

Soiled Sinema

Articles

100 YEARS OF ADOLF HITLER AND THE DANGERS OF IDEALISTIC ART FAGS

Scandalous German director Christoph Schlingensiefel's 100 Years of Adolf Hitler (1989) is an absurdist mockery of Adolf Hitler's last days in the Führerbunker. The film takes a fairly schizophrenic approach to Hitler's final hours, especially in comparison to Oliver Hirschbiegel's recent big budget German production Downfall (2004). While Downfall almost comes close to glamorizing Adolf Hitler and the destructive conclusion of the Third Reich, 100 Years of Adolf Hitler makes a sick slapstick joke out of it. From the beginning of the film, you know that Schlingensiefel is a bold and uncompromising artist. 100 Years of Adolf Hitler is full of incest, cross dressing, drug use, suicide, and other offensive things that are treated in a completely comical manner. The film begins with a speech by German director Wim Wenders (Wings of Desire, Paris Texas) saying, "We can improve the pictures of the world and with that, this world can be improved." I think it is safe to say that Schlingensiefel is also mocking German cinema with the inclusion of Wender's embarrassingly idealistic and generic speech. Despite my love for many of Wender's films, he seems like a turd of a man. 100 Years of Adolf Hitler is the first film I have seen of Schlingensiefel's and I found it to be a masterpiece, especially for a film with a 16 hour production time. The film is shot in B/W and executed in a theatric manner with spotlights focusing in on actors lurking in the shadows of a desolate bunker. Legendary Gay German Actor Udo Kier (a former lover of Rainer Werner Fassbinder) stars as a fairly emotionless and surprisingly unexpressive Adolf Hitler. The rest of the caricatures of the Nazi bunch seem to be in a constant state of pathological hedonism and greed. They continuously bicker about who will take power and such ideological fantasies as the promise of a "3000 year Reich." Their insane stream of consciousness arguments make the three stooges look like courteous debaters. During their stay in the bunker, the outrageous Nazi heavy weights get involved in a variety of comical situations. The most heartwarming of these wacky scenarios involves the singing of Christmas carols around a Christmas tree. It surely wasn't a silent night in the deep dark abyss that is the Führerbunker. Schlingensiefel even makes the poisoning of the Goebbels children by their mother a comical yet still disturbing scenario. I assume that like many Germans, Schlingensiefel is incapable (and rightfully so) of completely articulating all the horrible things that happened during the end of the Third Reich. In that regard, Christoph Schlingensiefel is the most honest of the German directors in expressing his feelings about the aftermath of Nazi Germany. National Socialism (Nazism) was probably the only political movement based on aesthetics. Documentary filmmaker Peter Cohen's film The Architecture of Doom, although somewhat flawed, goes in depth about Nazi ideology and its obsession with beauty. As Walter C. Langer's wartime psychoanalysis of the real Adolf Hitler, The Mind of Adolf Hitler states, the Führer had the mind and emotions of an artist (although a failed one). Before Adolf Hitler's suicide in 100 Years of Adolf Hitler, he makes his final artistic masterpiece by pulling his pants down and covering his bare bottom with sloppy fecal looking paint. The Führer then stamps a piece of paper taped to the wall with his paint covered ass. This final ugly art piece by Hitler sums up his contribution to Germany. The feminine peasant artist from Austria could only lead Germany to destruction as the bankers that funded him probably expected. Adolf Hitler essentially left a stain on Germany that will last 100 years. Hence the title for the film, 100 Years of Adolf Hitler. Art Fag Wim Wenders Christoph Schlingensief concludes 100 Years of Adolf Hitler with the same bullshit speech by Wim Wenders featured in the beginning of the film. Following Wenders, a German fellow discusses the German people being both historically romantic and idealistic. The man also states, "The Germans have always shown their greatest skill in times of hardship, hunger, and war." The man finally goes on to talk about the Germans needing to be less enchanted, less romantic, and less idealistic (as these things have led to their downfall). Director Wim Wenders has always been an outspoken against Nazism and very idealistic in nature. I think it would be safe to say that Schlingensief was making a point that despite Wenders anti-Nazi attitude, he is just another artistically idealistic art fag like the Führer himself. The moral of the 100 Years of Adolf Hitler story is to never let an art fag in a position of power.

-Ty E

9 REASONS WHY MICHAEL WINTERBOTTOM'S 9 SONGS IS BEST LEFT UNSUNG
9 REASONS WHY MICHAEL WINTERBOTTOM'S 9 SONGS IS BEST LEFT UNSUNG

1. 9 Songs utilizes a cheap and unsuccessful gimmick: Don't get me wrong; I appreciate a director (like John Waters) who can successfully utilize a gimmick, yet the cheap pseudo-erotic sex scenes featured in 9 Songs – which are about as sexually alluring as the putrid meat of roadkill – add nothing of value to this ultimately deplorable film. Not even unsimulated gratuitous sex could save this shallow and pathetically pretentious work of would-be erotic art. I certainly was not surprised when the female protagonist asks her banal boy toy, "Do you think I look like a boy." Indeed, she does. Despite its inability to titillate, 9 Songs was considered (by the Guardian) the most "sexually explicit" mainstream film upon its initial release. I guess the folks at the Guardian have yet to see Larry Clark's Ken Park. Unlike Clark's sleazy, yet undeniably entertaining (and still unreleased in the U.S.) film Ken Park, 9 song features no redeeming qualities.

2. All 9 Songs suck: 9 Songs is divided into 9 chapters via 9 concert performances. If you like mediocre mainstream "indie" music (from bands like Black Rebel Motorcycle Club and the Dandy Warhols), 9 Songs is a film that you might enjoy. I personally found the music to be so repellent that I had to forward through most of the maladroitly shot (the concert footage resembles the kind of cellphone-camera-shot bootleg videos that you find on YouTube) concert scenes. I assume the bands featured in the film are supposed to be sexy rock acts that perform equally titillating songs, but, of course, I would rather dump cold water on my crotch than have to listen such musical platitudes again. The only thing I learned while watching 9 Songs is that certain people become hypnotized at rock concerts and end up hooking up with unstable sex partners. Maybe all those eccentric Southern Baptist groups that protested against rock 'n' roll during the 1960s were right in regards to their belief that musical genre has sinister hypnotic qualities.

3. 9 Songs is a prosaic work of pseudo-poetry: Despite attempting to construct 9 Songs as a digital video poem of sorts; Michael Winterbottom created a flick that does the total opposite of poetry: dulling the senses and degrading the organic, thus turning sex into a cheap commodity. Instead of portraying sex in a more extravagant light, Winterbottom demotes it to a level comparable to that of a man defecating on a toilet after an all-night buffet at a Chinese restaurant. Of course - in the modern world - amateurishly shot sex scenes are generally considered high art.

4. Porn is better: Despite the contrived and inauthentic nature of porn, most of it is certainly more erotic than 9 Songs. The only type of person that would revere 9 Songs is someone who is too snooty to watch honest porn, so they use the film as a poor substitute for the real thing.

5. 9 Songs is nothing new: European directors have been producing artsy fartsy pornography for decades that is actually quite erotic. Maybe someone should have lent Michael Winterbottom a film directed by a master "erotic art house" auteur like Tinto Brass or a Radley Metzger film before the uninspired filmmaker made the artistic mistake of directing a gutter-grade film like 9 Songs.

6. The film wallows in memories that are unmemorable: Through sex and song, boring protagonist Matt stewes in a cold potboiler and reflects on the unremarkable. Of course, it is purely the director's fault that 9 Songs fails to make an adequate case for the purported remarkableness of the protagonist's fading memories.

7. Putting a homely hoe on a pedestal: In one particularly telling scene in 9 Songs, the boyish female protagonist tells her boyfriend about all the foreign lovers she has been with, as if her many sexual partners are sparkling trophies that confirm her imagined intercultural refinement. She is also a drug addict who snorts various things up her nose. The tragedy contained within 9 Songs is not that the protagonist loses his lover, but that he glorifies such a blatantly inglorious and cumbersome quasi-harlot.

8. 9 Songs is too long: Although the film is only about an hour in length, 9 Songs feels like a 3 hour journey into cinema purgatory. Everything that is expressed in the film could have been accomplished in a 5 minute montage. In fact, the sex-laden European vacation montage (which is approximately 4 minutes in length) featured in Robert Avary's adaptation of The Rules of Attraction features more depth and content than in all 69 (that number is no doubt a cheap pun) minutes of 9 Songs. It seems like Michael Winterbottom came up with an idea for a film with 9 concert songs, 9 romance scenes and a 69 minute running time, yet neglected to equip 9 Songs with vital thematic and aesthetic content.

9. 9 Songs is as aesthetically appealing as Steven Spielberg's Rabbinic Beard: If 9 Songs manages to accomplish anything, it is offering the viewer an eclectically unappealing collection of carnal sights and strepitous sounds. Indeed, 9 Songs is a philistine journey into the void of one couple's unhealthy relationship, thus one expects a certain stark artiness to the film, yet the ultimate aesthetic effect is nil. 9 Songs has about as much beauty and content as camcorder recorded autopsy footage.

In Conclusion: 9 Songs is an unremarkable film about a guy who is apparently smart (he is a climatologist), but suffers from unrefined taste in women. Mr. Matt is a character that fails to conjure up empathy nor disdain in the viewer, as he is ultimately a forgettable man that lacks even the slightest inkling of a personality. Although 9 Songs has been masqueraded as a work of art (by a marginal few); it is nothing more than crudely shot melodramatic smut. If you have an interest in seeing real-life ejaculation and cunnilingus on your TV screen; skip 9 Songs and watch real pornography.

-Ty E

A CLOSER LOOK AT BLAXPLOITATION
A CLOSER LOOK AT BLAXPLOITATION

Blaxploitation is one of the more colorful genres of films that instead of exploiting nuns or frequent sex, it exploits blacks. The genre of "Blaxploitation" was born in the early 70's from with the urban youth in mind. Arguably, the very first Blaxploitation film was "Sweet Sweetback's BAADASSSSSS Song". Many claim due to it being directed by a Negro, it refutes the whole purpose. If you notice, Whites & Jews directed many of the cult or more obscure blaxploitation films. For instance, Note Williamson's classic "Boss Nigger" being directed by Jack Arnold, the infamous director of Universal classic "Creature from the Black Lagoon". This was a tactic picked up to make a mass amount of money by appealing to the urban kids. Upon the discovery of this, there was a "boom" in the market spawning Superfly, Black Caesar, and other classic titles. Bone from Larry Cohen is another film of this stature. The massive meaning of this film aims towards being an anti-white film and mainstreaming racism. Aside from Bone, Cohen also directed the rebirth mash-up "Original Gangstas" with classic Blaxploitation stars such as Pam Grier, Fred Williamson, Richard Roundtree, and Jim Brown. The film is an interesting view on urbanization. If you view each of the characters, you can imagine them actually coming back to the "hood" to find it in flames. It seems like a loose ending to every Blaxploitation film they have starred in. They once were hood rats, now they have come back to clean up the streets. The afore-mentioned Boss Nigger was one of the Blaxploitation films that showed its militant black character on a step above whites with the slogan "Black Man's Law in a White Man's Town" In this film, Fred Williamson and D'urville Marin play a duo of bounty hunters who force the role of sheriff and deputy among themselves. Through out their journey, Williamson beds up with a white teacher and Martin with an obese lady; exaggerating the fact that black men love a big woman. The director of the cult-animated spoof "Coonskin" was born in what is now Israel. Coonskin was the main target for controversy due to the mass amounts of character models based off of Jolson's immortalization of blackface. Coonskin was not the first animated feature to use the "coon" archetype. In fact, Disney was doing it long before. Many now banned clips feature blackface caricatures devouring watermelons in church then in turn, spitting them on the poor white folk in front of him. The influence of Blaxploitation soon spread, generating Richard Roundtree's classic SHAFT featuring a magnificent score from Isaac Hayes, thus paving the way for soul and funk soundtracks for these features. The formula for these films involves urban violence, explicit profanity, frequent drug use, and the famed "pimp" role. Rudy Ray Moore played the most notable role of a pimp in his hit "Dolemite" based off one of his stand-up characters. Dolemite was such a hit; it spawned countless sequels, records, and a new film due out later this year called "The Dolemite Explosion!" The plot of Dolemite is simple and campy. Dolemite is released from prison to catch the man who framed him there in the first place, Willy Green. Along the way, he will train all his "bitches" in the art of Kung-Fu, come across crooked white cops, and manages to keep his wardrobe colorful and distinguished. Rudy R. Moore might have even created the look for a pimp with this series. Many of these Blaxploitation films have a political message, if you notice, either a major or minor villain is set against stereotype. I.E: The perfect white crooked cops in Dolemite who abuse their power and ultimately get their ass beat by Dolemite. Us genre-fans are not the only ones that Dolemite has entertained. More mainstream rap artists such as Snoop Dogg and Wu-Tang Clan have admitted their inspiration from Dolemite. To quote Snoop Dogg, "Without Rudy Ray Moore, there would be no Snoop Dogg, and that's for real." - Snoop Dogg Even after all this time, Blaxploitation is not dead, nor does it look like it will die in the near future. Films like "Black Devil Doll" ensure the snagging of new fans to the genre. This one sports the excessive nudity, frequent profanity, and the lost language of jive. Director Jonathan Lewis obviously wants the urban feel, hence his incorporating the funk group "Bamboo Gods" in the soundtrack. Blaxploitation has come a long way from being directed by white men to make blacks mainstream. It's only very exciting to see what effects time will have on this genre.

-Maq

A LAUD FOR HANS LANDA
A LAUD FOR HANS LANDA

I expected Quentin Tarantino's film Inglorious Basterds to be the pop-director's most culturally-despicable film yet. His entry in the Grindhouse project was bad enough, but a Philo-Semitic war epic full of Jew porn schizophrenia and blood-thirsty Semitic murderous indulgence?!? Degenerate hack Horror HEEBie-Jeebie Eli Roth has made it known that "holocaust education" was a big part of his upbringing as a Jewish supremacist. In Inglorious Basterds he ecstatically displays his love of bashing in the skulls of heroic (and restrained by a Jew Crew, of course) Aryan blond beasts via his Jude-bat. I may be wrong, but I always thought Jews were generally fairly pathetic when it comes to athletics, heroism, courage, and fighting their own battles in general, but I guess that is why Inglorious Basterds is a War fantasy film. Due to my repelled feeling towards anything involving Tarantino or Roth, it was practically a given to me before watching Inglorious Basterds that the film would be indistinguishable from Elie Wiesel's favorite wet dream after an all-NIGHT party in Israel involving the most attractive of blond Slavic sex-slaves owned by the Judaic mafia and a couple rusty razorblades. That was until I watched the film and was soon introduced to Tarantino's best written character ever; SS-Standartenführer Hans Landa.

Quentin Tarantino for once almost stated something true about film when he said that Hans Landa may be the best character he has ever written. My own personal disgust with Tarantino comes from the fact that despite many years of his own personal "VHS-Tape Film School", Tarantino seems to have the least refined and most eclectically all around trashy taste in film. Don't get me wrong, I like a good film noir or horror film like the next guy, but Tarantino obsesses over pure stylized-Scheiße, hence why his films are soulless (with no human feeling aside from excitement and "coolness") big-budget piles of shit. Hollywood has been pretty much always fundamentally anti-art and anti-organic kultur as they like to contrive their own culturally-hollow-Hollywood "reality" so that the masses erroneously imitates these "ideal" pseudo-realities, like the mindlessly good little unconscious comrades they are. With the character of Hans Landa, for once it seems that Tarantino has refrained from obsessing over cool wacky Negro characters, alpha-females, and arrogant beaners. This time Tarantino attempted to put his self in the position of an Austrian Aryan, but Tarantino's Aryan is of course a psychological abstraction of sorts. After all, one could never expect Tarantino to understand the natural psyche of a Teuton for it would have probably induced a suicide-reflex. Right from the get go, Hans Landa identifies himself as an Aryan who can "think like a Jew." By this, Landa recognizes that Jews will just about do and say anything to get their way. After all, how could such a small tribe of Judaics (with a slave morality to boot) be able to almost completely monopolize the international wealth of the world? Nowadays, we live in the miserable reign of the Tschandala, a "postmodern" nightmare where weaknesses, failure, deformity, victim hood, and other pathetic attributes are worshiped as the height of virtue. Hans Landa recognizes that once a soul loses dignity, he/she is capable of the most (pathetically) amazing of feats. No matter how rich or successful a Jew is, there is still the memory of the Ghetto and the gutter. There never was nor will there ever be a true Jewish aristocracy, for a true aristocracy comes about through strength gained from being the fittest (both physically and mentally) person within ones own blood/soil environment, something that has become pretty much obsolete in the postmodern Western world (a healthy Western would never allow third world immigration) and elsewhere. All Jewish power is derived from the manipulation of capital, linguistics, psychology, and other intellectual abstractions. Whether it be Marx, Einstein, or Freud, all of these great "Jewish geniuses" derived their theories through the iconoclasm of the existing Occidental model which Hebrew-incinerators so instinctively destroyed. As the great Francis Parker Yockey once stated, "An insatiable lust for revenge was born in the soul of the parasite through centuries of silent sufferance of the unassailable superiority of the host. When defeated Europe - and in particular, the most vital part of it, the bearer of the grand European Idea of the 20th century - lay at the feet of this totally alien conqueror from a Culture of the past, no feelings of magnanimity, chivalry, generosity or mercy were in his exultant soul. There was only there the gall which he had been drinking for a thousand years while he had bided his time under the arrogance of the alien Western peoples whom he had always considered, and still considers, barbarians, goyim." Hans Landa acts as model for all aspiring "Jew Hunters" out there. Skinheads and other related ilk will always fail as they refuse to even attempt to understand the psychology of God's chosen Hebrew as shown in Henry Bean's The Believer. Anyone who has taken the time to study the German National Socialist leadership will understand there is a pathological pattern starting with the movements spiritual father Richard Wagner (who meta-politically influenced both Adolf Hitler and political Zionist Founder Theodor Herzl's almost identical goal of a racially pure Übermensch state). Like Zionism (although this movement will never be truly successful for it is fundamentally at odds with the true nature of Jews/Judaism), National Socialism was inspired by identifying and rejecting the stereotypical traits of Jewish effeminacy and amorality, hence why many Mischling (part-Jews) eagerly became the most committed of Antisemites. National Socialist propagandist and "World Jew-Baiter No. 1" Julius Streicher is noted to have once recognized his Jewish ancestry as the best weapon in fighting the Jews. The honorable and stoic Aryan is no match for the moral bankruptcy that slithered out of the ghettos of Eastern Europe. The Aryan, in all his honesty, will fight for his people and his country whereas the typical Zio-poodle always contracts someone else to do his dirty work. Hans Landa also understands this psychology as shown in Inglorious Bastards by "single-handily toppling the Third Reich" when he recognizes that Germany defeat is now inevitable. Aside from the unfortunate swastika mark permanently engraved into his head, he is the only top National Socialist to survive a Jewish murder rampage at a cute French cinema. Not many people are good at suavely pulling off both a good ol' froggy ratonnade and an one-man conditional armistice in the same lifetime.

A LAUD FOR HANS LANDA

Hans Landa is a man that is always about twenty steps above his contemporaries just as Friedrich Nietzsche and Francis Parker Yockey were, two other Sages of the Jewish Question. There truly is a thin-line between authentic Antisemitism and Philo-Semitism as "Second-Generation holocaust survivor" Norman Finklestein has recognized. Hollywood did itself a service when they released American History X, a film that romanticizes the skinhead movement for the skinhead is a true friend of Zion. Skinheads and Ku Klux Klaners save your average Rabbi a trip to the Jewish cemetery where he no longer has to spray paint swastikas on Jewish tombstones for evidence of "growing Antisemitism." Your average "White Power" skinhead is a foot soldier of Zion and just another pawn in the game, similar to some Clown-Azz-House-Negroes like Jesse Jackson or Al Sharpton. Hans Landa is a cold, calculating, and obscenely conscious man who has talents that cannot be contrived. He laughs at the mind of a German soldier as his soldierly honor is now obsolete (at least as far as leadership goes) in our world of technological and political bureaucracy, for such a honorable man (naive to the behavior of those with a conspiring nature) will always be used as pawn to whoever is in power. Hopefully, the character of Hans Landa will awaken those out there with the mental capacity as to the proper etiquette when dealing with conspiring cultural distorters. Herr Landa's motivations may have been unsavory but his methods were almost pristine. Landa's Weltanschauung is probably best symbolically expressed when he laughs at double-agent Bridget von Hammersmark's lie about how she broke her leg stereotypically (German) by mountain climbing. Hans Landa has learned how to read people better than the chief Rabbi of Israel questions his Talmud and better than how depraved Sigmund Freud was able (or at least pretended to be able) to analyze the psychosexuality of children.

-Ty E

A PACT WITH LUCIFER: OTTO RAHN AND THE QUEST FOR THE

Many young American boys (and of course more adventurous girls) over nearly three decades now permanently have the image of Nazis soldiers faces melting all the way down to the skull ingrained in their memories for a lifetime. These Nazis soldiers were on a crusade to find the much desired and legendary Ark of the Covenant in hopes to have an invincible army. This image of death and a literal Holocaust takes place in a fairly popular film directed by Steven Spielberg and produced by George Lucas known as Raiders of the Lost Ark. One could say that these deaths via supernatural ark have become iconic. The melting of a group of Teutonic faces is a much warmer occurrence than the reality of a young man who froze to death on a mountainside near Söll in Austria. That unusual adventurer was SS-Obersturmführer Otto Rahn, whose lifetime of searching would lead to a Faustian pact with The Third Reich and a short life shrouded in mystery.

Although Steven Spielberg and George Lucas have never spoken of Nazi archaeologist Otto Rahn, he undoubtedly comes closest to being a real-life Indiana Jones. Rahn was an artistic man that was obsessed with the history of the Cathars and the suffering they faced during the crusades as heretics. Otto Rahn believed that the Cathars guarded the Holy Grail in their castle at Montsegur located in Southern France. The best evidence of Rahn being an artist at heart is his belief that Wolfram von Eschenbach's medieval epic Parzival held the key to the mysteries of the Cathars and where they were secretly hiding the Holy Grail. Rahn's book Crusade Against the Grail is a bizarre work of history that combines poetry, anti-catholic sentiment, and wild speculation for a truly original look at medieval Catharism. Otto Rahn traveled to the Pyrenees region of Southern France in 1931 to complete his research for Crusade Against the Grail which was completed in 1933. It should be noted that Crusade Against the Grail was published three years before Otto Rahn would join Heinrich Himmler's sinister SS. Rahn came to the attention of Heinrich Himmler after Gabriele Dechend, private SS secretary of secret(occult) king Karl Maria Wiligut, read Crusade Against the Grail and gave it to Wiligut. Karl Maria Wiligut was impressed by Crusade Against the Grail and immediately informed SS leader Heinrich Himmler of the book. Himmler was highly impressed by the book and summoned Otto Rahn to meet him in Berlin, Germany. At the time of meeting Himmler, France had just denied Rahn his much desired visa. Otto Rahn, to his embarrassment, had also just gotten dropped by his publisher. One could not find better timing for a Faustian pact with a metaphorical devil known as Heinrich Himmler. Heinrich Himmler's elite SS would give Otto Rahn the opportunity to travel Europe and write in a travel diary which would later become his second (and final) book Lucifer's Court (1937). Rahn believed that Lucifer was bearer of light and true illumination and his journeys recorded in Lucifer's Court were meant to shed light on “the ghosts of the pagans and heretics who were (his) ancestors.” Otto Rahn’s work Lucifer’s Court was made required reading by SS leader Heinrich Himmler for the Nazi elite and higher. One could say that Rahn was responsible for writing part of the gospel for the short lived but eternally remembered Third Reich. The SS also required Otto Rahn to do something that one might consider much physically and emotionally stressful than reading merely about heretics of the past. Rahn was forced to do four months’ military service with the SS-Death’s Head Division ‘Oberbayern’ at Dachau concentration camp, an experience that apparently forever changed the romantic young man for the worst. Otto Rahn’s personal life would also find him to be an enemy of the Nazi state. Rahn did not do much to hide his homosexuality which would eventually result in the most undesirable of fates. Rahn was caught twice engaged in homosexuality activities which Heinrich Himmler warned him against. SS secretary Gabriele Dechend believed that Otto Rahn was being spied by someone in the SS that was jealous of Rahn. Dechend speculates that on Himmler’s third time catching Rahn engaged in homosexual activities resulted having to “save his honor” via suicide. Surprisingly, the Judeo-Christian propaganda book The Pink Swastika: Homosexuality in the Nazi Party, a work that argues the Nazi war machine was fueled by German homosexuality, forgets to mention Otto Rahn’s sexual persuasion. Otto Rahn’s mother, who knitted her son a sweater which displayed a lightning bolt similar to that found in the SS emblem, was also found out to be Jewish. The 2001 documentary on Otto Rahn, The Secret Glory directed by Richard Stanley (Dust Devil, The White Darkness), reveals that Rahn was Jewish although he may have not known that until he did his genealogical research for the SS. According to rabbinical law (and of course the Nuremberg racial laws), Otto Rahn was Jewish. It would be very hard to find a stranger and unconventional character as Otto Rahn in the SS. But then again, Emil Maurice who founded the Stosstrupp Adolf (which later became the SS) with Adolf Hitler, also was of Jewish ancestry. Maurice was also apparently bisexual, something you would not expect from someone that was partly responsible for founding the SS. When Heinrich Himmler brought to the attention of Adolf Hitler that Emil Maurice had Jewish ancestry, Hitler responded “in this one exception case” Maurice could stay in the SS. After all Emil Maurice was one of the first members of the Nazi party and one of oldest friends. Indeed, fact is truly stranger than fiction.

A PACT WITH LUCIFER: OTTO RAHN AND THE QUEST FOR THE

Many proto-Nazi and Nazi authors had a much different interpretations of the Holy Grail than Otto Rahn. Nordacist writers would interpret the blood of Christ with Aryan blood which is interesting as Nazi philosopher Alfred Rosenberg would later claim that Jesus Christ was not Jewish (but Aryan) in his best selling book The Myth of the Twentieth Century (1929). Ultimately, Aryan propagandists finally brought forth the thesis that the “Aryan” grail would only begin to shine again with the Nordic races return to racial purity. At the conclusion of Crusade Against the Grail, Rahn stated, "What happened to the Grail, the Occitan Mani?" According to Pyrenean legend, the Grail moves farther away from this world, and upward toward the sky, when humanity is no longer worthy of it." Instead of finding the grail, Otto Rahn's escapades led him to a tragic departure from this world and ultimately the destruction of the Third Reich. Certainly, the grail moved farther the earth as Rahn's life progressed. Drawing of Otto Rahn by his friend Paul Ladame Before becoming involved with searching for the Holy Grail and later his fatal decision to join the SS, Otto Rahn had an interest in the art of cinema. Otto Rahn played an extra in the G.W. Pabst (Director of Pandora's Box starring Louise Brooks) film Westfront 1918 (1930) with his friend Paul Ladame. Rahn and Ladame also collaborated on a screenplay for Drehbuch von Klabund's marriage comedy XYZ but were unfortunately unable to financial backing for production of the film. Otto Rahn was also hoping to have an acting role in XYZ, a film which was collaboration between a German and French company. Now, the question is when is Hollywood going to make the ultimate Otto Rahn bio-pic? Unfortunately, I think the Indiana Jones series is as close to get as Hollywood will get to a serious film about Otto Rahn. If only there were courageous European director such as Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Pier Paolo Pasolini still living. Then maybe a serious film about Otto Rahn will be made.

Works Cited

Angebert, Jean-Michel. The Occult and The Third Reich. New York: Macmillan Publishing Co., 1974. Flowers, Stephen. The Secret King: The Myth and Reality of Nazi Occultism. Los Angeles: Feral House, 2007. Goodrick-Clarke, Nicholas. The Occult Roots of Nazism. New York: New York University Press, 1992. Graddon, Nigel. Otto Rahn and the Quest for the Grail: The Amazing Life of the Real Indiana Jones. Kempton: Adventures Unlimited Press, 2008. Hakl, Hans. Unknown Sources: National Socialism and the Occult. Sequim: Holmes Publishing Group, 2005. Hermand, Jošt. Old Dreams of a New Reich: Volkish Utopias and National Socialism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992. Lively, Scott. The Pink Swastika: Homosexuality In The Nazi Party. Sacramento: Veritas Aeterna Press, 2002. Machtan, Lothar. The Hidden Hitler. New York: Basic Books, 2001. Rahn, Otto. Crusade Against The Grail. Rochester: Inner Traditions, 2006. Rahn, Otto. Lucifer's Court. Rochester: Inner Traditions, 2008. Rosenberg, Alfred. The Myth of the Twentieth Century. Torrance: The Noontide Press, 1982. -Ty E

ALIEN VS. ALIENS
ALIEN VS. ALIENS

Aliens is one of those few film sequels that is more highly regarded than the original film. I would have to disagree with that popular opinion as I see Alien as a more innovative and important film. Alien is a film that has its setting in a Sci-Fi background but owes more to haunted house horror. Aliens is more of a sci-fi and war film hybrid. Both films go against expected genre conventions. I just recently viewed Aliens for the first time over the past couple days (I would call it long term procrastination). Alien is a film that I watch at least once a year. It is a film that no doubt gets better with each viewing. Its entire atmosphere demands the viewer to suspend all belief for a subconsciously sexual look at killer extraterrestrial life forms. H.R. Giger provided the disturbing sexual aesthetics that give Alien a good portion of its nightmarish and dark fetishistic appeal. Had he not been involved in the imagery in the alien film franchise, the films would be crucially lacking in both appeal and power. The phallic headed Aliens found in the Alien films are the ultimate enemy of ambiguous lesbian and virtual mother Ripley (quite an odd dichotomy). Ripley acts as a mediator and leader to even the most authoritarian of male personalities found in the films. In Aliens her motherly intuition becomes even more apparent with her rescue of a lone little girl (as her colony had been slaughtered by the Aliens). Ripley lacks the stereotypes types generally attributed to Hollywood heroines. She is stoic, clear minded, assertive, and fully capable of controlling her own life (while also guiding others). One aspect of the alien films that obviously had an effect on the difference in films is the change in directors. Ridley Scott was the director of the first film. This is no surprise when taking into consideration that Scott is known for his heavy emphasis on aesthetics and set design (look at Blade Runner for example). A good percentage of the cinematic power Alien has is the result of Ridley Scott's eye for set design. Ridley Scott is notorious for directing films that are heavily weighed down by his obsession with aesthetics. Scott's films are generally overwhelming in that regard. You can't help to focus on the visuals and almost forget the film actually has a story. Aliens director James Cameron is best known for his ability to make tons of money with exciting and fast paced action films. For the most part, with Cameron's cinematic visuals, what you see is what you get. Aliens lacks the subconscious sexual elements so strongly prevalent in the original film. Aliens is an exciting action film that only requires attention. The film also plays with reflexive elements of the original film (as most sequels do). A token and unnecessary dream sequence features an alien popping out of Ripley's abdomen and gives the audience what they expect. The human robot found in Aliens conflicts with that found in the original film. This robot becomes a hero and an important asset to the rescue team. The original robot of course lost his manmade mind and decided it was time to kill. Both of the robots, of course, have semen like blood. The ending of Aliens also heavily parallels that of the one found in the original. The cinematic comparisons go on and on. In conclusion, I find Alien to be a much better film. As much as I enjoyed both films, Alien had a much stronger impact on me and the cinema world in general. Aliens is still an exception in that it contradicts the stereotype that sequels are god awful (which most are). Now I just hope I don't get death threats (it's long overdue) for my conflicting film preference.

-Ty E

AN ODIOS ODE TO HORRORIST HANNS
AN ODIOS ODE TO HORRORIST HANNS

Esoteric Mythmaker of Uncle Adolf's Minute-Long Millennial ReichDefender of SINema, the novice art of Mass Communal Phantasmagorical RiteInternational NationalVoyeur of Vodun Island SacrificeParticipant in New Orleans Necro NachtAryan DegenerateWarring AestheticKamerad of SatanNo Enemy of THY
-Ty E

BRAIN DAMAGE FILMS INTRODUCTION

Another day, another cinematic torture. This time, I didn't even make it to the film. In fact, I was treated with an introduction forged in the Underworld by Hades himself. To delve a bit into what I will explain with an article on Brain Damage in the future, the screener DVD's I have received have a very "colorful" introduction that is almost as bad as the films themselves. Allow me to go off-topic to explain Brain Damage Films to you in case you haven't read a review of their films. Many review sites see the easy way to fame is to applaud horrible film efforts for a cheap shot for a quote on a DVD cover. As nifty as that sounds, Our readers time is more important than us being noticed. I have seen the worst that world cinema has to offer; fish porn and extreme scat to name a few, but for some damn reason, I cannot find it in me to finish a Brain Damage film. (X-STREAM Editing Part I) My remedy to this type of bullshit is closing my eyes with happy thoughts of watching Ving Rhames in a boxing match against Wesley Snipes. Before you think that Brain Damage Films is just a film company who is plagued by bad luck, might I point out some scenes in their introduction. The intro begins with a film company scene with the text written in blood reading "Terror TV" If you listen closely, It's obvious that the sound clip that shamelessly stole was from Static-X's song "Loser" Then it moves on to the fictional mascot for Brain Damage Films, aptly named "Brain Damage" If by brain damage, they mean retarded, Then yes, This is a retarded film company with a retarded mascot. In their future, I see..... Shortbus of Terror. They already made a film entitled Goth, It wouldn't surprise me to see them tackle that familiar subject that they deal with; Low IQ's. When Brain Damage walks out, the actor is making the best Quentin Tarantino face he can. While straining, the camera begins to auto-focus and zoom in/out to create this wild effect of purgatory. Brain Damage then introduces himself as a fanatic - no, scratch that, a "FREAK" of horror films. I guess this character loves his labels twisted. Personally, I can't imagine someone who has ruined the face of independent horror to look so highly to the genre. He then calls his fans "GOREHOUNDS" Again with the CAPS key. He likes to make a solid point. I might have seen 4 - 5 Brain Damage films, and as I can remember, none of them had gore, save for the Shockumentary's and Traces of Death series. (X-STREAM Editing Part II: This Time It's Personal!) His next method of making himself seem important is him boasting in a forced raspy voice about how many e-mails and film submissions he gets from fat guys with pony-tail's all around the world. After this contrived segment explaining how people from third-world countries love his films, he begins to ramble in his heavy metal voice about how successful Brain Damage Films is. Just as Romero before, BD brags about how his fame is derived from the "INTERNET echo" and how there are hundreds of reviews for all his distributions and productions. Good Heavens, If he actually took the time to read some, like the ones I write, he might pack his bags and become a security guard. Brain Damage, if he has done one thing, it's stereotyping and insulting his fans. After exclaiming that Brain Damage Film's target audience is through the years 18 - 25, he then shouts that they "LIVE ON THE INTERNET" Nice, a man who ruins horror is telling me I have no life. I might have believed that this character was a somewhat iconic fake-punk who is in dire need of Rogaine and a fruitcake at best, but when he makes another exclamation, he grabs a plastic skull and using all the homosexuality in his body, barely taps it on the table, I lost it. The most fun I've had with Brain Damage Films, is dissecting this clever ruse which is nothing but an extreme fabrication and exaggeration of what Brain Damage Films really is. When he tells me to "Turn down the lights, Crank up the volume, and Hold on to your seats" I realize that there is no punishment worse than having to listen to DIY trash at a high volume level while not moving in a darkened room where my attention span can't wander. It's final; Horror truly is dead and hasn't even hit first base.

BRAIN DAMAGE FILMS INTRODUCTION

-mAQ

BRANDO FLIRTED WITH FASCISM?

In Marlon Brando's early years, he could have made the ideal Aryan superman. Brando was tall and handsome which would make him suitable for being the poster boy of an American Nazi movement. The reality is, however, that Brando has always taken up the liberal and civil right causes. In body he may have been Aryan but in mind is a completely different story. With Marlon Brando's acting abilities, it's apparent that he was a very emotive person who lacked the ideal stoicism for someone of his appearance. Brando was the great American "rebel" and new kind of man that Hollywood pushed. Marlon's brilliant and suave performance in The Wild One made it cool to be a rebel and even cooler to do it with style. Marlon Brando starred in the banal American World War II propaganda film The Young Lions. The highlight and only redeeming quality of the film is seeing Brando in a Nazi officer uniform. In the film, Brando carries a horrible German accent and his hair is bleached a peculiar blond. Marlon plays a tragic character in The Young Lions that starts out as an ambitious German peasant who wants to bring up his social status which National Socialism has promised him. Essentially, Marlon Brando is the "nice" Nazi who "sold his soul" to the evil Third Reich and pays for his mistake with his life in the end. The Young Lions even features an obviously Yiddish Jewish actor playing a Nazi concentration camp leader who brags about all the Jews that have been gassed. Marlon Brando was disappointed with the arrogance of the writer of The Young Lions, Irwin Shaw. Brando felt annoyed by the fact that Shaw felt that all Germans were to blame for what came to be known as the Nazi holocaust. Marlon stated about Shaw's book, "if you pick out a whole people and say, all the Germans are this, all the Jews do this, that's exactly what Hitler did. If you start thinking and feeling in broad terms like that then it's very dangerous, That was clear in Shaw's book, in his bitterness and anger." After making statements like this, Marlon Brando would be haunted with the typical slur of being labeled an "Anti-Semite" for the rest of his career. Brando never even knew what the purpose or the real meaning behind the word "Anti-Semite" was. Marlon Brando stated of Anti-Semitism, "Anti-Semitism? I used to have to ask people what that was. I didn't understand the word, I could never figure it out. It's still a problem to figure out."

Marlon Brando, Celia Adler, and Paul Muni in A Flag is Born

Knowing Marlon Brando's track record with the Jewish community and his Civil Rights activism, it would be absurd to call Brando an "Anti-Semite." Despite whatever things Marlon may have said in his life, his contribution to the Jews and other minority groups rights are tremendous. Brando helped raise money for the Israeli terrorist group Irgun Zvai Leumi by performing in a play called A Flag is Born by Ben Hecht. The profits from the play were used to buy arms and ammunition. Irgun would be responsible for the deaths of many Arabs and British soldiers. Marlon Brando also stated of his involvement with

BRANDO FLIRTED WITH FASCISM?

Irgun that, “We had to take six weeks’ course and learn about Israel and how it was formed, how it became a state, the Balfour Declaration and the presence of the British, the position of the Arabs.” For the Jewish community to label Marlon Brando, an early supporter of Israeli terrorism, an Anti-Semite is nothing more than an ungrateful stab in the back. George Lincoln Rockwell Marlon Brando was also known for his contribution to and mobilization of Civil Rights activists. In California in 1963, Brando led a small group of CORE marchers to protest for Civil Rights. Also present at the event were troops of George Lincoln Rockwell’s American Nazi Party. One of the American storm troopers carried a sign that stated “Marlon Brando is a Nigger-Loving Creep.” It is a surprise that none of the American Nazi Party members carried a sign about Brando’s alleged homosexuality. Brando would later pay his respects to the American Nazi Party by portraying George Lincoln Rockwell in the television adaptation of Alex Haley’s book Roots.

Marlon Brando in Roots Marlon Brando’s performance as George Lincoln Rockwell in Roots is strange to say the least. Brando portrays Rockwell as a slurring deranged racist who likes to hide in the shadows of swastikas. Brando acts nothing like the real Rockwell whose father was a vaudevillian comedian. Rockwell’s father “Doc” was friends with such vaudevillian Jewish performers as Benny Goodman, Groucho Marx, Jack Benny, and the perverted propagandist Walter Winchell. George Lincoln Rockwell was more a gag comedian than he was a Nazi leader. As a joke and to discredit the holocaust, Rockwell once wrote a bunch of lies about Nazi medical experiments pretending to be an SS officer. He sent the article to the Jewish magazine Sir! and they published it even including stock holocaust death camp photographs. George Lincoln Rockwell also was known for his offensive cartoons of stereotypical Jews and Negroes. Despite inaccurately portraying George Lincoln Rockwell as a humorless psycho in Roots: The Next Generations, Brando won an Emmy for the performance for “Outstanding Supporting Actor.” The same year he won the Emmy award for his performance in Roots: The Next Generations, Marlon Brando was once again labeled an “Anti-Semite” because of a Playboy Magazine article he did. In the article Marlon Brando stated, “You’ve seen every single race besmirched, but you never saw an [unfavorable] image of the kike because the Jews were ever so watchful for that—and rightly so. They never allowed it to be shown on screen. The Jews have done so much for the world that, I suppose, you get extra disappointed because they didn’t pay attention to that.” Almost twenty years later, in 1996 Marlon Brando’s thought on the Jews and Hollywood didn’t change. On Larry King live in April 1996 Brando stated, “Hollywood is run by Jews; it is owned by Jews, and they should have a greater sensitivity about the issue — of people who are suffering. Because they’ve exploited — we have seen the Nigger and Greaseball, we’ve seen the Chink, we’ve seen the slit-eyed dangerous Jap, we have seen the wily Filipino, we’ve seen everything but we never saw the Kike. Because they knew perfectly well, that that is where you draw the wagons around." By now Brando should have known that without mentioning the Jews unless it's in regard to their "suffering" or "achievements" is borderline "Anti-Semitism." Marlon Brando was easily one of America's greatest acting sons and possibly an "Anti-Semite." Brando was a rebel in the truest sense in that he sought to destroy whatever institution or group was dominant whether it be through protest or financial support. Marlon Brando is the perfect example of someone who has suffered from the irrational and childish slander technique of being labeled with stereotypical "Anti-Semite" canard. Brando was sure no fascist as he was a strange and peculiar individualist. Hollywood should be roman saluting his grave for all the help Brando gave them whether it be moneymaking, activism, or political subversion.

-Ty E

CANNIBAL HOLOCAUST: CULTURAL ANTHROPOLOGISTS FINALLY GET THEIR DUE!
CANNIBAL HOLOCAUST: CULTURAL ANTHROPOLOGISTS FINALLY GET THEIR DUE!

Cannibal Holocaust is the definitive Italian cannibal film. Anyone that has ever been interested in underground horror, exploitation, and other related cinema perversities has seen or at least heard of the film. Cannibal Holocaust also has a good amount of interesting truths and tall tales surrounding the film. Director Ruggero Deodato was arrested for obscenities after first being premiered in Italy. Rumors were later spread that Cannibal Holocaust was a snuff film and that the actors involved were really killed. Of course (and unfortunately), none of this was true. Various critics have supported the film as they see it as an excellent social commentary on the civilized world. When watching Cannibal Holocaust, the social commentaries are quite apparent and obvious (just how mainstream critics like it). Cannibal Holocaust concludes with a cowardly morale note of 'who are the real monsters – the cannibals or us?' To be honest, I enjoy Cannibal Holocaust for it's extreme revolutionary killings and complete disregard for spineless political correctness. But I also enjoy it for another hidden reason. The mainstream critics always forget to mention one crucial element of Cannibal Holocaust and it's "social commentary." As everyone who has seen Cannibal Holocaust knows, the film follows a group of sick anthropologists as they exploit the savagery of the native savage. These scientists have PhD's, yet lack any type of moral consciousness. They actually do represent the contemporary forms of Anthropology, cultural Anthropology. Cultural anthropology was invented by self-loathing German Jew Franz Boas who wouldn't even acknowledge his Jewish background. He was a product of assimilation during the period of German enlightenment. Franz Boas was also heavily influenced by the anti-reason philosophies of Emmanuel Kant. Novelist and philosopher Ayn Rand stated the following of Kant and his contribution to Western civilization, "I have mentioned in many articles that Kant is the chief destroyer of the modern world... You will find that on every fundamental issue, Kant's philosophy is the exact opposite of Objectivism." When dissecting the irrationality that is modern academia, you will find that Rand is accurate in her assertion. Tragically, Kantian Franz Boas is considered the "father" of modern day anthropology. Cultural anthropology is often considered in union with Sigmund Freud's invention of psychoanalysis.

Franz Boas being scientific It is not surprising to see the often correlation between cultural anthropology and psychoanalysis as they are both pseudo sciences. Cultural anthropology emphasizes the "science" of culture. They consider race to be a "social construct" with no biological basis. Anyone that has ever taken the most basic of university level biology classes will know the only truth is in genetics. For anyone to call something like "race" a social construct, is both irrational and ignorant. Especially when considering that most supporters of cultural anthropology also strongly believe in evolution. Sigmund Freud plotting destruction So one might ask, why would these two pseudo sciences (cultural anthropology and psychoanalysis) be so highly regarded and practiced in modern day academia? The reason for this is they are both political movements bent on subverting Western civilization in hopes of establishing an internationalist one world government (called "Globalization"). Cultural anthropology and psychoanalysis both ignore the scientific method giving the excuse that "science" is racist. They deny reality with the horrible lie that they are virtuously promoting diversity and international harmony. The cultural anthropologists featured in Cannibal Holocaust act as a great example of the subversive and immoral practices utilized by those "scientists." During the early 1960's, cultural anthropologists began an unofficial competition of sorts to find unstudied cultures around the world and document them. In the process they ended up destroying all of these cultures as they were exposed to western culture. Very few hunter-gatherer tribes contemporarily exist due to the "scientific investigation" of a few neo-Bolshevik propagandists. The rape, murder, and destruction found in Cannibal Holocaust symbolically emphasizes the destruction of culture so hatefully practiced by cultural anthropologists. A group of individuals that sought to subvert "white western ethnocentrism" in hopes of establishing international global harmony and eventually racial hegemony, have done the world a great disservice. The killer "savages" found in Cannibal Holocaust are heroes of the highest degree. They acted to protect their people and culture from the contamination of cosmopolitan degeneracy (whether they knew it or not). Director Ruggero Deodato almost perfectly captured the atmosphere of cinema vérité popularized by French cultural anthropologist Jean Rouch. Rouch would later have a huge influence on commie directors Jean-Luc Godard and Béla Tarr. Deodato's unapologetic attitude towards the likes of cultural anthropologists should be held in the highest regard to those considering themselves friends of humanity. When someone tells you they are fighting against "oppression" they are usually fighting for it.

-Ty E

CHRIS TUCKER IS RUBY RHOD
CHRIS TUCKER IS RUBY RHOD

The Fifth Element, to me, is a perfect film. Not necessarily artistic or rewarding, but an amazing science fiction epic teeming with zany characters, explosions and aliens, and my favorite - Bruce Willis playing John McClane in space. Willis might be flamed for taking the same role with dysfunctions into a quirky film, The Fifth Element should have been Die Hard in Space. Even though I would have rather seen Korben Dallas been the central show-stealer, that role is handed on a silver platter to Chris Tucker's metro sexual diva Ruby Rhod. Chris Tucker lends his natural pitch inflation to the character which gives him a feeling of spunk when he graces the screen. Albeit, the character is generally annoying as fuck, it's hard to not enjoy the screen time you spend with him. In many Hollywood scripts, roles are written exclusively for a single actor they have in mind. While this practice seems flawed unless you are backed behind a project and budget they can't refuse, I would say it's safe to assume that Luc Besson wrote this role for the hyper Negro Chris Tucker. While Chris Tucker's stand up comedy only manages to be moderately funny, he has found a way to transfer all his personality into a single character that is hilarious and awkward.

No doubt that Ruby Rhod is the Jar Jar Binks of this actioner, but if there were two key differences, it would be comedic timing and helpfulness. Several highlight scenes include Rhod's impromptu rap about the recent winner of a vacation of a lifetime and his almost-remix of Lionel Richie's All Night Long, and when Rhod manages to kill an alien with a gun on accident. Whether it be the annoying "BzzZZZZZZ" that emanates from his scrawny chest, or the flamboyant hair that suits his outrageous costumes, Chris Tucker has created a personal character from the depths of pseudo-homo eroticism hell. Ruby Rhod is arguably the most enjoyable character from The Fifth Element, other than the ultra-sexy Milla Jovovich.

-mAQ

COMMANDO: A HOMOSEXUAL ACTION FILM

I am writing about the beginning of insanity amongst character roles. Vernon Welles plays a mysterious mercenary named Bennett in the Hollywood action film and cult classic COMMANDO. He is the antagonist of a normal screenplay that sounds like anything Tom Clancy would do. What differs from this film between other action films? I'll tell you what. The character Vernon was one of the first closet homosexuals in action cinema. It's not some over analysis that leads to it, it is common knowledge. In many scenes, we are given hints that he seems to adore Matrix of both his handiwork and determination.

He set the stone for both Dennis Hopper and Gary Oldman. Until this film came out, there were no complicated villains with backdrops or some sort of psychosis. Vernon Welles plays the role according to script while giving it that "umph", you can tell from his stunning performance. Basically, Bennett has kidnapped John Matrix's daughter and is holding her hostage. Schwarzenegger plays Matrix and of course, steals the show, but what motivates Bennett? Why is he such a mystery? Nothing is known about him other than he is a deranged, sadistic killing machine who has no problem killing a child, but fears confronting Matrix. Another fine example of this is Kakihara of ICHI THE KILLER. Both are prime examples of sado-masochists that get excited to feel the terror of the ultimate showdown. Bennett himself had a chance to shoot Matrix but instead chose to settle it like a man. A classic knife fight, which in my opinion, is one of the best original knife fights. Not since THE HUNTED has there been such a realistic fight with blades. Not only sporting just his derangement, but he also experiences a death that is so over the top, you just can't help but feel bad for the guy and is also followed by one of Schwarzenegger's classic one liners. The only problem I have with him in this movie is the lack of screen time. In one particular scene, some of the Latin American soldiers are discussing slitting a girl's throats, he tells them to shut the fuck up. He then begins to tell the dictator how his men mean nothing to him and Matrix will kill all of them. The dictator then makes his point by saying he doesn't fear Matrix. Bennett quickly comes back and tells him "You should. I do". In another scene near the end, Matrix told Bennett to kill him with a knife; to man up. Bennett's face then contorted to pain and maniacal glee. A really effective emotion that got the point across. To hold my point even further, during the closing lines, Bennett said "I'm going to shoot you in between the eyes...No...I'm going to shoot you in between the balls!". His face then turned to rage and he quickly met his demise. Matrix: "You can beat me... You want to put a knife in me. Look me in the eyes. See what's going on in there while you turn it. That's what you want to do to me, right? Come on, let the girl go. You and me. Don't deprive yourself of some pleasure. Come on Bennett; let's party." Bennett: "I don't need the girl -- I don't need the girl!" Bennett is such a feminine character. When you watch him throw weapons, he seems to have a limp wrist go about. Not to stereotype, but it all adds together in a package. Many people derive humor from that casting choice but to me it is something more to fear. You have to give props to Vernon Welles and Mark Lester for not conforming to the standard villain. What we have hear is how villains should be perceived, Dysfunctional and insane.Chain mail has never looked so bad-ass.

COMMANDO: A HOMOSEXUAL ACTION FILM

-Maq

CROWLEY RISING: KENNETH ANGER'S THE MAN WE WANT TO HANG AND BRUSH OF BAPHOMET

Biologist-turned-Sexologist Alfred C. Kinsey (left) and Kenneth Anger (right) at the Abbey of Thelema in 1955

Homo-Occultist auteur Kenneth Anger has always had a lifelong admiration for The Great Beast Aleister Crowley. As a matter of fact, Anger is also a follower of Crowley's Thelema - a religion which would play a major influence on the independent filmmaker's cinema-magick experiments. Anger's stunningly colorful and ambitious work Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1953) includes a variety of Crowleyite and Thelemite inspired themes and also features the mysterious Scarlet Woman Marjorie Cameron (whom would later live with Anger for a small period of time) - the widow of NASA rocket scientist Thelemite Jack Parsons (whom accidentally blew himself up in his home laboratory) on the eve. In 1955, Kenneth Anger traveled to Sicily, Italy (with his fellow hedonistic friend Alfred Kinsey) so that he could direct a documentary on the Abbey of Thelema - a small house that Aleister Crowley used as a Temple for his religion in 1920 during one of his various self-imposed exiles. Italian II Duce Benito Mussolini would later have Aleister Crowley thrown out of fascist Italy and subsequently the religious murals created by the English Occultist were painted over by locals. Although Kenneth Anger would later restore the murals for his documentary Thelema Abbey (1955), unfortunately, a British television channel lost the film. Kenneth Anger's most ambitious Thelema themed film is undoubtedly Lucifer Rising - an extraordinary esoteric work that would take over a decade to make, but was certainly worth the long wait as it is arguably the American auteur filmmaker's cinematic magnum opus. Lucifer Rising - which was shot in Germany and at various ancient Egyptian temples - is a symbolic interpretation of Aeon of Horus - a new period in human history prophesied by Aleister Crowley in his Thelemic unholy holy book, The Book of Law. Apparently, at the dawn of the Aeon of Horus - which began in 1904 - humans would become devoted solely to individual liberty, following Crowley's law "Do What Thou Wilt." Despite being a nonbeliever with little interest in the Thelemite self-gratifying faith, I think it is obvious to most people that self-worship is indubitably a virtue of the modern Occidental world, thus coincidentally fulfilling Crowley's prophecy.

The Man We Want To Hang (2002)

After about twenty years of retirement, Kenneth Anger returned to filmmaking at the genesis of the new millennium and eventually released the short film The Man We Want To Hang (2002) - a work which encompasses a good number of phallogocentric painting created Aleister Crowley during his lifetime that had been displayed at an exhibit Bloomsbury, London. Additionally, in 2009, Anger released Brush of Baphomet, yet another film comprised of various painting (from a 2008 exhibit in Paris) created by Aleister Crowley. Although shorter in length than its predecessor, Brush of Baphomet is the more wickedly sweeter of the two Crowley painting tributes. As for Crowley's art: although the paintings leave much to be desired in the way of technique, they vividly scream out the Great Beast's undeniably distorted view of humanity, as well as his playful fixation and notorious historical participation with sexual depravity. I especially enjoyed a painting featured in Brush of Baphomet of a nude savage Negress jovially grabbing the phallic nose of a man who resembles Pinocchio. Whereas The Man We Want To Hang features Crowley's most iconic artistic works, Brush of Baphomet features The Great Beast's more complex and expressionistic oil murals. In 2000, Dutch filmmaker Nico B. paid homage to Kenneth Anger's infamous book Hollywood Babylon by documenting an exhibition dedicated to the gossipy work at the Museum of Death in California. Thus, I would not be surprised if Kenneth Anger received his initial inspiration to document the two Aleister Crowley painting exhibits from Nico B. Interestingly enough, in an interview we (Soiled Sinema) conducted with Nico B., the Dutchman stated about his friendship with Kenneth Anger, "Afterwards he (Anger) met my then wife and child. We even celebrated Christmas together. Then out of nowhere, in some dark moment he called me and was upset about something. Anger said he would put a spell on my family and I asked him to never contact me again."

Brush of Baphomet (2009)

Kenneth Anger lecturing on Aleister Crowley

Although Kenneth Anger's post-career shorts The Man We Want To Hang and Brush of Baphomet might not seem like anything special - they are beyond a shadow of doubt - loving tributes to a wicked man whose Occult influence is uniquely grand and ultimately incalculable. In a way, Aleister Crowley was the hidden guru behind the counter-culture "revolution" and the hippie movement. After all, Mr. Crowley is featured on the cover of the Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band album with other various historical figures that The Beatles admitted to admiring. In 1971, Jimmy Page - guitarist of Led Zepelin - moved into Crowley's former house in Loch Ness, Scotland and he even engaged in sex magick rituals, but later found such Occult activities no longer fun (replacing them with heroin). In fact, Page was originally hired by Kenneth Anger to provide the soundtrack for Lucifer Rising, but his wife later had a cat fight with the Occultnik filmmaker, so consequently, the famous guitar player was fired from the film (despite the fact that Page had already composed a score, which was inevitably left unused). In retaliation, Kenneth Anger belittled Jimmy Page to the press and even threatened to attack him with a black magic curse. After his falling out with Jimmy Page, Kenneth Anger hired convicted murderer and Manson family associate Bobby Beausoleil to score and record the soundtrack for Lucifer Rising in prison (Beausoleil was given permission by the institution to do so). Beausoleil also stars in Anger's short Invocation of My Demon Brother (1969) - a film made from an agglomerate of scrap footage from Anger's original 1966 failed attempt at directing Lucifer Rising. On top of being heavily Thelemic in both theme and imagery, Invocation of My Demon Brother features Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey (whom plays "His Satanic Majesty"), as well as random concert clips of Mick Jagger - who also composed the Moog Synthesizer-driven score for the film. After all, Mick Jagger is the man that gained much fame by writing (with some minor help from Keith Richards) and confidently singing the 1968 controversial hit song "Sympathy for the Devil." What better way for Lucifer to subliminally trick people than through the aesthetically pleasing hypnotism of music?! Aleister Crowley would also influence industrial music (Throbbing Gristle, Coil), as well as neo-folk groups (Death in June, Current 93). In the late nineteenth century, German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche stated that god was dead. Instead of embracing their traditional Christian cultural backgrounds, many of the great artists of the twentieth culture fell in love with the self-worshipping gospel of Aleister Crowley. 'Tis no wonder the modern world is so pridefully and enthusiastically unholy, for that we can partially thank Aleister Crowley.

Aleister Crowley on the cover of The Beatles' Sgt. Pepper's album
-Ty E

CULTURAL POP ICON QUENTIN TARANTINO TACKLES THE HOLOCAUST WITH INGLORIOUS BASTARDS

CULTURAL POP ICON QUENTIN TARANTINO TACKLES THE HOLOCAUST WITH INGLORIOUS BASTARDS

Quentin "I love kissing Kosher ass" Tarantino is about the begin production of his latest schizophrenic pop culture movie Inglorious Bastards. In the long awaited film, eight Jews take on evil Nazis Zio-Style! Only Tarantino could come up with idea of making a fantasy holocaust action film featuring tough Jews kicking Kraut ass. Zionist filmmaker Steven Spielberg's American propaganda slime Saving Private Ryan (essentially a weak remake of Darryl F. Zanuck's The Longest Day) only featured a little footage of Kosher commando Private Stanley Mellish (played by the whiney Adam Goldberg) fighting a devilish German Nazi one on one. Knowing Tarantino's love for old and horrible action films (and film in general), one can expect to see Nazi heads and limbs flying in Inglorious Bastards. Jewish Hack horror director and Tarantino lover Eli Roth will be playing "a baseball bat-swinging Nazi hunter" in Inglorious Bastards. God's chosen have always been followers of the "eye for an eye" law. Goy boy toy Brad Pitt will also be starring in the film as "a hillbilly from Tennessee who puts together a team of eight Jewish-American soldiers." The Jews of Inglorious Bastards aren't your stereotypical draft dodgers! They are lean, mean, chutzpah filled killing machines. One of Quentin Tarantino's influences for this holocaust epic? The plot of Inglorious Bastards is as follows, "Two story lines... converge: One follows a group of prisoners-turned-soldiers whose mission is to take down a group of Nazis, and the other follows a young Jewish woman who seeks to avenge the death of her parents by this Nazi group. German film critic Tobias Kniebe has described the film as "This is pop culture meets Nazi Germany and the Holocaust." Only Quentin Tarantino could reinvent the holocaust film for this generations tough and militant Zionist Hebrews. Sadly, Jewish funny boy Adam Sandler will no longer be starring in Inglorious Bastards as expected. A scheduling conflict has caused Sandler's dropout of the film so no one will be able to see the comedians homicidal kraut killing side. Quentin Tarantino with brothers Weinstein Instead of dramatic scenes featuring Yiddish children being led to the gas chambers, Inglorious Bastards will feature torture, revenge, and Tarantino style slaughters. Tarantino's Kill Bill Volume 1 and 2 reminded me of a really long and bloody Asian car commercial. I don't think it would be far fetched to assume that Tarantino will be "borrowing" some scenes from Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS. After all, the pop culture icon director has never thought about making a personal and serious film in his entire life. Tarantino has also considered titling the film Once Upon a Time in Nazi-Occupied France. Something tells me that Sergio Leone would have considered Quentin Tarantino a mediocre and soulless director. Inglorious Bastards will be distributed by the lovable and bloated Weinstein brothers. Everyone knows that Quentin Tarantino has always had the best connections in Hollywood. For Tarantino to truly leave his mark in Hollywood, a film about the holocaust is mandatory. After all, Tarantino has always been a fan of tough World War II vet and Jewish pulp filmmaker Samuel Fuller. Tarantino has managed to steal many of Fuller's signature pulp film making themes and techniques so he only owes it the director to make a holocaust film.

-Ty E

DANIELLE HARRIS: A TALE OF TWO MICHAEL'S
DANIELLE HARRIS: A TALE OF TWO MICHAEL'S

In the fall of 1988, Halloween 4: The Return of Michael Myers was released to an anticipating public. With the star being of young Jewish talent, Danielle Harris put up an admirable role as the little girl who wouldn't stop screaming. Logically, she had every right to but the kicker was that she was very good at acting in hysterics. After this role, she would reprise the Jamie Lloyd character in Halloween 5: The Revenge of Michael Myers then found a more generous market in such films as Free Willy, Urban Legend, and my personal favorite - The Last Boy Scout. Starting in the 90s, Danielle Harris began receiving out-of-the-ordinary fan mail. A stalker had been admiring her from afar in her home in Houston. Can't blame a simple man for wanting someone who's beautiful, successful, and earnest (Or so it seems). To play a character for a role, she cut her hair shorter. In retaliation, the hardened creeper sent spiteful comments separating "old" Danielle with the "new" Danielle, calling her newly used alter-ego a slut. From here on out, the letters got increasingly more savage and morbid with fantastical tales of cutting her delicate body into pieces. The irony lies solely on the eerie occurrence of her first starring roles being that of a stalker victim. Perhaps this crazed fan idolized Michael Myers more than Danielle Harris? The truth may never be known. The entire incident had been kept under tight wraps. Names, dates, and other gossip necessities are unavailable. In the final incident of violence, the man showed up at her house with a Teddy Bear and a shotgun. Danielle's mom feared for her life as she received a threatening call in the night. Police arrived and promptly arrested the man. Many restraining orders later, she continued to receive fan letters from the stranger begging for forgiveness.

Things seemed good for Danielle Harris after the foul-mouthed efforts of her crazed fan. She appeared on the Dr. Phil show relaying her experiences for a laughable stalker crowd (Highlight is the black woman expressing her love for Jay Z). In the epilogue of this sentimental talk, she basically summarizes the plot of Jennifer Lopez's Enough, in which Lopez embraces her femininity and is trained by a karate master to kick her husband's ass. The move of this perhaps may have strengthened already feeble Oprah fans but only proved to be mildly laughable.

As for the possibility that the stalker could have been mesmerized with Michael Myers, it is very plausible. Take his core in retrospect. He's a menacing yet respectable character of terror. This allows him to have power over any mere mortal. As seen in Halloween 5, he experiences a kiss of love meant for someone else. Such emotional foreplay is his only apparent weakness. Michael Myers is a cold soulless killer whose only weakness is the never-ending psychic link with his relatives. Perhaps pursuing her in a stern and serious manner was his only real chance at being with her. Love does crazy things, eh? I find it fascinating that some hold stalking as the highest form of flattery. A logic that is neither deceptive nor misleading. In 2007, Rob Zombie began produced and directing his own "spin" on Carpenter's classic Halloween tale of horror simply called Halloween. His idea to revamp the film took what made it a "Halloween" film and redesigned it with more action and more swearing, which isn't a good thing. To appeal to harsh cynical Myers fans, he placed Danielle Harris in the film as a teenager (Whom is actually 30 years old and has never looked better). The equivalent of this role boils down to Harris cock-teasing the screen with her small-town hipster look then running out of a house screaming baring her breasts. When watching Halloween 4 & 5 back-to-back with Halloween (2007), the expeditious jump from childhood innocence to middle-age sex symbol is brazenly apparent mixed with a hint of eroticism and forbidden fruitions that spring to mind. Danielle Harris has the same symbolic phases that every genre diva has been through. They will encounter a childhood stardom, hit a busy scandalous phase, then to finally settle down. Danielle Harris hit a stint in the horror genre then recently exploded back with a vengeance thanks to Rob Zombie's casting in Halloween (2007). Now she's scheduled for a plethora of horror films, mainly reboots of classic B-movie fare. Judging by the Prank teaser poster, I could wildly assume that Danielle Harris forgot which Halloween film she starred in.

This guy points too much and I don't think Danielle even watches horror films. Ever since the stalker situation, Danielle Harris' life will never be the same. She was stalked, obsessed over, and emotionally abused. Threatened if she changed and followed to the grave, this deep love will never fade and Rob Zombie's choice to have her bare all was the only exploitative and interesting factor of Halloween (2007). Apart from the real to life stalking incident, Danielle Harris is only a human being who is more beautiful than some others. Time can only tell if this mysterious stalker will "come home" to claim his "reimagined" prize, or other stalkers for that matter. Not a very intelligent move on Ms. Harris' part.

-mAQ

DIRECTOR OF THE APOCALYPSE: GASPAR NOÉ
DIRECTOR OF THE APOCALYPSE: GASPAR NOÉ

There is no doubt that French filmmaker Gaspar Noé is one of the most controversial contemporary directors of French and international cinema. Film critics have done everything from praising him as an innovative filmmaker to condemning him as a fascist offender. One thing is true about Gaspar Noé, he is a filmmaker with his own set of themes and characteristics that define him as a cinematic auteur. He is a filmmaker that has set out to make films with his own individual vision. Very few contemporary film directors can say that they have the same type of freedom and artistic integrity as Gaspar Noé. In a world where dollars signs are more appealing to a director than ones desire to express their most potent of obsessions, Noé has shown no reluctance in continuing his individualistic approach. The auteur signatures found in Gaspar Noé's films are both viciously graphic and tragically human. Noé likes to look at both ends of the emotional spectrum that humans are capable of. Whether it be the violent racist hatred displayed by an incestuous father in a jealous rage or the beautiful intimacy of two lovers in each others arms, Gaspar Noé's films are no doubt of the human nature. He grew up in an artistic family as his father Luis Felipe Noé is a renowned neo-figurative painter (Gabbey 37). Gaspar Noé has also stated that his father, Luis, wanted him to be what is typically referred to as an "artist." Of course, he ended up being one of the most subversive and controversial filmmakers of recent time. Gaspar Noé, unlike a lot of underground filmmakers, had formal training in film production and cinematography. He trained at one of the most famous schools in France for cinematography (Gabbey 37). He entered school at the ripe young age of seventeen and by the time he was nineteen had a graduated with a highly beneficial understanding of the technical aspects of filmmaking. Not only is Noé subversive with the content and story format of his films, but also the construction and techniques of the films. Gaspar Noé's formal film production helps to explain his unconventional and revolutionary techniques. It is good to know the rules so that you know how to break them. Various film critics have called Gaspar Noé's films both existential and anti-French (Gabbey 38). Quite ironic considering many of the greatest existentialist philosophers such as Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Camus, and Simone de Beauvoir were French. Gaspar Noé has denied claims that his films are anti-French, stating of his first feature length film I Stand Alone(1998), "Actually, the film isn't anti-French at all... There's a subculture in France that is rarely portrayed on the screen... At the time, fifteen percent of the people voted for the National Front (French fascist party), and many of the other people were as racist as the National Front." Gaspar Noé is speaking of the racist remarks of the lead character simply named "The Butcher." I would have to agree with Gaspar Noé's remark as "The Butcher" is far from a positively portrayed character. This character is also featured in Noé's films Carne(1991) and Irreversible(2002). Carne is a medium length film Noé made about “the Butcher” before I Stand Alone. In Carne, the butcher stabs an Arab construction worker in the mouth with a knife, mistaking the man for someone that harassed his daughter. In I Stand Alone, the butcher continues his attacks on Arabs and other minorities. The irony is that the butcher’s father was a French resistance fighter who was killed by the Nazis during the second world war. Although Gaspar Noé’s films aren’t necessarily anti-French, they feature subcultures of France that might not be considered the most flattering representation of the once powerful empire. In fact, I would argue that Noé is one of the most French (although originally from Argentina) of filmmakers as he presents the country in a more realistic way. A country in racial and political turmoil. A place where crime, prostitution, unemployment, and hate run rampant. Gaspar Noé is a director that displays controversial issues facing a nation in an objective way which bothers many people. Offering no type of real moral messages, audiences are both intimidated and offended by his films. It is up to the audience to make up their opinion about Gaspar Noé’s films content. Gaspar Noé stated in an interview, “The French movies that are promoted abroad are the ones that give like a trendy, cultural, petit-bourgeois, upper class image of France, but it’s true that people who are poor in France are the same as in New York or in India. People who are poor, they are poor and they suffer a lot (Thrower 44).” Gaspar Noé’s honest statement about the suffering of the poor in France reflects the brutal and often offensive truth surrounding contemporary France. Bizarre and graphic sexuality are themes found in the works of Gaspar Noé. Two of his shorts, Sodomites (1998) and We FK Alone (2006) are just subversive porn films. Carne and I Stand Alone feature scenes of father and daughter incest. Irreversible features scenes that range from sensual lovemaking between two lovers and a brutal sodomy rape committed by a homosexual pimp on a woman. Gaspar Noé once again doesn’t relent in his subversive content when looking at human sexual relationships. Gaspar Noé’s short Sodomites was commissioned by the French Administration Health strangely enough (Gabbey 37). The short is part of five shorts that were concocted by the French government to promote the use of condoms amongst heterosexuals. The French government was uninterested in having porn directors producing the shorts and asked exclusively artistic directors (including Jean-Luc Godard who declined) to be involved in the project. Sodomites features the actual act of sodomy between a female and a wolf masked male. During the sex acts, a group of bikers cheer them on. I couldn’t imagine an artistic American director like Wes Anderson directing a porn short for and funded by the American government. Gaspar Noé’s short We Fck Alone was featured on a compilation of porn shorts by artistic directors around the world. The short features two very different individuals (a cutesy girl and a dirty punk) masturbating to the same pornographic film. The short is quite an interesting concept in the way of form. Furthermore, the cinematic technique used is quite unique. A camera that seems to be floating weaves in and out of scenes of the individuals in the middle of sexual acts (having a similar feeling to Noé's Irreversible). Despite their content, both of Gaspar Noé's porn short films feature odd techniques and auteur signatures so often associated with the young director. Irreversible (Noé's most recent feature length film) features many of the subversive ingredients so prevalent in Gaspar Noé's earlier films. The film unfolds in backwards order revealing how time can change everything. As the film progresses, you find that a woman who has been brutally raped is also pregnant. Unfortunately you can assume that the woman experiences a miscarriage. During the May 2002 Cannes screening of Irreversible, apparently around 250 out of 2,400 audience members either fainted or walked out on the film (Brottman 160). Like Gaspar Noé's earlier films, Irreversible takes a look at France on the verge of apocalyptic chaos. The film features a variety of scenes involving racial conflicts, brutality and killing of homosexuals, beating of a transgendered prostitute, and the killing rape of a beautiful woman by a drug fueled pimp. Gaspar Noé opens the viewer up to a world of subversive and widely unknown subcultures. French director Mathieu Kassovitz also examines different subcultures of France in the Cannes winning (drama) La Haine (1995) (focusing on immigrant ghettos). The difference between Kassovitz's La Haine and Gaspar Noé Irreversible is that the later film takes a more nihilist approach. Irreversible is a film that makes it look like its only a matter of time before France explodes into a world of chaos whereas La Haine merely displays the problem. Irreversible has a seamless flow from scene to scene that owes a little to Alfred Hitchcock's experimental cinematic masterpiece Rope (1948). The camera floats from scene to scene in a way that parallels the detached nature of the overall film. Fatalism, nihilism, and powerlessness are the trinity of secular apocalyptic thought according to scholar Daniel Wojcik (Brottman 167). These characteristics are also quite prevalent in both the content of Irreversible and the emotional output of the technique in the film. All of these things add up to the auteur characteristics on an individual looking at the world (especially France) with a view of unfortunate apocalyptic inevitability and realism. Gaspar Noé is an individual that is unafraid of looking at the world through lenses that see human darkness. He displays images and truths that others have tried so hard to ignore and cover-up. Many film critics have written him off as someone that merely offends to offend. I find Gaspar Noé to be a realist of the nihilist sort. Someone that will offend and disturb the typical filmgoer (whether intentional or not). Of course, the greatest filmmakers have always caused major controversy and public outcry.

DIRECTOR OF THE APOCALYPSE: GASPAR NOÉ

-Ty E

EASTERN PROMISES OF WHITE SLAVERY

David Cronenberg's feature-length film Eastern Promises may be his greatest "mainstream" film yet. The film mixes a very bizarre love triangle (which many people seem to not notice), the "Russian Mafia," and an orphaned child for a truly "thrilling" experience. I found David Cronenberg's portrayal of the Russian Mafia to be very interesting as he did not glamorize these international criminals as most filmmakers seem to do. I also believe Eastern Promises to be the "best mafia film of the decade" as I have yet to see a mafia film of the 2000s come even close to the power and quality of the film. I also believe David Cronenberg to be a courageous director for intimately tackling Eastern Promises in the manner he did.

In the biography David Cronenberg: A Delicate Balance it is revealed that Cronenberg was an outsider in relation to his upper middleclass Jewish community located in Toronto, Canada. To this day, David Cronenberg still considers himself merely an "Atheist" and lives his life in such a way. One could even call David Cronenberg the "Sigmund Freud of cinema" as both men are atheist Hebrews obsessed with the Psycho-Sexual. In fact, the only time David Cronenberg has seemed to acknowledge his heritage is in the recent short At the Suicide of the Last Jew in the World in the Last Cinema in the World made for the film anthology To Each His Own Cinema. Cronenberg stated of the film, "I've never thought of myself as a Philip Roth whose subject was his Jewishness, but I've never denied it." Cronenberg was responding to a Hezbollah mission statement and he went further on to state, "It's pretty interesting to hear someone say our goal is to kill every Jew in the world wherever they are. That means me and my children. It does evoke a reaction." I bring up David Cronenberg's "Jewishness" as I found it interesting that he directed a film about the so called "Russian Mafia." The only thing "Russian" about the "Russian" mafia is that many of its members are Jews from Russia. Anyone who has studied the Russian mafia knows this and I found it particularly interesting that David Cronenberg would direct a film about it. Former president of Russia and current prime minister of Russia Vladimir Putin flushed Russia's toilets a couple years back when he expelled much of the "Russian" Mafia and the infamous Jewish Oligarchs (who bought Russia for pennies when the Soviet Union fell). Like in Eastern Promises, many members of the Russian Mafia with the Jewish oligarchs, moved to England. One very arrogant Jewish Oligarch exiled in England, Boris Berezovsky, claims he is going to run a "second Russian Revolution" against Putin. Due to Vladimir Putin actually caring about his country (he also apparently banned "EMO" and "South Park") by kicking out parasitical criminals, the American and Western press have been giving Putin negative coverage. Eastern Promises exposes how the Jewish Russian Mafia have been using the Slavic women of eastern Europe as sex slaves. For some reason Hollywood doesn't seem to care about contemporary international slavery of white women. In the Zionist propaganda film Taken, it is unsurprisingly Albanians that are running the slave trade of girls. Why does Hollywood need to lie about who is really behind stealing Slavic girls, getting them addicted to Heroin, and selling (and killing) them to people around the world? Jewish horror clown Eli Roth also did his part in portraying Slavic Eastern Europeans (and Europeans in general) as barbaric monsters that torture (in Neo-Death Camps) and kill Americans for profit in his soulless Hostel films. Jewish author Robert I. Friedman released a book Red Mafiya: How the Russian Mob Has Invaded America about the Jewish Russian Mafia and their international crimes. Apparently, the American FBI won't even keep files or go after the Jewish mafia because the Jewish "anti-hate" group The Anti-Defamation League persuaded the FBI not to as it would "foster Anti-Semitism." Forget about an America (or England) that actually takes care of its own citizens against criminal alien elements. One has to wonder why David Cronenberg did not have Eastern Promises take place in the United States. Maybe the film's material was a little bit "too close to home?" The Jewish Russian mafia members in America have certainly done their fair share of crime. For example, Jewish Mafia boss Semion Mogilevich, who had very profitable slave prostitution rings in Eastern Europe and Israel, masterminded a 7 billion dollar money laundering scheme (the largest at that time). Unsurprisingly, Mogilevich stole the money from the Bank of New York, one of the owners of the Federal Reserve. Of course, US congress met a "dead end" in their investigation against Mogilevich. Viggo Mortensen's character in Eastern Promises has a Jesus tattoo, but Mortensen mentions on the film's DVD release that the tattoo's meaning has nothing to do with Christianity. Of course, the average viewer watching Eastern Promises will interpret Mortensen's tattoo in a way that will lead them to believe that the Russian Mafia is full of criminal Christians. Although disgusting and inhumane, the international sex slave trade of Slavic women seems to be unimportant to Hollywood and the Media. After all, it is only white women in slavery and they would rather talk about Darfur or pathetic Somalian pirates (who should be shot on the spot like white pirates used to be). Steven Spielberg also brought us the wretched and lie of a film Amistad. One doesn't have to look far to find out that the Jewish community (mainly from Holland, Spain, and Portugal) also dominated the slave trade of Africans which only whites get the blame for. The book The Secret Relationship of Blacks and Jews provides more than a plentiful amount of evidence as to who should carry the majority of the blame for Slavery of Blacks. After forty years of filmmaking, David Cronenberg has maintained his ability to direct both original and quality films. Eastern Promises is one of Cronenberg's many mainstream films and probably his best. Although at first glance, Eastern Promises may not seem like a film full of risk taking, it no doubt is. What outrage it would spark if the typical American and Englishman were to be completely enlightened to the true problem of the “Russian” Mafia and how our governments have been tolerating these criminals. As shown in Eastern Promises, the Russian Security Services (FSB which was formerly the KGB), has taken it upon themselves to stop these international criminals. Stopping the “Russian” Mafia is a true promise of the FSB from the East.

EASTERN PROMISES OF WHITE SLAVERY

-Ty E

ETHICAL RESPONSIBILITY AND RACE RELATIONS IN BAMBOOZLED ETHICAL RESPONSIBILITY AND RACE RELATIONS IN BAMBOOZLED

One of the most interesting aspects of Spike Lee's much-maligned Bamboozled is that it neglects to mention that in the original blackface minstrel shows of early America, some of them were put on by abolitionist advocates and used the blackface format as a means to portray the situation of blacks in a sympathetic light, often pointing out white American double-standards and injustices against black people. The film itself contains a wealth of cultural references, historical information, and general awareness of all race issues in general, and it never points out this fact. But it doesn't really matter at all. The omission of this fact seems completely deliberate as the film innately shows awareness to this irony in its main message. All broadcasted or even written information lives as a virus, and film itself is perhaps the most powerful form of all information. When information is disseminated enough, the simple ideas being communicated are what stick to people's minds, not the sophistication or intellectual subtlety behind these ideas. That is what Bamboozled is chiefly about, and that is why the film works so incredibly well on so many different levels. Perhaps the greatest mark of Lee's success in this film is the overwhelming amount of negative criticism the film garnered at the hands of white and Jewish liberal intellectuals. Leftists in general cannot handle the idea that art can be anything more than just art. When anyone points out that information has an impact on the people who view it, whether it's through children becoming more violent after watching Home Alone or women acting dumber and more whorish in the wake of the countless feminist "female empowerment" movies like Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, you can be sure that a chord will have been struck with the modern leftist. It is not enough to simply view Bamboozled, because a full appreciation of this film cannot be attained unless one sees the confused and noticeably insecure reviews of it as well. It is my own belief that if Bamboozled was greeted with nothing but overwhelming positivity from the very people that Lee is satirizing, he would have failed miserably. But fortunately, this is not the case. The two most common issues with the film that I have observed from Bamboozled's many negative reviews are that the film has a "confused message," and that it is not funny. Both of these criticisms are absolutely wrong: Bamboozled has a very consistent message, and it also is extremely funny.

The film is about a black television executive named Pierre DeLacroix (Damon Wayans), a man with a contrived white accent, who is frustrated at the network for refusing his various show ideas for legitimate entertainment that does not degrade or pejoratively portray blacks. His boss is a condescending young go-getter named Dunwitty (Michael Rappaport) who masks his own racism by appropriating his own interest in black culture. He frequently says the word "nigger," and although he makes no attempt to rationalize it other than by saying “it’s just a word,” he noticeably feels a sense of entitlement as shown through his interest in black sports figures, black entertainment, and his own black wife and two biracial children. As he puts it to Pierre, “Brother man, I’m blacker than you.” Pierre’s big idea is to create a variety show so extraordinarily offensive that it will accomplish two main objectives: to reveal the network for being as racist and obscene as it is, and to get himself fired. Pierre concocts a blackface minstrel variety show entitled Mantan: The New Millennium Minstrel Show and what actually happens is the exact opposite of what he thought would happen. Not only does the show do extremely well, but Pierre becomes enraptured in the surprising success, turning himself into Hollywood’s new favorite Negro.

The pilot episode is perhaps the most telling part of the entire movie, giving an explanation to the logic behind the show’s success. Mantan and his partner Sleep’n’Eat, two down-on-their-luck street performers (formerly known as Manray and Womack) who get hired for the show, explain to the audience that they want to take them back to a time when “niggers knew their place.” Mantan then instructs the audience to yell out of their windows, “I’m tired of the drugs. I’m tired of the crack babies born out of wedlock to crackhead AIDS-infested parents. I’m tired of the inflated welfare rolls while good wholesome Americans bring less and less of their paycheck home every two weeks.” In the same monologue, Mantan chastises (presumably black) professional athletes for having sex with prostitutes and doing drugs while claiming to be Christian. He then concludes the monologue by instructing the audience to yell, “I’m sick and tired of niggers and I’m not gonna take it anymore.” Now, while the internal logic of the show is confused, the element of satire within the show’s presentation becomes quite apparent. The message of Mantan is that any attempt to try and improve the lives of black Americans is akin to bringing them back to the days of slavery and robbing them of their freedom, that the whole idea behind trying to get blacks off of drugs and into the job market is simply a way for whites to continue to enslave them and rob them of their own unique culture. And, of course, the idea behind Bamboozled is that sentiments such as these are complete bullshit.

Nevertheless, white and black liberals watching the show absolutely love it, presumably because they identify with this idea, and the critics universally hail the show as a fearless comedy that breaks boundaries and barriers. One of the reasons Bamboozled confuses so many people is because it is a satire that satirizes a satire, and the two messages of each presentation are extremely different. To add to the complexity of the film, Mantan’s New Millennium Minstrel Show is not portrayed as aesthetically bad. Rather, the opposite is true: it’s aesthetically wonderful. The writing is slick, the dancing and music performances are excellent, the sets are well-crafted, and the comedy is hilarious. Spike Lee even highlights this idea by having the segments of Mantan shot in 35mm film, while the rest of Bamboozled is shot in very ugly and crude digital film. Ultimately, however, despite its positive qualities, the message of Mantan leaves a devastating impact on the community. Mantan is more than a fictitious minstrel show: it is an allegory for almost all corporate black entertainment in the 21st century. It makes use of talented black entertainers but utilizes their talents to communicate all the wrong messages. Thus, in the film, Lee equates gangsta rap with minstrel shows and plays a heavy role in attacking rap culture. One example is in an ad for Timmy Hillnigger clothes (a play on Tommy Hilfiger) in which Hillnigger himself tells his black consumers, "If you want to keep it really real, never get out of the ghetto, stay broke, and continue to add to my multibillion dollar corporation."

ETHICAL RESPONSIBILITY AND RACE RELATIONS IN BAMBOOZLED

To add another level of complexity, Lee introduces an afrocentric rap group called the Mau-Maus who absolutely hate Mantan but are nevertheless a product of its influence. The Mau-Maus, while auditioning for the show in hopes of landing the role for a band called "The Alabama Porch Monkeys," explain exactly what they are all about in their own lyrics: "Freedom, reparation and apologies, from Africa to America odysseys, guerilla-type tactics on that socialistic fallacy, the devastation of the social darwinistic thought to keep a brown man down sport." In spite of their grandiose mission statement, the Mau-Maus are equally led astray by the mass bombardment of harmful media images. At one point, they are shown drinking Da Bomb Malt Liquor, a beverage advertised specifically for black people in the ghetto. Showing similar hypocrisy near the end of the film in a far less subtle fashion, the Mau-Maus kidnap and murder Mantan while each wearing blackface minstrel Halloween masks. The idea behind their presence in the film then becomes very clear, which is that even well-intentioned people can be warped enough by media to the point where they become everything they are trying to fight against.

Another aspect of the film that people believe to be counterintuitive to its message is within the presence of a Jewish media relations consultant. Since New York Magazine film critic David Edelstein did such a fantastic job of explaining the scenario, I will use his writing to lay it out:

"When the network brings in a Jewish consultant named Myrna Goldfarb (Dina Pearlman) to advise on a public-relations strategy, her mere presence is treated as an affront. In an attempt to defend her perspective, she mentions having lived with a black man and adds that her parents had marched with Martin Luther King Jr. at Selma, Ala. But Sloan and De-La don't buy her empathy, and neither does the movie. I'd like to say that any Jews who'd appear in a Spike Lee "joint" are traitors to their people, but I'm afraid I'd sound too much like Lee. Does he want that to be his legacy? He makes it so much easier to resign ourselves to our racism."

While Edelstein does a great job at offering his frothing, confounded perspective on how a Hollywood movie could actually portray a Jewish person as less than 100% morally altruistic, he also hints at one of the great truths to the movie. Failing to note that Myrna instructs Pierre to hire only black employees, wear kente cloth, invoke the name of Dr. Martin Luther King, and use the word 'community' when talking about Mantan, Edelstein has picked up on the fact that she represents a Jewish stereotype – a neglected, archaic, obscure stereotype rarely found in any mainstream media, but a stereotype nonetheless. Bamboozled is not any attempt to encourage a strengthened sense of staunch political correctness in America, but rather an attempt to encourage responsibility and taking pride in one's actions and behaviors. Black people are far more likely to give birth out of wedlock, commit homicide, commit rape, or commit robbery than the Jews, and their unemployment and poverty levels are also much higher as well. For Dina Pearlman, the stakes are relatively low for her strengthening the idea that Jews are shrewd, amoral corporate shills. For a black actor to accept a role as a slovenly, ignorant or violent human being, the stakes are much higher for the message being communicated. Moreover, the bombardment of negative black images marketed as supposedly being by, for, and about the black community is quite common in today's culture. The ivy-league educated Pierre DeLacroix could be a premature parody of Reggie Hudlin with his Harvard degree, five years before becoming the BET Programming Chief, but ultimately, it does not matter. When Edelstein writes, "[Spike Lee] makes it so much easier to resign ourselves to our racism," what he actually means is, "Spike Lee is pointing out that racial issues are still relevant today, and this offends me." This lack of responsibility from all sides is a phenomenon much too common in American culture.

The subtlety of Bamboozled is perhaps at its strongest when the name of Martin Luther King is evoked, but not in a very endearing way. As previously mentioned, the Jewish media relations consultant exploits her own parents' work as a means to make herself look less racist, and true enough, the Jews did play a major role alongside Dr. King's activities in the Civil Rights movement. DeLacroix himself also explains, while rationalizing the intent of the show to the two main actors, that, "The good Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King did not enjoy seeing his people beaten on the 6:00 news. However, white people needed to see that in order to move this country to change. They need to see this show for that exact same reason." It seems as though Lee is asking if anything has seriously changed since then. He is not complimenting the tactics of King, but instead criticizing them through DeLacroix's appraisal. The days of Malcolm X have long since ended, and his ideas have been thoroughly kicked aside by just about everyone with the exception of a small and dwindling number of cultural figures. Bamboozled takes place in a post-Malcolm X society, where his ideas are alluded to here and there (such as in the title of the film), but his name is never mentioned once. It does not seem to be any kind of coincidence that Malcolm X once called Dr. King an Uncle Tom, and in the film we see King's name used by only the most smarmy and avaricious of intellectuals for no real altruistic purpose whatsoever. Dr. King's name is actually used to justify the most racist images one could possibly imagine on television. This is probably the most important and offensive touch to the film: Lee is not championing the sort of Civil Rights causes that sought to find acceptance and tolerance from white people by being passive and complacent. He is advocating responsibility, personal empowerment, and strength. These are ideas that most white and Jewish liberals simply cannot handle, or even find frightening.

ETHICAL RESPONSIBILITY AND RACE RELATIONS IN BAMBOOZLED

Of course, the movie does have its flaws. The sentimentality does run a bit thick at times near the end, and viewers might find some of the funniest dialogue to be in the most poignant scenes, which can admittedly be jarring. For example, while Pierre's dignified, intelligent comedian father (Paul Mooney) talks to him about responsibility, he tells Pierre that in every black man is a born entertainer. I found this understated line pretty funny in an otherwise serious context. Another (unintentionally?) hilarious moment occurs when, after the police have shot nearly all of the Mau-Maus to death, the sole remaining member, a white man named 1/16th Blak, screams out, "I'm black too... it only takes one drop of black blood." Perhaps the idea should have been moved to an earlier scene, so the audience could simply watch on, aghast at the brutal fallout of this minstrel show. The most biting commentary and subversive dialogue happens at places where perhaps the film should refrain from being controversial. But it is also the controversial element of the film that cements its relevance today, especially in a country where it is frowned upon to discuss racial issues in any meaningful manner. Spike Lee had to show an overwhelming level of audacity for Bamboozled to be made, and sure enough, the studios responded by allowing it only to be made on a shoestring budget. Rather than hurting it overall, it is entirely because of this intellectual audacity within studio constraints and outside pressures that Bamboozled stands as a classic, not only as Spike Lee's greatest film, but also one of the greatest films on race relations ever made.

-Blind Lame OKB

FRENCH TERRORISTS DESTROYING AMERICAN HORROR

It never really occurred to me how the average French directors are slowly destroying all things great or tolerable about horror. It hit me once I decided that I'd been a bad boy and needed to punish myself by forcing Alien: Resurrection into my corneas. You see, the "special edition" version of this film (Which is by no means special) has an introduction from Jean-Pierre Jeunet. The director of The City of Lost Children and Amélie decided to separate these two better-than-good films with a shocking blunder of a horror film. What's worse is that he hammered the final nail into the coffin of the Alien franchise. Not that it was particularly going anywhere or had created anything decent after Aliens, but it was still a depressing time in 1997. The introduction opened with the frog in a theater discussing how proud he is of this feminist sci-fi classic. The introduction alone revived long suppressed memories of the cinematic atrocities this film committed. Sigourney Weaver is the woman's answer to a Rambo and shows off her B-Ball skills against the manly Ron Perlman. French citizens have always been known to hate America. The quickest "terrorist" attack is to adapt all classic cinema's into a steamy pile of trash so faggy art students run to shitty films like Paris, je t'aime or any other piece of "French art" This attack on American cinema does include films like The Eye, Hitman, and the recent Mirrors, along with the script for P2. Alexandre Aja (A noted Jew) was among the first noted French horror directors and infiltrated studios with his surprisingly mint remake of The Hills Have Eyes. This stealthy attack also includes him to Americanize his name by changing it to just "Alex" With the American success of Haute Tension (High Tension) and the release of THHE, he secured his and his fellow frenchie's foot in the door and thus began to auction off properties and rights to all sorts of creations to be slaughtered. Rights such as a 3D remake to the Corman Classic Piranha and the remake of a South Korean horror film Mirrors were sold to Aja. He seems to have his hands full Easternizing all things wonderful about terror. Directors of fellow gorehound's favorite Inside were scheduled to direct the Hellraiser remake. As much as I'd like to think it would have been successful, chances are they'd just ruin the franchise so we'd run to films produced by their economy such as the upcoming Martyrs and Ils (Them) What the French are creating is a multi-level attack on world cinema. Think the terrorism in Live Free or Die Hard but directed towards film. Timothy Olyphant (Villain of LFDH) was even the main actor in Xavier Gens (Frontières) Hitman. Another successful attempt to destroy Western cinema. The French horror boom is in no way successful by it's own part. Look at films like Frontière(s) and Them. After seeing trash like The Ruins and such escape out of their cages into theaters, we turn to ultra-violent over-the-top French carnage. I'll be the first to admit that upon the first viewing, you think to yourself "Wow, that was fucking awesome!" but I never let it got that far. The After Dark Horrorfest is all complete shit with the exception of a moderate title here and there. As soon as I was done with Frontière(s), I noticed how contrived the killer Nazi plot had been and the anti-big-business opening which is a fabled attempt to create a political tide was contrived and a feeble attempt to create a horror La Haine. The French have no respect for our own horror cinema and no respect for themselves. The only French people I admire are people like Jean Reno (Who sticks to his grassroots within the Action Genre) and Vincent Cassel (Who actually brought something new to horror with Sheitan.) The French will not stop until a systematic relapse of all originality is reset in Hollywood. It won't stop with Mirrors and Martyrs. It didn't stop with High Tension or The Hills Have Eyes. For every shitty American film they direct, they will plant a seed which leads to a new shocking French horror film that will be lauded by Rue Morgue and Shocktillyou drop until it cannot accept anymore praise. They've made it so that whenever a hot new French feminist-survival film is dropped, the gorehounds will scatter to find a copy only to be disappointed and continue to fall into the same trap over and over again. What a depressing cycle. Only when the population wises to this tactic is when the fans will revolt. Seeing as how people are actually looking forward to seeing Disaster Movie, It seems Judgment Day is at hand.

FRENCH TERRORISTS DESTROYING AMERICAN HORROR

-mAQ

GERMAN EXPRESSIONIST CINEMA AS UNINTENTIONAL NAZI PROPAGANDA

Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will (1934) and Olympia (1938) are most often considered the masterpieces of National Socialist (Nazi) Germany. Both of these films epitomized the idealized view of Nazism and its obsession with aesthetics. Anti-Semitism is nowhere to be found in Triumph of the Will or Olympia. Fritz Hippler's The Eternal Jew (1940), a film that did not hide Nazi Germany's anti-Semitism, was a failure in Germany. Germans seemed to be more concerned with a once again powerful Germany than their hatred of the Jews. Before the Nazi era in Germany, German expressionist cinema was already bringing up the idea of the "evil outsider" and the Jewish other (whether intentional or not). Paul Wegener and Henrik Galeen's Der Golem (1915) predicted a threat to European Jewry and what would later erupt in the holocaust. In this essay, I will examine two German expressionist masterpieces and their psychological effects on the German audience (whether being conscious or subconscious).

F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922) and Fritz Lang's M (1931) both focus on a subversive element hiding in the shadows of German cities. These films were able to strike fear in the German audience while at the same time promising the triumph of "good" over "evil." The Nazis considered German expressionism (and expressionist cinema), for the most part, the result of Jewish mental illness and deemed it "degenerate" art (Kracauer, 1947). Nazi minister of propaganda Dr. Joseph Goebbels had many German expressionism films banned (Eisner, 1976). Ironically, he was so impressed with Fritz Lang's dystopia masterpiece Metropolis (1927) that he offered Fritz Lang the job of being the head of Nazi Germany's propaganda film industry despite Lang being of Jewish ancestry (in which he mentioned to Goebbels). Lang fled Germany almost immediately after the offer from the Nazi propagandist (Eisner, 1976).

I chose Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror (1922) and M (1931) to examine for their more realistic expressionist sets in contrast to the ultra surrealist and nightmare like sets found in German expressionist films such as Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) and Murnau's Faust (1926). I found the dark realist aesthetic of both Nosferatu and M to be taken more literally by the German audience than expressionist films dealing with what seems like more of a nightmare. Murnau even utilized the real ruins of a Slovakian castle to more realistically portray the immortal decay of an outsider that desires new blood.

Although F.W. Murnau was not of Jewish ancestry, he was a closet homosexual (Anger, 1981). The Nazis deemed homosexuals also as degenerates resulting in many of their deaths in the holocaust. Murnau left Germany in 1926 to work for Fox studio before the rise of Nazism in Germany. Murnau (like Lang) is often cited as being one the most important innovators of cinema and the directors as author (auteur). His contribution to cinema is immeasurable.

GERMAN EXPRESSIONIST CINEMA AS UNINTENTIONAL NAZI PROPAGANDA

Nosferatu is based on the novel Bram Stoker's Dracula. Count Orlok (a pseudonym for Dracula) desires to acquire real estate in the fictional German city of Wisborg. He is a royal outsider from Transylvania, Romania (although filmed in Slovakia). Upon Count Orlok's arrival in Wisborg, a series of deaths occur in the city which are blamed on the plague. It is important to note that the plague (the black death) was accused of being an international conspiracy of Jewry to poison European Christendom. This anti-Semitic lie closely parallels the "behind the shadows" blood draining carried out by Count Orlok. F.W. Murnau's niche for evil that lurks behind shadows acts as a metaphorical representation of the myth of Jewish backstabbing during the first World War. The citizens of Wisborg are obsessed with finding the source of the creeping death that has plagued the city. Real estate employer Knock eventually becomes a scapegoat (just as the Jews were after the second world war) for the mysterious deaths of the peoples of Wisborg.

Rosa Luxemburg

Another fear of Germans after the first world war was the threat of international bolshevism. German-Jewish communists (called Spartacists) such as Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht were calling for a revolution in Germany which ultimately failed (Craig, 1982). The ultra right wing Nationalist Freikorps eventually had both Luxemburg and Liebknecht assassinated. This ended any potential German proletarian (or more accurately banker) revolution. Although Jewish communists made up a very small minority of German Jewry, Nazis used what they called "Judeo Bolshevism" to their propaganda advantage (Rosenberg, 1982). The majority of Jewish Bolsheviks were atheists that had already been far removed from the Jewish collective. Jewish Bolsheviks in the Soviet Union (another source of propaganda) were also known to be anti-Semitic despite the ethnically Jewish dominated government (Solzhenitsyn, 2007). Nazi theorists such as Alfred Rosenberg claimed that the Bolshevik revolution was organized in attempts to destroy Western civilization through subversive and violent means (Rosenberg, 1982). Nazis took full advantage of "Judeo Bolshevik" propaganda.

F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu uses the fear of the infiltrating outsider to scare the audience. Count Orlok could easily be looked at as the impending Bolshevik threat. The vampire is a foreign subversive element that is bent on destruction through unconventional means (blood sucking). Although I doubt that it was Murnau's intent to scare the audience with the threat of Bolshevism, the psychological fear that Nosferatu conjures up is the same. The audience expects an invasion that lurks behind shadows that uses strange and unpredictable methods to acquire its goal of destruction. Subconsciously, the viewer would have acquired the fear that Nazis also used in the propaganda against Jews.

Fritz Lang's M also captures the audience in a world where a dark element hiding behind the shadows of a German city. The film was originally titled Mur- derers Amongst Us and Nazis used that title to their full advantage. Fritz Lang, in the middle of negotiations of the film, seized the manager's lapel and found a Nazi badge on its reverse (Eisner, 1976). Nazis had used the original title in reference to German Jewry (and Fritz Lang and star Peter Lorre himself). The Nazi propaganda film The Eternal Jew also featured the end speech by Peter Lorre in M as proof of Jewish proneness to criminality. Quite absurd propaganda indeed, Fritz Lang's M was also labeled as Jewish "degenerate" art (among other Fritz Lang films).

The "heroes" of M are the underground organized crime elements that are found in the city that the killer stalks. These heroes could easily be looked at as the Nazi "heroes" that saved Germany from bolshevism (which would later ultimately prove to end in Germany's destruction). Peter Lorre epitomized what the Nazis thought of as the degenerate Jew. It makes me wonder why Fritz Lang would have directed such a film when only 2 years later (1933) the Nazis would take power in Germany. The Nazi threat by this time was quite obvious. I would argue that M has done more in the way of Nazi propaganda than any of the actual Nazi propaganda films (aside from the ones used as "entertainment"). Lang would later immigrate to the United States and direct the anti-Nazi propaganda film Hangmen Also Die (1943) which was loosely based on the assassination of Nazi chief Holocaust architect Reinhard Heydrich.

The child murderer in M also is stamped with an M (for murderer) in the film. German Jewry would also face a similar fate when forced to wear Star of David badges to signify their background. The mark of "M" and the "Star of David" are emblems of a target. They let the population know that these individuals are outsiders and an abstraction from collective society. German-Language Jewish fiction writer Franz Kafka brought up a similar feeling with his novel The Trial. The Jew has become an object of judgment for a crime that he has not committed. He is "guilty" because he is a Jew. The same feeling was experienced by German Jewry in their horrific fate throughout Nazi rule.

Whereas F.W. Murnau's count Orlok is a monster of horrible and obvious evil, Fritz Lang's child murderer is a pathetic and weak individual. The child murderer acts as a conspirator of subversive hedonistic pleasures. He admits that he cannot control his perverse urges (another reason why Nazis used M as propaganda). The German psyche would respond to such a character as someone to look out for in everyday life. After watching the film, the German citizen might take a second glance at the "ordinary" German. Everyone (especially the Jew) becomes a potential threat to the German way of life. The child murderer in M is more horrifying than any monster because he is the person we would least expect to commit such a crime.

Although I don't believe it was intentional, the German expressionist film movement fueled fear that would result in anti-Semitic eruptions. Eruptions that would ultimately lead to the Holocaust and stain Germany's reputation forever. The filmmakers of the German expressionist movement for the most part, were far removed from the Nazi ideology (many fleeing Germany in the process). After the second world war, the German expressionist aesthetic is even more powerful and relevant now, than it was during its existence. The dark political and psychological elements surrounding this time period I believe, are best captured in these important films.

GERMAN EXPRESSIONIST CINEMA AS UNINTENTIONAL NAZI PROPAGANDA

-Ty E

GUMMO AND THE DECLINE OF WESTERN CIVILIZATION

Harmony Korine's directorial debut Gummo is a contemporary masterpiece. It is an art film that reflects contemporary western civilization (or the destruction of) better than any other of its kind (it is one of a kind). Mainstream film critics (petty propagandists) have almost unanimously attacked Gummo calling it everything from "pretentious trash" to a "sick joke" on the directors part. I slightly agree with the latter assertion. Harmony Korine comes from a Jewish atheist background and like many Jewish atheists, he also comes from a communist background. Korine stated the following about his mother's Jewish background, "My mother's side was a bit more liberal, from Eastern Europe, like Communist Trotskyites." Trotskyite is in reference to to Marxist philosophies of Jewish Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky (born Lev Davidovich Bronstein). Trotsky was responsible (with his Bolshevik buddies) for the deaths of tens of millions of White Russians. Josef Stalin later had an ice axe driven into Trotsky's skull. Anti-Bolshevik Propaganda with Trotsky as a servant of death Jewish atheists often are communists because the political belief replaces the religion of Judaism. Communism calls for the destruction of all religions (calling religion "the opiate of the masses") and international revolution. These two characteristics greatly reflect an unofficial form of secular Judaism. Harmony Korine commented the following on being a Jew, "I'm half-Ashkenazi, half-Sephardic. I was barmitzvahed, I went to temple, but I always felt more of a kinship with the culture than I did with the texts." Jewish Soviet general and brother in law of Josef Stalin, Lazar Kaganovich (born Kogan) made the conscious decision to have up to between 7-10 million Ukrainians starved to death in the Holodomor (taking place 1932-1933). Although an atheist Jew and long deracinated from the Jewish collective, Kaganovich admitted that famine was an act of revenge against many years of Ukrainian Christian (Kulaks) antisemitism. The Kulaks represented the farming bourgeoisie and were deemed "unfit" for Soviet collectivization. This genocidal Holocaust has become virtually unknown in the west and represents an example of the many mass murders carried out by communists over the past century that have been hidden from the American population. The amount of deaths that can be attributed to Lazar Kaganovich's reign of terror (aside from Holodomor) is conservatively estimated at 14,500,000 dead. Don't expect to see Steven Spielberg directing films about those holocausts.

Karl Marx

When Karl Marx invented communism (born Moses Levy Mordecai, or Mordecai Levi, it is unclear what his real name was), he knew that he would be destroying Christianity and the power of the European monarchical nation states in the process. Karl Marx was descended from a long line of Rabbi Talmud scholars and Judaism (although often criticizing himself) played a crucial part in the philosophies of Marxism. The Talmud preaches of a tribal form of socialism with ownership of property to be controlled by elders of the community (which is actually practiced in Israel today in the form of Kibbutz communes). Now we have to take a look at the consequences of communist revolutions and their effects on Western Civilization. After the second World War, European nationalism became a taboo of sorts (because of the failure of Fascist and National Socialist governments). Most of the great nations of Europe were in ruins and all the countries were built up again to be socialized via the Marshall Plan. Now Europe is taking on a similar system to that of the Soviet Union with the anti nationalist European Union. Christianity has lost a good amount of its original stranglehold over Europe also. The same subversive occurrences have also taken place in the United States. America has experienced a flood of international immigration and monetary outsourcing. The United States is steadily entering a future (which we almost are) police state style neo-Bolshevism (called "globalization"). America will soon no longer be a country for "Americans." A North American Union is currently in the works.

GUMMO AND THE DECLINE OF WESTERN CIVILIZATION

Harmony Korine makes all these unfortunate circumstances obvious in Gummo (named after the least famous Marx brother). The Aryans in the film have taken up glue sniffing, Satan worshiping, cat killing, and other associated degenerate acts. Christianity has clearly all but disappeared (except for an unconsciously humble retarded woman) from the life of these miserable human beings. All situations found in Gummo reflect the disappearance of European Christianity and the values that it upholds. The defeat of Western civilization is confirmed in one pivotal scene in which a gay black Dwarf (wearing an Israel shirt) beats a drunken white trash Aryan in an arm wrestling match. It is clear here that Western European civilization has been weakened to such an extent that the most obscure of minorities (a gay black dwarf) has no problem beating a towering Aryan monster. Avraham Stern The Israel shirt worn by the black Dwarf symbolically represents this. Israel is a fundamentally Jewish secular society that really has no strong religious ties. The nation was founded on terrorism by those schooled in Bolshevism terrorist thought. Avraham Stern's (who was eventually assassinated by the British) NMO "Stern Gang" even offered to fight for the Nazis during World War II in hopes of getting more Jews evacuated to Palestine. Stern was also a promoter of the socialist kibbutz movement (as most underground Zionists at the time were).

Walter Winchell Another important scene in Gummo is when a perverted Jewish gossip columnist who claims to be the brother of Freddie Prinze scams a group of white trash girls in taking a ride with him. He attempts to put his hand up one of the bleach blonde haired girls skirt and is immediately denied his perverted desires. The girls escape the car of this sleaze bag gossip columnist and he shouts at them "nothing new for trash like you" in a triumphant display of arrogance. This Gossip columnist can easily be looked at as the protégé of Jewish gossip columnist Walter Winchell. Winchell played a significant role in getting America into both World War 1 and 2 with a hateful attack of slanderous propaganda against Germans (calling them Huns and such). The power of media had yet to infiltrate so many American households as it did during the early 1900s and there after. People didn't realize at the time the almost unlimited power of media and the influence on the psyche of the everyday individual. Most people don't expect to be lied too.

Walter Winchell made his original debut in the Jewish American ghettos performing vaudeville acts (something that can be still seen in the form of Hollywood movie comedies). This is interesting as Gummo is like one big deranged vaudeville comedy act. The charismatic character of Tumbler (from Yiddish tumler, from tumlen 'make a racket') in Gummo performs a vaudevillian stand-up comedy routine for a Jewish pimp (who is pimping out his Blonde haired wife with downs syndrome) played by Jewish philistine actor Max Perlich. In numerous parts of Gummo you can find photos of vaudevillian performers in black face placed randomly throughout the film. Jewish entertainers utilized blackface as a means of becoming more "white" in a time when the Anglo elite still dominated the United States. Harmony Korine knows his roots and is schizophrenically obsessed with them.

Legendary and important contemporary filmmakers such as Werner Herzog, John Waters, Bernardo Bertolucci, and Gus Van Sant have all championed Harmony Korine as one of the most important directors of his generation. Mainstream film critics know (in most cases I suspect) exactly where Korine is getting at with his films and they will do anything to slander, degrade, discredit, and not even acknowledge the young auteur. They fear directors like Harmony Korine who have exposed the truths that they hope to be so neatly tucked under an iron and sickle rug. May Korine continue his "revolution" of artistic integrity and cinematic truth for years to come. Hopefully he won't have an overdose anytime soon.

-Ty E

HEATH LEDGER IS THE JOKER
HEATH LEDGER IS THE JOKER

After actor Heath Ledger died, it was almost instantly confirmed that his performance as the Joker in The Dark Knight would be the stuff of legends. Like Brandon Lee before him, Ledger died before his comic book cinema performance would be seen by the masses. With that, it is usually hard to separate that unfortunate legacy left behind such a death and the quality of the performance itself. Everyone goes into The Dark Knight knowing that Heath Ledger died of an accidental drug cocktail overdose, so how can the actor's performance compare to that gossipy reality? I must say that Heath Ledger's performance in The Dark Knight is the best that I have seen come out of Hollywood this year. Hell, I don't think it would be a gross exaggeration to say that Ledger's performance as the Joker was the single greatest performance in cinema history for a character adapted from a comic book. In all honesty, I find most comic book and superhero based movies to be fairly banal. They are generally the rehashing of the same trite material that seems to spring up every decade or so. But for the role of the Joker, Heath Ledger made it his mission to design a character that expresses in his own words, "a psychopathic, mass murdering, schizophrenic clown with zero empathy."

Apparently, Mr. Ledger was inspired by both Malcom McDowell's performance as Alex Delarge in A Clockwork Orange and punk rock junkie legend Sid Vicious. But with Ledger's performance in The Dark Knight, I see neither of these influences really shine through. The Joker's maniacal fanaticism in The Dark Knight left me astonished with such a direct feeling of warped individual psychology that I can't compare it to any performance. Ledger's performance is one of those timeless expressive performances that stands alone, such as Conrad Veidt's role as the noble Compracicho in The Man Who Laughs(1928) and Max Schreck as the decaying Count Orlok in Nosferatu(1922). Despite Ledger's morbidly beautiful linguistic skills as the Joker, his most powerful acting talents are in his physical expressions. One of the most powerful scenes being when the Joker gets away from the police station he has just blown up and sticks his head out of a stolen cop car in a sort of proud maniac euphoria in complete silence. Unlike most mass murderers, the Joker is a man that loves to get his hands dirty. He wants to be the one to press the button on the bomb that blows up the hospital and assassinate the public official. The Joker would be a nihilist if he didn't believe in chaos for chaos sake. He simply wants to see the "world burn" and has no rules in obtaining that self-entertaining goal. He calls cops and mafia guys schemers as they are all following a personal path for power. The Joker's power is that of destroying power, making him the ultimate villain. The Joker is comparable to Bolshevik revolutionary and mass murderer Leon Trotsky (real name David Bronstein) in that regard. Trotsky had a goal of destroying all nation states in the world in which he promoted with his theory of "perma-ment revolution.” No matter how many arguments or theories Trotsky had to support his aspirations, ultimately he was just striving to destroy both man and civilization by brute force. Like the Joker, Leon Trotsky was an intelligent individual that could use his “gift” to cause morally inconceivable human destruction and irrational chaos. Most people forget that even the most depraved and deranged of individuals can make their aspirations seem rational. Heath Ledger’s performance as the Joker in The Dark Knight easily outweighed all the other talent featured in the film. This even includes the role of Christian Bale as Batman. Keep in mind, I thought that most of the performances by the leads were extraordinary. It is really hard to compete with the acting abilities of a man who can pull-off a mutilated clown in nurse drag that nonchalantly blows up a hospital for kicks. Sorry Jack Nicholson, but your performance as the Joker in Tim Burton’s Batman is for the most part, one dimensional in comparison to Mr. Ledger’s. The Dark Knight is a comic book adaptation that actually demands both respect and notoriety. It is not merely mindless and forgettable superhero entertainment, but a unique study in varying philosophical world views executed by actors not afraid to challenge the mainstream Hollywood limitations of acting. Heath Ledger, to me, is now The Joker. No other actor will ever be able to champion Mr. Ledger’s performance as the Joker as it is a work of individual expressive genius. How many other people could play both a gay stoic cowboy and The Joker with such natural precession? Unfortunately, it was probably the kind of genius that also caused his fancy of drug cocktails that would take away his life.

-Ty E

I'D RATHER HUMPH TRASH INSTEAD OF WATCHING ANOTHER MOVIE ABOUT THE HOLOCAUST
I'D RATHER HUMPH TRASH INSTEAD OF WATCHING ANOTHER MOVIE ABOUT THE HOLOCAUST

I cannot lie, I am losing faith in cinema. Sometimes I feel like I have lost complete faith in cinema. Will there ever be another director that compares in artistic integrity and real artistic progress (a career that noticeably developed with each groundbreaking film) as F.W. Murnau? Everyone that is truly serious about cinema knows that Europe is responsible for the bulk of the masterpieces of cinema history. How could a "great" Hollywood artisan like John Ford ever compare to the brilliance and auteur artistry of Carl Th. Dreyer? Is Steven Spielberg an auteur because he has "Spielberg-esque" traits in his films like often having socially retarded children play lead characters? Is Spielberg an middle aged socially retarded child? Who wants to pay $10.50 a movie ticket to see a made up socially retarded child? Would Spielberg?

Nowadays, 12 year old kids are making two minute and thirty second long short films that are more entertaining than your typical Michael Bay or Spielberg film. Youtube is flooded with those type of videos. Hollywood refuses to display real humanity. Instead, they offer us propaganda that is coated with sentimentalism so the lies don't taste bad while being digested. Those 12 year old filmmakers that are fucking around with their family camcorder have more to offer humanity than Steven Spielberg. The 12 year old creates for the enjoyment of those he cares about (and of course himself). Spielberg makes films to help his politically aligned kinfolk rob Swiss banks and to show the "moral superiority" of those same swindlers. For some reason, Spielberg also enjoyed portraying black males as the ultimate misogynists while promoting the "strengths" of sista-sista style lesbianism. Why else would Whoopi Goldberg and Oprah star in The Color Purple? The question is, does humanity really benefit from the big budget degeneracy that is the Hollywood studio system? Most Hollywood films are criminal products whose makers deserve a special type of punishment.

A couple contemporary filmmakers give me "hope" for the future of film. I have no hope that there will ever be aesthetically pleasing films like Triumph of the Will every again, that are full of beauty that cannot be impersonated or contrived by classless Hollywood. I believe that it was that dirty and precise Kraut F.W. Murnau that directed probably the most beautiful film to ever come out of Hollywood. The film won the super unique (only offered at the first ever Academy Awards) Academy Award for Unique and Artistic Production. That was a very longtime ago when the United States did not resemble a third world sewer and people actually had some (granted many times banal) values. So the question is, can cinematic art (and art in general) exist in a cultureless world that has complete and utter contempt for natural beauty?!? Of course, Harmony Korine and Giuseppe Andrews are the two new leaders of a new type of degenerate realist art that speaks to the soul of the "forgotten" part of America.

No doubt, Harmony Korine's directorial debut Gummo is a masterpiece that the world needed. What better way to get rid of the icky feeling of a film like Schindler's List than to watch Gummo right after. Just like Gummo Marx, Harmony Korine is the odd Jew out in the world of filmmaking. Korine follows in the tradition of such honest "chosen" gentlemen as Otto Weininger and Carlo Michelstaedter (minus suicide, thankfully Korine came off heroin completely unscathed). When Gummo first came out, the cultural Marxist film "critics" acted as if Korine was worthy of a one man pogrom. Was it the fact Korine showed what the many American whites really live like (in poverty)? Was it the fact that a gay black dwarf insulted Israel by wearing an Israeli flag t-shirt? Or more importantly, did the critics hate Gummo because Harmony Korine was able to bring vaudeville to the slums of Tennessee?

After watching Harmony Korine's recent effort Mr. Lonely I felt that maybe the young auteur had grown soft. That was until I saw the trailer for upcoming picture Trash Humpers. It seems Korine is reverting back to his earlier and stronger filmmaking days when his drug addiction hadn't fully caught up with him. I bet Bavarian Werner Herzog is very proud of his young Yiddish buddy Korine's upcoming effort, a film influenced in some way by Herzog of course. Herzog is a brilliant filmmaker that turned Cinéma vérité into a sideshow. Of course, Korine turned that sideshow into modern day vaudeville. After all, Harmony doesn't pay tribute to Al Jolson and blackface for nothing!

Western civilization is a rotting corpse covered in international maggots (the chosen maggots have entered the corpse deepest of course) of all slimy stripes. What was once beautiful and strong, has now become just another thing for those that cannot create to exploit. Do Giuseppe Andrews and Harmony Korine exploit those unfortunate subjects that they make films about? No, I honestly believe they do not. I believe that both video camera auteurs have a certain amount of empathy for their truly interesting and one of a kind stars. I would compare Korine's and Andrews' portrayal of his stars to that of Tod Browning in his masterpiece Freaks. On top of that, Korine and Andrews don't have to coat their films in sentimentalism. Korine wasn't selling a lie when he showed that young cowboys hate queer rabbits. Andrews wasn't selling a lie when he showed that Bill Nowlin had no problem showing off his chode while drinking a beer in his trailer shower. In the age of Kali Yuga, what kind of art can one really expect?

-Ty E

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

For about a decade or so, I have tried to steer completely clear of Hollywood movies in general, especially nasty anti-white agitprop of the brain-dead neo-nutzi sort where skinheads and other ostensibly pro-white tattooed losers demonstrate that they are even less articulate and cultured than the ghetto negro crackhead and dope dealers that they so ruthlessly and venomously hate yet somehow I forced myself to watch the innately insipid and inane idiotic Imperium (2016) directed by young Hebraic hack Daniel Ragussis who demonstrated a prior interest in Judaic studies with his short Haber (2008) starring Teutonic mischling Christian Berkel in the titular role as German-Jewish chemical warfare pioneer Fritz Haber. In fact, my main reason for enduring such fiercely phony ADL-approved celluloid shit is due to it being seemingly named after Francis Parker Yockey's wonderfully arcane neo-Spenglerian tome Imperium: The Philosophy of History and Politics (1948), which is hardly the sort of book that is read by the tattooed neo-nazi degenerates, neo-confederates, and the various other sorts of terminally retarded and completely culturally deracinated would-be-stormtroopers that make up the so-called 'white supremacism' movement. In fact, while a copy of Yockey's classic text Imperium can be briefly seen quite preposterously alongside Essays of a Klansman (1983) by Louis Beam (whose maritime KKK actions against Vietnamese immigrant fishermen seems to have partly inspired Louie Malle's shockingly horrendous late-era agitprop piece Alamo Bay (1985)), it has nothing to do with the film and simply seems to be the expression of the filmmaker's fear of an almost mystical book that, quite unlike the cartoonish white nationalism of George Lincoln Rockwell, represents the zenith of post-Third Reich pro-Europid revolutionary thought as a 600-page metapolitical philosophical text as written by an American lawyer turned virtual one-man-revolution that, among other things, abandoned his post as a post-trial review attorney for the Nuremberg Trials while fighting against the Allied Occupation of Germany and later even wrote anti-Zionist propaganda for the Egyptian Information Ministry after an inspiring meeting with Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser. In short, Yockey, who had a genius IQ of 170 according to his extensive FBI records, is the sort of fearless Faustian Renaissance man that hysterical Hebraic types wish did not exist and the film is ultimately a piss poor pathetic attempt to ostensibly confront that 'neo-nazis' are not only people, but also that some happen to be intelligent and even extremely cultivated and far from the deranged dipsomaniac bonehead stereotype that absurdly finds a sense of racial identity by chanting Skrewdriver lyrics while chugging cheap canned beer with his similarly boorish bros. Not surprisingly, the film fails in virtually every single regard while quite ironically and unintentionally making the neo-nazis, or at least the more cultivated ones, seem like the good guys, which is funny for a film that uses the played-out and oftentimes misattributed quote, “For evil to triumph, it only takes good men to do nothing” as a tagline. In fact, the only thing that could make the movie more carelessly cliché and intellectually bankrupt is if it featured some George Santayana quote about history or whatever.

Released around the time of 2016 United States presidential election when Donald Trump was still promoting borderline white nationalist ideals and the so-called alt-right and related groups horrified Hollywood and the mainstream media by revealing that pro-white subcultures are now actually cool and somewhat evolved since the largely lumpenprole days of less than elegant ex-con skinheads and bearded pseudo-Odinist LARPerS, Imperium is less a serious movie than a considerably clueless PSA that was meant with the disingenuous intent to strike fear in Judaic and leftist elites about the very real possibility of a new white American consciousness that completely rejects the completely counterfeit multiculti globalist con and corrupt kritarchy that America has become as a result of the undeniably steady decline of its elite Anglo-Saxon founders. A frivolous failure in virtually every single objective it seeks out to accomplish, the film ultimately also somewhat paradoxically attempts to comfort the sort of compulsively complacent idiots that believe in Hollywood negro scientists, reflexively reference the pseudo-scientific turds of Jared Diamond, and read The New Yorker like it were scripture, which is ironic when one considers the sheer cluelessness of this feckless filmic fart as a movie that confirms that the enemies of white nationalism simply do not understand as to why there is an organic reawakening of the blond beast despite being a largely racially European yet culturally mongrelized country where Nietzsche has never (and will never) be a household name. Of course, one should not expect anything less from a movie meant to appeal to the sort of bourgeois lemming losers that unwittingly adopted degenerate leftist politics as a result reading Harry Potter as children.

Despite being a preposterously flaccid and superficially melodramatic pseudo-thriller sans action and suspense that has literally nothing going on for it, Imperium curiously seems to have been heavily promoted among the mainstream liberal intellectual elite as demonstrated by the extra features of the blu ray release of the film, which includes two different 30-minute The New York Times’ TimesTalks with Daniel Ragussis and Daniel Radcliffe where the non-auteur and his similarly intellectually languid lead actor try in vain to explain the idiosyncrasies of what is oftentimes described as the white nationalist movement as if they are trying to explain the behavior of exotic animals in a zoo. Undoubtedly, what becomes clear in these superficial interviews is that, aside from having an intrinsic racial disdain for these movements, Ragussis and Radcliffe have real no innate understanding of the contra-kosher subculture that they supposedly spent many months, if not years, apparently researching. For example, there is not a single reference to Yockey and his tome Imperium despite the latter strangely acting the inspiration for the name of the marvelously mediocre movie. Of course, the reality is that Imperium inspired many strange things both inside and outside the largely bankrupt WN movement. For example, before providing hipster cred to dead-eyed porn star Sasha Grey—a proud ostensible bad girl with a boy bod that is big on anal—David Tibet created an entire album entitled Imperium (1987) for his longtime neofolk project Current 93 in tribute to Yockey's book and it features lyrics like: "The jews they crucified the Christ...And the jews they crucified the Christ...And nailed him to a tree...Imperium...Imperium...Imperium." Additionally, before he ruined his life by getting involved with the so-called Manson Family, psychedelic musician Bobby Beausoleil—a tragic 'acid fascist' that created one of the greatest film soundtrack in cinema history for Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972) from the comfort of prison—found influence in Yockey and his book.

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

As for actual neo-nazis, Imperium has influenced figures ranging from National Renaissance Party leader James H. Madole to lone wolf advocate James Mason of Siege infamy yet his influence on these neo-nazi misfits seems to be more symbolic/superficial than truly (meta)political. Hardly an advocate of the stereotypical (neo)nazi view of race, Yockey—a dark-haired dude of mostly German and Irish stock that grew up in a cultivated Anglophile family—aggressively rejected 'racial materialism' in favor of a more 'spiritual' idea of race and thus has inspired some more seriously racially dubious stormtroopers over the years, including kosher Nazi Dan Burros, whose tragic life inspired Henry Bean's The Believer (2001) starring Ryan Gosling, as well as tragic mulatto neo-nazi and would-be-terrorist Leo Felton. Of course, nothing in the moronic movie Imperium gives any idea as to the strange, singular, and oftentimes arcane influence of Yockey, which is, in a way, strangely fitting as the film dares to sympathize with the morally bankrupt plight of an unashamedly underhanded undercover FBI agent and the neo-Spenglerian philosopher was himself the victim of FBI oppression, which ultimately led to his mysterious death.

The sad reality is that most films about neo-nazis/skinheads seem to be, at best, poor philistine attempts at reexamining the more sensational elements of Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971)—a film largely inspired by its celebrated NYC Jewish director's own conflicted view of Faustian man—in a painfully literal and one-dimensional fashion as is especially exemplified by the decidedly dumb yet somewhat entertaining Australian flick Romper Stomper (1992). Of course, whacked-out Hebrew Tony Kaye's overrated Edward Norton vehicle American History X (1998) is the most popular and beloved of these films and it fails miserably in its objective by somehow unintentionally romanticizing the white prole power subculture. Undoubtedly, Greek-French commie Costa-Gavras did a more respectable job with Betrayed (1988)—a film inspired by the real-life outfit The Order (aka Brüder Schweigen) and its founder/leader Robert Jay Mathews (who, notably, was burned alive by FBI agents during a disastrous standoff in December 8, 1984)—where the FBI is arguably portrayed as more criminal and terroristic than a neo-nazi terrorist group. Despite the film's director and actors constantly attempting to claim one of their main objectives with the film was to try to humanize its rather stereotypical collection of neo-nazis characters, Imperium is no more successful in this regard to similar flicks to the point where Jeremy Saulnier's Green Room (2015)—a neo-Carpenterian genre-crusher with vague arthouse qualities—takes a more nuanced approach to depicting skinheads despite being a horror-thriller where heroin-dealing neo-nazis utilize dogs to kill some dumb punk kids.

Although based on the professional experiences of a real-life ex-FBI agent by the name Michael German as detailed in his book Thinking Like a Terrorist: Insights of a Former FBI Undercover Agent (2008), Imperium never manages to seem like it is anything more than the careless and confused result of some SPLC researcher glancing over a couple Wikipedia articles on the most bland sort of white nationalist groups and then assembling what feels like a third rate detective story sans any serious detective work. Indeed, the only thing one really learns by watching the film is that FBI agents live pathetic lives that involve treachery and emotional exploitative and that they are much closer to the losers of Martin Ritt's classic John le Carré adaptation The Spy Who Came In from the Cold (1965) than some glamorous alpha-male James Bond type as only the morally defective and uniquely unprincipled could pretend to be something they are not while exploiting the trust of people that already find so little to trust in the world. In that sense, it is a sick irony that such a film would be named after the magnum opus of Yockey who had so little trust for the government of his nation that he went renegade by defending the conquered people that said nation destroyed during the so-called Nuremberg Trials, thereupon completely throwing away a very potentially prestigious and lucrative law career in the process.

If it was not obvious from his appearance and overall essence, Daniel Radcliffe is notably a chosenite so it naturally seemed like an absurd prospect when I initially discovered that he of all people would be pretending to be an undercover FBI agent LARPing as a neo-nazi. While I have personally known some rather racially dubious individuals associated with certain 'pro-white' and counter-kosher subcultures, including half-Jews and hapas, as it is a scene that—rather unfortunately but unsurprisingly—tends to attract a lot of unhinged and/or terribly troubled individuals, Radcliffe is just too painfully banal and mirthlessly milk-toast in his Judaic essence to ever be even remotely believable as an American neo-nutzi, hence one of the many reasons that Imperium is a fundamentally flawed celluloid shitshow that, at best, would only appeal to the already (kosher) converted. Admittedly, the idea of Harry Potter hanging out with tatted Hitlerites did seem like it could be potentially humorous in an unintentionally absurdist fashion, but the film even manages to fail in that regard as insufferably runty Radcliffe simply lacks the command and charisma of someone like Otto

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

Preminger in terms of a Jew preposterously portraying a nazi. Hell, even with his relatively small secondary role as a paranoid neo-Nazi in Costa-Gavras' Betrayed, self-described "hillbilly Jew" Ted Levine makes a seemingly infinitely more convincing and captivating neo-brownshirt. I, for one, certainly have no problem with members of the tribe playing various types of National Socialists and anti-Semites so long as they bring the sort of fierce flare typical of Erich von Stroheim when he was depicting pernicious Prussian officers and Nietzschean monsters, but little boy Radcliffe has about as much life and potency as a meth-addled tranny's chemically-castrated cock, but I digress.

Undoubtedly, Radcliffe's glaring lack of believability as a soulless FBI stooge posing as a neo-brownshit is only transcended by the sheer and utter unlikability of the 'good guys,' especially the shady bitch boy protagonist's feministic FBI handler Angela Zamparo (Toni Collette). Indeed, when FBI agent Zamparo—an obnoxiously proud 'naughty women' that is certainly a painful reminder of Yockey's words from Imperium, "Feminism liberated women from the natural dignity of their sex and turned them into inferior men"—notices that pussy protagonist Nate Foster (Daniel Radcliffe), who is, quite unsurprisingly, the annoyingly introverted and effete product of a single mother, seems particularly sympathetic towards a decidedly dark-skinned Jihadiŝt that is more or less entrapped by some scheming FBI goons, she absurdly assumes he is autistic enough to go completely underground and learn to sympathize with neo-nazi types despite his strange affection for said dark-skinned Jihadiŝt. Needless to say, nancy boy Nate is not initially up for the job as he lacks both the testicular fortitude and sense of conviction it takes to pretend to be a hardcore Mein Kampf fan-boy, but the insufferably pushy Zamparo, who clearly suffers from a perennial case of Penisneid, eventually gets her way in what ultimately proves to be one of the most less than uniquely underwhelming and stale spy scenarios in cinema history to the point where the film seems like a personal affront to Alfred Hitchcock as a master of suspense. In short, Imperium lacks virtually everything that makes Hitchcock's anti-nazi spy flick Notorious (1946) great and I say that as someone that has never had a hard-on for Hitch.

Starting nearly at the bottom of the white nationalist scene, Nate—a worm of a lad that is hardly the posterboy for white power prowess—first hooks up with a small-time neo-nazi leader named Vince Sargent (Pawel Szajda) while proclaiming to be a disgruntled Iraq War veteran that, due to his experience as a "WMD squad" bro, can offer special security to the less than motley skinhead crew. Although painfully idiotic in a cartoonish sort of fashion, Vince's security guy Roy (Seth Numrich)—the sort of rabidly retarded, insanely irrational, and ultraviolent one-dimensional type that you tend to expect from a Hollywood neo-nazi flick—immediately rightly suspects that there is something fishy about Nate, but luckily the protagonist soon moves up the ranks of the white nationalist movement which, of course, has rather low standards and thus he only has limited interactions with the exceedingly erratic troglodyte Hitlerite. In the hope of entrapping them in a terrorist plot, Nate simultaneously attempts to court both an odiously opportunistic white nationalist shock jock named Dallas Wolf (Tracy Letts)—a sort of Hal Turner type (who, of course, was a real-life FBI informant)—and a rather rotund white nationalist leader named Andrew Blackwell (Chris Sullivan) who is the national director of a group called ‘Aryan Alliance’ that espouses a sort of archaic Christian Identity Weltanschauung (of course, this group is modeled after the long-irrelevant neo-nazi organization Aryan Nations founded by shady porn star fan Richard Butler). Needless to say, like in the real-life white nationalist scene, infighting and wild posturing is common but terrorist behavior is a rarity, so Nate wastes a good deal of time before he can find some poor unwitting idealist to bust with his bullshit FBI scheme. Rather preposterously, in the fiercely flaccid kosher-certified Hollywood fantasy that is Imperium, it is ultimately the most successful, cultivated, and respectable neo-nazi types that are involved in a terrorist plot.

In a film that trades in the probable for the pathetically propagandistic, it should be no surprise that the least likely sort of white nationalist type—a loving and well-educated family man of the highly intellectual, soft-spoken, and loving sort—is the one that ultimately gets busted in a monstrous terrorist plot. Indeed, gentleman Aryan Gerry Conway (Sam Trammell of True Blood)—an almost perturbingly pleasant pretty boy—is so wholesome that he detests when his skinhead comrades cuss and smoke around children and he is even cultured enough to confess that Leonard Bernstein is his favorite conductor when it comes to the musical compositions of Tchaikovsky (whereas the skinhead characters absurdly refuse to wear Levi’s jeans simply due to their Judaic origins), yet he is totally enamored with the prospect of getting involved in a suicidal terrorist plot that involves utilizing caesium for a dirty bomb, as if such a senselessly destructive scenario will somehow bring about some sort of Aryan utopia and guarantee his place in Valhalla (notably, the film strangely uses Gerry’s suicidal terrorist plot comments to allude to belated National Alliance founder William Luther Pierce via his favorite ancient Norse proverb and, in turn, the title of his bio The Fame of a Dead Man’s Deeds (2001) by Robert S. Griffin). While the Pierce-inspired Norse proverb is too good to be in the film, the following words do pay apt tribute to Yockey: “Cattle die and kinsmen die, and so must one die oneself. But I know one thing that never dies: the fame of a dead man’s deeds.”

Needless to say, FBI stooge Nate is shocked that a mensch as calmly charismatic and cultured as Gerry could be a true blue Nazi but, as the family man explains, a youthful reading of a book called Which Way European Man (which is a clear reference to William Gayley Simpson’s classic WN tome Which Way Western Man? (1978)) and experiences living among black Africans in Kenya imbued him with a strong racial consciousness, especially in terms of his firm belief in terms of the cultural and, in turn, racial superiority of Occidental man.

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

While there have been a couple American neo-nazi terrorist types like David Lane that were certainly not dumb, there has certainly never been one like white bread suburban racial warrior Gerry Conway and one can only come to the conclusion that the character has been contrived to strike fear in stupid normie lemming types that their relatively successful Nietzsche-reading neighbor might be a potential terrorist that wants to violently exterminate mamzers and other untermenschen from the world. In fact, Imperium concludes with Nate's FBI buddies busting Gerry and other neo-nazi professional types in what can only be seen as a fantasy scenario for Hebraic Hollywood types that would love nothing more than for successful racially-conscious whites to die in prison and their kids be spiritually and psychologically (and probably physically) defiled the sickos of Sunset Boulevard. Indeed, the title of the film only makes sense when one considers how the FBI destroyed Francis Parker Yockey, who was unequivocally the most intelligent and cultivated person ever associated with American white nationalism and a rare example of an American WN that was, as Savtri Devi would describe, a 'Man Above Time' who exhibited creative life-affirming qualities and sought to transcend the process of Occidental decay. Of course, Yockey was a somewhat mystifying rebel with certain libertine qualities and hardly a family man type like Gerry. While Imperium revels in lies and half-truths, probably the most hyper hypocritical and all-around nonsensical message of the film is the claim that the "one essential ingredient to fascism" is "victimhood," as if that is not really basis for virtually all forms of leftist politics and, in turn, identity politics. Indeed, considering we now live in a country with a slave-morality and victim culture where one's supposed moral superiority is based on what victim group they belong to, it is pretty hilarious that the film would accuse fascists of playing victim when many modern-day fascists were largely inspired to become fascists due to their disgust with victim politics and phony concepts like "equality," which ultimately drags society down to the lowest common denominator at the expense of superiority. While there are undoubtedly various WN types with victim mentalities, it is simply a form of racial projection (especially in Hollywood's case) to accuse racially conscious whites of suffering from a victim mentality simply because they have identified a hostile group that is working against their interests. Indeed, one does not need to be a neo-nazi to clearly see that there is currently a war against America's largely silent white majority.

Undoubtedly, the petty propagandistic nature of Imperium becomes quite clear when one considers that the film's ex-FBI agent co-writer Michael German and co-writer/director Daniel Ragussis were interviewed by the anti-white goons of the moronically misnamed Southern Poverty Law Center. Somewhat shockingly, German goes against the grain of the SPLC agenda in the interview and argues against the de-platforming of WNs and other right-wingers, stating, "The vast majority of neo-Nazis strongly believe what they believe and don't want to share that side of themselves with the rest of society. They're completely peaceful and have their website, where they can go invent their ethnoState and [organize their] conference once a year. I'm completely fine with that and more power to them; I will defend their right to do that. This idea that we have now of twitter-takedowns and social media-takedowns I think is very dangerous. From my experience within the violent fringe of this movement, that's exactly what they want. As soon as people feel like they can't express themselves and can't engage with others about their ideas, that's when the person on the fringe who says, 'No, you have to use violence to change things,' becomes more convincing." Of course, this interview was conducted in February 2017 a number of months before the disastrous Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville, Virginia, which led to the hysterical unprecedented mass-banning of WNs from social media sites, banning of alt-right sites like The Daily Stormer by several domain registrars, and complete deplatforming of pro-white politics from pretty much everywhere on the internet aside from the fringes. In short, the Tech companies, mainstream media, Hollywood, and United States government have colluded to create a sort of post-bolshevik softcore authoritarianism that will ironically guarantee the rise of WN terrorists who, feeling they have nothing to lose, will lash out, but maybe that is the point. After all, it does not exactly help the white identitarian movement for unhinged nut-jobs to go on rampages, so it is rather curious that Imperium somehow depicts the nicest and most morally pristine of white nationalist types as a potential mass-murdering terrorist.

Notably, as recounted in the book Manson: The Unholy Trail of Charlie and the Family (2000) co-written by John Gilmore and Ron Kenner, Bobby Beausoleil, who once appeared as 'Lucifer' alongside experimental auteur Kenneth Anger as he waves a swastika flag in the film Invocation of My Demon Brother (1969), declared a somewhat conflicted affection for Yockey and Imperium. Indeed, Beausoleil, who was originally given the death sentence for killing his leftist hippie dope dealer friend Gary Hinman, once stated, "I had this image in my mind of a sword—like it's pictured on the cover of a book called IMPERIUM, by a guy the FBI was hounding and busted into infinity . . . a hated and feared man by the name of Francis Yockey. He wrote that book under the name of Ulick Varange, a pen name. It was a big book and I read it a lot—studied it and tried to make as much of it as I could—but my course was different. There was something about it—some passive idea that kept me put off by it. I finally would come to believe that I was a man of action, I had to go through things no matter what they were or how dangerous they may have seemed to someone on the outside." While Beausoleil would go on to create one of the greatest original film scores of all-time for Anger's Lucifer Rising—a film he was originally also supposed to play the titular the role of—he more or less completely wasted his life by getting involved with the misfit Manson Family and would have probably led a more artistically fruitful life had he stuck with Imperium, which inspired the late-1960s proto-neofolk group Changes led by cousins Robert N. Taylor and Nicholas Tesluk. Indeed, contrary to the confused covert message that the film attempts (and fails) to make about the tome—a virtual real-life Necronomicon for white nationalists (notably, like Yockey, H.P. Lovecraft was heavily influenced by Spengler)—Imperium is a metapolitical text of great artistry that has proven to greatly inspire an artist's complete Weltanschauung. As for the movie Imperium, it can only inspire disdain for Hollywood and the FBI, which is completely fitting since both are largely Hebraic harbingers of anti-aesthetic authoritarianism and asininity.

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

While Yockey originally wrote Imperium in 1948 long before the internet was created, his following words are still fairly accurate, "The techniques of American propaganda is inclusive of every form of communication. The leading instrument is the cinema [...] During the period of war-preparation, 1933-1939, the cinemas produced an endless succession of hate pictures directed against the European Revolution of 1933, and its 20th century outlook and actualizations." Needless to say, even Imperium—a film that repeats the lie that Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh was some sort of white supremacist terrorist simply because he sold copies of The Turner Diaries (1978)—proves that Yockey was clearly right and that little has changed in terms of agitprop when he wrote in regard to WWII era propaganda, "The propaganda was entirely free from any cultural basis, and was completely cynical with regard to the facts. Precisely as the cinema-factories of Hollywood ground out lying plays and 'newsreels,' the propagandists of the press created what 'facts' they need." When an autistic part-Jewish nerd diagnosed with schizophrenia by the name of James Fields panicked and crashed his car into some far-left protesters at the 2017 Unite the Right rally in a scenario that is, in some ways, eerily similar to a scene in Imperium and it resulted in the death of a protester, the mainstream media immediately used the opportunity to unleash a nonstop war on white nationalists and the FBI director at that time even absurdly called it an act of domestic terrorism, thereupon leading to countless frivolous arrests and lawsuits against WN leaders that never even heard of troubled mischling Fields. Of course, a movie like Imperium gives one the impression that such a stupid tragic scenario would inevitably happen, as if the movie was specifically made with the intent of psychologically conditioning Americans for a major clampdown on pro-white voices. Either way, as Yockey's lead demonstrated, both rallies and protesting are completely worthless and can only lead to negative press, among other things.

One reason that Imperium is a strangely fitting, if not incredibly insulting, name for the film is that there exists more than a thousand pages of once-classified FBI documents on Yockey and his revolutionary internationalist exploits as a renegade neo-Spenglerian on the run. In fact, in many ways, Yockey would have made for a great FBI undercover spy as he engaged in purported fascist espionage with a sense of humor. An individual described by the FBI as a loner and "secretive individual who did not tolerate anyone who would not wholeheartedly agree with his solution to world problems,” Yockey never used his real name when phoning associates and even signed his letters with the pseudonym “Torquemada” in tribute to the Spanish Grand Inquisitor of Jewish descent from the Middle Ages who persecuted Jews. Somewhat perversely, Yockey even was a sort of warped James Bond when it came to the ladies and even apparently bashed the gashes of wealthy Hebraic Heiresses for cash or as Martin A. Lee explained in the book The Beast Reawakens (1997), “A relentless womanizer, Yockey had plenty of bed partners when he came to New York, including Hazel Guggenheim (sister of Peggy, the famous art collector and philanthropist). An oft-married Jewish woman of rather large proportions, Hazel dyed her hair blond, wore heavy purple eyeliner, and smoked cigarettes in a long cigarette holder. Apparently she liked young men and found the idea of sleeping with a fascist particularly appealing. ‘I am sure he received some financial remuneration for any services rendered to her,’ alleged [Harold Keith] Thompson.” Of course, all this talk of Yockey points to the fact that there should exist a very different film entitled Imperium as Yockey’s real-life is infinitely more interesting than the dubiously shadowy tactics of any shady FBI spook. Indeed, in a sane world, Yockey would hold the reputation that some shadowy commie revolutionary like Che Guevara—a sociopathic rich kid of the hardly racially sensitive sort that has countless crappy films directed by whorish hacks ranging from Richard Fleischer (Che! (1969)) to Steven Soderbergh (Che (2008)) made about him—maintains today among rebellious teenagers as his face would certainly look much better on a t-shirt (though, of course, Yockey is too good for such tacky corporate branding), but we unfortunately live in a morally and spiritually inverted world where many young kids have their aesthetic and moral tastes destroyed by hokey Harry Potter films where the villain Lord Voldemort is of course a fiendish blood-obsessed fascist Führer of sorts. After all, in a sensible world, Daniel Radcliffe would portray resentment-ridden evil nerds instead of mercurial heroes but, as Yockey would have noted, such is one of the many consequences of the rise of the culture-distorter as a result of Europe being completely destroyed in two World Wars.

In an unpublished 1940 manuscript entitled ‘Life as an Art’ that he wrote at 23-years-old while still a student at Notre Dame University, Yockey made it quite clear the difference between himself and a FBI stooge like the hero of Imperium when he wrote, “Higher men and lower men—the few called to rule and the masses born in order that the higher men may actualize a grander destiny—differ in spirituality so much that they cannot be comprehended otherwise than as two different species. In all reverence it can be said the lower men rely on God and the higher men on themselves. This basic natural hierarchy is the fundament upon which rests all practical philosophy of human nature. It must therefore be definitively set forth.” After all, whereas Yockey lived and died for his quite singular metapolitical vision, Daniel Radcliffe’s character is such a superlatively soulless little worm that he is even willing to get a Nazi tattoo that represents something he completely hates just so that he can play the good little whore of a government agency that is rarely associated with any sort of good. While Yockey was right when he recognized that Hollywood trash movies spread the message of “the total significance of the isolated individual, stateless and rootless, outside of society and family, whose life is simply, the pursuit of money and erotic pleasure,” the one exception to this spiritually moribund message of passive hedonistic nihilism is moronic agitprop movies like Imperium and American History X where the white American is taught they should always actively fight against the interests of their own race as well as against those white individuals that dare to fight for their race, as if it is totally sane and normal for any other living organism to fight against its own survival.

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

As a literal genius and highly cultivated artist of the somewhat wanton and womanizing sort that spent a good portion of his life traveling the world in the hope of helping to create a Europid Imperium, Yockey breaks virtually all the tired stereotypes associated with (neo)fascist types and that is why it was so important for Hollywood types to disgracefully name a film after the book he is best known for. Considering he was once punched in the nose by (in)famous British Union of Fascists leader Sir Oswald Ernald Mosley, had a propensity for imitating misanthropic film comedian W.C. Fields, enjoyed holding fascist meetings at expensive Jewish luncheonettes, and remains the most exceedingly enigmatic neo-fascist figure in history despite having two lengthy biographies dedicated to him, Yockey is a name that demands an epic biopic but, rather unfortunately, that is probably even less likely to happen than his dream of an Imperium, though somehow I can see Johnny Depp of all people playing the role. After all, both Jodie Foster and Steven Soderbergh have attempted to create a Leni Riefenstahl biopic. In terms of living filmmakers, only Teutonic auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg is intelligent, politically astute, and creative enough to assemble a truly visionary depiction of Yockey’s somewhat tragic and stranger-than-fiction life and considering that the American political revolutionary—a man that tried to help German philosopher Carl Schmitt escape political persecution during the Nuremberg Trials and later even earned the respect of German ace fighter-pilot Hans-Ulrich Rudel—was such a hardcore Teutonophile, it would only be fitting.

The patent absurdity of a film about modern-day neo-nazis being entitled Imperium becomes quite clear when one considers that American Nazi Party Führer George Lincoln Rockwell—arguably the single most influential figure on the largely pathetic joke that is post-WWII American neo-nazi scene who was curiously the son of a vaudeville performer that was pals with celebrated Jewish comedians like Groucho Marx—was vocal in his hatred for Yockey who he described as a “Strasserite” in anti-tribute to Uncle Adolf’s ‘left-wing nazi’ rivals Gregor and Otto Strasser. Even four years after Yockey’s death, Rockwell, who was himself assassinated a couple years later under dubious circumstances supposedly by a disgruntled Greek-American (ex)stormtrooper, would complain, “There is rising all over the world, among hard-core National Socialists, a new cult of what I call Yockeyism. I found much of interest in Yockey’s book IMPERIUM and actually helped promote it. But the cult founded on this man is dangerous and, I believe, in some ways downright evil.” Of course, both brain-dead neo-nutzis and kosher commies alike probably have nothing to fear as it has been over 70 years since the publication of Yockey’s magnum opus Imperium and it is quite unlikely that it will ever become a sort of new Mein Kampf as it is just too arcane and aesthetically pleasing to ever appeal to the masses, even if the white nationalist ideas began to flourish among the American mainstream. After all, in Nazi Germany, Mein Kampf was much more popular than National Socialist philosopher Alfred Rosenberg’s innately more interesting and intelligent tome The Myth of the Twentieth Century (1930), just as Rockwell’s own virtual Mein Kampf, This Time the World (1961), is considerably more popular than Imperium among WN types today. Needless to say, Yockey is not only hated among raging Rockwellite types as he oftentimes is referenced in a negative sense by neo-fascist and neo-nazi types even though very few have actually read his work. For example, while white nationalist scholar and professor Revilo P. Oliver—an old school far-right intellectual and professor with a legit palindromic name who once testified before the Warren Commission in regard to the JFK assassination—went to the effort of carefully criticizing Yockey’s views with an entire book entitled The Enemy Of Our Enemies (1979), the majority of his critics simply rely on libel, dubious rumors, and downright ludicrous lies like in the obscenely dumb anti-occult text Satanism and its Allies: The Nationalist Movement Under Attack (1998) anonymously co-authored by writers from the British neo-nazi magazine Final Conflict who describe Yockey as “part-Jewish and homosexual” despite the Imperium author’s well-known womanizing escapades and hardcore counter-kosher activism. In the end, it might be best think that Ludwig II of Bavaria was also practically speaking for Yockey when he once famously stated, “I wish to remain an eternal enigma to myself and to others.” Incidentally, Yockey once wrote, “The articulation of the Culture has three aspects: the Idea itself, the transmitting stratum, those to whom it is transmitted [...] Who knows whether we would have Wagner’s greatest works but for Ludwig II? [...] Not everyone can play a great role, but the right to give meaning to his life cannot be taken from a man.” Somehow, despite his relative obscure, I think the full meaning of Yockey’s life remains to be seen.

Unlike glorified agitprop director Daniel Ragussis and most of the rabble associated with supposed neo-nazism, Yockey was first and foremost an artist so it is only natural that Imperium—a book that, not surprisingly, is more talked about than actually read—will forever remain a text appreciated by a special sort of artistic type that dreams of a world that will never be. Somewhat absurdly optimistic for a Spenglerian, Yockey, like all serious artists, lived to create a completely new world so it comes as a great insult that a film bearing the name of his revolutionary text could only dream up a painfully banal and superlatively soulless vision of the ghettoized neo-nazi scene that the philosopher-cum-revolutionary's intellectual nemesis Rockwell is largely responsible for inspiring. Of course, considering Rockwell's background as a cartoonist, it almost seems like tragicomical kismet that his ultimate legacy would be something akin to the grotesque image of a morbidly obese Amero-mutt sporting a homemade SS Halloween costume while hysterically screaming lowbrow racial slurs to similarly unsightly and racially dubious protestors. While Francis Parker Yockey will never be a household name, he has at least inspired some interesting art from the likes of Current 93 and NON/Boyd Rice and will probably continue to inspire it well into the future considering the unfortunately imperative rise of racial consciousness among American Euro-pids—a mongrelized group that, as Yockey noticed, is unfortunately decidedly more deracinated and culturally retarded than its mainland European brothers—in the zio-globalist age of Occident decline.

IMPERIUM: THE FLACCIDITY OF HOLLYWOOD AND CULTURE-DISTORTER

Rather unfortunately, modern-day pro-white movements tend to focus on the negative and critiques and thus are starting to resembling the sort of leftist anti-culture that Yockey critiqued when he wrote, "Liberalism can only be defined negatively. It is a mere critique, not a living idea." Undoubtedly, one of the greatest things that one can learn from Yockey comes from his words, "But creative force—this will remain forever incomprehensible to those, far more than 99% of humanity—who cannot see deeply into the soul of Culture-man—IS AT BOTTOM ARTISTIC. In the deeps the will-to-power merges with the aesthetic instinct. In the brief moment of satisfaction which follows the completion of a work—a novel, a building, a suspension bridge, a symphony, a victorious battle, the soul of a higher man feels an intense and profound aesthetic satisfaction in the form of self-reverence and a feeling of union with the essence of Being." While just speculation, somehow I doubt the creators of Imperium felt the 'profound aesthetic satisfaction' that Yockey speaks of when they completed their aimless agitprop abortion. Indeed, politics aside, the film can, at best, be seen as an excremental exercise in anti-aesthetic whoredom where artistic, intellectual, and philosophical integrity are completely compromised in a fundamental fashion that speaks to the superlative soullessness of its creators, but I guess one should not expect anything less from an FBI-approved neo-nazi spy flick starring Harry Potter. While the film attempts to make a profound statement about cultivated Yockey-esque types with the Lord Byron quote, "This should have been a noble creature: he hath all the energy which would have made a goodly frame of glorious elements, had they been wisely mingled," the creators are not even worthy of such a remark as they lack any noble or glorious elements and instead symbolize midbrow mediocrity at its most self-deceptively dull, unwittingly disingenuous, and cowardly conformist as a movie that even has less value than the vintage (anti)neo-nazi doc Blood in the Face (1991). Instead of watching the movie, I recommend that one read Yockey's Imperium and other texts, the anti-Yockey bio Dreamer of the Day (1999) by Kevin Coogan and pro-Yockey bio Yockey: A Fascist Odyssey (2018) by Kerry Bolton, and then contemplate the great sort of film that could be made about his life and struggle. Unfortunately, I fear there will soon be a time in a generation or two when few, if any, understand Yockey's words because, as his great intellectual influence Oswald Spengler once recognized in regard to the precarious nature of art, "One day the last portrait of Rembrandt and the last bar of Mozart will have ceased to be—though possibly a colored canvas and a sheet of notes will remain—because the last eye and the last ear accessible to their message will have gone."

-Ty E

INDIA'S COMING OF AGE IN SLUMDOG MILLIONAIRE
INDIA'S COMING OF AGE IN SLUMDOG MILLIONAIRE

A few years back I had the "privilege" of running tech and audio for a convention celebrating Indian and Southeastern Asian "Americans." I had the impression that the event would be full of the typical minority overcoming "oppressive" white America speeches and testimonials. Instead, the convention was full of bragging about how these various groups of Asians are taking over America via international marketplace. One of the Indian speakers bragged that all of his relatives owned an Exxon or a 7-Eleven. Basically, he played on the type of stereotypes that would get a European-American thrown out of such an event.

After watching Slumdog Millionaire last night courtesy of mad dog mAQ allowing me to get in for free, I couldn't help but think of the Indian and Southeastern Asian event I had attended years before. Slumdog Millionaire is a coming of age story about an Indian boy named Jamal who basically goes from being an inhabitant of Mumbai third world sewer to a millionaire. With the boy's rise to adulthood in the world, also comes the development of India into a serious global economic player. Jamal even takes a job at one of those outsourcing telephone service companies. I am sure everyone has had the annoying opportunity to call a company and having to deal with a telephone operator who has a hard time both speaking English and understanding what you are talking about. Typical annoying and worthless protesters. In all honesty, Slumdog Millionaire is a well contrived and constructed film but highly overrated like most of director Danny Boyle's work. Also, the film is one of few honest major motion picture films. Aside from the sickening "we are the world" propaganda in many Hollywood movies, few mainstream films address the age globalization and the new world order we are entering. Now even Hindus and Muslims can watch trash American TV shows like Who Wants to Be a Millionaire? Slumdog Millionaire makes it clear that the world is becoming homogenized and with it the dissolution of culture. Through Jamal's life of struggle, he accidentally becomes a player in the international market and for the "citizen of the world" that is the only thing left to obtain in our new materialist world. I won't be giving away any "spoilers" by saying that Slumdog Millionaire ends with a triumphant Bollywood style dance featuring Jamal (plus his girl) and a group of random street dwellers. I found this silly ending of the film to be interesting because I saw a similar thing take place at the Indian and Southeastern Asian convention I attended. Aside from bragging about India's success internationally, the only evidence of Indian culture were the goofy Bollywood dances these people performed. Just like many other "up and coming" third world nations of the world, they are trading in their old culture for economic and industrial development. The Bollywood dance is merely a last remnant of what Indian culture was. One could say that Karl Marx's dream of a materialistic and cultureless international world is coming true. One only has to go to a local gas station to see one of the many "American" members of the Indian diaspora. The wise Indian has his eye on the money and he's willing to work 12 hour days serving hostile American blacks (Indians really seem to hate them) and whites to get it. Slumdog Millionaire is a film about both the triumph of a Young man and his country. The film, like the Indian-American, is a hybrid of both east and west. Slumdog Millionaire features both the Hindi and English language. Like the film, the borders between nations and cultures are becoming blurred. For those third world peoples that are lucky enough to "immigrate" to America, they have a better life to look forward to. For those members not lucky enough to find a good outsourced job in India or ability to make a living in America, the future probably looks bleak. Just like the lower classes in the United States, with the dissolution of culture, they have not much to look forward to except maybe watching films featuring Bollywood style dances.

-Ty E

INTERVIEW WITH ALVIN ECARMA
INTERVIEW WITH ALVIN ECARMA

Alvin Ecarma is the director of the TLA/Unearthed release of LETHAL FORCE. SS: What inspired you to make this spoofish film? Did you just wake up one day and decide to make the mad-cap action blast "LETHAL FORCE"? AE: I was a couple of years out of film school and I had spent the intervening time hustling my short films and spec scripts. When those went past their freshness date, I decided it was time to make a feature using Robert Rodriguez's "El Mariachi" as a model. And concurrent to all this, I had been compiling a dossier on people in the Washington, DC Metropolitan area who had skills that would come in handy for a project like this, and I also had become friends with Teddy Chao and the Johns Hopkins Film Society in Baltimore, Maryland. So my desire to make a film and finding a core crew to make the film with dovetailed together nicely into A Perfect Moment, never to happen again. The script itself is born out of my affection for action movies of all sorts with an emphasis on HK heroic bloodshed (which I believe to this day to be the absolute zenith of the Action genre) with riffs on 80's Cop movies, Kung fu, blaxploitation, Spaghetti Western and the odd Japanese Yakuza bit. And because we were dealing with limited resources, the screenplay was very lean and barebones since I had to be flexible in dealing with casting and budgetary restrictions. Basically I went for "clever and smart" rather than "noisy and loud" since the former is always easier (and cheaper.) The mild tongue-in-cheek tone was always present but it read a bit harder on page than it does on screen; in any event, the quiet absurdity gave the film a free pass with most audiences since there was an acknowledgement that we know that the audience knows that this movie is verrry cheap (but without being over-bearing and obvious about it.) SS: How did you come up with the design for the henchmen? It seems you tease the audience with their identity. AE: This was artistic inspiration meshed with logistical pragmatism. Not only was it a comment on the general faceless nature of action-movie henchman, it was just easier to plug in people whenever bodies were needed without worrying about continuity or worrying if an actor was going to show up or not. SS: Is the nemesis purposely given a teutonic appearance? AE: Funny story. The first guy we had for the Big Bad was this hairy, beefy, beast of a man who, two weeks before production began, demanded a $100 for every day we went over schedule, a travel stipend, a costume stipend and 3% of the gross. Now everybody who was working on this movie knew it was a volunteer/credit/copy-of-the-movie deal but apparently this fat headed prima donna bastard was the King of Rockville, Maryland dinner theater and it was head shot next to the chipped beef on toast at the Lazy Susan. Of course, we fired him but he continued to try and sabotage things by telling the rest of his acquaintences on the cast that I was secretly planning to set them all on fire and leave their charred corpses in a mass grave at Seneca Creek State Park. Tragically, some of them listened but I don't harbor any ill will toward any of them and I wish them all the best of luck in whatever impoverished, half-assed community theater production of "Starlight Express" they find themselves in. Anyhoo, we eyeballed the remaining cast, trying to figure out who looked the most freaky, and it turned out that person was Andy Hewitt, God Love Him, that Aryan Ubermench. Generally speaking, there was a bit of casting drama with a sizeable amount of people abandoning the movie because the script was so shockingly offensive to their genteel sensibilities, but that's the Washington, DC Metro area for ya. It's the milquetoast and Wonder Bread Capital of the World. SS: Do you have anything written down for the sequel? And how would that work considering the ending? AE: If I made a sequel, it would just start with Savitch alive and punching people. He'd be an eternal, immortal, unkillable archetype like Santa or Fu Manchu. SS: Do you have anything planned out for your film making career? AE: I am very quietly working on something that's not a sequel, but a thematic follow-up. It's in the same mold of LETHAL FORCE with the exception that I'm writing more well-rounded characters rather than just flat out "types". More importantly, the script will have a "scalability" meaning that it could be mounted effectively with either no money or with lots of money (of course, the latter would be nicer). The script should be done in the coming year and we'll take it from there. SS: Thanks a lot for your time. AE: Straight backatchya!

INTERVIEW WITH ANDREY ISKANOV
INTERVIEW WITH ANDREY ISKANOV

Andrey Iskanov is a film maker from Russia best known for his micro budget films NAILS and VISIONS OF SUFFERING released on Uearthed Films. His upcoming film Philosophy of a Knife has been met with a lot of hype and he is currently working on a Sci-Fi horror called THE TOURIST. He took the time for an interview concerning POAK.

SS: Hello Andrey, thank you very much for taking the time for this interview. To start it off, How did you get started in film making and what inspired this incredible style that you taint your film with? AI: I always had dream about making my own movie, which for someone else years back here was practically impracticable. Therefore I started to master the work of a photographer, as being something close to cinema. The photo became for me my small cinema in which I could be engaged completely independently and imperceptibly. You should also notice, that already after some years, I have achieved the certain successes on a field of photoart. Besides I started to specialize from the first (and the last) in Russia of photofilms of horror, I also photographed girls for competitions of beauty, did advertising photos for girls which were sent in the Korean, Chinese or Japanese night clubs (though actually they were brothels), was thephotographer of the criminal chronicle in the local newspaper and much more. Besides that, I wrote horror novels (dilogy of Odour of blood) and a set of fine stories and also have written set of a revue of the western films of horror. I constantly required money and could not make the following logical step in any way. To this time I have suddenly lost the work in the newspaper (now they use free-of-charge photos from internet) and to continue to shoot girls wishing to become models and girls for the Chinese brothels at me any desire already was gone. I didn't have enough money for the following step: to start to make own film. It would be underground, guerrilla film production. But it did not frighten me because I knew completely precisely: nobody will give me money for my own film. Once I even talked in this occasion to one guy from Russian mafia. He has told me, that can give money for film and it does not make for him any problem. But he should know, how soon I can return the money and what will be his profit? Certainly I have refused his help because profit from horror films in Russia practically zero and I never could return his money. However from the end of 90's, I wrote scripts for own films and waited for a suitable chance. At last, in the beginning of 2003, light ahead began to dawn. Irina Nikitina, my good familiar from time of my photofilms, has given me money for my first film. In total about two thousand dollars. And I started to write the script of maximum cheap and simple film with a minimum of characters but with potential for some interesting effects which I could create with my own hands. Thus, almost one thousand dollars left on purchase of the camera, one thousand more dollars was spent for tickets from Kiev up to Khabarovsk (From Europe to Asia) for Alexander Shevchenko who should write music and edit the film, subsequently he also has acted also the main hero. And for ten days, i had only two hundred dollars for my disposal and to survive on. This film which today is known as Nails. Precisely why I have made Nails I can not tell. Today I look at this film absolutely differently than then, and now I would make all my films completely different. Who my influence is exactly is difficult to tell now. Obviously it was Dario Argento with his magical Inferno and Suspiria. But also many other directors, and also musical pop video clips, photographic advertising of the 70-s' years etc.SS: With the release of Philosophy of a Knife edging closer and closer, what do you think about your finished project? Is it the bona fide source on the information on the atrocities that occurred at Unit 731?AI: I wanted to be completely fair, both before my own conscience, and before the memory of victims of Unit 731. And if in the film there is no invented dialogue, it's only because I did not want to burden fiction and conjecture this history. And if in film there is a nice young girl in prison of Unit and the young Japanese militarist sympathizing her it at all was not elements of a romantic plot. Similar characters existed in a reality. Only I have dared to change some details for creation of the atmosphere necessary to me and the moods. The correct mood of film at times very much depends on those or other visual details. For example, I have shown in the film Unit 731 as the gloomy started place with dirty, covered with blood and rusted walls. This image was necessary for transfer for the spectator of my sensation of this place impregnated with pain, fears and suffering. In a reality of a room of Unit 731 it was sterile pure, had snow-white tiled walls and a floor. It is sure, that they were very similar to modern stomatologic studies. All is clean, sterile, accurate and is fresh. Anywhere there are no traces of blood and a tortured body are not crumpled in stacks in a corner. But it was one of few changes or simplifications of the real facts which I has admitted meaningfully. In all the rest, my film follows exact chronicles and can be seen as the bible of Unit 731 studying a history, from for abundances of the original staff and memoirs of eyewitness Anatoliy Protasov. In my opinion, my film is best of all films existing today about Unit 731. It the most detailed, artistic and fair from all existing today.SS: Since POAK is in fact a shockumentary, are you going to include the visual flair that you are famous for?AI: Visual flair? It so refers to? To tell the truth, when I look on something a subject that, I perceive it almost just as then I show in the films. I simply try to see usual things under a unusual corner of sight. In Philosophy of a knife I tried to avoid all that I did for Nails and Visions of suffering. I dont know as far as well I have succeeded in it, but I wanted to make a realistic film as soon as it is possible. I did not want to do film of horror, I wanted to make a detailed historical film.SS: After watching the clips and such for The Tourist, it seems that you are eventually going to make a film in almost every genre with your own surrealist flair, is there any truth behind that?AI: It is very possible, that so it and is. Right now I would like to make a comedy. I'm probably a little tired of violence. To work with stages of violence is rather hard. Therefore the Philosophy of a knife is most my difficult and heavy project. SS: Who were your film making influences? and how is the market for Cult/Gore films in Russia? It seems like an incredibly hard place to market films of your caliber. AI: Who rendered the greatest influence on Philosophy of a knife? Buddhism, I think. The released approach to death and violence has helped me to show that I have shown working on film. The Japanese from Unit 731 were Buddhists, besides others. Studying on Buddhism and Shintoism during work on the film has considerably expanded my outlook and has helped me to look at many things under another other corner of sight. For example from the point of view of Japanese. I did not want to make a film reflecting European mentality. I wanted to make a film close to the Japanese mentality. I think, that a surface of Mars would be a more successful market for films of horror than Russia. A shame for this country! I still can not look set of excellent films at all my efforts which you saw. I don't do entertaining films, therefore i am possibly the worst director for Russia. The horror movies are not entertainment for all family but only such films have here popularity. Fuck Russia! SS: My only guess is that all of the violence in POAK is unflinching and is documented without the camera turning away, such as T.F. Mou's film Men Behind The Sun. Care to explain the process of the violence? AI: I show violence without patriotism, even with cynicism and gloomy irony, with all details which you can see on place of crimes. If you will try to show murder in details, you will come besides to what I have come also. I never would use real murders of animals to make the film more effective. Any film in the world and any idea or true in the world do not cost murders or sufferings of animals. This does not have justifications and it is not necessary to try to search for them. They simply do not exist. Film can not become better if in it somebody kills in the real. It can become worse only. I do not have complexes in relation to display of violence to films, I dont get frightened with cinema violence in films. But I do not bear violence in real life. The violence in film demands as much attention how many statement of small performance or creation of a picture. Usually I write all key elements and details of a stage before I start to shoot on a paper. I in general never start to work, yet I shall not see the internal sight all main elements, signs of a concrete scene. More often those details which the spectator can be at all in detail undersign notices or does not pay to them any attention. But they are in film. And they make a basis of a stage. SS: Fellow friend and star, Alexander Shevchenko, has been in all of your films so far? How did this friendship/business relationship begin? AI: Alexander did music for all my films but acted in Nails and Visions of suffering only, he also has a cameo in The Tourist As TV news announcer. Also Alexander did amazing digital effects for my films, especially great work for POAK. I have got acquainted with him in 2000 or 2001, through net. He was the fan of horror, same as well as me and had casually read on the internet my review of Xtro. As it was the unique positive review of this film in Russian, he has written to me. All began from it. Then, I have found out, that he as successfully tries himself in the literature and is the professional artist. We loved the same films, therefore I have decided, that it will be better if we shall try to work together on my then project about people appeared in installed death which I have named Necro. Unfortunately, bastards from Moscow have deceived us and this project so never and were not filmed. After Visions of suffering and Nails we support contact through internet and we discuss work too through net. He developed digital effects in Kiev, Ukraine. I did render them in Khabarovsk, Russia, on the other end of the earth. We work on the Tourist precisely the same as and on Philosophy of a knife. Through net. The tourist became the first film in which besides his music will sound like music from other authors. So I have tried to adopt experience of use of music from such films Dario Argento as the Opera or the Phenomena.SS: How long does the process of thinking of these bizarre plots take? For example, the "new" style of vampires shown in Visions Of Suffering.AI: I have thought up the plot of Nails for 10 minutes and the script has written for three days. The Plot of Visions Of Suffering I have dreamed. So they havent borrowed a lot of time. Style of vampires was inspired by "men in black" real supernatural phenomena. Unfortunately I cant control the dreams to see as much as possible interesting plots. Its healthy has facilitated my work. But in general that, with everything, as to imagination I do not test special problems. I can imagine everything. Only on a plot of Philosophy of a knife I worked longly, as very attentively it was required to study set of original documents what to find points of a support and to size up own opinion. It is very important to have own opinion when you work above such difficult theme as the second world war and Unit 731. I saw one Russian documentary TV - film about Unit 731 and it was full shit. Typical propagation and pathos a syllable. I hate pathos and propagation.SS: Have you ever thought about making a film based on the murders of the bolshevik's gulags death camps?AI: Sometimes I think about it. And if someday somebody will offer to me make such project i shall not to refuse. Im sure, that I know about it more than any from the western directors. Only good script and very good actors is necessary. You know for example, that when prisoners run from camps in Magadan, they take with themselves the young and inexperienced prisoner whom named "cow" If fugitives water or meal come to an end, They kill him to drink his blood and eat his meat. This practice is kept till now and it is the naked truth.SS: Well Andrey, We thank you very much for your time and patience. I can only barely hold back my excitement for viewing POAK and The Tourist. Anything you'd like to add before you go?AI: The evil is not belonging of the Japanese race, it belongs to all mankind. People create evil without dependence from race, religions and preferences. Each person is potentially the murderer. Do not overlook about it when will look Philosophy of a knife.

INTERVIEW WITH ANDREY ISKANOV

INTERVIEW WITH ANTONELLO GIALLO
INTERVIEW WITH ANTONELLO GIALLO

Isle of the Damned, shot on location in Argentina in 1980, brought filmmaker Antonello Giallo under fire yet again... this time by the Argentinean government, who issued a warrant for Giallo's arrest under suspicions of abuse of the native peoples. Giallo fled the country before he could go to trial. The film has been long out of print, but is presented here in a digitally remastered form. This is an interview with Antonello Giallo in regard to his "lost" masterpiece Isle of the Damned.SS: So Antonello, what made you decided to direct the epic Cannibal film that is Isle of the Damned?AG: Well when I first met my wife... me make vacation in Argentina. We go on a safari with native guide who show us to eat genitals of pig. I take my 8mm camera and make home movie of this and other rituals. I use this footage in Isola del Maledetto, and create a story about these adventure men who go to island but instead of eating pig genitals, is their genitals which becomes food.SS: Did you ever hear Ruggero Deodato, director of Cannibal Holocaust, response to Isle of the Damned?AG: I know Ruggero from when we both were working on diarrhea art film. He knew my script before he make his film. I show him my home movies, and behind my back he steal idea and get very rich. Then Isola come out and Ruggero say I steal his story. Bastardo!SS: What Italian filmmakers influenced your filmmaking?AG: I like the films of Mario Bava... when I younger I work on the set of his movie, Ercole al centro della terra.SS: Did any stupid American filmmakers influence your filmmaking?AG: I enjoy films make by Alfred Hitchcock, and very much the films of George Romero, also I like very much the films of Howard Hawks.SS: Who is the dumbest American working in Hollywood?AG: I no like this new movie Star Wars... it very unrealistic.

SS: I hear you have a new Italian masterpiece in the works? Tell me about this Antonello.AG: Right now we make new film, in USA called, City of the Damned. It very exciting, very big budget. Based on true story of what happens when teenage boys play too much this Dungeons and Dragons and demons rise from underworld to enslave many men.SS: Did you ever get the chance to meet Pier Paolo Pasolini before his untimely death? Did you see his final masterpiece "Salo or the 120 Days of Sodom"?AG: Yes, I like this film. I often think what it would be like to do this what the actors of the film do. Is very fun vacation but I think my wife not like.SS: Antonello, I have heard you used to wine and dine with Lucio Fulci?AG: Yes, but he never phone me no more. I not sure this reason.SS: Can you tell us anything personal about the actors from Isle of the Damned?AG: People say very mean, untrue thing about the actors of this film... and I would like to say that I never made control of actors with LSD for Isola del Maledetto. They all good people who is very much dedication to art and acting.SS: Did you indulge in any hedonistic activities during the filming of Isle of the Damned?AG: We prepare our minds for this jungle travelling. The film compare man versus beast and civilization versus savage. Anything we did in the film was being done already by the Yamma Yamma, but hedonistic... no. Was natural, yes?SS: What can we expect from you in the future?AG: Once I make City of the Damned, next I probably do script called Barbarian Sex Warriors, movie about outerspace gladiator mans who enjoy very much to punish woman sexually.For more info on Isle of the Damned and Antonello GialloCLICK HERE

INTERVIEW WITH BRUCE LABRUCE
INTERVIEW WITH BRUCE LABRUCE

Undoubtedly, one of the most subversive and iconoclastic 'gay' auteur filmmakers working in the world today, Canadian auteur Bruce LaBruce has managed to assemble the perfect insanely idiosyncratic marriage between arthouse and pornography and sardonic satire and biting political incorrectness with aesthetically and thematically revolutionary works like No Skin Off My Ass (1993), Hustler White (1996), The Raspberry Reich (2004), and Otto; or Up with Dead People (2008). His upcoming film, Gerontophilia (2013), will be LaBruce's most mainstream work to date which, although not featuring any of the aberrant-garde pornographic imagery typical of his previous works, deals with a totally taboo sexual relationship between a young white twink and an old black man and has already been described as a sort of 'gay Harold and Maude.' In this interview, Soiled Sinema asks LaBruce about his cinematic influences and singularly eclectic filmmaking career, as well as his thoughts on the 'mainstreaming' of gay culture.

Soiled Sinema: Kurt Cobain apparently hailed you as his favorite filmmaker after seeing your feature-length debut No Skin Off My Ass (1993). Do you have any other infamous/famous fans?

Bruce LaBruce: Georgina Spelvin and Camilla Sparv. But seriously, one big thrill for me was when somebody contacted me on facebook and told me that he had taken the brilliant playwright Edward Albee to see my movie "Otto; or, Up with Dead People" in New York, and he had been quite entranced by it. So I asked them if I could get a blurb from Mr. Albee for the back of the DVD, and he did it! I think a lot of people think I just made it up, but it's really from him. I was over the moon because I love his plays so much.

SS: You co-directed Hustler White (1996) with photographer Rick Castro. How did you share the directing duties?

BLB: Very carefully. Actually, the writing and shooting wasn't too bad, but in post-production it got a little messy. I was also the co-star and a co-producer, and the post process was extremely difficult because we had so little money, so I really had to work hard with my editor to get it completed for its Sundance world premier. Co-directed presented a lot of complications. Let's just say I vowed never to co-direct anything ever again after that experience.

SS: What were the main film influences for Hustler White? Does it owe more to Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard (1950) or Paul Morrissey's Heat (1972)? Were you also inspired by The Blind Owl (1992) directed by Reza Abdoh?

BLB: The main influence for Hustler White was real life, followed closely by Sunset Boulevard, Whatever Happened To Baby Jane?, and Warhol's Flesh and Heat, with a little Alice in Wonderland thrown in for good measure. We actually shot the final scene of the movie at the same location where Aldrich shot the ending of Whatever Happened To Baby Jane?, which we were clearly referencing. Zuma Beach, or El Matador, I can't remember which now. We also threw in a little Death in Venice there for good measure, like when the black hair dye is running down my face. I've never seen The Blind Owl, but it sounds delicious.

SS: A number of your films have dealt with neo-nazism. Do you have any plans for similarly themed works in the future? How about a Ernst Röhm biopic?

BLB: I feel like I really explored the neo-Nazi theme, and the relationship between homosexuality and fascism, in my movie Skin Flick, and its hardcore version, Skin Gang. I mean, when you have a scene in your movie of a neo-Nazi skinhead jerking off to a copy of Mein Kampf, as I did, it kind of says it all. But actually I am making an experimental film in the near future called Ulrike's Brain which, in a minor subplot - a B-movie-within-the-movie - pits the RAF's Ulrike Meinhof's re-animated brain against the re-animated ashes of Michael Kuhnen, the gay German neo-Nazi leader of the eighties who died of AIDS in 1991. The movie-within-the-movie is a cross between They Saved Hitler's Brain and The Brain That Would Not Die, two famous B-movies of the sixties. I've already shot parts of it, in Hamburg, as part of the Die Untoten: Life Sciences and Pulp Fiction Kongress at Kampnagel, curated by my friend Hannah Hurtzig.

SS: You have portrayed/parodied both fascists and communists with your films. What political persuasion do you find more "erotic" and/or "fetishistic" and why?

BLB: An excellent question. Obviously politically I'm more in sympathy with communism than fascism, to say the least, but erotically and fetishistically it's a real toss-up. I love the stylish uniformity and militancy of both movements, but for different reasons. I like the simplicity and starkness of both styles, but obviously fascists - the Nazis, for example - were more interested in power and wealth as an expression of style, so they also borrowed from the baroque, both in architecture and in the use of sadomasochistic black leather coats, hats and trimming and fetishistic adornments. Charlotte Rampling in The Night Porter, with her long black gloves, suspenders, and shiny black patent leather Gestapo hat, is one of the ultimate expressions of this style. The gay leather movement was clearly influenced by fascist style. In terms of communism, I love the simplicity and the plainness of the design, whether it be the Mao suit with everything in uniform grey, including the buttons, or the Soviet proletariat uniform with its clean lines and industrial purposefulness. So although the ideologies may be repugnant, the style is undeniably sexy. I am a Marxist-sympathizer, but obviously I don't support any form of totalitarianism. However, totalitarians can have great style.

SS: What inspired you to direct two quasi-pornographic zombie films? Are you a fan of the subgenre or slightly more ambivalent? What are your favorite zombie flicks and did any of these inspire Otto; or Up With Dead People (2008) and L.A. Zombie (2010)?

INTERVIEW WITH BRUCE LABRUCE

BLB: I was interested in exploring a more popular idiom at that time, so the hot horror genre and the even hotter zombie sub-genre seemed like the way to go. I've always been a fan of the horror genre, and I do love zombie movies, especially when they're used as political and social allegories. But I also like to explore genre conventions, and mix up the conventions of seemingly irreconcilable or incompatible genres. So I have mixed porn with political satire, or porn with romantic comedy, or gore with porn (gorn), like in Otto and L.A. Zombie, or in the case of Hu$tlers White, the underground art movie with classical Hollywood melodrama. Ambivalence is my middle name, so I always approach each genre with some ambivalent feelings. I hate zombie movies that merely use the zombie as a kind of distasteful replica of the homeless, who can be laughed at or killed for sport. So in my zombie movies I made the titular zombies ambiguous characters - they could be interpreted as homeless schizophrenics who perceive themselves as zombies, or whom others perceive as such, or they could be viewed as "real" zombies. I love Romero's hyper-political zombie films (I wrote an article about them, with an emphasis on Diary of the Dead, for Fangoria magazine), and I love the British miniseries Dead Set. I also love Romero's teenage vampire movie "Martin", which was another inspiration for Otto.

SS: With the mainstreaming of 'LGBT culture,' have you felt a rising backlash from critics? Have you ever been accused of being a 'self-loathing homosexual?'

BLB: I am self-loathing homosexual, but I embrace it! I love my self-loathing! I had a party during Pride Week a few years ago in Toronto called the Self-Loathing Party. It was quite popular. Actually, I would probably be self-loathing even if I weren't homosexual. It's not really self-loathing, but more of an existentialist honesty, along the lines of Mersault in Camus' The Outsider. (I just watched Visconti's film version of it on YouTube last night. Marcello Mastroianni is brilliant as Mersault, and Anna Karina is fantastic as his long-suffering girlfriend.) I think there should be a little more self-loathing these days with the gays and a little less mindless self-affirmation and brainwashed conformity. A healthy bit of self-doubt, ambivalence or well-delivered sarcasm has always been one of the great strengths of the homosexual psyche. But my movies have generally been so far away from the gay mainstream that I've long been accustomed to disapproval and marginalization even within the historically marginalized gay movement. My friends and I were more aligned with the punk movement in the eighties because even back then we found the mainstream gay world hopelessly conformist and assimilationist and bourgeois. Now that gays have become even more mainstream and reactionary, I feel I have less in common with them than with a younger generation that eschews any type of sexual identification and is more interested in political or social upheaval. My films have always been about characters who aren't necessarily gay-identified, but who nonetheless have homosexual sex (hu$tlers, neo-Nazi skinheads, extreme left wing revolutionaries, gerontophiles, etc.). So even though I'm a Kinsey 9 or so, I've long since given up identification with any gay orthodoxy.

SS: You're undoubtedly the most prolific filmmaker of the "Queercore" (aka homocore) movement. What links homosexuality and punk rock? Do you believe that Darby Crash's 'gayness' was an innate attribute of his art?

BLB: I'm also really over this idea of the queercore or homocore movement being enshrined as some kind of unassailable, pure, and idealistic political moment. It's absolute historical revisionism. Sure, it had its day, and its moments of excellence, but there was also tons of in-fighting, gossip, questionable ideological posturing, and out and out hypocrisy. What was so great about particularly American punk rock was that it refused to be categorized or pinned down in terms of its ideology, its political orthodoxy, or what it stood for. It was a very eclectic, diverse, and ambivalent group of individuals united by a certain amazing and inventive and countercultural style. Great style refuses to be limited to a single meaning or unilateral signification. Punk was confrontational, ambiguous, intense, sometimes violent, and always anti-corporate. It was the last great cohesively incohesive, starkly anti-establishment youth movement. The word punk came from prison slang meaning a passive bum-boy, and also derived from a name for the wood that was used to burn witches and homosexuals at the stake. The original radically political gay movement had lots in common with the countercultural punk movement, so it was only inevitable that the overlap between the two would emerge as the homocore movement. But it was a queer romance that soon became entrenched and co-opted by the art world and political orthodoxy. Darby Crash was the ultimate queer punk because he crashed and burned before he could be co-opted or tamed.

SS: What are your thoughts on popular mainstream gay films like Brokeback Mountain (2005) and its effect on society as a whole?

BLB: Brokeback Mountain was okay, but I thought it was mainly Heath Ledger who really nailed the agony of repressed homosexual longing, just as River Phoenix did before him in My Own Private Idaho. It's so strange that both actors Darby Crash and Phoenix died so young. I love the scenes toward the end when Ledger cries clutching his dead male lover's jacket, and then when he asks his daughter if she's sure the man she's going to marry loves her, and assures her he will attend her wedding. It's so touching and melancholy. As to how it effected society, I guess it was a bit of a breakthrough in terms of the tolerance and acceptance of homosexuality, particularly as they were working class, salt-of-the-earth characters without any gay "affectations". But of course when someone tolerates you, it's time to reach for your pistol.

SS: Politically speaking, what inspired you to direct The Raspberry Reich (2004)? Were you in any way inspired by Fassbinder's The Third Generation (1979)?

BLB: Yes, of course! The main movies I studied when I was writing The Raspberry Reich were Fassbinder's The Third Generation, Dusan Makavejev's WR: Mysteries of the Organism, and Godard's La Chinoise (and the last part of Weekend). I particularly love Fassbinder's playful, farcical approach to the wannabe extreme left wing revolutionaries, and his willingness to expose all the hypocrisies and inconsistencies of the radical left. I wrote The Raspberry Reich in the few years following 9/11, when leftist rhetoric had largely been silenced and the radical left proved to be ineffectual against the tide of paranoia and fear capitalized on by western capitalist interests. So I wanted to make an agit-prop movie that both screamed a lot of leftist revolutionary rhetoric but also critiqued the radical left for allowing itself to be diluted, co-opted and exploited by fashion, art, and other capitalistically entrenched institutions. The film operates as both a nostalgia for the no-nonsense, rational discourse of the traditional left - espousing equality, anti-authoritarianism, anti-corporatism, etc. - and as a bitter critique of the left's inability to stave off the global scourge of unbridled, unregulated capitalist hegemony.

INTERVIEW WITH BRUCE LABRUCE

SS: You have directed a number of films in Germany using mostly German actors. Is there any reason why? Do you prefer working in Germany as opposed to American/Canada?

BLB: I go where the money is! I mean, you have to have some capitalist impulses to make movies! After my first two feature length films, which were sexually explicit, I couldn't find any funding in Canada, which was also censoring my work like crazy. My producer, Jurgen Bruning, was based in Berlin, and he was able to secure me some modest financing in Germany and from getting recoupable advances from a number of my international distributors. But there is a certain freedom in working in Berlin, which is a much more permissive and free atmosphere for difficult and controversial work. It's also cheaper to shoot there, and there is no shortage of spectacular locations. I also made two films in L.A., also co-produced by Mr. Bruning, which is another city where you can get away with a lot (if you stay under the radar) and which has a preponderance of stunning and unusual locations.

SS: With great gay auteur filmmakers like R.W. Fassbinder, Werner Schroeter, Rosa von Praunheim, Ulrike Ottinger, and Frank Ripplloh, etc. making quite a number of great and revolutionary works during the 1970s and 1980s, it seems that West Germany used to have the greatest 'gay' filmmakers in the world. Why do you think this trend has died out in recent decades?

BLB: Well, you could also say that cinema in general in Germany hasn't been the same since the "New German Cinema" of the seventies, with the films of that era by Fassbinder, Herzog, Wenders, Kluge, Syberberg, von Trotta, Schlöndorff, etc. German cinema of the seventies was perhaps a reaction against a certain amnesia that Germany had developed about its recent history, with a lot of denial happening about what had gone in German society that allowed the horrible ascendance of the Third Reich, and the failure to teach the new generations about that history in schools. The seventies were also the great heyday of the gay movement, the pre-AIDS era of unbridled, revolutionary hedonism and militant activism, which had a very strong expression in Berlin in particular.

SS: Where are your films most popular? Do you have a larger fan base in Europe or North America?

BLB: I probably have a stronger "fan base", or more accurately, cult following, in Europe, but also strangely in South America, where The Raspberry Reich was particularly revered in certain circles. Hustler White was very popular in France, and Italy and Spain have also always been very supportive of my work, as has Mexico. In the last couple of years I've been invited to mainstream festivals in Mexico City, Guadalajara, and Monterrey.

SS: Although I know you do not consider yourself a part of it, what do you think happened to "New Queer Cinema?" Do you foresee a new generation of subversive gay auteur filmmakers in the future, or has political correctness and mainstreaming killed such a possibility?

BLB: I often joke quite seriously that "gay culture" is essentially dead. The net result of the gay assimilationist movement is that gays have now been integrated into the fabric of mainstream culture, so it no longer has the same iconoclastic, oppositional, and subversive impetus that it once had. In fact, you could argue that the gay movement has overcompensated by espousing and supporting reactionary and conservative values and institutions, to the point where political correctness and the idea of presenting a non-threatening, innocuous "family values" image has undermined the previously well-developed political and aesthetic avant-garde character of homosexuality. Which is fine. Not everyone has the stomach for a daily struggle against oppressive institutions and nature. I never really minded being considered part of the New Queer Cinema, although I was the only one of the group who was making pornographic and largely underground movies. I felt more aligned with the likes of the Kuchar Brothers, Curt McDowell, Wakefield Poole, Peter de Rome, John Waters, Fred Halsted, etc. - the pornographic and the avant-garde.

SS: You have directed a number of films that have been described as "art porn." Do you see any intrinsic similarities between pornography and arthouse films? What directors do you think were most successful in synthesizing the two?

BLB: Lately I've come to the conclusion that I don't think there really is or should be a distinction between art and pornography. Re-reading Camille Paglia's astounding book Sexual Personae, I remember now that she is in complete agreement. They are both mediations of reality made by creative people. The arthouse cinema that emerged in the sixties and seventies crossed over somewhat with the softcore porn genre, with films like Emmanuelle and Bilitis and the films of Jess Franco mixing with sexually perverse movies like Luna and The Tin Drum and Salò. And then porn filmmakers like Peter De Rome, Wakefield Poole, Fred Halsted, etc. were making very avant-garde porn films. Even Warhol made a sexually explicit film, Blue Movie, and Paul Morrissey's films were very sexually frank. That was the heyday.

INTERVIEW WITH BRUCE LABRUCE

SS: Do you believe that porn can make for potent political propaganda? Can you name any examples?

BLB: Only in the Godardian sense, i.e., sex is always political. That's one of the other reasons I made Skin Flick and The Raspberry Reich, which are both overtly political. I found it astounding that more people haven't used pornography as a tool of political propaganda. So many people watch porn that it would seem like the perfect means to spread a political message as widely as possible. Maybe it will happen some day...

SS: What are your thoughts on mainstream heterosexual actor James Franco directing a gay S&M flick like Interior. Leather Bar. (2013), a work inspired by the cut scenes of William Friedkin's Cruising (1980)?

BLB: Actually, Mr. Franco and I had already discussed making a super 8 remake of Cruising together before he made that film, but we couldn't get the rights to the script and the idea kind of fizzled. I haven't had a chance to see it, but I think people should make films about all sorts of sexuality and not box themselves into one category. It's all about not fixing your sexual identity or imagination.

SS: Your upcoming film Gerontophilia (2013) has already been described as the "gay Harold and Maude." What inspired you to direct this film and when can we expect it to be released?

BLB: Gerontophilia has a few references to Harold and Maude, a great film by a great director, but it also gives a nod to Lolita and One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. Mostly I was trying to make a film with a seventies vibe, aesthetically and thematically. I see it in some modest ways as a kind of reverse Lolita. It will be done by the end of summer, when it will start playing at film festivals.

SS: What can we expect from you in the future?

BLB: Gerontophilia is my first film financed by larger funding bodies, my first union picture - in a sense, a film made more inside the film industry paradigm with a bit of a bigger budget for me. I think I've explored porn and guerrilla filmmaking quite a bit, so I would like to try make another industry film. I have a great script, if anyone is interested in co-producing. But I'll probably never give up the underground altogether. It's a freedom difficult to renounce.

For more on Bruce LaBruce and his films/projects, checkout his official website <http://www.brucelabruce.com/>

INTERVIEW WITH CHRISTOPHER ALAN BROADSTONE

Christopher Alan Broadstone recently agreed to an interview with Soiled Sinema. He is best known as the aspiring filmmaker of the award winning trilogy "3 DEAD GIRLS!"

SS: Thanks for doing this interview. How did you get started with your filmmaking and what advice would you give to any would-be independent filmmaker?

CAB: I was born in Oklahoma City and raised in Dallas, Texas. Many years ago I moved to L.A. with my band, THE JUDAS ENGINE. Although TJE had a CD under its belt, was playing gigs regularly, and had a new demo recorded, it was brutally murdered by circumstances about eight months after our arrival in California. I was suddenly a lost soul and too burned out to pursue music anymore. My only opportunity lay in some good luck I'd had in meeting two professional film producers. They read the unpublished (at the time) manuscript of my novel PUZZLEMAN, liked the story, and wanted to get it into script form ASAP. I took the challenge and launched into an endless screenplay writing exercise that eventually went nowhere. I could never please two producers of different minds and myself too. I also wrote a second feature, LOVE ME, based on an old short story I'd written many years before, but was nearly thrashed to death by criticism upon completion of the first draft. It was then that I realized the only way anyone was ever going to take my cinematic visions seriously, or even understand them, was if I took control and made a film myself. My first choice was SCREAM FOR ME, based on another of my short stories — a little tale that people either loved or absolutely hated. I had quite a bit to prove to the world, as well as to myself, so I wanted to shoot a movie that broke rules. In the case of SFM, that meant dealing with controversial subject matter, male nudity, sexual violence, excessive language, back-to-back monologues, a one-room location, and a lead character that constantly wore reflective mirror sunglasses. Most all of those challenges are considered bad luck for a first-time filmmaker. (Or even a pro.) As for my advice to would-be independent filmmakers? Uhhhhh, don't even start. If you can keep from it. Get out while you can!!! While you still have your sanity. Danger, Will Robinson! Danger! LOL! Thing is I can't really give advice, because my films have come from my heart, and a whole lot of thought (translation: lying in bed for endless hours, staring at nothing, and trying to see everything), and also from suffering with the project itself. That last statement, in translation, means: (simply) I'm married to the project. In other words, I'm ultimately committed. But I'm also ultimately committed to make the marriage work. Divorce is not an option. I either go down with the bitch (the ship), or I figure out how to keep a sinking, potential goddess afloat. Fortunately, with all three films, I've done enough Hitchcockian fore planning to have guaranteed a reasonably successful voyage. Of course, the designers of the Titanic would've said the same thing. Difference is, at least with filmmaking, you can take the time — if you want to (if you have the will power, the patience, or the insanity to) – to simply let the ship sink. And then you can reevaluate the disaster and figure out that you sometimes just have to reinvent the wheel. That means going back to your original ideas (your script) and putting it all together as you had hopefully planned to do. It's really so simple, but also incredibly, painfully complicated. Everything you need will be there, if you just plan ahead enough. Even so, you always have to find it all again, in the end. In the editing. So here is my real snippet of advice, it's better to shoot something than nothing at all. You can't edit a shot if you don't have anything to work with. Simple as that.

INTERVIEW WITH CHRISTOPHER ALAN BROADSTONE

SS: How exactly do you think up these variations of classic tales but with a Clive Barker-ish twist?

CAB: I was writing the first draft of my novel, PUZZLEMAN, many years ago, and was trying to sleep one night but couldn't. So I picked up the first BOOK OF BLOOD and read the MIDNIGHT MEAT TRAIN and I realized that what I was already trying to do was possible. I realized that gore and death could be poetic and beautiful, as well as motivation for story. That's the really important part. If the gore/brutality doesn't drive the story forward, then it's useless. It's just a joke. A shock factor. A laugh. As it is in most horror films. I think that's why what I've done has worked. The gore (or lack thereof) in connection with the story elements and characters creates an environment that sucks in the viewer and then doesn't let them go. Before they know it, they themselves are part of the story. But that also comes down to technical issues as well. You can't have even one bad edit or any bad audio. Because no matter how powerful your characters and story, in this modern age, picture and audio quality can make or break a film. Simply put, everything (story, characters, acting, shots, editing, and audio) has to work perfectly to make even a reasonably good film. Even a reasonably good, bad film.

LOL!SS: I really liked the impish camera work in the short "HUMAN NO MORE". Did you string a camera up or crawl around the ceiling? How did you do that? Seems similar to the non-linear camera style of Irreversible.

CAB: Yes, extremely nonlinear (as with all my films). HNM was very, very hard work and required tremendous pre planning. Every shot was choreographed to marry up to every other shot, in a way that would imply a single, endless perspective (a continuous POV). And yes, if you watch the HNM extras on the DVD, you'll see that I really was crawling around at the ceiling -- on homemade catwalks and peering through many pipes. In many sequences, the pipes were used as a cutaway to marry different shots and to make them seem like a continuous perspective. In post-production, I also used many different experimental methods in Final Cut Pro to make the production footage marry together even more seamlessly. I nearly drove myself mad with it, to be honest. But in the end, I did not divorce the project and I made the marriage work. And I think the film works. I realize it's not the most popular of all three of my films, but it is the most personal – and the one drawn from my deepest pain. And, with the amazing performance of Tony Simmons, I think that one day true fans will see this is my VERTIGO. Hitchcock's best film, in my opinion. It's also one of his most personal films and, until recently, one of his most unappreciated. SS: The mask in MY SKIN! looks almost exactly like the one in the upcoming Hollywood addition to the over-used snuff category "The Poughkeepsie Tapes". Is it me or does that seem like a total rip-off? CAB: No rip-off. Not intentionally, anyway. I don't even know what you're talking about, and I also made MY SKIN many years ago. The mask, however, is an old school tradition in Venice at carnival time. I ran across it at a store up on Franklin Avenue in Hollywood and fell in love with it. I still have it, in fact. For me it was a way to make MY SKIN! and the character of death surreal and theatrical, which would immediately sell the over-the-top, uber-stylized, and somewhat campy, Hammer horror-esque nature of the film. I just wish I could have used the mask more. Maybe this "The Poughkeepsie Tapes" is ripping me off. Of course, I'm just ripping off human history. So let's sue each other, for godsake! SS: How the hell did you find that creepy bastard Tony Simmons? His each performance horrified me a little bit and how did you alter his appearance so easy? From being incredibly muscular and menacing as Madman to old, attention to detailed, and howling as Death. CAB: I met Tony by the sheer luck of fate. I'd put out a casting call for SFM in "Backstage West", a trade mag here in L.A. When I submitted the ad info I stated that the film contained "some nudity" and that there was "no pay" for the actors. When the ad was printed, however, it read as "some nudity" and "some pay". I freaked out and called immediately to complain. "Backstage West" now informed me that because of increasing sexual abuse issues at auditions, they had recently changed their policy on films with nudity: if an actor has to perform nude, he/she has to get paid something. Now exactly how problems of sexual abuse would be solved by offering "some pay" is still beyond me, but whatever. At the time, I was mainly concerned with having to explain to the actors I called to audition that "Backstage West" had misprinted the ad and there was actually no money to be had at all. What an embarrassment. To my surprise, however, everyone I called (about 30 people for each of the three parts) accepted the chance to audition anyway — including a very mean and scary looking guy named Tony Simmons. I fell in love with his headshot immediately, but was terrified by the fact that he looked like he'd enjoy nothing better than beating the hell out of anyone that looked his direction — especially some no-name filmmaker suddenly telling him sorry, there really is no pay. I was also terrified that because he so looked the part of Madman, he probably couldn't act worth a shit. But my fears were unfounded — Tony's audition blew me away. No other actor even came close. The following week I offered Tony the part, and he accepted immediately. A couple years later, when we were shooting MY SKIN, he confessed that he never answered ads that stated "no pay". So, that's why I say that the sheer luck of fate brought us together. If "Backstage West" hadn't changed their policy, and arbitrarily changed my ad info, Tony never would've sent his headshot. He also told me that the only reason he went through with the audition was that when he read the sides I'd put out for the call, he was blown away by my writing; especially the voice of Madman. A match made in heaven. Or maybe I should say hell, considering the content of SFM. As for changing him into Death for MY SKIN!, it was really just a matter of lighting, camera angles, a little makeup, and the brilliant Tony Simmons inhabiting the character. Viola!SS: I noticed you wrote a lot of the lyrics and performed most of the music on the OST's. How did you manage to do that so efficiently?CAB: As for my lyrics and music...I did write the lyrics for IN THE MOONLIGHT (MY SKIN!) and SOUL IN A HOLE (HUMAN NO MORE), but the amazing Brian Sussman wrote and performed the music. I was, however, a professional musician for many years and used some of my previous band's (THE JUDAS ENGINE's) tunes, which I also wrote the lyrics for. In SFM I used the song WORLD SCREAM (from our debut CD) and in HUMAN NO MORE I used a never distributed track called I AM A WALL. Both tunes are available for download at: <http://blackcabproductions.com/MP3.TJE.html>Alas, a past life much missed. Enjoy!SS: How did the audience reactions to SCREAM FOR ME vary? You should have seen my face when I found out what was happening. Did anyone leave the showing?CAB: Yes, some have walked out. LOL! When the film screened at the New York City Horror Film Festival (at which it won Best Short Film) I know five people walked out in the first 10 minutes. Ironically, I ran into two of them as they were going back into the fest later. It was two women complaining about the violence of the film and wondering how and why anyone could make such a terrible thing. I then shook their hands, gave them a DVD, and said I was the writer and director. LOL! The look on their faces was worth a million dollars.SS: You mentioned that these films were very personal and could be an exorcism of your own demons. Care to explain?CAB: Well, in some ways there's not really much to explain. On the other hand, the personal part has really been about the challenge of just making a solid, good film. One that connects with me and, hopefully, one that will magically connect with others. But with every film...well, it's turned into the hardest thing I've ever done in my life. Technically, philosophically, emotionally. I wonder why I even want to continue sometimes. But it's simply something that's in me. And it has to come out one way or another, or I'll die. Whether it's through music, writing, or filmmaking, it has to come out. It's the only way I know how to justify my existence. (For whatever that's worth.)SS: After writing a novel (PUZZLEMAN), do you have any more planned exploits in film?CAB: For years I've been about 300 manuscript pages into writing a novel called HEATHER'S TREEHOUSE. It isn't nearly as complex of a story as PUZZLEMAN, but it's definitely as visceral and graphic. It's also less angry and philosophically gloomy. It should be a fun read, if I can ever get the time to finish it. Speaking of which, I'm about 60 pages into a shorter novel I plan to call M. That one is a very personal story and is written in first person with a stream of conscious feel to it — definitely very different from PUZZLEMAN or HEATHER'S TREEHOUSE. I also have two feature screenplays I'm dying to direct, LOVE ME and RETARD (Best Horror Feature Screenplay – A.K.A Shriekfest 2004) which I wrote with actor/writer John Franklin (who played Isaac in CHILDREN OF THE CORN and CHILDREN OF THE CORN 666). And I have two more scripts I need to finish writing – which will hopefully star Tony Simmons. And a couple children's stories I'd like to do. And the list goes on. There's lot's and lot's to do. But whether or not these projects are produced by Black Cab Productions, or some bigger studio or publisher, is up in the air right now.SS: Last but not least, what is your process of coming up with such a terrific monologue ala HUMAN NO MORE? It is near impossible to not be affected by that scene. Many thanks for this interview. I look forward to your name slapped on more cinema in the future.CAB: Thank you for that. The monologue was something I worked on very hard. Very, very hard. I really had to externalize my own pain – really get to my core emotions and stare straight into the abyss. And, I'm afraid it's true, the abyss did stare back into me – and it showed me two faces. The 9/11 disaster and the love-of-my-life suddenly walking out on me without any warning. I was angry at the world already, and then I was thrown into a dark basement, not unlike Detective Nemo in HUMAN NO MORE, without a soul to hold onto. I did have my family, fortunately (although long distance), but I had lost the most precious gift I'd ever been given. It was like being addicted to the most powerful drug in the world, and then suddenly having it taken away. Detoxing hasn't been easy. Part of that detox was the making of HUMAN NO MORE and the writing of the infamous monologue. I thought it would release me. But, sadly, it really hasn't. I've been told I have an amazing ability to externalize my pain through writing. And I guess that is my true gift. But it is rarely a pleasant one. So enjoy. I'm just here to entertain. :)Be sure to check out his award winning collection at Black Cab Productions

INTERVIEW WITH CHRISTOPHER ALAN BROADSTONE

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER
INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

It comes as a great honor that we at Soiled Sinema bring you this insightful interview with modern day Renaissance man Crispin Glover. Although best known as an actor and for playing standout roles in films like Back to the Future (1985), River's Edge (1986), Charlie's Angels (2000) and Willard (2003), Mr. Glover is also a distinguished filmmaker/screenwriter, author, recording artist, and publisher. In this interview, Crispin discusses his It? Trilogy and his extremely exceptional and fruitful career.

Soiled Sinema: How did the tragic premature passing of It is Fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE writer/actor Steven C. Stewart affect the conclusion of the trilogy you both set out together to complete?

You had also mentioned that Steven C. Stewart was subject to cruel abuse which bled over into much of the work you two created. Care to elaborate?

Crispin Glover: Steve Stewart only wrote "It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE." I incorporated Steve in to What is it? to make his screenplay a sequel and part of the trilogy. Steve did not have any involvement in writing "What is it?" or "IT IS MINE."

Steven C. Stewart wrote and is the main actor in part two of the trilogy titled It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE. I put Steve in to the cast of What is it? because he had written this screenplay which I read in 1987. When I turned What is it? from a short film in to a feature I realized there were certain thematic elements in the film that related to what Steven C. Stewart's screenplay dealt with. Steve had been locked in a nursing home for about ten years when his mother died. He had been born with a severe case of cerebral palsy and he was very difficult to understand. People that were caring for him in the nursing home would derisively call him an "M.R." short for "Mental Retard". This is not a nice thing to say to anyone, but Steve was of normal intelligence. When he did get out he wrote his screenplay. Although it is written in the genre of a murder detective thriller truths of his own existence come through much more clearly than if he had written it as a standard autobiography. As I have stated, I put Steven C. Stewart in to What is it? When I turned What is it? in to a feature film. Originally What is it? Was going to be a short film to promote the concept to corporate film funding entities that working with a cast wherein most characters are played by actors with Down's Syndrome. Steve had written his screenplay in in the late 1970's. I read it in 1987 and as soon as I had read it I knew I had to produce the film. Steven C. Stewart died within a month after we finished shooting the film. Cerebral palsy is not generative but Steve was 62 when we shot the film. One of Steve's lungs had collapsed because he had started choking on his own saliva and he got pneumonia. I specifically started funding my own films with the money I make from the films I act in when Steven C.

Stewart's lung collapsed in the year 2000 this was around the same time that the first Charlie's Angels film was coming to me. I realized with the money I made from that film I could put straight in to the Steven C. Stewart film. That is exactly what happened. I finished acting in Charlie's Angels and then went to Salt Lake City where Steven C. Stewart lived. I met with Steve and David Brothers with whom I co-directed the film. I went back to LA and acted in an lower budget film for about five weeks and David Brothers started building the sets. Then I went straight back to Salt Lake and we completed shooting the film within about six months in three separate smaller productions. Then Steve died within a month after we finished shooting. I am relieved to have gotten this film finally completed because ever since I read the screenplay in 1987 I knew I had to produce the film and also produce it correctly. I would not have felt right about myself if we had not gotten Steve's film made, I would have felt that I had done something wrong and that I had actually done a bad thing if I had not gotten it made. So I am greatly relieved to have completed it especially since I am very pleased with how well the film has turned out. We shot It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE. while I was still completing What it? And this is partly why What is it? took a long time to complete. I am very proud of the film as I am of What is it? I feel It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE. will probably be the best film I will have anything to do with in my entire career. People who are interested in when I will be back should join up on the e mail list at CrispinGlover.com as they will be emailed with information as to where I will be where with whatever film I tour with. It is by far the best way to know how to see the films.

After Charlie's Angels came out it did very well financially and was good for my acting career. I started getting better roles that also paid better and I could continue using that money to finance my films that I am so truly passionate about. I have been able to divorce myself from the content of the films that I act in and look at acting as a craft that I am helping other filmmakers to accomplish what it is that they want to do. Usually filmmakers have hired me because there is something they have felt would be interesting to accomplish with using me in their film and usually I can try to do something interesting as an actor. If for some reason the director is not truly interested in doing something that I personally find interesting with the character then I can console myself that with the money I am making to be in their production I can help to fund my own films that I am so truly passionate about. Usually though I feel as though I am able to get something across as an actor that I feel good about. It has worked out well.

SS: Do you see yourself -- years from now -- after all of the legendary tours have become history, releasing the films for the public in any sort of home format?

CG: Right now I have no plans to stop touring. The tour is the way people should see the films. People can find out where I will be touring by signing up for my newsletter on CrispinGlover.com

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

SS: At a past Big Slide Show, you mentioned how you initially happened to make the acquaintance of Steven C. Stewart. Would you care to reiterate this story for Soiled Sinema readers? How did this personal relationship develop into the creation of the It? Trilogy?

CG: When I was 19 I was acting in a film made at the AFI called The Orkly Kid. The character I was playing was based on a person the director had made a documentary about when he was working on a television show in Salt Lake Utah. He was friends with another filmmaker from Salt Lake named Larry Roberts who had made a documentary on Steven C Stewart when Steve was still not able to get out of the nursing home. When Steve got out of the nursing home he told Larry that he wanted to make a movie. Larry was an interesting filmmaker, but was older and doing other things and he introduced Steve to another younger Salt Lake filmmaker that was making unusual movies and said maybe they could work on it together. I had also been shown some of David Brother's films by Larry and the director of the Orkly Kid. It was around this time that I had been wanting to make a movie from one of my books and I had very much liked David Brother's movies he was making on video. So I met up with David Brothers and we started making a movie of one of my books called The Backward Swing. We started shooting this on video in 1987. Actually this will be the next movie I edit together as the films took over. In any case while we were working on The Backward Swing David showed me the script for Everything is fine! and as soon as I read it I knew it was a movie I had to produce.

Steven C. Stewart's own true story was fascinating and then the beautiful story and the naïve including his fascination of women with long hair and the graphic violence and sexuality and the revealing truth of his psyche from the screenplay were all combined. A specific marriage proposal scene was the scene I remember reading that made me think "I will have to be the person to produce/finance this film."

SS: Would you say there is a connection (whether it be aesthetic, idealistic, or otherwise) between elements of your films and your concept album The Big Problem ≠ The Solution. The Solution = Let It Be?

CG: My films, books and album "The Big Problem ≠ The Solution. The Solution = Let It Be?" contain questions or let people come up with their own questions.

SS: Is it safe to say that most true artists are competent in a variety of mediums?

CG: It is possible and it is also possible that many artists are far better at one medium than another, but I have noticed that many good artists are good in multiple mediums.

SS: Your father, Bruce Glover, is in the second film of your trilogy It is Fine! Everything is Fine.. How was the experience of directing your own father, who we can assume had much weight in steering you towards your current occupation?

CG: My father was easy to direct in "It is Fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE." My mother is also in the film. When I was born she retired as an actress and primarily a dancer. "Steering" would be the wrong word to use about my choice of profession. My mother did want me to become involved in dance when I was a child. I went to one dance class that she taught and she said "Alright girls... and... boy." and I never went again.

So my parents were not really able to steer me in an occupational direction.

I am very satisfied with my profession/professions. The one thing I wanted to be before figuring out that it would be a good idea to enter in to acting professionally at age 13, was a geologist. My idea of the profession was that I would find geodes and fascinating geological rocks and formations. I then realized that a geologist at the time I was thinking about it, which was the 1970's would probably need to work for a multinational oil corporation finding oil deposits. That did not seem as interesting to me. I am glad I continued on doing what I do. I still have great interest in the tectonic plates and volcanoes and geological formations. My publishing company is called "Volcanic Eruptions"

My father is what I would describe as a blue-collar or working-class actor. I witnessed my father's struggles as an actor and did not look at the business in a glamorous way.

I made a pragmatic choice to pursue acting as a career when I was quite young around 11 or 12. I got an agent when I was 13 and got my first professional job that year. Having grown up around the business it seemed like something that I would be able to do. My father also teaches acting and has since before I was born. I never formally studied with my father but I am certain that hearing him speak about things had influence. I would say that my personality type is not that of a standard actor's personality type that would more be someone who enjoys attention for attention's sake. That in fact makes me rather uncomfortable. For me it is important to have an idea that can be supported with performance or even for media publicity. Because of this I believe that if my parents had not been in the business and I was born with the personality type that I have, I probably would have pursued a very different career path.

> I became a professional actor at age 13 by my own choice. I emphasize that because there is a large difference in that from when a child is forced in to acting by parents who choose that career for a child. I began studying in a professional acting class at age 15. At age 16 I viewed many revival films of the 1920's through the 1970's at the revival theaters that were popular in the early 1980's before the advent of VHS competition that led to most of the revival houses closing. While watching many of the films and being in acting class I began to understand film and acting as art.

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

SS: How does your father feel about your ambitious taboo-breaking cinema?

CG: My parents have come to see the films and live shows on multiple occasions and are supportive of both the live shows and films.

SS: Censorship and context are both reasons for your choice in creating and controlling the screenings and distribution of your films. How would you imagine a general audience perceiving your film if it was promoted and released like your typical Hollywood Blockbuster?

CG: I love showing at museums, universities, cinematheques and vaudeville theaters. As I tour through the world it is apparent that as much as multiplexes and home theater has become ubiquitous that the single screen cultural center is absolutely vital to a specific audience that is looking to have a thoughtful experience at the theater be it live or by film. Museums can attract particularly thoughtful crowds. The forums are greatly appreciated by audience members. In vaudeville there was an energetic exchange between the performers and audience. The audience is part of the experience as opposed to merely being an audience that has no interaction when alone at home. The Q and A portion of the shows are extremely helpful with the films, particularly "What is it?" which can generate a particular amount of demand from the audience in forms of questions.

All currently corporately funded films by US film ratings must be made for the viewership of children. The reason for this is that when the NC-17 rating came about to replace the X rating multiplexes had become a norm. In the 1960's and 1970's films like A Clockwork Orange and Midnight Cowboy were given the X rating in the US. At that time it was easy to control if children were able to get in to a single screen theater or not. When multiplexes came in to being and X was changed to NC-17 the corporations that ran the multiplexes became concerned that a child could walk down the hall and easily enter in to an NC-17 film and they could be sued. So they stated that they would not show films rated NC-17. Being that multiplexes had become the main source of recoupment for the film distributors it was no longer viable to distribute NC-17 films. Without viable distribution of an NC-17 rated film no corporate entities would fund films they cannot recoup on. So at this point in time corporate funding and distribution entities in the US will only fund films that are rated G, PG, PG13, and R. R means under 18 accompanied by an adult. Therefore all corporately funded films in the US must be made with concept that those under the age of 18 are able to view the film. This means all corporately funded films in the US are made for the eyes of children. There is certainly nothing wrong with films that are specifically made for children, but it certainly is questionable when there is not a corporately funded film company that will fund and distribute films that are specifically for the eyes of adults.

Unfortunately I see the corporately funded and distributed films industry currently as having a hugely propagandizing effect on the US population at large. It is an enormous topic. I recently read the book "Propaganda" written in 1925 by Edward Bernays. Bernays was Sigmund Freud's nephew and utilized his uncle's understanding of the subconscious and became the literal founder of the "Public Relations" industry. Bernays came up with the word combination "Public Relations" to replace the word propaganda. The book is not an expose but an instruction manual for the monied and privileged class through psychological "Public relations"/propaganda techniques to get the lower class masses to serve the privileged class with the disguise of democracy. I feel like this book should be mandatory reading for everyone in high school so people in the US would have a better understanding of how things genuinely work in the media.

Stanley Kubrick made some of the most beautiful, thoughtful and questioning cinematic films ever in the corporately funded and distributed studio films system. He is fascinating to study. The culture ebbs and flows and waxes and wanes in terms of how much questioning can happen in media. We are in a particularly restrictive time right now with what will be corporately funded and distributed. Questioning could become even more restricted or less restricted. It sort of depends on how much people become concerned about the restrictions. Most current media that is corporately funded and distributed now is designed to make people not question.

I am not against the basic concept of corporations, but I have come to notice a similarity to the "Occupy Movement" and what "What is it?" is essentially protesting. It seems that the "Occupy Movement" is protesting business interests having an influence in what has basically become a legalized form of bribery by corporate/business/banking interests in politicians/political elements which is of course against the concept of basic democracy.

Relatedly "What is it?" is a protest to the corporate corporate/business/banking interests in the content of film/media which ends up leading to corporate/business/banking interest's propaganda.

SS: For as long as I can remember, River's Edge (1986) directed by Tim Hunter has been one of my favorite films. Naturally, it goes without saying that your performance as Layne is for me (and most other fans of the film), one of the most (if not the most) potent and memorable aspects of the film. How did you prepare for the role of Layne and what are your personal thoughts on the character?

CG: The way the character was written made me think of a certain regional dialect that I had grown up hearing. I am proud of that film. There was an intention change in the character from the way it had been written. The character could have been played as a person who sincerely wanted the best for the murderer character. But I made the choice to play the character as a person who wanted people to believe that intentions of the character were sincere in order for positive attention to be put on to himself. That is a different intention than what was written. The dialogue was not changed but the intentions was changed. There was a certain dynamic that this brought about in the character within the film. I like my performance in that film and I like the film as a whole.

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

SS: You mentioned the mainstream media's influence on Columbine High school massacre killers Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold in your article What Is It? Would you consider Layne a "proto-Columbine killer" of sorts?

CG: The repressive culture brings out troublesome actions. The character in River's Edge and the film itself is not a repressive film but an explorative film and film that brings up questions which is healthy for the culture. I think right now most films are not explorative and unfortunately are more dictatorial in the approach as to how the audience is approached as to how to think about the subject matter. The business interest's control on how they want the culture to work for their own benefit. I would say that sort of media control can bring out negative repressed actions from people.

SS: How/when did you get interested in writing/designing books?

CG: The live aspect of the shows I perform before the films I tour with are not to be underestimated. This is a large part of how I bring audiences in to the theater and a majority of how I recoup is by what is charged for the live show and what I make from selling the books after the shows.

For "Crispin Hellion Glover's Big Slide Show" I perform a one hour dramatic narration of eight different books I have made over the years. The books are taken from old books from the 1800's that have been changed in to different books from what they originally were. They are heavily illustrated with original drawings and reworked images and photographs.

I started making my books in 1983 for my own enjoyment without the concept of publishing them. I had always written and drawn and the books came as an accidental outgrowth of that. I was in an acting class in 1982 and down the block was an art gallery that had a book store upstairs. In the book store there was a book for sale that was an old binding taken from the 1800's and someone had put their art work inside the binding. I thought this was a good idea and set out to do the same thing. I worked a lot with India ink at the time and was using the India ink on the original pages to make various art. I had always liked words in art and left some of the words on one of the pages. I did this again a few pages later and then when I turned the pages I noticed that a story started to naturally form and so I continued with this. When I was finished with the book I was pleased with the results and kept making more of them. I made most of the books in the 80's and very early 90's. Some of the books utilize text from the binding it was taken from and some of them are basically completely original text. Sometimes I would find images that I was inspired to create stories for or sometimes it was the binding or sometimes it was portions of the texts that were interesting. Altogether, I made about twenty of them. When I was editing my first feature film "What is it?" There was a reminiscent quality to the way I worked with the books because as I was expanding the film in to a feature from what was originally going to be a short, I was taking film material that I had shot for a different purpose originally and re-purposed it for a different idea and I was writing and shooting and ultimately editing at the same time. Somehow I was comfortable with this because of similar experiences with making my books.

When I first started publishing the books in 1988 people said I should have book readings. But the books are so heavily illustrated and the way the illustrations are used within the books they help to tell the story so the only way for the books to make sense was to have visually representations of the images. This is why I knew a slide show was necessary. It took a while but in 1992 I started performing what I now call Crispin Hellion Glover's Big Slide Show Part 1. The content of that show has not changed since I first started performing it. But the performance of the show has become more dramatic as opposed to more of a reading.

People sometimes get confused as to what "Crispin Hellion Glover's Big Slide Show (Parts 1&2)" is so now I always let it be known that it is a one hour dramatic narration of eight different profusely illustrated books that I have made over the years. The illustrations from the books are projected behind me as I perform the show. There is a second slide show now that also has 8 books. Part 2 is performed if I have a show with Part 1 of the "IT" trilogy and then on the subsequent night I will perform the second slide show and Part 2 of the "IT" trilogy. The second slide show has been developed over the last several years and the content has changed as it has been developed, but I am very happy with the content of the second slide show now.

The fact that I tour with the film helps the distribution element. I consider what I am doing to be following in the steps of vaudeville performers. Vaudeville was the main form of entertainment for most of the history of the US. It has only relatively recently stopped being the main source of entertainment, but that does not mean this live element mixed with other media is no longer viable. In fact it is apparent that it is sorely missed.

I definitely have been aware of the element of utilizing the fact that I am known from work in the corporate media I have done in the last 25 years or so. This is something I rely on for when I go on tour with my films. It lets me go to various places and have the local media cover the fact that I will be performing a one hour live dramatic narration of eight different books which are profusely illustrated and projected as I go through them, then show the film either What is it? Being 72 minutes or It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE being 74 minutes. Then having a Q and A and then a book signing. As I funded the films I knew that this is how I would recoup my investment even if it a slow process.

Volcanic Eruptions was a business I started in Los Angeles in 1988 as Crispin Hellion Glover doing business as Volcanic Eruptions. It was a name to use for my book publishing company. About a year later I had a record/CD come out with a corporation called Restless Records. About when I had sold the same amount of books as CD/records had sold it was very clear to me that because I had published my own books that I had a far greater profit margin. It made me very suspicious of working with corporations as a business model. Financing/Producing my own films is based on the basic business model of my own publishing company. There are benefits and drawbacks about self distributing my own films. In this economy it seems like a touring with the live show and showing the films with a book signing is a very good basic safety net for recouping the monies I have invested in the films

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

There are other beneficial aspects of touring with the shows other than monetary elements. There are benefits that I am in control of the distribution and personally supervise the monetary intake of the films that I am touring with. I also control piracy in this way because digital copy of this film is stolen material and highly prosecutable. It is enjoyable to travel and visit places, meet people, perform the shows and have interaction with the audiences and discussions about the films afterwards. The forum after the show is also not to under-estimated as a very important part of the show for for the audience. This also makes me much more personally grateful to the individuals who come to my shows as there is no corporate intermediary. The drawbacks are that a significant amount of time and energy to promote and travel and perform the shows. Also the amount of people seeing the films is much smaller than if I were to distribute the films in a more traditional sense.

The way I distribute my films is certainly not traditional in the contemporary sense of film distribution but perhaps is very traditional when looking further back at vaudeville era film distribution. If there are any filmmakers that are able to utilize aspects of what I am doing then that is good. It has taken many years to organically develop what I am doing now as far as my distribution goes.

SS: On top of appearing in What Is It?, Feral House owner Adam Parfrey published your essay What Is It? in his book Apocalypse Culture II. What is your relationship with Parfrey and do you have any plans to once again collaborate with him in the future -- be it in film or otherwise?

CG: I am friends with Adam Parfrey and he has influence on both the article in "Apocalypse Culture II" and content in the film "What is it?" I am always open to collaboration with intelligent people that I have had positive relations with. So I certainly would be up to collaborating with Adam Parfrey again.

SS: How does your brilliant article What is It? relate to your 2005 film of the same name? Is the film an abstract surrealist portrayal of some of the ideas expressed in your article?

CG: The article in What is it? was written in 1999 after the feature film "What is it?" had been locked as a picture edit. It was conceived as an entertainment essay for Adam Parfrey's book "Apocalypse Culture II" that would also promote the film "What is it?"

SS: In your film What is It?, one of the roles you played was that of the "Dueling Demi-God Auteur." What are your thoughts on auteur theory and auteur filmmaking in general? Is it safe to say that the films (and upcoming film) in the It? Trilogy are a rare modern example of pure and personal "auteur" works?

CG: On some level the word "Auteur" was used for entertainment purposes with a sense of humor. Although it is true that Steve is the original "Auteur" of "It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE."

I am very careful to make it quite clear that What is it? is not a film about Down's Syndrome but my psychological reaction to the corporate restraints that have happened in the last 20 to 30 years in film making. Specifically anything that can possibly make an audience uncomfortable is necessarily excised or the film will not be corporately funded or distributed. This is damaging to the culture because it is the very moment when an audience member sits back in their chair looks up at the screen and thinks to their self "Is this right what I am watching? Is this wrong what I am watching? Should I be here? Should the filmmaker have made this? What is it?" -and that is the title of the film. What is it that is taboo in the culture? What does it mean that taboo has been ubiquitously excised in this culture's media? What does it mean to the culture when it does not properly process taboo in it's media? It is a bad thing because when questions are not being asked because these kinds of questions are when people are having a truly educational experience. For the culture to not be able to ask questions leads towards a non educational experience and that is what is happening in this culture. This stupefies this culture and that is of course a bad thing. So What is it? Is a direct reaction to the contents this culture's media. I would like people to think for themselves.

SS: What are thoughts on the blatant decline of great auteur filmmakers in the modern Occidental world? Undoubtedly, you have helped to fill the void in our mostly auteur-less era. Do you believe that Hollywood has consciously sought out to destroy the auteur filmmaker -- and organic art in general?

CG: Consciousness in corporately funded and distributed filmmaking for the most part is difficult to define as propagandized thought processes end up infusing in to what the sensibility of the corporately funded and distributed film entity decides on what is put forth to the population. Every once in a while a film will come out from the corporately funded and distributed filmmaking business from a filmmaker that is both intelligent and deft at making cinematic decisions that have positive cultural messages. It is rare and difficult for that to happen, but when it does I applaud those film makers.

The way that US propaganda works is difficult to describe.

Unfortunately the corporately funded and distributed films industry currently is having a hugely propagandizing effect on the US population at large. It is an enormous topic.

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

I recently read the book “Propaganda” written in 1925 by Edward Bernays. I recommend everyone read it. The first sentence of the book is “THE conscious and intelligent manipulation of the organized habits and opinions of the masses is an important element in democratic society. Those who manipulate this unseen mechanism of society constitute an invisible government which is the true ruling power of our country.”

Bernays was Sigmund Freud’s nephew and utilized his uncle’s understanding of the subconscious and became the literal founder of the “Public Relations” industry. Bernays came up with the word combination “Public Relations” to replace the word propaganda. He brought his uncle’s ideas and introduced Sigmund Freud to the US to help influence US corporations, Academia and the government. The book is not an expose but an instruction manual for the monied and privileged class through psychological “Public relations”/propaganda techniques to get the lower class masses to serve the privileged class with the disguise of democracy. I feel like this book should be mandatory reading for everyone in high school so people in the US would have a better understanding of how things genuinely work in the media. Once anyone reads this book they will not be able to see the function of US media the same way again.

The difficult part of the US propaganda is the way it is put in to effect is not be committee dictation but by the way corporate/business interests utilize money to essentially legally bribe people/government/academia/media to do that which is in the corporate/business interest.

SS: What are some of the struggles you have had to dealt with in your ambitious career of simultaneously working within the Hollywood studio system, but also creating uncompromising artistic works independently in various mediums? You seem to be one of the few people that has been able to successfully do that. Why do you think this is?

CG: There is a strange mix of being brought up working within the media business and becoming aware of the amount of control that corporate interests were having on the content of film in general.

The first time I used discretion about choosing films was not till after “Back to the Future” came out in 1985. After that film came out and had made so much money I felt a certain obligation towards finding films that somehow reflected what my own psychologically interested were. The first film I acted in after that was “River’s Edge.” I am not critical of the concept of corporations. I am critical when the result of corporate control causes people to think less or for media in general to come out with less questioning or question causing content. Corporations do not necessarily cause this, but it currently is happening in great quantity. There are times when corporate entities have been behind great questioning films like “A Clockwork Orange” or “2001 a Space Odyssey.” I prefer to not be overly political. I concern myself with things that affect me directly.

The film industry I had thought I had stepped in to was the spirit of when I was a teenager attending the various revival theaters that were so popular in Los Angeles in the 1980's before home theater business competition forced most 35 mm venues to close. I did not realize at the time that I stepped in to working as an actor that the kinds of films that were being funded and distributed had changed.

As soon as I got my driver's license when I was 16 in 1980 I attended screenings at revival theaters that were quite popular in LA before VHS competition cleared many of them away. Many of these revival theaters no longer exist such as, one of my favorites, the beautiful Fox Venice with a wide cinemascope screen on Lincoln Blvd.

The films I saw that played in these venues tended to question culturally accepted truths with performances that underscored these concepts.

Films played such as:

Ken Russel's The Devils,

Roman Polanski's Repulsion and Chinatown,

Frederico Fellini's 8 1/2 and Cassanova,

John Cassavete's A woman under the influence,

Orson Welles' F is for Fake and Citizen Kane,

Billy Wilder's The Apartment and Sunset Blvd,

John Waters' Pink Flamingos and Desperate Living,

Todd Browning's Freaks,

Stanley Kubrick's 2001 and Clockwork Orange and Dr. Strangelove, Werner Herzog's Aguirre Wrath of God, Even Dwarfs Started Small and Fata Morgana.

I was a regular attendee of David Lynch's Eraserhead at midnight on Fridays at the Nuart.

I studied actors giving performances like:

Jack Nicholson in Five Easy Pieces and Easy Rider,

Timothy Carey in Marlon Brando's One Eyed Jacks and Elia Kazan's East of Eden,

Charles Laughton in The Hunchback of Notre Dame

Brad Dourif in One Flew Over the Cuckoos Nest and Wise Blood,

Peter Lorre in M

Emil Jannings in The Last Laugh

and Klaus Kinski in Aguirre Wrath of God.

These films and performances characterized the atmosphere of cinema and acting I believed I was stepping into as a young actor. By 1982, at age 18, I began to act in feature films. At this time I believed contemporary culture's film's main purpose was to question suspect things in our culture. I enthusiastically supported the idea of questioning our culture. To help support the idea, I also questioned the film industry's and media's messages. Sometimes I felt scorned and isolated; other times I felt accepted and admired. Then, at one point, in the midst of my career, I realized that the types of films the industry was financing and distributing had changed almost diametrically from the types of films I had watched when I was 18.

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

Now, I have put my artistic passions and questions in to my own filmmaking with films like "What is it?" and its sequel "It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE."

SS: Can Hollywood filmmakers like Steven Spielberg and Michael Bay be considered auteur filmmakers due to their somewhat consistent and ambiguously "personal" themes? Or would you consider them "anti-auteur" filmmakers due to their intrinsic lack of thematic, aesthetic, and artistic complexity? In other words, are Blockbuster filmmakers merely soulless and totally lacking in genuine expression and/or are they merely appealing to the lowest common denominator with the sole goal of obtaining a substantial monetary return?

CG: I specifically do not use the term "Hollywood film" because it is overly generalized and "Hollywood" for me is a place I have lived, so I think of that more as a geographical place. The specific term I use is "Corporately funded and distributed film." I am not so familiar with Michael Bay's films. I am far more familiar with the films of Steven Spielberg. Looking both of their credits up on IMDB, which can be inaccurate, it seems that Michael Bay had not written any of the films that he has directed. But the definition I understand of "Auteur" this would mean Michael Bay would not be that. The film that Steven Spielberg solely wrote the screenplay and directed is "Close Encounters of the Third Kind" By and by the definition of "Auteur" it would make him that definition.

I would think all films whether one likes the expression held within them or not are forms of expression. It may be that some filmmakers forms of expression are more aligned with business interests. It can be argued whether their personal interests naturally align to business interest or if the business interest had caused what is their personal interest has become.

SS: You have stated in the past that you're a fan of German New Wave filmmakers like Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Werner Herzog. Historically, what do you think are the main differences between Hollywood and European cinema? Why do you think there has been a decline in great European films and filmmakers?

CG: I admire both Herzog's and Fassbinder's work as filmmakers and it has been a great honor and pleasure to know Werner Herzog. Herzog of course is still making great films to this day so he is still a fantastic force. I am sure if Fassbinder were still alive he would also be a great force. The decline you may be feeling is probably a general worldwide waxing of control by business interests and control over the content of film.

SS: Are there any modern films/filmmakers that you admire/respect?

CG: There certainly are.

SS: What films and filmmakers have inspired you? Trilogy? Have any writers, philosophers, or otherwise inspired the Trilogy?

CG: Some of the filmmakers mentioned above certainly have had influence on my thoughts.

“What is it?” started production as a short film in 1996. It took 9.5 years from the first day of shooting on the short film to having a 35 mm print of the feature film. I wrote it as a short film originally to promote the viability of having a majority of the characters that do not necessarily have Down’s Syndrome to be played by actors with Down’s Syndrome.

The way this came about was this. In 1996. I was approached by two young writers and aspiring filmmakers who were from Phoenix to act in a film they wanted to produce and direct. They made a monetary offer to my agents which they really should not have done as they did not actually have financing. Nonetheless it did get me to read the screenplay which I found to be interesting. This screenplay was not What is it? I found interesting things about the screenplay and was interested in the project, but I thought there were things about the screenplay that did not work. I came up with solutions that needed re working of the screenplay and I told them I would be interested in acting in the film if I directed it. They came to LA and met with me and wanted to know my thoughts. There were quite a few things but the main things was that most of the character were to be played by actors with Down’s Syndrome. They were fine with this concept and I set about to re writing the screenplay. David Lynch then agreed to executive produce the film for me to direct. This was very helpful and I went to one of the larger corporate entities in Los Angeles that finances films and met with them. They were interested in the project but after a number of meetings and conversations they let me know that they were concerned about financing a project wherein most of the characters were played by actors with Down’s Syndrome. The title of this screenplay at this point had become IT IS MINE. And will become part three of the “IT” trilogy. It was known yet at this time that there would be a trilogy but it was decided that I should write a short screenplay to promote that the concept of having a majority of the characters played by actors with Down’s Syndrome was a viable things to do for corporate entities to invest in.

This is when I wrote a short screenplay entitled What is it? We shot this short screenplay in four days. I edited that over a period of six months and the first edit came in at 84 minutes. The final feature length film of What is it? is 72 minutes. So the first version of the short film is longer than the final version of the feature film, and it was too long for the material I had at the time, but I could see with more work and more material I could turn it in to a feature film. Over approximately the next two years I shot 8 more days and edited this in to what is now the final version of the film. I locked the edit of the film about three years after the first day of shooting what was supposed to be a short film. Then there were a number of years of very frustrating technical problems that mainly had to do with SMPTE time code. Originally I was going to make the film the now old fashioned way of a complete photochemical process and not digital intermediate. An optical house in New York that did not give me enough information to let me know that the SMPTE time code had not been properly put on when the film was telecined. During this time I worked patiently on the final sound edit of the film with a number of interns. Finally that sound edit was finished and it became apparent that the film optical house was not telling me the truth and prices had fallen during this time so I was able to make the film using a digital intermediate to ultimately go out to a 35 mm print of the film. So from the first day of shooting what was to be a short film to having a 35 mm print for the film took 9.5 years.

INTERVIEW WITH CRISPIN GLOVER

> Sometimes people ask me if the length of time it took for me to make the film had to do with working with actors with Down's Syndrome. This was not the case. Even though the film took many years to make much of the delay were technical issues. What is it was actually shot in a total of twelve days which was spread over several years. Twelve days is actually a very short amount of shooting days for a feature film. The most important thing about working with an actor whether they have Down's Syndrome or not is if they have enthusiasm. Everyone in I worked with had incredible enthusiasm so they were all great to work with.

SS: What can we expect from It Is Mine? Do you have any specific goals you would like to reveal regarding the final chapter of your It? Trilogy? Do you have any plans for directing films after you complete the It? Trilogy that you would like to reveal?

CG: I should not go in to detail for "IT IS MINE." yet and I will not shoot that next. There are other projects outside of the trilogy that I will shoot next. The Czech Republic is another culture and another language and I need to build up to complex productions like "What is it?" and the existing sequel "It is fine! EVERYTHING IS FINE." IT IS MINE. Is an even more complex project than those two films were so it will be a while yet for that production. I will step outside of the trilogy for a number of films that deal with different thematic elements.

The sets for my next film productions have started construction. At the same time the sets are being built I am in the process of continuing to develop the screenplay for myself and my father to act in together on these very sets. He is also an actor and that is the next film I am planning to make as a director/producer. This will be the first role I write for myself to act in that will be written as an acting role as opposed to a role that was written for the character I play to merely serve the structure. But even still on some level I am writing the screenplay to be something that I can afford to make. There are two other projects I am currently developing to shoot on sets at my property in the Czech Republic. The cost of the set building will determine which one I actually shoot next. They will all be relatively affordable yet still cinematically pleasing.

SS: Would you ever consider directing a film within the mostly strict confines of the Hollywood studio system? Additionally, are there any characters (be they historical figures or fictional) that you have always wanted to play?

CG: It may come about naturally that corporately funded and distributed film's interests will naturally come in to alignment with my own interests. There have been waxing and waning periods of corporate control of the content of film and right now we are in a severe waxing of control. We shall see what the future holds.

For more info on Crispin Glover's Big Slide Show, his company Volcanic Eruptions, and the It? Trilogy, please visit: <http://www.crispinglover.com/>

INTERVIEW WITH FSUDOL
INTERVIEW WITH FSUDOL

FSUDOL is the director of both animated zombie horror films City of Rott and the upcoming Dead Fury. His work has been seen and acclaimed for mixing homages with toilet humor. His more known work would be on the South Park film. We had a chance to discuss his new film DEAD FURY and a mutual love for zombies.

SS: You seem to have an avid appetite for zombie carnage. When did all start, and what were your inspirations?FS: Romero's Day of the Dead on VHS back in the 80's is one of the biggest inspirations for my gore filled cartoons. Along with Evil Dead and a few others. Really enjoy the gory films.SS: What exactly is the process for creating your own animated horror film? I can imagine the work for drawing alone to be tedious.FS: First thing is the idea, then writing the story, drawing the characters and pieces by hand on paper, scanning it all into the computer, then using photoshop to animate and a few movie programs to piece it together. Currently focused more on telling a better story. Looking back, City of Rott was a start, but could really use improvement in the plot department. The animation is intentionally limited, not going for anything too fluid right now. Animating the gore and action scenes is the most fun. On a side note, I like some of the changes made to the gore FX in Dead Fury.SS: You do plan on releasing DEAD FURY on Unerthed, correct? Do you have any more ideas planned for film?FS: Unerthed Films will be bringing Dead Fury out on DVD sometime in August 2008. Currently working on a third, gory animated apocalyptic film. I'll see what happens for the future.SS: What is your favorite version of Zombie seen on film?FS: Favorite zombies are Savini's zombies in Day of the Dead. The gritty make up effects and gore are my favorite. They really look like they've been dead for awhile, but can still get around with what's left of their rotten muscles. When I make another zombie film in the future, it'll have much improved zombies in that style, but animated.SS: When you worked on the South Park film, how was the experience, and what exactly was your job?FS: It was a great experience. I started doing lip synching for the characters with a team, and soon had the chance to do scene set ups, some 2D character set ups, texture and color stuff, etc. While working on the scene with Terrance and Phillip in Canadian traffic, I threw an animated cartoon version of myself dressed in black, near the front of the scene at the very last line. Overall, learned a lot about putting it all together. Much credit to the cast and crew's hard work on the short deadlines. Matt and Trey were there often, working on the film, but not much chance to interact with most of the crew.SS: Is Max's (Dead Fury) character inspired by Ash from The Evil Dead?FS: Max was inspired by Ash, but instead of trying to match Ash's voice, personality and one liners, I took it a different route. Although Dead Fury is in the parody style, I can't even come close to matching Bruce Campbell's brilliant character performance. Ash and Evil Dead rule.SS: What made you decide to carry the Old man character from your previous effort City of Rott to Dead Fury? Are they the same character?FS: I get a laugh out of older characters, so decided to bring him back for a secondary role. He can be a bit annoying, but it's intentional mostly. The idea is, I consider these animated characters as actors, so they can play different roles in future films if I need to bring them back. But no, Fred and Pop are two different characters played by the same cartoon actor so to speak. He may or may not show up in the third animated film I'm working on. If he does, it'll be a smaller part.SS: How did you go about creating all the sound effects for the gore that slops around? One might call them sickening.FS: I used plenty of household objects like filling a bowl with water, rattling metal parts around, tearing paper, stuff like that. Then bring it into the computer and edit the sounds. I'm not satisfied with some of the gore sounds from City of Rott compared to Dead Fury, which is a nice improvement in my opinion. Sound is very important, but I still could use better equipment balancing it all out with the sound FX, music and voices.SS: Have you ever thought about delving into Claymation?FS: I used to work on claymation as a kid, Gumby super 8 movies I made with my brother. I probably won't get into claymation again, as it's not quite what I'm looking for in style. Speaking of claymation and zombies, I saw "Clay of the Dead" online, which is a neat idea. I'm inspired by the limited style of older Hanna Barbera Cartoons. For now, my style is similar to South Park's "stop frame" animation, based on budget, time, style, etc.SS: If you could kill a real zombie in any way, which weapon would you use to do the deed?FS: To finish off a zombie with only one weapon... A shotgun for the movies, a spear if it was real; less contagious zombie mess.FS: I just want to finish by saying Dead Fury offers an improved story(compared to COR) and plenty of gore, inspired by the great classics like Evil Dead, The Hills Have Eyes, and a few others, but with a number of original ideas thrown in as well. Unearthed Films should be releasing the Dead Fury DVD sometime near August, 2008. It's also premiering early at the Philadelphia Film Festival April 9th, 2008, which is a great opportunity.FS: Thanks for the interview and the early film fest review!Be sure to see Dead Fury, whether on it's DVD release, or its premiere at the Philyfest.

INTERVIEW WITH GIUSEPPE ANDREWS
INTERVIEW WITH GIUSEPPE ANDREWS

Most people know Giuseppe Andrews as one of the Stoner Kiss fans in Detroit Rock City and his kid role in Independence Day. It's a shame considering Andrews is one of the most original auteur filmmakers out there. He shoots his films on a Sony camcorder and for the most part has them set in his trailer park. Hollywood beware!SS: So Giuseppe, What made you decide to be a filmmaker? Has it always been an ambition you have had?GA: I've been chosen by the cosmos.SS: What camera are you currently shooting on? What do you like about?GA: the same camera ive shot with for 10 years, it's sony, i don't know the model. i like that it films an image with sound.

SS: I have noticed you are a fan of the late German New Wave auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder. As directors, both of you have the ability turn the most limited of sets (the trailer) into extraordinary scenes of drama. What attracted you to Fassbinder? Does his filmmaking influence yours?GA: His style and his ideas and yes.SS: The trailer park is a place not often seen in Hollywood films but more representative of American than say New York City. What compels you to shoot in the trailer park? Do you think the average American has a sort of fear of the Trailer Park?GA: The cosmos chose it. I do make films in other places, but I shoot alot in the trailer park because i live there and im reclusive.SS: In your films, you have some of the most interesting characters/real people (Bill Nowlin, Tyree, Walt Dongo, Vietnam Ron, etc.). Did you know any of them personally before they became your stars?GA: yes, all of them.

SS: What other directors (if any) have inspired you or have had an influence on your filmmaking? What are some of your favorite films and/or directors?GA: here are the films i own:50 movie pack of western classicsthe singing dectectivepennies from heavenlamb of god - live!steven allen davis - livethe ed wood collectionzontarthe first films of samuel fullerel topothe fassbinder collection 2berlin alexander platzthe giant clawplay timerififitownes van zandt documentaryinland empirethe african queenmi!ster hulot's holidayfilm noir box setI have had thousands of films in my trailer, but these are the only ones that remainSS: I have noticed that you have been doing acting for some horror films lately. Are you a fan of the genre and if so, what are some of your favorite films and filmmakers?GA: i like night of the living deadSS: You have some interesting tattoos. I especially like the war tattoo and noticed that start Bill Nowlin has a similar tattoo. Is there a story behind that?GA: i got it right after i made my first movie, touch me in the morning, to remind myself that i was entering a war against the old establishment of cinema. as years went by, it's meaning changed to symbolize war against other things such as addicition and demons. now, it just makes me smile for pure punk value.SS: You are also a musician. What inspires you to play music? Do you have any type of process you go through when creating music?GA: i can only answer this question like this: walks, talks.SS: Troma has released a couple of your films. A while back they were supposed to release a box set of your films. What happened with that? Are you a Troma fan?GA: I think they're having distributing and financial problems.no.SS: Do you have any advice for aspiring filmmakers?GA: "be prepared to bleed" -joni mitchellSS: What can we expect from Giuseppe Andrews in the future?GA: alot of films and alot of music. and one big-ass novel.Check out Giuseppe Andrews site

INTERVIEW WITH JOHN R. HAND
INTERVIEW WITH JOHN R. HAND

I recently got an interview with the director of the pseudo-surreal nightmare that is Frankenstein's Bloody Nightmare. SS: Hello, John. I noticed the way you filmed Frankenstein's Bloody Nightmare looked inspired and original. How did you decide how you wanted it to look and feel? JRH: Well I definitely wanted the film to look and sound like it came from another planet. At first I was just going for a kind of vintage or retro vibe because I'd seen some films where all the press kept pushing the whole vintage/retro/seventies angle and I'd just watch these films and I knew these people hadn't seen an issue of Cinemagic, just totally lifeless to me. I mean I'm sure they were fine people and artists but come on, vintage is more than just some grain and endless digital scratches. So part of it was the know-it-all in my thinking I could do better. Then another part of it was my love of films like Begotten, films which exists in another world. So I think a certain set of happy accidents along with my experimental tendencies pushed what started more as a kind of homage to eurohorror into something a little stranger. SS: In the one scene where Victor went to his friends with the formaldehyde, his friend said, "Wait a minute" and I began to count the seconds. It strangely was close to exactly one minute. Was there anything behind that or just a goof? JRH: It wasn't exactly a goof, I mean I purposely directed Billy to just kind of take this very odd pause and let the music play out behind him in order to build a little atmosphere. He also turns the volume down by rotating it clockwise, which usually turns the volume up. Even that still makes sense to me. That was a horrible night man, because I'd spent all day dressing up that room with all kind of texture, character stuff, in-jokes, etc., and there was supposed to be about three or four other actors coming down and giving this very seedy vibe to the whole thing along with these little vignettes which you could see Victor to and kind of help to build his character, but I didn't know these people so I also invited my friend Wade to come along to kind of corral these people that I didn't know. Well that wasn't a problem because none of them showed up and I just basically put Wade in the costume and he played the role. Then I dubbed his voice using the voice of my cameraman Brian, just to give it a strange, otherworldly feel. Wade is also wearing a very large shirt in the scene which was actually a movie prop I bought at an estate sale - it was a shirt that Tyrese wore in 2 Fast, 2 Furious, which someone won from a Starz movie contest or something, at least that's what the certificate of authenticity states. I'm sure they probably had a couple dozen replica shirts so who knows if that exact shirt was used in the film but if you study the shirt it really looks like a movie prop because all the identifying tags and everything have been carefully trimmed off and if you look at some press photos of Tyrese from the film and then watch my movie it's pretty clear that they're the same style shirt. SS: Did you borrow anything traits/habits from yourself to fit the character Victor? JRH: Victor has a few of my character traits in that he's this kind of introverted little guy. He's also incredibly paranoid - throughout the film he's constantly glancing around, wondering if someone's watching him. I don't think we're ever really sure if someone actually is or if these heat video displays are just his internal idea of what the people watching him are seeing. I'm kind of glad you picked up on some of that in your review because it seems like most people can't even get that and I don't even think it's that hard to grasp. Basically the film is this - it's just one guy's descent into madness. I think I'm a little paranoid, I used to be morose, but I think I brought a lot of that paranoid energy to the core of the role and to the core of the film itself.

SS: How did you decide on the origins of the beast? Was he brainwashed of sorts?

JRH: I think many people are little unclear of the who/what the beast is. It's pretty laid out in a very logical way by Victor at the end of the film during his little heatgram monologue but if you read every synopsis or review you find that each critic kind of interprets the plot a little different, which I think is neat, because this is not necessarily a true-blue experimental film - it DOES have a plot, so it's kind of weird that there's this strange leeway in the plot for different interpretations. Some people think the monster is even Victoria. Anyway, my story on this is basically Victor's - he's just some guy that Victor found that he was able to revive and control. I don't think he was really brainwashed per se, but he didn't really have any higher brain functions beyond those sparks of memory which comprise that weird black-and-red experimental film sequence. There's kind of an Astrozombies vibe to the beast, and he was also supposed to have more a presence until that head I built was much too large so I kept cutting him back, also he was supposed play prominently at the end of the film and I cut that all out as well when I found the chemical burn technique for the photos.

SS: Any word on the next project you will do, do you see it being released under Unearthed, and will it be filmed in Super8?

JRH: I'd like to work with Unearthed again but maybe next time I'd have to be under a decent budget. They're always looking to move into production so who knows, stranger things have happened. I really like Super-8 but right now I've just getting my camera and lighting equipment together for this new film I'm making and I'm shooting in HD, 1080p, just because you can't get such quality along with the shots that you can get using these lightweight HD cameras. Basically the camera I've got is about twice the size of my tiny little Chinon Super-8 camera but it's shooting 1080p. It's just incredible to me.

SS: The film is obviously inspired by Frankenstein but I couldn't help but noticing similarities in Buio Omega. Anything behind that?

JRH: I was heavily inspired by that film, which actually for me provided that initial spark to put together thing film. Some people it's Spielberg or Kevin Smith. For me it's Buio Omega. Of course you've got the superficial similarities, like the guy with his girlfriend who dies and then kind of comes back her sisters, other certain elements, but as I said at the beginning I took my initial ideas to such a strange place that it doesn't really resemble Buio Omega anymore. Also, I was interesting in taking that sketch of an idea, the guy with the girl, and then exploring the psychosexual identity of guy - did he really even love this girl, or did she even exist beyond his tangled delusional framework? That's why the whole scene with the guys in the alley has this really strange sexual edge to me, like it's this character confronting his masculinity against the cold blue night - blue, the color of a kind of emotional sleep. My next film's going to be really blue, by the way. I think there were number of additional scenes which could've fleshed Victor out a little more but by the end of the film I had run out of steam and also I was always looking for things to cut out of the film in order to make the film feel a little more vague and internal, not to confuse people but so that some people might even relate to better. Some people, I guess, maybe not everyone, but that's okay.

INTERVIEW WITH JOHN R. HAND

SS: Many thanks for the interview John. Best wishes for your directorial future. Any final words for our readers?

JRH: Well I just hope people like the next film I'm making. That's about it. You know, you say that this film is ripe for a prequel or sequel and I'd like to tell you that I'd love to do a sequel maybe a decade or so later but this time it'd be like an Italian horror film in a castle with my midget friend that I give birth to who hits people with a hammer - he doesn't really kill anyone, he just hits them with the hammer and laughs like a maniac. Check out John R. Hand's debut film FRANKENSTEIN'S BLOODY NIGHTMARE from Uearthed Films.

INTERVIEW WITH JÖRG BUTTGEREIT

Illustration: Rainer Engel

Soiled Sinema is very pleased to bring you an interview with German auteur Jörg Buttgereit of Nekromantik fame. It is not an exaggeration for us at SS to say that Jörg Buttgereit is one of our favorite directors and without groundbreaking filmmakers like him, this website would not exist.

After a 16 year hiatus from feature-length filmmaking, Buttgereit released CAPTAIN BERLIN VS. HITLER. Following in the tradition of German filmmakers like Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, CAPTAIN BERLIN VS. HITLER was shot on a stage-play.

set of Nekromantik (C) Jörg Buttgereit

SS: When I first discovered your work, I was amazed by your keen ability to successfully combine sex and death in an artistic manner whilst still maintaining a sense of humor. Personally, I think you're a modern auteur coming from a rich tradition of German cinema. Believe it or not, your films (especially Nekromantik) remind of the great silent German expressionist masterpieces, in their ability to hypnotize and transport the viewer to a transcendent world of the macabre. When I watch a German film like Run Lola Run, it seems like the same film could have been made in Hollywood or France. Do you see yourself as a culturally German filmmaker (to any degree), influenced by your native land and culture? Was your own style of filmmaking influenced by German filmmakers of the past, whether it be the German expressionists or German New Wave or any other German film movement/genre?

JB: Its hard to judge your own influence. I think it is quite normal to check out your own limits when you are young. That is why Horror-movies are so appealing to younger people. But NEKROMANTIK was also a protest against the strict censorship movement in Germany. During the 80s all Horror films were cut or banned in Germany and we were fighting for our right to get those movies uncensored in our country. Adults should decide on their own what they want to see and what not. Censorship can't prevent people from seeing what they want anyway. It's an old fashioned concept that does not work anymore. I was not so much influenced by other movies. Real live Horror was always more disturbing to me. I think it is important for my films that they are shot on actual film stock. The grainy 16mm and Super 8 film stock definitely works for the atmosphere of the films. We did a lot of screen-tests with the prop of the corpse before choosing the right film stock for NEKROMANTIK. It was very important to me to have a believable atmosphere for my story.

(C) Jörg Buttgereit

SS: In an interview featured in the book Sex, Murder, Art: The Films of Joerg Buttgereit, you mentioned that German audiences are not too fond of German films/filmmakers unless the directors are dead (like Fassbinder) or the films are praised by international critics. Why do you think Germans react this way to films created by their fellow countrymen? Over the years, has your popularity and status as a filmmaker increased in Germany? Do you have a strong and loyal German fan base?

INTERVIEW WITH JÖRG BUTTGEREIT

JB: I do have a fan base in Germany that follows my work in Radio Plays, acting and all the books and film reviews I do. That part of my work that is invisible to my fans outside of Germany 'cause its all in German language. Over here I am more known as a maker of Stage-plays and radio-plays.

SS: I know that you traveled to Japan to write an extensive book on Japanese Monster films. Do you have plans for writing more books in the future, whether it be on film or otherwise?

JB: I am more involved in new projects for the stage which is very exciting to me.

(C) Jörg Buttgerreit

SS: You originally introduced Captain Berlin in a short of the same name in 1982. In 2009, you released CAPTAIN BERLIN VS. HITLER. How did the creative process come about for CAPTAIN BERLIN VS. HITLER? Were you always planning to do a feature-length film about the adventures of Captain Berlin? Do you have plans for any new Captain Berlin films in the future?

JB: I think the fun of CAPTAIN BERLIN VERSUS HITLER is the fact that it is a stage-play that was filmed for a DVD release. The plot goes like this: Adolf Hitler's brain has survived. The crazy Nazi-doctor Ilse von Blitzen hires the master of life and death: Dracula himself. He is supposed to resuscitate Teutonic human material with his bite. The reward that has been chosen is the virgin Maria – Captain Berlin's daughter. Superhero Captain Berlin now has to confront these two monsters. Since the 1940s he wants to eliminate Hitler, but now he first has to save his daughter from the vampire. I documented the play on video and made a film out of it. Its a mix between film and stage-play and it is available on DVD with English subtitles from the German distributor "media target". Extras include my old Super 8 shorts "Captain Berlin" + "Captain Berlin vs Hyxar", a backstage report, a film about the world premiere, a photo gallery and a comic based on the film. The DVD is region-free. The film looks a little bit like one of those crazy Mexican wrestler movies. I really can't think of getting money for a real feature film with Captain Berlin. But who knows...

SS: Was there any controversy in Germany when you released CAPTAIN BERLIN VS. HITLER regarding Adolf Hitler (despite obviously being negatively portrayed)? Additionally, did anyone in Germany criticize the Nazi-exploitation parody in Der Todesking, the Hitler Youth outfit worn by Monika in Schramm, or your early short BLOODY EXCESS IN THE LEADERS BUNKER?

JB: There was no real controversy about me dealing with Hitler. If you do something on stage in Germany it is labeled as art and you are free to express yourself. Regarding my films, the depiction of violence was more difficult to deal with.

SS: I have read past interviews where you spoke about the possibility of a third Nekromantik film? Will there be a Nekromantik trilogy? Also, do you have any other film projects planned for the future that we can anticipate?

JB: You have to keep in mind that because of censorship restrictions my films are still only legally available in a handful of countries. I don't see how to get my money back for an independent film like NEKROMANTIK nowadays. If I would do a part 3 it would be all over the internet the day after a DVD release. Bootlegs and illegal downloads have made it impossible for me to do independent films like I did in the 1980s.

(C) Jörg Buttgereit

For more info on Jörg Buttgereit visit his official website

Nekromantik II: Return of the Loving Dead (C) Jörg Buttgereit

INTERVIEW WITH LUCIFER VALENTINE
INTERVIEW WITH LUCIFER VALENTINE

Lucifer Valentine is no doubt a talented director. Regardless if you're a fan of his works or not, he is competent and skilled in what he makes; VOMIT GORE. A new genre of terror which uses bodily fluids in a perverse and Satanic manner. His first film Slaughtered Vomit Dolls rocked the underground horror movement and now his second film (Available to download for free on <http://regoregitatedsacrifice.com/>) ReGOREgitated Sacrifice continues the reverberations.

SS: Hello Dr. Valentine. Many people know you as the relentless marketing man who promotes your "VOMIT GORE" films - Slaughtered Vomit Dolls and your new film - ReGOREgitated Sacrifice. Care to tell our "virgins" about these films and your intentions?

LV: Sure, I created a film genre called Vomit Gore and I am making a Vomit Gore Trilogy; Slaughtered Vomit Dolls is the first movie in the Trilogy and ReGOREgitated Sacrifice is the second ! Vomit Gore came into existence because I am an Emetophile (which means I am sexually attracted to Vomit or Vomiting) and because I wanted to create a personal artistic venue for myself in which I can make any kind of movie I want exactly how I want !

SS: Both of your films reflect your own beliefs in Satanism, correct? And could you describe your beliefs? Did you make one of these sacred pacts that these women make?

LV: There's a quote on my Myspace that I wrote that sums up my belief in Satanism, which is the following: "To me Satan means whatever people can't fathom or understand; the Unknown, whatever breaks the commonplace and predictable mental patterns of conventional thought and experience; Satan represents the opposite of people's fears, weakness, and crushing self-doubt about their world and the entire Universe." My parents are Satanists and I was raised with their beliefs instilled in me throughout my formative years; and, I think in my movies it is sometimes apparent that the movie was made by a Satanist, but that's just my personal characteristics naturally coming out through the artistic process and it's not necessarily important to me that my movies seem Satanic. Ironically, in Slaughtered Vomit Dolls (SVD) and ReGOREgitated Sacrifice (RS), the two "Satanic Pact" scenes are prime examples of me, an actual Satanist, interpreting what non-satanists think Satanism is ! So for example, in SVD, when Angela/Ameara makes her Pact with the Devil, that is my interpretation showing the mythological notion, based on what I saw in the "Satanic Panic" episodes of the Geraldo Rivera talk show from the 1980's, of a teenager making a pact with Satan and giving her life and soul to him. It's ironic to me because that scene with Angela is a pure fear image conjured and realized by non-satanist parents, Christians mostly, to give themselves the comfort of hatred and ignorance toward something they do not understand, thereby actually creating a self-fulfilling prophesy of teenage rebellion by making dark realms like Satanism a taboo to be sought out by their children. In ReGOREgitated Sacrifice, the "Whore" character is forced by a serial killer to recite a Satanic Pact to do with his obsession of destroying beauty. Again this is not necessarily my idea of real Satanism as I know it, but it is my interpretation of how some serial killers take on a very distorted view of Satanism as a justification premise to allow themselves mental leeway, if you will, to commit various acts of violence and murder.SS: I understand you were born and raised in South Africa. How did you get along with your community? Did you hide your beliefs and fetishes from the public?LV: No. My family did not hide our beliefs from anyone, and we had a lot of great friends in the small fishing village of Arniston. My parents were quite well-respected in the community and people found them to be quite interesting because they were terrestrial invertebrate researchers (they studied bugs) and often they'd show our neighbors strange and rare bugs they had collected for study. My parents are scholars and very serious professionals so they didn't walk around in black robes conducting the Black Mass in our backyard or anything like that; but if anyone asked, or the subject of spiritual beliefs came up in conversation, my parents would never shy away or pretend to be something they are not in order to not scare someone, they are proud to be Satanic.My parents did travel quite extensively throughout their careers and so I was in charge of raising my nearly blind little sister Cinderella who had ASD (Autistic Spectrum Disorders), with the supervision of a nanny/nurse, and so I didn't really have time to notice or even care about what people thought of me or my beliefs, I was completely consumed in the well-being of Cinderella.SS: I'm sure you've answered this one a million times, but is your birth name Lucifer Valentine? And if so, I'm extremely curious to hear your middle name!LV: Lucifer Valentine is the name I gave to my character in Slaughtered Vomit Dolls as Angela/Ameara's childhood imaginary friend; Lucifer Valentine is the projected manifested image from the archetype of the neglected, traumatized, abused and exploited teenage runaway stripper-turned prostitute-turned hardcore porn star. The idea of Lucifer Valentine is that as Angela Aberdeen is disassociating from herself and her body as a child due to her physical/mental/sexual abuse from everyone who ever was in a position to take care of her, she begins the fragmented process of compartmentalization of her feelings and begins to create alternate selves and personalities to displace and deal with her feelings of profound sadness and trauma; the first personality Angela created was the closest to her, an imaginary best friend/confessor/father figure/dominator/confidant: LUCIFER VALENTINE.SS: Do the surreal elements in ReGOREgitated Sacrifice come from your dreams or some cerebral exercise?LV: The surreal scenes in RS come from the process of weaving the story of Angela unconsciously and recognizing when ideas and elements rise to the surface of my conscious mind to be collected and represented on camera. I'll have basic signposts or landmarks in my mind about a movie, like RS for example, of scenes or major ideas that I want to elaborate on, and I'll make notes of the main ideas knowing that my unconscious mind will "fill in the blanks", connecting the dots, if you will, over the course of making the movie. I don't always know or understand what everything means in totality when I'm making a movie, but I always trust my instincts and my kinds of movies are very intuitive that way where I have to oftentimes go with the flow of what feels good and pay no mind at all to anything logical as I feel that does not apply to me at all.

INTERVIEW WITH LUCIFER VALENTINE

SS: What on your thoughts on Ipecac? I have several bottles. How should I use these (If I do)?

LV: Well Ipecac is a great record label owned by Mike Patton !! I've never actually used the Vomit-inducing liquid, I prefer to ram my cock down girls' throats to make them puke.

SS: The editing in your films is very hyper-kinetic and vibrant. Approximately how long does post-production take for one of your films?

LV: Usually about six months.

SS: In several scenes, I noticed you liked to focus the camera directly under the vomiting person or persons. Did any get on you? Did you do this so you can work and be pleased at the same time?

LV: Ha ha, well I really love getting shots of Vomit coming right at the camera and seeming to hit the lens of the camera. I love these Vomit-cam shots and it does turn me on, but I don't quite get the same sexual charge from it as I would normally when I'd be fucking a girl and she'd puke right on me, but it's still nice !

SS: I recently discovered about the untimely death of your sibling Cinderella. It's very heart-breaking and unfortunate. Care to talk about it?

LV: Cinderella took her own life New year's Eve 2006; she drown herself in a bath tub after overdosing on various prescription drugs. Cinderella and I had an incest relationship for many years and, understandably, she was very possessive of me as I was the only person she had ever been with sexually and I had become the absolute center of her Universe as her caretaker and best friend throughout her life. I had mentioned to Cinderella that I thought the scene in SVD in which Angela/Ameara drowns herself was one of the most beautiful scenes I've ever done and she got very upset and was crying uncontrollably and said that she wanted to be the only beautiful thing in my life so she would drown herself just like Ameara did so I'd love her more. Cinderella demonstrated this drowning for me many times and I videotaped it and used one version of it in RS at the end in black and white footage connecting the drowning of Angela and the archetype of "Angela" in a broader sense. I found my sister's body floating in a bath tub from drowning herself New Year's day 2007; I didn't think she would ever do this for real because I didn't think she'd ever want to be separated physically from me in this world, but it's complicated and she was mentally unstable so I've had to accept this reality over the course of many painful months. I love my sister more anything in the world and I am eternally horrified at the loss of her life in this form of reality but we are still together forever in multitudes of other realms so our relationship doesn't ever really "end" for me in that sense, I just don't get to actually have her sitting here in my lap like she normally would like a cat while I do these interviews.

SS: How old were you when you two first made love?

LV: YOUNG.

SS: What ever happened to your parents?

LV: I actually have a legal agreement with my parents to not discuss them, except for basic agreed upon details such as the things I've already described here, in the press for many reasons, obviously not everyone in this world is as open-minded about Satanism and incest as I am, and my parents simply don't want to be hassled by the rest of the world so I definitely respect that.SS: Does Ameara know about Cinderella's reason for taking her life, and if so, does she feel horrible? I can imagine that weighing heavy on ones shoulders.LV: Yes Ameara knows all about Cinderella's passing, she was horrified and saddened, she always loved Cinderella and never wanted there to be any jealousy; Ameara and I have always been great friends and have worked together for many years since we were in a relationship and she thought Cinderella was so cool and brilliant, but, me and Ameara have both seen a lot of Death in our lives so we are sadly well-equipped to deal with it.SS: Since Cinderella could only see shadows, did you ever think about using this element in a horrific sense? Maybe make a shadow vomit film next?LV: Interesting idea, I'll likely make a movie more specific to her at some time so we'll "see" . . .SS: Only one more film till the VOMIT GORE trilogy is done. What do you plan on doing after that? Continue filming I hope. Vomit Comedy? Better yet, Vomedy?LV: Ha ha well I've already shot two non-Vomit Gore films: A PERFECT CHILD OF SATAN, which is about Date Rape, and BLACK METAL VEINS, which is a documentary about heroine addiction; I am very very excited to release these two films and they are definitely at the top of my list !!SS: Anything you'd like to say to our readers at this point. Anything?LV: I'd like to say THANKS to everyone for their interest in me and my movies !! I really appreciate it and THANKS to you for this interview !!

INTERVIEW WITH MAGISTER JAMES D. SASS
INTERVIEW WITH MAGISTER JAMES D. SASS

Fascist, Satanist, Occultist, Antiquarian, Bibliomaniac, Autodidact, Teetotaler, AntiCommunist, AntiLiberal, Dissident Right Wing Political & Social Critic, Social Darwinist, Weaponer, Experimental Noise/Musician, Film Buff, Amateur Philosopher and Historian. Born in 1965. Affiliated with the Church of Satan in 1992. Appointed to the Priesthood of the Church of Satan by Dr. Anton Szandor LaVey in 1996. Appointed to the degree of Magister in the Church of Satan by High Priest Peter H. Gilmore in 2005. Author of Essays in Satanism, the afterword to the Underworld Amusments edition of H.L. Mencken's translation of The Anti-Christ by Friedrich Nietzsche. Other works in progress.

SS: In the most general terms, what makes a film Satanic?

JDS: A film is "Satanic" insofar as it deals with themes of Satanism, such as productive alienation, stratification, nonconformity, total environments, artificial human companions, justice, revenge, incursions of the irrational, misanthropy, etc. in a productive or insightful manner that frequently paints the outsider-antihero in a sympathetic light (intentionally or not) in contrast with the bland mediocre conformists. Aesthetics are also a huge part of what makes a film "Satanic." A film such as The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari would still be "Satanic" to some degree if it were an entirely different story using the same aesthetics and psychological devices in sets (The Law of the Trapezoid), photography (The Command to Look), editing and whatnot.

Another thing I would point out, although it digresses from your question, more than how Satanism features in films, I think it is interesting to observe how film features in Satanism as a legitimate recognized religion. I cannot think of any other religion that considers a body of film work as a primary source or example of its doctrine, aesthetics, and ideals. This is one of the truly unique aspects of Satanism. Other religions have music and art, I can't think of any that have films they regard as centrally related to their religion as does the Church of Satan.

SS: Can a Satanic film come from any genre? Are there certain genres that feature Satanic films more prevalently? If so, which genres?

JDS: Yes, I cannot think of a genre that would be incapable of fitting a Satanic film within its parameters. Skimming over the "official" Church of Satan film list we see everything from horror and gangster films to comedies, musicals, and children's cartoons. Of course for obvious reasons Film Noir and classic Horror feature Satanic themes more explicitly, because they are based in the "dark side" of human nature, or depict man as "just another animal... worse than those that go on all fours," and frequently center around themes of obsession, justice, and revenge.

SS: Would you describe the post-World War I German expressionist movement as Satanic?

JDS: Personally, I cannot think of one German expressionist without some type of Satanic theme in it.

Most definitely, and this is explicitly stated by Dr. LaVey in more than one place in his writings, especially pertaining to the Law of the Trapezoid. It is also important to note how much of this was intentional on the part of the film makers, directors, and art directors of these films. Even later films by the same people made in the USA follow the same line of thought. F.W. Murnau's Sunrise for example is outwardly a simple love story with a happy ending, yet there are Satanic undercurrents in the story, and the aesthetics are extremely Satanic.

SS: Many of the filmmakers and actors that were involved in making low budget Hollywood film noir films immigrated from Germany and Austria to the United States. Many (if not the majority) of these filmmakers were German expressionists. Do you believe that these European directors helped to bring a Satanic element to American films that was lacking before?

JDS: Of course! This is all well-documented. The influence of German expressionist ideas on Universal Classics such as Dracula, Frankenstein, The Wolf Man, and a slew of others is indisputable. The German expressionists coined the aesthetic that would define Film Noir and Horror. The films of Carl Lemele, James Whale, Val Lewton, Howard Hawkes, etc. are all saturated with the expressionist aesthetic.

SS: In your book Essays in Satanism, you make no lie about the fact that you're a horror film connoisseur. Were horror films an early obsession of yours?

JDS: I cannot over-emphasize how strongly horror films were an early obsession of mine. My mother still has drawings I made when I was four years old of Frankenstein, Dracula, the two-headed man, and others. I lived for this stuff. I was in second grade when I watched my first Creature Feature episode, and never missed it until it went off the air some ten years later. I also had a huge collection of Famous Monsters of Filmland from before I could read because I liked the pictures. I was very much a "Monster Kid" of the 70s.

SS: In Essays in Satanism, you talk about how younger horror fans just cannot appreciate the genius of the Satanic themes featured in older films. Do you believe there is any hope for these sad individuals?

JDS: Probably not – I have no idea what is wrong with someone who still cannot tell the difference when they have seen the classics, or who dismiss them as "slow" or "boring." Don't get me wrong, I'm a huge fan of John Carpenter, Wes Craven, and a lot of the "post-classic" horror films, I just get disgusted with people who can't appreciate something like The Ghoul, while at the same time praise some filmic atrocity like Coppola's Bram Stoker's Dracula, or worse, some mindless schlock like the Friday the 13th sequels. I appreciate the humor element in horror, this is even present in classics such as Bride of Frankenstein and The Old Dark House, but when it becomes the dominant element in the genre something has been lost. Then on the flipside there are films that take themselves too seriously, trying to be hard-edged horror, and fall face-down. It is also appalling that there are so many dumb kids stumbling around who have seen all the bad remakes of films like The Texas Chainsaw Massacre, Psycho, House of Wax, and think they are somehow in touch with the “tradition” without ever having seen the originals. Or worse, they think the remakes are better! There is no hope for them.

INTERVIEW WITH MAGISTER JAMES D. SASS

SS: Is Rosemary’s Baby the definitive Satanic film? What are your personal thoughts on the film?

JDS: The gathering of eccentric Satanists at the end could literally have been home movies of a Church of Satan event, in terms of the cast of personalities involved. Compare it for instance with the Church of Satan individuals interviewed in Satanis. Really not far off the mark!

SS: The good doctor Anton LaVey has been said to have given new life to old and forgotten films like Tod Browning’s Freaks. Can you tell us anymore about LaVey’s endorsement of films that would probably otherwise have been forgotten?

JDS: It’s funny because there are so many films that are still forgotten even after Dr. LaVey’s endorsement! Even within the Church of Satan, the individuals who have systematically worked their way through the recommended film lists are few and far between. I can think of just a handful of people who have actually watched The Boy With Green Hair. As far as keeping some films alive: Just about anyone I’ve met who has seen The Ruling Class heard about it from Church of Satan sources, likewise Night of the Generals and a handful of others. There are others that until recently were very hard to come by, including Island of Lost Souls, Svengali, The Most Dangerous Game, etc.

SS: What are your thoughts on Kenneth Anger and his filmography? I was personally happy to see Anton LaVey’s appearance in Kenneth Anger’s Invocation of my Demon Brother. Is he (or was he ever) a member of the Church of Satan?

JDS: I’m a huge Kenneth Anger fan. I was very pleased to see his collected films finally released on DVD with the supplementary material they deserved. Anger had been something of a secret influence on so many film makers, more than suspected by most fans attracted to his work because of occult connotations. It is impossible not to see signs of Scorpio Rising in the work of Lynch, or the influence of Kustom Kar Kommandos on specific scenes in Scorsese’s Goodfellas.

Kenneth Anger and Anton LaVey were personal friends since childhood. In spite of false reports in some gossipy journalism, Anger has to my knowledge never uttered a negative word about Dr. LaVey. Somewhere in The Devil’s Notebook, I think LaVey refers to Anger as a “magus”, although I’m sure he meant it in the sense of being a magician and master of his art rather than as the technical title of a degree within the Church of Satan, although I'm also fairly certain Anger was an honorary member, even though his interests rant more toward Aleister Crowley, which has little or nothing to do with Satanism. But on that note I would add that Anger has, from my perspective anyway, done more than anyone to present the symbolism of Crowley's work in an aesthetically interesting and "magically charged" way.

SS: In your book Essays in Satanism, you have listed 200 Essential horror films. I must admit that I have yet to see another list of horror films with such refined and eclectic taste. It is not everyday that you find someone that is a fan of both Der Golem (1915) and Clean, Shaven (1993). That being said, could you narrow down a list to your top 5 essential films and why a serious horror fan should see these particular films?

JDS: Narrowing it down to a list of five would be nearly impossible. The five I would list today might not be identical to the five I would list tomorrow.

1. Nosferatu
2. Frankenstein
3. Dracula
4. Freaks

Like I said, restricting it to five is impossible, conceptually, and forces it to be a very flawed list.

SS: On your 200 Essential horror films list you have David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), Twin Peaks: Fire Walk With Me (1992), and Mulholland Dr. (2001) listed. What are your thoughts on David Lynch as an American filmmaker and his unconventional cinematic portraits of America? Do you believe that David Lynch is someone that is primarily interested in Satanic themes?

JDS: You are the only person to catch that. I put Lynch on the list because, while he is not exactly a "horror" filmmaker, he incorporates horrific elements and genuinely terrifying manifestations of the supernatural or irrational in a way most contemporary horror filmmakers could stand to learn a lot from. Without being a horror filmmaker, he does horror better than most horror film makers. He also orchestrates a genuinely disturbing atmosphere, whereas most contemporary horror filmmakers would have to look up "atmosphere" in a dictionary and probably still be at a loss how to incorporate it into film. That is a huge disjunct between guys now and the old classics. Lynch also deals with psychological themes, intrusion of the irrational, and compulsions that make him of Satanic interest for the same reasons that makes someone like Alfred Hitchcock a categorically Satanic filmmaker, and Hitchcock similarly was better at "horror" than most horror filmmakers, without being a horror filmmaker himself. He and Lynch share a visceral understanding of the monstrousness in human nature, even though their overt "shock tactics" are dissimilar.

Of the Lynch films included on my list, Fire Walk With Me was hated by critics, and Mulholland Dr. is hated by most Lynch fans I know. Both contain the best examples of Lynch's effective use of horrific imagery, and I'm continually impressed by the way he depicts the intrusion of the irrational or supernatural into normal consciousness. The burned-witch episode in Mulholland Dr. stands out as one of the most horrific moments in film that I can think of. I had a friend who had nightmares about that after I reminded him of it, and he hadn't seen the film in years. I get the feeling Lynch incorporates nightmare material from his personal unconscious into his art in a manner similar to H.P. Lovecraft, his work is more authentic because of it, even if only those elements. I would add Inland Empire alongside Mulholland Dr. for the same reasons. I am the only person I know who has anything good to say about Inland Empire, but it hinges on these same themes, and has some of Lynch's strongest material along these lines. The film is entirely self-indulgent, and his most irrational film, which is why most people detest it or can't follow it, and also why I liked it.

INTERVIEW WITH MAGISTER JAMES D. SASS

SS: As someone that owns over 30,000 books, you're obviously a bibliophile. About how many of these books are on cinema? Do you have any favorite books or authors(or critics) that are dedicated to the art of cinema? Better yet, are there any certain film critics/authors that you hate?

JDS: I have surprisingly few books on film, probably less than 100 and I haven't read most of them. I will mention one book, American Movie Critics: An Anthology from the Silents Until Now, edited by Philip Lopate and published by The Library of America, that is a fantastic collection of film writing, including such unlikely things as a review of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari by Carl Sandburg.

SS: About how many films (in any format) do you own? Is your film collection anywhere near the size of your book collection?

JDS: I really have no idea how many films I own or have owned in my personal collection, probably 1000 or more, which isn't very many. I probably have thirty times that many books.

SS: What are your thoughts on the future of cinema? Do you see any parallels between the decline of the west and film as an art form?

JDS: The future of cinema holds a lot of potential, especially considering the advances made in digital technology, the quality of digital filmmaking and editing is continually improving and becoming more affordable. The more ability placed in the hands of filmmakers without having to go through the suppressive distortion of the studio system, or the marketing system. I suspect even more creative filmmakers will develop their own cottage industry marketing their own work through the internet. At least I hope so.

SS: Can you mention a couple mandatory films for those interested in Satanism, The Church of Satan, and Anton LaVey? Why are these films essential viewing?

JDS: The two documentaries about the Church of Satan, Satanis and Speak of the Devil! would be at the top of the list, followed by the cream of the Church of Satan film-list in terms of exerting the most overt influence on the Satanic philosophy, or embodying it; The Black Cat, The Seventh Victim, Freaks, The Most Dangerous Game, The Sea Wolf etc. Really it is hard to narrow it down from the CoS film list because they are all relevant in some way. The two abovementioned documentaries are essential for being the story straight from the horse's mouth so to speak. Edward G. Robinson's portrayal of Wolf Larson in The Sea Wolf is probably the most quintessentially Satanic character in film or literature. Once someone gets a grasp of what authentic Satanism is about, you start noticing Satanic themes and characters in various places and films – usually there is one character that will stand out in almost any film as being more “Satanic” than the others, although I'm sure there are mainstream “feel-good” films, or comedies lambasting average mopes, that feature NO Satanic characters but are still “Satanically” relevant films for the way they treat normal people.

SS: Are you planning any future projects related to film? I know that I am sure as hell interested in reading a book on cinema and/or a film directed by Magister James D. Sass.

JDS: Actually, just because you mentioned it, I gathered together everything I've written so far into one document and it is already over a hundred pages, so the answer is yes, I probably will put out a collection of film writing when I have enough material. You will be to blame!

INTERVIEW WITH MANFRED O. JELINSKI
INTERVIEW WITH MANFRED O. JELINSKI

Nekromantik II: Return of the Loving Dead (C) Jörg Buttgereit

Manfred O. Jelinski is best known in the horror cinema world for his collaborations with German auteur director Jörg Buttgereit. Jelinski was the producer behind Nekromantik, Der Todesking, Nekromantik II: Return of the Loving Dead, and Schramm. Jelinski also worked as a cinematographer, editor, and even as an actor during his collaborations with Buttgereit. Soiled Sinema is very pleased to bring you this interview with Manfred O. Jelinski.

SS: How did your filmmaking partnership/collaboration come about with Jörg Buttgereit? Did you know Buttgereit before you first collaborated with him on the original Nekromantik film?

MJ: Uwe Bohrer and I had a company for Film Service since the late seventies. We designed a way of filmmaking on a nearly no budget basis. After we had everything under control, we looked out for a potential director. Jörg Buttgereit was a customer who needed film copies from us. I noticed he had potential and I liked his films, so I asked him to make a film. It turned out very well.

(C) Jörg Buttgereit

SS: What is your favorite film that you worked with Buttgereit on? Why that particular film?

MJ: I like Schramm very much. Everything came easy. Watch the making of Schramm. We had developed a deep understanding of filmmaking by the time we made Schramm. Most problems we had were with Nekromantik: At the set, with the editing, with every part. But it was fun in the end to see it all come together. Actually, none of the films were a problem. Each one gave me new inspiration. Each one was special.

SS: Nekromantik II was the first film seized in Germany since the Nazi era. What kind of trouble did you get into with Nekromantik II? Is the film still banned in Germany today?

MJ: We were accused, but won in the end. So it was never really banned but it always sounds fine for advertisement. But we had to work about a year to make the film... illegally. It's difficult to explain, needs more space. We had spread the material, negatives, prints among six of our friends, a hidden flat etc. Man, what a time!

(C) Jörg Buttgereit

SS: Personally, the films you created with Buttgereit remind me of German expressionist films due to their dark, yet powerful expressive aesthetic. Are you a fan of German expressionist films from directors to F.W. Murnau, Fritz Lang, Robert Wiene, etc.?

MJ: No. Not really. I like Murnau and Lang as heroes of their time and expression. But I always tried not to copy someone's style.

SS: Are there any horror films from the so called "German New Wave" movement that inspired you and/or that you liked? For example, did Lommel's "The Tenderness of Wolves" (which was a loose remake of Fritz Lang's "M") inspire you?

MJ: No. Same reason as above. I avoided seeing too many films. They leave too big of an impression on the brain. To admire someone doesn't mean to copy him. Each film needs its own unique design.

(C) Manfred O. Jelinski

SS: Besides producing films, you have also directed a couple films. Can you tell us about the short "mein Schones Husum" and the documentary "So war das S.O.36?" Are these films currently available with English subtitles?

MJ: No. Husum is a short which shows a local city in an unconventional light. SO36 is about German Punk Music, stuff that no one would be interested in seeing outside of Germany.

SS: You were the cinematographer behind the beautifully shot films Der Todesskipping, Nekromantik II, and Schramm. Did any particular cinematographers inspire your style of filmmaking?

MJ: Not really. I tried to avoid it. I love Antonioni, Kubrick and Polanski (and Russ Meyer). But for low budget films you need different concepts. You have different materials of stock, less light, people to handle and so on. You cannot stylize low-budget films in a way similar to Hollywood.

(C) Jörg Buttgerit

SS: Are there any particular German filmmakers from the past that you admire? Aside from German filmmakers, do you have any other favorite filmmakers (from around the world)?

MJ: Well, I don't know. If I really grab inside my mind, I would say, I admire Wenzel Storch. He is outstanding and lovingly crazy.

SS: Would you like to create a third Nekromantik film with Buttgerit? Also, do you hope to work with Buttgerit on new films in the future?

MJ: Well, we talked about it. All the actors and other people that have survived would love it. In fact, that is not the point which drives a decision. We are not sure if it will work ... in many ways. On the other hand, I would not be able to split from my family for long because I have two very little children. (But "Yes!", said my wife.)

(C) Jörg Buttgerit

SS: I noticed that you sell Spanish director Nacho Cerda's 1994 film "Aftermath" on your site "Jelinski & Buttgerit." Are you a fan of "Aftermath?" Are you friends with Cerda?

MJ: We shot the interview with Jörg at my house in North Frisia. Nacho is a nice guy, really. We had fun.

SS: Are there any contemporary German horror films/film directors that you can recommend?

MJ: No. Ask Jörg, he is more into that. I don't like "horror", it has limited dimensions.

INTERVIEW WITH MANFRED O. JELINSKI

Nekromantik (C) Jörg Buttgerit

SS: Do you have any upcoming film projects in the works?

MJ: I'm writing books now. Very different stuff. Remote Viewing and Quantum physics. Scientific stuff and novels. As for my novels, people say you can read them like films. Whatever that means.

For more info on Jelinski and Buttgerit, check out: Jelinski & Buttgerit

INTERVIEW WITH MARK COLEGROVE

Mark Colegrove is a low budget filmmaker who has found himself a niche. Obviously a film junkie, Colegrove has taken Italian horror influences of the late 1970's and early 1980s and made them into hilarious parodies. It is rare to find a low budget filmmaker who is actually doing something interesting. Any filmmaker that brings cannibal castration back can't be bad.

SS: Isle of the Damned is your upcoming film. Is it a sequel of sorts to Pleasures of the Damned?MC: Yeah, it's a direct sequel featuring the further adventures of private investigator Jack Steele from "Pleasures." Although this time do to scheduling conflicts, he's played by a different actor (Larry Gamber in this film). I figure if Batman can be played by a different actor in each film, surely we can get away with it in our cheap garbage movie! We've changed the setting this time around, and dropped Jack off on a cannibal island, so "Isle" is designed to be a parody of the Italian cannibal films of the late 70s, early 80s. Mark Leake, who wrote the script, is looking to spoof a niche genre within Italian horror with each of the "Damned" films. If we get around to doing a 3rd one, it'll be more of a mid-eighties thing along the lines of "Demons."

SS: Your films seem to be heavily influenced and inspired by Italian exploitations of the late 1970's and early 1980s. What made you to decide to do this?MC: It's a time period where filmmakers were able to get away with a lot more in terms of sleaze. Also, since the majority of films from that time period (with a few notable exceptions) are generally pretty bad and cheesy, it's ripe for parody. Also, I think those types of films hold a special place in the hearts of everyone involved with the flick.SS: Being a low budget filmmaker, you don't have access to as much time and money as say Michael Bay. What is your creative process? Do you film when you're able to secure funds?MC: We generally go from paycheck to paycheck to fund these things. All the money was put up by myself and Mark Leake, with no outside funding. That's something that we'd like to change down the road, because actually having a real budget to pay our cast and crew would enable us to shoot for a month solid, rather than just on the weekends over a year and a half. What we've done on Isle probably could have been done in a month if scheduling wasn't such a nightmare.SS: What filmmakers have inspired you as a director?MC: I'm a huge Peter Jackson fan... particularly to see his humble beginnings making "Bad Taste," which was shot over a period of 4 years on his own money, on the weekends, with his friends. That's what we're doing (although I might hang myself if it got stretched out over 4 years), but that's pretty inspiring. It's the same thing with Eraserhead, or the first Evil Dead film. I also grew up watching the Star Wars films, John Woo (his Hong Kong stuff). I volunteered with Troma for a few gigs, and was able to learn a lot from Lloyd Kaufman, by seeing first hand how they operate. I'm also just really inspired by my friends who are getting out there and making stuff on micro-budgets, like Doug Sakmann (Punk Rock Holocaust), Alvin Ecarma (Lethal Force), Ryan Graham (Livelihood), and other local guys like Dave Kratz (who is shooting Isle with us), Armando Valle, Sillicon, and Better Hollywood Productions. SS: Pleasures of the Damned featured many American taboos. Do you consider yourself a fighter of political correctness? MC: Well the films we're spoofing are sleazy, so it was done more out of parody... we're not out looking to offend anyone, and hopefully the goofy execution of the script for Pleasures and Isle shows that everything is done as a goof. Obviously the films are not for everyone, but the folks that enjoy that little niche of Grindhouse style stuff usually enjoy it. SS: Are your films meant to be watched while intoxicated? MC: It probably helps... Pleasures was designed to be a film where the audience can provide their own running commentary along the lines of MST3K. SS: What advice do you have for aspiring independent filmmakers? MC: Get out there and make something! You'll learn way more by "doing" than you will from a textbook. Also, I always hear people talking about waiting for investors so they can do their dream project, and then it never gets made... it's all talk. Just do it... figure out a way around your budget limitations. Keep your locations easy to access and your actors down to just a few. It only takes one dude to call up and cancel, and then you have to call 10 other folks to tell them the shoot's off. Also, just watch a lot of movies... not just the "good" ones. See what works and what doesn't. Go to film fests, and watch other micro-budget stuff. Network with other filmmakers in your area. Don't set out to make a "Hollywood" movie because if someone's given the option between watching "The Omen" or your cheesy $1000 knock off, they're gonna pick "The Omen." You should revel in the fact that you have the opportunity to do something different, since you're in total control.

INTERVIEW WITH MARK COLEGROVE

SS: When can we expect Isle of the Damned to be finished? MC: We should be finished shooting in September, and then we've got a lot of editing and sound design work to do (also low budget filmmakers should remember that sound is half of your picture, it's not just about the visual), so hopefully end of '07 or early '08. I'll keep you posted, so long as I don't hang myself first!

Dire Wit Films Website

Isle of the Damned Trailer

INTERVIEW WITH NICO B.

Nico B. is the renowned director of the experimental cult film PIG. This macabre masterpiece was a collaboration between Nico B. and the legendary Christian Death front man Rozz Williams. Nico B. is also the founder and owner of the film distribution company CULT EPICS which has released PIG, VIVA LA MUERTE, IN A GLASS CAGE and a variety of other subversive masterpieces. Shortly after PIG was finished, Christian Death's Rozz Williams took his own life. "All truth is parallel" -Rozz Williams SS: Nico B, you're originally from Holland. What made you decide to move to the United States?

NB: I was living at the time with Gitane Demone (of Christian Death) in Holland and she suggested the move as she wanted to pursue her career further in the states. I liked the idea as I could concentrate on making some films I had been thinking about.

SS: Were you involved with film in the Netherlands?

NB: When I was in my early 20's I went to film school. My teacher, who was a Buddhist, and former lover of Abel Ferrara and Bob Dylan, became a good friend of mine. She gave me the crucial advice after finishing my first short film to make money first and then make films. She said nobody was gonna finance my films as my ideas were too radical, so I started the idea of Cult Video, distributing cult films on video by mail order. Shortly afterwards I opened a few stores in Holland and started my film company Cult Epics which distributed unreleased rare Cult films like Bettie Page and Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer films. I still run the company to this day, but now only in the US and Canada.

SS: How did you meet the late and great Rozz Williams?

NB: I saw Rozz play when I was 18 (we were the same age). I didn't meet him at that show. Ten years later I was living with Gitane. I heard he was gonna play in Germany and I suggested to her to meet him and make up (the two had a falling out). She did and after that I booked a tour with them together. I also produced their collaboration CD Dream Home Heartache and again organized a world tour for both of them. I captured some amazing footage of her and Rozz. It will be released later this year on a DVD compilation I am producing with Gitane at the moment.

SS: What was the process you and Rozz used when collaborating on the masterpiece PIG?

NB: I moved to the United States in late 1996. Rozz suggested we make a film together and I liked his ideas. I told him to make a film we needed to transform his ideas more clearly into script form. We started meeting every day at Canter's in Hollywood around the corner where he lived. After about a month we had a final script. The film was originally intended to be projected on screen behind a PE (Premature Ejaculation) or a Heltir performance. Rozz was supposed to improvise the films soundtrack live. Of course, this never happened and the film was released later with music edited by Chuck Collison (PE) out of sound collages recorded by Rozz Williams.

SS: What can you tell us about Rozz for those that didn't know him?

NB: He was the sweetest and kindest person I ever met. Ironically, he also had one of the darkest minds I ever came across, much like my own. Like me, he was interested in serial killers and I guess that's why we got along so well. At the end of his life, Rozz told me that he was in love with me. Of course, the sexual part I could not do much with which I had to tell him. I think it hurt him as we were very close in the last year of his life. I know he wanted somebody to love him and have a relationship with, especially a man. He felt guilty about something that happened when he was a teenager and he never really got over it. I think that and the lack of love made him kill himself.

INTERVIEW WITH NICO B.

SS: Were you a fan of Christian Death before meeting Rozz?

NB: I never was a fan of anybody. When I got older I met many "known" people. This happened at first when I became an editor for a music magazine. Later I became a music and film distributor. Pretty soon I saw that the people behind the music and films that I was a fan of were rather disappointing in real life. Although, I must say Rozz lived up to his legacy and we also had some things in common.

SS: I saw your short Hollywood Babylon. How did you come into contact with Kenneth Anger?

NB: PIG was advertised at the American Cinematheque in 2000 in Los Angeles. Kenneth called me up and I invited him to the screening. I did a Q&A and he was the main person at the sold out house to ask questions. Afterwards we met and he asked me if I had a film camera. I still had the same 16mm Ariflex Camera that I used for PIG and later on BETTIE PAGE DARK ANGEL. Strangely enough the camera was used for a 70's TV series in Holland that I loved when I was a kid. It was about the misfortunes of a boy named Bartje. Anger eventually invited me to come to the Museum of Death, to film his exhibit Hollywood Babylon.

SS: Can you tell us about your experience meeting with Anger?

NB: Afterwards he met my then wife and child. We even celebrated Christmas together. Then out of nowhere, in some dark moment he called me and was upset about something. Anger said he would put a spell on my family and I ask him to never contact me again.

SS: What filmmakers and films have inspired you personally?

NB: Not sure as my film making is mainly subconscious. Consciously maybe Jean Cocteau. Like myself he was not really a traditional filmmaker. He used film as merely an instrument to visualize his dreams (or as he said slumbers), visions, and clairvoyant experiences (like myself). Currently I am also inspired by early century Vintage Erotic films. They inspired the visualization of my new film SIN.

SS: What do you think about the digital age that we have entered into? How do you feel about filmmakers using film less and less?

NB: It's not that important. If it fits the subject and it works, then that's great. If you are trying to make a HD look like film, you are missing the point. For my film BETTIE PAGE DARK ANGEL, I shot partly Digitally for the kitschy recreation of scenes as how I saw Bettie Page and the 50's in a Cinemascope color aspect. However, for the recreation of the bondage films I used the traditional 16mm b&w film that were used in those days.

SS: Are there any filmmakers that you believe that we should be watching out for? Anyone that you think has something new to express/say?

NB: Olivier

Smolders, from whom I released his films (with Cult Epics) SPIRITUAL EXERCISES and BLACK NIGHT. His ideas are extremely interesting and dark. He is a lot like David Lynch but much more organic. I first released his short film ADORATION about the Japanese real life cannibal on the CINEMA OF DEATH DVD. This is the same DVD collection in which I released the second edition of PIG (as the first release has been out of print for a long time) and HOLLYWOOD BABYLON. People really loved his short so I contacted and told him that we should release his other films. I love his short films specifically. They can be seen SPIRITUAL EXERCISES DVD.SS: What upcoming projects are you working on?NB: My new film SIN is a collection of 3 stories told from my own personal experiences with women I have been with. I put the protagonist of each film in a different time and changed their professional ambitions. All three I shot on Super 8 to get that early century artistic feeling. All three are also very surreal and erotic (and of course controversial). In one story a nun gives an on camera blow job to a priest. I believe this is the first art film to show this on screen. The scene is a tribute to Rozz of Christian Death (both of us being brought up with Christian beliefs). Also, the religious ending of Bettie Page Dark Angel is also a reference to the scene in SIN.SS: Your use of real depicted violence and sexual mutilation in PIG has been known to shock. How did that scene go about being filmed? I can imagine that being an awkward set-up.NB: It was hard to find a victim who would agree to being in these scenes. After interviewing several people, everybody had some kind of phobia. This one guy eventually came along and said we could do anything to him as long as we didn't kill him. He was a huge fan of Rozz. We shot all the torture scenes in one day. I believe the first day of shooting was the day after I got married and I had just got back from Las Vegas. It was shot in Rozz's basement. I wasn't always sure what Rozz would do next. He would not only follow the script, but would improvise, and I would direct him visually in the scenes. The torture victim had the title of the movie PIG carved in his chest. He also had a syringe put thru his nipples and penis (and a tube inside his penis). He also had a syringe inside the veins of his arms. Rozz missed the vein in one of the torture victims arms and he did come to the point of changing his mind. He started screaming "no more torture, I will do anything else." This was fine because at that point we already got what we needed.

R.I.P Rozz

-Nico B

INTERVIEW WITH SHAWN LEWIS
INTERVIEW WITH SHAWN LEWIS

As you may or may not know, Shawn Lewis is the proprietor of Rotten Cotton, an online shirt company specializing in horror, cult, and exploitation shirts. His brother and him recently got together to direct a blaxploitation killer doll film called BLACK DEVIL DOLL. If there is one thing i have to say, it's "Boy this film is going to piss some people off." SS: So Shawn, what made you decide to get into filmmaking? SL: Well I've been a horror fan most of my life, as young as I can remember, my mother raised me on Creature Features, a Bay Area Saturday night horror TV show... I attended film school at SF State but ended up dropping out, school just wasn't for me. I always had intended on making my own films but when Rotten Cotton took off, I found very little time for it. That all changed when my youngest brother Jonathan started film school this past year, he was looking for something to direct and the rest is history. SS: How did you decide on want to make a blaxploitation doll film? SL: I am a huge fan of killer puppet/doll films, I try to collect all of them, even the shitty ones. And it has always been my dream to contribute to that sub-genre. Once we all agreed that our film would be in the killer doll genre, then we went back and watch every single one I had in my collection. We wanted to do something different with ours and thats how the Blaxploitation/Grindhouse thing happened. There has never been a doll film that combined those genres. So we took our doll idea and combined it with a Blaxploitation vibe and a little Russ Meyer'ish flavor too... It worked better than we could have ever imagined. SS: What films inspired Black Devil Doll? Did anything else besides film inspire BDD? SL: Our major inspirations are things like Trilogy of Terror, Black Devil Doll From Hell, Dolls, and Meet The Feebles from the doll era. And stuff like Dolemite, Sweetback, The Spook Who Sat By The Door... and too many 70's Grindhouse films to mention... SS: Has their been any controversy surrounding Black Devil Doll? SL: Well not so much controversy, well maybe a little. Everyone wants to think our film is a remake of Chester Turner's Black Devil Doll From Hell. Its not. People are stupid. Other than that, King Magazine compared our film to Birth Of A Nation. Fucking clueless. SS: Do you have any plans for other films besides Black Devil Doll? SL: We are working on a sequel to BDD now. And we are in the script stages of a film called She's A Whore. Its a retro 70's female revenge film in the vein of Thriller: They Call Her One Eye... SS: How did you get into the horror t-shirt business ? SL: I just do whatever I gotta do to keep from getting a real job. A friend was selling a t-shirt company years ago, I bought and I got lucky, it took off. SS: How did you get jive translated for the screen? Do you or your brother speak jive? SL: Nigga please. SS: If this film were to be taken to the MPAA, do you think it would be rated X? SL: Shit, the first 5 minutes would get it an X. There is no XXX penetration on camera but its packed with nudity, gore, sex, and violence. Oh and lots of RAPE. It would be an NC-17 for the nudity and gore for sure.SS: You seem like a true proponent of freedom of speech with your anti-politically correct clothing line and now a film. What do you have to say about political correctness?SL: Fuck political correctness. Its the number one problem with our society, actually its number 2, religion is the biggest problem, anyway... Whoever said that as an individual in our society that you have the right not to be offended? You don't. People need a thicker skin and they need to learn how to change the channel and shut the fuck up.SS: What would you like to see different in the horror and film in general?SL: More puppet rape.SS: What can we expect from Rotten Cotton in the future?SL: A t-shirt with this:"When a person is delusional, they call him insane. When a group of people are delusional, they call it a religion..."SS: Anything else that you would like to say?SL: Go to <http://www.blackdevildoll.com> and <http://www.myspace.com/blackdevildoll>Support puppet rape! I gotta go take a shit.

INTERVIEW WITH THISTLE HARLEQUIN
INTERVIEW WITH THISTLE HARLEQUIN

Thistle Harlequin is an accomplished professional body piercer and star of the shock viral video Putrid Sex Object. For more information on him, visit Thistle-Harlequin.com

SS: How did the director convince you to star in Putrid Sex Object? TH: This is actually a funny story. I find it quite sexy. I was visiting my friend and watching her dance at some local hole in the wall bikini bar. She mentioned that her ex-boyfriend wanted to talk to me about filming me fuck a pigs head for $30 or whatever. I was intrigued, and I called him the next morning.

SS: How would you describe the experience? Is it something that you would do again? TH: It's actually something I've sorta done before. Not the actual ejaculating and fucking the eye socket of a skinned cows head but I've go-go danced drenched in cows blood with other animal body parts (nothing you can't find at the butcher, though sometimes special order) and have performed body modification rituals with AMF at some clubs/bars in Hollywood. It's just meat, it's just like jacking off with a piece of uncooked meat. Same thing, different body parts.

SS: What is the response that you have gotten from those that have seen the film? TH: I get more haters than lovers. I love reading the haters remarks, a lot of them are like mad at world or themselves or something because they say they want to kill me and they will if they find out where I live (so they say) but if that were the case why haven't they killed me already? And they all claim to themselves that I was molested when I was child, when I really wasn't but I think it's just them that got raped or something and they are taking their hatred out on me for whatever reason, but maybe they're just jealous because a hott guy like me (that looks like a hot female) fucked a skinned cows head and they can't even get laid because they're soo ugly, so they're mad. Anyways, the lovers are some great people, very supportive and want to be informed of what's next. Some of the lovers get a little bit creepy at times because they think I'm really into fucking animals and they want like details and what else do I do and blah blah blah...I'm sure they want to hear things that they do that I don't do, so they have someone to talk about their experiences and so they don't feel ashamed. But whatever, lol... they're talking to the wrong person. I was on a bunch of Xanax too when we filmed (I do have a prescription, by the way) but we made the film during the time I was abusing alcohol and Xanax just for fun. You know, kids these days...

SS: Have you ever received "hate mail" from an animal rights activist? If so, How did that go? TH: Luckily, no hate mail from Animal Rights people. And the video has been on the net for about 3 years, so I think it's too late anyways.

SS: How did you manage to stimulate yourself for the scene? TH: Actually...I really didn't. Maybe it was because I was drunk and my friend, the camera guy, was a guy, and I like guys and he was watching my masturbate? I dunno...it felt kinda stupid really, but I just did what I thought I had to do. Also we took a travel DVD player and I took some porn, but since I'm a cheap ass and my gay pornos are burnt DVD's, they didn't play on the DVD player so I got stuck rubbing pig intestines around my ass. That actually did feel good...SS: Where did you happen to acquire a cow head?TH: My friend, who's idea it was (the camera guy) ordered it from the local Mexican meat market. It took like 5 days to special order it and we originally wanted a pigs head but it was like 4x's more expensive and it would have taken longer to receive also (I don't know why). And before we shot, it was in his fridge for like 5 days, because it wouldn't fit in his freezer...so it probably wasn't that sanitary...oh well. lolSS: Has anyone in your family seen the film?TH: That's a funny question. My boyfriend of 5 years at the time wanted to break up with me because he was sooo disgusted by it. I kept trying to explain to him that I used to do this before I met him and it's just performance, not something I'm into. He still to this day hates it and talks shit about it, but we're still together. We've moved on, it's not that big of a deal, I don't think it's anything to make a fuzz about at all. But he's raised Christian, I was raised Catholic though (guess that sums it up, huh?) lol Anyways, I know my little sister has seen it, she's 16 right now and she was 14 when she saw it. She looks up to me, she knows me, she knows how I am... and she hasn't told my parents about it, even she knows not to tell them because they are really strict Mexican Catholic Old School Traditional... so even she knows not to tell them because she'll get in trouble to watching it. She's a smart girl. I have an older sister too, she's actually a teacher at my High School (she was training when I was in school) and we haven't talked about it, but I'm sure she's seen it too. And if my parents do see it, I think they'll be over it. I don't think I can surprise them anymore, they kicked me out of my house 4 days after graduation after searching my room and finding a photo shoot set. It was either "burn these pictures or get the fuck out of our roof" and I really loved that photo shoot, it was my 2nd one, though illegal cuz I was 15 and nude in them, but I decided to leave. And my dad came back 2 min. later with boxes and told me to start packing. 4 days later, they begged me to move back, but I had discovered the Hollywood party lifestyle, so I chose to stay living on my own. (I did have a job and I was couch hopping)SS: Did any particular actors, film makers, or films influence you during the production of Putrid Sex Object?TH: Ummm...maybe just Divine and John Waters. And maybe my friend Lenora Claire. I've kinda looked up to her since she's started out young and in Hollywood and in the same scene just like myself.SS: Do you have any plans for acting and possibly directing films in the future? If so, what are some ideas that you have?TH: I don't have any plans other than just being in more underground "cult" films like this. I hope to be in more and I hope be like the "next" Divine, not necessarily her, but along the same lines. "Future Cult Icon Thistle Harlequin"...of course I love Edith Massey too, and well John Waters and I have the same birth date, that's ironic.SS: Do you see yourself as someone that may start a new type of subversive art in regards to film making and beyond?TH: Nah... There's a lot of Japanese porn out there that's pretty gross, like with eels and stuff. I've seen other stuff with guts too, after I made this film. Unless we come up with something totally new, but it seems like everything's already been done, and I'm not down to fuck live chickens. That's really disgusting (to me) so is getting fucked by a horse. I stay away from any animal genitals. It grosses me out when I see my hairless cat licking his cock, he sticks it out and it's all pink and pointy. SS: What are your other interests besides film and modeling? TH: I'm a professional body piercer. I'm into the Occult, into the paranormal, taxidermy and postmortem 1800's Victorian funeral memorabilia type of stuff, I have the most beautiful coffin in my bedroom and it's been used too. I like racist jokes (but I'm not racist-- those are just the funniest) & jokes about stereotypes. I like opiates too..oops is that too much info? Oh and I love vintage gay porn! SS: How did you get into modeling and come up with your Thistle character? TH: I kinda came up with Thistle, I liked it and got it from this "gothic" poetry magazine from back when I was a teen (95) cuz the drawing of the goth boy on the cover looked like me (skinny frail boy) and it's been my nickname every since. I then came up with the Harlequin part about a decade later when I was trying to make a "club kid" name for myself. An online friend helped me pick it out, and it just fit. The rest is history. It's become my character. When I go out to clubs and bars and well just in general in the club scene, especially the deathrock scene, everyone knows who I am, they know me by Thistle Harlequin. I started young. SS: Thanks for your time, Thistle. Any last statements you'd like to say to any aspiring fetishists or potential leaders of a new form of art? TH: Say NO to Drugs! You can view Putrid Sex Object directly on Thistle Harlequin's site. Photo's courtesy of ThistleHarlequin.com

INTERVIEW WITH THISTLE HARLEQUIN

INTERVIEW WITH ULLI LOMMEL

Love him or hate him, no other actor/director can boast a life so diverse and seemingly contradictory as German-born actor-turned-director Ulli Lommel. As the man who directed one of the greatest and most gruesome serial killer films ever made The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe, as well as the "most hated film" ever made, Daniel - Der Zauberer (2004), Lommel certainly has experienced the positive and the negative as a filmmaker. As someone who worked with both German New Cinema master filmmaker Rainer Werner Fassbinder and famous American 'Pop Art' leader Andy Warhol, Lommel is not exactly someone that will be forgotten by film history. As an individual who has starred in and directed some of our favorite films, including Whity (1971), The Tenderness of Wolves (1973), World on a Wire (1973), Shadow of Angels (1976), Satan's Brew (1976), and Melancholie der Engel (2009), among countless others, Soiled Sinema is quite proud to bring you this interview with Ulli Lommel.

Soiled Sinema: Your father was a famous comedian and your mother was an actress. What was your upbringing like?

Ulli Lommel: It felt normal, because I didn't know anything else. And it was fun, because I grew up right after WWII and Germany was completely destroyed and all the people that survived this madness were so happy and stuck together and helped each other, there was a lot of love and sudden peace, even though we had nothing for years to come, but we were content with what we had. Today nobody seems happy, nobody seems content, with few exceptions. There is way too much of everything today. Too many songs that are terrible and too many awful movies, week after week, bombarding us and that's almost worse than being bombarded by the allies in WWII.

SS: You originally got your start in cinema as an actor. Did you always have plans to become a film director?

UL: Ever since I saw VERTIGO at age 12 I knew I wanted to make movies. VERTIGO had an amazing influence on me and two of my favorite films, OLIVIA and BRAINWAVES, deal with the VERTIGO trauma, the VERTIGO theme. Plus I adore Hitchcock. He and Kubrick and Peckinpah are my top three directors.

SS: Your first feature was Haytabo (1971). How did you get involved with directing the film and what were the influences behind the film?

UL: I had gotten tired of working as a movie actor with a whole slew of idiotic directors and I had become quite impossible to deal with, because I had such a hard time accepting their stupidity. So instead of continuing to have such an awful time as an actor I decided to make movies myself. I has just met Eddie Constantine, the star of my first movie HAYTABO, and when he accepted the role I had the financing for the film. Constantine had made several very successful films in France, including Godard's ALPHAVILLE and so it was easy to get the money for my first film.

INTERVIEW WITH ULLI LOMMEL

SS: Fassbinder's Beware of a Holy Whore (1971) was based on the hectic experience of making Whity (1971). As someone who acted in both films, do you think Beware of a Holy Whore features a realistic portrayal of what happened during the making of Whity?

UL: No, not at all, it's complete fantasy, and anyway, Fassbinder was always drunk during WHITY and probably didn't remember a thing. I actually co-produced WHITY and due to Fassbinder's insane actions which went way beyond being drunk on and off the set non-stop, it almost ruined me. But I forgave him.

SS: How did critics in Germany respond to The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) when it was released? Were you the first New German Cinema director to direct a horror film about a serial killer? What did Fassbinder think of the film?

UL: It opened the Berlin Film Festival in 1973 and became an instant scandal. It was highly controversial with some critics adoring the film and others hating it. Fassbinder loved it, I think. Critics in London, Paris and NY loved it, and so I was invited to NY and met Warhol, because Vincent Canby, the star critic of the NY Times had written that TENDERNESS OF THE WOLVES reminded him of the early Warhol films, only that it was much better. So Warhol got curious, went to a screening, loved the film and invited me to work at the Factory in Manhattan for three years, where we did Art, Polaroids and Movies (BLANK GENERATION and COCAINE COWBOYS). So in a way, TENDERNESS OF THE WOLVES was my break-through. As to other German serial killer movies I believe I was not the first, there were others, but I don't remember the titles right now.

SS: Your third feature was Adolf and Marlene (1977). Can you describe this film to our readers? I once read the film is 'lost.' Will it ever be released on DVD?

UL: The Fassbinder Foundation is currently restoring ADOLF & MARLENE (it's a Fassbinder production). I met with Fassbinder in Paris in 1976 in a famous brothel and told him that I had discovered the diary of Eva Braun, Hitler's girlfriend and Fassbinder said let's make a movie! It's a very dark comedy, Michael Ballhaus did the camera and Kurt Raab, the male lead of TENDERNESS OF THE WOLVES, plays Hitler. I myself play Goebbels. The movie was compared to Ernst Lubitsch TO BE OR NOT TO BE. It's one of my dearest films.

SS: What was your relationship like with Fassbinder?

UL: Everything one can imagine and more, that's all I can say. He asked me to star in his first film LOVE IS COLDER THAN DEATH so he could get the financing since I had already become a teenage idol with covers on teen mags etc. and I was box office. I accepted and for the next 10 years collaborated on 21 Fassbinder productions. He was a true genius, with all the madness and the good, the bad and the ugly.

SS: Which of the Fassbinder films that you personally starred are you most proud of?

UL: I love EFFI BRIEST, LOVE COLDER THAN DEATH and CHINESE ROULETTE the most.

SS: What was your relationship like with Warhol?

UL: Warhol was the opposite of Fassbinder. While Fassbinder tried to jail you in his own prison of the mind, Warhol gave you the key and set you free. I owe Warhol more than I will ever be able to imagine, not to mention the few pieces of Warhol Pop Art I have in my possession and Warhol Polaroids. Warhol was and is out of this universe for me.

SS: You worked with Warhol on Cocaine Cowboys (1979) and Blank Generation (1980). How was he involved (aside from acting)? What were his thoughts on the films?

UL: Warhol was very much involved in his own way, his quiet way, he told people that Ulli Lommel was his favorite new director and that opened all the doors for me. he raised the money, he acted in both movies, I was his "Soup Du Jour" for several years. And when some people trashed my films Andy said so what, they trashed mine too and look what happened, where are they now and where am I? I kind of feel the same. I love and adore Andy Warhol!!! BLANK GENERATION and COCAINE COWBOYS have become cult classics, selling over and over again and again world-wide with audiences loving it and critics as well, it's so much fun to be so closely connected to these two films. Andy rules!!!

SS: Did you expect The Boogeyman (1980) to be such a hit? What inspired you to direct the film?

UL: After the first sneak previews where audiences went crazy we knew we had a winner, but that it would be THAT big, nobody could've ever expected. What inspired me were the Brothers Grimm and their dark fairy tales. Boogeyman to me is a fairy tale. Next year I'm making BOOGEYMAN 4D - why 4D? It plays in the forth dimension, Sci-Fi /Adventure genre and not R-rated but PG-13. Budget $24 million to be filmed in 3D.

SS: You made a number of films, including Olivia (1981), BrainWaves (1982), and The Devonville Terror (1983) with your then-wife Suzanna Love. What was it like directing your own wife?

UL: Oh, we had such fun! She was perfect in all those films. Ten great years and ten wonderful movies. Wonderful to make and enjoy. Wonderful times. Unforgettable...

SS: Your underrated cult musical Phantoms of Paradise (1984) seems to be a more 'personal' work. Do you agree? What was the inspiration behind the film?

UL: We just completed the German version and it should come out in Germany later this year. Yes, it's very personal, political, rebellious...I think. I love this film and I loved making it.

INTERVIEW WITH ULLI LOMMEL

SS: You worked with popular German pop singer Daniel Küblböck for your film Daniel – Der Zauberer (2004). How did that collaboration come about and what was it like to work with Küblböck?

UL: He was hated by millions of Germans and I was fascinated by that type of hate towards such an innocent young man and I decided to defend him and stand up for him and make a movie to set the record straight. Needless to say, the haters voted it worst movie ever made, hahahahah! But I like it a lot. Always will. And it got some great reviews too. So what the hell, right? And it made money. Hahahahah!!!

SS: You dedicated Absolute Evil - Final Exit (2009) to Fassbinder. Is there any particular reason why? Are you still planning to direct an "Absolute Evil Trilogy?"

UL: Because Fassbinder's madness was similar to Carradine's. After his death I stopped thinking trilogy. RIP David and RIP Fassbinder.

SS: Out of all the films you have directed, which ones are you most proud of? Why?

UL: Proud is a word I don't know what to do with. But I love almost all the films I made, just like they were my children.

SS: You still make films in Germany from time to time. Do you prefer working there or in the United States?

UL: I love making movies in America, especially LA, which is my favorite place. I love LA, I made over 40 films in LA. Germany is different, more dark and analytical and stuff, right now I'm making theater in Berlin combined with 3D movies, almost like a new genre. It's called FUCKING LIBERTY which means fucking great or fucking beautiful and it's 500 years America in 100 minutes with lots of music and dance celebrating "my" America.

SS: How has filmmaking changed since when you first started? Where do you see cinema heading in the future?

UL: When I started it was much more precious with far less films coming out every week and I much prefer that. The future is something I rarely speculate about, I love memories, I love the past, it's all we have. The present is only an illusion and the future has not arrived yet, we can only dream about it. But every split second the future turns into the past, without ever stopping in the present.

SS: The movie genre that you always come back to is horror. Did you always have an interest in horror? What are some of your personal favorite horror flicks?

UL: I don't go to the movies much more any longer. Plus I do not consider my films horror films, for me they are experimental films, maybe that's why some hate my "horror" films, because they're disappointed that they didn't get a horror film. And maybe it's Lions Gate's fault to market and sell them as horror films, just made people mad I think. Some at least. Sorry for that...

SS: You appeared as an actor in German horror auteur Marian Dora's Melancholie der Engel (2009). How did you get involved with the film? Have any of your films had an influence on Dora?UL: I think Dora likes my films, he's a very cool guy. And when he asked me to do him a favor I said yes.

SS: What can we expect from you in the future (be it film or otherwise)? Do you plan on writing an autobiography?

UL: My biography came out in Germany two years ago and it's a huge success, it's called "Tenderness of the Wolves", how fittingly, right? Other than that I'm working on a bio pic and of course BOOGYMAN 4D. Cool questions BTW. Thanks!

For more info on Ulli Lommel, checkout his official website UlliLommel.com

JUDEA DECLARES WAR ON GERMANY
JUDEA DECLARES WAR ON GERMANY

Judea Declares War on Germany is an ultra offensive documentary created by Australian Dr. Frederick Töben of the Adelaide Institute. Mainstream media and “scholars” have vilified both Töben and the Adelaide Institute as “holocaust deniers.” Mr. Töben has spent his career attempting (and in some ways succeeding) to debunk certain facts and details centered around what today is called “the holocaust.” Töben’s low budget documentary Judea Declares war on Germany takes an in depth look at Dr.Töben’s findings. Since “the holocaust” is a faith and dogma based historical event, Dr. Töben has decided to take a critical look at all the facts surrounding the only historical event that Europeans are forced to believe to the very least detail by law. Dr. Töben (and other historians) has been jailed for this research.It is no surprise that Judea Declares War on Germany has been banned in many parts of the world. The documentary features the swimming pools, post office, library, theaters, and other luxury services provided by the Germans at Auschwitz “Death Camp.” The documentary also goes into detail about how international Jewry declared war on Germany in 1933 via global boycott which cutoff 2/3 of Germany’s food supply (which was imported). No wonder why citizens of Israel have compared Judea Declares War on Germany to “pornography” and “pedophilia.” After all, the Israelis should know as they (and their international brothers) are the biggest producers (and promoters) of both porn and it’s underage illegal molested stepbrother (kiddy porn).

Footage of a real NAZI DEATH CAMP during World War IIThe reality of “the holocaust” is that any research done on it contrary to the “Russian” Bolshevik postwar propaganda is automatically labeled anti-Semitic, denying the holocaust, and Nazis. Ad Hominem’s attacks are very typical of modern academia and it’s “scholarly” supporters. Faith has always been more powerful than the actual facts. In the documentary, Dr. Töben visits the most barbaric of the death camps and talks to experts on the methods used by the Nazis to exterminate Jews. Dr. Töben also brings up how international Jewry tried to claim that 6 million Jews were exterminated in 1919 after World War 1. Jewish prophecies in the Torah claim that 6 million Jews are supposed to “vanish” before the state of Israel can be established. That being said, without the holocaust Israel would have never been recognized as a Jewish state in 1948. This is in despite the fact that most of the original Zionists founders of Israel are atheist Jews that base Judaism on “Jewish blood” and not religious beliefs. Essentially, “the holocaust” and the “six million dead Jews” are a kabbalistic (and scriptural) reasoning for the existence of Israel.Dr. Fredrick TöbenHistorians should never cease studying and critically researching historical events. This should be especially true for historical events that are promoted everyday on MTV commercials, Hollywood movies, and are forced parts of the curriculum in American public schools (despite Jews making up only 2 % of America’s population). After viewing Judea Declares War on Germany, I can see that it is easily more scholarly (despite it's lack of production values) than most documentaries and books I have read on "the holocaust." The media has done a great job portraying international Jewry as the eternal passive "victim" despite how Israelis shoot Palestinian children like it's target practice on a daily basis. It's odd how the same people that promote the official "holocaust" story also promote drug use, pornography, abortion, materialism, hedonism, greed, ignorance, and weakness. Hollywood really is full of a bunch of virtue promoting do-gooders. Judea Declares War on Germany is an interesting documentary that I recommend for anyone looking to see that other side of the argument. Dr. Töben does not try to "deny" the holocaust. He merely argues with the Soviet invented details centered around it. I can't say I agree with everything featured in the documentary, but I most surely don't believe in the Hollywood version of the "holocaust" either. Especially considering the "liberating" allies killed up to 11 million (4 million ethnically cleansed throughout eastern Europe, 5 million starved to death in occupied Germany, and 2 million soldiers died in slave labor captivity) Germans after World War 2 and then boast about morals. Around 72 million people (the majority being civilians) died in World War 2, yet we are only expected to recognize 6 million. Funny how World War II caused the destruction of Europe (all empires and nations fell) and the birth of Israel. World War II really had a nice monetary and power return for those notorious international bankers.

Watch Judea Declares War on Germany

-The Ghost of Varange

LUCHINO VISCONTI'S VERSION OF "THE NIGHT OF LONG KNIVES"
LUCHINO VISCONTI'S VERSION OF "THE NIGHT OF LONG KNIVES"

Not long ago, perhaps about two years, I first heard of The Night of Long Knives via an alternative media show. Yes, it had a cool sounding title, but it was the description of what it actually was that riveted me stone-straight in my car seat. We've all been taught textbook versions of Nazi Germany, of Hitler, and of the Holocaust, but what wasn't discussed in an open classroom environment (even in college) was the massacre of homosexual Nazis by another group of Nazis. After typing that, it's understandable why a teacher would want to keep such an event out of his or her lesson plans. Gays... Nazis... massacres. These aren't words teachers want students taking home from their classrooms.

Briefly, The Night of Long Knives was when Hitler ordered the SS to kill the SA. The former caught the latter off guard by ambushing them the morning after an exhausting and extensive gay orgy. [NOTE: My interest in this event was also sparked by a documentary review here on Soiled Sinema. Ty E or mAQ will have to amend this to let me (us) know what the title of it was, but it had something to do with homosexuality and Nazism.] Apparently, the SA did a lot of Hitler's dirty work, and for whatever reason (again, I'm not well versed on this) after they completed the job, he decided to dispose of them.

In the first half of the twentieth century, many a European felt the breeze of rolling Fascism and Communism. Sometimes both. Often both. Luchino Visconti's brother was a member of Mussolini's army, so it isn't unlikely that a young Luchino often found himself posing in Blackshirts for the mirror. But as an adult, Visconti became a devoted Communist. You can find this type of ideological slip-n-sliddin' all over Italian cinema (see Bertolucci's 1900). Visconti was also born into money and lived in a castle with his family. Knowing this background, it's easy to read a bit of fictional autobiography into his 1969 film The Damned. The movie is a tough one. Messy, and at times laborious, The Damned traces the rise of Nazism through the melodrama of a corrupt and family-owned steel corporation. Imagine Pasolini doing a signature, personal interpretation of The Godfather... but poorly, and with incest.

Well, sometimes Netflix queues can bring about sweet coincidence, because when I popped in The Damned, I was unaware it included a whole chapter on this historically hushed about event. But while Visconti's interpretation is still the kind that would likely infuriate gay activist groups today, the overall sequence is actually pretty tame and lazily executed. Like the entirety of The Damned, "The Night of Long Knives" chapter doesn't live up to its gargantuan title. But at least we have it.

After a heavy night of cuddly drinking and pub-chanting, Visconti shows wasted members of the SA taking each other to bed: some crossed-dressed, some bare-chested and blonde, some old, paunchy, and Bear-like hairy. Cut to the SS arriving on boats, motorbikes, and jeeps. Without hesitation they enter the compound and execute the homosexual SA members at first sight. Despite a few expressive shots, most of the violence feels disjointed and clumsy. But what sticks with you is the imagery of penis-shaped helmet Nazis walking over (and on) their once fellow Nazis... now bare-bottomed and bleeding. I'm left wanting more after watching Visconti's version of the event, but the fact that at least one depiction of it exists on film is good to know. Now, to know more, get out those books, do research, check sources, and keep the curiosity of this historically significant event alive, because the establishment - all across the board - sure seem like they want it to die.

-The Man With No Name

MY FRIDAY THE 13TH ADVENTURE WITH NEGRO SMILEY
MY FRIDAY THE 13TH ADVENTURE WITH NEGRO SMILEY

Tonight I had the opportunity to view the new Friday the 13th remake for free. I probably would not have seen the movie if it weren't for mAQ sneaking me in. As I predicted, the film was nothing special. But then again, are any of the Friday the 13th movies anything special? Anyways, during my viewing of Friday the 13th, a young gay black man also happened to be in the theater. For virtually the whole movie, this loud young fellow "added his own soundtrack." This boisterous fellow I nicknamed "Smiley." I never got a good look at the endearing Smiley. This is probably because the theater was very dark and so was Smiley. However, his voice alone shined enough of this character through to make him more interesting than the majority of American citizens. Loud black people in movie theaters is nothing new. If you go to any horror flick at a theater you can be sure to expect to hear some brothas speaking nonsense. Probably the most common thing one will hear from the "African American" community at the movie theater is loud and obnoxious out of place laughter. Unsurprisingly, Smiley did his fair share of laughing at Friday the 13th that also made me giggle in delight. I will even go as far as saying that Smiley's commentary during Friday the 13th was as entertaining as the ones John Waters does for his own movies.³ Spoiled (but not soiled) Degenerate Aryans with "Uncle Tom" and "Goofy Asian" Friday the 13th featured a group of lame ass contemporary white people that obviously get picked off one by one by the very special ed. Jason Voorhees. There are two new contemporary additions to the group however. One is a goofy Asian and the other is a very racially conscious black Uncle Tom. Like in real life, the white group of friends in Friday the 13th have minority friends as evidence that they aren't racist. The Uncle Tom in the group constantly says such things to his white friends as "Is it because I'm black?" Naturally, Smiley couldn't contain his laughter every time Uncle Tom spoke. Smiley also seemed to have a special spot for the goofy Asian, but with Uncle Tom he really let his laughter rip. Uncle Tom isn't exactly an illiterate big black buck like most white girls seems to go for nowadays. Due to Uncle Tom's lack of ladies man talents, he ends up taking a bong hit and then decides to masturbate. At this point in the movie, Smiley sounded like he was going to have a heart attack. But I mean, who can blame him? Uncle Tom and the goofy Asian were really the best characters in Friday the 13th. In fact, I will even go as far as saying that they are both the most interesting characters in any Friday the 13th movies (aside from maybe Corey "Tommy Jarvis" Feldman and Crispin "Jimbo Anderson" Glover's character in Friday the 13th: The Final Chapter). After watching Friday the 13th, I was separated by the genius that is Smiley's voice forever. Where is Smiley right now? What is Smiley doing? Does he eat the same food as me? Does he abstain from basketball because he's gay? I doubt I will ever know the answers to any of these questions. One thing I do know is if I ever decide to watch the remake of Friday the 13th again, my memories of Smiley will be with me.

-Ty E

ON DVD: MAN ON WIRE
ON DVD: MAN ON WIRE

Tight-ropeing. Suspending yourself in virtual mid-air while an audience looks up at you admirably. What a perfect gig for a narcissist like Philippe Petit.

Late in this crowd-pleasing documentary, there is a still of Petit infamously walking across the twin towers of the World Trade Center sneering a smirk on his face as the NYPD wait for him to cross. Like a child, or post-Boho 60's pseudo-radical, Petit plays cat and mouse with the law. Unintentionally, this scene is symbolic of Petit's true character. He pretends to be a pure artiste-bad boy, but as he balances between these two towers of international commerce he knows this stunt will bring him overnight fortune.

After Petit finishes this act, he's hounded by the media with questions, yet Petit feigns disinterest with an upturned wink of the eye. Like most of the maneuvers by this Frenchman, there is always the calculated signs of sneaky self-promotion. It's also betrayal. You can see this in the tears of his former best mate Jean-Louis and in the regret of his ex-girlfriend Annie.

These were people who gave full efforts, put their reputations on the line, and stood in the way of danger for someone who was doing something admittedly remarkable, but really rather irrelevant. Yet what does Petit do after accomplishing his "dream"? He goes and f*cks the first local that whispers in his ear while his friends strain their necks looking for him.

I've given up on trying to make sense of the enthusiasm that surrounds documentaries these days. The formula towards acclaim seems simple enough. Either: A.) Be sensational - glorify daredevils, pedophiles, murderers, bestiality, etc. OR B.) Have talking heads spout leftist politics. These two options will cinch you red carpet rollouts to festivals and just maybe an Academy Awards nomination.

[FINAL NOTE: If you doubt my claim that Philippe Petit is a flaming narcissist, watch the interview with him on the special features section of the DVD.]

-The Man With No Name

POSTMODERN TECHNIQUES IN THE FRIEDBERG AND SELTZER FILMS

The team of Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer should be a force to be reckoned with, perhaps as the most corrosive duo in all 21st century art. Their three films Date Movie, Epic Movie, and Meet the Spartans have each drawn in over double their respective budgets, and the latter two debuted as the #1 film in the United States. All three of these films have been critically panned, and Date Movie has the highest rating of 6% on RottenTomatoes.com. This might seem perplexing to one unfamiliar with the technique behind these movies, or for that matter, the nature of all of contemporary culture, but to those of us predisposed to the awful truths of 21st century America, it is quite obvious that Friedberg and Seltzer are masters of their craft. They are, in fact, the harbingers of true genuine postmodern film and the cryptic intellectual artisans ready to contribute bringing all culture to its knees through strictly postmodernist action.

For those who may not know, these three movies are “spoof films” that carry their weight entirely on gross-out gags, minor T&A, and references to other contemporaneous films, television shows, popular news items, popular catch phrases, and even popular advertisements. I feel it is important to at least provide some background information to help explain the nature of this strictly technical phenomenon. In an increasingly technological society, the role of art inevitably diminishes into a means to encourage mindless consumption and servant-like passiveness until it eventually disappears entirely. This is not controlled by humans in a concrete sense, but rather, the techniques necessary to sustain such a society. People need to be burdened with constant distractions in order to ensure a distinct conformity with which to properly operate in the technological society. Whereas technology allowed a certain breathing room for art to have spiritual and philosophical depth at one point, the tightening of circumstance has forced art to become a product of its increasingly technicized culture by being more technicized itself. Moreover, this technicization of art is not new, nor is it a radical shift, but part of a long ongoing process. Consider modernism, for example. As Jacques Ellul explains, modern art expresses the subconscious precisely to the degree that the subconscious has been influenced by the machine. The artist is in fact a seismograph that records the fluctuations of man and society. The cubist and abstract schools of art (as, in poetry, dadaism and oneirism) are aspects of this deep reality. With very different forms, Chapiro, Leger, and Marcel Duchamp, sometimes consciously and sometimes unconsciously, show us the coupling of machine and person. They show too the absurdity of the mechanical world, however rational it may be, and the impossibility of an aesthetic based on the technical movement unless it is an aesthetic of madness.

Given that Ellul wrote this in 1964 and had no way to predict the oncoming vicissitudes for art forms, it is thus my own belief that postmodernism represents that aesthetic of madness that Ellul describes. All of the prerequisites for postmodern cinema are met in these three Friedberg and Seltzer films. They constantly reference (not necessarily condemn or salute, but merely reference) cultural items, giving weight to the postmodern belief that all possible ideas have been expressed and thus can only be archetypically represented in one form or another in any new medium. They show reflexivity and self-awareness, playing with the conventions of the film medium itself, and therefore questioning the very foundations of reality through metaphysics in the way postmodernists often do. The plot of these films will irrationally jump around between time and space, enabling a reference point from any corner of the world or time in history to surface, reinforcing the postmodern belief that all things are connected somehow and in some way. But most importantly, these films bring absolutely nothing new to the table and provide literally no valuable insights on anything at all whatsoever. Their purpose would be more comparable to the utilitarian art of the Soviet Union than any art meant to express human spirit or creativity. In my opinion, that is perhaps the most postmodern element to these films above all else.

POSTMODERN TECHNIQUES IN THE FRIEDBERG AND SELTZER FILMS

Think, for example, of how classical music began to be composed in the 20th century. It started to become designed by technique, as cold and sterile as machinery itself. Pieces of music began to be composed through computerized Markov chains or through merely the rolling of dice. Although the production of this art was technicized and impersonal, the message could be interpreted in a number of ways, and often the interpretation would prove meaningful to life and the human condition. The Friedberg and Seltzer duo, in a true act of postmodernism, are able to take the creation of art through technique and strip it bare of all provocations. The purpose of the film, to make a lot of money, is obvious, and moreover, it becomes obvious entirely because of the technique in which it is made. Around the end of the year, before the Oscars come on television, people begin to consider the best films of that year. Beyond this, they begin to question the best anything of the year – music, TV shows, advertisements, whatever – and so a demand arises for a recap of some sort to summarize the year in pop culture. The brilliance of these manufactured spoof films has nothing to do with their writing or production values, but within the fact that they specifically market the technique of spoofing movies itself. Date Movie stays largely contemporaneous, but the very title gives away the fact that it seeks to parody romance comedy films. Nobody cares about date movies enough to really watch a spoof on it, but the fact that a movie is coming out with such perfect timing, promising to be rife with pop culture references is reason enough to go spend $8 or $9 on it. And as it indirectly promises through advertising, it offers many references to pop culture items of the past year.

In this regard, Meet the Spartans represents the ultimate in perfection of this technique. It strips away a genre-specific title, pinpoints only one major film (in this case 300), and uses that film as a vehicle to insert whatever miscellaneous debris is deemed necessary and important. In addition to the newfound elasticity of this concept, it also invokes the spirit of old novelty records that used to focus on one particular film and “comment” on it by throwing in sound bytes of contemporaneous pop songs interspersed along a largely pointless narration. These novelty records were never meant to be particularly intelligent, nor were they meant to satirize one genre or film in particular. In all three movies, techniques from those records are employed. The Friedberg and Seltzer team manage to make their films combine an irrational story element with song and dance sequences featuring musical content reminiscent of the Now! CD compilations. The major difference between those old novelty records and these films is that the novelty records in question would only make pop culture allusions, but these films more analytically allude to the techniques behind these products of pop culture. Because of this, the novelty records would only appeal to 8-12 year olds then, whereas these films are marketed toward teenagers and young adults now. Any child would enjoy these Friedberg and Seltzer movies despite the grotesque humor and degradation of women, and another technical triumph of Meet the Spartans is its PG-13 rating as opposed to the previous films’ R ratings. Children will learn to enjoy just about anything, but the fact that more mature people are enjoying this indicates a growing understanding of the basic framework that makes up film itself. The more man knows, the easier it is to manipulate him. As soon as man learns to read, he can be manipulated through writing. As soon as man understands percentages, he can be manipulated through statistics. And most importantly for Friedberg and Seltzer, as soon as man understands the conventions of film, he can be manipulated by the subversion of these conventions. The latter tactic simply molests the mind of man with no real attainable goal other than pure sterile calculation. Once man begins to think with a more technically-oriented point of view, morality, spirituality, and artistry become less and less relevant.

This subversion is exactly what people are looking to get when they buy the tickets for these films. Since people are not really looking for parodies of “date” or “epic” films specifically, it can only be deduced that they are looking for the technique of subversion to be shown to them in addition to simply being reminded of the products’ existence in the first place. As long as the pop culture item is still fresh in the people’s minds, the technique of subverting pre-existing techniques will suffice with no other added content. It is safe to say that this has already been popularized by TV shows like Robot Chicken and Family Guy as well as other spoof movies of the past. This sort of subversive nihilism is what people are looking for, and so by keeping all possibilities open tied around one theme, Meet the Spartans accomplishes this nihilism the most effectively of all three films. At one point in the Stone and Parker movie Team America: World

POSTMODERN TECHNIQUES IN THE FRIEDBERG AND SELTZER FILMS

Police, a song is featured set to a montage sequence explaining what a montage is and how it is used. The intent of the joke is to say that people are already familiar with montages, so the filmmakers are therefore hip enough to see the silliness of this convention. Meet the Spartans represents a full-length film adaptation of this joke in many respects. The apex of this principle occurs when a member of the Spartan army carries around a large green screen showing that this particular technological item allows for the illusion that there is a much larger army, when in reality it is mere computer wizardry that does the trick. The joke is so telling that it is actually used twice. And, of course, throughout the entire movie itself, the backdrops of each set are created through the use of green screens.

In addition to the thematic open-endedness in which Meet the Spartans presents itself, it also is superior to the other two because of its efficiency as a film. Supposedly it was created on a budget of $30 million, but I don't believe this for one second. Whereas Date Movie and Epic Movie (which both cost $20 million) feature a multitude of different on-location sets, costume arrangements, and special effects, Meet the Spartans is stripped down and bland. The special effects are largely nowhere to be found and the sets are all pretty much the same. If it really did cost $30 million, the difference would most likely be in marketing. Meet the Spartans also claims to be an 84-minute film, which is not true. It is actually around 64 minutes, but the ending credits roll so slowly, that they clearly are part of a technique to artificially bloat up the running time. This technique is used to a lesser extent in Date Movie and Epic Movie, but the credits are only a mere ten minutes in those films as opposed to the audacious twenty in Meet the Spartans. Also worth noting is the much more intense use of product placement in the third film, whereas the first two use it sparsely. Popular commercials are mocked in all three films, but the first two often refrain from having the actual product being used during this mockery. Meet the Spartans does have some commercial spoofs with the product absent, but it compensates by throwing in a fair amount of other products at other points in the film. This idea is largely absent from its two predecessors. It also represents a technical subversion of conventions as previously noted: the products are advertised so blatantly that the film makes it appear as if it is trying to communicate that product placement in films can be silly and obvious. Nevertheless, this technique is still being employed.

My initial goal was to watch all three of these films in one sitting, but it proved too aggravating of an experience. I had to wait a week before watching Meet the Spartans. It is perhaps not enough to explain the difficulty of this project by saying what the films were about, because they weren't really about anything, or what they consisted of, which was essentially nothing, and I was anticipating all of this quite readily. What blindsighted me personally was how extraordinarily hateful toward the audience these films were within the realms of their own reflexivity and self-awareness. The key is to understand that although many popular culture items and techniques are “spoofed,” they are at once simultaneously condoned. Nothing about the jokes (in what presents itself as a satire) are really critical of the status quo, but more at the audience for partaking in it. Once the films start to show their own cynicisms, the real butt of all of these jokes proves to be the viewer. Take, for example, the preponderance of gross-out gags in all three of these films. It was not out of intellectual laziness that the writers decided to rely on them – many of them had no deliberate comedic value that I could discern in the first place. So why use them at all? Imagine any seemingly vile scenario, and more than likely it can be found in these films. A woman projectile vomits on many people at a party. A hump growing on Paris Hilton is revealed to be a purulent growth, which is popped. A nude shapeshifting woman on top of someone grows a unibrow and about a hundred pounds heavier at his request. A woman pops a particularly large pimple. A man eats raw sewage believing it to be a river of chocolate. A cat sits on a toilet and makes loud shitting sounds. A heavy woman slurps her own liposuctioned fat through a tube coming from a large vat labeled ‘mayonnaise.’ At first, these occurrences seem cryptic and inexplicable, but after a while, their existence seems to prove the efficiency of the aforementioned techniques. Since a large part of the appeal for the audience is recognizing the target of reference, these grotesque elements to the film seem to serve as a sadomasochistic test of faith. If the viewer can sit through a completely disgusting scene, he will feel more psychologically rewarded when he is able to recognize Paris Hilton holding her Maltese dog and talking on her cell phone. The best part is that if he is not able somehow to catch the reference, then typically the reference will be openly said out loud so as to eliminate any confusion. This element of psychological difficulty thus makes each of these films very “challenging” for the viewer, resulting in feelings of accomplishment and fulfillment after they end.

If anything, the elements of gross-out humor prove that if the technique of subverting other techniques had not been pre-popularized by other films and media, these films simply never would have worked. If a film, for example, with an identical structure and 50’s pop culture references had come out in the 1950’s, it would have failed, and the reason is because people’s brains would not have been sufficiently prepared for the acquiescence of technical sterility necessary to derive appreciation from these pseudofilms today. Even without the scatological elements, the conventions of TV Westerns and successful commercials would not be fully grasped by the American public, and so they would merely prove confusing to the average viewer when pointed out or alluded to. It would actually take a fairly advanced person to understand what is happening. But this is not the 1950’s and we as filmgoers are now privy to pop culture conventions and understand the techniques behind these films and television shows. Never let it be said that as soon as we understand the workings of the media, it automatically will leave us more enlightened and critical. Friedberg and Seltzer prove that this understanding can actually prime us to be less conscious of reality and more easily distracted. That is essentially what postmodernism is all about. Even with a more cohesive plot structure, genuine wit, and popularity from previous films, Mel Brooks's Spaceballs only raked in around one third of the amount that Meet the Spartans was able to in the opening weekend and considerably less in total box office. The reason is because even as recently as the 1980's, postmodernism did not have the relevance it does today. As information becomes decentralized and the secrets to techniques become disseminated, art simply loses its meaning.

POSTMODERN TECHNIQUES IN THE FRIEDBERG AND SELTZER FILMS

It would be folly to dismiss these asinine parody films as mere anomalies. Every single one is very much ahead of its time, and the innovations of Friedberg and Seltzer as pioneered in Meet the Spartans hit the bullseye on a target so distant from our understanding that people don't even know it's there. The lack of positive reviews do not really matter, because as history has shown, people's opinions can be easily molded by sheer repetition anyhow. As Sylvester Graham points out in his manifesto A Treatise on Bread and Breadmaking from 1894, assembly-line produced white bread was initially met with negative response, but the negativity certainly didn't last very long. The sheer repetition and constant technical reproduction eventually led people to prefer this nutrient-deficient, bland, tasteless bread as opposed to naturally-grown bread with fiber, whole grain, complex carbohydrates, and a hearty taste with character to it. Right now, the only positive review for Meet the Spartans on RottenTomatoes.com (which makes up its 2% positive rating) comes from some woman from an obscure website called "News Blaze" who says, "Don't expect anything of depth and you won't be disappointed by this predigested pabulum. Mental bubblegum for the brain whose cinematic taste lasts only about as long as the viewing." Given the low costs, high profits, and intellectual laziness it takes to pump out these films, it is safe to say that this woman represents the critical voice of the future. But what will the future hold for us when art begins to seep further and further into the nihilistic realms of meta-narrative? When the people have been so narcotized as to believe that any idea can be characterized by sheer archetype, what will this say of us? What will we have to judge ourselves by when the only art we can produce will be in the innovations of scientific applications and mathematical equations? Would we even be human, or the product of some far-reaching abstraction? If there really is salvation to be found in the possibilities of some sort of technological utopia, then do you really want to be saved?

-Blind Lame OKB

PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA APPOINTS BROTHER OF HOLLYWOOD SLEAZE AGENT TO WHITE HOUSE CHIEF OF STAFF

I once made the mistake of pretending to get along with an individual that I truly hated. I only decided to mask my true feelings because this parasitical individual would be living with me for over 6 months. He once brought home a newspaper and bragged about how Israel had bombed Lebanon. Hearing that his favorite country killed innocent women and children brought a smile to his face similar to that of a young child about to receive presents on his Birthday. This feminine and ultimately sadistic fellow also introduced me to some of his favorite movies and TV shows. Naturally, his favorite filmmaker was Steven Spielberg and he loved to watch poker tournaments.

One day this individual went too far and showed me the degenerate HBO series Entourage. Never in my life had I seen such worthless and despicable human beings featured on one TV show. The most repulsive and disgusting character on this show is hands down Ari Gold. Talk about Jewish stereotypes, Ari is the type of Hebrew that Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels could have easily exploited in his aggressive newspaper Der Angriff. In these mixed up times that we now live in, Ari Gold is considered a role model for today's disillusioned and materialistic youth. Talk about the apocalypse, Satan is already waiting at the gates.

Emmanuel Rahm

Leave it to newly elected and first mulatto president Barack Obama to hire the brother of the man that inspired the character Ari Gold. Yes, Ari Gold is based on real "talent" agent and conman Ari Emanuel. Ari represents such Zionist favorites as Michael Moore and Zio-clown Sacha Baron Cohen. Americans can now sleep easy knowing that on November 6, 2008, Ari's brother Rahm Emanuel accepted the position of White House Chief of Staff for Barack Obama. Having a brother like Ari "Gold" Emmanuel really shows that Rahm is a man looking after the welfare of America and it's reputation in the international world.

Like fellow Talmudist Michael Chertoff, secretary of United States Homeland Security, Rahm Emanuel also holds Israeli citizenship. Anyone that knows anything about or anyone in the Zionist community knows where their true loyalties lay. After all, no man can possibly serve two Gods. Rahm Emanuel's father also happened to be in the Zionist terrorist organization Irgun which did an excellent job blowing up trains, hotels, and countless other buildings in Palestine during the 1930s and 1940s. During these bombings, Irgun also killed many British soldiers and Palestinians in hopes to steal land that would be recognized as the Jewish state of Israel in 1948.

Rahm Emanuel doesn't have the nickname "Rahmbo" for nothing. With a terrorist for a father and filth promoter for a brother, Rahm will be sure to make his mark in American history. Watch out Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran and Vladimir Putin of Russia, Rahmbo is coming for you! Barack Obama needs all the “advising” he can get.

PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA APPOINTS BROTHER OF HOLLYWOOD SLEAZE AGENT TO WHITE HOUSE

-Ty E

SCHINDLER'S LIST AND STEVEN SPIELBERG'S HOLOCAUST MYTH MAKING CAMPAIGN

Steven Spielberg is the unofficial international minister of propaganda. An individual that has done more to hurt humanity's ability to decipher between fiction and reality than anyone before him. His movie Schindler's List (1993) is quite possibly the most hateful and misleading of his moneymaking propaganda accomplishments. Schindler's List acts as the ultimate pity party of the notorious "crime against humanity," the "Holocaust." First one has to examine the history of the Holocaust as Zionist (supporters of the Jewish state in Palestine) propaganda. After World War II, what came to be known as the Holocaust was for the most part instantly forgotten. American Jewry decided to look the other way at the crimes committed by Germans in hopes of making business deals with western Germany. American political scientist Norman Finkelstein (the son of Holocaust survivors) admitted that the American Jewish community looked at the Nazi Holocaust with apathy. It wasn't until the Israeli success of the so-called Six-Day War that American Jewry became serious Zionists. The military achievements of Israel (thanks to special U.S. help) confirmed that the tiny state had much promise in the future. Almost immediately after, the Nazi Holocaust became a symbol of Jewish suffering and Israel's right to exist. After American Jewry's almost virtual unanimous support of the state Israel, Nazi Holocaust propaganda started its unrelenting storm of self pity. Holocaust education became a required part of public school curriculum (yet Jews only make up approximately 2% of the American population). Now seven year olds are taught that their blond haired and blue eyed ancestors were guilty of putting Jewish children in gas chambers and feeding them to rabid dogs. The Nazi Holocaust has turned into a early brainwashing technique used to stifle any possible criticism of Israeli's numerous crimes against humanity. Schindler's List gives the impression that every Jew was a victim of the Nazi Holocaust. Holocaust survivor and propagandist Eli Wiesel is quoted as saying, "not every victim was a Jew but every Jew was a victim" in regards to World War II. This blasphemous statement on Wiesel's part is evidence of his own "Holocaust denial." The truth is that many "Holocausts" occurred over the last century and that Jews played a crucial role in most of them (including the "Nazi" Holocaust). Now I will take the time to examine some of these. The first Holocaust I want to look at is the Armenian Genocide committed by the Young Turks in 1915. The leaders of the "Young Turks" were for the most part not Turks at all as virtually all of them were Jewish. A couple of the Young Turks were openly Jewish and most others were Crypto-Jews (Jews that were outwardly Muslim but practiced Judaism in private). Young Turks displaying their "trophies" The Jewish conspirators involved in the Armenian Genocide are as follows: Talaat Pasha "Donmeh" Jew. Interior Minister of Turkey during WW I. Chief architect of the Armenian Holocaust. Djavid Bey "Donmeh Jew." Talaa't's Finance Minister. Messim Russo was Assistant to Djavaid Bey. Refik Bey: Editor of Young Turk newspaper Revolutionary Press; Prime Minister of Turkey in 1939. Emanuel Carasso: Jewish propagandist for The Jewish Young Turks. Vladimir Jabotinsky: Russian Bolshevik and Zionist who moved to Turkey in 1908. Editor of the newspaper Young Turk. Alexander Helphand: Liaison of the Rothschilds. Editor of The Turkish Homeland. Mustafa Kemal Attaturk: A Jew of Sephardic origin. Attaturk attended the Jewish Elementary school known as the Semsı Effendi School run by the Jew Simon Zvi. During the last year, the Armenian Holocaust has made quite the controversy in the news. Many American politicians and Jewish groups were quick to not acknowledge the genocide as a "genocide." Aside from monopolizing Holocausts, Zionist propagandist didn't want the names and backgrounds of the perpetrators reaching American minds. The ADL (Anti-Defamation League), a Jewish "anti-hate" group, took a firm stance in denying the recognition of the Armenian Holocaust. Abraham H. Foxman, National Director of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) issued the following statement August 21, 2007: "we continue to firmly believe that a Congressional resolution on such matters is a counterproductive diversion and will not foster reconciliation between Turks and Armenians and may put at risk the Turkish Jewish community and the important multilateral relationship between Turkey, Israel and the United States." Estimates of those that perished in the Armenian Holocaust range between 300,000 and 1,500,000 (some estimates reaching 3 million dead). Lazar Kaganovich The second Holocaust that I want to look at is the Ukrainian famine (Holodomor) of 1932-33. The number dead in this famine reach as high as 7-10 million dead but are more conservatively to be estimated at 6 million dead. The Jews involved in this genocide are as follows: Lazar Kaganovich: Stalin's political figurehead of the Central Committee. In 1928, Kaganovich led the implementation in the Ukraine of Stalin's first Five-Year Plan. Genrikh Yagoda: Founder of the NKVD (Soviet Secret Police). Assisted in the first Five-Year Plan of starving Ukrainian peasants. Nikolai Yezhov: Appointed by Yagoda as Head of the NKVD. Assisted in the first Five-Year Plan of starving Ukrainian peasants. (Yezhov took on a "Russian" name like most Bolshevik Jews. His wife was an active Jew). In the Baltimore Jewish Times, Nov 14 2007 The Ukraine's chief Rabbi Yakov Dov Bleich said: "We can't equate the Holocaust of the Jews in Germany with the Holodomor in Ukraine. Ukrainian Jewish leaders do not support recognizing the Holodomor as genocide." The arrogance and Holocaust denial of Rabbi Yakov Dov Bleich speaks a great deal about the apathy towards non-Jewish human tragedies so commonly seen in the world. Genrikh Yagoda (second to the left) and his assistant butcher- Jewish Bolshevik Genrikh Yagoda was not only a mass murderer of Ukrainians but of also a good number of white Russians. Yagoda was notorious for showing up in black vans with Bolshevik goons at the homes of individuals in St. Petersburg and having them executed where they stood (he usually had them buried in the woods). It is estimated that he is responsible for the deaths of at least 10 million people. Genrikh was also responsible for setting up the Bolshevik Gulag death camps in the Siberia. The Gulag death camps were responsible for more deaths than all of the Nazi concentration camps combined. Jewish Bolshevik Lev Inzhir was commissar for Soviet death camp transit and administration. Jews Firin, Rappoport, Kogan, and Zhuk ran the death camps and concocted the mass murdering plan for the construction of the White Sea--Baltic Canal (Hoffman II, 2006). Of course, you will never learn of this in an American public school. Hollywood has always acknowledged the crucial role that Jews played in Bolshevism. The horrible 2001 war drama Enemy at the Gates paints Jewish Bolsheviks as heroes. Woody Allen let's the whole world know that Bolsheviks even had family ties in New York City (Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky even lived there for some years) with Crimes and Misdemeanors. Warren Beatty found Jewish love in the form of a Jewish Bolshevik in Reds. Hollywood knows it's roots! The last Holocaust I want to look at is a one closer to home. Jewish author and Manhattan-born businessman Theodore N. Kaufman wrote the book Germany Must Perish! This hateful book describes a plan on how to exterminate the German race over a couple of generations. Nazi Germany's propaganda chief, Joseph Goebbels, exploited the book to his fullest, "This Jew [Kaufman] has done a disservice to the enemy." Jewish Secretary of the Treasury of the United States utilized Germany Must Perish! in creating his hateful plan for the Germans known as The Morgenthau Plan.

The plan originally called for the depopulation of Germany (which had already lost 12.5% of its population which had perished in the war) and dismantling of all of Germany's industry. In early 1947 four million German soldiers were still being used as slave labor in the UK, France, and the Soviet Union to repair damage made by Nazi Germany. Nearly one million of these POWs were killed in Dwight D. Eisenhower's Death camps due to starvation and horrible living conditions. Eisenhower made the erroneous mistake of acknowledging his Swedish Jewish heritage in his West Point Military Academy graduating class yearbook, published in 1915. He is quoted as referring to himself as a "terrible Swedish Jew." I won't even go into the millions of ethnic Germans killed throughout Eastern Europe by Stalin and his Bolshevik thugs.

So now we can see that ALL Jews were not victims of the Holocaust as some constructed their own. These subversive Jewish killers in no way represent the Jewish collective but still need to be acknowledged as important players in recent world history. Now I am going to examine Schindler's List and its wealth of historical inaccuracies and misleading circumstances. Schindler's List is in no way a realistic portrayal of what has come to be known as "The Holocaust." The first thing one has to acknowledge is that the source material that Schindler's List is based on is a novel (work of fiction) originally titled Schindler's Ark. The Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data has designated the novel as follows:

SCHINDLER'S LIST AND STEVEN SPIELBERG'S HOLOCAUST MYTH MAKING CAMPAIGN

Keneally, Thomas. Schindler's List. 1. Schindler, Oskar, 1908-1974--fiction. 2. Holocaust, Jewish (1939-1945)--fiction. 3. World war, 1939-1945--fiction. Although Oskar Schindler and his Jewish prisoners were obviously real, the circumstances surrounding the novel are for the most part fantasy. The real Oskar Schindler The real Schindler was a traitor, black market criminal, extortionist and pedophile who molested young Jewish slave girls. The only reason Oskar Schindler became a "savior of the Jews" and "righteous gentile" was to save himself from the fate of being charged as a war criminal (it was obvious Germany had already lost the war before Schindler's act of virtue). The Nazis themselves were preparing to have Schindler arrested for a variety of crimes (against his slaves and the Reich). Rudolf Kaštner Steven Spielberg conveniently left out Jewish Hungarian Nazi collaborator Rudolf Kaštner who worked with Nazi "exterminator" and "architect of the Holocaust" Adolf Eichmann. Kaštner helped Eichmann deport hundreds of thousands of Jews to Auschwitz in hopes of saving some "richer" Jews. As a child, Adolf Eichmann was persecuted for looking Jewish. Other less scholarly sources (such as Hitler: founder of Israel by Kardel) having stated that Eichmann was in fact Jewish. Adolf Eichmann also spoke perfect Hebrew and visited Palestine in preparation of having Jews from Germany immigrate to Palestine. Two Jewish films dealing with Jewish self-hatred also allude to Eichmann being of Jewish ancestry. Henry Bean's The Believer and Arthur Hiller's The Man in the Glass Booth bring up various philosophical questions on the topic of Jewish self-hatred. Baby Eichmann The "Jewish Looking" Adolf Eichmann Eichmann in his later years before Israel hanged him Furthermore, SS Lieutenant general Horst Hoyer submitted a report in 1952 on the role Jews played in the Holocaust. Jews helping to plan the final solution were Walter Sonnenschein, Zuckerhorn, Spitze, Lowenstein, Gregor and Feckler. Hoyer was offered 30,000 DM to suppress the facts and turned it down. He was eventually murdered (Makow, 2007). Jewish Communist Lenni Brenner's 51 Documents: Zionist Collaboration With the Nazis also incriminates Jewish Zionists (who only made up 3% of Germany Jewry at the time) as enemies of their own people.

The Jewish Emil Maurice founded the SS. Adolf Hitler became member #1 and Maurice #2

Ironically, the founder of the SS (Schutzstaffel) was a Jew by the name of Emil Maurice. Adolf Hitler and Maurice were friends dating back to at least 1919. Emil Maurice (with the help of Rudolf Hess) also transcribed Adolf Hitler's oration of his political testament Mein Kampf (he didn't actually write it) during their imprisonment after the failed Beer Hall Putsch coup d'état. The SS was also in charge of the concentration camps and carrying out the "final solution." Jewish Dr. Eleke (Fritz) Scherwitz was in charge of Lenta-Kaiserwald concentration camp and fellow kinsman Arthur Pisk was in charge of Westerbork concentration camp. Holocaust icon Anne Frank was shipped to Auschwitz from Westerbork. Arthur Pisk with all of his fellow Jewish concentration camp officials

One other common myth associated with Germans of partial Jewish descent (having at least one Jewish grandparent) is they were also escorted to concentration camps. This assertion is far from reality as over 150,000 Germans of Jewish descent (Mischlinge) fought for Hitler in World War II. 20 Jews were awarded Hitler's highest military honor, the Knights Cross. At least 2 field marshals and fifteen generals were also of Jewish descent (commanding up to 100,000 troops.) One also needs to take in consideration that only 600,000 Germans claimed to be Jewish before the Nazi era.

1/2 Jewish ideal Aryan poster boy Werner Goldberg Another vital fact that Spielberg chose to withhold from the movie going audience is that September of 1944, Amon Goeth was arrested by the Central Office of the SS Judiciary and imprisoned on charges of theft and the murder of concentration camp inmates (Hoffman, 1994). Spielberg portrays all Germans (aside from Schindler of course) as blood thirsty monsters bent on the extermination of European Jewry. The reality is sadists only made up less than 10% of concentration camp guards and employees. Spielberg even goes as far as to falsify his own religious book the Talmud. "He who saves a single life, saves the entire world," (found in the film and on movie posters) is supposedly a verse found in the Talmud. The actual verse states, "Whosoever preserves a single soul of Israel, Scripture ascribes to him as if he had preserved a complete world" (Tractate Sanherdin 37a). This means that the verse is only in reference to Jews. Steven Spielberg is a Zionist supremacist and an open racist. In his book of interviews (Steven Spielberg Interviews, Pg. 50), Spielberg refers to a blond haired woman as a "Shiksa" (a derogatory Yiddish word for female gentiles meaning "abomination," "impure," or "object of loathing"). When analyzing Schindler's List analytically (and not viewing with a childlike sentimentalism that Spielberg strategically employs), the lies and hate are quite obvious. Human tragedies should not be exclusively acknowledged for one group. The last century brought the deaths of hundreds of millions of people. Steven Spielberg is only interested in letting the world know that 6 million died. He is a Holocaust denier of the elite and untouchable sort.

-Ty E

SERGEI EISENSTEIN, JUDEO-BOLSHEVISM, AND GENOCIDE DENIAL
SERGEI EISENSTEIN, JUDEO-BOLSHEVISM, AND GENOCIDE DENIAL

In my life, I have seen my fair share of deranged and perverse films. Whether it be some sick film from Japan involving naked women and eels or the artistic necrophilia of Jörg Buttgerit, I feel that I have desensitized myself to the artistic depravity of notable subversive artists. I must admit that none of these films have remotely disturbed me or even really shocked me. It wasn't until I saw Soviet revolutionary director Sergei Eisenstein's Bezhin Meadow (1937) did I question the morality of a filmmaker. The content of Bezhin Meadow is not what makes the film morally irresponsible but what the film neglects to tell you historically.

A Deranged Kulak from Bezhin Meadow

Bezhin Meadow portrays the Ukrainian Kulak farmers as Christian patriarchal parasites who suffer from a certain monstrous derangement. Sergei Eisenstein shows the Kulaks as Christians that utilized their religion to beat their women to death and physically abuse their children. Eisenstein once even stated that the murder of a young revolutionary named Stepok by his father was "reminiscent of Abraham's sacrifice of Issac." Eisenstein portrays the children in Bezhin Meadow as liberators who support the good Bolshevik fight of "liberation" and destroy their own fathers. The young Bolsheviks also take their local church and turn it into some child fantasy Bolshevik clubhouse. What really happened to the Kulaks, however, is a much different reality than Sergei Eisenstein portrays.

Victims of Holodomor

What really happened to the Kulaks was not a "joyous" and "progressive" revolution but a Soviet executed famine that killed millions of innocent people known as Holodomor that took place 1932-1933. The chief architect of this genocide was a Jewish Soviet politician Lazar Kaganovich. Kaganovich was notorious for killing tens of millions of people and burning every Christian church he could find. Keep in mind not one synagogue was burned down or destroyed during the Russian revolution. After burning down the great Cathedral of Christ the Savior Lazar Kaganovich boasted, "Mother Russia is cast down. We have ripped away her skirts."

Lazar Kaganovich "Butcher of the Ukraine"

Unlike the child revolutionaries of Bezhin Meadow, the children were the first to starve to death during Holodomor. Cannibalism was also prevalent and it was not unheard of for children to go "missing." Ukrainian born Russian serial killer Andrei Chikatilo's older brother was supposedly eaten by his starving neighbors. Despite being one of the most horrific events of human history, the average American has never heard about this event or the killers that executed it. Maybe it has something to do with the fact that the killers were Jewish and to admit this even happened would be deemed as anti-Semitic. Despite contemporary claims that the Soviet Union was “anti-Semitic,” Jews were overrepresented in the Soviet leadership. After the famine, Jewish Yiddish culture thrived in the Ukraine whereas the Kulaks were all but destroyed. Lazar Kaganovich even admitted that Holodomor was payback for centuries of “Ukrainian Anti-Semitism.”

A Leon Trotsky lookalike from Bezhin Meadow

Like Lazar Kaganovich, Sergei Eisenstein was a Judeo-Bolshevik revolutionary. Eisenstein had the anti-proletarian luxury of growing up in a prosperous and cosmopolitan family. His ancestors were successful German Jews who eventually relocated to Latvia. In Eisenstein’s masterpiece The Battleship Potemkin, an evil bourgeois states, ‘Down with Jews.’ Obviously, Sergei Eisenstein was not going to ignore the anti-Semitism within the repressive bourgeois Slavic majority. Eisenstein’s Jewish pal Isaac Babel would also help him co-write Bezhin Meadow. In Babel’s story How It Was Done in Odessa, a character states in a Woody Allen-esque manner, “Wasn’t it a mistake on God’s part to settle Jews in Russia so they suffer in Hell?” Sergei Eisenstein was also a huge fan of Yiddish slang and Yiddish humor.

Sergei Eisenstein also did a stint in Hollywood, like many other Jewish Bolshevik filmmakers who immigrated from the Soviet Union. Eisenstein completed a script in 1930 for an adaptation of Theodore Dreiser’s An American Tragedy but paramount studios was not too keen on the script so Eisenstein left Hollywood for Mexico. In July 1941, Eisenstein once again appeared in America to speak on a radio program called ‘To Brother Jews of All the World’ as a Soviet Jew. One could say that Sergei Eisenstein did more for Jewish international propaganda than Steven Spielberg ever could. Spielberg may have invented the modern cinematic interpretation of the holocaust, but Eisenstein was able to cover up a Jewish executed Holocaust via Bezhin Meadow. Bezhin Meadow is now forever lost in its complete form. The film now only exists in a “silent film-cum-slide show.” Essentially, the film is just now clips from the actual film with the film’s original score intact. The modern day film school student is introduced to Sergei Eisenstein and usually looks at the director as a boring old fossil. If film schools actually put Eisenstein’s work in context with the socio-political elements that surround them, maybe Eisenstein would still be more of interest to new filmmakers. Also, one can’t forget that Sergei Eisenstein’s Soviet montage editing style that Hollywood has made no lie about utilizing is probably responsible for the so called ADHD epidemic that has plagued the United States.

Works Cited

Bergan, Ronald. Sergei Eisenstein: A Life in conflict. New York: Overlook Press, 1999. MacDonald, Kevin. The Culture of Critique. Long Beach: 1st Books Library, 2002. Seton, Marie. Sergei M. Eisenstein. New York: A. A. WYN, INC, 1960.-Ty E

SEX MURDER ART: OR HOW I LEARNED TO STOP WORRYING ABOUT UNCLE ADOLF AND LOVE TEUTONIC NECROPHILIA

SEX MURDER ART: OR HOW I LEARNED TO STOP WORRYING ABOUT UNCLE ADOLF AND LOVE TEUTONIC NECROPHILIA

While my taste in cinema has naturally become more cultivated as the years have passed and I have become somewhat more increasingly unrepentant in my prejudices, some things have certainly remained the same, especially in regard to my great affection for the truly singular cinematic oeuvre of Berlin blond beast Jörg Buttgereit. Indeed, Buttgereit's four feature-length arthouse-splatter films—NEKRomantik (1987), Der Todesking (1989), NEKRomantik 2: Die Rückkehr der liebenden Toten (1991) aka NEKRomantik 2 - Return of the Loving Dead, and Schramm (1993)—are longtime personal favorites of mine that I revere for a number of reasons, but mainly because they were the first films that I had ever saw that I felt immaculately reconciled my childhood love of horror and exploitation with my later adult appreciation for mostly melancholic European arthouse cinema. In short, Buttgereit's films made me realize that it was not exactly insane to be a fan of both Rainer Werner Fassbinder's In a Year with 13 Moons (1978) and Ruggero Deodato's Cannibal Holocaust (1980). As a result of the generosity of Dutch-born filmmaker and film distributor Nico B (Pig, Bettie Page: Dark Angel), I recently had the splendid luxury of re-watching all of Buttgereit's films in HD after receiving the excellent Cult Epics Blu-ray box-set Sex Murder Art: The Films Of Jörg Buttgereit where the Teutonic enfant terrible auteur justly receives the Criterion Collection-esque treatment. A four Blu-Ray and two CD box-set that includes an informative 40-page booklet and a wealth of mostly imperative extra features, Sex Murder Art not only includes the director's first four features, but also the soundtracks for all four of the films, audio commentary tracks and introductions, fairly lengthy vintage making-of featurettes, the medium-length absurdist pre-NEKRomantik anti-romance Hot Love (1985), and other short films and music videos, among other things that can hardly be described as mere junk filler. Seeing as I have not seen most of these films in a couple years, it was a somewhat nostalgic experience devouring this entire boxset over the course of one single weekend while coming to realize that I love Buttgereit's films just as much as I love the cinematic works of my favorite 'legitimate' arthouse directors like Fassbinder, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Werner Schroeter, Carl Th. Dreyer, and even Ingmar Bergman. On top of everything else, I must confess that I have come to the conclusion that I sincerely believe that Buttgereit is the greatest German 'horror filmmaker' since F.W. Murnau. Of course, re-watching all of these films reminded me of the quite dejecting fact that Buttgereit completely gave up filmmaking when he was in his prime after his masterful serial killer flick Schramm because he felt burnt out and was tired of having no money to work with. Indeed, while Buttgereit did indeed return to filmmaking in a sense in 1999 to direct an episode of the Canadian science fiction TV series Lexx and he would go on to direct various documentaries like Monsterland (2009), the goofy filmed theater piece Captain Berlin versus Hitler (2010), the superlatively silly stageplay triptych Monsters of Arthouse (2013), and one of the three segments of the horror anthology German Angst (2015), none of these films aside from possibly the latter contain the same distinctly Teutonic seriousness, innately instinctual and visceral artsy, unrelenting obsessiveness, gorgeously grotesque clarity of vision and all-around idiosyncratic economic filmmaking that epitomizes his four feature-length works. While Buttgerit discussed in an interview with Loris Curci in Shockmasters Of The Cinema (1996) about how he was working on both a film about a TV show host and a much anticipated cinematic work entitled NEKRomantik 3 (apparently, he even penned two different scripts for the latter), neither of these projects ever came to fruition. In short, Buttgerit more or less committed suicide as a cinematic auteur, which is somewhat ironic considering that he is currently at the height of his international popularity and even has such a loyal following that a number of these fans have demonstrated their dedication to his films by vandalizing their own bodies with NEKRomantik and Der Todesking tattoos.

While New German Cinema unofficially ended in 1982 when the movement's figurative 'heart' Fassbinder died under somewhat dubious circumstances that hint towards subconscious suicide, Buttgerit would ultimately transcend their objective in terms of creating a truly subversive non-commercial underground cinema that would put the works of the most controversial filmmakers of that era like Ulrike Ottinger and Rosa von Praunheim to abject shame. Indeed, quite unlike Ottinger and von Praunheim, Buttgerit did not have the convenient excuse of being 'campy' or gay to get away with his truly transgressive themes and imagery. In fact, in terms of his distinctly German Romanticism and keen obsessiveness with Germany's dark past and stark present, Buttgerit is also somewhat ironically the most German of German filmmakers, even though he was mostly influenced by American sources. As a filmmaker once made a short mocking his own father entitled Mein Papi (1981), Buttgerit also follows in the post-WWII German tradition of depicting a figurative "fatherless society" and a homeland with no true "Heimat" where a true German identity has become intangible due to the ghosts of the Second World War. Notably, while watching the audio commentary for his short Horror Heaven (1984), Buttgerit made a point to recognize that he, like many West Germans of his era, grew up on American trash culture as opposed to traditional German culture, yet amazingly the Teutonic essence of his artistry bleeds through every single frame of his four features as if he was under the subconscious influence of Wotan in a fashion not unlike how Nietzsche was described by C.G. Jung in his 1936 essay on the Aryan war god. Indeed, while Buttgerit might not be aware of these figures, he is indubitably an heir to great German artists of the aesthetically pleasingly grotesque, including bisexual Satanic novelist and screenwriter Hanns Heinz Ewers and Expressionist poet Gottfried Benn, who both became more or less unofficially blacklisted after World War II due to their temporary support of National Socialism, even though both men would eventually be persecuted by the regime. Without even knowing it, Buttgereit would demonstrate a certain solidarity with Ewers and Benn early in his career by daring to direct decidedly iconoclastic films like Blutige Exzesse im Führerbunker (1984) aka Bloody Excess in the Leader's Bunker, which depicts a sort of mad scientist Uncle Adolf attempting to regain power with the help of Eva Braun and the director himself. Notably, Buttgereit was so disinterested in appeasing the authoritarians of political correctness that the filmmaker once dared to screen the short alongside concentration camp footage. Of course, more obviously, Buttgereit is an underground heir to the great German Expressionist filmmakers, especially F.W. Murnau, as well as the German emigrants that came to Hollywood and influenced everything from horror to film noir.

If you listen to the audio commentary tracks featured on the Sex Murder Art Blu-Rays, it becomes quite clear that Buttgereit has a certain latent German pride, but I have my suspicions that he has a special affinity for famous American serial killers of German descent, as if they act as a sort of special imperative link for him between his homeland and the country that culturally colonized his nation after the Second World War. Indeed, aside from the fact that Schramm opens with a quote by serial killer and sadistic sodomaniac Carl Panzram—a sort of Nietzsche of serial killers who had his own personal unhinged Übermensch philosophy of hatred and misanthropy whose parents were from East Prussia—Buttgereit has demonstrated a lifelong obsession with Aryan-blooded macabre momma's boy Ed Gein, whose both maternal and paternal grandparents were German Lutheran immigrants. In fact, not only did Buttgereit pay tribute to Gein with an entire true-crime-tragedy play entitled Kannibale Und Liebe about the necrophile that is set during 1957, but he also actually traveled to his unmarked grave in Plainfield, Wisconsin in July 2012, which he documented with his rather respectful and quite literally titled 2-minute short A Moment of Silence at the Grave of Ed Gein (2012). In an interview with Cinedelphia.com in September 2013, Buttgereit would rightly remark regarding the real-life ghoul and his overall importance on the horror genre as a whole, "I think Ed Gein is the first American Horror-character. Monsters like Frankenstein, Dracula or the Mummy came from the outside. But Gein came from the inside of America [...] I love PSYCHO, TCM and SILENCE OF THE LAMBS. Every film deals with a different aspect of this weird character." Notably, Buttgereit was not the first Teuton to develop a deep interest in the infamous real-life necromantic, as Bavarian wild mensch auteur Werner Herzog met up with Hebraic documentarian Errol Morris in 1975 in Plainfield to work on a film where they planned to dig up Gein's mother's corpse to test their theory that the cross-dressing proto-Leatherface had already dug up his mommy. Unfortunately, Morris wussed out, but Herzog ultimately paid tribute to Gein in his own special way by filming part of his masterpiece Stroszek (1977) in the infamous cross-dressing killer's hometown.

Undoubtedly, one of the most intriguing yet commercially and critically deleterious aspects of Buttgereit's films is that they feature a completely seamless incorporation of both arthouse and exploitation/horror elements. In other words, many braindead glue-snuffing gorehounds find his films to be too 'boring' and 'artsy' while mainstream film critics and academics find them to be too obscenely offensive, politically incorrect, and repugnant to take seriously. Indeed, not surprisingly, German film critics acted like timid little uptight bitches when Schramm was screened at the prestigious Max Ophüls Prize Film Festival, or as David Kerekes explained in his book Sex Murder Art, "Some are convinced that SCHRAMM promises a bright, blood-free film future for the director, but not so the critics at the Max Ophüls Prize Film Festival. Buttgereit tells the author that it's nothing short of a scandal for a film such as his to be playing a 'serious' festival like this. Sure enough, the consensus is that Buttgereit has nothing to say, and his whole film just an excuse to present meaningless violence." Naturally, it should be no surprise that Austrian one-time-auteur Gerald Kargl's arthouse-horror piece Angst (1983)—a truly masterful serial killer flick if there ever was one that would ultimately have a huge influence on the overall style and aesthetic of the films of Gaspar Noé—was also poorly received upon its release, as if most people in the German-speaking world cannot handle films about serial killers because it reminds them too much of the sort of cartoonish genocidal Nazi maniacs depicted in Hollywood films. Of course, arguably more obviously and rudely than any other German filmmaker of the post-WWII era, Buttgereit has unwittingly demolished kosher commie and tiresome Teutonphobe Theodor W. Adorno's decidedly dickheaded dictum (translation: goy golden rule), "Writing poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric" in a most deliciously savage fashion, as an auteur that managed to create, among other things, erotic cinematic poetry in the form of a voluptuous Aryanness wearing a Hitler Youth outfit while in bondage as depicted at the very conclusion of Schramm. Additionally, Buttgereit's wickedly darkly humorous satirizing of Nazisplotation trash like Ilsa, She Wolf of the SS (1974) in Der Todesking would have probably so severely irked dildo Adorno that it would have possibly inspired him to write another extensive esoteric essay on the ostensible innate evilness of krauts and how they should spend the rest of eternity repenting for their sins against Judea.

While Adorno would have certainly loathed Buttgereit's films, his shabbos goy protégé Alexander Kluge (Abschied von gestern - (Anita G.) aka Yesterday Girl, Der Starke Ferdinand aka Strongman Ferdinand)—a lawyer turned cinematic auteur that is arguably the most overtly 'intellectual' filmmaker in German history and who was one of twenty-six signatories to the Oberhausen Manifesto of 1962, which more or less marked the launch of the New German Cinema and a renaissance in German cinema—had enough appreciation for Der Tode- sking to include the infamous Nazisplotation castration in his 20-minute short Das Goldene Vlies, which won the prestigious Adolf Grimme Award. In fact, Kluge caused a scandal of sorts when he managed to get the short screened on television, though a dubious “freak weather accident” conveniently resulted in five minutes of the film to being blacked out, including the infamous Nazi castration scene. Somewhat interestingly, it seems that Kluge saw some genuine talent and inspiration in Buttgereit, as he not only had him on his talk show, but also hired him to direct at least three documentaries. Undoubtedly, for Kluge to work with Buttgereit would be somewhat akin to Godard working with Jean Rollin or Woody Allen collaborating with Jim Van Bebber, but then again I personally believe that the Teutonic auteur clearly has more genuine artistic talent and originality than his French and American counterparts. Indeed, had Buttgereit not been brought up on a steady diet of American trash culture and instead was exposed to traditional German culture, one could argue that he might have evolved into a sort of Franz von Stuck of cinema. After all, Fassbinder also received a similar American cinematic education as demonstrated by his imperative influence from Hollywood auteur filmmakers ranging from Raoul Walsh to Douglas Sirk.

A somewhat prominent figure of the 1980s Berlin punk rock scene, Buttgereit started out directing goofy anarchic Super-8 shorts like Der explodierende Turnschuh (1980) aka The Exploding Sports Shoe, Der trend - Punkrocker Erzählen aus ihrem leben (198) aka The Trend - Punkrockers Speak About Their Lives, and Manne the Mowie (1981) and even co-directed the feature-length doc So war das S.O.36 (1985), which features a number of important Neue Deutsche Welle, Punk, and Industrial bands of the time like Einstürzenden Neubauten, Lorenz Lorenz, Betoncombo, Die tödliche Doris, Malaria, and Die Gelbs. In fact, a good percentage of the people that have appeared in Buttgereit’s films are from the Berlin music scene. Indeed, only in a Buttgereit film like Der Tode-sking will you see weirdo black-haired kraut musician Hermann Kopp naked and committing suicide in a scene that he actually composed the music in a scenario that was based on the dubious death of disgraced West German politician Uwe Barschel. In short, Buttgereit is a true D.I.Y. artist and thankfully he does not go around bragging about this fact as if it were some sort of grand virtue like certain posturing leftwing scenester wimps tend to do. Also, it should not be overlooked that Buttgereit has ties to the queer avant-garde in the form of his handful of collaborations with Michael Bryntrup, who looks like he could practicably be the filmmaker’s twin brother (incidentally, Bryntrup claims on his website bio that he had a identical twin brother that was stillborn). Arguably the two most archotypically Aryan looking filmmakers that have ever lived, Bryntrup fittingly contracted Buttgereit to direct the crucifixion scene for his rather ambitious 35-episode experimental Super-8 epic Jesus - Der Film (1986). Ultimately, Buttgereit returned the favor by having Bryntrup play a less than merciful Aryan Christ at the end of Schramm. Notably, like Buttgereit, Bryntrup also has a sort of reluctant nostalgia for Germany and his family as indicated by his short DER RHEIN - ein deutsches Märchen (1983) aka THE RHINE - A German Fairy Tale, which tells the sad and somewhat sentimental story about how he never got the opportunity to meet his pretty boy uncle Karl-Anton because he was senselessly killed during the last days of the Second World War when he was just 18 years old while defending a toll castle on an island in the Rhine called Pfalzgrafenstein Castle.

From the comic book heroes of Jews like Jerry Siegel and Joe Shuster (e.g. Superman) and Stan Lee (e.g. Marvel Comics) to the sub-schlocky exploitation films of Herschell Gordon Lewis and David F. Friedman like Blood Feast (1963), Buttgereit is somewhat ironically a product of the very same kosher cultural colonization that Nazi Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels so often warned of during his rather eloquent propaganda speeches, yet he has managed to take these virtually aesthetically worthless ingredients and sire something inordinately cultivated and singular, sort of the way that Hans-Jürgen Syberberg managed to do the seemingly impossible by combining the distinctly Teutonic Romanticism of Richard Wagner with the audience-alienating cultural Bolshevism of kraut commie Bertolt Brecht. Of course, also like Syberberg, Buttgereit has also remained a controversial figure that will probably not get his total due, at least while he is still alive (incidentally, Buttgereit once stated, "If you show an American film in Germany then it's not so interesting, unless you're dead like Fassbinder, then it's okay," thus underscoring modern degenerate Germany's sad, pathetic and innately irrational loathing for its own great living artists). Of course, it can be argued that, also like Syberberg, Buttgereit has attempted to symbolically salvage German kultur from the Nazis. Indeed, not unlike Syberberg in his mammoth magnum opus Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977), Buttgereit's Captain Berlin versus Hitler is an example of a filmmaker exorcising Hitlerite demons and reclaiming German history and culture.

As his films, especially NEKRomantik and NEKRomantik 2, aggressively demonstrate, it is like Buttgereit has taken the title of Syberberg's decidedly damning 1977 essay "We Live in a Dead Country" quite literally, as if the auteur subconsciously came to the conclusion that necrophilia would be the greatest metaphor for spiritual and cultural decay that plagues many modern-day Teutons. Notably, as Syberberg quite accurately remarked in his essay, "German cinema is finished in its present structure and the rats are leaving the sinking ship. This country is not only dead, it is not even a country any longer. Centerless. Without a spirituality identity [...] A country deserted by the Jewish intellectuals of film and nevertheless with such a large mafia? In my book I speak of a mafia of the subconscious. Our filmbuffs [sic] are grotesque in their refutation of the efforts of the anti-Semites. The Jews left, the mafia remained." Of course, Syberberg is speaking of the sort of ethno-masochistic kraut philo-

Semites that incessantly kiss kosher ass as an ostensible means to atone for the holocaust, as if that will every change the fact that Hollywood and the majority of Hebrews in general have a totally visceral undying hatred of all-things-Teutonic. Naturally, only the underground could have sired a German filmmaker as subversive as Buttgereit who, not unlike Syberberg, is not afraid to reveal the present necrotizing state of the German Volksgeist. If we are to believe National Socialist philosopher Alfred Rosenberg when he wrote, "Every race has its soul and every soul its race," then I think it is safe to say that, as far as post-WWII directors are concerned, Buttgereit's films embody the most visceral and uncensored expression of the German collective unconscious. Indeed, in their collective unwillingness to reproduce and open embracing of innately hostile aliens with primitive savage religions that are turning their cities into third world hell-holes, the Germans long for death as both a nation and people and one could certainly argue that the passing of this truly great race began with the capitulation of the Wehrmacht 6th Army during the Battle of Stalingrad (indeed, it is no coincidence that Stalingrad is a major motif in Kluge's films, as if it represents a sort of very real reoccurring nightmare for both him and his nation's clearly haunted collective subconscious).

In his fairly short but immaculately sweet autobiography My Last Sigh (1983), great Spanish maestro Luis Buñuel, who had a fairly big influence on some of Buttgereit's films, wrote regarding the imperative influence that his Catholic upbringing and Jesuit education would have on his life and art, "Ironically, this implacable prohibition inspired a feeling of sin which for me was positively voluptuous. And although I'm not sure why, I also have always felt a secret but constant link between the sexual act and death. I've tried to translate this inexplicable feeling into images, as in UN CHIEN ANDALOU when the man caresses the woman's bare breasts as his face slowly changes into a death mask." Judging by Buñuel's rather bold confession, one could argue that Buttgereit has a somewhat similar outlook and that he totally transcended the Spanish surrealist maestro into terms of cinematically expressing the innate link between sex and death. Of course, life begins with sex and ends with death, hence Nietzschean anarchist Georges Bataille's remark, "Death is really the opposite process to the process ending in birth, yet these opposite processes can be reconciled." When it comes to necrophilia, there is no potential for reproduction, thus highlighting its sort of potential poetic appeal for a filmmaker like Buttgereit who seems to loathe his family (or at least his father) and who lives in a suicidal national where antinatalism—an anti-life position that was notably endorsed by Teutonic pessimist Arthur Schopenhauer about a century before it became vogue—seems to be a sort of rampant metaphysical affliction that will only disappear when, somewhat ironically, the last German disappears. In fact, aside from Japan, Germany has the lowest birth rate in the entire world. Indeed, while a mass suicide wave that hit Germany in 1945 when the Red Army began invading the country during the final days of the Second World War (for example, on May 1, 1945, hundreds of people committed mass suicide in the town of Demmin as a result of the Soviets invading the area and committing atrocities, including mass rapes and destroying 80% of the town in a mere three days), one could argue that this disturbing trend still lives on today, albeit in a sort of passive and largely anti-natalist form. Of course, Buttgereit's darkly delightful cinematic Danse Macabre Der Todesking—a truly one-of-a-kind piece of cinema that is arguably the director's greatest contribution to the medium—is probably the most potent example of Germany's tragic tradition of post-Nazi self-slaughter and possibly the most poetic celluloid reminder that transgenerational epigenetic inheritance is real and that virtually every single contemporary German has arguably been accursed with the wartime traumas of their ancestors. In fact, I would not be surprised if all of Buttgereit's four features were the unconscious expression of inherited traumas, but I digress.

Undoubtedly, in some ways I am a hopeless luddite of sorts as demonstrated by the fact that I only just recently got a Blu-ray player, but I certainly do not regret it as it was put to great use for Sex Murder Art, which will indubitably become one of my most used and abused box-sets. If there was anything that I immediately realized after re-watching Buttgereit's films, it is that, quite unlike a lot of the horror movies I loved when I was younger, my appreciation from them has only grown all the more as the years have passed as it is easier for me to see the German auteur's imperative experimental and arthouse influences. Indeed, only Buttgereit could make a film like Schramm that was heavily influenced by a fairly underrated and largely forgotten French arthouse flick like Claude Sautet's Les Choses de la Vie (1970) aka The Things of Life starring Michel Piccoli and Romy Schneider. Likewise, only could Buttgereit not only pay sort of post-punk tribute to Louis Malle's My Dinner with Andre (1981) in a romance film about necrophilia, but do it with a sort of superlatively surreal twist that even outdoes Buñuel in terms of absurdity. In terms of his mastery of poetic cinematic oneiricism on a beggar's budget and seemingly innate and discernibly Germanic talent for decidedly grim Gothic horror, Buttgereit is like a punk F.W. Murnau, albeit seemingly more sexually perverse and nihilistic. Additionally, Buttgereit has probably come closer than any other contemporary horror filmmaker to being a Jean Cocteau of the genre, as his quite clever and creative special effects and camera tricks, as well as shockingly delectable use of dream-sequences, certainly make his films an excellent choice to watch alongside the French poet-cum-filmmaker's singular Orphic Trilogy.

As far as I am concerned, Buttgereit, not unlike the late great Christoph Schlingensiefel (Terror 2000 - Intensivstation Deutschland, United Trash), succeeded in many ways where the would-be-revolutionary filmmakers of New German Cinema failed by concocting an intrinsically subversive and aggressively anti-commercial style of insanely idiosyncratic auteur filmmaking that still manages to fall in the grand Teutonic tradition of irrational Romanticism. Indeed, instead of falling into the sort of commie ghetto of conformity that has severely dated many of the cinematic works of popular New German Cinema filmmakers like Volker Schlöndorff and his bitchy ex-wife Margarethe von Trotta, Buttgerreit embraced a distinct punk Weltanschauung that inspired him to break all taboos, including those relating to Germany's Nazi past, albeit in a keenly cultivated fashion where it is apparent that he is not just out to shock people. In fact, as Buttgerreit explained to Kerekes regard to his utilization of real animal-killings and sort of anti-exploitation approach to gore, "I thought it important to put the rabbit sequence in because there has to be a scene that people are positive is not faked – that it isn't fun anymore. That's why I don't understand this 'Glorifying Violence' argument leveled at us, because every time we cut something up it's a mess. When somebody gets killed, it's a mess. It even takes hours to dig up a grave." While people can say many things about Buttgerreit's films, there is no denying that his features lack the sort of sensational pornographic thrills featured in exploitation films that seem to arouse certain gorehounds, hence his lack of popularity among various horror fiend philistines.

Notably, in an interview with Marcus Stiglegger featured in the book Caligari's Heirs (2007) edited by Steffen Hantke, Buttgerreit remarked in regard as to why he specifically sought to parody Nazisplotation cinema in Der Todesking, "I think of this as an act of liberation, an homage to all those things that were kept from us in Germany presumably for our own good. Once you discover that these things exist, you are equally horrified and intrigued. ILSA was punk rock for me—same thing as Sid Vicious with his swastika." While some might interpret Buttgerreit's attitude to Nazism as reckless or immature, it is indubitably more healthy than the seeming majority of contemporary German filmmakers, who seem to bask in their own completely shameless ethno-masochism and patently pathetic post-holocaust guilt despite the fact that they were not even alive during the Third Reich. Of course, it is most likely this sort of spiritual necrophilia regarding long dead Jews that the NEKRomantik films even exist. As the films of the somewhat mysterious pseudonymous auteur Marian Dora (Cannibal, Melancholie der Engel)—Buttgerreit's virtual cinematic heir—demonstrate, it seems the post-shoah metaphysical affliction has only grown darker and more hysterical and irrational in Deutschland since the release of NEKRomantik, but that is probably to be expected in the era of globalization where Hollywood cultural colonization has guaranteed that Germans and whites in general will be incessantly bombarded with sickeningly sensational big budget agitprop of the holy holocaust oriented sort where the big bad goyim is expected to pay tribute to the glorious six million while ignoring both the many great Hebraic mass murderers of the pasty century like Lazar Kaganovich (who carried his own little holocaust against the Ukrainians called "Holodomor") and Genrikh Yagoda and Israel's staunchly Zionist longtime ethnic cleansing campaign.

While Hollywood continues pouring salt onto old Aryan wounds by incessantly defecting out fictional holocaust film after fictional holocaust film, Buttgereit has intriguingly used the most critically maligned film genre as a means to create the most visceral and curious of Trauerarbeit pieces, as if the auteur had been engulfed in the darkest corners of the German national psyche and felt instinctively compelled to artistically express the morbidly melancholic spirit that was eating away at his soul (notably, Buttgereit eventually developed a stomach ulcer from the stress of filmmaking). After all, arguably the most offensive aspect of Buttgereit's films is the surprising seriousness and inordinate pulchritude that he brings to these totally taboo themes. Of course, in a once proud nation where a good percentage of the people hate themselves so much that they suicidally welcome their own displacement and genocide by refusing to reproduce and embracing the colonization of their country by hostile medieval-minded Muslims that think that all women that do not wear towels on their heads are dirty whores, it is only natural that beauty would come in the form of the moribund, grotesque, and eclectically unnatural. Undoubtedly, it should be noted that the murders in Buttgereit's films more resemble ritualistic sacrifices than mere killings, which is interesting when one considers Bataille's words, "It is the common business of sacrifice to bring life and death into harmony, to give death the upsurge of life, life the momentousness and the vertigo of death opening on to the unknown. Here life is mingled with death, but simultaneously death is a sight of life, a way into the infinite." Indeed, judging by Bataille's remark, one could argue that Buttgereit's single greatest philosophical feat as a filmmaker is that he has managed to make cinematic works about corpse-fucking that are strangely life-affirming.

-Ty E

SHIVERS / RABID: DOUBLE FEATURE
SHIVERS / RABID: DOUBLE FEATURE

David Cronenberg is one of the most versatile and greatest auteurs currently still working/breathing. His record of great filmmaking is seamless, save for one hiccup, his second theatrical release, Rabid. Starring Marilyn Chambers, Rabid begins all so quickly. The film literally opens with a motorcycle being driven off the road, severely burning Rose with an explosion. Taken to the nearby cosmetic alteration clinic, a doctor with more than a few screws loose, ironically named Keloid, opts to submit her to a radical, untested procedure, grafting flesh over the burns with hopes to differentiate the flesh and regenerate tissue. At the time, Cronenberg's pseudo-scientific physical aberrations were a bit artistically repressed but already lacking in the plausibility category. The metaphysical horrors that occupy Rose include a puckering wound located in the host's armpit that emits a tendril fitted with a stinger used to drain the blood out of victims. The sexuality is present but restricted, as was the decision of the CFDC (Canadian Film Development Corporation) after Shivers horrified their noble tastes. The parasitic sexual frenzy within Shivers had disgusted financiers alike and it seemed no one at the time could understand Cronenberg's artistic vision. To capture the carnal demand for Rabid was both the casting of a porn-star and the lust-driven acts of violence committed on screen. Horrific phallicentrism in tow with the insect-like black widow pattern of the diseased Rose, the same blueprint was transfixed from Shivers to Rabid, the "companion" piece to Shivers.

Rabid is a film that can be blindly defended due to the illustrious techniques later employed by Cronenberg. One would be dedicated enough to claim he never made a "bad" film. If these ignorant fools could get their heads out of their asses and face Rabid with a keen eye for a sense of style, they'd discover that there isn't any to be found. Apart from being aesthetically dry or based upon an unbelievable horror premise that coos to "bad biology" (whose best bet for impact relies on the flaws of cellular science), Rabid simply isn't a good film by any standards. Sure, there are "zombies", violence, sexuality, and all of those later assets owed to the king of body-horror's throne, but Rabid is a film suffered by drought and ever-watchful eyes, which affect the script and execution. The Brood brought slick lighting and a sinking feeling of dread. Similar science in The Brood included the incubation of beasts in the mold of a child, what one perceives as the most harmless being of all - perfection and innocence incarnate. Rabid doesn't break any molds with its minimalism in terror, however, Rabid features systematic attacks of "the dead" which is the main facet lifted from Shivers. Instead of an infection as found in Rabid, parasites created by an ambitious doctor are the reason for duress in Shivers. Despite my hostile offensive taken against Rabid, at least it remains leaps and bounds better than similar Romero's post-Night of... diuretic concoction, The Crazies.

The lusts of men are the victims of Rabid, not Rose as a character. You'd consider that Rabid held in esteem the fate of Rose, carrier mother of the apocalypse. But you'd be wrong to believe so. Cronenberg makes no attempt to shove her into the doleful eyes of the audience. When one considers her plight and the urges she cannot control, a whim of empathy is planted. But once she begins to feed, yet again, all pity felt towards this slovenly beast is shed. Shivers, on the contrary, features a cast of characters with whom you can establish a connection to. After all, Shivers is an attack on the middle class and the sexuality confined. These are victims that could be you and I, with the temptation of anonymous sex and parasitic ecstasy. Within the sterile walls of the Starliner Towers, a mega-resort for the bourgeois, lives a terrifying abomination, a parasite designed for the benefits of mankind but might ultimately become its downfall. This plot fixture of Shivers provides immense horror and my highest form of adulation. Ringing with terror towards this strain of venereal disease, promiscuity and the disasters of polyamory, and the confined environment of the self-sufficient, Shivers is such a marvel of its time - a dateless entity that retains the same sociological impact of that when it was released. It's sister, Rabid, is a disgrace in comparison to the intellectual property of Shivers. Only in the final 3 minutes does Rabid supersede its past ill effect and present the only image that could be deemed as "haunting."

The genesis of Cronenberg's body-horror hit full force with Shivers, though. I can shower Shivers with as much praise as I can muster for its daunting schematic of sex and organic assimilation. Adolescent mistresses and a deranged incestuous tableaux await with Shivers. Something as brilliant as Shivers denounces the interpretations one might assess from the early title of The Parasite Murders. When you juxtapose both Shivers and Rabid, the results are of a notable degree of differentiating theories of sexuality. I fancy Cronenberg to be more Freudian than anything, further evidence includes his upcoming film, A Dangerous Method, based around Carl Jung and Sigmund Freud. Jung's philosophies were based with more of a spiritual bite whereas Freud was the materialistic of the two. Cronenberg's thesis of physicality aligns him up nicely with Freud's line of work. Fellow auteur, David Lynch, is admittedly more of a Carl Jung fellow, himself stating that his work isn't intellectual but rather stems from his subconscious. "You don't work with any kind of intellectual thing." Several scenes of aberrant sexuality are frequently at play in Shivers and further the suspense of consummation. Where Shivers had this slimy fear of coupling, Rabid was a one-note female power play in which Marilyn Chambers seduced and destroyed whomever she wanted. Only when she refrained from advancing on her (ex)boyfriend (morphogenetics will do that to you) was the slightest of control displayed for the succubus.

I can honor both films as ending on an excellent note - both desperate and dismal. However, Rabid's finale focused more on the fate of the titular character and the dwelling of mankind was to be done at your leisure. Shivers' affirms that even "old flesh . . . is erotic flesh" and those dwelling within the modern architecture deemed safe are at the mercy of science and eroticism. Both of these prove to be pivotal forces in Cronenberg's early career centered around obviously structured linear experimentalism. While my words and harsh demeanor towards Rabid may be misconstrued as "unfair" or that "I just didn't get it," I'll have you know that if Rabid held 1/4th of the finesse used in the creation of Shivers, I'd be more keen to let the flat story speak for itself, and not the staleness. David Cronenberg created two films within two years that have been deemed companion pieces. I condemn the term "companion" with regards to both films, withal, both films create not an experience but that similar of a Venn diagram - two vastly different but recognizable instances of sexually-charged horror. On one hand, Rabid is a dynamically flawed film discoursing an allegory for the woman, a literal blood-sucker who flings with other men unbeknownst to the partner in search for a hunger within to be quenched. On the other hand is Shivers, the predecessor to Rabid, ultimately more refined and envisioned, which catapulted Cronenberg into a debut virtuoso. What Shivers does, Rabid doesn't. Not only does Shivers appear timeless, Shivers, to this day, is Cronenberg's best literal (and purest) work of horror.

SHIVERS / RABID: DOUBLE FEATURE

-mAQ

SUNRISE: A MASTERPIECE LOST IN TIME

The early masters of cinema are fading in time with each passing year. The world has changed a lot since the silent years of cinema and the film audience has also changed. Ironically, not much has changed in the way of storytelling. People still desire to see a story about a couple in love and the conflicts they encounter. F.W. Murnau's Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) is no doubt one of the greatest love stories to have ever graced the silver screen. The film's German Director F.W. Murnau managed to import elements of German expressionist cinema and bring them to the Hollywood studio resulting in a tale of aesthetically powerful and engaging rediscovered love. Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans is a film that emphasizes the triumph of true love over sham of new subversive love, a film depicting the battle of the old rural life against the promises of a new life found in the form of a cosmopolitan city. In its essence, Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans is a film expressing various related dichotomies facing human beings both during the time of the film's release and even at the present. F.W. Murnau stated in 1927, "It is very strange to me that we have a generation born and grown manhood since the motion pictures were invented, and yet so far, no great poet of the new art has arisen (Fischer 52)." I don't know whether Murnau spoke these words out of pretension or when subconsciously thinking of himself. My belief is that F.W. Murnau was the first great artist and poet of cinema. Although cinematic artists came before him, Murnau was the first to truly master his art before his tragic and untimely death. When viewing F.W. Murnau's small lexicon of films (most of his first being lost), it is obvious that there was an artistic progression with each film. The artist known as F.W. Murnau was born F.W. Plumpe in Bielefeld, Westphalia. He adopted the pseudo surname of Murnau after a small Bavarian town in Germany famous for its artists' colony, the Blaue Reiter group (Fischer 10). Murnau was educated as he graduated from the University of Heidelberg studying literature and art history. His background in history would eventually inspire his artistry as a filmmaker (Fischer 56). In fact, many filmmakers have compared Murnau's mise en scène to that of still life compositions. This is also obvious when considering Murnau's name change. The Bavarian town associated with the famous Blaue Reiter (Blue Rider) movement in Germany of the early 1900's (Fischer 57). It can be expected that a student of art history would have known of the famous art movement and its painters. The Blaue Reiter group was led by Russian immigrant painter Wassily Kandinsky and featured such other painters as Alexei von Jawlensky, Paul Klee, August Macke, Franz Marc, Gabriele Muntz, and Marianne von Werefkin (Fischer 57). While most film directors seemed to be influenced by the theater, Murnau seemed to take influence primarily from painters. This is something that set him apart from most filmmakers of his time (and before him) and even the German expressionist film movement that he was a part of. Sunrise:

SUNRISE: A MASTERPIECE LOST IN TIME

A Song of Two Humans was the first film that F.W. Murnau would direct in America and for Fox Film Corporation founder William Fox. Fox's biographer claims that the legendary producer stated Murnau was "the genius of his age" and that his previous German film The Last Laugh was "the greatest motion picture of all time (Allen and Gomery 93)." These are quite bold statements from a man of William Fox's American cinema pioneering stature. Fox made a very risky move when deciding to import F.W. Murnau and many of his German filmmaking associates to make films for him at Fox Film Corporation. Unfortunately for both Fox and Murnau, Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans failed to even recoup its costs as it was the most expensive silent film made by Fox at that time (Allen and Gomery 91). F.W. Murnau would only make two more films (Four Devils and City Girl) at Fox Film Corporation that both suffered from director's nightmare of studio interference. Murnau's last film would be a co-direction with documentary filmmaker Robert Flaherty appropriately titled Tabu. Soon after the completion (and before the premiere), F.W. Murnau would tragically die in an automobile accident. Although a financial failure, Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans is one of the greatest artistic achievements in cinema history. The very first Academy Awards (1929) took notice as Sunrise received an Oscar (among other awards) for "Unique and Artistic Production" despite the film's lack of monetary success (Fischer 14). The award predated the "Best Picture" Oscar. Englishman Charles Rosher and German Karl Struss also received the first Academy Award for Cinematography (Fischer 15). To call the cinematography work in Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans breathtaking would be an understatement. Englishman Charles Rosher learned a lot of his craft and techniques from German cinematographer Carl Hoffman while working on F.W. Murnau's adaptation of Faust (1926). Rosher stated of Hoffman, 'I took several ideas back, including a dolly suspended from railway tracks in the ceiling which I adapted for Sunrise.' Rosher's assertion is no surprise when taking a look at the seamless and flawless long shots so prevalent in Faust. I would be lying to not acknowledge the crew members that contributed to Sunrise in very crucial ways. F.W. Murnau

The story for Sunrise was written by Murnau collaborator Carl Mayer, which he adapted from a story written by Hermann Sudermann (Fischer 12). Carl Mayer, an Austrian writer, was a major player in German expressionist cinema and even co-authored the script of the iconic Das Cabinet des Dr. Caligari. Mayer decided to stay in Germany during the production of Sunrise (Fischer 12). Another important member of the Sunrise team was set designer Rochus Gliese, who contributed a lot to the overall look of the expressive film. I can't imagine a contemporary set designer putting as much detail as the atmospheric swamp found in the rural farm in Sunrise. This is a scene that no doubt caused a cold chill to sneak up the back of audience member's necks upon viewing the film. F.W. Murnau wasn't the only German director to pack his bags for America. Out of all the other German Expressionist filmmakers to decide it was time to work in Hollywood, Fritz Lang is the only other one worth praise in the same league as Murnau. Lang's German films were of a much grander scale than most of Murnau's, as seen in Die Nibelungen (1924), Metropolis (1927), and the sound film M (1931). Fritz Lang's influence on contemporary Sci-fi films is obvious upon viewing (especially Metropolis). Lang even made cinematic politic attacks against Adolf Hitler and the Nazi party with his film The Testament of Dr. Mabuse (1933). Nazi Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels said of the film: 'I shall ban this film...because it proves that a group of men who are determined to the last...could succeed in overturning any government by brute force (Eisner 130).' Unlike Lang, F.W. Murnau was a fairly apolitical film director that thankfully never saw the day that Adolf Hitler took power in his homeland. Fritz Lang was also supposedly offered (according to Lang himself) by Goebbels to be the head of the Nazi propaganda film industry despite being of half Jewish ancestry (Eisner 131). Lang would eventually make his way to America and direct Anti-Nazi propaganda film such as Man Hunt (1941) and Hangmen Also Die! (1943). Unlike Murnau, Fritz Lang had a very long film career spanning four decades. Lang had his largest and most lavish production during his German era. Unfortunately, most of his American films are considered B films and some later ones even unwatchable. Fritz Lang did, however, direct some of his best films in America (despite their budgets). Lang's Scarlet Street (1945) is one of the greatest and most brutal film noirs to ever be made. A film that echoes back to Lang's shadowy German child murder masterpiece M starring Peter Lorre as the pathetic killer. Despite working in the same genres and film movements, Murnau and Lang are fairly different directors. Murnau's films are much more soft focused and atmospheric in nature. F.W. Murnau was an individual more interested in artistic elements of the film being very specific to the very last detail. Fritz Lang seemed more interested in telling a very dark story and emphasizing the visual power (but not necessarily artistic power) of special effects. Fritz Lang's influence can be easily seen in more recent Sci-fi films such as Star Wars IV: A New Hope (1977) and Dark City (1998). F.W. Murnau's influence on cinema is much harder to find (aside from Nosferatu) nowadays. Of course, Fritz Lang's career lasted much longer than Murnau's, so who knows what type of influence (if any at all) Murnau may have had if he had lived a full life. Both F.W. Murnau and Fritz Lang have contributed a wealth of important films to the history of motion pictures. To accurately compare them in terms of significance and quality would be pointless.

Fritz Lang

The year that Fritz Lang directed the first in his Mabuse series (Dr. Mabuse the Gambler) was the year F.W. Murnau released his most widely known film Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror (1922). Nosferatu is in many ways the polar opposite film in way of approach to Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans. Nosferatu (based on the novel Dracula by Bram Stoker) takes a realistic approach to a supernatural story whereas Sunrise takes a sometimes dreamlike approach to a fairly realistic story. F.W. Murnau utilized real castles in ruins found in Eastern Europe to give Nosferatu an authentic feeling of gothic horror. This was in extreme contrast to the often elaborate sets designed for the typical German expressionist film. Sunrise uses a variety of dreamlike and surreal scenes to derive emotions you wouldn't expect from such a simple story. Contemporary American auteur Martin Scorsese called Sunrise a 'super production, an experimental film and visionary poet (Fischer 52).' Quite powerful words from a man often considered one of America's greatest filmmakers. After a scene of making up between man and wife in Sunrise, they stroll down a busy street full of traffic that magically turns into a beautiful country field. The scene derives emotions of natural and pleasant love via surrealism. When one thinks of surrealism, they generally think of an image that is initially surprising and even absurd. Early surrealist directors such as Luis Buñuel (An Andalusian Dog, 1929) and Jean Cocteau (Blood of a Poet, 1930) utilized surrealism and dream sequences as an unconscious ambiguous art. F.W. Murnau manages to use this abrupt appearance of the country field as a sign of a love that was thought to be lost, once again appearing. Scenes like this one (and countless other found within Sunrise) are a true testament to the magic of cinema. Another important scene using the surreal (or dreamlike) is when identifying the dichotomy of differences between the city and the rural. The femme fatale vamp makes her intentions and desires apparent early on in Sunrise. During a very atmospheric scene bordering on gothic horror, the farmer protagonist of Sunrise meets the city girl (dressed like a flapper) in a secluded swamp. She convinces the farmer that he must drown his wife so that she and the man can move to the city together. A dreamlike image (playing like a movie screen for the farmer and the vamp) is then superimposed over the swamp featuring the farmer's wife falling into a river with the inter title "couldn't she get drowned?" Images of the city also float over the swamp to entice the farmer of a new life in a developing city. Like the images superimposed over this, the promise of a new life seems more dreamlike than real in the first place. The super fantasy element of living a life in the city is more a dream of the farmer than something he will actually commit to (which of course, he doesn't). The farmer finally realizes the errors of his ways and almost ends up killing the city girl. Sunrise wasn't the only film that F.W. Murnau directed dealing with the "purity" of the rural and the appealing modern vices of the city. Murnau's third and final film with Fox Film Corporation, City Girl (1930), originally titled Our Daily Bread, also confronts the crucial differences between the rural and the city (and the people in each). Murnau's final film Tabu (1931) also deals with a similar theme. The sudden appearance of civilized Westerners comes to jeopardize the sacredness of Polynesian islanders and their spirituality. This also works hand in hand with the two Polynesian couples desire to go forward with a forbidden love (the ultimate "Tabu") that predictably ends in tragedy. Many of Murnau's films put trust more into nature (and its unexplainable natural mysticism) than that of science and logic. F.W. Murnau's gothic vampire masterpiece Nosferatu also takes view. Initially, the people of the fictitious German city Wisborg, blame the sudden occurrences of death of the townspeople on the plague. Their rational and logical assumption is proven to be untrue when they realize that the killer is no other than the horrifying vampire Count Orlock. F.W. Murnau, a man that received a formal university education, still felt more compelled to look at the horrors affecting in a supernatural way than a logical one. This type of psychological escapism is most likely part of the same genius that made Murnau the cinematic genius that he was: a genius that was never truly understood in Hollywood. Like many other German and Austrian immigrants who came to America to work in the Hollywood studio system, F.W. Murnau was a victim of discrimination. This antagonistic attitude occurred almost immediately when the towering and lanky director began working on his first American film Sunrise. Many of the European directors were seen as 'Prima Donnas' and their unique craft was seen as "weird" instead of innovative (Fischer 19). It can only be assumed that Americans were full of jealousy and intimidation when confronted with European filmmakers. After all, Sunrise combines elements of Europe and America into a hybrid of the highest of form of cinematic art. Fox studio head William Fox (who was an immigrant from Hungary) also felt it was necessary to make a statement about the discrimination and stereotypical labels that Americans placed on European filmmakers. Fox denied Sunrise being a "strange" and "weird" film. His reasoning for making this statement was, "because of the exotic and sometimes freakish character of the majority of foreign films which have been shown in this country (Allen and Gomery 102)." William Fox's statement is obviously geared towards the common American filmgoer and critics as he felt Murnau's innovative film The Last Laugh (as stated earlier) was "the greatest motion picture of all time (Allen and Gomery 93). It is obvious that F.W. Murnau had no type (at least openly) of hostility towards the United States upon viewing Sunrise and his subsequent films. The trend of discriminating against European film directors and crewmembers didn't stop during the silent and early sound Hollywood studio era. Later exports like Roman Polanski would also face similar discrimination (prior to the charges brought against him). It is understandable that American born filmmakers working in the Hollywood studio system would be in fear of foreign born filmmakers making more impressive and superior films in their indigenous countries. During the release of Sunrise, The United States was still a fairly puritanical nation in fear of the foreign "other." This would explain the contrived moral element found in Sunrise in context of both female love interests. The farmer's wife is a very traditional puritan looking woman. She seems to have completely dedicated herself to both her family and husband. Her long blond hair is tied back and her choice of dress is very conservative. The woman from the city, on the other hand, is in complete contrast to these puritanical elements. She is a woman that dresses

SUNRISE: A MASTERPIECE LOST IN TIME

SUNRISE: A MASTERPIECE LOST IN TIME

in all black (very obvious symbolism for the time) and isn't someone you would want to bring home to your mother. The woman from the city also has very short hair that flappers of that time period would have. Flappers were known to be very "loose" women who indulged in hedonistic activities. American flapper actress Louise Brooks, who starred in the German film production Pandora's Box (directed by German G. W. Pabst), even posed nude during that socially restrictive time period. Louise Brooks During the silent era, women were generally split into two opposing categories, the virgin (pure in action) and the whore (usually a Vamp). When examining Sunrise, the farmer's wife obviously being the virgin (despite having a child), and the promiscuous city girl as the whore. The "pure" woman of the silent era was often considered to be childlike, fulfilling the Victorian ideal of what a woman should be (Fischer 41). The farmer's wife is certainly someone of that nature. The city girl, on the other hand, is independent. She has spent time conspiring and has concocted a plan for the farmer to kill his wife and go with her to the city. Feminist film critic Janet Staiger stated of the female character of the Vamp, "The character of the vamp seems almost to be merely a foil for an extensive examination of the power of sex, women's rights in this new age, and the crumbling belief in the assertion that some nineteenth century notions of the family's behavior were still pertinent for twentieth-century America (Fischer 43). When examining F.W. Murnau's film lexicon (often visually and thematically subversive in nature) and his own personal background (he was a Homosexual and family black sheep), it becomes apparent the dichotomy of women found in Sunrise was most likely formed by pressure put on Murnau. As I stated before, Murnau's films were also fairly apolitical in nature and his mind strictly geared toward artistry (first and foremost). The thought of a woman that thinks independently is really not something you would expect Murnau to fear. Despite condemning independent and promiscuous women in his films, F.W. Murnau befriended these types of women in real life. Swedish actress Greta Garbo was a good friend of Murnau. She was such a good friend of Murnau that she commissioned a death mask to be made of the director after his death (Anger 246). The mask would stay on top of her desk during all of her years at Hollywood (Anger 246). Greta Garbo was also assumed to be a bisexual and had various relationships with women including Hollywood actress and screenwriter Salka Viertel (Anger 246). Growing up in a proper family background, F.W. Murnau learned how to adapt to certain repressive and proper backgrounds. Having to do this in the Hollywood studio system for American audiences would have been no problem for the director. Despite having to submit to the moral conformity of American culture and the Hollywood film studio system, F.W. Murnau had the potential to change the look of the Hollywood film. Had Sunrise been popular with the American film going audience, the aesthetic of American film would have most likely changed with it. William Fox took the chance with the "German genius" and the end result was not to his monetary liking. Sunrise was doomed (like the director) from the beginning. The film was poorly promoted and released during the time when Al Jolson's The Jazz Singer had changed the way Americans watched (and listened) films (Allen and Gomery 103). Although Sunrise features a variety of complimentary music and sounds, it was no match for the one man singing shows performed by the legendary Al Jolson. On top of competition with other groundbreaking films, Sunrise was just too European for American audiences. America's animosity towards the European "other" (despite most Americans being of European descent) just didn't help to make Sunrise appealing. F.W. Murnau's early death only caused the director to be forgotten in America much sooner. Considering only two of his American films survive in their entirety (Sunrise and Tabu) and the lack of public interest in the silent era, the chance of the average contemporary filmgoer stumbling upon Murnau's work is very slim. The death of F.W. Murnau is even one of mystery and confusion. Rumors surrounding Murnau's death in an automobile range from the late director crashing the car himself, to the director's hired fourteen-year-old Filipino valet Garcia Stevenson riding off the road as Murnau performed fellatio on the teenager (Anger 246). The mystery of F.W. Murnau's death parallels lack of information on who the German born director was and where he ultimately derived his genius from. The influence of Sunrise on American cinema today is virtually (if not completely) nonexistent. F.W. Murnau's most influential film (in an American and international context) can be assumed to be Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror. Most filmgoers can vouch for having at least seen an image of the frightening grotesque and icon vampire Count Orlok. German New Wave director Werner Herzog would pay tribute to his German cinematic grandfather with his remake Nosferatu: The Vampyre (1979). A recent Hollywood vampire film, 30 Days of Night (2007), features a variety of vampires that were obviously influenced by the ghastly stare of Count Orlok. Hollywood film Shadow of the Vampire (2000) also tells a fictional tale of F.W. Murnau and his cinematic quest to direct Nosferatu starring a real vampire. My introduction to Murnau was also with Nosferatu. Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans is a film all serious fans of cinema should take upon themselves to view. A cinematic poem, Sunrise is a film which gave evidence that the form of the cinema could be changed. This is a film that showed much promise for the future of cinematic and aesthetic achievements. Sadly, Hollywood found the film incapable of producing large sums of money. Hollywood has become less and less interested in art over the years and more interested in sneaking in advertisements in scenes. I hope that F.W. Murnau has no ghost as he would be haunted by what Fox Film Corporation has turned into.

Works Cited

Allen, Robert and Douglas Gomery, ed. Film History: Theory and Practice. New York: Knopf, 1985. Anger, Kenneth. Hollywood Babylon. New York: Dell, 1975. Eisner, Lotte. Fritz Lang. London: De Capo Press, 1976. Fischer, Lucy.

SUNRISE: A MASTERPIECE LOST IN TIME

Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans. London: BFI, 1998.-Ty E

THE ANTI-AESTHETIC APPROACH OF PAUL MORRISSEY

The average moviegoer usually expects to be sensationalized and wowed when going to see the latest product pumped out by the showman in Hollywood. They judge a film's quality a lot of the time by how innovative the special effects are and how much money is put in the film. The reason for this is that when looking at a film from the perspective of someone who doesn't have an educational background in film studies, the most obvious aspect of the film is its visual power. The undeniable revolutionary success of James Cameron's The Titanic and Michael Bay's Armageddon are a testament to that.

Cult auteur Paul Morrissey never had it in his mind to create the most visually stunning of films. I don't think he even had it in his mind to even learn the basics of cinematic technique and editing. His Flesh trilogy is more of an artistic attack on the "peace and love" generation than a display of his cinematic sense. Paul Morrissey's aesthetic is one of crudely exhibiting hedonistic nihilism and despair. The unconventional director merely placed his camera in a spot and captured a lost generation. A group of individuals that have given up the security of a Bourgeoisie life for the promise of a drug "mind expanding" and "free love" society. Paul Morrissey's "Flesh" trilogy is an assault on those that fell prey to the promise of "liberation" from the fascism of Western Civilization and Christianity.

Auteur Paul Morrissey refused to work with any individuals using drugs when producing films for the legendary pop art icon Andy Warhol (Yacowar 1). Morrissey may be the most hated artist that Warhol "discovered." Surviving member of Warhol's entourage Stephen Koch stated of Paul Morrissey, "A very typical young man in a hurry. That was not really the Factory style: pushiness was out (Yacowar 2)." Paul Morrissey's decidedly reserved and rather traditionally conservative manner was in complete opposition to what you expect in Andy Warhol's army of artists. Paul Morrissey introduced a stripped down version of America cinema that emphasized the emptiness and absurdness of the love generation, and turned it into a revolutionary art.

Paul Morrissey was mainly interested in exposing the failure and de-evolution of the late 1960's love movement. He was also obsessed with body worship and the sexual appeal of drug addict little Joe Dallesandro. Morrissey made an exception to his "no drug addicts allowed" rule when casting real drug addicts to portray the pathetic habits of addicts. Joe Dallesandro's sexual appeal and charisma worked to capture audience members that might be put off by Paul Morrissey's obvious assault on the love generation. One could say that Paul Morrissey's Flesh trilogy films are anti-drug porn flicks disguised as a Cinémavérité document. No matter what way you look at it, Paul Morrissey captures an almost depressingly realist world that is so bizarre and disconnected that it borders on the surreal.

THE ANTI-AESTHETIC APPROACH OF PAUL MORRISSEY

Novelist and philosopher Ayn Rand brought up in her book The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution, a collection of criticism of the late 1960's peace generation and her famous anti-Kantian philosophies, the fact that the average college student was more interested in going to Woodstock and getting high off various drugs than the Apollo 11 moon landing (Rand 75). Not only did the average American college student show little interest in the moon landing, but they also dismissed it as "mere technology (Rand 75)." This example that Rand emphasized goes perfect with the criticisms that Paul Morrissey displays in his Flesh trilogy. The love generation is more interested in having fun than taking responsibility for themselves and the progression of mankind.

The same individuals criticized in Paul Morrissey's Flesh trilogy and Ayn Rand's philosophies often refer to themselves as humanitarians and altruists working towards "progression." The reality couldn't be farther from the truth (especially when in context with the flesh trilogy). The first thing to look at is that the love generation was commonly enslaved to their hedonistic tendencies and vices. Little Joe in the Flesh trilogy can barely get off his couch and is many times naked. He doesn't mind being a slave to his own addiction. His actions parallel that of his naked baby featured in Paul Morrissey's first film in the flesh trilogy Flesh. Like his baby (who appears to be not much older than one year), he crawls around naked and his only real focus is food (for Joe it's mainly drugs). Little Joe is essentially an adult age baby. If this is a sign of progression, than the world may really be heading towards an apocalypse.

Ayn Rand said that the "New Left" also portrays their admittance of not wanting to live in reality as they choose to be drug addicts. Furthermore, Rand emphasizes that hippies that call themselves "individuals" but are in reality pathetically docile conformists. She goes on to say, "unable to generate a thought of their own, they have accepted the philosophical of their elders as unchallenged dogma-as, in earlier generations, the weakest among the young conformed to the fundamentalist view of the bible (Rand 77)." Little Joe in Paul Morrissey's second film Trash (a word used to emphasize the drug addicts in the film) has conformed to the worthless and reality disconnected world of a full blown heroin addict. His only ambition is to obtain money in order to buy drugs.

Many of the individuals of the hippie generation were inspired by the anti-reason philosophies of German Immanuel Kant. Ayn Rand even went as far as calling Kant the first hippie (Rand 65). Kant's anti-reason philosophies would go on to inspire Karl Marx and Marx's theories would go on to cause the largest amount of deaths in humanity history (especially in the Soviet Union and China). Kant's collectivist theories would also go on to inspire fascism and national socialism (Nazism). Whether it be hippies, Nazis, or communists, Immanuel Kant's anti-reason and anti-individualistic theories have only caused destruction.

I doubt little Joe is a fan of philosophy, but he is no doubt a product of it. The environment Joe lives in is one of desperation and neglect. I think it would be safe to say that Paul Morrissey had to do very little in the way of set design (of course this working to the films advantage). Little Joe lives in a one room apartment in Flesh and he can't even seem to keep it maintained. He has a child with a girlfriend who needs to borrow money for her friend's abortion. The idea of abortion seems like a necessity when taking in consideration the lifestyle that these two "parents" have taken up. Two individuals that can't even function together (or on their own) have no right bringing up a child.

A topless female friend of little Joe even states, "the more you learn, the less you will be happy." With this scene, Paul Morrissey makes it clear that "the love generation" prefers ignorance and hedonistic escapes over reality. The young woman also goes on to talk about how she wants silicone breast implants. For this scene (and the majority of other scenes in the Flesh trilogy), Paul Morrissey merely lets the camera roll as a virtual voyeur to capture the de-evolutionary nihilism of the peace movement.

Heat, the final film in Paul Morrissey's Flesh trilogy, examines a washed up child actor (played by little Joe) and his relationship with a washed up star. The film is essentially a loose remake of Billy Wilder's film noir masterpiece Sunset Boulevard. The washed up star (who can be assumed to be around 50 years old) also has a daughter who has decided she hates men and has turned into a lesbian. The daughter now has a girlfriend and a child. Paul Morrissey attacks the woman's liberation movement and free love with this character. Like Joe, the girl is sexually free (even performing a sexual act on a mentally retarded young man she just met) and has no control of her life. All characters in Heat are a mess as they can't even control their most archaic of sexual instincts.

In Heat, little Joe uses sex as a way to get what he wants (as he does in the rest of the flesh trilogy). He has sexual encounters with both his unflatteringly overweight landlord and the aging star. Little Joe obviously has no type of self respect or integrity. He is only interested in obtaining what he needs by doing as little as work as possible (usually with sexual acts). Heat is Paul Morrissey's most aesthetically daring film (at least in his flesh trilogy). The film actually features a somewhat memorable soundtrack and is filmed in more than just a few rooms. An old mansion is even used similar to the one found in Sunset Boulevard. Paul

THE ANTI-AESTHETIC APPROACH OF PAUL MORRISSEY

Morrissey attacks Hollywood and the way they treat their stars once they are no longer of any type of monetary value.

Paul Morrissey's flesh trilogy is both an attack on the cultural subversion of the late 1960's and the film industry that supported it. Morrissey portrays flower children as irrational and ignorant existentialists always looking to satisfy their hedonistic pleasures. The characters featured in the flesh trilogy are presented as so pathetic that it's absurd such individuals would be allowed to have any type of ideological view (let alone tell anyone else how to live). Paul Morrissey's anti-aesthetic parallels the hollowness and desperation that the characters in the flesh trilogy exhibit. I seriously doubt that Mr. Morrissey had any type of respect for the late 1960's hippies and the Hollywood films (Easy Rider, Woodstock documentary, etc.) that promoted them.

-Ty E

THE ANTIFASCIST WAR FILM

All war films have an agenda. Whether it is anti-war or pro-war, these thematic propaganda pieces center themselves around one major purpose. One of the most prevalent of the war films is the antifascist war film. The first of the antifascist war films started springing up before and during the Second World War. This was in response to the spreading of fascism in Europe which was a response to the Bolshevik internationalists calling for global revolution. Jean Renoir's Grand Illusion (1937), Michael Curtiz's Casablanca (1942), Fritz Lang's Hangmen Also Die (1943 film based on the assassination SS Obergruppenführer Reinhard Heydrich), and William Wellman's The Story of G.I. Joe (1945) are excellent examples of effective antifascist world war II cinema. Interestingly enough, the majority of antifascist war films came from Hollywood (as opposed to the Soviet Union). In post war Europe, antifascist war films started popping up almost immediately. Italian director Robert Rossellini's (originally a director of fascist propaganda films) Open City (1945) and Germany Year Zero (1948) were effective Italian neorealist film's that used the ruins of Europe as its settings. Both of these films contained an authenticity that has never been matched in their presentation of a destroyed Europe. The antifascist war film has taken various approaches in conveying its message. Unfortunately, the majority of these films are highly unintelligent, fundamentally flawed, and lacking any type of cohesive message. Some of these films are even so ridiculous that they would fit better in the fantasy adventure genre (with Spielberg's Raiders of the Lost Ark). Many of these films also use the same characteristics supposedly utilized by fascists and their propaganda. A "black and white" look at war is obviously the most effective and straightforward form of propaganda. You can analyze any Hollywood war film (or Hollywood film in general) and figure that out. American and International war films greatly differ. Whether it is execution, political agenda, artistic integrity, or set design, global perspectives on film making greatly vary. This is no different for the war film and the antifascist war film. For this essay, I will analyze two antifascist war films from the United States and two antifascist war films from Europe. The first being Steven Spielberg's Saving Private Ryan (1998) which I believe to be the most straightforward and symbolic of America's interpretation of the second World War. The second American World War II film I will be examining is Samuel Fuller's The Big Red One (1980). I believe this film to be the most realistic and holistic view of America's involvement in the Second World War. The two European anti-fascist war films I have chosen take much different approaches in getting their messages across. The first being Soviet propaganda film Elem Klimov's Come and See (1985). This film uses an unconventional combination of the real and surreal to get its hellish, lucid dream message across. The second international film I will analyze is Italian Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salo, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975). This film takes the most unconventional approach to both the war and antifascist film. Its artistic usage of human sexual and physical degradation acts as metaphorical symbolism for fascism. Not something you would expect from the typical American antifascist war film. Steven Spielberg's Saving Private Ryan is one of the most popular, if not the most popular of American World War II films (and American films in general). Despite its violence and use of obscene words, ABC aired the film uncut and with limited commercial interruption on Veteran's Day from 2001-2004 (de Moraes, 2004). It's safe to say that most Americans have seen or at the very least heard of Saving Private Ryan. At the academy awards the film also won awards for Best Cinematography, Best Sound, Best Sound Editing, Best Editing and Best director for Spielberg (Clarke, 2006). Saving Private Ryan takes a fairly simple and direct approach to the American World War II combat propaganda film. The film starts with an old man visiting the cemetery of Americans who died in Normandy. Next thing you know its June 1944 and American's (The English contribution was not acknowledged) are landing in Normandy. Body parts and blood start flying immediately. These scenes come out more resembling a cheap and gory horror film than as the dramatic deaths of U.S. soldiers. A Unit of U.S. soldiers are on the search for Private Ryan. All of Private Ryan's brother's have died in the war and they want the last of the brothers to go back home. Most of the units of U.S. soldiers are killed in their mission to locate Ryan. At the end, you find out that the old man from the opening of Saving Private Ryan is the elderly Ryan. The only thing the film seemed to accomplish was embarrassing sentimentalism, naive patriotism, and an extremely distorted and inaccurate view of history. The only political element to Saving Private Ryan was the acknowledgment of anti-Semitism in National Socialist Germany. The way that this is responded to is immature at best. A Jewish Private Stanley Mellish lets German POWs know that he is tough by waving his "Star of David", while chanting "Juden" repeatedly. Later in the film Mellish dies heroically fighting a German one on one. This scene was in contradiction to Spielberg's "every Jew is a victim" theme found in Schindler's list. I also doubt Spielberg would ever mention that over 150,000 Germans of Jewish descent fought in Hitler's army (Rigg, 2004). It seems that Spielberg was trying to allude that the United States got into World War II to save the Jews. He also tried to create a similar myth in his film Amistad by attempting to make the viewer assume that the American Civil War was fought to free the slaves. Steven Spielberg seems to want Americans to think that every war fought in the past couple hundred years was to battle racism. This works hand in hand with Spielberg's utilization of sentimentalism that he has helped to contaminate Hollywood with. Steven Spielberg wants Americans to have an idealist and illogical view of the world. He wants Americans to think they are "progressing" in their battle against evil. That's probably why he's the master of fantasy and adventure. "The good war" wouldn't be complete without allied myths and distorted tions. Because of course, the bad wars were fought against Communism (Korea, Vietnam, etc). The Wehrmacht (mostly comprised of conscripts) German Army is seen as cowardly and evil. The U.S. soldiers learn their lesson when they don't kill an unarmed POW Wehrmacht soldier (which Spielberg strategically used the ugliest German possible for). Later the captain is killed by that same POW. The message Spielberg is giving is not to spare one German soldier's life as they are all enemies. The German language in Saving Private Ryan is referred to as "filthy pig Latin." For Spielberg even the German language is a forbidden taboo. Spielberg also had the German language substituted in Schindler's List for the more friendly English language. I don't think he wanted to scare anyone with the mean and "hunnish" German language. Spielberg's token attempt to humanize German soldiers is through the babbling of "betty bop" and other childish things. But it really isn't to humanize Germans. It's just to discredit German stoicism and strength which self determination promotes. Spielberg also didn't want to give credit to Nationalist Socialist Germany's Swastika. It is only seen once in the film (graffiti on a wall). I guess even acknowledgement of the enemies symbol would be too extreme. But factual acknowledgements aren't Spielberg's objective. He proved that in Schindler's List, when he conveniently forgot to acknowledge that the mentally ill Commander of Krakau-Plaszow (Amon Goeth) was arrested by the SS for brutality against inmates (Critchley, 1997). Saving Private Ryan's "battling against Nazi fascism" theme has no substance or intelligence. You never really get an answer as to why you're supposed to hate Nazis and Fascists. The only accomplishment of the film was the respectful acknowledgement of those that died in World War II for the United States. I don't believe Steven Spielberg was mature enough to handle such material. He should stick to making kid's films. Director Samuel Fuller was another Jewish American to tackle the antifascist World War II combat film. The major difference between Fuller and Spielberg is that Fuller actually participated in the war (Spielberg wasn't even born until 1946). Fuller's The Big Red One follows U.S. soldier's through North Africa, Sicily, D-Day landings, and eventually the liberation of Falkenau concentration camp. This gives the viewer a more realistic, holistic, and complete view of the United States involvement in Europe during World War II (in comparison to other World War II films). In The Big Red One, the German enemy is at least acknowledged as human (unlike Spielberg's films). The politics of the war are for the most part, neglected as the soldiers see each other as fighting other soldiers. At the end of The Big Red One a German soldier is even saved by American soldiers. The narration by Mark Hamill goes on to say that he had more in common with the German soldier than many of the American soldiers (since he had lived the war so long). This was a bold move on Samuel Fuller's part as he crossed the barrier of "black and white" that most American war films subscribe to. Fuller tackles the Nazi holocaust in a more mature way than most films on the subject. After liberating Falkenau concentration camp, a soldier notices an oven (which we can assume bodies were burned in). The soldier then finds a German soldier inside it and shooting. He continues to do this for a while as his emotions have overwhelmed him. His shock has turned to hatred which is a truly human response. In comparison to other World War II films, The Big Red One is not as highly recognized. This came as a shock to me after watching it as it gave me the most historically informative perspective on the war (like Patton). Since The Big Red One was recently reconstructed (the original version being heavily cut), it may finally get its due. After watching the film I didn't feel like I had just watched a hateful and hypocritical film, like when I watched Saving Private Ryan. Most American films dealing with World War II are generally combat films (like Saving Private Ryan and The Big Red One). I can assume one of the reasons for this is monetary. Films that bring up intellectual and philosophical questions regarding politics and war are most likely not going to make money. Hollywood films (since its beginning) for the most part have always appealed to the lowest common denominator as the American film industry is a business. Although Saving Private Ryan is first and foremost a money making product, it is also a propaganda piece (and effective at that). Americans are entertained by its cheap violence, sentimentalism, and patriotism. World War II was the last war the United States really won and to watch Saving Private Ryan is to make a proud American. No intellectual thought is regarded to enjoy the film and that makes the best propaganda. I personally would like to see an American that intellectually tackles fascism. A film that takes an unconventional approach that raises both philosophical and intellectual questions. American society needs to be challenged. If you hate something, you should at least know a little bit about it. International war films, I have to admit, are my true love. There is such a variety of films produced globally that offer so much to the viewer, film's that have something new with each viewing. I am not one for overused conventions. International war films offer me countless cinematic structures relative to nation of origin, auteur (most of these films are auteur pieces), culture, and socio-political climate (but not limited to). The two international war films (Come and See and Salo, or 120 Days of Sodom) I will analyze are from the Marxist perspective. Since the directors involved in these films were obviously not interested in money, art and propaganda was their priority. Being Marxist in nature, neither director was afraid to experiment as proved in the originality of the films. With most Marxist War films, the antifascist element is obvious and direct. The fascist being the eternal enemy of the Marxist, is given the relatively proper treatment in these films. The difference in these two films is the approach and execution. Elem Klimov's Come and See (1985) was one of many films in a series to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of Germany's surrender (Chambers, 1996). In the film, a young teenage boy named "Flora" is forced into joining Soviet Partisans in resistance against the Waffen SS. Throughout the film Flora experiences the horrors of war. As Come and See progresses, Flora's face becomes increasingly horrified, complimenting the tone of the film. Come and See was done in a quite realist fashion. The film was shot on Steadicam allowing the viewer to feel as if they were watching a documentary (Chamber, 1996). This style of realism echoes back to the films of Soviet Cinéma vérité pioneer Dziga Vertov. Like Vertov's films, Come and See is a realist film that at the same time is surreal. This combination of opposites created a truly disturbing look at war, making Apocalypse Now look like it was directed by Michael Bay. To add to the film's realism, most of the SS uniforms used in Come and See were originals worn by German and German contracted (Slavs, Poles, Russians, etc) soldiers in World War II. Live ammunition was also used. Aleksei Kravchenko, the actor that played Flora, stated in a video interview (found on the Kino DVD release), that bullets were passing 10 centimeters above his head. It seems that the Soviet Union didn't have as much problems with insurance companies like Hollywood. Since Come and See is shot from the perspective of a young teenager, it is initially apolitical. Flora knows there is a war and eventually to his horror starts seeing dead bodies. The worst is seen through his eyes when he sees a whole village burned a live in one building. As this point, Flora seems almost completely detached from the world. So many things he couldn't possibly comprehend he has witnessed with his own eyes. The true antifascist sentiment of the film comes when the remaining members of a recently destroyed SS unit are captured. The angry and vengeful partisans question the soldiers about their actions. One of the SS leaders cowardly calls out "kill the fascist pigs" in hopes that they will spare his life. An older German SS Major (Sturmbahnführer) tries to convince the partisans that he's an old grandfather that just wants to get back to his family. After seeing the atrocities committed earlier in Come and See it is crazy on their part to even contemplate mercy. Finally another SS man speaks with his true beliefs. Earlier in the film he told people in the building (that was eventually burned down containing the entire village) that they could leave if they didn't have children. One of the partisans inquires the SS man on his reason for saying this. The SS man goes on to talk about how that the Bolshevism starts with the children. He goes on about how parasite races spread the Bolshevik disease. Almost immediately afterwards the partisans unload bullets on all the captured SS men. One characteristic of Come and See that is comparable to Saving Private Ryan is the presentation of German soldiers. The soldiers are ugly, maniacally laughing, and take pleasure in killing. At one point a German soldier starts repeatedly shaking his head from left to right with his lips flapping in the air. When he finally stops he laughs barbarically almost mimicking a baboon. Saving Private Ryan's presentation of German soldiers was tame in comparison to Come and See. Come and See presents the fight against fascism as a means for Slavic survival. It wasn't a matter of them disliking fascism; they just wanted to spread bolshevism. Fighting fascism was fundamental to Soviet survival. At this point in the Come and See Flora understands what the war is about and has finally accepted his roles as a partisan soldier. The film was able to present a clear and logical reason for its antifascist propaganda. Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salo or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) has a very unusual and unconventional format to get across its strong antifascist sentiment. The title of Salo is derived from The Republic of Salo, the Fascist state which was set up in the German-occupied portion of Italy in 1944. Salo is also the area where Pasolini's brother Guido was killed during the Second World War (Schwartz, 1992). This fact adds to the already very personal production of Salo. Salo features some of the most depraved and disturbing scenes ever committed to celluloid. Rape, sodomy, and sexual dehumanization are seen throughout. The victims of these acts are eighteen young men and women. Throughout virtually the entire film, all of them are naked and under the complete sexual dominance of their fascist controllers. At one point a girl is even forced to eat the feces of the duke. Later, all the fascist leaders have a huge dinner with the prisoners where they all dine on feces. The president has much enjoyment eating feces and flirting with one of his young male prisoners seated across from him. Pasolini presents fascism as the dehumanization and destruction of the individual. None of the sex scenes in Salo are even remotely erotic. Sex has become something that is done at the command of the fascist government without warning. Humans are turned into objects of pleasure for fascist leaders who can't control their own power. Throughout the film the young prisoners are also forced to hear perverted sex stories from middle aged prostitutes. Pasolini felt that the language of Power in fascist Italy corrupted, degraded, and brought with it the objectification of the body (Schwartz, 1992). The narration by the prostitutes gets so out of hand that it perfectly complements the bad dream feeling of the overall film. As the viewer you even feel dehumanized. Pier Paolo Pasolini succeeded in delivering his antifascist message via sexual nightmare. Europeans seem to have a more clear view on Fascism having experienced it firsthand. This is obvious viewing the countless European films dealing with it. Americans never experienced firsthand the repressiveness and horrors of fascism. American soldier's toured Europe and battled its soldiers, but never knew what it felt like to be a victim of it. American war films reflect that. As brought up before, the majority of American war films are combat films (as they should be). They provide the viewer with entertainment, mostly unnecessary melodrama, and American patriotism (even in the antiwar films). It will be interesting to see what the future holds for American war films.

THE ANTIFASCIST WAR FILM

THE ANTIFASCIST WAR FILM

THE ANTIFASCIST WAR FILM

-Ty E

THE BANKING SCAM OF MULTICULTURALISM AND THE DEATH OF THEO VAN GOGH

Nothing has cost the Western World more destruction (aside from war) than cultural Marxist idealists and movements. I just got done watching Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange again after various viewings this year (one of my all time favorite films), and I can't help to laugh at the beating Alex gives to the cosmopolitan intellectual husband and wife in their very home at the beginning of the film. Alex scams the couple into letting the gang of droogs in after claiming "there was a terrible accident" and minutes later their world falls apart. I laugh not because of the beating they take but how their naïve intellectual idealism is what leads ultimately to their downfall. As we find out later in A Clockwork Orange, the husband is crippled and the wife is dead. Still the "intellectual" has retained his altruistic idealism and claims that poor Alex is "a victim of the state." Of course, this old geezer is quick to change his mind when he finds out that Alex was the leader of the gang that put the man in his wheelchair and his wife in a coffin.

But as we all know, A Clockwork Orange is a work of dystopian fiction. I'm going to now take a look at an event that is film related that happened just a couple years ago. In 2004, Muslim extremist Mohammed Bouyeri brutally murdered Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh. Van Gogh, a descendent of Vincent van Gogh, had recently directed a short film that appeared on Dutch public broadcasting network television which criticized the obvious misogyny and double standards found in Islam. The short Submission was written by Dutch feminist Ayaan Hirsi Ali and directed by Theo van Gogh. Theo van Gogh with only ONE Beer Left Theo van Gogh Dead Submission is just over 10 minutes in length and features a naked woman covered in verse from the Koran. The woman plays the voice of four different women that suffered abuse from their power hungry radical Islamic father. The woman's only wearing a veil over her face (and nothing covering her body) is obviously symbolic of Islam's treatment of women as a sexual object and not an individual. One of the testimonials involves a woman talking about how "Allah" likes women to be "pure" and "clean" yet various men (like her Husband's brother) have defiled her. Unsurprisingly, the literal translation of "Islam" is "Submission". Hence, the film's completely appropriate title. The Islamic killer Mohammed Bouyeri apparently has a thing for amputee and necrophilia pornography. I don't believe that the rotting and legless have that much in the way of "purity." Maybe Bouyeri thought that killing an infidel Dutchman would boost his sexual desire for a woman that actually has all her limbs and even possibly is alive. The questions I have for Allah is if a woman has a female circumcision, is she still pure? Dutch liberals have welcomed many different cultures into Holland. This ongoing trend of "Globalization" has flooded Europe with immigrants from abroad, and from the look of things it has only caused damage. For an individual like Theo van Gogh to be murdered in his own country for having an opinion, is a sign of a serious problem. Van Gogh is artistic royalty in his homeland and for an ethnic Moroccan (who has "Dutch" citizenship) to silence him with death is an outrage. For the international bankers, it has brought them almost unlimited power with very little fight from European (and American) nationals. Racial tensions are things that internationalists love to instigate. They really don't believe that multiculturalism, feminism, and other cultural Marxist "isms" will work. The bankers fund these subversive political and social movements so that they can destroy nationalism and loot these countries for what little they have left. Islam has no place in Europe as its Archaic and barbaric nature isn't even up to date with the mores of Europe hundreds of years ago. The Dutch thought that they were being "open minded" by allowing such "diasporas" infiltrate their country and now the "melting pot" is starting to boil. Neo-Nazis have been starting to gain momentum in Holland and abroad as "multiculturalism" only causes racial tensions, not destroys them. The same thing has been going on in the United States for decades and it is inevitable that chaos will ignite. You can guarantee that the bankers are counting on it.

THE BANKING SCAM OF MULTICULTURALISM AND THE DEATH OF THEO VAN GOGH

-Ty E

THE CRUDE REVOLUTIONARY AESTHETIC OF SWEET SWEETBACK'S BAADASSSSS SONG

Many film critics and historians have called Melvin Van Peebles Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song the first blaxploitation film. I slightly agree and disagree with that assertion. The subsequent so-called blaxploitation films were for the most part directed by whites in Hollywood after they realized the monetary success of SSBS. The film was unexpectedly a huge financial success and the businessmen in Hollywood took notice. Although only budgeted at $50,000.00 (most of the money coming from people in the black entertainment community), SSBS grossed over $15 million dollars (Merritt 218). SSBS would change the way the Hollywood film industry looked at the American black community and film audiences there on out. Hollywood knew that they could cash in.

Novice filmmaker Melvin Van Peebles starred, wrote, produced, directed, composed, and edited Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song. I think it is safe to say that SSBS is an auteur piece. Van Peebles had only directed two films before the successful SSBS. His first feature length film was a 1967 adaptation of his novel The Story of a Three Day Pass (Merritt 216). Extremely controversial for its time, the film was a romance about a black American soldier who falls in love with a white French girl (which was filmed in France). Melvin Van Peebles second feature was produced by Columbia pictures in Hollywood. Watermelon Man (1970) is a race comedy about a white racist who unexpectedly wakes up to find himself black. Although both of Van Peebles first two features were controversial and possibly offensive to white audiences during their releases, neither films came close to the powerful cinematic assault of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song. Black Panther leader Huey Newton even called SSBS "a great revolutionary document (Merritt 218)."

Mel Gussow of the New York Times stated of Melvin Van Peebles and the success of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song, "The first black man in show business to beat the white man at his own game (Van Peebles 7)." Gussow's bold statement resonates quite true. Melvin Van Peebles succeeded in creating a low budget film that had a better return than most big budget Hollywood studio system films of that time period. SSBS's is also an unconventional (especially at the time of its release) film that questions the calculated "aesthetics" of Hollywood. Like other unconventional filmmakers of the late 1960's and early 1970's, SSBS takes a different angle in constructing a cinematic work. Low budget auteur directors Paul Morrissey (the Flesh trilogy), John Waters (Pink Flamingos, Desperate Living), and even Dennis Hopper (Easy Rider) also paved the way for future subversive directors.

Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song was shot on 16mm resulting in an aesthetically gritty film that compliments its controversial content. For the most part, SSBS uses non actors and other individuals that weren't part of Hollywood unions (Van Peebles 73). Melvin Van Peebles also told Hollywood unions that he was making a black porno film so that they would have nothing to do with it (Van Peebles 73). By casting non actors, Van Peebles was able to capture a certain realism that Hollywood has never been capable of capturing. The aesthetic realism of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song echoes back to the days of Italian Neo-Realist such as Vittorio De Sica (The Bicycle Thief), Pier Paolo Pasolini (Accattone, Mama Roma), and Roberto Rossellini (Open City, Germany Year Zero). Like the Italian Neo-Realist directors before him, Melvin Van Peebles was able to create a film that captures the true essence of the proletariat and his natural environment.

THE CRUDE REVOLUTIONARY AESTHETIC OF SWEET SWEETBACK'S BAADASSSSS SONG

Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song is also a film that appealed to more than just the black American film audience. The film features a variety of acid washed color shots that would appeal to the hippie drug crowd. Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (which features similar acid color sequences near the film's conclusion) also appealed to the hippie audience and utilized the obvious drug advertising line, "the ultimate trip." Furthermore, Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song features a soundtrack by Earth, Wind & Fire, a group popular among both blacks and white hippies. White hippies were generally more accepting of radical ideals and revolutionary movements. Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song was a film that the hippie movement could appreciate.

Due to the film's fairly low budget and for the most part inexperienced crew, Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song has its fair share of cinematic and aesthetic blemishes. A good number of the night sequences are fairly underexposed and somewhat visually confusing. At the same time many of these sequences emphasize the character and action in the scene. This is especially true when Sweetback kills two cops who have just assaulted a black revolutionary. The character and action are emphasized in a way that forces the viewer to focus on the action. This scene almost has a supernatural feel as Sweetback kills the police officers with their own handcuffs. Unintentional blemishes can sometimes work to a film's advantage. French New Wave director Jean-Luc Godard made no lie of his accidental blessing during the editing of Breathless, resulting in the ever so popular jump cut.

A good portion of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song involved Sweetback running through various terrains from the cops. Throughout these often occurring sequences, the Neo-Jazz soundtrack accents Sweetback's run from oppression. These sequences predate the MTV music video and have a very fluid power. Film critics and historians have compared these sequences to the hymn of pain and transcendence that were firmly part of the tradition of African-American songs and literature (Merritt 217-218). Melvin Van Peebles stated of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song, "The message of Sweetback is that if you can get it together and stand up to the Man, you can win." During the conclusion of SSBS, Sweetback escapes the white cops and crosses the border to Mexico. Although Sweetback isn't much of a role model for the black community (as he is a murderer, hustler, and womanizer), it was important to have a film where a black man actually stood up to the notoriously ruthless "man."

Another controversial sequence in Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song is when young Sweetback, taking place during the American depression era (played by Melvin Van Peebles son Mario), has simulated sex with a full grown woman. The pre-teen Mario is completely nude as is his much more mature first sexual partner. During sexual intercourse, the woman screams that young sweetback has a "sweetback." Hence, the reason why the protagonist is called Sweetback. Had this film been released today, it would have been called "child pornography." This scene is crucial however as it affirms to the audience Sweetback's sexual powers. Throughout Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song you see how Sweetback sexually dominates every woman that he comes in contact with. It is no doubt that one of Sweetback's biggest appeals is high performance hustler sexual persona.

Another interesting element of Sweetback's aesthetic appeal is his hustler outfit. His complete wardrobe looks like someone took the outfit out of an early Western and stylized it for a cooler than cool black hero. Like the ideal Western hero (or antihero), Sweetback is a stoic lone man that speaks little and acts with a purpose. The women love him and the men fear him. White cops will do anything to stop him as they see him as a serious threat (and as a cop killer). Had Sweetback worn generic clothing, his appeal would have been much less powerful. He is an enigma and is often one of few clues (besides his actions) that let the viewer know who Sweetback really is.

One of the most crucial aspects of Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song is the setting of the film. Melvin Van Peebles made sure to film SSBS in an urban black area to capture a realistic view of Sweetback and his community. The cast of the film is credited as "starring the black community." Like casting non actors, real urban settings work the same way atmospherically as the Italian Neo-Realist films did. You get an authentic feel of the streets. I couldn't imagine Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song being filmed in a studio with generic gritty streets and nice new exploding cars. The fact that Melvin Van Peebles worked with such a low budget only added to the film. When a filmmaker lacks funds, they have to think more inventively and creatively. Mr. Van Peebles thoughtfully had his mind set on the proper settings for Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song.

Melvin Van Peebles's son Mario recently directed a biographical film on the making of Sweetback titled appropriately Baadasssss! (2003). The film is an enlightening and very entertaining look at the problems Melvin Van Peebles (starring son Mario) encountered before and after the production of SSBS. The film is based on the book by Van Peebles Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song: A Guerilla Filmmaking Manifesto. Like Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song, Baadasssss! features a variety of political and controversial circumstances surrounding the early 1970's. I feel that Baadasssss! is the perfect companion piece to SSBS and an excellent update for new generations. Baadasssss! is a testament to the power of one man and his crusade to break crucial grounds both in a cinematic and socio-political manner.

THE CRUDE REVOLUTIONARY AESTHETIC OF SWEET SWEETBACK'S BAADASSSSS SONG

Revolutionary and Black Panther leader Huey P. Newton stated, "On many levels Van Peebles is attempting to communicate some crucial ideas, and motivate us to a deeper understanding and then action based upon that understanding (in reference to SSBS)." Although I wouldn't agree with all of Sweetback's methods (some being counterproductive), Huey P. Newton is right in his assertion. Newton went on to say, "He has certainly made effective use of one of the most popular forms of communication-the movie-and he is dealing in revolutionary terms (Van Peebles 5)." Mr. Newton no doubt understands the crucial power and impact of the film medium. Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song is one of the most powerful films to ever grace the screen of the movie theater. The film's crude and gritty aesthetic gave the viewer a powerful message in a realistic context. Not many American films can say the same thing.

-Ty E

THE GAY JEWISH NAZI THAT INSPIRED STEVEN SPIELBERG'S INDIANA JONES

Steven Spielberg has been utilizing the medium of film for decades now to express a variety of his juvenile driven obsessions. His most obvious (at least for some) and successful obsession is coming back in touch (if he ever left) with childlike sentimentalism. There has yet to be another "filmmaker" who has done as much as Spielberg to infantile the mind of the average American (and international) film goer. Another big obsession of Steven Spielberg is fiercely dehumanizing Nazis (and Germans in general) collectively to the point of absurd monster caricatures. Unfortunately, this obsession of Steven Spielberg has come back to bite him in the ass. Spielberg's Indiana Jones and the Raiders of the Lost Ark is one of the biggest franchises in international film history. The film's hero and protagonist Indy is a powerful man that has the ability to survive any natural obstacle thrown at him. Indy is said to be modeled after Nazi SS Obersturmführer and German medievalist Otto Rahn. Like Indian Jones, Rahn set out to find ancient human legends. Of course, there is more to Otto Rahn that might give Spielberg more problems than a little bit of anxiety.

Despite being an SS man, Otto Rahn was an open homosexual and this inevitably led to his downfall. In 1937 Rahn was forced to work at Dachau concentration after getting in a drunken homosexual quarrel. This wasn't the worst of Rahn's unfortunate problems as the young scholar also happened to be Jewish. This was revealed in Richard Stanley's documentary on Otto Rahn The Secret Glory. Being a Jewish homosexual in the SS must have been hard on Rahn as he committed suicide on 1939. He was found frozen to death near a mountain region in Tyrol, Austria. Otto Rahn had no restraints in letting his later disgust with the SS be known. Otto Rahn quit the SS in 1938 and in his diary he wrote: "There is much sorrow in my country. Impossible for a tolerant, liberal man like me to live in the nation that my native country has become." I think that is safe to say that Otto Rahn's involvement in the SS was merely a way for the young medievalist to pursue his goal of finding the Holy Grail. Asiatic eyed Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler felt Otto Rahn was the right man for the job in handling occult ventures for the Third Reich. I don't think Steven Spielberg would enjoy hearing that the real Indiana Jones was a gay Jewish Nazi. Indiana Jones and the Raiders of the Lost Ark is a much more interesting film when looking at it in context to the historical facts relating to the film. At the end of the film, Nazi's faces burn off in Steven Spielberg's hopes that the movie going audience will cheer in joy. Indiana Jones and the Raiders of the Lost Ark features a few gruesome Nazi deaths yet it received a PG rating. So my question for Spielberg is, does a gay Jewish Nazi also deserve to get his face burned off?

Watch Video Excerpt on Otto Rahn's Jewish Ancestry

-Ty E

THE LAST ARYAN ALIVE: ROY BATTY
THE LAST ARYAN ALIVE: ROY BATTY

Rutger Hauer's performance as Roy Batty in Blade Runner is without doubt the most emotionally powerful one in film. Before Batty's death, he recites a beautiful speech to Rick Deckhard (while also sparing the "Blade Runner's" life). Batty tells Deckhard in his remaining minutes of life, "I've seen things you people wouldn't believe. Attack ships on fire off the shoulder of Orion. I've watched C-beams glitter in the dark near the Tannhauser Gate. All those... moments will be lost in time... like... tears... in rain." After the poetic speech Batty accepts his fate and says his final words "Time... to die." Afterwards, his head merely falls down in the rain and his dead hand releases a white dove. But I believe that Batty's death is more symbolic than that of "Human and replicant" relations, for Roy Batty is the last Aryan alive. The world featured in Blade Runner is one of postmodern filth and the end of culture. America is now completely inhabited by third world street dwellers that don't seem to mind the streets being flooded with overwhelming amounts of trash. All forms of past culture are jumbled together in a degree that their roots are impossible to distinguish. For example, a group of midget sized gang members speak German among one another as they go on a journey of thievery. The past of that language has been deracinated to the point that the language itself might as well have not existed in the first place. The neo-Bolshevik scam known as "Globalization" has truly conquered the world in its destruction. Roy Batty is a human engineered "Aryan Superman" and the "prodigal son" of Eldon Tyrell. Tyrell makes no lie in his arrogant pride for his "replicant" inventions. Roy Batty, being Tyrell's greatest "invention," only ends up killing his father. Roy Batty is only putting Eldon Tyrell out of his own ugly misery when he gouges his eyes out and crushes his skull. Roy Batty, although human engineered, has far exceeded his father in intelligence, beauty, humanity, and strength. In Philip K. Dick's novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? (the book Blade Runner is based on), the Tyrell corporation was originally called the Rosen corporation. It can be assumed that Hollywood would have nothing to do with a Jewish surname being used for the name of an evil "Godly" inventor and his earth destroying corporation. Hollywood would rather have you believe that the evil Anglo "Tyrell" was the root of such diabolical international destruction. But the reality is the Rothschilds (through their headquarters in London finance in their own bloody words), "governments, corporations throughout the world." The Rothschilds have paid for and caused more death than any group in history. I am sure they would be offended to be called "Anglo-Saxon." In the world of Blade Runner, "Aryans" no longer exist. They have been dissolved from the earth (as they are being now), by a series of cultural Marxist subversive political movements, third world international influx, and lack of overall international morals. The Joseph Goebbels' advertised "master race" fell to an outside group of self-proclaimed chosen "masters." Rutger Hauer was the appropriate choice for Roy Batty because as a Dutchman he represents one of the highest points of Germanic culture. Long ago detached from Germany and the Germans, the Dutch established their own rich history of cultural achievements that ever since the end of World War II have been "fading into history." Eldon Tyrell (or more appropriately Rosen) gave birth to a new type of Aryan that only his materialistic god complex could fathom. The man whose corporation destroyed the whole world has now met his demise in the form of his own monster. Roy Batty, a replicant designed for off-world combat, and the brutal battlefields of war. Tyrell (like The Rothschilds), have never confronted the horrors firsthand that their money cowardly paid for. Eventually, the master will have nothing left to destroy but himself. Roy Batty, the ideal Superman, destroys the aesthetically and emotionally appalling destroyer...

-Ty E

THE LEGACY OF NEKROMANTIK
THE LEGACY OF NEKROMANTIK

Super 8 mm has become an almost extinct film format. Released in 1965 as an improvement over 8 mm film, Super 8 mm provided American (and abroad) families with a clearer format for home movies. Oddly enough (or not so when considering monetary factors), Super 8 mm would be later utilized by underground horror guerilla filmmakers. The inexpensive and easy to use Super 8 mm film format only accented the already gritty nature of countless macabre masterpieces. The greatest of these films being German auteur Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik.

Nekromantik grabbed my attention due to its reputation for its controversial subject matter (Necrophilia isn't the most common subject found in films) and disturbingly perverse cover art. After viewing the film for the first time, I was surprised by its beauty and artistic merit. I expected it to be more on the lines of cheap Euro trash exploitation such as SS Hell Camp and Erotic Nights of the Living Dead. Director Jörg Buttgerit is not only obviously a fan of horror, but of European master directors such as Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Ingmar Bergman, and Jean-Luc Godard. Witnessing the killing and skinning of a rabbit at a young aged might cause some undesirable psychological effects. Nekromantik protagonist "Rob" was certainly effected as he has incorporated death into his sexual activities. Rob takes a job at a street cleaning agency and decides to bring a fairly rotten body with him. Girlfriend "Betty" has become aroused by the dead causing a truly bizarre love triangle. It seems very unlikely that necrophilia (and the blood that drips out of it), could look so good on anything other than Super 8. Of course Buttgerit proved this theory wrong in his sequel Nekromantik II: Return of the Loving Dead.

Jörg Buttgerit's three subsequent films: Der Todesking (1989), Nekromantik II: Return of the Loving Dead (1991), and Schramm (1993) prove his progressiveness and maturity as a director over the years. It's a shame that it has been so long since he has produced a feature (he has been director TV episodes for over nearly 10 years). One has to wonder whether or not Mr. Buttgerit is unable to secure finances or decided to call it quits after making four masterpieces. Nekromantik has already shown its inspiration in the German production Cannibal (based on the 2001 real videotape of German cannibal Armin Meiwes and his lunch/willing victim) directed by Marian Dora. Buttgerit's influence has no doubt also become international. Russian Director Andrey Iskanov (Nails, Visions of Suffering, and Philosophy of the Knife) and Spanish director Nacho Cedra (Aftermath, Genesis, and The Abandoned) are two other auteurs that have combined sex, death, and art to give viewers the most sensual of cinematic experiences. The Bloody Hitler mustache sporting Ilsa - She Wolf of the SS parody featured in Der Todesking. When I think of the true New German cinema (or at least over the past 25 years of it), I don't think of Tom Tykwer's Run Lola Run or Wolfgang Becker's Good Bye, Lenin! Nekromantik is a truly German film. Its dichotomy of the beautiful and the rotted, the empathic and the brutal, and live and the dead speak more about a country with a conflicting history. Jörg Buttgerit is also one of few German directors to confront Germany's National Socialist past. He goes even far as to make a joke about it (with the pseudo snuff Nazi exploitation film seen in Der Todesking). Jörg Buttgerit is not afraid of showing blond haired, blue eyed boys and girls in the middle of postmortem sexual activities. Nekromantik is not the only great horror film shot on super 8. Leif Jonker's Darkness: The Vampire Version (1993), J.R. Bookwalter's The Dead Next Door (1988, Sam Raimi secretly produced), and more the recently John R. Hand's experimental Frankenstein's Bloody Nightmare offer the horror fan a different way to look at the genre. Canadian psychosexual auteur Guy Maddin has also utilized Super 8 in various shorts and features he has created (Cowards Bend the Knee 2003, Brand Upon the Brain 2006). These films made me realize that super 8 is a highly neglected format in regards to its possibilities in film. Although these various films and directors greatly differ, they all guarantee the most demanding of horror fans a different world to become enthralled in. The future of the Super 8 mm format (and film in general) looks bleak. If Jörg Buttgerit were to finally make a fifth feature, would it be shot on DV? If so, it is safe to say that Nekromantik would still dominate that feature aesthetically. A lot of great Hollywood filmmakers have even gone the route, including David Lynch who vows he will never shot on film again. Super 8mm will always have a place in film history. There is something special about a film when it looks like it was dead and buried then unearthed from hell.

-Ty E

THE LEGEND OF DOLEMITE: NOT AS BIG OR BAD
THE LEGEND OF DOLEMITE: NOT AS BIG OR BAD

Since the dawn of mankind and its wondrous inventions, Black people have been mocked, parodied, portrayed as less than intelligent, beaten down, spit on, and many other horrible, horrible things. No act of atrociousness will ever be able to independently relieve the humor spring-loaded behind the entire culture. Even from the early remnants of film has the Negro been made to look a damn fool and with role models like these, where else is there to go but down? In fact, the public image of the average African-American has been relentlessly haltered by hillarriouss news articles depicting a rather "retarded" love for a certain fried poultry. As to not get started on a down-key note, Rudy Ray Moore is a fellow I can appreciate. His morals, humor, ghetto tell-all attitude, and brazen yell only add to his ability to stick to his dreams. He is a man who had an insatiable appetite for all forms of art, branching from modeling for his "Party records" to acting/producing/and editing his own creations of soul. In all his forms of ghetto art, there hasn't been a proper chronicling of his achievements and life story. God knows that the Biography Channel would rather swallow a mouth full of testicles than to report on an icon that made "nigger" a household phrase. What kills is the irony when Rudy Ray Moore decided within the last months of his life that this word was unacceptable and should never be uttered again, all the while I'm watching The Human Tornado listening to every other character exclaim about a "nigger" in the vicinity. The Legend of Dolemite: Bigger & Badder is the documentary I'm "reporting" on. For being a blissful "retrospective" of his entire career, I found this feature to be numbingly boring and only worthy of a make-shift prop to put an end to that wobble in your antique coffee table. At least this documentary succeeds in being informative, right? While I don't love this documentary as much as newcomer Fox loved Man On Wire, I do find very minuscule facets of this film to be enough to sake me into continuing rather than shutting off my television set and fantasizing about watching a film that doesn't completely bore me. The main outlet for entertainment are the "interviews" shot on cellphone quality cameras with no tripod nor stand. Everything from low-brow rappers to second-rate comedians compliment the legacy that Dolemite has left. Checklist. Trashy amateur interviews? Check. A Microsoft PowerPoint-like presentation? Check. Recycled footage from Dolemite DVD's we already own canceling most of the actual run time out to a mere 20 minutes? Check. What Xenon Pictures has funded* is completely oblivious and soulless at the same time; a role that hasn't been filled since the birth of Helen Keller (Yes, I accept hate mail). When this documentary isn't focusing on a rather boring middle school scenery drape with an elderly Dolemite intersected with clips of him in rather Kwanzaa-enthusiastic outfits, this film does absolutely nothing else. That's another secret. You will have your time wasted with such valor. Rather than continuing to verbally slaughter this documentary, allow me to move on the topic of the missed late great Rudy Ray Moore. Here is my disclaimer of dissatisfaction towards an adored icon that decided to change his pleasurable ways at the nearsight of death. Fact: The events transpiring in this screenshot are as unnecessary as watching the "documentary" discussed throughout. I found that the longer Rudy Ray Moore drew breath, the more radical his thoughts were becoming. It's as if the politically incorrect facility that was his train of thought had gone bankrupt and opted to serve as a soup kitchen instead. After all, it's all for the children. Rudy Ray Moore is like a scornful father to a genre that he influenced, crafted, and molded into his own personal blend of humor, subtle racism, and ghetto folklore. Within the questioning, Dolemite is quick to call the genre of blaxploitation "crude". He starts rambling like an angry Protestant swearing death upon those that labeled his films such. If "The Godfather isn't considered Italian exploitation" (This quote is a loose version of what he said which brings about the exact same point) then his Dolemite films shouldn't be called a Black exploitation film. Well my dear Rudy, The Godfather doesn't feature and preoccupy itself with artful imagery of "niggas" running amok, fucking white desperate housewives, and pimping karate hoes. "Well, that isn't apart of Italian culture" is what I could see him feebly responding with to which my reply would shoot forth calling him a bigoted racist ultimately turning the race card on him after all these years of "Kill Whitey" mentality and label him the father of a dead end culture. Rudy Ray Moore succumbed to the specifically lethal complications of diabetes in October before seeing his final Halloween. It's venomously lethal to consider The Legend of Dolemite: Bigger & Badder to be his definitive legacy put on film. Hopefully we'll see a Hollywood adaption of his life on the big screen in twenty or so years. Considering the rate that Will Smith's parasite child Jaden is acquiring roles to butcher, we might have to see this "Karate Kid" ruining one of our favorite blaxploitation star's image. The only act his "documentary" pulled was a vanishing trick right before teaching Dolemite a brief lesson of humility. From allowing him to contradict himself and demonstrating a film editor's ability to render the same jokes used in three different stand-up performances, I cannot tell what the most dismal asset of this film is, or perhaps the end of his career and sadly, his life. Looking forward to the Dolemite Explosion, I have but little to hold on to other than the blissful memories of Petey Wheatstraw. As I've said, I love Rudy Ray Moore to death but I lack the compassion to forgive a lethal case of senility.*It's impossible to tell what this DVD company partakes in seeing as how many Special Feature content lists are inaccurate and the improper scene selections plague many copies.

-mAQ

THE ONE YEAR ANNIVERSARY MESSAGE FROM THE SS
THE ONE YEAR ANNIVERSARY MESSAGE FROM THE SS

American media, especially electronic media, has always been a forbidden place for those with a different worldview. If you never liked Karl Marx, Sigmund Freud, or MTV, you are immediately seen as suspect by the gate keepers of thought control. Modern universities have become psychological gulags where even the most slight differing of opinions is seen as criminal. Those that preach tolerance are always the least tolerant. However, technology has always had a way of doing things that it's maker never intended to. Stanley Kubrick knew it when he directed 2001: A Space Odyssey.

The internet is a form of media that has presented a problem for those who seek to mold minds into cattle lines. Individuals on both sides of our so called "two party system" are already calling for censorship. The H.R. 1955 Violent Radicalization & Homegrown "Terrorism" Prevention Act of 2007 is on it's way to silence the voices of those individuals that actually value their "right of free speech." But why censor voices when there is nothing to hide? The recently deceased author Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn quickly realized the dangers of being vocal in a place that values serfdom as his masterpiece The Gulag Archipelago demonstrates. At Soiled Sinema, we value freedom of speech and research. We also value the challenging of contemporary norms, mores, and history. Soiled Sinema is a blog dedicated to those cinema fans that aren't afraid to look at modern film and film history critically. Soiled Sinema is also a place that attempts to note films that are taboo, under appreciated, over appreciated, or have never seen the light of day. We only ask that the serious and sometimes not so serious fan of cinema at least seriously consider what we have to say. With our blog, the writers of Soiled Sinema have taken risks to deliver forbidden knowledge, subversive speculation, critical analysis, and taboo art.

Soiled Sinema has just passed it's first year of existence. We regret nothing that we have written, nor will we ever. Soiled Sinema is here to stay and only plans to grow. Italian poet, intellectual, film director and writer Pier Paolo Pasolini was a man that truly did what he felt. He may have died for his masterpiece Salò or the 120 Days of Sodom, but he never cowered to accepted public opinion. Neither did Jean Cocteau, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, or even Lucio Fulci(at least from what I know). Out of respect to our favorite filmmakers, we at Soiled Sinema will continue to write our personal honest opinions and research on the art of cinema. After one year of existence, we owe our fans(and haters) a big THANK YOU! Sincerely, Ty E and maQ

THE PERSONAL AESTHETIC INFLUENCES OF JEAN COCTEAU

Legendary and pioneering film director Jean Cocteau considered himself a poet first and foremost. Cinema just happened to be the medium the late artist most excelled in. Cocteau's stance on cinema as a poetic medium enabled for the director to take a much different approach to the art of cinematic aesthetics. This is obvious when viewing the director's small film lexicon which spanned over 30 years resulting in only seven feature length films. Cocteau's films engage the viewer in a world of lucid dreams and spectacular fantasy. A lifelong opium addict, Cocteau's films feature a world of realistic detachment paralleling his own detachment.

Another obsession and influence of Jean Cocteau was his lead actor and real life lover Jean Marais. Marais no doubt was an object of Scopophilia for Cocteau. In what I will argue are Cocteau's greatest films, Beauty and the Beast and Orpheus, Marais plays the crucial role of a confident yet conflicted lead character. In Beauty and the Beast, he even played three roles (including the masked beast). Jean Marais perfectly carries the roles that Cocteau gave to him. It is as if Jean Cocteau already had in his mind (which he may have) the way Marais would walk and talk in perfect synch with Cocteau's unconventional film directing.

Jean Cocteau made sure to emphasize his thoughts on approach and technique when directing films. In his book The Art of Cinema, Cocteau stated, "I don't think, therefore I am" (Cocteau 164). In that statement, Cocteau makes it clear that he is not a proponent of incorporating intellectualism within film production. Cocteau goes on further to say, "All thought paralyzes action, and a film is a succession of acts." Cocteau's emphasis on the intuitive and subconscious artist reveals his thoughts on the dire importance of the "purity" of the art. When an individual is directing a film without a concrete, thought out technique and strategy, the end result will be the most true and pure. The final product may not be perfect (as none of Cocteau's films are or any other persons films for that matter), but the artist allowed for a more intimate and honest film.

Jean Cocteau also emphasized the purity of the poet in his works. As film was just one of Cocteau's poetic mediums, his thoughts on poetry and film generally follow the same rules. Cocteau stated, "Poetry is the opposite of poetic. As soon as someone aspires to being a poet, that person ceases to be one and the poetry makes it's escape (Cocteau 15)." I picked up subconsciously on Cocteau's cinematic philosophies when first viewing his films. I knew when watching his films that I wasn't watching anything too contrived, and it was something that came from some ones soul. Cocteau's films immediately struck me as auteur pieces, but not in the way that I conventionally look at that theory.

When ones watches a film, say, by master craftsman Stanley Kubrick, you can see the authorship of Kubrick all over the film. His scenes are strategically calculated and thought out to even the most smallest of details. Furthermore, when one watches a Kubrick film, you can also tell that Stanley Kubrick is an intellectual. Someone that has read every book relating to the subject of the film. I don't see Kubrick as someone that would take the chance of improvisation and serious experimentation (he would have to do much studying before trying something new). Therefore, whereas auteur Stanley Kubrick is a studious master craftsman, Jean Cocteau is ambitious child (not to sound insulting) that puts his true self unconsciously and completely (to the extent that one can do so) into the film.

THE PERSONAL AESTHETIC INFLUENCES OF JEAN COCTEAU

During the production of Jean Cocteau's adaptation of the French fairy tale Beauty and the Beast, he kept a diary of the film's production. Cocteau made confession, "I am not a real director and probably never shall be. I get too interested in what is happening." Although this statement sounds unflatteringly incriminating on Cocteau's part, it also lets the audience know that Cocteau has no real idea about the fundamental roles of the director. Jean Cocteau goes into creating films with a sort of voyeurs eye and becomes engulfed in his own creation. This only adds to Cocteau's authenticity and purity as a film director.

Jean Cocteau made the conscious decision to become a filmmaker when he was being weaned off of opium (Cocteau 115). His addiction to opium at the very least was partly the result of his heartbreak when his young poet friend and collaborator Raymond Radiguet died of typhoid fever at the very young age of twenty. Cocteau's literary style greatly changed during his addiction and weaning off of opium. It would have been interesting if he had directed a film before his introduction to opium, and compared it to his post drug addiction works. Opium was no doubt one of Cocteau's biggest cinematic and aesthetic influences.

Opium: The Diary of His Cure is one of Cocteau's most dark and honest confessional documents. The book reads an obsessed addiction with a drug that had a huge influence on Cocteau's life and work. Cocteau wrote both Opium and his novel Les Enfants Terribles during his opium weaning experience. Both of these works are widely considered some of Cocteau's best literary works. If he had not been introduced to opium, one has to wonder if Jean Cocteau would have produced the variety of masterpieces that he did.

I am going to look at three cinematic works that Cocteau was involved with: Beauty and the Beast (1946), Orpheus (1949) and Les Enfants terribles (1950). I chose the first two films as I believe they are Cocteau's greatest works. Although I believe his surrealist directorial debut Blood of a Poet is an equally important film of Cocteau's, I want to examine his films that have a more cohesive plot. Les Enfants Terribles was not directed by Cocteau, but was adapted from a novel of the same title by Jean-Pierre Melville.

Jean Cocteau's Beauty and the Beast was produced shortly after the liberation of France by the United States during the second world war. France lacked many resources after its liberation and film equipment was also very scarce (Cocteau

6). The production of Beauty and the Beast also faced many other problems involving power outages, lack of set materials, and disruption by outside (and sometimes inside) variables. Despite the hectic problems associated with the film, Jean Cocteau found the conclusion of the production of Beauty and the Beast to be heartbreaking. He stated, "I know of nothing so sad as the end of a film and a unit that has worked well together breaking up." Cocteau's passion for film production and collaboration was very strong to say the least.

Jean Marais

As stated before, Jean Cocteau's lover Jean Marais played three of the roles in Beauty and the Beast. Jean Cocteau did not miss any opportunity to feature the face (when not covered by a beast mask) of his love obsession. Cocteau's aesthetic influence in Beauty and the Beast is obviously a personal and intimate choice. The roles Marais plays perfectly blend into the overall feeling of the film. When the beast transforms into a man, it becomes Cocteau's ultimate testimony to the beauty of one's soul. The beast is built up to be an evil monster of sorts. When Belle is forced to live with the beast, she discovers a beauty not at all obvious on the outside. A cliché tale indeed, but its conclusion has more power than most contemporary films could even hope for.

Jean Cocteau utilized a variety of his usual simple, yet extremely effective special effects. Faces appear in mirrors, statues come to life, and human bodies float. I can see these occurrences as something Cocteau might have conceptualized while under the influence of opium. On the other hand, most scenes featured in Beauty and the Beast that do not occur at the Beast's castle have a very realistic (although taking place some time ago) and standard aesthetic. These scenes have the feeling of an outdated period piece that incorporates melodrama and slight comedy. The dichotomy of worlds; the real and the surreal give Beauty and the Beast a great deal of its power. Had the film taken place merely at the beast's castle, it would have lacked the power that a setting of contrast helps accent.

Jean Cocteau's Orpheus (based on the Greek classic myth) finds itself for the most part in the world of the supernatural. A middle aged naked Orpheus poet (played by Jean Marais) finds competition in a new young and celebrated poet. When the young poet dies, Orpheus comes in contact with Death, who falls in love with him. Death is an attractive female (Cocteau's ultimate competition for Marais) who takes the young dead poet and turns him into her servant. Orpheus's wife Eurydice has great admiration and love for her husband. She states, "he's very handsome and very famous. It's a miracle that he's still faithful to me." I got the feeling that Cocteau was implying that Orpheus possibly had homosexual feelings as Eurydice's random quote hints at.

Heurtebise, an associate of death, falls in love with Eurydice. He has fallen victim to love in the past that resulted in his suicide (by lethal gases). This causes a particularly bizarre love conflict. Two dead spirits fall in love with two live spirits (Eurydice is killed and taken to the underworld eventually). Jean Cocteau's obsession with unconventional love affairs most likely reflects his own homosexual relationships. At one point Orpheus states "Women adore complications." I found this dialogue to be very telling on his view of the female as the potential enemy.

THE PERSONAL AESTHETIC INFLUENCES OF JEAN COCTEAU

The final film I am going to look at is Les Enfants Terribles directed by Jean-Pierre Melville. Melville is most well known for his gangster films, so I found it particularly odd that he would direct an adaptation of a Cocteau novel. Les Enfants Terribles features many of the themes so deeply associated with the works of Cocteau but lacking the aesthetic power. The film follows an ambiguous incest brother and sister relationship. The sibling duo in Les Enfants Terribles have made it their life goal to play games and jokes on others. They have involved others in their conspiracies and eventually the sister goes against her own partner (brother). This results in a very tragic ending.

Les Enfants Terribles lacks any of the dreamlike special effects so deeply associated with Jean Cocteau. The film's dramatic ending is the only scene that felt as if Cocteau could have possibly directed (in which did a very small number of scenes). Director Jean-Pierre Melville is known for being very minimalist in nature. That is why I believe that Les Enfants Terribles lacks the "magic" films directed by Jean Cocteau have. Just as in Orpheus, a female becomes the conflict bringer in the game of love. And just as seen in Orpheus, the female causes her own relationship's (and personal) demise. I think it would be safe to say that Jean Cocteau had some hostility against woman.

Jean Cocteau was a film director that seemed to have very little aesthetic influence from others' films or film directors. His biggest aesthetic influences seem to lie in his loss of love, experience with opium, his sexual persuasion, and the tragic circumstances surrounding his life. When Orpheus is asked what a poet is, he responds with, "to write without being a writer." That statement sums up Jean Cocteau as a film director.

-Ty E

THE SATANIC NEO-NAZI THAT PLAYED A BAR MITZVAH

The documentary Charles Manson SuperStar is easily the most interesting and intimate cinematic (or videomatic) look at Mr. Charlie Manson. The documentary was directed by a man named Nikolas Schreck who also happens to be the lead singer of the band Radio Werewolf and also used to run a Satanic outfit known as "The Werewolf Order." At first glance most people are likely to assume that "Nikolas Schreck" is not that Sataniſt Neo-Nazi rocker's real name and they would be right. The real name of the man that calls himself "Nikolas Schreck" is the much tamer (but more appropriate) Barry Dubin. Mr. Dubin seems to have borrowed Schreck from Julius Schreck (the first leader of the SS before Heinrich Himmler) and Max Shreck (who played the vampire in F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu). But then again, most of Schreck's "career" and "efforts" seemed to have been borrowed from the fruits and labors of other artists.

Julius Schreck

Before finishing Charles Manson SuperStar, Nikolas Schreck's contribution to the art of film was his appearance in the embarrassingly banal horror comedy Mortuary Academy (1988). I found Nikolas Schreck and Radio Werewolf's appearance in the film to be interesting as they are playing at a Jewish kid's Bar Mitzvah. Mortuary Academy also had a production designer by the name of Jonathan Rothschild. One can only wonder if he is a member of that famous international banking family. But anyways, it is a pretty strange occurrence if you consider a year earlier Schreck (with "Evil Wilhelm" of Radio Werewolf) appeared on so-called Neo-Nazi Tom Metzger's show "Race and Reason." On Race and Reason, Nikolas Schreck goes on megalomaniacal tirades about how he and Radio Werewolf are going to take over the world. Schreck refers to other people as mortals (Maybe Schreck really is the reincarnation of Julius Schreck) and talks about how he is a member of the "true elite." I guess everyone feels like an elitist when they get the chance to make it on a public access television show.

Nikolas Schreck and Radio Werewolf in Mortuary Academy During the episode of Race and Reason, footage of Radio Werewolf is shown featuring swastika flags and Nikolas Schreck giving Nazi "Hail Victory" salutes. Despite the attempt of being a Nazi Gothic act, the music comes out sounding more like a deranged Jewish Gothic Carney performing in an abandoned warehouse in the Warsaw ghetto. It seems that Radio Werewolf stole a good amount of their sound and aesthetic from death rock group 45 Grave which appeared about a decade before. Tom Metzger seems to take the music of Radio Werewolf as serious as Nikolas Schreck. Throughout the Race and Reason show, Metzger subtly mocks Schreck and his Schizo-style arrogance. Despite what people say about Tom Metzger, he surely has a gentleman grandfather quality that even arrogant weakling and British Broadcast Louis Theroux took notice of.

THE SATANIC NEO-NAZI THAT PLAYED A BAR MITZVAH

Nikolas Schreck and Evil Wilhelm on Race and Reason After Nikolas Schreck's appearance on Race and Reason, Tom Metzger found out something that he probably wasn't too surprised about. When talking about Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey, Metzger said: "I personally have met the daughter, Zeena. Both she and her son are not Aryan and have the Semitic look. She married a man called Schreck, who promoted the Nazi line. Too bad he turned out to be a Jew, it (Werewolf Order) was pretty good. He is the son of a furniture dealer in Tarzana, California." Interestingly enough, Zeena LaVey (who now goes by Zeena Schreck) would later denounce the Church of Satan and her father Anton. Current High Priest of the Church of Satan Peter Gilmore also stated, "Zeena, along with her companion Barry 'Nikolas Schreck' Dubin, wanted to ease Dr. LaVey into retirement so that they could assume his position. Neither was suited for this role, and Dr. LaVey was quite firmly in control. So when their efforts failed, they made a big show out of departing the 'corrupt' Church of Satan and leaving the United States behind for 'Fortress Europa.' I do not think it is hard for one to believe after watching the Race and Reason footage of Nikolas Schreck that he is of the "scheming" nature.

Nikolas and Zeena "Schreck"

Instead of taking over the world, Nikolas Schreck's only success has been in editing a couple books and releasing a few CDs that no one has ever heard. Instead of actually coming up with material of his own, it seems Schreck is more like a community college professor of the Occult. Although he has done a handful of excellent book compilations like The Manson File (probably the best book on Charles Manson), Schreck seems to be lacking in actually having an original thought of his own. I guess you cannot blame the poor "undead Aryan" for trying.

"If you are scared of Radio Werewolf then there is something in yourself that you fear" - Nikolas Schreck Nikolas Schreck also apparently rarely ever appears out of his crypt in Berlin, Germany. There is good reason though as apparently he's afraid to go out in public ever since someone cut off one of his ears while he was rolling down his car window. I guess the losing of one's ear can really put one's "mortality" in perspective. If only the people that hate Schreck realized that he is just a poor self-loathing Jewish boy, they might cut him some slack and he might still have two ears. Instead, he has to go on being the head of the world's most acclaimed occult organization and has to settle for having his greatest populist achievement being featured in a forgotten horror comedy.

-Ty E

THE STAR PERSONA OF MARILYN MONROE

Marilyn Monroe is the iconic dumb blonde. She paved the way for dumb blonde stereotypes that still carry a lot of resonance today. Marilyn Monroe wasn't even a natural blonde (but a redhead). I doubt she had much confliction about the affect that her film characters have influenced American (and international) societies view of blonde females. I believe that her film characters are a little more complicated than they let on. Despite her film characters persistent joy and absent mindedness, I think that they had another underlying layer. The best evidence of this theory is the theme of psychoanalysis found in Marilyn Monroe's film The Seven Year Itch. Marilyn Monroe's characters are able to seduce a man in seconds with her suggestive (many times in a subtle way) gestures. She can put a man in a trance within less than a seconds time. Whether her characters are conscious or subconscious of this is irrelevant (the real Marilyn Monroe was obviously conscious of this). Marilyn Monroe's characters have the ability to sexually entice any man resulting in her benefit. If it wasn't for this "tool" of sorts, the success at the very least, would be somewhat weakened. If Marilyn Monroe's characters had a mean and cold persona than her popularity would wane to some degree. In the film The Seven Year Itch directed by Billy Wilder, psychoanalysis becomes a weapon. Marilyn Monroe's character in the film has caused a married man to swoon for her. After just meeting Marilyn Monroe's character (who is listed as "the girl"), the male protagonist becomes instantly obsessed with her and every little movement she makes. A psychiatrist diagnoses the protagonist with "the seven year itch." The married man blames the girl for his weak spot and obsession with her. The man believes that everything that happened is the result of subconscious decisions. Somehow the girl seems to have an intuitive knack for knowing what is going on and how to respond. Her beauty has become an engulfing trance inducing weapon just as the vampire in Dracula does when seducing his victims. Marilyn Monroe wasn't the first women to use her beauty as a weapon to entice males to the point of complete dominance. German actress Marlene Dietrich also seduces an older man in her film The Blue Angel (among other films) directed by Josef von Sternberg. In the film, a strict and authoritarian like teacher meets a seductive dancer by the name of Lola and doesn't look back. He quits his job teaching and eventually becomes a circus clown for Lola's cabaret. Like Marilyn Monroe's characters, Lola has the ability to make any man satisfy her desires. I can only assume that Lola was an influence on Marilyn Monroe's characters and her film career. Marilyn Monroe's character in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes also knows what she wants. She uses her sex appeal and suggestive nature to obtain what she wants from a rich man. Monroe's character is engaged to a not so handsome guy. One can only assume she is in it for the money and in the end she marries the suitor. The man's father disapproves of Marilyn Monroe and he believes that she just wants to get married for money.

THE STAR PERSONA OF MARILYN MONROE

Monroe's character states to her suitors father, "I don't want to marry your son for his money, I want to marry him for your money." I found this hard to believe and just as more evidence of Monroe's cunning sexual persona. I believe Marilyn Monroe's characters to be ironic examples of women's empowerment. Her characters seem to have an objective (whether conscious or subconscious) and carry them out to her benefit. Many viewers just assume that Monroe just plays the role of a dumb blonde, but she is also the one that always comes out on top. The male protagonist in The Seven Year Itch states, "Everything happens for a reason." Going on that statement, it can be rest assured that Monroe knows how to get what she wants. I wouldn't necessarily call Marilyn Monroe's characters feminists, but they do not accept the role of the dominated female (she is the dominator). The female stars of previous Fox studio films were somewhat different from the roles that Marilyn Monroe played. The film In Old Chicago features the aggressive female played by Alice Faye. She supports herself and is the master of her own destiny. Only a criminally minded Irish American can tame her and turn her into a loving lady. Marilyn Monroe, on the other hand, gives the impression that she is a sweet and innocent girl. In the end, Monroe's characters always end up dominating the males. The character of Laura (played by Gene Tierney) in the film Laura (directed by Otto Preminger) is sort of a ghost of intrigue. Thought to be dead at first, Laura reappears and has three men fall in love with her. Three men try to obtain Laura due to their love and infatuation with her. Her alluring power is almost as strong as Marilyn Monroe's, but Laura doesn't need to be sexually suggestive in her way. One of the men even falls in love with Laura while thinking that she's dead. Laura's powers are almost supernatural. There is no doubt that there is more that meets the eye in regards to the character played by Marilyn Monroe. Her success just didn't appear from her good looks. Monroe's characters obtained what they wanted anytime they wanted. Marilyn Monroe was an unconventional symbol of female empowerment and success.

-Ty E

THE STENCH OF INGLOURIOUS BASTERDS

I have never had any interest in reviewing “trailers” but Quentin Tarantino’s upcoming tour-de-fart war film Inglourious Basterds deserves soiled acknowledgement. After watching the trailer, it is apparent that Tarantino is hoping to achieve an all time low in cinematic defecation. Tarantino has always been a filmmaker that has been hostile to art and genuine human emotions but Inglourious Basterds seems to be evidence that Tarantino has snorted too much cocaine while simultaneously frying his “brain” on ecstasy. Inglourious Basterds is a film about a group of Jews who take revenge on evil German Nazis and scalp them. Talk about Science Fiction, Inglourious Basterds seems to feature fantasies that only a deranged Israeli IDF soldier could dream of after wasting an 8 year old Palestinian girl with a bullet to the head.

Fellow hack “director” and Tarantino ass kisser Eli Roth plays a Jew that kills Germans with a baseball bat in Inglourious Basterds. In the film trailer, Roth makes a stereotypical sinister Jewish smile that would have made great propaganda for the German National Socialists of 1933. Speaking of Nazi propaganda, Eli Roth also directed a fictional Joseph Goebbels Nazi propaganda film titled Stolz der Nation for Inglourious Basterds. Something tells me this will be Eli Roth’s greatest contribution to film yet. The real Nazi propagandist Joseph Goebbels wasn’t nicknamed “The Rabbi” in college for nothing. Self-loathing Jewish mentality can go a long way. Just ask Woody Allen, he made a career of it.

This poster would look much cooler with the Swastika intact. Tarantino has never been someone that valued aesthetics.

Despite what Hollywood tells the world, “Aryans” were the ones that won World War II for the United States. German-Americans made up the largest ethnic group to fight for the United States in the war and the majority of the rest of soldiers were of Nordic descent. Inglourious Basterds is just an attempt by Tarantino to kiss the horrendous asses of his Hollywood masters due to his declining popularity. Instead of the passive-Jew-gets-shoved-into-the-gas-chamber angle Steven Spielberg practically invented, Tarantino wants to make up a myth that Jews collectively fought the Germans man-to-man in the second World War. To be fair, Jews did take their revenge against the Germans after World War II. For example, Jewish Zgoda death camp commander Salomon Morel killed about 1,695 Germans (and a handful of Poles) for mere pleasure. He killed the German refugees by ill treatment, torture, and outright murder. One of his favorite ways of killing Germans was bashing their brains out with the end of a chair leg. Poland attempted to have Morel extradited from Israel for “crimes against humanity” but of course Israel declined. Naturally, Morel felt that he was a victim of an “anti-Semitic” plot.

Brad Pitt is fighting for the wrong side!

THE STENCH OF INGLOURIOUS BASTERDS

Inglourious Basterd looks like nothing new but just rehashing of the same kosher trash World War II propaganda. Don't get me wrong, Ilsa, She Wolf the SS is a fun flick and Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter is a sexy film. When is Hollywood going to realize that no one cares about the holocaust as much Israel's economy depends on it? There is one new holocaust film that I would like to see. A concentration camp comedy in the tradition of Billy Wilder's Stalag 17 could be fun. Imagine Woody Allen and Larry David having starring roles where they complain about the condition of the concentration camps. I believe that it could be the funniest Jewish comedy since A Night in Casablanca by the Marx brothers.

-Ty E

THE TERROR OF FRIDAY THE 13TH

Friday the 13th is a scary, scary day indeed. Never have I thought about resembling one with superstitious beliefs until now. I've never quite written something similar to the medium of analysis as I am scouring through right now but the tragic downfall is horrifying. In order to set the scene, a brief synopsis and run-down of my job (and theater) is due. I support creative writing as much as the next lush so my story is simple. It begins with a decrepit six screen theater with Friday the 13th in auditorium 1 and The Pink Panther 2 in auditorium 2. Previously two nights before, Friday the 13th was screened in auditorium 2. This leads to the eventual and eventful conclusion to the tale. After noticing that no one purchased tickets for the morning show of Pink Panther 2, a co-worker and I began conversing in the empty theater aided only by the incredibly unfunny performance of Steve Martin. His humor sure has fallen to such a slump since The Jerk and Bowfinger. After walking upstairs back into my territory accompanied by my favorite cinematic phylum's, I realized something was out of the ordinary - the lamp in auditorium 2 was off. Running over in a frantic frenzy, I soon realized that no one was in the theater so my stress soon there after evaporated into a colorful mist. It was a good feeling. Then I went to start the second Friday the 13th showing, but that was during the time I began thinking about what I had stupidly said earlier. Earlier that day, I boasted almost competitively "Haha! It would be funny if Friday the 13th fucked up on Friday the 13th!". This was the last thing I said before I pushed a loose button into the correct positioning. The light discharged a soft pop and my torso was showered with sparks. I couldn't believe it. A showing with a decent amount of people had just been cursed to be canceled. Or had it? Working with the manager, we decided to switch it to the already faulty theater 2 since the last showing of Pink Panther 2 had been canceled. Rethreading the projector, I had my doubts. Keep in mind, the projector screwed up not too long ago. Starting it in 2 was a death trap but we went ahead anyways. Number 2 went fine, for 20 minutes that is. While attempting to fix the bulb in projector number 1, I brought up the fact that I screened Friday the 13th in theater 2 previously and that might explain the misfortune. I laughed and sighed, inexplicably, I witnessed the bulb blow in projector 2, I started cursing aloud and looked though the port glass window to see an angry crowd. Number 1 and 2 were both down for the count and we still had a print to motor through. Perplexed at the amount of anti-luck I'd experienced only through half of the day, I was sure I was to go home and drown my black cat of 15 years. As soon as all the refunds were done, wouldn't you know it, number 1 kicked back on. After troubleshooting both projectors, both had little to no errors. Now, I have skipped over many parts of the day but know this - Friday the 13th is now a day I fear. Bubble wrap seems to be a good choice for clothing on this day. This isn't so much an article displaying literary academia but a confession of someone who focuses on Cryptozoology and has finally been swayed by the effects of superstition and the likes. I realize that every projector that the print of Friday the 13th has touched has become defunct. This isn't some bizarre effect of possession but a true form of "jinxing" something. I refuse to ever work a Friday the 13th ever again and this event has made a scared man of me. It could be mere coincidence but I enjoy harvesting feelings of fear and cowardice. I'd never let something so bold go to waste. Plainly, this movie's fucking evil.

THE TERROR OF FRIDAY THE 13TH

-mAQ

TRIBUTE TO JEAN RENO

Jean Reno killed Godzilla. With those four words, I begin my quest in bringing his character to notice. Jean Reno in short terms is a bad motherfucker. A lot of people criticize how he plays stereotypical roles in all his films. No matter what role he is, playing French detectives or the key bad ass, he always delivers quality entertainment and personality to every character. Whether it is in such garbage film like The Pink Panther or Godzilla, Jean Reno never lets fans down.

My love for this Moroccan native first came when I saw The Professional when I had matured. I had seen this movie as a child and forgotten about the visual excitement and tragedy it brought. When re-watching it, I realized how great this film was. I then sought after the Extended cut entitled Leon, which is two separate movies in my opinion. After that I rented Wasabi and was blown away with his ability to make every movie an instant classic. Without Jean Reno, all these movies would be mediocre at best. Not only is he a towering monolith of testosterone, he encompasses all the culture of the French without being it himself but he also out shines Sean Connery in the category of attractive unshaven elderly men by standards of modern women. Jean Reno's extensive library of acting roles places him from outlandish scripts to video game likenesses. His talent has been exploited in the most fruitful of ways. Bringing light to his films is the greatest thing you could do for a friend. Hallmark should buy out the Jean Reno image to use as product placement. In an alternate universe, I can see people buying loved ones Jean Reno bobbleheads and other various merchandise. A man once told me I was a faggot for admiring a male. I sent him a link to the Wasabi trailer and he shut up quick.

Most people are either a Beatles or Elvis fan. Jean Reno is an Elvis man and because of that, so am I. His strangest role by far was in Luc Besson's first directorial effort dubbed Le Dernier Combat. In this role he played "The Brute", a man wandering a wasteland of mute people in search of the protagonist. This "dude" wasn't in a film called The Moroccan Stallion for nothing. In closing remarks, all anybody needs to know is that if you see Jean Reno pasted anywhere, that shit is a gold mine and popcorn flick to boot.

-mAQ

TRIBUTE TO LLOYD KAUFMAN
TRIBUTE TO LLOYD KAUFMAN

Lloyd Kaufman is probably the most shameless swindler in the film industry. The swindler is his persona and he does it well. Anyone that's obsessed with film knows who Lloyd is. You don't even have to like Troma films to be a fan of him. Lloyd Kaufman is Troma studios. His long (Troma is the longest running Independent film studio) involvement in the film industry alone demands respect.

Lloyd has also brought us the iconic Toxie monster hero of The Toxic Avenger. Toxie even made his way to being a kid's action figure. That's a pretty extreme change from the same guy that had peddled cheap sex (he still does this). His newest film Poultrygeist (shot on 35mm) has supposedly put Lloyd in the monetary crapper (he used his own money for it). Hopefully the film will make it to more theaters and make Lloyd some of his well earned bread back.

Tonight, I watched The Toxic Avenger for the fourth or fifth time. It's a complete piece of cheap trash and I love every minute of it. The film features everything you could ever desire in being entertained. The killing of animals (and on top of it a seeing eye dog), child killing, senior citizen beating / killing, homicidal hero, and transgendered criminals. The best part of all these taboo filled scenes is that they are featured in a film that has a very formulaic Hollywood structure (and Lloyd still screwed that up). These sub versions of Hollywood nos have enabled Mr. Kaufman to make a name for his self in film history.

Lloyd also lets the viewer know that he's not a fan of Richard Nixon, mean jocks, fast food (which he goes back to in his new film Poultrygeist), Nazi cops, and nuclear waste being transported by fans of the rich man's candy. Lloyd Kaufman is no doubt an auteur. Many of Lloyds themes of perverted sex, bodily dismemberment, car crashes, ugly guys wearing makeup, and animal abuse (he's also a proud supporter of PETA) can be seen in his sizable library of films. Class of Nuke 'Em High, Troma's War, Tromeo and Juliet, and Terror Firmer are other great films Lloyd has brought us. I just hope he decides to make an autobiographical film based on his long career (directed by Giuseppe Andrews).

-Ty E Poultrygeist Teaser Trailer

TRIBUTE TO ROY SCHEIDER

I had been thinking awhile about which person deserves a tribute to post on Soiled Sinema. After hearing of the death of this fellow American, i realized how much of an influence he had on my life. As i look around my colorful room, i see an original JAWS stuffed animal, my JAWS boxers, and my JAWS DVD set. Roy Scheider, along with the two other leads, made this movie, not the shark. As i look on his Wiki article, i see now that he was scheduled to play John Rambo in First Blood. Pretty funny coincidence as i just re watched the new Rambo film. This would have been an interesting future to see. Who knows? Roy might have done it better. He sure did have the charisma. The two roles that i see Roy Scheider as, are "Herr" Benway in Cronenberg's film Naked Lunch and Brody in Jaws and Jaws 2. He definitely brought an essence to both films. Dr. Benway was a genius creation of Burroughs and was brought to screen with the perfect cast choice. Schieder. In fact, Roy Scheider should have been in every movie ever made. I can imagine his face superimposed over E.T's face, Sean Connery's face, Hell. Scheider would have made an impressive Bond. He's got the suave feel to him, the looks, and looks damn good smoking a pipe. That is definitely something that should have been. Roy Scheider will be remembered, if not through his badass film acting style, then definitely for one of the most remembered one-liners ever. "Smile you son-of-a-bitch"

-Maq

TRIBUTE TO VINCENT CASSEL
TRIBUTE TO VINCENT CASSEL

What can be said about Vincent Cassel that hasn't already been said? Probably not that much, but that doesn't stop me discussing the greats of this Frenchman. Vincent Cassel brings a lot to modern art-house cinema. Not only is he a great fucking actor and has an angelic wife, but he has a great taste in film. I was first introduced to Cassel with the introduction of HATE (La Haine) via an old VHS tape. Upon watching this film, it blew me away. The intensity of Vinz's role is actually a stepping stone along the way to the cinema that I watch now.

After watching this film and being marked, I began to hunt down more of his films, stumbling upon Irreversible, Doberman, Sheitan, and The Crimson Rivers. Each of these films are amazing in different aspects but tie in on his roles. Let's go through his variety of acting.

La Haine - A misunderstood Jewish sociopath with vengeance on the mind.
The Crimson Rivers - A tough Paris cop who teams up with Jean Reno (Instant Points)
L'Appartenance - A man who is searching for the truth (Mindfuck Film)
Sheitan - A satanic Shepard who is trying to flock in some college sacrifices.
Irreversible - A homophobic bastard who loves cocaine and gay bashing Derailed - A French smooth-mother-fucker who is a master conman.

These are just some of the many roles he can play. Sheitan was an amazing film in overview but did have its flaws. If it wasn't for Cassel's deep pockets and his ability to fund the film, we wouldn't have seen this macabre masterpiece. Not only does Vincent Cassel and his wife Monica Bellucci form an amazing family, but his brother is a part of French rap group ASSASSIN codenamed Rockin Squat. I highly anticipated his role in Cronenberg's new crime masterpiece EASTERN PROMISES and after viewing, he made that film. Kirill was an amazing character. Not only did he handle the homosexual undertones with class, but he also made such a monster a character you actually feel for. It's really amusing to watch a Frenchman playing a Russian, Jew, Frenchie, and a cartoon character off of Shrek. Such a wide range of capabilities shouldn't go unrewarded. Vincent Cassel is an amazing actor and indeed one of the finest. His name alone is worth a rent.

-Maq

VIN DIESEL: MONGREL "ACTION" HERO

Every year Hollywood gets more and more degenerate. Obviously, Hollywood has to keep up with the lowest common denominator individuals that they have produced over many decades. Nothing is better for a large collective of cattle than a good stupid laugh, cheap sex, glamorized crime, "bad ass" special effects, and the triumph of "the little guy." A lot of Americans (and people abroad) get their ideas of what is "cool", trendy, and to be strived for by watching the latest film churned out of the little hell known as Hollywoodland. One trend I couldn't help but notice in the recent years is the MONGRELIZATION of Hollywood stars. The NEW face of America? I recently saw a putrid and unbelievably mind numbing piece of visual diarrhea of a film called Babylon A.D. directed by hack Mathieu Kassovitz. I must admit that I have never seen a film starring the new action film star Vin Diesel. After seeing the piece of filth known as Babylon A.D., I can say that he is one of the ugliest and most unappealing actors to ever "grace" the movie screen. I can only see Vin Diesel as an action "hero" appealing to criminals locked up in county prison. Vin Diesel is truly a man that only an alcoholic stepmother could love. What happened to the Bruce Willis and Sylvester Stallone's? I know these two men got old, but I am sure someone more appealing than Vin Diesel can replace them. Bruce Willis and Sylvester Stallone are guys that you can be "proud to be American" by watching them. Willis is the German-American hero that kicks real kraut ass in Die Hard. Sylvester Stallone is the Italian-American hero that turned slightly deranged by having too many tours of Vietnam. Vin Diesel has a name that sounds like some cheap third world sports car. Hollywood may want America to turn into a nation of criminal mongrels, but Vin Diesel will never be a true action hero. Vin Diesel is a fellow mixed of "black and Italian" with a bunch of other ambiguous pedigrees. He is obviously a poster boy for the new world order. A cultureless world of internationalism and nihilistic hedonism. Vin Diesel's character in Babylon A.D. lacks any real virtue or values. He just sports a bunch of tacky looking "hard" tattoos and has the stoicism of an ape. Young boys and men should look up like to someone like Vin Diesel and produce bad ass mongrel children that know how to obtain exotic Aryan women from Russia. I get disgusted by most action films and other related garbage that "explodes" out Hollywood's Luciferian vaults every week. Obviously, most of the time I choose not to watch these films. I seek films out of interest and try to ensure that I have at least somewhat pleasant cinema viewing experience. Every once in a while I will watch a film like Babylon A.D. and realize that Hollywood really does get dumber and more degenerate with every passing day. Vin Diesel is not a hero, but the ideal slavish brute that minister of international propaganda Rupert Murdoch hopes will one day inhabit the earth in vast numbers. Vin Diesel looks like the poster boy for a new soldier barbarian for a new technological dark age.

VIN DIESEL: MONGREL "ACTION" HERO

-Ty E

VIRAL MARKETING TECHNIQUES EXPLOITED IN CLOVERFIELD

During the year 2007 in the month of July, All theaters were being ran as normal. Popcorn being popped and concession items being sold. The only real difference is the long-awaited arrival of Michael Bay's Transformers. During these summer slams, big-budget movies always deliver the action and stars. While the cheerful audience awaited for their re-vamping of a nostalgic tale of machines to begin, their pleasant experience was ruined, savaged, and raped by a little teaser called 01-18-08. This conundrum wrapped tightly in its own carriage was an untitled film with no discernible plot. All we bare witness to is a group of New Yorkers at a party for a friend named Rob. While they are drinking and mingling with the socialite crowd, a loud and strange earthquake and explosion is heard. Upon going to the roof, Our mysterious cameraman exclaims "Looks like you should have left town a little bit earlier" This foreshadowing is of the most menacing kind and leaves you speechless as you see the head of our Statue of Liberty crash down a street. This video was then recorded by every sort of device known to mankind and mirrored to any site it could, only to be pulled by Paramount days later. Questions began popping up all over forums and discussions. People started to gossip about the endless possibilities. Unsound theories showed no remorse as they popped up everywhere, vastly covering up any possible theories on the film. Voltron, Cthulhu, Dodo, and Godzilla are just a few examples of what this creature was interpreted to be. The hysteria of the cinema community wouldn't be extinguished even after Abrams revealed in an interview that the creature would be entirely original. The biggest impact of the trailer might be the New Yorker screaming "I saw it! It's alive! It's huge!" Cause of the teasers short time it had to be filmed, the word was slightly slurred and many people derived the word "Lion" out of it. Not only did we have rabid fans thinking it was a Lovecraft film but now we had them thinking a giant lion was destroying NYC. Numerology even took a turn when YouTube videos and blogs were posted explaining the amount of numbers in certain key phrases and deducting a hidden meaning. After all of these were debunked, all the theories were taken down by the original writer, for shame i guess. LOST theorists even began trying to add it up. JJ Abrams, after all, is a hype machine. The man lives for the climax and always delivers. In the teaser, Rob's brother is wearing a Slusho shirt. As you might know, Slusho exists in the ALIAS universe, also belonging to Abrams. Once you delve into the official Slusho website, you are greeted with smiling cartoon sea creatures. Possibly a horrifying environment depending on how you associate this lovable drink with a creature capable of total absolute annihilation. Early on, theories of the monster being attracted to a sweet nectar used in Slusho sprang forth, giving the film new life and a ridiculous tone. People backed up this speculation and others dismissed it from the get-go, whereas the element of Deep-Sea drilling did fit. It was only a matter of time before the film got released in theaters. Viral marketing sites appeared all over the Internet. Blogs began popping up including Ethan Haas Was Right. This site in particular was falsely connected to the mythology that already begun to surround the untitled project. Abrams had an interview conducted with him not too long after that stating while there were sites out there, Ethan Haas was not one of them. This is when the first official site was noticed. Several pictures were scattered amongst a flash canvas of black. You could interact with these pictures; dragging them around and flipping them over to see the contents on the back. We started out with pictures of the friends at the party and then several which were a bit more in depth. One of two women's faces, both contorted in horror, staring at something monstrous and another of a Japanese chef with a recipe on the back. People immediately began dissecting these photos and several even went as far as to find a pattern in hair between the girls heads and trace a gargoyle face. Time was counting down till that day in January and people still didn't know what to call this film. Around this time, a teaser poster started popping up in various places including Comic-con. The poster featured a headless Statue of Liberty standing defeated while being ground to a ripple in the water which leads to the shore of a devastated New York. Many fake names like 01-18-08, Slusho, Cloverfield, Cheese, Monstrous, Furious, Colossus, The Parasite, and Grayshot were all proposed and used to distract the outside world from gathering more information than they initially wanted or even expected. Around this time, word of a trailer attached to Beowulf with an official title began to leak. The response was enormous. The film was finally titled; Cloverfield. Cloverfield is the military name for the project, and it is also a road Abrams uses to get to his Santa Monica house. The success of controlling the information surrounding this film was all thanks due to the cast and crew. When the auditions were held, the actors were told nothing of the script and were given a piece of script from ALIAS to work with. Controversy encircled the film after the pinnacle release of the trailer. 9/11 allusions were all tied in. People would be whispering "It's too soon..." for a while now. More pictures debuted on the mysterious site. If you left it open for 6 minutes, a chilling roar rips through your speakers leaving you slightly unnerved. Each of these photos in time-stamped to relay a series of unfortunate events. These times would conflict with the dates presented in the film, but I applaud their efforts on all other planes. This is when Tagruato made its viral release. It is a Japanese drilling company which has been linked to the awakening of the monster. Its logo is a simple one that can be seen in the film and is linked to the fate of Rob. Soon after the release of the film, many things were noticed. The satellite falling from the sky, the graffiti Slusho, and the reversible audio clip at the end of the credits. All of these expand your Cloverfield experience and offers arguable destinies for every character. T.I.D.O. wave websites began to be born from the terrors of the Tagruato company. These two warring factions over eco-terrorism continue to write blogs and tie the film in further; For example, after the release of the film, Tagruato's page was experiencing technical difficulties due to a downed satellite. All the characters in the film had an adjacent Myspace on which they blogged and conversed like every one from this contemporary generation would. On the release of the film, they stopped visiting their respected Myspace's due to the events and most of them dying off. After the film premiered and Hud was bit in half by the monster, his height changed from 6'something to 2'9. Quite a comedic effort on their part. In this .gif below, we can see clearly what befalls the lovable cameraman. Jamie and Teddy (password: jllovesth) is a website featuring the woman who appears passed out on the couch during the film. During these viral videos that are sent to Teddy from Jamie, we see many hardships and heartbreaks which boil down to a tape from Teddy saying he has been captured by Tagruato and which leads to the climax of Jamie going to the Rob's party (Lily's Party). So amongst a plot device of deception and terrorism from foreign companies comes a Cloverfield manga called Cloverfield/Kishin. The manga is in 4 installments with the fourth not out yet. It sheds a gratuitous amount of light on all these strange ongoingings. As for the origin of the monster, not much is explained. We see a Tagruato ship dragging the creature under the ocean. Kishin is a boy who is motherless and is constantly bullied. After an incident at sea, Clover breaks free and begins to jump (Yes, jump. That explains how it got around NYC so fast) towards Tokyo in order to find the strange feeling that it senses. After some Slusho frames, Kishin's biological father meets up with him and explains how his mother put the "God's Vestige" into Kishin's body. This is explained by a bizarre cult that worships Clover as a god. The Vestige is a piece of the "gods" DNA and creates a psychic link between Clover and the boy. After you discover that his mother was killed, he is saved by his father, only to be put in a suicide bombing situation involving his father. His father understands the power in which he holds is leading the creature into the heart of Japan and decides to sacrifice him and his son. Right as he pulls the trigger, Clover's hands burst through the building and shields the young Kishin. After his madness snaps, he climbs atop of the impressionable Clover and begins to march toward the destruction of earth. The fact that Clover has attacked a city before the fateful night in New York is questionable. If this happened, wouldn't we have heard about it?

VIRAL MARKETING TECHNIQUES EXPLOITED IN CLOVERFIELD

This is a video from the Spanish version of Cloverfield. While from an American view, nothing seems out of place but something is afoot. The reporters in the background dialogue is translated to "We have some news about other city's who was already attacked, but we don't know what it's happening... the communications from some sites were cut..." Most people will immediately dismiss this because our government tells us everything. If you recall any viral materials involving Tagruato, it is proven that this company is capable of deceit, murder, and kidnapping. Surely this hazardous company can conceal an incident. In the manga, we see Clover attack Tokyo, ripping it apart. The creature manages to kill his worshipers, innocent civilians, and is even shown to purposefully pull the parasites off of its body to attack and flank the panicked city. Clover is intelligent and is fully aware of what he is doing. In some scenes in the comic, he is shown being shackled up and captured, thinking aloud not to wake him. He grabs people and eats them, squashes helicopters, and is being controlled by a young boy. The main character in the film, Rob, would have been a victim each way. Hud's infamous line "Looks like you should have left town earlier" was previously mentioned in regards to being mysterious. That line is also the most ironic line in cinema history. Had Rob left town earlier, he would have just ended up in Tokyo when the monster made its explosive debut. So now that we know Rob is a doomed character and chose the better route; dying with love. In recent Cloverfield news, the main website has been altered. The trailer begins as normal but is cut off 6 seconds or so in with an alternate ending. The way its prominence is shown on the site suggests that even though it is alternate, it still is affective in the right reality. Beth might still be alive, and due to the clip at the end of the credits, it is heard that Rob was still alive too, but the harsh reality is that the mysterious face is probably a member of the military. The latest viral site is <http://www.usgx8810b467233px.com/>. This website requires a username and a password which was found to be on every copy of Cloverfield sans the Steelbook edition that everyone pines over. The username is alysehanssen and the password is 11112014349. The index directory lists three deep-sea photographs which show Clover's positioning at the incident of the Chuai station. The second photograph is a Tagruato submersible "shedding some light" on the parasites. This may or may not be on the ocean floor. It would be highly convenient if it was found on the back of Clover. Despite having been out on DVD for a couple of weeks, the viral marketing is going strong. Cloverfield opened this path for many films now. The Dark Knight used some of these techniques to its advantage before the untimely death of star Heath Ledger. There are many more questions that circle this limitless mythology of Cloverfield, for example, What is the mysterious new symbol which resembles a sword with a 6 or 9 on it? It might be impossible to discuss every hidden aspect surrounding the film. Cloverfield is an amazing experience, but it stops short unless you pay attention to the happenings in its universe. Special thanks goes out to the folks at CloverfieldClues for keeping us all up to date.

VIRAL MARKETING TECHNIQUES EXPLOITED IN CLOVERFIELD

-mAQ

WHY IS HOLLYWOOD "OBSESSED" WITH GARBAGE?

The Hollywood film industry has never been interested in art. They only seem to be interested in social subversion, agitation, blatant degeneracy, arrogant parodies and of course one cannot forget profits. Hollywood has also convinced white girls that it's okay to be a dirty whore and partake in recreational miscegenation. Elia Kazan's film Splendor in the Grass (1961) taught teens that if they do not have sex before marriage then they may go insane. Now Hollywood is teaching us that blond haired Aryan women are very "obsessed" with black men.

Hollywood's latest assault on Americans of European descent is a piece of filth called Obsessed. In this cinematic shitfest, not only is the deranged white bitch obsessed with a Negro but she puts his life and family in jeopardy. Funny, have any of the clowns that work in Hollywood actually looked at the yearly statistics of black men raping white women? You can be sure that you will never see a film about grotesque and obese Jewish bull dykes that stalk little blond girls. You can also be sure to never see a film about the typical local Negro that targets college freshman for rape yet somehow the worthless multicultural "cops" can never arrest this bestial thug.

Yes, Hollywood is obsessed with its hatred of Western civilization. Hollywood is run by cowardly weaklings who have serious "mommy" issues. The only subjects that Hollywood can treat seriously is the so called holocaust and "minorities" overcoming evil prejudices. It is sad that white America is stupid enough to eat up this sentimental garbage that even the Hollywood producers doubtfully take seriously. If a white woman were to become criminally obsessed with a black man hopefully she will be blessed with AIDS.

After watching the trailer for Obsessed, I really wonder if the world is coming to an end. Seriously, how can a society that takes pleasure in watching such garbage ever expect to survive the next century (or next couple of decades)? Had a film like Obsessed been released a hundred years ago, you can be guaranteed that all those "talented" people working in Hollywood would be hanging from telephone poles all across Sunset Boulevard. White America has just become too degenerate, valueless, cultureless, and apathetic to care about the blatant anti-white sentiment behind films like Obsessed.

A truly beautiful couple with a long future ahead of them

On second thought, maybe white women are becoming dangerous for black men. I am sure everyone has noticed the rise in mulatto children in public over the past couple years. Will whorish white women be responsible for the extermination of the true 100% black race via miscegenation? Are white women conspiring a "silent holocaust" for the black male "victims" of America? I doubt it.

-Ty E

Reviews

THE VIENNA AKTIONISTS COLLECTION
THE VIENNA AKTIONISTS COLLECTION

?? (1970)

In a world where I've seen the most extreme, bizarre, and unkempt acts performed, I always find ways to one up my own expectations. Well, today, I fear that I have reached the end of the line, folks. I present to you, the most foul, erotic, beautiful, and extreme collection of art that I've ever encountered before. So much, that I myself don't know what to make of it upon initial viewing. I keep retracing my steps, questioning my own beliefs and morals.

Call it a video mixtape if you will, created by five Viennese artists of the strictest caliber. Otto Muehl, Gunter Brus, Kurt Kren, Rudolf Schwarzkogler & Otmar Bauer all responded with an outlash of violent art aimed to destroy the very fabric of "Art" which we encountered. Their message was simple; change performance art as we know it and crush simplicity. It's a shame these artists aren't more renowned in this day and age. The collection is based off of visual imagery so allow me to paint a canvas for you. A man has his face tied up while having layer after layer of plaster, goo, slime, and other various liquid solids smeared over his face for an insane amount of time. A time long enough for you to doubt his breathing capabilities. A room full where existential artists gather. One is bottomless while receiving a handjob from random males while a baby's diaper is changed just feet away. Lurid and foul homo-eroticism at its finest. Cut to quick frames of vaginal torture with a flawlessly executed score. 12 inch needles impaled in a females labia. The after result is a malformed vagina which is then drowned in various substances and smacked. A bold statement is then made with the female position in the household as a pathetic female behind backs into a tiny room. The male quickly denies "the only asset in which a woman makes her worth" and continues reading. This same "asset" looks for solace in another man.

Erotic statues of nuclear family's are erected as a mother, while holding a baby, gives a male a handjob while the infant stare inquisitively. Art of this form has only been documented with photos until now. Foul oral tubes leading from ones rectum to own ass are on display with enough body horror to give David Cronenberg nightmares for life. We see the evolution of simple flesh into a form of grainy art Nouveau. Confectionery delights are used to an extreme that surpasses Sweet Movie. Beatings and oral sex with eggs, mass orgies to same sex art pieces, I find my self unable to process this much at any time. Women covered in feces and hyper-editing of disgusting emetophilia and corophila are enacted resulting in a hellish assault on all senses. What Muehl & co. has created is simply an erotic form of transgressive art. Showcasing the body as a canvas in which sexual freedom runs rampant. This often results from extreme fetishism to horrific acts which one cannot help but to find erotic but ashamed. From every fetish you can imagine, The Vienna Aktionists Collection puts the term "aktion" into a three hour degrading art piece and breathes life into it, creating the most expressive and disgusting form of film I've ever seen. THE VIENNA AKTIONISTS COLLECTION VOLUME 1 on DVD and THE VIENNA AKTIONISTS COLLECTION VOLUME 2 on DVD exclusively at wtfdvds.com

-mAQ

BAT PUSSY
BAT PUSSY

??? (1973) Where can I possibly begin. This film is so incredibly awful that I don't know what to say. 1973 was an eventful year; Nixon decided it was time to reconsider America's place in 'Nam, The Roe v. Wade case empowers women across the globe, and Picasso passed away. Of all the things I'd be most likely to remember about this year, It would be the release of Bat Pussy. Take the adult cast of Roseanne and Married with Children and force them to have awkward 69 scenes. The deficient offspring would be Bat Pussy.

Buddy: "I want HOT pussy on the grill!" That is the kind of dialogue we are treated with. Most pornographic videos tries to build a story with under 10 actual lines, but no, Bat Pussy is 50 goddamn minutes of non-stop child support threatening redneck action. Buddy and Sam are an average American couple, rolling around in their bed complaining about bills and how slutty each other are. There lines are often confused and the sound is cut as the poor cast looks towards the crew for their next lines. My pal Pete told me this film was bad, but I didn't realize a spectrum of film this horrible existed. I have found the 4th dimension of horror and she's called Bat Pussy. You'll know her when her twat twitches. That's when she senses a crime in progress. Such as a couple filming an amateur smut film without her. Buddy: "BATWOMAN!!" Sam: "...it's Bat Pussy" Buddy: "BAT PUSSY!" Buddy has a little problem. He suffers from erectile dysfunction. Not so much a hardcore film as they are just chewing on each others genitalia for 50 minutes screaming at each other, threatening to file for divorce the next day and how big Sam's pussy is. I've never seen a porn where the star stays limp dick the entire duration of the film. It seems to defy physics. Bat Pussy is utterly unwatchable but the replay value is so high. This is a film that exceeds its own limitations, thus becoming a wildly quotable film. I could never recommend a film and warn them at the same time until I saw Bat Pussy. Dora Dildo is the only good looking face in this film and that's not saying much. Watching her tumble on her Hoppity-Hop is too damn hilarious. Bat Pussy is a masterpiece porn spoof of a downright terrible caliber.

-mAQ

BOX BALL

??? (1977)

Box Ball is the living endowment of "anti-porn." To listen closely as a lady with a nasally vocal system describe in vivid and vulgar detail her fantastical experiences involving bringing a lucky male home to twist his "pendulous" balls over and over in the fashion of a rope forming a "grotesticle" anomaly is the true definition of home entertainment terror. Filmed in 1977, Box Ball is one of the better roughies I've been unlucky enough to witness and with this condolence, I give you my short and inebriated thoughts on the subject. Now with calling the film a "better" roughie, I find it necessary to examine the word closer as to get a feeling of pride in knowing you're about to watch a project that only Satan can be proud of. Box Ball is a film that I could ultimately go without seeing ever again but for a man to climax as the horrors of the world are being unleashed on his family jewels is something that needs to be seen to be believed. You will admire painted pastels decorate the film stock along with much needed grain and VHS reproduction tracking errors. This is something of an accidental aesthetic and it actually benefits the case of Box Ball and that case is beyond my, or any man's, comprehension. Only thing I know is that whatever they had in mind to create was successful with the invention of Box Ball - a film that dictates a strict character of monogamy. It's practically blurting out a sermon warning of the dangers of recreational sex. God only knows how many romantic comedies should take after Box Ball, one of the first classics of the genre. For being a porno short, Box Ball is efficient in building up such an aberrant argument against the sexual affliction. Women require the need of diversity. Hence why most of female kind seems to lean towards doggy style and bullish black men. It's this lingering curiosity that leads to the sexual experimentation in Box Ball. Speaking of women's fixation with diversity, that brings to mind the domineering role of a modern day fellatio-giver. Women love to feel in charge, to feel empowered - Hell, most of us do and it's in this similar staple for men to commonly enjoy the thought of power-play (rape). Men enjoy rape fantasies and women have testicle-twisting fantasies. Let's hope the last statement isn't accurate or both sexes are screwed. It's in this similar vein of vice versa squirming lovers experiencing a tipping scale of fetishism that the philosophy of Box Ball occurs. The leading lady loves to twist his testicles tight into a sliver and forcefully lift up his body by noted "organ." This scene in particular is the most arduous scene Box Ball has to offer. For being an archaic look at a masochistic male and sadistic slut, Box Ball is an absorbing film(?) if not for being inclusively fucked up and the antithesis of common placed arousal.

-mAQ

JIGGA JONES
JIGGA JONES

?? (2006)

I normally stray from the temptation of creative film writings while intoxicated. When I watched internet meme Jiggaboo Jones' film Jigga Jones several days ago, I owed it to myself to pick up myself some O.E., slam it back, and write about my racial learnings in the heart of a forged urban environment where the streets can kill you. For the general population who hasn't heard of him, he's an African man parading around in a Jheri curl talkin' bout some bitches and hoes, based solely on his existing fan base. Far from post-blaxploitation, Jigga Jones is a caricature of African's while not quite being pro-White. In this barely feature length film, we follow a first person perspective of a documentation on Jiggaboo Jones. This ex-con has recruited a camera man (ala Man Bites Dog) to film him while he robs, jacks, snatches, flips, twists, and hustles the common man, all for a buck. The original edit of this film would have been made notorious, for it featured around 700 curse words, which would have propelled it into the number one profane film on retail distribution. They didn't, but with this current cut, I learned how to make the "$1.89" which might be an experiment I myself might partake in.

The "$1.89" is a weapon for thugs with little to no money, or any dawg that simply loves to cause unexpected destruction. This recipe of death follows this mold. Acquire an empty soda bottle, preferably a dark cola. Spray paint the inside a black color with a couple coats. Purchase a 12 inch metal rod, insert it into the bottle after drilling two holes near the bottom, then fill with cement. As Jiggaboo Jones explains, what you are now equipped with is not only a devastating weapon, but one that disguises its wielder as a soda-loving nigga, that is, until he attacks and unwittingly steals all your cash. Jigga Jones is a short film. One should be advised to not pay full price for this film. While being hilarious, an urban satire, and an all-out attack on the "Definitive" black culture, this is far too short to spend full price on. In comparison, The Dragonball Z "films" that barely clock in at 48 minutes that have you paying up to 17 dollars a piece. Jigga Jones is entertaining and happens to teach you homegrown and sarcastic street smarts. If anyone is stupid enough to reenact anything in this film, they deserve the jail time. This is worth your time if given the chance. Jiggaboo Jones will always be "the #1 nigger in America". Kill Whitey.

-mAQ

KON KIN PLEAD 3

??? (???) WARNING: Animal Cruelty

Judging from the foreboding logo sprawled in red during the introduction to PETA hell, I'd like to assume this is a documentary discussing the horrors of humanity ala Jacopetti's Mondo Cane. Language differences block any and all source of comfort, thus making this film's mixed messages much harder to stomach. You're probably asking yourself, "What the hell is Kon Kin Plead 3?". The answer isn't easy. From a bird's-eye view, my best guess is to call it a documentary of delicacies in the form of wildlife. In between the Pirates of the Caribbean stolen score that appears every so often, the result is a quite tragic piece of film making. Had I known what they were saying, I might have been able to simply dismiss this film as useless but my curiosity overwhelmed me to such a degree, that simply shutting this off wouldn't have sufficed. Remember the infamous turtle evisceration scene in Cannibal Holocaust? Well, Kon Kin Plead 3 is an extended and lost in translation version of that extended to a mind-numbing length of 50 minutes. According to my sources, Kon Kin Plead is a reality show of sorts. One that involves Thai reporters traveling to film their neighbors - the Cambodians - indulge in exotic treats of various forest critters. I'd like to get this out of the way. I love animals. I respect all phylum's and all shapes. Unlike a 16 year old girl and her fear of spiders, I respect all life to a degree. Fear should only be used as a tool of utmost respect anyhow. Watching such widely despised creatures like tarantulas and snakes getting devoured, sometimes while alive, is horridly upsetting to both your principles and your digestive system. I believe I read this film being called a "Crazy Critter Cuisine" somewhere on this wonderful wide web. All this blood-draining is getting to me. It's not that I'm queasy, it's the fact that this film is useless. I may not know what they're saying and that these events are directed towards realism, but the "Arterial spray sound effect" needn't be applied to the throat slitting of a serpent. That's down right low, even for a wannabe mondo film. Kon Kin Plead 3 might have been a culturally fascinating, albeit graphic documentary, had I been reassured that there was a point behind all this savagery.

-mAQ

THE E.T. PORNO
THE E.T. PORNO

???) (???)

When I first heard of an E.T. porno, I was confused and horrified. How could someone take a children's classic family film and convert its basic principles from friendship and adaptation, into getting off in each other's mouth? It seems to be quite simple. During my viewing of E.T., I loathed the film. It's use of horrible thematic elements and lack of any personality left this film as dry as bargain bin beef jerky. E.T. was always asexual to me, if not masculine. This came as a surprise to see E.T. in this porn knock off, with a brown shriveled vagina. So, the pieces of plot that I picked up from the hours of hardcore sex and foreplay were that colonial people loved to have sex, and then E.T. came along. E.T. observed and became fascinated by our copious amount to procreate, minus the fertilization. E.T. decided in order to blend in, She must do the same. So this all boils down to your favorite family's hero sucking colonial reproductive organs. The effects in the film are quite horrible. E.T. is clearly a tall woman with full body makeup. I guess it was to incorporate this without hiring a midget. That might have been too much. The film is quite a miscarriage on screen. It certainly doesn't arouse in any aspect and is only really good for the few laughs and the bragging rights of seeing it. I am glad I watched this, for now every time I think of Spielberg, I think of raunchy sex and cheap Hollywood knock-offs, which is what most of his films consist of, save for Jaws. The only thing I can really hope for is a Schindler's List porno.

-Maq

DANDY DUST

A. Hans Scheirl (1998)

As far as quality films/filmmakers go, very few works by lesbian and transgendered 'ladies' are at the top of my list of important flicks as it seems oftentimes such emotionally and politically-driven works are merely a temporary outlet for the bush-league agitator to 'sass and harass the cis', but not much else, at least where artistic merit is concerned. After all, one would have to be a master of pussy-licking puffery to argue that critically-revered American lesbian films like Rose Troche's Go Fish (1994) and Cheryl Dunye's The Watermelon Woman (1996) have any sort of aesthetic or artistic assets aside from lipstick lezy g Guinevere Turner's ass. It was not until about a month ago after being introduced to the unyielding low-budget trans-lesbo sci-fi epic entitled Dandy Dust (1998), a British-Austrian co-production directed by sexually anomalous Aryan auteur A. Hans Scheirl (now known as 'Angel Hans') that I reconsidered my mostly generous assessment of contemporary dyke directors. Whatever Scheirl's true objective with the film was, Dandy Dust feels like the Germanic lipstick mafia equivalent of Shinya Tsukamoto's classic homoerotic Japanese cyberpunk flick Tetsuo: The Iron Man (1989), except featuring an aberrant kaleidoscope of colors and an even more incoherent and antagonizing plot. Starring director Scheirl in the title role as 'Dandy Dust' (and he/she certainly has the dandy wardrobe and demeanor to live up to the name), Dandy Dust is a decidedly deranged cinematic nachtmahr where sexual perversity – and especially degenerative hermaphroditism – is a norm of the future inter-sexual inter-galaxy. Filmed over a 5 ½ year period using a variety of film formats and techniques, including (but not limited to) Super 8 film stock, black-and-white film stock, early video, stop-motion animation, and digital animation; and eventually blown-up on 16mm for the finished cut, Dandy Dust is a carnal collage of meticulously constructed images that potently permeate a certain loopy and many times schizophrenic idiosyncrasy that – for better or for worse – few, if any, other films can claim.

Dandy Dust follows the cosmic cunt-licking journey of Dandy Dust, a "split-personality cyborg of fluid gender" whose memory has been erased, but to its dismay, is randomly reappearing in his/her arenose mind. After crash-landing on the hermaphroditic and inorganic manmade sphere of 3075, Dust who – through a series of real and/or imaginary childhood flashbacks during her upbringing on the Planet of Blood and Swelling (a menstruating matriarchal planet, perhaps?) – comes to realize that he/she was sexually used and abused by her incestuous father who was, in turn, murdered by the guy/gal's Xanthippe mother during a jealous and prepossessed crime of passion. The orgasmic sphere of 3075 features a variety of gaudy and gay characters that include, lesbo-Negro identical twins Mao and Lisa; scientist sistas with an aptness for reanimating phallic-like mummies, surly and sadistic Super-Mother Cyniborg; a ghoulish and (unfortunately) unclothed being obsessed with constructing a heretical hermaphrodite army that includes Dust, and father Sir Sidore; a sexually-repressed yet remarkably decadent 18th century aristocrat with a prudish and pompous persona. Of course, Dandy Dust is such an overwhelming overload of audacious aesthetic debauchery that it is nearly impossible to make any sense of the film's plot, at least upon an initial viewing of the film. Admittedly, it took me a couple tries to actually finish the film due to its tumultuously condensed and compacted cluster of unflattering intersexual nudes, frightful lesbian fetishism, and overall deluge of eclectic seizure-inducing neon polychromasia.

DANDY DUST

Like the more inaugural films of the silent era (especially, German expressionist works) and the equally masturbatory works of contemporary Canadian auteur Guy Maddin, Dandy Dust is primarily a visual experience that reminds the viewer why that film is a virtually unlimited artistic medium that has been barely explored, at least as far as narrative structure (or lack thereof) and the mise-en-scène is concerned. Although a low-budget effort shot in a quasi-dilettantish and embarrassingly intimate manner not unlike James Bidgood's Pink Narcissus (1971), David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), and E. Elias Merhige's Begotten (1990), Dandy Dust, like the previously mentioned films, is a flick that venturesomely pushed the envelope of filmmaking, thus making its paraded status is a work of 'Queer cinema' of only secondary and circumstantial importance. As a result, the film will be ultimately more appealing and rewarding to ardent cinephiles than the confused teenage tomgirl who just got her first taste of her friend's meat-curtain. Like any meritorious work of art, Dandy Dust is a candid and uncompromising – if non compos mentis – expression of the filmmaker; a dignified quality that few modern celluloid works strive for, let alone possess.

-Ty E

UNTIL THE LIGHT TAKES US

Aaeon Aites, Audrey Ewell (2008)

Norwegian black metal holds a special place in my heart and by that I do not merely mean the music (but mainly the spirit). Growing up watching MTV during my elementary school years, I soon became disillusioned by the messages of peace and tolerance promoted by the majority of white artists I was exposed to. After all, all the Negro “musicians” promoted violence and the will to power (albeit, in a way I could never relate to). For me, it was simply a question of, “Why are all white musicians a bunch of pussy hippies?!” Of course, I grew older and discovered aggressive music on my own but it was not until I discovered black metal that I realized the power (for better or for worst) a music scene could have. I was first exposed to black metal after watching Harmony Korine’s Gummo about 7 years ago, a cinematic experience that changed my life in more than one way (the discovery of black metal being one of those ways). I soon realized black metal was an expression of an atavistic reawakening in the Nordic countries, the European dream that German Friedrich Nietzsche had hoped for, only on a much smaller (and somewhat degenerate) scale.

The black metal musicians have done much more than most people that simply describe themselves as “musicians.” They burned down churches, murdered homosexuals, committed suicide and even murdered each other. The little Jewish auteur from Tennessee, Harmony Korine, even stated that the black metal musicians killed their Messiah. As a tribute to black metal musicians and their neo-heathen imagery, Korine even exhibited his photography project The Sigil of the Cloven Hoof Marks Thy Path whilst tap-dancing in black-metal-face. Korine’s project can be seen in the 2009 documentary on the history of Norwegian black metal Until the Light Takes Us. Surely, the greatest and most innovative musician involved with black metal is Varg “Count Grishnackh” Vikernes. Varg is best known for his musical outfit Burzum as well as the killing of his musical rival Euronymous, the man Harmony Korine named the messiah of black metal. The documentary Until the Light Takes Us helps to separate the facts and myths surrounding black metal culture.

Aside from the killings and church burnings, the only other thing most people associate black metal with is Satanism. Of course, the media was behind associating black metal with Satanism as Varg Vikernes makes clear in Until the Light Takes Us. The real motivation behind the anti-Christian sentiment associated with black metal is the reawakening of the pre-Christian Nordic soul. As explained by Varg and various other musicians in the documentary, black metal musicians hate Christianity due to the fact that the Christians destroyed their original cultures and replaced it with the religion of Christ. Not only do the black metal musicians despise Christ but they also hate egalitarian globalism and how it is being spread like cancer in a similar manner they feel Christianity was, destroying what is organically theirs and replacing it with “peaceful” universal internationalism. In Until the Light Takes Us, Varg Vikernes describes how as a child, when he saw a McDonalds fast food restaurant built in his town, his immediate reaction was to shoot it with a rifle with his comrades. In fact, Varg and his fellow musicians, although taught lies of equality growing up, felt with their truest instincts that globalization was wrong, hence reacting to it in the most violent manner, whether it was by creating raw black metal or catching a church on fire.

UNTIL THE LIGHT TAKES US

Varg in prison

The black metal musician Fenriz sums up the Norwegian soul as one of extreme individualism and isolation. Surely, the modern internationalized world is causing dissonance in the Northern soul with third world immigrants (who are generally collectivist races that lack individualism) flooding into first world nations. As the world gets more globalized and even more groups of people that have nothing in common (both culturally and racially) are cramped together, one can most certainly expect much more violent and powerful resistances to internationalism in the future, for black metal is only the beginning. Since the events discussed in Until the Light Takes Us happened sometime ago, the documentary mainly acts as a reflection of the black metal movement during the early days of a globalized Norway. Recently, Varg Vikernes has even described metal culture as “Nigger Culture” and is now mainly involved with creating dark ambient synthesizer-based (something he has always experimented with) and folkish music, as well as writing books on Heathenism.

The best source for the history of black metal is the book Lords of Chaos written by Michael Moynihan (with the help of Norwegian Didrik Söderlind). Much like the documentary Until the Light Takes Us, Lords of Chaos is fairly objectively done, allowing for the main creators of black metal to tell their own stories. I had already read the book before watching the documentary Until the Light Takes Us so I didn't really learn anything new by watching it (but at the very least, I was once again treated to the fantastic aesthetic package of black metal). Apparently, Japanese auteur Sion Sono (Suicide Club, Strange Circus) will be directing a film based on Lords of Chaos. For now, treat yourself to Until the Light Takes Us.

-Ty E

OMEGA SHELL

Aarón Soto (2001)

Deemed a "Cyberpunk Spaghetti Western", this film is directed by "newbie" Aaron Soto. The entrance of the film picks up strong, conspiring to grasp our deep attention with an intro that could only be imagined and performed by an experimental band like Fantômas mixed with the influences of early Tsukamoto. The beginning of the actual film takes a boring turn as a dirty Mexican is wrapped up with VHS tape. Perhaps a metaphor that this "underground classic" is the death of modern film as we know it? He eats rocks, digs holes, and trips around a vast nothingness in Tijuana. The surrealism is forced and bland. Hyper-edited to try and keep your attention. This is one film that doesn't know what it is. At first, our subject is clumsy and inanimate posture, shuffling across the desert. Next he is ghetto-rigging some sort of machine in a vain attempt at making a cyberpunk film. The visuals are mostly there, but this short lacks heart and a discernible story line. This isn't a film like Begotten in which you can deeply admire the pretentious thoughts surrounding the film, it's more like "Wow. I like what they are aiming for, but there is nothing really here for me to like besides a couple of interesting scenes." And that is the fault. Interesting does not mean good. Such a statement could be frowned upon, but in case of this short, the victor is obvious. Where Tetsuo amazed with its amazing visuals, the protagonist of this story looks like Luis Guzmán just crawled out of a chimney.

Along his pointless journey to nowhere, Tapeman meets a chemo patient who hands him a tablet/book thing with something scribbled on it. World Surrealism seems to be long but dead. Every other film to come out of the avant-garde genre is a mock-up of Tetsuo. Goddamn, these directors need to get a new influence. Soon the film ends, and you feel suicidal for putting up with the semi-hyped garbage. There is no mistake that somewhere out there, someone must love this film for what it is- Pointless. I mean, isn't that why people watch "B movies"? I'm a fan of all things cinema, be it romantic comedies to blaxploitation to even extreme nihilistic horror's. One thing that jerks my chain is film that exercises its ever-so-noticeable right to be annoyingly cryptic. So, the plot is meant to be a future-laden desperado with some phallic apparatus. Not only did he fail on mentioning that at all, but he also failed in his attempt to enthrall his viewers with the promise of fetching mysticism similar to El Topo. Suffice to say, his other films show a great increase in promise. Move along, Nothing to see here.

-mAQ

RHINOCEROS EYES
RHINOCEROS EYES

Aaron Woodley* (2004)

Aaron Woodley's career in film no doubt has been pampered by his uncle, who you may know, David Cronenberg. After making several short films, Woodley jumped into his feature debut with Rhinoceros Eyes, yet another shell in which Michael Pitt struts his god-given eccentricity as horn-rimmed bespectacled liberal arts ladies coo in unison. In Rhinoceros Eyes, the mystery and wonder behind the title is soon revealed as nothing more than a manipulating wench puppet play. Pitt stars as Chep, an introverted autistic prop assistant who resides in the very prop house that he commits his daily activities to. After being confronted by a woman whose artistic integrity leads her to this very same prop house in hopes for authentic rhinoceros eyes, Chep's debilitating mental illness leads him to reach into pockets of excess he was unaware of in order to do anything to aid his confused obsession. Several comparisons can be drawn from Rhinoceros Eyes and Bertolucci's The Dreamers. Not only does Michael Pitt express his love for cinema in both films but he is equally as mentally deficient in the roles of Chep and Matthew. At least in Rhinoceros Eyes Pitt didn't shame me by having his pants removed while Bertolucci gawks at his flaccid member.

Being the nephew to David Cronenberg does not entitle you with a hereditary disposition towards crown cinema. Woodley needs to realize this and any fan that is endeared to this film as well. Rhinoceros Eyes isn't a good film in any regards. I was able to finish it but this alone does not certify as entertainment. Rhinoceros Eyes consists of two "realities". The first is the dark, pain, dark lifestyle that Michael Pitt lives and expects you to conform to being interested in. The second is his strange hallucinations of various trinkets taking animation and forming into patchwork reflections of his very own image. Hardly inspired by the stop-motion greats, these scenes will leave you groaning, more so than the faux-sentimentality at work in what must be Michael Pitt's worst role. Gondry's Science of Sleep did this infinitely better than Rhinoceros Eyes flails to achieve. If Rhinoceros Eyes succeeds in any aspect, it's making romance tasteless and tame yet again. Soon after acquiring the rhinoceros eyes, the woman begins milking the retard for more elaborate pieces for their art film: a memorable prop being an Irish carved prosthetic arm, who Chet's neighbor coincidentally owns and beats her husband with every night.

What is accomplished within Woodley's debut is creating something with the intentions of being a film, but plagued by every possible nuisance of modern filmmaking, an aesthetic in drought, intellectually void, plot inconsistencies, and an ending involving a decision that should have been made from the start, rendering the later half of the film null. If you have a significant other that favors films such as Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind then Rhinoceros Eyes might be the perfect film to delude respect towards in exchange for late night sex. Guilty of more than one crime, Rhinoceros Eyes also shares some strange similarities with Donnie Darko, released 2 years prior. Same stigma as most pretentious cinema that reaches out to vulnerable females susceptible to romance, Rhinoceros Eyes is hollow cinema, driven only to conceptualize an ending that Woodley thought was "sick" or "awesome". To be forward, the ending was the only bright side of this piece of film, in fact, watching Michael Pitt withstand a remarkable amount of pain was oddly the most satisfying thing I'd recently viewed. But it's all in vain, Rhinoceros Eyes still remains one of the worst films I've struggled through.

-mAQ

9 LIVES OF A WET PUSSY
9 LIVES OF A WET PUSSY

Abel Ferrara (1976)

Since he is a supposed crackhead (or as Vincent Gallo once noted, “Abel Ferrara was on so much crack when I did THE FUNERAL, he was never on set. He was in my room trying to pick-pocket me.”) who has directed some of the most unwaveringly sleazy works of celluloid art-trash to slither out of the busted bowels of NYC, it should be no surprise that the McGuido auteur Abel Ferrara (Ms. 45, Bad Lieutenant) started his filmmaking career in pornography, with his first feature being the incest-themed blue movie 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy (1976). Indeed, Ferrara certainly went ‘all the way’ with his first feature film, as the somewhat strange fuck flick not only features the director’s then-girlfriend getting boned by other people, but the director himself being cinematically debased (though many reviewers assume Ferrara hired a cock-double for his scenes, the filmmaker revealed in his obscure 2010 documentary Mulberry St. that he bravely used his own member for the scenes, thus demonstrating his unwavering ‘commitment’ as a true, if not seemingly terribly troubled, auteurist filmmaker). As Italian actress-turned-auteur Asia Argento, who starred in Ferrara’s little mess of a movie New Rose Hotel (1998), stated in 2001 regarding her colleague, “Mr. Ferrara will not speak about his porn film. He says that now he has two daughters and that’s why he will not allow it to be re-released or talk about in interviews,” yet since then, the director has discussed the film, even complaining about the experience of making the film in a 2010 interview with the Guardian, “It’s bad enough paying a guy $200 to fuck your girlfriend, then he can’t get it up.” In fact, Ferrara had mentioned 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy in interviews long before 2010 because, as noted by biographer Brad Steven in his work Abel Ferrara: The Moral Vision (2004), the director told a French journalist in 1988 who asked whether or not the film was a thriller, “Some episodes were sort of like something you’d find in a thriller, but otherwise it was rather an erotic movie. It was my first feature, one of the first things I shot in 35mm. It was a sexy portmanteau drama about three or four women we knew, their sexual adventures. It consisted of seven episodes, ten minutes each.” David Pirell, who played the cold husband of the main character of the film, speculated that 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy, “was a way of raising funds to do The Driller Killer. That movie (in my opinion) had redeeming social value, although it was basically a grade B porno. It was filmed during Fall 1975. We had a great time making it, because we were all beginning our careers and had been friends for many years. Abel was a good and unique director. I remember the film opening at a theatre in the city: everyone attended this screening and laughed at how stupid this movie was, but we believed it would lead to better things. We all learned a lot about the film process, and I learned what I did not want to do.” Originally made under the working titles ‘White Women’ and ‘Nothing Sacred’, 9 Lives of a Wet

Pussy is somewhat in the spirit of the semi-artsy/quasi-narrative-driven works of auteur-pornographers Armand Weston (The Defiance of Good, Take Off) and Cecil Howard (Neon Nights, Scoundrels), albeit somewhat more degenerate and incoherent. Indeed, featuring Abel Ferrara in a scene where he plays a deeply religious old Polack man (he was 25 at the time!) whose daughters take turns raping him after he gets too drunk on wine, 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy features a debauched mix of daughter-on-father incest, lesbo miscegenation and lily-licking of the black blue blood sort, superficial occult themes (including dubious tarot card readings and Nigerian 'black' magic), and aesthetically vulgar 1970s hairdos (sometimes it is hard to tell if it is a man or woman that is giving a blowjob), 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy is by no means a lost masterpiece from a great American auteur, but simply evidence that proves Abel Ferrara has always been an 'exploitation' filmmaker with a wayward moral compass.

Beginning with close-up shots of a negress massaging oily white tits and a high yellow chick sucking on a white cock, 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy at first seems like another miserable miscegenation porn movie, but things change quite quickly after the title screen disappears, at least temporarily. Narrated and presented by a hippie-like chick named 'Gypsy' (Dominique Santos), who reads out letters written to her by her former lesbian lover Pauline (Pauline LaMonde), 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy is a curiously convoluted tale of compulsive carpet-munching, anticlimactic cumshots, and rather tedious tarot readings. As Pauline confesses in a letter to Gypsy, she is cheating on her husband David (David Pirell) with a French stable boy (Shaker Lewis), stating of the erotic experience, "oh god, how I love it when he cums and cums... Oh Gypsy, you must really learn to love men again." As Gypsy states to the viewer after reading Pauline's letter, "Learn to love men again? That's Pauline. She does nothing but have intercourse all day long. Then she writes letters about it as if I might be interested." Indeed, while reasonably beautiful, Gypsy is a devout dyke and has nil interest in men. Instead, Gypsy spends her days all by her lonesome playing with her kitty cat and tarots cards in the hope that Pauline will one day come back to her so they can rekindle their 'cunning linguist' games. After smoking opium from an exotic peace pipe, Gypsy reads a letter from Pauline where she complains regarding her hubby, "Oh we still make love together when he's not snorting coke with Rachel or balling his mistresses and boyfriends," adding regarding the dubious status of their relationship, "But this cold detachment of his, which derives me wild when we are in bed, makes the rest of my life unbearable." Indeed, while taking a leak at a gas station bathroom, Pauline decides to counteract her husband's 'cold detachment' by having sex with a random stranger. Reading tarot cards in a supposed 'Hungarian fashion,' Gypsy also describes how savage salaciousness is in Pauline's blood, remarking, "I know Pauline, she has her grandmother's soul. They even say she has her grandmother's face. You see, Pauline's great-grandfather and two daughters came to America in 1903 from Poland. Pauline's great-grandfather was a very strict Christian. He was really overprotective with the two girls. When the old man would go out to work, he would lock them up in the apartment. The only time they could leave the house was under his chaperon. Life was pretty lonely and...the older they got, the more curious they became." Indeed, Pauline's great-grandfather (played by auteur Abel Ferrara, who sports a rather unbelievable grey wig) was sexually ravaged by his own two daughters after he had too much holy wine to drink. Gypsy then goes on to complain about how Pauline had a steamy love affair with a virginal Nigerian princess named Nacala (Joy Silver) and how she "was afraid of that black bitch" and her double black magic. In one of the more would-be-depraved scenes of the film in what is a less than dreamy dream sequence, Gypsy morphs into a man (of course, this is not actually depicted in the film) and literally begins biting Pauline's beaver. In the end, Pauline somehow 'magically' appears at Gypsy's apartment. After getting all pseudo-philosophical and stoically stating, "There is no reality except human reality," Gypsy walks over to Pauline's naked body and states, "Sister, I have been waiting...It has been lonely and dark for me here since you left."

9 LIVES OF A WET PUSSY

While I was hoping 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy would be a wanton lost masterpiece, it ultimately proved to be one of Abel Ferrara's worst cinematic efforts to date. While it attempts to tell a sordid story in an experimental way, 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy ultimately seems like a haphazardly constructed collection of banal fuck scenes that Ferrara attempted to piece together with a Sapphic pseudo-occult storyline. Indeed, when everything is said and done, 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy is nothing more than a botched celluloid orgasm with a rather misleading title that, with the exception of sexual degeneracy and cheap exploitation, gives little, if any, indication of what sort of filmmaker Ferrara would evolve into. Of course, as musical composer Joe Delia, who would go on to write music for most of Ferrara's films, revealed regarding the film, "it was never anyone's intention to make an intellectual statement with this production. I always had the feeling that it was a means to get to the next level, which was to get another film made." As early Ferrara collaborator Douglas Merov would also insightfully reveal, "The only reason Abel made 9 LIVES OF A WET PUSSY was because that's the only kind of film he could get money for. Arthur Weisberg, an old porno producer from Detroit, gave him the money. Why he's not credited, who knows? Tax reasons, maybe. Arthur was a character, boy – a truly tough, no-nonsense Jew [...] I saw the film and laughed my ass off at the sight of my friends in powdered wigs and beards showing their private parts for all the perverts in the world to see." Indeed, 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy is nothing short of an abject embarrassment, so it should be no surprise that Ferrara tends to tell people that his arthouse-slasher flick The Driller Killer (1979) was his first film, though the director apparently told Brad Stevens, "I'm not ashamed of having made a porn film, but if I hadn't directed anything except 9 LIVES OF A WET PUSSY, you wouldn't be writing a book about me." A work that ranks below Stanley Kubrick's Fear and Desire (1953) and John Waters' Mondo Trasho (1969) in terms of embarrassing first features, 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy is ultimately a potent reminder of what can happen when you get involved with Jewish pornographers.

-Ty E

THE DRILLER KILLER
THE DRILLER KILLER

Abel Ferrara (1979)

I do not know when NYC-based auteur Abel Ferrara (Bad Lieutenant, 4:44 Last Day on Earth) became a full-fledged crackhead, but he certainly seemed like he was smoking rocks at the time he directed and starred in his first 'official' film The Driller Killer (1979), even though the film pre-dates the crack epidemic of the mid-1980s. Indeed, while Ferrara had the opportunity to use 35mm film stock for his rather disappointing porn flick 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy (1976), he shot his quasi-arthouse slasher flick The Driller Killer on cheap 16mm film stock, which would prove to only further accentuate the film's already glaring grittiness and sometimes cinéma vérité-like feel, especially during scenes featuring deranged dipsomaniac bums regurgitating on shitty city street corners. Admittedly, when I first saw The Driller Killer about a decade or so ago, I thought it was a plodding pile of totally forgettable homeless vomit (and, indeed, the film has its fair share of wino bile), yet as a fan of a number of Ferrara's films, I felt it was about time I give the film another chance, especially after watching 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy and seeing for myself why the director wanted to distance himself from his first unofficial film. A sort of superlatively sordid and sleazy yet suavely stylized work of unhinged aesthetic wickedness set in an urban post-industrial wasteland that seems like a cross between Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976) and Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982) as directed by a crack addicted Paul Morrissey with an affinity for the killer kaleidoscopic cinematic works of great Guido horror masters like Mario Bava and Dario Argento, The Driller Killer is offensive simply due to the fact that it is an artsy slasher flick that uses blood the same way porn flicks use cum shots and Picasso used paint. Additionally, Ferrara seems so innately irrational, hysterical, and hopped up on who knows what during his performance in the film that it seems virtually unthinkable that he was actually responsible for directing the work, but then again, The Driller Killer also has a sometimes punk rock documentary-like vibe, as if it was made over a couple weekends at the director's favorite party spots and friends' homes. Despite being a bottom-of-the-barrel avant-garde exploitation flick that seems to have influenced lesser NYC filmmakers of the 'no wave' and Cinema of Transgression movements, The Driller Killer was labeled a 'video nasty' and banned in the UK, with Mike Bor—the pansy Principal Examiner at the British Board of Film Classification—stating of the film, "The Driller Killer was almost single-handedly responsible for the Video Recordings Act 1984." A vehemently vile piece of 'vigilante' anti-justice about a mentally perturbed painter who goes around wasting winos with a cordless electric drill, The Driller Killer is an aesthetically and thematically reckless work of low-class celluloid nihilism with the sort of gutter trash cultivation that only an old school street rat like Abel Ferrara is capable of. Although mere speculation on my part, I have to assume that

The Driller Killer is a semi-autobiographical work directed by a struggling artist about a struggling artist, as what can be seen as Ferrara's excrement-ridden equivalent to David Lynch's masterpiece Eraserhead (1977). Filmed in NYC's little Italy by Martin Scorsese's half-Irish tweaker bastard son, The Driller Killer—a work that was hilariously, 'Dedicated To The People of New York – "The City of Hope"'—is, if nothing else, a tastelessly charming, celluloid cultural artifact that is mandatory viewing for anyone who thinks Andy Milligan's Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1973) features one of the most important and honest historical depictions of the rotten Big Apple.

Erratic social retard and loser loudmouth Reno Miller (played by Abel Ferrara under the pseudonym 'Jimmy Laine'), who looks sort of like a Jewish crackhead version of Mick Jagger, is a down-and-out degenerate painter who gets quite a shock when he enters a fancy Catholic Church and an old 'Father-Christ' figure grabs his hand, as if he knows the young artist is about to become a portable-drill-wielding psycho killer. When Reno's girlfriend Carol (Carolyn Marz) asks him who the old man at the church was, the painter eloquently replies, "Who knows, some fucking degenerate bum wino." Reno lives in a dilapidated Union Square apartment with his girlfriend Carol and her 'punk pixie' lesbo lover Pamela (Baybi Day) and they cannot afford to pay the rent nor phone bill. To top everything off, Reno hates the fact that his area is infested with perennially barfing, beer-binging bums who have little respect for civilization, let alone bathing. In the hope of getting money to pay his bills, Reno conspires to get a $500 advance from a flaming fag art dealer named Dalton Briggs (Harry Schultz II) in regard to a giant surreal buffalo painting (Ferrara claims this painting is now in the National Gallery in Washington D.C.) he is putting his finishing touches on, but he is snidely turned down by the pretentious degenerate art queen. When Reno's girlfriend complains that he should finish the painting now so they can get money to pay the bills, the exceedingly emotionally erratic artist flips out and screams at his best beloved, "Since when did you become such an expert on painting?! I mean, you're telling me its finished? [...] You know nothing about painting, man. You know what you know about? You know how to bitch, and how to eat, and how to bitch and how to shit and how to bitch, but you don't know nothing about painting, so you don't know when its gonna be done." To make matters worse, a no-talent punk band in the spirit of the New York Dolls/Television that is fronted by a narcissistic mascara-wearing wop named 'Tony Coca-Cola' (D.A. Metrov) has just moved into Reno's apartment building and they practice until 2am when the painter is trying in vain to concentrate on his work. After seeing a commercial for a Porto-Pak wireless electric drill and finding temporary solace in playing with the flayed corpse of a mutilated bunny rabbit (which resembles the skinned bunny from Roman Polanski's Repulsion (1965), as well as the mutant baby from Lynch's Eraserhead), Reno comes up with the bright idea to let off some steam by killing the bums that have been stinking up his neighborhood. Indeed, as an artist, Reno is a visionary and a creator and opts for taking it upon himself to create a new world that is free of parasitic subhuman rabble, but the problem is that he loses control and starts killing off more people than just bums.

THE DRILLER KILLER

As The Driller Killer progresses into deranging aesthetic debauchery and angst-ridden antihero Reno suffers a number of schizophrenic hallucinations and nasty nightmares, the quasi-psychosexually insane social reject begins perniciously penetrating bums and drunks via his trusty portable driller. Indeed, Reno drives his wacky weapon of choice into winos as if he is literally fucking their brains and guts out, even approaching one unsuspecting bum from behind as if he is bugging him. When Reno finally decides to kill pretentious art fag Dalton after he describes his finished buffalo painting as follows, "... this isn't right...this is nothing...this is SHIT. Where is the impact, it is just a god damn buffalo. This is nothing like your other works...this is far from your best stuff and the size can't hide it. Reno, the worst thing that can happen to a painter is happening to you...You are becoming simply a technician. There's nothing there...there's no feeling, there's no drama, there's no passion," he gets all ritualistic and sexually confused and makes sure to put on some pink lipstick and mascara before literally 'sticking it' to the anally retentive sodomite. Indeed, Reno even seduces Dalton over the phone before the killer climax by making it seem as if the two are going to make love, but the only penetration the art dealer receives is with a state-of-the-art consume grade electric drill. Meanwhile, after a series of nasty fights with his girlfriend Carol and various failed attempts at reconciliation (Reno paints her a childish painting with the words 'I Am Sorry' written on it), Reno finds himself without a girlfriend, so he kills his little lady's lily-licking lover Pamela and plots his revenge. Carol has gotten back with her estranged husband Stephen (Richard Howorth), so Reno pays a visit to the two at their apartment. After killing Stephen, Reno sneaks into the couple's bed and waits for Carol to arrive. Ultimately, The Driller Killer ends with Carol getting in bed and romantically whispering, "Stephen... come here" to what she assumes is her husband, not realizing her reject artist ex-boyfriend Reno is laying in the bed with his trusty drill.

More 'art-addled' than Scorsese's Taxi Driver and too gory and ultra-violent to appease the passive appetites of Francophile cinephiles who religiously masturbate to the cover art of the latest Criterion Collection release, The Driller Killer really is a film without an audience that was directed by a man who is not pretentious nor phony enough to market his films for art galley poofs and pansies, thus making it all the more significant that an art fag is brutally slaughtered in the film. Aside from possibly his philosophical 'postmodern' vampire flick The Addiction (1995), The Driller Killer is easily Ferrara's most arthouse oriented work to date, yet it is the sort of aberrant arthouse work that could only have been shit out by a decidedly degenerate low-life from NYC, hence the film's greatest appeal as a rude and morally unredeeming window into an American metropolitan maniac microcosm where all hope has been flushed into the sewer and where discriminatory homicide seems like the only reasonable answer. Indeed, The Driller Killer is not the Jewish bourgeois intellectual New York City of Woody Allen and half-Heeb hipster Lena Dunham, but the visceral and violent racially/culturally mongrelized McWop Catholic quasi-human cesspool of committed crackhead Abel Ferrara where municipal mental illness, mayhem, and murder are just as important cultural ingredients as pizza, crucifixes, and crack rocks. Forget the posturing moral righteousness of Slavic-Tatar Charles Bronson in Death Wish (1974), The Driller Killer is real and unadulterated depiction of what vicious vigilante dreams are made of. Like George A. Romero's hit midnight movie Night of the Living Dead (1968), The Driller Killer would fall into the public domain due to some lawyer's negligence, but if you have the opportunity, try to track down the French DVD release of the film featuring an audio commentary track from Abel Ferrara where the auteur gives a discernibly stoned recap of the film and hilariously mocks his own work, as if it is no more culturally significant than an antique ashtray. A true piece of American proletarian art without tradition or cultivation, The Driller Killer is a positively potent sub-avant-garde expression of the fact that American history, even that of a multicultural hellhole like New Amsterdam, was forged in blood, and oftentimes nonsensically so, as the troubled history of the Big Apple demonstrates.

-Ty E

Ms. 45

Ms. 45

Abel Ferrara (1981)

Ms. 45 is a revenge masterpiece directed by former pornographer (Nine Lives of a Wet Pussy) and Italian-American Abel Ferrara. The film's female lead is the tragically beautiful baby faced mute Thana (played by Zoë Tamerlis Lund) as a woman out for revenge against all men. Thana is a seamstress that is brutally raped in the typically degenerate human Zoo of New York City. After the rape, she enters her apartment and is raped yet again by a burglar. This time around Thana fights back and wastes the killer by beating him with an Iron. The brutal attacks transform this young woman into something completely different. Thana becomes a feminist in a very real sense. Like many Feminists were, she is a victim of male brutality. Feminists are from normal people as the "theory" of Feminism is a Lesbian one. Every Feminist that I have had the misfortune of meeting, had some very serious issues and a special place for young ladies. They expect the world to conform to their social abstraction, thus destroying the nuclear family in the process. The "god playing" Rockefeller foundation funded their subversive cause also known as "The Woman's Liberation" movement. Feminism, like the killer Thana, is social abstraction at the most brutal low. Thana has made all males her enemies and all females her allies (even ones attempting to kill her). She is incapable of feeling any type of empathy for the opposite sex. The irony being, that as a male viewer, I felt completely heartbroken by her character. A tragic beautiful woman that can no longer function in society is not the most heartwarming thing to see. It becomes clear from the beginning that Thana's "transformation" has essentially ended her life in the normal sense. Ms. 45 is truly a film of nihilistic horrors. Actress Zoë Tamerlis Lund would later go on to co-write the script for psycho, drug-addict cop flick Bad Lieutenant with Abel Ferrara. Like her character in Bad Lieutenant, Zoë Tamerlis Lund had a problem with needles and later transferred that horrible vice to cocaine. She died of a heart attack resulting from a Cocaine overdose in 1997. I believe that the "acting" Zoë Tamerlis Lund does in Ms. 45 is more real than one wants to believe. After watching Ms. 45 for the first time, I can easily say that it is the greatest American female revenge film.

-Ty E

CHINA GIRL

Abel Ferrara (1987)

I have always had a soft spot for Italian-Americans (or more specifically Sicilian-Americans). One of my best friends growing up was a Sicilian-American who had a natural knack for subversion, crime, lying, and the best fucked up ideas ever. By the age of 5 years old he was already a ladies man smooth talking young blond girls like a natural. After I saw Abel Ferrara's film China Girl I couldn't help but think of my childhood friend. Unlike the lead Tony in the film, my Sicilian friend was far from sweet. My friend was more like that older Sicilian-Americans in China Girl that waste Chinks for sport.

China Girl is quite the unconventional "Romeo and Juliet" style story. Nowadays there are plenty of interracial films where a white whore wants to screw a Negro or Latino for recreational fun. I don't think there is, however, another film about a forbidden love between an Italian boy and Chinese girl. One could say that this odd relationship is even a bit heartwarming. Amongst the hatred of rival racial gangs, these two abstractions find love in the most unconventional of places. One also can't help but enjoy seeing Italians and Chinese guys kicking each others asses. China Girl is one of Abel Ferrara's more "Hollywood" style films. Still, the film has a good balance between Ferrara's signature gritty urban style and studio production values. I must admit that China Girl is a much better film than Ferrara's infamous film Driller Killer. I also found China Girl to be fairly modern despite being over twenty years old. With the progressing influence of hostile third world "immigrants," city racial tensions are on a rise. I only wish other directors would make films featuring realistic fights between rivaling minorities.

With the unconventional and dangerous relationship in China Girl, one can usually only expect tragic results. Despite the drama, China Girl is still a film about the strength of the "human spirit (or something like that)." Spike Lee's film Jungle Fever was a film featuring an Italian woman and black man that "hook up." Despite the film being unintentionally funny, the film lacked any type of "soul." Maybe Spike Lee should treat Abel Ferrara to a basketball game and Ferrara might give him some directing tips.

-Ty E

KING OF NEW YORK
KING OF NEW YORK

Abel Ferrara (1990)

Watching films directed by some of New York City's finest auteur filmmakers, I get the feeling that many of these directors, to quote anti-hero Travis Bickle of Taxi Driver (1976), would like to live to see the day when "a real rain will come and wash all this scum off the streets," but in an absolutely abject area of cultural and racial chaos where the only thing that people have in common is their propensity for fucking everyone and anyone over just to grab a couple extra shekles, one can only guess who would have the moral and testicular fortitude and selflessness to give the miserable apocalyptic metropolis a nice cleansing via figurative acid rain. It seems that delightfully deranged mick-wop auteur Abel Ferrara (Bad Lieutenant, 4:44 - Last Day on Earth)—a man that undoubtedly owes his unhinged worldview and gritty aesthetic to his home city—has it in his mind that a white race-mixing drug lord with an all-Negro criminal outfit of fiercely fresh gangstas would be the valiant postmodern knight in shining black-and-white armor to clean up the mean streets of its most corrupt criminals and cops and give some of the drug-money profits to the meek, or at least one would assume so after see what is probably the director's most popular cinematic work, King of New York (1990), a contemporary update of the Robin Hood legend that reminds viewers why America is the foremost promoter of racial Armageddon and savage moral retardation. Like a speed-addled exploitation flick on steroids directed by a patently paranoid crackhead megalomaniac who came to a half-baked epiphany to solve all the problems of the rotten Big Apple after a lonely and otherworldly night on an angel dust high, King of New York has a pair of big yet busted celluloid testicles that could only have been conjured up by a chemically-influenced mad man with little concern for his health and reputation. A work so offensive to the morals of the seemingly amoral in the mainstream movie world that it inspired a number of audience members, including Abel Ferrara's own wife, to walk out of its premiere at the New York Film Festival, King of New York is a perversely potent piece of totally uncompromising and suavely stylized celluloid sadism disguised as saintly street justice that, unlike more popular gangster flicks Scarface (1983), GoodFellas (1990), Carlito's Way (1993), and The Departed (2006), does not give a shit about appealing to anyone aside from the director himself. That being said, as far as I am concerned, when it comes to uncompromising semi-mainstream auteur filmmakers, Abel Ferrara is the 'King of New York,' even if he has released a number of tedious celluloid turds since the release of King of New York, which probably largely has to do with the fact they he severed his longtime artistic relationship with screenwriter Nicholas St. John (Ms. 45, The Funeral) about half a decade after completing his modern day mafioso masterpiece. Starring Christopher Walken in one of his most iconic gangster roles and Laurence Fishburne in one of his most naughty

Negro roles, King of New York features some of Hollywood's best crime actors at their most lovably scummy.

Big time drug lord and classy classless glorified wigger Frank White (Christopher Walken) has spent half his life in prison and has just been released from Sing Sing and, quite naturally, he is determined to reign as both the king of the underworld and social justice, at least in his warped sort of unpredictable anti-hero way. A man who is extremely bitter because he has lost a lot of time due to his imprisonment, Frank wastes not a single second of time exterminating the criminal competition and on his first night out of the pen, he has his crucial killer crew slaughter a big-time Colombian drug dealer named Emilio El Zapa and his compatriot King Tito and steals their cocaine during a decidedly dirty drug deal that leaves a hotel room covered in a bloody mess of maimed and murdered Mestizos. Not long after, Frank gets a 'welcoming home' visit from his all-black criminal entourage, including a court jester sort of jigaboo named Jimmy Jump (Laurence Fishburne) and a nefarious nerd named Test Tube (Steve Buscemi), who warmly congratulate him on his release and give him a welcome-back present of Colombian coke. Frank wants to be the major of NYC and discusses his seemingly unlikely plans with his two corrupt lawyers, mulatto Puerto Rican Joey Dalesio (Paul Calderón, who also co-wrote Abel Ferrara's 1992 masterpiece of misanthropy Bad Lieutenant) and Nordic blonde babe Jennifer (Janet Julian). Dalesio is told by his boss to go to Little Italy to set up a meeting with mafia boss Arty Clay (Frank Gio) about running for mayor, but the anti-miscegenation Mafioso states, "I don't talk to nigger lovers" and literally pisses on the part-black lawyer's shoes as a message to his negrophiliac employer, so Frank comes by and unloads an absurd amount of rounds on the racist crime leader, thus making him a major enemy among organized crime leaders everywhere. When Frank attempts to make a drug deal with a Chinese drug leader named Larry Wong—a fan of F.W. Murnau's bloodsucker masterpiece Nosferatu (1922) who has private screenings of the film with his chink whores—for $15 million worth of cocaine, things get ugly due to the arrogance of the criminal Chinaman, so he and his crew are naturally exterminated on their own turf in Chinatown at the same area featured in Abel Ferrara's China Girl (1987). Indeed, love him or hate him (I tend to do a little of both), nobody makes a more interesting and unpredictable mafioso than Christopher Walken, whose gaunt appearance and idiosyncratic emotional mixture of stoicism and stuttering are realized to the fullest in King of New York.

With all the competition wiped out in a totally "no bullshit" type of manner, Frank White certainly becomes the unofficial 'King of New York,' but a group of cops, who are the first to verbally recognize this fact, including Detectives Roy Bishop (Victor Argo), Dennis Gilley (David Caruso), and Thomas Flanigan (Wesley Snipes, who was apparently living in his car during the production of the film), decide to take justice into their own hands. After having Jimmy Jump and some of Frank's lieutenants arrested for murder when a bodyguard from the Colombian gang miraculously survives and acts as a witness, Frank White has their bail posted at a million dollars a head, which makes the police realize that the “whole system favors the scum bag.” Corrupt cops Gilley and Flanigan get together a police crew posing as black gang bangers and bribe Dalesio so they can approach Frank’s gang under false pretenses and wipe them out. Of course, things go wrong and a number of cops and gangsters, including Uncle Tom Flanigan and fried chicken addict Jimmy Jumpy, are left dead. At the funeral for cop Flanigan, Frank White personally blows distraught policeman Gilley’s brains out in an impulsive act that leaves no doubt that he is no longer sound of mind, but a man on a mission for total self-destruction. Not long after, Frank White pays a personal visit to uncorrupt cop Roy Bishop’s apartment and expresses his reasoning for killing his criminal compatriots, stating, “When the D.A.’s office investigated the sudden death of Arty Clay, they found that he left a $13 million estate. How do you explain that? There there’s Larry Wong, who owned half of Chinatown when he passed away. Larry used to rent his tenements to Asian refugees, his own people, for $800 a month to share a single toilet on the same floor. How ’bout King Tito? He had thirteen-year-old girls hooking for him on the street. Those guys are dead because I don’t want to make money that way. Emil Zappa, the Mata brothers, they’re dead because they were running this city into the ground.” Unimpressed by Frank White’s deranged sense of vigilantly justice, detective Roy Bishop has a final showdown with the King of New York in a subway car. In the end, it seems that neither crime nor fighting crime, pay.

KING OF NEW YORK

When watching a reckless film like King of New York, as well as pretty much any of Abel Ferrara’s previous films, I see everything I love and hate about an atom-bomb-worthy metropolis like NYC because, while the film features no Jewish/liberal intellectuals, wussy Woody Allen types, hipsters/hippies, political poofs nor frigid feminists, it does feature an apocalyptic multicultural nightmare that is central to the miserable metropolis’ sociopolitical degeneracy. For an alpha-crook like Frank White to think he could bring any solace to the suffering of the populous of the city just goes to show how forsaken the area is and that there is nothing worth saving once a big apple has become rotten. The fact that a bloated barbarian like the Notorious B.I.G used the name “Frank White” as a racially-confused moniker in many of his songs only goes to show the retarded romance with renegade gangsters that have become quite popular in America—the land of the moral-free and socially-depraved. In a film where gangsters discuss drug deals in a children’s hospital that one of them has helped saved from going out of business via drug money and where cops pop more pills than criminals, King of New York is crime film iconoclasm at its finest and least fleeting and a striking example as to why a bunch of towelheads declared jihad against democratic Great Satan and flew planes into the World Trade Center. A gratuitously enthralling and totally unsentimental look at the darker side of the American dream, King of New York is a cultural cringe inspiring piece of unadulterated Americana of the post-Euro-American sort where a race-blind white man leads a colorful collection of Negro Übermensch into destroying every shade of grey, thus making it a virtual celluloid bible for aspiring wiggers/white rappers everywhere, but also a thrilling tragicomedy for cultural nihilists and pessimistic Faustian men.

-Ty E

BAD LIEUTENANT
BAD LIEUTENANT

Abel Ferrara (1992)

Although I seriously doubt it was the director's intention, Bad Lieutenant (1992) directed by McWop pornographer-turned-filmmaker Abel Ferrara (The Driller Killer, King of New York)—for better or worse—has to be one of the most hilarious and degenerate crime dramas ever made as a sort of aesthetically and thematically 'copsploitation' flick of the crude and embarrassingly Catholic sort. Co-penned by tragic model/actress Zoë Tamerlis Lund (Special Effects, Exquisite Corpses) who previously starred in Ferrara's raunchy rape and revenge flick Ms. 45 (1981) aka Angel of Vengeance and who died at the rather premature age of 37 in 1999 after suffering from a heart attack caused by too much cocaine, Bad Lieutenant is a compulsively Catholic-guilt-ridden corrupt cop flick starring tiny yet tough Hebrew Harvey Keitel about a perverted police detective with more than one unhealthy addiction who attempts to seek redemption after two superlatively swarthy untermensch thugs brutally rape a nun, including with a crucifix The Exorcist-style. By no means a 'feel-good' nor uplifting flick, Bad Lieutenant is the kind of cinematic work that real-life nightmares are made as a work written and directed by damned drug addicts of the decidedly dispirited and uniquely unsentimental sort who seem to have more faith in self-destructive nihilism than the Virgin Mary. A work of stylishly sleazy maniac melodrama that works best as a brazen black comedy and was blessed with a NC-17 rating upon its release, Bad Lieutenant features an intemperate and drug-addled cop who masturbates on the street, gambles his money and dignity away, snorts coke and shoots heroin, engages in seedy motel threesomes, and robs robbers and crime scenes, all the while trying to keep up the absurd semblance of being a serious cop and Catholic family man and falling further and further into an existential hell as god's most lonely lunatic lieutenant. Arguably the greatest and certainly one of the most degenerate films directed by Abel Ferrara, Bad Lieutenant is indisputable proof the Italian Renaissance man Pier Paolo Pasolini (Mamma Roma, Salo, or the 120 Days of Sodom), whose life the American auteur is planning to depict in an upcoming biopic, is not the only filmmaker who had a somewhat nasty knack for corrupting Catholic themes in curious celluloid form.

During the beginning of Bad Lieutenant, one might assume that anti-hero 'The Lieutenant' (Harvey Keitel) is just another agitated, overworked, and patently pessimistic cop as he has a reasonably nice suburban home, listens to sportscasters on the radio, and drives his two young sons to Catholic school, but in reality, this completely corrupt officer of the law lives a second life as a seemingly psychopathic criminal whose addiction to sex, drugs, and gambling only grows larger with each passing day and who is undoubtedly on an unholy path to self-destruction and inevitable annihilation. After being assigned to investigate a grizzly double homicide, the Lieutenant chases down a couple drug dealers and meets one of them in a dark alleyway, where he gives the racially dubious pusher a bag of drugs to sell and proceeds to smoke some of the street crack himself. Later that night, the Lieutenant gets drunk and engages in a less than thrilling threesome with two ladies who would probably be described as 'damaged goods' and crusty crack whores. Meanwhile, a redheaded virgin Nun (Frankie Thorn) of the uncommonly voluptuous sort is raped by two ugly mongrel teenagers with a crucifix and the Lieutenant is assigned to the investigation and watches voyeuristically when the defiled holy woman is given a rape test at a hospital following the odious ordeal. In her own deluded mind, the Nun believes that she has been bequeathed with the grace of god and holds no animosity towards the rapists, or so she tells the Lieutenant, who makes it his mission to hunt down and serve justice to the sick defilers. The next day while lounging with his young daughters at home, the Lieutenant learns via TV that he has just lost a ton of cash via a bet regarding a National League Championship Series game between the Mets and the Dodgers he gambled on, but he cannot afford to pay it so it decides to bring the wager up to $30,000 for an upcoming game, which he does not even have enough cash to pay for. While drinking and driving, the Lieutenant learns he lost a second bet and shoots out his car stereo. Assumedly to recoup lost funds, the LT attempts to steal a kilo from a car at a crime scene, but he is so wasted that his motor skills fail him and he accidentally drops the stash in a ditch right in front of his cop coworkers, but manages to weasel his way out of the situation by telling them to collect the drugs as evidence. At the First Communion of one of his children, the Lieutenant doubles the wager to $60,000 because, as he tells his cop friend who acts as a middleman for his bets, the Mets cannot continue to win because apparently no baseball team has ever come back from three straight losses to win a series. On his way home, the Lieutenant pulls over two underage girls without drivers licenses and forces them to show their naughty bits while he jerks off while standing in the middle of the street. Indeed, if anyone is 'ridin' dirty,' it is the Bad Lieutenant.

After losing another gamble, the Lieutenant, who preposterously professes to find a kindred spirit of sorts in Darryl Strawberry and still adamantly believes the Mets cannot win the series, attempts to double his wager again to the hefty sum of $120,000, which his friend advises him against as the bookie will most likely murder him if he fails to pay. While extremely high and drunk, the Lieutenant wanders into a Catholic church, where he finds the Nun rape victim and offers to kill the two sexually pillagers for her, but she continues to proclaim she has forgiven the brown beasts. Not long after, the Lieutenant hallucinates and sees a vision of bloody Jesus Christ at the church and proceeds to throw curse words, including "fuck" and "rat-fuck," at the imaginary son of God, but eventually breaks down, confessing his guilt and proclaims he is too weak to do the right thing and asks for forgiveness. When he goes to kiss Christ's feet, he finally realizes it is just a random old black woman holding a gold chalice who tells the corrupt cop that the two nun rapists, whose names are apparently Julio and Paulo and live right across the street from the church, pawned the holy object at her husband's store. Using the new lead, the Lieutenant manages to track down the two racially indiscernible Hispanic rapists, who live like dirty animals in a pigsty. Instead of booking the rapists at Port Authority or killing them on the site, the Lieutenant offers them the seemingly improbable chance of redemption by giving them $30,000 he earned from selling 'evidence' (aka cocaine) and forcing them to leave on a bus heading out of town, telling them never to come back to New York City. Unfortunately, the bad Lieutenant is not afforded the same opportunity as someone drops by his car and yells "Hey, cop!" and unloads a couple bullets on the corrupt cop, thereupon killing him in the process.

BAD LIEUTENANT

Despite being a totally thrilling work with a number of tragicomic and sometimes cruel twists, Bad Lieutenant fails to be as rewarding as Werner Herzog's non-sequel The Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call - New Orleans (2009), even if Harvey Keitel gave a much superior performance. Not surprisingly, Abel Ferrara was not too happy upon initially hearing about the pseudo-sequel to his iconic cult flick, stating regarding those involved with The Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call - New Orleans, "As far as remakes go ... I wish these people die in Hell. I hope they're all in the same streetcar, and it blows up," which Herzog later richly retorted to with, "I've never seen a film by him [Ferrara]. I have no idea who he is." Additionally, the homoerotic Italian giallo Copkiller (1983) aka Copkiller (l'assassino dei poliziotti) aka Corrupt Lieutenant aka Bad Cop Chronicles #2: Corrupt—a work directed by commie Guido auteur Roberto Faenza also starring Keitel, alongside The Sex Pistols frontman John Lydon in his sole film role, that is a sort of prototype for Bad Lieutenant in its depiction of a degenerate police officer—is, at least in my opinion, a superior work to Abel Ferrara's fucked catholic-splottation cop flick. Of course, all three of these corrupt cop cult flicks make for great celluloid companion pieces to one another, even if Bad Lieutenant is the only one of the films to have the grand distinction of featuring Harvey Keitel totally naked with his kosher chode in full view as the actor suffers a mental meltdown of the embarrassingly (both for the viewer and the actor) humorous variety. Of course, next to the malignant, if not oftentimes accidentally merry, macho melancholy of Bad Lieutenant, The Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call - New Orleans and Copkiller seem too contrived and stylized to dispirit the viewer as much as Ferrara's flick. Like a number of Ferrara's films, Bad Lieutenant is too professionally directed and thematically serious to be a mere exploitation film, yet it is also the sort of work that would prove to be a major discomfort to a good portion of American mainstream filmgoers. Named by fellow wop NYC filmmaker Martin Scorsese (Taxi Driver, Goodfellas) as the fifth best film of the 1990s, Bad Lieutenant acts as a sort of 'spiritual sequel' and more nihilistic update of Who's That Knocking at My Door (1967) in its depiction of an ostensibly Italian-American character played by Harvey Keitel whose anti-sex Catholic guilt makes him react rather ridiculously to the fact a woman is raped. As someone who was not brought up Catholic, it is hard for me to relate to the subversive themes of Bad Lieutenant, but if one thing is for sure, I think the eponymous anti-hero played by Keitel should not have given into Christ's cuckolded word because, after all, any down-and-out druggie can fall for the con of religion. Of course, most people do not watch a film like Bad Lieutenant for its Catholic themes, but to see Harvey Keitel cry and yell like an infant on meth while buck naked and yelling stuff at the crucified Christ like, "Mutt! You got something that you want to say to me? You fuck! You ratfuck, you ratfuck! Here's your... What? Say something, I know you're just standing there. What am I gonna do? You gotta say something! Something! You fuck, you fucking stand there and you want me to do every fucking thing! Where were you? Where the fuck were you? Where were you? Where the hell were you?" Of course, Christ was nowhere to be found when little Harvey got blown away by a bunch of bullets, but that is the small price one pays for faith, or at least in the wanton and wicked wack-job world of Abel Ferrara's Bad Lieutenant, a sort of anti-Christ's take on American proletarian Catholicism.

-Ty E

ADDICTION
ADDICTION

Abel Ferrara (1995) Another day, another Brain Damage film. This time, Not only was I surprised to find a film that doesn't suck all the way, but I was also alerted when a faint trace of effort lingered from the final cut of this film. While I'm on the topic concerning cuts and edits of a certain film, This is another in the long line of films that brandishes a bloody logo reading "UNRATED" in an attempt to draw up controversy or to spark an illusion for something that simply isn't there. Addiction isn't bloody in the slightest. There is more blood in the ever popular Halo franchise than there is in the entirety of this film. An abnormally normal office worker stabs a filthy homeless negro and becomes obsessed with the rush of killing and stabbing. Taking cues from the ending of Nekromantik, films these days always try to elaborate some deep psycho-fetish for death, but never pay up its inspirations. Largely a character portrait, I didn't appreciate how this film was a direct copy/paste from Mamet's Edmond (stage play). Similarities: Both involve a normal man with a normal marriage Both get fed up and somehow get separated Both acquire a knife and begin stabbing people using rage Both kill negroes who try and rob them Both have a psychosis effect Both have a huge falling out Both get disheveled and pick up prostitutes in an effort to smooth out. Regardless of James Tucker's original intentions, his subconscious played a huge role on the film by making the majority of his killings racially charged. First he kills a rough Dave Chappelle looking man who attempts to rob him. The tables are turned when Whitey returns the blow and leaves the black man whimpering in a corner. Then he encounters a vagabond who wants to die. Our anti-hero acquiesce half-heartedly to a homeless man's request. All around the world, fans of the Cosby Show cried. Brain Damage Films has released a decent film which is ripe with unfinished side stories and rips off an amazing stage play which was transformed into a film in 2005 starring William H. Macy. That comes highly recommended, more so than this low budget soap opera. While being an "alright" film, It doesn't meet hardly any requirements to make it a must see. Barely being worthy of a rental, it sure was nice to see some acting that wasn't too horrible.

-mAQ

THE ADDICTION

Abel Ferrara (1995)

With his undoubtedly most idiosyncratic and inaccessible celluloid work The Addiction (1995), NYC Catholic nihilist auteur Abel Ferrara (9 Lives of a Wet Pussy, King of New York) managed to homogenize Gothic Grit with wayward wit in an innately anomalous vampire flick that has the ability to scare viewers away from doing drugs and studying philosophy. The virtual sister film to Ferrara's The Funeral (1996) in that both films were apparently inspired by the tragic death of screenwriter Nicholas St. John's son, The Addiction is a decidedly dreary and maliciously melancholy work that mischievously mediates on sex, death, drugs, and religion to the point of inspiring abject disgust and misanthropy in the viewer. An aberrant arthouse bloodsucker flick shot in suavely stylized black-and-white, The Addiction is much like the David Lynch produced work Nadja (1994) directed by Michael Almereyda in its total deconstruction of the vampire subgenre, except with a vulgar and seemingly oxymoronic rap soundtrack (which was probably inspired by the fact that Russell Simmons of all people executive produced the film) as opposed to soothing shoegaze and all the more philosophically penetrating, like a dispiriting stake in the heart of Occidental philosophy. Starring the ever so homely and unappealing Lili Taylor (Arizona Dream, Pecker)—an actress who is only second to Sandra Bernhard in terms of being an anti-diva who literally brings physical disgust to my stomach any time I see her—The Addiction follows an ugly graduate philosophy student who does ugly things after being bitten by a beautiful babe of the unhinged and undead sort. Addicted to blood and books, as well as searching for the meaning of life, death, and the reason for man's eternal violence against his fellow man, the physically and mentally perturbed plasma-addict vampire of The Addiction goes through an odyssey of the body and soul that cannot simply be learned by spending one's free time reading in an academic library. Featuring quotes and references to Friedrich Nietzsche, Søren Kierkegaard, Jean-Paul Sartre, Edmund Husserl, Martin Heidegger, Ludwig Feuerbach, Descartes, Dante, Charles Baudelaire, and William S. Burroughs, as well as stock footage from the atrocities of Auschwitz concentration camp and the My Lai Massacre, The Addiction is a mystifying and misery-inspiring piece of allegorical celluloid metaphysics that reminds one that, to quote Christopher Walken's character's seemingly contrived but charming reference of Nietzsche, "Mankind is driven to exist beyond good and evil...From the beginning." While I never saw Abel Ferrara as a man interested in German philosophy and arthouse vampire flicks, The Addiction is filled with enough drug-addled derangement, cultural pessimism, and an unromantic view of NYC to remind viewers who directed it, even if the philosophical meat of the film was clearly a result of screenwriter Nicholas St. John's uncompromising contribution to this seedy exercise in post-Victorian bloodlust.

THE ADDICTION

Kathleen Conklin (Lili Taylor) is a promising yet hopelessly naive graduate student at the philosophy department of New York University, but she has a hard time understanding why a bunch of American soldiers wasted a bunch of gooks at Vietnam and an even harder time fathoming why only one fellow was brought to justice for his infamous war crimes. It is only when she is passively bitten by a voluptuous vamp named Casanova (Annabella Sciorra) during a nefarious NYC night that Kathleen begins to understand the meaning of a life of lechery and bloodlust, later learning from an elder vampire played by Christopher Walken, that "The entire world's a graveyard, and we, the birds of prey picking at the bones. That's all we are. We're the ones who let the dying know the hour has come." While Casanova even tells Kathleen to "order me to go away" before she sinks her teeth into her neck, the grad student is far too pathetically lifeless and intellectually pedantic to merely verbally defend herself, even at the request of her victimizer (who calls her a "collaborator" due to her pathetic passivity in an unholy crime against her soul), thus her transformation into a bloodlusting vampire is just what she needed, at least when it comes to being a cannibal as opposed to mincemeat in the rotten Big Apple. Unfortunately, being addicted to human hemoglobin, Kathleen must satisfy her cravings by abandoning empathy and stoically taking victims, including her best friend Jean (Edie Falco), pompous philosophy professor and a Negro gangster named "Black" (played by rapper Fredro Starr) who rather vulgarly offers her a bit of "jungle fever," who provides her with some tasty dark meat. When a pretentious anthropology student quotes Protagoras' famous and once-infamous proto-humanist "man is the measure of all things," Kathleen teaches the sucker of a idealistic college student man's true worth by draining her of her sacred sanguine fluid. When the anthropology student freaks out over the fact a piece of flesh has been ripped out of her neck, Kathleen snidely remarks, "It was your decision. Your friend Feuerbach wrote that all men counting stars are equivalent in every way to God. My indifference is not the concern here. It's your astonishment that needs studying," thus displaying her new and improved intellectual insights as a postmodern active-nihilist philosopher with a master morality as opposed to a slave morality (like she once had before as a feeble human). Of course, being a fiending blood addict, Kathleen suffers major withdrawals when not getting enough of the biological fluids she needs and an older and wiser Nietzschean vampire named Peina (Christopher Walken) recommends that she read trust-fund junky William S. Burroughs' Naked Lunch (1959) to help her cope with addiction. A recovering vampire addict who only need to take a 'maintenance dose' of blood to survive, Peina is proud to admit to Kathleen that he is a rare bloodsucker that defecates and that he lives a rather 'human existence' and that she has all of her immortal lifetime to master her diseased soul. A studious sadist of the vampiric sort, Kathleen graduates and has a party to celebrate and admits to her professor and colleges, "I'd like to share a little bit of what I've learned," thereupon ushering in an ominous yet orgasmic bloodsucker orgy with her vampire compatriots (including Casanova and her many victims, who are now vampires as well). Being a bloodthirsty broad who must spread moral decay and a daunting degenerative disease of the immortal sort to survive, Kathleen inevitably comes to the conclusion that suicide is the only answer, but her maker, Casanova—an unlikely fan of Calvinist theologian/philosopher R. C. Sproul—is not going to let her philosophical progeny make the mistake of an endless lifetime. In the end, Kathleen sheds her human mortality, which is really a small price to pay to be perennially undead in at a time when god is dead.

A rare vampire flick lacking in romance (as well as a romantic subplot), aristocratic elegance, and an easy-to-read black-and-white moral compass, The Addiction is more focused on the need to live an egoless, colorless, and nondualist life as depicted through the torturous trials and tribulations of a vamp that is initially too interested in social prestige and hemoglobin to see the bigger picture, but finally comes around when her overwhelming bloodlust almost destroys her. Indeed, it is no surprise that the film concludes with Kathleen walking by her own tombstone, which has the inscription John 11:25 as one witnesses the vampiress' death, burial, resurrection, and post-resurrection. Of course, with its quoting of everyone from Nietzsche to a Calvinist kook, one would be quite wrong to describe The Addiction as a 'Christian' film, but more like a work of Perennialism as promoted by Aldous Huxley due to its portrayal of all religions sharing a singular truth, thus ultimately making the film a strangely spiritual work with a positive message, which is rather ironic for a work featuring vulgar academic-eating vampire orgies, historical snuff footage, cliché Nietzschean ramblings, and a rather retarded rap soundtrack. For a film featuring a curious character whose aberrant actions are more disturbing than real-life footage of genocide and war, The Addiction must be doing something right as an unwonted bloodsucker and soul-sucking flick that trades in supernatural superstition and folklore for perennial philosophy and gritty street realism of the quasi-apocalyptic. In comparison to similarly themed works like Jeffrey Arsenault's Night Owl (1993) and Larry Fessenden's The Habit (1995), The Addiction is certainly the king of American metropolitan metaphysical vampire flicks. With a short but brilliantly bittersweet performance from Christopher Walken that is almost in league with German actor Max Schreck in Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror (1922) directed by F.W. Murnau in terms of vampiric authenticity, as well as shadowy and phantasmagorical imagery in the spirit of the German expressionist movement except contained with a largely "black" and negrophilic world, The Addiction is a rare postmodern 'horror' flick that does not inspire me to barf, even though it features a ghastly ghoul of a gal like Lili Taylor in the leading role, which is typically a cruel curse for any celluloid work. One of the few American films ever made—be it from the horror genre or otherwise—with some intellectual meat to it, which makes it all the more diacritic and inaccessible since it is a quasi-horror flick of sorts, The Addiction is undoubtedly habit-forming, although Lili Taylor and Feuerbach certainly leave a bad taste in one's mouth.

THE ADDICTION

-Ty E

THE FUNERAL

Abel Ferrara (1996)

Although I rather enjoy mafia films, I have always been bothered by the lack of thematic diversity in the genre. Sure, most wop and Judaic mafia men are barbaric psychopaths that will kill just about anyone to make an extra buck, yet one would think that there would be more diversity of dago characters in such colorful and moral-free cinematic works. Admittedly, I loved the HBO series The Sopranos due to its more intimate and family oriented look at New Jersey's finest goombah thugs, but, unfortunately, the show was canceled years ago. A couple days ago, I finally got around to seeing Abel Ferrara's The Funeral (1996) – an excellent mafia flick that is like no other – breaking all the conventions and stereotypes so closely associated with the extremely formulaic genre. What better auteur than Abel Ferrara to direct one of the grittiest and darkest mafia films ever made? In The Funeral, Ferrara does for the mafia what he did for corrupt cops in Bad Lieutenant (1992). Proving his undeniable integrity as a serious filmmaker; Ferrara refrained from glorifying and romanticizing the organized crime life, and instead deconstructs the genre; portraying the mafia brothers during their weakest and most pathetic moments. Like many characters featured in works directed by Abel Ferrara, the GINZO Bros. featured in The Funeral are plagued with Catholic guilt. Throughout The Funeral, the anti-hero mafia brothers are shown at their most vulnerable times of guilt and impotent moments of self doubt, but also during moment of domineering brutality. The three “Tempio” mafia brothers are as follows: Eldest brother Raimundo aka “Ray” (played by Christopher Walken), middle brother Cesarino aka “Chez” (played by Chris Penn), and baby brother Giovanni aka Johnny (played by Vincent Gallo). After brother Johnny dies, the two remaining brothers look towards redemption whilst recollecting over their brutal and blatantly blasphemous lives. At one point, Ray even acknowledges that he is destined for hell. At the most fundamental level, The Funeral boldly asks hard questions regarding immorality that most previous mafia films refused to even acknowledge.

Despite being blood brothers, the three Tempio boys are quite contrary in character, consequently resulting in constant family feuds among the brothers. Alpha-Mafioso Ray - who is the strongest and most intelligent of the brothers – clearly runs and holds the crime family together. Overweight Chez is a loose cannon of sorts and is easily the most deranged of the brothers, which is no surprise as the middle child usually tends to be the craziest. Due to his explicitly erratic performance as Chez in The Funeral, Chris Penn deservedly won Best Supporting Actor at the 2006 Venice Film Festival. However, the strangest and most individualistically peculiar of the brothers is Johnny – a communist whose political idealism is glaringly detrimental to the family business. As indicated in the title of the film, The Funeral begins with the funeral of recently murdered Johnny, thereupon the rest of the film unravels the mystery behind his dubious death. I must admit that seeing Vincent Gallo (who is one of my favorite actors) laying in a coffin was something I found to be unintentionally humorous. Proving their true brotherly loyalty to Johnny; Ray and Chez proceed (albeit in totally different ways) to avenge their little brother's untimely death. After the introductory funeral scene, The Funeral cuts back to the past, unfolding what led to Johnny's death in the first place. It becomes clear that Johnny was bound to end up six foot under (as his brother Ray acknowledges to him as he lays dead in the coffin) – as he gave his brothers much grief due to his unruly behavior, on top of making numerous enemies due to his narcissistic and idealistic demeanor. Of course, the film eventually zooms back to the present, as Ray finds out who murdered his baby brother. At the tragic conclusion of The Funeral, all three brothers are finally vindicated of their family demons.

THE FUNERAL

The Funeral is the ultimate anti-mafia film, as it creatively breaks every convention of the genre, thus reinventing the entire genre in the process. In fact, I would go as far as saying that The Funeral is "The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance (1962) of mafia films" – as both films are quite anarchistic in their defiance against the conventions of their respective genres. Personally, I have always wondered about the guilt and psychological insanity one must suffer as a mass-murdering career criminal, yet very few mafia films even begin to portray such serious, yet ultimately anti-romantic scenarios. Although the three brothers featured in The Funeral are exposed in the most unflattering of lights; the film also gives these characters a certain humanity that is often times lacking in the genre. The almost mystical stoicism that is so typical of characters in mafia films is destroyed in the best sense in The Funeral; a wonderful greaseball tragedy about a family that is genetically cursed. In fact, the source of the family curse is exposed in the film during a very stark and telling scene that signifies the loss of innocence among the three brothers. In this key scene, a flashback shows the three brothers as children under the corrupt guidance of their mafia thug father; a psychopathic delinquent who forces young Ray to shoot and kill a helpless man that is tied to a chair. After that life changing dark day (both figuratively and metaphorically), the three brothers have continuously suffered from the crimes of their father, thus inheriting his sins and maintaining his severely tainted legacy of criminality. All three men have their own way of coping with their hidden suffering: Johnny becomes a true believer in the Marxist internationalist working-class utopia dream, Chez is less stable in his suffering; outlandishly abusing women (accusing them of "selling their souls") in a feeble attempt to expel his inter self-hatred, and Roy stoically hides his suffering, until he confronts the young man that killed his younger brother. By the end of The Funeral, all three brothers meet their peace, henceforth leaving their already broken female companions to carry the burden, but isn't that what families are for?

-Ty E

PASOLINI
PASOLINI

Abel Ferrara (2014)

Aside from finding their political beliefs to be autistically naïve, unwaveringly faith-based, or just plain disingenuous, I tend to have a natural instinct towards hating communist artists and commie-created art, yet I have always regarded gay Guido Marxist Renaissance man Pier Paolo Pasolini (The Gospel According to Matthew, The Decameron) as one of my favorite artists and see him as the sort of Jean Cocteau of his nation and zeitgeist, but of course he was no ordinary pinko poof as a man who had a deep respect for his cultural and spiritual heritage as reflected in quotes like, “If you know that I am an unbeliever, then you know me better than I do myself. I may be an unbeliever, but I am an unbeliever who has a nostalgia for a belief.” Of course, Pasolini’s rather idiosyncratic brand of filmmaking, not unlike that of many popular Mao-fetishizing Italian and French arthouse filmmakers of the late-1960s and 1970s like Godard and Bertolucci, was hardly in tune with the banal commie art movements of real so-called socialist ‘utopias’ like Soviet Social Realism or the East German DEFA films, but like many great artists, the Italian filmmaker was a man of great contradictions as one certainly realizes while watching American McGuido auteur Abel Ferrara’s long in the making and eagerly awaited quasi-biopic Pasolini (2014) starring Willem Dafoe as the eponymous lead. Set mostly during the last day of Pasolini’s life on 2 November 1975 when he was murdered and run over with his own car under dubious circumstances by a 17-year-old hustler named Pino Pelosi (who in 2005 retracted his murder confession) on the beach of Ostia on the outskirts of Rome, Ferrara’s work is not the first film depicting the tragic and mystifying, if not strangely fitting, death of the ill-fated filmmaker, but it is certainly the most aesthetically and thematically ambitious, structurally intricate, perversely poetic, strangely respectful, and relatively adequately budgeted. Excluding documentaries, the first film about the death of Pasolini was the reasonably worthwhile yet glaringly amateurish homo-heavy British student short Ostia (1991) directed by Julian Cole (who later went on to direct the doc With Gilbert & George (2008) about the eponymous degenerate queer ‘living statues’) and starring English auteur filmmaker Derek Jarman as the lead in a role where one great filmmaker ultimately pays tribute to another filmmaker who is ultimately depicted as being barbarically assassinated by homme fatale Pelosi and some older bat-wielding and fag-bashing ‘breeder’ thugs. The second film about the poet’s grisly demise is the made-for-TV French-Italian crime-drama-thriller Who Killed Pasolini? (1995) aka Pasolini, un delitto italiano aka Pasolini, an Italian Crime directed by Marco Tullio Giordana, which is based on Enzo Siciliano’s celebrated biography and apparently inspired the reopening of the murder case in light of the new evidence it revealed. A sort of meta-biopic featuring both a film-within-a-film and novel-within-a-film, Pasolini is certainly ambitious in that it adapts excerpts from the filmmaker's final two unrealized works that include his unfinished posthumously released novel Petrolio and film Porno-Teo-Kolossal (1976), which was a quasi-sequel to Uccellacci e uccellini (1966) aka The Hawks and the Sparrows starring veteran actor, writer, and director Edoardo De Filippo and the director's one-time boy toy Ninetto Davoli that never reached past pre-production. While Ferrara is probably my favorite crackhead and an artist I have always liked, I do not think he has ever directed anything approximating a true cinematic masterpiece, at least by art fag standards, and the same can be certainly said of his Pasolini biopic, but as a cinephile and diehard fan of the cocksucking commie artistic genius I could not help but love the film, which was clearly directed by a mensch who deeply respects his subject. As a man who once described Pasolini as the filmmaker who was most influential to him, "because he filmed his visions and did it without qualifications," it should be no surprise that Ferrara was somewhat hesitant about even directing the virtually lifelong dream project, even once confessing to fellow NYC-based filmmaker Julian Schnabel in an interview featured in Interview magazine, "Sometimes I think, why am I doing this? Here's this guy who's dead, didn't know me, never met me – where do I come off robbing this guy's grave? I mean would you want someone making movies of your life?" Of course, considering the superlatively sleazy subject matter and the strong Roman Catholic roots of both the legendary Italian poet and the American auteur, there probably was no better suited person to direct Pasolini than Mr. Ferrara.

Featuring Willem Dafoe in an undeniably iconic role that Ferrara apparently originally planned to cast model-turned-actress Zoë Lund for (as revealed in Brad Stevens' book Abel Ferrara: The Moral Vision (2004), Lund apparently felt a close connection to Pasolini because her ex-lover Edouard DeLaurot was supposed to meet with the filmmaker the night he was killed), Pasolini is like a cinophile's wet dream that unfortunately climaxes too early (the film is only about 80 minutes but could have easily been twice as long). To prepare himself both spiritually and culturally for the film, Ferrara frequently visited Italy over the past decade or so and even shot a couple movies there, including Mary (2005), which was partly filmed in Rome, and the gritty documentary Napoli, Napoli, Napoli (2009). I think Ferrara's time in Italy, especially Rome, paid off as Pasolini does not feel like a contrived Hollywood-esque outsider's view of the city that you would typically expect from an American filmmaker, but instead a work that acts as a sort of aesthetic antidote to the pseudo-chic pageantry-plagued goombah buffoonery of Paolo Sorrentino's obscenely overrated work The Great Beauty (2013) aka La grande bellezz, which is more or less La Dolce Vita 2.0 with none of the organic beauty, character, or substance of the classic Fellini flick. Notably, the writer, cinematographer, and editor of the work were all indigenous dagos, thus also adding to the film's authenticity. Although seemingly 'softcore' for a Ferrara flick in some regards (though it does feature a somewhat rough blowjob scene, as well as a Bacchanalian orgy), Pasolini was unequivocally made with buckets of blood, sweat, and tears and is a work that, despite its various flaws, is surely one of the greatest and most sensitive tributes from one filmmaker to another. Directed by a half-breed Amero-wop that ultimately managed to create a direct celluloid link to the old world of his paternal ancestors, Ferrara's filmic micro-odyssey is also a testament to the fact that blood trumps everything else, though one must also not discount the guilt-tripping power of Guido's style Roman Catholicism. After all, Ferrara's previous effort Welcome to New York (2014) failed because he attempted to interpret the carnal crimes of a powerful kosher creep with a Catholic lens. In Pasolini, Catholicism is just as important to the film as it was to the works of the titular 'nostalgic atheist' filmmaker.

PASOLINI

One thing that might seem odd to viewers watching Pasolini is that the film sometimes has a 'fascistic' aesthetic tone about it due to its almost Riefenstahl-esque shots of neo-classical sculptures and architecture, but it is certainly something the Italian poet turned filmmaker experienced every day as a Marxist that strangely opted to live in such an aesthetic environment. Indeed, somewhat curiously, Pasolini lived right next to the EUR, which is a district in Rome featuring fascist architecture that was planned by Benito Mussolini in celebration of twenty years of fascism (the 1942 world's fair was supposed to be held there but World War II put an end to that). Also not mentioned in the film is the fact that P.P.P.'s army lieutenant father Carlo Alberto Pasolini became famous for saving Mussolini's life after a 15-year-old anarchist named Anteo Zamboni attempted to assassinate him in 1926. Of course, fascism is constantly in the air in Ferrara's Pasolini, which depicts the protagonist as having a perpetual forlorn feeling regarding his own demise, with both fascist and commie terrorism haunting him wherever he goes, be it while reading a newspaper on his couch or while talking to one of his friends at his favorite restaurant. While being interviewed by an obnoxiously arrogant French journalist at the beginning of the film, Pasolini stoically declares, "I think to scandalize is a right...to be scandalized is a pleasure, and those who refuse to be scandalized are moralists. The so called moralists." Somewhat inexplicably, the French journalist attends a dubbing of Pasolini's latest and most controversial work Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), yet he has the gall to accuse the auteur of being soft and no longer politically transgressive. Not only does Pasolini confirm that people still attack and insult him for his politics, but that he also thrives on such attacks, thus reflecting his undeniable sadomasochistic essence (notably, Genoese writer/poet Edoardo Sanguineti once described Pasolini's death as "delegated suicide" and even the filmmaker's own fellow gay poet cousin Nico Naldini said something along the same lines). In a letter to a friend, Pasolini states regarding the novel he is working on that it "...is of no use to my life anymore...it is not a proclamation. It is the preamble to a testament...the testimony of that little bit of knowledge that a man has gathered, a totally different knowledge from what he had expected it to be or wondered.” In the novel, the glaringly sexually depraved protagonist Carlo (Roberto Zibetti) smiles with a sort of wickedly debauched masochistic glee after being violently fucked in the mouth by a degenerate longhaired leather-clad hustler. Quite notably, when the hustler whips his cock out, unsavory sod Carlo stares at it with a huge maniacal smile and says “love,” thus reflecting Pasolini’s own warped sense of sexuality. Indeed, anyone who thinks sucking the very potentially STD-ridden cocks of random hustler criminals that routinely debase themselves with strangers for money is a form of “love” has a seriously unhinged view of romance and human emotions. Ultimately, this seemingly random excerpt from the novel will ultimately foreshadow Pasolini’s own death on the beaches of Ostia at the hands of a leather-clad hustler and his equally pernicious homo-hating comrades.

Like many gay men, Pasolini is depicted as a mama’s boy and despite being a middle-aged man, he lives with his overindulgent mother Susanna (Adriana Asti), who wakes him up in the morning as if he is still an adolescent schoolboy who still needs help living his day-to-day life. Of course, being a handsome, charming, kind and highly intelligent queer, Pasolini also has diva-like muses as is especially epitomized by the rather raunchy goombah blonde Laura Betti (Maria De Medeiros), who pays a visit to the filmmaker’s apartment and humorously states regarding her experience working on Miklós Jancsó’s Yugoslav production Private Vices, Public Pleasures (1976) aka Vizi privati, pubbliche virtù, “Ah socialist actresses, such a wonder, eh...I adore them, they’re real professionals! They put this hemorrhoid cream on their pussies to hide the wrinkles.” Unquestionably, the most sensitive and introverted woman in Pasolini’s life is his housekeeper/secretary cousin Graziella Chiarocci (fittingly played by Dafoe’s Italian wife Giada Colagrande), who is more or less like the protagonist’s female alter-ego. Indeed, despite being responsible for carrying out meager jobs for her cousin like pouring him cups of coffee and whatnot, Graziella is a woman whose intellect Pasolini clearly respects as demonstrated by the fact that he recommends that she borrow his copy of far-left anti-mafia novelist Leonardo Sciascia’s latest work. Graziella is also responsible for managing Pasolini’s personal and professional relationships as indicated by the fact that she informs him that Jewish anti-fascist painter Carlo Levi called to say hi (notably, Levi was already dead at the time). If Pasolini was not a poof, Graziella would almost certainly be his wife.

One of the things I appreciated most about Ferrara’s film is that it exposes Pasolini’s vulnerability and seemingly masked melancholia, which was hidden by an oftentimes glacial borderline scowl. Unquestionably one of the most penetratingly somber and dejecting scenes in the entire film is when Pasolini holds the newborn baby of his ‘great love’ Ninetto Davoli (portrayed by Riccardo Scamarcio in a ridiculously moody and broody hipster-esque fashion in what is indubitably an annoyingly miscast role), who is now living the life of a bourgeois heterosexual father. While Pasolini and the baby are smiling during the scene, it is apparent that the protagonist is just smiling to disguise his perennial sadness as he probably realizes that he will never know the joys and happiness of being a father and that his great love has moved on to live the sort of life that he is innately incapable of living. Of course, it should be no surprise that Pasolini cruises around Rome's red light district right after his meeting with Ninetto and his family. It is a well known fact that Pasolini had a pathological predilection for criminally-inclined teenage proletarian boys who were mostly heterosexual and, unlike the protagonist, would go on to get married and have children after growing out of their poverty-induced 'hustler' stage. In that sense, it is as if Pasolini never matured beyond his teenage years, at least as far as his romantic life was concerned. This becomes especially clear in a brief yet strangely charming scene where Pasolini plays soccer with a bunch of teenage boys as if he is just one of the gang and not some middle-aged Marxist intellectual that still lives with his mother. Another scene I found to be particularly awkward and dejecting is when Pasolini is eating with his murderer, teenage hustler Pino Pelosi (Damiano Tamilia), and he asks the boy about his girlfriend as if jealous of the girl yet at the same time completely ignoring the fact that he plans to fuck the lad later that night. Ultimately, Pasolini is murdered by Pelosi with the help of three comrades who randomly show up on the beach in Ostia while the protagonist is caressing the two-faced hustler. After getting his cock and balls stomped in by one of the brutes (who screams, "Imma gonna break your dick" at his victim in between incessantly calling him a "faggot") and taking a deleterious blow to the face with a piece of wood by Pelosi, Pasolini is finished off when his 'date' runs him over with his own car. Naturally, Pasolini's beloved mother is completely hysterical when she hears the news.

PASOLINI

Using the filmmaker's unrealized final film Porno-Teo-Kolossal as a template, Pasolini intriguingly attempts to depict the Italian Renaissance man's sense of spirituality and post-Catholic interpretation of the afterlife. In an unintentionally absurd scenario featuring the real Ninetto Davoli portraying a goofy elderly Guido prole named Epifanio who believes the messiah has come and has left his morbidly obese bitch of a wife to take a pilgrimage to a sexually sacred city with the poorly played fictional young Ninetto portrayed by Riccardo Scamacio, Pasolini's idea of a utopia is depicted in the form of an all-gay Dionysian micro-metropolis called Sodomia where "gays make out with gays and lesbians make out with lesbians, all year long," except during the annual fertility festival where the fags and dykes have sex with one another for reproductive purposes to preserve the human race. During the festival, handsome yet hysterical homos stand on one side and shout, "Cunt, cunt, fuck you!" while busty yet bitchy bean-flickers stand on the other side and shout back "Dick, dick, fuck you!" as both rival groups watch their respective comrades perform ceremonial heterosexual coitus. Ultimately, Ninetto and pseudo-Ninetto, who is actually an angel, attempt to reach heaven but never get there because, as the latter states, “There’s no such thing as an end.” Indeed, one gets the sense while watching Pasolini that the filmmaker’s greatest fear was death and the nothingness upon nothingness that accompanies it as reflected in a scene where old man Ninetto stares down at earth while standing on a literal endless stairway-to-heaven and finally realizes the intrinsic value of the irreplaceable mortal human life he so eagerly and foolishly left behind.

While by no means an immaculate masterpiece, Pasolini certainly features Abel Ferrara at his peak in maturity as both a filmmaker and an individual. Considering the rampantly heterosexual nature of virtually all his previous cinematic works, it seems almost inconceivable that Ferrara would be able to put himself in the surely strange-fitting shoes of an eccentric gay middle-aged Marxist momma’s boy that just happened to be one of the finest and most uncompromising Italian artists of his zeitgeist. Certainly, Pasolini is also Ferrara’s most ‘cryptic’ and subtextual work to date as it seems almost impossible to truly appreciate the film without at least having a general understanding of the eponymous subject and his work. I also must admit that I respect Ferrara for not attempting to ape the Italian filmmaker by making an overtly ‘Pasolinian’ work. Indeed, in its subtle implementation of heroic fascist imagery and fairly visceral as opposed to hyper-intellectual execution, Pasolini features an aesthetically subversive approach to its subject that few, if any, other filmmakers would have the testicular fortitude to try to pull off. Not unlike Frank White in King of New York (1990), the titular corrupt cop of Bad Lieutenant (1992), or even the crazed killer ‘Reno Miller’ played by Ferrara himself in The Driller Killer (1979), P.P.P. is ultimately portrayed in Ferrara’s biopic as a sort of tragic and self-destructive antihero whose subversive behavior and charismatic persona is only transcended by his perennial sense of loneliness and metaphysical detachment from the world. Indeed, while Pasolini surely hated the fascist era, he certainly found the 1970s to be even worse as revealed in outlandish statements he made like, “I consider consumerism to be a worse form of fascism than the classic variety” (unfortunately, it seems that, like many commies, Pasolini would oftentimes label things he didn’t like as being ‘fascist’). Personally, I see it as only fitting that Bronx-bred filmmaker Abel Ferrara—a true American proletarian filmmaker if there ever was one as less than eloquently expressed in candid personal remarks like, “I grew up in a very idyllic, beautiful neighborhood full of Mafiosi, and was raised to be a nasty motherfucker. Everyone’s your enemy, it’s a siege mentality. Fuck everybody. If you gotta kill them, great. Kill them before they come back and kill you. That kind of idiocy. So I’m sure it’s reflected in my work”—would ultimately be the person to direct the most lavish and important film about a man that had a lifelong obsession with the (sub)lumpenproletariat and who, unlike most card-carrying commies, actually helped members of peasantry as indicated by his jumpstarting of the careers of Ninetto Davoli and the Citti brothers (notably, Sergio Citti, who once stated, “If I hadn’t met Pier Paolo I’d have probably ended up as a delinquent,” was the one and only true disciple of the Pasolinian style of filmmaker). Of course, while it might be in poor taste to admit, it is also only fitting that Pasolini died at the hands of one of his teenage twink fuckboys, for there could be no sweeter or more symbolic death for a man who had a nihilistic self-destructive lust for discernibly dangerous sub-literate juvenile delinquents who ironically gave him the feeling of being fearless and invincible. Indeed, if there is anything to be learned from watching Pasolini, it is that the truth behind the Italian filmmaker’s death does not really matter as he probably would have inevitably died some other way around the same time, as no one that could direct a film such as Salò could have been in a healthy state of mind, which is something that Ferrara—a man with his own fair share of personal demons who started his filmmaking career directing a porn flick where he actually paid some guy to fuck his then-girlfriend—surely recognized..

PASOLINI

-Ty E

WELCOME TO NEW YORK

Abel Ferrara (2014)

Very rarely does one see movies, especially Hollywood movies, made about high-profile Hebraic criminals. Of course, when such films actually do get made, like Martin Scorsese's The Wolf of Wall Street (2013), which depicts the hedonistic Quaalude-addled times of psychopathic stockbroker Jordan Belfort in a 'fun' and 'cool' way, the kosher conman is portrayed in an absurdly favorable light, as if the chosen amongst God's chosen are held to a different standard when they commit crimes. Like The Wolf of Wall Street, Abel Ferrara's latest feature Welcome to New York (2014) depicts the lies and crimes of a Jewish criminal, but luckily this film makes no pathetic pandering attempts to bend over for world Zion. Indeed, based on the 2011 arrest of former IMF chief and French presidential contender Dominique Strauss-Kahn—a pseudo-Frenchman of Alsatian Jewish and Sephardic Jewish extraction who is not surprisingly a member of the French Socialist Party (PS)—for sexual assault and attempted rape, Welcome to New York has already been condemned as being supposedly "anti-Semitic" and faces a dubious future in terms of an American theatrical release. Indeed, Strauss-Kahn's ex-wife Anne Sinclair—a big financial supporter of Israel who comes from a family of wealthy Jewish art dealers based in Paris and New York City (she is the maternal granddaughter of Paul Rosenberg, who represented Pablo Picasso, and made a ton of money during the Second World War)—complained in an editorial that Ferrara's film is an "anti-Semitic" work where the "filmmakers project their fantasies about money and Jews." Although he has never seen the film and claims he never plans to, Strauss-Kahn recently had his lawyer Jean Veil reveal on France's Europe 1 Radio that he is getting ready to sue the makers of Welcome to New York for supposed "defamation owing to the accusations of rape and insinuations which run throughout the film." After watching Ferrara's Strauss-Kahn flick, I have to say it is, rather unfortunately, not at all anti-Semitic, unless one is deranged enough to believe that portraying a man of Jewish blood who is convicted of attempted rape in a negative light is anti-Semitic. Indeed, like most of Ferrara's work, Welcome to New York deals with the very Catholic theme of redemption, but as the film reveals, there is no redemption for an over-privileged and obscenely arrogant sex addict with seemingly infinite power who can afford to do whatever the hell he wants, or so he thinks until he attempts to molest the wrong poor negress maid. A work where Ferrara goes back to his unflattering roots, Welcome to New York is easily the director's most sexually explicit work since his debut porn flick 9 Lives of a Wet Pussy (1976). Rather unfortunately, the film is not the comeback masterpiece that the director probably hoped it would be, even if it is infinitely more interesting than Ferrara's previous pseudo-apocalyptic abortion 4:44 - Last Day on Earth (2011). More than anything, Welcome to New York is an unintentionally humorous frog sideshow act set in modern-day Sodom where a morbidly obese Gérard Depardieu grunts, humps, and flaunts his shriveled penis and bulging gut off in a rather foul fashion that is more likely to humor the viewer than make them deeply consider the moral failings of a powerful Franco-kosher sex addict. Indeed, a largely improvised work, or as Ferrara revealed in an interview with the Hollywood Reporter: “Every performance is an improvisation. The writing of a script is an improvisation. We wrote the script and we worked on the scenes. Chris Zois, the writer, was on the set. He was there with the actors. OK for some of the actors, Baby Jackie [Jacqueline Bisset], the lines were important. For Gerard, the lines weren’t important. For me, I don’t want to hear the fucking script, especially if I worked on it,” Welcome to New York is a decidedly degenerate little mess of a strangely merry yet misanthropy-inspiring movie where Depardieu proves that, despite his rather odious obesity, he can still act with a singular sort of anarchic tenacity that reminds the viewer why the French have historically romanticized criminals and egomaniacal sexual deviants.

WELCOME TO NEW YORK

As Gérard Depardieu tells some journalists at the beginning of Welcome to New York as to why he chose to portray Dominique Strauss-Kahn (under the pseudonym ‘John Devereaux’): “Because I don’t like him [...] I don’t trust politics. I’m an individualist...I’m an anarchist. I don’t like people that mix politics...I hate them.” Indeed, debauched IMF chief Devereaux hopes to be the next president of France and his power-hungry Zionist supremacist wife Simone (Jacqueline Bisset) is determined to make sure he achieves that goal. Unfortunately for him and his much suffering family, Devereaux is a self-professed “sex addict” who even gets excited upon hearing about his daughter’s sex life. Indeed, Devereaux may be so repulsively fat that he even has trouble walking a couple feet without perspiring, but he has a little friend named Viagra that gives him the sexual pseudo-potency he needs to engage in multiple orgies and threesomes every single damn day. The first place we see the antihero display his debauchery and self-entitled arrogance is at his international bank’s Washington, D.C. headquarters, which he has turned into a not so discrete high-class makeshift whorehouse of sorts that is occupied by tall Nordic callgirls with tasteless tramp stamps who offer free blowjobs to more dignified clients of the bank. Of course, the party does not really get started until Devereaux flies to NYC and goes to an orgy where he, a small and effeminate frog of the stereotypically swarthy sort, and a small French-speaking Capoid-like negro indulge in a number of expensive streetwalkers in a luxury hotel room. Looking for a little bit of privacy, the IMF chief takes a prostitute into a backroom, forces her to give him head in a ridiculously rough fashion (he almost seems to pass out in the process since he is so fat), slaps her large tits fairly hard, and finishes the happy hooker off by performing cunnilingus on her. After drinking some whisky-cognac-Viagra milkshakes with his multicultural entourage, Devereaux ends the hotel party, but the party has just begun for him, as he has two high-dollar Russian hookers come to his hotel room later that night. After watching the two Slavic skanks engage in streamy Sapphic sensuality, Devereaux joins the fun by penetrating one of the girls' doggy-style while she performs cunnilingus on her comrade. Clearly not satisfied with the multiple orgies he has partaken in during that single day, Devereaux attempts to force a less than homely negro maid to give him a blowjob after she unwittingly walks into the quasi-demonic degenerate's room after he gets out of the shower. Addled with arrogance and sexual aggression, the IMF pig declares "do you know who I am?" to the Maid, but she begs "no please" and eventually manages to flee the room after being semi-molested. After eating at a fancy French restaurant with his daughter and her new boyfriend and bragging to them about how he confessed to the press that he is a proud womanizer, Devereaux heads to JFK airport, but he does not make the flight as two cops, a black and East Asian, arrest him after being charged with attempting to rape the black maid the night before. Indeed, at least momentarily, the party has ended for the Semitic socialist party animal.

Of course, in his unwaveringly arrogance, Devereaux proclaims he has "diplomatic immunity" upon being arrested, but the hardened NYC cops are immune to his pathetic pleas of pretense. Being too fat for normal handcuffs, Devereaux complains his hands hurt and a tough cop rightfully retorts with the remark, "too fucking bad." After endlessly bitching to the cops that he wants to make a phone call, Devereaux is finally able to get in contact with his family, with his no less arrogant Zionist wife Simone complaining upon hearing the bad news, "I should just let him sit in jail...he's destroyed everything I've worked for." After being denied bail (they don't want him to pull a Roman Polanski and run off to France or Israel), Devereaux is taken to prison by two black cops who mock him for being so pathetically fat and slow. One of the black cops also yells at the IMF pimp for his arrogance, warning him, "You ain't no tough guy here, man...stop that shit." After being pushed around by a couple negro thugs in a holding cell, Devereaux faces the complete and utter humiliation of being strip searched by two black officers, who laugh at his incapacity for putting his clothes on in a timely fashion, with one of the policeman jokingly remarking, "Some workout, huh, putting your clothes back on." Since he is a stinking wealthy swine, Devereaux eventually manages to get out of prison after paying $1 million dollars in bail and agreeing to pay $60,000 a month for a court-approved apartment. Naturally, Devereaux is verbally reamed by his wife Simone, who clearly wears the pants in the relationship, upon being reunited with her. When Devereaux attempts to play the victim to his beloved by stating his life has been turned upside down by the recent series of events, Simone becomes infuriated and shouts, "Your life has been upside down since the day you were born. I tried...God knows I tried...YEARS...to make you into a man. Do you know what a man is? You don't know what a man is. A man knows about consequences...protecting the wife...a man doesn't follow his dick into every dark alleyway and whore that crosses his path.” Of course, Devereaux also uses the excuse that he is a “sex addict,” adding, “I didn’t get a blowjob, you know...it was a setup [...] I just jerk on her mouth...that’s all. That’s my sickness.” Naturally, as a man who believes he suffers from a sickness, the disgraced IMF pig feels no need to cease his depravity, even while embroiled in an international sex scandal.

WELCOME TO NEW YORK

Naturally, Devereaux immediately goes back to banging random women, including a statuesque French-speaking negress that he meets at a ‘ethnic’ art museum. After watching a private screening of François Truffaut’s Bed & Board (1970) aka Domicile conjugal in his lavish apartment, Devereaux is once again verbally attacked by his wife Simone. After rationalizing his sex crimes by pleading to his wife, “It’s a crime that I want to feel young?,” Devereaux proceeds to attack his beloved’s family for being war profiteers, so Simone hatefully states to her hyper horny hubby, “You couldn’t put your face where my father put his ass.” Of course, Devereaux eventually gets around to sexually assaulting another woman, even in a manner more violent than he attempted with the black Maid, but luckily the young lady gets away. Naturally, Devereaux is eventually cleared of all charges after the Maid is discredited (which was his lawyer’s goal from the get go), thus saving the sexual predator from being the sexual prey of hordes of dark-colored honky-hating prisoners (indeed, the IMF head would have served a 20 year sentence had he been convicted of rape). When Devereaux goes to a psychiatrist, he complains that his wife wants to leave him, his girlfriends have left him, and that no one returns his calls, as if it is a big surprise. When the psychiatrist asks the dejected Judaic frog about his feelings on the whole ordeal, Devereaux passionately states: “I’m sorry to say that, but I feel nothing. I don’t feel guilty, I don’t give a shit about the people [...] No one can save anyone. And, do you know why doctor? Do you know why? Because...no one wants to be saved. That is the irony I only recently understood...no one wants to be saved.” Indeed, at least Devereaux is honest. After Devereaux accuses his wife of paying someone off to free him of the sexual assault and rape charges, Simone harps on about her disappointment in her hubby, stating to him, “I didn’t want to be president...I wanted you to be president...you would have taken France in another direction,” as if a sick socialist sex predator is the kind of leader an already degenerate, malignantly multicultural, and conspicuously corrupt nation like Frogland needs. To Simone’s credit, she certainly has a point when she says to her husband, “You’re expendable because you act a certain way [...] What I will say is...so much has been done for you...and you didn’t appreciate it.” In the end, Devereaux manages to have a conversation with a young Hispanic maid named Marti (Raquel Toro) that does not result in the obese Hebraic ogre attempting to rape her.

When Abel Ferrara was recently interviewed by AFPTV and asked whether or not his film Welcome to New York was anti-Semitic, the auteur attempted to portray himself as a philo-Semite and responded in his typically verbally spastic fashion by stating, "Am I anti-Semitic? No, I was raised by...well, you know, I hope not, okay. I was raised by Jewish women, so as an Italian boy...I'm like, you know...I'm not an official member of the tribe but I'm there, you know." In fact, during the same interview, Ferrara stated in a quite groveling manner in defense of his depiction of Strauss-Kahn's wife's art dealer father Paul Rosenberg, "He was not a collaborator. He was almost killed by the Gestapo. He was completely the opposite. He was very nearly killed like six million Jews." Indeed, aside from one single scene that most filmgoers would not understand, Ferrara's film gives no indication that Dominique Strauss-Kahn and his (ex)wife Anne Sinclair (who divorced him in March 2013) are members of the Hebrew tribe. Of course, what the film does do is demonstrate that Strauss-Kahn and Sinclair are exceedingly arrogant international parasites who, for what was probably the first time in their entire lives, faced minor hardship after the Hebraic presidential hopeful attempted to stick his circumcised prick in the wrong brown prole hole. As with most of his cinematic antiheroes, Ferrara chose not to portray DSK in a cliché one-dimensional fashion, but instead as a weak and pathetic pig who, when everything is said and done, seems rather lonely and unloved (after all, his wealthy wife is a mega-bitch), hence his love of soulless lechery. Unquestionably, the film's greatest merit lies in star Gérard Depardieu's crazed, flamboyant, grotesque, and even absurd improvised performance. Indeed, not since his quasi-pornographic role in Marco Ferreri's The Last Woman (1976) aka La Dernière femme aka L'ultima donna, where the French actor waves around his erect member, has Depardieu given such a delightfully depraved and uniquely unhinged performance. If anything, DSK should thank Depardieu for portraying him in such a memorable way, as Welcome to New York surely makes the disgraced French socialist politician seem more interesting and likeable than he really is. Apparently, when Guido commie auteur Bernardo Bertolucci saw Ferrara's work, he stated, "This film reminds me of a Warhol film." Indeed, as its sardonic title indicates, Welcome to New York features a damning depiction of the rotten Big Apple that is no less unflattering than the films of Paul Morrissey, as a work that is just as much about NYC as DSK. In that regard, Ferrara is one of the most important filmmakers that New York City has ever produced, as a sort of gutter poet who makes mostly honest celluloid anti-tributes to the superlatively shitty city and its eclectic collection of uniquely unsavory inhabitants. That being said, I can only guess how Ferrara's upcoming Pier Paolo Pasolini biopic will turnout, but at least a gay communist Guido poet/filmmaker with a nostalgia for his Catholic roots makes for a more interesting subject than a powerful Jewish sex addict. Indeed, Ferrara's bargain bin Catholic morality is certainly lost on Judaic subjects as Welcome to New York demonstrates.

-Ty E

DER NACHTMAHR
DER NACHTMAHR

Achim Bornhak (2015)

It is a long story, but somehow I used to know a gay Sicilian-American that somewhat resembled a young Julius Evola who became a mystical-minded neo-eugenicist of sorts because he was so obsessively disturbed by the low quality of young women in his native NYC and was quite rightly convinced that many of these debutantes were forsaken whores and too hopelessly drug-and-dick-ridden to actually sire healthy offspring. Convinced that he was on some sort of holy mission in a decidedly dysgenic age where Western governments subsidize the proliferation of racial untermenschen at the expense of the mostly Europid taxpayers, this superlatively strange gay guido, who once told me in all seriousness that he believed that Soiled Sinema was one of the darkest and most depressing website on the internet, had personally known his fair share of dumb party bitches that took too much ecstasy and felt it was his sort of quasi-spiritual duty to preserve superior genetic material that had not been despoiled by modernity. Undoubtedly, this eccentric homo wop eugenicist, who had obvious maternal instincts and clearly suffered from an advanced form of 'ovary envy,' was thinking about the sort of teenage kraut raver sluts featured in the experimental Teutonic horror-sci-fi-fantasy Der Nachtmahr (2015) aka The Nightmare directed by 'Akiz' aka Achim Bornhak (Das wilde Leben aka Eight Miles High, Shakespeare's letzte Runde aka Will's Grill) when he decried the reproductive unsuitability of many modern women. Quite provocatively and fittingly, Bornhak's feature, which features a bizarrely lovable yet somewhat tragic gargoyle-like fetus monster of sorts, deals with themes of birth, death, motherhood, and womanhood, thus making it a cinematic work that is certainly more socially pertinent than it might seem upon a superficial glance. Set in a nation that is committing collective suicide via to its rapidly declining racially indigenous birthrates and released around the time of the racially apocalyptic so-called 'migrant crisis,' Der Nachtmahr—a not-so-orgasmic odyssey about a vapid teenage raver slut with seemingly nil authentic personality that starts losing her mind while simultaneously developing a strong connection to the somewhat enigmatic fetus monster—is indubitably an auspicious cinematic work in a somewhat perversely preternatural form where raw and visceral teenage sexual appeal collides with ostensibly banal things like motherhood and reproduction. Indeed, for better or worse, there is no film quite like Bornhak's somewhat unclassifiable feature, even if it features some glaring cinematic influences.

Part arthouse, part exploitation, and part exercise in spastic genre-defilement, the film certainly surprised me when I first saw it as I am familiar with Bornhak's most popular flick Das wilde Leben (2007) aka Eight Miles High—a fairly generic biopic about dark-haired German 68er-Bewegung hippie icon and model Uschi Obermaier—which lacks any sort of genuine artistic merit or originality and feels like it could have been directed by any nameless soulless for-hire hack. A seeming expression of the same culturally retarded (pre)apocalyptic post-nihilistic Europa that produces tragic melancholic Nordic wigger rappers like Yung Lean, multicultural British alt-pop groups like Young Fathers, ethnomasochistic antifa-supporting far-leftist half-breed filmmakers like German-Greek auteur Nikias Chryssos (Der Bunker), and intriguingly unhinged yet talented Dionysian divas like Italian actress-cum-auteur Asia Argento, Der Nachtmahr is unequivocally a potent example of a sick and deracinated Americanized Occident that has lost its soul, succumbed to debauchery and complying with every base instinct, and completely forgotten its rich history and cultural legacy. Indeed, Bornhak, who has been supported by people ranging from David Lynch to artistically bankrupt urban scribbler clown Banksy, is clearly a degenerate of sorts, but some brutal truths bleed through his film in a way as if the auteur somehow managed to expose the hidden screams and cries of the decidedly diseased German collective unconscious. In fact, although assuredly a victim of modernity himself, Bornhak has been influenced by the writings of 'Aryan Christ' Carl Jung and his film offers an esoteric view of the excesses of Berlin youth culture and the soulless spiritual void that is (post)modernity.

Set in a decidedly deracinated trash-covered 'post-racial' Berlin that makes the Weimar Republic seem like the height of class and cultivation by comparison and featuring an inordinately sexy 'heroin chic' female lead that looks like a Russian sex slave and plastic multicultural cast that includes (but is not limited to) gooks, towelheads, uppity high yellow negroes, assorted mystery meat, and a seemingly self-loathing kraut with a fake Hispanic name (babyface rocker Wilson Gonzalez), Der Nachtmahr could not be more appropriately titled in both the literal and figurative sense. Part of an anti-intellectual romantic genre-conscious trend in contemporary German cinema that includes similarly generically titled films as diverse as queer auteur Till Kleinert's art-horror fever dream Der Samurai (2014) and Greek-German Nikias Chryssos' dank dark comedy Der Bunker (2015), Bornhak's artsploitation experiment can certainly be enjoyed by those individuals that either loathe or loathe art (translation: it has entertainment value). Somehow managing to combine elements of David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), Steven Spielberg's E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial (1982) and Gaspar Noé's Enter the Void (2009), the film is a sort of forsaken Fräulein Donnie Darko for a nihilistic age where young women seem to more prefer to get drunk and high and sleep with countless guys than do something so deplorably anachronistic as actually get married and have children. Undoubtedly, it would also be fair to describe the film as being like a marriage between Frank Henenlotter's classic exploitation flick Basket Case (1982) and Harmony Korine's Spring Breakers (2012). In short, auteur Bornhak seems to have eclectic taste in cinema, including American arthouse, exploitation, cult, and even mainstream big budgets blockbusters, or so one would assume while watching his rather ambiguous feature. In an interview with AFI, Bornhak notably confessed, “There are plenty of filmmakers I truly adore. But none of their films have been a direct influence on DER NACHTMAHR. At least I was not aware of that while I was working on this film. Looking back at DER NACHTMAHR, I can see some influences from E.T., which was a film I saw when I was a kid. Some say DER NACHTMAHR is like E.T. on acid. SPRING BREAKERS and IT FOLLOWS came out when we already had picture lock in the editing room, and I haven’t even seen IT FOLLOWS yet. My greatest filmmaker role models are David Lynch, Gaspar Noé, Alejandro Jodorowsky, Werner Herzog, Chris Cunningham and Stanley Kubrick.” In the same interview, the auteur would also reveal that he came up with the idea for the fetus monster long before he ever decided to create a film centering around said creature. In that sense, Bornhak follows in the footsteps of his hero David Lynch in terms of taking an incremental approach to filmmaking that involves obsessing over certain single ideas and images that ultimately act as a genesis to a more intricate cinematic creation (for example, Blue Velvet was sired from a number of ideas, including Lynch’s obsession with spying on a girl while hiding in her closet). Apparently borrowing its antiquated Teutonic title from the 1781 oil painting of the same name by Swiss artist Johann Heinrich Füssli (1741-1825) that features a demonic apelike incubus crouched on the chest of a beautiful young woman in a deep sleep, Der Nachtmahr is also interesting in the sense that it is a hopelessly modern take on Germany’s great history of dark romanticism. Indeed, if Teutonic Art Nouveau painter Franz Ritter von Stuck had grown up in modern times and developed a hedonistic obsession with teenage flesh, shitty vacuous rave music, and designer drugs, he might direct a film like Bornhak’s.

DER NACHTMAHR

Beginning with a sensational disclaimer reading, “WARNING – The following film contains flashing lights and patterns which can cause epilepsy! Warning – This film contains isochronous sounds and binaural frequencies! Anyway – this film should be played loud!” Der Nachtmahr immediately announces to the viewer that they are about to experience a harsh and grating yet aesthetically pleasing audio-visual drug of the transcendental sort. Ultimately, the viewer is exposed to the increasingly unreliable mind of teenage protagonist Tina Petersen (Carolyn Genzkow) after she encounters a strange little creature and becomes increasingly alienated from her clueless parents and good-for-nothing dope fiend friends. To be somewhat blunt, tiny Tina seems like your typical dumb teenage party bitch, as she has no problem pissing in the middle of the street and exposing her shaved pussy in public after she gets good and wasted. At the beginning of the film, we are introduced to Tina and her two equally vapid best friends ‘Moni’ aka Monika (Lynn Femme) and Barbara (Sina Tkotsch) as they act like spastic hens and talk about stupid shit while they are driving to a pool party to celebrate the protagonist’s birthday. Among other things, Tina discusses deformed fetuses that she and Monika were exposed to at school earlier that day. While by no means a serious student or scholar, Tina seems to have been deeply affected by one of these barely human miscreations of god. When Monika—a loudmouthed Asian that seems to be the most domineering of the thickheaded threesome—dares to make a .GIF of Tina transferring into an especially grotesque fetus, the protagonist is immediately disturbed and demands that her friend immediately delete the photo, as if she has a premonition of things to come. When they finally arrive at the party, Tina gets drunk, pops some pills (assumedly ecstasy), and then gets all moody and broody about a dopey dork rocker named Adam ('Wilson Gonzalez' Ochsenknecht) that she has an unhealthy crush on. Unfortunately for Tina, an aggressive negress also has a crush on Adam, but all of the teens seem to be too lost and immature to main a serious relationship and are barely even able to communicate with one another in any meaningful way, hence their love of mindless rave parties. Unfortunately, Tina will soon have much more serious and morbid things on her mind. Indeed, upon taking a piss in the middle of a street and flashing her teenage twat, Tina becomes horrified when the fetus she saw from school suddenly moves through a bush after a trail of her urine hits the creature. Somewhat predictably, things only get weirder from there, as Tina is soon plowed down by a very fast sportscar car while she is picking up a necklace with an occult-like medallion that she dropped in the middle of the street. Considering Tina should have been killed but is depicted in the next scene merely lying in the street as if she got too drunk and passed out, the film only gets more convoluted from there as Tina's mind begins to deteriorate and the fine line between reality and nightmare is ripped to shreds. From there, Tina finds herself increasingly haunted by the mutant fetus, who she eventually becomes extremely close to in a truly transcendental way.

A girl from a nice banal bourgeois home with loving but seemingly clueless parents, Tina, not unlike many people her age, naturally feels alienated, but it is only when the grotesque fetus enters her life that she truly comes to understand what it really means to be alone in the world. Indeed, somewhat ironically, Tina even seems detached and alienated at a rave party—a celebration of mindless extroversion that is supposed to bring people 'together'—but when she begins seeing a tiny monster that no one else can see that she is forced to confront her own loneliness and, in the process, eventually obtains self-acceptance, self-esteem, and personal sovereignty. The first time that Tina is confronted face-to-face with the ambiguously friendly fetus after the incident at the party, she is horrified that he has raided her fridge and has made a nasty mess on the kitchen floor. As a result of talking to her psychiatrist, who inspired her to attempt to communicate with the strange creature, Tina asks it, "What do you want from me?" and it responds by non-verbally offering her an egg, but she bitches, "No, I don't want an egg. They give me a rash. All over. Do you understand?," in an arguably symbolic scene of dialogue that may or may not hint at the protagonist's lack of suitability for motherhood and overall warped female instincts. Notably,

DER NACHTMAHR

Tina's friends call when she is in the company of the fetus and she attempts to show them it when they arrive at her house, but the little monster is gone so she opts to smoke some blunts and take bong rips with her completely and utterly worthless friends. As time passes, the fetus becomes Tina's virtual hermetic roommate and the only living being that sees the seemingly forlorn heroine for who she really is. When the fetus opts to use a razor on his arm and accidentally cuts himself, Tina immediately acquires the same exact wound on the same exact area of her body, thus hinting the two have a deep otherworldly connection and possibly that they are even the same person. Indeed, as the film progresses, it becomes more and more apparent that the fetus is Tina's sort of Jungian shadow (aka 'shadow aspect') and the grotesque bodily version of her entire collective unconscious. Needless to say, it is only a matter of time before Tina completely embraces the fetus and succumbs to the darker elements of her unconscious.

When her bossy busybody father busts into her room and finds her sleeping with the fetus, Tina realizes that other people can actually also see her little buddy, though they do not take too kindly to him. Indeed, Tina's father stabs the fetus with a rod and then a medical crew shows up and has them both tranquilized. From there, the creature is seemingly imprisoned in a hospital and has unexplained experiments done on it. Meanwhile, Tina's parents consider having her institutionalized. When Tina returns to school after a long unexplained absence, she is berated by her somewhat sympathetic blonde American teacher (Kim Gordon of Sonic Youth in a rare acting role) for missing a month and half of class. During class, Tina is exposed to 18th-century English poet William Blake's 'prophetic books,' which are a series of lengthy, interrelated poetic works drawing upon Blake's own personal mythology. Notably, part of the poem reads, "A shriek ran thro' Eternity, And a paralytic stroke, At the birth of the Human shadow," thus alluding to the fetus being Tina's shadow. Eventually, Tina totally snaps late one night, physically transforms herself into a sort of strong and super sassy neo-gothic supervillainous, steals her parents' car, and then sneaks into a hospital to free her fetus friend. In Jungian terms, Tina seems to have achieved total 'individuation' as she has achieved a complete transformation, fully embraced the fetus and, in turn, her own dark unconscious self. Coming full circle, the film concludes at Tina's eighteenth birthday party where she unexpectedly arrives and horrifies her friends by introducing both her fetus friend and new (and seemingly true) self. Luckily, Adam is happy to see Tina and tells her, "You look great." Naturally, the two kiss, but things get ugly from there, as Tina's friends seem somewhat perturbed by her new sense of self-confidence and grotesque gargoyle-like friend. Indeed, Tina's friends try to prevent her from touching the fetus, but she proudly cradles the creature like a baby and even kisses it while they look on in horror and abject disgust. Unfortunately, Tina's parents eventually crash the party and her absurdly anally retentive father seemingly kills the fetus. Notably, the fetus is also depicted being run over with a car just like Tina was at the beginning of the film. In the end, Tina is depicted lying in the backseat of a sports car while the fetus drives in what is indubitably a symbolic scene that underscores the fact that the heroine's unconscious has completely taken over.

Depicting a morally inverted world where the protagonist's father is such a petty politically correct pussy that he is actually offended by the word "freak" and even complains "'Freak' is stupid and derogatory," yet he does not concern himself with real serious problems and seems to have no clue that his daughter is a hedonistic whore that loves popping pills, pissing in public, and playing hard to get with pudgy-faced stoners, Der Nachtmahr ultimately unwittingly reveals, at least to some extent, how Germany has become so valueless, suicidal, and nihilistic that a good percentage of its populous welcomes the flooding of their once-great-nation with low IQ untermensch invaders from the third world. In fact, the heroine of the film seems exactly like the sort of girl that would get gang-raped by these primitively misogynistic Muslim invaders where she to attend a New Year's Eve celebration or take an evening stroll down the wrong Berlin alley. Of course, being that her parents are weak bourgeois liberals and she friends with a curious clique of multicultural dope fiends that value nothing aside from their own hedonistic self-indulgence, it is easy to see why the heroine was so psychologically feeble that she needed a sort of transcendental intervention that resulted in her more or less abandoning everyone in her life, at least emotionally, for a sensitive fetus that ultimately teaches her the singular joys of early motherhood, among other things. In that sense, Der Nachtmahr is a shockingly hopeful film with a largely positive message about the importance of true individuality and the bottomless void that is modern youth (anti)culture. Unfortunately, somehow I think the message of the film will be lost on most teenage girls, but then again, I think the flick is probably the most influential on the subconscious level, which seems to be the director's intent.

Upon doing some research on auteur Achim Bornhak, I discovered that he is indeed a C.G. Jung fan and even advertises such on his facebook page, though I have to wonder if he sees Der Nachtmahr as depicting the Wotan archetype as personified by an all-too-petite teen with terribly tiny titties. Indeed, unlike all the other characters in the film, heroine Tina, who initially suffers repressed psychic complexes, arguably has the old gods in her reawakened when the fetus enters her life and exposes to her everything about herself that was once hopelessly buried in a toxic cesspool of soul-numbing ecstasy, generic EDM, and erotomania. As Jung once noted regarding the importance of these perennial archetypal "Gods, Demons and Illusions" and their influence on both the conscious and subconscious, "...they exist and function and are born anew with every generation. They have an enormous influence on individual as well as collective life and despite their familiarity they are curiously non-human. This latter characteristic is the reason why they are called Gods and Demons in the past and why they are understood in our 'scientific' age as the psychical manifestations of the instincts, in as much as they represent habitual and universally occurring attitudes and thought forms. They are the basic forms, but not the manifest, personified or otherwise concretised images. They have a high degree of autonomy, which does not disappear, when the manifest images change." While one could argue that National Socialism was a reemergence of the repressed Germanic god Wotan, the fetus in Bornhak's film makes for an even more interesting archetype representing Aryan fertility, as if it an expression of repressed maternity in an ungodly age of philosemitic Americanism, abortion-on-demand feminism, neo-liberalism, and cultural Marxism where motherhood is frowned upon and seen as anachronistic and unprogressive while soulless sexual promiscuity and miscegenation seen as has 'hip' and 'progressive.' Undoubtedly, the Teutonic collective unconscious is sick and repressed and heroine Tina's arguable involuntary date with ancestral memory is a blessing in disguise. Needless to say, it is only natural and exceedingly fitting that the heroine's nemesis is a nasty negress who, as a racial alien, naturally lacks the genetic capacity for encountering such archetypes (after all, were goofy kraut turd Wilson Gonzalez to have a child with a negress, it would indubitably be more horrifying than the fetus in the film, but I digress). Interestingly, the grotesque fetus in Der Nachtmahr looks like it could have been one of the ghouls featured in Franz von Stuck's classic 1889 painting 'Wild Chase,' which is notable for featuring a prophetic Hitler-esque Wotan on horseback. Notably, in an interview with the American Film Institute, auteur Bornhak revealed that he always intended Der Nachtmahr to be a film that was open to interpretation, stating, "There is a lot of guessing and discussing what the creature stands for, or what it symbolizes. Some say it's an incarnation of a symbol of bulimia (fat belly, Tina throws up, it is constantly eating, Tina is feeding him junk food, etc.); some others see the fear of an abortion or an involuntary pregnancy. Some think it represents Hades, the god who guides the living to the realm of the dead. It was always important to me to keep the interpretation open to the audience so everybody could come up with their own interpretation. For me, the creature was always something that appears between two different worlds. He is like a doorman, like a Fata Morgana that appears in the space between the ground and hot air. He never sleeps but at the same time he never seems to be really awake." Of course, as Jung revealed in regard to his belief that Friedrich Nietzsche was under the subconscious influence of Wotan despite his lack of familiarity with Wotan, "Nietzsche's case is certainly a peculiar one. He had no knowledge of Germanic literature; he discovered the "cultural Philistine"; and the announcement that "God is dead" led to Zarathustra's meeting with an unknown god in unexpected form, who approached him sometimes as an enemy and sometimes disguised as Zarathustra himself. Zarathustra, too, was a soothsayer, a magician, and the storm-wind..." Personally, I like to think that Bornhak had a sort of atavistic awakening and discovered the old gods while assembling Der Nachtmahr.

DER NACHTMAHR

While I am more than just a little bit pessimistic, especially since the nation is flooded with hostile Islamic hordes, Der Nachtmahr hints at a sort of cool atavistic reawakening in Deutschland that actually appeals to young people. Undoubtedly, Till Kleinert's Cowboy (2008) and especially Der Samurai (2014) accomplished something similar, albeit in a sort of gay Männerbünde fashion. At the very least, these relatively idiosyncratic Teutonic neo-romantic films represent a healthy change of pace in German cinema and are certainly a major improvement over the spiritually sick films of the so-called 'Berliner Schule,' which is a movement that gives a good indication of the sort of metaphysical malaise, collective social alienation, racial and cultural deracination, and overall self-loathing that has led to so many Germans being completely happy with their nation being overrun by brown barbarians that are not exactly too fond of static and plotless kraut art cinema. Surely, unlike the German era fantasy films of German-born homo Hebrew Roland Emmerich—a master hack that was once nicknamed 'Swabian Spielberg' due to the Schwaben region around his native Stuttgart and his fetish for making childish generic genre garbage—most notably Joey (1985) aka Ghost Chase, Der Nachtmahr is a consistently foreboding flick with a certain unmistakable Teutonic flavor, albeit a somewhat mongrelized one that reminds the viewer of S. Spielberg's pernicious international influence. Undoubtedly, Spielberg's morally dubious, spiritually retarded, and sexually autistic films have played an imperative role in creating the sort of decidedly dull and deracinated infantile teens depicted in Bornhak's film. While Der Nachtmahr might be vaguely Spielbergian in terms of cute yet grotesquely friendly monster, the film is, on closer inspection, ultimately as traditionally Teutonic as the strange tales of H.H. Ewers, Expressionistic poetry of Gottfried Benn, the classic West German fantasy flick Die unendliche Geschichte (1984) aka The NeverEnding Story directed by Wolfgang Petersen, and even the dark folklore of Brothers Grimm. Indeed, Bornhak might not be the next Hans-Jürgen Syberberg or even Niklaus Schilling, but he does have enough artistic prowess and originality that he managed to sire a genuinely hypnotic and enthralling piece of neo-romantic cinema that involves teenage girls barfing and pissing in the streets, which is certainly no small accomplishment.

-Ty E

HATCHET
HATCHET

Adam Green (2006)

I've only linked the term "red-blooded" towards film a minuscule amount of occasions. One being Jeremiah Johnson and the other being There Will Be Blood. The very idea of American citizens calling Hatchet a distinctive "American" horror film is insulting. Hatchet is anti patriotic in every sense and a low blow to rural America in the guise of a contemporary slasher farce. Hatchet isn't very "old school" or "mind-blowing" as other critics hailed it but Hatchet is constantly entertaining and manages to be something unheard of in its genre - truly funny.

Joel David Moore plays the main "hero" of sorts. He is a charming yet awkward man attempting to get over a love once lost. Together with his token black friend, they decide to escape from the crowded streets of New Orleans by taking a haunted swamp ride hosted by none other than that Asian in Better Luck Tomorrow. From the opening credits, what wraps around a pleasing horror spoof is a circle jerk horror icon fest. We have constant cameos of Kane Hodder, Tony Todd, and Robert Englund. I wouldn't be surprised if Douglas Bradley was key grip. The villainous creature Victor Crowley is a barbaric inbred who misses his daddy. He's stuck in the same horrific night as the one in which his father died, so he stalks all the trespassers, murdering them in various grotesque ways. It's blatantly obvious that the name Crowley was derived from infamous occultist Aleister Crowley, who was also referenced and defeated in PlayStation video game Nightmare Creatures. If it weren't the comic effect, this film would be nothing but a horrible homage to the slasher genre. Thankfully, the film has the technical footnote on call and manages to amuse, both in terror and humor. Many of the fine folks at my employment lighten up the day with many various "inside jokes" relevant only to the regs. of our theater. It came as a great surprise to see many of our jokes used in action to such an advantage. Many scenes actually made me spit up with laughter. Hatchet isn't something new, but the creative arrogance behind the film's production certainly allows it to stand above the rest. Hatchet isn't a revelation in horror and it's a cocky piece of cinema violence, very similar to Feast, but Hatchet has an equivocal beauty about it. By no means an art piece, what you see is what you get in what might be the most shallow horror film to date. That doesn't mean it isn't immensely entertaining though.

-mAQ

CARNOSAUR

Adam Simon, Darren Moloney (1993)

Carnosaur might be the greatest dinosaur film ever made. Instead of material focused on subverting race or religion, It ascends into archaic carnage. It's like the Carnosaur just said "Fuck your gender, Imma eat you anyways." And for this, I have great respect. Carnosaur was one of those films you'd rent in your favorite video store as a child. Knowing nothing about it, you wouldn't even realize that these women were giving birth to raptor-rexes. The plot involved the frequented mad scientist, only this time, she was a crazy female. She created some reborn dinosaurs and managed to spread it like a disease. So not only do we have a killer animatronic baby dinosaur running around, ripping lustful teenage boy's nads off, but we got immaculate dino-conception. This provides an amazing biblical "fuck you." I wonder if this is where the "Raptor Jesus" meme was born. When Carnosaur was released, Ebert, Film Threat, and even Fangoria loved it. Now it just seems that with the release of the CGI-induced Jurassic Park, everyone forgot about the classics. I am bringing up no new point here, for it seems that this generation are all about the modern cinema. Carnosaur is also one of the older films to have a nihilistic, and sadistic ending. Carnosaur, besides being cheesy, has a strong commentary behind it. It's a slap in the face of people who try to play god. Keep aneye out for the out-of-control violence towards Hippies. Scene goes as follows. Hippie sees dinosaur. Hippie says "Peace Green Brother." Hippie gets eaten. End of scene. Diane Ladd is at her peak in this film, giving it the edge for acting it needs. This film relies mostly on screaming humans and prehistoric roars. Dinosaurs don't get much better than this. Carnosaur is the exclusive dinosaur film that features an epic showdown of Lizard VS. Machine. I wouldn't ask for anything else.

-Maq

THE GUEST
THE GUEST

Adam Wingard (2014)

Lately, there has been a strange trend among a couple American mumblecore hacks and independent horror pseudo-auteurs to collaborate on ostensibly quirky genre-bending cinematic works made for rural hipsters and slightly more discerning horror fans who do not need to wallow in buckets of blood to appreciate a film. Indeed, Adam Wingard (Pop Skull, A Horrible Way to Die), Ti West (The House of the Devil, The Innkeepers), and Joe Swanberg (Silver Bullets, Drinking Buddies) represent a sort of rising dynasty of pseudo-auteurist degeneracy that pumps out a lot of pointless films over a short time, sort of like a group of yank Fassbinders, albeit minus the genius and talent for histrionic melodrama. Arguably, the three directors are probably best known for the 'found-footage' horror anthology V/H/S (2012), as well as the darkly comedic 'slasher' flick You're Next (2011) directed by Wingard and starring Swanberg and West, with the latter work certainly being their best collaboration to date. Though he and his buddy Swanberg demonstrated they have the sexual maturity of autistic middle schoolers with their pseudo-erotic hipster digital diarrhea abortion Autoerotic, Wingard has certainly proven to be the most talented of his pansy pals with not only You're Next, but especially his latest feature The Guest (2014) which, not surprisingly, neither of his pals had any involvement with whatsoever. Penned by fellow hipster horror homeboy Simon Barrett (Dead Birds, V/H/S), Wingard's latest work may be typical of his previous films in that it was thrown together in a fairly sloppy fashion, features more than its fair share of overtly amateurish acting, basks in postmodern posturing and cross-genre masturbation, and is conspicuously flawed on the most fundamental level, yet it is also his most endlessly enthralling cinematic effort to date. Wingard's sort of celluloid equivalent to Nicolas Winding Refn's Drive (2011) in terms of its hodgepodge of film and genre references, as well as its retro 1980s synthesizer-driven soundtrack featuring songs by industrial and goth groups like D.A.F. (Deutsch Amerikanische Freundschaft), Love and Rockets, The Sisters of Mercy, Clan of Xymox, and Front 242, among various groups, The Guest is a short and sweet action-packed movie miscreation plagued by patently preposterous fanboy logic, rather retarded murder rampages, and mentally vacant pot-addled teenybopper morons, yet I somehow liked it enough that I watched it twice, which is something I never thought I would do with a Wingard flick. Like an American philistine take on Pier Paolo Pasolini's Teorema (1968) meets John Carpenter's Halloween (1978) and James Cameron's The Terminator (1984) as starring the more suave and macho yet no less demented little brother of the eponymous serial killer of the hit TV-series Dexter (2006-2013), Wingard's little wonder flick has about as much aesthetic merit as a Mountain Dew commercial and the sophistication and moral prowess of a Michael Bay blockbuster, but it also reminds the viewer that somewhat decent popcorn flicks can be made on fairly modest budgets. A genre-confused action-thriller-antiwar-horror hybrid made more or less for the same sort of mindlessly hedonistic teenagers it somewhat unflatteringly portrays, albeit with a nostalgia for the 1980s that somehow manages not to be radically repugnant, The Guest is certainly the best pomo jerk-off piece of at least the last couple years, as a work that Rob Zombie, Eli Roth, and Quentin Tarantino could learn a thing or two from in terms of 'relatively' seamlessly combining cinematic influences and tweaking genre expectations.

A strong, smart, suave, stoic and respectful ex-soldier named David Andersen Collins (English actor Dan Steven of the British post-Edwardian period drama TV series Downton Abbey) stops by the secluded country home of the Peterson family and informs the matriarch, Laura (Sheila Kelley), that he is a friend of her deceased son Caleb who was killed in the disastrous Zionist war in Afghanistan. After confirming that David is telling the truth by looking at a picture of her perished progeny's army platoon and seeing him standing with her dead son, Laura invites the seemingly harmless guest to stay at her humble abode. Before Laura and her scrawny beta-male softcore dipsomaniac husband Spencer (Leland Orser) know it, David, who is not shy when it comes to doing domestic chores around the house and spending quality time with the family, becomes more or less their surrogate son, as a seemingly morally pristine confederate Aryan Christ of sorts who knows what to say and do at all times, especially when it comes to a grieving family that has been socially splintered by the tragic death of their oldest son. Of course, suffering from John Hughes-esque teenage angst and whatnot, the Peterson's children Luke (Brendan Meyer) and Anna (Maika Monroe) need a little more time to adjust to perennial do-gooder David's old-fashioned charms.

Luke is an intelligent yet seemingly half-autistic teenage turd who is constantly bullied at school, but when David singlehandedly beats up an entire group of jocks that regularly torment him, his self-esteem improves dramatically and he grows an almost boyish crush for the elder gentleman. 20-year-old prima donna waitress Anna is somewhat harder to please, but she creams her little pink panties after seeing David topless. When Anna's mother forces her to bring David to a party at the home of her friend Kristen (Tabatha Shaun), the ex-commando smokes a little weed, drinks a couple brews, and even manages to screw the party host after beating up an aggressive ex-boyfriend to heckle her. At the party, David also befriends a burnout dope dealer named Craig (Joel David Moore) who he asks if he can find someone to buy illegal weapons from. David also learns that Kristen is secretly still dating her no-good drug dealer/would-be-rock star (ex)boyfriend Zeke (Chase Williamson) behind her parents' back, but the valiant war veteran agrees not to tell anyone. On the way home from their party, Anna complains about the fact that her boyfriend is a loser, so perennial gentleman David tries to cheer her up with the following cheesy compliment,

THE GUEST

“If I had a girl like you at home, I would not have gone over to the middle east and got shot at.” To display her gratitude after he sweet talks her, Anna agrees to make David a CD mix featuring a variety of synth-driven industrial groups. Of course, little does Anna realize that David will blast the same compilation while he is attempting to hunt down her and her brother Luke.

When David meets up with dullard drug dealer Craig and his ex-navy black market gun dealer pal, he reveals his true character by killing the two small cons and stealing the latter’s various weapons, which included a couple barrettes, a 9mm, and two grenades, among other things. Ultimately, David frames Anna’s boyfriend Zeke for the crime by planting the murder weapon in his car. David also takes the liberty of killing Spencer’s boss after hearing the patriarch complain about how he stole his job. Meanwhile, Kristen decides to do some snooping and calls the military where she learns that David apparently died the week before in a hospital fire. Using her female intuition, Anna deduces that David framed her degenerate boy toy and then reveals to her parents that their guest is supposed to be dead, but the ex-commando tells the Petersons a half-lie about being part of some top secret mission and they naturally believe him since they like him so much. Meanwhile, Anna’s call to the military base alerts an authoritarian negro military police leader named Major Carver (Lance Reddick) who is apparently looking for David and will stop at nothing to find him. Set during the holiday season, Major Carver becomes a sort of Dr. Sam Loomis to David’s Michael Myers-like character. As Carver later explains to Anna, who is certainly no Laurie Strode though she is infinitely more attractive, David was the subject of a military medical experiment of sorts to create the ultimate super soldier and he has a “neurological condition” that compels him to clean up all “loose ends” and kill anyone that might compromise the top secret project. Indeed, were it not for Anna’s snooping around and attempt to get her loser druggy beau out of prison, David would have never began brutally murdering everyone she loves. Somewhat ironically, Luke does not care when he learns that David is not the person he thought he was but instead a coldblooded killer who had plastic surgery to change his appearance and to get rid of his fingerprints. Like in virtually every slasher flick, nearly all of the characters croak in the end and the work concludes with more than enough room for a sequel.

If one learns anything from watching The Guest, it is that young girls will go to absurd lengths to support their delinquent doper boyfriends and ‘sensitive’ bullied teens tend to take on borderline psychopathic qualities after being called a “faggot” one too many times. Cinematically speaking, the film teaches the viewer that a sleek, stylish, and consistently enthralling film can be made by tweaking some of the most inane and insipid Hollywood film genre conventions, by featuring a handsome and charming likable mass murderer and a hopelessly stupid cutesy girl whose bad blonde hair dye jobs seem to have given her brain damage, and by having a narcotizing retro goth/industrial soundtrack. Indeed, the film surely owes a large percentage of its darkly quasi-erotic potency to its vintage score, which the majority of the American mainstream filmgoing audience has certainly never heard before. As someone who couldn't care less about the Halloween franchise (there is even a blatant homage to the 'black sheep' of the series, Halloween III: Season of the Witch, thus reflecting the director's unconventional interest in the horror genre), the Terminator franchise, and the various other corporate celluloid crap that the film pays playful homage to, I have to confess that The Guest is pomo pastiche that actually works in a fashion that does not make the viewer feel like they have been spiritually raped by the pernicious aesthetic plague of pop (pseudo)culture. I have to admit that the film is more thoughtful than most works of its particular celluloid breed, as director Adam Wingard does not give away as many clues and answers than the work leads the viewer to think. Indeed, there is more than enough evidence to indicate that the eponymous killing machine is, in fact, the Peterson family's dead son Caleb, though Wingard thankfully never reveals the curious character's true identity. If one thing is for sure, it is that the titular character fights an urge not to kill the Petersons, though he seems to have no qualms about killing anyone else for the most insignificant of reasons. Unquestionably, the best compliment I can pay The Guest is that it is the first film that has ever made me question my thoughts on American independent film and a seemingly hipster filmmaker like Wingard, who seems to be the only member of his cinematic clique that has evolved as a filmmaker. Undoubtedly, it is surely an accomplishment to make metacinema entertaining and not like posturing pseudo-intellectual twaddle that is made to impress film critics and fap-happy fanboys who masturbate to the latest cover art put out by the Criterion Collection. Indeed, if you're tired of mentally retarded slasher killers with moronic masks or aesthetically sterile autism-packed action-thrillers featuring cardboard villains and heroes and generic pseudo-neo-classical scores, you might benefit from spending a little valuable time with The Guest.

-Ty E

THAT WAY TO MADRA
THAT WAY TO MADRA

Adriaan Ditvoorst (1965)

Although not exactly one of the director's best films (in fact, I would argue that it is one of his worst and most primitive works), Ik kom wat later naar Madra (1965) aka That Way to Madra directed by criminally underrated auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst (De blinde Fotograaf aka The Blind Photographer, Flanagan) is considered such an important and revolutionary work of Dutch cinema history that it was selected as one of the sixteen films included in the 'Canon of Dutch Cinema' (aka Canon van de Nederlandse Film), which also includes Joris Ivens' Rain (1929), Fons Rademakers' Like Two Drops of Water (1963) aka Als twee druppels water, Frans Zwartjes' Living (1971), Paul Verhoeven's Turkish Delight (1973) aka Turks fruit, and Alex van Warmerdam's The Northerners (1992) aka De Noorderlingen, among various other works spanning all of Netherlandish film history. Indeed, Ditvoorst's film is important not only because it won tons of prizes and made a name for its director, but also because it totally revolutionized Dutch cinema and introduced the auteur theory as inspired by La Nouvelle Vague to the Netherlands, which was completely behind much of Europe in terms of filmmaking. As a work that was praised by none other than Jean-Luc Godard, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Joris Ivens, Bernardo Bertolucci and other top European arthouse filmmakers of that time, That Way to Madra more or less single-handedly put Dutch cinema on the map, or as Suriname-born Sephardic Jewish auteur Pim de la Parra (Frank en Eva, Wan Pipel aka One People)—a man that helped revolutionize Dutch cinema in his own way by creating salacious sexploitation works with his oftentimes collaborator Wim Verstappen—stated in Thom Hoffman's excellent documentary De Domeinen Ditvoorst (1992) aka Ditvoorst Domains regarding the director's imperative influence, "He was one of the reasons that new Dutch films appeared in magazines. Cahiers du cinema, Sight & sound, and Italian and German magazines wrote about Adriaan's work." Like most of Ditvoorst's work, the less than 30-minute-long short is unflatteringly, albeit somewhat cryptically, autobiographical and expresses that director's innate anti-authority weltanschauung and iconoclastic approach to the cinematic language. Somewhat shockingly for a man that later lived completely off the grid and became a drug-addled dipsomaniac bum of sorts that hung out with punks and skinheads, Ditvoorst was a Dutch army officer before he ever became a filmmaker, so it should be no surprise that That Way to Madra takes place in a nightmarishly bureaucratic military setting where following protocol trumps the importance of life-and-death situations concerning loved ones. Beginning in a relatively straightforward, if not flagrantly cynical, fashion, Ditvoorst's film abandons convention and logic at about the midway point and delightfully degenerates into a sort of Kafkaesque magical realist nightmare that not only attacks the Dutch military, but Dutch society in general, as well as the Roman Catholic Church that the southern Dutch director was reared in.

That Way to Madra begins banally enough with a dorky old fart military officer with a bald head and small frame giving a lecture to a classroom full of young cadets that involves stating cliché things like, "If you want to get such results you must realize...that it's your duty to obey your superiors. Obedience means subordination. Herein lies the soul of our military affairs." After his pathologically pedantic spiel, the old officer states, "I'll show another recording. You'll see how these soldiers who are ready for battle...were able to carry out their orders," and then screens an absurd compilation of authentic stock war footage that is not only of Dutch soldiers (who were easily defeated during the Second World War, as Germany took over the Netherlands and its provinces in less than a week), but also German Wehrmacht soldiers during WWII. During the screening someone yells out, "Telephone for private Oosterhuis" and the viewer is then introduced to the rather goofy and less-than-handsome protagonist Private Hans Oosterhuis (played by Hans Oosterhuis, who later became a 'prop master' that worked on films ranging from the campy thriller Mascara (1987) directed by Patrick Conrad to Paul Verhoeven's Black Book (2006)). Hans has been summoned because he has received a telephone call and when he gets on the phone he discovers that his beautiful young wife Yvonne (Yvonne Grosfeld) has been in an accident and that he must travel to a hospital in Madra immediately, though the person who has called the protagonist refuses to give him any details regarding his spouse's condition. Before he can leave for Madra, Hans has to go through the bureaucratic process of being granted leave and after hearing an officer bitch to him, "Just imagine...Just on the eve of a full scale military exercise. You know how important that is," the protagonist is finally given the go ahead by a captain. Unfortunately for Hans, his day from hell has just begun as a series of absurd situations and circumstances are ultimately going to prevent him from getting to his beloved.

Whilst running like hell to get to the local railroad station before the train leaves, Hans passes a Catholic Church where a priest absurdly preaches, "The past keeps us busy. The present is a torment. And the future scares us. So don't stop praying. Those who'll pray, will be blessed." When Hans gets to the train station, he discovers that the train has already left and the next one won't be along for another hour, so the protagonist makes the mistake of breaking army rules by attempting to hitchhike. Indeed, right before getting in a truck he has just waved down on the side of the road, an authoritarian MP of the super Aryan-looking sort pops out of nowhere and states, "You were hitchhiking. You know that's forbidden. You're committing an offense. You're not allowed to stand here." Determined to get to his injured wife no matter what, Hans decides to brutally beat the nosy asshole MP until he is unconscious and then is subsequently nearly hit by a car upon running right in front of it in a desperate attempt to flag it down for a ride. Luckily, the driver is not angered by Hans' dangerous behavior and gives him a ride, though he is a rather weird and annoyingly talkative fellow who forces the protagonist to take a temporary break from their trip at a diner even though he is in a hurry. When the driver remarks, "You know, I live in a combination of the present and the past. It's a good way to idealize things. As a child I had a great time. I remember it with pleasure," Hans begins remembering events from his own adolescent years, like when his father once went on an impassioned rant about how he is unable to communicate with him and how Dutch youth are spoiled rotten compared to his generation. Indeed, in a scene that is simultaneously a parody of the older generation and an assault on contemporary Dutch society, Hans' father complains, "Today you curse your father and tomorrow you're back for help. That's the way it goes. I can say it once or five times, that's what it comes down to. You can't compare it with the old days. We had nothing, you have too much of everything. This economic climate isn't good for young people. Neither for older people. People become insensitive because they get too much and can get too much. That's the big difference with our time." Notably, as alluded to later in the film, auteur Ditvoorst's father died in a car wreck when he was only a boy, thus giving Hans' father's rant an extra eerie dynamic when viewed from that perspective.

THAT WAY TO MADRA

When Hans remarks, "The memories, the useless conversations. I don't know if they understood me. I wanted to be free," the faceless driver retorts, "You want to be free and have nothing to do with other people. Just think: that means you're totally dependent. I don't believe there is such thing as happiness. In that case you would feel free and dependent." From there in a scene reflecting Ditvoorst's troubled relationship with his own family (before killing himself, the director had not seen his family in about two decades) and suicidal tendencies, Hans recites the followings lines which were supposedly taken from some recently found unpublished work by Kafka: "I would give myself the deadly injection. My sister promised to stay silent. After my funeral she would commit suicide. She said she loved me. Maybe so, but I never knew what love was." When Hans finally arrives at the hospital in Madra, the building seems all but completely empty and his wife is nowhere to be found. While Hans runs through the hospital, the film abruptly cuts to the scene of a beachside car accident where Yvonne has assumedly died and then to a beach setting where a priest carries out a funeral for the protagonist's supposedly dead wife. After the surreal beach funeral procession, the film cuts to Hans being brought back to the military base to be disciplined. Indeed, as it turns out, Hans never beat up the MP or hitchhiked to the hospital. Additionally, Yvonne never died or had a funeral on the beach. Hans is brought to a Nordic sergeant with the curious Jewish surname 'Cohen' who calls a captain to inform him of the protagonist's ungodly crime of 'hitchhiking.'

While waiting for the captain to come by and assess the severity of his supposed 'crime' and hand out appropriate punishment, Hans recalls a letter from his wife Yvonne where she bitched, "If you think I'm happy, you're wrong. I'm not happy at all. You would be home this weekend, but now you write: Another useless exercise. Not even God knows how long it will take. I know I'm unreasonable. I'm not even able to write something cheerful. I'm afraid, Hans. I'm afraid." Notably, Yvonne's narration of the letter is juxtaposed with footage of her dressing in drag with her husband's army uniform in what is ultimately an absurd, albeit strangely lighthearted and even sentimental, scene that is not exactly typical of a Ditvoorst flick. When the captain finally arrives, he sternly states to Hans, "How stupid of you to go hitchhiking" and then yells at the busybody MP for giving the protagonist trouble in the first place. After Hans throws a cigarette at the MP, Ditvoorst totally deconstructs the film by having the camera move away to reveal that the characters are not at an actual military base but are in fact on a cheaply-made stage. After Hans walks off the stage and kicks his military knapsack like it is a soccer ball, a narrator states in a somewhat tongue-in-cheek fashion, "Oosterhuis was told through the phone that his wife Yvonne was saved. Gift doctors at the hospital of Madra succeeded in operating on her. Science stops at nothing."

Rather sadly and absurdly, especially considering the unrivaled artistic genius of many of his later cinematic efforts, That Way to Madra was the only commercially and critically successful film of Adriaan Ditvoorst's less than prolific, if not totally singular, filmmaking career. As his friends described in the doc Ditvoorst Domains, Ditvoorst hoped throughout his entire career that he could at least once again capture the same amount of praise and prestige that his first film had acquired, but it never happened and it was only many years after he killed himself in October 1987 that he received some posthumous critical acclaim, though he is hardly a household name in his homeland of the Netherlands or elsewhere. Not only was Ditvoorst's first feature Paranoia (1967) a flop, but even when he attempted to make an artistic compromise with the relatively accessible Tim Krabbé adaptation Flanagan (1975), he still failed to succeed commercially. In fact, the failure of Flanagan led to Ditvoorst becoming a complete social recluse who slept all day and only went outside late at night to go to his favorite bar. It should be noted that, during his early years, Ditvoorst was rather enthusiastic about being a filmmaker as demonstrated by the fact he once wrote, "Filming is settling accounts, ridding yourself of obstacles. Obsessions begging for solutions. Screaming for a climax. I want to make 3000, three thousand films!" yet instead of making three thousand cinematic works, he only had the opportunity to make ten, which includes shorts. Of course, as That Way to Madra clearly reveals, Ditvoorst was innately anti-authority, including when it came to the rules of filmmaking, so he had an impossible time trying to find funding for his films (interestingly, his Pasolinian Biblical satire De mantel der Liefde (1978) The Mantle of Love was produced by a drug dealer that he was friends with) yet he somehow managed to make some of the greatest Dutch films of all-time.

THAT WAY TO MADRA

Indeed, although I only saw it for the first time just a couple months ago, I regard Ditvoorst's swansong De witte waan (1984) aka White Madness—a work that is sort of like an exceedingly esoteric cinematic suicide letter that references everything from the director's love of Comte de Lautréamont's Les Chants de Maldoror and Anton Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard to his loser lifestyle as a dope-addled quasi-bum who spent most of his free time hanging out with young punks and skinheads—is easily one of my favorite films of all time and it features many of the same themes explored in his first film, albeit taken to much further extremes. Notably, in That Way to Madra, Ditvoorst alludes to the fact that his father died in a car wreck, but for whatever reason, the filmmaker also thought that his dad's death was an act of self-slaughter, which was ultimately the way he would conclude his life. Undoubtedly, one of the most eerie scenes That Way to Madra is the surreal beach funeral, especially considering the fact that Ditvoorst would commit suicide by walking into the Scheldt River and drowning himself. Quite notably, actor Thom Hoffman, who played the lead role in White Madness, would later recreate the beach scene from Ditvoorst's first film for his directorial debut Ditvoorst Domains during a segment in the doc where the filmmaker's friends discuss his suicide. Of course, maybe if Ditvoorst had stayed in the Dutch army and lived the reasonably comfortable life of a commissioned officer instead of becoming a filmmaker he might not have walked into the sea, but then he would have deprived the world of some of the most ideally idiosyncratic films ever made. It should be noted that That Way to Madra was the first film that Dutch arthouse cinematographer turned blockbuster director Jan de Bont (Speed, Twister) had ever worked on. Of course, the fact that a hack like de Bont went on to become a rich and world famous Hollywood filmmaker while Ditvoorst died poor, destitute, and drug-addled is just one more of the many absurdities of life and surely something that the That Way to Madra director could have appreciated in his own weird way as a true starving artist and spiritual heir to Vincent van Gogh.

-Ty E

PARANOIA

Adriaan Ditvoorst (1967)

While highly influenced during his formative years by the cinematic revolution of the La Nouvelle Vague, Dutch avant-garde auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst (Lucifer, De witte waan aka White Madness) adamantly rejected the Marxist-Leninist politics endorsed by the likes of filmmakers like Jean-Luc Godard and in Les Cahiers du Cinéma as he was anti-authority on a more metaphysical level and considered such far-leftist ideologies to be the height of submitting to authority and conformity. Ironically, many top card-carrying commie European arthouse filmmakers like Godard, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Bernardo Bertolucci, and Joris Ivens were so impressed by Ditvoorst's 22-minute experimental directorial debut Ik kom wat later naar Madra (1965) aka That Way to Madra that they regarded him as the most important talent working in the Netherlands at the time. With his innately incendiary and iconoclastic feature-length debut Paranoia (1967), the filmmaker would not only reveal his aesthetic influence from the Frog New Wave, but also his seething cynicism towards the pseudo-rebelliousness and trendy far-left politics of the time, as well as the taboo of the collective guilt of the Dutch for failing to do much to stop the horrors of World War II. A decidedly dark yet almost sadistically sardonic depiction of abolition through self-destruction, Ditvoorst's devastating transcendental debut depicts a deranged Dutch veteran with a persecution complex who has not recovered from the Second World War and falls deeper and deeper into insanity after suffering the delusion that he is a fugitive Waffen-SS soldier who escaped from an internment camp after the war. Based on the short story of the same name written by Willem Frederik Hermans, who Ditvoorst butted heads with when the writer visited the set of the production (though the director would adapt another Hermans story for his subsequent feature De Blinde Fotograaf aka The Blind Photographer), Paranoia was made when the auteur was only 27-years-old and is surely a formative work, yet it features most of the major themes and idiosyncrasies of Ditvoorst's later film as the director's sort of equivalent to Godard's Breathless (1960) aka À bout de souffle, albeit all the more subversive and iconoclastic. Like a stripped down no bullshit Dutch Taxi Driver, except without redemption, meets a nihilistic The Tenant, as channeled through the warped and uprooted psyche of the post-WWII generation, Ditvoorst expresses the collective guilt of the Netherlands for the Nazi takeover in a rather visceral fashion that takes no prisoners. As lead actor Kees van Eyck stated regarding the character he played in Paranoia and its connection to the director in the documentary De domeinen Ditvoorst (1992) aka The Ditvoorst Domains: "Adriaan clearly identified very much with the main character of the film. Given what we now know about him, growing gloomier...this identification becomes all the more harrowing." Featuring a far-leftist protestor being run over with a car after giving a preposterously contrived one-man demonstration, a goofy parrot that yells "Heil Hitler!," and a patently perturbed protagonist who commits suicide by jumping out of his apartment window without so much as screaming, but not before murdering his anal retentive landlord and worried waif of a girlfriend, Ditvoorst's weltschmerz-ridden existentialist nightmare ultimately viscerally depicts the worst and darkest of the post-WWII Dutch collective unconscious.

PARANOIA

Paranoia begins prosaically enough with blond protagonist Arnold Cleever (Kees van Eyck in his first and last film role) in a Dutch army uniform waiting for a train to take him to war to fight against the German invasion of May 10 1940 (The Germans completed their invasion on May 17th in an occupation that would last about five years and claim the lives of about 210,000 Dutchmen). After that, a silly Robinson Crusoe postcard appears on the screen that Arnold wrote to himself from the warfront where he complains about his uniform smelling like mothballs and being so far away from his hometown in Amsterdam. Arnold also discusses how he bumped into a woman who told him how the "whole world would blow up" and that he is deathly "afraid." On top of the fact he absurdly sent the postcard to himself, Arnold did not even buy postage for it, hoping that "perhaps it will be delivered anyway." Indeed, Arnold is clearly a bit "funny," but his current state of mind is nothing compared to how his fragile sanity will progressively deteriorate after the Second World War is over. After the credits scenes, which feature shots of buildings around Amsterdam juxtaposed with the sounds of a banging acoustic guitar that almost sounds like proto-punk music, an inter-tile appears reading "Several Years Later" and Arnold is depicted at a record shop during the post-WWII era where Americanization and rock 'n' roll have surely left their mark on the Netherlands. As demonstrated by the fact that he seems to hear a dozen or so songs playing at once while hanging at the record shop, Arnold is clearly not of sound mind. Of course, hearing a horrid rock storm will ultimately be the least of poor Arnold's problems.

While Arnold is afraid of being thrown out of his apartment, his girlfriend Anna (played by 'Pamela Rose' aka Pamela Koevoets, who would go on to appear in most of Ditvoorst's subsequent films) is worried about him, stating in an overtly concerned fashion, "Because you're so afraid...I don't know what to say to you anymore." Arnold attempts to calm Anna's worries by promising, "If everything goes right, we can be married next year," but the protagonist's mind will completely deteriorate way before the next year and neither of the characters will be alive by the end of the film. While waiting to meet with his lard ass quasi-pornographer uncle (Paul Murk), Arnold casually flips through a newspaper and literally jumps out of his seat when he notices his picture next to an article about a fugitive Dutch Waffen-SS soldier named Cornelis Dirk van Maanen who was put in an internment camp after the Second World War, but managed to escape and has been a wanted man ever since. Arnold also reads regarding the fugitive SS man that, “Due to shellshock, he is only able to whisper when he talks,” so he spends the rest of the film talking with a whisper. To his minor credit, Arnold has some good reason to suffer a persecution complex, as his uncle’s slutty post-MILF wife hatefully states to him, “you know I don’t like you.” When Arnold finally gets to speak with his uncle, he finds the old fat man, who is annoyed by his nephew’s incessant whispering, dining on an entire table of food that could easily feed an entire family. While the uncle is looking around for film reels to show to Arnold, the protagonist finds a revolver in a drawer and steals it. After the uncle finally finds the film reels, he shows his nephew footage of Gestapo-like Dutch cops in suave uniforms bombarding families and arresting large groups of young men. When Arnold gets home from his strange meeting with his uncle, he pretends to kill cops by pointing his new stolen revolver at photographs of police officers.

For the rest of the film, Arnold never leaves the apartment as he does not want to be seen as he truly believes he is the wanted Waffen-SS fugitive. Needless to say, Arnold’s bizarre behavior worries his sensitive girlfriend Anna, who is forced to buy groceries for her bat-shit crazy beau since he refuses to leave his flat. While out, Anna stops by a bar where she somberly watches an elderly couple, including an old Jewish looking woman with two broke arms (!), slow-dancing, and also spots an old man violently slaughtering his wife with a butcher knife in a nearby window. Out of nowhere, a far-leftist protestor barges into the bar and carries out a one-man demonstration where he declares “it’s a good thing there’s police,” complains that there are “31, 492 homeless people,” and then runs out into the street where he is hilariously run over by a car instantly. While sitting outside of her parent’s home while looking tragically forlorn, Anna hears her pet parrot state, “Heil! Heil! Heil Hitler!,” which somewhat upsets the girl’s fairly bourgeois father (Ton Vos of the Dutch TV series Floris (1969) starring Rutger Hauer), so he tells his daughter that his friend Wester knows her boyfriend Arnold and can attest to the fact that he has always been a weirdo. As Anna’s father remarks, according to Wester, who was once her boyfriend’s teacher, Arnold “had already been a strange boy at school. Shy of people...and didn’t hang out with anybody.” After revealing to Anna that Arnold was never in the Waffen-SS, her father also describes how his friend Wester was in the same army unit as Arnold and the boy apparently never recovered from the experience of the Second World War. Indeed, as Anna’s father states regarding the pathetic failure of the Dutch army, “The fact is, they had to beat it before they had seen one German...It got to Arnold so hard, he took blame for all the crimes committed by the SS.”

When Anna gets back to Arnold’s apartment, he accuses her of being involved in a conspiracy against him and screwing his much hated elderly landlord, absurdly stating, “I can always smell it when you have been with him.” Needless to say, Anna gets fed up with Arnold’s schizophrenic bizarre, hits him in the face with a bouquet of flowers, and tells him he is not an SS man and that he needs to see a doctor. While snooping around her boyfriend's apartment, Anna eventually finds the newspaper article that Arnold told her about regarding the Waffen-SS man, but the picture looks nothing like her beau. Despite the fact that Anna seems extremely afraid of her boyfriend and Arnold seems a tad bit too schizophrenically paranoid to be intimate with another person, the two end up making passionate love for the first and last time in the film. Unfortunately, carnal pleasure does nothing to calm Arnold's deleterious paranoia and pathological nervousness and the loony lad soon locks Anna, who is completely naked, in a room where she routinely cries for him to let her out, but he never does. When Arnold's landlord and a cop show up to evict the antihero from the apartment, he reacts rather drastically by shooting both of the men in a disturbingly calm fashion. Of course, Anna cries when she hears the gunshots, so Arnold shoots her too. After his fairly calmly executed murder spree, Arnold commits suicide by jumping out of his window.

PARANOIA

As Paranoia lead Kees van Eyck stated regarding director Adriaan Dittvoorst in the documentary The Dittvoorst Domains: "Adriaan was strongly anti-establishment. He rebelled against everything organized or official. The church, bureaucracy, government. He strongly opposed it all. Not with political theories. It was more of an emotional matter." Indeed, Dittvoorst's directorial debut features none of the sort of groveling to far-left ideologies that were especially popular among European arthouse directors of that zeitgeist, thus demonstrating that the auteur was one of the very few true wholly subversive, anarchistic, and individualistic filmmakers of his time. As French actor/writer Michel Delahaye—a fellow who, like his comrades of the French New Wave, got his start in film writing for Les Cahiers du Cinéma—states in The Dittvoorst Domains regarding the difference between Dittvoorst and his commie frog comrades: "Dittvoorst's PARANOIA, like LES CAHIERS, displays fascination with destruction. A fascination with destruction and submission, as was the trend then. At that time, the trend was Marxist-Leninism where individuality doesn't count. We submitted totally. LES CAHIERS surrendered to the enemy. We collaborated with the enemy."

Notably, in terms of themes and aesthetics, Dittvoorst's first feature most closely resembles the once-banned Italian avant-garde work A mosca cieca (1966) aka The Blind Fly aka Ricordati di Haron directed by avant-gardist turned exploitation auteur Romano Scavolini, which was lauded by none other than Guido futurist/fascist poet Giuseppe Ungaretti. Like Paranoia, A Blind Fly is a gritty black-and-white work featuring erratic editing and a virtually nonexistent plot that centers around a morbidly melancholy young man of the mentally degenerate sort who has a dubious relationship with his loving girlfriend and who steals a handgun which he plays around with in a masturbatory fashion before going on a senseless murder spree. As the grandson of a Dutch resistance fighter who seemed destroyed by the Second World War and who had cousins in the Dutch Waffen-SS, I found Ditvoorst's film particularly provocative, as it made me experience a sort of tragicomedic déjà vu based on fantasies I have had regarding the wartime experiences of my ancestors from the Netherlands. As Paranoia female lead Pamela Koevoets remarked regarding the film and its relevance to her and Ditvoorst's generation: "Our generation still lives in the shadow of the last World War. Our parents were silent. We had to stake new claims in the world. Build a new society, create new conventions. Our generation had to do so much. We were cut loose, as though born from a black hole. You had to find your own way." Judging by Paranoia and the rest of Ditvoorst's dark and doomful life and oeuvre, it seems that the auteur never managed to find his way out of the black hole.

-Ty E

THE BLIND PHOTOGRAPHER
THE BLIND PHOTOGRAPHER

Adriaan Ditvoorst (1973)

Like many Dutch 'war children' who grew up knowing hunger, defeat, and occupation by various foreign entities including the krauts and yanks, auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst (Flanagan, De Witte Waan aka White Madness) was a great fan of writer Willem Frederik Hermans and even adapted one of his stories for his debut feature Paranoia (1967), but when the writer came on the set of the film and began interfering with things, the two great creative egos naturally collided, so it seemed more than a little bit dubious that the two Dutchmen would ever collaborate together again. Luckily, a certain arrogant scheming producer named Rob du Mee was committed to making a W.F. Hermans celluloid triptych and he felt that Ditvoorst was the only right man for the job since they had both worked together on Paranoia which, although a pathetic commercial failure, proved the auteur had a certain uncompromising vision that complimented the novelist's distinctly dark and nihilistic post-WWII Dutch worldview. At the strange 'medium-length' of just under 50-minutes and featuring a sort of distinct and almost 'Gothic' doom and gloom black-and-white film stock, De blinde fotograaf (1973) aka The Blind Photographer—a work based on the short story of the same name taken from the Hermans short story collection Een landingspoging op Newfoundland (1957) aka An Attemptive Landing on Newfoundland—seems like it was specially tailored to be an abject commercial failure as a paranoia-plagued piece of darkly mirthful existentialist eccentricity that falls somewhere between Franz Kafka and early David Lynch, albeit with a distinctly Dutch sort of terror-tinged absurdity. Both anti-media and anti-art-faggotry, Ditvoorst's strange little filmic freak show is like an episode of The Twilight Zone for nocturnal nihilists and autistic acidheads, as a work with its own singularly loony logic, distinctly deranged cinematic language, and delightfully unsettling atmosphere of the farcical yet equally foreboding sort. Created at a time when 'social realism,' cinéma vérité, and other forms of largely static and aesthetically sterile cinematic styles were vogue in Europe, The Blind Photographer is most certainly one of Ditvoorst's most perversely potent pieces of celluloid rebellion, or as his friend/collaborator Thom Hoffman—the star of the director's swansong and magnum opus De Witte waan (1984) aka White Madness—stated in his documentary De domeinen Ditvoorst (1992) aka The Ditvoorst Domains regarding the demented flick and its equally demented director: "Realism fared well in the cinema. Adriaan was instinctively drawn to the absurd, the Kafkaesque. Mystery. Surrealism. He said: 'I despise everything superficial. Certainly when it sneaks up on you.' Again he turned to Hermans, the chronicler of Dutch impotence." Indeed, Ditvoorst's film transforms the seemingly banal into the deranged, the everyday into the eccentric, and the pedestrian into the preposterous as a work that, in terms of tone and visuals, seems like it was seen by David Lynch when he was assembling Eraserhead (1977), as work that does for the ancient proletarian ghettos of Amsterdam what the American auteur's first feature did for the post-industrial rot of Philadelphia. The story of an ass-licking yellow journalist who is assigned to cover a story about a visually impaired photographer of the somewhat enigmatic sort whose creepily coddling parents have turned their home into a gigantic darkroom, The Blind Photographer is truly a work that transcends the line between humor and horror, as well as art and anti-art as a sort of absurdist Gothic parable with sometimes Expressionistic overtones.

Beginning simply enough with the mundane inter-title "A Day in the Life of a Reporter," The Blind Photographer soon introduces the super smug and obscenely arrogant anti-protagonist 'Journalist' (Gees Linnebank, who played a 'homosexual' in Paul Verhoeven's Spetters (1980) and had a small role in Dick Maas' Flodders 3 (1995)), who bitches upon waking up in the morning, "Damn it, I have to get up!" and then proceeds to complain to his half-asleep wife about not being able to find his cufflinks. Before leaving for work, the Journalist's wife tells him that her mother will be coming over for dinner sometime in the evening and then asks him when he will be home from work, but he claims to have no idea. Of course, little does the Journalist realize that he will never be coming home from work after being assigned to do some investigative reporting on a famous blind photographer that still lives with his parents in a pre-multicultural Amsterdam ghetto. While walking to work, the Journalist, who walks like a spastic chicken with his head bobbing in and out, bumps into a beautiful blonde and he does not even have enough courtesy to apologize to the delightful little dame, thus reflecting his generally repugnant character. When the protagonist finally arrives at work, his slob of a boss says "I found an article...The Blind Photographer" and recommends "We add someone else's picture. He won't notice anyway." After a strange and unsettling walk, the Journalist arrives at the Blind Photographer's house and is greeted by a somewhat unfriendly old man (Frans Vorstman of Fons Rademakers' De aanslag (1986) aka The Assault and Alex van Warmerdam's De jurk (1986) aka The Dress) who tells him that he is the boy's father and then reluctantly invites him into his home. Unbeknownst to the scummy reporter, the Blind Photographer and his parent's know all the tricks of the trade when it comes to yellow journalism and he is about to get lost in a labyrinthine nightmare realm of no return.

Upon entering the Blind Photographer's home, the father asks what the Journalist wants to know and he replies like a true media whore, "Everything. Everything interests me. I'd like to have a chat with your son. The man behind the work, if you know what I mean," to which the patriarch strangely replies, "Talking to him is one thing, but seeing him is another. Why see him? He's blind. He can't see you. So, why should you see him? Something's wrong, Mr. Journo." When the Journalist absurdly argues that he would be willing to wear a blindfold to see their son, the Blind Photographer's mother (Elizabeth Hoytink, who also appeared in van Warmerdam's The Dress)—an initially seemingly introverted but ultimately exceedingly extroverted woman who hasn't said a word up until this point as she has been engaged in some hardcore knitting in a rocking chair—abruptly yells out of nowhere “Entrance fee is a buck,” so the protagonist hands over the money and the viewer is soon startled to hear the illusive eponymous character yell, “Well done, mother” in the background. After hearing the Blind Photographer, the Journalist asks if he is coming out and his father hilariously replies in a matter of fact fashion, “He's a photographer, you know. A photographer is in his dark room. That's where he feels good. That's why he is blind. You don't know much about life. Mr. Press Parasite” and the mother adds, “The paper's always full of bullshit.” Despite paying the entrance free, the parents are still reluctant to introduce the Journalist to their mysterious son and instead brag about their dark home, which they have more or less turned into a gigantic darkroom in tribute to their superstar son. After calling the journalist a “little newspaper brat” and belching in a fairly rude and raunchy fashion, the father tells the protagonist that he needs to purchase a lantern if he wants see their son since he lives in the darkness, even preposterously bragging regarding his family's lack of flashlights, “You can go buy one. We don't have one and we are proud of it.”

THE BLIND PHOTOGRAPHER

When the Journalist goes to a local bike shop under the Blind Photographer's father recommendation to buy a lantern, he discovers that they only have broken ones, with the shop owner arguing, “black light is sufficient when meeting a blind photographer,” so the protagonist thanks the proprietor for his “black light bullshit” and goes on his merry way to a local bar so he can contact someone at his work about getting a properly working flashlight. After bumping into an old fart with slicked back white hair passionately singing some exceedingly intolerable oldie song, the Journalist goes to use the telephone at the back of the bar and discovers a wayward young woman (Pamela Koevoets, who appeared in most of Ditvoorst's films) on the phone crying to her assumed lover, “so I won't see you again?” and then proceeding to mumble gibberish while succumbing to a total mental breakdown. Ultimately, the loony lovelorn lady covers her lips and face with lipstick in a sloppy fashion à la Blue Velvet (1986), wraps a scarf around her eyes as if she is a heartbroken fan-girl of the elusive Blind Photographer, and runs out of the bar where she bump into various walls and buildings. After calling someone at his work to tell them to bring him a lantern, the Journalist leaves the bar and is soon approached by an overtly salacious semi-butch prostitute with a dyke haircut and strange eye makeup who ultimately gives him a handjob for ten guilders. After having his pecker waxed by a sub-proletarian pussy-peddler, the Journalist goes into middle of the streets and laughs hysterically while looking fairly proud of the fact that he was just jerked-off by a dirty dame with dude hair. After receiving the lantern from a fat man who also buys some time with the streetwalker, the Journalist is now 'ready' to meet the Blind Photographer, though he has no clue what he is getting into.

After going back to the Blind Photographer's home, the Journalist must endure a number of sentimental stories from the eponymous character's highly hysterical mother. Indeed, as the mother states regarding her son while lying in bed like an elderly cripple, "Please don't think we locked him in permanently. In the past he did not even photograph. We used to go out. Together. I remember going to De Rijp. Taking the bus. Happily next to each other. He wore binoculars." The mother also brags that her son used to wear "normal glasses...special glasses, made by a professor. Real blind people's glasses" and "People thought he could see very well. That nothing was wrong with him," which causes the Journalist to laugh hysterically in a rather disrespectful fashion. The Mother also tells a seemingly fanciful story about how she saved up 15,000 coupons so that she could get her son a "free camera." When the mother gave her son the camera, apparently, "He photographed like a mad man. Each day we went out. He was so delighted. Sometimes a thumb before the lens, but happiness counted. Photography is expensive. A rich man's hobby. We didn't care. We would do anything to please him. Until the moment came, we told him: 'a real photographer belongs in a dark room.' Then we gave him that large back room. Dark as hell." When the mother hears her husband coming, she warns the Journalist that he must leave, so he makes his way to the Blind Photographer's 'darkroom' where he takes a seemingly endless hallway that resembles a dark abyss. When the Journalist trips over something and complains of losing his suitcase, the Blind Photographer (Dutch TV actor Roelant Radier) laughs maniacally and is finally revealed.

While the Journalist flashes his lantern in the blind man's face, the titular character states in a somewhat sinister fashion, "Everybody does what I tell them...And they don't regret it," as if bragging of the talent that some artists have in regard to coercing people into doing stupid and nonsensical things for their art. When the Blind Photographer asks the journalist how he found his way to his room, he replies, "I wonder myself. Straight ahead all the time, so to say." The Blind Photographer, who seems to suffer from Asperger syndrome, does not like the Journalist's answer, so he states "Straight lines don't exist" and then proceeds to deliver the following philosophical tangent: "A circle is the geometric place in which all points are at equal distance to a given point. The so-called center point. Every diameter ends at the center point on one end. Why talk of endless circles when there are no circles like that? And every diameter ends at the center point. Nobody will ever be able to point out the center of an endless circle. Then we would have to cut eternity in half...Which can only be done if times comes to a halt...But time doesn't stand still." After the Blind Photographer's longwinded rant, the Journalist remarks that he would like to hear about his work, so the eponymous character shows the reporter a gigantic lens and states, "I have this to thank for everything. A lens made by the famous Petzval. Ingenious object." Needless to say, the Blind Photographer acts offended when the Journalist is reluctant to write down his mathematical "optical calculations" for his story. Naturally, the Blind Photographer becomes even more offended when the Journalist remarks "I don't think my paper is interested. Your mother's story was beautiful. The mother figure is sacred. How can you expect me to write that it's all lies?" after he tells him that all of his mother's sentimental stories all complete fabrications. Indeed, the Journalist and Blind Photographer both have their own bullshit interpretations of reality as men that make a living off of fabricating false realities and perspectives, thus they naturally butt heads when in one another's company.

THE BLIND PHOTOGRAPHER

When the Blind Photographer asks the reporter, "What are you writing about? A mother or a blind photographer?" he replies "Perhaps about neither of them. I only write what my audience wants to read about. I don't care about who." Not surprisingly considering his profession as a blatant public novelty and absurd gimmick as a mensch who cannot see yet snaps photos for a living, the Blind Photographer also reveals that he was already famous before anyone had even seen his pictures, adding regarding his parents' supposed scheme to have him imprisoned in their home after he became a household name, "Suddenly it was a good idea to have the film developed...With all the double exposures...Afraid that I would ask for more, they decided to lock me up. I can't make any new pictures...[I] have to chew on old fame." According to the the Blind Photographer, he is a perennial prisoner in his own home and his parents do not even have the decency to buy him new film stock. On top of that, apparently to save the money, the Blind Photographer's father merely reloaded his son's camera with the same film over and over again, thus created warped double exposed photographs. When the Journalist asks the Blind Photographer how he knows that his father did this since, after all, he cannot see, the titular character gets rather offended, gets out of his chair, and says to the reporter while approaching him in a menacing and almost vampire-like fashion, "You think I'm blind as a bat? How I found out...I saw it! It's not that I can't see. It's that I cannot look. You're a big crook like I am...And an asshole too! You think I didn't see it." From there, the Blind Photographer flashes the lantern light in the Journalist's face and begins choking him. While the Journalist laughs hysterically while being choked to death, the Blind Photographer is revealed to have ominous and particularly penetrating completely white pupil-less eyes that radiate a certain sinister soullessness. As the Journalist dies while he is being strangled, his laughter wanes while transcendental neo-classical music plays in the background in what is ultimately an almost sinisterly sardonic climax to a sinisterly sardonic film. In the end, the Journalist is finally able to 'see the light' (or something).

In the documentary The Ditvoorst Domains, The Blind Photographer producer Rob du Mee states regarding auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst and his relation to the second Hermans adaptation they collaborated on, “He was a strange guy. He was a poser. Always withdrawing. This was often entertaining. Charming in a way. A con artist. But that’s film.” Apparently, Ditvoorst acted a lot like the eponymous character of his film while directing the work, with du Mee also remarking in the doc regarding the director, “The more bizarre it was, the more he started to giggle. He would really get a kick out of that.” Not surprisingly, du Mee never got to finish his planned W.F. Hermans trilogy, as he and Ditvoorst never collaborated together on another film again. Interestingly and almost somewhat unbelievably, The Blind Photographer was shot by none other than world-class Dutch cinematographer Jan de Bonet who also shot Paul Verhoeven’s classic arthouse (anti)romance Turks fruit (1973) aka Turkish Delight—a work that is not only considered the most successful Dutch film of all time, but also received the award for ‘Best Dutch Film of the Century’ in 1999 at the Netherlands Film Festival—the same year. It is kind of hard for me to wrap my head around the fact that the same man that did the cinematography for Ditvoorst’s The Blind Photographer would also go on to shoot Hollywood blockbusters like Die Hard (1988), The Hunt for Red October (1990), and Basic Instinct (1992), but that just goes to show the kind of serious whoring a European artist has to do if they want to be in anyway monetarily successful in this Americanized day and age. Of course, this also explains why Ditvoorst—a filmmaker that is well known for hating producers and not caring about what audiences thought of his work—only directed a mere ten films (including his shorts) during his nearly twenty year filmmaking career despite the fact he originally intended to direct 3,000(!).

As the grandson of a blind woman, I found The Blind Photographer to be an especially idiosyncratic experience that straddled a strange line somewhere between absurdist surrealism and horrifying hyperrealism. Indeed, on top of the titular character’s mother’s fanciful stories reminding me of my own grandmother’s fanciful stories, the Blind Photographer’s borderline ‘sixth sense’ gave me an eerie reminder of what it was like to be in the company of someone that is more than just a little bit visually impaired. Undoubtedly, it is somewhat of an awkward experience for a blind person to call you handsome or know that you’re are doing something that shouldn’t be as a child even though they cannot actually see you doing it. Of course, Ditvoorst’s film is more about the oftentimes overlapping con-artistry of both journalists and artists than the perennial darkness that the blind must endure. When it comes down to it, The Blind Photographer is a somewhat short and rather savagely sweet celluloid joke at the expense of not only both the journalist and artist, but the viewer as well. Indeed, unlike most serious avant-gardist, naughty nihilist Ditvoorst was fully willing to admit that there was a certain amount of preposterous pretentiousness and bullshitting that comes with being an artist. After all, what kind of cynical trickster makes a film about a blind photographer?!

THE BLIND PHOTOGRAPHER

-Ty E

LOLITA

Adrian Lyne (1997)

Adrian Lyne's adaptation of Lolita is more "revealing" than Kubrick's film. Don't expect to see much from Lolita (though she bares some skin). Super pervert Clare Quilty exposes his horrible floppy cock in an unflattering drunken stupor (while attempting to escape execution). Lyne's version of the novel stays truer to its source material than Kubrick's ultra tame 1962 version. I felt that Lyne's version was more of an anti-Kubrick film. I respect screenwriter Steven Schiff and director Adrian Lyne's attempt at being original. Jeremy Irons pulls off an Anglo pedophile in a completely natural manner. Irons' effeminate nature has always worked to his advantage when playing sexual deviants (I.e. David Cronenberg's Dead Ringers). His role as Humbert Humbert in Lolita is "fitting" to say the least. I found disgust in his ability to masquerade as a man of high manners while concealing the soul of a conspiratorial coward. Young Lolita (played by the talented Dominique Swain) sees through Humbert as clearly as Humbert would like to see through her dress. Unlike Kubrick's version of Lolita, the character of Clare Quilty has a much more minor role. Lyne's version of the film primarily focuses on Humbert Humbert and the pathetic infatuated state that guides his life into hopelessness. Stanley Kubrick seemed more focused on Clare Quilty because he no doubt wanted to give Peter Sellers more screen time. Chameleon Sellers would have never accepted such a minor role (when comparing to the novel and remake). Lyne's version of Lolita is a worthy update of the novel. I found more intensity in his version than Kubrick's version (and I generally believe less is more). Adrian Lyne has proven that he has the ability to make the most odd of situations erotic (I.e. Jacob's Ladder). Although I still enjoy Kubrick's version, it is somewhat dated and lagging. I am a product of the degenerate age. Lyne's Lolita is worthy of being considered one of the best contemporary erotic films.

-Ty E

GRIM
GRIM

Adrian Santiago (2010)

By now you should be acquainted with Troma, that oh-so exquisite branch of shameless horror that recycles footage and plasters DVD releases with painful introductions with fart-dubs and self-appointed scream queens. Grim is a recent film picked up for distribution by Troma, which more-or-less means that director Adrian Santiago gave the rights to his film away for a very small amount of cash, if any at all. Now, Grim falls alongside many of the classic exploitation films for a simple reason; the exaggerative marketing ploy. Branded across the back of the case, in big, bold letters, reads "The Most F*cked Up Film of the Year", a quote in which no person admits stating. We've all seen this used before but to a similar comedic effect, whether it be Banned in 492 Countries! atop the Isle of the Damned poster or the better known Cannibal Ferox purportedly banned in 31 countries. This path of methodical marketing works wonders, especially if the film actually contains a fraction of what it reports. Sadly, Santiago's Grim offers nothing apart from character impotence and a hack-job attempt at recreating Mexican uprising ala Machete.

Grim opens up with a shoddy pick-up truck speeding down a long, lonely desert road in Texas. In the bed cowers a family with gun sights aimed down upon them. For reasons unclear at first, the parents are brutally executed and the boy is left with a nasty pipe wound on his forehead. Found by an ex-lawman, Nicolas Grim is raised a proper boy. Or so we're left to assume because Grim has a nasty habit of skipping large chunks of time and then hides behind an alleged dystopian atmosphere hinted at through contrived pieces of dialogue. Once Grim is of age he reflects the murderous compassion held by his parents killers when they return to take the lives of his adopted guardians. Grim soon discovers that the militia held responsible for such savagery is a rogue union known as the United American Brigade. From here Grim escalates into third-rate slaughter in the terrible form of digital video. Santiago's priorities should be ashamed, all talk and no aesthetic. Not once does Grim resemble a project higher in class or charm than a student film. Simple scenes of gunshot wounds are turned into a fallacy all its own when 2 foot long streams of tomato soup blow out the back like a renegade squib. Not to mention the daft production in which a simple set piece of obstinate musing falls victim to relentless set echo.

Classy...

When you tally what Grim would hope to achieve and contrast it to its successes, this would be the point at which you'd look down to discover an empty looseleaf page. Grim is stubborn filmmaking at its worst. Juggling through comedy, mexploitation, thriller, and post-USA, you begin to realize that all of these classifications are simply too good for Grim. Whatever Santiago had in mind for Grim withered before the film could even take off into the ignorant land of postmodern exploitation garbage it hoped to populate. I can safely refute the existence of aspiration in Adrian Santiago's future career in film. If he hopes to achieve anything in the business of horror at all he must set aside his atrocious digital dreams and rework his childish ideologies on a better format. Doomed economy or not, Grim is convicted for a litany of transgressions - crimes against cinema. The likes of which I could never forgive. What's more is that Grim manages to be unspeakably boring. Don't take my word for it, simply pick up a copy for yourself @TLACULT and attempt to muster appreciation for Grim's diseased cause. Unless, of course, you happen to be a purebred film masochist. Positively speaking, Troma is getting quite skilled at masking their products under beautiful cover art. I've always had an aesthetic fascination with art & marketing and that is about all that can be said for Grim.

-mAQ

EUROPA EUROPA
EUROPA EUROPA

Agnieszka Holland* (1990)

Europa has easily produced the greatest of World War II films. This is no surprise as unlike the average American, most Europeans suffered the horrors of war firsthand. Whether it be occupied Holland or war torn Poland, the average European most likely suffered in one way or another. ½ Jewish Polish filmmaker Agnieszka Holland's Europa Europa is one of the many masterpiece World War II films to come out of Europe. Europa Europa follows the bizarre true story of Solomon Perel, a Jew boy who pretended to be an Aryan and fought for Germany in the second World War. Solomon Perel is not the only Jew to have fought for Hitler in the second World War. It is estimated that around 150,000 men of Jewish descent fought in the German Army during World War II. Bryan Mark Rigg's book Hitler's Jewish Soldiers does a great job documenting this publicly unknown and neglected part of history. Solomon Perel was different from many of the Jews that fought for Hitler in World War II in that he was a full practicing Jew that had to hide his identity. His biggest problem with hiding his identity was trying to hide his circumcised penis from his Aryan comrades in Hitler's youth. Despite their obvious anti-Semitism, Solomon Perel seems to sympathize with the Nazis in Europa Europa. He has seen the slaughtered bodies of ethnic Germans killed by Bolshevik death squads and has grown a certain empathy for his biological enemies. They have accepted him as a fellow Aryan and he is proud of it. I found that the perspective of Solomon Perel to be one of the most original and interesting perspectives in a World War II film. Not only does Perel fight for the German Army and train with Hitler's youth, but he also stays at a Soviet orphanage. From Perel's perspective, the viewer gets to see both extremes of the political groups that were competing to takeover Europe. Solomon Perel seems to sympathize with the Nazis more than the communists. Europa Europa director Agnieszka Holland offers some creative directing in the film that should be noted. I especially like a dream sequence featuring a dance between Joseph Stalin and Adolf Hitler. These were the two men that were responsible for the tearing apart of Poland during World War II and Holland couldn't have come up with more a ironic dream moment. It feels as if Europa Europa has two authors, Agnieszka as the imaginative director and Solomon Perel with the driving true life story. Agnieszka also couldn't help but get Europa Europa star Marco Hofschneider nude every chance she got. Europa Europa is a dreamlike World War II odyssey that I have no problem coming back to at least once a year. Steven Spielberg should have taken notice of Europa Europa instead of ripping off old Hollywood studio films like The Longest Day. When I watched Europa Europa, I felt that Agnieszka Holland really cared about her subject and the complicated circumstances surrounding him. When I watch a film like Saving Private Ryan directed by Spielberg, it feels like a film directed by a petty anti-German propagandišt. Europa Europa is a film for anyone that loves good cinema.

-Ty E

TOTAL ECLIPSE
TOTAL ECLIPSE

Agnieszka Holland* (1995)

Arthur Rimbaud was the greatest and most revolutionary poet of his time in part because unlike most artists, he was not a member of the bourgeois class. As the degenerate French philosopher Foucault once mentioned, Rimbaud's mother came from the peasant class and eagerly wanted to become part of the bourgeois. She constantly treated Rimbaud as a potential criminal, instilling a sense of guilt in the young poet that would no doubt have an influence on the decadent poet's prose. Rimbaud felt that he was "exempt from all morality" and lived a short life of wandering decadence. In the film Total Eclipse directed by Agnieszka Holland, the most creative period of Rimbaud's life is chronicled as well his eventual downfall after struggling with a form of cancer that resulted in the amputation of his leg. Despite his highly influential and revolutionary contribution to the art of poetry, Arthur Rimbaud completely quit writing by the age of 21 and died at the young age of 37. Surely not a long life, but his artistic contributions to the world can be matched by very few.

I had some reservations when I found out Leonard DiCaprio played the role of Arthur Rimbaud in Total Eclipse. Of course, DiCaprio did a fine and believable job playing a energetic retard in What's Eating Gilbert Grape? Unfortunately for Leo, his reputation is largely based (or at least was) on the awakening sexuality of prepubescent girls and less based on his actual talent as a serious actor. After watching Total Eclipse, it is quite apparent DiCaprio was the right man for the job in regards to playing Rimbaud. Despite being part of a decadent artistic circle, Rimbaud was known for even offending his fellow poets and artists. In Total Eclipse, Rimbaud states of a group of fellow French poets that they are "more bourgeois than the bourgeois" and he was right. Where he differed from his contemporaries is that he saw no limits and no boundaries, hence why he broke new ground in poetry. In Total Eclipse, Leonardo DiCaprio is quite young and even more of a smart ass. In fact, throughout the film, DiCaprio's character becomes rather annoying, displaying a certain hostile and improperly channeled form of energy that was only best expressed in Rimbaud's poetry.

The main plot behind Total Eclipse is Arthur Rimbaud's relationship with the older poet Paul Verlaine. Despite being much older than Rimbaud, Verlaine is a weaker poet and man. In fact, Verlaine is such a weak man that he allows Rimbaud to ruin his family and marriage, on top of being sodomized by the younger poet. It is clear from the start of Total Eclipse that the artistically superior teenage Rimbaud uses Verlaine for his money which allows the two men to travel the world together. The very ugly Paul Verlaine (played without shame by David Thewlis) is obviously in love with the young Arthur Rimbaud. Rimbaud never returns the love, but instead taunts Verlaine for his mediocrity and ugliness, eventually driving him to the verge of insanity and even attempted murder. The greatest gifts Rimbaud gave to the world were with his hands so it was quite fitting that the drunk Paul Verlaine would shoot him in one of those poetic hands. The chemistry between DiCaprio and Thewlis during these various dramatic and sometimes brutal scenes is certainly powerful to say the least, making one feel the urge to take a break from the film various times to emotionally collect oneself. It is sad to think that DiCaprio had more chemistry with David Thewlis than he did with Kate Winslet in Titanic but I guess that is the magic of the movies.

In a letter to a friend, Rimbaud once stated, "I am condemned; have always been, forever." That single sentence briefly tells the autobiography of the decadent poet's short life. The older poet Paul Verlaine would never truly win over his young friend, but at the conclusion of Total Eclipse he seems to come to terms with this by realizing he was probably the man who best understood and respected the work of Arthur Rimbaud. Seeing as Rimbaud's work was already superior to Verlaine's in his teenage years, his life would also eclipse that of his older friend, leaving the older man to die alone in a drunken stupor. During the conclusion of the film, Paul Verlaine sits pathetically at a bar drunk on absinthe imagining the young Arthur Rimbaud sitting in front of him. Rimbaud's early death was only appropriate for no one could ever keep up with him but he was also marked as the first to go, surely the tragedy of a great poet.

-Ty E

THE SEA
THE SEA

Agustí Villaronga° (2000)

Although his first feature Tras el cristal (1987) aka In a Glass Cage is his most idiosyncratically and artistically stylized and thematically terrorizing, Agustí Villaronga's sixth film El Mar (2000) aka The Sea – based on a novel of the same named by Blai Bonet – is assuredly the Spanish auteur filmmaker's most emotionally grating and draining, yet startlingly spiritual work as a sort of wicked fantasy/nefarious nightmare of the Spanish auteur come to life in celluloid form. Indubitably, the unofficial master of stark sadomasochistic coming-of-age films – the strikingly sordid sort that no impressionable children see lest they turn out like the emotionally broken children of the Spanish filmmaker's cinematic works – Villaronga opens El Mar with the introduction of five decisively damned grade school children who shed their innocence long before they can reach puberty or drive a car as they become secondary victims of the fratricidal terror and trauma of the Spanish Civil war. During the summer of 1936, the violence of the war finally hits a tiny village in Mallorca in a way that will touch the children for the remainder of their ill-fated lives. After four of the children – boys Andreu Ramallo, Manuel Tur, Pau Inglada and a girl Francisca – witness the execution of leftist revolutionaries by pro-Franco partisans, they decide to take revenge against Julià Ballester; the young son of one of the Nationalist executioners. Pau is especially possessed by a commanding sense of street justice as his father was one of the men that was executed, thus his personal vendetta against Julià runs blood deep and is of a wholly visceral and innately irrational nature. Originally planning to torture boy jerk-off Julià by forcing him to drink ungodly amounts of castor oil, things take a turn for the worst when the arrogant son-of-a-bitch mocks the fervent and fuming fatherless boy. Instead of merely lubing Julià's vile vocal chords, Pau brutally bashes his archenemy's brains against a boulder and mercilessly finishes him off by stabbing him repeatedly in the throat in a most malicious and ultimately murderous manner. Totally unable to psychologically deal with what he has done at such a young age, poor Paul commits self-slaughter by jumping to his prepubescent death via a deep hole in the cave. Although Julià and Pau have perished into eternity, three collateral victims of war remain – Andreu Ramallo, Manuel Tur, and Francisca – all of whom deal with the tragedy in different, albeit similarly radical, ways.

Over a decade later, the three victims are brought together by happenstance which eventually results in the most unhappy and unfading of consequences, at least for the two males Ramallo and Manuel Tur. In the early stage of tuberculosis, Ramallo (Roger Casamayor) – now a cocky and cryptically-cock-sucking fellow – goes to a sanatorium in Mallorca to recuperate during the early stages of TB, thereupon randomly running into Manuel (David Lozano) and Francisca (Victoria Verger) who have already reunited through faith and circumstances.

Clearly internally scarred by the events that transpired over a decade ago, Manuel is now pathologically obsessed with Catholicism, which he uses to keep his latent homosexual tendencies in check. Although no longer with her hymen intact, Francisca is even more fanatical about Mother Mary and her virginal birth than Manuel, so much so that she has become a nun and helps nurse sick TB patients back to health, while also providing comfort to those unlucky patients on the verge of death. A victim of sin and sodomy, Ramallo receives unwanted visits from ex-boss Don Eugeni Morel – a middle-aged molester and smuggler of contraband – who the young man previously relied on as a fiendish father-figure of sorts. Despite the very different but equally peculiar paths in life, it is quite apparent during The Sea that they are all still spiritually united by the events that transpired during that calamitous day of the Spanish Civil War. Their by chance meeting coupled with themes of engulfing Catholic guilt make The Sea seem like the threesomes' reunion was foreordained by sinister forces, especially when one considers the exceedingly grim yet fitting end of the film that parallels what happened to the children during their childhood years. In a sense, both Ramallo and Manuel Tur would go on to face a fate more deplorable and vexing than that of Julià and Pau because at least their suffering was only short-lived. Charming and charismatic yet ultimately mentally unstable due to the two deaths he witnessed as a child and the sexual abuse he experienced thereafter, Ramallo brutally beats Manuel's cat an inch away from death. Being a man of unflinching faith, Manuel uses the dying animal as the opportunity to reconcile with his childhood friend. Forcing Ramallo to put the nearly dead feline out of its misery, Manuel and his belligerent boyhood friend both bury the cat in a symbolic gesture that temporarily restores their friendship, but the scars and sins sown in childhood henceforth prove to run too deep. Eventually, Ramallo goes on a rampage of slaying and forced sodomy that proves to be even too powerful for marvelous Manuel's holy miracle of self-induced stigmata. In the end, only Francisca – a modern day Mother Mary figure not unlike Amanda Krueger of A Nightmare on Elm Street 3: Dream Warriors (1987) – has transcended the wages of fear, fury, and fatality.

Incidentally, director Agustí Villaronga's father was a child during the Spanish Civil War, so one can speculate that these events had a penetrating, if terribly traumatizing, effect on his son as expressed in films like The Sea and his most critically and financially successful work Pa negre (2010) aka Black Bread; both of which were filmed in the Catalan language and set during the civil war between 1936-1939. Although sleekly stylized and decidedly thrilling and chilling, The Sea is essentially a work of aesthetically keen kitsch of the sleazy yet sophisticated soap opera sort, especially when compared to Villaronga's greatest aesthetic achievement In a Glass Cage – an audaciously atypical arthouse horror flick that earned him the Manfred Salzberg Award at the Berlin film festival – and the sordid cinematic storytelling of Black Bread; the film that would earn the Spanish auteur thirteen Gaudí Awards and nine Goya Awards, including best film, best director and best adapted screenplay, as well as a nomination for Best Foreign Language Film at the 84th Academy Awards (making it the first Catalan-language film be nominated for the prestigious award). Although I doubt it was Villaronga's intention, The Sea shares a similar 'dream logic' in a manner that would predominate the director's second feature-length work El niño de la luna (1989) aka Moon Child; a wonderful fantasy flick that would prove to be the filmmaker's least sombre and sinister cinematic effort. Make no mistake about it, The Sea is a pure and unadulterated Agustí Villaronga auteur piece, hence why the film oftentimes feels like a softcore sadomasochistic porn flick of the guilt-ridden and consciously Catholic sort, but an uncompromising and courageous one nonetheless. That being said, if Pedro Almodóvar (Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown, The Skin I Live In) is the Spanish queen of camp cinema, Villaronga is surely the Catalan prince of pernicious coming-of-age carnage. If you're a naive novice to the foreboding films of Agustí Villaronga, The Sea surely makes for an unsettling and unforgettable introduction to the Spanish filmmaker's taboo-taunting themes and oftentimes afflicting yet abnormally attractive aesthetic.

THE SEA

-Ty E

IN A GLASS CAGE

Agustí Villaronga° (1987)

A number of years ago, I made a valiant attempt to hunt down and see every sexually perverse Nazi-themed arthouse film ever created in post-WWII Europe. Naturally, I viewed and savored Luchino Visconti's The Damned (1969), Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974), and Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), but none of these films compared to the antipodal aesthetically-pleasing unsightliness, thematic depravity, and overall solemn gloominess of the Spanish film In a Glass Cage (1987) aka Tras el cristal directed by Balearic auteur Agustí Villaronga (Moon Child, Black Bread). Without a doubt, Villaronga is the greatest director of stark and ruthless coming-of-age films, but none of his subsequent works quite compare to the grim, emotionally-draining and uniquely uncompromising nature of his directorial debut In a Glass Cage; a work that John Waters – the Baltimorean auteur who once directed a pot-addled and unflatteringly overweight drag queen eating steaming dog feces – once described as, “a great film, but I’m scared to show it to my friends.” In a Glass Cage focuses on a pedophilic ex-Nazi doctor named Klaus (Günter Meisner) who is permanently constrained to an archaic iron lung (the ‘glass cage’) due to being paralyzed after a botched suicide attempt. Upon a superficial glance, Klaus – a robust and impeccably dressed family man with a wife and a daughter – seems quite bourgeois, but underneath his clean exterior lies a soul modeled after infamous child murderer Gilles de Rais heart. In fact, Villaronga was partly inspired to create In a Glass Cage after reading Georges Batailles’ book on the Breton knight leader and companion-in-arms of Joan of Arc turned prolific serial killer. Instead of setting the film during the Hundred Years’ War, Villaronga decided to study Nazi concentration camp experiments on child, which inevitably inspired the script for In a Glass Cage; a work that makes Spielberg’s Schindler’s List (1993) seem like a mundane melodramatic television mini-series on monetary-steroids. Despite being easily one of the most emotionally grueling and unsettling films ever made, Villaronga’s film features less nudity and violence than Spielberg’s artless and overly sentimental zio-ganda epic, thus, unlike The Damned and The Night Porter, one can hardly make the argument that In a Glass Cage is a work of exploitation masquerading as art. Needless to say, do not watch In a Glass Cage if you’re looking to gratify a fetishistic compulsion for images of gratuitous torture or hoping to find a kinky masturbation aid, as you will be certainly disappointed, unless you happen to be someone like Albert Fish or Victor Salva.

Ultimately, In a Glass Cage is a tale about the vicious circle of abuse where the victim become victimizer; a relatively common and unfortunate occurrence that few people want to recognize. Klaus has had many victims over the years but few probably compare to Angelo (David Suñé); a seemingly angelic boy who shows up to the ex-Nazi doctor's house anonymously as an adult to volunteer as a nurse. Immediately upon arriving at the pedo's pigpen, Klaus' neurotic wife Griselda (María Paredes) treats Angelo as a contemptible nuisance with dubious motives. Indeed, grizzly Griselda – a less than delightful lady whose ever-present resentment seems to be the result of extreme sexual repression – is correct when it comes to her female intuition, but little does she know that Angelo plans to become the new man of the house and he is not looking for a nagging wife. Out of all those living at the house, Klaus' daughter Rena (Gisèle Echevarría) – being a highly impressionable prepubescent girl with a rather pathetic, physically immobile and suicidal father – is most impressed with Angelo and his intriguing, haunting aura. After the Second World War, Klaus went into exile with his family in Catalonia, Spain and continued to molest and murder young boys; an aberrant addiction he must have had an overwhelming guilty conscious about, hence his bungled attempt at self-slaughter via jumping off a tower. Sometime before attempting suicide, Klaus sexually tortured and eventually murdered a young boy with a mere blow to the head, which was witnessed by adolescent Angelo; another victim of the good doctor who escaped from and stole the pathologically perverse pedophiles incriminating diaries and torture photographs. Clearly physically (as signified by a scar over his eyebrow) and emotionally scarred by the odious ordeal of his childhood, Angelo – who is incontestably now more mentally deranged than Klaus – begins bringing young boys to Klaus' haus and murdering them before his very weary eyes while reading fiendish excerpts from the stolen experiment diaries, thus both ironically horrifying and further compounding the irrevocable guilt of the stiff Nazi doc in the process. As his already fragile sanity wanes and his coldblooded ruthlessness becomes more pronounced, Angelo's appearance changes dramatically as he goes from looking positively pusillanimous and wearing drab clothing to looking like some sort of stoic New Wave Nazi chic dictator. Of course, with Griselda gone and with Rena under his spell, Angelo is now indeed the Führer of the house and he celebrates by interior decorating the place in a strikingly complimentary fashion; adorning the now almost-phantasmagorical abode with tons of barbed wire and gloomy blue wallpaper, henceforth making it seem like an extravagant post-apocalyptic art deco concentration camp for deathrockers. It is quite apparent as In a Glass Cage progresses that Angelo is in the midst of completing his metamorphosis from petrified child to prudent perpetrator. In the end, Angelo's self-prophesying future looks bleak, but he has an accidental protege of sorts to take his place.

IN A GLASS CAGE

Not unsurprisingly but certainly unfortunately, In a Glass Cage has been often compared to Apt Pupil (1998) directed by Bryan Singer and based on a novella by Stephen King, yet unlike its predecessor, the propagandistic Hollywood film is not the least bit artful nor subtle. As an obscenely candid and unsentimental work of celluloid art, In a Glass Cage, like in deplorable crimes of similar nature in the real world, offers no sort of reconciliation, thus leaving the viewer with a paralyzing feeling of fretfulness that haunts one literally years thereafter. Despite its disconcerting persuasion, In a Glass Cage is also an aesthetically dynamic work that has aged most gracefully since it was released about ¼ a century ago. In short, there is no other film in existence that is quite like In a Glass Cage that has the ability to both dazzle and dishearten the filmgoer in a most penetrating and audaciously austere manner. It should be no surprise that In a Glass Cage, much like the considerably inferior American homosexual serial killer Frisk (1995) directed by Todd Verow, was met with ample animus when it was screened at various gay and lesbian film festivals upon its initial 1987 release. Thankfully, unlike Tom Kalin's Swoon (1992) – an American arthouse work based on the real-life thrill killing of a child by infamous rich gay Jewish homosexual lovers Leopold and Loeb – In a Glass Cage does not feature any sort of sociopolitical message, hence the controversy it stirred amongst certain overly prissy politically correct aberrosexuals. Considering its often hardboiled portrayals of child abuse and murder, In a Glass Cage is not a film I would recommend to real-life victims of similar craven crimes. In fact, although it has been nearly a decade since I first saw the film, I am still baffled that In a Glass Cage – a work that is like a cross between the dolorous stock-footage featured in the HBO documentary Paradise Lost: The Child Murders at Robin Hood Hills (1996) and the high camp of German New Wave auteur Werner Schroeter's Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King – even exists, yet it does as a brutal and beautiful work of cinematic bliss.

-Ty E

HOT ROD
HOT ROD

Akiva Schaffer* (2007)

I've said it before and I'll say it again; I hate reviewing comedies. As long as there's free will, tastes will change and vary from anothers. I might bring about a point of a certain joke revolving around the heydays of slapstick comedy and one might snap back with a comment putting Apatow on a pedestal. So rather than expecting you to enjoy this comedy, I'm merely reiterating my thoughts on this film down on digital paper, more so as a personal exorcism. This has been a long time coming. Hot Rod is the film created by the now famous Lonely Island trio of Akiva Schaffer, Andy Samberg, and Jorma Taccone. This group smashed into the mainstream with videos for both "Dick in a Box" and "Jizz in my Pants". As juvenile as these videos are, one can't help but to laugh. Hot Rod stars Andy Samberg as a struggling stunt man attempting to raise money for his step father's "conveniently priced surgery". Before you think this film has layers of sentiment, this is all so he can beat his step-father's ass without him dying. The subplot of Hot Rod is a dignified father/son machismo tournament where winner takes all. The weapons available are shurikens, dry wall, Rhodesian fighting sticks, ultimate punches, and Vietnam flashbacks. Hot Rod really is one of a kind. For scenes of clever and dry comedy, Hot Rod is the purveyor of such. Danny McBride churns out line after line, each presenting something new, quotable, and dead hilarious. Hot Rod, as a scene collective, is the greatest buddy comedy ever. Watch this with as many friends as you can as the experience is one to appreciate. When I saw this film in theaters, it was between this and Superbad. Knowing that Superbad was going to be trashy, foul, and uninspired, I decided to go for the underdog. Let me tell you, that decision is a glowing point in my life. During one wooded glen Footloose scene in particular, a fall occurs over an extended period of time and I've never laughed so hard in my entire meaningless existence. I was hunched over a stadium seat crying from violent fits of laughter. I wouldn't be surprised if I was retching.

Apart from this scene, so much more stands out. Brief improvisations such as "Pools are perfect for holding water, man..." or Rico's dream description in which he describes him dreaming about punching a thousand wizards as hard as he can in the face so they explode. He then goes into detail about how the wizard wives all come out wanting to have sex with him. Who writes this stuff? Give it time and Hot Rod will finally be realized as comedy gold. All great things realized over time eventually get their due. All these scenes don't even scratch the surface. The golden treat of this film is the retro soundtrack that passes vibes like Hurricane Katrina passes levees. Too soon? Reviewing comedies is like telling someone their opinion is wrong, which in some cases is necessary. You hate my comedies and I probably don't like yours. If there ever were a film to topple the quote king Anchorman, Hot Rod is that golden messiah, but with a cape and a stick-on mustache. With quiet hits like Space Olympics, Blizzard Man, and Jizz in my Pants, Andy Samberg is quickly becoming an honest comical figure. I'd much prefer his glorification than Seth Rogen making the same faces and starring in one-note films. Best of all? I never tire of Hot Rod. I could watch this film on repeat.

-mAQ

ZOO ZÉRO
ZOO ZÉRO

Alain Fleischer (1979)

When not feuding with fellow mixed-blood German Werner Herzog on their various classic film collaborations – simultaneously playing the role of actor and as the filmmaker’s own personal Rasputin – Polish-German actor Klaus Kinski appeared in a number of Euro-Sleaze exploitation and arthouse flicks, a good portion of which are forgotten and rightfully so, yet there a couple exceptions. Undoubtedly, the more irregular and incoherent the film, the more interesting Kinski’s performance tended to be as he always accentuated the already aberrant aura of the film. Personally, one of my favorite obscure Kinski flicks is the sorely neglected dystopian sci-fi arthouse flick Zoo zéro (1979) directed by unsung French auteur Alain Fleischer (Dehors-dedans, Rome Roméo), who would later (and somewhat ironically considering the nature of his previous works) have a relatively successful career in documentary filmmaking (Bernard Rapp’s Un siècle d’écrivains TV series, Morceaux de conversations series). In a typically typecast role, Kinski plays Yavé, a kinky megalomaniac who moonlights as a cabaret director at a post-apocalyptic night club/zoo. Undoubtedly a mental and verbal cripple, Yavé speaks through a vocoder, thus evoking the ambiance of a suavely dressed, Kraftwerk-esque fascist dictator as a result. Opening with a narrated passage regarding the Noah’s Ark myth from the Book of Genesis and other (and eventually inaudible) esoteric gibberish, Zoo zéro hereafter begins with images of a dim, destitute, and drizzly street of a futuristic French neo-noir metropolis (that more resembles a necropolis) featuring a dark cabaret club named “Noah’s Ark.” On this night at the curious club, an androgynous cabaret singer named Eva (played by Catherine Jourdan) with a neon-orange butch cut gives a performance that is like a cross between Marlene Dietrich’s in Josef von Sternberg’s The Blue Angel (1930) aka Der blaue Engel and Charlotte Rampling’s deranged topless performance of a Dietrich song for concentration camp guards in Liliana Cavani’s The Night Porter (1974). Emotionally detached and literally robotic in her movements, Eva attempts to drown her sorrows by drinking wine straight out of the bottle and watering plants in her dressing room as an effete negro friend looks on with the most gravest concern. A mysterious, mumbling fellow named Ivo comes to visit Eva and reminds of her less debauched days as a dignified singer of Mozart’s opera The Magic Flute in Salzburg, Austria but her wee midget manager “Uwe” (played by Pieral of the Cocteau-penned 1943 flick L’Éternel retour aka The Eternal Return and Buñuel final 1977 effort That Obscure Object of Desire) reminds her that the past is best left forgotten, especially when you’re questionable future is perpetually rotten.

Somewhat peculiarly but undoubtedly working in the film’s favor, Zoo zéro has a striking aesthetic resemblance to Ridley Scott’s Tech-noir masterpiece Blade Runner (1982) though more subdued, as do many of the lugubrious yet ex-pressionistic characters in the film, but contained within such a relentless realm of Weltschmerz-inspiring dreariness that I wouldn't be at all surprised if the British director's younger brother Tony watched this obscure French flick before jumping off the Vincent Thomas Bridge. Zoo zéro even concludes with a sort of "tears in the rain" sequence that anticipates the ending of Scott's classic Hollywood cyberpunk flick. Even more strangely, many of the indoor sequences with exotic zoo animals and soulless nihilistic erotic scenarios resemble and invoke a similar atmosphere to those featured in Tony Scott's comparably stylized yet more slapdash, postmodern deathrock-inspired vampire flick The Hunger (1983), but Zoo zéro – with its sparse dialogue, lack of sympathetic characters, and deep-seated discordant structure – is ultimately a much less accessible work that does more to capture the spiritually and culturally-cadaverous apocalyptic zeitgeist of post-industrial Europa as foreordained by the likes of Spengler and Evola as opposed to infatuation over a couple of ancient aristocratic supernatural degenerates. Zoo zéro also contains an infertile fictional forthcoming that makes the dystopian reality featured in Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971) seem relatively modern and even quite tame, so it should be no surprise the film concludes in a manner echoing the iconic opening of 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) and the ending of Planet of the Apes (1968), albeit with all the more forlornness and unsentimentality. Like Ludwig van Beethoven in A Clockwork Orange, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and his work The Magic Flute, one of German composer's most beloved achievements in his operatic repertoire, becomes a vague cultural remnant and a symbol of a moribund continent's lost glory and complete and utter collective devitalization, hence why the lead protagonist merely reworks tired and decayed cabaret acts from (presumably) over a century ago in a New Wave form.

It goes without saying that Klaus Kinski looks quite dapper as Yavé, le directeur du zoo, as if he is the direct progeny of decadent German horror author Hanns Heinz Ewers, but like most people in the city, his future is predestined to desperation as mother nature and her animals reclaim the world for themselves. In a vague sense, Zoo zéro features a glimmer of hope and prospect for rebirth, at least as far as the earth in its entirety is concerned. Humans, the most conscious and cancerous of God's creations, through their deluded self-worship and grandiose greed, have ushered in their own mass suicide so it is only fitting that Klaus Kinski would be directing an allegorical dirge for humanity's (and his own) funeral; a theme he would later return to in his last film and directorial debut Kinski Paganini (1989). Transcendental, nonlinear, and nightmarish in structure like the kindred obscure (but somewhat inferior) French surrealist horror flick Clash (1984) directed by Raphaël Delpard but especially reminiscent of the nearly immaculate post-apocalyptic French-Canadian sci-fi short The City Without Windows (2002) aka La dernière voix directed by Julien Fonfrede and Karim Hussain, the postmortem bluish blends of Agustí Villaronga's of In a Glass Cage (1987), as well as capturing the carnivalesque characters and wayfarer wandering essence of Walter Hill's The Warriors (1979) and Enzo G. Castellari 1990: The Bronx Warriors (1982), minus the mindless action and street gangs, Zoo zéro is a rare and wildly idiosyncratic (and consequently flawed) arthouse entry in the unofficial existential dystopian neo-noir subgenre. Probably in part due to its unwaveringly artiness and absurdness, as well as its staunch somberness, Zoo zéro – a demanding and dispiriting Delphian odyssey with a tolerable tinge of zoophilia that is bound to inspire profound ennui in the everyday filmgoer – has been plagued by obscurity since its release in 1979, but, I for one, can say that I am one of the film's greatest admirers.

ZOO ZÉRO

-Ty E

STRANGER BY THE LAKE

Alain Guiraudie° (2013)

Undoubtedly, unsimulated sex is a dubious gimmick that has been used by European arthouse directors, namely that of the ill-restrained yet pedantic French persuasion, for sometime now and has had some rather preposterous and strangely banal results as demonstrated by mostly worthless works like Virginie Despentes' Baise-moi (2000) aka Fuck Me, Michael Winterbottom's 9 Songs (2004), Carlos Reygadas' Battle in Heaven (2005) aka Batalla en el Cielo, and John Cameron Mitchell's Shortbus (2006), but recently I got quite a shock after viewing one such cum-covered work, L'Inconnu du lac (2013) aka Stranger by the Lake directed by French auteur Alain Guiraudie (No Rest for the Brave aka Pas de repos pour les braves, The King of Escape aka Le Roi de l'évasion), as it proved pornographic scenes can be utilized effectively in films if done in a passing and nuanced fashion that adds to the overall essence of a cinematic work. Although I am not familiar with any of auteur Guiraudie's previous celluloid efforts, I can safely say that Stranger by the Lake is nearly immaculate in its sometimes macabre minimalistic construction as a gut-wrenching work that manages to transfer the homicidal homo themes of William Friedkin's leather-fag slasher flick Cruising (1980) to a sunny and scenic frog lake. The gently paced story of a lapsed twink (or 'twunk') who begins cruising an almost otherworldly lake and eventually falls for a stoic yet unhinged Freddy Mercury-look-alike, only to soon learn that his best beau is a psychopathic murderer who killed his last lover, Stranger by the Lake is a strikingly charming psychosexual thriller of the semi-politically-incorrect sort that subtly highlights the impossibility of homosexual monogamy and how lust trumps love in a recklessly wanton world where depraved dudes seek their own little sunny Sodom in public. Originally intended to be a heterosexual film, Stranger by the Lake eventually evolved into a fag-themed flick after Guiraudie decided the original story did not work and that such a seemingly senseless tale would have been a grave mistake considering women do not typically go cruising for anonymous sex in public areas. As someone whose girlfriend somewhat recently took me to a local park to show the social epidemic of mostly redneck closeted homosexuals cruising around the area and audibly bugging in the bushes and disappearing in the woods, I found Stranger by the Lake to be an aesthetically misleading work of scenic sadomasochism that is quite comparable to a more recent Ulrich Seidl flick like Paradies: Liebe (2012) aka Paradise: Love, albeit with a more visceral and personalized soul (in fact, Guiraudie has cited it as a highly personal work) that does not make the copout mistake of detaching the viewer from the characters like so many European arthouse flicks tend to do. A Dogme 95-esque work (minus the shitty homevideo quality) that was shot by a mere 20 person crew (neither hairdressers nor makeup artists were used) and featuring no music (be it diegetic or non-diegetic) and only organic sounds (i.e. wind, water, etc.) that were shot on-location, The Stranger by the Lake demonstrates that, indeed, some modern day French filmmakers have souls, even if warped ones, hence why the work was named the No.1 film of 2013 by Cahiers du Cinéma.

STRANGER BY THE LAKE

Franck (Pierre de Ladonchamps) is a 30-something-year-old gay man that seems no more effeminate than the average heterosexual Frenchman (not that it says much) and he has just found his new favorite hideout in the form of an ethereal French lake with a rock beach surrounded by a forest where nudists and cruising cocksuckers wallow in less than sensationalistic exhibitionism amongst one another as if living on their own secluded poof planet. On his first day there, Franck watches men screw like wild animals in the woods, but more importantly, he meets a rather rotund gentleman named Henri (Patrick d'Assunção) who is old enough to be his father. An old overweight fellow who not even the most depraved of shit-stabbers would touch with a ten-foot condom-covered dildo, Henri is mostly a voyeur who apparently used to cruise men in the company of his wife, but she left him and he seems no longer bold enough to approach other men for carnal pleasure, which seems largely the result of his lack of esteem. A closet queen, Henri cannot wrap his head around the fact that Franck is an out-of-the-closet cocksucker who has nil interest in men. Indeed, there is certainly a wide and protruding generation gap between the two as old man Henri grew up at a time where homos got married and had kids, whereas Franck leads a self-indulgent life where he does not feel the need to hide his flagrant homosexuality. As Franck explains to Henri, it is "always the same story, I always like those that are not available" and his experience at the lake proves to be no different as he falls for a semi-masculine man with a mustache with the unfortunate name Michel (Christophe Paou) who has a jealous queen of a 'boyfriend' named Pascal (François-Renaud Labarthe). Luckily for Franck, Pascal is soon drowned in the lake one night, but the problem is that Michel was the man responsible for committing the unprovoked murder. Before long, a prying detective named Damroder (Jérôme Chappatte) begins hanging around the lake to investigate the murder and Franck, who has just started a strictly sexual relationship with Michel, ends up lying to the cops to protect his new boy toy. Indeed, Franck actually witnessed the murder of Pascal by maniac Michel in the lake from afar, but that does not stop him from getting hot and heavy with a homicidal homo. Naturally, Franck develops a passionate romance with Michel that includes backwoods bareback sex, but he will not agree to meet him anywhere aside from the isolated cruising spot. Being a perennial voyeur who never engages in sex with the other cruisers because, as he himself states, "I'm alone because no one comes," Henri has figured out everything regarding the murder and warns Franck, "In your shoes, I would be very scared," but his words fall on deaf ears as the romantic twink is totally unwilling to betray his lunatic lover, even if he cheats on him and allows some fat slob to suck him off. Eventually, Henri confronts Michel and lets him know that he is “not subtle” and that he knows he is the murderer. Seeming to have a death wish of sorts as a lonely man in love with the intangible (he confesses his love to Franck), Henri goes to the woods and looks back at Michel as if gesturing him to come kill him. And, indeed, Michel tears Henri apart and Franck finds his blood-soaked friend lying in a grass-covered ditch, dying. Franck runs further into the woods and Michel follows, even stabbing to death inspector Damroder on the way during a random forest run-in with the cop. While looking for Franck, Michel shouts about he only needs love and he even wants to spend the night with him. Despite everything, Franck eventually goes looking for Michel in the dark, but fails to elicit any response after routinely shouting his name. In an alternate ending to Stranger by the Lake that was filmed but not used in the film, Franck and Michel end up reuniting and driving away together in what is undoubtedly a deranged sort of happy ending.

Aside from the films of so-called New French Extremity auteur filmmakers Philippe Grandrieux (Sombre, La vie nouvelle aka A New Life, Un Lac), Gaspar Noé (I Stand Alone, Irréversible), Marina de Van (Dans ma peau aka In My Skin), and Bruno Dumont (Twentynine Palms, Camille Claudel 1915), Stranger by the Lake is one of the few contemporary frog films that has left any sort of impression on me in some time, thus demonstrating that, somewhat unfortunately, France is once again the dominant nation when it comes to true European national cinema. Undoubtedly, the genius of the film is that it is strikingly simplistic as a film set over an easy-to-follow ten-day period and set in a hermetic universe of self-destructive sexual deviance where the inhabitants have their own distinct language of gesture, thus making for a viscerally voyeuristic film where the viewer must interact with the characters whether they want to or not. Indeed, while featuring erect cocks ejaculating (the original 2 hour and 18 minute featured much more sex, but Alain Guiraudie thankfully opted for cutting much of it out) and incessant, unflattering nudity (including various scenes of a fat man named ‘Eric’ played by Mathieu Vervisch with a borderline micro-penis who passively masturbates while watching other men bugger), I would be hesitant to describe Stranger by the Lake as ‘queer cinema’ as it is a highly accessible work that transcends the best of reality TV and cinéma vérité in terms of transferring to the center of the aberrant action. While described by various reviewers as a ‘Hitchcockian thriller’ and whatnot, Stranger by the Lake is far too naturalistic, genuinely suffocating, anti-psychoanalytic (indeed, no quack Freudian symbolism and pop psychology here) to be compared to such innately contrived and fantasy-driven drivel. In short, Stranger by the Lake makes Hitchcock seem like a skilled theorist and artisan as opposed to an active artist with a penetrating artistic vision. An uncompromising yet slightly open-ended character study about the innately irrational behavior associated with love, sex, and death, Stranger by the Lake is one of a few somewhat recent films that I have seen that dares to tackle homosexuality head on without resorting to pathetic poof social critiques about how society hates sodomites, but instead depicts it as the height of human sadomasochism where even a scenic lakeside beach is no escape from the perennial paradox that is human nature where some men long for love just as much as death and where others simply prefer to act as harbingers of death yet still need love. If nothing else, Stranger by the Lake demonstrates that, to steal a truism from Fassbinder, love is colder than death. Forget aesthetically impotent sentimentalist faggot shit like Andrew Haigh's Weekend (2011), Alain Guiraudie managed to make a gay-themed film that can actually be enjoyed by people who do not feel the need to get involved in the cultural cold war against Russia and Putin sired by the heebz Hollywood and the gatekeepers of LGBT authoritarianism.

STRANGER BY THE LAKE

-Ty E

NIGHT AND FOG

Alain Resnais (1956)

Night and Fog is a French documentary directed by Alain Resnais. The documentary shows the concentration camps 10 years after their liberation in vibrant colors with the greenest of grass fields. Resnais then compares that footage to the older footage of the concentration camps and starved naked bodies sitting in piles. The old concentration camp footage is often scratched giving it even more of a chaotic feel. That being said, Night and Fog is undeniably a powerful documentary.

Night and Fog is narrated by a froggy voice in French that can easily put the viewer off. Instead of stating facts and statistics, the narration is full of existential garbage about the evils men do to other men. The narrator makes it seem as if all Europeans were victims of Nazi atrocities. The narrator must have forgot that at best 10% of French citizens were part of any resistance. The narrator also forgot about the French Waffen SS troops and the French Vichy collaborationist government.

Night and Fog would have been a much better and honest film had it presented atrocities from all sides of the world. For example, Dwight David Eisenhower had German POW's thrown into a muddy field with a heavily guarded fence around it where at least 750,000 died (some estimates 1.7 million killed). The French army took 630,000 German soldiers as "labor reparation" of which around 250,000 died. I don't think I even need to go into the atrocities of the Soviet Union. Like most documentaries on "the Holocaust", Night and Fog looks at history in an irrational and Bolshevik manner. The documentary also featured the Dutch internment camp Westerbork camp which was run completely by Jews (the guards were referred to as the "Jewish SS").

The "Jewish SS"

Of course, Night and Fog has some historical inaccuracies. The claims of making soap of Jewish bodies has long been discredited as have the stories of regarding skin lampshades. The scenes featuring these lies border on the comical. Night and Fog is best looked at as a piece of art and not a documentary. It features all the same holocaust footage and pictures that have been recycled again and again.

-Ty E

BABY BLOOD
BABY BLOOD

Alain Robak (1990)

Every so often, I need a break from the art house and avant-garde realm and feel the need to wallow in the sort of tasteless and morally retarded horror trash that caused me to develop cinephilia in the first place but I find most of such works absolutely intolerable nowadays and am quite discerning when it comes to what sort of celluloid trash I choose to devour. While the French have never exactly been masters of horror, I decided it was about time I give the oftentimes lauded, if not equally times hated, body horror flick Baby Blood (1990) aka The Evil Within directed by Alain Robak a watch due to its reputation as a rather raunchy and darkly mirthful piece of 'reproduction horror.' Of course, as a completely Judaic produced and directed work that depicts virtually all French women as desperate whores and French men as superlatively sleazy untermenschen vermin that use whatever means necessary to get into a strange pregnant woman's seemingly never washed panties, the film is about as organically French as Serge Gainsbourg. Indeed, Baby Blood more or less does for the French what Veit Harlan's Jud Süß (1940) did for German Jewry, albeit in a more seedy and of course less melodramatic fashion as a stereotype-driven piece of racial caricature that reminds the viewer that the Hebrew nation has yet to get over the petty Dreyfus affair. On top of that, the film has the honor of being probably the first quasi-feminist body horror film ever made, as a work where virtually every male character attempts to defile the pregnant female lead, who becomes stronger and stronger each time she slaughters an imbecilic male character. As a socially scathing and darkly comedic film where an ancient and rather talkative parasite of the rather pernicious sort takes over the protagonist's body and forces them to 'feed' (aka kill) for them, Baby Blood is surely the closest thing to a French equivalent to Frank Henenlotter's crusty cult classic Brian Damage (1988), albeit featuring a voluptuous frog babe instead of an all-American turdboy. Indeed, for those that enjoy seeing completely unclad babes with large bosoms and an equally plentiful derriere killing men while drenched in blood, Baby Blood is probably your film but expecting mothers should probably stay clear of such a work, as it depicts pregnancy as something that is all the more grotesque than in vaguely related works like Roman Polanski's Rosemary's Baby (1968), Larry Cohen's It's Alive (1974), Donald Cammell's Demon Seed (1977), and David Cronenberg's The Brood (1979), and Norman J. Warren's Inseminoid (1981) aka Horror Planet. Of course, in its portrayal of a fetus as a sort of murderous parasite, the film might wet the all-too-dry panties of bull-dyke pro-abortion activists and other fecund-free aberrant females.

Baby Blood begins with the ancient parasitic antagonist declaring, "At the beginning of the world, earth was just a planet...which had just cooled down covered by ugly vegetation...and hideous gargoyles fighting for their food...under the star-filled sky. At the beginning of the world, appeared the first life forms...around the hole of a lost African swamp. And all of them started to reproduce. All except one. Me, who was deprived of one thing. Birth." In the hope of being born, the creature takes over the body of a Central African leopard, which is ultimately shipped to a carnival in the North of France to be sold to a traveling circus. Ultimately, the parasite, which resembles a sort of grotesque snake, will enter the vagina of a beautiful, if not intellectually challenged, dame named Yanka aka 'Bianca' (Emmanuelle Escourrou) while she is sleeping in her trailer. Bianca 'works' at a traveling carnival owned by an abusive little prick with the Judaic surname 'Lohman' (Christian Sinniger), who beats the female protagonist for ostensibly acting like a whore while treating her like a whore at the same time. The very night the infected leopard is brought to the circus, the parasite escapes its body by blowing it up and then invades Bianca's nether-regions, which causes the protagonist to wake up startled. Upon going to a doctor and discovering that she is pregnant, Bianca decides to leave the circus and Lohman behind for good and then flees to a city where she lives in squalor in a rat-fest dump of an apartment in a third world-esque ghetto.

Not unlike feminism, albeit in a more innately absurd way, the parasite in Bianca's womb gives her a warped sense of independence that makes her feel the need to look at man as a perennial enemy who she must destroy before he destroys her. Indeed, everything changes for the protagonist when Lohman hunts her down in the apartment building and the creature that has invaded her cunt coerces her into stabbing to death her ex-beau. The ancient parasite in Bianca's stomach has the power to make her feel great pain if she does not follow his deranged demands of killing men and drinking their blood so that the creature can be properly nourished. While Bianca initially attempts to commit suicide by drowning herself, she merely gets her clothes wet and ultimately hitches a ride with a 'reformed gay' trucker of Portuguese ancestry who ultimately ditches her for two much younger kraut babes. Like many downtrodden (future) single mothers, Bianca is forced to take a degrading job as a waitress and eventually slaughters a degenerate downtrodden would-be Don Juan that lives off of women named Richard (Jean-François Gallotte) after she has less than charming coitus with the fellow and he later proclaims that he would like to have children with her. Meanwhile, Bianca begins to develop a sort of bizarre attachment to the parasite in her womb, who ultimately becomes her best friend. When the parasite asks her if she likes men, Bianca strangely replies, "The eyes, a sad look, I like when they are unhappy." A somewhat melancholy monster with a soft spot for his beyond hospitable host, the parasite confesses to Bianca, "Sometimes I am unhappy."

Throughout Baby Blood, Bianca takes on a number of odd jobs and even odder murders. At one point, Bianca becomes a taxi-driver, which ultimately becomes a handy trade as she later carjacks a medical bus. When Bianca accidentally crashes the bus after an unruly blood donor takes his revenge against her for stealing his vital fluids, she ends up dropping dead, but the parasite gets extremely lonely and somehow brings her back to life while she is in an ambulance. After coming back to life, Bianca brutally murders the EMTs, even bashing one's brains in with a fire extinguisher. While lying in the blood splattered ambulance, Bianca manages to give birth to a happy baby boy and subsequently steals a car that soon breaks down. While attempting to get a mechanic to fix her car, Bianca's baby is blown to bits when the parasite explodes out of its body. Ultimately, the parasite manages to slither its way into a bus full of sleazy soccer players that Bianca also manages to hitch a ride from. The lard ass alcoholic driver of the bus allows Bianca to ride the bus on the condition that she does not wake up the players. Of course, when one of the sportsmen wakes up and spots Bianca, he wakes up all his comrades and they begin pawing at the protagonist as if they plan to gang rape her while singing lyrics like "fondle my dick." While Bianca attempts to warn the hyper horny soccer stars about the creature on the bus, the parasite randomly jumps on the fat fuck bus driver's head in an Alien-esque fashion and begins draining his blood. As the now petrified players bang on the back of the bus window, Bianca attempts to stop the vehicle from crashing, but it ultimately does and explodes. While Bianca presumably perishes in the accident, the parasite manages to realize its goal of reaching the sea.

BABY BLOOD

Undoubtedly, as a work of cryptically Hebraic horror of the morally retarded yet darkly humorous sort where bodily dismemberment becomes a sort of nihilistic slapstick routine, Baby Blood is probably the closest thing to a 'French' equivalent to Judaic auteur Sam Raimi's The Evil Dead trilogy. In fact, the scene in Robak's film where the parasite enters the protagonist's pussy seems to be a homage to the infamous 'tree rape' scene from The Evil Dead (1981). Of course, aside from the films of Raimi and Henenlotter, Baby Blood also deserves comparisons to the early works of Peter Jackson like Bad Taste (1987) and Dead Alive (1992) aka Braindead. Horror fans should note that Robak's film also features a cameo role from not only the screenwriter of the French arthouse splatter flick Baxter (1989), but also the eponymous bull terrier that appeared in the film, though this should be no surprise since Judaic frog Ariel Zeitoun produced both of the films. In keeping with the film's somewhat inconspicuously kosher flavor, Jewish actor and sometimes director Alain Chabat also has a cameo in the film. With a Béatrice Dalle lookalike as the protagonist, all-too-stylish direction, and a somewhat cynical modernist depiction of France, Baby Blood is like the horror-comedy equivalent to the mainstream art house works of Jean-Jacques Beineix. Naturally, not unlike most of the films of Beineix, Robak's film has more style and substance and thus is a work that ultimately has about as much artistic merit as the classic frog fuck flick Le sexe qui parle (1975) aka Pussy Talk. As a work that portrays the majority of Frenchmen as sleazy scumbags and potential rapists, Baby Blood demonstrates that, despite whatever country or film genre, Jewish filmmakers are always looking to undermine the people and culture of their host nation. Undoubtedly, fellow Franco-Hebrew filmmaker Alexandre Aja would continue Robak's kosher trend of degrading French culture with the sick-for-sick's-sake celluloid abortion Haute tension (2003) aka High Tension. Notably, Baby Blood was followed by two sequels directed by horror hack Jean-Marc Vincent that include Lady Blood (2008) and Eject (2010) but they are both so appallingly horrendous that I would not even recommend them to schlock-loving completists. Undoubtedly, the best thing I can say about Baby Blood is that it makes the perfect antidote for anyone that has ever had to suffer watching the rather retarded romcom Look Who's Talking (1989).

-Ty E

TOWELHEAD
TOWELHEAD

Alan Ball° (2008)

Kike and Nigger are titles for movies that you will never see anytime soon. The Jews do not want you to know that the “k word” even exists. How many times in those “realistic” World War II films do you hear an Aryan superman yell “kike” at the Jew he is about to execute? “Nigger” will never be the title of a movie because that is the proper spelling of the “most evil word ever.” Instead, an “African American” director will have a film with the ironic “Nigga” as a display of empowerment. There is, however, a movie called “Towelhead.” Towelhead is the latest movie from writer Alan Ball of American Beauty fame. The film follows a ½ Lebanese girl as she comes to terms with her sexuality at the ripe age of 13 years old. I bet this “islamofascists” are getting what they really deserve with taste of freedom loving democratic filmmaking. After watching Towelhead, the viewer will feel “liberated” in their hatred of Arab Muslims and their misogynistic culture. You find that Arab girls can love screwing black boys at the age of 13 (otherwise it would be racist), get raped by evil rednecks, and be protected by warm “open minded” white liberals. I didn’t think that Arabs were capable of that! Towelhead features a lot of raunchy scenes for those viewers that like to feel turned on by girls that have just hit their teenage years. It shows that one is cultured when they can have a cinematic experience of viewing an Arab teen girl’s hymen getting broken via the hands of an Aryan redneck. We also cannot forget how sensitive black teens can be while shaving the pubic area of a raghead girl. This high class negro makes his first move on this Arab girl by calling her a “sand nigger.” Maybe he felt they were both persecuted by the evil rednecks of Texas? After Towelhead, you will learn that Muslims can be Americans too. Just like white Americans, a Muslim man has to allow a Negro buck to ravage his daughter. The raghead also has to make sure to hate the evil rednecks that fight all the phony wars for a country. Despite the redneck making up the majority of America’s population (but not for long says the “progressive liberal” globalists), he must be looked down on as an evil literal and metaphorical rapist (despite having any real power). Maybe an underground filmmaker needs to make a gore film entitled “Yid’s Revenge: The Story of Abe’s Holocaust against Western Civilization.” I am sure a short film with such a title would make international news.

-Ty E

KILLER'S MOON

Alan Birkinshaw (1978)

What has Killer's Moon done to deserve this sentence of being grouped in with comparisons towards A Clockwork Orange? Surely the only grounds to give way to such silly accusations are the white coats suiting the escaped mental patients. Maybe the cunning and, dare I say, terrifying intellect of the mad rapists who have been treated with large doses of LSD. These minuscule factors do not equate to a larger picture worthy of slinging the terms of "droog" around, regardless of how many DVD copies it will sell. Any person expecting anything along the lines of Kubrick's vision of A Clockwork Orange would be sorely mistaken and stupid enough to warrant the blind purchase. To cut down to the bone, Killer's Moon is devoid of any and all morals, carving a rather intoxicating product of objectification with the case being nubile teenagers. The simplicity of the narrative can be evidenced with a rather short synopsis - A hotel holding up stranded schoolgirls for the night becomes the target of 4 escaped mental patients whose mental condition can be likened to "tripping balls". Thus is the portrait of fleshy desires that Killer's Moon colors in. Opinion towards Killer's Moon stretches from outrage to acceptance, leaving no room for compromise and that is the beauty of it - uncompromising, misogynistic, misanthropic, and dreamlike, not for the visuals but for the strange fantasy these men are indulging in.

Poetic, philosophizing rapists prowl the woodlands. Roughly sounds to be the breadth of a popular urban legend but for these very unfortunate young girls, it would seem to be that their god abandoned them tonight to the lusts of a handful. The very thought of a man, driven by rage, fearing no consequence towards his actions, raping the daughters of fathers, sends a chill down my spine. Killer's Moon certainly has its appeal, in both the context of eroticism and incredibly abrasive dialogue credited to be written by famous author Fay Weldon who has had much experience in thrusting women "in oppressive situations". One of the offenders mumbles to himself, reassurance, "only a figment.. only a figment". Killer's Moon has been called many things and many things it is. For reportedly having such a low budget, Killer's Moon is gifted with a vintage aesthetic. Most likely, not on purpose, but the soft grain of the film stock adds a higher level of endearment to be had as age aids as salve, especially when nightdresses presume to get ripped, revealing tender, pink flesh underneath. This is probably the highest form of entertainment Killer's Moon is indebted to bearing - the, at the time, graphic depictions of rape. I am currently in the position to praise the violation on screen without a sigh in regards to retaliation because for what other reason would you be reading about Killer's Moon? This British shocker's lifeblood is gorgeous women being sexually assaulted, with an addition of wonderfully insensitive dialogue such as "Look, you were only raped, as long as you don't tell anyone about it you'll be alright. You pretend it never happened, I'll pretend I never saw it and if we get out of this alive, well, maybe we'll both live to be wives and mothers". This brings to mind the smear campaign ran by Clayton Williams running for Texan Governor in which he takes a stab at John McCain for comparing weather to rape - "As long as it's inevitable, you might as well lie back and enjoy it". Killer's Moon is just ripe with subtext and discussion and arguably one of the best exhibitions of retro breasts that I can recall.

KILLER'S MOON

Killer's Moon is a very fine form of classy trash, - a thoughtful representation of the perturbed disturbed not without its frequent injections of savage sadism. Watching scallywags empty their tanks of fluid and spoken prose upon wriggling jailbait does come at a cost of immoral obligation but certainly not without its charm. Accompanied by a jazzy, pseudo-orchestral soundtrack that occasional evolves into lounge-like tunes, Killer's Moon benefits from its humdrum opening sequences of giggling girls. Take comfort in the fact that a select few will be chosen for raping, and let the suspense stew. Those prone to rash outbursts upon hearing or viewing "insensitive material" would be best to avoid Killer's Moon as I am not looking forward to mopping up the saliva of a frothing feminist anytime in the near future. Killer's Moon maintains its composure right before the very final scene, when it suddenly changes face to a different beast, ending on a note of the macabre - a distanced view of a lone police officer, oblivious to the world, inquiring as to the shaken nature of the survivors. All the while, a female body is strewn across a bench with a knife protruding from her back in close proximity to the camera. This is just a visual memento of the terrifying night that will forever haunt these girl's dreams, whether or not they are manifested through substance abuse. Knowing full well of the indignity that is Killer's Moon, I can't refute the blatant evidence of vile filmmaking, all I can do is embrace such carnal chaos.

-mAQ

SCUM

Alan Clarke (1979)

After respectfully viewing both the 1977 BBC broadcast and the 1979 feature film version of Scum, I find the true victor of the content wars to be neither nor. Scum is a shattering view of the Borstal system in which both inmate and warden are under constant oppression from all eyes. This "oppression" is an omnipotent idea that we soon let go grudges with and grasp the fact that everyone involved in this situation is doomed to British pansy hellfire and racially and politically charged themes of homosexuality, "black bastards," and many suicide attempts that were either ill-fated from the start or simply lost all power through moving images in regards to the porting of this once and always classic story of stripped brutality. "A brutal story of today" is now nothing more than an archaic tale of someones third-person depiction of a violent scenario which, try as you might, would never really change. As it is, Scum isn't a genius envisioning or one of the greatest motion pictures of all time; I don't even see it to be all that great. What Scum has going for it though is a compelling tale of British pansy opportunist queers and a tale of inner-sanctum power struggles boiling up over the top. A Borstal is glorified as a dog eat dog world envisioned by unsavory youth and Alan Clarke. His method of inputting violence and how it should be portrayed in truthful cinema is mostly reduced to contradictory fluff when he decides to add more rape, more violence, and more death to his production in order to give Scum that superficial theater-worthy entertainment. A bad move on Scum's behalf, I found the BBC version to gain the provincial higher rank of blistering engagement. After all, Toyne's discovery of his recently departed wife, Candy, was all the more punishing on the viewers when we were treated with the most poignant stare cinema had to offer at the time rather than some ludicrous attempted suicide scene with some ballistic Negro running, screaming, spraying blood all over the off-white walls. Perhaps the strangest notion of the reshot feature length presentation of Scum is the absence of the choice actors David Threlfall as Archer and Martin Philips as Davis. Threlfall's performance as Archer was something of a sole guiding light to Carlin, the self-defending homosexual daddy. Without Archer, Carlin wouldn't be the daddy and would be without guidance. Threlfall's charisma and condescending persona really adds to the mystery of how many of these seemingly innocent boys get into such a hellhole. There's really no option other than to rebel against society within the concrete walls. Philips as Davis was a darker turn over the blond haired weasel that gets the short straw in homosexual rape. The BBC Davis was a dark haired mousy-visaged innocent minor whose screams of emotional distress can indeed pierce the reflective screen of our television set and the walls of the Borstal. To award the 1979 remake it's due, the idea of having Davis ring the bell one last time after his fatal decision added to the stunning retrospective typology of suicide. In the BBC version, he hesitated before chiming to the "screw" and decided he'd rather die in the "bird." Scum's highlight moments consist of Carlin's chronic predatory performances that arise out of mostly racially-charged fighting moments. Securing realism in both action choreography and the dominance between whites and blacks, Carlin takes both tool and "snooker" balls to his enemies leaving him the authoritative figure in this anarchic cage-like disposition of a public building. The initial daddy before Carlin is simply known as Banks, a rotund figure that lacks a real intimidating posture and tone. His kind is known simply as a catharter; the figure who releases violence in an effort to subdue the side-effects of negativity and a release of accumulated emotion. Ray Winstone's career changing role in both Scum features marks the beginning of an important actor who has been grandly seen in the so-so Sexy Beast and the gritty-as-hell Nil by Mouth. Taking both films in consideration, I could consider much of Scum's past and future apparitions to be contrived and pseudo-societal. The effect of this film in today's culture is nowhere to be found. Marketed as an exploitation film by a company mainly hailed for their exploitation, Scum has found a fan base in entirely wrong hands. With a passive approach to dissecting violence within chaos, race, and power struggles, Scum manages to be important and fascinating for mostly wrong reasons. That's not to say that most won't find this film appealing but if you have an incredible aversion to "British pansy queers," It's within your best interest to avoid this film as you wouldn't have missed anything more potent than La Haine and that's me speaking within the dialect of violence portrayed or as I prefer, glamorized, in cinema.

SCUM

-mAQ

MADE IN BRITAIN

Alan Clarke (1982)

What a great biting irony of history that Great Britain—the fallen empire that declared war against Uncle Adolf's Aryan utopia after it invaded Poland in 1939 in what would prove to be a distinctly deleterious war that would ultimately lead to the country's decline as a global power—would ultimately be responsible for producing the most degenerate neo-Nazis in the world, skinheads, who seemed to personify everything the real German National Socialist were against as aesthetically repugnant untermenschen who, with their shaved heads and tattoos, more or less resembled concentration camp survivors on steroids. Instead of curtained haircuts, super suave uniforms, and Richard Wagner, the skinheads had shaved heads, the ultimate proletarian 'uniform' as partly inspired by Jamaican Negros, and third rate punk rock bands like Skrewdriver. Of course, the skinhead movement was probably the most catastrophic thing to happen to National Socialism since Stalingrad and in the social realist 'television play' Tales Out of School: Made in Britain aka Made in Britain (1982) directed by British left-wing filmmaker Alan Clarke (Scum, Billy the Kid and the Green Baize Vampire) one gets a small idea of the sort of social misfits that the degenerate skinhead lifestyle appeals to. Starring Tim Roth—a fellow who, despite his big nose and German Jewish surname (notably, the actor's card-carrying communist father changed the family name from Smith to Roth in the 1940s, "partly through solidarity with the victims of the Holocaust, partly because the English were far from welcome in some of the countries to which his job took him"), is not actually a member of the Hebraic tribe—in his debut film role as a scrawny yet tough and primitively intelligent skinhead punk who unwittingly proves the failure of the establishment to deal with the working-class and society in general after causing all sorts of havoc around his town after being placed in an exceedingly ineffective detention unit run by weak bureaucrats, Clarke's film depicts the archetypical neo-Nazi skinhead as a impulsive nihilist, small-time criminal, and born failure who wages a one-man war in vain against a bloated bureaucratic system that does not even know he exists. Notably, the skinhead antihero is not so much of a National Socialist as he is a disgruntled antisocial teenage tosser that resents the fact that Pakis and other wogs who do not even speak English have successful businesses in his neighborhood while he and most people his age cannot even find an entry-level job. Featuring music by the Scottish punk band The Exploited instead of shitty neo-Nazi punks like Skrewdriver, the cynically titled Made in Britain paints a particularly pathetic portrait of Thatcher era England as an abject failure of a multicultural sewer full of pissed off proles and a disillusioned yet ass-kissing middle-class. One of the first British films of its kind shot by cinematographer Chris Menges (Ken Loach's Kes, Stephen Frears' Bloody Kids) on a Steadicam, Clarke's film is like a gritty punk take on kitchen sink realism, albeit without any of the juvenile posturing and wankery that one might expect had the film been directed by an actual punk.

MADE IN BRITAIN

Trevor (Tim Roth) is a 16-year-old skinhead with a Manson-esque swastika tattooed to his forehead that gets his kicks breaking into cars and going on joy rides, getting high huffing glue, and throwing bricks through store windows, especially at businesses owned by wogs. As punishment for throwing a brick through a lounge window and hitting its Paki owner Mr. Shahnawaz in the head, Trevor is sent to a place called Hooper Street Residential Assessment Center for six weeks where he will wait to receive his punishment for another charge in regard to theft of cassettes from a department store called Harrods. When the judge at his sentencing reads off his list of previous offenses and remarks, "It's a long, depressing list. Are you not ashamed of yourself?," the perennially grinning Trevor gives an affirmative "no." Unfortunately for Trevor, his personal social worker Harry Parker (Eric Richard)—the only adult that the antihero seems to respect in any sort of meaningful way—is going on vacation to the Greek island of Corfu, thus leaving the skinhead to feel abandoned and even more prone to criminality. When Trevor is brought to the assessment center to be 'assessed,' the social worker in charge, Peter Clive (Bill Stewart), acts discernibly annoyed by the fact that he has to deal with yet another juvenile delinquent, thus reflecting the general attitude of those that run the juvenile justice system. Somewhat humorously but certainly not surprisingly, Trevor's roommate is a dopey negro named Errol Duprey (Terry Richards) who remarks in a somewhat shocked fashion upon seeing his new roommate, "You got a swastika on your head," but does not seem particularly bothered about the white boy's antipathy towards wogs like himself. Under the pretense of seeking employment at a work center, Trevor leaves the assessment center and takes Errol to steal a car and huff Evo-Stik glue. While Errol is nodding out in the car after inhaling too much sticky stuff, Trevor goes inside the work center where he ultimately decides to throw a brick through the front window after becoming annoyed with the two-minute-long job search, especially after talking to the intolerably bitchy and passive-aggressive secretary who works there. From there, Trevor takes Errol to an abandoned indoor pool where he has stored a set of keys and tools for stealing cars and subsequently allows the wog to pick out the next car that they will steal together, though he kicks him out before going on a joy ride.

When Trevor gets back to the assessment center, Peter sees him getting out of the stolen car and demands that he take it back. After facing resistance from the skinhead, pansy pushover Peter ultimately makes a compromise with Trevor that he just get rid of the car instead of taking it back to where he stole it from and when the social worker later asks him what he did with the car, he sarcastically replies, "I gave it to Oxfam. They're using it to ship wogs back to Zululand." When Trevor is denied lunch after he arrives back at the assessment center too late, he becomes ballistic, begins kicking in doors, and assaults the cook (Jim Dunk) whilst screaming “I want my lunch!” like a tyrannical toddler, so Peter and two other men subdue him and lock him in a room where he tediously walks around in circles while practically foaming at the mouth like a rabid animal. After some time has passed, Peter, a care worker named Barry Giller (Sean Chapman), and the assessment center superintendent (Geoffrey Hutchings) come into the room and the latter explains to Trevor how he is being given a “second chance,” but he also lets the skinhead know that his future will probably be one big vicious circle revolving around thieving, prison, and the dole. After the Superintendent concludes his self-righteous spiel and leaves, Trevor gets in an argument with Barry and mocks his liberal mainstream mentality, stating, “I’m more British than you, fuck face! You hate the blacks as much as I do, only you don’t admit it. You hate the blacks more than I do, ‘cause they frighten you. That’s why you lock them up. You lock up anything that frightens you.” Barry concludes regarding Trevor that “he’s a sod. He’s psychotic” and recommends to Peter that he be transferred to a “secure unit” so that someone else can deal with him. In an attempt to “keep the peace” with Trevor, Peter reluctantly agrees to allow him to drive in a banger racing event, but he also makes the following threat, “If you let me down, I’ll kill you. With help, that is. I’ll get the chef and some of the biggest lads I can find. And Wankers United will bring you down here and, together, collectively, we’ll duff you up.”

Needless to say, Trevor is not in the least bit happy when the engine of his car conks out after crashing into another car during the banger racing event and even though Peter offers to help him join a racing team so that he won’t have to bother stealing cars anymore, the self-destructive skinhead makes no reply to his offer and instead decides to steal the hopelessly naive social worker’s keys. Upon getting back to the assessment center, Trevor wakes up Errol and brings him to the file room of the building which he opens with the stolen keys. While reading through Errol’s files, Trevor is delighted to learn that his colored comrade was busted for “racist remarks.” Trevor decides to make his own racist remark by calling Errol a “fuckin’ baboon” when he asks him if he can read and he replies “not very well, no.” To show their disgust with the intrusive system that keeps less than flattering tabs on them, Trevor ceremoniously pisses on his files while Errol defecates on his and the two subsequently steal the assessment center van and head to the city where they throw bricks through the windows of homes in a Paki neighborhood. Of course, Trevor specifically targets the home of Mr. Shahnawaz who he blames for getting him sent to the assessment center. Rather humorously, nig-nog Errol yells things like “You Paki bastards!” and “black nigger bastards” while throwing rocks through the windows, thus revealing that Trevor’s influence has rubbed off on him. After getting done chucking rocks, Trevor decides to crash the stolen van into some squad cars in front of a police station and poor Errol is knocked unconscious in the process. Trevor flees the car and intentionally leaves his colored comrade behind, thus Errol is soon busted by a cop who hatefully states “you little black bastard” and takes him to jail. After admiring a middleclass mannequin family in a store window and attacking a car in a tunnel while yelling “wanker,” Trevor heads to his social worker pal Harry Parker’s apartment to turn himself in and ultimately burn his final bridge.

MADE IN BRITAIN

Naturally, Harry, who is about to go on vacation, is pissed when Trevor shows up at his door, so he calls him a “nerd” and immediately begins berating him. While in Harry’s apartment, it is obvious that Trevor is jealous of Harry’s children and middleclass lifestyle, which the skinhead has intentionally invaded in a pathetic attempt to intimidate the social worker. After Trevor arrogantly brags about all of the crimes he has committed over the past day or so, Harry tells him that he is an “asshole” whose “not worth a piss,” thus confirming that the antihero has finally burnt his last bridge and has lost the one person that actually seemed to care about him. Ultimately, Trevor is sent to a real prison for the first time in his miserable life. While in a holding cell, Trevor annoys the guards by incessantly pressing the buzzer in his cell room, so two guards eventually come in and the shorter of the two, a rather authoritarian fellow named A.C. Anson (Christopher Fulford), informs the skinhead, after he complains that he is juvenile, that he cannot be kept at an adult prison and that he is not going back to the assessment center but a borstal and when he gets out, he will be sent to real prison where he promises, “we can screw you, and we will. We got ya now.” When Anson threatens to fingerprint Trevor after he gets out of the borstal so that he can connect him to all the car thefts in the local area, the skinhead sarcastically replies, “sounds great!,” thus causing the now fully enraged prison guard to smack him on the kneecap with a baton. While looking discernibly broken and defeated for the first time in the film after taking a brutal blow to the knee, Anson mocks Trevor by remarking “You think you’re fucking hard” and then proceeds to tell him that he needs to learn to respect authority and the law like everyone else in society. After Anson and his pal leave, Trevor regains his iconic deranged grin, as if to demonstrate that physical violence has only strengthened his criminality and his unwavering desire to wage war against society.

Despite being a small and scrawny pedomorphic weakling (he apparently was 21 at the time of shooting yet looks barely old enough to be a teenager), Tim Roth did a fairly believable job in Made in Britain portraying a self-destructively nihilistic skinhead of the totally toxic sort who, unlike many juvenile delinquents, quite consciously decides to make all the worst decisions in whatever situation he may happen to be in. Of course, Roth’s performance is just a testament to his acting talents, with the actor being the complete opposite of his character as reflected in his remark during the audio commentary track on the Blue Underground DVD release of the film regarding his own personal interactions with skinheads, “I unfortunately went to school with a few of those...and got beaten up by many skinheads during the punk time...horrendous, horrendous people.” Apparently, Roth’s communist father also cried after seeing his son in the film after it debuted on British television, as the sight of his beloved son portraying a violent neo-Nazi thug was just too much for the old philo-Semitic commie to take. Ironically, after starring in Made in Britain, Roth had skinheads chasing him down the street for his autograph instead of kicking his ass like they apparently did when he was in high school. In the Blue Underground audio commentary, Roth also explains how the film was apparently a hit with both left-wingers and right-wingers, though some in the latter group were naturally disappointed with how the film portrayed them.

Despite director Alan Clarke’s obvious intention to not romanticize skinheads or their dead-end lifestyle, antihero Trevor is easily one of the most strangely likeable, if not most likeable, skinheads of cinema history, as a character who, despite his overall vulgar nature, is more tolerable and empathetic than most of the rest of the characters in the film, which certainly seems to reflect the director’s disgust with Britain’s social and legal system. Indeed, while Edward Norton’s character in American History X (1998) seems too phony and contrived and Ryan Gosling’s character in The Believer (2001) is just too plain schizophrenically Jewish, Trevor of Made in Britain seems to completely embody the sort of troubled individual of reasonable intelligence and wit who makes the seemingly insane decision to have a swastika tattooed to his forehead. Of course, aside from a murdered wog here and a burned down Paki-owned restaurant there, the skinheads ultimately proved to be not much of a threat to Britain in the long run, especially when compared to the trouble that Pakis and various other sorts of brown-skinned Muslims have brought to their adopted nation, which includes everything from brutal terrorist attacks involving the decapitation of white British soldiers to white sex slavery rings comprised of barely-teenage British girls, not to mention the total ghettoization of all major British cities, especially London, which now has a non-white majority population. Of course, Alan Clarke probably would have never directed a film about white sex slavery or the new color of urban decay as it would have been a conflict of interests for him, but it would certainly be interesting to see a filmmaker direct such works in the gritty in-your-face Clarkeian style just as Gus Van Sant somewhat did with his 2003 Columbine High School Massacre Elephant (which borrowed its name from the 1989 Clarke short of the same name). Apparently, Made in Britain screenwriter David Leland wrote a screenplay for a sequel about Trevor as a middle-aged man, but no one was interested in producing the film and, of course, Clarke died a very long time ago. Call me crazy, but I would not be surprised if Trevor ended up turning into a dope dealer with mulatto kids as spawned from a relationship he had with a Jamaican hooker. After all, the skinheads of yesteryear are the chavs and wiggers of today, with the antihero of Made in Britain growing up at a time before Britain had been completely ‘culturally enriched’ by the members of its ex-colonies.

MADE IN BRITAIN

-Ty E

TROUBLE IN MIND

Alan Rudolph (1985)

Sometimes I find myself appreciating a filmmaker and his craft, even though I sense an innate distaste, if not downright hatred, for their character and overall essence as an individual. For example, I see Billy Wilder as a subversive little semite that, aside from physically resembling a sort of kosher Jean-Paul Sartre, made films that reek of an intolerable venomous bitterness, primitive misanthropy, and covert anti-shiksa vile, yet there is no denying he made some fairly worthwhile films The Lost Weekend (1945) and Ace in the Hole (1951) that say something relatively profound about the (in)human condition. Additionally, while I like The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick (1972) and Paris, Texas (1984), I basically cannot watch a Wim Wenders flick without fantasizing about violently slapping the terminally tedious Teutonic auteur in the face for being such a meandering wimp that seems to have forgotten he has a pair of testicles. As for American auteur Alan Rudolph (The Moderns, Breakfast of Champions)—arguably the only true authentic protégé of great freewheeling American auteur Robert Altman—I would be lying if I did not admit that I also see him as a sort of wimpy weasel that would probably benefit from a gym membership and a steady dose of red meat but, unlike the spiritually comatose Wenders, he at least has something of a heart and has directed some truly romantic films that, quite unlike the typical Hebraic rom-com or historical romance à la Miloš Forman's Valmont (1989) and Pride & Prejudice (2005), actually manages to make romance seem cool and sophisticated. The son of filmmaker Oscar Rudolph who directed the Lenny Bruce-penned low-budget sci-fi oddity The Rocket Man (1954), Rudolph may be of a certain dubious Hollywood pedigree but he is also an unequivocal artiste and cinematic auteur that, naturally, was always more respected in Europe than the United States. Despite being a pussy pothead of sorts, Rudolph has managed to assemble a fairly idiosyncratic oeuvre that pillages the best from film noir and melodrama (not to mention various European new waves) in style, as if attempting to demonstrate to Godard the proper way to shamelessly recycle certain genre conventions without seemingly like a pedantic poindexter with an undying contempt for cinema. Politically speaking, one might assume that Rudolph is a man of the left (and you're probably right, though his films are fairly apolitical), but his arguable magnum opus Trouble in Mind (1985)—a film that seems to beg for a curious combination of lachrymose and awkward laughs yet ultimately inspires spiritual rejuvenation—would be considered 'reactionary' by today's rather ridiculous standards. Indeed, in the film, cities are a seedy and soulless cesspool of sin that turn good men bad, nonwhite foreigners run most of the criminal realm, beta males get their women stolen by alpha males, art has been reduced to a primitive childish level, and an exceedingly effete evil fat queen portrayed by Divine of Pink Flamingos (1972) and Female Trouble (1974) infamy in a rare male (yet nonetheless glaringly gay) role is the most loathsomely ruthless of underworld crime bosses.

TROUBLE IN MIND

More importantly, Rudolph's film is the cinematic work that I originally hoped Godard's Alphaville (1965)—a virtual tribute to German Expressionism and its masters like F.W. Murnau and Fritz Lang—would be as a superlatively stylish and genuinely romantic dystopian sci-fi flick where love conquers all in the end and not in a phony emotionally counterfeit sort of fashion (although Godard's film literally concludes with the words, "Je vous aime" aka "I love you," it does not ring true like at the end of Rudolph's flick where no words are needed to express the life-changing love that the antihero feels). Undoubtedly, more than just a sort of more stylish 1980s American Alphaville, Trouble in Mind is like an anti-Blade Runner as a relatively laid-back, laconic, and low-key film of the aesthetically understated sort that is more dedicated to somewhat hermetic melodrama and poetical pathos than a meticulous mise-en-scène and oneiric atmospheres that manages to, not unlike Ridley Scott's film, completely swallow up the storyline (which, of course, is of secondary importance in the case of Blade Runner). Indeed, while Scott's arguable magnum opus manages to provide the viewer with someone akin to a drugless high due to its overwhelming aesthetic allure and initially inexplicably foreboding atmosphere as a film that sincerely feels like it could be set in some dystopian future despite being released nearly forty years ago, Rudolph's film is first and foremost a story about love and the power of love and its dystopian setting is largely symbolic and secondary to its story, or as the auteur once explained himself, "To me, love is always the turning point, the best hope for any future. And my favorite subject for a film. If nothing else, I hope TROUBLE IN MIND convinces you of that." While I can only assume due to what I know about him that there is very little that the quirky auteur and I would agree on, I unequivocally agree due to sheer personal experience when it comes to his assessment of love and his film—one of the most leisurely and idiosyncratically romantic films ever made—certainly strengthens his argument. Featuring an ex-cop-cum-ex-con antihero, ditzy yet well-meaning dame with a baby and degenerate baby-daddy as the female love interest, and a violently misogynistic queer queen as the villain, Trouble In Mind might be an eccentric film with an eclectic collection of eccentric characters yet its insights regarding love and human motivations certainly ring true, as if the film was directed by a self-loathing humanist with an unshakeable film noir fetish that wanted to make a feature-length melodrama to accompany the latest New Order album.

For better or worse (and in true pothead style), Alan Rudolph has had one of the most uniquely uneven and less than ideally idiosyncratic filmmaking careers in cinema history and Trouble In Mind is certainly the crowning achievement of said artistically troubling career. Beginning his directing career with the personally disowned hippie horror flicks Premonition (1972) aka Head aka The Impure and Nightmare Circus (1974) aka The Barn of the Naked Dead aka Ter- ror Circus, Rudolph did not seem to take the art of filmmaking seriously until he became the protégé of Robert Altman and acted as an assistant director on such Altman classics as The Long Goodbye (1973), California Split (1974), and Nashville (1975). In fact, Rudolph's first true auteur effort Welcome to L.A. (1976)—an Altman-produced production that does not coincidentally star such Altman superstars as Keith Carradine, Sally Kellerman, and Geraldine Chaplin, among others—is like a West Coast spiritual sequel to Nashville, albeit somewhat more romantic and, in turn, precisely narratively structured in a fashion that has been compared to Arthur Schnitzler's play La Ronde (in fact, it would not be an exaggeration to describe Rudolph as a sort of preternatural heir of Schnitzler and, in turn, Max Ophüls who of course cinematically adapted La Ronde (1950) and directed some of the most stylish (dis)romances ever made). While Rudolph is a clear protégé of Altman, by the time he was directing films like Choose Me (1984)—the director's sole hit film—he had already developed his own distinct cinematic worldview, which would only further evolve as the years passed in between occasionally accepting for-hire hack work (e.g. Mortal Thoughts (1991) starring Demi Moore). Although Welcome to L.A. is undoubtedly the auteur's first true auteur piece, Rudolph was still relegated to directing some passable hack work like the pseudo-horror-thriller Endangered Species (1982)—a film dealing with cattle mutilation conspiracy sans aliens (!)—and the Sydney Pollack-produced Songwriter (1984), which is an important yet artistically forgettable film in the director's career in that sense that it introduced the auteur to singularly stoic Trouble In Mind lead Kris Kristofferson. While he might have started out as a singer-songwriter and demonstrated a natural talent for so-called revisionist westerns like Sam Peckinpah's regrettably uneven Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid (1973) and Michael Cimino's watchable yet plodding box-office disaster Heaven's Gate (1980), Kristofferson—probably the only cowboy to get down with Mishima in the unjustly overlooked The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea (1976)—demonstrates in Rudolph's flick that he was born to be the film noir antihero par excellence. As for his mischling costar and Altman/Rudolph regular Keith Carradine, he once again demonstrates that he is the vaguely creepy dorky weirdo par excellence. Indeed, not unlike his buddy Altman, Rudolph has a knack for perfectly casting actors, even when it comes to against-type roles (for example, while Lori Singer plays a relatively innocent and naive girl in Trouble In Mind, she would effectively play the complete opposite in the director's later Equinox, which is also notable for Matthew Modine portraying central two roles in the form of long lost twin brothers that could not be more different in terms of character).

Naturally, as I have gotten older, my perspective of certain films—and the way I look at films in general—has changed drastically. For example, I once tried to watch Trouble In Mind about a decade ago before I was familiar with Rudolph's work and could not even get into it as it seemed like cartoonish kitsch noir and apparently I am not the only one. Indeed, as Richard Ness explained in his text Alan Rudolph: Romance and a Crazy World (1996), “As much as CHOOSE ME seemed to excite critics, TROUBLE IN MIND (1986) appeared to alienate them. While the film received some strong notices and a few critics, including Roger Ebert, numbered it among the best of the year, many were unsure whether Rudolph intended the film as a serious revision of film noir or a parody of the genre. Although there are comic elements in the film (such as the increasingly odd appearance of Keith Carradine’s character), they end to grow out of the absurdity of the situations, whereas the humor in CHOOSE ME grew out of the honesty of the characters [...] Although it anticipates a whole cycle of later new-wave noir films (producer Carolyn Pfeiffer described it as existing somewhere between Bogie and Bowie). TROUBLE IN MIND also serves as a summation of Rudolph’s work to date.” While the film is, to some degree, absurdly aesthetically goofy in a manner that would anticipate Rudolph’s later films like Made in Heaven (1987) where Debra Winger of all people appears in drag as a sort of neo-greaser guardian angel of sorts, it is also quite deadly serious when it comes to love and the ways of the world. Undoubtedly, it is no coincidence that Divine, in what is probably the most underrated role of his all-too-brief and unfortunately largely terminally typecast career, plays a murderously neurotic queer underworld boss that, owing to his hatred of his own mother and humanity in general, lacks the capacity to love, hence his erratically evil pussy-repulsed essence. Additionally, the film dares to demonstrate that it is much better for a woman to leave the father of her baby for a stronger man than to stay with him, especially if the baby-daddy is a despicable bitch of the constantly criminally bungling and dopey dope-addled sort that curiously resembles a New Romantic drag king.

TROUBLE IN MIND

While the product of a pothead that used to share joints with the belated auteur of the comfortably dumb O.C. and Stiggs (1985) and even co-penned the insipidly anti-white celluloid abortion Buffalo Bill and the Indians, or Sitting Bull’s History Lesson (1976), Trouble In Mind is also surprisingly red-pilled in many respects, as if the largely apolitical auteur unconsciously came to a number of truths and naturally could not help but disseminate them due to tackling the dystopian realms. Indeed, Teutonic philosopher Oswald Spengler might as well have been speaking of the dystopian ‘Rain City’ (aka Seattle) of the film when he once wrote, “Long ago the country bore the country-town and nourished it with her best blood. Now the giant city sucks the country dry, insatiably and incessantly demanding and devouring fresh streams of men, till it wearies and dies in the midst of an almost uninhabited waste of country.” As the viewer soon discovers as the film progress, the film’s antihero lead John ‘Hawk’ Hawkins (Kris Kristofferson)—an ex-cop that is released from prison after serving eight hard years on a murder rap that involved gunning down a bigwig gangster for his ladylove—might be a somewhat cynical killer, but his ugly urban environment forced him to become tough and ruthless and it is only when he discovers love in the form of a relatively innocent young lady that he is given a true chance at redemption instead the predictable figurative road to katabasis. Aside from Hawk, the viewer witnesses how city newcomer 'Coop' (Keith Carradine)—a country boy that not coincidentally declares at the beginning of the film, "I've been to plenty of cities...And they ain't nothing but trouble"—completely morally and psychologically deteriorates after reluctantly moving to the miserable metropolis at the behest of his young naïve wife 'Georgia' (Lori Singer) who foolishly believes the city will provide a bright future for their baby son 'Spike.' Somewhat ironically, the young family's move to the city ultimately leads to a bizarre love triangle the concludes with Georgia leaving Coop for Hawk in what is a bitter-sweet scenario where love conquers all but a baby boy loses his loser beta-boy father. Needless to say, had Coop never listened to his wife's dubious advice and relocated the family to a big shitty city, he probably would have never hooked up with black criminals that deal in stolen goods smuggled by Koreans and turned into a deranged dope fiend dork that loses his entire family in the end. Indeed, not unlike Blade Runner, Trouble in Mind is set in a grotesquely mongrelized multicultural realm where black neo-gangster speak Korean and curiously practice Buddhism and an overall lack of cultural and, in turn, moral, consistency (and, of course, racial homogeneity), leads to a gynophobic gay queen becoming both a powerful man and proud patron of the (rather entartete) arts. Needless to say, the film hardly depicts so-called multiculturalism in a flattering light and the central dystopian city is something akin to H.P. Lovecraft's view of NYC, albeit nowhere as paranoically portrayed. Not unlike his comrade Altman, Rudolph has a certain inordinate respect for audiences and does not dare to attempt to force the viewer to accept a sort of dichotomous perspective of completely 'good' and 'bad' in regard to characters as everyone of them displays a certain 'humanity,' not matter how vulgar or unflattering. For example, when Coop's colored criminal comrade 'Solo' (Joe Morton of John Sayles's vaguely comparable Afrofuturist cult classic The Brother from Another Planet (1984)) spiritually foresees his own demise via being drowned inside his own car (!), one cannot help feel the character's pain. Aesthetically speaking, the film can obviously be compared to Slava Tsukerman's kaleidoscopic sci-fi cult item Liquid Sky (1982) and Alyce Wittenstein's neo-Godardian hipster joke Betaville (1986), but it seems to be of a more artistically sophisticated pedigree than these two flicks. Indeed, aside from sharing some aesthetic similarities with Germanic cinematic works like Niki Lišt's exceedingly eccentric cult flick Malaria (1982) and mischling dyke Ulrike Ottinger's collaboration with her then-muse Tabea Blumenschein like Bildnis einer Trinkerin (1979) aka Ticket of no Return and Freak Orlando (1981), the film demonstrates somewhat of an understanding of modern art history and its relation to the decline of the Occident. For example, numerous wholesome and romantic scenes in the film depicted from the outside perspective of a diner seem like they were dreamed up by American realist painter Edward Hopper. Rather fittingly, much of the urban graffiti and art gallery paintings in the film, which certainly symbolize cultural and spiritual decay in a rather goofy otherworldly way, seem to be modeled after the Der Blaue Reiter and Die Brücke movements associated with German Expressionism. Additionally, the colorfully grotesque sculptures featured at the art gallery mansion of the film's gay villain bear a striking resemblance to those of debauched French-American feminist sculpture and occasional filmmaker Niki de Saint Phalle (Daddy). While one could try to make the largely pointless argument that Rudolph is, to some extent, himself a degenerate artist, Trouble in Mind is hardly respectful to degenerate art and ultimately carries a fairly aesthetically and morally conservative message of the rather perennial sort.

TROUBLE IN MIND

As for Hawk, who more or less has the total opposite experience as his much younger rival Coop, it is only when he rejects the sickness of the city that he finally achieves his dream of discovering his dream girl and leaving the urban hellhole behind for good. To accomplish this dream love affair, Hawk agrees to save the mostly worthless life of the guy he is cuckolding as Georgia might be leaving Coop but she is a good girl and does not want her no-good-bastard baby-daddy to die despite it being his own fault when he becomes a marked man after robbing a powerful gangster. A blunt man of gristled honor with a stern chiseled face that practically screams indelible stoical strength, Hawk even matter-of-factly declares to his love interest Georgia in regard to reluctantly agreeing to save her worthless husband Coop but also keeping her as his beloved prize, "I'll save the poor son-of-a-bitch but you'll owe me something I want. And I've just spent too many years wanting and wanting and never having. So once I fix this up and send him on his way, you belong to me—completely. You'll live with me...and I'll take care of you and the kid and we'll have something. Otherwise, let him get what he deserves. Let everybody get what they deserve." In the end, practically everyone indeed gets what they deserve and luckily hardened cynic Hawk finds true love despite losing love in the past due to his criminal impulses. In fact, Hawk lost his previous lover Wanda (Geneviève Bujold), who incidentally employs Georgia at her café, as a result of heading to the slammer upon murdering a criminal in cold blood and the two fuck soon after the antihero is released from prison at the beginning of the film but the long-awaited sexual reunion is short-lived. Upset about their seemingly complicated tragic past that includes the antihero receiving a hefty prison sentence after killing a mobster named 'Fat Adolph' (Gailard Sartain) to defend his beloved's honor, Wanda refuses to continue the sexual relationship after their first fuck, complaining with the sort of fiery fury of a wounded woman that still loves a man but knows she cannot be with him, "It's got nothing to do with hunger, Thickhead! It's a matter of philosophy." Needless to say, young, fertile, and relatively innocent Georgia is a much better choice for Hawk as she offers the sort of comfort and nurturing qualities that a bitter old bitch like Wanda simply can no longer provide. A lonely little lady that has let her life slip away, Wanda is still a character of strength that, somewhat curiously, provides Hawk and Georgia with the 'philosophy' they need to start a healthy romance. By the end of the film, Wanda has abandoned her café and disappeared, as if her one job in life was to hook up her ex-flame Hawk with a much younger dame. Of course, as Otto Weininger noted, women first and foremost excel at being matchmakers.

If I was a bitchy queer, I might conclude that Alan Rudolph is some sort of hipster homo-hater after watching Trouble In Mind as the film's fittingly named antagonist Hilly Blue (Divine)—a sort of obscenely campy Sydney Greenstreet type—is arguably the most ravenously repugnant gay villain in cinema history as a sort of sod spiritual son of kosher carpet-muncher Madame Spivy's similarly sleazily sexually sinister villain 'Ma Greeny' in Ralph Nelson's Rod Serling film adaptation Requiem for a Heavyweight (1962). While Rudolph's film is littered with great highly quotable dialogue, Divine certainly steals the show with Hilly Blue with prissily pugnacious lines like, "People that say they care about other people are hypocrites. I prefer priests; they're at least real hypocrites. I prefer two-faced people who show it." Notably, Hilly Blue is a morbidly miserable character of the compulsively cynical and homicidally hysterical sort and although he spouts wacky womb-envy-oriented misogyny like, "Women are despicable...especially mothers," he is not enjoying his life as an ostensibly all-powerful poofster crime lord and even displays glaring weakness by hysterically shouting in front of his entire entourage in regard to a criminal comrade as if complaining about a lover, "Everything between me and Nate is desolation, sadness, disappointment after disappointment." Undoubtedly, Hilly is a sort of symbol of Hawk's old immoral life and naturally he violently berates the antihero for wanting to go straight, stating, "You are capable of almost anything, John, but mainly anything bad. You have nothing but bad qualities and, yet, you think you have a heart." When Hawk expresses his desire to spare Coop's life, Hilly loses it and declares, "You're so predictable. You make me want to vomit. The only way you can ever live up to this ideal you have of yourself is from a hole in the ground." Naturally, it proves to be a symbolic act when Hawk kills Hilly by putting a bullet in his brain. Indeed, out of his love for a young mother, Hawk kills a homo that hates mothers. Notably, Hilly's murder sparks an extravagant absurdist shootout-cum-riot in the villain's virtually magical mansion that is surely the centerpiece of the film and is comparable to the legendary climatic hall-of-mirrors shootout in Orson Welles' The Lady from Shanghai (1947) in terms of great film noir climaxes.

I am not the only one that has noticed the film's somewhat idiosyncratic contra cocksucker subtext. Indeed, as Richard Ness noted in regard to the sexual and, in turn, moral degeneration of one of the main characters, "Coop's increasingly androgynous appearance suggest that his loss of identity may owe in part to a sense of sexual confusion as he goes from a traditional family environment with Georgia and their child to consorting with male companions and attempting to reaffirm his heterosexual identity through liaisons with prostitutes. His androgyny is paralleled by the casting of transvestite Divine in the nondrag role of Hilly Blue. If Coop's coif becomes a reflection of his search for identity, Hilly's baldness suggests an emasculated state, and his need for power and control appears to stem from a lack of affection from his mother." Interestingly, unlike his obscenely over-the-top and low-camp killer dookie-downing characters in classic John Waters flicks like Pink Flamingos (1972) and Female Trouble (1974), Divine, who was eager to finally play a male character and defy his drag stereotype, comes off as sincerely demented and disturbing to the point where his violent murder comes off as a relief to both the viewer and his character as if he was practically begging to be put out of his misery. Indeed, while Divine's Hilly Blue declares, "Everybody wants to go to Heaven; nobody wants to die," one suspects he wanted to die even though there was no way in hell that he would get into heaven.

TROUBLE IN MIND

Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes Trouble In Mind such an organically romantic film despite its tendency towards artifice and preternatural pageantry is that, unlike many films—be they romantic-comedies, film noirs, or otherwise—it actually depicts what a couple needs for a healthy love affair. Indeed, when Georgia reveals her reason for leaving her husband by stating in regard to Hawk, "Him and me feel safe together," she is expressing what every woman instinctively wants and needs. While Georgia's young husband Coop goes from being an unemployed loser to erratic egodystonic dork that tries in vain to be a cool criminal yet fails in every regard, Hawk—in his impenetrable stoicism—radiates strength and demonstrates through deed and demeanor that he can be the real strong man that she so desperately needs. Like any good woman, Georgia also inspires Hawk's greatness and goodness with remarks like, "I think you're a good man that's had bad luck and I think all that can change. The luck, I mean." Although a man that sincerely believes, "A little bit of everybody belongs in hell," Hawks also discovers heaven through Georgia and the two even symbolically enter romantic nirvana by leaving Rain City at the end of the film (though, to be fair, said ending is somewhat ambiguous, but their strength of their mutual love is unquestionable). While I am not sort of moron that believes that people can sincerely change in any meaningful way for the better, Trouble In Mind rightly reminds the viewer in a refreshingly understated way that certain good qualities of a person are deeply buried and sometimes it takes love and the right inspirational lady to dig up such long submerged qualities. In that sense, Trouble In Mind is a rather hopeful film despite being made during what its director felt was a rather hopeless time. Indeed, as Rudolph stated in regard to the metapolitical influence for the film during the 1980s, "My opinion at the time was that despite the warm rhetoric and political smoke screens, our society's increasingly cold blood could easily turn to ice [...] What's important and desirable would soon be hidden, forgotten or missing altogether. Escape would mostly come through daydream reality, memory imagination. Whether our fictional replica appears more within reach now compared to the soothing form of avarice of the 1980s is for someone else to decide. Where, you might ask, would human affection fit into this bizarre and harsh environment? Would it be worth searching for? Or even possible? To me, love is always the turning point, the best hope for any future. And my favorite subject for a film. If nothing else, I hope TROUBLE IN MIND convinces you of that." To my surprise, pot-head Rudolph's film—and, of course (and obviously more importantly), real-life experience—has certainly convinced me of that.

While most of Rudolph's post-Welcome to L.A. output is mostly comprised of highly watchable auteur pieces, Trouble In Mind is probably his only film aside from his later romance neo-noir Love at Large (1990) that I would dare to describe as a personal favorite of sorts and something I could re-watch at least on a yearly basis, even though I would probably stop short of describing it as a masterpiece. Beyond my personal taste, the film represents Rudolph at the height of his auteur powers as a film that, totally transcending the Altmanian influence, could have only been directed by the filmmaker who, naturally being an idiosyncratic auteur, has never really gotten his due and is largely best remembered today among cinephiles as a loyal compatriot of Robert Altman. While the auteur would turn to more ambitious art faggotry the 'Lost Generation' flick The Moderns (1988), which is dripping with bohemian chic style and attitude, and even an unconventional biopic on red mischling Dorothy Parker entitled Mrs. Parker and the Vicious Circle (1994) starring Jennifer Jason Leigh in arguably the greatest performance of her rather eclectic career as the titular lead, these films fail to capture the shameless romantic resonance and dazzling oneiric aesthetic allure of Trouble In Mind. While his playfully preternatural fantasy flick Made in Heaven (1987) is undoubtedly romantic to the core, it is just too gimmicky, silly, and full of too many wussy rockers like Tom Petty and Neil Young to be taken as seriously as his great romances. In terms of aesthetics, positive approach to romance, and successfully subversive genre-tweaking, Trouble in Mind strangely reminds me of a sort of counterpiece film to Peckinpah's masterpiece Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia (1974) which, incidentally, features Kris Kristofferson in a small but unforgettable role as a rapist that gets his just deserts. While I typically subscribe to the Peckinpah School when it comes to patently pessimistic depictions of life and romance, Trouble In Mind is just pessimist and culturally nihilistic enough for one to reasonably accept its unconventionally hopeful happy ending in regard to love. Notably, Rudolph was not so optimistic about love's healing capacity and ability to save the sick and broken in his subsequent work Equinox (1992) where the quasi-autistic hero loses his chance at serious romance when his would-be-lady-love regretfully fails to flee with him for the Grand Canyon upon being forced to make a split-second decision about the future of their relationship. Of course, the antihero of Trouble In Mind is older and wiser than the lead of Equinox and thus does not waste time in securing his future. As Rudolph's own filmmaking career demonstrates, oftentimes with age comes wisdom, but pain and regrets regarding love can sometimes last a lifetime and Trouble In Mind seems to organically express that while remaining optimistic in regard to the quest for love in a seemingly loveless world of softcore authoritarian asininity where society is shit and culture and art are crap. In that sense, the film is more hopeful and inspiring than when it was originally released some 35 years ago.

TROUBLE IN MIND

Throughout his career, director Alan Rudolph has made no lie about the fact that his unique utilization of absurd humor and equally atypical aesthetics reflects his belief that real-life society is absurd and should symbolically depicted as such, or as he once stated in a 1993 Film Comment interview recounted by Richard Ness, "Once I realized I was going to take the leap with Divine, this was not going to be a conventional film. When Keith got involved we started talking about how this guy should go through these transformations. I never realized we would take it to such an exaggerated level, but then it seemed to be the way to do the story without taking it totally seriously. If you do these retro story plot ideas and take them terribly seriously, then you've made another exercise. The times seemed to be going through that culturally, with Reagan and all that; it just seemed to be an unfamiliar terrain that we were living in. There was an absurdity to the whole film that I kind of enjoyed—people talking funny languages, all the gangsters were inarticulate people who don't even use words so they growl. . . . What it really is is this thing that gets me in trouble all the time, which is this simultaneous serious-humorous. If you ask me to make a film that is the most accurate reflection that you see of our condition right now, I'd make a version of TROUBLE IN MIND or EQUINOX. I see it—it's absurd." Undoubtedly, in his tendency toward taking an absurdist approach to our putrid (post)modern milieu, Rudolph is practically sugarcoating cyanide, thereupon making the intolerable at least tolerable enough to be eccentrically engrossing in a way where the spiritual and cultural morbidity of modernity is at least recognized but thankfully not embraced in what is ultimately a sort of form of anti-escapism that manages to entertain even the exceedingly alienated and/or ludicrously lovelorn. Of course, in an absurd society, there is also a morally ambiguous blurring between cop and criminal as completely personified by antihero Hawk who, due to the degenerate world he lives in, had to learn to be a little bit of both and does it well. In that sense, I could not help but reminded of the Ernst Röhm quote, "The soldier turns away from this kind of false morality in disgust. What mattered to me in the field was not whether a soldier measured up to society's morals, but only whether he was a dependable man or not. An immoral man who achieves something is far more acceptable to me than a 'morally upright' fellow who ac-completes nothing. So-called society commits no greater sin and inflicts no greater harm than it does in this way. Suicides of the best people speak only too eloquently here.” In his sort of neoclassical historical fiction play My Friend Hitler (1968), Yukio Mishima speculated that Röhm foolishly stayed in Nazi Germany despite the high probability that he would be killed—as he ultimately was during the infamous so-called the Night of the Long Knives—out of a gay love and romantic allegiance to Uncle Adolf. Of course, cop or criminal, Hawk is, probably unlike tragic rectum-reamer Röhm, a great man and that is why he gets the girl in the end and he does not allow moral questions to get in the way of that fact, but both Trouble In Mind and My Friend Hitler demonstrate that the only truly timeless and respectable sacrifice is for love and death—or at least a willingness to dance with death—is a more worthy route than to betray said love and succumb to soulless mediocrity.

-Ty E

PREHYSTERIA 2
PREHYSTERIA 2

Albert Band* (1994)

Moonbeam Entertainment is that film company you remember from when you were a child. They released such classics as Josh Kirby: Time Warrior, Pet Shop, Prehysteria, and Adventures in Dinosaur City. These films are all ones that i remembered but could never find a title anywhere. Prehysteria 2 is the sequel to the original that broke rental records. The second is being helmed by Albert Band, who i will assume is Charles Band's butler. I'd like to assume this for comedic value. In the second coming, the story ditches the original little boy who has a strange likeness to Jonathan Taylor-Thomas, and instead focuses on a rich brat who later became the wardrobe designer for The Matrix. He uses his money to purchase a crate of raisins which contains a handful of "Rock'N'Roll" dinosaurs. These mischievous dinosaurs are all named after musical artists, some more popular than the rest. There is Jagger, Madonna, Hammer, Paula, and Elvis. ("The One" on his way to Zion) All of the characters fit the horrible stereotypes. The strict grandmother, the foreign gardener, the dad who has no time for his son, and the bumbling exterminators. Perhaps the worst stereotype of all is the token Goofy Jap. In all modern films, there lies at least one retarded Oriental. This one screams his name "Hiro!" over and over again and likes to sing really loud while preparing food. They exercise this stereotype even in modern films, like Disturbia. Even in films that embrace their own culture does evidence remain of this. The one surprise that i never expected was to see Giuseppe Andrews in this film. Yes, lil' Joey is in this film, sporting a plaid jacket as the gang leader of a bunch of miscreants. I noticed that most ringleaders of young crime grow up to become successful actors; such as Jack Black in The Neverending Story 3, as the pseudo skinhead. I thought i had seen it all too. (Giuseppe Andrews; 2nd from the right) When these films premiered, they were magical and brought you into a world of fantasy. As an adult, these films are just very ridiculous. Upon my second viewing of 3 Ninjas Kick Back, i found the film to just be one of the worst films i have ever seen. It sounds unlikely that i had liked it when i was a child. Prehysteria 2 isn't as good and magical as the first, but it is still entertaining and retains some charm.

-mAQ

BERNIE

Albert Dupontel (1996)

Bernie is a film directed and starring Albert Dupontel. You might have heard of Dupontel in his supporting acting role in the French art house drama Irreversible. Due to Dupontel's recent career as a stand up comedian, he has the talent in order to make people laugh. Well now, he is using to to make us laugh at inhuman things. Similar in style to Bonnie & Clyde and 2LDK, this story follows Bernie Christmas. He is an orphaned 30 year old who suffers from a case of mental retardation. Not as extreme as it sounds, but this doesn't stop him from making up invisible mafia plots and an excuse to find his parents; at any cost. Dupontel shines in this role. His sadism is cleverly masked by his charming sweet smile. Definitely one of the better psychopaths to be on screen. When i say that this film is a dark comedy, I mean black comedy. As in, this film is more taboo than even Visitor Q or Happiness. Dupontel succeeds at making it's viewer laugh at violence, rape, and dismemberments. It's easy to say that even the most jaded cinema viewer will have something new to shock & offend them. Whether it be butt-fuck rape, a certain wheelchair accident, or it's hilarious look at Africans living in France. The one scene in instance is when Bernie wishes to find his home. He encounters his old room, which is now home to a sprawling Negro family who doesn't seem to speak any language. Hilarity ensues as he goes down in the garbage chute on to have a syringe stick him in the face. While being from another apartment, I cannot help but to laugh at this could-be accidental AID's joke. Despite being a film that has bits of humor and horror in it, It also a quirky love story. It seems not all is right in this little man's head. Many of his adventures were even recorded on his personal tapes. When it boils down to the formula, Bernie is a rip-roaring sinister voyage into the gates of hell.

-Maq

CYBORG
CYBORG

Albert Pyun (1989)

"The muscles from Brussels" is indeed one of my favorite action stars. His action isn't exaggerated or falsified. In a time where action moguls (Tony Jaa, whom I love) rip the screen with unprecedented acrobatics, Van Damme was still printing enjoyable film after enjoyable film with insane plots and ridiculous dialogue that led to another fight scene, each better than the last. Cyborg is a film that markets the term "Cyborg" with the face of a battered Van Damme. For those who've seen this film, we all know that this film has very little to do with a Cyborg. Gibson Rickenbacker is a hired martial-artist/bodyguard that is seeking vengeance on a dread locked gang leader of a group called "Pirates". His quest will lead him to saving the life (er...) of a Cyborg carrying the cure of the plague that has destroyed most of humanity. Most of the humanitarian aspect of this film has been sacrificed for gun fights and high jump kicks. Where they could have taken the escort mission far, the plot is squandered for cheap thrills, but they do satisfy. Director Albert Pyun had been busy directing both Spiderman and Masters of the Universe 2. When the copyrights to both Mattel and Marvel became void, the recycled sets and such became home to a script dubbed Cyborg. The rest is history. Well, as historical as a less-than-memorable science fiction/action film can get. The enchanting asset to Cyborg is how young Van Damme looked at the end of the 80s. After watching Cyborg, It dawned to me just how well he would have fit into a role as Peter Pan. He might have even brought unspeakable entertainment to such film. Cyborg is by no means the definition or even the guideline of a classic. The action is indeed well filmed but the "good overpowers all" cycle is easily tiring. In fact, I couldn't recommend this film for anything other than Van Damme kicking dirty people repeatedly in the face. The Dystopian genre has been plagued, not from a mysterious illness, but from shoddy film making that is cleverly hidden so that the recycled plot/script isn't too noticeable to the fans of both Jean-Claude and fans of post-apocalyptic scenarios.

-mAQ

LE SALAMANDRE

Alberto Cavallone (1969)

With his risqué interracial-love-story-turned-homicidal-rampage Le salamandre (1969), Italian auteur Alberto Cavallone (Man, Woman and Beast, Blow Job) announced his potent and steadfast arrival in the world of Italian cinema. On top of making Cavallone a hot name (at least as far as producers were concerned) for the one and only time in his filmmaking career due to the film's surprisingly successful monetary gain at the box offices (earning 500 million liras), Le salamandre also launched the (albeit brief) careers of lead actresses Erna Schürer (Summer Love, Scream of the Demon Lover) and Beryl Cunningham (Il dio serpente, The Black Decameron). Despite its various scenes of gratuitous nudity (which seem quite tame by today's standards) and preposterous scenarios of lipstick lesbian pseudo-love, Le salamandre – which is mostly set at a post-colonial Tunisian vacation spot – is fundamentally a staunchly defiant socio-political work with a biting and acrimonious message targeting the white colonial oppressor. The film opens with a conspicuously consternating dream-sequence featuring a young black man being violently beaten and eventually castrated by three good ol' white boys on a serene and scenic beach. This whole scenario is witnessed by black American female protagonist Uta (Cunningham) as she hides in terror behind a bush like a wild bushwoman. Not long after seeing one of her brothers literally losing his manhood, Uta is welcomed with literal open-arms in a absurdly sympathetic manner by her white female lover Ursula (Schürer); a Swedish-American photographer with lady-licking proclivities. Apparently, this direful and sardonically symbolic dream-sequence, as well as the rest of Le salamandre was inspired by Cavallone's reading of French-Algerian philosopher Frantz Fanon's revolutionary work The Wretched of the Earth (1961); a volatile pseudo-Freudian/Marxist tirade that blames African male impotence on the (apparently) psychologically-emasculating brutality of colonizing white man. Considering the epidemic of rape and AIDS in most modern Africa nations, as well as starvation-stirring population booms, one can only assume the white devil's super sterilizing powers have only swayed since the decolonization of the dark continent. Despite the sometimes anachronistic nature of the film, Le salamandre does offer some seemingly moldy food for thought that most filmmakers in our toddler-like times of authoritarian political-correctness would barely consider, especially in regard to the still somewhat prevalent phenomenon of master-slave relationships between whites and blacks.

Starting on the first draft of Le salamandre in 1967 with collaborator Sergio Lentati, the film – ultimately for commercial reasons – became notably more erotic and increasingly less political when the finished product was completed, yet the political subtext is still quite potent and an intrinsic attribute of the work. In a most antagonistic manner, Cavallone described the message of Le salamandre dre as follows: “You came to see this film just to see two naked women... you have a colonialist mentality. Nothing’s changed, the only way to change things is to kill you.” Indeed, Le salamandre ends on a murderous and sadistically psychosexual note that is bound to offend certain superficially liberal folks who see the antidote to centuries of hostile race relations as skin-deep physical love and miscegenation. The character of Uta learns everything she needs to know about whiteness through her sexual relationships with Ursula and later psychologist Henri Duval (Antony Vernon); an intellectually inquisitive middle-aged man who randomly meets the twosome on the beach (when Ursula is topless, of course), thus eventually forming a torrid and tumultuous threesome. However different each white lover may initially seem to Uta, she discovers that most of them view her as nothing more than an exotic and sexually stimulating novelty of sorts and not as an individual with any inkling of personal merit. While watching Le salamandre one learns that Ursula ‘rescued’ and brought up Uta from being a penniless nothing to a renowned international model. Ursula also fails to hide her overwhelming feeling of superiority and sense of ownership over Uta, as if the black girl owes her body to her rescuing and ever so resourceful master. Initially, Uta is afraid of Henri and his psychoanalytic speculations, but she eventually comes to realize some less than flattering things about herself and her melanin-deprived lovers via these theories, to the eventual detriment of the good doctor. Cavallone also spliced in real stock-footage of executions as ghostly symbols of the colonial past that Uta seems to feel in a metaphysical manner (it seems Cavallone envisioned the mystical ‘supernatural Negro’ idea long before films like The Green Mile and The Legend of Bagger Vance were ever created), but fails to affect her perfectly comfortable and always hedonistic white compatriots. It is only when all the discommodious emotions brewing within her soul become intolerable that Uta is able to collect herself and take action in a seemingly unbecoming style that is no less audacious than the ending featured in Melvin Van Peebles’ revolutionary work Sweet Sweetback’s Baadasssss Song (1971). Like Van Peebles’ socially influential and economically successful film, Le salamandre was not intended as a ‘feel good’ exploitation work, but as a serious ‘call to arms’ of the violent nation-imploding persuasion.

LE SALAMANDRE

Despite its abrupt and unduly unpleasant ending (at least for white folks), Le salamandre also concludes with the revelation by Cavallone that the viewer is watching a mere work of fiction created by a filmmaker in a fashion not unlike the one featured at the conclusion of fellow Italian auteur filmmaker Federico Fellini’s late masterpiece E la nave va (1983) aka And the Ship Sails On. Although one of Cavallone’s earliest works, Le salamandre is also certainly one of his most complex, mixing discordant phantasmagorical dream-sequences, hyper-realist stock-footage of authentic mass murder, and sleekly stylized scenes of sensational lesbian erotica in a film that – in terms of execution and overall quality – totally eclipses the director’s later Africa-based post-colonial work Afrika (1973).

Unsurprisingly, few of the filmgoers who originally saw Le salamandre upon its original premiere cared for its keen socio-political complexity. Although a film producer offered Cavallone the job of directing another film in the spirit of Le salamandre starring Florinda Bolkan, the Italian auteur declined and instead directed Dal nostro inviato a Copenaghen (1970) aka From Our Copenhagen's Correspondent; a patently anti-American work about two U.S. army deserters who try to survive while taking refuge from the Vietnam war in Copenhagen. Of course, one of Alberto Cavallone's greatest attributes as a filmmaker was his uncompromising artistic vision, even if he sometimes failed in his cinematic experiments, thus Le salamandre is an especially must-see work as it comes as one of the Italian filmmaker's most adept efforts.

-Ty E

FROM OUR COPENHAGEN'S CORRESPONDENT
FROM OUR COPENHAGEN'S CORRESPONDENT

Alberto Cavallone (1970)

Long before Francis Ford Coppola, Oliver Stone, and Stanley Kubrick directed myth making films where they more or less dictated to the audience what they thought the Vietnam War was all about and how evil it was, a little known subversive Guido auteur by the name of Alberto Cavallone (Man, Woman and Beast, Blue Movie) directed a scathing low-budget shocker entitled From Our Copenhagen's Correspondent (1970) aka Dal nostro inviato a Copenaghen aka Sindrome Infernal aka Così U.S.A., which depicts the madness and misery that ensues when two shell-shocked American GIs that saw action in Vietnam desert their post in Wiesbaden, West Germany and hide in Copenhagen with the help of a far-left group with dubious intentions by posing as graduate students working on their thesis. Audaciously anti-American as demonstrated by its alternate title 'Così U.S.A.' (which, according to Cavallone scholar Roberto Curti, is a wordplay on the phrase "così usa", which in Italian means "that's the way it goes"), as well as critical of both the left and right and the pornography industry, Cavallone's film may look like an ambitiously directed piece of dago diarrhea, but it also makes Coppola's Apocalypse Now (1979) and Stone's Platoon (1986) seem like sentimental humanist flicks by comparison. Cavallone's subsequent film after the racially-charged Sapphic hit Le salamandre (1969)—a work depicting a messed up miscegenation-based ménage-à-trois between a blonde Swedish-American photographer, her murderous negress lover, and a frog psychologist that temporarily made the filmmaker seem bankable in Italy for the first and last time in his distinctly uneven career—From Our Copenhagen's Correspondent proved that the auteur, who turned down an offer to direct another lesbo exploitation flick starring Florinda Bolkan, refused to play by the rules and would try in vain to be the master of his own destiny. Cavallone's film depicts two men who also attempt to become masters of their own destinies, only to find themselves physical and metaphysical prisoners in a foreign Nordic nation where they succumb to poverty, predatory married middle-aged homosexuals, the Danish porn industry, Nam' and childhood incest flashbacks (in that sense, the film has a lot in common with the Amero Brothers' phantasmagoric 1971 blue movie Bacchanale), murderous impulses, and mental illness. An intentionally ugly film that was made all the more effective for me due to the horrendous bootleg print I watched, From Our Copenhagen's Correspondent is, for better or worse, arguably the most nasty and nihilistic Vietnam War flick ever made, as a sort of grating Guido equivalent to Michael Verhoeven's kraut artsploitation flick O.K. (1970), albeit all the more misanthropic and histrionically acted.

After seeing the corpse of their comrade, whose skull was crushed and body ran over by two fellow GIs, American GIs Nick Valenti (played by Tony Di Mitri, who fittingly had an uncredited role in Luchino Visconti's 1954 masterpiece Senso) and William Cole (played by one-time Pasolini production assistant Walter Fabrizio who, being a Guido Klaus Kinski clone of sorts, was credited in the film as 'Alain N. Kalsyj') get scared and opt to go AWOL and leave their base in Wiesbaden, West Germany to Copenhagen, Denmark where a group of leftists have a secret underground network that harbors deserters and other military misfits. Unfortunately, since both men, especially William, saw action in Vietnam and were deeply affected by the sight of gook Napalm victims and child corpses, they will have a hard time camouflaging themselves among the general populous in the seemingly sleazy Nordic city where perverts, swindlers, and sadists seem to be lurking around every corner. Unquestionably, Amerowop Nick is easily the most mentally stable of the two men and acts as a sort of surrogate parent to pseudo-WASP William (indeed, while a blonde boy, 'Kalsyj' is clearly a dirty dago posing as an all-American Anglo), who is a hopeless neurotic with more than a couple screws loose and thus probably not the most ideal man to have been sent to the Asiatic third world to blow away goofy gooks and whatnot. While Nick has real problems with the guy harboring him, William finds himself to be the object of desire of a Danish married couple named the Gustavsens.

When Mr. Gustavsen tries to get in William's pants, he merely smashes the crypto-cocksucker in the balls, but when Mrs. Gustavsen (played by Cavallone's wife Maria Pia Luzi, who starred in a number of the director's films) takes out her tits, he reluctantly gives in and finds himself having hallucinations of napalm and gooks being blown to pieces while having sex. After commencing a sloppy coitus session with Mrs. Gustavsen, William seems to become possessed, nonsensically stating, "I get the urge to shoot and shoot. BANG! BANG! BANG! [...] This is my sound, I love this sound...BANG! BANG! BANG!," and proceeds to attempt to brutally murder the unhappily married woman. Meanwhile, due to the fact he has run out of money and cannot find legal employment since he is a so-called 'undocumented worker,' Nicky boy begins starring in porn films featuring two chicks and, somewhat symbolically, a Guinea pig. The pornographer Nick works for is a sort of debauched pseudo-Freudian crackpot who rationalizes his scummy line of work with the following absurd theory: "We live in a society starved of tits. We see them everywhere; lemons, oranges, grapefruit...All women must have tits; natural or made of rubber...Of course. Far from Twiggy. The reason lies in breastfeeding...Instead of breasts, they put a baby's bottle in their mouths when they return from the hospital...So what happens? A trauma." Of course, the only one really suffering from a trauma in the film is William, though it has more to do with his scandalously sordid relationship with his sister than his mother's lack of breastfeeding.

While in the wild jungles of Gookland, William engaged in torture, including the removable of Vietcong members' entire fingernails with pliers and whatnot, but he seems more plagued by the patently perverse relationship he had with his sister than engaging in sadistic forms of warfare. After discovering that William attempted to kill the young wife that provided him with sanctuary, Nick brings his comrade to stay with an unsavory pinko left-wing psychologist named Dr. Max Borg (played by Spaghetti western star Antonio Casale, who worked as an assistant director on Cavallone's previous film Le salamandre)—a despicable dude that keeps decrepit elderly catatonic cripples and lavish hardcover editions of C.G. Jung books around his office—who diagnoses the deranged deserter as being schizophrenic and immediately begins using him as a guinea pig for his sadistic psychological experiments. Borg is married to a young babe named Ulla and she has much empathy for William, who thinks she is his sister. After discovering incest with his sister is the root of William's psychosis, Dr. Borg coerces his wife Ulla to play along and pretend she is the mentally perturbed GI's beloved sister Kate. After telling her to call him 'squirrel' (he also describes himself as being, "Tough like a lobster, a crab, a turtle"), William begins talking about his love for his sister and the atrocities that he committed in the war, including offering $200 to the man who killed the most gooks during battle. While somewhat rightly describing Dr. Borg as wanting to kill him (the good doctor may not want to personally kill him, but he is willing to sacrifice him for 'science'), William also begins fantasizing about suicide when not frolicking around in fields with his pseudo-sister Ulla. Eventually, Nick reveals to Borg that most of his platoon was accidentally annihilated in 'friendly fire,' with the same army helicopter that bombed them into oblivion also picking up the surviving members of the doomed brigade. Nick also theorizes that the American helicopter intentionally attacked his platoon so as to stir hatred against the Vietcong. In the end, William is reunited with his sister and the unethical psychologist Dr. Borg finally begins to question not only the conscience of his patient, but his own.

FROM OUR COPENHAGEN'S CORRESPONDENT

As an anarchic work that deals with common yet rarely cinematically depicted plagues that infected American GIs during the Vietnam War, including heroin addiction, 'friendly fire,' the coldblooded murder of commanders by the troops, the perennial problem of posttraumatic stress disorder, the use of post-WWII Europe as an exploited vassal of the anti-Occidental American military-industrial complex, and the disgusting treatment of American soldiers by effete left-wing academics who did nothing about war yet feel the need to always offer their purely bullshit theories about it, From Our Copenhagen's Correspondent was surely ahead of its time and probably attempts to tackle more issues than any other film of its kind, which is unfortunate considering the film is such an eccentric mess of gratuitous shock value, grating Guido histrionics, and glaring incoherence as a signature Cavallone work that is equal parts socio-political agitprop, aberrant avant-garde celluloid art, and excessive exploitation trash. Undoubtedly, one of the most annoying yet sometimes unintentionally humorous aspects of the film is its incessant use of zoom shots, with Cavallone himself even stating of the film some years later in an interview regarding the work: "It looks as if the director had just discovered the use of the zoom lens." With its use of cheap stock war footage, the Italian countryside in place of the jungles of Vietnam, conspicuously Italian cast to play Americans and Danes, and rather ridiculous dubbed dialogue, the film is just too blatantly cheap and thrown together for most viewers to take its heavy socio-political issues seriously. At the same time, Cavallone's work has a partial 'neo-neorealist' essence about it, especially during a scene that was shot on a handheld camera of wayward character William going around to anonymous Danes and absurdly asking them, "Who am I?" Ultimately, From Our Copenhagen's Correspondent is an innately incendiary and iconoclastic work that belongs in the same category of forgotten misfit Vietnam War movies like Verhoeven's O.K., but also Amero-Guido Buddy Giovinazzo's Combat Shock (1984) and even Burr Jerger's General Massacre (1973). Of course, for Cavallone's small but loyal fan base, From Our Copenhagen's Correspondent certainly beats another re-watching of Platoon, as a work that may be technically inept and oftentimes tedious but ultimately has more testicular fortitude than 10,000 Goombah left-wing terrorists.

-Ty E

MAN, WOMAN AND BEAST
MAN, WOMAN AND BEAST

Alberto Cavallone (1977)

Man, Woman and Beast (1977) aka L'uomo la donna e la bestia aka Spell - Dolce mattatoio is most assuredly one of the most lavishly, methodically, and harmoniously crafted works of lecherous high-sleaze ever concocted. Directed by Alberto Cavallone of Blue Movie (1978) infamy, Man, Woman and Beast has all the aberrant auteur ingredients one would expect from the unabashedly debauched Italian filmmaker: killer sex (both literally and figuratively), sexually impotent artists, apprehensive commie verbal spew, and immoderately crude scatological fixations. Easily Cavallone's most well-known and most artistically eclectic effort, Man, Woman and Beast manages to do the seemingly insurmountable by seamlessly hybridizing both the sensational surrealism and quasi-cinéma vérité realism that the filmmaker is celebrated for. Unlike the mental maestro's subsequent effort Blue Movie – a work that was essentially assembled in an improvised manner on a nonexistent budget over the course of a week or so – Man, Woman and Beast has the certified picturesque stamp of an idiosyncratic 1970s masterpiece of Italian cinema, as it features obsessive direction and polished technique that is surely in recherché company with the 'self-indulgent' later works of Federico Fellini, yet it also includes incendiary libertine content that rivals that of Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), except executed in a charmingly campy fashion that is more akin to Dada than to de Sade. In fact, Man, Woman and Beast is a work that pays humble, if equally intimately perverse, homage to its aesthetic influences. Featuring appearances of artistic works by artists including Hans Bellmer, Salvador Dalí, Gustave Courbet, and José Posada, as well as thematic nods to literary lechers including Comte de Lautréamont, Jean Genet, Georges Bataille, and to a somewhat less noticeable and more anachronistic extent – Marquis de Sade – Man, Woman and Beast is a work that although culturally cultivated, does not attempt to mask its influences in a borderline plagiaristic fashion. Out of all its morally execrable influences, a delightfully deleterious tribute to Georges Bataille's short novella Story of the Eye (1928) is ultimately the most assuredly memorable, negligently nefarious, and perversely potent. Despite its many scenes of somber and severe sadism, Man, Woman and Beast is indubitably a mischievously mirthful work that has few contemporaries in regards to its bodacious bestialized badinage and overall ribald absurdism. In short, Man, Woman and Beast is an ungodly and exceedingly audacious avant-garde work that pays paradisiacal homage to Dadaism like no other cinematic work before nor after it. In fact, Marcel Duchamp himself could not have done a more desirable job capturing the essence of the innately irrational art movement in celluloid form.

Upon superficial glance, Man, Woman and Beast seems like a domesticated Italian neo-neo-realist work due to its sometimes everyday portrayal of a seemingly traditional and typical Italian Catholic village, but underneath the thin veneer of normality lies a copious collection of vicious, violent, untamed, and even murderous sexual pathologies that would even astound the most seasoned of Reichian psychoanalysts and cannibalistic gay pornstars. In the village of wanton vulgarity featured in Man, Woman and Beast, a butcher packs his meat with his own unkosher meat, an Electra complex is utterly appeased via incestuous progeny-begetting familial relations, a lapsed-Marxist maniac attempts to tame his even more deranged wife, and a conspiring priest uses images of saints and the labor of unsuspecting children as a parasitic means to sell lottery tickets. Unsurprisingly, Man, Woman and Beast was filmed around the period of the so-called 'Anni di Piombo' (aka Leaden Years) during the mid-1970s in Italy when a nation-revamping revolution seemed like a very real possibility and when right-wing and left-wing were in unofficial camaraderie in their campaign to blow-up as many government buildings and officials as possible. Man, Woman and Beast does a most decorous job expressing this corrosive countrywide phenomenon at the community-level by the way of man's most rudimentary, if base, form of social interaction: sexual intercourse. What becomes most apparent while watching the mostly sadistic sexcapades featured in Man, Woman, and Beast is that not one of the characters featured in the film approaches eroticism from a natural and utilitarian manner, hence the predominant theme of a society in disorder. In Man, Woman and Beast, sacrilegious sexual dysfunction and frivolous fetishism become sport and societal degeneration an uncontested, if unspoken and strategically veiled, matter-of-fact. Cavallone did a marvelous job highlighting this perturbing paradox by assembling a series of contradictory collages and montages comparing society of the old (outdoors and in public) and new (indoors and in privacy). For example, toward the end of Man, Woman and Beast, footage of jubilant villagers dancing jovially during an annual religious festival is spliced together with images of a young woman murdering her unsuspecting partner with scissors and scheid during an impassioned session of sexual intercourse. Strangely (but most appropriately), the film ends with the melancholy face of an impressionable young lad who is undoubtedly symbolic of Italy's problematic future. It is not unlikely that this boy would grow up to be like Marco Corbelli; the lurid cross-dressing lunatic behind the Italian noise project Atrax Morgue who committed suicide by the way of hanging in 2007 after a lifetime of necrosis fetishism.

Director Alberto Cavallone once admitted that the character of a Christ-like homeless man featured in Man, Woman and Beast was his alter-ego. Fittingly, this mystery man is a herald of change, but – unfortunately for the villagers and himself – their damned futures are already foretold. The uncanny wanderer also meets a deplorable doom that would anticipate the thoroughly demented defecation-phile anti-hero of Cavallone's successive film Blue Movie. Indeed, in the wretched realm of Man, Woman and Beast, god has died a most unflat-tering death and has gone to waste in literal human waste. Even the fanatical godless commie of the film has lost his faith in Marxist propaganda and the world revolution, as expressed by him vocally and when he superimposes an image of Vladimir Lenin over a picture of a woman's sin flower, which is most certainly a bantam and frolicsome expression of Cavallone's own newfound political disillusionment. Unquestionably, Man, Woman and Beast is an uncompromising expression of nihilism and a bold testament to the apocalyptic arrival of der letzte Mensch, but also a work of active artistic nihilism that had the potential to spark a revolution in cinema that was only vaguely hinted at by future subversive arthouse filmmakers like Jörg Buttgerit, Karim Hussain, and Andrey Iskanov. Disenchanted with commercial success and (arguably) cinematic artistry in general, Cavallone would later give total way to his abased aesthetic proclivities as expressed by the hardcore pornographic nature of most of his later works. Aside from possibly his lost masterpiece Maldoror (1977), Man, Woman and Beast is unmistakably Cavallone's crowning achievement as a filmmaker and his celluloid magna opera. Like his vital influence Georges Bataille, Cavallone is one of few artists that successfully proved that artistically-refined works can be pornographic and vice versa. If it were not for his later propensity for creating mostly incoherent esoteric hardcore pornography, Cavallone may have gone onto consummate a reputation as grand and venerated as fellow Italian filmmakers Federico Fellini and Pier Paolo Pasolini, as he certainly deserves it, even if only for Man, Woman and Beast; a blissfully carnal phantasmagorical work that does the seemingly inconceivable by vigorously raping the senses in a spellbinding and inordinately multi-orgasmic way with salacious sin-ridden scenes of grotesque human depravity. As Nietzsche's Zarathustra once preached, "as for me, I rejoice in great sin as in my great solace."

MAN, WOMAN AND BEAST

-Ty E

BLUE MOVIE

Alberto Cavallone (1978)

I first became conscious of the devalued and often derided Italian auteur Alberto Cavallone (1938-1997) after researching cinematic adaptations of Comte de Lautréamont's six cantos poetic novel Les Chants de Maldoror (The Songs of Maldoror). Although dismayed upon learning that Cavallone's Maldoror (1975) was never ever actually released due to petty monetary reasons (even though the blessed few who have actually seen the film regard it as the filmmaker's celluloid opus magnum), I was at least introduced to the seemingly lunatic libertine filmmaker's consistently controversial yet cinematically diverse filmography that includes everything from esoteric hardcore pornography (Baby Sitter aka Il nano erotico) to less-than-action-packed-post-colonial-homoerotic-race-mixing-adventure flicks (Afrika) to kaleidoscopic Bataille-esque avant-garde surrealist works (Man, Woman And Beast aka L'uomo la donna e la bestia aka Spell). Recently, I had the extraordinarily effete aristocratic pleasure of watching Cavallone's Blue Movie (1978); a lurid scatological celluloid phantasm that the filmmaker made during a turning point in his career before gaining the distinction of being one of Italy's most enigmatic hermetic hardcore pornographers. Borrowing its name from Andy Warhol's amateurish sex flick of the same name (Cavallone would do the same with his later Cocteau-esque surrealist sleaze flick Blow Job), Blue Movie was created in a similar perfunctory fashion as many of the earlier films directed by the famous American homo hack artiste. Apparently assembled on a whim inspired by a bet made by producer Martial Boschero, Blue Movie – a work that foretells the Dogme 95 movement – was made in a lackadaisical Roger Corman-style manner (production lasted a week) on a nonexistent budget with mostly non-actors, yet the film is very possibly Cavallone's most unscrupulous and discombobulated work. Despite featuring scenes of hardcore pornography (which were subsequently cut at the behest of the Italian Board of Censors), a decidedly incoherent plot, a depraved 'anti-hero' with a fecal fetish, and exceedingly somber themes of staggering hyper-nihilism, Blue Movie would go on to become a box-office hit of sorts in Italy. After watching Blue Movie a couple times, I find it quite unimaginable that such a debauched film featuring naked Italian beauties eating shit would prove to be palatable for public consumption, but I can't say I don't like the idea of such a ruthless eremitic work obtaining semi-mainstream notoriety. In short, Blue Movie proved to be a work that lives up to its underground cult cinema infamy.

Blue Movie follows cunning Claudio, a serious newspaper photographer turned mechanic (while moonlighting as a shutterbug pornographer) who derives venerate and aesthetic pleasure from humiliating graceful statuesque women. While talking to a prospective sex-slave, Claudio matter-of-factly states to the lovely little lady, "Your beauty is absurd and I can't stand beauty. I love to see fear on people's faces. Degradation. Its then that they become human." Indeed, throughout Blue Movie, Claudio proves his propensity towards 'humanizing' women through a variety of fetishistic dehumanizing methods that only a completely unhinged sadomasochist with an uncontrollable urge could execute so keenly and unwaveringly. After being nearly turbulently raped by a malicious masked man in the woods, a young beautiful named Silvia is picked up randomly by Claudio as he cruises down a desolate road in his beloved automobile. Little does stunned Silvia know that her personal nightmare is going to be compounded by a manipulative man who finds alleviation in footage of genocide and delights in taking photographs of girls drenched in toxic dung. As a man of exquisite refined taste, Claudio incessantly plays the musical compositions of German composer Johann Sebastian Bach as his own personal soundtrack (which acts as the score for the film). Like many patrons of the arts, Claudio is a committed cinephile of sorts who luxuriates in watching forgotten silent vaudeville comedies and slow-motion stock-footage of Vietnamese Mahāyāna Buddhist monk Thích Quảng Đức burning himself to death. Not content with just using Silvia as his own personal Devil's plaything, Claudio recruits an alluring model and an attractive homeless gal as disposable accessories for his scantily furnished scat-house. While the later two are mostly pleased with Claudio's omnipresent charm and confident courteousness, Silvia – who seems to be suffering from delusions brought upon by post-traumatic stress – cannot shake-off visions of encroaching faceless rapists and milky blood filling up the bathtub. Luckily, Silvia has a gay black male companion (who carries around a skull in a bag) who is looking out for her interests, but he essentially proves to be no more useful than the Negro elder from Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980). Speaking of Kubrick, Cavallone must have been a fan of A Clockwork Orange (1971) as Blue Movie also features an amorous spasmodic montage coupled with Teutonic classical music; the main difference being that while droog dictator Alex can more than aptly sexually service a tenacious twosome a number of times during a single sexual session, Claudio cannot even get off from a mere passive hand-job, hence the source of his preternatural proclivities. That being said, one can only guess how much of Alberto Cavallone's own personality was channeled into the character of Claudio, as Blue Movie is undoubtedly an utterly frustrated expression of Weltschmerz and irremediable impotence. Forget fellow Italian filmmaker Romano Scavolini's 1981 slasher flick, Blue Movie is a truly unflinching and wholly unequivocal expression of Nightmares in a Damaged Brain.

BLUE MOVIE

The relative commercial success of Blue Movie turned out to be just as big of surprise to Cavallone as the film itself is to most uninitiated viewers as expressed by the filmmaker introspective quote, "I was bewildered by the box office results. Blue Movie was meant to piss off the raincoat crowd, it was such an antagonist film..." Indubitably, one of the film's greatest attributes is its abiding carnal cruelty and deep-rooted misanthropy and misogyny. Although the world positively suffers due to the lack of materialization of Cavallone's unreleased masterpiece Maldoror (which has essentially vanished without a trace), Blue Movie makes for a germane celluloid panorama of Comte de Lautréamont's clamorous influence on the venturesome Italian auteur, as it is a work that features a quasi-Satanic steady stream-of-consciousness (non) narrative and hypnagogic sexual deviance; two glaring traits that helped earn the tragic pseudo-Count posthumous immortality. Despite its grody dreamlike imagery and disconcerting schizophrenic editing, Blue Movie, not unlike Roger Watkins' more or less tamer work Last House on Dead End Street (1977), often has the begrimed aura of a genuine vintage snuff/found footage, but incongruous with authentic stock-footage, one never really knows whether the scenarios played out in the film are real or imaginary, let alone discerning which character's mind/reality we are peering into. Outstandingly, Blue Movie is often humorous (and seemingly intentionally so), in spite of the film's loony licentiousness, but then again, such a fundamentally anti-human work would probably be rather intolerable without a little tenebrous comic relief. Like many of Cavallone's earlier films, Blue Movie features Marxist political commentary about consumerism, but I won't bore you with specifics as it ultimately, in my opinion, detracts from the film, but I will say it is more subtly executed than anything that George A. Romero has ever done. It should be noted that virtually from the get-go of Blue Movie, it is more than apparent that all the women featured in the film are absolute material objects for cagey Claudio to defile, hence the appearance of various symbolic toy dolls and figurines that somehow mysteriously change position as time passes on. It is only when semi-psychotic Silvia forgets her foreordained subservient role that Claudio's Section 8 microcosm comes tumbling down. In the end, cursed Claudio finally achieves the climactic consolation that he failed to acquire from normal sexual intercourse. If you're keen on watching films that rape your senses and berate your moral compass, make yourself some cold chocolate milk and cuddle with a love one to an intimate screening of Blue Movie; an original romantic comedy for less inhibited and more ambitious lovers.

-Ty E

BLOW JOB – SOFFIO EROTICO
BLOW JOB – SOFFIO EROTICO

Alberto Cavallone (1980)

Worthwhile works of Gothic horror-core are quite hard to come by, thus Alberto Cavallone's phantasmagoric porn flick Blow Job - Soffio erotico (1980) – although intrinsically inferior to the Italian filmmaker's previous films – comes as notable exception. Directed by the nearly forgotten arthouse smut auteur who brought us such mostly unsung cult classics as Zelda (1974) and Blue Movie (1978), Blow Job signified the steady artistic and monetary decline of Cavallone's – at best – marginally successful film career. The production of the film was cursed from the beginning as one of the film's producers committed suicide (as if he was an anti-hero in one of Cavallone's films) during the filming of Blow Job, which is indubitably a shining, albeit tragic (at least as far as the film's budget was concerned) example of life imitating art, at least for those individuals that have seen the film. Essentially divided into two halves, Blow Job begins as what initially seems to be a generic Italian smut flick and later morphs into what is one of the most ridiculously wanton and discombobulated Gothic horror films ever created. Following in the delightfully despoiled footsteps of the Amero brother's gothic LSD trip Bacchanale (1970) and anticipating Stanley Kubrick's final effort Eyes Wide Shut (1999), Blow Job is a spasmodically sleazy yet swimmingly surreal cinematic wet dream where everything is not as it seems; at least, for the film's oversexed and mentally obscured protagonist; a flagrant fellow who could pass as Jim Morrison's swarthy and less attractive Italian ½ brother. Like the poetry and lyrics of Mr. Morrison, Blow Job is a haunting expression of an erotically-obsessed and esoteric escapist mind that is thematically naughty and aesthetically nice. Cavallone stated of Blow Job, "the whole film was focused on the possibility of escaping from our own bodies, by modifying sensorial perceptions through the use of drugs or self-concentration," thus, it should be no epiphany that the film is best viewed while one's intellect is totally tuned out; or at least when one is reasonably inebriated.

Blue Job begins with the introduction of actors/lovers Stefano and Diana frolicking around stark-naked in a scarcely furnished hotel room that they do not even enough money to pay for. Although Diana makes quite the first impression when she crawls on the floor while in the bare like a seductive sex kitten on the prowl, she cannot compare to the various nefarious nymphomaniacs who will eventually ransack Latin lover Stefano's crotch. Naturally, Stefano and Diana find themselves in trouble when they fail to pay their hotel bill, but they manage to escape unscathed after a woman randomly falls to her death from the balcony of the building. The couple's luck seems to change for the better when they encounter an eccentric middle-aged woman named Angela at a race-track who has a keen eye for foretelling the winning racehorse. After profiting from the fruitful predictions of lady luck, Stefano and Diana follow Angela to her lavish countryside villa, a somewhat chilling yet chimerical spot with seemingly shady characters whose dubious intentions appear less than savory. Not long after arriving at this majestic maniac mansion, Angela's put Diana under an incapacitating spell that ultimately uncouples her from Stefano. After being separated from his inamorata, Stefano enters through a series of literal and figurative doors of perception that become increasingly nonsensical and indiscreetly erotic. Among other things, Italian stallion Stefano encounters a quaint she-devil on wheels with a kitschy totenkopf mask who rides her motorcycle in the mansion during a lunatic's ball; and a one-eyed erotomaniac who enjoys teasing the man with her grotesque facial deformity and devouring his body. In the divinely demented Gothic delusional realm of Blow Job, nothing is as it seems, thus making for a rare quasi-porn flick that concludes in an abrupt and fantastic fashion that is worthy of being compared to such cinematic classics as the German expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) and Herk Harvey's extremely influential cult horror flick Carnival of Souls (1962).

Compared to Alberto Cavallone's previous works Man, Woman and Beast (1977) and Blue Movie (1978), Blow Job – despite its various scenes of hardcore and not so hardcore sex – is a relatively harmless yet sporadically tasteless work directed by a once politically and socially concerned man who – like many creative and revolutionary individuals of his era – settled for escaping in his own manifestly tainted psyche via irrational metaphysical mumbo-jumbo and mind-altering chemicals as testified by the film. Of course, Blow Job is a much more artistically ambitious, campy and erotically-charged work than the Andy Warhol 1963 short it was inane named after. Additionally, Blow Job seems like an immaculate masterpiece of erotic arthouse cinema when compared to the awfully artless yet somehow more popular works of fellow Mediterranean libertine filmmakers Joe D'Amato and Jess Franco. Watching Blow Job may not be as gratifying as receiving actual fellatio, but it does feature an oftentimes entrancing diacritic Arcadia all of its own.

-Ty E

BEING CAPTURED
BEING CAPTURED

Alberto Cavallone (1982) Being Captured is yet another euro-trash obscurity that really doesn't make a lick of sense. The plot line follows a woman who gets hired to babysit a supposed child while the wife has an affair with her chauffeur. The only conflicting problem is that the child is a midget in a sailor outfit with a blowgun armed with poison dart. That's right. This piece of cinema is among many that have been lost and discredited due to obvious reasons, but the truth is that Being Captured is a form of sleazy anti-art. The film's narration follows the victim as she is explaining what happened to her friend; a lawyer. A story that involves a strip-teasing kidnapping midget who has a numerous amount of eccentric fetishes including rape and sodomy. The film is from a VHS transfer available from VSoM, but this version is subbed and cut, so you can imagine how horrible the quality is. The obscurity for the film is the most appealing asset besides the midget's array of trashy fetishes. This is just one of few films that doesn't have an IMDb page. Watching a woman trying to escape from a midget and fail is pretty funny. It is almost as horrible as watching a tiny doll overpower a full-grown man as seen in Child's Play. The film has a pretty horrible approach on midgets. She constantly screams, "Dirty midget" while he attempts to sodomize her. The name of the game is stupidity. Sabrina has so many chances to escape but is plagued with naivety, as are most characters on film in similar situations. The soundtrack is reminiscent to most low budget Euro-trash films. Keep in mind this film has an extreme amount of nudity. In fact, Sabrina is only clothed for around 9 minutes of its hour-long runtime. Italian filmmaker Alberto Cavallone credits his name as Baron Corvo when he directed this film. It must be to hide his name from this absurdity. Being Captured is a rare find that will appease anyone who is a fan of the down right bizarre. Keep in mind though; the ending is basically a lifetime film when it comes down to federal officials. My advice is watch the first 50 minutes, then turn it off.

-mAQ

TESIS

Alejandro Amenábar° (1996)

The thing about reviewing thriller films is finding the words to express the film as best as you can. In every review for a suspense film, you will find words like "first-rate" or tense & taut". The lack of variety in detailing leaves for an unsure mind in need of a recommendation. Natural Born Killers was once heralded for its abrasive look at violence in the media. Allow this film to step aside for a film depicting violence in a small environment, Tesis is here to stay amongst the classics.

A film more realistic and mentally explosive than 8mm, Tesis provides countless progression to keep the mood intact and the story tense. A film student is developing a thesis on violence in film. She then uncovers a snuff film and is led into a labyrinth of betrayal, lust, and deceit. She eventually uncovers a snuff ring and the truth may be more horrifying than she originally expected.

Besides from our inquisitive female lead Ana Torrent, the cast is composed of Spanish unknowns and one happens to eerily resemble Johnny Depp. Tesis is one of few films to give the snuff mythology the proper treatment to film. It's quite ironic that a video tape featuring a death recorded for entertainment and/or to sell is one of the hardest horror subjects to adapt into film. As for the speculation that snuff films don't exist, that's utter nonsense. The coercion of other films on snuff include the basement mixtape gritty filming style. Killing someone on film wouldn't have to be so nightmare inducing if you were killing someone for entertainment, which is the exact reason when a film on snuff tries to make you feel "Seedy" for watching the material, you feel like you're watching a normal film on snuff. Tesis, on the other hand, puts the illegal ring around a secure location and increases the absurdity and suspense of it all. Tesis as a film completely surprised me. Do not expect a new age art in the guise of a thrilling film. It is an extravagant look at how a murderer could be amongst your midst and increases that very existent paranoia. Tesis is an extremely average film that might surpass 8mm. It's hard to surpass Joaquin Phoenix in a punk fashion.

-mAQ

EL TOPO
EL TOPO

Alejandro Jodorowsky* (1970)

I have almost always had somewhat mixed feelings about Jewish-Chilean-French auteur Alejandro Jodorowsky (Fando y Lis, The Holy Mountain) and certainly get a feeling of decided disgust when I encounter his more devout disciples, yet I respect him, if for nothing else, as a filmmaker with a distinct and uncompromising vision. Indeed, as a man who wore a special pair of underwear (apparently, black silk underpants with holes exposing his testicles and penis head, as well as a green circle over the area covering the anus) so he would not mimic the contrived cowboy cockiness of John Wayne, picked out a short yet thick rock in the shape of a chode for the set that resembled his own penis, made filmic love to a Mexican dwarf and apparently actually really raped his female costar for ostensible 'realism' during a rape scene, forced his real-life pre-pubescent son to star in the film completely naked in a role also as his onscreen son, and utilized countless dead, and oftentimes mutilated, animal corpses (as the director admitted himself, he killed 300 bunny rabbits with 'karate blows' to the neck), as well as Mexican cripples, dwarves, and other human freaks, for his magnum opus El Topo (1970) aka The Mole aka The Gopher, Alejandro Jodorowsky was not merely playing around, as the director once had the gall to make the exceedingly egomaniacal claim: "If you are great, 'El Topo' is a great picture. If you are limited, 'El Topo' is limited." Judging by Jodorowsky's remark, I suspect the average American filmgoer is rather limited, as they would probably find the film to be grotesque garbage of the perversely pretentious sort, if not a total insult to their faith and nation. Personally, after recently re-watching the film for the fourth time, I must admit that I think El Topo is nothing short of a morbid masterpiece that manages to create a marvelously misbegotten marriage between the amorality and beautiful bodily dismemberment of the Grand Guignol, the allegorical iconoclastic surrealism of Luis Buñuel, the nihilistic western ultra-violence of Sam Peckinpah, the human freakiness of Tod Browning's Freaks (1932), the atmospheric celluloid spirituality of Sergei Parajanov, and the obsessive attention to detail of Stanley Kubrick, albeit in a Mestizo dime-store form. Directed by a true 'wandering Jew' who was born in Chile in 1929 to Ukrainian Jewish parents (Jodorowsky claims he was the product of his father raping his mother) in Chile who moved to Paris, France in the early 1950s and ultimately co-founded (with fellow surrealist western director Fernando Arrabal and Roland Topor) the Dadaist-inspired anarchistic avant-garde Panic Movement before moving to Mexico to direct his first feature Fando y Lis (1968), El Topo is undoubtedly a 'messianic' cinematic work where auteur Jodorowsky plays an (anti)Christ-like figure who learns from and then kills four different spiritual/philosophical gurus (whose dogmas range from Eastern philosophy to Catholic mysticism to Nietzscheanism), only to be resurrected and act as the revolutionary saint of a group of Mexican cripples, freaks, and dwarves. Quite arguably a work of absurdist Jewish messianism (Hassidic belief states that in every generation a potential Messiah exists, with Jodorowsky being the messiah of his own film), El Topo changed the way people looked at movies as a hit on the Midnight Movie circuit that mystified the counter-culture generation with its insanely idiosyncratic blend of celluloid outlaw esotericism and aesthetic and thematic acid anarchism. Unavailable for over 30 years after Jodorowsky had a falling out with copyright owner/producer Allen Klein (who had El Topo and the director's subsequent work The Holy Mountain (1973) banned after he refused to adapt Pauline Réage's classic S&M novel Story of O 1954)), El Topo is in many ways the ultimate 'cult film,' as the sort of arcane cinematic work that people could literally worship in our decidedly degenerate postmodern age.

Divided into four pseudo-Biblical chapters (Genesis, Prophets, Psalms, Apocalypse), El Topo follows an eponymous spiritual outlaw (Alejandro Jodorowsky)—an initially stoic avenger who sports an all-black leather rebel cowboy outfit—as he travels through the desert on horseback with his naked son Brontis (played by the director's real-life son Brontis Jodorowsky). After El Topo tells his son, "You are seven years old. You are a man. Bury your first toy and your mother's picture," the little lad follows his dad's command and the following allegorical words are narrated, "The mole digs tunnels under the earth, looking for the sun. Sometimes, he gets to the surface. When he sees the sun, he is blinded." From there, El Topo and his son enter a town where the entire population has been massacred aside from a dying man who begs the dark leather-clad cowboy to help him, but he gets his son Brontis to put the man out of his misery. Meanwhile, three degenerate banditos who were involved in the massacre—a freak with a serious female shoe fetish, a guy that likes slicing bananas with his sword, and a sexually depraved loser that makes an image of a naked woman out of rocks and proceeds to hump the erotic rock formation—are lurking near the town. When El Topo runs into the banditos, he immediately kills two of them and leaves the foot fetishist alive long enough to find out where his leader is located. El Topo learns that a fellow named the Colonel (David Silva, who later appeared in The Holy Mountain and Juan López Moctezuma's Alucarda (1977)) has overrun a Catholic Mission where his depraved untermensch goons are engaged in sexually torturing the monks (forcing them to dress like Mother Mary in drag) and raping and torturing women. Needless to say, El Topo shows up at the Franciscan Mission and confronts the Colonel. When the Colonel asks El Topo, "Who are you to judge me?," to which the renegade cowboy replies, "I am God," El Topo proceeds to castrate the degenerate bandito dictator in a blood-gushing fashion. Literally and figuratively no longer a man, the Colonel commits suicide by blowing his brains out with a shotgun and El Topo takes the dead eunuch's sex slave, who he renames Mara (Mara Lorenzo), and proceeds to do the seemingly unthinkable by abandoning his naked son Brontis with the rather effete monks of the mission.

EL TOPO

El Topo and Mara head to the desert and the messianic cowboy performs live-saving miracles like shooting a stone with his revolver and making water gush out of it, so that the two do not die of dehydration. For whatever reason, El Topo decides to violently rape Mara (in the audio commentary for a recent bluray release of the film, the director confesses he really brutally raped the actress, stating, "It looks less spectacular than a choreographed one."). Not long after, El Topo confesses he loves Mara and she replies with the following demand, "So that I may love you, you have to be the best. Four great gun masters live in this desert. You've got to look for them, and kill them." Although El Topo is ill-equipped to take on the great gun masters, Mara convinces him to play dirty and use trickery to defeat them. The first Master El Topo takes on is a young blind hippie-like guru (played by Mexican rock musician Héctor Martínez) who wears nothing but a loincloth, has a legless cripple for a servant who is strapped to an armless cripple, and is seemingly immune to bullets. El Topo defeats the Master #1 by digging a hole, which the unwittingly blind guru falls into, thus giving him the opportunity to put a bullet in his brain with very little effort. After Master #1 is killed, a 'Woman in Black' (Paula Romo) who is the virtual female counterpart (or Jungian 'anima') to El Topo shows up and agrees to guide him to the second Master. Master #2 (played by theatre director Juan José Gurrola) is a Sufi goldsmith with a serious Oedipal complex who is quite in love with his rather rough gypsy-like Mother (Bertha Lomelí), who has a man's voice. Once again determined to win by cheating, El Topo places broken glass on the ground for the Mother step on and when momma's boy Master #2 turns around to see if his mommy is hurt, the Mole shoots the unlucky guru when he is not looking. Master #3 is a rabbit-obsessed perfectionist whose countless bunny rabbits drop dead upon El Topo's arrival, as the dark cowboy seems to bring a metaphysical plague with him. Knowing that Master #3 (played by Mexican antique dealer Víctor Fosado) only has one shot and plans to shoot him in the chest, El Topo places a copper plate over his heart. After surviving being shot in the chest, El Topo jumps back up in joy like a shameless braggart, shoots Master #3, and arrogantly states, "Too much perfection is a mistake" (the director once stated in an interview regarding that quote, "All Oriental culture is in that sentence") as the guru dies. Master #4 (played by retired alcoholic actor Agustín Isunza) is a half-naked toothless old bum who is so fast he can catch El Topo's bullets in a net and fling them back at him. Luckily for El Topo, Master #4 does not care about life and proves it to El Topo by snatching his gun and blowing his brains out. While El Topo succeeds in swiftly killing all four masters, he becomes overwhelmed with grief for using such cowardly trickery to kill four gurus who provided him with priceless esoteric knowledge, so he smashes his revolver and goes completely mad, even revisiting the sites of the great men he maliciously murdered and mourning over their rotten corpse. On top of that, the 'Lady in Black' challenges El Topo to a duel and proceeds to shoot him in his hands, feet, and side ('the wounds of Christ'). Turned into a callous carpet-muncher by the lesbo Lady in Black, Mara also shoots El Topo and as he dies he sees visions of the two sapphic she-bitches making lurid lesbian love. Luckily, a grotesque gang of Mexican cripples, midgets, and horribly deformed individuals find El Topo's corpse and bring him to a cave where he is 'resurrected' like Christ, ultimately reawakening 20-years-later with a blond Jew-fro and drag queen makeup, thereupon resembling what looks like the most aesthetically repugnant Marilyn Monroe impersonator in history.

Upon his great reawakening, El Topo is told by a female dwarf (Jacqueline Luis) of the cripples that he is their savior and he will build a tunnel through the mountain cave that will help the cripples escape their imprisonment and go to a local town. After shaving his Aryan Jew-fro and sharing a beetle with an old wise woman, El Topo is fully resurrected and powerful enough to carry out his Christ-like duties. To fund the operation, El Topo and the Dwarf go to a discernibly decadent town where they 'beg' (i.e. put on Vaudeville-like performances) for change from the locals. A sort of maniac microcosm of the most infamously degenerate aspects of the United States, the town is a place where buck negroes are bought and sold into sex slavery for the perverse pleasures of old fat bourgeois white women and where people play Russian roulette at the local church where it is declared a 'miracle' each time a player of the game manages not to blow their brains out (though a young boy inevitably does). The flag of the village is the 'all-seeing eye of God' of the dollar bill, which is a sort of stand-in for the swastika of Nazi Germany (Jodorowsky once stated regarding the image, "I used it in the film as a symbol of guilt: the eye says, 'You are guilty, you are guilty.' Yes, a guilty society. In the film. It was a very nice symbol"). While begging in the town, El Topo and the Dwarf are taken hostage and forced to perform sex with each other in a sort of makeshift basement orgy room, thus resulting in the little person becoming pregnant. El Topo agrees to marry the Dwarf, but their priest ends up being the cowboy's son Brontis, who is now a grown man and attempts to kill his father. After the Dwarf convinces Brontis that El Topo is a savior who plans to liberate the cripples by building the tunnel, the prodigal son agrees to wait to kill his father until after the tunnel is finished. Brontis also agrees to help beg and dig the tunnel to speed up the process of liberating the cripples, but when they finish, the son cannot bring himself to kill his papa, stating, "I cannot kill my master." When the cripples escape via the tunnel and enter the village, they are exterminated by the local police (who are obese scat-obsessed homosexuals), which infuriates El Topo so much that he massacres all the inhabitants of the village (like his enemy the Colonel did at the beginning, thus becoming what he always hated) and proceeds to commit self-immolation à la Thich Quang Đức. Indeed, El Topo forgot to take notice of the over-quoted words of warning from Nietzsche, "Beware that, when fighting monsters, you yourself do not become a monster... for when you gaze long into the abyss. The abyss gazes also into you." Meanwhile, the Dwarf gives birth and she, Brontis (who is now dressed like his father and has taken over his persona), and the baby leave the village on horseback.

EL TOPO

While Santa Sangre (1989) is my favorite Alejandro Jodorowsky flick, I am not going to pretend that El Topo is not the director's most important and immaculate work. Additionally, I would go so far as saying that El Topo is not only the best film to have ever been sired in Mexico, but one of the most, if not the most, artistically genuine and ambitious of films ever directed by a Jewish filmmaker. Indeed, despite coming from a similar background (poor Yiddish-speaking Jews from Eastern Europa), Jodorowsky is contra to everything that the big Hebraic Hollywood moguls like Adolph Zukor, William Fox, Samuel Goldwyn, and Louis B. Mayer stood for. While the Goldwyns and Mayers made an absurd amount of money turning cinema into a cheap product and artistically unmerited form of entertainment meant to appeal to the lowest common denominator, even popularizing the dreaded musical (not to mention the western), Jodorowsky approached the medium of film from almost a quasi-spiritual angle and waged a sort of celluloid revolution against the Hollywood western genre as well as the so-called 'American Dream', which was also dreamed up by the Judaic bigwigs of Tinseltown. In its depiction of an anarchistic outsider who kills four spiritual gurus (and thus symbolically destroys four religions), supports the weak (i.e. the cripples) against the strong, and totally exterminates a town run and inhabited by white people, El Topo ultimately reads like a sick Semitic fantasy that is as old as Judaism itself, yet Jodorowsky expresses sorrow and guilt for his character's actions. After all, after killing the four Masters, he is plagued by his guilt and goes completely insane. Additionally, El Topo commits suicide after exterminating the white village, which, rather unfortunately, is certainly not something that the great Jewish communist mass murderers of history like Leon Trotsky, Lazar Kaganovich, Genrikh Yagoda, and Béla Kun ever considered doing. As demonstrated by his quoting of French traditionalist/metaphysician René Guénon in the book El Topo: A Book of the Film (1971) and incessant quoting of various religious figures and events, Jodorowsky's respect for various forms of spirituality is indisputable (he has described himself as an 'atheistic mystic') and El Topo represents his sort of cinematic Torah, with The Holy Mountain being his New Testament. As for what the experience of making the film meant to him, Jodorowsky gave the following answer in an interview featured in El Topo: A Book of the film: "I was born. A new life. Really, a new life. I think my brain opened up. When I started this interview, I spoke about my skull dividing into eight pieces, and the butterfly that came ... Maybe the butterfly was the movie. Maybe when you do something, you are changed. When I shaved my head, and when I found the landscapes, for example, those were very strong experiences -- Jungian experiences." And, indeed, speaking of Jung, Jodorowky managed to create his own archetypes (while utilizing ancient ones) with El Topo that very few other films in cinema can boast. While I am somewhat skeptical about the idea, one can only speculate whether or not the sequel Son of El Topo will ever be made (Jodorowsky has been talking about it pretty much ever since the release of El Topo), but if one thing is for sure, it is that El Topo is and will always remain an unrivaled work of cinema, as well as the perfect antidote to the passive peace and love of the counter-culture zeitgeist.

-Ty E

FANDO Y LIS
FANDO Y LIS

Alejandro Jodorowsky* (1970)

Longtime friend of Jodorowsky's, Fernando Arrabal, once wrote a play entitled Fando y Lis. Jodorowsky felt strongly towards the idea of adapting the play into his first feature length film using his memories of the performance and a one page script. The result is his greatest film in substance with meaningful and harrowing imagery with a score drowning in mystique. While being of the surreal genre, the film has a sideshow mystique emanating from it which in turn creates a sprawling epic of abuse and passion. I use the word epic freely. Not a traditional epic but a vast odyssey of the masks of comedy and tragedy, both. If you want the feel of theater perfectly captured, Fando y Lis would be your luckiest endeavor. Fando and Lis are an unconventional coupling of handicaps. Fando has a statuesque face made for the silver screen (Similar to icon James Dean) and Lis is as gentle and kind as a china doll and also paraplegic. Due to this, she becomes a burden on the passive Fando. Maladolescenza brought this film to mind. Both characters seem saintly, but Fando is constantly spiraling downwards to an inevitable ending which is already written in the threads of fate. Their personal journey towards the "lost city of Tar" brings to mind many questions - of course, relating to society. The very figment of a society is nowhere to be found. Barroom singers and musicians play their beloved melody to a cultured world devastated by debris and rubble, sanctioned by miserable mud men and populated with slutty elderly folks. Jodorowsky's world is a world I could populate as well. But many can clash with this perspective. During the premiere and screening, riots continuously broke out leaving Jodorowsky escaping into a limo. One might wonder how a first time full-lengther would escape into a limo, but this even adds to the delirious cosmic force of Jodorowsky. Surely a mystic man has reached a personal limit of enlightenment. I've encountered situations similar to the journey towards Tar. As a child, I've found myself wandering aimlessly around the forest with friends, not knowing where I was heading but slowly careening towards my destination anyways. With as much ferocity presented in its simple black & white picturesque, I too felt a greater need of purpose. Such simple antiquities has Jodorowsky captured with his camera's lens. As cunning as the director may be, he has fallen under a spell of bad publicity due to this film. The star of Fando, Sergio Kleiner, claims that Jodorowsky was indeed of vampiric descent as he craved real blood for a scene. Every portion of this 3 hour surrealist spectacle is needed to fully flesh out the torments, characters, and the faceless journey. Fando y Lis is his most linear film to date, save for The Rainbow Thief. While being extremely engaging regardless of what is going on, the possessive need for analytics is still there. A somber, mellow mood steadily creeps towards a more aggressive standpoint until the sorrowful finale. Many spite Jodorowsky due to his lack of a cohesive storyline. Many cannot sit without squirming thanks to abundant visual eccentricities. What James Joyce did with wordsmithing, Jodorowsky does with moving pictures. In a sense, Jodorowsky is the original visual auteur. No one did it as fast and as furious as him. Even to this date, Fando y Lis & The Holy Mountain still best the likes of Un Chien Andalou and such Maya Deren films. A romantic story never phases me. Sought out love in celluloid is a thing of the past. Now, with a suggestive plot like that, you're treated to Vince Vaughn being a retarded piece of shit for an hour and a half as a slutty A-list celebrity imposes the idea that failures such as him get laid. Too personal for a screen presentation? Hardly. Ty E's recommendation of Sunrise: A Tale of Two Humans proved to be a most intimate performance. During the dawn of a cinema eclipse, it will be films such as Fando y Lis that will brandish the crown of time. This my friends, is a work of intimate genius.

-mAQ

SANTA SANGRE
SANTA SANGRE

Alejandro Jodorowsky* (1989)

Admittedly, I have become quite disillusioned with the films and character of “acid-garde” auteur turned comic writer/would-be-guru Alejandro Jodorowsky (El Topo, The Holy Mountain) over the past couple years or so, but strangely, at the same time, I have found a new affinity for his Mexican-Italian surrealist thriller-horror film Santa Sangre (1989) aka Holy Blood; a work I was so annoyed with upon my initially viewing of it some 8 or 9 years ago that I did not even make it to the midpoint before turning it off. The first film he directed in almost a decade after his failed children’s filmic fable Tusk (1980) and his aborted attempt at cinematically adapting Frank Herbert’s epic 1965 science fiction novel Dune, Santa Sangre – a work co-written and produced by Claudio Argento (the younger brother of Italian giallo maestro Dario Argento, who produced many of his big bro’s films, including Suspiria and Mother of Tears) – was a sort of “comeback” effort for Jodorowsky, but it was, unfortunately, a short-lived one as his subsequent attempt at creating a cinematic blockbuster, The Rainbow Thief (1990), was an abject failure of the first order, both artistically and especially financially speaking. Featuring the sort of sordid sideshow surrealism and gross and gory yet gorgeous grotesquery fans have come to love and expect from Jodorowsky yet with a much more coherent narrative than El Topo (1970) and The Holy Mountain (1973), Santa Sangre arguably makes for the seemingly megalomaniacal avant-garde auteur’s most accessible and, dare I say, eclectically and endlessly entertaining work, thus making it the perfect introduction to his odd and oftentimes oneiric yet ominously obscene cinematic oeuvre. Although often described as a Chilean, Latino, and/or French filmmaker, Jodorowsky is undoubtedly the virtual archetypical “wandering Jew,” as someone who was born to Ukrainian Jewish immigrants that learned to dislike the natives of Chile due to their mistrust of his ‘foreign’ character, as well as the American mining industrialists that mistreated the natives, thus developing a dual hatred for American imperialism and its victims, which bleeds deeply through his celluloid works, including Santa Sangre; a film that portrays the majority of Mexicans as savage scavengers, filthy freaks, and, at best, suave criminals and charismatic psychopaths. A man that was apparently, according to himself, the product of rape after his father sexually ravaged his mother, Jodorowsky (who once claimed to have literally raped the heroine for a scene in El Topo, thus following in the foul footsteps of his fiendish father) was naturally resented by the woman that rather reluctantly gave birth to him, which most certainly seems to shine through in Santa Sangre; a film about a child magician turned bestial adult mental patient and malicious murderer who thinks he is a phoenix and is horribly haunted by his armless and merciless mother. Featuring a visual feast of human freaks of the genetically dubious sort, hungry mobs of mud-covered Mexicans who are hellbent for the foul flesh of dead elephants, voluptuous zombie babes, kooky coke-snorting beaners with Down syndrome, a super slavish religious cult that worships a girl that who was raped and had both her arms cut off by two bodacious buggering brothers, and meta-Fellini-esque carnival and murder scenarios probably inspired by psychedelic drugs and even more mind-penetrating personal memories, Santa Sangre is a surrealistically sound film that convinced me that Jodorowsky is more than just a pretentious psychopath who is addicted to his own deluded, drug-addled pseudo-spirituality of "psychoshamanism."

Fenix (Axel Jodorowsky; the director's son, who bares a striking resemblance to his father thus making for the perfect alter-ego for the auteur) is all fucked up and like many deranged people, his mental affliction started after a rather tragic series of events he experienced during his completely corrupting childhood during those especially critical coming-of-age years. Rather prestigious and wise for a child carnay, young Fenix (Adan Jodorowsky; another one of the director's sons) works as a "child magician" at a Gringo-owned (as advertised) Mexican carnival run by his semi-nefarious knife-throwing father Orgo (Guy Stockwell) and whose best friend is a middle-aged Mexi-midget named Aladin. Fenix's mother Concha (Blanca Guerra) also works at the carnival as a trapeze artist and aerialist, but her real passion is being the leader of a renegade religious cult that has a raped and dismembered girl (who has no arms) as its patently perverse and preposterous patron saint. On top of suffering from spiritual insanity, Concha suffers from self-imposed sexual repression and totally hates a tattooed woman (Thelma Tixou) that also works at the carnival because her husband Orgo has a rather dubious and risque relationship with her that includes throwing knives only a couple inches away from her illustrated meat-curtain. The tattooed woman also has an adopted daughter named Alma (Faviola Elenka Tapia); a blonde-haired, deaf mute tightrope walker that Fenix is feverishly fond of. Naturally, little Fenix's life begins to take a dramatic turn for the worst when one of his friends, a small elephant, dies and is given a public funeral where it is paraded through the city streets in its campy coffin like all great Mexican folk heroes and is subsequently dumped in a trash pit, where a virtual army of dirty mestizo savages (played by real poor people whose sole costume for the film was mud splattered across their clothes and for whom the director apparently gave real beef to quench their hunger) rip the deceased beast to shreds so they can eat its rancid meat, thereupon traumatizing the little magician, yet the downward spiral that is his late childhood has only begun to turn into a very real nightmare. To simultaneously console and make a man out of his son, ogre-like blond beast Orgo tattoos a large spread-eagled phoenix (a symbol typically used as a sign of "resurrection" or an "exceptional man") onto the boy's chest that is identical to his own chest tat via his favorite knife and some bloody red ink in what is a symbolic mark that will perpetuate a family curse. In retaliation for seeing Ogor fondling and fornicating with the tattooed woman, Concha pours sulphuric acid onto her husband's Orgo's disloyal dick and balls and he retaliates by cutting her arms off, thereupon turning her into a mommy martyr in the form of her favorite limbless rape victim saint. With his manhood mangled and ruined, Ogor – who is no Adonis as a large and in charge fellow with an exceptionally unflattering and badly bulging beer gut – walks naked into the street while grasping his disfigured genitals and slits his own throat with his favorite phallic throwing knife, all while Fenix watches to horror while helplessly locked in a trailer.

SANTA SANGRE

Flash forward a decade or so into the present, Fenix is now a funny feral-like fellow who thinks he is a phoenix as an emotionally monotone maniac who stands crouched down and perched on a tree and eats raw fish in a mental institution where he seems to be the only patient who does not suffer from Down syndrome. One night, when he and the merry mongoloids are taken on a night field trip to a local movie theater, he and his crazy comrades are given cocaine by a suave pimp (Teo Jodorowsky; undoubtedly the director's least ugly son) with his hair slicked back like a greaser who has an obese prostitute as a girlfriend. The pimp takes them to the more sleazy side of the superlatively shitty city, where Fenix sees the tattooed woman, who now works as a fleshpeddler, trying to sell cheap tricks on the seedy sunset strip, which throws him into a fit of rage. His encounter with the tattooed whore must have awoken something deep inside of his subconscious because he regains the strength and will to live, but also sees the ghost of his dead mother, who calls out to him, so naturally he escapes from the less than secure mental hospital and rejoins his mommy to begin his new life of murder and mayhem. To his decided dismay, Fenix witnesses the tattooed women trying to teach now-grownup Alma the trick of the trade of a hooker, but before long, the ex-carny covered in salacious tats is brutally mutilated by an unseen woman's hands with red finger nails. Together mother and son go on vengeful seek-and-destroy missions, but is the armless Madonna just really a figment of the marvelously mad man's macabre and murderous imagination?! Can lifelong love interest Alma prove that 'love conquers all,' by getting Fenix to stop fetishizing his freaky mom?! Through a series of trials and errors, including attempting to take on the identity of the 'Invisible Man' and giving way to his bi-curious side by dating and courting a massive and muscular cross-dressing wrestler, Fenix comes to realize that his mother is not of the nice, nurturing sort and that he needs to finally come to terms with his unpleasant past, even if it means eradicating his phantasmagorical procreator for a woman of the more physical and less homicidal and incestuous sort.

Like Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) meets Steve Balderson's Firecracker (2005) as directed by a younger, more vivacious Luis Buñuel on LSD attempting to direct a film in the spirit of Dario Argento, Santa Sangre is a psychedelic psychosexual cinematic tale about the irrevocable consequences of one man's stunted and terribly tragicomic coming-of-age that ultimately had murderous consequences of the ominous oedipal sort, which also seemed to have plagued director

Alejandro Jodorowsky; a man whose mommy resented him since birth since he was the rather unwanted product of rape, even once telling him, "I cannot love you." Of course, while Fenix dealt with his demons by killing people, Jodorowsky creatively and cleverly concocted some of the most gnarled and grotesque yet strangely gorgeous scenarios ever captured on celluloid with those featured in Santa Sangre being some of his most seemingly personal. Whereas someone like Steven Spielberg makes mundane and absurdly artificial coming-of-age movies that portray childhood as a positively pleasant period of majestic perfection of the literally supernatural and non-allegorical sort where everything works out immaculately in the end and is saturated with severely soulless and superficial sentimentalism, Jodorowsky bares his determinedly damaged inner-child with Santa Sangre; a film with the message that, to quote Morrissey, "Barbarism Begins at Home," and that one must get over these childhood ills if they ever hope to move on with their lives. In a 2008 interview with Bright Lights Film Journal, Jodorowsky admitted regarding his film and the difference between he and the Hollywood Shoah-man of Show biz, "In Santa Sangre, I shot in the streets where all the thieves and the criminals and the drunks are, I went there to shoot. It's a very . . . you know, you are not you when you are shooting. The person who made those pictures is not me. I was a completely different person when I made these pictures: I would see no one, I would sleep only four hours a day, I didn't drink, I didn't take drugs, I didn't have a woman — nothing. I ate very little. The only thing I did was make the pictures. They are honest pictures. They are good, they are bad — they are something which happened there, which is honest... But, say, Spielberg is not honest. I hate Spielberg, because none of his movies are honest. His violence is ill, it's not honest. He shows an ill violence, as though he was the father of history. He hates Jews, because he is Jewish. He is making business with that, with Europe. He is fascist, because America is the centre of his world. If I can kill Spielberg, I will kill Spielberg." Indeed, any film that led Jodorowsky to lay off the psychedelic drugs for an extended period of time must have been an important and even spiritual work as a sort of personal cinematic 'exorcising' ritual and quite possibly the most honest and strangely hopeful work the seemingly damned director has ever created. That being said, until the day comes when S. Spielberg directs an extra-erotic big-budget 'kids-ploitation' film celebrating the triumph of Judea and the destruction of Europa and Occidental civilization, as well as the spiritual and financial enslavement of the Goyim, will he have reached a degree of personal and artistic integrity that is anywhere near as great as his renegade messianic kinsman Alejandro Jodorowsky.

-Ty E

THE DANCE OF REALITY
THE DANCE OF REALITY

Alejandro Jodorowsky* (2013)

Despite the fact that most of his films are in some way autobiographical, Chilean-born auteur/movie metaphysician, comics writer/artist, and spiritual guru Alejandro Jodorowsky (Fando y Lis, El Topo) has rarely made reference to his Ukrainian-Jewish origins in his cinematic works aside from fleeting esoteric references to the cabbala in The Holy Mountain (1973), at least until recently. Indeed, for his first feature in well over two decades, The Dance of Reality (2013) aka La danza de la realidad—a film based on the director's 400+ page 'psychomagical autobiography' of the same name—Jodorowsky depicted his uniquely unhappy, if not equally magical and fantastic, 'coming-of-age' as a Ukrainian Jew who had the rare experience of growing up in a small and destitute Chilean town and suffering the emotionally and physical brutality of his sadistic and highly hypocritical Stalinist storeowner father. Quite obviously the director's most overtly personal, intimate, and even 'sentimental' work to date as a film where the filmmaker and self-proclaimed "atheist mystic" makes random abrupt appearances throughout the film where he attempts to console his younger self in what some might describe as a bittersweet mix of nostalgia and self-pity, The Dance of Reality is somewhat predictably the product of a much tamer and less hysterically hermetic Jodorowsky, even if it features a middle-aged Amazonian-like woman with meaty bosoms urinating on her husband and a talking burnt corpse that is covered with maggots and snails. Sort of like a deranged Disney coming-of-age flick that turns into a spiritual quest halfway through as directed by a Chilean Fellini who had the grand misfortune of being the sole Jewish boy in a remote area inhabited by savage Indian boys who were not too sympathetic to his 'mushroom-shaped' circumcised cock, Jodorowsky's latest film may not be the great long-awaited masterpiece that his fans have been eagerly expecting since his last excellent effort 1989 Santa Sangre (Jodorowsky directed The Rainbow Thief in 1990, but he ultimately disowned the film because his artistic freedom was taken away by executive producer Alexander Salkind, whose wife penned the screenplay), but it certainly offers a potent glimpse of the artist's extremely vulnerable naked soul, so it is only fitting that the 84-year-old posted a video of himself naked to promote the film. Easily the most idiosyncratic and pleasantly unhinged autobiographical film by an auteur filmmaker since belated German dandy Werner Schroeter's totally impenetrable penultimate work Deux (2002) aka Two, Jodorowsky's cinematic journey may have been shot on kitschy digital video and features absolutely aesthetically repugnant CGI special effects, but there is no mistaking the artistic integrity of the mensch that created it. Starring the director's own son Brontis Jodorowsky (who is best known for playing Jodorowsky's naked son in El Topo) in the role of the director's father, the film may feature cliché Freudian overtones, but it is unquestionable that it is an in-nately anti-Hollywood work, as a celluloid spiritual quest in the spirit of what Aldous Huxley described as the, "Perennial Philosophy." Indeed, on top of being autobiographical, the film pays tribute to the fact that all religions share a single universal truth, thus demonstrating the director's lifelong obsession with arcane knowledge and all things relating to the spiritual and metaphysical. Shot on location in the director's hometown of Tocopilla and set in 1930s depression era Chile, The Dance of Reality is part political-thriller, part Fellini-esque fantasy, part absurdist comedy, part culturally confused allegory for Jewish assimilation, and part grotesque freak show, but it is also 100% Jodorowsky and that is certainly what matters most.

Young Alejandro Jodorowsky (Jeremías Herskovits) is a strange and severely sensitive little boy who lives a nightmarish yet fantastic and magical life with his unhappily married Jewish-Ukrainian parents Jaime (Brontis Jodorowsky) and Sara (Pamela Flores) in Tocopilla, Chile, which is a third world hellhole that is mostly populated by half-crazed mestizos, Indians, and cripples. Jaime is a diehard Stalinist who, despite his ostensible hatred of capitalism and affinity for dressing like a commie dictator, owns a successful bourgeois shoe and clothing store called "House of Ukraine" where a portrait of Joseph Stalin absurdly hangs on the wall as if it were a religious icon like a cross or a portrait of Christ. An unrepentant atheist true believer whose life philosophy is "you die and you rot" and who berates his son anytime he demonstrates an interest in religious matters, Jaime is ultimately a spiritual cripple and aggressively nihilistic materialist who uses communism as a sort of pseudo-religion. Indeed, while he never outright says it, Jaime seems to think that a communist overthrow of the Chilean government will lead to him becoming a bolshevik god. A former boxer and rope-climber for the local circus, Jaime hates the fact that the locals think of him as a weak foreign Jew who has no real love for the poor (indeed, during one especially scene, Jaime hatefully attacks a homeless cripple whose hands were blown off in a mining explosion), so he wants his seemingly effeminate son Alejandro to toughen up and forces the boy to cut off his big viking-like blond mane, which he inherited from his maternal grandfather, hence why his mother Sara—a spiritually-inclined woman who literally talks to god and sings in an operatic fashion every time she opens her mouth—strangely refers to her son as her "father," at least until he gets a haircut. To the chagrin of Jaime, Sara thinks that her father has been reincarnated via her son. Indeed, after his marvelous mane is murdered via non-haircut (the barber simply pulls a wig off the boy's head!), mother Sara calls poor Alejandro a "traitor." Indeed, after tragically losing his glistening golden locks, Alejandro is forced to be a tough son as opposed to a whiny momma's boy. After teaching his son to overcome pain by various methods ranging from being tickled with a feather to being smacked in the face to the point where he cracks a tooth, Alejandro is given the honor of becoming the "mascot" of the local fire department, which his father belongs to, but when the little lad witnesses the burnt corpse of a firefighter at the sight of a burned down home and later hallucinates seeing the corpse talking to him during a funeral ceremony for said burnt corpse, he disgraces his padre by fainting and not awaking for two entire days. Indeed, after Alejandro's pathetic display at the funeral ceremony, two of Jaime's firefighter comrades mock him by remarking that, "Even dressed up as a fireman, a Jew is a Jew," thus inspiring the Judaic Stalinist to go on a journey to deliver water to countless crippled refugees to prove his supposed dedication to the proletariat, but when he arrives, the poor people kill and eat his donkey and give him the plague, which is only cured when his wife Sara urinates on his face and bare toso. Ultimately, Jaime decides that killing Chilean president Carlos Ibáñez del Campo (Baštian Bodenhofer) will be the best way to prove his manhood and demonstrate his dedication to Chile and the commie cause. Of course, as a bourgeois-bred kosher capitalist, Jaime will ultimately fail in his dubious mission to liberate the masses via senseless assassination.

THE DANCE OF REALITY

Jaime belongs to an underground Stalinist terrorist group—a curiously eclectic collection of cripples, beatniks, homos, lardos, trannies, and other social defective untermenschen that rather symbolically meet in whorehouses and masonic lodges (indeed, aside from the fact that brothels reflect some of the worst elements of capitalist exploitation, some believe that Freemasons were responsible for funding various communist revolutions)—and with his pinko cronies he attempts to figure out the best way to assassinate Ibáñez. After learning that the President loves his horse more than anything else, Jaime figures out his enemy's 'Achilles heel' and leaves his family to carry the assassination out, but a problem arises when one of the member of his commie clique, 'The Anarchist' (the director's rocker son Adan Jodorowsky, who played young Fenix in Santa Sangre), pulls a gun on him and says a foreign Jew should not have the right to kill the Chilean leader. After learning that the Anarchist wants to avenge his journalist father, who was executed by Ibáñez's men for writing unflattering things about the dictator's regime, Jaime agree to help his comrade carry out the assassination. Somewhat absurdly, the Anarchist attempts to assassinate Ibáñez at a dog show where canines are judged by how they look in goofy clothing, but Jaime stops him right before he shoots the dictator at close-range. After stating, "I don't want to live in a world with dressed up dogs," the Anarchist commits suicide by shooting himself with the same gun that he planned to assassinate the dictator with. For ostensibly risking his life to save him, President Ibáñez honors Jaime's request to be his personal horse trainer. Indeed, since the original horse trainer Don Aquiles (Andres Cox) plans to retire, Jaime is sent to train with him before he dies (Aquiles later has Jaime bury him alive). While Jaime loves the beautiful white stallion 'Bucephalus,' he decides to poison the horse by encouraging it to eat poisonous yellow flowers as a way to get Ibáñez to come by the farm in the middle of the night so that he can shoot him, but when the Stalinist gets the opportunity to kill his supposed oppressor, his hands become paralyzed and he literally loses his mind. From there, Jaime will go on a Christ-like spiritual odyssey that will teach him how to be a humble man and loving father.

After Sara covers Alejandro's body with black paint in what is easily one of the strangest and most perverse blackface scenes in film history, the boy is able to get over his fear of the dark. Indeed, Sarah is a born healer with a spiritual touch and like with her son, she will ultimately save her husband Jaime from his seemingly malignant spiritual sickness. Sara also helps her son get over his fear of mestizos after being beaten up for being a Jew by stating to him, "Out with Pinocchio. Out with the Jew. Out with the nose and white skin!" and subsequently telling Alejandro that he is invisible. Indeed, after Sarah goes to the bar where Alejandro was beaten up, strips off all her clothes, and walks around the place like she owns it, no one touches the scrawny Jewish boy again. With the help of an eccentric and heavily tattooed shaman that resembles a Hindu sadhu named the 'Theosophist' (played by the director's son Axel Jodorowsky, who played the adult Fenix in Santa Sangre), Sara and Alejandro are able to send Jaime a message telling him to come back home. When Jaime receives the message, he snaps out of his amnesia and finds himself in a dilapidated shack in a third world ghetto lying next to a crippled midget who later explains to him that she found him half-starved wandering the streets. Flattered by the fact that Jaime seemed unaware of her glaring deformities and short stature, the crippled midget made him her live-in lover. Upset that Jaime's memory has come back and that he will no longer want to have sex with her, the midget commits suicide via hanging and the Stalinist is blamed for the death by the locals, thus he is forced to immediately flee from the shantytown.

After being tormented by seemingly rabid Catholic schoolgirls and being treated like a lowly beggar, Jaime happens upon a building called "Sacred Wood Carpenters" where he meets a humble old Christian carpenter named Don Jose who helps him to rehabilitate his paralyzed hands by teaching him to make wooden chairs that will be given to a local Catholic Church. When Jaime and Don Jose give 26 wooden chairs that they created to the Catholic Church, they are warmly honored by the priest and congregation. During the festivities, Don Jose unexpectedly drops dead and Jaime becomes so touched by the experience that he cries and gives away all his money to the church to help pay for Don Jose's funeral. With nowhere to go, Jaime hits the streets and sees Nazi brown-shirts parading down the block yet despite being a Judeo-Bolshevik, he decides to warmly salute the Chilean fascists. When a SS officer beats Jaime for supposedly disgracing the fascist salute by doing it with a crippled hand, the lapsed Stalinist becomes a true 'man of steel' and beats up an entire brigade of brown-shirts and forces the SS officer to hail Don Jose. After beating the Latino Nazis, Jaime is arrested by Ibáñez's secret service men and undergoes grueling torture, including receiving electrical charges to his genitals, but luckily he is saved by a group of commie resistance fighters just before one of his tormentors puts a bullet in his brain. As it turns out, due to public uprisings, Ibáñez decided to relinquish his power and flee to Argentina. With the help of the communist resistance fighters, Jaime manages to get back home to his family, but Alejandro and Sara are saddened to see that their once proud and stoic Stalinist is now a weak, broken, and crippled untermensch that looks like a poor man's Jesus and cries like an autistic little girl. With Sara's spiritual guidance, Jaime begins to learn the error of his ways. After Sarah says, "you found all you admired in Ibáñez in Stalin. And here you are...You are the same as they are!," a guilt-ridden Jaime cries out in terror and shoots a portrait of himself where he looks like a commie dictator, which causes a fire that burns his portrait, as well as portraits of Ibáñez and Stalin, thus ritualistically ridding himself of his old commie dictator self. In the end, Alejandro and his family leave Tocopilla, though the memories that the filmmaker received there never left him as he describes at the conclusion of the film.

THE DANCE OF REALITY

In the book Anarchy and Alchemy: The Films of Alejandro Jodorowsky (2007) by Ben Cobb, Alejandro Jodorowsky is quoted regarding his rather complicated origins: "My parents were Russian...I was born in Chile...the [Chilean] children didn't accept me because I was 'Russian'...the young men didn't accept me because I was a 'Jew'...the French didn't accept me because I was a 'Chilean'...the Mexicans didn't accept me because I was 'French'...the Americans think I am 'Mexican'...after ten years, I will move to another planet. They won't accept me because they will think I am an 'American'." Indeed, it is quite apparent while watching The Dance of Reality that Jodorowsky is a born eccentric and perennial loner and that he did not fit in anywhere, including Chile and especially his own family home (interestingly, the director decided not to include his much resented elder sister as a character in the film). Jodorowsky even went so far as more or less rejecting his Jewishness and opting out of following in family tradition, remarking in Cobb's book in broken English regarding his decision to quite college: "I realized the scientific way or the logic way, rationalism...was not my way. My way was imagination. My father...was a businessman [who] want to have a child who can be in the university. Like all the Yiddish...they start to sell shoes and the second-generation [become] psychoanalysts. I didn't want to do that." Additionally, Jodorowsky would also later criticize the 'Jewishness' of Hollywood and Spielberg by remarking in an interview with Bright Lights Film Journal: "I like pictures that are honest. Like some Hong Kong pictures — those filmmakers are honest thieves, they are making business, and they are so honest about it, it's fantastic. But, say, Spielberg is not honest. I hate Spielberg, because none of his movies are honest. His violence is ill, it's not honest. He shows an ill violence, as though he was the father of history. He hates Jews, because he is Jewish. He is making business with that, with Europe. He is fascist, because America is the centre of his world. If I can kill Spielberg, I will kill Spielberg." Indeed, love it or hate it, there is no denying that The Dance of Reality is honest filmmaking from one of the most idiosyncratic auteur filmmakers that the artistic medium has ever produced.

If you're tired of seeing countless hokey holocaust films and period pieces where Jews are depicted as morally righteous god-like beings who were persecuted by Europeans simply because they are Jewish, checkout Jodorowsky's film and learns that many Jews of the 1930s were not commies simply because they cared for the poor stupid goyim, but because they resent strong gentile leaders and opulent Aryans and want to rule over white gentile cattle. Ironically, it is only when antihero Jaime lives like Christ that he is able to get over his Hebraic megalomania, thus make The Dance of Reality pure heresy to Zionist supremacist types. Speaking of megalomania, Jodorowsky recently met with revolting negro rapper Kanye West, who apparently considers the filmmaker one of his greatest influences and even modeled the aesthetic of his 'Yeezus Tour' after the filmmaker's counter-culture classic The Holy Mountain. If Jodorowsky receives the gracious respect of a uniquely untalented yet stinking rich neo-minstrel entertainer like West, one would hope that someone will give him the money to make his long-awaited El Topo sequel, Abel Cain aka Sons of El Topo, as The Dance of Reality may be a worthwhile effort for an old artist reminiscing over his life, but he still has yet to create his last great masterpiece. Aside from being one of the greatest, if not the greatest, films of 2013, Jodorowsky's coming-of-age is a visceral attack against Hollywood and its soulless and materialistic weltanschauung of deracinating globalist anti-cultural and philo-Semitic hegemony. Notably, the director publicly stated that he hoped the film would lose money and intentionally made the film through donations without the backing of studios. While it might seem like some sort of sick joke that the Jewish director is featured at the beginning of the film taking about money while gold shekels falling from the sky and into his hands, Jodorowsky makes it quite clear what he thinks of monetary matters when he remarks: "Money is like blood, it gives life if it flows. Money is like Christ, it blesses you if you share it. Money is like Buddha, if you don't work, you don't get it. Money enlightens those who use it to open the flower of the world, and damns those who glorify it, confounding riches with the soul...There is no difference between money and conscience. There is no difference between conscience and death...There is no difference between death and wealth." Indeed, like Christ, Jodorowsky understands the moneychangers all too well, which, as depicted in the film, is something he learned at an early age via his abusive father, thus making the film a sort of metaphysical cinematic expression of what transformed the auteur into the uncompromising artist that he is today.

While it would be easy to describe Jodorowsky as a 'self-loathing Jew' after watching a film like The Dance of Reality where the boy protagonist is literally exorcised of his Jewishness by his mother, I like to think that the cinematic shaman transcended his Judaic roots as an anti-materialistic/anti-Marxist Hebrew that seems to have recognized that his 'Ātman' (one's 'inner-self' or 'true self') is identical with his 'Brahman' ('transcendent self'). Of course, the director's father failed to obtain this level of spirituality maturity, hence the great misery he suffered as depicted in the film. Indeed, The Dance of Reality makes the perfect comparison piece to French-Polish Jew Jean-Pierre Mocky's similarly surreal and darkly humorous 'folk horror' flick Litan (1982), which depicts religion, especially Catholicism, as the most malignant and deadly of diseases. As the films demonstrate, while Jodorowsky got over his spiritual sickness as a mere child and grew to become a deeply devout practitioner of the perennial philosophy, Mocky seems plagued with spiritual retardation for eternity. Indeed, while it may sound absurd, it seems that Jodorowsky's rather unconventional childhood as a Jewish boy who suffered regular cruelty from mestizos who mocked his circumcised cock was, in the long run, one of the best things that ever happened to him.

THE DANCE OF REALITY

-Ty E

THE CHEKIST

Aleksandr Rogozhkin (1992)

For a number of years, I have been trying to find a reasonably historically accurate and ironfisted film depiction that does not shy away from unearthing the atrocities of the so-called 'Russian' revolution, Bolsheviks, and the Soviet Union, so it was quite a surprise when this film turned out to be Russian. Centering around a small town Cheka – the first secret police in the Soviet Union set up by decree by Vladimir Lenin himself – The Chekist (1992) aka ~~XXXXXXXX~~ directed by Russian auteur Alexander Rogozhkin (The Cuckoo aka Kukushka, Peculiarities of the National Hunt) is an unflinchingly brutal and obscenely un-sentimental depiction of Soviet state sadism that makes Hollywood holocaust flicks like Schindler's List (1993) and The Pianist (2002) seem like big-budget melodramatic afterschool specials by comparison. More hecatically hardboiled, decisively deadpan, and vigilantly violent than Elem Klimov's Soviet war masterpiece Come and See (1985), The Chekist is the sort of film that would even make debauched horror fans cringe and consume them with a rare sense of guilt due to its unrelenting realism and overall lack of gratuitous entertainment value. Focusing on a small-time Cheka leader named Andrey Srubov (played masterfully by Igor Sergeev) and his mass-murdering underlings as they secretly exterminate masses of naked people by way of underground firing squad, The Chekist is a relatively minimalistic work with a steady burning foreboding story and fiercely forlorn aesthetic that portrays the emotionally-draining monotony of old school red mass-slaughter and how it slowly but steadily eats away at the souls of the perpetrators. Srubov describes the philosophy of the charming Cheka as follows: "To quell the chaos this country needs a strong, even cruel executive....in the basement, in secret without reading the appeal, with no public impact, morally destroys the individual. After his death, nothing remains; neither the body nor the grave, or any details of his death." Throughout The Chekist, one sees scene after scene of Srubov and his mostly mundane yet largely sadomasochistic men carrying out these killings in a barbaric, heartless, and mechanical fashion. After forcing the prisoners to strip, lines of five naked prisoners are forced to stand with their face against the wall and are subsequently shot. Like dead animals in a butcher shop, a rope is attached around the body of the still warm cadaver, which is then dragged out of the basement while hanging upside down in an opprobrious fashion and thrown into the back of a large truck with hundreds of other naked 'counter-revolutionaries.' As can be expected from such a gruesome and appalling yet undeniably potent film, The Chekist makes for a singularly degrading and literally sickening cinematic experience, thus it comes fully and highly recommended.

There are many reasons why Hollywood has never and will never make a film like The Chekist, not least of all because a number of their ancestors actively supported such perverted political movements, but the most obvious and important reason being that the victims of the Cheka – which mainly included white, heterosexual Christians like Imperial Russia civil servants and military officers (including their children and wives), all members of the clergy, aristocrats, anyone suspected of not supporting the Soviet government, and any person whose property amounted to more than 10,000 rubles, among various others – are the same sort of people that the detestable dream-makers of Tinseltown target today in many of their malicious movies. Of course, the Cheka – as depicted in The Chekišt – also persecuted a couple members of certain minority groups, including a handful of rich, anti-communist Jews, but, in reality, the Soviet leadership, especially during the early years, was made up of a large number of genocidal Jews. For example, the first president of the Soviet Republic (later the Soviet Union), Yakov Sverdlov – a Bolshevik party leader and an ethnic Jew – ordered the murder of the Czar Nicholas II and his family, which was subsequently carried out by fellow atheistic Israelite Yakov Yurovsky and his Semitic assassins Medvedev, Nikulin, Yermakov, and Vaganov. The two greatest killers of the Soviet Union – Genrikh Yagoda and Lazar Kaganovich who were responsible for no less than ten million deaths apiece – were also down with the Hebrew hammer as somewhat recently recognized by a surprisingly honest Israeli journalist in the worthwhile article Stalin's Jews. The Chekišt is also one of only a handful of films to make light of the Jewish connection with the Jewish Cheka leader Isaac Katz; an old Bolshevik who was responsible for Srubov's father's death during the early days of the revolution. In one particularly unintentionally surreal scene, Katz teases a Jewish jewelry dealer about his Jewish origins, subsequently inspiring the wretched small fry capitalist to call out the Cheka man on his absurdly glaring self-hatred. Of course, while virtually all church buildings in the Soviet Union were blown up and over 50,000 priests were either executed or sent to the Gulags (Soviet concentration camps) during the 1920s through the 1930s, not a single synagogue was harmed. In The Chekišt, a large percentage of the prisoners that are stripped and executed are holy men, which even forces one Cheka man to trade shooting spots with a less god-fearing comrade of the innately atheistic Marxist faith, thus showing how so many everyday individuals, especially opportunists, would ignore their spirituality just to fall in favor with the new Russian leadership. The Cheka group is also startled when a young woman in her early 20s proclaims that “she wants to live” and “she has so much life,” thus causing the generally amoral assassins to hesitate, but Srubov – who usually only decides one's fate and never does any of the actual killings – does not dillydally when it comes to putting a bullet between her weary, big bourgeois eyes. Clearly a totally demoralized individual with some sort of all-consuming psychosis, Srubov brings his kosher compatriot Katz – the man who executed his father – to his mother's home for dinner, which she is naturally offended by, but the Cheka leader is more disgruntled with her for cooking meat. It seems when carrying the executions of hundreds of human cattle each day, one has a reasonably hard time devouring a medium-cooked steak.

THE CHEKIST

Undoubtedly, The Chekišt is a film that needed to be made a longtime ago, but surely Hollywood, which has always had a more sympathetic view of the Russian Revolution of 1917 and continues to back the persecution of any individual that is white, Christian, and wealthy, hence their need to make a new hysterical holocaust film every week, as well as ethno-masochistic Western Europeans of the usually neo-Trotskyite sort, would never dare make such a damning and disconcerting film. If the average white American was aware of the sort of thing that happened in The Chekišt and that certain alien elements in Germany and elsewhere in Europe were trying to bring the same thing outside of Eastern Europe during the first half of the twentieth century, it would be doubtful that they would be so sympathetic towards that latest overly sentimental Shoah flick from the anti-Occidental showmen of Hebraic Hollywood. As a low-rank Cheka man states quite ironically (and unintentionally so) and in complete opposition to how Srubov states how what they do “morally destroys the individual,” there is no doubt in his mind that, “The revolution has taught our people to die with dignity.” Of course, there is nothing respectable about being stripped, facing a basement wall, and going to one’s death without even putting up a fight. With its unwavering sepia-tone-like browns and all around lack of spirited color, The Chekišt is a film that is deathly dreary and dehumanizing in terms of both theme and aesthetic. That being said and relatively speaking, The Chekišt is a nearly immaculate work that cleverly uses ‘Soviet realism’ against itself in a manner better than most of the commie state filmmakers ever could in portraying the cruel and cryptic deaths of those inflexible individuals who could not fit in with Lenin’s ideal ‘New Soviet Man’; a malleable slave that can be programmed to do anything, including killing one’s kin and befriending the slaughterer of one’s own father. Accordingly to The Chekišt lead character Srubov, “The Revolution has nothing to do with philosophy” and by the end of the film, neither does the Cheka’s killings as a black heart needs no intellectual justification. Unfortunately, The Chekišt director Alexander Rogozhkin went on to create less serious films about what Russians love best: vodka and hunting, but with this one film he proved he could direct like a man of steel.

-Ty E

MOTHER AND SON
MOTHER AND SON

Aleksandr Sokurov (1997) Mother and Son (1997) directed by Aleksandr Sokurov is now on my list of favorite Russian dreamlike films (is this all Russian films?). The back of the Kino DVD has written, "Visuals that make Terrence Malick's Days of Heaven look like a home movie." This is what made me decide to watch Mother and Son. I was thrown out of the class I originally saw Days of Heaven in. If they had screened Mother and Son, the philistine teacher would have screamed "revolution."

Russia proves they are one of few nations producing their own cultural films. Maybe its their new sense of nationalism. I doubt that's true though. Andrei Tarkovsky's The Mirror was doing more interesting things in 1975. But whereas The Mirror is a poem of the stream of consciousness, Mother and Son is a collage of beautiful paintings. But this beauty is distorted.

Mother and Son is honestly one of the most disturbing films I have seen recently. The film is like Oedipus Rex from hell. The relationship between Mother and Son is quite intimate throughout. The son carries his dying Mother around the outdoors. They sporadically talk of the Mother's inevitable death. The images follow the gloomy tone of the film. Mother and Son wasn't the easiest to digest. But that is a good thing. Director Aleksandr Sokurov brought up life questions and philosophies that even became darker than the most misanthropic films of Ingmar Bergman. Mother and Son is not misanthropic however. It just takes you to a experience that most wouldn't dare look into. Too bad its inevitable.

Mother and Son derives much of its emotion through its utilization of special camera lenses , stained glasses, and mirror effects. Don't expect much plot. The film is rich in artistry. You'll feel from beginning to end. Watch Mother and Son before World War III happens! Putin approves.

-Ty E

REPO MAN

Alex Cox (1984)

Undoubtedly, if I were to guess what film that I have seen the most times, it would surely be Alex Cox's absurdist and sardonic dystopian punk sci-fi masterpiece Repo Man (1984)—a work that I have no problem admitting that I watched at least twice a day for about a month a couple years back. Although I first saw Repo Man when I was around 12 or 13 years old, it would be a decade before I developed the deep admiration and obsession with the film that I have today, which is rather odd considering my teenage appreciation for early 1980s punk/hardcore has all but totally fizzled out since then yet Cox's film is one of the very few 'punk' films that actually has the authentic attitude as a fiercely farcical work where legendary "man's man" John Wayne—the Irish-American draft-dodger who provided the countless American males with enough romancing of battlefields to fight it in virtually every war of the second half of the twentieth century—is described as a fag and where Emilio Estevez sings the Black Flags 'blues.' With uniquely unhinged references to UFOs, Jungian psychology, rabid Reaganism, Televangelism, Scientology and other chic cults, the 'Reconquista' of California by Mexico, psychotic yuppie materialism, crackpot conspiracy theories, nuclear war, youthful middleclass nihilism, and the apocalypse in a world of aberrant spirituality, pathological paranoia, and all out cultural chaos, it is nothing short of absolutely amazing that Repo Man was ever released by Universal Studios—a studio that stands for everything that Cox's film is against as a work with an unlikeable anti-hero as a protagonist and a cast of totally corrupt characters, an anti-romantic subplot, and an unwaveringly anarchic, misanthropic, and pessimistic essence where the American dream has been replaced with a pleasantly pernicious punk rock nightmare of the tragicomic sort. Released in the fitting Orwellian year of 1984, Repo Man features a world all the more negative and nihilistic than that of the Orwell novel as the characters of Cox's are far too apathetic and infantile to have thought-crimes and are far more interested in beer, money, drugs, joyless sex, infantile rock n roll, television, and pseudo-religions/cults to get involved in any sort of humanistic people's revolution. Featuring a punk/hardcore soundtrack that acts as an imperative ingredient of the film, including songs from Black Flag, the Circle Jerks, Iggy Pop, Suicidal Tendencies, and the Plugs, Repo Man, despite being directed by a Brit, probably does the best job out of any film of its time at portraying its particular zeitgeist because it depicts all groups and subcultures that Hollywood never gave a 'serious' voice, including braindead punks, mischievous mestizos, middle-aged ex-hippie burnouts turned Christian burnouts, trendy cult groups, and members of various loveable lunatic fringe groups. Indeed, the genius of Repo Man is that by using absurdist Buñuel-esque satire and anarchic sardonic slapstick of the very vaguely Italian Neorealist and Spaghetti Western sort, Cox was able to hysterically and humorously highlight everything that made the 1980s one of the most repugnant eras of the twentieth century, even if it sired a timeless cult classic like Repo Man as a result of such culturally crappy circumstances.

REPO MAN

Dullard punk rock dude Otto Maddox (Emilio Estevez) has one of the worst days of his rather mundane and aimless life after he is fired from his job as sales clerk at a grocery store and later walks in on his beautiful yet bitchy dark-skinned punkette girlfriend Debbi (Jennifer Balgobin) making out with his dumb-ass small-time crook best friend Duke (Rick Rude) at a suburban punk rock party hosted by his nerdy ass-kissing friend Kevin (Zander Schloss)—a goofy fellow who bears a striking resemblance to Napoleon Dynamite. With neither a job nor a girlfriend, Otto aimlessly walks through a Mexican ghetto and is approached by a corpse-like conman named Bud (Harry Dean Stanton), who offers him $25.00 to drive ‘his’ other car to another location and becomes a repo man in the process after unwittingly repossessing the car of a deadbeat Hispanic for an absurdly generically titled repo company called “Helping Hand Acceptance Corporation.” Although initially ambivalent to brazen bitter bastard Bud and his motley crew of wisecracking repo men, and only deciding to take the job after finding out his ex-hippie pothead parents donated all his graduation money to a megalomaniacal televangelist, Otto eventually comes to appreciate the fact that “the life of a repo man is always intense.” Otto becomes the protégé of Bud, who teaches him the “Repo Code,” and the two subsequently snort coke, battle a rival gang of Hispanic repo men named the Rodriguez Brothers (Del Zamora and Eddie Velez), get involved in “real-life car chases” and repossess countless cars together. A sassy (and apparently Sapphic) black chick named Marlene (Vonetta McGee) also works at the repo company, but she is a secret traitor in cahoots with the Rodriguez brothers as a Marxist revolutionary of sorts from people varying from pompous preppy pricks to kindly old black grandmothers. Otto also learns the trick of the trade from a pimp-like black repo man named Lite (played by Cox regular Sy Richardson)—a man who literally breaks every segment of the “Repo Code”—and reluctantly takes spiritual advice from deranged junkyard guru named Miller (Tracey Walter) who promotes pseudo-Jungian theories, including “the lattice of coincidence” and something he calls the “cosmic unconsciousness,” which is clearly a bastardized take on Jung’s psychoanalytic theory of the collective unconscious. Meanwhile, Otto’s ex-best friend Duke, ex-girlfriend Debbi, and another Mohawk-sporting punk named Archie (Cox regular Miguel Sandoval) have formed a criminal punk gang that commits a number of armed robberies against various convenience stores and factories. Otto also starts a rather ridiculous non-romantic relationship with a bat-shit crazy and exceedingly annoying bitch named Leila (Olivia Barash) who is part of a “secret network” under the aptly titled named “United Fruitcake Outlet” that is dedicated to exposing the U.S. government’s cover-up of UFOs and space aliens. Leila also tells Otto about a mysterious 1964 Chevrolet Malibu from Roswell, New Mexico that contains four dead yet decidedly dead space aliens in the truck. Although Otto thinks the little lady has more than a couple screws loose (despite screwing her), the next day he learns there is a $20,000 reward for the recovering of the Malibu, which is being driven by a determinedly deranged dude named J. Frank Parnell (Fox Harris) who stole the alien corpses from a Los Alamos National Laboratory and whose acute cognitive dissonance is the result of a lobotomy, as well as extraterrestrial radiation that is seeping out of his truck.

Naturally, a number of parties start searching for the radioactive Malibu, including Otto and Budd, the Rodriguez brothers, Leila and her loony friends, Debbi and Duke's gang (who actually just steal the lucky car by happenstance), but also a group of all-blond Aryan federal agents led by a frigid fuhrer bitch with a bionic New Romanticist-style hand named Agent Rogersz (Susan Barnes), whose character seems to be modeled after fashion designer Anna Wintour and who rightfully proclaims, "No one is innocent," at least in the ridiculous realm of Repo Man where everyone is looking out for #1. Even loveable bastard Bud begins to break his own code when his ever growing fanaticism for obtaining the hefty monetary reward for the Malibu gets the better of him, thereupon leading to his inevitable demise, but leaves with the sagely words of wisdom, "I'd rather die on my feet than live on my knees." In the end, it is the wildly idiosyncratic, idiot savant crank Miller—the man who stoically proclaims "John Wayne is a fag" and "the more you drive the less intelligent you become"—who is the only person who has the power to master and maneuver the extraterrestrial-fueled Malibu and Otto—the formerly apathetic yet nihilistic and hateful suburban punk—has finally found a calling in his life, thus also enabling him to take a ride in the alien automobile, thus concluding on a rather positive note for a film that restlessly wallows in cultural pessimism of the apocalyptic sort.

In an interview featured in the book Destroy All Movies!!! The Complete Guide to Punks on Film (2010), Repo Man director Alex Cox stated, "I was certainly interested in punk, but as a revolutionary movement rather than a fashion thing. In that sense, as Buñuel said about Surrealism, the movement completely failed. But it was inspiration for a while." And, indeed, while being the indisputable quintessential 'punk film,' Repo Man makes a mockery of the fact a good percentage of punks are spoiled middleclass morons who have no real reason to wage a mindless war against society, especially since Mexicans and hobos are literally dropping like flies in the gutter in the film. As for the protagonist of Repo Man, Cox stated, "Otto is more a blank page than an everyman, I think. What I found interesting in his character was how a supposedly 'counterculture' character like a punk rocker could be quickly assimilated into a reactionary and hierarchical system—in this case the repo business, but it could also be the military, say—without even changing his appearance; the Suicidal Tendencies T-shirt was replaced by a suit jacket but the haircut remained the same.” Rather ironically, despite Cox’s talk of a “reactionary” system, it is only when Otto learns the “Repo Code” from Bud and learns to master his job that his life develops meaning and that he is able to shed his uncultivated hatred and nihilism, hence why he later symbolically states later in the film “I can’t believe I used to like these guys,” in regard to the alpha punk group the Circle Jerks, who have now degenerated into a goofy lounge act (in real-life, the band actually devolved into a second-rate metal group). On top of that, it is through supposed wack-job messiah Miller that he develops the sense of spirituality that he so bitterly fought against throughout Repo Man. Indeed, it seems that while punk rockers always glorify disorder, mindless and fruitless libertinism, and anarchy, their innate inner need to rebel against society is a direct result of their hatred for the spiritually degenerate and cultureless society full of chaos and dysfunction that makes up the modern world, where nothing is sacred and those that claim to be are carnal frauds and false prophets who like to earn large profits like the televangelists and Scientologists. Indeed, it is only the biggest losers of losers who never grow out of punk as it is a sign of a sheer and utter lack of maturity and self-control, hence why Otto’s punk friends meet grizzly and patently pointless ends.

REPO MAN

Released the same years as the other big LA punk rock flick, Suburbia (1984) directed by Penelope Spheeris, Cox’s Repo Man topples over its cinematic counterpart in aesthetic, sentiment, and attitude. While Suburbia has a slave-morality-driven, victim-based attitude of ‘Tis a Pity We Are Poor Punk Who Get Beat Up By Rednecks,’ Repo Man takes a look in the figurative punk rock mirror and reevaluates the whole Weltanschauung for the disastrous dead-end drive into a dilapidated ghetto brick-wall that it is. That being said, Repo Man is one of the few artifacts of punk—be it film or otherwise—that has aged quite gracefully as a potent piece of charmingly cynical celluloid that totally philosophically destroys the degenerate subculture it depicts, while having more of a punk attitude than the majority of things that are labeled ‘punk,’ including the bands featured on the film’s soundtrack. As much as I absolutely loath automatons who incessantly quote stupid Hebraic Hollywood comedies and other culture-distorting swill, I would be lying if I did not admit that Repo Man is one of the most compulsively quotable films ever made as one would be a pretentious poof not to admit that such lunatic lines like “Goddamn-dipshit-Rodriguez-gypsy-dildo-punks” and “You hear the most outrageous lies about it. Half-baked goggle-box do-gooders telling everybody it’s bad for you. Pernicious nonsense. Everybody could stand a hundred chest X-rays a year. They ought to have them, too,” are words of charmingly crude, comedic genius. Indeed, director Alex Cox must have been an alchemist during a previous life, as he turns everything that is American Kulturscheisse into jarringly jocular celluloid gold via Repo Man, so it is a shame that his long-in-the-make non-sequel Repo Chick (2009) is one darkly retarded piece of undignified digital diarrhea that should be absolutely avoided at all costs, especially if one values their personal integrity and/or god given right to think. As a proto-X-Files except all the more mirthful and conspiracy-driven, a hysterical history lesson in common counterculture spirituality, a jaded jukebox of the best of 1980s LA punk rock, a celluloid rehab program for dumb young punks everywhere to reconsider their worldview, a politically incorrect lesson in Yank class and racial relations, and a rare, highly quotable comedy that does not result in the cinematic equivalent of a lobotomy, Repo Man is indisputable proof that the death of the West can be looked at as a tragicomedy that one can learn many lessons from, at least until an apocalypse or space aliens wipe us out.

As psychoanalyst C.G. Jung wrote, whose theories are not playfully parodied in Repo Man for nothing, "Our present day observations of Saucers coincide – mutatis mutandis – with the many reports going back into antiquity, though not in such astonishing frequency as in these times. But the possibility of the destruction of a whole continent, which today is in the hands of politicians, has never existed previously." One of the first major thinkers to take the post-WWII UFO phenomenon seriously and actually study it, Jung ultimately came to the conclusion that, although not completely rejecting the idea of real-life little green men from outer-space, UFOs might have a primarily spiritual and psychological basis as he believed modern Occidental man was suffering from a crisis of the mind and soul. Indeed, when maniac Miller seemingly schizophrenically states, "There ain't no difference between a flying saucer and a time machine. People get so hung up on specifics they miss out on seeing the whole thing," he is essentially pointing to the fact—whether he knows it or not—that all these weird phenomena and alien sightings have a common origin; an all-encompassing Weltschmerz and deadlock of the Western collective unconsciousness. That being said, it would not be an exaggeration to say that every Western man is seeking to obtain what Otto achieves by the conclusion of Repo Man as a middle-class nihilist man who achieves spiritual and emotional ecstasy by finally riding in the radiation-run Malibu spaceship/time-machine as opposed to merely getting a mere passing glimpse of it. Of course, as Miller once so famously stated, "The life of a repo man is always intense."

-Ty E

STRAIGHT TO HELL
STRAIGHT TO HELL

Alex Cox (1987)

When I first saw British cult auteur Alex Cox's anarchistic surrealist slapstick Western Straight to Hell (1987)—a work titled after the 1982 Clash song of the same name—I thought it was one of the most incomprehensible cinematic failures of the director's career (I had yet to see most of the filmmaker's post-El Patrullero (1992) oeuvre), especially when compared to his debut feature-length masterpiece Repo Man (1984), but I have given it a couple subsequent viewings since then and the film has grown on me like a juicy cyst that is just waiting to be popped. Co-written by Dick Rude (A Cox regular who played protagonist Otto's skinheaded criminal punk friend "Duke" in Repo Man) and Cox over a mere three day period of apparent coffee addiction and sexual tension (apparently, the two writers were entranced by a woman sunbathing in a hotel room nearby their own) and shot over a four week period in Almería, Spain—the place where many great Spaghetti Westerns were filmed, including a number directed by Dago master auteur Sergio Leone (A Fistful of Dollars, The Good, the Bad and the Ugly)—Straight to Hell was not originally intended as a film, but a concert tour of Nicaragua of all things in support of the quasi-commie Sandinistas against the USA (like most ethno-masochistic whites/Europeans, Cox has had a lifelong obsession with leftist Latin American revolutionary movements), yet things fell through due to lack of funds and political reasons, and it was also probably decided that it would be much easier to raise money by making a feature-length with rock stars being cinematically killed opposed to being literally killed at concerts very few people would probably attend. With all the musicians already around that were supposed to support the unofficial "Rock for Communism" festival, including Joe Strummer of the Clash, Elvis Costello, and Grace Jones, as well as members of the The Pogues, Amazulu, and The Circle Jerks, Straight to Hell already had a punk rock star cast for a punk rock parody of Spaghetti Westerns in the spirit of Repo Man (1984), albeit with much less pre-production planning. An extremely loose remake of the criminally underrated Spaghetti Western Django Kill... If You Live, Shoot! (1967) directed by comp-symp auteur Giulio Questi—a gothic surrealist Western featuring a gay gang of fascistic blackshirt bandits—Straight to Hell is all the more nihilistic than the film that inspired it in its loving antagonism of the Guido cowboy genre that it is pathologically obsessed with. Advertised with the more than literal tagline, "A story of blood, money, guns, coffee, and sexual tension," Straight to Hell is the closest in spirit to Cox's masterpiece Repo Man, aside from possibly Walker (1987), albeit all the more uncompromisingly cynical, misanthropic, aesthetically malicious, and thematically anarchic, yet that does not also necessarily make it the lapsed punk filmmaker's greatest film either, but it does not make a bad way to waste about 80 minutes or so. A torrid and sardonic pseudo-Spaghetti

Western about four innately ill-starred and incompetent hit men/bank robbers who hide out in a peculiar desert town inhabited by the decidedly deranged and degenerate, Straight to Hell—a work director Alex Cox once described as an “anti-capitalist, anti-world trade, political parable”—is a classic story of what human beings do best, killing each other, and the altruistic big businesses that support them doing it.

Straight to Hell opens with the introduction of three goofy hitmen, Willy, Norwood, and Simms (played by co-writer Dick Rude, Cox regular Sy Richardson, and the Clash frontman Joe Strummer) as they prove from the get go they are incompetent criminals by botching a hit against an ostensibly Jewish businessman named Mr. Greenberg by oversleeping after an all-night alcohol binge. Norwood—a swag-driven middle-aged black man who happens to be the oldest and wisest, if not equally self-destructive of the criminal clan—also has brought along his brazen and bitchy pregnant old lady/bride Velma (played by pre-Hole Courtney Love) for the wild and reckless ride. In fear for what might happen to them after their suavely-dressed employer Amos Dade (played by filmmaker Jim Jarmusch) learns they really fucked up the job, the four fiercely fallible felons rob a bank and head for the desert, but their car breaks down so they bury their money and head for a seeming ghost town “till the heat blows down,” where they are silently greeted by a turned over car that looks much like their own with a dead man still in the driver’s seat, thus offering a potent premonition of their dubious futures. The next day, the goofy hit men have a bloody showdown with a gang of outlaw bandits named the McMahan clan (made up of Celtic punk band the Pogues) who are addicted to killing and coffee. After mindlessly killing a couple of people, the hit men earn the respect of the mad and murderous McMahans and their crudely charismatic leader Frank (Biff Yeager), thus resulting in a dubious truce for the next couple days in the rather treacherous tradition of the Molotov–Ribbentrop Pact. Not long after, Simms and Willy fall in love with two local women from the town, Fabienne (Jennifer Balgobin)—the French wife of an insanely paranoid ex-war veteran turned hardware shop owner—and Louise (Michele Winstanley)—a British bitch that is quite adamant about finding out where the hit men’s money is buried as opposed to what is hidden in the horny hit man’s pants. When the McMahans’ respected patriarch, a disgruntled old man, is killed by his own deranged granddaughter Sabrina McMahon (Kathy Burke), who pops her pop-pop over the head and knocks him off a roof just for the hell of it, the blood gets flowing and starts flying. Naturally, with Straight to Hell being a spoof of the Spaghetti Western genre, a quasi-metaphysical and festive funeral is held where a friend of Amos, Whitey, makes the mistake of showing up at the wrong place at the wrong time as he is looking for the renegade hit men and is subsequently hanged as he is blamed by the bloodlusting and vengeful McMahans for being a “stranger” and, naturally, the death of dear old grandpa. Not long after, a supposed house manufacturer named I.G. Farben (Dennis Hopper) and his genteel wife Sonia (Grace Jones) show up to the town and delivers a number of high-tech weapons that everyone in the town will inevitably use to exterminate one another in one of the most erratically eccentric and needlessly nonsensical battle scenes ever filmed in cinema history. When Amos Dade shows up at the town, the cat is finally let out of the bag in regard to the hit men's deceit and the bullets begin flying in a less than civil, civil war between the townspeople, the hit men, and Amos' criminal crew. Frank McMahon inevitably sides with Amos in reconciliation for mistakenly hanging Whitey for the death of grandpa McMahon and the hit men are essentially all by their lonesome, including among themselves as treachery reigns. Velma proves that Courtney Love was always a whore and Willy and Simms put holes in a holy man and one of the two men eventually betrays the other. In the end, only Norwood—whose wanton wife has cheated on him and ultimately pays the ultimate price via a karma-based car explosion—and a couple cute prostitutes are left standing. In the end, only the mysterious I.G. Farben and his big oil company win.

STRAIGHT TO HELL

The key to the anti-capitalist/anti-globalist 'message' of Straight to Hell is the character I.G. Farben played by Dennis Hooper. Hooper's character is named after the German chemical industry conglomerate of the same name that had the patent for the Jew-iciding gas Zyklon B which was found guilty of war crimes and seized by the Allies in 1945 and liquidated in 1952 (now only existing as an asset-less shell that pays 'reparations' to its victims). I.G. Farben was also in cahoots with John D. Rockefeller's United States-based Standard Oil Company and possibly had ties with DuPont, a major investor in and producer of leaded gasoline, United States Industrial Alcohol Company and its subsidiary, Cuba Distilling Co., as well as countless other "Allied" companies, but the kraut company would ultimately act as the scapegoat for all the other cancerous corporations who have only become all the more powerful and world-conquering today. Straight to Hell points to the fact, using a maniac microcosm of the pseudo-Spaghetti Western as the context, that while big corporations on opposing sides were getting rich together exploiting their nation's war effort, the civilians of each respective nation were the ones that ultimately paid the price for an illusionary war (or the 'Grand Illusion' as famed French auteur Jean Renoir once called it) established to do one thing and one thing only—to make the rich even richer at the expense of everyone below them, especially the philistine peasant. Indeed, the overall 'message' of Straight to Hell is a bit preachy in the quasi-punk fashion, even if few viewers of the film actually seem to notice it, thus making for one of the many reasons why the film just cannot compare with Cox's celluloid magnum opus Repo Man—a celluloid goldmine of nihilistic ideas and absurdist comedy—but the two together do make for an ideally idiosyncratic double-feature (and a triple-feature with Walker (1987) makes for all the more farcical fun). Although Straight to Hell concludes with promise of a sequel with the inter-title “COMING SOON: BACK TO HELL,” Cox would never get around to making it but he did create a rather pointless ‘director’s cut’ of the original film. Inspired by Francis Ford Coppola’s disastrous “Redux” version of Apocalypse Now (1979), Cox released a director’s cut of his Spaghetti Western parody entitled Straight to Hell Returns (2010) a couple years back, which features a couple deleted scenes, new CGI scenes of skeleton wolves and dogs, and a slightly upgraded soundtrack. Considering Alex Cox’s filmmaking career has plummeted to unimaginable depths of celluloid ineptitude with the marvelously mundane anti-Western melodrama Searchers 2.0 (2007) and his blasphemously bad non-sequel to Repo Man, Repo Chick (2009), one can only assume he needed to find a way so his electricity would not get cut off and Straight to Hell Returns was the rather unfortunate answer. Still, I found Straight to Hell Returns to be infinitely more enjoyable and inventive than a masturbatory porno fanboy flick like Quentin Tarantino’s negrophiliac celluloid defecation on Spaghetti Westerns, Django Unchained (2012). After all, where Alex Cox admits he is a pussy “pacifist” (he even had the gall to personally tell Neutron bomb inventor Samuel T. Cohen this), which Straight to Hell fully illustrates in a meaty manner that actually has testicular fortitude (even if the director has none in a real world context), Tarantino, despite his incessant celluloid licking of black and brown butts and women’s feet, has yet to fully embrace his inner beta-male and direct a two-volume piece of big budget interracial cuckold porn. In short, I will always prefer going Straight to Hell to seeing Django Unchained.

-Ty E

HIGHWAY PATROLMAN
HIGHWAY PATROLMAN

Alex Cox (1991)

It was no surprise to me when I found out that Alex Cox directed a film about a Mexican Highway Patrolman. After all, a Mexican Highway Patrolman is easily comparable to an American Repo Man. Like Repo Man before it, Alex Cox's Highway Patrolman follows a young man as he encounters the many dangerous adventures of the open roads. Unlike Repo Man, Highway Patrolman features a man trying to uphold the law, albeit in a lawless country. Otto in Repo Man was enticed to a career as a Repo Man due to the ambiguous legality of the job. After all, Otto was a punk rocker who loved to skank and mosh to the lovely punk hardcore group The Circle Jerks. Pedro Rojas, the lead and idealistic cop of Highway Patrolman, on the other hand is a Mexican patriot that is truly looking to cleanup up crime and grime of his beloved ancestral homeland.

Pedro is a Patrolman who truly thinks Mexico is a great country. When a Gringo offers Pedro and his partner some German beers, Pedro proclaims the best beer is Mexican. Of course, when the Gringo and his Gringo comrade leave, Pedro and his Mexican comrade guzzle down the Kraut Brewski as if they were dying in their quest for aqua. After all, whether you be an Injun, Mestizo, or Negro, it is wise to hide partaking in the altruistic welfare of a Gringo. One must never let the Gringo know that your existence relies on his generosity, even if he is a "racist." Pedro not only loves his wonderful sandbox Nation, but he also carries about the beautiful Chicas that live in it, especially female prostitutes with cocaine addictions. After marrying a Mexican broad and implanting his zesty ranch sauce in her meaty fajita, Pedro becomes a father. At this point, Pedro realizes he will now have to get his sex elsewhere as he cannot stand his Punta wife and her firecracker-style bitching.

Not long after starting his career as a Highway Patrolman, Pedro's fanatical idealism starts to wear thinner than a .50 cent piñata. And like a piñata, once Pedro's idealism breaks, he explodes with an eclectic array of colorful surprises. After Pedro's partner is killed, he goes vigilante and hunts down the drug peddling culprits. Pedro also makes sure to steal some drugs and cash from the dealers as he feels he owes it to his mistress prostitute girlfriend. Pedro may have to work a little overtime to get the job done, but I guess that is what one has to expect when bedding down two spicy ladies. Surprisingly, Pedro somehow is able to single-handedly bring down a group of drug dealers. Maybe Alex Cox was shooting for the Sci-Fi angle a little bit with Highway Patrolman just as he did with Repo Man. After all, everyone knows that there ain't no Mexican cops stopping drugs from getting into the glorious United States of America.

Highway Patrolman is no doubt one of Alex Cox's better films but certainly not his best. I can only assume that Highway Patrolman was made as a somewhat serious film for Mexicans, yet the film is full of hilarious scenes that probably only a Gringo could love. I also having a feeling that despite being directed by an outsider (and Brit to boot), Highway Patrolman offers a somewhat realistic look at Mexico and the typical daily hell the average Mexican faces. Shirtless grade school children skipping school to sell wild Iguanas, rabid dogs that need to be shot, a family of Mexicans gutting a recently dead pig, and a variety of other depressing/disgusting scenarios give meaning to the life of a Highway Patrolman. I certainly would rather be an American Repo Man rather than a Mexican Highway Patrolman. I can't wait to see how great this country looks in a couple decades from now with all the Illegal (and Legal) immigrants. One can certainly expect a rise in Repo Men and Highway Patrolmen as a result.

-Ty E

PERDITA DURANGO
PERDITA DURANGO

Álex de la Iglesia (1997)

Before becoming the king of international Spanish-Language cinema, a relatively unknown Javier Bardem played the lead role of Romeo Dolorosa – a cracked character with most likely the most hideous haircut in cinema history – in the criminally underrated film Perdita Durango (1997) aka Dance with the Devil directed by Álex de la Iglesia (The Day of the Beast, The Last Circus); a film based on the Barry Gifford's novel 59° and Raining: The Story of Perdita Durango. Gifford's ultra-venomous femme fatale character Perdita Durango made her first cinematic appearance in David Lynch's Wild at Heart (1990) and was originally portrayed by the beautiful Swedish/Italian actress Isabella Rossellini. Upon first discovering that beady-eyed Afro-Puerto Rican actress Rosie Perez played Perdita Durango in Perdita Durango, I was more than a tad bit disappointed. After all, few actresses can level up to the hypnotic beautiful insanity of Rossellini's performances, especially someone as seemingly unappealing as the woman who played Spike Lee's bitchy Baby Momma in Do the Right Thing (1989) yet Perez, like Bardem, manages to give a performance that is nothing short of fully artistically committed and stripped (both literally and figuratively) in Perdita Durango. In the film, Bardem and Perez star as the Hispanic equivalent of Bonnie and Clyde, the main difference being that the leading man's sexual potency is fully intact and that he is a Santeria witch doctor. Showing their undying commitment to meszito pride, the loco Latino couple kidnaps a young bourgeois WASP couple and uses them as their own personal sexual playthings. Despite their instinctive proclivity towards psychopathic criminality, Romeo Dolorosa and Perdita Durango – like their killer couple forebears Bonnie and Clyde – are extremely likeable anti-heroes whose charisma and charm is only rivaled by their moral instability. As one would expect from a film directed by Spanish auteur Álex de la Iglesia, Perdita Durango is as carnivalesque as a Fellini film and as sardonically (yet sillily) surreal as a work by Jodorowsky and Buñuel, but assembled in a more cohesive and linear manner, thus making the film accessible to both cultural philistines and snobbish cinephiles alike.

On top of all the cross-genre and thematic insanity of the work, Perdita Durango also features macabre Negro singer Screamin' Jay Hawkins as a spooky Santeria spook that certainly "puts a spell on you" despite his somewhat brief appearance in the film. Naturally, Perdita Durango also features music by Screamin' Jay Hawkins which – like the musical score by Simon Boswell – compliments the overall vivacious and equally visceral feel of the film. Perdita Durango also features an underweight James Gandolfini as a Drug Enforcement Administration officer who has a knack for getting hit by cars like Wile E. Coyote and an ironic cameo from Brit punk auteur Alex Cox as a cop. I am not usually one to describe a film as "cool", but Perdita Durango permeates divine derangement and subtle (and not so subtle) cultural references throughout, thus it is the kind of work that such would-be-cool contrivers like Quentin Tarantino and Oliver Stone wish they could make but lack the organic-suaveness to do so. After all, I cannot think of another film in the vein of Perdita Durango where race-based Stockholm syndrome is sexy and killing is kinky. In fact, I would go as far as saying that Perdita Durango is the ultimate action-packed cinematic “Meszito-Negro-Europid Western-spiritual” as it is a work that mongrelizes an eclectic collection of cultural, genre, and spiritual ingredients in a melting-pot that, for once, does not reek of repellant anti-cultural decay but smells like a most refined dish of the most delicious exotic and erotic kind. Needless to say, Perdita Durango is just another great example as to why Álex de la Iglesia is one of the greatest – if not the greatest – Spanish directors working today. If Luis Buñuel were alive today, I am sure he would take De La Iglesia out for some fine Spanish cuisine.

Although I am an unwavering fan of David Lynch’s film, I must admit that De La Iglesia’s Perdita Durango is more wild at heart than Wild at Heart. Apparently, a lot of Álex de la Iglesia’s Spanish fans felt that the Perdita Durango was a “sell-out” film and that the director was pandering to mainstream North American audiences for mere monetary gain. I find such masturbatory fan-boy sentiments to be nothing short of patently absurd. When watching Perdita Durango, it feels as if Álex de la Iglesia is boisterously and jovially raping American cultural values, especially mundane white middle-class mores with his uncompromising Spaniard flare, hence the somewhat obscure status of the film in the USA. It can only be assumed that the cult following for Perdita Durango will grow steadily as the years pass as it is surely one of the most underrated films of the 1990s. Luckily, Javier Bardem has finally earned the reputation he deserves as one of the greatest actors working today, but it is still most unfortunate that few have seen his unrivaled performance as the romantic homicidal rapist loon and Herb Alpert fan Romeo Dolorosa. Additionally, it is obvious that Rosie Perez will never again bare her derriere in a film as gloriously gory as Perdita Durango. Although a hyperbolic work, Perdita Durango is celluloid on speed at the peak of the high and a flick that never leaves the viewer adrift in a muddy swamp of action-packed banality. Perdita Durango is a lusty and lurid romance film for those that absolutely loathe romance films and for that reason alone (among many others), it must not be overlooked.

-Ty E

THE CROW
THE CROW

Alex Proyas (1994)

Seeing The Crow as a kid of about eight or nine in the theaters was pretty pivotal. Aside from Jurassic Park, it was the first movie I had really anticipated prior to its release, for any number of reasons (I was already well on my way to being a goth-lite social reject, it was based on a comic book, my dad and his girlfriend deemed it cool and at the time I had a raging crush on her and didn't yet long to crush my dad's head with a cinderblock, the "Lee family curse" the media kept on and on about). As the months ticked by, I would scour the magazines at the Tower Records magazine rack for any passing mention, taped episodes of tacky tabloid news shows exploiting the on-set slaying of star Brandon Lee, and tried on at least two occasions to steal copies of the graphic novel because the assholes at the comic store deemed me too young to read it and my parents were too lazy to accompany me to the store so I could read a comic where the hero dispatches bad guys with Joy Division quotes in place of the usual groan-inducing puns. By the time the flick hit theaters, my excitement had reached a fever pitch, and as genuinely stoked as dad and his flame were to see it, I was positively obnoxious, wanting to go the very first matinee showing in clown makeup (my dad drew the line at the idea of his son wearing makeup of any kind) and reciting the entire plot to people waiting in line as I understood it from Entertainment Weekly articles and my own imagination. Two hours later, give or take, the lights came on and I begged my dad to watch it again. As his girlfriend had been giving him a handjob through his pants throughout the entire movie, he relented, and showed me where to hide in the theater to wait for the next showing and promised to come back for me in a couple of hours. For months I would proclaim my love of The Crow to anyone and everyone, adult and classmate alike, without provocation. Something about a guy in a goth get-up blowing away a multi-cultural gang of goons in an endlessly raining, nigh post-apocalyptic Gotham-esque shithole spoke to me on many levels, mainly that of how cool it was to see the goth guy, instead of being spindly and getting molested by jocks in a locker room after refusing to dress out for Phys Ed, running on rooftops and looking good with his shirt off and saying shit like "Victims aren't we all?" before fucking some dude's shit up something fierce.

Flash-forward to this past weekend. While scavenging through a box of old VHS tapes my mom had deemed either garbage or storage worthy, I rescued all manner of perennial childhood favorites- The Toxic Avenger, Face/Off, Taxi Driver, Godzilla Vs. Megalon, The City of Lost Children, and yes, The Crow. With my girlfriend over and having ample time to kill, we decided to dig in and watch a few tapes, first Taxi Driver (still resonates perfectly after all these years- Paul Schrader might very well be the screenwriter I relate to most) and then, after the requisite jokes about Hot Topic to distance myself and preserve my illusion of "cool", I popped in The Crow...

...and it too held up after all these years. But for different reasons. No longer do I love The Crow because it is a cut above other comic adaptations, or for its "deep" themes, or because with Brandon Lee's passing I can attach a greater meaning to it all a la how Joy Division resonated so much more to 14-year old me when I read up on Ian Curtis' suicide. No, my love for The Crow continues unabated because it is charmingly awful - a mid-nineties time capsule that is the perfect ode to how silly the post-Dark Knight Returns "gritty" comic book thing got, stuffed to the gills with plot holes and inexplicable behavior all in the name of coming across as "edgy" and "alternative."

Eric Draven is some photogenic grunge rocker dude with a hot fiancée, Shelly, who wants to bring about housing reform but then the night before Halloween, or maybe it's Halloween night, or the night after (somewhere in that general time frame), a multi-cultural gang of uniquely nineties miscreants including a black guy with dreads and a leather overcoat and throwing knives, a retarded speedfreak named Skank, and two others I've already kind of forgotten break into their fancy loft and rape and kill Shelly (as choir music hums over the soundtrack to underscore the tragedy of it all) and shoot Eric, who goes through the ornate, gothic window and plummets to the ground. Their skateboarding alterna-kid friend Sarah shows up at the scene, all tough and exchanging last words with a dying Shelly, and is consoled by Ernie Hudson, playing the dedicated, bumbling black cop with his heart of gold on his sleeve. A year goes by and in keeping with some opening narration from the kid, Sarah, sometimes when a crime is so heinous a crow will bring a person back to life a year-to-the-day of when they shuffled off and that person will show no signs of decomposition whatsoever and will crawl from the grave shivering with rock hard abs and strands of their long, rocker mop all plastered to their face and then they'll wander back to their formerly fancy loft that has been left as is and that no one has moved into (a lucrative piece of real estate, too- like ten floors up, very top floor, penthouse perfection all the way) and with The Cure moaning over the soundtrack slather on some white face paint, dab some black around the eyes, tear up some black duds all Edward Scissorhands-like, and hunt down the baddies one-by-one, supplanting tough guy one-liners with Edgar Allan Poe quotes and shit because, even though judging from the flashback scenes and press photo of his band the guy was anything BUT a goth (more a second-rate pretty boy Cobain-aper a la the guy in Bush), I guess if Nine Inch Nails covering Joy Division is going to blare on the soundtrack whenever you run around rain-soaked rooftops looking for revenge, you'd better affect the leather pants and talking like a Freshman Lit major with a hard-on for Clive Barker vibe, plus I reckon dead, raped girlfriend is an acceptable reason to wear eyeliner as having no real prom prospects or snarky Columbine jokes or whatever it is nowadays that convinces kids to stay out of the sun and blare Sisters of Mercy when borrowing dad's car to drive to the mall ("Woe is me, forced to adorn the thorny crown of Hot Dog on a Stick").

THE CROW

Anyways, in one poorly conceived, anti-climactic kill scene after another, Draven (Draven...sigh) totally mindfucks his killers by regenerating after being stabbed or shot (bullet through the hand, looks through the hole as it closes, and might have made a quip about Jesus, but then again, might have been me making a quip about Jesus to my girlfriend between guffaws) and has to continually go through great lengths to remind them of who he is despite apparently having the power (as he illustrates to his new best bud, Ernie Hudson) to grab someones hand and make them re-live his death, or his fiancée's death, or something like that. Turns out this Crow fella has some very ill-defined powers. To the best of my comprehension these abilities include CGI-enhanced regeneration, super-speed, the ability to wig out friendly black cops, to see through the eyes of his companion crow, and to lecture everyone all self-righteously about not smoking and doing drugs and shit because, um, Crows don't do drugs or because he is trying to impart some wisdom from beyond or something? Maybe it's supposed to be ironic? Whatever it is, it definitely neuters the guy as an undead vigilante some- what the fuck does he care if the cop smokes or if Sarah's mom is a junkie? He came back to kick ass, not to be a DARE spokesman in corpse paint. At one point, he even drains the morphine from Sarah's mom's arm after incapacitating one of the bad guys, whom she happens to be fucking, (apparently another of his powers? what else can this fucker do- unscrew lightbulbs with his mind? drink a case of beer without a hangover? wait...no...Crow's got the edge), prompting her to make scrambled eggs for Sarah in the morning. That's cool, I guess. Your mom is a morphine-addicted whore barmaid draining the balls of a guy who raped and killed your friends, but some scrambled eggs should prevent costly therapist visits and rehab stints, no? Speaking of Sarah, with all of the advice this guy doles out, why does he never think to mention to her that skateboarding in the rain all the time is a bad idea? When I was a young skatepunk about her age I made the mistake of skating in the rain a few times and it fucked up my trucks, completely undid my grip tape. And maybe someone should give Mr. Draven some advice when he takes some down time to shred on his guitar atop a building...motherfucker, it's sprinkling out, the rooftop is soaked, and yet you have your amp and tons of electrical cords everywhere? I know this won't affect you, dude, you're dead, but lead by example. That shit is dangerous, and you are doing it for no other reason than to look cool (does your Slash-lite solo-ing further the plot any?), which is definitely in line with, say, puffing on the occasional cigarette, you hypocritical prick.

Tangent aside, as Draven works his way through the gang we come to realize via clumsy expository dialogue that they were only acting on orders of their boss, Top Dollar (Michael Wincott, one of the sole bright lights of the film), a comically confused gangster who is equal parts Southern gentleman (his accent and delivery), Samurai (his mane, sword, and Asian half-sister fucktoy, played by Bai Ling), with just a dash of Trent Reznor for good goth measure. Wincott invests what is a fairly laughable only-in-a-Hollywood action movie/comic book kind of role with a degree of menace and charm that definitely had me wishing the guy had more screentime and a better written role, or maybe a starring vehicle as a half-Taiwanese fur-trapper/cocaine dealer or something. Whatever the case, Top Dollar makes it his mission to bye bye Birdy Brandon Lee, The Crow's powers, whatever they are, begin to waver near the climax, and, to quote Sarah quoting a song of Eric's band earlier in the film "It can't rain all the time." (Again, for all the goth-posturing, this non-cigarette smoking bore wrote a song about how it can't rain all the time? Come on!)

All snark aside, Brandon Lee's on-set shooting death was quite tragic and without a doubt the reason this movie carries some of the weight it does. It is hard not to wince a little in every scene where Draven is shot, even with the knowledge that the offending footage was not used in the film. Death aside, Lee turns in as good a performance as anyone could with such an underwritten character, and is quite adept at laying on the charm or unhinged mania whenever the scene calls for it. With his leading-man good looks Lee could have likely turned in another big screen action performance or two before drifting into DTV-obscurity, and it's a real shame he didn't get the chance, leaving behind a fiancée of his own (which also adds some weight to the proceedings, making one wish these real-life parallels were matched up to a better film). I could also use this space to get into the graphic novel and the real-life tragedy that inspired it, but the book is similar to the film in that, despite having such weighty real-life events tied into its creation (in the case of the book, the drunk driving related death of author James O' Barr's girlfriend), it just...isn't...that...good, unfortunately. I should also point out that even the films detractors tend to point out the visual style of director Alex Proyas, and I will say- the film does do well in creating its rain-soaked noir atmosphere of a dying cityscape on the brink of extinction, a lot of which is rendered moot by some painfully dated nineties-isms like the cheesy industrial club that exists only in the imaginations of forty year old production designers that would rollerblade to work circa 1992, 1993, but still, the film looks nice, moves at a good clip, and judging from some DVD extras I saw back in the day, a few of the action scenes would potentially have been pretty good (especially the scene with Lee vs. the gangsters seated at the table in Top Dollar's board room) had they not needed to be pared down due to matters of sensitivity to Lee's death, MPAA, inability to do re-shoots, etc.

As it stands, while all of this may come across as a pretty harsh drubbing, it is actually still an enjoyable film. A frame of reference- at about the time I first saw this film, I absolutely adored Glenn Danzig. I listened to nothing but the first four Danzig records, Samhain, and The Misfits, and even made Danzig the topic of my first zine (I was eight...my cover lobbied for Danzig getting the role as Wolverine if an X-Men movie should ever come to pass)(sigh). As I got a bit older, I became pretty embarrassed by all of this, and rejected Danzig outright. "I only enjoy refined, critic-proof ART" became my unspoken motto. But in the past couple of years, I've come around. Fuck it, I love Danzig. Sure he's cheesy, and fails miserably at being the imposing figure his 5'4" frame wants to put across. Yeah, searching "Danzig's Book Collection" on Youtube should make milk come out the nose of even those who aren't drinking milk. But fuck, I know all of his songs by heart and as silly as much of it is, I can't help but love it.. Not everything in black and white- some things, like Glenn Danzig or The Crow, exist in that weird grey space somewhere alongside nostalgia and "so bad it's good", neither of which quite explain the appeal. All I know is that my girlfriend and I got some good laughs out of it and I'm not as ashamed as being on this movie's nuts as an eight or nine year old as I would had I been fifteen or twenty-four when I first caught it, and while part of me almost wants to bemoan the dearth of truly badass undead goth vigilantes (though I will say that The Crow is about a thousand times more hardcore than Edward and Bella and co.), um, fuck goths. Dudes with pasty skin wearing fishnet shirts and black lipstick fetishizing death while continuing to live in their parents' basements don't deserve a kickass cinematic analogue. Just uncomfortably homoerotic bro-pummeling, and lots of it, until they either grow a pair and fight back and stop supporting Cleopatra Records or give in and join Ian Curtis and Rozz Williams for absinthe and sullen shuffling in the great goth club in the sky.

THE CROW

-Jon-Christian

THE NORTHERNERS

Alex van Warmerdam (1992)

Although my grandfather was a native Dutchman, he decided to immigrate to the United States after the Netherlands went kaput as a result of the Second World War and eventually started an 'American' family with a woman of old English, German, and Irish stock. Probably like many foreigners, especially those from Western Europe, my grandfather regretted moving to the United States and naturally took trips back to the Netherlands long after he had acquired American citizenship and started a family. Needless to say, I thought it would be interesting to watch a Dutch film set during the post-WWII reconstruction period in the exact year my mother was born in 1960 and luckily the delightfully debasing Dutch dark comedy De noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners directed by Alex van Warmerdam (Kleine Teun aka Little Tony, Borgman) offered me that completely rare and ultimately rather bizarre opportunity. Admittedly, I was not that impressed with van Warmerdam's De Jurk (1996) aka The Dress, nor his extra loose 'postmodern' Brothers Grimm adaptation Grimm (2003), but considering the context of the film and the fact it is oftentimes considered the director's best work, The Northerners was something that I could not help but see, especially after learning that iconoclastic auteur Theo van Gogh appears in the film as a mischievous moped-riding man-child. Van Warmerdam's second feature following his shockingly successful hit directorial debut Abel (1986) aka Voyeur, the film is more or less the Dutch equivalent of a German anti-Heimat film, as a work that depicts a small Dutch village as an unrelentingly claustrophobic and ridiculously repressive virtual hell-on-earth that is haunted by the metaphysical plague of both Catholicism and Calvinism, but especially the latter. Somewhat ironically produced by mainstream Dutch writer, director, and producer Dick Maas (De Lift aka The Lift, Amsterdamned)—a mensch that is about as far as away from the arthouse world as a filmmaker from Holland could be as the creator of the internationally successful Flodder film franchise and as someone that makes poor and pointless Hollywood remakes of his own films (i.e. Down (2001) aka The Shaft starring Naomi Watts)—and featuring a relatively large budget for a Dutch production (4.7 million Dutch guilders, which was a little bit over $2.6 million) that enabled the work to be shot entirely in a studio located near the tiny and relatively new planned city of Almere, The Northerners features a somewhat unnerving, hyperrealistic aesthetic that feels like an Edward Hopper painting come to life as assembled by the sadistically sardonic spawn of Luis Buñuel and Jacques Tati, albeit with a discernibly Dutch flavor that will certainly dumbfound and probably upset the majority of American Hollywood-lobotomized viewers. Unquestionably, the film feels like a work that could have been directed by perennial hipster Wes Anderson (The Royal Tenenbaums, The Grand Budapest Hotel) were he Dutch and had some actual testicular fortitude

THE NORTHERNERS

(in fact, I am willing to bet my life that The Northerners and van Warmerdam are both Mr. Anderson's greatest 'cryptic' influences). Set in a superlatively sterile and conspicuously contrived realm of static nothingness just before the Netherlands embraced sexual liberation and all other forms of post-WWII degeneracy in a no bullshit fashion that surely transcended their neighbors, The Northerners follows in a strong but largely unknown tradition of Dutch savage (anti)humor that makes it rather clear that the Dutch tend to find things funny that would certainly make numerous other peoples and cultures cry and wallow in disgust. Notably, at the end of the 17th century, the Dutch Reformed Church denounced humor and laughing out loud as poor public etiquette in a curious trend that lasted at least until the Second World War when occupying American GIs were warned not to tell the Dutch jokes, as they would not understand them. Certainly, The Northerners is a truly absurd and sardonically surreal depiction of the singular essence and unrivaled idiosyncrasies of the once-humor-hungry people from Holland.

The Northerners begins simply enough with a family posing for a photograph and the photographer telling them they should look less gloomy and more "hopeful." When the father asks, "Hopeful, for what?" the photographer replies, "For the future, of course," which inspires the family to smile in an exaggeratedly phony fashion typical of Americans. In the next scene, the portrait of the family is featured on a billboard reading "2000 Apartments to Be Realized in 1958," yet it is the summer of 1960 and only 9 apartments have been built in the seemingly aborted town, which has such a small population that everyone knows everything about anyone, whether they want to or not. Indeed, privacy is virtually nonexistent in the world of The Northerners, except for a quasi-magical wooded area nearby that seems like a parody of a völkisch National Socialist propaganda film like Ewiger Wald (1936) aka Enchanted Forest co-directed by Hanns Springer and Rolf von Sonjevski-Jamrowski. More like warped archetypes than real and nuanced individuals, the people of the town all have their own glaring quirks and vices which ultimately make for explosive combinations when mixed together, as a series of misunderstandings between the characters ultimately leads to death and tragedy. Auteur van Warmerdam also seems to believe that sexual repression as brought on by religious psychosis can lead to rape. While the town is as sterile and contrived as humanly possible, a nearby forest features a Grimmian fantasy realm that inspire rape, murder, and mutilation in the locals. If there is anyone resembling a sort of central protagonist to the film, it is a 12-year-old boy named Thomas (Leonard Lucieer) who regularly sports blackface and jungle garb in tribute to his hero, Congolese independence leader and Pan-African revolutionary Patrice Émery Lumumba, who by the end of the film will be dead. Thomas does not like his butcher father Jacob (Jack Wouterse)—a visceral man with a big beer belly and iconic mustache—because he is constantly fighting with his devout Catholic wife Martha (van Warmerdam's wife Annet Alherbe) over the fact that she will not even let him touch her rather larger derriere, let alone have sex with him. Indeed, while Jacob worships Martha's sizable rump, she equally fanatically worships Jesus Christ at a makeshift altar she has assembled in the home. Possibly a sufferer of schizophrenia, Martha imagines seeing inanimate figurines on her altar of a saint and a red bird coming to life, thus further confirming her belief in the Lord and Savior and, in turn, causing her butcher hubby to suffer a prolonged case of blue balls that ultimately incites him to attempt to rape local women. Although just a preteen, Thomas' best friend is a rather nihilistic and anarchistic middle-aged mailman named Plagge (fittingly played by director van Warmerdam who, like his character in the film, is a mastermind of pernicious absurdist situational chaos), who regularly reads his neighbors' mail and sometimes even burns it for fun. Plagge also regularly spies on his neighbors so he has dirt to use against them, thereupon making him a much loathed man in the neighborhood. Plagge's archenemy is a local four-eyed 'fascistic' hunter named Anton (Rudolf Lucieer) who, despite having a hot and loving Aryan blonde wife named Elizabeth (Loes Wouterson), is sexually impotent and thus cannot sire the progeny he and his wifey so hysterically desire, hence the rather large chip on his shoulder. Anton is a human ticking time-bomb of the literally impotent sort and it is only a matter of time before the nefarious nerd explodes on someone. Unfortunately, it is ultimately the most innocent of individuals that succumbs to Anton's infertile fury and deep-seated seething hatred.

The more butcher Jacob's wife Martha begins to suffer surreal and seemingly schizophrenic religious hallucinations, the less sexual relief he receives, thus resulting in ultimately violent tensions to build up in their household that are unreleased in the most irrational of ways. In fact, Jacob becomes so sexually frustrated that he decides to lock the door of his butcher shop and then coerces a young big bosomed blonde female employee to come into his office where he forces himself upon her. Needless to say, the big breasted blonde storms out of the butcher shop screaming after being nearly raped in an embarrassing scenario that is witnessed by every single woman in town. Instead of being repulsed by Jacob, the women of the town begin regularly visiting the Butcher and symbolically buy large phallic-like pieces of meat from him, thus giving him the typically esoteric feminine signal that they would like him to penetrate their gravy-giving meat-curtains with his beefy blue-veined steak. Since she's desperate to have a child, the hunter Anton's wife Elizabeth becomes especially interested in receiving Jacob's throbbing knockwurst and naturally the beefy Butcher cannot deny her attention. Meanwhile, Thomas discovers a graceful fairy-like feral waif that lives in the forest named Agnes (Veerle Dobbelaere) who likes showing off her derriere in a merrily mischievous fashion while hiding behind trees. Agnes is unquestionably the sole bright light in the town, so it is only natural that she is senselessly snuffed out by asshole hunter Anton, who accidentally shoots her, ties her corpse to a large boulder, and rolls it into a pond where the quasi-fairy girl loved to swim. Before killing Agnes, Anton also manages to get his nemesis, mailman Plagege, arrested and imprisoned after catching him burning mail and reading a 'nudišt' magazine that he has stolen from one of his neighbors. Meanwhile, Thomas' mother Martha falls into a bedridden borderline catatonic state after her husband confronts her regarding her cock-blocking spiritual cramp and manhandles her in front of the entire town.

THE NORTHERNERS

While little Thomas naturally never gets to meet his ebony hero Lumumba, he experiences the next best thing when two dubious bearded Belgian Catholic missionaries come to his town with a nicotine-loving caged negro warrior (Dary Some), who they put on display for the townspeople as if he is some sort of rare exotic panther that caught after entering the mysterious jungles of the Dark Continent. Naturally, as a proud Lumumbaphile, Thomas helps the negro escape from his cage and of course hunter Anton makes it his business to find him in what ultimately proves to be a failed manhunt. As a feral man from feral-land, the negro makes the forest his home and soon creates various boob-traps and paints primitive Africa art around the area, thereupon bringing a little slice of the Global South to the Nordic north. Unbeknownst to Anton, the Negro witnesses him murdering Agnes while hiding in the woods and he takes it upon himself to avenge the fellow nature-lover's death at the hands of a nature-hating hothead. When Anton later makes the mistake of pulling a gun on Thomas, the Negro uses a makeshift Zulu spear to gouge his eyes out, thus blinding the hunter and, in turn, destroying his livelihood as a woodsman in the process. Meanwhile, to the abject disgust of the Butcher, his house becomes a religious shrine of sorts, with his rotting bedridden wife becoming the object of vigils and adoration by all the local women, who seem to use the borderline catatonic woman as a therapeutic source of solace for their own sexual repression. Meanwhile, the butcher gets so hopelessly horny that he attempts to violently rape a nearly-elderly woman, but he is ultimately stopped after suffering the major embarrassment of his son Thomas witnessing him in the act. Luckily, as van Warmerdam's film seems to more than hint, the sexual revolution, women's lib, and birth control will eventually save the frigid chicks and pulsating dicks of the Netherlands from the shackles of Christian patriarchal oppression and whatnot.

A sort of 'evil fairytale' and (anti)folk fable that is as shamelessly Dutch as it is anti-Dutch, The Northerners demonstrates that, despite their rather (in)famous reputation for being some of the rudest 'finger-waving' people in Europe, the people of the Netherlands also happen to be some of the most self-deprecating people around. In a somewhat unwitting way, van Warmerdam's film depicts many of the mental pathologies and vices that the Dutch possess today. Indeed, in his love for 'black Jesus' Lumumba, the character Thomas exhibits the sort of rampant xenophilia that is common among more 'enlightened' Dutchmen today. Also, the Negro character that Thomas befriends who ultimately decides to live on the outskirts of the town in the forest is symbolic of the Netherlands' new 'post-racial' citizenry, as he certainly has a major problem assimilating into the mainstream population and probably never will. Of course, the tragic 2004 assassination of The Northerners star Theo van Gogh, himself a vocal critic of multiculturalism and the Islamization of the Occident, made it quite clear that the racial assimilation of the 'racial other' is a preposterous liberal humanist fantasy and Zio-American globalist scheme (notably, van Gogh's assassin was born and raised in Amsterdam, thus demonstrating that you can take the camel jockey out of the desert but not the desert out of the camel jockey). As for the sources of distinctly Dutch pathologies, van Warmerdam seems to blame over four centuries of Calvinism and, to a lesser extent, Catholicism. Of course, in its uniquely unflattering depiction of Belgian Roman Catholic missionaries with goofy beards bringing caged negroes to the Netherlands, van Warmerdam also attacks Catholicism for colonization. More recently, the Catholic Church, like most post-WWII brands of European Christianity, has done its part in promoting multiculturalism and proliferating the flooding of Europe with mostly uneducated and oftentimes medieval-minded citizens from the Global South. In its almost oneiric depiction of a somnambulist-like middle-class population that suffers from more mental pathologies than an Israeli mental institution, The Northerners vaguely resembles the dystopian anti-Heimat flick Ich liebe dich, ich töte dich (1971) aka I Love You, I Kill You directed by Uwe Brandner, but aside from that I can only really draw comparisons to van Warmerdam's oeuvre and works by other Dutch arthouse filmmakers. Indeed, Dutch couple Maartje Seyferth and Victor Nieuwenhuijs' pitch black absurdist comedy Vlees (2010) aka Meat—a work featuring a horny hog-like butcher who likes playing with all sorts of meat, especially of the youthful flesh-flower sort—almost seems like a modernist update of van Warmerdam's film and thus it is all the more unhinged because of it. Notably, The Northerners won the Golden Calf (aka 'Gouden Kalf')—The Dutch equivalent of an Oscar—for "Best Director," thus reflecting the drastically different mindsets between the Dutch and Americans. Certainly, the commercial and critical success of van Warmerdam's in the Netherlands is the equivalent of Todd Solondz's unsung masterpiece Palindromes (2004) becoming a blockbuster film in the United States. While some, if not most, of my Dutch grandfather's children and grandchildren would probably have a hard time appreciating, let alone understanding, The Northerners, to me the film seemed almost too restrained, thus reflecting the whimsical nature of genetic inheritance. Indeed, I don't know much about Calvinism, but somehow I suspect that it has contaminated by blood and van Warmerdam's iconoclastic celluloid romp has only reinforced my suspicions.

-Ty E

BORGMAN
BORGMAN

Alex van Warmerdam (2013)

Dutch auteur Alex van Warmerdam (Abel aka Voyeur, De Jurk aka The Dress) is a filmmaker whose works I tend to consider hit or miss, but are certainly never boring. Personally, I was ready to give up on van Warmerdam after Grimm—a botched modernist reworking of the popular European fairytale Brother and Sister written by the Brothers Grimm, who have most certainly been one of the greatest influences on the Dutch filmmaker—but then he made his near-masterpiece Borgman (2013), which is certainly his greatest and most ambitious effort since his second feature De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners. Like most of van Warmerdam's films, Borgman is a darkly humorous, nihilistic, and rather misanthropic anti-bourgeois neo-fable of sorts, but what makes it somewhat different than the director's previous works is that it is his closest thing to a 'horror' film, though certainly not in the conventional sense of the genre. The first Dutch film in 38 years to be selected to compete in the Cannes Film Festival for the coveted Palme d'Or (Jos Stelling's beautifully brutal directorial debut Mariken van Nieumeghen (1974) was the first and last film to compete in the festival before van Warmerdam's film was accepted), the film is a pernicious piece of antichrist celluloid metaphysics where pure and unadulterated, yet admittedly charming and sophisticated, evil prevails in the end. Indeed, aside from its idiosyncratically incendiary humor and post-Grimmian storytelling, van Warmerdam's fiercely farcical filmic fable is anti-Hollywood to its cold black dead core in that all of modern Americanized western man's dreams are meticulously destroyed in an intriguingly slow-burning fashion that destroys the viewer's world and takes them to hell in about 110 minutes or so.

In a June 5, 2014 interview featured at Dangerous Minds, van Warmerdam confesses regarding the eponymous 'antihero': "He is an evil version of myself. He does what I would do if I were him." In a storyline that is superficially similar to Pier Paolo Pasolini's Teorema (1968), Borgman depicts an enigmatic stranger entering an oh-so ostensibly perfect bourgeois home and slowly but surely 'seducing' virtually every single family member in a somewhat inexplicable, quasi-supernatural fashion. Featuring blatant references to Swiss painter Henry Fuseli's masterwork The Nightmare (1781), the film features an antihero that looks like a deranged hobo but is ultimately an evil being whose behavior resembles that of the incubus-like 'Alp' of German folklore. It should also be noted that the titular character's first name is 'Camiel' and he becomes the gardener of the main family featured in the film, as 'Camael' is one of the seven archangels of the Bible and is claimed to be the leader of the forces that got Adam and Eve expelled from the Garden of Eden. Notably, van Warmerdam was brought up in the Roman Catholic Church, which refuses to recognize Camael because of the Vatican's decision to ban the veneration of angels that are not mentioned in the Bible, thus reflecting the Dutch auteur filmmaker's innately heretical essence. Indeed, Borgman is a work where the figurative 'Adam and Eve' are 'banished' from their suburban 'paradise' on earth, the bourgeois utopian ideal is deconstructed and ripped to shreds, and the bad guys win, among various other uniquely unsavory and superlatively subversive sacrilegious things that make van Warmerdam seem like one of the most spiritually forsaken yet comically clever filmmakers in cinema history.

Opening with the foreboding pseudo-Biblical quote, "And they descended upon the earth to strengthen their ranks," Borgman instantly establishes a supernatural horror mood that is only further accentuated when a super stoic Catholic priest (Pierre Bokma) with a shotgun and two brutish looking dudes with bad ass attitudes attempt to hunt down and presumably kill a hobo that lives in a sort of makeshift bunker in the woods. The hobo in question is named 'Camiel Borgman' (Belgian actor Jan Bijvoet) and he bears a striking resemblance to the eponymous character played by John Barrymore in Svengali (1931). Unluckily for the main middle-class family featured in the film, Borgman manages to escape from the martial priest via a tunnel connected to his underground home and subsequently warns his equally hobo-like comrades Ludwig (director Alex van Warmerdam) and Pascal (Tom Dewispelaere) to escape as well. Somewhat strangely, Borgman thinks it is a good idea to enter an opulent bourgeoisie neighborhood with large houses featuring modern architecture where he proceeds to knock on the doors of random people and asks them if he can bathe in their homes, which he is routinely denied. When Borgman knocks on the door of a middle-age corporate workaholic family man named Richard (Jeroen Perceval) and pretends to be know his blonde wife Marina (Hadewych Minis), he is nearly beaten half to death and then subsequently disappears seconds later seemingly into thin air, though the sinisterly manipulative meta-Machiavellian hobo never actually leaves the property. Indeed, Richard seems to wisely sense there is something ominous and threatening about Borgman and instinctively physically ravages the blatantly dubious vagrant, who actually has the gall to get smart and arrogant with the man whose bathtub he so arrogantly demands to use. Falling victim to irrational female style empathy and the sort of liberal humanist brainwashing you tend to suffer if you watch too much TV or attend a liberal arts college, Marina feels sorry for dirty bum bastard Borgman and when she notices the antagonist squatting in her shed later that night while her husband is at work, she does not call the police but instead absurdly invites him into her home to take a luxury bath where he enjoys a nice meal, wine, and cable television while sitting in the tub. Of course, little does hopelessly naive Marina realize that Borgman will eventually take over her home, family, and entire life, among other things.

Despite the fact that she does not work and spends most of her time playing around and creating degenerate Pollack-esque paintings by literally flinging paint on a large canvas, Marina has her three small grade school children watched and taken care of by a young maid named Stine (Sara Hjort Ditlevsen), who the female protagonist warns to not tell her husband about the fact that Borgman is squatting in their shed. Rather curiously, Marina's youngest daughter Isolde (Elve Lijbaart) falls ill after Borgman moves in and the seemingly demonic antihero soon uses the opportunity to brainwash the young girl with seemingly satanic stories like 'The Story of the White Child that Floats Above the Clouds.' In fact, Borgman begins regularly telling all three children nighttime stories about how Jesus Christ is a liar and a banal narcissist who does not care about anyone but himself. Ultimately, by telling the children these stories, Borgman manages to become the sole paternal influence, as the kids' father is also depicted telling them stories but he is nowhere as near as good of a storyteller and seems like an over-the-hill meathead jock philistine compared to the spiritually deleterious vagrant, who utilizes lies and superficial charm to corrupt the souls of his all-too-human prey. Aside from being able to brainwash Marina to begin hating her husband by sitting unclad on her body while she is asleep like the incubus in Fuseli's painting The Nightmare, Borgman also has the power to talk to animals, namely dogs, who soon begin roaming the bourgeois family's home and may or may not be the antihero's comrades Ludwig and Pascal in animal form. Aside from Ludwig and Pascal, two similarly swarthy guidette-like women, the middle-aged Brenda (van Warmerdam's wife Annet Malherbe) and 30-something-year-old Ilonka (Eva van de Wijdeven), also 'work' for Borgman, who he communicates with via cellphone. Ultimately, Borgman will use his loyal menacing collectivist-minded minions to help him take over both Richard and Marina's home and family. Quite notably, all of the members of Borgman's group have a scar on their back near their shoulder blade, as if they have been given some sort of satanic surgery that has programmed them to become evil followers of the almost seemingly undead sort. Naturally, Richard and Marina's children and maid Stine will also become unwitting victims to this exceedingly energuminal esoteric influence.

BORGMAN

Needless to say, it does not take Marina long to completely fall under Borgman's uniquely unscrupulous spell and when the antihero decides to leave after complaining that he is bored because he cannot roam around her house freely, the pathetically lonely and seemingly sex-starved housewife becomes desperate and agrees to a curious arrangement that ultimately results in the slow and painful death of the nice elderly family gardener. With the help of his demonesses Brenda and Ilonka, Borgman kills the gardener and his wife, drops their corpses in a lake after attaching a plant pot full of cement to their heads, and then takes over their home as if they are assuming their identities. By shaving his head and beard and sporting a fancy new suit, Borgman manages to obfuscate his identity and is instantly hired by superficial and vain 'bourgeois-minded' Richard, as the new gardener, though Ludwig and Pascal also help him obtain the job.

Indeed, knowing that Richard is a 'racist' who does not want dirty untermenschen roaming around his property and have easy access to his young children and frigid wife, Ludwig and Pascal pay shabbily-dressed bum-like Arabs and negroes to apply for the gardener job so that Borgman comes out looking like the only decent and worthy candidate. When a nice looking old white fellow attempts to apply for the job, Ludwig grabs him before he reaches the front-door of Richard's home and proceeds to brutally beat him. When Richard and Marina's youngest daughter Isolde, who has completely fallen under Borgman's sinister spell and whose eyes indicate that she seems dead inside, later finds the old man in the woods, she kills the poor old bastard by crushing his skull with a cement block. Ultimately, moronic Richard is so impressed with Borgman that he not only hires him for the gardening job, but also allows him to stay in a luxury room in their family home and Ludwig and Pascal are soon brought in as 'assistants.' While transforming Richard and Marina's garden from a suburban Garden in Eden into a subtly ominous Garden of Evil, Borgman and his chthonian comrades begin putting the final touches on their metaphysically malefic master plan that only the children seem to truly understand.

Naturally, when workaholic Richard unexpectedly loses his much cherished job as an ass-licking corporate whore, he is destroyed, so when maid Stine brings her masculine military recruit boyfriend Arthur Stornebrink (Mike Weerts) over for dinner one night and the family man realizes he is the son of the boss that fired him, a fight breaks out that rather repels Marina, who now hates her hubby and has become completely infatuated with Borgman, who tells her that he will not have sex with her until the time is right, as if the carnal act will be of spiritual proportions. Of course, Borgman has nil interest in Marina and is just stringing the hopelessly horny housewife along so that he can fulfill his particularly pernicious plan. When all three of the children become ill, Borgman has his demoness Brenda come by in the guise of a doctor and she somewhat humorously describes the kid's sicknesses as being the result of being "overtired" from the "modern world," adding, "Don't forget they have a lot to cope with these days: TV, internet, school. In the holidays the child's body will give up." To keep Marina and her children in check, Borgman and his pals also begin drugging the family, with Ludwig and Pascal even taking the three kids into a sewer where they supply them with a dubious red liquid that resembles Kool-Aid. When Borgman induces a nightmare in Marina where she has her skin ripped off her flesh by her husband during a heated sex session, she wakes up enraged and nonsensically punches her sleeping hubby in the head, so the decidedly disrespected family man fights back by smacking her around and then subsequently drags her into a bathroom where he forces her to take a cold shower. Needless to say, Marina is rather pissed about being smacked around by her much hated hubby Richard, so she asks Borgman to kill him. Ultimately, Richard is poisoned after Borgman's minions perform a sort of sinisterly high-camp garden-based opera featuring Ilonka performing ballet and Ludwig and Pascal in drag sporting tights and tutus. After Richard croaks, Borgman's demons perform 'back surgery' on Stine and assumedly the kids, thus leaving them with the same back scars as the antihero and his comrades. While Marina expects sex from Borgman, the antihero predictably poisons her as well. In the end after Richard and Marina are killed and buried in their yard, Borgman leaves the home with his comrades and brings the three children and Stine with them. Like all evil psychopathic leaders ranging from Trotsky to Obama that thrive on lies to maintain power and to get their followers to mindlessly support and/or carry out the most daft and despicable of deeds, Borgman understands that to make someone your spiritual slave they still have to be young and impressionable enough, hence his decision to spare none of the adults just as the bolsheviks spared none of the white Russians, especially not the priests, intellectuals, and members of the aristocracy. In that sense, in few other films does evil triumph in such an effortless and seemingly immaculate fashion than in Borgman.

BORGMAN

Unquestionably, Borgman can be interpreted in a variety of ways, both materialistically and metaphysically, but some things are quite certain like its flagrant anti-bourgeois and ultimately ethno-masochistic message. Indeed, aside from a scene where Richard is depicted as a big mean racist who turns down poor brown people of various shades for the gardener job, the same character defends his so-called 'white privilege' after his wife complains she feels guilty due to their European opulence by stating, "We were born in the West, and the West happens to be affluent. We can't help it." Of course, auteur Alex van Warmerdam demonstrated his sad groveling sense of white guilt and ethno-masochism in The Northerners, which not only portrays traditionalist Dutch folk as sadistic perverts, rapists, murderers, and schizophrenic religious fanatics but also pays quirky tribute to Congolese independence leader and Pan-African revolutionary Patrice Émery Lumumba, as well as features a negro tribesman blinding a 'fascistic' hunter of the symbolically sexually impotent sort. Despite the film's dubious, convoluted message, Borgman can luckily also be interpreted in the opposite way that the director probably intended, especially considering that the eponymous villain looks just like Svengali who, as depicted in George du Maurier's 1895 novel Trilby, is a Jew with Eastern European origins who, aside from seducing and manipulating young girls, also bullies and utilizes cynical humor like the character in van Warmerdam's film. The fact that the antihero also first targets the women and children while sneakily isolating them from the unwitting father is also a method that the Judaic cultural marxists of the Frankfurt School have used to undermine and destroy white western man via feminism, multiculturalism, so-called 'sexual liberation,' and various other slave-morality-inclined underhanded weapons based on great lies that only the figurative synagogue of satan could contrive. After all, like Borgman, world Judea tends to corrupt a society from within, infecting and subverting every imperative cultural, moral, and spiritual tradition of its host until it is only a distorted shell of what is used to be as especially reflected in the contemporary West. The fact that Borgman drugs his victims just like contemporary western school teachers and psychiatrists recommend parents do to their children if they have a hard time adjusting to the globalist anti-Occidental multiculturalist LGBT-friendly program just goes to show that van Warmerdam's work is probably the only modern filmic fable that manages to capture spiritual afflictions of our conspicuously corrupt and amazingly morally inverted contemporary zeitgeist, which absurdly values the weak over the strong and emphasizes the minority over the majority. Interestingly, the family featured in the film is not very sympathetic, thus hinting that the West is already so forsaken in its malignant moral bankruptcy that its defeat by pure evil is nothing short of inevitable. Of course, the greatest irony is that Borgman and the rest of van Warmerdam's oeuvre could have only been created in a spiritually sick and racially and culturally deracinated nation that has succumbed to the darker side, thus the Dutch auteur must feel blessed in his own warped sort of way. Despite van Warmerdam's questionable views of his own people and culture, Borgman indubitably follows in a rich Dutch artistic tradition dating back to paintings of Hieronymus Bosch and Jan Brueghel the Elder in its modernist interpretation of the Garden of Eden. Indeed, as much as van Warmerdam might resent it, he is unquestionably a product of his culture, people, and religion as is so idiosyncratically and iconoclastically expressed in Borgman, which is a work that could only have been directed by a degenerate post-WWII Germanic mensch who can only laugh at the idea of a figurative hell on earth and world in flames.

-Ty E

STAR TIME
STAR TIME

Alexander Cassini (1992)

I have no scientific way of proving it, but I am going to have to assume that aside from possibly western musicals and breakdance films, the slasher film has to be the most uniquely unsophisticated, fiercely formulaic, and prosaically primitive of the various film subgenres, so I never thought anyone would attempt to take an arthouse, experimental and/or avant-garde approach to the innately artless and absurdly asinine horror style. While Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984) does feature some Buñuel-esque dream-sequences, but that film is a rare exception and certainly a work that totally transcends the aesthetic norms and thematic conventions of the slasher subgenre, hence its much desired popularity. Recently, I discovered a far from popular flick that is superficially a slasher flick that ultimately proves that the subgenre has a lot more potential than one would suspect. Indeed, totally unknown auteur Alexander Cassini's directorial debut Star Time (1992) is a sort of darkly satirical art-(anti)slasher flick that is like a hodgepodge of David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), David Cronenberg's Videodrome (1983), and Terry Gilliam's Brazil (1985) as seen through the lens of Marshall McLuhan's media criticisms where a seemingly autistic man-child of the assumedly virginal sort takes a "tune in, turn on, and drop out" approach to serial-killing and realizes his lifelong dream of becoming an (in)famous 'TV star' as a result. Featuring arguably the most bizarrely nightmarish depiction of Hollywood since the Expressionistic horror-noir cult classic Dementia (1955) aka Daughter of Horror directed by John Parker, Cassini's film mixes elements from German Expressionism, film noir, tacky TV gameshows, and even video art in a work that ultimately attempts to juggle classic horror scares, savage satire, and aberrant art faggotry in an admittedly ambitious fashion that only semi-succeeds in its aims but certainly never fails to intrigue in its sardonic approach to slasher cinema. Notably, the genesis of Star Time was a 30-minute short that, like Lynch with Eraserhead, was produced at the American Film Institute (AFI) while Cassini was a student there, so it is only fitting the murderous antihero of the work is named 'Henry' and he is a little lonely, socially retarded, and suffers from a bit of good old-fashioned 'female trouble' of the non-menstrual oriented sort. Undoubtedly Star Time feels like the project of an enterprising novice auteur that knows a great deal about filmmaking and film history and wanted to make a work that would display his talents and personal obsessions but would also appeal to a more mainstream audience, hence its less than sincere 'exploitation' of obscenely outmoded slasher conventions. Indeed, with its almost complete and utter lack of graphic murders sequences and violence, emphasis on morality and philosophy over mindless stalking and killing scenes, and patently pathetic and autistic killer, Star Time is not exactly the sort of slasher flick that will appeal to thoroughly debased gorehounds who like to herkin the gherkin to any of the countless worthless Friday of the 13th sequels, though it might appeal to a handful of people that thought great goombah character actor Joe Spinell's performance in Maniac (1980) was something bordering on true 'performance art.' A sort of macabre slasher mutilation of Frank Capra's It's a Wonderful Life (1946) with an antihero that seems like the murderously moronic nephew of the loony lead characters of Hal Ashby's Being There (1979) and Martin Scorsese's The King of Comedy (1982), Cassini's proudly perverse parable about the perversion of the mainstream media and Hollywood is ultimately a rare horror flick that attempts to make the viewer ashamed of being a horror fan.

Henry Pinkle (Michael St. Gerard of John Waters' Hairspray (1988) and the TV series Elvis (1990)) is a superlatively socially retarded man-child with no friends or family who is morbidly depressed because his sole reason for living—the discernibly outmoded black-and-white TV sitcom The Robertson Family—has been cancelled, so he has decided to end it all by killing himself. While walking to the building he plans to jump off of in a scene seeming like a nocturnal version of the opening scene from Eraserhead in terms of its combination of awkwardness and ominousness, Henry passes large piles of debris and decaying buildings that make Hollywood seem like the world's loneliest post-industrial hellhole. While Henry is a pretty boy guido type that sort of resembles a more macho and masculine Sal Mineo, he is far from your typical charismatic wop and is most likely a virgin as hinted at by the fact that he has a blowup doll lying on his bed. Right before Henry jumps off a building and splatters his brains on the concrete, a charismatic old fart of the seemingly incessantly bullshitting Hebraic sort named Sam Bones (John P. Ryan of Larry Cohen's It's Alive (1974) and Andrey Konchalovskiy's Runaway Train (1985)) yells to him in a comforting manner, "It hurts when you're robbed...or they take away what's yours. I once thought about putting an end to it too, pal, and do you know what saved me? YOU. Yeah, you and every single human being who carries the cross of awareness in this world." Sam Bones is a show business icon who makes a living lying to people on television and, somewhat inexplicably, he wants Henry to become the latest and greatest TV star, as if an autistic man-child has what it takes to captivate mainstream America audiences (maybe he does!). Unfortunately, the catch is that Sam wants Henry to become a serial killer who wears a creepy baby doll mask and exterminates entire suburban families in their homes while they are watching TV. Indeed, Henry becomes 'The Baby Mask Killer' and he takes a more visceral approach to killing by brutally slaughtering his victims with an ax. Before Henry's first slaughter, Sam says to him, "You're not quite Rembrandt. You forgot your paint brush" and hands him his ax. While Henry gets scared the first time he attempts to kill and runs out of the victim's home like a retarded child, Sam gives him an uplifting pep talk that gives him the confidence he needs to kill without remorse.

While psychopathic Hollywood showman Sam acts as a sort of pernicious paternal figure to Henry, he also has a maternal figure in the form of a kindhearted yet semi-butch social worker named Wendy (played by Cassini's then-wife Maureen Teefy of Grease 2 (1982) and Supergirl (1984)). In fact, Henry likes Wendy so much that one of the reasons he originally intended to kill himself is because she moved away to be with a lover. Unfortunately, things did not work out with Wendy's lover and naturally she was rather perturbed when she received a 'suicide letter' in VHS form from Henry where he jovially states, "They cancelled THE ROBERTSON FAMILY, so I'm dead now, but you can see me anytime you want...on your TV." Indeed, in Henry's mind, television is more real than reality, so sending Wendy the VHS tape was a sign of his great affection towards her. Henry also has a strange frog fetish that he acquired as a result of Wendy once giving him a toy frog. In a scene in the spirit of Swiss artist Henry Fuseli's classic painting The Nightmare (1781) of an incubus hovering over a beautiful sleeping woman, Henry sits perched on a desk while staring down at Wendy while she sleeps naked in her bed. Like a good percentage of the scenes in Star Time, the viewer does not know if Wendy is merely having a bad dream or if she has become a passive victim to Henry's ominous unhinged reality.

STAR TIME

Aside from Sam and Wendy, Henry has a third individual in his life, though it is not a real living and breathing person, but a pitch black room full of a couple dozen televisions with a sexy female voice that could be the little slutty sister of sentient computer Hal of Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968). Since the TV screens feature footage of tender tits, delectable derrieres, and faceless women fingering their furry main veins, Henry is totally entranced by the television room which also successfully attempts to seduce the protagonist by salaciously stating, "It's safe to want me, Henry. I don't have any diseases...and I won't break your heart ever again. I can see into your heart, Henry, and I can see that you need so much, so much. You need what only I can give you. I want you inside me, Henry, I want to feel you as a part of me. I'm so hungry for what you can give." When Henry makes a pathetic attempt at touching one of the televised titties, the unclad chicks disappear off all of the screens and are replaced with TV noise and the room demands that the hopelessly horny antihero "earn the right" to defile the screen. Naturally, Henry agrees to do whatever the TV room wants him to do and soon blood, gore, and serial killers appear on the television screens. Of course, all the classic killers appear on the TVs, including Charles Manson, James Dean wannabe Charles Starkweather (himself a victim of Hollywoodization), Nguyễn Ngọc Loan, and various others. As the room tells Henry regarding Manson & Company, "These children of mine are your ancestors. They will show you the way." Of course, Henry has no problem following in the footsteps of his fatally dangerous forebearers, but problems arise when Wendy reluctantly comes back into the antihero's life and Sam is not happy with it. Needless to say, Star Time concludes on a down note in a work that, quite unlike your typical bullshit Hollywood celluloid bile, demonstrates that losers never become winners in real-life and that not all 'underdogs' are good guys.

For better or worse, Star Time is an unequivocal downer featuring a totally tragic antihero who meets a particularly pathetic but much needed end in a work that will ultimately dishearten and deject most viewers due to its patent cultural pessimism, demystification of Hollywood glamor, and sardonic mockery of mainstream America's fucked fetish for all-things true crime. Indeed, no one can finish Cassini's decidedly dark and intentionally debasing directorial debut without feeling ridden with pangs of guilt and abject disgust, thus making for an innately anti-Hollywood work that most Americans will hate right from the start. Clearly director Cassini was attempting to go for some sort of mainstream accessibility, no matter how slight, when he made the film, which is somewhat disappointing as he might as well have gone all the way in terms of aesthetic iconoclasm as there is no way in hell the flick would have ever gained any sort of serious following, let alone commercial success, as it is just too plain dark and depressing for the masses who watch movies purely as a cheap form of escapism from their largely miserable lives (but of course, that is one of the many pathetic points that the film makes). Aside from directing a couple episodes for TV shows like Law & Order: Special Victims Unit and Deadline, Cassini has only directed one other film and it is not exactly as ambitious or as intriguing as his rather worthwhile debut. Somewhat curiously, Cassini's second feature, the USA-Romanian coproduction The Incredible Genie (1999), is a cheap and tacky family film that the director probably made with his child with actress Maureen Teefy in mind. Despite being a failure commercially that has yet to even get a DVD release (though a long out-of-print VHS tape exists), Star Time got mostly favorable reviews upon its release, with relatively respectable critic Jonathan Rosenbaum (co-author of the classic text Midnight Movies) describing it as "An exceedingly odd first feature" that "Played half as arty allegory, half as satiric comedy, and generally as some species of midnight madness, this gaga independent item is most daring in refusing to focus on the violence that's its subject, while getting us to think plenty about what it means. Recommended."

Notably, Star Time features strangely hypnotic chiaroscuro style scenes featuring a wall of TVs playing mostly pornographic imagery that bear a strikingly resemblance to South African auteur Aryan Kaganof's early Dutch era 'pornology' short The Solipsist (1991). Whether Cassini saw Kaganof's film or not is rather questionable, but the similarities between both films is quite striking and undeniable. Of course, Cassini's film also features some aesthetic similarities with works associated with the Cinema of Transgression, especially the collaborations of Scott B and Beth B (Black Box, Vortex). In its incendiary and iconoclastic in-your-face approach to criticizing television and its singular lobotomizing power, Cassini's film is also comparable to Beth B's first solo feature Salvation!: Have You Said Your Prayers Today? (1987), though I would have to acknowledge that Cassini's flick is indubitably more successful on both an aesthetic and satirical level, as Star Time is certainly nowhere as convoluted. In fact, the biggest flaw of Cassini's film is that it is not long enough and could have certainly benefited from even more intricate themes and esoteric imagery. Of course, the film's lack of details regarding the antihero's particular upbringing and parents ultimately makes Star Time a work where the viewer's imagination is able to run wild, which is certainly a rarity in the horror (and especially the slasher) realm. At the very least, Cassini revealed with his directorial debut that he could have evolved into a formidable auteur filmmaker with a distinct and potent vision, but instead his career just seemed to wither away before it even really ignited, which is sad but assuredly not surprising considering no one gets paid to be a serious auteur in Tinseltown. I certainly would not be surprised if the creators of The Cable Guy (1996) starring Jim Carrey saw Cassini's film and felt it would be a fairly safe work to steal ideas from. Ultimately, Star Time belongs in the same virtually nonexistent category as Elly Kenner and Norman Thaddeus Vane's The Black Room (1983) as an oh-so rare and unbelievable avant-garde-slasher that probably should not exist but somehow thankfully does.

STAR TIME

-Ty E

ARSENAL

Alexander Dovzhenko (1928)

Alexander Dovzhenko's Arsenal (1928) is a Bolshevik hate filled propaganda masterpiece. It's presentation of German Kaiser soldiers as laughing toothless maniacs shows the real "equality" banker Jacob Schiff paid for. New York City banker Jacob Schiff gave Leon Trotsky 20 Million dollars to run the 1917 red revolution. This "revolution" killed around 10 million people alone. The Bolsheviks committed many mass murders for decades and decades more.

Arsenal is set during the Ukrainian Civil War (based on an actual incident from 1918). This is quite ironic considering Holodomor (Ukrainian Famine of 1932-1933) occurred a couple years after the film's release. Holodomor resulted in the intentional (man made famine) starvation of between 7-10 million Ukrainian Kulaks. The war criminal Soviet leaders benefited greatly from the famine. It eliminated the cultural elite of the Ukraine thus resulting in forced collectivism. Communists hated national self-determination because it went against their goal of "international revolution." Insane mind controlling editing and lack of plot make Arsenal the ultimate nightmare. After watching it, I would have let the Bolsheviks kill me. The early Soviet directors had a very odd take on film theory and its psychological effects on viewers. It is obvious that they wanted the proletariat ignorant and impulsive when defending collective enterprise. Compared to other early Soviet propaganda, Arsenal is fairly tame in its propaganda. Soviet montage madman Sergei Eisenstein's film Bezhin Meadow portrayed Christian kulaks as hideous and homicidal son killers. Of course, Bezhin Meadow neglects to let the viewer know that the Soviets intentionally starved to death between 7-10 million of those evil kulaks. Arsenal is an oddly political and surreal look into the past. Knowing the history surrounding the film only makes it more interesting. I felt sick and lied to after viewing Arsenal. Piles of starved skeleton corpses perfectly compliment it.

-Ty E

Watch Arsenal

YESTERDAY GIRL
YESTERDAY GIRL

Alexander Kluge (1966)

Without question, there is no great metaphor for German New Cinema 'father figure' Alexander Kluge's filmmaking career as a cultural cuckold, shabbos goy, and pedantic ethno-masochistic lunatic other than the fact he decided to cast own Aryan sister, Alexandra Kluge, in the role of a down-and-out Jewish daughter of holocaust survivors for his first feature-length film Yesterday Girl (1966) aka Abschied von gestern - (Anita G.), a patently plodding 'modernist' celluloid work that is just as much inspired by French New Wave auteur filmmakers like Jean-Luc Godard as it is by the static Theatrical Marxism of Brecht and cultural Marxism of the Hebraic kraut-hammering Frankfurt School. Directed by a fiercely philo-Semitic far-left lawyer turned filmmaker who once proudly and pretentiously proclaimed, "I don't know what an artist is. I'd say, my roots are in Hebrew theology; in the Critical Theory of Horkheimer, Adorno, Oscar Negt; in Walter Benjamin," Yesterday Girl is a cinematic work that is so superlatively soulless in terms of its pedantic politics and shockingly static aesthetics that it acts as a potent reminder of how German cinema has degenerated since the days of F.W. Murnau, Leni Riefenstahl, and even Veit Harlan. Clearly taking his buddy Adorno's infamously idiotic words of Hebrew hostility, "Writing poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric," to heart, Yesterday Girl is about as poetic as a cattle prod to the prick and as aesthetically audacious as the syphilis-ridden brain of a purged Bolshevik revolutionary's corpse. Essentially the German New Cinema equivalent of Godard's obscenely overrated first feature Breathless (1960) aka À bout de souffle—the supposed French New Wave classic where the director proved that even Marxist morons can love capitalist Hollywood and stupid Americans as demonstrated by the film's counterfeit frog Humphrey Bogart-wannabe—Yesterday Girl is the sort of innately insipid and ultimately pointless pseudo-iconoclastic work that gives arthouse cinema a bad name due to its putrid and pansy political posturing and patently prosaic aesthetics, and overall brazenly banal story. The hopelessly mundane and meandering celluloid non-story of a young and rather annoying East German Jewess with large Anna Karina-like eyes, Yesterday Girl is not only an inane indictment of West German capitalism and democracy, but an assault on 'bourgeois' Teutonic society in general that, more than anything else, accuses the German system and populous of harboring 'everyday fascism'.

As explained by a judge during a court case regarding her supposed theft of a cardigan sweater and some other items from a coworker's locker, "Anita G., born April 2, 1937, unemployed, no fixed abode, single, with no prior convictions, appears before the Braunschweig Court as she is duly suspected of having had the intention to take and carry away movable property." During the trial, Anita also uses the race card, though she denies it is her intent, by bringing up the fact her kosher parents' factory was taken away from them by the naughty Nazis and the trauma of said events inevitably led her to leave East Germany to seek her (un)fortune in West Germany, but the rather physically grotesque kraut swine judge has no sympathy for the children of holocaust survivors, so her Jewishness does not save her as one might expect it to in the real world. Ditzzy and compulsively 'cute,' Anita is certainly not someone you would peg as a kleptomaniac Jewess, but then again the celluloid realm of attorney at law turned auteur Alexander Kluge has always been more of a place of sterile ideas and theories and intentionally lackluster direction as opposed to aesthetically pleasing magic and true (as opposed to imaginary Marxist) social realism. The story of Yesterday Girl is fairly simple and especially anticlimactic as it basically depicts the failure of a commie-trained kosher chick to integrate herself into society and find a decent boyfriend/job, so she goes from job to job and boyfriend to boyfriend, until she eventually gets arrested for theft (of course, probably in Kluge's mind "property is theft" or something like that), thus demonstrating the supposedly brutal authoritarianism of capitalist krautland. At her first apartment in West Germany, Anita is kicked out for failing to pay the rent on time, thus beginning a series of temporary stays at various motels and apartments as she is a born screw up, though, of course, director Alexander Kluge clearly expects the viewer to believe capitalism, latent fascism, and anti-Semitism are to blame for the little lass' failures. Undoubtedly, Kluge also reveals that Anita is Jewish, despite her appearance to the contrary, to demonstrate that were she not both a direct and indirect victim of the holocaust, she probably would not be a petty criminal or something along those lines and that her criminality is even justified considering her special Semitic situation. Of course, all the crypto-anti-Semites in the film give her no breaks. Dealing with everything from a brief stint with pussy-peddling to a bastard boyfriend that gives her the gift of bruises, Anita is certainly used and is abused, but because of Kluge's pedantic and sterile direction and the director's sister's lack of acting talent, it is all but impossible to empathize with the tragic girl and her terribly trying situation. Concluding with the inter-title, "We are all to blame for everything, but if everyone knew it, we would have paradise on earth," one wonders if Alexander Kluge is one of the most, if not the most, whiniest and self-righteous filmmaker who has ever lived. Naturally, I blame Kluge for making an empty film for empty people.

Judging by Yesterday Girl and Part-Time Work of a Domestic Slave (1973) aka Gelegenheitsarbeit einer Sklavin, which also stars the director's sister Alexandra Kluge, one must question auteur Alexander Kluge's dubious quasi-incestuous direction of his sis, but if one thing is for sure—sister lover or not—he is a filmmaker with a special knack for making the most clinically assembled celluloid works ever, as if he were a cultural mortician and Aryan Uncle Tom hired by his Hebraic homeboys at the Frankfurt School to deconstruct and ultimately destroy Germany's deep and singular legacy of romanticism and historical myths.

YESTERDAY GIRL

Incidentally, Kluge, who once served as a shabbos goy legal counsel for the Frankfurt School, was encouraged by Theodor W. Adorno—the Guido-Hebrew cultural Marxist messiah who spent a good percentage of his time criticizing German/European kultur with his ‘Critical theory’ and trashing the German people for the holocaust (hence his dickheaded 1949 dictum “To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric”)—to become a filmmaker in the first place, thus knowing that the lawyer-turned-auteur would never become the next Veit Harlan, but a sort of intellectually masturbating, anti-aestheticist who would degrade Teutonic culture and cinema for the greater good of the chosen amongst god’s chosen. One of 26 signers of the Oberhausen Manifesto of 1962, Kluge undeniably helped launch German New Cinema, but as the naked melodramas of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, darkly romantic adventurist works of Werner Herzog, and the anti-leftist Wagnerian works of Hans-Jürgen Syberberg demonstrate, the kraut new wave thrived in spite of Kluge and not because of him. Despite Kluge’s cultural Marxist filmmaking career and supposed support of fellow directors of German New Cinema, Czech animator/auteur Vlado Krištl, who won the main prize at the Oberhausen International Short Film Festival for his work Don Kihot (1961), once revealed the Yesterday Girl director was not a Marxist who practiced what he preached, stating, “Even though they claimed to be socialists, Kluge and a few others were almost careless in the way they showed their true face.” Indeed, as a proud anti-Marxist/anti-leftist myself, I have no problem admitting some of my favorite filmmakers, including Pier Paolo Pasolini, were card-carrying commies, yet Kluge’s films are as materialistic, mundane, soulless, and—most importantly—culturally corrosive as his political beliefs. With a pointless dream-sequence involving SA Nazi stormtroopers and American GIs chasing Anita and then Anita subsequently stomping on a good Christian woman’s hand (with gorehound-esque blood spattering and all!) being the most enthralling aspect of Yesterday Girl, it is probably safe to say that Alexander Kluge is one of the most aesthetically inartistic, unappealing and autistic filmmakers to have ever lived, hence why very few people watch his films today, yet names like Herzog, Fassbinder, and Wenders will be remembered forever.

-Ty E

STRONGMAN FERDINAND

Alexander Kluge (1976)

Out of all the filmmakers associated with German New Cinema, the movement's 'father figure' Alexander Kluge (Yesterday Girl, Mensch 2.0) was probably the one who spent the most time chilling in an ivory tower of his arcane neo-Marxist imagination, yet the auteur somehow absurdly thought he was some sort of champion of the proletariat and voice of the Teutonic collective, even once stating in 1980 regarding his enemies and his hopes for the future of German cinema: "...we still have three enemies: the American companies, the bureaucracies—our sacrosanct national bureaucracy—and finally the individualism of the filmmakers. These filmmakers present themselves as auteurs, and their subjectivity becomes the primary point, which in fact this subjectivity is always less than the cinema itself. The cinema is its spectators, the collective imaginary. From now on, it will be necessary to move ahead to a new stage and to make not personal films but collective films. . . . One should make collective films that bear on daily life. Such a cinema could ultimately be the cinema of spectators which is my goal." Of course, as the son of a bourgeois doctor and quasi-neo-Marxist intellectual who worked as a lawyer for the Frankfurt School and who was influenced to become a filmmaker by his kosher communist comrade Theodor W. Adorno, Kluge did not exactly come from the sort of background where he could relate to the common working-class kraut, hence why, unlike Fassbinder's works, virtually none of his films have become classics among the general German populous. With his 'offbeat' anti-fascist comedy Strongman Ferdinand (1976) aka Der starke Ferdinand—a satire inspired by the near civil war that occurred in West Germany during the 1970s as a result of far-left terrorists like the Red Army Faction about a tragicomic buffoonish cop turned security chief who provides security for a private company in an ostensibly 'fascistic fashion' and ultimately ironically becomes a terrorist in the end to prove the ineffectiveness of contemporary law and order in the socio-politically chaotic Fatherland—Kluge tried extra hard to make a highly accessible film that would be a mainstream hit and even went so far as to go back and reedit the film to make it even more palatable to less sophisticated prole viewers, yet the film was still a failure in the end, thus demonstrating how out of touch the auteur was with the general public, especially the bread-and-circus-loving working-class. While Kluge probably hoped the film would be the German New Cinema's answer to Charlie Chaplin's Modern Times (1936), Strongman Ferdinand is only vaguely less hyper-intellectualized than the director's previous cinematic offerings, as a work that may lack the Eisenstein-esque montages that the filmmaker is particularly fond of yet wallows in banal Brechtian audience-alienating distancing techniques and horribly dry humor that would probably only appeal to a handful of old school German far-leftist academic types from the late-1960s. Starring the rather Jewish-looking German character actor Heinz Schubert, who apparently used to collaborate with Bertolt Brecht before the building of the Berlin Wall and would go on to play both Uncle Adolf and Heinrich Himmler in Syberberg's magnum opus Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977), Strongman Ferdinand is indeed Kluge's most accessible and formulaic work to date, yet it features an antihero that is so less than empathetic and a storyline that is so severely stale and conspicuous that the film might as well have been directed by a humorless Leninist robot.

STRONGMAN FERDINAND

After a cop comrade and a criminal are killed during a terrorist break-in, tiny 50-year-old strongman Ferdinand Rieche (Heinz Schubert) decides to quit being a cop because, as he tells his commander, he is fed up with the police department's, "bloody tactics [...] Just to satisfy the press and the courts," and due to the fact that the bureaucratic legal system's, "ridiculous regulations make criminal prosecution impossible" for him. When hanging out with his morbidly obese sergeant friend Kniebeling (Joachim Hackethal), Rieche demonstrates he is a 'corrupt' cop in the spirit of William Friedkin's The French Connection (1971) by breaking into an apartment without a warrant. Rieche may be an unwittingly goofy little mensch, but he is not a complete idiot and regularly visits communist book stores, as he has a keenness for not only voraciously reading works on security and policing theories, but also studying his enemy, whose attacks he eagerly awaits. As narrated in a typically goofy fashion by director Alexander Kluge, Rieche "knows all there is to know, and can't comprehend that others don't." Indeed, Rieche takes his job very seriously and can only see the world through the lens of a security-obsessed policeman. Even in terms of his own personal life, Rieche divides everything into five "Security Zones," which include: "Zone 1: Rieche himself, Zone 2: His flat, Zone 3: His job, Zone 4: Police work in its entirety, Zone 5: everything in its entirety." After the previous security chief, Berthold, is fired from a private chemical company for causing a scandal (a big "no, no" when it comes to these companies), Rieche replaces him and within 48 hours the ex-cop already has the entire factory building under check. Unlike the previous security chief, Rieche forces his underlings to learn security theory because, as he states, "As working security men, you can't use your hands; you have to use your head." Of course, Rieche has no problem breaking the rules when necessary, as demonstrated by the fact he forces a girl at the factory to submit to a urine test under false pretenses, so he can turn said urine in for a physical examination that is required by the Brussels-based parent company that owns his employer, so as to prove he is healthy. In what is easily one of the more humorous scenes of the film, Rieche is told by the doctor upon receiving the results of his urinalysis that, "If you weren't a man, I'd say you were 3 months pregnant."

Undoubtedly, one of the more dubious things that Rieche does during his employment is that he more or less coerces a young blonde babe named Gertie

Kahlmann (Véronice Rudolph) into becoming his live-in lover/girlfriend after he catches her routinely stealing food from the company. Indeed, while Rieche complains to Gertie that she “exploits positions of trust,” he does the same by not only blackmailing the young country girl, who says she’d rather commit suicide than have to go back to the hinterland after losing her job, but also by not reporting to his employer that his girlfriend is a morally retarded kleptomaniac. As Kluge narrates: “Rieche ponders the question with hindsight: How do you reconcile a thieving girlfriend with security?” While dating Gertie, Rieche learns that many of the people that work at his company find him so repugnant that they would not even dare be seen drinking beer with him in public. Ultimately, Rieche proves to be a somewhat loving and supportive, if not authoritarian, boyfriend, as he buys Gertie a taxi so she can start a new business, but inevitably his controlling behavior eventually pushes her away. As Kluge explains, “Rieche is fenced in by the law. Rieche needs a crisis. If nothing happens, he lies dormant,” but luckily some terrorist strikes and blows up part of the factory, so the security chief assembles the most elite security team in all of West Germany. Just for practice, Rieche has his loyal team strike a rival company where they successfully remove 26 crates of electronics and store them in the woods. The more Rieche becomes obsessed with security, the more paranoid he gets. After receiving a box of chocolates from his boss, Rieche decides to have them tested in a laboratory, so as to confirm they are not laced with poison. To test his security team’s effectiveness, the Strongman puts a pair of pantyhose over his head and attacks his own factory, ultimately allowing himself to be captured in the end. Indeed, while Rieche would have probably made for a marvelous National Socialist, American-style capitalism ultimately proves to deter the Strongman’s advancements in security. As one of the heads at Rieche’s company notes, it would be cheaper to simply buy insurance for the factory than to employ a security chief and entire security team.

When Rieche provides security for his boss Ganter (Heinz Schimmelpfennig) at an opera performance of Puccini, he becomes so paranoid and agitated during a scene in the performance of Tosca killing Scarpia that he whips out his pistol and prepares to fire at an imaginary adversary. Rieche also learns while at the opera from Ganter that the company is not happy with his work and that he might be fired after his six month trial at the company is over with unless he learns “to do more” but “not to do too much.” It seems the big wigs at the company are somewhat disturbed by Rieche’s fanatical security methods and see him as a liability, not to mention a potential source for bad press. Meanwhile, Rieche begins to describe certain fish in his own personal fish tank as enemies, absurdly (but hilariously) stating regarding some of his gill-bearing pets: “The little one: The communist party, The black one: An Arab, The dotted one: All Eastern spies together.” When Rieche becomes suspicious of a young female scientist working at his company who he believes is trading scientific information to enemies, he manhandles her, takes her hostage, and locks her in a room at the factory. When Rieche's cop friend Kniebeling accuses him of having the young female scientist imprisoned somewhere, the security chief decides to let her go, though he refuses to confess to any wrongdoing. When Rieche begins stalking his scheming corporate whore boss Wilutzki (Gert Günther Hoffmann), who is the vice president of the entire company, he learns that his boss is attempting a merger with another company, so he has him kidnapped and imprisoned against his own will. Rieche attempts to tell Ganter about Wilutzki's underhanded tactics, but the boss seems unimpressed and confesses that he knows little of multinational business transactions. Of course, the merger goes through and Rieche not only loses his job (which is given to his friend turned enemy Kniebeling), but his girlfriend as well, who dumps him after he screams at her like a maniac for selling some of his old personal belongings. After writing Gertrude a letter with the pathetically poetic remark, "I drag my soul behind me like a big St. Bernard dog," Rieche attempts to assassinate a politician, who he ultimately hits in the cheek but does not kill. When asked about his motives by a journalist after being detained by the police, Rieche states, "Security-political. To show that an assassin could get to the minister despite all security, and, if we were allowed to lead the opposing side, that we would be able to do it. This proves the need for our services. I'm really sorry I hit the minister in the cheek. I was aiming for the wall behind the minister." Ironically, while Rieche believes, "Radical security has nothing to do with radicalism," he ultimately proves that he is not much different than his commie terrorist enemies. In the end, Rieche reveals that he is a nihilist by remarking regarding his deleterious actions, "I shot him in the cheek because there is no real meaning to our life. For this reason, you can't always shoot straight."

STRONGMAN FERDINAND

While auteur Alexander Kluge probably hoped to hit two birds (fascism and capitalism) with one filmic stone with Strongman Ferdinand, the film is ultimately a convoluted cinematic mess that, like many of the director's more intricate works, attempts to say and do so many things at once, but fails on most accounts, especially in terms of satire, though the work does have its occasional moments of tragicomic charm. Indeed, compared to Fassbinder's similarly themed work Die dritte Generation (1979) aka The Third Generation, which also depicts both the police and terrorists as unwitting pawns of big corporations who only strengthen capitalist tyranny, Kluge's work seems like a hopelessly restrained and patently pedantic exercise in left-wing bourgeois banality that ultimately makes the director seem more paranoid than the crazed antihero of his film. Indeed, only a left-wing academic could believe that a working-class security chief spends his free time voraciously reading communist texts and planning mock terrorist attacks. In one especially awkward and ultimately pointless scene in the film, the eponymous protagonist's fat ass friend Kniebeling remarks while flipping through communist books, "nothing but Bolshevik propaganda" and then changes the subject by nostalgically stating, "We just celebrated the 37th anniversary of our Fuehrer's 50th birthday," to which Kluge directly responds to the character off-screen (!) by stating, "That's rubbish, too." Interestingly, Austrian actor/auteur Paulus Manker (Weininger's Last Night, The Moor's Head), who starred in Kluge's flick Die Macht der Gefühle (1983) aka The Power of Emotion, also directed an underrated little film entitled Schmutz (1987) aka Dirt about a mentally unhinged security man, but it takes a totally different approach from Strongman Ferdinand by utilizing a sort of visceral metaphysical horror that manages to express so much more with visceral feeling, post-industrial landscapes, and quasi-expressionistic aesthetics than the other film ever could. While Kluge once stated, "cinema has one possibility other arts don't have. Because it's rather trivial and derives from the fairground . . . it hasn't been developed from the viewpoint of a small, educated society; it's made for the plebeian people, for the proletarian component," Strongman Ferdinand ultimately demonstrates that the auteur has nil understanding of the "plebeian people." Indeed, maybe it is because I am a bit prejudiced but working as an attorney for the Frankfurt School seems like probably the worst training someone can get for being a filmmaker, especially when it comes to making films that are meant to appeal to plebs. While I would not exactly call myself a Kluge fan, I have to say that the director's more arcane and impenetrable works like The Power of Emotion and Die Patriotin (1979) aka The Patriot are infinitely more interesting, provocative, and artistically genuine than Strongman Ferdinand, which, aside from being a mostly prosaic piece of hopelessly sterile satire, ultimately patronizes the very people it was made for, the Lumpenproletariat. Indeed, the proles want their bread and circus and the only thing Kluge could offer them was boredom and contempt of the anti-action-packed sort, with Strongman Ferdinand ultimately being a sort of contra work to the working-class blockbuster favorite Die Hard (1988).

-Ty E

BURIAL GROUND
BURIAL GROUND

Alexander Shevchenko (2007)

Before you begin getting all excited that i am talking about the Italian zombie film, let me tell you this is not the same film. Alexander Shevchenko (Nails and Visions of Suffering) has had an illustrious acting career already and has worked on music and digital effects for most of Andrey Iskanov's filmography. His short "Burial Ground" is without a doubt in my mind, the most horrifying 7 minutes i have ever spent in my life. Not only did this short alarm me with it's gratuitous static and radiation noises, but it made me fear things that cannot be explained. I will not bother to explain the plot for then the effect will be gone. Your best bet is to watch this on your own, without hearing anything about it. This film and another of his shorts "HOMUNCULUS" will be on The Tourist DVD, and believe me, it is worth the wait. Burial Ground features some of the most bleak, aesthetic shots i have witnessed, and the sound effects of the wind, radiation meter, distorted breathing and noises make for a terrifying treat. Not only has Alex proved his acting worth by playing a trepanning hitman, but he has also proved that he has what it takes to be a visual idealist in the world of horror. I applaud this short for scaring me shitless. Bravo. Burial Ground is a visual dystopian poem.

-Maq

PIRANHA 3D

Alexandre Aja* (2010)

I watch horror films for two reasons, both harkening back to childhood. One reason is to get in touch with the primal, sleepless night-inducing fear of, say, watching The Texas Chainsaw Massacre for the first time (the day before Halloween, 1995, aired on a local television station. Being nine and naïve the opening ‘based on a true story’ crawl narrated by John Laquett had me convinced I wasn’t watching a ‘scary movie’ but true crime along the lines of Helter Skelter. By the end of the scene where they pick up the hitchhiker I was nearly in tears). On the other hand, there is the “Do you like see-food?” appeal of films that, while not particularly scary, appeal to the twelve year old in all of us who lived for nothing more than throwing bricks at the dead cat behind the cafeteria dumpster after school to see if we could dislodge some maggots before skulking over to a friend’s house to thumb through his older brother’s worn copies of Hustler. Flicks that are big, dumb, gross, and awkward as we were when stuck in the painful expanse between our childhood perception of what constitutes cool (roadkill, fighting robots, armpit farts) and our young adult perception of what constitutes cool (girls) and all that entails (mostly masturbation, humiliation, and acne scars). Flicks that one must put away with the childish things if one ever wants to know the love of a woman (Corinthians 13, I think), but can indulge in every once in awhile to satisfy the adolescent weirdo with the peach fuzz ‘stache that resides at the base of our brain.

Of course, you can always indulge and wear Fulci Lives shirts and argue on message boards about how the laserdisc of a Blind Dead movie omits a second-and-a-half transitional scene and blare Cannibal Corpse on your way to your graveyard shift retail job, but this will ensure that in the odd event your penis ever lands in a vagina and you aren’t paying for it that said vagina will belong to a woman that outweighs you considerably and is every bit the nerd you are and you’ll despise her for it and feel like you’re slumming and she’ll feel the exact same about you but you’ll stay together because no one else could possibly be interested in fucking either of you because you prattle on for hours like a couple of fucking Aspies about meathooks going through breasts and Goblin soundtracks but never bother to expand the scope of your interests beyond something someone that rides a bike with a baseball card in the fucking spokes would think is “pretty siiick.” A more successful approach? Watch movies with substance, subtitles, and/or subtlety. Watch stuff that you could imagine girls you’ve always wanted to cum in might enjoy or at the very least tolerate, but which won’t make their vagina’s arid at the mere mention of. Respect cinema as an art form and appreciate the nuances of a particular director or camera movement or something, anything beyond “dude, he removes their kneecaps and then sews her mouth to the one girl’s butt and then that girl’s mouth to the guy’s butt and...” I guess what I’m trying to say is it is more than okay to like something puerile and disgusting, but don’t let that be the sum of your interest in movies because (a) you aren’t twelve years old and (b) being a movie nerd, or nerd of any kind really, stacks the odds pretty high against you in terms of getting laid by anything remotely human in appearance, but being a nerd whose development peaked at twelve years old, i.e. horror geek, comic book guy, etc, you are pretty much guaranteeing yourself a life of quiet desolation, disappointment, and actually attending conventions and shit. Grow the fuck up. It is okay to like comic books or horror movies, but if you are 35-going-on-12, no one wants to fuck you. Did girls want to fuck you when you were twelve? Of course not, and they certainly won’t want to now that you wear a hockey jersey as “going out” wear and use a goatee to disguise how fat you’ve gotten since you dropped out of community college eight years ago. The only people that want to fuck twelve year old boys are creepy old men, and even they don’t want to fuck you because while you are emotionally stunted at an age when things made sense and you didn’t have to slave away all night cleaning chili dispensers and selling smokes to tweakers to afford your Fangoria subscription you don’t possess an untapped butthole and pimples and puppy tails or whatever the fuck it is pedophiles are into because you are an adult man, you fucking fuck. I don’t know who to pity more, the washed up “horror icons” who have to stand arm in arm with you for a photo op at the convention center or you for having to part with twenty-five bucks for such a unique privilege. Ultimately I pity your parents, anything with self-esteem low enough to allow you to wiggle around your puny pecker inside of it, society as a whole, but mostly yours truly for having had to endure so many terrible conversations with so many of you fucking losers over the years.

PIRANHA 3D

Okay, so perhaps this (maybe) misguided rant is the result of my (definitely) misguided attempt to discuss movies with a guy at work wearing a Friday the 13th shirt whose eyes glossed over whenever I’d mention a movie that didn’t feature disembowelings and grotesquely augmented breasts, the guy who thinks Argento is a hack because Fulci “brought it” in terms of gore and who looked completely dumbfounded when I mentioned anything remotely outside that of which could constitute Necro lyrics. We did, however, find some brief common ground in my most recent adventure to the multiplex, Piranha 3D. My friend had just been fired from her job under the worst possible circumstances. Said friend needed some cheering up, and nothing cheers one up better, if you ask me, than putting adult notions of good taste and responsibility to the side and enjoying some disembowelings and grotesquely augmented breasts for about an hour and a half, even better if it’s in 3D. Of course, like Lifetime movies or greasy post-hangover grub, this is the kind of empty calorie awesomeness that is best enjoyed sparingly, but taken in the right frame of mind (drunk, high) really hits the spot.

Piranha 3D, like the Joe Dante flick on which it is based, is essentially Jaws

helmed by someone who doesn't want to fuck twelve year old boys (or be Peter Pan or whatever the fuck Spielberg's deal is) but rather by someone who understands what twelve year old boys want to see, in this case Alexandre Aja (director of the overrated Haute Tension and The Hills Have Eyes, maybe the gold standard against which all other horror remakes should be measured). As was the case with The Hills Have Eyes, Aja recognizes what worked in the original film but is able to improve on it both stylistically and in terms of gore. With The Hills Have Eyes, Aja was able to translate the Vietnam-era anger of Craven's first films into a political parable that was less preachy than just really lean, mean, and jarringly brutal. With Piranha 3D, Aja knows as well as you and I do that there is nothing intelligent to mine from a flick that existed solely to improve on Jaws by way of blood and titties, so he goes the exact opposite route of Hills and injects Piranha 3D's scant running time with wall-to-wall ass, titties, gore, moronic humor, and a couple of great cameos, all of this again, in three glorious dimensions. Steve McQueen's grandson is the Pixies-shirt clad good guy, who blah blah likes this girl yadda yadda his mom is the sheriff and an earthquake dislodges prehistoric cannibalistic demon fish from an underwater lake just in time for Spring Break and Jerry O'Connell plays a thinly veiled Joe Francis of Girls Gone Wild infamy (here called, if I remember correctly, Wild Wild Girls) so Steve McQueen's grandson gets on board with the girl he likes as a tour guide and the fish eat everyone you'd expect them to eat and a "twist" ending sets it up for a sequel but don't stick around for the end credits because all that happens is a skull floats by so fuck that.

There are two things I really took away from Piranha 3D, or rather, two things I still remember about it (aside from that we had a great time and laughed and guffawed and made "bo-o-o-i-i-ing" sound effects to represent our boners throughout). One is the genius of casting Jerry O'Connell as Joe Francis. Spoilers abound, but when O'Connell's coked out, obnoxious character bites the dust, we are treated to the spectacular sight of his severed penis floating past our face, being swallowed by a piranha, and then coughed out over our heads before being bitten in half. As the fat kid from Stand By Me and Joe Francis should be at the top of anyone's list of people who should never be allowed to procreate, this is crowd-pleasing at its finest, plus it is refreshing to know that we live in an age where hundreds upon thousands of dollars will be spent to realistically thrust severed cocks in the faces of moviegoers. The other thing I can recall about this movie was the big climactic massacre scene where Spring Break is interrupted by bloodthirsty piranhas but because the 3D process kinda makes a lot of the underwater stuff a bit murky, the best deaths are caused by humor error, including one death-by-hair-caught-in-boat-motor that is so great it belongs in a hastily-edited, grindcore-scored Youtube video along with clips from Dead Alive and Guinea Pig films or something. I'm sure the guy from my work is hard-at-work compiling it as you read this. Did I mention that he declared this the best film he'd seen all year? Like, really? I mean, it was fun. The nude underwater ballet scene where two chicks with tits bigger than, well, the guy from my work's tits, is pretty amazing, and the Spring Break massacre, O'Connell cock- it all added up to a very satisfying, imminently forgettable timewaster. It will satiate your inner-adolescent appetite for mayhem and female nudity (also 3D vomit), but it isn't something you'll ever really consider watching more than once, or sober, or at home even (at least I wouldn't - if Jerry O'Connell's meat isn't plastered to your forehead, it really isn't the optimal Piranha 3D experience).

PIRANHA 3D

That said, Aja continues to be a capable director, my friend seemed sufficiently cheered, and the lack of anything substantive to say about the flick itself has allowed me to tackle one of my least favorite archetypes at length, so if it is still in theaters, check it out, and if the DVD comes with little 3D glasses or something check it out or if you find a torrent and can skip to the above mentioned scenes, by all means, but don't buy it or think it is some kind of masterpiece or invite an attractive co-worker to dinner and breathlessly recount your favorite parts of the movie with your fucking mouth open (see? food! haha) while she recoils in (actual) horror and wishes someone, anyone would text her so she can make an excuse to get away from you but you're so convinced you're getting laid tonight that you are already plotting how to get through the hallway and past mom and dad's room without waking them and are forming a mental picture of a post-coital snuggle sesh in which she's wearing your favorite death metal shirt watching Nekromantik but really this will be like every other night of your life since you were a pre-teen and you'll masturbate furiously, cluelessly into a tube-sock and feel curiously empty and fill the void by clicking Buy It Now and now you've gotta make room on your wall for another autographed Bruce Campbell poster - fuck.

-Jon-Christian

IN THE SOUP

Alexandre Rockwell (1992)

In the Soup is one of the greatest American comedies in the past 20 years. It also won the Sundance Grand Jury Prize: Dramatic in 1992 (does this even matter?). Steve Buscemi stars as Adolfo Rollo, a loser trying to make a pretentious art film. He puts an ad out looking to sell his 500 page film script and a crazy Jewish gangster by the name of Joe responds. Joe brings Adolfo on a ride of thievery and crime. Joe is a sociopath out to make tons of money at the expense of Adolfo's weak personality (to raise for the film?). Joe is charismatic, cunning, and conspiratorial. He would probably even be good friends with Meyer Lansky. Adolfo makes for an easy target with his lack of assertiveness and confidence. Adolfo helps bring out the "man" in Joe to some extent. My only complaint with In the Soup is that it was shot in black and white. There was no reason for this as it doesn't add to its independent "credibility." I assume it was an economic choice which is reasonable. The only comedies that work in black and white are Jim Jarmusch's Down By Law and Stranger Than Paradise. Coffee and Cigarettes was a pretentious and pointless piece of shit. In the Soup is truly a heartwarming film and a humanistic film. Rarely do I find these qualities in films and especially in regard to American comedies. Hack comedy director Todd Phillips makes me almost hope that a nuclear apocalypse will wipe out humanity as he is evidence that the human race is in terrible danger. In the Soup almost makes me want to atone for my sins.

-Ty E

LIFEBOAT
LIFEBOAT

Alfred Hitchcock (1944)

Alfred Hitchcock's Lifeboat (1944) still holds the world record for having the smallest film set ever to be used for a feature length motion picture. Seeing as Hitchcock was the director of the film, I was not surprised to find this out. Alfred Hitchcock is notorious for his master of situational psychology. In Lifeboat, a group of American and British seeks refuge in a small survivor boat. Soon after they all become acquainted, an unlikely refugee comes aboard the ship. The German U-boat captain tricks the collective of allies to believe he is merely a sailor. Before the end of the film, the German captain becomes Der Führer of the raggedy lifeboat. Lifeboat is clearly a propaganda film but apparently when it came out people were offended that it seemed not completely anti-German (as in portraying them as actual human beings). I guess that makes Alfred Hitchcock a better filmmaker than the wretched and overrated studio propagandist director Lewis Milestone (real name Lev Milstein). Lifeboat takes a more complex road in the way character interaction between the enemy and his dependent co-refugees. The German captain Willi plays his enemies as long as he can in playing ignorance (for example, pretending to not know English). A self-loathing German-American proudly admits that he changed his family name from Schmidt to Smith. Willi later reveals what he really thinks of such ancestral "traitors" ultimately resulting in the captain's downfall. Lifeboat is also the only World War 2 film that I can remember seeing acknowledging the German-American role as those American Krauts were the largest ethnic group (upwards of 40% of all soldiers) to fight for the USA in WW2. It seems Hollywood is only interested in finding all the handful of minorities under rocks for recent fantasy World War II big budget films. Tallulah Bankhead does an extraordinary job as an aging madame who has been able to live a fairly successful life living off married men. She sports a very fancy bracelet that turns off a younger tattoo covered sailor who has a working class inferiority complex. The brilliance of the film lies in these varying individuals that you wouldn't normally expect to see in the same room (or boat) with one another. The most neglected character was probably the black man on the boat that saved a white woman. For the boat, he provides entertainment and is persuaded by the shipmates to steal a watch (which was really a compass) from the German captain. I would like to hear Spike Lee's commentary on this character. Hitch's Cameo Due to its original small release, Lifeboat has not gotten the recognition that it deserves. The film clearly holds up with the best of Alfred Hitchcock's excessive film lexicon. Lifeboat is an experiment in how a collective of individuals are incapable of making important decisions that will benefit all. The Nazi captain being the most proactive and helping (despite his cryptic behavior) of the group, confirms this. Lifeboat also demonstrates that one man can be much stronger than a whole group (a theme also found in Billy Wilder's concentration camp comedy Stalag 17).

-Ty E

ROPE
ROPE

Alfred Hitchcock (1948)

Rope(1948)was Alfred Hitchcock's first film to be shot on color(luscious Technicolor to be exact). The film is loosely based on gay Jewish child murderers and lovers, Leopold and Loeb. The two young men in Rope, like the real-life lovers Leopold and Loeb, were inspired by German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche's "superman" theory which the Nazis always ironically utilized. The gay lovers in Rope, the dominant and passive(or the "Butch" and the "Femme") have an ambiguous gay relationship that obviously couldn't have been blatant for American audiences of the late 1940s. The questionable sexuality of the two gay lovers only adds to the film's psychological power.Alfred Hitchcock also experiments with Rope by making it seem in "real time." The film has only ten shots giving it a more "trapped" feeling that might cause the contemporary filmgoer to have a panic attack. The gay lovers, Brandon and David, decide to play a game with the family of the young friend they just killed. They hide the young man's body inside a chest which is also used as a table for their food buffet. Brandon constantly taunts the guests talking about the "art of killing" and the "superman." The two young men's professor, Rupert(played by James Stewart), picks up almost immediately what Brandon is getting at.Although only running a little over 80 minutes, Rope seems much longer. The reason for this is most likely in it's limited amount of cuts and that the entire film is essentially shot in one room. Alfred Hitchcock was a master of psychology and suspense, and Rope is a perfect demonstration of that. Rope is a good example of the theory that ambiguity is much more powerful than being blatant. This is the main reason why "Hitchcock rip off" hack Brian De Palma will never come close to Hitchcock's greatness.Alfred Hitchcock would later tackle the odd sexuality of Norman Bates in his masterpiece Psycho(1960). But Unlike Bates, the young men in Rope are completely conscious of their sadistic behavior. As the viewer(or at least for me), I couldn't decide whether or not I wanted the two young men to be caught. Either way, the suspense leading up to the film's conclusion was brilliant. Alfred Hitchcock was a director much more interested in planning the stages(as he had stated himself)of filmmaking than the actual directing, and Rope is a perfect example. The film is an experiment in cinematic technique and the questionable behavior of a so-called diseased brain(like Nietzsche himself).

-Ty E

VERTIGO

Alfred Hitchcock (1958)

I consider myself generally fearless. Nothing sways my vulnerability like heights. Like Scottie in Vertigo, I too have a crippling fear of heights. Although it is one of the most daunting phobias in terms of actual legitimate danger, it is also the most common fear save for arachnophobia. I haven't experienced much of Hitchcock's filmography but I know this fact already; Vertigo is an absolute masterpiece in every possible department from the riveting suspense that Hitchcock is acclaimed for, to his precise spinning of a human psyche evident on screen. Over time, people finally began to understand how important this film is to the idea of cinema as a whole. Detective work is a honest days work for an honest dollar. When Scottie realizes his severe fear of heights, he becomes disabled in such a way that he leaves his line of work. When an ill-fated contract comes his way for a bit of private investigation, Scottie finds himself in a web of deceit, love, and a whole lot more headed your way. More so than you could ever begin to expect. For those knowledgeable of the films L'appartement and the American hipster remake Wicker Park, the generally philosophy of venomous and disguised love wears the same, following L'appartement more to the root whereas Wicker Park is a diluted version of both masterpieces. Other than Scottie's celebrated acrophobia, he also avoids flirtatious advances with Marjorie, which leads to the idea that he is also advocates a mild Philophobia. This only further conflicts his love affair with the manipulative Madeleine and her tale of personal madness. From the characters to the sets, Vertigo isn't your common tale of film noir. Being wrapped around a Hitchcock tale of unrequited passion, he sets new mediums for film to surpass, leaving most other films lacking such vivid integrity. The only companion piece this film is lacking is this femme fatale armed with a gun. The presentation of acrophobia is terminally flawless. Hitchcock employs suspended cameras in between gaps of stairwells while using a drop-zoom effect to create a suspended fear that beats with a pulse, much like the victim of a flawed psyche. Early on in the film after the traumatizing events, Scottie is in Midge's living room/study and demonstrates a method of progressive therapy by tackling heights early on. After reaching the third step, he begins to falter and seizes. Much can be said about Vertigo but words can only do so much when trying to explain the varietal impact that this film causes. Vertigo is surprisingly best with multiple viewings. This is so you can view each layer of Vertigo with as much appreciation and thought to detail that you give the straight-forward plot line. Each character deserves their own study. Hitchcock offers this to you quite generously with a dream-like experiment in fear. Presently, Vertigo is Hitchcock's masterwork of his immortalized brand of suspense and a film noir amalgam of a terror that isn't physically manifested but lies dormant waiting for a key incident to spark within your cerebrum only to spark and spread like wild fire. Recently, the Coen brothers decided to "borrow" the very minimalistic, yet imaginative poster scheme for their film Burn After Reading. I would like to hope that Burn After Reading would be worthy of carrying a piece of Vertigo's torch but the truth points opposite. Vertigo is unmatched on all planes and is definitive of a classic.

VERTIGO

-mAQ

PSYCHO

Alfred Hitchcock (1960)

Generally, I have two modes of film viewing: serious and unserious. While I tend to reserve arthouse films and 'heavy stuff' for my more serious film experiences, I also like to binge-watch old horror and sci-fi series like The Twilight Zone (1959–1964) and Tales from the Darkside (1983–1988) when I am feeling less serious and am simply looking for something nice and cozy to play in the background when I am working on other things, eating, or whatever. While many film nerds and film academics swear that he is unequivocally the greatest cinematic auteur that has ever lived and a virtual god among mere mortals, Hitchcock—a man that would arguably ultimately become better known as a brand than a simple filmmaker—is not exactly an all-time-favorite filmmaker of mine, which I recently further confirmed after having a long Hitch marathon of his mostly late-era top-shelf stuff during a number of my 'unserious' viewing sessions over the course of two weeks. Although there is no denying that Hitchcock was some sort of master craftsmen in a way probably comparable to Dutch graphic artist Maurits Cornelis Escher was in his field in terms of playing with things like symmetry and perspective and mastering découpage to an almost mathematical degree, it is hard for me to take him serious the way I do highly idiosyncratic auteur filmmakers like Carl Theodor Dreyer, Robert Bresson, Pier Paolo Pasolini, and Werner Schroeter as his films are simply too glaringly contrived, cold, artificial, superficial, unbecomingly garish and just plain too old-fashioned for my tastes, hence why it does not surprise me that the man was a virtual brand and that he was the progenitor of a hit TV series entitled Alfred Hitchcock Presents (later known as The Alfred Hitchcock Hour) that lasted ten seasons as he mastered a sort of gimmicky form of entertainment which, to his credit, he did better than anyone else. In fact, I would argue that even a classic The Outer Limits episode like 'The Man Who Was Never Born' displays more a 'soul' than the average Hitch flick, but I digress. Somehow I can imagine that even during sex (which he apparently had very little of during his life), Hitch would have to at least spend 20 minutes getting ready and putting on the right specially selected bondage gear just to get down and dirty as normal sensual things like passion and spontaneity probably totally escaped him. Indeed, at the risk of sounding like a pretentious prick and/or contrarian cunt, I found it nearly impossible to take most of Hitchcock's films any more serious than any other seriously reasonably entertaining horror and thriller flicks as they lack a certain heaviness, rely too much on pop psychology and bastardized true crime tales, and just do not hit me the way a great Bresson and Fassbinder flick does (indeed, compare Fassbinder's Cornell Woolrich adaptation Martha (1974) to Hitchcock's Rear Window (1954) and it becomes quite crystal clear who is the more painfully serious and completely uncompromising artist). Similarly, Rebecca (1940) is undoubtedly one of Hitch's greatest and most elegant films, but fellow English filmmaker Nicolas Roeg went much further with his Daphne du Maurier adaptation Don't Look Now (1973) and seamlessly assembled a singular combination of pathos, tenderness, eroticism, and virtual avant-garde horror that would simply confound the Notorious (1946) director as he seemed to lack a sense of artistic vigor, hence his self-admitted boredom while actually directing films. Still, if you are looking for the cinematic equivalent of a fun amusement park ride that takes your mind off the greater miseries of life, Hitchcock's films indubitably provide and his countless imitators of various stripes prove this. In fact, like it or not, there is no denying that Psycho (1960)—a film that arguably represents the auteur at his most subversive, daring, and uncompromising—is simply one of the most influential films of all-time, though the overall value of said influence is somewhat dubious (after all, is there a more decidedly disposable and artistically bankrupt (sub)genre than the slasher film?!).

PSYCHO

After my recent half-ass Hitch marathon, I think I tend to agree with the popular consensus that Psycho—along with Vertigo (1958) and The Birds (1963)—is one of Hitchcock's greatest, if not greatest, masterpiece and a film that has aged relatively gracefully despite the large virtual garbage dump of senseless cinematic trash that it has influenced, which is somewhat ironic since it is certainly the one film that has completely escaped its creator's grasp and developed a life of its own as demonstrated by the various Hitch-unapproved sequels and TV series that have haunted it, not unlike Norman Bates being perversely haunted by the memory of his dead mommy. Of course, more importantly, Psycho has had a totally unquantifiable influence on the art of cinema as a film that, aside from the obvious example of guido giallos and its American bastard offspring—the wretched slasher film—has been paid tribute (and anti-tribute) to in films ranging from William Wyler's The Collector (1965) to George Kuchar's high-camp avant-fart short Pagan Rhapsody (1970) to Fassbinder's debut feature Love Is Colder Than Death (1969) to the Amero brothers' psychedelic hardcore horror flick Bacchanale (1970) to Maurice Pialat's anti-romance We Won't Grow Old Together (1972) to Robert Altman's Images (1972) to Paul Bartel's Private Parts (1972) to Jonathan Demme's underrated Last Embrace (1979) to Brian De Palma's Hitch homage Dressed to Kill (1980) to Ken Russell's Crimes of Passion (1984) featuring Anthony Perkins in a virtual meta-commentary role of his Bates character, among countless other examples. In short, Hitchcock's arguable magnum opus is a film that has influenced an eclectic range of filmmakers, though there is no denying that its sexual perversion angle is indubitably one of its greatest sources of influence as a work of great indelible penetration where Hitchcock does not fuck around when it comes to depicting a freaky fuck that, probably not unlike the filmmaker, suffered the fate of living too much inside of his own head where he imagined many beautiful blonde babes dead.

Needless to say, Psycho was not the first film where Hitchcock dealt with the perils and problems of the seriously sexually sick, though he was certainly more covert, if not sometimes downright esoteric, when dealing with such material in the past. Indeed, even with his third feature and first worthwhile flick The Lodger: A Story of the London Fog (1927)—an Expressionistic silent feature where the auteur revealed his crucial Teutonic influence (for example, Hitch once spent weeks on the set of The Last Laugh (1924) watching F.W. Murnau direct)—Hitchcock had the rather androgynous and openly gay Ivor Novello play the titular lead. While I am totally opposed to the modern-day mainstream academic trend of attempting to prove that great dead artists were secretly gay, Hitchcock's films just give too many damn clues that he was a closet queen and gay film critic Robin Wood makes a pretty good case in his classic text Hitchcock's Films Revisited (1989) that these signs are apparent starting with The Lodger and his second lesser known Novello collaboration Downhill (1927). In Woods' obviously biased blow-boy mind, Hitchcock got really fat and married Alma Reville at the same time he worked with Novello as a means to repress his sexual desire for the flaming Welsh actor, or as the film critic argues, "Why, in fact, did Hitchcock put on so much weight? No clear medical evidence has been produced, as far as I know. There seems to be abundant testimony that Hitchcock, throughout his life, longed to be attractive to women an experienced agonies of frustration over his fatness. The Psychoanalytical evidence seems to point in the opposite direction, to a hysterical resistance to being physically attractive to anyone." Indeed, it is also hard to imagine a straight man stating things like, "The trouble today is that we don't torture women enough" and taking so much sadistic glee in the brutalization and/or death/murder of beautiful blondes in films like Psycho, The Birds, and Vertigo which are, not coincidentally, the filmmaker's greatest (and, for the most part, most personal) works.

Of course, with his great experiment in (non)editing Rope (1948)—a film penned by kosher cocksucker Arthur Laurents—Hitchcock paid (anti)tribute to infamous Hebraic homo childkillers Leopold and Loeb and their failed attempt at a mundanely murderous pseudo-Nietzschean Übermensch lifestyle. Even more incriminating, after his commercial critical flops with Marnie (1964) and Torn Curtain (1966), Hitchcock planned to direct a covertly gay necrophiliac serial killer film entitled Kaleidoscope (aka Frenzy)—a film project that apparently even disturbed #1 Hitchcock fan-boy Truffaut—but apparently Universal Studios bigwig Lew Wasserman felt a film involving an unhinged killer with an unhealthy addiction to beefcake bodybuilding magazines who gets caught masturbating by his own mother was not commercial enough so the filmmaker was unfortunately persuaded to direct the all-too-cold Cold War thriller Topaz (1969), which is indubitably one of his worst and most forgettable films, instead. Of course, Hitchcock's oeuvre is, relatively speaking, a clever cocksucking cinephile's wet dream as it features much hermetic homoisms. For example, Hitch's first feature The Pleasure Garden (1925) features an exceedingly effete costume designer, Murder! (1930) is notable for a half-breed transvestite killer, The Lady Vanishes (1938) has a curious cricket (and seemingly cock) obsessed male couple, Strangers on a Train (1951) features a titular bromance that borders on the homoromantic, and Martin Landau plays a murderously jealous queen of sorts in North by Northwest (1959), among various other examples. Needless to say, in terms of implied homosexuality and gay coding, there's a lot of creepy covert cocksuckers when it comes to the cinema of Hitchcock and, as Psycho certainly demonstrates, this one of the most interesting and entertaining aspects of the filmmaker's oeuvre.

PSYCHO

Undoubtedly, the casting of actor Anthony Perkins—a painfully shy and weirdly wiry fellow that, not surprisingly, was involved in strictly same-sex relationships until his late-30s—was a stroke of genius and one can only assume that old Hitchcock had a great gaydar as it is simply impossible to imagine, say, Paul Newman (who later appeared in Hitchcock's uneven Torn Curtain (1966)) or any another top leading man portraying the unconventionally iconic role of Norman Bates who is indubitably one of the great unforgettable characters of cinema history. Rather revealingly, Bates suffers from the stereotypically homosexual psychological problem of mommy issues and, as Jewish feminist Paula Marantz Cohen complains in her book Alfred Hitchcock: The Legacy of Victorianism (1995), the film is arguably at least partially the auteur's response to 'Momism'—a term coined by psychologist Erik Erikson (who had his own special lifelong mommy issues as the bastard broad of a Jewess and Danish Aryan father)—and the deleterious nature of an obscenely overly-controlling maternal influence. Of course, not unlike many of Hitchcock's greatest films, most of the female characters in Psycho are unlikable, if not downright loathsome, including an insufferable secretary played by the director's own daughter Pat Hitchcock (apparently, the filmmaker was not too happy when his daughter got married in 1952 and their relationship permanently suffered as a result). While most of the male characters are not much better, one gets the sense that Hitchcock is somewhat rooting for Bates Motel master Bates and that he is nothing if not the demented victim of gynocentrism in its most natural and unfortunately unchecked form. While some perennially dry and soulless fecund-free feminist types might go as far as describing the film as misogynistic, I think it would be more accurate to describe Psycho as a fairly successful experiment in merrily macabre misanthropy where a relatively tasteful tongue-in-cheek approach is taken to the idiosyncrasies of the rather retarded enigma that is (in)humanity. Undoubtedly one of the most artfully executed cinematic trolls in Hollywood history, Psycho is a proto-tranny-tinged anti-tribute to the tediously terrible turd pile that is (most of) humanity. In short, the film is where Hitchcock revealed what sort of beast he really is and he curiously utilized a knife-wielding dude in a dress to do it. In modern post-internet speak, Psycho is the tragic tale of a young erratic incel of the obviously autistic sort (hence his bird fetish) that confronts his virtual female sexual marketplace opposite—a desperate unmarried and childless dame of the seemingly highly sexually experienced sort that is about to ‘hit the wall,’ hence her desperate motivation behind impulsively stealing $40,000 from a crude capitalist cowboy—in a confrontation between the sexes that would have been rather unlikely were it not for the absurdity of fate. Indeed, real-estate secretary Marion Crane (Janet Leigh) has good reason to be so deleteriously desperate as her biological clock is ticking and her divorced boy toy Sam Loomis (John Gavin)—a somewhat dumb yet likeable hunk that makes most Hitchcock heroes seem like effete pussies by comparison—is in serious debt on top of having to pay alimony to his ex-wife, thus it seems unlikely that she will have the means to start a family anytime soon. In that sense, Marion’s brutal murder at the hands of Normans Bates (Anthony Perkins) almost seems like an unintentional act of compassion as the quasi-heroine, who seems to have very little prospects in life aside from great lunchtime sex in sleazy hotel rooms, is put out of her misery and it is only fitting that the culling process is carried out by a miserable man-boy that is unlikely to reproduce himself due to being psychologically castrated by his mother who he, rather fittingly, killed. Notably, after Marion dies, her sister Lila Crane (Vera Miles) hooks up with boyfriend Sam to search for her and it is quite clear the two have great chemistry and will probably make for a great couple in the future. Notably, when Marion and her beau Sam are depicted at the very beginning of the film during a brief post-coital exchange, it almost seems like the end of a transaction between a whore and her john, but one would never sense such a sleazy display between sister Lila and Sam. In that sense, Psycho is not unlike Fassbinder’s The Merchant of Four Seasons (1972) of all films in terms of its ironical depiction of a healthier couple being formed as direct a result of the death of the protagonist. In short, sometimes tragic murders have positive consequences and sometimes lethally lonely lunatics can make positive contributions to society; or such are some of the more delectable absurdities of some of Hitchcock’s greatest films. After all, in The Birds, the most benign of creatures—feathered warm-blooded vertebrates that remind one of nature’s harmony, purity, and beauty—provide the viewer with the delight of going on a bloody rampage and collectively attacking obnoxious spoiled people in what might be best described as the anti-monster movie par excellence. Undoubtedly, films like Psycho and The Birds demonstrate that Hitch derived his greatest sense of humanity in his inhumanity, misanthropy, and misogyny, as there would be very little emotionally left in his films were it not for these audaciously asocial attributes cloaked in dark sardonic humor.

Aside from taking the pink pill and attempting to reveal what sort of queen the knighted English auteur really is after coming out of the closet himself, gay Hitchcock scholar Robin Wood has done a pretty interesting job dissecting the filmmaker’s psychological motivations and compulsions in general, especially as it relates to his most famous flick Psycho. Unfortunately but not surprisingly,

PSYCHO

Wood takes a pathetically politically correct and absurdly academic approach and even attempts to link the film to the holocaust and the abandoned British government-produced agitprop doc German Concentration Camps Factual Survey (1945) that Hitchcock worked as a supposed ‘treatment advisor’ on. Indeed, as Wood curiously argues at the very end of his chapter on the film in Hitchcock’s Films Revisited, “PSYCHO is one of the key works of our age. Its themes are of course not new—obvious forerunners include MACBETH and Conrad’s HEART OF DARKNESS—but the intensity and horror of their treatment and the fact that they are here grounded in sex belong to the age that has witnessed on the one hand the discoveries of Freudian psychology and on the other the Nazi concentration camps. I do not think I am being callous in citing the camps in relation to a work of popular entertainment. Hitchcock himself in fact accepted a commission to make a compilation film of captured Nazi material about the camps [...] But one cannot contemplate the camps without confronting two aspects of this horror: the utter helplessness and innocence of the victims, and the fact that human beings, whose potentialities all of us in some measure share, were their tormentors and butchers [...] PSYCHO is founded on, precisely, these twin horrors. For Hitchcock it was a ‘fun’ picture, and a streak of macabre humor (‘Mother . . . what is the phrase? . . . isn’t quite herself today’) certainly runs through it. Is it, then, some monstrous perversion? Many have found it so, and their reaction seems to be more defensible than that of those (must we include Hitchcock himself?) who are merely amused by it [...] No film conveys—to those not afraid to expose themselves fully to it—a greater sense of desolation, yet it does so from an exceptionally mature and secure emotional viewpoint. And an essential part of this viewpoint is the detached sardonic humor. It enables the film to contemplate the ultimate horrors without hysteria, with a poised, almost serene detachment. This is probably not what Hitchcock meant when he said that one cannot appreciate PSYCHO without a sense of humor, but it is what he should have meant [...] For the maker of PSYCHO to regard it as a ‘fun’ picture can be taken as his means of preserving his sanity; for the critic to do so—and to give it his approval on these grounds—is quite understandable. Hitchcock (again, if his interviews are to be trusted) is a much greater artist than he knows.” Somehow, I doubt shoah saints like Claude Lanzmann would approve of Wood’s attempts to connect Hitch’s masterpiece to the Big H, but I have to respect the film critic’s preternatural passion for Psycho.

While I can appreciate Wood’s hardcore (Hitch)cockphilia as a fellow cinephile and argue that Hitch mastered a sort of majestic detachment like no other, I cannot help but feel that, as hinted at in the biopic Hitchcock (2012), the filmmaker derived a great sense of sadistic glee from Psycho and that the film is largely an expression of the all-too-deceptively-effete filmmaker’s great contempt for his audience and humanity in general to the degree where a killer momma’s boy in a dress is arguably more sympathetic than his victims. Indeed, while I do not typically find much to agree on with feminist Hebrewesses, I cannot help but mostly concur with Paula Marantz Cohen when she argued in regard to the savagely yet stylishly sadistic essence of Hitchcock's classic cinematic work, "The gaze that the film directs back at the audience in PSYCHO is, in [William] Rothman's phrase, 'murderous' precisely because it envisions the gaze of the spectator to be, like Norman Bates's mother, not capable of the right response—imaginatively, if not literally, dead. This being so, the film can only engage in acts of vengeance against the spectator, acts that is also attributes to the spectator as if seeking to animate it (Norman's strategy with his mother's corpse). Thus PSYCHO seeks both to animate us into an identification with the murderous Norman and to prove through doing so that we are morally empty in our ability to shift our investment from Marion to Norman and, finally, to accept meekly the posturing paternal verdict of the psychiatrist. The film works to ventriloquize our response, to animate it in order to kill it again. The 'construction of a mental process' that Hitchcock had linked to the look in REAR WINDOW has been placed by its opposite, the dismantling or murder of the look. One critic has made a relevant observation with regard to the look in PSYCHO: 'What is remarkable . . . is that most of the characters who stare at the public are dead when they do so.' Even the sophisticated montage technique in the PSYCHO shower scene is a model of its deconstructive method [...] If montage in its traditional usage conditioned us to see an integrated reality, montage in PSYCHO conditions us to see an unintegrated one—to expect the inexplicable and gratuitous." While Jimmy Stewart is an obvious stand-in for Hitchcock in films like Rear Window and Vertigo, I have always felt he was living somewhat vicariously through the John Dall character in Rope as if getting away with (a homoerotic) murder is one of his greatest fantasies, hence the sense of contrived insincerity of the ending where the lead denounces his previous (pseudo)Nietzschean philosophy after discovering that his (ex)students have actually dared to put his Übermensch philosophy into practice. Either way, Psycho, not unlike much of Hitchcock's films, reeks of fetishism and psychosexual sickness; it is just a question of what the filmmaker's true repressed impulses really were. After all, as a relatively cultivated Victorian gentleman, Hitchcock was a bit more intelligent and civilized than Ed Gein—the real-life momma's boy quasi-necrophile influence for Norman Bates—and one can only assume that he would not act on such impulses, which arguably acted as the source of his arguable genius as a master of cinematically depicting mentally defective criminality of the sort that might have been inspired by the various case studies featured in Richard von Krafft-Ebing's Psychopathia Sexualis (1886). In fact, I do not think it would be much of a stretch to describe Hitchcock as a sort of covert modern Uranian artist, but there is no way in hell that the filmmaker would have ever accepted such a label, even if he had been unequivocally exposed as being engaged in tearoom action or buying bussy from young twink hustlers.

PSYCHO

Notably, in an essay entitled ‘Must We Believe in Hitchcock?’, celebrated French film critic André Bazin—a great cineaste intellect that, quite unlike his Cahiers du cinéma comrades like Claude Chabrol and Truffaut, had somewhat mixed feelings about the Psycho director—made a great point about the filmmaker that underscores what I both love and loathe about him, arguing with great no bullshit penetrating insight, “We know that Hitchcock has one idiosyncrasy: he appears in all his films for a brief moment. In LIFEBOAT, he is seen in a magazine photograph that is stained with oil and floating among the wreckage of the ship. In STRANGERS ON A TRAIN, we see him as a musician glimpsed boarding the train with an enormous bass fiddle. We have to take this as more than a superstition or a director’s trademark. A point of irony touching his entire oeuvre is the reminder of a certain between-the-lines reading of the scenario by those who can see beyond the most obvious effects. Nonetheless, at times this marvelously oiled mechanism grates strangely on one’s ears. Through the rhetorical, conventional, and, in a word, reassuring sadism of American films, Hitchcock sometimes makes you hear, over the victim’s terrified screams, the true cry of joy that does not deceive you—his own.” Indeed, Hitchcock’s greatest films almost mockingly hint at the perversions of the man that created them, as if he is so arrogantly rewarding those special individuals that are not total dumb asses and can see the camp and dysfunction hidden underneath—like Norman Bates’ erotic member under his mother’s dress as he penetrates with dumb bimbo with a knife—with a window into his true perverted personality. In fact, this aspect of Hitchcock’s films—and not the brilliant Psycho shower scene montage or oneiric essence of Vertigo—is the one thing that keeps me interested in his films and has kept me from the strong temptation to write him off as an obscenely overrated (yet undeniably technically talented) artisan that has had more of a negative than positive influence on the art of cinema (from the senseless schlock of the slasher genre to the The Bourne Identity, Hitch has inspired a lot of completely soulless/tasteless cinematic shit).

While critics have oftentimes argued that Hitchcock’s intent with Psycho and many of his other films was to, somewhat hypocritically, implicate the voyeurism of his audience (whereas his wop spiritual son Brian De Palma would simply use cinema to wallow in his own self-admitted fetish for voyeurism), the real intrigue of a Hitch flick is what cannot be seen: the debauched director’s deep dark desires. In Psycho and Hitchcock’s penultimate Frenzy (1972)—a virtual exercise in perversely playful self-parody where the auteur finally got to expose real unclad female flesh—the filmmaker probably comes the closest to revealing the real rampaging gynophobic queen hidden beneath the makeup. In that sense, that is why the psychiatrist scene at the end of Psycho is especially annoying and obnoxious as it not only insults the viewer’s intelligence, but also seems like a form of obfuscation upon the auteur’s part as if he wanted to clearly separate himself from the sexually psychotic nature of his film. It is also no coincidence that Hitchcock directed his most personal films while working in Hollywood as he would have surely faced a similar hysterical backlash to the sort that was heaped on Peeping Tom (1960)—a film that, for various obvious reasons, is oftentimes compared to Psycho (in fact, the film's heroine Anna Massey would later rather fittingly star in Hitch's Frenzy)—in the UK that more or less ruined its once-well-respected auteur Michael Powell's career had he dared to direct his gender-bending proto-slasher flick in his native land. In short, had Hitchcock grown up in a different era, he might have done for the thriller and horror genres what Fred Halsted did for homo hardcore as the man was just too innately Victorian and a product of his time to completely break out of his shell. Undoubtedly, Norman Bates might as well be speaking for Hitchcock when he so passionately proclaims, "You know what I think? I think that we're all in our private traps, clamped in them, and none of us can ever get out. We scratch and we claw, but only at the air, only at each other, and for all of it, we never budge an inch." While Hitch would actually dare to 'budge an inch' (or two or three) with Psycho, one can only assume the sort of unhinged cinematic assault he might have assembled had he been more comfortable with embracing his inner pervert. Personally, while it might sound insane, I actually find it is easier to fully embrace a no-budget Andy Milligan genre movie than a Hitchcock one as I feel like I am not being lied to or bullshitted as the gay gutter auteur might have had a somewhat 'spastic' directing style but he could not help but be himself. Indeed, Milligan may have been a monster of the absurdly technically inept sort but, quite unlike Hitchcock, at least he fully embraced it with great gusto.

While, in my opinion, Hitchcock never directed a cinematic work quite as artfully unnerving or perfectly pitch black as Henri-Georges Clouzot's Les diaboliques (1955)—a film that would heavily influence Psycho, especially the filmmaker's decision to shoot it in black-and-white—I think it is safe to say that he transcended his French influence in terms of being a morbid master of manipulation (though Clouzot was clearly the more delectably misanthropic of the two filmmakers). Indeed, as Robert P. Kolker argued in his text The Extraordinary Image: Orson Welles, Alfred Hitchcock, Stanley Kubrick, and the Reimagining of Cinema (2016) in regard to Hitchcock's arguable magnum opus, "PSYCHO is, like all Hitchcock, highly manipulative; it takes us exactly where it wants us to go but on subsequent viewing allows us in on the joke at PSYCHO's heart. In the parlor scene, where Norman and Marion meet and she first hears Mother's voice yelling at her son, the conformation exposes who Norman is and pretty much what is going to happen to Marion. The sequence is worth looking at in detail." But of course, being a master of manipulation and 'campy' dark humor (which itself was oftentimes a result of said manipulation) just further confirms my suspicion that Hitchcock was a homo or, at the very least, a sort of 'spiritual sod' of sorts, but of course the same can be said of many of Hitchcock's film heroes. After all, while various film critics and scholars (including filmmaker William Friedkin in his DVD audio commentary for the film) have speculated that Vertigo is largely inspired by the sense that Hitch felt haunted by the unattainability of beautiful platinum blonde babes due his trademark portly physique, one could just as easily argue that said unattainability was the result of his sexuality and that he was more jealous of said beauties than desirous of them. After all, Hitch's gleeful brutality of Tippi Hedren in The Birds makes a lot more sense if one sees it from the perspective of a jealous gay man that is using cinema as a cunty covert means to attack stupid dames that he sees as rivals (additionally, due to his curious mommy issues, strange attitude, and dubious dress sense, Rod Taylor's character also seems fairly queer).

PSYCHO

While undoubtedly 'Hitchcockian' in the best sort of way, there is a certain irony in Psycho being the director's arguable magnum opus as it owes so much to so many other talented artists and, not unlike Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976)—a film that, incidentally, Bernard Herrmann also scored—has more than one auteur (indeed, screenwriter Paul Schrader was the real 'brain' behind the film). Indeed, aside from the iconic title designs by Saul Bass (who, rather revealingly, also storyboarded the shower scene), uniquely unforgettable musical score by Herrmann, and source novel by Robert Bloch (as penned for the screen by The Outer Limits writer-producer Joseph Stefano), the film is impossible to imagine without lead actor Anthony Perkins who, as far as I am concerned, IS Norman Bates as the character is nothing without the actor's perturbingly preternatural essence. After all, as Orson Welles' Kafka adaptation The Trial (1962), Pretty Poison (1968), WUSA (1970), Curtis Harrington's How Awful About Allan (1970), and Crimes of Passion (1984) surely demonstrate, Perkins excelled like no one when it came to portraying unnervingly awkward introverts of the oftentimes morbidly mentally unsound sort. In fact, even in Jules Dassin's Phaedra (1962) where Perkins plays an atypical hunk that cuckolds his own powerful bigwig shipping tycoon father, the actor bleeds a sort of highly visceral vulnerability that screams crazed cracked queer. While they might be obvious examples of cinematic sacrilege, I even find the three Psycho sequels tolerable simply because of Perkins' presence (notably, Perkins also directed Psycho III (1986), thereupon further cementing his claim to Psycho auteur status). While I have admittedly fantasized about other leading men aside from Jimmy Stewart and Cary Grant being in Hitchcock's other great films, Psycho would be simply unimaginable without Perkins who proved that sometimes being a waywardly wimpy weirdo has its advantages. Additionally, Gus Van Sant's soulless virtual shot-for-shot Psycho (1998) remake is worth seeing just to see how appallingly horrendous Vince Vaughn is as Norman Bates compared to Anthony Perkins. Indeed, Vaughn, who Van Sant clearly wanted to fuck (among other things, the camera pointlessly focuses on the actor's ass as he walks up a set of stairs), seems like he is doing his best impression of what he thinks stereotypical gay men are like (in S. Craig Zahler's Brawl in Cell Block 99 (2017)), the actor would prove he is not bad at acting so long as he is playing a masculine character).

Somewhat recently, not long after re-watching Psycho for probably the fifth or sixth time in my entire life, I happened to rewatch Joseph Losey's beautifully bizarre failure Secret Ceremony (1968) for the first time and I could not help but notice the similarities and dissimilarities in how they deal with the theme of monstrous mothers as both films feature tragic young characters who grew up to be unhinged due to their mothers' dubious relationships with sexually domineering men that dominated their lives at the expense of their children. While Psycho is clearly the superior and more immaculate film, I could not help but feel more impressed with the artistic integrity of Secret Ceremony—a meditative, somewhat ambiguous, sometimes dreamlike, and oftentimes quite beautiful film—despite it being a glaring artistic failure that sometimes borders on unintentional camp. Additionally, Nicolas Roeg's uneven yet underrated Track 29 (1988) acts as a nice thematic counterpoint to Psycho as a film where a sexually repressed wife is both literally (?) and figuratively haunted by the long lost son she gave up for adoption 15 years before. Needless to say, Roeg's film is both more thematically and artistically ambitious in depiction of the psychosexually unsound, especially as it relates to the morbidly maternal. In short, I find it somewhat hard to like Hitchcock as both an artist and as a man as his films are oftentimes as cold and calculating as his carefully contrived cool-as-a-corpse character. In fact, I cannot help but agree with David Thomson—a lifelong Hitchcock fan that even devoted an entire worthwhile book to Psycho—when he wrote at the conclusion of his entry on the director in The New Biographical Dictionary of Film (1975), "His great films are only partly his; they also belong to the minds that interpret them. There is an artistic timidity in Hitchcock that, having put the audience through it, must allow them to come to terms with the experience. But his own personality is withdrawn, cold, insecure, and uncharitable. The method, despite its brilliance, is equally privative and restrictive. To plan so much that the shooting becomes a chore is an abuse not just of actors and crew, but of cinema's predilection for the momentary. It is, in fact, the style of an immense, premeditative artist—a Bach, a Proust, or a Rembrandt. And beside those masters, Hitchcock seems an impoverished inventor of thumbscrews who shows us the human capacity for inflicting pain, but not more. Such precision can only avoid seeming overbearing and misanthropic if it is accompanied by creative untidiness. In the last resort, his realized blueprints affirm film's yearning for doubt and open endings." In short, Hitch had the virtual emotional depth of a tick, the artistic passion of a mathematician, and the humanity of an over-educated executioner, but of course these are some of the things that also make him interesting and distinct as a filmmaker.

Despite the contrived nature of his films, Hitchcock actually demonstrated in a 1960 article entitled 'Why I Am Afraid of the Dark' a somewhat surprising appreciation for the proto-Surrealist literature of Comte de Lautréamont and surreal cinema of Luis Buñuel, René Clair, Jean Epstein, and Jean Cocteau, thereupon making his seeming incapacity to take serious artistic risks all the more perturbing but such seems to be typical and quite expected of his carefully contrived character. Indeed, somehow I think I would like Hitchcock more if it was revealed that he was not totally unlike the Norman Bates preposterously portrayed by Vince Vaughn in Van Sant's Psycho remake and prone to masturbating while playing peeping tom as it at least would reveal a certain vulnerability and, in turn, humanity. Of course, somehow I suspect the real Hitchcock was a mix of motel master Bates and 'Scottie' in Vertigo as a man that rather see an inordinately beautiful blonde dead than lying naked in his bed. While Hitch might have been a fag, he was surely no serious art fag and I will continue to enjoy Psycho like my favorite episodes of The Twilight Zone and The Outer Limits while trying to forget that certain film scholars and even great filmmakers somehow regard him as one of the great cinematic masters as if he was working on the same level as a F.W. Murnau, Bresson, Dreyer, or even P.P. Pasolini. While it is easy to understand why Hitch's films are so commonly taught in film schools as they are so meticulously and obviously manufactured with great geometric precision, there is no way one can truly teach the gifts of a Bresson, Federico Fellini, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, or Werner Schroeter. Still, many filmmakers have tried to make their own equivalent to Psycho and various other Hitchcock films (e.g. D.J. Caruso's Disturbia (2007) is a tedious teenage reworking of Rear Window), yet Hitch still did it best (sorry, Maestro De Palma). In fact, even François Truffaut had to rightly admit that his Hitchcock homage The Bride Wore Black (1968)—a film scored by Bernard Herrmann and based on a novel by Cornell Woolrich who of course also provided the source material for Rear Window—was an artistic failure.

PSYCHO

In Psycho, the female lead portrayed by Janet Leigh is brutally studied in the way women judge other women for about forty minutes and then slaughtered like a pig while in a most vulnerable position by a man in a dress with a serious negative Oedipus complex. While Hitch's own sexuality is a matter of speculation, I think it is only fair that film scholars recognize his masterpiece as a classic piece of queer cinema that arguably demonstrates what Jean Cocteau meant when he stated of himself in Vanity Fair in 1922 that he is a, "lie that tells the truth" as it a sometimes campy fictional cinematic work that gets to the heart of certain homosexual truths in regard to sex, misogyny, and mommy issues, among other things, hence why top New Queer Cinema auteur Gus Van Sant—an artsy fartsy director that does much better with loose nonlinear narratives than more convention linear ones as confirmed by his greatest films like My Own Private Idaho (1991) and Elephant (2003)—was given the decidedly dubious job of directing the terrifying tacky remake (which is ultimately gay in the worst sort of way). In her magnum opus Sexual Personae: Art and Decadence from Nefertiti to Emily Dickinson (1990), Camille Paglia attempts to make the case for elevating Hitch's film to the level of high art by arguing, "The finale of THE GIRL WITH THE GOLDEN EYES anticipates a classic moment of cinema. Paquita is not just killed but slaughtered, butchered, as in the murder scene of Alfred Hitchcock's PSYCHO (1960). In Hitchcock as in Balzac, a knife-wielding hermaphrodite [...] compulsively slashes the body of a beautiful woman enclosed in a female bower [...] The horror of the two scenes comes from the mutilation of a sensuous female body around which an erotic aura has been painstakingly built up, in Balzac by the stressing of Paquita's 'luminous' beauty and in Hitchcock by the voyeuristic display of half-naked Janet Leigh, who models lingerie from the first scene on [...] Balzac and Hitchcock turn the beautiful woman into an object. Marion's blood flows indifferently with the bathwater down the drain. Her body falls awkwardly over the edge of the tub. Her cheek is deformed by the tile floor. And the last we see of her is her dead eye, lingered over by the camera until it has the iconicism of Paquita's golden eyes. Cold and marmoreal but still glittering with beauty, Marion's eye belongs to a fallen statue, an art object vandalized and abandoned. Balzac and Hitchcock record symbolic sex acts by megalomaniacal but phallically impotent cultists. Norman Bates, like the Marquise, has his own sequestered ritual love-object—the body of his mummified mother!" Of course, it would not be a stretch to assume that Hitch was an impotent megalomaniac that was enslaved to some Oedipal trauma and thus a real 'psycho' of sorts, which I hope is true as it certainly makes him more interesting as both a man and artist.

-Ty E

THE BIRDS
THE BIRDS

Alfred Hitchcock (1963)

While I have never particularly cared for monster movies one way or another (and I find most killer animals films to be rather retarded), I think it is safe to say that Alfred Hitchcock was taking a big quasi-artistic risk when he decided to make a horror flick about birds as they are, at least to my mind, the most benignly beautiful of god's creatures and hardly beings that inspire feelings of fear and terror. After all, unless you are someone that suffers from the acute aesthetic ailment of liking Troma trash like Poultrygeist: Night of the Chicken Dead (2006), there is not another single decent killer bird flick aside from Hitch's The Birds (1963), but of course the film has much more to offer than the seemingly goofy thrill of uniquely unlucky humans suffering the less than dignified fate of being liquidated by fierce feathered flocks as the film's title—a clear reference to British slang for women—surely hints. Indeed, the film seems like what might happen if anti-feminist Jewess Esther Vilar's classic anti-vag quasi-manifesto The Manipulated Man (1971) aka Der Dressierte Mann was used as the philosophical inspiration for the anti-monster film par excellence as a curiously quirky yet strangely sexually cruel cinematic work where the viewer roots for the killer birds, especially when they attack obnoxious human birds and the dumb easily manipulated men that love them. In fact, the real 'monster' of the film is women and femininity as an oftentimes cleverly cryptic cinematic work that reveals womankind without its figurative makeup, not unlike Norman Bates' mummified mommy's face in Hitch's arguable magnum opus Psycho (1960). Speaking of Psycho, the film also certainly does not leave the less fairer sex off the hook as the dubious dating habits of a nearly-middle-aged momma's boy ultimately leads to the doom of no less than two hot dames in the film. In short, The Birds is a masterwork in mainstream movie misanthropy where the real monster is humanity to the point where one does not really question why the birds want to wipe humans out despite it being an obviously absurdly silly premise, hence the understatedly eccentric brilliance of the film; or so I learned during a recent re-watching of the film for the first time since I was a young kid.

One of the things that I find particularly annoying about Hitchcock's films in general is that, aside from their glaring artificiality, I rarely ever find myself identifying with any aspect of them, but on my recent re-watching of the famously bloated British auteur's feathery flick I was bombarded with seagulls, which I am certainly familiar with. Indeed, as someone that has the luxury of living at the beach, I have also had the luxury of regularly encountering gulls—a seabird that is so unsavory that is known to engage in kleptoparasitism—and can certainly say they are the ideal bird type when it comes to apocalyptic feathered dinosaur flicks. Aside from seagulls crashing into my car windshield at least a couple times, I have personally witnessed these parasitic winged creatures eat cigarette butts, shit on small children at the local boardwalk, and steal french-fries right out of the hands of unsuspecting vacationers. In short, gulls—or ‘mews’ as they were once called—are a bird of an oftentimes stunning natural beauty that is betrayed by their grotesquely aggressive behavior, which Hitch’s flick really underscores. Of course, the main characters of the film make these killer birds—whether they be seagull or otherwise—seem like totally angelic beasts by comparison as it is a stylishly savage cinematic work where much of the frivolousness that defines civilization is both literally and figuratively ripped to shreds by seemingly god-ordained creatures that force said main characters to confront nature in all its unsentimental brutality for what is probably the first time in their entire exceedingly sheltered lives. While it is well known that character development is not exactly key when it comes to creature features, The Birds largely works because Hitchcock goes to great pains to teach the viewer to hate the main characters in all their agonizingly all-too-human glory. Seemingly at least partly fueled by hatred and resentment for the sort of hot blonde bitch that Hitch—a sexually dubious dude that infamously obsessed over his leading ladies and personal secretaries in rather creepy ways—could never get despite his great fame and fortune, the film is also a great example as to why Hitchcock biographer Donald Spoto went so far as in tome The Dark Side Of Genius: The Life Of Alfred Hitchcock (1983) to describe his cinematic works as, “astonishingly personal documents.”

In fact, Spoto makes it very clear at the beginning of his extensive biography that Hitchcock was a highly secretive chap that, despite his fame and intelligence, left very little behind in the way of journals and letters, as if he was deathly paranoid that someone might glean some special insight in regard to his psyche and/or personal life, among other things. In that sense, Hitchcock’s films can be somewhat fun to analyze in an auteurist sense as they are indubitably the works of a pervert, misogynist, misanthrope, and sadist, albeit one that seemingly lacked the gall and balls to truly practice such tendencies in real-life to any serious degree (for example, as Spoto also notes, Hitch’s wife more or less wore the pants in the marriage). Notably, as Spoto mentions in his bio, Hitch actually dared to offer some rare thematic insight in regard to The Birds when he stated, “The girl represents complacency. The mother panics because she starts off being so strong, but she is not strong, it is a facade: she has been substituting her son for her husband. She is the weak character in the story. But the girl shows that people can be strong when they face up to the situations. . . . But as a group they were the victims of Judgment Day. . . . I felt that after PSYCHO people would expect something to top it.” In the film, the almost insufferably sassy socialite heroine Melanie Daniels (Tippi Hedren)—a rich bitch that loves playing practical jokes who becomes the unwitting butt of the joke in the end—travels about an hour-away over the weekend to see and ultimately attempt to ensnare a vaguely hunky lawyer named Mitch Brenner (Rod Taylor) that she barely knows, only to discover he is the son of an obscenely overprotective widowed bitch named Lydia (Jessica Tandy) who seems intent on forever carrying her grownup baby boy's balls in her purse (of course, as Norman Bates insightfully states in Psycho, "A son is a poor substitute for a lover."). Luckily, Hitchcock uses the killer birds to ruthlessly murder the romantic melodrama and, in the process, puts these pretty yet putrid people in their place in an almost therapeutically apocalyptic scenario where the petty problems and plotlines of pretty prosaic people are deemed irrelevant as a peroxide blonde cutie goes from being insufferably comfortably smug and confidant to catatonic in a single scenic weekend. In that sense, Hitch exposes himself as a sort of spiritual (proto)incel, though his observations in regard to the so-called fairer sex seem very close to that of a bitchy gay man à la Rainer Werner Fassbinder or even Andy Milligan (who, of course, also utilized horror genre conventions to express misanthropic and misogynistic sentiments) than some virginal heterosexual gamer. Needless to say, I do not think it would be a stretch to describe Hitchcock as the real monster of The Birds, but he is such a marvelous monster that he thankfully trades in tired genre tropes for sexual terror. Also proving that he did not need Bernard Herrmann or a traditional musical score in general to make a great cinematic work, the film is also notable for its exquisitely eerie electronic proto-synthesizer Trautonium anti-soundtrack as composed by kooky krauts Oskar Sala and Remi Gassmann. In that sense, the film goes back to Hitch's early cinematic roots as a student of German Expressionism which is fitting since it was a movement that imbued the horror genre with artistic merit.

THE BIRDS

While Hitchcock certainly took a frisky, if not downright fierce (albeit somewhat covert), approach when depicting those of the feminine persuasion, The Birds is arguably his most ruthlessly 'gyno-ambivalent' flick in both the covert and overt sense. For example, as Camille Paglia argued in her magnum opus Sexual Personae: Art and Decadence from Nefertiti to Emily Dickinson (1990), "The Harpies are servants of the Furies. They are 'the Snatchers' (from harpazo, 'snatch'), airborne pirates, befouling men with their droppings. They represent the aspect of femaleness that clutches and kills in order to feed itself. The archetypal power of Alfred Hitchcock's THE BIRDS, comes from its reactivation of the Harpy myth, shown as both bird and woman." While Paglia might be committing puffery and giving too much credit to an oftentimes goofy horror flick (indeed, compare Hitch's flick to Belgian auteur Raoul Servais' delectably disturbing animated short Harpya (1979)), her BFI Film Classics book The Birds (1998) provide a number of positively penetrating insights about the monstrous tendencies of the so-called fairer sex. Indeed, while I have to agree with Woody Allen of all people when he stated in a Sight and Sound Hitchcock tribute, "I delighted in about five of Hitchcock's movies and enjoyed a few others pretty much, but there are many I have no interest in, including some revered ones. They are all very light entertainment, fun like airport books or, as he referred to them, 'slices of cake,'" it is ironically The Birds—a film with a premise that is so patently absurd and seemingly silly that it screams excremental exploitation trash—of all films where Hitch arguably reveals the most about his own personal Weltanschauung in terms of both elegantly and intricately expressing his great contempt for humanity and especially the opposite sex. A monster movie for people that do not necessarily give a shit about monster movies, the film is mostly worthy of Paglia's praise of the film as "a perverse ode to woman's sexual glamour, which Hitchcock shows in all its seductive phases, from brittle artifice to melting vulnerability." Of course, Paglia is a fiery guidette carpet-muncher and while I agree with her that Tippi Hedren is indubitably the greatest and most beautiful of the haute Hitch hoes, I think it would be more accurate to describe the film as a delightfully devastating deconstruction of the intricate perennial lie that is woman's sexual glamour, which Hitchcock soaks in blood and bird shit in what is ultimately a rather ruthless film where a hot twat 'peroxide blonde' faces struggle for the first time in her putridly privileged San Francisco socialite life and naturally completely mentally deteriorates in the process, thereupon exposing both the innate frivolity and fragility of femininity. In short, The Birds demonstrates that it is a man's world and the veneer of civilization, which is completely demolished in Hitch's film, is the only thing keeping people from remembering that simple fact, hence the lack of so-called feminism among primitive peoples. After all, it is only the hocus pocus of feminine glamour, which is clearly and cleverly depicted in the film, that causes man to yield his power as most women would have very little if it was not handed to them by a dumb horny men that have foolishly fallen under their spell.

While it is impossible to completely hate her, blonde bombshell bon vivant Melanie Daniels—a vapid San Francisco vamp that lives a life of luxury due to her father owning a successful newspaper—immediately announces her sickening sense of self-absorption at the beginning of the film when a little boy whistles at her and she responds by proudly smiling, as if she thrives completely on male attention, including even that of a cheeky kid that is clearly old enough to be her son. While she never verbally expresses it, Melanie is clearly husband-shopping as she is getting pretty old for a debutante and she even immediately begins attempting to capture her prey upon meeting a young bachelor named Mitch Brenner (Rod Taylor) while shopping for Indian mynah birds at a local pet store. Despite (or, probably more accurately, because of) the fact that Mitch makes a total moron of her by pretending to think she is a store employee and letting her perform an entire bullshit seduction routine, Melanie is immediately enamored with the young hunk who, as a lawyer, recognized her from court in regard to a case he describes to her as, "one of your practical jokes that resulted in the smashing of a plate-glass window." When Mitch states things like, "Back in your gilded cage, Melanie Daniels" and "The judge should have put you behind bars," you can practically imagine the heroine getting her panties soaked at the sense of stern male authority and her subsequent actions certainly hint at such a reaction as she utilizes her father's newspaper power to find out who the hunk is simply by writing down his license plate. Determined to entangle Mitch in her virtual bourgeois femme fatale web, Melanie symbolically buys him lovebirds, but she only learns later from a neighbor that, despite being a hardly-young professional, the young bachelor curiously spends his weekends at his mother's house in Bodega Bay. Despite being about 60 miles away from SF and Mitch expressing no serious desire to be with her, Melanie absurdly decides to head to Bodega Bay with the lovebirds in what ultimately proves to be the worst mistake of her entire life. While she does seem to achieve her objective of ensnaring Mitch the oedipally curious bitch, she will never be the same woman again as a poor little rich girl that now has bird-induced PTSD.

THE BIRDS

Although heroine Melanie Daniels is, to a certain degree, vaguely likeable, Hitch makes it quite clear that she is a half-crazed spoiled cunt that, among other things, engages in stalking, emotional blackmail, lying and deception, and various forms of deleterious tomfoolery. Of course, such is to be expected of a pretty peroxide blonde and as Paglia noted in regard to the character in the context of Hitchcockian cinema, "As a bottle blonde herself, she seems to gain strength from the peroxide, which operates on her like a transfusion of plasma. They dye theme appears in Hitchcock as early as THE LODGER [...] Hitchcock treats blonde as a beautiful, false color, symbolizing women's lack of fidelity and trustworthiness." Despite being riddled with a good percentage of negative female stereotypes, Melanie also expresses absurd pretenses towards (proto)feminist folly, or as Paglia noted, "Miffed at Lydia's frostiness, Melanie digs in her heels and refuses to let Mitch pick her up for dinner: 'I can find my own way,' she says, in what could stand as a manifesto of feminist independence." Needless to say, Melanie is not the only insufferable chick in the flick, as Mitch's widowed mother Lydia Brenner (Jessica Tandy)—a woman that, not coincidentally, bears a striking resemblance to the heroine, albeit a couple decades older—is every young debutante's worst nightmare as a stuck-up old bitch that treats her son as if he were her hubby. Despite the fact she looks borderline elderly, Lydia has a banally conformist adolescent daughter named Cathy (Veronica Cartwright) who Melanie strategically buys lovebirds for as a birthday gift even though said birds are really clearly a symbolic gift to Mitch who she plans to capture via her feminine wiles. Out of all the main female characters in the film, a young single schoolteacher named Annie Hayworth (Suzanne Pleshette)—a buxom brunette of the subtly bitchy yet rather sexy sort—is probably the most tolerable yet ultimately most tragic. An old flame of Mitch's who actually relocated to Bodega Bay because of him, Annie was no match for the momma boy Mitch's momma Lydia yet she still cannot get over him, hence why she has stayed in the area. Luckily for Melanie, the titular feathered terrors take care of the competition as the heroine and Mitch eventually suffering the shock of finding the ravaged remains of still-beauteous Annie's bloody bird-brutalized body.

Arguably more ravishing and certainly strangely sexier than Melanie, Annie is assuredly one of the most interesting of the Hitchcock chicks and as Paglia noted in regard to the character, “Suzanne Pleshette, with her savvy Jewish Freudianism, puts all the right shadings into her marvelous depiction of the articulate, hyperconscious, but slightly depressive Annie.” In fact, Annie goes as far as arguably hinting that her ex-lover is gay when she states, “Maybe there’s never been anything between Mitch and any girl.” Needless to say, when Annie states in regard to San Francisco—the virtual cocksucker capital of the world—“I guess that’s where everyone meets Mitch,” one cannot help but feel that is once again hinting at his dubious sexuality (notably, in her new foreword to the 2nd edition of her BFI Film Classics book The Birds, Paglia would even describe a neighbor of Mitch’s portrayed by Richard Deacon as “a waspish, fashion-savvy gay connoisseur who recognizes the supreme sexual power of a woman as cult object without yielding to it”).

While The Birds undoubtedly portrays leading lady Melanie Daniels as an inordinately manipulative and exceedingly entitled bitch that is used to getting what she wants whenever she because she realizes that she has a pricey pussy and is more intrinsically important—both in terms of class and genetics—than most of humanity, her female inferiors, which includes women of all ages (but certainly not coincidentally, especially older women), actually prove to be the greater monsters to the point where they irrationally accuse her of causing the virtual bird apocalypse after all hell breaks loose. Indeed, one hyper hysterical mother portrayed by Doreen Lang even dares to scream in Melanie’s face at a diner, “Why are they doing this? Why are they doing this? They said when you got here, the whole thing started. Who are you? What are you? Where did you come from? I think you’re the cause of all this. I think you’re evil! EVIL!” Of course, in stereotypical negative female fashion, this sensually sapless bitch just seems to be utilizing the situation to unload her (potentially subconscious) sexual jealousy onto a feisty Fräulein that is both much younger and more beautiful than she is, yet Hitchcock makes sure it is almost impossible not to feel a certain schadenfreude at Melanie’s expense as it is about time that the preternaturally pretty heroine be smacked in the face with reality and learn what it means to truly suffer. Additionally, Melanie has something metaphysically (fe)malefic about her and as Paglia noted in regard to the diner scene with Doreen Lang, “The shrill mother, like a witch-baiter in THE CRUCIBLE, advances on Melanie, whose point of view is taken by the camera and therefore us [...] Melanie, having had quite enough of impossible mothers, smacks her solidly in the face—which breaks the spell, but there is still no movement to Melanie’s side. While the woman’s charges are too irrational and sensational to accept in naturalistic terms, they have a mythic power that cannot be shaken off: on some level, Melanie really is a kind of vampire attuned to nature’s occult messages.”

Undoubtedly, until she is brutalized by the birds, Melanie wears a perennial

THE BIRDS

smile of self-satisfaction as if there is no doubt in her mind that the world is her oyster, which is in stark contrast to Mitch's constantly moody and broody bitch mom Lydia who immediately expresses a guarded glacial demeanor to the heroine that only begins to dissipate as the feathered apocalypse begins to get fierce. In that sense, Paglia makes an interesting argument when she mentions, "Crisscross (the theme of STRANGERS ON A TRAIN): literally from the moment Melanie crosses her legs, the bird attack begins. Has Lydia's witchy malice evoked it? [...] Lydia 'panics,' Hitchcock told Bogdanovich, because 'she is not strong, it is a façade': so architecturally, she is crumbling." In short, female strength comes with a sunny smile as opposed to a fierce frown as exemplified by the stark contrast between the young and fertile Melanie and old and postmenopausal widow Lydia (who is so desperate for a man that she has succumbed to covert incest and has irrationally attempted to shield her son from a female mate so that she can perversely keep him for herself). Indeed, one can sense that Lydia innately understands (but, due to very personal reasons, does not want to accept) that her son has found a most apt sexual mate when she states to Melanie, "I feel as if I don't understand you at all, and I want so much to understand. Because my son seems to be very fond of you, and I don't quite know how I feel about it. I don't even know if I like you or not [...] Mitch is important to me. I want to like whatever girl he chooses." Needless to say, were it not for the beaked holocaust and Melanie's behavior during said beaked holocaust, it is dubious as to whether or not Lydia would have ever embraced the heroine as the almost quasi-biblical experience seems to force the fiercely frigid old hag to finally come out of her shell. Notably, the film concludes with Lydia caressing a catatonic Melanie as the lead characters escape Bodega Bay in a car driven by Mitch and one can only assume that the older woman's display of compassion is somewhat deceptive as it can be rightly assumed that the widow no longer feels threatened that her much beloved substitute husband—her own son—will be taken away from her, at least not completely. For example, as Paglia argued, "At the end of THE BIRDS, who wields the claw? I agree with Margret M. Horwitz's view that Lydia certainly appears 'victorious' and that she and the birds have 'achieved dominance.' Melanie is now damaged goods, which Madonna Lydia prefers for her pieta," but, of course, part of the brilliance of the film is Hitchcock's quite intentional ambiguity. After all, the film would have probably not been such a big hit, especially among chicks, if it was made completely unequivocal that woman are obscenely opportunistic, cold, calculating, callous and craven creatures that only get all the more so with age. Of course, the great irony of the filmmaker's understated misogynistic brilliance is that his film is as coldly covert and cryptic as the monstrous women it portrays and in that sense, Hitch is the real monster of The Birds.

Whether intentional or not (I certainly believe the former), it is certainly fitting that, not unlike Jacques Tourneur/Val Letwon with Cat People (1942) and

Paul Schrader with his 1982 remake, The Birds connects horror with the primordial horror of femininity, which makes perfect sense when considers the closer link that the fairer sex has with nature. Indeed, as Otto Weininger—a virtually blacklisted philosopher that, not unlike with Oswald Spengler, Paglia certainly borrowed a thing or two from—argued in his magnum opus Sex and Character: An Investigation of Fundamental Principles (1903), “Women are closer to nature in their unconscious than man. The flowers are their sisters, and they are less far removed from animals than Man, as is proved by the fact that they are surely more strongly inclined to bestiality than he is (remember the myths of Leda and Pasiphae; and women’s relationship with their lapdog is also much more sensual than is general believed).” And, of course, what better symbol of femininity than the angelic parasite known as the seagull and its flying sisters?! While The Birds heroine is constantly conspiring and plotting her next move, her main goal is clearly completely instinctual and that is to find a man and procreate, which she literally dedicates all her efforts to in her absurd pursuit of momma’s boy Mitch. After all, as Weininger once wrote (and Hitchcock would surely agree with), “Woman seeks her fulfillment as an object. She is the chattel, either of the man or of the child, and all she wants to be taken for is a chattel, despite all her attempts to hide this. There is no surer way to misunderstand what Woman really wants than by being interested in what goes on inside her and sympathizing with her emotions and her hopes, her experiences and her inner nature. Woman does not want to be treated as a subject. All she ever wants—and that is what makes her Woman—is to remain passive and to feel a will directed toward her. She does not want to be treated either timidly or gently. Nor does she want to be respected. Rather, she needs to be desired merely as a body and to be the sole possession of another. Just as a mere sensation only assumes reality when it becomes a concept—that is, an object—so Woman only acquires her existence, and a sense of her existence, when she is elevated by a man or a child—a subject—to his object, and thus has an existence bestowed on her.” Of course, this explains why Melanie is totally turned on by Mitch’s initial rather arrogant insults (and why women in general are totally disgusted by ostensible ‘nice guy’ types) to the point where she fabricates an entire journey to be with him (despite knowing next to nil about him). Indeed, as far as nature is concerned, Melanie’s only real mistake is being attracted to a momma’s boy, which is probably the deleterious subconscious result of having a troubled relationship with her own estranged mother who abandoned her. Ironically, in the end, Melanie does acquire a surrogate mother of sorts but it is dubious at best that she, Mitch, and mommy Lydia will live ‘happy ever after’ in the end, especially since she has already made the unforgivable mistake of exposing weakness to the old lady. After all, as Hitch knew, trust no birds/bitches.

Just the other day, I saw a redneck truck plow down two seagulls on the main road in my hometown and there was a certain ironical poetry to these bright white bird bodies as these dead winged parasites still demonstrated more beauty than all the humans around them despite dying such undignified deaths. Indeed, while I am not particularly fond of gulls, they are undoubtedly less obnoxious and purer than the mostly putrid people that have turned their habitat—a resort town—into a hedonistic wasteland where (sub)humans come to bask in booze at the beach and other senseless shit that has less intrinsic value than bird shit. In short, the people I regularly encounter in real-life are certainly more worthy of a bird apocalypse than the characters in The Birds, which says a lot since I feel hardly sympathetic towards the characters of Hitch's flick. Needless to say, a sequel exists but the made-for-TV turd The Birds II: Land's End (1994) directed by Hebraic Halloween sequel hack Rick Rosenthal is even worse than one might presume despite also featuring Tippi Hedren (who, rather curiously, does not reprise her Melanie Daniels character). Indeed, as much as I like seaside horror cinema, The Birds II provides less entertainment than staring at seagull roadkill for 90 minutes or so. Instead, Jean Renoir's The Woman on the Beach (1947), Curtis Harrington's Night Tide (1961), Ken Wiederhorn's Shock Waves (1977), Lucio Fulci's Zombi 2 (1979), John Carpenter's The Fog (1980), and Joel Schumacher's The Lost Boys (1987), among a couple other examples, make for a nice companion to Hitchcock's classic if you enjoy fun horror in the sun this summer. In that sense, The Birds might be, for me, Hitch's most enjoyable film. As for Robert Eggers' latest The Lighthouse (2019)—a film that feels like what the mongrelized mutant offspring of H.P. Lovecraft and F.W. Murnau might make if attempting to take a grotesquely gynophobic approach to Harrington's Night Tide and The Birds—it is probably the greatest killer seagull flick since Hitch's classic, which of course does not say all that much but I can certainly recommend it. Notably, during his pre-The Draughtsman's Contract (1982) years, British auteur Peter Greenaway paid tribute to both Hitchcock and The Birds in various experimental collage-like films. In fact, Greenaway's absurdly ambitious first feature The Falls (1980)—an eccentrically and oftentimes esoterically epic 195-minute avant-garde docucomedy of sorts—can be seen, in part, as a sort of absurdist (anti)sequel to The Birds that, aside from being set in a post-apocalyptic realm where characters have bird-like mutations and are obsessed with birds and flights, makes numerous references to the classic Hitch flick. For example, a film character named Obsian Fallicutt—a fanatical film editor that, not unlike Greenaway, becomes obsessed with films with ornithological themes—is described as believing that Hitch faked the mysterious apocalyptic scenario that is central to the film. Indeed, as the film's narrator states, "Obsian Fallicutt had a theory that the V.U.E. [Violent Unknown Event] was an expensive, elaborate hoax perpetrated by A.J. Hitchcock to give some credibility to the unsettling and unsatisfactory ending of his film THE BIRDS." Needless to say, The Falls is mandatory-viewing for anyone with an acute autistic obsession with birds and/or The Birds.

THE BIRDS

Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes The Birds so inordinately enjoyable and artistically singular, especially in the context of Hitch's overall oeuvre, is its strangely foreboding ambiguity. Indeed, as Robin Wood notes in his classic text Hitchcock's Films Revisited (1989) in regard to the conclusion of the film, "A bleak enough message; and in the last sequence of the film—the departure by car through the massed, waiting birds—the effect of bleakness is intensified by the uncertainties. For uncertainty is the keynote of the film: Hitchcock allows himself and us no easy comfort. Under this sense of judgment, of intense scrutiny, every action becomes ambiguous. The carrying of the lovebirds out to the car: is it a touching gesture (through the child) of continuing faith, despite all, in the goodness of nature and the possibility of order, or an absurd clinging to a sentimental view of life, a refusal still to face reality? The mother's cradling of Melanie in her arms and the shot of their interlocking hands: is it a gesture of acceptance (hence creative and fertile) or a new manifestation of maternal possessiveness? Melanie's broken condition: does it represent the possibility of development into true womanhood, or a final relapse into infantile dependence? All these questions are left open: if we demand a resolution of them we have missed the whole tone and temper of the film. We can say, at best, that there is a suggestion of a new depth, a new fertility in the relationships—Lydia has become the mother Melanie never had. The point about the ending is that the degree of optimism or pessimism it is felt to contain must depend on ourselves: what Hitchcock gives us is the questions." Of course, as a proud (cultural) pessimist, I can only interpret the film's conclusion as being nothing more than a sort of figurative 'calm before the storm' where the main characters receive a temporary reprieve before the misery commences. As to whether it is the birds or their own self-destructive behavior and/or dysfunctional relationships that destroys them, it remains to be seen. In that sense, one must at least give credit to Rick Rosenthal for not reprising the original characters in his steaming celluloid seagull shit The Birds II as it would have surely contributed to the destruction of the mystique of the original film, hence the true unmitigated horror of most horror sequels.

Probably the greatest compliment I can pay to The Birds is that its greatest scenes resemble a sort of goofy warped take on a landscape painting by great Swiss Symbolist artist Arnold Böcklin who Weininger once described as "one feels that mountains are dead and is mightily attracted only to the sea with its eternal motion." Of course, as from its eternal motion, the sea represents a sort of escape from humanity as an unconquerable realm that virtually separates worlds, hence the genius of using birds as an apocalyptic catalyst as not even water can offer a chance of escape. Naturally, it is also extremely fitting that it was also directed by the man behind the idiosyncratic anti-Nazi propaganda piece Lifeboat (1944) where the sea become a sort of perennial psychodramatic prison where man's sanity and civilization are put to the ultimate test. Surely, The Birds—a film that has aged somewhat gracefully over nearly 60 years—can be seen as a sort of allegorical cinematic ‘canary in a coal mine’ in regard to a sort of sexual apocalypse that has afflicted the Occident for sometime but certainly went into overdrive during the dreaded 1960s. Indeed, as Weininger—a Viennese Jew whose somewhat predictable suicide Spengler once poetically described as death, “in a spiritual struggle of essentially Magian experience is one of the noblest spectacles ever presented by a Late religiousness”—foresaw over a century ago, “Our age is not only the most Jewish, but also the most effeminate of all ages; an age in which art only provides a sudarium for its moods and which has derived the artistic urge in humans from the games played by animals; an age of the most credulous anarchism, an age without any appreciation of the state and law, an age of species ethic, an age of the shallowest of all imaginable interpretations of history (historical materialism), an age of capitalism and Marxism, an age for which history, life, science, everything, has become nothing but economics and technology: an age that has declared genius to be a form of madness, but which no longer has one great artist or one great philosopher, an age that is most devoid of originality, but which chases most frantically after originality; an age that has replaced the idea of virginity with the cult of the demivierge. This age also has the distinction of being the first to have not only affirmed and worshiped sexual intercourse, but to have practically made it a duty, not as a way of achieving oblivion, as the Romans or Greeks did in their bacchanals, but in order to find itself and to give its own dreariness a meaning.” Despite Hitchcock’s Roman Catholic background and formative Jesuit education that he once described to mischling Peter Bogdanovich as being so highly influential in the sense that, “The Jesuits taught me organization, control and, to some degree, analysis,” there is no question of the Freudian factor of his oeuvre and his various crucial collaborations with Hebrews that include Ealing Studios head Michael Balcon, composer Bernard Herrmann, businessman Sidney Bernstein, screenwriters Arthur Laurents and Ben Hecht, and graphic designer Saul Bass, among countless others, reveals that the filmmaker is—for better or worse—a glaring product/symptom of Judaic modernity.

THE BIRDS

Undoubtedly, to various degrees, Hitch’s films absolutely epitomize this spiritually necrotic disease, but at least The Birds arguably recognizes it on a sort of ambiguous subtextual level as a flick where a scheming debutante, momma’s boy lawyer, and covertly incestuous mother seem to get their just deserts; or at least they are forced to pull their heads out of the asses for the first time in their entire pathetic lives due to the curious circumstance of a wonderfully nonsensical Neornithes nightmare. Of course, in the end, flocks of fatally fierce feathered friends attacking people seems less patently absurd than the petty and patently prosaic concerns of the pretty plastic people of The Birds who are forced by a sort of goofy Armageddon to, at least temporarily, end their innate inertia. As Guido Gore maestro Lucio Fulci’s The Exorcist rip-off Manhattan Baby (1982)—a film that manages to pay tribute to both Hitch's Psycho and The Birds in a single scene in its depiction of stuffed birds coming alive and killing their master—surely demonstrates, killer winged beasts are not interesting enough to make a film worthwhile but they make a nice backdrop to a film marinated in misanthropy and ostensible misogyny where one cannot help but root for the birds, including seagulls. While I hardly would describe most of Hitch's film as art and find very little to admire about the life and work of Pablo Picasso, I think the Spanish artist could have certainly been talking about The Birds when he once stated, "Art washes away from the soul the dust of everyday life," as it is a film that gives a soul to the soulless and takes a pleasantly preposterous approach to giving a sort of human vulnerability to the only superficially human. Indeed, the film might make Hitchcock seem rather unflattering in that it seems like his savagely sadistic reaction to a lifetime of being rejected by premium grade pussy, but he does somewhat paradoxically demonstrate that pretty peroxide blondes also have feelings (or whatever), which the filmmaker took to even further extremes with lead Tippi Hedren in his underrated subsequent film Marnie (1964). After all, Hitchcock—a lifelong sadistic practical joker—seemed to most enjoy cinematically abusing female birds and he apparently even acted like a monster to Hedren in real-life, so it is only natural that a high-point in his career would involve literal birds brutalizing people in what is arguably the most playfully pernicious cinematic pun in cinema history. Of course, in a seemingly apocalyptic age that is increasingly decadent and feminine where relationships between the sexes have reached an all-time high in terms of dysfunction to the point where the birth rate is dropping rapidly in the West and divorce is the norm and marriage is considered a joke, The Birds—a film where it takes a literal bird apocalypse for the heroine to become more passive and her male love interest to take real action and act like a man—is certainly more relevant today than when it was first released and thus more pleasantly punishing than Psycho. After all, we need a world with more pretty birds and less men in dresses.

-Ty E

MARNIE
MARNIE

Alfred Hitchcock (1964)

Alfred Hitchcock is a director that I grow to appreciate more and more as the years go by. I am more often sickened by a new big special effects film than I am "wowed" by it. I wouldn't say that I am a fan of cinema that is obsessed with "minimalist" films, but I am certainly someone that can appreciate a film more for the thought put into it than the money. Alfred Hitchcock is someone I value as a director because he is a master of psychology, suspense, mystery, and all those other wonderful things that people give him credit for. I recently saw Hitchcock's film Marnie and I must say that I was impressed.

Anyone that has ever been to Baltimore city knows it's a shithole that probably should have been demolished about a century ago when it pretty much stopped developing. What better place for a deranged kleptomaniac girl to grow up than the city of piss tasting natty boh beer and rednecks that live in the city? The character Marnie from the film Marnie obviously had a bad childhood. In Hitchcock's brilliant film, you see how Marnie got to be the warped female criminal that she is. Although she doesn't fancy ladies like most female criminals, Marnie also can't stand the intimate touch of a man. Only a young Sean Connery is of any hope of awakening this sexually depraved female. Marnie is not as big of a film of old Hitchcock's as say Psycho, Birds, or North by Northwest. That being said, I believe Marnie to be one of Hitchcock's most underrated. Although the film has some slow parts, in its entirety it works especially well. Marnie also may have the greatest conclusion for an Alfred Hitchcock film. The fact that a film such as this could have a PG rating shows Hitchcock's genius ability of giving the audience more by showing nothing. I am not surprised that Alfred Hitchcock suffered from obesity as he spent all his time using his mind and thinking how to manipulate others. I have yet to see all of Alfred Hitchcock's films and I don't plan to. Nothing is more depressing than seeing a director's later works when their minds and soul start to decline. I wouldn't be surprised and I am willing to be that Marnie was Hitchcock's last great film. Although Marnie may have some silly special effects and montages (ex. Marnie's spill off her horse), the film puts to shame what contemporary Hollywood calls "psychological thrillers".

-Ty E

HOUSE OF ROTHSCHILD

Alfred L. Werker (1934)

House of Rothschild (1934) is a film produced by Twentieth Century Fox's greatest heavyweight producer and unimpressive looking gentile Darryl F. Zanuck. The film follows the Rothschild family as they go from being the richest Jews in the ghetto (in the film called "Jew Street") to establishing a financial empire all across Europe. The Rothschilds were able to takeover all of Europe's economy by establishing banks in all major European nations. Contemporarily, The Rothschilds have established banks in virtually all major cities in the world. House of Rothschild was released one year after Adolf Hitler's and the National Socialist party's (Nazi) rise to power in Germany. French master auteur Jean Renoir would also make a film on the topic of anti-Semitism and Jewish international banking in Europe. Grand Illusion (1937) is a film that any serious fan of film history knows and usually cherishes. But Grand Illusion takes a much different approach than House of Rothschild. Whereas Grand Illusion is a humanistic pacifist film, House of Rothschild is essentially a bragging piece on how the Rothschild became rich due to their funding of wars that cost many Europeans their lives. Excerpts of House of Rothschild can even be found in the Nazi propaganda film The Eternal Jew (1940) directed by Fritz Hippler. The Smiling and Cunning Nathaniel Rothschild in House of Rothschild Mayer Rothschild tells his five young sons to establish five banks in five different countries across Europe. He tells his sons, "Money is power, money is the only weapon the Jew has to defend himself." He finally tells his sons to always "remember the ghetto." Interestingly enough, it was Rabbis that were the biggest proponent of keeping Jews confined to the poverty of Ghettos in Europe. After Mayer Rothschild's emotional request to his sons about fighting Europeans with money, House of Rothschild flashes forward to a couple decades later where the Rothschild sons have become important players in international European banking. At the head of the family is Nathaniel Rothschild (played by George Arliss who also played Mayer Rothschild) located in England. When House of Rothschild concludes, Darryl F. Zanuck makes it clear that the Rothschilds beat Europe and ultimately defeated "anti-Semitism." Of course, the only anti-Semitism that the Rothschilds encounter in the film is being called a "Jew" and not being allowed to be involved in certain business deals (which Nathan Rothschild eventually takes advantage of). Nathan Rothschild states, "Europe hides its head in shame because it borrows from the Jews." This statement from Mr. Rothschild is a clear message to Mr. Hitler and the German nation (and Europe as a whole). The Five Rothschild Brothers The Rothschilds, of course, have been involved in much more than just the European economy. For example, the American Federal Reserve bank is a Rothschild headed bank. There is nothing "federal" about the Federal Reserve at all. The nine private banks that make up the Federal Reserve are all private and internationalist owned. They are as follows: 1. Rothschild Banks of London and Berlin, 2. Lazard Brothers Banks of Paris, 3. Israel Moses Seif Banks of Italy, 4. Warburg Bank of Hamburg and Amsterdam, 5. Lehman Brothers of NY, 6. Kuhn, Loeb Bank of NY (Now Shearson American Express), 7. Goldman, Sachs of NY, 8. National Bank of Commerce NY/Morgan Guaranty Trust (J. P. Morgan Bank - Equitable Life - Levi P. Morton are principal shareholders), 9. Hanover Trust of NY (William and David Rockefeller & Chase National Bank NY are principal shareholders). The Rothschilds also took complete control of Great Britain's economy in 1814. They have established a private financial corporation in England called "The City." Here they control everything from The Central Bank of England to the London Stock Exchange. The genius of the Rothschilds banking dynasty is their secrecy and behind the scenes operations. They plug in the puppet politicians that do their biddings. For example, president hopeful John McCain just recently flew to England to meet with Lord Rothschild and Nathaniel Rothschild at London's Spencer House. As can be expected, the Rothschilds showered McCain with generous donations (as they do with all presidential candidates). The Rothschilds were also most responsible for funding and setting up the state of Israel. At a recent AIPAC (American Israel Public Affairs Committee) Lobby "Show" all presidential candidates confirmed their commitment to Israel. Barack Obama even wore a cute pin with the American and Israeli flag joined together. Quite a symbolic gesture on Obama's part. If you think your vote or interests as an American citizen count, you're sadly mistaken.

HOUSE OF ROTHSCHILD

Salomon Mayer von Rothschild

Many dark secrets and conspiracies surround the Rothschild banking dynasty. So many that I can't even bring up a significant fraction of them in this essay. I will, however, bring up one of the most bizarre and disconcerting conspiracies in the history of the Rothschilds. The rumor is that Adolf Hitler was the grandson of Salomon Mayer von Rothschild. According to American psychoanalyst Walter C. Langer (among other historians and authors), Hitler's grandmother Maria Anna Schicklgruber was a servant in the home of Baron Rothschild. The story is that she became pregnant by Salomon Rothschild while working as a servant in the Rothschild home in Vienna. Furthermore, Austrian Chancellor, Dolfuss, was the one that ordered the investigation that found out about Hitler's "Rothschild" heritage. Dolfuss was later assassinated by the Gestapo. Evidence also exists that Adolf Hitler was funded by the Rothschilds via The Bank of England and Kuhn, Loeb Bank of NY. The Rothschilds have always been notorious for funding wars on both sides and monetarily (among other things) benefiting from each nation's destruction. The Man that proved Adolf Hitler was a Rothschild chancellor of Austria Engelbert Dollfus shot Dead. Some may ask, "Why would a Jewish banking family fund Hitler?" First, Hitler brought about the destruction of most of Europe. This includes dramatic population reductions, destruction of nationalism (and the great European empires), and overall chaos in Europe. Adolf Hitler was also responsible for pushing the Jewish population out of Europe and into Palestine. The fact of the matter is this: if Adolf Hitler never existed there would be no state of Israel (which was made official in 1948). Before World War II, only 3% of the German Jewish population were Zionists (Jews for a Jewish homeland). Now virtually all Jews around the world are Zionists. The Jews that died in the second World War, for the most part, were poor ghetto Jews that rabid Zionists openly admitted were genetically inferior and unfit for assimilation (read early Zionist eugenics writings). Zionist Aryan Adolf Eichmann It is also very well documented that the early Zionist collaborated with the Nazis. Adolf "Holocaust Architect" Eichmann considered himself a staunch Zionist and even attended Zionist founder Theodor Herzl's 35 year death anniversary. Before becoming a member of the SS, Eichmann worked for Vacuum Oil Company which is owned by the Rockefellers. The Rockefellers are longtime associates and married in with the Rothschilds. Adolf Eichmann continued to work for Vacuum Oil Company after becoming a Nazi for sometime despite his Jewish employers knowing of his Nazi party membership. Eichmann eventually opened up the Nazi SS Central Office for Jewish Immigration at Rothschild Palais in Vienna, Austria. The Jewish collective has never made a lie of their power that they have gained through their persecution. Zionist Scientist Albert Einstein stated the following, "Anti-Semitism will be a psychological phenomenon as long as Jews come in contact with non-Jews—what harm can there be in that? Perhaps it is due to anti-Semitism that we survive as a race: at least that is what I believe."—(The Collected Papers of Albert Einstein, Volume 7, Document 37, Princeton University Press, (2002), p. 159). My opinion of House of Rothschild is that it is one of the most neglected films in film history. I think this is for obvious reasons, but still it is a shame. The Rothschild banking dynasty is an international family that everyone should be aware of. The Rothschilds make the world turn and the wars happen. Most people have forgotten that wars are the greatest moneymakers. Where would historical puppet mass murderers like Vladimir Lenin, Adolf Hitler, and Mao Zedong be without the bankers that backed them?

-Ty E

BLAST OF SILENCE
BLAST OF SILENCE

Allen Baron* (1961)

While I recently felt a certain degree of long buried nostalgia upon re-watching the classic Xmas TV movie special Emmet Otter's Jug-Band Christmas (1977)—an inordinately cute, clever, and shockingly kindhearted production courtesy of none other than great muppet auteur Jim Henson—as it is one of my earliest film memories and something I probably have not seen in well over twenty years, I would be lying if I tried to pass it off as reflecting my current mentality or how I feel about the so-called holiday season. Surely, it is keeping with my current cynicism that I was not at all that surprised to just learn that the film's 1971 source children's book of the same name was penned by chosenite Russell Hoban (which explains the film's somewhat grating 'class consciousness') and mischling hack Frank Oz had to taint the film with his voice, but I digress. Feeling like I might be able to tap into a smidgen of Xmas spirit with a quasi-arthouse slasher featuring a bunch of Warhol Superstars in the quite fitting roles of mental patients, I decided to re-watch Theodore Gershuny's Silent Night, Bloody Night (1972), but it reminded me more of hokey Halloween hijinks than jingle bells and red-nosed reindeer. Hell, I even gave Joe Dante's Gremlins (1984) a re-watch after two decades or so, but I was distracted by its odd neo-Orientalism and the fact that the recent PSYOP-like emergence of 'Baby Yoda'—a sad unintentional symbol of Werner Herzog's strange newfound Hollywood whore status (though, to be fair, the Bavarian auteur started heading into this direction with his soullessly sentimental Spielberg-esque shoah shit show Invincible (2001))—has forever tainted the memory of the film in my mind. Indeed, I am somewhat ashamed to admit it, but the only film that could get me into the Christmas spirit—or, more specifically, the anti-Christmas spirit—is the nasty little neo-noir Blast of Silence (1961) directed by one-anti-hit-wonder Allen Baron who also acted as the film's writer and antihero. Despite being a relatively obscure figure that was mainly involved in doing completely irrelevant hack directing for popular (and not so popular) TV shows including The Brady Bunch, Kolchak: The Night Stalker, Charlie's Angels, and The Love Boat, Baron was recently a casualty of the yeast-infected Me Too campaign at the ancient age of 91 after being exposed by his former personal assistant Anna Dey who not only accused him of doing disgusting things like throwing cum-rags at her, but also curiously accused him of the following in a July 2018 lawsuit: "Baron is a person of Jewish faith and expressly discussed his disdain for [Dey's] Christian religion." Of course, any non-pozzed thinking person that has seen Blast of Silence will see this as no big surprise as the film is devoutly anti-Christmas in a sort of marvelously mean-spirited and misanthropic fashion as if the writer-director fantasizes about a sort of semitic (anti)Santa Claus using his magical Kabbalah-charged sleigh with evil Golem-like Reindeer to drop a nuke on happy Christmas carolers. Indeed, Baron's debut feature offers the viewer the opportunity of spending Christmas with a half-crazed coldblooded hitman killer of the absurdly alienated and perverted sort who glorifies solitude and ultimately achieves a perennial sort of solitariness with his much-warranted grisly demise. In short, there is no doubt in your mind that Baron absolutely loathes Jesus Christ's b-day and the great joy, happiness, and spirituality associated with it, thus making the film a must-see film for 'spiritual Ebenezer Scrooge' types. Like a more morbidly mental Melville movie for sleazy American philistines created years after the release of Orson Welles' Touch of Evil (1958) when film noir had already more or less died, the film is no immaculate masterpiece yet it manages to bleed alienation, despair, and a certain hardboiled nihilistic fervor that makes this film an apt experience for those less than jolly beings that can't get into the Christmas spirit but don't necessarily want to blow their brains out. Whereas sadistic sod gutter auteur Andy Milligan's proto-slasher Seeds (1968) offers the ultimate depiction of family dysfunction where hate epitomizes the holidays, Blast of Silence wallows in a lethal sort of loneliness where murder is merry, at least for the absurdly aberrant antihero.

Aside from obvious racial and cultural reasons, I have always been counter-kosher for largely aesthetic reasons because I cannot stand the innate artificiality and overall phoniness that plagues Judaic artists, especially filmmakers ranging from Mel Brooks to Steven Spielberg to Darren Aronofsky to J.J. Abrams. Indeed, as Ludwig Wittgenstein noted in a more articulate fashion, to be kosher is to be cosmopolitan and, in turn, completely culturally bankrupt which leads to soullessly 'universalizing' the art of the people of their host nation, hence the oftentimes obnoxious Judaic propensity towards satire and parody where an artistic model is manipulated and subverted for (at least partly) comedic (but more often subversive) ends. Over the years, I have realized that the Hebraic filmmakers that I actually do like, quite unlike softboys like Spielberg or Abrams, tend to come from rougher backgrounds where their art comes from the rather organic source of the streets. Indeed, even in their big budget films, the street smarts of tough Jews like William Friedkin and Michael Mann is quite apparent (whereas Spielberg's films reek of a certain insipid suburban soullessness and sapless artificiality). Before switching to artless Zionist propaganda, streetwise semite Peter Emmanuel Goldman almost made the desperation and nihilism of gutter-dwelling counterculture types seem cool in underrated films like Echoes of Silence (1965) and Wheel of Ashes (1968) in between whoring himself out for sexploitation trash like The Sensualist (1966). Indeed, it is hard to imagine that early Martin Scorsese flicks, especially his first feature Who's That Knocking at My Door (1967), would exist were it not for Goldman's largely unknown influence. Similarly, Actors Studio co-founder Jack Garfein—a supposed Shoah survivor that had a certain glaring contempt for white America—demonstrated with his two fictional features The Strange One (1957) and Something Wild (1961) a certain singularly scathing depiction of human psychology and abnormal behavior that makes the films of John Cassavetes seem like sentimental children's films by comparison. Needless to say, Baron does for film noir with Blast of Silence what Goldman did for underground arthouse cinema and Garfein did for adult drama in terms of bringing a certain uncompromising vehemence and viscerality to the medium. As to the defining trait of Baron's first and only worthwhile feature—a film that makes The Lady from Shanghai (1947) seem quite campy and Henry Hathaway's Kiss of Death (1947) seem humanistic by comparison—it is its pure and unadulterated venom as if the filmmaker needed to create it lest he commit a mass murder spree.

BLAST OF SILENCE

Just judging by the opening scene of Blast of Silence, one might suspect it would be more fitting for the film to have the Cioranian title The Trouble with Being Born as a nasty and nihilistic virtual antinatalist film noir where the strangely angsty antihero 'Baby boy Frankie Bono' (writer-director Allen Baron)—a covert wop character that is, somewhat believably, portrayed by a Jew—immediately begins narrating his great displeasure with being born juxtaposed with a train emerging from a pitch black tunnel like a bastard baby being violently blasted out of its mother's monstrous womb. Indeed, as Frankie narrates (by way of blacklisted kosher card-carrying commie Lionel Stander), "Remembering, out of the black silence...you were born in pain [...] You were born with hate and anger built in." Needless to say, Frankie will also die in pain with his hatred and anger still intact as if it was a fate he instinctively understood all along. A deranged hitman that, unfortunately for him considering the particularly perturbed state of his psyche, largely lives in his own mind as highlighted by the film's exceedingly effective and superlatively sleazy narrated 'internal monologue' (notably, celebrated screenwriter Waldo Salt of Midnight Cowboy fame wrote the narration under the pseudonym 'Mel Davenport') where fucked Frankie boy practically seems like his head might explode at any moment. Indeed, Frankie is a virtual ticking time bomb, but some other gentlemen do him the honor of extinguishing him before he can explode on his own in what ultimately proves to be a pathetic end to a patently pathetic life. A resentful ex-orphan that seemingly spent his entire childhood in an orphanage and thus never received critical things like love and affection as a childhood, Frankie naturally has mixed emotions about traveling all the way from Cleveland to his hometown in Manhattan to execute a hit on a mid-level goombah gangster. As Frankie gloats to himself in a self-deluding manner upon first arriving via train while suavely sucking on a cigarette, "You're alone. But you don't mind that. You're a loner. That's the way it should be. You've always been alone. By now it's your trademark. You like it that way." Unfortunately for Frankie, he won't be alone for long as he bumps into some old childhood friends by mere chance, including an old love interest, thus leaving him vulnerable and warping his plans in an ultimately rather pathetic scenario that underscores the angst-ridden antihero's incapacity to completely connect with other people on any meaningful level. In that sense, it is surely fitting that splenetic psycho Frankie meets a miserable end on a cold and rainy day in a scenario that hardly inspires lachrymose in the viewer. Like a rabid dog that is begging to be put down, Frankie's somewhat predictable yet nonetheless delicious demise ultimately acts as a source of solace for the viewer. In short, Frankie is a sick animal and his great suffering finally ends when he is put down.

Although Frankie would certainly agree with Baron's racial kinsman Heinrich Heine words, "Sleep is good, death is better but of course, the best thing would to have never been born at all," his boastful street philosophy of misanthropy and self-isolation are clearly the defensive psychological tools of a forsaken literal and figurative bastard that has no good reason to be happy about life as a poorly socialized lapsed orphan that is ill-equipped to deal with life, hence why he has dedicated his career to taking the lives of others as if he is unwittingly offering his victims the sweet sort of death that his sick self-destructive subconscious is driving him towards. Before executing his murder contracts, Frankie likes to channel all of his internalized hatred into these forsaken fellows. Indeed, when first mentioning his target Troiano (Peter Clune), Frankie states while practically dripping vile, "You know the type. Second-string syndicate boss with too much ambition...and a mustache to hide the fact he has lips like a woman...the kind of race you hate." While stalking Troiano, Frankie also rationalizes the murder he is about to carry out by hatefully stating of his target, "He runs the girls and the dope and the books and the numbers. There's a guy you could really learn to hate." Although not his initial intention, Troiano is not the first scumbag that Frankie wastes as he impulsively yet still rather sneakily brutally beats and strangles to death an 'old friend' named 'Big Ralph (Larry Tucker)—a fiercely foul and seemingly fecally unsound fat fuck that owns multiple pet street rats—that dares to attempt rip him off for a "thirty-eight with a silencer" after already agreeing to a contract. Indeed, while being a contract killer is technically Frankie's job, one certainly gets the sense that he simply chose the career as an opportunistic outlet for his overwhelming bloodlust. Needless to say, a woman also helps inspire Frankie's homicidal rage after temporarily softening his cold black heart during a moment of weakness that clearly contributes to his demise.

While incessantly complaining about his need for solitude, Frankie somewhat changes his tune upon being reunited with an old female friend named Lori (Molly McCarthy)—a hot dame that is able to have a rare ataraxic effect on the seemingly impenetrable antihero—and instantly falls for her. When Lori invites Frankie over for Christmas out of what seems to be nothing more than an altruistic sense of pity, he more or less attempts to rape her, but not before going on an insane rant that exposes him as a perturbingly pathetic whack-job that cannot even hold a conversation with a woman without it ending in disaster of the mutually embarrassing sort. Undoubtedly, Lori is right when she recommends that Frankie get a girlfriend as it would at least warm his seemingly half-rotten heart and give him a temporary relief from his hate-ridden psychosis, but he seems to be too hopelessly socially alienated and emotionally retarded to maintain any sort of sane love interest. Aside from killing Big Ralph, Frankie also makes the mistake of attempting to renege on his contract and is immediately threatened by the guy that hired him with the carefully expressed words, "All right. Now listen careful, Cleveland. Item one: For just thinkin' what you just said...you're in real trouble...and they're gonna hear about this call. Item two: You made a contract with us, so you'll do the job and you'll do it right. Then we'll listen to your problems. You've got till New Year's Eve. And remember, you're in trouble now." While Frankie manages to commit the contract hit on Troiano with a certain savagely sadistic gusto that involves shooting the mobster while he is carrying a plush panda for his mistress and then kicking over his corpse while on the way out the door, he does not manage to escape from NYC alive as the men that hired him decide to assumedly cover their tracks by executing him. Indeed, despite being clearly threatened over the phone by the mobster that hired him, Frankie does not think twice about meeting him at a secluded pier outside the city where he is jumped by two hoods that, rather fittingly, look just like him. After being shot by the two doppelgängers and falling from a pier into the sea, Frankie tries in vain to climb out of the water by grasping for mud as the two killers continue to blast him into silence, or as the now-dead-narrator states at the very end of the film, "'God moves in mysterious ways,' they said. Maybe he is on your side, the way it all worked out. Remembering other Christmases...wishing for something, something important, something special. And this is it, baby boy Frankie Bono. You're alone now. All alone. The scream is dead. There's no pain. You're home again. Back in the cold, black silence."

BLAST OF SILENCE

For whatever reason, I recently decided to re-watch Dan Gilroy's somewhat overrated Nightcrawler (2014)—a film that seems to have made with the objective of petrifying tech industry dorks and other spiritually neutered types—and was amazed at how much more unlikable Jake Gyllenhaal's exceedingly effete sociopathic 'gutter capitalist' character is compared to the crazed contract killer of Blast of Silence. Indeed, while Allen Baron's film is a singularly dark and nihilistic neo-noir that ends in a fittingly dejecting fashion, there's at least a certain underlying humanity to the proceedings whereas good goy Gilroy's film is almost as sterilely cynical as its sociopathic antihero as if it is a (pseudo)arthouse film made specifically to remind long-suffering office bureaucrats that they might not actually be autistic automatons after all despite all evidence to the contrary. In short, Baron's film is sympathetic towards its aberrant antihero to the extent that, unlike Gyllenhaal's stone cold yet sapless character, he wants to love and fuck just like anyone else despite his comments to the contrary. Additionally, Hebraic hack Ariel Vromen's superlatively shallow hitman flick The Iceman (2012) seems like an insipidly stylized piece of shit by comparison despite feeble attempts at pathos and poignancy. In short, most contemporary film villains, especially in neo-noir, are unsympathetic garbage that are rarely worthy of even being described as caricatures as they lack more substance than a Looney Tunes cartoon character and Baron's film—where an exceedingly erratic ex-orphan expounds on his perturbing primitive prole philosophy in a manner worthy of Panzram—arguably underscores this better than any films of its era. While English auteur John Boorman's masterful Point Blank (1967) is certainly the superior tragic hit-man flick in almost every regard, Baron's dementedly daring directorial debut is certainly on another level in terms of tapping into the almost-evil essence of a damned dude that lives for death and personifies the Christian phrase: "Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

Despite being an irreligious film with an anti-Christmas spirit as directed by a racially conscious Jew, Blast of Silence ultimately has a certain strange spiritual dimension if we listen to Emil Cioran, or as the Franco-Romanian philosopher once wrote in a piece entitled 'Annihilation by Deliverance' featured in his classic book A Short History of Decay (1949): "A doctrine of salvation has meaning only if we start from the equation 'existence equals suffering.' It is neither a sudden realization, nor a series of reasonings which lead us to this equation, but the unconscious elaboration of our every moment, the contribution of all our experiences, minute or crucial. When we carry germs of disappointments and a kind of thirst to see them develop, the desire that the world should undermine our hopes at each step multiplies the voluptuous verifications of the disease. The arguments come later; the doctrine is constructed: there still remains only the danger of 'wisdom.' But, supposed we do not want to be free of suffering nor to conquer our contradictions and conflicts—what if we prefer the nuances of the incomplete and an affective dialectic to the evenness of sublime impasse? Salvation ends everything; and ends us. Who, once saved, dares still call himself alive? We really live only by the temptation of irreligiosity. Salvation haunts only assassins and saints, those who have killed or transcended the creature; the rest wallow—dead drunk—in imperfection." Indeed, in his own sick sad way, Baby boy Frankie Bono—the most lonely of god's losers and a virtual spiritual brother to Travis Bickle of Taxi Driver (1975) fame—achieves salvation and, in turn, total transcendence in the end. Speaking of Scorsese, the famous guido filmmaker apparently once described Blast of Silence as, "my favorite New York City movie," which says a lot considering the filmmaker once directed a cocaine-fueled musical entitled New York, New York (1977) and later a slightly better film entitled Gangs of New York (2002). Additionally, the camera operator for Baron's film, Erich Kollmar, acted as the cinematographer of Scorsese's mentor John Cassavetes' jazzy debut feature Shadows (1958).

As a film that makes the grittiest of Sam Fuller flicks seem about as hardcore as a transman's neo-penis and features a fiercely foreboding fatalism that might inspire suicide in less psychologically sound viewers, Blast of Silence—a minor masterpiece of misery and misanthropy where hate manages to effortlessly metastasize as the film progresses—is probably the ultimate anti-Xmas trip and a fittingly aesthetically abrasive testament to the soul-sucking power of solitude, especially when you are a lonely individual during what is supposedly the happiest time of the year. In short, Black Christmas (1974) seems like director Bob Clark's later Fellini-esque classic A Christmas Story (1983) when compared to the stark and dark spiritual decrepitude that engulfs Baron's virtual cinematic bomb. Considering that Baron spent the rest of his career being a for-hire hack that only managed to direct a couple mostly worthless films, including the uncharacteristically anti-cosmopolitan Foxfire Light (1982) where a rich city slut is tamed by a Southern rancher, one can only assume that Blast of Silence is the filmmaker's sole auteur work and a true reflection of his seemingly twisted soul. Aside from apparently bragging about various dubious sexual conquests, including scamming his way into then-Charlie's Angels star Farrah Fawcett's panties, the July 2018 lawsuit filed against him by his ex-assistant alleges that, "Baron also claimed to have forced numerous Cuban women to have sexual intercourse with him in exchange for roles in the 1959 movie CUBAN REBEL GIRLS." Needless to say, for better or worse, the recent allegations against Baron only add to the creep factor of Blast of Silence where the completely socially sick antihero seems to absurdly believe that dancing with a girl somehow immediately leads to aggressively trying to fuck them.

BLAST OF SILENCE

While I don't really believe in New Year's resolutions and can never deny the raw aesthetic power of Blast of Silence, I think my goal for next year is to make sure that I have no desire to watch the film ever again, at least not during the Christmas season. Indeed, I am perfectly fine with making Terry Gilliam's Brazil (1985) my reliable Christmastime favorite lest I succumb to a 'schism of the heart,' or as Cioran once so pitilessly described, "We are doomed to perdition each time life does not reveal itself as a miracle, each time the moment no longer moans in a supernatural shudder [...] And it is not the miracle which determines tradition and our substance, but the void of a universe frustrated of its flames, engulfed in its own absences, exclusive object of our rumination: a lonely universe before a lonely heart, each predestined to disjoin and to exasperate each other in the antithesis. When the solitude is intensified to the point of constituting not so much our datum as our sole faith, we cease to be integral with the whole: heretics of existence, we are banished from the community of the living, whose sole virtue is to wait, gasping, for something which is not death. But we, emancipated from the fascination of such waiting, rejected from the ecumenicity of illusion—we are the most heretical sect of all, for our soul itself is born in heresy." In fact, I think I am going to spend Christmas day re-watching Ronald Neame's classic Charles Dickens adaptation Scrooge (1970) starring British screen legends Albert Finney and Alec Guinness and just try to be grateful that my ancestors derive from the Western European countryside instead of dreary Eastern European shtetls which clearly provided a sort of atavistic spiritual influence on a film like Blast of Silence where man is completely deracinated and an abstracted slave that is no longer in tune with nature. Needless to say, re-watching Carroll Ballard's Nutcracker: The Motion Picture (1986)—a near-masterpiece of sight and sound that is like the 1980s Christmas equivalent of classic Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger productions like The Red Shoes (1948) and The Tales of Hoffmann (1951)—helped to cleanse my soul after watching Baron's gleefully seedy celluloid bomb and it also reminded that the right film can help even the most Scrooge-esque of individuals find some small glimmer of the yuletide spirit. Indeed, despite the virtually malefic message a film like Blast of Silence might communicate, it is important to remember that the world is not a shtetl and that Christmas can even be enjoyed by spiritually and/or seasonally sick niggas that, despite hating Hollywood in general, can still enjoy Clive Donner's Dickens adaptation A Christmas Carol (1984) starring George C. Scott without succumbing to the figurative wizard of poz that is hollyweird. Still, I have more faith in someone that prefers Baron's film to fiercely phony crypto-kosher Christmas crap like mischling hack Jon Favreau's Elf (2003)—a radically retarded film that was written, directed, and largely starring members of the tribe—where Santa Claus is portrayed by Ed Asner who, not coincidentally, could easily pass for Baron's brother. After all, there is something innately sinister about a world where Will Ferrell is considered funny and Blast of Silence—an inordinately metaphysically aggressive film that acts like acid on the psyche in terms of completely wiping away what might have previously been on your mind—acts a sort of ideally corrosive antidote to such mesmerizingly moronic crypto-anti-Xmas insipidity. After all, better a Christmas-tide cynic than a buffoonish shabbos goy fairy like Ferrell.

-Ty E

HOLLYWOODLAND
HOLLYWOODLAND

Allen Coulter (2006)

The stories behind the real-life movers and shakers of Hollywood have always been more interesting than the actual films. Let's face it, Hollywood has never made a lie of the fact that it is first and foremost a business. The seedy place has always attracted the most degenerate and desperate of individuals. Prostitutes, murderers, the mafia, white collar criminals, drug fiends, homosexuals, lesbians, war profiteers, communists and a whole large cast of other social parasites. Kenneth Anger's wonderful book Hollywood Babylon I and II goes into depth on a variety of things. Hollywoodland is one of the few films to come out of Hollywood that reflects on the dark past of the ghostly streets of Sunset Boulevard.

Hollywoodland is a "biopic" of sorts attempting to examine the mysterious death of TV Superman George Reeves. The silly and embarrassingly bad actor Ben Affleck stars as the slightly out of shape Mr. Reeves. I must say that the casting of Affleck as Reeves was indeed appropriate. Like Affleck, George Reeves seemed to be an actor that took himself far too seriously as acting goes. Affleck probably finds his biggest fan base in Kevin Smith fans whereas Reeves found his fan base with little boys. Both men seem to attract males that have a hard time finding members of the opposite sex.

An arrogant and wannabe tough guy Adrien Brody stars in Hollywoodland as Louis Simo, a somewhat of a loser private detective. I wouldn't be surprised if Simo was a relative of sleazebag gossip columnist Walter Winchall. Simo really has nothing going for him in life but he is determined to prove that George Reeves did not commit suicide. Simo's "brave" style of personal investigating is a result of his nothing to live for mentality. Also, Simo unsurprisingly has a soft spot for paper money. Other than receiving a few bucks here and there, Simo's life sucks. His young son doesn't want much to do with him and he always seems to get his ass kicked.

Hollywoodland's strength lie in it's unpleasant story of an over glamorized place. Many children and even adults dream of going to Hollywood where all the great American stars once stood. But when one takes a look at what Hollywood was built on and the tragedies surrounding it(such as the death of George Reeves), Hollywood loses its magic. When an ugly troll of a criminal states "he makes movies" near Hollywoodland's conclusion, one gets a bitter feeling in their stomach. How could such an ugly man control what played on American silver screens?

I have never thought of Ben Affleck as the "cool" guy he pretends to be in movies. Like the late George Reeves, Affleck must know of his limitations as a so called "talent." Despite Reeves's story being told through a series of flashbacks, his character sticks out. He was a man that wanted to be much bigger than he could have ever dreamed of. It would have been no surprise if he really killed himself but many still reject this. Whether he killed himself or not, George Reeves most likely had a death wish. Hollywoodland makes it clear that he did not have much more to live for. Although a sometimes banal film, Hollywoodland at least offers the viewer something to think about.

-Ty E

CREATURES FROM THE ABYSS
CREATURES FROM THE ABYSS

Alvaro Passeri (1994)

Creatures From The Abyss (Plankton) is a "THE THING" inspired Italian-trash horror film set in a nautical environment. The film is directed by Massimiliano Cerchi who made 3 other films that i especially don't care about. The plot features the worst acting i have ever witnessed, dubbed or not. The things these characters do are ridiculous. I dare to say this film was made on a budget of at least $500.00. I like his pseudonym. Yes, it is that bad. The film revolves around 5 teenagers being played by adults that i don't care for at all, as you can obviously tell.

The Characters:

Mike: The nerd with a mullet. Bobby: The old Zac Efron look-a-like who is an asshole jock. Margaret: Mike's fiance. Dorothy: I don't care. Julie: Sister to someone.

They push each other on the beach and giggle and some gay shit like that. Then they leave without Mike and makes him chase them out. In this confusion of teenage stupidity, they leave the gas can on the shore. I have no idea where they were trying to go on a little raft, or why they ended up in the Atlantic Ocean, but this is only a small problem with the film. They soon get stranded and get pissed off at each other and drop the motor to start paddling. Soon after getting tired, their oar gets stuck on a dead body that looks sort of like Lon Chaney in The Phantom of the Opera. Hysteria is performed and they see a light from a yacht. Closer inspection reveals this yacht is an oceanographic institute of research. All the meanwhile they stare, we are bombarded with shitty flash-editing of tentacles, screaming, open mouths, and useless Amoebas. When they finally board, they declare it part time since there seems to be no crew aboard. They begin to listen to shitty dance music and drink alcohol water. Bobby is still trying to get laid by seducing all the women. After Mike tells the women to GB2Kitchen and make him food, they see fish that they cook up screaming and catch on fire. They blame it on simple hallucinations. After thoroughly searching the cabin they encounter two incredibly annoying objects. One is a clock named Cutie Time. If you walk by it it wakes up and begins to talk to you about various foreshadowing plot points which gets really fucking annoying. Two is the fish eye camera slithering on the ground watching the characters extremely closely. Even when they look right at it, they don't see the creature. I don't remember there being an invisible fish in the film. After sitting down and eating and watching Bobby eat like a pig making stupid jokes, all the women seem to love him. I want him to teach me his secrets. One of the women characters whom i don't care about eats the fish she fried and begins to have stomach pains later that night which leads to a great vomit scene with bugs in her upchuck making vomit angels. A very great squirm able scene. While the boys check out the crawlspace below they find a drooling, foaming, old man with frizzled hair who is a chemist. When i say chemist, it sounds normal and you probably don't take another look at the word but after hearing Mike say chemist, i don't think i can ever hear this word and not laugh to my self again. They drag him up to the deck while he bleeds and foams a lot. This only leads up to Bobby's conclusion that the ship was a cover to create drugs. After tasting some "cocaine" which we later find out to be mutated plankton, we only begin to taste his fate. While Mike is in the lab looking at a Tron looking screen, he realizes there is a mutant fish aboard. Key the scene with the flying fish comes alive and latches on his future-wifes throat biting it a little teensy bit. After witnessing a fish fly through the air looking like a paper cut-out, you wonder how worse can this film get. Mike then goes crazy with a giant jaw bone and destroys all the fish and manages to hit one in a meat grinder which results prove satisfactory. He misses the huge freezer of these fish which evades me and proves him to be a stupid nerd. Then Bobby has his way with _____ (Insert Big Busted Female) and apparently she is a virgin (questionable). He then gets a recently de-thawed fish in the back of his skull which spikes protrude and impregnates _____ with lots of fish eggs and disappears. These scenes are only the mere catalyst for such a pile of shit. I cannot ruin the ending because you must see it so you can come to a conclusion by yourself. All right, to square the review down let me ask myself, what didn't work? Everything. This film had the most atrocious acting ever printed to film and given a proper release. The dubbing is pure shit. The story is uninspired. The characters are retarded. The scares are none. The only things i really like about it was the animation and the effects. Some of them that is, less we not forget the flying fish. Creatures of the Abyss is a funny movie because of how fucking shitty it was. Is it a grand old film that has lots of tits and blood? Yes. Would i recommend it to anyone i cared about in the slightest? No.

-Maq

LETHAL FORCE
LETHAL FORCE

Alvin Ecarma (2002)

Imagine a pure-octane action movie with a lot of throwbacks to the grand days of discovering Riki-Oh. Finding Lethal Force for sale is the only thing you can possibly do to get that same grand feeling of watching something so over-the-top yet hilariously brilliant and violent at the same time. Alvin Ecarma's Lethal Force is a spoof film that is just a little bit serious. It parodies blaxploitation films, kung-fu classics, and the ridiculous early crime films. The plot is something we have heard of before. A gangster is forced to turn in his best friend who also happens to be a hitman, after his wife was murdered and son was taken hostage. The hitman with the name of Savitch (Get it?) is the placeholder of all the action scenes. This includes catching knives in his teeth and squishing eye goo out of putty-lookalike henchmen's faces. While some of the acting is quite atrocious, it semi-works due to the wardrobe. They look the part therefore they must fit. Cash Flagg Jr. is amazing as Savitch. Not only is he the badass, cold minded killer who has a soft spot for his time in 'Nam but he has suave one liners and the ability to deflect bullets with knives sticking out of his palm. Cash Flagg Jr. would fit perfectly in the live action cast of a Dragonball Z film. The characters in this film that decorate the beautiful artwork are extremely eccentric and are amongst the enormous appeal. We have a little boy who is thrown into a quick draw match to the death, an obese lady with a humongous fez on her head. The crippled shaded villian who reminds me of a scientist, the soul powered Foxy Brown parody and let us not forget the henchmen. Their uniform is a black suit with kabuki masks. Very iconic and should be delved into in the sequel. They remind me of Putty's. The sheer absurdity is amazing and goes down well with intoxication. The whole reason the shaded man wants Savitch for revenge is explained in the funniest assassin scene ever. The villian went to the public mail drop box and puts his letter in. He turned around and it opened and flew out. After this happening a couple more times, you see Savitch's face inside and he shoots the man in the face, scarring him for life. Lethal Force is a must for any fan of action or comedy. Look for this off the wall kooky film at a store near you. You can only benefit with a film as wise as this one.

-Maq

DEATH SHIP

Alvin Rakoff* (1980)

Anyone that has watched the History Channel has heard about the horrible automobile-Auschwitzs, vans that apparently drove around gassing Jews around the clock while strolling the block. These portable Death-Camps are just one of the many tales told after the second World War that make young children cry and the dreaded perpetrators want to die. But what if there was a Death-Camp sailing the mysterious seas today? What about an Evil Nazi ship that makes the Titanic look like the lush luxury ship that it was? In the 1980 movie Death Ship the horrors of the Hollywood concocted Evil-Supernatural-Nazi-Mythos enters the uncharted territories of a truly dead sea. Maybe Herr Goebbels should have taken some propaganda lessons from the masters of Hollywood for The Eternal Jew and Jew Süß are far too tame in comparison to the dreaded Death Ship!

Actor George Kennedy has come a long way since his performance as the goofy and loveable redneck Dragline in Cool Hand Luke. In Death Ship, an older Kennedy plays a deranged ship Captain named Ashland (a possible allusion to Auschwitz!?) who becomes possessed by the ghostly SS (both kinds) spirit of a German Kriegsmarine ship. While making the killings happen as the captain, the refugee passengers of the Toten-Ship attempt to escape with their lives intact. Little do these passengers realize the powerful spirit of National Socialism has consumed Ashland's ogre size body. While on the ship, the passengers are shocked with horror to see aesthetically pleasing red rooms with Swastikas and a micro-movie theater projecting unstoppable Nazi archive footage. SSooky SSstuff!

One of the "best" and most standout scenes in Death Ship is when the Holocaust victims are found on the ship. The skeletons of victims are scattered around and there is even a box found with the gold teeth of rich Jews!!!! The filmmakers must have taken a trip to the Holocaust Museum in Washington D.C., because their commitment to historical accuracy is impeccable. I couldn't forget a scene involving a woman with a fat ass (check screenshot) taking a warm and bloody shower. The allusions to the Holocaust were with me throughout the scene. Without a doubt, Death Ship is pure Hollywood-GOLD in its unintentional commitment to being mildly humorous!

"Those who survive the ghost ship are better off dead!" is the zany and wonderfully wild tagline to the movie poster of Death Ship. I just wonder if the producers of Death Ship feel the same way about the survivors of the real Holocaust. Like the 1977 film Shock Waves before it, Death Ship is a film where the SS Ship of the Sea meets the SS of Heinrich Himmler's genocidal glee. Unfortunately, aside from Captain Ashland, no awesome Nazi uniforms are present in Death Ship which is a must in any film dealing with the SS. All in All, Death Ship is another passable pile of cinema feces, but still preferable to Swindler's

DEATH SHIP

List.
-Ty E

BETAVILLE

Alyce Wittenstein* (1986)

While the daughters of Hebraic lawyers are not exactly the sort of people you would typically expect to be involved in any half-serious avant-garde cinema movement, such is certainly the case with Alyce Wittenstein (Rent a Wreck, Multiple Futures), who is one of the more obscure figures associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement and who was apparently once labeled the, “Queen of the New York Underground.” Like many of the films associated with both the No Wave and Cinema of Transgression scenes, Wittenstein’s fairly obscure cinematic works are not exactly easy to find, yet I managed to stumble upon her kaleidoscopic 20-minute dystopian farce Betaville (1986), which was marketed as “A Post-Modern Nightmare” and is probably best described as a satire of Jean-Luc Godard’s obnoxiously minimalistic (anti)sci-fi flick Alphaville, une étrange aventure de Lemmy Caution (1965) aka Alphaville: A Strange Adventure of Lemmy Caution as directed by an overly scene conscious chick who seemed more interested in making a sequel to Slava Tsukerman’s Liquid Sky (1982) than lampooning the style of some unintentionally goofy frog comic filmmaker. While directed, co-written, and produced by Wittenstein, the film owes a great deal of its charm, character, and aesthetic integrity to lead actor Steve Ostringer, who also acted as the co-writer and production designer (in fact, he would work in the same capacity on virtually every one of Wittenstein’s other films, thus one could argue that all of these cinematic works really have two central auteurs). As its ironical title somewhat hints, Betaville is set in a dystopian realm of perennially sneering beta-bitch man-pussies, albeit of the somewhat idiosyncratic stripe as most of these exceedingly effete fellows look as if they had been run over a by an ice cream truck that was driven by Klaus Nomi and John Sex while the former was inseminating the latter with AIDS. In other words, the flagrantly fairy-like fellows featured in Wittenstein’s fairly politically incorrect flick are not even fit to shine Eddie ‘Lemmy Caution’ Constantine’s shoes, or so the outmoded pseudo-alpha-male protagonist of the film discovers as he watches in compulsively cynical horror as his beloved city degenerates into one big gigantic fag New Romanticiſt-esque fashion show where traditional film noir men fall prey to salacious sluts with dyke haircuts who prefer jumping the bones of androgynous wimps that wear more makeup than they do. While a regime of logical science where free thought, love, poetry, and emotion are banned rules in the titular dystopian metropolis featured in Godard’s Alphaville, Wittenstein’s film features a pompous poof urban pandemonium where radio networks dictate fashion sensibilities and a person’s worth is judged by how flamboyantly they dress. Indeed, Betaville may not make any serious statements about the collective Weltschmerz that is plaguing the metaphysical corpse that is Occidental man, but it does provide charming and witty campy fun and offers the closest thing to a neo-noir equivalent to Mark L. Lester's Class of 1984 (1982), Troma's Class of Nuke 'Em High (1986), Stanley Lewis's Punk Vacation (1990), and various other 1980s cult flicks where the bad guys resembled rabid psychopathic punks. Somewhat bizarrely, the fashion victims in Wittenstein's film probably most resemble those featured in the aberrosexual hardcore porn flick Squalor Motel (1985) directed by tranny pornographer Kim Christy. Surely the most intriguing short but sweet avant-garde micro-noir since Cabaret Voltaire scored 22-minute celluloid cult item Johnny YesNo (1982) directed by Peter Care, Betaville is probably the most pleasantly playful cinematic work on the fringes on the Cinema of Transgression movement.

BETAVILLE

Betaville begins with protagonist 'Coman Gettme' (Steve Ostringer) driving around in his car with a little lady simply known as 'The Girl' (Holly Adams of Richard Kern's Horoscope (1991) and Charles Pinion's Red Spirit Lake (1993)), who he states to, "I'm glad we're outta that pile of transistors" and "You're lucky I had some business there...Or you'd still be plucking at those circuit boards with those little tweezers." Indeed, as depicted in a black-and-white flashback scene from the day before, Coman saved the girl by picking her up from the pavement and giving her a lift in his car after she was thrown to the concrete in pouring down rain after her fat old factory manager caught her reading a Superman comic when she was supposed to be putting together transistors like her fellow serfs in the futuristic sweatshop where she worked. As demonstrated by the fact that scenes set in the Girl's home are in black-and-white, the female lead is from a place that resembles Godard's Alphaville and which Coman describes as a "Bauhausian boobyhatch" and "technological tour-de-farce." A sort of metropolitan nationalist that loathes leaving his home turf, Coman loves his city and is quite vocal about this love as reflected in his remark to the Girl, "I've never really loved anything except this city. The graphics on the neighborhood drugstore...The linoleum in the lobby of the Bijou...The curious expressions on the faces of the kids...The lonely ladies on the barstools...The lonely men that try to talk to them...The sound of the garbage trucks in the morning...The traffic in midday...And the sirens at night. Out of it all, everything's different...interesting...it gives me something to think about. Some people say it is all a bit too much...But to me, anything else is a bit too little." Unbeknownst to citylicker Coman, a pernicious plague has infested Betaville and when he finally arrives back to his hometown, the social cancer of underground fashion trends will completely consume the hopelessly vain and stupid Girl, who comes from a literally colorless world where reading a stupid comic book will get you thrown in the street like a pile of rotting garbage.

Upon sneaking the Girl into Betaville by hiding her under his dashboard since she does not have a passport to show a border guard (who is actually a dubious blonde chick in disguise who will stalk the protagonist for the rest of the film), Coman turns on the radio and is distressed to discover that every single station is playing what he describes as, “the same lousy tune.” Indeed, the radio stations are spreading a message of authoritarian ‘fashionism’ as reflected in one announcer’s ludicrously languidly spoken declaration, “Green may not be worn with blue. Fashion is the dictum of a free people. The substance of a nation is style.” As Coman states, “Betaville’s always been a place where a guy can feel at home... Full of quaint little bars and cafes where you can feel human again,” but little does the protagonist realize that his beloved hometown has been invaded by hedonistic homos, fierce fag hags, and pretentious postmodernist artists and that he will soon will feel like nothing more than outmoded human garbage that fell out of fashion decades ago. While Coman hopes to take the Girl to his favorite diner to get some home-style chipped beef not longer after arriving back to Betaville, he only finds a disappointing modern pizza joint that has pretentious painters, New Wave hookers, and swarthy Guido-esque pimps lurking around it. While eating slices of pizza with the girl at the less than class pizza place, Coman has his first encounter with what he less than flatteringly describes as, “the new elite... nouveau homos, so to speak.” Indeed, Coman is approached by three particularly pompous-looking poofs, including a longhaired chap carrying a purse and sporting an extra tight blue sports bra, a sort of sod pseudo-sailor with a silver glittery ‘uniform,’ and funny fellow in a giant yellow suit jacket and swarthy complexion that the protagonist describes as looking like “Reginald Van Gleason III from Mars.” Needless to say, Coman is disgusted when the Girl licks her lips at the perennially posturing queersome threesome, especially after ‘Reginald’ gives her an invitation to a show, though the protagonist is also somewhat confused by the entire dubious encounter, thinking to himself, “I couldn’t figure if they were after the girl... or just trying to bone me.” As Coman narrates, “going to a party with these futuristic fops of the funny pages wasn’t exactly what I had in mind,” but he is willing to do anything to please the girl, especially after he takes her back to his apartment at a place called the ‘Skyline’ and she jumps his bones. Indeed, like most film noir heros, Coman seems fairly hopeless when it comes to reading the minds of the members of the opposite sex, but luckily the Girl takes it upon herself to change into some lingerie, sit on his desk in a provocative fashion, and then literally jump into his lap, thus making it quite clear to the protagonist what she really wants. Unfortunately for Coman, it is not only the first but also the last night he will be spending with the Girl.

The next day, Coman is rather dismayed when he takes the Girl to a seemingly pessimistic place called ‘Schopenhauer Square Park’ and discovers it has been transformed into a landfill. Indeed, it seems that the bombastically dressed beta boys that have infiltrated that city not only have poor taste in clothing and haircuts, but philosophy as well. Out of supposedly sheer “masochistic curiosity,” Coman decides to take the Girl to the club that fashion victim Reginald gave the latter an invite to and naturally the protagonist is surprised to see the patently preposterously sight of a group of New Romanticiſt ſtyle perverts dancing to generic synthesizer-driven New Wave music. While the Girl wallows in the entertainment and dances provocatively with various strange and seemingly queer men, Coman eventually “decides to make a quick getaway” and leaves by himself after suffering the shame of dancing all by his lonesome for a minute or two while sticking out like a sore thumb next to all the cyber-punk fashionistas at the club. After shooting a man dead for daring to break a bottle over his head after he simply asks him for a light, the rather reluctantly lovelorn Coman becomes somewhat emotionally vulnerable and attempts to call the Girl, but she says literally nothing and immediately hangs up on him upon picking up the phone because she wants to continue making love to and drinking wine with some borderline tranny in a glittery outfit with an absolutely appalling avant-garde Jew-fro. At this point, Coman rightly realizes that he is a “stranger in this town,” but rather wrongly assumes that the Girl needs to be saved by him because she is supposedly “naïve and vulnerable” when, in fact, she is a cold and calculating femme fatale cunt who wants him dead. Meanwhile, Coman realizes that a strange blonde (director Wittenstein) has been stalking him, which he finds somewhat annoying since he, “hates blondes.”

BETAVILLE

While hoping that the Girl will realize that Betaville has transformed into a perturbingly preposterous “postmodern nightmare” as a result of “fashion” (or what he describes as “contamination”), Coman has let love contaminate his mind and is suffering from a stereotypical heterosexual film noir hero delusion that ultimately gets him killed. Indeed, in the film’s intentionally anti-climatic climax, Coman senselessly runs inside a futuristic building to save the Girl even though he has no clue as to who and/or what awaits him inside the seemingly pernicious place. In the end, Coman is immediately shot dead when he enters the building and comes face to face with his ladylove, who barely even bothers to acknowledge him upon killing him. After shooting Coman, the Girl hands her murder weapon to the mysterious blonde woman and somehow the gun manages to vanish in thin air immediately after being placed on the golden girl’s palm. After a scene featuring close-up headshots of various automaton-like fashion victims, including the Girl, who seem like they they are a New Romanticiſt equivalent to the extraterrestrial alien duplicates in Invasion of the Body Snatchers, the film concludes with an audio recording of Coman stating, “This isn’t in exactly what I had in mind.”

It should be noted that Betaville is the first chapter in a satirical lo-fi sci-fi trilogy entitled Multiple Futures starring Holly Adams that was followed by No Such Thing As Gravity (1989) and The Deflowering (1994). In fact, although these films are more of sequels in terms of theme as opposed to characters and storyline, Wittenstein later decided to combine all three films and release them as the 100-minute feature Multiple Futures (1995). While I cannot really comment on The Deflowering since I could not locate a copy (though I do know that it features a quote from Guido commie theorist Antonio Gramsci’s posthumously published work Prison Notebooks), No Such Thing As Gravity is notable for featuring the special novelty of featuring Cinema of Transgression anti-messiah Nick Zedd portraying a fairly normal and level-headed hero, as well as featuring one-time Warhol superstar Taylor Mead (Gregory J. Markopoulos' The Illiac Passion, Warhol's Lonesome Cowboy) and eccentric dwarf Michael J. Anderson of David Lynch fame in a rare pre-Twin Peaks role. Somewhat strangely for someone that collaborated with Mr. Zedd and was associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement, director Wittenstein would go on to become both a yoga teacher for babies and a member of her father's law firm Wittenstein & Wittenstein in Queens, NYC. Of course, a good portion of the appeal of Wittenstein's films charm and potency are a result of the neo-retro sci-fi visuals, which were created by Steve Ostringer, who also co-wrote all the scripts, thus they are, at best, collaborative works between two main individuals and not true auteur pieces. While not exactly the most bizarre of the various neo-noir flicks associated with the No Wave and Cinema of Transgression movements (Mexican-born auteur Manuel DeLanda's Raw Nerves: A Lacanian Thriller (1980) is simply one of the most one of the most preternatural and absurd neo-noir pieces ever made), Betaville is arguably the most addicting, especially for cinephiles, including someone like myself who does not exactly have a hard-on for Godard or Alphaville. Far too tongue-in-cheek and just plain goofy to be truly subversive despite its overt anti-technocratic message (indeed, one could argue that the film is a direct attack against Italian Futurism, even if seems to be somewhat aesthetically influenced by Futurist flicks like Thais (1917) directed by Anton Giulio Bragaglia), Wittenstein's short is like the NYC underground equivalent of a Friedberg and Seltzer flick, albeit actually sometimes humorous and witty and with an actual smidgen of artistic integrity. More or less feeling like the quite curious result of a heterosexual Jewish American princess who wanted to rebel against her hopelessly bourgeois background by attempting to create a campy sci-fi flick in the spirit of the films of underground queer goyim filmmakers like the Kuchar brothers and Jack Smith, Betaville ultimately makes art fags seem like a menace that is ten times worse than the plague, which is certainly something I can appreciate, especially in our real-life dystopian era when there is a rather queen-ish double-bastard as the U.S. president who decided to display his own aesthetic (and possibly sexual) sensibilities when he had the White House lit up with gay rainbow lights. While I rather much prefer re-watching Kamikaze 1989 (1982) featuring Fassbinder in his very last acting role when I am feeling inclined to see a sardonically satirical cyber-punk flick, Wittenstein's film deserves to be credited as the closest thing to a Blade Runner of the Cinema of Transgression scene. Of course, like Ridley Scott's classic cult film, Betaville is inordinately memorable and begs for repeat viewings.

-Ty E

AROUND FLESH, TRASH /& HEAT
AROUND FLESH, TRASH /& HEAT

Amaury Voslion (2003)

Aside from the book The Films of Paul Morrissey (1993) written by Maurice Yacowar – which is the only serious academic study of the Warhol Factory filmmaker – and the feature-length ‘video-memoir’ document Factory Days: Paul Morrissey Remembers the Sixties (2006), the French documentary anthology Around Flesh, Trash & Heat (2003) by French documentarian filmmaker Amaury Voslion is indubitably one of the best sources for information on the “Paul Morrissey Trilogy” produced by Andy Warhol. Around Flesh, Trash & Heat also features information on Morrissey’s experience as the manager of The Velvet Underground and Nico, footage from the famous concert The Exploding Plastic Inevitable that took in NYC in May 1967 directed by Ronald Nameth, and the 36-minute documentary Scenes from the life of Andy Warhol: Friends and Intersections (1982) directed by Jonas Mekas (Reminiscences of a Journey to Lithuania, Lost Lost Lost). Quite frankly, the films by Nameth and Mekas add virtually nothing to Around Flesh, Trash & Heat and reflect the sort of Warholian monster that has followed Paul Morrissey throughout his career, thereupon giving credit where credit is not due because the Warhol brandname was written in large letters for films the pop-con-artist had no part in writing, filming, or directing. As Morrissey once stated, “Andy would just give me the money and let me do what I wanted. He had an encouraging tendency, always asking what he could do for you...He wasn’t stupid but he didn’t come across intelligent. But he was. He knew what he could do and what he couldn’t.” After directing, editing, shooting, and distributing so-called Warhol films like Chelsea Girls (1966), I, a Man (1967), Bike Boy (1967), The Nude Restaurant (1967), and Lonesome Cowboys (1968), Morrissey was finally able to develop a distinctive and pioneering auteur style of filmmaking with a gritty and sometimes grating ‘anti-aesthetic’ that complimented the filmmaker’s astute satire and social commentary on the sexual revolution and counter-culture movements that were terribly trendy at that time. As a proud and uncompromising right-wing conservative, Morrissey was able to do the seemingly impossible while working with virtually nil budget by making curiously campy comedies that de-romanticized and deconstructed the gutter-level glamour of sex, drugs, & rock ‘n’ roll, which amusingly generally appealed to the sort of viewers that they lampooned. Needless to say, with his relatively successful career in comedic filmmaking, Paul Morrissey inevitably had the last laugh.

As Morrissey explains in the segment “About Flesh” in Around Flesh, Trash & Heat, Andy Warhol was the one giving the budding conservative filmmaker the encouragement to make the first film in his classic trilogy Flesh (1968). While working as a manager at the Warhol Factory, Morrissey was responsible for gathering up Warhol Superstars as extras for the later infamous pseudo-Warhol-esque hippie artist party scene (which features Viva, Ultra Violet, etc.) in John Schlesinger's Midnight Cowboy (1969). After Morrissey explained to Warhol that Midnight Cowboy was about a male prostitute (a subject previously covered by Warhol in the 1965 film My Hustler), the pop-artist recommended to his young 'protégé' that he beat John Schlesinger to the chance and make an independent cinematic work in a similar vein, but releasing it before to the Hollywood film. Of course, Morrissey did and the film was Flesh (1968) starring then-relatively unknown hustler-turned-actor Joe Dallesandro in the lead role. As Morrissey explains in Around Flesh, Trash & Heat, Flesh was the first film in cinema history where an audience was handcuffed and arrested after a Nigerian distributor made the mistake of having the film screened in jolly old England. Little Joe would also go on to star in the second two films in the Paul Morrissey Trilogy as well: Trash (1970) and Heat (1972). Ironically, for a film that literally describes the counter-culture it sardonically spoofs as "worthless garbage" with its title, Trash would be described by Rolling Stone magazine in 1970 as the "Best Film of the Year" and turned Dallesandro into a sex icon among youth culture and the so-called sexual revolution.

As he clearly states in Around Flesh, Trash & Heat, what ties all the films in Morrissey's trilogy together, aside from Dallesandro's presence, is that all the films feature a "world where sex is dead" due the fact that the lead character is a product/victim of the sexual revolution (aka sex, drugs, rock 'n' roll) because, as an idiot idealist who bought into mindless hedonism, he has become a heroin addict who can't get an erection, even with all the pussy and cocks that are incessantly waved in front of his face. Each one of the films focuses on the three main ingredients of the sexual revolution: Flesh being about sex, Trash being about drugs, and Heat being about rock 'n' roll with the films in the Paul Morrissey trilogy offering a less than nostalgic view of this trend that still lingers today among youth. Despite being constantly described as a loose remake of Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard (1950), Morrissey described the final film in his trilogy Heat as being intrinsically influenced by Josef von Sternberg's The Blue Angel (1930) aka Der blaue Engel starring Emil Jannings and Marlene Dietrich, albeit with the gender roles reversed (instead of a young cabaret whore using and destroying an esteemed educator like in Sternberg's film, a drugged-out would-be-rock-star uses a washed-up actress to finance his career) with Sylvia Miles and Joe Dallesandro as the stars. In Heat, the anti-hero Joey Davis (Dallesandro) – a hustler and former child star – wants to jumpstart his rock star career so he superficially seduces an older Sally Todd (Miles) with the most patently pitiable yet perversely playful of results. Naturally, Paul Morrissey would continue to satirize the complete and utter worthlessness and corrosiveness of liberalism and counter-culture with his more professionally directed works like Forty Deuce (1982), Mixed Blood (1985), and Spike of Bensonhurst (1988).

As Paul Morrissey makes quite clear in Around Flesh, Trash & Heat, he almost singlehandedly ran Warhol's factory for a number of years, but especially everything and anything related to filmmaking. Eventually, Morrissey became the manager and producer of The Velvet Underground and even made the crucial recommendation of adding German singer Nico (born Christa Päffgen), thereupon resulting in the film The Velvet Underground and Nico: A Symphony of Sound (1966), the revolutionary 'art rock' album The Velvet Underground & Nico (1967) and the seemingly thaumaturgic and quasi-psychedelic multi-media event The Exploding Plastic Inevitable (1966-1967), where the Factory filmmaker (with the help of forgotten filmmaker Danny Williams) would project footage he shot on the wall while the band performed. As Morrissey explained, in the documentary Factory Days: Paul Morrissey Remembers the Sixties (2006), The Velvet Underground inevitably disbanded because Lou Reed had a pestering and overwhelming jealousy of Nico, but the filmmaker would continue to work as the singer's manager for some time thereafter. Essentially, Around Flesh, Trash & Heat makes for a great introduction to the work, philosophy, and influence of Paul Morrissey, especially in regard to his original trilogy, so it is a shame that the French documentary is not exactly easily accessible, which is undoubtedly another sign of Andy Warhol's undeserved and unearned legacy haunting the anti-revolutionary revolutionary auteur filmmaker's work.

AROUND FLESH, TRASH /& HEAT

-Ty E

DEVARIM

Amos Gitai* (1995)

Devarim is the first film I have viewed from Israel. It takes a realist aesthetic to provide a very intimate look into the lives of three Israeli's and their hang-ups entering middle age. Devarim is sort of like Federico Fellini's I Vitelloni except more centered around desperation and less flamboyant. Director Amos Gitai seems to have also taken cues from the Italian neorealists, French New Wave, and even German New Wave. The shot composition of the film is very standard (reminding me of Fassbinder) and used to focus the scenes on the intense (yet for the most part monotone) drama between characters. Many shots featuring no dialogue and a character simply walking down the street in a lonely way. Most conversations in Devarim are quite dark as suicide and the inevitability of death are discussed quite often. It is interesting seeing personal drama Tel Aviv while knowing that the IDF is trying to hunt down "militants" in the same city. These topics are only briefly discussed. Devarim is not going to appeal to most audiences as it is up to the viewer to derive meaning from the film. Although intellectually stimulating, the film is quite dark and depressing. The older the character in the film, the more they have realized the torment of life and it's unpredictable tragedies. Suicide becomes the only way to beat death at it's own game as one character in Devarim brings up. An older woman in the film brings up her lifelong belief in atheism and she is obviously unhappy. Does it hurt one to believe in something false and die happy? Director Amos Gitai might have promise as a director as he develops his niche with each subsequent film he creates (of course I would have to see his others). I can respect any director that can turn nothing into something. Paul Morrissey, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Giuseppe Andrews, and Pier Paolo Pasolini are some directors I truly respect for that reason. Exploding heads become old very quickly.

-Ty E

FIONA
FIONA

Amos Kollek* (1998)

Unquestionably, Amos Kollek (Goodbye, New York, Fast Food Fast Women) is one of the worst Israeli filmmakers who has ever lived which certainly says a lot. Indeed, Israeli cinema as a whole pretty much discredits the stereotype that the members of god's chosen tribe make better filmmakers. It should be noted that Kollek is not just any random Hebrew, as he is the son of Hungarian-born Hebraic politician Theodor "Teddy" Kollek who, on top of being named in tribute to Zionist founder Theodor Herzl and being the longtime mayor of Jerusalem (1965 - 1993), was once described as "the greatest builder of Jerusalem since Herod." In fact, the director even made a documentary about his father with the rather lazy title Teddy Kollek (1995). Indubitably, any talent Teddy might have had as a keen observer of society and culture was lost on his seemingly prodigal son Amos, who has dedicated his life to making innately immoral quasi-pornographic smut disguised as socially redeeming avant-garde cinema. Indeed, a sort of Judaic Abel Ferrara meets a less pretentious Henry Jaglom, Kollek largely makes pseudo-controversial failed cult films that only seem to be released in Europe revolving around a tragic female protagonist in trouble who is more or less a pathetic product of the society in which she lives. In his rightfully long forgotten would-be-cult-hit Forever, Lulu (1987), Kollek demonstrated just how truly untalented he is by making a film starring Fassbinder's muse Hanna Schygulla and Deborah 'Blondie' Harry that actually manages to be singularly unsexy, reliably banal, and sickeningly soulless. Indeed, despite being from the same tribe as kosher funnymen like the Marx Brothers, Woody Allen, and Harmony Korine, Kollek somehow absurdly thought that titillating Teuton Schygulla would be capable of playing a comedic lead. While I am convinced that Kollek has less artistic talent than his religious brother Michael Bay, he has made a handful of films that are reasonably entertaining, if not for all the wrong reasons. Indeed, Fiona (1998), starring the director's dud-diva Anna Levine (aka 'Anna Thomsen')—a mostly untalented yet artificially busted art-house pseudo-superstar who has starred in works ranging from Mary Harron's feminist filmic feces I Shot Andy Warhol (1996) and French fag auteur François Ozon's decidedly disappointing Fassbinder adaptation Water Drops on Burning Rocks (2000) where she plays a post-op tranny—is a plainly pathetic celluloid turd that pretends to be a "hard drama" about a drug-addled bisexual hooker that reeks of moral retardation and sordid and sleazy sensationalism, as a work of hokey 'hookersploitation' in a gritty realist quasi-documentary-like style that is undeniably entertaining but has about as much artistic merit as fossilized dog dung.

Fiona (Anna Levine) is a sassy streetwalker with a voracious appetite for drugs and pussy who seems like she has had a lot of plastic surgery done despite the fact she is more or less a down-and-out bum who crashes at her bull dyke lesbian friends' seedy apartments. Fiona's sorry lot in life started practically after birth when her hooker mother abandoned her as a baby by leaving her in a NYC alley in her stroller. As she describes the event, "I remember being left out on the street by my mother. Most people don't think a 6 month old baby can remember anything, but I really do. I remember everything. She left me there to die, I mean...I remember the feeling. Only her face I don't remember so clearly. It was hidden by glasses." Probably partially due to the fact that she was eventually adopted by a family of which the father routinely raped her, Fiona would love to put a bullet in the brain of her biological mother. Due to being molested at such a young age, Fiona came to the conclusion that, "sex is the answer to everything" and that she will use her decidedly defiled body to, "get out of this miserable place." Unfortunately, prostitution has only landed her in a personal pandemonium involving drug addiction, carpet-munching, self-destruction, suicide attempts, and inevitably death. To make a little bit of cash, Fiona is willing to do more than just peddle her overused gash, as she does things like lick the toes of her bull-dyke friend to satisfy more particular patrons. Fiona is also an ungrateful little lady, as she describes a young male that saves her life during a suicide attempt as a "secondary creature." Indeed, as a victim of regular sexual abuse, Fiona prefers to be around lady-licker junkies and crackheads as opposed to a male that seems genuinely concerned about her safety.

During one of the most absurd scenes of Fiona, the heroin-addled eponymous anti-heroine pulls a gun on a poor man's Mickey Rourke who she seems to fancy in the middle of a busy restaurant. Indeed, despite initially threatening to kill the Rourke-wannabe, she saves him from prison time by killing a couple cops that show up to arrest him, stating of her nonsensical actions, "I shot them because I hate cops...pure and simple...I just acted instinctively; I didn't think or anything. Some things I've done I am sure I shouldn't have done but I really can't make any apologies. I've always just went with my emotions. I'm not really a coldhearted person or anything." Indeed, retarded Rourke flatters Fiona in his own sleazy NYC proletarian way by remarking to her, "Why do you talk like that...like your mouth is right out of the sewer? You know what...cuz you're not like that. I can tell...underneath all of this you're like a sweet tender person...I know this." Of course, he eventually blows Fiona off, even though she wastes a couple pigs for him, thus aborting their romance before it even begins. Unquestionably, Fiona's greatest love affair is with a 30-year-old fellow hooker junky who lost her "life in a couple months" after her husband was imprisoned for drug charges and her little boy was taken away, thus she now lives an unhinged life off the grid. Of course, Fiona's loser lady-lover friend eventually overdoses on junk, but like most tragedies in her life, the forsaken streetwalker gets over her premature death rather quickly.

In a rather unlikely scenario of seemingly magical happenstance, Fiona bumps into her mother at a restaurant, though she does not realize until it is too late that she is the woman who give birth to and subsequently abandoned her. Indeed, after paying her super sub-homely crackhead mommy a penny to dance for her, Fiona unwittingly makes incestuous mother-daughter love with her equally perverse progenitor. Rather unfortunately, by the time Fiona wakes up the next day and finds her own baby picture near her bed, mommy dearest has already committed suicide by jumping off a building. Of course, like all the horrible things that happen in her loser life, Fiona does not seem particularly affected by the rather senseless death of her mother. After blowing off a young bourgeois boy who tells her that he loves her and asks for her hand in marriage, Fiona decides to steal a vintage red Chevy and head to a near-elderly black cop's apartment who she previously befriended. Although he is married and plans to start a bed-and-breakfast with his wife when he retires, the colored cock agrees to drop his spouse and head to California with Fiona using cash he stole from drug busts. While the black pig packs stuff and tells his wife that he is leaving her, Fiona heads to a convenience where she regularly steals worthless junk food like Doritos and she is shot by the racially ambiguous brown untermensch storeowner while attempting to make her getaway. While Fiona and her spade sugar daddy begin their journey to California, the hopelessly unlucky hooker assumedly dies from her wounds on the way. In the end, Fiona ends pseudo-poetically with a shot of Fiona as a baby in a stroller, as if to demonstrate that she was not always a Sapphic cum-fueled scumbag. If one learns anything from the film, it is the rather obvious fact that trash begets trash, with Fiona being no different from the worthless crackhead mother that she hated for abandoning her.

FIONA

Somewhat in the aesthetic spirit of the Warhol-produced "Paul Morrissey Trilogy" (Flesh, Trash, Heat), albeit minus Joe Dallesandro's dong and a sardonically hilarious anti-counter-culture essence, Fiona is the unintentionally entertaining result of what happens when a morally vacant perennial dilettante pretends to make a serious, socially-conscious film about cliché urban plagues ranging from prostitution to drug addiction just so he can get his lead actress naked as many times as possible. Indeed, somewhat resembling an anorexic drag queen with bigger silicone tits than brains, lead Anna Levine is certainly responsible for any charisma or entertainment value the film might have, albeit in a fashion comparable to that of chimp drinking its own piss or one of the countless phony black scientist characters in Hollywood movies. Featuring insanely insipid dialogue like a scene where a braindead crackhead makes the elementary school joke, "Why can a prostitute make more money than a crack dealer? All she's gotta do is wash off her crack and use it again," Fiona really has to be seen to be believed as a rare ostensible arthouse work that is so bad, it's almost good. If you're looking for a fucked urban hooker-on-heroin flick somewhat in the dispiriting spirit of Abel Ferrara, albeit more needlessly nihilistic and minus the glaring McWop Catholic guilt, Fiona is probably your film. As a work directed by the son of the ex-mayor of the Jewish capital of the world, Kollek's film also acts as a sort of accidental aberrant allegory from America as a whole. Indeed, acting as a sort of cinematic pimp, Zionist Israeli Kollek coerced a bunch of real goy crackheads and prostitutes to exploit their unglory in America's unofficial Jewish capital. Somewhat notably, with his later equally recklessly wanton and witless work Restless (2008)—a film that managed to upset some Israelis due to its sometimes unflattering depictions of Israelites—Kollek would depict the strong Judaic connection between NYC and the unholy holyland. While Kollek's feelings towards Israel are somewhat ambiguous at best, his love of drug-addled pussy-peddlers is undeniable as demonstrated by the plodding yet sometimes playful softcore poverty-and-prostitution porn piece that is Fiona.

-Ty E

THE FOREIGNER
THE FOREIGNER

Amos Poe (1978)

Just as it had influenced a number of New German Cinema filmmakers and their early films, including Alexander Kluge with his debut feature Abschied von gestern (1966) aka Yesterday Girl and Rainer Werner Fassbinder with his debut feature Liebe ist kälter als der Tod (1969) aka Love is Colder Than Death, the French New Wave would have a crucial influence on the New York City underground, especially the No Wave Cinema movement. Indeed, the movement's founder was arguably Israeli-born auteur Amos Poe (Subway Riders, Triple Bogey on a Par Five Hole) who early works Night Lunch (1975) and The Blank Generation (1976) were more or less punk rock homemovies starring then-unknown musicians ranging from the Ramones to Richard Hell to Blondie and whose first narrative feature Unmade Beds (1976) was the sort of À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless of the No Wave scene, with the art fag protagonist absurdly believing that he is Jean-Paul Belmondo's character from Godard's flick (in fact, when the film was released on DVD by Eclectic DVD Distribution, it featured the tagline, "Godard's BREATHLESS re-made by the avatar of the "New" New Wave!"). Of course, not unlike Kluge and Fassbinder, Poe did not really become an intriguing filmmaker until he began to dispose of his fetish for the frog filmmakers of La Nouvelle Vague. In fact, with his second narrative feature The Foreigner (1978) starring French-born auteur Eric Mitchell (Kidnapped, Underground U.S.A.), Poe virtually single-handedly gave birth to the No Wave movement, or as the film's female lead Patti Astor—an underground actress turned gallery owner whose real-life promotion of urban negro culture is reflected in Charlie Ahearn's proto-hip-hop flick Wild Style (1983)—stated in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Céline Danhier, "You really have to give Amos Poe the credit for starting the next independent film movement after Andy Warhol." Even Poe himself credits the film as inspiring all of his compatriots in the NYC underground as revealed by his remarks in Blank City, but more importantly said compatriots have also said the same thing. While para-punk auteur Scott B (Black Box, Vortex) said of the flick, "THE FOREIGNER was very fast, very tough and really there in the moment," alpha-hipster Jim Jarmusch was even more generous when he stated, "One of my favorite films, that actually encouraged me to make films, was Amos Poe's THE FOREIGNER. When I saw that, in 1978 or so, I got really inspired because he had made a feature film for about $5,000. It was so loose and raw, so close to the idea of the music of the late Seventies - so-called punk music where musicianship wasn't important, virtuosity wasn't the main criterion, it was "I have something I want to express." It's a very loose story about a guy, played by Eric Mitchell, who's being chased most of the film. He has real short hair, bleached blond, and there's a great scene where he's walking down an alley and he walks by Debbie Harry, who plays a hooker; she's really gorgeous and she has a cigarette and she says, "You got a light, blondie?" I haven't seen it in years, but it really gave me a lot of energy. It was my favorite New York punk movie - I hate to use that kind of label - of that period."

Somewhat ironically, despite being directed by a Hebraic hipster that was born in Tel Aviv, The Foreigner, not unlike Poe's subsequent feature Subway Riders (1981), owes a great deal of its style and aesthetic potency to its Austrian-born Germanic assistant director, associate DP, and editor Johanna Heer, who went on to shoot important European cult works like Hungarian auteur Gábor Bódy's epic punk swansong Kutya éji dala (1983) aka The Dog's Night Song and the kaleidoscopic kraut flick Decoder (1984) directed by Muscha and featuring various drug-addled cult figures like Christiane Felscherinow, FM Einheit, a pre-tranny Genesis P-Orridge, and even William S. Burroughs. Not unlike Subway Riders and Decoder, The Foreigner features a sort of highly stylized low-budget neo-Expressionist aesthetic with Warholian undertones. Luckily, the Aryan influences do not end there, as the film is about a nihilistic European blond beast that comes to NYC as a sort of disgraced terrorist agent to get away from his continental compatriots, but ultimately finds himself alone recording himself reading Hermann Hesse in his hotel room and suffering from a decidedly debilitating case of Weltschmerz. A sort of neo-Expressionist punk anti-noir (or 'no noir') with vague horror elements where perennial loneliness, malignant paranoia, collective social autism, senseless nihilistic violence, and sexual and romantic dysfunction are the name of the game, Poe's film is like a cryptically Teutonized No Wave equivalent to Godard's Alphaville (1965), albeit starring a frog in an American film as opposed to a American in a frog film, meets Hesse's novel Steppenwolf (1927) and Albert Camus' novel The Stranger (1942) with a tad bit of metaphysical influence from The Rebel (1951). While probably not a masterpiece of any sort outside of the mostly mediocre No Wave realm, The Foreigner is a goldmine for fans of punk as a work that features the members of the proto-psychobilly group The Cramps giving the film's lead a sadomasochistic beating that is nothing if not fetishistic, among various other distinctly memorable moments that demonstrate what true cult cinema is all about. Also, the musical score by Czech-American musician Ivan Král (who previously co-directed The Blank Generation with Poe) is actually quite good and certainly infinitely superior to the sort of degenerate pseudo-avant-garde jazz that plagues much of Poe's films and No Wave cinema in general.

The Foreigners somewhat fittingly begins on Halloween 1977 with angst-ridden antihero 'Max Menace' (No Wave auteur Eric Mitchell with his hair dyed bleach blond)—a moody and broody European spy/terrorist of the seemingly innately inept sort that looks like the morbidly depressed loser grandson of Laurence Olivier—arriving in NYC via airplane in a slightly tacky all-white suit and walking through an airport in a scene juxtaposed with increasingly ominous ambient noise that hints that the character is about to enter a sort of metaphysical pandemonium that he will probably not survive. When Max is picked up by a taxi, he answers virtually everyone of the driver's questions with a simple robotic "yes," as if he is plagued by paranoia and would prefer not to giveaway personal details. Max wants to go to Manhattan, but when the taxi driver asks him the specific location he is headed to, he curiously replies, "Just drive." Unbeknownst to Max, the taxi driver, who is dressed like a leather-fag, is actually an operative of a dubious unnamed group of druggo punks led by a faggy fellow named 'King Bag' aka 'Shake' (painter Duncan Hannah, who played the lead role in Poe's first feature Unmade Beds) that wants to hunt down the lead for an unexplained reason. Of course, it is also unexplained as to why he has flown to NYC or what he plans to do there, but it seems pretty obvious from the beginning that he will be dead by the end in an unfriendly city where social alienation is a way of life and where sensitive souls have no chance of surviving. Not long after arriving in the shitty east coast city, Max meets a kraut contact on a beach (German photographer Klaus Mettig) who tells him when he asks if he can still help him, "Well, I tell you, for the moment it is practically impossible. The police and the underground are constantly harassing us. I'm not in such a hot position either, but I'll give you the name of a friend that might help you, but be careful." As Max will soon discover, he is majorly fucked as he is ultimately led on a merry-go-round of abject neglect and apathy where each contact he encounters proves to be more worthless than the last, not to mention the fact that a motley crew of deranged punk rock dope fiends are attempting to hunt him down.

THE FOREIGNER

Max may be a murderous spy of sorts, but he gets a kick out of watching punk docs while lying around the seedy hotel room he is renting. Indeed, after watching a performance of "Fan Club" by UK punk band The Damned on a tiny black-and-white TV, Max listens to a narrator hilariously stating, "It is a rare punk performance that doesn't wind up with someone hurt or something destroyed, usually for no discernible reason. At this performance by The Damned, fans were having such fun crashing into each other that they ripped off the ceiling and the electrical wiring. It was the totally mindless action of which punk rockers seemed inordinately proud. They can't do anything else...they can destroy. They count it an accomplishment." The narrator of the doc also says something about punks that epitomizes the senselessly nihilistic psyches of Shake, describing them as follows, "What seems to worry the British is not that punk rock fans have rejected the older generation's values, but that they have rejected all values. They are anti-everything. They will tell you at the drop of a safety pin that they have no future and that society offers them nothing." As for Max, he is not so much "anti-everything" as he is just disillusioned with the world in general and everyone he encounters. If Max was not a misanthrope before, his time in NYC will certainly lead him to believing that a nuclear apocalypse might be exactly what humanity needs.

Unbeknownst to Max, an East Asian femme fatale in a skintight all-black leather outfit named 'Doll' (Anya Phillips of James Nares' Rome 78 (1978)) has paid a big bosomed broad named Fili Harlow (Patti Astor of Mitchell's Underground U.S.A. (1980) and Assault of the Killer Bimbos (1988)) five grand to follow him and everything he does and make sure he does not leave town. Meanwhile, Shake declares to his punk minions in regard to the eponymous protagonist, "The foreigner is for the birds. We're going to snip...snip his head off." As a bunch of bongo-playing pansies who wish they were James Dean and like to play with electric powerdrills, light off firecrackers that they have fastened to their butt-tight denim jeans, and say absurdly retarded pseudo-poetic things like, "...his clenched asshole warned me," Shake's sickeningly dress-conscious leather-clad sub-beta-males minions seem like a said excuse for a hermetic collective of assassins, but of course that is largely one of the things that largely gives the film its inordinately charming character and pathologically offbeat essence. As for Max, when he goes to see the contact that the kraut on the beach gave him, he discovers the fellow does not speak a word of English. When he goes to see another contact (Ronny Stefan) outside of a gay bar, he is rudely asked, "What do you think I am...the Salvation Army?," told "I can't help you," and warned, "Watch your ass." Likewise, upon meeting another contact sporting an absurd cowboy hat named 'Mr. Kool' (the film's cinematographer Chirine El Khadem, who was also the DP of Susan Seidelman's Smithereens (1982)) at the sight of the World Trade Center buildings, he is told "You're on your own." Naturally, virtually everyone else Max encounters tells him the same thing, so he begins to accept that he is a lone urban existentialist Euro-cowboy trapped in a city full of bloodthirsty assassins, schizophrenic fashion victims, babbling philistines, rabid mercenaries, cunt-chic femme fatales, and other various sorts of highly deleterious undesirables that are native to NYC.

When not attempting in vain to get help from worthless weirdos around the city, Max enjoys lying around his hotel room and listening to tape recordings he has made of himself. Indeed, Max seems particularly forlorn upon listening to a tape of himself somberly reciting, "When we dream that we dream, we're beginning to wake-up. Bourgeoisie civilization and all of its inanities are always a great joke. The dead...the dead do not discriminate. A coward cannot be free. A coward cannot lose. A coward cannot win. A coward cannot be. Each one carries the remains of his birth, slime and eggshells, with him to the end. That's Hermann Hesse." On the same recording, Max can also be heard bitching things like "every time I think I've found someone, they die" and "I'm only driven by eternal defeat," so it almost seems like he would not mind being assassinated and that his trip to NYC is really a form of unconscious suicide. Certainly, if nothing else, it seems that Max has listened to the Sex Pistols song "No Future" one too many times. When Max takes a ride on a ferry during one particularly sunny November day, he receives an old school shoeshine and is eventually approached by an annoyingly extroverted dame of the discernibly dubious sort named 'Zazu Weather' (French TV actress Terens Séverine) who talks him into going to a bar with her and eventually going back to her apartment with her where she ultimately makes him her personal prisoner. The first blatant sign that Zazu might be unhinged is when she complains, "White socks. I never like anything white. I hate it. It disgusts me" and then compliments Max on being filthy and recommends that he not take a bath, but then immediately goes on to complain about how she hates anything that is dirty or filthy and then demands that he take a bath. Not only does Zazu lock Max in her apartment, but she also deprives him of food for two days and ties him to a chair in a manner that makes him seem like the masochistic partner in a stereotypical game of BDSM. Luckily, Zazu is eventually killed while she is playfully eating a sandwich on her bed by a faceless assassin who shoots her about a dozen times. Naturally, Max celebrates Zazu's death by freeing himself from the chair he is tied to and finishing the sandwich that was in the bat-shit crazy broad's hand while she was getting shot. Unfortunately for Max, despite managing to escape from the wrath of Zazu, he is no less safe on the streets.

THE FOREIGNER

While walking down the street, a prostitute named 'Dee Trik' (Deborah Harry of Blondie) humorously asks Max, "Hey, Blondie. Have a cigarette?" and of course the protagonist obliges the beautiful street slut. After lighting her a cigarette, Ms. Trik repays Max by singing him a somber take on the German-language song "Bilbao Song" from Bertolt Brecht's and Kurt Weill's three-act commie musical comedy Happy End (1929) and then tells him "Thanks soldier." Not surprisingly, Max's brief yet solacing encounter with Dee Trik is probably the happiest moment the character has during the entire film, as everything goes drastically downhill from there as the protagonist is immersed in a deluge of visceral street violence. Indeed, shortly after his encounter with the pseudo-blonde streetwalker, Max is brutally beaten by the members of The Cramps in the bathroom of CBGBs while the band the Erasers plays on stage. Indeed, The Cramps singer Lux Interior even cuts off Max's shirt and then slices up his chest in a somewhat fetishistic fashion. Meanwhile, while looking for Max, who she has been stalking for most of the film, Harlow is knocked out by a faceless person after suffering the shock of discovering her Asiatic friend Doll dead. When Harlow wakes up, she discovers that Doll's corpse has mysteriously disappeared and immediately goes looking for Max. Upon arriving at Max's hotel room, Harlow warns him by shouting to him outside his door, "You're in big trouble, baby [...] Don't move until I come back. I'm the only one that can get you out of here alive." Of course, considering all the pain and suffering he has experienced at the hands of various nefarious ghetto-dwelling New Yorkers, Max hardly trusts Harlow and fails to take heed of her warning. In the end, Max is chased by a car as someone shoots at him while Harlow tries in vain to get to him before it is too late. Rather fittingly, Max is eventually shot in the back multiple times by Shake's goons while running through Battery Park. Upon collapsing from his wounds, Max grabs onto a fence and stares at the Statue of Liberty in a ending that might be described as quasi-poetically anti-American.

Notably, in a January 1981 interview with BOMB Magazine, Amos Poe somewhat pretentiously stated regarding his film, "THE FOREIGNER remains a mystery to me now, a very cloudy space where questions are allowed to go. Say you call it a genre, where the typical film tells a story by giving certain facts. THE FOREIGNER tells a story by leaving out the facts, a cloudy space where ambiguity, most fears, and emotions exist. If the film is successful at all, in any sense, it's only if that occurs, that type of mystery." To Poe's credit, the film's mystique does to some extent largely lie in its ambiguity and inexplicable foreboding atmosphere, but also its absurdity. Indeed, what is more absurd than a bunch of drug-addled hipster and punk degenerate portraying evil government agents and assassins who have been professionally trained to kill?! Of course, Poe's film is a work that emphasizes preternatural and pleasantly grating style over substance. In terms of its idiosyncratic take on Godard and the French New Wave, The Foreigner is certainly comparable to the early works of Fassbinder, especially his black-and-white 'Franz Walsch' gangster trilogy that includes Love Is Colder Than Death (1969), Gods of the Plague (1970), and The American Soldier (1970). Interestingly, Fassbinder superstar turned auteur Ulli Lommel came to the United States in the late-1970s and directed Blank Generation (1980), which, aside from sharing the same name as Poe's second doc and depicting the same NYC music scene (among other things, Richard Hell appears in both films), also features imperative No Wave influence Andy Warhol. Poe would also pay tribute to Fassbinder at the end of Subway Riders during a climatic scene with a shot of a movie theater marquee advertising the Teutonic auteur's classic (anti)Wirtschaftswunder film The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) starring Hanna Schygulla. Notably, both Poe/No Wave scene and Fassbinder would be somewhat linked together in a less than ideal fashion when short moon-faced blonde divas Schygulla and Deborah Harry co-starred together (with Patti Astor) in the botched pseudo-quirky comedy Forever, Lulu (1987) directed by Israeli degenerate Amos Kollek, who was clearly influenced by both Warhol/Morrissey and the filmmakers of the NYC underground like fellow Israeli Poe.

Somewhat respectably, Poe would reveal in an interview with BOMB Magazine that he felt his film influenced many other works of the No Wave scene, stating, "I think the B's intentionally or unintentionally copied THE FOREIGNER, in some of their films...there were a whole rash of films for a while about terrorists and kidnappings when that was in the news. Michael Oblowitz uses stereotypes and camera movements that are a lot like THE FOREIGNER's, except they're cleaner." Indeed, both Beth B and Scott B's oeuvre, as well as Oblowitz's early films like Minus Zero (1979) and King Blank (1983), feature various glaring aesthetic and thematic similarities with Poe's flick, albeit executed in a more sensational and, in turn, stupid and superficial way that would ultimately influence the filmmakers of the Cinema of Transgression movement, who also had a hard-on for Warhol yet had seemingly little interest in both the French New Wave and New German Cinema. While The Foreigner is certainly one of his best films, I believe that Poe did not reach his peak until his subsequent work Subway Riders, which highly benefited from featuring kaleidoscopic cinematography, cult character actors like Susan Tyrrell and John Waters superstar Cookie Mueller, and various idiosyncratic subplots. For a film that was shot guerilla-style in chronological order over the course of only eight days on a mere $5000 budget that the auteur procured via a phony car loan, Poe's gritty little 'No Noir' flick proves that a little bit of passion goes a long way when siring celluloid art. Interestingly, Poe is somewhat ambivalent of The Foreigner and his other early works being labelled 'No Wave,' or as the filmmaker stated in an interview with The Wall Street Journal, "The thing about making an experimental film is having enough stuff and then just going with the accident," he said. "You can look back and say it was all 'No Wave. We certainly didn't have a name for it at the time. We didn't feel part of anything." Admittedly, I can understand Poe's sentiment to a certain degree, as his film is far too 'cinematic' to be lumped in with the pseudo-avant-garde torture porn of Beth B and Scott B and glorified homemovies of Irish feminist Vivienne Dick, among various other examples. Ultimately, as a work that was shot at the World Trader Center buildings and various other iconic NYC landmarks, The Foreigner makes for a fitting film to watch on the upcoming anniversary of 9/11 attacks as a sort of modernist horror flick that, at least to some degree, does for the rotten Big Apple what Fritz Lang's M (1931) did for Weimar era Berlin. In the other hand, as a work that features European-Americans who express so-called 'xenophobic' sentiments against a curiously dressed European from the Old World, Poe's film will probably induce feelings of nostalgia in viewers who are not too keen on the fact that most American cities are degenerating into third world hellholes that would never produce real art or cinema movements, including those as minor as the No Wave.

THE FOREIGNER

-Ty E

SUBWAY RIDERS

Amos Poe (1981)

While I am not a big fan of their music, I have always had a special place in my heart for the hardcore punk band Fear because they not only enjoy pissing off morose leftist pussies by using fascistic imagery, but also because they wrote songs with excellent titles like “New York’s Alright If You Like Saxophones,” which they performed on Saturday Night Live on Halloween in 1981 in an infamous event where they incited a group of slam-dancing NYC-hating punks to hilariously cause $20,000 worth of damage to the studio. Of course, the song, which has great lyrics like “New York’s alright, If you like art and jazz...New York’s alright, If you’re a homosexual,” is clearly in reference to the too-cool-for-school ‘avant-garde’ No Wave scene, which was comprised of negrophiliac individuals who seemed incapable of directing a single film or composing a single song without including some pretentious saxophonist playing obnoxious discordant noise (apparently, certain half-crazed crippled NYC Hebrews are less tolerant of trumpets). Incidentally, the same year that Fear trashed the Saturday Night Live studio, NYC auteur Amos Poe (Unmade Beds, Alphabet City)—a French New Wave fanboy who has probably done more than any American filmmaker to influence the dreaded Mumblecore movement—released a film that epitomizes more than any other No Wave flick the racially and culturally nihilistic ‘white negro’ obsession with degenerate jazz. Indeed, Poe’s Subway Riders (1981) is a sort of unintended film-within-a-film about a hipster serial killer who lures in his victims with his saxophone playing when he is not penning a cryptically autobiographical screenplay about the same thing. A sort of more nihilistic and cynical NYC underground equivalent to the classic slasher flick Maniac (1980) starring Joe Spinell, this now obscenely outmoded NOIR-ish ‘hipster horror’ flick is quite arguably Poe’s most ambitious and aesthetically accomplished work to date, as a rare No Wave flick with a sometimes entrancing mise-en-scène, somewhat nuanced storyline, and fairly idiosyncratic characters who do not seem like neo-bohemian bums simply portraying themselves. Starring a number of prominent actors, including John Lurie (Stranger Than Paradise, Down By Law), Susan Tyrrell (Fat City, Forbidden Zone), tragic Warhol superstar/dope-dealer Cookie Mueller (Pink Flamingos, Desperate Living), avant-garde artist William ‘Bill’ Rice (Manhattan Love Suicides, Coffee and Cigarettes, and even Hollywood star Robbie Coltrane (GoldenEye, Harry Potter and the Sorcerer’s Stone) as a resentful cop with the cinephiliac name Fritz Langley, Subway Riders is like Fritz Lang’s M (1931) meets Warhol and Morrissey’s Chelsea Girls (1966) meets an adamantly anti-cop The French Connection (1971) meets a more metaphysically sick Taxi Driver (in fact, Paul Schrader is even referenced at the beginning of the film), albeit nowhere as amazing as it sounds. Featuring both auteur Poe and Lurie portraying the exact same role because the latter had the audacity to quit the film in the middle of production to work on his degenerate jazz music, the film indubitably features one of the most nightmarishly visceral and gorgeously gritty portrayals of early 1980s NYC as a work that makes Martin Scorsese's coke-fueled flick After Hours (1985) seem like an unpleasantly polished Spielberg flick, as a strangely melodically melancholic midnight movie that is indeed best suited for watching at midnight.

SUBWAY RIDERS

Described by Poe himself as belonging to "a genre unto itself," Subway Riders certainly features a hodgepodge of various different (sub)genres but it is ultimately a pathologically moody mood piece that attempts to pierce the heart of its decidedly despairing zeitgeist of cultural, moral, and romantic nihilism where corrupt cops are married to mudshark junky whores, melancholic saxophonists kill random strangers because their hooker flatmates are mean to them, and young lovelorn single mothers stalk serial killers, among other things. A phantasmagoric and oneiric film with a strangely comforting yet foreboding narcotizing tone that makes early 1980s NYC seem like some sort of post-punk existentialist pandemonium that is closer to hell than heaven, Poe's work actually manages to do the seemingly impossible by making the rotten Big Apple seem somewhat cool. Featuring an unconventionally sympathetic serial killer whose sax seems like a sorry masturbatory outlet for his sexual repression, Subway Riders ultimately reminds the viewer why, "New York's Alright If You Like Saxophones." Promoted with the line, "I think we are in rats' alley where the dead men lost their bones," from T.S. Eliot's masterful poem The Waste Land (1922), Poe's film was notably only ever released in Germany on VHS and is all but totally forgotten today, yet it ultimately acts as one of the most aesthetically potent and darkly humorous indictments of the nihilistic necropolis that was early 1980s NYC, where everyone seemed more or less metaphysically dead and a serial killer could arguably act as a sort of dark savior and humanist hero who provided the forsaken living dead with a final resting place and, in turn, perennial peace and quiet.

Pathologically posturing and particularly mentally perturbed protagonist Anthony Zindo (Amos Poe) is an Italian-American avant-garde jazz player who has not been happy since the day he and his family arrived via boat in NYC from Italy when he was a young kid, thus demonstrating that the city at least played some role in molding him into the mumbling misanthropic murderer he is today. At the beginning of the film, Anthony meets with a sleazy Hebraic Hollywood producer named Mr. Leo Gallstone (Bill Rice) who he is attempting to sell his crypto-autobiographical screenplay about a saxophonist that moonlights as a serial killer, but when the morally bankrupt movie man discusses Jack Nicholson or Warren Beatty playing the lead, Diane Keaton playing a "mind-reading woman," Jane Fonda playing a junky, and Marlon Brando playing a cop, the protagonist seems to be much less interested. Of course, all the characters that Gallstone mentions from Anthony's screenplays are also featured in Subway Riders.

ers, though they are not played by glamorous Hollywood stars like Nicholson and Brando. Gallstone loves working in Hollywood because it is a business that, unlike a clothing store, the customer enters the building but leaves with nothing, or as the seemingly pernicious producer states, "That's what this business is about: It's about money and nothing." When Gallstone promises getting Paul Schrader or some other screenwriter to take over his script, Anthony decides to leave abruptly and seems to give up his dubious dream of working in Hollywood. Just before the film's credit sequence rolls, Anthony allegorically states regarding NYC, "Home is where the heart is... The Deskman is dressed in black." Of course, Anthony not only dresses in black, but is also a sort of self-appointed ghetto Grim Reaper who lures people in with his degenerate jazz playing and then wastes them with his snub-nosed revolver.

According to a nameless hobo street poet (played by AIDS victim Emilio Cubeiro, who is probably best known for the Lydia Lunch produced album 'Death of an Asshole') regarding the people of NYC, "No life left anywhere... Only zombies." Indeed, if any of the characters in the film have anything in common, it is that they are spiritually comatose and merely drift through life like superlatively sullen somnambulists who can only find solace in vice. Antihero Anthony lives in the same apartment building as a Sapphic statuesque streetwalker who sometimes stars in exploitation films named Penelope Trasher (Cookie Mueller) who is nothing if not a brazen bitch that enjoys gnawing on female naughty bits. When Gallstone 'buys' Penelope, he brazenly lets her know that if his daughter was in the same trade as her he would be shattered, stating, "I don't know if I would shoot her or hang myself." While Penelope is not too offended by Gallstone's rather unflattering comment, she is exceedingly annoyed with Anthony's sax playing, describing it as a "bang-at-the-moon" and "disco music" and then recommends that he sell his "tuba" so that he can get a heater because, "It might even sound better." As the viewer eventually learns, Penelope's resentment towards him is one of the things that has provoked Anthony to kill. Indeed, not long after his argument with Penelope, Anthony murders a man that attempts to rob him with a machete. Of course, the police are looking for Anthony and it is only a matter of time before they catch up with him.

Aside from dedicating most of his time to hunting the "psycho killer" (as Anthony is described by the media) that is ravaging NYC, Detective Fritz Langley (Robbie Coltrane) has to deal with the pathological degeneracy of his junky wife Eleanor (Susan Tyrrell) who hangs out with "junky niggers" and pimps with goofy names like Pinky Marbles. Fritz is offended by the fact that his wifey hangs out with junky jigabbos and complains to her, "You've got to see the light of it, Eleanor. I'm a cop. What do you think it does to me when I hear you're running around with a guy whose a killer [...] you're a thoroughbred, Eleanor... What are you running around with these mutts for?" but Eleanor is a loony libertine who respects her negro pimp pal Pinky Marbles and replies to her hubby by selfrighteously stating, "What are you, life's big winner?! You're no different than he is. You're a white rat and he's a black rat. You're both caught in the same trap. I don't give a rat's ass." In fact, Eleanor has such little respect for a hubby that she pulls his service revolver on him when he is showering and states, "You should never take a shower without your gun. Even cops die." Naturally, Fritz will eventually realize that his wanton wife's words ring true.

SUBWAY RIDERS

Upon murdering a complete stranger and subsequently hearing police sirens, Anthony opts to enter the passenger seat of a car that has stopped at a crosswalk and soon discovers that it is driven by a strange bleached blonde babe named Claire Smith (Charlene Kaleina) who does not seem particularly alarmed by the fact that a seemingly dangerous stranger has entered her automobile without asking. As Anthony says to Claire, "Downtown lady. Don't be scared, my name's Anthony. Just give me a ride back, alright," but she does become somewhat alarmed when she notices that the antihero has a revolver that he has named 'Beatrice.' Ultimately, Claire gives Anthony a ride back to his apartment and the protagonist rewards her by informing her that she can drop by his place anytime she wants. Before parting ways, Anthony asks Claire where she was originally driving to and she replies in a somewhat existentialistic manner, "I don't know where I was going." Indeed, as a lovelorn single mother who has not gotten over her great love 'Bobby' and who had to quit her dream of becoming a doctor to take care of her young daughter, Claire no longer has any plans and merely floats through life without a purpose as a sort of living ghost that forgot to die and still has a human body. A somewhat phantom-like lady who seems to be able to appear and disappear from places without warning, Claire more or less instantly realizes that Anthony is the "psycho killer," yet she opts to begin stalking him and entering his home without warning via windows. Notably, while sneaking into Anthony's apartment, Claire cries to herself regarding her 'great love,' "Bobby...Oh, Bobby, what did you do to my life? I was so alone. Talk to me Bobby." One almost suspects that Claire wants Anthony to put her out of her misery, but fate has different plans.

When Claire randomly shows up at Anthony's apartment the first time, the two have a sort of somewhat metaphysical philosophical conversation about NYC, with the former stating to the latter, "I know that the only people that are not afraid in this town are the innocent and guilty. Take you: You jump in my car...I look at you and you're nervous but not afraid. And take me: I'm not afraid...but then I'm naive. Take you: You are not naive...You're guilty." Suspecting that she might know that he is the killer, Anthony frankly states to Claire, "Lady, I don't know if it is the beer or cold, but you're off your rocker," and she somewhat esoterically replies, "Me...You...All of us. Everybody riding subways...waiting for stations...when do you get off?" Anthony's curious conversation ultimately inspires him to get pathetically drunk and imagine that he is John Lurie (who is his sort of literary alter-ego). Meanwhile, junky cop's wife

Eleanor injects a mixture of heroin and a cocktail drink into her tongue and complains regarding his hubby Fritz, "Funny, he used to be a human being...warm and funny. He actually used to have a sense of humor but it has all turned to ugliness and cynicism. He's grotesque, stupid, ugly. Blind and arrogant [...] I'm sick of his sadism. I'm sick of tough guys who are uncharitable and unfair." Indeed, Eleanor is so fed up with her tough guy spouse that she even fantasizes about him dying, thinking to herself, "He's not my problem anymore. Yeah, sure, I'll go to the funeral...when they tell me his brain has been blown into some gutter or corner of this town. Sure, I'll be the cop's widow dressed in black. I'll play the role in that charade but I ain't holding tears that have been shed a longtime ago."

With carpet-munching hooker Penelope continuing to rebuff his rather retarded romantic advances, Anthony naturally continues to drink and kill. Somewhat ironically, Penelope actually secretly likes Anthony and his music and describes her antagonistic behavior towards him as a mere "game" to her lesbo girlfriend, even justifying her behavior by arguing, "In this city, you can't give inch. You go into a restaurant and you order tea and waiter brings you coffee, you just have to make a fuss. You can't EVER let yourself be easy." Somewhat humorously, Penelope's ladylove is so offended by her attitude that she not only bitchily retorts, "There's a subtle difference between being hard and being a bitch," but also dumps her and resentfully states to her while walking out her front door for good, "So long, Trash. When the door closes behind you, remember I loved you...But you love yourself even more and I'm the jealous type." Meanwhile, old school cop Detective Fritz becomes exceedingly annoyed with having to use modern crime technology to track down the killer and complains to his boss about the fact that the mayor's nephew works for IBM and that he hates using a computer, bitching, "You tell me to go and get this guy. What have I got. I got a computer...vomiting out all of this garbage all day. Profiles, data, information, nothing." Using his seemingly 'immaculately flawed' cop intuition, Fritz eventually comes to the conclusion that "The Saxophonist" (which was notably the original name of Poe's film) has to be the killer. With his wife leaving him by writing a simple note reading, "Fritz...There's Nothing Left Anymore," the rather rotund detective is all the more determined to take out his rage on the psycho killer. Of course, it is only a matter of time before there is a final showdown between Fritz and Anthony.

In their final quasi-philosophical meeting at the antihero's apartment, Claire states to Anthony after revealing her story about how she had to quit her life-long dream of becoming a nurse after she got knocked up and her deadbeat beau Bobby screwed her over, "The funny thing is when you lose interest in dreams, you kind of lose interest in everything. Sometimes, kids really understand the essence of everything." Indeed, the NYC depicted in the film is a place of dead dreams and real-life nightmares, yet Claire and Anthony's 'non-romance' seems to be an example of fate, at least at first. Claire attempts to reason with Anthony about his unspeakable crimes by warning him regarding his questionable fate, "...When they catch you...and they will...you're gonna suffer...and you're really gonna suffer." When Claire asks why he committed the killings, Anthony complains about how Penelope has treated him and how she reminds him of his mother, complaining, "I just really wanna play my sax. She won't let me. My mother was just like that." While not exactly the same type of serial killer, it seems that Anthony suffers from mommy problems just like Norman Bates and Ed Gein. When Anthony makes the mistake of deciding to go out to waste another innocent victim, he is ultimately chased down and severely wounded by Detective Fritz during a somewhat spastic and incoherent shootout. Luckily, Claire seems to have a sort of sixth sense and waits for him inside her car outside a movie theater playing Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) and a fictional sexploitation film entitled "A Bitch In Heat" starring streetwalker Penelope Trash. Indeed, Claire manages to help seemingly mortally wounded Anthony into a car and drive him to safety. The next morning, Claire inexplicably attempts to save the serial killer Anthony by setting him up with a helicopter out of NYC, but somewhat unfortunately the protagonist succumbs to his wounds only seconds after flying over the city, mumbling before he dies, "Too many things. Just too many things."

SUBWAY RIDERS

Undoubtedly, Subway Riders owes most of its aesthetic potency to the neon-lit cinematography of the film's Austrian co-producer/editor Johanna Heer, who notably worked as an assistant director, editor, and associate director of photography on Poe's The Foreigner (1978), but even more notably later shot shot Hungarian auteur Gábor Bódy's epic punk swan song Kutya éji dala (1983) aka The Dog's Night Song, as well as the underrated Teutonic cyberpunk flick Decoder (1984) directed by Muscha. Aside from Heer acting as the DP on the kraut cult flick, which bares striking aesthetic similarities to Poe's 'kaleidoscopic noir' film despite being set in Berlin instead of NYC, Decoder also stars Subway Riders star Will Rice in one of the lead roles. Surely, without Heer's talent for shooting reds and pinks that practically bleed through the screen despite being set in shadowy rooms, the film would be lacking aesthetically, which is somewhat ironic considering Poe hated her, or as he was quoted on the book Trash-film Roadshows (2002) by Johannes Schönherr, "She is the worst person in the world." To Poe's credit, Heer was apparently rather vocal about her personal belief that her cinematography is more important than the filmmaker's direction, or so stated Schönherr in his book. Still, as a rather psychotic, schizoid, paranoid, and perverted film about a psychotic, schizoid, paranoid, and perverted sort of 'folk antihero' that was unequivocally dreamed up by seemingly paranoid hipster pervert Poe, one should certainly credit the director for his role in this rare melodic yet malefic nihilist melodrama, which is indubitably one of the most idiosyncratic serial killer flicks ever made.

While describing the original script as “a kind of demonic action urban picture” with “a very straight narrative,” Poe began using a lot of improvisation while directing Subway Riders, stating of the film’s narrative in a January 1981 interview with BOMB magazine, “...though at first I hoped to make it like Dante’s Inferno and Paradiso and like that, in terms of literature, it was well...poetically, mythologically bent.” Poe followed up the film by attempting to enter the mainstream with the stylish yet ultimately all-too-superficial feature Alphabet City (1984) starring Vincent Spano, which originally featured a much more brutal and nihilistic ending but the director copped out at the request of the producers (who wanted him to make a “urban teen flick”). Of course, as a conspicuously culturally pessimistic and spiritually apocalyptic work with a ridiculously darkly (anti)romantic spirit and almost tragic, cynical ending, Subway Riders is not only Poe’s most iconoclastic, misanthropic, and aesthetically ambitious work, but also a film that makes for a great antidote to the neurotic Jewish intellectual rom-coms by Woody Allen and the shallow ‘cocaine cowboy’ pieces by Martin Scorsese that were being made in NYC around the same time. Indeed, for better or worse, Poe’s slow-burning serial killer picture probably better personifies its particular zeitgeist than any other film of that time, so it is almost fitting that the auteur subsequently bought into his own version of Reaganism and unsuccessfully attempted to sellout (though, to the director’s credit, he freely admitted to work in Hollywood, stating “Yeah. That would be ideal,” when asked if he wanted financing from Hollywood during his interview with BOMB magazine). While I would not exactly call Subway Riders a masterpiece, it is certainly the closest thing that an American filmmaker has come to creating a pure and unadulterated arthouse work of its time, as a sort of NYC equivalent to what the filmmakers of New German Cinema were doing back then (in that regard, it is fitting that the film features a movie theater marquee advertising Fassbinder’s The Marriage of Maria Braun, which probably influenced Poe at that time). To quote the Fear song again, Poe’s flick thankfully, grisly depicts the sentiment, “New York’s alright, If you wanna get mugged or murdered...New York’s alright, If you like saxophones.” Somewhat inexplicably, despite being someone that loathes both NYC and saxophones (though murder is not always bad), I surprisingly enjoyed wallowing in the the slime, sin, and jazzy serial-killing of Subway Riders. Indeed, maybe if more white saxophonists were philosophizing serial killers instead of culturally cuckolded hipster dorks, the sax would not be such a hopelessly lame instrument, but of course that is probably about as likely as NYC producing an important underground film movement sometime soon.

-Ty E

AN AMERICAN HIPPIE IN ISRAEL
AN AMERICAN HIPPIE IN ISRAEL

Amos Sefer* (1972)

Personally, I cannot think of many film titles that are more humorous and simultaneously intriguing yet repulsive than An American Hippie in Israel (1972) directed by one-time Israeli auteur Amos Sefer. While I would not exactly call myself a connoisseur of Israeli cinema and I have done little in the way of attempting to study the Hebrew nation's rather unremarkable film history, Sefer's strikingly hypnotic hippieexploitation flick certainly has to be one of the strangest, silliest, and unintentionally amusing films ever (mis)begotten in the so-called 'holy land.' The schlocky and ultimately somewhat shocking tale of a NYC-bred Vietnam War vet/idealistic hippie who travels to Israel to recruit a bunch of Hebraic hippies and create an ostensibly flower child utopia in the middle of the desert, An American Hippie in Israel aka Ha-Trempiš aka The Hitch Hiker is notable in that, unlike the always phony and soulless celluloid swill directed by the culture-distorting Hebrew Zionists in Hollywood who tend to depict the counter-culture zeitgeist as some sort of meta-holy Golden Age that 'liberated' the evil racist goyim from their innate authoritarianism and Christian morals, it has a rather nihilistic and pessimistic ending and depicts ideas like "world peace" and "harmony" as an intangible idealistic joke dreamed up by decidedly deluded and debauched dreamers who are attempting to run away from the problems in their own loser lives. Make no mistake about it, Sefer's celluloid affair is a B(ad)-movie of the obscenely outmoded and unintentionally humorous sort, but it has a sort of idiosyncratic character about it that is hard to ignore, even if the prospect of being around hippies, heebies, and/or the holy land makes you cringe, as it does me. While certainly nowhere near "the most psychedelic movie ever made" as advertised on the poster art released by Grindhouse Releasing, An American Hippie in Israel is most certainly the "most psychedelic Jewish movie ever made," which may not say much, but certainly has a bizarre ring to it, no matter which way you look at it. Featuring a deadly duo of phantom-like mimes with hippie-extminating machineguns and technocratic machine-men, Sefer's cinematic hybrid is part sci-fi, part horror, part adventure, part action, and part unintentional comedy but all kosher kookiness. A film that makes Israel seem like a paradisiacal ghost town inhabited by the spirit of Hebraic gangsters like Meyer Lansky that is quite hostile to naïve American hippies who think they can find peace in a place ravaged by perennial hatred and war, An American Hippie in Israel certainly somehow makes the holy land way more entrancing than those rather repellant pictures of various culturally-cuckolded shabbos goy celebrities and politicians pretending to wail at the Wailing Wall.

Beginning with title scenes featuring flowers being crushed by a steamroller juxtaposed with sounds of gunfire and warfare in a somewhat eerie scenario reminiscent of the bulldozing of Palestinian homes by Israelis carrying out Zio-style

'Lebensraum,' An American Hippie in Israel then introduces the bearded 'American Hippie' Mike (Asher Tzarfati), who is flying into the holy land in the hopes of establishing a hippie utopia. With not a dime to his name, Mike immediately begins hitchhiking when he lands in Israel and he is soon picked up by a beautiful actress named Elizabeth (Lily Avidan), who asks him if he is a hippie, to which he stereotypically replies, "You might say so. Right on." While on the road, Mike is followed by two deathly pale mystery men sporting gangster-like zoot suit outfits and top-hats and wielding menacing machineguns, who he calls "scum buckets" and "shitheads" and yells at for following him everywhere around the world, though he does not really know why. As Mike explains to Elizabeth, he was born and bred in New York City, but has spent the last two years or so floating around Europe. A disillusioned Vietnam War veteran, Mike also explains to Elizabeth that he resents the fact that he was turned into a "murdering machine" by the U.S. military and killed some anonymous gook at age 19, which was before he even lost his virginity, hence his new found delusional love for 'free love' and unconscious attempt to atone for his sins via promoting peace and selfless communal living. After demonstrating flower power to Elizabeth by pounding her flesh flower, Mike explains his ultimate dream as follows: "I'm looking for a place faraway from everything. A place where I can live with a bunch of people that think like me without anyone telling us what to do." Indeed, before they know it, Mike and Elizabeth have established a kosher commune of sorts full of dozens of Hebrew hippies engaging in dope-smoking and free love, but that is cut short when the mysterious mime duo shows up and kills every single person present aside from Mike, Elizabeth, and an Israeli hippie couple (played by Tzila Karney and Shmuel Wolf, the latter of whom only speaks Hebrew) that was responsible for introducing the now-dead deadheads to the protagonist.

Although all their hip hippie homeboys were exterminated in a storm of bullets, that does not stop Mike, Elizabeth, Tzila, and Shmuel from carrying on their glorious utopian dreams of a simpler world without technology and war. After Mike declares, "from now on, we're one family" and that they are "free," the four peaceniks make their way out to the desert in Elizabeth's rather bourgeois convertible in search of their own little hippie Heimat. After Mike awakens from a couple nightmares involving battling machines with human legs (indeed, Mike literally 'rages against the machine'!!!) and seeing Palestinians imprisoned in surreal mirage-like desert-based jail cells and execution squads, among other things, the four flower children buy some hippie gear, including a little goat, from some Arab vendors and make their way further into the desert where they find a serenely surreal island comprised entirely of jagged rocks and a couple pieces of ancient ruined buildings, which the self-appointed flower power Führer declares their new home, stating, "Man, this is really fantastic...really out-of-sight" and to which his automaton-like followers jubilantly declare, "Finally, we're free!" as if they are excited grade school children who have found the perfect spot to build a tree fort. That night, the less than fierce foursome huddle together during a bonfire where Mike self-righteously proclaims to his comrades like the corny charlatan that he is, "I want this place to serve as a living symbol for the whole world. We'll show the world that it is possible to live without war...without violence...without machines with buttons...the only sounds that will be coming out of this place will be those of song, joy, and laughter."

AN AMERICAN HIPPIE IN ISRAEL

Despite his initial positive attitude, Mike then proceeds to go on a rather juvenile nihilistic beatnik rant, hatefully stating in the most pansy way possible: "Let's say something to the whole world! World, you're so full of shit...you're so badly contaminated that it is impossible to find a corner free of smell, especially the stench of dead bodies...that's why I hate you. There are millions that hate you...millions that want to escape to another place...a place in which they can breathe air, pure and clean, but you find them, kill them, torture them...the day of reckoning will come. You will be doomed. You will destroy yourself with your own hands...you stinking world." Elizabeth reveals how brainwashed she is by Mike by responding to his speech with the following mindless gibberish: "I love Mike and believe in him...and if he says you're doomed, you'd better watch out!" not realizing that her new beatnik boy toy will be the one that is ultimately responsible for her and the rest of the group's doom. While Shmuel does not really say anything since he only speaks Hebrew, Tzila also expresses her slavish mentality by declaring: "You're a meek world [...] good riddance to bad rubbish." After they all give their poorly articulated little 'anti-world' spiels, the four friends engage in an orgy to usher in the beginning of their new utopia, but little do they realize that they have reached the beginning of the end of their vapid existences as people who yearn for simpler lives yet can barely tie their shoes. Indeed, these big-nosed beatniks are in store for both a literal and figurative rude awakening that will conclude in their own Lord of the Flies-esque demise.

Upon awakening the next morning after the first night at their island utopia, the hymie hippies notice that the small shitty boat that they used to get to their micro-homeland has disappeared, thus cutting them off not only from the land, but also from food and fresh water. To prove his prowess as a leader and dedication to self-sacrifice, Mike volunteers to swim back to the homeland to get supplies for his fellow Dead Sea pedestrians, but he ultimately pansies out while swimming across after bumping into two ominous sharks that may or not be the mystery mime men in anthropomorphized form. After complaining to his comrades, "Bummer. If it wasn't for those damn sharks, everything would be ok" and absurdly berating the deadly fish by shouting at them, "Blasted creeps...Get out of here, you bastards!" Mike begins acting like the sort of authoritarian dictators he claims to hate and forces his meek followers to scavenge for food. Ultimately, only Mike finds food in the form of measly limpets, which the others refuse to eat, with Elizabeth pompously proclaiming, "You'll never get me to eat one of those. Those disgust me.” Indeed, due to their sheltered and pampered up-bringsings, the ‘bobos’ (bourgeois bohemians) would rather starve to death than eat something that might gross them out. After Tzila accuses Mike of using “smooth talk” to con them into coming to the island, a pathetic fight breaks out between the two couples that results in each set of lovers occupying one side of the island. Rather absurdly, a four person civil war breaks out between the two couples, with Mike and Shmuel threatening to kill one another if they dare to set foot on the other’s side of the island. After each couple sharpens some jagged rocks, there is a showdown between the two couples to kill the little goat for food. In the end, all four of the hippies end up killing each other, with Mike screaming like a wounded animal before he perishes. After the deadly micro-civil war that ends with all four hippies and the goat lying in a holocaust-esque heap of untermensch death, the two mysterious gangster mimes show up and steal Elizabeth’s convertible. The film concludes with a giant “END” appearing on the island of lost hippie souls.

Rather ironically, the only other counter-culture-themed films I know of aside from An American Hippie in Israel that are set in Israel are both German and nowhere as kitschy as Sefer’s truly awe-inspiring celluloid oddity. Indeed, aside from kraut cult auteur Roland Klick’s underrated ‘acid western’ Deadlock (1970) featuring a great score by Can and starring perennial screen villain Mario Adorf and West German counter-culture figures Marquard Bohm and Mascha Rabben, Veit Relin’s Chamsin (1972)—a psychedelic reworking of German poet/playwright Friedrich Schiller’s tragedy Die Braut von Messina aka The Bride of Messina (1803) starring Maria Schell (whose then-husband directed the film) and featuring a score by pioneering krautrockers Amon Düül II—was also filmed in Israel. Unquestionably, the major difference between the two German films and Sefer’s work is that while Deadlock and Chamsin are authentic works of counter-culture cinema made by counter-culture types for counter-culture types, An American Hippie in Israel is an innately anti-hippie celluloid affair that not only makes a major mockery of hippiedom, but also attempts to condemn the whole hippie Weltanschauung as an idiotically idealistic pipedream that is totally incompatible with the innate nature of mankind. Ironically, National Socialism, Zionism, and the American and European counter-culture movements were all in part inspired by the Weltanschauung and aesthetics of the German Wandervogel movement—a youth movement promoting a ‘back-to-nature’ ideology that became popular in 1896 and lasted until 1933 when the Nazis had the groups banned and replaced with the Hitler Youth—thus all three films make for interesting viewing when watched back-to-back.

While all three films feature a certain apocalyptic nihilism where neo-paganism reigns and music has more or less replaced religion as the opiate of the masses, only An American Hippie in Israel goes as far as primarily focusing on the counter-culture movement and its failure to make any real difference in the world, albeit in a slightly esoteric and allegorical sort of way. In that sense, Israel—the virtual epicenter for racial, religious, and cultural hatred and warfare in the world—is probably the best setting for a (anti)hippie cinematic parable about the failing of humanity and the naivety of those that believe there can be peace on earth and everlasting good will among men. In its unflattering depiction of Americans as unworldly morons who think that they have the god given right to go to foreign lands and change them however they see fit, as well as its darkly humorous portrayal of the hippie way life as an oftentimes deadly road to nowhere, Sefer's film also makes for the perfect double feature with the somewhat superior and surely underrated Spanish surrealist quasi-giallo Bloodbath (1979) aka Las flores del vicio aka The Sky Is Falling directed by Italian-Canadian auteur Silvio Narizzano, which depicts the bizarre demise of a middle-aged American hippie (played by Dennis Hopper) and a couple American expatriates who arrogantly defile a Spanish island with their spiritual and sexual degeneracy. Sefer's hallucinatory hippieexploitation nightmare is also notable for being a work that will appeal to both would-be-hippies and hippie-haters alike, as a glaringly flawed yet undeniably unforgettable filmic fever dream set in a figurative hippie Hades where 'The Man' takes on ghostly, robotic, and even anthropomorphic forms. Indeed, if you enjoy truly idiosyncratic exploitation flicks and/or seeing hippies having an apocalyptic 'bummer' during an existential pilgrimage, An American Hippie in Israel is certainly worth your time.

AN AMERICAN HIPPIE IN ISRAEL

-Ty E

THE LONG ISLAND FOUR

Anders Grafstrom (1980)

For what is probably his most popular song, "Total Eclipse", Bavarian-born kraut new wave countertenor Klaus Nomi included the extremely controversial (especially for a post-WW2 Teuton of the hyper-homo sort) yet considerably catchy line, "hotter than a holocaust." Being born in early 1944 just over a year before Germany's brutal cataclysmic defeat and virtual total destruction, Nomi certainly grew up in a place and time of collective misery and unspoken guilt, thus I do not think it is a stretch to say that the singer's distinct performer persona was largely the result of his desire to live in a state of total escapism and, ultimately, quasi-transhumanism as a mensch who gave off the impression that he was literally out of this world. When I discovered that Klaus Nomi played the role of a Nazi officer in the campy No Wave flick The Long Island Four (1980) directed by onetime-auteur Anders Grafstrom, I naturally made it my mission to track down a copy of the film. After all, few films can boast of featuring Klaus Nomi as a Nazi chic National Socialist who moonlights as a classy cross-dresser and crowd pleasing Jazz singer. Based on a true story about Nazi saboteur spies who infiltrated Long Island, New York in 1942 and were eventually caught and executed, The Long Island Four is a film that cares more about jovial sexual ambiguity (or not so ambiguous) than any sort of historical accuracy. I am certainly not the kind of person who throws around the word "camp" when describing a film, but The Long Island Four is camp to the core. In fact, I think the film would be best described as a work of "death camp" as the film combines queer-ness, National Socialism, and death like never before, even making the exploitative Hitlerite homoeroticism featured in Luchino Visconti's The Damned (1969) seem quite bland and less than campy by comparison. Although The Long Island Four features next to nil in the way of nudity and blood-gushing brutality, the film has an incomparable cinematic aura of camp eccentricity that would probably even make Soft Cell frontman Marc Almond quiver. French poet Jean Cocteau once described camp as, "The lie that tells the truth" but in The Long Island Four, this truism is exquisitely inversed in a work where conspicuous cock-suckers attempt to portray a little known historical truth regarding a failed Nazi spy operations in one of the most Hebraic areas of the world. Although playing the roles of nonfictional Nazi spies who express an affinity for heterosexual activities, the queenish gayness of the actors (who aside from Klaus Nomi, all have goofy American accents) is so shamelessly and hopelessly glaring that while watching the film, I wondered to myself if they were early AIDS victims (like Nomi himself). The celestially odd character of The Long Island Four is further accentuated by the gritty Super 8 film stock that it was shot on. Despite the somewhat anarchistic nature of The Long Island Four, the film is hardly of an anachronistic nature as one would expect from such a film. In fact, while watching the film, I would sometimes forget that it was created nearly four decades after the time period that it is set in.

THE LONG ISLAND FOUR

The Long Island Four starts when a small brigade of Nazi spy saboteurs land in Long Island. Upon arrival, one of the lisp lips Nazis states, "It's a perfect day to become an American" but as the viewer finds out whilst watching the film, this terrible Teuton has spoken too soon. Although all four spies enter Amerikkka with the sole objective of selflessly devoting their lives to the Third Reich at whatever cost, these kamerads soon learn that they cannot abstain from the sinister hedonistic self-worshipping lifestyle that American democracy has to offer. Of course, the actors playing these committed National Socialists look like natural born degenerates who see decadence as a civic right and duty, but they make for exceedingly charming fellows, nonetheless. One of the spies wears an eye patch in the tradition of 1/2 Aryan filmmaker Fritz Lang. Naturally, Klaus Nomi's character is the most multifaceted and mysterious Nazi featured in The Long Island Four. X-man Nomi acts as a X employed voyeur and committed scopophile who spies on the newly arrived Nazi recruits in a curiously cunning and keenly discreet manner. Thankfully, Nomi's singing talents can be also heard in The Long Island Four. When not checking up on his Nazi underlings, Nomi sings his classic pop love song "Falling In Love Again" in a dimly lit night club and later to his drag queen self while narcissistically gazing into a mirror. Klaus Nomi may not sport his iconic wardrobe and signature hairdo in The Long Island Four but his charismatic persona is fully intact throughout the film. With his small/slender frame, pale skin, and black hair; Nomi kind of looks like a junkie version of Joseph Goebbels in the film. As Nomi's character states in the film, "the true god can have no friends", which no doubt can be said of his character in The Long Island Four and in his short real-life. Although Nomi steals the show, most of the actors featured in the film must be praised for their memorable performances. Dasch, the dainty leader of the four Nazi spies, hilariously tells his American Frau early on in the film that in Germany, "we have big ovens, our ovens are very big." Indeed, such Xatrical dialogue is, as Nomi himself sang so many times, "hot as a holocaust."

If anything can be learned from watching The Long Island Four, it is that America can deracinate even the most rooted of genocidal nationalists. Whether fornicating with blonde beastesses with lesbo haircuts or crawling into a Chinese opium shotgun, the Nazi saboteurs of the film cannot help but enthusiastically knock on death's door in their unconscious quest for unquenchable pleasure. The real National Socialists themselves looked upon cities as training grounds for turning moral rural folk into immoral rootless cosmopolitans, hence their "blood and soil" ideology, thus The Long Island Four is a film that is more conscious (whether intentional or not) of Nazism than it initially appears to be. Although the film tends to fall short of the flashy X uniforms one would expect from a film featuring ostensibly nefarious Nazis, The Long Island Four radiates the sort of strangely charming and classiccamp that would even make Uncle Adolf giggle with glee. Unfortunately, director Anders Grafstrom died tragically in a car accident during a trip to Mexico shortly after the completion of the film, hence his rather small one-film-oeuvre. Of course, by creating The Long Island Four – the apotheosis of true artsy fartsy camp and No Wave cinema – Grafstrom achieved more artistically than most filmmakers do in a lifetime, thus, his premature passing was not in vain. After all, it is quite an achievement for a filmmaker to make a brilliant work of camp while remaining subtle and abstaining from using too much nonstop nudity and endless gratuitous bodily dismemberment. The Long Island Four is also another example as to why Nomi's early death was a tremendous loss for the NYC (and beyond) art world as he could have had a somewhat successful acting career like his fellow musician and performing arts pal David Bowie. With all the forgettable and worthless exploitation films that have received fancy dvd releases over the past decade, it is undoubtedly a shame that The Long Island Four has yet to be digitally remastered and re-released. If you only had the opportunity to watch one No Wave film, make it The Long Island Four.

-Ty E

THE MAN WHO HAD HIS HAIR CUT SHORT
THE MAN WHO HAD HIS HAIR CUT SHORT

André Delvaux (1966)

If there was a single film that would usher in the decidedly dark path Belgian cinema would take as reflected in such eclectically wonderfully wicked works as Roland Lethem's La Fée Sanguinaire (1968) aka The Bloodthirsty Fairy, Thierry Zéno's Wedding Trough (1975) aka Vase de nocés aka The Pig Fucking Movie, Rob Van Eyck's The Afterman (1985), Dominique Deruddere's Crazy Love (1987), and more recently Fabrice Du Welz's Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal, it would have to be De man die zijn haar kort liet knippen (1965) aka The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short aka The Man with the Shaven Head directed by André Delvaux (Un Soir, un Train aka One Night... a Train, Rendez-vous à Bray). Indeed, not only was the film responsible for sending Belgian film on a morbid and melancholic course of no return, but Delvaux's debut feature is also credited as putting modern Belgian cinema on the international map. Based on the supposedly unfilmable 1947 novel of the same name by Belgian magic realist writer and respected film critic Johan Daisne, the film also established magic realism as a mainstay of Belgian cinema long before Harry Kümel (Malpertuis, De komst van Joachim Stiller aka The Arrival of Joachim Stiller) ever began working in the style. Sort of like a feature-length Ingmar Bergman dream-sequence, albeit more raw, grotesque, and ridden with rot and decay, The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short depicts the nightmare life of a physically and mentally middle-aged poindexter professor who begins becoming decidedly deranged as a result of the delusional unrequited love he has for a beautiful blonde student and soon begins having a hard time discerning between reality and hallucination. A tale of obscene obsession that was fittingly shot in cold and lifeless black-and-white and somehow managed to do the seemingly inexplicable by translating the stream-of-conscious structure of its source novel to the silver screen, Delvaux's film is one of those rare films that reminds you that David Lynch is not as idiosyncratic of a filmmaker as you thought he was, as well as a work that confirms that Hollywood is no less than half a century behind a little insignificant country like Belgium in terms of articulating certain complex human emotions, presenting perturbing and unsettling philosophical themes, and portraying desire in its most patently pathetic and deranging form as a work about a metaphysical cuckold who is ultimately the last fellow in line to meet his great crush, or so he thinks. Of course, the film follows in a tradition much older than both Hollywood and magical realism, as a work that Tom Milne stated in BFI's Monthly Film Bulletin would appeal to, "admirers of Bosch, Breughel, Ghelderode and the Flemish genius for finding horror and beauty hand-in-hand," though one must also acknowledge its influence from Symbolism, German Romanticism, and the French New Wave as well. Like a Flemish take on Lolita meets Alain Resnais' Last Year at Marienbad (1961), albeit with seemingly infinite more substance and creepy character, as a sort of work of Gothic magical realism that also acts as a kind of aberrant allegory for an innately divided and schizophrenic nation in its uniquely unflattering depiction of an antihero with a schizoid personality, The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short is, if nothing else, a perversely poetic masterpiece from the Lowland country of mud and rot.

The very first word fairly introverted protagonist Govert Miereveld (Senne Rouffaer) says at the beginning of The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short is the name of his titillating teenage crush Eufrazia 'Fran' Veerman (Beata Tyszkiewicz), but the very last word he says at the end of the film is the name of his neglected wife Corra (Annemarie Van Dijk). Govert is a rather impressive middle-aged man and Belgian Goebbels lookalike with a small and scrawny frame, pale skin, and a badly balding head of dark thin hair. Somehow, in Govert's mind he has a chance of initiating a hot and heavy romance with a beautiful underage blonde who is one of the most popular girls at her school and who aspires to be a famous singer/actress. Rather curiously, Govert, who is certainly no moron as a certified lawyer with a degree, does not seem the least bit worried about what might happen to his career as a teacher and lawyer or his relationship with his wife and two young daughters were he to begin an affair with Fran, thus indicating the absurdity of his all-consuming obsession. Like many naive men who mindlessly worship the feminine object of their romantic desire, Govert does not really know anything about Fran aside from the superficial persona that she projects while she is at school. Govert plans to declare his love for Fran at a special graduation event at his school, as it will be the last chance when he will get the opportunity to do so, so he decides to clean himself up a little bit by getting a pseudo-suave haircut right before he heads to the big event. While riding a public bus on the way to the barber, Govert thinks to himself, "Fran, I feel as if I've always known you. How can I tell you...what you mean to me. How? I can't see you until I know how to tell you." Unfortunately, it seems Govert will never have any clue how to tell her.

While getting his extra short haircut that he thinks will feel good in "wind and rain," Govert chats with the rather creepy and effete sounding barber whose face is initially off-screen thus adding all the more to the almost Svengali-like nature of the fellow, but it is eventually revealed that the hair stylist is just as grotesque in his physical appearance as his undeniably unnerving voice suggests. As the barber somewhat ironically states to Govert in a scene the strangely foreshadows the protagonist's break with sanity, "People like you, who use their head, should have it looked after. Piano players do the same with their fingers and cyclists with their calves." After finishing cutting Govert's hair, the barber gives the protagonist an almost 'erotic' massage while a weird contraption called a 'vibro-massage device' is strapped to his hands. After the super sensual head massage given by the seemingly malevolent barber who seems like he should be running a gay whorehouse in hell full of AIDS victims, Govert simply states “wonderful” and goes on his merry way. Upon arriving at the school, Govert suffers the real-life nightmare of making an ass of himself by being noticeably late for the event and failing to get onstage with the rest of the teachers and administrators before the festivities begin, thus he is left standing in front of the entire school in plain view like a moron as everyone gets up to sing the institution’s anthem. While sitting on the stage with the rest of the teachers and administrators as diplomas are being handed out to graduating students, Govert perversely stares at Fran and states in his own mind in a most hysterical fashion, “Fran...Fran...Look at me, Fran. Please, look at me, now. Now. It’s our last day, Fran. You know it is, you know how much I love you. Fran. Fran.” After the award ceremony, Govert wanders around looking for Fran under the pretense of giving her a book as a gift but he runs into another girl that is dressed like a flapper named Beps (Hilde Uitterlinden) instead who takes the present from the protagonist’s hand without asking and promises to give it to her. While Govert sees Fran sing a Kurt Weill-esque song entitled ‘The Ballad of Real Life’ in the style of the score from Bertolt Brecht’s popular 1928 The Threepenny Opera (notably, director Delvaux considered the music to be such an imperative aspect of the film that he began working with musical composer Frédéric Devreese before he even wrote the screenplay), he never gets the chance to talk to her, so he goes to his classroom to sulk while thinking to himself, “I’ll never see her again. Goodbye. Fran. You were too beautiful for me. I couldn’t reach you. You were too far away for me.” Notably, the lyrics of the song that Fran sings were actually written by auteur Delvaux and feature an eerie esoteric reference to something that will be revealed later in the film via the line, “three Kings suffered shipwreck for me.” The ‘three Kings’ that Fran sings of are a triptych of middle-aged men that have had an imperative impact on her development into a full-grown woman and they include her father, a once highly respected fellow named Judge Brantink (François Bernard) who was presented a ‘hand of justice’ at the award ceremony in ostensible tribute to his contributions to the institution, and protagonist Govert, who has no idea what kind of young woman he is in love with, or so he will eventually learn in a most morbid way. After a happenstance meeting at a hotel towards the end of the film, Fran will ultimately reveal the true meaning of the lyrics behind ‘The Ballad of Real Life’, as well as the sort of sick and sordid impact that the ‘three Kings’ had on her relatively debased womanhood.

THE MAN WHO HAD HIS HAIR CUT SHORT

Flash forward a couple years later and Govert still has not gotten over the fact that he did not get to profess his love to Fran, or as he somberly narrates himself, “The night that closed around me then, lasted for years.” Indeed, the event had such a deleterious effect on his discernibly damaged psyche that he had to give up his dual profession as a lawyer-cum-teacher because he could no longer handle the stress of the work, so he moved his family to a new town and started working in the lowly position of a court clerk, though he claims regarding his new job, "I don't feel degraded." Through his job, Govert befriends an extremely extroverted medical examiner named Professor Mato (Hector Camerlynck) who manages to coerce the protagonist into traveling to the Dutch border with him and his assistant (Paul S'Jongers) to perform an autopsy on a badly decomposed corpse that may or may not be the corpse of a bank teller that mysteriously disappeared six months earlier. Needless to say, Govert becomes quite perturbed when Professor Mato and his assistant play with their autopsy tools and the protagonist suffers the delusion that an electric bone-cutting saw resembles the 'vibromassage device' that he liked so much at the barber. Ultimately, Govert is forced to endure the ultimately traumatic experience of watching Mato and his buddy performing an outdoors autopsy on a freshly unearthed rotting corpse that is still inside the casket in a fairly surreal and foreboding scene that more than hints that the protagonist's fragile sanity has become compromised. If Govert had been like a normal man and had had enough testicular fortitude, he could have merely declined to watch the autopsy, but he ultimately watches it in all its grueling detail because he is afraid to be rude to Mato and his comrade. Of course, if Mato had any idea of how big a lunatic Govert really is, he would not have invited him in the first place. Needless to say, seeing a rotting corpse sliced, diced, and surgically butchered is the last straw for Govert, who comes to unwittingly 'embrace' his slow-burning break with sanity.

While Govert attempts to wear a mask of sanity while in the company of his comrades and even goes so far as to tell Mato that he was not the least bit phased by seeing him defiling a vulgarly smelling deteriorating corpse, he ultimately learns he cannot escape from his inner pandemonium when he is unexpectedly forced to confront a particularly pulchritudinous ghost from his past. Indeed, while Govert obviously quit his job and moved to another town in the hope of erasing Fran from his mind once and for all, it only resulted in him becoming all the more possessed by her almost ghostly memory, not to mention the fact that it has caused his rather fragile mind to slowly but surely collapse under the weight of lovelorn repression and schizophrenic obsession. By mere happenstance, Govert bumps into Fran while staying at a local luxury hotel and is intrigued to learn from Mato that she is now a superstar singer/actress of sorts. While Govert goes out and buys a pair of fancy new dress shoes for Fran, he gets 'cold feet' about giving them to her and decides to drop them in a dam literally a minute or two after purchasing them. When Govert arrives at Fran's room after wasting a bunch of time attempting to get the gall to face her, he immediately professes his longstanding and seemingly perennial undying love for her as the two drink wine, stating things like "I hope that I may tell you everything, that I have always loved you" and "To me you're beauty incarnate." Rather senselessly, Govert also says some rather unflattering things about himself, including that his daughters, "... still don't understand what a failure their father is." Somewhat unbelievably, Fran confesses to Govert that she was also in love with him, but berates him for never getting the balls to profess his love to her, stating, "I loved you and expected everything from you. Happiness within our reach, perfect, too perfect." Of course, Govert is not the least bit happy when Fran reveals to him that there were other men she also loved who eventually debased her in a most morally and emotionally irreparable way.

THE MAN WHO HAD HIS HAIR CUT SHORT

While the one-on-one confessional begins to get rather intimate to the point where Govert is lying side-by-side with his dreamlover in bed, Fran ultimately demystifies the perturbed protagonist's romantic view of her by revealing to him that she is a lecherous lady who ruined no less than three older men's lives. Of course, it takes two to tango and the men Fran mentions were also equally responsible for destroying her life, even if she is now a famous actress. Too prove what she is saying, Fran pulls out three keepsakes that represent each one of her victims/victimizers, including a luger handgun given to her by her disgraced father, the 'hand of justice' statue that was awarded to Judge Brantink (François Bernard) who was forced to resign his position at the school after getting caught having an affair with her, and the book that Govert bought for her as a graduation present but did not actually have the opportunity to give to her. After learning that the rotten corpse Professor Mato and his partner performed an autopsy on was actually that of Fran's father who dubiously disappeared one day but whose corpse was never recovered, Govert becomes visibly distraught and begins frantically pacing back and forth in the hotel room like a mad man on the verge of a massive panic attack. As she describes in a most morose manner, Fran's father gave her the gun because he wanted her to kill herself but she did not have the nerve, so she asks Govert to do it, pleading like a sort of pernicious little princess, "Govert, you wanted it to reach right up into heaven, didn't you? This meeting can turn into something wonderful if you will see me off. Yes, that is the meaning of you coming to me so late." Of course, Govert abides in what is easily one of the most bizarrely oneiric 'murder scenes' in cinema history. Shortly after the protagonist pulls the trigger, Professor Mato and his mate walk in the room and Govert runs up to them and pleads while on his knees in a most meek yet hyper hysterical fashion, "Don't cut her up. Don't cut her up. No autopsy." Ultimately, Govert, who now calls himself 'Godfried' (or as he says himself, 'God Fried') ends up in a mental institution where he lives a fairly peaceful and productive life as a gardener, especially after coming to realize that he probably did not kill Fran after all. In one of his very last lines of dialogue, Govert reveals he is an unequivocal schizophrenic with a split-personality when he confesses to himself, "The world always seems so vague. I see the truth, in duplicate, in triplicate. But that vagueness, that's what I believe in."

Interestingly, source writer Johan Daisne once stated regarding his source novel The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short that, "It's not a novel about a madman. This man is not deranged. He's neurotic, an oversensitive person, who feels what we all feel, but more intensely. He suffers as a result, he becomes a perfectionist, and because of that perfectionism he feels too second-rate for everything he has to do.” While Daisne denies that antihero Govert is crazy, the novel itself seems like it was written by a raving madman as it is over 200 pages yet does not feature any paragraphs or chapters, but is instead structured in a manner that is like one long stream-of-consciousness rant. Indubitably, the genius of André Delvaux’s cinematic adaptation and the way that it traps the viewer into entering the mind of a madman is that the protagonist initially seems like a harmless pathetic pencil-pushing wimp that deserves the audience’s pity and not a completely unhinged nut of the potentially homicidal sort, thus enabling the viewer to empathize with him and ultimately experience his progressive mental degeneration, which is certainly a quality that few, if any, other films can boast, at least to any notable degree. While the film was mostly trashed by Belgians film critics upon its initial release, it ultimately earned much well deserved international success as a work that was praised by Jean-Luc Godard and even won the British Film Institute award for the ‘most original and imaginative film,’ thereupon putting both Belgian cinema and director Delvaux on the map in the cinema world, though the filmmaker would never again have another work that was just as successful, even if he did direct a couple more masterpieces in and outside of Belgium (indeed, Delvaux would later go on to direct a couple films in France). In its change in style at about the midway point from a sort of quasi-neorealism to magic realism, The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short somehow manages to take an approach to mental illness that is, somewhat paradoxically, both seemingly rather realistic and completely mystifying. Indeed, aside from possibly Ingmar Bergman’s classic Såsom i en spegel (1961) aka Through a Glass Darkly, Delvaux’s debut is easily the most mature, hypnotic, and artful film I have ever seen on the subject of a person succumbing to schizophrenia. Naturally, The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short also makes Ron Howard’s four-time Academy Award winning blockbuster A Beautiful Mind (2001) and other related overrated Hollywood works revolving around the subject of schizophrenia seem like aesthetically autistic and arrogantly asinine exercises in schizoid fetishism and social retard romanticism. Indeed, post-WWII Belgium may not be good for much, but the country is most certainly responsible for producing some of the darkest and most disturbing cinematic works around, which is probably normal for a culturally schizophrenic country with two different main cultures that speak two different languages.

-Ty E

ONE NIGHT... A TRAIN
ONE NIGHT... A TRAIN

André Delvaux (1968)

Rather unfortunately for me and other people that cannot stand frog-speak, Belgian filmmakers tend to film their works in French instead of Flemish/Dutch because it makes the works much more commercially viable, yet master auteur André Delvaux dared to shoot his masterful first feature De man die zijn haar kort liet knippen (1966) aka The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short in the goofy Lowland Germanic language and the film ironically not only turned out to be the most commercially and critically successful film of the auteur filmmaker's career, but also more or less singlehandedly put modern cinema from the culturally schizophrenic Lowland nation on the international map. Sadly, Delvaux would only shoot one more film, Een Vrouw Tussen Hond en Wolf (1979) aka Woman in a Twilight Garden, in Flemish, though some of his other works were partly shot in the Dutch, including the auteur filmmaker's second feature and arguable magnum opus Un soir, un train (1968) aka One Night... a Train aka De trein der traagheid. A French-Belgian co-production featuring two relatively big French-language stars, including Italian-born leading man Yves Montand (Le salaire de la peur aka The Wages of Fear, Manon des sources aka Manon of the Spring) and exotic Fellini graduate Anouk Aimée (La Dolce Vita, 8 ½), Delvaux's ominously oneiric second feature ultimately managed to receive frog commercial support because his debut The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short was so critically and commercially successful in France, with La Nouvelle Vague gatekeeper Jean-Luc Godard even giving the work great praise. Ironically, despite receiving French commercial support and featuring two big name international film stars, One Night... a Train failed to receive Belgian ministerial support like the director's previous film for seemingly absurd linguistic reasons that also happen to be a major theme of the film. Indeed, conflicts between the Dutch-speaking Flemish and French-speaking Walloons in terms of linguistic turmoil and rivalry reached such a volatile level the same year that Delvaux's film was released that the Belgian government actually managed to collapse. In One Night... a Train, a titular locomotive containing Belgians of various cultural backgrounds crashes and causes a 'Danse Macabre' in what is indubitably an allegory for a culturally schizophrenic nation on the verge of catastrophe where everyone, despite language or culture, burns in the end because, as the film demonstrates, there is nothing more universal than death. Centering around a reluctantly nationalistic and pathetically pedantic Flemish professor played by Montand whose once-seemingly-magical romance with his regrettably French theater director lover played by Aimée is beginning to wither away due to both political and personal reasons that largely have to do with the male protagonist's lack of real principles and seeming incapacity for embracing happiness, Delvaux's second masterpiece is all the more forebodingly surreal as his first masterpiece The Man Who Had

His Hair Cut Short (which, incidentally, was also based on a work by Flemish magical realist writer Johan Daisne, though the first half of One Night... a Train was written entirely by Delvaux), as a sort of strangely narcotizing nightmare and 'magical realist' fever dream that is most certainly the closest thing to a European arthouse Carnival of Souls (1962), albeit more immaculately tragic, not to mention aberrantly allegorical.

A feverishly forlorn odyssey of figurative lost souls that become literal lost souls, One Night... a Train begins normally enough with middle-aged Flemish protagonist Mathias Bremen (Yves Montand) being bitched out by his exceedingly elderly and frail mother, who annoyingly complains "I never forgot about that" because he refused to go to the movies with her when he was ten years old because he didn't like the hat she was wearing. Of course, Mathias' mother's seemingly irrelevant remark reveals a great deal about the protagonist's personality, as he is a curious man who, like many intellectuals, concerns himself with the more petty things in life while failing to be able to see the bigger picture. Mathias' mother also complains that he does not have children and then makes him promise that he will lay chrysanthemums on his beloved father's grave, but by the end of the film, not only will the protagonist fail to put the flowers on his dead daddy's resting place because he is unable to find it, but it also becomes clear that he will never have children, at least not with his French ladylove Anne (Anouk Aimée). Mathias and Anne are total opposites as especially demonstrated by the fact that the former is a sort of pedantic softcore nihilist with no real strong principles or beliefs and the latter believes in god and is full of passion for life and love, hence her recent decided disillusionment with her relationship with the protagonist. At the beginning of the film after meeting with his mother, Mathias—a linguistics professor who lectures in French—heads to his classroom to teach, only to learn that only a handful of students, mostly negroes and Asians, have attended class that day, as the Flemish majority has decided to strike. A minute or so after beginning his lecture, an attractive female student comes into the classroom to tell Mathias that the Flemish teachers and students are leading a strike and that classes are cancelled, so the protagonist ends class by stating to his students, "I'm very sorry. I'm astonished to see so few here! It looks like your Flemish colleagues are on strike this afternoon. I understand their reactions against the ecclesiastical authorities in this affair, but I am more concerned about their position regarding their francophone colleagues. Otherwise I support them wholeheartedly. Well, I am most happy to discuss linguistic matters. Gentlemen, till next time!"

When a fellow professor comes up to Mathias after he cancels class and recommends that they both show support to the protesting Flemish students by joining a demonstration, the protagonist displays his glaring cowardice by self-righteously declaring, "Is it solidarity, to persecute a minority? Apartheid, racism, wait, doesn't that remind you of something?," thus revealing that he is certainly no Flemish chauvinist, but a loner of sorts that never joins sides, though it is more because he is a passive fellow with no heart and not because he is some sort of virtuous individualist. Due to his influence as a professor, Mathias has managed to get his lover a job as a theater director via his friend Werner (Domien De Gruyter), so he decides to visit both of them while they are working. After leaving the university, Mathias goes to see Anne while she is working on rehearsals for a production of the 15th-century morality play Elckerlijc aka Elckerlyc aka Everyman by Flemish playwright Peter van Dieft that the protagonist has specially adapted for her. Despite discussing his adaptation of Everyman for months with Mathias, Anne does not like his version because, as the protagonist states later in the film, “She thought that it was not enough to be conscious and lucid when confronted by Death.” Indeed, Death is one of the characters in the play and is described by Werner’s friend as being, “... neither Dracula nor Nosferatu, but a disquieting figure,” while the eponymous Everyman is depicted as stronger than both Death and God, which Anne rightfully thinks is patently absurd. While the Death character in the play version physically resembles a cross between Dracula and Nosferatu, both Mathias and Anne will later confront a real and literal ‘Death’ and it is certainly no vampiric fellow that looks like Anton LaVey sans goatee, thus revealing that the latter was certainly right when she complained to the protagonist that it was not enough to be conscious and lucid when confronted with it.

ONE NIGHT... A TRAIN

After leaving the rehearsal for Everyman, Mathias and Anne go home together and eat an extravagant meal at their cultivated, if somewhat bourgeois, apartment which is adorned with classical Greek and surrealist statues, as well as various foreshadowing images of ‘Death,’ but while the protagonist is deeply immersed in eating his oysters and drinking his wine, his lover seems quite melancholy and plagued by something that has long been on her mind. When Anne says that she thinks the most “beautiful” and “admirable” line from Everyman is, “The Angels spreads its wings and says, ‘I pluck the soul out from the body. Its substance is pure and light. I bear it skyward into the blue, there where we will all be reunited,’” and asks her clearly apathetic lover why he does not like it, Mathias disheartens her by tastelessly replying, “Angels have no sex.” Of course, Mathias does not believe in angels and has no problem mocking Anne’s superstitious beliefs, which she does not take lightly as demonstrated by the fact that she denies his overt sexual advances after he mocks her. Mathias is leaving for a trip to meet up with some “old nationalist” buddies at a Flemish university in the north and he does not want Anne to come because of her alien frog tongue and culture, even stating to her while on a bus ride, “You know how they react down there. Old school nationalists, closed minds. I can’t even introduce you.” Needless to say, Anne is not happy with the fact that the man who she loves most seems ashamed of her and her rather unfortunate heritage, so she starts a fight with him, even proposing they break up, stating, “It would be to the detriment of your career for us to be closely linked. I can't be your French wife, because it's immoral not to be Flemish." Indeed, Anne defensively proclaims that she is "not an object" and "I feel so lonely in your land...I know nothing and nobody...No friends, no child." Mathias attempts to comfort Anne after she claims that one day he will leave her and disappear, but she ultimately decides to act irrationally and run away, so he is forced to visit his father's grave by himself. When Mathias arrives at the graveyard, he fails to locate his father's grave, so he just gives up after searching for only a couple minutes, drops the flowers in a random place on the ground, and gets on a train so that he will not be late for meeting up with his old friends that evening as he planned.

While on the train, Mathias is quite delighted when Anne randomly shows up, so he smiles at her and she warmly smirks back. While Anne apologizes for her somewhat hysterical behavior and blames it on being "under strain," Mathias replies, "You know, probably it's going to last forever this evening. You shouldn't wait for me at the station" and she agrees to take the next train back home. While on the train, Mathias becomes sleepy and begins recollecting past events from his relationship with Anne, including a melancholic trip to London that reminded both of them of the fact that they have no kids and probably never will, but also happier and more romantic moments like when they once kissed in a wooded area near a Bruegel-esque farm. As Mathias begins falling asleep, a montage appears that inter-splices images of a disastrous train wreck with shots of the protagonist warmly embracing his lover. When Mathias finally wakes up from his spontaneous slumber, he is startled to discover that Anne has disappeared and is nowhere to be found on the train. Although both Mathias and the viewer do not know it yet, the protagonist is no longer in reality. Indeed, aside from the last couple minutes of the film, the second half of One Night... a Train is set in an otherworldly dream realm where nothing is as it seems and the only thing that makes sense is no sense. On his temporary odyssey in a sort of nightmarish purgatory that is slightly more like hell than heaven, Mathias will meet up with two very different men of two very different ages that he knew at different points in his life and all three fellows will soon discover that they are trapped in an absurdist anti-Arcadia where people act like autistic somnambulists and speak insufferable gibberish.

While looking for Anne on the train, Mathias bumps into a retired history teacher of religion from Tübingen named Gotfried Hernhutter (Hector Camerlynck) that he used to know, though the old man does not at all remember him and seems offended by the fact that the protagonist recognizes that he used to be a professor, as if it shames the old man to be reminded of the fact that he spent his entire life reading and grading papers. While Mathias and Gotfried are talking, the train stops and a handsome young man with blond hair and a Nordic physique in his early 20s named Val (François Beukelaers) standing outside begins talking to them, so the two get out and speak with him, but when they do the locomotive suddenly begins moving again and ultimately leaves them behind. Just like Hernhutter does not remember him, Mathias fails to remember Val when the friendly young man informs him that he took a college course with him two years before. Stranded in the middle of nowhere after treading through mud, the three men, who are unquestionably symbolic of the three major stages of adulthood (early adulthood, middle-age, and old age), decide to start a fire at night to cook some potatoes since they are hungry and naturally they begin going into detail about their private lives, especially Mathias, who has a lot to be concerned about since he is on the brink of losing his great love. Of course, Mathias discusses his trouble with Anne to the two men and his fear that she might leave him for good if he does not get back to the train station in time. After bragging that she is a "real woman" who has given him the "best years" of his life, Mathias describes how he was introduced to Anne several years ago around Christmas by some actor friends at a Catholic church on the Spanish border. When Val decides to go look for some help, Hernhutter warns him to be safe, to which the young man replies in a fashion that reveals one of the major philosophical themes of the film, "Everything that happens is foreordained. There is no risk." While Val is away, Hernhutter rather perturbs Mathias by confessing to him, "My ancestors, the Hernhutters, were Protestants from Bohemia...very attached to the doctrines of Jan Hus. They never mourned because for them death was the occasion for great hope. The Hernhutter clan have a grand mausoleum in the commune garden. I have never done wrong to anyone, and when I visit that garden I feel less alone." Luckily for Hernhutter, he will be permanently 'relocating' to the garden very soon.

ONE NIGHT... A TRAIN

After what seems like only a couple minutes or so, Val comes back and lets Mathias and Hernhutter know that he has located a nearby town, but when the three arrive there they find what amounts to an angst-inducing The Twilight Zone-esque ghost town where the only evidence of the presence of life comes in the rather annoying form of an incessantly ringing alarm. Eventually, the noticeably disturbed yet equally intrigued threesome happens upon a dilapidated movie theater from virtual hell, which they enter and soon discover mostly elderly and foreign nonwhite people watching a terribly disturbing film featuring a skydiver falling through the sky juxtaposed with a sort of exceedingly unnerving ambient noise. When the film abruptly stops with no ending or credits sequence, the audience members nonsensically jump out of their seats in a spastic fashion and start a mini-riot-cum-brawl of sorts among one another as if they have rabies and are collectively high on a killer cocktail of crack, PCP, and cheap vodka. Upon leaving the theater, Mathias attempts to ask an Arab-like audience member for directions to a hotel but he does not understand him as he speaks some sort of gibberish language (apparently, the actual language used is Farsi). Ultimately, Mathias and his two new buddies end up at a bizarre ancient two-floor bar that one might expect to see in an old school Hollywood western that is inhabited by mostly elderly people that also speak gibberish. When Mathias becomes agitated and loudly asks them in broken English, “What this place?,” every single person at the bar stares at him and his friends in an intimidating straight-faced fashion that clearly disturbs the protagonist and his two buds. Without even asking, a young male waiter serves Mathias and his two friends glasses of red wine and eventually an exotic chicken dinner that they do not have to pay money for. While they are eating and getting drunk, Mathias more or less reveals himself to be a nihilist without any ideals after explaining how he was initially proud to join the resistance at the conclusion of the Second World War, but eventually he stopped believing in the cause after he was involved in arresting female collaborators and imprisoning them in abandoned lions cages at the zoo since the local prison was closed. After telling his story about his short-lived association with the resistance, Mathias goes on to explain to Hernhutter and Val that his lover Anne began believing in god during the same war because she skipped school on the very same day that every single one of her classmates were killed after a bomb was dropped on their cafeteria.

While they are hanging out at the bar, Val’s youthful sex-drive kicks in and he becomes hopelessly obsessed with a super sexy and seductive, if not seemingly sinister, young statuesque blonde barmaid and against Mathias and Hernhutter’s advice, he goes up to her and she ultimately puts him in a sort of incredibly intense demonic trance and eventually gets him to follow her lead in a truly devilish dance set to evil yet undeniably hypnotic discordant music. In what amounts to both a literal and figurative ‘Danse Macabre’ aka ‘Dance of Death’—an allegory on the universality of death—every single person in the bar, both young and old, immediately stops what they are doing and begin dancing with Val and the bodacious blonde barmaid. Naturally, this strange display disturbs Mathias, so he goes up to Val and tries to stop him, but he merely ignores what he says and replies like a lobotomized madman in regard to his sinisterly sensual dancer partner, “Her name is Moira...And I understand her language. It’s a miracle!” When Mathias complains that he still does not know why the train stopped and left them, Val confidently replies, “I’ll explain it to you, Mathias,” but he ultimately never gets the chance. When a whistle randomly blows and the music stops, every single person stops dancing and leaves the bar in a hasty fashion as if they are under some sort of oppressive curfew, with Mathias and devilish diva Moira (played by Romanian actress Adriana Bogdan, who later played the eponymous role in André Delvaux’s Belle (1973)) being the sole two people left in the bar. Of course, against his better judgement, petrified Mathias walks up to menacing Moira and before he knows it, he is fainting on the strange woman, who attempts to reassure him by stating, “It’s nothing, you are not injured.” When Mathias regains his consciousness, he realizes that he is no longer at a bar in some strange otherworldly town, but at the site of a tragic train crash. Indeed, Mathias was in a dream realm but now he is stuck in a real-life living nightmare and naturally he immediately begins looking for his beloved Anne and soon notices that some of the paramedics and firefighters at the scene of the accident were some of the same people in the dream bar. After walking around in an exceedingly forlorn fashion while passing the inflamed wreckage, Mathias wanders into a sort of shed and finds three corpses covered with blankets lying on the ground, with two of the bodies obviously being Hernhutter and Val as indicated by the shoes they are wearing. When Mathias lifts the blanket off of the third corpse, he finds Anne, breaks down, and caresses her cold pale dead body. Obviously, it is now too late for Mathias to get his priorities straight and fix things with Anne, thus the protagonist might as well be dead like his lover, Hernhutter, and Val.

ONE NIGHT... A TRAIN

Although few pretentious limp-wristed cinephiles would be willing to admit it, One Night... a Train is unequivocally a horror flick and an exceedingly eerie, esoteric, and darkly erotic one at that that does not follow in the tradition of classic tales like Frankenstein and Dracula, but instead belongs to one much older and all the more morbid and morose. Indeed, as blatantly highlighted near the conclusion of the film during the waywardly 'infernal' dance scene, Delvaux's devilishly delectable masterpiece is certainly a rare cinematic work that closely follows in the late-medieval allegorical artistic genre of the 'Danse Macabre,' which emphasizes the universality of death and was designed to remind people of the fragility of morality and how vain the earthly glories of life are. Indeed, protagonist Mathias certainly learns this harsh lesson in the end as he spent his life caring about such petty things like his Flemish nationalist friends' opinions regarding his French lover, only to lose said lover before he could discover the error of his ways and reconcile with her. More importantly, to the longstanding chagrin and resentment of his much suffering lover, the protagonist spent his life caring about frivolous things instead of doing the things that, for most people, make life worth living, like getting married, having kids, starting a family, and, in turn, creating a genetic and cultural legacy. While the film arguably carries various pessimistic messages, including allusions to the decidedly deleterious and culturally corrosive nature of so-called 'multiculturalism' (indeed, I don't think it is coincidence that most of the people in the nightmarish movie theater scene are either Arabs or elderly, thus reflecting the changing demographics of Belgium), I think One Night... a Train ultimately carries at least one positive cautionary message about the need for one to live life to the fullest and to put one's life in perspective so as to not let unimportant and arbitrary things get in the way of a great love and/or destiny. Of course, it is no coincidence that the protagonist of Delvaux's film is a professor—a man that teaches instead of does and talks instead of creates—as he absolutely personifies the pedantic pussy who may be the most sophisticated linguist in town, but ultimately lacks the most rudimentary elements of common sense and cannot see the voluptuous human treasure that stands constantly before his eyes, as intellect oftentimes comes at the price of unhappiness and incapacitation. Indubitably, One Night... a Train is more relevant today than when it was released nearly half a century ago, as the protagonist absolutely personifies the archetypal contemporary Western European as a decadent, passive, nihilistic, unprincipled, deracinated, gluttonous, and overly sophisticated pansy who has no desire to get married, have children, and carry on the legacy that his ancestors bequeathed to him, hence why he is too lazy to even look for his father's grave and instead symbolically tosses the flowers in the dirt.

German auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg geared his filmmaking career towards following in Richard Wagner's footsteps by attempting to create the ultimate celluloid 'Gesamtkunstwerk' (or 'total work of art'), but I think André Delvaux came closer to this artistic ideal as One Night... a Train is a work that seamlessly weaves elements of film, theater, literature, poetry, music, painting, and even the culinary arts (the film features a number of exquisite food scenes) in a cinematic 'Danse Macabre' with a stark Symbolist flair that manages to reconcile the works of Flemish Renaissance painter Pieter Bruegel the Elder (whose 1562 painting The Triumph of Death arguably features the greatest portrayal of the 'Dance of Death' ever dreamed up by an artist) with the surrealist nocturnal erotica of the director's Walloon namesake Paul Delvaux. Cinematically speaking, Delvaux's work will either interest or bewilder fans of cinematic works as diverse as Walter Forde's The Ghost Train (1941) adaptation, Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls (1962), Willard Huyck and Gloria Katz's Messiah of Evil (1973) aka Dead People, Adrian Lyne's Jacob's Ladder (1990), and M. Night Shyamalan's The Sixth Sense (1999), among various others, but of course One Night... a Train is a work that is innately superior to every single one of these films. Interestingly but not surprisingly considering the deep cultural roots that most Belgian filmmakers seem to have in comparison to their European counterparts, Walloon auteur Fabrice Du Welz would pay tribute to Delvaux's film with the bizarre bar sequence in his brutal yet beautiful quasi-arthouse horror flick Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal. With all the films I see, I rarely come across a work that I would describe as an unquestionable masterpiece, but One Night... a Train is the real decidedly delectable celluloid deal as a work that is as romantic as it is cynical, eccentric as it is true to life, dark as it is sensitive, fiercely fatalistic as it is wonderfully fantastic, and beautiful as it is bleak. Indeed, the film is just another one of the various examples of why Delvaux is one of the most criminally underrated filmmakers of all time.

-Ty E

RENDEZ-VOUS À BRAY
RENDEZ-VOUS À BRAY

André Delvaux (1971)

While Belgian auteur André Delvaux (The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short, Un soir, un train aka One Night... A Train) has quickly become one of my favorite filmmakers, I must confess that I was eager to see his third feature Rendez-vous à Bray (1971) aka Appointment in Bray aka Rendezvous at Bray for the most hopelessly base of reasons. Indeed, after I saw a screenshot from the film featuring a rather petite unclad woman with an hourglass figure and a fairly ample derriere, I just could not get it out of my mind, so I had to immediately watch the film and see said fairly ample derriere in moving image form. As someone who can only seem to tolerate women that have rather largely and shapely backsides, seeing that delectable derriere in Delvaux's film was like a sort of otherworldly déjà vu as if the director could read my mind almost fifteen years before I was actually born. Rather fittingly for me considering my initial impression of the work, Delvaux considered Rendez-vous à Bray his most joyous and uplifting work, stating that it is, "without doubt my happiest film, calls to mind a finally mastered form, where music and characters, grafted on a correct time line, marry perfectly." Indubitably, the film is also Delvaux's most successful attempt at a cinematic 'Gesamtkunstwerk' as a work that seamlessly weaves together virtually all artistic mediums and confirms cinema's status as the 'seventh art' as well as the sum of all other arts, not to mention the fact that it pays charming tribute to the early days of film via sepia-tone scenes and excerpts from Louis Feuillade's five serial French silent masterpiece Fantômas. As a work that, although technically a French-Belgian-German co-production, is completely set in France and stars top La Nouvelle Vague divas Anna Karina and Bulle Ogier, the film is also Delvaux's most 'French' work, even if it is also a classic piece of Belgian magical realism. Based on the short story Le Roi Cophetua (1970) aka King Cophetua by French novelist Julien Gracq, Rendez-vous à Bray tells a story set near the conclusion of World War I about an eclectically repressed and introverted young Luxembourgian pianist and music journalist that lives in Paris who receives a telegram from his extroverted airman best friend asking him to meet him at his country chateau in a fictional town called Bray, but when he arrives his friend is not there and he ultimately spends his entire time reflecting on the past and spending company with his comrade's seemingly forlorn and emotionally distant beautiful maid, who he eventually has sex with, thus making the failed rendezvous rather worthwhile after all in the end. Arguably the Delvaux's most personal work as a film featuring intimate anecdotes from his own personal life, an uncredited cameo from his daughter, and a reference to the fact that he used to perform live scores on piano for silent films at the Cinémathèque Royale de Belgique before ever becoming Belgium's most celebrated auteur filmmaker, Rendez-vous à Bray is also probably the best example of how the director was able to turn a writer's work into his own in a rather clever, highly personalized, and idiosyncratic fashion that even puts Kubrick to shame. Like a Gothic ghost story sans ghosts where the only phantasms are the protagonist's oftentimes bitter but sometimes sweet memories of self-denial and self-loathing while in the company of his quasi-aristocrat French comrade and said comrade's beautiful blonde bimbo girlfriend, Rendez-vous à Bray is ultimately an elegant piece of celluloid anti-puritanism as a life-affirming work that celebrates Occidental art and culture yet also reminds the viewer that one must sometimes give into carnality or otherwise life a non-life a monotonous misery.

Pedantic pretty boy protagonist Julien Eschenbach (Mathieu Carrière of Volker Schlöndorff's Young Törless (1966) and Harry Kümel's Malpertuis (1971))—a character whose surname is probably a reference by Delvaux (notably, the narrator of Gracq's source story is nameless) to the similarly repressed and Apollonian-oriented protagonist Gustav von Aschenbach of Thomas Mann's classic novella Death in Venice (1911)—is an enterprising young pianist and music journalist who has dedicated his life to overcoming his meager Luxembourgish proletarian roots to such a stern and serious degree that he denies himself every single worldly pleasure, especially women and sex, as if he is afraid of these self-forbidden things. Indeed, Julien is more or less the complete opposite of his best friend and musical collaborator Jacques Neuil (Roger Van Hool, who later starred in Delvaux's Woman in a Twilight Garden (1979) aka Een vrouw tussen hond en wolf), who is a wealthy Frenchman of seemingly blueblood stock who never turns down an enticing woman or drink and, oftentimes to the chagrin of the life-denying protagonist, likes to live life to the fullest as demonstrated by his tendency to drive his car like a daredevil and eagerness to join the war effort as an airman during the ultimately fratricidal so-called Great War. At the beginning of the film in a scene shot in a sepia-tone silent film style juxtaposed with Brahms' intermezzo in B minor, Julien reads a letter from Jacques telling him to meet him at his family chateau in rural Bray on December 28th because he has a couple days of leave from the airforce. Upon Jacques enrolling in the airforce three years earlier, Julien agreed to take over his job as a music journalist in Paris, but the protagonist does not seem quite cut out for the job as he is berated by his boss for being too cowardly to write in one of his articles that a group of rather rude Wagnerians were hissing at Debussy fans during a performance of works of César Franck and Claude Debussy by a group called the Capet quartet. Of course, as it makes reference to various times throughout the film, Julien is very self-conscious of his Germanic accent due to World War I and uses it as an excuse as to why he was not accepted to volunteer for the French military, even though he is a citizen of the neutral nation of Luxembourg.

While taking a train ride to Bray, Julien talks with a French soldier who claims that an offensive will be launched nearby sometime soon, thus striking a certain foreboding fear in the fairly cowardly protagonist that will haunt him for most of the rest of the film. Julien also tells the soldier about his relationship with Jacques and his blonde lady friend Odile (Bulle Ogier of Jacques Rivette's Celine and Julie Go Boating (1974)), who the latter the protagonist treats with contempt because she comes from a humble proletarian background similar to his own. When the soldier asks Julien regarding Jacques, "Is it him you're going to meet?," the protagonist seems quite startled by the question and retorts, "How did you know?" in a somewhat paranoid fashion as if he has just seen a ghost. Julien also takes a special interest in the soldier's mostly silent and somewhat beautiful female friend, as if he is infatuated with her as reflected by remarks he makes about her later in the film. When Julien finally gets off the train at the station in Bray, he asks a couple young boys if they know where Julien's house his, but they treat him in a discernibly suspicious fashion due to his accent and are of no help. When Julien eventually arrives at Jacques' somewhat dilapidated chateau, he is greeted at the gate by his friend's exotically beautiful and almost ghoulishly angelic dark-haired maid Elle (Anna Karina of Godard's Band of Outsiders (1964) and Alphaville (1965)), who almost seems like she is floating around like a sort of melancholy ghost. Naturally, Julien is disheartened when Elle informs him that his comrade Jacques has not arrived back yet from the war but that he is expecting him. Elle is a sort of dreamgirl with a fiercely flat affect who seems to be lost in some of metaphysical nightmare and she acts as the perfect groveling servant for Julien, who is certainly not used to any sort of stunning woman giving him such close attention, but she does not even show the slightest inkling of emotion as if she is a wandering dead soul who will disappear into thin air at any moment. Despite her seeming emotional vapidness, Elle will ultimately change Julien's life like no one before and teach him that there is more to living than practicing piano and writing second rate music reviews.

RENDEZ-VOUS À BRAY

Not long after Julien enters his friend's home, he is somewhat spooked by a sort of ghostly presence in the living room and soon finds a Nocturne-like musical piece in the style of the protagonist's favorite composer Brahms that Jacques has written in tribute to him. After playing the piece of music, Julien remembers once arguing with Jacques over the dubious future over their musical quartet as a result of the war, with the protagonist rightly fearing that it will have an irrevocably deleterious effect on not only their lives and friendship, but Europe in generally. Jacques attempts to comfort Julien by telling him regarding their music quartet, "The war will end. We will practice again." When Julien later enters the kitchen, he finds Elle looking all forlorn with her hand over her face as if she has discovered that Jacques dead or something like that, which inspires the protagonist to consider leaving the chateau. Ultimately, Julien decides to head outside and look for a phone at the seemingly unpopulated and somewhat ruined local town nearby but the one he finds does not work, so he heads back and stares at Elle from a window and then recollects a less than happy and rather embarrassing episode from his life when Jacques discovered him playing piano live during a screening of the second segment, Juve Against Fantômas (1913), of Louis Feuillade's classic 5 ½ hour five serial silent epic Fantômas. Indeed, Jacques is offended that Julien would hide such a lowly job from him and aggressively attacks the protagonist with the remark, "I think it's despicable that you hide what you do here from me." Jacques also sarcastically states to the protagonist that he is free to waste his life and free to wear out his fingers on a "tinny theatre piano," to which Julien replies in a most arrogant fashion, "It's typically bourgeois to think that playing in a cinema is degrading." Needless to say, play-boy Jacques is not happy with Julien's remark, so he viciously rebukes him by retorting, "Jesus from Luxembourg. No alcohol, no women, no concessions to philistines." When Julien learns that it was Odile who told Jacques about his secret profession, the protagonist calls her "Judas" when in reality the young girl likes him a lot and was actually trying to help him start a series career. Indeed, Odile was helping Jacques to look for Julien because he got him a respectable gig playing for a rich kraut named Monsieur Hausmann (Pierre Vernier) and he equally opulent friends.

While Julien attempts to turn down the gig because he has an inferiority complex of sorts and resents playing for rich people and rather play for uncultivated proles at the movie theater, he ultimately gives in and receives a standing ovation following his solo performance at Hausmann's high-class party. While Monsieur Hausmann compliments Julien's performance by telling Jacques that it is the "the epitome of youthfulness," his wife Mme Hausmann (Martine Sarcey) takes an extra special liking to the protagonist to the point where she remarks to him that he reminds her of someone special from her youth and then attempts to seduce him, but he just stands there coldly as if he is about to receive the kiss of death, thus offending the rich broad, who seemed convinced that she could defile the young man. When Monsieur Hausmann compliments Julien on his performance and attempts to hand him a glass of alcohol and a thick wad of cash in payment for his services, the protagonist becomes infuriated because he feels like he is being patronized, loses his cool, and slaps the alcoholic beverage out of wealthy man's hand, thus causing a majorly disgraceful scene at the party that is not exactly appreciated by Jacques, who has a prestigious reputation to uphold. Meanwhile, Odile tries in vain to 'properly' eat a piece of chicken on a plate while standing up at the party, thus revealing her less than well-to-do class background. As demonstrated by a previous flashback scene where the protagonist incessantly corrects her mispronunciation of words and names while she is speaking passionately about Fantômas, Julien has sheer and utter contempt for Odile because, while he tries very hard to disguise his peasant origins, she seems to make no effort at all and totally embarrasses him by her mere presence as she reminds him of where he really comes from. In another flashback scene, Jacques attempts to coerce Julien into having sex with Odile, but he becomes rather annoyed by the request and flatly turns the offer down as if it is an offense against his character. In the final and most happy flashback, Julien, Jacques, and Odile go skinny-dipping in a river in a forest in an almost fantasy-oriented scenario, with Bulle Ogier's bare voluptuous ass certainly being the highlight of scene and arguably the highlight of the entire film. Rather shockingly, it is prude Julien of all people that strips first and initiates the almost heavenly skinny-dipping session, thus revealing that there is a wild and adventurous fellow lurking somewhere beneath his hopelessly serious and rather prosaic exterior.

RENDEZ-VOUS À BRAY

Towards the end of Rendez-vous à Bray, Elle serves Julien an extravagant three course meal and the maid manages to smile for the first time in the entire film after the protagonist compliments her on her cooking and warmly smiles. After dinner, while Julien gets drunk on various sorts of expensive liquor that Jacques has stocked at his home, Elle abruptly enters the room while carrying a candelabra and wearing nothing but a blue robe to gesture to the seemingly impenetrable protagonist that she wants sex and then lures him to an upstairs bedroom where they make passionate love. The next day, Julien wakes up and Elle is nowhere in sight, so he quickly puts on his clothes and heads to the train station where a seemingly disillusioned French army unit is hanging out. After borrowing a newspaper from one of the soldiers, Julien discovers that the airmen have not flown in three entire days, thus it seems unlikely that Jacques is dead as the protagonist had presumed. In fact, it almost seems as if Jacques setup a scenario where Julien was asked to come over with the intention of Elle seducing him and freeing him of his assumed virginity. After all, virtually all of the flashback scenes are comprised of Jacques attempting to get Julien to live a more free, happy, and ultimately hedonistic lifestyle. For whatever reason, instead of taking the train back to Paris, Julien decides to stay behind in Bray. Whether Julien hopes to screw Elle again, finally fulfill his planned rendezvous with Jacques, or something else is anyone's guess, but if one thing is for sure it is that the protagonist's one-night-stand with his friend's maid has turned him into a new and more lively man with a great appreciation for life. In the final scene of the film, a shot of Julien stand outside the train station in Bray is juxtapose with a little girl singing the lyrics, "We will meet in hell again [...] Paradise is not for you [...] Paradise is for the King."

Among countless other aesthetic idiosyncrasies that the film features, Rendez-vous à Bray is notable for being in the structure of a musical 'rondo' in terms of how it weaves scenes together from the past and present in a cinematically irregular fashion (instead of having an 'ABCD' structure, they have an ABA, ACA, ADA structure). Of course, in its implementation of musical works by and/or inspired by Frédéric Devereese, Johannes Brahms, and César Franck, the film makes it more than clear that auteur André Delvaux was a true music connoisseur with a strong background in the artistic medium. Naturally, the film also demonstrates Delvaux deep love for other artistic mediums, namely painting. Indeed, two relatively famous paintings play a prominent in the film, with British Pre-Raphaelite artist Edward Burne-Jones' King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid (1884), which is mentioned prominently Gracq's source story, indubitably being the more important of the two. Notably, Burne-Jones was heavily influenced by Hegel's master-slave dialectic, which is quite clear in his painting, which features a powerful King kneeling before a beautiful beggar-maid that superficially resembles Anna Karina's character in a sort of ironic role reversal that demonstrates the cryptic powers that attractive women, not matter how poor or destitute, can wield over even the most powerful and prestigious of respected men. The other painting featured in Delvaux's film is Goya's Mala noche (1799) aka A Bad Night and it is featured in a somewhat obscured fashion in the bedroom where the protagonist has sex with the maid played by Anna Karina. Of course, the greatest and most organic piece of art in the film is Bulle Ogier's bare bum and considering how much emphasis he put on it and the way he directed it, I think Delvaux would certainly concur. After all, Rendez-vous à Bray is about an uptight young man of the Apollonian sort who does not really become a real man until at the end when he is quasi-seduced by a somnambulist-like Anna Karina and develops a more Dionysian outlook towards life. Notably, as revealed in the featurette Rendez-vous avec André Delvaux, out of all his works, Rendez-vous à Bray was the film that Delvaux requested should be the first to be restored and released on DVD, thus suggesting that it was the Belgian auteur filmmaker's favorite and most cherished work. Indubitably, it is certainly his most uplifting, arguably his most accessible, and seemingly his most immaculately structured, thereupon making it the perfect work for Delvaux novices. After all, even if you don't enjoy the film, you still have the grand honor of gazing at petite yet buxom blonde beauty Bulle Ogier's bare buttocks.

-Ty E

WOMAN IN A TWILIGHT GARDEN
WOMAN IN A TWILIGHT GARDEN

André Delvaux (1979)

One important fact about World War II that most contemporary liberalized Europeans seem to have amnesia about and what world Jewry, which does not hypocritically promote multiculturalism for the Occident while at the same time promoting Zionism (aka Jewish racial nationalism) for no reason, has hardly forgotten about is that Uncle Adolf considered all Western European people to be 'Aryan' and planned to incorporate all of their nations, including nations as seemingly different as Iceland and Bohemia, into Germany in what would have been a pan-Germanic empire called 'Greater Germanic Reich of the German Nation.' Additionally, a much larger number of people from these countries than most contemporary Europeans would like to admit supported the Third Reich, as they saw it as their only hope against the spread of godless red bolshevism from the East. Of course, the Allies ultimately won the war and the rest of Europe ironically decided to use Germany as a scapegoat for their own shameful sins and/or cowardice, with many people in countries like the Netherlands and Belgium pretending to have been victims of Nazism and/or members of the resistance after the war, even though only a handful of largely disorganized people were involved with the latter. Of course, aside from a handful of cinematic works of mainly Dutch origin like Adriaan Ditvoorst's debut feature Paranoia (1967), Paul Verhoeven's Soldaat van Oranje (1977) aka Soldier of Orange and to a lesser extent Fons Rademakers' Harry Mulisch adaptation De aanslag (1986) aka The Assault, very few European films have been made depicting the precarious circumstances and strange alliances that many people of Western Europe found themselves making during WWII. Not surprisingly, the Germanic Dutch-speaking Flemish part of Belgium was going to be incorporated into Hitler's thousand-year Aryan empire, though no contemporary Belgian film would ever reveal this. Ironically, it was a French-speaking Walloon fellow, Waffen-SS Standartenführer Léon Degrelle, who not only becomes the most (in)famous Belgian National Socialist, but also one of the most popular and well known figures of the post-WWII European fascist movement.

Luckily, in the Belgian-French coproduction Woman in a Twilight Garden (1979) aka Een vrouw tussen hond en wolf aka Woman Between Wolf and Dog aka Femme entre chien et loup directed by Belgian maestro André Delvaux (Un Soir, un Train aka One Night... a Train, Rendez-vous à Bray), the viewer thankfully gets a refreshing 'no bullshit' look at Belgium during the Second World War as seen mostly from the perspective of an archotypically Aryan-looking housewife who falls for a somewhat swarthy French-speaking Walloon communist 'resistance fighter' after her fascist blond beast husband leaves home and goes to lead a Waffen-SS unit on the Eastern Front. Delvaux's only Dutch-language film aside from his masterful debut feature De man die zijn haar kort liet knip- pen (1965) aka The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short, the film not only depicts the curious position of Dutch-speaking Flanders before, during, and after WWII in a cinematic tale that spans over a 15 year period that begins in 1940 and concludes in 1955, but also the schizophrenic cultural divide between the Flemish and the Walloons as allegorically personified in the Nazi husband and Marxist resistance fighter. Directed by a proudly apolitical filmmaker who may have been the first Belgian 'modernist' filmmaker but was certainly no leftist ideologue or culture-distorter as a mensch that subscribed to the Flemish artistic tradition of magic realism, Woman in a Twilight Garden thankfully does not glorify the resistance nor condemn the collaborators, but instead depicts the rarely good, sometimes bad, and ultimately fairly ugly of the Second World War, which turned neighbors into enemies, criminals into heroes, and respected citizens into much maligned murderers. Indeed, unlike virtually all Hollywood WWII films, Woman in a Twilight Garden—a work based on the 1977 Ivo Michiels novel of the same name—demonstrates that the Second World War only had a negative effect on Belgium, even if those nefarious Nazi demons were defeated. Featuring famous Dutch actor Rutger Hauer in an against-type performance that is completely contra to his legendary character in Soldier of Orange in a fragmented role as a Nazi diehard who disappears for about an hour or so, the film may be the most accessible work of Delvaux's singular filmmaking career, but it is also one of the most subversive European WWII flicks ever made, as the kind of work that has the power to make an entire nation feel hopelessly embarrassed and ashamed.

Despite the fact that they do not seem to really love one another, not to mention the fact they are never depicted fucking, Flemish nationalist Adriaan (Rutger Hauer) and equally blonde and Aryan-looking Lieve (Marie-Christine Barrault) decide to get married during the beginning of the Second World War at a time where Belgium is still neutral and England and France are at war with Germany. Adriaan is a local Flemish fascist leader in Antwerp who plays piano for his comrades during rallies and, to the slight chagrin of his seemingly sexually repressed wifey, makes impassioned speeches like, "Beautiful, but sad. That was our motto. But we didn't like the South... We're a northern people. Our poets know it. We should listen to them and choose our friends carefully. The South is our natural enemy. Our historical enemy. And if a voice calls me, I won't hesitate for a second for it's the voice of my conscience... the voice of history. We are only worth what we are prepared to sacrifice. And what do the lives of the few matter in the eternal scheme of things? If I go, I go for my country. For you. My life is your life." Rather curiously, Adriaan has nowhere near as much passion for his wife as he does for fascism and the two do not even seem interested in having children, as they never mention the subject. When Germany invades Western Europe in August 1940 and subsequently occupies the Lowland countries, including Belgium, it does not take Adriaan long to realize that he has to go to Germany and join up with the Waffen-SS so that he can play his part in annihilating the red menace. Needless to say, Lieve is not happy with her hubby's decision, but he reassures her by stating, "It won't be for long. It's a little war. It's already won" and then walks out the door while his wife is still talking to him. When Adriaan walks out the door, Lieve grasps around her naughty bits as if her womanhood has been compromised. Little does Lieve realize that she will soon fall in love with a card-carrying commie enemy who is in the Belgian resistance.

WOMAN IN A TWILIGHT GARDEN

Almost as soon as her husband lives for Deutschland, Lieve is shunned by almost everyone in Antwerp except for the local butcher, who is a Nazi supporter and provides the young wife with free fresh cuts of meat and much needed emotional support. The locals also seem to be jealous of the fact that Lieve has a nice large bourgeois home with an extravagant garden and greenhouse. When Lieve sees a black cat roaming outside while she is tending the garden, she rightly sees it as a bad omen as reflected in a petrified look that she has on her face. At first, Adriaan mails Lieve money but fails to include letters, but when he actually does send a letter, he seems more interested in his piano than his wife as expressed in his words, "I miss you very much...I also miss my piano. I have no time for music here." At one point, Adriaan sends an SS man (played by German actor Mathieu Carrière) to help Lieve, but she seems to resent him, especially after he remarks regarding her emotionally negligent husband that, "We all think a lot of him. He sacrifices everything for us, for the group." Indeed, Lieve seems to be trapped in a sort of internal pandemonium as a socially scorned woman whose husband is not around to protect her, or at least until a young fugitive commie resistance fighter named François (Roger Van Hool) literally sweeps her off her feet and forces her to let him hide in her home. While Lieve initially wants François out of her home ASAP, she ultimately decides to seek shelter in the charming commie's arms after her own family ends up treating her like a piece of trash. Indeed, shortly after leaving a nice dinner with her family, Lieve turns around and goes back after realizing she has left her bag, only to walk in on her loved ones, including the family dog, sinking their teeth in large servings of beef that they had hid from her. Despite being the wife of a Nazi, Lieve receives total romantic devotion from self-described 'socialist' François, who only ever leaves her humble abode to engage in resistance actions, which include gun fights. Ultimately, it is Lieve's relationship with François that will spare her from persecution after the war concludes.

When the war finally ends, members of the resistance walk through the streets like heroes and exact their revenge on Nazi collaborators, including the Butcher, who pulls a Goebbels and kills his family and himself before his enemies can get to him. Notably, before killing himself and his family, the Butcher asked Lieve if she knew anyone that could take care of his kids if something were to happen to him as a result of his pro-Nazi sympathies, but she completely ignored his plea for help even though he had helped her throughout the war. Suddenly after the war concludes, people who had no direct involvement in the resistance pretend to be heroes and use the German defeat as an opportunity to act sadistically against their neighbors, especially pretty women, who take great pride in shaving the heads of women that had affairs with German men. These pseudo-resistance fighters also take the opportunity to destroy the personal belongings of neighbors whose wealth they are jealous of, including smashing windows and throwing expensive pianos out of four-storey buildings. In fact, a rabid brigade of seething wenches show up at Lieve's home and attempt to attack her, but François sets them straight and informs them of the crucial help she provided to the resistance. Meanwhile, it is learned that Adriaan is still alive and Lieve coerces François into using his political influence to make sure her husband is not executed via firing squad. Indeed, despite the fact that she clearly loves François more than Adriaan and they seem way more sexually compatible, she decides to stay with her husband, who is released from prison in a fairly physically unscathed state, though he is far from mentally sound as one of the few survivors of a thoroughly decimated army brigade, as well as a man who is now regarded by his neighbors as a traitor, war criminal, and sinister Semite-slaughterer.

To his credit, Adriaan proves he is no opportunist by remaining an unrepentant National Socialist, but that also means that he refuses to move forward with the future and live his life. Indeed, while Lieve runs the family furniture store, Adriaan stewes in his study, which is adorned with fascist and Christian paraphernalia, and writes his 'magnum opus,' which he calls, "Notes, memories, my defense." When his repugnantly effete Catholic priest cousin attempts to get him to repent, Adriaan rubs the holy man's hypocrisy in his face by stating, "Did you know which side you were on? Your songs evoke the great Flemish people...And yet you surrendered. Belgium shall be Latin or nothing at all." Adriaan even hates his customers, describing them as "parasites" after his wife tells him that most of their buyers are lawyers, architects, and various other sorts of professionals. Although Adriaan has very little interest in his wife and rather resents the fact that she maintains a strong friendship with her ex-beau François, who is now a powerful politician, he manages to get her pregnant and the two have a little blond Aryan boy. While Lieve showers their son with love even when he is bad, Adriaan finds it hard to even interact with his son in a fatherly way. Meanwhile, Adriaan forces Lieve to listen to his writings but she does not seem particularly impressed when he gives the following speech: "Looking back, and deep inside myself, I still don't understand what it is I am guilty of. They say I betrayed my nation. But what do those accusations mean? I say I served my people. They say I collaborated with the enemy. But how can a nation which has armed itself to defend the culture of the western world, be an enemy nation? They say that we were thinking of our own interests...But how is that possible when you believe in a new world, a new society? When you have sacrificed everything for that. When you have given up your career, your family...your own life." Of course, being a woman, Lieve does not understand the concept of true self-sacrifice and completely resents the fact that her hubby devoted himself more to his country and comrades than her. Ultimately, Adriaan cannot live with the fact that his struggle amounted to nothing, mumbling to himself, "All in vain. All those fallen comrades... in vain." Eventually, Lieve goes crazy after listening to one of Adriaan's speeches, goes on a bitch-fest about Dachau and the Jews, and smashes every single Jesus statue in his room and even goes to hit him, but stops when she realizes how weak and pathetic he looks. In the end, Lieve leaves her husband for good while he is chopping wood. The film closes with the inter-title: "Fifteen years in the life of Lieve."

WOMAN IN A TWILIGHT GARDEN

Notably, auteur André Delvaux once described his work Woman in a Twilight Garden as an "intimist" film, adding: "We have set the story... in the stirring years of Flanders so that the echo of uproar and fury gives more power to its intimacy and its terrible fragility. We want to bear testimony to this piece of history that has never been dwelt on by the Belgian Cinema. A sensitive testimony, above all, for it is more a question of subtle differences of memory than of History. The sounds and colors of our memory: a Flemish house and garden but also Antwerp during the war, its silences and its noises, its voices and its music, perceived from this look-out station in a garden by night." Judging from his film alone, it seems that Delvaux felt that the war had brought out the worst in everyone, especially the everyday lemming citizen, who put up no real resistance when the Nazis took over yet pathetically pretended to be heroes when the war ended and the National Socialists were regulated to the losing side of world history. Indeed, in the film, the citizens of Antwerp run through the streets and hatefully attack and assault both real and imagined collaborators in a most self-righteous manner as if to convince themselves they are not the true blue cowards that they actually are, as the sort of opportunistic two-faced individuals who would have most certainly treated the members of the resistance just as harshly had Germany won the war instead. Unquestionably, the genius of Woman in a Twilight Garden is that, despite being an aesthetically resplendent and visually solacing work that is really quite not like any other WWII flick, it is actually a subtly misanthropic film that only displays sheer and utter contempt for the majority of humanity and does not really feature a single likeable character, thus making it true to real-life. Indeed, even the somewhat homely female protagonist is hard to empathize with, but that is also what makes her more true to life as a woman that encompasses many of the flaws of Western European womanhood. Of course, as someone who is easily the most masculine and stoic character at the beginning of the film yet later degenerates into an irreparably broken man as a result of the German defeat, forlorn ex-Waffen-SS man Adriaan acts as a sort of allegorical symbol for the death of masculinity in Europe, especially when one considers that he is incapable of taking care of his son and no longer has the power to instil masculine values in future generations of Flemish men like he once did before the war when he was a fascist leader. Indeed, ultimately Adriaan is the most tragic character of the film as a mensch who is just as much of a casualty of the Second World War as his comrades that had fallen on the Eastern Front. Somewhat curiously, resistance fighter François, who is a nihilist at heart, becomes a sort of sneering political bureaucrat in the end who ironically resents the new phony cosmopolitan Belgium that he helped to create, thus symbolizing that Belgium's post-war leadership was a sad and pathetic joke. Although I doubt it was intentional on Delvaux's part, the only thing I could think about after watching Woman in a Twilight Garden is if Flanders and, in turn, all of Western Europe, might have been better off if Germany had won the war. Naturally, considering the Flemish, like most Europeans, are committing population suicide and have long been the cultural cuckolds of the culturally retarded philo-Semitic mongrel anti-nation known as the United States, I think the answer is pretty obvious, though no contemporary 'Aryan' would ever have the gall to admit it.

-Ty E

THE TROLL HUNTER
THE TROLL HUNTER

André Øvredal (2010)

After peeping the promotional footage on Twitchfilm, I was immediately taken aback by the digital lawlessness that The Troll Hunter so proudly flaunts. The empty canals of the Norwegian film industry are quickly being populated with directors wielding vigor but at a steep price, complete eradication of national culture, save for brief context of storytelling. With Dead Snow, Cold Prey, Hora, and now The Troll Hunter, the complete emergence of Hollywood blockbuster ideals within Norway is imminent and what, with most of Scandinavia pardoning these excuses to turn a profit, it won't be long before traditional artistry and aesthetic in Europe are replaced with car chases scenes involving a colossal troll. But I don't dare impute the fact that The Troll Hunter is a massive slice of entertainment. Like the best action films of North America, The Troll Hunter only aims to please and does so scrupulously. The Scandinavian mythology of trolls as both beast and spirits of nature follow suit with the musings of "the troll hunter", Hans, and many of the weaknesses as detailed by ancient tomes appears to be verified. In a nutshell, that is the basis of The Troll Hunter, a feeble shell of Nordic beliefs stuffed with American trash. The director even has the gall to namedrop the fat slob Michael Moore as a positive influence on their short-lived career as documentarians.

The plot is quite simple and leaves much more space for the sequential mythological adventure to take place instead of bogging the film down with trivial ideas of cinema such as "plot progression" and "character depth." Thomas leads a small film crew to document the mysterious poaching of bears and winds up tailing a shady fellow named Hans who vanishes all hours of the night only to return in a fashion undeniably introspective. Not a huge surprise that the veterinarian has such a "thing" for the heavyweight of The Troll Hunter. Soon spotting Hans leaving at the dead of night, they follow his vehicle past a government zone warning of blast testing. They soon hear cracking trees, ravenous and guttural growls and witness Hans sprinting from the tree-line screaming "Troll!" Soon after conspiracies and cover-ups from the government are revealed with religious zeal an appetizer to the meal Hans cautiously cooks. Christian blood is a scent trolls can determine to be a source of food. This regard is the only instance except for sunlight that the fables ring credibility. The Troll Hunter evolved into the very same popcorn spectacle that I anticipated from the impression the trailer left. This film is hardly extraordinary but a damn fine way to kill a couple of hours safe from regret.

I greatly enjoy when feedback towards a film hailing from Europe such as The Troll Hunter is greeted with such a smarmy retort as "Hopefully Hollywood won't ruin it!" Statements like this only make me wish I could backhand such an asinine character who cannot connect the very plain dots linking the globalization of world cinema to the plague-ridden cinema of the West. From the first sighting of a troll to the final sighting, we, the audience, are swept into a vortex of diner breakfast, noisome slime, calcified creatures, and the hairy beasts of Nordic yore. The Troll Hunter even goes as far as to facetiously include a swift nod to a classic parable of trolls, Three Billy Goats Gruff by Asbjørnsen and Moe, who are commonly referred to as untrustworthy of their text by our troll hunter, Hans. The shining force of The Troll Hunter has to be the incredibly endearing character of Hans as he is a figure of hope in an otherwise soulless tableaux of mega-monster films. The inclusion of a Muslim in the final roster of crew is a wasted opportunity of mocking the Muslim community in retaliation to the taint left on European countries. Even understanding the Muslim's fate ringing not a bang but a whimper, this retaliation towards the rape epidemic centering on Norwegian victims, the crimes committed largely by minorities, especially Islamic 'citizens.' Argue against statistics all you'd like but I imagine you would have a great difficult time explaining the sudden inclusion of a token Muslim character, only to be given a handful of lines and disappear into a government vehicle as fast as she appeared on screen.

The Troll Hunter is vastly superior to the atrocious Dead Snow which collected an excellent idea and left it out to spoil. Taking the already soiled product and covering it with decorations did not help Dead Snow's hopeless cause one bit, but for The Troll Hunter, things are extravagantly different. Despite containing absolutely nothing of intellectual value other than a director who read several parables involving trolls, The Troll Hunter is the usual jerk-fest involving cryptozoology and paranoid government figures. Perhaps the same characters you'd encounter if The Mothman Prophecies was filmed from a third-person perspective and not an omniscient figure wielding authoritative control of the camera. Despite suffering the flaws of a director with dreams of big-top Americana, The Troll Hunter is immensely entertaining and is often humorous and thrilling. The film's emotive stance on exploration of mythology switches gears from perky fun to drastic, consequential drama quickly and effectively. By the end of The Troll Hunter, you will either be immensely entertained or disappointed by the fact that you just watched a competent American film in another language.

-mAQ

BURIAL GROUND: THE NIGHTS OF TERROR
BURIAL GROUND: THE NIGHTS OF TERROR

Andrea Bianchi (1981)

Out of all the Italian zombie films I have seen, Burial Ground: The Nights of Terror (1981) aka Le notti del terrore aka Zombie 3 (one of a number of films released under this name!) aka The Zombie Dead aka The Nights of Terror directed by Andrea Bianchi (Strip Nude for Your Killer, Confessions of a Frustrated Housewife) and written by Piero Regnoli (Navajo Joe, Nightmare City) has to be the most innately and inately idiotic, aesthetically repugnant, morally irredeemable, patently preposterous, and unintentionally entertaining zombie flick ever made, as a rip off of both the films of George A. Romero and Lucio Fulci, as well as the Spanish zombie flick Amando de Ossorio's Tombs of the Blind Dead (1971). To the minor credit of the film, the special effects for Burial Ground were done by Gino De Rossi who, on top of working on respectable films like The Last Emperor (1987) directed by Bernardo Bertolucci and Casino Royale (2006), created the standout special effects for a number of Guido exploitation flicks, including Cannibal Ferox (1981), but also Lucio Fulci's Zombie (1979) aka Zombi 2 and City of the Living Dead (1980) aka Paura nella città dei morti viventi, thereupon making this miserable maggot-infested zombie film mandatory viewing for any serious zombiphile. Aside from featuring Fulci-esque zombies with real maggots and worms crawling out of their eye sockets, Burial Ground is probably best remembered for featuring a 26-year-old Italian midget that looks like a more fetus-like version of Dario Argento (incidentally, a workshop featured in the film was also used in Dario Argento's Inferno (1980)) playing the role of a 13-year-old boy with an odious Oedipus complex who has never gotten over his love of suckling on his wanton whore mother's mature tits. Featuring an intolerably obnoxious cast of Hightalian jet-set degenerates of the imbecilic and lecherous sort, Burial Ground is also a rare distinguished low-class trash celluloid treat in that the voracious cadaverous flesheaters eat the decadent upper-class humans in what amounts to an anti-bourgeois permanent revolution in zombie form. Before the internet made it so that C-grade exploitation films like it were made somewhat readily available, I managed to secure a copy of Burial Ground by chance while still a preteen and I was left in a state of awe by how absurdly amateurish, sleazy, and morally retarded the film was, as if it was a reactionary zombie flick made in petty protest to the superficial civil-rights-saluting of Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968) and the pseudo-Marxist anti-capitalist subtext of Dawn of the Dead (1978). A horrendously hokey and haphazardly assembled horror fest where every single character is dismembered and devoured by cloaked undead cannibals, Burial Ground is a hopeless film with an equally hopeless message of schlocky gloom and doom that never fails to entertain, even if it fails in every single other regard as a sort of Plan 9 from Outer Space of Guido zombie flicks.

A swarthy Professor Ayres (Raimondo Barbieri) who looks like a poor goy's rabbi has made a major discovery (apparently, he is "the only one who knows the secret") at an ancient Etruscan crypt he has been rigorously studying and he has invited three couples, who seem to have little interest in ancient history (let alone thinking!) to his quaint mansion to see said magnificent discovery, but he is already dead by the time they have arrived because he has accidentally unleashed a corpse-reanimating curse. Hyper hedonistic and recklessly lecherous jet-set jackasses that seem like a poor Sicilian man's equivalent to the voracious suicidal eaters of Marco Ferreri's La Grande Bouffe (1973), the Prof's guests are the last people you would expect to survive a zombie apocalypse and sure enough, they do not, but some of them do put up a fight with the flesheaters in between sniffing wine and having lackluster sex. The most interesting of the couples is fetus-like preteen pervert Michael (played by wily wop midget Peter Bark) and his sub-MILF mommy Evelyn (Mariangela Giordano), who has just gotten married to a weak man (he is the first person aside from the professor to be killed) who does not love his wife nearly as much as his new stepson does. Jealous of any man that courts his mommy dearest, Michael intentionally walks in on his mother while she is sharing carnal knowledge with her new hubby. Luckily for little Mikey, his mother's new husband is the first one to be made into zombie meat, thus enabling the incestuous boy to keep the matriarch all to himself, at least for a momentary period of time. Of course, Michael is not the only degenerate at the manor as a fellow named James (Simone Mattioli) also demonstrates his love and respect for his girlfriend Leslie (Antonella Antinori) by telling her, "You look just like a little whore but, I like that in a girl." The youngest couple is Mark (Gianluigi Chirizzi) and Janet (Karin Well), hence probably why they end up living the longest.

Rather ridiculously and ultimately hilariously, micro-man Michael unwittingly prophesies the presence of the zombies after smelling an old piece of cloth and pseudo-poetically stating, "Mom, this thing...it smells of death," as if he found a pair of skidmark-stained zombie underwear. When the zombies attack the mansion, the brilliant couples barricade themselves inside the lavish home in a Romero-esque fashion and despite ostensibly fighting for their lives, they still demand that the maid brings them beverages and whatnot, as if the hordes of flesheaters will retreat in no time. When the maid is killed after a zombie somehow pins her to a window via throwing a knife (!) at her hand (as if the zombie is a world champion dart player) and subsequently decapitating her pretty little head with a scythe, the infantile inhabitants at the house realize they have reached an all-time low in terms of comfort. Michael, on the other hand, seems to be at his most comfortable and confident as he makes an audacious attempt to seduce his mother by groping her breasts and going down her panties, confessing to her, "Oh Mom, I love you so much. I need to feel you near me. To touch you...When I was a boy, remember? You always held me to your breast.

BURIAL GROUND: THE NIGHTS OF TERROR

I liked your breasts a lot,” for which he is rightfully rewarded with a slap to the face, thus causing the little fetus boy to run away crying like the little whiny shit momma’s boy that he is. Of course, mother Evelyn later rather regrets denying her son her flesh because not longer after slapping him, she finds Leslie, who is now a flesh-fiending zombie, dining on little Michael’s tiny dismembered arm. In the end, the survivors—Mark, Janet, and Evelyn—make their way to an ancient monastery where they discover all of the monks have joined the ranks of the living dead and are devouring human body parts in a seemingly ritualistic fashion. Eventually, Michael, who is now zombified and more hungry for his mother’s flesh than ever, shows up at the monastery, and Evelyn, who suffered more than just a little nervous breakdown after her son’s death, wastes no time whipping out her tits for her undead progeny, thus inspiring her creepy cadaver of a son to bite her nipple off. In the end, Mark and Janet also succumb to hordes of horndog zombies and Burial Ground concludes with the ridiculously misspelled quote, “The earth shall tremble...graves shall open...they shall come among the living as messengers of death and there shall be the nights of terror...” from the so-called (and also misspelled) Prophecy of the Black Spiders, as if attempting to rip off Romero’s Dawn of the Dead with pseudo-theological apocalyptic mumbo jumbo.

Featuring marvelously mediocre acting, over-the-hill actresses of the marginally attractive sort, pudgy pussy male actors who manage to be simultaneously fat and skinny (boney arms yet huge guts and fat faces), fetus-like, testosterone-deprived midgets playing creepy children, zonked out zombies whose skulls (which are made of what seems to be cement) are much larger than the average size human head (this might explain why they are more intelligent than the humans), unfitting degenerate jazz music (thankfully this is only played towards the beginning), and a uniquely unhappy ending where every single character is slaughtered by reanimated corpses, Burial Ground: The Nights of Terror is, if nothing else, one of the most unforgettably incompetently directed cinematic works ever made and a true curious cult item of filmic flesheater crap. An incoherent rip-off of an incoherent rip-off, Burial Ground is like George A. Romero’s Night of the Living Dead (1968) meets Fulci’s Zombi 2 (1979) meets Amando de Ossorio’s Tombs of the Blind Dead (1971) as directed by a man who seems to have just as little interest in zombies as Steven Spielberg does when it comes to historical fact. Admittedly, upon first viewing Burial Ground in middle school, I was awe-stricken as I thought it was easily the worst and most radically repugnant film that I had ever seen, yet it has never left me as the sort of cinematic equivalent of a chickenpox scar that one grows to feel a bit nostalgic for as the years pass. Indeed, with its pseudo-eccentric combination of extra-retarded-looking paper mache-like zombies, Guido midget Peter Bark, unattractive females and even more unattractive males, extra-one-dimensional characters, and mostly anti-climatic death scenes, Burial Ground is one of the very few films I would describe as being 'so bad that it is good' (typically, when I read or hear someone describe a film this way, I discover the film is pure celluloid shit with no redeeming qualities). In its depiction of ancient Etruscan and monk zombies killing uncultivated members of the bloated booboise, one could argue that Burial Ground acts as a pro-Traditionalist work where the undead ancestors of modern Italians get revenge for the degeneration of Mediterranean kultur and spirituality, but of course, that would be giving director Andrea Bianchi, who is clearly not the most artistically-inclined of 'auteur' filmmakers, a bit too much credit; nonetheless, it's a notable sentiment regardless of the creator's true intentions. Either way, Burial Ground makes for a must-see zombie movie simply for poor little Peter Bark's performance in what is easily one of the most eerie yet needless and nonsensical incest scenarios ever depicted in celluloid.

-Ty E

DER TODESENGEL
DER TODESENGEL

Andreas Bethmann (1998) In the tradition of I Spit On Your Grave, Der Todesengel (Angel of Death) features a scantily clad female who gets raped by a couple of men. After this traumatic experience, she decides to rebel against the opposite gender and seduce men into sexual situations only to murder them. Due to the lack of subtitles, dialogue is incomprehensible and utterly worthless. The only thing you might be missing out on is the possible lesbian nature of the main character. It tries to make the connection between Sex and death that Nekromantik did so well. The tendency to fornicate with the dead leads to an addiction that normal sex cannot quench. So begins the murders. As far as a sexploitation trash film goes, Der Todesengel doesn't disappoint too bad. It features explicit shitty gore, including a hilarious head exploding scene. Der Todesengel features an audacious amount of German T & A. Unlike the rivaling title Der Todesking, which exhibits the deterioration of even death, this film has nowhere near any of the pure Teutonic values that came from Buttgerit's film. The fact that this German film's title came from the moniker which was given to Josef Mengele, a Nazi physician who enjoyed activities as castrating young boys. This being speculation and reports from survivors of "The Holocaust" Needless to say, reading about the real "Angel of Death" is more interesting than this film. At least Uncle Mengele gives you delicious sweets for good behavior. Andreas Bethmann brings nothing new to the genre and doesn't try to make up for his faults with effective visuals. Most of the sets look like his mother's basement or rather his backyard. There is no soundtrack to be heard, as I recall. Bethmann has more artistic merit than lets say, Andreas Schnaas, who just creates cinematic shit. While it is a simple sex-and-death film that tries to capture the notoriety of other films like Baise Moi, it doesn't succeed and is just another forgettable rape revenge film. Der Todesengel is as bad as it sounds, but has some entertainment factor. I hate how the German language sounds on DIY film. Sounds like a slurred accent being put through an emotional blender.

-mAQ

DER STRASS

Andreas Höntsch (1991)

While I have always had a special innate and visceral obsession with various forms of Teutonic cinema that ranges from German Expressionism to New German Cinema to obscure avant-gardists like Klaus Wyborny and Lutz Momartz to the low-budget aberrant arthouse splatter of Jörg Buttgerit and Marian Dora, I have come to the conclusion that the majority of the cinema produced by the socialist German Democratic Republic (GDR) and its state-owned studio Deutsche Film-Aktiengesellschaft (DEFA) is, aesthetically speaking, entirely worthless and largely indicative of the overall repressive and dreadfully banal essence of that failed dystopian Soviet satellite state. Surely, it is very telling of East German cinema and its dubious history that one of its most famous 'auteur' filmmakers, Konrad Wolf (Sterne aka Stars, Solo Sunny), was a Jew who fought in the Soviet Red Army during WWII whose brother was a famous Stasi spy master. Likewise, it is probably no coincidence that the GDR was also responsible for the Holocaust classic Jakob der Lügner (1975) aka Jacob the Liar, which was so impressive to the supposedly capitalistic Zionist fat cats of Hollywood that they produced a remake in 1999 starring tragic goofy goy Robin Williams as the eponymous Judaic deceiver. Like in most Eastern Bloc countries, the so-called 'Red Western' (aka 'Borscht Western')—a virtual cultural inversion of Hollywood westerns where the Indians are depicted as the good guys and the whites are mostly evil genocidal capitalists—was very popular as demonstrated by hit East German films like the anti-Fordian Die Söhne der großen Bärin (1966) aka The Sons of Great Bear directed by actor turned director Josef Mach. Undoubtedly, most of the East German films that I have had the misfortune of encountering are even more contrived and emotionally phony than the typical Hollywood hack work of the same era despite their glaring anti-American sentiments. Not surprisingly, virtually any East German filmmaker that attempted to be artistically distinct, experimental, and/or culturally subversive found their work banned, hence the lack of artistic innovation in GDR cinema. For example, painter and documentarian Jürgen Böttcher's sole narrative feature Jahrgang '45 (1965) aka Born in '45—a sort of GDR answer to the French New Wave—was immediately banned upon completion and did not even receive its premiere until 1990 after the reunification. Of course, it should be no surprise that some of the most controversial and experimental films of the Teutonic Eastern Bloc country were made during the GDR's final years when it became obvious that Soviet style communism was on its deathbed. In fact, DEFA's first and last gay film, Coming Out (1989) directed by Heiner Carow (who was also responsible for the slightly subversive DEFA classic Die Legende von Paul und Paula (1973) aka The Legend of Paul and Paula), had its premiere the very same night the Berlin Wall came down as is briefly referenced in Rosa von Praunheim's Ich bin meine eigene Frau (1992) aka I Am My Own Woman starring East Germany's most legendary tranny Charlotte von Mahlsdorf. Naturally, it should be no surprise that the DEFA's most controversial and experimental film was released not long after when the GDR was already in ruins.

DER STRASS

Indeed, as much as I loathe East German cinema, Der Strass (1990) aka Rhinestones directed by Andreas Höntsch is unequivocally a lost classic of East kraut cinema that is more intriguing and unconventional than the majority of West German cinema of that same era. Like Walter Ruttmann's Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Grosstadt (1927) aka Berlin: Symphony of a Great City meets Woody Allen's Annie Hall (1977) meets Stanley Kubrick's Eyes Wide Shut (1999) meets Martin Scorsese's After Hours (1985), Höntsch's first and last feature might be best described as a sort of 'experimental romantic-dramedy,' but that would be selling it short as both a piece of cinematic art and social criticism as it is the sort of film that could have only been made during a particular time and place by a seemingly artistically repressed auteur that was finally able express himself in a candid and artistically free fashion. Apparently inspired by a 1985 article in Sonntag magazine about an exotic dancer named Miss Albena, the film tells the largely pathetic yet nonetheless humorous tale of a 30-year-old photo journalist that becomes obsessed with a rather flexible exotic dancer that he does not even know and ultimately exploits his position as a newspaper photographer as a means to incessantly stalk her, even though she seems to have next to nil genuine interest in him as an individual. Featuring incessant occurrences of what might be best described as 'slapstick magical realism,' the film features the striking novelty of surreal tragicomic scenarios that represent the protagonist's oftentimes absurdly pessimistic, neurotic, and delusional perspective of the world, especially in regard to the enigma of the opposite sex. The film also features a rather effective novelty in the spirit of Luis Buñuel's masterful swansong That Obscure Object of Desire (1977) in that the lead (anti)heroine is portrayed by two different actresses. In its surreally darkly humorous approach to depicting sexual humiliation and the banality of bureaucratic office work, the film can only be really compared to obscure cinematic works like Austrian auteur Philip Brophy's piece of pleasantly pernicious cinematic iconoclasm Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat (1988). In short, Der Strass is a fittingly anarchistic swansong to the end of the GDR as directed by an ambivalently nostalgic man that cannot bring himself to completely hate the authoritarian Soviet puppet state that he grew up in.

If Rolf Thiele's Moral 63 (1963)—a somewhat underrated pulpy artsploitation piece that shares some aesthetics similarities with Höntsch's debut feature—demonstrated that West Germany was already a decidedly decadent hellhole by the early 1960s, Der Strass reveals that East Germany is slowly but surely catching up, or at least so one would assume when seen through the eyes of the film's fairly young and horny dark-haired photo journalist protagonist Georg Bastian (Thomas Pötzsch). After a sort of seemingly intentionally lame opening post-Soviet Socialist realism montage depicting the bloody misbegotten birth and history of the GDR, including footage of the ultra lame DDR rock band the Puhdys, the viewer is introduced to gregarious Georg during his big 30th birthday party where he is congratulated by friends who do not really seem like real friends at all, including his true believer commie boss and two dudes drinking bong water in a bathroom. After the festivities end and everyone goes home, Georg's supposed two best friends leave him stranded inside a highway tunnel, but his luck soon changes when a beautiful white stallion leads him to a beautiful swarthy woman that looks like she could be Anne Frank's surprisingly stunning sister. Indeed, while looking at creepy mannequins in a storefront window that somehow end up moving on their own, Georg catches a glimpse of the woman and follows her all the way to a bar where she does an erotic striptease to Arab-like music (which is actually music by Israeli Ofra Haza, whose Yemenite Jewish influenced music is apparently beloved by both Jews and Arabs alike) while an audience of old people in mostly pagan-like The Wicker Man-esque animal masks watches on in eerie casual delight. Unfortunately, Georg is soon rudely thrown out of the venue by a bouncer dressed like Santa Claus, but luckily he discovers the name of the mystery lady via a poster on the outside of the building. Indeed, the enigmatic beauty's name is 'Miss Albena GDR' (Sylvia Frank) and Georg instantly develops a deep and all-consuming obsession with her that eventually puts both his job and entire life in jeopardy. Of course, Georg is the sad and pathetic kind of fellow that tends to put pussy on a pedestal. As hinted by the fact that Miss Albena is sometimes portrayed by a somewhat more homely actress (Claudia Maria Meyer) that hardly seems sexually mystifying, Georg has an insanely idealized view of her where he sees her as the most beautiful of literal goddesses, but unfortunately for him she never really reciprocates his warped romantic feelings. After all, Georg is a goofy neurotic mess of a man and most women do not even seem to like him, including those that dare to sleep with him.

As the film eventually reveals via striking chiaroscuro style flashbacks, Georg was abandoned when he was just a wee little boy by his careerist Wagernian opera singer mother, hence his obsession with strong and powerful unattainable women that would not typically give him the time of the day were he not a noted photographer that might help their careers. In fact, at the beginning of the film, Georg makes a total ass out of himself by attempting to get a woman named Steffi (Claudia Wenzel) to spend the night at his flat after they have what the viewer assumes is lame awkward sex by playing one of his mother's records, but of course his lady friend is naturally revolted by his serious mommy issues and immediately leaves his apartment while he is completely naked and his flaccid cock is awkwardly hanging out. While Steffi immediately stops seeing Georg, she uses her connections as a showgirl to do him the dubious favor of finding out Miss Albena's personal address, thus giving the protagonist the information he needs to begin his obsessive Oedipal odyssey that eventually leads him to learning important insights in regard to the opposite sex, though very little sex is actually involved. In short, Georg will come to learn the difference between a woman and a vagina and how a vagina has more than one use, namely that it produces life. Under the pretense of acting as her own personal glamour photographer, Georg basks in the highly intimate glory of having one-on-one photo shoots with Miss Albena that involve her posing in a variety of less than subtly alluring fashions where she demonstrates that she can flex her body so freely that her she could practically kiss her own pussy lips. While Miss Albena poses for his camera, which seems to be more important to him than his cock as a sort of substitute phallus (indeed, the film is full of tons of overt Freudian symbolism), Georg imagines all sorts of fantastic things, including oceanic waves projected off her rather tan tits and derriere. Of course, the protagonist is always both literally and figuratively chasing his highly flexible crush, even if she fairly blatantly demonstrates that she has no interest in him outside of a purely professional capacity. Indeed, when Georg offers to buy her some fancy wine, she swiftly blows him off like he is an annoying yet ultimately irrelevant little gnat. Somewhat inexplicably, Georg even manages to get his boss (Eberhard Mellies)—a proud 'Socialist Unity Party of Germany' member that enjoys swimming with the protagonist and taking showers with him in a curious unisex collectivist bathhouse—to let him do an entire article on Miss Albena for their newspaper under the innately dubious subject of, "exoticism in socialism." While Georg's boss—a seemingly gynophobic man who strangely regularly swims and showers with his favorite young employee—complains he feels "sick in my stomach" upon seeing a portrait of the exotic dancer, he likes his employee too much to deny him the opportunity, henceforth eventually leading to conflict when the protagonist spends more time following around Miss Albena than actually working.

DER STRASS

Naturally, when Georg's boss denies him the opportunity to follow Miss Albena around Europa and he is instead assigned to travel to Nicaragua to cover kraut commie propaganda parades, he does not take it too well. Indeed, Georg even prepares an elaborate phony pro-Marxist speech where he does his greatest Trotsky impression and declares with not the slightest bit of irony, "Can an artistic dancer, raised from the soil of our Socialist society hold her ground in the landscapes of Capitalism? Where woman's beauty, even woman herself, is only a commodity. How will she present herself? Well, our country, our morals, our point of view, regarding the relations of the sexes, a universal subject, a touchstone where we could assert our superiority, our tireless striving for equality, the unity of economy and social politics for the benefit of the workers, to protect peace and the socialist accomplishments," but he is ultimately turned down and forced to travel to the Mestizo majority Central American hellhole where he gets so fed up with his work and the blatant propaganda that it entails that he destroys all of his rolls of film before they are even developed. Meanwhile, Georg begins a seemingly less than serious sexual relationship with a blond co-worker with a goofy face and even goofier haircut named Fräulein Schneider (Catharina Krautz), but that naturally goes nowhere. As similarly socially awkward quasi-autistic individuals that work at the same newspaper, Georg and Fräulein Schneider seem like a perfect couple, but the protagonist is too pigheaded, delusional, and lovesick to recognize that she might as well be his soulmate. When Georg finally manages to catch up with Miss Albena in a sort of exceedingly ethereal pastoral fairytale setting where wild stallions are running around, she confesses to him in regard to her mysterious lack of boyfriend and overall lack of social life, "A husband and family. I can't afford all that with my profession. I'm on the road far too often. And friends? They can almost never reach me at home. And when I turn up somewhere, sometime, they would have to be very patient. And if I get pregnant everything's over anyway." Of course, unbeknownst to Georg, Miss Albena will soon get pregnant, just not by him. To Georg's credit, it seems to be at least partially his influence that makes Miss Albena realize that there is more to life than sleazy bars and pink titty tassels.

Despite being nothing more than an annoying little cuck that she barely knows or even acknowledges yet creepily follows her around like a scared little puppy dog, Georg soon becomes extremely overprotective with Miss Albena and tries to rough up some sleazy old fart that attempts to molest her after a striptease routine where one of her titty tassels accidentally falls off. While the would-be molester dares to complain, "First she turns you on, wiggling her arse, and then it's all fake," Georg will eventually realize what he says is all too true, but not before masturbating while thinking about doing exactly what the would-be molester attempted to do with Miss Albena. When Georg decides to pay Miss Albena a surprise visit with the cute thoughtful gift of two baby chicks due to suffering from lovelorn insomnia, he gets quite the surprise when he catches her virtually fucking a handsome trapeze artist outside in the rain. When Georg makes the mistake of confronting and punching the much taller and more masculine trapeze artist, he gets punched back even harder, though Miss Albena ultimately leaves both men cold and wet in the rain. With no real friends, Georg makes the mistake of complaining about his romance life to his less than understanding boss, stating in a delusional manner in regard to Miss Albena, "I'm losing her. She's accepted an engagement in a circus. She's so naive, she'll refrain from nothing. A circus! She'll be on the road all the time, abroad, wherever. I could ever follow her tracks." In response, Georg's boss informs him that he has been assigned to do a story on a "feeding program" and that he should forget about Miss Albena by getting a "shave" and a "girl in a bikini," so the protagonist tells his employer to "[go] fuck yourself." It seems that Georg's boss has great love for his best boy, as he blames himself for the protagonist's flagrant indiscretions. When Georg goes to see Miss Albena after bitching out his boss, she tells him “We won’t see each other again” but somewhat surprisingly thanks him and then reveals that the trapeze artist got her pregnant by exposing her baby bump, thus confirming her career as an extra exotic glorified stripper is all but completely over. Meanwhile, two of Georg’s friends attempt to coerce him into not quitting his job, but he soon learns that his (ex)boss put him them up to it, thus reflecting the sort of hive-minded Stasi-esque spy society that the protagonist lives in where no one can be trusted. As a result of his romantic misadventures with Miss Albena, Georg just cannot seem to tolerate playing the conspicuously socially contrived collectivist commie game anymore as he has realized that there is much more to life than being a productive member of an ostensibly classless society, especially when deep emotions and pathos are involved.

DER STRASS

While Miss Albena explicitly explained to the protagonist that they would never see each other again, things do not go quite as planned for the exotic dancer as Georg notices her being wheeled inside an ambulance while walking by her apartment and decides to follow to her a hospital where he poses as the father of her unborn child while she gives birth. Indeed, while Georg was unable to realize his dream of being her lover, he at least gets to temporarily act as Miss Albena’s sort of cuckold pseudo-baby-daddy while she is giving birth, thus giving him the opportunity to finally gaze at her gash in all of its glory, albeit under less than glamorous circumstances. Among other things, Georg watches as a nurse shaves off all of Miss Albena’s pubic hair in a symbolic scene where she also sheds her former identity as an exotic dancer. When some of Miss Albena’s pubic hair falls to the ground and Georg goes to pick it up, he notably finds the sort of pink feather that was part of her dancer outfit instead of dark Jewess-like pubes. Ultimately, the experience of watching Miss Albena give birth proves to be too much for Georg, as he realizes that she is more than a magical piece of shiny carnal flesh and reacts accordingly by running home and hysterically destroying every single photograph that he has ever taken of her. With the great Miss Albena completely demystified, Georg now sees her first and foremost as a mother and acts accordingly by hanging up a large photo of her pregnant figure where a sexy dance photo once hung. In the end, Miss Albena’s birth seems to be a major revelation for Georg as he now seems to realize that, unlike his own negligent famous opera singer mother, women are oftentimes more than just untouchable enigmatic sex objects and thus he begins a new and seemingly liberating career as a maternity photographer. In the end, the Berlin Wall finally comes down and Georg is depicted at the entrance where East meets West giving away all of his old photos in a scene juxtaposed with “Dido’s Lament” in a highly allegorical scenario where Purcell’s words “Remember me, remember me, but ah! forget my fate” surely echo auteur Andreas Höntsch’s feelings regarding the end of the GDR. Indubitably, when it comes to East Germany, “Death is now a welcome guest,” though there is certainly a sort of foreboding melancholy in air, as if the filmmaker senses that the German reunification will have less than utopian results, which the last two decades have proven.

Undoubtedly, one of the most intriguing aspects of Der Strass is its reluctantly nostalgic depiction of East Berlin, as I expected it to take a more hate than love approach to the GDR, especially considering the thoroughly negative depiction of the western side of Germany as depicted by West German filmmakers ranging from Fassbinder to Buttgereit. In fact, I do not think it is that big of an exaggeration to say that the East Berlin of Höntsch's film seems like a heavenly utopia in comparison to the sort of perennially dark and grim dystopian post-industrial hell that is West Berlin in Sohrab Shahid Saless' Utopia (1983) and Wim Wenders' Der Himmel über Berlin (1987) aka Wings Of Desire, the hellish pre-apocalyptic Hamburg of Klaus Lemke's Paul (1974) and Roland Klick's Supermarkt (1974), and the eerily evil post-holocaust Frankfurt of Daniel Schmid's classic Fassbinder adaptation Schatten der Engel (1976) aka Shadow of Angels, among countless other examples. Although the protagonist of the film is somewhat neurotic on a personal and especially sexual level, neither he or director Höntsch seem to suffer from the sort of malignant melancholy or ethno-masochism that is typical of much post-WWII German cinema. As I discovered from talking to an Austrian-German friend, despite living in a commie nation that was set up by Jews, Slavs, and German communist traitors, East Germans were never brainwashed with the sort of anti-German guilt that was and is still quite typical in so-called free Germany, hence why PEGIDA (Patriotic Europeans Against the Islamisation of the West) is a largely East German movement. In fact, West Germany's most unrepentantly nationalistic and right-wing filmmaker, Prussian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Hitler: A Film from Germany, Parsifal), was born in the GDR and spent nearly the first two decades of his life there. Of course, the great American neo-Spengerlian political theorist and revolutionary Francis Parker Yockey long ago predicated that American culture-distorting would ultimately have a more deleterious effect on the peoples of Western European than communist tyranny would have on Eastern Europe. As Cora Stephan wrote in an article that was later translated by Sarah Farmer for an article entitled Symbols that Face Two Ways: Commemorating the Victims of Nazism and Stalinism at Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen in regard to the lack of self-loathing among East Germans, "The state ideology of the antifascist resistance [...] exonerated East Germans from guilt [for] Nazi crimes since, according to the [antifascist] myth, their country was free of malefactors, the high-level Nazis having fled west at the end of the war. Since the roots of fascism had been eradicated in the GDR, where antifascists had won out and established a state committed to peace, there was nothing to apologize for. This sense of distance from the Nazi perpetrators and of moral superiority [over] the Federal Republic permitted some in the post-war generation of East Germans to develop a sense of national pride rare among their West German counterparts.” Certainly, quite unlike much of West German cinema, one does not get the sense while watching Der Strass that the director is plagued with guilt and/or has a deep-seated death wish. In fact, the film even features excerpts from the Siegfried’s funeral march segment of Richard Wagner’s “Götterdämmerung,” which would be somewhat taboo in West Germany due to the great Romantic composer’s associations with the Third Reich as was made obnoxiously apparent in sexually degenerate Judaic Bryan Singer’s big budget agitprop piece Valkyrie (2008).

DER STRASS

Despite its experimental structure and sometimes crude and risqué humor, Der Strass ultimately features a shockingly wholesome message that you will be hard-pressed to find in most West German arthouse cinema. Indeed, as a cinematic work that celebrates motherhood in all of its majesty, it is surely not the sort of film you would find in today’s spiritually moribund exceedingly ethnosuicidal Germany, which has one of the lowest birthrates in the world and which actively welcomes its own demise via the absorbing of highly hostile brown hordes with extremely low IQs and high birthrates. As a sexually neurotic and largely clueless beta-boy that comes (but does not cum) to discover that women are slightly more than just warm wet holes for his prick and that said warm wet holes are actually the spring of life, the protagonist of the film is, by the conclusion, indubitably wiser and more mature than the average porn-addicted modern-day American or Western European male. In fact, Der Strass is almost like a surreal adult sex education film made for emotionally immature young adult males as directed by the cheerfully disillusioned East German lovechild of Stanley Kubrick and Woody Allen. While you will probably learn more about the facts of the innately corrupt commie police state that was the GDR by watching Frankfurt-born Hebrew Marcel Ophüls’ doc Novembertage (1991) aka November Days or even Florian Henckel von Donnersmarck’s popular kraut blockbuster Das Leben der Anderen (2006) aka The Lives of Others, Höntsch’s ambitious debut is indubitably the best film to see if you are a young mensch that wants to experience how much it sucked for a young horny mensch to live in East Berlin during the final year or so of the GDR. Unfortunately, not unlike the seemingly semi-autobiographical protagonist of his film, Höntsch’s filmmaking career seemed to more or less end soon after the dissolution of the GDR as he would never get the opportunity to direct another film aside from the WDR TV movie Die Vergebung (1994) aka Forgiveness starring Lena Stolze and Sylvester Groth. Notably, DEFA apparently produced about 950 features between its founding in 1946 and demise in 1992, so it is only a great irony of kraut commie film history that the studio’s first film created after the collapse of the GDR, Der Strass, is probably the freshest and most idiosyncratic, challenging, titillating, and aesthetically intriguing cinematic work that they ever produced. An oneiric one-man journey set in a decaying urban dystopia that truly gives off the powerfull illusion that grass is always greener on the other side of the fence (or, in this case, the other side of the wall), Höntsch's film is ultimately an unforgettable obituary for a wholly inorganic nation that should have never existed yet nonetheless still managed to produce at least one good film during its all too long existence.

-Ty E

HUNTING CREATURES
HUNTING CREATURES

Andreas Pape (2001) Due to the gorehounds' love for a certain recipe, namely being gore, it's easy to suck them into buying any piece of trash that features a couple decapitations. Hunting Creatures is no exception. Unearthed Films' recent DVD release is a rare German splatter film that should have stayed lost and forgotten where it belonged. I will describe the storyline to you in plain speaking. A experiment at a rave that has about 6 people there goes wrong, turning these losers into zombies (Guys with orange food coloring on their face.) 4 or 5 gay German guys go around with fake guns for an hour, shooting zombies with incredibly contrived camera angles and situations. The result is the most horrendous zombie film ever made. The climax of the film results in a homosexual picking up a retarded zombie and administering some horrible, butchered wrestling move. That is the only thing worth of value because with that one scene, you have some spark of hope that this film wasn't serious. Bad news, this film is too serious. You discover this when you view them all crying in a minivan. You think that's bad? What about the one scene with a camouflaged man walking with a gun discovers a zombie, shoots him, and then begins to puff a cigarette that clearly wasn't there before in some half-ass attempt to regulate some sort of noir-ish, even badass feel. Hunting Creatures is pathetic. Don't be fooled by the cover art. This is stagnant trash.

It would be one thing if this group of Germanic youth had high inspirations, but in several scenes, we see a room decorated with Carrie 2: The Rage and Face/Off posters. Inspiration is clearly not one of their strong points.

Unearthed Films is also due out Das Komabrutalle Duel. With hope, they will quickly abandon these "splatter" titles in order to pick something up with merit or quality.

-Maq

VIOLENT SHIT

Andreas Schnaas (1989) Low budget can be a fickle thing. When you watch a low budget performance, it no doubt shows, but thank god we have such a thing as "acting" to create stories and drive emotions. Low budget and gore are two words that should never mix ever again after watching Violent Shit. Andreas Schnaas was a gorehound as a child, so i guess he got some false inspiration to create the lamest film alive and give it a "shocking" title. So Karl Shitter is a shitty boy who gets punished by his mom and he hacks her up. Some boring stuff happens and he is grown up and cuts a lot of Styrofoam arms off. The film is stark with stupid acting and horrible settings that look like someone found a stolen video camera, and got a bunch of high school jerk-off friends in my backyard and decided to make an abomination. I honestly cannot write paragraph after paragraph plotting out why you should never see this film other than the brutal truth. Andreas Schnaas has killed the genre of splatter for me. Now i am terrified of watching Olaf Ittenbach. Everytime i see a European splatter film, i honestly crawl into the fetal position and cry. The chances of the sequels being any better are high, but the chances of them being watchable are still in the negatives.

I only thank Schnaas for the appropriate title.

-Maq

VIOLENT SHIT II
VIOLENT SHIT II

Andreas Schnaas (1992)

Germans are so misunderstood. Their polarized and complex identity easily rivals the schizophrenic and more accepted Japanese culture. In reviewing Violent Shit II, I can't help but comment on the seedier, darker dynamic of German cinema. You can't learn everything about a group's culture from watching one film, but you can learn how some of how it ticks. And I think watching old school, SOV German gore porn is a great place to do this. The plot is simple: The son of the killer in the original Violent Shit must kill people to sexually satisfy his aging mother. What follows is a story worshiping bloodshed, the hatred of humanity, the sick preservation of physical dominance and the degradation of women... all with a joyful intensity. It can be nauseating, but it has a camp aspect that mocks the attitude it seems to be glorifying. This is what elevates it from something like the August Underground films. At one point the killer is carrying a corpse singing "I am the Greatest, I am the Best" and the film ends with goofy, blood-soaked outtakes and rainbow-colored titles! The film is mostly a loose collection of gritty, fetishistic murder sequences, but told with a furious lack of artistry and pretension and sporting a bizarre, complex psychology that makes it a supreme B-Movie in my book. I actually hated this film until watching it after Giuseppe Andrews' similar work "Period Piece". Violent Shit II is a fun, confessional, dirty little movie made for no one's entertainment but its filmmakers, and it works.

After WWII, the Germans, Japanese and Italians seemed compelled (out of guilt?) to showcase their darkest, most savage motives in their cinema. I think it's admirable that they never sugarcoat or downplay their sexism, shallowness, racism, rudeness or more moronic nature. If America had a voice this honest, we could address these issues openly and intelligently. This brutal honesty is what gives German art/entertainment their uniquely beautiful edge. It teaches me to be at peace with the dark animal nature and immorality that exists in everyone. Violent Shit II seems to be celebrating this and mocking this when the killer beholds a Japanese warrior a'la the Baby Cart movies and quips, "You were good, but I am better... I am Karl the Butcher... Junior!" (cue opening theme "VIOLENT!SHIT!"). The killer, Karl the Butcher Jr. (perfect name) is a great slasher character. He's a tall psycho with a body like concrete and a crude Iron Maiden mask. Karl Jr. has to be one of the first collage-type characters created to wear his influences on his sleeve, which is now common in a post-Tarantino world. He jokes like Freddy, looks like Jason and takes a sensual pleasure in his evil deeds like Leatherface. What is really charming is how the killer spends so much time belittling and taunting his victims. There can't be a more verbally abusive horror character out there, even if he's not the most clever or eloquent.

My favorite bit is where Karl blasts a man's head apart and groans, "Bullseye, dickhead!"

Violent Shit II is a film you can put on, turn on MUTE and then play your favorite angry, vile or decadent piece of music. It's pure visual splendor: non-stop horrific simulated murders in grainy VHS detail with the occasional absurd subtitle like "Bye, Chubby. Say Hello to the worms". Violent Shit II is not really a slasher film in classic terms. It's more of a homemade work of video art. If John Waters was a younger, sexually repressed, heterosexual German, he might make films like Violent Shit II. I enjoyed Violent Shit II. Why? Because it constantly entertains. Its sensibilities should be so foreign to me, yet they hit home HARD. Of course I can only recommend it to very few types of film-goers: fans of lofi/low tech cinema, gore-hounds and the most cynical and nihilistic lovers of splatter. As poorly shot, sloppily edited and badly acted as it can get, Violent Shit II does what any good film does: It keeps you glued to the screen AND reminds us we are alive.

-Q

IVAN Z

IVAN Z

Andrés Duque (2004)

Beyond a shadow of doubt, the cinematically reflexive Spanish auteur-piece Arrebato (1980) aka Rapture directed by eclectic Basque artist Iván Zulueta (Un, Dos, Tres, Al Escondite Inglés aka Hide and Seek, Leo Es Pardo aka Leo is Dark) is one of my favorites films, even if I only first saw it about 6 months ago, so it goes without saying that I consider it nothing short of an artistic tragedy that the eccentric genius behind the film would never again direct a feature-length film before dying in 2009 at the somewhat premature age of 66. Plagued by a lifelong lingering addiction to heroin – which played a central role in the direction and themes of Arrebato – Zulueta only found enough energy to direct a couple shorts and TV episodes and design art for a couple movie posters (including early works of Pedro Almodóvar), but would never achieve anything even remotely as groundbreaking and artistically dignified as the 1980 film he is best remembered for. In the 52-minute documentary Ivan Z (2004) directed by Spanish-Venezuelan documentary filmmaker Andrés Duque (La constelación Bartleby, Dress Rehearsal for Utopia), one is treated to a rare and intimate interview with Zulueta at his parents' house regarding his lifelong film fanaticism, filmmaking, family, and the soul-destroying nature of heroin. Suffering from a perennial case of Peter Pan syndrome well into his 60s, which he is more than willing to own up to, Ivan Zulueta has no qualms about describing his many failures in life and his lack of enthusiasm at the prospect of continuing filmmaking after completing Arrebato. As big of a cinephile as ever, Zulueta spends more time talking about films that paralleled and changed his life than discussing friends and relatives. As he explains at the inception of Ivan Z, Zulueta described the power and influence of cinema as follows, "I haven't had a better time with anything than with watching films. There was nothing better. Well...I spent the whole day in theatres." Undoubtedly, such enthusiasm for the silver screen would ultimately be a central and guiding theme for his modern masterpiece Arrebato.

The son of a rich and successful lawyer who somewhat strangely moonlighted as a director of The San Sebastián International Film Festival and a mother that dabbled in painting, Ivan Zulueta was destined to a life of leisure, cinema, and art before his birth. Roaming around in his charming childhood home in a blue bathrobe at the beginning of Ivan Z, Zulueta shows off vintage film posters he designed for films like the classic West German anti-war flick Die Brücke (1959) aka The Bridge directed by Austrian auteur Bernhard Wicki, the British romantic-comedy The Grass Is Greener (1960) directed by Stanley Donen (Singin' in the Rain, On the Town) and the Spanish-Mexican black comedy Viridiana (1961) directed by Luis Buñuel, among many others. Zulueta also reveals paintings done by his mother and it is quite apparent that her aesthetic influence had a major impact on her son. Zulueta describes watching the progress of his mother's paintings as a child as being exciting as watching the progress of a movie. Lovingly calling his mother "loopy" after the Hanna-Barbera's theatrical cartoon short series Loopy De Loop (1959-1965), as well as And the Ship Sails On after Federico Fellini's late-period 1983 minor masterpiece because he jokingly states that he hopes she one day moves, Zulueta seems to have an especially close relationship with his mum, even if he refuses to call her "mom." Although the Spanish auteur admits, "I've really had a perfect life here" in regard to his family and childhood, he feels it was ultimately harmful in his development as an adult. Judging by Zulueta's highly vocal disdain for "keeping busy," I have no doubt he is right, but, of course, it inevitably lead to his direction of Arrebato as no working-class individual would ever consider being an artist a legitimate form of work. Indeed, Ivan Zulueta may have wasted and thrown away most of his life, but relatively speaking, he has achieved more than most by directing ones of the greatest films of the 1980s period, thus it was ultimately worth it in the end. After all, how many human beings can say they will be forever immortalized due to there art?!

Towards the conclusion of Ivan Z, Zulueta admits that he always admired the scene in Bob Fosse's All That Jazz (1979) where the lead character Joe Gideon, an overworked theatre director, opens up his medicine cabinet and takes his narcotic happy pills. Although Zulueta would not have as fruitful of a directing career as Gideon, he would get his own bottle of prescribed methadone tablets, which he proudly displays in what is one of the most distastefully uproarious scenes in the entire documentary. Despite Zulueta's generally positive attitude and charming persona, I found Ivan Z to be a doleful documentary about a somewhat tragic individual who, in my humble opinion, had the potential to be one of the greatest filmmaker who ever lived, but instead opted for a less than luxurious life of aimlessness and addiction. Referencing Alice's Restaurant (1969) directed by Arthur Penn as an example, Zulueta freely admits that he was well aware of heroin's destructive essence and how it partially led up the dissolution of the hippie movement, yet he couldn't help embracing what he describes as, "the ultimate drug, the last frontier." Indeed, indubitably a man with an addictive personality, film and filmmaking also acted as a sort of a drug for Zulueta as they gave him an arguably 'safe' high, but, then again, the Spanish auteur depicts quite a different scenario in Arrebato; a film where a young avant-garde is eventually totally drained of his youthful vitality to be vampiric Super 8 camera. Using a Super 8 camera himself for the greater part of his years as a filmmaker, the character Pedro (Will More) in Arrebato is more obviously modeled after Zulueta than the lead José Sirgado; a hack horror filmmaker who is more interested in monetary stability than artistic integrity. Discussing past conversations he had with Arrebato star Will More, Zulueta readily admits that regarding junk, "It's simple. If you take it you can't fuck, you can't go to the movies, you can't travel, you can't move. There are lots of things you can't do." Of course, for Zulueta it cost him a potentially unparalleled filmmaking career, but at least we still have the enrapturing Spanish masterpiece that is Arrebato.

IVAN Z

-Ty E

FUNNY HA HA

Andrew Bujalski* (2002)

I recently discovered an American independent film movement known as “mumblecore.” Last night I had the misfortune of watching Funny Ha Ha, the very first mumblecore film. I assume the name of the movement has to do with the fact that the pathetic actors featured in the films, despite being college graduates, have a hard time speaking proper English as they constantly mumble, whisper, stutter, and have an overall difficulty being linguistically assertive whilst speaking. The main character in Funny Ha Ha, a girl named Marnie whose cutesy good looks are ruined by her feebleminded personality, certainly personifies the verbal mumble to the very core. The question I had to ask myself after watching Funny Ha Ha is how anyone could find anything at all interesting or engaging about the film. I assume the title of the film is supposed to be ironic in the most hipster fashion. The fact that critics have compared the banal realism of mumblecore films to the gritty realism of the works of John Cassavetes is nothing short of cinematic blasphemy and complete ignorance in regards to authentic emotions. After all, Cassavetes’s film A Woman Under the Influence has more emotion in 2 seconds of Gena Rowlands desperate cries than all of the silly slacker scene-stealer scenes in Funny Ha Ha combined.

The protagonist Marnie in Funny Ha Ha is a recent college graduate who cannot find work nor a decent man. As a college graduate myself, I can honestly say that I have met some of the stupidest and most impressionable people (both students and professors) whilst obtaining my liberal arts degree. Marnie certainly shares many of the characteristics of the typical hipster dullard girl that one could easily find while roaming a college campus. Probably the only thing of value I learned in college is the way of the enemy and the overall intellectual bankruptcy of modern academia. Although I am the sure New-Left counter-culture revolution of the late 1960s might have been entertaining for students during those times as it was something new, now these Frankfurt school inspired ideas have turned into the dogma and gospel of banality, fundamentally flawed ideas to start with that have never advanced past their initial theories for they are mere critiques and not living ideas. As the great German political philosopher Carl Schmitt once wrote, “The essence of liberalism is negotiation, a cautious half measure, in the hope that the definitive dispute, the decisive bloody battle, can be transformed into a parliamentary debate and permit the decision to be suspended forever in an everlasting discussion.” Schmitt’s statement about liberalism certainly holds true in regards to the liberal nihilists of Funny Ha Ha as they endlessly talk about nothing, giving no evidence that they have real personalities, let alone the will to power.

Marnie knows that she needs a real job and a boyfriend but is completely unable to assert herself in actively fulfilling her desires. To say she does things half-ass would be too generous of a description in regards to Marnie's monotonous behavior. Marnie is obsessed with an equally pathetic slacker named Alex. Unlike Marnie, Alex cannot make his mind up whether or not he should start a relationship with a beautiful lady that fancies him like no other. Out of nowhere, Alex ends up marrying a Jewish American princess without telling his friends and family. I found Alex's quick marriage to be the most enlightening aspect of Funny Ha Ha. After all, most liberal ideas (both young and old) are of Jewish origin (especially those promoted in academia) whether it be Spinoza, Marx, Trotsky, Marcuse, or Tim Wise. Although liberals describe themselves as "progressive," one does not have to look too hard to realize that the rise of liberalism parallels the decline of the occident. Europe became powerful through hard work, tradition, self-control, and with strong uncompromising idealism. Of course, liberalism promotes self-gratification of the individual, cosmopolitanism, weakness, acceptance of most things degenerate, and various other poisons that have sickened the Western world. The Jews, being an alien group to Europeans, do well in a liberal globalized world as they could never collectively live up to the standards of the traditional western world, hence why they were early proponents of liberal ideas in the first place. European Jewry reached it's peak in power in Weimer Republic Germany, the most degenerate era (up to that point) in German history. That being said, it is not hard to understand why many German nationalists saw Jewry as their greatest enemy. In Funny Ha Ha, the Jewish girl certainly knew what she wanted and married herself a good little goy boy while in her aimless Marnie could not even find the energy to attract Alex with anything more daring than infantile fart jokes. I guess all those feminist classes really destroyed Marnie's female instinctual seducing powers.

FUNNY HA HA

If I did not know that Funny Ha Ha was supposed to be a serious critically acclaimed art film, I would have assumed it was an exploitative parody of the all-embracing impotence of white liberals. If the average white college graduate is as pathetic as those featured in the film, maybe the white race deserves to cease to exist. One of the flaws of your modern white person (especially college educated) is listening to and honestly believing wholeheartedly in the lies of the liberalism that are being fed to them. While your average "minority" knows that liberalism is a tool (used by those with slave moralities, who cannot take control by merit/action but instead demand rights as a "victims") of war used against whiteness for power and the destruction of everything that is of European origin, liberal whites actually believe the fantasy of world peace and equality. As the great German philosopher/historian Oswald Spengler, a man that predicted many of the modern ills that now contaminate the West, long ago wrote, "Pacifism means letting the non-pacifists have control ... Pacifism will remain an ideal, war a fact. If the white races are resolved never to wage war again, the colored races will act differently and become rulers of the world." Marnie and her friends cannot rule their own lives, let alone provide stability for future generations to fight for their very existence. After watching Funny Ha Ha, I felt that I was mediocly mumbled at to the core, hopefully never again will I have to endure such a deplorable cinematic chore. At the end of the film I truly felt sorry for Marnie, an undeniably beautiful girl lost in a sterile sea of purposelessness.

-Ty E

THE MUTILATION MAN
THE MUTILATION MAN

Andrew Copp (1998)

While 'arthouse-splatter' might sound like an oxymoronic description for a film, a couple filmmakers have managed to somewhat successfully create such works that merge serious artistic pretense with sleazy celluloid trash. Indeed, underground filmmakers like Jörg Buttgerit (Nekromantik, Der Todesking), Andrey Iskanov (Visions of Suffering, Philosophy of a Knife), Marian Dora (Cannibal, Melancholie der Engel), Nacho Cerdà (Aftermath, Genesis), and Karim Hussain (Subconscious Cruelty, The Beautiful Beast) have, to varying degrees, been aesthetically fruitful with cinematically juggling gore and poetry. To me, a successful 'arthouse-splatter' flick manages to depict something morbid and grotesque in an aesthetically pleasing fashion to the point where it offends viewers who are not used to such works and feel outraged that they were 'tricked' into finding pulchritude in perversity. Naturally, as a fairly artistically and culturally vacant nation of the largely proletarian sort with virtually no great aesthetic traditions aside from a few scattered artists and novelists, America has not produced many, if any, notable filmmakers who have dared to make celluloid depravity delectable, but of course, some have tried and, for the most part, they have failed hard. A case in point is belated Dayton, Ohio-based filmmaker, horror fanatic, fanzine writer/blogger, and community college film professor Andy Copp (Black Sun, Quiet Nights of Blood and Pain), who is probably best known for his micro-budget directorial debut The Mutilation Man (1998), which I recently had the grating displeasure of viewing. Considering it stars underground cult auteur Jim Van Bebber (Deadbeat at Dawn, The Manson Family) as an abusive alcoholic father who beats children and rapes women after he has a little too much to drink, Copp's first feature is something I wanted to like, but there is no way I can polish this turd and write a puffer-plagued appraisal about its virtually nonexistent merits as a mixed media fever dream of the gratuitously bloody and gory masochist sort. Indeed, as a disturbingly personal work created by a man who clearly suffered inner torment as demonstrated by his seemingly senseless suicide in early 2013 at age 40, I hate to trash The Mutilation Man, but it ultimately reminded me of something I would have created when I was in high school and not the dream project of a artistically enterprising man on a mission who spent four years of his life to assemble it. Shot on 16mm negative film and Super-8, which was absurdly transferred to VHS(!) for editing purposes, Copp's film looks like a product of some sort of ungodly early-1990s heavy metal mullet hell. Featuring real stock-footage from the holocaust and Vietnam War randomly spliced in throughout, Copp's work wallows in bad taste and senseless sensationalism and thus might give a semi-hard-on to some lonely jaded gorehound, but it left me feeling like I endured a tedious torture test of the aesthetically insipid and uniquely vapid sort. The embarrassing 'confessional' non-story of a morbid masochist who travels around a barren post-apocalyptic countryside and mutilates himself for small adoring sub-retarded metalhead and grunge dork audiences, The Mutilation Man is a sort of carelessly convoluted 'metaphysical manifesto' from an American-bred born-again nihilist who clearly has a lot of internal pain and agony but clearly has no practical or positive way to express it. Indeed, it may be the only film that made me consider that horror movies and trashy thrash metal might have a devastating effect on American youth.

Ivan (played by Terek Puckett, who previously played the murderous metalhead moron sidekick in Van Bebber's absolutely hilarious 1994 short My Sweet Satan) is an ugly, swarthy, and out-of-shape beta-male G.G. Allin wannabe who seems to have the same barber as Kevin Smith and who is so emotionally damaged from the emotional and physical abuse that he endured from his dip-somaniac rapist father (Jim Van Bebber) that he has dedicated his non-life to mutilating his body for young sadistic audiences in what one might describe a traveling 'postmodern post-apocalyptic performance art show.' Indeed, Ivan is a sort of troubadour for a fallen zeitgeist of atavistic depravity where love, beauty, poetry, and creativity have become a distant memory. In a scene that will only make sense to people who have listened to the director's audio commentary for the Sub Rosa Studios DVD release of the film, young Ivan (Robbie Crellin) digs a grave and somehow buries himself (while standing over his own body at the same time!) in a symbolic scene representing the character's attempt to bury his traumatic past into his subconscious, so that he can put his ugly childhood to rest and be reborn. Flash forward a couple years later and Ivan arises from the grave completely naked as a full-grown adult and immediately encounters a post-apocalyptic hellhole where the landscape is covered with the unclad bodies of countless homely young girls. A collage and montage heavy work shot from three different yet intertwined perspectives (1. Reality 2. Ivan's Memories 3. Ivan's Hallucinations) that are jumbled together in a completely convoluted fashion that makes little, if any, sense (aside from reflecting the cognitive dissonance of the protagonist/director), The Mutilation Man ultimately seems like a hokey yet mostly humorless hodgepodge of the director's dreams, fantasies, horror film fanboyism, and plaguing post-traumatic stress. Indeed, while watching the film, one certainly gets the impression that the director has a lot of bad memories as a result of child traumas and failed romantic relationships. In other words, things get a little bit ugly.

Ultimately, The Mutilation Man is mainly comprised of mentally perturbed protagonist Ivan treading along in a morbidly depressed lackluster fashion and doing a couple of ostensibly perverse performance art shows, as well as the character's quasi-spiritual interaction with two very different and seemingly imaginary women that more or less subconsciously guide his messed up mind. Indeed, Ivan is compelled by both good and evil as represented by these dichotomous female beings. The first woman is credited as 'Fetish Demon' (Kristy Bowersock) and she is a discernibly sadistic soul-sucking mutilated bitch with a pseudo-Gothic outfit who looks like she got gang-raped at a Skinny Puppy concert. The second woman is the 'Angel' (Jollie Scott) and she is a loving 'guardian angel' and a sort of spiritual arch enemy to 'Fetish Demon' because she wants Ivan to follow a positive path whereas the demoness merely contributes to his self-destruction and spiritual degeneration. As depicted in mostly dimly lit nightmarish flashback scenes that are incessantly spliced in throughout the entire film, Ivan owes virtually all of his malignant masochism to the fact his Father—a lanky lunatic that looks like a cross between Charles Manson and tragic Gothic prince Rozz Williams—was an abusive alcoholic asshole who raped him, his mother, and a prostitute, hence why the film opens with the quote: "THE SINS OF THE FATHERS SHALL BE VISITED UPON THE CHILDREN." If it were not for the degenerate dipsomaniac daddy that got him addicted to masochism in the first place, Ivan would probably would not want to deal with an unhinged bitch like 'Fetish Demon,' but his appetite for self-disintegration is an innate part of his being and compels him to be attracted to bat-shit crazy bitches who leave him in stitches. In the end, the post-apocalyptic femme fatale 'Fetish Demon' gets bored with brutalizing and torturing Ivan, but luckily the protagonist manages to find so much needed redemption by saving a pregnant woman from some goofy looking borreby untermensch who starts an impromptu massacre during one of the mutilation man shows. In what is a quasi-happy ending to a uniquely unhappy movie, Ivan walks in front of the 'Angel' while heading towards a new chapter in his life, thus reflecting that he has finally taken lead of his own destiny.

THE MUTILATION MAN

While shot over a four year period and aiming to be a sort of wildly idiosyncratic splatter-tinged Jodorowskyian mystical quest that also pays homage to great Guido gore masters like Lucio Fulci and Ruggero Deodato, The Mutilation Man ultimately seems like a hokey homemade horror mix-tape that was haphazardly assembled over a couple weekends while the director was drinking cheap beer and dropping acid with his buddies. Naturally, the fact that Jim Van Bebber, who was drunk for at least part of the production, is constantly featured in the film drinking beer and liquor only all the more adds to this glaring 'beer buddy' vibe. Of course, I would be lying if I did not admit that I found the film at least partially disturbing, albeit not in the way that the director probably originally intended. Indeed, while I was watching The Mutilation Man, I got the sense that the director is a troubled fellow with low self-esteem and a lot of emotional battle scars and internal open wounds who does not have a real outlet for his emotional and mental afflictions aside from watching old school horror flicks, listening to soulless heavy metal music, and making no-budget 'auteur' pieces. As director Andy Copp describes in the audio commentary for the DVD release of the film, he grew up in a poor white trash ghetto where he was routinely tormented by his abusive father (who the director lovingly describes as “my son-of-a-bitch dad”) and ironically grew up eating the same sort of cheap meat that was used as special effects for the film. Undoubtedly, for better or worse, the film brings new meaning to the famous The Wizard of Oz line: “There’s no place like home”

While the film would have probably been a little bit better if Copp had chosen to cut and edit the work together the traditional way by using a flatbed editor as opposed to transferring it onto video (after all, what is the point of shooting on real film in the first place if it is eventually going to be degraded to VHS quality?!), The Mutilation Man is ultimately a mutilated movie made for masochists and misfits that is full of half-baked ideas and fanboy horror fantasies and that was directed by a man that clearly loved horror and film in general but lacked the artistic talent and focus of vision to create something truly worthwhile. Indeed, something is certainly wrong with a film when its own director states of it: “I don’t know how clear it is in the film...and some people get it and some people don’t...I think it is more of my fault as a director for just not shooting it and editing it in such a way that it comes across...” For fans of jumbled video horror trash like the shot-on-video collage pieces of Charles Pinion (Twisted Issues, Red Spirit Lake), The Mutilation Man might seem like an unsung masterpiece, but I guess I am just not masochistic enough to truly dig such a aesthetically degrading work. Of course, there is one good thing I can say about the film and that is that it has a highly personalized essence about it that might inspire aspiring filmmaker to get off their asses and spill their guts. Indeed, The Mutilation Man may not be my cup of tea, but it managed to attract a loyal, if not marginal, fan base. After all, America is a place full of damaged individuals who were brutalized as children and somehow found solace in the seemingly unlikely world of horror cinema. While Copp’s film is in no way comparable to Jodorowsky’s films, it is surely a rare example of American ‘proletarian art,’ as a less than literate and rather visceral expression of a forlorn horror fan that was bred in a white ghetto who managed to slightly rise out of the cesspool he was spawned in, though as The Mutilation Man readily demonstrates, the cesspool never left him.

-Ty E

ALL GOOD THINGS
ALL GOOD THINGS

Andrew Jarecki* (2010)

I usually stay away from Hollywood dramas with big name stars in them as I tend to appreciate authentic human emotion (when it is done right, of course), not the contrived pseudo-emotions and sentimentalism concocted by the culture-distorting movie wizards of Sunset Boulevard. Of course, every once in a while I will watch a Hollywood drama that at least mildly interests me. When I found out the film All Good Things was based on the true story of Robert Durst, a rich and sadistic Jewish New York City realtor who got away with murdering his Aryan Shiksa wife, I knew that I had to see the film. I was also excited when I found out that Mormon Ryan Gosling would once again be playing a deranged Jew (see Henry Bean's The Believer for Gosling's greatest cinematic performance as a Jewish Neo-Nazi) in the film. After hearing Kirsten Dunst finally exposed her voluptuous bosoms in All Good Things, I figured even if it is a mediocre film, at least I get to see the tits of the little vamp featured in Interview with the Vampire.

Instead of properly including the real name of failed Realtor heir Robert Durst, All Good Things features the pseudonym David Marks (played by Gosling) in reference to the pothead wife killer. Being the homely son of a rich Jewish real estate tycoon, David plays it smart and marries himself an obedient working class beautiful blond named Katie. After all, not many males have enough patience to tolerate the nagging campaigns of your typical Jewish American Princess. After David Marks introduces his prize Nordic beauty to his Jewish female friend Deborah Lehrman (based on Susan Berman, the daughter of a Jewish Las Vegas mafia boss, who Robert Durst would also be responsible for killing), the obnoxiously narcissistic Jewess says to David, "You surprised me a little, you're married to a nice blond shiksa (A derogatory Yiddish word for female gentiles meaning "abomination", "impure," or "object of loathing")." David is surely obsessed and even respectful of his little shiksa but that all changes when Katie decides she wants a little independence and enrolls in medical school.

David Marks reminds me a Jew I used to live who was also named David. Like the David featured in All Good Things, my ex-roommate had a beautiful Aryan girlfriend that he used to keep incapacitated by providing her with a steady flow of high grade Marijuana. Also like David Marks, my ex-roommate would fly into erratic fits of rage (despite all the estrogen flowing in his body), pounding punches into the ribs of his shiksa girlfriend's cute American Eskimo dog. Unfortunately for Katie in All Good Things, her husband David Marks is less restrained than my Judaic ex-roommate as he beats his blond goy toy regularly, eventually murdering her and getting away with it. Maybe if some money grubbing Barbie shiksas watch All Good Things, they will think twice about marrying effeminate and unattractive Jewish men for their blood money, but in this materialistic and highly degenerated anti-kultur post-post-modern world, I find that highly doubtful.

All Good Things director Andrew Jarecki (who is also Jewish) is also responsible for directing the documentary Capturing The Friedmans, a repulsive and infuriating film that is all too sympathetic to its pedophile subjects, a Jewish son and Father duo who committed serial child sex abuse against many children that they were supposed to be giving computer lessons to. Like Capturing The Friedmans, All Good Things is a film that provides no criticism or condemnation when it comes to savage criminals members of God's Chosen (for what?) race. Interestingly enough, the real David Marks, Robert Durst, felt All Good Things was an excellent film, surely a moving picture trophy to his legacy as a spoiled brat that got away with murdering his wife. Whereas Capturing The Friedmans is sympathetic towards the Friedman family, providing sentimental home movies of the pedophilic family as well as portraying the police as evil men conducting a (anti-Semitic?) witch hunt, All Good Things shows the fairly lucky life of a murder and drug indulgent sadist. Despite being responsible for the deaths of three people (his wife, female friend, and an elderly man), Durst was only ever convicted of bond jumping and evidence tampering which resulted in a 5 year prison sentence. Apparently, Ryan Gosling made no effort in attempting to promote All Good Things and I would not be surprised if his lack of enthusiasm for the film was the result of the gifted actor realizing he played the main character in an ultimately immoral cinematic abomination (on top of being mediocre film). Also, I doubt Gosling was proud about having to dress as a middle aged drag queen (as Robert Durst did in real-life to "conceal his identity"). As for Kirsten Dunst, God was generous enough to endow her with marvelous mammary glands.

-Ty E

THE FLOCK
THE FLOCK

Andrew Lau (2007)

The Flock is a film starring real-life sex pervert Richard Gere who plays an aggressive and eccentric employee of the Department of Public Safety that checks up on sex offenders. Mr. Gere goes by the name of Agent Babbage in the film which is as silly of a name as the man himself. Agent Babbage really hates sex offenders and seems to have some repressed desires. One could even theorize that he may be taking out his impulse for unholy acts on perverts that he may have something in common with. The ever so boring Claire Danes plays the role of a young female replacement named Allison that has been partnered up with the soon to be retired Agent Babbage. The two agents are as different as two individuals can be thus resulting in expected character conflict. It is not until Ms. Allison realizes that perverts are permanently fucked up people that she loses her naïve leftist idealism. She almost becomes the victim of a pornographer that likes to take pictures of amputated and decomposing body parts. The Flock is a fairly tame film for its subject matter. It doesn't glorify the grotesque as David Fincher's overrated serial killer film Seven does. It also lacks the psychological "depth" of say The Silence of the Lambs. After all, any film featuring Richard Gere can't be taken too seriously. Mr. Gere hasn't been involved in such a "dark" film moment as The Flock since his friend committed suicide in An Officer and a Gentleman. The Flock is easily comparable to any good television show about cops that have to deal with unpredictable deranged individuals. The Flock is a splendid film to watch after eating a cup of strawberry yogurt and a bowl of old bay seasoned Tuna Fish. Serious and action packed melodrama is not to be expected with The Flock. Any film featuring the death of a chipped tooth Avril Lavigne is at least worth a leisurely viewing.

-Ty E

LEGEND OF THE FIST: THE RETURN OF CHEN ZHEN

Andrew Lau (2010)

Legend of the Fist highlights the status of Donnie Yen's increasingly successful career to a point. Reprising the incredibly popular spirit of Chen Zhen while filling the shoes worn by both Bruce Lee and Jet Li, Donnie Yen's titular interpretation takes place seven years after the events of his own television series Fists of Fury. Set during the Second Sino-Japanese War, the torch of martial art's legend Chen Zhen is in safe hands because as we all know, Donnie Yen isn't just an artist of the body but one that can dramatize damn near any role. So while he may get caught up on the burlesque portrayal of the cruel Japanese or the visually stimulating violence, it's been declared a safe passage which allows for some of the greatest recent escapism to flood through your nostrils and soak your brain in hair-pin mixed martial arts. And for what it's worth, The Return of Chen Zhen houses an indescribable charm, potent and out of place for this historically fantastical oddity.

Beginning abruptly in a war zone, the impoverished Chinese are panicking while attempting to take cover behind sandbags littered across what seems to have resembled a courtyard at one point. While their numbers dwindle and the need for ammunition becomes unbearable, the camera begins to fixate on Donnie Yen and if you didn't know any better, this is the scene to elect him as the hero of our story, Chen Zhen. After losing several of his friends to the faceless Germans nesting in several buildings surrounding them, Chen Zhen impacts a reserve of glandular focus and sprints at a break-neck speed across the battlefield with several blades. Performing various free-running maneuvers while blending a bit of meta-wuxia within his rhythm, he glides and twirls to reach his murderous destination within the base, singlehandedly killing every German with his affable Asiatic prowess. For a fair and default representation of the Germans, Legend of the Fist receives high marks from me for providing both an action spectacle and a display of warfare and not the warped politics behind the veil. This only further incriminates the sensitive pussies who claim that Legend of the Fist contains a sharp racial animosity towards the Japanese yet fails to even acknowledge the cinematic abuse of Germans since the Cinematographe decided to employ counter-propaganda.

These allegations haven't impeded the success or longevity of talk-back concerning Legend of the Fist but I found them peculiar and irrational enough to discuss within my written reflection. Within the elements of Legend of the Fist exists a storyline all too political concerning China's struggle with the Japanese vowing to occupy and control the "weaker" of their yellow brethren. The truth couldn't really be any closer to what is displayed in this film. The never-ending conflict between the Japanese and Chinese has been revisited many times within the years and I've recently finished Iris Chang's chilling documentation of the cruelty the Japanese have perpetrated in The Rape of Nanking. With the fresh ideals of a "better" holocaust in mind, Legend of the Fist doesn't offend or betray anyone with the depiction of the Japanese and if anything at all, serves as a mixed drink to be consumed by damn near anyone, especially after the realization of how diluted the product is in retrospect. The absurdity of these claims reaches a new peak as my tangent switches rails from the incredible choreographed fight scenes with Chen Zhen donning Kato's costume from The Green Hornet to the reverse-engineered understandable resentment of the Japanese by the Chinese. To be blunt, I'm relieved at the absence of the asinine German crowd control that most cliched villainry seems to adopt with doe in their eyes. And seeing as the Eastern film industry has been modeled meticulously after our own, do we not enjoy staring back at the beast?

LEGEND OF THE FIST: THE RETURN OF CHEN ZHEN

AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Unable to execute JavaScript.

To jump ship from the strenuous rant I've just exhausted, Legend of the Fist is an accelerated period piece with enough action to entertain even the most nit-picky arthouse squealer as he reorganizes his Criterion collection ritualistically, by spine number or what have you? This recent exploit from the Chinese fascist of action marks a continuing trend of mobilizing even the most stalwart of screenplays. Not to riff on the alternate-history of war and society's low times but it becomes painfully obvious that absolutely no one could have pulled this character off as well as Donnie Yen has in the Return of Chen Zhen. It's predictable, marvelous, bottom-heavy near the climax, and yet not long enough, but I find something new to love about this film with every thought that pops into my head throughout the day, whether it be the hilarious usage of the infamous feral growl that has found itself to be nature's Wilhelm Scream or the brutal race to save as many as the Japanese kill in a race for a country. Certainly not Donnie Yen's best performance but I'm proud to say I cannot say the same for the fight scenes. Call me giddy but I felt this incredible rush of energy throughout each and every frenetic and implausible blow to the merciless Japanese. Return of Chen Zhen marks yet another highly satisfying tale of a one-man army.

-mAQ

NAILS
NAILS

Andrey Iskanov (2003) It gets harder and harder to find contemporary directors that are worth following. Novice Russian director Andrey Iskanov is one of few worth mentioning. His dreamlike and surrealist films bring the viewer in a new world of pain. Hailing from modern day Russia alone could cause one to be easily influenced by the dark and perverse. Only a cinematic genius could shoot such masterpieces on budgets around a couple hundred US dollars. Nails is a short and sweet masterpiece by Iskanov. Driving nails through your skull and into your brain can produce a better trip than any acid trip. Using an electric drill on your brain can become a serious matter. Iskanov took Nails plot from a real life story. I guess you come to accept stories like that when you live in a country that has more abortions a year than births.

Nails was shot on digital video. I am generally against digital as I believe film will always have more character. Iskanov proves that you can make good of digital as a filmmaker on a low budget. He was able to do more with Nails than David Lynch could with his first digital movie Inland Empire. Digital video has opened the doors so that anyone could be a filmmaker. Imagine the talent that would have never have gotten discovered without it.

Andrey Iskanov is also a artist. Painting your protagonist into a wall is very effective when trying to derive a new type of emotion out of an audience. Watching a drill entering inside a brain also can be exciting. I also don't want to forget to mention the delicious looking entrees Nails protagonist gets out of a can.

There is nothing tasteless about any of these scenes. The visuals in Nails are the sign of a true auteur. Andrey Iskanov obvious knows what he wants to do with him and goes about trying to accomplish his goals. He is taking film to new boundaries and breaking down barriers (especially in horror). I think in disgust how Iskanov can do what he does with so little money when undeniable hacks like Eli Roth get millions. I guess Hollywood doesn't like Ruskies.

-Ty E

VISIONS OF SUFFERING

Andrey Iskanov (2006)

"A dream is a reality, rejected by our mind" Having watched this film, i couldn't help but feel marked. The film viewing experience is certainly a unique one. I don't know if that is the right word because i have never seen anything like this. Boasting an entirely unique plot, taking a stale label and boosting it's cult status, and showing us masterful abstraction and surrealism like no other, Andrey Iskanov is a new kind of auteur. One that doesn't have visible modesty and seems to be inspired by few. The loose narrative plot follows a troubled noir-ish man played by Alexander Shevchenko who has two things on his mind, sleep and the occasional cigarette. While not much in character development, we definitely feel claustrophobic in his dull existence. Lately, he has been host to the most neurotic nightmares ever filmed. Strange pulsing pods have been chasing him followed by a hulking figure without a face. Truly a horrifying sequence. Not since "This Night I'll Possess Your Corpse" has such a horrifying scene been shot with severe colors. After all is said and done, the man feels like his life is coming to an end so he decides to call his girlfriend at the frenetic nightclub DELIRIUM (Aptly named), his phone soon breaks. So what does any disturbed young chain smoking man do? Call the phone repairman. He goes next door to find a creepy fucking old guy who rasps at him madly until he leaves. As soon as that madness is over, the man soon arrives and fixes his phone. Dreams are brought up. Rain is discussed. The man tells him that the vampires are given flesh when it rains. What this man doesn't realize is that he sealed his doom. Whenever it rains these "Vampires" are given flesh and powers to do what they feel. In a NOES turn, they can kill you in your sleep through your dreams. All this leads to his discovery of horrendous horrors involving black clothed men standing outside his apartment and violent whispers on the other end of a phone line. Our camera shows us many angles and characters around this rainy city in Russia. Many tortured faces, souls, and scenes. One in particular at this nightclub where you pay money to beat the living shit out of a woman which can be seen as strangely erotic. All this combines in a truly unique film. Visions of Suffering is only one part of his HalluCinoGeNnN film series that can be described as artfully directed gore masterpieces that qualify him as a master of surrealism. This and the fact that he makes these films for slightly over 200 dollars USD. Andrey should direct his own version of the shit fest "WHITE NOISE" which would turn out to be quite horrifying. Russian Horror is all but rare. Only having seen his films and TRACKMAN, he is defying all odds and supporting a dead genre in his motherland all by himself. Visions of Suffering is available from Unearthed Films, a grand releasing company and i suggest you pick this up immediately. Look out for his new and last film in the series "PHILOSOPHY OF A KNIFE"

VISIONS OF SUFFERING

-Maq

PHILOSOPHY OF A KNIFE

Andrey Iskanov (2008)

Long have I been waiting for Iskanov's psycho-medical envisioning of the horrific events that took place at Unit 731. This latest outing of Iskanov might be his magnum opus. Driven by archive footage, narrated to explain the timeline, and part feature, POAK is a true documentary, for it takes you into things that should never be forgotten. For those of you who have no idea about the incident, what happened was that the Japanese set up a classified facility that housed some of the worst experimentations and chemical warfare crimes of the century. These were carried out on Russian and Chinese P.O.W's between the years of 1937 - 1945. The purpose was to form weapons against China and possibly Bolshevik Russia. As we can see from some of the tortures; they seemed hardly educational but served their purpose as meaningless and revolting. For example; injecting horse urine into a human kidney. The film is about 4 hours long, which spans two episodes; which should be finished over the span of a day or two. Many of the films that explain the same atrocities contain too many elements of trash and exploitation. For example, Black Sun: The Nanking Massacre didn't focus on the history or the atrocities; it was just like a violent over the top Jonathan Taylor Thomas film. Men Behind The Sun is guilty of the same thing, but still manages to be an exceptional film. POAK opens with two Japanese soldiers escorting a lone Russian POW through thick snow, before executing him by way of the blade. The realist performances enough are alone to initiate brainstorming. Much of the film is archived footage, so Iskanov being the new wave genius that he is, films many of the brutal scenes the same way. Through out the film, many horrible acts of putrid experimentation are being done, and it is hard to pick out between the real and the fake. There is no way around it, Philosophy of a Knife is the most violent and harrowing film I have ever seen, and I wouldn't have it any other way. Iskanov mixed with Shevchenko is the formula for the editing, which is at hand here. Many scratches and artificial debris clutter the screen, but only adds to the superficial beauty of it. The opening credits alone are a wet dream for all lovers of the macabre. Iskanov hand wraps this film with the feel of a Japanese film, including scrawling Japanese symbols mixing with bizarre blueprints of medical tools and torture devices. Large black-goggled men are dimly lit with luminescence set to a droning track of blips and beeps. A master soundtrack at the core, I haven't enjoyed a handcrafted soundtrack such as this since Tetsuo: The Iron Man. Manoush (From Amelie and Cannibal) plays a narration role of the female nurse, who is one of the tortured ones, but for the wrong reasons; she is directly involved with what is at hand. She performs bizarre sexual experiments, which cause her to lose her sanity. It shows how one sided this situation was. If you weren't with the Japanese, you weren't with anything; they made sure of that. Iskanov recorded over 13,000 sound effects for this film, none of them being used twice. A completely fresh feeling, mixed with horrible sadness. The film chronicles the experimentations and tortures committed by the Japanese, giving us an unflinching eye as to what was afoot in the real "Death Camp". Sexually transmitted diseases, pounds of plagues and tons of cholera were used in association with creating a plague shrapnel bomb that was to be used with a biological WMD. Scenes of narration on the historical aspect are intertwined with interview scenes from Anatoliy Protasov who experienced this all as a doctor of medicine, then scenes of soldier's interactions with the victims and the sorts of tortures. The beautiful thing about the variety of tortures in this film is the attention to every detail. Instead of being a splatter fest, we see it like it actually is. Instead of the highly unlikely intestinal discharge in MBTS, we are given the real deal, with bubbling flesh, eye stress, and the ultimate flesh-fire. These scenes show that not everyone really had a say in this. Most of the soldiers seem to come from the invaded town of Manchuria. Each horrific scene is spliced with even more unnerving footage of deterioration and madness. Philosophy of a Knife is biological insanity printed on film. It is really as simple as that. There will never be another film like this one. The set pieces of the film compliment the age-old incident. Ancient machines decorate the stained furniture and walls. On a technical side of the film, it is bathed in a starkly glorious light, which really expunges the colors and textures of the mutilation and tortures. This also serves its purpose as it magnifies the facial expressions of many of the doctors and victims. When the most graphic torture scenes ever filmed are over, morbidly poetic scenes of destruction then assault us. It presents itself with utmost importance, just to remind us that there are "no such things as monsters". Pointing out that this film is indeed a highly regarded film in my eyes, it doesn't mean it is always entertaining. Just as history is, segments will move slower than others. Watching this film for the gore value would be enough, but you'd miss the complete experience of it. A word of advice; don't walk into this film expecting a bloody romp with a colorful cast of dysfunctional characters. If you just want to just see some more "fucked up shit", you are almost stooping as low as the monstrosities depicted in this film. Andrey Iskanov is a pure-bred surrealist that is taking the world by storm. Whether you are on his side is your choice.

PHILOSOPHY OF A KNIFE

-mAQ

IN AN OLD MANOR HOUSE OR THE INDEPENDENCE OF TRIANGLES

Andrzej Kotkowski (1985)

As an American of solely Western European stock, I find there to be a certain alien quality to virtually all things Slavic and I say that as someone that has spent much time around actual Poles, Ukrainians, and Russians, thus I find their to be a certain extra eerie quality to Eastern European horror cinema, especially of the Polish sort. Indeed, even simply looking at vintage Polish film posters, one can sense that there is something singularly dark and moribund about the Polish collective unconscious. With my recent enthrallment with the delightfully decadent anti-communist cult classic Pożegnanie jesieni (1990) aka Farewell to Autumn directed by Mariusz Trelinski, I decided to track down more film adaptation of works by the film's source writer Stanisław Ignacy Witkiewicz (aka 'Witkacy') and eventually happened upon a particularly preternatural piece of Polish horror that mixes philosophy, metaphysics, and politics in a psychosexually sick yet almost shockingly cultivated supernatural form that pays respectful tribute to the man whose plays the work is based on. Indeed, the regrettably absurdly unknown work W starym dworku czyli niepodleglosc trójkątów (1984) aka In an Old Manor House or The Independence of Triangles aka In the Old Manor House directed by Andrzej Kotkowski is based on two plays by Witkacy, including W małym dworku (1921) aka Country House and Kurka Wodna (1921) aka The Water Hen, and it offers a particularly aesthetically refined instance of what one might describe as Polish absurdist Gothic horror that includes, among other things, themes of cross-generational incest and cuckoldry, uxoricide and filicide, spectrophilia, and class warfare of the mass murderous commie sort. A work that somehow manages to do the seemingly impossible by seamlessly interweaving Gothic horror with (meta)politics and philosophy, Kotkowski's film is indubitably an underrated classic of sorts that would surely gain a cult following outside of Poland if it actually had some sort of international distribution. Beginning with a wealthy patriarch murdering his second wife with a shotgun after discovering her making love to his somewhat effete adult art fag son from a previous marriage, In an Old Manor House tells the obsessively atmospheric and eerily and oftentimes eccentrically erotic tale of a vengeful whore ghost who haunts the Polish countryside while seducing and slaying men in most bizarre fashions. Set in turn of the century Poland before the peasants mindlessly revolted and featuring an impotent artist as the central protagonist, the film also seems to express Witkacy's less than flattering philosophy on the place of the artist in society as a whole, albeit from a intriguing post-revolution perspective after the commies had wiped out so-called bourgeois degeneracy and installed their delightful little real-life dystopia. Starring actors and actresses that were featured in various great European dark arthouse works, including Beata Tyszkiewicz of André Delvaux's The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short (1966) aka De man die zijn haar kort liet knippen and Guław Holoubek of Wojciech Haś' The Hourglass Sanatorium (1973) aka Sanatorium pod klepsydra, In an Old Manor House sometimes feels like a classic fairytale on acid with its mystical wooded setting, catchy songs, and supernatural elements, albeit with a dubious moral compass and dark sexuality that reminds the viewer of the seemingly irreparable spiritual and cultural damage that communism has had on Poland.

IN AN OLD MANOR HOUSE OR THE INDEPENDENCE OF TRIANGLES

Undoubtedly, you know you're a cowardly cuckold of a half-man when your prepubescent daughters mock you over the fact that your wife is secretly carrying on a hot and heavy romance with your exceedingly effete artist son. Indeed, such is the superlatively sorry situation of powerful businessman, aristocrat, and patriarch Dyapanazy Nibek, who blows away his recklessly wanton wife Anařtazja (Beata Tyszkiewicz) with a shotgun after catching her having sex with his surely scrawny art fag son Jezory. While Jezory begs his father not to kill his beloved stepmother, Dyapanazy simply replies, "I won't let her destroy your life the way she destroyed mine," ultimately not realizing that his audacious act of cold-blooded murder will have rather deleterious consequences for both him, his son, and the rest of the family. After killing his wife, Dyapanazy decides to invite his recently widowed cousin Aneta aka 'Annette Wesiewiczowna-Nevermore' (Grazyna Szapolowska of Krzysztof Kieslowski's A Short Film About Love (1988) aka Krótki film o miłości) to stay with him and his family at his large ancient country mansion in the hope she will eventually become his wife, but ultimately, not unlike Anařtazja, the woman will become the lover of the patriarch's pansy son Jezory. Notably, Jezory and Aneta are about the same age as they both first met one another as young kids and it is insinuated that they sexually experimented with one another. Meanwhile, after their mother is killed by their father Dyapanazy, mischievous preteen little girls Zosia and Marysia, who have certainly inherited the subversive spirit of their progenitor Anařtazja, decide to bury their baby dolls while singing a most morbid nursery rhyme with lyrics like, "La La – three small kittens...their brains eaten by grey maggots. La La – four small kittens...dad went away to a wretched woman." Undoubtedly, Zosia and Marysia seem to realize in a subconscious sort of way that they will soon be joining their mother for eternity.

The day that cousin Aneta arrives at the Mansion, she unwittingly ruins dinner and starts a fight between father and son by asking about Anařtazja, with Jezory stating of his deceased mistress-cum-stepmother, "She was brilliant and beautiful. What dad did to her was terrible [...] Why is my own father such a bastard," and Dyapanazy angrily retorting to his progeny, "Watch your tongue, you sissy." After berating his art fag son, Dyapanazy opts to reveal to Aneta that he indeed killed Anařtazja, proudly stating, "Yes, I killed her. I shot her like a dog in heat. I married her against the family's wishes. And she was lying to me.

Can you imagine? I couldn't stand it. To make things worse, Jezory was her lover. My wife's lover. And that's why I killed her." Rather inexplicably, after the proud patriarch boasts of killing his wife, deceased dame Anaŝtazja appears out of nowhere in ghost form and contradicts her homicidal hubby by stating, "It's not true, Dyapanazy. I died of my own free will. I wanted to die...and I died." Not only does Anaŝtazja contradict Dyapanazy, but she also reveals that she was the mistress of his best employee Ignacy Kozdron, who is the manager of his business and who the she-bitch ghost lovingly describes as, "my Romeo with abacus." To demonstrate his love for her, Jezory reads Anaŝtazja poetry that he has written for her, somberly stating, "Bloodless paleface...sublime death mask...Candles burning in the final hour..." but the sensual spirit is less than impressed with his literary longings. In fact, Anaŝtazja breaks Jezory's heart by telling him that she never loved him and describes his belief that she loved him as one of his many "artistic delusions." Ultimately, Anaŝtazja visits Jezory that night and tells him that he must forget about her and marry his cousin Aneta, which he ultimately does. Jezory has been unable to paint or write poetry every since Anaŝtazja died, but Aneta ultimately restores his questionable artistic prowess, or lack thereof. Rather unfortunately for him and his entire family, Jezory's artistic inspiration does not last long. While Anaŝtazja gives him the artistic advice, "The most beautiful and powerful art is the art of lying. All artists should be aware of that," Jezory ultimately never takes heed of her insights and ultimately stays true to himself, thereupon ultimately having rather horrific consequences.

When Anaŝtazja coerces her two young daughters Zosia and Marysia to drink green poison and the two little girls ultimately die, Jezory decides it is time that he murder his dead lover/stepmother for a second time. While Dyapanazy theorizes that Zosia and Marysia deaths are "Anaŝtazja's revenge," the ghost rationalizes her murdering of her two daughters by stating to Jezory, "You'd seduce them if it wasn't for your cousin who was ready to seduce you first." Somewhat curiously, Anaŝtazja goads Jezory into killing her by stating, "Shoot me now or I'll despise you forever like you were a dog," so the artist shoots her in the stomach with a shotgun. Rather bizarrely, as Anaŝtazja succumbs to her wounds, a hand appears out of the ground and before Jezory knows it, a large old tree is uprooted and a somewhat dorky four-eyed teenage boy with a dead serious facial expression appears from under it. The boy is Jezory and Anaŝtazja's posthumously 'born' bastard son Tadeusz and he will eventually become the ultimate prodigal son as an angry young man who leads a revolution against his entire family in tribute to his forsaken mother. As Jezory curiously states upon seeing the boy for the first time, "I might be his father, though I hate children." When Jezory brings Tadeusz back home, Dyapanazy asks his son who the "worm" is and the artist replies, "He's Tadeusz. He came out of the ground" and reveals that he is his son. After Dyapanazy says he likes Tadeusz and Aneta is introduced as the boy's 'mother,' Jerzory states to himself, "Finally I created my own family. I can start a new life...But can I stand this?" Of course, Jerzory's family will be an abject failure.

IN AN OLD MANOR HOUSE OR THE INDEPENDENCE OF TRIANGLES

After Jerzory and Aneta have a large public wedding, a local peasant describes how he wishes he was the artist and how he feels like "manure," to which another prole resentfully replies to by describing the artist and his family as "maggots" that are "on the carcass of some prize cow from the past." From there, the subversive peasant goes on a rant about creating a utopian "new order" that rejects everything from the past and creates "Everything new. New machines, New paintings...Symphonies, poems, dances, everything." While the peasants are talking, the ghost of Anaŝtazja once again appears and attempts to incite the proletarians by poetically stating, "Society is a woman. She needs a male to rape her. Am I wrong?" After he talk with the peasants, Anaŝtazja seduces her old lover Ignancy Kozdron and intentionally causes him to drown in the process, thereupon causing Dyapanazy to lose his best employee. To the chagrin of Jerzory, an exceedingly arrogant psychopath named Ryszard Korbowski is brought in to replace Ignancy and he soon begins a lurid love affair with the artist's wife Aneta. After calling his weak nemesis a "cheap painter," Ryszard proudly states to Jerzory regarding his wife, "I'm her lover...And thanks to her dead husband...I have a salary too." Ryszard is a 'fascist' of sorts who states regarding any citizen that dares to rebel against his planned utopia, "...And if you don't want to work, a bullet in the head. A risky experiment perhaps...But we'll have to sacrifice ourselves." When Dyapanazy questions whether or not Ryszard's planned political system will be a democracy, he replies, "It would be a so-called democracy but without parliament's bluff. What people need is a true fictional religion. Not some kind of substitute dream of a general strike. People yearn for a new religion. But we must control it. Make it a social matter." Notably, when Jerzory asks Ryszard what place "truth and beauty" will have in his proposed utopian society, the smug fascist true believer replies, "The future will not need that. They'll be happy. Isn't that enough?," thereupon causing the artist to laugh hysterically. Indeed, Jerzory ultimately becomes both a sexual and cultural cuckold of sorts while Ryszard is in charge.

Naturally, phantasmagoric femme fatale Anaŝtazja continues killing men around the countryside, including Dyapanazy's servant Mr. Maszejko. When Anaŝtazja visits Jerzory and asks him about his love affair with his wife Aneta, the artist replies, "Don't even talk about love. I'm just a marionette. I've nothing to do with that. I'm in pain worse than ever. I've started a new life." Jerzory also reveals to the ghost that he is having a hard time bonding with his son Tadeusz, stating, "I'm attached to him...but he doesn't love me." Needless to say, Tadeusz becomes quite upset when he walks in on his (step)mother Aneta having sex with Ryszard and says to the latter, "I hope you burst." Ultimately, Tadeusz completely loses faith in both his father and family in general, especially after having sex with his birth mother Anaŝtazja during an act of spectrophiliac incest. While making love to her son, Anaŝtazja tells Tadeusz, "Be the best in whatever you choose to do." When Jerzory finds Anaŝtazja and Tadeusz together, the latter remarks regarding his ghost mother, "I'm in love with her and I want to marry her." Anaŝtazja justifies her proposed marriage with their mutual son by stating to Jerzory, "His soul is beautiful. With me he'll become great."

Of course, everything begins to fall apart for the Nibek family after a successful communist revolution occurs and all private property is made illegal. Not surprisingly, Aneta 'officially' leaves Jerzory for his rival Ryszard and when the artist accuses her of being a "peasant's mistress" and "spy," she hatefully replies, "I'd prefer the vilest man to one chickenhearted like you. Painter!" In fact, Aneta goes so far as completely destroying Jerzory's entire character, stating to him, "You're repulsive...Neither musician nor painter. The very sound of your name kills art." Despite originally being a fascist of sorts, perennial opportunist Ryszard naturally becomes a diehard commie revolutionary after the revolution. Meanwhile, Dyapanazy wisely states regarding Ryszard and 'workers' in general, "servants will always be servants," as if to insinuate that communism only left the working-class all the more locked firmly in place in its chains. When Tadeusz decides to leave for good with his mother/lover Anaŝtazja, his father Jerzory attempts to warn him by stating, "If you leave with her, you're lost," but the boy will not budge and retorts, "You only say that because you're jealous. I'll do as I please." Of course, Tadeusz decides to completely part ways with his family for good and wage war against them after Jerzory shoots and kills Anaŝtazja with a shotgun. Indeed, Tadeusz hatefully states to his father, "I see now. Your fake crimes, fake people, fake emotions. Everything's fake. I won't be like that. I won't [...] I'll never forgive you."

Towards the end of the film, Jerzory asks his father Dyapanazy why he did not kill him the day he killed Anaŝtazja after finding the two having sex and the old patriarch replies, "I hoped you'd write, paint. I couldn't let her destroy your life the way she destroyed mine. You have to be an artist. That was your mother's wish." Ultimately, Jerzory must confess that he is a failure as both a man and as an artist, stating, "I suffered, but it wasn't artistic suffering. The last thing left for me in this life is death. The last thing to do." When the ghosts of Anaŝtazja and his two dead young daughters Zosia and Marysia appear at the family mansion, Dyapanazy somewhat humorously declares a toast to, "three failed generations," as if he has finally accepted that all is lost in terms of his life and the future of his family. In the end, prodigal son Tadeusz leads a proletarian lynch mob carrying pitchforks to the Nibek home and self-righteously declares like some mini Trotsky, "Listen, what are you afraid of? They're garbage not your masters. We, the people, don't need this democracy. We can govern ourselves. We'll create a real paradise. Without leaders and work. There's no room for individuality or personality. The self has no place. Long live the masses." Of course, the angry mob of bloodthirsty lumpenproles invades the Nibek home and exterminates what is left of the forsaken family. Before he can be butchered by a brigade of braindead bolsheviks, Jerzory somberly says to himself, "If I could paint I'd be scared less. But all this has no form. Only zigzags in eternal space" and then proceeds to kill himself by slitting his own throat with a straight razor. While Jerzory never had much control over his own life, he was at least able to end it on his own terms. Notably, Jerzory looks quite peaceful after committing suicide, as if he has finally reached the sense of solace that he had always searched for but could never find. As for Anaŝtazja, she calmly walks away from the smoldering ruins of the Nibek estate with her two daughters as if her vengeful metaphysical mission as a haunting harlot has finally been fully realized.

IN AN OLD MANOR HOUSE OR THE INDEPENDENCE OF TRIANGLES

Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes In an Old Manor House or The Independence of Triangles such a penetrating piece of poetic cinematic horror is that it was inspired by about half a century of real-life commie horror and the curious social circumstances of aristocratic decadence that partially led to communism in the first place. Aside from being inspired by the anti-commie/anti-authoritarian writings of Witkacy—a man who, not unlike the protagonist Jerzory of the film, ended his own life when the Bolshevik butchers invaded his homeland—the flick seems to be influenced by Italian philosopher, sociologist, and economist Vilfredo Pareto's classic text The Rise and Fall of Elites: An Application of Theoretical Sociology, which influenced Mussolini's rise to power and describes how elites typically bring about their own demises via progressive moral degeneracy and absurdly supporting political movements that call for the destruction of the very class that they belong to (indeed, as Spengler rightly noted, Marx was a failed member of the bourgeoisie who never worked a single day in his entire life, not to mention the fact that Trotsky was the son of a wealthy kosher capitalist). Of course, Kotkowski's film depicts the demise of the central family as the result of the hateful revenge of a forsaken prodigal son who was sinisterly sired via a sort inter-generational sin that involved incest, deceit, and even murder, among other things. Indubitably, In an Old Manor House also reveals Witkacy's influence from Otto Weininger in terms of its relentless depictions of misogyny. Indeed, ghost Anaŝtazja practically channels anti-feminist Jewess Esther Vilar when she states, "All beautiful and healthy women lie all their life [...] You can't say what's true and what's a lie. The only certain thing in the world is a lie [...] Only hunchbacked and crippled girls don't lie. Perhaps they want to...but no one believes them. That's why they're so frustrated." While only mere speculation on my part, I am sure that Witkacy would have appreciated Kotkowski's film, which manages to do the seemingly impossible by channeling the delightfully decadent aesthetic and philosophical spirit of pre-commie Europe without seeming like an obscenely outmoded absurdity.

Aside from being based on two of the Polish artistic Renaissance man's classic plays, In an Old Manor House will also surely interest Witkacy fans due to the fact that some of the scenes resemble some of the artist's paintings and especially self-portraits (for example, a scene featuring protagonist Jerzory's image being reflected from various different angles via a mirror bears a striking resemblance to Witkacy's iconic 1915-1917 work Multiple Self-Portrait in Mirrors). In terms of the film's emphasis on the suffering of an artist as a result of his ultimately tragic decisions, darkly erotic approach to necromancy and spectrophilia, singular darkly romantic aesthetic elegance and foreboding and oftentimes chiaroscuro-like arthouse approach to horror cinema, the only other film I can compare Kotkowski's work to is the rather underrated British Sheridan Le Fanu adaptation Schalcken the Painter (1979) directed by Leslie Megahey. If Wojciech Has' The Hour-Glass Sanatorium (1973), which is based on a work by Witkacy's kosher comrade Bruno Schulz, is a sort of celluloid nightmare haunted by the ghosts of pre-holocaust Polish Jewry, In an Old Manor House is a sort of celluloid Hades depicting the forsaken lost souls of the foredoomed pre-communist aristocracy. While Kotkowski's film undoubtedly features an exceedingly unflattering depiction of the Polish aristocracy, it is arguably even less sympathetic to communists, who are more or less depicted as a mob of misguided and resentful philistine thugs that are ironically led by members of the upper-classes whose thirst for revolution has been sown in personal hatred for their own family members, thus reflecting the absurdity of the commie revolution in Poland and communism in general. Of course, as In an Old Manor House delightfully demonstrates, Witkacy knew all too well that communism was a sinister scam that was born out of hatred and resentment and could only bring hell on earth, especially to those that longed for it the most. Undoubtedly, it is only fitting that the film is a ghost story, as the legacy of communism will probably continue to haunt Poland and the rest of Eastern Europe for centuries to come, thereupon securing Witkacy's rightful place as the most important and prophetic Polish artist of his rather tragic zeitgeist.

-Ty E

THAT MOST IMPORTANT THING: LOVE
THAT MOST IMPORTANT THING: LOVE

Andrzej Żuławski (1975)

After a recent one-man Andrzej Żuławski marathon, I came to the somewhat ironical conclusion that the director's (arguably) most accessible and aesthetically conventional film, L'important c'est d'aimer (1975) aka That Most Important Thing: Love aka The Main Thing Is to Love aka Nachtblende—a love story for the terminally lovesick and romantically nihilistic based on the novel La Nuit américaine by the film's frog co-screenwriter Christopher Frank—is also one of his greatest and most immaculate accomplishments as an artist. Of course, like many of the director's cinematic works, including his most popular and well known feature Possession (1981), the French-Italian-German co-production deals with the timeless Żuławskian theme of 'love as pain' and the rather romantic notion of true love being a grave metaphysical affliction that can bring death and self-destruction, among other less than desirable things. Indeed, the sort of love depicted in a Żuławski flick is more deleteriously addictive and all-consuming in the poetic sense than the way poet and cine-magician Jean Cocteau described the eponymous narcotic in his classic text Opium: Diary of a Cure (1930). Of course, being a Żuławski flick, it is a cinematic work that practically redefines the romance film as it feels more fierce, frantic, violent, and fast-paced than the latest Hollywood action film, albeit non-retarded and packed with almost painfully penetrating pathos. Additionally, only in Żuławski's film does the random anecdote, which is not even depicted onscreen, of a pathetic commie intellectual reciting Rimbaud as his last words on his deathbed become one of many so memorable moments, as if the auteur was able to fit three or four films into one. Depicting a bizarre love triangle between a wash-up Austrian exploitation actress, her exceedingly emasculated and perennially unemployed beta-male frog husband, and a French alpha-male photographer protagonist that is determined to make her his beloved, That Most Important Thing: Love is also a film about how women, including old and used up ones, can completely destroy men without even the slightest bit of effort or concern for the forsaken fellows that suffered the misfortune of falling in love with them. In short, the film brings a certain poetic truth to Friedrich Nietzsche's oftentimes quoted words, "Ah, women. They make the highs higher and the lows more frequent." Unfortunately for the film's male protagonist and the goofy guy he cuckolds, the heroine—played by Austrian diva Romy Schneider in a performance that would rightly earn her a 'frog Oscar' (aka César Award)—is too much of a sad solipsistic emotional mess of a woman to be too concerned with the fact that she is tearing up the souls of the two men that matter the most to her in life.

Admittedly, it felt somewhat like kismet when I recently watched That Most Important Thing: Love for the first time as I had a somewhat recent romantic experience that is, at least superficially, comparable to that of the protagonist.

Indeed, I began a brief yet somewhat passionate romance with a girl that found herself unable to breakup with her longtime cuckold fiancé despite her completely sexless and largely pathetic relationship with him, as she could not break an old routine with a loser that she openly admitted that she was completely sexually disgusted with. Incidentally, this same girl bears a superficial resemblance to Romy Schneider. Needless to say, after watching the film and experiencing something similar firsthand, I have resolved to never ever again deal with a damaged dame that lacks the strength and decisiveness to stick with one man. In the film, Schneider's character—an ex-whore of sorts that makes a living flaunting her flesh in disreputable Jean Rollin-esque art-horror-erotica—feels obligated to stay completely faithful to her husband despite the fact that they have nil sex life and he is a weak and pathetic unemployed man that collects Hollywood publicity shots like some old queen-ish antique dealer. In short, the heroine—a woman that is clearly well past her prime in terms of pulchritude—finds herself practically creaming her pants at first sight when she meets the masculine alpha-male photographer protagonist played by Italian Stallion Fabio Testi (who apparently was some sort of macho male bimbo in real-life), who makes the iconic character played by David Hemmings in Michelangelo Antonioni's counterculture classic Blow-Up (1966) seem like a sapless Brit prick bitch pussy by comparison. Although a dark love story, it is also a film about broken people where no character is unforgettable but virtually every single one seems to have been either forgotten, disposed of, and/or beaten down by society. Set in a largely dark and dreary Parisian underworld inhabited by overly intellectual communist cuckolds, puritanical black market pornographers, megalomaniacal theater faggots, impotent cinephiles, childish gangsters, and other losers and freaks, That Most Important Thing: Love ultimately makes love seem like a painfully rare and important thing that demands great sacrifice due to the ugliness, failure, and stupidity that seems to consume most of humanity; or so one discover in the unforgettably zany Żuławskian realm.

In a somewhat incriminating interview included as an extra feature of the Mondo Vision DVD of That Most Important Thing: Love, Żuławski states, "It's true that I'm more gripped by the characters who are perhaps good people at heart, but who end up going down a slippery slope, and don't ever manage to fit into society." Indeed, every single character in the film is a misfit of sorts that is connection to a group of misfits, including pornographers, theater poofs, and gangsters, yet Żuławski somehow manages to give most of these individuals a certain degree of humanity. Undoubtedly, the film's tall, dark, and handsome protagonist, Servais Mont (Fabio Testi of Vittorio de Sica's The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (1970))—a two-time war veteran and stoic yet not exactly sophisticated alpha-male of sorts—is the most seemingly normal of these characters and he is a fairly lonely guy with a drug addict bum for a father who makes his living taking pornographic photos involving such unsavory things as homo mis-cegenation involving muscular negroes and Brit tranny freaks with Isaac Asimov fetishes. At the very beginning of the film, Servais sneaks into a porno shoot to take bootleg photos of its female star Nadine Chevalier (Romy Schneider) straddling a bloody corpse, but he is instantly taken aback when the failed actress stares directly at him and states to him while sobbing with a certain inordinate emotive intensity, "No photos please. I'm an actress, I do good stuff. I only do this to... to eat." While Servais manages to escape from the film set with the snapshots after getting in a brawl with a couple film crew members and being kicked out of the production, he immediately becomes obsessed with Nadine to the point where he wastes no time in finding out where she lives and then randomly shows up there unannounced. Luckily for Servais, Nadine seems to be just as interested in him, but unfortunately she has certain moral obligations to her unemployed beta-boy husband Jacques Chevalier (musician turned actor Jacques Dutronc in his second acting role) and has also adopted a sort of self-stylized Puritanism as an assumed psychological defense mechanism due to her decidedly debasing career as an exploitation slut. A childless c grade actress that lies multiple times to Servais by claiming she is only 30 even though she is clearly about a decade older and thus has very little sexual market value left to any man that is serious about having children, Nadine is clearly at a miserable place in her life, so naturally the handsome protagonist is very tempting to her. Unfortunately, Nadine's husband is a serious obstacle, at least until he becomes seriously suicidal.

THAT MOST IMPORTANT THING: LOVE

While poor old Jacques is a seemingly impotent loser that cannot even bear to fuck his wife even when she is literally on her knees begging for it while repeatedly declaring "Fuck me!," he certainly understands Nadine as indicated by his remark to Servais in regard to her seeming hypocritical occupation as a porn star, "Nadine does them but doesn't like them because she's a puritan. Understand that? She's done everything and showed everything and is getting more and more puritanical. She discovered she had principles. Now, you can strip her of her pants, but not her principles. She couldn't explain her principles. They're just there...like rails and Nadine sticks to them even if they burn her feet like right now." Of course, Jacques' passive-aggressively expressed words reveal why Nadine is initially hesitant to engage in carnal passions with Servais despite their clear strong mutual attraction for one another. As a man that begrudgingly snaps shots of orgies for an elderly effete gangster he despises named 'Mazelli' (Claude Dauphin)—a reluctant pornographer that also happens to be a prissy little prude—Servais certainly has more in common with Nadine than a mere mutual attraction, as they are both individuals that really loathe their jobs because they are forced to routinely debase themselves just to get a paycheck. Two seemingly innately moral people that have been degraded by the demands and influences of a degenerate demonic world inhabited by freaks, faggots, and fucks-ups, Nadine and Servais seem like they could be soul mates in some ideal alternate universe, but they are ultimately trapped in a living nightmare of isolation, morbid melancholy, and just plain bad luck. Like her husband Jacques, who apparently acquired her love and affection by saving her from a self-destructive life of hedonism and whoredom, Servais wants to be Nadine's own personal savior and decides to put himself in a precarious situation to accomplish that goal by borrowing a bunch of money from his much hated gangster 'boss' Marzelli so that he can financially back a play and thus secure his would-be-ladylove the prestigious lead female role of Lady Anne in an avant-garde theatrical production of Shakespeare's Richard III. Indeed, somewhat ironically, Servais gets sucked further into the slimy subterranean realm of pornography so that he can rescue Nadine, who initially has no clue that he is even responsible for getting her the role.

On top of going into great debt and virtually selling his soul to a boss that he absolutely loathes, Servais also makes some other sacrifices to get Nadine the role in Richard III, including befriending a theater troupe of flaming fag degenerates that include an absurdly arrogant German aristocrat named Karl-Heinz Zimmer (Klaus Kinski) and his cross-dressing director pal named Laurent Messala (Guy Mairesse). In fact, despite the fact that he is clearly a rampantly heterosexual frog buck, Servais even attempts to convince Nadine that he is an old friend of queen Messala so that he has an excuse to hang around the rehearsals for Richard III and thus spend time with her. Of course, as a man with a criminal drug addict father (Roger Blin) that longs after mulattoes, Servais is not too picky with who he hangs out with, though he certainly has somewhat curious friends in general. To his minor discredit, the protagonist, who has his own flaws and annoying idiosyncrasies, also has no problem cuckolding his best friend Raymond Lapade (Michel Robin)—an unhinged Marxist dork and all-around failed intellectual that, somewhat ironically, gives him romance advice and inspires his quest to get Nadine to play the lead in Richard III—even though he does not seem particularly fond of his beautiful wife Luce (Nicoletta Machiavelli) and quickly forgets about fucking her when Nadine enters the picture. In fact, pussy does not seem to be something that is particularly hard for Servais to acquire as he also sleeps with a hot Vietnamese whore (Hong Kong model Sin May Zao), but all these fuck-buddies disappear when he falls in love with Nadine. When it comes down to it, Servais is ultimately a loner that does not seem particularly fond of his friends or fuck-buddies, thereupon making it all the more apparent that his obsessive love for Nadine is real and not simply some form of misguided infatuation.

Aside from also wanting to be her savior, Nadine's pathetic husband Jacques is more or less the complete opposite of Servais in practically every way imaginable. Indeed, while Servais is tall, strong, stoic, hardworking, and seemingly humorless, Jacques is a short goofy cinephile that seems to be allergic to work and incessantly acts like a clown to the point where he literally sports clown make-up at one point in the film. While Jacques is completely financially supported by his wife, who cinematically peddles her puss for a living in trashy films with titles like Nymphocula, Servais is willing to go into extreme debt with an unsavory gangster he hates in the hope that he can simply make his seemingly perennially dejected would-be-lover happy. In that sense, Servais is certainly the more ideal lover for Nadine, who has been forced to take on the sexually inverted role of breadwinner. While Jacques is a pathetically laughable loser that lives his life like it is one big joke because he seems to be quite conscious that he is a joke, he is certainly no moron and almost immediately realizes that Servais will soon replace him. Notably, in an attempt to rationalize her sad and pathetic marriage to an unemployed film dork, Nadine describes her dubious relationship with Jacques as follows to Servais, "I'm neither a victim nor a prisoner. My life is what it is even if you don't think it adds up to much. About the ghost in my last play, six years ago. I married him and I love him." Rather unfortunately for him and his wife, Jacques also refuses to fuck Nadine and it is hinted that he is all but completely impotent despite his worship of manly fictional heroes like Zorro and the Italian silent era cinema hero Maciste created by proto-fascist hero Gabriele d'Annunzio and Giovanni Pastrone. Of course, it is obvious that Jacques lives in a fantasy world of cinema and superheroes because he needs to escape from his own miserable unmanly existence, hence his boyish reverence of Zorro and Maciste. In short, Servais is the man that Jacques never was and everyone in the bizarre love triangle seems to be painfully aware of this, though the protagonist would never be so arrogant as to actually state this.

THAT MOST IMPORTANT THING: LOVE

Needless to say, Nadine is the only thing that Jacques has to live for, so naturally suicide becomes the only serious viable option when he poses to lose her. Indeed, when Nadine realizes that Servais must truly love her after he turns down her pussy when she offers it to him as payment after learning that he secretly funded the Richard III project so that she would secure the lead female role, Jacques also comes to the cold realization that his wife is hopelessly in love with a strong and protective man and she will be moving on. Right before killing himself, Jacques finally drops the pathetic clown routine and confronts Nadine in regard to her true feelings for him, stating, "You know what the lousiest thing is? The most disgusting. Pity. Because it's terminal. I know what you think of me. Of all my bullshit. There's a word for it. I found it in my leather bound and gilded dictionary. Contempt." Jacques also tells Nadine, "I can do anything for you except... live," so naturally he must die and he does so by intentionally overdosing on drugs in the bathroom of the very same restaurant where they had the intense post-breakup conversation only minutes before. In a sick and pathetically passive-aggressive twist, Jacques sets it up so that his replacement Servais is the first to discover his corpse in what is ultimately a most loathsome craven attempt at revenge. While staring at Jacques' corpse at the morgue, Servais becomes emotionally erratic for the first time in the film, declares in front of Nadine, “What a jerk!” and then proceeds to scream in his ladylove’s face after she physically attacks him, “Why did he do it? He should have done it before! Before he met you! Why did he do it? He should have done it before knowing you! Do you understand?”

Love kills, or so one certainly learns at the end of the ultimately somewhat bitterly brutally titled That Most Important Thing: Love, which concludes with Jacques successfully committing suicide and Servais being beaten within an inch of his life by a motley crew of gangsters at the behest of his (ex)boss Marzelli. While Nadine finally tells Servais that she loves him and caresses his badly brutalized body, it remains to be seen whether or not the male protagonist survives the ordeal, though one can certainly see the two being happily married if he does; or at least as happy as two outcasts can be. For better or worse, Servais ultimately proved his dedication and paid a hefty price to be with Nadine, who initially let her sentimentalism for a spiritually castrated cinophile blind her from a very great future. On the other hand, the innate irrationality of heterosexual love seems completely sane when compared to the almost otherworldly narcissism and all-around megalomaniacal madness of the homosexual characters in the film, namely the kraut queen Karl-Heinz Zimmer as personified by the one and only Klaus Kinski. Indeed, after discovering that his play is a critical bomb, Karl-Heinz needs to repair his ego and thus decides to brutally beat a couple boorish heterosexual men and then, despite his fagdom, proceeds to take home said boorish heterosexual men’s women and fuck them in a threesome. Notably, before beating up the men under the dubious pretense of one of them touching his coat, Karl-Heinz states to them with a sort of exceedingly eloquent understated rage, “My overcoat, sir. You touched it [...] I paid a lot for this overcoat! Since I’m a well-bred homosexual, I care a lot for my things. Silence. I don’t like your type. You touched me with your proletarian fingers.” Undoubtedly, as the film reveal, homosexual insanity makes lovelorn lunacy seem rather tame by comparison, especially in regard to Teutonic dick-downing dandies.

While That Most Important Thing: Love depicts female protagonist Nadine in a relatively favorable light, I cannot help but think of her husband’s suicide and be reminded of the H.L. Mencken quote, “No matter how much a woman loved a man, it would still give her a glow to see him commit suicide for her.” Indeed, as the popularity of websites and apps like Instagram, Twitter, and Tinder demonstrate, female narcissism and solipsism knows no bounds. Taking this into consideration, one cannot help but speculate Żuławski and source writer/co-screenwriter Christopher Frank’s intent as to why the fierce fag played by Kinski randomly declares, “Philosophically speaking, if you don’t count St. Thomas Aquinas, the medieval period was a catastrophe but we owe it a certain conception of women’s dignity.” Of course, with his later film Possession, which could also be called That Most Insane Thing: Love, Żuławski would reveal a more cynical view of love and especially marriage. Additionally, in an interview included with the Mondo Vision Blu-ray release of the filmmaker's somewhat neglected feature La note bleue (1991) aka The Blue Note—a film that depicts with an almost annoying degree of artistic license the bitter end of the romantic relationship between Polish composer Frédéric Chopin and pseudonymous French novelist George Sand—Żuławski concludes in regard to the real-life protagonist of his film, “After this day depicted. . . filmed. . . in LA NOTE BLEUE, he never wrote any kind of new music. He went through Europe, went to Scotland, went to England, went to . . .—while adding some notes here and retracting some notes there—and he died, which means for me only one thing; if you're in a profound, real love relationship with somebody, be this somebody good or bad, you'll die of it.” Naturally, Żuławski's remark seems somewhat curious when one considers that he seems to have been fueled by the romantic ideal of ‘Liebestod,’ but then again maybe he never ever really experienced a “profound, real love relationship,” though I sincerely doubt it. After all, the auteur was in a long-term artistically fruitful romance with singular French beauty Sophie Marceau and one can only assume he suffered greatly at some point in that relationship, hence the increasingly romantically nihilistic nature of his films. While That Most Important Thing: Love is indubitably a dark romance that concludes in a fittingly unsettling fashion, it ultimately seems like a sentimental rom-com when compared to the bloody bacchanalian brutality and Yandere insanity of Żuławski's later Polish feature Szamanka (1996) aka She-Shaman.

THAT MOST IMPORTANT THING: LOVE

Notably, Żuławski would state of the importance of That Most Important Thing: Love in the context of his entire filmmaking career, “It's a film that has stayed very close to me, because of its humanity. The final feelings it leaves me with are very human, and not artificial.” Undoubtedly, the film features the auteur's warmest and most sympathetic female character and not the sort of demonically possessed sort of bitches in his later works like Possession and Szamanka. Indeed, the film is ‘humanistic’ in the best sense of the word as a cinematic work where the scab of lovesick humanity is ruthlessly ripped off and the open wound is allowed to freely bleed into the viewer's soul. After all, even when Nadine declares to Servais, “You see, you were right. A woman can always be bought. Whatever they say,” one cannot help but respect the vulnerability in her honesty and I say that as someone that finds poetry in the words of Otto Weininger. Rather embarrassingly, I am not really familiar with much of Romy Schneider's work, but she certainly reveals in Żuławski's film that she was the height of feminine elegance and the sort of actress that seems painfully nonexistent nowadays. While Schneider's character Nadine might be a porno whore that is certainly long past her peak in terms of pulchritude and fertility, I think it is safe to say that many men, including myself, long to be with a woman of such bargain bin diva divinity. Romantic intrigues aside, the film also carries a very important message about the tragedy of true individuality in a socially oppressive world where both literal and figurative serfdom and whoredom seems to be the norm. Indeed, while his eccentric entourage of eclectic goons are brutally beating Servais to a bloody pulp at the end of the film, villain Marzelli exposes his own personal Weltanschauung and declares to the protagonist, "You know kid, normally people like us don't exist. I know it but I'm the only one. Each morning when I see myself, I say: 'this is not real.' So, since we don't exist we must find a way to be accepted, right? That's what you're doing now. You're accepting." Considering Marzelli's words, one can only come to the conclusion that That Most Important Thing: Love is a film about accepting the fact that life sucks and then you die, but if you're lucky you might snag a Romy Schneider-tier babe at some point during your miserable existence.

-Ty E

POSSESSION
POSSESSION

Andrzej Żuławski (1981)

Have you ever stumbled upon a film that entranced you, not just with the plot progression or stellar casting, but with a tale of murmuring madness? Going into Possession with the knowledge only of a feminine hatred uprising, I concluded that this film was to chronicle a break-up and how right I was. Directed in the eye of the storm, Andrzej Żuławski continues his (unknown to me) cosmically surreal ascension into philosophical tripe masked with a "blasphemous" swipe to the construct of puritanism - all in the span of his own terribly messy divorce! As Infinite Jest^{er} would spread it, "Isn't Possession the perfect break-up movie?" This continues my autumn habit of not reading a synopsis and indulging tastes with a blindfold, lucky for me that Possession breaks tides in its berserk ambiguity. As regarded by a select group of people who can stomach the events and forgo an unnecessary criticism for something that transcends a physical manifestation of the supernatural, Possession was an arthouse classic destined for the guillotine.

First thing I'd like to bring up and discuss is Anna's (Isabelle Adjani) role throughout Possession as the sole agitator and let's not even bring to surface the intentions of the film's title. Starting out, Mark (Sam Neill) is in a meeting with his previous employers and resigning against their wishes to return home to his wife and son in Berlin. Upon arriving, Mark discovers a certain air around Anna; she's leaving him with mention unearthing of a German dandy she has been sleeping with, name of Heinrich. Not to concern oneself with dispelling the great treasures this film has to offer, Mark gradually exorcises his pedantic nature in turn for a more primal and instinctual defensive to better suit the fluctuating needs and desires of his precious whore. Turn after turn, the opposition proves fierce and we are graced with what might be the sole continuum of the body horror filmic turn and a film that shields its own misogynistic(?) claims in a sometimes muddled allegory towards marital bliss and lack thereof. With the familiarity of heart break and spousal abandonment, it's safe to assume that Żuławski not only played his part of concerning husband but also that Possession also treads the boards of a medium for his anguish and rage, something I am only too familiar with, which is what most of you men can agree with me on.

Possession is a fright. I found myself genuinely disturbed and a slimy ooze creeping down my back during the subway scene of miscarriage interpretive dance. It's ultimately at this point where the thin line between reality and fictional prurience becomes blurred and shuffled over; a worthy conflict. As the title so reads, Possession takes on a tale of a domicile possession. It's very unclear whether or not an existing presence other than menstruation possessed Anna to do the deeds she did. Further highlighting the excuses at work, the masquerade of feminine blood-lust, Isabelle Adjani is reported to have attempted suicide after seeing the finished product of Possession, as told by the director himself in the DVD audio commentary. Is Anna really such a distant and unrelenting character or is Isabelle Adjani just another woman afflicted with the possible parasite of ladyhood? As we continue this primordial descent into tactical manipulation at the hands of "Barbara" and other such succubi, Possession points out a question only homosexuals ever ask - "Is it really worth it?"

To retain previous discussion towards the earlier events of the film, I'd like to point out the technical achievements of Andrzej Żuławski and his sweeping throes of woeful congregation. The camerawork featured in Possession recounts a trait that seems entirely extraterrestrial - camera work based on continuity. Whether or not the recurring shots of twisted and voyeuristic embrace actually pose as an accelerator to the many thoughts and theories lay jumbled in the mess is another situation and topic that is overthrown by the sheer velocity of which Possession strikes. A frequent meandering of broadcasting insatiable images, Żuławski features many scenes in which his compelling nature of filming isolates the subjects from settings temporarily leaving me bewildered and aroused. Playing coy and innocent, I'd also like to point out the marvelous score collected by Andrzej Korzyski, a man proven genius that pains me that I've never heard of his work sooner. His cloying and clouding of playground instrumentals ripples through subspheres of what can only be intermittently described as carny organs and dandy flutes. While I agree wholeheartedly that specific temperatures of films aren't made for everyone, I have deemed it impossible not to appreciate the remarkable technical achievement in which Żuławski has secured permanently.

I mentioned misogyny and you guffawed. Possession formally accepts all of the traits and habitual rituals of the female kind and precociously envies the freedom they have to look stupid and not be judged by their effervescent taste in shoes and luxuries. During many scenes of Mark wading through Anna's insecurities, he chivalrously attempts to meet in the middle to discuss what could come. Mark tells her that they can work it out while she squirms and resists his passes for emotional convergence. Once her defensive stature and hysterics withdraw from sheer amount of mutilated use, she sleeps easy in their bed as they both lay naked, secured with a nice and calming sheet only for Żuławski to implement a flip psychosis trick on the viewer in which the symmetrical shape of the room and the exiting furniture flips suddenly to present his empty bed with a note from his dearly departed wife. Alas, Mark. There is no saving the wretch now. Enter scene of subway corridors ghostlike in filming. Anna struts through these smooth-cold tiled walls carrying a bag of groceries with a sadistic and sprawled grin of regalement. The actions of Anna soon spiral into a blistering nothingness in what seems to take an infinite amount of time for her "possession" to fully take place. As she whips her groceries into a wall and is showered with goods and services, she begins screaming uncontrollably - writhing and convulsing which brings to light the earlier scenes of high-velocity kitchenware in one of our couples many fights. And to think that this notorious subway scene was universally set in our same world with many of mans own inventions, machinery and otherworldly oddities, . . . can they really coexist?

POSSESSION

Accent so thick and dementia so bloomed, it's as if Anna were communicating in a form of tongues. Through the "misogyny", through the shroud of cinema prose, it becomes adamantly clear that this film is the most brave, inventive, and conniving of all "possession" films as it deals with a very close-to-home approach of married life and to think I just recommended this film to a lady who has been recently married. A film with such a title defies all paranormal ties except for brief instances of dubious measure on behalf of the stricken and old-age Kali Yuga in which man suffers for his sins and to be controlled by women, which happens on so many occasions within the teasingly-heretic film of Possession. Relapsing back, Possession is a film that cannot be disregarded as anything and especially not as a supernatural reflection of the nuclear family. By the last half-an-hour mark it becomes unclear that if the "possession", so to speak, is a singular occurrence or a dual possession. The belligerent way in which Żuławski captures the going-ons prevents us from allowing such meticulous ideas to become apparent. The scene involving the sacrilegious miscarriage could lay waste to many theories revolving around the film but alas, another director whose own esoteric mindplay is a manipulating game even to us, his devoted audience.

Possession is one of the few films generally regarded as a "mindfuck" that I feel I could revisit over and over again. From the mysteries of the Jewish fellow with the pink socks to the entirely audacious ending with the self-destructive nature of a son who has seen more than we are let on to (given the previous story development of him screaming in his sleep, stammering for his mother), Possession is a film that can be enjoyed regardless of the deceitful and depressing nature of this handicap heartbreak. Even the fate of prissy-Tantric boy Heinrich can be traced back to the cut/copy traits of the now-infamous stylizing of black widows. Did he really witness a creature in which Cronenberg is probably idling over himself for not imagining it first, or was that just a realization of his "loved one's" real gutter instincts? Hedonism is dually explained earlier in the film but is actually manifested upon later with what can only be uttered as "Naked Lunch...?" near the ending of the film. It's at this point where Possession skydives into marital imperfections and a pre-nuclear Bonnie and Clyde tale of monstrous, lustful appetites and double standards as to how one woman envisions how her husband should be, darkened pupils and all. Possession is astoundingly one of those films where you hold tight, let your mind flood, sensors buckle, and try to scramble your way out of this erratic yet brilliant masterpiece with all your previous morals intact. Good luck.

-mAQ

VAPORS

Andy Milligan* (1965)

Out of the 27 or so films gay gutter-auteur Andy Milligan directed, Vapors (1965) – his first featurette – is quite possibly his most honest, intimate, and damning work. Written by Hope Stansbury – who would later star in subsequent Milligan efforts like The Degenerates (1967) and The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here! (1972) – Vapors is a work “From the Tearoom to the Steamroom” (poster tagline) about a couple qualm-ridden queers as they get-on in a homo-hotspot; a steamy yet mostly static steamroom full of hysterical and horny queens. Glaringly more serious and melodramatic than most of Milligan’s subsequent works, aside from his once-lost-but-now-found British masterpiece Nightbirds (1969) – the director’s last black-and-white film – Vapor is a suitably gritty and amateurishly directed 32-minute 16mm b/w short that gives the viewer a pithy yet punchy glimpse into Milligan’s stunted artistic potential as the director that would later focus almost exclusively on crazy and crappy camp as opposed to the omnipresent debauchery that consumed his personal life and inevitably led to his demise via AIDs during the early cockcrow hours of June 3, 1991, thus resulting in an ignoble burial in an unmarked grave somewhere in Los Angeles. With unflattering black comedies like Bruce Kessler’s The Gay Deceivers (1969) and William Friedkin’s The Boys in the Band (1970) being quite prevalent during the late-1960s/early-1970s – works that expressed the self-loathing trials and tribulations a homo in a pomo world – Milligan’s Vapors proves to be a more brash, glum, and dispiriting work that is scantily side-splitting but often unintentionally silly, thus it is no surprise to me that the exploitation director chose to focus his filmmaking career on the exceedingly degenerate (at least, for the time) world of sexploitation and dimestore horror like his better known works The Ghastly Ones (1968), Guru, the Mad Monk (1970), and Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1973). Originally getting his start working on sadomasochistic, hyper-camp renditions of plays like Lord Dunsany’s The Glittering Gates and Jean Genet’s The Maids with the Caffe Cino – a small café-based theatrical group composed of an assortment of aberrosexuals – Milligan also owned and operated a clothing boutique named Ad Lib; both of which activities would act as a crucial source of inspiration and training for the hapless filmmaker. Of course, arguably the greatest influence behind Vapors – a work set in New York’s St. Mark’s bathhouse – was Milligan’s own personal erotic exploits in tearooms and steamrooms that involved anonymous, unprotected sex, which he would ultimately pay for with his life and dignity.

As someone who grew up with a physically and emotionally abusive alcoholic mother of a hefty, bovine build, it is no surprise that Vapors features the following line from a steamroom attendant early on in the film, “Well, you can’t trust your own mother these days. How ya gonna trust..uh..a recent acquaintance?" The steamroom employee must have gotten to know his customers very well as foreboding paranoia and distrust, especially of women, act as deep-seated themes of Vapors. As the sometimes prissy and always pessimistic protagonist Thomas (Gerald Jaccuzzo) states early on in Vapors to his prospective lover Mr. Jaffee (Robert Dahdah), "Do you get the strange felling someone is staring at us?" To his credit, indeed, a virtual parade troupe of queens and sexual inverts are watching the two men in a viciously voyeuristic fashion as they snidely giggle like a pack of Pop-Rocks-addicted toddlers at a nudie bar, thus making it seem as if the viewer of Vapors is in on the same sleazy action with them. Although a totally different film with an inherently different agenda, Vapors often feels like a neurotic and anti-erotic adaptation of Jean Genet's sole (and disowned) cinematic effort Un chant d'amour (1950) aka A Song of Love. Like the hypnagogic libertine short directed by the gay ex-con frog writer, Vapors is a work that would anticipate the sexually-charged films of Andy Warhol. Of course, gay-ghetto-based homoeroticism is not the only indulgent ingredient of Vapors that would later appear in the works of Warhol, as Milligan packed the short with a bitter cocktail of misogyny and misery. For instance, during Vapors Mr. Jaffee discusses in detail his disdain for his wife's less than dainty feet and her abiding inability to throwaway soiled menstrual sanitary pads. Jaffee also fondly reminisces to Thomas about his prematurely deceased son, a handsome and soft-skinned high school football player that the man speculates may not have been his actual progeny due to his lack of physical resemblance who died in a freak drowning accident and whose corpse was subsequently mutilated by hungry snakes. Needless to say, Vapors concludes in an appropriately anti-climatic manner, as if Kenneth Anger's celluloid wet-dream Fireworks (1947) merely feebly fizzled instead of exploding in a most fiercely phallogocentric fashion.

VAPORS

Ultimately, Vapors is a bleak yet puissant testament to the emptiness and humiliation of gay life during the pre-Stonewall era, henceforth acting as an unofficial fictional melodramatic supplement to the real-life anonymous sexual excursions featured in the William E. James presented document Tearoom (1962). Thus, it is shame that Milligan, a misunderstood man whose film The Ghastly Ones (1968) was described by popular hack horror author Stephen King as, "...the work of morons with cameras," never fully bloomed into the "sort of a Douglas Sirk figure" that Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn (Valhalla Rising, Drive) so cordially described him as, yet Vapors and Nightbirds, which also unfortunately happen to be two of the trash-auteur filmmaker's least-seen films, are a testament to the fact that underneath all the fairy dressmaking and illegally solicited sodomy was a serious cinematic artist with something truly ghastly to express.

-Ty E

SEEDS OF SIN

Andy Milligan* (1968)

Surely, there is nothing more depressing to a cinephile than the fact that one of their favorite filmmaker's potential masterpieces has been butchered, botched, and/or just never plain released for whatever reason. For example, Guido exploitation auteur Alberto Cavallone's supposed masterpiece Maldoror (1977)—a loose psychedelic reworking of the rather mysterious French poet Comte de Lautréamont's proto-surrealist late 19th-century poetical novel Les Chants de Maldoror aka The Songs of Maldoror—has never been released in any form despite the fact it was actually completed and is considered by those handful of people that have had the truly singular honor of seeing it to be the auteur's greatest masterpiece. While most of gutter auteur Andy Milligan's early sexploitation films, as well as his rare 1967 uncompleted arthouse film Compass Rose (which can actually be found by collectors, though the print is horrible and inaudible) and apparently highly worthwhile campy homo bloodsucker flick Dragula (1971) are completely lost, arguably the greatest aesthetic tragedy is the fact that the director's would-be magnum opus, Seeds (1968) aka Seeds of Sin, only exists today in a senselessly butchered form because the film's monetary-motivated Guido producer, Allen Bazzini—a restaurateur and sometimes cherry farmer who wanted to break into the movie business whose sole other film credit is for acting as the 'presenter' of the exploitation flick The Blue Sextet (1971) directed by gay pornographer and exploitation auteur David E. Durston (I Drink Your Blood, Manhole)—later inserted softcore sex scenes that were not directed by the sub-infamous gutter auteur featuring actors that were not even originally in the film and also cut key scenes from the flick to make way for the added smut, thus making the work somewhat incomprehensible in some respects (though not much more incoherent than a lot of exploitation flicks from that era). Indeed, as Milligan's friend and biographer Jimmy McDonough wrote in The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001), regarding the work: "SEEDS is Milligan's MAGNIFICENT AMBERSONS—meaning that what exists of the film only frustrates after reading a nearly complete script. This was to be Andy's sickest masterwork yet." After watching the butchered cut, I can happily report that it is still one of Milligan's greatest and most memorable works, as a cracked window into the sod filmmaker's dark and depraved soul.

Indeed, despite being one of the handful of works that Milligan directed that was not produced by Hebraic smut-peddler William Mishkin (whose asshole lawyer son Lew would later be responsible for intentionally destroying most of the Milligan films that are now lost), who often fiddled with and molested the director's work in various ways in the hope of cashing in, Seeds of Sin—a work that was advertised with the eloquent tagline, "Sown in Incest! Harvested in hate!"—was still perniciously defiled and now exists today as a curious celluloid oddity that feels like an unhinged family soap opera from Sodom that is routinely interrupted by lighthearted 'commercial breaks' of random unclad hippie-like people (including platinum blonde Swedish exploitation diva Uta Erickson of the Amero brothers' classic 1971 psychedelic gothic hardcore flick Bacchanale) rolling around on top of each other and unconvincingly attempting to make the viewer think that they are actually fucking. A work that was indeed "sown in incest" and "harvested in hate," the film is, like many of Milligan's works, a thinly disguised attack against the director's own deranged and highly abusive mother and family members and revolves around a crippled and considerably cunty wheelchair-bound old hag matriarch who self-righteously describes her own children as "a bunch of bad seeds" and who foresees the destruction of the entire family after her seemingly half-autistic incest-inclined daughter invites the rest of the family over for Christmas in a fucked family affair wherein virtually everyone dies a mirthfully gruesome death at the hands of one of their (un)loved ones. Black-and-white celluloid vile spat from the warped mind of one of exploitation cinema's few true 'serious' artists (before becoming a filmmaker, Milligan directed off-off-Broadway adaptations of works by Jean Cocteau and Jean Genet, among others), Seeds of Sin was somewhat fittingly written for Milligan's one-time wife Candy Hammond (indeed, like Fassbinder, despite being a gay sadomasochist, Milligan got married to one of his screen divas), who is a horse-faced girl with a butch dyke haircut that prances around the film naked and acts like an all-around socially retarded individual, and more or less represents the director's final word on family matters (not that the auteur quit making raunchy and hate-driven family reunion flicks after it was released), as a work featuring black market abortions, intricate incest-based bizarre love triangles, and inter-familial mass murder, including fratricide, sororicide, and matricide, among other things.

SEEDS OF SIN

When her live-in adult daughter Carol (Milligan's wife Candy Hammond) invites the rest of the family over for Christmas without telling her, wheelchair-bound matriarch Claris Manning (elderly Milligan superstar Maggie Rogers, who died two years after the film was released)—a seemingly rotting old violent hag who resembles an elderly high yellow negro tranny sporting a Warhol-esque blonde wig who would make for a great girlfriend for 'grandfather' of Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974)—states the forebodingly prophetic warns to her scheming progeny, "You mark my words, you've destroyed us." As a girl who started having sex with her blood brother Michael (Anthony Moscini of Milligan's Compass Rose and the lost 1968 flick Gutter Trash) when she was just 13 and he was 17, Carol—a dyke-like chick with an aesthetically repellant butch haircut who masturbates to the sort of vintage muscle mags that were big with fags before the deluge of homo hardcore flicks that followed the release of Wakefield Poole's classic crossover cocksucker flick Boys in the Sand (1971)—has her own reasons for wanting the family back over for the holidays and it is not just because she wants to reboot her unsavory sex-scapes with her big bro, who is now unhappily married to a lying bitch. A hate-driven and glaringly grotesque old repulsive über-wench who looks like she would radiate a rather revolting stench while stewing in her wheelchair, mad matriarch Claris receives constant help from her one-eyed servant/cuckold/baby-daddy Mortimer (Jesse Bigelow of Gutter Trash) and a crooked crackpot doctor named Dr. Kram (Paul Eden of Gutter Trash and pornographic auteur Peter De Rome's 1976 hardcore psychedelic horror Poe adaptation The Destroying Angel), who performs regular blood transfusions on the old hag. Dr. Kram also performs an emergency illegal coat-hanger abortion on a hysterical young chick named Bonita (Magie Dominic of the lost 1968 Milligan flick The Filthy Five) after her husband Drew (David Hazard) makes a botched attempt himself. To pay for the $1,500 abortion, Drew, who is the gay boyfriend of Ma Manning's youngest son Buster (though the viewer will not be able to figure this out by watching the film), steals his girlfriend's bracelet and gives it to Dr. Kram as payment. When Bonita screams hysterically just as Dr. Kram gets in between her legs to abort the unborn baby, Drew punches her in the face and knocks her out, thus eradicating the need for anesthesia.

When all the siblings and their partners arrive at the matriarch's house and meet for dinner, Ma Manning is wheeled out and makes the following seethingly hateful speech to her progeny after getting seated: "I might as well make it clear right here and now; I didn't invite any of you. Don't get your hopes up. Carol, I guess thought she was doing me a favor when she asked you here. There isn't anyone at this table that I give two cents for. Well, it's not entirely your fault...Its mostly mine. I spoiled you when you were children. I spoiled you rotten. The good book says "he shall reap what he thou sow." [...] You're a bunch of bad seeds! Well, you ruined my life and now I've just ruined your dinner [laughs sinisterly] Go ahead and eat! [continues laughing maniacally]," to which one of her children mockingly replies, "To our dear sweet mother, long may she live." When Claris remarks that she could outlive all her children, her eldest child Margaret (Lucy Silvey)—a blonde bitch who married a dumb and violent Guido ex-gang leader named Jonathan (who hilariously later states with a glaring NYC dago draw to his wife, "I love you so much I could kill you") because he is a "beautiful animal" with "sadiſtic urges"—states, "I don't think nature would allow that." Rather nonsensically, Margaret slaps one-eyed cuckold Mortimer on the face after he insults her momma and asks, "who do you think you are?," so mother Manning grabs her, smacks her in the face in an even more violent fashion, and says "he's your father," thus revealing the dark family secret that she is the bastard spawn of her mommy's 'kept-man' and all-around bitch. Of course, that is just one of the many sick secrets regarding the family.

That night, brother Matthew (Milligan superstar Neil Flanagan)—a gay priest who molested his own military school cadet brother Buster (Gene Connolly of

SEEDS OF SIN

Tommy Goetz's 1969 film A Bride for Brenda and C. Walsh's Sweet Taste of Joy (1970)—is totally oblivious to the fact that his nymphomaniac girlfriend Barbara (Milligan superstar Susan Cassidy) has snuck into his brother Michael's room and seduced him. After screwing Mike, who has no qualms about cheating on his wife Susan (Eileen Hayes of The Ghastly Ones) since he resents her and the fact that he had to marry her when she got pregnant (apparently, with another man's baby), Barbara goes to take a bath to assumedly wash all the spilled seeds out of her overworked snatch so her Catholic cocksucker boyfriend does not notice, but before she finishes someone knocks a radio playing degenerate jazz into the bathtub, thus electrocuting and killing the debauched dame. After getting done talking to Ma Manning and learning that her husband's father—the matriarch's second husband—is imprisoned in a house for the criminally insane, Susan goes back to her hubby Michael and accuses him of cheating on her, so he unleashes a tidal wave of verbal venom and reveals that he never wanted to marry her in the first place and that he started an incestuous sexual affair with his sister Carol when he was a teenager and she was barely a teen. Totally horrified by what her hubby has just told her, Susan runs out of the room and grabs a butcher knife in the kitchen so she can stab her already broken heart, but she does not have to finish the job as some mysterious killer slams a door into the handle of the weapon, thus killing the hysterical wife instantly. Although Dr. Kram absurdly writes off the deaths as suicides, Ma Manning knows better and tells her cuckolded servant/lover Mortimer, "everyone in this house is capable of murder, including you and me" and then proceeds to burn a $100 dollar bill while proclaiming that if she knew that she would die tomorrow (ironically, she does die the next day), she would burn all her money just to spite her children.

When Mamma Manning tells her gay pervert criminal son Buster—a pedomorphic bibliophile and military school cadet who has been kicked out of every school on the east coast yet absurdly sports a West Point uniform—that she has not written him into her will and then berates him for being kicked out of multiple private schools for having sod sex with and blackmailing other boys, among other things, the loony lad flies into a hysterical queenish rage, runs outside while flailing his arms and screaming about wanting to kill himself, and then proceeds to slit his own wrist with a broken bottle while laughing maniacally. Meanwhile, matriarch Manning's two young servants, Peter (Jonathan East of Milligan's lost 1968 film Tricks of the Trade) and Jessica (Patricia Dillon of Milligan's Gutter Trash and 1970 medieval horror flick Torture Dungeon), who are carrying on a lurid love affair behind their employer's back, have forged their boss' will and are plotting to poison her, but right before they attempt to do so, someone ironically poisons them. Meanwhile, sister Margaret reveals to her bohunk hubby Jonathan that her mother is a cripple because some unknown person pushed her down the stairs, thus breaking her neck and spine in the process. Margaret also states regarding the incident, "nothing can kill a bitch like momma. Ever since that day she's grown more and more hateful. Like a cancer on the whole family. It was as if we were the puppets and she controlled the strings, making us share her pattern of hate." Margaret also discusses how her little sister Carol has always hated her because she is jealous of her beauty. Indeed, Margaret is right because not long after telling her husband about her bitchy little sister, Carol kills her by throwing acid in her face and then proceeds to kill Jonathan, although she is not revealed to be the killer for a couple more scenes. From there, Carol seduces her bro Michael and they make ostensibly passionate love after flirting like grade school children for a little bit, but when the big brother kicks her out of the bedroom when she gets too lovey-dovey, she flips out and starts singing "step on a crack, break your mother's back" while standing topless in the hallway in a discernibly deranged state. When Ma Manning calls for her daughter while in an absurdly drunken state, Carol pops out of nowhere like a rabid cheetah and pushes her down the stairs in her wheelchair, thus killing the mad matriarch (apparently, elderly actress Maggie Rogers was actually seriously hurt during this scene, as the film crew members lost control of her wheelchair and she ran directly into a wall after falling down the steps), who realizes just before she kicks the bucket that her favorite child is the one that is responsible for crippling her. When Michael walks in the room to see that his sister has just killed their mother, he becomes so enraged that he strangles her to death, thus making him the only surviving member of the family.

Although the only known existing print of Seeds of Sin is the butchered version I viewed featuring the added softcore sex scenes and excised key scenes, Something Weird Video released a double-feature DVD of the work and its spiritual brother film The Ghastly Ones that also includes Andy Milligan's old workprint of the film as an extra feature, thus the viewer can mentally fill in a number of blanks themselves in regard to the missing scenes from the bogus Bazzini cut. For instance, one of the excised subplots involves the gay incestuous pedo priest character Matthew being seduced by his little sister Carol, who spits in his mouth when he requests that she 'punish' him with a good beating. Later, in a rather darkly humorous scene, unholy holy man Matthew goes to commit suicide via hanging, but he pussies out at the last minute and ultimately dies anyway when his feet accidentally slip from a chair while he still has a noose wrapped around his neck. Another scene missing from both the film and the workprint apparently involves priest Matthew and his girlfriend Barbara engaging in a "sacrilegious love scene in the rectory." The worksprint also features an ultra-cynical extended ending where Michael cradles his sister Carol while singing a nursery rhyme to her after strangling her while Mortimer proceeds to call the police with a smirk on his face, as if he knows that he is going to inherit the family fortune after getting the surviving brother locked up in prison. Despite being blatantly butchered and featuring long and pointless sex inserts featuring random anonymous people who are not even characters in the film (including a negress!), Seeds of Sin as it exists today still manages to be a perversely potent piece of ceaseless anti-family celluloid hate and malignant misanthropy that makes the viewer realize that there is no question that auteur Milligan was himself sown from a forsaken heritage of hate.

SEEDS OF SIN

Indeed, on top of having a sadistic crippled mother who used him as an emotional and physical punching-bag and forced him to regularly clean between her toes because she was so morbidly obese (at 300+ pounds, she was a fairly big momma, especially for her time period when it was actually shameful to be a lard ass) when he was just a young child, Milligan, like some of the characters of Seeds of Sin, did not find out his older brother Harley LeRoy Hull, who was a successful businessman that served multiple long prisons sentences after being convicted of serial pedophilia (interestingly, when biographer Jimmy McDonough called Hull to get information on Milligan for his bio, he recommended writing a book about his life instead and even proposed the Milliganesque title 'The Wayward Pedophile'), was not his full brother but actually his half-brother from his mother's previous failed marriage to a Jewish bigamist (apparently, Milligan's father resented the fact that his stepson was a mischling Jew). Unquestionably, Milligan's then-wife Candy Hammond gives a most believable performance in the film as a cracked cunt who kills all her family members just so she can have her beloved brother/deflowerer all to herself. As Milligan would state of Hammond in one of the rare occasions where he said something semi-nice about a woman, "SEEDS was written for Candy. Candy's not an ordinary woman. She's self-made, always was. Left home at a young age. Candy would talk wild, act wild, but she's really a prude. Not about nudity—sex. She's afraid of men in a way [...] Candy and I got along well, and one day I asked if she wanted to get married. It was convenience. I knew she was gonna go back." Indeed, one can only assume that a woman who would marry a notoriously bitchy and sadomasochistic sodomite who was constantly cruising for tricks and pricks and wanted nothing to do with women, especially in the bedroom, would have to be suffering from some sort of hang-up in regard to men and their members. Indubitably, it is quite unfortunate that Mr. Milligan did not get the gall to hump Hammond and produce a "seed of sin" of his own as the kid would surely have grown up to be more interesting and very potentially more murderous than the debauched and depraved demons seeds of his degenerate daddy's films. Of course, oftentimes filmmakers will describe their films as their 'children,' with Seeds of Sin indubitably being Milligan's most nasty, rotten, and marvelously misbegotten little mongrel bastard celluloid abortion.

-Ty E

THE GHASTLY ONES

Andy Milligan* (1968)

Before the hysterically melodramatic bourgeoisie-bashing flicks of Bavarian bad boy Rainer Werner Fassbinder and the somewhat recent would-be-demented independent dysfunctional family reunion You're Next (2011) directed by Adam Wingard, there was The Ghastly Ones (1968) aka Blood Rites aka Blood Orgy directed by sub-(in)famous gutter auteur Andy Milligan (Vapors, Nightbirds). Advertised as being shot "In Cranium-Cleaving Color!", The Ghastly Ones was mad man Milligan's first color feature and a semi-psychedelic one at that, but more importantly it is the sort of fucked family film that the sadomasochistic sodomite did best as a work directed by a man who spent virtually his entire life estranged from family and scorning the memory of his obese mother by modelling most of his cinematic villains after her. Described by then-unknown horror filmmaker Joe Dante (The Howling, Gremlins) in Film Bulletin as being, "like a home movie from Bedlam and gives evidence of being processed in a dirty bathtub," The Ghastly Ones is an oftentimes unintentionally hilarious piece of low-class, low-camp celluloid trash sass masquerading as a high melodrama, albeit with absurdly inane exploitation gross-out scenes. Indeed, The Ghastly Ones is the sort of film that can only be appreciated by the already Milligan initiated as a murderous melodrama for the morally insane that wallows in decided disdain for the nuclear family, especially of the bombastic bourgeois sort. A whacked-out work of garbage camp lunacy penned and directed by cinema history's most marvelously misogynistic and hysterically hateful homo, The Ghastly Ones is probably best known in the horror world as a film that somehow managed to make the UK's 'Video Nasty' list under the inferior alternate title Blood Rites, yet the film will probably be best enjoyed by those looking for an aesthetically malevolent mutation of the melodrama as a work that did for exploitation cinema what Fassbinder's The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974), and especially Martha (1974) did for German New Cinema as a damning work that defiles and denigrates the moral fiber of the family with the sort of venomous vengeance that one could only expect from a pissed poof with a large pink chip on both shoulders. The sordid story of three upper-middle class sisters who go with their equally banal cuckolded husbands to their deceased father's manor for a three-day rendezvous of bloody murder to ostensibly collect their inheritance, The Ghastly Ones demonstrates that lies, greed, jealousy, hypocrisy, and hatred are the things that make families stick together like flies on dog shit.

Vicky (Milligan superstar Anne Linden) has been married to her lawyer hubby Rich (Fib LaBlaque) for seven long years yet her homo pastor brother-in-law Walter (Hal Sherwood) still has the gall to say to her like a true queen bitch, "You know, when Richard married you, I was furious with him. I didn't think you were good enough for him...but I'm sure in time you'll prove me wrong." As hinted, Rich and his bro Walt once buggered one another, but he has more pressing problems to worry about as a man with a law firm who is somewhat broke, but luckily his wife Vicky is about to inherit a handsome sum via her father's death. With her sister Liz (Carol Vogel), who has been married to her husband Don (Richard Romanus, who would go on to star in Martin Scorsese's Mean Streets (1973)) for five years, and other sister Veronica (Eileen Hayes), who has been married to her husband Bill (Don Williams) for three years, Vicky meets with a grotesque lawyer named Dobbs (Milligan superstar Neil Flanagan in cheap Halloween makeup) to hear the reading of her belated father's will. In the will, the father Crenshaw hilariously states, "My dearest darlings, by now you're all happily married—something I never was. You loved your mother; I never did. She was a good mother but a bad wife. She was possessive, selfish, and frigid." In the will, it is stipulated that the three sisters must "reside at the Crenshaw house in sexual harmony for a period of 3 days" and that "in case any unforeseeable events occur, the eldest heir shall re-disperse according to her best wishes." When the sisters and their husbands arrive at Crenshaw manor, they are greeted by two maids, Martha (Veronica Radburn, who is best known for playing Annie's psychiatrist in Woody Allen's Annie Hall (1977)) and Ruth Trask (Milligan superstar Maggie Rogers), and their hunchback brother Colin (Milligan superstar Hal Borske), who resembles a retarded gay werewolf and is featured at the beginning of The Ghastly Ones massacring a loving dandy couple.

THE GHASTLY ONES

The first night at the home, Veronica and Bill are treated to a dead rabbit in their bed with a note reading, "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit." Meanwhile, Rich and Vicky find a 'X' written in blood on their bedroom door and Don goes to investigate. Ultimately, Don collapses after being drugged and Rich is found dead hanging upside down like Mussolini in the basement by his wife Vicky, with the viewer assuming retard Colin has committed the grizzly crimes. The next day, Don and Collin chop wood together and after the former finds a plank of wood with a bloody 'X' on it, he is gagged and disemboweled by a cloaked figure. Wondering where Don and Elizabeth have disappeared to, the guests proceed to eat dinner and find Elizabeth's decapitated head on a platter. While rummaging through old photos, Bill discovers something interesting about the Crenshaw family but Colin snatches a particularly incriminating photo away from him and he is gutted with a pitchfork not long after. Servant Martha later discovers the very same picture and realizes an awful truth, but she is butchered with a sizeable hatchet before being able to tell someone. Not long after, the cloaked killer is revealed to be servant Ruth, whose real name is Hattie and who is not a mere maid but the fourth and oldest Crenshaw sister, who states to the two surviving sisters, Vicky and Veronica, "Meet your sister, Hattie! That's right...your sister. You didn't know that did you?... 31 years ago I was the first born in this house. My momma died giving birth to me. My father, our papa, loved my momma very much. He was so alone he married again, but he was so heart broken, he stayed away aside from five visits and he laid in there with that woman. That bitch! Your mother. Out of those five visits, 3 girls were conceived.” Hattie also reveals that her stepmother lied to her and convinced her she was one of the Trask children. Hoping to take the inheritance she believes is rightfully hers as the eldest Crenshaw daughter, Hattie planned to kill all her sisters and frame demented dullard Colin for the crime. Of course, she ultimately fails because Colin knocks her down the stairs and kills her while Vicky and Veronica stare in horror.

As star Hal Borske (who played hunchback ‘Colin’) revealed in the audio commentary for the Something Weird Video DVD release of The Ghastly Ones, the killer of the film, Hattie, like most of Milligan’s filmic villains, is based on auteur Andy Milligan’s own mother. As a man who had a physically and emotionally (and even sexually) abusive alcoholic mother (Milligan apparently shouted she was a “bitch” at her funeral), a bitchy sister (whose boyfriend once beat the shit out of the director in 1969, thus resulting in brother and sister never seeing each other again), and a half-Jewish pedophile half-brother, Milligan indubitably had a warped view on family matters and that is certainly quite clear in The Ghastly Ones. As one-time Milligan collaborator Jimmy McDonough wrote in his bio The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001), “Utilizing his Staten Island regulars, Milligan made yet another forgettable period horror movie in 1978, LEGACY OF BLOOD, and, improbably enough, it’s a nicely shot but pointless remake of his own GHASTLY ONES.” Additionally, Milligan’s early work Seeds (1968) aka Seeds of Sin, which only survives today as a butchered print featuring inserted sex scenes that have literally nothing to do with the film (Milligan oftentimes worked for Jewish exploitation distributor William Mishkin and his scumbag lawyer son Lew, who butchered/lost/destroyed most of the filmmaker’s works), is a sort of prototype for The Ghastly Ones in its depiction of a nasty and ultimately quite murderous family reunion. Undoubtedly, in terms of Milligan’s surviving films, The Ghastly Ones is a borderline ‘cream of the crop’ work that only falls behind Vapors (1965), Nightbirds (1970), The Body Beneath (1970), and Fleshspot on 42 Street (1973) in terms of its marvelous melodramatic malice. I think Milligan biographer McDonough paid Milligan the greatest compliment when he stated, “In terms of aesthetic, technique, and temperament, Andy Milligan and Rainer Werner Fassbinder are eerily similar. While far more sophisticated, movies like THE STATIONMASTER’S WIFE or MARTHA don’t seem all that far from Seeds, and entire sections of BERLIN ALEXANDERPLATZ feel as if Milligan could have been lurking behind the camera. People talk and talk without ever getting close to one another,” Christian Braad Thomsen wrote of one particularly pungent Fassbinder creation. It’s a description that fits any Andy picture.” Featuring charmingly cynical one-liners like, “It always takes money to bring people together, doesn't it," "When you have been married as long as Richard and I, you will think twice about sexual demonstrations in public," and "I want what's coming to me...I'll do anything to get what I want," The Ghastly Ones ultimately demonstrates that when it comes to families, every member is more or less a ghastly one with some sort of unsavory ulterior motive.

THE GHASTLY ONES

-Ty E

BLOODTHIRSTY BUTCHERS

Andy Milligan* (1970)

While taking a sabbatical over the pond in merry old England in part to get away from his swindling Jewish producer/distributor William Mishkin (only to be swindled by a British Jewish producer and to go crawling back to Mishkin), sadomasochistic sodomite gutter auteur Andy Milligan managed to squeeze out no less than five films, including a couple of his 'masterpieces' like his most avant-garde work Nightbirds (1969), as well as the Gothic vampire flick The Body Beneath (1970), which concludes with a Jack Smith-esque Bacchanalian food orgy where a bunch of fat, bitchy British bloodsucker broads complain about how America is a shithole overflowing with dipsomaniacs and bums. Mr. Milligan must have found the incessant rain, bad teeth, and urban decay in London to be quite delightfully dejecting in some way, as it was there that he also directed what is arguably his most hateful and mean-spirited work, Bloodthirsty Butchers (1970), which is a dimestore reworking of Sweeney Todd with a decidedly dickheaded nod to Dickens. Advertised with the patently preposterous puffery, "MORE SAVAGE—MORE VIOLENT than anything written by the MARQUIS de SADE" and "Their prime cuts were curiously erotic...but thoroughly brutal!" the film was promoted as unadulterated celluloid sadomasochism of the bawdy body dismemberment-based sort, but it is really just a miserable melodrama of the majorly misanthropic and misogynistic sort featuring scheming social savages, cunty old bitches that probably haven't eaten a cock in a decade or two, and pernicious proletarian capitalists who practice a meta-predatory form of capitalism involved killing of their customers so they can use their bodies for meat pies. Starring Milligan's real-life bud John Miranda, who helped pay the medical bills when the director was dying of AIDS and who, quite fittingly, met the auteur when they were both cast for a Gillette commercial considering he would play a man that would slit people's throats with a shaving razor, Bloodthirsty Butchers is a big ugly smelly celluloid turd that is ostensibly set during Victorian times but seems like a homemade play put on by mental patients in the basement of a nut ward as opposed to a period piece. Shot over a mere seven day period on a budget star Miranda described as "thirty-nine cents and a box of green stamps," this non-adaptation of Sweeney Todd is a putrid piece of no-budget misanthropic high-sleaze celluloid poetry that is infinitely more pernicious than Tim Burton's Johnny Depp dud Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street (2007) and an excellent argument for gutter auteur Milligan being the most hateful, pessimistic, cynical, misanthropic, misogynistic, and brazenly bitchy filmmaker who has ever plagued this world.

Beginning with a horrendous, shaky handheld shot of the murderous antihero's crypto-butcher barber shop on Fleet Street in dreary London, Bloodthirsty Butchers then introduces Sir Sweeney Todd (John Miranda, who had small roles in big budget sci-fi flicks like Innerspace (1987) starring Dennis Quaid and Star Trek IV: The Voyage Home (1986) directed by Leonard Nimoy), who is cutting the hair of a pretentious young twat of a customer who reveals that he has been in the city for “about a fortnight” and “London is not what I thought it would be.” Mr. Todd begins admiring the young man’s ruby ring, which he reveals was inherited from his great-grandfather. After listening to the young man talk in a self-righteous, bitter way as if he is some sage of cynicism, Sweeney Todd puts an extra steamy shaving towel around the young man’s face, but instead of shaving the unwitting fellow’s neck, he violently slits his throat and proceeds to steal his ring, which he does the hard way by hacking the still warm corpse’s finger off. Although unhappily married to a bitchy blonde broad named Becky (Linda Driver) who regularly brutally beats him because she is a hysterical dipsomaniac who clearly cannot handle her gin and tonic, Sir Todd is a degenerate Brit Don Juan of sorts who, when not cutting up his customers and stealing their cash and prized family heirlooms, is hanging out with one of his two mistresses.

BLOODTHIRSTY BUTCHERS

On top of defiling a slutty and equally cunt-y actress named Anna (Susan Cassidy of Milligan’s Seeds (1968), Gutter Trash (1969), and Torture Dungeon (1970)) who lives off her husky and violently jealous yet meek and cuckolded theater director/owner sugar daddy who is put in his place by a daring drag queen named Corky (George Barry, whose sole other role was in the useless 1984 Robert De Niro and Meryl Streep romance Falling in Love), Todd is partners-in-crime with a fire-crotched post-menopausal cunt named Maggie Lovett (Jane Hilary of the British 1970s TV series Poldark) who is married to a kind cuckolded cripple named John (Jonathan Holt) and who, using the some “258 people” her bad beau has butchered, sells human-based “meat pies” to unsuspecting customers at her quite quaint bakery. A redhead that looks like she could be Maggie’s strikingly more stunning daughter named Johanna Jeffrey (Annabella Wood of José Ramón Larraz’s The House That Vanished (1974) aka Scream... and Die!) also works at the bakery and is deeply in love with her seafarer fiancée Jarvis Williams (Michael Cox), who is about to return from sea. Mr. Todd and Mrs. Lovett also use a deranged bitch boy named Tobias Ragg (Berwick Kaler of Milligan’s once-lost masterpiece Nightbirds and Michael Winterbottom’s 1996 tragic celluloid turd of a romance Jude), who is discernibly more unhinged than his mass murderer employers and never misses an opportunity when he sees one, like when he catches Johanna in the back room of the business and decides to sexually ravage her despite the fact that his crazy bitch girlfriend Rosie (Ann Arrow) would kill him if she knew what he did.

When gentleman Jarvis gets back from sea, he does not waste time buying an exceedingly expensive pearl necklace for his beloved Johanna, though the jeweler warns him to flash it around lest he be the victim of a deadly theft. Of course, Jarvis does not listen and before he knows it, Tobias is stalking him. On top of that, Jarvis makes the unwitting mistake of taking a walk down Fleet Street and getting a haircut at Sweeney Todd's bloody brutal barbershop where he brags about his upcoming marriage and the expensive necklace he has bought for his fiancé. When Todd gives Jarvis asshole marriage advice like "just screw 'em" and laments on his nightmarish drunkard spouse, the young man says to the barber, "you sound like a cynic," to which he eloquently replies, "well, I'm a man who's had experience." Unquestionably, the best advice misanthropic misogynist Todd gives Jarvis is as follows: "Women can't stand happiness for more than three days at a time. It drives them wild. So you have to know when to upset things before they do. And then - you forgive them, you screw them, and you watch out for the next three days!" When Jarvis moronically shows Todd the pearl necklace he has bought his sweetheart Johanna, Todd warns him about thieves and then hilariously proceeds to attack, with Tobias soon showing up at barbershop and helping his boss to restrain the young man. Unfortunately for Todd, he makes the mistake of imprisoning Jarvis in his cellar instead of killing him right away. When Tobias' girlfriend Rosie reveals she is pregnant, he decides to literally and figuratively stab her in the back, but not before coercing her into writing a letter to her mother about going on an imaginary vacation and sardonically stating the following before driving the knife in her back, "I want you to remember this for the rest of your life."

Meanwhile, a married couple is surprised to find real breast meat in one of the meat pies they bought from the bakery, so they go to the police and bump into Johanna who is pleading with the cops to find her missing fiancée. Hoping to start a new life with him after having him liquidate her crippled husband, Mrs. Lovett convinces Todd to kill his wife Becky. Luckily, Becky arrives at the bakery a couple minutes later and attempts to blackmail Mrs. Lovett regarding the corpses in the cellar, so her hubby hacks her up. Of course, considering this is a gritty misanthropic Milligan movie, Becky is not the only one who attempts blackmail, as Tobias soon shows up and demands 5000 pounds from Mrs. Lovett and Todd or else he is going to the cops regarding the murders so that he can flee town since he just liquidated his pregnant girlfriend. While Mrs. Lovett acts like he is going to give him the money, Todd gets a weapon instead, though when he attacks Tobias, he gets a butcher knife to the face. In a twist happy ending for a Milligan film, Jarvis manages to escape before he is butchered and is reunited with Johanna, with whom he plans to move to America. In a biting conclusion, a fat woman brings the couple a pie and, forgetting that Jarvis and Johanna were almost made into mince meat by a serial killer and his queen bitch baker mistress, states regarding their plans to move to America, "Won't that be something. It's such a new country, but you be careful now, they've got Indians there...I've heard tales...there's cannibals. I heard they get your head off and eat you up."

Surely a piece of obscenely outmoded celluloid sewage, Bloodthirsty Butchers is also one of the various examples as to why Andy Milligan was the greatest director of so-bad-it's-good movies who has ever lived. Indeed, only from Mr. Milligan could one expect for his most hateful and misanthropic films to also feature one of his rather rare 'happy endings.' Apparently, the film was a huge hit with the perverts, hustlers, drag queens, black prostitutes, cruising cocksuckers, and other related urban bottomfeeders that used to lurk around 42nd Street in Manhattan, New York City, because it fueled their visceral hatred and disillusionment with life, or as Bill Landis and Michelle Clifford noted in their classic text on exploitation fair, Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002), regarding the work: "A film called BLOODTHIRSTY BUTCHERS was a frequent replay at the Lyric. A threadbare version of SWEENEY TODD that first appeared in 1970, it kicked around for years, and the Lyric audience always got a charge out of its aggressive, insistently mean tone and jack-in-the-box gore scenes. When SWEENEY TODD itself opened as a Broadway play in the late 1970s, BLOODTHIRSTY BUTCHERS played at the Lyric one chilly Friday night, with the same title slapped on as a draw for a less affluent theater district crowd. When a sadistic Sweeney is about to slit the throat of an unlucky customer in his barber's chair, a bad splice appears and the film jumps—the gore scene had been chopped out by its distributor to get the film an official MPAA "R" rating. The Lyric didn't generally attract troublemakers, but the audience had loved this film in its uncut version and felt cheated out of its gruesome kicks. The crowd became agitated. Suddenly, a small refrigerator was hurled from the balcony, hitting the screen amid a mass of jeers, laughs, and boos." Certainly, Burton's Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street nor any of the other Sweeney Todd adaptation ever received such an 'enthusiastic' response.

BLOODTHIRSTY BUTCHERS

Andy Milligan's good friend and the star of the film, John Miranda, thought the film was more or less trash and would never be released, or as he stated in an interview featured in Jimmy McDonough's masterful Milligan bio The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Miligan (2001) regarding the production: "I thought this was all madness; it was ridiculous, nobody's ever gonna go see this and he's not gonna be able to sell it - and here I am with my head split open, holding the axe by the handle, blood was dripping down and Andy was saying, 'Good! Good!' [...] When it played on Broadway I had to stand in line." Even the master himself, Milligan, was not too keen on the conspicuously cruel and callous piece of superlatively seedy pseudo-Victorian celluloid crud, stating that it was, "very claustrophobic, it doesn't have quality to it ... the reason you work so close in low budget is there's no sets, you can't show anything." When it comes down to it, the real 'bloodthirsty butcher' of the film is auteur Milligan himself, who more or less used the film to malevolently metaphysically 'murder' filmgoers with his perversely and perniciously pessimistic view of humanity, seemingly murderous misogyny/misanthropy (indeed, everyone killed in the film deserves it and their deaths serve as a sort of 'therapy' for more misanthropic viewers), and rather ridiculous portrayal of heterosexual love affairs to the point where the viewer laughs like it is a big fat stupid joke in regard to the plastic engaged couple surviving in the end. For better or worse, Milligan was a serious auteur with a distinct vision that bleeds through every grueling second of his fiercely fucked films. Indeed, when one watches Bloodthirsty Butchers they probably would not be startled to realize that its director was a deranged dude who celebrated his sham marriage to one of his actors by spending their honeymoon by himself cruising gay bars, laughed in the faces of actresses who cried after he slapped them in the face for giving bad performances (Milligan was a "one take" kind of guy who would include a scene in a film even if it was botched), was friends with abortion clinic bomber Dennis Malvasi, regularly brutally beat underage twinkles during sadomasochistic sod sex, and was ultimately buried in an unmarked grave after burning all the bridges in his life and succumbing to AIDS in 1991. If you ever wondered what an Ed Wood flick would be like had the auteur been a raging sadomasochist queen with seemingly serial killer-like tendencies and not a goofy cross-dressing drunk who thought he was the next Orson Welles, bask in the brazen banality of Bloodthirsty Butchers.

-Ty E

GURU, THE MAD MONK
GURU, THE MAD MONK

Andy Milligan* (1970)

While I'm certainly no believer, I would most certainly rather listen to some sub-liberate Baptist preacher give a sermon than suffer some obnoxiously asinine anti-Christian rant given by some arrogant Christ-hating (or, should I say Christ-killing?!) left-wing Judaic, resentful cocksucking faggot who is pissed the bible rejects boy-on-boy buggery, or deracinated white liberal weakling who has merely replaced Christ with some other egomaniacal kosher conman like Marx, Trotsky, Bob Dylan, or Jon Stewart. Indeed, nothing is weaker or more conformist and banal than Christ-bashing, so it really takes a special sort of Christ-bashing to catch my attention. While I typically prefer some Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, and Mencken, I recently decided to endure the antichrist polemics of gay gutter auteur and seasoned sadist Andy Milligan (The Body Beneath, The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here!), and his delightfully titled feature Guru, the Mad Monk (1970) aka Garu, the Mad Monk—a work that clearly borrowed its title from Don Sharp's pseudo-biopic Rasputin: The Mad Monk (1966) starring Christopher Lee and Barbara Shelley—which is more or less the director's final word on Christianity and religious institutions in general. Aside from being the mad megalomaniac Milligan's most flagrantly anti-Christian work to date, the film also has the distinction of being the first film that the director shot on 35mm, which he managed to do on a mere $11,000, as well as the only film where he not only acted as the director, cinematographer, and editor, but also producer and distributor, thus making it, at least technically speaking, the most eclectically 'auteurist' work of his career. Unfortunately, due to the fact that he switched from a small Auricon 16mm sound-on-film camera, which were usually used by news reporters and recorded both picture and sound at the same, to using a 35mm camera and a Nagra recorder and having to record picture and sound separately, this also meant that Milligan had to get rid of his erratic signature handheld 'swirl camera' style, including his intrusive in-your-face close-ups, intentionally cockeyed shot sex scenes, and obnoxious snuff-like ultra-up-close murder scenes, among other things, thus giving the film a more 'conventional' yet, somewhat paradoxically, amateurish style that makes the direction seem more like that of the typical horror hack than the man who directed the pathologically gritty and almost cinéma-vérité-like romance Nightbirds (1969). Due to his technical trouble in both production (while the director managed to shoot about twelve minutes a day on his Auricon, he only shot about six or seven with the 35mm camera) and post-production, Milligan ultimately disowned Guru, the Mad Monk and somewhat absurdly wrote it off as his single worst film yet, as the director's friend/biographer Jimmy McDonough wrote in his book The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001) regarding the film: "although it tends to run out of steam toward the end of its hour-plus and features a rather, uh, Methody lead performance by Paul Lieber, GURU is a scream and Milligan's most overt attack on organized religion [...] Strip away the medieval costumes and canned music in GURU and everything can be viewed in terms of a street pickup. The exchanges are all so sleazy and desperate. Don't trust anyone, every man for himself, perhaps I'll do for you if you do for me."

Milligan's first film after getting back from his exodus over the pond where he shot five films in London, including classics like Nightbirds (1969), the Sweeney Todd adaptation Bloodthirsty Butchers (1970), The Body Beneath (1970), and the radically raw Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde reworking The Man with Two Heads (1972), and the first the filmmaker made through his own short-lived movie company Nova International Pictures (since Milligan had been incessantly cheated out of money by his kosher producer/distributor William Mishkin, he decided to produce and distribute his films himself, though he made the mistake of borrowing money from another kosher conman, "some character named Maibaum"), Guru, the Mad Monk is another nasty melodrama disguised as a medieval horror costume piece but what distinguishes it from the director's other work is that it attacks traditional western religious institutions while at the same time mocking the then-trendy counterculture-based 'new age' and occult movements, particularly the obsession with eastern mysticism, hence the film's initially seemingly nonsensical title. The story of a young lover that works at a corrupt church prison who agrees to procure corpses for the eponymous monk antihero in exchange for helping him to save his beloved from a very certain death via execution for the false charge of murdering a bastard child that was born stillborn, the film follows in the tradition of Bloodthirsty Butchers in that it depicts two seemingly respectable citizens, a corrupt male named 'Guru' and his equally amoral female accomplice 'Olga', using their power of authority to ruin an evil black market empire just so they can survive and possibly even thrive during a time of great economic hardship, while also killing people just for kicks. Shot in a striking and rather idiosyncratic Manhattan church with kaleidoscopic stained glass windows that members of the Black Panther Party were apparently hiding out at when Milligan began shooting that almost passes for the medieval Slavic church in which the viewer is supposed to believe it takes place, Guru, the Mad Monk is a spiritually retarded hate screen from the deep and dark abysses of Mr. Milligan's forlorn sod soul.

Opening with the witch-like hand of a woman opening a book that features the title screen and credits on the pages in a strikingly elegant fashion typical of old school Hollywood Golden Age era masterpieces, Guru, the Mad Monk certainly strives for a little bit of cultivated class, even if it is a piece of conspicuously kitschy and campy celluloid trash. The year is 1480 and on the fictional Slavic island of Mortavia exists a church prison that was built after the "great plague" of 1438 called the 'The Lost Souls Church of Mortavia' that is ruled by a sinisterly self-interested and Id-driven chaplain named Father Guru (played with a sort of effortlessly effete eloquence by Milligan superstar Neil Flanagan) who gives prisoners their last rites before they are executed. When a young dame named Nadja (one-hit wonder Judith Israel) is falsely accused of infanticide by a jealous old bitch after she gives birth to a stillborn bastard boy, she is condemned to death and sent to the island where she runs into her former lover, Carl (played by Hebrew Paul Lieber, who went on to play small but more respectable roles in kosher comedies like King of California (2007) starring Michael Douglas and even Larry David's hit show Curb Your Enthusiasm), who works there as a jailor and whose job it is to look after the prisoners and to make sure they are buried in the ostensibly holy church graveyard after they are brutally executed. Upon talking to Nadja, Carl learns that she was kidnapped by a band of ruthless rapist thieving intermensch gypsies who forced her to steal and sexually pillaged her, thus resulting in her pregnancy. Aside from getting her knocked up, the gypsies discarded her and forced her to give birth on her own, but luckily the misbegotten half-gypsy bastard was stillborn and saved her the shame of having to raise such a hated-sired beast. Hoping to save Nadja, Carl goes to his master Father Guru for help, who offers to save his beloved if he procures corpses to sell on the black market, or as the immoral religious leader states himself, "I need your help. Our church is poor...Mother Church has seen fit not to send enough money to survive on, perhaps that's why we're looked down upon by all of Eastern Europe. The lowest of all humanity is sent to us to be executed. It's not a very pretty island, but it's all that we have, therefore we must make the most of it. A stench of death makes other people turn their noses up at us and, in turn, turn their backs on us. I need extra money. It is not easily come by, but there is a need for bodies...human bodies for medical study. With your help, it would be much easier for me to supply these bodies to the medical schools." Rather reluctantly, Carl obliges and a Faustian pact is made that inspires Father Guru to somewhat sinisterly but more sardonically state, "Thank god. there are many ways to work little miracles."

GURU, THE MAD MONK

To save Nadja's life, Carl must obtain a potion from the Guru's crazed cunt collaborator Olga aka 'Nosferatu' aka 'Soul of Darkness' (Jacqueline Webb) that will be used by the Father during the "last rites" and make her heart temporarily stop, thus making it seem like she has already died before she is executed and thus preventing her execution. Of course, Olga—an overweight middle-aged cunt who is equally as ugly on the exterior as the interior—is secretly a vampire and she makes Paul do a literal blood pact by pricking his skin to make sure that he carries out his promise of obtaining human blood in return for the potion. While the Guru manages to spare Nadja from execution during last rites by giving her the magic potion, which is hidden in a ring on his finger, with wine, he has ulterior motives. As he tells Carl regarding his personal philosophy, "I preach that god takes care of those that believe in him, but I have discovered that all my years of believing haven't helped me one bit. Mother Church sends me little money to exist on and even then it doesn't arrive when it's supposed to, so I preach one thing and continue to believe another...SELF-SURVIVAL. You will do well to remember this." Indeed, Guru is closer to a LaVeyan satanist than a Christian monk. Aside from being monetary-motivated, Father Guru also has an unquenchable thirst for blood and brutally murders any desperate person that makes the fatal mistake of attempting to seek spiritual refuge and redemption in the church. Guru is also a schizophrenic Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde-like character with at least two personalities, with his 'good' side oftentimes arguing with his 'bad' side, which has more or less taken over, while he stares in the mirror. Aside from dyke vamp Olga, the Guru's sole company is a retarded hunchback with grotesque physical and facial deformities named Igor (Jack Spencer), to whom he states, "I can say anything to you, you ignorant bastard, and you just smile. Maybe god was kind to you when he made you this way. Maybe god knew what he was doing when he gave you to me to take care of. Maybe god knew how desolate and forsaken this place was when he gave you to me to talk to, to keep me from going out of my mind." A two-faced schemer, the Guru tries to entice Igor to receive a "favor or two" from Nadja, who essentially becomes a prisoner of the church while Carl is away and she instantly notices the Father's proclivity towards pernicious murder. Luckily, Igor is a kind and selfless man whose grotesque appearance and seeming mental retardation betrays his truly valiant character. Meanwhile, Carl takes a pilgrimage to a medical hospital to deliver corpses to fulfill his part of his deal with Guru, thus leaving his beloved Nadja vulnerable, Olga, and their menacing minions.

When an old queen of a church leader sporting a gigantic German Iron Cross (!?) around his neck named Bishop Kopel (played by Frank Echols, whose sole other film credit was playing a doorman in Tim Burton's classic 1994 biopic Ed Wood) shows up with a young blond queen named Father Polanski (played by Milligan regular Gerald Jacuzzo) to replace Guru at the Lost Souls Church of Mortavia due to the fact that he is committing blasphemy by harboring evil vampiress Olga, the Mad Monk begins seeing red and plots to kill the two so that he can keep his post and marvelous underground murder empire. After Bishop Kopel comments about how the island church is used so that "the rest of middle Europe is able to get rid of their...undesirables" and discusses how the Mother Church hides the fact that even those prisoners that are not sentenced to death somehow end up dying as well, he tells Father Polanski to leave so he can begin viciously berating Guru about his decadent and flamboyant fashion sense (he sports a silk blood red robe like he is some sort of demonic drag diva out of a horror flick directed by Werner Schroeter) and lets him know that he has been fired and replaced by the younger Chaplain, so the Mad Monk states, "I'm not going anywhere and neither are you," in a superlatively sassy fashion and subsequently decapitates him. Indeed, Father Guru is one mean and ruthless bitch and he is willing to kill anyone or anything that gets in his way, no matter how insignificant.

GURU, THE MAD MONK

Meanwhile, pedo-like priest Polanski runs into Nadja, who tells him that she suspects people are being murdered by Guru and his disciples at the church. Although Polanski consoles Nadja and gives her a temporary feeling of relief after telling her that he is replacing Guru and that she will be safe soon, little does the priest realize that his comrade Bishop Kopel has already lost his head and he's next. When Polanski goes looking for the Bishop, he finds bloodsucking she-bitch Olga, who gives him the shock of his life by violently murdering him without warning, but not before showing him Kopel's bloody decapitating dome on a platter. After that, Olga has a verbal bitch fight with Nadja and then proceeds to 'glamour' the poor girl, but luckily kindhearted cripple Igor breaks the vampire's mind-control powers over the little lady and saves her life. When Guru learns of Igor's betrayal, he wastes no time ruthlessly punishing the kindly monster by crucifying him on a large door with the help of Olga. When Guru tells Olga that he plans to run away and live in complete secrecy by himself, and that he wants nothing to do with her and has no use for her anymore, the vampire's innate female hysteria and jealousy gets the best of her and she attempts murdering the Mad Monk, but he swiftly grabs her knife and kills her with it. Meanwhile, Carl finally gets back from his Jonathan Harker-esque journey (which is never actually depicted in the film) and Nadja tells him about everything that has happened. Although Igor manages to free himself and attack Guru, the Mad Monk manages to grab his knife and, to add insult to injury, murders him by repeatedly stabbing him in his deformed hunchback. While Guru attempts to escape from Carl, the lapsed jailor merely grabs him and ties the rope of the church bell around his neck, thus lynching the murderously schizophrenic monk, whose dangling corpse hilariously rings the bell. In the end, Carl and Nadja leave the church and assumedly live happily ever after in a rare Milligan flick like it's brother film Bloodthirsty Butchers where a rampantly heterosexual couple proves that love conquers all, even exceedingly effete killer holy men.

As Milligan would reveal in McDonough's bio regarding his innate heretical character even as a young boy, "I went to German Lutheran School. I was forced to believe. The first class was religion. We had a nasty old German guy with gout, big red nose, must've drank. Used to hit your knuckles with a ruler. He'd go on about Adam and Eve and they had two sons and I'd raise my hand and say, "If they had two sons, well, who did they marry and have kids by?" Whack! I'd always ask about the holes in the Bible. "If the ark was only a hundred-something feet long and they had all the animals in the world, how could they all get on the ark?" Whack! Hee Hee. I was always in the corner. Always asking questions." Indeed, unlike similarly themed Hebraic Hollywood celluloid swill, Guru, The Mad Monk does not attempt to obscure its seething hatred for organized religion and all that it stands for, while at the same time making the eponymous 'Mad Monk' seem more intriguing, complex, and 'human' than the typical filmic priest. Also, unlike Hollywood films, Milligan's virtual anti-church manifesto gives reasons for the Mad Monk's hypocritical behavior. Notably, at various points in the film, Guru and his partner Olga say hypocritical things like, "you can't trust people these days" to the point of unnerving repetition, but this is also a major theme of the film and a glaring element of the Andy Milligan Weltanschauung. Indeed, the eponymous villain/antihero is a sort of stand-in for Milligan who's personal philosophy is pretty much exactly the same as Guru as demonstrated by his remark in McDonough's bio while talking about himself and his films in the third-person: "Milligan pictures are very moral pictures, actually. Extremely moral. They show what happens if you fuck around. Even Elmer Gantry—if you get hooked on religion it becomes a drug and you become destroyed by it, too [...] The answer is to go back to the basics of religion—try to be as nice as you can be daily. That's what it comes down to. But if you get crass, nasty people, you can't turn the other cheek to them, you have to kick them in the other cheek. You have to be as low and depraved as they are. They don't understand anything else." Notably, when Milligan was in the hospital in mid-1991 dying from AIDS, McDonough visited him daily and recorded him stating the following, "Everybody has religion, everybody...I wish I could believe. Life is so full of emptiness." Like Guru, Milligan lost the faith long ago, which basically gave him the license to become an insanely intemperate sexual sadist and one of the most hateful and morally curious filmmakers who has ever lived, but unlike the sort of fat, weak, and impotent atheistic Richard Dawkins, Neil deGrasse Tyson, and Christopher Hitchens fanboys who pride themselves on senselessly attempting to make people feel as miserable and nihilistic as they are and who probably spend 24/7 trying to artificially boost their fragile egos by pointlessly and ultimately fruitlessly attacking true believer Christian evangelists on the internet while lurking in their grandmother's basement, the gutter auteur was at least man enough and rational enough to recognize the value and purpose that religion gives to certain people's lives. Of course, if Guru, The Mad Monk was made today in Hebraic Hollywood, the eponymous villain would be portrayed as a deranged dude drunk on Christ as opposed to a schizophrenic charlatan who lost his faith. Indeed, more than anything, Guru, The Mad Monk, like much of the director's work, is a semi-cryptic celluloid confession as to why Milligan became the raging sadistic queen, godless misanthropic misfit, and mad micro-budget moviemaker that he was.

-Ty E

NIGHTBIRDS
NIGHTBIRDS

Andy Milligan* (1970)

Until last week, I thought Andy Milligan was one of the most irredeemable, talentless, and inconsequential filmmakers who had ever made the unfortunate mistake of picking up a Bolex 16mm camera. The fact that he has a marginal but loyal following baffled me as most of his inept cinematic works would not even be worthy of a minor Troma direct-to-video release. Of course, that was before I saw his extremely sordid yet queerly charming x-rated anti-romantic drama Nightbirds (1970); a mostly unseen work that was once considered lost until Milligan biographer Jimmy McDonough revealed a 16mm print of the film that he would later sell to Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn (Valhalla Rising, Drive); who would later help with the restored release of the film (with Milligan's campy vampire flick The Body Beneath) on dvd/bluray by actively petitioning the British Film Institute (BFI). If it hadn't been for Refn's serious commitment as both a filmmaker and a cinephile, I am fairly certain that I would have never attempted to watch another Andy Milligan smut-piece again after my last grueling experience with his appropriately titled yet surprisingly banal work Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1972). In fact, the sole reason (aside from a recommendation by Phantom of Pulp) why I decided to give Nightbirds a chance was due to Refn's name being on the front cover of the new BFI release because, unlike unrefined cinephile Quentin Tarantino, the Danish auteur filmmaker is someone whose taste in cinema I can trust and count on. Indeed, Nightbirds proved to be a magnificent piece of gritty melodramatic misogyny that totally took me by surprise; so much so that I ended up watching the film no less than three times over the course of a one week period. I don't know whether or not Milligan was experimenting with a different kind of drug, amidst a breakup with his latest boy toy, or emotionally influenced by the wet and dreary London air, but with Nightbirds he proved that behind all the vapid degeneracy and technical incompetency was a serious and uncompromising artist with something profound yet inordinately pessimistic to express, even if it was a stereotypically gay contempt for womankind and heterosexual love. Mr. Refn stated of maniac Milligan: "He was sort of a Douglas Sirk figure." Indeed, Nightbirds is a quasi-Sirkian work for degenerates, delinquents, dandies, and other socially defective individuals that makes Todd Haynes' Sirk-inspired work Far From Heaven (2002) seem quite restrained and prosaic by comparison. Nightbirds follows the spontaneous and aimless rise and deadly fall of an ephemeral relationship between two lanky British blondes: Dink (Berwick Kaler) and Dee (Julie Shaw). Right from the beginning of Nightbirds, it is blatantly apparent that goofy momma's boy Dink is submissive to all of Dee's self-indulgent desires. Sensing and eventually exploiting his kindheartedness and gentlemanly demeanor, Dee – an opportunistic succubus who uses her beautiful body as a man-eating weapon – takes Dink's heart hostage and drains his feeble soul. Squatting on the top-floor of a decrepit apartment building owned by a young slumlord named Ginger, the twosome spends their days and nights having mostly one-sided impassioned sex, but unlike kindly Dink, Dee has no other expectations nor desires for a relationship other than erotic debauchery where her body is treated as a precious temple of worship and her groveling man is nothing more than a glorified vibrator with arms and legs that makes whining noises.

Like the equally unseen and shameless British film Duffer (1971) directed by Joseph Despins and William Dumaesq, Nightbirds is a gloomy and gritty work depicting the peculiar perversity of the non-working urban proletariat. Neither Dee nor Dink were born in the working-class, hence their abhorrence of work and failure in regards to self-sufficiency. Unable to deal with the neurotic ramblings of his distraught widowed mommy, sweet and humble man-child Dink chooses homelessness over reasonably plush bourgeois comfort and eventually bumps into ferocious femme fatale Dee by mere chance, thus beginning their manifestly foreordained relationship. Leading desultory lives with nil goals for the foreseeable future, the curious couple of Nightbirds sees nihilistic sex as a way of life and working and building a family as a gross pestilence. As a socially retarded would-be-romantic at heart, Dink is willing to overlook the fact that his quasi-sociopathic girlfriend is an unsentimental ice queen of the most unrelenting and thoroughly demoralized kind. In his pathetic and ultimately self-destructive naivety, Dink is willing to do anything and everything to please his idolized girlfriend as long as it does not involve working, including grovelingly kissing her feet and performing cunnilingus on Dee's command and masochistically accepting her venomous verbal reproaching, whilst totally oblivious to the fact that Dee sees him as nothing more than a momentary fling and a semi-entertaining sexual novelty. Unable to provide for himself, let alone his girlfriend, Dink relies on Dee's crafty flirtations with other men and shoplifting to survive. Essentially, Dink and Dee – as a product of the post-WW2 generation – are an unstable couple that are totally at odds with every characteristic that was once expected of traditional and healthy western societies. Naturally, the couple would also feel at home in the sort of degenerate hipster ghetto microcosm of false values mindless sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll contained within the early cinematic works of Paul Morrissey. Unlike Morrissey's pseudo-cinéma vérité works Flesh (1968) and Trash (1970), Nightbirds has a fairly potent, penetrating and expressive atmosphere, even if most of the film is constrained to a single and relatively unfurnished room. Originally shot on grainy greyish 16mm film stock, Nightbirds – like Duffer – is as aesthetically dispirited and decayed as it is thematically, thus near-perfectly accentuating the lifelessness of the demoralized characters and post-industrial setting the film so candidly portrays. Nightbirds also features a sometimes erratic and disjointed editing style that is analogous to the despoiled psyches of its lead characters. Needless to say, Nightbirds is a film that will appeal more to antinatalists than hopeless romantics.

NIGHTBIRDS

Like Andy Milligan's first film Vapors (1965), Nightbirds is considered to be one of the hysterical homo auteur filmmaker's most personal and unprecedented efforts, sort of like Fassbinder-meets-grindhouse-kitsch. As a rabid misogynist who was raised an exceedingly cold and emotionally and physically abusive alcoholic mother, Nightbirds features one of the most naturalistic and inexorable depictions of a vicious vixen of a woman ever captured on 16mm film. Although evidence of Dee's sadistic personality is sprinkled throughout Nightbirds, it is not until the remaining minutes of the film that one learns the true extent of her utter soullessness and sheer depravity. Like all great exploitation works, Nightbirds features a tragic conclusion that is guaranteed to fully agitate less than demanding filmgoers. Although featuring scenes of sex and nudity throughout, Nightbirds is about as erotically stimulating as a vintage Polaroid of Steven Spielberg in a bikini and as romantic as a winter season coathanger abortion. I can honestly say that Nightbirds is one of few films that has inspired me to reexamine the work of a director that I was once vehemently dismissive of, so if you're an Andy Milligan virgin, make sure that you pop your cherry with Nightbirds. For an auteur that boasted of never directing a film that cost over $10,000.00, Nightbirds is certainly no small achievement.

-Ty E

THE BODY BENEATH

Andy Milligan* (1970)

After completing his typically wretched work Torture Dungeon (1969), low-camp auteur Andy Milligan (Vapors, Guru, the Mad Monk) would make a deal with British producer Leslie Elliot and move across the pond to England. During his exile in England, Milligan directed two of his “greatest” and most original films: Nightbirds (1969) and The Body Beneath (1970). Once presumed-lost, but now found thanks to dandy Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn (Valhalla Rising, Drive), Nightbirds is arguably Milligan’s most mature and artistically-merited yet strikingly stark and maliciously misogynistic work that – not unlike his debut featurette Vapors (1965) – takes a more audacious and uncompromising look at the frailty of the human condition, especially among sexual degenerates; a subject the debauched director knew all too well. Being a sadomasochistic sodomite with a terribly torrid and troubled personal life, Milligan ultimately opted for directing escapist exploitation flicks and bloody bad period pieces, but with The Body Beneath, the technically-incompetent visionary created a more serious and – dare I say – more classy film in the Grand Guignol-esque cinematically fantastic style he is infamous for. “Filmed in the graveyards of England” in “bone-chilling color” and featuring “sexually rampant ghouls, depraved souls...and blood-red roses,” The Body Beneath is a modern vampire flick with traditional folklore elements about an ancient family of inbred bloodsuckers that is looking for some new, mortal inter-family blood, so as to rejuvenate their current degenerating state. Led by a charismatic yet physically unremarkable “Reverend” who likes to quote Oscar Wilde (although forgetting his name due to his advanced undead age) and protected by a fearsome threesome of green-faced barbarian Barbarella-like lady vamps, the frightfully fabulous Ford family takes residence in the Carfax Abbey; a Gothic monastery with an ancient graveyard that is haunted by the bloodsucking ghouls. Reasonably paced and surprisingly coherent in structure for an Andy Milligan monster movie, The Body Beneath is a welcome relief from the emotionally and aesthetically sterile Hammer horror films that were flooding the British film market at that time.

Reverend Alexander Algernon Ford (Gavin Reed) is quite the charming blood-sucker in a religious shepherd’s clothing, as he has a wonderful way with words as displayed early on in The Body Beneath when he declares in the most grand pomposity that, “I know everything dear boy!” and “it isn’t easy being right all the time” and, indeed, it would seem that he does, especially when it comes to his family’s extensive genealogical records. Looking to recruit some fresh mortal for the immortal vampiric Ford family that goes back no less than 21 centuries, the good Reverend aggressively recruits long-distance mortal relatives against their will and is especially interested in female Fords as he will use them – not unlike the National Socialist Schutzstaffel Lebensborn breeding program – to sire a rejuvenated generation of immaculate god-men that the Rev fervidly describes as “godlike in appearance.” To help him with the less glamorous work associated with kidnapping, torture, and murder, the Reverend uses a slavish, shy, and seemingly half-retarded hunchback named Spool (played by Berwick Kaler of Milligan’s Nightbirds). Spool may be a ridiculously repulsive monster-man that does daftly and dirty deeds for vampires, but that does not stop him from being hopeless romantic that eventually falls prey to the temptations of a beauty mortal girl that the Reverend has held captive. Featuring less than erotic gratuitous sex scenes, violent yet exceedingly schlockish death scenes, and mind-numbingly maladroit melodrama, The Body Beneath is a film of unintentionally delightful distinction. Undoubtedly, the greatest part of the film is when the entire Ford family congregates into a giant crypt and engages in a Dionysian orgiastic feast of blood and debate as to whether they should move to America. Bearing a suitably campy resemblance to the faggy and fairy varmint of Jack Smith’s revolutionary and sexually-ambiguous featurette Flaming Creatures (1963), except filmed in a quasi-psychedelic and notably atmospheric color that further accentuates Milligan’s costume design talents, The Body Beneath – although inferior to the auteur’s other British trash masterpiece Nightbirds – concludes in a sinisterly climatic fashion.

THE BODY BENEATH

Sneeringly attacking his nation of origin, Milligan decided to present the land of the free as a virtual hellhole inhabited by the “scum of the earth”; full of socially and physically defective pimps, prostitutes, vagrants, and medieval religious fanatics, but I guess that is what one would expect from the miserable, misanthropic auteur who gave us Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1972). In the rather risible realm of The Body Beneath, ghastly bloodsucking ghouls are the most valiant of heroes and all things pure and untainted are determinedly defiled. That being said, I wouldn’t be surprised if the persnickety Reverend Ford was an alter-ego of Andy Milligan and the rest of the vamps being symbolic of his off-Broadway performers. As Milligan fanatic Nicolas Winding Refn once stated regarding the schlockmeister filmmaker’s horror works: “They have these strange scenes of violence, poorly done but so charming and campy, and all conveyed with such sincerity.” Indeed, one of the main appeals of Milligan’s marginal cinematic works, especially Vapors, Nightbirds, and The Body Beneath, is that – unlike the similarly incompetently directed gore flicks of Herschell Gordon Lewis (Blood Feast, Color Me Blood Red) – they have a distinct and blatant wholehearted essence behind their direction, hence the gutter-auteur’s posthumous popularity in the underground. With The Body Beneath, Milligan was indubitably at his most preeminent, which might not mean much in context with his mostly wholly worthless filmography, but as contemporary alpha-auteur Nicolas Winding Refn sentimentally declared regarding the ghastly filmmaker: “Few filmmakers can boast of having a recognisable style, but when you see a Milligan movie, you are in no doubt whose film it is.”

-Ty E

TORTURE DUNGEON
TORTURE DUNGEON

Andy Milligan* (1970)

Lately, due to my increasingly disturbing and admittedly unhealthy obsession with the superlatively shitty films of gay American gutter auteur and well-seasoned misanthropic sadomasochistic sodomite Andy Milligan (The Rats Are Coming!, The Werewolves Are Here!, Fleshpot on 42nd Street), I feel like a junky who has hit rock bottom and am willing to trudge to the deepest and darkest of untermenschen abysses to get my filmic fix and I say that as someone who originally wrote the director off as the obscenely overrated darling of autistic schlock cinema fanboys like Nicolas Winding Refn and jaded exploitation fans who wallow in celluloid excrement. While I have no doubt that most of his fans are indeed autistic fanboys and people that like to play with filmic feces, I now can fully understand the appeal of Milligan's undeniably singular oeuvre, so I have made it my mission to see every single one of his films as soon as possible as if the Dracula (1971) director is as important an auteur as Pasolini and Fassbinder, both of whom he had more in common with aside from their shared sexual vice(s). At the recommendation of the director's biographer and one-time friend, Jimmy McDonough, who stated in his biography The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001) regarding the work that it is "Milligan at his most unhinged, and it may be my favorite Andy picture of all time," I decided to watch Torture Dungeon (1970) aka Dungeon of Death. A medieval costume horror piece about literally cutthroat royals and ostensibly set in olde England yet actually starring proletarian American guidos and shot on the pathetic (non)beaches of Staten Island, the thrift store micro-epic is notable for, among other things, its mesmerizing melodramatic misanthropy, anti-aristocratic inanity, prole-pleasing perversity, and loony low-camp cruelty. An immaculately excreted Bolex-shot 16mm celluloid turd with a mere budget of $15,000 (apparently, the budget for a typical Milligan production) that manages to elevate 'bad taste' to an artform, Torture Dungeon may seem like it was directed by a dyslexic gay dago hairdresser from New Jersey, but it is really the product of an eccentric ex-dressmaker who directed superlatively shitty period piece horror flicks just so that he would have an excuse to design lavish, if not rather kitschy, homemade costumes. The decidedly debasing tale of a demented bastard duke and literal son-of-a-whore of the self-described "trisexual" yet sterile sort who has his flagrantly faggy flower-picking half-brother decapitated and then plots to have his rather retarded bug-and-booger-eating other half-brother get married to a local big bosomed peasant babe with a loving boyfriend so that he can spawn an heir so that the degenerating plague-ridden family Kingdom can once again thrive, Torture Dungeon is a classic "evil family" Milligan flick where the auteur demonstrates why being spawned and raised by a morbidly obese psychopathic alcoholic bitch of the emotionally and physically

(and some believe sexually) abusive sort was probably the best preparation he could have for becoming one of the most, if not the most, overtly misanthropic and misogynistic filmmaker who has ever lived.

While picking daisies like a seasoned fairy and queenishly arguing with one of his servants over whether or not it is going to rain, faggy monarch Lord Harkin is decapitated by a mysterious being with a large axe. At Harkin's carnivalesque funeral procession, one of the pallbearers, the deceased's retarded blond beast brother Duke Albert of Aberthy (Milligan superstar Hal Borske, who even appeared in the director's 1965 cinematic debut Vapors)—a forsaken fellow that seems to have a lot in common with real-life 17th-century retarded cripple King Charles II of Spain—picks his nose and eats his boogers while carrying his big brother's royal fruit-adorned casket. Albert also has a thing for gorging on live bugs when he is not spending his time picking and devouring his boogers in a dainty fashion. While sub-half-wit Albert has no clue who killed his brother Lord Harkin, his sister Lady Jane (Patricia Dillon of Milligan's Seeds (1968) and Gutter Trash (1969)) is all too aware and even accuses the culprit, her evil libertine bastard half-brother Duke Norman of Norwich (Milligan regular Gerald Jacuzzi, who penned a couple of the gutter auteur's late-1960s efforts, including The Degenerates, The Filthy Five, and Tricks of the Trade)—a deranged and tastelessly charming sadomasochist that is more or less a stand-in for director Milligan—who resents his half-siblings due to the fact that he is a sexually sterile son-of-a-whore who is last in line to become the ruler of the family Kingdom due to the fact that his regrettable birth was unsanctioned. Naturally, the Duke's ultimate goal is to wipe out every single one of his half-siblings so he can be king. To male-nympho Norman's credit, the Kingdom is in drastic decline as a result of the plague, which has impoverished the monarchy and wiped out a good percentage of the peasantry. As someone that was in love with and just secretly impregnated by her belated brother Harkin, Lady Jane absolutely loathes Norman and plots with her sister Lady Agatha (Donna Whitfield) to take down their bastard of a bastard brother. Of course, as someone that is pregnant with the unborn inbred spawn of her dead brother, 'good gal' Lady Jane is not all that different from her deranged half-bro, at least when it comes to carnal knowledge. Meanwhile, Duke Norman plots with some similarly evil aristocrats to have his brother Alfred, who will "rule in name only" since he is a bug-and-booger-eating retard, marry a local girl that is "fertile, healthy, beautiful and—above all—untouched by the plague" because he is unfortunately the "last chance for the Kingdom's survival" and "if he does not conceive a male heir all is lost." Ultimately, the Duke and his co-conspirators decide on a big bosomed brunette peasant babe named Heather MacGregor (played by Milligan regular Susan Cassidy, who was one of the few women the director did not hate), who has no clue what sort of evil and blueblooded debauchery that she is in store for.

TORTURE DUNGEON

Although a rather poor mate for a royal as a somewhat chubby and soft Scottish girl that was adopted (an elderly handmaiden warns her that “I won’t tell if you don’t” regarding her unfortunate ancestry), Heather is forced to wed mental invalid Albert after her adopted father is paid 30 pieces of gold by the Kingdom. Rather unfortunately, on top of having a hot yet mentally feeble fuckbuddy named Marvin (George Box), Heather already has a boy toy named William (Dan Lyra), so Duke Norman has him liquidated by two of his muscular cloaked goons, who first crucify him and then drive a pitchfork into the loverboy’s throat in a classically poorly directed Milligan-esque death scene. Although Heather initially finds the Duke to be a kind and hospitable fellow, she is soon startled to learn from his two half-sisters, Lady Jane and Lady Agatha, that she should, “always be wary of him...never trust him” and “always think the worst and you’ll survive.” Indeed, as he declares to his royal whore and virtual slave Rosemary (Patricia Garvey) after telling her that, “I could so easily love you but I won’t let myself. See, that’s where you and I differ, my dear. I have a very strong mind...a very strong will power and I can turn my love into hatred or the other way around. All my life I have never been able to love. I take that back, I do love one thing: power, power...,” Duke Norman is a deviant sex addict, or as he states himself, “I live for pleasure...only second to power, of course. And I’ll try anything. I’m not a homosexual...I’m not a heterosexual...I’m not asexual...I’m trisexual. Yes, that’s it...I’ll try anything once.” Among other things, the Duke forces his (un)beloved Rosemary to engage in a ménage à trios with him and his best friend/groveling servant ‘Ivan the Hunchback’ (Richard Mason) in what he describes as “one big happy family” and also has a dark and damp S&M-themed torture chamber where he derives sexual gratification from torturing and killing his enemies and even his servants.

When Heather finally marries spastic retard Albert, the mentally disabled monarch has to be physically forced to kiss the bride at the wedding because he is too retarded to figure out how to do it on his own. During the honeymoon night, Albert refuses to screw his bride because he would much rather eat greasy chicken and drink wine, so the Duke shows up and tells Heather “I rely on you, my dear, to direct the consummation” because “my unfortunate half-brother was pushed or fell on his head at the age of 6 under mysterious circumstances,” thus hinting that he was the one who turned his brother into a babbling booger-fetisizing buffoon. While the two manage to consummate under the Duke’s observation, Albert is killed the next morning by a muscle-bound cloaked goon who hammers a stake into his heart. Realizing they will be next after discovering the bloody corpse of their mentally invalid brother, Lady Jane and Lady Agatha plot to make their getaway before they two are sacrificed to the Duke’s cruel conspiracy, but the latter is soon killed after she is caught by her homicidal half-homo half-brother. Meanwhile, Lady Jane seeks sanctuary with Heather’s father Mr. MacGregor and a one-eyed old hag Margaret (Milligan regular Maggie Rogers of the lost unfinished 1967 arthouse flick Compass Rose), who wants to seek revenge against the Duke after discovering his torture dungeon, declaring of the bastard blueblood, “The Duke? Who else but treachery himself, the son-of-a bitch. His mother was Satan, his father was King...a skunk should smell as sweet.” In the end, Mr. MacGregor and hag Margaret save Heather from the whip-wielding Duke, who perishes in a rather pathetic fashion. In a twist ending, it is revealed that mono-eye hag Margaret is not only Heather’s biological mother, but also the original queen who was disposed of, thus making her daughter the rightful queen and true heir to the Kingdom. Unfortunately, Margaret perishes from wounds she received from her “half-son” the Duke (how a person can be someone’s half-son is anyone’s guess, but these are Margaret’s words, not mine) only seconds after telling her story.

As Milligan biographer Jimmy McDonough hilariously noted regarding the production of Torture Dungeon, “Andy rounded out the cast with a bunch of Staten Island nonactors possessing the worst (and most nonmedieval) accents ever, particularly a “dese, dem, and dose” duo playing the medieval potentates, Andy inexplicably dubbed Peter the Ear and Peter the Nose (and eye-patched Neil Flanagan was Peter the Eye). The locals were swept away by the promise of stardom—until they actually saw the film. “They were a bunch of lower-class Italians who owned hardware stores,” recalled Matt Baylor. “They wanted to strangle Andy. They were gonna lynch him, I swear to God. He stayed away from Staten Island for about a month.”” Indeed, it is certainly an amazing prospect to think about a bunch of vulgarly narcissistic proletarian goombahs being bossed around by a raging blond queen like Mr. Milligan. Somewhat curiously, Milligan’s film resembles a poor man’s version of Sapphic kraut-kickass Ulrike Ottinger’s epic avant-garde freakophile masterpiece Freak Orlando (1981) in terms of its campy and colorful neo-medieval costumes and seemingly pathological sadomasochistic imagery. Certainly, out of all the films in Milligan’s oeuvre, Torture Dungeon comes the closest to featuring its own waywardly distinct cinematic universe, as a work that is like a campy no-budget 1970s version of HBO’s hit show Game of Thrones directed by and starring mental patients that have been institutionalized for horribly heinous sex crimes. Notably, the film was also an underground hit of sorts, which was largely the result of the advertising campaign and marketing techniques of Hebraic producer/distributor William Mishkin, or as Bill Landis and Michelle Clifford revealed in their book Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002): “Mishkin packaged TORTURE DUNGEON with such a provocative (if misleading) S&M-slanted campaign that it kept popping up on 42nd Street for a decade after its initial release.” Milligan also seemed to be particularly proud of the film as he had a character mention it in his gritty 1973 masterpiece Fleshpot on 42nd Street (an over-the-hill tranny hooker played by Milligan superstar Neil Flanagan remarks, “Let’s go see Torture Dungeon playing on a double bill with Bloodthirsty Butchers down at The Waverly”) and once proudly stated regarding the unconventional shooting of the work: “TORTURE DUNGEON—Staten Island looks like the coast of England, doesn’t it? That’s under Mt. Loretta in Tottenville, the southernmost point in Staten Island. We didn’t look like we were making a film. That’s the secret of doing nonunion. I never advertise anything..”

TORTURE DUNGEON

Featuring various highly quotable Milligan aphorisms like, “Always think the worst and you will survive” and “I see beauty only in decadence, for only decadence is the mother of invention,” the film is a virtual celluloid treasure-trove for Milliganphiles and/or proud misanthropes. While I think Russ Meyer was a crypto-feminist pig who was spiritually cuckolded by big bosomed broads and Herschel Gordon Lewis (who once proudly stated, “I see filmmaking as a business, and I pity anyone who regards it as an art form”) and Doris Dishman were Semitic swindlers who used exploitation cinema as a means to make a quick easy buck and to further a Judaic anti-WASP agenda (after all, Hersch was the man that directed overtly hick-hating exploitation trash like Two Thousand Maniacs! (1964) and The Gore Gore Girls (1972) and even made the dubious claim in the 2010 documentary Herschell Gordon Lewis: The Godfather of Gore that he personally beat up some supposed antisemites), I consider Andy Milligan a real auteur and outsider artist as his patently perverse personality is just as much a part of his films as the glaringly amateurish special effects, gratingly bad acting, and shaky handheld cinematography and probably no other work is covered with the director’s sticky auteur fingerprints than Torture Dungeon, which is the virtual Gone with the Wind (1939) of late-1960s/early-1970s American exploitation trash. Indeed, only Milligan would have directed a campy medieval melodrama about a murderously resentful “trisexual” bastard aristocrat who plots to murder his retarded brother and all his other half-siblings and then attempt to disguise the film as a sleazy sexploitation-horror hybrid. If you thought the Teutonic blueblood von Essenbeck family of Luchino Visconti’s The Damned (1969) aka La caduta degli dei were nasty, debauched, incestuous, and insanely treacherous, you have yet to experience the fucked family affair contained in Milligan’s contagious gutter-grade celluloid Götterdämmerung.

-Ty E

THE MAN WITH TWO HEADS

Andy Milligan* (1972)

If his bargain bin Sweeney Todd adaptation Bloodthirsty Butchers is his most overtly hateful and misanthropic film, The Man with Two Heads (1972) aka The Man with Two Faces aka Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Blood—an aberrant adaptation of Robert Louis Stevenson’s classic Victorian era Gothic novella The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (1886) that begins with a dapperly dressed British gent brutally mutilating and murdering a blonde prostitute in a somewhat Jack the Ripper-esque fashion—is gay American gutter auteur Andy Milligan’s most violently misogynistic, perversely personal, and sexually incriminating work. Slightly butchered in post-production to receive a PG-rating and titled The Man with Two Heads by Hebraic producer/distributor William Mishkin to cash in on the popularity of Lee Frost’s race-baiting blaxploitation-horror-sci-fi-comedy hybrid celluloid turd The Thing with Two Heads (1972) even though the work does not feature a dude with two noggins, the film may have been defiled for monetary reasons yet it is still pure and unadulterated Milligan and certainly one of the filmmaker’s ‘classics.’ One of the director’s five films, which also include Nightbirds (1969), The Body Beneath (1970), Bloodthirsty Butchers (1970), and The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here! (1972), that he created when he relocated to London, England to get away from his regular producer Mishkin to work with Anglo-Semite Leslie Elliot at Cinemedia, only to have the relationship fall apart in the middle of the second film (apparently, Elliot’s father accused Milligan of making an “anti-Semitic attack” after the auteur remarked, “I know your type from New York City and I’ve never been fazed by your type”) and forcing the filmmaker to rekindle his Faustian pact with the NYC smut-peddler, The Man with Two Heads is certainly a classic among the auteur’s oeuvre, as well as one of the sadomasochistic creator’s own personal favorites among his own work. In his excellent biography The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001), Jimmy McDonough probably paid the film its best compliment when he wrote about it and the influence of its director, ““Insanity represents a form of hope in Douglas Sirk’s works,” wrote Fassbinder. The same seems true for Milligan. “Andy had a thing about the mentally insane,” said SEEDS producer Allen Bazzini. “He used to frighten me with that. When he’d talk about it, his eyes lit up.”” After watching a print of the film that looks like it stewed in a concentration camp porta-potty for a couple decades before being violently defecated onto the world, I can happily report that The Man with Two Heads is a gritty and visceral piece of venomous celluloid hate in an ostensibly elegant pseudo-Victorian package that completely lacks the camp and goofy queer elements that are typical of Milligan’s other films. The sordid story of an atheistic egomaniac who attempts to play god and sires a murderously sadistic misogynistic monster in his own body that takes over without warning and forces the antihero to malevolently torture and kill unsuspecting streetwalkers and winos, the work ultimately reflects Milligan's own very personal war against god, society, and conventional sexuality.

THE MAN WITH TWO HEADS

Opening with a dapper yet deranged and deadly dandy-like gentleman (Jim Wilson of 1977 family-horror turd Return to Boggy Creek and Jaws 2 (1978)) being asked by a blonde hooker, "do you happen to know what time it is?" and then proceeding to take a walk with her back to her apartment where he begins violently manhandling her on the way and then sadistically slaughters her after she complains, "Hold on, I don't go in for this rough stuff," The Man with Two Heads immediately establishes a tone of unnervingly brutal, if not innately ineptly directed, contempt for the more monetary motivated-members of the fairer sex, who Mr. Milligan seems to have nil sympathy for. The elegantly dressed whore-killer is soon caught and decides to hang himself in his jail cell, but his woman-hating homicidal spirit is resurrected in another person's body after an enterprising young scientist named Dr. William Jekyll (Denis DeMarne) decides out of desperation to inject the evil part of the man's brain into his own body so that he can test his revolutionary evil-eradicating serum, thus ultimately having terrible consequences for the already debased and downtrodden streetwalkers of 1835 London. After he reveals in a pompous rant he makes while talking with a certain Inspector Wolfe (Laurence Davies) while procuring the corpse of the whore-killer for his experiments, Dr. Jekyll is a sort of nihilist who hates spirituality, or as he himself states, "I do not believe in a soul. I believe in facts, I believe what I can see and touch, what is real. This thing 'soul' as you call it, is a figment of man's imagination. Something brought on by himself to help his everyday existence. Man has invented this soul to help him get out of today's difficulties...to transport him to a hereafter...a hereafter that doesn't exist [...] I'm a man of medicine. I have no time for such things as souls and religions. I believe in science and medicine and only in that." In fact, Jekyll is so tirelessly dedicated to sterile science that he incessantly misses meetings with his beautiful and rather dainty (especially for a Milligan film!) fiancée Mary Ann Marsden (Gay Feld) and her family. Judging by his glacial manner of speaking with his beloved, one might suspect that Dr. Jekyll is borderline impotent or, at the very least, has very little, if any, sex drive. Indeed, Dr. Jekyll has made an unofficial Faustian pact with science and he will ultimately pay for it with his life, but not before he has a bit of good clean sadomasochistic libertine fun of the de Sadean sort after developing a second, more sinister personality after he becomes a victim of his own dubious scientific research.

Dr. Jekyll hates his beloved Mary Ann's scientist father and men like him, or as he states to his fiancée, "It's men like your father in our profession that hold back men like your brother and me. Every time we come up with something new, your father and some of his old cronies down at the medical league refuse to even listen to us [...] Therefore, we have to seek financing by becoming either second rate doctors to anyone at any price—giving up our experiments—or taking on private students as I've been forced to do." Indeed, Dr. Jekyll is a professor with six students, though one of them, a prissy queen named John Murphy (Milligan superstar Gerald Jacuzzi), decides to quit when his professor's experiments regarding eradicating evil become more dubious, warning his pedantic teacher, "I think it's my duty to warn you...you're playing with things that are no concern of yours. They belong to one Supreme Being, God, and you have no right to tamper with nature as he gave it. God will punish you, you'll see. I'm warning you." Of course, god (or tragic happenstance) does punish the good doctor. Indeed, when Dr. Jekyll believes he has perfected a serum that can isolate good and evil in man's brain, he becomes so eager to test it that he cannot wait for the latest shipment of lab rats and other animals, which are on backorder, so he absurdly opts to try it on himself, but trouble arises when his dimwitted assistant Jack Smithers (genuinely talented Nightbirds star Berwick Kaler, who is probably the only Milligan star to go on to real mainstream success) absent-mindedly drops the formula and then subsequently ruins the data for it after spilling chemicals on it, thus forcing the scientist to develop the evil alter-ego Mr. Danny Blood, who is a born master of a macabre form of misogyny that he credits as being heavily influenced by the Marquis de Sade.

After transforming into his evil alter-ego, Dr. Jekyll-as-Mr. Blood strolls down to a bawdy bordello and immediately begins suavely hitting on the lead performer, April Connors (Julia Stratton), who he tells that he will "teach" some of the things he learned from his spiritual mentor de Sade. When April's boorish drunken boyfriend shows up at the bordello and causes trouble with the demented doc, Blood brutally beats the man to death with his cane and then sarcastically states in a sinisterly sardonic fashion, "I knew you'd see it my way, old man." From there, Blood takes April back to a dilapidated apartment and tells her to wash off her makeup because he thinks she looks like a "cheap little tramp." Of course, Blood does not stop his verbal venom there, as he tells April she is not only "scum" but also "the defecation of the slums of London." Blood also makes April his own personal "dog" and forces her sit at his feet and bark. When Dr. Jekyll unexpectedly transforms into Blood during one of his lectures, he also unleashes his rabid misogyny on his sole female student, Victoria Crenshaw (Jennifer Summerfield), declaring to her in front of the entire class, "You're privileged...to be a female medical student in this day and age. After all, we all know you should be at home looking after snot-nosed little brats [...] What makes you think you should be a doctor...standing up there as if you knew what you were talking about?! All women should be in bed...to be used." Meanwhile, assistant Smithers reveals to the brain-damaged doc's fiancée Mary Ann about Dr. Jekyll's new sinisterly schizophrenic mentality. When Mary Ann confronts Dr. Jekyll about this, the doctor becomes enraged and inevitably transforms into Mr. Blood and pays Smithers a visit that results in the absent-minded assistant being burned and butchered to death. Dr. Jekyll also begins frequenting a curiously quaint S&M pleasuredome, the 'House of Degradation' (as it was advertised on the poster released for the film), where he engages in smoke-fueled sadomasochistic orgies in a semi-psychedelic scene that certainly seems to reflect Milligan's 'unconventional' sexual proclivities as is especially demonstrated by the fact that virtually all of the torture victims are men. Of course, after hacking off his whore April's head with a butcher knife and sexually assaulting his medical student Victoria, Jekyll finds himself a marked man. When Dr. Jekyll turns into Blood and attempts to ravage his fiancée Mary Ann, a lynch mob shoots him dead.

THE MAN WITH TWO HEADS

As biographer Jimmy McDonough wrote regarding the significance of the scene in The Man with Two Heads where Mr. Blood first goes out for a night on the town and meets his future slave April: "On first kissing her at the club, he bites her lip. "Call me Daddy," he then tells her (which, as Joe Davis reported, was the nickname Andy demanded from his own street conquests." Apparently, when McDonough confronted Milligan about the "Call me Daddy" scene, the auteur "got all worked up" and stated, "Stop it, babe, you're givin' me a hard-on," thus signifying the unsavory 'subtextual' nature of the film. Indeed, there is no question that Mr. Milligan was a sort of Mr. Blood in the bedroom (or alley or tearoom) and as a man that apparently could be quite sweet and kind who suffered heavy physical and emotional abuse virtually since birth from his half-crazed and morbidly obese odious ogre of a mother, it seems that the auteur also had developed a second personality as a result of his youthful struggles, hence why The Man with Two Heads is arguably the filmmaker's most personal work. Apparently, the film used to baffle audience members when it was screened at the Lyric Theatre on 42 Street in NYC, or as Bill Landis and Michelle Clifford wrote in their book Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002) regarding what they witnessed firsthand: "Dr. Jekyll is a bushy-haired misogynist who constantly yells at this female students. One Lyric audience member yelled back, "Go fuck yourself!" [...] Though the film is mostly asleep, Andy tosses in a psychedelic S&M orgy scene out of nowhere, which elicited cries of "What the hell?!" and gales of laughter from the audience." Indeed, if there is any filmmaker and film that would have made for a great case study for Austro-Teutonic psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing's classic forensic reference book Psychopathia Sexualis: Sexual Psychopathy: A Clinical-Forensic Study (1886), it is most certainly Milligan and The Man with Two Heads, with the exquisitely eccentric, if not oftentimes equally banal, misbegotten movie being a virtual celluloid pathology as dreamed up from the deepest and darkest desires of the debauched director. Like all of Milligan's greatest works, his merrily misanthropic Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde mutation is a perversely potent celluloid punch of culturally pessimistic perniciousness and savage playfulness that reminds one why psychopaths, debauchees, retards, whores, and intemperate megalomaniacs make for more interesting characters than normal folk. After all, a patent piece of cinematic shit like The Man with Two Heads would not be so crudely enthralling were it not directed by a vicious sado-masochistic sodomite who derived pleasure from beating underage boys and was a bigger bitch than an overweight chain-smoking negro wench with borderline personality disorder and a nasty crack addiction.

-Ty E

THE RATS ARE COMING! THE WEREWOLVES ARE HERE!
THE RATS ARE COMING! THE WEREWOLVES ARE HERE!

Andy Milligan* (1972)

Certainly, you cannot fuck with a film with a title like The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here! (1972), or so I thought while attempting to watch every single one of the surviving films of sadomasochistic queer gutter auteur Andy Milligan (The Ghastly Ones, Fleshpot on 42nd Street). Easily the worst of the films that the fucked filmmaker made while taking a temporary sabbatical over the pond in London (the others being Nightbirds, The Body Beneath, Bloodthirsty Butchers, The Man With Two Heads), the film is, somewhat absurdly, a lycanthropic anti-family melodrama of the ostensibly period piece oriented sort that was originally titled The Curse of the Full Moon and was shot in 1969, but the producer/distributor thought the film was too banal for even Milligan standards and later had the auteur shoot a series of pointless scenes in the director's then-hometown of Staten Island involving two rats that were actually named 'Willard' and 'Ben' to capitalize off the success of Willard (1971) and Ben (1972) and was finally released in 1972. Moneyman Mishkin did the same thing with Milligan's superior English era work The Man With Two Heads (1972), which, despite being a reworking of The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (1886) and being originally fittingly named Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Blood, was renamed to cash in on the unwarranted popularity of Lee Frost's race-baiting blaxploitation-horror-sci-fi-comedy hybrid celluloid turd The Thing with Two Heads (1972) and released a couple years after it was actually completed. Admittedly, aside from wanting to complete my viewing of the director's entire oeuvre, my main interest in seeing The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here! is due to the fact that it features auteur Milligan in a cameo role as a ghetto-dwelling arms dealer, which, at least in my less than humble opinion, is worth the price of admission alone, even if it is one of the filmmaker's more second rate fucked filmic family affairs. Unquestionably, the world's greatest (and probably only) werewolf melodrama and, for better or worse, easily more 'idiosyncratic' than the other American-directed London-set lycanthropic film An American Werewolf in London (1981), the flick will certainly satisfy Milligan maniacs, but probably no one else, not even spastic Troma fanboys. The film depicts in slow and painfully hetero-hating detail the suffering that an ancient English family suffers as a result of a longstanding curse of both the literal and figurative sort. Featuring a decidedly degenerating werewolf family led by a morbidly and elderly half-dead patriarch who is attempting to assemble a formula to cure the family curse, as well as an eclectic collection of siblings, including a belligerent beast-man who is fed live chickens and lives in a cage with said chickens, as well as a savagely sadistic sister who gets off to slaughtering both rats and peasants, The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here! is a vaguely fleetingly charming and charismatic piece of celluloid crap directed by the horror genre's most exquisitely misanthropic and cynical anti-gentleman.

The Mooneys are a very ancient aristocratic family from “Northern Europe” who have been cursed ever since one of the patriarchs was bitten by a wild beast and developed a degenerative disease that he would pass on to every newborn family member. The family used to be much larger, but now only one line exists. It is the early 1900s and the current patriarch of the surviving family is Pa Mooney (Douglas Phair) and due to a formula he created that he is regularly injected with by his eldest daughter Phoebe (British TV actress Joan Ogden of James Mitchell’s thriller series Callan (1967-1972)), he is 180-years-old, though he seems like he will croak at any moment. The eldest son of the family, Mortimer (Noel Collins), who seems like the humorous twin brother of Mr. Bean, is responsible for maintaining the family finances. Unquestionably, the most demented of the Mooney siblings is middle sister Monica (played by Milligan regular Hope Stansbury, who was responsible for penning the director’s debut 1965 queer short Vapors), who is a sadist that wallows in morbidly mutilating and murdering her pet rats and torturing her younger brother Malcolm (Berwick Kaler of Milligan’s 1969 arthouse masterpiece Nightbirds), who is the youngest and most animal-like member of the family. Indeed, Malcolm is so majorly messed up that his family members keep him locked up in a cage and feed him live chickens. When the youngest daughter Diana (Jackie Skarvellis of Milligan’s The Body Beneath and Michael Sarne’s The Punk and The Princess (1993) aka The Punk) returns home from medical school in Scotland with a husband Gerald (Ian Innes), she surprises the entire family, not least of all Pa Mooney, who sent his daughter away so that she could learn enough to help him with his scientific research and certainly not so she could bring home an outsider. Since Gerald is a starving artist of sorts, Diana thought it would be a good idea that she and her hubby move in with Pa so that they will be financially supported. Of course, little does Gerald realize that his wife’s family is comprised of a bunch of loony lycanthropes that are just as liable to rip out the throats of each other as they are that of strangers and enemies. Indeed, as ruthless, degenerate blueblood rabble, the Mooneys are more or less incestuous cannibals who eat and fuck one another (indeed, as the eldest sister Phoebe reveals towards the end of the film, she and Pa used to practice father-daughter coitus).

Monica, a deranged bitch with a murderously sadistic streak, introduces herself by humorously stating, “Hello, I’m Monica, the middle sister...the bitch. The one they always talk about behind her back,” and attempts to warn Gerald about his wife by telling him that his wife/her sister Diana is a self-centered bitch who only cares about herself. She also informs him that the Mooney family has a curse that he “better find out about now.” Instead of taking heed of Monica’s advice, Gerald says to his wife, “She has a few problems, doesn’t she?!” and then proceeds to ask her about her retarded brother Malcolm, who she describes as follows, “He’s a year older than me and he’s not quite normal. He’s almost animal-like. We don't know how it happened...the genes got mixed up in conception and he never developed into a normal baby. When he was a youngster, we had to keep him locked up in a room. He has the instincts of an animal. Oh, he's not dangerous or anything like that, but to this day we keep him locked up in a room." Diana also reveals that Monica hates her because they have different mothers and that her mother was mysteriously poisoned after she was born. Vowing to no longer keep secrets from one another, Gerald also describes his own rather unsavory family background, stating, "My father deserted my mother when I was five. Two years later, he was arrested for raping and murdering a six year-old girl!" for which he was subsequently hanged where "he hung there for two weeks. His body became so hideous that they had to cut it down for health reasons. He was buried in an unmarked grave in the yard of an insane asylum. Two weeks later my mother died of grief and shame." After his mother died, Gerald was shipped to an orphanage in Scotland where he was regularly stripped naked and beaten by sexually sadistic nuns. Instead of being turned off and disturbed by her husband's story, Diana declares, "my god, I love you so much" and embraces Gerald, who has no idea that his wife is a two-faced wench that has pernicious plans for him and her family.

THE RATS ARE COMING! THE WEREWOLVES ARE HERE!

Eventually, Pa Mooney gets around to berating his daughter Diana, telling her that she is "playing with fire" due to her marriage and proclaiming, "...the Mooney's are a selfish lot...but we need that selfishness in order to exist. When we think of the family continuing, we must not think of ourselves but the family as a whole. We're the last of the Mooneys and we must protect our heritage. Society does not accept us because of what we are, so we're an enemy of society and we must protect ourselves by being self-sufficient." Of course, Pa loves his youngest daughter more than any of his other children and sees the rest of the family as completely expendable. After dealing with enough of his wife's family's demented behavior, Gerald confesses, "I'm not happy here" and "there's something not normal here, I don't like it" and even offers to give up painting and get a real job if she agrees to move out of Mooney manor, but she refuses. On top of that, Phoebe and various other family members encourage Gerald to divorce Diana, but he flatly refuses, even after discovering the mangled and dismembered corpses of chickens that retarded beast brother Malcolm has rabidly slaughtered and devoured. When brother Mortimer attempts to comfort Diana and recommends she divorce Gerald for the sake of the family, she responds, "I don't think this family stands much chance of surviving as a whole for much longer. I think we're on the verge of destroying ourselves."

Meanwhile, in a pointless subplot, Monica goes to a shop after killing her pet rat "Ben" with a butcher knife (since Hope Stansbury refused to kill the animal, Milligan apparently coerced a boy sporting a dress into killing the rodent) and buys a couple human-eating rodents from the cripple vendor Mr. Micawber (Chris Shore), who lost his arm and part of his face (which is partly black, as if Milligan was too cheap to get the actor's face completely covered in blackface) after his rats got a hold of him when he was asleep. After killing the rats, penny-pinching mad cunt Monica attempts to return them to Mr. Micawber because she doesn't want any "ungrateful rats," but he adamantly refuses as he spent all the money on booze, so she malevolently murders him. Meanwhile, Diana goes to a curious queen 'gunsmith' (played by Mr. Milligan) and has her hubby Gerald's silver cross turned into silver bullets, as she expects all her siblings to transform into wolves as a result of the full moon. Meanwhile, Pa Mooney finally kicks the bucket and eldest sister Phoebe becomes so upset that she reveals that she and her father carried on a love affair and that she also poisoned Diana's mother out of jealousy. From there, Phoebe then transforms into a werewolf and all the other siblings follow except Diana. While most of the siblings end up killing each other while in lycanthrope mode, Gerald ends up shooting Mortimer with the silver bullets that were made from his mother's cross. In a twist ending, Diana finally reveals her true character by telling Gerald that she no longer has any use for him because he has impregnated her, declaring, "I'm different from the rest of my family...I can change myself at will," transforms herself into a werewolf, and slaughters her beloved.

In his biography The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001), Milligan's comrade Jimmy McDonough wrote in regard to his decided dissatisfaction with The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here!, "RATS is hampered by a talky script; flat, amateurish performances; and effects that are bad even by Milligan standards. Seeing Hope Stansbury and the rest of the cast skulk through the shadows in very cheap werewolf makeup is funny for about a second, but the film meanders. It just doesn't possess the crazed energy one expects from Milligan in this period." Indeed, aside from dark-haired diva Stansbury, who seems like a meta-bitch prom queen high on coke and PCP, all of the performances in the film are conspicuously plagued by just plain bad and seemingly unending mediocrity and banality, not to mention the fact that the direction is shockingly dull and oftentimes nonsensical (with many of the scenes being far too dark to see anything), and the special effects and makeup are akin to that of a play put on by autistic preschoolers, yet the work will ultimately at least slightly wet the lips and semi-satisfy anyone that has gotten used to the nasty habit of devouring Milligan's misanthropic family melodramas. Notable for being Milligan's first PG-rated work despite featuring a pointless scene where a real rat is tortured and killed with a knife, The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here! is arguably the most impotent and insipid werewolf flick ever made as a work where the lycanthropes are slow and clumsy like Special Olympics contestants and ultimately meet their demise in exceedingly anti-climactic ways that make it quite clear that the director had little, if any, interest in the horror elements of the film and was much more interested in the venomous verbal (and sometimes physical) bitch fights between the rather re-pellant female characters. Additionally, the film is also notable for the fact that the female leads look more like New Jersey-debased guidettes than cultivated members of a Northern European aristocracy, with the pseudo-medieval England of Torture Dungeon (1970), which was shot on the quasi-beaches of Staten Island and starred a number of sub-literate working-class wops, being even more believable. Indeed, despite being shot at the scenic Hampstead Heath estate in London, which was also used for Milligan's previous film The Body Beneath as well as Joseph Losey's big budget psychological-thriller Secret Ceremony (1968) starring Elizabeth Taylor and Mia Farrow, the film has about as much 'Gothic' atmosphere as an early 1990s mestizo boy band. If Tennessee Williams suffered brain damage after a car wreck, got addicted to Roger Corman horror turds and queer style misogyny, and was sent to England with a couple thousand bucks given to him by some scheming Semitic exploitation producer like David F. Friedman to direct a cheap quickie lycanthrope flick, it would have probably resembled The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here!, which is certifiably Milligan-esque in all the wrong ways!

THE RATS ARE COMING! THE WEREWOLVES ARE HERE!

-Ty E

FLESHPOT ON 42ND STREET

Andy Milligan* (1973)

Admittedly, when I first saw gutter-auteur Andy Milligan's Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1972), I thought it was one of the biggest pieces of sleazy, stinking celluloid shit that I had ever had the dishonor of spending a single second on and like with most films, I am generally not someone who changes my opinion of a film over time, but that was before I caught the Milligan bug. As a socially repulsive sadomasochistic misogynist who apparently had spontaneous orgasms while literally torturing people, Mr. Milligan is not exactly the sort of person one would be at their greatest as a director of melodramas starring female and pseudo-female leads, but as his biographer and one-time collaborator Jimmy McDonough details in the Milligan bio The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2003), the emotionally and sexually erratic exploitation auteur was a sort of poor man's Fassbinder of filmic filth. Like the German New Cinema giant, Milligan was a high-strung homo yet married one of his lead actresses, got his start in the world of avant-garde off-off-broadway theater, enjoyed engaging in anonymous sex in public bathrooms, churned out movies faster than most people can turn out turds, loved and loathed women, and died prematurely via his self-destructive tendencies (in both cases one could argue self-conscious suicide). Although I do not want to give the seedy serial moviemaker too much credit, Andy Milligan's celluloid equivalent to Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) is mostly certainly Fleshpot on 42nd Street due in part to their similar themes (a woman trying to cum up in the world via her body, only to see everything topple down), as well as its relative popularity as a film the 'general' might like despite having no interest in filmmaker's overall oeuvre. Just like with Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun, Fleshpot on 42nd Street is the one film that people other than Milligan's barely multiple maniacs (fans) might have heard of. His last great sexploitation melodrama, Milligan never really directed a film that was even remotely watchable after Fleshpot on 42nd Street as his biographer McDonough had to admit (despite working on his later California monster movies like the aptly titled "Monstrosity" and "Surgikill"), as he moved away from the title street depicted in the film and mostly stuck to directing monstrous gore flicks that appeal to no one, not even fans of the Ghastly One. Like most of his previous films (the majority of which are lost), Fleshpot on 42nd Street was shot (and would be the last he shot) on a single hand-held 16-millimeter Auricon sound-on-film news camera, the same crappy cam that was not meant for creating feature-length films that was also utilized by Paul Morrissey and John Waters for their early aesthetically gritty and grating exploitation works. Fleshpot on 42nd Street would also mark the last film that Milligan collaborated on with his miserly Hebrew producer Lew Mishkin as the filmmaker refused to concede with creating pornographic works with real sex, arguing, "I found it sleazy to shoot a penetration....why not just turn out a Mafia fuck film?" Known as one of the sleaziest men in the movie business, Mishkin caused Milligan hell throughout his filmmaking career, stealing every cent he could get from the mostly destitute director and butchering his films with cheap sex, stating of the filmmaker that he was the, "most moral person I ever met doing immoral films," but he did admit, "that fleshpot is a great minor film," which is no small compliment from a man who was apathetic towards celluloid art and inserted gratuitous nudity scenes in serious melodramas.

FLESHPOT ON 42ND STREET

Fleshpot on 42nd Street centers around decisively degenerate dame Dusty Cole (Laura Cannon but credited as "Diana Lewis"), a lecherous lady who will do anything to not have to work, including pawn her sole personal belongings, steal from hyper-horny Judaic pawnstore owners, and even peddle her rather homely flesh for a couple ten dollar bills. After her boyfriend demands that she either obtain gainful employment or— at the very least — clean the apartment, Dusty dashes out the front door, but not before jumping the bones of her blue-collar beau one more time, and enters the urban jungle where she encounters a variety of human animals who are only interested in one thing: SEX. After conning a prissy pawnbroker named Sammy (Earle Edgerton) who believes "nice Jews don't divorce," hence his need pay to play with prostitutes, out of a bundle of cash after buying her flesh, Dusty is determined to begin a new life, no matter how pathetic. Luckily or unluckily, less than dainty Dusty meets up with her old friend Cherry Lane (Neil Flanagan of Milligan's Guru, the Mad Monk); a streetwalking fag in drag who sells its prick at a cheaper price than biological women peddle their percolating pussies. More bitchy than a jaded Jewess on the rag married to a poor fag, Cherry Lane makes it quite clear to Dusty on their rather racy reunion that s/he doesn't like women taking away her away business from her mobile whore house, but ultimately decides her friend might be able to bring in more customers with her genuine vagina. After going out to dinner together and apparently catching a double-bill horror screening of Andy Milligan's Torture Dungeon (1969) and Bloodthirsty Butchers (1970) — a cheap but charming display of self-advertisement on the Ghastly One's part — things seem to be looking up for the terrible trick-turning twosome. Ultimately, the two decide that Dusty will permanently move in and they swap semen together via screwing the same sleazy Johns. As in all Andy Milligan films, heterosexual sex is portrayed as uniquely unhealthy and decidedly disturbing as further accentuated by the sado-homo-auteur's cockeyed camera angels. In fact, when she endures her first pussy-purchaser — an intrepid tranny-chaser who her friend describes as "being a little weird" in the bedroom" — after meeting up with Cherry, she is treated to the beating of her life that might be considered a violent rape of sorts, had she not been paid for the pleasure, but it is in all in a day's work for this 42nd street sex worker. As charming Cherry states, "America ain't no place for old folks,” at least as far as the cum and blood-covered gutters of old school NYC are concerned. In an instance of fleeting fate, a bright light appears in Dusty’s daunting derelict life in the form of a rather “nice guy” named Bob (credited as being played by “Bob Walters” but really future Deep Throat star Harry Reems; an actor Milligan couldn’t stand working with) – a wholesome fellow who believes in honesty in relationships, even when dating a whore – and falls in some sort of “love” with him, even if he is rather banal in bed as a sensitive individual who is better at making coffee than making love. Of course, being a biological man missing the flesh wound that all men want, Cherry becomes quite jealous of Dusty’s man, relative ‘success’, and newfound happiness, thereupon sparking a feud of fierce femmes (and faux-femmes). As with any Andy Milligan film, Fleshpot on 42nd Street concludes in a curiously cynical manner where Dusty is eventually left in the dust in a more degenerate and destitute state than she was before, but keeps on peddling that puss.

A rather reckless racist who refused to work with negroes due to his belief that they made lousy works, especially on film sets, Andy Milligan spared no one’s feelings with Fleshpot on 42nd Street; a work where a drag fag has no problem warning her gal pals with the incendiary insight of sound advice, “don’t let the niggers see you.” Naturally, the authoritarian authority of Nixon and New York’s finest are also verbally assaulted in one of the best lines in the film: “You can’t suck a cock without a cop looking over your shoulder.” Unlike his much maligned costume horror period pieces, Fleshpot on 42nd Street is an authentic auteur work as films cum, featuring the sort of shameless street trash that Milligan reluctantly cavorted with in real-life. That being said, Candy’s line “I’m no prize package...I’m a cocksucker...I’m not even a good one...I hide from the world in this getup...It ain’t easy bein’ a freak” is probably the most autobiographically true words he had ever written. The son of an abuse obese mother who quite possibly molested him and a father who was sexually impotent (Andrew Milligan Senior later remarried a Japanese bride who he purportedly never had sex with), a ½ Jewish pedophile brother (the product of Milligan’s mother’s previous ‘marriage’ to a Judaic bigamist with three wives), and a sister he seriously hated, Andy Milligan was born into a world of sadism, sexual perversion, and social dysfunction and would spend his filmmaking career creating cinematic works that reflected a similar seediness with Fleshpot on 42nd Street being his crude celluloid crowning achievement and a film that almost brings artistic merit to slums of late-1960s/early-1970s 42nd Street. For a man who fondled and fucked the random flesh of thousands upon thousands of men throughout his life and inevitably paid for it by contracting AIDS and dying a slow and painful death, only to die alone in his hospital bed and have his body buried in an unmarked grave in some foreign land, what better magnum opus of misery and misanthropy than Fleshpot on 42nd Street; a work where a woman’s love is literally run over with a car and forgotten the next minute.

FLESHPOT ON 42ND STREET

-Ty E

CARNAGE

Andy Milligan* (1984)

I have never really cared much for blockbuster ghost stories like The Amityville Horror (1979) and the Steven Spielberg produced (and apparently ‘ghost-directed’) Poltergeist (1982), so I was naturally somewhat interested to see how gay gutter auteur Andy Milligan would molest the intolerably formulaic horror subgenre with his hopelessly hokey haunted house rip-off piece (of shit) Carnage (1984) aka Hell House. Milligan’s first film in about half a decade since the release of Legacy of Blood (1978) aka Legacy of Horror (which was a mediocre remake of the director’s 1968 ‘classic’ The Ghastly Ones) and the failure of his aborted Antebellum Southern Gothic melodrama House of Seven Belles (1979), the work is notable for being the director’s second film shot on 35mm (following Guru, the Mad Monk (1970), which Milligan ultimately disowned) and being the only work where the filmmaker went over budget, or as Jimmy McDonough wrote in The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001) while trashing the film: “Via Lew Mishkin, Milligan hooked up with English producer Michael Lee in 1983 to crank out CARNAGE, a forgettable lowball POLTERGEIST knockoff that featured regulars from the Troupe. Andy pointed out that it was one of the few Milligan pictures to go substantially over budget—$32,500 instead of $30,000.” In October 1977, Milligan bought and moved into a four-story building in Manhattan where he used one of the floors for the Troupe Theatre, which was an Off-Off-Broadway venue that the auteur founded and ran until he closed the place for good in 1985 and made his way to Los Angeles where he would predictably die of AIDS in 1991. Naturally, regulars from Troupe Theatre appear in Carnage, which boasts some of the most unattractive actresses and especially actors (Milligan may have been a proud poof, but his choice in men was rather dubious) in a horror film, even for Milligan standards. Notably, one of these actors, Dennis Malvasi—a half-crazed and criminally-inclined Vietnam War vet and demolitions expert who falsely complained to be the son of Jewish bad boy actor John Garfield—would become much more (in)famous outside the Milligan circle, as he led a double life as a member of the Christian extremist group Our Lady of the Roses and was involved in four abortion clinic bombings that began in the late 1985 (while Malvasi eventually turned himself in after being declared a fugitive and served his time in prison, he has been in and out of prison ever since then and apparently now lives off the grid somewhere in New Jersey with his wife and three kids). Upon meeting him, Milligan fell in love with Malvasi, whose sole other acting roles include Don Schain’s sexploitation flick The Abductors (1972) and frog fag filmmaker Jacques Scandelari’s homo-slasher Monique (1978) aka Flashing Lights, and made him a member of the Troupe theater despite the fact that he was virtually illiterate and had to ad lib his lines, even dressing up in drag for one performance when a female actress failed to show up for a show. Rather unfortunately, Malvasi only had a small and insignificant role in Carnage and would not go on to appear in anymore Milligan flicks.

CARNAGE

The film will also notable to exploitation fans in that Bill Landis of Sleazoid Express infamy worked on the production, or as mentioned in Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002) by Mr. Sleazoid and his wife Michelle Clifford: “Andy’s realization that he still had a dedicated audience revitalized his interest in filmmaking. By the summer of 1983, he was back at work on a horror movie called CARNAGE. He photographed for the first time in 35mm, using cut-rate ends of film stock, shooting in Manhattan and Staten Island. Coauthor Landis worked on Andy’s crew, taking time off from his job managing the shoebox adult grindhouse, the Doll, on 47th Street and 7th Avenue. The film was an entertaining haunted house escapade that wound up being released directly to home video. On the set, Andy was much like he was with his tiny Bolex in VAPORS—a peppery munchkin zooming all over the place, supervising the crew, searching for the best camera angles, acting out scenes for the performers.” A somewhat typical Milligan effort in that the director seems to have put most of his effort into the flower arrangements and misanthropic dialogue, Carnage is certainly a work that will appeal to Milligan maniacs and proud proponents of poor celluloid taste, though gorehounds will certainly find it to be the best of the director’s work as it is certainly his most graphic and gory film to date, as a work featuring a sinisterly sassy corpse bride disemboweling a would-be-robber’s intestines, not to mention some pretty cool, if somewhat softcore, suicide scenes.

In a classically mean-spirited Milligan-esque opening scene, a seemingly newlywed groom blows his beautiful blonde bride’s brains out while embracing her and then turns the gun on himself in the house they have assumedly just moved into together. Flash forward three years later and a less than young unwitting married couple, Carol (Leslie Den Dooven of Milligan’s unreleased 1984 TV series Red Rooster) and Jonathan Henderson (one-time actor Michael Chiodo), move into the house thinking they got a steal in regard to what little they paid for it, not realizing it is haunted by a pissed off poltergeist who still has not gotten over the fact that her husband blew her brains out on their wedding day (of course, as the viewer later learns, this is not exactly how the scenario played out). Carol and Jonathan do not think anything is out of the ordinary when items like coffee mugs and hedge clippers begin inexplicably moving around the house on their own or when an old phonograph randomly plays wedding music late each night. In fact, when the married couple hires an old maid named Rose Novak (Lola Ross of the 1981 Troma turd Waitress!) who soon randomly falls into a catatonic state and subsequently slits her own throat with a shaving razor, they still do not suspect that there might be something somewhat ominous about the less than humble abode that they call home. Of course, maid Rose had an unsettling face-to-face encounter with the ghost Bride, who warned her, "Go! Get out of my house." Unfortunately, the Hendersons were not home when the disgruntled she-bitch spook committed her most surreal slaughter when she telekinetically murdered two would-be robbers, even ripping out the intestines of the unluckier of the two amateur small-time crooks. It is not until their housewarming party that Mr. and Mrs. Henderson begin to consider that they may have been ripped off in regard to their new home.

On the night of their housewarming party, the Henderson's unhappily married friends Walter (John Garitt) and Ann (Chris Baker) are the first to feel the Ghost Bride's wrath. Ann first encounters the ghost while she is brushing her hair, but that does not do enough to scare her away for good. After revealing to her hubby Walter that she is pregnant, shards of glass mysteriously stab her in the arm. That night, Walter decides to take a bath while listening to putrid polka music, but his relaxing moment is ruined when he is electrocuted after the ghost knocks the radio into the tub (notably, the viewer can see that the actor is still wearing underwear while he is being electrocuted!). At this point, Carol finally decides it is wise to do some actual research on the history of her homicidal home, so she goes to city hall where she meets with an eccentric old fart named Willis Karp (Ray Trail) who apologizes for rudely interrupting her while she is on the telephone with her husband and then proceeds to deliver the following classically Milligan-esque rant: "The whole world is rude. Years ago we had manners and beauty about us. Now it's anything ugly that's our way of life. People have forgotten to live with manners, so you do the same thing. You wake-up one fine morning and you find your food just like the rest of them." From Mr. Karp, Carol learns that their home used to be owned by the loving married couple Mark (Chris Georges) and Susan Webb (Deeann Veeder), who he describes as, "such a beautiful couple...they loved each other very dearly." Apparently, Mr. Webb spent years restoring the house and even when the wife Susan had a miscarriage, they still had much hope for their future, with Karp stating of the feeling that loving couple's influence had over the home, "you could feel that house come alive with their love and adoration." When Mrs. Webb was diagnosed with terminal breast cancer, the couple decided to commit suicide on the anniversary of the day they took possession of the house, hence why they haunt the house today.

After realizing their house is hopelessly haunted, the Hendersons decide to have a priest come by the place and he declares that the cursed spirits of the home's former inhabitants have taken over the spirit of the house itself. In a rather cynical Milligan-esque scenario, the priest receives a butcher knife to the skull just as he walks out of the house. Mr. Henderson's newly engaged secretary Judy (Ellen Orchid) also literally loses her head after a flying ghost-wielded ax chops it off in one swift blow. Needless to say, the Hendersons finally decide enough is enough, call it quits on their luxury dream home, and decide to leave immediately, but while hubby Jonathan is packing the car with their possessions, Carol is visited by ghost Susan Webb who inexplicably attempts to convince her to stay, stating like a tired toddler with Down syndrome, "Don't...go. We...will...leave...you...alone...if...you...keep...our...house...just...as...it...is." When Jonathan eventually goes back into the house to get his wife, he is shocked to see she is holding hands with the ghosts of Mr. and Mrs. Webb. In a twist ending, the Webbs force the Hendersons to commit suicide in exactly the same fashion that they did some three years before, as if to save them from ever having to suffer the romantic tragedy of their marriage going sour. Carnage closes with a low-angle shot stolen directly from Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) of the haunted house, which has a "For Sale" sign in front of it, thus hinting that the vicious cycle of spouse-based suicide pacts has just begun. Luckily, Milligan never opted to direct a sequel.

CARNAGE

Andy Milligan must have had a truly accursed sod touch, as the old house where he shot Carnage reportedly burned down shortly after the film completed production. The film is also notable for being the last film Milligan shot on the east coast before moving to a gay neighborhood in L.A. and defecating his last (and arguably worst) three features—Monstrosity (1987), The Weirdo (1988), and the horrendous Hebraic-humored horror-comedy Surgikill (1988). Although Carnage was Milligan's last east coast film, the filmmaker hooked up with a retired chemical engineer turned would-be playwright named Don Tobey who he convinced to allow him to turn his play into a TV series. A patently political incorrect low-camp sitcom about a pre-Viagra drug that helps old farts get their shriveled up cocks hard featuring old homos in drag, Mafioso vermin, and Arab Sheiks, the six-part series Red Rooster (1984) and its pilot episode Adventures of Red Rooster (1984) were ultimately never bought or released. Unfortunately, Carnage is neither as campy nor misanthropic as Milligan's more classic works, which is all the more underscored by its promising opening quasi-high-camp murder-suicide scene between the husband and wife, which seems to be the director's final word on marriage. In respect to Milligan's entire oeuvre, Carnage is probably as important as the darkly comedic 2011 chamber piece of the same name is to Roman Polanski's career. Still, I rather enjoyed the film's extra venomous twist ending and would rather re-watch Carnage over The Amityville Horror or Poltergeist any day. One thing I found especially notable about the film is that it does not feature a single child and every married couple featured in the work either suffers a miscarriage or is killed off before they can start a nuclear family, which is a sentiment that I can currently relate to in terms of big familial plans falling through like a stake to the heart or a bullet to the brain. In that sense, the film is autobiographical as, although rampant sadomasochistic homo Milligan married his screen diva Candy Hammond (the true star of the director's 1968 anti-family melodrama Seeds aka Seeds of Sin), she inevitably left him and the gutter auteur died in the summer of 1991 of AIDS without producing an heir. Indeed, Carnage practically bleeds of resentment and hatred for happy married heterosexual couples, hence its slight air of fleeting authenticity in comparison to other bullshit haunted house films, which seem to be geared towards phony bourgeois families who go to church every single Sunday. Personally, I would not mind living in a haunted house, especially one haunted by the cute blonde ghost bride of Milligan's Carnage.

-Ty E

MONSTROSITY
MONSTROSITY

Andy Milligan* (1987)

Since he exploited, molested, dismembered, and reassembled various classic horror stories, movies, characters, and genre conventions during his nearly a quarter century reign as arguably exploitation cinema's most idiosyncratic and certainly most misanthropic auteur, it should be no surprise that sodomaniacal gutter auteur Andy Milligan (The Man with Two Heads, Fleshpot on 42nd Street)—a man who once directed an anti-family monster melodrama, Blood (1974), where the degenerate spawn of Count Dracula and the Wolfman are disharmoniously married and ultimately tear each other to shreds in the end as their humble abode burns down—would direct a film tackling the Golem monster of Jewish folklore and its superior European progeny Frankenstein. Indeed, Baron von Frankenstein would make a brief cameo at the conclusion of Blood, but it was not until Milligan moved to the West Coast that he took on the Frankenstein legend in full fag force via his antepenultimate work Monstrosity (1987) starring longtime Milligan superstar Hal Borske (Vapors, The Ghastly Ones) as a rather romantic retarded teddy-bear-hugging reanimated corpse named 'Frankie' who goes on a vengeful Rambo-esque murder spree after his creators kill his dazed and confused dope-addled punk slut girlfriend. A pseudo-punk horror-comedy featuring nearly middle-aged no-talent actors portraying young adults and balding old farts unbelievably sporting aesthetically repugnant punk rock costumes that seem like wardrobes rejected by Michael Jackson, Milligan's flatly farcical celluloid Frankenturd could not be more fittingly titled as if the autistic-garde auteur set out to parody his own oeuvre. A work that marked a sort of misbegotten and inauspicious 'rebirth' in the director's career as a gutter-dwelling West Coast direct-to-video hack, Monstrosity was largely filmed at Milligan's own small white duplex and the garage and is notable for featuring the director's last 'great love', "Bobby" Wayne Keeton—a borderline retarded yet kindhearted Louisiana-born hick hustler who was nicknamed "the human toothpick" due to his corpse-like gaunt appearance and who died of AIDS in the summer of 1989 almost exactly two years before his filmmaker lover would do the same—in a small cameo role as a drug dealer who gets his throat slit by the main monster. According to Milligan friend and biographer Jimmy McDonough, who worked on the film (even playing a double for the titular monster), Keeton apparently described his acting debut in his lover's film as, "The happiest time of my life," but other crew members remember the work less fondly. Indeed, as McDonough wrote in his bio The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001), "As fun as it was to make and to be a part of the Andy experience, his heart just didn't seem to be in it. He hired people to do the stills and gore effects, and bent to the ideas of others." McDonough was no more kind to the finished product, writing, “MONSTROSITY oozes a certain pained, not-too-with-it zaniness (think of a poverty-row, no-stars version of Otto Preminger’s SKIDOO), but its fascinations are fleeting, with plenty of breathing space in between.” A dreadfully 1980s style hokey horror disaster that is the closest (geographically speaking!) that Milligan ever came to Hollywood featuring a positively painfully addictive synthesizer score, pathetically plastic and shockingly banal would-be witty prep-lead actors with vulgar mullets, and a sentimental hopeless romantic with a ginger Jew-fro wig and a curious stuffed animal fetish as the monster, Monstrosity is the only Milligan film that made me feel embarrassed while watching it.

Opening with shots of the iconic ‘Hollywood Sign’, the art deco style Griffith Observatory dome building and the crowded gritty streets of Los Angeles, Monstrosity initially seems like a vintage tourism tape for LA, but the film then soon cuts to an old wino fart who likes hanging out in Mexican convenience stores having his withered old throat slit by a sadistic blond beast criminal that looks like a born-again meth addict named Clay Cole (Tommy Voager) as a way to entertain his two comrades after the poor elderly geezer fails to give him any money. Next, Clay goes by the shabby apartment of a young female artist named Ronnie (Audra Marie Ribeiro) and brutally rapes her to the point where she is hospitalized with a concussion and a “fractured left ear,” among other things. When Ronnie makes the mistake of telling the cops about her rapist, Cole sneaks in her hospital room wearing doctor scrubs, complains “you bitch, I show you a good time and you’re gonna put the finger on me!,” and performs surgery on his victim that involves slicing open her stomach and pulling all of her intestines out, thus killing her instantly. Needless to say, Ronnie’s unintentionally goofy prep-lead boyfriend Mark (David Homb) is completely devastated by the whole ordeal and when two exceedingly lazy police detectives fail to catch his girlfriend’s killer, he decides vigilante justice is in order and brainstorms with his two equally annoying comrades. Luckily, Mark’s insufferable religious studies friend ‘Carlos’ (Joe Balogh) states, “I just got an idea. You guys ever hear of a golem?” and proceeds to state the following bullshit dialogue that no real person would ever say in the most monotonous manner imaginable, “Jewish legends from the middle-ages tell of various persons with the power to create a golem—a monster made of clay given life from the proper combinations from the letters of the divine name. The most famous of these creators was a rabbi Judah Loew of Prague from 1512 to 1609. He supposedly created a golem to avenge the enemies of his followers.” Indeed, they decide they will kill Ronnie’s killer with a golem and since none of them is a rebbe or Jewish and Mark’s other comrade Scott (Michael Lunsford) is a medical student, they decide against clay and opt to use the parts of dead human cadavers instead to make their golem monster.

Wisely using the corpse of “some disgusting mutilated pervert” and a bald decapitated head that “looks mongoloid,” the three mullet-adorned pals meticulously assemble the mongrel golem monster they have lovingly named “Frankie” (Hal Borske) in tribute to Mary Shelley’s classic Gothic horror novel Frankenstein; or, The Modern Prometheus (1818) inside of Mark’s cramped garage. When they try every method they can think of (including absurdly reading from The Book of the Dead) to get the crappy sewed-together corpse to come alive but nothing works, they give up and decide to dismember their miserable miscreation before someone discovers it rotting in the garage, but just before they begin cutting, Frankie magically comes alive and immediately demonstrates he is a rather personable, if not intellectually challenged fellow. Although Mark and his friends provide Frankie with an extensive training program on becoming a killer monster that involves pointing at film posters for such Regan era classics as First Blood (1982) aka Rambo and The Terminator (1984) and saying “Kill Frankie, Kill,” hopelessly friendly fiend Frankie would rather talk about the Three Little Bears and play with his stuffed animals collection that his makers have provided him with (notably, Milligan’s then-boyfriend Bobby Wayne Keeton was apparently fond of stuffed animals and had a huge collection of them). Meanwhile, crazed killer Clay Cole begins slicing and dicing a small clique of mostly middle-aged punk rockers (!) and just before he slits the throat of a young yet hyper-haggard-looking pint-sized blonde junky punkette named Jaime (Carrie Anita), Frankie pops out, saves her, and dismembers the thug with a butcher knife in a Milligan-esque fashion. Ironically, Mark and his friends never seem to realize that Frankie unwittingly ‘executed’ their mission of bringing Ronnie’s killer to justice. Needless to say, Frankie and Jaime soon fall in love, though the monster gets scared when his lady love lights blunts in front of him because he is afraid of fire. Among other things, Jaime teaches Frankie how to fuck and demonstrates her concern that a transvestite might steal her marvelous monster man away from her. Frankie practically melts Jaime’s heart when she asks him, “What are you in to? Do you do crystal? Speed? I know you don’t like weed” and he sweetly responds by saying, “I like you.” To demonstrate her devotion to him and to help clean up his reasonably grotesque appearance, Jaime gives Frankie a new wardrobe, including a cheap and tacky “I Kick Ass” t-shirt, Hondo headband (to keep his red Jew-fro wig in place), and somewhat homoerotic studded neck choker. When Mark and the boys realize that Frankie has sexual needs after catching him looking at a porn mag, they buy him a blonde blowup doll, but he prefers a real woman and pops the pseudo-woman before even sticking his reanimated monster member in its less than warm vinyl vag.

MONSTROSITY

Of course, everything goes downhill when Mark, Scott, and Carlos become jealous of Jaime after she turns Frankie into all the more of a gentle giant. When Frankie scares Scott’s girlfriend, they decide to punish him by burning his beloved over-sized teddy bear, which makes him cry like an autistic toddler suffering a temper tantrum. In an especially nonsensical scene, Frankie’s stuffed animal collection magically comes alive and he is awakened by an exceedingly extro-verted fellow named Angelo (played by Joel Weiss who, as someone who appeared in The Warriors (1979) and starred in something called F.A.R.T.: The Movie (1991), is probably the most 'famous' actor in the entire film) who proclaims to be he and his girlfriend Jaime's special 'Guardian Angel.' According to Angelo, heaven has become so flooded with the souls of aborted fetuses like himself that they don't even have enough wings to go around and his only means of transportation is a bike he stole from "some 14-year-old that overdosed at Venice Beach." Angelo also seems to moonlight as a preacher, as he weds Frankie and Jaime in Mark's garage. Paranoid about Frankie's unpredictable behavior and new love affair, Scott buys a machinegun from some "pro-black guy" and plots a way to get Jaime out of the picture. Ultimately, Scott tempts Jaime with a needle with crystal meth laced with poison and being that she is a psychologically weak drug addict who will do anything for a fix, she immediately shoots it up and ultimately drops dead after dancing around in a spastic fashion for a couple seconds. Naturally enraged over the death of his braindead beloved, Frankie ignores Guardian Angel Angelo's plea not to seek revenge, attacks Scott, grabs his machine gun and kills his three creators Rambo-style just as he was trained and then proceeds to burn down the garage. In the end, Frankie becomes a sloppy wino and gutter philosopher of sorts and spends his free time shooting the shit with his dumpster-diving hobo hag friend Agnes (played by Helen Costa, who later appeared in Henry Jaglom's Venice/Venice (1992), as well as the popular corrupt cop show The Shield (2002-2008)) while the two share a bottle of cheap rum. When Agnes asks Frankie what he plans to do with his life, he says he wants to "find himself" and then remarks, "It's a big country... Maybe I'll be like you, Agnes, and just walk around," though he also considers being a doctor or preacher. From there, someone yells "Cut. That's a wrap!" and auteur Andy Milligan and the rest of the film crew is revealed in a rather strange and totally unexpected Fourth Wall smashing conclusion 'comparable' to those featured at the end of Ingmar Bergman's Persona (1966), Alejandro Jodorowsky's The Holy Mountain (1973), and Federico Fellini's And The Ship Sails On (1983). Quite preposterously, at the end of the credit sequence, an inter-title appears reading: "THE END. See the return of Frankie soon in MONSTROSITY II."

Aside from the fact that Monstrosity II was never made, Monstrosity remained unreleased until fairly recently. While one would have thought the video boom of the 1980s would have been the perfect time for Milligan to cash in on his strangely hypnotic horror schlock, all three of his final feature films were abject artistic and commercial failures (like Monstrosity, Milligan's next film The Weirdo (1989) ends with the promise of a sequel that would ultimately never surface), as the piss poor products of a man whose unique and unrelenting movie misanthropy and misogyny seem to have fallen victim to the mindless 'quirky' escapism that accompanied the Reagan years and was quite typical of both low-budget horror and Hollywood films of that time. It is interesting that Milligan decided to include contrived dialogue about golems, late-16th-century Prague Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel, and Jewish folklore in Monstrosity, as the film was produced by Semitic lawyer and sometimes smut-peddler Lew Mishkin (the son of Milligan's usual producer William Mishkin), who the director hated with a passion comparable to that of the characters in his films. As Jimmy McDonough wrote in his Milligan bio, "Lew Mishkin was, of course, considered the absolute villain of MONSTROSITY. Although largely unseen, Milligan cursed his name every chance he got" (interestingly, Mishkin appears in a New Jersey Guido-esque tracksuit at the end of the film where all the cast members appear). Indeed, Milligan's miscreation of a Frankenstein reworking is probably the closest thing to an 'anti-Semitic' horror-comedy, but I doubt that was the director's conscious objective with the work. Unfortunately, Monstrosity was not Milligan's only crap-covered pseudo-kosher celluloid excursion in vaudevillian Hebraic horror, as his final work Surgikill (1989) aka Screwball Hospital Central was penned by a Hebrew hack screenwriter named Sherman Hirsh (who has written negative reviews for the film on both amazon.com and imdb.com) and is plagued by hopelessly juvenile Jewish frat boy humor that would even embarrass Eli Roth. As McDonough somewhat fairly wrote regarding the film, "MONSTROSITY may be Andy's best released picture since 1972's FLESHPOT, but that's not saying much. Milligan's eager but faceless Hollywood SAG misfits were no substitute for his hand-picked New York eccentrics, and his stuffy, old-school theatricality and aged-in-wood slapstick add up to little more than frumpiness in the end." Despite its abject failure in almost every regard, Monstrosity is notable for having an overt anti-Reaganite essence that lampoons the stupidity of 1980s action films and depicts young preppies as two-faced sadists and psychopaths who do not think twice about shooting up poor proletarian punk girls with tainted meth and consider movies like First Blood educational, as a sort of Repo Man (1984) of retarded horror comedies. In its graphic depiction of violence against women, Monstrosity also features classic Milliganian misogyny, though the film lacks the sort of scenes typical of the director's work where some conspicuously cunty chick unleashes a tidal wave of verbal venom. If you ever wondered what it might be like if the Frankenstein monster had a slutty junky punkette girlfriend or how gay gutter auteur Andy Milligan might defile Jewish folklore, Monstrosity might be for you, but otherwise steer well clear of this shamelessly schlocky celluloid abomination.

MONSTROSITY

-Ty E

WEIRDO: THE BEGINNING

Andy Milligan* (1989)

In this day in age where every child born seems to be diagnosed with some sort of debilitating mental illness, autism, and/or a peanut allergy, it only seems natural that there should be more horror flicks featuring killers and/or antiheroes suffering from autism, Asperger syndrome (AS), and related forms of social retardation that seem to be dubiously increasingly plaguing American youth with each new generation. On top of seeming to suffer from schizophrenia, perennial momma's boy Norman Bates of Psycho (1960) also seemed to be some sort of aspie, hence his unnerving social awkwardness and unhealthily obsessive behavior. Much less known than cross-dressing hotel master Bates but similar in his ominous Oedipal hang-ups and proclivity towards playing a peeping tom is a human dildo by the name of Donnie Raymond of gay gutter auteur Andy Milligan's penultimate celluloid abortion Weirdo: The Beginning (1989) aka The Weirdo aka Donnie. One of the director's late era works after he finally decided to get out of the seedy slums of New York City during the late-1980s to move to sunny Los Angeles where he was in an unhealthy relationship with his half-retarded white trash hustler boyfriend B. "Bobby" Wayne Keeton aka "The Human Toothpick" that ultimately resulted in both men succumbing to AIDS, Weirdo certainly lacks the true grit and sort of superlatively slimy pseudo-snuff aesthetic of his 'classic' celluloid crud, but it at least has one thing in common with the earlier films in that it is an updated 1980s-ized remake of the unfortunately unreleased Milligan flick The Weirdo, which the director apparently lost during the early 1970s (indeed, many of Milligan's films from his most prolific period during the late-1960s through early-1970s have been lost forever). Co-produced by "kung fu movie expert" and producer Neva Friedenn who is best known to horror fans as the screenwriter of the somewhat underwhelming video nasty The Toolbox Murders (1978), Weirdo was marketed to be a monetary success and sets up for a sequence (hence, its original title Weirdo: The Beginning and dubious open ending), but the film was an abject failure and Milligan made sure to destroy the possibility of any sequels by burning his bridges with the producers and torturing the young male lead who would never star in a film again. Forced to work with a cast that was hired against his will instead of his regular anti-iconic superstars, Milligan reluctantly assembled a patently pathetic piece of ostensibly serious schlock about a deranged dude with no family who is constantly beat up by a gang of mullet-adorned 30-something-year-old rednecks and who lives in the shed of an elderly woman who incessantly bosses him around. A sort of rare reworking of Romeo and Juliet for the Adam Lanzas, Elliot Rodgers, and all the other violent autistic misfits of the world as directed by cinema history's foremost misanthropic and shockingly untalented S&M-inclined semen demon, Weirdo is a rather rare dark romance for all those sexually repressed and dysfunctional social retards out there who might be prevented from committing some sort of tragic shooting if at least one deranged dame could at least give them a quick handjob. Like the gutter-dwelling west coast cinematic homo hustler step-uncle of Richard Kelly's Donnie Darko (2001) due to its ultimately tragic depiction of an unconventionally dorky yet deranged dude of the absolutely autistic sort named Donnie who finds himself in the seemingly unlucky situation of finding a girl that he loves so much that he is willing to die (and kill) for her, this miserable mess of a micro-budget movie is gratifyingly bad yet shockingly perversely poignant proof of Milligan's singular talent for polishing stinky and slimy celluloid turds.

WEIRDO: THE BEGINNING

Upon a superficial glance, 22-year-old perennial loner Donnie (Steve Burington in his first and not surprisingly last film role) seems like a benign retard who merely likes hanging out in the woods and collecting rocks, but underneath his veil of mentally and physically feeble defectiveness is something dark, violent, and dangerously foreboding. The unwanted bastard son of a worthless dipsomaniac mother who lives to drink and kicked her forsaken son out of the family home long ago, dingbat Donnie is taken care of by an extroverted old eccentric named Miss Martins (Naomi Sherwood), who provides the young man with food and shelter in the form of a shed in her backyard. Unfortunately, Donnie is the constant target of degrading violence by a gang of mullet-sporting redneck untermenschen lead by a nefarious nimrod named 'Nails' (Shawn Player) who sports an absurdly tight-fitting denim vest featuring a large confederate flag on the back. At the beginning of the film, Nails and his braindead goons destroy Donnie's rock collection and almost drown him in a shallow creek just for fun. One day way playing in his favorite wooded creek like a spastic toddler, Donnie meets a crippled and seemingly equally autistic yet warmhearted little lady named Jenny (played by Jessica Straus, who went on to become a relatively successful videogame voice actress for games like Joseph D. Kucan's 1997 Philip K. Dick adaptation Blade Runner, Chris Mullender's Evil Dead: A Fistful of Boomstick (2003), and various World of Warcraft games). Although Donnie naturally acts like a complete and utter moron around Jenny, she becomes completely smitten with him and his glaring mental 'idiosyncrasies.' As for Donnie, he likes Jenny so much that he ritualistically sniffs a scarf that she gives him and then proceeds to masturbate. While Donnie's lonely loser life seems to be looking up after he meets Jenny, Nail and his gang, Miss Martins, prying priests, and his mother seek to destroy his little piece of happiness.

One day, while taking a box of worthless junk to a reverend at the request of his caretaker Miss Martins, Donnie is once again beaten by Nails and his mulleted minions. Luckily, after being beaten up and thrown around like a ragdoll, Donnie is helped up by his lady love Jenny who accompanies him to the house of worship run by charlatan asshole Reverend Cummings (John Rand, who appeared in pornographer Gregory Dark's 1986 softcore skin flick In Search of... the Perfect '10' and Milligan's sorry 1989 swansong Surgikill). Upon talking with Jenny in private, the Reverend puts his hand on her thigh and begins berating her boyfriend, stating, "Donnie will never be a normal friend." When Jenny reveals that both of her parents died in a car wreck that also left her crippled and forced her to live with her bitchy aunt who she unlovingly describes as "my mother's sister," the perniciously patronizing Reverend states, "Oh, I'm sorry but God must have meant for it to be that way." Of course, the pervert Rev is not the only one that will attempt to destroy Donnie and Jenny's blooming love affair. When Donnie gives Jenny a kiss and proceeds to attempt to force himself on her, the young lady freaks out and knocks her loverboy on his ass. After Donnie declares, "I'm sorry, sorry, sorry" over and over again in a spastic fashion, Jenny states, "I wanna belong to you Donnie but not just yet" and proceeds to explain how she lost her virginity at the age of 14 after a boy that incessantly bullied her due to her crippled leg knocked her unconscious and raped her. Not long before getting the opportunity to pseudo-deflower the already deflowered Jenny, Donnie plays peeping tom and jerks off while hiding in a collapsed house and voyeuristically gazing at his enemy Nails nailing his slut girlfriend. After Nails finishes cumming and leaves, his girlfriend, who complains about her boy toy's failure to sexually satisfy her, notices Donnie and attempts to seduce him. After letting Donnie touch her tits, Nails' whore begins mocking the autistic boy and the two get in a pathetic fight. Luckily, after Donnie comes back to his shack and curls up in a fetus position after being beaten up by a big bosomed redneck broad, Jenny soon comes by and takes his virginity. Rather unfortunately, the same day Donnie loses his virginity, he is forced to confront the abusive alcoholic who once threw him away like trash and she has rather heinous plans for her misbegotten boy.

Upon being forced to meet with his estranged progenitor 'Ma Raymond' (Lynne Caryl), Donnie not only learns that he is the inbred spawn of a love affair between his mother and her abusive brother Eddie, but also that his mom/aunt is planning to sell him to a crazy poof pig named Mr. Cycil Price (Carroll Oden, who also appeared in Milligan's final film Surgikill) where he will live in Mississippi in sod-based sexual servitude. Indeed, Ma Raymond is selling her sole son for a mere $1,500 whether Donnie likes it or not. Needless to say, being a rampantly heterosexual autistic man, Donnie refuses to listen to his mad mommy and attempts to escape, so Ma Raymond starts beating him with a whip. Of course, Donnie eventually overpowers her and begins whipping his mother with her own whip, but he does not stop there, as he also hacks off her head with a butcher knife. When Mr. Price arrives to pick up his new half-retarded sexual serf and discovers Ma Raymond has been murdered, Donnie kills the creepy cocksucker by stabbing him in the throat with a shovel. On his way home, Donnie stops by Reverend Cummings' church to drop off some old clothes and is soon threatened by the pseudo-spiritual leader's busybody's wife (Janet Roberts) who threatens to destroy his love affair with Jenny, so he decides to treat the old soul-sucking bitch like the vampire she is by driving a giant white crucifix through her seemingly cold, black heart. Reverend Cummings is such a perverted degenerate that when he sees blood on Donnie's clothes, he assumes that it is a result of him deflowering Jenny. When the Rev friendly realizes that Donnie has killed his wife, he locks the boy in a backroom, calls 911, and tells him that he will "burn in hell by the blood of Jesus by nightfall." When the Reverend makes the mistake of belittling Donnie a little too much, he finds himself being strangled to death with a string of Christmas lights.

WEIRDO: THE BEGINNING

After getting back to his shack and embracing Jenny, Miss Martins walks in on them and calls the young girl a slut. After that, Miss Martins tells Donnie that she is his aunt/mother's sister and tells him he must move out. When Miss Martins makes the mistake of calling Jenny a "no-good filthy little slut" one-too-many times, Donnie becomes enraged and attacks her, thus resulting in her accidental death when she is set on fire. After killing Miss Martins, Donnie confesses to Jenny about his crimes and she is surprisingly accepting, even declaring her undying love to him. Unfortunately, a couple hicks soon discover Miss Martins and a lynch mob comprised of rabid rednecks, including naughty Neanderthal Nails and his motley crew of mullet men, begin looking for Donnie so they can kill them. When the mob discovers Donnie and his girlfriend (who does a poor job running away since she is a cripple and all), Nails attempts to rape Jenny, but luckily her brave boy toy slits the attempted rapist's throat and cuts off his hands. Of course, Donnie can only hold off the hysterically homicidal hicks for so long and soon meets his grizzly end when about a dozen or so raging rednecks, including women, beat him to death with sticks and boards. Needless to say, Jenny is heart broken when she discovers Donnie's corpse. When Jenny notices a young mother threatening to kill her prepubescent son—a virtual future Donnie in the making—she rhetorically asks herself, "why can't people be nice to one another?!" In a twist ending that sets up for a Weirdo sequel that was ultimately never made, Jenny brings a police officer to the location of her belated boyfriend's brutalized body, only to discover that he is gone and only his clothes remain, this more than hinting that he managed to survive.

A shockingly penetrating dime-store fable that was created by a true antihero who depicts the murder of mothers, religious leaders, and affluent slave-driving sodomites as a more or less righteous act of spiritual retribution as carried out by a truly sad victim of society who could not even carry on a true love affair without the threat of imprisonment and homelessness, Weirdo is not only notable for featuring a rather idiosyncratic moral compass as a work that is essentially a slasher flick from the perspective of the killer, but also for being probably the only Andy Milligan film where a heterosexual romance is portrayed in a positive and even touching way and the female lead is pure and sweet and not some conniving psychopathic cunt like in most of the director's films. Indeed, in its oddly endearing depiction of a forbidden romance between two forsaken social and mental defectives, Milligan's film is like the David and Lisa (1962) of 1980s horror/exploitation films, albeit thankfully minus the sentimentalizing sermonizing and P.C. pandering. In its decidedly deranged twist on Romero and Juliet featuring mommy issues and perverse murders as carried out by a spiritually castrated and seemingly autistic male lead who falls for an equally whacked out little woman, Milligan's Weirdo also superficially resembles the similarly titled French semi-surreal S&M-themed flick Weird Weirdo (1969) aka Le grand cérémonial directed by Pierre-Alain Jolivet (Bérénice, Black Mirror) and based on a play by Spanish auteur Fernando Arrabal (Viva la muerte, I Will Walk Like a Crazy Horse). In its relatively subversive depiction of two forsaken young lovers who love hanging out at secluded spots like the woods and go as far as murdering their parents to maintain their rather risky romantic relationship, Milligan's film will also probably interest fans of the comparably harsh and rarely seen flick Wildwechsel (1973) aka Jail Bait directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder (who, aside from also being a sadomasochistic sod that once married one of his actresses and celebrated his honeymoon by engaging in some late night hardcore homo action, also shared a similarly pessimistic Weltanschauung to Milligan and was at his most prolific as a filmmaker during the early 1970s). Directed by the son of an emotionally and physically (and some believe sexually due to the incessantly incestuous nature of his films) abusive crazed alcoholic bitch who made sure that her son would hate women for the rest of his life, Weirdo is quasi-esoteric autobiographical anti-Oedipal cinema at its most obsessively odious. Undoubtedly, Norman Bates seems looks like a whiny bourgeois bitch boy compared to Milligan's murderous, mommy-hating Donnie. Indeed, after watching the film, I have to admit that I am now dying to see the original 1970s version that Milligan lost, as it would have most certainly helped Weirdo to have been a tad more gritty, especially featuring the director's various anti-superstars and debauched divas.

Somewhat ironically, auteur Andy Milligan apparently treated the lead actor of Weirdo: The Beginning, Steve Burington, in a sadistic manner not unlike how the eponymous antihero of the film, who seems like a youthful alter-ego of the filmmaker, is treated by everyone he knows, or as Jimmy McDonough noted in his excellent and highly addictive biography The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001) regarding the torrid production and its tyrannical director: "The fact that the casting choices weren't his own—likewise for a tacked-on ambiguous ending leaving room for a WEIRDO II—made Milligan's blood boil. He was especially cruel on THE WEIRDO set, reducing at least one person to tears. "Andy hated the actors," said Frank Echols. "The boy playing the lead? Andy screamed at him every day, to the point of no return." Indeed, if there ever was a perfect example of a horror auteur being the true monster of his own movies, it was Mr. Milligan, but as Weirdo readily demonstrates in its damning depiction of a boy spawned through incest, alcoholism, and various forms of traumatic abuse who was left to die in the streets and was treated as virtual human garbage by everyone he knew, he was created by other monsters who, behind the false facade of legal and spiritual authority, managed to get away with their cruel and violent behavior. With Weirdo and virtually every other one of the filmmaker's fucked flicks, Milligan took his therapeutic revenge against these monsters as a sort of faggy Frankenstein monster of nasty no-budget filmmaking. Considering the director's swansong, Surgikill, is an absolutely horrendous, Hebraic-humored horror-comedy that has absolutely no redeeming qualities whatsoever (the director's friend/biographer McDonough stated of the film, "...this movie is utterly painful to sit through [...] I'd rather not remember Andy as a gay, gutter-trash Benny Hill..."), I like to think of Weirdo as Milligan's last real film as a work that, not unlike his best movies like Nightbirds (1970) and Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1973), provides more than enough reasoning as to why the director was a proud misanthrope and sadist who got a kick out of cinematically pissing on people's dreams and raining on their parades.

WEIRDO: THE BEGINNING

-Ty E

VINYL

Andy Warhol° (1965)

Aside from taking credit for other people's art and making an absurd profit off of it like some Hebraic Hollywood producer or rock manager, American pop (con)artist Andy Warhol's greatest talent as an (anti)creator was taking an existing piece of work and defiling it to the point of being totally unrecognizable, with his cinematic adaptation of Anthony Burgess' 1962 dystopian novella A Clockwork Orange, Vinyl (1965), being an excellent example of this. Indeed, six years before Stanley Kubrick directed his cult masterwork A Clockwork Orange (1971) and unwittingly incited juvenile delinquency in Great Britain (thus resulting in Kubrick's decision to withdraw the film from distribution in the U.K.), Warhol—who was then somewhat addicted to filmmaking and purportedly spending around $400 a week on his little film experiments at the time—paid a mere $3,000 for the rights to Burgess' novel and directed a 63-minute adaptation shot in real time that more or less celebrates the antisocial behavior of the classic 'JD' figure and demonstrates why the pop artist is arguably the most technically inept filmmaker who has ever been given any serious consideration by film critics and historians. Indeed, despite being a pathologically plodding piece of insipid celluloid incoherence starring a bunch of uniquely untalented 'cool people' posturing themselves in a flagrantly narcissistic fashion that is more worthy of being laughed at than emulated (unfortunately, as the wretched No Wave world demonstrated, some people were dumb enough to emulate it), Vinyl is easily one of Warhol's greatest, if not greatest, and most filmic pre-Morrissey era film production. Penned by off-off-Broadway Warhol collaborator Ronald Tavel (Poor Little Rich Girl, Chelsea Girls) over a 2 or 3 day period into a quasi-screenplay (the actors read their lines from cue cards) of what can only be described as a meta-bastardization of Burgess' novel, or as the screenwriter described his creative process, "He [Warhol] gave me the idea behind it because Warhol gave me the Burgess book, A Clockwork Orange, and said that he had purchased the film rights from Anthony Burgess, and he wanted me to do it... So, I took the book and read it... but I only used the first half of it because I got bored and just stopped in the middle of the novel," Vinyl is a hermetic homoerotic 'chamber piece' from the banal bowels of Warhol Factory hipster hell where two would-be-poet poof pansies, Gerard Malanga (Gregory J. Markopoulos' Twice a Man, Michel Auder's Cleopatra) and Robert Olivo aka 'Ondine' (The Loves of Ondine, Sugar Cookies), demonstrate they want to show up American heiress/tragic socialite Edie Sedgwick (The Andy Warhol Story, Ciao! Manhattan) in terms of charisma and sex appeal, which they ultimately fail to do. Indeed, Vinyl is also notable for being the first 'major' film Sedgwick starred in (though her first screen appearance was in the Warhol short Horse (1965)) and as screenwriter Tavel explained how she got involved with the project, "... somehow, they [Edie and Chuck Wein] showed up on the set of Vinyl... and they showed up to see it being shot... This really pissed me off because I had rehearsed it for a week [...] So, then we rehearsed it for a week... But when she [Sedgwick] showed up with her hair dyed silver, no less... he [Warhol] asked her to sit right on the set. She said, 'What should I do?' He said, 'Well, there's no part for you. So just sit there.' [...] And she ended up stealing the film and becoming a star overnight...," thus demonstrating the hopelessly improvised and amateurish essence of the film. Partly filmed while all the actors were high on poppers (amyl nitrate), which they actually take while on camera, Vinyl is quite arguably the most incriminating cinematic depiction of the drug-addled degeneracy and narcissism-without-talent-to-back-it-up spirit that fueled the pre-Morrissy factory films.

VINYL

Opening more or less the same way as Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange did with a close-up of the face of lead 'JD' (aka juvenile delinquent) Victor (played Adonis-like Gerard Malanga in the 'Alex DeLarge' role), Vinyl has a strangely ethereal feeling at first, but from there the camera never moves a single other time for the entirety of the film. Indeed, for most of this haphazard piece of cramped celluloid chaos, all of the characters are in the shot, even when they are not acting, with J.D. McDermott (My Hustler) as the 'cop' on the left side of the screen smoking a cigarette in a chair, Edie Sedgwick as an 'extra' in the right corner smoking a cigarette, Ondine standing in the center of the back like a creep, and various other 'actors' standing partially onscreen. At about the 3:20 minute mark, an off-screen narrator announces "Andy Warhol's Vinyl" (this is repeated at about 30 minutes when cast is named and at about the 56 minute mark where the crew credits are named) and lead Victor soon declares to his poof partner-in-crime 'Scum Baby' (Ondine), "We'll do whatever comes along, Scum... We'll do whatever comes along, scum baby." From there, Victor heads to an imaginary place (after all, all action in the film takes place in what seems to be a corner in Warhol's factory) and begins to assault a young man carrying 'books' (aka a large stack of muscle man magazines), sarcastically saying to the poor man, "It is uncommon to see someone who knows how to read, sir [...] I have always had the deepest respect for sirs that can read." Needless to say, Victor trashes the young intellectual's books and declares, "Let's have a little bit of the old 'up yours,'" where he, with the help of Scum Baby, proceeds to tie up his victim in chains in an S&M sodomite fashion. After what proves to be a sort of substitute sex act for vice-addict Victor (indeed, he gets a sexual thrill out of handing out beatings), he smokes a joint and declares, "Ok... Ok... I am a JD. So what?! I like to bust things up and carve people up and I dig the old 'up yours' with plenty of violence so it's really tasty. And then, if I get busted by the cops...so what." So, what the hell, I say. You cannot have JD like me running loose all over the city. Then it is me that loses if I get busted."

And, indeed, as Vinyl progresses, Victor ends up losing as he is finally busted

for too much “breaking up China shops and carving up cuties,” but not before dancing like a high hippie moron to Martha and the Vandellas’ “Nowhere to Hide” (which is played not once, but twice in a row!) while an old fart Cop (J.D. McDermott) laughs manically and Edie Sedgwick grooves out in a languid and lackluster fashion. After the retarded dance routine, Victor starts a pussy fight with Sir Scum Baby and calls his compatriot “a pig” and “an ape,” but he ultimately gets his ass kicked. After beating his JD comrade up, Scum Baby calls a Cop and Victor is arrested and when the exaggeratedly odious officer of the law asks him why he tried to kill his friend, the Droog dope fiend pseudo-poetically replies, “Scum is already dead. He was born dead,” as if that is some sort of reasonable defense. After talking a bunch of banal shit like a deranged high school principal that gets a hard-on from dishing out punishment to pupils, the Cop tells Victor, “This is an ethical problem. We are going to convert you into a boy who never wants to do bad.” From there, Victor is strapped to a chair, has his hands tied around his back, his shirt ripped open, and is forced to watch brain-washing films by a devilish Doctor (Tosh Carillo). After telling his tormentor, “I see little children having their teeth pulled out by yellow dwarves. I see virgins with long white gowns and gladiators are setting fire to their gods. I see virgins trying to crawl out of the flames. I see the gladiators attempting to push them back into the flames. I hear their screams: ‘Oh, please stop this, stop this,’” while watching the ‘reprogramming’ films, Victor pleads to the Doctor, “Please stop these flickers, Doctor.” Instead of having his pleas for mercy answered, Victor is forced to sport a leather-fag ‘gimp’ mask à la Pulp Fiction (1994) over his head and the torture only gets worse. While being tortured, Victor complains, “How can I be made sane if I feel so much pain now?,” so the Doctor drives his boot into the young man’s genitals in a rather assertive fashion. Ultimately, Victor is ‘cured’ of his affliction and becomes a mindless slave/victim who freely allows people to torture him without any repercussions. Indeed, when Victor attempts to punch the Doctor, he cannot even land the hit and merely gets sick. Ultimately, the last 10 minutes or so of Vinyl climaxes into one of the most passive and uneventful homo S&M orgies in cinema history, with Victor being forced to take poppers, having his haircut, and being forcibly danced around and beaten by the Doctor as if he were a lifeless dummy or the victim of a gang-raping.

Believe it nor not, someone actually had the lack of artistic integrity to remake a miserable celluloid mess like Vinyl. Indeed, French-born actor/director Eric Mitchell (Underground U.S.A., The Way It Is)—a member of the so-called ‘no wave’ movement who acted in films like Amos Poe’s Unmade Beds (1976) and The Foreigner (1978) and Jim Jarmusch’s Permanent Vacation (1980)—directed a quasi-remake of Vinyl entitled Kidnapped (1978). Unlike Vinyl, Kidnapped is mostly a pathetic punk fantasy with an atrocious art-punk soundtrack where a group of young degenerates kidnap a businessman RAF-style and proceeds to torture him in a chair like Gerard Malanga was in Warhol’s film. The fact that such a technically incompetent and largely incoherent work like Vinyl was such a popular work in the vogue 'underground' that it manages to inspire a remake just goes to show how much of a deleterious effect Warhol had on NYC filmmakers (ultimately, inspiring mostly worthless movements like the 'No Wave' and 'Cinema of Transgression'). While largely forgotten and never released in the United States in any home media format (though the Italian company Raro Video did release the film together with the 1966 Warhol directed documentary The Velvet Underground and Nico), Vinyl was, for whatever reason, included in the film reference book 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die (2003) edited by Steven Jay Schneider.

VINYL

To Warhol's credit, Vinyl is one of the pre-Morrissey efforts that managed to put a smile or two on my face, if not for all the wrong reasons (in my opinion, the work plays out like Warhol-exploitation). While an avant-garde effort, Vinyl, unlike something like Jean Marie-Straub's similarly statically directed work Der Bräutigam, die Komödiantin und der Zuhälter (1968) aka The Bridegroom, the Actress and the Pimp, is not the least bit pretentious, but instead, pathologically preposterous to the point where one must respect the auteur's seemingly autistic gall. While I would have liked to have seen nauseatingly narcissistic art fag Gerard Malanga manhandled in sadistic fashion like the demented dick-stabbers of Jacques Scandelari's New York City Inferno (1978), the fact the actor/poet was 'tortured' so impotently by his braindead beatnik buds makes Warhol's Vinyl all the more entertaining and memorable, as seeing two queens fight always make for a comical scenario. Indeed, Vinyl is 16mm celluloid crap, but it 16mm celluloid crap with character, albeit a character that begs to be ridiculed and critically ravaged. Undoubtedly, Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange and Warhol's Vinyl make the perfect double feature as they represent the alpha and omega of cult cinema. Vinyl is indisputable proof that you can promote and make a pretty penny off of anything so long as you can convince people it is 'art.'

-Ty E

CHELSEA GIRLS

Andy Warhol° (1966)

Sometime at the end of my junior year of high school, I first heard junky kraut diva Nico's 1967 bohemian ballad "Chelsea Girls" – a song I would later learn was referential to a 1966 Andy Warhol film of the same name which also starred the singer in what was a mostly silent and somber performance that captured the melancholy essence of the beatnik Brynhildr. While Nico previously made a cameo appearance in Federico Fellini's classic La Dolce Vita (1960) as a smiling statuesque Nordic beauty who seemed like she was on her way to the top of the world, her appearance in Chelsea Girls (1966) was of a strikingly sullen nature as the seemingly apathetic and negligent mother of a young son, thus illustrating the 'sweet life' was not so sweet after all, at least for one of the most beautiful blonde beautesses in the world. An 'experimental epic' at 3 hours and 15 minutes of the innately improvised, ploddingly plot-less, passively nihilistic, emotionally and aesthetically erratic and seemingly pointless, Chelsea Girls would ultimately prove to be Andy Warhol's first big success as a sometimes-filmmaker as the first ostensibly 'underground' film in American history to be played in a mainstream movie theater, yet the work indubitably owes most of its 'cult status' and 'artistic integrity' to its co-director Paul Morrissey (Blood for Dracula, Madame Wang's), who many believe to be the real 'auteur' of the film. While Warhol came up with the general aesthetic concept for the film, writing to Chelsea Girls co-scripter Ronald Tavel (who scripted a mere two segments of the film), "I want to make a movie that is a long movie, that is all black on one side and all white on the other," Morrissey was essentially responsible for everything else, once stating, "Andy was an entrepreneur who wanted to produce something. I was the experimenter who created the experiments for him and then learned from the films that were made. I learned that really interesting personalities were out there and the trick is to let those personalities come out in front of the camera," and, indeed, one of the greatest aspects of the films is its naturalistic, albeit sometimes nauseatingly so, tone of a hotel of burnouts and bummed out beatnik bastards drowning in their own humiliating, and sometimes hysterical, humdrum lives. Warhol himself once stated of Chelsea Girls, "The lighting is bad, the camera work is bad, the sound is bad, but the people are beautiful," thus proving his own superficial reading of his 'own' film, but radical right-winger Morrissey managed to pack the film with enough quasi-mundane melodramatic meat to do the seemingly heretical (at least where hippie types were concerned) by unflatteringly demystifying the young, cool, and artistic by portraying them (with seemingly no effort on his part as they 'hang themselves' quite naturally) as the pretty, vacant people that most of them actually were. Featuring an iconic split-screen technique throughout combining both black-and-white and color segments of seemingly unrelated scenes and alternating soundtracks in what is an accidental post-structuralist celluloid hippie nightmare where a deep, dark abyss exists where the soul is supposed to be, Chelsea Girls features the unhappening happenings of a generation too impotent and idiotic to leave anything of value to subsequent generations, aside from posturing poses and the sometimes hypnotic hysteria of half-men with imbalanced estrogen levels.

CHELSEA GIRLS

Regarding Chelsea Girls, Warhol once remarked, "I use superstars in my movies so they can be superstars, portray their spontaneous—uh—talents on the screen," yet the only flair the pretty people of the film have is moody broody complaining and the occasional hysterical freak-out, especially when it comes to hyper homos like early and rather odious Factory Superstar Ondine (Vinyl, Silent Night, Bloody Night) – a man so innately impotent and mentally unsound that he feels the need to physically and verbally assault women and even has the audacity to try (and fail miserably) and pseudo-philosophize his actions later. Other Warhol Superstars featured in Chelsea Girls include Nico, Brigid Berlin, Gerard Malanga, Mary Woronov (playing 'Hanoi Hannah' in one of the two segments of the film scripted by Tavel), Ingrid Superstar, International Velvet and Eric Emerson, as well as a symbolic appearance by experimental filmmaker Marie Menken – who not only influenced Andy Warhol's banal brand of filmmaking, but also Kenneth Anger and Stan Brakhage – as a motherly figure. Whether one wants to acknowledge it or not, one becomes a voyeur-by-default when watching a film and one becomes especially conscious of their pathological scopophilic tendencies while viewing Chelsea Girls – a film where nothing and everything happens in a quaint hotel from hippie Hades where everyone is unhappy, except when sadistically molesting someone or procuring and abusing mind-altering substances so as to dull their lack of personal substance. Needless and heedless narcissism is the name of the game in the Hotel Chelsea, a spiritually and emotionally vapid lunatic asylum of the lethargic libertine sort where fags attack fag hags, bitchy blonde bull-dykes bargain large quantities of dope over the phone, wealthy queens manhandle young twinks, sexual experiences and religious beliefs are inanely touched on, and where no one can seem to bother to give a shit about anything but themselves, even if everyone there seems to destroy their minds and bodies with a sad cocktail of sex, drugs, and rock n roll. Assuredly, if someone overdosed on heroin and laid sprawled out with the needle still in their diseased genitals in the Hotel Chelsea, the other tenants of the overly blasé building would be too immersed in an unrelenting anti-nostalgic rant about their sexual awakening to bother to notice. Indeed, if the Chelsea Hotel featured in Chelsea Girls burned down with all of its occupants inside, I doubt the viewers or even the occupants would care because at least then they could feel something aside from feeling dead inside and would at least be put out of their misery. Surely, it is no coincidence that junky punk icon Sid Vicious would stab his Jewish prostitute girlfriend Nancy Spungen to death at the Hotel Chelsea twelve years after the release of Chelsea Girls. As the film demonstrates in a slightly less violent fashion, somehow when drug-addled rockers and 'artistes' lock themselves in dark rooms, things get a bit ugly and rather retarded.

In a December 1978 interview with Chelsea Girl star Ondine, who gives a performance that earned him "cult status" as a belligerent bitch boy who feels the need to assault women to assert his broken manhood and even proudly states to the camera "I am a violent person," he described the importance of the film and Warhol's influence as follows, "And in that film, not only in my segment—the culmination of my career at that point. But, quite honestly, he (Warhol) got from everybody involved in the film—everything that they could do. There are people running around wasted on the street now because they did it in that film. They should be, but they're probably dead. [laughing] There's no way out of that film. That film is a living torture test." Of course, Paul Morrissey's more imperative influence as a crypto-director is apparent in the film itself in a scene of Ondine as the prissy "Pope" during one of his real mental breakdowns when he states to the camera/director, "I'm ready to get any kind of confession, Paul. Anyone who wants to confess may confess," as the flamboyant flamer finally becomes clearly conscious of the fact that his less than prudent performance is incriminating and quite embarrassing due to his mindless megalomania and unwarranted assault against an equally mindless young woman. While not as blatant in his later films, Chelsea Girls would also be arguably the first film where Paul Morrissey exposed the sexual revolution and the counter-culture as deleterious abject failures that created a spiritual void in those individuals who fell for such self-gratifying degeneracy, yet, quite paradoxically, queer Jewish feminist Kathy Acker believed that his films, "made the art world, then the United States generally, accept, even admire those whom they had formerly condemned: drag queens, strippers, young homeless kids, not hippy pot smokers but actual heroin addicts and welfare victims," so one could argue that the auteur filmmaker's 'political objective' backfired, at least to some degree. Luckily, most kids today lack the attention span to even get through the first 5 minutes of Chelsea Girls, so they are going to have to develop their artificial angst and bitter romance for drugs and 'free sex' from illiterate rappers and the latest scatological Hollywood kosher comedy instead as the film has aged quite ungracefully.

After years of procrastination, I finally managed to get through the grueling 3+ hour entirety of Chelsea Girls the other day and I can safely say that I doubt I will ever re-watch the film ever again, but if I did, it would be while reading a book and listening to music because, in terms of actual worthwhile content and provocative ideas, the film has a tad bit more depth than vintage wallpaper. In fact, I would go as far as saying that I agree with Roger Ebert's review of the film, where he gave one out of four stars for the work, writing, "...what we have here is 3½ hours of split-screen improvisation poorly photographed, hardly edited at all, employing perversion and sensation like chili sauce to disguise the aroma of the meal. Warhol has nothing to say and no technique to say it with. He simply wants to make movies, and he does: hours and hours of them." Of course, Paul Morrissey never made a lie about the fact that Chelsea Girls was a cinematic "experiment" and nothing more and nothing less. Morrissey would later put the split-screen technique to better use in his seedy hustler flick Forty Deuce (1982) starring a very young and greasy bisexual, heroin-addicted Kevin Bacon in a sardonically sick scenario of a dead child in a bed on one screen and two degenerate dick-peddlers (Bacon being one of them) blackmailing a middle-aged bourgeois John regarding the dead kid in the other screen. More importantly, Chelsea Girls would inspire at least two of the greatest directors of German New Cinema, including dandy auteur Werner Schroeter, who utilized the split-screen technique and kaleidoscopic colors (featured prominently at the end of Chelsea Girls) in his excellent 35-minute short Argila (1969), as well as Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who adopted the posturing 'beatnik' attitude (both on and off film) and plodding plot to his semi-autobiographical work Beware of a Holy Whore (1971). Although once described by Newsweek as, "the Iliad of the Underground," Chelsea Girls is best seen today as an inane yet semi-important artifact of arthouse film history and as one of the least autistic and most 'coherent' films Warhol ever produced, but not as an unparalleled masterpiece of film history. Personally, I still prefer the Nico song.

CHELSEA GIRLS

-Ty E

MY HUSTLER

Andy Warhol^o (1966)

Described by the Factory Führer fag Andy Warhol himself as, “the story of an old fag who brings a butch blond hustler to Fire Island for the weekend and his neighbors all try to lure the hustler away,” and dubiously credited to both Warhol and Chuck Wein (Rainbow Bridge) – who acted as Edie Sedgwick’s promoter (inevitably introducing her to Warhol) – My Hustler (1965) is an important film that marked a turning point for the Factory films because, unlike all the of previous films that lingered in plodding plot-less-ness and were generally banal body worship, it actually features a discernible plot, editing, and – relatively speaking – ambitious pan-shots that switch back-and-forth between a gentle giant gigolo on the beach and the backporch of an old bitchy queen’s beach house. What sparked this change in My Hustler and practically all subsequent Factory films in terms of narrative structure and the general mise-en-scène is that Paul Morrissey began to take over virtually all stages of the filmmaking process, including directing, editing, producing, and distributing, even once stating in an interviewing, “whatever directing these films had, came from me.” Centering around a shallow yet stoic novice hustler, My Hustler – with its less than compassionate portrayal of a strikingly statuesque yet superlatively superficial and stupid stud – would also act as practice for Paul Morrissey first ‘official’ feature-length cinematic work Flesh (1968); the inaugural film in his original trilogy (the other two being Trash and Heat), as well as his rarely-seen post-Factory work Forty Deuce (1982) starring a very young and a surpassingly sleazy Kevin Bacon as a hustler/heroin addict. Essentially divided into two separate acts from two different film reels, the first segment of My Hustler – which features actual editing – focuses on the catty ravings of a rich bitch old queer and the equally catty remarks of his female ‘friend’ and his aged ex-streetwalker man servant as they gaze voyeuristically at the blond beast on the beach, and the second – which is comprised of a single shot and is of a more distinctly Warholian flavor – focuses on the handsome hunk as he is gawked at and fawned over like a juicy slab of meat, and is propositioned by the three horny and hysterical human hyenas. Although no day at the beach in terms of aesthetic and storyline, it is still a must-see for Morrissey fans as it shows the filmmaker’s ‘technique’ at its most gritty, primitive, and socio-politically scant form.

Undoubtedly, all of the characters featured in My Hustler are miserable, misanthropic narcissists of the exceedingly egomaniacal sort with Mr. Man Meat himself being the least nauseating, if only due to the fact that he is a novice to the game of a lecherous life of gay prostitution. Unbeknownst to him, blond hustler hunk Paul played by Paul America – who Warhol himself described as, “unbelievably good-looking - like a comic-strip drawing of Mr. America, clean-cut, handsome, very symmetrical. He seemed to be exactly six feet tall and weigh some nice round number” – is being spied on by three scopophilic degenerates of the dangerously debauched and devising sort. The old queen – a particularly pretentious and pompous odd fellow with a positively unpleasant appearance being bald and blistered – is a master of mental and rhetorical masturbation, which he makes a point of unleashing on his two cohorts and later Paul. The supernuated queer has a right-hand man and virtual sex serf on the surf named Joe (played by Joseph Campbell aka ‘The Sugar-Plum Fairy’) whose job is to wait hand and knees on both his boss and the boss’ latest acquisition Paul. The third member of the terrible threesome is neighbor Genevieve (Genevieve Charbon) who – being a ferocious fag hag – gets “some kind of perverse psychological enjoyment out of stealing them (twinks) from faggots,” as declared by the old queen. Genevieve is apparently a master at “stealing tricks from hustlers,” which assuredly infuriates the posh poof because not only does she get to sleep with the high dollar twink for free – the same man that the seasoned fag has to pay top dollar for – but she also has the potential of sexually rehabilitating the salesman of his lust for sodomy. Despite stating salaciously that he would love to “run barefoot through all those goldilocks” in regard to Paul, the old queen thinks very little of his bought two-legged beefcake, later remarking that hustlers are, at best, one-dimensional creatures whose only interests are comprised of “leather boots and motorcycles.” Needless to say, the seasoned sodomite is the sort of slave-driving fag-master that abberosexual Aryan auteur Rosa von Praunheim warned about in his curious celluloid manifesto It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971). In fact, the pushing poof admits “there are black slaves and there are white slaves,” with the young and dashing Europid being the apple of his erection. If one is to learn anything from My Hustler, it is that hustling makes for a humiliating, unstable, and short-lived (and oftentimes life-shortening) occupation, that fag hags make for meager mothers and lifeless lovers, and that ancient queens love to reign supreme over their self-created overripe realms.

MY HUSTLER

I think that most fans of the Trash director will agree that My Hustler makes for a meager Morrissey film, but, nonetheless, it is an interesting excursion in the deconstruction of the ‘romantic’ gigolo life, thus making the considerably campy cinematic work mandatory viewing for those interested in the history of the so-called ‘Factory’ filmmaker. According to Gerard Malanga – who worked on a number of early Warhol films, including acting in Kiss (1963), Vinyl (1965), and Chelsea Girls (1966); and co-produced Bufferin (1967) – My Hustler (along with Chelsea Girls) was one of the first Factory films to turn a profit, albeit marginal, which is undoubtedly due in part to Paul Morrissey’s artistic involvement with the film. As for all-American hustler Paul America – who was a fullback and defensive linebacker on his high school football team – he only appeared in one more acting role after My Hustler as ‘Paul’ in Ciao! Manhattan (1972); a work featuring fellow “Warhol superstar” Edie Sedgwick in her last acting role before her premature death via barbiturate/alcohol overdose that same year. America lived at the Factory from 1965 to 1968 and to quote odious Warhol superstar Ondine, "Paul America was everybody's lover.... He was the personification of total sexual satisfaction. Without a brain in his head. Just beautifully vapid. He was a wonderful creature. Anybody who wanted anything from Paul could get it. He was there to satisfy. And he did" and according to art curator Henry Geldzahler, by the early 1980s the handsome hunk, "was a wasted creature after they [Warhol's crowd] had finished with him. They finally washed their hands of him and let him float away. He's a poor burned-out thing living in a commune in Indiana and trying to pull himself together." In 1982, Paul America was ran over and killed by a car while on his way to a dental appointment. Needless to say, he never acquired the life of "money, cars, education, travel and beautiful women" that was offered to him by the old queen in My Hustler.

-Ty E

BIKE BOY
BIKE BOY

Andy Warhol° (1967)

Without question, out of all of Andy Warhol's early pre-"Paul Morrissey Trilogy" autistic-garde films, the color feature-length work Bike Boy (1967) – a minimalistic drama about a buff, braindead bohunk biker who goes head-to-head verbally with a number of Warhol Superstars – is the greatest and most entertaining, not least of all because the supposed 'cinematographer' (Paul Morrissey) contributed immensely (and some would say solely) to the overall thematic and aesthetic essence of the film. In fact, the filmmaking roles were quite the opposite of what is listed on imdb.com, as Paul Morrissey explained in an interview in the book The Eyeball Compendium (2003) that: "He himself (Warhol) could not physically, was not capable of making his own experiments, someone else had to make his experiments for him. He wanted them to be experiments. To keep Andy involved with the experiment, he operated the camera. He operated the camera on LONESOME COWBOYS and BIKE BOY and things like that" and in another interview: "There wasn't much direction in these experiments but whatever directing was done, I did. Andy just aimed the camera." Indeed, Bike Boy has the unmistakable feel of a Paul Morrissey work, especially when compared to his original factory film trilogy (Flesh, Trash, Heat), albeit more archaic and gritty; traits that ultimately work in the favor of this early experiment in realist pseudo-cinéma vérité anti-aesthetics. Instead of Joe Dallesandro as the beautiful and verbally brutish beefcake star, Bike Boy features quasi-wop Joseph Spencer (whose sole other acting credit is a cameo on terribly trashy TV series Baywatch Nights) as 'Joe, the Motorcyclist'; a cliché and cryptically gay bonafide 'bad boy' with the tattoo "Born To Lose" branded on his arm. To Warhol's minor credit, the pop-con-artist was apparently heavily influenced by Kenneth Anger's iconic short Scorpio Rising (1964); a work that Bike Boy seems to be quite conscious of with its flagrant biker fetishism, fearless flaunting of the male body, and flirtation with themes of Nazism, yet depicted in a marvelously mock-heroic fashion. In short, Bike Boy decisively deconstructs and demystifies the proto-leather-fag motorcycle rebel that first made its appearance in the American public's conscious via the outlaw biker movie The Wild One (1953) starring Marlon Brando as the enigmatic rebel-without-a-cause. Anti-anti-hero Joe of Bike Boy is nothing short of a rebel-without-a-brain-and-an-erection who can't even keep up with casual conversations between Warhol's speed-addled Superstars nor does he have the chic fashion sense to pick out an urbane urban uniform without the help of raving and snidely snickering queens, let alone takeover an entire town as Brando and his crew The Black Rebels Motorcycle Club do in The Wild One. In short, Joe is, at best, a blue-collar fashion victim that is as wild and warring as a wet Chinese wang on Sunday in the dead of winter.

Like with Morrissey's subsequent work Trash (1968) starring Joe Dallesan-

dro, Bike Boy begins with a scene of the philistine protagonist in a gratuitous, if gauche, scene totally stark-naked. Joe is neither a gentlemen nor a scholar, but he does know how to use running water as demonstrated by the fact that the first 5 minutes of Bike Boy essentially revolve around him taking a less than sexy shower in an underlit room. Of course, all things go downhill for Joe Schmo biker after he runs into members of Warhol's dick and drug addicted Superstars, not only because they make him feel stupid due to their semi-literate linguistic skills, but also because they are the queens (especially the homo clothing salesmen) of verbal diarrhea and marvelously mundane mental masturbation. After enduring the seemingly unending verbal venom of two clothing store queers – who have a fond time glancing at the bike boy's bulging underwear and discussing perfume on penises, the fertility of flower children, and an imaginary film "Transparent Transvestite" – Joe goes to a flower store and hangs out with a man that proclaims to be a fellow bike boy, listed in the credits as "Joe's Buddy" (Ed Wiener). Joe and his bald-headed buddy discuss such important problems as the recent assassination of American Nazi Party founder and Führer George Lincoln Rockwell (who was killed by a brown-complexion brownshirt of Greek descent named John Patler that was expelled from the party due to his "bolshhevik leanings"), the bike boy's plans to blow-off the head of an enemy with a shotgun, the pros and cons of bestiality (Joe states he would rather fuck a sheep, which he claims to have done once before, than bugger a hefty "horse" aka a big-boned blonde chick), and the merits of being a "cunning linguist" (Joe claims to have a big tongue and be a master of oral sex). Next, Joe has the grand pleasure of engaging in a one-sided conversation with Ingrid Superstar, a hyperactive and seemingly neurotic chick that absurdly proclaims, "That's what I hate about you men, you all know that you're good looking" while clearly but failingly attempting to get in the apathetic bike boy's pants. While Ingrid rants incessantly on a variety of pointless topics like how "soup is so divine," how "men drive her nuts," and her narcissistic claim that "what matters is what I (Ingrid) like, not what you like," Joe merely stares into space, paying literally nil attention to the hyper-horny hysterical broad spewing verbal venom at him. Thoroughly dismayed, Ingrid even pulls her tits out and accuses Joe of being a "faggot" but he is never once phased nor impressed. By far the most repellant Superstar that Joe undergoes is big bloated bitch Brigid Berlin – an arrogant and aggressive amphetamine addict with a passively and seemingly homosexual husband – who accuses the Brando-esque biker of being a "faggot," "motorcycle queen," and "leather lady"; and he describes her as a "Faggot" and "dyke" with "the face of a dyke" (aka "a horny looking face") that likes to "do 69s all the time." Needless to say, Joe blow biker never gets a blow-job from bulky bull Brigid Berlin.

Out of all the gorgeous and not so gaudy gals 'bikey' (as he calls himself) Joey encounters, only Viva – a vehement she-bitch notorious for her vivacious viciousness against the male gender, especially in regard to sexual scenarios – catches his fancy, so much so that attempt to engage in carnal knowledge, but – to the utter amusement of the deranged Warhol darling – the bike boy is no Don Juan and his peeled penis remains noticeably pendulous during the entirety of their exceedingly endless and uneventful sensual encounter. To her credit, Viva seems genuinely interested in Joe, his tattoos, and what little he has to say, thereupon discovering that his swastika tat (which, incidentally, is turned the wrong way) was the result of a drunken night that the bike boy cannot recollect and that he has a 'Born To Lose' brand on his arm because he's a "Born Loser." In the end, like Paul Morrissey's subsequent trilogy with Little Joe and his post-Factory efforts, Bike Boy ridicules, rebukes, and rather harshly but relevantly reams another romanticized but ultimately shallow, sterile (literally in Joe's case), and stupid American rebel icon: the Outlaw Biker. In Bike Boy, Scorpio is falling and he cannot get his dick up; themes that utilize against the counter-culture movements to 'polished' and potent degree via Trash, Flesh, and Heat. If anything makes Bike Boy stick out from Warhol's and Morrissey's other films, it is the 'humanity' that is brought to the character of Joe. Indeed, the would-be-bad bike boy may be a half-retarded wop with an acute case of nauseating narcissism, a broken ego, and sadomasochistic tendencies, but he is certainly more sympathetic and sincere than Warhol's wayward gang and at least he does real work for a living. That being said, if you plan to see one of Warhol's celluloid trainwrecks, make it Bike Boy; a marvelous meandering motion-picture where bombastic bad boys and slap-happy speed-queens play a gay game of survival of the unfittest.

BIKE BOY

-Ty E

I, A MAN

Andy Warhol° (1967)

In compensation for the fact that he had lost a screenplay that had been lent to him with the rather tasteful Warhol-esque title Up Your Ass, pansy pop-artist Andy Warhol cast the would-be-screenwriter in his latest film I, a Man (1967). The writer of the screenplay was a deranged bull-dyke named Valerie Solanas—a diagnosed paranoid schizophrenic and all-around feminist whack-job who urged women to overthrow the government and exterminate all men in her hyper hysterical self-published polemic, the SCUM Manifesto (the acronym meaning “Society For Cutting Up Men”)—and by early 1968 she would try but ultimately fail to assassinate the man who gave her only two acting roles (Solanas would also have a very small cameo in the Warhol production Bike Boy the same year). As for her excuse for wanting to kill the alpha-con-artist, Solanas made two seemingly contradictory statements on two different occasions: “I just wanted him to pay attention to me. Talking to him was like talking to a chair” and “He had too much control of my life,” probably not realizing that, as Paul Morrissey has mentioned in various interviews, that Warhol was socially retarded, if not downright autistic. Ironically, Solanas’ botched assassination attempt would contribute to the end of Warhol’s directing career because, aside from the fact that Paul Morrissey was already ghost-directing most of his films by that time, the beloved soup can fetishist would be too afraid to get involved with active art and working hands-on with superstars after his near-death experience, so he focused on more entrepreneurial matters. Indeed, Morrissey began collaborating with Warhol on films in 1965 at the youthful age of 27 by taking creative control over My Hustler (1965) and would secure his place in cinema history a year later by (co)directing the cult classic Chelsea Girls (1966) where he introduced a psychedelic split-screen technique, even though his real directing career had yet to begin. Of course, as a work that, according to Morrissey himself, was apparently shot in one day (mainly at night), I, a Man is not exactly one of Morrissey’s most innovative and remarkable works, but it would act as a prototype of sorts for his iconic anti-counter-culture trilogy (Flesh, Trash, Heat) starring Joe Dallesandro and is thus mandatory viewing for fans of the vehemently rightwing auteur’s subversive oeuvre. Apparently, the film was originally supposed to star Jim “The Lizard King” Morrison in the lead role but The Doors singer’s manager was against the idea, so his friend, Hollywood actor Tom Baker (who would later appear in the Italian-French film anthology Love and Anger (1969) aka Amore e rabbia and Dennis Hopper’s The Last Movie (1971), among various other obscure art films) took over the job as the leading man and would ultimately have the honor of being verbally berated by meat-beating Sapphic psycho Solanas in a dark stairwell. Like Bike Boy, I, a Man, which is a parody of the prosaic piece of now-forgotten Danish-Swedish erotica I, a Woman (1965) starring Essy Persson, is a work of quasi-anti-sexploitation that follows a handsome but hopelessly dumb and superficial stud as he gets with a bunch of equally vapid chicks and they spend more time insulting one another than doing anything even remotely sexually appealing. An early cockeyed vision of Morrissey's mockery of 'toilet culture', the film features, among other things, lesbo lunatics talking about beating their meat, burnout bohemian babes call their breasts fried eggs, young impotent men proudly proclaiming their love of TV and hatred of literature, and a spontaneous séance given in honor of the late great John Wilkes Booth. Indeed, I, a Man features a cast of pretty vacant characters who talk, talk, talk, yet have nothing to say, thus acting as a sort of movie microcosm for what the whole Warhol Factory was about.

I, A MAN

As can be expected from virtually all of the Morrissey/Warhol collaborations of the mid-to-late-1960s, I, a Man begins just abruptly as it concludes with male bimbo bro Tom Baker sleeping in bed with an annoying chick (Cynthia May) who tells him that he has to leave ASAP as her old fashioned parents are arriving soon, but before he actually leaves, the two mentally/erotically challenged love birds decide to play footsies under the bed. A mundane male whore, Tom begs for everything that he can get for free from the hysterical young lady, including cigarettes, coffee, and a shower. By the end of their little love fest, the girl tells Tom that he should, "Jump out of the window before my parents come." When Tom, who is now naked and standing in the chick's kitchen, asks her for some sugar for his coffee, she says "you don't deserve it" in a rather nasty fashion and throws a cup of java in his face. Needless to say, Tom leaves after that and goes looking for another dumb dame to exploit with his imaginary charms. On top of the roof a penthouse, Tom proves to the next girl (Stephanie Graves) that he tries in vain to swoon that he cannot even remember the most rudimentary characteristics of her appearance, stating when she puts him on the spot by remarking that he does not even know the color of her eyes, "Yes I do, they're...the same color they were when I met you." When Tom asks the girl, who lives off the generosity of an older man, if she is a hooker, she simply states, "Well, not really [...] I don't go around and walk the streets," thus revealing that she realizes that she is a whore of sorts, if not a rather successful one with a loyal sugar-daddy. On his next dull date, Tom hooks up with a feisty fire-crotch (Ingrid Superstar aka Ingrid von Schoffen), who shows him her fairly decent tits (which she calls "fried eggs"), to which he responds, "You should take better care of yourself," as if he is the living embodiment of god's gift to women. After grabbing one of Ingrid's breasts and further insulting her appearance, the two attempt to conjure up the spirit of John Wilkes Booth (of course, an infamous real-life assassin will appear later in the film, but no one knew that at the time it was made) during a séance to ask him why he killed Lincoln while the little lady lies on a table with a candle sitting between her legs, but naturally no apparition appears as they clearly have no clue what they are doing.

The next chick Tom hooks up with is tragic German diva Nico (who only originally agreed to be in the film because she thought her then-crush Jim Morrison would star in it, so she demanded Tom Baker star in the film when the Lizard King opted out), who is undoubtedly the most mild mannered and elegant chick in the entire film (though, it should be noted that, unlike all the chicks who used speed, heroin was Nico's drug of choice, hence her calm presence). Despite his innate superficiality and unwarranted arrogance, Tom seems to make a true romantic connection with Nico, who treats him with unwarranted warmth and affection, as if she is desperate for true love yet a bit shy at the same time. The next chick Tom visits is a sweet French babe (played by Ultra Violet aka Isabelle Collin Dufresne, who was Salvador Dalí's muse during the mid-1950s until the surrealist introduced her to Warhol in 1963 and she decided to move into the Factory not long after) who tells him to, "blow hot air on my feet." Tom and Ultra Violet have a short but sweet sensual time that mostly involves them messing around like little children on the latter's apartment floor. Unfortunately for him, the next young lecherous lady Tom hooks up with, Ivy Nicholson aka 'Ms. Tigress' (as she calls herself during the scene), is a bit crazed and proclaims to be strong because she has "Mongol blood" and then proceeds to babble about how Alice in Wonderland is a "funny" and "romantic" novel. Of course, Tom seems no more intelligent, confessing, "I don't like to read much...I watch a lot of television...which is more exciting." It should be noted that Ivy was apparently no less emotionally troubled in real-life because, as Tom would later reveal in an interview regarding working with her, "The first time I sensed impending danger was during a scene with Ivy Nicholson. She had stipulated that she would not appear on camera with me in the nude. Shortly after the scene began I walked out of the frame and removed the towel I was wearing in order to put on my pants. Clad only in unlaundered bikini underwear, Ivy exploded in an emotional fury and stormed out of the room in tears, claiming she had been betrayed. I was talking with Warhol, who was very much perplexed by Ivy's behaviour since, as he casually pointed out, 'Ivy'll cut her wrists for me...'"

In the next and arguably most important scene of I, a Man, Tom briefly hooks up with demented dyke Valerie Solanas, yet rather ironically, the actor admitted he had a somewhat nice experience working with the fiercely frigid feminist on the film, stating in an interview, "My third scene was with Valerie Solanas. I felt no personal threat from Valerie. Just the opposite. I found her intelligent, funny, almost charming, and very, very frightened." Of course, anyone who has actually seen the scene will notice that Solanas seems like anything but frightened as she tries with all her man-woman might to emasculate poor Tom boy. Tom and Solanas have their fleeting encounter in a shadowy stairway (which was apparently shot at the Warhol Factory) and the lethal lesbo proceeds to call the man-whore a "fink" and adds, "You know, you've got the most squishiest male ass I've ever seen." Indeed, with her vulgar objectifying remarks and aggressive behavior, Solanas seems like a living parody of the sort of misogynist men she proclaimed to want to exterminate in her manifesto. After Solanas reveals, "It all started in the elevator when I grabbed your [Tom's] ass," she confesses "You got me at a weak moment...I'm a pushover for a squishy ass," but she ultimately proves to be all talk as she abandons Tom because, as she states herself, "I gotta go beat my meat." While Warhol/Morrissey should have probably ended I, a Man with the Solanas scene, Tom goes to see one more chick, Bettina Coffin, in a brazenly banal scenario that unfortunately takes up the entire final 1/3 of the film. For those viewers looking for fag porn, Tom's uneventful erotic encounter with Bettina is the only scene where he exposes his cock and balls. Of course, instead of getting an erection and boning babe Bettina, he bitches at the chick for killing cockroaches and her unborn baby (she says she had an abortion because she did not want to marry the father of the child). Shockingly, Tom's seemingly unending dialogue with Bettina is the only point in the entire film where he makes any sense and gives evidence that his moral compass is not as busted as one initially suspected. In the end, Bettina attempts to call her brother, who she was supposed to meet for dinner but Tom screwed that up, and the film cuts off abruptly.

I, A MAN

A mind-numbingly mundane window into counter-culture-victimized human crud who unwaveringly support 'free love' yet cannot even consummate coitus in a work starring a future rock 'n' roll casualty who would drop dead just like his good bud Jim Morrison via a heroin overdose 15 years after proudly revealing to the entire world that he was an arrogant moron by becoming a one-time Warhol superstar, I, a Man is nothing short of static semi-eccentric celluloid excrement that demonstrates why Paul Morrissey would become one of the most important American cultural critics of his generation. As for murderously gynocentric 'lone wolf lesbo' Valerie Solanas, she was apparently embarrassed by her role in the film and would send Warhol a postcard dated August 25, 1967 making the following complaint: "Dear Andy, I've been noticing gross misspellings of my name in articles & reviews connected with 'I, A Man.' Please note correct spelling." Of course, after she cowardly shot Warhol (as well as art critic Mario Amaya) on June 3, 1968 in a stereotypically passive-aggressive female manner while the pop-artist was turned around and talking on the phone, Solanas would not have to worry about people misspelling her name, as she was inevitably immortalized with the sympathetic biopic I Shot Andy Warhol (1996) directed by Canadian feminist Mary Harron (who later demonstrated her hatred of white Nordic men with American Psycho (2000)) and starring the equally sub-homely Lili Taylor in the lead role. In fact, Solanas' performance in I, a Man was reenacted in Harron's horrendous film, with Bill Sage portraying Tom Baker. After serving a mere three-year prison sentence (had she been a man, she would have most certainly had a longer and more agonizing prison stay), Solanas was released in 1971 and would continue to stalk Warhol via telephone, thus she was arrested again in November 1971 and spent the rest of her pathetic life drifting between mental institutions and homelessness. In a classically female fashion, Solanas would later express no remorse for her crimes, stating regarding her botched assassination attempt against Warhol, "I consider that a moral act. And I consider it immoral that I missed. I should have done target practice." As for Warhol, he would fittingly relate the attempt against his life to cinema, stating, "Before I was shot, I always thought that I was more half-there than all-there—I always suspected that I was watching TV instead of living life. People sometimes say that the way things happen in movies is unreal, but actually it's the way things happen in life that's unreal. The movies make emotions look so strong and real, whereas when things really do happen to you, it's like watching television—you don't feel anything. Right when I was being shot and ever since, I knew that I was watching television. The channels switch, but it's all television." Of course, I, a Man, as well as most of the pre-Flesh (1968) films, make real genuine emotions seem like a thing of the past, with the actors being strung-out on speed and always sedentary, and the direction being so innately inept, that the viewer almost suspects they're trapped in some sort of bohemian purgatory of perennial banality. Indeed, if Warhol and Solanas are now in hell together as some might conclude, I would not be surprised if their punishment was to watch unending screenings of I, a Man while listening to the pansy pontificating of poof poet/woman-beater/sod superstar Ondine.

-Ty E

THE NUDE RESTAURANT
THE NUDE RESTAURANT

Andy Warhol° (1967)

“You would think Castro did the castrations” or so says the would-be-witty but nonetheless amusing Taylor Mead (Tarzan and Jane Regained...Sort Of, Coffee and Cigarettes) – a Warhol Factory superstar who has the misfortune of looking like a middle-aged fetus – in the oftentimes spastic and surfeiting yet sometimes startlingly stimulating color feature-length film The Nude Restaurant (1967) directed by Andy Warhol (Vinyl, Poor Little Rich Girl) and apparently in part ghost-directed by Paul Morrissey (Blood for Dracula, Madame Wang’s). Originally directing two different films at once – one featuring an all-male cast, which was inevitably trashed and a second featuring infamous fag hag Superstar Viva in the starring role aside Taylor Mead, which is the campy culinary cinematic work that exists today – The Nude Restaurant is a side-freakish flick featuring an all-partially-nude cast that merely babbles about everything ranging from “European Freudian bullshit” to the rampant heterosexuality of the mick Catholic clergy. Like Grey Gardens (1975) directed by Brothers Maysles – a delightful, if disturbing, documentary about Jackie O’s reclusive socialite aunt and first cousin – The Nude Restaurant is a work about that is, in part, about the rather repugnant side-effects of growing relatively ritzy and the completely and utterly ineffectual thoughts and cheap trash talk that such privy privileges of a posh upbringing bestows. As she explains in the film, Viva (born Janet Susan Mary Hoffmann) is the reluctant daughter of a wealthy lawyer (who was a loyal follower of senator Joe McCarthy) and once considered being a nun, but ended up posing needlessly nude for the films of an acutely autistic pop-artist instead. During The Nude Restaurant, Taylor Mead also confesses that he was born a member of the comfortable class, but the only thing he has to show for it is being a 40-year-old “virgin with possibilities” (both male and female) and being arrested nine times and showing his glaringly grotesque gluteus maximus off for 70-minutes in Warhol’s innately infantile flick Taylor Mead’s Ass (1965). In The Nude Restaurant, both Viva and Mead give it there all by bombarding the viewer with their particularly puerile and unpleasantly perverse psychobabble in a ferociously fruitless flick that tests the patience of even the most trash-treading (and treasuring) of cinephiles.

Although Viva was never the most studious of Catholic schoolgirls growing, she did develop a particularly close and personal relationship with her priest, who confided in the dirtball diva about “oral intercourse” and even dabbled with her derriere and stuck his whole holy tongue down her teenage throat as she explains in great and glorifying detail in The Nude Restaurant. Contrary to contemporary consensus where anytime someone hears the word “pope” or “priest” they think of a puny and peculiar old man in a preposterous dress with a particular predisposition towards altar-boys, Viva claims that her Catholic church was full of rampantly heterosexual priests with a paralyzing predilection for pubescent pussies, so much so that many of these perverted padres were exiled to cold areas so as to chill their little bishops in turtlenecks. In The Nude Restaurant, Viva describes her childhood experiences with Catholicism as “My Memoirs of the Catholic Girlhood,” which she proclaims is superior to Irish-Jewish-American author/political activist Mary Therese McCarthy’s book of a similarly titled name. A hypnotic hypocrite with an idiosyncratic lure, Viva says she’d rather be a lesbo than a hetero – which she associates with sadomasochism – despite stating to her swarthy man-friend Mr. Mead only a couple minutes later, “That’s the trouble with being around homosexuals; you always feel like covering up because you know you aren’t appreciated.” In no way phased regarding her embarrassingly pronounced narcissism, Viva vies for attention against the handful of people in The Nude Restaurant, despite the fact that, as a waitress aka softcore slut, hence the comedic “genius” of the film where a poor little rich girl attempts performing the most subservient occupation in the world as a topless server and failing miserably in the process; offering neither sensuality nor service in the process. Of course, Taylor Mead is an even more intrinsically incompetent, inept, wimpy, whiny, and utterly worthless waiter, as no degree of charm could hide the fact that he looks like a proto-AIDS victim and that guy g-string certainly does not do him any favors. Suffice to say, The Nude Restaurant does offer a campy carnal feast as advertised in the title, albeit of the Warholian abberosexual proto-hipsters-from-hell sort.

Like in Paul Morrissey’s trilogy and his later works, The Nude Restaurant does spoof the innate impotence, irrationalism, indecency, and overall idiocy of the so-called sexual revolution, as well as other counter-movement trends. One of the fellows that is a patron of The Nude Restaurant is an absurdly asinine and delusional anti-war activist who makes drug-addled dimwit Taylor Mead seem like an astute professor of philosophy by comparison. At one point in their inane conversation with one another, the slave-morality moralist activist states the following hippie truism, “anyone who doesn’t like war must be beautiful,” to which Mr. Mead replies, “not necessarily,” thereupon bursting the self-satisfied anti-war enthusiast’s bloated and bombastic bubble of pacifistic neo-bolshevik baloney. Viva also makes these fellows seem like yellow-bellied yokels, proclaiming to a white hippie bastard that claims he is related to some prominent Injun chief that, “that’s what they all say,”; “they” meaning all ethno-masochistic counter-culture, hippie, and post-hippie whites who will attempt to ‘uncover’ any nonwhite ancestry they can unearth from their family tree, even if it is total phony puffery of the most paltry and pathetic sort. Of course, the film certainly has something distinctly ‘Warholian’ about it because as a camera whore who would pull out dildos and nude mags while members of the press would photograph him, the basic and seemingly superficial premise of The Nude Restaurant – a cinematic work featuring an all-nude diner with penis designs on the menus – is indubitably of the autistic pop-artist's particular persuasion. Although quite tame by today's standards, the film caused a bit of controversy after its initial premiere at the Hudson Theatre on 44th Street in New York. Nowadays, the only thing 'subversive' and 'taboo' about The Nude Restaurant is its portrayal of peace activists as pompous, drug-riddled, bourgeois-born retards whose idea of 'political action' is occupying a piece of public pavement, being arrested and subsequently playing the scripted part of a martyr, hence its somewhat lasting value as a film today.

THE NUDE RESTAURANT

-Ty E

LONESOME COWBOYS

Andy Warhol° (1968)

On top of predating John Schlesinger's Midnight Cowboy (1969), Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Whity (1971), Paul Bartel's Lust in the Dust (1985), and Ang Lee's Brokeback Mountain (2005) as a curious and campy tale of cock-sucking cowboys on the boy-buggering range, the X-rated cinematic work Lonesome Cowboys (1968) co-directed by Paul Morrissey (Madame Wang's, Beethoven's Nephew) and Andy Warhol is quite possibly the first and only cinematic adaptation of William Shakespeare's tragic play Romeo and Juliet set in a vaguely Western setting (it was actually filmed in an Old Tucson cowboy village that John Wayne was purportedly the co-owner of) minus the intoxicated Injun menace. It is also probably the most unconventional and incoherently assembled of the played out Shakespeare play. Of course, Lonesome Cowboys is not your typical cowboys flick because, aside from featuring five flaming wang-wranglers, the film also features as passive, cross-dressing sheriff who would rather wear a dress than brandish a gun and an ostensibly loose cowgirl who will fuck anything with a swinging dick, even if they may have a venereal disease from riding more cowboys than horses. Starring weirdo Warhol superstars Viva (Bike Boy, Blue Movie), Joe Dallesandro (Blood for Dracula, Je t'aime moi non plus), Eric Emerson (San Diego Surf, Heat), and Taylor Mead (Tarzan and Jane Regained... Sort, Taylor Mead's Ass), among some relative unknowns (Frankie Francine, Tom Hompertz, etc.), Lonesome Cowboys is probably the best film Warhol worked on at that point in his filmmaking career, but it owes most of its enduring entertainment value and sociopolitical/cultural consciousness to Paul Morrissey. Warhol worked on the film during what was undoubtedly a rough patch in his life, at least during the post-production as he was recovering from serious injuries he received after would-be assassin Valerie Solanas (who appeared in Warhol's 1967 film I, a Man) of lesbo S.C.U.M. infamy. Paul Morrissey – apparently the real 'director' of Lonesome Cowboys – described the process of the downright bush-league direction of the film as follows: "We don't move the camera in, and we don't zoom in, in the shot. We stop the camera, zoom into the close-up, maybe pan to the second actor, turn the camera off, zoom back, to a two-shot, then start the camera again." Indeed, Lonesome Cowboys is an audacious yet absolutely amateurishly directed work that is composed of a couple overly long shots that were poorly chosen, thus the film is more of interest to Warhol Factory and/or Paul Morrissey fans as an historical artifact than a serious work of merit in itself.

With its long and incessantly long improvised takes that were typical of such works as Sleep (1963), Blow Job (1964), and Vinyl (1964), Warhol's scopophilic sideliners' 'auteur' presence in Lonesome Cowboys is undeniable, yet it seems that the film's greatest moments and sociopolitical subtext are owed to Morrissey's more thoughtful and provocative direction. In fact, Warhol's voyeuristic mindlessness was so detrimental to the film that art critic David Bourdon noted that the pop-icon missed some of the most interesting improvised moments of Lonesome Cowboys, stating: "Viva was nearly urinated upon by her antagonist's horse and then, losing her footing in the mud and falling against the hind legs of her horse, nearly trampled upon. Warhol missed both events because he was zooming in on a storefront sign across the street." Undoubtedly, Viva as Ramona D'Alvarez (or "Romeo" in this gender-bending adaptation of Shakespeare's classic story) is one of the most, if not the most interesting character of Lonesome Cowboys. After being raped and humiliated in a seemingly never-ending scene in the film, Ramona goes on to subsequently have sex and attempt a suicide pact with a dandy drifter while babbling on needlessly about how she can reach the ocean and eventually the cosmos with sexual intercourse, hence her proud-slut posturing throughout the film. The real-life daughter of well-to-do conservative religious parents who once dreamed of being a nun during her less debauched years, Viva looks especially degenerate and emotionally vacant as she allows her sandy snatch to be exposed in the desert for extended scenes while she nonchalantly recites a bunch of hippie jibberish. Assuredly, Morrissey's conservative Roman-Catholic subtext about the dead end delinquent road of hedonistic hippie liberalism is especially prominent during these scenes and it is especially effective that he was able to utilize Viva – a lapsed member of the same faith – for these scenes. Like the director's later "Paul Morrissey Trilogy" (Trash, Flesh, Heat), Lonesome Cowboys is an anti-erotic work disguised as a zany avant-garde sex comedy, as one would be hardpressed to find anything remotely arousing about these films, even with all the close-ups of trot out genitalia. As Viva states in Lonesome Cowboys, "What's more important; my hymen or your money?" Judging by the relative monetary success of the film, grossing $35,000.00-$40,000.00 during its first week of being screened with only $9000.00 on advertising, Warhol's money was discernibly more important than Viva's cheaply brandished hymen (or lack thereof).

LONESOME COWBOYS

Although taking credit for directing (as well as acting as the producer, editor, and cinematographer) Lonesome Cowboys, Paul Morrissey does not think highly of the film, stating, "I feel it's too silly. It was a real exception, the first film I thought would be a production of sorts...I had this idea of doing Romeo and Juliet with groups of cowboys and cowgirls. But no girls came because they had a quarrel with Viva. We made the film over a Friday morning, Saturday and Sunday morning." And indeed, Lonesome Cowboys has the unmistakable feel of a film that was made over a weekend without any sort of serious preproduction planning. As Morrissey and David Bourdon noted, Warhol superstars Brigid Berlin and Ondine were also supposed to appear in Lonesome Cowboys but Viva's trouncing egomania prevented that. In fact, despite her rather unremarkable appearance, Viva even manages to upstage Joe Dallesandro in Lonesome Cowboys, which is no small accomplishment considering Little Joe's always commanding screen presence in virtually every other film he starred in. Featuring outlaw ballet that "builds up the buns," macho men in mascara, overextended homoerotic wrestling matches between Little Joe cowboy and the wild boyz, and probably one of the most banal and seemingly unending rape scenes ever filmed in cinema history, Lonesome Cowboys is a curiously camp spoof of America's most beloved male genre. Despite being an absurd spoof of the Western film formula, Lonesome Cowboys is probably a truer expression of the real-life John Wayne – a draft-dodger who apparently enjoyed dressing in drag – than any of the classic Hollywood John Ford films he starred in. During the film, a character pompously states, "Little Joe was an altar boy, and we all know what happens to altar boys when they grow up." In Lonesome Cowboys, they ride gayly off into the sunset with one another plagued to a lifetime of homoerotic aimlessness, leaving a bodacious bitch-in-heat cold as she dreams idiotically about the prospect of mutual martyrdom via suicide pact. Needless to say, Lonesome Cowboys – a film where boys-will-do-boys and girls-want-to-be-boys – features none of the harrowing romanticism of Shakespeare.

-Ty E

BROKEBACK MOUNTAIN
BROKEBACK MOUNTAIN

Ang Lee (2005)

Brokeback Mountain may be Hollywood's greatest assault against rural America. Turning the manly cowboy gay is the ultimate blasphemy against redneck masculinity. Hollywood was more subtle about this in 1969 with the release of Midnight Cowboy. Now Hollywood has the audacity to show Donnie Darko getting sodomized in a shitty tent. Taiwanese director Ang Lee lends his aesthetic talents to Brokeback Mountain. Having chosen Lee as the director was another good "move" by Hollywood to legitimize the diversity of the film. I couldn't even pay attention to five minutes of Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon. Brokeback Mountain is driven by its gayness. Otherwise the film would be considered a fairly boring love story. After watching the film, one question remains: Were the cowboys really gay? Of course they threw darts back and forth but they enjoyed some ladies. Jack Twist was obviously really gay as he was the receiver. Ennis del Mar had himself a couple of ladies. Throughout Brokeback Mountain he was fighting his gayness. I don't think he won. Both of the cowboys were really bisexual. The truth is Brokeback Mountain is one of the better Hollywood movies to out in the past couple of years. The piece of trash Crash beat Brokeback Mountain for Best Picture at the 78th Academy Awards. Both films are cultural Marxist propaganda set on social deconstruction of America (which for the most part has already been achieved). Brokeback Mountain at least was a decent film. Crash was just another lame and unrealistic look at "multicultural" America. Director Paul Haggis is in dire need of having someone excrement on the top of his shiny evil head. I decided to rewatch Brokeback Mountain after the recent death of Heath Ledger. I wonder if he will be immortalized like James Dean. It makes me wonder if Hollywood kills its stars to guarantee never ending franchises. I know Marilyn Monroe, Elvis, and James Dean have made them a hefty sum. Soon you will see gay cowboy Heath Ledger action figures. What else would you expect from Hollywood?

-Ty E

VIVA

Anna Biller (2007)

Admittedly, I find virtually all sexploitation and skin flicks, especially those from the 1960s and 1970s, to be rather dull, but then again, I have never really needed masturbation aids – movie or otherwise – so naturally I was more than a tad bit skeptical about the postmodern retro feminist flick Viva (2007); a superficially sexy satire of the sexual revolution written, directed, and starring lady auteur Anna Biller (The Hypnotist, A Visit from the Incubus). Although inspired by wild and wacky (at least, for that rather tame zeitgeist) films like Luis Buñuel's Belle de Jour (1967), Herschell Gordon Lewis' Suburban Roulette (1968), and Radley Metzger's Camille 2000 (1969), Biller cites vintage issues of Playboy Magazine as the main aesthetic and cultural influence for Viva; a true 'auteur piece' where the director was literally involved in every facet of the filmmaking process, including casting, designing/sewing the wardrobes, painting the sets, and completely baring her body for a variety of filmic perverts; both male and female and young and old. Shot on luscious 35mm film stock, Viva features a kaleidoscope of sensual colors that – for better or worse – marvelously mimics the poorly aged films it pays peculiarly potent 'anti-tribute' to. As for her interest in exploitation cinema – a seeming contradiction for a purported feminist filmmaker – Biller stated in an interview, "I noticed that a lot of the 60's exploitation films were about women undergoing sexual trials, and although they were created for the prurient viewing pleasure of men, they are stories about women and what women go through. So the genre really interested me because of that." Centering on a naïve suburban housewife stereotypically named Barbi (but going against the grain in terms of casting since Biller, who plays the lead role, is half-Japanese by ancestry and certainly no blonde bombshell blow-up doll), Viva follows a girl in a quaint 'sexually liberated' world of antagonistic authoritarian nudists, bourgeois prostitutes, hysterical hippie manipulators, seemingly gay British rapists, softcore orgy armies, lesbian race-mixers, and homo hairstylists, among various other flaming sexual creatures. A scantily clad scapegoat of the so-called 'women's liberation' period, Barbi (alias Viva) unwittingly becomes the pretty plaything of various pernicious perverts who have a propensity for eating up fresh human meat; both literally and figuratively. As narrated in the introduction of the film, Viva: "is a story about a housewife during the sexual revolution. The time is 1972... The place is Los Angeles. ..And the people...ordinary."

In the beginning of Viva, Barbi (Anna Biller) has a rather sedentary and relaxed lifestyle, which she seems to be getting bored with, especially when comparing it to the colorful and carnal contrived worlds she fantasizes about while reading her favorite magazines. After losing her job upon rejecting a 'promotion' via unwanted penetration from her sleazy and greasy blob of a boss, Anna is virtually imprisoned in her own home. Not long after, she has a verbal fight with her virtual Ken doll of a husband Mark (Jared Sanford), so after being brainwashed by her bimbo blonde neighbor Sheila (Bridget Brno) about the lecherous 'liberating' qualities of 'women's lib,' Barbi and her gorgeous gal pal hit the streets without their brassieres, thereupon shooting for maximum sex appeal. Barbi becomes vivacious "Viva"; an intrinsically ignorant girl lost in a world of predatory pervert beatnik bastards and dirty yet would-be-dapper old men. Pimped out by an old Madame named Mrs. James (Carole Balkan) who claims that she can find her Mr. Right – a sensitive and sexually satisfying guy sired by the sexual revolution – Viva faces daunting disappointment after disappointment, ranging from braggart burnouts in bohemia to less than fresh "British Invaders" who need not ask permission to plow her plush puss. Needless to say, the swinging seventies are not as sexy and savory as she hoped they would be, but Viva never gives up or shuts up, thereupon learning the trick of the trade in the fine art of flesh-peddling. After hooking up with a hyper-hedonistic hippie nudist folk singer named Elmer (Paolo Davanzo) who manhandles her within minutes, Viva realizes she hates this horny humanist of a hanky-panky hustler and goes to her Madame to find a new man, thus leading to a two-sided ménage à trios of sorts. While entering a doomed domestic relationship with a degenerate hack of a puffery-inclined pop-artist named Clyde (Marcus DeAnda), she refuses to engage in explicit eroticism with the arrogant 'artiste' and instead learns carnal knowledge from a busy black girl name Agnes (Robbin Ryan) in this tragicomic episode of Biller's virtual take on Three's Company. After a while Clyde decides he no longer wants to be a cuckold whose girlfriend prefers cunt to his cock, so he drugs Viva at an orgy with some unmentioned psychedelic substance, thereupon leading to a date rape of sorts where the frigid lady finally has her first vaginal orgasm. Finally experiencing strength through joy as a virtual 'sexual goddess' who was 'wanted' and 'worshiped,' Viva is finally ready to go back to suburbia, thus becoming "Barbi" again with the intent of reuniting with her blond beast beau Mark. Unfortunately, Viva's friend Sheila's sleaze-bag husband Rick (Chad England) – a grotesque actor with a fierce fondness for much fresher flesh – wants a piece of the light-brown babe's body. Can Barbi resist Rick's rabid rapist wit and stay married to Mark?!?

VIVA

An epic of the reflective retrograde erotic, I was admittedly quite surprised that I made it through Viva and – dare I say – enjoyed it! In fact, as someone who adamantly despises masturbatory porno flicks like Quentin Tarantino and Robert Rodriguez's anti-climatic dual-jerk-off double-feature Grindhouse (2007), Viva makes for an aesthetically and thematically vibrant exception. Instead of adding contrived scratch marks to her film like perennial fanboy and transparent faker Tarantino did with Grindhouse, Biller – who actually has an appreciation for rich celluloid and melodramatic nuance – opted for reproducing the tantalizing technicolor of the mostly inferior films she pays slightly ambivalent tribute to. While Viva would probably work better at 90 minutes as opposed to its official 120 minute running length, the absurdly sassy celluloid work still manages to keep a plainly pleasant pace that never wallows too far into redundancy (although, I cannot say I was a fan of the over fluffy burlesque dance numbers!). A 102-minute R-rated version of Viva also exists, but I cannot imagine why considering the unrated version of the film I saw shows nothing more risqué than a couple bushy 1970-style beavers and a nudist cocktail of limp cocks. For those looking for cheap titillation and double-penetration, Viva will probably be a brooding bore, even if features more flesh than virtually all of Russ Meyer and Herschell Gordon Lewis' skin flicks combined. Ultimately, Viva is a charmingly campy vision of a less than furious feminist auteur filmmaker's idea of a world that is neither dystopian nor utopian, but something more akin to a ridiculous hyper-reality in vaguely postmodern softcore pessimist form. As director Anna Biller stated at the beginning of her official 'director's statement': "In the film VIVA, I am reworking old sexploitation movies from the 60's and early 70's, from a woman's point of view. Vintage sexploitation films interest me because they revolve around fantasies of a woman's power over the male, her beauty, her desirability, her sex appeal. The idea was to make a movie that seems like a sexploitation movie, and that offers up all the spectacle and lurid promise of that genre, while at the same time talking about what women really go through, their fantasies and sexual trials." Ultimately, a good orgasm (elegantly accentuated by Biller's bold and bloody animation) is all Viva needs to dissolve her debilitating discontent. I guess in the postmodern post-sexual revolution/women's lib world that is the only thing a girl can ask for as hubby is no longer the only one paying all the bills. For more info on Viva, checkout: www.culpepics.com

-Ty E

THE FIGHTER
THE FIGHTER

Anthony Maharaj (1989)

It is so easy to pass a movie off as shit and it be ignored by the general population. Many films do deserve this label but there are some films that are indeed bad but still entertaining. Not this myth of "B Movies". To me, B Movies don't exist. There is a fine line between serious work and silly work. You can call Evil Dead 2 a B Movie, but this is a false, pretentious label that does nothing but belittle the intentions of the director. Nowadays, directors don't even try. Horror comedies are popping up everywhere, being bred like rabbits. The Fighter is a really bad action/martial arts directed by Anthony Maharaj who is an unknown, shitty director who made a couple of shitty action films but none didn't compare to this. The Fighter (Kick Fighter) is a story about Ryan Travers. A thick headed street smart 9 year old kid played by a 37 year old man. Yeah, i know. It gets better though. In a horrible scene, he kills a man over a game of street dice. Therefore, he is sent to jail and we get him screaming while a whole bunch of dirty Thai's hold his shoulder in a shitty scene that almost was as awkward as it's cousin in The Life Aquatic. Ten years or so later, Ryan Travers is exactly the same size, but wearing tighter clothes just to exaggerate his "maturity". His family was murdered by the mob but the time of this is really certain. Other than that, this tragedy doesn't really effect the story but anyways. When he gets out of jail, he meets up with his bombshell sister and Viet-servant aptly named Tien who participates in "cock fights" on the streets. Because of this, he is murdered and the police just...forget about him. He works at a shipyard welding for small change to pay for his sisters conveniently timed heart problem. After a while, he discovers she needs open heart surgery and upon a discovery of a street fight, he gets offered 10000 baht to fight. Of course he is brimming with foreign patriotism and kicks the Filipinos ass. Thus through painful filler scenes, he gets an alcoholic Australian agent. Ryan then fights an extremely ugly guy for 10 minutes. Seriously, this guy is fucking disgusting. After this, he fights a gimp kick boxer and a couple more extremely interesting characters until some drama from the mob comes around. Basically he starts hard core fighting to save her life then she gets kidnapped and it is a shitty loophole. End of plot. Did i mention he had an Asian whore who was important to him but was also erased from the script? "KEKEKEKEKEKE" What worked the most was the fighting. This film had incredibly real fighting and i appreciated that greatly. Benny "The Jet" Urquidez plays the "last boss" of this film and i must say, he terrifies me. That man has the score of 56-1-1 and has never lost. The man is a kickboxing god and has 9 black belts in different martial arts. Ouch. Richard Norton plays Ryan Travers and...does..well, a pretty horrible job. He lacks charisma and acting skills, but still does entertain the fuck out of me with his naivety. The one actor i really did love was Traver's best friend and to be totally honest, i have no idea who he was. Information on this film is far and between. This film can be analyzed and dismissed as shit, or you can sit back and enjoy the fuck out of this film like i did. I wouldn't go and buy this for over 10 dollars but it is definitely worth a view if you like your action cheese. The Fighter is a realistic street brawling movie with shitty characters, shitty dialogue and shitty everything but don't let this stop you from having fun.

-Maq

CONTROL CONTROL

Anton Corbijn (2007)

On the eve of his band's first American tour, Joy Division singer Ian Curtis hung himself shortly after watching Werner Herzog's classic German film Stroszek. Maybe the film made Curtis feel even more pessimistic about life, with the possibility of failure in America (just as the protagonists of Stroszek ultimately failed) looming closely over his haunted head. Of course, any serious Joy Division fans knows that Ian Curtis's suicide was a longtime in the making. The lyrics Curtis wrote for his innovating band are truly an expressions of a "dead soul (also the name of a popular JD song)." With each new Joy Division album, the sound and lyrics of the band would parallel Ian Curtis's further psychological escape into introversion and all-around reclusive behavior, eventually resulting in his own self-prophesized suicide. When I found out that Hollywood completed a film entitled Control (2007) about Joy Division and the brief life of poetic singer Ian Curtis, I could not help but cringe. After all, the director of Control, Anton Corbijn, is best known for directing music videos, not to mention the fact that the film was distributed by The Weinstein Company. After reluctantly watching Control, I can report that the film was not nearly as bad as it could have been, but it is no masterpiece either.

The first thing I noticed about Control is that it was pretentiously shot in black-and-white. Joy Division certainly was not a 'colorful' group, so I assume that the director was going for a gloomy aesthetic. Virtually all (if not all) of the artwork featured on Joy Division album covers are also in black-and-white (with shades of gray), certainly complimenting the group's somber music and mournful lyrics. During his early grammar school years, Ian Curtis was recognized for his talent in poetry, even earning a scholarship at the age of 11 for the prestigious The King's School in Macclesfield, Cheshire, England. Although a talented wordsmith, Ian Curtis was not a serious student and never went onto a university. In Control, the film begins during the end of Curtis's high school days, showing a young man that could never successfully adapt to adulthood. It also becomes apparent in the film that the root of Ian Curtis's creative talents were also intertwined with the deterioration of his psyche. Not only did Ian Curtis suffer from crippling depression and overall psychological misery; he also suffered from epileptic seizures. In fact, as exhibited in Control, Ian Curtis would sometimes have an epileptic seizures during Joy Division performances, in which many people would mistake for his unconventional dance routines. Ian Curtis even wrote a song, She's Lost Control, about a girl that he knew (he was a civil servant that helped handicapped people acquire jobs) that had epilepsy. Curtis later called the girl to find out how her new job was going and was horrified when he heard that she died. Contrary to how it is chronologically portrayed in Control, Ian Curtis did find out that he had epilepsy until after he wrote the lyrics to the song She's Lost Control. For a man that constantly saw death surrounding him, it must have been a nightmarish experience for Ian Curtis when he was diagnosed with epilepsy, only shortly after finding out a young girl he knew unexpectedly died from it.

Joy Division named themselves after a fictional Nazi-run brothel of Jewish sex slaves featured in the 1955 novella The House of Dolls written by Israeli author Yehiel De-Nur. In fact, the first Joy Division EP An Ideal for Living featured a drawing of a Hitler Youth member on the cover. Due to the band's name and Nazi imagery, people were speculative about Joy Division's dubious political affiliations. Jewish psychoanalyst Eric Fromm described fascists as people that were consumed by the death-drive and "in love with corpses." Although the quack propagandist theory that Nazis were driven by the desire to die and once again become inanimate is preposterous (to say the least), there is no doubt in my mind that Ian Curtis was driven by the urge to die. As depicted in Control, the better his personal and financial life got, the more worse off Ian Curtis became both mentally and physically. Despite having a wife and beautiful child, Curtis could no live up to being a family man, eventually starting another relationship with a woman from Belgium. Ian Curtis also could not deal with the success of Joy Division, killing himself on the eve of his first American tour and before the album Closer (1980) and the single "Love Will Tear Us Apart" were released, the group's highest charting releases.

Control is not the first film to characterize the rise and demise of Joy Division. The hyper-cynical film 24 Hour Party People (2002) portrays the death of Ian Curtis as some type of bad English comedy skit. Although Control does a better job interpreting the history of Joy Division and the life of Ian Curtis, it still left me with the feeling that I was cheated out of the definitive Joy Division film. Control is comparable to Oliver Stone's The Doors, as both films are essentially like feature-length music videos that only manage to pay musical tribute to the subjects they portray, but are lacking in depth and substance when it comes to telling the 'real' story behind band. Although he praised the film, Joy Division drummer Stephen Morris remarked regarding Control, "None of it's true really" but somewhat justified the film's inaccuracies by stating, "The truth is boring." After re-watching Control a second time last night, I found it much more boring when comparing it to my initial viewing of the film. Still, the film has some intrinsic value in that offers a good introduction for Joy Division's novices and forthcoming generations of fans.

-Ty E

LA CABINA
LA CABINA

Antonio Mercero (1972) Every once in a blue moon, I come across a fickle little oddity. It might reside in a Japanese pinku film or a Russian surrealists vision. This time, it took the disguise of a Television produced Spanish short. Something of a spurious episode of The Twilight Zone; La Cabina is a whole new nightmare for a mind washed audience. No wear and tear on this mean short. This film was created for one thing and one thing only - a campaign of relentless fear to rip through paranoid peoples minds.

Plot line: A man gets trapped in a telephone booth. Onlookers gather at the hilarity of the situation. Things escalate quickly when the man realizes that something is at work that happens to be unexplainable. The tension scintillates at a fierce exponential rate and the clock doesn't stop ticking. What could have been a mundane character, due to the lack of intimacy with the camera, is transformed into one that bears a more sympathetic persona of which is forced to see the world, albeit confined to a tight, claustrophobic space.

After viewing this short without subtitles, I fear that I may have missed something consequential to our characters outcome or perhaps even a greater understanding at the inanimate menace at large. Great ties seem to have been used to forge the almost similar bizarro novel from auteur Carlton Mellick III entitled The Menstruating Mall, in which several people get trapped inside of a mall and cannot leave for some particular reason that is later revealed.

The humans who are featured - other than our forlorn protagonist - are depicted as biased and cruel monster's dedicated to humiliating each others. Among these spectators is where mankind's horrific natures bleed through like wine to cotton. Lurching men steal food from atop a merchant's head. Services are offered to the crowd as this horrible debacle is morphed into a sideshow of freaks staring at what they believe is the main attraction, but alas, the pot is calling the kettle black.

Strictly horrifying and mesmerizing, these 35 minutes have left me marked. I never will stare at a telephone booth with a proud feeling of societal partnership. This film succeeded in making me paranoid at even the most common form of community services. Never again will I doubt a TV production for being "unoriginal" or "a waste of monetary resources", and never again will I be plagued by so much fear. The Emmy speaks for itself.

-mAQ

TOWERS OPEN FIRE

Antony Balch (1963)

In terms of cinematic works that come closest to encapsulating alpha-Beat writer William S. Burroughs' oftentimes discordant, formless, and innately anarchic literary style, you probably cannot do better than the short films of British auteur Antony Balch (Secrets of Sex aka Bizarre, Horror Hospital), who collaborated with the yank junky writer on a couple experimental shorts during the 1960s and was even originally supposed to direct a feature-length adaptation of Naked Lunch (1959) starring Mick Jagger, but rather unfortunately, fate had different plans. With his first major cinematic collaboration with Burroughs, Towers Open Fire (1964), Balch was the first person in the world to introduce the novelist's 'cut-up technique' to cinema, so at least in that regard, this less than 10 minute long avant-garde short is a cinematically revolutionary work, if only a minor one that will probably baffle most cinephiles. Shot between 1961 and 1962 in Paris and Gibraltar, Towers Open Fire premiered at the London Pullman Cinema in 1966 alongside Tod Browning's Freaks (1932) of all films (actually, Balch, who was originally a film distributor, is the man responsible for getting the ban lifted off of Freaks in the UK). Although the short is a mostly incoherent work of cut-up metacinema set in a predictably Burroughs-esque dystopian world, it is mandatory viewing for fans of Burroughs, who not only stars in the film, but says some ironically 'racist' things, gives a very quick demonstration on how to do a 'cut-up,' wanders around while smoking fags as if he is cruising for young fags, shoots some junk, and becomes the victim of an orgasm attack, among other delightfully decadent things. Naturally, the short also features footage of avant-garde painter Brion Gysin's dreamachine invention. Gysin, who introduced Burroughs to the cut-up technique (which was originally utilized by Dadaist artists), came up with the idea for a 'drugless high' of sorts via a stroboscopic flicker effect that creates visual stimuli, with the dreamachine ultimately being the invention he created to achieve this pseudo-psychedelic effect. Beginning with a seemingly unrelated image of director Antony Balch's lifelong hero Bela Lugosi, Towers Open Fire is a short but sweet trip of the apocalyptic sort that demonstrates why the largely forgotten filmmaker would have probably made for a more apt director for adapting Naked Lunch than David Cronenberg.

After seeing a picture of Bela Lugosi looking typically eccentrically sinister, the viewer is treated to a delightful little monologue by William S. Burroughs, who sardonically states in his typically monotone fashion: "Kid—what are you doing over there with the niggers and the apes? Why don't you straighten out and act like a white man? After all, they're only human cattle, you know that yourself. I hate to see a bright young man fuck up and get off on the wrong track — sure it happens to all of us one time or another. Why the man who went on to invent Shitola was sitting right where you're sitting now twenty-five years ago when I was saying the same thing to him — Well, he straightened out same as you're going to straighten out. You can't deny your blood kid — You're white, white, white — And you can't walk out on life times change there's just no place to go." Notably, Burrough's little monologue was taken from his cut-up novel The Soft Machine (1961) and it reminded me why the writer's most racially-charged writing tends to be his most hilarious. The excerpt from The Soft Machine is juxtaposed with a headshot of Burroughs, who looks like a half-artistic WASP degenerate, which was more or less what the novelist was, but that is also what makes him so interesting, as a man who more or less embodied Spengler's theory of decline (after all, Burroughs' grandfather was a pioneer who invented the adding machine, yet Burroughs himself invented the 'word virus' and shot his wife in the head, among countless other things).

TOWERS OPEN FIRE

In the next scene, Burroughs appears as the head of a corporate board meeting and by the end of the film, all the board members will be vaporized into oblivion, as if the novelist infiltrated their little group solely so he could destroy them (of course, this is a rather typical Burroughs fantasy). Juxtaposing images of exotic masks that resemble something out of a Steven N. Arnold film (The Liberation of the Mannique Mechanique, Luminous Procuress), a guy masturbating in bed, as well as countless grimy film reel canisters, to the less than soothing sounds of Burroughs mumbling gibberish (apparently, these noisy sound clips were recorded on a cheap Grundig tape recorder), the short gives off a feeling of oppressive audio/visual overload, as if the viewer is being forced to endure the junky queer novelist's various neuroses. After demonstrating the cut-up technique via a newspaper, the film features a crude cut-up montage of Burrough's walking around and spouting nonsense, as if he is a disgruntled old man who cannot think of anything practical to complain about. As demonstrated by a quick shot of a newspaper headline reading "Stock Exchange Suspend Dealings," Towers Open Fire depicts a materialistic society on the brink of collapse and naturally Burroughs is quite excited by the prospect, as demonstrated by the fact that he begins waging a lone-wolf war via aesthetic terrorism (i.e. cut-up sound recordings). After a scene featuring Burroughs hanging out at a zoo and checking out some large birds, the novelist discusses the dreamachine while young wild boys get high off the flickering light. In between shots of spinning dreamachines, Burroughs shoots some junk into his arm, as it would not be a Burroughs flick without someone shoving a needle into their flesh. In one of the most climatic scenes of the film, Burroughs, who is in military fatigues (including a gas mask), shows up at a dilapidated old house and proceeds to shoot ping pong balls at old family photos, thus causing people to magically evaporate outside on the street. Indeed, in the end, civilization as we know it ends and everyone evaporates, except a Wild Boy and the Führer of the Wild Boys, Burroughs, who is featured in the final scene waving his ping-pong gun in a shockingly militant fashion, as if the writer somehow managed to develop a deep sense of testicular fortitude after wiping out humanity.

Featuring Moroccan music (which was apparently recorded by Brion Gysin), shameless Bela Lugosi fanboy worship, William S. Burroughs of all people telling the viewer how to be a white man, and a small storm of incoherent cut-up degeneracy, Towers Open Fire is certainly a curious little slice of celluloid insanity that barely gives any sort of hint regarding what kind of filmmaker Antony Balch would eventually evolve into (he is best known nowadays for his campy horror-comedy Horror Hospital (1973)). Balch and Burroughs would collaborate on a couple more shorts films, including Guerrilla Conditions (uncompleted), The Cut-Ups (1967), Bill and Tony aka Who's Who (1972), as well as two posthumously released works, William Buys a Parrott (1963) and Ghosts at Number 9 (2005) aka Ghosts at Number 9 (paris), but I have to admit that Towers Open Fire is easily my favorite, as a work that, somewhat strangely, seems to have infinite replay value. Like the out-of-control celluloid monster of a mad cinematic scientist, the short ultimately demonstrated to me that the whole cut-up technique seems more effective in film as opposed to novel form. As someone who has personally attempted to endure some of Burroughs' cut-up novels and was rather disappointed (to say the least!), Towers Open Fire proved to me that the technique is more than just a pretentious gimmick used by a junky with a confused opium-addled mind who lacks the mental coherence to write anything even remotely linear. In Balch's short, the technique ultimately creates a sort of apocalyptic poetry that, if nothing else, would make for great recruitment material for prospective Wild Boys.

-Ty E

SECRETS OF SEX
SECRETS OF SEX

Antony Balch (1970)

