asking myself while watching the documentary is how Edith Radtke would have reacted had she survived the nut ward and met her big gay biological son.

TWO MOTHERS

-Ty E

KING OF COMICS

Rosa von Praunheim° (2012)

I have never been a comic book fan and never understood the appeal of reading glorified picture books nor have I ever had any interest in comic book film adaptations, but I do like the campy dark horror-comedy Killer Condom (1996) aka Kondom des Grauens, which was based on 1987 work of the same name written by kraut queer comic book artist Ralf König. Despite being an unrepentant homo with a pathological propensity for drawing massive monster members, König is easily the most famous and commercially successful comic book artist working in Germany today, so it should be no surprise that foremost Teutonic gay agitator and fag-fascist filmmaker Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity) would direct a documentary about the comic king. Indeed, König des Comics - Ralf König (2012) aka Der König des Comics über und mit Ralf König aka King of Comics is just another one of many examples as to why von Praunheim is the greatest aberrosexual anthropologist-sociologist ethnology documentarian who has ever lived, as the documentary digs deep into the life and work of Ralf König, a man who went from being a meager peasant woodworker to being one of the most controversial and politically incorrect comic book artists of his zeitgeist and a rare gay artist who actually managed to crossover into the mainstream in a mostly non-affirmative-action-based fashion. Simultaneously a man who worships and fetishizes the bronze bungholes of brown men from foreign southern lands and depicts Muslims as the most primitively-minded yet decidedly dangerous philistines in the world, König is depicted as an equal opportunity offender in King of Comics, though his allegiance to quasi-hermetic homo sects in the Fatherland, especially Munich, cannot be denied. Taking cocksucker clichés to such extremes that his work manages to parody everything from the erotic caricatures of Tom of Finland to the mainstream homogenized fagdom typical of American suburban sodomite sitcoms like Will & Grace, König managed to catch the attention of the heterosexual mainstream, with his comics Der bewegte Mann (1987) and Pretty Baby (1988) being adapted into the popular award-winning German comedy Der bewegte Mann (1994) aka The Most Desired Man aka Maybe ... Maybe Not directed by Sönke Wortmann and starring Til Schweiger and Katja Riemann. Seeming like the typical gay story aside from the subject's success at comic arts, King of Comics tells the story of a strange boy from a small village who did not 'find himself' until moving to the big city, being sexually used and abused by older men, dressing in drag, developing a dubious taste for dark meat, and eventually becoming a married member of the buggery bourgeois.

Swiss dentist René Krummenacher (who co-directed the S&M-themed documentary The Pierce File (2002) and acted as cinematographer of the von Praun-heim doc Phooey, Rosa (2002)) has been a Ralf König fan for 26 years and credits the comic artist for helping him to come to terms with his homosexuality. With the help of von Praunheim, Krummenacher is finally going to get to meet his hero and luckily for him, König is no 'spiritual queen' with airs of anal-retentive arrogance, but a rather humble fellow who has a giant portrait of a cow hanging on his apartment wall. Indeed, growing up in the small town of Soest in North Rhine-Westphalia, West Germany, König even dated a chick when he was a teenager but when he failed to assert himself on her, he had to confess to his lady friend that he liked boys and not girls. Only managing to graduate middle school, König worked a banal job as a 'joiner' (a type of low-level carpenter) for eight grueling hours each day, which enabled him to develop a sort of 'cerebral cinema' in his mind where he would dream up comic scenarios while at work that he would ultimately bring to life in comic book form. After meeting a comic book publisher who found him 'sexy,' König published what he describes as 'adolescent scribbles,' which were really nothing more than crude homo erotica with comedic undertones. With Rosa von Praunheim's book Sex und Karriere (1978) aka Sex and Career as his gay bible and after attending a fag festival with his fat fag hag friend where he was quasi-raped, König finally came out of the closet in 1979, even leaving a note out at his workspace letting his heterosexual prole coworkers know that he is a proud poof. To the scribbler's surprise, none of his comrades at work confronted him about his homosexuality, thus leading König to come to the conclusion that the heteros were more afraid of him than he was of them.

KING OF COMICS

As King of Comics candidly reveals, although initially disgusted by effeminate queens and drag queens, König began dressing in drag himself after entering the homo underworld, which he does on occasion to this day. Meanwhile, despite lacking a high school education, König was accepted into Kunstakademie Düsseldorf art academy in 1981 and managed to publish three full-length comics in a single year while attending school. Finding Düsseldorf boring, König decided to go to Munich where he became a gay celebrity and started becoming politically active in poof power groups. König also became active in indulging in brown men, namely a fellow who he simply describes as 'The Brazilian' and who, not unlike Rainer Werner Fassbinder with his brown boy toys Günther Kaufmann and El Hedi ben Salem, he blew all his money on with lavish vacations and whatnot to appease his swarthy but apparently sexually virile schwarze mensch. While becoming accepted as a mainstream figure, the comic artist could not stomach the fact a hit film based on his work, The Most Desired Man, catered mostly to heterosexual audiences and made a mockery of gaydom. With a growing hetero audience, as well as the growing homo-hating Muslim population in Germany, König began making politically incorrect comics mocking the Prophet Mohammad as well as those white liberals that were too afraid to acknowledge the fact that people who force their women to wear towels over their heads might have a hard time playing nice in a liberal democracy where prostitution is legal. Now living the life of a bourgeois housewife with his young boy toy Olaf Gabriel, König downplays his talents to Kruppenacher, who he sells three large paintings.

During the beginning of King of Comics, auteur Rosa von Praunheim asks a heterosexual comic fan, “Can Ralf König comics make you gay?,” to which the man jokingly replies “yeah.” Personally, after watching the documentary, I believe that if it were not for the comic artist’s more obsessively detailed drawings of men’s rectums and his natural tendency toward bizarre pro-gay messages, one would think König was a heterosexual mocking homo kultur in a fashion not unlike American animated shows like South Park and Family Guy, albeit taken to a more perversely pornographic and unwaveringly debauched degree that would certainly baffle American viewers. Although I am far from a comic connoisseur, I think König’s aesthetic seems like Robert Crumb meets Matt Groening with a slightly and quasi-sarcastic influence from Tom of Finland. As a German heterosexual comic bookstore owner named Bert Henning states regarding König’s work, “He’s definitely on the right track in that his comics, probably without intention, are very cinematic.” While I cannot say I have seen any other König film adaptations, Killer Condom—a deranged dark comedy with special-effects work done by arthouse-splatter auteur Jörg Buttgerit about a gay twink-loving wop cop police detective who goes on a mission to uncover the dubious origins of ravenous rubbers after losing a testicle via a carnivorous condom—is certainly a rather raunchy and patently politically incorrect (albeit with a taken-on pro-gay message at the end) work that is bound to offend more gay than straight viewers. During King of Comics, director von Praunheim, who is well known in Germany for his audaciously annoying and arrogant approach to AIDS activism, seems somewhat irked by König’s Killer Condom as he interpreted it as an anti-condom film, but luckily the comic artist makes no apologies for his work. Of course, as a man who made a comic in tribute to his friend who died of AIDS-related complications, König has probably done his part in the gay cancer campaign. Indeed, König has created comics about racially pure ‘right-wing homophobic’ terriers, a gay molestation of Goldilocks and the Three Bears featuring a tranny hair-hat negress as Goldilocks and three fat hairy men as ‘bears’, a moronic and ostensibly heterosexual muscle-bound Spanish construction worker who likes rim-jobs named ‘Ramon’, and a gerontophilic Platonic dialogue between a geezer-like Plato and a monstrously hung Narcissus, so there is no doubt that the comic artist has done his part as a cocksucking culture-distorter who has defiled the mainstream, with von Praunheim’s King of Comics being an interesting and equally incriminating introduction to his wayward world.

-Ty E

THE TWILIGHT OF THE GOLDS
THE TWILIGHT OF THE GOLDS

Ross Kagan Marks (1996)

I was flipping through the television and came upon a rather “controversial” film entitled The Twilight of the Golds. The protagonist is played by an extra effeminate Brendan Fraser. The Twilight of the Golds follows a nice reform Jewish family as they come to terms with their gay artistic son David (played by Fraser). David is a Jewish fellow that has an athletic Aryan boyfriend and is anticipating the production of his own rendition of a play by Nazi inspiration Richard Wagner. David makes sure to acknowledge that Mr. Wagner was said to have Jewish blood and the family agrees that “Jewish anti-Semites are the worst.” I recall Larry David also defending the artistry of Richard Wagner against a Zionist extremist in a splendid episode of Curb Your Enthusiasm. The tragedy that Gold family faces is that David’s sister may give birth to a gay child. David’s sister has a doctor husband who has been doing controversial genetic testing. He cautiously tests his pregnant wife and finds out that the child has a good chance of being a homosexual. The conflicted doctor also has problems with his own family as he was brought up an orthodox Jew. The doctor’s father is outraged by his sons “experiments” alluding to “you know what.” Maybe the orthodox father was thinking about the evil Nazi experimenter of Jewish blood Hans Eppinger. David almost has a nervous breakdown when he finds out that his sister may abort her gay son. He has yet to be accepted by his liberal Jewish family and this potential abortion is the last straw. David bitches out all his family members and cuts off contact with them bitterly. The Twilight of the Golds brings up questions about humans playing god and accepting gay relatives. How gay. The Twilight of the Golds is a nice little propaganda film targeted at the sentimental “cultured” crowd. It has all the proper ingredients for those good doer types to confirm that they are making the right choice. Brendan Fraser’s gay artsy look is similar to his outfit in Encino Man. Obnoxious alpha lesbo Rosie O’Donnell also has a supporting role as a woman that can’t have children (surprise?). The Twilight of the Golds is a “progressive” film for today’s “progressive” people.

-Ty E

DEATH RACERS

Roy Knyrim (2008) If you have any knowledge of The Asylum's stature in the film industry, you can already call this a dud from miles away. For the people who are new to the term "The Asylum", what they are is a California based company that specializes in low-budget horror. Their defining characteristic is that every film sans a couple are "rip-offs" of a current Blockbuster in theaters. This time, they took Death Race and added Insane Clown Posse to the mix. The plot is never important with these films; it's like multiple choice. Take a shattered government which consists of 4 people in suits in a back room with a flag in the background. This is our government and it is in danger. Some greasy guy is manufacturing Sarin gas to release into a water supply so they form a Battle Royale II stolen scheme to have people race to kill the man known as Reaper. There are also explosive devices lined in the base of the head. Hmmmm....The headliner of this film and all around product placement is the music and fan base of horrorcore rappers Insane Clown Posse. They inject their horribly shoddy discography into the film at every scene so there isn't a moment that goes by when you don't hear clowns rapping in the background about Juggalo's and Shangri-La. Just goes to show that some things refuse to change. I could go on about my opinions on ICP but this is a review on the film, not the nature of the band. The racers are an obnoxious bunch. Mexican perverts (Is there any other kind?), bimbo dykes, a military duo, and the killer clowns. It is their mission to stop Reaper and save the world. Somehow, they've incorporated some point system for killing prisoners that wander the grounds. The film's plot holes run rampant as nothing is explained. Death Racers is a mess. There is violence present but has no substance. It is immature, shoddy, and thinks that putting stars (to some) in a film will boost ratings and fans. This may be true, but lets hope fans of ICP and film alike can see this film for the cesspool it is. If you don't like ICP, avoid this film like the plague.

-mAQ

ASYLUM
ASYLUM

Roy Ward Baker (1972)

So begins my initiation rite into the oeuvre of Amicus Productions, the company that rivals Hammer Film in style but not composition. I had long seen the unforgettable poster art of Asylum and had the picturesque image of a packaged head immersed in my memory banks. Up until today, I had the film trapped in a queue hell of sorts, that seems to shuffle priority often. After viewing a very similar film but a few months ago, Tales that Witness Madness, and being floored by several of the shorts, I decided to apprehend Asylum with the very same unwillingness I had shown its unrelated companion. Upon revelation of the film's basic guideline, I immediately sunk into what felt like a thematic whirlpool towards Svankmajer's excellent sanitarium picture, Lunacy. The construct of the "framing story" is quite simple and meandering to the tales that await our ensemble cast. The story follows such; a young psychiatrist enters a secluded sanitarium with hopes of a prospering job only to find a sinister game in which begs him to meet & greet four patients and determine which used to be the authoritarian figure before an uprising at the funny farm.

The first short up for trial is Frozen Fear. By proxy, Frozen Fear is the casual "dead lover comes back" tale that you've seen in near every portmanteau film of any age. In this tiny picture, a husky senior prepares to hack his gorgeous free-spirited wife into pieces, only after learning of her boding, yet still innocent, shamanism. After the grisly deed is done, Walter suddenly is attacked by the tidily disposed of heiress while the surviving loony takes the fall after a terrifying instance of animated appendages damages her psyche and ironically, her face as well. After all, Bonnie was the woman Walter was leaving Ruth for, who in actuality, seemed like an oppressive, yet, endearing power-hungry lass who possessed unearthly beauty, as well as vocal cords. I suppose my entrapment within the miserable chafe experienced by most, if not all, anthology films could be summed up to the neatly packaged brown paper parcel figures containing once erotic flesh. The delicate task of wrapping Ruth's pretty little head with butcher knots elevates this eroded piece of introductory horror into an experience invigorating though easily forgettable, especially in comparison with the later tales. But as it stands, I take great pride in the flaccid two-dimensional character Walter as he and I both share a similar taste in women and brandy.

The second tale finds Peter Cushing in his stoic skeletal prime requesting an unusual suit from an impoverished tailor. Given very specific instructions, Bruno is supplied with effervescent material in which to craft a suit, but only past the stroke of midnight is he to work. The stipulations apply direct stress to Bruno's marriage that is suffering in part to the wife's loneliness. Her needy nature coincides to the fate of one Mr. Bruno and lands him incarcerated within a mental institution for the incurably insane. Our lead character, Dr. Martin, so humbly believes in psychotherapy and rationalization to all events deemed otherworldly by diseased minds. It's his job to filter truth from fiction and fact from fantasy and this is the adhesive coating to all these stories within. After Bruno explains his story to the noticeably bewildered Dr. Martin, Bruno begs the good doctor to find "Otto". One would think that spotting a large mannequin wearing an illuminated suit wouldn't be too difficult a task, not even in part to his peeling facial features. The Weird Tailor is unlike most tales that I've seen in these portmanteau films as it beckons originality. Author Robert Bloch's stories of horror translate well from the realms of reality to ideals slightly more grounded in grim parables of monsters and murder.

Afterwards, our next story is revealed in the shape of a young, nubile Charlotte Rampling plays Barbara, a neurotic heiress who, upon release from an asylum, is imprisoned within her own house by her loving brother and a portly nurse. This leads her to reuniting with a friend named Lucy, who is brought upon by the pills that Barbara consumes hungrily as if they were bits of hard candy. Lucy Comes to Stay is perhaps the worst of the Asylum tales but continues to show effort placing it into the genre of murder mystery. For the sheer femininity of it all, Lucy Comes to Stay is the typical bad-girl RX fantasy you witness in such films as Girl, Interrupted in which pseudo-lesbian relationships clash with the stupidity of it all. The vanity of Barbara's character is revealed after the story is told as she smiles to Lucy in the mirror, the misguided hormones winding into a tornado of self-assessment and utter satiation. The final short film takes place at the current coordinates of Dr. Martin, within his own reality as well, for his unbelieving eyes to witness. Still not quite sure who Dr. Starr is, Martin meets the final patient, Dr. Byron, and his collection of miniature automatons built with supposed organic viscera and the capacity to will one's mind within the tiny bodies.

This is the default "tiny terror" story that winds up in most films of this caliber but you won't find a complaint out of me. These films of sinister puppetry tickle my fancy in ways that undercooked psychopath dramas will never have the pleasure of doing. As several Amicus horror pictures seem to embrace, Asylum is but one of the strange style of "Choose your own adventure" novels that Amicus breeds, according to the synopsis of The Beast Must Die. The tales within Asylum are refreshing and morbid, embracing modern gothic with varying aesthetics. The Weird Tailor being the most accomplished in art direction as the dark cobblestone streets are rivaled by a suit that emits an eerie glow. Asylum is an excellent entry in horror anthology but I feel more partial to Tales that Witness Madness as the framing story was genuinely surprising and ultimately featured more variety of horrific tales. It's a shame that Max Rosenberg, co-president of Amicus Productions, didn't favor film as much as the directors he employed showed. In an interview collected in a featurette called Inside the Fear

ASYLUM

Factory, Max Rosenberg admits having "no emotional investment in this kind of filmmaking and I did it to make money." Which he did, following the release of Asylum, with Tales from the Crypt.

-mAQ

PIG

Rozz Williams (1998)

Pig, co-created by Rozz Williams (singer/founder of goth band Christian Death) and Dutchman Nico B. is a diamond in the rough of somewhat contemporary short films. This is especially true in regards to films of a similar nature (if there is anything similar). Shot on gritty and scratched black and white film, Pig looks like its film was found in the abandoned house it was filmed in. It captures a world that is buried at the bottom of a dark soul's unconscious. Rozz Williams's set design is amazing as expected. Collages of the apocalypse surround rooms and they are even read from a truly unholy book. Rozz's art is easily identifiable as it is piercingly full of taboos. Pig is also easily the most lively of Rozz's art (for more of his art checkout the book "Art of Rozz Williams: From Christian Death to Death") as it is his only film. I think that Rozz Williams and Nico B. may owe a small debt to auteurs of the past. Luis Buñuel (Un Chien Andalou), Jean Cocteau (Blood of a Poet), Maya Deren (Meshes of the Afternoon), and Kenneth Anger (Fireworks) to name a few. Pig is easily able to hold its own with these masterpieces. I have yet to see any other recent short films worthy of this recognition (unless you count the first 15 minutes of Elias Merhige's Begotten). Pig in its entirety is one bad (or good) surrealistic dream. Body mutilation, head bandaged sign language, and atmospheric car rides stick in your mind long after the film is over. This is a world I would enjoy visiting if I had the opportunity and nerve to do so. I am sure Rozz Williams did as he committed suicide (April Fool's 1998) shortly after Pig's completion. The musical score of Pig is similar to that of Rozz Williams's music projects (Christian Death, Shadow Project, etc). Ambient sounds and noise perfectly compliment the film's nihilistic and detached tone. Obviously something you would expect of Rozz Williams. The score becomes especially intense in a scene that continuously spins around in circles in a room in the abandoned house. Hitler also makes a couple auditory appearances. Pig is a film that is recommended reviewing for everyday of the week. When I watch it I can't help to think what Rozz Williams could have created cinema wise in years to come. Rozz admittedly used Pig as a way to exorcise and transfer his inner demons. In real life I don't think he accomplished this. (his suicide is an indicator of that) Instead he created a transgressive masterpiece.

-Ty E

ROTE SONNE
ROTE SONNE

Rudolf Thome (1970)

Undoubtedly, one of the best ways to get a penetrating and somewhat metapolitical understanding of the drug-addled minds, degenerate souls, and dispiriting spirits of the overzealous zeitgeist that sired counter-culture movements, second-wave feminism, would-be-hip hippie bastards, cultural Marxism, kosher cosmopolitanism, and virtually every other anti-Occidental trend that hit Europe and North America during the late-1960s is by viewing ostensibly 'revolutionary' cinematic works from this thankfully bygone era, which, when feeling rather masochistic, I do from time to time. Recently, I decided to watch the West German flick Rote Sonne (1969) aka Red Sun after learning it was a feminist science fiction film that was promoted with the outwardly titillating tagline: "Frei, wild, cool und tödlich" (free, wild, cool and deadly). Directed by Southern kraut auteur Rudolf Thome (Supergirl – Das Mädchen von den Sternen, Tarot) – a filmmaker who has been described as "the German Eric Rohmer" and who, like his cinematic compatriots Peter Nestler, Eckhart Schmidt, Max Zihlmann, and Klaus Lemke, belonged to the so-called "New Munich Group"; a collective of closely related "cinephiles" and documentarians who were unassociated with and ultimately eclipsed by filmmakers of the New German Cinema – Rote Sonne is a genre conscious yet audaciously antagonistic celluloid work that is more of dystopian anti-sci-fi flick that, whether intentional or not on the director's part (most people believe the work to be a genuine 'feminist film'), makes for a fabulous farce of feminism as opposed to a special-effects-driven celluloid manifesto that argues for so-called gender equality that one would expect from such a seemingly wretched work. Described by internationally renowned German auteur Wim Wenders (Paris, Texas, Wings of Desire) in the January 1970 issue of Filmkritik in the following manner, "Red Sun is one of the rarest kind among European cinema - one that doesn't imitate American cinema. In the Red Sun the actors always talk like they wouldn't need to bother about the story of the movie. They are just boldly present in the scene, talking and acting as if they do not yet know what's next....," Thome did indeed assemble the sort of seemingly plodding and virtually plot-less yet inconspicuously clever film that makes popular American New Wave counter-culture works like Easy Rider (1969) and Bound for Glory (1976) seem like pastiche pieces of prosaic philistinism in its scathing (and apparently accidental) assault on the wild world of women's liberation. Centering around a beatnik bastard who looks like an inbred version of Mick Jagger who moves into a hormone-driven house occupied by a cult of murderously wanton women who kill any man that they date for longer than five days so as to prevent falling in love with them, Rote Sonne takes feminist stereotypes to such extremes that one could never take such a loony liberation philosophy serious again after watching the film, not that any sane or sensible person would in the first place. Starring counter-culture sex symbol, German left-wing movement icon, and international super groupie Uschi Obermaier (born Chrissi Malberg) – a real-life wanton woman who lived in the kraut hippie commune Kommune 1 (K1) and carried many high-profile romances with rock ‘n’ roll stars, including Keith Richard, Mick Jagger, and Jimi Hendrix – Rote Sonne is nothing short of being bohemian Bavarian cult cinema degeneracy in its most killer and kaleidoscopic form.

Thomas (played by Marquard Böhm of Klick’s Deadlock (1970) and Fassbinder’s Beware of the Holy Whore (1971)) is a beatnik bum who has abandoned his 3-year-old child and wife and has just landed in Munich from Hamburg and he is already trying to swindle a taxi-driver out of cash, instead of paying him a tip. Luckily, Thomas – a man who states about himself that, “Tactics were never my strong point, but my broken charm is irresistible” – runs into his ex-girlfriend Peggy (Uschi Obermaier) at a bar and she invites him to squat at her home, which is full of very literal ‘femme fatales’ who seem like a bunch of lollipop and lily-licking lipstick lesbians, but they are something much more sinister as misandry-championing succubi who suck and fuck men, but for no more than five days. As Thomas finds out while interrogating a small blonde babe named Isolde (Gaby Go), Peggy killed her unfaithful boyfriend 18 months ago by pushing him off a balcony and telling the police that he committed suicide and ever since, she made the girls make a pact that they would kill any boyfriend they have after five days so as to prevent them from falling in love with a potentially fleeting philanderer. Of course, like any megalomaniacal cult leader, Peggy does not follow her own dogma, thus her Teutonic boy toy Thomas manages to live past five days, but being a wonderfully wacked out wench, the fatalistic female Führer is bound to crack at some point. The more men these murderous madams kill, the more fanatical their cult of the crazy cunt becomes as they begin building and testing bombs and even assassinate fellow female members who they believe are involved with treachery. Needless to say, these beautiful brunette and blonde beastesses give the brownshirts a run for the money because although National Socialism and the Männerbünde might be totally tot in Deutschland, fierce Feminazis have rightfully taken their place. With totally emasculated males who make absurd statements like “We got to break with tradition. That’s today’s task,” and “Even if we have to change the weather to change society, then we’ll do it,” women have to naturally step up the plate, but, unfortunately, as the gorgeous gun-toting gals of Rote Sonne ultimately find out, no matter how many times one reads old Hebraic hags and Semitic slags of the Levite-left like Emma Goldman and Rosa Luxemburg, there is no cure for homicidal female hysteria, especially of the (unconsciously) shabbos goy, gynocentric sort.

Like her character in Rote Sonne, Uschi Obermaier apparently made some absurd demands in her contract for the film, including having her then-boyfriend and commundard Rainer Langhans (a “mover and shaker” of the Kommune 1 commune) on set at all times, working no longer than 4-day work weeks, and weekly paid flights from Munich to Berlin for the leftist love birds. As Obermaier would later admit, she had no actual interest in politics and her sole reason for living at Kommune 1 was to be with Langhans, a rather repugnant fellow who looked like the kraut version of John Lennon (Obermaier and Langhans were even described as the “German version” of John Lennon and Yoko Ono by the press), except even more gawky and gaunt. Interestingly enough, both Obermaier and Langhans would later star in the kraut counter-culture science fiction work Haytabo (1971) co-directed (with Peter Moland) by Ulli Lommel of all people and also starring Eddie Constantine and Rainer Werner Fassbinder, thus demonstrating the popularity of Rote Sonne at that time as an instant cult classic. Although still making films today, director Rudolf Thome would never again make another celebrated cinematic work that was as big of a hit as Rote Sonne, thereupon proving that one can never predict cultural trends, nor when they will degenerate into forgotten aesthetic debris. While few know of or talk about Rote Sonne today, the film does hold up to some degree as a quasi-ancient celluloid artifact from a thankfully dead, but still influential era when girls wanted to be boys and boys wanted to be girls and spoiled bourgeois white people wanted to live their lives in the vein of mythical ‘noble savages.’ Personally, I think feminists would be contributing to the great cause of mankind if they assassinated beatnik beta-boys, but as Rote Sonne has proved, they tend to go wild for those weasley wanton wimps.

ROTE SONNE

-Ty E

SUPERGIRL - DAS MÄDCHEN VON DEN STERNEN

Rudolf Thome (1971)

When I hear a film described as an “undercooked indie hybrid” of Jean-Luc Godard’s Le Mépris (1963) aka Contempt and Jonathan Glazer’s Under the Skin (2013), I have to admit it sounds more cinematically appetizing than I would like to admit. Indeed, that is how a certain German cinephile described the hopelessly offbeat West German cult flick Supergirl - Das Mädchen von den Sternen (1971) which, despite being advertised as a sci-fi flick upon its initial release over four decades ago and being categorized on imdb.com as a ‘comedy,’ is really a sort of jet-set (anti)romance and post-counterculture ‘cuckold fantasy’ as directed by a dubious dude who seems to get off to seeing ‘mysterious’ underfed women destroying men and turning them into groveling and dejected lovelorn losers of the alcohol-addled sort. Indeed, described as a “Regisseur der Frauen” aka “Director of Women” in his native land of Deutschland, Rudolf Thome (Detektive, Berlin Chamissoplatz) is probably best known for his dystopian counterculture flick Rote Sonne (1970) aka Red Sun, which depicts a crazed cult of fierce feminist cunts who seduce men and then subsequently kill them for sport as if they have been lobotomized by deranged dyke and failed Warhol assassin Valerie Solanas’ infamous SCUM Manifesto. While I initially assumed that Red Sun had to be a sort of dry satire of women’s lib and the sexual revolution, apparently Thome’s tongue was not as firmly placed in his cheek as I had once assumed. Indeed, like most of Thome’s early work, Supergirl was penned by Max Zihlmann and is an obscenely outmoded too-cool-for-school film about too-cool-for-school dudes who for fall prey to a much cooler chick that is literally and figuratively out of this world (or something). Like many of the filmmakers associated with the largely forgotten New Munich Group (aka ‘Neue Münchner Gruppe’) that was later eclipsed by New German Cinema as led by Rainer Werner Fassbinder (who was, somewhat ironically, inspired by NMG filmmakers like Thome and Klaus Lemke as his early cinephile works like Love Is Colder Than Death and The American Soldier demonstrate), Thome was heavily inspired by Godard and his tiresome tendency to fiddle with beaten-to-death old school Hollywood genre conventions, especially relating to film noir. Unfortunately, Thome took this tendency one or two steps further than Godard to the point where there was nothing left except a compulsively quirky and sometimes ‘pretty’ cross-genre shell of a film that is arguably best exemplified by Supergirl. Despite the film’s title, the work has virtually nothing to do with comic book superheroine of the same name aside the fact that the eponymous chick is from another planet and enjoys reading comic books. A work that transcends Godard’s Alphaville (1965) in terms of its asinine ‘anti-sci-fi’ angle (notably, the film even features a cameo appearance by Eddie ‘Lemmy Caution’ Constantine himself), Supergirl is a rather ridiculous exercise in would-be-style, proto-hipster wit(lessness), postmodern referencing, and pathetic retrograde jet-set degeneracy. For fans of seemingly autistic ass-less and tit-less girls that resemble scrawny preteen boys, heterosexual men that act and look more effeminate than the most flagrantly flaming of queers, and/or a cuisine of clichés about movie clichés, Thome's quirk-ridden wonder film guarantees to offers the worst (or 'best,' depending who you are and what kind of dames you find delectable) of early-1970s kraut post-counterculture cult cinema.

SUPERGIRL - DAS MÄDCHEN VON DEN STERNEN

As some great generic krautrock blazes in the background (created by Swiss composer Patrick Moraz, who also composed music for Swiss auteur Alain Tanner), a stoic and seemingly possessed young girl (Iris Berben, who previously starred in Thome's Detektive and would go on to have a long acting career) in a strikingly silly yellow jumpsuit emerges from a weed-covered field on the outskirts of Munich as if she is on some sort of mission to murder a bunch of men, or buy an entire new wardrobe. When the mysterious woman reaches a highway, she immediately flags down an exceedingly effete and somewhat overweight 33-year-old playboy in a sports car named Charly Seibert (Nikolaus Dutsch, who looked much more masculine as fascist cop in Uwe Brandner's I Love You, I Kill You (1971)), who immediately asks the strange young lady regarding her jumpsuit, "Are you not wearing anything under that?" but she does not reply as she rarely talks, especially when asked specific questions about her life. When chubby Charly brings the curious chick back to his ostensibly hip pad, she immediately strips off her rather unflattering jumpsuit and crawls into a bed where she immediately falls asleep. While digging through the girl's jumpsuit, Charly finds a Bolivian passport indicating that her name is 'Francesca Farnese.' Charly is too much of a pussy to try to fuck Francesca but he does buy her like ten expensive wardrobes while Fassbinder watches from outside and smokes a cigarette in arguably the most 'subtle' cameo role in film history and then he takes her to the opulent home of his much more famous and slightly more attractive writer friend Evers (West German counterculture icon Marquard 'German Belmondo' Böhm of Thome's Red Sun and Roland Klick's Deadlock (1970)), who is a depressed dipsomaniac that "loves mysterious women" and is terribly tired of his blonde bombshell superstar wife Elsa Morandi (played by the director's then-wife, writer/director/producer Karin Thome, who was previously married to underrated auteur Uwe Brandner). Evers is a would-be-romantic of sorts who writes stuff like "He took her in his arms and said, 'I tried to hate you'" and his latest 1,200-page tome Cynthia is such a big hit that a bigwig Hollywood producer named Polonsky (American actor Jess Hahn in a role that is more likely in tribute to black-listed kosher commie director Abraham Polonsky of Romance of a Horsethief (1971) starring Yul Brynner and Jane Birkin than Roman Polanski) that thinks the film adaptation "will be the biggest hit since DOCTOR ZHIVAGO."

While Evers has no interest in selling his precious book rights to monetary-obsessed Polonsky—a proudly unscrupulous mensch of the cigar-sucking sort that is the complete opposite of his real-life Judeo-bolshevik namesake as a sort of Anglo-American 'cowboy producer' who lives to sell-out and cash-in—Francesca tries her damndest to change his mind. Although not revealed until later on in the film, Francesca was apparently “born on the third planet of the Alpha Centauri system” and she was sent to earth to stop a rival political party from her home planet from attacking and colonizing earth. The daughter of the president of her planet, Francesca was part of an important expedition that was sent to earth to warn earthlings of an impending attack from the rival political party, but instead of landing in Washington D.C. to warn the President of the United States as intended, her spaceship crash-landed in West Germany and she was the only survivor. Through Evers' connection to Polonsky—a relatively powerful man with many political connections who is good friends with a U.S senator—Francesca hopes to be able to warn the U.S. President before things are too late. Unfortunately for her, Francesca is treated like a cute and delicate little social-climbing slut by everyone she meets, especially Polonsky, who wants to make her his new Warholian 'superstar,' hence the title of the film. Meanwhile, Evers just wants to get into Francesca's out-of-this-world underwear, but she seems more interested in reading Marvel comics than being dined, wined, and defiled by a famous writer with a self-destructive fetish for “mysterious women.” As a result of Francesca's influence, Evers eventually agrees to sell his book rights to Polonsky, so the two (non)lovers both fly to Spain to meet with the producer. Unfortunately, Francesca becomes increasingly paranoid upon arriving in Spain as she suspects a black Cadillac is following her, but as Polonsky's driver tells her in what is easily the most rather retarded movie cliché of the entire film: “You watch too many movies.”

While Polonsky says “Who's the girl? Hire her immediately!” upon being introduced to Francesca, the producer soon decides to use “Gestapo methods” to find out more about the personal background of the intriguing young lady and soon learns that her Bolivian passport is a fake and that there is no record that she even exists, as she has no social security number or any other sort of official records to her name. When Polonsky introduces Francesca to his U.S. Senator friend at her urging, the Supergirl makes a major ass of herself by telling him that she is an extraterrestrial from another planet that has come to warn him about an impending attack against earth. Meanwhile, at the same party, drunken Evers slaps his wife Elsa in front of a large number of people and is soon manhandled for daring to hit a 'lady.' After the party, Evers shoots and kills a super swarthy and seemingly anorexic man with long black-hair that has been following Francesca around Germany and Spain, though he does it not to protect her but because he is jealous of the fellow and suspects it might be her husband. After the senseless killing, Francesca reveals to Evers her true identity as a literal 'Supergirl' from outerspace, as well as the fact that the man he has killed was one of her extraterrestrial comrades who has been following her to warn her about their enemies. After Francesca tells Evers her long and seemingly preposterous story about the Alpha Centauri revolution and then pleads with him to take her to Moscow, the thoroughly inebriated writer responds predictably by stating, "You read too many comics."

SUPERGIRL - DAS MÄDCHEN VON DEN STERNEN

When Francesca and Evers go back to Munich after their strange aborted scenic yet sexless 'vacation' in Spain, they still fail to commence coitus, though the writer still has not given up. Meanwhile, the sinister black Cadillac continues to follow Francesca everywhere she goes. After another failed night of pathetically attempting to get into Francesca's panties that concludes with the extraterrestrial debutante falling asleep early and subsequently spastically tossing and turning as if suffering a seizure-inducing nightmare, Evers decides to go by his fellow playboy pal Charly's pad to get good and drunk while complaining about his impossible failed love affair with the Supergirl. While Charly tells Evers how everyone in their clique thinks that Francesca is completely insane due to her 'war of the worlds' story and that Polonsky no longer wants to cast her in his upcoming film, the Supergirl buys a dozen or so comics from a newspaper stand in Munich. Charly also attempts to convince Evers to reconcile with his wife Elsa, but he is not hearing it and states to his friend while the two are both stinking drunk: "I don't like you, Charley. I never liked you. You're a revolting pig. You're somewhat a regular human being." In an 'open ending' of the rather anti-climatic sort, Francesca voluntarily gets inside the black Cadillac that has been chasing her during the entire film, but not before trashing her comics, and assumedly disappears from planet earth forever. In the end, lovelorn drunkard Evers goes on the balcony of his lavish mansion and stares up into the sky as if to mourn the fact that he never got to bugger the seemingly autistic Supergirl.

With its oftentimes pathetically drunk too-cool-for-school effeminate male characters, seemingly braindead cipher-like sex-starved beauties, incessant 'off-beat' humor, slow-burning melancholy and even misanthropic tone, and exotic locations and partial Spanish setting, not to mention cameos from Fassbinder and Eddie Constantine, Supergirl largely feels like a bare bones bargain bin version of Beware of a Holy Whore (1971), albeit with a preposterous sci-fi angle and minus the meta-cinematic elements that made the 'anti-theater anti-film' so intriguing. Ironically, Thome attempted to get Fassbinder to produce his film, once writing in West German Filmmakers on Film: Visions and Voices (1988) edited by Eric Rentschler: "I was in a jam. Distressed, I sought out Fassbinder, who just had received the Federal Film Prize in Gold and 650,000 marks for his second feature film, KATZELMACHER. I asked everyone I knew. Finally Karin found a rich private source in Hamburg who was willing to lend us part of the money (125,000 marks). We went on to make SUPERGIRL with this money." Thome would also write regarding the public reaction to the film: "The production was a technical tour de force [...] The final version was accepted and I'm not exaggerating when I say that the TV editors were excited. The film was aired in March and I received numerous crank calls from people who threatened all kinds of things. They thought I was putting them on. They thought that I wasn't serious about the story of SUPERGIRL, this girl from another planet." Like the West German public of the early 1970s, I also had a very, very hard time taking the film seriously, but after reading Thome's own words, I am going to have to take his word for it and assume that he is a strange and emasculated dude that seems more aroused by the prospect of being led on by a mysterious girl that he cannot have than actually manning up and showing a lady a good time with his cock. Indeed, somehow it is hard for me to watch a film like Supergirl where a rich and famous playboy writer somehow cannot manage to get the girl he wants in bed without thinking the director is some sort of majorly masochistic cuckold. After Supergirl, Thome began working on a film entitled Rio Guaniamo about "two friends who take off for Venezuela one day to hunt in the jungle for diamonds" that he absurdly anticipated would be produced by Columbia Pictures, but the Hollywood studio predictably blew him off and the auteur would later complain regarding the fact that his Bavarian comrade Werner Herzog actually managed to finish his own exotic South American epic: "That was right at the time when Herzog was making AGUIRRE and Antonioni was working on a film about the half-overgrown Amazon city, Manaus, which around 1900 had had one of the largest opera houses in the world. Unfortunately only Werner finished his film. I never forgave him for not showing the jungle as I imagined life in the jungle." Of course, it is easy to see after watching Supergirl why Herzog and Fassbinder went on to do great things and create great cinematic masterpieces while Thome soon fell into obscurity and never again achieved the fleeting popularity and success he did with Red Sun. Indeed, luckily films featuring German guys wearing colorful queer scarfs and purple shirts soon fell out of fashion.

-Ty E

LOOKING FOR EILEEN
LOOKING FOR EILEEN

Rudolf van den Berg* (1987)

Quite notably, the great Vienna-born Austrian-British philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, who was himself $\frac{3}{4}$ Jewish and described his mind as being “100% Hebraic,” once wrote: “In western civilization the Jew is always measured on scales which do not fit him [...] And by taking the words of our language as the only possible standards we constantly fail to do them justice. So at one time they are overestimated, at another underestimated.” Naturally, I agree with Wittgenstein, especially when it comes to art and cinema, and I would certainly argue that a German-Jewish or British-Jewish filmmaker tends to have more in common with a Jewish Hollywood filmmaker than a fellow German filmmaker or British filmmaker of the wholly European-blooded sort. Indeed, I have watched tons of different films from around the world from different time periods and zeitgeists and I have noticed that it is much easier and appropriate to compare Jewish filmmakers to other Jewish filmmakers from different nations than to compare them to the gentiles of their own respective host nations, especially in Europe, for a number of reasons but mainly in that their works tend to lack a certain organic poetry and rawness and have a certain conspicuously contrived, calculated, cosmopolitan, and highly conscious essence about them that is especially apparent in Hebraic Hollywood where ‘genre cinema’ and various forms of comedy (e.g. parody, satire) does not reign for no reason as it reflects the concreteness of the Judaic mind. As Wittgenstein also once wrote in regard to the Jews: “What Renan calls the ‘bon sens précoce’ of the semitic races (an idea which had occurred to me too a long time ago) is their unpoetic mentality, which heads straight for what is concrete.” Indeed, when kosher commie cultural theorist Theodor Adorno once wrote in an absurdly arrogant fashion, “To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric,” what he really meant is ‘I am going to use the holocaust as an excuse as to why you evil Aryan goyim have no right to express the most beautiful and romantic aspects of their innate racial essence because I am jealous that we Jews suck at writing poetry.’ Anyway, I have recently been on a Dutch cinema kick and in the process of discovering various notable auteur filmmakers in the Netherlands, I naturally encountered Jewish auteur Rudolf van den Berg (De Johnsons aka The Johnsons, Süskind), who is a perfect example of an ostensibly ‘European’ filmmaker who might as well be working in Hollywood as all of his works reflect a deep deracination from the culture and people they depict. Van den Berg’s innate lack of Dutchness is most apparent in what is arguably his greatest and most well known work, De Avonden (1989) aka Evenings—an adaptation of Gerard Reve’s 1947 novel of the same name—as it is based on one of the most important and innately Dutch works of the post-WWII era, yet it feels like it was directed by a well trained Hollywood technician with no intrinsic understanding of Dutch culture or people. Even more so than Evenings, van Den Berg's second feature Zoeken naar Eileen (1987) aka Looking for Eileen—a work based on the 1981 novel of the same name written by second generation holocaust survivor Leon de Winter (whose work La Place de la Bastille van den Berg previously adapted as his first feature Bastille (1984)—feels like a contrived Hollywood production that just happened to be shot in the Netherlands and not a work that was directed by a man who grew up in the same country as Adriaan Ditvoorst, Jos Stelling, Theo van Gogh, and Alex van Warmerdam. Indeed, in its Judaic obsession with the all-beauteous exotic shiksa, Looking for Eileen is like the American Pie of romance-thrillers, albeit minus the retarded raunchy humor and with a slight bit of class.

On his personal website, auteur van den Berg wrote regarding Looking for Eileen, “A strong romantic story, audiences still love it to this very day. Even though, at the time, I had the feeling I was a sell-out, because it missed the engagement and underlying existential ideas of my previous work.” If van den Berg means by “sell-out” a work that seems like it was made more with an American than Dutch audience in mind, he is certainly right as it is an unfavorably formulaic and easy-to-follow flick where about half of the dialogue is in English and one of the main stars is a hot mainstream actress who bares some skin. A sort of cross-genre romance-crime-thriller-melodrama featuring Lysette Anthony at her physical peak flashing some boobs and beaver and rather talented Dutch actor Thom Hoffman (Luger, De Witte Waan aka White Madness) in one of his most hopelessly ordinary yet at the same time strangely Jew-y roles, van den Berg's work has a strange character about it in that it feels like what would happen if a Hollywood producer got a hold of a European arthouse production and did his damndest to make sure that it would be palatable to the most art-antagonistic of proud American philistines. Indeed, Looking for Eileen certainly follows the Hebraic Hollywood tradition of featuring a stunningly beautiful chick being in hopelessly love with a less than handsome dork who makes up for his lack of sex appeal and testosterone with his shallow charm, emasculating sensitivity, and slightly above average intellect. Unfortunately for the less than handsome dork, he loses his stunningly beautiful wife and, in turn, his mind, after she unexpectedly dies in a car wreck on the way to the airport to travel to a mere book auction in London, thereupon causing the protagonist to realize the strange and cruel nature of fate. In fact, protagonist Philip de Wit (Thom Hoffman) is so distraught after the untimely death of his wife Marian (Lysette Anthony) that he locks himself in his bathroom and attempts suicide by swallowing an entire bottle full of pills, but his father and father-in-law break into his home after he fails to answer the door and save him just before he croaks by forcing him to vomit up the surely fatal cocktail of prescription drugs. Of course, there is a Hitchcockian twist to Looking for Eileen in that a year after the widowed protagonist's wife dies, his dead wifey Marian's Irish Catholic dop-pelgänger randomly shows up in his life while looking for a copy of Tristan und Isolde at the English-language bookstore that both he and his belated beloved used to run together. Unfortunately for pansy Philip, the Irish chick not only has a bastard baby but is also married to a stereotypically violent and stupid red-faced mick philistine bastard that is connected to the IRA, among other things. In other words, emotionally perturbed protagonist Philip is so irrationally desperate to get his deceased lover back that, despite being a candy ass bibliophile who is so exceedingly effete that grade school children pick on him (during the same moment his wife dies in a car wreck, three little kids led by a turd-like Turk boy push him into a pond), he manages to develop the gall and testicular fortitude to enter the Dutch criminal underworld where he encounters violent junkie bums, barbaric gangsters, fat low-grade hookers, scheming fags, and related subhuman rabble that live off the grid.

LOOKING FOR EILEEN

As one would surely expect from such a Semitic cinematic work where everything is so deliberately quirky and out of tune with the hopelessly banal Aryan world, Philip's sole friend is curiously a goofy negro with an Afro-mullet named Geoffrey (Kenneth Herdigein) who does the bitch work at the protagonist's bookstore business. Geoffrey is certainly no scholar, but he provides much needed support for Philip when he has one of his many wussy bourgeois white-boy breakdowns. When his dead wife's mick doppelgänger, Eileen (also played by Lysette Anthony), decides to leave abruptly upon first entering his life after randomly walking into the protagonist's bookstore, it is jigaboo Geoffrey that is the one who convinces the fairly passive protagonist to chase her down. Ultimately, Philip follows Eileen to an abandoned building full of junky hobos where he transforms into a valiant white knight and saves her while one of the dope sick vagrants is trying to rob her. While bravely Philip acts as her savior, Eileen repays him by acting like somewhat of a bitch, as she lacks the cultivation of the protagonist's deceased wife but he does not mind too much as he is a lovelorn loser who thinks the strange Irish peasant girl with a bastard baby can somehow fill the large void that Marian's tragic death left. For their first date, Philip takes Eileen to an art museum to show her the 1923 painting "Nude Bending Down" by French post-Impressionist painter Pierre Bonnard featuring a woman whose face is obscured because her head is turned sideways and who is wearing nothing but a pair of high-heels wiping her leg. Although annoyed by the fact that the woman is wearing shoes despite being completely naked otherwise, Eileen proclaims to like the painting and later in the film she will come to be a real-life personification of the woman in Bonnard's piece. Rather conveniently, Philip first became aware of the painting shortly before his wife kicked the bucket, so he sort of sees Eileen's relatively positive response to the piece of art as a sign of fate.

Of course, Eileen eventually vanishes and Philip immediately panics, but he manages to find her whereabouts at a seedy hotel, but she is unfortunately already gone when he gets there. While at the hotel, one of the inhabitants gives Philip a letter that was sent to Eileen that was written by a certain 'Tristan' to a certain 'Isolde.' When Philip later goes back to his home-cum-bookstore, he is given the shock of a lifetime after being less than warmly greeted by Eileen's estranged husband Marc Nolan (Gary Whelan), who pulls a gun on the protagonist and ultimately personifies the 'tragic hero' (or what he calls "King Sucker, King Cuckold") of Tristan und Isolde. Marc is a boorish and belligerent Irish Catholic bastard with IRA connections who forces Philip to drive him to Amsterdam so that he might find his wife Eileen and baby daughter. As Philip soon learns, Eileen ran off to the Netherlands with her secret young druggy lover Kevin Fletcher (Ronald Tholen), who is the 'Tristan' that wrote the letter. While Marc and Philip initially reluctantly work as a team to find Eileen in an Amsterdam ghetto, the latter eventually breaks away and manages to track down his would-be-ladylove at a whorehouse called 'Hotel Wong' where he even goes so far as to smack around an Irish prostitute in the hope of finding pertinent information regarding his dream-lover's whereabouts. As it turns out Eileen's real name is 'Susan Callagher' and she is actually at the whorehouse. Ultimately, Philip saves Eileen from Marc when the latter shows up and demands the baby, but she is later falsely charged with the murder of her lover Kevin Fletcher, whose bloody corpse the protagonist later finds lying in a bathtub.

Flash forward two years later and at first it seems as if Philip and 'Eileen' have multiple children with one another and are living in a luxurious castle in Jouvemont, Belgium. Of course, the reality is not quite as romantic, as Eileen merely works at the castle as a nanny and Philip just came by the estate by happenstance as he is now a successful architect who has come by to do some work. Naturally, when Philip sees Eileen, he becomes obsessed with her and has to meet with her again. Upon reuniting with Eileen, Philip learns that Kevin was actually the real father of Eileen's child and the only reason she married Mark is because he was 'Catholic' and could provide her and her child with protection. Indeed, apparently Kevin was a protestant whose parents had been assassinated by the IRA, so Eileen was afraid that their 'half-Catholic/half-Protestant' baby would be in danger, so she made unwitting moron Marc her cuckold husband by lying and telling him that she was pregnant with his baby. Eventually, Eileen got tired of Mark and his "beer belly and football mentality," so she decided to go looking for her true love/baby daddy Kevin in the Netherlands, but when she finally tracked him down, he had already been murdered. In the end, Philip shows a picture of his dead wife to Eileen and reveals that his initial obsession with her was due to her striking resemblance to his belated spouse. Of course, Eileen has a characteristically jealous female response and complains in a bitchy manner "I'm not her," to which the protagonist replies "I know. I figured that out" and adds, "Do you think it makes any difference the reason you feel attracted to someone?" While the two part ways and begin walking away after the little lady gets a tad bit bitchy, Eileen and Philip cannot contain their mutual attraction toward one another, so they both turn around, run towards one another, embrace, and passionately kiss, thus ushering in the beginning of their dubious romance.

LOOKING FOR EILEEN

Undoubtedly, Looking for Eileen is like an overly melodramatic soup-operish mix of Alfred Hitchcock's Vertigo (1958), George Sluizer's Spoorloos (1988) aka The Vanishing, and Theo van Gogh's Loos (1989), albeit it is nowhere as good as any of the other three films. Notably and not surprisingly, Sluizer, who was also Jewish (even though he once accused Ariel Sharon of shooting two Palestinian children in what the Israeli officials absurdly described as 'modern blood libel'), produced van den Berg's debut feature Bastille (1984). In fact, van den Berg would ultimately become a sort of 'poor man's Sluizer' as a filmmaker who began making increasingly Hollywoodized and less arthouse-oriented works that were shot in English, but he never did quite make it to his spiritual and racial home in Hollywood, though he did manage to direct Burt Reynolds and Julie Christie in the fairly unknown abject failure Snapshots (2002). Additionally, the director's Friedrich Dürrenmatt adaptation The Cold Light of Day (1996) was later remade by Sean Penn as The Pledge (2001) starring Jack Nicholson and Benicio Del Toro (though Ladislao Vajda's German-language adaptation It Happened in Broad Daylight (1958) aka Es geschah am hellichten Tag is better than both of the later two adaptations). Lately, van den Berg has devoted himself to working on almost exclusively Jewish-themed material, most notably Süskind (2012) about the controversial eponymous Dutch Jewish council who has been called both a Nazi collaborator and holocaust hero due to his stranger-than-fiction involvement in the deportation of Dutch Jews to concentration camps. On top of also planning a feature on famous 17th-century Sephardic Jewish philosopher Baruch Spinoza—a once-controversial figure who was expelled from the Jewish community due to his supposed heretical ideas—entitled Spinoza Con Brio, van den Berg also recently released the seemingly intriguing documentary Hamartía: More or Less Louis van Gaasteren (2014), which centers around the killing of a Jewish refugee during WWII by the filmmaker's Dutch gay mentor and filmmaker friend Louis van Gaasteren. While featuring no overtly Jewish content, Looking for Eileen is 100% the product of Judaic minds and could have just as easily been set in Brooklyn and starring Robert Downey Jr. and Winona Ryder. Indeed, were I to rate the film against a similarly themed work by a great European arthouse auteur like Rainer Werner Fassbinder, I would have to say the film is a soulless piece of celluloid superficiality that, in a characteristically Jewish fashion, puts pussy on a pedestal and depicts masculine men as brutes, but were I to compare it to Hollywood films of the same era, I would have to admit it is a rare genre-bending romance that appeals more to men than women and its not just because it shows Lysette Anthony's boobs and beaver. For those interested in seeing Looking for Eileen star Thom Hoffman in a more masculine and 'virile' role that completely contradicts his Dustin Hoffman-esque performance in van den Berg's film, checkout Aryan Kaganof's darkly and perversely poetic cult classic Shabondama Elegy (1999) aka Tokyo Elegy, which features the Dutch actor committing unsimulated sex acts on a gentle Jap chick with a shaved snatch. As for van den Berg and Hoffman at the height of their artistic collaboration with one another, checkout De Avonden (1989) aka Evenings, which is easily the single strangest Dutch film ever directed by a Hebraic filmmaker.

-Ty E

EVENINGS
EVENINGS

Rudolf van den Berg* (1989)

If the Netherlands has anything representing a sort of Dutch equivalent to J.D. Salinger's obnoxiously overrated novel The Catcher in the Rye (1951), it is probably De avonden (1947) aka The Evenings by Gerard Reve, which is so popular in its native land that it was ranked first among works created since 1900 in the Dutch homeland in a 2002 poll conducted by members of the Society for Dutch Literature. Written by a subversive sodomite of the almost pathologically anti-communist sort who was brought in to the atheistic Marxist faith by his parents but later converted to Roman Catholicism and who claimed to use homosexuality as merely a motif for his work which ultimately dealt with the theme of the inferiority of human love in comparison to 'divine love,' The Evenings is certainly a more intricate, mature, and multilayered work in comparison to Salinger's oftentimes intolerably whiny proto-hipster novel. In fact, the novel was deemed so bizarre due to its largely plotless and sometimes dreamlike structure that it was believed that it could never be adapted into a film, yet Dutch auteur Rudolf van den Berg (De Johnsons aka The Johnsons, Süskind) had the gall to take up the challenge, or as he later reflected regarding his decision to adapt the novel: "EVENINGS (DE AVONDEN) is the best known Dutch literary novel of all time, so turning it into a film was a great challenge. Everybody agreed it couldn't be done, so I ignored all advice, and told the story backwards compared to the book. I remember feeling that through each and every shot the story began to reveal to me something about myself until eventually, when the film was finished, I finally understood what the film was about." While van den Berg's 1989 film adaptation of the same name was criticized by certain film critics because they felt it was not a faithful adaptation, the film became somewhat of a cult hit in the Netherlands and managed to earn no less than two Golden Calves (the Dutch equivalent to the Oscars), including 'best film' and 'best actor,' thus demonstrating its importance in the context of Dutch cinema history.

The darkly comedic story of a hyper-neurotic 23-year-old college dropout turned office worker who is terrified of confronting the year 1948 as he is of embracing his latent homosexuality, Evenings is, not unlike the films of German auteur Volker Schlöndorff, a slightly dumbed down and stripped take on its source material that ultimately attempts to capture the spirit of Reve's work while paying biographical tribute to the writer himself (as reflected in the film's gay angle), but of course the director also hoped to add his own angle as reflected in an almost ghostly Jewish presence throughout the flick (while the film features no Jewish characters, a closed Jewish shop is featured throughout, as if to subtly symbolize the eradication of the fairly ancient and once thriving Dutch Jewish community during the Second World War). Indeed, not surprisingly considering van den Berg's Judaic background, the film takes a Freudian-cum-Kafkaesque approach to Reve's work as it wallows in strikingly surreal and oftentimes dark symbolic psycho-sexual imagery, especially of the Oedipal sort, including big breasts dripping with milk, and certainly does not really emphasize the Roman Catholic subtext like Paul Verhoeven's somewhat superior Gerard Reve adaptation De vierde man (1983) aka The Fourth Man, which also stars Thom Hoffman. Unquestionably, van den Berg's film owes a great deal of its peculiar potency to lead Hoffman who, as a man who starred in such great and eclectic films as Theo van Gogh's daringly iconoclastic debut feature Luger (1982), Adriaan Ditvoorst's Dutch magical realist magnum opus De Witte Waan (1984) aka White Madness, and Aryan Kaganof's darkly humorously pornographic cinematic poem Shabondama Elegy (1999) aka Tokyo Elegy, is arguably the greatest and certainly the most daring Dutch actor of his generation. Simultaneously depicting the literally and figuratively nightmarish neuroticism of a young crypto-cocksucker suffering from an acute case of oikophobia who must come to terms with his desire to suck cock despite living with horrifically humdrum parents with whom he takes great pains to relate, as well as portraying post-WWII Holland from the perspective of a Jew who seems to have mixed feelings regarding the Dutch role in the war, Evenings is ultimately a work that straddles an aesthetically schizophrenic line between the forlorn and farcical as well as the hyperrealist and absurd, thus making for an undeniably unforgettable, if not somewhat uneven, coming-of-age work that makes it seem like the Dutch psyche was a hidden casualty of the Second World War.

23-year-old college dropout turned office worker Frits van Etgers (Thom Hoffman) is going to have one hell of a struggle trying to deal with Christmas and the days after that leading up to New Year's Eve of 1947, which he seems to believe will conclude with some sort of apocalypse that seems to be more metaphysical than literal. Frits lives by the personal mantra, "Things are bad. Otherwise I'm fine," and he seems completely incapable of relating to anyone, especially his hopelessly banal and old-fashioned communist parents, who have no idea what to do with their seemingly perennially problematic prodigal son. With his father (Rijk de Gooyer) being a half-deaf hard ass who asks his son rather rude things like, "Don't you ever doubt your sanity?" and his mother (Viviane de Muynck) being an easily upset worrywart who likes calling her son 'mouse,' Frits is on the verge of insanity as a result of living with his parents and incessantly fantasizes about them dying in grisly ways. At the very beginning of the film, Frits suffers from a tormenting nightmare set 11 minutes before the New Year where he spots a fellow closeted homosexual named Wim (Jobst Schnibbe) outside from his upstairs window and subsequently runs to his parents to tell them something that he just cannot find the words to say. Of course, what Frits cannot tell his parents is that he has the unshakeable urge to smoke some pole and to pound some twinks.

Partly because he has an immaculate head of red hair that he prides himself on, but mainly because he is hopelessly neurotic and suffers from a variety of pathologies, Frits is obsessed with balding and wastes no time telling people, including his much hated family man brother Joop (Kees Hulst), that they are suffering from a receding hairline. When Frits attends a Christmas event at his high school, he informs a former teacher while urinating next to him, "Mr. Wening, some bald people are quite happy," in what can be described as the protagonist's warped attempt at complimenting another person. At the same event, Frits imagines himself one day becoming as famous as Dante, Shakespeare, and Einstein, among others. While Frits is certainly a preternaturally intelligent guy with somewhat cultivated taste, he is also a hopeless slacker who has yet to attempt to fulfill his dream of being a famous writer by actually writing something. Instead, Frits likes unloading his curious and oftentimes appalling criticisms, fantasies, and desires on his oddball friends and apathetic family members. For example, Frits tells his four-eyed comrade Viktor (Gijs Scholten van Aschat) that, regarding his father, "My only hope is that he hangs himself." Indeed, an intolerably anally retentive chap, Frits cannot stomach the fact that his half-dead papa constantly farts, mashes his food, and uses a sugar spoon for a porridge pot. Sexually speaking, Frits is all screwed up as demonstrated by the fact that he puts his penis between his thighs to make it seem as if he is a girl with a bushy beaver and then proceeds to examine his rectum with a mirror while repeatedly asking himself, "What am I? A cone or a funnel?" as if to question whether he is a man or a woman. While carefully inspecting his anus, Frits states to himself in a rather intrigued fashion regarding his toxic-waste-dispensing nether-region, "Disgusting. If you saw a photo of it...you'd never believe it was human." As demonstrated by the fact that he abruptly blows off his virtual doppelganger Wim—a fellow closet case that has the same exact haircut and some of the same neurotic tendencies as the protagonist—after the young man gets a little too 'personal' with him, Frits is deathly afraid of his hidden sexuality.

EVENINGS

One night, Frits decides to pay a visit to his quirky offbeat female photographer friend Bep (Elja Pelgrom) and on a whim he decides to bury his head into the little lady's crotch and then proceeds to pull up her dress. While Bep initially becomes angry and pushes his hand off of her, she subsequently puts Frits' hand on her naughty bits, which startles the protagonist and causes him to immediately abort the rather awkward sexual encounter. Possibly because she thinks he is a gynophobic nancy boy and thus feels sorry for him, Bep gives Frits a stuffed rabbit to borrow, which becomes a sort of symbol of his repressed sexuality and which he punishes by anally pillaging it with a stick. If there is anyone else like Frits in his town, it is his demented one-eyed friend Maurits Duivenis (Pierre Bokma), who fantasizes about strangling little boys in the woods and also shows signs of being a repressed rectum-reamer, albeit of the more sadomasochistic sort. Despite the fact that Frits states to Maurits, "I'm polite but that is partly fear. With you, I'm never sure I won't get stabbed in a dark alley," the two certainly have a special connection due to being sexually perverted social outcasts. Needless to say, Frits suffers from a histrionic freakout and flees when Maurits attempts to grab his cock while describing in a fetishistic manner how he would torture a young boy. Unquestionably, Frits receives a sort of epiphany regarding his life when he discovers that his beloved closest crush Wim has committed suicide and although he never says it outright, the protagonist knows that he must embrace his homosexuality if he ever wants to live anything resembling a tolerable life. While Frits becomes obsessed with the idea of coming out to his parents on New Year's Eve night, he ultimately wusses out, runs outside into the street, and suffers a hellish allegorical hallucination where he sees a group of menacing demonic figures in masks standing among otherworldly flames that the protagonist's dead friend Wim soon walks by. In the end, Frits finds it in himself to find forgiveness for his unsympathetic parents and declares to himself before going to bed regarding surviving the New Year, "It's all over, gone. But I'm alive. I breathe, therefore I'm alive. Whatever ordeals...pain, disasters...I'm alive." After falling asleep, Frits dreams about his smiling parents collectively telling him, "Frits, it has been seen. Yes, son. It has not gone unnoticed," as if they are letting him know that they realize he is gay and accept it. In a metacinematic scene in tribute to source writer Gerard Reve, who seemed to use writing as a source of solace and therapeutic outlet for his neurotic tendencies like so many writers, the film concludes with Frits beginning to write for the first time in the film in a heavy-handedly triumphant scene complimented by uplifting transcendental music.

While I would have surely appreciated it if director Rudolf van den Berg had chosen to emphasize Gerard Reve's innate anticommunist and Roman Catholic tendencies in his adaptation of Evenings, the film certainly exceeded any expectations I had for the work, though I think that is largely owed to Thom Hoffman's singular performance in what was surely an intricate and undeniably unflattering role. Aside from van den Berg's predictable Freudian approach to the source novel, the film has an all-too-polished Hollywood-like aesthetic that can be somewhat distracting and even annoying, especially considering the overall subversive essence of the novel, which would have certainly been better adapted by an indigenous Dutchman like Adriaan Ditvoorst who demonstrated a proficiency for adapting the works of Willem Frederik Hermans (who, with Reve and Hebrew Harry Mulisch, is considered one of the 'Great Three' of post-WWII Dutch literature). Indeed, like the works of fellow Dutch Judaic George Sluizer (Spoorloos aka The Vanishing, Dark Blood), van den Berg's film has a certain deracinated 'cosmopolitan' feel about it that, for better or worse, betrays the decided Dutchness of its source material, thus probably making it more accessible for foreign viewers. Undoubtedly, Evenings is worth seeing just for Hoffman's performance alone as a cracked crypto-homo trichophile that ultimately makes Holden Caulfield seem like an insufferable failed bourgeois man-child who needs to shut-up and just get laid. Of course, antihero Frits of van den Berg's film also needs to get laid, but being a confused cocksucker in pre-sexual liberation Calvinist Holland ultimately makes for a more interesting scenario than a rich American wuss who is too afraid to lose his virginity, even after paying a pussy-peddler for her valuable time. Judging by van den Berg's subsequent work De Johnsons (1992) aka The Johnsons—a strange and somewhat original yet mostly mediocre horror flick starring Dutch diva Monique van de Ven of Turkish Delight (1973) fame that is notable for apparently being the last Dutch horror film of the twentieth century, but not much else—Evenings certainly seems to owe most of its potency to Reve's novel as channeled through the wayward spirit of Herr Hoffman. Of course, the film is just as much a (anti)tribute to and psycho-biography of Gerard Reve as it is an adaptation of the writer's novel, which is ultimately what makes it quite intriguing and fairly original for a work of its kind.

EVENINGS

-Ty E

THE JOHNSONS

Rudolf van den Berg* (1992)

A very longtime ago when an evil propaganda video chain known as Blockbuster still existed and before rather useful websites like YouTube were ever even dreamed of and insanely rare films became available at the mere press of a button, one would be certainly hard-pressed to find any DVDs for under $20, let alone any worthwhile ones, so when I discovered an Anchor Bay Entertainment release for a strange horror film with a seemingly mummified fetus with piercing blue eyes on the cover entitled The Johnsons for only a mere $3 at a certain now defunct home video chain known for selling things at an exorbitant price, I naturally impulsively bought it, even though I had never heard of, let alone seen, the film. As a company that released great films like The Wicker Man (1973), Suspiria (1977), Maniac (1980), The Evil Dead trilogy (1981-1992), The Beyond (1981), and Repo Man (1984), among various other genre classics, Anchor Bay was a company I thought I could trust when it came to quality cult and horror cinema yet The Johnsons proved to be an innately incoherent fiercely fuming pile of filmic feces with ludicrously laughable bad dubbing and featuring a token negro scholar, deranged Auschwitz-esque baldboys that like painting fetuses with blood, and borderline gratuitous shots of the floppy cocks of honky tribesmen with phallic faceless masks. Anyway, about fifteen years later I would reencounter the film by accident after being exposed to the oeuvre of Dutch Jewish auteur Rudolf van den Berg (Süskind, Tirza), who was responsible for directing the work, and I was finally able to understand why I found it so unbelievably inexplicable and brazenly bizarre. Directed by an arthouse auteur turned would-be-mainstream hack turned foremost master of Dutch celluloid Judaica, De Johnsons (1992) aka The Johnsons aka Xangadix aka Rituales sangrientos is a majorly mongrelized, if not admittedly curious, multicultural-friendly miscreation of a movie that is technically Dutch but clearly directed with a culturally retarded American audience in mind, though the film naturally never made it to U.S. theaters. Interestingly, despite never managing to secure a theatrical release in the United States, van den Berg's film still managed to develop a loyal cult following via bootlegs that was hungry for horror due to the rather pathetic state of the genre at the time.

With his second feature Zoeken naar Eileen (1987) aka Looking for Eileen, van den Berg had already proved he aimed to work in Hollywood as it starred mainstream British beauty Lysette Anthony and about half of the dialogue was in English, but with his third feature De Avonden (1989) aka Evenings—a worthwhile, if somewhat contrived, adaptation of great Dutch post-WWII writer Gerard Reve's classic 1947 novel of the same name—he proved he was a capable, if not somewhat 'unDutch,' filmmaker, but not exactly one with a special knack for horror cinema. Ultimately, The Johnsons was a last minute 'for-hire' work for van den Berg that was only given to him after the original writer and director, Ruud van Hemert (Schatjes aka Army Brats aka Darlings!, Ik ook van jou aka I Love You Too), was fired from the production because the producers did not like his approach to the material. A work with a long and troubled production history that is arguably as bizarre and culturally confused as the finished film itself, The Johnsons was originally titled The Johnson Blues and was dreamed up by American screenwriter, producer, and documentarian Roy Frumkes (Document of the Dead, Street Trash, The Substitute franchise), who originally planned the project to be the story of a father and son being attacked by inbred hicks while on a camping trip in New York, with Clint Eastwood playing the lead protagonist and Oliver Reed portraying the role of the 'blue-eyed' Johnson clan leader 'Unk.' Originally, Frumkes planned to produce the film for a production company that he started with fellow Hebrew Richard Abram, but when the latter moved to the Netherlands the company was dissolved and he took the project with him. Rewritten by Frumkes' pal Rocco Simonelli and then eventually rewritten again by van den Berg's oftentimes collaborator, fellow Dutch Israelite Leon de Winter, the film eventually evolved into an eccentric 'mystical horror' of the quasi-Freudian sort involving ancient Amazonian Indian paganism, pedantic Surinamese negro professors, murderous menstruating teenagers, seven incestuous baldheaded mute psychopath killers, magic mother-daughter sensuality, sinister blue-eyed fetuses, and multicultural chaos galore.

THE JOHNSONS

Undoubtedly, Dutch horror is not even worthy of being described as a ghetto as it is virtually nonexistent, even though, like their Flemish and Walloon neighbors, Dutchmen tend to be good at making decidedly dark and depraved films that make slasher and monster movies seem totally pointless and irrelevant by comparison. While Dick Maas' De Lift (1983), Paul Verhoeven's The Fourth Man (1983), and the low-budget medium-length work Necrophobia (1995) are certainly fun and worth seeing by any semi-serious fan of the genre, they hardly put Dutch horror on the map and The Johnsons, which has been wrongly described as 'last Dutch horror film in the twentieth century' (the credit actually goes to the fairly unknown Necrophobia), is no different but it is surely of some interest as a marginally original work that unwittingly demonstrates that multiculturalism is a cataclysmic curse that has turned the world into a culturally schizophrenic and spiritually impoverished place that is much more horrifying than any stupid celluloid scare-fest featuring a masked retard stalking and murdering half-braindead teenagers. The film stars Dutch diva Monique van de Ven of such Dutch era arthouse classics as Turkish Delight, Katie Toppel (1975), and The Fourth Man but she is practically unrecognizable and the girl who plays her daughter looks more like a Mestizo than a Dutch debutante. A work in the tradition of Peter Weir's The Last Wave (1977) and William Girdler's Graham Masterton adaptation The Manitou (1978) in that it uses horror and thriller conventions to pseudo-cryptically attempt to instill post-colonial guilt in the white honky viewer, The Johnsons tells the cross-cultural tale of how an evil French anthropologist that stole an 'evil deity,' an ominous fetus in a large glass vase, from a group of imaginary Amazonian Indians called the Mahxitu and thus unwittingly released a terrible curse in the Occident that eventually made its way to the Netherlands after an evil eponymous American doctor engaged in a top secret artificial insemination project that resulted in the sinister and inauspicious siring of seven psychopathic baldheaded mute brothers and the sister they have been born to fuck. Featuring unintentionally hilarious racial caricatures, including a fat negress with horse hair on her head biting into a greasy piece of fried chicken and a 'supernatural negro' who sports ancient Indian tribal gear and tries to warn his deracinated uncle tom professor son not to fiddle with evil spirits, as well as a decidedly dystopian Netherlands where trash literally overflows in the street and indigenously Dutch people seem like a minority that merely exists to provide foreigners with police and incestuous psychopaths, the culturally mongrelized nature of van den Berg's work is ultimately much scarier than the intentional horror and graphic murder scenes that the film contains.

At the beginning of The Johnsons, the eponymous evil American physician Dr. Johnson (Rodney Beddal) is congratulated by his fellow doctors and nurses for delivering septuplets, so he celebrates by driving to some remote wooded area where he immediately gets out of his car, smears a good portion of some strange colored mud that resembles feces onto his face, demands that some deity that he describes as a "Snake of a hundred heads. Lion of burning flame" set him free, walks into a river that soon becomes encircled with flames, and greets his god 'Xangadix,' which looks like an evil stillborn fetus with super Aryan blue-eyes. Although not revealed until much later in the film as the film is set 21 years after their births, the septuplets were the product of a top secret artificial insemination project carried out in the Netherlands that involved Dr. Johnson stealing cells from unwitting patients and creating an artificial uterus that produced seven embryos from one ovum. These seven fetuses grew up to be so murderously psychopathic that by age seven they collectively committed a massacre at their children's home that resulted in the deaths of sixteen other kids and have been locked up in a maximum security mental institution ever since in the rather remote area of the Biesbosch wetlands in South Holland. Of course, the seven psychopaths are really the progeny of the evil deity named Xangadix, whose wrath was unleashed on the world after he was stolen from the Amazonian Indians that guarded him in 1934 by a Frenchman named Vidal-Naquet, who ultimately went mad and killed himself shortly after committing his ungodly act of 'cultural appropriation.' The savage septuplets were created using the eggs of a young journalist named Victoria Lucas (Monique van de Ven), who is now a widowed mother with a teenage daughter named Emalee (Esmée de la Bretonière), who is on the verge of having her period and keeps having nightmares involving seven murderous bald brothers that have a fetish for painting primitive fetus drawings on walls with red blood. Although almost 14-years-old, Emalee already has a psychiatrist named Dr. Goldman (Elise Hoomans) and being an old Jewess of the Freudian school, she speculates that the teen's nightmares are the result of her being on the verge of her menstruation cycle. Indeed, Goldman is unfortunately correct, as Emalee's 21-year-old septuplets bastard half-brothers can sense she is about to bleed and want to have an incestuous orgy with her ASAP but first they have to escape from the maximum security prison they have been held captive in since they were seven. By impregnating Emalee, the brothers will unleash total horror and destruction on mankind. Rather curiously, despite being an ancient evil Indian deity from pre-European times, Xangadix demands that a blue-eyed woman be fertilized.

THE JOHNSONS

Undoubtedly, The Johnsons features an 'unconventional' hero in the form a deracinated Suriname-born negro nerd named Professor Keller (Kenneth Herdigein) who is ashamed of his elderly father (Otto Sterman), who scams a negress into buying some black pepper from him because she believes it will banish an evil spirit from her grotesquely gluttonous daughter's bloated body. When Papa Keller sees rare recovered footage of the failed 1932 Vidal-Naquet expedition that features footage of the infamous Xangadix deity, he immediately decides to take decisive action by stealing the priceless film reels from his son's university and burning them in a fireplace. Papa Keller may be an eccentric old negro with a couple screws loose, but he is certainly wiser than his anally retentive uncle tom professor son, thus hinting that he should have raised his boy in Suriname instead of the Netherlands. Meanwhile, an indigenous Dutchman named De Graaf (Rik van Uffelen) of 'Department of Education and Science' gets in contact with Professor Keller because he knows the academic has written essays on exorcisms and wants his professional advice because he is in charge of dealing with the evil septuplets and has no clue what to do with such big bad evil bald-headed bastards since the maximum security mental institution that they are imprisoned in is set to be demolished. Rather conveniently, the nutward is located in the rather isolated and almost completely unpopulated area of Biesbosch wetlands, which Victoria takes her daughter Emalee camping to because she has a journalism assignment involving taking photos of a rare bird called a night heron. Of course, the mother and daughter ultimately spot more psychopathic bastards than rare birds. Indeed, the septuplets manage to escape from the mental institution after catching the security guards off guard while they are watching old episodes of Laurel and Hardy, killing them all in an ultra-violent fashion that involves dismembering their bodies and using their blood to draw ancient fetus drawings on the walls, and escaping through the roof of the building where they spot Emalee and her mother from across a canal. It is actually Emalee's presence that magically causes her lethally loony long lost brothers' prison cells to open. Since they are practically magnetized to their sister's naughty bits, the brothers immediately begin sniffing out Emalee's fresh teenage flesh-flowers and before the young girl knows it, one of her big bros is trying to rape her but luckily she has a hysterical response to the attack and manages to decapitate her would-be-rapist. Needless to say, the mother and daughter immediately hightail it out of Biesbosch and seek safety back in trash-covered Amsterdam, but of course the sibling-sex-craved septuplets follow them.

Although he says pretentious things to his father like, "This is the age of science...voodoo is passé," Professor Keller and, in turn, Emalee and her mother, ultimately come to rely on the Surinamese spade's invaluable magic knowhow to battle the seven psychopathic brothers and Xangadix. Although as black as Zwarte Piet, Papa Keller dresses up in Mahxitu Indian garb and performs a ritual with the help of a rooster that helps his son Professor Keller to find an old document that reveals to him that Victoria is the escaped psychopathic septuplets' less than proud progenitor, although she does not realize it until after the black academic has the chance to tell her after they kill Dr. Goldman and one of them kidnaps Emalee. Indeed, while Victoria, Emalee, and Professor manage to kill five of the last six surviving brothers in the former's apartment, one manages to kidnap his long lost sister and getaway. Ultimately, Victoria and Professor Keller follow the last Johnson brother to a sewage treatment plant (!) where he proceeds to prepare to ritualistically rape Emalee in front of the devil deity Xangadix, but luckily Papa Keller randomly shows up in his flamboyant injun garb and coaches the protagonist on how to defeat Xangadix, who appears in all of his blue-eyed fetus glory while surrounded by a white haze. As Papa Keller tells Victoria, "This embryo can't stand a mother's warmth," so she begins cradling the grotesque booger-like monster fetus, which causes it to explode and a literal bloodbath of menstrual blood to soak the mother and daughter in a somewhat fetishistic scene that seems to put special emphasize on the queen on the Dutch silversreen Monique van de Ven's blood-soaked derriere.

Interestingly, on his own official personal website, director Rudolf van den Berg confesses that The Johnsons was not much more than a 'for-hire' hack job, stating of the work, "I had big doubts about taking on this film. I didn't want to feel like a sell-out. But two things convinced me to direct the movie: at the time my second daughter was born and I wanted to take good care of my family. Secondly, I wanted to prove to myself that I could direct any film, including horror. Horror experts tell me that The Johnsons has become a sort of cult film in the US and elsewhere and is still appreciated today. Nice experience, taught me a lot, but once is enough." Ironically, aside from possibly his indisputable magnum opus De Avonden (1989) aka Evenings, The Johnsons is easily van den Berg's most bizarre, idiosyncratic, and, somewhat strangely, fetishistic work to date. Indeed, the film is less than subtly scatological and includes multiple scenes where people are covered in feces, one scene where Emalee pisses herself, and numerous references and allusions to periods and menstrual blood (in one scene, Emalee has some good clean fun by laughing jovially while playing with a tampon), among other things that make the work more intriguing and memorable than it actually should be. The film is also drenched in incest of various sorts that includes, aside from malevolent mystical brother-sister ritualistic rape, a super sensual scene that van den Berg has described as one of his favorite parts of the film where mother Victoria and daughter Emalee embrace while they are completely unclad as they take an intimate bath together that turns ugly when the latter suffers a horrific hallucination and mistakes her naked mommy for one of the perversely pernicious phallic-mask-adorned Johnson brothers.

THE JOHNSONS

Cinephiles might be interested to know that The Johnsons features numerous nods to various others films, including 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) as represented by Xangadix who looks like a grotesque mutant version of the iconic 'starchild' in Kubrick's film, as well as Hellraiser (1987) as personified by the last surviving Johnson brother who bears a striking resemblance to Pinhead sans the pins. Somewhat to my surprise, the film was not only somewhat of a hit in the Netherlands that actually managed to outsell various Hollywood movies in the theaters, but also developed a loyal cult following among American horror fans (of course, the early 1990s were a horrendous time for horror everywhere), with top American horror film critic and cineaste Chas Balun even giving the film a rather rave write-up where he concluded his review in Deep Red with the somewhat agreeable remark, "Fuck Craven's SCREAM, this is the real deal." Although I thought the film was a piece of crusty and conspicuously convoluted celluloid crap when I first saw it about 15 years ago, my obsession with Dutch cinema and recent assessment of van den Berg's oeuvre has led me to bizarrely appreciate The Johnsons as a sort of cross-cultural celluloid train wreck with a hysterical hodgepodge of incongruent cinematic and cultural influences that strangely personify some of the most preposterous and laughable aspects of multiculturalism, globalization and so-called 'post-colonialism.' Indeed, what other film features an elderly negro running around the Netherlands in festive Amazonian Indian garb while seven cracked crackers that are possessed by an evil embryonic blue-eyed Indian deity attempt to rape and impregnate their sister with their demon seed?!

-Ty E

SCREAMPLAY

Rufus Butler Seder (1985)

While I typically loathe fiction writing aside from some pre-Stephen King horror and the occasional racially charged dystopian work like Jean Raspail's eerily prophetic novel Le Camp des Saints (1973) aka The Camp of the Saints, I recently got the urge to watch a horror-related flick about a writer who is losing their mind and I was not in the mood to re-watch a film as long as Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980). After watching a couple minutes of Steve Miner's Vietnam War themed horror-comedy House (1986), I got rather annoyed by the film's overt phoniness and uncultivated goofiness and began looking for other options, thus leading me to momentarily consider watching third rate works like Oliver Stone's fairly rough debut feature Seizure (1974) aka Queen of Evil and Maltese-Canadian auteur Mario Azzopardi's somewhat genre-confused feature Deadline (1984), but I was not in a masochistic enough mindset to endure either work. Luckily, as a direct result of my recent obsession with the Kuchar brothers, just the right film I was looking for practically fell right into my lap. Indeed, Screamplay (1985) written and directed by onetime-auteur Rufus Butler Seder not only stars George Kuchar in the most curiously boorishly 'butch' acting role of his career as a murderously aggressive meathead with an unquenchable thirst for young pussy, but it is also probably the only film ever released by the proud smut-peddlers at Troma Entertainment that has any sort of true artistic merit as a strikingly potent piece of neo-Expressionist metacinema of the fairly idiosyncratic and satirical horror-comedy oriented sort that was shot on bold black-and-white film stock and features pleasantly primitive special effects. A work that is to noir-ish Hollywood Babylon-esque Hollywoodland classics like Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard (1950) and John Schlesinger's The Day of the Locust (1975) what the epically unhinged Kuchar penned pornographic cult classic Thundercrack! (1975) was to classic 'old dark house' mysteries like The Old Dark House (1932), Seder's film is one of those oh-so rare works that I would describe as a sort of regrettably undiscovered cult classic as a cinematic work that probably owes its undeserved marginality due to its rather unfortunate association with the celluloid turd factory known as Troma (notably, in the introduction to the DVD release of the film, Lloyd Kaufman described Seder as, "The Luis Buñuel of Tromaville").

A fairly singular work that might be described as a curious cross between the campy cult classics of Paul Bartel like Private Parts (1972) and Eating Raoul (1982), Richard Elfman's Forbidden Zone (1980), the shamelessly cinephiliac works of Guy Maddin, and kitschy lo-fi avant-garde flicks of Kuchar and his all the more perverse student Curt McDowell, Screamplay managed to effectively end writer, director, and star Seder's all-too-brief filmmaking career due to its commercial failure, though he would later utilize some of the special effects he pioneered in the film to start an artistically revolutionary career with his artistic invention of 'Lifetiles,' which are animated murals that can be found in museums and various other institutions around the world. The genesis of the film came as a result of Seder moving back to Boston from Los Angeles after spending about a decade attempting to get a feature made about Thomas Edison and Nikola Tesla that was ultimately ruined as a result of the quite dubious business tactics of a sleazy producer (not surprisingly, Screamplay features multiple sleazy Hebraic Hollywood producer types). Not unlike David Lynch, Seder, who began making films when he was only 12, studied at the American Film Institute and he won various awards for his experimental shorts, but his first feature would not be his Eraserhead (1977), at least as far as cult status is concerned. Although mostly shot in a 20 foot by 40 foot 'makeshift studio' that the director assembled inside his South Boston loft, the film manages to conjure up the illusion of a somewhat eerie Expressionist Hollywood apartment complex, which is inhabited by a number of eccentric lowlife types, including a proudly wanton washed-up B-movie actress, burn out dope-addled rocker with a messianic mindset, and a hopelessly desperate aspiring young actress who has big dreams but questionable talent. Featuring auteur Seder himself in the lead role as an eccentric novice screenwriter who comes to Hollywood in the hope of starting a career but ultimately gets in the middle of a whodunit murder mystery and finds himself working as a janitor for $30.00 a week at a sleazy apartment building as the personal bitch boy of a remarkably macho George Kuchar (who apparently modeled his performance after Richard Gere's in Jim McBride's Goddard remake Breathless (1983)), Screamplay has apparently been described by its director as "kinda boring," yet I found it to be the most shockingly entertaining film I have seen in some time as a shamelessly cinephiliac satire of Tinseltown that features both camp and arthouse elements and unwittingly exposes Sin City (2005) for the intolerably phony faux-noir fanboy porn piece that it is. A work that the eponymous auteur of Wes Craven's New Nightmare (1994) seems to have borrowed a good portion of his ideas from, the film is ultimately a sad example of a first time auteur making an excellent and fairly original work that has unfortunately been virtually relegated to the celluloid dustbin of history.

SCREAMPLAY

Screamplay begins with a premise that is indubitably patently preposterous but somehow manages to mostly work in the end. Indeed, the film starts with a shot of dorky protagonist Edgar Allan (Rufus Butler Seder) sitting with his arms raised over his typewriter like a seemingly possessed Frankenstein monster and attempting to finish a screenplay-cum-letter, which is more or less the film's entire storyline, before a shadowy monster of sorts that has just invaded his room attacks him, or as the character writes himself, "Dear Mr. Weiner, just a quick note to tell you that the killer is approaching me from behind and, by the time you read this, I may be very well dead. It's all because of my screenplay. I'll try to explain as quickly as possible. It all started a short time ago when I first arrived here in . . . Hollywood.” Mr. Al Weiner (somewhat humorously played by the director’s father Eugene Seder, who was also responsible for some of the film’s special effects) is a sleazy Hollywood producer with a stereotypical German-Jewish surname who the protagonist bumps into at the beginning of the film after his wife leaves him because he is broke and refuses to go to his big Hollywood movie mogul brother Irving Weiner (Bob Wilson) for help since he is a fairly prideful creature. After arriving in Hollywood via bus, Edgar goes by a diner and annoys the exceedingly bitchy waitress (Johanna Wagner) because he wants to make the most of a $1.00 minimum the place has and becomes somewhat indecisive in terms of what type of pie he wants (Edgar can’t decide between coconut cream pie and deep-dish poison berry). When the waitress calls Edgar a “creepy little jerk,” he becomes discernibly enraged and immediately takes his revenge by whipping out his typewriter and writing a scenario where the cunt server is violently murdered by a mysterious figure that stabs her in the face with a pie cutter, thus causing her blood and pie pieces to splatter across the diner’s $1.00 minimum sign. After the protagonist types up the fairly inspired death scene, Al Weiner shows up at the diner and gives Edgar his business card. Of course, little does Edgar realize that a scummy little parasite like Weiner will ultimately be his savior in the end, but not before the protagonist experiences destitution, mental deterioration, and the murder of various new friends, among various other unpleasant things.

After leaving the diner and subsequently joyously passing the Hollywood Walk of Fame stars of great iconic horror figures like Boris Karloff, Bela Lugosi, and Peter Lorre, Edgar has the honor of going to an old school movie theater where he pays one dollar to attend a triple horror feature of German Expressionist classics that includes such masterpieces as F.W. Murnau’s Nosferatu (1922), Carl Boese and Paul Wegener’s The Golem (1920), and Robert Wiene’s The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), but things go completely downhill for the protagonist after that. Indeed, while Edgar is taking a piss in a theater urinal, a deranged tranny on roller-skates glides into the bathroom, snatches his typewriter, and then pulls a gun on the protagonist and declares “Chow baby” when he attempts to get his prized personal possession back. Luckily, a boorish middle-aged brute named Martin (George Kuchar) soon emerges from one of the bathroom stalls, twirls the transvestite around on his roller-skates, and then breaks his neck with outstanding ease while the cross-dressing crook is still spinning around in circles. While Edgar is shocked by what he witnesses and complains “She’s dead,” Martin does not shed a single tear for his gender-challenged victim, stating, “It doesn’t matter. This whole entire is a garbage can full of maggots and flies. You gotta’ squat a couple now and again just to keep them in line.” Not long after, police attempt to break into the bathroom, so Edgar escapes with Martin, but he unfortunately leaves a page from his script behind, thus giving the less than bright cops a lead. Needless to say, the police are not too disheartened to find the wasted tranny criminal lying dead on the bathroom floor, with one cop quipping, “We got one dead closet queen” and pocketing the dead sadistic shemale’s cash.

SCREAMPLAY

Martin is the manager of an apartment building called ‘Welcome Apartments’ and he offers Edgar a room to stay in and $30 a week to be building’s custodian, which the desperate protagonist naturally reluctantly accepts. While Edgar remarks, “Don’t worry. Writers are very solitary sorts of people” when Martin warns him not to get involved with the other tenants, it is only a matter of time before the protagonist is trapped in a sort of Hollywood ghetto purgatory where every single person seems to suffer from some serious personality disorder. Indeed, the apartment has its own sort of local Norma Desmond figure in the form of a character named Nina Ray (M. Lynda Robinson), who is a proudly whorish washed up B-movie actress that is best known for playing a ‘vampire princess’ in a fictional film called Kiss and Kill and who more or less rapes Edgar when he comes by her apartment to fix her tub. Nina proudly proclaims that she has the “hottest titties in Hollywood” and that she “fucked some biggies to get where I am today,” yet nowadays she is willing to fuck wimpy losers like Edgar, thus reflecting her rather tragic fall from grace. Naughty Nina gives acting lessons to a young aspiring actress named Holly (Katy Bolger), who dress like Judy Garland from The Wizard of Oz (1939) and who is dating a motorcycle-riding hotshot actor named Nicky Blair (James M. Connor) who is starring in a $20 million film and is described by the media as the new James Dean, even though he is a rather banal dude with the IQ of a gnat. As the viewer suspects, it is not long before Holly becomes Edgar’s love interest, even if he seems more interested in writing his script than the opposite sex. Arguably the most demented tenant of the apartment building is a burnt out rocker named ‘Lot’ (Bob White), who resembles a cross between Moses and Satan Claus, enjoys playing Bach’s Toccata and Fugue in d minor on his electric guitar, conjures up religious prophecies while he is high on dope, and believes that the apocalypse is soon coming to the uniquely unholy modern-day Sodom of Hollywood. Of course, when people soon begin dropping dead at the apartment, Lot’s preposterous prophecies begin to seem not all that crazy, at least to him. While Lot warns Edgar, “Hollywood is the land of the doomed” and “Those who come to live here die. Go back, brother, I beg you. A thousand avenging angels of the lord will destroy you with their flaming swords,” the protagonist is broke and has no choice but stay. Ultimately it is not Lot’s prophecies but Edgar’s screenplay that will foretell the death and mayhem that will ensue at the apartment complex.

A figuratively (and arguably literally) deadly serious artist, Edgar offers Holly the following advice in regard to fine tuning her acting skills after watching her pathetic attempt to rehearse lines from Anton Chekhov’s The Seagull, “Break through your innocence; let yourself go. Whenever you feel passion of any kind—hatred, jealousy, lust...even the urge to kill...that’s what I use in my writing—latch onto it. Ride it like the crest of a wave. Let the undertow pull you down to your depths. At first, you'll be terrified and disgusted with what you find, but when you face your despair, your vulgarity, your depravity and learn to bring it all to the surface, that's when you'll be a great actress." Of course, little does Edgar realize how seriously Holly will take his somewhat egomaniacal words of wisdom. When Edgar "Give thanks to the gods of Ganja" by smoking reefer with Lot, the two see a 'vision' of the protagonist attempting to strangle Holly to death by the apartment poolside. Naturally, deluded dope fiend Lot decides to "purge" Edgar of his "evil" by burning his hand. In revenge against Lot for senselessly burning his hand on an open flame, Edgar decides to write a scene in his screenplay where a "burnt out rock star" is fittingly burnt alive after being drenched with gasoline and lit on fire. In fact, anytime a character does something that annoys Edgar, he gets his revenge by 'killing them off' via his screenplay, but things get extra weird for the protagonist when these people being dropping dead in real-life in the same exact fashion that he had written.

When a super sleazy would-be producer named Keven Kleindorf (played by Hollywood sound editor Ed Callahan) that makes Al Weiner seem like a priest by comparison in terms of moral bankruptcy approaches the protagonist and offers him his services in regard to getting his screenplay turned into a movie, Edgar is more annoyed than anything, but that does not stop the ambiguously kosher conman from routinely hassling him about his script. Meanwhile, Holly begins throwing herself at Edgar and saying preposterous things like, "Do anything you want to me. Help me to explore my passion," even though she is still dating Nicky. Though Edgar initially attempts to ignore Holly's rather flagrant sexual advances, he soon finds himself somewhat falling in love with her. While Nicky eventually lands Holly a major role in a big budget movie and even offers Edgar a job on the production, it all falls through in an extra tragicomic when the Hollywood heartthrob moronically crashes his beloved motorcycle into the side of a large truck. Naturally, Holly becomes quite upset when she sees her suave beau smashed like a fly and Martin attempts to comfort her by absurdly declaring "It's ok, Holly" whilst grabbing her fairly tender tits. Martin is in love with Holly and he will do anything to make her a traditional domestic housewife, but she's repulsed by him, not to mention the fact that she has big dreams of becoming a legendary Hollywood diva. When Nicky drops dead, Lot stoically declares like a thoroughly inebriated ghetto wino, "Nicky Blair's death is the beginning of the end. Nicky, in his blind search for the top, has fallen into the pits of hell. There can be no escape. We're all going to die." Indeed, not long after Nicky kicks the bucket, Nina is drowned in her bathtub and two distinctly moronic police detectives, Sgt. Joe Blatz (George Cordeiro) and his much taller and dimmer Guido sidekick Tony Cassano (Basil J. Bova), begin suspecting that Edgar is the culprit due to a tip from the bitchy waitress from the beginning of the film.

SCREAMPLAY

With Edgar being suspected of Nina's death, shameless scumbag Kleindorf decides to get the media involved so as to get publicity for the protagonist's screenplay, which is beginning to mirror reality in a way that does not sit well with the young screenwriter. Meanwhile, Al Weiner tries in vain to get in contact with Edgar about buying his script for $100,000 since his media mogul brother Irv Weiner wants to make a "classy and bloody" film. On top of everything else, Edgar begins suspecting that Martin might be the killer. Martin also begins getting on Edgar about not doing his custodial work and makes violent threats to him like, "You cross me and I'll kick your artsy fartsy into the street. Remember, as long as you're here, you're a custodian...a janitor...a peon...a nothing." To make matters worse, someone has stolen Edgar's script which, if found by the cops, could be used as evidence against the protagonist. Towards the end of the film, things come full circle, with the same scene from the beginning of the film of Edgar typically demonically at his typewriter as some ominous figure's shadow lurks over him. The ominous figure in question is revealed to be Martin and he has come to bash Edgar's brains in with a mallet because he wrongly thinks that he is the killer, but luckily Holly saves the day and knocks him out before he can crack the protagonist's skull. Unfortunately, things get strange for Edgar when Holly begins strangling him while reciting a scene from his script. Indeed, not only is Holly the person who stole Edgar's script, but she is also the killer. Luckily for Edgar, Martin eventually wakes up and knocks Holly out before she can kill him. Somewhat absurdly, Martin accuses Edgar of forcing him to hit his beloved Holly over the head with a mallet and then begins to prepare to crush the protagonist's skull with his own typewriter, but luckily Joe Blatz and his cop goons show up at just the right second and shoot the apartment manager with so many bullets that he falls through a wall. While succumbing to her head wounds, Holly confesses to Edgar in regard to why she committed the grisly murders, "Look, Edgar, it was me! I wanted it to be a surprise. I wanted to show you what a great actress I could be. And I am a great actress, aren't I? Tell me! And I'll be great in Nicky's movie, won't I? Kiss me, Edgar. You're a great screenwriter. Preparing for this role was so difficult, but acting in your movie taught me so much. You were right, I was limited, but now I'm ready to play anything. I could play any role. It was hard work, but we did it. We sunk to the depths. . .together." In the end, Edgar reluctantly agrees to sell his script to Weiner's brother's studio. When Weiner asks Edgar, "Who would want to kill a talented kid like you?" after he reveals that he was almost murdered, the protagonist concludes the film with the tastefully cheesy pun, "Holly would."

It would probably interest fans of the Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966) director that $20,000 out of about $45,000 of the budget of Screamplay was spent on George Kuchar's hospital bills after he broke his ankle in three places while working on the film. Personally, I think that was a small price to pay, as Kuchar unequivocally gives the greatest and most memorable performance in the film and saves it from being simply yet another horror film with superlatively shitty acting. Despite the fact that even director/star Sefer agrees that he gave the greatest performance in the film, Kuchar apparently felt he gave a horrendous performance, or as he stated in an interview with Scott MacDonald that is featured in the book A Critical Cinema (1988), “When I got on the set, I decided I was going to be OK: I wasn’t going to fall apart ahead of time. I was going to be a together person. Then the night before my big scene, I fell apart as usual. I was just a wreck. I knew my lines and everything, but I went through the thing in a daze, and I thought I was absolutely awful and felt so sorry for them having paid the airfare to get me out there to do the scene. I was just so hideous, and I knew I said the lines horribly. Then nobody said anything. I thought they were too embarrassed to tell me how horrible it was [...] Then the next day the director said it was really good, and I said I thought it was miserable. It was constantly like that through the whole picture. I was always just hideous.” Of course, as a goofy queer who actually manages to be highly believable as a sort of creepily hyper horny macho pig with homicidal tendencies, Kuchar’s performance is nothing short of unbelievably outstanding and even comparable to Marlon Brando’s in A Streetcar Named Desire (1951) in a curious sort of way.

While I typically loathe films like the badly botched Lovecraft adaptations The Call of Cthulhu (2005) directed by Andrew Leman and The Whisperer in Darkness (2011) directed by Sean Branney as well as Michel Hazanavicius’ obscenely overrated Academy Award winning turd The Artist (2011) that attempt to parrot outmoded vintage film styles, Screamplay is original, aesthetically idiosyncratic, and enthralling enough to be more than just a cheap gimmick or curious novelty. In fact, I found the film so aesthetically enamoring that I was not all that surprised to learn that auteur Rufus Butler Seder eventually became a Renaissance man of sorts whose Lifetiles exhibits are featured in museums all around the world, thus it was somewhat a blessing that Screamplay was a flop as it led him to creating a new art form, even if it seems somewhat like a cinematic tragedy that he never got the chance to make another film. As Seder told NewsOK regarding his interest in film, “I was more interested, I think, in the plasticity of film for the lack of a better word, rather than directing actors,” which is somewhat strange considering his film is just as entertaining in terms of characters as it is with its fairly singular mise-en-scène and special effects. The only other sort of neo-Expressionist film from the 1980s that I can recommend aside from Seder’s work is the somewhat obscure German flick Die letzte Rache (1982) aka The Last Revenge directed by Rainer Kirberg, though it is somewhat less accessible (indeed, while featuring fairly preternatural visuals, Seder’s flick can be easily followed by both art-shy gorehounds and autistic fanboys). For those interested in seeing Screamplay, it is also probably worth watching the film with the audio commentary track by Seder that is featured with the Troma DVD release. Among other things, Seder reveals in the commentary his affinity for Buñuel and the fact that Troma Lloyd Kaufman and Michael Herz had “absolutely nothing” to do with the film. Seder originally planned to have New Line Cinema release the film but after a disastrous review following the Boston Film Festival, Seder had to settle for Troma, which he described as “the bottom of the barrel choice.” Indeed, in an interview with Michael Adams at Movieline, Seder demonstrated his dissatisfaction with Troma distributing the film, stating, “I never really felt that my movie belonged in their pantheon.” Ideally, it would probably be best if Kino Lorber re-released the film, but something tells me that Lloyd Kaufman is not interested in promoting cinematic art unless the price is right. Both a love letter to horror film history and an ambitious cinematic experiment in the eccentrically phantasmagorical, Screamplay seems like what avant-garde cinema would be like if it was specially tailored to be palatable to normal folk.

SCREAMPLAY

-Ty E

WAVES OF LUST

Ruggero Deodato (1975)

While his ultra-violent cop flick Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man (1976) aka Uomini si nasce poliziotti si muore co-penned by Fernando Di Leo (Caliber 9, Avere vent'anni aka To Be Twenty) is oftentimes considered his first brutal breakout film, Italian exploitation auteur Ruggero Deodato (Jungle Holocaust, The House on the Edge of the Park) did direct a film the year before that, aside from his crowned cannibal subgenre masterpiece Cannibal Holocaust (1980), which is just as endlessly engrossing as the best of his films. A rather surprisingly refined and risqué rip-off of Roman Polanski's early Polish masterpiece Knife in the Water (1962) aka Nóż w wodzie, Waves of Lust (1975) aka A Wave of Pleasure aka Una ondata di piacere was a sordid cinematic 'family affair' of sorts for Deodato, as not only does the film star the director's then-wife Silvia Dionisio (The Fascist Jew, Murder Syndrome aka Murder obsession), but it also features a small appearance from their son Saverio Deodato, yet it is certainly not the sort of sunny and sentimental beach film one would want to watch with the entire family as a scenic yet seedy and salacious cinematic work in the spirit of late-1960s Italian jet-set erotic thrillers with a little bit of murder and a whole lot more of exposed and unrobed suntanned bodies. Centering on an awfully arrogant alcoholic industrialist and egomaniacal would-be-Übermensch named Giorgio who invites a young couple to join him and his long suffering wife/slave for a weekend cruise on his expensive and fully furnished yacht, Waves of Lust is a titillating and rarely tedious thriller about passion and power among four Nordic Hightalians of the hyper horny and somewhat homicidal sort. Ironically, Deodato initially had nil interest in directing a film that was even remotely flesh-driven and had the goal to "maneuver it out of the erotic ghetto," and his jealous wife was not too happy with the idea of him directing other women in completely compromised and unclad positions, so to solve the problem, the auteur's sexy spouse Silvia Dionisio (who was quite popular at the time, not least of all due to a nude pictorial she did with her model sister for Playboy magazine in 1976) managed to talk the producers into annulling another actress' contract who was originally slated to star in the film so that her husband could direct her engaged in simulated carnal knowledge as opposed to some other random woman. Needless to say, Deodato managed to get over his anxiety of filming female flesh, so much so that he would inevitably become infamous for directing exploitation works featuring hordes of stripped and sadistic savages slaughtering arrogant leftist anthropologists in South American rainforests, as well as swarthy NYC thugs cutting up cute au naturel girls for fun, thereupon making Waves of Lust a nice cinematic vacation from the director's more grotesque and vulgar works, even if it does feature some of the director's auteur signature themes, including murder, mayhem, exploitative nudity, animal killings and whatnot.

WAVES OF LUST

Giorgio (British actor John Steiner of Caligula (1979) directed by Tinto Brass and The Berlin Affair (1985) directed by Liliana Cavani) is a grade A asshole of sorts and the fact that he is a rich industrialist only further compounds his flagrant and feverish megalomania and unquenchable thirst for power and pounding pussy. Naturally, Giorgio's beautiful but somewhat masochistic wife Silvia (American actress Elizabeth Turner of Lucio Fulci's The Psychic (1977) and Antonio Margheriti's Cannibal Apocalypse (1980)) takes the brunt of his drunken brutality and sexual sadism, but he also has a keen proclivity for compelling his capitalist compatriots to commit suicide due to his nefarious narcissism as depicted in the beginning of Waves of Lust. Although Giorgio may be the undisputed master of his domain and dependent dame Silvia, he is about to get a lesson in love, lechery, and lethality from a young and beautiful couple of more humble and hot means. Strikingly stunning lovebirds Barbara (Silvia Dionisio) and Irem (Al Cliver) already have Giorgio and Silvia in their calculating and inconspicuous crosshairs after seeing the rich prick on his luxurious yacht and belittling his brutalized wife as they sunbath from afar on the beach. Seemingly a femme fatale of the counter-culture sort due to her insistence on using her brain and never wearing a bra, Barbara silently stalks and eventually approaches Giorgio at an art gallery in a foreshadowing scene where the filthy rich fellow buys a degenerate painting that looks like a bloodstain and the two make plans for dinner that inevitably results in an informal invitation from the corrupt capitalist captain to the luscious lady and her strong and stoic boyfriend Irem – a physical superman of a specimen who makes the elder man seem like a pansy peon of the particularly posh and prudish persuasion. Immediately upon boarding the ship and heading out to sea, cross-couple sexual tensions arise that involve Giorgio slobbering over Barbara and vice versa, Irem seducing Silvia and vice versa, and least, but not least, Barbara swooning over Silvia and vice versa. Despite all the sleazy passes and snide sexual remarks he makes at Barbara, Giorgio procrastinates in sealing the sensual deal with the little lady, but he has no problem incessantly drinking like a fish out of water and verbally assaulting his slavish wife Silvia, which rather infuriates the younger couple, thus leading to their secret desire to lead a 'slave revolt' of murderous mutiny against the captain of the ship. While Irem remains stoic in the face of opulent sadist Giorgio, Barbara begins to lead the wealthy vulgarian on in a sensual sort of way that will inevitably have rather risky results for the rich twat. In fact, Giorgio becomes so intoxicated with Barbara's beguiling beauty and charm that he even hints at giving Irem a "present" in the form of his emotional wreck of a wife, but things get a little strange and paranoia strikes when a psychological war is directed at the industrialist, including the appearance of a ghastly painting in his room and faulty scuba gear that almost drowns the fellow. Like Giorgio, one does not learn until the very end of Waves of Lust who of the vengeful vacationing seafarers is trying to snuff out the demon of a seaman.

A film featuring an all blond and Nordic cast, Waves of Lust seems hardly like a work shot in the same country where Pasolini made his films and were it not for the film's innate sleaziness and Italian-language cut, it would be virtually impossible to tell this decidedly decadent and delightful film about beautiful bourgeois people doing bad things was a genuine Italian production. Sort of like a soft-core (both in terms of theme and imagery) and less nihilistic thriller equivalent to nihilistic Italian auteur Alberto Cavallone's iconoclastic and semi-psychedelic wife-swapping celluloid odyssey Zelda (1974) – a brutal and bodacious indictment of the debauched bourgeois featuring miscegenation-inspired murder – in its depiction of the salacious and sadistic sex-capades and snorkeling of the wealthy, wanton, and reckless, Waves of Lust is an unwavering cinematic assault on the senses that is undoubtedly enthralling from beginning to end, if not for all the wrong reasons. Featuring charmingly mediocre scenes of mundane melodrama and seriously strabismic scenarios of sexual socialization that are far less convincing than virtually any 'porn chic' from the Golden Age of Porn, Waves of Lust, not unlike most of director Ruggero Deodato's films, owes a good bit of its entertainment value to its blatant lack of plausibility and preposterous porn flick style acting. With its nearly immaculate (reality speaking, of course!) pacing and fulfilling finale, pulchritudinous posh people, marvelous Mediterranean scenery and vintage tropical musical score by Marcello Giombini (the man responsible for the amazing synthesizer-driven score in Cavallone's Zelda (1974), as well as trash exploitation works by Guido genre-hack-turned-porn-hack Joe D'Amato, including Anthropophagus (1980) and Erotic Nights of the Living Dead (1980)), Waves of Lust is a work of extravagant escapist exploitation cinema that offers a much needed celluloid getaway for both arthouse and giallo fans alike as a work that is like Knife in the Water (1962) and Lina Wertmüller's Swept Away (1974) meets Goombah Baywatch as directed by a much happier and less cinematically murderous pre-divorced Ruggero Deodato. Needless to say, I doubt it is a coincidence that Deodato directed his misanthropic masterpiece Cannibal Holocaust (1980) shortly after his divorce with Silvia Dionisio, as the director seemed to get stuck in a riptide of anti-romance and belligerent bloodlust after the dismembering of his marriage, thereupon making Waves of Lust an especially interesting exception in his oeuvre. It seems that like the antagonist Giorgio of Waves of Lust, Deodato would become a much more bellicose, brazen, and ultimately broken man after coming under the spell of saucy succubus of the seedy silver screen, Silvia Dionisio – the main attraction of this pleasing celluloid plagiary of Polanski's early masterpiece.

-Ty E

LIVE LIKE A COP, DIE LIKE A MAN
LIVE LIKE A COP, DIE LIKE A MAN

Ruggero Deodato (1976)

Maybe it is due to their seemingly innate hatred of cops and authority in general, or overall dubious respect for law and order, but no other filmmakers in the world made better corrupt cop flicks than the Italians, especially in regard to the Guido Poliziotteschi subgenre of the late-1960s and 1970s. Of course, it should be no surprise that Ruggero Deodato (Waves of Lust, The House on the Edge of the Park)—an Italian auteur who had his own fair share of legal trouble relating to his magnum opus Cannibal Holocaust (1980), which features real animal killings and would result in the filmmaker's arrest for murder due to its snuff-like depictions of death—would contribute a major work to the gloriously ridiculous goombah crime-action subgenre. Penned by the undisputed master of Poliziotteschi flicks, director Fernando Di Leo (Caliber 9, The Boss), Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man (1976) aka Uomini si nasce poliziotti si muore aka The Terminators was Deodato's first and sole contribution to the subgenre yet it also happens to be one of the greatest and most unconventional Italo-crime flicks ever made. Aside from featuring hyper-cynical scenes of ultra-violence, malignant moral retardation, and insane chase scenes (which the director shot during rush hour in downtown Rome without getting the appropriate permits, thus demonstrating his quasi-criminal-like status as a filmmaker), Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man is notable for its homoerotic subtext. Indeed, the two pretty boy antihero cops of the film, a blond Nordic (Ray Lovelock) and a brunette Mediterranean (Marc Porel), seem to be one and the same and do literally everything together, especially when it comes to needlessly nasty and rather nihilistic violence and murder of the rather sadistic sort. Indeed, like Giulio Questi's Django Kill!... If You Live, Shoot! (1967), which features a brigade of fascistic black-shirt cowboy homos, Deodato attempts to make a link between ultra-masculine sadism and sodomy, as if they are one and the same. A sort of gay Guido Starsky & Hutch featuring two old twinkies riding around on a crotch-rocket together as if permanently joined ass-to-cock, Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man is certainly a curious work that demonstrates that Deodato and Di Leo were nothing, if not two of the most cynical Italian filmmakers of their generation, which is certainly no small accomplishment. By no means a masterpiece, Deodato's film still deserves to be regarded as the dirty dago answer to William Friedkin's The French Connection (1971), as a work that almost single-handedly discredits the claim that the Poliziotteschi subgenre has 'fascistic' undertones, as the film is flagrantly anti-fascistic to the core, as an anti-fascist-fag-cop crime thriller where the ambiguously gay cop duo shoots and kills first and asks questions later, even before the criminal has actually committed a crime. Featuring seemingly unintentionally ironic 'folk ballad' songs written and sung by Italian-British star Ray Lovelock (who would later star in screenwriter Di Leo's rather underrated 1978 (anti)counter-culture flick Avere vent'anni aka To Be Twenty), Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man is undoubtedly one of the most aesthetically and thematically warped cop flicks ever made. After all, what other cop flick would feature Fellini star Alvaro Vitali (Fellini's Roma, Amarcord) as a goofy pornography-addicted apartment building concierge as a form of exceedingly random comic relief?!

Anti-gangster unit gangster-like cops Fred (Marc Porel) and Tony (Ray Lovelock) aka (Al)Fred(o) and (An)Tony(o) are two best buds who do everything together, including fucking, killing and 'riding' together. Indeed, during the first scene of Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man, Fred drives a motorcycle while Tony sits behind him as if he is his beloved girlfriend and the two are about to have a romantic candlelit dinner. After two sleazy criminals on motorbikes attempt to steal a chick's purse and drag her bloody and unconscious body down the street, Fred and Tony spend ten minutes chasing them down. In the end, both of the criminals are dead, with the second criminal's death a result of Fred breaking his neck after catching him. After the two criminals are made into roadkill, bystanders who witnessed the chase are shocked to learn that the two men that killed the street thugs are hotshot cops attached to an anti-gang unit. Despite the fact that they seem hopelessly in love with one another, Fred and Tony routinely harass women together, especially a young and beautiful secretary that works at their station named Norma (played by the director's then-wife Silvia Dionisio, who also starred in Waves of Lust) who rejects their macho posturing, complaining to them, "Masculine supremacy is bullshit, you believe you're Superman... You invite us to a sumptuous banquet but don't get past the starters." Indeed, the police secretary must have taken too many women's lib classes in college, as she calls Fred and Tony "phalocrats" and goes on and on about how no man has the sexual stamina to adequately sexually satisfy a woman. Of course, the dynamic duo has no problem finding other chicks, including their maid's daughter and various other random women they bump into. Ultimately, Fred and Tony's main objective in the film is to take out an elusive and crazed mob boss named Pasquini (Renato Salvatori), who makes for their perfect nemesis, as he matches the two corrupt cocksucker cops in terms of moral bankruptcy and sadism. In between torturing bouncers with fire, using small fish thugs as punching bags, burning up wealthy gangster's luxurious Cadillacs, and wasting Pasolini protégé Franco Citti (who plays a deranged hostage-taker), the boys engage in a rather primitive, if not always hilarious, form of misogyny and manage to get in a couple girls' panties along the way. As for their enemy Pasquini, he gets his kicks gouging the eyes out of treacherous junkie scumbags. Somewhat humorously, little do Fred and Tony realize that they will face their greatest struggle against Pasquini's blonde nymphomaniac sister Lina (played by the director's then-sister-in-law Sofia Dionisio), who proves she has more sexual potency than both cops combined, thus confirming the bitchy police secretary's remark that men lacked the stamina to completely satisfy a woman. In the end, the dynamic ambiguously gay duo saves the day merely blowing up a boat they just happen to find the detonator for in what is a pathetically anticlimactic ending that seems to be specially designed to piss 'fascistic' Poliziotteschi fans off.

LIVE LIKE A COP, DIE LIKE A MAN

Undoubtedly, few things sound less delectable than an anti-fascist Poliziotteschi film with feminist undertones, yet Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man manages to be reasonably entertaining simply because it breaks convention and seems awfully politically incorrect nowadays. In its depiction of cops as sadistic shit-stabbers who are, at the very least, just as depraved as gangsters, Deodato's film seems to follow commie hero Maxim Gorki's line of thinking when he once wrote: "Eradicate the homosexual and fascism will disappear." Naturally, a film like Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man could never been made nowadays, not even in a country like Italy where political correctness has not been nearly as corrosive. Instead, of Deodato's Poliziotteschi flick, we now have films like the kraut queer flick Freier Fall (2013) aka Free Fall where a young and married rookie cop with a pregnant wife is converted to cocksucking by another young rookie cop who, of course, faces discrimination from other police officers. Considering its absurd and seemingly nonsensical English title, Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man should probably be called 'Dirty Homos' as a work that, like most films of its subgenre, was clearly influenced by Dirty Harry (1971), albeit with the message inverted to appease to beta-males, communists, and feminists and other human crud. Still, despite its dubious politics, Deodato's 'anti-Poliziotteschi' can actually be enjoyed by real men and would probably be the last sort of film a frigid feminist cow would want to watch, thus making the film's socio-political subtext ultimately seem pointless, as if the writer and director just wanted to have the pleasure of mocking the unwitting filmgoer. Ironically, the film was trashed by Italian film critics upon its release as it was perceived as 'fascist,' or as the director revealed in the featurette Poliziotti Violenti: "B-movies are never considered left-winged. Culture is considered left-winged, so anything that's not an A-movie isn't culture. It's a B-movie, and fascist. But most of these film writers were left-winged. Active left-wingers [...] Italian cinema has always been this way. If you're not cultural, you're right-winged. If you're mediocre and make technical films, you're right-winged. Who can figure it out? When I tried to make a politically-oriented film against the politics of that time, I was called a fascist. Twenty-three years later I was called the first to fight the mass media. The communist newspaper "Manifesto" wanted to tar and feather me. Twenty-three years later they dedicated two color pages to me for CANNIBAL HOLOCAUST." Indeed, like the director's greatest films, including Cannibal Holocaust, Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man features a sort of nihilistic contempt for society and humanity in general, thus making the film mandatory viewing for Deodato fans. The film also happens to be the greatest ambiguously gay cop buddy flick ever made.

-Ty E

CANNIBAL

Ruggero Deodato (1980)

Marian Dora's debut film "Cannibal" is the most disgusting and perverse film i have ever seen and yet it's so strikingly beautiful. In many ways it could be viewed as two lost souls who find their way to each other through the Internet in order to satisfy each other, or it could be viewed as one of the most notorious crimes in the 21st Century. In 2001, Armin Meiwes posted an advertisement on the Internet, which read, "looking for a well-built 18 to 30-year-old to be slaughtered and then consumed". He got a response. The film tells the story poetically starting off with a reading of Hansel & Gretel then switches view to "The Man" who is Armin's character. He is a bald silent man wandering around town with a black suit and suitcase. He is very enigmatic. We are told his story through silent conversations with many men in coffee shops, diners, and community parks. He decided against killing women because we need them to benefit our species. Then he stumbles upon a reply. The perfect male. He begins to talk to "The Flesh" and they schedule the day. They meet and he brings them to his house. They arrange many drinks and rooms. I dare not ruin the violence in this movie for it will dull down the effect that this movie spews forth but I will say this film has the most putrid butchery ever printed before. This film is a festering stone on cinema's walkway. The acting, of course, is amazing. Expect no less from the geniuses that bring you this picture. Before he begins this event that will forever change his life and leave him scarred with the title "Cannibal", he has problems with it. As any man would. Doing something this extreme does desensitize you eventually and you can certainly notice with he is butchering that there is a soul behind his eyes.

Not only does this film has the most malignant violence and the most disturbingly realistic scene of castration but this film puts August Underground's Mordum to shame. The sexuality of this film is filthy and the torture is more realistic. The staff at Unearthed Films has brought this gem to our hands and is available via www.unearthedfilms.com. This is the easily the most disturbing film i have ever seen, and to think that the director helped direct The Green River Killer is shameful. A stunning work of art and the most repulsive love story ever put to film, but beware. They are adapting this story into a Hollywood film that will prove to be utter shit.

GRIMM LOVE

For your viewing pleasure, I have located the actual site where The Man met The Flesh. You can search for "Franky" and find the title of his posts, but nothing more because this is just an archive.

The Cannibal Cafe

-Maq

CANNIBAL HOLOCAUST
CANNIBAL HOLOCAUST

Ruggero Deodato (1980)

Over a decade ago or so, I began my search for a certain infamous Italian cannibal film that I was led to believe was the Holy Grail of horror and splatter cinema and considering the film was never released in the USA in any home format (as it is today), not to mention the fact that it was not exactly as easy as it is today to find such rare films online, it felt like a rather hopeless situation in terms of seeing the film, so I inevitably caved and swallowed my pride, went to a horrific horror convention flooded with flabby fanboys who masturbate to Friday the 13th Part III (1982) while wearing Wal-Mart hockey masks, and did the unthinkable by buying a bootleg copy of Cannibal Holocaust (1980) directed by Ruggero Deodato (Waves of Lust, The House on the Edge of the Park) from a superlatively slimy and sleazy bootlegger from NYC. While the act of paying a parasitical urban pirate money for a film he had no part in creating disgusted me just as if I bought crack from some jaded jigaboo, I had no idea that the less than pristine print of Cannibal Holocaust was going to shock me in such a severe manner that I realized that my lifetime of being desensitized due to my horror movie addiction was not nearly as bad as I had originally assumed, thus leading me to similarly 'infamous' cinematic works like Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), Tinto Brass' Salon Kitty (1976), Roger Watkins' Last House on Dead End Street (1977), Gerald Kargl's Angst (1983), Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik (1987), Gaspar Noé's Irréversible (2002), and countless other conspicuously controversial cinematic works that have made it all but impossible for me to take any Hollywood film seriously in terms of 'taking risks' and shocking the viewer. While Italian cannibal films are not exactly my favorite film subgenre, I still regard Cannibal Holocaust as king and can honestly say it is the only guido flesh-eater flick that I have taken the trouble to view more than once. In fact, after nearly half a decade without seeing it, I decided to re-watch Cannibal Holocaust recently and once again realized why it is the only "found footage" film I can stomach, as well as one of the only films that I am not surprised was banned not only in its native country of Italy, but also a number of other countries and why it still remains banned today in some places as one of the only exploitation films that brings minor poetry to senseless animal slaughter.

A surprisingly seamless yet savage film-within-a-film, Cannibal Holocaust has been described as a potent piece of cinematic social commentary, as well as repugnant, reprehensible, and racist film with no redeeming qualities. Frankly, I couldn't care less if some sissy ethno-masochistic xenophile that lurks in an overpriced independent coffee shop is even vaguely correct in his assessment of the film, but it is a fact that director Ruggero Deodato has cited the less than politically correct Italian documentary filmmakers Gualtiero Jacopetti, Paolo Cavara, and Franco Prosperi of Mondo cane (1962) fame as a major influence behind the film. Like Jacopetti, Cavara, and Prosperi's documentaries, Cannibal Holocaust does not wallow in cuckold 'cultural sensitivity' as it portrays "noble savages" (the Yanomamo and Shamatari tribesmen featured in the film are authentic, but only the Yanomamo partake in a form of post-mortem ritual cannibalism) in a uniquely unflattering light, even if the film has an absurd tacked-on message, "I wonder who the real cannibals are?," in a feeble and superficial attempt to condemn imperialism and whatnot. What is more important is that Spaghetti Western maestro Sergio Leone (The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, Once Upon a Time in America) wrote a letter to director Deodato after watching Cannibal Holocaust, which stated, "Dear Ruggero, what a movie! The second part is a masterpiece of cinematographic realism, but everything seems so real that I think you will get in trouble with all the world." And, indeed, the film caused all kinds of hell around the world, hence its relative scarcity until rather recently. Featuring a pseudo-documentary entitled "The Last Road to Hell" (which features real murder scenarios from around the glorious Third World) within the film in the tradition of Jacopetti and Prosperi's Africa Addio (1966) and Goodbye Uncle Tom (1971), as well as film reels of a film crew's ill-fated attempt to create a documentary about Amazon Rainforest tribes while raping, pillaging, and terrorizing people, Cannibal Holocaust is more than ample proof that the Occident, as well as the rest of the world (whether they like it or not), has reached an apocalyptic stage since the less ominous days of Italian Neorealism. If you're a braindead gorehound and want to learn about the innate culture-distorting ills of multiculturalism without having to read a single line from a banal book written by some poof of a pencil-pusher, Cannibal Holocaust is probably the film for you.

During the beginning of Cannibal Holocaust, one learns about a missing American film crew comprised of director Alan Yates, his girlfriend Faye Daniels, and two cameramen Jack Anders and Mark Tomaso who traveled to the Amazon to make a documentary about warring indigenous cannibal tribes. A bleeding heart liberal cultural anthropologist named Harold Monroe (played by Jewish-American pornstar Robert Kerman aka R. Bolla of Debbie Does Dallas (1978)) from NYU ends up leading a rescue team to find the forsaken filmmakers. When he arrives in the Amazon, Mr. Monroe hooks up with a guide named Chaco, a charismatic barbarian of a man who snorts cocaine off a knife, and his twinkish assistant Miguel. With the help of a coke-snorting Yacumo tribesman who was taken hostage by the military, the group delves deep inside the rainforest where no other white men would dare to tread, killing real animals on the way and witnessing tribesmen performing adultery punishment against whorish wives, which involves rock-cock dildos being rammed up the philandering women's vaginas. Eventually Monroe and his motley crew locates the warring Yanomamö and Shamatari tribes. After saving the lives of some of the more yellow-bellied Yanomamö, Monroe and his crew are invited back to the tribe's tree village, but not without suspicion of their weird white man ways, and after having a naked swim with some of the penis-prodding tribeswomen, the anthropologist is taken to a spiritual shrine used to ward off evil Eurupid spirits where the bones of the missing American filmmakers are located. Naturally, pissed off that those disenfranchised Indians dare to eat cultivated gringos, Monroe freaks out and has a hysterical hissy fit and fires off a couple rounds from his gun, but things cool down when the anthropologist trades a magical tape recorder to the savages for the fallen film crew's film reels and the two groups celebrate by dining on fresh human meat. Of course, Monroe proves his cultivated open-mindedness and dedication to diversity by chowing down on the remains of savage, if not rather reluctantly so.

CANNIBAL HOLOCAUST

When Monroe returns back to his inhospitable cosmopolitan habitat of NYC, he is offered by a team of sleazy and shallow executives at the generically named "Pan American Broadcast Company" to host a show of a broadcasted documentary that is being made from the footage he recovered tentatively entitled, "The Green Inferno." Monroe is shown one of director Alan Yates' previous documentaries, The Last Road to Hell, which features footage of exterminated Africans and piles of corpses of color. The anthropologist also learns that Yates was known to stage some of the footage to make it more enthralling and soon Monroe is exposed to how far the fiendish filmmaker was willing to go to get the perfect wide-angle rape shot and stunning savage-on-savage slaughter. Quite reluctantly, Monroe reviews the 'found-footage' that he is supposed to host and learns a number of unflattering things about his foredoomed filmmaker friends, including their taste for butchering and eating giant turtles, burning down entire villages of tribesmen and then forcing them to watch how white folks from America have sex, savagely defiling a savage woman via gringo gang-rape and subsequently impaling her body and blaming it on the savages as a sick sex ritual, blowing away tribesmen with their 'boomsticks,' and a variety of other odious displays of behavior that gets Alan Yates and his film crew brutally butchered and eaten by armies of the Yaomamö. Disgusted with himself for being an American white man like Mr. Alan Yates, Monroe leaves the final screening disillusioned, but at least the TV executives decide to destroy the footage.

Not unsurprisingly, Cannibal Holocaust was confiscated by authorities a mere ten days after its premiere in Milan, Italy, but director Ruggero Deodato had bigger problems as he was not only charged with obscenity, but also murder as the courts believed the simulated death scenes in the film were real and that the actors that played Alan Yates and his compatriots really met true death, which is the sort of audacious auteur infamy that few other filmmakers can boast. As for Cannibal Holocaust star Robert Kerman, he had the following to say about his experience with mad maestro Ruggero Deodato, stating he is, "A maniac – totally nuts! He was often stressed and he lost his control sometimes and would shout. That really pissed me off. I always had the feeling that Deodato drove everybody crazy. And those animal scenes! I thought those pictures were created by special effects men, but no way was it...I told Deodato I would curse him if he kept on filming those animal mutilation scenes...Those scenes are disgusting and perverted." Of course, one has to be doing something right when they have the propensity to piss-off and gross-out a Hebraic hardcore pornstar who once admitted, "I hope that porn is the most unrighteous thing I do. If we go out of our way to be scumbags, that's the sin; when I do porn, I offend Shakespeare more than God." The great irony of Cannibal Holocaust is that despite being considered one of the most decidedly disturbing, exceedingly exploitative, and ceaselessly shocking films ever made, it also happens to be quite breathtaking and even majestic in parts, which is only all the more accentuated by Riz Ortolani's melodious and highly memorable musical score. While not a work of 'art cinema' itself, Cannibal Holocaust is a singular exploitation piece in that it transcends the celluloid ghetto it ostensibly belongs to as a work that proves that films featuring naked brigades of savages castrating and cannibalizing evil white men and primitive women being impaled on poles can be not only aesthetically and thematically redeeming, but also endlessly enthralling. Also, clearly a relentless misanthropic, director Deodato does not care about sparing your emotions and if you came to Cannibal Holocaust hoping to get your jollies off by seeing hordes of denuded exotic primitives being wild and wanton and Amazonian miscegenation between savages and the racially sacrilegious, you're in for a rude awakening!

Predating The Blair Witch Project (1999) – one of the most critically and especially commercially successful independent films ever made (grossing over US$248 million worldwide) – by nearly two decades yet taking the whole "found footage" gimmick to a much deeper and more depraved level, Cannibal Holocaust, despite its lack of availability until relatively recently (Grindhouse Releasing released a great DVD of the film in 2005 in the U.S.), has managed to develop an almost religious cult following over the decades that proves the particularly perverse potency of the film. With proponents like Troma Führer Lloyd Kaufman of all people, who compared the animal slaughtering scenes in the film to Bolshevik auteur Vsevolod Pudovkin's theory of montage, writing, "In Cannibal Holocaust, we see the actors kill and rip apart a giant sea turtle and other animals. The brain has been conditioned to accept that which it's now seeing as real. This mixture of real and staged violence, combined with the handheld camerawork and the rough, unedited quality of the second half of the movie, is certainly enough to convince someone that what they are watching is real," Cannibal Holocaust proved horror films can be made that truly horrify the viewer to the point of shock and bring one to actually reexamine their entire Weltanschauung on a worldly cross-cultural scale, thus actually making them use their gray matter for once, which is truly an achievement for a genre in which its entire basis lay in striking the nerve of man's most archaic emotions. A film that demystifies the power of news media and supposedly authentic documentary films, Cannibal Holocaust, to reference The Wizard of Oz (1939), figuratively reveals the “man behind the curtain,” puts him on trial, and has him executed by a savage swarm of sanguinary mud people who may have a virtual incapacity for reason, but who know when someone is truly deserving of death, which is indubitably one of the few truly ‘universal’ laws of humanity. An incendiary indictment of both degenerate Westerners of the pathologically materialistic persuasion and naive cultural anthropologists of the commie Boasian blend who believe in hocus pocus like “cultural relativism” but are shell-shocked when actually experiencing primitive peoples first hand, Cannibal Holocaust is easily the foremost anti-globalization horror work ever made and an inexplicably anti-agitprop agitprop work that intensely illustrates, quite ironically, via a pseudo-ethnology cinéma vérité work in the vein of French leftist anthropologist/filmmaker Jean Rouch – a xenophilic man whose supposedly sympathetic documentary depictions of peoples of the dark continent was oftentimes viewed by native filmmakers as having “distorted African realities” – that different races and cultures have an innate incapacity for living in harmony together and that the more the peoples of the world come together, the more barbaric murder the planet will experience on a mayhem-ridden multicultural scale. However, more than anything, Ruggero Deodato has managed to package more practical anthropological insights and lessons in the subjectivity of documentary film/electronic media than one would probably receive at the undergraduate level at an American liberal arts university and if anyone can reach the deluded and damaged minds of fierce philistine gorehounds, they must be a savage genius of the Svengali Italian Stallion sort.

CANNIBAL HOLOCAUST

-Ty E

HOUSE ON THE EDGE OF THE PARK

Ruggero Deodato (1980)

Ruggero Deodato's classic is what I would refer to as an original rape revenge classic. It is in many ways similar to Craven's The Last House on the Left, but far superior. The Last House on the Left is a film that should burn in cinema hell. It is a film undeserving of any of its "cult" praise and notoriety. It is also a non-credited remake of Bergman's classic The Virgin Spring. Funny how The Last House on the Left gets a remake but The Virgin Spring isn't being credited for it. House on the Edge of the Park carries a far greater purpose than shock value. The resulting finale will leave you stunned and satisfied. The foreshadowing was laid on thick and heavily. You almost feel ashamed to have not picked up on it sooner. In retrospect, House on the Edge of the Park is the polar opposite of most rape revenge films. The revenge scene comes blossoming out of a fatal mistake and turns the film into a teenage recklessness/murder plot game. The alignment of the characters are unsure of at the beginning. When we meet "Alex", he seems charismatic and happy, only being dragged down by his job and the rich yuppies who try and trick his mentally retarded friend (Giovanni Lombardo Radice) out of money. So he takes things into his own hands to finally stick it to "the man". You'll soon uncover that every one involved has a greater purpose. David Hess turns another great role as a psycho-sexual maniac. It seems as if he was made for the role of being a rapist. His character is unforgiving and a hollow shell devoid of any normal emotion. Humanity has reared its ugly head for all that are involved. None would escape this situation unharmed. Forget about the idea that this is an anti-drug commercial like its Last House on the Left counterpart. The only mistake these women made were going to the "party" in the first place. Originally a video nasty, this film is now available uncut for your viewing pleasure. I couldn't imagine watching this film with 11+ minutes chopped out for the tamer audiences. The sexual violence is needed in order to establish the story and the poignancy. House on the Edge of the Park is a brash and uncompromising film depicting rape and sexual mutilation. It doesn't just stop there. This film is just an all round damn fine roughie experience. What else could you really ask for?

-mAQ

RISE OF THE PLANET OF THE APES
RISE OF THE PLANET OF THE APES

Rupert Wyatt (2011)

Rise of the Planet of the Apes is a film about an uprising of those a few rungs down the evolutionary ladder against humans that succeeds in showing up the human race two-fold; both in terms of arguments as to why the human race deserves to be blotted off the face of the earth by its closest cousins, and in a broader sense, as the likely next step in evolution- the computer- finally succeeding in leaving human “actors” behind in the dust. Here we are presented with a riveting revolutionary parable chock full of emotion and nuance, but only when the flesh-and-blood humans are off-screen (or getting beaten to a pulp by pixelated primates). Recall when “The Phantom Menace” and that Final Fantasy film that had all but nothing to do with any of the games came out and there were all these debates about whether a CGI “performance” could overtake human acting and if this was the death of cinema as we know it and how in no time we might very well be plugged into the Matrix or sending a dude back in time to fuck our mom and save her from Conan and shit? And how you likely looked at Jar Jar Binks shucking and jiving and shining Anakin’s shoes and thought “never gonna happen”? Well, think again.

Rise of the Planet of the Apes concerns the usually semi-kinda-interesting-for-a-pretty-fella James Franco as a drying patch of paint/scientist attempting to cure Alzheimer’s. You know he’s serious and willing to commit all the necessary reckless scientific gobbledygook that will make it a Planet of the Apes because his dad, phoned in by John Lithgow, suffers from the affliction, and furthermore, hasn’t John Lithgow always looked kind of like an orangutan? So with that in mind, Franco works for a pharmaceutical company and has to test his cure on apes, but conveniently smack dab in the middle of a presentation one of his computer-generated chimps bursts through the windows of the boardroom and gets blown away by security guards and lo-and-behold she was pregnant so Franco, with all the conviction and personality of a paper plate, takes home the baby and in almost no-time realizes the brain serum from the pregnant mother was passed genetically to his new housemate, who in short time totally makes Nim Chimpsky and Koko and those gorillas from Congo totally look like the lice-chowing simps they are... To allude to past pictures in the franchise Lithgow’s doddering dad names the little guy Caesar (played by computer pixels arranged around a motion-captured performance by that “give me my preciouss” guy from Lord of the Rings). In short time, Caesar is communicating through sign-language, walking semi-upright, kicking ass in IQ-tests, and becoming more and more aware at the humiliating position he is placed in by society- not quite a man, not quite a monkey (an ape, to be exact).

So Franco goes all ‘renegade’ and decides to sneak some of the forbidden

Alzheimer's medicine from the lab and take it home to test on dad and the same guy who was having trouble playing chopsticks at the beginning of the film is grimacing and mincing his way through an intense piano workout and around this time an over-the-top asshole neighbor attacks Caesar, who just wants friends aside from the dull pair he's stuck with, with a baseball bat and so Franco takes him to the zoo to get patched up and he meets his love interest, a chick so bland I think they hired her so that Franco would seem to be giving an acting performance in comparison but all her presence succeeds in doing is to grind the film to halt whenever a pixel-primate ain't on screen. So as Caesar grows, both in size and intelligence, he starts to understand his position in the world, at one point asking Franco with a fierce look of indignation whether he is a pet or his son. In explaining to Caesar his origins, what with the medical testing and the death of his mom, he plants the seed of revolutionary consciousness. Soon, the Alzheimer's cure backfires, Lithgow starts wandering around in a daze and trying to drive that one asshole neighbor's car, over-the-top asshole neighbor proceeds to start pummeling the old guy, and Caesar springs to action, beating his ass and chomping on his fingers. This indiscretion gets Caesar taken away and locked up in a primate prison, where abusive (and horrendously acted) human guards and the feeling of having been betrayed by his human father, who is unable to spring his charge from the facility, work together to cement the fate of our budding Chimp Guevara.

Some more plot occurs, all of which eventually leads to an evolved-ape escape/revolt which climaxes on the Golden Gate Bridge and will have the blood pumping and heart racing as the computer-animated apes are indeed more animated and lively and sympathetic than any of the human cast members. Caesar, for example, is a sight to behold. The animation is done well to the point my suspension of disbelief was nearly total, and I didn't for a second pause to consider in many scenes that the human actors might be acting to an empty space. Rather, the human actors seemed to be digitally drawn in, either lifeless and bland or cartoonish and broad, whereas the facial expression Caesar begins to wear about a half-hour is fraught with complexity, somewhere between a hurt child and an indignant teenager, or "father, why art thou forsaken me?" and "die, honky." Caesar and his companions, be it the kindly circus orangutan (you won't confuse 'im for Lithgow cuz this fucker can "act"), the perpetually pissed-off gorilla, or the bad-ass Bonobo Koba, who ain't got no use for no damned dirty humans, make this film. I've always been one to side with flesh-and-blood, honest-to-Gawd human emotion over something created by engineers using computer programs, but in this case, I think it's really been proven that just like a machine can totally whoop ass at chess, it can also whoop ass at making chimps seem capable of whooping ass at chess. Let's see a chimp handler make THAT happen without making everyone stay on set for like three hours extra. Shit, let's see 'em make James Franco convincingly win a game of chess...ha!

RISE OF THE PLANET OF THE APES

One particular moment of the film warrants mention above all others, though it is something of a spoiler (that you and your 11-year old nephew already know all about). At one point, having already “educated” his fellow apes at the primate prison, Caesar leads his least favorite guard into the ‘playpen’ area, refusing to return to his cage. Wielding a cattle prod and looking like a cross between Jeremy Renner and DJ Qualls (and apparently acted by some kid from the Harry Potter flicks? I wouldn’t know...), the guard lands some blows, which Caesar does his best to dodge, a wry, enraged glint in his green eyes. As the tides of battle turn once Caesar intercepts a would-be chilling blow and grips his arm, Caesar, up to this point communicating solely through sign, let’s loose with a full-throttled, vocal “NO!” that, despite the latent predictability of much of this flick (it’s a prequel to Planet of the Apes, after all, so we kinda know the eventual outcome and pretty big swaths of what must happen to bring us to The Statue of Liberty resembling that which pees in its own mouth for Youtube hits), still managed to elicit gasps and a cheer or two from the audience. So convincing is Caesar that somehow this obvious plot development manages to come as a rousing surprise, and from that point on the film is one big “fuck you” to “the man” (or, in this case, just “man”), catharsis on the scale of The Battle of Algiers, only supplanting documentary realism with chimps on horses and Algerians with apes (I think part of the reason Rise works the way it does, for a misanthrope like myself anyways, is that intelligent chimps will always make for more likable protagonists than any know-nothing human beings), or computer generated simulacra thereof. (Oh yeah, Andy Serkis is underneath Caesar’s pixels and maybe some other nominally “human” “actors” are involved, but give ‘em a few months and I’m sure they’ll figure out how to get guys like him out of the equation entirely so the studios can reap pure profit and credit and the machines can slowly but surely start plugging us into “The Matrix”)(Remember The Matrix? Wonder how many weeks until we are sitting before a Matrix reboot?) All in all, you can do a lot worse, and probably not a whole lot better as far as summer fare goes. You’ll walk out of the theater, your head swimming with images of apes spearing humans and raising the red flag of rectal-digging resistance while in actuality the computers and their number-crunching studio executive human analogues wage the REAL revolution right underneath our noses.

-Jon-Christian

BEYOND THE VALLEY OF THE DOLLS

Russ Meyer (1970)

Undoubtedly, probably the easiest way for one to discredit the late Roger Ebert's competency as a critic of the movies is to point out the fact that he co-penned the script for the absolutely aesthetically appalling and socio-politically sickening piece of crappy celluloid counter-culture camp Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970) – a pomo pseudo-homo 'musical-horror-sex-comedy' that epitomizes everything that is culturally corrosive about American pseudo-culture, while also reflecting the sort of hedonistic and materialistic liberal Weltanschauung the populist cinephile who wrote it was a part of. Directed by and co-written by sexploitation auteur and movie mazophilic Russ Meyer (Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill!, Beneath the Valley of the Ultra-Vixens) – a similarly rather rotund man co-scripter Roger Ebert was a faithful fanboy of – Beyond the Valley of the Dolls is a uniquely ugly X-rated window into all the soulless lust and lifestyles, vapid music and culture, degenerate politics, and delusional dreams that transformed the United States of America into the Philo-semitic, philistine, technocratic quasi-Third World sewer it is today. Featuring porn stars, sentimental race-mixing, softcore Negrophilia, curiously cliché Teutonophobia (despite the fact that both Ebert and Meyer are apparently Amero-krauts), emotionally plastic psychedelic parties, trips to abortion clinics, hyper-hip hippie lingo, posh rebellion, feminist capitalism, retarded rock n roll, and just about every other anti-cultural ingredient that Hollywood thrives on and the American public mindlessly gets high on, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls is America and camp filmmaking at its worse as a relentlessly wretched work that curiously wallows in the sort of social sewage it so haphazardly attempts to satirize, yet is indubitably a part of. Originally intended as a sequel to the marvelously mundane melodrama Valley of the Dolls (1967) – a shallow movie about shallow babes who have too much fun with big boys and barbiturates – Beyond the Valley of the Dolls ultimately evolved into a somewhat superior, but equally shallow and senseless parody of the original film, with an equal dumb-downing dosage of tacked-on moralizing. After my second viewing of Beyond the Valley of the Dolls not long after Ebert kicked the big boy bucket, I decided enough was enough and I can safely say that I will never reduce myself to such asinine audio-visual rancidness again, though I would be lying if I did not admit that the final ten minutes or so of the film act as a sort of therapeutic cleansing of the soul in comparison to the rest of the work as a brutal scenario inspired by the mayhem of the Manson Family – the 'acid fascists', who if doing nothing else of value, helped to put the final nail in the coffin of the hippies and the 1960s, which was a great way to conclude a deplorable phenomenon that was rooted in the phony slave-morality-driven ideology of peace, love, and tolerance.

Three would-be-wild-and-wanton women – Kelly MacNamara (Dolly Read; the first British Playboy Playmate of the Month), Casey Anderson (Cynthia Myers; Playmate of the Month for the December, 1968 issue of Playboy), and Petronella "Pet" Danforth (Marcia McBroom; a popular black fashion model of the 1970s) – make up a multicultural and quasi-feminist rock band called "The Kelly Affair" whose members wear a lot of unsightly make-up and have equally awful and artificial personalities. Kelly MacNamara is the unofficial leader of the group and her pouty pussy of a beta-male boyfriend Harris Allsworth (David Gurian) manages the group, but he is hardly the right man to keep both the band and his girlfriend satisfied. When Kelly drags the band and her beau to Los Angeles to track down her estranged aunt, Susan Lake (Phyllis Davis, who got her first big break playing minor roles in Elvis Presley movies) – the sole heiress of a one million dollar fortune, things begin to become a bit strange and hyper-hedonistic for the gullible glamour gals. Things seem to be looking up when Kelly's aunt Susan proves to be a pleasant broad, who, quite absurdly, offers to give 1/3 of her inheritance to her niece upon first meeting her, but a stereotypically conservative yet corrupt financial advisor Porter Hall (Duncan McLeod) has different plans, as he does not want a half-baked hippie chick getting her pretty paws on the dough as he wants to keep it for himself. Meanwhile, The Kelly Affair plays a show at a faggy fuehrer freak named Ronnie "Z-Man" Barzell's (John LaZar in his sole memorable acting role) 'happening crib,' which ultimately causes a number of radical changes for the band. Zany Z-Man – a clever, if not half-crazy, megalomaniac with a peculiarly gregarious god complex – becomes the manager of the band and forces them to change their name to "The Carrie Nations," thus ushering a new beginning of sin, sex, success, and social stupidity for the awfully annoying all-girl group. On top of firing Harris, Kelly dumps the frail fellow for a blond bimbo beast and top-dollar gigolo named Lance Rocke (Michael Blodgett, who scripted Turner & Hooch (1989)), who helps the girl to get in touch with her inner-greed and vaginal orgasms. Deeply hurt, Harris gets hooked on drugs and alcohol and begins dating a predatory porn star named Ashley St. Ives (Edy Williams, who later married Russ Meyer and who the director, like a true cultural cuckold, later photographed for the March 1973 issue of Playboy), who ultimately insults the gentle gentleman's complete and utter lack of sexual prowess, thus causing the bashful boy to think he may be a closet queer. Casey has a pathetic one-night stand with Harris that ends in pregnancy, but she later has an abortion after getting advice from a Saphic fashion designer she has a brief lesbian affair with. Ebony diva Petronella begins a steamy love affair with a black law student named Emerson Thorne (Harrison Page), but things go awfully awry when she cheats on her man with a barbaric black prize-fighter named Randy Black (James Iglehart), whose character was modeled after Muhammad Ali. Although Kelly dumps Lance after he beats Harris to a bloody pulp, the erratically emotional ex-manager/ex-boyfriend attempts suicide and fails, but manages to paralyze himself in the process, thus further stifling his already rather pathetic sexual potential. Although the band continues to get more popular by playing on popular TV shows, the members get further involved with too much sex, drugs, rock n roll, and abortions. All the counter-culture fun and games ends in a climax of campy carnage when Z-Man has a deadly Dionysian party at his mansion that begins with a relaxed cocktail of psychedelic drugs and sex, and concludes with the music producer revealing he has tits and that 'he is a she' and decides to murder everyone around him, including his own lapsed National Socialist butler/bartender who may or may not be Nazi heavyweight Martin Bormann.

BEYOND THE VALLEY OF THE DOLLS

Russ Meyer's only major studio production and probably his most accessible work (the director himself regarded it as his "most important" film), Beyond the Valley of the Dolls is, in my opinion, low camp done too polished and clean-cut, sort of like an early John Waters flick minus the charmingly trashy character, authentically eccentric actors, and grotesque gross-out imagery. Indeed, in terms of its overwhelming aesthetic repugnancy, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls is a work of cinematic grotesquery, but not the sort that, to quote the psychopathic messiah of perversion Z-Man, that makes me think, "This is my happening and it freaks me out!" Directed by a man who was a virgin until he was in his twenties and who, rather pathetically, lost his virginity to a big breasted prostitute during his military service in the Second World War, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls, like all Russ Meyer films, has the essence of a man with a pair of permanent boob-goggles who was intimidated by and put pussy on a pedestal and watched one too many episodes of Hogan's Heroes. Indeed, what separates Meyer's films from the schlocky cinematic works of fellow American low-camp crusaders John Waters and Paul Bartel (Eating Raoul, Lust in the Dust) is that the "big tit man" lacked a queer sensibility because he was a "big tit man" and not a "big dick man" like the latter two directors. With its cast of highly untalented Playboy playmates with vapid personalities and even less acting abilities, and cardboard caricatures of figures like Phil Spector (who, like the Z-Man, would go on a deranged killing spree) and Muhammad Ali, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls is too passively playful and artistically conservative to be regarded as a classic work of camp as it is more geared toward the bloated American booboisie – a classless class Russ Meyer certainly belonged to and Roger Ebert fed with his armchair liberal brand of film criticism. Meyer and Ebert probably should have taken some lessons from Paul Morrissey (Flesh, Women in Revolt), who despite being an unrepentant right-wing Roman Catholic, created much more effective sardonic satires of libertine lunacy and the counter-culture movements because, unlike the flabby and flaccid liberal men behind Beyond the Valley of the Dolls, he was able to see the anti-cultural debauchery of the late-1960s/early-1970s for what it was (i.e. total garbage), from an insightful and idiosyncratic outsider's perspective.

With vomit-inducing dialogue from glorified hookers like, "Hey man, I dig.

BEYOND THE VALLEY OF THE DOLLS

You're on an ego trip" and "Don't Bogart the joint," it is easy to see why Beyond the Valley of the Dolls is the cinematic equivalent of genital warts as an ugly, highly infectious and seemingly incurable influence on American (non)culture that reminds one why the late-1960s/early-1970s make for the most repugnant, deleterious, and unflattering point in American history. If some day in the future, an advanced alien race comes to earth and attempts to find out why the West passively capitulated in an apocalyptic scenario, one would just have them watch Beyond the Valley of the Dolls – a film without a soul but steeped in superficial sin and salaciousness of the conspicuously contrived sort that could only appeal to the sort of guy that is better at sleazily staring at gorgeous women than he is at banging them – to see why the Occident died with a retarded whimper. A less than banging bacchanal in banality and anemic aesthetic barbarity, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls is what I assume the movies might be like in hell and if Russ Meyer and Roger Ebert are in Hades, which one would naturally assume they are, I hope the devil himself is forcing them to watch the films of real cultivated camp auteur filmmakers like Werner Schroeter and Daniel Schmid while being whipped by Rainer Werner Fassbinder with a golden reel of Nazi-produced 35mm film. Indeed, it is not a good sign when America's first double-bastard president – a man with the class of a preppy pimp – states, "Roger was the movies." Undoubtedly, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls was Roger Ebert's closet thing to his own 'auteur piece' and it concludes with a female-to-male transvestite slaughtering a group of pretty (vapid) people, but I guess that is what one expects from a man who looked like a middle-aged lesbian for most of his life.

-Ty E

THE SHADOW

Russell Mulcahy (1994)

Be it the alignment of the planets or what, but I've been flat out addicted to the classic 90s films of yesteryear. First The Shadow, then The Phantom, Demolition Man, and etc. The nostalgia invades my senses like a tidal wave. It's truly invigorating to watch films with a completely morphed mindset. When I first watched Judge Dredd, I found an entertaining action vehicle for Stallone, now I see a horrific vision of the future displayed by an above-average film that is hated by everyone. I felt it was the right time to re watch Alec Baldwin's The Shadow. In the world of international cinema, the great era of the 90s and 80s presented a period where language authenticity wasn't needed. Any Mongolian could pick up an educated English vocabulary and accent regardless of the time period. It was something that fans lived with. Cinema is constantly evolving, so has the audience's perception. We know notice when a Spanish conquistador speaks English. So it's only fitting that Alec Baldwin plays a humanoid Jabba the Hutt character named Ying-ko (Or something) that is passed off as a native. He ultimately finds redemption in a lost art of shadow manipulation. Then, in a Ghostbusters 2 turn, Genghis Khan's ancestor is awoken from a slumber to finish what his cousin started. The Shadow is as much of a neo-noir as it attempts to be. Important to an extent, this isn't a Dark City or an excellent adaptation. While being close to the radio show, this contains a superhero figment that is noticed as exaggerated. The Shadow is an idea. An idea of an elusive man fighting a never ending quest to redeem himself. He might be forgiven, but for himself to forgive his own deeds is a different journey. To his aid comes an early example of the blossoming CGI experiment. For being such a young technique, it's used quite effectively. The Shadow, not only is a great story acted by a talented cast, but is also a technical achievement. The frequent use of shadows even in the most lighted places provides a sense of evil lurking every which corner. After all, New York is the "most villainous place in the world". The comedy scale tips a bit when you watch Baldwin attempt a sub-Jedi Mind Trick on the 30s femme fatale daughter of a mad scientist. The one scene that always stuck out was the imprisonment in the water chamber by a certain Dr. Frankfurter. The Shadow is a perfect example of pulp fiction, without the horrendous droning dialogue. Wonderfully exciting and still fresh to this day. It's hard to imagine Alec Baldwin as the washed up actor that he is in this day and age. cough Georgia Rule cough

-mAQ

TALES FROM THE HOOD
TALES FROM THE HOOD

Rusty Cundieff (1995)

As long as I can remember seeing Negro-oriented horror films, I can still recall that disgusting feeling growing in the pit of my stomach. As much as I love violence and rap, the idea of a bunch of Negroes running away from some supernatural entity screaming "Nigger!" non-stop just turns me off to the genre as a whole. Much to my surprise, Tales from the Hood was actually excellent and construed the horrifying reality of propaganda behind even the simplest of big-budget films. Director Rusty Cundieff appears in one of the segments aimed at showing the horrors of a black step-father. His role is that of an incredibly docile teacher who has an almost "white" stature. This character is the teacher to a boy who fears a monster that leaves him with welts and bruises. The white man's black man then goes to the boys house and unwillingly "unleashes" the monster which results in a fight between two "African-American" adults; One being a large male with a demeaning presence, and the other being a wimpy dread-locked queer. The stories range from quirky "Better-than-Creepshow" to urban surrealism "Black men ruin everything good" The scene in example of the second type of short, would be the last segment called Hard-core Convert. All in all, this segments purpose it to set up the twist ending and to provide this film with more structure by ripping off Burgess's A Clockwork Orange. The question of "Can man be rehabilitated?" is answered in this film. The path that the character chooses is obviously the same path that the director/writer has in mind for the average Negro criminal. As Mr. Simms says and I quote "I don't think you can rehabilitate those types. No, you just kill them" The violence towards Negroes doesn't stop there. The stories exchange all their own political commentary on "hot" topics such as police brutality and black-on-black violence, with a dash of neo-Nazi's in them. The most infamous tale of all is KKK Comeuppance; a tale which features the single most horrifying doll horror story ever. A story to marvel over; An ex-Klansman is running for Governor of a southern state. If that weren't enough, he still hates "spooks" While he is about to refurbish his recently bought house (An old slave plantation with a macabre past), the local crazy Uncle Tom begins to spout ridiculous stories about killer dolls. Madness ensues. I didn't care too much for the first story (Rogue Cop Revelation.) The standard zombie format is going to be stale; making him black isn't going to change things up. Out of all the originality that is present in this film, this short is the sore thumb that drags it down. Most viewers of this film have seen this film as a child. While i can recall the excitement of renting a Hard R rated film, I wouldn't have appreciated this piece of self-hating trash as much as i do now. This film is an exercise in inter-racial racism. A classic horror anthology with touches of satire and sparkles with horrifying segments of Negro lynchings, burnings, axings, and many more archived footage with a point to prove. Negroes are going to be the end of themselves. While the many remain to be of a pure and independent spirit, most would rather blame their parents or whine about growing up in the streets. Rusty Cundieff is basically telling you to shut the fuck up and change your life, or else. It comes as no surprise that this anti-Negro film directed by a Negro is executive produced by Spike Lee.

-mAQ

LOST RIVER
LOST RIVER

Ryan Gosling (2015)

Naturally, as someone that has an innate aversion to virtually all-things-Hollywood, I find it rather dubious when some huge Tinseltown superstar randomly decides that they want to become a 'cinematic artiste' and begin directing films, as if to prove to themselves that they are more than just glorified prostitutes. Indeed, Warren Beatty's epically banal Bolshevik belch Reds (1981), Sean Penn's badly botched Friedrich Dürrenmatt adaptation The Pledge (2001), Angelina Jolie's culturally retarded piece of plodding plagiarism In the Land of Blood and Honey (2001), and especially George Clooney's pointlessly black-and-white pseudo-arthouse comsymp joke Good Night, and Good Luck (2005) are just a couple examples of what happens when extremely rich and famous airheads get bored and decide that they want to play artist by using the seemingly limitless technical and monetary resources at their disposal to up their game in terms of shallow virtue signaling and lame leftist cheerleading, among other less than noble things. One also cannot forget the fact that actors-turned-directors like Ron Howard and Robert Redford have probably done more to perpetuate the misguided stereotype that WASPs are humorless soulless dorks with their films than any of the films directed by their racially hostile Hebraic colleagues. Of course, some actors have proved that they had would it takes to be a great auteur as demonstrated by English character actor Charles Laughton's sole feature The Night of the Hunter (1955) and Dennis Hopper's Easy Rider (1969) and Out of the Blue (1980), but these are mostly rare exceptions. Needless to say, when I initially discovered that Canadian heartthrob Ryan Gosling—an actor that I consider to be fairly talented, even if he has appeared in a number of supremely shitty films that are made to wet the panties of preteen girls—was directing his first feature, I was quite intrigued but also somewhat concerned. While on one hand, Gosling proved early on in his career that he had an inordinate degree of emotional intelligence by managing to seemingly perfectly pull off the role of a self-loathing Jewish neo-Nazi in Henry Bean's The Believer (2001) despite his totally non-kosher Aryan good looks, the unquestionably talented actor does not exactly scream fanatical auteur and seems more like a follower than a leader, thus making him seem somewhat unfit for the dictatorial duties of being a filmmaker (after all, film history has demonstrated that many of the great auteur filmmakers ranging from Stanley Kubrick to Rainer Werner Fassbinder have proven to be almost intolerable to work with). After all, unfortunately for Gosling, it seems that many of the great filmmakers of history also tended to be quite nerdy, unattractive, and/or otherwise unlikable. Of course, if there is any contemporary actor that I would want to see direct a film, it is Gosling, so naturally I was quite excited upon learning about his directorial debut Loſt River (2014). Although the film had the honor of premiering in competition in the Un Certain Regard section of the 2014 Cannes Film Festival, it was almost unanimously trashed by critics and received piss poor limited theatrical distribution (in fact, the film's U.S. distributor Warner Bros. Pictures even considering selling it to another studio due to its poor reception). Considering the critics seem to love anything that is directed by absurdly arrogant white liberal psychopaths like Beatty and Clooney, I only became all the more interested in seeing Gosling after learning of its poor critical reception. Luckily, Loſt River not only proved to be a legitimate auteur effort that hints that Gosling might one day become a formidable filmmaker with his own distinct cinematic vision, but it is also somewhat politically correct as a sometimes surprising flick that breaks with the mainstream white/Jewish liberal narrative, especially in regard to its rather empathetic portrayal of white proles and their rapid decline.

One of the most frequent criticisms that Gosling's film has received is that it is 'derivative,' even though it takes a more subtle and seamless approach to honoring its influences than shameless negrophile Tarantino does with his films. Personally, I think many of these critics were offended that a brooding pretty boy like Gosling dared to make such an ambitious and oftentimes beautiful film that does not follow the mainstream leftist narrative and instead depicts a spiritually necrotizing dystopian realm featuring poor struggling white families, deranged black bums, disillusioned anti-American immigrants, and an ambiguously Jewish banker played by real-life Judaic Ben Mendelsohn that acts as a zany villain who tries to take advantage of a single mother that is desperate to support her two sons. Seemingly completely apolitical and without any real agenda aside from the desire to create cinematic art, Gosling seems to have merely abstractly channeled his emotional response to the rampant societal decay that he encountered while visiting the post-industrial wasteland that is Detroit. Shot by Belgian cinematographer Benoît Debie, who has shot a number of important contemporary arthouse works, including Gaspar Noé's Irréversible (2002) and Enter the Void (2009), Lucile Hadžihalilović's Innocence (2004), Fabrice Du Welz's Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal and Vinyan (2008), and Harmony Korine's Spring Breakers (2012), among other notable films, Loſt River feels the result of Gosling attempting to make a Detroit Blue Velvet meets a pro-Europid Gummo disguised as an homage to Mario Bava and Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol, albeit with shades of Terrence Malick, early Tim Burton, and Derek Cianfrance, among other less conspicuous influences. Championed by Mexican Hollywood filmmaker Guillermo del Toro (The Devil's Backbone, Pan's Labyrinth) of all people, Gosling's film undoubtedly deserves comparisons to David Robert Mitchell's excellent arthouse-horror flick It Follows (2014) in that sense that it is an intentionally visually anachronistic piece of slow-burning and foreboding celluloid Americana that portrays Detroit and America in general as a sort of perennial purgatory that has been plagued by some unknown metaphysical curse that has destroyed love, happiness, the family, and virtually everything else that makes life worth living.

LOST RIVER

While I do not want to succumb to Kael-esque puffery, Loſt River is a great contemporary example as to why foreigner filmmakers oftentimes make more insightful and juſt damn delightfully damning cinematic depictions of the United States than native directors. Indeed, if Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977) depicted an America where even the moſt remote regions of the Midwest were afflicted with the alienating and dejecting effects of capitalism, Gosling's ſtrangely sentimental neo-fairytale depicts a rotting America empire on the verge of the apocalypse where love and romance seems to be a bittersweet memory from a time when romantic interpersonal connections were ſtill possible and fathers and ſtrong men ſtill held ſociety together. In Gosling's film, demonic dick-heads ruthleſsly rule all segments of ſociety as if they were placed in their places of power by the devil himſelf, virtually all young people ſeem to have already given up hope, and all old people either ſeem to be insane or in ſome catatonic ſtate as if they cannot cope with what has happened to the world. At leaſt partly inspired by Gosling's upbringing as the ſcared ſon of an attractive ſingle mother who was inceſſantly hit on by men, Loſt River is also a rare contemporary film that demonstrates that ſingle moms are oftentimes not the ſtrong and independent 'bad aſſes' that Hollywood movies and the mainſtream media and TV would have you believe, but inſtead vulnerable, desperate, and oftentimes damaged dames that ſometimes have to ſubject themſelves to degradation juſt to make ends meet. Additionally, the film reveals that ſingle mothers are incapable of controlling their ſons, as the male protagonist not only ſomewhat reſents his mother, but also acts as both a ſurrogate husband and father as a young man that ſeems to ſpend more time raising and teaching his younger brother than his mommy does. Notably, in an interview with del Toro during the firſt day of the 2015 SXSW Film Feſtival, Gosling would confeſs in regard to the uneasy feeling of growing up with a beauteous mom that was always the center of unwanted male attention and its imperative influence on his film, "When you're a kid and you have a ſingle mom, all men feel like wolves. Guys would whiſtle at her — it was very predatory and threatening. As a kid I felt helpleſs, ſo you ſtart to imagine all theſe [ſcenarios] where you can do ſomething. You ſee the world through the filter of your imagination." Considering the film features a ſcene where a ſingle mother aſſumedly brutally murders a poſh pervert that attempts to get a little bit too close to her, there is no queſtion that, in a ſeſe, Loſt River is an almoſt brutally incriminating auteur piece that hints that Gosling ſuffers from a ſomewhat ſtrange caſe of modern miſandry that ſeems to be the unintended conſequence of being the ſon of a MILF.

Featuring a highly complementary original muſical ſcore by Johnny Jewel, who is the owner/producer of the great record label Italians Do It Better and who is probably beſt known for his muſic in Bronson (2008) and Drive (2011), Loſt River predictably demonstrates that Gosling's collaborations with Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn have had a huge aesthetic influence on him as a filmmaker. In short, the Jewel produced Chromatics song, “Yes (Love Theme from Lost River)” is just as an imperative ingredient of the film as the Kavinsky, Chromatics, and Desire songs are in Drive. Of course, Gosling’s friendship with del Toro, who convinced Gosling to direct the film by telling the actor-turned-auteur that he would direct his script if he did not, also had a major influence on the genesis of the film. Luckily, Gosling’s film is not plagued with the lame and predictable sort of quasi-Marxist subtexts that totally tainted the Mexican filmmaker’s more notable cinematic works. While probably not a conscious decision, Gosling was not doing his career a favor by casting a Judaic actor with the quite famous Hebraic surname ‘Mendelsohn’ (although not related to the famous German-Jewish Mendelssohn family, Mendelsohn is indeed descended from Prussian Jews). Likewise, Gosling revealed that he was not a white liberal bleeding heart faggot when he opted to allow black crackheads who just happened to wander onto the set to appear in the film in fairly unflattering yet nonetheless humorous roles, or as he explained to del Toro, “In some cases we found ourselves in situations where it was easier to let whoever showed up to be in the movie as opposed to keep them out. The actors had to try to weave these strangers into the reality of the movie. There’s one case where we were shooting in the gas station...and I think they were selling something else in the gas station, and some people really wanted it. It got really intense so at a certain point we said, ‘Fuck it, just let them into the scene.’”

In its quite quixotic combination of quasi-Fantastique imagery and gritty subprole realism that oftentimes feels disturbingly surreal in a sort of Korine-esque sense, Lost River is indubitably a strange celluloid beast that is sure to bother cinephiles and philistines alike due to its unwillingness to be ghettoized into any single genre or style, not to mention the fact that it oftentimes straddles the line between highly stylized high-camp kitsch and serious understated melodrama. Arguably more intriguingly, the film reveals Gosling to be, not unlike his characters in Drive and Only God Forgives, a lost soul with a lot of pent up rage, as it depicts forlorn characters that commit ultra-violent yet justified murders, thus hinting that the filmmaker is no pussy pacifist (in fact, when he was only in first grade, he was suspended from school for throwing steak knives at some bullies during recess). Indeed, the violence in the film is not the sort of soulless cartoonish Tarantino-esque sensationalism that works the same way as a cumshot does in a fuck flick, but is instead a seemingly sincere and therapeutic expression of the filmmaker’s own desire for revenge and poetic justice, which is ultimately cinematically unleashed on perverted Judaic bankers and psychopathic bullies. It should also be noted that Gosling opted to whore out his strong Latina baby-momma Eva Mendes and had her play the role of a sort of neo-cabaret scream queen that makes a living being brutally murdered in an glamorously gorgeous fashion on stage for admiring sadists. Undoubtedly, Gosling’s single mother background and choice in female partner says a lot about him as a person and thus it should be no surprise that Loſt River depicts an innately morally and sexually inverted world where fathers are spoken of if they are mysterious ghosts, a chaotic matriarchy is the only form of family, and girls are oftentimes braver and more stoic than boys. Once somewhat curiously described by Gosling as “my version of Dark GOONIES,” the film took the director three years to complete after conception, but I believe it was worth the wait. In fact, before even coming up with a screenplay or storyline, Gosling began shooting footage of the ruins of Detroit with a RED digital camera (though most of the film would eventually be shot on 35mm film), thus reflecting his obsessive dedication to the project, which is quite apparent while watching the film.

LOST RIVER

Surely when I think of Loſt River, the following Heinrich Mann quote comes to mind, “Aestheticism is the product of times without hope, of states that kill hope.” Indeed, like a Tim Burton flick on cheap hillbilly acid, albeit with a soul, Gosling’s flick features a foreboding forsaken netherworld where a certain repugnant and sometimes putrid aesthetic seems to engulf everyone’s life. From the flagrantly trashy neon graffiti on ruined buildings and homes in Detroit to a dimly lit demonic cabaret where decadent dimestore divas ply their trade and bring a sort of unhinged collective ecstasy to an abhorrent audience comprised of wealthy degenerates that get off to the sickly sordid sight of dead dames covered in blood to the strikingly beautiful destruction of ancient middleclass homes in flames during the blue hour, Loſt River depicts an aesthetically atrocious yet nonetheless undeniably enthralling world dominated by corrosive colors and imagery that hardly brings solace to the soul yet cannot be ignored. While the aesthetically degrading graffiti seems like the modern-day equivalent of cave drawings as created by sub-literate urban neo-primitives, the cabaret shows and house fires give off the vibe of being Satanic rituals that entertain the wealthy psychopaths that have managed to succeed in the conspicuously corrupt sinking ship that is post-Christian multicultural America. Notably, even the sub-lumpenprole villain in the film sports a flashy diamond-studded Michael Jackson-esque jacket that seems to represent the sort of style-over-substance mentality that plagues not only Detroit but the country in general. Quite fittingly, virtually all the visuals that represent something loving are static and/or lo-fi, including seemingly ancient wedding footage of a terminally distraught widowed grandmother and the cheap keyboard of her inordinately soulful yet sullen granddaughter. Undoubtedly, one of the most uniquely unforgettable moments of the film is when Irish actress Saoirse Ronan sings the absolutely haunting song “Tell Me” on her tiny electric keyboard. In many ways that the director probably did not consciously intend, Gosling’s film is almost like an artsy fartsy advertisement from Emperor Trump’s glorious “Make America Great Again” campaign. On the other hand, the world depicted in the film is so forsaken that it seems completely beyond any sort of redemption, hence why the characters decide to move in the end.

Loſt Rivers begins with a little blond boy named Franky emerging from his family's exceedingly dilapidated family home and crying to himself, "I'm gonna help you. A monſter gonna eat you, Dada. The monſter gonna eat me, Father." Unfortunately, this poor little lad does not have a "dada" and inſtead relies on his young adult brother Bones (Iain De Caeſtecker)—a ſeemingly loſt and confused fellow that could hardly be described as a ſtrong alpha-male—for a paternal figure. While buſty redheaded momma Billy (Chriſtina Hendricks) loves her boys and would do anything for them, ſhe is certainly no ſubſtitute for a proper patriarch and is on the brink of loſing the family home to an evil predatory bank that is bent on buying every ſingle houſe in the area and then burning them down. Indeed, Billy and her boys, who are one of the laſt ſurviving families in their neighborhood, watch in anxiety-ridden dread as their neighbors' homes are regularly burned down by leſs than ſympathetic guys that work for the bank. While his mother clearly needs extra help and ſupport, Bones hopes to leave the area as ſoon as he finishes working on his car. To buy parts for his ſupremely ſhitty antique automobile, Bones ſteals copper pipes out of abandoned buildings and then ſells them to a negro junkyard owner. Unfortunately, Bones more or leſs risks his life when he goes pillaging for copper as he is liable to be caught by a deranged ghetto Führer named 'Bully' (Matt Smith), who rides around in a ſupremely ſhitty white convertible with a makeshift 'throne' and ſhouts things out of a bullhorn like, "I put a ſign up here that ſays 'Don't let me ſee your fucking face near my motherfucking copper.' This is my fucking copper. I own this fucking copper. I own this city. I own this copper. This is my fucking copper [...] This is my country, this is my city. I own this fucking city [...] Welcome to Bullytown!" Undoubtedly, Bully's mobile bullhorn buffoonery ſeems like a ſavagely ſardonic parody of the unorthodox political campaigning tactics of the fictional presidential candidate Hal Phillip Walker in Robert Altman's classic ſatirical country muſical Nashville (1975). Needless to ſay, when Bully ſpots Bones ſtealing copper, he declares him a dead man and demands that his underling 'Face' (Torrey Wigfield) hunt down the male protagonist. As the bombastic negro that owns the junkyard warns Bones, "Bully running everything now. You a dead motherfucker. You know, he caught that boy up there on St. Mary's, that little Chinese boy. Cut his goddamn lips off with a pair of ſciſſors. You think that motherfucker looked funny in the beginning? You ought to ſee him now, Bones. No more copper. No more you, Bones." In fact, when 'Face' fails to catch Bones after the latter ſteals back a ſack of copper that was ſtolen from him, Bully decides to cruelly puniſh him by cutting off his lips, hence his rather unfortunate nickname.

When Billy goes to the big bad bank to diſcuſs a houſe loan that ſhe is three months behind on, ſhe is leſs than delighted to meet a new exceedingly arrogant banker named Dave (Ben Mendelsohn) who practically radiates ſleaziness and who has been brought to the area to consolidate bank branches. When Billy willfully expresses her strong desire to keep her house since it belonged to her grandmother, Dave practically mocks her peasant sentimentality and tries to coerce her into giving up the house, stating, "If I were you...I'd make the payments, walk away with the money. Because I'm telling you, the wolves, if they're not already at your door...they're gonna be there very fucking soon." After discovering that Billy has no job and thus no means of acquiring capital to pay off the loan, Dave gives her a business card for a schlocky yet sinister cabaret that he owns and hints that she should whore herself out by complimenting her on her beauty. Indeed, while Billy does not want to believe it, Dave wants her to be his whore and he is wholly willing to exploit her monetary desperation to get in her MILF panties. Naturally, when Bones eventually discovers that his mother is in dire need of money to pay for the family home, he decides that he must use his copper pillaging money for her instead of parts for his car. As the film progresses, Bones must avoid ghetto quasi-wigger antagonist Bully and his henchman Face while his mother attempts to not be raped or molested by upper-class scumbag Dave, with both villains ultimately reflecting the fact that all levels of society are controlled by innately evil and craven sadists that exploit the weaknesses and desperation of the protagonists. While Bully reflects evil in its most visceral, primitive, and savage form, Dave is like the devil in the form of an obnoxious Jewish comedian. In the seemingly perennial pandemonium that is Lost River, hope is nonexistent and love seems like a strange memory. Additionally, aside from the sadistic glee that the villains derive from tormenting their victims, the entire population of the town seems plagued by anhedonia.

LOST RIVER

While Bones seems to have some romantic interest in his beautiful and intelligent yet somber neighbor 'Rat' (Saoirse Ronan)—a girl whose unfortunate nickname derives from the fact her best friend is her pet rodent 'Nick'—the two seem to lack the strength to declare their affection for one another and thus act like virtual children around one another. Rat's deep love for Bones is hinted in a scene where she soulfully sings a song on her keyboard with the rather revealing lyrics "Whisper, that you want me / And I'll, love you always / Truly, you will be mine / For eternity." While Rat is a rather eccentric chick that enjoys watching vintage documentaries on a seemingly ancient projector, she seems perfectly sane compared to her borderline catatonic grandmother (British scream queen Barbara Steele in a role originally intended for Karen Black, who died of cancer before shooting), who has not spoken since her hubby died decades before and who spends all her time incessantly watching home movies from her wedding. After running away from Bully and his goon Face one day, Bones discovers a road that leads to a somewhat ominous yet nonetheless stunning river that curiously has streetlights sticking out of the water, as if a lost aquatic ghost-town lies underneath. When Bones tells Rat about his strange discovery, she informs him that there is indeed a town under the river that was intentionally submerged with water during the building of a reservoir, hence the name 'Loſt River.' As Rat explains to Bones, "My grandmother used to live there. She hasn't been the same ever since. No one has. As soon as the laſt town was drowned...an evil spell was caſt on Loſt River [...] That's why this whole place feels like it's underwater too." Needless to say, Bones finds Rat's ſtory to be somewhat dubious, eſpecially in regard to curſe. The next day, Bones decides to dive into the river and gets the ſhock of a lifetime when he happens upon a large dinosaur, which is actually a diſplay piece from an old amuſement park. That night, Rat shows Bones a vintage doc about the building of the dam and flooding of the neighborhood and then remarks in regard to the death of her grandfather and how it effected her grandmother, "He died during the conſtruction of the dam. She hasn't ſpoken ever ſince." When Rat asks Bones, "Now do you believe about the ſpell?" and he replies, "No," ſhe tells him "That only way to break it is to bring a piece to the ſurface." Needless to ſay, it is ultimately up to Bones to end the curſe, though it is going to have to take diſcovering that his mother is working as a quaſi-proſtitute for the male protagonist to get the gall to dive to the depths of the river, decapitate the dinosaur diſplay, and use it to ſymbolically break the curſe.

As revealed by his rather forward ſleazily ſalacious confeſſion to her, "I like to fuck. That's my problem. And when I meet a bad bitch, it drives me crazy. I really, really...think about it," degenerate Dave is deſperate to defile buſty Billy. In a ſcene where he ſings the ſong "Cool Water" composed by Johnny Jewel at his cabaret for an adoring audience of bourgeois degenerates, Dave also demonſtrates that he is the ſort of rampantly heterosexual Jewish banker equivalent to Dean Stockwell's poof pimp character in Lynch's Blue Velvet. Needless to ſay, it is only a matter of time before ſhameless ſexual predator Dave attempts to moleſt Billy, who practically bleeds vulnerability, or ſo it ſeems. Although a hopeless girly girl that likes to cry a lot, Billy has a ſomewhat fierce cabaret routine that involves her ſlicing up and peeling off her face in a marvelouſly morbid faſhion that recalls both Georges Franju's Les yeux ſans viſage (1960) aka Eyes Without a Face and Jeſús Franco's ſuper ſchlocky quaſi-remake Faceless (1988). The main diva of the cabaret is a ſaſsy Latina named 'Miss Kitty Cat' (Gosling's girl Eva Mendes) and ſhe helps Billy with her act, but ſhe also encourages her to get involved with an all the more unſavory ſide job that ultimately puts the female protagonist in a very precarious ſituation that debauched dickhead Dave takes full advantage of. When Billy takes a ſpecial job at the cabaret at Cat's recommendation to earn extra money that involves her being locked inside a tranſlucent purple 'ſhell' while paying perverts ſtand in front of her and do whatever they want, ſhe does not conſider that Dave has a ſpecial remote to open ſaid ſhell. Unluckily for Dave, Billy is indeed a "bad bitch" and waſtes no time in ſtabbing him in the ear with her prized ſwitchblade in a Jodorowsky-eſque ſcene that is ſomewhat ſurpriſing in terms of how the violence unfolds. Indeed, Dave, who does a sort of eccentrically debauched mating dance of sorts before trying to hump the heroine, does not even get to touch so much as a titty before Billy stabs him in the ear (it should also be noted that Dave is already deaf in his other ear, so if he somehow survives the stabbing, he is probably left completely deaf). Meanwhile, to protect her best bud Bones while he hides inside a convenience store, Rat more or less sacrifices herself in the name of loving by accepting a ride home from Bully. Of course, being the evil sadistic villain that he is, Bully violently murders Rat's beloved rat by violently stabbing it multiple times. As a result of finding about his mother's degrading job after driving her to work one day and being unable to cope with Bully's increasingly sinister behavior, Bones decides enough is enough and decides to leave his little brother Franky with Rat so that he can dive into the lake and obtain the sort of 'hobo holy grail' that will supposedly break the curse. Unfortunately, while Rat is playing with Franky, Bully's bitch boy Face shows up and sets her house on fire. While Rat's grandmother is in the same room as Face when he sets her house on fire, the catatonic elderly widow barely pays him a glance and allows herself to be burned alive in the home after her wedding home movie ends. When Bully later attempts to run Bones over after setting the protagonist's car on fire, the protagonist takes the decapitated plastic dinosaur head that he has rescued from the lake and throws at his nemesis' windshield, thus causing the psychopath to crash his car and ultimately drown in the lake in a fittingly horrendous fashion. In the end, Bones, Billy, Franky, and Rat leave their Detroit neighborhood with a foreign taxi driver (Reda Kateb) for good to assumedly start a new life somewhere else where psychotic negro crackheads, megalomaniacal wigger lunatics, and eccentric Jewish sexual predators are less prominent.

LOST RIVER

Notably, during one particularly telling scene in Loſt River that seems to underscore one of the central themes of the film, Gosling reveals his true feelings about Obama era America in a scenario where the taxi driver played by Reda Kateb states regarding the grand illusion that is the American dream, "They like burning houses, you know. This is like a game. You know...in my country, in my place...when you heard about America, everybody said...there's so much money there...and you're gonna have a big car, a big house and a swimming pool...and you're gonna catch money on the floor...and you juſt have to take it and pick it up. Um, finally, it's different, but...you realize when you arrive here, it's different. So everybody's looking for a better life somewhere. It's tied up. And maybe we'll find some. One day." According to Gosling in various interviews related to the film, he apparently used to have a "crush" on America and Detroit, but that all changed when he finally realized his dream of visiting the Midwestern city and discovered that it was an ungodly hellhole that is not fit for human living. Indeed, while Harmony Korine—a racist Judaic that, on numerous occasions, has expressed his contempt and hatred for whites—made the South seem like a poſt-apocalyptic white trash sewer in Gummo (contrary to being set in the small Midwestern town of Xenia, Ohio as described in the film, it was actually shot in the director's hometown of Nashville, Tennessee) in a fashion that reeks of arrogance towards the Euro-American goyim, Gosling reveals a great empathy towards the surviving inhabitants of Motor City, as if he too, despite being a Canadian, nostalgically longs for a no longer existent America that was unequivocally destroyed by so-called civil rights, desegregation, multiculturalism, and deindustrialization, among other things. Instead of succumbing to the grotesque act of vanity known as virtue signaling or attempting to portray ghetto negroes as all-wise rocket scientists, Gosling presents an unhinged wonderland where both whites and blacks are under some mysterious curse that has destroyed the nuclear family and turned everyone into poor neo-serfs of some ominous faceless banking entity that is run by effeminate beta-bitches that have a thirst for blood and desperate single moms. While I somewhat doubt it was a conscious decision on Gosling's part, Mendelsohn's character can almost be described as a quasi-Lynchian equivalent to the titular villain of Veit Harlan's infamous National Socialist classic Jud Süß (1940 film) and that is just one of the many reasons why Loft River is both intriguing and highly relevant.

I would have never guessed that Gosling is a Fassbinder fan, but Barbara Steele's character seems to be a clever subtextual reference to the tragic Teutonic auteur's classic film The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979). Indeed, aside from the fact that Steele dresses virtually exactly the same way as Braun does after she assumes her husband has died, the fact that the character incessantly re-watches a home movie of her wedding seems to be alluding to the title of Fassbinder's film, not to mention the fact that both characters arguably commit (subconscious) suicide and symbolically suffer the same fiery fate as their homes. Of course, like many of the characters in Fassbinder's films, Steele's character suffers from great sorrow and the total incapacity to grieve, but I digress. If there is anything to be learned about Gosling simply by watching his directorial debut, it is that, despite his charm and cutesy behavior during interviews, he seems to be a covertly melancholic man who, despite his great success, is still deeply haunted by old wounds, as if he is still the scared boy who lost his father and ultimately suffered the horrible fate of being incessantly drenched in estrogen and ultimately learning "to think like a girl" (indeed, this is how Gosling described what happened to him after his parents divorced when he was 13 and he was forced under the dubious influence of his mother and elder sister). In his directorial debut, Gosling certainly demonstrates has a sort of inordinate talent when it comes to choosing female wardrobes and makeup to the point where it seems like he watched a Werner Schroeter marathon in preparation for his film. Like Schroeter and his Swiss pal Daniel Schmid, Gosling also seems to be diva obsessed, especially for a heterosexual man (after all, the actor could have pretty much any woman in the entire world, yet he is with Mendes, who is a somewhat rough alpha-bitch of sorts that can hardly be described as one of the most beautiful babes in the world). Either way, Lost River is surely the film that the millions upon millions of Gosling fangirls (and boys) need to see if they want to understand the real Ryan Gosling, who proved that he is not the mensch that everyone thinks he is by siring an allegorical neo-fairytale that transcends the brutality of a Brothers Grimm tale that arguably reveals that its creator is a troubled yet nonetheless hopeful young man who still seems trapped in an internal pandemonium of foreboding boyish melancholy. Still, despite the film's melancholic tone, it radiates a certain dark childish wonder and intrigue, hence why the director has described seemingly unlikely fantasy movies as The Secret of NIMH (1982), Howard the Duck (1986), and Batteries Not Included (1987) as having an important influence on his film. Notably, during an interview conducted at the 2014 Cannes Film Festival, Gosling expressed being somewhat disturbed as a child by a scene in Howard the Duck featuring a naked duck chick.

LOST RIVER

When it comes down to it, Lost River ultimately features a simple yet timeless moral message of Arthurian proportions (in fact, Gosling once described the character Bones as being 'Parzival' and Bully being the 'Red Knight') where a hero must not only gather the courage to first identify and then confront an evil, but also put his life on the line and attempt destroy it. After all, protagonist Bones is initially too afraid to even acknowledge the 'curse' and is only willing to accept and fight it when both his ladylove and mother fall victim to this evil, but I guess one cannot accept much from the emasculated son of a single mother. Notably, as Aryan Christ C.G. Jung noted in his classic text Modern Man In Search Of a Soul (1933) in regard to the tendency of man to ignore problems like the plague, "The biblical fall of man presents the dawn of consciousness as a curse. And as a matter of fact it is in this light that we first look upon every problem that forces us to greater consciousness and separates us even further from the paradise of unconscious childhood. Every one of us gladly turns away from his problems; if possible, they must not be mentioned, or, better still, their existence is denied. We wish to make our lives simple, certain and smooth—and for that reason problems are tabu. We choose to have certainties and no doubts—results and no experiments—without even seeing that certainties can arise only through doubt, and results through experiment. The artful denial of a problem will not produce conviction; on the contrary, a wider and higher consciousness is called for to give us the certainty and clarity we need." Of course, Lost River is a luscious and deliciously phantasmagoric arthouse fantasy flick and thus does not diagnosis the real curse that is plaguing America, but the very fact that it acknowledges the accursed state of America automatically puts it above virtually all contemporary Hollywood films in terms of importance and relevance, though I guess that that does not say much since Tinseltown thrives on gross lies and deceptions. Thankfully, Gosling unwittingly opted to hire a Hebrew to play the role of a hyper horny and decidedly degenerate evil banker, thus the film is ultimately more realistic in terms of presenting the malignant virus that is eating away at America than the director originally intended.

Interestingly, in Modern Man In Search Of a Soul, Jung also makes an attempt at art criticism and argues, “The personal idiosyncrasies that creep into a work of art are not essential; in fact, the more we have to cope with these peculiarities, the less is it a question of art. What is essential in a work of art is that it should rise far above the realm of personal life and speak from the spirit and heart of the poet as man to the spirit and heart of mankind. The personal aspect is a limitation—and even a sin—in the realm of art. When a form of ‘art’ is primarily personal it deserves to be treated as if it were a neurosis [...] In his capacity of artist he is neither autoerotic, no hetero-erotic, nor erotic in any sense. He is objective and impersonal—even inhuman—for as an artist he is his work, and not a human being.” Judging by Jung’s opinion, Loft River is a highly successful piece of cinematic art that is only cryptically personal and thus hardly plagued by the autistic masturbatory idiosyncrasies that epitomize much of Godard and Tarantino’s cinematic works. In other words, Gosling has already demonstrated with his first film that he knows how to direct a fairly entertaining and aesthetically pleasing arthouse film for the masses that does not succumb to self-indulgent fetishes or frivolous postmodern film referencing.

Although just speculation, I am pretty confident that, not unlike Richard Kelly’s Donnie Darko (2001), Loft River will eventually develop a loyal cult following. Personally, I can safely say that the film gets better and better with each subsequent viewing, as one certainly feels more comfortable the longer one spends in Gosling’s world. Indeed, for all of its flaws, the film is indubitably a respectable directorial debut from an actor that has proven that he has both an imagination and artistic integrity. After all, had Gosling wanted to guarantee commercial success for his debut feature, he would have pulled a Warren Beatty or Zach Braff and directed a lame bourgeois drama with a romantic subplot starring himself in the lead role, but instead he hired washed-up European scream queens, strange Brits, and seemingly half-insane negro amateurs to appear in a somewhat enigmatic, fairly forlorn, and almost addictively melancholic movie that manages to find preternatural pulchritude in the death of the American dream and the rotting of the American middleclass. Undoubtedly, Gosling has always given me the impression that he is a nice and charming young man with a very well hidden dark and melancholic interior, which I believe is elegantly expressed in Loft River. While it seems somewhat improbable now since he has a half-Latino family to support, Gosling could probably evolve into a formidable auteur if he were to mostly give up on acting and dedicate most of his efforts to writing and directing. Like The Place Beyond the Pines (2012) meets Beyond the Black Rainbow (2010) meets a less phony Beasts of the Southern Wild (2012) for America’s declining white majority as directed by a closet cinephile that loves gorgeous guido Gothic horror like Bava’s Black Sunday (1960) and early Tim Burton flicks like Beetlejuice (1988) just as much as the greats of European arthouse like Bergman and Fassbinder, Gosling's debut deserves to be seen by anyone that loves and respects the artistic medium of film. Additionally, Lost River is probably the greatest and most deranged fantasy film to have ever been directed by a (lapsed) Mormon, which is certainly no small accomplishment considering some of the more bizarre beliefs that members of the religion hold.

LOST RIVER

-Ty E

TORCHED

Ryan Nicholson (2003)

Many of you in the extreme gore scene have heard of Ryan Nicholson before. He directed the straight-to-video film LIVE FEED and is releasing his new film GUTTERBALLS soon. His first film is actually a short rape/vengeance film which has garnered notoriety for its graphic depiction of genital torture. While there is nothing wrong with genital torture, I do have a problem with a lack of story, or acting even. Deanna is an unbelievably tattooed nurse who works at the local hospital. She gets raped while leaving her apartment and then later almost gets raped again. So she decides to extract the sperm and find out the identity of her rapist and see if it's the same one tied up in her living room. Rape revenge films don't need an award for an amazing yet gripping storyline but they at least entertain and have certain advantages over any other counterpart. In Torched, I see none. The effects are fucking amazing. The blowtorch to the testicles scene left me cringing and the stabbing of the penis with syringes made me want to be a woman. I wanted to love this film but I couldn't bring myself to lie to myself. The soundtrack is ridiculous. I guess Plotdigger expects you to feel horrible for someone getting raped while hardcore rap plays in the background. A song about fucking, nonetheless. The editing is shoddy and the camera work seems like the camera is taped to a board and carried around. Ryan Nicholson's entry in Rape revenge films adds nothing new to the dying genre except maybe a step up in gore and torture. Stick with the classics, kids. It's rare that you see a crying woman stumble into the shower only to emerge with her hair perfectly dry and untouched. This is another reason to see Torched. For the effects and the hilarity. People need to learn that putting Death Metal in a soundtrack kills whatever mood it has. Brain Damage Films in particular needs to take a hint from this. Torched is an amateur attack designed to make you grossed out but can't even find its way to the door. Only recommended for gorehounds.

-Maq

GUTTERBALLS
GUTTERBALLS

Ryan Nicholson (2008)

I have disliked the past two Ryan Nicholson films thanks to my own blend of harsh cynicism. For the love of the genre, I have even tried to force myself to appreciate his work but much to my dismay, I could not express gratitude for the creation of these films (Torched and Live Feed). With his newest film Gutterballs, all that is about to change. Gutterballs to me, is the perfect mixture of sustainable genres, creating a film that is as violent as it is hilarious. This film is a genius mix of vulgar comedy, brutal horror, and extreme sexual perversions and nudity. There is no doubt in my mind that this film would be rated X if it were to be submitted to the MPAA. It might even sicken the critics. Gutterballs features explicit sexual acts, prolonged scenes of rape, sexual torture, head explosions, bowling pin sodomies, and 70's Afro's. The lanes shine with an eerie neon glow and the disco ball & lights trigger cinematic luminescent intensity. The dialogue is even ripe with "Your mom" jokes.

The entire film is constructed around the setting of the Excalibur bowling alley. Inside this disco house is where some of the most bizarre and creative deaths will take place. Nicholson has really got his film making down pat and for this I am so glad. His father, Roy, even helps him with his film making. I think to myself "Damn...Ryan must have a cool dad". If my dad supported rape and carnage, well, I don't know what I'd do. Perhaps discuss the pros and cons of virility? The film features some of the most wonderful music that screams Donna Summers on meth. It's all funky classics and primary beats that really fit the era this film adapts to. This film making team's earlier effort called Live Feed was a disappointment to me. Without the tag of being a Hostel ripoff, the film still lacked a general direction and screamed with impoverished acting. The camera angles and lighting were shoddy at the most critical points and the characters were so damn annoying that I'd give life & limb for them to encounter incredibly horrifying demises. Much to my from-the-grave happiness, most of the douche bag's were eliminated. He improves upon every single flaw and delivers an amazingly entertaining film. I might even purchase this to own. Gutterballs is the perfect date film, provided that your woman is into gore and rape as a fantasy perversion. If that's the case, why bother watching this? The characters are all amazing, polished, vulgar, and stylish. I felt bad for hating the transvestite so much. It caused me to question whether I had gay hatred hidden under everything, but I realized promptly it was just the wimpy character. Steve is the typical jock with the popped collar and features perhaps the most vulgar mouth I have ever heard. I would almost promise you that he says "fuck" every sentence. Gutterballs is a screwed up film that excels at appearing cartoonish and wacky. While not being serious, It features enough audacity to surprise even the most jaded cinema-goer. Plotdigger films has suddenly been granted massive potential. While being a bit immature for a film, there in lies the whole point. From a lover of horror cinema, I honestly cannot see anything critically wrong with this film. Gutterballs is fun for the whole family. The non-existent kind, that is.

-mAQ

STAR VEHICLE
STAR VEHICLE

Ryan Nicholson (2010)

The last I had seen Canadian director Ryan Nicholson he had been bowling strikes with his grotesque neo-revival of some odd, extreme horror circuitry in Gutterballs. Skipping right on over Hanger, a film Nicholson directed previously, I tackled Star Vehicle without either a care in the world or a care for the synopsis. This led me down a sinister road pertaining to dismal line delivery and deadbeat violence. Star Vehicle is one of those strange occurrences in horror where the violence isn't amped up past 11 and the storyline fails to hold a candle to Tommy Wiseau's The Room. A significant problem with Star Vehicle is that its attempts to channel meta but transcends an homage and becomes redundant and completely blinded by the love of horror films. You could at least consider Star Vehicle a passionate film, albeit devoid of any talent that Nicholson had hinted at in his discotheque thriller Gutterballs.

Star Vehicle concerns the story of a one Don Cardini, a "movie driver" whose eventual outburst of psychopathy is as awkward as Dan Ellis' perm. Given the task of driving around the hot-to-trot cast and crew of a new horror film, Don woos scream queen obsession Riversa Red into reading his screenplay, making a jealous fool out of the director obviously styled after Nick Palumbo. What transpires are clumsy events igniting a homicidal rage that takes the lives of cast, crew, and co-workers. Now, for a film of this caliber you'd think the catalyst to such an outrageous display of produced on-screen effects would have been something of tangible evidence. The truth is farther than it seems, however, as everyone is a pawn in a game entitled as manipulation. For Nicholson to pull this stunt, to keep us guessing assuredly, isn't far past his previous films. Gutterballs pulled the same string but had the raunchy rape to accompany it and gallons of silly syrup to spill all over the alleys. Star Vehicle could be considered Nicholson holding back, restrained from achieving desired effect, if you will. Not once does the scale tip towards over-the-top; even during the bloody and degrading showdown. No doubt Cardini is an obsessive fan, we all have our obsessions. But the line is drawn once Nicholson's previous obsession with meta reaches outrageous proportions and dozens of slapstick references and winks towards the genre flurry out of the television set.

My main problem with Star Vehicle is the dead delivery of lines. The characters never exude the wit delivered with Nicholson's carefully crafted quips. The actors besmirch the attitude and suave posture that one would uphold in such a situation. Instead, we're given lines sneaking out from between gritted teeth. Another foul mediation of filmmaking that Nicholson needs to work on is the handling of his actors. Nicholson is a man of a good heart, this I can tell. This also plays a part in his perhaps all too passive role as director. Residential egoistical director Nick Palumbo wasn't afraid to push whores and men past their limits in the arguably excellent Murder-Set-Pieces. Neither was David Cronenberg when he smacked around Susan Petrie in order for her to simply "emote" on the set of Shivers. Quite frankly, if Nicholson ever hoped to blow by this cycling niche he is entrapped in, he must learn to push his actors to desired result instead of just shrugging mediocrity off. Unless of course he doesn't very much care about creating quality over the obligatory quantity. Star Vehicle is what must be an arbitrary detractor from the immediate continuation of the Gutterballs franchise. I bless the concept of originality but condemn the diseased rodent.

-mAQ

DOWN TO HELL
DOWN TO HELL

Ryûhei Kitamura (1997)

Down to Hell is Ryuhei Kitamura's first stab at film making. It also stands as the acting prequel to his hit cult film Versus, which was splendid for combining properties of Evil Dead with popular Capcom game Devil May Cry. Thanks to Kitamura's break out in Hollywood after his release of Midnight Meat Train and Godzilla: Final Wars, he seems to finally be moving on to complete his Versus sequel, which I am dreading. Down to Hell is a simplistic short film; one might even call it a student film without a second glance. The characters have no real name or background and the plot structure seems to rip off classic short story The Most Dangerous Game. These "punks" initiate a game in which a man they were hired(?) to kill is granted a 10 minute head start to start hiding. After this, the game begins, but with that Versus twist we all love. The dead become undead and the body count begins to pile up, but in a minuscule way thanks to the small cast. I'm not one to cherish a directors early work only cause I approve of his later directing efforts. In all reality of the phrase "fine film making", this early effort flat out sucks. Down to Hell is cheap and an amateur's work of "Art". Sam Raimi might be proud of this lacking effort, but I sure the hell am not. Down to Hell has a prehistoric version of the Casio music that makes Versus so energetic. I could find some way to appreciate it, but I'm reveling in the sheer "almost hatred" I have for this film. Down to Hell is ridiculous and a petty excuse for a horror film. It doesn't titillate, it doesn't excite, and it does not pass the time any easier. Just repeat to yourself. It's only a short film...It's only a short film....It is only a short film.

-mAQ

GODZILLA: FINAL WARS

Ryûhei Kitamura (2004) To bring him back once more to put a temporary seal on the series, the latest Japanese craze Ryûhei Kitamura is tackling the subject of Godzilla. In this melodramatic action film, we are treated to a Godzilla film with not so much Godzilla. Although this is an offense punishable by death, what we are given is a retarded feel-good Japanese film every little bit of a mix between his earlier works Versus and Alive with a dash of a monster bonanza. Godzilla: Final Wars could have been an easy production. Just make a souped-up Destroy All Monsters! with a bigger budget and bigger monsters. The roster wouldn't be so much a problem if they had included the popular and bad ass monsters, and by bad ass, I do not mean King Caesar. Why this creature became a licensed Toho creation is beyond me. It closely resembles a Fraggles on meth. This is a Godzilla film that officially "tries too hard". Whereas most Godzilla films feature that quick ten minutes of hating Godzilla, then relying on him, then hating him at the end, this film features a meaty plot about Mutants, Aliens, Body Snatchers, and Dragonball Z genomes. Might be a little too much for the average Gojira enthusiast but it fits nicely in a film that was never meant to be taken seriously in the first place. The last 30 or so minutes is when Godzilla makes his appearance and it is decidedly not as epic as imagined. He does the tail whip here and there and employs his Atomic Breath when needed but mostly sticks to Lizard boxing which befuddled me. In his most glorious moment, Toho decided to really insult the 1998 Godzilla film by having the real Godzilla pick up the tuna-eating monster and vaporize him in a bout of humility. Godzilla: Final Wars is pretty intense. It is a fine helping that I will allow to cap off this generation's Godzilla flow. It just seems tedious to watch the entire world become completely leveled in a matter of days only for civilization to be completely rebuilt several years later. Only time can tell when Japan's bogeyman will be awakened for his next world-saving mission. I just hope I'm around to see it.

-mAQ

THE MIDNIGHT MEAT TRAIN
THE MIDNIGHT MEAT TRAIN

Ryûhei Kitamura (2008) -Spoilers-

There was once a time when horror was something that was respected. Families would gather around the tube during Halloween, not to enjoy the festivities, but to indulge in the steamy rerun matter existing on televisions also known as horror movie marathons. Its a shame that it is but a mere shadow of what it used to be and no matter how many times I repeat this to myself, it will never get better. Horror is the most popular genre as of the 2000's and this is the worst thing to ever happen to it. I'd been following the trailer to this Clive Barker film for some time now. Maybe even around a year. I was monitoring my presentations during work when I caught the name Ryuhei Kitamura. Seeing this on a trailer in a small-town theater surprised the hell out of me. Had I been consuming some sort of food, I reckon I would have choked. Going back to the next set, I sat down in the darkened theater and saw two names sharing a story that oozed coolness on the big screen; Clive Barker & Ryuhei Kitamura. I had several volumes of the Books of Blood anthology and I can say that I'm very grateful that I never got around to reading them. After viewing the Midnight Meat Train, I allowed the experience to soak into my cerebrum. I accounted for every frame of violence and character progression. I wallowed in the stylish blood and the subterranean creatures. What I got was an ill-received film that borders a new-age genius. The screenplay has been altered to better suit a full length feature film. This adds depth, obsession, love, friendship, and an entire second-level advantage that allows the film to be something more of a shallow creepster film that only really functions to provide a small plot twist. Vinnie Jones leads the sadistic side of the film with a cold steeled face and posture that is eerily alike his murder weapon. Perhaps Kitamura planned for this murderous extension to go all the way. Bradley Cooper plays the surprising likable Leon. Leon is a man who questions the art world, much like I do. In exchange for human apathy, he is given the chance to become a renowned artist. After photographing someone last seen on a train, he becomes engrossed in a huge conspiracy lying under the tunnels of the grandest city in the world. Things switch up a bit as the main focus re-evaluates its choices and decides to shed light onto his girlfriends struggle with Leon's unhealthy obsession. Vinnie Jones cuts a swath through the nocturnal citizens of NYC which results in some brutal scenes of incredible violence. Everything about this film is really beautiful. The only thing that obnoxiously sticks out is the co-lead Leslie Bibb. She does the role great and I appreciate her enthusiasm to star in a horror film as nihilistic as this is, but her pretty face and curves negate the masculine effect and the metallic feel that this film carries on its shoulders. It's very heart breaking to hear about Midnight Meat Train's limited theatrical release and its immediate exposure onto DVD. This is the best big budget horror film to come out in a while. With promises such as Quaran- tine, The Uninvited, and The Haunting of Molly Hartley. Horror is now about preteen actresses and CGI ghosts. It's a sad time for fans like us. The Midnight Meat Train is an irreconcilably graphic force. This is the kind of horror that is made for theaters; stark colors, graphic violence, and a firm anti-hero. God, I love horror films.

-mAQ

TOKYO ZOMBIE
TOKYO ZOMBIE

Sakichi Satō (2005)

Tokyo Zombie is a film that should have worked, given the status quo of fans adoring the original and simple manga that seemed to worship everything bland about the myth of a zombie. With the openness of a low budget zombie film, using restrained effects and dollar store make up, this film should have walked into its own game at least well equipped and not relying on the marketing lines of "_____ of Ichi the Killer." This two step process consisting of genre butchery and title familiarity is a common game employed by most, if not all, current filmmakers. Now who would have known with the script writer of Ichi the Killer and the lead of Tadanobu Asano returning in a script coveting jujitsu gags and undead jokes would have spoiled so easy. Overexposure this is not, Tokyo Zombie never even had a chance. Tokyo Zombie suffers from a disease; a sickly one that causes rashes, blisters, uncontrollable hysteria, and bouts of manic-depressive film making at its most atrocious. The plot sounded simple enough. After seeing the one-sheet for this film, I soon lost hope for Tokyo Zombie. Color me homophobic but the poster makes it look like a straight up homosexual zombie film (This is no Bruce LaBruce project). The decadence of Tokyo is prescribed with a surreal touch as a man-made garbage mountain called Black Fuji offers free shelter for anything that needs to be buried, even secrets. From this, a chemical reaction causes bodies to unearth and roam the streets of Tokyo while two bumbling wanna-be jujitsu fighters fight their way, obviously, through zombie after zombie. Don't get too used to this straight forward plot device, soon all will be trashed in a vain attempt at contemporary Dystopian aristocracy in which you must fight or squeeze to make a living and what a living it isn't. Tokyo Zombie's flaws outweigh the brief, BRIEF, moments of humor. In several scenes, a muffled and dissipated chortle might escape from your vocal orifice but that is the most I got from Tokyo Zombie. The set design in the beginning is an awful cream color with no enthusiasm in scenery and the most vibrancy you will get from this film can be found in stills strategically spread across blogs as to hype up the "unhypeable." Let's face it, even the plot synopsis makes this film sound awful to the point of repelling. Anybody who is anybody knows that the best mixture of martial arts and zombies is the brief stint of Father McGruder in fan favorite Braindead. This alone promised to be mocking the mockery of death in cinema but the jokes were dusty and recycled from films back. Ads argue that this came before Shaun of the Dead which would mean this is an earlier example of the resolute stone being "zom-com." Yes, this may be true but at least Shaun of the Dead had the benefit of being entertaining and not as much of a waste of time as this piece of "kawaii" garbage that anyone with an Inyuasha shirt and cat ears will snatch up in some Pocky-fueled "Wapanese" rage. Tokyo Zombie plays out in three or more absurd chapters, each one wholly different than the last. First there is the "oddball buddy comedy" segment which is more or less a complete waste of life, dictated by me in the most incendiary way possible. Then we're "treated" to the alimonious slut coliseum portion that is nurtured by a story of a pyramid based aristocracy. All the while, you are being bludgeoned with tidbits of slipshod jujitsu/Russia stories. I am not amused and cannot stress the gaps cutting off Tokyo Zombie from my logic. I mean, has anyone really been far even as decided to use even go want do look more like? It seems this film was made as a vehicle for the movement of manga adaptations we've been seeing pop up recently; Detroit Metal City, Negative Happy Chainsaw Edge, and Tokyo Zombie. These are only ones I've viewed recently as I'm sure the list extends out farther than that. Point being, if you're a rabid Tadanobu Asano fan, avoid this as your suave Japanese counterpart in culture has been reduced to a "retarded" pathetic worm who cannot fight, cannot act, and cannot entertain. In essence, there's absolutely no reason to view Tokyo Zombie as long as you have at your disposal better zombie films and trust me, there are many.

-mAQ

MOTHER'S HEART
MOTHER'S HEART

Salvatore Samperi (1969)

While I have seen a variety of Brechtian sociopolitical arthouse films that I found to be quite aesthetically and intellectual intriguing, albeit at the same time tending to be emotionally vacant and mostly mundane mental masturbation, including Jean-Luc Godard's Weekend (1967) and The Niklashausen Journey (1970) co-directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Michael Fengler, none of these films have a soul as rich yet tragicomic as the criminally neglected Italian work Mother's Heart (1969) aka Cuore di mamma directed by relatively forgotten Goombah auteur Salvatore Samperi (Stormtroopers aka Sturmtruppen, The Corruption aka La bonne). A particularly pessimistic yet strangely passionate film centering around a mute Hightalian mother who watches seemingly helplessly and speechlessly as both her family and nation breakdown in an absurdist fashion via stereotyped political pathologies of both the far left and far right persuasion, Mother's Heart is an insanely idiosyncratic film that seems like it was co-scripted by Sicilian 'ultra-fascist' philosopher Julius Evola's more nihilistic brother and directed by a Ginny Wes Anderson were he more wanton and less of a pansy Philosemite. Featuring a suitably somber yet solacing musical score by none other than Italian maestro Ennio Morricone (The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, Days of Heaven) and starring the gorgeous Carla Gravina of The Antichrist (1974) aka L'anticristo, Mother's Heart is just as odd of a collection of Guido talent as it is an audaciously avant-garde arthouse work with no contemporaries. Centering around a divorced mother of three with fascist children (led by "Big Brother") who joins an anti-bourgeois terrorist cell and works at a blasphemous yet bookstore that recommends works by the Marquis de Sade to grade school kids, Mother's Heart sardonically shows what happens when a moratory, melancholy mommy who – aside from being far from a Mother Madonna-like figure, is certainly no Mary Magdalene either – gets involved with terrorism and class action warfare while nonchalantly watching her genocidal neo-fascist children come-of-age in a devitalized nation consumed with decadence and on the blatant brink of self-annihilation. Featuring child nudity and volatile, Tourette syndrome spiels coming from prepubescent mouths, as well as dubious situations between adults and children, Mother's Heart – for better or worse – is like nothing you have ever seen before, as the sort of film every kid would love to see, but that most adults would be at a loss to even begin to understand.

Depressed divorcee Lorenza Garrone (Carla Gravina) has some serious problems, but she is literally not saying a word as woman who may or may not be mute, but judging by the fact that people talk to her as if they are expecting her to respond, one can only assume that she has made the conscious decision to stop talking, even if her active vocalness could have easily prevented her pernicious eldest son from gassing his little sister, among countless other incidents of baneful behavior from the brazenly bad yet bright young buck. While her three children (the two oldest children being Gravina's real-life spawn) are indubitably geniuses with intellects that far surpass most adults, they choose some rather peculiar intellectual proclivities that include rocket science, bio-chemistry, Lombroso-inspired Positivist criminology, eugenics, tattooing, hardcore fascist politics, and chemical murder methods. During the beginning of Mother's Heart, we are introduced to the terrible threesome, but especially the eldest, a dark-haired lad named Massimo (Mauro Gravina) who holds down the beautiful babysitter Berta (Rina Franchetti) by force and tattoos a beautiful rose on her wild working-class derriere, which is depicted in an exceedingly aesthetically pleasing montage during the opening credits of the film. A little lad who always sports a nice and shiny Nazi army helmet, ultra-macho preteen Massimo – a "Big Brother" in every sense of the phrase – is undoubtedly the master of his domain and the undisputed "Duce" among his siblings, maid, and babysitter and despite seeming rather intelligent, he also seems to suffer from coprolalia, copropraxia, and coprographia, not to mention sadomasochistic and homicidal tendencies, but he manages to channel all of these 'character flaws' in his flagrant fight for fascism. After all, with a red-handed mother and an absent, albeit wealthy father, who else but macho and martial Massimo is fit to establish order at home. When Massimo notices his baby brother is not upholding the honor of his race and family, he bombards him with the followings slurs, "Enough is enough with this filth... Little wild pig, Negro of the Amazon, vile communist, cannibal, African!" The self-appointed gallant guru of his siblings, Massimo wastes no time telling his sister Anna (Monica Gravina) that, "a parasite is a Negro, living on the shoulders of others," when she asks him what a parasite is. The product of a divorce, Massimo clearly has to compensate for his ineffectual parents' lack of parenting skills and questionable morals. With a seemingly vapid and neglectful mother who can barely hold a job at a degenerate bookstore and who loves her sexy, Sapphic ex-sister-in-law more than her own children, it is only a matter of time before mini megalomaniac Massimo starts killing off his siblings in freak accidents of the stereotypically fascist kind.

Upon her first appearance in Mother's Heart, it is quite apparent that Lorenza Garrone does not seem to care about anything, especially when it comes to her children and their apparent sadism, because after her son tells her that, "the skin of the butt burns in no time at all. Like paper" after tattooing the babysitter's buttocks, she does not even acknowledge it and merely proceeds to mindlessly watch television with the other Enfants Terribles. As lady Lorenza learns whilst listening to a political minister on TV, "Over time everything works out... we Italians have faith in time... It's our great savior," but things prove to be quite the opposite for the mirthless mother of three. After seeing an intriguing young hippie bastard in a pink shirt one day while at work, languid Lorenza finally seems alive and 'in the moment' and wastes no time leaving her job without warning and following the funny fellow around town. Meanwhile, while her children are left by their lonesome, Lorenza's eldest son Massimo blows up the family cat in a failed rocket launch on the beach, but not before calling his baby brother an, "Ugly rampant pissing brat, shitter, disgusting incontinent, vicious, coprophiliac!" after the wee blond babe defecates in his favorite swastika-adorned nazi helmet. Losing the fellow in the pink shirt (who happens to be a pinko commie bastard whose terrorist cell the monotone mommy will soon join), Lorenza reverts back to her intrinsic imbecilic state and slavishly goes back to her work, where the quasi-Marxist manager (who stresses social class sensitivity) of the bookstore recommends the Marquis de Sade's classic lurid libertine novel Juſtine or the Misfortunes of Virtue (1791) to a mother for her 9-year-old child who is bedridden with mumps, which he describes as a 'tearjerker,' but the mother is called back home after hearing about the family cat dying in what her son Massimo eulogizes as being, "one who has died, sacrificed for the triumph of science. Struck down by secular idiocy and brutality." Lorenza's sassy ex-sister-in-law Magda Franti (Beba Loncar), who she is apparently carrying on a secret lesbian relationship with (for who knows how long), reveals a lot about the mute mother's character when she states to her, "When I met you, you were a spoiled child... Taking your shower with your shirt on, I bet. What idiocy! I refused. I began to reject everything starting at age 6. I hate it when they tell me what to do... But you, you stay standing there, you don't react, you let them guide you. First you were tamed by your father. Then the monster of perfection that is your husband – to watch him is to die from boredom. I'm his sister, but this does not prevent me from seeing him for what he is... You should pick up your life like I do... I say this just for you. You know I love you. Your life is so boring." Indeed, with increasingly troublesome tragedies brewing at home, including the death of her blond baby boy via dubious bathtub accident and later the death of her daughter Anna via gassing by Massimo, as well as repeated reprimands and her eventual firing from her job at the bookshop, Lorenza gets all the more involved with a super stereotypical, slogan and statistic spouting, communist terrorist group whose members state things like, "The bourgeoisie has no other pleasure than to degrade all." Ironically, a degraded bourgeois babe herself, Lorenza eventually decides it is time to payback her ex-husband by blowing up his prestigious pharmaceutical factory, thus consummating the physical and financial ruin of her entire family with a big bang.

MOTHER'S HEART

A sardonic, semiotic window into counter-culture chaos of late-1960s Italy (as well as the Occident in general), Mother's Heart is a titillating and terribly tragicomic work that uses a mute mommy as a charming and cute cipher for depicting sociopolitical abuse from both extremes of the political spectrum, but being set during the post-WWII era when fascism was already defeated, the film mainly focuses on the lunacy of the left and how such destructive politics are sired by nihilistic and impotent members of the upper-classes and especially the self-loathing members of bourgeois. Being a bored blonde babe of the less than blessed bourgeois sort, plagued protagonist Lorenza naturally becomes a mindless victim of neo-bolshevik banality of the bomb making and planting sort, thus Mother's Heart ultimately managed to foretell real-life terrorist cells like the Baader-Meinhof Group in West Germany, which was comprised mostly of middle-class college students who were facing increasing feelings of alienation from their families and the capitalistic, 'democratic' way of life. As her son Massimo tells her before blowing himself up in another attempt at launching a rocket for the glory and triumph of Italian national science, "You, Mom, haven't said anything, so you're my accomplice. Silence indicates consent. After all, you have profited on all these things that happened. Now you're free. You have your Magda, who is your love, but you can't have all the profits for free. If you do not want me to go tell the police it was you who killed your children, you must help me kill Magda, because Magda is corrupting you. She's a freak. I don't want you to become like her, degenerate and communist. But we'll talk again. We'll have time to talk about everything." Indeed, the boy, who acts as an exaggerated archetype for fascism as a nationalist extremist whose fascist fanaticism is stirred by an unquenchable desire to restore order in his family, which is symbolic of Italian nation itself, is right as his neglectful mother could have easily prevented her children's deaths had she been more responsible, but instead, gives into her lesbian decadence and, as a last resort due to her guilt as an "accomplice" of her son's fascism, pinko terrorism. When Massimo perishes, once again a result of his mother's pathological negligence, Lorenza is finally ready to completely throw away her reasonably plush personal life by becoming a full-time anti-Occidental terrorist and thus destroying her ex-husband's pharmaceutical empire, thereupon symbolizing via one dysfunctional family, the downfall of Italy as a whole. An allegory for Italy and Europa's decided degeneration as a result of cosmopolitanism and cultural Marxism, which has only gotten worse since the film's release with the flooding and colonization of the nation with illegal and mostly hostile aliens from the global South (which began in 1962), the formation of the anti-European "European Union," and the impending economic collapse, Mother's Heart, albeit somewhat dated, is ultimately a work that is more important today than when it was first released over four decades ago. With the rise of neo-fascist groups in the Mediterranean like Golden Dawn in Greece and CasaPound in Italy, one can only assume what the true sons of Europe have in store for Mother Europa if the continent experiences a highly probable collapse in the next decade or so.

-Ty E

ERNESTO
ERNESTO

Salvatore Samperi (1979)

While effeminate gay Jews aren't hard to find in cinema, especially in Hollywood, Italian films, especially of the melodramatically ironic sort, featuring homo Hebrews are not exactly common place, yet the Guido coming-of-age flick Ernesto (1979) directed by Salvatore Samperi (Malicious aka Malizia, The Corruption aka La bonne) was once regarded as one of the greatest fag-themed flicks ever made, but like most of the director's work, has fallen into relatively obscurity. Not unlike his fellow iconoclastic ginny auteur countryman Alberto Cavallone (Le salamandre, Zelda), controversial director Salvatore Samperi made a number of strikingly subversive and underrated works like Mother's Heart (1969) aka Cuore di mamma, Kill the Fatted Calf and Roast It (1970) aka Uccidete il vitello grasso e arrostitelo, Submission (1976) aka Scandalo, and a variety of other erotically aberrant arthouse flicks (as well as some less interesting wop 'sex comedies'), but is virtually totally unknown now, with Ernesto being arguably his most well known and critically revered work, even earning one of its stars, popular proletarian actor/director Michele Placido (an actor on the Italian TV series La Piovra), the Silver Bear for Best Actor at the 29th Berlin International Film Festival. Based on the 1953 (but not published until 1975, long after the author's death) unfinished autobiographical novel of the same name written by Italian Jew poet/novelist Umberto Saba, who rather ironically once wrote for a newspaper owned by Benito Mussolini but faced some persecution during the Second World War due to his stern refusal to convert to Catholicism, Ernesto tells the curious coming-of-age tale set in 1911 Trieste, Italy of a 17-year-old Jewish bastard named Ernesto of the quasi-commie persuasion who finds his sexual awakening in the form of a butch and buff yet tender stableboy with a leather-fag mustache who introduces him to, among other things, sodomy. Of course, all good things must cum to an end and socialist ideologist Ernesto, a social-climber like the goyish gentile father who left him a bastard before he was even born, inevitably realizes that marrying a rich and sexually androgynous debutante will be the best move he can make for his future, thus leaving the blue collar grease-ball hunk who took his anal virginity a sad victim of capitalist exploitation. Described by Canadian gay far-leftist agitator/film critic Thomas Waugh as follows, "as a sketch of the dynamics of a cross-generational and inter-class relationship and of the rites of gay initiation, Ernesto is masterful. It is also, if you look, a profound analysis of the politics of family and social control, and within the relationship, of the politics of role playing, bum fucking, and power. As if that were not enough, Samperi has provided a suggestive speculation on what the gay subculture must have been like in Mediterranean society eighty years ago," Ernesto is ultimately a satirical leftist critique of (kosher) capitalism disguised as a coming-of-age cock-sucker flick that reminds one why 'Italians do it better,' even in regard to cliché Marxist bullshit.

Ernešt (Bavarian actor Martin Halm) is a 17-year-old poser socialist of the cynical and self-satisfied sort who has just graduated high school and feels on top of the world as he struts around in a bitching bowler hat, watch chain, and dandy cane, but he is also totally sexually inexperienced and wants to wait until he is 18 to share carnal pleasure with a nice Italian girl. Aside from his loving mother (Virna Lisi), Ernešto is an object of contempt and scorn among his Jewish merchant family, especially his religious uncle Giovanni (Francisco Marsó) who has little hope for the boy because, after all, as he states himself, "he's the son of a man who became a Jew for money" (as history has proven, the situation is typically the reverse). Ernešto's uncle also has no problem telling his nephew that the first time he saw the boy's father, he thought "that goy is a bastard," thus expressing contempt for and a sense of superiority over gentiles, surely a rare occurrence in any film, be it gay or otherwise. Indeed, after Ernešto's mother got pregnant with him, her husband ran off, thus disgracing her and the family in the process and leaving a 1/2 goy black sheep to constantly remind them of this fact. Of course, Ernešto has zero tolerance for his Uncle's kosher contempt and reads the socialist publication "The Worker" in protest, even telling his family members, "I hope the socialists take over and hang you" during a Jewish ceremony. Not one to get his hands dirty as an effete member of the bourgeois (his aunt describes him as having a "socialist tongue with a capitalist stomach"), Ernešto takes a job as a clerk in a warehouse owned and run by a fellow Judaic named Signor Carlo Wilder (Turi Ferro) and ultimately takes his revenge on his family by passively allowing himself to be buggered by a low-wage worker simply named "The Man" (Michele Placido), who tells his partner-in-cocksucking-crime "Do you know what it is like to be a friend of a guy like me?" Indeed, turn-of-the-century Italy has serious sanctions against sodomy that even force a big businessman to commit suicide after he is caught with a young boy, so it does not take long for Ernešto to reconsider his future as a man who allows himself to be rectally probed by other men. After randomly paying a beautiful diva of a prostitute for a couple minutes of her time, Ernešto loses his heterosexual virginity and realizes he is more 'sexually versatile' than he once thought and reconsiders his options in terms of his sexuality and social prestige. An aspiring violinist, Ernešto ultimately quits his job (largely because he wants to get away from "The Man") and starts a little romance with a rather naive and sexually androgynous 15-year-old bourgeois boy from a family of considerable social prestige named Ilio (Lara Wendel), but it is ultimately the boy's feisty twin sister Rachele (also played by Lara Wendel) who the up-and-coming Jewish commie-turned-capitalist marries. As the "wedding will make up for her marriage," Ernešto complacently agrees to marry Rachele in respect to his mother, who ruined the family's reputation due to marrying a goy that left her with a bastard 1/2 Jewish son about two decades before. In the end, high Hebrew society and kosher capitalism trump genuine sensuality and individuality for the gay commie turned closest-cast capitalist Ernesto, a boy who once idealistically stated “prostitutes are the victims of a bourgeois society,” yet patronizingly penetrates one for a couple shekels.

ERNESTO

Compared to one of his absurdist avant-garde masterpieces like Mother's Heart (1969) aka Cuore di mamma, Ernesto is not exactly the most controversial Salvatore Samperi flick, though its unflattering depiction of the early twentieth century Italian Jewish bourgeois might lead some to think that Il Duce and Uncle Adolf were correct in their estimation of European Jewry and its exploitation of indigenous populations. Undoubtedly, Ernesto is a sensitively handled, if not equally sardonic, and culturally respectful period piece quite unlike the culturally mongrelized celluloid sort the perennial cosmopolitans of Hollywood churn out. A criminally underrated master of aberrant arthouse eroticism, Ernesto is certainly typical of Salvatore Samperi oeuvre, although the film clearly had a larger budget and was made palatable for a larger audience than some of his earlier works, even as a melodramatic Katzenfresser work that deals with Hebraic homosexuality. Featuring a mischling Marxist who has no problem calling his fellow Hebrews “shylocks” and being anally penetrated by proletarians poofs, Ernesto is a rare work with gay themes that will appeal to both the hopelessly politically incorrect libertines as well as anally retentive socialist sodomites like Thomas Waugh, which is no small achievement. As a man who is known for directing films about young boys who become obsessed with older and exhibitionistic women, Samperi was certainly not a ‘queer’ filmmaker, which was certainly to the benefit of Ernesto, a timeless coming-of-age flick that shows how a young man, as so many young men do, goes from being a rebellious idealist to a complacent social cuckold when reality penetrates him harder and deeper than any blue collar worker's blue-veined custard chucker could.

-Ty E

PRINCE

Sam de Jong (2015)

Long before the socio-cultural plague of political correctness and the active promotion of the genetically apocalyptic nightmare known as miscegenation, the 'tragic half-breed' used to be a somewhat common figure of cinema for obvious reasons as indicated by an eclectic assortment of cinematic works ranging from Alfred Hitchcock's Murder! (1930) to both John M. Stahl's 1934 version and Douglas Sirk's 1959 version of Imitation of Life to voodoo oriented B-movie horror trash like George Terwilliger's Ouanga (1936) aka Love Wanga to Raoul Walsh's Antebellum South mulatto melodrama Band of Angels (1957) to Rainer Werner Fassbinder's grotesquely bizarre Euro-western Whity (1971). After all, one does not need to see the scientific data to realize that the mongrel—an innately raceless and cultureless individual that can never truly belong to either of the races that they have descended from—oftentimes suffers from a socially, psychologically, and genetically schizophrenic existence where nothing seems quite right. When I recently learned about a new hip Dutch flick about a half-white/half-Arab teenage, I was naturally intrigued, even if I suspected it would feature phony multicultural-friendly sentiments about the singular intrinsic nobility of the ungodly human mutt. Indeed, Prins (2015) aka Prince directed by seemingly drug-addled first-time feature film director Sam de Jong (Magnesium, Marc Jacobs) was co-produced by the hipster leftist cultural parasites at Vice and a Dutch production company that is curiously named 100% Halal, yet somehow it does have some positive cinematic attributes, even if it does feature a truly vomit-worthy pro-miscegenation 'happy ending' that more or less destroys the entire film and makes me assume that the filmmaker is a completely compromised whore who would never dare to make any truly subversive (socio)political statement with one of his films. Directed by a filmmaker who describes his own work as being, "heavily influenced by present-day youth culture and studies the implications of growing up in the 21st century: in the face of our rapidly changing multi-ethnic society where pop culture is the new predominant religion," the film is clearly the production of a terribly deracinated and Hollywoodized Dutchman who, as a result of probably watching garbage ranging from TV shows like The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air to Hollywood garbage like Save the Last Dance (2001) while growing up in the Netherlands (notably, de Jong was only 28-years-old when he directed the film), believes the great corporate globalist and cultural Marxist lie that all races of people are exactly the same. Set in a government-subsided Amsterdam ghetto where the rotten fruits of so-called multiculturalism, the welfare state, and race-mixing are unintentionally unflatteringly exposed, Prince semi-stylishly depicts the patently pathetic life of a half-breed teenager with a lecherous white single mother and junky Moroccan hobo father who ostensibly 'falls in love' with a blonde beauty he barely knows and ultimately finds himself the victim of said blonde beauty's tattoo-covered boyfriend and his four-wheeler-riding multicultural 'gang,' among other seemingly petty problems that seem quite grand to a virginal momma's boy who wants to make a name for himself in an innately materialistic lumpenprole microcosm where a person's reputation is based solely on what clothes they wear and what car they drive.

PRINCE

Obviously influenced by the films of Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn, especially Drive (2011) and Only God Forgives (2013), and to a lesser extent Adam Wingard's The Guest (2014), de Jong's film has a sort of late-1980s/early-1990s neo-retro style and synthesizer-driven score (courtesy of Palmbomen aka 'Kai Hugo'), thereupon making it all the more of a grating experience that it features a bunch of super swarthy turd-skinned Arab boys with glaringly greasy mullets who practically slobber over an extra fair-skinned blonde babe whose genetics they would love to destroy with their caveman DNA. Featuring a cast comprised of mostly non-actors (notably, every single one of the Arab actors uses their real-life first name, as if it would be too hard for them to use a fake name for their characters) who seem to epitomize Amsterdam's new 'vibrant' post-racial (translation: uprooted, decultured, and mongrelized) society, Prince naturally features the sort of wholly imaginary and carefully sentimentalized depiction of how effeminate white bourgeois hipsters and leftists wish to think of multicultural lumpenprole neighborhoods. Of course, while every single Arab character is portrayed as a noble savage and/or victim of white racism, every single bully and villain (aside from a token buffer negro) is a heterosexual white male yet, to be fair, the film features a good portion of negative stereotypes that one typically associates with both Arabs and single mothers. For instance, none of the Arabs have jobs and they devote most of their time to destroying public property and committing petty crimes so that they can buy expensive designer clothing for the sole purpose of flaunting it around their friends. In that sense, both the Arab and white characters have the same morally and spiritually bankrupt Weltanschauung as the average young American negro, thus underscoring the totally deleterious effect that rap music has had on the West. Indeed, while the viewer is supposed to be highly sympathetic to the eponymous protagonist and his dubious plight, he is a gutter-level criminal and youthful low-life that is not beneath kicking his sister in the stomach and physically assaulting his mother. Yes, somehow the filmgoer is supposed to root for a small Middle Eastern mutt in his pursuit of procuring a tall blonde Dutch babe, as if cuckoldry is something the average viewer desires to experience. After all, the film's target audience is clearly not Arabs, who clearly have no use for synth-pop or genre-bending quasi-arthouse films, among other things. A stoner Bildungsroman about a hapless bastard that wants to become a virtual aristocrat in his culturally confused ghetto where dysgenic relationships seem to be the norm, Prince is like a marginally artsy fartsy Dutch Stand by Me (1986) for a decidedly doomed generation without values or spirituality that has been spoon-fed since birth on a steady diet feel-good racial nihilism and kosher culture-distorting. If de Jong had any intention with the film aside from directing his own feature and attempting to further cultivate his cinematic craft, it was to try to give hope to the completely hopeless, which might be somewhat admirable if it were not a film about a Moroccan mongrel who is unwittingly committed to speeding up the racial apocalypse in the Netherlands.

Like most half-caste people in the West, 17-year-old Prince protagonist Ayoub (Ayoub Elasri) has a government-subsidized white single mother and a dead-beat foreign father who spends most of his time loitering and mumbling about pointless bullshit. Not surprisingly, Ayoub's sister Demi (Olivia Lonsdale)—a considerably less swarthy girl who looks like she has Latin blood—has a different father, thus confirming that the protagonist's mother has particularly poor taste in men. Unfortunately for Ayoub and Demi, their mother is so poor that they have to share a bedroom. Despite the fact they are clearly living on the government's dime as residents of a sterile looking Amsterdam housing project where all the apartment buildings seem like they were modeled after the ghettos of some Eastern European ex-communist shithole, Ayoub and his friends love spending their free time destroying government property, with blowing up mailboxes seeming to be their favorite pastime. The boys also enjoy incessantly collectively chewing on sunflower seeds, which is apparently a common custom among their Arab ancestors from the Moroccan motherland. Aside from his two mullet-sporting Arabs friends, Oussama (Oussama Addi) and Achraf (Achraf Meziani), Ayoub has a white best friend named Franky (Jorik Scholten), who looks like a young Robert Görl of the German electropunk/Neue Deutsche Welle band Deutsch Amerikanische Freundschaft (D.A.F.) and whose boorish philistine big brother Ronnie (played by non-actor Peter Douma, who was apparently a real-life bully that de Jong went to school with) is the leader of a local European-negro multicultural 'gang.' Ronnie is the typical dumb low IQ bully and he likes insulting Ayoub because of his mongrel blood and saying things to him like, "Pancake. Dog's face. Son of a whore. Half-blood. Goddamn it." Of course, Ayoub is a literal "son of a whore" and "half-blood," so the insults naturally hurt but they also reaffirm the protagonist's desire to get serious and making something of himself. Indeed, at the beginning of the film after Ronnie insults him, Ayoub declares to his comrades, "Our time will come." Unfortunately for him, at least at the beginning of the film, Ayoub believes that he is in love with a blonde babe that he does not even know named Laura (Sigrid ten Napel) who is the girlfriend of a tyrannical tattoo-covered degenerate named Vince that belongs to Ronnie's gang. Needless to say, trouble comes Ayoub's way when he begins hitting on Laura.

During the beginning of the film, Ayoub makes his sister Demi promise that she does not "become like mom" and she in turn makes him promise that he does not become like his deadbeat dope-addled dad. While his mother is a melancholic dipsomaniac with two bastard kids of varying racial pedigree who have different father, Ayoub's dad is an even bigger loser as he is a discernibly dirty Moroccan junky bum with greasy long black curls who resembles a sort of perennially stoned gothic Latino cowboy. Rather pathetically, the protagonist regularly visits his father at the bottom of an empty blue swimming pool where he gives him money so that he can buy junk to shoot into his arm. At one point, Ayoub's father gives him a wrinkled old black-and-white postcard and inexplicably states, "Whistler," though he is an Indian-giver of sorts and later asks his son to give him back the seemingly worthless object. Naturally, like any child, Ayoub loves his father, but cannot emotionally deal with the fact that he is a heroin-addled hobo whose arms are covered in grotesque track marks. When Ayoub asks his mother what is wrong with his father, she acts somewhat evasive and describes him as a "little bird." At one point in the film, Ayoub's father gets so high that he starts laughing manically while grabbing all over his son to the point where the protagonist becomes so petrified that he flees from his padre and subsequently projectile vomits. Literally right after Ayoub vomits, a local 'crime boss' named Kalpa (Dutch rapper Freddy Tratlhner) pulls up in a shiny purple Lamborghini and throws the protagonist an energy drink and states, "Come and see me soon. It's been too long." Notably, this scene is stylized in a sort of ominous neo-Expressionist fashion, as Kalpa's face is completely hidden behind the tinted window of his Lamborghini in a scenario that strangely reminded me of the sinister black-swathed coach that takes Thomas Hutter to Count Orlok's castle in F.W. Murnau's masterpiece Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922). Indeed, at this point in the film, especially in regard to the scenes featuring Kalpa, Prince becomes increasingly more Magical Realist oriented, which is of course a long tradition of Lowland cinema.

PRINCE

When Ayoub dares to attempt to talk to his would-be-ladylove Laura, she predictably tells her jealous boyfriend, so Ronnie and Vince decide to teach the protagonist a simple lesson. Indeed, after Ronnie pours a drink over Ayoub's head, Vince spits in the protagonist's face. Being a small and scrawny half-caste towelhead that does not look like he has even reached puberty, Ayoub does not even bother to attempt to fight back. To make matters worse, Ayoub's best friend Franky begins dating his beloved half-sister Demi. Feeling quite betrayed and jealous over the fact that his best friend and sister now have a fairly intimate relationship, Ayoub pathetically runs up to Franky, punches him in the nose, and then runs away. On top of that, Ayoub starts an argument with Demi that leads to him kicking her in the stomach and pushing their mother on the ground in a scene that more than clearly demonstrates that the protagonist will probably grow up to be a wife-beater just like his Islamic paternal ancestors. In revenge for punching his brother Franky and ultimately breaking his nose, Ronnie and his friends, including a big burly buffer negro that seems to lack the capacity to speak, take turns punching Ayoub to the point where his face is left bloody and bruised. Of course, seeing Ayoub take such a brutal gang beating rather upsets stereotypical feminine angelic beauty Laura, whose brutish boyfriend Vince smacks her around when she gets out of line and attempts to stop the interracial beating. After being betrayed by both his friends and family, Ayoub naturally feels lost and, with nowhere to turn, he seeks sanctuary in crazed cracker wigger criminal Kalpa, who ultimately attempts to get him to 'embrace' the dark side and become an underling in his small operation.

Somewhat curiously, when Ayoub first goes to see Kalpa—a stereotypical tall blond Dutchman, albeit of the particularly deranged and demented sort—the career criminal gives him an energy drink and a pair of fairly vulgar looking but quite expensive blue Giuseppe Zanotti designer shoes (how Kalpa knows the protagonist's shoe size in advance is anyone's guess). Kalpa is a sort of 'Aryan Fagin' and he is determined to lure Ayoub into his criminal operation with stupid gifts that appeal to image-obsessed teenagers like the protagonist whose social status is based solely on what shiny clothing and jewelry they wear. After telling Ayoub to put on his new Zanotti kicks, Kalpa opens a door in his house and reveals that he has a fully functioning butcher shop inside, including a giant pig that he proceeds to borderline sensual taunt, as if he gets a sexual kick out of torturing living things. As if to make a bizarre point to the protagonist about his power and to test his stomach, Kalpa then proceeds to gleefully slaughter the giant live pig in front of Ayoub. While all this is going on, Kalpa's sidekick, a short and pedomorphic chap named Rudy, is smirking while grinding meat in a meat grinder. Apparently, as Ayoub's friends tell him at the beginning of the film, when Rudy began working for him, Kalpa began fucking his mother as a means to debase him and put him in his place. Before working for Kalpa, Rudy had a long blond ponytail and wore 'wigger chic' gangster style clothing, but now he has short dark slicked back hair and sports tight-fitting all-black clothing and strange jewelry, as if he is some sort of goth chic gangster who has fully embraced the darker side of criminality of materialism. On top of everything else, Rudy is curiously missing most of the fingers on one of his hands, as if he got it stuck caught in a meat grinder (or Kalpa intentionally put it in said meat grinder as some form of punishment). In short, Kalpa—a man that drives a Lamborghini and only owns that latest in expensive top designer goods by companies like Gucci, Valentino, and Rolex—quite literally epitomizes the evils of excess and material insatiability and he wants Ayoub to also adopt these vices so that he will become his virtual slave, hence why he gave them the Zanotti shoes and energy drinks. Initially, Kalpa's attempt to lure Ayoub to the dark side works quite well, as the protagonist walks around his neighborhood with his new Zanotti shoes like he owns the place and even treats his friends like they are pathetic plebs for not owning such cool kicks. For his first 'job' assignment, Kalpa has Ayoub drive a moped while Rudy rides on the back and hits a negro in the back of the head with a pipe so that they can steal his metal briefcase. For his efforts, Kalpa gives Ayoub a couple hundred Euros.

PRINCE

After getting beat up by Ronnie and his gang and then watching his dad shoot up heroin and collapse, Ayoub becomes extremely upset and literally runs to Kalpa's pad for support where he is easily coerced into snorting a couple lines of cocaine and where the sadistic criminal ceremoniously places a golden crown on his head, hence the title of the film (in fact, in between snorting coke, Rudy declares that Ayoub is a "Prince"). Needless to say, it seems like a dream come true when Kalpa lets Ayoub drive his Lamborghini while he is high on cocaine, as it gives the protagonist the adrenaline rush of a lifetime. Unfortunately, while in the Lamborghini, Ayoub gets a call from his mother and learns that his father has just died of a heroin overdose (of course, Ayoub more or less witnessed said overdose and probably could have saved his father's life had he called for help, but instead he decided to runaway like a scared little girl). When Kalpa repeatedly asks Ayoub in a creepy fashion "Who hurt you?" in regard to the black eye he has received from the gang beating and he tells him what happened, the sadistic criminal demands that the protagonist drive to where Ronnie's motley crew are hanging out so that they can teach them a valuable lesson. Indeed, after getting out of the Lamborghini upon arriving at their desired destination, Kalpa whips out two handguns, begins firing them in an indiscriminate fashion, and then demands that Ronnie and his thug pals get on the ground and begin licking the pavement while meowing like cats. While Rudy seem to delight in seeing Ronnie and his friends being debased by sadist Kalpa, Ayoub seems to be somewhat disturbed by how much his new friends are enjoying torturing other people. Of course, when Kalpa hands Ayoub one of his pistols and demands that he shoot Ronnie, the protagonist gets afraid, especially after he sees a vision of his father hovering over the gang leader. Somewhat absurdly, Ayoub decides to shoot Kalpa in the hand so that he drops his gun instead of Ronnie. Ultimately, Ayoub lets Ronnie and his friends go and then scares away Kalpa with his gun.

Rather ridiculously, Ayoub's father long overdue death comes as a sort of blessing in disguise, as it causes everyone to feel sorry to him to the point where they want to be in his life again. Indeed, not only does Ronnie and Franky makeup with Ayoub, but Laura also decides to be his girlfriend. Indeed, apparently Laura's father was also a "little bird" (aka self-destructive junky dead-beat) and somehow this unfortunate commonality with the protagonist makes her develop romantic feelings for him (of course, in reality, women are attracted to strength and not weakness, but Laura is probably damaged goods and, like the protagonist's mother, has poor taste in men). Additionally, Ayoub learns to accept that Franky loves his sister and the two best friends decide to let bygones be bygones and proceed to act as if their friendship did not have a temporary detour. Rather inexplicably, unhinged sadist Kalpa does not opt to seek revenge against Ayoub for betraying him and shooting him in the hand, even though he is a ruthless psychopath that enjoys personally slaughtering animals and torturing animals. Somewhat ironically, despite the fact that he hates being a half-breed, Ayoub never seems to consider that, if he gets with a chick like Laura and procreates with her, he will be perpetuating the same vicious circle of racially schizophrenic dysgenic misery that his mother bequeathed onto him when she senselessly opted to reproduce with a Moroccan junky deadbeat, but I digress. After all, clearly director de Jong wanted to make a film where style and sentimentality trumps sanity and sensibility.

Unquestionably an almost redundantly simple underdog tale where supposed good triumphs over supposed evil and 'love' (or at least the multicultural fairytale version of it) conquers all in the end, Prince is just too plain juvenile, thematically superficial, and sentimental for me to believe that auteur Sam de Jong—a considerably goofy looking and seemingly sinfully stupid fellow that comes off as a perennially giggling pothead philistine in an interview he did with Vice—is a malicious covert cinematic propagandist who like, say, loyal shabbos goy Quentin Tarantino or gargole-esque Judaic culture-distorter J.J. Abrams, wants to actively promote the destruction of the Occident and outbreeding of Europeans, yet his debut feature still manages to promote those anti-values all the same. After all, the culturally bankrupt 'bobos' (aka bourgeois bohemians) and abersexual hipsters at Vice would not produce such a film if it was anything less, as ethno-masochism and xenophilia just come with a territory when it comes to that would-be-wild bunch. Of course, with the recent New Year's Eve rape and sexual assault epidemic in Germany as committed by Arabs (notably, 25 out of 30 of the suspects were from Algeria and Morocco), de Jong's film seems like a bad joke as directed by a hopelessly naïve and deracinated Dutchman who has never stopped to think of the true validity of the absurd multicultural fantasy that all races are exactly the same and have the same views on sex, love, and romance. What makes the film all the more absurd is that the teenage towelhead protagonist shows literally nil overt sexual infatuation with his love interest, as if he is a little boy whose balls have not dropped and lacks the thirst for pussy, when in reality a good percentage of the Arab rapists that have turned formerly relatively crime-free Sweden into the rape capital of the West are usually around the same age as the protagonist. In short, Arabs are not exactly known for being chivalrous hopeless romantics. Of course, one cannot deny that it takes a special sort of cuckold auteur to make his cinematic debut with a film where an Arab boy who physically assaults his own mother and sister is depicted as a righteous protagonist who deserves a nice blonde Aryan girl. To de Jong's credit, he is not quite as shameful as fellow Dutch filmmaker Martin Koolhoven, who started out his filmmaking career in a quite promising fashion with the darkly surreal arthouse drama AmnesiA (2001), yet went on to completely sell his soul and make singularly moronic pro-miscegenation rom-coms like Het schnitzelparadijs (2005) aka Schnitzel Paradise where an inordinately sophisticated Moroccan uses his third world charms to woo a blonde babe. Naturally, one also cannot forget the assassination of Theo van Gogh by a Moroccan pothead who lived on government welfare in an Amsterdam ghetto not unlike the one depicted in Prince. Although he was brutally murdered in 2004 before things got really bad with Muslims in Europe, van Gogh prophetically demonstrated with his mini-series Najib en Julia (2003) and film Cool! (2004) that both multiculturalism and interracial romances are doomed to catastrophic tragedy for all parties involved.

PRINCE

As Prince unwittingly demonstrates, third world people make third world communities and no amount of Western comforts or neo-liberal public school brainwashing is going to change that as second and third generation Arabs in Western Europe have clearly demonstrated. In its depiction of a seeming semi-artistic loser protagonist with a unintentionally goofy personality, cast of curious characters that sport outmoded 1980s and 1990s clothing and haircuts, and somewhat contrived pathological quirkiness, Prince is like a non-comedic Dutch-Arab Napoleon Dynamite (2004) as directed by a dopey dork that wanted to make Drive but lacked the maturity and testicular fortitude, among other things. Undoubtedly, director de Jong has some talent as a filmmaker, especially where visuals are concerned, thus making it seem all the more of an artistic sin that he would figuratively bend over and take it in the ass from the deluded devils of political correctness. After all, if there is anything that all the great filmmakers of Dutch cinema have in common, it is that they were almost always subversive and proudly politically incorrect as the cinematic works of Adriaan Ditvoorst, Frans Zwartjes, Alex van Warmerdam, Jos Stelling, and even Paul Verhoeven clearly demonstrates. Of course, tragic Dutch auteur Ditvoorst included an Asiatic junky with a white girlfriend in his magnum opus/swan song De witte waan (1984) aka White Madness, but that does not mean he actively promoted miscegenation like de Jong (in fact, Ditvoorst's film depicts a sort of pre-apocalyptic world and such a relationship can clearly be seen as a sign of a society that is on the brink of complete capitulation). Additionally, Dutch auteur Lodewijk Crijns has directed various commercial multiculturalism oriented comedies like Jezus is een Palestijn (1999) aka Jesus is a Palestinian and Alleen maar nette mensen (2012) aka Only Decent People, yet these are exceedingly incendiary and iconoclastic films that make South Park seem like Sesame Street.

Of course, Prince—a film that attempts to humanize the inhumane—is a cinematic work that ultimately demonstrates that you cannot polish a turd, let alone multiple turds, as a delusional flick that attempts to bring sappy sentimentalism to a multicultural ghetto. Indeed, the viewer is somehow expected to sympathize with delinquent noble neo-savages who engage in crime, assault women, blow up public property, and contribute to the overall deterioration of the Netherlands by turning it into a third world hellhole. In the age of taharrush gamea where even leftists and liberals are beginning to realize that multiculturalism is an abject failure and that so-called 'migrants' are actually parasitic hostile invaders who seek to destroy the Occident and plan to accomplish what their ancestors had been trying for well over a thousand years, the film almost seems like a sick joke at the expense of the viewer's intelligence. As the bastard brood of an irresponsible and idiotic white Christian European mother who presumably forgot to wear a condom and a Moroccan Muslim father who would not even be in the Netherlands were it not for the fact that West European politicians are bought whores who are doing the bidding of their globalist masters and rely on the untermensch vote to win elections, the titular protagonist of Prince can be seen as the contemporary equivalent of the 'tragic half-breed,' thus making it all the more absurd that the film concludes with the character starting a romance with a blonde and very potentially spreading his genetic curse by getting her pregnant. As far as I am concerned, the only chance de Jong ever has of becoming a formidable auteur with an original vision is if he has a lengthy stay at a special reeducation camp, but maybe I am being a little bit too optimistic.

-Ty E

JARHEAD
JARHEAD

Sam Mendes* (2005) Jarhead is another war film about a young man reaching true manhood and masculinity through the rite of military passage. This convention is used in so many war films that the film felt like nothing new. Jarhead was just a contemporary and polished version of the same story told in a slightly different way. The film was directed by Sam Mendes known for the highly overrated and banal American Beauty. Another soulless existentialist film set in suburbia. American Beauty was tooted around as a artistic "Masterpiece" to somehow give Hollywood artistic credibility.

Jarhead, although taking place during the first war in the Persian gulf, seems like a response to the disastrous and failure war in Iraq. I learned as much from Jarhead about war as I would from watching Fox news. The film would be ideal for screening after a drunken super bowl party. Jake Gyllenhaal almost makes Jarhead appealing to high school girls. The presentation of soldiers in Jarhead is embarrassing. Contrived idiocy, cuss words (fuck was used 278 times), and male bonding are nothing new in the American war film. The so-called antiwar Vietnam films did all these things better twenty and thirty years ago. But of course, these overused conventions made for a generous monetary investment. Too bad poor director Sam Mendes didn't get the critical ravings he did with his earlier films. I guess Jarhead was too hollow of a film this time. Jarhead has also reinforced my belief in that there is no such thing as a Hollywood antiwar film. Like all the other antiwar films, it entertains audiences with excitement and action. Its dramatic scenes are laughable at best and leave the viewer feeling embarrassing after watching them. Hollywood really never was able to execute drama appropriately. After reading articles comparing the novel version of Jarhead and the film and I wasn't surprised. Of course the film is going to leave the significance of the novel out. Meaning isn't important when your trying to make a buck. At least Stanley Kubrick was able to make his book adaptations interesting and well executed. Jarhead felt like a weak shell rip off of Kubrick's Full Metal Jacket. I still haven't figured out whether this was Sam Mendes intention or not. Mendes is another one of the perfection filmmakers that model everything they do after Stanley Kubrick. Unsurprisingly, none of these directors come even close to matching Kubrick's eye for constructed perfection and artisan craftsmanship. Kubrick never put his soul on celluloid and neither would any of these up and coming hacks. I can foresee a series of films similar to Jarhead in the upcoming years. Hollywood will obviously take the failure of the United States in Iraqi and capitalize on it. Eventually one of these will be hailed as a undisputable masterpiece capturing the essence of tragedy and suffering in war. Underpaid War veterans will shelve out their hard earned cash to see it while the film producers sit at their mansion and count their wads of cash.

-Ty E

AWAY WE GO

Sam Mendes* (2009)

In the liberal-petit-bourgeois “feel good”(but of course sometimes unhappy) film Away We Go, a 30ish year old white (only in skin, not in soul) male figures out he is going to be a father whilst eating out his Negress girlfriend. This scene happens to be the opening scene of the film and it also sets the feeling for everything that goes on there afterward. What I mean by setting the “feeling” is that the hipster (of course sporting an ironic army jacket) “white” guy is completely dominated by his sista girlfriend. The Negress proves her dominance merely by complaining while the male (in a subservient sexual position) performs cunnilingus on his ungrateful girlfriend.

Away We Go is your typical release from Focus Features, a mainstream (part of NBC) “Independent” film studio. The difference between the films released by Michael Bay and Focus Features is that the films released by the latter are apparently supposed to be artistic. Focus Features idea of art must be ugly people, flat aesthetics, and cultural Marxist (AKA “progressive”) ideals. The “male” lead in Away We Go is no doubt the “ideal” man in our “progressive” contemporary socio-political world. After all, he is introduced to the film as a castrated “male”, unable to assert himself (inside his girlfriend’s vagina), he settles for satisfying his complaining woman by licking her meat curtain (a true tribute to the gender politics of the iron curtain). Don’t get me wrong, it is ok to return certain types of sexual favors, but the “man” in Away We Go certainly seems more interested in pleasuring his “woman” as if he were her lesbian lover.

This guy’s ancestors were Berserkers?!?

“Progressive” film studios like Focus Features are often pushing collectivist cultural Marxist ideas on to the “educated” classes of America and pretend its “revolutionary.” Mainstream “Gay” culture, “unconventional” (aka degenerate) families, multicultural nihilism, internationalism, and anti-individualism are just some of the new “values” being pushed by films that for the most part have absolutely nothing to offer in the way of cinematic innovation. If a man has been dominated by a woman sexually, does that make the film groundbreaking? Wasn’t commie Guido Bernardo Bertolluci already doing sexually deranged/Marxist cinema like this almost over half a century ago? At least Bertolluci actually knew how to do it artistically. What white man would ever eat out a black woman? I bet Bertolluci would.

The scene of cunnilingus in Away We Go is easily the most “powerful” scene in the whole movie and I do not say that as a compliment. I say that in that I was completely disgusted by the scene and it is evidence that even upper middleclass America has been completely desensitized by and succumbed to degeneracy. The mulatto child born through miscegenation practiced by the couple in Away We Go is best representative of the global degeneracy being pushed by studios like Focus Features. A world without roots, without culture, without gender, without race, and without tradition. Away We Go indeed, into our own self-prophesizing apocalypse.

AWAY WE GO

-Ty E

STRAW DOGS

Sam Peckinpah (1971)

While I would not call myself a connoisseur since I have, quite regrettably, only seen a small fraction of the films in his apparently somewhat uneven oeuvre, I have much respect for true western auteur Sam Peckinpah (The Wild Bunch, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia) simply on the basis of the fact that he was a rare macho and rampantly heterosexual Hollywood filmmaker that, as both a man and an artist, made John Ford, Howard Hawks, and Clint Eastwood seem like prosaic pussies by comparison. In fact, I consider Peckinpah to be one of the few filmmakers in Hollywood history that represented the real America as a genuinely fierce fellow that was descended from western frontiersmen and not some semi-Asiatic momma's boy whose ancestors hailed from an Eastern Europe ghetto like so many of the filmmakers and producers in Tinseltown. Indeed, Peckinpah may have been one of those countless moronic white Americans who made fanciful claims of imagined injun blood and described himself as a "liberal democrat," but his film unequivocally gush a sort of visceral and unadulterated masculinity that is totally absent from virtually all forms of cinema nowadays. Certainly, if the film world has ever had an Ambrose Bierce, it was most certainly Peckinpah as a sort of ruthless and bitter warrior-poet who was largely molded as both a man and artist as a result of his wartime experiences. When Hebraic intellectual and TV host Clifton Fadiman stated of the sardonic writer, "Bierce was never a great writer. He has painful faults of vulgarity and cheapness of imagination. But... his style, for one thing, will preserve him; and the purity of his misanthropy, too, will help to keep him alive," he might as well have been talking about Peckinpah, who may have been no Bergman but confirmed his place in cinema history with the unmistakably sincere hatred, contempt, and cynicism for humanity that he captured on celluloid. While I tend to prefer Peckinpah's more flawed works like his wickedly wayward Wehrmacht flick Cross of Iron (1977), which the auteur notably turned down future blockbusters like King Kong (1976) and Superman (1978) to direct, I have to agree with most people in saying that Straw Dogs (1971) is one of his best, if not his best, film, though I suspect I like it for somewhat different reasons than most people, at least thematically speaking. The oftentimes much maligned story of an exceedingly unlikable, pretentious, arrogant, and pathologically passive-aggressive American mathematician of the small, short, swarthy, and physically weak sort who relocates to the backward rural hometown of his English wife and who is ultimately forced to fight to the death for his and his less than beloved spouse's life as a result of tensions he largely provoked due to his pompous and passive-aggressive dealings with a motley crew of construction workers that he hired to work on his garage, Peckinpah's wonderfully morbid masterpiece is a film that not surprisingly upset countless left-wing film critics upon its release because it revealed that even smug NYC intellectual types have a capacity for unhinged ultra-violence and bloodthirsty murder. Indeed, if you have ever wondered how some of the biggest mass murderers of the twentieth-century were weak and frail Jewish intellectuals like Leon Trotsky, Straw Dogs certainly gives some hints, even if that was not Peckinpah's intention, as a truly shocking cinematic work that reveals that puny passive pushovers oftentimes have an uncontrollable fury of seething rage and hatred hidden beneath their pathetic exteriors as a result of having no outlet for all the hatred and aggression that has built up inside of them after a lifetime of cowardice in the face of hostility.

STRAW DOGS

Not unlike Stanley Kubrick with 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) and A Clockwork Orange (1971), Peckinpah was heavily influenced by Robert Ardrey's classic paleoanthropological texts African Genesis (1961) and The Territorial Imperative (1966) while making Straw Dogs, which was somewhat loosely adapted from the novel The Siege of Trencher's Farm by Gordon M. Williams and copenned by Jewish screenwriter David Zelag Goodman (Logan's Run, Eyes of Laura Mars). Notably, both Peckinpah and Goodman loathed the source novel, which is quite fitting since novelist Williams hated the film because he felt it did not even vaguely resemble his book. While probably not Peckinpah's conscious intent, Straw Dogs is, in a somewhat esoteric way, ultimately the tale of a pompous Hebraic intellectual who has nothing but contempt for his blonde Aryan wife and is ultimately forced to fight his natural born enemies, a gang of Aryan proles, as a seemingly subconscious result of both neglecting his spouse and treating the Aryan proles like worthless subhuman garbage that are not even fit enough to shine his shoes. Quite infamous for a scene where the female lead is raped by an ex-boyfriend and comes to enjoy it so much that she actually cums in ecstasy, the film also depicts what can happen when a horny woman that is constantly surrounded by masculine and virile men is both sexually and emotionally neglected by her ugly and physically weak pint-sized hubby. Indeed, Straw Dogs depicts in a refreshingly crude, raw, and atavistic way that women have strong sexual needs, including being occasionally violently manhandled by mensch with a mighty sexual prowess who knows what he is doing. A piece of classic Peckinpah in its darkly ironical depiction of an ostensible protagonist that is actually both the villain and the central source of all the problems that plague most of the characters, especially the female lead, the film undoubtedly features Dustin Hoffman in the perfect role as a distinctly unlikable Hebraic intellectual that you could imagine espousing the anti-gospel of Marx were he not an aggressively antisocial math dork. Indeed, Straw Dogs—a work that can be accurately simultaneously described as a rape and revenge flick, British Wild Bunch, and West Country western (as it was described in the doc Mantrap Straw Dogs: The Final Cut (2003))—is, in a sick sort of way, kind of like a fantasy film for physically weak and effeminate Jewish intellectual types like Woody Allen due to its depiction of a beady-eyed Über-dildo discovering that he makes for a deadlier man than a gang of strong and aggressive hicks that work hard with their hands and fuck hard with their cocks.

David Sumner (Dustin Hoffman) may have an unmistakable British surname but he is undoubtedly the archetypal American Judaic intellectual type and thus it can only end badly when he relocates to a small town in a remote part of Cornwall, England where the locals do not take too kindly to arrogant anally retentive yank nerds who looks down on them because they do not have the luxury of working a job that involves a lot of typing, reading, and abstract paper-shuffling. Somewhat curiously considering his seeming disdain for his spouse's lowly lumpenprole origins, the place that David moves to is the hometown of his wife Amy (Susan George of Richard Fleischer's Mandingo (1975)) who, unlike the protagonist, is 'off the people' and has no problem getting along with the locals, as she grew up with them. In fact, Amy seems to be more comfortable around the local yokels than her own husband, thus hinting early on in the film that they should have never gotten married in the first place. Leaving his job at the university under the questionable pretense of receiving a research grant, David's main motivation for moving to the hillbilly Brit town for the next year is because he is terribly afraid of the race riots that are going on at his college campus and various other places in the United States, thus underscoring the fact that he is a pathetic coward who would rather runaway from a fight than face his problems head on, so it is only perversely ironic that he will be forced to literally fight for his life against five rough and tough working men that could probably effortlessly beat him to death in a fair one-on-one fight. At the very beginning of the film, virtually all of the principal characters are introduced in a scenario where David's manhood is almost instantly comprised in a fairly glaring way. On top of the fact that David looks like a complete and utter pansy while carrying a box of groceries and prancing around like an autistic dolt in fairly feminine looking white tennis shoes, he reveals his curious apathy for masculine things when he mocks a large antique 'mantrap' (which were used against poachers) that his loving wife Amy has bought him for his birthday. During this same scene, Amy is reunited with her ex-lover Charlie Venner (Del Henney) who, despite not having seen in six years, she still seems to be very much in love as if they never broken up in the first place. Indeed, one certainly immediately questions how Amy could be married to an unattractive intellectual untermensch like Davey boy if she is clearly highly attracted to a handsome and charming yet uneducated working-class chap. In fact, the sexual chemistry between the two ex-lovers is so obvious that Charlie even has the gall to put his arm around Amy and say to her like a sleazy braggart, "There was once a time, Mrs. Sumner, when you were ready to beg me for it," though she pushes his arm away as if she is still mad at him for some wrong he committed long ago. Notably, during this entire scene, Amy stands next to Charlie as opposed to her husband David, thus foreshadowing the course the film will eventually take. Of course, caring very little for his wife and her emotions, David barely acknowledges the obvious connection between Amy and Charlie and even hires the charming hillbilly to work on his garage, which will ultimately prove to be his first serious mistake in a series of easily preventable mistakes that eventually lead to rape and coldblooded mass murder.

STRAW DOGS

David decides to hire Charlie to build his garage because the guys currently working on it, Norman Scutt (Ken Hutchison of Ralph Nelson's The Wrath of God (1972) and Richard Donner's Ladyhawke (1985)) and 'rat man' Chris Cawsey (Irish character actor Jim Norton of Francis Lawrence's Water for Elephants (2011)), are "taking forever." Charlie also brings his friend Phil Riddaway (Donald Webster) to work on the project, thus making for a quartet of boorish Brit hicks that will be constantly hanging at Charlie's new home Trencher's Farm, which is where Amy grew up and which is clearly a place that is far too rustic and folksy for a cosmopolitan intellectual like David. When David asks Amy if she and Charlie were lovers in the past, she naturally lies and states, "Venner tried to get fresh once. Nothing happened." Of course, you can tell just when they are together that Amy gets wet anytime she thinks about country hunk Charlie, but eternal coward David prefers to ignore this. Stuck in a clearly loveless and largely sexless marriage with a seemingly emotionally vacant dork, Amy will ultimately use Charlie and his comrades as a dubious and ultimately highly deleterious means to channel her sexual frustration and resentment towards her negligent hubby. Indeed, it is quite apparent that Amy seems far comfortable around Charlie and the gang than her own husband. When David asks her regarding Charlie and his friends, "What was so funny with them?," Amy replies, "They just think you're strange" in a fashion that reveals that she feels exactly the same way about him. While David might have a great intellect when it comes to science and mathematics, he is somewhat socially retarded and seems to use his unwavering arrogance and cynicism as a mask so that he can disguise his quasi-autistic qualities and fragile psyche, but of course it is only a matter of time before the masks falls off. Trapped in a virtual prison as result of living on a remote property and constantly being in the presence of an outstandingly arrogant and unsympathetic husband that incessantly treats her like a badly behaved child and even yells at her anytime she attempts to show him affection, Amy not surprisingly transfers most of her love and affection to a cat, so naturally it quite upsets her when David mistreats the kitty and even threatens, "If she's in my study, I'll killer her." In fact, when Amy is not around, David even goes so far as jovially kicking and throwing objects at the cat, thus revealing that he has a sadistic side that he will come to fully embrace by the end of the film.

When David yells at her, "Get the garage makers and the rat catchers – Get them to all finish! Oh, and, and fix the toilet and clean up the kitchen [...] I love you, Amy, but I want you to leave me alone," Amy tears up and replies, "Ok, I'll leave you alone with your blackboard." After intentionally agitating David by putting a piece of gum on his chalkboard in what seems to be a desperate attempt by the character to get her self-absorbed husband to pay attention to her, Amy goes for a drive and when she gets back she intentionally exposes her bare legs and panties to Charlie and his friends as a means to both assert her badly wounded womanhood and to get back at her unloving hubby. After intentionally showing her flesh off like a scheming Lolita on the prowl, Amy then proceeds to absurdly complain to David regarding Charlie and his friends, "They were practically licking my body," but she does not get the response she intended as her less than empathetic spouse is hardly jealous and instead rebukes her for not wearing a bra, stating, "You shouldn't go around without one and not expect that type to stare." Considerably agitated at this point, Amy mocks David's glaring lack of masculinity by stating, "Look...if you could hammer a nail, Venner and Scutt wouldn't be out there" and then proceeds to go to the second floor of the house under the dubious pretense of taking a shower, strips off her shirt, and then shows off her bare breasts to Charlie and the gang while they are busy working on the roof. Needless to say, Charlie naturally sees Amy's seductive behavior as a direct invitation that he will take full advantage of later in the film. After all, when a married woman has the gall to randomly show you her bare bazongas, it is probably because she is in desperate need of being sexually ravaged because her husband is not getting the job done.

When the local holy man Reverend Barney Hood (actor and screenwriter Colin Welland, who is probably best known for penning Chariots of Fire (1981) and his role in Ken Loach's Kes (1969)) comes by Trencher's farm, David acts quite smug by immediately handing him a 'church donation' and playing loud and obnoxious bagpipe music, which Amy rightly immediately turns off (notably, David will later turn on the same exact music as a way to agitate the senses of men that are trying to kill him). Of course, David is no less hostile when talking to the good Reverend than he is with everyone else, as he is a little man that respects no one and probably suffers from a somewhat subtle form of megalomania. Indeed, when Reverend Hood asks him in regard to the proliferation of nuclear weapons, "You're a scientist. Can you deny the responsibility?," David replies in an insufferably arrogant fashion, "Can you? After all, there's never been a kingdom given to so much bloodshed as that of Christ," but the man of god proves to the protagonist that he is not as stupid as he thinks by immediately replying, "That's Montesquieu, isn't it?" and then opting to leave. That night, David is in for quite a shock when he opens his bedroom closet and discovers the corpse of his wife's kitten, which has been missing all day, hanging from clothesline. Completely oblivious to his wife's feelings, David merely walks away from the closet and passively watches as his wife investigates and suffers the shock of discovering her lifeless kitty cat hanging from a rope. When Amy blames "Scutt or Cawsey" for the kitty-lynching and tells David that they did it, "To prove to you they could get into your bedroom,” David proves he is a pathetic pussy by nonsensically replying, “I don’t believe that” and then preposterously arguing that “anybody passing” could have lynched the feline, even though their house is located in the middle of nowhere. While David finally agrees to question the workers about the cat, he ultimately pussies out upon talking to the men and instead agrees to go hunting with them the next day, thereupon unwittingly setting up for his wife to suffer a most brutal assault that could have easily been avoided had he had the testicular fortitude to confront his tormentor(s).

STRAW DOGS

As the viewer somewhat suspects, the workers have ulterior motives for taking David to the moors to hunt as Charlie plans to pay his ex-lover Amy a visit while she is conveniently home alone. Indeed, the men leave David to hunt birds by himself while Scutt secretly watches the physically weak mathematician try in vain to properly aim and shoot his shotgun at a target. Rather revealingly, when Charlie shows up at her home unannounced by himself, Amy does not think twice about inviting him inside, even though she is dressed fairly scantily. When Charlie proceeds to passionately kiss her, Amy kisses him back for a couple seconds but then eventually complains, “Please leave me.” At this point, Charlie warns her, “Don’t tease me, Amy. Please,” but Amy decides to get somewhat physically violent, so he slaps her around and then drags by her hair to a couch where he strips off her clothes and warns her while preparing to penetrate her pussy, “I don’t want to reave you, but I will.” At this point, Amy barely resists and even softly says “no” while activity kissing Charlie. Indeed, while Amy practically rubs her wet pussy in David’s face in a desperate attempt to get her husband’s attention and still ends up getting rejected, Charlie wants her cunt so bad that he is literally willing to fight for it to the point where it could result in having to serve a prison sentence. One suspects Amy’s initial resistance was just a means for her to not only pretend like she had no intention of cheating on her husband, but also to experience what it feels like to be desperately wanted by a masculine alpha-male. Interestingly, when Charlie takes his shirt off, the scene notably cuts to a brief shot of David taking his shirt off as if to highlight that Amy is finally getting the opportunity to be sexually ravaged by a real man as opposed to her small and physical frail hubby. Ultimately what started out as a rape results in truly passionate lovemaking of the mutually orgasmic sort, with Amy even moaning to Charlie, “hold me.” Notably, at the same moment their carnal session reaches its climax, David manages to shoot and kill a bird. Unfortunately, things take a considerably ugly turn for the worst when Charlie notices the barrel of a shotgun being pointed at his face while he is lying next to Amy. Indeed, scumbag Scutt has turned on Charlie and forces his friend to watch while he brutally buggers Amy while she screams in abject horror. Luckily for Amy, Scutt only lasts a couple seconds, though the emotional pain and trauma seems permanent. As the viewer suspects, the entire situation probably would have been nearly immaculate for Amy had savage hick Scutt not showed up and ruined everything with his primitive sexual habits.

Totally oblivious to the fact that his wife has just been sexually pillaged, David comes home while Amy is smoking in bed and bitches in a pathetic fashion where he is clearly putting on airs of masculinity, "I'm firing Scutt and Vener tomorrow [...] Because they stuck it to me on the moor today," to which she snidely replies, "They also serve [those] who sit at home and wait." When David asks her what she means, Amy rightly replies, "Nothing. If you'd have said something to them ages ago...about the cat, this would never have happened. None of it." While David does actually fire Charlie and his friends the next day, it only pours gasoline on the fire in terms of the working men's hatred for him which will eventually reach its peak in a final showdown that could have been easily avoided were it not for the protagonist's unwavering arrogance and seemingly pathological passive-aggressiveness. Indeed, during an annual church event held by Reverend Hood that is attended by every single person in town, including David and Amy (who suffers traumatic rape flashbacks as a result of all the noise and rambunctious behavior that she is bombarded with at the event), a local teenage girl named Janice Hedden (Sally Thomsett) goes missing after foolishly leaving with a local retard named Henry Niles (half-Hebrew David Warner of Peckinpah's Cross of Iron and Donner's The Omen (1976)) who is known for being a child molester. Notably, Janice's unwise decision to leave with Henry is a direct result of David treating her with apathy, as the ignorant teen craves male attention and decided to seek it elsewhere after the protagonist rudely snubbed. Ultimately, Henry accidentally strangles Janice to death in a barn while desperately trying to keep her quiet after some people that are looking for the titillating teen walk by the building and call her name. Janice is the daughter of a rough, tough, and perennially unemployed dipsomaniac brute named Tom Hedden (Peter Vaughan, who is probably best known for his role as Maester Aemon on HBO's Game of Thrones (2011-2015)) who is Charlie's uncle and who acts as a sort of greatly respected patriarch for all the local young men, even though he is a jobless ex-con who spends most of his time lurking in the local bar. When Tom sees David at the beginning of the film, he looks at him in complete and utter disdain after noticing that the exceedingly effeminate protagonist is sporting a perfectly clean pair tennis shoes as opposed to the sort of work boots that every other single man in the town wears. Needless to say, when Tom and the rest of the men discover that David is harboring child molester Henry, they decide to wage a sort of total war against him, especially after the protagonist dares to refuse to handover the mentally feeble pedophile.

Upon driving back from the church event at night, Drive accidentally hits Henry with his car, so he decides to bring the mentally challenged pervert back to his house to recuperate until he can get in contact with a doctor, even though Amy does not want the retard in the house because she knows of his unsavory reputation. Since he cannot get in contact with anyone since they are all still at the church event, David makes the mistake of calling the local pub where Tom and the boys are hanging out. When the bartender informs Tom and the men that Henry is at David's house, they grab two bottles of liquor to gain "liquid courage" and immediately head to the protagonist's humble abode. While Tom sits by his car at the recommendation of the younger men, Charlie, Scutt, and Cawsey force their way into David's house and violently demand that the protagonist hand over the retard. Seeming more interested in being a passive-aggressive prick than actually caring about Henry's safety, David somewhat unbelievably becomes annoyingly idealistic about the retard's responsibility and adamantly refuses to hand him over, even though Amy also wants the pedo out of her house. While David eventually manages to talk them into leaving so they can go find Janice, Tom refuses to leave without Henry, so the men walk back to the house and begin attempting to break the door down. Although the local magistrate, Major John Scott (T. P. McKenna of Joseph Strick's botched Joyce adaptation Ulysses (1967) and Milos Forman's Valmont (1989)), eventually shows up and attempts to get Tom and his men to leave, they refuse to budge and instead proceed to berate the lawman for not having the retard institutionalized a longtime ago when he first gained his reputation for being a dangerous kiddy-fucker. When Major Scott is accidentally violently killed after getting in a struggle with Tom over his shotgun, the members of the redneck lynch mob immediately realize that they have nothing left to lose and commit to a full-blown hillbilly siege against David. Indeed, after Scutt declares, "Accessories, we are" and Charlie replies, "That is the law," the men, who are obviously quite inebriated at this point, proceed to attack the house with full force by cutting the phone line, knocking out at all the windows, and dropping live rats inside the building while screaming crude obscenities at David. Of course, it is quite apparent that these country boys delight in destroying the house and taunting the petrified protagonist and his wife. In that sense, the somewhat seem like a rural equivalent to the Droogs of Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange, albeit vaguely less nihilistic (after all, they have come to kill a child rapist, even if a couple of them are rapists themselves). The one advantage that David has over the country boys is that, aside from being sober, he is more serious and methodical and less emotional when it comes to combat, or so the viewer discovers as the protagonist gets in touch with his killer side and dispatches each character one-by-one.

STRAW DOGS

Although a pathetic pansy, David realizes at this point that, as a result of Major Scott's death, both he and wife's lives are on the line, as Tom and the boys cannot afford to have any living witnesses if they expect to escape a lengthy prison sentence. When the hillbillies begin breaking smashing every window in the house while yelling less than clever things like "dirty yank bastard," David finally decides to take action, stoically declares Amy to, "This is my affair," and then forces his wife to go upstairs and turn on all the lights so that it is hard for the invaders to see inside the home. When Amy declares, "If you don't let them have what they want, then I'm going" and then proceeds to open the door to let Charlie in, David decides to scare her into submission by grabbing by her hair and smacking the shit out of her just like her rapist did earlier in the film. When David states to her, "We're dead if they get in," Amy seems to finally begin to realize the severity of the situation and starts fighting back in her own fairly pathetic way. As the homicidal hicks begin invading the house while laughing and jeering like demonic redneck jesters at a satanic hoedown (at one point, Cawsey, who is wearing a prosthetic clown nose, rides a tricycle through a shed door), David temporarily stuns them by throwing buckets of boiling water in their faces. Of course, it is not long before the men once again attempt to Blitzkrieg the house, but when Tom takes the lead and attempts to make his way through a window, David ultimately causes him to blow off his foot with his own shotgun after hitting the weapon with a fire-poker. After that, David finds Chris Cawsey standing in his living room and the two get in an intense standoff that somewhat implausibly concludes with the meek mathematician bashing the rat catcher's brains in with a fire-poker. After David kills Cawsey, Charlie enters the home with Tom's shotgun and the protagonist encourages him to shoot him because he thinks the gun is empty. Luckily for David, Charlie does not decide to shoot him because the shotgun is actually loaded.

When David and Charlie hear Amy screaming on the second floor, they both proceed to run up the stairs to the bedroom where they find sexual sadist Scutt attempting to rape the heroine. Demonstrating that he actually probably does genuinely love Amy and that he certainly cares more about her than his comrade, Charlie shoots and kills sick fuck Scutt. At this point, David and Charlie start brawling and the two men soon find themselves rolling down the stairs together in a climatic slow-motion fight sequence that concludes in a completely unforgettable way. During this scene, Amy seems especially emotionally conflicted to the point where the viewer somewhat suspects that she wants Charlie to triumph over David (after all, with most of his friends dead, Charlie will no longer have any negative influences in his life and can now dedicated himself to her). Notably, when David grabs the mantrap, Amy cries, "No, Charlie!" but it is already too late. Indeed, in what is one of the most brutal death scenes in cinema history, David manages to unleash the mantrap over his rival's head, thus causing Charlie to die a somewhat slow grisly death as the teeth of the trap bite into his now quite literally red neck. After killing Charlie and taking a sort of short victory tour around the downstairs of the house, David brags to himself while in a state of almost disbelief, "Jesus. I got 'em all," but he ultimately speaks too soon as Phil Riddaway enters the home and begins effortlessly beating the shit out of the puny protagonist. Although she hesitates for a fairly longtime as if she would not mind to see her hubby die (after all, he is the man that just killed her one-time lover Charlie), Amy eventually grabs a shotgun and shoots and kills Phil right before he beats David to death. In the end, despite everything that has happened, David makes Amy feel vulnerable by curiously leaving her at the house while he drives retard Henry back to town. During the car ride, Henry pathetically mumbles, "I don't know my way home" and David replies to him in an almost gleeful manner while smirking, "That's ok. I don't either," thus underscoring the fact that the protagonist has reached a point of no return in both his life and marriage.

STRAW DOGS

With the pathetic and somewhat disconcerting western trend of beautiful women getting involved in unhappy marriages with physically weak and unattractive yet wealthy men due to the fact that technology, bureaucracy, and various other factors have made it fairly easy for certain clever effeminate men to become rich and powerful while at the same time strong and masculine males are becoming more and more obsolete, Straw Dogs has only become all the more relevant, if not politically incorrect, since its release nearly half a century ago. Indeed, women instinctively tend towards hypergamy and thus nowadays they find themselves in the curious situation of marrying weak and pathetic office bureaucrats that their female ancestors would have never even considered touching with a ten-foot pole, thereupon resulting in unnatural and distinctly dissatisfying marriages where the wife naturally finds herself longing for the kind of man that would spontaneously bend her over a kitchen table and begin plowing her cuntkin into oblivion. Surely, Straw Dogs is a rare kind of film in that it acts as a sort of antidote to the countless revolting romance scenarios featured in Woody Allen, Ben Stiller, Noah Baumbach, Henry Jaglom, and Seth Rogen flicks where a physically grotesque and singularly obnoxious Jew-boy of the nauseatingly nebbish sort somehow magically hooks up with a hot blonde babe, as if it is somehow a normal and desirable occurrence that should be celebrated by everyone lest they be labelled a heartless antisemite. Of course, no sexually sound Aryan babe could ever find their cunt getting wet to the sound of Dustin Hoffman's nasally monotone voice, but Hollywood has spent at least half a century trying to prove otherwise in its incessant campaign of cultural cuckolding via celluloid. Of course, aside from the fact that her quasi-rapist also happens to be an ex-lover, one of the main reasons that the female heroine of Straw Dogs finds it so pleasurable to be vaginally pillaged is because it had been such a long time since she had been at the complete will of a strong and capable man that makes her feel like a woman, which is something that a Hebraic fellow like Herr Hoffman is just not capable of (after all, it is no coincidence that he gave one of his greatest acting performance in drag in Sydney Pollack's Tootsie (1982)). Indeed, somehow I suspect that if the average frigid feminist were routinely manhandled by a real man, they would probably be cured of their metaphysical affliction and political retardation.

Notably in response to a 1971 review featured in The New Yorker where she described Straw Dogs as a "fascist" film, Peckinpah wrote a letter to Pauline Kael where he stated, "I read your review. Its ambivalence was complete, although I was distressed that you didn't pick up that David was inciting the very violence he was running away from. After the killing of Cawsey, he realizes exactly what he has done. I appreciate your concern and involvement, but I don't appreciate the description of the film as a fascist one because it has connotations which to me are odious [...] How you can identify any element of my work in terms of fascism is beyond my belief and a red flag." Of course, being a left-wing Jewess, Kael probably could not fathom how Hebraic Hoffman's character could have been in the wrong against a group of barbaric English Nordic hillbillies, just as she probably could never consider that anti-Jewish pogroms were often the result of the goyim getting fed up with passive-aggressive money-lending tactics and the active support of genocidal anti-Christian communist movements that was quite common among certain members of the Judaic tribe during the early twentieth-century, among other things, but I digress. As a man descended from Nordic frontiersmen that immigrated from the Frisian Islands to the United States during the mid-19th-century and played a role in taming the hostile territories of the great American West, as well as an ex-soldier who witnessed the barbaric behavior between the Chinese and Japanese while stationed in China during WWII as member of the United States Marine Corps, Peckinpah undoubtedly knew more about the nature of mankind and his violence than the average Hollywood filmmaker and especially some frigid old Hebrewess, hence the singular importance of his oeuvre as a sort of Nietzsche of the Western genre. Notably, Peckinpah was apparently not too fond of the attitudes of certain arrogant Judaic types and according to Straw Dogs producer Daniel Melnick in the doc Passion & Poetry: The Ballad of Sam Peckinpah (2005) directed by Mike Siegel, he was not afraid to put high-minded Hebrews in their place and saying things to them like, "You're just a goddamn New York intellectual Jew." Of course, that is also what I usually think when I hear some hopelessly sheltered left-wing film critic denounce a film as being "fascist," "reactionary," "problematic," or any of the other sad, pathetic, and predictable outmoded buzzwords that they love to throw around, as the use of such meaningless labels ultimately reveals to me that the writer is a completely compromised grade A pussy whose opinion has about as much as intrinsic intellectual merit as a large pile of steaming horse shit.

Naturally, I was not surprised to discover upon somewhat reluctantly watching it that Israeli filmmaker Rod Lurie's 2011 Straw Dogs remake is a piece of terminally prosaic cinematic blasphemy that lacks any of the aesthetic and philosophical qualities that made Peckinpah's original film so damn great. Indeed, somehow Lurie felt that putting glasses on a semi-handsome guy like James Marsden and getting a Swede like Alexander Skarsgård to portray a Mississippi hillbilly would make for plausible characters. Of course, Lurie's remake is nothing more than a retrograde bargain bin Hicksploitation flick on monetary steroids that was directed by a typical Hebraic hack who has an irrational hatred of Southerners and racially schizophrenic infatuation with dumb blonde shiksas.

STRAW DOGS

Personally, I think a more practical update of the film would involve a white liberal pansy moving to the Deep South hometown of his high yellow black wife and ultimately causing a violent attack as a result of saying various stereotypical patronizing white bleeding heart liberal things to his spade spouse's friends about how he "doesn't see color" and has a "black bff" while they openly call him a cracker and take turns plundering his lady's main vein, but of course that would never happen, as the culture-distorters of Hollywood loathe reality and are all about creating propagandistic fantasy realms that they hope audiences will eventually mimic in real-life. Of course, one of the things that makes Peckinpah's Straw Dogs so potent is that it does feature a relatively realistic scenario where a weak and frail Hebraic intellectual type with poor social skills is married to a Nordic beauty who he treats like a child. After all, Swedish beauty Britt Ekland jumpstarted her career by marrying hardly handsome Hebrew Peter Sellers in the mid-1960s and such mismatched hypergamy-based marriages have only become all the more common today. Working in Hollywood for a good portion of his life, there is no doubt that Peckinpah—a real man that, quite unlike the typical studio hack, dared to depict the true depravity of humanity, as well as the manipulative and sometimes masochistic nature of womankind—oftentimes encountered these sham relationships and revoltingly insufferable passive-aggressive Dustin Hoffman types, so it is only fitting that he would direct a film like Straw Dogs that demonstrates that even pussy pacifists, who pride themselves on their ostensibly civilized behavior, are just as every bit capable of bloodthirsty murder as the extroverted hicks that they look down on. Indeed, as producer Melnick, himself a member of the chosen tribe, rightly stated of Peckinpah in Passion & Poetry, "I always felt that he was perhaps the last man making movies who had both guts and integrity." Of course, guts and integrity are even harder to find in Hollywood—a patently phony place that prides itself in lying, cheating, stealing, and whoring—than genuine artistic talent, which says a lot. A sort of less arcane father film to the criminally underrated Anglian pastoral arthouse piece Requiem for a Village (1976) directed by Lindsay Anderson's editor David Gladwell, Straw Dogs is ultimately a sort of post-Heimat quasi-horror-thriller that asks many hard questions and thankfully does not offer any safe or easy answers to any of them, though the film unquestionably demonstrates that seeing a stunning young woman in a loveless relationship with a swarthy little dork ultimately makes for a more revolting and unnatural sight than seeing her being passionately manhandled by a strong and attractive man that actually loves her. After all, it is no mere coincidence that most women (translation: all women) have rape fantasies and, as Straw Dogs reveals, not all rapists are equal in the eyes of a woman..

-Ty E

BRING ME THE HEAD OF ALFREDO GARCIA

Sam Peckinpah (1974)

Over the years, I have compiled a mental list of must-see films that I procrastinate watching because I want to be in the right mood and setting to appreciate such a supposed masterpiece and do not want to somehow ruin what can be an aesthetically transcendent experience. Indeed, I still haven't seen a number of Ingmar Bergman's films, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's Parsifal (1982), Krzysztof Kiesłowski's Three Colours trilogy, and countless other films that I probably should have watched many years ago. After recently finally watching Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia (1974) aka Tráiganme la cabeza de Alfredo García directed by absolutely singular Hollywood maverick Sam Peckinpah (Ride the High Country, The Wild Bunch), I can only say that I am pissed at myself for waiting about a decade too long to watch what is one of the most pleasantly venomously visceral and inexplicably cathartic yet senselessly tragic films that I have ever seen. In fact, I think it is now my favorite Peckinpah flick and I say that as one of the rare individuals that prefers Straw Dogs (1971) to his supposed magnum opus The Wild Bunch (1969). Sometimes feeling like a paradoxically immaculate exploitation flick on steroids as directed by a refreshingly unpretentious cinematic master possessed by the perennially bitter spirit of Ambrose Bierce, the film is notable for being the only work directed by Peckinpah that is a true 'director's cut' as it was released exactly the way he intended it to be and it certainly shows as a deliciously unpleasant movie that is dripping with spiritual morbidity, latent misanthropy, and a foredoomed sort of tenderness that only the Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid (1973) director was capable of. Indeed, fuck Peckinpah's somewhat minor celebrated westerns like Ride the High Country (1962) and The Ballad of Cable Hogue (1970), Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia is forever! Featuring a hard-drinking and self-destructive war veteran antihero that is always conspicuously hiding his thoroughly inebriated bloodshot eyes behind sunglasses and who has a fetish for fiery yet sensual Latinas, the film is also, for better or worse (I go with the latter), Peckinpah's most autobiographical and auteur-driven work. Made at the beginning of the late period of the filmmaker's career after the failure of Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia is, in the best sort of way, the sort of film you would expect from a terribly talented yet troubled man that once pathetically confessed, "I can't direct when I'm sober." The sad, slightly pitiful, sometimes melancholic and ultimately hopelessly tragic yet endlessly enthralling and perversely passionate tale of a hapless gringo bartender that gets him and his beloved pussy-peddler mestizo lover sucked into the highly dangerous Mexican criminal underworld upon learning about the large bounty placed upon the literal head of a dead male-whore that made the mistake of impregnating his crime boss's special little girl, the film is also a rather fittingly love letter to Peckinpah's virtual second home of Mexico. Indeed, despite the film's dark and morbid content, it also manages to reveal Peckinpah's more sensitive side, namely his love of Mexico and the Mexican people and especially his love of young nubile Mexican women. After all, the love of Peckinpah's love was Mexican actress Begonia Palacios (1965–1984), who he married no less than three times and had a daughter with. Like the protagonist's lover in the film, Palacios was perennially passionately devoted to Peckinpah who, not unlike the character in the film, had a hard time adequately (and sanely) expressing his emotions to his brown-skinned beloved. Of course, much like Peckinpah, the film's antihero—a painfully conspicuous stand-in for the alcoholic auteur—does not realize what he has until it is too late and he has lost it, especially where love is concerned.

BRING ME THE HEAD OF ALFREDO GARCIA

A film that has managed to have entries in both 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die (2003) edited by Steven Schneider and The Fifty Worst Films of All Time (And How They Got That Way) (1978) by Zionist turd Harry Medved and Randy Dreyfuss, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia is certainly the sort of shockingly unflinching, venomously vexatious, and unrepentantly 'politically incorrect' cinematic work that divides viewers. Indeed, I certainly cannot imagine a true blue optimist coming away from watching the film without feeling like they have suffered some sort of major metaphysical trauma that causes them to question the very meaning of life. For pessimists, the film offers a virtual playground of human stupidity, absurdism, and senseless tragedy in poetic celluloid form. In fact, the film even concludes with a close-up of a smoking gun barrel pointed directly at the audience, as if to remind the viewer in a humorously obnoxious fashion that life is all about pain, death, and destruction and that no one escapes death. Set in a wicked and wayward world devoid of heroes where only the meanest and morally bankrupt of motherfuckers thrive and survive, Peckinpah's flick is in many ways the 'antihero film par excellence' where an underdog pays the ultimate price for playing a very naughty game in a uniquely underhanded fashion that involves the decaying dismembered head of a Mexican chap that had cuckolded him only a couple weeks before. A compulsively cynical and somewhat morally dubious dude that is willing to risk his life if he sees a special opportunity to get rich quick, the antihero attempts to cheat in a deadly game with Mexico's criminal elite that involves him procuring the head of a man that only he knows is already dead for a $1 million bounty. Unfortunately, the protagonist unwittingly pays the ultimate cost for his singularly sleazy efforts, which eventually results in him losing every single thing that he truly values, namely what is left of his personal integrity and the inordinately sweet and loving Latina love of his life.

Vaguely (anti)Orphic in its daunting depiction of an antihero that loses his lover and intentionally enters a sort of figurative hell south of the border, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia is unquestionably an action film that totally transcends genre as a work that might also be described as being simultaneously a black tragicomedy, cowboy-less neo-western, Mexican gangster flick, necro-buddy movie, artsploitation revenge-thriller, and ultra-violent dark romance. In short, the film is a subversive work of cinematic art of the totally true grit oriented sort as directed by a man that was not afraid to be a man, especially in the unflattering sense of the word. More reluctantly neurotic and self-denigrating than self-pitying, the film is also, somewhat surprisingly, more drenched in grief and gloom than it is blood and gut, though it is by no means a tame film as far as delightfully deranged ultra-violence is concerned. Featuring singularly darkly humorous scenarios like a gay hit man knocking out a hooker that dares to hit on him and a protagonist that uses vodka to clean his genitals after a long hard night of dirty interracial sex, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia is a hopelessly humanistic film in the sense that Peckinpah dares to reveal the most unflattering aspects of human vulnerability, moral fragility, and suffering, but one should not expect anything less from an auteur that owned up to the fact that he was a self-destructive fuck-up and dipsomaniac that was incapable of living a stable life and maintaining a healthy romantic relationship.

Undoubtedly, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia does for the action genre what Werner Schroeter's Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran did for European high-camp in terms of being a rare film where virtually every single shot resembles a painting in terms of its seemingly immaculate composition. Indeed, despite technically being a genre film and featuring about as much sleazy content as a gleefully morally bankrupt 1970s Italian exploitation film, the aesthetic integrity of film deserves to be compared to the greatest and most hypnotic tableaux vivants of Visconti, which says a lot since most of the film is set in the Mexican countryside and inside dilapidated buildings that are not even fit for rabid barnyard animals. Once rightly described by belated pop film critic Roger Ebert as "some kind of bizarre masterpiece," the film provides the hallucinatory experience of hard drugs with the timeless tragic nuance of Shakespeare, albeit in a manner that can be easily consumed by the most inebriated of sub-literate white lumpenproles and mestizo farmers.

At the very beginning of the film, the viewer is exposed to the misleadingly splendid and serene image of a beautiful pregnant teenager as she basks in the sunlight beside a placid lake with swans in a scenario that resembles a sort of ethereal Mexican pastoral heaven. Before the viewer knows it, the young girl is brought before a sort of family kangaroo court where her crime boss father 'El Jefe' (played by Mexican actor and auteur Emilio Fernández, who is best known for directing the Palme d'Or award winning feature María Candelaria (1944)) demands to know who impregnated her while a virtual army of people that include her family members, Catholic nuns, and gangsters watch on in abject anticipation. When the teenager, who clearly loves the lucky mensch that knocked her up, refuses to comply, El Jefe has her top ripped off in a quasi-incestuous that eventually morally degenerates into minor torture. When the tormented topless teen can no longer take the physical and emotional pain of being tortured in front of a bunch of people, she finally reveals that her father's protégé "Alfredo Garcia" is the sperm donor of her unborn child. Although El Jefe somberly states of Garcia that, "He was like a son to me," he desperately lusts for revenge and immediately offers a bounty for her daughter's baby-daddy of $1 million, thus leading to many of his henchmen immediately vacating the premises so that they can go hunting for the poor miserable fool that idiotically got his all-powerful cutthroat boss's teenage daughter pregnant. While El Jefe will sort of get his revenge in the end in a somewhat expected way, so will his lovelorn daughter in what ultimately proves to be one fucked up Mexican family drama.

BRING ME THE HEAD OF ALFREDO GARCIA

Unfortunately for the film's gringo protagonist Bennie (Warren Oates)—a retired U.S. Army officer turned perennially drunk bartender that seems set on wasting away in a third world hellhole—he eventually learns of the bounty when two homo hit men show up at his bar in Mexico City and begin asking about the whereabouts of the seemingly elusive Alfredo Garcia. Indeed, when suavely dressed cocksucker career criminals Sappensly (Robert Webber) and Johnny Quill (Gig Young) show up at his bar and begin waving around money and asking about Garcia, born loser Bennie immediately begins scheming and lies to the two unconventionally intimidating killers by claiming that he does not know the man. As it turns out, Garcia cuckolded Bennie only a couple weeks before by banging his beloved Hispanic hooker girlfriend Elita (Isela Vega). When Bennie talks to Elita and learns that Garcia is already dead as a result of stereotypically dying in a drunken car crash, he believes he has a 'sure thing' and will be able to easily collect the bounty without having to actually commit a murder. Needless to say, Bennie has no qualms about defiling Alfredo's corpse. Unfortunately for him, Bennie's lazy amoral scheme will eventually lead him on a suicidal path of no return involving violent deaths and grisly (self)destruction. After talking to Sappensly and Quill's pompous German boss 'Max' (played by Helmut Dantine, who also acted as the film's executive producer), they agree to pay him $10,000 for the head of Alfredo Garcia, though they also threaten to kill him if he fucks up. In fact, one of Max's associates—a very Jewy four-eyed fellow that reeks of NYC style arrogance—even dares to call Bennie "a loser," but he calmly retorts, "Nobody loses all the time." Somewhat ironically, while Bennie eventually does obtain the head, he ultimately loses everything else in the process. While Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia might be a true underdog tale, said underdog goes down and brings virtually everyone else with him.

As far as the timeless 'whore with a heart of gold' archetype is concerned, Elita—a pleasant little pussy-peddler who is quite proud of her naked body as demonstrated by the fact that she is always flaunting it, including in front of potential rapists—is arguably the most sympathetic, lovable, and believable 'sporting girl' in cinema history and I say that as someone that is a great fan of Giulietta Masina's tragic lovelorn streetwalker in Federico Fellini's early classic Le notti di Cabiria (1957) aka Nights of Cabiria. Indeed, Elita's flagrantly expressed love for booze-loving burnout Bennie is largely responsible for humanizing him as he would be a mostly despicable character otherwise, hence why it is so devastatingly heartbreaking when the protagonist's absurd get-rich-quick scheme ultimately leads to her obscenely senseless premature demise. In fact, while Peckinpah has oftentimes been criticized for being a supposed misogynist, it is ultimately the main two female characters, Elita and El Jefe's teenage daughter, that are the strongest and most sympathetic characters in the entire film as two inordinately selfless women that are willing to sacrifice everything for the love of their man. Undoubtedly, the darkest and most emotionally wounding irony of the film is that Bennie unwittingly assigns his lover Elita's death for a scheme that she was very vocally against from the very beginning, thus highlighting her virtually suicidal loyalty. Indeed, it is almost as if Elita has a sort of noble savage sixth sense that helps her foresee serious danger that bumbling buffoon Bennie lacks. Intending to get married and more or less 'retire' together upon collecting the bounty, the money naturally ultimately becomes pointless once Elita is killed, which indubitably explains why Bennie eventually decides to go on a suicidal killing spree in end in an act that is probably best described as a form of stupendously sick broken-hearted penance of the murderously mournful sort.

After spending a vodka-fueled picnic together where the lovers demonstrate their love for one another and agree on getting married soon in an inordinately sweet and tender Peckinpah love scene that really underscores the auteur's surprising emotional range as a filmmaker, Elita makes the mistake of talking Bennie into camping out in the dangerous Mexican countryside under the stars. Not surprisingly considering the setting and director, the romantic scene in the picture perfect pastoral setting degenerates from classic romance into attempted rape and brutal vengeful murder. Unfortunately, two inhumane hippie bikers (one played by musician-turned-actor Kris Kristofferson and the other by Donnie Fritts) crash their campsite and almost immediately demand at gunpoint that they be able to take turns raping Elita, who, somewhat disturbingly, is quite the trooper in terms of embracing her ugly fate. Indeed, when Bennie violently threatens the armed bikers, Elita replies, "Oh, no, you won't, Benny. I've been here before, you don't know the way," as if she has been in a similar situation many times before. A totally tough hot tamale that even manages play sexual assault by her own rules, Elita takes the biker played by Kristofferson aside, takes off her shirt, proudly puffs out her bare tits, and even violently slaps the would-be-rapist in the face in a manner that seems to turn-on that degenerate bikeboy bastard. Rather curiously, Elita even seems to enjoy it when the biker begins passionately kissing her, but that does not last long as Bennie manages to catch the bikers off guard and then ruthlessly kills them both, but not before declaring

BRING ME THE HEAD OF ALFREDO GARCIA

“Hey! You’re dirt!” to the dirty hippie that is defiling his beloved. Of course, had not Elita played it so cool in the situation and neglected to act like a stereotypical hysterical woman, both she and Bennie would have probably been killed immediately, thus demonstrating that the heroine is more of a natural survivor than her somewhat insecure gringo lover. Undoubtedly, before she is killed, Elita acts as Bennie’s virtual guardian angel, so it is no surprise that he goes in full self-combustion mode after her tragic death. Indeed, Elita may be a cheap Mexican whore, but she has a certain penetrating purity of spirit that her cynical and somewhat jaded lover just completely lacks.

Notably, it is only after the unsavory incident with the bikers—an episode that clearly internally wounds the antihero’s manhood—that Bennie finally dares to come completely clean and admits to Elita his intention of digging up her ex-lover Alfredo’s assumedly somewhat rotten corpse and decapitating the head. While Elita is completely against the plan and describes it as an act of desecration, Bennie cynically describes Alfredo as their “saint” and then absurdly argues like some sort of cynical redneck pseudo-philosopher, “Listen, the church cuts off the feet, fingers, any other goddamn thing from the saints, don’t they? Well, what the hell, Alfredo’s our saint. He’s a saint of our money. And I’m gonna borrow a piece of him.” At this point, Elita, who cannot believe that her beau wants to actually decapitate the head of her rotting ex-beau, almost considers breaking up with Bennie, but she cannot bear to betray her beloved and instead reluctantly guides him to Alfredo’s small hometown village. Somewhat disturbingly, the lovers witness a rather joyous funeral for a small child at the same exact graveyard that Alfredo is buried out. Undoubtedly, the dead child in the small wooden coffin is eerily symbolic of the child that Bennie and Elita will never have together, as the latter will soon be dead. When Bennie finally goes to do the dirty deed and begins digging up Alfredo’s freshly buried grave, Elita simply cannot watch and walks away. Unfortunately, Bennie will never see her alive again, as he is soon knocked out cold with a shovel by an unseen assailant and later wakes up buried underneath the ground next to Elita’s lifeless corpse. Upon digging himself out of the shallow grave, Bennie tries in vain to revive Elita’s corpse, only to absurdly accuse her of wanting to be with Alfredo when she fails to wake up from her perennial slumber. Of course, upon emerging from the ground, Bennie—a pathetic man that has just lost the one person in the entire world that truly loved and cared him—is virtually reborn and proceeds to degenerate into a quasi-nihilistic killer whose best friend becomes a decapitated Mexican head. Indeed, not long after Elita is killed, Bennie manages to catch up with the malevolent mestizos that murdered his lover and stole Alfredo’s head. Upon unleashing a storm of bullets on both the men and killing them in cold blood, the antihero states with a sort of morbid sadistic glee that, “it feels so damn good.” After that, Alfredo’s head becomes Bennie’s best friend and closet confidant. While Alfredo’s family eventually attempts to take the head back at gunpoint, Sappensly and Quill randomly show up and begin exterminating the poor unwitting peasants with a machine-gun, though the latter is eventually killed by one of Garcia's relatives. When Bennie demonstrates his lack of tact by asking Sappensly "do I get paid?" while the highly homicidal homo hit man is caressing the still warm corpse of his gay lover, the seemingly psychopathic cocksucker gets a little bit irked and naturally attempts to kill the protagonist. Luckily, Bennie manages to kill Sappensly before the sod can get a shot in.

After procuring fresh ice for Alfredo's head and even giving said head a shower later on at his apartment, Bennie symbolically packs the rotten dome piece inside Elita's picnic basket and then visits Max and his goons at their lavish hotel headquarters to ostensibly get paid for the bounty. When a discernibly angry Bennie dares to question Max about what he wants the head for, the sly kraut criminal retorts, "No question, Benny . . . The ten thousand answers it all." With nothing left to lose and completely angry with both himself and the career criminals that hired him, Bennie proceeds to describe how the picnic basket that is carrying the head "belonged to a very special lady" and then abruptly proceeds to shoot and kill every single man in the room. Luckily, Bennie manages to grab El Jefe's business card off of Max's corpse, thus giving him the information he needs to collect the full bounty. Instead of a mere $10,000, Bennie seeks to gain $1 million by personally delivering the head to the man that put out the bounty, but unfortunately for the gangster leader the antihero no longer has any use for money. Looking to avenge his dead lover and place the blame at the supposed source of all his largely self-induced troubles, Bennie decides to pay El Jefe at his lavish estate and give Alfredo's head to him personally. Needless to say, Bennie sparks a massacre that he himself will never emerge from. Quite fittingly, if not sickly, Bennie arrives at the house during the baptism of El Jefe's grandson, who also happens to be Alfredo's son. Indeed, the same day that the bastard baby boy is baptized, his father's head is delivered to his grandfather. Needless to say, lovesick lunatic Bennie—a man that has lost everything, not least of all the love of his life and what was left of his personal dignity—is quite dissatisfied when El Jefe simply hands over a briefcase with $1 million and dispassionately remarks, "Take it and go. I have everything that I want. I have my grandson. So go. Don't forget to take that [Alfredo's head] and throw it to the pigs." In fact, Bennie becomes deeply infuriated, yells, "Sixteen people are dead because of him . . . and you. And me. And one of 'em was a damn good friend of mine!" and then begins shooting El Jefe's henchmen. In a nice little twist, Bennie also murders El Jefe at the request of his daughter, who has still not gotten over the fact that her father put a literal price on her lover's head. In the end, Bennie says to El Jefe's daughter, "You take care of the boy . . . and I'll take care of the father" and then attempts to escape from the gangster's well guarded estate by driving his car through the well-guarded front gate, but he is ultimately struck down with seemingly thousands of bandito bullets in what proves to be a fitting quasi-suicidal melodramatic conclusion to one miserable wasted life in a wicked romance film where a forsaken loser avenges the murder of his lover the best way he can.

BRING ME THE HEAD OF ALFREDO GARCIA

I think it is safe to say Peckinpah would agree with Robert Bresson's personal cinematic philosophy that, to quote the French master auteur, "I'd rather people feel a film before understanding. I'd rather feelings arise before intellect." After all, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia—an inordinately visceral film that increasingly pokes and prods at the soul of the viewer in a manner that might be seen by some as a sort of metaphysical torture—disgusted many reviewers when it was originally released and I would not be surprised if the average contemporary 'normie' viewer would have a hard time explaining the film's antihero Bennie true motivations, especially in the end when he chooses death over driving away with a small fortune. Of course, one could easily argue that Peckinpah and his film are example of what Poe described when he wrote about "the human thirst for self-torture," but the auteur seemed to be more conscious of his psychological defects than most, thus making it all the more tragic that he died the way he did. Indeed, in a 1974 interview with Joe Gelmis of Newsday, Peckinpah would even go so far as to confess during a somewhat depressing moment of self-illumination, "I'm the greatest stupid romantic in the world . . . really stupid. I'm an outsider and I think being an outsider is a lonely, losing job. I would love to be married and live in a split-level house, I love all that shit, but I don't do it. I get into many problems, I drink too much, and I get into too many fights. Next year, I'll be fifty years old and I've got to quit. Three knuckles have been broken; it's gone, right there right there, and right there, you can see it. . . ." Not unlike the antihero of his family, Peckinpah probably would have loved nothing more than to have spent the rest of his life living in a modest Mexican home with his Latina true love Begoña Palacios, but instead he became a slave to his own personal demons and more or less drank himself to death while trying in vain to reignite his stagnating filmmaking career. Of course, to understand Peckinpah's film on a more innate and visceral level, one must be familiar with a certain degree of misery and desperation. Luckily, instead of being marinated in moody melancholia like a Bergman flick, Peckinpah's film concludes with an exceedingly energetic and even transcendental form of self-destruction that feels strangely satisfying. In that sense, one could argue that the film has a quasi-happy ending as the antihero's internal suffering comes to an end and he even manages to avenge a young Mexican teenage mother in the process, thus slightly redeeming himself in the end.

While the increasingly erratic and self-destructive auteur made a number of films throughout his career depicting mad misfits and unhinged loners, none of these come close to the magisterial madness of Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia where full-fledged self-annihilation becomes a poetic form of spiritual transcendence and the only logical answer to a life no longer worth living.

In that sense, it should be no surprise that Peckinpah—a man that had already completely submitted to his dipsomaniacal demons—would never direct another masterpiece, though Cross of Iron (1977) is certainly a classic ‘antiwar’ film of sorts and arguably the best film ever directed by an American from the German perspective during WWII. Indeed, Peckinpah’s Steve McQueen vehicle The Getaway (1972)—another darkly romantic ‘action’ flick that is by no means a bad film—seems like prosaic pussy play compared to the whimsical unhingement, unrelenting spiritual ravenousness, and morbid moral decrepitude of the true renegade cinematic masterpiece that is Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia. I surely cannot think of another film where an ultraviolent death in rural Mexico at the hands of a bunch of insufferably swarthy bloodthirsty banditos seems like a ‘noble’ and relatively morally redeeming prospect. After all, in the end, the antihero finally demonstrates that his ‘very special lady’ is worth more to him than all the money in the world, even though, quite tragically, he could not actually prove this to her when she was actually still alive. In other words, the film bleeds romantic regret in a perversely poetic fashion, as if Peckinpah was compelled by his haunted (sub)conscious to pay tribute and respect to all the wives and girlfriends that he left emotionally devastated due to his belligerent and explosively abusive behavior. While I have great respect for Peckinpah as a cinematic artist, his films almost always give me a feeling of great relief that I am nowhere near as hopelessly forsaken as the clearly internally wounded man that created them. Notably, Peckinpah’s deeply flawed swansong The Osterman Weekend (1973) features a deranged renegade CIA agent portrayed by belated British actor John Hurt that is morbidly obsessed with the absolutely heinous post-coital murder of his beloved platinum blonde wife portrayed by Danish model Merete Van Kamp. Indeed, not unlike the antihero of Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia, Hurt’s heartsick character goes on a virtual suicide mission that involves a lot of senseless death and destruction. Of course, both of these characters are indubitably quasi-cryptic expressions of Peckinpah’s own heavy-hearted regret and vulnerability and reveal that the filmmaker was a haunted (ex)romantic that virtually suffered a pathological obsession in regard to his lost loves. Rather revealingly, when asked by Kathleen Carroll of The Daily News in 1974 about his intent with Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia, Peckinpah gave the less than flattering response, “The picture is about two things: it is about a love story, and it is about vengeance, a dish, as Machiavelli said, that is best served cold. . . . Somebody asked if I hit women, and I said, ‘Of course I do, I believe in equal rights for women. . . .’ If you study and live with something at all, you find that tenderness and violence sometimes go hand in hand.” While I have never hit a woman and consider so-called sexual equality to be a sad joke at the expense of both genders, I can certainly understand the dichotomy of tenderness and violence when it comes to romance, as deep emotions are certainly stirred when it comes to true love, especially when at least one person in the relationship suffers from personal demons. After all, there is no greater motivation for murder than some sort of unquenchable thirst for romantic revenge, but I digress. If you ever wondered about the personal and psychological motivations behind spree-killings and/or violent suicides, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia is one of the oh-so very few films that offers such daunting insights. Indeed, if you're a lovelorn man suffering from crushing grief and need some inspiration to go on a suicidal mass murder mission, Peckinpah's cinematic work is certainly the film to see as a sort of Titanic (1997) for romantically forsaken psychos and weebegone winos. Of course, more importantly, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia is a morbidly romantic masterpiece that contains the following timeless message: "¡Viva la Muerte!"

BRING ME THE HEAD OF ALFREDO GARCIA

-Ty E

CROSS OF IRON

Sam Peckinpah (1977)

A culturally mongrelized Anglo-Kraut co-production shot in what was then commie Yugoslavia with money put up by a West German porn producer, Cross of Iron (1977) directed by Sam Peckinpah (The Wild Bunch, Straw Dogs) is not only a rare anti-war film that has testicular fortitude, but also probably the only American directed World War II flick from the German perspective that is actually worth seeing and does not wallow endlessly in tiresome Teutonophobia. Of course, being a work created with American and British viewers in mind, Cross of Iron follows in the culturally disrespectful Hollywood tradition of featuring an international cast speaking in English for the German roles, but at least the film does feature some authentic Aryans, including Fassbinder superstars Klaus Löwitsch (Despair, The Marriage of Maria Braun), Dieter Schidor (Satan's Brew, Querelle), and Roger Fritz (Berlin Alexanderplatz, Lili Marleen), as well as real-life German bank robber turned writer/actor Burkhard Driest (Son of Hitler, Stroszek), and Academy Award winning Austrian-born actor Maximilian Schell (Judgment at Nuremberg, The Man in the Glass Booth). Based on the 1956 novel The Willing Flesh by German soldier turned novelist Willi Heinrich, which may have been based on the true story of Johann Scherz—Schwerdfeger—a German non-commissioned officer and super soldier who was awarded the Knight's Cross of the Iron Cross (the highest award possible in the Third Reich), Cross of Iron is the ultra-violent and philosophically unhinged story of a naughty kraut NCO who equally hates National Socialism and aristocrats yet also happens to be one of the greatest and most brave bastards killing Bolsheviks on the dreaded Eastern Front. Featuring quotes/references from Teutonic militarists like Friedrich von Bernhardi and Carl von Clausewitz (the man who wrote the popular aphorism "War is the continuation of Politik by other means"), as well as a crude and rather cynical quote from kraut commie playwright Bertolt Brecht, Cross of Iron is also a rare American directed World War II flick in the fact that it actually takes the time to study the 'enemy' and his history as opposed to merely hysterically harping on the holocaust and presenting Hitler as the devil incarnate and the German people as his decidedly demonic disciples. Oftentimes regarded as director Sam Peckinpah's last great film as a drastically declining filmmaker with a seemingly suicidal case of dipsomania and a softspot for cocaine, Cross of Iron is a brazenly bloody and brutal, ultra-violent tale of an angst-ridden anti-hero who tries to save his and his platoon's hides while dealing with the perniciousness and pretentiousness of a cowardly Prussian aristocrat officer and seemingly endless hordes of Soviet soldiers.

Opening with a collage of various glorious Nazi propaganda scenes juxtaposed against the horrific stock-footage of the brutal, bloody and body-ridden reality of the Eastern Front with the German children's folk song "Hänschen klein” playing in the background, Cross of Iron lets the viewer know from the get go that Uncle Adolf and the rest of the Nazi bigwigs were living lives of luxury while the average German was just hoping to survive the next day without facing starvation, frostbite, and/or Bolshevik bullets. After the black-and-white collage, Cross of Iron seamlessly segues into a bloody neck-slicing battle introducing anti-hero Rolf Corporal Steiner (James Coburn) and his men, who have killed every single man in a Bolshevik brigade, except a blond preteen Russian soldier boy (Slavko Štimac) who they spare due to his young age. Things change for the worst when a prick of an aristocratic Prussian officer named Captain Stransky (Maximilian Schell), who applied for a transfer from occupied France to have an opportunity to win the coveted Iron Cross, is made new battalion commander in the Kuban bridgehead on the Eastern Front and ultimately becomes the commander of a man that will prove to be his arch nemesis, Steiner. An absurdly arrogant aristocrat with appalling airs of superiority, Captain Stransky, despite his aversion to the ‘socialism’ of National Socialism and a classless society in general, still believes in the German cause and final victory, which baffles his superiors Colonel Brandt (James Mason), and his adjutant, Captain Kiesel (David Warner). Upon meeting Steiner, Stransky demands that he shoot the Russian boy that his platoon captured, which the antagonistic soldier refuses to do, thus ushering in their mutual hatred for one another.

CROSS OF IRON

When Captain Stransky gives Steiner the news that he has been made a ‘Senior Sergeant,’ the Prussian aristocrat seems baffled by the fact that the seemingly nihilistic NCO seems rather apathetic about his seemingly prestigious promotion. If Steiner cares about anything, it is the lives of the soldiers in his platoon. The only thing Stransky cares about is his pride and reputation, especially when it comes to obtaining the Iron Cross, which he needs to win or face irreparable shame from his family. When Stransky discovers his leather-fag-mustache-sporting adjutant, Lieutenant Triebig (Roger Fritz), is a crypto-cocksucker after catching him sensually stroking the neck of an Aryan twink named Josef Keppler, it gives him an ace up his sleeve. Of course, Stransky plans to blackmail Triebig for his own ends, which he will ultimately. An ominous and foreboding message is delivered to Steiner when he releases the captive Russian boy and the little lad is gunned down in friendly fire by his own Bolshevik buddies, who ultimately kill a number of Germans as well. While blueblood bitch Stransky cowers in his bunker, his adjunct Lieutenant Meyer (Igor Galo), who just celebrated his birthday, leads a successful counterattack which gets him killed that stops the Slavs from totally slaughtering their platoon, but Steiner is severely injured after attempting to save a wounded comrade, which lands him in the hospital. After awakening from a horrific coma involving phantasmagorical nightmares of Teutonic wraiths, he awakes to a beautiful nurse named Sister Eva (Senta Berger) who cannot resist his boorish charm, thus the two begin a brief romantic fling. While Steiner initially suffers from hallucinations of friends and comrades, as well as enjoying the sexual company of the nurse, he turns down home leave and his new girlfriend Eva and decides to get back to work and war with his platoon. Upon arriving back to the Eastern Front, Stransky offers to let bygones be bygones and begin a new start with Steiner, but with a catch. Under the false pretense of claiming to have led that counterattack that was really led by martyr Meyer, Stransky has been nominated for the Iron Cross and needs Steiner as one of two signatures (blackmailed homo Triebig has naturally already agreed to sign) to corroborate the fictional story to get the award. Although Stransky offers to essentially make Steiner a rich man after the war, the noble yet nihilistic NCO turns him down. As revenge, Stransky intentionally neglects to notify Steiner's platoon of an incoming Soviet invasion of the German battalion that will mean very immediate death for anyone that stays. Although Steiner and his men survive the Soviet bombardment, they must take special precautions to make their way back to their battalion. On their way, Steiner's platoon happens on an all-female Red Army platoon whose uniforms they steal so they can disguise themselves as Soviet soldiers, but also results in the castration of a hated SS man via cock-chomping and the death of a teenage youth named Dietz, who is bludgeoned to death by a falsely flirting Soviet babe. When Steiner and his men eventually near their battalion, they have the foresight to radio ahead so as to avoid friendly fire due to the fact they are incognito and wearing Russian uniforms, but when Stransky catches wind of this, he orders Triebig to machine gun them down and act like it was an accident, which ultimately kills everyone in the entire Platoon except the subversive Sergeant and his two comrades Corporal Krüger (Klaus Löwitsch) and Private Anselm (Dieter Schidor), both of whom are incidentally played by Fassbinder actors. Naturally, Steiner blows away Triebig with a storm of bullets and Corporal Krüger finishes him off with a knife in the gut. When Steiner eventually confronts Stransky about his dirty and devilish deeds, he cowers like a scared puppy awaiting punishment. While initially intending to kill Stransky, Steiner arms the cowardly aristocrat for battle, but not after calling him an "aristocratic pile of Prussian pig shit!" To prove his dubious honor and show him "how a Prussian officer can fight," Stransky takes up Steiner's challenge to fight like a man for the first time in his rather posh life. While Steiner shows Stransky, "where the Iron Crosses grow," the aristocrat shows he is unable to even reload his MP40 submachine gun weapon with ammunition. Of course, Steiner has the 'last laugh' when he watches Stransky begging for help while being shot at by a preteen Russian boy.

Concluding with real historical photos of Germany's victims as well as victims of subsequent wars and finally the Bertold Brecht quote, "Don't rejoice in his defeat, you men. For though the world has stood up and stopped the bastard, the bitch that bore him is in heat again," Cross of Iron is not so much anti-Nazi as it is generically anti-war. Of course, while being 'anti-war,' Cross of Iron is no pussy pacifist piece as it the film's 'anti-hero'—a man that admittedly hates

CROSS OF IRON

“all officers” (even those ‘enlightened ones’) and the “entire German army” and believes “God is a sadist but probably doesn’t even know it”—is also the greatest and most proficient killer in the entire film, thus making Peckinpah’s film not so much anti-war as it is anti-authority, anti-ruling class, and anti-aristocracy. In Cross of Iron, the ‘unknown soldiers,’ the German Wehrmacht, were finally given their due, so it should be no surprise that the film was very popular in Germany, being the biggest box-office hit since The Sound of Music (1965). Not unsurprisingly, Cross of Iron was a box-office failure in the U.S., which was in part due to the coinciding release of the feel-good blockbuster Star Wars Episode IV: A New Hope, which ironically utilized Riefenstahl-esque aesthetics. Described by no one less than Orson Welles as “the best war film he had seen about the ordinary enlisted man since All Quiet on the Western Front,” Cross of Iron is the aesthetic and sociopolitical antidote to the anti-kraut bloodfest and philistine sentimentalist propaganda of S. Spielberg’s Saving Private Ryan (1998). Of course, as demonstrated by the character Colonel Brandt’s remark, “The German soldier no longer has any ideals. He’s not fighting for the culture of the West, not for one form of government that he wants, and not for the stinking party. He’s fighting for his life. God bless him,” Cross of Iron makes the noble, if not somewhat naïve, attempt to disassociate the German soldier from National Socialism, which is something that Hollywood has rarely ever done (how many Americans can describe the difference between a German and a Nazi?).

What I found most unintentionally hilarious about Cross of Iron is the utilization of James Coburn—a man whose appearance and character scream grizzled American Scot-Irish—in the lead role as a sort of archetypal Western anti-hero and even the German Fassbinder actors featured in the film have a sort of redneck air about them. Undoubtedly, Cross of Iron is the closest an American directed World War II flick has come to somehow reconciling Germanness with Americanness, thus making it consumable for the most culturally retarded of American viewers, which was no small task on alcohol-addled director Sam Peckinpah’s part, who sunk $90,000 of his own money into the film. Of course, Steiner’s anti-aristocratic remark, “If I remember correctly, Kant was the son of a saddle maker and Schubert’s father was a poor schoolmaster. Perhaps talent, sensitivity and character are no longer privileges of the so-called upper class,” will speak to the typical Yank filmgoer. American viewers, who have always displayed a sentimental softspot for the ‘underdog’ as perennial peasants themselves, also probably loved the fact that Peckinpah portrays the Prussian aristocracy as a bunch of pernicious pansies and cowering girly men, even if it goes against historical reality as demonstrated by “The Red Baron” Manfred von Richthofen—the top ace flying pilot of the Great War and arguably the greatest and most well known fighter pilot in human history—as well as German field marshal Erich von Manstein, a Prussian aristocrat, who is also regarded as one of Germany’s greatest military strategists.

As demonstrated by the ever so wise Colonel Brandt's remark, "Steiner is a myth. But men like him are our last hope. And in that sense, he's truly a very dangerous man," Cross of Iron anti-hero Rolf Steiner is a 'man's man' and the sort of stoic and innately individualistic 'fuck you' kind of renegade ruffian that every (American) man wishes he was and thus acting as a 'stand in' for the American viewer to be able to sympathize with men in the German military, which no other Yank directed film has been able to do. Indeed, Cross of Iron is a celluloid cultural mongrel for sure, but that is also one of the things that gives the film its idiosyncratic nihilistic-nazi-cowboy character as a work that could have never been created within the kraut-contempting confines of the Hebraic Hollywood studio system. More than just a film, Cross of Iron is a coincidental celebration of Europeans of all stripes in its utilization of German, European-American, English, Slavic, etc. actors, which is all the more important considering the historical context of the film. Undoubtedly, World War II was a fratricidal war that led the world to turn into the worldwide multicultural sewer it is today, where even the victors of the war, Great Britain and the United States, suffer the infiltration of hostile rabble from the Third World. Of course, as the Occidental world grows ever darker, both literally and figuratively, with a soaring non-white birth rate and accompanying increase in crime levels and staggering decrease in collective intellect and ingenuity, I think more and more people are going to look to the once reviled German soldiers as heroes and the Americans, English, and French as shabbos goyim duped into murdering their own brothers for the benefit of a perennial enemy. For all the morons that like to gloat, "we'd be speakin' German if da Natzis had won da war!," what is so bad about that? After all, how many Nietzsches, Heideggers, Kants, Goethes, and/or Spenglers has the Anglo-American world produced?!

-Ty E

THE STEEL HELMET
THE STEEL HELMET

Samuel Fuller (1951)

Samuel Fuller's Steel Helmet is probably the most honest war film of its time. It presents honest character flaws, racism, inner demons, nihilism, and other very controversial ideas. Steel Helmet was able to offend both ends of the political spectrum. Fuller was also summoned by the Pentagon because of a scene in the film showing the shooting of a POW. America had never seen this side before, yet the Steel Helmet was loved by audiences. Fuller's honesty and brutality reached them. Race is central to the film's plot and confronted from the beginning. The film's not so likable protagonist Sgt. Zach, is rescued by an orphaned North Korean boy. Zach thinks little of the boy but eventually lets him tag along. Throughout the film slight signs give you the impression Zach is warming up to the boy. When the young boy is killed, Zach breaks down emotionally but tries to cover it up by blaming the boy. In an emotional rage Zach machine guns a POW for insulting a letter the boy has written. The barbaric Zach has finally broken through his strong emotional defense mechanism. Unconventional relationships like Zach's and the young boy had never really been portrayed in war films before Steel Helmet.

Another controversial part of Steel Helmet was baiting of a black and Japanese American soldier by the North Korean POW. The POW mentions to the Japanese soldier that America's put his people in concentration camps. He tells him that America does not like people with their eyes. The Japanese American seems to be already desensitized and accepting of the position he has taken as ethnically the enemy. The Japanese American considers himself American before anything.

The crimes of the United States and its allies (mainly the Soviet Union) had not been discussed publicly before the film. Dwight Eisenhower's death camps have been said to have killed up to 1.7 million German POWs by starvation and Josef Stalin's NKVD basically shot any German soldier they captured. Stalin also kept Auschwitz open for business.

America's alignment with the Soviet Union is one of the most disturbing things to consider. The worst part being we allowed Eastern Europe to be enslaved by Communism. The Soviet Union had produced countless Genocidal killers such as Leon Trotsky (real name David Bronstein), Lazar Kaganovich (man made famine starved 7-10 million to death in the Ukraine for resisting Communism), and Genrikh Yagoda which eventually lead to the deaths of up to 100 million Christians and Muslims throughout Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. These issues, with the Dresden and Tokyo fire bombings, could never convince me that World War II was a war of "Good" vs. "Evil." Such an idea is absurd. I found it interesting in the reading Franz Fanon was quoted in the reading. Fanon was very obsessed with the race issue being a Franco-African soldier fighting for France in World War II. Like the minorities in Steel Helmet, Fanon experienced racial discrimination by a country he fought for. Race became central to his various writings. In the later years of his life, Fanon turned to nihilism. The questions that people don't want to ask caught up with Fanon just as the Japanese American and Black soldier in Steel Helmet. At the end of the film, important questions never truly get answered. The Steel Helmet end title "there is no end to this story" perfectly compliments its nihilistic themes. The writings also bring up the issue of Jews wearing blackface to become more "white" and "American." The writing attempted to excuse the Jew from acts of racism in regards to Hollywood blackface. Although persecuted, the Jew had a more privileged place in society. But then again, the Jewish/Black alignment during the Civil Rights era further complicate the issue. The alliance was most likely because both groups became powerful when together. The NAACP was formed by a collection of blacks, Jews, and a German American. Although all groups differ, they could work together for the same cause just as they do in Steel Helmet. This essay is in response to a boring article I read on Fuller.

-Ty E

THE NAKED KISS
THE NAKED KISS

Samuel Fuller (1964)

The Naked Kiss is a pulp gem directed by B movie auteur Samuel Fuller. A city prostitute takes up life as a small town nurse. She soon realizes that the little town is not as clean as she desired it to be. Sam Fuller always had an obsession with examining topics and situations that most people would rather pretend didn't exist. The Naked Kiss may be the most offensive of Fuller's long list of films. Young multicultural crippled children in pirate outfits surround the prostitute turned nurse's new life. Her new love Grant, has a disturbing attachment to these unfortunate children. Grant's family is famous in this small town and his secret may upset quite a few people. Even prostitutes can only tolerate so much. The Naked Kiss was obviously promoted as a lowbrow shock fest during its release. Although obviously catering to its intended audience, The Naked Kiss is much more than a cheap thrill. City boy Samuel Fuller may have contempt for the small town. It is doubtful that he bought into the wholesome values of such a foreign area. Cultural Marxist morons may have even called him a "xenophobe" if it fit their agenda. Samuel Fuller was obsessed with political commentary, sleaze, and the dark depths of humanity. The Naked Kiss features all of Fuller's signature qualities. Like many of his films, it would also be considered a Neo-Noir, considering it was released 20 years after the peak of that genre. Quentin Tarantino, Martin Scorsese, and Brian De Palma borrowed a lot from the late director. Fuller's influence on filmmaking should be more recognized. Expect disturbing a children's song when watching The Naked Kiss. Don't expect graphic violence, nudity, and perversion. The Naked Kiss does more alluding than showing. Fuller knew how to get around the censors.

-Ty E

WHITE DOG

Samuel Fuller (1982)

Part Neo-noir and part blaxploitation, White Dog is all bite. After snagging a copy on 5MTL.com, I watched this film with at least zero expectations after baring witness to dog-attack dreck such as Rottweiler and Man's Best Friend. The film has recently been given a release sometime in 2008 on the Criterion Collection's roster. Just the sound of this melts avid DVD collectors ears and repositions our dreams. Lately, I have noticed Criterion just releasing Kurosawa diarrhea and thought the label's originality had dried up. But with news of White Dog being released, all my hopes were fulfilled.

White Dog is a film about two things - racism and primal instinct. When these two go hand in hand, we wind up with a film of this caliber. A single woman, while driving on the wet road at night, hits an albino German Shepard. She quickly gets out of her car and throws the wounded pup in the passenger seat. Upon taking him to the mild-mannered veterinarian, she is slapped with a bill and decides to hold onto him. Her Bruce Springsteen look-alike boyfriend eventually convinces her to set up a flyer displaying the beautiful found dog. After tacking them up for the duration of a couple scenes, the poor girl almost gets raped by a home intruder. What makes this scene so amazing, you ask? The suspense and tension builds up like a wildfire and uncorks it in your face. The dog is sitting on a chair sleeping, with a war film in the background. We witness a struggle and the dogs eyes flicker. Cannons and rifles are screaming across a battlefield. When the battle dies down, the man screams. This nice furry dog that we have seen turns into a bloodthirsty hound bent on ripping this man's throat out. Just when you think the rapist escapes, this dog jumps through a glass window. Upon the man getting arrested, she loves the dog and decides to keep it. While the single woman is filming a scene in a movie, we notice the co-actor who is black. The dog's face contorts into a sheer mask of fury and attacks her viciously. Luckily, she doesn't press charges. The poor woman is confused as to why it attacked her and decides to sleep it out. The scene then cuts to a black delivery driver who gets mauled by the dog then crashes into a store. After a few more incidents, she realizes this is an attack dog. Seeking help, she runs into a colored gentleman with her dog muzzled and leashed. The dog escapes and begins to try to bite the hapless man. All you can really hear is black people screaming about a "WHITE DOG". So, we find out that when this dog was a puppy, the owner hired black junkies to beat it rendering it hateful of the black skin. Enter Keys, a black lion trainer who decides to use the power of soul and redemption and makes it a personal challenge to try to convert this dog. They way they described this dog's "sickness" made it sound as if it were an urban legend. The final scene in this film is horrifying and basks in it's on brutality. Now, this film worked for so many reasons. The dialogue is sharp and tactful while the actors are borderline great or decent. The score was composed by Ennio Morricone. It really completes the mood of the film. You'd think the star of this film would be Key's character but truth be told, it is the White Dog that steals the show. These dogs might be the most incredible acting team ever. These dogs jump through glass, attacks black people, and can act rabid on a single whim. They used 6 different dogs in this film to play our vicious lead. Samuel Fuller is a wizard behind the camera. Bizarre angles invade your screen and shows you a scene in an entirely new way. If only one film had the right to display Black Power, it would be this one. It doesn't shove morals in your face, it just explains to you that it is wrong. The film starts off mellow but then turns into a fast paced noirish film laced with scenes of horror. This film was made in 1982 but was shelved for several years due to the racy elements. Samuel Fuller touched down with his own fears on this film. Just as in The Steel Helmet, he shows his opposition to racism, him being a Jew and all. Many film makers have shown their inspiration and gratitude towards Fuller such as Tarantino, Godard, and Jarmusch. He is truly a relevant director who is talented in his own regards. This film was adapted off of a book from author Romain Gary who wrote the book about his own dog. White Dog is a powerful film that is not ought to be missed. Expect an amazing transfer from Criterion here soon and save your money for this film. White Dog is a brutal, realist film that shows the horrors of mankind in a whole new light. This is easily the best "When Animals Attack" film ever made.

WHITE DOG

-mAQ

PIN

Sandor Stern (1988)

When I was an angry young man with a unrefined sort of visceral hatred, I listened to a lot of punk/hardcore bands from the late-1970s/early-1980s like Black Flag, Minor Threat, The Misfits, and the Youth Brigade. Not to be confused with the less popular Washington D.C. hardcore band of the same name, Los Angeles-based Youth Brigade was comprised of Jewish (non-racist) skin-head brothers named the Sterns, who even had their own pseudo-fascistic Hitler Youth-esque organization entitled BYO (Better Youth Organization), which also served as their record company, as well as a promoter of their 'Peter Pan Punk' Weltanschauung that used such slogans as "youth is an attitude, not an age" and "every generation has a responsibility to change what they feel is wrong in the world." Anyway, not until a couple years ago would I realize that the Stern brothers of the Youth Brigade had a Canadian-born filmmaker father named Sandor Stern who among other things, wrote the script for the original The Amityville Horror (1979) and was the winner of the 1979 NAACP Image Award for "best screenplay" for the now all but forgotten basketball flick Fast Break (1979), but more importantly, he was the director/screenwriter for the absurdly aberrant Canadian cult horror-thriller Pin (1988) aka Pin: A Plastic Nightmare. A patently perverse horror flick in the tradition of the Pinocchio legend, Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), Magic (1978) starring Anthony Hopkins, and WASP unfriendly horror Hebrew Larry Cohen horror flicks that is based on the 1981 novel of the same name written by V.C. Andrews' ghostwriter Andrew Neiderman (Child's Play, The Devil's Advocate), Pin is a patently contrived horror flick with a Nickelodeon's Are You Afraid of the Dark?-esque (incidentally, both are Canadian productions) aesthetic with a cast of characters wearing anachronistic, dandy-like Ralph Lauren wardrobes of the perennial preppy sort, yet it has something curiously captivating about it as a sort of perverted propaganda of the conspicuously kosher variety. Featuring a wayward white bread bourgeois family comprised of individuals that all have striking and seemingly artificial blond hair and blue eyes, Pin is a peculiar pseudo-Freudian assault on the Aryan middle-class that is full of sexual impotence, incest, sexually-depraved schizophrenia, frigid housewives, agalmatophilia, fascist fathers, and just about every other libelous attack that Judaic Freud-Marxist maniac Wilhelm Reich made against the goys of Germany. A rather simply assembled and easy-to-follow flick that was clearly made to be palatable for young children, Pin is a piece of accidentally absurd aesthetic terrorism geared at influencing the most impressionable and innocent of minds, even if it features fathers giving daughters abortions, mothers molesting life-size anatomically correct medical dummies, brothers controlling their sisters' sex lives, and nephews intentionally giving their bitchy aunts heart attacks, as director Sandor Stern assembled himself a putrid piece of hypnotic

PIN

Hebraic propaganda that is more complex and intricate than it would seem upon a mere superficial glance as the kind of work that psychologically debased and destroyed an entire generation of the Occident.

Dr. Frank Linden (Terry O'Quinn)—a stoic man of ostensibly Germanic descent—is a creepy authoritarian WASP who teaches his children about the 'birds and the bees' and other unflattering bodily functions via ventriloquism through a human-size anatomically correct medical dummy named "Pin" that looks like a real skinless human on superficial glance in the spirit of Clive Baker's Hellraiser (1987). Unfortunately, Linden's son Leon (David Hewlett) believes that Pin is a living and breathing guru of immense and all-knowing wisdom, but his little sister Ursula (Cynthia Preston) is certainly not so naïve. On top of the fact that he has no friends because his acutely anal retentive mother reprimands him for playing outdoors and "getting dirty" (all furniture in the Linden household is encased in plastic), Leon is also apparently an undiagnosed schizophrenic with traits of disassociative personality disorder, thus Pin makes for the ultimate plastic imaginary friend. Needless to say, Leon is totally traumatized when he accidentally witnesses his father's nurse raping the anatomically correct dummy Pin, which apparently has a protruding plastic pecker. Just like any serial killer or wicked sex fiend, little Leon naturally grows up to be a much more deranged young man and his ultimately malicious mental illness does not do his sexually active little sister any favors.

Now an angst-addled 18-year-old senior in high school, Leon becomes rather enraged when he discovers a couple of wisecracking jocks have written "if you want an easy screw, Ursula will do!" on his locker and not long after he discovers his 15-year-old sister fornicating in a car with a gentlemen that the teenage schizophrenic brutally beats up to a bloody pulp. Naturally, Leon gives his sister an ultimatum, stating to her, "I don't want a sister who's a tramp. If you ever do it again you can forget I'm your brother." Being a loyal sis, Ursula ultimately abides by brother Leon's demand, but unfortunately she is already pregnant. Leon recommends that they go to Pin for advice as they did as children and the dummy, which the schizo teen now acts as a ventriloquist for after learning the trick from his father, states, "The doctor is a truly scientific man. I don't think morality will affect his attitude. You made a mistake and it must be rectified." Indeed, doctor dad Frank Linden rectifies the mistake by personally performing an abortion on his own knocked-up daughter, even asking his son "Aren't you going to observe, Leon?" in regard to his sister's first child being ripped out of the womb by its physician grandfather. Dr. Linden may be an emotionally vacant fellow who seems to be suffering from socially-retarding Asperger syndrome, but he has enough sense to get rid of Pin when he finally figures out the perturbing degree of his son Leon's penetrating psychosis and rather ridiculous relationship with the doll, but unfortunately the good doctor and his wife are killed in a car accident en route to a medical school (where the doc planned to leave the dummy) where the man of the house was to give a speech. Being a martial wasp of the pathologically clean-cut and ultra-conservative kind, Dr. Linden hated being late and was driving rather fast and erratically to get to the medical school on time, hence why they crash, but while the Linden parents perish, Pin naturally survives and soon takes over the Linden household.

At first, the Linden children, especially Leon, feel rather liberated by their parents' deaths and immediately take the plastic off the family furniture and Ursula jokes that, in regard to her mother, "I bet she is telling god to take off his shoes." Unfortunately, the fun is short-lived as Leon and Ursula's bitchy and nosey aunt Dorothy (Patricia Collins) moves in, but luckily Leon realizes that she has a heart condition and literally scares her to death via Pin. Ursula takes a job at a library and soon meets a nice and sensitive gentleman named Stan Fraker (John Pyper-Ferguson), which infuriates her brother Leon, who firmly believes the new boyfriend wants to swindle the Linden family inheritance and institutionalize the boy shizzo in a sanitarium. Leon, an aspiring epic poet, also does not take kindly to Stan's negative critique of his novel-in-progress about a "modern day Beowulf" named 'Testes' who "creates as much progeny as he can" and uses rape (including against his sister "Ursula") to do so. Jealous and lonely due to his little sister's hot and steamy relationship, Leon feebly attempts a date with a girl named Marcia Bateman (Helene Udy), but he can only think and talk about Pin when the gal gets undressed and attempts coitus with the schizophrenic sexual coward. Extremely jealous and wanting to keep his sister for himself, Leon drugs Stan and bludgeons him with a wooden statue when he attempts to fight back. Leon concocts a bullshit story about Stan leaving town to altruistically visit a sick friend, which Ursula initially believes, but it does not take long for her to discover her brother's loony lies and she eventually attacks him with an axe as if haphazardly attempting to impersonate Jason Voorhees. In the end, Leon enters a comatose state and takes the identity of Pin.

A virtual pseudo-psychoanalytic celluloid catalog of stereotypically Jewish diagnosis of Nordic pathologies in the form of a seemingly humble horror-thriller, Pin brings to life in ridiculous melodramatic form scatological Semite Norman Mailer's analysis, "The mind of the Wasp bears more resemblance to the laser than the mind of any other ethnic group... To wit, he can project himself 'extraordinary distances through a narrow path. He's disciplined, stoical, able to become the instrument of his own will, has extraordinary boldness and daring together with a resolute lack of imagination. He's profoundly nihilistic. And this nihilism found its perfect expression in the odyssey to the moon—because we went there without knowing why we went." Indeed, while the only normal member of the Linden family is Ursula—a 'progressive' girl who has sex with a number of men at a young age before marriage—everyone else in the family, especially father Frank Linden and Leon, both suffer an unhealthy detachment from reality and communication with other people. While Dr. Linden lacks emotional connection and sexual maturity to such a degree that he must teach his children about sex by proxy through a medical dummy as opposed to speaking directly to them like a normal and loving father would, Mother Linden is a sexually repressed wench who suffers from such a bad case of obsessive compulsive disorder that she prevents her son from developing friendships, thus helping to lead to his debilitating psychosis and dumb dummy fetishism. As originally theorized by late 19th century Viennese Jewish intellectuals like psychoanalyst 'soul doctors' like Sigmund Freud, Sandor Stern depicts Dr. Linden's brilliance as a physician and Leon's talent as a perverted poet in Pin as the result of unhealthy mental pathologies and not as true genius, which are the sort of libelous claims that have become rather absurd clichés in modern academia that speak more about the mental state of the intellectual than the person being 'analyzed.' Indeed, Mailer's description of the WASP mind being more like a "laser than the mind of any other ethnic group" is certainly readily apparent in the character of Dr. Linden and his son Leon in Pin—a virtual work of celluloid Kabbalah black magic unleashed on the soul of Faustian youth, just as multicultural merry shows like Nickelodeon's Are You Afraid of the Dark? worked in a similarly malicious anti-Occidental fashion, albeit to a less gratuitous and perverse degree that does not feature nurse-on-dummy action and father-on-daughter abortions. Undoubtedly, if there is anything 'scary' about Pin, it is not its psychological horror show about an unhealthy boy with a curious relationship with a dummy, but the degree to which director Sandor Stern goes to metaphysically defile traditional Nordic man and his culture, religion, and achievements. Featuring a villain with an archetypical Hitler Youth-like appearance and haircut that fantasizes about impregnating as many young ladies as possible in the spirit of the SS Lebensborn in a totally white world of physically immaculate blond and blue-eyed people with something ugly and incestuous yet sexually-repressed hiding just underneath the surface, Pin is what happens when an Aryan-hating Hebrew does Hitchcock and creates something unintentionally enthralling as if directed by Woody Allen's humorless, horror-movie-loving third cousin. If one is looking for a more objective approach to Jewish versus Aryan families, compare the fictional Nordic family depicted in Sandor Stern's Pin to the real-life Hebraic pedophile ring of foul family in the documentary Capturing the Friedmans (2003) directed by Jewish auteur Andrew Jarecki. Admittedly, I had a lot of fun watching Nordic lunatic Leon going deranged with his dummy comrade in Pin, but the film did not even remotely horrify me like the child-deflowering father-son duo in Capturing the Friedmans.

PIN

-Ty E

BATMAN: DEAD END

Sandy Collora (2003)

Batman is a superhero with a real weakness. Not some moon rock or a certain material weakness; Batman is emotionally vulnerable. Seeing him masquerade around in film is often embarrassing. In the Kilmer/Clooney films, he was a bit of a tart. Personally, I didn't enjoy Batman Begins as much as i wanted to. It was the much-needed origin, but it bored me far too much, and the costume of Scarecrow was mega disappointing. Batman: Dead End is exactly what the Batman films needed. The streets are given a dimly lit atmosphere in which his pain is the only thing he wallows in. The Joker has escaped from Arkham asylum and is as crazy as ever and is one of the more faithful live-action renditions of the Joker, save for Heath Ledger's terrifying character. This tortured character realizes that what the Joker has become was his fault. Cue the Aliens and the Predators. About the far into this short, my brain exploded. I was a fan of the Batman VS. Aliens/Predator comic books but the authenticity of such a situation always flabbergasted me. There is no way any mortal man could kill something of this caliber. Let's face it, Bruce Wayne isn't an Aryan superhero like Schwarzenegger. The budget was at around $30,000 dollars and this definitely shows in it's graphic novel lighting. The Predators look faithful to the original and the Xenomorph's are amazing. Batman proves he is a bad ass. For once, I was rooting for this short film to magically expand. A knife fight scene to reckon with. Regardless if you like Kevin Smith or not, This is the definitive Batman film. That is, until The Dark Knight is released.

-mAQ

TRACKS
TRACKS

Sandy Tung (1991)

As far as I am concerned, there is no such thing as a bad Dennis Hopper film, at least if the legendary (and somewhat infamous) actor is portraying one of the central characters. Indeed, in his quite remarkable ability to turn otherwise shitty films into something quite enjoyable, including clichéd anti-Southern leftist garbage like Stephen Gyllenhaal's Paris Trout (1991), Paul Schrader's hopelessly kitschy pseudo-Lovecraftian made-for-TV turd Witch Hunt (1994), and Jan de Bont's big blockbuster booger Speed (1994), Hopper almost had alchemical powers as an actor. Arguably, the best example of Hopper's singular talent as an actor is the rarely seen experimental antiwar drama Tracks (1977) directed by Hebraic wuss Henry Jaglom (A Safe Place, Last Summer in the Hamptons), who is a strikingly self-exploitative and nauseatingly narcissistic auteur that I admittedly have a special sort of hatred and contempt for. A self-described "male lesbian" (notably, in the doc Who Is Henry Jaglom? (1997), Candice Bergen describes Jaglom as having physically resembled a "samurai transvestite" during the 1970s) who thrives on making gynocentric low-budget melodramas featuring singularly repugnant broads and bitch-boys whining and complaining in a thoroughly self-indulgent fashion that hints the director probably missed his true calling as a quack psychoanalyst, Jaglom is a master of the intricately melodramatically mundane, yet somehow his second feature is a mostly continuously enthralling flick that even has a bit of good old fashioned testicular fortitude. Shot guerrilla style on various trains without permits and with Jaglom's accountant (his brother Michael Emil) and producer (Zack Norman aka Howard Zuker) playing important roles (in fact, both men would portray a comedic criminal duo in the director's subsequent feature Sitting Ducks (1980)), Tracks was considered so controversial and in poor taste upon its release since it was made not long after the end of the catastrophic mess that was the Vietnam War that it is the sole film in the director's oeuvre that never received theatrical distribution (which is saying a lot considering Jaglom has made so many embarrassingly horrendous films that no one would want to watch). Not surprisingly, the film was not Jaglom's first excursion in anti-Vietnam War cinema, as he was responsible for buying and distributing the Academy Award winning documentary Hearts and Minds (1974) directed by Peter Davis after Columbia Pictures refused to distribute it, or as Peter Biskind wrote in his book Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998), "BBS sued Columbia for various monies allegedly owed, and to force [David] Begelman to released HEARTS AND MINDS. Eventually, Jaglom ponied up $1 million, which he and his partner, Zack Norman, had laboriously raised from dentists and plastic surgeons over the course of five years to produce his own Vietnam-themed picture, TRACKS, to star Dennis Hopper. He bought HEARTS AND MINDS from Columbia, then turned around and entered into a distribution deal with [John] Calley, who released the film in December 1974, in time to qualify for the Oscars.” Luckily, Tracks is nowhere near as lame and emotionally manipulative as a lackluster far-left agitprop piece like Hearts and Minds. In other words, Hopper completely dominates the film and, at the very least, should be considered a secondary auteur, as a true mensch who blessed Jaglom’s flick with an ample degree of precious lifeblood that is completely nonexistent in the director’s other films.

Forget the sappy sentimentalism of Hal Ashby’s Coming Home (1978), Jaglom’s film utilizes Hopper’s visceral acting prowess to violently express the sense of abject defeat and dreary disillusionment that many Vietnam War veterans felt upon returning home after oftentimes barely surviving battle and discovering no big parades or packs of beautiful women waiting for them. For anyone that is familiar with Jaglom’s oeuvre, it is quite obvious that Hopper took over Tracks and made it his film (in fact, in the audio commentary for the Paramount DVD release of the film, the filmmaker reveals that Hopper tore up a long monologue that he had written for the ending and instead completely improvised the dialogue for the unforgettable final scene). While, quite unsurprisingly, never an actual soldier himself, Hopper was the son of a Master Sergeant in the OSS during World War II, so it is somewhat fitting that he portrays a deranged Army First Sergeant (1SG) in the film. Edited down to 90 minutes from a 4 hour and 15 minute cut first cut (somewhat ironically, Jaglom’s first film job was being involved in the reediting of Hopper’s debut feature Easy Rider (1969), which apparently originally had a 4+ hour running time), Tracks is a sort of raw and erratic cinematic ride from post-hippie hell where Hopper, who was at the height of his substance abuse problems at the time of shooting, gives a truly tenacious and fittingly emotionally tyrannical tour-de-force performance that epitomizes why he is best remembered today as a wayward acting legend who was able to channel his real-life mental idiosyncrasies into his performances. Indeed, if Hopper ever experienced anything resembling boot camp, it was probably his experience working on the film where, despite being in his early 40s at the time of shooting, seems like a genuinely troubled young man that suffers from some serious sexual hangups. Jaglom’s only film featuring an action sequence, Track is a semi-surreal psychodrama about a soldier that, despite being on the brink of complete mental deterioration, is on a special assignment to escort the corpse of his comrade to his hometown and takes a long train ride across the country where he meets various curious characters and even makes a desperate attempt at love when he is not suffering debilitating hallucinations that involve phantom female killers in military drag, jovial gang-rapes, and interracial kidnappings, among other uniquely unforgettable things that you would never expect to see in a film by the director of such excruciatingly feminine whine-fests as Eating (1990) and Babyfever (1994).

At the very beginning of Tracks, quasi-antihero 1st Sgt. Jack Falen (Dennis Hopper) is depicted sitting on a train, asking an unseen person, "Do you think about your childhood often?" and then awkwardly remarking, "I think about mine...when the going gets rough. I think about my childhood at the strangest times." Indeed, as an American boy from a poor rural town who grew up regularly exposed to heroic and triumphant World War II propaganda, Falen has a rather romantic of war that is completely contrary to his personal experiences as a soldier that saw action in the Vietnam War and now suffers from a pernicious case of posttraumatic stress disorder as a result. Throughout the film, Falen is depicted carrying around a small radio that is incessantly blasting classic WWII propaganda pop songs sung by the likes of Glen Miller, Frank Sinatra, Dinah Shore, Bing Crosby, Fred Astaire, etc., as if he is attempting to live in another time and place that exists solely in his imagination. Of course, Falen listens to these obscenely outmoded anti-jap and anti-kraut pop tunes for largely therapeutic reasons, as he oftentimes finds himself needing to find a 'happy place' as a result of the PTSD he has received from his brutal wartime experiences. Despite all evidence to the contrary, in Falen's mind, his dead buddy is going to receive an extremely warm reception as a 'hero' when he is delivered in a coffin to his hometown. In short, Sergeant Falen suffers from a horrible case of denial because, if he were to accept that his traumatic experiences and the deaths of his comrades were totally pointless and completely in vain, it might lead to the irrevocable disintegration of his extremely fragile psyche. Luckily, before elements of reality begin seeping into his rather thick skull and his head eventually figuratively explodes, Falen manages to have some fun with the colorful collection of characters that he encounters on his epic train journey to hell.

TRACKS

Since he is a fairly morose guy with glaring anxiety issues and low-esteem that seems like he could explode into a homicidal rage at any moment as a result of the most minor personal discomforts, it is a good thing that Sergeant Falen's train is occupied by wisecracking middle-aged Hebrews and a couple hot young chicks, among other eclectic individuals. Indeed, aside from a balding blond Judaic dude named Emile (Michael Emil) that likes philosophizing about chess and masturbation and a bald and swarthy land-peddling swindler named Gene (Zack Norman), a beautiful young brunette named Stephanie (Tyronne Power's daughter Taryn Power, whose final film appearance was incidentally in Jaglom's Eating (1990)) and her somewhat less attractive friend Chloe (Topo Swope of Edwin Sherin's My Old Man's Place (1971), which is also about a deranged Sergeant with PTSD) are just a couple of the passengers that Falen somewhat reluctantly befriends on the train. Hardly a natural lady's man, the seemingly sexually inexperienced army sergeant is introduced to Stephanie and her friend Chloe by an effeminate lady's man that dresses like a disco fag named Mark (Dean Stockwell, who of course would later join Hopper in David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986) where he would sport similarly flamboyant clothing). When Mark randomly pays Falen a friendly visit in his room to shoot the shit, the protagonist describes how he is accompanying his friend's corpse across the country and describes how he and his dead comrade would "get high from Thai weed" while hanging out in foxholes and "watch [ing] the tracer bullets flash over us." In a rather revealing scene that demonstrates how delusional the protagonist is, Falen also states quite romantically regarding his dead friend, "I saw him do the most incredible things. I mean, this man was a Congressional Medal of Honor winner. But the way he bought it, the way he 'Katie'd by the door.' A tracer bullet, like, went right into the foxhole, and, like, it was like a flare coming out of him, and he was running around crazed. That's the way he bought it, and I'm taking him home. He's gonna have a band, he's gonna have a parade, he's gonna... He's..." Of course, Falen is in for a rude awakening when he finally comes to the bitter realization that not a single person, including family members, gives a shit about his dead buddy.

Unfortunately, when Falen joins Mark and the two girls for dinner one night, he almost suffers a panic attack and abruptly decides to exit the table to hang out with an inordinately wise young black bartender. When Stephanie gets up from the table and asks the bartender for some olives for her cocktail, Falen seizes the opportunity and awkwardly tell her how she looks like a girl "in a wheat field, with a hammer and a sickle" that he once saw on a commie propaganda poster in East Berlin. From there, Falen acts even more bizarre and unnerving, stating to the little lady in a somewhat creepy fashion like a deranged schoolboy with an unhealthy crush, "I think you're beautiful. I know that's very corny these days, to think somebody's beautiful, but you are. God, I want to hold you and talk to you and feel you, but I don't know how. See, I'm really shy, and this is very hard for me. I think I'd like to see you in my room." While Stephanie ultimately reluctantly agrees to follow Sergeant Falen back to his room, the protagonist makes a serious ass out of himself by kissing and licking her in a grotesque fashion in what is indubitably one of the most absurdly awkward make-out sessions in cinema history, thereupon inspiring the young beauty to abruptly flee the scene as if she just encountered a perverted three-dicked devil. Undoubtedly, the most pathetic aspect of this scene is that Stephanie gives Falen multiple chances to arouse her and treat her with the romantic attention that she desires, even asking him "Can I show you how I like to be kissed?" and then clearly showing him what she likes with her supple lips, but unfortunately the protagonist is a sad and pathetic sexual autistic who seems to have nil carnal knowledge. Luckily, the next morning, a wealthy yet fairly unattractive woman that is simply credited as 'The Lady' (Jaglom regular Barbara Flood) more or less jumps on Falen's cock while violently tonguing him in the same grotesque fashion that the protagonist is quite talented at. While kissing the lecherous lady, Falen discuss how garter belts turn him on because his mother wore them, even salaciously stating in regard to his Oedipal obsession with his progenitor, "I wanted her so bad." Indeed, Falen is both a literal and figurative mother-fucker if there ever was one.

TRACKS

As one can expect for a Jaglom film, a number of degenerates have small but memorable cameo roles, including a dorky tarot card reader (actor/director Paul Williams, who is responsible for directing forgotten cinematic works like Out of It (1969) and Dealing: Or the Berkeley-to-Boston Forty-Brick Lost-Bag Blues (1972)), who attempts to impress a group of attractive young gals by stating regarding the “The Star (XVII)” card, “See that. You got all the fluids going on inside of you. It’s not really fluids, it’s energy. You’ve got to put that energy right in the perineum. Perineum. You know where the perineum is? The perineum is right between the anus and the vagina. Now if you can get that energy into your perineum, see, and then bring it up your back into your head, then drop it through your head back down to your solar plexus, and then let it drop back down to the perineum again. You never have to make love again. ‘Cause you could just circulate your energy right around. You’ll never have to make love again.” Needless to say, the girls practically shit their pants laughing while the tarot reader preposterously pontificates on the power of the perineum (actually, contrary to what Mr. Williams states, the female taint is quite weak and often suffers trauma during childbirth). While playing cards with Emile, Gene, and a couple other guys, Falen attempts to impress a big burly middle-aged black man by passionately stating, “I’m escorting a coffin. Across the country. It’s a black man in that coffin. It’s a great black man. He saved my life, and I’m taking him home. I’m taking him home a hero. He’s gonna be Jackie Robinson when he gets home.” Naturally, Falen is not too happy when the negro gets visibly agitated and states, “I lost 21 guys in Korea. They’re buried over there. 21 out of 30. Why in the hell do you think you have the monopoly on feeling sorry for yourself? You only have one. I had 21. Sergeant, get off my back with this bull. I’ve lived a lifetime. A lifetime with 21 dead men,” thus further wounding the protagonist’s sense of pride. In fact, Falen is so upset by the jigaboo ex-GI’s less than sensitive remarks that he suffers a horrific hallucination where he imagines seeing Mark and a couple other guys laughing while gang-raping Stephanie in the back of the train car. Of course, Falen’s visions only get all the more disturbing from there as he becomes more and more aware of the harsh bitter truth.

During a rather revealing scene that manages to be both sad and pathetic, Falen’s exposes his fairly desperate reasons for joining the army by stating to Mark in regard to his impoverished childhood, “I wanted to know where the trains were going. I wanted to know where they were going [...] ‘Cause I couldn’t go anywhere. We were real poor. I couldn’t go anywhere, and I wondered where they were going. And so I joined the Army.” While Falen and Mark share a fairly sentimental moment of camaraderie after the two realize that they are both child runaways, their friendship comes to a swift and ugly end when Falen goes crazy upon seeing some MPs on the train. Indeed, after stripping off his uniform and scaring guests by walking around completely nude, Falen attempts to evade the military men by putting on civilian clothing and hiding in his room, so naturally he freaks out and refuses to help Mark when his friend randomly appears while in a clearly distressed state and begs him for help in what is ultimately a darkly hilarious scene juxtaposed with Carson Robison's singing the anti-Japanese WWII propaganda song "We're Gonna Have To Slap The Dirty Little Jap." Indeed, upon abruptly showing up at Falen's room, Mark reveals he is a fugitive yippie Abbie Hoffman type on the run and that he is attempting to evade being captured by government operatives, declaring while in a terribly panicked state, "I'm not what I seem. I'm not the guy that you've even met. I'm political, very political, radical political. And I mean, all my jewelry and stuff, it's just a cover, 'cause I'm underground, very underground. And there's someone on this fucking train that's a fink. So all you got to do is hide me. Will you do that for me?" Of course, Mark's revelation causes Falen to suffer serious cognitive dissonance to the point where he eventually becomes exceedingly enraged and somewhat irrationally screams at his new friend, "My buddy died because of guys like you. You're the guys that killed him. You're the guys that killed him! I want you out in the hall" and then throws him out of the room." After a semi-slapstick oriented chase sequence that involves the outlaw revolutionary jumping out of the train and attempting to board another, Falen passively watches from his room window as Mark is captured and manhandled by Gene and a couple Gestapo-esque hippie-hating MPs. Indeed, to the surprise of both Falen and the viewer, it turns out that Gene is actually a 'fink' government agent. As for Falen, he later rationalizes his treachery by remarking in regard to Mark that, "It's guys like that that have to be sacrificed, no matter how much you like them," though it is clear that he is actually wracked with guilt.

While Stephanie opts to ditch her plans with Chloe to stay on the train with Falen, the protagonist badly botches the clearly doomed romance. Notably, Stephanie reveals to Chloe that she is only interested in Falen as a sort of pity fuck, stating to her friend, "I just want to give him something nice, just once. He's had nothing nice in his whole life," as if she is a premium piece of pussy that is on a Christ-like mission of sexual altruism to sacrifice her glorious golden cunt to a lowly lumpenprole loser who probably does not even know where to insert his prick. Unfortunately for Falen, when it comes to finally prodding Stephanie's prized puss, the good sergeant suffers a sort of drugless trip during mid-coitus where he begins shouting in regard to betraying Mark, "It's guys like that that have to be sacrificed, no matter how much you like them," thus inspiring the little lady to scream "you're crazy" and "get away from me" and then runaway like her life depended on it. Of course, considering the sex scene is somewhat surreal and inordinately ethereal as a result of taking place in the curious setting of a sunny and scenic grassy hill, the film hints that this is just another one of Falen's hallucinations, though it is unquestionable that the foredoomed romance has ended as completely Stephanie disappears from the film after her truly nightmarish erotic encounter with the angst-ridden antihero. As can be expected at this point in the film when the antihero's behavior and actions are increasingly unpredictable and nonsensical, it becomes harder and harder for both the viewer and Falen to discern between reality and delusion. In one of the more darkly comedic hallucinations scenes, an old rich woman attempts to calm Falen's worries by patronizingly stating to him, "Don't you know that everything's going to be just fine? You're going to forget this in no time flat. Why, good heavens. I've seen this happen to so many people, and some of them can't take it, but you can take it. I can see it right in your eyes. You're a courageous little boy, and you've nothing to worry about, believe me," only for two high yellow negro train workers to appear out of nowhere, pick up the old woman as if they are terrorists kidnapping a hostage, and then disappear with her just as abruptly as they appeared. Additionally, when Emile disappears from the train and Falen asks Gene where he is, the land-peddler-cum-government-agent acts like he is crazy and says he does not know anyone named "Emile," thus causing the viewer to call into question every single thing that they have watched previously in the film.

TRACKS

If the trip was a decided downer, Falen's homecoming is a soul-crushing nightmare where he is brought face-to-face with the bitter realization that he has been trying to ignore during the entire film, thereupon eventually causing the antihero to go completely berserk like a real ancient Germanic berserker that is tripping on acid. Indeed, upon arriving to his hometown and exiting the train with his dead comrade's coffin, Falen is shocked to discover that there is no large crowd of people waiting there to welcome him and his postmortem friend as heroes. After his less than glorious arrival, Falen gets somewhat nostalgic and decides to revisit all the important places from his childhood, including his elementary school and family home, though he does not find a single person at either of these locations. Undoubtedly, it almost seems if Falen is trapped in a ghost town. Notably, while all this is going on, Falen is carrying his portable radio and blasting WWII propaganda songs, as if it will make him feel more like the hero that he expected to be treated as for his service in the war effort. In a pathetic symbol of Falen's sub-meager family background, there is a wooden sign on the wall of his home that reads, "Poverty Is No Crime" (although mere speculation, somehow I doubt a real poor person would own such a sign). Upon entering his childhood bedroom, it becomes quite apparent why Falen joined the military, as the room is full of World War II propaganda posters and armies of toy soldier figurines that clearly imprinted the protagonist with a deep fetishization for boots and bullets at a very young age. Of course, quite unlike the Vietnam War, World War II was the supposed 'good war' where American soldiers ostensibly proved that good could truly triumph over evil by stopping the sinister krauts, japs, and guidos from taking over the world and were thus warmly welcomed as morally pristine first-class heroes when they came back home. When Falen finally goes to his comrade's funeral, he is shocked to see that no one is there aside some cemetery workers and a couple middle-aged men that the protagonist previously met at the train station. As a man that expected a lavish parade full of pageantry and thousands of highly sympathetic mourners for his friend, Falen is naturally disturbed by the low turnout at the funeral and screams, "He's the biggest hero that's ever been here. No one showed up. No one." After scaring off the handful of funeral attendants by demanding that they leave, Falen begins stating to himself in an increasingly irate fashion, "I love. I love. I love. I really love. I really do love. I really do love. I love. I love. I love. And I hate. And I hate. And I hate. And the guys I love. 'Cause I love I hate! 'Cause I love I hate! 'Cause I love! 'Cause I love! You motherfuckers!" while bizarrely entering his dead friend's grave. From there, Falen opens his comrade's casket and finds weapons, an army uniform, and a Vietnamese flag instead of his black buddy's body. When Falen emerges from the grave, he begins charging an imaginary enemy while sporting full military regalia and wielding a weapon in a symbolic scene that demonstrates that the protagonist has finally entered a metaphysical hell and embraced full-blown insanity.

While Jaglom is as distinctly ball-less as filmmakers come as a sort of spiritual eunuch whose films make those associated with the dreadful mumblecore movement seem like aesthetically audacious expresses of rampant masculinity, Tracks is indubitably dripping with irate testicular fortitude, albeit of a somewhat unhinged drugged out sort that only an insanely intemperate nut-job like Dennis Hopper could be capable of. Although the film predictably makes a couple attempts to make stupid left-wing statements, I think it ultimately manages to say more about the war and zeitgeist than most antiwar flicks of its time due to its overall abstract and keenly chaotic nihilistic spirit. After all, there is nothing more phony, pathetic, and patronizing than a film that attempts to coldly intellectualize the horrors of war. Not surprisingly, according to Jaglom, the only fans the film had when it came out was Vietnam War vets, who were probably desperate to find some sort acknowledgement of their miserable plight as men that risked their lives to fight in an uniquely unpopular war that completely divided the nation to the point where these soldiers were looked at as outcasts and even war crimes (of course, kitschy big budget Hollywood twaddle like Brian De Palma's Casualties of War (1989) would later help to perpetuate this social stigma). Also according to Jaglom, who had the film reels of the flick shipped to The Godfather director, Tracks apparently partly influenced Francis Ford Coppola to begin working on Apocalypse Now (1979), which of course ultimately featured Hopper in a more harmless but all the more patently pathetic role. Somewhat surprisingly (or not so if you are familiar with the fact that Jaglom was friends with her), erotic novelist Anaïs Nin, who was herself married to American experimental filmmaker Hugh Parker Guiler (aka 'Ian Hugo'), was also a fan of the film and once wrote, "TRACKS takes you into the heart of the American Nightmare." Arguably, more interestingly, Peter Biskind, who heavily documented Hopper's borderline insane behavior during the late 1960 through 1980s in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998), paid the film and its lead a great compliment when he wrote that it featured, "The best, most powerful performance of Dennis Hopper's career!" While not exactly a conventional war film by any means, I, for one, would certainly rather re-watch Tracks over so-called classics of the genre like Coming Home (1978), Platoon (1986), Hamburger Hill (1987), Born on the Fourth of July (1989), Casualties of War (1989), Heaven & Earth (1993), and the various other covert agitprop pieces that remind me why I usually cannot watch a film about the Vietnam War without feeling the urge to stomp some Hollywood producer to death.

TRACKS

Naturally, considering both films feature the actor involved in strange behavior while roaming around a train like a mental patient that escaped from a loony bin, it is only fitting that Hopper also portrayed Tom Ripley in Wim Wenders' Patricia Highsmith adaptation Der amerikanische Freund (1977) aka The American Friend the same year that Tracks was released, though the Easy Rider director strangely seems like he could be nearly twenty years older in the German-French coproduction (incidentally, the next year Hopper would appear in the obscure French flick L'Ordre et la sécurité du monde (1978) aka Last In, First Out directed by Claude d'Anna, which also features a train setting). As someone that has proudly gone to the effort to hunt down Hopper's more obscure films, including such unloved flicks as Silvio Narizzano's psychedelic quasi-giallo Las flores del vicio (1979) aka Bloodbath aka The Sky Is Falling and Roland Klick's unfortunately somewhat botched rock business flick White Star (1983), I can say without hesitation that Jaglom's film contains the most criminally overlooked and underrated performance of the self-destruction dipsomaniacal actor's singularly uneven career. Indeed, even as a proud and unrepentant anti-Jaglomite, I cannot deny that Tracks is a wickedly wild and waywardly whimsical cinematic ride that almost makes me wish I could take a cross-country trip on a train with a deranged war veteran and a couple eccentric Mel Brooks-esque heebis. While the filmmakers of the New Hollywood era like to style themselves as original arthouse auteurs that were following in the footsteps of Godard and Truffaut, Jaglom's feature, which oftentimes feels wholly improvised and features a fairly anarchic narrative structure to the point of having a fairly unforgettable oneiric essence, undoubtedly makes the cinematic works of Coppola, Scorsese, and Bogdanovich seem quite contrived and classically Hollywood-esque by comparison.

In his directing of Tracks and backing of Peter Davis' doc Hearts and Minds yet vocal support of Zionism and Israel, Jaglom represents the height of hyper Hebraic hypocrisy that epitomizes Hollywood. Indeed, Jaglom's first film was actually an amateurish five-hour 8mm Zionist documentary featuring Israeli martial music that the filmmaker shot in the aftermath of the Six-Day War during one of his many trips to Israel (in fact, fellow wealthy kosher commie Bert Schneider, who was actually once Jaglom's Jewish summer camp counselor, decided to hire him to reedit Easy Rider after seeing the doc and being impressed with the film's editing). In other words, Jaglom and virtually all of the other Jews in Tinseltown are not the loving humanistic peaceniks and pacifists that they pretend to be, as the majority of them are racially nationalistic Jewish supremacists who only bitch about war when it is a war against an ideology that they support like communism and other anti-European causes (notably, Jaglom's bud Schneider was a longtime financial supporter of the Black Panther Party and even helped Huey P. Newton to flee to Cuba after he committed the senseless non-political killing of an 18-year-old girl who offended him by calling him "baby"). Indeed, if hostile Vietnamese people surrounded Israel as opposed to Arab cavemen, Jaglom and his kosher kinsmen would certainly not pretend to shed tears for a bunch of dead gooks. Still, despite its occasional retarded and clichéd far-left sentiments (e.g. Dean Stockwell portraying an Abbie Hoffman-esque Yippie type who is betrayed by the protagonist), Tracks is one of the few films about the Vietnam War that does not portray vets in a phony, sentimental, and/or patronizing fashion, which is largely the result of Hopper's ballsy no bullshit performance as a Kansas-bred man of Scottish stock who, quite unlike candy ass Martin Sheen in Coppola's Apocalypse Now and his tranny-fucking son Charlie in Stone's Platoon, is someone that America's white majority can identify with. Forget other antiwar flicks, Jaglom's film ultimately makes for the perfect doubt feature with Hopper's similarly obscenely underrated feature Out of the Blue (1980). While Mr. Hopper may have never went to war, there was certainly a war going on his head, thus making it all the more fitting that Tracks is an allegorical flick that depicts in a delightfully deranged way one man's death march to hell. Undoubtedly, far more important than its dubious antiwar message, the film demonstrates that madness can be an art form, with Herr Hopper being a sort of all the more primitive van Gogh of acting.

-Ty E

ZINDA
ZINDA

Sanjay Gupta (2006)

If you are going to incredibly rip-off a film, at least do it right. Zinda is the infamous Oldboy copy. Except filled with shitty English here and there and horrible Indian actors. The turks remakes are classics compared to this pile of scathing shit. Nothing remotely interesting about this film arises. So what happened was, this film called Zinda was released and the similarities were all too familiar. Bollywood or not, i will never forgive the label. So this plot follows a man who is jailed for 14 years in a steel room with no explanation why. He is then released onto the roof top out of a trunk with clothes and a cellular phone and he has 4 days to find out why. Already sound familiar? So what is the prospect of India run off of? Taxi's. No matter how many New York stereotypes this fits, it is true. So he meets the female who drives him around to perform many hammer attacks. You really cant write anything about the similarities as it would give away too much of the plot and that is unacceptable if you still haven't seen Oldboy. While the idea of watching a straight copy and paste film of a classic does sound appealing, i urge you to never watch this film. Many remakes or inspirations dont fail too incredibly hard because they attempt to capture the "soul" of the film. The feeling of woe, despair, or utter happiness that the film provides. Zinda does nothing. It is filmed with a shitty camera, horrible camera shots, even worse fight scenes that look like they fit in a original Star Wars film, and the most horrible acting/action effects i have ever seen. Zinda is not a fun viewing film in the slightest. Not even to laugh at. Side effects include stuffy nose, irratated skin, considerably low self-eesteem, and temporary blindness. Proceed with Caution.

-Maq

YOU ARE NOT I

Sara Driver (1981)

Despite the fact that his films, especially his debut Permanent Vacation (1980) and Broken Flowers (2005), would probably lead most viewers to assume that he could never be tied down by one single woman over a long period of time, Jim Jarmusch has been with the same exact dame for most of his life. In fact, this woman, Sara Driver (Sleepwalk aka Year of the Dog, When Pigs Fly), is a notable filmmaker in her own right who, at least during the early 1980s, seemed like she had the potential to become a more respected auteur than her white-haired neo-bohemian beau, or so that is the impression that Jonathan Rosenbaum gives in his somewhat obscure text Film: The Front Line 1983 (1983). Indeed, as Rosenbaum noted in his book, Driver received the ultimate compliment for a young avant-garde filmmaker when rootless cosmopolitan European alpha-avant-gardist Jean-Marie Straub said to her at an early screening at the 1982 Rotterdam Film Festival regarding her hypnotically haunting early work You Are Not I (1981), "I like your film ten times better than Roger Corman's Edgar Allan Poe movies." As to what Driver's 50-minute black-and-white film has to do with Poe or Corman, Rosenbaum attempted to make a connection when he argued, "Insofar as it uses narrative ambiguity and foregrounds some of its formal elements, YOU ARE NOT I demands a certain amount of collaborative work from the spectator. At the same time, it adopts the method of a Poe story, which requires the virtual submission of the reader/spectator to the will and power of the narrative voice." Not unlike with her boyfriend's first feature Permanent Vacation (1980), which she briefly appeared in and worked on as a production manager, Driver made her film while attending New York University's graduate film school with the help of a Louis B. Mayer grant (the film had about a $12,000 budget). Based on the 1948 short story of the same name written by queer Beat Generation writer Paul Bowles about a schizophrenic woman that escapes from a mental institution and ultimately gets her sister to take her place that Driver liked so much upon reading it for the first time that she immediately knew she wanted to adapt it into a cinematic work, the film certainly gives one the impression that the auteur might have become the female David Lynch instead of a fecund Jarmusch. Despite being a relatively huge critical hit in Europe that had a long ride on the film festival circuit and was even described as one of the best films of the decade in Cahiers du Cinéma, You Are Not I was actually considered lost for nearly thirty years after the original negative was burnt in a fire in the warehouse where it was stored and the only other copy had deteriorated due to being screened one too many times. Luckily, source writer Bowles, who apparently regularly exchanged letters with Driver while she was assembling the film, was such a fan of the film that he had a pristine print, which was found in 2008 by a fellow named Francis Poole when he traveled to the writer's old apartment in Tangier, Morocco to gather things for the University of Delaware's library collection. While I am not that familiar with Bowles' work, I have a feeling that he was more pleased with Driver's You Are Not I than he was with capitalist-minded Guido commie Bernardo Bertolucci's The Sheltering Sky (1990).

YOU ARE NOT I

A sort of avant-garde post-Gothic psyche-horror flick with seemingly nil direct cinematic influences (though Driver has credited German Expressionism, Chris Marker's La jetée (1962), and John Cassavetes' A Woman Under the Influence (1974) as inspiring her in different ways), You Are Not I might be described as the female Eraserhead that Lynch's own daughter Jennifer Chambers Lynch failed to make when she released her badly botched and laughably misandristic but nonetheless fleetingly entertaining debut Boxing Helena (1993). Indeed, if there is such a thing as true estrogen-charged arthouse horror, it is Driver's film, which is what you might expect if Danièle Huillet had kicked her pansy hubby Straub to the curb, listened to some Joy Division and read some Flannery O'Connor, dropped the pedantic Marxist idiocy, and assembled a film that truly tapped into the darker depths of the innately irrational and labyrinthine female psyche. More specifically, You Are Not I is one of those handful of seemingly inexplicable female 'psychic transference' flicks like Ingmar Bergman Persona (1966), Robert Altman's 3 Women (1977), Michael Almereyda's Nadja (1994), and Lynch's Mulholland Dr. (2001) that hints at the melding of two different female identities. While co-penned, co-produced, and shot by Jarmusch (who also later acted as the cinematographer of Driver's first feature-length effort Sleepwalk), the film has thankfully virtually nothing to do with the No Wave Cinema movement, which the filmmaker herself more or less confirmed in a December 2011 interview with George Siskar of Senses of Cinema where she stated, "There were a lot of movies about the scene, but I was not interested in that kind of representation. In a way, the film was part of the No Wave movement because we all worked on each other's movies, we were all in the scene together, but I never liked the kind of cliquish, who's cool and who's not setups." Indeed, You Are Not I is far too aesthetically elegant, masterfully stylized, apolitical, and idiosyncratic to be associated with the proudly amateurish and dilettantish of No Wave figures like Amos Poe, Eric Mitchell, James Nares, Scott B and Beth B, etc. Unlike many of the major films of the No Wave movement, which were very much a glaring product of their particular zeitgeist, Driver's film has a truly timeless quality that, not unlike Eraserhead and the better films of Straub-Huillet like Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach (1968) aka The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach and their Franz Kafka adaptation Klassenverhältnisse (1984) aka Class Relations, totally transcends (and was quite atypical of) the era when it was made. As for Driver's own objective in terms of adapting Bowles, she confessed in 2011, "I just wanted to tell the story. I was interested in telling stories in a new way. My only intention was to make something that I thought

Paul Bowles would be proud of and I would be proud of. And also make a movie that would get me to the next film, which I did. I mean, I think I felt so strongly about the story and what I was going to do, that I did not think what impact it was going to have.”

A film that seems to completely psychologically imprison the viewer inside the uniquely unreliable psychotic mind of its ‘paranoiac’ (anti)heroine, You Are Not I is surely one of the most consistently fiercely foreboding films that I have ever seen and even by the very end of the work, I was not able to shake off the borderline severe sense of unease that it almost perniciously permeates. A sort of contra Girl, Interrupted (1999) in virtually every regard, Driver’s delectably dispiriting yet no less eccentric work features a gratingly homely lead of the somewhat ominous sort who through narration, strange facial expressions, subtle physical gestures, and highly personalized esoteric rituals forces the viewer to enter her metaphysical hell and ultimately confront a couple conspiring rural womenfolk, including her rather repressed looking sister. If I were to guess, Driver’s amply atmospheric Bowles adaptation is a sort of allegory for the filmmaker’s sense of alienation with female family members and her childhood community, as well as typical so-called gender roles in general, though the film thankfully lacks any sort of discernible feminist subtext. As Rosenbaum rightly noticed, “...YOU ARE NOT I begins more or less the way PSYCHO ends—with a schizophrenic in close-up remaining absolutely still while explaining everything off-screen.” Unlike Norman Bates in Hitchcock’s proto-slasher masterpiece, the unnervingly loony lady of Driver’s film immediately plunges the viewer into her uniquely unhinged psycho-neurotically nightmarish realm of morbid esoteric inwardness, as the film seems to take place entirely in her head. Notably, Driver would state regarding the very conscious influence of Cassavetes’ A Woman Under the Influence on her film, “I think it’s because of the study of timing between people in that film [...] It’s not stylistic, it’s just a gut emotional reaction—and wanting to involve and audience that much.” Indeed, despite the film’s excess of narration from the lead character, You Are Not I is an exceedingly visceral work that seems to have been made with the objective of haunting the viewer’s soul as opposed to picking at their brain or flattering their intellect (though the flick leaves the viewer with much to think about in the end). With the intent of attempting to depict a sinisterly sisterly territorial showdown of sorts between two diametrically opposed adult siblings—a schizophrenic free spirit and a grotesquely sexually repressed old spinster—Driver isolated lead actress Suzanne Fletcher from everyone else on the set and even had Melody Schneider, who plays the protagonist’s sister, bring personal items to the set to inspire an organic rivalry between the two actresses. Indubitably, You Are Not I is one of only a handful of films that I know of that effectively depicts the pathologically cryptic passive-aggressive ‘games’ that members of the so-called fairer sex play with one another. In that sense, Driver’s film, which has an intrinsically feminine touch to it, could have only been directed by an actual woman.

YOU ARE NOT I

Featuring a female lead whose mind and motivations seem more arcane than that of 'The Gamin' played by Adrienne Barrett in the quasi-Expressionistic cult classic Dementia (1955) aka Daughter of Horror directed by John Parker, You Are Not I is a decidedly Delphic flick that stays with the viewer long after it has concluded. In an assumed attempt to make the film seem less enigmatic, Driver handed out a publicity flyer during screenings where she provided the following synopsis: "...It is the story of a young woman, Ethel, who escapes from a mental hospital during the chaos of a nearby multiple-car accident. She is mistaken for a shock victim by a rescue volunteer who finds her trying to place a stone in a dead woman's mouth. The volunteer drives her to her sister's house. The sister is confused and angered by the sudden arrival of the psychotic Ethel. Not wishing to be alone in the house with her, the sister brings two neighbor women over. Finally the sister calls the hospital and finds out that Ethel "wasn't released at all but somehow got out." They nervously await the attendants from the hospital while Ethel, refusing to speak, formulates a plan to stay in the house." Ultimately, the 'plan' that the lead carries out is arguably the most inexplicable and sphinxlike aspect of the entire film, but I guess that is what one should expect from a batshit crazy bitch who has a curious fetish for placing stones in the lifeless mouths of female cadavers.

You Are Not I opens with a still photograph of lead Ethel (Suzanne Fletcher of Bette Gordon's Variety (1983) and Driver's Sleepwalk) sitting on the ground and jotting notes juxtaposed with the character narrating, "You Are Not I. No one but me could possibly be. I know that. And I know where I have been...And what I have done. Ever since yesterday, When I walked out the gate during the accident." From there, Ethel somehow manages to get over the barbed wire fence located around the mental institution where she has been imprisoned and then wanders like a forlorn somnambulist to the scene of a tragic three-vehicle car accident where over half a dozen or so people have died. After thinking to herself, "Of course! This is just in man's world. If something real should happen...they would stop sinning," Ethel begins singing to herself like one of the little girls from Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984) and then steals and subsequently wears a pair of dress shoes that she finds on a male corpse. After also stealing a large coat from a cadaver that she will place a number of important stones in, Ethel begins roaming around the woods and complains to herself in her own mind, "I always hated cars. Hated to see them go by down there. Hated to see them disappear way off up the valley toward the next town. Made me angry to think...All those people moving from one place to another...Without any right to. Whoever said to them, 'You may go and drive your car this morning to Clifton. You may driver wherever you want.' No one. I know that. I know there's no chief that says things like that to people...But it makes it pleasanter for me...When I imagine such a person does exist. Perhaps it would be... Only a tremendous voice speaking over a public address system set up in all the streets." Indeed, it seems as if Ethel welcomes and even derives a sense of schadenfreude from the tragic accident, which ultimately acts as the genesis of her fight for freedom.

Upon encountering six corpses lying side-by-side and covered with white sheets, Ethel begins placing stones that she has found in the woods inside the mouths of these unfortunate car accident victims. When a rescue crew member spots Ethel doing this to another corpse that she later finds, he sensibly yells to her, "What are you doing? Are you crazy?" and she reacts by self-righteously replying, "It's my sister and she's dead!" even though her sis is far from dead. After the medical volunteer has Ethel sit next to a couple wounded survivors from the car accident, she begins repeating to herself out loud every couple seconds, "She's dead." Notably, Ethel also reveals her innately insane sense of inwardness by curiously thinking to herself, "It seems to me that life outside was like life inside. There was always somebody to stop people from doing what they wanted to do. That was just the opposite of what I'd felt when I was still inside. Perhaps... What we want to do is wrong. But why should they always be the ones to decide? For once, I will decide what was right. And do it." After giving the rescue volunteer the address of her sister's house, Ethel curiously thinks to herself while being driven to the truly humble abode, "I managed to count the gas stations along the way. And I found... There was one more of them than I remembered." Naturally, Ethel's Sister (Melody Schneider) is quite angered when she shows up at her home and complains to the rescue volunteer when he asks her if she is alright, "She don't look well yet to me." Of course, Ethel is not only far from alright, but she also has big plans that defy both logic and reality.

While standing outside the house while turned in the opposite direction of her conspicuously cunty-looking sister, Ethel smirks in a sinister fashion while thinking to herself, "I often feel that something is about to happen... And when I do... I stay perfectly still... And let it go ahead. There's no use wondering about it... Or trying to stop it. At this time, I had no particular feeling that a special event was about to come out... But I did feel that I would be more likely to do the right thing if I waited and let my sister act first." Upon having her discernibly scared sister escort her inside the house as if she is a retarded child, Ethel is somewhat annoyed to see that everything in the house, including the rooms, has been somehow "reversed" by her sibling. After thinking to herself, "I decided to say nothing and let her do the explaining if she felt like it. It occurred to me that it must have cost her every cent she had in the bank," Ethel begins laughing hysterically about the prospect that her sis has wasted all her money on the seemingly imagined 'reversal.' After a couple of minutes, Ethel's sister tells her to sit down and then exits the house. Ethel's sister is almost deathly afraid of her and the mentally perturbed protagonist seems quite proud of that fact to the point where it becomes a source of solace for her.

YOU ARE NOT I

Looking for assumed ‘backup’ in case her estranged nutjob sibling blows a fuse, Ethel’s sister brings back an overweight old housewife named Mrs. Jelinek, who is also totally petrified by the protagonist even though she probably weighs twice as much as her. Under Jelinek’s recommendation, Ethel’s sister decides to “call the home” so she can give the head psychologist, Dr. Don, a piece of her mind about the fact that her sister looks no less deranged than when she was originally institutionalized and that she should never have been released from the psych-ward in the first place. After her sister goes to fetch another old fat woman named Kate Schultz, Ethel thinks to herself while humming like an autistic toddler, “I did not even look up when she went out [...] I had made a big decision...And that was to stay right in the house and, under no condition, let myself be taken back there. I knew it would be difficult...But I had a plan. I knew it would work if I used all my will power. I have great will power.” Resolving to “keep quiet” so as to “not break the spell that is starting to work,” Ethel thinks to herself like a true megalomaniac with delusions of grandeur, “I knew it was going to be a battle between my sister and me...but I was confident that my force of character and superior education had fitted me for just such a battle...And that I could win it.” Sort of like if Nietzsche had regained some of his mental faculties after his mental break and decided that he would use his philosophical prowess to free himself from his scheming sister’s care, Ethel decides that she will use her true ‘Will to Power’ to reclaim the house and banish her sibling.

After talking to Dr. Don, Ethel’s sister learns that she was never actually discharged from the mental institution but instead “somehow she got out,” so she wastes no time in making a call to have a couple fellows from the nuthouse come down to pick up her unhinged sibling. Meanwhile, Ethel proudly thinks to herself that neither Mrs. Jelinek nor Mrs. Schultz will dare have the gall to do anything to her unless they are willed by her sister, who is far too petrified herself to sick the two old farts on her sibling. As Ethel thinks to herself like a bat-shit crazy braggart of the cunningly sadistic sort, “For although I had never done her any harm, she had always been convinced that someday I would. It may be...that she knew now what I was about to do to her. But, I doubt it, or she would’ve run away from the house.” As all three women wait in a discernibly horrified fashion for the guys from the mental institution to arrive, Ethel begins planning for a brighter future of the domesticated suburbanite sort, thinking to herself, “The house was already ugly...But I was already getting ideas for making it look better.” Ethel seems to more or less look at the three women as insignificant maggots, thinking to herself with a sense of self-satisfied glee, “I could’ve laughed out loud when I thought of what they were really waiting to see. If they had only known it.” When the guys from the mental hospital finally arrive and proceed to take Ethel away, the protagonist stops in front of her sister, pulls out a stone from the pocket of the coat that she stole from the corpse at the accident site, and then aggressively places the rock in her sibling's mouth. After Ethel's sister screams in abject horror, the screen cuts to black and the protagonist proceeds to narrate, "I felt that my front teeth were broken. I could taste blood on my lips. I thought I was going to faint. I put my hand to my mouth...and I knew...that this was the turning point. I shut my eyes very hard. When I opened them...everything was different and I knew I had won. For a moment, I could not see very clearly. But even during that moment...I saw myself sitting on the sofa. As my vision cleared, I saw that the men were holding my sister's arms...And she was putting up a terrific struggle."

In the end, Ethel's sister replaces her and is brought back to the mental institution instead. While being strapped to a stretcher in an ambulance before heading to the loony bin, Ethel's sister cries hysterically, or so the unreliable protagonist narrates in vivid detail as if she is the one that is actually being restrained. Indeed, despite still sitting at home in a chair, Ethel is somehow able to retrace her sister's every move while she is being transported to the mental institution, including regarding the EMTs that, "They kept promising her ice cream for dinner but she knew better than to believe them." Upon finally arriving to the nutward, Ethel's sister takes a stone out of a pocket of the coat that her sis had been previously wearing and then places it in her mouth, thus causing her to choke. Eventually, Ethel has a revelation of sorts and thinks to herself in a prideful manner regarding the seemingly inexplicable accomplishment of switching places with her sister, "The strange thing, now that I realize it, was that no one realized she was not I." Somewhat curiously, at the end, Ethel remains sitting in the same chair where she has sat for about the second half of the film because she lacks the drive and motivation to move and thinks to herself, "I could walk upstairs, and look into her bedroom, if I wanted to...But it's such a longtime since I've been up there and I no longer know how the rooms are arranged...So I prefer to stay down here." Meanwhile, Ethel's sister is portrayed jotting down what may or may not be the film's story in a very Expressionistic room in the mental institution that looks like it could be inside the lunatic asylum featured in The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920).

It should be noted that Jonathan Rosenbaum speculated in his book Film: The Front Line 1983 that director Sara Driver would probably not have a successful filmmaking career in the United States due to her avant-garde approach to the artistic medium, writing, "More recently, she cites as the two films that have most impressed her Dreyer's LA PASSION DE JEANNE D'AR and Tarkovsky's THE STALKER, both of which might be regarded as archetypes of the European art film. Whether or not that tradition has a viable future in this country, Driver is clearly a filmmaker to watch; it'll merely be our bad fortune if we have to cross the Atlantic in order to see her work." Unfortunately, it seems that Rosenbaum fears were not unfounded, as it has been over two decades since Driver has directed a film, not to mention the fact that she has only managed to complete two features, which include Sleepwalk (1986) aka Year of the Dog once again starring Suzanne Fletcher and the German-Dutch-American coproduction When Pigs Fly (1993) starring Marianne Faithfull and Alfred Molina. Still, the two features that Driver has directed are notable for being a rare example of American 'magic realism' (or what Rosenbaum describes as works belonging to the 'fantastique' genre). Aside from her two features and the occasional short like the documentary The Bowery, Spring 1994 (1994), Driver has unfortunately been mostly regulated to living in the shadow of her longtime boy toy Jarmusch, whose films she has worked on a variety of capacities that certainly seem to be beneath her talent as a rare genuinely talented American female arthouse auteur. Personally, I will take one Sara Driver over a dozen Sofia Coppolas any day. Indeed, as far as depictions of female schizophrenia go, You Are Not I can only really be compared to Teutonic auteuress Helma Sanders-Brahms' singular dark masterpiece Die Berührte (1981) aka No Mercy No Future, even if the two films have little in common aesthetically aside from featuring fairly homely and deathly pale she-schizos and sometimes transcending the line between reality and deluded fantasy. In other words, Driver's film features easily one of the most unsettling yet, at the same time, truly cinematic depictions of feminine mental derangement ever committed to bold black-and-white celluloid. In that regard, Driver's film(s) also has much in common with the cinematic oeuvre of Austrian artist Valie Export (Unsichtbare Gegner aka Invisible Adversaries, Menschenfrauen), though she has credited some more surprising personal influences. Indeed, at a retrospective of her work held by Anthology Film Archives entitled Sleepwalking: The Films of Sara Driver, the filmmaker had a couple of her favorite films screened, including the Val Lewton produced cult horror classic Cat People (1942) directed by Jacques Tourneur and Jack Hill's Spider Baby or, The Maddest Story Ever Told (1967). Of course, in terms of atmosphere, You Are Not I is pure and unadulterated oneiric horror cinema that owes just as much to Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls (1962) as it does an avant-garde work like Maya Deren's Meshes of the Afternoon (1943). Simply judging by her films, I would most certainly more enjoy raiding Driver's DVD collection than that of her lover Jarmusch, who probably owns one too many French New Wave flicks for my taste.

YOU ARE NOT I

When mentioned by an interviewer at Senses of Cinema that some critics interpreted her film as telling a story that manages to "question our notions of insanity and it is a play between real and dreamy" while other critics though it was "simply about depersonalization and identity confusion," Driver revealed regarding her personal thoughts on You Are Not I, "I'm very boring, it was very pure. It was very surprising because I found out it was being shown to a group of psychiatrists as an example of schizophrenia (laughing). But I think in their early twenties, a lot of women go through this; they sort of have a little bit of obsession with women and madness – you go through your Sylvia Plath thing, and you go through your Zelda Fitzgerald thing, but I did not look at madness that closely.” Apparently, source writer Bowles claimed that he sired the story while in a semi-conscious state that was, “a second between waking and sleeping, or sleeping and waking,” but I find that somehow irrelevant to the film, as Driver transformed it into her own highly personalized and even metaphysical story that is comparable to Lynch’s Eraserhead and Guy Maddin’s Tales from the Gimli Hospital (1988) in terms of being a highly intimate auteur piece of the totally transcendental and seemingly allegorically psycho-autobiographical sort. In terms of its literally and figuratively dark post-Gothic aesthetic, unconventional time running time, fiercely foreboding and paranoiac ‘Kafkaesque’ tone, macabre quirkiness, and otherworldly phantasmagorical ‘modernist horror’ approach, You Are Not I also deserves comparisons to criminally underrated Dutch auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst’s 48-minute Willem Frederik Hermans adaptation De blinde fotograaf (1973) aka The Blind Photographer. Although it might seem like a strange comparison, both Driver and Ditvoorst’s films reveal that they even beat Kubrick at his own game in terms of transforming someone else’s story into something that is completely and unmistakably their own. Indeed, after watching You Are Not I, I can only assume that Mr. Jarmusch is with a woman whose mind is much darker, stronger, and labyrinthine than his own, hence why he managed to reach the mainstream yet Driver’s filmmaking career fizzled out before it ever really got to blossom. Of course, if the schizophrenic protagonist of her film is in any way autobiographical, I can see why Driver might find a hard time finding funding for her films. After all, You Are Not I features what is probably the most innately horrifying and intimidating frail young woman in cinema history and I say that as someone that regularly sees a literally skeletal young woman every day with the unfortunate wasting away illness of Crohn’s disease who puts the average holocaust survivor to shame in terms of resembling a walking and talking corpse.

-Ty E

GUINEA PIG: DEVIL'S EXPERIMENT
GUINEA PIG: DEVIL'S EXPERIMENT

Satoru Ogura (1985)

Guinea Pig is the godmother of extreme Japanese cinema. For a film as influential as this, it hasn't aged well. What was once shocking the vulnerable masses, it hasn't aged well and time seems to be Devil's Experiment's worst enemy. The Guinea Pig series has many rough patches all around closing with only two solid films that are worthy of any recognition. Devil's Experiment is sadly one of the disreputable entries. For being a film revolving around the beauty of violence and having a clever premise promising brutal poetry, deterioration of the sense actually boils down to cool shaded Japanese "dudes" stage slapping a woman for 10 minutes then moving on to some assorted ridiculous task including tying a woman up and spinning her "to death". This exciting "experiment" can be mimicked at home by taking a broom and dust pan outside attempting to sweep up all the dirt. Devil's Experiment did pave the way for the rest of the series to extend upon a concept of symbolism, blood, and art. Five sequels were developed as well as two unofficial titles. When you single the less than established films, the odds are against them but as a collection Guinea Pig stands strong as a fierce competitor to any lexicon of violence. Guinea Pig wouldn't hit cinema puberty until the release of Flowers of Flesh & Blood which eventually led to the boom in popularity thanks to a Mr. Charlie Sheen. To bring it around full-stop on my thoughts on Devil's Experiment, the film is definitely a far cry from modern conventions in the mid 80s. Devil's Experiment is indeed a rough experiment, though I can't vouch for its notoriety being worth its weight in this modern era. It's a film I am glad to have seen and it kick started a Japanese gore and roughie phase -- Without it, exploitation and faux snuff wouldn't be where it is now -- but this regrettably isn't anything to write home about, but it remains a must see for being historic.

-mAQ

SLEEPWALKER

Saxon Logan (1984)

Without question, the last thing the world needs is another leftist horror flick, especially those of the effortlessly effete British persuasion, but somehow I managed to find a tinge of preternatural potency in the less-than-feature-length blood-soaked Thatcher era satirical scare-fest Sleepwalker (1984) directed by white Rhodesian-British auteur Saxon Logan, who was influenced to become an 'auteur' by his much more famous comrade and mentor, filmmaker Lindsay Anderson (if...., O Lucky Man!). Considered lost for nearly three decades until the BFI rescued the sole print of the film from the director's attic, restored it, and released it in late 2013 on DVD/Blu-ray under the BFI Flipside label along with two of Logan's earlier shorts Stepping Out (1977) and Working Surface: A Short Study (with Actors) in the 'Ways' of a Bourgeois Writer (1979), a 69-minute 2013 interview with the forgotten filmmaker, and Rodney Giesler's thematically similar 45-minute short The Insomniac (1977), the quite literally bloody Brit satirical black-comedy-cum-horror-show was assumed to be even hearsay by some, as very few people had actually seen it and it had only been referenced in print form by English journalist/film critic Kim Newman (who, incidentally, is a big promoter of BFI Flipside and hosted the label's screening of the 2010 'sampler documentary' Kim Newman's Guide to The Flipside of British Cinema) some 14 years after its release in the FAB Press release Ten Years of Terror: British Films of the 1970s. Quite ironically yet most fittingly, the film owes its past obscurity to the very regime that the film ruthlessly critiques whose pro-big-business policies ultimately led to the work's rejection by British film distributors (who found the film's horror-satire style inexplicable and thus unprofitable), as well as the termination of a government subsidy to theater owners promoting the showcasing of British-made shorts before feature presentations (notably, Logan's 1977 experimental short Stepping Out played before screenings of Roman Polanski's The Tenant (1976) in UK theaters). A sort of poor man's take on Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984), albeit more literate and cultivated and minus the supernatural elements, Sleepwalker has been advertised by the BFI as an "outrageous mix of biting satire and stylish horror" that "recalls the work of otherwise unlikely bedfellows, Lindsay Anderson and Dario Argento," yet the film has more obvious influences, namely James Whale's The Old Dark House (1932), German expressionism, and Hammer horror films. Partly inspired by a true anecdote from Logan's life about a rural retreat when his friend's wife uncomfortably revealed to him and their mutual friends while tipsy that her husband once attempted to murder her while he was sleepwalking, Sleepwalker is a largely metaphorical work that was heavily inspired by Anderson's underrated box-office failure Britannia Hospital (1982)—a work that uses a hospital as a metaphor for Britain—featuring characters that are more or less archetypes/allegorical figures and set at an old quaint country home that acts as the “embodiment of the United Kingdom” (as described by the director) about an unhappily married, mis-matched couple who come to visit their ‘friends’ in the countryside, only to fall prey to a somnambulist-based slaughter after a nasty night of venomous verbal class warfare.

SLEEPWALKER

Opening with a classic eerie nightmare scene involving blood-covered broken glass and a person being strangled to death in a bathtub that would probably lead the viewer to assume they are about to watch a classic Gothic haunted house film, Sleepwalker then cuts to a grey-haired chap named Alex Britain (played by Scottish director Bill Douglas, who is best known for an autobiographical trilogy about his working-class upbringing) preparing an insulin injection and milk and cookies for his bedridden sister Marion Britain (TV actress Heather Page), who has spent all afternoon in bed and who is the one who suffered the nightmare during the phantasmagoric introductory montage. Although initially seeming like an old (and regrettably) married couple, Alex and Marion are actually brother and sister who opted to move in with one another after their mother croaked and they inherited the North England rural estate ‘Albion’ (which is, somewhat notably, the oldest known name for Great Britain). The two siblings are expecting company, Marion’s friend Angela Paradise (Joanna David of Italian auteur Roberto Faenza’s The Soul Keeper (2002) aka Prendimi l’anima, which depicts the romance between psychoanalyst C.G. Jung and holocausted Jewess Sabina Spielrein) and her cannibalistic pseudo-conservative capitalist hubby Richard Paradise (Nickolas Grace of the classic dystopian cult sci-fi TV movie Max Headroom (1985) and the hit 1998 fantasy-adventure TV mini-series Merlin), who works “in video” (surely, a jab by Logan and his co-writer Michael Keenan at the desecration of cinema via the video boom). On their way to Albion, the Paradises get lost and Richard demonstrates his innate asshole and callous control of his wife by screaming at Angela, “Just let me remind you that this rural blood retreat was your idea. They’re your fucking friends. You find the place!” just before almost running over an old man on a bike. When the married couple finally arrives at the estate, it is quite apparent that emasculated bleeding heart socialist wimp Alex cannot stand alpha-asshole Richard’s audacious airs of arrogance. Since Marion’s planned evening of “al fresco” has been ruined by the rain and an exploding light bulb and shattered window which destroyed the kitchen, the four emotionally volatile adults are forced to spend the evening at a local restaurant where Richard uses the opportunity to loudly espouse his quite humorous homo-hating and sweatshop-saluting Weltanschauung and Alex demonstrates that he is a tired old leftwing weakling who is all talk and no bite just like so many others of his cuckold kind.

Upon arriving at the restaurant, Richard declares, “The place is full of bloody queers. Didn’t know they had them this far north” after noticing the elderly old queen waiters and proceeds to tell the following joke that would have probably upset queer auteur Derek Jarman: "What does G-A-Y stand for? 'Got AIDS yet?'" In an exceedingly feeble attempt to verbally battle Richard, Alex remarks that he recently read an article in the 'New Scientist' stating that AIDS is not an "exclusively homosexual" disease. From there, Richard demonstrates he is not a true conservative or traditionalist by revealing he is a sadistic sort of multiculturalist who advocates sweatshops and complains regarding country living that it is "luddite rubbish" and "sheer antiquated claptrap" and gives a toast by declaring "Here's to microwaves." Needless to say, Richard is not impressed with Alex's sentimentalist speech about living in the country and being proud of his country home. Eventually, Marion reveals that her brother Alex once attempted to murder her when he was sleepwalking. Additionally, Marion, whose job involves reading the works of prospective writers for a publishing house, describes how she suspects that her brother submitted a thriller novel, "about a woman who has a dream about peeling tomatoes. Then, when she wakes up, she's sliced her husband to bits with a carving knife." After declaring in regard to her brother that "translators don't have style," Marion states that she suspects that the novel was written by her brother due to certain "technical details," including "Russian expert. German expert. But particularly well up on sleepwalking." Clearly, the two couples are mismatched, which auteur Logan emphasizes by sitting the two assholes (Richard and Marion), as well as the well-meaning weaklings (Alex and Angela), together during the dinner scene. Indeed, like Richard, Marion also hates the country and complains that she was forced to move to Albion when she was 13 after her estranged father abandoned the family and, "pissed off to Africa. About a century too late." Richard is so excited by what Marion says, that he declares, "damn right. Big pond for big fish. It's the only place to be in this country. Money. Massive unemployment. Marvelous! I'll drink to London," which rather irks Alex. The last straw for Alex is when Richard states he is a proponent of Thatcher era unemployment, stating, "bloodletting...Sucking the poison out of the system. Dog eat dog. If you can't go to work, go to hell." When Alex asks him if he is serious, Richard replies, "Deadly. Don't you know your own history?" and then proceeds to berate his adversary, calling him a "kept man" and "a bloody pimp, a bloody little pimp who thinks all prostitutes ought to be virgins." From there, Alex, who has had a little bit too much to drink, gets up to pay the bill and passive aggressively tells Richard to "don't get up," as if he has the testicular fortitude to fight him or something. Needless to say, the guests don't tip so well, or so complains the waiter to his fellow "arch queen."

When the four frenemies get back to Albion, Alex uses the excuse that he needs to chop some wood and Marion follows, with Richard begging his wife to leave that night, but Angela refuses because she feels the need to pay back her friend for her support for when she was in the hospital. Indeed, although never mentioned explicitly, it seems that Angela has some mental problems that no Valium overdose could cure as she met her fellow mental cripple Marion there.

SLEEPWALKER

Angela also feels sorry for fellow mental invalid Alex, but she soon becomes frightened of him after seeing him chopping wood with a sort of murderous rage and screaming “bastard” in regard to Richard, as if carrying out some sort of murder. When Angela confronts her friend about her brother’s behavior, Marion reveals that she and Alex met with a psychiatrist who diagnosed the latter with suffering from “deep-rooted trauma” which is “all the result of a deeply insecure childhood.” Marion also trashes Alex’s bibliophilia and Teutonophilia, remarking regarding her brother’s book collection after Richard asks about it, “Von Kleist’s stuff of Alex’s. German dramatist. Death, rot, misery. Right up his street.” Marion also reveals her more morbid side by quoting from Edgar Allan Poe’s short story The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar, which is about a hypnotist who puts a man in a suspended state of hypnotism as he dies. After Alex calls his sister a “bitch” and walks out of the room and she responds by calling him a “dog,” Marion begins hitting on Richard right in front of her friend Angela, who becomes quite dismayed upon accidentally turning on negro porn and subsequently goes to bed. While Richard is prepared to cheat on his wife and commence coitus with his kindred cruel spirit Marion, she screws it up by complaining that her brother called her a “prick teaser,” thus hinting there is a somewhat incestuous relationship going on between the two disharmonious siblings. After their failed attempt at romance, Richard and Marion head to bed and the real fun begins.

During the final ten minutes or so of Sleepwalker, everyone falls asleep and dark dreams ultimately degenerate into deadly real-life nightmares. First, Angela has a nightmare of Alex coming into her room and disemboweling her hubby Richard, whose guts he pulls out with his bare hands (according to auteur Logan, while shooting this scenario he, “had a slight problem with Bill Douglas; he hated blood and gore of any sort” and even fainted after shooting the scene). Next, Marion has a recurring nightmare about her brother strangling her to death in the bathroom. From there, Marion sleepwalks into the Paradieses’ room and undresses in front of Richard, who becomes so aroused that he begins licking the somnambulist’s armpit and then proceeds to suck on her tits, but the fun soon ends when Richard is sliced up with a butcher knife, presumably. Shortly after, Angela wakes up, steps in a huge puddle of her deceased hubby’s blood, goes to the kitchen, and eventually takes a butcher knife to the back of the head. The next morning, Alex wakes up from a nightmare and goes downstairs where he notices blood dripping from the ceiling. Before he can do anything, sleepwalking Marion appears and stabs Alex in the chest with a butcher knife and he cries out “wake up...wake up...Please, wake up!” just before he dies. In a metaphorical scene, blood covers old Victorian furniture. Maybe if Richard had cheated on his neurotic wife and banged unconscious psychopathic killer Marion, the midnight massacre could have been avoided.

As exceedingly heavy-handed socio-political subtexts of most of the works of mainstream ‘masters’ of horror George A. Romero and Wes Craven demonstrate, horror and politics do not mix well together and the last thing a jaded gorehound wants to see are zombies ripping out and eating the hearts of pansy bleeding heart liberals. Indubitably, if Saxon Logan’s Sleepwalker does anything even remotely notable, it is creating an unholy cinematic marriage between scathing political satire and blood-drenched phantasmagoria of the shadowy anti-Thatcherite sort. Politically speaking, the film is notable for ruthlessly reaming all aspects of the mainstream British political spectrum during its time, with mainstream ‘conservatives’ (as personified by Richard) being depicted as deracinated psychopaths of the globalist technocrat sort whose only loyalty is to money and their own egos; socialists (as personified by Alex) being depicted as introverted emotional cripples who prefer to hide in an imaginary utopia and cower before their enemies; the British middle class (as personified by Angela) being portrayed as well meaning yet hopelessly feeble pushovers and cuckolds who support corrupt regimes despite knowing better; and Britannia (as personified by Marion) as an emotionally erratic and savagely snide whore and murderess who walks through life aimlessly and unconsciously slaughters both friends and foes. Notably, the film’s co-writer Michael Keenan was a diehard commie, as Logan revealed in the interview O Lucky Man: Saxon Logan in Conversation (2013) regarding his collaborator: “...I would say that most of my education in cinema came from going to movies with him. He was phenomenally intelligent and we enjoyed each other’s ideas, and although he was an avowed Marxist, we still managed to get on. And he brought to our work a kind of rigor that perhaps wouldn’t have necessarily been part of my work if I had been solely the author.”

Although the film was an abject failure commercially speaking, Logan initially had high hopes and thought he was “made” upon completing Sleepwalker having it screened at the opening of the Berlin International Film Festival (aka Berlinale) where it received a standing ovation, but when he later brought the work back to England and screened it, it was even hated by the filmmaker’s friends, thus reflecting the longstanding hatred Brits, especially of the elitist sort, have for the horror genre (after all, the classic horror-thriller Peeping Tom (1960) more or less destroyed auteur Michael Powell’s career). Of course, Logan’s filmmaking career never even began and Sleepwalker reflects the promising formative work of an auteur who could have developed into something much more interesting and provocative than the various hack filmmakers that were working in England at the time, though I doubt he would have become the next Lindsay Anderson (who, incidentally, was supposed to have a cameo role in the film but injured his ankle while in NYC and could not make the flight back). Notably, in a September 2013 interview with Celluloid Wicker Man, auteur Saxon would reveal that his somewhat admirable but undeniably unmarketable intentions with the film were as follows: “I had a great deal of freedom to make whatever film I wanted. I love Britain and care about it deeply. That is why I chose to make

SLEEPWALKER

SLEEPWALKER. I naively thought it would be a “wake up” film that would be entertaining, too. It is not entirely rooted in Thatcher’s time nor does it knock the aspirations of the young and thrusting. Instead, it knocks rapacious and unthinking greed, spineless idealism, and meek acquiescence. I feel it is still relevant now. For all its surface appearance Britain is dilapidated. There is a cold aggressiveness to the culture. Politically the current parties are like high street banks: in the same business only differentiated by the colour of their debit and credit cards. I think “Albion” is incrementally decaying while the rich concentrate on getting richer, the middle class acquiesce and the poor can just go to hell. Bill Douglas got the script in one. He came up to me and said: “Marion is Britannia gone mad, is she not?” Too eloquently directed, sophisticated, and restrained for the average video nasty junky and far too gory, politically incorrect, and cynical for the average art fag cinophile, Sleepwalker is ultimately an uneven celluloid enigma that is nowhere near as bad as it sounds but is also nowhere near as important as the BFI believes it to be, as a cult film without a cult. For those sadistic bastards that jumped for joy and sang “Ding-Dong! The Witch Is Dead” when the “Iron Lady” croaked in 2013, Sleepwalker is, next to Peter Greenaway’s The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover (1989), probably the most clever and creative anti-Thatcher flick ever made.

-Ty E

BLACK BOX

Scott B (1979)

For those that have seen the film, it might seem completely unbelievable but Andy Warhol's autistically minimalistic feature Vinyl (1965)—an experimental 'freeform' 70-minute black-and-white adaptation of Anthony Burgess' dystopian novella A Clockwork Orange (1962) featuring Edie Sedgwick in an early speechless role that predates Kubrick's adaptation and was basically shot from one single camera angle—had a major influence on various New York City filmmakers, not least of all those involved with the mostly overrated No Wave Cinema and Cinema of Transgression movements. Indeed, French-born auteur Eric Mitchell's debut feature Kidnapped (1978) is more or less a Super-8 remake of Warhol's film about political terrorism that features a group of scrawny punk deadbeats torturing a businessman and was seemingly also partly inspired by the works of Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Mitchell's compatriots, Scott B (aka Billingsley) and Beth B, would also take strong influence from Vinyl and cinematically fetishize sadomasochism and torture, among other things that seem fairly banal when compared to Pier Paolo Pasolini's cinematic swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975). Midwestern art school dropouts who met and married one another in NYC in 1977, Scott and Beth B more or less seem to have dedicated their early filmmaking career to incessantly reworking Warhol's Vinyl and Mitchell's Kidnapped, albeit in a somewhat more aesthetically inventive and carefully stylized way, at least up until their first 16mm feature Vortex (1982) before subsequently parting ways both romantically and professionally (while Scott would go on to become a TV hack of sorts, Beth went on to direct quasi-mainstream films like Salvation! (1987) starring Viggo Mortensen and Two Small Bodies (1993) starring Fred Ward and Suzy Amis before her career fizzled out). If their third collaboration Black Box (1979) is in any way indicative of the sort of romantic relationship that Scott and Beth had, I am surely not surprised that they ultimately parted ways after being together for about half a decade. Indeed, the film mainly features bloated hipster she-bitch and proud gutter whore Lydia Lunch (Death Valley 69, Submit to Me Now) gleefully verbally rebuking and physically torturing an unclad blond deadbeat with a Nordic physique, which naturally led me to the assumption that the directors shared a sort of sadomasochistic relationship of the gynocentric sort, but I digress. Undoubtedly, Black Box is a 'great' work for Scott and Beth novices as it is quite typical of their work due to its radically repetitive combination of preposterously executed political terrorism, fetishistic yet ultimately fairly softcore S&M/BDSM imagery, halfhearted anti-authoritarian/anti-technocratic message, and near celebration of post-industrial decay and nihilistic libertinism. If there is anything that I have learned from Black Box or any of the filmmakers' other 'para-punk' films, it is that Scott and Beth seem to delight in dehumanization and sexual dysfunction, among various other beaten-to-death motifs that countless other film directors have tackled in a more sophisticated and aesthetically (dis)pleasing way.

BLACK BOX

Notably, in his article on the directors featured in the book Film: The Front Line 1983 (1983), Jonathan Rosenbaum mocks the unoriginal, pseudo-rebellious posturing of Scott and Beth and their contemporaries, stating, "In New York, English film theory and SCREEN contributor Stephen Heath is 'out' because it is felt that in London he is 'in'; whether Heath is useful in relation to looking at or thinking about film is clearly felt to be a secondary issue. This helps to explain some of the crudeness and nihilism of New York in relation to non-turf considerations, in which the preoccupations and habits usually thought to dominate lower forms of animal life are made fashionably compatible with liberal-humanist (and even would-be socialist) and intellectual standards of behavior. The basic message: New York is in love with its own rudeness, and new ideas aren't wanted if the beat belongs to someone else." Naturally, when I read in Rosenbaum's same article that Scott and Beth were both art school dropouts, I could not help but laugh to myself, as Black Box seems like the conspicuously crude expression of vain cynics and pedantic posers who seem more interested in superficial attention-seeking and delighting in debasing the viewer for a cheap narcissistic thrill rather than producing truly revolutionary cinematic works that deserve the label 'avant-garde.' Indeed, after watching a truly idiosyncratic masterpiece like Teutonic dandy Werner Schroeter's early high-camp epic Eika Katappa (1969) or Frans Zwartjes' Pentimento (1979), it is hard for me to label Black Box an avant-garde film. Still, the short is by no means unpalatable, as it works as a sort of unintentionally mirthful romp that manages to unwittingly mock the filmmakers themselves to the point of self-parody. Indeed, the B's film is a perfect example of the seemingly perennial curse of Warhol and his 'anti-aesthetic' filmmaking technique on the NYC avant-garde and experimental filmmaking scene of the late-1970s through early-1980s.

Promoted with the decidedly dystopian tagline, "The culmination of many years of research into the breaking point of the human organism," Black Box attempts to make some sort of inane message about the U.S. government's 'occult war' against its mentally degraded citizenry yet it ultimately seems like a contrived pseudo-snuff film directed by a sadistic woman and masochistic man. The film begins banally enough with the vaguely handsome nameless protagonist/hostage (played by musician Bob Mason, who scored a couple of Scott and Beth's films, including Black Box) lying on a bed in his dilapidated apartment with his discernibly homely, horny, and high girlfriend while she recollects a fairly senseless dream that she only vaguely seems to remember where she dreamed her beau became a "fish or something." After the girlfriend describes how he transformed into a pelican and she became an elephant in the same exact dream, she complains that "someone was watching us all the time" and it was "just really weird." Of course, a blinking literal 'Big Brother' sign that can be seen outside the apartment attempts to signify that the film is set in a dystopian world of paranoia and authoritarian surveillance, but the directors fail in their attempt to even vaguely express this emotional tone, thus making the film oftentimes feel like some sort of homemade sci-fi films that was directed by a collective of stoned squatters who just happened to come upon a Super-8 camera. After briefly making out with his girlfriend before becoming hopelessly bored, the protagonist watches Mission Impossible, asks his girlfriend if she wants anything at the store (to which she agitatedly replies, "Go on, get out," since he rebuffed her sexual advances), and leaves his apartment to go get cigarettes, but almost immediately upon hitting the streets, a dubious dude sporting a leather jacket and black sunglasses puts a revolver under his chin and he soon finds himself being put in the trunk of a car and being kidnapped by a couple of ostensibly suavely dressed Baader-Meinhof-esque thugs that work for the government.

After being brought to an undisclosed underground location, the protagonist is routinely beaten and tortured while being forced to smile and say "I like it" like some sort of masochistic BDSM fetishist. To the lead actor's credit, his acting seems more believable than that of average sex slave in the typical S&M fuck flick. During a brief break from being beaten, the protagonist is told by a fairly fat fellow with a mullet that describes himself as 'Doctor' that, "I'll tell you why we brought you here; to cure you. To free you from error. No one whom we bring to this place, and survives, ever leaves without a complete purity of mind. We're not interested in the petty crimes you committed [...] the thought is all we care about. We don't merely destroy our enemies, we modify them." Indeed, the protagonist is literally beaten into psychological shape and, as the Doctor states in an exaggeratedly sadistic fashion, "Things will happen to you from which you will never recover. Never again will you be capable of ordinary human feelings. Everything will be dead inside of you. You will be hollow. We'll squeeze you empty and we'll fill you with ourselves." Somehow, I suspect that the intention of the filmmakers was to leave the viewer feeling like they are "dead inside," which Black Box manages to accomplish to a certain degree, albeit in an unintentional way where the directors' seeming soullessness and passive nihilism is channeled onto the viewer.

While the Doctor breaks the protagonist in with fairly standard torture methods, a fairly fat 'postmodern femme fatale' in all black played by Lydia Lunch will ultimately destroy him. While Lunch, who certainly looks like she has never missed lunch, beats the protagonist with a whip while he is hanging upside down, she self-righteously declares to him, "We're specialists in the application of stress, damaging anatomical and physiological components of body functions, progressively impairing the working of the brain and hastening the collapse of will and morale." From there, Lunch begins talking about an eponymous torture device called the 'Black Box,' which was apparently used against members of the Vietcong during the Vietnam War and was apparently later utilized by authoritarian regimes in Chile, Uruguay, and Iran. While the protagonist agrees to “confess anything” and even pathetically cries, “I will tell you anything you want to hear,” Lunch just mocks the hapless hostage and the world of pain that he is about to be in by repetitively repeating “Black Box” over and over again like a snotty toddler that is begging for attention. For what is six minutes of the film’s twenty minute running time, the protagonist is tortured by Lunch while completely naked inside the titular torture device, which features an obnoxious blinking light and radiates a sort of grating ambient noise that is controlled by the heavysset ‘government dominatrix’ via a small sound mixer. As to what ultimately happens to the protagonist after his various intimate sessions in the black box, it seems to hardly matter as the character is nothing more than an empty vessel that is just as much a depersonalized object to the filmmakers as he is to the character played by Lunch and the handful of other people that torture him during the film.

BLACK BOX

While featuring a sort of superficial anti-authority punk message regarding government-sanctioned torture and brainwashing of the generically Orwellian sort, Black Box feels like it is shot from the perspective of the torturers, which is underscored by the fact that the protagonist seems like nothing more than a useless eater, not to mention the fact that Lydia Lunch ultimately steals the show. Notably, Scott B once stated regarding his and Beth’s intention with the film, “We wanted to confront people...not only in an intellectual way but on a gut level.” Of course, the short only really achieves the latter and in a way that will probably lead most viewers to assume that the filmmakers might have been better off going ‘all the way’ and directing fully pornographic fuck flicks instead of pretending to be edgy avant-gardists with something edgy and provocative to say. It should be noted that in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier, Scott B not only describes his and his (ex)wife’s films as being outmoded, but also says the same thing about the films of his spiritual mentor Richard Kern and the Cinema of Transgression movement, stating, “Richard was willing to go to places that our films didn’t, but now that you look at the kind of films that pass as mainstream films, these films are tame by comparison.” To Scott and Beth B’s credit, their cinematic works are surely more aesthetically pleasing and technically competent than those directed by the likes of Kern, Nick Zedd, Tessa Hughes-Freeland, David Wojnarowicz or any of the other of the filmmakers associated with the obscenely overrated Cinema of Transgression movement, which took the more (pseudo)subversive themes of the No Wave Cinema and executed them in a decidedly dumbed-down fashion that would even make weirdo Warhol blush with Fremdscham. Indeed, for better or worse, Scott and Beth B were at least the sort of Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet of the NYC film underground.

For those looking for a truly idiosyncratic approach to sadomasochism and political terror, Sapphic Teutonic-Hebraic auteur Ulrike Ottinger’s experimental epic magnum opus Freak Orlando (1981) makes Black Box seem like kindergarten recess. Additionally, the largely unsimulated hermetic sadomasochistic horrors of Pig (1998) co-directed by Nico B. and Christian Death frontman Rozz Williams expose the B's short for the fleeting softcore dilettante excursion in would-be-excess that it is. According to Jonathan Rosenbaum, the B's subsequent Super-8 features The Offenders (1980) and the Nietzschean The Trap Door (1980) are probably the directors' greatest works, but they seem to be totally impossible to find, thus I have to say that Black Box is the filmmakers' most rewarding and worthwhile work to date, though I certainly do not plan to watch it ever again. While it would have never happened in a proudly jaded and left-leaning cement zoo like New York City, Scott and Beth B and their compatriots would most certainly have been better off mimicking the genuinely subversive anti-counterculture cult comedies of underground cinema saint Paul Morrissey than following in the plodding dead-end filmic footsteps of his autistic monetary-motivated producer Warhol. As perfectly personified in Black Box and most of the B's oeuvre, Morrissey revealed in his (counter)culture critiques disguised as camp comedies that liberalism produces a toilet (pseudo)culture of the innately impotent and superlatively nihilistic sort that is completely devoid of real morals and ideals, not to mention cultural, political, and sexual potency. While I would hardly call myself a Freudian, I think the seemingly endless torture and sadism that is unleashed on a somewhat handsome Nordic-looking fellow in Black Box really reveals where Scott and Beth B's values (or lack thereof) really lie, as well as the lies in their art, which I would argue is the most intriguing aspect of the film. As far as I am concerned, I find the fact that the film is actually considered avant-garde cinematic art to be more disturbing and more representative of dystopian times and Western decline than the authoritarian torture it supposedly exposes. Indeed, thank god there are not currently any contemporary NYC avant-garde filmmakers that I know of that are making films in the sterilely sordid spirit of Black Box and fetishize Guantanamo Bay detention camp or the short life and adventurous times of Trayvon Martin, but then again nothing could be more wretched and repugnant yet simultaneously banal than the the masturbatory audio-visual atrocities of over-privileged half-breed Jewish American princess Lena Dunham.

-Ty E

VORTEX
VORTEX

Scott B (1982)

Compared to the great European films movements of the same era like German New Cinema, the NYC-based 'No Wave' cinema movement seems like a totally forgettable and mostly irrelevant footnote from America's rather barren avant-garde cinema history. In fact, I cannot think of a single No Wave film that could be described as even remotely resembling a 'masterpiece,' but then again, I hate jazz, fat chicks with stupid haircuts, and Hebraic 'punk' rockers, so I might be a tad bit prejudiced when it comes to assessing such works. Regardless, I decided to view what is oftentimes regarded as the last No Wave film ever made, Vortex (1982) directed by Beth B and Scott B, as it seemed to have more 'meat' than the average piece of absurdly amateurish art-school-project-gone-awry celluloid puffery typical of the mostly mundane movement. Shot on 16mm film stock (as opposed to Super-8mm as was typical of most No Wave films) with a budget of around $70,000 given by the National Endowment for the Arts grant through Colab, Vortex is a sort of nihilistic neo-noir flick with a tinge of camp and a tidalwave of static phantasmagoria. Starring avant-garde artist/actor William "Bill" Rice (Decoder, Coffee and Cigarettes), movie Mafioso wop bad boy James Russo (Donnie Brasco, Django Unchained), loudmouthed lardo Lydia Lunch (Mondo New York, Kiss Napoleon Goodbye), and performance artist turned mainstream actress Ann Magnuson (Desperately Seeking Susan, Tank Girl), Vortex was a crossover work of sorts for most of those individuals involved as it proved that artists involved in the No Wave scene were capable of more professional and accessible works and, indeed, many of those involved with the film went on to more illustrious careers. A sort of hokey pseudo-Lynchian celluloid hallucination featuring mischievous midgets, fat and frigid femme fatales of the emotionally dead yet bitchy sort, and a quirky corporate/political conspiracy that is bound to tickle the toes of the average half-educated art school dropout, Vortex is a cool film made for the cool people that ultimately no long seems cool. The last film that the directors made together before both their romantic and artistic relationship dissolved into oblivion, Vortex certainly has a foreboding lovelorn feel that reminds viewers why hipsters make rather banal lovers.

At the beginning of Vortex, a portly politician named Congressman White (David Kennedy) is electrocuted to death with a state-of-the-art taser-like weapon by a menacing midget bartender named Peter (played by Brent Collins, a dwarf who suffered from Marfan syndrome and who died of a heart attack as a result of the disorder in 1988) who moonlights as a corporate hit man. Little Peter was sent by his secret employer Frederick Fields—the crippled and equally deranged CEO of the weapon-manufacturing Fields Corporation—to kill Congressman White because he made the fatal mistake of talking to rival weapon manufacturer NAVCO. A cryptic cripple who lives a pathetic, if not pernicious, existence that seems to fall somewhere in between that of Howard Hughes and William S. Burroughs, Fields now relies on his hotheaded Guido ex-limo driver Tony Demmer (James Russo) to carry out his day-to-day affairs, which include murder, terrorism, and espionage. Indeed, a brutish proletarian turned elite corporate servant, Tony takes his job as Fields' right-hand man very seriously, so when a would-be-wanton woman gets in the way, things get rather ugly for everyone involved. While Tony is a charismatic master of romantic manipulation who is able to treat much classier woman, like Fields employee Pamela Fleming (Ann Magnuson), like total shit and get away with it, he ultimately finds himself no match for a rather rotund private investigator named Angel Powers (Lydia Lunch). When not taking self-flattering masturbatory bubble baths while doing dubious investigative research, pussy power Powers is verbally assaulting her wop junky ex-boyfriend for asking for dope money.

One day, Angel gets a knock at the door from some strange fellow who wants to hire her to investigate the mysterious murder of Congressman White. Angel also learns about the billion dollar beef between FieldsCo and NAVCO and how both companies are competing to create a super weapon called the 'BFW' for the United States government. Eventually, Angel makes her way to the FieldsCo company bar and intentionally bumps into Tony Demmer, who she pseudo-seductively asks, "So, you wanna fuck or not?" as if she is god's gift to man (which she most certainly is not!). Of course, Tony wants to fuck, but his cockblocking cripple boss Field makes that impossible because every time the crude chauffeur goes in for the fuck, his boss calls and asks him to do something for him. A marvelously misogynistic man with a high strung heart of garylucky coal, Tony strangely begins to fall for fatso femme fatale Angel and even shows her his beloved pet Boa constrictor. Needless to say, being a virile Italian-American conman with the self-control of a rabid pit-bull, Tony eventually loses his cool, wastes his cockblocking cripple boss, and blows up the NAVCO company building with a super laser. Of course, Angel tries to stop him and when Tony yells to her, "Your brains are up your ass...you don't even know how to use that gun," she eloquently responds by yelling back, "I'll blow your fucking head off." After Angel loses control of her gun, Tony shows her his genetic talent as a born wifebeater and gives her a couple punches to the face. With his boss dead, Tony also manages to slip his prick into Angel via forced entry while the poor gal is semi-unconscious, but she inevitably awakes from her slumber and the goombah corporate gangster eventually loses his life after his true love electrocutes him and knocks him off a very high building.

As co-director Beth B stated in the somewhat recent documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier regarding the troubled production of Vortex, "That was the last film Scott and I made together and I think that it suffered because our collaboration was really not working, although it got a lot of attention." Personally, I think Vortex is the best film Beth B and Scott B ever made together and that their deteriorating romantic relationship only added to the starkly stylized pessimism and misanthropy of the film. After Vortex, Beth B would go on to make what is arguably her 'masterpiece,' Salvation!: Have You Said Your Prayers Today? (1987) starring a relatively unknown Viggo Mortensen and his future wife/ex-wife Exene Cervenka of the Los Angeles punk rock band X. A highly sardonic satire of televangelism featuring an excellent soundtrack by New Order and Cabaret Voltaire, Salvation! is no less 'punk' in spirit to the films of the No Wave and, unlike most of the dime-store cinematic works of the NYC-based art movement, actually manages to rise above the level of totally tasteless pseudo-subversive juvenile celluloid swill. Indeed, while I do not regret watching Vortex, I have seen similar films (i.e. postmodern neo-noir punk work), like Be-taville (1986) directed by Alyce Wittenstein, which manage to do much more in much less time. Indeed, ultimately, Vortex, not unlike Beth B's subsequent features Salvation! and Two Small Bodies (1993), seems like a short film stretched out to an ungodly length. That being said, I must give Vortex some credit for being the only film I have seen featuring Lydia Lunch that did not inspire me to fantasize about herding corpulent feminist cunts into cattle cars and dropping them off in crack and AIDS-ridden black ghettos, which is certainly no small achievement!

VORTEX

-Ty E

ELLIE

Scott Coffey (2005)

Early on, I found myself baring a remarkable attraction to the fruits of tragedy. To watch one's life being systematically destroyed from the inside out is something that draws ones full and undivided attention. In an episode of Gantz, we witness Kei Kurono's head land on a subway platform. In the blink of an eye, schoolgirls and businessmen draw their cellphone cameras to snap a picture of this morbid curiosity. The very same message can be said about nihilistic film making and with that I present Ellie. Ellie is a rather dreary looking teenager of an unknown age. She lifts weights before heading off to catch the bus. Her angst bleeds through her sweaty tank top. As the tag line reads, some questions will be answered but many more will be asked. This 30 minute short film will inevitably explode into a cataclysmic tale with nowhere to turn but to stare yourself down in the mirror and question your very existence. I'd heard of many needing showers after watching films but Ellie left me feeling a level of filthy. One of which that no amount of soap would ever wash away. In one scene, Ellie attempts to purchase whiskey at a general store. After being denied for lack of proper identification, a fellow convenience store worker asks "How bad do you want it?". For anyone that has experienced some trauma that "the real world" offers, we know what road this is heading down. Ellie is a self-conscious teenager and screams when her shirt is attempted to be removed. Each transpiring scene is more heart-wrenching than the last. The teenage rebellion starts off with baby steps, the beginning of nihilism if you will. First comes smoking, then drinking, then premarital sex. Then the events of Ellie get progressively worse. I'll leave it to your imagination to piece together the rest, that is caked in moral ambiguity. Minimalism aside, Ellie is a masterwork in low budget film making. Taking cues from films like Thirteen and In My Skin, Ellie transforms destructive human potential into the true definition of an American tragedy - all this with a young bag of meat. Marking each viewer's soul with relentless imagery of a tortured child, Ellie is an exercise of an independently thought grand scheme re-assessing depression into something unglamorized by popular media. My thanks to the vocally articulated ideas of director Matthew Garrett. Unannounced and practically unheard of, Ellie is one of the most toxic experiments I've ever witnessed.

-mAQ

THE DAY THE EARTH STOOD STILL
THE DAY THE EARTH STOOD STILL

Scott Derrickson (2008)

From the director of such bargain bin bullshit as The Exorcism of Emily Rose and Hellraiser: Inferno (!) comes a remake of one of humanity's favorite science fiction films - The Day the Earth Stood Still. Led by an all-star cast of Keanu Reeves, Jennifer Connelly, and (ugh) Jaden ~~Pinkett~~-Smith, this film aims to recast the hectic environment of post-Cold War conflict to more modern times, although not having the balls to confront a certain topic. To expect much from this film is your first mistake. As menacing and hardcore Gort looked in the trailer, it was inevitable to embrace the idea that the effects would be the only grand thing about the film. The special effects are gracefully majestic and groundbreaking, but the character acting is beyond horrendous. The film stood afloat, that is until Jaden Smith started trying to act. The film hits an all time low. Think of Dakota Fanning's role in War of the Worlds except add a bit of emancipation proclamation and that's the stench of humanity. I'll be the first to admit that I haven't seen the original "masterpiece". My intentions of seeing it only stretch so far. I love my classics, but time is of the essence. When ever I get a Blu-Ray player, I'll have to check it out, but until then I will save my breath. "Klaatu Barada Nikto" mutters Dr. Bensen moments before Earth's destruction. We know this much. As I eagerly awaited this infamous line, the silence grew heavy with wisps and grinding noises. The cult phrase was nowhere to be found. For a popcorn film, The Day the Earth Stood Still (2008) manages on its own. It can be a tedious time in the theaters though. The decision to create an IMAX Experience of this motion picture has its pluses and cons. The film features intense scenes of action, CGI, and spectacular deterioration's, but the film tends to drone on Kathy Bates' character as geriatric and cross-eyed as she is. I have many complaints with this film but Keanu Reeves made me appreciate this film a lot more. I can't really recommend this film but I will acknowledge there's substance for some to enjoy. A surefire technical achievement, but not much else.

-mAQ

DRIVE

Scott Dittrich (1974)

Over three and a half decades before mainstream Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn delicately assembled his 2011 synth-fueled neo-noir arthouse flick of the same name starring heterosexual alpha-twink Ryan Gosling, unrivaled 'master of narrative gay porn' Jack Deveau (Left-Handed, A Night at the Adonis) directed the avant-garde X-rated psychedelic fag fuck flick Drive (1974) starring a gigantic gay cast of no less than fifty longhaired cocksuckers. Not unlike Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool), Peter De Rome (The Fire Island Kids, The Erotic Films of Peter De Rome), Jacques Scandelari (Beyond Love and Evil, New York City Inferno) and more recently, Bruce LaBruce (The Raspberry Reich, Otto; or Up with Dead People) and Todd Verow (Frisk, Bottom X), Deveau—who had a background in architectural and graphic design and who got into the movie business after being convinced by his Sicilian-American sodomite actor friend Sal Mineo (Rebel Without a Cause, Exodus)—was essentially an artist who made pornography, thus his cinematic works would ultimately hold up much better today than those of many of his sleazy celluloid contemporaries, with Drive being arguably his most accomplished celluloid work as a film that works best today as sadomasochistic camp of the radically raunchy retrograde sort. Featuring a rather vainglorious and psychopathic cock-castrating Candy-Darling-wannabe drag queen as the main villain who could be Marlene Dietrich's demented fag-hating fag grandson and who is conspiring to destroy the sex drive of every person alive (hence the film's title, which is also a reference to the sports-car-loving hero), Drive is one of those oh-so rare and ridiculous gay porn flicks that is not only a perversely 'penetrating' piece of patently celluloid quasi-art, but a work of crudely and conspicuously corrupt black comedy, albeit of the cheesy science fiction sort. Part tribute to bad sci-fi b-movies from the 1950s, part degenerate dick-dangling disco cabaret show, part sodomy-saluting S&M dungeon debauchery, and part sass-saturated slapstick skin flick, Drive is the sort of insanely idiosyncratic celluloid work that needs to be seen to be believed, as a work that forever stays with the viewer no matter how much they would like to barf it out of their brain. A pre-AIDS, disco-digging dick-fest featuring double-fist anal penetration, debauched dungeon orgies, and decidedly disgusting drag queen histrionics, Drive is also a work of absolutely aberrant agitprop made when assaulting heterosexual America and establishing a sort of gay pride of the anti-bourgeois was vogue. Humorous homo hedonism from hell, Drive is like taking a bath in the contaminated sweat taken off the floor of a cocaine and popper fueled gay bar.

As the blonde drag queen villain Arachne (Chris Rage aka Mary Jim Sstunning) of Drive reveals in a long and drawn out sassy suicide letter/public service announcement right before putting a bullet in his/her makeup-adorned head,

DRIVE

“Dear World: ARACHNE will tell you the truth because I am the only one that understands the truth. By the time the official version has been announced and interpreted by the press, the facts will be distorted beyond recognition. It is the duty of the few who hear the voice of truth to speak to the masses. The masses hear nothing. And so I speak to you. I will begin with a scientist...He invented the drug...A drug that terminated the sex drive. It was the government’s idea to misuse the drug for birth control in underdeveloped nations. I sent my men to capture this scientist for it was my idea to use the drug to liberate the world. Scientists will not listen and governments are too busy talking to hear. If I had been forced to deal only with the scientists it would have been simpler but there was another man. His name was Clark and he was one of those special agents that the government is so fond of employing. I have hidden cameras that give me access to the files the government keeps on men such as Clark. His file described him as intelligent and unquestioningly obedient. I thought he was quite beautiful. I began on work with one theme and a simple pattern and then, as circumstances allowed, I spun a more complex web. I am a rational person.” Indeed, without Arachne’s narrated confessional at the beginning of the film, it would be nearly impossible to follow what is going on in Drive, but plot and storyline are secondary in such a visually visceral and exceedingly extremist work that is nothing short of aesthetic terrorism of the foully frolicsome sort.

Aside from opening with Arachne’s nauseatingly narcissistic letter to the world, Drive also features a bloody montage of the psychopathic tranny grabbing the cock and balls of an unfortunate gentleman and slicing them off in a very careful and dainty manner with a kitchen knife. As Arachne reveals during the film, s/he was not always a creepy cock-chopper, but previously someone who longed for love in all the wrong horny men and has since then dedicated his/her life to masterminding a conspiracy to destroy all sex drives. When not perniciously plotting destruction, Arachne moonlights as a campy cabaret singer in a disco hall where horny homos hump each others’ legs. Though seeming to lack even the most meager inkling of humor and humility, Arachne also is known to wear a gorilla outfit on stage. Using his/her less than androgynous minion Androgene (Peter Fersen), Arachne hopes to steal the liquid castration formula that will destroy all men’s sex drives, sinisterly stating, “I will have the formula... I will succeed. The world will remember Arachne...,” but rather unfortunately, a government secret agent named Clark (Kirk Luna) gets in the way. While attempting to steal the formula from its creator, Dr. Vincent Hardison (Sydney Soons)—a hippie-like degenerate who looks like a more gawky, zit-faced version of Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro—Arachne’s plans are thwarted, thus resulting in the death of one of his minions and a pole-smoking scientist. To relieve the stress of failure, Arachne fondles glass cases carrying castrated members s/he has carefully collected. In between cruising for cocks while driving around Manhattan in his red Lamborghini and engaging in full-force fisting in foggy gay bathhouses (even using government money to foot the bill!), Clark is on the glittery trail of Arachne. In the end, Clark find Arachne's secret dungeon and stops the deranged drag queen before s/he can hack off a young twink's prick. Of course, with all the torture devices in the makeshift Milligan-esque dungeon, Clark makes sure to sexually service the tied up prisoners before freeing them. As for Arachne, s/he has more red liquid on his/her face after sucking on a handgun and pulling the trigger (rather unfortunately, one does not get to see the drag queen's post-suicide facial).

A sort of celluloid missing link between Steven Arnold's Luminous Procureess (1971), Women in Revolt (1971) directed by Paul Morrissey, Michael Kalmen's Elevator Girls in Bondage (1972), and Troma brand cinematic sleaze, Drive seems like nothing short of a filmic anomaly today as a work created during a time where they seemed to be an overlap between pornography and the avant-garde. The fact that Drive also features avant-garde pornographer Peter De Rome (Adam & Yves, The Destroying Angel) only adds to the film's curious cult cred. Ultimately, Drive is the sort of film that Russ Meyer would never had the balls, nor the love of balls, to make. Of course, being a debauched hardcore flick, Drive is sometimes slowed down and aesthetically subverted by its explicit sex scenes, yet compared to the average fuck flick, Deveau has an uncommon balance between buggery and storyline, as if the director really wanted to make a cult flick, but found himself a little bit too infatuated with the 'actors.' Featuring melodic mono orchestral music and foreboding synthesizer-driven sci-fi-like sound effects, as well as Riefenstahl-esque trapeze artist imagery superimposed over semen-soaked sauna room orgies, Drive is like being thrown into director Deveau's diseased brain and wondering if one is lost in a sort of pandemonium between homo heaven and Hades. Featuring a deranged drag queen who vomits at the sight of two sauna room sodomites ejaculating in unison and disco dick-suckers who live for unsafe promiscuity, Drive, aside from being too artsy fartsy, is far too politically incorrect to have been made in contemporary times as the sort of sodomy-sanctioning work created by proud poofs who had nil interest in getting married, joining the military, or any of the other culturally conservative cocksucker crap promoted by the LGBT propagandists in the mainstream media nowadays, which is just one of the various reasons why Deveau's work is worth checking out if you wallow in extremist cinema.

-Ty E

BEHIND THE MASK: THE RISE OF LESLIE VERNON
BEHIND THE MASK: THE RISE OF LESLIE VERNON

Scott Glosserman* (2006)

One thing about me, I love surprises. When I watch a film that I expect to be utter crap, and it turns out to be good, let alone amazing, my heart skips a beat. This little gem is everything that was used to success in a film like Evil Dead II; part comedy, satire, and a mean horror film. Behind the Mask is a mean film to an extent. The first half of the film encompasses a mockumentary of sorts, depicting a would-be serial killer. This first half can be highly related to Belgian's Man Bites Dog, and then out of nowhere, it shifts horrifically. Behind the Mask takes place in a fictional world in which Jason Voorhees, Michael Myers, Chucky, and Freddy Krueger all exist. This world is also inhabited with reporters willing to follow around a young serial killer who wants to make his mark. Such clichéd rules are explained which often end with humorous results. The "Survivor girl" and "Ahab" are explained. While this should have been a stale approach which can be read in books such as How to Survive a Horror Movie?, It is true that the aforementioned absurdities commonly occur in slashers. Slashers. I hate that title. I hate the genre. Just the very word brings up painful memories of the chances I have given, and the hours that I have wasted attempting to adapt to the modern horror film. Even though I appreciate the slasher-esque ending, I can't help but discriminate against it as a whole. The twist in the film certainly was predictable, but that doesn't mean it wasn't good. Once again, Horny teenagers find themselves trapped in a horrifying situation. Things might have not been so bad if they would stay away from substance abuse. As with any Anchor Bay release, you can expect a cameo from Robert Englund as Leslie's "Ahab" These days, "cult" icons probably get pitched a couple hundred to a thousand dollars to appear in the next bargain bin horror film. Ken Foree's role in Devil's Den comes to mind. I do respect Robert Englund's role and career though. He has that face that is recognizable. His grizzled facial hair makes for a good supporting actor for films such as these. This isn't a perfect film, nor is it great. Being a good film is still tough business. Nathan Baesel (Leslie Vernon) is one of the most over-charismatic, pompous asses I have ever experienced in a film. Near the climax of the film is the only time when he acts as an iconic horror villain. I do appreciate his mask though. For the task of creating a memorable mask, Scott Glosserman has created a chilling caricature of a muppet skull. Behind the Mask is a film that stands out on its own. No matter how many other films are titled this, whether they be Slipknot films or documentaries on Rob Zombie's Halloween, this is a film that deserves its title and brandishes playful originality. Speaking of originality, I loved watching the credits. Too bad a really shitty band was playing in the background, or It might have had the benefit of being creepy.

-mAQ

SOCKET

Sean Abley° (2007) Socket is one of the few original sci-fi ideas lately. Director Sean Abley tapped in real nice with the regulars on his brave new outing. With his inspirations and influences in tow, he sets out to create a gay sci-fi film actually worth mentioning. Brilliant Surgeon Bill Matthews gets struck by lightning and ends up in his hospital, currently recovering. His young intern nurse hands him a card for "people like us". When he is at home, he is attracted to static from the TV, goes on an energy high, cleaning his entire home. With this event, he decides to check the meeting out, which leads to a group of people who love absorbing voltage to go club-hopping and making out with each other. The basic storyline has recurring elements of the films about drug addiction and the seedy side of ecstasy, which has its fun times, but is too overdone. Socket doesn't add any new emotions to the character's addiction. Many influences can be traced so deeply, that the film loses many of its originality points. The secret cult theme can be lead to Cronenberg's Crash and even the ridiculous surgery (body horror themes) can be lead back to Cronenberg as well. I even sense a slight ode to Electric Dragon 80,000v. Socket is a marvel of a gay film for the simple fact that it doesn't revel in the fact that it is a gay film. Most gay/lesbian films focus less on the story and more on the accept of them in our society, as sort of a "look at me" scream. You barely notice that the film is gay-themed and serves as a testament that there is a market in gay films. Aside from being a breath of fresh air, Socket is a film that can hold its own throughout the onslaught of sci-fi films to come. With recurring themes of body horror, dark perversions, and looking for the ultimate high, Socket is a science fiction film to reckon with.

-Maq

THE LOVED ONES
THE LOVED ONES

Sean Byrne (2009)

What kind of deranged bitch asks a guy to the prom? Apparently, the kind that likes to take her would-be boyfriends prisoner and keep girly scrapbooks of her man murdering escapades. The Loved Ones is an Australian film that features this kind of torture lusting she-bitch (named Lola) from down under. The unfortunate victim of this teen-girl psycho is a young man named Brent who finds it hard to cope after inadvertently killing his father in a head-on car collision with a tree. Of course, car accidents have unfortunate consequences but one never expects near death because they turned down a weird girl down for Prom. As you find out early in The Loved Ones, Brent has a loving girlfriend who has no problem letting him know he's appreciated by spreading her tender thighs, so there was no need for him to be so desperate as to flirt with freak girl.

The Loved Ones is certainly a film that borrows elements from earlier horror films, most notably The Texas Chainsaw Massacre and The People Under The Stairs. In fact, most of The Loved Ones plays out in a similar way to the family dinner torture sequence near the conclusion of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre. Only in this film, instead of featuring a family of inbred Texas degenerates having a jolly good ol' thyme playing torture, The Loved Ones presents an odd Father and daughter duo who like to play murderously with teenage boys. Lunatic Lola must have one hell of a sex drive and a lot of pent up libidinal frustration for her to decide kidnapping and torturing the opposite sex is a proper way to achieve sexual release. Lola's sexual perversion is most likely heavily influenced by her weasel-like Father who seems to have extremely intimate feelings for his aggressive debutante daughter. If there is any message of intrinsic value to The Loved Ones, it is that weak Fathers produce deranged and hostile daughters.

Daddy's Girl

I must admit that I found crazy Lola to be extremely attractive and find it unfortunate that Brent did not agree to go to the prom with her. Had Brent gone to the prom with Lola and broken open her meat curtain afterward, maybe he wouldn't have had to endure a nightlong torture session. After all, if Lola needed anything, it was to be submissive at the hands of one of her imagined Gentlemen callers. Even after getting hit by a car, Lola still finds enough gall to crawl with a knife (her phallus of choice) to stab the man that stood her up. Despite being the villain of the film, Lola is certainly the most interesting and complex character featured in The Loved Ones. Of course, being a sensational horror film, we are barely introduced to the character of Lola and what makes her tick. On the other hand, the ambiguity of Lola's character also gives the film a certain power that may have been lost had the director of the film decided to reveal more about the teenage angel of death.

Female serial killers are a rare breed and I would like to seem more featuring them like The Loved Ones. After all, the world needs more films featuring the deepest and darkest fantasies of your typical post-female Feminist. The Loved Ones certainly borrows conventions and characteristics of earlier horror films but executes these traits in a new way, resulting in a film that is sadistically entertaining from beginning to end. Maybe there is re-animated hope for the mostly sterile horror genre as recent shockfests like The Loved Ones and Deadgirl have given me some optimism.

-Ty E

I THINK WE'RE ALONE NOW
I THINK WE'RE ALONE NOW

Sean Donnelly (2008)

Unfortunately, I was formerly friends with a pathetic perverted fellow (lets just call him "Big H") that claimed he was in love with famous women that he had obviously never met. To show his delusional imagined love for porno star Riley Mason, big H wrote her a pop song on his folk guitar with melodies inspired by Brian Wilson of The Beach Boys. Big H also talked incessantly about the various women that he would never meet, let alone fornicate with. Unsurprisingly, Big H had many vivid sexual fantasies involving being sexually degraded by the women of his often advertised dreams. Once, Big H boasted that he would love to drink a freshly pissed cup of redheaded miscling Alyson Hannigan's urine. Naturally, I became very tired of Big H's pathetic behavior as it was no longer funny. Fortunately for Big H, he finally found a girlfriend (despite being a 23 year old virgin at the time) in the ferocious form of a husky rich bitch Jewess. To Big H's fanatical glee, his Jewish American princess physically abused him during sex and he would show off the battle wounds covering his grotesque body with overstimulated pride. I bring up Big H as he reminds me of the mentally perturbed Tiffany fans in the documentary I Think We're Alone Now directed by Sean Donnelly. Not since the vintage days of my friendship with big H have I felt embarrassed by the pitiful sounds of a gravely lonely person as I did after viewing this documentary.

Before watching I Think We're Alone Now, I had never heard of 1980s pop singer Tiffany nor her smutty pop songs. Tiffany's greatest aesthetic achievement was not her forgettable music but being featured in the April 2002 issue of Playboy magazine, a desperate comeback publicity stunt that she apparently had a hard time explaining to her 9 year old son. Tiffany's appearance in Playboy also probably did not help her already annoying problem with fanatic fans like Jeff Turner and Kelly McCormick, the two graceless 'stars' of I Think We're Alone Now. Jeff is a 50 year old uber-nerd-turd that suffers from Asperger's syndrome, a social disorder which allows him to live off the generous fruits of the taxpayer via welfare. Since Asperger's causes the individual to become immersed in various obsessions, it no doubt plays a huge part in Jeff's life commitment to Tiffany. Fellow I Think We're Alone Now subject Kelly is a hermaphrodite that also has the government foot the bill for her pseudo-career of swooning over Tiffany. While watching I Think We're Alone Now, I found myself completely repulsed by both Tiffany fans. The fact that both of these wackjobs live off public assistance while actively stalking a 1980s pop singer almost caused me to forget the fact that disproportionate members of certain minority groups exploit the welfare system.

Being the slightly more masculine of the two, Jeff is the more assertive and aggressive Tiffany fan, even having security guards subduing him at one of the singer's appearances. At the very beginning of I Think We're Alone Now, Jeff states quite confidently, "Tiffany and I have known each other most of her life and we are in love with each other." It is quite obvious that Jeff is a mastermind of self-deception but not so much when it comes to deceiving others. Jeff also believes that Tiffany can time travel and talk to different various alien races from outer space. Despite having a hard time speaking coherently, Kelly is marginally less annoying than Jeff. Although born with both the key and the hole, Kelly lives 'her' life as a woman, albeit as a lesbian woman that is infatuated with Tiffany. I think Kelly may have been exaggerating a tad bit when she describes herself as the most popular person in High school. Let's just hope that when her former classmates see I Think We're Alone Now that they do not drown her in the punch bowl at their class reunion. Kelly also used to be some kind of high school track star but she runs so awkwardly (whilst acting like quite the braggart) in the documentary that I thought she might be wearing a diaper. When Jeff and Kelly meet up for a Tiffany appearance, there is an unspoken rivalry of social retards that reaches a climax when Jeff ruins an extra special reflection moment of Kelly's.

I Think We're Alone Now was obviously made on a used shoestring budget with next to no production values. In fact, the documentary features no titles but instead film pieces of paper with writing on them. Of course, the minimalist approach taken no doubt works to the advantage of this highly engrossing yet disturbing documentary. I am sure some would see I Think We're Alone Now as exploitation but the documentary is far from it. The filmmaker could have decided to not mention Jeff's Asperbergers but instead the documentary features various insights into his life, including interviews with friends and church leaders. At the end of I Think We're Alone Now, Kelly comes out on top as the greater Tiffany fan. Despite having more contact with Tiffany, Jeff never seems to fill the lonely void that is at the center of his dubious fanaticism, even becoming a fairweather stalker by later deciding he would rather wed Alyssa Milano. Kelly seems to fill an enormous portion of her empty life just by meeting Tiffany, coming away from the experience with a noticeable amount of new self-esteem. At the end of I Think We're Alone Now, both Jeff and Kelly are still alone but isn't everyone (even Tiffany) to some extent?

-Ty E

BENT
BENT

Sean Mathias (1997)

Once long ago, the now deceased singer of a fascistically iconoclastic yet decidedly degenerate grindcore band with the positively poetic name “Anal Cunt” wrote a song entitled “Hogging Up the Holocaust,” which features the rather insightful lyrics regarding the greedy victim of God’s chosenites, “Other people were fucked with too...But all you care about is you...Faggots, gypsies, others too.” Of course, the faggots, as well as their ostensibly female counterparts (who the Nazis did not typically harass), are now undoubtedly only second to the Hebrews in getting a piece of the persecution pie because, in terms of being a political collective with a discernible agenda like their Judaic allies, they are pushy, politically subversive, relative wealthy, love to whine, and hold victimhood as the height of moral superiority, thus it was only natural that they would begin telling their “holocaust story” in celluloid form. In terms of homo holocaust flicks, probably none is ‘greater’ than Bent (1997) directed by gay British theatre director Sean Mathias and based on the blockbuster 1979 play of the same name written by gay Jewish American screenwriter/playwright Martin Sherman, who also acted as one of the film’s producers. Technically a British-Japanese co-production, Bent features an Anglicized National Socialist Germany featuring popular (and rampantly heterosexual) English actor Clive Owen in the lead role as a bourgeois bugger who takes on the false identity of a Jew and wears an ugly yellow star of David in a concentration camp rather than admit to being a homo and wearing a pink triangle as a wide-receiver on the fluff team. Following the tradition of Italian maestro Luchino Visconti in unabashedly portraying Nazis in an absurdly eroticized and fetishized fashion and featuring erratically exaggerated anti-reality melodrama that would even make Fassbinder’s stomach churn in disgust, Bent is surely a penetrating, if not oftentimes plodding, piece of sadomasochistic ‘persecution porn’ that seems more interested in enticing the viewer with salacious sex scenes and bodacious bloody violence than promoting the apparently ‘good fight’ of the poofer plight. Indeed, in terms of resembling reality and authentic human emotion, Bent is about as historically authoritative in sensitively portraying the horrors of the Second World War as Spielberg’s Schindler’s list (1993) and even Liliana Cavani’s The Night Porter (1974) and The Berlin Affair (1985), but all the more fetishistic, suavely stylized, and entertainment based. Essentially beginning on the Night of the Long Knives aka Röhm-Putsch—Hitler’s treacherous purge of the Nazi Strasserite ‘left-wingers’ and largely homosexual led Sturmabteilung (SA) that took place between June 30 and July 2, 1934—Bent focuses on a sexually promiscuous and supremely narcissistic sodomite from a wealthy family who finds himself a marked man after having an affair with a blond beast of a brownshirt. Featuring a cameo from Jude

Law as a one-eyed SA brownshirt with nonsensical SS insignia, SS men hanging out in and brutally raping and torturing prisoners in a relatively empty cattle car headed to Dachau concentration camp, old rock queen Mick Jagger in radically repulsive hagsploitation-esque drag, and a conspicuously British cast that look like they could be the cast of a Derek Jarman film, Bent, not unlike the TV movie Christopher and His Kind (2011) based on British author Christopher Isherwood's 1976 memoir of the same name, is a relentlessly culturally and historically retarded and superlatively sordid tale of Teuton buggery after the purge of the big bad butt-darting brownshirts.

Max (Clive Owen) is a dandy degenerate gay boi and black sheep from a wealthy German family who, judging by his rather promiscuous sexual behavior, is itching for a poz-cock as he spends a good portion of his time hanging out in Weimar Berlin cabarets and engaging in sodomite orgies. Despite the glaring jealousy of his four-eyed and effortlessly effete dancer boyfriend Rudy Glass (Brian Webber II), Max does not think twice about starting a solely sexual relationship with a handsome blond Nazi brownshirt named Wolfgang Ganz (German-Danish actor Nikolaj Coster-Waldau), but little does he realize that it is the eve of the Night of the Long Knives and his new piece of Aryan Übermensch meat is also the boyfriend of Berlin SA leader Karl Ernst, an ex-bouncer of a gay bar who will be one of Hitler's homo victims. Naturally, since Ganz is Ernst's boy toy, the SS comes for him and slits his throat right in front of Max and Rudy at their apartment, so the two make a run for it and go into hiding. Not long after, Max and Rudy discover that their old drag queen friend Greta (Mick Jagger), the star of their favorite gay cabaret is an opportunistic tranny traitor, who sold out Wolfgang Ganz to the SS and put his own friends in jeopardy after being bribed. Greta, who was awarded handsomely by the SS for his treachery and has burned his entire drag queen/cabaret wardrobe in a rather ritualistic fashion as a way to say sayonara to his past life as Berlin's most glamorous queen, gives Max the sound advice to accept the fact that in Nazi Germany, "Queer is out. Queer is dead" and that they should pretend to live their lives as heterosexuals as he has already started to as demonstrated by his new butch suit and name. Uncle Freddie (Ian McKellen) has given him new papers to hide his identity, but the naïve nephew refuses to leave his bitchy boyfriend Rudy behind. In a rather anti-völkisch action scene filmed in a seemingly haunted and phantasmagorical German forest that seems like a horror-like take on the mystical Germanic woods of the National Socialist propaganda flick Ewiger Wald (1936) aka Enchanted Forest, Max and Rudy are caught by the SS and sent on a train headed to Dachau as homosexual criminals. Rather absurdly, Rudy is forced to break his own glasses and is routinely tortured by an SS officer who also sports glasses because the naughty Nazi assumes that his lack of vision is a sure sign that he is a member of the intelligentsia. Max, who keeps telling himself like a scared child that "it isn't happening" as he sees his boyfriend routinely beaten to a bloody pulp in the cattle car, is forced by the sadistic SS officer to also beat Rudy, who is inevitably killed by being thrown out of the moving train. A traitor to his lover, Max also becomes a traitor to his homosexuality after he is forced by the SS to copulate with the corpse of a 13-year-old girl. For his daring display of heterosexual necrophilia/pedophilia, as well as bribing the SS men, Max is rewarded with the supreme honor of wearing the yellow star of David label as opposed to the dreaded pink triangle because, apparently, being a poof is worse than being a Jew at Dachau concentration camp.

BENT

Not long after arriving at Dachau, Max begins to fall in love with a less than handsome homo named Horst (Canadian actor Lothaire Bluteau), a mentally tough fluff who wears the pink triangle proudly as an activist of gay Jewish sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld who was naturally sent to the concentration camp due to his political commitment to cocksucking. Not unsurprisingly, Horst initially finds Max to be a repulsive character for being a self-loathing sodomite who pretends to be a Jew to save his own skin, but things change over time as the wealthy conman proves his commitment to his new comrade. A homo hustler of the supremely shameless sort, Max bribes the SS men and manages to get Horst a relatively easy job with him pointlessly carrying rocks from one side of a room to another, work designed to break the will and spirit of the prisoners. In a patently ridiculous scene of the quasi-supernatural sort, Max and Horst manage to reach mutual orgasms while standing side-to-side without even looking or touching one another nor themselves, but merely by talking dirty to one another and using their wanton will to power. Eventually, Max and Horst develop debilitating colds, which mark them as dead men as far as the concentration camp guards are concerned. To get medicine for Horst and himself, Max gives a blowjob to an SS officer. After finding out how Max was able to procure the meds, Horst refuses to take the drugs and the same SS officer who his boy toy blew begins to taunt him. Realizing he is about to die, Horst charges the SS man and is shot dead on the spot by a guard, but not before scratching the statuesque face of his seemingly gay Aryan persecutor. With his lover dead, Max finally gets enough courage to accept death like a Third Reich era German soldier would and he commits suicide by grabbing on an electronic fence in a morbidly melodramatic fashion worthy of Elie Wiesel's diluted literary fantasies.

A shamelessly sensationalized and even exploitative tale of cocksucker concentration camp blues, Bent expresses the sentimentalized message that it is better to die an open faggot than it is to live as a closet colon-choker. Undoubtedly, considering the sometimes surreal and theatrically stylized setting of the film, as well as the somnambulist-like movement of the characters, Bent resembles more of a Nancy boy nightmare than any sort of serious depiction of kraut fairies being fag-bashed by Hitler's heroes. Indeed, although penned and produced by a Jewish mensch, I would assume that most Jews (Shabbos Goys like Roger Ebert included!) would consider Bent to be a piece of holocaust heresy that uses kitschy and high-camp tableaux, as well as unwaveringly decadent eroticism and gratuitous ultra-violence to enthrall the viewer in what amounts to loony celluloid libertinism with a sorry shade of senseless sentimentalism, thus overpowering its rather weak and meek pro-homo message. In fact, Bent goes so far as to not only turn sodomite stormtroopers into super sensual sex objects, but also sado-masochistic SS men, one of which literally grabs the testicles of a prisoner in an S&M fashion and another one, arguably the most archetypically handsome and Nordic man in the film, receives head from a man he assumes to be a Jew. In what amounts to a rather insightful scene, protagonist Max remarks to his homo homeboy Horst regarding the sexual persuasion of a Svengali-like SS man, "Of course, he could be queer, but you don't like to think about that. You don't want them to be queer," thus discrediting the absurd idea that all queers are as morally supreme as Hollywood and MTV would lead one to believe. Although probably inadvertent on the director's part, Bent even hints that if the Sturmabteilung brownshirts, most of whom are portrayed in a reasonably positive light in the film, ruled Nazi Germany, the nation would be a virtual homo heaven on earth. Either way, Bent, like Visconti's The Damned (1969) and Cavani's The Night Porter (1974), is just one of many reasons why Nazis will live on to be the most potent and fetishized objects of artsy camp cinema. Unfortunately, kraut fag Führer Michael Kühnen, a man inspired by the struggle of slayed gay SA leader Ernst Röhm, died of AIDS before he could see what would have probably been his favorite film, Bent, a virtual romance flick for sodomite Strasserites.

-Ty E

CRONICAS
CRONICAS

Sebastián Cordero (2004)

Is the news media run by assholes? Does the media have the ability to mold public opinion? Does the media outright lie or withhold horrible crimes that may benefit them? Does the media think that the general public is a bunch of morons that barely know how to wipe their own asses? Obviously, I would have to say “yes” to all these questions. Naturally, Hollywood has produced a few films criticizing and satirizing the media. Hollywood hack Oliver Stone’s Natural Born Killers comes to mind. Funny, I thought that Stone was a disinformation guy with some type of agenda. Anyways, the Ecuadorian film Cronicas is the first film to appropriately address the conspiring clowns that run the media. In Cronicas, John Leguizamo plays an arrogant video journalist who is attempting find a child murdering and raping serial killer from Ecuador. I have never been a fan of Leguizamo but always felt he was good at playing asshole midgets. He seems to be a natural method actor of sorts. Of course, Leguizamo’s role in Cronicas as a self-serving news journalist is perfect for him. He also works with another man and woman who also happen to be a couple. Being the prick that he is, Leguizamo’s character is screwing the woman in the news crew making it very obvious to her real partner. Leguizamo saves the life of the ambiguous serial killer in Cronicas. An obese man attempts to set the killer on fire for killing his son (the killer accidentally killed him with his car). Soon afterward, Leguizamo’s character starts a sort of mutual beneficial relationship with the killer. The killer is attempting to get out of jail before he is murdered and Leguizamo is attempting to get his best news story yet. It is obvious that Leguizamo’s character only cares about his career and WISHING he was suave. The revealing of Leguizamo’s true self is what makes Cronicas a good commentary on those that make a career on bringing us “breaking stories.” Cronicas does have its fair share of flaws. I guess it wouldn’t be considered a “flaw” that Cronicas is one of the most aesthetically repelling films that I have ever seen. I thought the America’s inner cities were some of the biggest manmade waste piles in the world. That was until I saw the jungle and swamp “villages” of Ecuador. I guess the ugliness of the settings of Cronicas goes great with a film about a child serial killer. Still, there is only so much ugliness that I can take. Aside from the visuals of Cronicas, the film also seemed a little unevenly paced. Before you know it, the film is over before you feel it reaches its full “thrilling” potential. Cronicas is certainly a film I am glad I saw but most likely will never watch again. It is also a film that proves that John Leguizamo is talented but also an annoying little turd. It is about time someone made a film criticizing the ethics of the media while being somewhat subtle about it. Cronicas is able to combine “social commentary” and “psychological thriller” for an interesting hybrid. I just wish I didn’t feel a little sick from all the ugliness after watching it.

-Ty E

MADAME O
MADAME O

Seiichi Fukuda (1967)

For the past several days I have been plagued with fluish symptoms. During this brief period of hell, I had managed to view quite a number of films with Madame O being one of the more memorable ones. Not just because I, too, shared a "rot" of sorts with the main objector of the film but also because of the pulp decadence that played a part of this early entry in pinku. Past polygamy, Seiko harnesses the terror grained in her roots from a savage rape to fuel her moonlight attacks on men. Depicted only during a single and short scene, Madame O makes sure not to stick so much as to the erotic nature of her molestation as to focus almost exclusively on the stylistic composition of the film. After all, without the pseudo-noir and the toggled monochromatic/color, why, Madame O would have been left a sizzling piece of stale pink, as non-titillating as could be. Due to the absence of logical Japanese perversion and fetishistic truths, Madame O is counterfeit Americana picked up for Western soil via Audubon Pictures. It is in this vein that makes Madame O seem unfitted for any proper audience. You can herd it any which way you'd like but Madame O will never feel or be at home. No, Madame O was clearly made for a different species of being and in this context I'd imagine it getting the vast recognition it almost deserves.

Labeled as a killer and outcast as a saint, Seiko's livelihood makes up of two key activities: performing complicated surgeries, saving the lives of many, and seducing and transmitting her syphilis (given to her upon the rape) while the male contender rests peacefully after an explicitly PG-13 night of consensual sex. The surgical precision in which Seiko applies her "scorned woman" archetype is as devious and calculated as it gets. She is a simple and stupid creature, labeling all men as chauvinist pigs and dealing them her inner-rot via cotton swabs. For these terrible attacks on men, you'd assume the violation she suffered through would have been a grueling experience but due to the foolish and prudish handling of Madame O, the rape scene is presented as a slightly eschewed game of ring-around-the-rosie, baring only a small amount of breast and retaining full dignity, syphilis withheld, of course. Seiko's life is challenged, however, when she finally transcends teasing death and actually murders a potential blackmailer. She then not only becomes a legit killer but picks up a note of love with a young doctor employed at her clinic. Once married, Seiko doesn't rest easy as she begins to suspect her husband being of questionable intention. Again, the utilizing of two separate palettes really draws the line between art and proto-sleaze, black and white representing the drama and color to visually resonate with the graphic (at the time) images on display.

Madame O was, at times, breathtaking in its dazzling display of crisp cinematography. There is no denying its powerful images, including the silly throes of passion which barely stand for second base by today's standard. Whether or not you would enjoy it depends largely on your taste. Hailed as being cutting edge and graphic, Madame O is really neither - a fossil, more or less. Its value relies largely on its history and not so much the internal worth. Despite ending on a chord so silly and sudden that all dignity self-defenestrates upon credits, Madame O remained a worthy textbook pink film with rather unconventional decisions progressing itself in the art market. But if misandrištic cinema is what you are looking for, Madame O can only satiate a small portion as there is no real revelation as to the reason of her madness, other than Seiko's whines of an unfortunate incident which have, no doubt, happened to millions of other people. This facet plays perfectly with her narcissism and leaves the air about the character unsettling and curious. I still don't how to feel about Seiko's resentment towards men other than blaming it on naivety. Recommended for a single viewing but no more. To learn more about Madame O or more Asian cult cinema, visit Synapse Films.

-mAQ

I LOVE YOU, I DON'T
I LOVE YOU, I DON'T

Serge Gainsbourg (1976)

If there is anything more repellant and repulsive to me than Serge Gainsbourg's bisexed, apish face and Franco-Semitic hyper-ambisexuality, it is his overblown and over-esteemed creative output, so I was not exactly delighted when I realized that I made the unconscious commitment to watch one of his cinematic auteur pieces. This month, I decided that it would be quite regaling challenge to view every single one of Joe Dallesandro's post-Warhol European period flicks (mid-1970s to early-1980s), so naturally I caved in and decided to view Gainsbourg's directorial debut Je t'aime moi non plus (1976) aka I Love You, I Don't; a work starring the Italian-American junky hunk as a perverted Polak who decides to give women a try after a lifetime of unadulterated blue-collar male buggery. Undoubtedly, Dallesandro gave some of his greatest and most prestigious performances during his stay in Europa because, as he has stated in various interviews that unlike while working with Warhol and his mostly untalented weirdos – who saw him as nothing more than a beautiful brutish bohunk and unofficial factory bouncer – European directors treated him as a serious actor, hence his eclectic performances in such notable works as Vittorio Salerno's Savage Three (1975) aka Fango bollente, Louis Malle's Black Moon (1975), Walerian Borowczyk's La marge (1976), Fernando Di Leo's Madness (1980) and Jacques Rivette's Merry-Go-Round (1981). Out of all of his European films, I Love You, I Don't quite arguably features Dallesandro at his most intimate, vulnerable and yet decidedly brutal. Also featuring Gainsbourg's then-wife Jane Birkin in an unflattering yet notable performance that would get her nominated for a Best Actress César Award, I Love You, I Don't is a work of Arcadian libertinage where the conventions of sex and sexuality are mixed in a blender for a most potent, if slightly poisonous, ultra-erotic cinematic cock-in-tail. Originally banned in the UK in its uncut form upon its initial 1976 release, I Love You, I Don't is a cinematic work that is not so much infamous for its graphic nudity as it is for depraved sexual scenarios, recalcitrant relationships, and deluging lack of sentimentality. Unsurprisingly, featuring an unremarkable score and songs composed by Serge Gainsbourg himself, which proves to be one of the weaker points of the film, I Love You, I Don't – much like Godard's Contempt (1963) – is one of those rare films where I was able to put aside my unwavering antipathy for the artist and judge the film somewhat objectively on its own merits.

Over two decades before rather rotund fanboy Kevin Smith directed what is arguably his most serious film, Chasing Amy (1997) – a reasonably ridiculous and infantile quasi-fantasy work about a lipstick lesbo who temporarily switches to smoking poles instead of licking labias – Serge Gainsbourg released I Love You, I Don't; a more-bitter-than-sweet love story about a sad-eyed Slavic sodomite named Krassky (Joe Dallesandro) who experiments with heterosexuality after he meets a girl that seems to be man-enough for his sexual druthers; or so s/he seems. Johnny (Jane Birkin) may not have a cock, but she does have a tight pink hole and that proves to be good enough for Krassky's knob, at least for brief period of time. In I Love You, I Don't, Polish Garbage truck driver Krassy and his beau boi Padovan (Hugues Quester) – a hysterical queen who is the absolute female in the relationship – make a pit-stop at a rural French diner where the two meet androgynous Johnny; a boyish-girl that seems intrigued by the mysterious muscular Slav. Johnny is warned by her coarse yet upright boss that the two Poles are bona fide poofers, but that doesn't stop her from hopelessly crushing over the stoic yet swaggering homophile. Despite all the terrible biological odds against them, sassy Krassy and jejune Johnny eventually 'hook-up', but not in the conventional way as the homo Pole is unable to extend his pole when confronted with his lady friend's wet womanhood. Instead, the couple gets entangled in a steamy liaison of debauched scatology which – to her credit – Johnny takes like a the man, even if her cries of extreme discomfort during anal sex stir outrage from various neighbors as neither of the two lovers have enough foresight to utilize the lubricating wonders of spit like the gay cowboys in Ang Lee's Brokeback Mountain (2005). Heartbroken, hysterical, and horny due to his lover's absence, prissy prima donna Padovan tries to find a rebound stud in the form of a well-endowed bestialist (played by Gérard Depardieu in a hilarious yet bewildering cameo role) with a predilection for penetrating horses. Thoroughly dismayed by his failed sexual conquests and totally humiliated by his lover's newly found interest in the much more beautiful, fairer sex, pansified punk Padovan decides to take sadistic and spiteful revenge against Johnny with the most surprising of consequences for all three parties involved. Indeed, there are few, if any, more bizarre love triangles in cinema history than the one featured in I Love You, I Don't; a virtual romantic-comedy for fiendish fetishists, ardent anti-romantics, and depraved homophiles. Needless to say, I Love You, I Don't is not the sort of film one should show to a prospective lover on a first date, unless they happen to be someone like Sasha Grey or Genesis P-orrige.

It should be no surprise that swarthy Serge Gainsbourg was a bit startled by iconic hunk and authentic alpha-male Joe Dallesandro's manly manhandling of his wife as the singer-turned-filmmaker was apparently stricken, "with jealousy during some of ...Jane's sex scenes with Dallesandro" as detailed in Sylvie Simmons' biography Serge Gainsbourg: A Fiistful of Gitanes throughout the production of I Love You, I Don't. Aside from fellow French auteur Joël Séria's dubious uses of his soul-mate Jeanne Goupil in Marie-Poupée (1976) aka Marie, the Doll, I cannot think of another filmmaker who has so scrupulously humiliated and dehumanized his lover for the sake of cinema as Gainsbourg did with Jane Birkin in I Love You, I Don't, and for that alone it makes for an interesting and worthwhile cinematic work, but it is more than just a typically cheap French thrill as the film poses many serious questions; most specifically, compatibility between sexes, especially among those individuals with abnormal sexual tendencies. Although fairly forgotten nowadays due to his contemporarily unpopular ideas regarding the female sex and Judaics, Jewish-Austrian philosopher Otto Weininger proposed in his magnum opus Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character that all humans are more or less 'bisexual' (having elements of both femininity and masculinity) and that prospective lovers are attracted to individuals with complimentary sexual persuasions (e.g. a male that is 70% male/30% female would be best compatible with a woman that is 30% male/70% female), thus making Gainsbourg's experiment in I Love You, I Don't seem relatively reasonable all the more provocative on hindsight, especially when compared to similarly themed works like Chasing Amy and Paul Verhoeven's Basic Instinct (1992). Ultimately, I Love You, I Don't is undoubtedly one of the most serious, valiant, uncompromising and incensing yet titillating looks at transgressive sexuality in cinema history that is bound to affect even the most jaded and perverse of cinephiles; and for that alone, Gainsbourg at least deserves a lengthy footnote in film history. If one can learn anything from I Love You, I Don't, it is that one should never piss of a poof, especially when their manhood comes into question, as few things can compare to the seething wrath of an exceedingly enraged androphile.

I LOVE YOU, I DON'T

-Ty E

CHARLOTTE FOR EVER

Serge Gainsbourg (1986)

To his credit, Viennese Jewish actor and director Fritz Kortner was so angered by Uncle Adolf and his gang making him flee Germany that when he returned to the Fatherland in 1949, he exploited his glaring Jewishness on stage, intentionally acting as an obscenely sinister Shylock in a 1960s production of The Merchant of Venice, even stating of his respect for the fictional anti-Semite-inciting Hebraic Venetian moneylender, “he stands up and he is a terrifying Jew, and that’s why I play him. He does not whine for mercy... I am an untimidated Jew... I have found out that you succeed with this perspective rather than trying to sneak in.” While Kortner’s antics were surely subversive in terms of overtly agitating the very same people that considered him a member of a hostile enemy group only a couple decades before, they pale in comparison to the way degenerate French Judaic singer and songwriter Serge Gainsbourg routinely exploited the more unsavory stereotypes of his seemingly forsaken tribe throughout his entire highly obnoxious and proudly obscene career. Apparently, Gainsbourg was deeply affected as a child by having to see his fellow Jews wear yellow stars as a result of the German occupation of France during the Second World War and his work certainly reflected this as especially demonstrated by his 1975 album Rock Around the Bunker, which is completely dedicated to National Socialist themes and features song titles like “Nazi Rock,” “Yellow Star,” and “S.S. in Uruguay,” yet the singer more oftentimes used more ‘cryptic’ approaches to attacking and morally degrading the ostensibly antisemitic goyim. Certainly, both in physical appearance and behavior, Gainsbourg put the Jewish caricatures featured in Nazi propagandist Julius Streicher’s tabloid newspaper Der Stürmer to abject shame and it is certainly no small coincidence of history that he produced a bastard brood with the grandniece of German Field Marshal Friedrich Paulus of the Battle of Stalingrad, which is oftentimes considered the event that sealed the tragic fate of the Occident.

Indeed, from turning innocent blonde beauty Francis Gall into a sucker by getting her to record the song “Les Lucettes” aka “Lollipops”, which the yé-yé singer thought was about suckers but was really about sucking cock, to recording the French national anthem “La Marseillaise” in a reggae style to infuriate right-wingers and nationalist veterans of the Algerian War of Independence, Gainsbourg thrived on being a culture-distorting kosher creep who deracinated French kultur by Americanizing music and giving it a perversely pornographic tone, but arguably his most radically repugnant publicity stunt was recording an incestuous duet with his then-12-year-old daughter Charlotte Gainsbourg entitled “Lemon Incest” in 1984. Aside from the song evolving into an equally degenerate music video featuring the father and daughter in bed together in their underwear, Gainsbourg also directed a largely forgotten film entitled Charlotte for Ever (1986), which features, among other things, his then underage teenage daughter Charlotte topless, as well as engaged in would-be-lurid lesbo love, which her unhinged incestuous father watches up close in complete amazement. Charlotte for Ever is more or less a pathetically preposterous artsy fartsy chamber piece featuring Hebraic homeboy Gainsbourg as a widowed weirdo writer of the desperate dipsomaniac sort that lurks around his home with a Michael Jackson-esque leather glove and lusts over his daughter and her schoolgirl pals when he is not begging for money and berating his long suffering buddies. Surely seeming like a cheap and tasteless gimmick compared to the singer turned filmmaker's surprisingly decent directorial debut Je t'aime moi non plus (1976) aka I Love You, I Don't starring Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro as a 'bisexual' Polack garbage truck driver and Jane Birkin as a tomboyish waitress with a dyke cut, Charlotte for Ever is ultimately a reminder that the only reason Charlotte Gainsbourg is a screen sex icon is because she is the progeny of a world famous pernicious pervert who taught her at an early age to sexually degrade herself on film and not because she is even remotely attractive, not even as a little Lolita (of course, Gainsbourg makes the carelessly cliched mistake of namedropping Nabokov's obscenely overrated novel).

CHARLOTTE FOR EVER

Stan (Serge Gainsbourg) the swarthy little man is a washed up screenwriter who apparently paid his dues in Hollywood and now spends most of his time getting drunk, lusting over and denigrating his daughter Charlotte (Charlotte Gainsbourg) and feeling up her middle school comrades, talking trash to and scamming money out of his friends, and having sex with morbidly obese prostitutes that would probably suffocate him if they sat on his rather repulsive rat-like face. Ever since he killed his wife in a car wreck where he collided with a large truck, Stan has been immersed in a personal hell that neither whisky nor his daughter's itty bitty preteen titties can save him from, or so it seems. At the beginning of the film, Stan begs his bud Herman (Roland Dubillard) for a $10,000 advance because he is broke even though the screenwriter has already been given an advance and instead of producing a script, he was only able to finish "three lousy pages." When Charlotte gets home from middle school, literally and figuratively dirty old men Stan and Herman take turns hitting on her and she eventually flips out and cries, "I want my mom. I want to see my mom." Naturally, poor Charlotte blames her incestuous pedophile father for her belated mommy's tragic death.

As one can expect from a pretentious screenwriter of the daughter-lusting sort, Stan likes quoting Nabokov's Lolita, which Charlotte has read because she proudly stole a copy of the book from her school library. After Charlotte blames her father for her mother's death, Stan slaps her in the face and then reveals in a melodramatic fashion that he wears a leather glove because, as he states, "I tried to drag mom out of a pile of metal and burned my hand." Of course, the viewer suspects he wears the glove because he is a pretentious prick who wants to give off the image that he is a perverted sadist of the ultra chichi sort. When Charlotte and her nerdy school friend Therese (Sabeline Campo) decide to play bowling in the house by using wine bottles as pins in a game where the loser must show the winner her pussy, Stan gets mad after finding broken glass on the floor and punishes his daughter's friend by making her cleanup and subsequently opening up her shirt and feeling her small breasts. When his daughter's friends are not around to manhandle, Stan has a morbidly obese prostitute who is so fat that she waddles come over so that he can revel in the malodorous pheromones of her smelly rotten lard cunt. Although a predatory heterosexual, Stan is friends with a fat old queen named Leon (Roland Bertin) who is suicidal because his hustler boy toy has broken up with him. Needless to say, when Stan remarks to Leon regarding his boyfriend, "Your Stephen is an asshole...And he doesn't like guys, it's obvious" and "He used his ass to pay the dealer," he has a little queer bitch fit and asks his friend if he has any humanity. After crying about his parents, wife, and dog being dead, Stan the untermensch then cries, "And any day now Charlotte will have a kid or bring a guy home...some worker, black or Asian, it'll be just great," thus revealing that he is against miscegenation, even though his progeny is the product of such an unnatural union. Meanwhile, Charlotte physically assaults and rips off the bra of her friend Adelaide (Anne Le Guernec) because she is jealous her pal has been getting banged by her father. Needless to say, Stan gets a kick out of seeing his daughter on top of a topless young girl that he has been banging and gets closer to the young ladies to get a better look.

Near the end of Charlotte for Ever, Gainsbourg allows his daughter to put a handgun to his head, but unfortunately she does not pull the trigger. Notably, the very end of the film features father and daughter lying in bed together, with the former stating to the latter, "You're a little shit" in a scene that seems to express Gainsbourg's frustration with wanting to defile his daughter but not being able to bring himself to go all the way (although he confesses to groping her breasts while drunk). Indeed, in terms of delighting in defiling innocent little dames of the underage sort, Gainsbourg only transcends fellow Hebraic holocaust survivor Roman Polanski, but unlike the Rosemary's Baby director, the Judaic frog songwriter seems to take great pride in his pathological perversion. Not surprisingly, Charlotte Gainsbourg continued playing in relative-directed incest-themed films as she later starred in her British uncle Andrew Birkin's Ian McEwan adaptation The Cement Garden (1993). Of course, Lars von Trier would later provide Charlotte with the cinematic surrogate father she needed after cinematically exploiting her in works like Antichrist (2009) and Nymphomaniac (2013). Of course, only someone as uniquely unsavory as Serge Gainsbourg could ever think a swarthy sub-homely horse-faced lady like Charlotte would ever make for a stunning sex symbol of the silver screen. Undoubtedly, what makes Charlotte for Ever interesting is that the film demonstrates that the eponymous pseudo-diva has always seemed like a dark, damaged, and depraved gawky gal who probably has the talent to turn rampant heterosexuals into gynophobic queens, but I guess one should not expect anything less from the mongrel progeny of a monster like Monsieur Gainsbourg. Of course, directed by Gainsbourg or not, Charlotte for Ever is unequivocally the sort of preposterously pretentious and pathologically plodding film that gives arthouse films, especially of the French persuasion, a bad name.

CHARLOTTE FOR EVER

-Ty E

THE COLOR OF POMEGRANATES

Sergei Parajanov (1969)

Admittedly, I have next to nil interest in Armenian culture and history, yet after just viewing The Color of Pomegranates (1968) – a strikingly singular ‘Soviet’ avant-garde film of the seemingly inconspicuous ‘high-camp’ persuasion that aggressively, abstractly, and positively poetically depicts the life and poems of Armenian mystical troubadour Sayat-Nova aka “King of Song” (born Harutyun Sayatyan 14 June 1712, Tiflis – died 22 September 1795, Haghpat), a secular Christian known for his romantic expressionism and lyricism who was ordained as a priest in 1759 by the Armenian Apostolic Church and brutally slain in 1795 at a monastery by the invading army of Mohammad Khan Qajar, the Shah of Iran, for stoically refusing to denounce Christianity and convert to Islam – I can honestly say it is one of the most organic depictions of a national kultur ever captured on celluloid, albeit oftentimes hermetically and homoerotically so, so it is all the more ironic that it was created in an anti-nationalist communist dictatorship where “Socialist realism” (slave-morality driven works glorifying the ‘proletariat’) were en vogue and the only style of filmmaking sanctioned by the state. Directed by Sergei Parajanov (Shadows of Forgotten Ancestors, Ashik Kerib) – A Georgian-born bisexual of ‘wise blood’ who originally started as a professional filmmaker of “Socialist realist” works in 1954, but later disowned any work he created before 1964, describing them as simply, “garbage” – The Color of Pomegranates is oftentimes regarded as the filmmaker’s cinematic masterpiece; yet due to its highly cultivated depiction of a national kultur, a romantic viewing of archaic Christianity and an enduring race of an ancient people, the film would inevitably inflame the authoritarian Soviet censor, thus resulting in the film being banned more than one time. Originally titled “Sayat Nova” after the title character, The Color of Pomegranates was assembled by Parajanov under meager conditions with a virtually nonexistent budget in 1968, but was immediately banned for its being perceived as ‘inflammatory,’ so the dedicated director reedited the footage and renamed it under its current title, only for it to be banned again in 1969. The cut of The Color of Pomegranates that exists today – Parajanov’s ‘director’s cut’ – on DVD (via Kino) that was first officially released in 1992 is the banned second cut under the present title. Soviet documentarian/cinematographer Mikhail Vartanov – a personal friend of Parajanov’s who spent his life defending his comrade and who directed the banned documentary The Color of Armenian Land (1969); a now mostly lost work, in part about the making of The Color of Pomegranates, that got the filmmaker on the KGB’s blacklist – would write quite eloquently in 1969 regarding the Armenian arthouse flick, “Besides the film language suggested by Griffith and Eisenstein, the world cinema has not discovered anything revolutionarily new until The Color of Pomegranates ...” Indeed, forget the acid-addled auteur pieces of self-glorifying occultnik and would-be-messiah Alejandro Jodorowsky, persecuted poofster Parajanov is the real deal and he did not have to rape a woman to get that way, or as film critic Alexei Korotyukov wrote, "Paradjanov made films not about how things are, but how they would have been had he been God," whereas Mr. El Topo is merely the false messiah.

THE COLOR OF POMEGRANATES

If any film provides ample evidence that historically, homosexuals get a kick out of subverting the regimes they live under – whether it be of the political right or left, or individualist or collectivist – The Color of Pomegranates, as well as virtually all of Parajanov's cinematic works created after 1964, makes for a potent and poetic yet pleasantly peculiar example. A virtual 'fag fascist' in the eyes of Soviet censors due to his unrepentant ancestor-worship and respect for religion and the perennial nature of certain cultures and customs (despite the materialist communist fallacy that all people are 'malleable' material that can be molded into anything, especially after the eradication of their culture, religion, and castes), and lack of pontificating in regard to the perceived 'nobility' of penniless proletarians, Parajanov probably left his Soviet overlords in a state of complete and utter stupefaction with The Color of Pomegranates; a keenly culturally conscious yet mostly metaphysical celluloid work that is probably the greatest expression of the Armenian (or any other racial/ethnic/cultural group) collective unconscious ever cinematically concocted, despite the fact the director once admitted in a speech in Minsk that he doubted the contemporary Armenian public would understand it, but that they, "are going to this picture as to a holiday." Indeed, an opiate-like celluloid oneiric of the sometimes vaguely ominous but always otherworldly and aesthetically rapturous, The Color of Pomegranates is a rare piece of cinematic art where none of the meticulously (yet rather unnoticeably minimalist) tableaux go to waste in a work that follows Sayat-Nova aka King of Song as he comes-of-age, discovers and falls in love with the female form, falls in love with a woman, and enters a monastery for what will be eternity after dying in an 'anti-biopic' of a person, as well as a people, told through aesthetic-driven esoteric rituals, glances, gestures, and pure poetry. Starring Paradjanov's very versatile muse Sofiko Chiaureli in no less than six of the roles, both male and female, including Sayat Nova as a youth, the poet's lover, muse, and mime, as well as the 'Angel of Resurrection,' The Color of Pomegranates is a work featuring archetypes as 'characters' and in which the 'color of pomegranates' is symbolic of blood (which is featured in the film quite prominently) – the innate and perennial soul of people and a people's memories – a color that 'Red' communists ironically wear as their official uniform, but for which they know nothing. As film critic Frank Williams wrote in the book World Film Directors Volume 2: 1945-1985 (1988), Paradjanov celebrates the survival of the Armenian people under relentless and unwavering waves of oppression (with the Armenian Genocide of 1915–1916 being relatively recent), writing, "There are specific images that are highly charged — blood-red juice spilling from a cut pomegranate into a cloth and forming a stain in the shape of the boundaries of the ancient Kingdom of Armenia; dyers lifting hanks of wool out of vats in the colours of the national flag, and so on.”

Ironically, while the Soviet Union – a real-life dystopia rooted in class warfare and genocide that no one will miss – is gone, Sergei Parajanov’s films, like the culture he depicts in The Color of Pomegranates, will live on, if only cinematically so, which is good enough for me. Apparently, a longer cut of the film exists somewhere in the vaults of Armenfilm (an Armenian film studio in Yerevan), so until it is unearthed (if it is ever unearthed), the current cut of The Color of Pomegranates will work just fine as one of the most idiosyncratic works of cinema history that redefined film as an artistic medium and what it is capable of. Arrested in 1973 on dubious charges of rape, homosexuality and bribery for which he served 4 years of a 5 year sentence, and again in 1982 for bribery for which he spent less than a year in jail, Parajanov finally was able to direct two more cinematic masterpieces – The Legend of the Suram Fortress (1984) and Ashik Kerib (1988) before his death from lung cancer in his homeland of Armenia on July 20, 1990 at age 66, thus leaving behind the uncompleted film The Confession. With such prestigious filmmakers like François Truffaut, Luis Buñuel, Federico Fellini, Michelangelo Antonioni, and Andrei Tarkovsky (who was a personal friend) coming to his aid during times of persecution and influencing modern ‘arthouse’ auteur filmmakers like Theo Angelopoulos, Béla Tarr and Mohsen Makhmalbaf, Parajanov will certainly be one of the least forgotten ancestors of his people as not only the greatest Armenian filmmaker to live (sorry Atom Egoyan!), but also one of the greatest cine-magicians to have ever lived, with The Color of Pomegranates being his finest performance. As the Armenian equivalent of German auteuress’ Ulrike Ottinger’s kraut-dyke-freak masterpiece Freak Orlando (1981) – a work of hermetic tableaux where the lead actress plays at least five different characters – except featuring the obsessive attention to aesthetic details and archetypal religious symbols of Kenneth Anger’s Crowleyite masterwork Lucifer Rising (1972), The Color of Pomegranates is a rare cinematic work that reminds one that ancient alien cultures, including archaic Christian ones, can be aesthetically and sexually subversive, with auteur Sergei Parajanov himself being the modern-day Sayat Nova; a romantic Georgian-Armenian poet and mystic plagued by Soviet savagery (as opposed to the Islamic sort faced by his predecessor) who managed to create rather refined and transcendental pulchritude in a completely compromised climate of aesthetic banality and barbarism.

-Ty E

ASHIK KERIB
ASHIK KERIB

Sergei Parajanov (1988)

Ashik Kerib is an aesthetically wonderful and pleasurable film directed by Russian Soviet auteur Sergei Paradjanov. The film is based on a 19th romantic tale of the same name which was inspired by Turkish and Caucasian folklore. Director Paradjanov turned the tale into a wonderful art piece of luscious colors of a forgotten culture. The film also features a dark yet soothing combination of traditional and contemporary Russian music forms. Unlike most films dealing with history, Ashik Kerib merely focuses on the aesthetic elements of the past allowing for the visual power of a culture to speak for itself. The protagonist Ashik Kerib is denied his true love when his lover's father rejects him due to his humble proletarian background. Due to his failure in love, Kerib is forced to roam the land aimlessly for 1,001 nights. After this happens, I got lost in the aesthetic devices employed by the unconventional director. Paradjanov uses images of early Russian artwork and strategically choreographed scenes to capture a mystical world of captivating art. Sergei Paradjanov seems to be influenced by the surrealist works of Federico Fellini. Parajanov also claimed to be inspired by the works of Pier Paolo Pasolini and fellow soviet Andrei Tarkovsky. All of these influences are apparent as Parajdanov was a director that focused on visual expressionism as opposed to story and dialogue driven plots. Few directors (especially after the silent era) have had the courage to emphasize film as a strictly visual art (at least in an artistic way). Director Sergei Paradjanov decided to end Ashik Kerib with a tribute to the memory of master director Andrei Tarkovsky and his cinematic legacy. Paradjanov experienced a variety of film production setbacks before directing Ashik Kerib. In 1973, the director was arrested on rape, homosexuality, and bribery charges. Ashik Kerib was the last finished film from the controversial director (his final film The Confession went unfinished). Gay subversives have always made some of the best and most innovative film directors. F.W. Murnau, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Kenneth Anger, John Waters, and Sergei Parajanov are just a few homosexual directors to spark collective outcry and public hatred. Gay has recently been mainstreamed with films like Brokeback Mountain, I Now Pronounce You Chuck and Larry, and Boys Don't Cry (transgendered people are gay too despite what some wiseass cultural Marxist has to say about it). May Sergei Paradjanov's cinematic legacy be better documented in the books of cinema history.

-Ty E

ONE WOMAN'S LOVER

Sergio Bazzini (1974)

Only a film directed by an innately iconoclastic Italian auteur could manage to include such a cinematically chaotic combination of lapsed Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro (Flesh for Frankenstein, Black Moon), slightly chubby French art-house diva Andréa Ferréol (Fassbinder's Despair, The Tin Drum), a sadiistically sardonic satire of both communist and fascist extremism, and a curious cocktail of politically incorrect humor, including obese Italian men with Down syndrome studying pornography and the needlessly nonsensical bodily dismemberment of cute bunny rabbits, along with unhealthy sexual perversion, including obese blue-blood fascists and proletarian housewives screwing young hunk terrorists, as such is the case with the unfortunately barely ever acknowledged and long forgotten Italian-French-West German co-production Donna è bello (1974) AKA One Woman's Lover AKA Woman and Lover. While I could only manage to track down the heavily edited British release (although I managed to view the cut scenes in the official Italian VHS release of the film) of One Woman's Lover, the film left me laughing hysterically at, among other things, a rather rotund aristocrat with a flatulence problem, a mentally retarded man of the odiously overweight variety who has a rather hard time telling the difference between a penis and a vagina, a woman whose first encounter with her future lover involves said woman unwittingly urinating on his face, a fascist terrorist sexually defiling a Marxist MILF housewife, and much more. Created around the middle of the so-called 'Years of Lead' (which name may have been inspired by the film Marianne and Juliane (1981) by Margarethe von Trotta, of which the Italian title is Anni di piombo aka 'Years of Lead') in Italy when both fascists and communists were trying to take over the government via terrorism and which ultimately led to almost 2,000 deaths between 1969 and 1981 as a result of assorted bombings, assassinations, and street warfare between rival militant factions from all political persuasions (anarchists/nihilists included!), One Woman's Lover is a rare sort of anti-fascist/anti-communist farce of the flagrantly fucked sort that, although leaning more to the left, is mostly a nefariously nihilistic radical celluloid romp that gives a greatly grim prediction of Italy's future where virtually every single male character is left dead, including the female protagonist's great love. Like The Climber (1975) aka L'ambizioso, La Marge (1976) aka The Streetwalker, and Born Winner (1976) aka L'ultima volta, One Woman's Lover is one of the many rare and criminally forgotten Joe Dallesandro European era flicks that has fallen in the celluloid garbage heap of history that, in terms of acting talent, proved the Warhol Superstar was capable of more than simply laying around naked with a flaccid member in a drug-addled stupor as he mostly did in the "Paul Morrissey Trilogy" (Flesh, Trash, Heat). Sort of like the younger and more sensitive brother of the psychopathic killer he played in Fernando Di Leo's exploitation-thriller Madness (1980) aka Vacanze per un massacre, Dallesandro demonstrates in One Woman's Lover that mass-murdering right-wing terrorists can have style and sex appeal long before Anders Behring Breivik made media headlines.

ONE WOMAN'S LOVER

Poor proletarian servant Ottavia (Andréa Ferréol) leads a rather banal and exceedingly uneventful life as a sexually repressed married woman with a cold and committed communist husband who cares more about realizing the revolutionary doctrines of Lenin (whose portrait symbolically hangs in their bedroom) than making love to his erotically-deprived wife, on top of having to take care of her morbidly obese and porn-addicted retarded adult son named Pierre with a drastically debilitating case of Down syndrome who she spends much of her free time taking care of. On top of that, Ottavia is the servant of a beyond chunky and exceedingly effeminate Count who is the father of a perverted preteen boy who gives pornography to the sad servant's mentally retarded son and attempts to bribe her into showing off her naughty bits in return for an elegant pair of high heels (where this young man got these shoes or knew the woman's size is anyone's guess). On one beautiful and sunny day while in a discernibly depressed mood, Ottavia decides to discretely urinate on some hay inside a barn, unwittingly drenching a right-wing terrorist bomber named Walter (Joe Dallesandro), who is hiding from the law after his latest terrorist attack. Both sexually repressed and markedly miserable, Ottavia decides to give sexy stranger Walter, who is, tired, sick and hungry, shelter at her dilapidated home. Hoping to impress Walter, Ottavia decides to flash her puss to her boss' little boy so as to acquire the sparkling high heels the boy had previously offered, but the seemingly impenetrable terrorist does not even notice, so she let's him know that he must leave the next day. After thinking to himself "bitch kicks me out...and I'm fucked," Walter decides to fondle Ottavia's genitals from behind, thus ushering in their unhinged romantic relationship. A lovelorn man who has never gotten over the fact that his 57-year-old 'great love' committed suicide after swallowing sleeping pills and laying down on a train track (her head was apparently never found), Walter seems rather disinterested in love, but at least he knows how to give Ottavia a wild and wanton time like she has never felt before.

Eventually, Walter reveals to Ottavia, whose husband is a commie away participating in political activism in Russia, that he is a neo-fascist terrorist by blowing up a little bunny after attaching it to a tractor battery. Of course, Walter's career path does not sit well with Ottavia, especially after seeing an ostensible victim of a terrorist bombing hanging out at a hair salon with no legs, but she is hopelessly in love with the terrorist and she sticks by him. Unfortunately, Ottavia's retarded son attempts to kill Walter, symbolically using a hammer and sickle (☒), which foreshadows the two lovers' tragic fate. Walter works for Ottavia's blueblood boss and wants out of the terrorism business, telling his homo Hitlerite employer over the phone that, "I'm tired of placing bombs for $150 a month. What do I give a damn about fascism in Italy. Nothing,” and demanding that he pay him 50 million lire or he will go to the police about the rich fascists’ funding of the bombings and conspiracy to throw over the Italian government. Unfortunately, Walter does not realize that the fascist Count’s henchmen are standing right behind him during the phone call and hear everything. Naturally, Walter is bound and covered in explosives by his ex-comrades, but rather absurdly, it is Ottavia who accidentally detonates the bomb. When Ottavia’s husband finally gets him, he brings his Russian Marxist friend and she decides to poison the two after realizing their political activity is no different from Walter’s, especially after her hubby absurdly states regarding the family rooster, “Hey, he’s one of a kind. The only one...Like our party. The only one that makes revolutions,” thus demonstrating the man’s mundane one-track Marxist mind and his incapacity for seeing blatant parallels between his own political persuasion and that of neo-fascists. Of course, in terms of using terrorist tactics that have resulted in the deaths of thousands of people in Italy and expounding an intrinsically idealistic collectivist philosophy, the Italian commies and fascists are one in the same, albeit the retarded Reds (indeed, it is no coincidence that Ottavia’s son Pierre is retarded) believe they are somehow morally superior and ultra-modern in their tinkering. Ottavia also pays a visit to her glutton of a boss, who mocks her retard son’s Pierre’s death by joking, “Come on...you can have another child..with a nigger! Ha Ha Ha!” and who proudly proclaims regarding his relationship with Walter, “Did he also tell you that I was partial to that cute little ass of his my dear...lovely isn’t it?!” Of course, Ottavia poisons the fat, fat cat fascist as well by putting something less than kosher in his tea, but not before passionately calling him a “murdering fascist pig.” In the end, Ottavia, who has been totally transformed by the events and seems totally emotionally impenetrable, leaves her home and travels to the city assumedly to start a new life without a militant man. Like the female protagonist played by Hanna Schygulla in Marco Ferreri’s The Future Is Woman (1984) aka Il futuro è donna, the violent anachronism of Marxist politics and politically-obsessed self-destructive men has turned Ottavia into a postmodern woman and a ‘metaphysical feminist’ by default.

An acutely anarchic attack on both the militant left and right that takes no prisoners, One Woman’s Lover belongs in the company of incendiary and iconoclastic Italian cinema of the 1970s like the films of Alberto Cavallone (Blue Movie, Zelda) and Salvatore Samperi (Mother’s Heart aka Cuore di mamma, Ernesto) by combining seedy sex, sickening social aberration, and a pre-apocalyptic atmosphere that reflected the fragile and dubious future of Italy during the ‘Years of Lead’ (late 1960s – early 1980s). Of course, what makes One Woman’s Lover stick out alongside Cavallone and Samperi’s films is the inclusion of Joe Dallsandro, as well as the use of ‘stupidly’ scatological material, thus it a work that is quite accessible to the layman filmgoer. While One Woman’s Lover is worthy seeing simply to see Little Joe portray a jaded neo-fascist mass murderer with a super sensual side, the film also makes for one of the most charmingly trashy absurdist political allegories to have ever been distinctively defecated out by the Italian film industry. As a depiction of a woman whose son is impotent and retarded, whose Count boss is a wealthy (sexual) exploiter, whose husband is a cold and patronizing communist pig, and whose 'great love' is a murderous neo-fascist, One Woman's Lover—a work certainly following in the Marco Ferreri's "Cinema of the Absurd" school of supremely scathing and scatological satire à la La Grande Bouffe (1973) aka The Grande Bouffe—manages to depict through a rather risqué rural microcosm the capitulation of a country via very real political absurdity of the terrorist sort. Notably, Dallesandro's right-wing character is resentful of an elder lover from his past who taught him everything he knew about sex and life, which is undoubtedly a reference to Russian-Jewish-Italian communist activist Angelica Balabanoff, who was the older lover/teacher of Benito Mussolini before his socialist pre-fascist days and rise to power, thus making One Woman's Lover a rare work in that it dares to quasi-esoterically expose the common link/root between communism and fascism. While the marvelously mundane TV miniseries Benito (1993) aka Il Giovane Mussolini starring Antonio Banderas, which depicts the affair between Mussolini and Balabanoff, also exposes the mutual root of the radical left and right, I personally prefer Little Joe and raunchy retard and fart jokes of the sardonic scat sort when it comes to learning history via celluloid, which One Woman's Lover certainly accomplishes.

ONE WOMAN'S LOVER

-Ty E

IN THE FOLDS OF THE FLESH

Sergio Bergonzelli (1970)

Based around a Freud excerpt of his interpretation of flesh (brain flesh), In the Folds of the Flesh is a proclaimed "gialli" exploitation film. When not focusing on a mother/whore dichotomy, this film manages to top any impulsive genre organizing you may have had. Any dysfunction that you thought was absurd or any mind game that was too taboo is broken in this onslaught of emotional pain. In the Folds of the Flesh is truly a film that captures the essence of physical beauty only to distort it with malignant madness. On the sunny beach side of an old Castle structured building, horrific events unfold that I couldn't dare begin to try explaining without ruining the plot completely. A very disturbed family lures men into their home in order to kill them inexplicably to prevent a truth to be known. In this spider webbed plot you will encounter pet vultures, early 70s psychedelics, and enough perversions to leave a lasting imprint on you. Pier Angeli was the true shining ray of this film. A film of classic sleaze needed that Polaris to its empty sky. Angeli had dated James Dean during the filming of East of Eden. They reportedly broke up after complications with her parents. A year after her role in Nelle pieghe della carne (In the Folds of the Flesh), she died of a barbiturate overdose. Explosive controversy ensued over whether it was accidental or not. The National Enquirer supposedly posted lines from her alleged suicide note but it appears to be just sensationalism. It's a shame that a star of such beauty fell victim to pulling a Heath Ledger. In spite of the departed star, much of my dislike comes from the Nazi exploitation used in this film. Random plot points are set up intended to shock and offend. A character has reoccurring flashbacks of a Nazi death camp flashback in which many naked women are gassed to death including her mother. While not meant to be titillatingly, I couldn't help but laugh at the "Jewish" victims jumping around with their breasts jumping every which way. Not only a mood killer, but arousing in a perplexing sense. In the Folds of the Flesh is a film that starts out rough but smooths itself out by the end. In media res is how it begins, so the confusion is necessary for the spool to unwind, so to speak. While not being a masterpiece, In the Folds of the Flesh satisfies me in many ways - materialistic and not. A must-see for any fan of bizarre head-trips and Pier Angeli admirers.

-mAQ

PLAGIO

PLAGIO

Sergio Capogna (1969)

Long before dirty commie dago Bernardo Bertolucci (Last Tango in Paris, Last Emperor) demonstrated with The Dreamers (2003) that he has a fixation with Michael Pitt's pecker and has yet to get over his fetishism for the 1968 student movement, a fellow forgotten Guido auteur named Sergio Capogna (The Consequences aka Le conseguenze, Diary of an Italian aka Diario di un italiano) directed a somewhat unique and captivating, if not somewhat stereotypically histrionically acted, movie, Plagio (1969), about a melancholy and forlorn bizarre love triangle turned ménage à trios starring blond Anglo-Guido stud Ray Lovelock (Let Sleeping Corpses Lie, Live Like a Cop, Die Like a Man) as a strange rich 'student protester' who finds himself infatuated with a young couple and begins a tragic threesome that ultimately leaves all three of them broken, albeit in considerably different ways. Unlike other Italian films made in the spirit of 1968 like Bernardo Bertolucci's Partner (1968), Lilians Cavani's The Year of the Cannibals (1970) aka I cannibali, and Lucio Marcaccini's Hallucination Strip (1975) aka Roma drogata: la polizia non può intervenire, Capogna's unjustly forgotten work, not unlike maestro Luchino Visconti's Conversation Piece (1974) aka Gruppo di famiglia in un interno, has aged relatively gracefully over the nearly half a century since its initial release, which largely has to do with the fact that it is not an avant-garde agitprop piece but a mid-high drama that merely uses the far-left student protests as a backdrop for an undeniably unforgettable darkly tragic romance about an unloved and somewhat unhinged rich boy who develops a rather dangerous admiration for his two new friends' love for one another. In fact, in its depiction of a semi-deranged young man whose mental illness is, at least partially, the fault of his belated 'modern' feminist mother, Capogna's film would probably be considered 'counter-revolutionary' by certain less sophisticated viewers. Although completely unknown in the United States and hardly a success in its native Italy, Plagio was such a huge hit in Japan that star Ray Lovelock, whose performance is nothing short of hauntingly penetrating, became a teen icon among horny Jap teens and even had a fan club dedicated to him. Ultimately, Plagio is a sort of shockingly entertaining proto-Emo-fag melodrama of the vaguely bisexual sort where the two boys are 'prettier' than the girl and sleazy drama is more satisfying than sex. Featuring a soundtrack including Symphony No. 5 by Gustav Mahler, a hit single by Peppino Gagliardi, and songs by surprisingly unknown Guido rocker Johnny Davil (whose songs "Morning" and "I've Lost You" are just as important ingredients to the film as Ennio Morricone's were to Cavani's The Year of the Cannibals), Plagio is a distinctly aesthetically pleasing work with a highly complementary soundtrack that paints the pleasantly melancholy portrait of a decadent generation that thought "free love" was free, not realizing bizarre triangles are called 'bizarre love triangles' for reason.

Plagio opens in fall with a somber young lady named Angela (played by Mita Medici, who later became a popular Italian TV host) walking down a park path and saying to herself: "Already a pale sun warms this morning. Soon leaves will cover the branches of these dry trees. But none of this...will help us to forget the bad things...that against our will we were forced to live through...and for which we were not responsible. Of course, our poor dramas have no use but it is our awareness that helps us...that gives us the strength to fight...to continue. And even your memory will help me...because nothing is more pure in this world...than the love of a child." The "child" Angela speaks of is a tragic young man named 'Guido' (played by Ray Lovelock in a standout role where he bears a striking resemblance to Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro) who she and her boyfriend Massimo (played by French actor Alain Noury, who is probably best known for his roles in Alfred Vohrer's post-Edgar Wallace works and Just Jaeckin's 1975 The Story of O adaptation starring Udo Kier)—a sort of Mediterranean post-black-male Michael Jackson look-alike—will get to know very well after the two befriend and eventually fall in love with the young man. Flashback a couple months and Massimo, who is driving in a car with Angela that was borrowed from his friend Roberto, saves a young protestor who is getting beaten by three fascist MSI members. The young protestor is a Nordic-like goombah Guido and despite the fact that Massimo and Angela have helped save his life, he ends up stealing the car that they borrowed from Roberto (Dino Mele). Roberto's father sues Massimo, but luckily Guido shows up out of the blue with a brand new car to give to Roberto. Indeed, Guido is the heir to a paper mill dynasty and he is quite generous when it comes to money, even buying his new friends Massimo and Angela an apartment to stay at when they are in Bologna (they two are originally from Rimini and Massimo travels there quite often). Guido is a somewhat perturbed young man who seems consumed with the memory of his deceased parents. While describing his belated father as a "good guy," Guido is less generous towards his mommy, stating that she was, "young, modern, open-minded...Hardly a mother at all, in fact. She was madly in love with her husband." Like many gay men, Guido seems to suffer from an inverse Oedipal complex which has damaged his ability to start and maintain friendships and romantic relationships, but with Massimo and Angela he seems to have found the best of both worlds, or so he initially believes.

Ultimately, Guido seems to see Massimo and Angela as sort of surrogate parents whose love for one another he deeply admires to disturbing degrees to the point where he actively attempts to become a part of it. After failing to be aroused by a prostitute named Edera (Cosetta Greco) that Massimo is a friend/patron of, virgin Guido decides to seduce Angela when her boyfriend is away in Rimini studying for an exam. When Angela learns that Guido is a virgin, she is the one that ends up doing the seducing. While she enjoys having sex with Guido, she also confesses to him, "I don't understand why I can't love you and want him. Because I love him as before, even more. Is that wrong?," hence why she never even considers breaking up with her boyfriend. Ultimately, Guido plots to have Massimo walk in on him and Angela together in bed, as he wants them to form a ménage à trios, but knows that his friend is far too 'bourgeois' to accept such a thing were he to ask him about it. Of course, Massimo freaks out and runs away upon seeing his best friend and girlfriend in bed together. While Guido attempts to convince his hurt friend that the three can live together as a threesome, Massimo agrees that he is a "banal bourgeois" who cannot stomach such things and decides to take the next train back to Rimini.

PLAGIO

After talking to his prostitute friend Edera and having some time to cool down, Massimo eventually agrees to join Angela and Guido at the latter's luxurious country villa where the three ultimately consummate a threesome. While Massimo basks in the majesty of the large villa, Guido tells him he is "naïve" because he had such an unhappy childhood that no amount of comforts or riches could make up for. Guido also reveals to both Massimo and Angela hints that he killed both of his parents, as they died in a car accident as a result of a busted tire, even though the tires were brand new (in an earlier part of the film, Guido pops one of his own tires). Guido is still resentful about his parents, stating of them, "I told you, they loved each other. I always came second. And they managed to die together. They even excluded me from that." Of course, Guido will die alone. Indeed, after engaging in a passionate threesome with his two friends, Guido wakes up and tries to sneak out of the villa, but Massimo catches him and asks him what he is doing. Guido claims that he is going to buy cigarettes even though the store is not open and when Massimo asks if he can join him, he says no. Ultimately, like his parents, Guido dies in a dubious car accident, albeit alone. After Guido's funeral, Massimo cuts off all contact with Angela. When Massimo finally attempts to talk to Angela, she infuriates her (ex)boyfriend by insinuating that Guido committed suicide due to his gay love for him. After revealing his love for both her and Guido, Massimo states of the latter that he was, "perhaps, better than me. He was like you." In the end, Plagio concludes with Massimo shedding a tear for Guido as Angela walks away all by her lonesome.

Unlike a lot of the largely trashy exploitation films that he later starred in, Plagio was a sort of 'labor of love' for star Ray Lovelock, who later stated of the film that it, "really was a very special film: in fact I almost regret having made it so early in my career, perhaps I was a bit too immature for the character, which really was a great creation. Maybe if I'd had a bit more experience I would have been better equipped to do it justice." Of course, Lovelock is selling himself short, as his performance in the film is arguably the best of his career and certainly one of the strongest attributes of the film, though auteur Sergio Capogna's direction is also nothing less than striking and certainly better than the famous Italian auteur filmmakers from the same era like Bertolucci and Cavani. In fact,

Lovelock credits the director's passion for the film's aesthetic majesty, stating, "I was completely guided by the director, Sergio Capogna, who had also written the story. At a certain point, the money ran out and most of the crew left rather than work for nothing. Only 12 of us stayed on so for a week we made the film 'on the road' with just the director, the cameraman and the actors. I even had to operate the clapperboard!" Despite its sometimes histrionic overacting, Plagio is certainly a lost classic of Italian cinema that is dying to obtain cult status. While researching the film online, the only thing I could find were Japanese fan sites. Considering the strangely 'immaculate' and almost plastic-like beauty of the leads to the point where they somewhat resemble anime characters, I can see why Japs would swoon over such a film. Like a bisexual Guido Jules and Jim (1962) from the counter-culture generation, Plagio, unlike old perv Bertolucci's botched jerk-off piece The Dreamers, almost makes the rather repugnant zeitgeist that it depicts seem almost exciting and romantic, which is certainly not something I can say of many films. Arguably a so-called 'counter-revolutionary' work where the two most 'sexually liberated' characters, Guido and Angela, are depicted as coming from broken homes (whereas "banal bourgeois" Massimo comes from a highly supportive family and only becomes a mental mess after being coerced into taking part in a ménage à trios), Capogna's startlingly overlooked film more or less depicts the protests of 1968 as being a latent reaction to poor parenting and lack of familial cohesion, which only makes sense considering the fascists love of the Father(land). If one thing is for sure, it is that the student revolutionaries of '68, who are now members and leaders of the very 'system' that they once rivaled against, have turned the Occident into a degenerate dystopia plagued by broken families, gender disharmony, nihilistic sexual perversions, multicultural chaos, childless female careerists, authoritarian political correctness, cultural vacancy, and a dying indigenous population that is being replaced with largely hostile aliens from the third world. With that in mind, Plagio absurdly seems like a sentimental depiction of the good old days.

-Ty E

OSTIA
OSTIA

Sergio Citti (1970)

Throughout film history, there has been a number of films that people have wondered and speculated who was the real 'auteur' behind the film, especially in the case of works produced and/or written by a master filmmaker for his young protégé or assistant, including the popular and/or artistically merited cinematic works The Thing from Another World (1951) aka The Thing directed by Christian Nyby and produced by Howard Hawks, Lonesome Cowboys (1968) directed by Andy Warhol and written and produced by Paul Morrissey (the factory filmmaker is a rare case where the so-called 'master' took credit for the work of his supposed 'pupil'), The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe directed by Ulli Lommel and produced by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, and Poltergeist (1982) directed by Tobe Hooper and The Goonies (1985) directed by Richard Donner; both of which were produced by Steven Spielberg (the former film was also co-written by Mr. Holocaust). Out of all the presumably 'ghost-directed' films that I know of, Pier Paolo Pasolini presents Ostia (1970) directed and co-written by Sergio Citti and produced and co-written by P.P. Pasolini – a curiously comedic yet exceedingly eerie and ghostly work when examined from a historical perspective – is one of the most interesting examples of the maestro presumably acting as the master over his young apprentice's first feature-length film. Of course, it would be nothing short of a boldfaced lie to not mention Sergio Citti's early influence on the great poet, filmmaker, philosopher, linguist, and all-around Renaissance man Pier Paolo Pasolini, as the young pupil was described by his talented teacher as a "lexicon of the Roman dialect" due to his contribution to dialogue and screenplay collaboration in important works like Accattone (1961), Mamma Roma (1962), The Grim Reaper (1962) aka La commare secca directed by Bernardo Bertolucci (this was the filmmaker's directorial debut but it was ultimately penned by Pasolini and Citti), and Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975). After completing Ostia, Citti directed one more film of his own – the castration-anxiety-driven comedy and excursion in eunuch entertainment Bawdy Tales (1973) aka Storie scellerate – in the early 1970s, and eight more after Pasolini's death in 1975, but the director's first flick would ultimately be one of his most personal, especially for his master whose forlorn fate uncannily paralleled that of one of the main characters in the film.

Considering he and his younger brother Franco (who was an actor that was also schooled by Pasolini and would go on to star in over 40 films, including as one of the leads in Ostia) grew up in the squalid and slimy sub-proletariat slums of Rome, Sergio Citti made for an apt teacher in street smarts to the effete Marxist intellectual Pier Paolo Pasolini; a motivated man who was by no means the typical armchair leftist revolutionary whose only interaction with the workers of the world was when they mowed his lawn or cooked his brunch. Of course, the relation, which sprouted in the early 1950s when Pasolini was already a published poet, was mutually beneficial as Citti once matter-of-factly remarked, "If I hadn't met Pier Paolo, I'd have probably ended up as a delinquent," so it was only natural that the novice filmmaker's first film would be about the gutter-level unlawful antics of plebian hooligans – a duo of criminally-inclined anarchist marauder brothers to be exact. Centering around biologically bonded blood bros Rabbino (Franco Citti) and Bandiera (Laurent Terzieff) – not unlike the films of Pasolini – features themes of oedipal obsession, ghetto sexual and social debauchery, loving and loathing of all-things-Catholic, a dichotomy of the mother and the whore (mother Mary and Mary Magdalene), ferocious family feuds, and – of course – suitably saccharine and sweet moments of love and solidarity. Originally intending to direct it himself, Pasolini handed over Ostia to Citti to direct as he was working on Medea (1969) – an adaptation of the classic Euripides play of the same name starring the renowned Greek-American soprano opera singer Maria Callas that was the final entry of the director's "Mythical Cycle" (proceeding Oedipus Rex, Teorema and Pigpen) – yet the film bears all the trademarks of a work by the ill-fated filmmaker who once stated: "The mark which has dominated all my work is the longing for life, this sense of exclusion, which doesn't lessen, but augments this love of life."

The anarchist brothers Rabbino (Citti) and Bandiera (Terzieff) have been close since birth, but especially so after mutually killing their father while still grade school students by pushing him out of a window for slaughtering and eating their beloved pet ewe, so close that there seems to be a perverse sexual component to the relation, thereupon making Ostia all the more of an intimately 'incestuous' work considering that real-life brothers Sergio and Franco Citti worked closely on the film together as actor (Franco) and director (Sergio). Although sibling-sibling incest is often regarded as the most common form of intra-familial abuse, it has rarely been the subject of films before the 1970s with the couple exceptions being Sweet Smell of Success (1957), Bunny Lake is Missing (1965), and Anne of the Thousand Days (1969), thus making Ostia a very 'special' and 'singular' film in that regard, especially considering it is of the homosexual brothers sort, but the topic is only subtly portrayed and more implied in Citti's film, most notably when one of bros mentions how the two kin kissed, "like two lovers in a trench" as their matching underwear hangs side-by-side on a clothesline in the near distance of their shared jail cell. The devastating downfalls of the brothers does not occur as a result of their pathological petty criminality (stealing and lying) but because of a bitchy blonde bombshell named Monica (Anita Sanders) who was herself the victim of a number of unreported sex crimes, thereupon morphing her into a horny harpy of sorts with predilection for easy prey: the sexually-confused anarchist brother. After their mentally feeble friend finds Monica – whose own father had just raped her after becoming sexually aroused after passively witnessing an Italian soldier molest her – the two brothers bring the seemingly catatonic woman to their home and allow their friends to sexually ravage her while they remain rather dubiously sexually restrained downstairs. Although not fornicating with her themselves, the brothers and Monica eventually begin a platonic ménage à trios that climaxes calamitously on the beach of Ostia, inevitably leaving one of the brothers dead in a manner strikingly similar in setting and brutality to the real-life murder of Pasolini only five years later and tearing apart the tragic threesome irrevocably and breaking away the brother's beautiful bond for eternity, which is undoubtedly a trademark strategy of the devil himself.

OSTIA

One of the more interesting and superlatively autobiographical elements of Ostia is that of the ferocious femme fatale and her fatalistic encounter with the brothers. Throughout the film – not unlike Federico Fellini's segment "Toby Dammit" from Histoires extraordinaires (1968) aka Spirits of the Dead – the archetypal blonde beauty is portrayed as a bloodsucking succubus and a disciple of Satan, first in a painting of an alluring fair-haired, bare-skinned lady riding a winged devil, and later with Monica standing unclad on the beach smirking smugly in front of flames as if she is a loyal servant in Hades. Somewhat strangely and fortuitously, the Citti brothers would eventually marry blonde Swedish women, both of whom were coincidentally named Anita, and whose marriages would end disastrously with both ladies moving back to their Nordic homeland. Of course, the most engrossing and stranger-than-fiction foreboding premonition featured in Ostia is the death of one of the leads on the beach via brutal beating. Since Pasolini himself was the one to pen the script for the film, this foretelling scenario of sadistic savagery on the beach of Ostia all the more muddles the waters. While many film critics and Pasolini have recognized that the director's final work Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) gives some evidence that the renegade Renaissance man could foretell his forsaken future, Citti's Ostia features an almost literal presentiment of the poet's death. In May 2005, when Sergio Citti – who was now confined to a wheelchair and hard of hearing – learned that the young male prostitute, Pino Pelosi, who was convicted of murdering his friend and teacher Pier Paolo Pasolini, recanted his original testimony and admitted that he was not the only man on the beaches of Ostia that night over 30 years ago, he was naturally infuriated and one can only assume the film Ostia immediately came to mind. As the only authorized and authentic auteur to Pasolini's ultra-realist, proletarian-promoting film aesthetic, Citti was indubitably followed by a friendly ghost throughout his life which assuredly reached its peak when recollecting on his directorial debut Ostia. Despite its afflicting content and all the more dispiriting climax, Ostia does conclude on a positive and even uplifting note that is both celestial and deific, where the sun beams through the clouds as if heaven is opening its gates for the belated brother. Although his closest friend and blood brother is dead, the remaining brother is free to live his life as an individual of freewill who has to make decisions on his own, just as the director of Ostia would after Pasolini's death in 1975, which eventually led him to working with such big names and respected actors as Jodie Foster, Malcolm McDowell, Vittorio Gassman, Philippe Noiret and Harvey Keitel, which is not bad for a poverty-stricken peasant. Although barely known and rarely seen, Ostia – a minimalistic tragicomic Italian 'neo-neo-realist' minor masterpiece – is indubitably one of the most curious filmic chapters in the lives of both Pasolini and Citti. At worst, Ostia will have you begging for the answer for the perennially unanswered questions: who killed Pasolini?!

-Ty E

CASOTTO
CASOTTO

Sergio Citti (1977)

Aside from the fact that they are both abersexuals, one would assume that there were no real connections between Italian poet/auteur Pier Paolo Pasolini (Accattone, Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom) and mainstream Hollywood Academy Award winning actress Jodie Foster (The Silence of the Lambs, Panic Room), yet they have one notably secondary link in the form of the fairly underrated and unique Italian (anti)sex comedy Casotto (1977) aka Beach House aka The Beach Hut aka In the Beach House. Indeed, the film stars an almost amorous, teenage pre-dyke Foster and on top of being directed by Pasolini's only true cinematic protégé and heir Sergio Citti (Il minestrone, Happy Hobos aka Due pezzi di pane) and starring his brother Franco Citti (who regularly appeared in Pasolini's films), the film was made at the very same beach, Ostia, where the Salò director was mysteriously brutally murdered and run over with his own car multiple times five years before in late 1975. Notably, Citti's directorial debut, Ostia (1970), which was co-penned and was originally supposed to be directed by Pasolini, ends in an exceedingly eerily prophetic manner with one of the protagonists being brutally murdered on the beaches of Ostia in a fashion not unlike how the great Italian Renaissance man would perish five years later. Of course, although compulsively crude and even grotesque in parts, Casotto is fairly light-hearted in comparison to the beautiful brutality of Ostia, which is steeped in allegorical religious imagery and is quite dark despite its fleeting moments of classically Citti-esque comic relief. Sergio Citti and his brother Franco were members of Rome's sub-proletariat and grew up in a slimy Roman slum where they were discovered during the 1950s by Pasolini, who called the former brother the "lexicon of the Roman dialect," as he helped him write the dialogue for his first two films Accattone (1961) and Mamma Roma (1962) and eventually became his assistant director on important works like Porcile (1969) aka Pigsty, Medea (1969), The Decameron (1971), The Canterbury Tales (1972), and Salò (which was apparently originally Citti's idea). As Sergio would later remark regarding Pasolini's imperative influence on his life, "If I hadn't met Pier Paolo I'd have probably ended up as a delinquent." Instead of becoming a small-time con, Citti transferred his subversive vulgarian tendencies to the screen by directing what one might describe as 'proletarian arthouse' works that feature pathologically perverse and oftentimes tragicomic themes, albeit in a sort of Pasolinian style. For example, after his debut Ostia, Citti directed the four-story 'castration comedy' Storie scellerate (1973) aka Bawdy Tales characteristically starring the director's brother Sergio in one of the lead roles. Casotto was Citti's third and arguably most 'idiosyncratic' and internationally successful work, as a film featuring not only a rather young and nubile Jodie Foster, but also French diva Catherine Deneuve. Featuring a wealth of cock jokes and about 100 minutes of people in the most unflattering and compromised positions while getting undressed, among other things, in a public beach changing room, Citti's frolicsome flick is surely the best fun you will ever have at the beach without actually going into the water.

Early in the morning the beaches of Ostia just outside of Rome seem like a quiet and serene place located on the furthest tip of the world, but as soon as the armies of exceedingly extroverted squawking Guidos arrive, the place turns into a virtual improvised comedy show of the superlatively sleazy and fetish-fueled sort. After Pasolini's man muse Ninetto Davoli uses the beach changing room door to spark a match to light his cigarette, people begin storming into the yellow and blue shack to change into their bathing suits and do much less savory things. After a morbidly obese authoritarian gym coach that resembles an elderly pug dog marches his team of nubile teen beauties into the beach hut like they are soldiers in boot camp, a goofy looking dude with red muttonchops knocks on the door and informs him that they are using the wrong room. After the coach and his teenage concubines exit the building, muttonchops man drops his shorts while changing into his swimming trunks and reveals that he has two cocks (!) and a virtual jungle of pubic hair. After mutton mensch leaves the building so that he can read in peace and quiet on the beach, two goofy pussy-starved pals that work at a gas station together, Gigi (Gigi Proietti) and Nando (Franco Citti), enter the building with two borderline homely guidettes who are literally trying to use the two dimwitted dudes to get a free lunch. Indeed, redhead Gloria (Julia Sebestyan) and dark-haired Jole (Clara Algranti) are two unscrupulous skanks scheming for free food but they are not willing to give up any poontang to get it and one of the girls even goes so far as to insult Gigi's dead mother after he asks to see them undress in a semi-joking fashion. Since the two less than ladylike ladies have no bathing suits and are apparently wearing transparent underwear, Gigi and Nando are forced to buy them bathing suits, but the two girls are soon stolen by two arrogant and seemingly ambiguously gay blonde Nordic-like Milanese military men. One of the them has a borderline micro-penis (which, like the double dick, is clearly fake and made out of cheap prosthetic material), so he stuffs his speedo with tissues to make his bulge seem bigger. The same Milanese micro-penis fellow also absurdly carries around a white Chihuahua named 'Zaza' like he is some old queen. Needless to say, the Chihuahua eventually defecates in the beach house and a couple of the beach patrons, including the man with two penises, have the hilarious misfortune of stepping in it.

Of course, love is also in the air at the beach house, as especially personified by a candy ass cherub-like middle-aged mamma's boy with a chode (which, unlike the other two abnormal cocks, is real) named Carlo (Carlo Croccolo) and his secret young and rather petite redhead girlfriend who he has been hiding from his parents for over a year and cannot wait to screw seeing as he seems like a virgin. Carlo and his girlfriend plan to commence coitus in the beach house, but people keep interrupting them every time they strip their bathing suits off and go to seal the sensual deal. Two prostitutes also attempt to hustle money out of a pudgy would-be-suave insurance agent named Alfredo Cerquetti (Ugo Tognazzi of Marco Ferreri's La Grande Bouffe (1973) and Édouard Molinaro's La Cage aux Folles (1978)) by offering him their reasonably enticing bodies, but they eventually learn that he is wearing a locked chastity belt, as he has been cuckolded by Catholicism and believes that his abstinence is part of god's plan because, as he self-righteously proclaims, "Paradise exists, and it will be my reward." Luckily, the two career whores manage to get Cerquetti's chastity built off, as well as some of his money. When Jodie Foster finally appears in the film, the viewer soon discovers she is a newly pregnant teenager whose grandparents want to pawn her off to her half-retarded cousin Vincenzino (Michele Placido) so that her unborn child is not born a complete bastard. Aside from being a mentally challenged fellow who never seems to realize that his testicles are hanging out of his bathing suit, Vincenzino is a sexual invalid who describes to his cutesy blonde cousin Teresina Fedeli (Foster) how he has failed to ever be aroused by a woman. Luckily, moronic pervert Gigi will eventually take Teresina out of Vincenzino's impotent hands.

When Gigi bangs his head on a small boat that a couple people are carrying after running full speed out of the beach house like a spastic dunce, he eventually begins having fantasy dreams involving nine unclad Nordic babes, as well as his face becoming the image of the million aka 'miglione' lire bill. After becoming the miglione man, Gigi is greeted in his dream by a blonde bombshell named 'Naivety' (Catherine Deneuve), who proclaims her love to him but he initially rejects her since he thinks she is lying to him since a pulchritudinous babe like her could never be interested in an ugly swarthy moron like him. In revenge for Gigi rebuffing her love, Ms. Naivety absurdly attempts to commit suicide by holding her breathe, which inspires the gregarious Guido to come to the aid of the dream damsel in distress. When Gigi eventually awakes from his strange slumber, his oneiric rendezvous with Naivety will eventually come in handy for Teresina's grandparents, who pawn their granddaughter off to the unwitting gas station attendant. Indeed, Gigi almost immediately falls for Teresina, especially after she lies to him and tells him that she has never kissed a boy before, thus making him think that the knocked up teen is a virgin who only he will have the distinguished honor of deflowering. Gigi's giant black dog 'Rocco' also gets lucky at the beach house, as he finds dinner in the form of the white Chihuahua Zaza whose defecating bothered the cannibalistic canine. Naturally, when it begins raining and pouring outside, everyone at the beach immediately heads inside the beach house and begins getting dressed. During all the commotion, it is revealed that the man with two pricks and muttonchops is actually a priest, thus making his duo of dicks a total waste. After crying about losing his ticket to paradise after being defiled by two abnormally aggressive money-grubbing whores, Alfredo Cerquetti finally gives into sin, cheers up, and decides to leave with the two lovely little lecherous ladies. Of course, the last person to leave is Ninetto Davoli who, overall, seemed to have a fun day in the sun because he drilled holes in the beach house walls and spent most of his time playing peeping tom and watching the girls in the teenage swim team getting undressed and ritualistically combing their pubes.

Admittedly, as someone that lives at the beach and fell in love with my greatest love largely around my oceanside town, I could not help but rather enjoy Casotto, even if we do not have those huts like the ones in Citti's film where I live. Unquestionably, there is a certain singular 'humanity' to Citti's raunchy and ribald humor that the sort of scatological comedies starring the likes of unsufferable Zionist jackasses like Seth Rogen and Jonah Hill that Hebraic Hollywood regularly plops out certainly lack. While Casotto is very Guido-ish in terms of its comedy, the film also has a pure and unadulterated 'proletarian' essence about it that would make the film palatable to even the lowest of perennial lumpenproles, namely Americans, though I suspect that they might find some things lost in translation. Indeed, Citti's work is probably the only feature-length celluloid quasi-chamber piece I can think of that mostly relies on crude cock jokes and absurdist nudity scenarios, as a 100-minute film that almost entirely takes place in one single room. Of course, Citti does not deserve all the credit for the film's overload of merry degeneracy, as the work was primarily written by Vincenzo Cerami, who would go on to script hit Roberto Benigni flicks like Life Is Beautiful (1997) and The Tiger and the Snow (2005). In fact, Benigni played the protagonist in Citti's underrated dago 'trash classic' Il minestrone (1981), which was also co-penned by Cerami. Casotto is also notable for featuring Jodie Foster at her least frigid and most seemingly sensual, as surely no one that saw Citti's charmingly tasteless and bawdy celluloid beach party when it was originally released would have suspected that she would grow up to become an alpha-carpet-muncher. The film also reveals Citti's fetish for tall statuesque Nordic blondes, as reflected in the fact that most of the unclad ladies in the film are of such a pedigree (notably, both the director and his brother Franco were married to Swedish women with the name Anita). Undoubtedly, one of the aspects of Casotto that I found most intriguing is its anti-Milanese sentiments, which reflect the age old racial/cultural tensions between the more Germanic northern Italians and Romans (and especially southern Italians, like Sicilians). Of course, Lina Wertmüller's Swept Away (1973) aka Travolti da un insolito destino nell'azzurro mare d'agosto tackled similar themes, albeit in a more banal intellectual sort of way. Indeed, when comparing the films of a Northern Italian auteur like Michelangelo Antonioni to that of the works of Citti and a film like Ettore Scola's Brutti, sporchi e cattivi (1976) aka Ugly, Dirty and Bad, it is almost like comparing Leni Riefenstahl to some third world filmmaker like Ousmane Sembène. Ultimately, Casotto is the arthouse equivalent of junk food, as a film that certainly tastes good and is easy to devour but is probably not all that good for you, though at least, unlike the beach, the film won't give you skin cancer or a sunburn.

CASOTTO

-Ty E

DJANGO

Sergio Corbucci (1966)

The western is a genre that offers me not type of thrill or inspiration. When I do decide to watch a western, it is of the Italian persuasion. Spaghetti westerns added new elements to the western. They double the violence and emphasize atmospheric artistry. The contrived stoicism of John Wayne has always made me sick. That man never once fought in any American war yet propagated war time propaganda. Django is a western that I can get into. Any rebel cowboy that drags a coffin deserves recognition. Django wastes no time in wasting over thirty men and an equal amount of seconds. He is a heartless criminal that does everything in effort to benefit his own interests. He makes John Wayne look like a disgruntled sideshow cowboy clown. Mexican target practice is an exciting event found in Django. American filmmakers wouldn't dare feature such a politically incorrect act (a little in the early Hollywood studio system days). I can only assume that the Mexicans were played by Sicilians. Northern Italian has always considered them second class citizens. Pier Paolo Pasolini was most likely the only director to show them love. Like the majority of Italian films, Django features an impressive soundtrack. The Django theme is quite triumphant. I couldn't help cheering for psycho killer Django. Out of all the gringos in westerns, Django might just be king. That's why he has his own theme song. Cannibal Holocaust director Ruggero Deodato acted as assistant director on Django. He seems to have taken a couple cues from Django in his obsession with brutal violence. I would argue that Django is more of an Italian exploitation than the typical spaghetti western. Quentin Tarantino borrowed the ear cutting in Django scene for his film Reservoir Dogs. We all know that Tarantino is an exploitation thing.

-Ty E

BEAST WITH A GUN
BEAST WITH A GUN

Sergio Grieco (1977)

Around the time his filmmaking career began to totally peeter out, American cult auteur Curtis Harrington (Night Tide, Queen of Blood) began directing episodes for classic trashy American TV shows like Charlie's Angels (1976-1981) and Dynasty (1981-1989), where on the latter television series he had the distinguished opportunity to work with Austrian proto-twink actor Helmut Berger (The Damned, Salon Kitty). In his posthumously released autobiography Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013), Harrington wrote regarding Berger and his experience working with the actor, "I felt sorry for Helmut Berger in another way. He was easily the most feminine actor I have ever worked with. Most gay actors of that time, like Rock Hudson, had a very strong masculine persona, even if it didn't mirror their real-life behavior. Berger seemed to have none. I couldn't tap into a masculine core. He was soft and willowy and feminine in his voice and gestures." For those that do not know, Harrington was no alpha-male either as a man who dressed in drag as a teenager during the early 1940s for his first film Fall of the House of Usher (1942), who quite literally came in touch with his inner femininity in the avant-garde horror short Fragment of Seeking (1946), was a pioneer of the campy and mostly homosexual 'Grande Dame Guignol' subgenre, and was openly gay at a time when it was not cool to be gay. That being said, for Harrington to describe another male as "easily the most feminine actor I ever worked with" is the height of emasculation and it seems quite unimaginable that such an effortlessly effete Euro-twink would have the opportunity to play a leading man, let alone a low-class psychopathic thug, in any type of film yet Herr Berger did just that for the somewhat bizarre Italian poliziottesco flick La belva col mitra (1977) aka Beast with a Gun aka The Mad Dog Killer aka The Human Beast aka Wild Beasts with Machine Guns aka Street Killers aka Ferocious aka Ferocious Beast with a Gun directed by Guido writer/director Sergio Grieco (who is probably best known today for directing the Secret Agent 077 series of super schlocky James Bond parody films such as Agent 077 From the Orient with Fury and Agent 077 - Mission Bloody Mary under the Anglo pseudonym 'Terence Hathaway') in what would ultimately be the filmmaker's celluloid swansong.

A man with a uniquely unhealthy addiction to dago exploitation trash, alpha-fan-boy auteur Quentin Tarantino would pay tribute to Beast with a Gun by including stock footage, as well as a snippet of the striking score created by Umberto Smaila, in his pretentious and plodding postmodern neo-Blaxploitation flick Jackie Brown (1997), including in a scene where Samuel L. Jackson absurdly asks to a blond pothead surfer girl, "Is that Rutger Hauer?," in regard to Helmut Berger (apparently to blacks, all blonds must look the same). Indeed, Beast with a Gun has about four major things going for it: its ridiculous casting of Austrian queer Helmut Berger as a psychopathic guido prole rapist/killer, numerous catchy, if not ridiculous, alternative titles (with Beast with a Gun undoubtedly being the best), amateurish anti-realism and over-the-top rape/violence, and unequivocally an amazing and addictive primitive electronic musical score by maestro Smaila. While Beast with a Gun is not quite up to par with the best works of Fernando Di Leo in terms of the ostensibly 'fascistic' Italo-crime films go, the film manages to somewhat unintentionally transcend the Guido sub-genre due to its hysterical blond beast star and seemingly unintentionally idiosyncratic direction and nonsensical dialogue, which borders on the surreal. Loosely based on the crimes of celebrated Milanese mobster Renato Vallanzasca, who was once a pretty boy but nowhere as pretty as Berger, Beast with a Gun ultimately proves that, long before Sicilian-American filmmaker Martin Scorsese had the novel idea to cast lapsed twink Leonardo DiCaprio in The Departed (2006) as a ballsy bad ass of sorts, wops from the old world had the gall to cast a hysterical Aryan Adonis as a goombah gangster thug. A sort of quasi-campy (where there is Helmut Berger there is always camp, no matter what the genre!) take on the nasty nihilistic violence of Mario Bava's punishing piece of unhinged Guido grit Rabid Dogs (1974) aka Cani Arrabbiati with a marvelously melodic soundtrack that rivals Riz Ortolani's score from Cannibal Holocaust (1980), Beast with a Gun is a rare piece of celluloid trash that will probably be more of interest to fans of 1970s European arthouse films than bloodlusting poliziottesco addicts.

Statuesque psychopathic conman Nanni Vitali (Helmut Berger) who sports a lethal leather-jacket and aviator glasses, along with three of his burly goons with stereotypical names like 'Bruno' and 'Mario,' have just made a successful jailbreak and they have rape, murder, torture, and bank robbery in mind, but first the 'Beast with a Gun' wants to settle an old score with a bitch ass snitch. Nanni was sentenced to prison for 23 years for killing a lowly security guard after a groveling stool pigeon named Barbareschi squealed to the cops, so naturally he wants to torture and kill the little rat. When Nanni and his merry meathead men catch bitch boy Barbareschi, he is found with his girlfriend Giuliana Caroli (played by Austrian actress Marisa Mell, who is best known for her role as Eva Kant in Mario Bava's Danger: Diabolik (1968)). Needless to say, Nanni savagely sexually ravages Giuliana while Barbareschi is forced to watch. Of course, Nanni wastes the snitch and takes his bitch, making Giuliana his involuntary old lady. While she would not admit it in a million years, quasi-cougar Giuliana seems to be hot for Nanni and the two have sex more than just once, but she is also somewhat afraid of him as he makes incessant threats to kill her. Not exactly the brightest of blonds, Nanni convinces Giuliana to help him rob a bank where her estranged father works as a security guard, but she tells a police commander named Giulio Santini (played by Richard Harrison, who is probably best known for his work with Antonio Margheriti) about the robbery beforehand, thus botching the psychopath's grand plans as the cops set a trap. Indeed, while Nanni and his crew manage to take a van full of teen beauties hostage, Giuliana helps the girls escape and everyone in the Beast's gang is caught and arrested except the beast. After a temporary reunion with his seemingly hysterical sister Rosa (who he talks into telling the cops lies about his whereabouts) and hooking up with a young and dimwitted protégé named Bimbo Pacesi (Alberto Squillante), Nanni kidnaps Commander Santini's father (Claudio Gora), who also happened to be the judge that sentenced him to prison, and sister Carla (played by Marina Giordana, the daughter of Claudio Gora), thus making it personal for the police officer in what is ultimately one fucked family affair. On top of that, the Beast with the Gun attempts to assassinate Giuliana with a sniper rifle, but she merely receives a fleshwound in the thigh and she absurdly brushes the energy off as if she were a super soldier. Needless to say, Santini hunts down Nanni like he is a rabid dog, but before that happens, the Judge is shot by Bimbo and the Beast mutilates sister Carla's nubile young breasts. When Santini catches up with Nanni, he threatens to cut off Carla's tits and even displays the bloody topless girl for her cop brother to see in what is a quintessential scene of Guido celluloid sleaze. Of course, the big brother gives the big bad beast an impassioned beating before he is arrested and the Judge and Carla survive the ordeal, though the damage that has been done to the young lady's olive color bosoms is clearly permanent.

BEAST WITH A GUN

In his autobiography Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood, Curtis Harrington also remarked about Helmut Berger regarding his problematic experience working with him on Dynasty, "It did not help that he seemed totally at sea being in America, almost as if he had come from another planet. Unfortunately, all of this was evident on the screen. It was not long before most of his lines, if they had to be retained as plot points, were taken away from him and given to other actors. I wondered at the genius of Luchino Visconti, the Italian director of The Leopard and Death in Venice, who was Berger's real-life lover. Luchino had made him seem very strong and masculine when he directed him wearing a Nazi uniform in certain scenes of The Damned." While I would not exactly describe Berger's performances in Visconti's films as seeming "very strong and masculine," I do think Harrington was right when he insinuated that Herr Berger was not someone who could easily be imported for American television. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Berger portrayed the eponymous characters in Massimo Dallamano's Dorian Gray (1970) aka The Secret of Dorian Gray and Visconti's Ludwig (1972), as he had the aura of a decidedly debauched and exceedingly narcissistic old school European aristocrat, which is certainly something the mongrelized, perennially proletarian place that is the United States cannot appreciate. While Berger undoubtedly makes for a poor choice for a mad Mediterranean mobster, the actor's role in Beast with a Dog ultimately gave him the perfect platform to go wild and wickedly wayward with his fierce flamboyance and nancy boy narcissism. While Berger does not do go all out with a mean Marlene Dietrich impression like he did in Visconti's The Damned, he certainly brought some nasty Nordic swag to the played-out Italian poliziottesco films with Beast with a Gun that was never seen before nor was ever seen again in the sub-genre. Even though I rather like the title of Beast with a Gun, I think a more apt named would have been 'Blond Beast with a Gun' as Berger manages to channel a sort of visceral Nietzschean nihilism as an actor who, to quote Zarathustra, demonstrates, "one must still have chaos within oneself, to give birth to a dancing star."

-Ty E

ONCE UPON A TIME IN AMERICA
ONCE UPON A TIME IN AMERICA

Sergio Leone (1984)

Hollywood has plenty of dago wop-fest mafia films, but is certainly lacking in regards to the much more powerful and organized Jewish mafia. Leave it to to Spaghetti Western master craftsman Sergio Leone to make the greatest Jewish mafia (and possibly greatest mafia film in general) ever made, Once Upon A Time In America is as classy as gangster films get, quite the accomplishment indeed. Despite taking place mostly in the young ghettos of New York City, most of Once Upon A Time In America was shot in Italy and Spain. Director and co-writer Sergio Leone spent a lot of time and great detail recreating NYC, a version of the city that looks more aesthetically power than the real city itself. Apparently, Leone used paintings from such iconic American artists as Norman Rockwell as a frame of reference when designing the set for Once Upon A Time In America. Maybe researching art history can be of some value after all. I have never really thought of Robert De Niro as much of an Italian, but as more of a philistine working-class Jew. In Once Upon A Time In America, De Niro does a brilliant job playing the Rapist Jew Noodles. Noodles is a man who seems unable to truly get close with anyone, including his best friend Max and his life-long love interest Deborah. Of course, Noodles cannot be blamed for his criminal behavior and unconventionally smooth antisocial tendencies, for he is a product of a particular time and place. Noodles has turned into a man already in his early childhood/teenage years, killing an older mafia hood named Bugsby and even stabbing a cop, but those are just the consequences when playing rough. After serving time and getting out of jail as an adult, Noodles is even less emotional towards people in his personal life and more importantly whilst committing crucial crimes. Despite his peculiar form of criminal stoicism throughout his whole life, Noodles appropriately comes to terms with his dubious history in an elegant manner at the end of Once Upon A Time In America, making him a rapist and murderer one cannot help but like. Noodles uses words sparingly, but what the few words he does choose to use tell more than the most revealing of biographies. The real dirty psychopath Yid of Once Upon A Time In America is mafia mastermind Max. Like many of the top IQ individuals members of his kinfolk, Max suffers from a form megalomaniac madness that helps him to be a real top criminal. Noodles maybe a rapist and killer, but he certainly plays the game of morality more nicely than his bandit buddy Max. By the end of Once Upon A Time In America, it becomes very clear that Max was always a one-man team, just using his partners as temporary tools for personal gains. Unfortunately for Max, he is well aware of his insanity (and well aware of his late Father's) and does not take kindly to Noodles telling him that he is 'crazy.' Crazy is as crazy does, but Max does it fairly successfully, going from a poor Ghetto Jew to one of the richest businessmen/politicians in America. Max is a wonderful symbol for what it truly takes to become success in America, a purist in regards to achieving the much sentimentalized "American dream." I find most epics to be epically disappointing, films full of aesthetic fireworks yet lacking in solid and rich storytelling. Once Upon A Time In America maybe be the most complete and richly layered story ever told in the form of masterly crafted celluloid. A lot of the great and legendary auteur filmmakers end their careers on a weak note, no longer capable of the same artistic vitality that made them brilliant filmmakers. Sergei Leone is certainly an exception to this unfortunate trend of legendary directors burning out. As a master dictator auteur, Sergei Leone died with his boots on, proving to Hollywood and the world that artistic integrity will always stand the test of time in comparison to mere highly financed technical innovation. After all, who else could have created the brilliant work that is Once Upon A Time In America, one of the most American films ever made directed by a cultural outsider.

-Ty E

ONE MAN'S WAR
ONE MAN'S WAR

Sérgio Toledo (1991)

In many ways, the German World War I memoir Storm of Steel (1920) by Ernst Jünger is a spiritual antidote to Franco-German author Erich Maria Remarque's absurdly popular pussyfoot anti-war literary diatribe All Quiet on the Western Front (1928); a work that would be utilized and adapted as anti-Teutonic filmic-ammo by the glorified gangsters of Sunset Boulevard. Not only was Jünger a superior writer but his work would have a much greater influence on the German populous than Remarque's cowardly defeatist work. Although known for his romantic view of war, Jünger would later become quite disillusioned with the Second World War and most specifically; National Socialism and Adolf Hitler. Apparently, Jünger even played an exceedingly shadowy role in the Stauffenberg bomb plot against Hitler. If one thing is for sure, Jünger never attempted to capitalize off his celebrity as a distinguished and nationalistic anti-liberal writer during the Third Reich era, thus one can only conclude that he was a man of honor who never fell so low as to compromise his idealism for the personal benefit of power and monetary return like so many artists and prominent German figures of his generation. In fact, the most telling example of Jünger's character is that he refused an offer to head the German Academy of Literature and was subsequently banned from writing during the Nazi era. Like sage Radical Traditional Baron Julius Evola (who admired and wrote a book on Jünger), Jünger advocated a sort of aristocratic individualism called "Anarch" in response to an increasingly chaotic and totalitarian world. Jünger also defied the stereotypical conventions of a German nationalist by regularly experimenting and writing about drugs, including (but not limited to) cocaine, weed, and LSD (he even went on "trips" with Albert Hofmann; the inventor of the drug). During the German-occupation of France, Jünger was assigned to an administrative position in Paris. Although banned from writing, Jünger kept an intimate diary about his personal experiences in the slimy frog city and his (for the most part, pessimistic) thoughts on the war. In the experimental documentary One Man's War (1982) aka La guerre d'un seul homme directed by Argentine auteur Edgardo Cozarinsky, narrations of Jünger's Parisian diaries are cleverly juxtaposed with German and Vichy propaganda newsreels.

Upon first viewing One Man's War, it will be quite obvious to the fanatic cinephile that the documentary is a lot like Max Ophüls' overrated documentary The Sorrow and The Pity (1969); the main difference being that Cozarinsky's work is all the more potent and groundbreaking due to its inclusion of Jünger's narrated diaries. From his earliest diary entries on, it is apparent that Jünger feels his job in Paris is dubious at best. In between meeting fellow artists like poet polymath and cine-magician Jean Cocteau and fellow right-wing anarchist Louis-Ferdinand Céline, Jünger experiences the grand pleasure of witnessing a handsome German deserter being executed via firing-squad and hearing rumors about the mass liquidations of Jews in the East. Jünger also does not shy away from describing a friendly chat he had with a comical French prostitute who jokingly saluted him as if she were a patriotic German soldier. The newsreels featured in One Man's War range from the latest in tacky Parisian fashion to footage of numerous Frenchmen boarding trains to join the German National Socialist military campaign. The greatest irony of the documentary being that Jünger – a committed lifelong proponent of war and a lover of pain (After all, Jünger is the author of the pro-pain/anti-bourgeois book On Pain) has no faith in the greatest war of the twentieth century and fails to take pleasure in occupying a country which has arguably been Germany's greatest enemy throughout all of European history. In the excellent book on the intellectual history of National Socialist ideology, Metapolitics: from Wagner and the German Romantics to Hitler (1941), written by German-American Peter Viereck (the son of Nazi propagandist/Philo-semitic and purported bastard Grandson of Kaiser Wilhelm I; George Sylvester Viereck), the author makes the claim that German nationalism largely sprung from an inferiority complex Germany obtained by being so severely beaten and brainwashed (with ideas of "liberty") by the French throughout a number of wars over a number of centuries. I don't know about other people but I personally derived some pleasure from seeing various newsreels of the snobbish French being occupied by a nation that they had once felt infinitely superior to.

Edgardo Cozarinsky also added some more subtle contrasting ingredients to One Man's War that might not be apparent to most viewers upon first viewing the film. Throughout One Man's War, scores by Aryan composers like Hans Pfitzer and Richard Strauss are coalesced together with music works by Jewish degenerate musicians like Franz Schreker and Arnold Schonberg. Surprisingly, the blending of varying musical styles is fairly unnoticeable and is undoubtedly complementary of the film itself. Speaking of blending Aryans and Jews, a rare newsreel of ¼ Jewish-British fascist propagandist John Amery is also featured in One Man's War. Not only was Amery a committed fascist of royal Jewish ancestry (his father was Lord and conservative UK MP Leo Amery) but he was also a well known sexual libertine who – like many of the prominent French Vichy collaborators (writers Pierre Eugène Drieu La Rochelle and Robert Brasillach included) – was executed for treason by his respective nation of origin at the conclusion of World War II. That being said, One Man's War not only proves to be an intriguing and solacing portrait of Vichy France but also an important and equally inventive quasi-Cinéma vérité cultural and artistic visual testimonial like no other. I certainly can not think of another film that so seamlessly weaves cinematic poetry with historical document for a most celestially unruly mix. Despite the sometimes depressive narration of Jünger's writings and the war torn brutality of the imagery, One Man's War is for the part a relaxing and mellow cinematic timeline that offers a quite pleasurable experience for World War II fanatics (myself including) and cinephiles alike. Although Jünger's tone may be melancholic and pessimistic throughout One Man's War, he certainly proves comic (whether intentional or not) in his random ramblings, especially when he remarks in a cynical manner regarding Mongolian volunteers (Germany had the largest multicultural army in human history at the time), "whole tribes of yellow ants have been enrolled." If one is to learn anything from One Man's War, it is that the authoritarian racial collectivism of the National Socialist regime was not up to par with Ernst Jünger's aristocratic Anarch Weltanschauung.

ONE MAN'S WAR

-Ty E

THE NIGHT PORTER

Sewell Collins (1930) Before I start this review I would like to begin with this quote about The Night Porter from Pulitzer prize winning Film Critic Roger Ebert: "as nasty as it is lubricious, a despicable attempt to titillate us by exploiting memories of persecution and suffering." Knowing this is a good enough reason alone to watch The Night Porter. It seems as if Roger Ebert was so disgusted with himself for liking the film and feeling it had artistic merit that he had to somehow redeem himself with an emotionally fueled review. I will admit that I both enjoyed the film and felt it had much artistic merit. The film was directed by female Italian auteur Liliana Cavani, starring (the English stars) Dirk Bogarde and Charlotte Rampling. Not a bad line-up for a fan of European films of the 1970s. In 1962 both Bogarde and Rampling starred in another dark Third Reich tale, The Damned, directed by Luchino Visconti. Having seen The Damned gives an especially appropriate introduction to watching The Night Porter.

The Night Porter has a fairly straightforward and linear plot. What makes it different is its various flashbacks which seem more like decaying pastel dream sequences. These scenes have a power unmatched by any film trying to portray this time of history. These scenes range from an SS Man doing ballet for a large group of his comrades, to Max giving the head of an enemy prisoner in a box to his lover/prisoner. Never has the SS been so romantic. Expect to also see a Joseph Goebbels (Nazi Minister of Propaganda) look alike performing ballet for a group of SS men. This scene is both eerie and chilling. It makes Nazism look like a fetishist's art. This character later becomes an enemy of Max and still a driven Nazi. It is all so very strange in this world. The sex scenes are violent and animal like. Broken glass and blood make scenes of disturbing sex more real than what you might see in your latest slasher flick. This relationship truly has passion. Knowing that they could be killed at any second makes their relationship even more fun as they are finally living completely for each other. The effects of the war never truly go away. The Night Porter's score perfectly compliments the film. It is a melody that is as haunting as the protagonist's past. Throughout the film, the melody constantly reminds you of the film's tragic mood. I wouldn't expect anything less from Italian production. Even Italian exploitation films have excellently composed music. The ending of The Night Porter is as romantic as a film can get (of the sadist sort). I don't know whether or not Steven Spielberg would be happy with it, but don't expect juvenile sentimentalism. The Night Porter isn't out to make the viewer feel like everything is alright at the end. Postwar European film has a lot of darkness and nihilism involved. The Night Porter is like Ilsa, She-Wolf of the SS meets European art film. I don't think you can get much more different or offensive than that. Although flawed, The Night Porter has become one of my favorite films over the past couple of years.

-Ty E

THIS IS ENGLAND
THIS IS ENGLAND

Shane Meadows (2006)

This Is England is quite the appropriately titled film. The reason is that this film actually attempts to portray the working class English and the socio-political factors affecting that group. This Is England is not some piece of superficial trash featuring the faggoty Charm of Hugh Grant or the proud integrity of Ralph Fiennes. This Is England takes a look at those that represent the true majority of the English collective during the early 1980s. The film specifically looks at the skinhead subculture and how it ironically morphed from a multicultural influenced movement to a Neo-Nazi movement. The first English film I saw that attempted to take a personal look at the English Neo-Nazi skinhead was Alan Clarke's Made In Britain starring Tim Roth. This film features a powerful performance by Roth and gives small hints into what turned the young man into a vicious skinhead. This Is England, however, takes a more holistic approach to exposing the variables that turn young men into unlawful racist rebels. Many of the skinheads have lost a parent and are now living in a fragmented and defunct nuclear family. The film's young protagonist lost his father in the Falklands War. A war that is recognized in the film as one that was worthless and not in the interest of the common Englishmen. The only thing This Is England lets us know about the war is that a young boy lost his father in it. During the film's conclusion, real stock footage of dead English soldiers who perished in the Falklands is shown. This is England also takes a look at immigrant infiltration of England that is promoted by criminal bankers and corporations (like in the United States). Due to the fact that non-English Diaspora immigrants have jobs and are mildly successful in England, the common Englishman has become enraged and adopts fascism. The reality is that the immigrant shouldn't be blamed. The internationalist criminals that promote it are the source of such acts against the ordinary man. They expect and even promote racial tensions so that they can loot the countries while commoners battle it out with whatever little resources they can get. International bankers have always exploited the citizens of each nation they have infiltrated and brought them to war for monetary profit. The skinhead subculture in This is England is presented as a movement that was originally heavily inspired by black Jamaicans via ska, rock steady, reggae, and soul music. Even one of the skinheads featured in the film is of mulatto origin. This young man's assumed death acts as the symbolic transformation of the skinhead group from working class multiculturalists to hateful Neo-Nazis. Of course, the agitators that run the international news media (good ol' Murdoch) aren't interested in acknowledging this distinction. The news media has always used the contrived façade of "white collective racism" in attempts to stir up racial tensions and stifle the average white into a state of fear of being labeled a racist. The international news media has never attempted to put racial conflict into a realistic context. That wouldn't be good for their conquest of international slavery. This Is England also presents the English working class as similar to that of its American counterparts. The English skinheads love getting into trouble by wrecking abandoned houses, fucking with one another, and making the best of a not so bright looking future. This Is England is not a false Hollywood portrait of the English as linguistically refined and classy shadows of the Royal family. The lying and agitating opinion forming trash that is American Hollywood will never attempt to give a voice to the typical proletarian white. The reality is that the average white is far from rich and just as much of a slave of the system as many so-called "minorities." Finger pointing at the white collective only takes peoples eyes off the real criminals (the same criminals that pushed imperial colonialism, hegemony, and internationalism). This Is England is the most emotionally powerful and dramatic English film that I have seen since the titanic masterpiece A Night To Remember (1958). It is rare nowadays to find European national cinema that actually attempts to look at the common people of those prospective nations. Hollywood has made it their goal to buy out any international talent before they start a powerful film industry of their own. Hollywood has complete contempt for international culture and attempts to hide its hatred by making offensive inaccurate portrayals of "exotic backwards cultures" and the rich selfless altruistic whites that have dedicated their lives to helping those "savages." The young protagonist of This Is England doesn't seem to have a bright future and he knows it. This Is England is less about a nihilistic message than it is about a realistic message. A tragic story about a young man's loss of a father and the unfortunate future he faces as a proletarian white in anti-nationalist England. It is a rare event when a film like This Is England reaches international acclaim. Anyone that loves national cinema (or cinema in general) should watch this heartbreaking film.

-Ty E

AMATEUR PORN STAR KILLER 2
AMATEUR PORN STAR KILLER 2

Shane Ryan-Reid (2008) APSK 2 (Film Version) is a difficult film to review. The main reason is it being unfaithful to its own sub genre in faux-snuff. The narrative is several title cards placed throughout the 83-minute running time explaining the federal information on this killer. What we gather are his name, victims, and minor details. A man named Brandon meets up with a young girl in a new town and decides to fool around. That is the plotline right there. What separates this one from the rest is the utmost sincerity of the project. There is no rivers of blood; no exaggerated killings involving intestines. There is just a young man who is driven by his own disturbing sexual aura to murder and rape these young women. The movie version features overkill editing, which gets pretty frustrating while you are watching it. The filters switch from negative, to night vision, and to many more before this film is over. It gets so damn hard to adjust constantly, but then again, that only saves us from the boring details. This man talking to her involves realistic dialogue, which later leads to realistic sex. This cut is not the snuff version. Do not expect Dogme 95 killing here. This one is very edited, but still carries the majority of the emotion and power. The film version also features a score and soundtrack. The score is very impressive. I was amazed at how this independent film, especially of its genre, managed to grasp such a mesmerizing score and carry it throughout, never dulling; not even for an instance. One reason why this film series came under so much heavy fire from horror fans is that they assume that this director was trying to cash in on the notoriety of the August Underground series. Wait; now that I think about it, they claim everything is a rip-off of AU. The Poughkeepsie Tapes and Scrapbook are two examples. Hell, I'm sure that if 8MM came out several years later, it would be deemed a knock off too. Lets face facts gentlemen, AU didn't invent the snuff genre, nor do they deserve the mascot status either. The snuff genre stands on its own, bearing no owners or creator. APSK 2 (Film Version) is a flawed, yet extremely corrosive film depicting real brutality to real people. The ending scene will haunt you, due to the eyes of a young murderer. If only Myspace photos could be that haunting.

-Maq

AMATEUR PORN STAR KILLER 2

Shane Ryan-Reid (2008) APSK 2 (Snuff Version) is the blander, bastard child of the film version intended for audience's eyes. This goes to show, that this is the runt of the litter. Just because it is boring, void of a soundtrack besides the young man's charisma and her cock-teasing ways, doesn't mean this is a tacky entry. This film does what the original August Underground did, sans several butchered bodies and a horrible outdoor punching scene. What stands out is the personality emitting from the characters. Real chemistry is going on. The violence in this film doesn't go over-the-top, which makes me respect these even more. As I recall, director Shane Ryan doesn't even enjoy these types of films, which goes to show his lack of influences. This can only help his film path. This version is tedious, but it is without the misplaced color scopes and annoying title cards labeling the victims as if it were some game show. The only reason gripe I have this version is the way the "found tape" is edited. Events that have happened are all out of chronological order, and if they aren't, that only means they were in the film version. Despite being slow moving, this is the brutal and unflinching version. Expect cruder blowjobs, longer chokes, and his forced psychosexual temptations to eventually transgress onto her. Brandon is a pretty realistic role for Shane Ryan. I can see pent up aggression in his eyes. When he becomes this character, it does seem to overtake him. APSK 2 is a portrait of a perhaps soulless killer whose motives are unknown. To say that these films are microbudget would be a severe understatement. This film was made for 20 dollars and the first, 45 dollars. The snuff version is less rewarding from the film version, but it is still a damn good watch and effort from an independent director. I wonder how much this film was made for? Whatever the budget was, Terry Hawkins would be proud. Not everyone can do it as amazingly as he can.

-mAQ

SPLENDOR
SPLENDOR

Shari Springer Berman (2003)

To seamlessly blend his style of surreal and perverse sexuality into the mainstream was a 2-step program. Gregg Araki settled upon us a fine film depicting a titillatingly road trip not complete without a Ménage à trois of madness and murder. Araki took the same concept existent in The Doom Generation and layered it over a chic film along the lines of Clueless. The result is pertinent to the outcome of his latest film, Smiley Face. Splendor is a film that reminds me vaguely of the Edward Norton film The Painted Veil. Both films have a slow build up subversively hinting towards the stupidity and errors of women. In Splendor, you will watch as a "good girl" fucks and teases a literate "tortured artist" guy who eventually turns into a final form of Chris Kattan, and also a lug head band drummer with spiky blond hair. Both of these men seem to be very personal to Gregg Araki as he spends most of the film building atop their relationship and heterosexuality is challenged and "love" comes from all angles. Our main female is given many narrative segments in which she sits in a pristine white backdrop and discusses her many mistakes. Filters and after-effects are digitally added to give her eyes a sparkling halo within and a virgin-esque aspect of her perfect face. For once, Araki is approaching the situation at an entirely new angle, but this move is fatal on his mainstream career. A year later, he will have directed a pilot for MTV of a show that marveled with surrealism and oh-so quirky situations. He finally perfected his mainstream endeavors but at a fatal time. He would later release Smiley Face, a film starring the retarded Anna Faris as a pothead who winds up in "outrageous situations" with the Communist Manifesto. To call Splendor romantic is as much of a sin to call A Night at the Roxbury romantic. The only difference between the two is that one retains humor and by the tone of my writing, you can guess the latter takes the award home. Splendor is a doctrine of misled misandry. The females in the film are over forced to be the exquisite saints but the truth is far from. The female lead in Splendor is a spoiled, slutty princess who abuses men and later giggles about it. The same could be said with most of the younger female population. They cover the sexist discrepancies with a half-spoken message of true love. Splendor ends with a cookie cutter version of everyone's favorite motif - Girl loves guy, girl leaves guy(s), girl realizes she is a dumb whore and reunites to a happy ending. Araki isn't one for these measly stereotypes and is better off without them. Rather than suiting the mainstream, Araki should continue "sticking it to the man". He's one of the few auteur's producing homosexual, heterosexual, and everything in between that I can appreciate. Splendor is entirely passable and isn't even worth a viewing, even for fans of angst and antirealism.

-mAQ

WATER POWER

Shaun Costello (1977)

I wouldn't call myself an enemy of enemas, at least when it comes to proper medical uses, but I certainly cannot see how anyone would be sexually stimulated by such toxic and downright terribly repulsive material in pornographic form. After watching the cult porn flick Water Power (1977) aka The Enema Bandit directed by Shaun Costello (Midnight Desires, Dracula Exotica) – a decidedly politically-incorrect adult hardcore work loosely based on a real-life “enema bandit” and his manure-ophile mania – I haven't changed my mind about defecation as a distinctly deplorable aphrodisiac, but I must admit it was a gratifying and especially exhilarating X-rated work that most certainly transcends the usually fine line between pornography and a gritty cult flick. Starring avant-garde porn legend and AVN Hall of Fame member Jamie Gillis (Through the Looking Glass, Nighthawks) in a typically fitting sleazy role (although there is nothing 'typical' about the role itself) as “Burt – The Enema Bandit,” Water Power is indubitably as nasty, nauseating and aesthetically nefarious today as it was upon its original release over three decades ago. As far as vintage pornography is concerned, Water Power is undoubtedly one of the most – if not the most – brutal work of the Golden Age of Porn, even beating Shaun Costello's previous, aptly-titled effort Forced Entry (1973) to a shitty and bloody pulp in terms of its loony lewdness, spunky libertinage, and unsightly urban austerity. In short, Water Power, like Bacchanale (1970) directed by the Amero brothers, The Sex Garage (1972) and LA Plays Itself (1972) directed by Fred Halsted, Through the Looking Glass (1976) directed by Jonas Middleton, and Café Flesh (1982) and Dr. Caligari (1989) directed by Stephen Sayadian, is one of those rare embarrassing erotic works that one does not need to be necessarily turned-on by to fully appreciate, thus making it deserving of recognition in the pages of film history, alongside the audacious metropolitan early works of Robert John Downey Sr. (Chafed Elbows, Putney Swope), Martin Scorsese (Who's That Knocking at My Door, Taxi Driver), and Abel Ferrara (Driller Killer, Ms. 45).

Very loosely based on the eminent enema escapades of real-life serial enema-ist Michael H. Kenyon – a fecal felon who managed to get away with forcibly cleaning the colons of around two dozen unsuspecting female college students for over a decade – Water Power was made under almost similarly morally “dirty” circumstances. Propositioned by Sid Levine, the front-man of the porn division of the infamous Gambino crime family, the mafia family felt that Shaun Costello – their largest and most distinguished supplier of pornography – was the right man for the sensitive and surly scatological job. Always displaying a true professionalism as a pornographic performer like a true method actor in the spirit of Marlon Brando and Robert De Niro, Jamie Gillis even attempted to meet the real Michael H. Kenyon, the man that Water Power was based on, in preparation for the ambitious role, but he was unfortunately turned down. Similar in character to sexually debauched loser 'anti-heroes' like Harry Reems as the Gas Station Attendant (Forced Entry), Travis Bickle (Taxi Driver), Jimmy Fingers (Fingers), Reno Miller (Driller Killer), and Frank Zito (Maniac), "Burt – The Enema Bandit" (Jamie Gillis) is a socially alienated and inept degenerate who discovers his love for flying feces after happening to catch a pseudo-doctor performing an erotic enema at brothel he frequents in what is easily one of the most fiercely frolicsome scenes even captured on gritty 16mm celluloid. Undoubtedly a life-changing experience as exemplified by his absolute state of ecstasy as he wanks off to high-pressure fecal matter as if he is Dr. Frankenstein watching the reanimation of his creature, Burt is no longer satisfied with $10.00 blow-job special from homely hoes of his local whorehouse and decides to dedicate his already dastardly life to the misunderstood art of anal-induced "water power" so as to ceremonially purify the "filthy whores" of Manhattan in an ostensibly 'spiritual' manner as if he some sort of ultra-reformed messianic Rebbe. Like most real-life pathological fetishists and assorted perverts, Burt has self-deceptively convinced himself that his actions are not only morally justified, but also have an otherworldly purification property that only he is aware of and ordained to administer. In preparation for his eccentric excremental excursions, Burt scans issues of faux-porn mags like "Water & Power" to find worthy dirty dames, mumbling to himself that he plans to, "Clean em' out...shove it all the way up their ass and get all that shit out." With a nod to Alfred Hitchcock's Rear Window (1954), Burt also engages in masturbatory socophilia by spying on a neighbor in the apartment building across from his. A staunch true believer and rebel-with-a-prehensible-cause, bombastic Burt stalks Manhattan in a more sinister and body fluid manner than big brutish boy Jason Voorhees ever could. After all, unlike Mr. Voorhees, Burt knows what to do with a beautiful defenseless woman.

WATER POWER

Needless to say, Water Power is one of few quasi-slasher flicks where the victim would have been better off dead. Equipped with a better-than-average 'horror' score (stealing shamelessly from Bernard Herrmann's musical compositions from Hitchcock's Vertigo) and creepy yet inadvertently comical narration, Water Power – much like a lot of Costello's pornographic works – is a discernibly 'cinematic' film directed by a man who seemed to know more about mainstream movie history than the typically amateurish pornographic works. Like any classic cult/horror film, Water Power is a wildly engrossing work that demands constant replaying, as epitomized by highly quotable lines like, "I know it sounds simple, but giving an enema is an important responsibility. After all, its my job." and "I need to clean out these bitches as much they need to be cleaned." Although essentially unclassifiable, I would describe Water Power is a violently sardonic and misanthropic blacker-than-a-firebombed-Dresden-housewife black comedy that is conscious of horror and action conventions that is disguised as an ultra-adulterated hardcore porn flick. After all, most fans of the film seem to agree that the sex scenes are unequivocally anti-erotic and even downright despicable, which is no surprise when one considers the odious and toxic nature of human dung, especially when flying gloriously through the air while a mischievous maniac ejaculates simultaneously, but most proponents of Water Power tend to agree that it is an awfully facetious and sometimes satirical work that lampoons similarly-themed works like John G. Avildsen's Joe (1970) in its overblown absurdity of sexual violence and grotesquery. In an era where scatological pornography is easily accessible to elementary school students via the internet and flaunting aberosexuality is considered a badge of honor and the height of personal liberty, Water Power makes for all the more relevant and biting work. Alfred Hitchcock may have ruined the showering experience for an entire generation of women with Psycho (1960), but Water Power is probably the only film that makes showering seem like a frightfully grimy and vomit-inspiring prospect.

-Ty E

THE STREET FIGHTER
THE STREET FIGHTER

Shigehiro Ozawa (1974)

In most of my articles or reviews of film, i search out some intelligent core of a film; perhaps a personal trait to the director, perhaps even the coming of a new auteur. In this review, i will completely disregard that, because there is none of these available. However, we do have Sonny Chiba kicking so much ass, that in order to span this epic series, would take 2 sequels in order to properly dose you with the right amount of bloodshed and action. Terry Tsurugi is a martial arts mercenary who gets hired by the mafia to kidnap the only heir to an oil tycoon, a pretty lady. The mafia didn't like Terry's price so they did the only imaginable thing, to try and kill him, but oh no no! You can't kill Sonny Chiba! They find this out the hard way as he takes on the entire mafia to get her back. Just to outline how badass Tsurugi is, i will highlight this one particular scene. Boy can't pay Terry, doesn't have enough money. Terry throws boy out window. Sells sister for prostitution to pay him back. Nuff' Said. The design of this film is to take the "oh-so-bad" mafia, and show them getting destroyed by a one man army, much like what the Rambo sequels were designed for. It's films like these that make you stand up against innumerable odds for thoughts of a better future. Despite being a film that has no real motivation, the film is also quite racist in a scene. The only black person in the film is a drooling about-to-be rapist, that is before Terry castrates him with his bare hands. That scene adds to the previous rating of "X" which it received in the USA. Street Fighter is a multi-talented film. It takes some awesome kung-fu scenes, adds Chiba's berserk facial expressions, throws in some flashback footage of his father being murdered, and tries to implement the fact that he is a superhuman due to his half-breeding of Chinese and Japanese. The Street Fighter is a kung-fu classic that has stood the test of time. Quentin Tarantino actually uses this film as an influence, which is a blasphemy to say the least. I always said to leave the classics alone, but did this stop him from using Hatori Hanzo in Kill Bill or remaking Faster Pussycat! Kill! Kill!? I think not.

-Maq

BLACK HOUSE

Shin Tae-ra (2007)

Immortalizing celluloid psychopaths seems to be a step that every film director wishes to take. They explore these stereotypical situations in order to show us that a "psychopath" can be living amongst us, in some attempt to keep us living under fear. Black House is no exception, other than that this one is actually filmed aesthetically stylish, although relying on every twist in the book in an attempt to create the master thriller. The thing about Asian thrillers or horror films for that matter, is that they love to incorporate the average man or business man. Think about it. Save the Green Planet!, Tetsuo: The Iron Man, and Premonition are just a couple out of many. The average Joe archetype can only work so much. My only guess is that it's another scare tactic to show that these amazing and fantastical things can happen to anyone and refuse to have favoritism towards sinners. The story line consists of the usual Korean flair; stylized rain and splattered blood. Jeon Juno is an insurance investigator who lives in constant guilt due to the young suicide of his brother. This leaves him tacked down with nightmares and intimacy issues. After witnessing a client's son commit suicide, he begins to wonder if it was really suicide afoot or perhaps a deeper, darker secret. The title at hand here is accurate. The centerpiece of the film is a large, black house which resembles an archaic Gothic creation. The film sets its self up with effective tension and leads up to a lackluster ending but is wholly satisfying, so there's not much to complain about. While the film is decent, it isn't anything we haven't seen before in Western cinema - Albeit, they do it better. Some of the voyeurism scenes and coming back to the apartment broken in are reminiscent of the grand film The Life of David Gale. The film also has its inaccuracies due to the script being sacked and re-written. This goes in with the immense list of novel adaptations to the screen. The villain set-up is marvelous and then switches in full gear, leaving many questions and actually works to the films advantage. This film also houses one of the most grisly slaughter rooms seen in recent film. This one gives the original Texas Chainsaw Massacre a run for its money. Black House is a moderately effective film teeming with the stereotypical thriller works, but manages to bring style to light.

-mAQ

GANTZ
GANTZ

Shinsuke Sato (2011)

If I could list one archetype I'm never pleased to commune with it, it would be an avid Anime fan. Rather, anyone so obsessed with Eastern culture that they feel this profound itching to venture to a Sanrio store to pick up Pocky or a bottle of Ramune. These rabid fans cling to their manga and 25 dollars-a-volume-disc containing three episodes of their recent Japanese animated obsession. For me, this was a niche I spent most of high school struggling to avoid. It seemed no matter where I ran off to, cat ears or skunk tails twitched atop heads and derrières. I finally settled on a specific series as an introduction, however. When a friend boasting tastes I knew not to be poisonous summed up Hiroya Oku's Gantz in a nutshell, I had become smitten with the general outline. What about an after-life spent slaving over the corpses of aliens with advanced weaponry and lavish nudity/violence doesn't appeal to your palate? Regardless, the tale of Gantz that was serialized with hand-drawings was something unique and addictive. This live-action abomination does nothing in place of what the original Gantz had strewn about with precision.

For any of you out of the loop, Gantz (2011) is a film you wouldn't want to happen upon without prior knowledge to the more intricate mechanics of the series. The basis of Gantz involves two old friends reunited in death, obliterated by a subway train after saving a drunken vagrant who stumbled onto the tracks. Upon death, they are warped into an empty apartment high above the city, overlooking the Tokyo Tower. Among Kei and Kato are other recently deceased patrons and a obsidian sphere. This sphere is known as Gantz and is outfitted with a hostile and cynical conscious towards its participants. Not much else is known about the game, other than they have a time limit to execute aliens scattered around the city in an alternate realm. Taking something so wrapped up in childish fantasies of senseless brutality and sneering sexual overtones should be very easy to replicate within film, that is, before the plot really kicks into gear. The fact that the two lead characters are students should lend to their blossoming and whiny characteristics. However, in the live-action Gantz interpretation, our characters are very passive, only to flex hints of inspiration accordingly to the scene of combat. Which brings up the atrocity committed to our lead character, Kei.

At the very beginning of the show, Kei was animated as an insolent pervert who often fantasized about his teacher and classmates in the nude. The thesis of Gantz was built around his rite of passage; losing his virginity. So already Gantz has one over the average animated science fiction actioner. It caters to both adults and those experiencing puberty which leaves it effortlessly accessible to any demographic. Kei eventually becomes desensitized to the plight of the expendable "refills" Gantz accordingly drops into the room. As the mysterious character Nishi before him, Kei will not be bothered to explain repeatedly that they're trapped within an alien purgatory. After all, who would believe him or anything of the other babbling contestants limited to hysterics? Naturally, Gantz (2011) fits the bill bestowed upon most all other live action films based on anime. These characters were created solely as cartoons, therefore inheriting outlandish features and personality traits that should not, in any case, ever be replicated onto film. For example, take L's character in either Death Note film. The "wacky", untamed eccentricity can only go so far before being limited by flesh. This very same logic applies to every character within Gantz (2011). The director Shinsuke Sato cared enough to cast several characters that were obviously modeled after the drawings. This was all in vain though for the prominently white features of the persons within the series/manga do not translate to the Yellowkin within the film.

Reprising my statement towards the emptiness of Kei's character, in the film, we're only given two instances of a possible sexual side to our hero. No longer bellicose, Kei glances at a subway advertisement depicting a woman in the nude and in a scene with Kishimoto, he grabs a condom. A character included in the series, Sakuraoka, whom Kei has sex with in spite of Kishimoto's willingness to childhood friend, Kato, does not exist in this canon. This in turn renders Kei just as flaccid an attribute to Gantz (2011) as is the disappearance of rules and limitation to their game; mainly, the boundaries of the fight and the strange realm they exist in. The realm in which your actions affect the surroundings on both planes as well as your incarnation being invisible to the human eye. These elements are largely ignored by Shinsuke Sato, who must have been whistling a tune while approving the screenplay. It is also my firm belief that the Japanese are without an acting pool, so to speak. Most every Japanese film features unbearable facial gestures and Gantz (2011) is no stranger to this. The enigmatic Nishi contorts his jaw in a sarcastic manner as if to belittle his opponent. Absent in the show, the only thing this addition provides is a bit of irritating culture shock to even the most jaded Eastern film connoisseur.

Gantz (2011) is a complete, all around failure. It has absolutely no redeeming qualities save for the brief and disconnected scenes of alien mayhem. The absence of many characters could easily be overlooked on my part but I find myself so perturbed at the general embodiment of flesh within Gantz. For being a fan of the animated show, the release of this film marks a sad day for fans of Gantz worldwide, even if they are sniveling parasites wearing eyeliner and hair extensions. The strange lack of sexuality and even nudity strips Gantz (2011) of the very things that made up its grandiose package of teenage masturbatory fantasies including attempted rape, weaponry that triggers a delayed implosion effect, and attitude. Gantz (2011) is a lifeless being, devoid of any substantial traits as its predecessor boasted lovingly and I am not looking forward to its sequel. This is something that cannot be realized within the confines of reality.

GANTZ

Something as seamless and open-ended as animation is exactly why the more ludicrous ideas are transposed on paper and not celluloid. Leave this one to the artists.

-mAQ

THE PHANTOM OF REGULAR SIZE

Shinya Tsukamoto (1986)

AKA Futsu saizu no kaijin This film, more than likely, won't ring any bells or sound familiar at all. The Phantom of Regular Size is actually the prototype of the classic cyberpunk film Tetsuo: The Iron Man. Seeing as it's a rough draft of sorts, there are differences aplenty. The soundtrack is completely different. Most of it rests on an early theme from Chu Ishikawa. Rather than it being industrial sounding with clanking and pistons, it sounds more produced. The rest of the soundtrack is composed of weird grinding noises with some English lyrics in the background. This soundtrack in no way is comparable to the finished product but the tribal harmonics are enjoyable. The finished product of Tetsuo focused more on the entity of flesh fused with metal, whereas his early vision was more of a metal inspiration. Perhaps his inspirations changed course after viewing Cronenberg's Videodrome. In The Phantom of Regular Size, jaunty metal protrudes from yellow flesh and covers most of his body. In Tetsuo, we are given the black & white treatment, mixed with body sores that are masking metal. Dreamlike cognizance is the formula for his madcap Super8 adventures. Shinya Tsukamoto made homosexuality a relevant cause in Tetsuo, but masked it well. In his prior outing, he manages to create some darkly provocative scenes, such as when Salaryman drills his wife, Tsukamoto comes up behind him and grabs his drill penis while giggling. The plot is much more linear in this short. When you watch this film, make sure to watch Tetsuo again because a lot will be explained. While Tetsuo is more on the visually erotic side, The Phantom of Regular Size manages to at least give out a small percent of the original thoughts on viewing his masterpiece. Tsukamoto is a hard person to analyze. His contributions to cinema seem unprovoked. Perhaps that is why when I saw a Woody Allen poster in his room during this short, I was shocked and had to pause the film. The effects are amateurish and can be dismissed. The drill penis scene is more primal and results in a lustful rape and the untimely death of his girlfriend. After viewing this, there is no doubt that Tetsuo is the homosexual's surreal metal masterpiece.

-Maq

DENCHU KOZO NO BOKEN
DENCHU KOZO NO BOKEN

Shinya Tsukamoto (1987) The title might not seem familiar to you but if you have seen Tsukamoto's cult film TETSUO, you will recognize many scenes of this to be on the TV screen in TETSUO. This is one of his earlier Super 8 SHORT films. This film isn't perfect but it is highly entertaining while keeping the art and surrealism in place and can be viewed as a stepping stone to his genius personified in TETSUO. This title is about 47 minutes in length and has circulated the trader's circle under the title of "THE ADVENTURES OF ELECTRIC ROD BOY" The film opens up with a young man with an electric rod protruding out of his back. It gives him clumsy characteristics and has made him the target of the school bullies. His female friend Momo scares away the kids and in return, he gives her a time machine. Not before using it accidentally and whisking himself to 25 years in the future. This wouldn't be too bad if the world wasn't overtaken by metal vampires who have started an experiment named Adam that wipes out all natural light. It is now up to Electric Rod boy, who is from a long line of similar messiahs, to cleanse the future and spread his legacy through out time. Apart from having a funny story, the film bares Tsukamoto's trademark stop-motion animation and the wonderful surrealism that has left an impact on his entire filmography. From A Snake of June to Tetsuo II, his influence spreads through his career similar to Cronenberg's. This one strays from its bleak feel and dabbles in a bit of black comedy. This atmospheric science-fiction film is also outfitted with a wonderful score that fits very well. Expect many stop-motion chase scenes and pre-puberty rape scenes. This is the most interesting vampire tale i have seen. Not since Vision's of Suffering have i seen such an avant-garde vampire tale.

-Maq

TETSUO II: BODY HAMMER

Shinya Tsukamoto (1992)

With a lack of continuity and a thematic indulgence in reincarnation, Shinya Tsukamoto returned to his esteemed cyberpunk steam which spread like a panicked wave through cult and arthouse circuits with the smithy-porn Tetsuo II: Body Hammer. The idea on paper reads as such, juxtaposing itself alongside the original homoerotic male rapture aided with fleshy physicality that we all know as Tetsuo: the Iron Man, Body Hammer concerns itself as an allegory on reincarnation if you will, same characters grown up with different connections and an all too similar string of genetics. Perhaps lay blame on the subversive assimilation into one rusted being at the climax of the original. Both the roles of Tomorowo Taguchi and Shinya Tsukamoto as the salaryman and Yatsu, respectively, are reprised by the same actors from the original Tetsuo film. The metal fetishist, however, is given a name and a past. Branded as Yatsu and adorning the same shirt with an "X" emblazoned upon it, Yatsu is the skinhead leader of a group of bodybuilders who seek the scholarly fortunes of an elderly scientist in order to create the godlike body mechanics artificially. Or something along those lines.

As Tsukamoto and top film analysts would spread it, Body Hammer isn't a sequel but an evolution of both character and the regurgitated-and-not-improved aesthetic used within, which sadly, siphons most of the originals mark left upon the initial viewing. The stakes were certainly raised with the promise of a sequel, both on and off the set. With a salaryman confined in a sterile and concrete building instead of a sweaty shack, the bourgeois household and family matters are put to work quite efficiently. That is, before Tsukamoto bleeds this sequel like a stuck pig expecting expectations to be forgotten and weeding every promising aspect in favor for a sordid creature feature towards the end with coherence and narrative despite the successful nature of the sensory-overload that is the Iron Man. Not just the notion of ousting black and white in favor of a smeared color palette yet to be perfected, but for removing the blatant sexuality of the original in an attempt to channel pre-Tokyo Fist idealizations of macabre masculinity.

Foremost, color was never meant to be existent in the universe of Tetsuo. The grainy and obscured visuals of steaming coils, leaking faucets, and wire-rotting junk atop sordid soil was breathing the monochromatic horrors that Tetsuo: The Iron Man effortlessly exposed in a daring and culturally unheard-of fashion. The addition of hues flattens the lucid transgressions of the oddity that was the Tetsuo namesake. To set further in motion and to evolve my previous argument of narrative, Tetsuo II is more of a film than the original film ever aspired to be. With theories of gangs turned to manifesting flesh alchemy and the surplus scenes of tripe chest-piece manipulations with body cannons exploding with roadside sparklers and soaked fireworks, Body Hammer is not to be taken as a serious project. Perhaps a foot in the door as an aspiring film maker and not just an extended music video project for Chu Ishikawa's incredible hammer-to-anvil noisemakings, our pal Shinya has (decidingly) created some stale, albeit enjoyable, creations but Tetsuo II: Body Hammer finds no time to entertain except for a handful of scenes. Proving to be a failure on near all fronts, Ishikawa's return to scoring the post-science world of the Iron-beings is a haggard attempt at "evolving" the now "advanced" prototype of real industrial. Given inspiration from a poster with frogs(?), Ishikawa's ideal representation of the soundtrack to Tetsuo II sounds more as if a Super Nintendo track was recorded in midi format under several feet of water.

TETSUO II: BODY HAMMER

Tetsuo II: Body Hammer lives up to neither the title of Body Hammer or Tetsuo. As later experienced in the break-up masterpiece Tokyo Fist, Tsukamoto's obsession with bulging and grotesque muscles was still premature in the womb. With the exception of a couple of training montages, Body Hammer's addiction to the physique is quite absent and is perhaps rotting somewhere on a cutting room floor. The skinheads involvement in the film is quite absent and serves as a preinvention of the parable, Tokyo Fist - the perfected worship of dripping machismo. Body Hammer opens a note of remote tangency compared to the affable circus-scud of the predecessor. A salaryman in his marble chamber, a solid life in contrast to the squalid exploits of Taniguchi past. To break formation and sing some praise, the first 40 minutes is wholly better than the terrible drivel that makes up the climax and Tsukamoto is best to reference the first sequel as a portfolio for some terrific arm mutations and exquisite practical effects in an era that is overrun by the need for computers and technology to run rampant over expression. That being said, if you admire the audacity of the groundbreaking precursor, avoid at most costs.

-mAQ

TOKYO FIST

Shinya Tsukamoto (1995)

It has been said that authors only have one book in them and usually keep writing the same book but in a different way. To some degree, I think that is also true with auteur filmmakers. Japanese film director Shinya Tsukamoto is probably best known for his cyberpunk masterpiece Tetsuo: The Iron Man. Twice, Tsukamoto has tried and failed to recapture the hypnotic industrial majesty of Tetsuo: The Iron Man with two very forgettable sequels. Finally, with Tokyo Fist, a boxing film, Tsukamoto was able to once again capture the misery but eventual triumph of a bodily transformation that was so beautifully yet grotesquely expressed in Tetsuo: The Iron Man. Like Tetsuo: The Iron Man, the protagonist of Tokyo Fist is trapped in a world of abstract industry and technology. Only with an atavistic reawakening of nature can both protagonists in each film reclaim what is so organically theirs. In Tetsuo: The Iron Man, the protagonist turns into a machine and decides to destroy industrialized Tokyo, his only true option for reclaiming nature. In Tokyo Fist, the protagonist bulks up (pure muscle, no metal needed) and becomes an excellent fighter so he can destroy his former friend in a desperate attempt at winning back his ungrateful fiancée.

No matter how well a woman deceives herself (often marrying a man because of his prestige and income), she is still an instinctive animal that is attracted to testosterone and muscles. In Tokyo Fist, the fiancée (Hizuru) of the film's protagonist Tsudo (played by Tsukamoto) decides to leave her man when an aggressive boxer named Kojima (played by Shinya Tsukamoto's brother) beats up her husband-to-be. After all, her fiancé Tsudo lives a mechanical and monotonous life selling insurance door-to-door and there is surely nothing exciting about that. Unfortunately for infatuated Hizuru, Kojima is only interested in getting close to Tsudo and the traitorous woman is merely used as bait. Due to creaming her pants out of excitement, after seeing Kojima's undisputable martial prowess and ability to kick her fiancé's tiny Jap ass, Hizuru violently pierces her own ears and even gets a tribal tattoo on her arm. The psychological/physical transformation of his dame becomes a great concern for Tsudo and he decides pushing his fists (instead of just pencils) will be the way to get back his wife.

I never expected the Japanese to be great boxers but Tokyo Fist certainly packs cinematic punches. Unsurprisingly, the film is full of the quick hitting editing that originally helped gain notoriety for Tetsuo: The Iron Man. There is no doubt in my mind that boxing (like metal) is a fetish of director Shinya Tsukamoto. Right from the beginning of Tokyo Fist, the boxer Kojima and his body becomes highly stylized. If there ever was a director that could make the gushing of blood a poetic art, it is Shinya Tsukamoto as the film Tokyo Fist testifies to. In philosophy, Tokyo Fist is a lot like the overrated film Fight Club but only less blatant (yet more blatantly homoerotic) in the way Tsukamoto was able to execute the film. Only by reclaiming their masculinity can the men in both of these films feel content in a world of cosmopolitanism and technological bureaucracy. A great example of the celebration of masculinity featured in Tokyo Fist is when Hizuru tells Kojima to forget about the boxing match, he states, "You'll be my foe in the ring? Since when do you have balls?" After Tsudo starts to bulk up and beat men to a savage pulp, Kojima surprisingly begins to realize his life is at stake. When Hizuru happily cheers on Kojima in regards to the boxing match with Tsudo, Kojima angrily yells, "You stupid bitch, you know nothing about it. A human life is at stake." Whereas Kojima only wanted to make a man out of his friend, Tsudo is ready to battle to the death, all because of a woman that could care less about which man is left dead.

TOKYO FIST

At the end of Tokyo Fist, Tsudo is left with one-eye but he now carries a smile of confidence that he lacked at the beginning of the film. Technological Tokyo almost completely effeminized Tsudo but it took a deadly challenge with a caring friend to reawaken the man that was trapped in his emaciated body. Unlike Martin Scorsese's Raging Bull, Tokyo Fist is paced well enough to work as a boxing film and makes Scorsese's film feel like ungraciously aged antiquated cinema by comparison. In his Futurist Manifesto, F. T. Marinetti wrote "Beauty exists only in struggle. There is no masterpiece that has not an aggressive character. Poetry must be a violent assault on the forces of the unknown, to force them to bow before man." Tokyo Fist is certainly a film that makes poetry out of violence, no doubt a lesson for your typical samurai-lapsed Americanized Japanese man to learn from.

-Ty E

BULLET BALLET

Shinya Tsukamoto (1999)

Existing on the fringes of cinema is Shinya Tsukamoto, the Japanese nothing-but-an-auteur who (arguably) developed the resolute be-all end-all body horror in its finalized and post-cocooned state. With such a bevy of silver horrors underneath his exasperated arms, Tsukamoto set out to tackle the Japanese youth rebel boom of the 90s. Following in the wake of the mutinous children, Bullet Ballet, Battle Royale, and much more were created to chronicle the horrors of moonlighting young killers. Ordinary teenagers by day with jobs beneficial to the community of Tokyo as a whole (or so they thought), only to turn into rough-tough muggers, looters, and overall monsters who seek a supposed rapture of youth through sex, drugs, and violence. Supposedly Tsukamoto was mugged by a gang of the aforementioned. Like the absolute madman that he is, he didn't resist or pity himself. Feigning confrontation even with his peak physical condition, he observes their actions, their emotions, possibly the wild excitement in their eyes. This is the same voyeuristic approach from Tsukamoto that I'd expect nothing less of, especially from the famous Japanese auteur with his disillusioned peace-in-rebellion mindset. After the dust and fear settle, Bullet Ballet is born . . . in a frenzied statement and fictional documentation on the addicting pleasures of anarchy. But every rose has its thorn, as Douglas Jerrold put it, free from context. The question is, does Bullet Ballet qualify as entertainment?

First and foremost, Bullet Ballet is as wonderfully in touch with the flickering brilliance of black and white as demonstrated in A Snake of June and the better half of Tsukamoto's poetic yet fluctuating career. Chu Ishikawa marks his frequent return in most of all Tsukamoto's works and doesn't disappoint with the resurgence of his trademark twisting and hammering metal in a noise-punk admittance of layered guitar additions. With the aesthetic dissected from Tetsuo and the better half of his early Super8 shorts, Bullet Ballet looks and feels the way a black & white film regarding the regression of anger but cannot fit the part of a classic example of experimental Japanese filmmaking. The story revolves around a self-centered television executive who stumbles home in a stupor only to realize that his girlfriend of ten years committed suicide. Unable to come to grips with the resonating fact that her death is at the hands of his oblivious and domicile nature, Goda becomes enraged and seeks to find the exact model of gun, the .38 special, so he too can commit suicide. This was the plan, however, until he gets mixed up with a gang of youthful and irritable speed-freaks.

(Tetsuo: the Iron Man)

(Bullet Ballet)

Rather than sticking straight with the fetishism of metal and the likes, Tsukamoto hones it down to a specific artistry of steel - guns. The gun metal fixation from Goda presents some very serious symptoms of Taxi Driver melodrama with the scene of phallic extensions from his self-goading in the mirror to the shirtless pantomime trigger-teasings, it's obvious that Bullet Ballet was made with a special significant nod to the Western cultures while steadily embracing the Eastern side of things, mainly referring to the great lengths and difficulties Goda endures to finally land his hands on his prized possession, whereas it's remarkably easy to purchase a weapon in the States. After stumbling upon a young punk named Chisato, whom Goda rescued from falling on the subway tracks days earlier, Goda is tormented by her and the gang religiously, being mugged and beaten over the course of the entire run time. Strangely, I feel no sorrow towards Goda in the slightest making Bullet Ballet seem like a nicely shot student film with a budget fit nicely behind it. Perhaps it's this or the wistful fact that Chisato reminds me of an old flame - so blindly wrapped in selfish exploits proceeding a future fueled by "art" and circlejerk meditation on photography, all the while juggling men to both extremes of friendship and romantic entanglement. These ample musings of the hipster millennium crowd are the driving force behind my indifference to the character of Chisato and her fate.

BULLET BALLEt

Many flaws surround Bullet Ballet, whether it's the pedestrian filling surrounded by an excellent opening and climax, the events transpiring in the midst of this dark drama are ultimately forgettable and not worth even viewing. For lack of a better description, Bullet Ballet is a lost idea, wandering alone on a desolate stretch of highway with no real place to go but to follow asphalt. Following the temperament of Tetsuo: the Iron Man, the camerawork becomes frenetic during periods of high volume, so much that what action and throttled stress does compose within Bullet Ballet is strewn across the screen wildly leaving me bewildered and wondering what just happened. Rather than dismissing Bullet Ballet as the weaker film of Tsukamoto's art archives, I find myself able to compassionately appreciate this ill-received film as an exorcism of conflicting ideas of youth and violence and violent youth.

Only in the final ten minutes does Bullet Ballet even out and become a moving work of beauty. The mistakes we make and the consequences we hope to escape are brought to the stand. Tsukamoto created this rapid descent in quality with a fervor that I must commend and in part to his signature promise of bringing it all together in the end. If not as a rousing piece of entertainment, then certainly Bullet Ballet can be transcribed as an ill-sought meditation on the aggravated assimilation into the violent underbelly of the mutinous city inhabitants. Bullet Ballet is perhaps his weakest solid effort, not counting the visual afterbirth that is Tetsuo II: Body Hammer, but regardless of the quality (or lack thereof) Bullet Ballet is still a consequential ceasefire to the rampant youth of Japan. What better way to retaliate upon a large group of people than to construct a film showing them in their most instinctive and amorous state.

-mAQ

TETSUO: THE BULLET MAN

Shinya Tsukamoto (2009)

The finished product of Tetsuo: The Bullet Man seems to be up in the air for viewers and fans of the original groundbreaking Japanese film. Some see it as a rehash of the original with newborn steel while general consensus sees it as it really is; uninspired, contrived, ultimately a dismal failure on all planes of production. Only in the last 15 minutes does this 80 minute kindergarten class for expired surrealism repay the incredible support given to Tsukamoto by the art-house collective. Touted and sickly spread as being canon to only the first film, these ideologies of Raimi's whiteboard-wipe Evil Dead II tactic are fruitless pleas to direct attention to something undeserving of the most trivial festival award. Bullet Man is no more a continuation to Iron Man as Halloween III: Season of the Witch is to the Carpenter original. Taking chunk sectors of Body Hammer and expanding them vicariously, all to an ill effect, is the crime guilty of severe punishment. The Tetsuo condition worked amply enough as a spiritual and physical possession, not some traced cliché of a government funded scientific project, and that is the core concept in a new metal shell.

White scientist uses an attractive assistant to the Tetsuo Project, little does she know she is associating in the creation and corruption of genome into a biological weapon. Sort of like the Guyver except nowhere near as cool. A generation later, salaryman reborn but married to a Japanese hypochondriac who prophetically suffers from dreams of their son being murdered. He then is. Rather than stocking up on wholesale sympathy as Tsukamoto should have done to somewhat give the story emotional padding, Tsukamoto breaks out neo-romance as utilized in Tokyo Fist and to a similar degree, the wife becomes disgusted with Anthony's weak visage and attempts to impart her own vengeance on her son's mysterious murderer. Cue in Tsukamoto's reprisal of The Guy. Only in these scenes does something of a clout situate the steady leak Bullet Man suffers from since the show start. The Guy is as aimless as ever. In Iron Man, a purpose was served and punishment was carried out. Post-Iron Man, be that as it may, marks the feminization of metal and homoeroticism void. Too bad Shinya had to tuck his yellow tail in between his legs for he captured something as equally psychotic as the people who appreciate his rabid streams-of-consciousness. But to give sparse recognition, the action in Tetsuo: The Bullet Man is well-shot with much energy to spare. Previous metamorphosis of Tetsuo, however, against the glaringly sterile Toyko cityscape, are obviously rubberized and no longer echo coils, rust, and sewage pipes. Wave goodbye to the raw rust aesthetic that popularized the first two of the Tetsuo (now)trilogy. In its place is stock footage and re-shootings of key scenes from the first Tetsuo and added with the format of Digital, really proves a shocking blow to experimental integrity of DIY filmmakers around the globe.

TETSUO: THE BULLET MAN

Making a return is Chu Ishikawa to score the film with his once-inspiring piston-repetition and slamming synth beats to reflect industrial labor. But something is amidst, Ishikawa's score for Iron Man was grainy, deconstructed, and hazardous. But this trite excuse of redoing something that was always perfect is indefensible to this now-digitally filtered and smooth soundtrack that reeks of glazed electronica. Consider me unimpressed throughout. However, Trent Reznor and Shinya Tsukamoto finally got together to do that collaboration they had been talking of since before the release of Body Hammer. Perhaps if I was a Nine Inch Nails fan, would I have more to speak on but for now it's simple facts. These include the vast departure taken from the soul of steel. A mint filtering has been applied to the busy streets of Japan which neglects the spirit of Tetsuo entirely and debunks Tsukamoto's previous obsession with sweat. Where Tetsuo: The Iron Man reflected major elements of The Fly, Bullet Man clearly mirrors The Incredible Hulk, what with his infinite power, infinite rage element about him. And that is precisely what Tetsuo has become - a superhero.

It's sad to surrender so soon for Tsukamoto's career but it's becoming increasingly apparent that through the years, his heart softens and his once youthful rage and vision have become replaced with luxuries and family reconciling. After countless classics, after the warmth of kinetic hostility and psychosexual behavior spiced with fetishism, it all comes to an end due to an Americanized Tetsuo for the brainwashed masses. Accessible? Maybe, but the likes of which will never be on par to Tokyo Fist, Tetsuo: The Iron Man, A Snake of June, or, dare I say it, Bullet Ballet. Tetsuo: The Bullet Man isn't a final encore to body horror nor does it indulge in a pleasurable universe. I never push perfection but this is so far from it. Bullet Man serves as an obituary for Tsukamoto's artistic prowess. Rest in peace, Iron Man. We hardly knew ye.

Tetsuo: The Iron Man ≠ Tetsuo: The Bullet Man

-mAQ

S/&M HUNTER

Shūji Kataoka (1987)

Bondage and Superhero are two terms that normally don't mix unless you are viewing Sentai pinku or digging deep enough in Japanese fetishdom. Since both S&M Hunter and Sentai pinku come from the same culture, maybe it's best that you familiarize yourself with the term pinku and the variety of pleasurable oddities it provides. Pinku is a style of softcore theatrical film. Most catering to the fetishists in us. Always vulgar and always appealing, even in a disgusting sense. The most popular subsidiary's of pinku include rape and Japanese rope bondage, which is a lost art. This is how S&M Hunter springs to mind. A caped bondage superhero simply dubbed S&M Hunter has been recruited by a man to retrieve his gay partner from an all girl gang called The Bombers. These women have kidnapped his partner for forced sex in order to get back at the species they hate; men. These fiery feminazis (taken too literal at one point) have literally been raping the kidnapped man for days. Now this may be every mans dream. Naked women arm-wrestling over a blade towards the prize of fucking a male that is submitted on a table with no where to go. These leatherheads claim to hate men but their actions prove they are needed. This is a recurring message throughout S&M Hunter. Despite being sexy smut, S&M Hunter is laced with intricate lines from what could be poetry detailing the weaker traits of the female. S&M Hunter is yet another showcase of the Japanese obsession with Nazi regalia. In most pinku films, the swastika flows freely as a sign of forecoming and current themes rooted in breaking taboos. S&M Hunter is a vulgar exercise in the art of the fetish. While letting off a scent of the serious topic, things get increasingly wacky, creating a manga-like experience for all those that are involved. A low budget badge is something to wear proud. The effects of the rope play are prodigious, only strengthened by the enigmatic anti-lead of the S&M Hunter. Just when things were looking rough for the pinku market on American soil, the new office of Pink Eiga has opened up, thus opening our options extremely in turn. Sporting such provocative and outrageous material as Semen Demon and Whore Hospital, my only recommendation for this company is to pick up the license for the masterpiece of pinku cinema - Captured for Sex 2. S&M Hunter is everything that I could imagine or desire from a self-referential sex piece that features wonderful rope artistry. And the finale where the Dungeon Master's revelation considers you, the viewer, to be the ultimate sadist? That's a legendary scene in meta film making. If you weren't a sadist, why else would you be curious about a film such as this?

-mAQ

EMPEROR TOMATO KETCHUP
EMPEROR TOMATO KETCHUP

Shūji Terayama (1971)

While Japanese culture and cinema is full of all sort of sick and seemingly nonsensical scatological imagery, including petite ladies with big bulging pricks, feces-fueled necrophilia, electric robot sodomy, lesbian nuns with unholy uses for cock-sized crucifixes, and just about any unhinged rape scenario that one could ever imagine, radical Japanese Renaissance man Shūji Terayama's dystopian avant-garde trash piece Emperor Tomato Ketchup (1971) aka Tomato Ketchup Kōtei—a work that was originally only as a short film at 27 minutes upon initial release in 1971, but was later edited into a 75 minute feature (modeled after a lost 1970 "director's cut") in 1996, 13 years after the director's death—is certainly a standout work in terms of seemingly lunatic Jap libertinage. A dual assault against both the left-wing and right-wing that were making news around the time of the film's release, especially novelist Yukio Mishima and his failed coup and tragic suicide, Emperor Tomato Ketchup is nothing short of being an absurd and aberrantly audacious piece of celluloid aesthetic anarchy about deranged children in revolt who have taken over the Japanese empire and carry out cruel revenge against adults in the name of "children's joy." Featuring totally taboo images of borderline child pornography, including adult women that look like asiatic Werner Schroeter-esque drag queens fondling grade school boys and boy soldiers supping on mature diva nipples, Emperor Tomato Ketchup is as offensive and morally repugnant as films come, even putting Dušan Makavejev's Sweet Movie (1974) to shame in terms of its woman-whippersnapper wantonness and exceedingly erratic esoteric political message of the quasi-incoherent variety. Described by director Shūji Terayama himself as, "A joke but not a comedy," Emperor Tomato Ketchup is like Lord of the Flies meets Harmony Korine's Gummo (1997) as a sort of superlatively scatological and sadomasochistic children's film for the apocalypse made for infantile and hedonistic adults of the putrid postmodern age. Unlike his keenly kaleidoscopic works like Pastoral: To Die in the Country (1974) and Fruits of Passion (1981), Emperor Tomato Ketchup is an innately amateurishly directed black-and-white (although later color-tinted) work with unwaveringly gritty footage that is oftentimes overexposed and even indiscernible that looks somewhere in between an early 1960s 'pink film' (softcore porn) and an archaic silent film from the birth of cinema as assembled in post-samurai Japanese Sodom by Satan himself after overdosing on bath salts. For better or worse, Emperor Tomato Ketchup is certainly the sort of uniquely uncompromising celluloid that reminds cinephiles of the power of cinema as a potentially unsettling and subversive art, even if it looks like it was directed by some of the bloodthirsty rebellious youths that star in it.

As one learns towards the 'zany' conclusion of Emperor Tomato Ketchup, "if you have a beard, you can have an empire," even if you're a 7-year-old sadist with a fake beard. Resembling Werner Herzog's kraut cult classic Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) in its crude pseudo-cinéma vérité aesthetic, except all the more anarchic and socially deformed, Emperor Tomato Ketchup depicts what might happen if a bunch of jaded Jap youth were to run a successful revolution and restore the Japanese empire, albeit with an infantile hedonistic focus on aberrant activities you might expect from youngsters who were the victims of sexual abuse might perversely partake in. In the name of some delusional God that seems to have an Adderall-addled persuasion, loves having fun with feces, and engaging in subversion for subversion's sake and self-indulgence for self-indulgence's sake, children as a collective are king and have the following freedoms: freedom of conspiracy, freedom of treason, freedom to practice sodomy, and the freedom to use the bible as toilet paper. Opening with a dubious quote from Karl Marx's Das Kapital, "Capitalism is destroyed at the base if its motive is pleasure, not the accumulation of wealth" as if one of the main motivations of achieving wealth was not the desire to achieve pleasure, and featuring a pretty pink pastel pecker on the title scene thus indicating neo-pagan worship of the phallic, Emperor Tomato Ketchup immediately establishes an antagonism for what seems to be American capitalism and the so-called sexual revolution it ultimately helped sire. In the film, the nice and cheap blood-colored condiment ketchup is the sacred national symbol in the eccentric empire of oversexed child killers with a keen proclivity for camp aesthetics. As the true people and proletariat, the child rulers have declared false messiahs like Mao and Marx, as well as Jean Harlow and Mikhail Bakunin, to be enemies of the state. Fairy-like ladies in goofy wigs and preposterous pancake make-up provide sacred sexual rites and carnal knowledge to novice child nymphomaniacs and any adult that makes the mistake of impeding on a kid's right to eat, fuck, or fight is executed without mercy. For the upper echelons of the militaristic child society, absurdist and sadomasochistic games of "rock-paper-scissors" (or "Janken-pon" in Japanese) are played to the death and one especially heated game is played by a Jap imperialist and a Jap nazi with a sacred swastika armband, who drop rocks and trash in one another's underwear, but not before engaged in a strikingly scatological game of gymnastic sodomy. Language has also been revamped and defined by the kiddy rebellion. For example, the word "cat" has many new and inventive definitions, including (but not limited to): "Cats are...ruminators with excessive hair growth...carnivores that can't be eaten...mystery authors who don't write...hedonists with no property...the only political domestic animals...descendants of Machiavelli..." Clearly inspired by Yukio Mishima and his early predilection to sexual perversion, the children also engage in S&M bondage, tying up statuesque naked individuals with a sculpture-like physique and putting them on display for all to see, while more grotesque adult's corpses are merely dragged through the streets like dogs. If America destroyed irreplaceable buildings, monuments, and aristocratic DNA when they nuked and firebombed the Japanese into the oblivion and infected with the country with a cannibalistic blend of consumer-based capitalism, the creepy yet strangely charismatic kids of Emperor Tomato Ketchup have undoubtedly secured the apocalyptic end of the alpha-East-Asian race.

EMPEROR TOMATO KETCHUP

As a man who once brazenly admitted that Yukio Mishima “should have died at cherry blossom time” (apparently a reference to the fact that Japanese fighter pilots reference to themselves as “falling cherry blossoms”) and with a depiction of a muscular man in bondage that is clearly modeled after the ill-fated novelist, it is quite clear that director Shūji Terayama used Emperor Tomato Ketchup as both an aesthetic (no matter how perverse Mishima’s literature ever was, it pales in comparison to the film) and thematic assault against the writer’s desire for Japan to return to the way of the samurai and restoring the order of the ancient emperor. Of course, while depicting Mishima as an outmoded fool who promoted an anachronistic worldview, Emperor Tomato Ketchup is no more flattering to Trotskyite types who made up a large segment of revolutionary leftist types in Japan at that time. Groups like the “Sekigunha” (aka Japanese Communist League-Red Army Faction), who desired a permanent global revolution, not unlike those in Germany at that time (Red Army Faction aka Baader-Meinhof Group), were engaged in much more treacherous and deleterious activity than Mishima ever was, including plane hijackings, hostage taking, and coldblooded political murders; the sort of idiotic behavior quite reflective of the crazy children of Emperor Tomato Ketchup—a film that portrays Japan as a maniac microcosm where lack of self-control is used as a pretext for sexual savagery and social insanity. The irony of these loony leftists in Japan at the time is, while loathing their parents for their the Rape of Nanking and what not during the Second World, their behavior was no less violent than their parents, which director Terayama symbolically portrays via Nazi armbands on a boy general in Emperor Tomato Ketchup. Indeed, like the German leftists of the late-1960s, the Japanese Marxist epitomized self-loathing and ethno-masochism to an ungodly extreme, so it is no mistake that the Tomato Ketchup Constitution includes the line: “We despise Our Imperial lineage.” Even in the context of Emperor Tomato Ketchup, if Mishima was a sexually depraved reactionary then the Marxist left was merely retarded.

A self-described, “revolutionary terrorist of the imagination,” Shūji Terayama proved with Emperor Tomato Ketchup that he was very capable of celluloid iconoclasm in its purest form, yet the film is far from his greatest work as a filmmaker, even if it is his most arcane, anarchistic, and unrelenting work. An S&M and scat-driven satire of the most sardonic, subversive, and snarky sort, Emperor Tomato Ketchup is in good company with the films of Christoph Schlingensiefel (Mutters Maske, The German Chainsaw Massacre), Dušan Makavejev (W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism, The Coca-Cola Kid), and even Paul Morrissey (Trash, Madame Wang's), though something will undoubtedly be 'lost in translation' to Occidental viewers. If nothing else, Emperor Tomato Ketchup provides evidence that there might be more to the foul fetishistic fixations some Japanese have for eyes in vaginas and filming themselves molesting young girls in public.

-Ty E

PASTORAL: TO DIE IN THE COUNTRY
PASTORAL: TO DIE IN THE COUNTRY

Shūji Terayama (1974)

As far as I am concerned, Pastoral: To Die in the Country (1974) aka Pastoral Hide and Seek directed by Shūji Terayama – a work that manages to bring together the masterful technical precision and craftsmanship of Akira Kurosawa and Stanley Kubrick and the salient surrealism of auteur filmmakers like Arrabal and Buñuel – is one of the greatest, most original, and downright creepiest Japanese films ever created. Not only is Pastoral: To Die in the Country a film of Japanese origin but it is also a complex cultural dichotomy of ancient rural life and the technocratic Westernization of the tiny Übermensch Northeastern Asian nation and an intimate personal history of the country as expressed so vividly yet abstractly by Shūji Terayama. To say that each individual scene and segment of the film manages to illustrate critical issues that post-post-modern Japan is facing would be an one-sided understatement. Of course, being the refined artistic Renaissance man that he was, Terayama brings up these issues in a most wonderfully carnal-carnavalesque and self-indulgent manner that would even bring a blush to Maestro Fellini's tanned ½ Roman face in this brilliant film-within-a-film. Transcending all cinematic conventions, genres, and forms of storytelling, Pastoral: To Die in the Country is a work that revamps cinema in general and demands unwavering attention and commitment from the viewer. But more than anything, the film is Shūji Terayama's reflective post-pastoral quasi-tribute and personal-obituary to Japanese rural life and culture. Like fellow Japanese artist Yukio Mishima, Terayama especially focused on his awkward and hopelessly petrified adolescent encounters with members of the extra-fairer-fairer Japanese sex. In the city, the confessing protagonist is merely a nameless and faceless ant in an intimidating ant metropolis, but his disheartening past life in the country lives on in his memory as if the tortured souls of formerly known ghosts have taken residence in his often tormented mind.

In the world of Pastoral: To Die in the Country, mothers stare in joyous awe at their deceased fetuses, elder women rape young boys, bare-bottom beastesses/temptresses roam wild and the narrator contemplates killing his mother over 20 years after various traumas had taken place during his ominous adolescence. For the thoroughly perturbed protagonist, the past violently bleeds (both literally and figuratively) into the future. Whereas the rural world of Pastoral: To Die in the Country is a kaleidoscope of cut-throat colors and nefarious intrigue, the urban world is a culturally-retarded realm of restricting electronic-based banality where technology has seemingly trumped and triumphed over nature and has turned man into a mere insignificant cog in the machine. Unsurprisingly, this post-industrial phenomenon has left a somewhat appreciated hole in the soul of the protagonist. For most people, nostalgia is something to be cherished and retained, but for the protagonist of Pastoral: To Die in the Coun- try, past memories are an agonizing and tormenting army of ghosts who have taken his mind hostage. Despite all the unwanted memories that have conquered his mind, the protagonist also seems to have a vague bit of fondness for a past that he has no option of forgetting. Most violently tattooed on his mind's eye are the protagonist's various female encounters; the most penetrating being the unforgivable sins of his sadistic mother. As a child, the protagonist tells his mother, "Mommy, I want to get circumcised." Of course, this young man would grow up to live in a spiritually and culturally circumcised post-World War II Japan, a time and place where the ancient code of the Samurai was disposed of in a manner as careless and unsentimental as outdated technology. The folk of the protagonist's rural hometown also suffer from mental and physical degeneration as they no longer have the spirit and organic health that enabled the humble peasants of Akira Kurosawa's Seven Samurai (1954) to fight for the livelihood and preservation of their community. The world featured in Pastoral: To Die in the Country is certainly symbolic/symbiotic of German historian-philosopher Oswald Spengler's quote, "It is the Late city that first defies the land, contradicts Nature in the lines of its silhouette, denies all Nature. It wants to be something different from and higher than Nature. These high-pitched gables, these Baroque cupolas, spires, and pinnacles, neither are, nor desire to be, related with anything in Nature. And then begins the gigantic megalopolis, the city-as-world, which suffers nothing beside itself and sets about annihilating the country picture."

Pastoral: To Die in the Country is a work that certainly demands a lifetime's worth of re-viewings as the man who created certainly assembled of lifetime-size collection of autobiographical mise-en-scènes that encompass the joys of madness, misery, and menacing mammary glands. The fact that Pastoral: To Die in the Country remains a somewhat obscure work in the Occident is nothing short of baffling. Predating the Japanese Cyberpunk explosion by around a decade, Pastoral: To Die in the Country is certainly a first-class film that has failed to get its due as a revolutionary artistic and cultural work of the most grand cinematic kind. If it were not for Pastoral: To Die in the Country – a splendidly freaky flick that acknowledges the miserable death of the country and the birth of the technocratic bureaucracy – it is doubtful that the inevitable birth of the Cyberpunk genre would have been so timely, potent, and necessary. In short, Pastoral: To Die in the Country makes Akira Kurosawa's nostalgic Dreams (1990) seem like the innocent childlike recollections of a kindly old man suffering from Alzheimer's disease. I know if I ever live long enough to suffer the retarded delights of that mind-disintegrating old timer's disease, I will still be mentally cognizant enough to name Pastoral: To Die in the Country as my favorite film from the Land of the Rising Sun.

-Ty E

DEATH NOTE
DEATH NOTE

Shūsuke Kaneko (2006)

The fundamentals of making an adaptation aren't hard to abide by. Take a source topic, remain at least quasi-faithful, carry themes, and provide equal entertainment. The first live-action Death Note film does none of these things. It even goes as far as to stick up for its favorite film I Am Legend to make even worse special effects and incorporate abysmal CG in place of a story. The anime is something that i had recently become addicted to. Death Note (Anime) is something that i feel no shame in admitting that i loved it more than many things. At times it was frustrating and bleak, but it was also uncanny and intelligent; a quality that is more rare than the most perfect metals. The live-action takes the perfect elements and rusts them over with a dull coat of annoying-as-fuck Japanese teenagers. You might recognize the main character as well. He is well-known for playing the main bitch Shuya Nanahara in Battle Royale. In the first film, he ran from conflict, promoting pacifism and homosexuality both in the medium runtime. In the second, he was doing the same, except in a more violent way. No matter how many hair-metal sporting gooks he killed, it doesn't detract from his horrible acting. (Failed eccentricity) With Anime, everything is up to creative control. You might not like the obnoxious attitudes of the style of cartoon, but it presents the greatest colorful aesthetics around. Rain pounding on a busy street and lights illuminating the seedy slums; it's a beautiful thing. Light Yagami is an honorable student who discovers a "Death Note" on the ground. Many rules apply, but the gist is, the name you write in it, dies in a certain short time. It's more or less a Linkin Park infused soundtrack with some of the worst acting ever. In Anime, you can get away with ridiculous situations with the highlighted moving-background that is ever so common; it doesn't work so well in live-action. This film is no Ichi the Killer. Teen angst is abundant and is staler than the ever so well aged Heathers. In the show, the main conflict was 34+ episodes of an extended battle of wits and a shocking game of cat & mouse. This film is just over-styled heads drooling over case files. Gay. Moral of the story, kids; don't become power-hungry and waste your life. I cannot explain how the show made me feel, for it is completely different to the retarded workings of this rework. It doesn't even close off right for the sequel. Many things were changed for the worse. Oh, and L looks like a retard in this. True believers, Stay away!

-mAQ

CRACKLE OF TIME - CHRISTOPH SCHLINGENSIEF AND HIS OPERA VILLAGE IN BURKINA FASO

Sibylle Dahrendorf (2012)

As leftiŝt loon Marie-Hélène Gutberlet wrote in her article In the Wilds of the German Imaginary: African Viŝta featured in the BFI Modern Classic work The German Cinema Book (2008) regarding the late great Teutonic Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensief (Mutters Maske, The 120 Days of Böttrop) and his scatological satire The Slit (1996) aka United Trash: “A further exception is Christoph Schlingensief’s Die Spalte (1996) an ironic look at the military, shot in Zimbabwe. The film’s international title, United Trash, sums up Schlingensief’s rationale and his blatant disregard both for issues pertaining to the Nazi paŝt, and for political correctness. The film pursues the implications of the UN deployment in Africa, which has brought German troops once again to foreign soil. German soldiers fire a human-powered V2-rocket at the White House, with Udo Kier and the film critic Dietrich Kuhlbrodt playing a pair of perverse, Prussianesque generals who surround themselves with dancing ‘natives’ in short straw skirts. The film’s ‘trash’ aesthetic met with widespread incomprehension, and was indeed responsible for a brief suspension of diplomatic relations between Germany and Zimbabwe.” Of course, Schlingensief ultimately did more for the Dark Continent than all the kraut-hammering Hebrews and culturally cuckolded krauts of the Frankfurt School combined as he managed to receive funding from the German government and began building an opera village in Burkina Faso that had neither a school nor hospital, thus bringing not only Wagner and Bayreuth but also education and medicine to some of the world’s most isolated and impoverished negroes. On top of that, Schlingensief only had one lung, was on a steady dose of the hardcore pain killer fentanyl, and was dying of cancer when he made it literally his life’s mission to take on the seemingly impossible project. In the documentary Crackle of Time - Christoph Schlingensief and His Opera Village in Burkina Faso (2012) aka Kniŝtern der Zeit - Christoph Schlingensief und sein Operndorf in Burkina Faso directed by Sibylle Dahrendorf, the many problems associated with Schlingensief’s opera village—a project inspired by the director’s hero Joseph Beuy’s “social sculpture” idea—is depicted in candid detail. Aside from being a wonderful depiction of positive post-Hitlerite ‘Wagnerian colonialism’ in motion, Crackle of Time is a must-see doc for serious Schlingensief fans as it depicts the lapsed filmmaker’s rather idiosyncratic and seemingly possessed (not that he did not always seem possessed by something) state of mind while staring death in the face.

With the help of black Berlin-based Burkinabé architect Diébédo Francis Kéré, Christoph Schlingensief is determined to literally work himself to death in his quest to transform a small Burkina Faso village near Ouagadougou into an art-addled opera village equipped with a theater, school, and small hospital, among other things. Starting building in January 2010, Schlingensief is fully conscious that he is living on borrowed time and will not last much longer. In a scene early on in the documentary, a tiny black boy on a shadowy theater stage angrily shouts to an all-European audience the following scornful words: "You Europeans are all perverse! All of you! You escape to your dreams to avoid the catastrophe of your real lives. You dream of me because you can't stand your own dreams. But what you'll encounter in your shitty dreams will be much worse than all the altruism you imagined possible. And it begins like this: You only dream because you're not tough enough for reality. In the end you'll return to a reality all of your own because you can't stand your dreams. Yesterday's dreams are today's harsh realities. The gallows await you! Me, I'm real. And I can even bear it. Shit. To hell with you! To hell with you!" Of course, fun-loving aesthetic terrorist Schlingensief fed the little boy the lines of what is ultimately a self-deprecating speech written by a terminal artist chasing one last dream. On top of hoping to "steal something from Africa," Schlingensief gives the following tongue-in-cheek reason for wanting to bring Wagner to Africa: "At some point I started worrying about how I could create a monument to myself. Of course I want people to revere me after my death. I want editions of Geo history magazine written about me." Having 13 large containers shipped from Germany to Togo, which are then driven by 13 large trucks to Ouagadougou and eventually dropped off at their remote rural destination, Schlingensief manages to bring a theater to the small Burkina Faso village. As for the exact location of the opera, the renegade artist declares, "I'm now standing on the opera hill. Thank god it's not the green hill. It won't be a green hill. This won't be Bayreuth, I guarantee that. I'll swear an African oath on that." Schlingensief does not want the locals to become pseudo-Teutonic Uncle Toms, but organically-inclined individuals with artistic passion who sire art from their heart and souls. For a time, Schlingensief attempts to teach the villagers how to create art, encouraging them to come up with Wagnerian raps and directing films and creating multimedia installations with them, but his dream of seeing his project is not completed as he finally succumbs to cancer on August 21, 2010 in Berlin, Germany at the premature of age 49. Luckily, Schlingensief's Finnish wife and long-time assistant Aino Labrenz continues the project and the school is finished in October 2011. With continued fundraising and support from artists ranging from Patti Smith to Marina Abramović, the opera village project is still in progress to this very day.

CRACKLE OF TIME - CHRISTOPH SCHLINGENSIEF AND HIS OPERA VILLAGE IN BURKINA FASO

In what is probably the most reflective segment of Crackle of Time, Schlingensief confesses regarding his intended legacy with the project and the insights a lingering death brings to one's mind: "The world is at its most elevated when you're about to die or leave. It's the moment of super-heightened awareness. All the trips and this project mean that I can think about the future, and fantasize, which is wonderful. To look into the future, to see yourself in the future and ask: What's important for the others to know when I'm gone? Who built this road? Who put this seat here? But it's clear...I've also learnt that if other people hadn't stuck their neck out for me, I wouldn't be able to do this. And I'll take that example and say, I'll carry on building, so that others can continue after I've gone. And no one has to learn my name then. They can't pronounce it. Here, I'm called Singelfinger. Schlingensief is too complicated. I'm Singelfinger. "Mr One Finger." That's wonderful." Rather unfortunately, it seemed Schlingensief was at the height of his artistic prowess while working on the opera village, thus making his premature death all the more tragic. Long before the end of his life, the aberrant artist found it impossible to direct films as demonstrated by his documentary The African Twintowers (2008) where the filmmaker fails to complete what would have been his final feature (also called 'The African Twintowers') as he was a man whose energy was too untamed and his vision too grand to be confined to the passive artistic medium of film. A sort of scatological contra Hitler who, like the Führer, was inspired by the operas of Wagner to construct the ultimate real-life and practical 'Gesamtkunstwerk' where art and life become merged into one, Schlingensief was arguably the last great German artist and the cultural void that was left when he died will never be filled. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Schlingensief described his last feature The 120 Days of Bottrop (1997)—a work that features the AIDS-ridden 'ghost of Kurt Raab'—as the 'last German Cinema Cinema' as a work that one might describe as a coup de grace to Teutonic cinema in general. A real-life Teutonic Fitzcarraldo who managed to take German kultur further than Syberberg but in a paradoxically ludicrously lowbrow fashion, staged a race-based Big Brother-like TV show in the heart of Vienna, remade Veit Harlan's 1944 National Socialist masterpiece melodrama Opfergang (which was apparently the favorite film of Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels, who Schlingensief claims is a maternal relative of his) as a spastic scat-fest, and staged Richard Wagner's Parsifal for the Bayreuth Festival after rather shockingly being invited by the actual Wagner family, among countless other singular achievements, Schlingensief is the last truly great Germanic iconoclast and I cannot help but smile thinking some young and impoverished pickaninny from Burkina Faso will remember him forever as the man who brought opera, education, medicine, and art to his hometown.

-Ty E

THE DARK ANGEL
THE DARK ANGEL

Sidney Franklin (1935)

When it comes to the Golden Age of Porn, you can pretty much guarantee a film is a classic or at the very least interesting if it stars Jamie Gillis (The Opening of Misty Beethoven, Neon Nights), as he proved that porn stars could do much more than bust loads in gaping bungholes and receive sloppy, wet blow jobs while being only semi-erect from busted old slags with aesthetically displeasing platinum blonde dye jobs. Indeed, Gillis did not enter the blue movie realm until he was already in his early-30s, yet he became one of the most demanded, commanding, and captivating actors, as a sort of David Hess meets Harvey Keitel of hardcore flicks who could humor viewers just as much as he could horrify. Indeed, from the incestuous patriarch ghost of Jonas Middleton's Through the Looking Glass (1976) to the excrement-enamored 'Enema Bandit' of Shaun Costello's Water Power (1977) to the Faustian pact-making businessman of Roger Watkin's Corruption (1983) to the punk-rock-pussy-plagued old dork of Gregory Dark's New Wave Hookers (1985), Gillis always demonstrated with his multidimensional roles that he probably wasted his talents in the 'adult film' world when he probably could have easily made it big in Hollywood were one of his Hebraic homies to have hooked him up (of course, Gillis did appear in a couple mainstreams films like the 1981 thriller Nighthawks starring Sylvester Stallone and Rutger Hauer). Of course, as a Hebrew that was spawned on the same day as Hitler, Gillis was practically born for the dark and depraved world of pornography as demonstrated by his innovation of 'gonzo porn' as an auteur of sorts. With that being said, it is only natural that the sexually versatile 'actor' would play a role where he would fall in love with the devil. Indeed, in the forgotten phantasmagoric fuck flick The Dark Angel (1983) aka The Devil Wore High Heels directed by auteur-pornographer Pieter Vanderbilt (Blue Dream Lover, Woman in the Window) Gillis plays a wealthy and wanton businessman who degenerates into something nothing short of wickedly obsessed after spotting a mysterious blonde babe who is really Satan in super sensual female form. Featuring multicultural mental institution orgies with black chicks in whiteface, mystifying midnight gang rapes, and satanic shoe fetishism, The Dark Angel is one of those rare semi-surreal and sometimes artful blue movies where it almost seems like a shame that is a porn flick, as this eloquently sleazy erotic flick surely deserves some type of cult following.

As wealthy businessman Leland Keller (Jamie Gillis) describes while caressing a single red stiletto while sitting in the back of his car next to an ocean side cliff near San Francisco, "You wouldn't think that this simple object keeps me from total insanity...but it does...because there's something real. This solitary red shoe haunts me because it was left behind...in my dream." Flashback many months back and Leland is receiving a blowjob from two pseudo-cultivated chicks at the same time while his chauffeur watches on. As the protagonist explains, "My friends call me 'Lee.' I was the original golden boy. Everything I touched seemed to have 'success' written on it. The world was mine for the taking. And I took. If I wanted something, I'd buy it. If it couldn't buy it, I'd find another way to get it." Of course, when Leland encounters something he cannot simply buy/own, he begins losing his sanity, or as Leland explains himself, "I was riding a glittering wave of success...the future seemed seamless. And then I saw her for the first time. It was one of those San Francisco nights. My chauffeur and I were coming home from a party...she was standing underneath a streetlight. I felt a rush pass through me like an electric charge. She looked right at me, like she could see through my very soul." While Leland would continue to drive by the spot where he first saw the girl (played by Desiree Lane), who was sporting a red witch-like cape, in the hopes of attempting to swoon her, she would never be there, though he would later spot her at the most random spots in San Francisco. Indeed, obsessed with the mystery blonde in red like James Stewart was with Kim Novak in Vertigo (1958), albeit in a much darker and depraved manner in a San Francisco that barely resembles the sunny city of Alfred Hitchcock's classic, Leland is finally going to see what it feels like to be infatuated with flesh that he cannot find, let alone fuck.

As Leland describes to his friends regarding the mystery woman in red, "I don't know if I want her because she is just that beautiful...or because I just can't have her." In the hopes of attempting to get get him to kick his sick infatuation with the mysterious chick, Leland's friends set up an orgy party for their opulent friend, but it only makes him more enamored with the satanic chick. Hoping to spice things up, Leland has a friend let him stay in a nuthouse with an eclectic group of raving nymphomaniacs, which include a bull-dyke-like amazonian chick with a mullet, a high yellow black chick sporting whiteface, and a crazy cutie who incessantly stares at a mirror-less mirror. Of course, Leland's naughty night with the nymphs at the nut ward does nothing to diminish his deep-seated desire to defile the mystery girl in red. When one of Leland's female friends does an erotic dance in a warehouse that ultimately ends with her getting mock gang-raped (indeed, unbeknownst to Leland, his friend hired the fake rape squad) by a threesome of degenerates in demon masks, the posh pervert is hardly affected, or as he subsequently states himself, "I no longer have any feelings. I knew this was what she [the mystery woman] wanted from me."

Hoping to liven things up, Leland gets involved in S&M and even bites a woman's nipple off, stating of the meta-erotic experience, "I also enjoyed something else about myself that night...I enjoyed hurting people [...] had a taste of blood. I knew I was crossing over into some other reality...losing all control." With his sadomasochistic violence getting out of hand, Leland concludes, "I had to go somewhere and think," and heads to the beach where he spots the mystery woman in red standing on a rock. After the mystery woman mocks Leland for not realizing who s/he is, the desperate man follows his obscure object of desire up a hill as s/he strips and tells her that he will give her “anything” to be with her. Of course, the devil dame asks for Leland’s soul, which the hyper horny businessman is more than willing to give. Of course, after making strangely intimate love on an otherworldly bed in a bright white room, Leland never sees the sensual satan again. Flash forward about sixth months later, The Dark Angel comes full circle and ends where it began with Leland sitting in his fancy car while caressing satan’s stiletto and stating to himself, “All that was less than six months ago. I’ve been coming here every day since then...in hopes that I may catch another glimpse of her...but I never have. All I have is this memento [red shoe] to remind me of the night I slept with the devil.”

THE DARK ANGEL

A sort of superlatively sordid celluloid marriage between Goethe’s Faust and Hitchcock’s Vertigo with an oftentimes silly synth-driven score that sounds like it was taken from some third rate 8-bit NES game (unquestionably, the film would have benefited from featuring the song “Fucked by the Devil” by the L.A.-based deathrock band 45 Grave), The Dark Angel is ultimately a tasteless, if not sometimes aesthetically intriguing, tale of a tragic horn dog with a voracious sexual appetite of the satanic sort. While not Gillis’ greatest film, auteur Pieter Vanderbilt’s aesthetically and thematically pernicious porn flick certainly seems like it was specially tailored for the aberrant adult film star. Part metaphysical horror, part pulp (one reviewer rightfully compared the nuthouse scene to Samuel Fuller’s 1963 cult classic Shock Corridor), part film noir, and part salacious satire of Reaganite preppies, The Dark Angel is certainly one of the more underrated works of the late ‘porn chic’ era as a fuck flick that may not be as good as Nightdreams (1981) and Café Flesh (1982), but it is certainly more sophisticated, horrifying, and titillating than the majority of slasher/horror flicks that were coming out at that time. As a mensch who was not really plagued by the various ills that seem to be an innate part of his trade (e.g. drug addiction, AIDS/STDs, mental illness, suicide, etc.), as well as a fellow that seems to have genuinely enjoyed his job of getting countless onscreen blowjobs, Jamie Gillis certainly seems like the #1 candidate in terms of a porn star who would have/could have sold his soul to devil. Indeed, with his devilish charm and appearance, less than kosher Hebraic background, seemingly lunatic love of libertinism (aside from being involved with scat and S&M, he was an open bisexual who sometimes boned bros), seemingly demonically-possessed persona, and virtually immaculate talent for portraying evil sensual beings in already fucked fuck flicks, Gillis most certainly would have been more fitting for the role of the devil in The Dark Angel than some pseudo-blonde bimbo like Desiree Lane, but then again, the Fallen Angel is the master of deceit.

-Ty E

THE ENTITY

Sidney J. Furie (1982)

There's a lot on my mind after my fresh and initial viewing of this loose adaptation of what is known as the most extraordinary phenomenon to ever occur in parapsychology. It starts off as simple as this, when I was a child I thrived off of books of the occult, paranormal, and plain horror. When I was around ten years old, I received two things from a box in the attic - 1) Complete set of Man, Myth, and Magic and 2) A dusty hardback copy of The Entity. Excited more for the paranormal and plain weird rituals that exist within the pages of Man, Myth, and Magic, I gleefully opened the first volume I grabbed to find this insidious photograph of a doll stuffed with human blood and possibly innards. Needless to say, I opted for The Entity at the time, at least until I grew a pair. Now before I get started, know that I never actually read the novel and only skimmed through it. No matter the charges, what I read still stayed with me for some time. Not terror, no, but a prepubescent arousal of the strange. This feeling of wrong dominated by lust has only been felt twice, once while "reading" the book and the other while watching the film based on the same perpetrating book. During the scene of the first attack, while you watch a wonderfully aged Barbara Hershey apply lotion to her legs, that stare as if she knew she wasn't alone. It ripped, the smack too. Her frail body then flew back on the bed and a pillow applied over her head. While she writhed in agony, I felt for the first time, deliriously turned on and terrified at the same time. Such a weird intake of emotions kind of left me in a daze that only grew with each attack. It's hard to pinpoint what it is about the events. Maybe it's how helpless Carol Moran was. Maybe it's the fact that her true-to-life character still experiences these attacks. Whatever it was, it turned me on for all the wrong reasons.

Much of The Entity's power comes from all directions. The complacent family at the beginning. The degradation of a perky single mother. The riveting and intense score created by Charles Bernstein. Watching her sweaty and defeated face stare off, Barbara Hershey's lifeless stare scorching through your soul. Watching invisible fingers knead her breasts. It's all there - The Entity is the perfect mix of both supernatural and erotica and it's a shame that a tasteless taboo-cracking version hasn't been released. Instead we get a Bollywood remake entitled Hawa and I'm still not too happy about that. What the remake tries to do is to keep the attacks, lessen up the intensity, and in general, dumb down the fear-provoking process of watching The Entity in the first place. The Entity did one thing for me that so many have failed to do before - terrify me beyond any explicable explanation. For the duration of this film I had tears in my eyes from the chills shooting up my spine constantly. This is the effect of a great scene set up and a masterful score of pounding guitar.

I haven't too incredibly much to say about a story that has existed since the late seventies. My connection with this tale goes for me in such a ludicrous and drawn out manner that I'm surprised I never cared to watch this sooner. In part, I blame The Nest for that - such an incredible novel and such a sub par film. The Entity excels at showing the horrors and delights of rape without all the awkward male grunting and obtrusive fingers and hands getting in the way of the real prize - repulsive perversions. This, quite frankly, is a horror movie for most but a porno for sociopaths. I lie somewhere in between on what to think of this film but I can state one thing for certain, this is a film I will never show my fiancé lest I want her to never sleep with me as I can imagine this being the harbinger of "I'm not in the mood." The Entity is a cruel film of bold horror and sexuality and within that lies the essence of something shocking. Now that I have pinpointed it, It should be much easier to find something truly nerve-shredding. To keep it short, the best ghost film I've seen.

THE ENTITY

-mAQ

THE FUGITIVE KIND

Sidney Lumet (1960)

For most individuals, it seems the biggest draw to the movies for them is the cast. Whether it be middle aged women looking to drool over George Clooney's salt n' pepper hair, not to mention pseudo-suaveness, or 90 pound Wiggers looking to see bling-bling-baboon 50 cent trying to get rich with money he can't even count, people seem most magnetized to a film for whose on screen as opposed to who concocted what is on screen. Personally, I usually look to see who the director or auteur of the film is, before I waste my time watching another banal flick. After all, I do not want to accidentally catch myself watching another film directed by Hitchcock-clone/Hollywood Hack Brian De Palma.

I do like a couple actors however, although they tend to have been from Hollywood's less blatantly degenerate days. Marlon Brando and Anna Magnani happen to be two of my favorite silver screen stars. Before Brando was bloated and too overly belligerent, he was the best rebel to catch on screen. In her cinematic prime, Italian actress (with a surprisingly aesthetically successful mix of Egyptian and Judaic blood) Anna Magnani was a woman aggressive for what she wanted just as much as any man. It was a brilliant idea for these two stars to play lovers in Tennessee Williams's The Fugitive Kind directed by the extremely overrated filmmaker Sidney Lumet. It is apparent that Mr. Lumet understood nothing of the Southern Gothic, but with the chemistry of Brando and Magnani, plus with the perfectly dramatic play writing skills of Tennessee Williams, The Fugitive Kind still ends up coming out as one of the best southern Gothic films that I have had the extreme pleasure of passionately enjoying.

In The Fugitive Kind, Marlon Brando plays a man that excretes coolness. He is not cool because he wears a snake skin jacket (certainly more cool than Nicholas Cage wearing one however) or plays the guitar, but because he lives life the way he wants to wherever he wants to, even if that makes him homeless. When he meets an eccentric Italian woman who happens to own a shop with her "more than a little red in the neck" husband, Brando's character starts a relationship with a woman he never expected. Brando uses the Italian woman because he needs work and the Italian woman uses Brando because she needs a potent man unlike her bed-ridden hick husband. The Fugitive Kind differs (or more like the complete opposite in convention) from most Hollywood love stories in that the man is uninterested in love and the woman is doing everything she can to catch the man's fancy.

Apparently, back in the good ol' days in the South, if you sold bootleg alcohol to Negroes, it could result in a personal holocaust via being burnt alive by angry rednecks. The poor Italian lady in The Fugitive Kind lost her father due his altruistic willingness to diversify his customer base. Magnani no doubt does a splendid job playing a woman hurt and letdown by all the men around her, from the father that left her too soon to the rednecks that inhabit the town she lives in to the men she fornicates with that drop her because of olive-colored skin, she cannot find a man she can truly trust. Who else then, but Marlon Brando to fill her void for a new kind of man? Not only is Brando his own man, but he's willing to wage war on all other men, including the ones that Anna Magnani's character despises. The ending of The Fugitive Kind may not be the ideal happy ending for the mindless masses, but it is certainly appropriate for the unconventional true love found between manly Marlon Brando and alpha-aphrodisiac Anna Magnani. I rarely find middle aged women attractive personally, but Anna Magnani in The Fugitive Kind is certainly a lady I would have brought home to Mom.

THE FUGITIVE KIND

Marlon Brando did a little more than a good job portraying a polack barbarian by the name of Stanley Kowalski in A Streetcar Named Desire so I only had to assume he would also be brilliant in another silver screen adaption of a play written by Southern Queen Tennessee Williams. I just wonder why The Fugitive Kind has not gotten the recognition it deserves like just like A Streetcar Named Desire receives. The Fugitive Kind also certainly deserves more praise than Brando's performance in the iconic The Wild One. I guess The Fugitive Kind maybe just a little "too gothic" for a southern Gothic, especially for the undeserving American audiences that saw the film for the first time in 1959.

-Ty E

GINGERDEAD MAN 2: PASSION OF THE CRUST

Silvia St. Croix (2008)

A film I never thought I would enjoy. It's funny when sequels topple over the previous effort of an original idea. Gingerdead Man 2: Passion of the Crust is not an original idea. In fact, It heavily borrows so much from Troma that I'm surprised Lloyd Kaufman hasn't made an embarrassingly amount of blogs slandering Silvia St. Croix's work. Taking a huge chunk from the story of Terror Firmer, the once-dead and of course reincarnated cookie has wound up on the set of a low-budget horror film called Tiny Terrors 9: Purgatory of the Petite. I guess the director in the film is inspired by a young Charles Band, and yes, the douchieness is present. The characters last name is Cheatum, which brings a hilariously true element to the film which highlights the "down and dirty" business that is indie horror. Add a side of the same attitude present in Poultrygeist and you get the best work that Full Moon has had in a while. The Gingerdead Man kills many crew workers in this weirdly-paced satire film. The attempt at being controversial doesn't work very well with independent studios. The surname isn't offensive and the cookie raping a fag with a hair curler isn't offensive either, just disgusting. The hardest thing I've had to do lately is writing this review without "cooking" up any puns concerning the recipe used to make this delicious campy horror film. The film's only main problem is the horrible pacing. The film picks up in the first 10 minutes and really doesn't explain anything. Some busty "Scream Queen" brings a box of cookies to a Buffy the Vampire Slayer looking cast and on top is our favorite cookie. No explanation as to how he came about or anything. Plot holes galore! The ending was rock-bottom on the cliched scale as well. Perhaps the biggest change in film is the lack of Gary Busey. Don't get me wrong, I hated the first film, but Gary Busey was the Gingerdead Man. Without his screen presence, we just have a cookie with stale one-liners, and that is what I settled for. The animatronics in this film were either bad or acceptable. The Gingerdead Man's mouth rarely moves along with what he is actually saying. Gingerdead Man 2: Passion of the Crust is a great Troma film not made by Troma. It sounds confusing but once you view this film, you'll get my drift.

-mAQ

BLOODBATH
BLOODBATH

Silvio Narizzano (1979)

During his less than personally flattering, if not 'legendary' and artistically fruitful "tormented maniac" period during the 1970s after the abject personal, artistic, and financial failure of his film The Last Movie (1971), burned out yet still bodacious Hollywood hophead Dennis Hopper gave a number of less accessible and just damn strange performances in movies all around the world, including Mad Dog Morgan (1976), Tracks (1976), and The American Friend (1977), but undoubtedly the most wildly idiosyncratic and seemingly nonsensical film he ever appeared in was the Spanish production Bloodbath (1979) aka Las flores del vicio aka The Sky Is Falling directed by Italian-Canadian auteur Silvio Narizzano (Die! Die! My Darling!, Senza ragione aka Redneck). Directed by a relatively unknown director who mostly worked in British television and earned his greatest hit with the then risqué and sassy swinging 60's London-based romantic comedy Georgy Girl (1966), Bloodbath is certainly not the sort of film one would expect from a for-hire TV hack, though one must certainly credit screenwriters Gonzalo Suárez (The Exquisite Cadaver, Don Juan in Hell) and Win Wells (The Call of the Wild, The Greek Tycoon), who also happened to be the director's live-in boyfriend (they shared a place in Mojácar, in Spain's Andalusia, which was also the location of the film), for the film's brazenly bizarre nature and somewhat esoteric themes. A spoof of Pier Paolo Pasolini and other leftist European filmmakers' obsession with the 'noble savage' meets a lampoon of Dennis Hopper's drug-addled stupor played by none other than herr Hopper himself, Bloodbath rather facetiously yet ingeniously pits innately superstitious peasants of the quasi-medieval Spanish sort against a high-strung middle-aged hippie heroin addict and a variety of other eccentric expatriates, including a washed-up (quite literally, even making her first appearance in the film on the beach) Hollywood diva, a bitter and emotionally brutal Brit WWII vet, and a flaming fag with an unhealthy fetish for dark black Amerikkkan meat. A hallucinatory horror show for posturing peace-loving hippie bastards and a delightfully dark comedy of the Buñuel-esque beatnik-beating sort for happy hippie-haters and oddball European arthouse fans alike, Bloodbath features a delightfully deranged dichotomy between poor peasants that are totally untainted by modernity and technology and the debauched cosmopolitan Wasp 'Westerners' that pose the very potential deleterious threat of irrevocably tainting them. Described by Penthouse pussy magazine of all sources as follows, "This is Dennis Hopper at his best! A fantastic performance in an amazing movie," Bloodbath is undoubtedly a work that deserves just as much cult notoriety as Mad Dog Morgan (1976), Out of the Blue (1980), River's Edge (1986), and Blue Velvet (1986), but is just so unrelentingly bizarre, aesthetically schizophrenic, and hard-to-find (I, myself, secured a seemingly bootleg VHS with a horrendous transfer) to ever develop a serious cult following as a rare quasi-gonzo (or more like 'anti-gonzo') work that actually does not suck as a totally unclassifiable celluloid work that is like early Curtis Harrington meets Alberto Cavallone (Blue Movie, Man, Woman and Beast) as directed by a man that seems to only have hatred and contempt for the counter-culture generation of "peace and love" and other great lies.

Chicken (Dennis Hopper) is a totally debauched hippie who is addicted to heroin and bad poetry and both of these terrible vices are affecting his acid-addled brain, but not as much as the backward native locals of the beachside Spanish village he is staying at, who are waging a magic war against him. Naturally, Chicken likes eggs, so his Negro girlfriend surprises him with some, but after shooting some good junk, he cracks them over his thoughtful jigaboo gal's head and tells her, "Okay nigger. You start singing now. You start singing now...Mammy's little baby loves shortnin' shortnin', Mammy's little baby loves shortnin' bread," which she naturally does without hesitation as a totally spooked spook. Chicken, a proud community college graduate who was brought up a Southern Baptist but later converted to libertinism as a victim of the counter-culture age, also has a number of hallucinations that spark hysteria in his terribly tortured pseudo-artistic soul, including from his religious extremist "momma," which are sparked by the black magic-practicing peasants of the archaic village he lives in. After one hell of a night of attacks via Spanish sorcery and heroin, Chicken is found half-dead on a beach by a fallen Hollywood diva named "Treasure" (Carroll Baker, who also starred in Giant (1956) with Hopper), who brings him back to her humble abode and tells him about her rise and fall as a one-time Tinseltown superstar. Treasure describes how she received her stage name and career after screwing a grotesque Hebraic studio head with a Yiddish accent at the ripe age of 16-years-old. While Treasure used to do three movies a year and have the telephones ringing nonstop due to her popularity, now she is a dried up old hag of the hyper horny and fanatically narcissistic sort in the spirit of Gloria Swanson from Sunset Boulevard (1950) who has her own younger 'kept man' and dreams hopelessly of the big executives of Hollywood once again ringing her on the telly. A disgruntled and patently pretentious yet secretly salacious British World War II veteran named Terence (fallen British leading man Richard Todd) and his "bitch" (as he calls her) dipsomaniac dipshit wife Heather (Faith Brook), a suicidal chick whose mental instability is fueled by her love of alcohol, are also exiled on the Spanish beach. One also cannot forget a queenish homo named Allen (played by Bloodbath screenwriter/Narizzano's lover Win Wells), a flamer and borderline transvestite that Treasure describes as her "favorite fag," who is also another expatriate and he has a thing for Negro men, especially those that whip him like a white slave. Indeed, all of these individuals seem to have found themselves in the wrong place at the wrong time, but one cannot feel that fate of the fatal sort has brought them together for one last big party.

While Bloodbath is essentially a curious collection of oftentimes surreal and sometimes campy montages of nihilistic hedonism of the self-annihilating sort as especially emphasized in a quote by English metaphysical poet John Donne during the beginning of the film, "But I do nothing upon myself...and yet I am mine own Executioner," the major 'plot' of Narizzano's work takes the form of all the major forsaken Wasp expatriate characters beginning new romantic relationships with random and mysterious seemingly supernatural strangers who will ultimately lead them to their tragic yet inevitable and fitting ends. Reluctant race-mixer Chicken is happy to hook up with a young blonde Spanish babe named Buenaventura (Inma de Santis) that he tells "I wanna rape you!" (and she tells him he should) and even falls in love in an 'old fashion' sort of way, Treasure hooks up with a young and tanned beefcake who thankfully has never seen one of her horrible movies, Terence drops his bitchy wife and gets with a young ditzy Asian girl with ostensibly dubious motives, and glittery gay boy Allen finds himself a big black buck of the charming yet ultimately nefarious sort. A pesky little blond boy who is listed in the film's credits as "Mongoloid child" also appears throughout Bloodbath and is quite similar to the rather annoying androgynous kid from The Day of the Locust (1975), especially in that he meets a grizzly end. Of course, not a single character survives in a movie entitled Bloodbath.

BLOODBATH

Featuring blood-soaked white-boy-loving black broads hanging in pieces like swine in a cadaverous peasant slaughterhouse, Dennis Hopper overdosing on heroin after too many Oedipal complex inspired nightmares and flashbacks, fags being whipped by Negroes and gored to death by phantom bulls that drive their horns in horny homos, degenerate divas dying in an orgy of ringing telephones and a luxurious swimming pool, and proud anti-kraut war vets going to their deaths via firing squad quite proudly in dedication to their love for oriental girls, Bloodbath is a macabre yet inexplicably merry metaphysical horror flick of the spacey surrealist sort where the self-fulfilling deaths of overripe Westerns is merely sped up by pernicious peasants who have had enough of their infectious and dispiriting degeneracy. As the black buck tells his effeminate victim when he begins to whip him, "it's what you want" and, indeed, the masochistic man-woman embraces the brutality from the S&M spiritual negro to the point where it costs him his rather worthless life. Indeed, Bloodbath is certainly a bummer, but also side-splitting and singularly 'seductive' in its cynical surrealism and flimflam melodramatics. Like its cast of vice-ridden anti-heroes, Bloodbath was doomed from the beginning as a sort of gonzo giallo of the insanely idiosyncratic sort that will only appeal to the most marginal of audiences. Indeed, while this film might interest hippie and beatnik types with its scenes of counter-culture god Dennis Hopper absurdly stating "Nothing is True, Everything is Permitted" in anti-tribute to Hassan-i Sabbah/William S. Burroughs, it is quite unmistakable that director Silvio Narizzano is portraying such frivolous flower child swill in a rather negative light, hence why the original title of the film, "Las flores del vicio," translates to "flowers of vice" in English. After all, hippie types always talk about 'karma' but they never stop to think of the consequences of their own senseless and self-absorbed hedonism as if 'free love' and hard drugs don't have consequences, but they might if they watch Bloodbath, a celluloid slap across the face for deadheads and other deluded degenerates. In a sense, not unlike the supremely underrated Hopper directed/starring flick Out of the Blue (1980), Bloodbath is the perfect antidote to the naïve hippie romanticism of Easy Rider (1969). Additionally, you will not find a more drugged-out and degenerate Dennis Hopper than in Bloodbath, a work featuring the then-quasi-psychotic star covered in stinking sweat and slime and high out of his mind like a scared little child (who literally calls for his "momma") that totally iconoclastically shatters his seemingly legendary status as a counter-culture god, especially when his character states during a bad trip, "Looking in the mirror has fucked me up!" A twilight of the Anglo-American degenerates, Bloodbath is a wildly whimsical and anti-wanton wanton reminder why the Occident and its former colonies have now become cultural graveyard and colonies for the Third World.

-Ty E

THE LIVING AND THE DEAD
THE LIVING AND THE DEAD

Simon Rumley (2006)

Schizophrenia is a common showcase in thriller/horror films. They create these one layered villains and slap the illness on them to give some insight or explanation for their deeds. Director Simon Rumley pulls out all the stops in delivering us a new kind of mental and medicinal evil. The story is an unfamiliar one. After the father of an ill family goes bankrupt, he must leave to take care of his assets, thus leaving poor James in charge of his mum. This is such a saccharine thing to do, but then he is plagued by his ill mother who is bedridden. Determined to keep her healthy on his own means, and becoming the man of the house in the process, he decides to lock the nurse out and quit taking his medication. This begins a spiraling decay of character as reality is blurred with nightmares. This is but another film to bring the Oedipus Complex to the cinemas but with horrifying context. This isn't a children's tale. There is nothing to grab your attention other than the acting and the fun house rapid-fire frantic music. This one is purely a family study. Not just focusing on the ill son, it expands into the terror of the father and the mother. The theme of family dysfunction is not new, in fact, it is used too commonly now a days. Since the release of Baumbach's The Squid & The Whale and maybe even before that, dysfunction has been commercialized to be a great footnote to a story. Examples can be seen in The Host, Running With Scissors, and Donnie Darko. The difference here is this film is a wasteland of emotions. Nothing good in sight, and the worst kind of emotional torture around. This won't be the last time we see dysfunction in a film but i'll be damned if it will have anywhere near the effectiveness of this. Leo Bill as the schizo mothers boy, James Brocklebank, is a godsend to the shrinking list of actors who can play out a sickness amazingly. The last one who did this amazing was Ewen Bremner from the Dogme 95 film JULIEN DONKEY-BOY. The father strangely reminds me of Donald Pleasance and the mother is amazing in her role, playing a frail, tormented mother. The scenes where he starts to lose his sanity and when the hyper-camera work is implemented, make me feel as if my brain is leaking. I really must hand it to Danger After Dark for releasing some of the most melancholy films i have seen recently. Films like Strange Circus and The Living and the Dead is the reason why i love film so much.

-Maq

HARLEY DAVIDSON AND THE MARLBORO MAN

Simon Wincer (1991)

Harley Davidson and the Marlboro Man is the embodiment of all that reigns in American pastime cinema. The first portion of the film is fueled on the long roads of patriotism. We open to a biker awakened next to a beautiful naked woman grabbing all his belonging, most of which are cigarettes, keys, and lighter. He lights his cigarette in hand to his scarred reflection being illuminated by fireworks. Most of their journey is met with hilarious racial stereotypes. We have the Indians who flock to the bar as if some light attracted them. Of course, they also sport denim and feathers. They pick bar fights with the invented rural America character; The Marlboro Man. He exists in the film as the womanizing advertisement for cigarettes and work boots that require much duct tape to hold them together. Again, Duct Tape to add the feel to this illusory "redneck." The main teaser for the film, is the two factions of modern America, rural cowboy and the freedom biker. One believes in justice and freedom and the other is the belligerent half, who is an alcoholic. I'm actually surprised there isn't a Jewish intellectual who enjoys a game of chess. That would be the other stereotypical force of America. Ah, the all too similar bar scene. This is the scene in which I saw my first pair of breasts, in a seedy environment with smoke lingering in the air and mugs clinking. This might have had an adverse effect on the way I view women in today's society. This film does a great job of showing women as weak and pitiful, but at the same time, uses very noir-ish techniques to build up the female police officer. Girls with guns being controlling is in the top of most people's books. To top off the ridiculous stereotypes, the villains of the film are drug peddling Italians with their flashy suits, greased hair, and crime rings. It seems Australian director Simon Wincer decided to mock his own characters in his beloved epic Lonesome Dove. Another hilarious aspect is the main heist black man who is a clone of Jimi Hendrix, of course, his name is Jimi. So besides being sexist and racist, Harley Davidson and the Marlboro Man is a campy action film which is a thrill a minute ride and is still an ideal viewing for children, so they may grow up to be like me.

-Maq

BLOND, BLUE EYES
BLOND, BLUE EYES

Simone De Vries (2006)

When it comes to the cinematic ingredients that I consider most imperative when creating a great film, I have always found directors to be more consequential than actors. Even as a young child, I was cognizant of what a Tim Burton or Steven Spielberg looked like, although I didn't exactly know what a film director was. Of course, there have always been certain actors that I have admired, but they are few and far between. One of my favorite actors is Dutchman Rutger Hauer; an actor probably best known for his performance as alpha-replicant leader Roy Batty in Ridley's Blade Runner (1982). Despite seeming like a distinctly evil robot killer for most of the film, by the end of Blade Runner one is ultimately surprised by Batty's final display of noble empathy and forgiveness. For the final scene in Blade Runner, Hauer improvised his performance in the form of a visual poem instead of using the long and drawn out speech that was originally intended for the conclusion of the film, henceforth dreaming up what is arguably the most potent and memorable scene in the entire movie. If there is one thing that all of Hauer's performances have in common, it is the eccentric and unconventionally complex nature of the characters he plays. Like the fictional characters he has portrayed in nearly one hundred different films, Rutger Hauer is an enigma of sorts who finds no pleasure in having his personal life advertised to the entire world. In the documentary Blond, Blue Eyes (2006), Dutch filmmaker Simone de Vries followed Rutger Hauer around the world and interviewed the actor about his successful career as an international film star who – unlike most mainstream actors – refused to whore himself out to the glorified pimps that run Hollywood. During Blond, Blue Eyes, Rutger Hauer allows fans to enter a more personal and intimate side of his life, but as one can expect from a documentary about the somewhat secretive actor; the viewer shouldn't anticipate something in the vein of an episode of MTV's Jersey Shore where a glorified Guido micro-mob masochistically exposes their grand philistine pomposity and animalistic vulgarity. After all, Rutger Hauer is a stoic Nordic Dutchman of Frisian descent and not a shameless exhibitionist, thus his emotions are in check and collected throughout most of Blond, Blue Eyes.

One of the things that Rutger Hauer reveals in Blond, Blue Eyes that I was most glad but unsurprised to find out is that he essentially "played himself" for his role as the Dutch sculptor Eric in Paul Verhoeven's Turkish Delight (1973); a film that deservedly won the award for Best Dutch Film of the Century in 1999. Despite his internationally critically acclaimed performance in Turkish Delight, Hauer's parents found the performance to be quite dubious due to the various scenes of nudity featured throughout the film and neglected to appear at the premiere of their son's highly revered film. In fact, the only part of Blond, Blue Eyes where Hauer seems somewhat depressed is when he discusses his parents; both of whom left all of their children in the care of nannies during their childhoods as they were more interested in their own self-centered careers. In fact, Rutger Hauer's father was a failed actor of sorts, thus, I don't think it would be a stretch to say that he was more than a tad bit jealous of his son's early success. As Rutger Hauer describes in Blond, Blue Eyes, he originally had no pretensions of expecting to make acting a legitimate lifelong career for he found such a goal to be ultimately unrealistic. Of course, Hauer ended up being one of the greatest – if not the greatest – Dutch film star to have ever lived. At the very least, Rutger Hauer is the most popular Dutch actor in film history. Personally, I see Hauer as the Dutch equivalent of Swedish actor Max von Sydow, as both European actors proved they were competent at playing leads in everything from Nordic arthouse flicks to mediocre mainstream Hollywood movies. As you learn in Blond, Blue Eyes, Hauer has always been repelled by the petty politics and socially-synthetic nature of Hollywood. According to Hauer, if you accidentally turn your back to the wrong person at a party in Hollywood, your acting career could very possibly end then and there. Due to his aversion to Hollywood and its unwarranted airs of insider superiority, Hauer chose to maintain his main home in his homeland of the Netherlands. Not only has Hauer stayed true to his ancestral roots, but he has also managed to stay wholly committed to the woman that he has been married to for the greater part of his life. For an odious club that prides itself on sexual depravity, decadence, and deceit; Rutger Hauer is surely an odd man out in Hollywood, but that is because he has integrity as an actor and as an individual.

Anyone who is a fan of Rutger Hauer already knows that he is an extremely private individual, therefore, it will be no surprise that the documentary Blond, Blue Eyes is not exactly a totally revealing portrait of the dignified Dutch actor. Still, the documentary does offer the viewer a side of Hollander Hauer that has been yet to be revealed before. As is no surprise to most of his fans, Hauer has always desired to play serious roles but also enjoys playing the occasional goofy role and has been also known to play undesirable roles just to pay the rent. It is revealed in Blond, Blue Eyes that for most of his career, Hauer filmed “behind-the-scenes” footage of the movies he acted in. Although I am sure most of his fans (myself included) would love to see that footage, I doubt Hauer has any interest in releasing it, as he keeps it tucked away in a Hollywood apartment closet. Contrary to seeming like a deadly serious individual, Hauer has a giant statue of Mickey Mouse standing in his home. I don't know about most Rutger Hauer fans but I was extremely happy to see Dutch actor as the lead in the sadistically sensational pseudo-Grindhouse trash flick Hobo with a Shotgun (2011). If Hauer were to never act again, his reputation as one of the greatest actors of the post-World War II era would be guaranteed merely for his role as Roy Batty in Blade Runner alone. As Hauer candidly discusses in Blond, Blue Eyes, he improvised the iconic and unforgettable pigeon scene at the conclusion Blade

BLOND, BLUE EYES

Runner, which is indubitably one of the greatest scenes in cinema history. In fact, if that undeniably indispensable scene were to have never been included in the film, it is doubtful that Blade Runner would be regarded as the neo-noir science fiction masterpiece that it is today. In my opinion, Hauer gave his greatest performances in his lesser seen films with Paul Verhoeven (Turkish Delight, Soldier of Orange), but of course, that is to be expected of most modern films that were not shot in the English language. Anyways, I am excited to see whatever Rutger Hauer has in store for the future. Admittedly, it would be quite nice to see Rutger Hauer and Paul Verhoeven collaborate on one more film together.

-Ty E

SUICIDE CLUB

Sion Sono (2001)

Welcome to the club. Suicide Club, that is. Without a doubt, this is the most influential piece of cinema I've seen. Not because of the quality or the violence, but the motivation this film gave me to seek out more foreign horror films that defied conventions with ridiculous violence that once was stomach churning. This was a notorious title for me back 2 years ago. It's a shame that that popularity of this film never flourished more although Sion Sono has experienced a fruitful career. Suicide Club is the rental replacement for Faces of Death. It's about time a successor be known. The infamous opening scene still remains as one of the most shocking sequences of violence depicted on film. A smiling cluster of Japanese schoolgirls casually gossip along a subway rail. Grinning, they all join hands euphorically and leap in front of a train only to soak the entire station in saintly Asian blood. For its time, Suicide had leapt from being a sacred subject to hyper-violent satire thanks to Japan's most shocking auteur of taboos; Sion Sono. Keep in mind this is the man behind Strange Circus, which might be the sole nihilistic brainfuck to ever remember. Literal translation. Suicide Club is a film that most people have seen. Word of mouth travels a very extensive way. While being a personal favorite of mine, the faults won't get past the inner cynic in me. The film rotates around a contemporary and thorough exaggerated view of the effects of pop-culture on the masses. The "twist" in the film is one which is impossible to predict. In nature, one would laugh heartily at the mere idea of Sono's revelation, but the truth is actually fierce which resulted in a sequel entitled Noriko's Dinner Table (I haven't seen it yet). The highlights of the film range from the narcissistic suicidals to the extreme depicted violence to the character actors on screen. Other than these traits and some unmentionables, the rest is a filler detective plot line which seems really out of place. It's always nice to see Audition's Ryo Ishibashi get more work in extreme Japanese cinema though. Although not the first, Suicide Club is one of the earlier films to have a horror/satire plot revolving around the Internet ala the website that predicts the suicides. Mechanics such as this can be seen in Danger After Dark's Feed and Yo-Yo Girl Cop, which was recently reviewed. Suicide Club might be the most daring Festival film to come out of Japan. With enough blatant simulated blood and gore to satisfy the deepest blood craving, Suicide Club offers a horrific tale of hysteria with a perfect mix of intellectualism. After watching this film, ask yourself if you have a sickness of the soul. It is also a great reflective piece to round out an afternoon and serves as a great treat to give to "virgin" cinema-goers. I don't know what's worse, the fact that Suicide Club has an important message or the fact that it's based off of truthful unexplained suicides in the land of the highest suicide rate; Japan.

-mAQ

EXTE
EXTE

Sion Sono (2007)

Perhaps the most natural return to form for me would be to write reflexions of a Sion Sono film. As assuredly you all know, Sion Sono is my personal favorite auteur, with his each and every film reaching beyond the boundaries of reality returning with visual prose of weightiness. Pairing his talent of avant-garde poetry with the camera was a match made in heaven, whatever that may be. Following Suicide Club 6 years in the making is Exte, an idea that must have stemmed from a deleted subplot in Suicide Club. During the trailer of Suicide Club exists a scene in which blood and hair protrude from a printer in grotesque fashion. Seeming all too surreal for the very [sub]rational elements within Suicide Club, this attention to the supernatural with digital dreads would have made for Suicide Club to be rebranded entirely. Not just teetering on subliminal messaging but mechanical possession? Why, it seemed only logical to take his scorned ideas and to mutate them into something else - Exte, the greatest horror satire that was ever to be. Starring Chiaki Kuriyama (Kill Bill, Battle Royale) and Ren Ôsugi (HANA-BI, Audition), Exte: Hair Extensions is a wild, trope-smashing migraine of Japanese horror cinema. Ostensibly too muddled and tongue-planted-too-firmly, Exte has but been exiled into scraps of J-Horror excess which serves as every bit a crime as child abuse is.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Unable to execute JavaScript.

Exte is certainly nasty business, all involving the fine undead follicles of a dead girl. You'd hope Sono's "extensions" of horror would be safe from phobias. Well you can say goodbye to that notion as Sion Sono gives us another reason to fear physicality and being. Scenes to mention would be when a hairdresser discovers a strand of hair distending from beneath her eyeball. Grasping softly and tugging, the tension on the strand of hair has enough impact as to leave even the most jaded gorefiend emphatically wringing their fingers and begging for the images to succumb to a tone lighter than its current. On a strict plot basis, Exte is too weird for its own good, that is, this disjointed exhaustion of traditional Japanese curses and crude possessions is every bit bizarre as the mental image of a decomposing body's wounds exuding tufts of hair would be. A trichophilic morgue watchman, whose activities involve trimming the hair of the recently deceased to create hair extensions, discovers the corpse of a young girl whose organs were harvested by Yakuza and due to her flowing raven locks, Yamazaki steals the body and takes her home. This is just where the madness begins though. As the body appeared in a shipping box of hair, you might assume that this hair is a collection but her rage in an unhampered fashion may prove otherwise. Sion Sono doesn't answer these questions you might have. The terrible fate of the girl is hinted at during short, soiled segments. Exte would just rather tell the story of an inspiring hair stylist and her abused niece.

Now from the standpoint of a Sion Sono enthusiast, Exte is his most critically shamed film to date. I've had several like-minded fans of his auteur signature tell me that Exte really didn't contain all too much worth spare a couple scenes of hair-terror. I was colored very surprised, though, with Exte as it continues Sono's reign as king and proves to be his most established and separate taste to date. I have always witnessed Japanese films attempting to fit the mold of a direct, picturesque adaptation of manga to the screen. It is the Eastern equivalent of Hollywood buckling towards comic books aesthetics which you have seen in Punisher: War Zone and less-effectively, Zach Snyder's Watchmen. To be honest, the most recent of these films turned ink would be Hobo with a Shotgun. The inky pastels of blue and yellow taint the screen and create for an unsettling backdrop for the extreme violence. In Japan, many films have struggled to suit such a label including Ichi the Killer, Marronnier, and Uzumaki, just to name a few. Granted, these ideas seem more in tune with comics because several are based off of such and not just splashed with tinges of vibrant colors. With that in mind, Exte is the closest I have ever seen the medium of film succumb to a comic sickness. Ren Ôsugi's portrayal of Yamazaki is worthy of the film textbooks. Yamazaki is a character that, to an intellectual level, can only be described as batshit insane and no amount of brooding upon the volume of raven black hair can change that asset of his character.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Returning to the idea of a Suicide Club with technologically inclined spirits, Japanese horror cinema has been all about "grudges". In their market lies much room for mistakes. Catering entirely to the feeble-minded cowards of the West, it is hard for me to believe that anyone in the land of the East takes their own horror genre seriously. After all, the only atmosphere to be found is ample servings of soft focus and pajama garbed girls with knotted wet jet-black hair. In that instance in which the hair parts ways with raw data and projects itself out of a machine, I felt inspired to write about Exte, a film that has undeservedly been cast out among the Tartan filth of global cinema enthusiasts. Exte cannot be grouped up with any Kairo or its more suited companion The Wig. No, Sion Sono's Exte is all his own creation. Even the beauty shop comedic elements to this tale of sisterhood comes as a sigh of fresh air. I have spent so long avoiding J-horror for all of my worth when, in the process, I had foolhardily swept Exte under the rug as well. Not just for its extra-dimensional static cling, Exte is a unifying reason to pity the dead. That single tear escaping from the empty socket of a once beautiful girl marks the existence of a soul, which, even if in cinema, gives me some hope for an after-life. Exte: Hair Extensions is skin-crawling with emphasis applied to every syllable. Sion Sono borrowed the game just to humiliate the "masters" and further solidifies his placement on a pedestal.

-mAQ.

LOVE EXPOSURE

Sion Sono (2009)

While discussing Sion Sono with a friend, he inquired if I'd seen his newer film Love Exposure. I meekly responded with a "no" and as he began to tell me tales of a near 4 hour long film with satirical and over the top qualities, my interest was peaked with barely a mention of the synopsis. After viewing the scrapbook style trailer, I decided to let my instinct take the reigns and promptly found the film available for viewing. What unraveled over the course of four hours is not just what has been called "epic" or "a masterpiece" but a film that defies the very notion of time. With such a daunting run time of 237 minutes, the film seems to play for an average running time of 2 hours. With that considerable amount of time on hand, the delving into specific characters wields a remarkable level of detail that really sparked within me as I begrudgingly counted down until this outstanding achievement had finally reached its unwanted end. If you, like me, wish to have this dazzling array of absurd culture in an untouched virgin form, cease reading this following summary of just some of the events transpiring in a religion-torn Japan. Yu Honda is the devout son of a priest who has recently lost his mother. Before her untimely death, she told her affable son to find his own "Virgin Mary." With that, he remained entirely devoted to the idea of a single woman. After his father converts a homely whore, she arouses a faltering faith as he begins to slowly fall in love with this mysterious woman. As Yu's father begins to slowly deteriorate following her eloping with a younger man, he begins to call Yu ritually into the confession booth to purge the sins from his innocent mind. As Yu realizes he never really sins, he decides to rig his life with pain and mischief as to make his father happier. This involves joining a gang, learning to fight, and with the recommendation of his dear friend, totatsu (aka the art of peek-a-pantie voyeurism.) After becoming the apprentice of a lonely master of acrobatic totatsu, our lovable Yu now employs rather wacky methods of getting pictures of panties in a search of both acceptance from the shell of his father and his search for his "Maria." What eventually becomes of him is madness, a brainwashing evil cult, lesbianism, incest, castration, and most importantly, drag queen slaughter. Love Exposure is really, in every sense of the word, a sprawling epic. I had my doubts as its main recurring theme is love and religion. With the two topics in each hand as if being judged by my divine authority, I can't decide which one is more widely regarded as a myth. As Yu struggles harder for the love of his soon to be sister, Yoko, he's eventually driven over the edge and is faced with innumerable obstacles that most people wouldn't dream of approaching. This paired with the fact that this film is based on the life of director Sion Sono's friend really makes you scratch your head in an effort to discover which is fact and which is fiction. What Yu faces in his quest for supreme love is only so much an exaggeration. Their fateful meeting was all because of a bet on who could take the best pantie photo. After losing to his own pupil, Yu struts down the street in a black trench coat, black wig, and a large hat. After aiding and abetting the volatile woman, he kisses her and adopts the moniker of "Miss Scorpion." Soon thereafter, he discovers that everything that has happened in his life as of recently has been orchestrated by a sadistic sociopath named Koike who has been pulling the strings with a larger scheme in mind. In debt to the impeccable job that Sion Sono had performed at establishing characters from the rawest roots possible, I found myself becoming increasingly more and more distressed as Yu's life spiraled into mad turbulence. So I did what any panic-stricken male would do; begin drinking. After hitting several shots of 99 Black Cherries and 99 Grapes, I was finally at ease and could relax my tense and sore muscles. Love Exposure is that sort of film; the one where you are vulnerable from the same oppression as the lead absorbs like a magnet for everything evil in the world. What really drives the film in an already incredible direction is the masterful soundtrack and where the irony lies is that there is no soundtrack. It's composed entirely of eloquent pieces of classical works (with the exception of the theme track) ranging from Ravel's Bolero to various works of Taizé. The fact of the matter is that within two hours of watching Love Exposure, I knew that this was one of my favorite films of all time. Now I've always been partial to the works of Sion Sono but after seeing so many of his films and highlighting a trend of consistency, I have to say that he is one of my favorite auteurs. I mean, just look at his script for Love Exposure (see below). With Love Exposure recently in mind, it appears that I've reached a level of cinematic enlightenment. The pure replay value of this film is retarded and there is no other way to put it. With just the mention of Tak Sakaguchi directing the action sequences, my hard-on soared just as that of Yu's whenever he sees or thinks of his darling Yoko. Never has a film made me want to run out and kick ass except that of Die Hard and other various Bruce Willis films. The innocence in Yu's eyes always remains true, even after he is knighted the "Prince of Perverts." I can really grasp the feel of this epic as I've witnessed first-hand the insanity that plagues the female species and that's what these films all seem to be about. You take near any film and deconstruct it just far enough, and you'll find the fault of a woman. Take the recently viewed Park Chan-Wook masterpiece Thirst. Once the abused and damaged woman is given just a little power, she loses her shit and becomes damn near a psychopath. It's literally painful to watch the damage Yoko commits to Yu's entire existence due to her stubbornness to understand anything other than her hatred for all men. The very idea of her being duped into being a lesbian says a lot for the standards of gays all around the world.

LOVE EXPOSURE

As for the definitive evil bitch role, Koike does marvelous in her ability to turn an innocent "high school voyeuristic photo-maniac" into a simple "maniac." After stealing and manipulating everything he loves, our Yu would do what any other would - punch a woman in the fucking face. While Sion Sono does superb in the field of wringing your very soul of any positive emotion, he is also skilled at re-inflating it, instating a feeling of euphoria, if you will. As Suicide Club dealt with issues concerning subliminal messages and brainwashing, the very common ground between these two films is one of many reasons that I never wanted this film to end. I stand ground with each and every individual character. I love, I spite, and I cry at each turn of events. I have equally been assimilated into the universe of Love Exposure and for once, I found a home comfortable enough to revisit at any time. I never use this phrase with an exception of a small handful of films but Love Exposure has charmed, captivated, and horrified me. This will go down as one of my favorite films of all time. Other than that, I don't really know what to say that hasn't already been said about this grandiose pièce de résistance. You owe it to yourself to delve into Love Exposure and I cannot wait to view this elusive six hour cut.

-mAQ

LIQUID SKY
LIQUID SKY

Slava Tsukerman (1982)

After viewing the Austrian cyber-dyke flick Flaming Ears (1992) and taking heed of a film recommendation from my culturally refined lady friend, I decided to finally give the New Wave sci-fi work Liquid Sky (1982) directed by Slava Tsukerman (Stalin's Wife, Pereščroika) a serious viewing. Tsukerman decided to create the film after his previous project Sweet Sixteen – also a science fiction film designed with the New Wave style in mind that was to feature Andy Warhol – never received the funding the director needed, thus he became resourceful and merely used the cast of the aborted project for Liquid Sky, including star and script co-writer Anne Carlisle (Perfect Strangers, Crocodile Dundee). Although often associated with the punk subculture, Liquid Sky – which was released the same year as the Hollywood cyberpunk classic Blade Runner (1982) – has more in common aesthetically with the U.K.-based New Romantic fashion movement of the early 1980s as the film most certainly looks like it could have been directed by Visage frontman Steve Strange himself. Somewhat surprisingly, Liquid Sky was instead directed by a Soviet-born Jew who created TV movies and documentaries (he would later have a successful career in Israeli television) before assembling the avant-garde libertine sci-fi comedy that would gain him the most notoriety as a filmmaker because on top of being extremely influential culturally, Liquid Sky was the most economically profitable independent film of 1983. Materialistic monetary matters aside, Liquid Sky obtained a steady cult following over the years, not least due to the film's bittersweet cocktail of dazzling psychedelic special-effects, plentifully perverse humor (the lead anti-heroess is repeatedly the victim of rape), sometimes silly computer generated soundtrack and inter-sexual New Romanticist imagery. Taking its name from the English-translated American Indian saying for heroin, Liquid Sky is an often absurd and authentically campy sci-fi farce about a group of tiny and invisible junk-addicted space aliens (whose spaceship is about the size of a dinner plate) who come to earth to harvest the endorphins created in the human brain during sexual orgasm – which are apparently similar in chemical structure to heroin – by using an androgynous bisexual lady named Margaret as a vessel for obtaining orgasmic juices via her surly and sadistic sexual partners. In the process of obtaining their opiate-like pheromones, Margaret's sexual partners die post-orgasm after a crystal blade appears protruding through their skulls that is used by the aliens to extract the pleasure molecules. Needless to say, Liquid Sky is not the sort of sci-fi flick that was made with virginal fanboys and turdsh trekkies in mind, but instead junkies, perverts, pessimists, and degenerates of all sorts.

Liquid Sky begins at a newer-than-new-wave fashion show featuring model Margaret (Anne Carlisle) and her equally sexually ambiguous archenemy/doppelgänger Jimmy (also Carlisle); a fairy of an effeminate fellow who has a hard time fueling

his life-consuming addiction to heroin. Luckily for Margaret her butch gal pal Adrian (Paula E. Sheppard) is a hip heroin-dealer. Being a linguistically elegant and articulate lady of high Manhattan culture, Adrian describes her girlfriend as an, “uptight wasp cunt from Connecticut.” Indeed, miss Marge came of age in New England suburbia and had a relatively mundane upbringing as expressed by various childhood photos of her featured in Liquid Sky. It was not until Margaret moved to the city with overtly delusional aspirations of being the next David Bowie that she became an increasingly masculine, drug-addicted drama queen with a less than lavish libertinage lifestyle. Luckily for her, Margaret finally gets her big break in show biz, at least in her own mind, when an alien spaceship lands on the roof of the penthouse apartment that she shares with her stocky and cocky Alpine-shaped girlfriend Adrian. Indeed, Margaret wants to become a space oddity of sorts and she has no qualms about fucking people to death to appease her extraterrestrial masters (although she initially theorizes that an Indian God is guiding her). During her wild night of sexual seduction and depravity, Margaret helps the alien secure the endorphins of a rapist opera actor, an ex-hippie college professor, a failed artist who likens himself to French poet Jean Cocteau, among various other individual that probably deserve to die. Meanwhile, a socially inept German scientist named Johann Hoffman (Otto Von Wernherr) flies into Manhattan from Berlin as he has been monitoring the space aliens for some time now, but he has a hard time convincing the citizens New York City’s most densely populated borough that they are under attack by miniature junky spacemen. While attempting to find a view adjacent to Margaret’s apartment so as to monitor the space alien’s dubious activity, Johann is welcomed in the apartment of Sylvia (Susan Doukas) – a television producer who also happens to be the mother of jerk junky Jimmy – and carries the rest of his UFOphile voyeurism in her window. Clearly a sexually-deprived masochist, Sylvia is especially turned on by the fact that Johann is German and she is Jewish, thus she spends the rest of the night trying to get in the pants of the seemingly asexual Teutonic Scientist. Needless to say, there are a variety of outré sexual liaisons featured throughout Liquid Sky, but very little of it is mutually reciprocal, thus the aliens are the only group the truly benefits from the counter-culture phenomenon of free love in world were souls are vapid and emotions are artificially altered via downers and uppers.

One thing that most viewers will notice almost immediately upon watching Liquid Sky, aside from the quasi-schlocky futurist fashion imagery, is the curiously cynical comedic tone of the film, as if director Slava Tsukerman truly longed for the colonization of earth by endorphin-fleeting extraterrestrial beings. In an interview featured in the book Destroy All Movies!!! (2010), Tsukerman stated in regard to his satirical objective with Liquid Sky, “Criticism of the scene was not intended...criticism of our entire civilization was intended.”

LIQUID SKY

Unequivocally, from the emotionally sterile Faustian scientist to the deadbeat opiate-driven would-be artist, Liquid Sky is an aesthetically hypnotic yet delightfully scornful condemnation of the culturally-vacuous and technocratic Occidental world. With highly quotable lines like, “Cocteau was Cocteau before he ever did drugs” and “I kill with my cunt. Isn’t it fashionable?”, it is easy to see why Liquid Sky has remained a popular work among both cinephiles and sexually ambiguous New Wavers alike since its initial release three decades ago. Equipped with what Tsukerman describes as, “the first computer-generated music score in the history of film” and a number absurd avant-garde fashion styles that Lady Gaga has stolen and repackaged over the years, Liquid Sky is like all great works of science fiction; a fantastic but unsentimental window into a dystopian future that has subsequently revealed itself. A work influenced by heroin abuse that often looks like an acid trip, Liquid Sky is delicious cyber-candy for the eyes and a delightful despoiler for the soul.

-Ty E

THE WARRIORS WAY

Sngmoo Lee (2010)

With the extended release of products like The Matrix, Rush Hour, and The Last Samurai did Hollywood finally make its presence known and its intentions accepted. Accepting the appeal of cross-continent theater fares, it seemed overnight that the formula of East + West = "cool". Perhaps it was the technozen of the messianic "One" or even the sudden and obnoxious intrusion of Brett Ratner's smash hit Rush Hour. Regardless of the streamlined roots of this craze, one that has always been hidden beneath the dormant floorboards of the box office, one thing was for certain - American audiences devoured it. Enter the effects of the Wu-tang Clan, translated anime cassette tapes, the circlejerk that is Kill Bill, and Sanrio's mass roll-out of memorabilia and what you will find is that as often as the East is credited to adopting a largely Western ideal, we too, have exhibited symptoms of an impression left on us (although not in a traditional sense). For us it seems to be a fanaticism with no real intention on becoming permanent. This became apparent with the release of Ninja Assassin (2009), an idea so laughable it transcended novelty and leapt directly into its tomb where scripts go to die. Films like these play hooky with the thought of Asiatic stoicism/vigilantism then return home safely with no harm done - utter child's play. One could think that our Western vision is impervious of foreign influence (but how wrong you'd be). What Ninja Assassin adopted was a Western approach to romantic/action storytelling and with coating it with the sauce of Orientalism, had hoped to create an enigmatic character likable enough for a box office Eastern feast. As you can imagine, Ninja Assassin proved to be one of the worst films of 2009. With the slate wiped clean Sngmoo Lee debuted with The Warriors Way, the very same principle except overdosed on steroids reeking of sickening stylization.

Starring Dong-gun Jang, a personal favorite whose many roles encompass several classics (Friend, The Coast Guard, Taegukgi), The Warriors Way took to creating a hybrid all-too literal by crossing a shadowy ninja clan and thrusting them directly into a wild west scenario guilty of minuscule steam-punk influences. After slaying an entire clan on orders of his own, The Sad Flutes, Yang is frozen in his tracks at the sight of the sole surviving member, an infant. Putting his sword to rest and freeing the infant of its cradle, Yang flees the country after severing threads with his clan and jumps aboard a ferry navigating blindly across the stretch of sea. As wanderers do, Yang suddenly finds himself in a sleepy, sickly town whose only life is a waning carnival act. After learning the ways of these people as well as withstanding ridicule and expressing these questionable traits known as emotions, Yang's new home is stalked by his past as well as the town members' own. Like Lone Wolf and Cub before it, The Warriors Way idly juxtaposes beast & baby with a hint of babe (Kate Bosworth) in one of those senseless demonstrations of the monster-with-a-heart device. The film essentially just sputters along with images of the "greatest swordsman who ever lived" performing trivial tasks like "bonding" or doing laundry. The entire ruse of cheating the runtime builds up to the last 40 minutes in which the nature of time is slaughtered in favor of slo-motion scenes of Yang catapulting through the air with delayed spurts of arterial spray following in his jacketed wake. Once the villainous Danny Huston and his bucking cowboy crew meet the Sad Flutes, the level of silly skyrockets into the territory of being wildly unbelievable. For all it had going for it, strictly being on a scale of hardened entertainment, I feel that The Warriors Way wasn't as unnecessarily violent as I would have liked it to be. You never get the sense that his blade and all its soul-sadness, can do any real harm. There's visual mention of the rare head or arm tossed about but only a handful of quick images to support the timid nature of its existence. In fact, The Warriors Way could have just as easily been a PG-13 rated flick and not had any qualms with the idea.

THE WARRIORS WAY

When it boils down to the story of Yang's blade, the action is represented only by blood splatters. I imagined severed limbs, multiple decapitations, and rowdy brutality, something in the same vein as Ninja Assassin (the opening scene being the only decent thing in this case). What I got instead was akin to picking a shy, conservative dame of many Eastern-Western broads. Of this particular formula I'd have to say that The Warriors Way was of the more enjoyable go-arounds with entertaining a ludicrous synopsis. I don't mean to put a spin regarding the actual quality of the film. The Warriors Way is what you'd imagine from the looks of it - stupid, overloaded with digital set-pieces, lacking any distinct aesthetic, overburdened with time manipulation, and to top it all off, boasting a pitiful excuse for romance. When and if you can manage to set aside your differences with the artificial nature of this film, however, you can find it within yourself to actually become engaged by this hammy and juvenile procedure in extirpation of conventions. If you, like me and many others, were sickened and revolted by the excess of Ninja Assassin then mayhaps the candy-painted ninja-western The Warriors Way can provide to you what the aforementioned couldn't. To a degree of certainty, I can validate a sort of inner-warmness towards Yang's plight-with-fight and would enjoy seeing more of his bloody adventures in the future. If your wish is to see an inventive film relating to a ninja assassin the answer shouldn't be anymore clearer than it is with this. The Warriors Way may be shit but it's shit that I don't mind enjoying, even advocating, and in the end, that's all that really counts.

-mAQ

LOST IN TRANSLATION

Sofia Coppola (2003)

Sofia Coppola never had to “struggle” as a budding director because her father Francis is one of the most famous American filmmakers to ever live. She is best known for her horrible acting performance in her Daddy’s film Godfather III. Filmmakers should take note that just because you love your daughter doesn’t mean she should have a leading role in a very popular trilogy despite her lack of professionalism. It can be assumed that after her failure as an actress, she thought it would be a good idea to hide behind the camera as a director. After all, if the films she directs are embarrassing, at least she didn’t have to show her face. Lost in Translation was Sofia Coppola’s third film and it won the Academy Award for screenplay and three Golden Globe Awards. The film maintained a certain amount of hype even causing redneck types to watch something they didn’t expect to get into. I once recall seeing an angry blue collar man demanding a video store clerk to give him another rental because Lost in Translation was not funny. Well, that redneck was pretty accurate in his film analysis. Lost in Translation is the type of film cosmopolitan feminists and weak baby doll shirt wearing males rave about. The reason is obvious; like themselves the film is soulless. The film follows Bob (Bill Murray) and Scarlet Johansson (Charlotte) as they feel lost in the “culture shock” world of digital metropolis Japan. The young Charlotte feels like she is having second thoughts about her marriage with her wussy photographer husband. Leave it to a cynical and alcoholic Bob (who is in Japan to shoot a Whiskey advertisement) to save Charlotte’s plague of social awkwardness and loneliness. The two new friends frolic around Japan and have the most quirky fun of their life. I can imagine a young hipster guy with contrived nerd glasses saying to himself, “now that’s humanity.” Sofia Coppola’s portrayal of Japan is just silly and borders on offensive. Had the film been set in the Congo, looking at the country in a similar arrogant context, there would have been a yeast infection fueled outcry among all of America’s coffee houses. Sofia Coppola, like Jim Jarmusch in Mystery Train, seems to think of the Japanese as cultureless materialists that have adopted a distorted version of American culture. I guess that’s what happens when America drops a few Atom bombs on Japanese cities. So yes, two people you would never expect to get together do just that, because they feel lost in Japan. How quirky and cute. I was just waiting for Bob to “give it to” Charlotte but I think too much alcohol and lack of overall energy has made the man impotent. Maybe the film would have been more interesting if two rednecks were stranded in Hispanic populated Los Angeles with no way out. Possibly, they would come together for the benefit of humanity and expose real American gringo patriotism to hostile slightly-literate, Spanish speaking teenage gang members. That would be a true American comedy about things that get “Lost in Translation.”

LOST IN TRANSLATION

-Ty E

UTOPIA

Sohrab Shahid Saless (1983)

Out of all the countless books I have read about German New Cinema, very few have even bothered to mention the name of Sohrab Shaheed Salles (Hans - Ein Junge in Deutschland, Anton P. Cechov - Ein Leben), an Iranian auteur filmmaker who was educated in Vienna and Paris and who directed most of his films in West Germany about ghetto-dwelling Germans. Rather unfortunately, but not surprisingly, most of Salles' films are nearly impossible to find today and usually can only be found in poor quality bootleg form without English subtitles. Luckily, I recently managed to snag a copy of the director's kraut whorehouse epic Utopia (1983); a corrupting celluloid work that is almost Brechtian in its slowness and innately static direction, yet never wallows in banality and ultimately packs a penetrating punch. Somewhat unfittingly compared by some reviewers to Pier Paolo Pasolini's scatological swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) and described by German critics as a "hard ghetto film," Utopia is a sort of nasty neo-neorealist film about a pernicious pimp who wants to establish his own unhinged 'utopia' in the way of a would-be-high-class whorehouse and is willing to smack any bitch up who gets in his wayward way to do so. Made a year after German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's tragic death, Utopia certainly helped to fill void that he left in terms of portraying rather desperate and hysterical women as it portrays five female prostitutes who, for various (and oftentimes dubious) reasons, endure use and abuse not only from their prick pimp, but also their mostly perverted Johns. Indeed, while empathetic in its portrayal of street whores, Utopia does not exactly feature a flattering portrayal of the so-called fairer sex and thus follows in Fassbinder's quasi-anti-feminist filmic tradition. A nearly 200-minute chamber piece set in plodding pussy-peddler pandemonium, Utopia not only takes bitter swipes at capitalism, but West German society in general, depicting the post-Nazi nation as a clearly class-divided pseudo-democracy where bourgeois boobs go to operas and working-class heroes go to whores. Clearly a work directed by a man who is both a physical and internal exile with next to nil respect for the Heimat, Utopia is an intentionally painfully slow moving and brazenly brooding celluloid work with the aesthetic flare of a docudrama on downers. A decidedly debasing depiction of dumb broads who prefer the security of sexual slavery to a real-life of social and economic freedom, Utopia is a radical realist horror whore show that is bound to act as an audacious anti-aphrodisiac for even the most depraved of sexual sadists.

Opening with a beautiful blonde Aryan opera singer performing a soulful solo for a bunch of stiff and uptight upper-middleclass krauts in a fancy Berlin opera house, Utopia soon snaps the viewer back into reality and introduces brutal pimp Heinz (Manfred Zapatka) as he smacks one of his bitches up right outside said opera house. Heinz has just opened up a new bordello with a bar named 'Club Arena' in a dilapidated old building and, due to the various costs that go into the pussy-peddling business, he is mighty worried about money and is quite quick to smack a bitch if she makes a snide remark or refuses to follow his stern demands. Naïve college girl Monika (Birgit Anders) is the newest addition to Heinz's whorehouse and she is so deluded that she tells a stranger on a train ride to the bordello that, "I made myself a promise: Now, I want to live!" as if selling one's flesh and soul makes for a truly life-affirming experience. Of course, by the end of Utopia, Monika no longer wants to live as she makes a rather bloody attempt at suicide via straight razor to the wrist. The oldest and most pessimistic worker of Heinz's bordello is Renate (Imke Barnstedt), who can rarely attract customers due to her advanced age and who was tricked into the streetwalking business after the pimp pretended to be her boyfriend. As Renate tells the other girls regarding Heinz, "In thoughts I killed him a thousand times. Everytime differently. I'd favor cyanide. It's quick and foolproof." The most unruly of the girls is Susi (Gabriele Fischer), who has her own apartment and does not live in the whorehouse, thus giving her a tad bit more freedom and personal integrity. Eventually, Susi quits and Heinz beats the shit out of her and does not give her a dime of her hard earned cunt cash, but ultimately she comes crawling back to her miserly misogynist monster a couple days later after realizing she cannot make it on her own. The most dimwitted of the girls is Helga (Johanna Sophia), who rather enjoys it when Heinz forces himself on her. After having sex, Helga attempts to flirt with Heinz and he responds by stating, "Fuck off dumb cunt or I'll rough you up." Indeed, Heinz rules with a firm iron-fist as if he is a former concentration camp commander, but being a majorly miserable man, it does not take much for him to want to make people feel just as melancholy as he does.

UTOPIA

Naturally, as a man that gets a kick out of beating women, Heinz has his own problems, namely random unexplainable (and seemingly psychosomatic) debilitating headaches that cause him to lie around for hours with his hands wrapped around his head like a sad little girl. Of course, these headaches only compound Heinz's innate irritability and he wastes not time to dehumanize his dames when they get out of line. A key to Heinz's undying hatred is a dream that he has about his dead daddy that he tells to Renate after beating up her and ripping her haircut, which he describes to her as follows: "I dreamed about that asshole. If he was still breathing, I'd strangle him ten times. Are you listening?... The dream... I was little, about six or seven. I was walking with him in an alley. He was constantly babbling the same bullshit. All of a sudden, a man walks towards us. He had a big dog, a shepherd. The man comes closer. Suddenly, he kicks me right in the stomach. I try to yell for my father, but no sound's coming out. I realize, the dogs on my chest and has grabbed my throat. And then...what then? Fuck." Indeed, it seems Heinz's father was ungodly dictator, yet he ultimately grew up to be even worse than the man he hates with an oedipal passion. Not long after, Renate decides enough is enough after Heinz wakes her up and forces her to have sex with him, as she repeatedly stabs him with a pair of scissors in the gut. While dying of blood loss, Heinz tells his whores, "I'll take you with me, you cheap whores! Just wait, I'll show you!...All of you slits...All of you" as they hide together in the brothel hallway. In the end, Heinz calls all his girls "fucking cunts" as he bleeds out on the floor and the gals proceed to collectively kill him like wild animals using chairs, knives, guns, and anything else than can get their hands on to finish the job. Indeed, if Utopia proves anything, it is that slaves are oftentimes much more cruel and relentless than their masters. In a biting sardonic twist, the girls keep the brothel open for business and Renate—the old fat prostitute who initially stabbed Heinz—becomes the new pimp (or madame) of the whorehouse, thus demonstrating with every revolution, the new leaders always become just as repressive and authoritarian as the people they overthrew, if not more so.

With the legalization of prostitution in Germany in 2002, Utopia is indubitably more relevant day than it was when it was first released some three decades ago, though considering the sorry Americanized state of contemporary kraut cinema, it is doubtful most modern day viewers will have large enough attention spans to get through all 3+ grueling hours of the film. While I doubt it was intentional on the director's part, the villain Heinz has a lot of similarities with R.W. Fassbinder, namely that the auteur was once a pimp (both Udo Kier and Irm Hermann worked for him at various points), beat women, and had a rather regrettable relationship with his father, even basing the sadistic husband played by Karlheinz Böhm in Martha (1974) on his papa. Of course, unlike the character of Heinz in Utopia, as well as director Sohrab Shaheed Salles, Fassbinder actually had a sense of humor, which the hooker epic completely lacks to the point of acting as a sort of agonizing aesthetic torture against the viewer. In its depiction of a prick pimp virtually enslaving and constantly degrading female hookers, only for the girls to revolt and one of the female hookers to ironically take his place in the end and continue the cycle of sexual slavery, Utopia is a sort of allegory for the emasculation and feminization of Deutschland after the World War II (with many men dead or imprisoned) and with the so-called 'Wirtschaftswunder' when German women played a large part in rebuilding the country and ultimately realized they no longer had any use for men. Indeed, many directors of German New Cinema, including Fassbinder with The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) and Helma Sanders-Brahms with Germany Pale Mother (1980), had already cinematically depicted the declining power and influence of men in post-WWII Germany, but Utopia takes this to a whole new brutal and uncompromising extreme. Like John Cassavetes' The Killing of a Chinese Bookie (1976) meets the underrated West German teen hustler flick The End of the Rainbow (1979) aka Das Ende des Regenbogens directed by Uwe Frießner, Utopia ultimately anticipates the films of Gaspar Noé and the films of the New French Extremity in general, thus making it mandatory viewing for any serious subversive cinephile. In its outsider's portrayal of Berlin, Utopia certainly ranks up with Turk queer auteur Kutlug Ataman's Fassbinder-esque work Lola and Billy the Kid (1999) aka Lola + Bilidikid as an outstanding and singular, if not totally unflattering, depiction of metropolitan Teutonia by a swarthy Ausländer from the Islamic world. Indeed, in a strange sense, Utopia is a sort of cinematic revenge for the death of El Hedi ben Salem due to its exploitative portrayal of the kraut exploiter.

UTOPIA

-Ty E

DOG BITE DOG

Soi Cheang (2006)

Surely inspired by the success of Danny the Dog aka Unleashed, Soi Cheang created the hard-boiled Hong Kong thriller Dog Bite Dog with extreme prejudice towards the Hong Kong Police Force. I had first viewed this film several years ago fresh off the shelves of its Dragon Dynasty release. I wouldn't consider it a blind purchase though. I had first caught wind of the film in the guise of a broken DVD shell in a friend's trailer, complete with CATIII warning and printed box art. I had previously reviewed this film but was distressed with how unsatisfying my words had been. That seems to be the way with most of my dated entries. Having forgotten though allowed me to rewatch the film and herd some critical brainstorming as to the very violent nature of the two men and just how far gone both are in different respects. Walking a very thin line, the plot is a straight shot of vengeance. A detective goes to all ends of purgatory in search for a feral assassin who has murdered everyone close to him. You'd think the leeway would constrict the movement of the film but defying all odds, Dog Bite Dog remains an excellent resource of novelty cat-and-mouse games.

The differing audacity of Eastern and Western directors to allow police officers to be slain on film really gives the former the upper hand in scheming brutality for the screen. In Soi Cheang's Dog Bite Dog, virtually every character on the "good" team is slaughtered by the dog-like hit man, played by Edison Chen. 2 years after Dog Bite Dog saw release was the infamous sex scandal in which Edison Chen was the key player. What had happened was Edison Chen took to a computer technician his laptop to be repaired. Upon opening his laptop, said technician discovered hundreds of raunchy and lewd pornographic images of several Chinese celebrities. Had this instance unraveled in the U.S., the measures to be taken would have seemed lenient in regards to what officially happened. Sure this situation might not seem to be as heavy as it indeed was, most of the celebrities and singers involved were endorsed for their "squeaky-clean image", catapulting the red carpet district of Hong Kong into disarray. Surely Edison Chen's bad boy image added to the universal appeal of the star but the question begs; was this laughable incident a smear campaign or perhaps something more?

On terms of grim brutality, Dog Bite Dog might as well be a protégé of "Beat" Kitano's Violent Cop. Both films express a sexual deviancy and irresponsible nature towards human life. The crooked tactics utilized by Wai (Sam Lee) eventually rub off on his department which sticks as a fascinating transformation. Just as peer pressure and mass hysteria synchronize, his friends, who once doubted the length of extremes he vaulted, are seen letting loose and joining in on the "fun". Soon after the conflict escalates from childlike Pang attempting to escape to all sorts of turmoil as he "murders" a father living in a landfill who was pulling a "Fritz" and raping his daughter several times a day. After he ensnares the chubby lass with his domineering and firm, assertive behavior, she begins to follow him and dream big with their impromptu honeymoon on a sea-bound vessel towards Cambodia, where Pang was bred into the killer he is today. This introduces one of the very few flaws plaguing the rampage of Dog Bite Dog - the woman. I'm sure by now you're perceptive of my views towards women but this inclusion of romance where romance needn't fit drains the effervescent vitality straight from the vein. The bitch is borderline vegetable, blind to everything but her own gain. I admit the term "damaged goods" comes to mind but this portrayal of such is so flaccid and irritating. Her introduction to the story serves as the sole inciting antagonist towards the script-necrosis that takes effect during the last ten minutes.

DOG BITE DOG

Dog Bite Dog is an engaging and visceral experience in Hong Kong action cinema. Much of the effort on the part of Soi Cheang is lost due to these casual mistakes but all is forgivable. Apart from the assorted nitpicking of the incredibly rushed ending, so protruding from the overall flow that it's equivalent to tripping on an upturned stone. To close while reflecting paragraphs past, Dog Bite Dog is a film that withstood much malevolent hate within me these years of it evaporating from my memory banks. Having rewatched it with more of an understanding of the Eastern "filmsophy" I am more keen to the tale of despair it whispers. To rip a withstanding quote from my previous review, "If a film could work as sandpaper, Dog Bite Dog would be a carpenter's choice."

-mAQ

ACCIDENT

Soi Cheang (2009)

The last time I witnessed a role of Louis Koo's was in SPL's pseudo-prequel Flash Point. Within that film, Louis Koo demonstrated an uncanny ability to remain noticeable besides Donnie Yen's vacuum-like cinematic pull, abnormal in filmic science. It's within Koo's juggling of sidekick, comic relief, and tragic appeal that made me interested in seeing just how versatile this actor could be. With that in mind, Accident stars the aforementioned Louis Koo as the "Brain" of a crack-team of assassins with the specialty of creating "accidents" out of contracts. These recurring instances are where the title is derived and Accident offers many set-pieces in which to act out the Final Destination-esque moments with a searing taste for suspense and brief and brutal ways to depart from this mortal coil. Accident is a Hong-Kong superthriller from Soi Cheang, the man responsible for the plague-ridden Dog Bite Dog, and produced by the prolific Johnnie To. The credentials are enough to give Accident a pass from interrogating the Internet for reviews and scores because no matter who you show Accident to, it will incite a different perspective and sentiment. But one thing is consistent, Accident is a hell of a drag to any and all who view it.

The main team of assassins consists of Brain, Uncle, Fatty, and a nameless beauty. Brain carries with him a sick melancholy due to his wife's death, hinted at in flashbacks. Expressing the loss of a lover by ritual of rigging elaborate traps to uncork prolonged bouts of suffering is both conniving and bittersweet. The best part? It works. In the opening scene, a car suffering a flat tire blocks a bustling one way street. Perturbed, the man directly behind this car cuts his steering wheel and moves past through another street, getting water splashed onto his hood from a delivery truck. Once his vehicle trips a mechanism, a banner from several stories up flutters and lands atop his hood, stopping him in his tracks. Getting out, he tugs at the banner, breaking a pin and showering him with broken glass, lacerating an artery and leaving him immobilized and bleeding out in the street. Meanwhile, several spectators feign attraction to this "accident". You wouldn't normally consider that this grievous fatality was a murder, would you? Least of all committed by someone in your very near proximity. This moment of fatal paranoia is what Accident tackles full-force and dutifully.

After an accident goes terribly awry which costs the life of one of his team, Brain begins to slip into a paranoia on account of the synchronous nature of his trade. This opens the portal to the last act of the film, one that schemes to alter the texture of Accident. What was once a vessel for ridiculous, elaborate murder switches gears all too easily to a moody intellectualized "whodunit" that has you questioning the motives and sanity of everyone involved. Accident simply echoes Milkway production to a "T", excavating suspense out of the most mild-mannered situations backed by sinister and studious prowess. Unfortunate event after another, Louis Koo's character slips into a state of reclusive suspicion towards an insurance agent. Was the death of a friend an "accident" or an accident? The flawless style of Accident makes up a great half of the cool composure held by Louis Koo and his cohorts. The other half is clockwork misery with a light classical score to better aid the musings of our somber and conservatively existential lead. Accident may certainly have flaws under its skin but you'd have a hard time discerning them from the clinical depression left behind by the finale. Easily one of the best Hong-Kong thrillers you've never seen.

ACCIDENT

-mAQ

THE SEX OF SELF-HATRED

Solomon Nagler (2004)

Despite the fact that he is a largely forgotten self-loathing Jew whose theories regarding Jewry were so subversive that they were even, to some extent, promoted by the National Socialists and eccentric antisemitic figures like Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels, tragic Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger—a troubled and intellectually intense mensch that committed suicide in 1903 at the premature age of 23 shortly after the fairly lukewarm release of his magnum opus Sex and Character (1903) aka Geschlecht und Charakter, which would eventually inspire many important Occidental thinkers, most notably Austrian-British-Jewish philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein and Swedish playwright August Strindberg—has inspired at least two fairly sympathetic modern films about his singular spiritual struggle, rather refined sexual ambivalence, singular self-hatred, and rather lonely yet strangely poetic self-slaughter, among other things. Indeed, both Weiningers Nacht (1990) aka Weininger's Last Night directed by Austrian actor and sometimes director Paulus Manker (Schmutz aka Dirt, Der Kopf des Mohren aka The Moor's Head) and The Sex of Self-Hatred (2004) directed by Canadian experimental filmmaker Solomon Nagler (Gravity and Grace, Black Salt Water Elegy) not only happen to be about the great self-extinguishing antisemitic semite and the somewhat shadowy circumstances surrounding his suicide, but also are indubitably two of the most intriguing films ever made about a philosopher, but then again it takes a particularly preternatural artist to even consider directing a film about such an infamous, albeit largely forgotten, figure who is undoubtedly the antithesis of the archetypal Hollywood hero. After all, the last thing the Jewish studio heads and producers in Tinseltown want to do is make a film about an insanely impenetrable self-hating Israelite that argued that most Jews males are soulless pansies that think and act like lecherous neurotic women, but I digress. Certainly, of the two films, Nagler's is the most overtly and hermetically Hebraic, but such is to be expected from a Jewish auteur that has made a number of films with strong Jewish themes. An important influence on early twentieth-century intellectual figures ranging from lily-licking bull-dyke Jewesses like Gertrude Stein to decadent National Socialist poets like Gottfried Benn, the tragic Judaic philosopher was apparently once described by Adolf Hitler during a 1941 conversation with Henry Picker in the Wolf's Lair in the following fashion: "This destructive role of the Jew has in a way a providential explanation. If nature wanted the Jew to be the ferment that causes peoples to decay, thus providing these peoples with an opportunity for a healthy reaction, in that case people like St. Paul and Trotsky are, from our point of view, the most valuable. By the fact of their presence, they provoke the defensive reaction of the attacked organism. Dietrich Eckart once told me that in all his life he had known just one good Jew: Otto Weininger, who killed himself on the day when he realized that the Jew lives upon the decay of peoples." Undoubtedly, Weininger is a rare case of a Jew whose radical rejection of his own people and religion was innately intertwined with both his intricate personal Weltanschauung and rejection of life, with his suicide being arguably the truest form of post-religious Jewish transcendence and spiritual rebirth. In fact, the exquisitely ethno-masochistic philosopher even converted to Protestantism about a year before his suicide in what seemed like a failed last ditch effort to shed his inner Jew and become a noble Christian Aryan. Of course, this conversion was a failure as Weininger soon committed self-slaughter by shooting himself in the heart in the same exact room where his Aryan hero Beethoven died 76 years earlier, yet he still received a Christian burial, with his tombstone fittingly reading: "This stone marks the resting place of a young man whose spirit found no peace in this world. When he had delivered the message of his soul, he could no longer remain among the living. he betook himself to the place of death of one of the greatest of all men, the Schwarzschanerhaus in Vienna, and there destroyed his mortal body." Whether his intention or not, Weininger picked a quite auspicious time to commit suicide, as his self-ordained premature death and the strangely poetic circumstances surrounding it made him a cause célèbre in the German-speaking world to the point where he inspired numerous copycat suicides and his timeless tome Sex and Character, which was initially poorly received, finally achieved the critical acclaim it deserved. A true martyr of modernity who argued that men—be they Jew or Aryan—should completely emancipate themselves from the spiritual plagues of Judaism and femaleness, Weininger might be described as the purest and most authentic of philosophers as it can be easily argued that his suicide was merely an full-fledged execution of his philosophy. Indeed, quite unlike the countless culturally corrosive Judaic thinkers ranging from Marx to Derrida to Adorno that have contaminated the Occident with carefully calculated deceptions, pathological anti-European iconoclasm, culture-distorting, and asininely abstract word games, Weininger actually believed what he wrote, hence his tragic yet seemingly inevitable fate.

THE SEX OF SELF-HATRED

Needless to say, both of the films about Weininger are rather dark and forlorn as cinematic works that quite predictably conclude with the protagonist killing himself, but the most recent, Nagler's The Sex of Self-Hatred, is easily the most eerie and ethereally esoteric, as if the director was attempting to assemble a neo-Expressionist obituary to be played on a loop at the philosopher's graveside so that people might be able understand why a young Jewish bachelor with a very potentially intellectually prodigious career ahead of him decided to off himself while he was at the height of his intellectual prowess. The second film in the highly self-consciously Jewish director's 'Jewish elegies' triptych (which also includes Perhaps/We (2003) and Fugue Nefesh (2007)), the 9-minute 16mm short is like an aesthetically acidic marriage between German Expressionism, the pseudo-Fidus-esque Zionist eugenic art of Ephraim Moses Lilien, kosher counterculture poet Ira Cohen's experimental psychedelic film The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda (1968), and the savagely nightmarish Figurative paintings of Irish-born Brit Francis Bacon. Ostensibly set mostly in the dark and dreary Vienna room where Beethoven had kicked the bucket about three generations before, The Sex of Self-Hatred begins simply enough with the rather revealing quote "self hatred is the best foundation for self examination" and might be described as a sort of celluloid Judaic purgatory where one very lonely and fiercely forsaken Jew's all-consuming guilt, paranoia, and self-loathing reaches its zenith and erupts into a sort of morbidly morose act of self-martyrdom, with the singularly provocative philosopher both literally and figuratively sacrificing himself for his own ideals via an irreparable gesture that would ultimately determine his fate as both a man and philosopher.

Like a humorless Hebrew Guy Maddin or an all the more macabre Judaic Deco Dawson, Nagler is a Canadian experimental filmmaker that seems to reject most modern filmmaking technology and techniques and instead uses archaic and anachronistic filmmaking methods that make it seemingly possible to tell when his films were actually made. Thankfully, Nagler's quixotically quaint cinematic techniques are put to rather effective use in The Sex of Self-Hatred which, at least in my less than humble opinion, is easily the director's most accomplished and immaculate film to date. Indeed, to the film's great credit, one can almost delude themselves into believing that it was actually made in 1903, with the actor playing Weininger even bearing a strikingly resemblance to the (in)famous self-loathing Jew who developed the theory that Jewishness and femininity were one and the same. Like Manker's Weininger flick, Nagler's film alludes to the philosopher's rather intricate form of self-hatred by featuring a post-suicide drag king Weininger. In fact, right after Weininger blows his brains out (indeed, although the real Weininger committed suicide by shooting himself in the heart, he shoots himself in the head in Nagler's film in a fictional scenario that points to the philosopher's great mental suffering), he is depicted lying on the ground with bare tits, as if the philosopher's suicide really was an attempt to rid himself of both his Jewishness and femininity, or as contemporary self-loathing Jew Gilad Atzmon once speculated in his essay 'Sex and Anti Semitism,' "Otto Weininger was just twenty-three when he committed suicide. One may wonder how he knew so much about women. Why did he hate them so? How did he know so much about Jews, and why did he hate them so? The answer can be elicited from Weininger's thoughts, though not from his own words. He hated women and Jews because he was a woman and a Jew. He adored Aryan masculinity because he probably lacked that quality in any significant amount in his own being. This revelation probably led Weininger to kill himself, just a month after the publication of his book. Very likely, he had managed to understand what his book was all about." To Weininger's credit, his writings do hint that he was well aware of his intrinsic lack of Aryan manhood, which is especially apparent in the following excerpt from Sex and Character, “We do not hate anything with which we have no affinity at all. Often the other person only makes us realize the ugly and mean features we have in ourselves. This explains why the most rabid anti-Semites are found among the Jews. For only the completely Jewish Jews, like the totally Aryan Aryans, have no antisemitic disposition whatsoever.” While Weininger once wrote, “The real Jew, like a real woman, lives only within his species, and not as an individual,” he would unequivocally demonstrate with his self-slaughter that he was innately individualistic and hardly a passive follower of an ancient death cult that strives towards mindless collectivism, in-group self-worship, and ethnic chauvinism above all else. After all, women commit suicide on a much smaller scale than men and when they do get the gall to kill themselves they very rarely do it in a violent fashion that involves using a gun.

THE SEX OF SELF-HATRED

One of the more bizarre aspects of Weininger’s internal struggle that is subtly alluded to in The Sex of Self-Hatred is that, towards the end of his life, he had an unhealthy obsession with a barking dog. Indeed, according to friend Arthur Gerber, Weininger once confessed to him: “I spent a night in a hotel room in Munich once. I could not sleep. Then I heard a barking dog. I have never heard a dog bark in such a terrifying way. It must have been a black dog. It was the evil spirit. I fought with it, I fought with it for my soul. In sheer terror I bit the sheets to shreds that night. Since that time I have known that I am a murderer. That is why I must kill myself!” In fact, the dog began to symbolize death for Weininger, which is apparent in some of his writings. Notably, a barking dog can be heard in Nagler’s film just before Weininger collapses and prepares to put a bullet in his brain, as if a hound of hell has commanded the philosopher to seek self-obliteration. As Weininger wrote in his rather bizarre essay The Dog, “The eye of the dog irresistibly evokes the impression that the dog has lost something: it speaks of him (as does the dog’s whole bearing) of a certain mysterious relationship to the past. What it has lost is the I, self worth, freedom...The dog has a remarkably deep connection to death.” Of course, Weininger is speaking of the dog’s deracination and domestication by humans, but one suspects that he is projecting his own feelings as an involuntary member of the perennially uprooted and abstract Jewish (anti)race. Indeed, no other race is more uprooted, cultureless, and abstracted than the Hebraic race and Weininger—a man with a distinctly Aryan education who was heavily influenced by the völkisch writings of Houston Stewart Chamberlain—was certainly more aware of this than anyone else. In a sense, one could argue that Weininger’s writings were the equivalent of the dog’s bark.

In less than ten minutes, Nagler’s film more or less attempts to do what Manker’s Weininger’s Last Night attempted in 105 minutes, albeit in a less personalized and more esoteric, Expressionistic, and even cabbalistic fashion. At the beginning of the film, we see Weininger in a rather dark and dreary room featuring a desk with a menorah with lit candles and a large open Talmud, as if to allude that the philosopher was never far from his ancestral religion, especially when he was trapped in his deepest and darkest of thoughts. By the end of the film, Weininger has killed himself, the menorah candles have been burned out, and the Talmud is shut, thus alluding to the fact that the only way that he could truly destroy his Jewishness was by destroying himself (after all, as the famous Jewish saying goes, "Once a Jew, always a Jew"). Not surprisingly, especially considering Jews do not believe in an afterlife, suicide is considered a major sin in the Talmud as indicated by the following excerpt: "For him who takes his own life with full knowledge of his action [the Hebrew word is b'daat] no rites are to be observed. . . There is to be no rending of clothes and no eulogy. But people should line up for him [at the end of the burial ceremony] and the mourner's blessing should be recited [as the family passes through] out of respect for the living. The general rule is: Whatever rites are [normally] performed for the benefit of the survivors should be observed; whatever is [normally] done out of respect for the dead should not be observed." In one of the film's more striking and eerily erotic scenes, the viewer is exposed to a naked green-skinned Jewess lying in a tree whose rather shiny unclad body is covered in Tefillin straps as if they were bondage. Of course, these is a rare scenario of celluloid Hebraic hereticism as Tefillin (aka 'phylacteries,' which translates from Ancient Greek to "to guard, protect") are a set of small black leather boxes containing scrolls of parchment inscribed with verses from the Torah that are worn by religiously observant male Jews during weekday morning prayers and hardly objects that should be wrapped around busty unclad babes sitting in trees. By featuring a scene with a Hebraic harlot with nice tits covered in a religious object that is strictly worn by Jewish males, Nagler is probably alluding to the inherent misogynistic traditions of Judaism and how Weininger might have, somewhat ironically, inherited some of his attitudes regarding women from his ancestral faith. While his Hebrewess goddess would probably be somewhat alluring to most heterosexual males, Weininger would clearly be horrified by this lecherous lady who seems like she might suffer from vagina dentata. Notably, in Midrash in Ecclesiastes Rabbah it states: "When God created the first man he took him and showed him all the trees of the Garden of Eden and said to him, 'See my works, how beautiful and praiseworthy they are. And everything that I created, I created it for you. Be careful not to spoil or destroy my world—for if you do, there will be nobody after you to repair it.'" Of course, what better way to destroy God's creation than to have a seemingly lecherous Hebraic hoe lying on it in an erotically inviting fashion?! On a more simple level, this scene seems to be symbolic of Weininger's association of Judaism with his own supposedly warped sexuality, with the philosopher being just as repulsed with the obscenely outmoded dualistic laws of his ancestral faith as the scent of warm wet kosher cunts.

As auteur Nagler noted on his website in regard to The Sex of Self-Hatred,

THE SEX OF SELF-HATRED

“It’s 1903, and Otto Weininger, Vienna’s most infamous self-hating Jew has decided to kill himself in a room containing Beethoven’s deathbed. He has just published his first book Sex and Character, and has yet to witness an acknowledgment of his self-assured genius.” Somewhat ironically, Weininger believed Jews were incapable of genius. Additionally, Weininger’s philosophical disciple Ludwig Wittgenstein, himself a self-loathing Viennese Israelite, once wrote, “Amongst Jews ‘genius’ is found only in the holy man. Even the greatest of Jewish tinkers is no more than talented. (Myself for instance.) I think there is some truth in my idea that I really only think reproductively. I don’t believe I have ever invented a line of thinking.” Of course, in a sense, Weininger was a sort of Hebraic holy man trapped in an innately Aryan world that he never could really be a member of, no matter how desperately he tried. Notably, in the second book of his two-volume magnum opus Der Untergang des Abendlandes (1918-1922) aka The Decline of the West, Oswald Spengler—a Prussian nationalist of sorts that also heavily influenced Wittgenstein—was careful to separate Weininger from the tradition of Occidental philosophy and instead designated him as one of the three great saints of Jewish mysticism following Baruch Spinoza and Baal Shem. Indeed, as Spengler provocatively wrote, “...Otto Weininger, whose moral dualism is a purely Magian conception and whose death in a spiritual struggle of essentially Magian experience is one of the noblest spectacles ever presented by a Late religiousness. Something of the sort Russians may be able to experience, but neither the Classical nor the Faustian soul is capable of it.” Aside from Spengler, fellow German Conservative Revolutionary movement figure Gottfried Benn—an Expressionistic poet that once supported but was later persecuted by the Third Reich—regarded Weininger as one of the three Jewish figures that he recognized as true geniuses. To put Benn’s respect for Weininger in perspective, it should be noted that he saw Franz Kafka as merely a “talent of the first order” as opposed to a true literary genius.

After watching The Sex of Self-Hatred, I have to say that it is probably impossible to fully appreciate the film if you are not already familiar with Weininger’s writings and lonely and pathetic yet nonetheless rather remarkable and singular life. Somewhat fittingly, the film concludes with the Weininger quote, “Whoever detests the Jewish disposition detests it foremost with himself,” which hints that Nagler believes that there is something innately Hebraic about Weininger’s kosher brand of antisemitism. While Weininger was indubitably the most famous and intellectually gifted of the so-called self-loathing Jews of his time (in fact, his case has been studied by various Jewish thinkers ranging from philosopher Theodor Lessing to child psychologist Bruno Bettelheim), he certainly was not the only Jew that suffered from a sort of spiritually schizophrenic metaphysical affliction. According to Israeli journalist Amos Elon in regard to Sex and Character’s ultimate influence, “(Weininger’s) book inspired the typical Viennese adage that anti-Semitism did not really get serious until it was taken up by Jews.” Indeed, Viennese Jew Arthur Trebitsch (1880-1927)—the son of a wealthy Jewish silk industrialist—was heavily influenced by Weininger’s writings and he would eventually help to set up and fund the Austrian branch of the National Socialist party during the early 1920s. Despite his glaringly Jewish background, Trebitsch was apparently temporarily considered for the role of the Führer of the Austrian Nazis and he was even a personal acquaintance of both Hitler and his junky poet mentor Dietrich Eckart (who was also heavily influenced by Weininger). Additionally, great Austrian Jewish satirist Karl Kraus—a man that is sometimes described as the H.L. Mencken of the German language—was oftentimes described as a self-loathing Jew due to his attacks on Zionism and Freud and psychoanalysis (which he more or less regarded as a pseudo-scientific form of Judaism), among other things (somewhat ironically, Kraus oftentimes described Zionist founder Theodor Herzl as an “anti-Semite of Jewish origin,” which was actually a phrase Herzl coined in his revolutionary work Der Judenstaat (1896) aka The Jewish State). Although not necessarily a self-loathing Yid, Italian-Jewish philosopher Carlo Michelstädter (3 June 1887 – 17 October 1910) followed Weininger’s lead by penning his sole tome La persuasione e la rettorica (1910) aka Persuasion and Rhetoric, which is more or less an absurdly arcane suicide letter disguised as a philosophical tome, and then subsequently killing himself before he could see how his work would be received. Notably, like Weininger, Michelstädter committed suicide when he was only 23 years old. Incidentally, also like Weininger, Michelstädter would have a huge influence on self-described “super-Fascist” Julius Evola, who cites both tragic Judaic philosophers a number of times in his imperative work Il Cammino del Cinabro (1963) aka The Path of Cinnabar: An Intellectual Autobiography.

If Spengler was right in his belief that Weininger’s life and writings are not something that the Aryan mind can completely grasp, one suspects that the same can probably be said of The Sex of Self-Hatred. Of course, Nagler’s use of Hebrew and Jewish mysticism confirm that the auteur did not intend to make a film that would be accessible to the wretched goyim. If one thing is for sure, the film, which is practically dripping with the gash gravy of a wayward Jewess in certain parts, indubitably affirms Weininger’s posthumously published aphorism, “Science is asexual because it absorbs; the artist is sexual, because he emanates.” Quite ironically, Nagler’s film also brings great credence to Weininger’s theory that Jewishness and femininity are one and the same and that both women and Jews are more or less sex personified and lack the capacity for true individualism and transcendence, or as the philosopher wrote, “Both the genuine Jew and the genuine Women live only in the species, not as individualities.” Indeed, as virtually every notable Jew from Freud and his fellow Hebraic psychoanalysts to the hack writers and directors of the most loathsome of kosher Hollywood comedies demonstrate, Jews see all human psychology as being solely guided by sexual impulses and nothing more, which is quite ironical when one considers

THE SEX OF SELF-HATRED

Weininger's rather wise words that, "The Jew is always more lecherous, more lustful, than the Aryan man, although, strangely enough and possibly in connection with the fact that he is not really of an anti-moral disposition, he is less sexually potent and certainly less capable of any great lust than the latter." While surprisingly respectful to its subject in many ways, The Sex of Self-Hatred falls into Weininger's philosophical trap in regard to the innately sexually degenerate and effeminate nature of the Jew, but then again that was probably Nagler's objective, as if he wanted to proudly embrace the stereotype of Judaic androgyny and frivolous sexual obsession that the Sex and Character condemns. In other words, Weininger's idea of Hebraic hell is Nagler's vision of heaven.

Notably, in the chapter entitled "Judaism" in his magnum opus Sex and Character, Weininger eerily noted regarding to the increasing degeneracy of his age, "Our present age shows Judaism at the highest peak it has climbed since the days of Herod. The spirit of modernity is Jewish, wherever one looks at it. Sexuality is affirmed and today's species ethic sings the wedding hymn to sexual intercourse [...] women and Jews are matchmakers: their aim is to make humanity guilty. Our age is not only the most Jewish, but also the most effeminate of all ages; an age in which art only provides a sudarium for its moods and which has derived the artistic urge in humans from the games played by animals; an age of the most credulous anarchism, an age without any appreciation of the state and law, an age of species ethic, an age of the shallowest of all imaginable interpretations of history (historical materialism), an age of capitalism and Marxism, an age for which history, life, science, everything, has become nothing but economics and technology; an age that has declared genius to be a form of madness, but which no longer has one great artist or one great philosopher, an age that is most devoid of originality, but which chases most frantically after originality; an age that has replaced the idea of virginity with the cult of the demivierge. This age also has the distinction of being the first to have not only affirmed and worshiped sexual intercourse, but to have practically made it a duty, not as a way of achieving oblivion, as the Romans or Greeks did in their bacchanals, but in order to find itself and to give its own dreariness a meaning." Of course, with the destruction of all of the great Western European empires as a result of both World Wars, the dubious official recognition of the State of Israel in 1948, and malignant cultural hegemony of virtually the entire world via Hebraic Hollywood and Zio-American warmongering, things have gotten much worse than Weininger could have ever dreamed of. While The Sex of Self-Hatred demonstrates in a fittingly preternaturally elegant fashion that Weininger was a severely mentally disturbed individual that suffered from a perverse pathological fear of pussy, he was also one of the most daring and painfully honest Judaic thinkers who has ever lived as a rather rare intellectual who was almost Christlike in terms of his arguable willingness to sacrifice his life to overcome his Jewishness (notably, shortly before he died, Weininger somewhat strangely wrote, "The old man is a false eternity:

age. The good (and the true and the beautiful) is eternally young. That was also what Wagner knew as his own incompleteness; he was Wotan. Siegfried and Parsifal have not yet appeared. The completely good man (Jesus) has to die young.”). As the above quote from Sex and Character also proves, Weininger was alarmingly prophetic to the point where one suspects that one of the reasons he committed suicide was because he could not bear to see where the world was headed. Indeed, it is a true sign that we live in (pre)apocalyptic times when a modern-day Sodom known as Hollywood regularly defecates out films where grotesque overweight heebs like Seth Rogen and Jonah Hill Feldstein discuss important things like their friends’ cocks and scheme to find ridiculously craven means to get in the unkosher panties of unwitting drunken blonde shiksa skanks. Of course, a world as culturally corrosive and decidedly degrading as the one where sapless scatological schmucks like Rogen and Feldstein are famous could not produce a Weininger, thus underscoring the importance of a film like The Sex of Self-Hatred where a genius of the past is given new life in an era when his theories are needed most.

-Ty E

WINTER SILENCE
WINTER SILENCE

Sonja Wyss (2008)

When it comes to Germanic nations, I am going to have to assume that the Netherlands is the country that is the least in touch with its ancient pre-Christian pagan roots. Indeed, it should be noted that Sicilian philosopher Julius Evola—a man that had a more spiritual as opposed to biological view of race who was once contracted by Mussolini to start a journal entitled Sangue e Spirito aka Blood and Spirit that promoted a ‘Roman’ approach to race theory that contradicted the supposedly ‘materialistic’ view of race espoused by the racial theorists in National Socialist Germany—once argued in his work The Path of Cinnabar: An Intellectual Autobiography (1963) using the Dutch as an example of a people that, although racially pure in biological terms, had become completely spiritually uprooted, stating, “I rejected the fetish of merely physical racial purity, on the grounds that the purity of the external race of an individual is often preserved even when his inner race has dimmed or deteriorated (a common example of this is that of the Dutch and Scandinavians).” While the Dutch tend to be obnoxiously proud of their rampant irreligiousness and nihilistic atheism, their rigid approach to moral principles that they had adopted from centuries upon centuries of Calvinism seems to have become an innate part of their collective character, so the last European country that I would think would produce films with pre-Christian pagan themes is the Netherlands, yet there have been a couple of such unlikely cinematic works that have been produced there over the past decade or so and luckily they do not wallow in new age buffoonery. Indeed, aside from graphic novelist turned cinematic auteur Guido van Driel’s darkly comedic arthouse gangster flick De Wederopstanding van een Klootzak (2013) aka The Resurrection of a Bastard—a work set in Friesland that makes reference to the sacred Germanic pagan tree ‘Donar’s Oak’ aka ‘Thor’s Oak’ (which has been linked to the ‘world tree’ of Norse mythology, Yggdrasil) and the murder of the Christian missionary that cut it down, Saint Boniface—the Netherlands is also responsible for producing the ‘experimental Heimatfilm-cum-mountainfilm’ Winterstilte (2008) aka Winter Silence directed by video artist turned filmmaker Sonja Wyss in what would ultimately be her debut feature. To be fair, Wyss’ film is not as decidedly Dutch as some might assume as the director is actually a Swiss woman who has been living in the Netherlands for about the past couple of decades or so, not to mention the fact that the work was shot in a snowy mountainous region of Switzerland that hardly looks like the Lowland Netherlands. My interest in the film came upon researching it after it was recommended to me by a Dutchman and subsequently reading comparisons to the Nazi era work Der verlorene Sohn (1934) aka The Prodigal Son directed by Luis Trenker, who also played the lead role as a Tyrolean mountaineer who comes from a small Catholic village that, much like the one featured in Wyss’ film, still holds onto some of its pre-Christian beliefs, myths, traditions, and customs. A rare work shot on HD digital video that radiates a certain classic beauty and refreshing traditionalist perspective that makes one temporarily forget all the ugliness, deracination, degeneracy, narcissism, noise, phony post-Christian moral systems, and nihilism that plagues the largely irreligious (post)modern Occidental world, Winter Silence ultimately offers the viewer an all too brief return to rustic simplicity that does not revolve around cheap beer and cheap women.

Notably, Wyss stated after finishing the film, "In my previous work I had no interest in working with dialogue, neither was there, from my point of view, any need for it. In WINTER SILENCE the essential is told with an eye movement or the gesture of a hand. Adding even a single word would have destroyed the tension of the gesture. So not only did I not have a need for dialogue in my work, it was worse, I disliked it." Indeed, with next to nil dialogue yet featuring a meticulously constructed sound landscape that is as bold, intimidating, and entrancing as the literally and figuratively cold mountain region where the film is set, Winter Light is an eloquently and obsessively assembled experiment in cinematic composition that offers more in terms of poetry than storytelling, though it tells a story and has a message that will certainly appeal more to members of the fairer sex, especially those that have had a more traditional upbringing that involved a father, a mother, and some sort of traditional moral compass. Set in a remote forgotten world where atavistic pagan instincts begin to slowly but surely thwart Nazarene abstractions, the film tells the shockingly transcendental story of a newly widowed post-menopausal matriarch who is reluctant to let her four adult-aged daughters flee the nest and begin living real lives of their own.

Winter Silence begins with a shot of a rocky snowy mountain juxtaposed with an inter-title featuring the following lyrics from Franz Schubert's "Ave Maria" aka "Ellens Gesang III": "Ave Maria! stainless styled. Foul demons of the earth and air, From this their wonted haunt exiled, Shall flee before thy presence fair. We bow us to our lot of care, Beneath thy guidance reconciled; Hear for a maid a maiden's prayer, And for a father hear a child! Ave Maria." It should be noted that the lyrics were taken from Scottish poet/playwright Sir Walter Scott's once-popular six cantos epic poem The Lady of the Lake (1810). During the film, the mother character will ask for the intercession of the Virgin Mary after her daughters become the personal playthings of a group of mysterious deer-men who summon the girls at night in a fairly ritualistic fashion. Set in a small isolated Swiss mountain village during the beginning of the winter, the film immediately introduces the quaint morality of its characters near the beginning of the film when a young man playfully throws a snowball at a girl and she responds in an overtly flirtatious manner by slightly pulling up her dress to reveal a couple inches of bare skin on her calf. Ultimately the tiny isolated world of the central family is knocked out of equilibrium when the bearded patriarch (Werner Imhoff) accidentally slips and falls off the side of a snowy mountain and dies as a result, thus leaving his wife and their daughters to wallow in a sometimes nefarious nightmare of archaic superstition and folklore. Before she is even told of her husband's accident, it seems as if the matriarch (Gerda Zangger) could sense that something had happened, just as she will later sense that a couple guys sporting cloaks and antlers are lurking outside her homestead and intend to inseminate her daughters with semen and a new-found sense of freedom. At the father's funeral, a mysterious masked pagan female figure with a white festive suit covered with bells embroidered with flowers randomly appears as if to indicate that, with the patriarch no longer around to maintain order, the moral fabric of the family will be ripped to shreds and the four nameless sisters (Sandra Utzinger, Brigitta Weber, Katalin Liptak, Sarah Bühlmann) will enthusiastically succumb to their baser instincts, thereupon causing them to transform into independent women in the process. Indeed, it's all over for the adult virgins when the ostensibly devilish deer-men cum.

WINTER SILENCE

After the patriarch perishes in a somewhat anti-climatic fashion, the somewhat overweight widow and her equally less than talkative and mostly homely daughters attempt to keep up appearances and go on with business as per usual, which includes things like killing, skinning, and eating rabbits, as well as regularly praying in an almost pathologically masochistic fashion. Indeed, while standing next to one another with their rosaries hanging from their hands, the girls and their mother collectively chant things like, "I confess to almighty God and to you my brothers and sisters...that I have failed to do good, and have done wrong. I have sinned in my thoughts, my words and my deeds. My thoughts, my words and my deeds. My thoughts, my thoughts, my words and my deeds." The daughters also collectively knit together a large large white quilt featuring deer designs, but when a single drop of blood stains the cloth after one of the sisters pricks her fingers in a scene that could symbolize both menstruation and/or the breaking of hymen, things begin to get a little bit ominous around the small house full of assumedly horny and surely sexually mature yet sexually inexperienced young women who no longer have to worry about their father watching their every move. Of course, the seemingly all-knowing mother understands dark and potentially even demonic things are about to be unleashed on her humble abode, as she spots a band of seemingly menacing deer-men lurking outside her home while her daughters sew together the quilt, which may or may not have summoned the wild beast men, but she cannot do much in the way of defending her daughters aside from hailing Mary and treating her daughters like sacred porcelain dolls that must be guarded at all costs from being tarnished.

When bedtime arrives, a teenage neighbor girl arises from her sleep like a somnambulist and climbs out of a window where a mysterious owl had just been sitting previously, as if the bird summoned her to let her know that it is time for her to fly the coop. It should be noted that this scene is juxtaposed with a sorrowful folk song sung by a girl about a virginal Polish maid who kissed a “worthy cavalier” and ultimately paid for it with her life. The owl also later pays a couple visits to the widow as if to inform her that the time has come where her daughters must leave home. When the four sisters go to bed, one of them decides to look at herself in a mirror on their bedroom wall which is curiously covered with a piece of cloth, but when she takes off the cloth and proceeds to look at her reflection, she does not see her own face reflecting back at her but that of a young man that is about the same age as she is. Distressed yet seemingly equally enticed by the quasi-mystical experience, the girl decides to hide the mirror under her mattress and then proceeds to sleep with one of her sisters. Meanwhile, the mother goes to bed while holding a giant crucifix in her hands, as if it will protect her and/or her daughters from being raped by the deer-men. As the deer-men literally float across the landscape in an almost demonically poetic fashion in what is indubitably one of the most perniciously yet aesthetically pleasingly potent scenes in the entire film, two of the sisters decide to run outside as if lured there where they both meet ‘deer-men,’ though neither of them is wearing antlers and they are not beastly monsters but young men who the girls are quite happy to see. Needless to say, they have savage sex.

The next day as the sun rises, the entire lyrics to Handel’s “Ave Maria” are sung while one of the girls who got defiled by one of the deer-men smirks in ecstasy while her frigid sisters wash clothes in a rather robotic fashion. Indeed, it is quite obvious that the two girls that were deflowered by the deer-men have completely changed as a result of their erotic experiences, as they play around while doing their work and, unlike the other two sisters, actually smile instead of looking all morose and dead inside. When one of the sisters gets sick and vomits, it becomes obvious she is pregnant, so her mother decides to lock her in a barn where she cries and begs in vain to be let out. Meanwhile, the mother starts acting all the more eccentric and begins doing bizarre things like shaving flakes off of a ceramic Mother Mary statue and putting them into a cup of water which she makes one of her daughters drink as if to cure her of her undying thirst for cock and copulation. Of course, the mother’s efforts are ultimately in vain because by the end of the film, all four sisters are seemingly pregnant and locked in the barn, but they are certainly not sad. Indeed, not only do the sisters laugh amongst one another in an exceedingly jovial fashion, but they also use their bare feet to touch eggs that cover the barn floor that surely symbolize that they are gestating. Notably, the deer-men’s antlers now lie on the beds where the girls once slept, thus reflecting that the sisters have finally left home, at least in the metaphysical sense. In a fairly happy flashback sequence that will certainly catch the viewer by surprise as it is quite unexpected and is in stark contrast to most of the rest of the film in terms of its wholly positive ethereal pulchritude, the widowed mother looks at an old portrait of her and her husband and remembers when she became a woman after her happy marriage to her belated spouse. In the end, the mother smiles after finding flower petals in the snow that seem to not only symbolize the changing of the seasons but also the new chapters in her daughters' lives. In the end, each sister is depicted standing stoically on a different mountain while wearing a new fancy white pagan coat, as they have finally become 'independent' and are ready to lead their own lives and start their own families. Although paganism seems to prevail over Catholicism in the end, everyone is at least happy, including the widowed mother, who has also entered a new phase in her life.

WINTER SILENCE

Although a somewhat hermetic work that demands the viewer's undivided attention and really needs repeat viewings to be fully appreciated, Winter Silence, which might be best described as a 'neo-fable,' ultimately tells a relatively simple story in an exceedingly elegantly stylized and nicely nuanced way that is quite refreshing, especially considering all the static digital video twaddle that passes for European arthouse cinema nowadays. After all, nothing is more heretical in the contemporary Western European art and cinema world than works that attempt to establish a respectful link to one's cultural heritage and were the film directed by a man instead of a woman, I'm sure some sneering mainstream far-left film critic would have condemned the film for being 'fascistic' or something preposterous like that. Despite its sometimes dark and ominous themes and oftentimes strikingly foreboding tone, Winter Silence is ultimately a gentle and sensitive work with a discernible female touch that expresses a sort of sense of wonder that only women and children seem capable of. In fact, director Sonja Wyss' own personal comments regarding the production express a certain child-like intrigue and rather refreshing lack of pretense, especially her remark, "The shooting period was nonetheless a dream which was being realised. Some people claim that it is better for dreams to remain dreams than that they become reality. In this case I do not agree. It was and is still terrific to see my story becoming reality. Sometimes magical moments occurred during shooting, where we, the crew, were spectators astonishedly looking at what was unfolding before the camera." Indeed, I have no doubt in my mind that, in some sort of obfuscated way, the film is an expression of Wyss' own transformation into woman, so it is only fitting that it was her first feature. Undoubtedly I think Wyss was being totally honest when she stated, "Trained as a visual artist, I've made one feature film and am working on a new one. I know where my strengths and talents lie, working in this medium that's new to me, but I also know my limits." I can certainly see Wyss one day inhabiting a place somewhere in between Mai Zetterling and Leni Riefenstahl in terms of the great female filmmakers of cinema history, so let's hope that she maintains a sensible perspective regarding her strengths and weaknesses as a film director.

While one cannot be completely sure about everything, some of the pagan symbolism in Winter Silence is quite obvious, especially in regard to the deer-men, with many cultures having their own version of the man-beast with antlers, including the Pashupati of the Hindus and the Deer Kachina of the Hopi Indians, but clearly Wyss' film is obviously in reference to a European spiritual tradition. Indeed, aside from the 'Horned God'—one of the two primary deities found in the contemporary European neo-pagan 'religion' of Wicca—Europe also has the horned Gaulish god 'Cernunnos' aka 'Horn the Hunter' of Celtic polytheism. Like many deities of ancient pre-Christian European pagan religions, no one knows for sure what Cernunnos' cult or significance was, but some have speculated that he is a god of nature and/or fertility. Of course, Wicca's 'Horned God' was obviously influenced by Cernunnos and symbolizes nature, wilderness, sexuality, hunting, and the life cycle. Notably, Renaissance literature scholar Richard Sugg theorized that, in relation to its prominence as a recurring symbol in women's literature, the Horned God is, in Jungian terms, a symbol of the 'natural Eros' and masculine lover that 'subjugates' the social-conformist nature of the female shadow, thus encompassing a combination of the shadow and animus. Certainly Sugg's theory works in the context of the deer-men's role in Winter Silence, though it might not have been a conscious idea on Wyss' part. Indeed, I would actually find it more interesting if the film was more a product of Wyss' collective unconscious than something she merely contrived by doing banal research. In terms of its mystifying, phantasmagoric, and slightly horror-tinged depiction of the female characters' bewildering transformation from virginal girls that are figuratively still attached to their mother's umbilical cord into grown women who have obtained spiritual and sexual womanhood, Winter Silence is in good company with Jaromil Jireš's Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970) and Richard Blackburn's Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973). In terms of its rarely sentimental but surely sensitive look at old pagan pre-Christian Europa, the film also makes a great double feature with Russian's Aleksei Fedorchenko's rather underrated work Nebesnye zheny lugovykh mari (2012) aka Celestial Wives of the Meadow Mari. While the work managed to earn a 'Golden Calf' (the Dutch equivalent to an Oscar) at the 2008 Netherlands Film Festival for sound design, it is doubtful that such a work would ever earn a large following in Holland or elsewhere, so Wyss might end up becoming an undervalued misfit of Dutch cinema like Victor Nieuwenhuijs and Maartje Seyferth, but I, for one, will certainly keep my eye on her already rather singular filmmaking career.

-Ty E

PUPPET MASTER: THE LITTLEST REICH
PUPPET MASTER: THE LITTLEST REICH

Sonny Laguna (2018)

As much as I would not want to admit it to my rather naive childhood self, horror franchises—or, more specifically, movie franchises in general—are a cynical insult to filmgoers and their intelligence, especially when one really considers how unbelievably horrible these solely monetary motivated sequels really are, but few better demonstrate such an obnoxious talent for churning out pointless no-budget sequel after pointless no-budget sequel than semitic smut-peddler Charles Bands' uniquely worthless Full Moon Features. Indeed, the production and distribution company, which almost makes Troma Entertainment seem like Warner Bros Studios in terms of sheer artistic bankruptcy and lack of creativity, is notable for producing a number of strikingly terrible horror franchises over the past couple decades that seemingly no one watches or desires, as if the company is simply a laughable front for some money-laundering operation or something. Indeed, Full Moon is so shameless in terms of its patently pathetic propensity for defecating out mindless and worthless direct-to-video duds that it actually created a rip off its own Puppet Master franchise—the company's first and most successful series—with the rather literally named Demonic Toys, as if the Puppet Master films were not bad and unimaginative enough. Needless to say, I never thought I would bother to ever watch, let alone review, another film from the franchise, at least until relatively recently when I found a pretty good reason. A series reboot that was penned by talented auteur S. Craig Zahler (Bone Tomahawk, Brawl in Cell Block 99) and that thankfully has virtually nil association with Full Moon (though Charles Band acted as a hands-off executive producer, it is actually the very first film of the Fangoria Films relaunch), Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich (2018)—a delectably anti-politically-correct horror-comedy co-directed by Swedish duo Sonny Laguna and Tommy Wiklund (Wither, Animalistic)—is unequivocally the greatest, most intelligent, and idiosyncratic film in the entire series. Vaguely artsy, gleefully gory and amoral, and even somewhat eccentric, the film is what you might expect from a counter-kosher nihilist that hated the Puppet Master franchise so much that he decided to completely dishonor its dubious legacy by making a malefic Mumblecore-like killer quirk piece where the very same puppets that fight Nazis in previous films became genocidal Jew-slaughtering toys of lilliputian Hitlerian terror. Indeed, if there ever was a no-budget trash flick that seems like it was meant to bitingly troll superlatively sanctimonious shoah gatekeepers like Eli Wiesel and Abe Foxman and play them like marionettes, it is this film.

Indeed, anyone familiar with Full Moons knows that, aside making retarded entertainment, they have always had a sort of insufferably insipid anti-Nazi fetish, which is surely the result of the company's owner Charles Band—a Litvak-descended Jew—who, among other things, apparently talked director David Schmoeller into changing Crawlspace (1986) from an anti-Vietnam war tale to anti-Nazi one with Klaus Kinski portraying what is assuredly one of the most absurdly and inexplicably deranged National Socialist true believers in cinema history. Of course, Band did not stop there as he eventually introduced Nazis to his most famous franchise with Puppet Master III: Toulon's Revenge (1991). In fact, Band even created an entire sub-series of totally unwatchable anti-Nazi Puppet Master films known as the 'Axis Saga,' including Puppet Master: Axis of Evil (2010), Puppet Master X: Axis Rising (2012), and Puppet Master: Axis Termination (2017). While the classic puppet characters like 'Blade' and 'Pinhead' fought against the Nazis in the original films, Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich manages to disrespectfully mutilate and ultimately murder the entire Puppet Master mythos by having these very same puppets, as well as their eponymous creator André Toulon, portray Nazi spy killers that specifically target Jews, black, gays, and even gypsies. Probably to the great chagrin of Band, the anti-untermenschen motives of these characters ultimately makes them more intriguing than in the original films where they just seem like, well, mindless automatons. In fact, the puppets of the film oftentimes have more character (and even likeability) than the actual human characters, which was probably Band's (ultimately failed) intent with the original films. Gorehounds will probably also be pleased to know that the film has the highest body count of all of the Puppet Master films, though what fans of the franchise like seems pretty irrelevant when one considers that this film was clearly was not made with fanboy nostalgia or sentimentalism in mind. In that sense, it can be compared to the recent Star Wars franchise films like Rogue One (2016) and Solo: A Star Wars Story (2018), albeit in a good way. After all, whereas the new Star Wars films were an insult to George Lucas and the white heterosexual male target audience that made the series so popular in the first place due to being totally tainted with social justice warrior agitprop and grating displays of gynocentrism, the newest Puppet Master film paints a big beautiful bloody swastika onto the souls of both Charles Band and the franchise's original fans.

Despite the fact that he unfortunately had nil involvement in the actual directing of the film, screenwriter S. Craig Zahler—a relative novice that has demonstrated with only a handful of films that he is one of the best genre filmmakers working today—probably deserves the most credit for the spirit and overall positive qualities of the film. A music journalist turned filmmaker whose novels have been lauded by figures ranging from genre maestro filmmaker Walter Hill (The Warrior, The Driver) to legendary actor Kurt Russell to horror novelist Jack Ketchum, Zahler reveals much character in Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich in spite of the film's seemingly nonexistent budget and somewhat dubious direction (notably, co-directors Laguna and Wiklund have mostly dabbled in no-brain/no-budget digital horror trash and simply cannot be seen as true 'auteur' filmmakers). With his directorial debut Bone Tomahawk (2015)—a sort of seamless horror-western hybrid of John Ford's The Searchers (1956), Wes Craven's The Hills Have Eyes (1977), and Ruggero Deodato's Cannibal Holocaust (1980)—Zahler demonstrated a natural directing talent for nuanced depictions of human failings and visceral ultra-violence. With his second feature Brawl in Cell Block 99 (2017)—a moody and broody cinematic work with a fitting Siegel-esque title—Zahler revealed he could outdo his heroes like John Carpenter and Walter Hill by bringing a smidgen of arthouse cred and artful nuance to brute violence, gross criminality, and extreme character conflicts. Had Zahler directed Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich, it would have unequivocally been a much better film, even if the auteur is not exactly known for his dark humor. Although I can only speculate his motivations, Zahler's screenplay feels like a fun exercise in anti-fanboy postmodernism where the writer gleefully destroys a mostly worthless and forgettable franchise that probably has some sort of nostalgic significance to him but he felt was in desperate need of killing. After all, there is nothing more 'safe' and banally conformist than a film about puppets killing Nazis, so naturally the opposite scenario—in a sort of completely unexpected Mumblecore form no less—makes for a provocative film as demonstrated by the various obviously offended reviews from both professional and amateur (as well as Jewish and goy) reviewers.

PUPPET MASTER: THE LITTLEST REICH

In fact, some people are so offended by Zahler's work that, despite the fact he is Jewish, they have accused the auteur of being a neo-Nazi of sorts. Indeed, in a stereotypical whiny and pathetic article entitled 'Is S. Craig Zahler a White Supremacist?', a young autistic Jew-boy complains, "It's pretty clear that S. Craig Zahler has a formula for his fiction. Irredeemably evil minorities + damsel in distress threatened with sexual violence+ heroic Aryan(s)+ violent climax= jackpot!" Of course, what this hysterical Hebrew is really complaining about is the fact that Zahler prefers working within traditional western themes and does not contaminate his work with the social justice disease, Marxist sermonizing, nor phony token nonwhite characters, which is typical of contemporary Hollywood. Of course, as a member of the chosen tribe that has confessed that his favorite filmmaker is Sidney Lumet—a socially conscious Jew that directed such classic unAryan titles as 12 Angry Men (1957), The Fugitive Kind (1960), and Serpico (1973), among various other examples—Zahler would have hardly made the cut if he had a time-machine and traveled back to the Third Reich in a desperate attempt to get a job with Dr. Joseph Goebbels' studio (though, as recounted by the filmmaker himself in Godard's Contempt (1963), it should be noted that half-heeb Fritz Lang claimed that he was actually offered such a lofty position). Clearly a sane and masculine-minded individual that is able to appreciate art despite the politics of a particular artist, Zahler once revealed in an interview with the self-described 'extreme music journal' Worm Gear in regard to his preternatural interest in counter-kosher art, "I'm a (non-practicing) Jewish dude, but reviewed bands with white power or fascist leanings, because I have an ‘art over politics’ viewpoint, and even though Mike G was sensitive about this stuff, he and Wagner still ran reviews—often positive—of this material. People have a right to hate whomsoever they want to hate and also to express that feeling. Charles Dickens has a ton of anti-Semitic shit in his work, and he is a writer I like who was an inspiration to me as a young fiction writer. I’ve just never felt the best way to respond to intolerance is by returning the sentiment—partially because that is the desired response to intolerance.” Undoubtedly, if most Jews and left-wingers had a more reasonable attitude like Zahler does, the United States would not be on the brink of a second civil war, which is somewhat ironic considering that Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich depicts dolls waging a war against the very same sort of oh-so sensitive people that would want such a film banned and, for that very reason alone, it is much more important than the average hokey horror-comedy turd.

Just like most of the films Zahler has been involved with, Teutonic Überqueen Udo Kier—an unquestionably strangely charming chap that, not unlike fine wine, seems to get better with age—plays a small but unforgettable role in Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich as the eponymous figure André Toulon. Of course, in this (anti)sequel, Toulon is more of an antagonist than protagonist, but I could not help but root for him, as Herr Kier almost always comes off as distastefully likeable. A effortlessly effete ex-Nazi spy of half-French/half-German parentage, Toulon is depicted at the very beginning of the film slumming it at a soulless hipster bar in Postville, Texas in 1989. When Toulon tries to strike up a conversation with a female bartender and she gleefully attempts to piss him off by making out with her dyke friend, he mumbles “disgusting homosexuals” and subsequently summons his Nazi puppets to dispatch the extra county carpet-munchers. The cops eventually later catch Toulon in the act in his Hitler house of horrors using occult powers to kill subhumans, so they naturally kill him out of impulsive disgust. Flash forward three decades later to present day in Dallas, Texas and beta-boy divorcee Edgar Easton (Thomas Lennon)—a comic book nerd that writes comics and works at a comic store owned by his insufferably snarky semitic friend Markowitz (Nelson Franklin)—plans a road trip to a convention to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the infamous Toulon Murders because he owns one of the original Toulon puppets and plans to sell it there. Unbeknownst to Edgar, the ‘Blade’ puppet, which he finds in his deceased brother’s room, was also responsible for killing said deceased brother. Unfortunately for him, Edgar mistakes the uniquely unwitting mistake of bring his Jewish pal-cum-boss and new hot blonde girlfriend Ashley (Jenny Pellicer, who is the half-Norwegian niece of suicidal One-Eyed Jacks (1961) star Pina Pellicer) to a convention that is eventually blitzkrieged by a motley crew of nasty National Socialist puppets. Needless to say, as a place that details the history of an infamous Nazi where various expensive knickknacks and dolls are sold, the convention is flooded with Nazi-obsessed Jews so the puppets naturally decide to carryout a rather nasty Säuberung worthy of the Dirlwanger Brigade. While none of the puppets resemble Dr. Dirlwanger, Blade somewhat fittingly resembles a corpse-like Dr. Goebbels.

PUPPET MASTER: THE LITTLEST REICH

While Edgar might technically be the lead character, Markowitz is, for better or worse (I'd certainly choose the latter), certainly the most dominant and unforgettable, namely because he is a whiny neurotic loudmouth kosher cuckold of the stereotypically slave-morality-ridden sort that has Nazis on the brains, thereupon making his (rather pathetic) inevitable murder at the hand of a Hitlerian marionettes all the more grotesquely fitting. For example, when Edgar tells him that he will not be able to play his favorite music (e.g. grindcore) in the car and that he will have to pay for gas if he accompanies him to the convention, Markowitz retorts in a stereotypical smartass fashion by calling his goy pal "Genghis McHitler." Likewise, when the friends check into the convention hotel and the front desk clerk remarks, "You must be Markowitz," the Hebraic nerd bitchily retorts, "Why? 'Cause I look like a Jew?," thus underscoring his glaring lack of self-esteem and paranoia when it comes to his race-cum-religion. In short, Markowitz is what Woody Allen might be like if he was a chubby millennial anime nerd. When the puppets start killing, Markowitz—a grade-A four-eyed wuss with a flabby body and poor motor skills—declares in what is undoubtedly one of the most unintentionally hilarious one-liners in cinema history, "I got about six million reasons why" in regard to his decision to man-up and take on the terrifying toys that are exterminating his race. Needless to say, things do not go too well for Markowitz.

While it takes a little bit too long for the Hitlerian puppets to start killing, once it begins it feels like it never stops. The first notable death scene at the convention involves a yarmulke-sporting Jew named Jason and his wife. While looking for his missing 'Kaiser' puppet in the room, Jason rationalizes his somewhat curious collection of Third Reich material to his wife by arguing, "Lots of Jewish people collect Nazi memorabilia – medals, pamphlets, posters, stuff like that. My Uncle Shelley does. It's a reminder, sure, but there's also a feeling of empowerment there, you know? Like saying to the Nazis, 'Your big plans of genocide and world domination didn't work, and now your symbols are nothing more than trinkets for us, to collect, souvenirs of your failure and our survival.'" Rather ironically, only seconds after making his boastful Jewish power declaration, Jason finds his Kaiser, which proceeds to literally torch both him and his wife in what proves to be a literal two-person holocaust. Indeed, aside from knocking off his yarmulke, the flames reduces the faces of the couple to mere bone (or a sort of kosher 'totenkopf'). In a nearby room, a flying puppet named 'Autogyro' decapitates a gypsy while he is taking a leak and the headless gypsy even manages to piss on his own head after it falls into the toilet. After that, 'Blade' disembowels and slits the throat of a drunk blond gallery-owning queer shortly after he lies to his mother on the telephone about quitting drinking. In another room, a fat bull-dyke calls out for her girlfriend 'Anne' in the bathroom and is naturally dismayed when she finds her blue naked corpse in bathtub in what initially seems like a suicide but is ultimately something much stranger. In what is undoubtedly the most grisly and unforgettable killing scene, a puppet named 'Money Lender'—an archetypal hook-nosed rabbi-like Jew with claws that match his schnoz—enters a pregnant negress' vagina and eventually exists her bloated stomach with the woman's fetus in its hands in a scenario that surely can be seen as symbolic of the millions of black babies aborted by Jewish doctors in the United States since the landmark legal decision of Roe v. Wade Supreme Court in 1973. Undoubtedly, this scene is almost as shocking as Hebraic ex-abortionist Bernard Nathanson's classic anti-abortion doc The Silent Scream (1984), but I digress.

While Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich naturally does not have much in the way of a plot, it does have a lot of lame hipster-esque one-liners and whining, especially from Jew Markowitz, who states to protagonist Edgar after getting his fat neck slit by Blade, "Dedicate your next comment to me: to a great...Jewish hero. Shalom, amigo." Before croaking, Markowitz, who is certainly no hero, makes a rather pathetic beta-boy attempt at courting a uniquely unattractive Asian girl named Nerissa (Charlyne Yi) who, like the ill-fated Jew, has an unhealthy anime obsession. In what is undoubtedly one of the most (seemingly unintentional?) hilarious scenes in the film, Nerissa dies brutally as a result of her skull hitting pavement after making a failed attempt to jump out of a two-story window and into a dumpster in what feels like a sad commentary on the athletic capabilities of nerdy Asian fangirls. After all, Nerissa is the only character whose death is not the result of a Nazi puppet. Aside from possibly a negro bartender named 'Cuddly Bear,' who is brutally savaged by the puppets but whose true fate is never really revealed, none of the non-white/non-straight characters survive the genocidal puppet show. Being the white heterosexual male protagonist, it is naturally up to Edgar to save the day, but he's too much of a stereotypical modern-day spiritually castrated pussy to even accomplish that. Indeed, upon somehow magically realizing that Toulon is somehow alive (or, more specifically, 'undead') as a zombie and that he's using occult powers to control the puppets from the luxury of his resting place, Edgar crashes his car into the extra necrotic Nazi's fancy mausoleum. While this causes the puppets to lose their powers and thus stop killing, it quite predictably pisses zombie Toulon off and he instantly begins trying to kill Edgar and Ashley. While Edgar tries in vain to put up a valiant fight, Toulon grabs a luger out of a special Nazi suitcase and puts a bullet in Ashley's brain. In the end, Ashley is dead, Toulon gets away by slowly fleeing into nearby woods, and Edgar translates his story into a heart-broken issue of his comic series 'Madame Lightning.' While signing copies of his cryptically autobiographically comic, a young fan asks Edgar if he plans to write more comics and he replies, "Yeah, probably. I don't feel like things are fully resolved” and then the film predictably concludes with an inter-title that reads, “To Be Continued.”

PUPPET MASTER: THE LITTLEST REICH

As someone that is relatively familiar with various forms of National Socialist aesthetics and occultism/esotericism, I was somewhat disappointed that Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich did not really exploit this material. For example, at the very least, Toulon’s lair and/or mausoleum could have featured völkisch symbols like the ‘Schwarze Sonne’ (aka ‘Black Sun’), runes, and/or the quite alluring Ahnenerbe emblem. Additionally, aside from the skull-faced ‘Blade’ (apparently, three different versions of the puppet were used for the film) and ‘Money Lender,’ most of the puppets were simply too goofy to be taken seriously, especially ‘Happy Amphibian,’ ‘Grasshüpfer,’ and ‘Mr. Pumper.’ Undoubtedly, the filmmakers probably should have sought inspiration from Prussian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg’s magnum opus Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977), which features genuinely creepy puppets of Nazi bigwigs like Hitler, Himmler, Goebbels, and Göring. In fact, I would argue that the life-size puppets in the criminally-underrated British Angela Carter adaptation The Magic Toyshop (1987) directed by David Wheatley are much creepier than the ones in Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich, but then again, a pretty large percentage of audience members would probably find the film to be too disturbing if it took a more serious approach. After all, it is first and foremost a kitschy and sometimes even sardonic dark-comedy, as it would probably be impossible to take it serious if it was anything else, hence one of the various reasons why Zahler probably opted to not direct the film himself.

While I doubt it was the filmmakers’ conscious intention (though it might have been, at least partly, especially screenwriter Zahler’s), Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich can certainly be seen as an ‘unconventional’ commentary on the Holocaust and the legacy of Third Reich in the modern age, especially in regard to young American Jews that have no real connection to that era. Personally, I was somewhat shocked to learn that Zahler was a Jew after seeing his features like Bone Tomahawk and Brawl in Cell Block 99 they are highly masculine and testosterone-fueled cinematic works with traditional western themes that feature none of the insufferable sort of Judaic slave-morality sermonizing or race hustling that you expect from the stereotypical contemporary Jewish filmmakers ranging from Spielberg to Judd Apatow to J.J. Abrams, so I find it especially interesting that the Jews featured in Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich are unlikeable Holocaust-obsessed neurotics and narcissistic wimps that seem driven by a pathological obsession with antisemitism, hence the nerdy Jew named Jason who brags that he collects Nazi memorabilia specifically because it provides him with a certain “feeling of empowerment.” I do not think it is any coincidence that he is the first character killed in the film as his mentality and overall demeanor epitomizes what gentiles find most loathsome about Israelites. While various Jewish intellectuals ranging from Karl Marx to Otto Weininger to Gilad Atzmon have theorized about the motivation behind Jewish self-loathing and self-obsession, Charles Manson, who knew a number of prominent Jewish gangsters in prison, of all people once provided one of the more interesting arguments behind this. Indeed, in a 1989 interview with Penny Daniels, Manson, who sometimes made insightful statements in between his esoteric gibberish, remarked in regard to the Jewish tendency of Hitler (anti)worship and the strange tendencies in relation to his Jewish cellmate Jerry Milman, “How do you have peace on this earth? You can’t have peace on this earth unless you let the Second World War die. You wanna keep the Second World War going?! You wanna keep selling and buying Germans and dead Indians on TV every day? You know, that’s got to stop. The Second World War’s got to stop. And its got in the Jews. The Jews won’t let the Second World War stop. They keep the Second World War going [...] they keep perpetuating it because they’re making money! As soon as the Second World War was over, they never stopped the brainwashing. The brainwashing they were selling the American public was making money [...] Their not gonna stop making money! If the combination is there to make money, their gonna keep selling it. They’ll sell it all the way until I’m in the cell with a guy name Milman. Jerry Milman. And he’s got pictures of Hitler and Japanese and things and all . . . and I said, ‘Boy, Hitler must’ve been a hell of a guy,’ and he said, ‘Hitler was terrible. I hate him! I hate him!’ I said, ‘Why do you hate him?’ He said, ‘I’m a Jew.’ I said, ‘Why do you enshrine this guy? Is he your daddy?’ And he looked up to his mother’s fear. And his mother’s fear was Hitler. Hitler was like his father figure. He loved Hitler . . . but he hated Hitler. He needed Hitler to hold him up. Because Hitler was holding his hate up. Because, without his hate, he didn’t exist. He didn’t have no reason to live unless he had some hate. He didn’t have any reason to buy and sell unless the money held him up. If you took the money away from him, if you took the hate away from him . . . he’d be gone.” Clearly, Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich is a film that is a venomously sardonic assault on the very sort of archetypal Jew that Manson mentioned in his rant. Notably, more recently, Jewish American Olympian wrestler Mark Schultz, who was depicted in the Foxcatcher (2014), made a similarly and no less academically unsound argument when he offended his fellow Jews on Twitter by writing on August 14, 2018 (in a now-deleted tweet), “Jews win by sticking together against divided gentiles. Jews love persecution. It justifies offense and reinforces the need for strength in numbers to divide and conquer gentiles.” While just speculation, I can only assume that Zahler’s intention with the film was to drive a proverbial stake through the the perennial Hebraic vampire of Judaic victimhood, which the original Puppet Master franchise undoubtedly contributed to.

Undoubtedly, despite its surely shallow anti-Nazi angle, Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich is—whether intentional or not (I can only assume the former)—a critique of American post-holocaust Jewry and its own sick propensity towards neurotic self-worship. Just as the Halloween or Friday the 13th slasher flicks depict dumb pretty Aryan teenagers being dispatched for committing sins of the flesh, the Jews and other 'minorities' in the film become victims of their own sinful Hebraic hubris. While it would be easy to write-off screenwriter Zahler as a stereotypical self-loathing Jew, that would be too simple and ignores the rest of his highly masculine (read: unkosher) and master-morality oriented oeuvre. In short, Zahler seems to have mostly transcended his Jewishness, hence why he had no qualms about casting living legend Mel Gibson in his latest feature Dragged Across Concrete (2018). Indeed, as the great Otto Weininger once wrote, "The antisemitism of the Jew, then, proves that nobody who knows the Jew regards him as lovable—not even the Jew himself. The antisemitism of the Aryan supplies the no less significant insight that Judaism must not be confused with the Jews. There are Aryans who are more Jewish than many Jews, and there are really some Jews who are more Aryan than certain Aryans." Surely, considering Zahler's less than hysterical attitude towards antisemites and antisemitic art, it can be said that he has, at least partly, transcended his own innate Jewishness. Likewise, the typical Jewish filmmaker could not have created a film like Brawl in Cell Block 99 where a white blue collar worker commits a sort of twisted modern Christ-like sacrifice and, as Weininger also wrote, "Christ was a Jew, but only in order to overcome Judaism in himself most completely, since the firmest believer is he who has overcome the most powerful doubt, and the most positive affirmer he who has risen above the most dreary negation."

PUPPET MASTER: THE LITTLEST REICH

Unlike a lot of cinema, Zahler's films, including Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich, reject the metaphysical diseases of modernity and as Weininger wrote over a century ago in regard to modernity, "Our present age shows Judaism at the highest peak it has climbed since the days of Herod. The spirit of modernity is Jewish, wherever one looks at it. Sexuality is affirmed and today's specifies ethic sings the wedding hymn to sexual intercourse. The unfortunate Nietzsche is certainly not responsible for the grand union of natural selection and natural fornication, whose despicable apostle is called Wilhelm Bölsche. He appreciated asceticism and thought its opposite more desirable only because he suffered too much from his own. But women and Jews are matchmakers; their aim is to make humanity guilty." Aside from being responsible for a cinema that emphasizes heroism and strength over guilt and neuroticism and family love over soulless lust, Zahler creates films that promote sacrifice over self-worship and thus cannot be seen as in any way characteristically Jewish. While David Mamet—a right-wing Zionist Jew that attacks any Jew that rejects his race and/or religion—might have once wrote, "The quiddity of the self-loathing Jew, the opted-out Jew is his grotesquerie [...] his efforts at assimilation foiling the possibility of contentment with a group to which he actually belongs"—Zahler seems content due to the fact that he has transcended his Jewishness and not simply because he has fallen victim to 'assimilation.' After all, how could a Jew assimilate into an industry and culture that is covertly, if not overtly, kosher?! Additionally, Zahler is not helping his career by creating films involving Jews being blow-torched by puppets or muscular white proles exterminating entire gangs of Mexicans singlehandedly, so one can only come to the conclusion that he is an unequivocal auteur that is driven to create a deeply personal, albeit genre-oriented, that comes straight from the soul. Undoubtedly, the subversive nature of Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich becomes clear when one compares it to John Landis' surprisingly pathos-ridden An American Werewolf in London (1981)—a clear expression of culturally schizophrenic Jewish-American identity—where the auteur reveals his deep-seated Jewish paranoia in a nightmare scenario where a brigade of demonic Nazi werewolves quite literally holocausts his entire family in a dream-sequence that seems somewhat out of place in the film, at least if one does not realize it is a cinematic work that is fundamentally about Judaic introspection. Where it is clear that Landis is obsessed with Nazis and antisemitism in his classic kosher werewolf flick, Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich is a film that makes a mockery of such sentiments by gleefully depicting the most seemingly benign children's playthings brutally liquidating an eclectic collection of victim-mentality-ridden untersmenschen, thereupon killing the very spirit and essence of Charles Band's franchise in the process.

In preparation for this review, I attempted to (re)watch Puppetmaster (1989) and Puppet Master III: Toulon's Revenge (1991) but, unlike Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich, I found myself being unable to really concentration on the banality of it all. Indeed, I am willing to go as far as saying without even the slightest bit of exaggeration that the famous final segment "Amelia" of the classic made-for-television anthology horror film Trilogy of Terror (1975) features more delightfully deranged doll action and eccentric excitement than all of the original Puppet Master films combined. It is also no surprise that Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich shares something in common with Trilogy of Terror—a film where a so-called 'Zuni Fetish doll' takes on a dumb bitch chick—in that, on top of the fact that it features a puppet taking over the body of a human, it utilizes Lovecraftian tier fright tactics in its utilization of historical socio-cultural racial paranoia and animosity to stoke fear (whereas Black Devil Doll From Hell (1984) fails in that regard because it was made for blacks by blacks and thus comes off as superlatively silly). Notably, one of my earliest movie memories is being exciting about the fact my parents were able to grab a new release copy of Child's Play 3 (1991) at a local store video store, yet now it is nearly impossible for me to take any of these toy horror shit seriously thus making it seem like a miracle that I was even able to enjoy Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich. Interestingly, in his book The Mask Jews Wear: The Self-Deceptions of American Jewry (1973), Reform Judaism Rabbi Eugene B. Borowitz—a philosopher from a more liberal strand of Judaism that is arguably atheistic and promotes a assimilationist tendencies—reveals a certain shame and repulsion towards Occidental civilization, arguing, "I therefore have much sympathy for the concept of Black Power. As a Jew, I know personally that one can never truly be a person as long as he looks at himself with the eyes of those who hate him. I do not see how Jews can dodge the fact that, religious and social traditions aside, much of the best of Western literature from Marlowe to T.S. Eliot sees the Jew as intruder or enemy. So, every Jew appropriating even the best of this civilization must sooner or later come to terms with the scandal, the disgrace of his Jewishness. And this is one reason why we wear Marrano masks with such fixity—they enable us to escape from our stigmatized inner selves; they proclaim us to be just like everyone else." When I watch Zahler's films, I certainly don't sense this shame or repugnance towards the West, as they are cinematic works that express the opposite. For that reason alone, I certainly would nominate Zahler to 'Honorary Aryan' status, even though his favorite filmmaker is Sidney Lumet. As for a potential sequel that is hinted at quite blatantly at the conclusion of Puppet Master: The Littlest Reich, the possibilities seem endless but I think the coolest concept would involve the puppets heading to the nightmarish Unite the Right of 2017 in Charlottesville, Virginia. After all, the counter-protestors were comprised of a rather eclectic collection of degenerates that the puppets would clearly love targeting, though somehow I think they would go after Richard Spencer too.

PUPPET MASTER: THE LITTLEST REICH

-Ty E

APOCALYPSE ACCORDING TO CIORAN

Sorin Ilieșiu (1995)

During the beginning of the ethereal yet gritty documentary Apocalypse According to Cioran aka Apocalipsa dupa Cioran (1995), the exceedingly morose quote “World history is nothing else than a repetition of catastrophes waiting for a final catastrophe” appears on the screen among real war scenes of death and destruction. Those familiar with Romanian philosopher Emil Cioran’s work will be anything but surprised by the quote, but for the initiated, such a quote might seem a tad bit misanthropic. Also during the introduction, Cioran makes an appearance with his head tilted down and with his hands covering his head. Such a dramatic pose would lead many to suspect that the elderly man had just lost his wife to cancer or any other of a number of tragedies that usually affect those people in their barely shimmering golden years, but, alas, Cioran is in his typical and virtually lifelong state of despair; a cursed gift that enabled the Romanian-turned-unenthusiastic-Frenchman philosopher to write a number of books that are often considered the last great philosophical works of the Occident. Cioran has been described as the “King of pessimists”; no doubt a title that he deserves as he both wrote and practiced his disdain for living for most of his adult life like no man before nor after him. In the film Apocalypse According to Cioran, fellow Romanian philosopher (of a later generation) Gabriel Liiceanu (who also wrote a book on his elder) visited Cioran during his last year on earth at his humble apartment in Paris, France; a city the Romanian philosopher had been living in since a self-imposed exile 53 years earlier and described as an “Apocalyptic Garage.” Despite living in France for the far greater portion of his life, Cioran refused to allow a French film crew to interview him, so one might wonder why he left his homeland in the first place if he only seems trusting towards those that share the same ancient Slavo-Latin peasant blood. During his twenties, Cioran supported the Iron Guard; a mystical Romanian fascist movement led by the undeniably charismatic and equally handsome Corneliu Zelea Codreanu. As expressed in Apocalypse According to Cioran, Cioran’s emigration to France was largely the result of his disillusionment with the Iron Guard and its notorious acts of bloody murder and selfless martyrdom. While living in Berlin, Germany in 1933, Cioran approved of Adolf Hitler’s execution of the Night of the Long Knives; a cannibalistic purge resulting in the murder of most of the Nazi SA brownshirts leadership but mass murder in his homeland caused great regret and shame in the Romanian philosopher; the sort of discomposure that causes a man to leave his homeland for good.

Like his imperative influence Friedrich Nietzsche, Cioran was the son of a religious man who made no qualms about disavowing his father’s faith. Also like Nietzsche, Cioran’s words are those of a nihilist prophet. Like many great ancient religious texts, Cioran’s works are packed with infinite wisdom and are worthy of much consideration and constant critical contemplation. During his fascist years, Cioran wrote the book The Transfiguration of Romania (1936); a Spenglerian (and, indeed, the works of fellow pessimist Oswald Spengler were a huge influence on the young Cioran) text that calls for the cultural rejuvenation of Romania in the hope of assembling a rich destiny like France and a large population rivaling that of China. As explained in Apocalypse According to Cioran, the Romanian philosopher's fascist activism was largely the result of his belief in the inferiority of Romania and its relatively uneventful history. Cioran felt that Romania acquired most of its culture from alien peoples and nations and had nothing of its own, thus, he saw the Iron Guard as an active road towards revamping his homeland and putting it on a path to the sort of greatness associated with Germany and France. Of course, one cannot blame Cioran for his sentiments as Dracula is probably what Romania is best known for on an international level nowadays. Like Dracula, Cioran would also spend his nights wide awake. In fact, in Apocalypse According to Cioran, Cioran cites insomnia as the unwanted inspiration that sparked his despair and irregularity; the two uncomfortable states that would help develop and fine tune the prowess of his poetic pessimistic philosophy. As Cioran explains in the documentary, insomnia stirs lucidness and conflict in the sufferer, henceforth creating a wholly atypical and conflicting perspective in the individual. Like many (if not all) great artists, Cioran created works of philosophy mainly for therapeutic reasons, thus, it should be no surprise that his works became all the more dark after his brief and regretful flirtation with fascism. Cioran also cites megalomania as one of the inspirations behind his works and his inevitable break with fascism. In the documentary, Cioran explains that for most of his life he believed that everyone except himself lived under illusion. Naturally, an extremely pessimistic hyper-individualist is going to eventually realize that their philosophy is incompatible with a dangerously altruistic collectivist movement.

APOCALYPSE ACCORDING TO CIORAN

During his youth, Cioran made a morbid hobby of collecting human skulls and using them as soccer balls, which is indubitably a purely coincidental metaphor for his pessimistic yet often humorous and strangely joyful writings. Naturally, prophets of doom tend to have a distinct and refined sense of humor for such individuals would find life totally unbearable if they were unable to find amusement in things that also happen to be stabbing at their lost souls on a 24 hour basis. As he makes bluntly clear in Apocalypse According to Cioran, futility and death are the two themes that can be found in all of Cioran's works and have haunted the unromantic Romanian for most of his life. Apocalypse According to Cioran features a soundtrack reminiscent of the score featured in Herk Harvey's surrealist horror masterpiece Carnival of Souls (1962) which might sound strange to those reading this review but it is undoubtedly nothing short of complimentary when considering the real-life horrors and despair Cioran lived and wrote about on a day-to-day basis. Whereas one could consider Mircea Eliade the Martin Heidegger of Romania (both philosophers never apologized for their political activism yet both thinkers have retained most of their prestige as distinguished thinkers); Emil Cioran is surely the Oswald Spengler of his homeland as both apocalyptic philosophers originally desired a nationalist revolution in their nation but eventually lost total faith in the cause and died in a state of loneliness and hopeless impotence. Of course, Cioran, unlike Spengler, is still considered a highly revered thinker today as even the wretched Jewess Susan Sontag, who once proclaimed "the white race is the cancer of human history," stated of the Romanian ex-fascist that he is "one of the most delicate minds of real power writing today. Nuance, iron, and refinement are the essence of (Cioran's) thinking." As one would expect from a documentary about Cioran, Apocalypse According to Cioran is not an embarrassingly emotional sentimentalist look at the nihilist priest but a complimentary celebration of his relatively uneventful life and irreplaceable work.

-Ty E

HESHER

HESHER

Spencer Susser* (2010) In a way, Heshher reminds me of Kubrick's Lolita, in which Peter Sellers gives a typically varied comedic performance that takes up a lot of screen time in a story that does not at all require his services. You get the sense that Kubrick would have been better off trimming the Sellers footage and making it into a separate film, perhaps "The Pink Pantherphile" or something. Same deal with Heshher- Joseph Gordon-Levitt gives a pitch-perfect, career-best performance as the ur-headbanger- a shittily tatted, long-haired pyromaniac who speaks in monosyllabic grunts and feels most at home clad only in his underwear on someone else's couch eating their cereal when he's not zooming around town in his souped-up van blaring "Battery". It is an instantly recognizable archetype, heightened to almost cartoon levels, but brought to life so effortlessly by a nigh-unrecognizable Levitt (Gordon-Levitt?) that one wonders why the fuck the filmmakers found it necessary to drop so awesome a character into so saccharine and unbearable a tepid family drama. I get the sense they were going for a sort of Visitor Q, "Teorema"-lite, the whole 'family in peril shaken out of their routine by enigmatic stranger' deal, only in this case instead of tit-milk orgies and homosexual dalliances with Terence Stamp we are treated to that guy with the big forehead from The Office looking stricken and miserable for two hours and one of the more grating child performances in recent memory.

Young TJ's mom dies and he has trouble coping and so he oh-so-quirkily becomes obsessed with owning the car she died in and runs afoul of this kid who works there who bullies him and he lives with his doting grandma whom he totally takes for granted and his dad who sits around in his underwear all doped up on pills, possible side effects of which include having a huge fucking forehead and only being amusing on The Office, intermittently at that, and so one day all angsty and unable to cope and shit TJ throws a brick through a window at a construction site and totally exposes Heshher in the process as that's where the dude was squatting so Heshher plants himself in TJ's house with the threat of bodily harm to TJ and in the process teaches TJ and his family about being a family, sticking up for oneself, AND he gets to totally plow away at Natalie Portman (Heshher that is, TJ totally wants to get at it, but he's like fucking 12 and she's Natalie Portman). So yeah, real TV Movie of the Week stuff, TJ dealing with grief, his shitty home situation, and being bullied with Heshher incongruously pasted onto the scenes, with nary a reaction from the cast. Heshher plops down on the couch across from dad, dad just kinda shrugs, Heshher watches TJ getting forced to eat a urinal cake at school, the bully hardly bats an eye. He also implicates TJ in some arson or something and TJ is the one taken to the police station. Up until the point we see Heshher and the grocery store clerk Portman plays going at it, I was pretty much convinced Heshher was just a creation of TJ's subconscious, like a live-action Calvin and Hobbes where instead of pissing on a Honda decal

Calvin has just lost his mom and grows his bangs all shaggy like so they can hide his tears. Which reminds me, this TJ kid is fucking annoying- I think the only direction given to the kid playing him was "alternate between looking like your mom is not taking you to your dad's for the weekend so you'll have to wait a week to play the new Halo game and looking severely constipated."

Which sucks, because Heshher is an awesome character. Take for instance the scene where Heshher, chomping away at the dinner table, chastises TJ for not walking with his grandma by talking about how he heard about a "granny rapist" and proceeding to explain in graphic detail what being a granny rapist entails- hilarious! Or the scene where without rhyme or reason Heshher demolishes some random household's pool, throwing in all of the patio furniture and setting it ablaze, and since Portman is on hand during this it brings to mind the pool scene in Garden State, that sterile slice of linoleum masquerading as "indie" cinema, and in a way it's like Heshher is saying FUCK Garden State and fuck you, Ms. Portman, for producing THIS steaming pile, fuck Heshher, I want out. Dude has a horrible tattoo on his chest of a stick figure flipping the bird and blowing it's brains out! Heshher, the character, deserves a much better starring vehicle than Heshher the After School Special provides. By the time the finale rolled around, with Heshher the holy ghost to TJ's son and forehead guy's heavenly father pushing a coffin in slow motion as mood music blares on the soundtrack, I half prayed for Heshher, so vivid and malevolent and METAL, to flip the coffin over, grab the dead grandmother's corpse (oh yeah, SPOILER!) and drunkenly facefuck her, revealing himself to be the granny rapist, before cracking Dwight from The Office's bulbous dome like an egg and making TJ eat a piece of his cranial discharge, SATAN! But no, we are merely placated with the footnote of Heshher leaving behind "Heshher was here" in spray-paint on the roof of the house, har har, as TJ and dad look on all misty-eyed and appreciative and shit. What a waste.

-Jon-Christian

DO THE RIGHT THING
DO THE RIGHT THING

Spike Lee (1989)

Due to the corrosive nature of Spike Lee's most controversial film, to discuss the film would be to humor the happenings with analytical discussion. In other words, if you haven't seen or plan to see Do the Right Thing I don't recommend reading any further as I will reveal many plot points. Do the Right Thing is Spike Lee's most critically acclaimed film to date and for good reason. Concocting a heatwave aesthetic, the burning asphalt leaps off camera and scalds your senses. This was Spike Lee's aim with the bright orange backdrops and sweat-covered hood rats marching up and down the block - it's quite obvious that he succeeded. The heat mirrors two purposes: to allow the boiling point of racial tension a visual metaphor and to accentuate the "hottest day" of the summer in which the film is set in. Rewind back to 1989 and you'll see the release of Do the Right Thing, a racially conscious masterpiece of urban life that terrified critics as fears and rumors of the film's release inciting real riots spread. To fully understand Do the Right Thing requires two key elements: being black and acquainting yourself with the many characters that Lee immortalized. As I am not African-American (but can speak jive), I must rely heavily on the second aspect in order to absorb any intended effect that Spike Lee had set out to burn into the brains of naive white liberals.

Allow me to introduce a selection of the colorful cast of characters now. Mookie, played by Laurence Fishburne, is a passive manipulator. Mookie also moonlights as a dead-beat father to his Latino girlfriend who has two volumes, squabble and mute - no in between. He is employed at Sal's Famous Pizzeria located in the projects of Brooklyn. Mookie is what can be considered a terrible human being, which is especially apparent at the film's end. He not only takes extended breaks while on the job but whines incessantly about having to deliver the pizza up and down the block - a task of which he is graciously paid but fails to understand the idea of trade. It comes as a surprise that he maintained his employment for as long as he did. Sal is a compassionate yet fiery Italian-American who maintains his business regardless of the racial climate that the area has turned towards. Considered not a dangerous neighborhood but a belligerent one, Sal feeds off the thoughts of his pizza feeding generations of children, surely a sweet man with the thickheaded and proud visage of an Italian. His pizzeria is what fuels the fire that rages throughout the second half of the film. Sal's two sons, Pino and Vito, are the typical Italian brothers, feuding amongst each other and getting into a homo-erotic fights now and again. Buggin' Out is the catalyst for the perilous episode that befalls the block and seems to reflect the ignorance of director Spike Lee, but we'll get to that topic in point later. Rounding out the cast is Da Mayor, a humble old drunkard whose wisdom makes up for his lack of decision-making skills and intelligence shared by the rest of the cast, and finally, Radio

Raheem, a philosophizing street preacher who sermons on the relationship of Love & Hate - Spike Lee's homage to Night of the Hunter.

As I mentioned before, Buggin' Out is the main offender in the film and the cause of substantial structural damage and the death of a brother. After purchasing a slice from Sal's Famous Pizzeria, Buggin' Out becomes highly offended when he notices no "brothas" on the Wall of Fame within Sal's Italian establishment. Sal responds "You want brothers on the wall? Get your own place". This is a perfectly logical retort from someone who manages and performs upkeep on his own shop. Seeing how Buggin' Out is so concerned with "staying black" and avoiding responsibility, you'd think an infraction could be laughed off as juvenile and redundant. But no, that isn't enough for Buggin' Out, who enlists the help of Radio Raheem to boycott Sal's Famous Pizzeria. The irony involved is that Spike Lee demonstrated the same indomitable Negro spirit as Buggin' Out did by ousting Clint Eastwood. "He [Eastwood] did two films about Iwo Jima back to back and there was not one black soldier in both of those films," said Spike Lee during an interview. Clint Eastwood responded how any self-respecting legend would and told the idiot to "Shut his face". What does one expect when someone in a league of his own such as Eastwood falls victim to a state of radical racial malaise. In one fell swoop, Spike Lee dropped his facade of intelligence and proved without a shadow of a doubt that he is as hypocritical and aggressive as the characters he creates. Furthermore, Do the Right Thing failed in regards to sympathize with the blacks. For most, if not all, white viewers, by the end of Do the Right Thing, one cannot help but to weep for Sal and his former famous pizzeria - victim to the destructive force of the black community. If what Spike Lee expects of his brethren to be true, by films end, blacks would be cheering on the destruction in quasi-brainwashed fashion while weeping for Radio Raheem, a man of no distinguishable humanity.

Radio Raheem is the whistle-blower to the climax. Herded into the climactic boycott of Sal's Pizzeria like cattle, Radio Raheem's stubbornness and general inconsiderate behavior lent to the greatest tragedy in Do the Right Thing - the death of the ghetto-blaster - the consequential relic of the film. Had Radio Raheem known that this confrontation led to his future death, would he have changed anything? Probably not. His character seemed to give priority to "keeping it real" over his own life. I find myself hardly empathizing over Radio Raheem's death, a scene that which later greatly inspired Mathieu Kassovitz's La Haine - as he never applied himself to anything other than "hood". The scene in which Radio Raheem enlightens Mookie on left hand, right hand is one of the more fascinating scenes to be found and proves that had Radio Raheem straightened out and garnered even a sliver of responsibility, he could have done something, anything other than loitering and listening to Public Enemy's "Fight the Power" on repeat. In the end, Mookie reveals himself to actually be the Antichrist of urbanites when he incites a riot by throwing a garbage can through the pizzeria window. As I mentioned before, Sal blesses Mookie with a job. Something that seems so irrelevant and passé to Mookie is actually a necessary element of escaping the cycle that all black youth are born into. As Spike Lee records via stream-of-consciousness in his companion volume to the film, "I gots to get paid. Mookie repeats this often. When he delivers pizzas, he refuses to leave until he gets a tip. You can believe that." Lee then calls him an "instigator, a rabble-rouser" and then expects us to back up the motivations that drive Mookie to destroy a positive influence to a rotting community. Spike Lee also scowls in the directors commentary that he "has only ever been asked by white viewers whether Mookie did the right thing; black viewers do not ask the question". He is also accredited to saying that those who question Mookie's irrational actions "are implicitly valuing white property over the life of a black man." This brings me to the conclusion that Spike Lee's ignorance is a cause for concern. Had black youth caught wind of the sweltering hysteria of Do the Right Thing, why, we'd have hordes of blind militants storming the streets "doing the right thing" and amassing millions in property damage stemming from persuasive hatred.

DO THE RIGHT THING

Tied together with Samuel L. Jackson playing narrator via the radio waves, Do the Right Thing is an exceptional package, often confused as well, which makes the film and its legacy truly hilarious. Spike Lee attempted to rationalize the bellicose blacks. What is left behind the rubble is a question asked and an answer nowhere to be found. Traditional white values are not to blame for interpretation, rather, the brilliant set-up as you watch the local Negroes, built to support, inevitably cause the structure to crumble. No more Sal's, no more pizza. The prospect of any self-respecting eatery was launched out the window when they formed a misguided uprising and destroyed what very little they had. The problem of Do the Right Thing is also its greatest aspect - it's a definitive racially polarizing masterpiece of cinema. It is the heat that gets to you. All the water in the world, nor the Popsicles can cool the racial tension that boils under the city streets in Do the Right Thing. When you take a step back and glance over the picture in retrospect, Ossie Davis as Da Mayor captures the only "good" force within Do the Right Thing. Da Mayor was passionate, wise, levelheaded, and intelligent - a saint amongst sinners. Is Do the Right Thing culturally important and a modern masterpiece of American cinema? Yes, but for reasons unintended by Spike Lee. I wouldn't go as far as to say Radio Raheem was murdered by hate, but instead: irrational stupidity.

-mAQaveli X

SUMMER OF SAM

Spike Lee (1999)

While Italian and Italian-American auteur filmmakers, including such diverse filmmakers ranging from Alberto Cavallone and Martin Scorsese, have made endless incriminating and unflattering portrayals of their own neighborhoods and people, lifelong race-hustler and honky baiter Spike Lee (She's Gotta Have it, Malcolm X), undoubtedly the single greatest Negro filmmaker who has ever lived, probably created what is the most epically Italo-incendiary "Wopsploitation" ever made, Summer of Sam (1999)—a work centering on a blue collar Guido community in the Bronx set around the backdrop of the so-called "Son of Sam" serial murders carried out by deranged Jewish-American serial killer David Berkowitz. As someone who has already displayed a more brazen and glaring contempt for 'sub-white' types like Italians, Jews, and the Irish as opposed to WASPs and Nordic types as demonstrated in his classic works of heated race-hate, including Do the Right Thing (1989), Jungle Fever (1991), Clockers (1995), Bamboozled (2000), 25th Hour (2002), and Miracle at St. Anna (2008), Summer of Sam is undoubtedly the most uncompromising and unwaveringly malicious assault on the American gumbas, which is quite ironic considering, as Todd McCarthy of Variety wrote regarding the melodramatic crime-thriller, "this is the closest Lee has yet come to Scorsese territory!", as Scorsese is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, Guido American filmmaker to ever live with classic films like Mean Streets (1973), Taxi Driver (1976), and Goodfellas (1990). Of course, with films like Raging Bull (1980) and his classic mafia flicks, Scorsese has been known to give strikingly shuddersome portrayals of his fellow Sicilians, but it seems that Lee's Summer of Sam is celluloid revenge of sorts for the Italian-American filmmaker's nefarious portrayal of savage-like and conspicuously criminally-inclined negroes in Taxi Driver as never have I seen such an eclectically retarded cast of garlic-eating wop retards than in Summer of Sam—a perturbing portrait of NYC's Little Sicily as a modern day Sodom and Gomorrah, except where the pervert protagonist can only 'rise to the occasion' for every wop whore aside from his wife. Starring Colombian-American actor John "Spic-O-Rama" Leguizamo—a man of marginal Italian ancestry but who describes himself as being of "Amerindian and Mestizo heritage"—as a flamboyant and semi-faggy heterosexual hairdresser, and the blatantly much taller and more attractive Mira Sorvino as his wife, Summer of Sam follows what happens when a bunch of deluded Guidos become paranoid because of a homicidal Hebraic serial killer is killing brunette babes around town. Offending the families of the victims of Berkowitz, as well as prideful Italian Americans, who left racially-charged and anti-Spike Lee graffiti around the production during the making of the film, Summer of Sam is the Negro filmmaker's bitter unlove letter to the rotten Big Apple's Sicilian community. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Spike

SUMMER OF SAM

Lee once wrote in his Do the Right Thing companion book regarding a Eddie Murphy sketch that, "The most truthful thing he said is that Italians act like niggers more than niggers do. It's true, they certainly act Black and don't even know it," as Summer of Sam is a virtual quasi-pornographic Guido show for the American racial apocalypse.

It is the summer of 1977 and everyone in New York City is freaking about the sensationalized Son of Sam serial killer case, which is dominating media headlines. Set around a group of half brain-dead and delinquent Dago dumbasses in the Bronx (filmed in the Throgs Neck/Country Club section of The Bronx, which is apparently more German/Irish than Italian in real-life), including protagonist Vinny (John Leguizamo), a hyper horny hairdresser who gets hard for anal sex, but falls flaccid when it comes to his beautiful wife Dionna (Mira Sorvino), Summer of Sam shows what happens when you're born Sicilian-American and never get out of the neighborhood. During the beginning of the film, Vinny, dressed in gay disco clothes, goes to a night club with his girl Dionna, but being a sexual psychopath of sorts, he offers to drive his wife's Italian cousin back home and makes a pit stop to screw in her car. Vinny goes back to the club and picks his wife up and on the way back he runs into a crime scene where the Son of Sam has just unleaded bullets on a couple in a flashy sports car. Dionna smells the vaginal juices of her cousin on her hubby's mouth and immediately suspects his infidelity, but being friends with a group of dumb Goombah bastards, Vinny the ginny also runs into trouble with his friends as well. Vinny's friend Ritchie (Adrien Brody) is now a punk rocker with spikes in his hair who speaks in an absurd contrived British accent in tribute to the Sex Pistols, which baffles his vulgar archetypical wop friends who symbolically stand next to a sign that says "Dead End" as they aspire to nothing aside from dealing drugs and having an aimless identity in their own little Italian neighborhoods. Being more ambitious than his racial compatriots, Ritchie begins living a second life as a gay stripper/hustler/punk rock singer and gets another Italian girl from his neighborhood, a whore named Ruby (Jennifer Esposito), involved with prostitution and the punk lifestyle, which leads his small-minded neighbors to eventually suspect that he is the Son of Sam serial killer. Ritchie's girl Ruby may be a moron of the major sort, but she is intelligent enough to rhetorically ask the boys of the neighborhood, "Don't you assholes ever grow up?!" It would seem, at least according to Spike Lee, when you're Sicilian-American, you never grew up, but your childhood friends might beat the shit out of you if you get a stupid haircut as it scares their old world sensibilities.

While Vinny cannot get over his pathological and Catholic inspired obsession with "butt-fucking, 69," which he refuses to ask his wife Dionna to do, Ritchie dives deeper and deeper into a state of hedonistic nihilism and pawns his man-puss to buy Fender Stratocaster guitars (or as he describes it, "A fuckin' new Fender!"). Meanwhile, after being asked by a member of the NYPD to help, a local mob boss named Luigi (Ben Gazzara), who eats at an Italian restaurant where Dionna works as a waitress and that her father owns, takes it upon himself to take crime into his own hands by trying to identify and kill the Son of Sam killer. Unfortunately, Vinny's man-children wop friends, including their leader Joey (Michael Rispoli), also tries the same and based purely on his perverse punk lifestyle, nonsensically implicate raunchy Ritchie as the murderer after devising a list of possible suspects. Of course, the real killer, David Berkowitz, who calls himself the "Son of Sam," is into pseudo-occult mumbo jumbo, and is partly inspired to kill from a talking dog that he thought was possessed by a demon, is certainly no punk rocker but a pudgy beta-male of the physically repulsive and swarthy sort. After temperatures reach 100°F and a mass blackout hits the five boroughs, tons of black riots break out and mob boss Luigi holds a block party to cool things down while his Mafioso muscle patrols the streets for the Son of Sam. After attempting to see Ritchie's band play at CBGBs, Vinny and Dionna are pushed out by a group of pissed punks and they end up at an orgy instead, where vice-ridden Vin accuses his gal of being a whore after they both blow other people and snort blow up their nose, thus resulting in their separation. In Spike Lee's mind, Dionna finds the wild black snaked of a "soul brother" in a "big black Cadillac" with a "big black dick" is more sexually appetizing than Vinny's "linguini dick." In the end, Ritchie is severely beaten by his friends (Brody's Ashkenazi beak was actually broken during the fight sequence), despite the fact that the Son of Sam has already been snatched by the cops, thus acting as the climax of what is the wildly retarded and wanton Wopsploitation melodramatics that is Summer of Sam.

More than anything, Summer of Sam seems like Spike Lee's greatest fantasy come to life, a deranged poor Hebrew killing a bunch of wanton wop women while a bunch of wops with dead-end lives, to quote the filmmaker, "act like niggers more than niggers do," but as Guidos constantly say themselves, "Italians do it better." Indeed, I am certainly not the only one that believes this as I recall talking to a less than brilliant wop dude from New Jersey who told me that he and his pothead, drug-dealing father walked out of a screening of Summer of Sam in disgust due to its less than flattering portrayal of Italian-American garlic-eaters. Despite his clearly negative opinion of 'racist Italians,' Spike Lee seems to have a peculiar fetish for them as demonstrated by how many naked wops—both male and female, including a number of appearances from Italio-Mestizo John Leguizamo's bare ass—are featured in compromised sexual positions throughout Summer of Sam. Featuring a quasi-magical Scorsese-esque montage featuring the song "Baba O'Riley" by the Who and footage of wops being killed by the Son of Sam, Adrien Brody selling his ass to buy guitars as well as playing said guitar, jaded Guido junkies shooting up, retarded baseball worship, wops waxing their cars, trannie Dago potheads getting stoned, wops beating wops, and John Leguizamo pathetically praying to a Mother Mary statue, Summer of Sam is irrefutable proof that a black man, and a flagrantly racist one at that, can be rich and famous in America and make a move denigrating Italians—descendants of the old and great Europeans—into oblivion in a manner worthy of Veit Harlan's Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß. What one learns while watching Summer of Sam is that while Negroes kill people for new kicks so they can be stylin' for about a week, wops sell their willies to buy guitars, thus making the Guido seem slightly less pathetic, at least according to Mr. Lee's pseudo-moralistic celluloid pleas. Anyway, maybe its about time some real white filmmakers should take notice of Spike Lee's films, especially Summer of Sam, and embrace racial stereotypes and entertaining race hate once again.

SUMMER OF SAM

-Ty E

BAMBOOZLED

Spike Lee (2000)

While I do not typically tend to following the behavior of old independent filmmakers as all my favorites long ago croaked, I could not help but smirk upon passively coming across an attack against Spike Lee by old school auteur Jon Jost (All the Vermeers in New York, The Bed You Sleep In) on facebook on June 13, 2020. As an elderly lefty draft-dodger that seems to think he is still living in a different era, Jost is not exactly someone I find myself tending to agree with on even the most fundamental level yet he has proved with underrated films like Last Chants for a Slow Dance (1977)—a rather intimate and aesthetically idiosyncratic depiction of a small-time sociopathic criminal—that he is a singular and uncompromising artist and his recent rant against little Lee is fairly respectable and surprising considering the current state of the decidedly degenerated (dis)United States. Indeed, as Jost wrote, “I was never a Spike Lee fan. I met him once, long ago when I was running, for no money, a collective stand for American independent filmmakers at the Berlin Film Festival - 1979-80, I think I did it for 3 years. I tried to get Spike to join with his first short film, WE CUT HEADS. He was too busy hustling for himself to be bothered, and brushed it off. It had I think less to do with race than class – he comes from upper middle class Brooklyn and it shows. He is releasing a new film, DA FIVE BLOODS. Along with it, for Covid times, he put out a short, NEW YORK NEW YORK, which lasts as long as the Sinatra song. Shots of an emptied New York, taken from archival footage. The song, shots with dissolves and cuts. Real lazy-ass filmmaking totally leaning on the song. Bad filmmaking. Of course it has been praised as blah blah blah. Nostalgia is cheap. Sinatra is good. Spike is a ho, doing his best to prove he is a down black bro. It is an act and always has been, the well-off now very wealthy (40 mil) guy proving he’s one of the gang. Spike, like Mr Zimmerman, is now a very rich man. And like Dylan he’s made his wealth commenting on, describing, using the misery of America as his subject and topic. This is one of the magical aspects of America, in which it is always the wealthy who are allowed to speak for the poor.”

Admittedly, I found Jost’s sentiments, which I mostly share, humorous enough to inspire me to finally get around to re-watching Lee’s savage satire Bamboozled (2000), which was recently released on Blu-ray by the Criterion Collection for the first time on March 17, 2020. While I was not as impressed with the film as I was when I first saw it well over a decade ago at a more impressionable time in my life when I had less refined taste and now see it as somewhat of a mess of a movie that oftentimes plods and succumbs to unintentional absurdity at its somewhat pointless 135-minute running time like so many other unpleasantly grotesquely garish Spike Lee Joints, I can still safely say that it is unequivocally the proudly angry Afro-American filmmaker’s most ambitious and subversive cinematic to date and in stark contrast to his recent curiously kosher conformist crap like BlacKkKlansman (2018) where he seemed to be atoning for the virtual career-long accusation of 'antisemitism' that began with the ADL and various Hebraic film critics attacking the director for his unflattering but historically accurate depiction of Judaic nightclub owners in Mo' Better Blues (1990). To his credit, Lee refused to apologize for these comically sound kosher caricatures and instead opted to up the ante in terms of ostensible anti-Semitic content with his most shameless and subversive film to date, Bamboozled, thereupon predictably resulting in tons of negative reviews and accusations of antisemitism despite his propensity to get away with virtually all other forms of racial antagonism. Following his most Scorsese-esque film to date, Summer of Sam (1999)—a film that is, rather ironically, also Lee's most anti-guido film to date—the film represents the director at the height of his most gleefully bombastic and hyperbolic race-hate powers as a film that does for both mainstream television and Hollywood in general what John Schlesinger's The Day of the Locust (1975) for Golden Age Hollywood, albeit to a more racially ravenous degree.

BAMBOOZLED

Undoubtedly, the selective outrage against Lee by film critics of a mostly similar persuasion becomes quite clear when one considers the predictable silence in regard to filmmaker's fetish for goombah-bashing as is glaringly clear in films like Do the Right Thing (1989), Jungle Fever (1991), and Summer of Sam despite the filmmaker borrowing his entire style from his supposed Sicilian-American friend Martin Scorsese. Of course, if Lee's films—or at least his best ones—were not ridden with raw race-hate and demented Der Stürmer-tier racial caricatures of virtually all races (including his own), they would hardly be worth watching and simply cheap expressions of glittery bloated budget kitsch (in fact, Lee's fairly unknown sometimes-filmmaker brother Cinqué Lee demonstrated a greater dedication to serious art fagdom with his film Window on Your Present (2010)). While oftentimes genuinely funny (albeit sometimes unintentionally so), Bamboozled is indubitably a fiercely fucked flick that is fueled by tastefully toxic racial venom and full of a very calculated yet primitive contempt where Lee demonstrates his nauseating sense of unselfconscious narcissism by repeatedly referencing to himself and his various enemies (e.g. Quentin Tarantino), but of course such superlatively senselessly shallow self-aggrandizement is one of the things that makes Lee's films so interesting, even if it does not exactly endear one to the filmmaker's character (or lack thereof). An unintentional racial exploitation film supposedly satirizing Hollywood's history of racial exploitation, Bamboozled is, in many ways, a virtual cinematic train wreck polluted with mostly corrosive racial cultural debris of both the long ago past and present and it is simply impossible to look away. Simultaneously critiquing the Anglo blackface action of early WASP maestro D.W. Griffith and Hebraic Hollywood while exploiting the most idiotic cultural trends among the modern-day black ghetto subproletariat, Lee's never-sweetly-sardonic satire is ultimately a surreal expression of racial neurosis and nihilism where the somewhat deranged director characteristically incessantly critiques yet never offers any serious answers aside from condemning the actions of ‘uncle tom’ types like the film’s unconventionally pathetic (anti)hero . In short, Lee’s pleasantly perniciously playful neo-minstrel movie reveals that the filmmaker suffers from a sort of racial psychosis which, as the film vividly demonstrates, is only natural for an innately inorganic ‘multicultural’ nation where the minority is forced to live at the behest at the majority; or so the fucked filmmaker wants you to think.

Undoubtedly, Lee’s racial psychosis becomes clear simply when one realizes that Bamboozled—a film that might have single-handedly destroyed the dubious legacy of Hebraic blackface icon Al Jolson had it been more popular—was dedicated to Jewish-American screenwriter Budd Schulberg (On the Waterfront, The Harder They Fall). While it does make sense that Lee would dedicate the film to Schulberg when one considers that the film was clearly heavily influenced by Elia Kazan’s A Face in the Crowd (1957)—an inordinately cruel satiric dramedy about the propensity for TV networks to create and celebrate loathsome grifters that the screenwriter is celebrated for penning—it does seem rather absurd when one considers that a major theme of the film is how Judaic writers, directors, producers, and actors have historically exploited blacks and negative black racial stereotypes. In fact, speaking of Hebraic writers, there is even a scene in the film where the (anti)hero played by Damon Wayans expresses his disdain for lack of black writers on his neo-minstrel TV show by contemptuously proclaiming to a Hebraic underling, “If I had my druthers, they’d be at least one negro writer in this room, and that afro does not qualify you, my Jewish friend.” Needless to say, the counter-kosher references do not stop there as one of the most despicable characters in the film is a seeming sociopathic Jewess named Myrna Goldfarb (Dina Pearlman) who postures as a good little racial freedom fighter by bragging in an obnoxiously condescending manner to the black protagonist in regard to her ancestral civil rights cred, “my parents marched in Selma, Alabama, with Dr. King” while simultaneously suggesting means to exploit exceedingly grotesque (anti)black racial stereotypes on television. In fact, the character of Myrna Goldfarb is more loathsome than anything you might find in Veit Harlan infamous NS classic Jud Süß (1940) as the villain of that film at least has his positive traits, so it should be no surprise that Lee was routinely accused of antisemitism by various film critics. Notably, Lee actually based Goldfarb on a real person, or as the filmmaker explained in Spike Lee: Interviews (2002), “There was an article in their VANITY FAIR or NEW YORK magazine about these young Jewish women publicists for the Wu-Tang Clan, and she was sort of patterned after them. That’s another thing, getting back to what we were talking about before, I’m supposed to be anti-Semitic. Because BAMBOOZLED has a publicist named Myrna Goldfarb, that’s another example of my anti-Semitism! That’s what Amy Taubin said in the VILLAGE

BAMBOOZLED

VOICE.”

Aside from possibly Goldfarb, the character of Thomas Dunwitty (portrayed by obnoxious Hebraic philistine Michael Rapaport)—a gleefully racist wigger TV executive that has happens to be the boss of the film’s ‘uncle tom’ protagonist Pierre Delacroix/Peerless Dothan (Damon Wayans)—is probably the most decidedly despicable as a rude and raunchy race-fetishizing fiend that literally gets off to routinely shouting “nigger” at blacks in between strategically bragging about the fact that he has a black wife and mulatto kids. Playing it safer with Dunwitty—or ‘dumb whity’ as the name less than subtly suggests—the character is more covertly kosher as demonstrated by his use of stereotypical Yiddish phrases like “Mazel tov” and unforgettably unflattering portrayal by low IQ Hebraic hothead Rapaport who is just as notorious in both acting roles and real-life for shamelessly ‘acting black’ as is probably exemplified in the singularly horrendous film Zebrahead (1992). Dunwitty hates “white-bread” shows about black people and considers the idea that a healthy black middleclass even exists as being patently absurd and beneath contempt as the character takes an almost a demonic delight in lowbrow black dysfunction. Fed up with the fact that Dunwitty rejects and cancels any show that he writes about intelligent bourgeois black types, Pierre Delacroix—a racially conflicted type that was born ‘Peerless Dothan’ but decided to change his name to sound more ‘white’ (it seems Lee has never heard of famous black American filmmaker Oscar Micheaux or French colonialism)—conspires to create a modern-day minstrel show that is so ruthlessly racially repugnant that he can escape his contract by being fired while, at the same time, somehow exposing the racism of the TV network. Of course, in the tradition of Melvyn Kaminsky’s The Producers (1967), Pierre’s preposterous scheme does not exactly work out as planned and instead he unleashes a sort of culturally terrifying televised negro nightmare that ultimately destroys his entire life and confirms that many (white) Americans (still?) believe that blackface is beautiful (or something). While obviously a satire, Lee, who was partly inspired to create the film as a result of being disturbed upon seeing such cinematic classics as D.W. Griffith’s The Birth of a Nation (1915) and Victor Fleming’s Gone with the Wind (1939) in film school, clearly wants the viewer to see the film as, at least in part, a horror film of the aberrant agitprop sort where whity has his face rubbed in the cultural disgrace of the blackface of his ancestors (which is made quite clear in a vintage blackface montage at the very end of the film). When lead Pierre declares to his bitch boss Dunwitty, “And as Mark Twain so fully understood, satire is the way if we are ever to live side by side in peace and harmony. So my show that I’m pitching is about promoting racial healing,” he is clearly expressing the opposite of Lee’s sentiment and intent as Bamboozled is unequivocally a ‘race hate’ film that can only inspire racial hatred, nihilism, and gaslighting. Still, I would argue that it is Lee’s unequivocal pièce de résistance and a tastefully trying testament to the racially apocalyptic essence of the decidedly (dis)United States of American. A satire-within-a-satire (as well as a satire of satires), the film ironically (attempts to) underscore how racial satires can have the opposite effect of their artistic intent, or so the uniquely unhip and hapless protagonist Pierre learns upon exploiting the great American culture of taboo blackface with the noble objective of ruthlessly squashing negative black stereotypes and ultimately discovering to his great chagrin that America loves said stereotypes, hence the popularity of hip hop and household name status of such dubious buffoons as Snoop Dogg and Lil Wayne who certainly represent a sort of neo-minstrel phenomenon of sorts.

Notably, in his insightful yet oftentimes historically dishonest text Blackface, White Noise: Jewish Immigrants in the Hollywood Melting Pot (1996), Judaic far-left political scientist Michael Rogin—the progeny of union and pinko activist types—attempts to downplay the severity of the Yiddish role in blackface and Al Jolson's (in)famous performance in The Jazz Singer (1927) (which of course is routinely referenced in Bamboozled). Indeed, in regard to the 'musical miscegenation' of Jolson and company, Rogin argues, "Like the Jewish struggle for racial justice, the black-inspired music of urban Jews was a declaration of war against the racial and ethnic hierarchy of Protestant, genteel culture." In other words, the proto-wigger minstrel routine of Jolson, warped 'white negro' hipsterdom of Norman Mailer, and hokey hip hop hijinx of the Beastie Boys, among countless other examples, can be seen as at least partly informed by Hebraic hatred for mainstream white America. In Bamboozled, Hollywood executive types like Dunwitty and Myrna Goldfarb reflect the chutzpah and arrogance of this bizarre form of cultural appropriation that is expressed with a sort of gleeful contempt for the very same race of people that they are pretending to be in solidarity with. Driven by a sort of 'psychological blackface' sociopathy where they do not seem the least bit concerned about hurting or disrespecting the very same race of people they are ostensibly paying tribute to, these characters humorously manage to make a mockery out of both their own race and the one they are poorly attempting to pantomime. Blinded by an almost hypnotic level of hubris, they cannot even see black people as actual people with actual feelings as if 'being black' is simply an identity the one can purchase at the local mall when one feels ashamed at the banality of their own race. Needless to say, with Bamboozled, Lee exposes this cruel culture-distorting phenomenon while, at the same time, fighting fire with filmic fire. In fact, this was not Lee's first attempt at fighting back, or as Rogin complained, "No African American put on Jewface in a Hollywood film, to my knowledge, until Eddie Murphy's Jewish barber in COMING TO AMERICA [...] When Spike Lee turned the Jewish blackface tables in MO' BETTER BLUES (1990), with barbed, comic ethnic stereotypes of two brothers in the entertainment business, Josh and Joe Flatbush, the outcry about anti-Semitism sounded in a historical vacuum."

As one would expect from any of Lee's better films, Bamboozled does to some extent encourage personal responsibility among colored folks by ruthlessly critiquing its more self-destructive and otherwise deleterious elements. Indeed, aside from constantly attacking lead Pierre Delacroix for being an uncle tom that sold his soul to the very same pernicious people that profit from the exploitation of his race, the film also attacks the antihero's antithesis in the form of a militant rap collective named the Mau Maus—a group named in tribute to the Mau Mau Uprising (1952–1960) when black Kenyans successfully revolted against whites and the British Empire—that promote a moronic mix of pseudo-Marxist revolution and primitive ghetto culture that promotes drug addiction, illiteracy, and all-around stupidity. Notably, the group is lead by a charming chap named Julius 'Big Blak Afrika' Hopkins (Mos Def) who happens to be the brother of lead Pierre's self-described "little lamb" personal assistant/ex-lover Sloan Hopkins (Jada Pinkett Smith) in what ultimately a symbolic representation of black interfamilial conflict and the two self-destructive extremes of contemporary black identity. For example, when Julius dares to describe his sister Sloan as a "house-nigger" after she tells him he "sounds retarded" and is "embarrassing" due to his vulgar black nationalist rhetoric, she tells him to get his "field-nigger-ass" out of her home. While ostensibly on different sides of the spectrum of black society, both characters have virtually sold their souls as Sloan is a borderline sellout that works for a TV network that denigrates her people while Julius represents a lowbrow lunatic fringe that marinates in malt liquor, senseless black-on-black murder, and pseudo-Marxist moronacy. Needless to say, it is fitting that all of these characters meet tragic ends, though Sloan arguably 'redeems' herself by 'unintentionally' killing her boss Pierre who of course must pay for being the mastermind of the popular Mantan: The New Millennium Minstrel Show where black actors in blackface make a great mockery of their race for mostly adoring white American audiences. Hiring two haplessly desperate street performers named Manray (Savion Glover) and Womack (Tommy Davidson)—largely ignorant and pathetic characters that are desperate to get the latest 'Timmi Hillnigger' jeans—that he proudly rechristens 'Mantan' and 'Sleep 'n Eat' respectively, protagonist Pierre Delacroix boldly exploits and debases everyone with his new minstrel show as if he is on some sort of holy mission. Needless to say, Pierre also thoroughly debases himself and in the end pays the ultimate price. Indeed, in what is arguably a symbolic depiction of Mother Africa getting revenge against race traitors, Pierre is gunned down by his beloved Sloan who, as an unintended consequence of the protagonist's neo-minstrel show (which she reluctantly worked on), loses both her lover Manray and brother Julius. In short, Bamboozled does not have a happy ending because Lee (probably rightly) believes that there is probably no happy ending to America's racial disharmony as virtually all of past human history has confirmed, hence the cathartic need for comedy of this inordinately cruel and conflicted sort. Undoubtedly, the successful but short-lived sketch comedy show Million Dol- lar Extreme Presents: World Peace (2016)—a so-called ‘post-irony’ TV series that was also ruthlessly attacked (and ultimately blacklisted) under the dubious charge of antisemitism—achieved something similar to Lee’s film, albeit for a largely young white racially-conscious audience. When Pierre declares at the very ending of the film, “always keep ‘em laughing,” one cannot help but think it is the only way to endure this American racial Armageddon.

BAMBOOZLED

While Bamboozled certainly mocks minstrel-esque rappers that profit from making a mockery out of their race by being grotesque racial caricatures of the drug-addled, crime-prone, and sub-literate sort, director Lee certainly could not foresee the rise of mainstream rappers like Tekashi 6ix9ine and Nicki Minaj as they are indubitably infinitely more exploitative and spiritually bankrupt than any of the acts featured in the Mantan: The New Millennium Minstrel Show, which at least advertises itself as a comedy. Indeed, say what you will about the blackface buffonery depicted in a D.W. Griffith flick or a jazzy Jolson vehicle, but they seem fairly milktoast compared to the phenomenon of ‘twerking’ and gang murders that plague the sick and retarded anti-human joke that is modern hip hop (pseudo)culture. Of course, while Lee would probably attempt to argue otherwise, this killer kitsch (pseudo)culture is just as toxic to whites and other races as is to blacks (after all, the troll-like being known as Tekashi 6ix9ine is actually Latino). Notably, one of the arguments among proponents for desegregation was that it would help to uplift blacks, but as the popularity of rap music certainly demonstrates, it had the complete opposite result as demonstrated by the countless working-class, middleclass, and even wealthy whites that have adopted the culture of the poorest blacks in which is ultimately of vicious circle of spiritual blackface debasement where everyone loses. After all, one can only guess how many lives were ruined as a result of naive white kids embracing Eminem—a rather milk-toast moron nowadays who parrots mainstream media talks and routinely cries about Donald Trump and his shame at being melanin-deprived—during the late-1990s and mindlessly adopting the rather retarded (non)life that he so grotesquely glorified. Arguably, the deleterious and all-around nihilistic nature of this strange distinctly American (yet constantly exported) form of cultural miscegenation is best epitomized by the short and tragic life of SoundCloud rap/Emo rap figure XXXTentacion—a rather popular figure among melancholic and effete Xanax-addled white boys from broken middleclass homes—who ostensibly promoted anti-racism in a video where he hangs a white child and who brutally beat women and robbed people before he was gunned down at the age of 20 in 2018. While it is easy to write-off somebody like XXXTentacion as a wayward wastrel that got what he deserved, his popularity is the real concern as it means that audiences are just as unwittingly doomed as the dumb asses that make the minstrel show a big hit in Bamboozled.

A ruthlessly renegade musical of rancid racial razzmatazz where virtually every single (black) characters meets a miserable end, Bamboozled is not a product of the merry Martin Luther King Jr. School of Filmmaking where a deluded manufactured dream is dispensed like a condom from a machine in some shady truckstop but closer to the 'anti-communist communist' film collages of Dušan Makavejev like W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism (1971) and Sweet Movie (1974) in terms of pleasantly preposterously pessimistic perspective. Of course, Lee's film is about dreams, albeit of the doubly dark deranging sort where the intrinsic impossibility of (inter)racial harmony is sardonically exposed in the way characters of all races (but especially the black race) react to the most mindless sort of race-denigrating mainstream entertainment as they eat broadcasted shit with sadistic glee without even properly digesting it, therein finding themselves in a particularly precarious situation when it is far too late. Somewhat curiously, Warren Beatty of all people pulled a similar savagely satiric stunt with his somewhat slightly underrated flick Bulworth (1998)—a rare Hollywood film that also dares to point out Hebraic Hollywood hypocrisy—but little Lee goes all the way with a film that is the cinematic equivalent of a pitch black nuke as detonated by the crack-and-acid-addled son of Huey P. Newton. While the film might contain all the rage of Marcus Garvey and Malcolm X, it is channeled through the lunatic lens of MAD magazine marinated in malt liquor meets the peculiar plastic pathos and socio-politically revolutionary aesthetic artifice of Paul Schrader's Patty Hearst (1988). Shot on atrocious Mini DV digital video (with faux TV commercials curiously shot on 35mm), the film is, in many ways, absurdly aesthetically atrocious, which is fitting for an aggro Afro-American anti-cinematic work that basks in the nadir of kitschy cultural debris. In that sense, the film is like a cruel culturally apocalyptic cinematic counterpoint to James Whale's Show Boat (1936)—an inordinately romantic musical with exquisite expressionistic cinematography based on the novel of the same name by leftist Jewess Edna Ferber and penned by mischling maestro Oscar Hammerstein II that deals with themes of miscegenation (as personified by a tragic mulatta) and features famous black actors Paul Robeson and Hattie McDaniel—as a film that uncompromisingly shatters the liberal dream of 'equality' and does so in the manner of absurdist anti-art agitprop. Speaking of Whale—a cinematic maestro that was himself the victim of the historical curse of a marginalized identity via Bill Condon's defamatory yet somehow worthwhile fictionalized biopic Gods and Monsters (1998)—Bamboozled also tells a simple tale about the perils of creation and that there is always the danger that what you create might turn monstrous and escape your grasp as Pierre Delacroix learned the hard way.

BAMBOOZLED

As the various harshly negative reviews of the film and artistic stagnation of his career demonstrates, Bamboozled is the closest thing to a filmic Frankenstein monster that the Afro-auteur Lee has ever made as none of his later films would even come close to the venomous iconoclasm and subversion of his morbidly merry neo-minstrel movie. In regard to attacks from various Jewish critics, Lee once stated in an interview, "The easiest way to discredit the work of a filmmaker whose subject matter is race is to call him a racist. Simple. There is an unwritten code, especially if you're not Jewish, that if you have a Jewish character who is not positive, you're automatically considered anti-Semitic. But I'm not going to be handcuffed like that or be forced to falsify a situation. You mean to tell me that in the history of the music industry there have never been any white managers who deliberately exploited black artists? That in BAMBOOZLED, while I can have rappers going around smoking herb, drinking malt liquor, and killing people, I can't have a Jewish publicist whose character might be a little shaky?" Of course, as a good percentage of contemporary movie and TV trash ranging from White Chicks (2004)—a rare example of 'whitface' of the trans-racial/transsexual sort—to Dear White People (2017-present) to the singularly wretched Simon Kinberg/Jordan Peele The Twilight Zone (2019-present) reboot unequivocally confirm, anti-white racism is not only perfectly acceptable but totally vogue in the totally culturally, artistically, intellectually, and spiritually bankrupt cesspool that is modern-day Hollywood, but Lee is totally right about counter-kosher sentiment, which probably explains why he opted to direct the surprisingly philo-semitic BlacKkKlansman by kosher mini-mogul Jason Blum's innately anti-white Blumhouse Productions. In short, Lee seems to have learned some hard lesson as a result of Bamboozled about who he can and cannot attack and now he has ironically become a sort of Pierre Delacroix, albeit one that still postures as a subversive. Needless to say, to describe the film as 'woke' would be an insult to its artistic and intellectual integrity as such a film would never ever be made today as it at least partly contradicts the corporate-backed sapphic sista blm narrative.

For a director that has borrowed most of what he knows from great mainstream Italian-American filmmakers like Vincente Minnelli, Frank Capra, and Martin Scorsese—members of the group Spike has had a career-long obsession with treating in a minstrel-esque fashion (including this film, which includes an obnoxious Sicilian-American character in blackface boasting about the dark skin of his fellow Sicilians)—Bamboozled seems especially bizarre as a flick that feels like Federico Fellini meets Dogme 95 as directed by an angry black kid that just read the Nation of Islam (NOI) classic The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews (1991). In short, that such a film even exists is nothing short of a movie miracle and indicative of how once cherished things like 'free of speech' and 'artistic integrity' have become somewhat of an anachronism in the past two decades or so. While I have very respect for Lee as a man and only slightly more for him as a filmmaker, Bamboozled at least reveals that he might have become a serious artist if frivolous and superficial things like posturing and guis-dploitation tactics were not his main motivations. When I compare the film to his more recent celebrated antifa-approved conformist turd BlacKkKlansman, I cannot help but reminded of Pierre Delacroix's final words as he dies after taking a bullet to the gut, "As I bled to death, as my very life oozed out of me, all I could think of was something the great Negro James Baldwin had written: 'People pay for what they do, and still more for what they have allowed themselves to become, and they pay for it, very simply, by the lives they lead.' Indeed, one cannot deny that Jon Jošt was at least partly right when he declares, "Spike is a ho, doing his best to prove he is a down black bro. It is an act and always has been, the well-off now very wealthy (40 mil) guy proving he's one of the gang."

BAMBOOZLED

While he also committed the liberal sin of 'cultural appropriation' by borrowing virtually everything he knew from Europeans while ironically making films against European colonialism, Senegalese auteur Ousmane Sembène—the undisputed 'father of African film' and director of such notable works as La noire de... (1966) aka Black Girl and Xala (1975)—at least was the real deal in terms of organic black revolutionary cinematic art. In terms of somewhat overlooked black American directors that do not need to exploit black racial stereotypes to make authentic black cinema that culturally empowers, Lee simply cannot compare to Charles Burnett and his classic films like Killer of Sheep (1978) and especially the mystifying folk comedy To Sleep with Anger (1990). Additionally, Carl Franklin has proved a special talent for using Hollywood genre conventions to explore black (and sometimes white) racial issues with classics like One False Move (1992) and Devil in a Blue Dress (1995). Even when it comes to goofy black filmmakers like half-kraut mulatto Michael Schultz, his films like Cooley High (1975), Car Wash (1976), The Last Dragon (1985), and Krush Groove (1985) have more 'soul' than most of Lee's films and do not seem like the conflicted expressions of someone suffering from a terminal case of racial resentment, but I digress. Undoubtedly, in terms of exploiting the worst aspects of black prole kultur, Lee probably most closely follows in the footsteps of Melvin Van Peebles of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971) infamy. In fact, Lee even more or less copied Van Peebles' debut feature The Story of a Three-Day Pass (1968) aka La permission with his uneven miscegenation movie Jungle Fever (1991). To Lee's credit, he is still a much better filmmaker than Van Peebles, who seems to have never learned the basics of cinematic technique and has thoroughly debased himself with such retarded pseudo-erotic neo-minstrel shit as Vroom Vroom Vroom (1995). When it comes down to it, Lee is just doing the black mainstream equivalent of Scorsese and Robert Zemeckis (who Lee has curiously routinely criticized) and cannot be seen as any sort of innovator as even the low-budget films of a forgotten 'race film' director like Spencer Williams, including The Blood of Jesus (1941) and Go Down, Death! (1945), are considerably more idiosyncratic when looked at through the context of cinema history. Still, it takes a special sort of brutal bastard to direct a film like Bamboozled that was clearly meant to be an assault on the greater part of humanity and for that—and pretty much that alone—Lee deserves more artistic cred than 99.9% of Hollywood whore filmmakers, even if BlacKkKlansman is the ultimate expression of black-blackface shabbos goy whoredom and a disgraceful insult to the legacy of trash auteur Ted V. Mikels' exploitation excrement The Black Klansman (1966). Indeed, probably the only way Lee could redeem himself at this point is by remaking the West German exploitation classic Born Black (1969) aka Der verlogene Akt—a film that, incidentally was directed by a part-Hebraic exploitation hack by the name of Rolf von Sydow who, despite his partial kosher pedigree, fought in Uncle Adolf's army—as both the film and its director represent the sort of hyperbolic racial nihilism that America's #1 most famous black filmmaker does best. While Bamboozled is indubitably Spike Lee's most intellectually rewarding and layered film to date, somehow I think most viewers would find the cinematic experience more rewarding if they took heed of gentleman junky queer William S. Burroughs' words, "Exterminate all rational thought," for such is the only way to accept the innately irredeemable culturally miscegenated clusterfuck that is American (pseudo)culture lest you go insane with abject disgust and disillusionment, among other things. After all, whether Lee wants to admit it or not, Hollywood and the mainstream media has bamboozled everyone, especially America's infuriatingly voiceless and disenfranchised silent majority, hence the very real nightmare that has replaced the American Dream that exists today.

-Ty E

DA SWEET BLOOD OF JESUS
DA SWEET BLOOD OF JESUS

Spike Lee (2014)

I'm not one to take an affirmative action based approach to reviewing movies, so when I state that I think Bill Gunn's black bloodsucker flick Ganja & Hess (1973)—a work made during the Blaxploitation era that is always lumped in with such celluloid swill, mainly because it was re-edited and promoted as a black exploitation film under the title Blood Couple—is one of the strangest, most idiosyncratic, atmospheric, phantasmagoric, artful, cultivated, literate, and creative negro films ever made, you can be rest assured that it is a film I actually appreciate and not something I'm giving unwarranted puffery-plagued credit to because it was created by and for so-called 'people of color.' Of course, when I learned that Spike Lee (Do the Right Thing, Summer of Sam)—a small and spiteful little spade who, for better or worse, is probably the greatest and most prolific negro filmmaker that has ever lived—was planning a remake of Gunn's film, I was somewhat intrigued but even more surprised, as the last genre I would expect the filmmaker would ever work within is horror, especially considering the innately European nature of the genre. Of course, considering how absolutely dreadfully horrendous his Oldboy (2013) remake was (keep in mind I am not even a fan of Park Chan-wook's original 2003 film, so it was not like I went into the film already hating it), I set my expectations for his Ganja & Hess remake, Da Sweet Blood of Jesus (2014) aka 'The Newest Hottest Spike Lee Joint' (as it was originally advertised in promotional material), considerably low, especially after learning it was a fairly low-budget work funded via Kickstarter and shot over a mere 16 day period despite being about two hours in length. Luckily, despite being hardly a horror flick in the tradition sense (it is somewhat misleadingly listed as a 'comedy-romance-thriller' on imdb.com, though it does have elements of all those genres), Lee's film stays fairly true to the spirit of its source material (Lee even credited Gunn as the co-writer even though he died in 1989) in its extra 'Afro chic' updating of Ganja & Hess. Undoubtedly the most notable thing about Da Sweet Blood of Jesus is that it is probably the most thematically ambitious, esoteric, philosophical, subtextual, and 'arthouse' orientated film that Lee has ever made, even though it makes use of horror elements, including extra bloody murder scenes, so the fact that it was shot on such a low-budget is a blessing in disguise, as it enabled the auteur to do whatever they hell he wanted to. Indeed, for all his fiercely frivolous lowbrow race-hustling (for some reason, I seriously doubt Lee has read Fanon or studied the films of Ousmane Sembène), Lee has rarely transcended the sort of hate-charged lumpenprole 'Guido vs. negro' scenarios he is best known for, but in his remake of Gunn's masterpiece he takes a look at opulent pseudo-aristocratic blacks, the deleterious effects of black assimilation, the dichotomy between ancient pagan and Christian negro spirituality, jigaboo lechery and sexual promiscuity, addiction, and even the highly controversial issue Afro-faggotry, among various other things. In other words, Da Sweet Blood of Jesus is a film that most people will probably find somewhat inexplicable, including those individuals that love partaking in Spike Lee joints. Notably, Lee has been fairly evasive in interviews when he is asked what the film is actually about aside from claiming that the film is about 'addicts' and not vampires, even though said 'addicts' are undead supernatural bloodsuckers who can turn other people into undead supernatural bloodsuckers by drinking their blood.

Centering around a completely deracinated rich negro intellectual who has nil real friends and no experience with 'Da Hood' yet has managed to establish a sort of contrived black identity by dedicating his life to studying ancient pre-Christian African culture and religions and collecting priceless art and artifacts, Lee's film is ultimately a sympathetic assault against a seemingly imaginary and largely metaphorical 'American negro aristocracy' that has sold out its race for a life of personal wealth, luxury, and sophistication. Surely Lee's most overtly 'arthouse' oriented work since his low-budget debut feature She's Gotta Have It (1986), as well as his most daring and sophisticated film since the brutal anti-anti-Semite-inciting satire Bamboozled (2000), Da Sweet Blood of Jesus also bleeds a sort of strange sensuality and cultivated style that hints that Lee tends to hide a huge part of his personality with his big budget works so as the appeal to the lowest common denominator as his most popular works reveal with their lowbrow humor, pedestrian race-baiting, juvenile rants, and stereotypically dumb characters. Featuring unnerving homoerotic overtones, black sister vampire lesbianism, a sort of quasi-Jungian look at the African(American) collective unconscious, spade sexuality sans twerking and including sadomasochism, pathological Kubrickian dead-center framing, and a black antihero hero with a blood addiction as opposed to a crack addiction whose brain actually overpowers his blue-veined porridge gun, Da Sweet Blood of Jesus is not only Lee's most idiosyncratic film to date, but also easily one of most preternatural American vampire flicks ever made, even if the director denies that the characters are actually vampires.

Dr. Hess Greene (played by Jamie Foxx clone Stephen Tyrone Williams, who is probably best known for his role in the gay Bahamian flick Children of God (2010) directed by Kareem Mortimer) is probably the most pedantic Afro-centric fellow in the entire world, as a reasonably powerful and influential sage of ancient Africa who seems to have no other interests in life, including love, sex, and romance. Indeed, despite his pathological obsession with his ancestral heritage, Hess is the complete opposite of the stereotypical American negro male. While Hess is obsessed with all-things-African (or as he states while hanging out with his rich white pseudo-friends, "Africa is my passion"), he has virtually no real exposure to any sort of real black American community, as he is independently wealthy as a result of his deceased parents being the first black family to own a firm on Wall Street. Indeed, the closest Hess ever gets to any real black community is when he sits in the very last row of a Brooklyn Baptist church and watches silently and unemotionally as the elderly vaudeville-like preacher gives ridiculous sermons where he screams things like, “pick up that Bible and put down that .22 [...] put down that Uzi...you don’t need no AK47.” During one of these sermons at the beginning of the film, the preacher foreshadows Hess’ future life as a member of the dually dark undead by quoting a vampiric verse from John 6:56, “Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life.” While Hess is a practicing Christian, his faith seems somewhat dubious. While he has a pad in Brooklyn where he likes to take pilgrimages when he gets bored with rural island life, Hess’ mostly resides at his large ‘40 acre’ estate in Martha’s Vineyard, Massachusetts where he is the sole negro inhabitant and curiously lives the life of a ‘confirmed bachelor,’ with his only companion being an inordinately handsome and seemingly gay manservant with a sassy attitude. When Hess has a fellow negro nerd scholar named Lafayette Hightower (Elvis Nolasco of Lee’s Clockers (1995) and Steven Soderbergh’s Che (2008)) stay at his home after the rather wacky brother becomes his assistant, both his spirituality and sexuality will ultimately be tested.

DA SWEET BLOOD OF JESUS

A wealthy collector of ancient African art and artifacts who seriously believes, “Art is god’s ally...science [is] god’s natural foe,” Hess comes into contact with Lafayette upon purchasing an ancient Ashanti dagger that was used by an infamous negress queen who suffered from a blood disease and thus needed constant blood transfusions. Naturally, the queen used the blood of the healthiest members of her tribe for her blood transfusions, but she eventually began to use so much blood that her victims started to bleed to death and eventually a “pernicious anemia” plagued the Ashanti people, who inevitably became collectively addicted to blood and began waging violent ‘blood wars’ against neighboring tribes. It becomes immediately apparent that weirdo dork Lafayette—a rare negro who seems to suffer from Asperger syndrome—is more interested in Hess than the Ashanti tribe or Afrocentric. Indeed, Lafayette is a mental case who has been in and out of nutwards and his psychological affliction seems to be the result of being a sexually repressed latent homosexual as hinted at in bizarre remarks he makes to Hess like, “I suppose if I believed in desire, it wouldn’t frighten me so much.” During Lafayette’s first night at the protagonist’s home in Martha’s Vineyard, Hess is alarmed to hear loud unnerving crying from outside in the middle of the night and when he goes outside he finds his colleague squatting on a branch at the top of a large tree with an old school KKK-esque noose around his neck as if he is planning to kill himself. Lafayette is considerably intoxicated and when Hess tells him to get out of ‘his’ tree, he shouts like a mad megalomaniac drunk on Christ, “this is almighty god’s tree.” Ultimately, Lafayette eventually pussies out, accidentally falls from the tree, and subsequently confesses to Hess about his long history of mental illness. The next day, Hess awakens to find Lafayette running into his room and attempting to butcher him with an axe. During the struggle between the two negro pencil-pushers, Lafayette eventually stabs Hess in the heart with the Ashanti dagger and then subsequently begins crying after realizing what he has done. After expressing his repressed homosexuality by kissing seemingly dead Hess on the lips in a darkly erotic fashion, Lafayette ritualistically baths, brushes his teeth, and then proceeds to commit self-slaughter by blowing his brains out while still naked. The Ashanti dagger must still have its sinister mystical blood powers after thousands of years of lying dormant because Hess wakes up at the exact moment Lafayette fires a bullet into his skull and soon realizes that there is somehow no wound on his chest. When Hess finds Lafayette's unclad corpse, his immediate reaction is to begin licking the blood from the floor. Indeed, like his ancient ancestors, Hess is now a savage black bloodsucker who will do anything to get his fix.

While Hess initially finds creative ways to get blood like starting a fire at a hospital and subsequently robbing the blood bank while the doctors and nurses are scrambling to prevent their building from burning down, he soon decides to take a more visceral approach to feeding and begins frequenting a seedy black bar where he finds his first victim. Of course, first Hess has to develop a charismatic mack daddy persona if he plans to glamor prospective negress victims into coming home with home, so he buys a new stylish wardrobe and develops a sort of super suave alter-ego. The first person Hess picks up is a dyke-like dame with an unflatteringly deep voice and ridiculous blonde wig with the ironical name 'Lucky Mays' (played by real-life dyke and convicted killer Felicia 'Snoop' Pearson of HBO's hit show The Wire) under the pretense of buying her busted-up meta-ghetto booty, but instead of having sex with the trashy used-up hooker, the protagonist strangles her to death, pierces her throat with a corkscrew, and then proceeds to drink her blood, which makes him deathly ill since his victim is a pillpopper with contaminated blood (undoubtedly, Lee seems to pay unlikely homage to Paul Morrissey's Blood for Dracula (1974) as reflected in the film's various darkly comedic scenes where Hess gets extremely sick from drinking despoiled vital fluids). While Hess is perfectly fine living a solitary vampire life that is not much different from his previous life as a human as it still revolves around taking rides in his vintage Rolls-Royce, briefly attending shallow local parties where hyper horny rich old white twats with jungle fever attempt to jump his bones, and having his racially ambiguous British accented lapsed twink manservant Seneschal Higginbottom (played by Egyptian-American actor Rami Malek, who is coincidentally best known for playing a gay character on the FOX comedy series The War at Home) do petty bitch work, he has a sort of sexual awakening when Lafayette's ex-wife Ganja (Zaraah Abrahams) comes to Martha's Vineyard looking for her dead hubby. Although a brazen mouthy bitch that gets a real kick out of figuratively breaking men's balls, Ganja more or less causes Hess to fall in love with her at first sight, which seemed somewhat unlikely considering his dubious sexuality and seemingly emotionally impenetrable essence.

DA SWEET BLOOD OF JESUS

As her name surely hints, Ganja loves rolling big fat joints and smoking dope, though one would not assume so merely judging by her physical appearance and character as she is a high yellow black Brit with a posh accent and a razor sharp wit that constantly catches spade sage Hess off guard with her invasive questions and snide remarks. Naturally, when Ganja asks Hess if he is a homo, he gets pissed and complains, "Why does everyone think a man my age who isn't married is homosexual?" in a rather whiny fashion that seems a little bit too defensive, thus indicating that the protagonist is not very secure in his sexuality. When Ganja coerces Hess into smoking weed with her, the protagonist breaks down and confesses that Lafayette has committed suicide, but the little lady seems less upset about her late hubby's death than the fact that her next prospective lover is a glaring weirdo and complains, "How come every rich man I meet is so fucked up? Why can't you be sane? Normal? Anything but bonkers." While Hess is initially shy about having sex with Ganja due to his blood addiction and tendency to kill people during coitus, he eventually manages to make passionate love with Ganja without murdering her and the two fall deeply in love with one another in what ultimately seems like an idyllic romance between two physical and intellectual equals who compliment one another perfectly. Of course, Hess has to maintain his blood addiction and, in an allegorical scene that seems to symbolize the exceedingly abusive and exploitative way black men treat black women, especially of the desperate single mother sort, the protagonist seduces a young mother and then proceeds to kill her and drink her blood right in front of her baby. Meanwhile, Ganja finds the frozen corpse of Lafayette in Hess' basement freezer and begins to suspect that the protagonist murdered her ex-husband, but when she confronts him about it when he gets back from hunting single mothers in Brooklyn, the protagonist 'reassures' her that he did not kill her ex-spouse but merely drank his vital fluids, confessing, "I'm an addict...I drink blood." Not surprisingly considering her rather thick skin and deep love for the protagonist, Ganja seems fairly happy with Hess' explanation as to why her ex-husband's corpse is in his freezer and she even helps him dump Lafayette's corpse in a river; and if that is not true love then I don't know what is.

Of course, Hess and Ganja eventually get married and have a small Afrocentric wedding that takes place on the protagonist's beach and is attended merely by a black preacher in Kwanza garb and manservant Seneschal. On their honeymoon night, Hess decides to give Ganja immortal life by drinking her blood and turning her into a vamp, with the protagonist stating to his wife while she lays unclad and lifeless after he bites into her throat, "I want you to live forever." When Ganja finally wakes up, she is terribly ill and immediately begins fiending for blood. In a somewhat shocking way to reveal to her that she is now an immortal vampire, Hess stabs Ganja in the gut repeatedly with a knife and then proceeds to point out to her that she has no wounds. Not surprisingly considering she is a more emotionally impenetrable individual with a strong sadistic side, Ganja begins to enjoy being a bloodsucker more than Hess does. When Hess invites an old high yellow mulatto ex-girlfriend named Tangier Chancellor (Naté Bova)—a woman who jokes regarding her exotic racial characteristics, “My mom’s black, my dad’s Irish. Black Irish, there you go”—over for a long awaited get together, Ganja uses Sapphic seduction tactics to make the blue-eyed negress her easy prey. After smoking a joint while watching Tangier taking a shower, Ganja initiates sex with her victim and when the masochistic mulatto asks her to choke her, she uses the opportunity to strangle her unwitting prey to death. After Ganja is finished killing Tangier, Hess joins his wifey in slurping the McBlack half-breed’s blood off the floor. Of course, Tangier also becomes a member of the darkie undead, which is important as she later becomes an imperative presence in Ganja’s life in the long-run. Although developing a visceral hatred for Christianity after becoming a vampire as expressed in remarks like, “The cross is only an implement of torture. Its shadow is the darkness it casts,” Hess eventually has a crisis of faith and decides to head to Brooklyn and attend a sermon at the Baptist church that he used to frequent. Ultimately, Hess is so deeply affected by the bodacious Baptist minstrel show that he is exposed to at the church that he realizes that he can no longer turn away from Christ, so he decides to kill himself by abstaining from blood while sitting under the shadow of the cross. While what little is left of her cold black heart is shattered when Hess commits undead suicide, Ganja, who ultimately becomes a symbol of black womanhood, is much stronger and more ruthless than her hubby and perseveres in the end. In a concluding scene straight out of a Jess Franco or Jean Rollin flick, undead unclad Tangier joins Ganja on the beach, thus symbolizing that the two are now full-blow lipstick lesbo vamps who no longer need weak and meek black man.

I must admit that Da Sweet Blood of Jesus has made me question Spike Lee’s sexuality, as the film has about just as much queer content as the average François Ozon flick, not to mention the fact the filmmaker oftentimes acts like a raging queen that is in desperate need of some midnight tearoom action, but I digress, as the film has something more important about it that is worthy of a public dialogue among both blacks and whites. Indeed, throughout its jigaboo vampire microcosm, Da Sweet Blood of Jesus highlights the dysfunction and deleterious chaos that has not only plagued the black family, but also American negroid gender, sexuality, and romantic relationships. Surely it is no coincidence that the male lead is a rich middle-aged mensch with no children who is, among other things, racially deracinated, spiritually sick, and possibly latently gay or bisexual, not to mention the fact that he is weaker than his lover. As for the female lead, she suffers from all the afflictions of a ‘modern’ woman—be it white or black—as a bitchy, frigid, and hyper-materialistic dame with no maternal instincts or empathy who ultimately converts to lesbianism. I hate to admit it but I have watched a number of videos from prominent black personalities on YouTube like Tommy Sotomayor and one thing that they seem to always bring up is that most ghetto black single mothers engage in a lesbo relationship after getting tired of black men. These same YouTube personalities also always complain about how more and more black men are becoming crypto-homo/bisexuals (or what they call being 'on the down low' aka 'DL'). Of course, the way the protagonist of Lee's film ruthlessly drains the blood of a young single mother right in front of her baby is symbolic of both how black 'sims' treat women in the black community, as well as how young single mothers are so desperate for men that they will invite any strange man into their home (notably, it only takes a minute or so for Hess to coerce the woman to have 'sex' with him upon first meeting him). Of course, in its depiction of the protagonist being an addict and even taking a HIV test (which is administered by Lee's sister Joie Lee), Da Sweet Blood of Jesus ultimately uses a variety of creative methods to cram all the vices plaguing black America into one single film in an original way that Bill Gunn must be credited for pioneering, at least as far as the virtually nonexistent film style of 'Afro-American arthouse' cinema is concerned. As the film demonstrates, it is not the big bad and all-powerful white that has destroyed the American black community but the vicious circle of addiction. Indeed, not unlike white America, albeit to a more deleterious degree, blacks have become self-destructively addicted to mindless sex, money, fame, and drugs, which Da Sweet Blood of Jesus ultimately at least partly attributes to a loss of religion and true spirituality.

DA SWEET BLOOD OF JESUS

It should also be noted that, despite its damning critique of virtually every aspect of black American society and culture, Da Sweet Blood of Jesus has a semi-cryptic black power message that is expressed in its reference to the Ashanti tribe. Notably, out of all the countless tribes in Sub-Saharan Africa, the Ashanti people were arguably the strongest and most advanced as they were one of the only 'kingdoms' to put up any serious sort of resistance against European colonizers. In fact, during the so-called 'Anglo-Ashanti Wars' between 1823 and 1896, the Ashanti kings were able to hold their own against the British and it was not until 1901 that they were defeated and incorporated into the Gold Coast colony as a protectorate. Despite their nearly century long war with the British, the Ashanti also maintained strong interactions with Europeans and because of this they have the greatest amount of recorded historiography out of all the tribes in sub-Saharan Africa. Ironically, unlike most African tribes, contemporary Ashanti people have become increasingly irreligious and atheistic. Of course, as depicted in Da Sweet Blood of Jesus, spiritual degeneration leads to degeneration in every regard, though the film ultimately sends mixed messages in terms of what religion is most beneficial, but what is clear in the film is that people cannot go back to dead religions that were practiced by their ancient ancestors and expect positive results. After all, religions die for a reason and there is nothing more pathetic than a contemporary deracinated white American of dubious Germanic ancestry proclaiming to be an Odinist and committing the less than Odin-like act of trolling a Christian on an internet messageboard. Notably, the main characters in Lee's film do not have all that hard of a time adopting the bloodsucking rites of their ancestors because they were already so debased and morally bankrupt before turning into vampires that their transformation more or less seems like the next logical step for them to take in life, thereupon highlighting the spiritual and cultural degeneracy and psychopathic essence of today's world. While many nonwhites, especially American blacks, tend to think of Europeans and European-Americans as innately evil, what they do not realize is that Nietzsche declared god was dead well over a century ago in Europe for a reason, as the white world became spiritually impoverished long ago, hence the decline of the Occident and why figures like C.G. Jung and movements like communism and National Socialism attempted to fill the void that the disappearance of religion left, just as the Jews today subscribe to Zionism as they no longer have true Judaism. Like with everything else, blacks are just now beginning to catch up with whites in terms of spiritual impoverishment. While Da Sweet Blood of Jesus is surely not up to par with its cinematic progenitor Ganja & Hess in terms of overall importance, aesthetic integrity, and providing a totally transcendence experience, it is indubitably much more relevant to the problems of today's world.

Unquestionably one of the things I found most baffling about Lee's film is that it lacks the surrealist dream-sequences and oneiric tone that made Gunn's film so particularly potent and memorable. Indeed, Ganja & Hess feels like it is set in some sort of perpetual negro purgatory that falls somewhere in between heaven and hell. Instead, Lee took the easy way out by replacing the more arcane elements of the original film with Wilder-esque humor and 'sassy' dialogue as if to appeal to the lowest common denominator of audiences who would otherwise understand nothing else about the film. Negative qualities aside, Da Sweet Blood of Jesus ultimately makes for a great argument as to why serious contemporary auteur filmmakers should consider using Kickstarter instead of working with producers with last names like Goldberg and Roth, as crowdsourcing enabled Lee to make a striking, original, and seemingly highly personalized work where he did not have worry about being fucked in the ass by a shady producer or losing final cut. Whilst Lee has gone as far as to say that his work is not even a bloodsucker film (I guess vampires and vampire mythology are too European for him), Da Sweet Blood of Jesus still deserves credit for defiling classic vampire mythology to such a startling degree that it is comparable to what a band of a dozen or so Zulu warriors would do upon finding a bare big-assed colonial cracker bitch walking in the woods.

-Ty E

A SERBIAN FILM
A SERBIAN FILM

Srdan Spasojević (2010)

Ah, A Serbian Film. What could I possibly say that many of the sickened festival attendees haven't? Even the news of a disgusted film distributor leaving the theater only to stumble and fall breaking his nose scrapes the controversy of the film. Strangely, I'm not here to talk about the controversy because frankly, I don't care what others think about this film. This Serbian film is something that isn't an argument of taste or ethics. What you see is what you get and in this case, close your eyes, swallow, and accept your gift of pure and unadulterated venomous misogyny wrapped in a crunchy shell coated with a (so called) political allegory. A friend of mine coolheadedly recommended me to view this maelstrom of cruelty with no previous knowledge of the events or mishaps that may occur within. Much to my chagrin, A Serbian Film not only impacted me into a state of realized delirium but shook me to my core as I sought out to insure the stability of my future nuclear family. Even for the jaded business-casual wreck, this film should offer something contemptuous to feed upon your psyche. To redefine the plot within a spoiler-free confine, A Serbian Film offers up a family's story on a burner of esoteric deception. Milosh is a hardly working retired porn star who is struggling to support his beautiful wife and cheerful son, who is experiencing a sexual awakening in part of his dad's films, and is bleeding out his revenue on silly things like singing lessons. Scared of his family's future, he agrees to film a final piece out of retirement, one that is wholly unknown filmed by a mysterious man named Vukmir. As the "official" synopsis would treat it, the director's intention might not be as peachy and straightforward as the art would have it. As far as Milosh's odyssey of sexual humiliation is shown in graphic detail of ambiguity, I too have been in a situation entirely interesting and chilling to the bone, but not so much as depraved as this experiment in film-making. Some time ago on a forum, a beautiful woman began speaking to me in philosophical tongue. She had been new to the forums and keenly dismissing most of the horny teenagers making passes. As she private messaged me and our conversations raged on for days, she inferred me to a organization (cult?) known as Yellow-1. After much searching the Internet and not coming up with nothing, I linked my friend to the website and he returned with an IP. Tracing that and the location, we discovered that this organization was apart of Neurocam, which is known secretly as a strange affiliation that plays cryptic games of delivering and receiving anonymous packages. Almost like a real life courier game that is bizarre and unknown to most. After inquiring on their own personal web-board, I was plummeted with woefully profound messages asking me to question my own goals and needs, that brand of horseshit. After acquiring an application to join Yellow-1 in my mailbox, I dropped the topic with chills down my spine and moved on. Much of what I experienced cannot be transferred into mere words as it would rain down skepticism and diatribe on my end. We all fear something and it's always lurking. This story of mine is very congruent to Milosh's feelings as well, without the sodomy of the peculiar. What I ravished in was the descent into madness that this male, like many males with their formidable lust and power, have fallen victim to. A Serbian Film isn't the kind of film an overweight loser from Pittsburgh can make. While this film has a body count, it doesn't act as an exclusive accessory. Take the cult "classic" August Underground for example. With a mere mention it sparks a communion of underground horror fans chanting about "severed penises" and "cut-off nipples." While these facets do occur within Fred Vogel's creation, you must understand that these scenes make the film and the hype. When you mention this pseudo-snuff trilogy, you don't say to yourself "Oh, that's that movie with the climatic character-intrusive depth and ravaging climax?" Those compliments are reserved for an endeavor worthy of the title "art." Taking what I know and what you don't, it would seem that the only fitting label for A Serbian Film is high-velocity punishment. Vukmir would have been so proud of what his creators have created for this is what art is - Consequential. What Irreversible is largely known for is its brutal rape/fire extinguisher scene and the music. Thomas Bangalter (half of Daft Punk) created for Noé a collection of the finest and grittiest electronic music ranging from the glitch-pop repetition that is Spinal Scratch then onto the bass-thumping dominance of Outrun. Surely the composer of the eclectic soundtrack of A Serbian Film took notice to this soundtrack, at least enough to incorporate grinding low frequencies in order to churn intestines. For all you noise fans as well, there are better sequences of clenched-teeth dispositions of transgressive savagery marked to the sweet sound of what could be Aphex Twin with unleaded gasoline and vinegar destroying its engine. For what it's worth, Vukmir rants and raves mid film about the languorous state of his mother country; art, film, life. The ravings of a cinema obsessed lunatic have never been detached so clearly from a perspective planted in reality to a character created and given life from a sheet of paper. While he screams about the fragility of being a victim and how victims sell, he reassures Milosh that he is the only one in the picture that isn't a victim. I believe after viewing all what this film has to offer, that his assertion is intelligently correct because whether we like or not, we all fall victim to the seething nihilism that A Serbian Film has to offer.

Creativity is a divine force in the directorial business. You can take any idea and shift it towards either a gifted individual or an inexperienced twit and the result would always show of quality or deterrence. Had any other director taken this film, I'd imagine the end result to pop up of Cinemageddon with observations of its Z-grade no holds barred trash aesthetics. Gladly, I gloat the artistic exhibitionism of this fine barrel ride into a disparage of sadism and Twin Peaks infused scenes of degrading fellatio and cock prosthetics. What really drags me to me senses is the display of disheveled and abused women, crawling towards another cock to suck, another man to please. In this account of what 8mm could have been like had Joel Schumacher been on more coke, the folds of misogyny are ironed out into something so irrevocably clear and direct. The several disenfranchised women throughout A Serbian Film are real women - bitchy, painted, and repulsive in their impulses. For better or worse, A Serbian Film is a real organic piece of hatred with a genre dividing atmosphere for better placement. This is the definition of love it/hate it and I can only give this my highest recommendation. This being the film containing the ending that nearly got me in a car accident on recollection and which killed my sobriety as I wanted, no, needed to consume copious amounts of rum just to get the images out of my head.

A SERBIAN FILM

-mAQ

TOYS ARE NOT FOR CHILDREN

Stanley H. Brassloff (1972)

Immediately after receiving a reader entitled Misogyny in the Western Philosophical Tradition recommended to me by Ty E, I noticed a blurb from the works of Schopenhauer which read "big children their whole life long". What I didn't realize, however, was just how in tune the "misogynist" texts written by Schopenhauer were with Stanley Brassloff's Toys Are Not for Children. Released on a double feature disc from a vanguard in schlock, Something Weird Video, Toys Are Not for Children is possibly the most shocking film I've seen in lieu of lowered standards to date. On a blind whim I decided to watch this film remembering nothing but the poster art that titillated me and left me drooling for an indication as to what would go in in such a picture. Opening with a dimly lit outline of a bed with writhing legs atop it, the camera pans slowly up the fair body to put on display a young female clutching and grinding with a large toy soldier, all the while moaning "daddy". This sets the tone quite nicely, even more so when Jamie's tyrannical mother bursts through the door, disgusted and furious. Spouting hostilities through clenched teeth - such as "unnatural" - (which corrupts the "daddy complex" further), Jamie soon grows up clinging onto the toys given to her by her father, carrying them with her even into her marriage to a boy named Charlie with whom she worked with in a toy store.

Complications arise on the honeymoon when Jamie refuses to make love to Charlie. Being a man of sexual impulse, the same as Jamie's father, Charlie soon drifts apart from his disconnected wife and starts visiting clubs. What else could a man do when dating a true-to-life doll such as Jamie. Why, she begs to be tucked in and refuses to sleep without her toys, a child through and throughout. Shown during stumbling flashback sequences, light is shed upon Charlie and Jamie's relationship, even highlighting a playful game of chase which is interrupted upon the discovery of naked lovers in the brush. Scarring and frightening Jamie, she runs home to her mother, sobbing. Charlie follows suit but is greeted by a knife-wielding mother who is all too eager to console her unnatural daughter. Her entire life, Jamie has been running from sex, whether it be hormonal invasion or wedlock advances. It takes a real snake and an aspiration to reunite with her father to get the pants off Jamie and when this finally happens, Toys Are Not for Children receives a turbulent makeover and leaves you stranded into some kind of torturous waters. When it comes down to brass tacks, Jamie Godard is another victim whose innocence is spoiled without the proper helping of masculinity to guide her throughout childhood. When hooker friend Pearl comments on being without father - "I didn't have a dad and I turned out just fine!" - the class of misogynists quietly snicker.

It is the involvement of this character, Pearl, that shapes Jamie's future endeavors with various "Johns" and "pulling tricks". Armed with a childlike sense of wonder and a face contorted of salient glee, Jamie arms her complex into her "unnatural" career path and plays twisted lolita games with her clients. You cannot simply classify Toys Are Not for Children as exploitation for it is not guilty of any recurring facet of the idea. It is an archaic figure of disturbing qualities, sure, but that doesn't stoop the film's standards down to the level of garbage. Toys Are Not for Children has taste and is a mature look into the female condition, starved of masculine nutrients her whole life and force-fed brutish feminism and hatred. Edna Godard, Jamie's atrocious mother, couldn't even predict the horrible events forthcoming. "He still thinks you're a baby!!" she scowls during the opening of the feature. This strikes a tune that resonates until the very end, the final scene in which Jamie's eyes glaze over to that of a doll's lifeless eyes, these being her instrument of comfort throughout her life up to this point. Marcia Forbes has the role of Jamie down pat. It is an absolutely incredible performance when you notice the balance of innocence and easy virtue she puts forth. Rather, her vicissitude into steaming harlot is entirely credible as the playful promiscuity is a path I've seen countless women wander on. The transformation alone is evident in a simple hair cut; from long-haired daddy's girl to darling stylish "daddy's girl" who moonlights as a bashful objector.

TOYS ARE NOT FOR CHILDREN

Toys Are Not for Children is a film experience lavish with substance but lacking in a dynamic style. Directed in 1972, I wouldn't expect much in technical achievement but all in a consistent storytelling. This sexy shocker falls victim to its lack of narrative adhesive; you will find this out in due time as scenes transition without mention to past occurrences. Though martyr to stubborn editing, Toys Are Not for Children is a wonderful film boasting a crude and untamed view at the standard of women afflicted with an unfortunate, selective case of being raised by a single mother. What lies in store for the characters within is honestly harrowing and of the utmost importance. Stanley Brassloff's film is further evidence that once a woman topples over into the territory of sluts, there is no turning back. The very feminine nature behind this work aids the testament to "loss of innocence" more so than films made of a similar caliber decades later - truly ahead of its time. To close on a note of reprisal, as Schopenhauer put in his philosophical texts, "in a word, they are big children all their life long - a kind of intermediate stage between the child and the full grown man, who is 'man' in the strict sense of the word." Toys Are Not for Children is unequivocally a staggering experience and a key example of retro cinema done masterfully.

-mAQ

SHIP OF FOOLS

Stanley Kramer (1965)

Ship of Fools is a nice little short film directed by Danny Ledonne from a story written by Ted Kaczynski, the infamous Unabomber. The short tells the tale of a group of seamen (sea "people" to be in tune with the theme of the film) as they head north to ultimately face death by drowning. The reason why this "diverse" group of individuals are on their way to die is because they care more for complaining about petty individual problems than more important things (like preventing death). The short film was done uniquely with Lego figures on a toy ship. Using the toys of children instead of real actors was quite appropriate as the seamen are childlike in their demands. Everyone is a victim nowadays. Chances are if you're living and breathing (and not a heterosexual Anglo male) you qualify for victim status! Sexism, Racism, Homophobia, Ageism, and other inequalities are all horrible forms of cancer that plague our society today! Or at least the seamen featured in Ships of Fools believe so. The main agitator of the ship is your typical impotent and hostile liberal college professor. He rallies the seamen to make protests to the ship's captain. Naturally, the seaman spout childish ad hominem attacks and slurs typical of irrational "victim" behavior. The Unabomber may have been off his rocker, but he sure understands American society better than the average Joe American. Seeing how the college professor is portrayed in Ships of Fools, it is quite obvious why he sent homemade bombs to real ones. Kaczynski's characterization of the college professor is realistic. Most of these sad individuals should be institutionalized so that they don't damage other minds like their own. It is no surprise that members of the hippy liberal terrorist group the Weather Underground have now taken up the teaching profession.

Ship of FoolsShip of Fools has the beaner that demands to speak "Spanish" instead of "English." The short also has a "native" American that demands reparations for the stealing of his "ancestral lands" and a fruit that demands to "suck cock openly." And one can't forget the monkey that was kicked by an evil human being! Ship of Fools is a short about contemporary America as a whole right now. All these Gay rights parades nowadays are quite unnecessary and counterproductive considering our nations current state. So are all those illegal aliens demanding full rights and other handouts. America is going down the shitter and no one seems to care. They only care about not being labeled a "fascist" or a "homophobe."The media masters, the same individuals that promote these "special" interest groups, are also related to the same people that are flushing America down the drain. These petty "equality" activists are just tools for those subversive individuals with larger and more corrosive goals. If only someone would shut these people's mouths for them and actually do what needs to be done to save America. But in America, we are a Neo-Marxist slaughterhouse of cattle ripe for butchering.

SHIP OF FOOLS

-Ty E

KILLER'S KISS

Stanley Kubrick* (1955) Even master Stanley Kubrick had humble beginnings. His second feature length film (just over an hour long), Killer's Kiss, finds Kubrick at a time when he had yet to develop his craft. It was also the last film where Kubrick had written a completely original screenplay (not adapting the film from a novel or short story). Later in his life, Kubrick would call Killer's Kiss 'a dumb story with bad actors.' I would, to some degree, have to agree with Kubrick's assertion.

Killer's Kiss seems to have had a crucial influence on fellow New Yorker Martin Scorsese. The boxing scenes in the film have an aesthetically similar feel to that of Scorsese's Raging Bull. The boxer also suffers from isolation that haunted Travis Bickle in the Taxi-Driver. The overall visuals of Killer's Kiss got me thinking about the early films of Martin Scorsese and the crucial impact Stanley Kubrick had on him (and countless other filmmakers). Of course, Killer's Kiss lacks the perfectionism and concrete construction that have turned Stanley Kubrick into a household name. I became a Kubrick fan in elementary school before I even knew who he was or what a film director did. The Shining and Full Metal Jacket I would regularly watch on cable television. Killer's Kiss only interests me as a fan of both Stanley Kubrick and film noir. The film offers nothing new to the film movement except some notable lighting designs (especially during the scene with the mannequins) and an odd negative image (using undeveloped film) dream sequence. Stanley Kubrick was able to capture the grittiness of New York City streets and characters that reflect it with Killer's Kiss. The film is nothing special in the way of cinematic achievement or even quality. Killer's Kiss also features horrible sound quality that can be attributed to post-sync sound. I am sure Kubrick is rolling around in his coffin thinking about all the fine tuning that he needs to do on Killer's Kiss. Only then will the legendary director rest in peace.

-Ty E

PATHS OF GLORY
PATHS OF GLORY

Stanley Kubrick* (1957)

Paths of Glory (directed by Stanley Kubrick) is about one of the biggest scams in world history (World War I). Kubrick proved to be an agitator after its release with it being banned, criticized, and condemned globally. It was an anti-war film in a time when pacifism was not a national virtue. The cold war was on and war seemed eminent at any second. With the film's quality and controversy, Paths of Glory was Kubrick's first "masterpiece."

Paths of Glory was important because its intention was to make aware the cattle the soldiers played during the war. The generals' only concern was making a career for themselves no matter what human cost. To these generals, a soldier's life was a mere statistic. The generals seemed to be in a form of psychosis and completely free of any sort of human empathy. Of Kubrick's war films, Paths of Glory is most effective in its intentions. Spartacus was just a way to make some cash. Dr. Strangelove came out as a nihilist's satire. Full Metal Jacket was nothing new. Paths of Glory was a bold defiance against the right timing. It was also the film where Kubrick started to develop his style and obsession to detail. Although Kubrick's The Killing showed a promising director, Paths of Glory confirmed a new talent and master craftsman.

The battle scenes throughout Paths of Glory felt like the most realistic to that doubt. Bodies piling upon bodies and eardrum-blowing explosions echoed the feeling of old 16mm Bolex stock footage. Paths of Glory just made it feel more clear. Kubrick was successfully able to articulate what he felt was a true battle scene.

Kubrick seems to be more of a realist than the stereotypical liberal idealist. He has claimed that Paths of Glory isn't an anti-war film and that he isn't a pacifist. Paths of Glory was merely the displaying of the irrationality and career-obsessed mentality of opportunist generals. The film has nothing to do with why the war being fought is bad or for what reason the war is even being fought for. Paths of Glory is concluded appropriately with the singing of a captured German girl. She is able to communicate with the French soldiers on a universal emotional level, through song. This song gives a sign of hope for humanity, although this wasn't successful with the second world war. Kubrick just seemed to be showing that irrational history has a way of repeating itself. Paths of Glory stands among Kubrick's greatest films. Many of Kubrick's films could be considered excessive in length. Paths of Glory is quite short at less than ninety minutes. Kubrick was able to say a whole lot more when having to cram his film into a smaller budget.

I found Paths of Glory to be the most interesting and true American anti-war film. Films like Platoon and Apocalypse Now make war still seem exciting and even mythical. Paths of Glory presented human error at its least empathetic mode. The circumstances are presented and they are absurd. Most anti-war films are unable to show the absurdity of war. Kubrick succeeded.

-Ty E

EYES WIDE SHUT
EYES WIDE SHUT

Stanley Kubrick* (1999) Eyes Wide Shut may be master craftsman Stanley Kubrick's most hated film. It was also his last. Eyes Wide Shut finally takes Freud's obsession with dreams into interesting depths. Eyes Wide Shut is based on the 1926 novella Dream Story by the Austrian writer Arthur Schnitzler. Schnitzler was a friend and correspondent of psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud. Stanley Kubrick was obviously still an old horny man before he died. Eyes Wide Shut features the most explicit sex scenes out of any of Kubrick's films. He also wasted no time getting Nicole Kidman to drop her clothes for the film. Kubrick must have known the power of art as he obviously utilized it.

I wouldn't say it is too farfetched to say that Eyes Wide Shut was inspired by the films of David Lynch. Stanley Kubrick was a huge fan of Lynch's Eraserhead and he made no effort to hide it. Eyes Wide Shut is full of the mystery, perversity, and dreamlike nature that makes David Lynch a great director. It would be no doubt interesting to see Lynch's reaction to Eyes Wide Shut.

Eyes Wide Shut also deals with secret societies and assumed freemasons. The sex orgy scenes of the film make you really wondering what secret societies are about. The cloaks and masks these individuals wear are interesting to say the least. I would even go as far to say that the secret society meeting is the best part of Eyes Wide Shut. I still find the scene intense every time I revisit it.

Was Eyes Wide Shut a good film for Kubrick to end his career and life with? I think so. It may not be Kubrick's greatest film but offers much more than Spartacus (which Kubrick just did for the money). Tom Cruise contrives his niceness and is quite annoying. The only disappointment for me in Eyes Wide Shut was that Tom Cruise didn't get killed at the sex orgy.

-Ty E

FORKLIFT DRIVER KLAUS

Stefan Prehn (2001)

"The First Day On The Job" Forklift Driver Klaus is without a doubt, one of the most entertaining and visually magnificent shorts ever. There is only one problem to this claim, it is an instructional video. It was released in Germany as a parody/spoof of the safety videos. Never has one shown you what not to do in such vivid blood and GORE-o-VISION. Apparently, there is a series of these. My interest is peaked. The beginning shows the poster child of factory workers. Meet Klaus. Klaus is well-groomed, well-mannered, and well-taught. This is the day when he first gets his forklift operating license. He begins his first day of work bright and early, whistling a happy tune. Surely nothing could go wrong. Then the film stops its serious route and goes for a more Final Destination feel. We watch as the worst freak accidents occur around Klaus. Why? For breaking the set rules. The film is a parody but indeed has a valid point. Never break the rules in a work zone! Doing so could lead to your severed-in-half co-worker's upper torso getting gutted by a run away chainsaw. This film is well acted, with a surprising amount of Gore and schlock to boot. Also, has a stomach flinching scene of a box cutter blade being broken while dug into someones skull. The end scene is a classic scene due to the watercolor background and the two impaled people screaming while being steered off in the wonderful sunset. Forklift Driver Klaus is a good reason why Germany remains at the top of the great producers of cinema.

-Maq

STAR SUBURB: LA BANLIEUE DES ÉTOILES
STAR SUBURB: LA BANLIEUE DES ÉTOILES

Stéphane Drouot (1983)

