Ultimately, Spike of Bensonhurst is an atypically ‘light-hearted’ and sometimes sentimental comedy by the almost exclusively sardonic Paul Morrissey with a positive message about the power and importance of family, even if they happen to be of the criminally-inclined and verbally/physically abusive kind. That being said, Spike of Bensonhurst is no less socio-politically astute than Morrissey’s previous works, but even more so as expressed by the film’s clever depiction of mafia-politician and Italian-Jewish political ties, thus beating Hollywood at their own cryptic-comedy game (e.g. American Pie series, Harold & Kumar Go to White Castle). Featuring a colorful cast of characters that would foretell the spoiled Guido cretinism as depicted by the real-life dumbass Dagos of the pathetically popular MTV reality show Jersey Shore (2009-present), Spike of Bensonhurst – although a satirically jovial work with rather ridiculous scenarios – offers a very true portrait of an America (criminal) political force that is not often seen by the WASP majority. Personally, as someone who attended college with the sort of overindulged, monetarily posh yet culturally uncultivated

SPIKE OF BENSONHURST

Italian-Americans featured in Spike of Bensonhurst and that are akin to puerile pretty boy Spike, are only a kickback away from total barbarism, but that is what the American dream is all about; going from rags to riches by any means possible – be it violent criminality or being a big enough putz to actually work hard for your earnings. Instead of starting a career pirating hardcore pornography as suggested by his Sicilian spiritual father Mr. Cacetti, Spike opts for a more honest, hardworking, blue-collar career as New York's finest; a true blue man in blue. I like to think that the character of Spike – a man who brought order to America's urban third world – holds a special place in Paul Morrissey's iron Roman Catholic heart.

VERUSCHKA: A LIFE FOR THE CAMERA

Paul Morrissey (2005)

Like a lot of guys, I have never understood the appeal of runaway and fashion models as I am not attracted to women that are only a couple inches shorter than me and lack an ass and tits (indeed, I can proudly say without exaggeration that my girlfriend has a delectably large and shapely derrière that goes perfectly with her equally immaculate true hourglass shape and nice and firm busty bosoms), but then again I am not a fag or a woman like most people that work in and/or follow fashion. Indeed, I am convinced that the homos that run the fashion industry are interested in tall beam-shaped women because they remind them of awkward and gawky teenage boys, but I digress. I must admit that there is at least one famous supermodel that I respect and my interest in her is completely accidental and purely the result of the fact that she just happened to be in a number of classic European arthouse works that I have seen over the past decade or so. Indeed, Prussian-born supermodel turned actress turned artist Veruschka von Lehndorff (real name 'Vera Gottliebe Anna Gräfin von Lehndorff-Steinort') has lived a totally unbelievable stranger-than-fiction life that is more melodramatic than the starkest and most tragic of Sirkian and Harlanian melodramas, or as the almost lethally lanky and alien-like diva stated herself, "My story seems like a horrible fairytale." Indeed, this is one of the many confessions that Veruschka makes in the documentary Veruschka - Die Inszenierung (m)eines Körpers (2005) aka Veruschka: A Life for the Camera, which is notable for being the first film that lapsed Warhol superstar auteur Paul Morrissey had directed in almost twenty years since he released his classic Guido comedy Spike of Bensonhurst (1988) starring Hebraic philistine Sasha Mitchell (the filmmaker would also direct the impossible-to-find feature News from Nowhere (2010) five years later after the release of the doc). Co-directed by the eponymous star's friend and sometimes photographer Bernd Böhm, the doc tells the uniquely unbelievable story about how Veruschka went from a homeless aristocrat interned in a concentration camp at the age of five after her Count father was executed for his involvement as a resistance fighter connected to the 20 July 1944 plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler to becoming arguably the most famous and prolific supermodel in all of human history. Although I cannot say that I was all that surprised to learn these things as someone that has seen her esoterically autobiographical work Veruschka - poesia di una donna (1971) directed by her then-boyfriend Franco Rubartelli and her pleasantly preposterous performance in drag as the titular character in Ulrike Ottinger's Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press, Morrissey's particularly provocative collage-like doc—a film that is notable for featuring excerpts taken straight from new restored 35mm prints of Rubartelli's Veruschka and Ottinger's Dorian Gray, as well as various other insanely rare cinematic works and documents—reveals Veruschka to be a haunted and guilt-ridden woman who finds it to be quite therapeutic to hide behind various self-created personas and who is still just a “timid little girl” who has yet to get over the brutal murder of the father that she barely got to know. Indeed, Veruschka might be an insanely famous and wealthy supermodel who still models despite being well over three times the age of the average model, but she is also a barren woman who, unlike her sisters, never got married or had children and seems to suffer from a perennial state of loneliness that no amount of fame or fortune could compensate for. As the doc ultimately demonstrates, Veruschka is androgynous Nordic Aryan beauty at its most tragically and malignantly melancholy and forlorn and I would argue that, in terms of her background as someone whose aristocratic father was executed by the Nazis and strikingly statuesque yet perennially sad appearance, she is symbolic of the present state of Germany, which has become a fatherless Fatherland.

As revealed at the beginning of Veruschka: A Life for the Camera, Veruschka had graced over 800 magazine covers by 1970, but the last thing the supermodel ever thought about herself was that she was beautiful as she has dealt with self-loathing ever since she was a young child. Indeed, by the time she was a teen, Veruschka was extremely self-conscious about her inordinately tall and lanky frame and especially large feet and dreamed of looking like her sister Marie Eleanore “Nona,” who would eventually marry Richard Wagner’s great-grandson Wieland Wagner. Ironically, she was a chubby baby, or as she states of herself in the doc, “I was the second child, a chubby Caucasian baby in a palace, the only time in my life that I was really fat.” Veruschka was born on 14 May 1939 in Steinort in East Prussia at a 6,000-acre castle estate that had been in her old aristocratic family for centuries (although the baroque castle was built in 1689, the family had owned the land since the year 1400). Somewhat bizarrely, while her father was secretly working with the resistance, Nazi bigwig Joachim von Ribbentrop would be regularly hanging around Veruschka’s family castle where he would screen Nazi propaganda films and take propaganda photos with the supermodel and her siblings. In fact, Uncle Adolf’s headquarters, the Wolf’s Lair, was nearby Veruschka’s family castle just through the Masurian woods. Like many aristocrats that had originally supported National Socialism, Veruschka’s father eventually realized that the regime was run by mad men after seeing Jewish kids get liquidated on the Eastern Front and finding his complaints fell on deaf ears after complaining to a fellow Prussian aristocrat, field marshal Fedor von Bock, who was no fan of Hitler himself. Ultimately, Veruschka’s father stood trial before “the horrible Roland Freisler” and was sentenced to death and executed on September 18th 1944 at Plötzensee Prison where thousands of other members of the resistance were also executed. To add insult to injury, Veruschka’s mother was sent the bill for her husband’s execution. Due to her uniquely unpleasant childhood, Veruschka reflects regarding her early years of childhood innocence,

"I remember mostly the unpleasant, the idyllic I only know from photographs, where I laugh and seem happy on a swing with my father." As Veruschka explains regarding how the tragic death of her father impacted her for the rest of her life, "My father was one of thousands who lost their lives in the Resistance. The childish concept that I was to blame for the demise of my father befell me early and contributed much to the episodes of depression later."

While Veruschka's mother was imprisoned after her husband's execution and even members of her extended family were sent to concentration camps, all the family members survived and were reunited after the war, though they were left homeless and completely destitute. Naturally, the Nazis confiscated the family estate, which was soon overrun and taken over by the Soviets, who were notorious for deriving a special sense of sadistic glee when it came to stealing and destroying the property and possessions of the German aristocracy (while the von Lehndorff castle still stands today, it is more or less in ruins like much of former German territory in Eastern Europe). With her family left both penniless and homeless and lacking a patriarch (which is most certainly highly detrimental to any child), Veruschka ended up moving all around Germany while staying with various different family members, thus she ended up attending no less than thirteen different schools during her childhood that ranged from a small one-room schoolhouse to a Waldorf Institute. While she had an interest in dance, Veruschka's dream was to become a painter and, to the slight chagrin of her monetary-minded mother, she attended art school, but it was not long before she began being approached by photographers and began appearing in various magazines. Undoubtedly, Veruschka soon began to develop a sort of compensatory love and affection for modeling that her own real-life lacked as indicated by her remark, "A photo shoot is like a love triangle of the photographer, the camera and me. I imagine the camera to be a lover I am intensely flirting with." The first major photographer Veruschka worked with was Hollywood filmmaker Arthur Penn's brother Irving Penn, who was responsible for shooting her first cover for the American version of Vogue magazine. Naturally, the model was rather flattered when Salvador Dalí took a strong interest in her in the early 1960s and unwittingly taught her to view her body as a work of art when he worked with her. After appearing as herself in Michelangelo Antonioni's Blow-Up (1966), Veruschka's popularity completely blew up in the mainstream yellow press and she soon had many nicknames, including the "Naked Countess" in Germany and "Übermensch," "Frauleinwunder" and "Unucklabella" and abroad. Despite becoming rich and famous, Veruschka's blueblood family found her career choice to be "Really quite cheap" and "close to being a prostitute" because being a model was no way for any true noble woman to live.

As Veruschka explains regarding how her international fame began to negatively affect her psyche, "The problem starts, when you realize what it means to be a model. It concerns one to be such a fantasy figure that fools the people. Suddenly you are always expected to be perfect. People want to adore you and don't accept that you have weaknesses. Here lies the vicious circle." Over the years, Veruschka suffered various deep depressions and mental breakdowns, even attempting suicide and being brought to a mental institution in a strait-jacket at one point. Undoubtedly, Veruschka has a rather pessimistic and even morbid view of fashion and modeling as expressed in her remark, "Fashion and death are closely related, because fashion is made from death. Whatever today is fashion will be gone tomorrow. It happens every year and for a model it is not different in the fashion game. They come and go, every few years all the faces change." Luckily for Veruschka, her modeling career has still yet to end even though she is literally elderly. Assumedly as a result of some irrational guilt revolving around her tragic childhood, Veruschka also began to believe that she was "evil" because she believed she was culpable for "seducing" people with her work. Despite her rather delusional and neurotic view of herself, Veruschka does seem to be conscious of her greatest aesthetic strength as indicated by her rather accurate remark, "My melancholy expression is my trademark... a decadent sadness in the face almost always." Of course, the supermodel eventually got tired of modeling and decided that she wanted to cultivate herself into a serious and respectable artist even though it seemed impossible for a woman of her particular profession.

Indubitably, the fact that Veruschka had the gall to star in films and stage plays directed by German-Jewish lesbian avant-garde filmmaker Ulrike Ottinger (Freak Orlando, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia) in drag for next to nil money is more than enough evidence to demonstrate that she was truly serious about becoming a legitimate actress and artist, as appearing in such works, especially while dressed like a man, could only besmirch her seemingly unblemished career as an individual that was regarded by many as the most beautiful woman in the world. Indeed, in Ottinger's delightfully deranged dystopian epic Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press, Veruschka portrays a new sort of postmodern Dorian Gray who degenerates into a debauched gangster of the mass murdering sort as a result of becoming a popular celebrity and international playboy who is 'created' and eventually 'ruined' by an overtly evil media dictator of sorts with the fitting name Dr. Mabuse as portrayed by French diva Delphine Seyrig. Veruschka would also portray decadent proto-fascist poet Gabriele D'Annunzio in Ottinger's 1983 theatrical staging of Elfriede Jelinek's play Clara S. Arguably, Veruschka would become most artistically prolific when she hooked up with photographer Holger Trülzsch and began using her body as a canvas and turned herself into a sort of "living sculpture." Indeed, Veruschka would spend 10-12 hours a day just to paint her unclad body for photo shoots where she would camouflage herself in her surroundings to the point of blending in almost immaculately with everything from rocks to dilapidated wooden doors to dead trees. Apparently, blending into her surroundings and 'disappearing' was quite therapeutic for Ver-uschka, or as she explains, “We are horrified by it but for me impermanence is not horrible. It is rather liberating.” Notably, during the doc Veruschka proudly reads Susan Sontag’s description of her work with Trülzsch, which is described as reflecting, “...a desire to punish the self, dissolve the self into the world...to be stripped naked...to petrify the body and become matter.” Indeed, it seems the beautiful, rich, glamorous, and famous Veruschka would love nothing more than to disappear into oblivion.

Ever since the 2000s, Veruschka has been spending much of her time living in New York City where she apparently hangs out under the Brooklyn Bridge and creates art with people who have no idea who she really is, which she finds quite liberating. In fact, Veruschka directed a short film under the bridge entitled Buddha Bum and Burning City about hobos, who she describes as having a special affinity with. Probably due to the fact that she feels a kinship with him because they were both homeless aristocrats, Veruschka also developed an obsession with Buddha, stating during the doc, “We can all end up on the street in no time at all. Buddha was an aristocrat who became a beggar by choice.” Indeed, it almost seems as if Veruschka feels guilty over the fact that she is now wealthy after experiencing an impoverished childhood. It also seems that the supermodel has become disillusioned, as wealth (she was making $10,000 a day when she was at her peak!) did not help to fill the void she felt as she probably hoped it would, but instead made her feel all the more detached from life and other people. Of course, as a woman that says things like, “What fascinates me about transformation is the possibility...to change one’s skin, the illusion that one is detached from the self,” it is quite clear that Veruschka is a woman that feels comfortable portraying any and every other person (and animal or inanimate object!) aside from herself. Indeed, as part of her curious “Veruschka’s Noble Gangstas” photo shoot, the supermodel unequivocally proves that she is better at pantomiming the appearances and mannerisms of low-class negro criminals than moronic white rappers like Ruff Raff and other racially schizophrenic untermensch scum.

Rather fittingly, Veruschka: A Life for the Camera concludes with still photos of the eponymous subject’s father, mother, and herself as a child as it emphasizes the fact that the model is indubitably the tragically pulchritudinous person she is today as a direct result of her entire life being completely destroyed when she was only five when her daddy was executed and the entire family fortune was lost. Notably, Veruschka does not make a single reference to her love life or why she never opted to get married or have kids, but I certainly do not doubt that it is a direct result of the internal pain she was exposed to as a child as a girl who loses her father at such a critical age is bound to have troubled relationships with men when she grows up. It should be noted that gay icon and pornographer Peter Berlin (whose real name was ‘Armin Hagen Freiherr von Hoyningen-Huene’) came from a similar background to Veruschka as an aristocrat whose father was killed in the Second World War and whose family lost their estate and entire fortune. Of course, Berlin ended up just as lonely and screwed up as Veruschka as a gay man with no heirs and only memories of vain and narcissistic glories as a homo icon and pornographer. Undoubtedly both Veruschka and Berlin's tragic yet high-profile lives act as sort of allegories for the death of old Europa as fallen sons and daughters of the Teutonic nobility that were forced to make their livings on their appearances instead of living great lives as leaders of Europe. Instead, Germany is now ruled and governed by the same sort of largely degenerate and psychopathic democratic whore politicians that make up American politics.

I am not at all surprised that Veruschka has a morbid view of fashion and the visual arts in general, as she is well aware of the fact that her father's execution via hanging on piano wire attached to a meat hook was actually filmed for Hitler's viewing pleasure. Near the beginning of Veruschka: A Life for the Camera, the supermodel mentions how she somewhat recently finally visited the location of her father's execution where she almost instantly suffered a blackout as she felt a sort of ominous and foreboding force in the atmosphere. Since her father used to take her to a lake to collect stones as a child, Veruschka developed a lifelong obsession with rocks and stones that is quite prominent in her personal paintings and photography. In fact, Franco Rubartelli's Veruschka - poesia di una donna (1971) begins with the supermodel's carefully painted face completely camouflaged amongst various stones. Personally, I found Veruschka: A Life for the Camera exceedingly enjoyable as it confirmed many of my suspicions about Veruschka as someone that is a fan of her films with Rubartelli and Ottinger, which are works that gave me a feeling that the supermodel was a morbidly melancholic and weltschmerz-racked lost soul of the conspicuously accursed sort who, somewhat paradoxically, resents her fame just as much as she wallows in it. Of course, the doc also convinced me that Veruschka has probably come closer to any woman in human history in terms of transforming her body into a genuine work of art, which is certainly no small accomplishment considering that virtually all members of the fairer sex spend a good portion of their lives looking at themselves in mirrors and experimenting with makeup and fashion. Indeed, Veruschka may be a fallen member of the Prussian nobility, but there is no mistaking her blueblood pedigree, even when she is in blackface drag as an American negro gangster. While I consider myself one of Paul Morrissey's greatest fans, I have to admit that I consider Veruschka to be the true auteur of Veruschka: A Life for the Camera, as all the film's potency and charisma comes from the supermodel, whose particularly penetrating presence haunts the viewer long after the film is over. Of course, Morrissey has always had a talent for finding and directing strikingly attractive and preternaturally charismatic people for his films and it is no different with his documentary, which more or less unwittingly depicts the moral and cultural decline of the Occident from the perspective of a woman who is, quite symbolically, post-WWII Germany's most internationally famous aristocrat. Indeed, we certainly live in strange times when an elderly yet nonetheless still beautiful Prussian noblewoman sports blackface and pretends to be a young crotch-grabbing American negro thug.

FOREIGNERS OUT! SCHLINGENSIEFS CONTAINER

Paul Poet (2002)

Probably the most socially and meta-politically active filmmaker who has ever lived, eternal enfant terrible auteur Christoph Maria Schlingensiefel started his own labor union, political party (Chance 2000, Vote for Yourself), TV show shows (both real and imaginary), art action projects (one of which at the Documenta X exhibition in Kassel, Germany got him arrested for posting a sign that read “Kill Helmut Kohl!”), and even staged his own cancer experience (with the ‘ready made’ opera Mea culpa), but undoubtedly one of his most interesting public stunts was setting up a satirical Big Brother-like art project/television show titled Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container aka Ausländer raus! Schlingensiefel's Container in 2000 where he put twelve nonwhite asylum seekers in a mini makeshift concentration camp and members of the audience could vote who they wanted to be deported during his “Please Love Austria—First European Coalition Week” quasi-carny campaign. Showcased during the Wiener Festwochen (Vienna Festival) in an area next to a bourgeois Viennese opera that is frequented by art connoisseurs and tourists, Schlingensiefel set up the terribly trash show as a form of active protest and counter-agit-prop against the election of extreme-right politician Jörg Haider, then-leader of the Freedom Party of Austria (FPÖ), into the National Council of Austria. As a leader who made no lie of his disdain for foreigners and leaders of Austria’s Jewish community, as well as man who was vocally nostalgic for National Socialism and a friend/financial benefactor of certain bigwig Arab dictators, Jörg Haider was not your typical cosmopolitan globalist, prostitute-like politician; he inspired sanctions brought against his charming country by fourteen member nations of the European Union, and Western countries also temporarily relieved their ambassadors in protest, even inciting then-U.S. Secretary of State Madeline Albright – an American Jewess with a kosher bone to pick – to publically announce, “We are deeply concerned about the Freedom Party’s entry into the Austrian government...a party that does not clearly distance itself from the atrocities of the Nazi era and the politics of hate.” In the delightfully deranged documentary Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container (2002) directed by Paul Poet (Empire Me: New Worlds are Happening!), one gets to experience the realer-than-reality-TV flagrant furor of political philistines of both the left and right as they are antagonized by the always spirited and sardonic Schlingensiefel as he bodaciously blows smoke out of his trusty red bullhorn. Featuring post-game interviews with cultural critics, academics, members of the FPÖ, and – most importantly – Schlingensiefel himself, Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container makes for a socio-politically insightful work of postmodern vaudeville insanity – Big Brother Nazi Style!

As Schlingensiefel explains in the documentary, he got the idea for modern ‘concentration camp containers’ for Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container around the time he directed his absurdist action flick Terror 2000 - Intensivstation Deutschland (1994); a work that features crowded ausländer untermensch in what seems like the inside of cattle cars. Throughout the documentary Schlingensiefel antagonizes and ultimately confuses the audiences crowded around the containers, proclaimed that Austria is the, “Land of the Nazis. Land of the fascist. Here is Nazi central.” As he explains in one of the post-show interviews for Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container, he concurs that, “In some aspects this venture was swinish to the highest degree.” Indeed, whatever aberrant auteur filmmaker’s main objective with satirical campaign for “Foreigners Out—Artists against Human Rights,” he certainly managed to bring out the worst in people on both ends of the pseudo-dichotomous political spectrum. While inspiring hypocritical bleeding heart left-wingers to cry, “Foreigners In! Kick out the Krauts,” Schlingensiefel also managed to inspire joy and nostalgia in elderly old school Austrian National Socialists, even allowing a feeble old man – who can barely hold the bullhorn – to declare that all foreigners must be killed. As an academic explains in Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container, Schlingensiefel utilized a form of social criticism originated by ‘Austrian H.L. Mencken’ Karl Kraus where one need not comment to articulate a criticism, but instead merely cite what you criticize ‘as-is’ in the right context, thus highlighting the absurdity of their political mantras and causing them to figuratively hang themselves with their own rhetoric in the process. Controversial Austrian author and Nobel Prize winner Elfriede Jelinek (Wonderful, Wonderful Times, Lust) also lent her support to Schlingensiefel’s sarcastic social experiment, writing a childish puppet show for the foreigners to perform for adoring audiences. Like virtually any great modern Austrian film, actor/director Paulus Manker (Schmutz aka Dirt, Weininger's Last Night) makes an appearance in Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container as a guest speaker. Ultimately the genius of Schlingensiefel’s “Please Love Austria” campaign is getting people out of their houses into the streets like the good ol’ days of street fights between National Socialist and Communist groups during the 1920s/1930s. Unfortunately, one of the most vehement and violent people in Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container is a middle-aged woman whose blatantly aroused nipples are poking out of her shirt as she verbally assaults Schlingensiefel to a most vindictive degree, as if she is receiving some sort of much needed sexual release. Needless to say, Austria is starving for some modern brownshirts.

In the end, Schlingensiefel concluded that Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container was at least a partial flop due to what he described as the failure of “well-meaning leftist activists” to actually take action. Schlingensiefel also criticizes a speech by American theatre director Peter Sellars – a typically exceedingly effeminate left-winger who delivers an idiotically sentimental and impotent speech – for mentioning the ‘need’ for containers in NYC and Los Angeles, but not actually taking the initiative to setup such a gallant public spectacle. A female member of Schlingensief's crew also complains that passive, opportunistic left-wingers used Foreigners out! Schlingensiefs Container as a petty propaganda forum, thereupon diluting the objective of the TV show: bringing attention to the 'neo-nazi' political policies of Jörg Haider and the Freedom Party of Austria. Since the release of Foreigners out! Schlingensiefs Container, both Christoph Schlingensief and Jörg Haider have died, thus leaving a vast void in the German/Austrian media and public sphere. Schlingensief's antics in Foreigners out! Schlingensiefs Container were forever immortalized in popular Austrian crime-thriller Silentium (2004) directed by Wolfgang Murnberger where he plays himself as a wacky and intemperate director of oddball yet politically-charged plays. Whatever your political persuasion, one can learn a lot from Foreigners out! Schlingensiefs Container and Schlingensief's 'active-art' antics in general, as there is no doubt that it takes a certain type of integrity to get docile Westerners off their couch and into the street. That being said, maybe it's about time for David Duke to start an Occupy movement.

ALL DOGS GO TO HEAVEN

Paul Sabella (1996) Animated children's classic? or a film completely hidden by its outer shell to be realized for what it is? All Dogs Go To Heaven is an animated film about a dog named Charlie who had been framed for murder and was put on death row. Already not a film for kids. He then breaks out to meet up with his old partner-in-crime Carface. Note the antagonist. After meeting up at his old casino, he realizes it is rigged and takes up his share of the profits. Lifetime friend Itchy hears about Charlie's planned murder and tries to save him but it is too late. Charlie was murdered by this neo-gangster and was sent to Heaven. All Dogs Go To Heaven you see? Because unlike humans and their foul nature, a dog is incapable of committing an atrocious act upon the world. After a musical number involving the infallibility of god in a Dali inspired Heaven, Charlie steals back his watch (His life) and winds the clock back, proving god wrong and thrusting him back into the world. He surprises Itchy and plots to kill Carface. He stumbles upon a kidnapped orphan girl named Ann-Marie and brings her along due to her amazing ability to speak to animals. Using her sense to his advantage, he finds out the winners of races and places massive bets winning enough money to open his own bar. Many adventures await this gloomy trio in this animated film from hell. Now what makes this movie so inappropriate? There are many facets of this which prove to be not understood by kids but if grown up upon, could alter a sense of mind. To start off, this is a groundbreaking animated film. One simple reason. It takes the stereotype of an animated film being only for children and destroys it. This film is more of a neo-noir film with hints of surrealism and a satirical look at divinity in all forms. That, and its featuring of a homosexual singing alligator. Without all the subliminal content, the film is increasingly violent and nihilistic. Featuring scenes of murder, torture, and heavy scenes of smoking and intoxication.

Director Don Bluth really did a good job capturing the feel of the slums in this film. The quality of life seems so slow. It's very bleak and hard to keep a high spirit when you are constantly reminded of the poverty even for animals. Not only featuring an incredible heaven, but showing a terrifying hell. This is one of the most creepy scenes in an animated film. Comparable to the Satan scene in The Adventures Of Mark Twain. Not since the early Coffin Joe films has hell been captured vividly enough to terrify viewers. All Dogs Go To Heaven is a noir classic with enough violence and undertones to entertain any age group. This deserves the title of "Classic" and should be shown to your kids just to fuck them up a little bit.

Paul Schrader (1979)

Long before flaming homo Hebrew Joel Schumacher (Falling Down, The Lost Boys) expressed his fantasy of seeing Nicholas Cage and Joaquin Phoenix in a quasi-homoerotic relationship in his sleazy crime-thriller 8mm (1999)—the story of a private investigator who delves deep in the underworld of snuff films—screenwriter turned film auteur Paul Schrader (Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters, The Comfort of Strangers) directed Hardcore (1979), the almost gratuitously sleazy yet surprisingly spiritual celluloid tale of an extremely religious Calvinist businessman who enters the unhinged underworld of pornos, prostitutes, pimps, and snuff films in search of his missing daughter who was last seen in an amateur porn film with a twinkish homo hustler. A work rather similar to Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976), a work penned by Schrader, in its depiction of a sexually repressed outsider of the exceedingly lonely sort who enters a savage urban underworld with the noble intention of saving an underage girl from further moral and sexual degradation, Hardcore is assuredly one of the few and uncompromising films of its time in its relatively honest and politically incorrect depiction of the sort of degeneration of the body and soul that has plagued the West ever since the advent of the counter-culture movements and the sexual revolution, which guaranteed personal freedom of the self-indulgent and hedonist sort, but at the price of one's ancestral faith. Directed by a lapsed member of the Calvinist Christian Reformed Church who did not see his first movie until he was 17-years-old due to his rather strict and repressed upbringing, Hardcore also does not exactly give a flattering depiction of the religious community it portrays, so much so that the city of Grand Rapids, Michigan proclaimed that Schrader's work gave an "unfavorable depiction of middle America." More than anything, however, Hardcore demonstrates how impotent and ineffective religion is today in the face of a secular society addicted to sex and self-gratification of the needlessly and heedlessly nihilistic sort. Starring 'all-American' actor George C. Scott (Patton, Dr. Strangelove), a fellow who hated writer/director Paul Schrader so much that he threatened to quit the film and made the then-novice director promise he would never direct a film again (thankfully, he decided to break that promise), Hardcore is probably the only film ever made to demonstrate that sex is considered rather worthless and shallow for both stern Calvinists and debauched prostitutes.

Jake Van Dorn (George C. Scott) is a rather repressed yet successful divorced businessman of the Calvinist faith who works and prays hard, but has a hard time expressing emotions to his darling teenage daughter Kristen (Ilah Davis), who he alone raised. When Kristen disappears without a trace on a seemingly harmless church-sponsored trip to California, Jake wastes no time in hiring a private investigator named Andy Mast (Peter Boyle) after the police prove to be rather worthless in their search. Naturally, Jake becomes quite disgusted with Maſt's vulgarity, but the real sickening icing on the decadent cake comes when the private investigator turns up a gritty 8mm amateur porn flick entitled "Slaves of Love" featuring the Calvinist businessman's daughter in a variety of compromised sexual positions with a blond fag that looks like an anorexic version of Peter Berlin. Rather absurdly, Maſt has Jake unwitting view the porn flick with his little girl, which inspires the Calvinist to cry out, "Turn it off! Turn if off! TURN IT OFF!" while in a ſtate of macabre metaphysical torture. Naturally, Jake assumes his good conservative daughter was kidnapped and forced into sexual slavery of sorts and that she did not merely runaway as the police and Maſt have insinuated, so he begins to dig deep into the world of a degenerate subculture where sex, sins, and souls are sold. When Jake catches his perverted P.I. Maſt messing around with a less than pretty porn ſtar, he fires his horribly horny ass and makes his way to Los Angeles, California to pose as a pornography producer in the Los Angeles Free Press so as to find better leads to the whereabouts of his daughter, hoping to run into the blond boy that boned her. Under the false pretense of auditioning young men for a fake porno film, Jake eventually runs into the blonde twink, a fairy fellow named Jism Jim, who banged his daughter for a couple bucks in the porn film and proceeds to brutally beat the little twink bitch, but not before getting information regarding Kristen (who he eloquently describes as "one crazy freaking bitch") and the man who made the film. With the information he receives from Jism, Jake is led to a sassy porno actress/hooker named Niki (Season Hubley), who the Calvinist pays a large weekly sum to travel with him and help find his daughter in San Diego where she might be hanging around as the lecherous lady has a number of seedy underworld connections. Rather ſtrangely, Niki and Jake become friendly with each other, largely because the Calvinist is the firſt man she has met who does not want to screw her and because he finds it easy to admit things to her that he could never say to Kristen, including the touching ſubject of his divorce. Through a degenerate fellow named Tod (Gary Graham) that Niki knows, Jake is lead to a ſiniſter mes-tizo named Ratan (Marc Alaimo) who deals in snuff films, which the Calvinist has the unfortunate opportunity to view for a large lump sum, thus confirming his suspicions regarding the lunatic of a Latino's dubious character. Ultimately, Kristen is found with Ratan and Jake has no problem blowing the beaner away when he finally catches him but Maſt, who has been hired by the Calvinist's brother (who felt Jake might be a danger to himself and others because he is an "angry, unhappy man"), does the killing. To Jake's surprise, he learns that his daughter ran away under her own free will, admitting to her father, "I'm with people who love me now. You robbed my life." Rather magically, Kristen comes around and agrees to come home with daddy, and Hardcore concludes in a half-positive fashion, though the father-daughter relationship is certainly going to need some work.

HARDCORE

Undoubtedly one of Paul Schrader's best films, Hardcore was also a rather personal work for the Dutch-American auteur as he based the protagonist of the film on his own father, a rather strict Calvinist who obviously had a deep and arguably deleterious influence on his son who, as his films testify to, seems to suffer from an unhealthy amount of guilt. As the protagonist Jake Van Dorn mentions in Hardcore, Calvinists believe in the theological doctrine of "Total Depravity," which teaches that as a consequence of the Fall of Man, every person is enslaved to the service of sin. Undoubtedly in Hardcore and Taxi Driver, as well as a number of other Schrader penned/directed films, it is interesting to note that the protagonist enters a virtual hell on earth where sin is a virtual currency and it is up to the protagonist to dig through the human slime and save a character from a doomed life of sinning. Interestingly, Jake Van Dorn's daughter runs away largely because of her father's repressive, sin-free religious nature, but it is also his deep commitment to Calvinism and the belief that he is going to heaven that gives him the seemingly superhuman strength to beat up homo hustlers, sadomasochistic pimps, and snuff producers. Whether one wants to admit it or not, most people are too weak to control their natural impulses and curiosity and need something like religion in their life to refrain 'sinning' and Hardcore certainly makes that point, but not without the criticism that with religion comes repression and a detachment from the 'mainstream,' especially in a relatively cosmopolitan country like America where homosexuality, sexual promiscuity, miscegenation, cross-dressing, and drug use are actively promoted by television and Hollywood. Indeed, what makes Hardcore a 'hardcore' film, especially as a Hollywood production, is that it exposes the fact that the root of degeneracy in America is a lack a serious traditional religiousness, especially among young whites in cities. As the grandson of a Dutchman who was a member of the Dutch Reformed Church, I doubt there will ever be a point in my life where I could ween myself off movies, especially like those in the anti-Hollywood tradition of Hardcore, a virtual celluloid gospel for the degenerate postmodern age.

CAT PEOPLE

Paul Schrader (1982)

When he was at the height of his fame, cocaine addiction, and flagrant homophilia, screenwriter turned auteur filmmaker Paul Schrader (American Gigolo, The Canyons)—a lapsed member of the Dutch Reformed Church who did not see his first movie until he was 17-years-old because his extremely religious Calvinist parents forbid it (notably, after the filmmaker and his brother Leonard became established in Hollywood, their mother wrote them a letter reading, “Father and I will miss you in heaven.”)—began work on what would ultimately be his biggest and most elaborate studio film, Cat People (1982), which he mainly decided to make as a means to maintain his artistically fruitful friendship with gay Italian production designer Ferdinando Scarfiotti, who was largely responsible for the distinct look of the director’s first big success American Gigolo (1980) starring Richard Gere. Indeed, as revealed in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998) by Peter Biskind, “Schrader was working hard and playing hard. He became very much a part of the gay party scene, which he had been flirting with since TAXI DRIVER days in 1975 [...] People like Schrader were attracted to it because they understood there was something religious in the intertwining of sex, death, and ecstasy.” Of course, Scarfiotti—a cultivated man with an aristocratic demeanor who treated his sets with a preternatural seriousness, like he was Michelangelo working on the Sistine Chapel—was one of these extremely chic sod party boys and Schrader gave him free reign over the Cat People set, even attempting to include an inter-title at the beginning of the flick reading “A film by Paul Schrader and Ferdinando Scarfiotti,” but ultimately being denied the request by the studio (since Scarfiotti was not part of the relevant union at the time, he had to be credited as a ‘Visual Consultant,’ even though he was in charge of every single set piece and the overall look of the entire film). Schrader had good reason to kiss Scarfiotti’s gay ass, as he was the production designer of Bernardo Bertolucci’s Il conformista (1970) aka The Conformist, which was one of the filmmaker’s favorite films and greatest influences at the time, or as he stated himself, “You looked at Bertolucci, it was just like he took Godard and Antonioni, put them in bed together, held a gun to their heads, and said, ‘You guys fuck or I’ll shoot you.’” Despite being intended as an revisionist remake of the classic 1942 Val Lewton/Jacques Tourneur production of the same name and his first film that he did not actually write, Cat People would ironically eventually become a fairly personal project for Schrader for various reasons, not least of all because he was fucking star Nastassja Kinski at the time he made it.

Barely even qualifying as a remake of the 1942 film (in fact, Schrader later expressed regret that they did not change the title of the film, as he felt critics had judged him harshly by comparing Tourneur’s film to his when they barely have anything in common), the film was heavily influenced by his philosophical propensity to put pussy on a pedestal, which was largely the result of his fear of the so-called fairer sex (indeed, the director has described the film as a “Dante and Beatrice story” in reference to Dante Alighieri’s “courtly love” for a Florentine woman named Beatrice Portinari who he worshipped from afar and who became a great source of inspiration for Vita Nuova and The Divine Comedy). Indeed, as is quite evident when comparing both films, Schrader did heavy uncredited reworking of Alan Ormsby’s original script, thereupon ultimately siring a semi-cryptic auteur piece where the male protagonist is more or less a stand-in for the filmmaker. While Schrader was obsessed with Kinski to the point where he planned to propose marriage to her, their relationship ended badly during the production and they eventually stopped talking on the set, though the clearly unhealthily obsessed filmmaker later followed her all the way to Paris in a desperate attempt to win her back. Of course, the young actress was not happy and when Schrader dared to corner her and some young stud that she was dating at the time, Kinski stated to the lovelorn filmmaker, “Paul, I always fuck my directors. And with you it was difficult.” Luckily, Schrader’s fetishistic Dante-esque worship of Kinski was channeled into Cat People where the actress naturally spends a good portion of the second half of the film baring all, including her dark-haired Teuton-polack beaver (notably, Kinski later attempted to get the beaver shots taken out of the film, arguing that they were being used against her wishes, even though she had long ago bared her bush at the ripe age of 14 in the Hammer horror flick To the Devil a Daughter (1976), among various other examples during her career). Considerably pissed that Kinski both dumped him and reneged on the nudity scenes, Schrader thankfully fought tooth and nail to keep these scenes intact. Indeed, while Cat People is not a fuck flick, it is exceptionally erotically-charged and it is hard to imagine the film without these imperative scenes where a completely unclad Kinski stalks the New Orleans bayous like a sexually insatiable beastess that is on the prowl for something to fuck and kill.

Admittedly, my recent decision to rewatch Cat People was largely inspired by the death of David Bowie, whose theme song “Cat People (Putting Out Fire)” act as sort of foreplay to the celluloid multiple orgasm that is Schrader’s succulently salacious piece of semi-sadomasochistic celluloid. Sort of like the Death in Venice of Hollywood horror (which is no surprise when one considers that Scarfiotti was the art director of Visconti’s masterful Thomas Mann adaptation), the film makes absolutely exquisite use of its truly foreboding New Orleans setting, thereupon making for a rare American film that gives the United States a truly exotic and otherworldly ancient essence that subtly underscores the fact that the largely Latin city is the culturally, racially, and spiritually mongrelized culmination of centuries of bizarre Afro-European intermingling. Indeed, the film might have a somewhat superficial and sometimes nonsensical storyline with plotholes, but that is somewhat irrelevant as the real appeal of the flick is its sort of decidedly aesthetically decadent neo-Cocteauian phantasmagoria, or as Schrader once stated himself, "Previously, I've made films about daydreams – this is my first film about nightmares . . . It's about what goes on when the lights go out – the unconscious world inhabited by erotic fantasies, and what Cocteau calls the 'sacred monsters' . . . When you're dealing with the fantastic, you need a place where people would accept it (the myth) . . . New Orleans is one of those towns where you think almost anything can happen – and probably has!" Indeed, as Cat People clearly demonstrates, if you want to make an American horror film with strong atmosphere and a foreboding spirit, there is probably no better place than 'The City That Care Forgot.'

While the film is ostensibly based on the same DeWitt Bodeen short story as its 1942 namesake, Cat People is less a remake than a tribute to Romanticism, Symbolism, and Art Nouveau (in fact, Schrader shot a recreation of Belgian Symbolist painter Fernand Khnopff's painting "The Caress" featuring Kinski's mother Ruth Brigitte Tocki with a leopard's body, but opted to not use it in the film) and the films of great post-WWII guido auteurs like Visconti and Bertolucci. Additionally, aside from being a horror movie that, as Schrader described, "contains more skin than blood," it also probably has more in common with the Southern Gothic genre than supernatural horror. In other words, Cat People clearly was not made by or for horror fanboys who diddle themselves to Friday the 13th movies while sporting hockey masks, hence why it had much more success in Europe than the United States. Aside from being arguably the ultimate film for Nastassja Kinski fetishists, Schrader's flick is also probably the most elegant film ever made about zoophilia. The reluctantly supernatural yet unrepentantly sensual tale of an exotic yet terribly naive and seemingly borderline autistic beautiful young virgin of incestuous werecat stock who moves to New Orleans to be united with her long lost brother, only to become entrenched in a sort of seriously unwanted bizarre love triangle with her mentally sick sibling and a bookish yet extremely chivalrous zoo curator of the quasi-misanthropic sort who works with animals because he prefers them to people, Cat People is a somewhat cautionary tale about the perils of putting pussy on a pedestal, especially if said pussy is a crazy cunt of the uniquely unhinged and unpredictable sort. A horror film made for people that do not necessarily care for horror films that wallows in the dichotomous theme of the sacred and profane where Kinski does a fairly believable job portraying the ultimate archetypical virgin-whore, Schrader's film is notable for its genre in that it dares to blur the line between myths and the archaic psycho-historical roots of said myths, hence Cocteau's imperative influence.

After opening with an aesthetically pleasing ritual scene set in a fiery desert involving the 'sacrifice' of the lead female heroine's ancient female ancestor to a leopard by a group of nearly naked tribesmen covered with crude body paint (rather curiously, this people are clearly non-white), Cat People then flashes forward to the present day at a New Orleans airport where the female protagonist/quasianti-heroine Irena Gallier (Nastassja Kinski in a role that Bo Derek was originally intended to play) is virtually stalked all the way to a payphone by her long lost brother Paul (Malcolm McDowell), who she has not seen since they were very young children after both of their parents tragically died. Unbeknownst to Irena, her long dead parents were brother and sister and died in a dubious suicide pact of sorts that the circumstances of are never fully revealed. Also, quite unlike Paul, Irena is completely unaware of the fact that she and her brother are werewerecats and if she has sex with a man, she will transform into a black panther and will remain in that form until she kills another person. Of course, Paul is quite happy to see Irena, as he has big plans with her that mainly involve incestuous sex, lest they both be doomed to a life of perpetual murder and strange sexual dysfunction. As Irena learns upon arriving at her ancient family estate, the Galliers are watched over by a seemingly voodoo oriented negress servant named 'Female' (Ruby Dee in arguably her most unconventional and thankfully most apolitical role), who is also an orphan and who got her strange name (which is pronounced "feh-MAH-leh") after someone wrote on her birth certificate, "Child, Female" since she had no parents. While celebrating their (un)timely reunion during a sort of homecoming dinner where they eat "Female's special gumbo," Paul asks his sister if she remembers him in any way and she replies in a borderline sensual fashion, "Mmm, I used to fantasize about you...when I was in the orphanage. Well, you know, about you coming to rescue me and things. Daydreams." According to Paul, he "had the same dream," thus underscoring their innate supernatural connection as inbred werewerecats. Indeed, while she is not conscious of it yet, Irena's body is telling her to be defiled by her brother, who is determined to make his little sis his lover. Unfortunately for Paul, who gets temporary sexual release by fucking and killing dumb whores and trashy prostitutes, his sister will ultimately fall in love with a mere human, thereupon eventually leading to quite deadly consequences.

During their first night together, Paul gets so intolerably horny for his sister that he decides to seek the company of a hooker, thus resulting in unfortunate consequences for all involved. When a streetwalker arrives at a sleazy fleabag hotel to meet a john, she gets quite the surprise when she is brutally mauled by a black leopard that is hiding under a bed. As the viewer somewhat suspects, the leopard is actually Paul in animal form. Although the streetwalker survives the attack, the panther is left trapped in the hotel room and is eventually captured the next day by a zoologist/zoo curator named Oliver Yates (John Heard of C.H.U.D. (1984) and the Home Alone franchise) with the help of his female assistant/fuck-buddy Alice Perrin (Annette O'Toole of Superman III (1983) and Smallville (2001)) and some cops and imprisoned at a strange borderline Fellini-esque zoo where female secretaries do office work above cages full of dangerous animals. Although a handsome, intelligent, and seemingly physically strong fellow, Oliver is an introverted dork who spends his free time reciting

Dante and dreaming of an ideal woman that he can put on a pedestal and worship like a goddess. While his co-worker Alice—a reasonably beautiful babe with a classic Nordic physique and a fairly nice set of large firm tits—is clearly in love with him, Oliver is not quite interested in making her his serious lover, as he seems to be looking for a lady that is more exotic and enigmatic. Luckily, supernatural virgin Irena is probably the closest thing to a real-life goddess and she will soon enter Oliver's life by sheer happenstance. When Paul goes missing, Irena, who expected to be given an extensive tour of the city by her brother, goes looking for him around the French Quarter, thus eventually leading her to the zoo where she meets Oliver under awkward circumstances after running away from him after he startles her. Naturally, it is love at first sight for hopeless romantic Paul, who immediately offers Irena a job at the zoo gift shop. While everything initially goes splendid at the zoo, Irena is soon given somewhat of a shock after witnessing the black panther, who she has no clue is actually her brother, attacking and killing a fairly obnoxious zookeeper named Joe Creigh (Ed Begley, Jr. of Monte Hellman's Cockfighter (1974)). With a single bite, Paul-as-the-panther manages to completely dismember one of Joe's arms. Although Oliver resolves to euthanize the killer cat, he discovers it has escaped when he goes to its cage to kill it. Of course, as result of murdering Joe, Paul was able to transform back into a human and escape. As a result of witnessing his sister's budding romance with Oliver while imprisoned in the zoo, Paul is determined to deflower his little sis ASAP so that he can have the distinguished luxury of being the man who pops her cherry.

When Paul somewhat surprises Irena by randomly showing up back at the house after disappearing for days, he ignores his sister when she describes about being completely horrified as a result of witnessing Joe's brutal death and then proceeds to accuse her of wanting to jump on Oliver's cock, stating in a somewhat hostile yet nonetheless sexually-charged fashion, "You want to fuck him, don't you? You dream about fucking him. Your whole body burns. Burns all along your nerves. In your mouth, your breasts. You go wet between your legs." When Paul attempts to defile her while rationalizing his violently incestuous actions by stating, "But I'm the only one who can touch you, and you're the only one who can touch me. Don't you see we're saved together because we're the same," Irena predictably decides to flee the house and does so by instinctually doing a back-flip off a second floor building in a scene that somewhat seems like a homage to Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia (1938). While a police officer finds Irena running down the street in a hysterical fashion and proceeds to question her, she opts to not tell him about her big brother's violently incestuous outburst. When another police officer comes by the house and his K9 dog starts barking after catching a scent, the police decide to search the home and ultimately find a large animal cage and the remains of three or four dead sluts and prostitutes, or as an inordinately stoic negro cop named Detective Brandt (Frankie Faison of the Hannibal Lecter franchise) tells Oliver while showing him the grisly crime scene, "I expect Gallier killed them first, possibly as part of some ritual. Then fed 'em to the leopard. We've found some others, too, over the years. Mostly prostitutes, female runaways, half-eaten, genitals torn out [...] Gallier's been in and out of psycho wards since he was 12. He's a religious fanatic." Needless to say, Oliver wants to know if Irena was in any way involved in the fetishistic murders and Detective Brandt calms some of his worries while stirring others by remarking, "We have no reason to suspect her. In fact, it looked as if he'd planned to kill her too."

With her brother Paul a wanted fugitive on the run and her servant Female imprisoned, Irena naturally accepts Oliver's invitation to move into his flat, thereupon accelerating the evolution of their initially fairly tame romance. Not long after she moves in, Oliver enthusiastically declares he plans to one day buy her a plantation and takes her on a sort of mini-vacation to a small red boathouse that he has on the bayou. While the two lovers have fun during the day while doing harmless things together like boating and crabbing, things get somewhat more intense later that night since both of them have become quite sexually frustrated as a result of the fact that Irena refuses to allow Oliver to deflower her. Of course, things get even more complicated when Oliver wakes up in the middle of the night and sees Irena screaming at him to not look at her since she is completely naked body and covered in blood. Indeed, as a result of her werecat instincts, Irena woke up in the middle of the night and decided to go hunting for prey in the form of a cute bunny rabbit that she sank her teeth into while it was still alive, even though she is a vegetarian. During the same night, Paul murders a dumb blonde named Billie (Tessa Richarde of Boaz Davidson's The Last American Virgin (1982)) that he met in a graveyard earlier that day after she gives him a blowjob in a hotel room. When the two lovers get back from their trip, Irena has a slight mental breakdown and expresses her doubt about her her sanity and the future of their relationship, so Oliver states to her in an intimately impassioned fashion, "Listen, Irena, I'm 34 years old. I spent most of my life looking for somebody...I even wanted to be in love with. Now that I've found you, I'm not gonna let you go. I love you." When Irena replies, "Oh, yeah? Would you love me just as much...if we, if we could never sleep together?," Oliver attempts to console her and assure her of his love for her by stating absurdly nonsensical pseudo-poetic things like, "I loved you before you were born." Unbeknownst to both Oliver and Irena, Paul while hiding in a tree above them the entire time and he listened to their entire conversation. Ultimately, Paul decides to surprise Irena by crashing through a window and then subsequently attempting to explain to her of the importance of them becoming lovers, stating in a violently despairing fashion, "Save me. Only you can stop this killing. You've got to make love with me...as brother and sister. I've searched for you for so long, from one foster home to another. We can live together as mates. Just as our parents did. You do know that they were brother and sister, don't you? Oh yes. Make love with me and save both of us." While Paul gets a little bit rough with his sister, Irena eventually manages to escape by stabbing him in the hand with a piece of broken glass. When Oliver comes home later that night, he finds Paul there waiting for him in semi-panther form. Luckily, Alice shoots and kills Paul with a shotgun just after he transforms into a panther and attempts to maul Oliver. When Oliver later does an autopsy of the werecat, he is disturbed to find a human body inside the panther corpse. Even more curiously, after cutting open Paul's corpse, green gas oozes out and eventually evaporates both the panther and human corpse into a pool of flesh and viscera, thereupon conveniently ensuring that Oliver is unable to document the supernatural creature.

With her only living relative now dead, Irena decides to visit Female in prison to get advice about what she should do next and is ultimately given the semi-cryptic words of wisdom by the worldly spiritual negress, "Live as he [Paul] did: hidden, in jails. Never love. Pretend the world is what men think it is." Hoping to figuratively and literally flee from her truly nightmarish situation, Irena decides to flee town and buys a train ticket to Richmond, Virginia, but during the train ride she has an elaborate life-changing dream involving her dead brother Paul that fully awakens her long dormant atavistic instincts and transforms her from skittish prey into a lethally lecherous predator on the prowl. Indeed, during the otherworldly dream-sequence, Irena enters a windy transcendental desert realm with a dark orange tone where she is greeted by her brother, who is topless and declares to her in a quite proud fashion in regard to the legacy of their godly werecat heritage, "Long ago our ancestors sacrificed their children to the leopards. The souls of the children grew inside the leopards...until the leopards became human. We were gods then. We are an incestuous race. We can only make love with our own, otherwise we transform. And before we can become human again, we must kill." During the dream, Irena also meets her mother in panther form. After the dream, Irena evolves into a cruel, craven, and completely confident sexual predator and opts to travel back to New Orleans to hunt down Oliver so that she can lose her virginity and finally fully embrace her werecat birthright. Luckily for Irena, Oliver is so obsessively in love with her that he is somewhat willing to overlook certain things about her, including her primal urge to kill, especially after they fuck.

Before seeking out Oliver, Irena decides to crush the sexual competition by stalking and severely petrifying Alice, who is hopelessly in love with the male protagonist (notably, Alice's jealousy of Irena and love of Oliver is made quite clear in a scene where she states to the latter, "Her [Irena's] type will always be all right. Look, I'm not blind, Oliver. I've seen you obsessed before, [but] not like this. I even thought I'd seen you in love before. I guess that was just my vanity."). Indeed, in one of the few scenes in the film that was also in the original 1942 Cat People, Irena scares the shit out of Alice while she is swimming in an indoor swimming pool by lurking in the shadows and making bestial sounds (notably, Schrader opted to add an extra layer to Alice's vulnerability by having the character swim topless). When Irena eventually comes out and reveals herself to Alice after sadistically terrorizing her like a cat that is playing with a mouse that it is about to kill, her jealous rival loses all self-control and immediately accuses her of wanting to kill her. Of course, Irena just continues to play mind games with Alice by maintaining a gleefully sadistic smile and stating to her in a preposterously passive-aggressive fashion, "I'm sorry if I frightened you." While Alice subsequently calls Oliver and tells her about Irena's creepy behavior, the male protagonist hangs up the phone on her when his leopard lady love randomly walks in the house and begins stripping off her clothes in a provocative fashion where she more than obviously demonstrates that she is finally ready to fuck. Needless to say, Oliver experiences the erotic relief of a lifetime when he subsequently deflowers Irena after having been cock-blocked for such a long time. After the two fall asleep, Irena wakes up in the middle of the night and admires and licks blood that is dripping from her hemorrhaging de-hymened werecat cunt. Of course, not like after sampling her vaginal sanguine fluids, Irena transforms into a panther for the first time and pounces on Oliver, though her love for him stops her from slaughtering and killing him. Instead, werecat Irena flees Oliver's home and then causes a spectacle of herself by occupying a bridge where she is ultimately trapped by police. When Oliver eventually arrives at the scene, Irena jumps off the bridge and swims to land while dodging police bullets.

Naturally, Oliver immediately goes looking for Irena and is disturbed when he happens upon the mangled corpse of his elderly friend Yeatman Brewer (Emery Hollier), who she heroically killed so that she could transform back into a human. Not long after finding the dead body, Oliver is approached by Irena, who unrepentantly declares she killed Yeatman and then begs the protagonist to kill her, which he naturally refuses to do. When Oliver asks her why she did not kill him, she tells him that it is because she loves him. While stripping off her clothes, Irena then declares, "Free me. Make love to me again. I want to live with my own." Of course, Oliver enthusiastically abides, though he makes sure to tie all four of Irena's limbs to bedposts before penetrating the human pussycat's puss in a tastefully sleazy scene that is part quasi-religious ritual and part zoophilic S&M bondage scene. In a bizarre and totally unforgettably twist ending, it is casually revealed that Oliver has not only started a romance with Alice, but that he also has managed to keep Irena. Indeed, in the very last scene, Oliver is depicted gently stroking and hand-feeding a black panther at the zoo that the viewer presumes is Irena, who has been placed on a sort of perennial pedestal that arguably demonstrates that the curious male protagonist is more interested in romanticizing the idea of love than actually making love to women, henceforth underscoring auteur Schrader's somewhat 'idiosyncratic' philosophical view of love and romance.

Ironically, despite originally being intended as an impersonal project where the auteur wanted to have the luxury of utilizing studio resources and to experiment with adapting someone else's work, Cat People would ultimately evolve into one of Schrader's most embarrassingly, if not somewhat cryptically, autobiographical works, albeit with a bizarre happy ending that is in stark contrast to what he actually experienced in real-life. Indeed, instead of having the grand honor of permanently keeping Nastassja Kinski imprisoned in a cage like the male protagonist in the film, Schrader was not only pathetically dumped by the actress but also heckled by then Universal Pictures executive Ned Tanen for filming various beaver shots of the intemperate Teutonic actress (as described in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls, Tanen called up Schrader and said, "Listen, you fucking idiot, this girl [Kinski] is running around telling everybody you shot her crotch and you're going to put beaver shots in the middle of this movie, what the fuck are you doing?," to which the angry and vengeful lovelorn auteur apparently replied, "Oh man, she fucked me over and I'm going to fuck her, nobody's going to treat me this way. . ."). Luckily, Schrader did not have to excise the beaver shots from the film but both his career and personal life was a mess, as the film was a commercial failure and he had some serious drug problems, or as he stated himself, "My life was completely fucked up by women and drugs and my career had gone dead. The Russian roulette was the event that made it clear to me it was time to leave L.A., go to New York, and start over. So I did." Thankfully, unlike many of the other filmmakers of his generation that were associated with the New Hollywood movement, Schrader was able to get his shit together and went to Japan to direct what he has described as his masterpiece, Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985), which is actually alluded to in Cat People (indeed, there is a shot in the film of a Mishima biography sitting on Oliver's nightstand). As Schrader would later state of the film and its importance in the context of his entire oeuvre, "It's the one I'd stand by – as a screenwriter it's TAXI DRIVER, but as a director it's MISHIMA." Somewhat ironically since Schrader once declared, "STAR WARS was the film that ate the heart and the soul of Hollywood. It created the big-budget comic book mentality," George Lucas was one of the executive producers on his Mishima biopic. Notably, there is actually a scene in Cat People where Schrader takes a snipe at Lucas and his commercialization of cinema where a couple little boys buy some The Empire Strikes Back (1980) chewing gum from Kinski while she is working at the zoo gift shop. Of course, I am sure his film would have been more popular and profitable if Schrader had opted to release Cat People merchandise like Kinski sex lube and McDowell dildos, but I digress.

Notably, in the featurette Cat People: An Intimate Portrait, Schrader would reveal in regard to Cat People and its central Beatrice complex theme that he had a personal tendency to put pussies on a pedestal as a sort of therapeutic means to deal with his “fear of women.” Of course, no matter what women say, they never truly respect a man that treats them like an immaculate goddess that is worthy of worship, hence one of various reasons as to why Kinski grew to loathe Schrader as a woman that later admitted to him, “I always fuck my directors. And with you it was difficult.” Despite the fact that Schrader saw her as a goddess, Kinski’s quote clearly reveals that she felt that he was, at best, less than average, at least as far as fuck-buddies are concerned. Personally, one of the things I found most intriguing about the film was that Schrader attempted to do a sort of heterosexual take on Cocteau with a big budget Hollywood studio flick, which explains why it was so poorly received among filmgoers. Notably, in an interview featured in Schrader on Schrader & Other Writings (1990), the filmmaker would confess, “...on CAT PEOPLE the tapes I took along were BEAUTY AND THE BEAST and ORPHEUS, which are obviously nonpareil landmarks in the history of movies. There will never be another Cocteau.” Admittedly, when I first saw Schrader’s film over a decade ago, I was not all that impressed, but now I see it as a highly re-watched novelty of bizarre cocaine-addled cinematic experimentation where the seemingly disharmonious worlds of Hollywood horror trash and European arthouse reluctantly fucked and gave birth to an aesthetically majestic monster of a movie that is quite easy on the eyes. Additionally, I always appreciate a horror film where the archetypal roots of fear and eroticism are provocatively played with (as the filmmaker also stated in Schrader on Schrader, “The NEWSWEEK review said it was a movie for the Jung at heart, and I guess that’s pretty much what I wanted: the idea of myth and the kind of primal images that are embedded in our genes.”). Of course, Bowie’s addicting theme song and Scarfiotti’s extravagant sets alone are worth the price of admission. Indeed, as a wonderfully wanton and delightfully eclectically aesthetically decadent movie of erotic murder and mayhem that is like a popcorn flick for both Jungians and lapsed horror fiends turned arthouse fags, Cat People is the virtual definition of a cinematic guilty pleasure, at least if you’re lame and/or pretentious enough to feel guilty for liking it.

Paul Schrader (1985)

As someone who has always been a much better screenwriter than he ever was a film director, it was only natural that Paul Schrader (American Gigolo, Patty Hearst)—a man who was brought up in a strict Calvinist household and did not see his first movie until he was 17-years-old, thus missing the imperative emotional effect films have during those 'critical' childhood years, and ultimately developing a more 'intellectual' approach to filmmaking—would direct his greatest film about a writer, albeit one from a drastically different cultural and ethnic background. Gay, Japanese, right-wing, dandy, campy, body fetishist, unrepentant traditionalist, samurai, polymath, and a man who committed ritual suicide via seppuku after a failed military coup d'état with his private army, Japanese novelist Yukio Mishima was an extremely contradictory fellow who died at the height of his artistic and physical prowess and fulfilled his lifelong dream of leaving behind a beautiful corpse in the spirit of Italian high-Baroque painter Guido Reni's portrait of Christian martyr Saint Sebastian, while Schrader has spiritually and physically degenerated into one of the people responsible for scripting and directing some of the darkest mainstream American films of his time, including Hardcore (1979) and Affliction (1997), not to mention being the man that penned Taxi Driver (1976) directed by Martin Scorsese. With Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985), which was co-penned by his brother Leonard Schrader and his Japanese wife Chieko Schrader, Paul Schrader went to Japan to direct a film about a controversial figure that would ultimately never be screened in the country it was filmed in and takes place in. Initially receiving support from Mishima's widow and family, Schrader eventually lost the support when he refused to cut rather mundane gay bar scenes from the film of Mishima dancing with a fellow Dorian loving, Jap homo, thus leading to the film being indefinitely banned in the Land of the Rising Sun. Additionally, a good fraction of the budget for Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters, about two million dollars, was contributed by Japanese producers, but they deny it to this very day due to the taboo circumstances revolving around the film, or as Schrader stated himself, "I moved to Japan and we had a Japanese producer who was able to raise half of the budget through his own money and from Fuji Television and Toho-Towa. Then, of course, the Japanese financiers tried to pull out at the last minute because of pressure from the widow. There was another drama involving that and the end result was that they gave us the money but claimed that they didn't. To this day, they claim that they did not finance the film." Undoubtedly, as far as I am concerned, especially in regard to staying faithful to a country's culture and language, Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters—a work co-produced by Francis Ford Coppola and George Lucas of all people—is one of the most respectful 'Hollywood' films in its depiction of a foreign figure and peoples and were it not for

MISHIMA: A LIFE IN FOUR CHAPTERS

Yukio Mishima's flagrant homosexuality upsetting the Japanese, it would probably be considered the greatest piece of cross-cultural filmmaking ever made. I guess Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters was destined for infamy in Japan after Schrader, in decidedly taboo fashion, opted to expose an unpixelated Jap bush to the Occidental world.

Beginning on the last day of Yukio Mishima's life, November 25, 1970, and ending with his ritual suicide after his failed coup for restoring order in Americanized Japan, Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters tells the rest of the story of the conflicted man who sought a "Harmony of Pen and Sword" via a number of meticulously constructed minimalistic montages, including black-and-white flashbacks from his life and highly stylized depictions of excerpts from three of the Japanese writer's novels, including Runaway Horses (1969), Kyoko's House (1959), and The Temple Of The Golden Pavilion (1956), although a fourth novel—the innately homoerotic autobiographical work Confessions of a Mask (1949)—is cinematically visualized but never actually mentioned by name. Additionally, Mishima's militant nationalistic autobiographical manifesto/essay Sun and Steel: Art, Action and Ritual Death (1968)—an imperative work for understanding the writer's 'body fascism' and overall Weltanschauung—was also utilized for the film. In addition, the film finishes reenactments of Mishima's direction of his sole film Patriotism (1966)—a work that foreshadows his suicide—as well as depictions of the novelist's iconic homoerotic photo shoots with Japanese photographer/filmmaker Eikoh Hosoe. Starring Japanese actor Ken Ogata (Vengeance Is Mine, The Pillow Book)—a man who looks nothing like the novelist—in the role of Yukio Mishima, narration (using Mishima's actual written words) from American actor Roy Scheider (The French Connection, All That Jazz), and an iconic ethereal soundtrack from minimalist composer Philip Glass (Koyaanisqatsi, The Thin Blue Line), Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters certainly has the unmistakable feel of a work created by a racial and cultural outsider, yet one would be hardpressed to find a more seamless collaboration between Yanks and Japs. Featuring immaculate production design from Eiko Ishioka (Closet Land, The Cell), whose highly expressionistic and kaleidoscopic visualizations of novels seem to be in some sort of celluloid nirvana in between the early works of German auteuress Ulrike Ottinger (Madame X: An Absolute Ruler, Freak Orlando) and the films of Japanese experimental Renaissance man Shūji Terayama (Emperor Tomato Ketchup, Pastoral: To Die in the Country), Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters certainly owes much of its aesthetically potency and intrigue to members of the Japanese crew, thus making it a work that never could have been contrived on a Hollywood studio lot by garish gaijin.

From the beginning of Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters, it seems that Yukio Mishima has his own little heaven on earth as he lives on an almost aristocratic homestead that is surrounded by homoerotic European architecture, but as he once wrote and is narrated in the film, “All my life I have been acutely aware of a contradiction in the very nature of my existence. For forty-five years I struggled to resolve this dilemma by writing plays and novels. The more I wrote, the more I realized mere words were not enough. So I found another form of expression.” A sickly boy since his birth, Mishima was taken in by his paternal grandmother, who had aristocratic airs because she was raised in the house of a Japanese prince and whose influence would no doubt rub-off on the novelist, and did not move back in with his immediate family until he was 12-years-old. As Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters depicts, Mishima was always an extremely oversensitive and introverted young man who had better command over words than his body. Despite developing into a muscular and statuesque samurai with his own private army, Mishima—whose father was a stern military minded man that used rather dubious parenting techniques such as holding his son under a moving train in order to desensitize him to fear—suffered the shame of being judged unfit to serve in the Second World War by a young military doctor who misdiagnosed that he had tuberculosis because he had a cold. While Mishima would later develop an affinity for ancient Japanese culture, he was largely influenced by decadent Occidental authors like Oscar Wilde, Rainer Maria Rilke, and Raymond Radiguet, so his transformation from a mere, albeit successful, wimpy writer who wrote about masturbating to ancient paintings of Christian martyrs into a master of both pen and sword was an exceedingly extreme, if not self-deceiving, one as expressed in his narration words, “My life is in many ways like that of an actor...I also wear a mask. I play a role. When he looks in the mirror, the homosexual, like the actor, sees what he fears most. The decay of the body,” and, of course, he made sure to allow himself to physically deteriorate by ultimately embracing death in a manner no less stoic than that of a kamikaze pilot.

Indubitably, the cinematic adaptations of Mishima’s novels featured in Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters are just as important, if not more important, for understanding the novelist’s character and essence as the anecdotal biographical elements from his real-life. For example, in the The Temple of the Golden Pavilion segment, an ugly Buddhist acolyte boy afflicted with a compromising stutter becomes obsessed with the beauty of a pavilion and his irrational urge to destroy, which he inevitably does via arson, thus illustrating Mishima’s youthful fanatical aestheticism as well as pathological self-consciousness and physical weakness and the eventual destruction of his own body when it reach its peak in terms of masculine physique. In terms of Mishima’s transformation into a samurai, his nationalistic right-wing fanaticism, failed coup d’état, and final act of self-slaughter, the segment for the novel Runaway Horses is probably the most eerily foretelling in its resemblance to the novelist’s life as it follows a far-right reactionary trained in the samurai code who is involved in the assassination of corrupt business men (Zaibatsu) and eventually commits seppuku. An outspoken nationalist who lived by and actively promoted bushido, the code of the samurai, Mishima was vehemently hated by young Japanese leftists, who he saw as traitors to their own people. Mishima's attempt at a coup was sparked by his desire to restore order and protection of the Emperor of Japan (which to him was not a literal ruler, but the abstract essence of the Japanese people), so when he and members of the Tatenokai ("shield society"), his own private army, failed to get a response he wanted in restoring honor to the homeland, he committed suicide. In Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters, Mishima's disillusionment with the future of Japan is made clear when he is shouted down by military men, thus it was only fitting that he, the last prominent samurai in his homeland, would famously commit seppuku, thereupon signaling the end of a period in Japanese history and the reign of modernism.

Although I would not consider myself a Yukio Mishima fanatic, I have read a number of his novels and he is certainly my favorite non-European writer, so my initial viewing of Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters was not as a total Mishima novice and I would be lying if I did not admit that Paul Schrader's biopic was much more impressive and faithful than I expected it would be, even if it is an undeniably flawed work. For one, I see nothing of the essence of Mishima in Ken Ogata, even if the everyday Joe Schmo yellow man looks indistinguishable to me, as the novelist radiated a sort of idiosyncratic charisma inherent only to the spiritual and cultural aristocracy of a nation's elite (especially for a collectivist-minded nation like Japan), hence why his work, unlike that of largely unknown Japanese literary figures, is quite popular even today outside his homeland despite his unrelenting disposition to cultural chauvinism. Judging by interviews I have viewed of Mishima, he speaks more eloquently in English than Ogata seems to speak in his native language of Japanese. Of course, it would have probably been impossible to find any actor that could permeate Mishima's idiosyncratic essence. A decadent homosexual dandy who morphed into a stoic samurai who meticulously reshaped his body by taking up weight training and a rigorous workout regimen of three sessions per week which never waned for the last 15 years of his life, Mishima was a walking contradiction as a sort of Japanese Gabriele D'Annunzio, a debauched romantic writer who also had his own private army and became a national war hero whose political and aesthetic ideas Benito Mussolini of all people ripped off. Of course, as Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters director Paul Schrader stated himself, "[Mishima] is too much of a scandal. [...] When Mishima died people said, 'Give us fifteen years and we'll tell you what we think about him,' but it's been more than fifteen years now and they still don't know what to say. Mishima has become a non-subject," thus his influence on Japan, at least culturally speaking, did not live up to D'Annunzio's legacy. Of course, as a man who wrote 34 novels, about 50 plays, about 25 books of short stories (around 200 total), at least 35 books of essays, one libretto, and directed an avant-garde film, not to mention his involvement in acting and promotion of traditional Japanese culture and theatre, Mishima's legacy as an enduring aesthete is forever secured. For an introduction to the life and art of the last samurai, one cannot do better than viewing Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters—a work that director Paul Schrader even had to admit, “It’s the one I’d stand by – as a screenwriter it’s Taxi Driver, but as a director it’s Mishima.” Indeed, if anything, one will learn by watching Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters that Japanese culture is not just about eels squirting out of vaginal and anal orifices, mass rape, and the ‘Nordicizing’ of the Jap physique via degenerate anime.

THE COMFORT OF STRANGERS

Paul Schrader (1990)

While his keenly kaleidoscopic Yukio Mishima biopic Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985), as the director himself has recognized, is American auteur Paul Schrader's greatest accomplishment as a filmmaker, especially in terms of its aesthetic magnitude, I personally prefer his rather darker and mysterious works Hardcore (1979) and The Comfort of Strangers (1990), with the latter film being what I consider to be his most overlooked and underrated cinematic work yet which has virtually nil reputation and fan base in the United States. Rather ironically, Schrader—a man who is often regarded as a greater screenwriter than he is a filmmaker—did not pen the script for The Comfort of Strangers, but instead Nobel Prize-winning English playwright Harold Pinter adapted the screenplay from a 1981 book of the same name written by British novelist Ian McEwan—an author described by The New York Times critic John Leonard as, “one of the few English writers of fiction who belong these days to a dark Europe; he is a Samuel Beckett with some genital organization.” And, indeed, Schrader's The Comfort of Strangers portrays a rather ominous and uncertain Europa, most specifically Venice, Italy (although the novel takes place in an unnamed city) where men no longer act like men and accept responsibility as fathers and patriarchs and where women, who have bought into feminism and can no longer rely on the strength and discipline that was a given for men of the past, have stepped up to the plate and have developed a sense of independence they never once had before, at least in terms of the Occident. Starring statuesque English sodomite Rupert Everett (Another Country, Cemetery Man) in the role of a modern weak and vain, albeit ostensibly heterosexual, man who is more concerned with his own appearance than that of the future of his relationship with his girlfriend (played by English actress Natasha Richardson) and Christopher Walken as a menacing Italian man who hates modernity and respects the patriarchal tradition, The Comfort of Strangers is a feverishly foreboding flick about what happens when a narcissistic proto-metrosexual Brit meets up with a Guido ‘spiritual fascist’ of sorts with a broken manhood who does not take kindly to ‘communist poofs’ and independent women with idealistic diarrhea of the mouth.

British couple Colin (Rupert Everett) and Mary (Natasha Richardson) have traveled to Venice for vacation so as to discuss the dubious future of their relationship. A nauseatingly vain man who has the audacity to admit he is jealous of his girlfriend's pulchritude, Colin is not sure if he wants to stay with Mary because she is a single mother with children from a previous relationship and he does not particularly like children as it seems it would take away attention for himself. Unbeknownst to them, a Venetian couple—a cunning and charismatic Italian-British (with a Guido father and Brit mother) man named Robert (Christopher Walken) and his Canadian wife Caroline (Helen Mirren in a surprisingly submissive role)—have been watching the British couple ever since they arrived in Venice and have been taking voyeuristic pictures of Colin. One night after getting lost looking for a restaurant in Venice, Colin and Mary are approached by a stranger named Robert, who is dressed like a dapper dandy in a white suit and who is quite an articulate individual who seems to speak virtually every European language, and he brings them to his bar (although never telling the couple he owns it). A seemingly wealthy bar owner with what most people would describe as an anachronistic worldview, Robert always speaks of the greatness of the past when men were men and women were women, especially in regard to his father and grandfather. Upon first meeting Colin and Mary, Robert is asked how he met his wife Caroline, which he responds with “Let me tell you something: My father was a very big man. And all his life he wore a black mustache. When it was no longer black, he used a small brush, such as ladies use for their eyes. Mascara” and goes on a seemingly senseless spiel about how his older sisters traumatized him by covering him with make-up as a child and getting him drunk and locking him in their father’s much cherished study where he vomited and defecated everywhere, which the patriarch apparently never forgave him for. When Colin and Mary later go back to Robert’s lavishly furnished and classically stylized apartment, the Venetian would-be-alpha tells the bitchy Brit, “My father and his father understood themselves clearly... They were men... And they were proud of their sex. Women understood them too. Now, women treat men like children because they can’t take them seriously, but men, men like my father, my grandfather... women took very seriously. There was no uncertainty. No confusion.” When Colin makes a cynical comment regarding the Italian Stallion’s serious speech, Robert gives him a nice hard punch in the gut, which the ballsy beta of a Brit takes like a true bitch, pretending it never happened. Not long after, Colin and Mary join Robert and Caroline for dinner, where the gentlemanly Italian man compliments the British government and the Brit calls it “shit.” Angered by Colin’s cynical arrogance and liberal persuasion, Robert remarks, “I respect you as an Englishman but not if you are a communist poof.” Of course, as a man who pathologically snaps photos of a handsome male stranger and makes love to his wife with those same photos hanging over his bed, Robert’s actions seem to contradict his words.

As one learns whilst watching The Comfort of Strangers, Robert and Caroline have a somewhat unconventional sexual relationship that involves violent sadomasochism, which has left the wife partially crippled, which the little loony lady sees as a badge of honor of sorts. As Caroline proudly confesses to Mary, she enjoys the abuse her husband has given her (and “feeling like nothing”) and is quite thrilled to remain a slave in her own home at the demand of her domineering husband. Upon meeting the English couple, Caroline remarks regarding Colin’s wimpy demeanor, “Isn’t it sweet when men are shy?” as the Brit boy’s alien behavior seems like an absurd novelty when compared to the severe sternness of her husband—a man who sees it as his duty to put a woman in her place. Ultimately, cowardly 'gentle'-man Colin becomes the pretty prey of Robert and Caroline and—being a self-absorbed pansy with no predatory sense—the Englishman lacks the instincts to realize he is being drawn into a web that will lead to his premature demise. Towards the conclusion of The Comfort of Strangers, Robert remarks to Colin regarding a conversation with a friend, “I was telling the...that...you’re my lover and that Caroline is jealous because she likes you too,” thus playing with his prey before the kill, yet also hinting at a homosexual side that he is rather ashamed of hence why the effeminate Englishman will ultimately be the victim of his unhinged mind. Undoubtedly, Robert seems to see everything he hates about himself personified in Colin—a cowardly cynic with no strong sense of values who cares more about his appearance than his masculinity (or lack thereof)—thus explaining the Venetian ‘man’s man’ seemingly inexplicable dual hatred/fascination with the effortlessly effete Englishman. In a sense, Robert’s eventual crime against Colin towards the end of The Comfort of Strangers is a macabre act of mercy against a biological man with a chiseled Roman-like face and muscular body who is not mentally fit to be a man. It is only in his violent death that Colin becomes a man for the first time in his life, but also becomes the martyr of his Adonis-esque beauty, which, in a sense, was what he also dreamed of as an exceedingly vainglorious man.

A postmodern psychosexual horror flick disguised as a romantic melodrama set in paradise, The Comfort of Strangers is a sadistically seductive cinematic work that, like the British couple in relation to antagonist Colin, takes the viewer on an exotic and mystifying ride until it is too late and one is backed into a petrifying corner of no return. A virtual European arthouse flick as directed by a Hollywood outsider, The Comfort of Strangers is as good as foreigner directed films get when depicting Europa as a work that never attempts to contrive the kultur of the people it portrays, but makes it quite apparent to the viewer one is in a strange place with a rich history and historical legacy that its contemporary countrymen can no longer live up to. More importantly, The Comfort of Strangers is one of a handful of semi-Hollywood films that portrays the virtual death of masculinity and tradition in the Occident and does not exactly portray it as a good thing as one would expect from similarly themed works, but that probably has to do with the fact that it is an American/UK/Italian co-production as opposed to a purely Hebraic Hollywood production. Indeed, the character of Colin—the defender of patriarchy and tradition—may be a pernicious psychopath, but he is also a failed male as well as a curious perv who can only be superficially suave (and does quite an immaculate job doing it!) and obsess over the legacy of his father, the “Big Man,” and not his own legacy, while Rupert Everett’s character is a proud pansy wuss (or “communist poof”) who perishes without putting up a fight and whose girlfriend has more common sense than he does. When it comes down to it, the fact Everett’s character is gone will only have a positive effect on his girlfriend and her children, who certainly do not need a beta girly-man who pathologically admires himself in the mirror around as a pseudo-father figure. When it comes to the death of the traditional sexes in the Occident, you will not find a more contemplative and insightful yet equally thrilling mainstream film than The Comfort of Strangers—a metaphysical horror flick that takes a brief look at sexual aberration in post-WWII Western man, but only leaves the viewer with questions and offers no answers.

LIGHT SLEEPER

Paul Schrader (1992)

It is oftentimes said that writers spend their entire lives writing the same book over and over again and of course the same has also been said of filmmakers, especially of the auteur oriented sort like Federico Fellini and Alexander Kluge, but also seemingly autistic Hollywood blockbuster whores like Steven Spielberg and Michael Bay. Undoubtedly, if any American auteur provides great evidence to this theory, it is screenwriter turned filmmaker Paul Schrader (Cat People, Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters), who first came to fame for penning Taxi Driver (1976) and would go on to direct a number of cinematic works that feel like reworkings of the screenplay for that film. Indeed, if Hardcore (1979) is a sort of 'Calvinist Taxi Driver' and Affliction (1997) is a 'redneck Taxi Driver,' Schrader's Light Sleeper (1992) is a 'bourgeois Taxi Driver,' albeit with a tad bit of American Gigolo (1980) thrown in for good measure (additionally, The Walker (2007) would be Schrader's 'dick-sucking Southern dandy American Gigolo' and the Scorsese/Schrader collaboration Bringing Out the Dead (1999) is like 'Taxi Driver as an EMT'). Of course, in the sense that it is about a reasonably intelligent ex-drug addict who is suffering a midlife crisis, one could argue that it is the most autobiographical of Schrader's Bressonian 'a man and his room' films. In fact, as the auteur stated himself in the book Schrader on Schrader & Other Writings (1990) in regard to Light Sleeper and its relation to his other works, "Well, that form of the script is the same as the format of TAXI DRIVER, in that it uses pseudo-chapters rather than scene numbers, but the deeper connection comes from the fact that this is a character that I have felt comfortable with in the past and hadn't written about in some time. As to the specific moments – well, you don't want to be too self-referential, but if it works, it works, and if you're ploughing the same row ten or fifteen years on, you're going to end up with the same roots being dug up. The character of John LeTour is, in my mind, another installment of the characters of Travis Bickle in TAXI DRIVER and Julian Kay in AMERICAN GIGOLO. These characters are really not so much people as souls, they drift around and things happen to them, they watch and they are acted upon. I don't really see this group of films as a trilogy, I just think that as I get older my views about this character and these themes change. So that when the character and myself were in our twenties, he was very hostile and paranoid and felt oppressed by the world, and was a cab driver. When he was in his thirties he was very narcissistic and self-involved, and he was a gigolo. Now he's forty and he's anxious and uncertain, and he delivers drugs. He hasn't made anything of his life, and he doesn't know what will become of him." Needless to say, Light Sleeper does not feature a grungy porno-obsessed prole weirdo who becomes murderously obsessed with saving a hopelessly naive teenage prostitute from a white pimp like in Taxi Driver, but it does feature a devastating portrait of self-destructive inwardness that explodes into a poetic transcendental bloodbath.

I might be a good decade shy of suffering a midlife crisis and I have never sold drugs as a career, but I certainly could somewhat empathize with the loner protagonist of Schrader's film, even if I found him to be somewhat of a passive bitch in many respects. Indeed, I could identify with the titular insomniac in the sense that the protagonist feels like he is trapped in a sort of perpetual soul-draining personal pandemonium where he hates his job and life and feels like he has no other options and has run out of what he describes as "luck" (notably, the protagonist and his friends believe in New Age bullshit and love chatting about numerology, among other hopelessly banal esoteric things). Undoubtedly, the increasingly mentally perturbed protagonist is like a forlorn phantom who passively drifts through life and does only the bare minimum to survive in his insufferably sterile and stagnant world of white collar dope dealing, though a seeming case of hypergraphia compels him to write in journals that he disposes of soon after he finishes filling them up with writing, as if he is ashamed of what he has written and considers it to be more or less a disposable waste that is the putrid result of his brain defecating. A film about a man with no life who, due to his trade, is constantly wandering in and out of other people's lives, it is not surprisingly probably the only flick where a drug dealer is used as a midlife crisis metaphor. While an extremely personal cinematic work, the protagonist is actually based on a real-life drug dealer that Schrader knew and naturally decided to reconnect with when he was assembling the project. Interestingly, Schrader has also compared Light Sleeper to Taxi Driver in the sense that he wrote the script very fast as if he was being compelled by some unseen force, or as he stated himself, "It came to me pretty much as a piece; I saw it all, and I always knew what was going to come next. What happened was that I had a dream about this character sometime in September 1990, somebody I had know years before. I woke up at about four in the morning, and I knew from that moment that he wanted me to write about him. By six I also knew I was definitely going to do just that. I hadn't written about this type of character in almost ten years. I'd been looking around for a personal, original piece to write and it hadn't been coming, so I had given up, and then it just came. So I set off to track down this man I had known." It should also be noted that Schrader has himself described Light Sleeper as an 'inverse Taxi Driver,' as the autobiographical lead was transformed from an active man that symbolically drove the cab to a passive man that sits in the back (in fact, Willem Dafoe spends almost as much as time in a taxi as De Niro's did in the Scorsese flick).

Not surprisingly, Schrader has described Light Sleep as his most personal film, with the prole ex-GI Travis Bickle being replaced with a character that the auteur could more relate to as a spiritually-oriented ex-drug addict who has suffered much personal failure, especially in relation to love and romance. During the film, the protagonist is reunited with his great love—a woman he has not seen in a longtime who he had a very toxic relationship with that involved lots of drugs and self-destruction—by happenstance and makes a predictable attempt to get back with her, only to lose her in the most violent and tragic of ways, thereupon leading him to take serious action for possibly the first time in his entire life. An emotionally turbulent flick with a somewhat ironical ending about a man who is only able to get free from his personal purgatory by finally accepting he is imprisoned, Light Sleeper is a tale of personal redemption that most people will find totally inexplicable because the morose protagonist ultimately loses his personal freedom at the conclusion yet develops a hopeful and optimistic mindset as a result. In other words, Schrader's film is a somewhat arcane cinematic work that probably can only be truly understood and/or appreciated by people that have experienced some form personal despair or alienation. Indeed, Light Sleeper might be about bourgeois coke peddlers and features some sex and nudity and a couple of violent deaths, but it is probably not going to appeal to someone that sees the guido gangsters of Scorsese's Goodfellas (1990) as cool cats that are worthy of emulation. In that sense, Schrader's film is one of only a handful of cinematic works that makes drug dealing seem about as glamorous as working as a technician at a Wal-Mart pharmacy.

As seemingly perennially dejected dope dealing protagonist John LeTour (Willem Dafoe) narrates at the very beginning of the film while riding in the back of a taxi, "Labor Day weekend. Some time for a garbage strike. Everybody crazy to stock up. They want to score at the last minute and they want it now. Never fails. The faces look alike. You gotta use memory tricks: each has some peculiarity. It keeps your sharp. A D.D. told me, when a drug dealer starts writing a diary, it's time to quit. I started writing after that. Not every night. Now and then. Fill up one book, throw it out, start another." Indeed, not unlike with the summer heat that makes the wops and negroes in Spike Lee's Do the Right Thing (1989) become all the more irritable and destructive, the sight and stench of piles upon piles of trash that are crowding the streets of NYC as a result of the garbage strike seems to be only compounding LeTour's unending personal misery, which reaches its peak in the film and is ultimately released in the form of murder. A reformed drug addict that has ironically spent over the last decade peddling cocaine to a rich and largely Wall Street connected clientele that is willing to pay a highly inflated price so they don't have to endanger their lives by attempting to procure dubious product from dubious darkies on the literally and figuratively dark side of town, LeTour is a born loner-cum-loser that is forced to regularly socialize with various individuals that he seems to be quite apathetic towards as a result of his trade, including a 'Theological Cokehead' (David Spade) who states to the protagonist whilst sitting in his whitey tighties in between snorting a line of blow, "...so if there's no God, then how can we conceive of him? I mean, the idea of God presupposes the existence of God. That is the Ontological Argument. That's Anselm. That's 1200 or 1400." The protagonist works for a hot yet vulgar fire-crotched fag hag named Ann (Susan Sarandon) and her mustached best fag friend Robert (David Clennon), who looks like the typical AIDS-ridden homo agitator featured in Rosa von Praunheim's aberrosexual agitprop docs Silence = Death (1990) and Positive (1990). As LeTour describes, Ann "made" him the d.d. bitch-boy he is today, as he found her glamorous and wanted to become a part of her supposedly exciting life, but a lot of things have changed since the 1970s and crack has destroyed the supposed glamour that was once associated with the black market drug trade. While Ann and Robert plan to get out of the criminal underground and go legit by starting a super chic cosmetics company, LeTour does not know what he wants to do, though he is thinking about getting into music recording. Of course, as his various past failed life plans demonstrate, LeTour is an aimless and seemingly weak-willed fellow who cannot seem to commit to anything, including Ann, who is clearly a longtime romantic interest of his. While Ann incessantly flirts with him to the point where she jokes about giving him blowjobs, LeTour just cannot seem to initiate a love affair with her, even though he is in her company all the time. Luckily, fate will force the protagonist to get a little bit of testicular fortitude and compel him to take serious action, even though he does not want to.

As a result of a "yuppie murder" involving a "19-year-old Barnard co-ed bitch" whose corpse was found with a large amount of cocaine in the middle of a public park, the police have become interested in high-class drug dealers of LeTour's ostensibly cultivated caliber. As a man that does not own a TV and does not read newspapers, LeTour learns about the homicide from a dopey ghetto wigger dope dealer named 'Jealous' (Sam Rockwell), who warns him to be on the lookout for pesky cops. Jealous also complains that, "19 gram shit is a drag" in regard to the size of their dope transaction, but the protagonist is not about to get charged with dealing because he is carrying a couple extra grams of the rich man's candy (as LeTour explains regarding the law, "19 is carrying, 20 is dealing" when it comes to cocaine). Not surprisingly, LeTour does not think much of his buyers or their drug-addled pseudo-philosophical rants as demonstrated by his remark, "Everybody wants to talk. It's like a compulsion. My philosophy is: You got nothing to say? Don't say it. They figure, you can tell a D.D. anything. Things they'd never tell anyone else. Of course they're stoned to start." Despite his antisocial attitude, LeTour cares enough about clients to not let them kill themselves with the drugs that he sells them. Indeed, when a fairly Jew-y junky Wall Street type of the exceedingly effeminate sort named Eddie (Paul Jabara)—a fellow whose drug addiction apparently ruined his marriage and a number of jobs—demands more drugs than the protagonist is willing to sell them, LeTour refuses to give in and later calls his client's brother when he suffers a sort of violently deranged dope psychosis. Undoubtedly, LeTour's most prestigious client is a suave yet slimy Swiss prick named Tis (Hebrew Victor Garber doing his best 'evil Aryan aristocrat' caricature) who has the protagonist deliver him some Valium (aka diazepam) at a hospital as a result of getting exceedingly stressed that he had to bring an underage teenage girl to the emergency room after she overdosed on coke. Although he has no clue at the beginning of the film, Tis will ultimately become LeTour's arch nemesis.

While LeTour has nothing to live for at the beginning of the film, that somewhat changes during a dreary rainy night when he spots his ex-girlfriend Marianne Jošt (Dana Delany) standing outside in the rain while riding in a taxi. LeTour has not seen or talked to Marianne in many years and she is not exactly happy to see him because they had a considerably corrosive drug-fueled relationship that concluded in a nasty fashion. Apparently, LeTour has made numerous attempts to reconnect with his ex-flame, but she has routinely ignored him as she fears reigniting the passionate and exciting yet mutually destructive cocaine-driven romance that they once had. While Marianne reluctantly agrees to get in the taxi, she soon gets out after LeTour lies to her by telling her that he is completely straight and has quit dealing (somewhat humorously, LeTour's beeper gives him away immediately after he tells Marianne in a seemingly sincere fashion that his powder-peddling days are over). Luckily for the protagonist, he later bumps into Marianne and her much nicer sister Randi (Jane Adams) while delivering drugs to Tis at the hospital. The Jošt sisters are at the hospital because their mother is dying of cancer, so it is a somewhat awkward time for LeTour to attempt to weasel his way back into Marianne's life. While her mother apparently loves him, Marianne refuses to allow LeTour to see her, though she agrees to follow him to the hospital cafeteria where she unloads her many justifiable grievances and complaints in regard to the seemingly nightmarish nature of their terribly failed romance. Somewhat ridiculously, Marianne more or less blames LeTour for ruining her entire life. Indeed, when LeTour dares to happily state to her in regard to their past relationship, "We were happy," she somewhat aggressively replies, "We were miserable. We were either scoring or coming down. Mostly coming down." Naturally, when the protagonist states, "Out on the streets dancing with friends. . . We were magical," Marianne begs to differ and replies, "You took off for 3 months without telling me and called once. That's how magical we were. You were an encyclopedia of suicidal fantasies. I heard every one. I mean, nobody could clear a room like you, John. And the friends, you may have noticed, turned out to be mine, not yours. I envy you. A convenient memory is a gift from God. In rehab it's called 'Euphoric Recall.' You only remember the highs, never the lows." Of course, Marianne's unwavering negativity and hostility does not stop LeTour from attempting to get her back, as he then brags to her about being clean from drugs for two years and states, "If I could do that, I could do anything. We could do anything. We could start all over again." Somewhat annoyed that he is attempting to drag her back into a relationship that she assumes will be catastrophic for her life, Marianne abruptly decides to leave, though the viewer suspects that she still loves the protagonist and that she is fighting as hard as she can to not give into her deep-seated emotional and lustful longings. That night, instead of thinking about Marianne when he gets home, LeTour writes in regard to his sassy fag hag boss, "I can always find another way to make a living. I never planned this in the first place. Not like Ann. She came up to sell, have parties, make contacts. She was glamorous. I just wanted to be around her. She'd sit up listening to coke stories. Now it's me and Robert. The whole crowd was the same age then. Everybody's younger now. She made me." Of course, LeTour's desire to reignite his romance with Marianne does not end there.

When he has a lunch 'date' with Ann the next day, LeTour asks his beautiful boss, "What are the odds of meeting someone that you haven't seen in years twice in 2 days?" and she reveals her affinity for metaphysical mumbo jumbo by replying, "If it's indicated in your house of relationships, it's pretty high. You should have Robert do your chart." Indeed, aside from playing films directed by Crowleyite auteur Kenneth Anger at her apartment (indeed, during a scene at the beginning of the film, Scorpio Rising (1964) can be seen playing on a TV in Ann's apartment), Ann is into numerology and Madame Blavatsky, among other things that demonstrate that she is a superstitious chick who lives life according to 'emotions' and 'senses' as opposed to reason. While LeTour and Ann both seem like they want to declare their romantic affection for one another, it seems like they have too many emotional and psychological hang-ups to say what they really mean. When Ann asks him if he will still keep in contact with her after they close their underground stardust operation, LeTour holds Ann's hand and passionately declares in an unintentionally goofy fashion, "Ann, you want me, just call. Write a letter, tell a wino, I'll be there." Naturally, Ann is somewhat taken aback by LeTour's response and does not know how to react. While LeTour's conversation with Ann does not lead to anywhere romantic, he does finally rekindle his long awaited lurid love affair with his ex-flame Marianne later that night. Indeed, while she does accuse the protagonist of wasting a decade of her life, Marianne cannot help but kiss him in the hospital hallway and then take him back to her inordinately stylishly decorated apartment where they make passionate love. Notably, it is apparently the first time the two have fucked when they were both sober. While staring at LeTour's purple-headed love truncheon, Marianne remarks while practically drooling, "That's quite an erection!" and he replies, "I never had anything like it stoned." In fact, Marianne is so hopelessly horny that she gleefully confesses to the protagonist in regard to her aroused main vein, "I'm dripping." While the two have seemingly otherworldly sex and subsequently fall asleep while embracing one another in a loving fashion, LeTour later awakes to find Marianne getting dressed and preparing to sneak out of the apartment, thus underscoring the female character's annoyingly emotionally schizophrenic behavior. When LeTour questions her about what she is doing, Marianne states in an exceedingly bitchy fashion, "This is the end. It was wonderful and I'm glad it happened this way. It will never happen again. You will not call me. You will not see me again. I'm happy for you. I wish you the best. I'm leaving. I shouldn't have left the hospital, but I don't regret it. Please get dressed and leave as soon as you can. I have a key. Bye." Needless to say, LeTour refuses to accept his ladylove's rather callous final farewell, though, as the film soon demonstrates, both he and she would have been better off if he had.

On top of the fact that Marianne has dropped out of his life again and refuses to return his calls, LeTour finds himself being hassled by a short angry guido cop with the rather fitting name Bill Guidone (Robert Cicchini) who threatens to bust him if he does not give him any leads regarding the death of the rich 19-year-old "co-ed bitch" that was found with dope on her, stating in a stereotypically bombastic wop-ish fashion, "Tell me something I don't already know. It's either that, leave town, or get your ass busted day in, day out." When LeTour discovers that Marianne's mother has finally died, he makes the major mistake of randomly showing up at the funeral where he is predictably immediately verbally reamed by his morbidly depressed (ex)lover. Indeed, as soon as she sees the protagonist walk into the funeral home, Marianne causes a scene by smacking and pushing him while screaming in his face like a demented banshee bitch on crack, "Every time you come into my life something terrible happens. I thought I was rid of you. What are you . . . ? How did you . . . ? I don't want you here! I don't want you around! I don't want you around my mother! Damn you! Just get out! Get the fuck out of my life! Get out! Get out of here!" As LeTour soon discovers, Marianne's mother died when they were fucking, hence her hateful irrational hostility towards him, as if their lovemaking session resulted in her mommy's long overdue death. Later that night when LeTour goes to deliver some drugs to Swiss twit Tis at his luxury sky rise apartment, he is horrified to find Marianne there totally stoned out of her mind. Needless to say, Marianne is quite embarrassed and refrains from saying anything to LeTour. When a visibly highly dejected LeTour exits the apartment building, he soon hears a woman scream and receives the heartbreaking shock of a lifetime when he sees Marianne's corpse lying on the sidewalk pavement. Naturally, LeTour refuses to believe that Marianne would commit suicide by jumping out of a building. While the police, media, and even her family conclude that Marianne committed self-slaughter since she was morbidly depressed as a result of both her's mother death and the fact that she had completely ruined her life and had nothing to live for, LeTour immediately realizes that Tis killed both the 19-year-old teen and his lady love and thus seeks to take revenge against the super smug Swiss neo-preppie prick.

After calling guido cop Guidone and telling him that Marianne was murdered and hinting that Tis was the killer, LeTour decides that he must protect himself and buys a handgun from a sleazy Latino and his sub-literate Afro-Hispanic homeboy. When Ann demands that the protagonist deliver some drugs to Tis, he attempts to refuse and complains, "I don't want to go. I have a bad vibe." Ultimately, LeTour eventually reluctantly agrees to deliver dope to Tis when Ann volunteers to accompany him, though he demands that they make a detour stop at his apartment so that he can grab his supposed "lucky sweater" (aka his gun). When the two cultivated coke dealers finally arrive at Tis' place, they are shocked to see two armed bodyguards at the door. In fact, the bodyguards piss Ann off so much that she grabs one of their guns, tosses it onto the ground, and yells, "I told you greasy fucks, no guns! When I see a fucking gun, I walk! How fucking dare you?!" Of course, Ann does not stop there, as she goes up to the other body guard—a small and swarthy mestizo—and hits him in the testicles while screaming, "And I don't know who you are, you little beaner, but kiss my fat ass!" When Tis finally comes out, he apologizes for the weapons and says they are merely for "emphasis." While Ann somewhat calms down, she knows something is suspicious when Tis tells her to leave so that he can talk to LeTour about police matters. Undoubtedly a smart little bitch that does not take shit from anyone, Ann follows Tis' demand by exiting the apartment but then proceeds to start screaming "fire" while knocking on various apartment doors, thus assuring the police will soon be there. As soon as Ann begins screaming like a harpy, a somewhat anticlimatic gun fight breaks out that ends with Tis running to a back bedroom while LeTour shoots and kills his two bodyguards, though the protagonist is shot in both the arm and leg in the process. Clearly in great pain as a result of his wounds, LeTour wobbles into the back bedroom where he shoots LeTour in the middle of the forehead while he less than inconspicuously attempts to grab a gun that he has hidden inside a duffle bag. Naturally, LeTour is subsequently imprisoned for murdering Tis and the two body guards, though he is in inordinately high spirits for a man that will probably spend the next half of a decade locked inside a cage located inside a maximum security prison full of psychopathic negro rapists, Latino gang members, and goombah gangsters, among other forms of human rabble. In the final scene of the film, which is an obvious homage to Robert Bresson's Pickpocket (1959), Ann visits LeTour in jail and the two expression their desire begin a lurid love affair. Indeed, after describing how he will probably spend no more than 5-7 years in prison, LeTour reveals that he is in high hopes and tells Ann, "It hasn't been so bad. It's a relief in a way. So far. I've been writing. . . And reading." LeTour also decides to ask Ann, "Did we ever fuck?," even though he already knows the answer. In regard to their future plan to finally fuck, LeTour states to Anne, "It's one of the things I think about. One of the things I look forward to. I've been looking forward," to which she replies, "Me, too. Strange how things work." In the end, LeTour kisses Ann's hand as a sort of gesture of love and devotion to her, even if it is doubtful that any woman would wait so many years for a man, especially a man

Undoubtedly, the great borderline infuriating irony of Light Sleeper is that the hapless protagonist only becomes 'free' when he is imprisoned, as if he was so perennially stubborn in his fatalistically forlorn mindset that it took becoming a murderous criminal to realize what was right in front of his face all along, especially in terms of love, but of course one should not expect anything less from a Schrader flick where the whole Bressonian redemption motif is taken to almost absurdist extremes that border on the (pseudo)Biblical. Another great irony of the film is that, although it is hopelessly late-1980s/early-1990s in terms of overall aesthetic and largely soulless characters and was made at a time where auteurist cinema was practically completely dead, it is more auteur oriented and non-commercial in its essence than the most personal and idiosyncratic works of the New Hollywood era. Somewhat inexplicably, even the rather outmoded score by Michael Been (who incidentally played the apostle John in the Schrader penned Scorsese flick The Last Temptation of Christ (1988)) still manages to perfectly compliment the film (notably, Schrader originally planned to use some Bob Dylan songs, but luckily he decided otherwise). It should also be noted that the film was shot by American cinematographer Edward Lachman who got his start acting as an assistant director and cameraman on Werner Herzog's masterpiece Stroszek (1977) and would go on to shoot important cinematic works ranging from Larry Clark's quasi-pornographic skater melodrama Ken Park (2002) to Ulrich Seidl's no less pornographic anti-globalization drama Import/Export (2007) to Todd Solondz's pedo piece Life During Wartime (2009). While it is quite obvious that Lachman at least partly modeled his cinematography after Taxi Driver, especially the many scenes where the protagonist is riding in a taxi, Schrader had the cinematographer watch a couple early Michelangelo Antonioni films to give him an idea of the look he wanted (notably, as the auteur once stated in regard to the film's look, "Antonioni is always good to look at because he loves to define situations by architecture"). Of course, the NYC architecture featured in the film is as dreary and emotionally oppressive as the protagonist's forsaken soul, thus making it all the more fitting that it concludes in a brightly lit white prison after the protagonist has figuratively 'seen the light.'

While Light Sleeper is surely not my favorite Schrader flick, it is arguably the director's most immaculate cinematic work to date. Indeed, aside from the dubiousness of the somewhat abrupt murderous climax (personally, I could not imagine a passive pussy like the protagonist killing anyone, let alone three men in a couple minutes) and glaring recycling of the Bressonian ending of American Gigolo, there is not much to criticize (indeed, I even found Susan Sarandon, who I usually cannot stand, quite fuckable, even when I was hoping someone would shove their cock in her mouth so that she would shut up). In its depiction of swarthy Wall Street types high on dope and a scene where Sarandon repugnantly flirts with a young Hasidic Hebrew that she regularly does 'business' with,

Schrader's film also has a vague and wholly unintentional Der Stürmer-esque quality. Considering the film's decidedly dispiriting tone and grim and gloomy aesthetic essence, I think it is only fitting that it features a Hasidic Jew, as they subscribe to a religion that worships death and they have a physical appearance that I personally find to be more insufferably grotesque than that of a semi-rotten bloated corpse, but I digress. While Light Sleeper has what might be described as a happy ending, it is still a decided downer that sometimes makes Taxi Driver seem like a dark romantic-comedy by comparison, even if it is nowhere near as violent or sleazy (in fact, Schrader should be commended for his understated approach to such subversive material). After all, there is not many films were a terribly troubled loner finds solace after killing three guys and being imprisoned, but such is the uniquely unhinged vision of a (once) suicidal lapsed Calvinist that was a member of a supposedly hip cocaine-fueled cocksucker party scene during the 1970s despite being heterosexual. A bizarrely optimistic 'feel-bad' flick that concludes in an almost absurdly yet somehow fittingly utopian way, Light Sleeper is a film that demonstrates to the viewer in a sensitively nuanced fashion that, no matter how miserable and unendurable existence gets, there will always be another exciting chapter in your life, even if your great love is thrown out of a building by a rather dapper Swiss psychopath.

FOREVER MINE

Paul Schrader (1999)

As a filmmaker from a strict Dutch Calvinist background that makes intellectually oriented films about supremely fucked-up and oftentimes self-destructive individuals who once confessed that he was finally able to learn how to properly touch and have normal relationships with woman by hanging out with very touchy-feely oriented gay men, film critic turned screenwriter turned cinematic auteur Paul Schrader (Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters, The Canyons)—arguably the last worthwhile and fairly untainted filmmaker of the so-called New Hollywood movement—does not exactly seem like someone that would be suitable for directing a lavish tragic romance with a sort of classic Golden Age Hollywood style yet he did just that and naturally it is one strange and sometimes baffling cinematic monster that makes love seem like a morbid mental illness that consumes the soul. Indeed, Schrader's self-described "beauty film" Forever Mine (1999) is, in many ways, not only the director's most bizarre work, but also his most overt artistic disaster as a shockingly ambitious flick that is ultimately, quite unfortunately, less than the sum of its parts, though nonetheless certainly worth seeing at least once, especially for those that already have an appreciation for the auteur (after all, the film is superior to a number of the director's other works, including Blue Collar (1978), Light Of Day (1987), Witch Hunt (1994), Touch (1997), Dominion: Prequel to the Exorcist (2005), Adam Resurrected (2008), and the studio-destroyed The Dying of the Light (2014)). In fact, I would almost argue that the film is a cinematic tragedy, as a would neo-Sirkian romantic epic that was supposed to seamlessly weave elements of a Scorseseian guido gangster flick and a De Palma crime-thriller, yet ultimately does not completely work as it was supposed to due to various reasons, not least of all lead Joseph Fiennes' glaringly uneven performance in a dual role. As Schrader has described in interviews, Fiennes had the impossible tasking of playing "Leonardo DiCaprio in TITANIC and Pacino in CARLITO'S WAY in the same movie." As for female lead Gretchen Mol, she demonstrates that she was a cold yet compulsively cute cunt long before her role as the always charming son-fucking whore murderess Gillian Darmody on Boardwalk Empire (2010-2014). Originally written by Schrader in the late-1980s for producer Alan Ladd (not to be confused with the tragic actor of the same name) at MGM and later brought to Columbia Pictures where Patrick Swayze of all people was originally scheduled to play the lead role, Forever Mine was ultimately put on the backburner for over a decade until after the director began filming his minor masterpiece Affliction (1997) in Montreal and he randomly met a Sri Lanka-Born conman named Damita Nikapota—a supremely shady fellow that was later imprisoned for using dead film producers' identities and producing imaginary films with titles like 'The Flying Scotsman'—who luckily agreed to raise funds for the film. While Schrader finally managed to complete his dream romance flick, it succumbed to a similar sorry fate as many of his other films and ultimately made its debut on the Starz! cable channel instead of theaters after the film's production company went bankrupt and its assets were taken over by its Dutch insurers, who did not seem too keen on even promoting the film. Described by Schrader himself as being, "...nineteenth-century schmaltz: the formerly-thought-dead lover comes back in altered form, that Count of Monte Cristo/Heathcliff thing. I was trying to tap into the old sense of melodrama, with very lush visuals, and make a retro movie," Forever Mine is indeed an oftentimes pleasantly pulchritudinous yet mean-spirited and even misanthropic piece of rather refreshing filmic fluff with a dark and demented romantic edge that questions the sanity of individuals that completely submit to pure love, especially when it involves a treacherous woman that has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that she can never ever be trusted. In short, the film more or less portrays men that devote themselves to one single woman as recklessly self-destructive fools with their heads in the clouds who do not know when to quit and women as petty and callous and almost wholly glacial creatures that tend to prefer being with a wealthy and powerful man who cannot even get their pussy wet to a modest man that they love and have an otherworldly sexual relationship with. Featuring an original score by David Lynch regular Angelo Badalamenti, Schrader's rather artistically ardent film depicts in a somewhat aesthetically schizophrenic way the internal purgatory a young lovelorn man is trapped in after finding his one-true-love in a sunny beach paradise, only for said one-true-love to betray him in a nearly deadly fashion that results in both his physical and psychological transformation in what is ultimately a rare relatively contemporary American movie that demonstrates in a largely allegorical way the sort of misery that a woman can afflict on her lover, especially when monetary concerns are involved.

As made quite clear in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998) by Peter Biskind, Schrader is anything but a lady's man and when he was getting his start as a young screenwriter in Hollywood during the 1970s, no woman wanted anything to do with him, or as one excerpt from the book reveals, "Women didn't like Schrader, didn't appreciate his finer points. He had a crush on [Margot] Kidder. One night, the two of them were driving along Sunset in his car to meet Brian [De Palma] at a screening. 'Kiss me! Kiss me!' he implored, out of the blue. She pulled away [...] Paul was crushed, felt like he must display the mark of Cain. She slept with everything in pants—except him [...] Like Kidder, Sandy Weintraub couldn't stand Schrader: 'Paul was a very messed up human being. When he left his apartment, he went to a bar and sat there and drank all night.'" Indeed, when not bonding over guns with Hebraic 'Zen Fascist' John Milius and hanging out with his cocksucking comrades in a cocaine-fueled gay party scene, Schrader was failing badly with the ladies and it was only when he became an established filmmaker that things began to slightly change. For example, while working on his first self-described “beauty film” Cat People (1982), Schrader began a short-lived ‘romance’ with lead heroine Nastassja Kinski that ended with a failed marriage proposal and the filmmaker traveling to Europe to chase his love interest, who ultimately terribly humiliated him by stating, “Paul, I always fuck my directors. And with you it was difficult.” Like Cat People, Forever Mine features a Dante and Beatrice motif, though it is clear that Schrader, who went on to marry and have children with actress Mary Beth Hurt, has grown quite cynical as the years have passed in regard to pure love, especially when it comes to seemingly immaculately beautiful young women whose physical allurements are in stark contrast to their minds and souls. A sort of gleefully genre-bending romance-crime-drama-thriller that updates the theme of classic ancient Occidental myths like Tristan and Iseult and Orpheus and Eurydice in regard to love and sexuality compatibility not exactly always making for the most perfect of relationships, Schrader’s artistically enterprising experiment in narrative construction is a sort of romance flick for cynics who have given up on love yet still have nostalgia for past loves.

Schrader’s first film shot in CinemaScope, Forever Mine is somewhat of an unintentionally eccentric aesthetic enigma as a cinematic work that transforms from a sort of candy-colored beachside fairytale into a bourgeois Victorian Gothic erotic thriller, with early Fassbinder style dilapidated apartment scenes, flagrant Scorsese-esque Catholic imagery, and post-industrial ruins thrown in for good measure. Indeed, the film might be a mess of a movie in various ways, but it is a surprisingly enthralling mess of a movie with an oftentimes unpredictable yet absurdly improbable storyline that defies all sense and logic to the point of being embarrassingly addictive, even on subsequent viewings (in fact, I have watched the film four times and it holds up each time). Featuring stereotypically boorish and moronic garlic-marinated guido gangsters with fragile egos, a shamelessly and psychopathically corrupt politician that finds romantic poetry to be the language of a raving retard, an Anglo-Saxon college student that magically transforms into an extremely wealthy disfigured Latino black market ‘banker’ with connections to Contras and the South American drug underworld, and a fine ass female protagonist whose insufferable frigidness can only be penetrated by the protagonist’s prick and incessant flowery poetic pronouncements, the film may have various dubious ingredients that have about as much chemistry as Godiva chocolate and sun-fried dog shit, but it never fails to enthrall and surprise. Undoubtedly, another intriguing element of the film is that it features a sort of Dionysian hero that makes insanely irrational and oftentimes highly deleterious decisions for love and an Apollonian antagonist that is a cruel and calculating politician who specifically loathes the protagonist because of his talent for lurid love poetry and absurdly romantic Weltanschauung. Indeed, to the scumbag antagonist’s credit, the protagonist is nothing if not a ludicrously lovesick fool who practically invites his own death not once but twice just so that he can prove to himself that his “love is pure,” hence his vocal willingness to die for love.

After beginning with the somewhat fitting yet slightly pretentious Walter Pater quote, “It is the addition of strangeness to beauty that constitutes the romantic character in art” and an opening credit sequence featuring an almost obscenely pink fantasy castle that is ultimately revealed to be a hotel (in fact, the hotel in question, Loews Don CeSar Hotel in St. Pete Beach, Florida, was also used in Robert Altman’s Health (1980) and Sergio Leone’s Once Upon a Time in America (1984)), the film cuts to a shot of a man with a disfigured face named Manuel Esquema (Joseph Fiennes) sitting on an airplane next to his friend and body guard Javier Cesti (Vincent Laresca) while looking particularly forlorn, as if he is haunted by something and/or someone from his past. The year is 1987 and Esquema—a WASP pretending to be a Latino that has literally created a totally new identity for himself—is flying from Miami to New York to confront his past in the form of both the woman he loved who betrayed him and the man that thought he killed him. The last time these two people saw Esquema, he was a poor bum with big romantic dreams that lived in a dirty dilapidated apartment, but now he is an extremely wealthy international financier that does business with banks from all around the world, especially dirty ones. Flash back “14 years earlier,” the same man is depicted riding a bus to a Miami, though his name is not Esquema but Alan Riply and he is a terribly naïve yet passionate 23-year-old college student that has come to the coast of southeastern Florida to work as a lowly cabana boy at a luxury castle-like hotel with his somewhat hyperactive Hispanic homeboy Javier. While Javier attempts to coerce Alan into getting into the drug dealing business with him, the protagonist has his mind on somewhat more savory and romantic things, especially after he randomly spots a blonde beauty named Ella Brice (Gretchen Mol) emerging from the water one day while he is working on the beach. Using his job as a cabana boy as a reason to immediately introduce himself to her, Alan almost immediately becomes wax-poetic around Ella, who seems intrigued with the protagonist’s somewhat idiosyncratic way with words, radiating charms, and inordinate kindness and empathy. Of course, as a seemingly long-suffering wife in a lonely one-sided marriage with an up-and-coming New York politician who clearly is more interested in his work than her tits and ass, Ella cannot help but be smitten with the cute and charming cabana boy, who has her complete and undivided attention. As Ella will later confess to Alan, she, like many women, only married her husband Mark Brice (Ray Liotta) for his power and money, as she was previously a poor secretary that was ashamed of her humble background and cheap clothes. Needless to say, when Ella ends up falling in love with the poor cabana boy, she has a hard time fighting her natural female instincts towards hypergamy and cannot possibly fathom dumping her successful husband for an eccentric hopeless romantic who speaks in riddles and does not have a penny to his name.

Naturally, as a man that seems to believe that he fallen in love at first sight and is convinced that he must dedicate every moment of the rest of his life to one single woman, Alan—an obsessive romantic that spends his free time in his scantily decorated one-room apartment staring at a photo of his love interest—almost immediately begins borderline stalking Ella and when the heroine soon realizes this she becomes both fearful of and infatuated with the eccentric young cabana boy. Indeed, after strategically recommending that her husband Mark go to the hotel's nightclub one night, Alan shows up to said nightclub to spy on Ella while lurking in the shadows like a shy Don Juan that has yet to completely cultivate his romantic moves. When Ella leaves the club alone, Alan follows her home to declare his love for her, stating, "I think you're extraordinary," but she coldly replies, "There's always another woman." While Ella blows Alan off and tells him, "If my husband even saw us standing here—he doesn't think anything is innocent," she is clearly intrigued by the protagonist and voyeuristically gazes at him from her hotel window after they part ways, as if she regrets not immediately jumping on his cock. Indeed, one gets the impression that Ella got extremely wet as a result of the short conversation with Alan and immediately diddled her clit upon entering her hotel room. The next day, Alan is quite delighted when Ella approaches him on the beach while carrying a pink bikini and boldly declares to him in an overtly salacious fashion, "I was wondering what it would be like for us to kiss." Not only do the two soon kiss right there on the beach, but Alan also manages to coerce Ella into faking sick as a way to blow off a boat trip with her husband so that she can spend the evening with with him instead. Needless to say, Alan and Ella immediately make otherworldly orgasmic love that clearly penetrates the heroine in a fashion that she previously never felt possible. After the lovemaking session, the two go to a local bar where the two act like completely innocent youthful high school lovers and Ella states to Alan in an unintentionally incriminating fashion during a rare moment of vulnerability, "Sometimes it just amazes me. We're all so self-centered. And then you look around and you see everyone else. Everyone is the main character in their lives. They all have a story." Of course, as the trophy wife of an insanely arrogant and self-centered opportunistic asshole who does not take her seriously, Ella barely has a life and she makes for an awfully banal and passive main character in her own story.

Despite everything being so perfectly magical during their wild and wanton day of fucking, Ella demonstrates that she might be a tad bit bipolar by randomly turning into a cold bitch that same exact night. Indeed, after cynically stating that her hotel is nothing more than a "fantasy castle" and that she is in "fantasyland," Ella tells Alan her sob "story," stating in a somewhat bitchy fashion, "I was in the secretarial pool...Xeroxing, getting coffee, guys making jokes about me, the way I dressed. I didn't have any money. We didn't have any money. We moved from place to place. And then...guess what? The boss started asking me out. Everything changed. Then I became...Mrs. Mark Brice.

So...you like my story? Are you disappointed?" While Alan attempts to get Ella to leave her husband for him by simply stating with supreme confidence, "You will never be loved the way you are now. You never have been, and you never will be," her transformation into an ice queen is already complete and she declares, "I'm leaving tomorrow, it's over!" Naturally, being someone that was previously a working-class broad, Ella cannot fathom going back to living a life of lame lumpenprole stagnancy and describes Alan's plan as simply "impossible." While Alan stoically declares, "Refusal to love is just an excuse for cowardice. Emotional cowardice," Ella is just too damn feminine to have any intrinsic understanding of cowardice and will later betray her true love in such a pathetically pusillanimous fashion that it almost results in his death. Like most women, Ella is very concerned with her future security, yet what happens to the man she loves never really seems to cross her mind.

When Ella leaves the hotel with her husband to go back to the sterile suburbs of New York after their vacation is over, Alan immediately quits his job and borrows his homey Javier's car so that he can drive to his beloved's hometown where he plans to relocate permanently. Indeed, Alan wastes no time in acquiring an entry level position at a bank and renting a dilapidated one-room apartment in a quaint ghetto. While Ella is excited when she learns that Alan has moved nearby to be with her and the two once again have great sex after she sneaks out of her house to pay him a visit, the heroine once again morphs into a quite cunty ice queen during a post-coital conversation involving cheap Chinese takeout where she expresses her abject disgust with his crummy apartment (where the protagonist has notably written "Give All To Love" across the wall) and how she cannot bear the thought again of having to live in such a lowly fashion ever again. In short, Ella, like many women, is unwilling to settle for hypogamy and tells the protagonist that there is no way that she could ever considering divorcing Mark and getting with him, stating like the most fiercely frigid of quasi-lesbianic public school administrators, "Think, Alan. A person just can't wake up and start over." Of course, Ella can do whatever the hell she wants and is just making excuses for the fact that she has been hopelessly despoiled by her nice and laid-back bourgeois lifestyle. Quite unlike Alan, Ella is petrified of spontaneity, uncertainty, and selfless devotion, thus making her a sort of archetype for the worst qualities that members of the so-called fairer sex have to offer, though the protagonist seems to be in total denial of this. After going to a Catholic confessional where a busybody priest persuades her to stop betraying her husband and break off her relationship with Alan, Ella unwisely decides to tell Mark everything while crying seemingly phony tears as if she is some sort of victim that needs to be rescued instead of an adulterous liar. In an assumed classically feminine attempt to garner sympathy while attempting to project all of her guilt solely onto the protagonist, Ella cries to her husband in regard to Alan, "I wish I never met him." Of course, what Ella really means when she says that she wishes that “never met him” is that she hates that she has been forced to acknowledge the fact that Alan made her come to the bitter realization that she is in a soulless sham marriage and that she could be so much happier with someone else, but she is too weak and materialistic to devote herself to the man she loves. Needless to say, Mark immediately decides that he has to do something about the “lovesick cabana boy” and uses his political power to get Alan arrested on trumped up charges by having a couple corrupt cops plant drugs on him. While Alan is in prison, Mark pays him a visit and, somewhat surprisingly, offers to have his charges “dropped on a technicality” if he agrees leave Ella alone, but of course the protagonist adamantly refuses and proudly proclaiming, “Everything has a purpose. Everybody has a purpose. It is my purpose to be with Ella. Nothing can change that. Not you, not the police, not the courts. It’s just a fact...like plants turning to the sun. Or death. Or taxes.” Needless to say, Mark is less than impressed with Alan’s way with words and hilariously states to him in a condescending fashion as if he were talking to a mentally challenged child, “What is this gibberish and asks “Are you crazy? Nobody talks like this. Make sense [...] There are two types of people in this world: assholes and pricks. You’re an asshole. And I’m a prick. Do the math. Ella’s mine.”

When Mark eventually discovers that Alan has been writing absurdly arcane love letters to Ella from prison, he becomes exceedingly enraged, decides he must have his romantically unhinged rival liquidated, and ultimately has his short-tempered guido body guard Rick Martino (Myk Watford) setup a staged prison break that involves fugitive inmates dragging the protagonist to a construction set where he is shot and dropped in a large hole. Needless to say, when Mark boasts of Alan’s dubious death, Ella, who is drunk, breaks down and accuses her husband of killing him. Needless to say, Mark gets a little annoyed with Ella’s back-talking and slaps her across the face so hard that she falls to the floor. After confessing to her priest, “I was a...coward,” Ella completely loses her faith and never steps back into a church ever again. Meanwhile, after somehow magically surviving a shotgun blast that badly damages both his arm and half of his face, Alan manages to crawl back to Miami while in a half-dead state where he immediately pays his loyal friend Javier a late night visit. After pleading that he needs “money to buy a new life,” Javier informs him that he can earn both $5,000 and a great underworld reputation by killing a man for a powerful drug cartel. With nothing left to lose as a man that has been robbed of his lady love, pretty boy good looks, and entire future, Alan manages to gather the courage and morally bankruptcy to kill a man that he does not even know named Manuel Esquema while the poor bloated beaver is quietly defecating in a public restroom. In a strange but somewhat fitting twist, Alan opts to adopt the name and identity of the man he so ruthlessly murdered and ultimately transforms himself from an all-American WASP into a sly Latino gangster. Indeed, Alan even contrives a preposterous pseudo-poetic sob story that he later uses on Mark and Ella about how he was born deformed to a poor but loving family that taught him to be the highly successful career criminal that he is today.

At about the halfway point of Forever Mine, the film finally catches up to the present with Manuel/Alan finally arriving in New York to initiate his long awaited reunion with Ella and her hubby. Naturally, Alan has a personal vendetta against Mark and after discovering that his nemesis is now an ex-councilman that is about to be indicted by federal prosecutor for serious criminal charges, he decides to use his new identity as 'Manuel Esquema' and power as a powerful international financier to execute his quite cleverly constructed revenge plan. Indeed, with a completely new appearance, accent, and speech pattern, 'Manuel' has no problem convincing Mark that he is someone else and that he wants to help him get out of his legal bind, so long as he willing to pay a 'fair' amount for his services. Needless to say, Alan intends to take Ella as part of his payment, though Mark will not find this out until the services are rendered. Of course, Alan also his new identity as Señor Esquema as a means to get close to Ella who, despite everything, he still loves. When Mark invites Esquema over to his house for dinner after their first business meeting, he gladly accepts the offer as it provides him with the opportunity to see Ella for the first time in fourteen years. Not surprisingly, Ella seems totally phony when Alan arrives at her house, as if she is doing her best to the mask the perennial misery, guilt, and regret that plagues her quite posh yet pathetic life of perpetual bourgeois banality. As it turns out, the only thing that Ella has done over the past fourteen years is take pointless college courses and volunteer her time to reading to elderly people at a retirement home. When the protagonist asks her what her favorite book is, Ella rather revealingly declares with great joy that it is Gustave Flaubert's debut novel Madame Bovary (1856), which hints that the heroine is probably nostalgic about her past romance with Alan and has even considered committing suicide, as the book deals with the adulterous affairs of an eponymous protagonist who decides to have extramarital affairs because she hates her bourgeoisie life and who ultimately kills herself in the end. Rather shocked that anyone would have any sincere interest in what his spouse has to say since he clearly considers her nothing more than a trophy wife that he used as an aesthetically pleasing prop for his political career, Mark remarks to the protagonist while he is listening intently as Ella talks, "I can't believe you're really interested in this." During the same conversation, Ella also unwittingly reveals that she is rather unhappy with the fact that, although long married and quite financially secure, she is a barren woman by abruptly stating with a sense of pathetic hopeless excitement, "Oh, if I had a child I would love that child." Indeed, while it is a natural female instinct for a woman to marry a wealthy and successful man so that she will have a good provider for her children, Ella did not even get any kids out of her sham marriage, thus all the more underscoring the absurdity of her decision to betray

Alan and stay with Mark. While Alan gives small hints of his true identity and wastes no opportunity to make Mark feel uneasy, the unhappily married couple surely does not believe that people come back from the dead and thus never suspect that the protagonist is anyone aside from an preternaturally poetic Latino weirdo with tons of money and a vulgar fashion sense.

When Alan has Ella meet him at a NYC bar under the dubious pretext of needing to find important information from her that will supposedly help him with her husband's criminal case, the protagonist almost immediately causes her to leave the taproom abruptly after he less than tactfully declares, "I just wanted to talk to you alone." When Ella asks him, "What do you really want?" Alan cryptically replies, "I think you know." Shortly after his fairly uneventful encounter with Ella, Mark's guido bodyguard Rick intentionally crashes his car into the back of Alan's vehicle while he is parked at a gas station pump and then threateningly states to the protagonist and his friend Javier, "You guys, you think you're really something, don't you? You slick Miami spicks come up here to fleece these dumb New Yorkers? You go sneakin' around, behind the boss' back, spyin' on his wife? Well, you think I'm on medication, huh? Just 'cause I'm white don't mean I'm dumb." Of course, Rick is probably pissed off over the fact that Alan previously embarrassed him by calling him a "guido" during a business meeting in front of his boss and other important men. Somewhat ironically for a man that loathes "slick Miami spicks," Rick is ultimately brutally murdered that night while getting a fake tan at a tacky tanning salon called 'Miami Bronze.' Indeed, Alan's #2 guy Javier has a showdown with Mark's #2 guy Rick that involves the former torturing and killing the latter while he is trapped in a tanning bed while wearing nothing but whitey tighties. Before putting a bullet in his brain, Javier states to Rick what is ultimately a rather lame pun in reference to Ripley's Believe It or Not! amusement museum franchise, "Alan Riply, believe it or not." Meanwhile, Alan breaks into the Brice's home and waits for Ella while hiding in the shadows of her bedroom like an awkward vampire. While Ella is initially petrified when she enters her house becomes she knows that Señor Esquema is waiting for her inside since his car is parked in her driveway, it is clear that she is just as excited, as if she is entranced by his erotic magnetism but does not know what to expect and is afraid of the consequences. When Ella shouts out his name and threatens to call the cops, the protagonist emerges from the shadows of her bedroom and reveals his true identity, thus resulting in very long-and-coming makeup sex that involves the heroine fucking the protagonist on the very same bed that she shares with her hubby. After the carnal passions have climaxed, Ella states to Alan while the two are still in bed during a classic moment of stereotypical female post-coital disclosure, "I've lived my life in regret." When Ella asks if he had sex with her out of revenge, Alan confesses, "Even when I thought I no longer cared for you, I still do" and foolishly agrees to not murder Mark like he had originally planned to. At this point, Ella finally declares that she wants to “start over again” and begin a new life with Alan.

During their final business meeting, Esquema informs Mark that he has setup a plea bargain where he will plead guilty and only have to serve 10 months at a comfortable white collar prison. While Esquema tells Mark that he can keep his house, car, and $300,000, he demands $600,000 for his services. Considering the severity of his charges, Mark is quite happy with this deal and begins to celebrate by calling for champagne, but the celebration comes to a swift and bitter end when Esquema states calmly yet confidently adds, “There is one other condition...your wife.” At this point, Mark predictably goes completely berserk and begins shouting obscenities at the protagonist, who responds by calmly and quietly exiting the room while his somewhat unhinged adversary continues to scream his head off. After all, Mark cannot believe that Esquema would have the gall to imagine that immaculate blonde Aryan beauty Ella would be interested in a horribly disfigured third world gangster, even if he is a politician and thus knows that every pussy has a price. When Alan informs his comrade that he no longer wants him to kill Mark, Javier gets annoyed and remarks, “Nothing like love to screw up a good thing,” though the two longtime friends part on happy terms. During a classically Schrader-esque of keen cultural cynicism where the auteur more or less likens American capitalism and U.S. political systems to that of a third world whorehouse, Esquema recommends that Latino killer Javier, who is probably an illegal alien, donate money to a college since it might earn him an honorary doctorate and a school building being named after him. After coming up with the decision to obtain a new “all-American identity,” Alan picks up Ella and the two head to the a remote wooded area where they start a new life in a log cabin. Naturally, as a man that has lost virtually everything, including his wife, career, dignity, and pretty much his entire life, Mark has nothing left to live for and thus has his lawyer find Alan and Ella’s whereabouts so that he can exact his revenge. Indeed, Alan gets quite the shock when he gets out of the shower one day and discovers that Mark has broken into his cabin and has come to kill him, Ella, and himself. In regard to his planned bizarre love triangle oriented murder-suicide pact, Mark states to Alan in a joyously deranged fashion after shooting him in the thigh, “We’re all gonna die for love. See? I’m a romantic, too.” When the protagonist dares to vocally doubt Mark’s love for Ella, the romantically autistic antagonist becomes exceedingly enraged, shoves his gun in Alan’s face, and shouts, “How dare you judge me, you lovesick little nobody! I love her in my own way!” When Alan retorts, “Love is not your own way. It’s either pure...or selfish,” Mark asks the protagonist if his love is “pure” and when he affirmatively replies “yes,” the sadistic villain shoots him in the neck and then goes outside to wait for Ella. When Mark confronts Ella and implies that he has killed Alan, the heroine cries, “I will not lose him.” Although Ella attempts to go inside the cabin to see if Alan is ok, Mark grabs her, puts a gun to her head, and then demands that she say “I love you” one more time before he kills her.

FOREVER MINE

Luckily, before her lovelorn hubby can blow her brains out, Alan emerges from the cabin and begins brutally bashing Mark's head into a cement floor until he is dead. In the end, Ella attempts to keep Alan conscious while he is succumbing to his wounds by reminding him about how they first met. In the end after a series of flashback scenes, the film concludes with protagonists' saying the titular words: "Forever Mine" in what is ultimately a beautifully bittersweet conclusion to a beautifully bittersweet movie.

While Forever Mine concludes in almost infuriating ambiguity, auteur Schrader has hinted that the protagonist dies in the end, or as he stated in the audio commentary for the MGM DVD release of the film, "If anyone would ask me, 'Did he live or did he die?', I would always say, 'Well, he lives...in her memory,' which I guess is an appropriately romantic answer for this oddly romantic film." Indeed, "oddly romantic" is a pretty good way to describe the film, especially considering the reputation of the man that wrote and directed it, yet despite its sometimes almost oneiric fairytale essence, Schrader's decadently aesthetically pleasing dark romance reveals more insights in regard to the absurdities of love and its oftentimes senselessly tragic consequences than probably any of the shiksa-obsessed films that superlatively sexually dysfunctional Hebraic romcom maestro Woody Allen has ever made. Although oftentimes exquisitely ethereal in terms of visuals, Forever Mine is hardly a cinematic work that attempts to romanticize the pangs and perils of romance, as the film is like a sensitively written love letter that was penned with the blood of a stillborn babe and placed in a pretty pink envelope that is laced with anthrax and cheap Cuban cologne. Indeed, to any sane male, the love affair depicted in Schrader's film would seem like a deadly curse, as if the protagonist came under the spell of an inordinately gorgeous autistic witch that was not even totally conscious of her own sinisterly seductive sexual powers, thereupon making her all the more deleterious to her male victims. While Gretchen Mol's character might have a face and body that suggests she is an immaculate angel that sired with god's greatest materials, I would go so far as to argue that she is actually that true villain of the film, as a sort of bourgeois femme fatale who destroys both the protagonist and antagonist and whose treacherous and manipulative actions against both of these characters is inspired solely by her desire to avoid even the most mild of emotional and material discomforts. Undoubtedly, there is no question that Schrader thinks very little of the film heroine as he makes a joke in his audio commentary where he points out the fact that the "ice queen" is ironically standing next to a polar bear statue. Of course, the brilliance of Schrader's film is that he never dares to demonize or ridicule the heroine, but instead subtly depicts how, due to pathological passivity and supreme cowardice, she more or less stands by and watches as her one-true-love is destroyed. Not surprisingly, it is only in the end when the protagonist has become much wealthier than her husband that the heroine finally agrees to ditch her jail-bound hubby and get with him, so I must admit that I felt a little bit of schadenfreude when said protagonist assumedly dies in the end and she is left with nothing but her own regret.

Notably, in her classic text The Manipulated Man (1971), antifeminist Jewess Esther Vilar has a fun little dictionary of sorts where she exposes what women, who typically delight in obfuscation, really mean when they say certain things. For example, in one decoding that certainly pertains to Forever Mine, Vilar claims that when a woman says, "A man must be able to protect me," what she really means is, "A man must be able to spare me from all forms of discomfort." Undoubtedly, this is one of the central conflicts of the film, as the heroine refuses to leave the husband she loathes for the man she that loves and has seemingly immaculate emotional and sexual compatibility with because she fears the prospect of poverty and, in turn, material discomfort, among other relatively petty things. Of course, this is one of the main innate timeless differences between men and women, as whereas a man is usually happy enough to just be with a woman that he loves, a woman always wants more and starts to loathe a man that has not dedicated his life solely to making her life easier. Another rather repellent feminine characteristic that the film highlights is the tendency of women to be more concerned with superficial appearances and the opinions of others than their and their lovers' own personal happiness, as the the film's rather vain and superficial heroine cannot bear the social repercussions of leaving her successful spouse for a poor young man with no reputation and instead stays in a completely loveless and childless marriage with a seemingly sociopathic political parasite whose wealth has been at least partially obtained via criminal means. Not surprisingly, not once in the film does the heroine express guilt over the fact that her husband is a criminal except when he ostensibly kills the protagonist. In an assumed attempt to spare herself personal guilt, the heroine also makes the fatal mistake of coercing her lover into not killing her scumbag spouse, thus giving said scumbag spouse the opportunity to kill both him and her. In short, Forever Mine is a film where love-crushes-all as a sweetly venomous and sometimes elegantly cynical cinematic work where an adulterous dame who married for money incites a fourteen year blood feud between two very different men that ends with both of their violent premature demises.

While I was only somewhat impressed when I originally watched Forever Mine nearly a decade ago, I have discovered with my recent re-watching of it that, like many of Schrader's films, it is a subtly intricate flick that made me come to the realization that its creator is a mentally accursed man that sees murder-suicide pacts and deadly game of cross-class adultery as deeply romantic, but I guess one should not expect anything less from the man that created the autobiographical antihero of Travis Bickle. I also recently came to the bitter and slightly embarrassing realization that I could empathize with the film's male protagonist in his self-destructive and masochistic quest to devote all to the love of his life. Like the film's protagonist, there is a certain woman in my life that I probably should loathe, but I just cannot find it in me, at least for long. While I have been in relationships with various beautiful women, I can safely say that I only still love one of them and I still pretty much have the same exact feelings for her that I have always had. Thankfully, unlike the film's protagonist and a lot of men in general, I do not take comfort in being some bitch's bitch, or as Villar noted in regard to the self-delusion that many men have when it comes to marriages and romantic relationships, "As a result of 'love,' man is able to hide his cowardly self-deception behind a smoke screen of sentiment. He is able to make himself believe that his senseless enslavement to woman and her hostages is more than an act of honor, it has a higher purpose. He is entirely happy in his role as a slave and has arrived at the goal he has so long desire." Undoubtedly, if there is anything to learn by watching Forever Mine, it is that one should never trust any woman, especially the sort that regularly lies and cheats on her husband. Additionally, any woman that marries a man that she does not love wholly deserves the abject metaphysical misery and grand sexual dissatisfaction that typically accompanies such a sham relationship, as she has robbed both herself and her spouse of true happiness due to both greed and/or cowardice.

It has been some time since lapsed Calvinist screenwriter turned audacious auteur Paul Schrader—the man who penned classics like Taxi Driver (1976) directed by Martin Scorsese and directed classics like Hardcore (1979) and Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985)—directed a film that got some notable attention, be it negative or positive, but with his recent work The Canyons (2013), he has certainly grabbed some headlines, if not due to the no-budget work's dubiously degenerate stars and almost unanimous critical scorn among professional film critics and fans alike. Starring the smoked out slut and media molested Disney child star turned raunchy train wreck Lindsay Lohan and 'sexually versatile' Hebraic porn star James Deen, The Canyons is a film that upon even a superficial glance one assumes is a tremendously trashy tabloid-worthy celluloid sleaze, which is no surprise considering director Paul Schrader has always had his 'genius in the gutter' as the metaphysically miserable mind behind American Gigolo (1980), The Comfort of Strangers (1990), and Light Sleeper (1992). Also starring in The Canyons is ancestrally cursed Jewess Amanda Brooks, whose 'trust fund stoner' brother was not only convicted of murdering his girlfriend this year, but whose psychopathic pervert father is Joseph Brooks—the seemingly sappy sentimentalist yet ultimately psychopathic Academy Award-winning songwriter behind the emotionally phony hit song "You Light Up My Life" and a serial rapist who was to be tried in the state Supreme Court for Manhattan on no less than 91 counts of rape, sexual abuse, criminal sexual act, assault, and other charges, but committed suicide so he would not have to deal with his demonically degenerate deeds. Undoubtedly, the lead antagonistic of The Canyons as played by gay-for-pay debauchee James Deen is not that unlike Joseph Brooks in his sexually predatory and ultimately psychopathic behavior, just as Lindsay Lohan's onscreen character is not that far off from her real-life persona as a lecherous lady who could be described as 'damaged goods,' thus one has to admit that Schrader's film is certainly an unflattering example of art reflecting life and vice versa. Penned by overrated quasi-nihilist novelist Bret Easton Ellis (The Rules of Attraction, American Psycho), who bashed Schrader's film before it was even released, stating, "The film is so languorous. It's an hour 30, and it seems like it's three hours long. I saw this as a pranky noirish thriller, but Schrader turned it into, well, a Schrader film," The Canyons is, indeed, pure Paul Schrader, which was surely to the corrupting celluloid work's benefit as a rare flick from 2013 that is reflective of America, as well as Hollywood's, all-encompassing moral, cultural, and aesthetic decline. Essentially, the The Canyons is the superlatively sordid story of a young trust fund kid psychopath who produces movies to "keep his father off his back," who starts a personal war with a struggling actor who is secretly screwing his prostitute-like girlfriend and who is a sort of psychopath-in-progress who has yet to learn what it takes to live, survive, and strive in Los Angeles. A no-budget piece of 'psychological horror porn' shot on a mere $250,000 utilizing some of the most unsavory 'actors'/porn stars/socialites in Hollywood, The Canyons is not a suavely stylized Schrader-esque celluloid sleaze that lives and breathes the paradoxically sickening Hollywood sunlight, but a radically cinematically reflective work and an indictment of the Hollywood film industry itself, portraying a young producer as the most pernicious and perverted of manipulators who runs and 'directs' the show 'behind the scenes' and depicting a young actor as the mostly unholy of whores, who is willing to both literally and figuratively screw anyone, male or female, to get his way. Opening with a number of allegorical shots of various dilapidated, rundown, and closed movie theaters, The Canyons is also a work that portrays the Hollywood studio system as a sort of bankrupt bordello of sorts, run by lunatic libertine pimps (i.e. producers) and occupied by soulless prostitutes (i.e. actors) whose sole goal is to be the most high profile and wealthy sluts in the world.

In the first couple moments of The Canyons, one is introduced to the four lead characters, couples Tara (Lindsay Lohan) and Christian (James Dean) and Ryan (Nolan Gerard Funk) and Gina (Amanda Brooks), who are on a double date with one another at an upscale bar so the men, one an actor (Ryan) and another a producer (Christian) who landed the actor a job for an upcoming slasher flick he is producing, can meet each other for the first time, thus sparking the beginning of the end for both men's mutually exploitative relationships. Gina is something like a production assistant on a 'low-budget slasher flick' produced by tyrannical trust fund brat Christian, who is only involved with the film to keep his father off his back and pretend he has a semblance of a job. As a favor to her from Christian, who has nil interest in the film and does not even plan to be around for the work's production, Gina has managed to get her boyfriend Ryan, a fellow that somewhat misleadingly describes himself as a "more conventional guy," the lead role for the slasher flick. Unbeknownst to Christian and Gina, Ryan and Tara were once lovers and have rekindled their flame after meeting one another again by happenstance on pre-production for the film. Unfortunately for Ryan, his ex-lover Tara is a virtual sex slave of pretty boy psychopath Christian, who essentially forces her to have sex with strangers he meets on the internet, as he gets off to dominating her and loves 'directing it' on his cellphone. Not unsurprisingly, Christian has hired a goofy wigger 'private detective' to tail Tara wherever she goes, so he eventually learns of his girlfriend's affair with Ryan. Naturally, Christian starts a war with Ryan that involves the ostensibly heterosexual actor allowing another producer (a gay kraut who Christian asks him to blackmail sexually) to suck his cock so he can 'keep the part' in the slasher flick, hacking into his facebook, cellphone, and bank account (where he drains his money). Meanwhile, Ryan learns that a girl he used to date named Cynthia (Tenille Houston) is also a mutual ex-girlfriend of Christian who he still screws.

Ryan convinces Cynthia to tell Tara a sob story about how supposedly when she dated Christian, who she lovingly describes as a "sick little boy," he secretly put roofies in her drink and allowed a bunch of guys to 'run a train on her' while she was passed out, thus landing her in the emergency room at UCLA. Paranoid about the fact she has serially cheated on him with Ryan and his purported drugging of his ex-girlfriend, Tara begins to consider leaving Christian for good, but she also starts her own quasi-femme fatale-like 'psychological war' against her rich lunatic lover beforehand to 'soften him up,' including coercing the wealthy and wanton psychopath to experiment with his bi-curious side by allowing another man to blow him during one of their 'swinger nights' with random people they met on the internet. When Christian goes to his mandatory weekly counseling session (his father will 'pull his trust fund' if he does not go) with his therapist Dr. Campbell (symbolically played by queer auteur Gus Van Sant, a filmmaker who 'crossed the line' between the independent New Queer Cinema world and horribly hokey Hollywood blockbusters), he less than proudly admits regarding his brief and ultimately dis-empowering flirtation with faggotry, "Usually, I'm the one in control. Last night I wasn't. None of it seemed real. Not when that guy was sucking my dick or when Tara tried to get him to fuck me. Which didn't happen, FYI. There were certain things that Tara and the other girl wanted us to do, and I don't even know why I care. Just some dumb kids on the internet I'll never see again. Just...didn't feel like I wasn't in control. I felt objectified. The way the two of them just watched and told us what to do. Doesn't usually go down like that. Usually I'm the one directing the scene....It made me feel like an actor." Of course, Christian ultimately finds a way to become the "one directing the scene" again and it involves him killing a certain girl in coldblood who both he and Ryan used to date. In the end, Tara finally gets away from Christian, Ryan loses everything important to him yet develops a new found sense of sociopathy, and Christian is still at the top of his game, graduating on to becoming a calculating coldblooded killer opposed to being a mere calculating cock on coke.

While a sickeningly sleazy 'erotic thriller' featuring some of the most innately reprehensible, unredeemable, and revolting 'pretty cool people' characters in recent film history, The Canyons is more importantly, an unpretentious and far from preachy indictment of the contemporary American zeitgeist, where loveless and aberrant sex, mindless materialism, less than fulfilling hedonism, callous careerism, and fraudulent and mutually exploitative 'romantic' relationships, are just the name of the game, especially in an unwaveringly soulless and culturally hollow place like Hollywood, a decidedly degenerate dream-factory that, rather unfortunately, infects the rest of the world with its metaphysical maladies. As director Paul Schrader stated in a recent interview with Film Comment Magazine regarding the film, "...we're making art out of the remains of our empire. The junk that's left over. And this idea of a film that was crowdfunded, cast online, with one actor from a celebrity culture, one actor from adult-film culture, a writer and director who have gotten beat up in the past—felt like a post-Empire thing,” and, indeed, as a work featuring a child star turned disastrous diva and a small and frail boyish Jew porn star in the lead roles as directed by a lapsed Calvinist who did not see his first film until he was almost an adult yet would go on to become one of the most controversial and politically incorrect American screenwriters/directors of his decidedly degenerate generation, The Canyons is indubitably the superficially seductive and scandalous yet also nicely nuanced and anything but naïve piece of apocalyptic celluloid that is bound to go over the head of most viewers, especially those quick to condemn it due to its starcrossed stars and almost nonexistent budget. As Lindsay Lohan’s character rhetorically asks the character played by Amanda Brooks, “Ok, tell me something...Do you really like movies?...Really, really like movies? When’s the last time you went to see a movie in the theater? A movie that you really thought meant something to you?,” thus demonstrating not only the decline of cinema quality in Hollywood and as a “favorite American pastime,” but also how films are now made in general in the internet age with Schrader’s The Canyons being a curious product of this trend as a work funded by the ‘crowd funding’ internet tool of Kickstarter and largely making its premiere on the online video-on-demand on sites like YouTube.com. Screenwriter Bret Easton Ellis also further confirmed the ‘post-modern’ form of film production regarding The Canyons by remarking “Using social media as a way to help build a film is really like riding the wave into the future,” which is further confirmed by the film’s producer Braxton Pope, who proudly stated regarding the film, “Nothing about this film was orchestrated in a traditional way. We wanted to actively embrace all the digital and social media tools at our disposal and give the film real cinematic value – ‘The Canyons’ is the result of a forward thinking experiment with a terrific cast.” While certainly no masterpiece, The Canyons is reasonably ‘penetrating’ proof that director Paul Schrader has been to keep up with the times in terms of his cinematic subversiveness, that Lindsay Lohan is actually a capable actor when in the right sort of film, and that porn stars like James Deen have their place in mainstream films, albeit supremely sleazy ones that are better funded by the fans than put in the hands of solely monetary and propaganda motivated psychopathic Hollywood producers like antagonist Christian as played by James Deen. As stated by Deen’s character, “Nobody has a private life anymore” as a result of the internet, social networking sites, and whatnot, but at least now American movies are not totally monopolized by the Hebraic hands in Hollywood as demonstrated with the production of The Canyons, a work that proves that Paul Schrader is not only an audacious auteur but also a postmodern alchemist who is able to turn cultural shit (e.g. James Deen, Lindsay Lohan, Bret Easton Ellis) into cheap celluloid gold.

THERE WILL BE BLOOD

Paul Thomas Anderson (2007) There Will Be Blood is the latest Academy-Award nominated picture for the Oscar's could be lovechild Paul Thomas Anderson. The film has been heralded time and time again throughout the last Oscar race, but much to the avail of any P.T. Anderson fan, the Coen Brothers stole away with it. TWBB chronicles the rise and fall of oil tycoon Daniel Plainview, who through the years, becomes severely disjointed in between his work and his hatred for mankind. P.T. Anderson adapts Upton Sinclair's novel Oil! for his latest motion picture which propelled his career into a more serious tone. It seems in Hollywood, the greater the film is, the fewer theaters they get shown at; It's really quite a shame seeing as how this film should be seen nearly by the entire American population. With greed comes hatred, which eventually unfolds during this saga of the Plainview family. The film is entirely supported on the dialogue, acting, and cinematography. Much of the acclaim is being showered amongst Daniel Day-Lewis. While he deserves all of the credit, I must hand it to Paul Dano for his excellent role as the sniveling religious boy who cares for the development of his church and nothing more, not even the prospect of his family. When you look at it in perspective, both were selfish figments of the story. Much of the film is built off the American dream and flourishes off of the cardinal sins; lust, greed, and envy. This leads to complications with the newly erected Church of the Third Revelation. Faith and power often clash in this film. I haven't seen a godless character been played so well since Timothy Carey's The World's Greatest Sinner. The eventual decline of Daniel is one of heart-breaking importance, seeing such a proud man spiral into alcoholism and chronic back-pain is the outcome of such a story. What makes this film's legacy so powerful? The acting? The characters? The steel determination to be the best? All signs point to the fluidity that guides the scenes along a rail road track. There Will Be Blood is a must-see for anyone. If you are interested in history, character developments of the colossal sort, an amazing soundtrack by a member of Radiohead, or the acting of Daniel Day-Lewis, you will absolutely adore this film. To put it simply, the best red-blooded American film to ever be made.

TURKISH DELIGHT

Paul Verhoeven (1973)

Lets face it, most film love stories are complete garbage. The ones that come out of Hollywood are especially appalling. Paul Verhoeven's Dutch masterpiece Turkish Delight is one of the very few exceptions to this rule. The film didn't receive the award for Best Dutch Film of the Century by the Netherlands Film festival for nothing. Turkish Delight is a powerful love story that shows the beginning and fatal conclusion of a relationship between man and woman of the unconventional sort. Rutger Hauer plays the eccentric artist and sex addict Eric. This young artist finds his ladylove in the form of redheaded teenager named Olga. The two young lovebirds hit it off perfectly with one another due to their practice of wild sex and erratic complimenting behavior. After first meeting each other, the couple symbolically engage in sex and eventually a car wreck. Not long after the wreck, Eric hunts down Olga at her parents store. Olga's mother already hates Eric and he could really care less. His only interest is Olga. Eventually Eric and Olga get married. Olga's mother attempts to accept bohemian artist Eric and his unconventional lifestyle. Eric responds to Olga's mothers token kindness by messing with the older woman's fake breast (she had breast cancer). Olga's father surprisingly accepts Eric as he seems to be a very mellow and laid back man. When the old man dies, Eric is offered to take over Olga's parents family business and instead flees to Amsterdam. Eric instead prefers to sculpt and draw figures of his new wife's nude body. Eric shows his love for Olga in some of the most perverse yet "touching" ways. In one unexpected moment, he digs through Olga's feces with his own bare hands to check for blood (she is in fear that she has cancer). Eric is an individual that is incapable of expressing how he feels to others in normal ways. But when Eric expresses his love for Olga, it is more than obvious. At the same time, Eric can be one of the most cruel individuals out there. For example, he sells a nude drawing of the two married lovers although he had already given the drawing to Olga as a loving gesture. Eric also later rapes Olga in a very sneaky and deceptive manner. Unsurprisingly, Olga seems to enjoy the unwanted sex until her mother bursts into the room in a belligerent rage of elderly fury. Turkish Delight also features a variety of dream and fantasy sequences that were no doubt inspired by the works of Italian maestro Federico Fellini. Eric imagines himself killing Olga's lover and then her. He also imagines Olga's father enjoying his funeral as if he was a young child attending a carnival for the first time. These dream sequences unsurprisingly further compliment the unconventional masterpiece that is Turkish Delight. Turkish Delight is a love story for the real passionate lovers out there. Those couples out there that have something special and unobtainable that makes others wonder. Turkish Delight is as close to a film will come to portraying one of those rare magnificent and spontaneously joyful relationships. Despite their hardships, Eric stays by Olga's side to the end. Turkish Delight is a truly heartwarming film that features two humans at the height of intimacy.

KATIE TIPPEL

Paul Verhoeven (1975)

Katie Tippel (1975) is another Dutch masterpiece from the early directing years of Paul Verhoeven. The film is a rags to riches story taking place during the 19th century as the banking scam of socialism started to rear its putrid head in the Netherlands. The film is based on the memoirs of true life Cinderella Neel Doff. As you can expect from Mr. Verhoeven, Katie Tippel is full of bizarre and even downright disturbing sexual moments. Katie Tippel's family have just arrived in Amsterdam without a penny to their name. Despite their lack of monetary success, Katie's mother and father have produced a number of kids they can't afford. The sole breadwinner of the family is Katie's overweight and fairly disgusting sister who has realized her baby making machine can feed her stomach. Katie's father (who eventually gets a job he loses) is pathetic to say the very least, and her mother seems to be willing to have her children do anything for a couple of pennies. Katie demonstrates from the start of the film that she is a fighter and won't let anyone get away with taking advantage of her. After being raped by her scrawny employer, she throws a brick through the window of the shop she once worked at. Against her own morals, Katie eventually takes up the undesirable career of a prostitute. She realizes early that men only end up taking advantage of her and she might as well get paid for it. One buyer even calls her most private area a "pretty little rose" and soon afterwards only gives her a couple cents due to her lack of experience. Rich people have always been cheap. Katie's overweight sister finds it only appropriate that she defecates in front of her parents while they eat dinner. In tribute to the dead art of reading, she wipes her hefty ass with a page that she tears out of a book. Earlier in the film, Katie's sister also finds it funny to drop the family's recently acquired puppy (that died in flooding of their shabby room) in the same toilet. Katie also finds her little brother prostituting himself to a dirty old rich man. When she tells her mother, she ignores what she says. Katie has more than enough reason to abandon her pitiful family. I have seen a variety of "success" films in America throughout my life as most Americans have. I find Katie Tippel to be preferable to those "American dream" propaganda pieces. Katie Tippel is full of artistic raunchiness which is something that I have always appreciated. The Dutch films of Paul Verhoeven are like the films Bernardo Bertolucci (although I am a fan of many of his films) except with more class and cohesion.

SOLDIER OF ORANGE

Soldier of Orange is one of the many Dutch masterpieces from Paul Verhoeven. Before Verhoeven started making Sci-Fi satires in Hollywood, he was Holland's most highly revered film director. But alas, like most international film talent, Verhoeven was taken away from his homeland to make big bucks for the men that live off of Mulholland Drive. Unsurprisingly, Soldier of Orange seems to be Verhoeven's most "Hollywood" Dutch film. I am sure that Mr. Verhoeven saw a few American war films before directing the film. Soldier of Orange is sort of a personal film for me. The film is set during the German occupation of Holland during World War II. I had relatives from The Netherlands living during that time period and can still feel the affects of that destructive (and pointless) war today. Soldier of Orange centers around a group of friends and the different paths they take during the war. Holland's greatest actor Rutger Hauer stars as the lead character Erik Lanshof, who joins up with the Dutch resistance and British to fight the Germans. Through his epic Journey, Erik realizes he can't even trust the best of friends. Paul Verhoeven took a more realistic approach than most on the subject of the second World War. You see as the Germans first invade Holland and their occupation is fairly peaceful. As the war progresses, the resistance gets more defiant and the tensions build up. Soldier of Orange also brings up how some Dutchmen joined the Waffen SS and fought for Germany on the eastern front. I find it odd that Paul Verhoeven forgot to mention the Dutch famine of 1944 where at least 18,000 people starved to death. Despite the lack of mention of this tragic event, I still respect Verhoeven's commitment to historical reality. Soldier of Orange features a variety of unfaithful sex scenarios. The friends in the film just can't seem to get enough of one another's sex partners. The men go from woman to woman like they are playing tag. These sex scenes are the only indicator that Paul Verhoeven would go on later to direct the ridiculous sleazy stripper drama fest Showgirls. Verhoeven has always been a master at filming scenes in the bedroom. Soldier of Orange also seemed to have a variety of subtle homoerotic scenes between the group of friends. The most obvious is a ballroom dance between Erik Lanshof and his friend Derek de Lint who is now a member of the SS. The two friends dance with each other, now on opposing sides in the war. This poignant scene is slightly erupted by some SS whores that desire Derek's Iron Cross metal he got for blowing up a Russian tank. Derek's demise is both pointless and tragic. A scene that director Paul Verhoeven later regretted shooting. There are too many worthless films that take place during World War II. Most of them are just rehashing of the same propaganda dribble. Soldier of Orange is a refreshing change with a very different perspective. It is a film that takes an unconventional route through a horrible war. Soldier of Orange also happens to be one of the best Dutch films ever made. Be sure to see it before you watch Verhoeven's recent inferior film Black Book which also takes place during the German occupation of Holland. I conclude with saying that the obese queen of Holland was a less than admirable leader for that country during World War II.

SOLDIER OF ORANGE

Spetters is without doubt Paul Verhoeven's most offensive film that he made in his homeland. The liberal Dutch even thought it was revolting. This was a thoroughly bold move on Verhoeven's part seeing as all his earlier films also have some type of controversy attached to them. Spetters also happens to be a rebellious masterpiece of European film making. It is rare to find movies of such unwholesome content that is of such high quality.

I have no interest in dirt bikes, motorcycles, motocross, or other crotch rocket related activities, yet I love racing themed Spetters. The film follows three young men that have dreams of making a career in motocross. They hate their hometowns and repetitive jobs, so motocross becomes the ideal profession for these young lads. Their ambition of changing careers also parallels their search for a new woman. Not only are these young men competing in motocross races, but also for the love of a blond femme fatale who has a food stand with her towering homosexual brother.

Spetters features an array of awkward nudity and sex scenes. One scene involves three young men comparing penis sizes. The guy with the biggest penis has the luxury of first attempting to put their manhood in the blond love interest. Another scene involves the faking of an orgasm by two of the young men and their girlfriends so that they can get out of sex. The young Calvinist mechanic also happens to spy on homosexual prostitutes and their Johns so that he can blackmail them for money later. Later this young man has something undesirable penetrate him which he later realizes he liked. Screwed up sex isn't the only thing featured in Spetters. Serious drama is found throughout the film. The youthful friends in Spetters realize as the days past that their ideal fantasies usually don't turnout the way that they would like. Fights, paralysis, rape, family problems, and failure are just a few of things that plague these callow friends. Dreams come at a substantial price and fellows in Spetters just don't seem to have enough to pay it.

Spetters is also a film about the "new" postwar Holland. The new Holland is a place of liberal and "everything goes" attitude. Before World War II, Holland was considered a proud moral country. After World War II, Holland became a socialized region where strict moral nationalist views became a taboo of sorts (like most of Europe). Spetters takes these liberal attitudes to extremes with "free love," miscegenation, gay gangbangs, and blasphemy against the Dutch reform church. I guess you could also say the same about the United States and Hollywood films. Of course, Hollywood started its blatant degeneracy in the late 1960s. Director Paul Verhoeven would later go on to direct the controversial Showgirls in Hollywood. The main difference between Showgirls and Spetters (other than the entire story) is that the latter is a serious film. So serious that one of the actors who commits suicide in Spetters would also go on to kill himself in real life. This is a film for anyone that likes to be both entertained and would like to see a quality film.

FLESH /& BLOOD

Paul Verhoeven (1985)

It would have probably sucked living during the Middle Ages because of the plague and all, but few things suck worse than Hollywood's blasphemous portrayals of those ghastly times. It would be very hard for me to come up with a "Top Five" list for "Best Films set during the Middle Ages" because I doubt that I even enjoy five films set during that death-filled era. Of course, when I found out that Dutch auteur Paul Verhoeven directed a blood-soaked film Flesh & Blood set during the Middle Ages, I felt compelled to see the cinematic adventure. After all, if there is a director that can take films with very stupid premises and make a masterpiece out of them (e.g. Robocop), Paul Verhoeven is the guy to get the cinematically ambitious job done right. Flesh & Blood is the film Verhoeven directed before completely surrendering himself to Hollywood with the Sci-fi classic Robocop, a film that virtually has nothing in common with his earlier Dutch Art House works, but deserves recognition in its own right. With Flesh & Blood Paul Verhoeven makes no pathetic attempts to romanticize the Middle Ages. The film features brutal rapes, castrated corpses hanging from trees, stillborn babies being born by virtual sex-slave mothers, and a very murderous form of Christianity. Even noblemen are at the constant threat of being murdered by ambitious barbarians looking to become Noblemen as well. Flesh & Blood follows a group of Mercenaries led by a devilishly Heroic man named Martin (played brilliantly by Rutger Hauer) and his rape victim/lover Agnes, a young Heiress who knows what she wants and how to get it. A young Italian ruler Steven Arnolfini, who is more interested in Science and inventions than his fiancé Agnes, realizes he must rescue her after the two would-be lovers share a mandrake. The driving plot of Flesh & Blood is finding out who will end up with Agnes: The middle-aged Barbarian Mercenary Martin who wishes he was a Nobleman or a Twenty-something year old Nobleman inventor Steven. Agnes may look like a pasty preteen while in the nude, but in her own Middle Age world she acts as a goddess. Flesh & Blood brings up some interesting ideas about class differences even if the film was set during the Middle Ages. The mercenaries want nothing more but to live the good life and become Noblemen. After all, gang raping children and castrating enemies can get quite banal after sometime and being the master of a castle has a certain classiness to it. After capturing a castle from some unfortunate Nobles with the plague, the Mercenaries start living the good life. They have plenty of food to eat and servants to serve them, but they look quite comic in their attempts at enjoying the Noble life. Heiress Agnes tries to show her Rapist Lover Martin how to eat with a fork which has comic results. Agnes seems to very much enjoy her lower-classed lover's pathetic attempts at becoming something he's not. Maybe Karl Marx wasn't the only effeminate mind conspiring for class warfare. Flesh & Blood may be no Turkish

FLESH /& BLOOD

Delight, but it will certainly fulfill ones appetite for Middle Age raping, pillaging, murdering, and everything else historically that is so bloody nice. The film does not solely glamorize or romanticize the Middle Ages as a time when people spoke more eloquently and dressed nicer than they do nowadays like most Hollywood films set during that era. Instead, Flesh & Blood presents a world where death is around every corner, whether or not one is rich or poor. Interestingly enough, Flesh & Blood also presents a world where there was more passion and incentive for one to live life to their fullest. Yeah, maybe people believed that wooden statues of St. Martin of Tours were guiding them on a spiritual tour, but that is much more admirable than hoping a criminal Mulatto Messiah will deliver the world from Evil and bring about universal world peace. How weak.

BLACK BOOK

Paul Verhoeven (2006)

Black Book is Paul Verhoeven's first Dutch film since The Fourth Man (1983). The film is also the most expensive and high grossing Dutch cinema history. I have always wondered would it would be like if Paul Verhoeven went back to Holland and started directing films in his homeland again. Black Book made for a great film to compare to his past Dutch films to, especially Soldier of Orange (1977). Unfortunately Black Book could not compare to the artistic integrity of Verhoeven's earlier German occupation masterpiece.

Verhoeven jumped onto the Jewish sympathy bandwagon with Black Book. On top of that, the story was historical fiction. I think it would be more appropriate of Paulie boy to have made a film about Dutch famine of 1944 as it did kill 20,000 of his own kinsman. Of course, I doubt Verhoeven could get the funding necessary for a film about the suffering of the Dutch during World War II. Any film that starts off its opening in Israel is catering to the international crowd.

Black Book goes back to the days of Verhoeven's often and casual nudity scenes. I didn't need to see a beer belly krauts Wiener schnitzel. Carice van Houten's boobs also seemed to somehow pop out of her dress. That somehow may have even been a theme of the film. It's a shame that Verhoeven couldn't match the natural nudity of his Dutch films Turkish Delight, Spetters, and of course Soldier of Orange. The Hollywood years have really wore off on Verhoeven. After Showgirls there was no coming back.

Mr. Verhoeven has been Americanized. His recent films have all the features that cater to the lowest common denominator: cheap nudity, sex, guns, killing, and poop. I do have to admit that the dumping of shit on a topless Carice van Houten was fairly humorous and somewhat odd. I don't know what Verhoeven's intentions were with this scene but I had a good laugh.

In conclusion, Black Book was a watchable disappointment. Verhoeven's Dutch films and Robocop will always be my favorite from his lexicon. Black Book is better than the majority of the trash that comes out of Hollywood. Just don't expect the magic Verhoeven produced when working with fellow kinsman Rutger Hauer.

ELLE

Out of all the filmmakers I can think of, no other has probably made a more successful transition from the European arthouse world to Hollywood than Dutch auteur Paul Verhoeven (Total Recall, Basic Instinct). In fact, Verhoeven has even been able to maintain his distinctly Dutch, subtly yet scathingly sardonic sense of humor as demonstrated by the fact that the satire of Showgirls (1995) flew over the heads of so many American viewers, including the NYC intellectuals, and it was wrongly labeled one of the worst movies ever made. Admittedly, I still prefer the auteur's early Dutch classics like Turkish Delight (1973), Spetters (1980), and The Fourth Man (1983) to most of his Hollywood films, so naturally I was initially excited when he returned to European filmmaking after almost two decades. Unfortunately, Black Book (2006)—a Zionist-friendly turd that has too much of a shallow Hollywood polish for my tastes—was quite inferior to Verhoeven's previous German occupation themed WWII flick Soldier of Orange (1977), which quite rightly focuses on the Dutch instead of the Jews. Luckily, Verhoeven did finally return to his true roots with the French-German co-production Elle (2016) starring redheaded mischling diva Isabelle Huppert in a role that feels like she was born to play, as if she is portraying the less autistic and more aggressive Paris sister of her character from Michael Haneke's The Piano Teacher (2001). While the film is provocatively entertaining as one would expect from a Verhoeven flick, it is far from a feel-good flick and, quite unlike Robocop (1987), not something I feel the need to revisit anytime seen, especially after watching it twice. Indeed, while on the superficial level it is a sort of unconventional rape-revenge dramedy where a supremely fucked up bourgeois bitch refuses to be a victim after suffering a rather violent episode of sexual rapine and ultimately demonstrates that it takes an insanely impenetrable ice queen to accomplish that task when rape and murder are involved, the film is also a sort of borderline absurdist allegory for the death of Europe, especially the culturally and spiritually senile European bourgeoisie. Set in a decidedly dysfunctional and decadent world of mostly disgustingly weak and emasculated men and soulless sex-obsessed women, the film effortlessly critiques everything that is innately repugnant and insufferably pathetic about modern Europe, especially France. Undoubtedly, Jean Cocteau might as well have been speaking about Elle when he once wrote in regard to his masterpiece Orpheus (1950), "Our age is becoming dried out with ideas. It is the child of the Encyclopedists. But having an idea is not enough: the idea must have us, haunt us, obsess us, become unbearable to us." While maintaining a mirthfully cynical and darkly humorous tone, the film is unequivocally haunting, as if Verhoeven wanted to make sure the price of admission for experiencing Isabelle Huppert being raped is nothing less than the perpetual rape of the viewer's soul. Based on the novel Oh... (2012) by Philippe Djian—a Parisian racial outsider of mixed Algerian Jewish stock that is probably best known among cinephiles for writing the novel that acted as the basis for Jean-Jacques Beineix's hardly-female-friendly 37° 2 le matin (1986) aka Betty Blue—the film also takes a somewhat subtle yet thankfully pleasantly politically correct approach to race relations. Indeed, aside from the heroine's son being literally cuckolded by his negro friend in an absurdly nightmarish manner that results in the Huppert's character becoming the stunned 'grandmother' of a mulatto baby, the rapist villain—a suave and successful yet seemingly sociopathic banker—is ambiguously Jewish (in fact, English subtitles were curiously changed to obscure this fact in European releases of the film).

Undoubtedly, the somewhat annoying brilliance of Elle is that the (anti)heroine Michèle Leblanc (Isabelle Huppert) is a uniquely unlikable ice queen that is so insanely impenetrable that it is hard to feel sorry for her when she is raped, especially considering that her cunt is so cold it is hard to imagine any man, no matter how aggressively virile and assertive, could violently shove his member in her seemingly frosty flesh cave. In fact, Verhoeven cleverly opens the film with the rape before we even get to know her character, as if the auteur wanted to deconstruct the viewer's sympathy for Michèle as the film progresses. In many ways, the film feels like a sort of post-feminist female fantasy as Michèle is a totally 'independent' woman that not only dictates over a 'hip' and 'sexy' videogame company staffed with largely attractive young men, but she also wields power over her adult son and even ex-husband, thereupon making the rape the one single instance in her life where she did not have total control over a male. Also, rather revealing, the heroine is shocked to eventually discover after chasing various red herrings that the married neighbor she lusts after (she even diddles herself while voyeuristically gazing at him via an upstairs window), Patrick (Laurent Lafitte)—a swarthy yet handsome young banker—is actually her rapist. Notably, instead of turning Patrick into the police, Michèle begins a somewhat short-lived sadomasochistic sexual relationship with him where violent rape is 'simulated,' at least until her cuckold son Vincent (Jonas Bloquet) bashes his brains in upon unwittingly walking in on one of their aberrant erotic episodes. As to whether or not Michèle intentionally gets Patrick killed is questionable (after all, she knew her son was home and also threatened to turn the rapist in), but she certainly does not shed a tear for her lunatic lover after he croaks under rather brutal circumstances. As can be expected from a seriously screwed up broad that regularly nonchalantly uses men as emotional punching bags because she has strategically acquired the monetary means to do so, Michèle has virtually demonic daddy issues due to the fact that she played a not-all-that-passive role at the mere age of ten in a massacre that her father carried out in the neighborhood that resulted in the death of no less than 27 children and adults and various cats and dogs. Needless to say, when Michèle's elderly imprisoned father is in news headlines again because he faces the possibility of parole, it adds an extra layer of paranoia to her life (after all, she even suspects her rape might be related to this). Luckily for her, by the end of Elle the titular twat has every single man in her life exactly where she wants them, including both her father and rapist dead. Needless to say, Michèle has an unspoken innate disgust of the patriarchy, but her patriarchal world is a morbid and morose mess of emasculated manginas, familial degeneration, and all-around emotionally-excruciating estrogen-driven dysfunction. Aside from the loser males in her family, Michèle is especially ashamed of her mother Irène (Judith Magre), who is a deeply narcissistic wanton old whore that proudly flaunts around a quasi-gigolo (Raphaël Lenglet) boyfriend that is young enough to be her grandson. In fact, the heroine hates her mother so much that when the old lady suffers a major stroke and goes into a deep coma, Michèle refuses to believe it and even asks a doctor if there is some way that her slutty old slag mommy might be faking it. Seemingly both jealous and disgusted by her mother's antics and arguably attracted to a rapist because of childhood traumas related to her father, Michèle suffers from what might be best described as the most warped (anti)Electra complex ever depicted in cinema history. Of course, as the film hints throughout, Michèle's strength is nothing more than an impenetrable shield that was put up long ago when she learned to distrust men after her father's murder spree and was forced to fend for herself. Undoubtedly, the film certainly demonstrates that the heroine has more than a little curiosity when it comes to a man that—for the first time in her fucked up life—completely physically dominates her and then takes her by force sexually. Needless to say, as a woman that refuses to defer power to any man, including an ex-husband that she still seems to love, she cannot let it last forever.

Notably, in a 1995 essay entitled Showgirls: Portrait of a Film, Verhoeven wrote, "This theme of redemption is part of American mythology. American movies are filled with these fairy tales in which everything comes out right and everybody goes to the seashore. It is an illusion that is supported by the whole culture, and is probably part of the larger unwillingness to look at unpleasant realities." While maintaining a savagely charming sort of addictively digestible cynicism, Elle not only basks in the unpleasant realities of the sexual dysfunction and cultural senility that plagues modern-day France in a manner that is oftentimes Rabelaisian, but it also makes a mockery out of the very idea of redemption, even if the film ends in a fashion that some misguided (feminist) types might interpret as redemptive as the heroine as she is irredeemably damaged and learns nothing from her exceedingly nightmarish experiences aside from further embracing her own warped form of gynocentrism where she figuratively carries around her son and ex-husband's testicles around in her purse via economic dependence. Instead of finding the security of a man in the end that saves her life and/or avenges her honor as one might expect from a film with similar themes, Michèle leads her already psychologically feeble son into becoming a murderer by going on a decidedly dangerous path that involves a 'voluntary' sexual relationship with the very man that brutally raped her. In short, Michèle is arguably just as hopelessly unhinged and sexually sick as her rapist who, like herself, is a successful professional that largely gets by in life by wearing a mask of sanity. The daughter of a sociopathic mass murderer, she seems to see her rape as less of a traumatic event than a great challenge where she can test her (both literal and figurative) pussy prowess against a man that is, quite unlike her ex-husband, a worthy adversary, thereupon going from prey to the ultimate predator. In that sense, it is no coincidence that a cat watches on with a soulless stare as Michèle is raped at the very beginning of the film as if the feline is the heroine herself coldly sizing up the strength of her enemy so as to adequately dispose of him later. While it is insinuated in the film that Michèle does not report the rape to the police because of the embarrassment that goes with being the daughter of an infamous mass murderer, it is really probably so that she can bide her time until she can eventually take matters into her own hands without getting in trouble with the law (after all, when the police question her after Patrick is killed, Michèle neglects to mention the previous rape or anything else related to it). Like a textbook sociopath, Michèle lacks empathy and merely sees people as things to be manipulated for personal gain. In the end, she even manages to manipulate her rapist—the one man that was able to control her, at least for a couple minutes—into complete and eternal submission. Notably, in a rather telling scene in the film, Michèle randomly acknowledges to a black nurse that she lacks any sort of maternal instincts, even stating in regard to her own son, “Sometimes I look at Vincent, the big lout with nothing special about him that came out of my belly, and I have to admit I don’t know him.” Of course, it is arguable as to whether or not Michèle really knows anyone, though it does seem that her rapist is a sort of kindred spirit as a fellow member of the cryptically unhinged bourgeoisie.

While it is easy to criticize (anti)heroine Michèle since she is a soulless bitch that, among other things, carries on a totally pointless one-sided affair with the husband of her sole true friend Anna (Anne Consigny)—a woman with a heart of gold that acts more like a mother to the heroine’s son than the heroine—she cannot be completely blamed for the sick emasculated world that has led to her professional success and the abject failure of all the men in her life. Indeed, as French New Right theorist Guillaume Faye argues in his book Sexe et Dévoisement (2011) aka Sex and Deviance, “But in reality, women are in no way responsible for the emasculation of men. One may suppose instead that feminism (which appeared at the beginning of the twentieth century) is not only a reaction to the traditional devaluing and inferiorising of women but, today above all, a response to this emasculation of men [...] The emasculation of young men of European origin is flagrant in France. What is more, since the 1970s, girls have been performing better in school, working harder, and taking their studies more seriously than boys. Zemmour rightly criticizes the effeminacy of social values, centered on protection, assistance, mothering, humanitarianism—ideals which, moreover, serve to compensate for the reality of a society increasingly shaken by a new pauperism, and by constantly rising criminality and insecurity, by barbarization, and by neo-primitivism. But things cannot be decreed: if men (and with them, social values) are emasculated, it is their own fault. Women are merely filling the vacuum, taking the place men have abdicated. Besides, many historical episodes (that of Joan of Arc being the most famous) show that women always tend to make up for the failures of men, replacing them.” I do not think it is a mere coincidence that Michèle’s father’s massacre was, according to the protagonist herself, sparked by his neighbors rebuking him for having their children take part in a Catholic ritual. Undoubtedly, this monstrous mass murder spree, which took place in 1976—almost a decade after the so-called May 1968 events and counterculture movement inspired a complete social and sexual change in France—is symbolic of a sort of apocalyptic Last Gasp of traditional French Catholic values. While true patriarchy is what led France to becoming one of the greatest civilizations and empires in all of human history, most people have amnesia when it comes to history and can only associate it with random negative things like Michèle’s father’s murder (just as leftists and feminists associate it with only slavery, misogyny, and war today). Of course, without patriarchy, society produces weak males like Michèle’s son and ex-husband and I doubt anyone truly believes such ‘men’ are superior to those of the past. While he’s not exactly my sort of writer, I think most people can agree that G. Michael Hopf was quite right when he wrote, “Hard times create strong men. Strong men create good times. Good times create weak men. And, weak men create hard times.”

While rape-and-revenge films are certainly nothing new, Elle is so much different from such films that it would largely be a grave disservice to associate it with the (largely exploitation oriented) sub-genre. Indeed, instead of being a film where a chick gets raped, temporarily mentally deteriorates, and then somehow magically becomes a ‘bad ass’ killing machine that literally and/or figuratively castrates her attackers, Verhoeven’s film features a cold and calculated cunt who is sharp enough that she need not even bother to even kill her rapist herself as ‘consensual’ sex with him seems to be her greatest award in terms of her warped sense of female empowerment. While she might be living the feminist dream, Michèle does not feel the need to advertise her feminist tendencies like that total twat Lisbeth Salander from the absolutely atrocious crypto-commie The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo franchise. Additionally, despite buying a gun and other weapons, Michèle does not become homicidally hysterical in a self-destructive fashion like Zoë Tamerlis Lund’s iconic titular character in Abel Ferrara’s cult classic Ms .45 (1981). Rather brilliantly, Verhoeven deprives the viewer of the sort of visceral animalistic satisfaction that is so typical of rape-and-revenge films, as if to point out the innate stupidity, phoniness, and hypocrisy of the sub-genre. While the rapist is indeed killed, his death is almost as shockingly brutal as the rape he committed, thereupon leaving the viewer defiled (or ‘raped’) in both instances in what can be interpreted as some sort of ironical anti-violence message. In a soulless world where people tend to get shocked by very little of anything, it is no surprise such inhumane savagery is approached in such a ‘nonchalant’ fashion, as if Verhoeven resolved to have the viewer question their own (in)humanity without even necessarily being completely conscious of it. Either way, there is no question that the rape is a metaphor for a bigger and more important theme.

While it is not exactly a subtle example of symbolism, it is surely fitting, especially considering contemporary events, that the rapist is an unrepentant banker that seems rather cynical about his wife’s strict devotion to Catholicism. In short, he represents everything that is corrupt, degenerative, and ultimately necrotic about the multicultural farce that is modern France. Indeed, it is no coincidence that French Republican politician Fabien Di Filippo referred to corrupt President of France Emmanuel Macron as “President Rothschild” in late 2018 as he is symptom of such decay that originates centuries ago with the Jewish Rothschild banking dynasty. It also seems fitting that the film was made shortly after International Monetary Fund (IMF) head Dominique Strauss-Kahn—a Ashkenazi-Sephardi Jewish hybrid and socialist politician that was originally considered to be a leading candidate for the 2012 French Presidency—was accused of sexual assault and attempted rape against a black maid. Interestingly, in an article at the Jewish news website The Forward, Jewess Phoebe Maltz Bovy noted at the end of her review of Elle, “Oh, and one more pressing question: Is Patrick Jewish? Michèle briefly suspects a coworker of the assault, and asks him to drop trou, explaining that she’d assumed this coworker was Jewish (he’s not) and that the man she’s trying to locate is circumcised. We don’t know much about Patrick other than that he’s a banker and that he, unlike his wife, isn’t a devout Catholic. Is the evil sadistic rapist banker – like so many bankers in French literature, for example – a Jew? If so, if that’s even ambiguous, this would just add another whole layer of problematic-fave.” I’m going to wager that Patrick is Jewish and that the film cannot be fully appreciated without this being taken into consideration, especially considering recent historical events in France (e.g. Strauss-Kahn) and the western world in generation (e.g. Harvey Weinstein, who was a well known sexual predator long before he was ever officially busted). After all, as Larry David (in)famously stated during a 2017 SNL monologue, “A lot of sexual harassment stuff in the news, and I couldn’t help but notice a very disturbing pattern emerging, which is that many of the predators, not all, but many of them are Jews.” Also, I don’t know much about the film’s source writer Philippe Djian as English-language material on him is very limited, but his schizophrenic lineage as the son of a rootless Algerian Jewish father and a reactionary Catholic mother and early love of great antisemitic novelist Louis-Ferdinand Céline is certainly keeping within the greater themes of Verhoeven’s film. It should also be noted that Djian found the May 1968 events in France as something he was not particularly impressed with as he even went so far as to describe it as simply a time where “there were many girls in the streets” and “everyone seemed a little crazy.” Clearly, Elle depicts the longtime societal rotten fruits of May 1968, though not a single film critic seems willing to even consider that.

Undoubtedly, the connection between Jewishness and decline of the sexes as depicted in Elle was surely highlighted over a century ago by Otto Weininger, who felt Jewishness and femininity were one and the same, in his classic text Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character where he argued, “Our age is not only Jewish, but also the most ‘feminine’; an age in which art represents only a sudarium of its humors; the age of the most gullible anarchism, without any understanding of the State and of justice; the age of the collectivist ethics of the species; the age in which history is viewed with the most astonishing lack of seriousness [historical materialism]; the age of capitalism and of Marxism; the age in which history, life, and science no longer mean anything, apart from economics and technology; the age when genius could be declared a form of madness, while it no longer possesses even one great artist or philosopher; the age of the least originality and its greatest pursuit; the age which can boast of being the first to have exalted eroticism, but not in order to forget oneself, the way the Romans or the Greeks did in their Bacchanalia, but in order to have the illusion of rediscovering oneself and giving substance to one’s vanity.” Interestingly, the lack of originality that Weininger speaks of is brought up by Michèle’s ex-husband Richard, himself a failed writer and exceedingly emasculated man, who soundly argues, “People don’t realize the art muscle needs training. Or else culture collapses, goes flabby. That’s what we’ve got now. Flabby culture. Originality or singularity used to be valued and sought after. Or even an end in itself. Now it’s a liability. I’m not talking about novelty.” In that sense, Elle is not just an entertaining and expertly executed film, but also a cinematic attack against modernity, even if it is also somewhat contaminated with the metaphysical affliction.

The Jewish angle of Elle also becomes more obvious when one reads the hysterical The New Yorker review written by neo-judeo-bolshevik critic Richard Brody—a Claude ‘Shoah’ Lanzmann fanboy who dedicated a good portion of his bio Everything Is Cinema: The Working Life Of Jean-Luc Godard (2008) to attempting to prove that Godard is an antisemite—where he demonstrates a visceral hatred for Verhoeven by completely misrepresenting the director’s film Black Book and unsoundly arguing, “Let’s imagine a remake of SCHINDLER’S LIST in which a Jewish woman, while in a group herded naked into a gas chamber that turns out to be a shower, notices one S.S. officer, finds him thrillingly handsome, and, when she meets him—oh, wait, something like it already exists. Verhoeven made it in 2006, and it’s called BLACK BOOK.” After attempting to paint Verhoeven as a sort of perverted crypto-antisemite at the beginning of his review despite the fact that Black Book has an obvious pro-Zionist message, Brody—a failed one-time filmmaker that, rather curiously, directed a film that no one has ever seen entitled Liability Crisis (1995) that rather revealingly involves a Jewish female documentarian whose obsession with the holocaust/Hitler spells disaster for her sex life—reveals that he has completely missed any message the film was trying to convey and instead cravenly resorts to accusing Verhoeven of being a sort of poser feminist, arguing, “Throughout the film, Verhoeven gives the impression of laughing up his sleeve at Michèle’s predicament as well as at her predilection, as if he were getting away with telling a sexist joke in a speech at a feminist convention. ELLE is no exploration of a woman’s life or psyche but a macho fantasy adorned with the trappings of liberation.” Of course, as someone that used the most absurd out-of-context circumstantial evidence to try to prove Godard is an evil antisemite, it is hard to imagine that Brody would miss the crucial (anti)kosher elements of Elle, though it could also be argued that he subconsciously became aware of the counter-kosher angle of the film and merely used his review as a means to (poorly) rationalize his potentially instinctual reaction. Either way, Brody’s Elle review reveals he knows nil about women and that the world could really benefit from less male feminists; be they Jewish or otherwise.

Aside from the obvious symbolic racial-political reasons as to why the rapist in Elle is also a successful banker, the character also represents a sort dichotomous representation of masculinity as underscored by Camille Paglia’s wise words from Sexual Personae: Art and Decadence from Nefertiti to Emily Dickinson (1990), “Serial or sex murder, like fetishism, is a perversion of male intelligence. It is a criminal abstraction, masculine in its deranged egoism and orderliness. It is the asocial equivalent of philosophy, mathematics and music. There is no female Mozart because there is no female Jack the Ripper.” In fact, Weininger felt criminality was quite common in great men of history and he even went so far as to argue that France’s most legendary statesman and military leader Napoléon Bonaparte—a man who, incidentally, was the first to emancipate Jews in France and Europe in general—was driven to glory by criminal tendencies, stating, “Napoleon, the greatest of the conquerors, is a sufficient proof that great men of action are criminals, and therefore, not geniuses. One can understand him by thinking of the tremendous intensity with which he tried to escape from himself. There is this element in all the conquerors, great or small. Just because he had great gifts, greater than those of any emperor before him, he had greater difficulty in stifling the disapproving voice within him. The motive of his ambition was the craving to stifle his better self.” It can be argued that the anti-heroine of Elle sees her rapist as her sort of erotic Napoleon as that rare no-bullshit alpha-male that, not unlike her mass murder father and quite unlike her meek beta ex-husband and son, has the gall to take what he wants whilst completing ignoring the laws and conventions of polite society. Of course, this also explains the female obsession with serial killers as exemplified recently by the unending media headlines in regard to the Netflix docu-series Conversations with a Killer: The Ted Bundy Tapes (2019) and the Jewish director Joe Berlinger's accompanying biopic Extremely Wicked, Shockingly Evil, and Vile (2019) starring perennial frat-boy mischling Zac Efron as bad boy Bundy. On a more personal level, I used to be friends with a German-American chick that was pen pals with mestizo serial killer Richard Ramirez and it soon became apparent to me after a fleeting sexual excursion that her main interest in me was due to my 'unconventional' Weltanschauung, as if it got her wet to know that I sported a Death In June t-shirt and didn't think the Allies were the good guys during WWII.

Apparently, New Line Cinema founder Robert Shaye—a man that made himself very rich with the A Nightmare on Elm Street franchise—once stated, “A black humor approach to filmmaking helps to diffuse the potential for offensiveness.” Undoubtedly, few other films validate this statement more than Elle where Verhoeven—arguably foremost master to this oftentimes cynical cinematic approach—demonstrates his singular talent for refined Rabelaisian satire where he manages to make the most uniquely uncomfortable of situations endlessly palatable in a manner comparable to disguising rancid maggot-ridden dog shit as Godiva Chocolatier. Indeed, the film does the seemingly impossible by making the European racial-sexual apocalypse seem entertaining, like when great Romanian pessimist Emil Cioran, himself a student of Weininger, once hilariously yet nonchalantly described his adopted hometown of Paris as an “apocalyptic garage” in the documentary Apocalypse According to Cioran (1995) directed by Gabriel Liiceanu. Undoubtedly, like much of Verhoeven's films, Elle is less a celebration of Occidental decline than a biting sassy and sophisticated reminder of it. In that sense, it is no surprise that the very last scene of the film features the heroine and her best friend Anna walking through a graveyard after bonding over insulting men together, as if to simply let the viewer know that the man-hunting cunts are carelessly walking on the corpse of Western Civilization and that they only have the utmost contempt for the long dead white men that were responsible for building said corpse that they are still unwittingly feeding off of. After all, whether conscious of it or not, these women blame white men for their current lot and, as they say: “Hell has no fury like a woman scorned.” As to the value of a film like Elle that criticizes decadence while also curiously embracing it, one must take heed of Cioran's wise words from the nihilistic classic A Short History of Decay (1949), “The mistake of those who apprehend decadence is to try to oppose it whereas it must be encouraged: by developing it exhausts itself and permits the advent of other forms. The true harbinger is not the man who offers a system when no one wants it, but rather the man who precipitates Chaos, its agent and incense-bearer. It is vulgar to trumpet dogmas in extenuated ages when any dream of the future seems a dream or an imposture. To make for the end of time with a flower in one's buttonhole—the sole comportment worthy of us in time's passage. A pity there is no such thing as a Last Judgement, no occasion for a great defiance! Believers: hamfatters of eternity; faith: craving for a timeless stage. . . . But we unbelievers, we die with our decors, and too tired out to deceive ourselves with blazonry promised to our corpses."

Paul W.S. Anderson (1997)

I never find it suiting to watch a mainstream film, mainly ones that have aged since I last remember. I'd rather settle in an underground film, an obscure title, or a Die Hard film. I became somewhat of a joke around my community friends because I had not seen Event Horizon. Peer pressure led me to see In the Mouth of Madness (A very similar film) and more recently, Event Horizon. The creator of the Event Horizon (A spaceship which travels at light speed) enlists a rescue crew to discover what happened to the ship and its crew (The "revelation" at the end of the film is wholly unique and makes me think in an expansive viewpoint concerning space. I like that.) Sam "Dr. Grant" Neill plays a convincing role as the douche bag who will throw down the Scientific method on anyone who says otherwise. Rather than arguing reality, he simply looks for a logical answer, which in turn leads to some screwed up shit. (SPOILER) Later in the film, Dr. Grant becomes a savior of sorts. The ferry guard towards the gates of hell. Messianic if you will. The fresh gashes scarring his face prove to effect even the most jaded horror fan. Laurence Fishburne is still working on removing the stain from his action-packed performance in ANOES: Dream Warriors. His role is perhaps a little bit on the wooden side. I did not expect Event Horizon to even be ¼ this engaging. A stark cinematic odyssey brimming with a bit of classic ultra-violence (owing a huge debt to the classic Hellraiser.) By all means, I was shocked and disgusted with this film. It hurts to see that the youth of the "torture porn" era think that their films are disgusting. Event Horizon's depictions of cannibalism, chaos, hell, and everything dark is bar none and upsetting to say the least. Event Horizon is a mash-up of all great science-fiction films. Sets spring with Alien inspiration and characters and situations are all ripped from various classics. I wouldn't expect otherwise giving that the director is the same hack who brought us such insta-classics (Note the sarcasm) as Mortal Kombat, Resident Evil, and AVP. The star of this film is the beautiful leading lady; The Event Horizon herself. A stunning ship decorated with spikes and claw-like doors with provide a tense and claustrophobic atmosphere. The heart of the ship is a fortified black hole being suppressed by three magnetic rings. A gyroscopic heart of infinite terror would be the best way to describe it. My favorite aspect is the funky green lit crawlspaces creating a technical labyrinth. An addition to the greats of Science horror has been achieved, but I can't help but feel copped out when every "war in space" film has to have a goofy black guy on board. It's been this way since the Alien films came out. I can except a goofy black limo driver thwarting Urkel's evil plans, but not in space! Other than this and the recycled events, Event Horizon is damn near perfect. A film that deserves more credit for managing to be creepy and fucked up.

DEATH RACE

Paul W.S. Anderson (2008)

At the helm of this schlocky (not the compliment you'd come to expect) racing action film is world renowned action star Jason Statham whose primary goal is to drive this film somewhere other than in the gutter. It works to a degree before the other cast subsequently drags him and this movie into a homo-erotic prison hell. Death Race is an exercise in gambling with property rights. When you take a director with a horrifying reputation in Hollywood with such blunders as the ill-fated Resident Evil and the too-tacky Mortal Kombat, chances are that your remake has no chances. The machine is just designed that way. Where Paul W. S. Anderson shows for no talent, he too can create an awesome film (Event Horizon) and completely disregard something he had briefly called talent. Remakes have and always will be there. It's been that way for years. The only difference now is the quality and quantity of them. I'm sure in about 10-20 years, our collective society will look back upon the film era and scoff at the insubordination and lack of creativity when it comes to our modern film. If there were to be one rule of remakes, it should be to not insult the original vision and that is exactly what Anderson does. You might recall the classic exploitation original - Death Race 2000. You might also remember the wonderful point system, surprising political messages, and the wonderful system provided by Frank and Machine Gun Joe as to shelter the truth on which is hero or villain. Well, take Machine Gun Joe for instance. Sylvester Stallone plays a wonderful womanizer who is as cocky as he is arrogant. Well, now he's a homosexual Negro who jive talks his way out of tight situations. It's like Anderson purposely wanted to make a vision of Death Race 2000 opposite of what it was. Terrible news - He succeeded. Jail bait Latino women are introduced as navigators, not the reserved daughters of America that we recall from the classic. These women are gang-banging thugs that are street wise and sexy. They aint mind poppin a cap (Napalm canister) inna foo's ass. Sounds like Michael Bay wrote the script, don't it? For the defense of entertainment, this "reboot" (which has a lawsuit filed on it from stealing a ideas from a film called Joust) has what we expect from the trailer, violence, bloodshed, high-octane car chases, and lots of bullet casings. They threw in the MTV generation women for shits & giggles. Keep in mind that most of the gross revenue that this film will make is from men. Men who read Maxim none-the-less. The concept of a freedom fighting Frankenstein conserving his country's freedom looks great on paper, not so much a pyramid scheme to fake Frankenstein to keep the illusion alive. The vision of this film is blurred and scratched. Paul W. S. Anderson is a dying breed. One can only hope that these fascist directors are weeded out by their roots. Death Race is loud and annoying, frenetic and a bit full of itself. The film still manages to be entertaining, but I would never recommend paying for it or for die-hard fans of the original.

Paulus Manker (1986)

While typically best known for being one of the most talented actors in the German-speaking world, even if he has aged horrifically over the past couple decades, Austrian actor Paulus Manker (Benny's Video, Brother of Sleep) is also an audacious auteur filmmaker who has directed some of the most immaculately assembled, if not acutely aberrant, Austrian films of the post-WWII era. Learning the craft of filmmaking by working with some of the most pathologically provocative and nihilistic filmmakers from his homeland, including Michael Haneke (Time of the Wolf, Funny Games) and Franz Novotny (Exit... But No Panic, Die Ausgesperrten aka The Excluded), Manker started his directing career with the completely unclassifiable and totally chilling yet suavely stylized post-industrial 'horror-thriller' Schmutz aka (1987) Dirt – a uniquely uncompromising and absurdly ambitious film that would earn a number of awards at festivals, including "Prize for the best director" and "Special recommendation for the soundtrack" at the 1987 Flanders International Film Festival Ghent, and would even be adapted into a book written by German writer Thorsten Becker, yet I doubt any novel could capture the fiercely foreboding and enthralling yet equally alienating atmosphere of the film. Centering around a humorless security guard who takes his unglamorous job watching over an abandoned paper mill a little too seriously and who experiences a brutal break with sanity after losing said job, Schmutz is like a nihilistic adaptation of F.W. Murnau's The Last Laugh (1924) aka Der letzte Mann for the post-WWII generation with its pomo post-industrial setting and irreparably lost protagonist, so it should be no surprise that Manker's former collaborators Novotny (who came up with the "idea" and "treatment") and Haneke (who wrote some of the dialogue) also contributed to the film as writers. For all those individuals who have worked at a job with a dreary dildo of a dude who treats every aspect of his work as if the fate of the world depends on it and brown-nosing the boss like a pathological shit-eater at what is nothing more than a dead-end job fit for a masochistic monkey, Schmutz makes for a horrifyingly 'postmodern human, all too postmodern human' work about a dispiriting dystopian world where a true 'purpose' in life is nowhere to be found. Featuring a super seductive synth-driven score by Swiss synthpop group Yello, Schmutz is probably the mostly readily digestible work ever made about the slow but steady mental disintegration of a maniac child killer.

Herr Joseph Schmutz (Fritz Schediwy, who played the Nietzsche-quoting, dipsomaniac criminal Willy in Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) directed by R.W. Fassbinder) is an undeniably remarkable man whose life is about to change rather dramatically as a result of his new false sense of 'self-worth' after being hired to work at a monstrously sized abandoned paper factory as a meager security guard.

As his seemingly megalomaniac of a boss (Hans-Michael Rehberg) tells him in a sinister fashion regarding his patrolling job, “Keep in mind, whatever the person in front of you is doing, whether he’s a trespasser or stray, child or criminal, he is in the wrong. He should not be where he is if you are standing opposite him. What do the peoples of the world call an invader into their territories?...Enemy.” A creepy kiss ass of the miserable middle-aged sort, Schmutz does not only go on the defensive against trespassers, but also his fellow security guard comrades as a traitor of the worst kind. Immediately upon first working with a goofy new security guard named Fux (Siggi Schwientek), Schmutz gives gruff to comrade in a rather ridiculously monotone manner as if he were an asexual automaton. Indeed, Fux offers Schmutz on-the-job free booze and babes, but the ungrateful fellow reacts with irrational rage like a tyrannical toddler who has an unhealthy devotion to his mommy. When Schmutz discovers Fux’s collection of porno magazines, the shuddersome and seemingly sexually sterile security guard cuts all the faces of women out from the pages of the mags and makes a collection of them and, for whatever curious reason, keeps them hidden in a drawer. When the bossman discovers Fux sleeping on the job in an inebriated state with two equally drunk, foxy ladies, the new employee has a gun pulled on him and is inevitably fired, thus leaving psycho Schmutz to work by his lonesome and to further stew in his own delusions and get in touch with his impending insanity. A victim of television, Schmutz suffers from sexual displacement and derives sexual pleasure via soap bars due to a television commercial he saw of two naked ladies in an intangible paradise advertising the wonders of sexy soap suds. Being the lone Führer of the post-industrial wasteland he guards with his rather worthless life, Schmutz begins attempting to murder any person that may have the misfortune of passing by the vicinity of where he works. After his boss breaks the bad news that his company no longer has a security contract with the owners of the decrepit paper factory, Schmutz loses his cool and venomously shouts at his boss, “You were entrusted with leadership! You can’t just simply elevate people and destroy them!” so he is naturally fired, but the screwy security guard stays at his job post, drawing up elaborate security plans and maliciously murdering anyone that crosses his pernicious path.

As someone who has worked with German New Cinema co-founder Alexander Kluge – a man whose first film, the experimental documentary short Brutalität in Stein (1961) aka Brutality in Stone, attempted to depict National Socialist architecture as something frightfully superhuman that was used to apparently ‘dehumanize’ the individual due to its preposterous massiveness – in the past, Paulus Manker was certainly someone who was in touch with all-encompassing alienation caused by industrialization and bureaucracy as portrayed in Schmutz – a film that does for technocratic post-Nazi Austria what David Lynch’s Eraserhead (1977) did for the putrid post-industrial hellhole that is Philadelphia. Schmutz also gives a number of nods to classic works of German-language cinema, but the most obvious is a tribute to Fritz Lang's M (1931). Like M, Schmutz features a scene where the calamitous kiddy killer's shadow appears hovering over a little girl in a dress who is playing around, but Manker's scenario is all the more disheartening and disturbing because the murderer is not motivated by an innate sexual perversion that he cannot control, but by slavishly doing a dubious duty for a job he no longer even has, thus making him more of a sad schlemiel of his environment as opposed to someone born with a broken brain. Manker also makes a number of allusions to Austria's infamous Nazi past, which is especially obvious by the eagle emblem the security company Schmutz works for uses and is featured prominently on the guards' hats as it looks strikingly similar to the one featured in the coat of arms of the Nazi Party, thus allegorically symbolizing the nation's perennial connection to its naughty National Socialist past of blind allegiance to an authoritarian state that advocated violence against the individual, thus turning Austrian against Austrian and mensch against mensch.

In another rather allegorical and acutely apocalyptic scene, Schmutz the putz, after being fired from his job, shoots a television ad featuring the Austrian flag, thus making it seem as if Uncle Adolf's homeland is still in flames due to its infamous legacy, but like many scenarios featured in Schmutz, reality and virtual reality are nearly impossible to distinguish. The one thing that gives Schmutz any semblance of inner 'humanity' is his longing for 'paradise' (in the form of an old postcard of a tropical island he finds at the plant) and 'romance' (in the form of a soap bar and TV commercial), but neither of these things are organic objects, but rather, abstract ideas advertized by companies, thus one could easily argue that the super slayer of a security guard, not unlike the anti-heroes of Manker's two other feature-length films Weiningers Nacht (1990) aka Weininger's Last Night and Der Kopf des Mohren (1995) aka The Moor's Head is a victim of the post-modern condition, albeit one suffering from a rather extreme and hopeless case of the decidedly damned sort. In the end, Schmutz calls out to the archangels Gabriel, Raphael, and Michael as a fallen man whose spiritual descent and revolt against god has put him in league with the evil archangel Lucifer. Indeed, no other race but Faustian man, European man, has managed to fall from the grace so hard and so fast with Schmutz being a meager member of this tradition. As the same country that has sired Adolf Hitler, Viennese Actionism, and Peter Kern, it is no surprise that the totally talented Paulus Manker was able to churn out an auspicious celluloid work like Schmutz – a film that acts as an esoteric expression of the psychosis-ridden Austrian collective unconscious. With epic Riefenstahl-esque camera angles in ostensible sardonic anti-tribute to Triumph of the Will (1935) aka Triumph des Willens and a postmodern pessimism in the tradition of his filmic gurus Michael Haneke and Franz Novotny, Manker's Schmutz is a seamlessly assembled hodgepodge of twentieth century Germanic cinema ingredients that has only become all the more relevant as the years have past in an age where it seems that every month there is an autistic shooter who has went on a rampage at a school or movie theater.

WEININGER'S LAST NIGHT

Paulus Manker (1990)

With possibly the exception of Ulrike Ottinger's carnivalesque surrealist lesbian epic Freak Orlando (1981) and Christoph Schlingensiefel's Mutters Maske (1988) – a loose remake of Veit Harlan's National Socialist arthouse masterpiece Opfergang (1944) – there is no other film that I have been more obsessed with seeing than Paulus Manker's Weiningers Nacht (1990) aka Weininger's Last Night, not least of all because of having been enamored and intrigued with the film's tragic subject for a number of years. Described by fellow Austrian anti-Semite Adolf Hitler in the following manner, "Dietrich Eckhart once told me that in all his life he had known just one good Jew: Otto Weininger, who killed himself on the day when he realized that the Jew lives upon the decay of peoples," Weininger's Last Night is about a youthful genius who was plagued with dire inconsistencies and whose own ethno-masochistic proclivities would ultimately lead to his own self-inflicted premature demise at the age of 23 in 1903. Weininger proposed the controversial thesis that the archetypical Jew and the archetypical woman are one in the same: passive, unproductive, unconscious, and amoral. The son of a strict yet cultured Viennese Jewish goldsmith, the physically unremarkable Otto Weininger grew up to receive a Ph.D. degree in philosophy and finished his marvelous magnum opus Sex and Character: A Fundamental Investigation (1903) aka Geschlecht und Charakter: Eine prinzipielle Untersuchung less than a year later – a work that would make the young genius more popular in his day than Sigmund Freud – yet he would not live to see this fame as he committed suicide in the same house Beethoven died in shortly after the book's publication. 100% Hebrew by blood yet highly influenced by proto-Nazi racialist writer Houston Stewart Chamberlain's best-selling work The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century (1899), one could argue that Weininger's suicide was merely the act of a logical man carrying out his own thesis, as he argued that Judaism is "the extreme of cowardliness" and "The Jew has no really strong will." Indeed, it was not converting to Protestantism that freed Weininger from his innate 'Jewishness' but a desperate act of self-annihilation. As fellow anti-Semitic Semite and celebrated Jazz saxophonist Gilad Atzmon stated in his recent work The Wandering Who? A Study of Jewish Identity Politics (2011) about Weininger: "He hated women and Jews because he was a woman and a Jew. He adored Aryan masculinity because he probably lacked that quality in any significant amount in his own being. This revelation probably led Weininger to kill himself...he had managed to understand what his book was all about." For those who have studied Weininger's work and life, Atzmon's thoughts might not seem like much of a revelation, as Paulus Manker seems to draw the same conclusion in his minor masterpiece of celluloid theatre Weininger's Last Night; a film that is both an efficacious introduction to the forlorn philosopher and an audacious piece of Austrian autocratic cinematic art.

No stranger to the curious case of Otto Weininger, Austrian theatric auteur Paulus Manker (Schmutz aka Dirt, Der Kopf des Mohren aka The Moor's Head) directed and starred in the 1982 work Weininger's Night (The Soul of a Jew) written by Israeli playwright Joshua Sobol, which proved to be his greatest triumph as a thespian, henceforth inspiring him to adapt it into the film Weininger's Last Night. Of Jewish ancestry himself (he dedicates the film to his Jewish father), Manker brings a certain authenticity and intense intimacy to Weininger's Last Night that is further exemplified by some of his casting decisions, notably the inclusion of his own mother Hilde Sochor to star as Otto Weininger's overbearing mom Adelheid. Virtually channeling the spirit of the suicidal Judaic man of immense genius, Manker would also play Weininger in the Hungarian film My 20th Century (1989) aka Az én XX. Századom directed by Ildikó Enyedi – a work that earned its director a Caméra d'Or ("Golden Camera") at the 1989 Cannes Film Festival – but no other acting role can compare to his performance and direction as immortalized in Weininger's Last Night; a work I would humbly consider the greatest celluloid 'tribute' to an intellectual figure ever made. A fabulous quasi-Freudian expressionistic psychodrama set almost entirely in one mere opera house theatre room, Weininger's Last Night is a tragicomedic window into one young genius' seemingly schizoid mind. Haunted by a female doppelganger (a virtual Jungian shadow), his overbearing parents, and historical intellectual figures of his day, including Sigmund Freud, August Strindberg, and Paul Julius Möbius, the Otto Weininger of Weininger's Last Night is propelled into hysterical states ranging from morbid megalomania to maniac depression, yet he is mostly able to prevail due to his intellectual sternness; a trait that English-language Weininger biographer David Abrahamsen (The Mind and Death of a Genius) argued was the only thing keeping the young genius from completely breaking with sanity. As is vividly expressed in the film, even during his untimely suicide by way of a firearm to the chest, Weininger was able to separate his visceral emotions from his domineering intellect, arguing that self-slaughter was no more of a physiological act than sneezing or coughing as described by controversial Italian-German psychiatrist-turned-avant-garde-writer Oskar Panizza. Despite its saturnine subject matter, Weininger's Last Night is ultimately a black comical work of the decidedly snide and cynical persuasion, but not so much so that the viewer is not introduced to Weininger's complex weltanschauung and his thoughts on Judaism, Aryanism, Zionism, Protestantism, and gender. If Woody Allen's character in Zelig (1983) was less sentimental and had more testicular fortitude and came-of-age in Fin de siècle Vienna, he would probably resemble the innately neurotic yet intellectually dynamic Otto Weininger featured in Weininger's Last Night.

On top of inspiring thinkers and artists as great as August Strindberg, Ludwig Wittgenstein, Karl Kraus, Alfred Kubin, Robert Musil, Gertrude Stein and Stefan Zweig, Otto Weininger and his work Geschlecht und Charakter would also inspire quasi-fascist thinkers like Austrian völkisch mystic Lanz von Liebenfels, Heimito von Doderer, Romanian philosopher Emil Cioran, and Sicilian Radical Traditionalist Baron Julius Evola, as well as the German National Socialists who edited the parts of his writing they did not agree with. Although Weininger's Last Night is arguably the greatest introduction to the life and ideas of Otto Weininger, one must have at least a basic understanding of the intellectual and political climate of late 19th century/early 20th Vienna to fully appreciate the film. At a time when so-called self-loathing Jews (Weininger, Karl Kraus, Egon Friedell, Arthur Trebitsch, etc.) and racially-conscious Jews (Max Nordau, Sigmund Freud, Theodor Herzl, Theodor Lessing, etc.) battled one another in the intellectual world, it is probably hard for modern viewers to accept such a seemingly absurd scenario, thus Weininger's Last Night makes for a strikingly singular and aesthetically extravagant awakening to this seemingly peculiar phenomenon in Austrian history. Despite being a man of overwhelming contradictions, Otto Weininger offers the following telling insight in the film: "Antisemitism is a Jewish invention." Like Jesus Christ – another great 'self-loathing Jew' of history – Weininger wears a crown of thorns and his is ultimately resurrected via the posthumous popularity of his work Geschlecht und Charakter; a work that will inevitably inspire the goyish antisemitism of the Third Reich. With potent yet preposterous scenarios of absurdist anti-Semitic puppet shows, castration-anxiety-fueled culinary circumcision, menacing Mel Brooks-esque musical numbers, and psychoanalytic psychodrama, Weininger's Last Night is a wonderfully wicked (un)love letter to not only to the film's subject, but a particular time and place in Europe before the rise and fall of Hitler, the death of European imperialism, and the founding of the State of Israel, thus it should be not surprise as to why, although Freud is still a darling of contemporary academics, Weininger has been conveniently disposed of in the kosher dustbin of history.

THE MOOR'S HEAD
THE MOOR'S HEAD

Paulus Manker (1995)

I am quite proud to say that, although I like some of his films like Funny Games (1997) and The White Ribbon (2007), I am certainly no Michael Haneke fanboy, which is largely due to the fact that I cannot stand the man, who resembles a sort of sneering Judaic left-wing intellectual in spite of his apparent Teutonic blue blood. Indeed, whenever I see a Haneke film, I can practically imagine him jerking off to himself while sitting in front of a mirror in his ivory tower like some nihilistic narcissus while fantasizing about the audience members he aesthetically assaulted with his obscenely self-conscious and largely self-congratulatory works. This of course is no fantasy of my own, but demonstrated by Haneke's own remarks and actions, like how he once bragged that audience members were horrified by a scene from his debut feature The Seventh Continent (1989) aka Der siebente Kontinent where the doomed family flushes all of their money down the toilet. While the director speaks of the "emotional glaciation" of the post-WWII Occident and whatnot, it seems like he is merely projecting his personality and view of the world. Naturally, when I discovered that someone else had adapted a screenplay penned by Haneke, I could not help but wonder if such a work would lack the director's proverbial wagging finger. Indeed, Der Kopf des Mohren (1995) aka The Moor's Head is Haneke as interpreted by fellow Austrian, actor/auteur Paulus Manker who, as far as I am concerned, has directed nothing but unsung masterpieces, including the post-industrial nightmare Schmutz (1987) aka Dirt, as well as the truly unclassifiable Weininger's Last Night (1990) aka Weiningers Nacht, which he also starred in. Based on the tragic life and genius philosophy of so-called self-loathing Jew Otto Weininger—a troubled young genius who committed suicide (interestingly, in the same house where Beethoven died) shortly after releasing his magnum opus Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character, which argued that all people are 'bisexual' (aka a mixture of male and the female character traits) to varying degrees and that the archetypal Jew is innately feminine and thus lacks a moral compass and true sense of individuality (soul)—Weininger's Last Night is one of the true contemporary masterpieces of Austrian cinema and a work that Manker, who is half-Jewish (his father was the Viennese Jewish theatre and TV director Gustav Manker), put himself into completely (on top of playing Weininger in the stage adaptation of Joshua Sobol's original play, Manker also played the suicidal Semite philosopher in Ildikó Enyedi's My 20th Century (1989) aka Az én XX. Századom). Unquestionably, The Moor's Head seems more like a work that Manker did to help out his buddy Haneke (who apparently wanted to direct it himself but for whatever reason couldn't) than a deep personal project, yet it is a 'lost classic' of sorts that would most certainly develop a cult following in the United States if it had better exposure. A work of suburban metaphysical horror in the spirit of Haneke's own The Seventh Continent meets Todd Hayne's Safe (1995) and Jeff Nichols' Take Shelter (2011), The Moor's Head begins as a seemingly banal bourgeois drama and delightfully degenerates into a fiercely foreboding horror show about a successful family man who, upon hearing about a toxic gas leak accident at a nearby factory, becomes deleteriously psychologically perturbed and ultimately a threat to his family as he begins preparing for an imaginary apocalypse of sorts.

Afrocentrics will be delighted to know that the eponymous Moorhead of Manker's film is a reference to a gigantic painting of a big-lipped and spook-eyed negress, which is located at a ruined lot where the protagonist, Georg Hartmann (played by Viennese actor Gert Voss, who just died a couple months back), is having a nice home built for his loving family. Georg is a seemingly happy-go-lucky physicist that lives in an Austrian suburb and works hard at a testing lab and has a wife, Anna (German New Cinema star Angela Winkler, of countless classics like The Tin Drum (1979), as well as Haneke's 1992 flick Benny's Video), as well as three kids, including a teenage daughter and prepubescent boy and girl. Everything seems to be running smoothly in Georg's life until he hears a radio broadcast at work that a "terrible accident" has occurred at a nearby plant in Wiesing involving a gas explosion. While his coworkers couldn't care less that some poor fellow was exposed to hazardous gasses, Georg becomes quite unnerved by the news and almost immediately hallucinates seeing the assumed corpse of the man that perished in the accident. While taking a bath with a rubber duck, Georg also hallucinates seeing blood dripping from his wife's arms. Anna does not become aware of Georg's mental illness until he sells their lot with the Moorhead to buy a ruined country home that he plans to revamp into an ostensible 'paradise.' When Anna questions Georg's sanity after he shows her the country home and recommends that he see a psychiatrist, he smacks her so hard that she falls to the floor and suffers a bloody nose. Afterward, Georg explains that he wanted to move to the country to get away from the "chaos" of the city and then goes on to describe the emigration and suicide rates in Austria. While Georg manages to make up with Anna during their rendezvous in the countryside and he even agrees to attempt to buy back the Moorhead house, the scientist's sanity has only begun to wane all the more.

When Georg opts to stay home while his family goes on vacation in Italy, he takes the opportunity to turn the fancy family apartment into a sort of post-apocalyptic sanctuary equipped with an indoor garden, a virtual jungle with living birds, bunny rabbits, and baby chickens. While turning his flat into an ostensibly indomitable fortress, George actively feeds his paranoia and insanity by listening to the news and becomes especially intrigued by a broadcast about a crazed Chechnyan who committed self-immolation in Moscow. Meanwhile, wife Anna attempts to contact Georg, even sending him a telegram urging him to call her back, but he ignores it. Georg also begins recording his phone calls and whatnot as keepsakes. On the handful of occasions that Georg opts to venture out in public, he takes a hint from the Japanese and sports a protective mask over his face, so as not to acquire whatever imaginary virus might be out there. When an elderly busybody makes the mistake of routinely spying on what Georg is doing, he stabs her in the eye via a keyhole. Whatever became of the nosey old fart is anyone's guess, but she surely got what was coming to her.

Naturally, when Anna and the children arrive back from their trip to Italy, they are quite taken aback by what old Georg boy has done to the apartment. While Georg's preadolescent son Jakob (Manuel Löffler) is amazed by the garden apartment, his wife Anna is not nearly as happy and tells her husband that she feels like she is trapped in a "nightmare." As someone who believes his wife only cares about irreverent things, Georg believes that it is she and not he who is the one that is acting delusional. When Jakob hurts his foot and Anna attempts to take him and the rest of the children away, Georg stops her by brutally beating her in front of the kids. When Anna becomes so disturbed by the realization that she and her children have become imprisoned by her husband, she becomes hyper hysterical and vomits. That night, Georg hears Anna running through the apartment, so to stop her he bashes her over the head and instantly kills her. Determined to finish the job, Georg also violently kills all the livestock and slaughters his two young children with a kitchen knife and attempts to frame his wife for the killings by planting said kitchen knife in her cold dead hand. Of course, seeing as he is a schizophrenic of sorts, Georg only imagined the killings and is soon taken away to the loony bin after his wife calls the authorities, but not before he slices his own face up. In the end, the film closes with a quote by Enlightenment era German philosopher/poet Gotthold Ephraim Lessing.

As depicted in the documentary Celluloid Horror (2004), Canadian cineaste and journalist Kier-La Janisse (author of the 2012 FAB Press release House of Psychotic Women) has done her part in promoting The Moor's Head by having it screened at her film festival CineMuerte aka 'Cinema of Death'—Canada's first and only international horror film festival—alongside works by Jörg Buttgerit, Jean Rollin, and Buddy Giovinazzo, among various others. Aside from that, it seems that Manker's film is destined to incinerate in the celluloid dustbin of history like so many other great German-language films. While I do not want to sound like some proud uncultivated philistine, I have to admit that I believe that what separates The Moor's Head from Haneke's oeuvre, is a certain sense of humanity that the Funny Games director seems to lack, as if he is above (and/or is too ill-equipped at) demonstrating empathy for his characters and audience. In other words, one does not get the impression while watching The Moor's Head that Manker thinks he is better than his characters and that he does not suffer from the narcissistic delusion that his shit does not smell. While nearly two decades old, the film has only become all the more horrifying and pertinent, especially considering the rise of survivalist and 'prepper' types who think that the apocalypse is just around the corner. Indeed, considering the current state of the West, especially the United States, we can probably expect to see a number of Georg Hartmanns cropping up. The greatest Austrian 'arthouse horror' flick since Gerald Kargl's Angst (1983) aka Schizophrenia, The Moor's Head is a great reminder of the true artistic potential of the horror genre as opposed to mind-numbingly retarded 'supernatural horror,' the totally tedious 'torture porn' of psychopathic Zionist frat boy Eli Roth, and related celluloid swill that Hollywood incessantly defecates out to remind the world that America has no culture. While probably not an intention of the director, The Moor's Head also depicts a culturally and spiritually repressed technocratic zeitgeist where rapid Americanization and a lack of a spiritual 'Heimat' drive people crazy, hence why the lead character has an undying atavistic urge to live a simple life without cars and cities and attempts to move his family to the country (and when that fails, he brings the country to his apartment!). Of course, as Haneke demonstrated with his film The White Ribbon, the country is an evil place that spawns violent proto-Nazi children.

LUNA PARK
LUNA PARK

Pavel Lungin* (1992)

I have a soft-spot for Jewish Nazis and self-loathing Jews so when I found out about the Russian film Luna Park, I immediately had to see it. The Russian film follows a Neo-Nazi skinhead named Andrei who finds out that he is the bastard son of a moderately successful Jewish musician. Andrei's father is everything he hates, a Jew that is more successful than the majority of ethnic Russians and admittedly disdains anything involving real working-class work. On discovering that he is a mischling in the first degree, Andrei is even more enraged than he is whilst beating swarthy mongrels. After all, Andrei's whole being and reason for living is destroyed upon learning he is one of Abraham's bastard sons as his life centers around his anti-Jewish skinhead crew that inhabits the industrial bowels of an amusement park. Luna Park is surely one of those wonderful and rare films that is able to eloquently express the absurdity of being a human as well as the schizoid joy of having a self/hate relationship with oneself.

Currently, Russia contains the most Neo-Nazis in the world (oh, how time changes everything with biting irony), from feeble minded meathead skinhead thugs to somewhat legitimate mainstream Nationalist politicians. Russia used to also have the largest Jewish population in the world (mainly contained in The Pale of Settlement of Imperial Russia). After the "Russian" revolution of 1917 (a largely Jewish supported and executed affair), Jews were able to spread throughout the world like wandering locusts. Mass Murdering mongrel revolutionary Vladimir Lenin (1/4 Jewish himself) even made a speech in 1919 on the capitalist ills of anti-Jewish pogroms which was surely one of the first somewhat famous Pro-Jewish propaganda campaigns, something that has become all too common in the post-Eurocentric and globalized United States of America. Andrei of Luna Park is surely an unfortunate assimilated remnant of the once thriving and still hated Russian Jewry. Unlike Daniel Balint from Henry Bean's The Believer, there is nothing Jewish about Andrei's behavior nor pantomimes (not to mention, he is a body builder), for he truly is a robust Russian brute flowing with a radiant energy of testosterone. It is fairly obvious that Andrei would never make it in the world of Jewish vaudevillian comedy but as for his Father, that is a whole other story....

Although a lover of Russian cinema from all eras, I find it nearly impossible to relate to the 'Russian mentality,' even at the most fundamental level. With the barbaric Russians featured in Luna Park, this also holds true for me for they seemed to be psychologically wired in a way that Northern Europeans probably could relate to in the Middle Ages. Andrei's Jewish father, on the other hand, is instantly identifiable as Jewish, for he certainly shares the cynicism, humor, and arrogance of God's chosen tribe. I bet that the average American would also find Andrei's Jewish father to be the most 'American' and understandable due to the bombardment of krappy-kosher-komedies that Hollywood has reamed them with since birth. Although clever and humorous, Andrei's Father is a highly despicable man, a swindling bohemian musician of the most culturally repulsive degree (he brought degenerate Jazz to Russia for god's sake), certainly someone sharing a similar genotype with Adam Sandler and Sacha Baron Cohen. Despite these glaring anti-goy traits, Andrei soon starts respecting his Father and his talents. It doesn't take Andrei long to realize he needs to shed his working-class skinhead lifestyle for the wealthy (at least rich for a Soviet) hedonistic living of a Judaic entertainer. It soon becomes apparent that the skinheads and virtual prostitutes of Luna Park hate Jews largely out of resentment, not for the love of Mother Russia.

Andrei's Jewish ancestry is revealed to him by his whorish lover, an older full-figured woman who also happened to be his deceased Mother's best friend. This older woman hates Andrei's Father for very personal reasons and wants nothing more than having the old Jewish bohemian die a miserable death with the musical compositions of Richard Wagner as the soundtrack. After all, Andrei's Jewish Father is a man known for screwing every young blond Russki in town (Andrei's girlfriend and Mother being two of them) so a lot of women in the area love and hate this Hebrew geezer. The real intensity and drama in Luna Park lies in a total personal war between Andrei's Father and all of the Russian Neo-Nazis, Andrei being the strongest deciding factor in who takes home final victory. Somehow, I found myself actually cheering for the Jewish con-man and his blue collar bastard son. After all, the skinheads (like in most films of this type and in real-life) in Luna Park come off as being a group of morons that flaunt petty idealism as a rationalization for their uncontrollable and improperly channeled hatred. If the skinheads really wanted to defeat the Jew, they would outdo him with cultural achievements and authentic/organic Russian art, not by proving that they are the untermensch barbarians that the real German National Socialists portrayed them as. These skinheads embody the slave-morality as described by Friedrich Nietzsche, for they cannot make a good reputation of themselves by achievement but instead blame the Judaics (the original promoters of the slave-morality) for their lack of success in their own country.

Luna Park starts excitingly with a savage brawl between skinheads and a group of bikers (ironically, sporting German helmets while fighting with the Neo-Nazis). The opening gang warfare scene also happens to be the most brutal segment in the film for Luna Park is no Romper Stomper. If you're looking for excessive philistine violence or a film that will pump you up for a fight, Luna Park surely fails in that regard. On the other hand, if you're looking for a film with somewhat subtle melodrama and multi-layered emotions, Luna Park is a film worth embracing. Despite being a film featuring a Neo-Nazi Anti-Hero, Luna Park is a fairly apolitical work that legitimately looks at the irrationality that is human nature. It is not often that I see a drama like this, where I don't find myself questioning whether or not the director has any understanding of humanity (not to mention, human emotions) as is the case with most Hollywood films.

SUMMER OF LOVE

Paweł Pawlikowski (2005)

If one needs a great example of the United States' decisively devastating and detrimental effects on German culture since the conclusion of the Second World War, look no further than weirdo auteur Wenzel Storch's film Summer of Love (1992) aka Sommer der Liebe – the second psychedelic cinematic chapter in the filmmaker's so-called "Jürgen Höhne Trilogy" – as no other film expresses so vividly and violently the horrifying homogenizing effects of America's hippie trash pseudo-kultur on the ill-fated Fatherland. To be fair, the whole 'hippie' aesthetic and lifestyle started in Deutschland during the early 20th century via longhaired, back-to-nature völkisch artist-messiahs like Aryan "apostle of nature" artiste Karl Wilhelm Diefenbach and his protégé Fidus (born Hugo Reinhold Karl Johann Höppener) who both promoted "Lebensreform" (life-reform), Neo-Paganism, sun-worship, nudism, organic foods, vegetarianism, homeopathic medicines, and unconventional gender roles, among other things, which were later imported to sunny California via German immigrants, hence the old stereotype of the tall, tan, and blond surfer dude cruising waves on the beach, but I doubt Teuton auteur Wenzel Storch knows this, or at least forgot it due to too many bad trips with Aryan Alice to Acidland. Of course, Storch is no Hans Bitterman as indicated by the line, "if you hate the krauts, eat Brussels sprouts" in his psychotic cinematic tribute to the black sun Summer of Love; a film that can probably be best described as an arthouse film for 5th grade amphetamine addicts and acid freaks and the sort of sardonic anarcho-mystical film that seems like it was directed by the 'too cool for school' bastard son of fellow anti-Catholic auteur Herbert Achternbusch. A heretical hodgepodge of humiliatingly horrendous hippie cultural clichés and random references to mainstream German culture and politics, Summer of Love is like dog days diarrhea straight out of Wenzel Storch's auteur asshole, which is exactly what I needed to see after enduring some pretentious French puffery piece that I would rather not name just moments before I stepped into the less than gentle German filmmaker's wacked-out Super 8 wonderland. As the sort of fucked up farce of a film that I always hoped Herschell Gordon Lewis' films would be, but proved to without merit, even where maniacal murder is concerned, Summer of Love is an overdose of stupid subversive sinema with Blood Feast (1963) style bodily dismemberment to boot, but all the more bloody and berserk. If you ever thought John Lennon's assassination and Jimmi and Janis' overdoses are as funny as I do, Summer of Love is surely the film for you.

Aryan acid freaks in bold blackface, psychedelic portraits of the pope, middle-aged hippies on heroin, sauerkraut rocking out (literal 'Krautrock'), and bugs bugging on flowers are just a couple of the happening things that go on in Summer of Love, a film set during "the year 1972 earth time." As described in the introduction to the film, “on our small blue planet (note: Storch’s earth is yellow, orange, and shit green) a group of young modern people is penetrating new dimensions of the mind. They were looking for the key to a better world and opened the door to a SUMMER OF LOVE,” but unfortunately, at least for p.c. poofs, Wenzel Storch’s peace is polluted with violent explosions, debilitating drug addiction, rabid racism and general human depravity. Centering on the acid-addled activities of fat freeloading flower child of flatulence Oleander (Jürgen Höhne) – a middle-aged burnout beatnik who prefers heroin to hotdogs and air guitar to the real thing – Summer of Love features a certain frisky foreboding love in the air, but where, I do not know. Like in certain hunter-gatherer tribes in Sub-Saharan Africa where the men shake one another’s penises when greeting one another, the free-thinking chicks of Storch’s unhinged hippie flick grab one another’s meaty tits in a salacious display of solidarity. In Storch’s bodacious beatnik realm, everything is possible, even hip racial slurs and spiritual sexual debasement of the most self-deprecating sort.

Oafish virtual-human-lawn-gnome Oleander is literally an electrifying individual who gives naïve nuns a special tingle when shaking their horribly holy hands, thus he figures the best way to help these little ladies with their broken stove is by merely sitting on it, thereupon drenching his sweet seat with his own sacrificial sweat. The nuns assume he is a, “funny guy...the sort who gets up at 10 at night when other people are going to bed,” but little do they realize that Oleander likes to rock-out with his cock-out in the daytime with young ladies while sporting a radically ridiculous red wig. Needless to say, in no time, Oleander has the women of the church dancing to the same beat of psychedelic sexual subversion as he does. After offering and opening bottles of beer for the nuns (who typically drink holy water), Oleander is complimented for his bottle-busting strength, which he replies is the result of strength-building stamp collecting. After setting the nuns’ Christmas tree on fire on Christmas Eve and secretly redecorating their monastery – the radical “results of weeklong secret handiwork” – the pleasantly plump perv of psychedelic psycho-babble belches the putrid stench of holy Xmas cookies and a groovy party begins where everyone is invited, thereupon resulting in a concert featuring cardboard cut-out air guitar. Without the nuns’ permission, Big O de-christianizes the now-unholy place “Rock-Monastery” where it is now inhabited by hippie heretics who use it as a hip hobo commune/head-shop. Naturally, Oleander, a hypnotic hippie holy-man of the messianic manic maniac sort, continues to spread his groovy guru gluttony all around the Teutonic countryside after turning the nuns into sexually promiscuous hippie gals worthy of joining the Manson family. The rather rotund renegade also runs into four happening hippie chicks named Trixi, Babsi, Trulli and Otti, last names being “Meier, Muller, Schulze, Schmidt swimming in a pool of shit,” and brings them to a Teutonic minstrel show where they request that the lone Negro play a cover of “Paint it Black.” Bored, Oleander goes to another monastery where he meets Sister Jasmin, who has been, “waiting for him to redeem her for 2000 years,” so naturally the “strange saint” in faggy hippie sheep’s clothing reams and redeems her. Oleander tells Jasmin about his first true love Sandra, who he describes as “beautifully ugly” and later hedgehogs ride around in a neon jeep. Oleander’s ‘trip’ gets madder and badder and concludes in a mental maze of madness that includes mutilation, murder, and, finally, miscegenation.

It should not be a surprise to anyone that has seen Summer of Love or any of the decidedly deranged director’s other films that Wenzel Storch was literally tripping when he wrote the script. Although I do not doubt that Storch is down with ‘drop-out’ degeneracy and the soulless sexual revolution that came with it, Summer of Love is just as much a mockery of hippie culture as it is of Catholicism and mainstream kraut kultur. A vehement vision of one virulent lapsed Kraftwerk fan’s most frenzied fantasies in Super 8 celluloid form, Summer of Love seems like a work more sowed in love of hate than love of life, but one can see that Storch surely had fun when he directed this piece of sordid and surreal spirited scorched earth cinema. Although not his celluloid magnum opus – an honor that goes to his final chapter in the Jürgen Höhne Trilogy A Journey Into Bliss (2004) aka Die Reise ins Glück – Storch’s Summer of Love is not far behind as a work as wacky and wild as the most scatological of Schlingensiefel films, but set on a totally different planet of playful perversity and putridity. Described by Rolling Stone magazine as “Germany’s answer to John Wayne and Louis des Funès rolled into one. One can safely describe him as the master of ‘extreme acting’,” jolly Jürgen Höhne is just as much of an innate ingredient of Summer of Love as Storch’s subversive direction as a good humored prophet of the hippie cinematic apocalypse. An idiotically idiosyncratic work of avant-garde cinema, Summer of Love is an indisputable masterpiece of kaleidoscopic and terribly steaming trash cinema, as well as an eccentric epic of bittersweet cinematic excrement.

Pedro Almodóvar (1997)

Carne is a neat little medium length short film which is a follow up to I STAND ALONE (Seul contre tous). In its short 40 minute running time, we see the events leading up to those in I STAND ALONE. Gaspar Noe proves his legacy is well deserved with this short. I am beginning to wonder if he ever made a bad film. In the beginning we are given the warnings he slaps on most of his films. Just when you watch this and open your mouth to yawn, we are given a unapologetic look at a beautiful horse, mere seconds before getting stabbed in the throat, allowing his blood and life spill out. Before fully grasping its own death, it gets its neck sawed almost off. Arterial spray and tissue are flowing down the tiles. This is only but the first scene in Carne. The next images explain the wife of the butcher's feelings towards the pregnancy through a singular scene depicting a dull shot of her eating. You can simply feel her hesitance without looking too hard. Next, a child birth. If i was of the opposite sex, this scene would have made me cringe more. Then a beautiful infant holding a ripped up piece of paper. When connected in two, it spells a simple message of asking not to look for her when she is gone. With that, the butcher is left with Cynthia and him to fend for themselves in the slums of France. As the years rack up and he does the same activities everyday, you feel bored with life as he does. He begins to notice his lovely daughter of his own blood is developing her own womanly flesh. Only a precursor to his feelings in I STAND ALONE. This eventually ends up in a tragic incident that leaves him in jail with nothing. These moments allow the full registration of I STAND ALONE to finally register fully in your mind. Think of Carne as the missing piece to a grand, artful puzzle. The dialogue returning is as fresh as its sequel, which is impressive considering the gap between both films. In this film, his daughter follows a show her whole life about a Luchador that battles the evils of Lucifer. Not only is it quite funny to watch his escapades in the background, but years later when she is relocated to an institution, she witnesses this mysterious mans last words as he curses at Satan before his magnificent execution. This happens right as he leaves her to forget her. Moving on can be a symbolic bitch. Phillippe Nahon returns as the Parisian vulgar and raunchy butcher with a taste for violence and objectionable perversions. As of course, his cold stare can stop a moving train. Carne is a grand fucking film that not only proves that Gaspar Noe was born with such artistic talent, but it proves that even in a monster of a man, there is good.

TRAMPA INFERNAL

Pedro Galindo III (1990)

When I worked at Movie Gallery, we had shelves full of Mexican films. The very thought disgusted me. At first I thought it was cause of my intolerance to the seedy "Illegal Aliens" but when I glanced at the back of several of these films, my hatred was affirmed. What lie before my eyes were Mexican drag queens with pistols and an obscene amount of lipstick. No, these weren't Spanish films. These were Mexican.

I stared at the plot and screen captures for Trampa Infernal (Hell's Path) long and hard. I wasn't sure if I wanted to brave through another cinematic atrocity. It's fine when it's from my homeland, but trash from Mexico? Even worse than having Terminal Cancer. What I got from this film was a animated gallery of the ugliest actors to ever appear on screen and a fraudulent film copying American classics. Take Michael Myer's Mask, give him Freddy Krueger's glove, then make him exactly like Predator except earthly. That is Jesse; this films villain. He is a war-vet who kills people for a completely unknown reason. Most of this films events happen completely without reason or trial. It's like that Gomez was simply shouting to his crew, "Yes! Throw that in the film!" I use the term film loosely. Our main bastard's name is Nacho, or Pancho. I really wasn't paying much attention to him thanks to his early 90's Weird Al fro. It's an equally disgusting hair piece mixed with the face of a goblin. Honestly, most of my dislike for this film stems from the unattractive cast but also is rooted deep within the films own disease. Simply put; its existence. Several scenes show off the budget and the directors passion excruciatingly well. Such as a machine gun shoot out which involves two physical indications of impact. Hundreds of rounds per minute and only a man is shot. His surroundings and the trailer remain intact. Meanwhile, no bullets pierce drywall or those sand bungalows those damn Mexicans live in. There may be some character who may approach you and start talking "gnarly" saying things like "Yeah mannn this is so bad it's good!" No. No it is not. Trampa Infernal is similar to eating Taco Bell and being stricken with explosive diarrhea. This is an uninspired, uninformed, and completely devoid of any respect from me.

SUBURBIA

Penelope Spheeris (1984)

Penelope Spheeris got her first serious start in the film industry with the punk documentary The Decline of Western Civilization (1981). The documentary features punk legend Darby Crash and his band the Germs (among other legends Black Flag, Circle Jerks, Fear, etc). A couple years later she would direct the 1980's hardcore punk masterpiece Suburbia (1984). The film follows a group of squatting punks and their virtual war against Californian rednecks (didn't know they existed). Suburbia features some of the best 1980s hardcore punk bands. Charismatic Jack Grisham and his band TSOL have powerful performances of their songs "Darker My Love" and "Wash Away." D.I. and The Vandals (before they sucked) also show their vintage talents. Your ears will be blessed with the gift of song. Suburbia is easily one of the most quotable films that I have ever seen (and I hate most quotable films). The performances by the punks in the film are as pathetic as you would expect from real punks (which many of the actors really were). Their apathy for life and everything in general is thoroughly reflected though out the entire punk rock romp. I have seen Suburbia so many times that it has become part of my cinematic family. Replay value is a guarantee with this film. Flea of the Red Hot Chili Peppers plays the lovable creep Razzle. Razzle is fond of rats and speaking of irrelevancies. The character of Jacki Diddley (who later had a minor role in Oliver Stone's Platoon) is the groups leader. His character seems to have taken one to many bowl hits in his lifetime. Suburbia features a wealth of colorful and unforgettable characters. People that always make interesting company despite their shortcomings. A minor Civil War between young Punks and jobless Rednecks erupts in backyard chaos. Growing up around rednecks, I welcome the cultural clashing fights. Punks and rednecks make the ultimate rivals. When rednecks start shooting dogs, it's time for pay-back. Suburbia is the definitive punk rock flick. Do yourself a favor and watch it. Suburbia is a Clockwork Orange for the apathetic generation. At the very least you will be rebelliously entertained.

Penelope Spheeris (1987)

Dudes is a film that I really wanted to enjoy. Director Penelope Spheeris successfully created two punk classics before with the gritty documentary Decline of Western Civilization and the cult classic Suburbia. Dudes is merely a pathetic 1980's comedy that is excruciatingly painful to watch. I wish that I had never tracked down the film (I have been wanting to see it for years).

Dudes opens with an enticing scene featuring a concert performance by The Vandals (the original line-up). From there, the film goes down the fashion punk shitter. Dudes lead protagonist is played by love shy wuss Jon Cryer (who plays the pathetic Duckie in Pretty in Pink). Cryer is about as believable of a punk as Emilio Estevez was in Repo Man (which is a classic despite Estevez). Dudes also features Flea from the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Daniel Roebuck (who played stoner metalhead killer Samson 'John' Tollet in River's Edge). Dudes lacks the "authentic" punks found in Suburbia. A group of Hollywood exaggerated rednecks kill one of the punks (Flea) and his two aimless buds decide it's time for payback. This boring plot never captured me for second in this wretched generic punk garbage. The two punks would have been better off if they had killed themselves and had their bodies tied to a pole to be used as redneck target practice. I wanted to drag Daniel Roebuck by his Mohawk down a couple flights of stairs. As for Jon Cryer, I would just drop him off in Northeast, Washington D.C. I am sure that someone creeping around in a dark alley will make use of his fragile and pale body. Dudes features a horrible generic 1980's soundtrack that would put John Hughes films to shame. I was expecting to hear some tunes by The Germs, Black Flag, Dead Kennedys (which are merely mentioned), and The Circle Jerks. Fear front man Ving Lee stars as one of the dirty and blood thirsty rednecks. His appearance doesn't save this punk rock abomination. I hate to be harsh on a 1980's punk rock comedy but it's necessary. Dudes lacks the character and punk authenticity that makes Suburbia the timeless classic that it is. I am really not interested in seeing Indian dream sequences and Jon Cryer try to shoot a gun. I will always have Suburbia.

THE HARDER THEY COME

Perry Henzell (1972)

I have never been a big fan of the Blaxploitation films and I can honestly say that the only film from the played-out subgenre that I appreciate in any way is Melvin Van Peebles' Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971), which ultimately unwittingly gave birth to a neo-minstrel movie trend that has provided cultural cuckold Quentin Tarantino with a pseudo-religion of sorts. Of course, what makes Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song different from the rest of these films, aside from the fact that it was actually directed by a black man, is that it is a serious film made for serious reasons and was not meant as mere monetary-motivated exploitation of proletarian negro kultur, but as an action-packed agit-prop work with a blatant black power message, hence why the film was promoted by the Black Panther Party, who made it mandatory viewing among its members. Like Van Peebles' film, The Harder They Come (1972), which was the very first feature film produced in Jamaica, also takes a no bullshit approach in depicting a rebellious black antihero who is determined to rise above his sub-meager circumstances, even if it kills him. Directed by a white Jamaican of French Huguenot and English descent named Perry Henzell who attended boarding school in the United Kingdom during his teens and later attended McGill University in Montreal in 1953 and 1954 before dropping out and wandering around Europa, The Harder They Come is a rare piece of Eurupid-directed black cinema that is neither patronizing nor phony in its essence, but instead gives an authentic voice to the voiceless with a vengeance that is hard to ignore. Indeed, the film was such a groundbreaking moment in Jamaican cultural history that apparently when the film first premiered in Jamaica, some 40,000 people showed up at the theater, which only had a capacity for 1,500 audience members. Described by some as the 'the first English language movie in history to require subtitles in the United States' due to the fact that the actors speak a sub-literate form of Creole dialect, The Harder They Come was barely noticed when it was released in February 1973 in New York City by Roger Corman's New World Pictures, but instantly developed a cult following when it was screened as a midnight movie a couple months later, ultimately playing for 6 years straight. Arguably most notable due to its soundtrack by the film's star Jimmy Cliff, the film also brought reggae out of the third world and introduced it to Americans. Shot in a somewhat cinéma vérité-like style with oftentimes shaky handheld camera shots on 16mm film stock and loosely based on the life of real-life Jamaican negro outlaw/folk hero/"original rude boy" Vincent "Ivanhoe" Martin aka 'Rhyging'—a figure who gained fame in 1948 after escaping from prison, committing a series of robberies, and killing a couple of crackers before being gunned down by the cops—The Harder They Come is like the Bonnie and Clyde of the Caribbean, albeit much more gritty and organic in persuasion, as if the viewer becomes a passive accessory to the crimes. Indeed, The Harder They Come is, if nothing else, an action-packed celluloid salute to the politically and socially impotent, perennially poor and disenfranchised, and hopelessly and stupidly romantic. A film that more or less features virtually every single negative stereotype associated with the black community, including unrealistic get-rich-quick schemes, charlatan preachers who wield power over the masses of the ignorant and poor for their own economic gain, young men who'd rather deal dope than do an honest day's work, and backstabbing women that cannot help but put their men in deadly situations, The Harder They Come is true social realism and not the phony plastic sort that bolshevik filmmakers tried in vain to peddle.

After his miserly grandmother dies and leaves him nothing aside from a couple of bucks (she sold her house before her death and wasted virtually all of the money on a big funeral), young soul brother Ivanhoe "Ivan" Martin (Jimmy Cliff) moves from an isolated rural area of Jamaica to urban Kingston in the hope that he will fulfill his dream of making a hit reggae album and becoming rich and famous overnight. Luckily for him, Ivan is far too ignorant to realize how little of a chance he has of actually making it big, thus he does not hesitate in trying everything to become a big star. When Ivan arrives in the superlatively shitty city, he discovers a plague of poverty, unemployment, crime, and political corruption. Although Ivan's mother (Lucia White) denies him a place to stay and takes the last bit of money he has, she gives him the name of a person that will ostensibly "try to help him"; a powerful charlatan known as the 'Preacher' (played by professional dentist Basil Keane, who was apparently the first black man that was an officer in the U.S. Navy, as well as a good friend of Martin Luther King, Jr.). That same night, Ivan meets a dubious dude named Jose (played by Carl Bradshaw, who has been described as, "Jamaica's most renowned actor") and the two go to a Rialto theater to watch the classic Spaghetti Western (according to director Henzell, wop westerns were the "staple of slum cinema" in Jamaica at the time) flick Django (1966) starring Franco Nero. In an important foreshadowing scene, an audience member in the theater remarks, "The hero can't die until the last reel." Indeed, The Harder They Come is certainly the closest thing to a black Jamaican western, with Cliff acting as Nero's character in Django. The next day, Ivan hears about a music producer on the radio named Hilton (played by Bob Charlton who, according to Henzell, is "one of the greatest insurance salesmen in the world") and becomes determined to chase him down to promote his music. Ultimately, Ivan takes residence in a broken down car on the Preacher's property and fixes up an old bike owned by the religious leader. Meanwhile, Ivan attempts to find work but fails everywhere he goes, which ultimately forces him to resort to begging. When Ivan asks a rich black bourgeois housewife (played by Beverly Anderson, who would later become the first lady of Jamaica as the wife of Prime Minister Michael Manley) for money, he is met with the nasty response, "What's the matter with you young, healthy boys? All you know to do is beg, beg, beg. That's all you can do, just beg?," thus demonstrating the class division in a nation with the rather ironic motto: "Out of Many, One People." Ultimately, Ivan starts a rather tame romance with a chick named Elsa (Janet Bartley), who is unfortunately one of the Preacher's many slavish young concubines. Naturally, the Preacher is repulsed by Ivan's love of pornography and reggae, so when he discovers that the young heretic is messing around with Elsa, he becomes enraged and kicks him out. When one of the Preacher's goons, Longa (played by real-life convicted rapist Elijah Chambers), attempts to takeaway Ivan's bike, the two get in a bloody knife fight and the struggling reggae artist is ultimately punished with "eight strokes of the tamarind switch" for his act of attempted murder in what is a rather homoerotic scene. Indeed, Ivan is bent over, has his pants pulled, and is whipped on the ass, which literally causes the antihero to piss himself. Although totally dehumanized by the experience of being bent over in public, Ivan luckily does not have to serve any jail time.

THE HARDER THEY COME

After his small brush with the law, Ivan finally gets the opportunity to record his song "The Harder They Come," but producer Hilton—an arrogant mulatto who has a complete monopoly over the entire Jamaican music industry—only offers him an insulting $20 for the song, so he decides to take his business elsewhere. While Ivan attempts to sell his song to other music producers, no one will buy it as they all take orders from Hilton. Of course, Ivan eventually gives in and sells the record to Hilton for $20, but the music producer tells an East Asian DJ to not play the song too much because, although he thinks that it is a great piece of music, he remarks regarding its composer, "he's a troublemaker. I don't want anything to do with him. I don't want to build him up." Still determined to make it big, Ivan tells his girlfriend Elsa that he refuses to live a straight life as a virtual slave, complaining to her, "You want me to go and beg for work for $10 a week for the rest of my life? I tried that. I'd rather die. And I don't have to because I'm gonna make it," so he begins dealing dope after his friend Jose offers him a position trafficking ganja from the country to the city on a motorbike. When Ivan gets in an argument with Jose over the meager pay, the dealer conspires to get his underling busted and locked up so as to 'teach him a lesson' by informing on the reggae artist to the cops. When a white motorcycle cop goes to bust Ivan, he freaks out and kills the cop. Later that night, Ivan is setup by a random whore he is sleeping with and finds himself surrounded by a brigade of cops, but he manages to get away after wasting three black pigs. Naturally, Ivan decides to get his revenge against his treacherous friends, so he kills the whore and subsequently tries to kill Jose, but he gets away. Now the #1 fugitive in Jamaica, Ivan finds that he is wanted by both the cops and the ganja dealers, with a high yellow detective named Ray Jones (Winston Stone) more or less controlling both sides. Meanwhile, Hilton decides to re-release the song "The Harder They Come" due to Ivan's growing fame as a folk hero among Jamaicans and the song naturally becomes a big hit, though the cops soon have it banned. With his newfound star fugitive status, Ivan becomes rather arrogant and shamelessly narcissistic, even forcing his fat friend Fitz (Bobby Loban) to take special photographs of himself posing with guns which he has sent to various media sources. Ivan also takes advantage of his fugitive status by stealing a convertible and driving around aimlessly in a field, as if he has finally achieved the 'Jamaican dream.' Of course, Ivan knows his days are numbered and wants to have his fun before getting gunned down like an animal. On the advice of a drug dealer friend named Pedro (Ras Daniel Hartman)—a Rastafarian who is the only person that does not betray his friend in the end—Ivan decides to flee to Cuba, but he ultimately finds himself cornered on a beach by a bunch of cops when he attempts to escape. Imagining himself to be Franco Nero in Django, Ivan decides to confront the cops even though he is out of bullets and is shot down, ultimately dying in a literal blaze of glory.

In the documentary Midnight Movies: From the Margin to the Mainstream (2005), director Perry Henzell states regarding his first feature: "The whole theme of THE HARDER THEY COME is: 'can the little man get through?' The promise of a city for somebody like that is an illusion... and their illusion is so strong that they'd rather die than give up the dream." Indeed, talk to any American black male teenager and over 99 out of 100 of them will probably tell you that they are going to be either a professional football player, basketball player, famous rapper, and/or pimp/gangster when they grow up, with the majority of which opting for the latter dream as it is the most practical. Hell, even millionaire football players in the NFL cannot help but assault cops, rape women, carry illegal weapons in public, and murder and/or put hits on people as demonstrated by the fact that various NFL players have been arrested/cited on 685 different occasions since 2000 (of course, the real figures are probably much higher, as the NFL has probably done their best to hide arrests, not to mention all the undetected crimes these guys have undoubtedly gotten away with). Despite being a revolutionary work with agitprop elements, auteur Henzell, who is a Nordic blond that grew up on a 22,000-acre plantation, is apparently no leftist, as J. Hoberman and Jonathan Rosenbaum revealed in their authoritative work Midnight Movies (1983), "...Henzell denies any Marxist intentions and, according to journalist Claudia Dreifus, has views on economics that are only 'slightly to the left of Ayn Rand'." Furthermore, in the audio commentary Henzell gave for the Criterion Collection dvd release of The Harder They Come, the director mocks wealthy Americans for their stupid rules of conduct and dress, proclaiming that his family used their wealth as a root to freedom and not as a source of social imprisonment. That being said, I think that Henzell was able to relate to the poor blacks of Jamaica due to their uncompromising thirst for freedom as men that rather die young as ganja-peddling outlaws than die old as neo-slaves who work at dead-end jobs their entire lives and have nothing to show for it in the end. Indeed, as far as I can think of, The Harder They Come is the only film I have ever seen directed by a white man about a black subculture that does not seem like an impotent piece of P.C. propaganda, cultural cuckoldry, ball-less bleeding heart swill, and/or a total mockery of true negro kultur. Although Henzell started working on a second film, No Place Like Home, after the success he received from The Harder They Come, some movers lost the footage he shot and he scrapped the project for a couple decades, though he would eventually find the missing footage and finish the film in 2006 to some critical acclaim. Apparently, Henzell's daughter Justine, screenwriter Chris Salewicz, Xingu Films and Conquering Lion Pictures were set to start shooting a remake of The Harder They Come in 2013, though it is dubious at best whether or not such a work could capture the gritty essence of the original film, which is a work that puts most of the oeuvre of Senegalese auteur Ousmane Sembène—the 'father of African film'—to shame.

MONSTERS

Pete Docter (2001)

Setting flame to SXSW this year is Gareth Edwards's Monsters, an independent hell-on-earth science fiction film seating both the aspirations of the best of District 9 and The Mist. What Monsters does is quite energy-efficient and relaxing, taking a big budget ideal and producing the film for a mere $15,000 using natural lighting, two reoccurring cast members, and a slew of volunteers to partake in this interstellar experiment in outwards community film-making all on location without too much permission. Refusing to view any trailers for a promise of a fable that I'd appreciate more with no prior indication of the events to transpire, Monsters came as quite a shock once I discovered how passe the realization of extraterrestrial Cthulhu life was for mini-budget Edwards and his DV dreams. The realization of the creature design and the likening effect that they produced on camera blew my expectations out of the water. If Gareth Edwards could create such an airtight romance surrounded by alien-organic infection then surely SyFy could fund something with double the cost besides a sweeping retelling of Sharkdactyl vs. Dinosloth only to appease autistic B-movie "fans." To put it simply, Monsters is in most regards a symbiotic epic, in which taking in the cost of shooting, provides a vast amount of appreciation reserved for the surprising skill of acting Scoot McNairy and Whitney Able are convinced to convey. Not to mention the conspiracies between disillusioned Mexican film viewers, their rage towards a theorized "final solution" to border patrol by deploying alien life in their zone of dusty squalor.

With much zeal does Gareth Edwards sidestep from adapting either of the films it's been convicted of "stealing" from. While The Mist does carbon-copy the same tentacled beasts imagined by Lovecraft, the only charge Monsters is guilty of is presenting us with face-time to these gorgeously animated octopi. Whereas Darabont's The Mist ended on such a note of helplessness while we acknowledge such large beasts compared to a quaint and rusted station wagon. Monsters doesn't feature the alien apartheid that District 9 is commended for, adorning its label with awards and praise which in a similar situation, Monsters might not be as soaked with praise but victim to argumentum ad infinitum. District 9 is made for the action connoisseur and racial inequalities put to the test of bizarre alien weaponry while Monsters captures an entirely desolate and benign world of limitless terror at every turn. In a bold strike to extinguish pacing and the needlessness of a constant quick pace to further the flow of visual stimuli, Monsters dutifully takes its time to create a stream of animated creature consciousness rivaled by the chaotic preachings of the creatures starring time in the unfairly maligned Cloverfield. The one ideal to grasp onto is that the final verdict for your enjoyment of Monsters is left up to your imagination as much of the terror and mystique is derived from the unknown.

MONSTERS

Amidst the chaos is where Monsters finds the tale of our two and only characters. Not to disregard the mentioned roles of fiance and father but Monsters caters to a bond grown over mistakes and mildly genial embrace of the possibility of death. I often found myself bound between loving the film purely for creature-feature antics but then often sat in a quiet embrace with a glass of brandy waiting for one of these classic lovetypes to further the romantic congregation. Not to expel my "man card" but Monsters was a quality monster film while at the same time digressing towards a womanly atmosphere, a monster film in which both genders could embrace as their own. Quite an impressive achievement for someone who created this particular shortcut towards destruction of body and society on a laptop. Other than the technical achievements that Monsters documents in the smegma-stricken underbelly of what's considered "indie" in this day and age, a fragile and simple story is told with a fervor for science. Reportedly, Edwards was inspired by both Jurassic Park and the possibility of life on one of Jupiter's moons, Europa. Title card mentioned NASA probe with findings broke apart over Mexico infesting forests with sentient fungi and spaghetti monsters, hardly the makings of a science-fiction classic but surprise is a dish best served vegetated.

Monsters is far from perfect but given the budget and the lengths that this amateur film maker went to capture his vision of escort-love-suicide betwixt a jungle of mysterious monsters, Monsters preforms favorably with still so much steam in its veins. A theatrical experience might be recommended for maximum Mexican anarchy but Monsters is definitely a film in which you must rewatch the beginning after the end unless you retained the brief semblance of a conclusion thrust in your cerebellum at the dawn of the film experience. Even breathtaking moments such as the border cross reveals a terror in stucco that seems to be a fantasy including this "American dream" we live out to our full extent. The vulnerability that we are actually victim to is enough to drive a striking narrative into even the sleaziest horror film e.g. Zombi 2 and Jason Takes Manhattan. Believing that an extraterrestrial force could overrun our land of the free and the brave is enough to drive even the most liberal-minded into a schemata of insanity. Pointlessly poetic and honest, Monsters rivals most science fiction to be released this year and I hope this euphoric brain chemistry never leaves the star-crossed lovers Andrew and Sam despite their pragmatic plight.

Pete Walker (1976)

As far as I am concerned, virtually everything about post-WWII Japanese culture, especially in relation to cinema, is hopelessly silly and superficial in a bizarre half-Americanized/half-feminized sort of way, as if the collective unconscious of the alpha-East Asian race was raped by Yanks and no film seems to express this distinctly bizarre phenomenon of cultural cuckoldry than the classic avant-garde horror-comedy House (1977) aka Hausu directed by Nobuhiko Ôbayashi. Rather absurdly, the birth of House came as a result of the Japanese film production company Toho approaching auteur Ôbayashi, who had previously only worked on experimental shorts, and asking him to create a film in the spirit of Steven Spielberg's summer blockbuster Jaws (1975), however House inevitably evolved into one of the most brazenly goofy and carelessly cartoonish celluloid ghost stories ever made, as a sort of jaded Jap Suspiria (1977) meets The Evil Dead (1981), except more recklessly wacky and made with cutesy Japanese schoolgirls suffering from exceedingly eccentric Electra complexes in mind. And, indeed, the story for House was largely inspired by the ideas of director's daughter Chigumi, which were eventually turned into a script by Chiho Katsura, though it would be about two years before the film was made as auteur Ôbayashi had to do a lot of promotion at Toho before they would let him direct the pet project (apparently, no director at Toho wanted to direct the film as they thought it would ruin their career, so they eventually let Ôbayashi do it himself). In part thematically inspired by the American nuking of Hiroshima and Nagasaki during the Second World War, which auteur Ôbayashi, being born in Hiroshima, experienced as a child and lost virtually all of his childhood friends as a result, House is a sort of excessive escapist tale that warns viewers that if they dwell on the past, especially in relation to the pain and suffering of the Second World War, they will degenerate into a hateful human creature of sorts who resents everything about the present, thereupon making the film a fiercely modernist work created for the pansy post-samurai generation. Although never receiving the same unbeatable success as Spielberg's outstandingly overrated shark flick Jaws, House was a box office hit in Japan, even if the film was a critical failure of sorts that mainly received negative reviews, which is no surprise considering the curiously flamboyant and campy film is about as serious as a fart attack as a childish nonsensical cinematic work that positively personifies the phrase 'guilty pleasure.' Originally released as a double feature with a seemingly ridiculous romance film entitled Pure Hearts in Mud and sporting the morbidly 'inviting' tagline "How Seven Beauties Were Eaten!," House is avant-garde cinema at its most tastelessly palatable, as if made by Werner Nekes' half-caste Jap bastard brother for the Disney company, and horror cinema at its most horrendous hokey and anti-horrific, as if specially tailored for most the impotent and idiotic of white American Japanophiles.

Gorgeous (Kimiko Ikegami) is a popular and, apparently, 'Gorgeous' Japanese schoolgirl who seems to get wet just thinking about spending her summer vacation with her widowed father (Saho Sasazawa), a film composer who scores films in Italy (even bragging to his daughter, "Leone said my music was better than Morricone's"), but when Papa, who certainly knows best, comes home and greets his excited daughter, she is sent into a minor depression when he reveals he has a new wife and she has a new stepmother named Ryoko Ema (Haruko Wanibuchi). Considering Gorgeous' equally gorgeous mother died only a couple years before, she is not exactly ready for a new mother, so she writes a letter to her aunt asking if she and her six sassy schoolgirl friends can spend summer vacation with her. A lonely old spinster who lives all by her lonesome in an old traditional house in the middle of the country, Gorgeous' aunt (Yoko Minamida) naturally accepts Gorgeous' request, but little does the naïve niece realize that her mother's sister is a miserable old maid who, still waiting for the young soldier who promised to marry her when he came back from fighting during the Second World War, is a bitter (and quite literally) bloodthirsty bitch who dines on the blood of young, unmarried girls. With her motley crew of six zany and superficially idiosyncratic friends, including Prof (Ai Matsubara), Melody (Eriko Tanaka), Kung Fu (Miki Jinbo), Mac (Mieko Sato), Sweet (Masayo Miyako) and Fantasy (Kumiko Oba), Gorgeous heads to the plastically pretty pastoral lands of the country to her bittersweet auntie's house and on the way they buy a watermelon from a morbidly obese and ominous farmer fellow (Asei Kobayashi) who tells the way to the aunt's house, sinisterly stating to himself after the girls leave, "We haven't had visitors for long time. I'm sure...the lady will be very pleased." And, indeed, when Gorgeous and her gals arrive, Auntie, who has creepy white hair and is wheelchair bound, is quite pleased, but for all the wrong reasons. After presenting Auntie the watermelon, the girls are given a tour of the house, which soon begins attacking the girls in somewhat harmless way. When Mac later goes to retrieve the watermelon, which had been placed in a well to keep it refrigerated, she never returns and when Fantasy goes to look for the watermelon, she finds Mac's animated decapitated noggin in the well instead of a juicy fruit, thus ushering in the funny foreboding phantasmagoria at the less than humble haunted abode. After dismembered Mac's head bites Fantasy on the buttocks, the heteromorphic house of horrors takes on a surreally supernatural form, with skeletons dancing kookily in what seems like a warped funhouse on East Asian acid.

After going into her aunt's room, putting on her lipstick, and staring into her mirror, Gorgeous becomes possessed by her mirror, which cracks (with blood draining out and all), as if Auntie has taken over her body. While Gorgeous manages to walk out the front door seemingly unscathed, the rest of the girls are locked inside the demonic house and when the girls try to find Auntie to unlock the door, the only thing they find is mangled Mac's severed hand in a jar. Melody makes the unwitting mistake of continuing to play the piano to keep her fearful friends' spirits up, but when Prof and Kung Fu later go to see her, her fingers have been eaten off and her entire body is inevitably consumed by the viciously voracious piano. After spotting Gorgeous sporting her aberrant aunt's bridal gown, Kung Fu finds Sweet's body being eaten by a tall grandfather clock. Scared and desperate, the surviving girls, Prof, Fantasy and Kung Fu, barricade themselves in the upper floor of the house, where they read Auntie's diary and realize the sadistic spinster still believes her fiancé is coming back for her, but they are interrupted by a giant-sized head of Gorgeous that states, "I'm in my aunt's world" and that Auntie died many years ago and that "she wanted to be married so badly that her body remained alive after her death. And she eats all the unmarried girls who come here." Immediately after Gorgeous' head goes wild, various appliances around the house attack the girls and Prof—the smartest girl in the lot—concludes that killing the aunt's white and furry cat, Blanche, will stop the superficial madness, but when Kung Fu master Kung Fu attempts to do so, she is gobbled up by a haunted light fixture from hell. Luckily, one of Kung Fu's dismembered legs manages to kick a painting of Blanche, but it only causes blood to spurt it out that ultimately floods the entire home with hemoglobin. With the entire house flooded with blood, Prof and Fantasy take shelter on a floating floorboard. Prof attempts to read Auntie's diary to discover the secret of the undead woman's demented mind, but she is pulled into the pool of water by an evil jar where her prepubescent-like body magically becomes unclad and is ultimately consumed by the bad blood. The only survivor, Fantasy, is soon approached by Gorgeous, but it is revealed in the reflection of the blood that it is really the aunt. Despite knowing better, Fantasy allows Auntie-as-Gorgeous to cradle her, even absurdly calling her, "Mommy." In the end, Gorgeous' stepmother Ryoko comes to Auntie's house to pick up the girls. Auntie, who has inhabited Gorgeous' body and is dressed in a traditional kimono, tells Ryoko the girls are sleeping but will awake soon because they will be 'hungry.' Before Ryoko knows it, she is seduced by Auntie, who shakes her hands and incinerates her to nothing as if touched by a nuclear bomb.

A sort of cutesy counter-culture-inspired celluloid softcore propaganda piece urging post-WWII Japanese youth to get over Hiroshima and have hedonistic fun or face an eternity of lonely misery and misanthropy, House eccentrically epitomizes the death of stoicism and the samurai in Japan, symbolically utilizing crude yet charismatic avant-garde pop art to aesthetically molest a traditional Japanese house. Indeed, after viewing House, I could not help but feel guilty for half-enjoying what is sort of the celluloid equivalent of Pop Rocks as a film that is fun to briefly wallow in and digest, but is a ultimately novelty with little to no redeeming qualities. Undoubtedly, I can think of few of films that so hopelessly personify 'all style and no substance' as much as House, the perfect film for culturally-retarded Americans to watch to feel culturally enriched or whatever. Personally, when it comes to cinematic ghost stories where furniture eats people, I much prefer the arthouse abortion Death Bed: The Bed That Eats (1977), a film where the imprisoned ghost of decadent English artist Aubrey Beardsley looks on as a bloodthirsty bed consumes hedonistic hippies. Even next to Steve 'Friday the 13th' Miner's similarly themed, lackluster horror-comedy of the same name, House (1986), makes Ôbayashi's haunted house flick seem like a cynical novelty by comparison. With the Japanese schoolgirl characters in the film notably remarking regarding World War II Japanese soldiers that "Men were more manly back then," House ultimately makes the case that the Japs have become too emasculated and decadent after facing devastating defeat, as if the film was directed by a hyperactive schoolgirl under the influence of acid and gummy bears who is still peeved over the fact her mother kicked the bucket a couple years back. If you're looking for a mildly entertaining yet obscenely outmoded example as to why a world famous right-wing Japanese writer and Renaissance man like Yukio Mishima tried to run a coup d'état to restore the power of the emperor so as to cease the cultural and social degeneration of Japan, House makes for a great example of the sort of aesthetic soulless and philosophical passiveness the master of pen and sword was fighting against. Indeed, there is something peculiarly repressive about a film like House, which is as violently over-the-top as the Rape of Nanking, yet is ultimately as harmless as an episode of the Power Rangers.

STAG NIGHT

Peter A. Dowling (2008)

Ghost House Underground's Stag Night intends to do good with the very similar construct of Midnight Meat Train and Creep. Starring popular television actors Kip Pardue and Vinnesa Shaw, Stag Night concerns itself with the fates of six socialites as they disembark off a train at an abandoned station and in turn, are abandoned. Their problems do not stop there, however, as they witness a police officer get hacked to death by subterranean vagrants wielding machetes. Stag Night is utterly implausible as to prevent any sense of entertainment. Upon mentioning and discovering that the branch of the subway system has been closed since the fifties, then wandering down the line to witness a cop getting murdered, Stag Night takes a steep drop into the realm of the silly. Not only would the disappearance of a New York City police officer set off a chain of search/destroy but why were these vagrants hassling a vending machine in the first place? After all, Stag Night's synopsis boasts "cannibal dwellers" and that is what sets it apart from being grounded in reality. Oh well. All is forgiven because surely there will be scenes of cannibalism later. Wait, what's that? They feed the flesh of the victims to their dogs?

Plastered on the artwork of the DVD is a quote that states "One of the most enjoyable chase thrillers of recent memory." Rather than using a blurb from any reputable source of fan base, Stag Night chose to quote Netflix, the broad-shouldered bastard of user reviews on the Internet, second only to IMDb. This incident reminds me of a Canadian film stooping even lower than Stag Night to collect quotes from YouTube. One Week was the title and its shame will shine through the darkest corners of Earth. To ingratiate is one thing but to force ideas from faceless sources who haven't even seen the film is a completely different ballgame. For what Stag Night is appraised for, the action, I find the confusing mixture of "fight" and chase scenes to be muddled up with a condition known as "shaky-cam syndrome". The events that transpire within the tunnels under New York can really only point to idiocy. These lad's prenuptial celebration, or Stag Night, is hampered down by our lead character's brother portrayed by Hollywood pussy Breckin Meyer. Now for Breckin Meyer to test his chops at the horror genre is fine. As long as we're safe from another rendition of Garfield, I suppose. It's when his character is superfluously imposed as a barroom brawler that things start to steer away from its own control.

The subterranean colony of murderous vagabonds is a situation I've seen before in several films; the only ones I can recall off the top of my head are Demolition Man and the film adaptation of Super Mario Bros. Both of these examples managed to craft life out of something degenerate and desperate, even if for short segments. Stag Night had all the time in the world to manipulate a beast to boast towards horror fans. Yet, alas, we're delivered this connotation of trite cinema. The only thing worse than Stag Night's everything is the "hyperkinetic" editing that disrupts the fluidity of scenes in an attempt at, what I guess, a jolting effect. It's not even the self-assuming quality of this film that leaves me keeled over with abdominal pains. It's the condition of Stag Night's being. What kind of director, one prominently known for writing Flightplan, a film considered big-budget, castigates a genre by filming something as devoid of emotion or purpose as Stag Night? This breed of film has me wondering aloud in a heated spit. Did Peter Dowling suddenly awake with a cold sweat? Did Dowling feel bestowed with a sense of purpose and the need to craft his nightmare into a medium as to share his darkest fears? I highly doubt it and if that was the case I'd say it's safe to assume Dowling has since relapsed into a mommas boy. Stag Night reminds me of a famous quote of Alfred Hitchcock's - "The more successful the villain, the more successful the picture." This rule does not apply to Stag Night. There is nothing extraordinary about these dwellers; they are neither subhumans or gifted with any incredible senses. The villains are as inconceivable as Dowling's nerve to put forth such banality to the video market.

THE RIG

Peter Atencio (2010)

To be honest, when I learned of the massive oil spill at the hands of BP in the Gulf of Mexico, my constant lingering thought wasn't of the destruction of the environment nor the hundreds of photos flooding social networking mediums of creatures covered in oil, dying. No, my constant was the slow realizing that soon we will be faced with an amassing of substandard horror films tacked on to adrenalize current events, sort of like what Bong Joon-ho accomplished with his tidy monster film The Host. Starring the incredibly bloated William Forsythe and Art LaFleur, The Rig only exists to profit off of the natural disaster. If anything, The Rig only manages to kick the ecosystem while it's down and out. Nothing of any value exists within The Rig, even for a fan of deep-sea terror as myself. It couldn't possibly be as challenging to invent a distinguishable creature as The Rig proposes through their lack of effort. In fact, the beastly hunters in The Rig seem awfully familiar. Oh, that's right. The supposed prehistoric monsters seem to be a rubber modeling of the "Sleestaks" from Land of the Lost painted black.

The Rig is similar to that of a scorned dog whom begs for forgiveness with doe eyes. As a dog would cower to your feet with its chew toy, The Rig hopes to amend its short-comings with likenesses to James Cameron's Aliens. As if casting a butch Puerto Rican replacement to Vasquez wasn't enough, the offshore rig is under the ownership of a Weyland Drilling Corp. Opening up with a submersible view of the drill penetrating the ocean floor, purplish steam begins to vent, confusing the gentleman in the manned vehicle. Suddenly, a disembodied jaw is shown snapping at the camera, destroying it and severing the feed to the control room. This character doesn't think much of it, however, as he and his crew are all vegetables, slave to the paper. The worst offender is the token heroic icon Faulkner, as he tirades endlessly about his past tours with Special Forces and manages to suffer the most hilarious, albeit predictable, fate of all the crew. Several progressive fixtures are installed early on but hardly linger in the memory, such as Freddy and his little brother Colin. After awhile, you start to wonder if the "script" these actors are reading from aren't just daily calendar quips.

The Intruder Within is a film of questionable meaning to The Rig. Perhaps the BP oil spill brought back fond childhood memories of the TV movie, but then again, that's highly unlikely as any comparison is drawn at the plot and not the now-antique execution. It's a silly thing that low-budget monster films put together before the millennium retains a certain charm that renders them highly watchable and enjoyable. It seems that no matter how close the current generation of creature-features try cutting it to the mold the result will also turn out to be a deformity and a near unwatchable abomination. The Rig is a prime offender in this instance. A shallow fit of comatose digital horror that refrains from excitement or amusing its own humble guests. It's trash like this that makes me ashamed to hold horror close to me as it seems more likely that an inept horror film be made then, say, an incompetent drama. For the first time in quite a bit, I'm actually at a loss for words as to this lifeless garbage before me.

HANCOCK

Peter Berg* (2008)

"With great power, comes great responsibility" I recall this quote from a bottom-barrel cookie cutter superhero film once. Spider-Man hardly wowed me in any sense, this being surprising due to the always eclectic catalog of villains that Spidey could have faced off against. But no, he had to rival an old Willem Dafoe who played a cyborg version of the classic Green Goblin.

Meet Hancock, a superhero with a fresh start. With no serialization penning him to perform certain actions, it only seems logical and politically correct that the Black superhero would have no limitations and a clean slate to fuck up everything. Hancock is an alcoholic superhero who levels cities just to piss off city folks. He also has amnesia and some strange fetish for eagles and small children. While the film structures itself on a simple plot of the ever-so fragile "iconic" image of a superhero, Hancock is thrown into a bunch of super-obstacles and several twists. After the film was initially over, I began to ask around for opinions. Most were favorable with a dash of negativity. I don't think America is ready for a Black Superhero just as many aren't ready for a Black president. The film opens with slave-like jazz music resonating through the credits. We then see a homeless Black man with a nasty case of 5 O'clock shadow. After trying to halt a group of young Asian punks with his chemical-induced negotiation session, he gets called "Soulja Boy." Hancock responds by screaming "Konichiwa!" and impaling their SUV on a spike. Racial tension begins early. Heat picks up later when the idea of inter-racial marriages B.C. come into play. Comedy flairs when a French child (played by the queer Michael Myers kid from Zombie's Halloween) gets thrown into the air so hard he "surrenders" Candyman would have been proud of Will Smith's chocolate thunder. Some amazing visual flair is throttled through our retinas with a potent dose of incredible action, beautiful destruction effects, and raunchy humor. When I first heard news a while back that Hancock was being re-shot for a better rating, my stomach lurched, but with this viewing, I'm not too worried about it. That doesn't stop Hancock from severing arms, degrading homosexual's, and saying "Fuck." Hancock has its "mortal" flaws. The later pacing is mildly sluggish, plot holes are a-plenty, and Will Smith played a horrible alcoholic, but the film is all in good fun. A rip-roaring comedy with equal treatment of a Superhero film. This one is definitely more comedic than Iron Man and definitely more action packed. I'd like to look forward to a sequel. Perhaps even bring in a bonafide villain this time. I can see it now; Christian Bale playing yet another White supremacist in another black marketed film.

THAT BOY

Peter Berlin° (1974)

The closest thing to a real-life living and breathing Narcissus, gay Aryan sex icon Peter Berlin was so obscenely enamored with his own blond beast beautifulness that he acted as his own photographer and would not allow anyone to take portraits of him, aside from the occasional guest like Rick Castro (who is probably best known in the cinema world for co-directing the 1996 cocksucker cult classic Hustler White starring Madonna's one-time 'kept man' Tony Ward). With that being said, it should be no surprise that he would also direct himself in his own quasi-hardcore fag fuck flick, That Boy (1974), under the pseudonym 'Peter Burian' (Berlin opted to adopt his current pseudonym after a Hollywood actor named Peter Burian threatened to sue him). Born in 1942 as 'Armin Hagen Freiherr von Hoyningen-Huene,' Berlin came from a poor Prussian aristocratic family that lost all of its money and possessions during the Second World War when the future sex icon's young father was killed in battle and the family's eastern estate was stolen by the Soviets occupiers. A relative of Baltic German fashion photographer George Hoyningen-Huene, who was also gay and worked with Hebraic Hollywood homo-auteur George Cukor (The Philadelphia Story, My Fair Lady) and acted as a color consultant on his film A Star Is Born (1954) starring Judy Garland, Berlin may be somewhat of a dumb blond, but he also has an innate talent for photography, or at least so much is clear in That Boy, which features a number of the iconic kraut cocksucker's iconic portraits spliced in throughout the film. Starring Berlin as his alter ego 'Helmut' (one reviewer speculated the name might be a tribute to Helmut Berger and/or a reference to his 'warhead' of a cockhead) in a role where he becomes infatuated with a newly blind boy because he "seems so different from all the other street people" and "lives in a world all his own," the film is ultimately the most bizarre example of the star/director's rather intricate and bizarre brand of post-WWII Teutonic fairy narcissism and vanity. The second and final film Berlin starred in before directing a couple obscure shorts and dropping out of filmmaking and acting altogether, That Boy is the height of homo vanity in quasi-avant-garde form as a sort of west coast equivalent to the Warhol/Morrissey films, albeit minus any sort of irony, cynicism, or sociopolitical context, thus making for a seriously silly cinematic work that is distinctly charming due to the fact that it is completely unintentionally humorous despite its sentimental 'humanistic' aspirations as a rather ridiculous tale featuring camp elements (including middle-aged tranny hippie homos!) about a glamorous gay boy who falls in pseudo-love with an equally 'side-pipe' plagued blind boy. In the world of Peter Berlin, nothing else exists except him and his many horny admirers, who, at best, only are allowed a mere tiny taste of the muscular Teutonic twink. While dead serious in an almost poetic fashion, That Boy is also a superlatively side-splitting depiction of the delusional beauty of an exceedingly eccentric gay dude with a silly Dutch boy haircut whose personal weltanschauung is self-worship and self-glorification. Indeed, if nothing else, Berlin is the ultimate unrivaled 'Übermensch' of sod sex icons, but of course, no one ever had to tell him that.

As a Blind Boy (Arron Black) narrates regarding the hypnotic sexual allure of protagonist Helmut (Peter Berlin) at the beginning of That Boy as the Aryan alpha-homo cruises down south of the Market and Polk Street areas of San Francisco as various people admire him: "Showing off that huge pleasure organ of his...everyone would stare at him...weird people, boys, girls, young men, freaks...everyone staring at this cock, doing anything to get his attention. Still, he ignored everyone...there was nothing anyone could do. I suppose he knew they'd follow him...anywhere, everywhere...just to get one more look at his cock. I followed too. I followed him...watched him everyday...strolling along the street...showing off his fine muscular body. I watched others look at him...pass him by as he stood on the street corner and take another look. Often, they would return...planning how they could lure him from his isolation." While Helmut rebuffs every single glaring girl and boy that passes his magnetic gay gaze, he develops a soft spot for the Blind Boy because he cannot imagine a life where one is deprived the sight of physical beauty, especially his own. Indeed, Helmut worships himself and derives the greatest satisfaction from being wanted by others who cannot have him. At the most, Helmut will let someone play with his cock and he might occasionally allow someone access to his poop-shute, but other than that he is a mere cockteasing cocksucker who does not even care about sucking cocks. When Helmut turns down some degenerate with a leather-fag mustache and Nazi hat, the unhappy fellow calls him "jack off" and hatefully proclaims, "you will be sorry bitch." Of course, Helmut barely even acknowledges the bitchy street sod and goes on his merry way, as he only has eyes for the poor Blind boy.

Ultimately, That Boy is comprised of a series of Anger-esque montages that are divided into a couple segments based on different SF street people that worship Helmut, which include an S&M photographer (who literally puts Helmut on a pedestal!), an exercise-obsessed high yellow negro twink, a urine-and-whip-loving 'power bottom' in a campy gay bar, and of course the ostensibly tragic Blind Boy character. And why is this Aryan hunk so obsessed with a Blind Boy? As Helmut narrates, "This boy intrigues me because he dresses so well and cares so much about his appearance." Apparently, the Blind Boy lost his vision the year before in an accident and is well aware of Helmut's appearance. Their 'relationship' begins when Helmut walks up to the Blind Boy and, while not saying a single word, helps the visually challenged twink cross the street in a hilarious scene where the bulges in each characters' pants is glaringly apparent. Surely, Helmut seems aroused by the fact that the Blind Boy must be dependent on him. As Helmut concludes at the end of the film regarding his new relationship:

THAT BOY

“I think I really found a friend. Someone I can talk to. Someone that can talk to me. Someone I can give protection to. Someone who, in return, can provide warmth and understanding when warmth and understanding are needed. Someone who will talk to me without fear and will listen in return. Someone who will share my fantasies and dreams without making demands while accepting help. I think of his fantasies...his dreams...and enjoy being with him. His mind is so much different...so much purer than the rest...he’s willing to understand and to listen...because there’s a joy in knowing no matter what events may occur, he will always hold me in his memory as I am now...as I was for him in these fine days.” Indeed, being the harmless pathological narcissist that he is, Helmut is most intrigued by the fact that the Blind Boy—being unable to see and all—will always remember him as the immaculate Aryan twink that, in terms of sod sexual magnetism, dominated the entire modern Sodom that is San Francisco. Notably, in real-life, Berlin’s longtime lover had a deformed leg, thus the sex icon’s fetishism for the handsome yet crippled is completely genuine and not something he incorporated in the film to make him seem like some morally righteous queer who was altruistic enough to give handicapped homos sympathy fucks.

Unquestionably, aside from the strange scenarios of seeing a masochistic man lick beer off Peter Berlin’s crotch while being whipped by a biker, a tiny muscular negro twink working out in a gym naked, and other fiercely foul examples of retrograde fetishistic faggotry, That Boy is a mighty awkward yet hysterically humorous experience simply due to the fact that it is full of so much pseudo-sensually narrated bad poetry. For example, Herr Berlin somberly narrates regarding the Blind Boy: “What a shame the boy can no longer see the color of the streets he dreams about” and “if only he could see.” When the credits roll, the hilarity still does not end, as the film gives “Special Thanks” to what I assume are hippie fellows as demonstrated by their names ‘Cardinal Mahdi Mahatma’ and ‘Crown Prince Jesus Christ Satan.’ Admittedly, for a directorial debut, Berlin’s work holds up, albeit for all the wrong reasons, as a virtual celluloid catalog of outmoded fag fashion and fetishes. I think John ‘The Pope of Trash’ Waters probably said it best when he described Berlin as a sort of walking and talking sex organ.

When it comes down to it, it is not Berlin but his uncut kraut cock, which gets all the great close-ups in the film, especially when he is walking down the street in his signature “saran” wrapped white pants (in fact, Berlin was given the nickname ‘Saran’ due to his perverse proclivity towards walking around town with his cock bulging out of his white pants). Notably, in the rather worthwhile documentary That Man: Peter Berlin (2005) directed by Jim Tushinski (I Always Said Yes: The Many Lives of Wakefield Poole), Berlin reveals that he derived the greatest sexual gratification from luring guys in the street and then blowing them off right before they thought they would have the opportunity to blow him. Indeed, instead of being gay, it seems that Berlin was more in love with himself and his own body as an innate narcissist who puts the men of James Bidgood's classic cocksucker cult flick Pink Narcissus (1971) to shame in terms of self-worship and glorification. Indeed, even with their Cocteau-esque use of allegorical imagery involving mirrors and what not, Michael Zen's classics, Falconhead (1976) and Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters (1984), cannot compare to the absolutely stupefying gay vanity of That Boy, which may be the most unflatteringly sincere yet paradoxically stereotypically gay film ever made. In that sense, it is probably for the better that Berlin never directed another feature, as it would have never been able to top his directorial debut, which probably said everything that the sex icon had to say about his life, philosophy, and personality in 80 minutes or so.

The spiritually prodigal son of a young Wehrmacht soldier whose Halstatt Nordic good looks and physique he passed on to his progeny before dying tragically in the Second World War while apparently saving a comrade in battle, Peter Berlin is, in many ways, a sort of symbol for the death of the Occident, as a man who, not unlike Fassbinder's Lebensborn-bred boy toy Armin Meier, would have gone on to do much greater things, like be a prestigious SS officer of an Aryan utopia covered in Berlin-esque Arno Breker statues, had World War II ended differently. Indeed, such is certainly a tragic fate for a man who was born with the name Armin Hagen Freiherr von Hoyningen-Huene and was probably destined to live in a castle, yet instead chose the suggestive porn name 'Peter Berlin' and preferred living in an American urban hippie gutter. In more than one way That Boy is a fitting title, as it depicts the striking mensch who was, psychologically speaking, a perennial boy whose narcissism, like many gay men, was comparable to that of an infant, thus hinting that he never got the proper maternal nourishment during his first critical years (after all, he was born during the middle of WWII in 1942, not much earlier before his father was killed). Like the first film the sex icon starred in, Nights in Black Leather (1973), That Boy demonstrates that fascistic aesthetics (which were partly inspired by Berlin's hero Tom of Finland's drawings) were quite chic among homos in the 1970s, thus symbolizing a certain sick irony of fate in Berlin's life as the spiritually fallen son of a Teutonic father and Fatherland. Indeed, That Boy demonstrates that 1970s San Francisco—with its tranny homo hippies, lurking and lecherous leather-fags, and bellbottom-wearing power-bottoms—was a sort of Weimar 2.0, with Peter Berlin being its unofficial prince, thus, in a sense, he did live the life of the the born aristocrat that he was after all.

Peter Bogdanovich (1968)

Out of all the filmmakers associated with the so-called 'American New Wave' movement that lasted from the mid-to-late 1960s to early 1980s, Peter Bogdanovich (Paper Moon, Saint Jack)—a somewhat fallen auteur that is probably best known nowadays for his recurring guest role on HBO's The Sopranos—was certainly the most aesthetically conservative, banal, and least thematically subversive. Indeed, when his largely fellow kosher counterculture compatriots like Bob Rafelson, Monte Hellman, Robert Towne, and Henry Jaglom were playing iconoclast and attempting to destroy the mores of mainstream white Christian American while simultaneously remodeling the Hollywood studio system to create a more European orientated auteurist cinema, Bogdanovich was still jerking off to the films of Howard Hawks and attempting to be a sort of modernist John Ford that did not direct westerns (incidentally and somewhat ironically, Ford was apparently instrumental in destroying Bog's chance to direct an unrealized John Wayne western entitled The Streets of Laredo, which the filmmaker believed would have been his masterpiece). The son of a Serbian Orthodox Christian painter and Austrian-born Jewess, Bogdanovich started out as a dorky cinephile that acted as a film critic at Esquire and film programmer at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City, on top of spending much of his free time stalking his cinematic heroes, including Orson Welles, who he would eventually develop a close and cinephiliacally fruitful relationship with. Influenced by the film critics turned auteur filmmakers associated with Cahiers du Cinéma like Godard and Rohmer, Bogdanovich was naturally destined to make shamelessly cinephiliac films. Considering his largely ancient cinematic heroes, it was only natural that I would never develop any special fondness for Bogdanovich's undeniably uneven oeuvre. In fact, I cannot think of a single Bogdanovich flick that I really like, though I do have a certain unexpected respect for his somewhat preternatural debut feature Targets (1968) starring Golden Age Hollywood horror legend Boris Karloff in a superficially semi-autobiographical role as a washed-up horror star that has become completely disillusioned with his trade who finds himself fighting a Charles Whitman-esque spree-killer in a climatic showdown that is fittingly set at a drive-in theater. A piece of self-reflexive quasi-meta-cinema where Bogdanovich even plays a virtual unintended self-parody of himself as a young screenwriter with a hard-on for old man Karloff, the film is a Roger Corman-produced mess where goofy old school horror meets visceral real-life true crime horror. In short, unlike most of Bogdanovich's films, Targets is a somewhat idiosyncratic flick with a slight bit of good old testicular fortitude that pays anti-tribute to one of America's most unconventional mass murderers.

Undoubtedly, gay novelist and theater critic Ethan Mordden probably paid the film its greatest compliment while adequately summing up its overall importance in the context of cinema history when he wrote in his New Hollywood history book Medium Cool: The Movies of the 1960s (1990), “There is the feeling that the entire movie is a public-service commercial (for the control of firearms), which Bogdanovich can then turn about by calling TARGETS apolitical, a film for film’s sake. That it is: a B that redefines the B’s power, a film reassessing the nature of certain film categories—‘exploitation,’ ‘real-life,’ ‘horror.’ TARGETS is the real terror, THE TERROR just a movie. But then so is TARGETS.” Like any film produced by insincerely charming McHebrew schlockmeister Roger Corman, the film is largely the consequence half-baked planning and a miserly budget, but eager novice Bogdanovich was determined to direct his first movie and was willing to accept table scraps to do so. Shot on a shockingly meager budget of around $130,000, the film had its genesis in the fact that star Corman was looking to capitalize off that the fact that Karloff owed him two days’ work and he decided his new young protege Bogdanovich, who previously worked with him as an assistant director on the outlaw biker flick The Wild Angels (1966), had the cost-cutting skills and technical competency to make him a quick cheapie that would make him a profit. In a sleazy attempt to give star Karloff more screen time, Corman also demanded that Bogdanovich use excerpts from his mostly lame and tame Napoleonic-era gothic horror flick The Terror (1963) starring (and partly co-ghost-directed by) Jack Nicholson. A perennially shameless penny-pincher, Corman ultimately funded a film that is, at least partially, a ruthless attack against the sort of mindnumbingly mindless and soullessly manufactured B horror flicks that he regularly defecated out. Somewhat of a Frankenstein monster of movie that is made of various pieces of scrap cinematic parts, Targets is in many ways the ultimate anti-Corman flick as a cinematic work that both mocks and was superficially modeled after the archetypal celluloid turd.

According to Peter Biskind in his magnum opus of New Hollywood gossip Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998), Corman gave Bogdanovich the following instructions in regard to directing Targets, “You know how Hitchcock shoots, don’t you? Plans every shot, totally prepared. You know how Hawks shoots, don’t you? Doesn’t plan anything. Rewrites on the set. Well, on this picture, I want you to be Hitchcock.” Of course, the film lacks the almost mathematical precision of a Hitch flick, but that is actually a good thing since the flick owes most of its potency to its almost sometimes cinema-vérité-like vibe and relative lack of cold technical precision, especially in comparison to Bogdanovich’s later films. Not surprisingly to anyone that has seen the film, Targets also had help from maverick auteur Samuel Fuller (Naked Kiss, Shock Corridor), who apparently did an uncredited revamping of the screenplay (which was co-written by the director’s then-wife Polly Platt) and guided his protégé Bogdanovich when it came to the film’s meager budget (in short, most of the film’s budget was saved for its extra long and climatic ending). Indeed, not unlike a Fuller flick, the film features a storyline that was ripped straight from a newspaper headline, namely the psychotic shooting spree of loony lone wolf mass murderer Charles 'Texas Tower Sniper' Whitman. An all-American-looking blond beast with a large muscular build and nearly genius IQ that went completely berserk on August 1, 1966 and murdered his wife and mother in their home and then headed to University of Texas at Austin where he killed 14 more people before being killed by some cops, Whitman was not exactly your stereotypical homicidal sniper (it is suspected that he might have been crazy because he had a pecan-sized brain tumor that may have pressed against his amygdala, which is a part of the brain that deals with anxiety and fight-or-flight responses).

Rather boldly, if not grotesquely and quite stereotypically, Bogdanovich's partly blames the Whitman-esque character's murderous meltdown on the soullessness and phoniness of white middle-class life. Indeed, Bogdanovich even goes so far as to blame some of the victims, especially the killer's wife and mother, for his aberrant actions, as these family members, who are hardly sympathetic, are depicted as emotionally neglectful buffoons that refuse to acknowledge that he is clearly unhinged. Like a stereotypical member of the Hebraic tribe, Bogdanovich less than subtly reveals his kosher contempt for WASPs and white suburbia (despite the fact that he is a real big fan of Aryan women as his dubious one-sided relationships with Cybill Shepherd and Dorothy Stratten demonstrate). Clearly ahead of his time as far as cultural Marxist bullshit is concerned, the film also includes mostly non-Europid heroes, including a China girl and Bogdanovich himself portraying a stereotypically whiny and neurotic screenwriter that is desperate to squeeze out the last bit of raw acting talent from Karloff's character in a rather crude and tasteless example of art intimating life and vice versa. Somewhat paradoxically, the film also manages to give Karloff some dignity while at the same time making him seem like a sad old joke. Indeed, somehow I assume that Karloff ultimately regretted having to owe Corman two days of work as Targets reveals that he probably would have done a fairly decent job playing the dainty tea-sipping cousin of one of the titular old farts of Grumpy Old Men (1993) in what is arguably the most unintentionally humorous yet somewhat horrifying roles of his very long career.

A sort of Sunset Boulevard (1950) for the film dork generation as directed by arguably the biggest film dork of his generation, Targets is in many ways the ultimate drive-in flick in that, aside from being virtually two films in one, it climaxes at a packed drive-in, thus contemporary viewers are unfortunately deprived of the full cinematic experience. Indeed, I don't think many things beat the cinematic thrill of watching a film about a sniper killing petrified audience members at a drive-in while at a drive-in with real-life petrified audience members. For better or worse, Targets is basically a glorified exploitation flick that takes the Ed Wood approach of both exploiting the past fame of a washed-up horror star and recycling cheap footage from a subpar horror movie that no one ever wants to see again. Of course, Bogdanovich learned all of the tricks of the trades in the exploitation world, or as he stated in regard to working under Corman as an assistant director on The Wild Angels, "I went from getting the laundry to directing the picture in three weeks. Altogether, I worked 22 weeks – pre-production, shooting, second unit, cutting, dubbing – I haven't learned as much since." Needless to say, Bogdanovich worked for one of the worst yet worshiped some of the best like Welles and Fuller, thereupon resulting in a film that totally transcends Corman kitsch but could have never been made in the Hollywood studio system.

In a scenario that might scare away more cultivated viewers from ever wanting to other seek out any other misbegotten celluloid Corman crud, Targets begins with the less than climatic conclusion of The Terror that involves Karloff being drowned by a beauteous ghost. After the movie concludes, it is revealed that quasi-protagonist, Karloff more or less portraying himself under the somewhat ludicrous Murnau-esque name 'Byron Orlok,' is in a screening room and he is greatly pained to see his ludicrously lackluster performance in shallow hack work that is clearly not worthy of his famous name. When Byron's considerably kosher producer Marshall Smith (Monte Landis) brings up a new movie that he wants him to star in, Byron quickly replies, "I'm not making any more films, Marshall. I'm retiring." Aside from Marshall, Byron immediately disappoints young screenwriter Sammy Michaels (Bogdanovich in an obvious semi-autobiographical role), who has just written a script that he proudly proclaims was modeled after the geriatric Brit's real-life personality. While Sammy and his Chinese secretary Jenny (Nancy Hsueh) make an impassioned plea for him to seriously reconsider retiring, Byron stands firm and replies, "Sammy, you're a sweet boy, but you can't possibly understand what it feels like to be me. I'm an antique, out of date" and "I'm an anachronism. Sammy, look around you. The world belongs to the young. Make way for them." Of course, what Byron fails to realize is that semite Sammy is an overly sentimental cinephile that lives in the past and worships the films of yesteryear. Indeed, Sammy would probably give old man Bryon a sloppy blowjob if he asked him to, but the wash-up horror icon is not impressed by groveling or superficial praise.

Aside from being a living and breathing anachronism that could not even scare a neurotic toddler, Byron is disillusioned with horror movies simply because they seem like a goofy joke compared to real-life violence and murder, or as he states to Sammy after showing him a newspaper with a headline that reads, "YOUTH KILLS SIX IN SUPERMARKET" in regard to the impotency of his trade: "No one's afraid of a painted monster." Indeed, Byron seems most appalled by the fact that film critics have recently described his work as "high camp," as if he is Vincent Price or something (incidentally, Sammy considers asking Mr. Price to star in his new film when Byron declines). Luckily (or unluckily depending on who you are), Byron eventually gets the opportunity to encounter a real-life homicidal maniac by happenstance and confront his fears in regard to real-life human horrors. Although resembling the typical all-American clean-cut white boy, generically handsome Vietnam War veteran Bobby Thompson (Tim O'Kelly) is, mentally speaking, on the brink of blowing a gasket and gunning down as many people as possible before he is caught, including the two women that he loves most. In a rather improbable foreshadowing scene at the beginning of the film, Bobby even unwittingly catches Byron in the crosshairs of a rifle while he is hanging out at a gun store that he and his avid sport shooter father regularly patronize. As demonstrated by his oftentimes socially retarded behavior and seeming incapacity to relate to other people, Bobby seems to fall somewhere on the autism spectrum, though that seems to be the least of his problems as he has recently contracted an impulse to kill and even considers shooting his own father in the back one day while they are target practicing.

In a strange fucked up way that seems to demonstrate both the director's lack of emotional intelligence and somewhat busted moral compass, deranged gun-freak Bobby—a psychological cripple that is embroiled in an intense civil war with his conscience—sometimes seems like the most sympathetic character in the film, as if his mind and body has been taken over by some evil entity like the NASA space commander Lt. Col. Marcus Aurelius Belt in the badly botched first season The X-Files episode 'Space.' Indeed, while Byron merely seems like a stereotypical grumpy old fart that longs for eternity in a cold dark coffin, Sammy boy is an outstandingly obnoxious social climber that seems like he would pimp out of his own mother to further his career. Surely, the only time Byron/Karloff is not completely insufferable is when he pays tribute to Hollywood maverick Hollywood Howard Hawks by stating in regard his Pre-Code prison flick The Criminal Code (1931), "Thanks to him, it was my first really important part." Undoubtedly, it is a rather dejected experience to see a rather weak and defeated old Byron/Karloff stare at his much younger and stronger self while watching the Hawk flick on TV as Sammy/Bogdanovich lurks in the background. While Karloff was never much of an actor, he certainly radiated a sort of menacingly visceral stoicism during his younger years, hence his famous and iconic role as Frankenstein's monster in Frankenstein (1931), Bride of Frankenstein (1935), and Son of Frankenstein (1939). Thankfully, Byron demonstrates he still has some of his fierce Modern Prometheus menace when he smacks the shit out of the sniper at the end of the film. Of course, Byron probably has other reasons for smacking the shit out of the sniper aside from his demented murder spree, as the elderly horror icon probably resents the fact that the relatively young killer is throwing away his life and, in turn, his youth.

Bobby might be a bat-shit crazy bastard with more than a couple screws loose, but he at least has enough of a conscience and foresight to know that he is about to explode and he even attempts to seek help from his wife the night before his killing spree, but unfortunately she is a stereotypical dumb and vapid blonde shiksa that is too narcissistic to notice her hubby is about to get a tad bit homicidal. Indeed, when Bobby attempts to confide in her and meekly states, "I want to talk to you, Ilene. I don't know what's happening to me. Oh, I get funny ideas," his self-absorbed wife does not bother to take seriously what he has to say and instead instantly changes the subject and asks him what he thinks of her work outfit (notably, her outfit is out little consequence as she works as a telephone operator!). That night when Ilene gets home from work, she finds Bobby lurking in the shadows of their bedroom and demanding that she not turn on the light, thus hinting that he has malevolent intentions and seeks to dehumanize her before he can go through with the unsavory act of uxoricide. The next morning, Bobby shoots his wife in the gut when she attempts to give him an early morning kiss and then proceeds to gun down both his mother and a hapless delivery boy who just happens to be at the wrong place at the wrong time. Right before wasting his wifey, Bobby types the following words on his typewriter, "To Whom It May Concern: It is now 11:40 A.M. My wife is still asleep, but when she wakes up I am going to kill her. Then I am going to kill my mother. I know they will get me, but there will be more killing before I die." Aside from typing up the pointless note for the police, Bobby further reveals his morbid anal retentiveness by placing the corpses on beds and covering them with sheets. Of course, after killing his wife and mother, Bobby drives to town with a full arsenal in his trunk so that he can proceed to kill as many innocent people as possible. Somewhat humorously, before he starts shooting random strangers, Bobby heads to his favorite gun shop and buys 300 .30-06 Springfield cartridges and a box of four buck for a 12 gauge, which he has charged to his father's account, thereupon making his father an unwitting accessory to mass murder.

To his minor credit, Bobby seems to be fairly confident in his shooting talents, as he initially opts to snipe at people in cars on a busy highway while lying atop an oil storage tank in another unintentionally tastelessly tragicomic scene that underscores the auteur's aesthetic autism. Indeed, at one point, Bobby not only manages to kill an unsuspecting motorist during rush hour, but he also successfully takes out a female passenger after she frantically flees from the car in a scenario that is somewhat comparable to the intentionally humorous sniper scene in Luis Buñuel's late period surrealist classic Le Fantôme de la liberté (1974) aka The Phantom of Liberty. Undoubtedly, Bobby's choice of targets and method for taking out said targets has a certain ritualistic quality about it that really highlights the character's peculiar pathology-ridden mind. Needless to say, when he is forced to kill a worker that climbs up the oil tank and subsequently sees police cars, Bobby immediately hightails it out of the area in his convertible. To evade capture after the police spot him, Bobby wisely decides to seek sanctuary at a nearby drive-in theater where he calmly purchases a ticket and then bides his time until the parking lot fills up with hundreds of potential victims. On top of having a nice place to hide, Bobby has discovered the perfect place to kill tons of people, especially considering the venue is expected to be unusually packed with patrons due to a promotional appearance from horror icon Byron. Needless to say, Bobby does not expect to be taken out by a barely mobile British old horror fart. Indeed, while Corman's kitsch gothic The Terror plays at the theater, Bobby begins blowing away unwitting audience members while they sit in their parked cars. At first, not many people notice the random deaths due to the darkness and noise from the movie, but it does not take long before full panic sets in and people are desperately attempting to flee the drive-in in their cars.

As a distinguished celebrity guest, Byron calmly sits in a limo at the front of the screen with his oriental secretary Jenny and it is only when he notices the killings that he seems to be even remotely alive. In fact, Bobby's killing spree really gets Byron's blood flowing, as if it is the one thing he needs in his life to have a sort of spiritual reawakening. As an old school (pseudo)Victorian gentleman, Byron naturally goes into full-fledged fearless hero mode when Bobby makes the mistake of shooting Jenny, who thankfully only receives a minor flesh wound. Indeed, like the most inordinately eloquent of screen monsters or even slasher killers, Byron stoically treads towards Bobby like an aristocratic Übermensch on a mission. Notably, Bobby becomes rather petrified when he notices that Byron is walking in his direction just as a projected image of the actor walking in a similar determined fashion from The Terror is projected on the movie screen, thus inspiring the unhinged sniper to shoot in both directions as if he is afraid that he is about to be obliterated by a big scary movie monster in what is a truly unreal and even vaguely surreal scenario where a movie monster transforms into a real-life hero. When Byron reaches the seemingly autistic sniper, he uses his trusty cane to knock a Luger out of Bobby's hand and then proceeds to repeatedly bitch slap him until he collapses and curls up into a fetal position like an abused child. Bitch-slapping the sniper ultimately seems to have a therapeutic effect on Byron, as it seems to release some pent up rage and deep-seated resentment. When Byron finally calms down and notices that big bad Bobby has been psychologically obliterated and is lying on the ground in a fetal position like an abuse child (which, in a strange way, Bobby seems to be), he thinks out loud by stating, "Is that what I was afraid of?," thus revealing that the horror icon seems to have some unwarranted guilt and moral qualms about being involved in creating hokey horror in a world full of real monsters and predators. Indeed, by confronting Bobby, Byron seems to have finally absolved himself of guilt and latent fear in regard to real-life human monsters and their growing prominence in the Western world.

Not one to easily dismiss his own work, Peter Bogdanovich revealed in an interview with Noel Murray at the now defunct film site The Dissolve that he is quite proud of Targets and considers it an important film in his overall oeuvre, or as he seemingly insincerely stated with the martial gusto of a dozen Indian eunuchs, “If it wasn’t for TARGETS, there wouldn’t be a LAST PICTURE SHOW. And TARGETS, unfortunately, from a social point of view, is not outdated, because we still have this terrible gun problem in the United States. I wish it was outdated, but it isn’t. You can still buy guns very easily, and we’ve seen in the last few years a lot of mass killings, like we showed in TARGETS. Unfortunately, it’s still a very common occurrence in the United States. I think it’s terrible.” Lame superficial anti-gun sentiments aside, Bogdanovich is also right when he describes the film as being still socially relevant, as deranged Batmanphile and failed neuroscience student James Holmes—a less than charming chap who, unlike Charles Whitman, has a less than handsome face that screams abject mental derangement—committed an infamous mass shooting on July 20, 2012 at a Century 16 movie theater in Aurora, Colorado that concluded with 12 people dying and over 70 suffering injuries. For better or worse, Targets is undoubtedly the most socially conscious film that Bogdanovich ever made, which is somewhat depressing when you think about it since it is a cheap exploitation film that was specially crafted to play at the sort of drive-in theaters that specialized in such superficially sleazy and salacious schlock films. Undoubtedly, the film also seems all the more powerful when one considers that Bogdanovich’s Dutch-Canadian Playboy Playmate girlfriend Dorothy Stratten was brutally murdered with a Mossberg 12-gauge shotgun in a murder-suicide committed by her estranged Jewish pimp husband Paul Snider. Of course, being the typical Hebraic Hollywood leftist, Bogdanovich blames guns instead of his sociopathic kinsman Snider for Stratten’s grisly demise, or as he somewhat absurdly stated while making reference to Targets, “Well, the story’s impossible to tell without showing the gun culture. Of course, the gun culture was very much on my mind. It was terrible then, it’s terrible now. I had a personal encounter with that tragedy when [my girlfriend] Dorothy Stratten was murdered by a gun that the killer, who was an alien, wasn’t supposed to be allowed to have. His visa had expired, and he still was able to purchase a shotgun with the ease of, as you say, going to the market and buying butter. And he killed her with it. I’ve experienced personal tragedy as a result of the gun culture in this country, which is disgraceful, frankly.” Of course, according to Bogdanovich’s logic, one only needs to be a morally virtuous elderly old horror star with a cane to take out a bloodthirsty mass murderer. Additionally, I doubt being able to purchase a firearm would have stopped Snider for killing Stratten. After all, Snider not only killed Stratten, but he also raped her before shooting her and then demonstrated he had necrophiliac tendencies by sexually defiling her corpse. Notably, auteur Bob Fosse would immortalize Stratten’s tragic life and gruesome death with his somewhat underrated flick Star 80 (1983) starring Mariel Hemingway and Eric Roberts. While I certainly consider Fosse to be the superior filmmaker, I kind of wish that Bogdanovich had directed the film.

Now celebrated by contemporary philosemitic and Hebraic hipster filmmakers like Wes Anderson and Noah Baumbach, who produced his latest film—the decidedly degenerate Woody Allen clone She's Funny That Way (2014)—Bogdanovich has certainly come a long way since he directed Targets and demonstrated for the first and ultimately last time in his career that he might have a drop of testicular fortitude. While the would-be-auteur enjoyed great success with his first three post-Target features The Last Picture Show (1971), What's Up, Doc? (1972), and Paper Moon (1973), Bogdanovich more or less destroyed his reputation as a filmmaker with three super soulless flops in a row, including the lame Henry James adaptation Daisy Miller (1974), pseudo-Lubitsch-esque musical At Long Last Love (1975), and insipid silent movie love letter Nickelodeon (1976). With his rather retarded rom-com They All Laughed (1980) starring Dorothy Stratten, Bogdanovich put the final nail in the coffin of his filmmaking career and was completely destroyed financially, as he funded the flop himself with his own money and was ultimately forced to file for bankruptcy as a result. In what ultimately proved to be a super sleazy move to help get him back on his feet after the truly cringe-worthy cinematic disaster that was They All Laughed, Bogdanovich wrote the sickly self-serving 'memoir' Killing of the Unicorn: Dorothy Stratten 1960-1980 (1984), which exploited the infamy of his lover's brutal death and contained many quasi-libelous allegations against the filmmaker's (former) friends (including, ultra-degenerate Hugh Hefner, who hilariously claimed to have suffered a stroke after reading it). Of course, Bogdanovich demonstrated with his directorial debut that he was willing to exploit both a real-life massacre and an elderly British actor that had a hard time finding work, so Killing of the Unicorn was really no big surprise.

Undoubtedly, the more I read about Bogdanovich, the more I despise him. The sort of stereotypical ugly semitic Woody Allen-esque 'nice guy' type that has spent a good portion of his life buying and groveling his way into blonde Aryaness panties, Bogdanovich basically destroyed his entire career as a result of promoting his uniquely untalented lovers Cybill Shepherd and Dorothy Stratten and attempting the impossible by trying in vain to turn these brainless beauties into respectable actresses. As noted in Biskind's Easy Riders, Raging Bulls and elsewhere, many of the people that were close with Bogdanovich credit his homely first-wife—screenwriter, producer, and production designer Polly Platt—as being the true source of his talent and early career success as a filmmaker. What is unquestionably true is that while Bogdanovich has never really made a decent film after parting ways with her aside from Saint Jack (1979), Platt would go on to work on a number of interesting and eclectic projects, including Robert Altman's underrated Great Depression era crime-drama Thieves Like Us (1974), Louie Malle's pederast-friendly Pretty Baby (1978), the totally trashy anti-white exploitation flick Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff (1979), and Wes Anderson's debut feature Bottle Rocket (1996). Despite treating her like garbage and divorcing her for a dumb blonde that he treated like a fragile porcelain doll as opposed to an equal lover and companion, Bogdanovich would later pay tribute to his ex-wife Platt by stating, “She worked on important pictures and made major contributions. She was unique. There weren’t many women doing that kind of work at that time, particularly not one as well versed as she was. She knew all the departments, on a workmanlike basis, as opposed to most producers who just know things in theory.”

As for Bogdanovich, he was absolutely despised by many people in the film industry due to his supposed flaunted excesses, arrogance, delusions of grandeur, and general megalomania. In fact, when his feature At Long Last Love became a flop, many people in Hollywood were absolutely delighted and celebrated his failure, or as noted in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls: “‘People loathed Peter,’ says writer David Newman. ‘His ego was just so monstrous. He was the great I Am, the Second Coming. This screening was a disaster, a cataclysm.’ The word on the street was that Platt had been the power behind the throne, and without her, he was nothing [...] he didn’t need Platt to sabotage his reputation. He was so universally detested that Billy Wilder is supposed to have said that after news of the screening spread, you could hear the champagne corks popping all over town. Complained Bogdanovich, ‘It was treated as if we had committed one of the most heinous crimes ever, including child-murdering and rape.’” Of course, one of the things that makes Targets so intriguing is that it is a work of true cinematic grit that was created before Bogdanovich became famous, succumbed to egomania, and thought he could get away with simply peddling soulless Cy-bill Shepherd musicals. Indeed, although far from immaculate, Targets is respectable because it is, in various ways, a work of authentic abject desperation and completely bare nihilistic fury that arguably does a better job of the capturing the essence of its particular zeitgeist than Dennis Hopper’s Easy Rider (1969). Aside from possibly Saint Jack, which was originally supposed to be directed by Orson Welles, Targets is surely Bogdanovich’s most underrated film. According to Bogdanovich himself, the real reason the film fell under the radar and went fairly unnoticed at the time of its original release is that, not unlike with Richard Kelly’s Donnie Darko (2001) and how the September 11 terrorist attacks doomed its fate, it debuted at a less than auspicious time in the wake of the Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert F. Kennedy assassinations. Undoubtedly, it is strangely fitting that the sniper in Bogdanovich is an all-American WASP that goes on a fairly indiscriminate killing spree, as the character can be seen as a symbolic of the white Christian Anglo-Saxon man reacting to the nation he built being taken away from him by negroes, Jewish intellectuals, feminists, and various other untermensch groups that waged war against him during the 1960s utilizing resentment-driven slave-morality tactics that have completely inverted the values and mores of the people that built this country. Of course, as a Jew, Bogdanovich has a sort of innate commitment to said anti-Occidental

While Targets is arguably Bogdanovich's most audaciously 'auteurist' work, it still ultimately reeks of being a slightly immature fanboy jerk-off piece. I know I am certainly not the only person that believes this as David Thomson argued in his magnum opus The New Biographical Dictionary of Film (1975) in regard to Bogdanovich's innate failure in regard to becoming the true auteur that he always dreamed of being, "As a director, Bogdanovich made four lovely picture shows, revealing marvelous accomplishment, wit, and sense of place. But, ironically, they are less an auteur's films than the extension of criticism. TARGETS—made under Roger Corman's aegis, after Bogdanovich had fueled the bikes for WILD ANGELS—is a tribute to AIP horror pictures, to Boris Karloff, and to Hawks, and also a stylistic nod in the direction of Hitchcock and Lang." Notably, Ethan Mordden went even further than Thomson and soundly argued, "There are so many 'movies' going on inside Bogdanovich's TARGETS (1968) that the film is more a state-of-the-art insertion into cinema history than an act of entertainment-enlightenment. What BARBARELLA was to the era itself, TARGETS was to the development of the movies in that era; a demonstration piece." Indeed, in terms of sheer entertainment value, Bogdanovich's directorial debut is decidedly uneven, but it is still worth the ride and indubitably makes for an intriguing piece of cinephile history. Undoubtedly, Bogdanovich is the perfect example of what Ludwig Wittgenstein meant when he described his fellow Jews as lacking the capacity for true genius and being only capable of 'reproductive thinking,' or as the Vienna-born philosopher stated himself in a somewhat self-denigrating fashion, "Amongst Jews 'genius' is found only in the holy man. Even the greatest of Jewish thinkers is no more than talented. (Myself for instance.) I think there is some truth in my idea that I really only think reproductively.." Indeed, Wittgenstein might as well have been describing Bogdanovich when he wrote in regard to the lack of genius of early Romantic period German-Jewish composer Felix Mendelssohn, "Within all great art there is a WILD animal: tamed. Not with Mendelssohn, for example. All great art has man's primitive drives as its groundbass. They are not the melody (as they are with Wagner, perhaps) but they are what gives the melody its depth and power. In this sense Mendelssohn can be called a 'reproductive' artist." Somewhat interestingly, the same Wittgenstein compilation Culture and Value (1970) features the following insight: "A typical American film, naive and silly, can — for all its silliness and even by means of it — be instructive. A fatuous, self-conscious English film can teach one nothing. I have often learnt a lesson from a silly American film." As to what can be learned from Targets, certainly a number of important lessons can be gleaned from it, though I think the most obvious one is that Boris Karloff was much more horrifying and unnerving when more or less portraying himself as a dejected, self-pitying, pessimistic and semi-crippled old man than he ever was as the darling monster of James Whale's Frankenstein (1931).

JOHNNY YESNO

Peter Care (1982)

There seems to be a tendency among certain cinephiles, myself included, to outright overlook and/or dismiss certain films because they were made in collaboration with a certain band or some other sort of musician(s), as if these works do not totally qualify as cinema and should be completely relegated to the ghetto realm of music videos and tour documentaries. Of course, it is hard to ignore when an artist whose music you hate and/or whose persona you find to be completely repugnant has played an imperative role in the making of a film. Indeed, admittedly, to this day, I refuse to watch any film featuring the Beatles and I probably never will, but then again I am glad I did not let my decided dislike of Mick Jagger to stop me from watching Donald Cammell and Nicolas Roeg's gangster-meets-rocker counterculture masterpiece Performance (1970), which ultimately led me to somehow developing a smidgen of respect for the Rolling Stones singer for appearing in such an ambitious film, even if he is arguably one of the world's first proto-wiggers. Additionally, although I generally loathe musicals and do not think much of Pink Floyd and especially the film's star Bob Geldof, I somehow appreciated Pink Floyd's The Wall (1982) more than I could have ever possibly fathomed. Of course, I am still very hesitant about watching any film involving any sort of heavy collaboration between a filmmaker and a band or musician, so naturally I was initially not too keen on seeing a mostly forgotten British experimental short film that was made in collaboration with a somewhat boring proto-industrial group and directed by a longtime music video hack and TV commercial whore who is responsible for such best-selling workout videos as Cindy Crawford Shape Your Body Workout (1992) and Cindy Crawford: The Next Challenge Workout (1993), among various other exceedingly embarrassing monetary motivated projects that no true serious auteur could have ever churned out. Indeed, the 22-minute British avant-garde neo-noir Johnny YesNo (1982) directed by Peter Care is not exactly something I expected to be a substantial piece of cinema, but after watching it I now believe it is and I am somewhat startled by its relative obscurity, especially since it was somewhat recently released in 2011 as part of a two DVD/two CD box-set by Mute Records after being out of print since the early 1980s.

Notable for being a rare short film that had an original and fairly notable soundtrack specially created for it, Care's almost criminally neglected cult classic was scored by British proto-industrial group Cabaret Voltaire, who originally distributed the film through their own label Doublevision in 1983 in the form of a VHS that included two alternate edits of sequences from the flick as well as three aesthetically complimentary music videos. Admittedly, although I am fond of some industrial music and the various other genres that the band has been associated with over their fairly long career (interestingly, they started their career playing gigs with Joy Division), Cabaret Voltaire is not a group I have ever been particularly enamored with, yet their contribution to Johnny YesNo is comparable to that of Bobby Beausoleil and The Freedom Orchestra on Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972), tranny Wendy Carlos' Moog synthesizer interpretations of Beethoven for Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971), and John Carpenter's own score for Halloween (1978) in terms of adding an imperative extra aesthetic layer to overall film. Quite rightly compared to the films of David Lynch, including Loſt Highway (1997) and especially Mulholland Dr. (2001), in terms of themes, aesthetics, and motifs, Care's deliciously dystopian neo-noir is set in a sort of mythical and intentionally artificial looking Swinging Sixties urban hell that falls somewhere between the Eaſt London of the Kray twins and the pulp purgatory of Samuel Fuller flicks where vice reigns and nihilism is the sole collective faith of the forsaken populous. The feverishly foreboding tale of a rough and tough gangſter with a rather refreshingly masculine mind and persona who starts a heated romance with a cute waitress but then discovers the simultaneously literal and figurative woman of his dreams and then soon finds himself trapped in a hallucinatory living nightmare where all forms of perception come into question, Johnny YesNo is unequivocally one of the moſt preternaturally stylish neo-noir flicks ever made as a work that utilizes the cut-up technique of William S. Burroughs in a rare practical and rewarding way that makes the celluloid experiments of the queer junky novelist and his charming cocksucking comrade Antony Balch like Towers Open Fire (1963) and Bill and Tony (1972) seem like badly botched amateur attempts at kitchen sink realism by comparison. Indeed, with the possible exception of the kraut cyber-punk-noir Decoder (1984) directed by Muscha, Care's film certainly deserves its place in cinema history as the moſt aesthetically pleasing and aggressively atmospheric experimental neo-noir flick ever made and I say that as a less than enthusiastic viewer that originally thought it would be a boring chore to watch.

After featuring various beautiful night shots of Manchester city centre, including entrancing neon-lit signs of overtly sleazy looking places like Playboy's Manchester Casino Club, the film introduces the tall, dark, and handsome shadow-dwelling titular protagonist Johnny Yesno (Jack Elliott), who narrates in a sort of elegant calm and collected proletarian fashion, "Flashy nightclubs. Dirty little dives where you never see the light of day. Full of squares and creeps; the people on the make. For these are the places that women like to go to. You choose them or they choose you. Either way make sure the collar of your shirt isn't greasy. Buy the girl a drink. Let her talk about herself. You can have a lot of fun. Don't carry a lot around with you. When women dig you, you only need basics." From there, Johnny ſtands ſtoically in front of a neon-lit blue sign that reads "A Punch," which is probably the beſt way to describe the film's overall effect on the viewer as an unrelenting and unforgettable cinematic work that hits you hard, faſt, and out of nowhere. While riding around in a taxi while partially camouflaged by shadows and with his face all busted up and bloody, Johnny proceeds to directly tell the viewer about he got into his current precarious predicament, which involves an almost romantically schizophrenic association with two different stunning women, with the protagonist stating regarding the deluge of disappoint that has recently engulfed him, "Well, you think you got your life worked out. You think you're happy and then something sneaks up on you when you're not looking...and changes everything." As Johnny states regarding his first love interest, a sexy brunette name Lorraine (Jude Calvert-Toulmin), and her less than prestigious prole background, "I met her in a dirty little dive called Pyjama Tops serving drinks. Her name was Lorraine. She had a badge that said Sandy, but I knew it wasn't her real name. She just wasn't a Sandy. I didn't realize then that something must have clicked between us. We even slept together, which was kind of cozy if you know what I mean. I woke up with a sore neck, but what the hell...She was worth it." After a night of flesh-filled fun with Lorraine, Johnny makes sure to wake up before she does and then proceeds to stare at her while she is sleeping while standing in her generically girly pink kitchen where a literal douchebag is hanging on the wall. When Lorraine says to the protagonist while talking in her sleep, "Johnny, don't go. Don't leave me, Johnny," he seems to get scared because he immediately exits her home like he is attempting to avoid the plague. In fact, just as Johnny walks out of her house, Lorraine, declares, "Johnny, I love you," but the protagonist does not hear her in a scene that hints at the protagonist's fears in regard to starting a serious monogamous relationship with a woman. As the film will later reveal, it seems that Johnny thinks Lorraine is just too much of a Plain Jane for his cultivated tastes, as she does not fit his romantic view of the ideal dream lover. Indeed, underneath Johnny's extra hard exterior as a pathologically stoic man's man lies a hopeless romantic who dreams of the day when he discovers the woman of his dreams.

Although not exactly the most intricately articulate of fellows, Johnny does not mince words, especially when it comes to his deep-seated contempt for his city and its largely nocturnal inhabitants, or as he states directly to the viewer while seeming like Travis Bickle's more handsome and dignified British big brother, "I hate these nowhere places full of nobodies doing nothing. A lot of jerks on dope of one sort or another. I have to keep saying to myself, 'Don't take this shit...Keep the creeps out.' It's nice to get away from it all." Notably, Johnny gets "away from it all" by staying at fancy hotels with fancy females, or as he states in an unintentionally humorous fashion, "There's no better feeling than walking into your favorite hotel with a good-looking girl on your arm. Well, her personality counts, too. I like girls that are hip, get drunk, drive their own cars, keep their independence." While clearly obsessed with procuring dainty dames of the opulent sort who like cars and beer and who make him feel like the most potent and desirable of super studs, Johnny seems to have some mixed feelings about the women in his metropolitan hellhole as indicated by his somewhat paranoid and pessimistic remark, "Some of these chicks are quite attractive but I wouldn't go near them if I was you. They're all treated like animals. I don't know how they stand it. They're nothing, like life in general, only worse." Of course, Johnny does not follow his own advice and almost loses his life after getting involved with a sort of perfectly pale blonde diva who is more or less the personal property of one of the most powerful yet physically unimpressive fat cat gangsters in town.

After concluding his fairly negative rant about the dubious character of the women in his city, Johnny adds, "Anyway, to get back to the story. A couple weeks after I left Lorraine, I met the girl of my dreams." Indeed, while standing outside a luxury hotel one night, Johnny became entranced upon seeing an absurdly angelic blonde femme fatale (also Jude Calvert-Toulmin) that looks like a sort of Nordic version of Elizabeth Taylor arriving in a pink convertible with her small and borderline elderly sugar daddy. Naturally, after thinking to himself, "She was all the same shade, like an angel [...] She was the best looking girl in the world," gentleman Johnny cannot help but get into the mystery blonde's prestigious panties, even though she apparently has a powerful 'boyfriend' with dangerous connections, or as the protagonist narrates, "The clerk told me that the little guy was a local big noise. The Casanova Counselor, they called him. He had a fleet of flashy cars and a load of flashy blondes to go with them. This one was special though, he kept her in a room of her own, so I got her name and changed my shirt. When a chick digs your shirt, you're half-way home." Indeed, Johnny wastes no time in attempting to swoon the blonde and he immediately calls her upon going inside the hotel, but when she hangs up on him after he states, "This is Johnny Yesno in room 202 and I think you're beautiful. Do you think you'd?," things begin getting fairly strange for the protagonist. Somewhat curiously, only seconds after calling the blonde, Johnny gets a knock at his door and is startled to find a wounded Lorraine crying, "Oh, Johnny, they shot me," just before falling into the protagonist's arms. Immediately after laying Lorraine on his bed, an unseen figure hits Johnny from behind and knocks him out cold, thus sending the protagonist into a sort of nightmarish delirium of psychosexual pandemonium where reality and fantasy become particularly hard to discern, especially where his two love interests are concerned.

Indeed, in a sort of Burroughs-esque cut-up montage, various scenes from previous parts of the film are edited together in a delightfully deranged dream-like way that makes the viewer question whether or not anything that Johnny has experienced previously has really even happened or is instead the product of a wayward imagination. In this sort of psychedelic neo-noir montage that certainly seems like it aesthetically influenced aspects of Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986), Johnny hallucinates seeing the blonde walking inside the entrance of the hotel yet somehow ending up in Lorraine's kitchen where she admires herself in front of a small mirror near the glaring douchebag that is hanging next to her.

JOHNNY YESNO

When Johnny imagines Lorraine saying to him, “We’re in this together, don’t you see?” and then appearing in the kitchen in the same exact place where the blonde was just previously standing, he loses his stoic calm and collected essence and completely freaks out. During his paranoiac psychedelic bad trip, Johnny occasionally regains semi-consciousness and at one point he even notices that he has been strapped to a bedpost and has two large track marks on his arm as a result of the fact that a mysterious faceless figure is repeatedly injecting him with a dubious substance that seems to be largely responsible for his harrowing hallucinations and overall lack of consciousness. When Johnny finally awakes from his hypnotically hellish drug-induced purgatory, he finds himself lying on his back while all beaten up and bloody in a gravel quarry in the countryside, which ultimately proves to be all the more traumatizing for the conspicuously cocky city boy as he hates the country, or as he complains like some cowardly cosmopolitan pansy, “I hate the country, especially at night. You never know what you’re stepping into.”

Notably, when Johnny wakes up in the quarry and tries in vain to stand up while sliding down a steep gravel incline, the shot is seen from an extreme close-up of his traumatized face in a highly idiosyncratic and exceedingly ethereal scene that involved a specially designed camera rig device created by British experimental filmmaker Tony Hill (Floor Film, Downside Up) being attached to actor Jack Elliot’s body. It seems to take Johnny an entire day just to get out of the quarry, tread through the moorland, and over a couple of large hills before he finds any sign of civilization, thus underscoring his relative insignificance in the context of nature and the world as a whole, hence his fairly vocal loathing of the countryside. Indeed, upon reaching a gas station building, Johnny is so excited and jubilant after encountering a sign of post-industrial decay that he declares in a humorously pathetic way, “I found a wall. A beautiful white upright wall.” Needless to say, Johnny is fairly tired as a result of his journey and immediately falls to the ground upon grabbing the side of the building, but he is naturally temporarily rejuvenated when the blonde femme fatale and her sugar daddy randomly arrive at the gas station in the latter’s striking retro pink convertible. While the sugar daddy fills up his car with gas and inspects his engine, the blonde takes her beloved matching white pet poodle for a walk so that it can pee. Undoubtedly in no other film is there a scene where a protagonist stares so intently at someone while they are taking their dog for a piss as Johnny does in the film. While staring at the blonde from afar, Johnny has a hallucination about Lorraine’s bullet wound and then suffers what seems like a minor seizure. Needless to say, at this point, Johnny lacks the gall to approach the blonde while she is in the company of her overprotective sugar daddy, but he certainly does not give up there.

After the gas station scene where the eponymous protagonist has hit both literal and figurative rock bottom, Johnny wraps up his unhappy personal story by stating to the viewer, “I’ve gotta sort some of this mess out” and then the credits role. Somewhat absurdly after a couple seconds of credits, the viewer is treated to a seemingly intentionally absurd tacked-on twist happy ending in the vein of Blade Runner (1982) where Johnny and Lorraine are featured driving in a convertible while traveling to some sort of pastoral paradise in a pseudo-sappy scene juxtaposed with melodic Twin Peaks-esque music. After Johnny states, "It was a piece of cake" regarding his accomplish to "sort some of this mess out," Lorraine reveals that she is actually also the blonde femme fatale and that she was shot by her pimp the night that the protagonist called her from her hotel room, though she has no hard feelings about the situation as indicated by her remark, "While I was glad to get away, my sugar daddy was quite sweet, really." As for Johnny boy, he could not be better, or as he narrates like some sort of would-be-wise old grandfather, "I wanted it to last forever, that journey with Lorraine by my side, but only just figured it out. The girl, the girl in the game and the girl of my dreams were the same person. It was weird, weird and wonderful. We drove on, a million miles away from the lousy world we've grown so used to...and we had a good time. Sometimes life does you a favor and sometimes you have to help it along." Indeed, if only real-life was so preposterously perfect as the oh-so neatly packaged ending of Johnny YesNo, which even makes the signature pseudo-ideal conclusions of the melodramas of Douglas Sirk seem more genuinely optimistic by comparison.

On of being probably the greatest 'post-punk psychedelic film noir' ever made, Johnny YesNo ultimately feels like a sort of missing link from cinema history that arguably exposes that David Lynch is not as an original and innovative filmmaker as everyone thinks he is. Aside from the fact that Lynch is a well known fan of industrial music and would probably seek out a film with a soundtrack by Cabaret Voltaire (incidentally, not unlike director Peter Care, Lynch has also directed various commercials and musical videos during his career as revealed in the highly worthwhile German documentary The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money (1998) directed by Hermann Vaske and hosted by Dennis Hopper), the film's lead actress, Jude Calvert-Toulmin, who went on to become an erotic novelist, created a virtual online campaign to get Johnny YesNo recognized as the sort of secret father film to Mulholland Dr. Although I will not go into detail, I have to say that the aesthetic and thematic similarities between Care and Lynch's film are unmistakable to the point of being a severe annoyance. For whatever reason, Care would dedicate most of the rest of his career to directing music videos and tour videos for high-profile mainstream musicians like R.E.M., Bruce Springsteen, and Depeche Mode, though he did manage to churn out one fairly entertaining feature. Indeed, while not exactly featuring the innovative artistic integrity of Johnny YesNo, Care's long-awaited first feature The Dangerous Lives of Altar Boys (2002) starring Jodie Foster as a sadistic nun who gets off to punish teenage boys is notable for being a rare darkly comedic coming-of-age flick that makes various reference to William Blake (which is somewhat different to Johnny YesNo's references to W.S. Burroughs and J. G. Ballard). Of course, one can only imagine where Care's filmmaking career would have headed had he been given the money to pursue uncompromising cinematic works that challenged his talents, though I am sure there are those individuals that admire the fact that the filmmaker got the distinguished opportunity to direct Cindy Crawford while she was bending over in spandex pants.

Notably, for the release of the Johnny YesNo box-set released Mute Records (who apparently insisted that new film material be created for the release because they apparently felt no one would be interested in purchasing such an 'old' film), Care directed a sort of digital remake of the film entitled Johnny Yesno Redux (2008), which superficially follows the storyline of the original film and features some new remix tracks by Cabaret Voltaire. While I think the remake is a piss poor pile of deplorable digital diarrhea that makes it seem like Care lost any artistic talent that he originally had long ago, Johnny Yesno Redux is at least worth seeing as a double feature with the original film as it unwittingly insightfully exposes how much things have drastically morally, culturally, and artistically degenerate since the early 1980s. Aside from being shot in L.A. on a cheap HD camera instead of the North of England on 16mm film stock like the original film, the remake betrays the classic European beauty of its predecessor and stars a swarthy and scrawny Hebraic degenerate in the titular role and a trashy looking East Asian go-go dancer as the female lead in what ultimately resembles a sort of trashy third world porn flick. Undoubtedly while Johnny YesNo oftentimes give off the feeling of being a fairly enthralling and narcotizing nightmare, the remake is just plain irritating and aesthetically grating and thus is an ironically fitting portrait of contemporary times where sex and romance about as meaningful as drinking beer and vomiting. The remake is also hopelessly modern in the sense that it endorses the patently pathetic trend of yellow fever based miscegenation. To go back to Lynch one more time, Johnny Yesno Redux is ultimately to Johnny YesNo what Inland Empire (2006) is to Eraserhead (1977) and Blue Velvet (1986) as an aesthetically asinine and innately incoherent piece of unintentional self-parody of the decidedly dull digital age sort that highlights how lazy and unimaginative certain filmmakers have gotten over the past decade or so as a result of the digitization of 'cinema.'

An ecstatically eerie and almost erotically foreboding work of noir-ish phantasmagoria, Johnny YesNo seems like it could have been the sort of cinematic bible for filmmakers ranging from Darren Aronofsky to James Fotopoulos, but most importantly it is a cult film that actually manages to transcend its reputation in terms of quality. A rare dystopian work that references a mythical aesthetic and cultural past while simultaneously making predictions for a misleadingly future of soulless pseudo-utopianism where darkness his hidden behind sunshine, the malignantly moody and broody micro masterpiece was notably described by director Care in an interview with FACT Magazine as a sort of reaction to the sort of aesthetic sterility associated with cultural Marxist agitprop docs that were popular with young filmmakers of that time, or as the auteur said himself, "At that time the English independent film scene was full of really important work, most of it political: you know, documentaries about the Glasgow rent strike and that sort of thing, left-wing subjects. I was involved in some of that work and believed in it, but for my own self-expression I wanted to make something that was the diametric opposite – so partly JOHNNY YESNO was a reaction to what I saw as the norm. But I was fascinated anyway by the idea that you could make a film about psychology, as opposed to politics." Indeed, the film may have been co-penned by a card-carrying feminist, but it ultimately seems like a work of unintentionally neo-fascist film noir that endorses classic heterosexual monogamy and traditional rural living. Indeed, in its seemingly half-hearted attempt to criticize the classic archetypal masculine antihero associated with film noir history, the film gives off the impression of endorsing these admirable character traits, especially in an era where more sensible people are starved for stoic white men that actually act like men and are not the least bit concerned with some absurd left-wing social construct like so-called 'gender equality.' Indeed, while the conspicuously contrived twist happy ending of Johnny YesNo was obviously meant to mock such an implausible Hollywood-esque scenario, I ultimately found it rather refreshing in its failed quasi-cryptic-cynicism, especially since it still manages to illustrate the natural beauty of a handsome macho man and feminine beautiful woman being in a passionate and loving relationship with one another. Luckily, the remake Johnny Yesno Redux at least concludes with an unhappy ending where the Asian girl drives off and leaves the pathetic Jew boy behind. Undoubtedly the best compliment that I can pay the film is that it is probably the closest thing to a 1980s equivalent to Cammell and Roeg's Performance as a work that takes an almost metaphysical approach to reflecting the particular zeitgeist and counterculture it was made within, with Cabaret Voltaire arguably being at the forefront of these aesthetic changes, at least musically speaking. Of course, one could easily argue that it is quite fitting that Johnny YesNo director Peter Care went on to become a music video director instead of a feature filmmaker as it indicative of the birth of MTV, the death of British experimental cinema, and the waning of the intelligence and attention-span of the average viewer. Not surprisingly, after reading various reviews, I discovered that many contemporary viewers find Care's film to be quite baffling, thus guaranteeing the film will remain a cult oddity that will probably only be remembered by hardcore Cabaret Voltaire fans and the occasional oddball cinephile.

Peter Cohen (1998)

I have read most of the definitive works regarding the history and theory of eugenics, so I was pleased to receive a copy of the 1998 documentary Homo Sapiens 1900 directed by Peter Cohen; a work that describes the various eugenic programs that were practiced throughout Europe and the United States during the first half of the twentieth century. Homo Sapiens 1900 also takes a look at the Soviet Union's opposition to Mendel's theory of heredity; a science that was at odds with the political ideology of the plutocratic communist super state. Sir Francis Galton, half-cousin of Charles Darwin, is generally considered the pioneer of eugenics. Galton felt that with eugenics, man could pull out the "weeds" (which he felt were growing at much faster rate than "cream of the crop" genetics lines) out of the flower bed of humanity. Of course, eugenics was discredited after the defeat of National Socialist Germany during the conclusion of World War II, thus dying in its infancy as a science. In Homo Sapiens 1900, a general overview pertaining to the history of eugenics is presented in a cold and emotionless manner, no doubt complimenting the inhumane approach scientists and governments would take against individuals after eugenic programs were incorporated during the early part of the twentieth century.

With the rediscovery of Austrian monk Gregor Mendel's (who was ignored during his time) science of genetics during the early 1900s, came a popular interest in bettering the human race by the way of eugenics. When I was in college, my Biology professor mentioned on the first day of class that Charles Darwin owned a copy of the original scientific journal that featured the genetic theories of Mendel. Had Darwin actually read Mendel's work, he would have concocted a more intricate and full-proof theory of evolution, but I digress. Scientists were not the only public figures interested in eugenics; poets, philosophers, and painters also saw much hope in the new sciences, as they felt it was capable of accelerating the evolution of mankind. In Homo Sapiens 1900, various völkisch drawings by the mostly forgotten German symbolist artist Fidus are presented as evidence that leading artists of the twentieth century had also been put under the spell of eugenic-obsessiveness. As shown in the documentary, Fidus created a variety of drawings featuring nude Aryan ubermensch. Ironically, Fidus' work, as well as his nudist ethic, would later be discovered and utilized by psychedelic hippie artists of the late 1960s. In the United States, eugenics started to gain notice in a rather odd and downright peculiar manner. Near the beginning of Homo Sapiens 1900, you viewer is exposed to clips from the 1916 film The Black Stork; a documentary-like work featuring real-life American doctor Harry J. Haiselden as he refuses to perform surgery on a deformed baby (which eventually dies). During the early twentieth century, in an attempt to preserve the best Nordic bloodlines, America, Sweden, and Germany created laws forcing sterilization on those individuals that were deemed not fit to breed. Of course, as modern indigenous population growth statistics in Germany and Sweden testifying to, the state-sanctioned eugenic goal of securing racial purity would prove to be in vain. Oswald Spengler, arguably the last great German thinker, once stated (despite his belief in race as a biological phenomenon) that, "Those who talk too much about race no longer have it in them." Interestingly enough, in Spengler's final work Hour of Decision (which was later banned in Nazi Germany), the philosopher (who argued against the Nazi's materialistic view of race) essentially predicted the "how", "why", and "when" in regard to the Third Reich's defeat.

By: Fidus

The real value of Homo Sapiens 1900 is that it acts as a sound outline for studying the brief history of eugenics. The documentary also features various forgotten German racial theorist, such as eugenicist Hans F.K. Günther and Leonard Conti (the Swiss-Italian "Reich Health Leader" of the Third Reich), as well as the anti-eugenic "scientists" of the Soviet Union. Homo Sapiens 1900 dedicates a good amount of time to Trofim Lysenko, the director of biology under Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin. Inspired by Lamarckism (a discredited pseudo-science that emphasizes environmental influence on genetic inheritance), Lysenko designed a pseudo-scientific "socialist biology" which supported the communist creed that humans, being property of the state, were malleable automatons that could be socially engineered to do anything. As explained near the conclusion of Homo Sapiens 1900, Lysenko had his opponents (especially those who agreed with Mendel's theories) lined up and liquidated via a firing squad. If a person needs evidence that science can be completely warped to fit the political agenda of the state and/or scientist, the life of Trofim Lysenko makes for a perfect example. After watching Homo Sapiens 1900, it will be apparent to the viewer that man, whether he be a Hitlerite or Trotskyite, will always fail in attempting to bolster the evolutionary fate of mankind. Who knows what will result from the modern experiment of "globalization." I wholeheartedly agree with the sentiment (featured near the conclusion of Homo Sapiens 1900) that a man can only be judged by his accomplishments; not from fruits of another man that just happens to be of the same race (although one should take pride in their ethnic culture). If a person were to judge eugenics by its accomplishments, one would soon realize why it has been naturally weeded out. Instead of reversing occidental decline as foreseen by Oswald Spengler, eugenics (with the help of unpredictable technology) has only sped up the process. THE HAUNTING IN CONNECTICUT
THE HAUNTING IN CONNECTICUT

Peter Cornwell (2009)

Boo! It's a ghost! Or even worse!!! MANY GHOSTS (AND THEY HAVE NO EYELIDS!!!!). Ghosts are a fun thing to be fascinated and afraid of as a child. I remember watching Tobe Hooper's (or more like Steven Spielberg's) Poltergeist and thinking it was one of the scariest yet greatest movies ever made. Now I just think the film is mildly entertaining in a nostalgic sort of way. Other than Poltergeist and Stanley Kubrick's masterpiece The Shining, I cannot think of any other ghost film that ever interested me, which I believe is a shame. Why can't some half competent filmmaker direct a decent ghost flick? Better yet, why did I bother watching The Haunting in Connecticut? I watched The Haunting in Connecticut because I wanted to appease a young and beautiful lady. Also, one cannot forget that marvelous mad dog mAQ was once again able to use his deviant magic and get us into the film screening free of charge. Aside from another couple, my lady friend and I were the only two in the theater. I must admit the vacant atmosphere was perfect for seeing a horror and especially a ghost film. It is great being at a movie theater screening without having to deal with a loud-mouthed virtual gang (or real gangs) of noisy would-be rappers. Seeing as The Haunting in Connecticut was a ghost film, I can now understand how a group of rebels in white ghostlike costumes used to scare the Negro population. I guess the only thing that can scare a spook is a spook. Unfortunately, The Haunting In Connecticut was not the type of film that could scare a cracker unless we're talking about those spiritual types. Before seeing The Haunting in Connecticut, I watched a Discovery channel documentary on the "true story." Yes, believe it or not, a real teenager with cancer and his family was haunted by ghosts. The house that the family moved into used to be a mortuary. Unsurprisingly, the family at first believed that the boy with cancer hallucinated his visions of ghosts due to the drugs (which cause hallucinations as a side effect) he was taking. When the real "victims" of ghosts appear on the documentary, they're in the dark so no one can see what they look like. When they talk, it is apparent that this family is the "true believer" spiritual type that is afraid of using their intellect. Sort of like when you're a child and you can trick your mind into believe things that are kind of cool at that early age yet pathetic if you're older than 13 years old. The family featured in the movie The Haunting in Connecticut seem to be up about ½ a knot in intelligence. So what does the film The Haunting in Connecticut have to offer? It has a bunch of flickering editing (during the sepia vintage séance scenes) that is kind of fun in the movie theater (but will probably lose most of it's power on DVD). Other than that, nothing else really stuck out except maybe the Robert De Niro look-a-like that played a terminally ill minister. The Haunting in Connecticut is a fairly banal modern ghost story that can be compared to a barely lit candle that attempts to flicker but instead burns out. But then again, with a film like The Haunting in Connecticut what could one actually expect?

BROKEN GODDESS

Peter Dallas (1973)

Out of all the drag queen superstars that worked with Paul Morrissey and Andy Warhol, Holly Woodlawn (Trash, Scarecrow in a Garden of Cucumbers) is the only one who managed to live long enough to become middle-aged (in fact, s/he is still alive today and well into her 60s). While fellow tranny superstar Jackie Curtis made for an even less believable woman than Divine did, and Candy Darling would have easily passed as a member of the fairer sex were it not for his/her pesky cock, Ms. Woodlawn fell somewhere in between her Women in Revolt (1972) co-stars in terms of genuine female physical features. Despite Woodlawn's sub-homely appearance, some goofy gay filmmaker actually had the gall to direct a film where the tranny attempted to recapture the spirit of silent screen divas like Gloria Swanson and Theda Bara. Of course, unlike many of Warhol's superstars, Woodlawn was fairly decent at acting and Hollywood Golden Age auteur George Cukor (The Philadelphia Story, My Fair Lady) even attempted to petition the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences for her to be nominated for 'Best Actress' for her decidedly degenerate gender-bending performance in Paul Morrissey's Trash (1970). Indeed, the 20-minute black-and-white silent short Broken Goddess (1973) directed by one-time auteur 'Dallas' stars Woodlawn as a majorly melancholy dude-goddess of the quasi-Gothic sort who does a bunch of melodramatic stares and poses, as if s/he is the only pseudo-girl left in the world. The closest thing to an aesthetic marriage between the films of Kenneth Anger and Werner Schroeter (in fact, the film is rather reminiscent of Eaux d'Artifice (1953), albeit the Anger flick features an Italian midget as opposed to a Puerto Rican American tranny), Broken Goddess features homo high-camp hysterics for sure, so I can only recommend the work to the already initiated, as it lacks the cheap quasi-scatological anti-feminist laughs of a film like Women in Revolt. Featuring Woodlawn wearing what auteur Dallas described as a "Western Kabuki" (a makeup style combining elements of Greek tragedy, pop art, and silent cinema aesthetics) on her face, Broken Goddess actually manages to do a little more than simply parrot the essence of the silent era, as a work that is equally aesthetically repugnant as it is strangely exquisite. As to why Dallas would do something so seemingly anachronistic as make a silent movie, the director once confessed: "Why, some people asked, a silent movie? Having had no education beyond New York City public high school (and that counts for nothing), I figured the best place to start directing great motion pictures was at the beginning. And move forward from there. Nice and simple; a one-character one-reeler. That's where D.W. Griffith started. And Mack Sennett. and Charlie Chaplin.." Shot during a series of twelve mornings (from 4 a.m. to 7 a.m.) that spanned a two month period at Bethesda Fountain in Central Park, NYC, Broken Goddess may not be up to par with D. W. Griffith's Broken Blossoms or The Yellow Man and the Girl (1919) starring Lillian Gish, but it is surely not bad for a work where the star was oftentimes drunk on the set and was paid for his performance with a mere bottle of wine (little Gallo port to be exact).

Almost entirely in slow-motion, Broken Goddess features probably no more than 5 minutes of actual footage that has been slowed down to create a reasonably poetic effect similar to that of Derek Jarman's hallucinatory neo-Shakespearean masterpiece The Angelic Conversation (1985). Of course, there is no one-on-one conversations in Dallas' film, as Woodlawn merely talks to herself in an absurdly lovelorn fashion that is communicated via elegant inter-titles. In fact, the inter-titles are actually derived from song lyrics written by Jewish-Polish-Italian-American singer/songwriter Laura Nyro. In terms of a score, the film includes classic impressionist compositions by French composer Achille-Claude Debussy, who also, somewhat coincidentally, influenced Nyro. Opening with the inter-title, "Love and despair, reminders that we are man, child and woman. For, in the private most hours dares there among you one who will make distinction between himself and the world?," Broken Goddess then features the eponymous protagonist as played by Ms. Woodlawn walking slowly down a set of stairs while sporting a tattered black dress, as if s/he had just been raped, beaten, and left to die, or so one might assume due to his deathly depressed demeanor and rather ghost-like fashion of moving. Undoubtedly, the Central Park of Dallas' film more resembles an ancient Gothic graveyard than some unpleasant concrete jungle in NYC where cocksuckers go cruising. In between scenes of Woodlawn looking like a wounded animal while striking preposterous poses around the fountain and absurd inter-titles like, "Now the tears in the gutter are flooding the sea...Why was I born?," topless glamour shots of the Warhol superstar in a silky white dress appear, as if to demonstrate what the sad she-male looked like before suffering abject heartbreak. In the end, flaming creature Woodlawn walks up the same set of stairs that she walked down at the beginning of the film, thus Broken Goddess comes full-circle in the end, as if the character had finally found some sort of peace. Indeed, there might be hope for this seemingly hopeless tranny.

In his book Joe Dallesandro: Warhol Superstar, Underground Film Icon, Actor, writer Michael Ferguson noted regarding Holly Woodlawn: "She appeared in a few other low-budget films on the heels of TRASH, including SCARECROW IN A GARDEN OF CUCUMBERS (1972) and BROKEN GODDESS (1973), before famously telling a lamely inquisitive Geraldo Rivera in 1976, who wanted to know WHAT she was, that it didn't make any difference "as long as you look fabulous." Gracious and much sought after for years on the film festival circuit, she's inevitably queried about working with Joe [Dallesandro]." Indeed, aside from brief cameos in a couple of Rosa von Praunheim documentaries, including Tally Brown, New York (1973), as well as a small non-sexual role as a lounge singer in Armand Weston's pornographic take on Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray, Take Off (1978), Woodlawn would not act in another film until the 1990s. Undoubtedly, in terms of Woodlawn films, you cannot find one that is classier and more cultivated than Broken Goddess, as it seems to be the one rare cinematic example where the dude-diva is taken terribly seriously. As for auteur Dallas, he apparently attempted to make a mainstream all-female comedy after releasing the silent short, but the studios were only interested in all-male buddy films (i.e. Steve McQueen and Dustin Hoffman; Paul Newman and Robert Redford; Al Pacino and Gene Hackman) and had no use for a work about a bunch of campy fag hags, so he never made another film, stating, "If I was ready for Hollywood, Hollywood sure wasn't ready for me. So I tended bar, wrote for magazines, painted silks for Halston." Whether they are completely conscious of it or not, most people have heard of Woodlawn via Lou Reed's 1972 hit song "Walk on the Wild Side," as s/he is the person mentioned at the very beginning of the song ("Holly came from Miami, FLA..."). Undoubtedly, Broken Goddess demonstrates that Woodlawn came a long way since that truly life-changing day when s/he, "Plucked her eyebrows on the way... Shaved her legs and then he was a she." Indeed, if nothing else, Broken Goddess is a celluloid enigma that reminds me more than any other film why I will never be able to wrap my head around the fact that certain people with penises have a more innate desire to be dreamy 'divas' than most authentic women do.

ADAM /& YVES

Peter De Rome (1974)

As far as rare porn flicks that are drenched in shameless yet distinctly cultivated cinephilia, you probably cannot do better than the Franco-America homo hardcore flick Adam & Yves (1974) directed by French-born yet British-bred avant-garde auteur-pornographer Peter De Rome (The Fire Island Kids, Prometheus). Indeed, a sort of hardcore homo reworking of Bernardo Bertolucci's erotic art-house magnum opus Last Tango In Paris (1972) made in partial homage to cine-magician Jean Cocteau 'starring' Swedish silent screen diva Greta Garbo in her last (and ultimately unauthorized) film appearance and featuring a nasty little nod to Blaxploitation and even an obfuscated hyper-homoerotic 'tribute' to Leni Riefenstahl, De Rome's first feature-length film is a cinephiliac mongrel of a movie that reeks of cinema history just as it does of urine-and-cum-drenched pissouirs. Produced by fellow auteur-pornographer/producer Jack Deveau, who also directed an artsy fartsy fuck flick in the capital of Frogland entitled Le musée (1974) aka Strictly Forbidden that same year, Adam & Yves depicts the brief and strictly anonymous "no strings attached" love affair between an American 'agfay' and a fairy Frenchman in Paris. In fact, De Rome would describe the work, which was originally titled 'Etoile,' in his memoir The Erotic World of Peter de Rome (1982) as being more or less a porn flick where virtually every scene is a tribute and/or parody of another film, writing: "The first episode is when he meets a young Frenchman in an unfurnished apartment in circumstances strangely similar to LAST TANGO IN PARIS. From then on, each of their adventures has its film parallel, and it becomes a guessing game to discover which film they are 'playing' – from a new and startling view of QUEEN CHRISTINA to an erotic extreme in black exploitation movies; from the extension of Le Sang d'un Poète already described to a discreet voyeur witnessing one of the more singular charms of the bourgeoisie." On top of cleverly synthesizing cinephilia with cocksucking, Adam & Yves is also quite notable due to its decidedly degenerate depiction of Paris as a historically fucked fetish-ridden nether-realm where proletarian perverts dip bread into piss and eat it as a delicacy (according to De Rome, this is a real French tradition that is referred to as "baba du pauvre") and old men snatch up the discarded cum-covered tissues of fat old prostitute as if they have discovered gold. Partially inspired by De Rome's experiences in Paris 25 years before, "the era of the Left Bank, Jean-Paul Sartre and Juliette Greco, students in black and the flowering of the Flore," had changed everything for the more socio-politically and aesthetically degenerate, Adam & Yves might seem like a curious mess of a 'Doran Love' blue movie today, but it is certainly one of the most ambitious, inventive, intelligent, and groundbreaking porn flicks ever made.

Aberrosexual blond Aryan American Adam (played by Michael Hardwick, whose sole other film credit is Boy-napped (1975) co-starring hetero-flexible Hebrew Jamie Gillis) is on vacation in Paris and he loves swarthy frog fellows, but he also complains, “You French guys are all alike...just love them and leave them...isn’t that about it?!” Like the two heterosexual leads of Last Tango In Paris, Adam meets and ultimately buggers his swarthy sub-Europid quasi-lover Yves (Marcus Giovanni) one day in an abandoned apartment and they have been anonymous fuck buddies ever since, as the French fellow finds serious personal relationships—be they sexual or otherwise—to be too “difficult” and refuses to even tell the ever inquisitive American his real name. While Yves proudly professes that he feels like “getting away from people,” extroverted yank Adam feels like “getting closer to them,” hence the dubious status of their romantic relationship. Despite not revealing much about himself, Yves is eager to expose rather repellant French culinary traditions, including a shocking scenario that Adam witnesses where an old frog practices the “old French custom” (a practice that apparently dates back to the 1920s that De Rome once lovingly described as “the poor man’s rum baba”) of dipping his long phallic-like loaf of baguette in the fermenting juices of a ‘pissoir’ (a sort of fancy urban public urinal that was invented by the French and is quite common in Europe cities) so that his bread has more flavor. While Yves reveals a lot to Adam about Paris, the American also describes his experiences as a New Yorker, especially in regard to a special, “day for a lay when the air smelled like a locker room. A day to blow or get blow” when he met a random half-brain-dead 24-year-old ½ Polish/½ Irish mechanic named Bud (played by the hero of Deveau’s 1974 cocksucking cult classic Drive) whose “tower of power” he delicately blew. Indeed, like his French buddy, Adam is certainly a fellow that will very likely acquire gay cancer in the next decade or so.

Upon visiting the grave of the debauched Irish dandy poet Oscar Wilde, Yves proclaims to Adam like a truly hopeless queen, “Friendship is so difficult. So delicate. I’m single and have no friends. Only lovers, like poor Oscar Wilde.” The two lovers also demonstrate their sense of solidarity with the Wilde quote, “For his mourners will be outcast men and outcasts always mourn.” Naturally, the two friends also visit the tomb of French poet/cine-magician Jean Cocteau and Adam asks, “Wasn’t it Cocteau who compared France to a cock crowing on a garbage dump?,” to which his French boy toy replies, “no, a dung heap. Take-away the dung and the cock dies.” Upon taking a pilgrimage to the 11th century Chapelle Saint-Blaise des Simples in Milly-la-Forêt, which Cocteau covered with murals and was buried in as per as personal wishes, Adam looks through a keyhole in a scene in tribute to The Blood of a Poet (1930) aka Le Sang d’un Poète and spots a young Nordic Narcissus (played by Bill Young, who starred in Deveau’s Le musée, as well as De Rome’s second feature The Destroying Angel) masturbating for about ten minutes or so in a scene of pure body worship reminiscent of Leni Riefenstahl’s 1938 masterpiece Olympia (quite notably, De Rome cited Riefenstahl as one of his influences in the 2011 documentary Fragments: The Incomplete Films of Peter De Rome). Later that night, Adam and Yves play a movie-guessing game quite similar to the one played by the three protagonists of Bertolucci's The Dreamers (2003) where they act out scenes from old movies. After Yves acts out a scene from the Pre-Code Hollywood flick Queen Christina (1933) starring Greta Garbo and directed by Armenian-American director Rouben Mamoulian, Adam describes how he once spotted the Swedish-born silent diva walking around NYC (indeed, Greta Garbo was shot by De Rome without her knowledge from top of a roof), stating of the experience, "It was one of the most exciting moments of my life...A living legend walking along First Avenue in New York."

In an undeniably iconic scene leading up to most daringly degenerate segment of Adam & Yves, the two eponymous protagonists drive past movie theatre marquees for various Blaxploitation flicks, including Shaft (1971), Hell Up in Harlem (1973), The Legend of Nigger Charley (1972), The Mack (1973), and Five on the Black Hand Side (1973), among various others, as well as a shot of a billboard of the director's very own 8-film compilation work The Erotic Films of Peter De Rome (1973). Set to the negrophiliac tribal beats, the Blaxploitation theatre marquee montage then cuts to a vomit-worthy black orgy in an extra-cramped public restroom, of which De Rome described as follows in his memoir: "For the black orgy scene in ADAM & YVES [...] I had engaged fifteen actors, but being very much aware of the exigencies of the situation, I was going to take no chances. So on the way over to shoot the scene (which took place in the men's room of the Lincoln Art Theater), I approached two hustlers on Third Avenue and asked them if they'd like to earn some easy bucks. They were both ready and willing, and my foresight paid off because five of my original fifteen failed to show and I was left with twelve, which is just about what I wanted – and quite enough to cope with in the confines of a 'can'." After the genuinely bestial and equally revolting spade gang-screw, Adam prepares to go back to NYC and says his goodbyes to Yves by melodramatically remarking "drive off" and "don't look back." After dropping off Adam at an airport, Yves spots an extra-mature Hooker of the rather overweight sort giving a blowjob to an equally fat and old bastard. After the Hooker finishes giving a hummer, she immediately spits the john jism in her mouth into a tissue, which is soon found by an elderly Hobo who is quite exhilarated by his major biological find. In the end, Adam & Yves concludes with the repeating of best line of dialogue from the two protagonists: "Wasn't it Cocteau who compared France to a cock crowing on a garbage dump? [...] No, a dung heap. Takeaway the dung and the cock dies." Indeed, De Rome seems to be saying that both fags and frogs need feces to survive.

Although never mentioning her by name, auteur Peter De Rome would describe his encounter with Greta Garbo that was used for his first feature as follows in his memoir: "Certain real-life situations provided me with scenes throughout the film, in fact. For many years in New York I lived very near a certain very celebrated and solitary lady who I'm sure would prefer to remain anonymous. I would sometimes see her out for a lonely walk and couldn't resist the opportunity of getting some footage one day when she was passing my house on First Avenue. This I was able to incorporate into the film in a scene which recalls the famous 'touching' scene in QUEEN CHRISTINA. So that any filmography now would hardly be complete without her return to the screen in ADAM & YVES!" Interestingly, as the director explained in the documentary Fragments: The Incomplete Films of Peter De Rome (2011) directed by Ethan Reid, he planned to do a gay version of the classic MGM Edmund Goulding movie Grand Hotel (1932) entitled Grand Motel starring kraut queer sex icon Peter Berlin in the role that was originally played by Garbo. Indeed, make no mistake about it, De Rome was not only in love with Golden Age Hollywood, but cinema history in general, with Adam & Yves featuring one of the most bizarrely eclectic collection of film references in cinema history (who else would combine Cocteau with Shaft?!), thereupon demonstrating that Quentin Tarantino's post-modern fanboy filmmaking gimmick is nothing new, as the little known British bum bandit with an even more unhealthy obsession with jigaboos was doing this decades before the Kill Bill director gave up his career working at a video rental store and began shoving incessant insipid exploitation film references in people's faces. Indeed, I suspect Adam & Yves would be much better known today if it were a simple (and straight) sexploitation flick as opposed to a full-blown blow-boy blue movie. Four years after the release of Adam & Yves, French auteur Jacques Scandelari (Beyond Love and Evil, Monique) would reverse the scenario of De Rome's film for his work New York City Inferno (1978), which is a much darker flick that anticipates William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) where a Frenchman heads to NYC to look for his boyfriend in the homo underworld and ultimately finds himself engulfed in an absurdly sleazy and scummy leather-fag Sodom. Of course, with his second and dramatically more ominous feature The Destroying Angel, De Rome demonstrated that he was just as proficient at cinematically defiling Poe as he was of Cocteau, but one would not expect anything less from the "grandfather of gay porn."

THE DESTROYING ANGEL

Peter De Rome (1976)

Aside from a handful of works directed by daring (and, in some cases, deranged) filmmakers like Jonas Middleton (Illusions of a Lady, Through the Looking Glass), Stephen Sayadian aka 'Rinse Dream' (Nightdreams, Café Flesh), Curt McDowell (Thundercrack!), and Michael Zen (Falconhead, Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters), there only a handful of avant-garde/arthouse horror porn flicks that have blessed this dark and depraved world, so naturally I always keep a lookout for similarly works themed from this rather idiosyncratic and somewhat inexplicable style of filmmaking. Recently, upon reading about the death of English avant-garde auteur-pornographer Peter De Rome on 21 June 2014 at the rather senile age of 89, I also learned that the fiercely fetishistic filmmaker directed an experimental hardcore homo horror flick entitled The Destroying Angel (1976), which was based on Edgar Allan Poe's 1839 doppelgänger-themed short story William Wilson (which was also loosely adapted by German filmmakers Stellan Rye and Hanns Heinz Ewers in 1913 as the silent horror flick The Student of Prague aka Der Student von Prag, as well as by Louis Malle in 1968 for the three segment omnibus film Spirits of the Dead aka Histoires extraordinaires) and borrowed its title from Luis Buñuel's Mexican surrealist masterpiece The Exterminating Angel (1962). As a man who worked as a publicist for David O. Selznick and even worked on Carol Reed's masterpiece The Third Man (1949) and Vittorio De Sica's Terminal Station (1953) aka Stazione Termini, De Rome was not exactly the typical gay pornographer as a cultivated and worldly man who began making short avant-garde porn flicks during the mid-1960s for the mere personal pleasure and never expected that he would develop any sort of reputation among art fags and more cultivated porn addicts. After hooking up with fellow auteur-pornographer/producer Jack Deveau (Left-Handed, Drive), De Rome released eight of his shorts under the title The Erotic Films of Peter De Rome and achieved success among both art and porn crowds, thus leading him to directing his first X-rated feature Adam & Yves (1974) which, on top of being more or less a gay take on Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris (1972) and being heavily influenced by Jean Cocteau, is also notable for being the last film to feature silent screen diva Greta Garbo. Indeed, due to the fact that De Rome stalked Ms. Garbo around NYC and filmed the reclusive actress against her own will from a rooftop, she would ultimately unwittingly conclude her acting career by unknowingly appearing in a 3-minute scene in a gay porn flick that was made some 30+ years after her last role in George Cukor's Two-Faced Woman (1941). For his second feature, which like Adam & Yves was produced by Deveau, De Rome decided to mix leather-fags, psychedelic mushrooms, Christian guilt, and a tinge of fascistic imagery for a perversely potent, if not somewhat incoherent, mix of hardcore Poe-esque pornography that will certainly be a more of interest to fans of avant-garde horror than horny homos looking for a cheap squirt 'n' spurt aid. Directed by a man who beared a strikingly physical resemblance to Poe, De Rome's film is, if nothing else, probably the most demented and deranging depiction of a minister's degeneration into sexually depraved personal purgatory of hallucinatory homo orgies, deleterious doubles, quasi-demonic golden showers, rectum-reaming cucumbers, and less than saintly seed spilling.

Caswell Campbell (Timothy Kent) is a sexually inverted minister who has been in the seminary for two years and one day makes the major mistake of taking a break from his religious studies to put into practice his undying fantasies for male flesh and exotic hallucinogenic mushrooms (notably, the books The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross by John Allegro and Soma: Divine Mushroom of Immortality by R.G. Wasson heavily inspired De Rome's screenplay). Upon taking his sod sabbatical, novice cocksucker Caswell decides to head to a shadowy and equally sleazy NYC leather-fag bar in the sadomasochistic spirit of William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) where he meets a meaty philistine biker buck named Bud (Bill Young) who, being a full-blow degenerate of the morally retarded sort, is proud of the fact that he shares the same name as the crappy America beer. Naturally, curious Caswell reluctantly takes Bud back to his pad near the Brooklyn Bridge, which is adorned with religious and icons, as well as a portrait of Edgar Allen Poe instead of Jesus Christ (indeed, it is quite apparent that something is a little off about the poof protagonist). After Bud insults minister's religious devotion and sexual performance and subsequently leaves his dimly lit apartment, Caswell confronts his double/doppelganger (who his identical from the minister aside from having a bigger cock and much more mangy hair) and for whatever decides to slowly devour a small red mushroom that he has magically found on a small nightstand near his bed. Before Caswell knows it, the mushroom, which he assumes to be a Fly Agaric (Amanita muscaria), has sent him into a surrealist sodomite nightmare where he becomes the passive victim in a golden shower orgy involving a brigade shirtless beefy beefcakes sporting tight denim jeans. Needless to say, Caswell is somewhat troubled by the entire experience of being ritualistically pissed on by a gang of fag phantoms with big pricks.

After his ugly phantasmagoric night of ritualistic communal urination, Caswell goes by a friend's house who, for whatever reason, has both a Jewish menorah, as well as a painting of a young Aryan twink wearing an Iron Cross necklace, hanging up in his loft. Needless to say, Caswell meets a dimwitted yet sexually eager twink (Philip Darden) at the party and brings him back to his Brooklyn flat where the two take shrooms and suck cocks. While literally tripping balls, Caswell's debauched doppelganger abruptly appears and gets in the middle of the sexually aberrant action. Indeed, Caswell watches in horrified amazement as his kinky double grins sadistically while being anally reamed by the minister's twinkish one-night-stand-man. After the plodding phantom threesome, Caswell decides he needs a break from his spiritual cramp and heads to the beach for a rather lonely vacation of would-be-holy serenity where he even turns down a muscular Mediterranean man for sex. Of course, the debauched doppelganger is not happy about this and appears while Caswell is shaving to tell the minister that, "I'm the air you breathe...the blood in your veins." After also telling Caswell that he is his "Angel of Light" (but that he can also destroy him), the doppelganger coerces the mentally perturbed minister into getting with the Mediterranean beach boy, who ultimately shoves cucumbers, bananas, and other quasi-phallic items in his holy manhole. In the end, Caswell realize that he was not taking Fly Agaric after all but the similar looking but quite poisonous mushroom Amanita virosa (or "Destroying Angel," hence the title of the film) and that he will soon die as there is not antidote. Clearly enraged as a young minister who has spent his remaining days living in hardcore sin and only has a couple hours to live, Caswell murders his doppelganger by stabbing him to death through a Cocteau-esque mirror. Dressed in monk-like religious garb, Caswell, who has somehow inherited his alter ego's mighty phallus, fiercely masturbates onto his own grave, thus spilling his seed onto the ground, which sinks into the earth and produces Amanita muscaria.

Not one to play around with puffery in regard to his own films, auteur Peter De Rome wrote regarding the somewhat spastic narrative of The Destroying Angel in his memoir The Erotic World of Peter de Rome (1982): "If not all of this is apparent to the casual viewer of the film, it is partly due to insufficient development of the theme on my part, and partly because the film was undershot, leaving our very creative editor, Bob Alvarez, with a difficult problem which he brilliantly manage to disguised with some virtuosos effects." Indeed, Alvarez edited a number majorly masturbatory jump-cut montages for the film that give it a certain hyper hallucinatory, psychosexual psychedelic flare, as if the viewer has been sentenced to endure surreally sadistic sexual savagery in some sort of post-counter-culture homo Hades that is ruled over by Fred Halsted. Indeed, The Destroying Angel certainly demonstrates why alpha-Beat William S. Burroughs, who once wrote De Rome a letter of praise describing his own film ideas, described De Rome's work as "gassy- a real rarity." Unfortunately, it is quite clear while watching the film that the over-ambitious auteur did not get to fully realize his vision and thus was forced to extend what would have probably made for a nearly immaculate short film into a discernibly fractured work that is barely feature-length. Aside from the fact that De Rome was unable to shoot all the scenes he needed, the work is also apparently missing a scene featuring Peter Berlin. Indeed, Andy Warhol's 'painting assistant' Rupert Smith probably said it best when he described De Rome's hardcore horror feature as, "a mess but a masterpiece," as a work that is discernibly flawed yet is a totally singular and strangely effective piece of pernicious pornography that, indeed, despite what politically correct poofs say, proves that homo sex can be horrifying, especially for those the god-fearing sort. Due to the AIDS scare and various other personal reasons, De Rome decided to quit directing artful fuck flicks after The Destroying Angel, complaining in his memoir regarding the pathetic state of porn at the time: “Sadly, what passes now for pornography in movie house plays gay sex films I find infinitely tedious and depressing. Possibly I am in the minority and most people would rather watch graphic scenes of explicit sex no matter how badly filmed. I would rather not. And for this reason I have tended to be relatively unproductive in the last few years. It’s an age-old gripe, and may sound presumptuous, but until and unless I can make the sort of films I want to make, I am not interested in making any.” Indeed, one can only guess what De Rome would have accomplished had he been given a proper budget to work with, as The Destroying Angel features more authentic horror than anything ever created by a contemporary no-talent zionist psychopathic like Eli Roth. It should also be noted that The Destroying Angel was not the the director’s last celluloid excursion in horror, as De Rome went on to play a malicious yet terribly charming man-loving magician in Long Island-based exploitation auteur Nathan Schiff’s short Abracadaver! (2008), which was included with the 2012 BFI dvd release The Erotic Films of Peter De Rome, who strikes fear into a married homo-hating heterosexual man and proudly states, “Magic’s quite gay [...] How many female magicians do you know? It’s a bit of a boy’s club.”

On top of being one of the greatest homo hardcore horror flicks ever made, The Destroying Angel should be also noted for being a rare work that attempts to establish the controversial link between homosexuality and religious fanaticism. In his groundbreaking 1886 text Psychopathia Sexualis, revolutionary Teutonic psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing recognized that a rather large numbers of gays become seriously mystical-minded and spiritually devout, but more importantly, he recognized the common link between spirituality and sexuality, writing: “But this relationship between religious and sexual feeling also manifests itself on indisputably psychopathological territory. Let it suffice to point to the powerfully active sensuality in the case histories of many religious maniacs, to the colorful mixture of religious and sexual deliria, that is observed so often in psychoses (e.g. among maniacal females who think they are the mother of God and the bearer of God), but most especially in psychoses with a masturbatory basis; finally, let us point to the lustful, gruesome self-flagellation, wounds, self-emasculations, even crucifixions on the basis of a morbid sexual-religious feeling.” Indeed, before he became a highly influential hieromonk for the Russian Orthodox Church Outside Russia that had an immense spiritual and theological influence on the Occident, Seraphim Rose was a practicing sodomite who only gave up his vice after accepting Orthodoxy. Of course, the tragic protagonist of De Rome’s film was not nearly as strong of a man as Rose. Needless to say, I would not mind hearing Rose’s always provocative insights regarding a seemingly personal film like The Destroying Angel, as a work that somehow manages to create an aesthetically and thematically malevolent marriage between Poe, leather-faggotry, spirituality, and psychedelic mushrooms in a way in uniquely unhinged fashion that reeks of abject metaphysical malady.

INVITATION AU VOYAGE

Peter Del Monte (1982)

Like anyone, I like a good road movie, but finding one I have yet to see that catches my fancy has become a rather tedious task, so I do not exactly go hunting for them and prefer to allow them to fall into my lap. Knowing nothing about the film aside from the fact it was supposedly about a lurid incestuous love affair between fraternal twins, I decided to watch the French-Italian-German co-production Invitation au voyage (1982), a work based on a novel written by the relatively unknown French novelist Jean Bany that proved to not only be one of the most idiosyncratic road movies I have ever seen, but also a nicely nuanced piece that esoterically expresses the vapid essence of its particular zeitgeist. Directed by Italian auteur Peter Del Monte (Piso pisello aka Sweet Pea, Étoile aka Ballet), Invitation au voyage is a post-punk/death rock/new wave drenched work of laidback yet ominously off-beat celluloid poetry that, as demonstrated by the film's title, alludes to decadent French poet Charles Baudelaire, but also Siouxsie and the Banshees and Joan Jett. Despite winning the prize for the Best Artistic Contribution at the 1982 Cannes Film Festival and being a rare French cult arthouse flick to actually have a mainstream release in the United States (Sony Pictures put it out on VHS), Invitation au voyage has, rather unfortunately, faded into almost total obscurity like the hokey hairstyles featured in the film. A moody, melancholy, and even morbid road movie about incestuous twins—one male and one female—that might as well be doppelgangers were it not for having different genitals, Invitation au voyage unravels through a series of flashbacks what happens when a brother promises his sister he will make her “live again” if she were to ever die, which she does. Featuring a brother bathing his twin sis in a bathtub full of creamy white milk, an exquisite naked corpse in a cello case strapped on top of an antique Rolls Royce, and a curious corpse-like ‘protagonist’ who moves like a somnambulist as he internalizes and ultimately transsexualizes his innate incestuous feeling after his rock star sister dies in one of the most peculiar accidents of cinema history, Invitation au voyage, for better or worse, is a film about transformation and emasculation in the post-apocalyptic age of cultural degeneration.

As demonstrated by the fact that he puts the corpse of a naked woman in a cello case, loads and ties said makeshift coffin to his car, and drives away for a rather dubious road trip, loner Lucien Vallon (Laurent Malet) seems to be a lecherous lunatic and as the film Invitation au voyage progresses, this seems to be all the more true, but not in the manner that one initially assumes as he is not a psychopathic serial killer or a rapist, but a man with a rather unhealthy attachment to his sister that extends to incestuous necrophilia of the morbid milk fetishizing variety. As revealed later in the film, the naked dead girl is postmortem punkette Nina Scott (Corinne Reynaud), the more successful fraternal twin sister of Lu-

Lucien who has supported her brother both economically and emotionally with her music. As quite blatantly demonstrated in a flashback scene featuring the two totally unclad and embracing after coitus, Lucien and Nina were incestuous siblings, so when the 'female' half of the duo dies, it leaves the male half in a sort of existential pandemonium, which is tested during a road trip where the lovesick twin brother meets a number of individuals no less eccentric than himself who more or less unwittingly help him embrace his metamorphosis into a tranny weirdo who believes he has taken on the identity of his decidedly deceased sister. As twin sis Nina tells her brother regarding their rather close relationship sometime before she dies, "With us it's not the same. The others don't matter. No one but us understands," and, indeed, as Lucien will find out through his vaguely phantasmagoric odyssey through rural France in a Rolls Royce, no one can quite compare or even begin to act as a substitute for his sister. The first person Lucien meets on his trip is an exceedingly extroverted female kleptomaniac (Aurore Clément) who rather irks the mourning twin after she accidentally puts on his dead twin sister's black lipstick, thus inspiring the melancholy traveler to kick the stranger out of his car into the pouring rain of the night. By happenstance, Lucien later runs into the cutesy klepto at a bar and she tells him in a stereotypically French manner that he is "a phantom" and that he is "here without being here," which the half-dead man seems to take rather well and the two strangers, somewhat surprisingly, share carnal knowledge later that night. Of course, when Lucien notices the wind is blowing around the cello case containing his sister on his car, he has a rather senseless emotional freakout and pastes a number of Nina Scott flyers around the bar, thus leaving his klepto love interest in the dust. After running into two Norwegian truckers at a diner and helping them to translate a conversation with a French waitress, Lucien ultimately helps the two Nordic gentlemen get in the pants of the frisky frog waitress, so when the loner twin is run off the road by a group of delinquent teenagers, he receives help from the Nords get backing on the road and eventually goes his marginally merry way. After getting his car worked on at an auto repair shop, Lucien is met with a surprise when an elderly and seemingly half-senile geezer, who had hid inside the automobile, randomly pops up, but does not scare the melancholy twin too bad. Using Lucien as a way to hitchhike to a graveyard to visit his wife's grave, the odd old timer confesses his deep dissatisfaction with his daughter and son-in-law, stating, "Money's the only thing that interests them...not even screwing. I have no grandchildren," but also confessing his love for David Bowie and Nina Hagen, thus signifying the lack of real values and worship of false values in the West.

While driving and daydreaming at night, Lucien hits a half-deranged Turkish illegal alien named Timour (Mario Adorf) with his car. Although Timour initially pulls a gun on Lucien when he seeks to help the injured man, the strange stranger passes out and is driven back to his homestead by the young Frenchman.

INVITATION AU VOYAGE

After playing a one-person game of Russian roulette while laying injured on a pool table, the hot tempered Turk confesses to Lucien he killed his “whore” wife, but, for whatever reason, later denies he killed his wife, meekly stating, “Those were all lies I told you last night. Forget everything.” After the Turk takes back what he said about killing his wife, Lucien tells Timour that he “does not make sense,” to which the ostensible wife-killer understatedly states, “neither do you,” thereupon establishing a strange sort of unspoken solidarity between the two mental men. With Timour riding along, Lucien heads to a farm where he grew up to meet up with his childhood friend Martine, but leaves rather abruptly without speaking to her and heads to Martine’s brother Gérard’s home where he reveals that his sister Nina is dead. After proclaiming, “I thought with her head, I saw with her eyes. You understand? Now, I see nothing...I feel nothing” regarding his sister, Lucien goes a little crazy and cuts himself with a butcher knife while crying and reveals to Gérard that he is hauling around his sister’s Nina’s corpse. After telling Gérard that Nina loved him very much, Lucien homoerotically kisses his friend as if his sis’ ghost is living vicariously through him, stating before he leaves to his friend, “never forget her.” The next day, Lucien takes his sister Nina’s nude corpse to a landfill and burns it. After going to a bar, Lucien once again runs into Timour, who is working as a server and is planning to go back to Turkey but needs a passport. Lucien, who has decided to take on the identity of his sister Nina (he promised to her “I’ll make you live again” were she to die shortly before she actually did die) and ultimately transforms into the tranny doppelganger of his big sis, gives Timour his passport. In the end, both Lucien and Timour head south via ship, but the latter does not recognize the former on the boat ride as he is dressed like a degenerate punk chick that wears far too mascara.

Whether looked at as a modernist tranny tragedy, post-punk road trip, macabre off-beat melodrama, arthouse Goth fetish flick, and/or decidedly degenerate dysfunctional filmic family affair, Invitation au voyage is most certainly hard to classify, but if anything is for sure regarding the film, it is a superlatively suavely stylized and ideally idiosyncratic cinematic work that never fails to be provocative in terms of its phantasmagoric ‘cold wave’ tableaux and froggy libertine themes. Shot by French cinematographer turned director Bruno Nuytten—the man behind the creepily compelling camera work of underrated frog cult flicks like Zoo zéro (1981), but more importantly Andrzej Żuławski’s Possession (1981)—Invitation au Voyage is a film that wallows in the ‘dark side’ of life and not in any sort of campy or cartoonish manner, but in a romantic and decadent fashion that borders on metaphysical horror and invokes the (di)spirit of not only Baudelaire, but also Edgar Allen Poe and Hanns Heinz Ewers. Featuring an insanely incestuous protagonist who ritualistically drinks milk that his twin sister died in during a freak accident involving electricity from a light bulb and a bathtub full of dirty dairy products, Invitation au voyage also features more universal themes, especially regarding the specific era when it was made, when boys began to resemble girls and vice versa. Most notably, protagonist Lucien relies on his sister both economically and emotionally, as he, although a male, is the weaker of the twins, thus symbolizing the emasculation of males not only in France (though France is obviously one of the most worst off), but the entire Occident in general. Of course, in its inclusion of an old man who longs for grandchildren but whose daughter is too selfish and money-motivated to have them, Invitation au voyage is a work that focuses on cultural decay in Europe in general, which reaches its most absurd level when the criminally-inclined Turk Timour even decides he prefers his homeland to France and ultimately decides to sail home. The extremely moody tale of a young man who is only able to find solace after his sister's death by 'taking on her identity' and becoming a punk rock tranny, Invitation au Voyage is by no means a happy film, but certainly an aesthetically hypnotic and hallucinatory one that might offer a sense of hope to certain hopeless (homo) types, even if it will leave most viewers, myself included, with an odd combination of disgust and ecstasy.

Peter Diamond (2000)

If there is anyone that can be described as a ‘baron of blue movies’ or ‘prince of pornography,’ it is most certainly Guido pornographer Lasse Braun (Penetration aka French Blue, Sensations), who was born into a wealthy, aristocratic Italian family and seemed destined to pursue a career in law (he was originally destined to be a diplomat like his father, but his doctoral dissertation proved to be so controversial that it was dismissed, so he became a pornographer instead). Indeed, unlike Radley Metzger who made films in Europe about the rich and raunchy but was really an American Jew, Braun (whose real name is apparently ‘Alberto Ferro’) was a real blue blood who, not unlike maestro Luchino Visconti in regard to melodrama, used his worldliness and distinguished background to assemble some of the most eloquent, lavish, and artistically merited fuck flicks ever made. Instead of American smut-peddlers and other rabble, Braun took his aesthetic influences from idiosyncratic sources, including the erotic novels of 18th century French novelist/commie/shoe fetishist Nicolas-Edme Rétif (who coined the word “pornography” in his pro-prostitution plea Le Pornographe (1769)), as well as the Priapistic rituals and orgiastic festivals of the Dionysus cult and ceremonies in veneration of Aphrodite (Porne), among other esoteric erotic things. Very much a child of his time, Braun was not just a decadent dago aristocrat, but also a political crusader who, using a series of pseudonyms, traveled all around Europe (including Franco’s Spain and Pompidou’s France) beginning in the early 1960s and created the (in)famous hardcore loops that he is famous for. Ultimately, Braun set up shop in Copenhagen (hence, his Nordic pseudonym) and the controversial doctoral dissertation that ended his academic career, Judiciary Censorship in the Western World, laid the foundation for the legalization of hardcore pornography in Denmark on 4 June 1969. While best known for his loops, Braun did direct a couple notable features, with Body Love (1978)—a wickedly wanton work about a lily-licking and leotard-wearing teenager who is forced by her blue blood baron father to be deflowered at an orgy on the night of her 18th birthday—being easily one of the greatest, if not the greatest, films of his relatively successful career. Featuring an original best-selling soundtrack by kraut electric music maestro Klaus Schulze (Tangerine Dream, Ash Ra Tempel) that is probably more famous than the film itself and starring Catherine Ringer of the French New Wave outfit Les Rita Mitsouko as the Sapphic teenage girl who is forced to endure heterosexual penetration by her pseudo-blond bastard baron father, Braun’s avant-garde fuck flick is also a European music fan’s celluloid wet dream, as a work that almost sounds as good as it looks. Shot at Groeneveld Castle in the Dutch town of Baarn, Body Love is equal parts moronic aristocratic libertinism, post-counterculture pseudo-philosophical twaddle, unintentionally hilarious pretense, and aesthetic ecstasy.

After doing some gymnastic stretches and watching a woman in a flashy red outfit drive off in a white Mercedes-Benz via an upstairs window in her family castle, leotard-clad 18-year-old 'poor little rich girl' Martine (Catherine Ringer as 'Lolita Da Nova') is rudely confronted by her arrogant and equally effete aristocratic father 'The Baron' (Jean-Gérard Sorlin), who asks her if she is ready to be "mounted" for the first time in her life tonight. Although Martine assures her father that she will accept being ritualistically deflowered in front of him and his equally sex crazed carnal comrades during an orgy, she is a lipstick lesbo with a wicked streak who loathes all men. The woman in the red outfit that Martine was previously watching from the castle window is her stepmother Glenda (Glenda Farrell), who is a famous actress that, due to her Nordic figure and blonde hair, resembles a poor man's take on an Ingmar Bergman actress like Bibi Andersson or Liv Ullmann, albeit minus the class and melancholy demeanor. When Glenda enters the castle, she looks in a mirror and is startled to see a shabbily dressed Confederate officer staring back at her. After the mirror nonsensically cracks, Glenda runs down the stairs and is sexually ravaged by two men (one of which is wearing a confederate soldier hat) against her will. As it turns out, Glenda's husband the Baron paid for the men to mock rape her just so he could get off to hearing the details. Indeed, it seems like, as the old stereotype goes, the Baron is an impotent aristocrat. While Glenda complains that the men who raped her had "normal cocks" and were "ordinary men, not of noble bearing like you" to the Baron, she still enjoyed being ravaged by the plebian proles because she is a naughty nymphomaniac with an unquenchable sexual appetite.

A spoiled little lesbo girl, Martine cannot stand the idea of her assumed girlfriend Gilda (played by Gilda Arancio, who starred in a number of Jess Franco flicks) being defiled by other people, so after a wild Sapphic sexual session involving swing-based cunnilingus and cunt-to-cunt kisses (indeed, the two ladies bump labias in a rather furious fashion), she warns her beloved, "I don't want you to have sex with other girls or other men. Your body is meant for me." Meanwhile, Glenda talks with a small frog journalist (old school French fuck flick superstar Jack Gatteau), who is at least an entire foot shorter than her, about her acting career and how she plans to shoot a porn film in Mexico in the next couple months. When the Journalist remarks that it would cause a scandal for an actress of her caliber to star in a fuck flick, Glenda demonstrates she got a feminist lobotomy at a university by snidely remarking, "As a woman of modern times, I can do whatever I feel like...no limits." When the journalist eats dinner with the 'unconventional' family, Martine proceeds to discuss how they practice meditative hippie mumbo jumbo called "sensitivity training," but when the reporter attempts to touch the girl to try it out for himself, she immediately stops him and says "no men." Luckily, Martine's stepmother warns her, "Once you get the feeling of a man's prick inside your pussy, you'll change." When Martine takes the Journalist outside to a fancy trailer where she has a Uruguayan sex slave (Gemma Giménez) locked up, she begins to rather reluctantly tap into her repressed heterosexual side. After bragging that the sex slave will do anything that she commands, Martine has her sensual serf pleasure the Journalist. While she does not say anything, Martine is clearly aroused by the French journalist, who will ultimately be the one who deflowers her that night.

Indeed, during the final act of the film, Martine enters a sort of makeshift pleasuredome in the castle where a dozen or so naked and half-naked motionless multicultural individuals, including her father and stepmother, are positioned like mannequins. To get the silly 'transcendental meditation' inspired orgy going, Martine merely touches each motionless individual to 'activate' them to life (notably, for her father, she grabs his flaccid kingly cock) in a scenario that seems like a pretentious pornographic take on a Les Rita Mitsouko music video. As the bodies begin to move, Martine soon loses her black leotards (the same pair she wore at the beginning of the film) and has her cherry popped by the hyper horny frog Journalist, who is surely going to give the family a great write-up in whatever yellow journalism rag he writes for. Unquestionably, Klaus Schulze's exceedingly ethereal synthesizers reach otherworldly orgasmic extremes during the orgy scene that features a virtual ocean of bodies intertwined in indiscriminate carnal pageantry of the preposterously pompous pornographic sort. When all the loads have been busted and all the participant's genitals have been rubbed raw, everyone falls asleep on the floor except Martine and Glenda, with the former eventually leaving the room quite satisfied after having her pussy plundered by not just the Journalist, but three other less than masculine men. Indeed, Martine has finally gotten over her juvenile carpet-munching and has learned to love cocks and cum.

While I was rather repulsed by virtually all the character's in the film, as well as the pseudo-philosophical tangents that director Lasse Braun programmed the actors to go in, there is no denying that, in terms of pornography, Body Love is like the Barry Lyndon (1975) of fuck flicks, albeit with a much cooler soundtrack. Despite the film's absolutely insipid libertine sermonizing, Braun's film ultimately has a good message due to its decidedly decadent depiction of a tyrannical teenage lesbian who is forced to convert to heterosexuality. If Body Love had been made nowadays, it would be about a heterosexual boy who is forced to lose his anal virginity by his two man-hating bull-dyke mothers. I have to admit that it was quite to my schadenfreude that Braun's utopian dream of a libertine world full of transcendental meditation, pornographic art, and perennial free love has been replaced with an ugly dystopia full of spiritual retardation, soulless internet porn, and AIDS. In fact, Braun quit making porn films because he was disgusted with the soulless commercial approach of the American porn industry and the rise of schlocky videos. Not unlike a very different Italian aristocrat, fellow polymath Baron Julius Evola (who also had a keen interest in sex as demonstrated by his work 1958 Eros and the Mysteries of Love: The Metaphysics of Sex), Braun withdrew into a more esoteric world after quitting porn and began writing scientific works on sexology and anthropology, as well as erotic novels and books on the history of sex. Without a doubt, Body Love is the work of a man of immense, if not misguided, talent who could have probably done something more useful with his life than mainstream pornography in the Nordic world.

WHEEL OF ASHES
WHEEL OF ASHES

Peter Emmanuel Goldman (1968)

In a culturally and morally inverted Occidental world that is plagued by rampant philo-Semitism, one would think that every single even remotely talented Hebrew filmmaker would be relatively well known, at least in the cinephile realm, but such is shockingly not the case for American-born experimental auteur Peter Emmanuel Goldman (Pestilent City, The Sensualist), who not only apparently taught a film course to a very Martin Scorsese at NYU during the 1960s (as seems evident in the Guido director's 1967 debut feature Who's That Knocking at My Door), but also very possibly the only true direct link to the American underground and the French New Wave. Indeed, after directing a couple influential documentaries and shorts, a seemingly impossible-to-find sexploitation feature entitled The Sensualist (1966), as well his revolutionary first 'serious' feature Echoes of Silence (1967), which inspired famous cineaste Amos Vogel to describe as auteur as "A major new talent," Goldman left for Paris to direct what would be his final and arguably greatest feature, Wheel of Ashes (1969) aka Roue de cendres starring frog counterculture actor Pierre Clémenti (Luis Buñuel's Belle de Jour, Bernardo Bertolucci's Il conformista aka The Conformist) as a spiritually and sexually schizophrenic man who is trapped in a crossroad between heterosexuality and homosexuality, as well as Christianity and Hinduism. Considering how the French hate it when outsiders fiddle with their culture (apparently, the frogs decided they hated Francophile kraut Volker Schlöndorff's Proust adaptation Un amour de Swann (1984) aka Swann in Love before it was even released), it should be noted that the film's importance in frogland was described as follows in Cahiers du Cinéma: "There was not one of us who was not profoundly touched by this film... perhaps the first to give a true feeling of certain quarters of Paris." Admittedly, I only learned of Goldman while researching Clémenti who, as an actor/auteur that had worked with not only Buñuel and Bertolucci but also such diverse auteur filmmakers as Luchino Visconti, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Liliana Cavani, Franco Brocani, Adriaan Dittvoorst, Philippe Garrel, Dusan Makavejev, and James Toback, among various others, is a sure sign of celluloid quality as Wheel of Ashes certainly confirms. Notably, Goldman was such a subversive figure of the NYC avant-garde that he broke with the gatekeeper of the scene, Jonas Mekas, for defending the work of Andy Warhol in his column at The Village Voice. Apparently, Goldman thought Mekas was a hypocrite for advocating "pure cinema" yet praising Warhol's Eat (1963), which he considered the height of cinematic banality. While fairly outmoded in regard to certain themes and styles, Wheel of Ashes is certainly fresher than a lot of the early pioneering works of the La Nouvelle Vague, or as the director's onetime-adversary Mekas once wrote: "His people come to life simply and believably – more believably than most of the people in the Chabrol and Truffaut cinema... the film has a thematic and formal beauty that is remarkable.” The surprisingly gritty and delectably dark story of a young socially alienated nihilist turned Hindu dilettante who must choose between the path of whimsical self-absorbed pleasure-seeking that he is used to or a highly disciplined ascetic path of unflinching spiritual devotion and saintly solitude, Goldman’s (anti)metaphysical indictment of the counterculture era and its curious fetishism for eastern religions ultimately lets the viewer know that you don’t have to shoot junk to be a junky.

Opening with the following quote, “THE LAW OF KARMA IS UNFAILING IN ITS OPERATION, AS IS THE LAW OF REBIRTH, UNTIL WE HAVE BECOME PERFECT IN LOVE. LOVE FULFILLS EVERY LAW,” Wheel of Ashes immediately lets the viewer know that it will be full of eastern mystical mumbo jumbo, yet it is ultimately a film that tells a tragic love story about a swarthy and scrawny frog boy named Pierre (Pierre Clémenti) who falls in love with a cute Danish girl, only to get scared when things get serious and escapes to an arcane ascetic world of self-imposed isolation where he tries to live the words of Indian Hindu mystics like Ramakrishna. In an opening montage featuring narration by Pierre juxtaposed with some of his crude drawings, the protagonist gives a good hint as to the state of his perturbed psyche by confessing: “Every morning, I asked myself how I was going to live. I could go to work. I could take a boat and leave my parents forever. I could stay on the ground in my filth, without moving. I could live intensely, full of hate, uncompromising. I could be banal, play the game and have a lot of women, try to be happy. They tell me I stray too far from reality. The only reality I know is chaos.” Pierre is in an ambiguously gay romance with a dude named David (played by Pierre Besançon, who apparently did some of the drawings for the film), but with winter coming to end and the sun rising, the protagonist gets hungry for pussy and must leave his comrade behind, or as he states himself, “...I can feel the Spring and with the Spring I smell women and David’s love can’t help me. I have to leave. David takes my hand and kisses me on the cheek, but I draw back. We can’t be happy together when women, with their fine legs, are coming between us.” Indeed, Pierre hits the streets and begins looking for lady meat, but he has no idea that he is ultimately going to take a metaphysical journey to hell after falling in love with a girl and becoming too afraid to completely commit himself to her.

Deciding to leave his apartment with David because he has “too much desire and resentment,” Pierre heads to Boulevard Saint-Germain in Paris because he is, “determined to walk until overwhelmed by love,” even though, as he reflects, “I had nowhere to go. I had nothing to hope for.” Pierre first attempts to find love in the questionable form of a bitchy platinum blonde hooker, but he seems repulsed by the fact that she washes her gash right in front of his face just seconds before they are supposed to make love, so he leaves without so much as getting a hard-on. As demonstrated by the fact that he routinely points at gun at his temple whilst smirking in a goofy fashion, Pierre also seems to be somewhat suicidal, hence his sudden obsession with Vedanta Hinduism, which he gravitates to because it gives him a reason to live and establishes order in his rather aimless life. As Pierre narrates regarding his angst and feeling of emptiness, "When one is alone, hate grows and gnaws at one's insides. It ruins everything and creates a real nest of vipers in one's heart, everything becomes bitter. This bitterness is such a part of me. But it's not everything. The faint hope of youth remains. But since my youth refuses, that faint light will perhaps go out," yet his latest spiritual obsession will ultimately plague him with a sense of all-consuming loneliness that he has never felt before. After various botched encounters with bitchy pseudo-blondes, Pierre spots a delightful little Danish dame named Anka (Katinka Bo) at discotheque who smiles at him while she is dancing with another fellow. In the hope that Pierre will follow her and introduce himself, Anka quits dancing mid-song and sits at a bar where the protagonist soon predictably greets her. In a short photo montage, Goldman effectively expresses that the two have fallen in love and are quite happy together, but Pierre's fear of intimacy and commitment will eventually scare him away from his beloved and throw him into a hermetic world of Hindu-inspired hobo-esque living.

When Pierre goes to a screening of the criminally underrated Dutch avant-garde auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst's debut feature Paranoia (1967), he becomes uneasy when a dark-haired girl sitting next to him in the theater attempts to entice him by spreading her mostly unclad legs. After the screening, Pierre runs back to home to Anka and suddenly bursts out in tears, as if he is a little boy seeking protection from his mommy. When Anka asks Pierre what is wrong with him because he won't talk and is acting all moody and broody, he refuses to reply and thinks to himself that she is acting, "too possessive and demanding." Deciding he must "liberate himself from what the Indians call Samsara, the cycle of death and reincarnation" and "find wisdom and god within oneself," Pierre vows to give up going to restaurants, movie theaters, parties and to abstain from sex, as he sees everything else in life as secondary to his delusional spiritual mission. Before he knows it, Pierre's sanity begins to crack and he becomes a Hindu junky of sorts who does nothing but sleep and read the philosophies of the great Hindu gurus. Unfortunately for Pierre, he cannot abstain from carnal desires while he is asleep and passively succumbs to progressively bizarre sexual nightmares involving Anka and busty blonde hookers. Influenced by Ramakrishna's belief, "As long as man lingers in ignorance, as long, in other words, as he has not attained God, he will be reborn on earth. But he who has been illuminated will no longer have to return to earth nor to any other sphere," Pierre—a fellow that certainly never wants to be reborn—religiously repeats while in a state of perpetual delirium, "The law of evolution may oblige a soul to return in flesh, endlessly."

One day while Pierre is wasting away in bed and looking like death warmed over, Anka randomly shows up to his apartment and brings him some food so he assumedly does not starve. When Anka remarks regarding the squalor her beau is living in, "This is a terrible place, Pierre," he is not the least bit phased and says nothing. While the two make love, Pierre ruins their special moment together by refusing to hangout with Anka afterwards, as he cannot bring himself to break his spiritual psychosis and devote himself to her for just a couple hours or so. Needless to say, after Anka gets pregnant and Pierre still refuses to wean himself off his addiction to Hinduism hermeticism, she breaks of their (non)relationship, stating, "I'm not coming back anymore, I'm leaving. I can't wait for you forever, I don't know what you're doing." After Anka leaves for good, Pierre begins to lose what little is left of his sanity and suffers a series of hellish hallucinations involving repulsively effeminate elderly old men and sinister smirking streetwalkers, among other pernicious phantoms. Luckily, in the end, Pierre manages to emerge from his lair and describes seeing tons of people walking down the street for the first time in months as seeming, "completely unreal." As for reuniting with Anka, Pierre remarks, "I walked towards her and I held her close to me for minutes until her skin couldn't take any more scratching from my beard."

While auteur Peter Emmanuel Goldman probably could have had a reasonably artistically fruitful career as an avant-garde filmmaker, he decided to give up filmmaking so he could devote his life to the Zionist cause. As described in a somewhat recent article entitled Peter Emmanuel Goldman, Man of Many Worlds featured at JewishPress.com, while raised as an assimilated Jew with virtually nil spiritual and cultural connection to his roots, Goldman was apparently so deeply affected by the Munich massacre at the 1972 Summer Olympics when eleven Israeli Olympic team members were taken hostage and eventually executed by members of the Palestinian Black September Organization (BSO) that he became a devout Zionist virtually overnight who ultimately led no less than two Zionist organizations in Denmark (where he had been living at the time). In fact, Goldman became so deeply immersed in Talmudism that he divorced his beloved shiksa wife/baby momma because she refused to convert to Judaism and even became a good friend of assassinated Zionist extremist Rabbi Meir Kahane. Instead of continuing to make avant-garde works, Goldman eventually shifted gears completely and whored himself out to the Zionist cause by making less than artsy fartsy propaganda films like NBC in Lebanon: A Study of Media Misrepresentation (1983). In fact, Goldman became such a respected and noted Zionist that he was invited to the White House by President Reagan to discuss Middle East policy after co-editing the book The Media's War Against Israel, which was apparently a favorite among Israeli prime ministers and of course American senators and congressmen. Indubitably, knowing Goldman's life story in Zionism makes Wheel of Ashes an all the more potent work, as it depicts a young man suffering an existential crisis that neither Christianity nor Hinduism can solve. Of course, in his spiritual fanaticism, one could also argue that he became like the character of his film, albeit in a more functional and sane sort of way as a man connecting to his true culturally roots and not as some deluded hippie who thinks that some exotic alien religion will give him what he needs in life. While the protagonist of Wheel of Ashes ultimately finds solace in his beloved girlfriend, Goldman would ultimately realize that his race and religion were more important to him than a goy gal. With that said, Goldman, who is still alive at the old age of 75 despite some sources saying to the contrary, would certainly have no problem coming up with new material for another film. Interestingly, he recently finished his first novel, Last Metro to Bleecker Street, which seems to be a continuation of the themes he examined in films, as it is about three friends, two Jews and a Christian, who attempt to find meaning in their lives in 1960s NYC and Paris and ultimately become deeply religious, only to suffer new spiritual dilemmas. Personally, I would not mind seeing an arthouse film about a NYC-bred Jewish art fag who transforms into a Zionist true believer and reads from the Talmud with Meir Kahane, as it would certainly be a change of pace from the obscenely annoying Hebraic neuroticism of Noah Baumbach and the eclectic vulgarity of spoiled half-blood Jewess Lena Dunham.

WHEEL OF ASHES

THE HAMBURG SYNDROME

Peter Fleischmann (1979)

While the anti-Heimatfilm (or 'new' Heimatfilm)—a satirical and far-left take on 'Papa's Kino' and the nationalistic pro-German Heimatfilm that portrayed a romantic and sentimental portrayal of Teutonic rural life and kraut history—were quite popular and directed by a number of filmmakers of German New Cinema of the late-1960s/early-1970s, including Edgar Reitz (Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany), Volker Schlöndorff (The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach), Herbert Achternbusch (Bierkampf), Rainer Werner Fassbinder (The Niklashausen Journey), and Werner Herzog (Heart of Glass), among countless others, the dystopian sci-fi anti-Heimatfilm is a more sparse breed as an unlikely marriage between European arthouse cinema and American cult horror/science fiction, and The Hamburg Syndrome (1979) aka Die Hamburger Krankheit aka Illness of Hamburg directed by Peter Fleischmann (Dorothea's Revenge, Hard to Be a God aka Es ist nicht leicht ein Gott zu sein) is probably the best and most wacky entry in this insanely idiosyncratic subgenre. Not unsurprisingly, Fleischmann was also responsible for the highly overrated but undeniably influential work Hunting Scenes From Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdscenen aus Niederbayern, which is oftentimes regarded as the first anti-Heimatfilm and would go on to play an imperative influence on directors like Fassbinder and Schlöndorff. While Hunting Scenes From Bavaria is an overly preachy tale about the supposed innate small-mindedness and crypto-nazi nature of Bavarian peasants who do not take kindly to a forest fag living in their wholesome village and are essentially the Southern kraut equivalent to the American Southern lynch mob archetype as concocted by the humble Hebrew dreammasters of Hollywood, The Hamburg Syndrome is a satirical and surrealist black comedy of the proto-Schlingensief type that does feature the Teutonic lynch mob, but also an aesthetically heretical hodgepodge of wheelchair bound cripples wielding giant dildos, dwarves working in hospitals, pigs consuming human corpses, boorish alcoholic bulldozers playing with the genitals of virus-ridden trannies, neo-stormtroopers with gasmasks hosing down unclad beauties, and various other scenarios of lunatic libertinage that won't put off cinephiles like myself who have a harder time digesting quasi-Marxist swill than they do German bratwursts.

An absurdist satirical odyssey that follows a motley crew, including a dorky yet handsome doctor (played by Helmut Griem), a beautiful young woman of the emotionally cold variety, a buffoonish sausage seller of the classic dumb kraut sort, and a vulgar anarchistic cripple in a wheel chair (played by no one less than Spanish playwright/filmmaker Fernando Arrabal) after they escape from a fascist quarantine camp in Hamburg and travel to the bottom of Germany to rural Bavaria in the hope of not contracting a deadly virus that turns people crazy for a couple of tragicomic moments and eventually concludes with their death in a fetal position, The Hamburg Syndrome, like Traumstadt (1973) aka Dream City directed by Johannes Schaaf and Welt am Draht (1973) aka World on a Wire directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, is undoubtedly one of the greatest and most idiosyncratically stylized dystopian science fiction films of post-WWII German cinema. To add to its ostensible cult and arthouse credibility, Roland Topor—a cofounder of the Panic movement with fellow scatological surrealists Alejandro Jodorowsky and Fernando Arrabal and the man who wrote the novel The Tenant (1964), which was later cinematically adapted by Roman Polanski in 1976 as the much more popular film of the same name—was one of the men who penned The Hamburg Syndrome, but perhaps more interesting is the fact that the film shows aesthetic influences from the popular North American post-apocalyptic horror/zombie flicks of George A. Romero like The Crazies (1973) and Dawn of the Dead (1978) and the early venereal body horror works of Canadian auteur David Cronenberg, especially Shivers (1975) and Rabid (1977). Featuring a highly complimentary synthesizer-driven score by French composer Jean Michel Jarre, The Hamburg Syndrome is an aptly atmospheric and aesthetically pleasing Teutonic celluloid apocalypse directed by a man with a glaring ambivalence for Germany's past, be it lederhosen or the Third Reich, and a sort of left-wing Spenglerian vision of the Fatherland's seemingly foreboding future. That being said, The Hamburg Syndrome also makes for one of the most enthralling examples of esoteric sci-fi celluloid ethno-masochism ever made.

Handsome young doctor Sebastian Ellerwein (Helmut Griem) is a speaker at Hamburg's congress centre for a big scientific conference regarding the possibility of prolonging human life and things begin getting a little weird for him when he learns during the middle of an uplifting speech he is giving that his elderly professor friend has just suffered a seizure, thus ushering in epidemic hysteria in Hamburg. Not long after, Sebastian learns from an old doctor friend named Dr. Hamm (played in a cameo role by Rosel Zech of Fassbinder's Lola (1981) and Veronika Voss (1982)) that his professor friend is dead and that various other mysterious deaths have occurred around Hamburg as a result of a mysterious virus that seems as deadly and infectious as the bubonic plague. Meanwhile, a stereotypically boorish and racist kraut sausage seller named Heribert (Ulrich Wildgruber) is throwing trash at a deranged swarthy untermensch in a wheelchair named Ottokar (Fernando Arrabal) who is jubilantly wielding a dildo. A beautiful young woman Ulrike (Carline Seiser) goes to visit Heribert's prostitute girlfriend Sonja, but the streetwalker dies shortly after being racially defiled by a Turkish John. Apparently, a group of Turkish illegal aliens are responsible for bringing the deadly virus to Deutschland and after buying carnal knowledge from a group of destitute Aryan working girls, the pernicious plague spreads like cancer all around Hamburg. Like the terminal Turks, Heribert, Ottokar, and Ulrike are sent to a quarantine camp. While his colleagues believe the unidentified virus is undisputedly a viral disease and that a vaccination should be immediately concocted, Sebastian believes that the plague has much more dubious source as people afflicted with it seem to die rather suddenly and without reason. After touching a man who has just died from the illness, Sebastian is also sent to the quarantine concentration camp, but soon he meets up with Heribert, Ottokar, and Ulrike and they make a hasty escape in the sausage man's wiener mobile and head South to redneck Deutschland.

The fearsome foursome make quite the oddball quartet, but they make due with their curious situation. Hotheaded meathead Heribert shows his sensitive side by helping infantile Ottokar urinate by tipping his wheelchair so he does not piss himself like an infant. Additionally, Ulrike equips Sebastian with a sort of heroic masculinity he never thought he had. Initially, the four do not have to worry about finding food because the always hospitable Heribert has a fan full of un-kosher kraut sausages, but rather unfortunately, a group of stormtrooping disinfectant crews come by and scorch the wiener-wagon (aka Heribert's "living") and take its owner away. Luckily, they meet up with a hippie-like fellow who effete sports Capri pants and Jesus sandals named Alexander (played by real-life commune leader/author/filmmaker Rainer Langhans, who also appeared in films by Fassbinder and Ulli Lommel), who owns a luxury trailer, and a deranged fellow named Fritz (Tilo Prückner) who believes standing naked on the top of roofs of houses is the best way to stay safe from the virus. Out of all the people heading South, Ulrike has the flattest affect and seems the least bothered by the deaths, to point where Sebastian even asks, "doesn't that affect you at all?" in regard to the sickening sight of a corpse, however the youthful Ice Queen's perennial emotional psychosis ultimately makes her a survivor who triumphs in the face of death while her compatriots croak endlessly by her wayside. When hero Sebastian drops dead from the virus after ironically proclaiming, "it's sufficient that a virus infects a cell, so that the cell divides itself indefinitely. The cancer cell multiplies continuously. A proof of immortality?" at what is only slightly past the halfway point of The Hamburg Syndrome, Ulrike opts for gluttonous decadence over depression and has herself a nice slice of cake while her romantic interest lies dead in a fetal position on the floor in front of a propaganda propagating television in what is one of many absurdist allegorical scenes featured in the film. Meanwhile, after a temporary disappearance, both Heribert and Ottokar reappear and have profited greatly from the epidemic as parasites of human suffering, thus alluding to the fact that degenerate proletarians became all-powerful National Socialist leaders following the cultural chaos after the Great War and the Great Depression of 1932 in the Weimar Republic and the rest of Central Europa. Rather conveniently, the German chancellor in The Hamburg Syndrome also succumbs to the epidemic, thus resulting in martial law and a fascist police state where most of the citizens are naively nationalistic and believe every lie that the government feeds them, including the appearance of a vaccine that seems to spread the virus as opposed to destroying it. In the end, it is not the virus that gets the seemingly immune Ulrike, but members of the anti-virus Gestapo, who steal her from her Grandfather's isolated rural Bavarian home. Totally ignorant of the fact that his granddaughter was kidnapped by a corrupt government as a mindless redneck kraut southerner, Ulrike's Opa yodels to her tribute in an ironically iconic Heimatfilm-esque ending that looks like a parody of a scene from a Luis Trenker mountain film.

Created in the wake of the so-called 'German Autumn' events of late 1977 when far-left West German terrorists of the Red Army Faction (RAF) kidnapped/killed an ex-SS man turned wealthy business man named Hanns-Martin Schleyer, as well as the hijacking of the Lufthansa airplane "Landshut" by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) and the subsequent mysterious deaths of the first generation of RAF leaders in their prison cells, The Hamburg Syndrome certainly makes for a much more eclectically enthralling work of anti-völkisch sentiment than the omnibus film Germany in Autumn (1978) aka Deutschland im Herbst, the work that inspired the phrase 'German Autumn' which was directed by a number of bigwigs of German New Cinema, including Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Alexander Kluge, and Volker Schlöndorff (who, incidentally, cofounded the production company Halleluja Film with Peter Fleischmann in 1969). Due to its North American influenced horror/science fiction conventions, sardonic surrealism, pernicious cultural cynicism, wacked out performance from Fernando Arrabal, soothing and succulent synth soundtrack, and delightfully daunting dystopian essence, The Hamburg Syndrome, unlike a lot of leftist films of German New Cinema, Germany in Autumn included, has aged quite gracefully and can easily be enjoyed by viewers of the apolitical or anti-leftist persuasion (myself included!), so it should be no surprise that the film would eventually achieve cult status in Germany. Essentially, The Hamburg Syndrome portrays the German people from North to South as an automaton-like collective who cannot change and are hopelessly set in their ways, hence their obsession with yodeling, lederhosen, and sickening sausages, so it is quite clear that director Peter Fleischmann, like many of the directors involved with Germany in Autumn, had become quite socio-politically disillusioned and had very little hope for Germany's future as they once did during the signing of the Oberhausen Manifesto of 1962, which launched German New Cinema and inspired the popular motto "Papas Kino ist tot" (Papa's cinema is dead). With a couple exceptions, it seems that the Teutonic prodigal son's cinema is also dead and The Hamburg Syndrome is an early, if highly entertaining, symptom of this cultural epidemic that marked the beginning of the end for art cinema in Germany (and Europe in general), which would become official with the death of German New Cinema's most popular and prolific auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder in 1982. Incidentally, Fassbinder's last screen appearance was as the lead protagonist in the farcical cyberpunk Kamikaze 1989 (1982) directed by Wolf Gremm, which makes for the perfect double feature with The Hamburg Syndrome.

In the original French poster for The Hamburg Syndrome (featured above), there is a small black caricature next to the title logo of Fernando Arrabal giving a Hitler salute in a wheelchair. Undoubtedly, this symbol can be seen as a metaphor for the post-WWII people as a whole who, although they had their cultural identity essentially taken away from them after the Second World War and have become cultural cripples and ethno-masochists of sorts, still have a deep and largely subconscious collective identity that is yearning for a sort of compromising nationalism that someone like director Peter Fleischmann would probably describe as authoritarianism, which was absurdly underscored in Germany in Autumn when Mr. German New Cinema Rainer Werner Fassbinder's own mother Lilo Pempeit confesses in regard to her ideal government, "The best thing would be a kind of authoritarian ruler who is benevolent, and kind and orderly." Of course, the greatest irony of German New Cinema and related directors like Peter Fleischmann is that with the virtual death on Teutonic art cinema and the German film industry as a whole, they were essentially the last of the directors to express a truly 'German' identity in film and The Hamburg Syndrome is irrefutable proof that Hitler's forsaken children also had a knack for singular science fiction of the sardonically dystopian sort.

HARD TO BE A GOD

Peter Fleischmann (1990)

While making a number of popular award-winning films, German auteur Peter Fleischmann (Disaster aka Unheil, Dorothea's Revenge aka Dorotheas Rache) never quite achieved the fame and glory that his celluloid compatriots of the German New Cinema like Werner Herzog, Wim Wenders, and Rainer Werner Fassbinder did, as he is pretty much completely unknown outside of Germany despite the fact that he has made a couple films outside of his homeland. First coming to prominence for his slave-morality-stained leftist redneck-lynch-mob-themed anti-heimat work Hunting Scenes From Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdscenen aus Niederbayern, Fleischmann would eventually develop a more polished Hollywood-style that was quite apparent in his dystopian sci-fi-horror flick Die Hamburger Krankheit (1979) aka The Hamburg Syndrome—a work that manages to combine anti-Heimat and arthouse aesthetics with the horror films of George A. Romero and David Cronenberg—but it would be the gigantic West German-French-Soviet co-production Hard to Be a God (1989) aka Es ist nicht leicht ein Gott zu sein, with the screenplay being mostly penned by Buñuel's late era screenwriter Jean-Claude Carrière (The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, The Phantom of Liberty), where he attempted to make an all-out blockbuster European film, which would ultimately prove to be a failure as the filmmaker would never again have the opportunity to work on such a large film again and since then has only directed three small documentaries. Based on the 1964 sci-fi novel of the same name written by Russian Jewish Soviet science fiction writers Arkady and Boris Strugatsky, who are probably best known by cinephiles as writing a novel that would act as the basis for Andrei Tarkovsky's masterpiece Stalker (1979), Hard to Be a God is a sort of epic dystopian arthouse sci-fi-action-adventure-fantasy flick with an eclectic international all-star European cast that includes, among others, Bavarian wild man auteur Werner Herzog (Even Dwarfs Started Small, Stroszek), French counter-culture star Pierre Clémenti (Sweet Movie, Steppenwolf), German diva Christine Kaufmann (Mädchen in Uniform, Egon Schiele – Exzess und Bestrafung), Russian 'People's Artist' Aleksandr Filippenko (The Career of Arturo Ui, The Master and Margarita), and Viennese actress Birgit Doll (Tales from the Vienna Woods, The Seventh Continent). Made during the later stages of Pereštroiika, Hard to Be a God is an anti-fascist sci-fi flick with the unthinkable, Conan the Barbarian-esque 'fascistic' violence and aesthetics, not to mention a miserable and misanthropy-inspiring neo-medieval realm that is quite unbecoming for a European film directed by a quasi-arthouse director. Shot in the Ukraine and Soviet Central Asia over a troubled six-year period, Hard to Be a God has the feel of centuries upon centuries of Slavic serf suffering and even concludes with a mass extermination that puts Schindler's List (1993) to shame. On top of that, Christine Kaufmann plays a carnally bestial babe who sheds some flesh, and Herr Herzog dies on screen after being literally stabbed in the back.

It is the future and a dude with a flat affect named Anton (Edward Zentara) works for the 'Institute of Experimental History' on planet Earth. He is sent on an exploratory space expedition to a backwards neighboring planet where the people are still in the dark ages. Under the alias of a primitive aristocrat named 'Rumata of Estoria,' Anton goes to the barbarian city of Arkanar to check up on one of the people who works for his institute, 'Mita' aka 'Cyril' (Werner Herzog), who lost contact with his team on planet Earth not long ago. Like Anton, Mita was only supposed to 'observe and report' what he saw while on the planet and not interfere with the inhabitants (which means allowing them to kill and rape each other and whatnot), but apparently his bleeding heart humanism has gotten him into a bit of trouble and thus he has been imprisoned. When Anton arrives in Arkanar, he meets the eccentric King (Pierre Clémenti), as well as his entourage, which includes an evil scheming minister named 'Reba' (Aleksandr Filippenko) who is described as "a contrarious man. He can't even bow properly," the wild and wanton royal whore Okana (Christine Kaufmann), the Prince, and various other exceedingly eccentric characters. Shortly after finding Mita, Anton realizes that his fellow countryman has gone soft and now wants to fight for the rights of the pitiful sub-peasant citizens of Arkanar, which is a big 'no' with the Institute of Experimental History, who do not want their employees messing with the history and progress of a underdeveloped planet in its dark age because, as one scientist states, "We had found our sister planet, the mirror of ourselves in a distant past. We must never dim this mirror." When Mita is killed for being named as a conspirator against the King (Mita made the fatal mistake of involving Mita in the revolution, as the minister merely uses it as an opportunity to liquidate his rivals and grab more power), Anton is forced to take his place and semi-permanently take up the archaic aristocratic persona of 'Rumata of Estoria,' which is the name of a nobleman who died long ago in a swamp. Through his research, Anton learns that Mita was involved with attempting to create the first printing press in Arkanar with the help of an inventor named Hauk (Mikhail Gluzskiy), but unconventional ideas and literacy are against the law in the unenlightened barbarian world. Meanwhile, Anton helps save the life of a 'proto-bolshevik' revolutionary of sorts named Suren (Hugues Quester), who local soldiers attempt to kill for reading revolutionary political propaganda in public in an attempt to rile up the citizenry.

In terms of staying in contact with his civilized yet emotionally sterile earth friends, Anton transmits exactly what he witnesses to them in real-time via his eyeball, so they know whether he is in danger or not. Ultimately, Anton hopes to find a local genius named Budach (Andrei Boltnev) from the neighboring city of Irukan as he is apparently the only real hope for getting the people out of the Dark Age, but rather unfortunately, the scholar is purportedly locked up in a dungeon of torture run by the King's psychopathic minister Reba. On top of that, Anton witnesses firsthand what the locals think of science after discovering the corpse of a scientist who was attempting to build a telescope. Reba also has his men kill inventor Hauk, thus killing any chance of the printing press being realized. Among other things, Anton screws the King's feisty whore Okana and eventually starts a lurid love affair with his sassy servant Kyra (Anne Gautier), but she is later tortured and murdered by sadistic minister Reba for helping the earthling. Hoping to consolidate complete power, Reba also poisons the half-insane King, but luckily Anton helps to save the young Prince before he can be disposed of as well. With the help of a strong man named Baron Pampa (Elgudzha Burduli) and revolutionary Suren, Anton wages a revolt against Reba and his giant armies, but his earth buddies do not appreciate his attempt at tampering with history, so they interfere. In the end, Anton's friends from the institute head to Arkanar and the primitive people of the city mistake their spaceship for God. Meanwhile, revolutionary Suren gets a hold of one of Anton's futuristic laser weapons and pulls a Trotsky by exterminating virtually every single person in his presence. Of course, with his mission finished, Anton goes back to earth, but luckily his savage girlfriend/servant Kyra and the Prince manage to survive the apocalyptic ordeal.

Not unsurprisingly, the Strugatsky brothers' main request for a film version of their novel Hard to Be a God was that the director be a Soviet, but of course they did not get their wish, even if kraut auteur Peter Fleischmann is a bit of an anti-Occidental commie himself whose works like Hunting Scenes From Bavaria and The Hamburg Syndrome are more critical of West Germany than the average Soviet propaganda flick. Apparently, the Strugatsky brothers also found Fleischmann to be a rather intolerable person to work with (judging by the less than thinly veiled propaganda in his films, I can certainly see why), so they abandoned the film and publicly trashed it when it was released, which ultimately led to a second adaptation of Hard to Be a God directed by Soviet veteran director Aleksei German and produced by Lenfilm. Quite curiously, like Fleischmann's 1989 version, German's adaptation of Hard to Be a God, which features a whopping 177-minute running time, also suffered a long and troubled production as a project that starting filming in 2000, but would not premiere until 2013, with the director dying before its premiere (German had finished principal photography in 2006 and spent the rest of the years editing the film to perfection, with his wife and son taking over post-synchronization when he died). Personally, I have never been a huge science fiction fan, but Fleischmann's Hard to Be a God seems more like a quasi-kitschy take on HBO's Game of Thrones with arthouse actors than a mere fanciful masturbation aid for virginal man-boys who fantasize about living in an imaginary utopian future where their autistic tendencies will be better suited. Additionally, aside from possibly The Hamburg Syndrome, Hard to Be a God is easily Fleischmann's best cinematic work to date, as it is not as drenched in the sort of dreaded Frankfurt School-approved messages that unfortunately plague a good portion of his films. By no means resembling anything that can be described as a masterpiece, Hard to Be a God ultimately makes for an excellent fantasy flick for Eurocentric cinephiles that find Luke Skywalker to be a pansy momma's boy and cannot stomach the cardboard cynicism of Harrison Ford as Hans Solo, not to mention the fact that it puts David Lynch's convoluted celluloid mess Dune (1984) to abject shame. While undoubtedly an anti-fascist allegory with the last days of the Cold War lingering in the background, I thought Hard to Be a God worked better as a cautionary tale about the unexpected consequences when an advanced civilization (i.e. Europe) begins meddling with the affairs of more archaic peoples (i.e. Africa and a good percentage of the so-called third world). After all, Western weaponry has only made ancient African tribal feuds more genocidal and all the aid given to the doubly dark continent has only guaranteed that there will be all the more Sub-Saharanans that will be starving with each new generation. Indeed, the title 'Hard to Be a God' is practically interchangeable with the phrase 'The White Man's Burden.' Socio-political contexts aside, Hard to Be a God must also be given credit for featuring what is probably the most aesthetically repulsive wigs in cinema history, which can be forgiven since it is a work that manages to feature the sort of scenario you might expect from an episode of Star Trek, albeit with a bit of Teutonic testicular fortitude and ultra-violence.

THE COOK, THE THIEF, HIS WIFE /& HER LOVER
THE COOK, THE THIEF, HIS WIFE /& HER LOVER

Peter Greenaway (1989)

About a decade ago, I made the rather grave mistake of watching British auteur Peter Greenaway's film Prospero's Books (1991) – an audaciously avant-garde, flesh-driven cinematic adaptation of William Shakespeare's The Tempest borrowing aesthetic attributes from Manierist paintings and featuring armies of elderly naked folk and a little boy happily swinging back and forth on a swing and urinating into a pool – which proved to be a terribly trying and exceedingly excruciating cinematic experience, so, naturally I have been a bit apprehensive about watching any other films directed by the seemingly pretentious and unpleasantly perverted filmmaker ever since. After hearing nothing but praise about Greenaway's previous cinematic effort The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover (1989), including from braindead gorehounds and anti-arthouse advocates, I decided to give the auteur another chance, which I am most certainly happy I did, as the film proved to be one of the most suavely and sophisticatedly stylized and ideally idiosyncratic works of sordid scatological celluloid that I have ever seen, so much so that I am more than prepared to give Prospero's Books another chance. Probably Greenaway's most famous/infamous film, as well as his most accessible, The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover is a greatly gastronomic themed work of corrupting culinary cinema featuring a farcical approach to food, feces, splashing, bathroom stall blowjobs, sadomasochism, and cannibalism, among various putrid and pleasing things. Oftentimes described as an allegorical work depicting tyranny and tragedy of Thatcherism in regard to Britannia, The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover is luckily a work where the viewer need not know, nor care about the sociopolitical subtext to appreciate it as it is a film that is big on aesthetics, character, comedy, and storyline that does not sacrifice cinematic quality for some 'bigger' and now-relatively anachronistic message. Featuring Helen Mirren giving bathroom blowjobs, a bookish Jew being forced to eat his own book, a bitchy woman taking a fork to the face, and the torture of a pure as snow and angelic albino boy, The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover is a rare cinematic work that reminds the viewer that black comedy has no bounds as an obsessively obscene yet aesthetically refined film that will make even the most cold and callous of viewers feel oddly overwrought. Doing the seemingly impossible by creating a seamless yet seemingly mismatched marriage between the aesthetic qualities of Baroque and Flemish paintings and thematic moral and sexual libertinism of lavishly lewd literary transgressors like the Marquis de Sade and especially Georges Bataille, Peter Greenaway has cooked a tasty, if not stomach-churning, celluloid meal with The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover; a film that reminds the viewer that sometimes there is a fine line between the physical appearance of chocolate mousse and feces, and high art and low art.

Things are getting ugly and rather unsanitary at the positively posh and upscale Le Hollandais Restaurant when the owner and head chef Richard Borst aka "The Cook" (Richard Bohringer) isn't able to pay psychotic sadist gangster Alfred Spica aka "The Thief" (Michael Gambon) money he owes. On top of stripping Borst's clothes off and rubbing dogs turds all over his disrobed body, super sicko Spica – a low-class yet curiously charismatic barbarian who loves gorging his mouth with food just as much he basks in humiliating and torturing people – also takes over his rather refined place of fine dining, thus setting the tone for a film about bad table manners that makes Paul Bartel's Eating Raoul (1982) seem like culinary child's play by comparison. Naturally, Spica makes a habit of attending Le Hollandais every night with his eccentric and erratic entourage, including his gorgeous and cultivated wife Georgina Spica aka "The Wife" (Helen Mirren) and criminal underlings Mitchel (Tom Roth), Cory (Ciarán Hinds), and Turpin (Roger Ashton-Griffiths), among various other ill-mannered low-lives and dedicated degenerates of the organized crime kind. A boorish, belligerent, and physically bloated megalomaniac who generally does and says whatever he wants whenever he wants, Alfred is not someone who is used to hearing "no" for an answer, let alone encountering people that have the gall and balls to contradict him, so the last thing he would suspect is that his well bred and seemingly uptight, bookish wife is having an affair with another man right under his nose. Unbeknownst to Alfred – a man who beats and rapes his wife from time to time – his wife Georgina is secretly having a heated love affair with an intelligent and seemingly introverted bookshop owner Michael (Alan Howard) that involves the collaboration of the Cook and his many employees in providing these lovers with sexual sanctuary at the restaurant. While Alfred goes on ridiculous rants about everything, including how close in proximity the vaginal hole and anus is on his wife and how about 60% of the patrons at the restaurant are Jewish, Georgina is getting her 'groove on' with Michael in toilet stalls, dirty dish rooms, walk-in refrigerators, and other sanitary and not so sanitary places. Of course, when Alfred finds out about Georgina's matrimonial indiscretions, he vows to kill and eat Michael, but he only fulfills half his promise, thus his wife makes sure that he keeps his word in what he describes as, "a revenge killing, an affair of the heart," but what turns into a sick sideshow of the stomach starring a devilishly charismatic gangster turned psychologically-castrated cannibal cuckold. Indeed, while it is Alfred that has Micheal literally stuffed like a Thanksgiving turkey using pages from the bookshop owner's favorite tome, a book on the French Revolution, it is Georgina that makes sure her dead flame is properly dressed and fully cooked, so that her husband can also experience what it is like to have the penetrating bibliophile 'inside' his body.

As oftentimes described by reviewers of the film, The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover utilizes eccentric characters, which are essentially walking and talking caricatures of the reasonably complex and calculating sort, as allegorical representations of the following: The Cook = Civil servants, The Thief = Thatcher and her insatiable need for greed and unwavering arrogance, The Wife = Britannia, The Lover = leftist/intellectuals who have the power to seduce, but are too impotent and ill-equipped to put up a worthy fight. Luckily, the film is too steeped in succulently stylized tableaux, character pathology and aesthetic scatology for one to feel like they have been penetrated with a putrid and pretentious political parable of the preposterous pomo sort. While Marco Ferreri's filmic food farce La Grande Bouffe (1973) aka The Grande Bouffe may make for a bodacious brunch with barrels of boobs, buffets, and belches, The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover is a meticulously prepared three course celluloid meal that totally fulfills without the unwanted side-effects of sentimentalist flatulence and preachy political puffery that is known to result in deleterious diarrhea of the mind and soul. Admittedly, The Cook, the Thief, His Wife & Her Lover was specially prepared for those with refined taste for tableaux and iron stomachs for aberrant aestheticism and subversive themes, so if you're looking for some filmic fast food, stay clear of Greenaway's celluloid cuisine and head to the dead-end drive thru of Stevie Spielberg or Mickey Bay's mass-produced fodder.

THE COOK, THE THIEF, HIS WIFE, HER LOVER

Peter Greenaway (1989)

I present to you a film with numerous bans and cuts, heavily censored around the world. Peter Greenaway directed the lush film which is indeed a "Black Comedy". The plot revolves around a restaurant named Le Hollandais which lays home to a bizarre kitchen crew. The co-owner is a despicable man named Albert who is married to a woman named Georgie. Throughout the film we realize that she is regularly abused as well as demeaned in public. She is afraid of him, and for the fact, everyone else is too. This situation sets the story up real nice and rarely gets boring.

One thing that makes this film click so well within our heads is the set pieces. The slums outside of the restaurant are boorish and breathe life in this offbeat film. When this film was released it garnered an "X" Rating only to be later cut to "NC-17".

The stories Albert exchanges nearly challenge the perversion of The Marquis De Sade. Albert's character is loathsome. Michael Gambon did a wonderful job and so did his weird sidekick Tim Roth. Upon viewing this film, the costumes strike your eyes and speak their own story, but the real magic happens once you enter the kitchen. A bearded strong man, a falsetto churning young lad, and the head cook Richard are just the fore-runners to such a surreal cast. The score is composed by Michael Nyman and pumps the moods up and presents each individual intense moment with Brass and Percussion. The dialogue is brash and immersive and the humor is razor sharp.

The director uses the color red so vividly just as in his other masterpiece "The Baby Of Mâcon". In a short summary, this film is a taboo-shattering theatrical masterpiece with Cannablism, Necrophila, Human Waste Consumption, and Fork Stabs to please even the most jaded cinema go-er. A tragic Love story at heart, this film could be considered Georges Batailles's Romeo & Juliet. A four-star dessert.

NEVER TALK TO STRANGERS

Peter Hall (1995)

Never Talk to Strangers is not the film you are thinking about with Antonio Banderas. This one, in fact, is a 70's roughie XXX film. The only available copy is double-billed with the gorenography Hardgore. It is of no real importance and could easily be forgotten. The whole film is an 8mm loop of the same porn to make you feel like you got your money's worth. What makes this film worth your time? Well, it happens to have the most hilarious editing I have ever-bare witness to. The screenplay follows a man in a white coat sporting an Afro, sodomizing two young females and performing bizarre tortures, such as nipple clamping, and electric shock on the ejaculation resting on Woman #2. The editing compromises each scene featuring a close up shot of his face over-acting various emotions, sort of like flash cards. Some of them feature him slyly smiling and nodding, to show his approval, and others show curiosity. These various facial expressions cannot be described vividly and must be viewed for the full effect. The second enjoyable aspect of the film is the colorful, yet funky soundtrack. The soundtrack incorporates beats and melodies similar to the golden days of Blaxploitation; Easily the best soundtrack for a porno film. Never Talk to Strangers is a bland half-an-hour porn that features buckets of sweat and hair. Only should be viewed for hilarity.

THE LEFT-HANDED WOMAN

While best known, at least in the cinema world, as the screenwriter for various Wim Wenders films like Falsche Bewegung (1975) aka The Wrong Movie (which is itself a loose adaption of Goethe's 1795-1796 second novel Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship) and especially Der Himmel über Berlin (1987) aka Wings of Desire (which was later loosely remade as the horrendous 1998 Hollywood movie City of Angels starring Nicholas Cage and Meg Ryan), avant-garde Slovene-Austrian writer Peter Handke has directed four feature-length films of his own, with his second work, Die linkshändige Frau (1978) aka The Left-Handed Woman, being easily his greatest and most revered, if not predictably controversial, cinematic effort to date. Rather bizarrely, especially considering a man who is foremost a novelist directed it, The Left-Handed Woman was originally envisioned as a screenplay and although the writer first released it as a book, he directed the film only a year later. On top of that, Handke's film is a work where the protagonist (or should I say 'anti-heroine'), whose psychological motivations are never examined, rarely speaks and does not even open her mouth until well past the 20-minute mark, thereupon making for a largely visually poetic work that does not seem like it would translate well on paper. Lauded in a review entitled "She Wants to Be Alone" featured in the 7 April 1980 issue of the Village Voice written by J. Hoberman (co-author of the seminal work Midnight Movies) as, "that rare thing, a genuinely poetic movie," Handke's film may not be as immaculately assembled as his cinematic collaborations with Wenders (who produced the film), yet The Left-Handed Woman certainly has a more authentic and overbearing soul that bleeds mercilessly with much internal pain, abject misery, and impenetrable melancholy, albeit in a sort of hermetic fashion that demands total patience and attention from the viewer. The superlatively somber and potentially suicide-inspiring story of a young married German mother living abroad in Paris who abruptly has what she describes as an "epiphany" and kicks her husband out of their apartment and ultimately leaves him for good without rhyme or reason, Handke's work has been described as everything from misogynistic to a rare true feminist film made by a man, yet if anything is for sure, it is that the lead character is an insufferable introvert who need not articulate her negation of society with words. Indeed, German actress Edith Clever, who previously played the eponymous role in Éric Rohmer's Heinrich von Kleist adaptation The Marquise of O (1976) aka Die Marquise von O..., certainly deserves credit for playing what I have come to regard as one of the most innately intolerable female characters in cinema history, as a cold mother and wife who brings coldness and rejection to virtually every single important person in her life, including her own young son. Indeed, forget Liv Ullmann's character in Ingmar Bergman's masterpiece Persona (1966) and the bisexual terrorist mother of Salvatore Samperi's rather underrated work Cuore di mamma (1969) aka Mother's Heart, The Left-Handed Woman features the most tension-stirring tongue-tied female character that I have had the distinguished delight of suffering watching. Arguably most influenced by the films of Japanese auteur Yasujiro Ozu (Tokyo Story, Early Spring), whose portrait is featured prominently in the protagonist's apartment (not to mention the fact that she goes to a movie theater to watch one of his films), the work naturally features static camera work that underscores the eponymous character's sense of self-imposed isolation and intrinsic introversion. If you've ever wondered what was brewing in the seemingly dormant post-WWII Teutonic Volksgeist, Handke's almost malevolently melancholy film might not give you a positive answer, but it will certainly demonstrate that some members of the German fairer sex might have benefited from being members of the BDM (Bund Deutscher Mädel) during their teenage years.

Marianne (Edith Clever) is a German former writer/translator living in Paris who has given up her career to take care of her young nerdy son Stefan (Markus Mühleisen) and be a wife to her husband Bruno (Bruno Ganz). When Marianne meets up with her husband, who she has not seen in some time, at Roissy airport, she shows virtually nil love or joy for Bruno, who complains on the car drive back that he spent most of his trip to Finland drunk and that he hates the Finnish because, unlike other European languages, he could not understand a single word of the language. Bruno also does not seem to understand a single word his wife says either. After spending the night drinking wine in a metaphorical scene at a fancy restaurant where a flower wilts and Bruno discusses reading an English-language novel on the joys of feudal servitude, the somewhat odd couple subsequently have passionless sex that same night that concludes with the introverted wife looking dead with a totally expressionless stare that tells the viewer that something is not quite right with her. The next day, Marianne drops a bomb on her hubby as they stroll through a dreary park that will change both of their lives forever. Indeed, out of nowhere, Marianne reveals that she has had an "epiphany" and tells Bruno to "Go away. Leave me alone." With no real reason given, Marianne throws Bruno out of her life and takes control of their poor son, even though she seems almost as resentful of him as her spouse. When Bruno comes to visit his wife shortly after being kicked out of their apartment, he calls her a "mystic" (notably, Handke once wrote in his work that, "The mystical is the mind's beginning and at the same time hinders its further development.") and tells her that a couple of electroshocks would make her "reasonable again," though he also gives her money and supplies for work and then leaves, but not before warning her that she will die of loneliness. Indeed, despite claiming that typing gives her carpal tunnel syndrome, Marianne decides to take on a job as a translator. While staring at herself in the mirror (though she is right-handed, she becomes left-handed upon staring at her reflection), Marianne venomously declares to her imaginary adversaries (assumedly, her non-present husband): “You think what you will! The more you think you know about me, the freer from you I become!”

Despite being a prepubescent grade school boy, little Stefan realizes that there is something cold and impenetrable about his mother, complaining to her while they eat dinner together one night: “You laugh like Philip. He always tries hard to laugh. You’re never really delighted. Just one time you were really delighted with me.” Indeed, even Marianne cannot deny she is a lousy mother, as she cannot even try to deny what Stefan says. When Marianne is visited by her elderly publisher (German actor/filmmaker Bernhard Wicki of The Bridge (1959) aka Die Brücke and The Longest Day (1962)), her lack of maternal qualities are once again reinforced, as her friend remarks, “You are only concerning yourself with the child now...to avoid responding to me. Why are you playing the mother-child game?” To Marianne’s credit, she retorts to her publisher’s remarks, “Maybe you’re right.” After giving her a copy of Gustave Flaubert’s A Simple Heart to translate, the publisher leaves Marianne with the remark: “Now begins the longtime of your solitude.” When Marianne begins translating, she becomes even less tolerant of her son and even gets so mad at him at one point that she literally wrings his neck in a seemingly homicidal fashion. Of course, Bruno eventually pays another visit to Marianne and tells her that one day that she will hang herself and makes the following marvelous misogynistic rant: “You women with your puny reason. With your brutal understanding for everything and everybody. And you’re never bored, you good-for nothing. All excited you sit around and let time pass. You know why nothing can ever become of you? Because you never get drunk alone. Like vain photographs of yourselves, you slouch in your tidy apartments. Machines of incapacitation for everything alive. Sniffing the ground, you crawl every which way, until death tears your mouth wide open. You and your new life. I never saw a woman who changed her life for good.” Bruno also confesses that he walked on foot to the apartment with the intention of “destroying” his estranged wife and when Marianne attempts to comfort him by touching him, he warns her by hostilely saying, “Don’t touch me. Please. Don’t touch me.” Indeed, at this point, it seems that any love that Bruno previously had for Marianne has now transformed into visceral hatred. Of course, aside from her fear that her husband might hurt her, Marianne seems totally unmoved by Bruno’s hatred. While Marianne demonstrates nothing but rejection and negation to all the important men in her life, she also turns down her female best friend Franziska (Angela Winkler) when she attempts to get her to join some feminist group.

When Marianne’s elderly father (played by German veteran actor Bernhard Minetti who starred in Leni Riefenstahl’s troubled 1954 film Tiefland) pays her a visit and she asks him if he still writes, he gives her the following somber spiel: “You’re saying I’m at life’s end and still writing. I think I have lived in the wrong direction. I’m not blaming it on the war or other circumstances, but on myself.

THE LEFT-HANDED WOMAN

Sometimes now my writing seems like an excuse to me. Sometimes of course it doesn't. Before falling asleep at night often I don't have anybody to think about. For the simple fact that I haven't met with anybody all day. Even though I know how good it feels to fall asleep thinking of someone. On the other hand I meet with people mainly to...make sure I'd be found in time if worst came to worst. Not by lying around for so long." After he confesses that he rarely cries (a major theme of much of post-WWII German cinema/literature is the 'inability to mourn'), Marianne's father warns his seemingly metaphysically dead daughter: "And you're going to end up just like me, Marianne. A remark that concludes the point of my mission." After they have their big talk, Marianne and her father go to a photobooth where they bump into a goofy out-of-work film actor (played by Wenders regular Rüdiger Vogler). After the father remarks to the actor that he is a poser who tries to act like a Hollywood star and refuses to put his true self into his roles, Marianne finds herself with a new love interest of sorts. Indeed, the actor bumps into Marianne a couple days later and confesses that he has never pursued a woman in his life, but he has looked for her for days. In the end, Marianne goes on a 'sentimental' camping trip with her son in what seems to be a junkyard and later Bruno stops by and confesses he is doing rather well despite the divorce, yet when the protagonist has a party with all her best friends and loved ones, she still has to admit her best friend Franziska, "even now I want to be alone," thus demonstrating her radical love of isolation. The film ultimately concludes with the following quote from artist/filmmaker Vlado Kristl: "Have you noticed there's only room for those who make room for themselves?"

Despite being nominated for the Golden Palm Award at the Cannes Film Festival in 1978, as well as winning the German Film Award in Gold for "Best Editing" (Peter Przygodda) in 1978 and the Guild Film Award in Gold at the Guild of German Art House Cinemas festival in 1980, The Left-Handed Woman seemed to completely go over the head of certain less sophisticated viewers like Hebraic hack film critic Leonard Maltin, who complained regarding the work, "Time passes... and the audience falls asleep." Indeed, if you're looking for uplifting mindless entertainment of the conspicuously contrived Hollywood sort, Handke's work might inspire you to blow your brains out, but if you're looking for a totally engulfing work with a distinctive mood that claws at the soul without mercy yet also picks at the brain with equal severity, The Left-Handed Woman is certainly a singular work that makes most of Wenders' films seem like the counterfeit celluloid swill directed by an emotional retard by comparison. An anti-melodramatic malady of a movie revolving around an emotionally constipated woman who desires some sort of intangible freedom but is mostly a slave of her own stubbornness, isolation, and intolerance of other people, including her own loved ones, Handke's film is certainly a work that manages to express the essence of its particular glacial zeitgeist via a fiercely frigid Fräulein, which is certainly no small accomplishment, especially considering it was directed by a member of the less hysterical sex. Compared to Volker Schlöndorff's similarly themed yet overtly feminist-driven work A Free Woman (1972) aka Strohfeuer—a film starring the director's then-wife Margarethe von Trotta, whose real-life divorce heavily inspired the film—The Left-Handed Woman seems like pernicious poetry that (quite unlike Schlöndorff's film!) never makes the mistake of attempting to make some sort of silly post-68er-Bewegung socio-political statement. As for Handke's aesthetic intent with the film, he once confessed, "What I am really striving to attain is monotony in its most intensive form." Indeed, The Left-Handed Woman is a work that turns banality into a sort of high celluloid art, as a film where nothing really goes on, yet every single scene is layered with a sort of nerve-racking intensity that never gives the viewer a chance to breathe. Unlike the typical Hollywood film, Handke offers no insights into the lead character's psychological motivations, thus it is up to the viewer to enter the seemingly half-loony lady's little head to see what makes her do the rather deleterious things she does. While I somewhat doubt it was the director's intent in terms of the film's title, the protagonist of the work is, spiritually speaking, certainly a follower of the Left-Hand Path, as a woman who has decided to break all the taboos of her bourgeois life and becomes her own god(dess), even if a rather weak and ineffective one whose greatest demonstration of personal sovereignty is walking around her neighborhood wearing a fancy (and rather aesthetically displeasing!) fur-coat. Made during a period of a so-called 'literaturverfilmungskrise' (literature adaptation crisis) in West Germany (Ronald Holloway once noted that, "Literature is the backbone of German cinema... Remove that backbone from the history of New German Cinema, and it appears to be a jelly-fish," The Left-Handed Woman is arguably most important because it proved German filmmakers could do more than just recycle played-out 19th century literary classics, as Handke's film is a truly modern avant-garde work that arguably managed to capture the spirit of its zeitgeist better than anything ever directed by Wenders or Schlöndorff. A sort of contra A Woman Under the Influence (1974), Handke's film ultimately expresses more its lack of drama than any sort of histrionic acting ever could. Indeed, for those looking to 'understand' the seemingly inexplicable behavior of innately introverted women, you probably can do no better than The Left-Handed Women.

HEAVENLY CREATURES

Peter Jackson (1994)

Good sadistic lesbian films are hard to come by. This is especially true in regards to high school girls. The French lesbian featured in Alexandre Aja's High Tension made me want to vomit. I wasn't surprised to find out that the blonde bull dyke with a crew cut was also a bit schizophrenic. For a notable fantastic yet deranged lesbo flick, one needs to turn to Peter Jackson's Heavenly Creatures. The film stars a very young Kate Winslet who befriends (among other things) a loser fat girl. The unflattering looking and trollish Peter Jackson directed Heavenly Creatures before CGI special effects unfortunately caught his fancy. Heavenly Creatures combines fantasy, comedy, and horror for an unsettling experience of unconventional sorts. It makes one wonder why Peter Jackson would bother with a remake of King Kong (other than the monetary return). Heavenly Creatures is a film about an unholy relationship that is constantly interrupted by unpleasant situations (like tuberculosis). By the end of the film, the two ambiguous lovers prove they will do anything to keep their bond. Heavenly Creatures is based on the real life true crime case of Parker-Hulme. I won't go into anymore detail, but it involves sexual perversity and blood. I don't know about the real Juliet Hulme, but Kate Winslet has an amazing performance as an eccentric young lady that is a little too smart for her own good. Melanie Lynskey also does a good job playing the young ogre school girl Pauline Parker. I watched in disgust every time I saw Parker on screen. Out of all Peter Jackson's films, I believe Heavenly Creatures to be the most ambitious. The film does an exceptional job of coming in and out of dreams. The two schoolgirl friends in Heavenly Creatures aren't the most normal of girls and Peter Jackson's directing skills demonstrate that. Peter Jackson also gives respect to Carol Reed's The Third Man and Mr. Orson Welles. I wouldn't be surprised if Peter Jackson was in the middle of a Federico Fellini marathon during the production of Heavenly Creatures. The film certainly brought me to another world.

Peter Kern (1991)

Speculating solely from his feature-length work Gossenkind (1992) aka Street Kid – the director’s only film released on any format (a long out-of-print VHS tape) in the U.S. and arguably (and rather strangely) his most ‘commercial’ cinematic effort to date, at least outside of Europe – I would assume Austrian actor/auteur Peter Kern (Domenica, Haider lebt - 1. April 2021) had a rather lecherous life-changing experience while still a young man in the prestigious Austrian Vienna Boys’ Choir as I have yet to see another pathologically perverse, pederast flick with such a conventionally directed and weirdly ‘wholesome’ pedo-packaging as if the filmmaker was a ‘poor man’s Spielberg’ who lost all restraint in regard to his taboo vice and went ‘full fantasy’ (as it were). Featuring everything from absurdist kraut auteur Christoph Schlingensief (Tunguska - The Crates Are Delivered!, The 120 Days of Bottrop) playing the seemingly tailored role of a retarded pedophile farm-boy who sports a vintage Wehrmacht hat, to a teenage hustler boy who is sadistically sodomized by his mother’s alcoholic boyfriend (while his mama watches on passively), Street Kid is surely not the sort of quirky and cute ‘kids film’ that it was advertised as, but a unsoundly soft-hearted NAMBLA-inspired pro-pedophile perv piece directed by an obscenely obese debauchee with a sick sense of cinematic sentimentalism. With its combination of city skaters destroying the concrete, salacious teen sex, and petty proletarian criminality, Street Kid is the virtual gritty celluloid prototype for Larry Clark’s Kids (1995), except with a more coherent narrative and no pretensions towards a realist cinéma vérité aesthetic. Essentially, Street Kid is a completely incriminating (at least, on the director’s part) cumming-of-age flick about an androgynous 14-year-old male hustler named Axel Glitter (Max Kellermann) – oddly, of no relation to Gary – who sports of preposterous Elvis pompadour, tight denim jeans, and cowboy boots. As someone whose own mother tells her only son that she couldn’t possibly have given birth to him and that he stinks “like a rat,” on top of being regularly abused by his mom’s belligerent boy toy, Axel is not the most appreciated of people with fucked haircuts, but he does get a superlatively sick yet sad self-esteem boost by peddling his aberrant adolescent ass on the streets. Luckily for him, Axel’s life changes, if only momentarily, when he meets a middle-aged bourgeois John and crypto-fag family man named Karl Heinz Brenner (Winfried Glatzeder, who was one of the most popular actors in kraut commie East Germany due to his performance in Heiner Carow’s 1973 hit film The Legend of Paul and Paula); a positively pathetic mensch of the mostly marvelously mundane kind whose own son is around the same age as the boy he is bugging. Needless to say, when a bunch of nosy middle-class types notice that cunning cock-sucker Karl is carrying on with a sardonic street kid who sells sex when not stealing skateboards, things get a bit troublesome for the fatherly faggot and his surrogate sodomite son.

Axel Glitter has been arrested by the police for hawking his body to a variety of old homos a number of times, but as he tells his arresting officer upon questioning during the beginning of Street Kid, “you never get rid of horniness,” hence why prostitution is oftentimes described as the oldest profession in human history, at least among determinedly damned and degenerated, destitute types. Shamelessly borrowing themes and narrative ingredients from German author Thomas Mann’s novella Death in Venice (1912), and, in turn, Italian auteur Luchino Visconti’s 1971 film adaptation starring Dirk Bogarde of the same name, Street Kid also follows a dismally depressed ‘artiste,’ in this case a thespian, who is superficially respected by his colleagues, but does not feel anything resembling personal solace nor closeness towards anyone, not even his undersexed wife nor seemingly autistic son, until first encountering a 14-year-old boy who his call-boy-calling compatriot describes as being, “14. Skin like velvet, and the face of an angel..He kisses like an adult and he is just perfect.” A highly hermetic hidden homo who humps hustler hunks on the side and has fashioned himself a homestead and home life in the sort of banal bourgeoisie bedroom community that he has nothing but completely cloaked contempt for, Karl Heinz Brenner finds a suave savior in the form of a streetwalking pubescent prick-peddler that also happens to be a double illegal piece of high-priced pink-steel property being that he is both underage and a hustler in pre-legal-prostitution Deutschland. Of course, Mr. Brenner is not the only one breaking laws and matrimonial vows in his family, as his lascivious wife also has a rent boy on lease, not to mention the fact that their son, who seems to be no genius, but a sub-beta-male in the making like his father, is being savagely seduced by a seemingly retarded farmboy as devilishly depicted by Aryan aesthetic terrorist Christoph Schlingensiefel, thereupon giving Street Kid a vague celluloid kindred spirit to Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s thrilling psychodrama of inner-familial deceit Chinese Roulette (1976). That being said, one would not even suspect that Street Kid was a kraut flick, if it were not for the fact that all the dialogue is in German, because on top of featuring a number of swarthy semite-like actors that look like they could be the strikingly slim relatives of Peter Kern himself, the thematically taboo-ridden and totally taut celluloid work was directed in a highly contrived and sentimentally stereotypical manner not altogether different from a children’s Disney movie. When gay gentleman Karl Heinz finally gets the gall to “come out” as a kiddy cock-sucker, he wastes no time telling everyone who will listen to him, including a banal bank clerk, who he lets know after withdrawing all of his money from his savings account that, “I’m not going on vacation. I’m driving away with my 14-year-old boyfriend. In a forest we’ll undress and make love.” Of course, like most uptight, materialistic, and severely soulless middle-class types who prefer monetary comfort and mundane modesty to the life of their inner-libertine dreams any day due to an impenetrable fear of spontaneity and a need to conform, bougie boob boy-buggerer soon has second thoughts regarding his Thelma & Louise-esque adventures with Axel and with the law tailing his teen-twink-thrusting tommyrot, it seems like a better time than ever to poof-out.

As a sort of minor quasi-Marxist melodrama with a purely pro-pederaſt symbolic message of "die cis-system," Street Kid is easily one of the most degenerate and perturbing yet puerile cinematic I have ever seen and like Arthur J. Bressan Jr.'s adult-fucks-vulnerable-child flick Abuse (1983), one of a handful of curiously conspicuous out-and-out pedophilia-advocating films, which is baffling to me considering it has probably been a good three decades since director Peter Kern was able see and utilize his penis considering his iconic morbid obesity that has played a prominent role in leading to his bloated cult status in the German-speaking world. Ultimately, the most outrageously glaring message of Street Kid is that the only way for a homosexual man to be truly liberated from the heterosexual shackles of good, plain, and fake (as Axel, says himself, he hates "dishonest people") conventional society is by saving young street rats and acting as a flesh-fondling father figure of sorts or forever remain a closeted cuckold whose wife gets more callow cock than he does. As is typical of the average Hollywood drama, Street Kid features middle-class people that are hyper-hypocritical, decidedly disingenuous, unashamedly and ceaselessly banal, absurdly paranoid of any outsider, and innately artificial in character and emotional, the proletarian 'street kid' is audaciously authentic (of course, who would be modest after being anally man-handled by your mother's boyfriend as she looks passively on?!), sexually secure, wonderfully witty, and an all-around entertainer. Needless to say, Street Kid is not The Outsiders (1983) directed purported pederast Francis Ford Coppola, but it does prove that Peter Kern is quite the ambitious auteur of commercially campy cinematic deception, if not exactly a successful one. If you want proof that even pederasts can be sappy romantics, look no further than Peter Kern's Street Kid; a cinema work where sex, sodomy, and sickening smuttiness has never been so shortsightedly sentimental and superlatively superficial.

HAMLET: THIS IS YOUR FAMILY
HAMLET: THIS IS YOUR FAMILY

Peter Kern (2001)

If there is just one taboo obsession that German renegade Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensiefel (Egomania - Insel ohne Hoffnung, The 120 Days of Bottrop) revisited throughout his artistic career in various mediums, including film, theatre, television performance art, and political parties and rallies, it would undoubtedly be anything revolving around National Socialism – be it old school Hitlerism, degenerate neo-nazism, far-right populism, and/or völkisch kultur and kunst. Inspired by his discussions with Dietrich Kuhlbrodt – a Hamburg District Court lawyer for the persecution of crimes under National Socialism who also acted as film/theatre critic and sometimes performer in Schlingensiefel's films – and his fascination with concentration camps and Pasolini's final work Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), the filmmaker-turned-polymath only became all the more obsessed with all-things-nazi as the decades passed. First tackling the legacy of Adolf Hitler with his feature Menu Total (1986) aka Meat, Your Parents – a phantasmagorical fantasy of the decidedly depraved and structurally delirious that the daring auteur regarded as his finest film – Schlingensiefel went on to direct a play about homosexual neo-nazi leader (and later AIDS victim) Michael Kühnen (who the director portrayed in his film Terror 2000) entitled Kühnen '94, Bring Me the Head of Adolf Hitler! (1994) at the prestigious Volksbühne in Berlin, a remake of NS propagandist Veit Harlan's melodramatic masterpiece Opfergang (1944) entitled Mutter's Maske (1988), a Nazi-laden "German Trilogy" of films (100 Years Adolf Hitler - The Last Hour in the Führerbunker, The German Chainsaw-Massacre and Terror 2000 - Germany out of Control), and a racially-charged Big Brother reality spoof Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container (2002) where a group of brown-to-black untermensch in a makeshift concentration are departed one-by-one by members of the Austrian voting public.

Undoubtedly, one of Schlingensiefel's most ambitious and audacious artistic flirtations with Teuton-flavored fascism was his play Hamlet: This is Your Family—Nazi Line (2001); a feverish and frantic freeform reworking of the Shakespeare classic starring a cast of real-life Swiss ex-nazis that was inspired by the director's belief that nazi-free, 'neutral' Switzerland was on the verge of adopting postmodern fascism à la the Swiss People's Party (Schweizerische Volkspartei, SVP). Simultaneously a play, media frenzy, and active political action campaign, Schlingensiefel predictably caused an uproar in Switzerland, which was captured via the director's bloated buddy Peter Kern (who plays King Claudius in the play) via the documentary Hamlet: This is Your Family (2001). Utilizing the 'Nazi Line' protocol, which included SS-esque uniforms (one being donned by Schlingensiefel himself) and holding heated press conferences, the political program sought the objective: "Right wing extremists / neo-Nazis should experience economical and social warmth and support in order to be integrated into our society. additionally NAZI~LINE invests into psychological and medical treatment of neo-Nazis. International Corporations as well as neo-Nazis and hate criminals are kindly asked to participate.” Needless to say Hamlet: This is Your Family is just another example as to why Christoph Schlingensief – not unlike the character Hamlet – was the Fatherland’s last great ‘enfant terrible.’

During the beginning of Hamlet: This is Your Family, Schlingensief – wearing a specially tailored Nazi Line SS officer uniform – makes it quite clear that he does not plan to play nice with the Swiss when he states at the beginning of a show, “Who financed your theatre? Jews who fled our...my country. Because they had to. You lined your pockets with Jewish money. You invested it in culture. That’s the truth.” Indeed, the director may have been a tad bit hard on the bombastic Swiss bourgeois, but he found a special place in his heart for brutish bootboys who used to sail the swastika. Dressed in full skinhead regalia, the carbon-copy commandos barbarically beat and sodomize effete actors on stage and sing punk rock skinhead anthems in a manner that would make most viewers doubt the authenticity of their political conversion. The lead ex-nazi Torsten Lemmer – a towering chap who sports a leather trenchcoat and slicked back hair – seems like a rather reasonable guy with surely sound intentions, but that does nothing to stop other members of Schlingensief’s production from treating him and his ex-Hitlerite comrades like they ran a gas chamber at Auschwitz, thereupon bringing doubt as to whether ex-neo-nazis can ever lead a normal life after ‘reintegrating’ into society. In fact, the prop-man for Hamlet: This is Your Family – a culturally-diversified degenerate with large African plates in his ears and aesthetically-repellent full-sleeves of tribal tattoos – adamantly refuses to “furnish props for the Nazis in this play” as if he is at risk for contracting some sort of obscure venereal disease by doing so. To the petty prop-man’s credit, one of the ex-nazi chicks claim that leader Lemmer is still a neo-nazi and that his alleged disavowing of his past is merely a ploy for him to become mayor of Düsseldorf, which probably had some to truth it as it was later revealed that he continued to work for a far-right record label from 2002-2006, despite marrying a Moroccan mud and converting to Islam in 2002. Regardless, in Hamlet: This is Your Family Lemmer and his ex-brownshirts pay tribute to poet/playright Bertolt Brecht – the Marxist race-traitor who committed racial treason by marrying multiple Jewesses – by taking a pilgrimage to his Berlin grave. Ultimately, I get the impression that Lemmer is merely a social misfit with no strong ideals aside from the desire to shock, provoke, and opportunistically attempt to gain political power because when Peter Kern asked him who he would have been during the Third Reich, he unhesitatingly states, “A resistance fighter, no doubt. I always oppose the establishment.” Aside from eccentric ex-nazis, Hamlet: This is Your Family also has the notable distinction of featuring Fassbinder Superstar Irm Hermann (in the play as Queen Gertrude), who has no inhibition about going topless despite being nearly 60-years-old at the time of filming. For the play, Schlingensiefel, also paid posthumous tribute to his spiritual father Rainer Werner Fassbinder for what would have been his 53rd birthday and to Hermann for her 500th performance. Naturally, Hamlet: This is Your Family – with its Germanization of Shakespeare's Hamlet and tribute to Brecht and Fassbinder – is an Anglophile's worst nightmare.

Ultimately, in terms of a 'social change' experiment, Hamlet: This is Your Family seems to have been, at the very least, a partial failure, but as an active multimedia event and performance art play, Schlingensiefel was ultimately successful, at least in the context of creating something new, refreshing, and particularly provocative, which was in large part due to the filmmaker-turned-playwright's almost fascistic fanaticism, thereupon becoming the thing he loves to hate in the process, but to a more patently preposterous and innately ironic degree. Hamlet: This is Your Family would also act as a continuation of his work with his previous unclassifiable active art project Foreigners out! Schlingensiefel's Container, albeit this time more focusing on the terribly timid la-di-da bourgeois by belligerently and bluntly bombarding their natural habitat of the theatre, henceforth dropping political and artistic vulgarity into their lap via sardonically subverted reconstruction of Shakespeare where skinheads beat and bugger physically frail types that resemble the audience members themselves. Naturally, Schlingensiefel responded to certain audience attendees abruptly leaving the play by yelling to them, "you don't deserve theatre. You don't deserve culture. No more supper and no more culture. That's it...go to bed. Sleep til you're dead. That won't be long." And indeed, these passive spectators aka cultural parasites – individuals who are afraid to experience any new art or anything that isn't already regarded as a 'classic' because it takes them out of their well cultivated comfort zone – most certainly exhibit a sense of fear when confronted with Schlingensiefel's agile art without boundaries. As his friend/collaborator Elfriede Jelinek – an Austrian author who won the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2002 – stated of Schlingensiefel shortly after his death: "Schlingensiefel was one of the greatest artists who ever lived...He was not really a stage director (in spite of Bayreuth and Parsifal), he was everything: he was the artist as such. He has coined a new genre that has been removed from each classification. There will be nobody like him." Not unlike Hamlet, Schlingensiefel – who the theme of family (both literal and figurative) played an integral part of his oeuvre – died after decades of battling his family and defending his father(land) via his art without bounds and ideas without ideology while both enduring cleverly fabricated and detectably debilitating forms of madness.

HAIDER LEBT - 1. APRIL 2021

Peter Kern (2002)

Austrian actor/director Peter Kern – a portly man of seemingly Semitic ancestry – has never shied away from playing with themes relating to nationalism, the history of Nazism, and the so-called ‘far-right’ in general. In Hans-Jürgen Syberberg’s Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977), while ironically sporting a SS uniform, Kern’s character reenacted Peter Lorre’s speech as the childkiller Hans Beckert from Fritz Lang’s M (1931), but the rather rotund Austrian actor’s flirtation with fascism would reach its zenith with the films he sat in the director’s chair for. With his early women-in-prison exploitation flick The Island of the Bloody Plantation (1983) aka Die Insel der blutigen Plantage – a work he co-directed with fellow Fassbinder regular Kurt Raab – Kern created a work seemingly loosely inspired by H.G. Wells’ science fiction novel The Island of Doctor Moreau (1896) about a neo-nazi dictatorship that has enslaved and sexually tortures, rapes, and kills female Filipino sex slaves. Later in his filmmaking career, Kern would focus on more serious nazi-themed subjects with the documentary Hamlet: This is your Family, Nazi-line (2001), a document of his buddy Christoph Schlingensiefel’s adaptation of Shakespeare’s Hamlet starring real-life ex-neo-nazis. More recently, Kern created a Hollywood-like melodrama Initiation aka Blutsfreundschaft (2008) about a newbie neo-nazi who forms a bond with an old homosexual (Helmut Berger) who suffered persecution during the Third Reich era. Undoubtedly, out of all of Peter Kern’s auteur efforts, his dystopian sci-fi comedy Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 (2002) aka Haider Lives – a no-budget digital video work starring hot German actor August Diehl (The Counterfeiter, Inglourious Basterds) in a rarely-seen performance he agreed to do for free (like all the actors in the film) due to lack of funds. A satirical reworking of ex-nazi propagandist Wolfgang Liebeneiner’s (director of the 1941 pro-euthanasia work Ich klage an aka I Accuse) film 1. April 2000 (1952) – a political satire about continued allied occupation of Austria some half a century after the conclusion of the Second World War – Peter Kern’s Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 is both an artistic assault against recently deceased Austrian far-right politician Jörg Haider (longtime leader of the Austrian Freedom Party (FPÖ)) and the dubious relationship of the United States government with Iraq. Set twenty years after the apparent rise and fall of Haider’s dictatorship of Austria and eventual occupation of Europe by America, Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 portrays a mythical future Austria with a silly softcore authoritarian dictatorship.

The title of Kern’s Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 is quite interesting because, as of October 11, 2008, the real-life Haider no longer lives. Dying under mysterious conditions that sparked speculation among Haider’s widow and conspiracy theorist alike, Jörg Haider – the first popular and powerful ‘right-wing’ Austrian nationalistic leader since the Third Reich and uncompromisingly nationalistic politician believed to have 'Nazi sympathies' due to his positive remarks about members of the Waffen-SS and less than flattering remarks about certain Jewish leaders – was certainly the sort of controversial leader who would be marked for assassination by a variety of idealistic opponents. Closely monitored by Mossad (the Israeli Secret Service) due to his political ties (apparently receiving large money transfers) to prominent 'Islamofascist dictators' like Saddam Hussein and Muammar Gaddafi, as well as his vocal positive remarks about the National Socialist era and his 'minimalism' of the holocaust and recognition of atrocities committed against Germanic peoples during World War II, Haider was indubitably a politician that certain alien anti-European elements and innumerable mainstream left-wingers wanted dead, thus making the film Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 an all the more curious work since its initial release over a decade ago, especially considering he and his Arab associates are no longer living. A proud Austrian who wore lederhosen and engaged in mountaineering (as shown in the film), Haider was certainly not the sort of ethno-masochistic multiculturalist that is typical of most modern European and American politicians. That being said, it is interesting to note that director Peter Kern has described Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 as a 'Heimatfilm' (aka 'homeland-film'), but considering the filmmaker's political persuasion, this sardonic satire at the expense of Haider and Austrian nationalists in general, is not exactly in the tradition of Arnold Fanck's The Holy Mountain (1926) aka Der heilige Berg. Like his friend and collaborator Christoph Schlingensiefel did with Mutter's Maske (1988) – a freeform remake of the National Socialist arthouse masterpiece Opfergang (1944) directed by Veit Harlan – Kern molest, mangles, mutilates, and ultimately deconstructs and re-assembles the 'Heimatfilm', henceforth resulting in a schlocky and artistically sacrilegious final product that no one would confuse with the real thing.

Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 opens with the lead protagonist August Maria Kaiser (August Diehl), a German journalist, awaking from bed and discovering the American Anschluss of Austria is complete with the American dollar officially replacing the Euro and the implementation of U.S. laws, including Capital Punishment and yank-style Civil Rights. A.M. Kaiser (who likes to sleep through the morning, hence his initials) – a spokesman and reporter for the fictional German Free TV – sets out to make a documentary about the political climate in contemporary Austria and by doing so, is constantly harassed by members of an American Gestapo, who have outlawed Austrian vernacular and traditional Austrian folk songs. Apparently, like fellow Austrian nationalist leader Adolf Hitler, Haider inevitably caused his nation to fall in enemy hands after the fall of his short-lived 'Germania' empire (which included Germany and surrounding states). With European nations divided into American satellite states and Johnny Bush (fictional son of George) as the prime minister of Austria, A.M. Kaiser soon comes to realize that Europa is a technocratic entity of a prison planet where – through forced deracination and globalization – important cultural ingredients like art and individuality are dissolving into nonexistence. Although Americans want Austrian citizens to believe he is dead, many people, including A.M. Kaiser, believe that ex-dictator Jörg Haider (whose reign lasted from 2003-2020) is hiding somewhere in the underground. As A.M. Kaiser discovers throughout his video-diary journey, Haider is, for many, a beloved folk hero like Uncle Adolf was to Germanic peoples in the 1930s and 1940s, but for some, including a disgruntled citizen played by Peter Kern himself, who almost has a heart attack while spewing his hatred, have less than fond memories about the missing Austrian politician. Eventually, Kaiser meets up with Mrs. Susanne Riess-Passer (Traute Hoess) – an excessively eccentric lady that loves the red-white-red (Austrian flag colors) and loathes the red-white-blue of the American occupiers – who is based on the real-life former politician of Freedom Party of Austria (FPÖ) that at onetime acted as a ‘puppet’ chairwoman and leader of the FPÖ due to Haider’s controversial reputation. As mentioned in Haider lebt - 1. April 2021, Riess-Passer earned the nickname ‘Königskobra’ (aka King Cobra) due to her loyalty to Haider. In the film, Riess-Passer leads A.M. Kaiser on an odyssey that ends in the forests of Austria, in the course of time revealing the truth about Haider’s whereabouts is finally revealed.

Considering Jörg Haider’s tragic death and posthumous rumors that the ill-fated Austrian politician was living a twink-filled, second life as a homosexual, one can only wonder how Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 would have turned out had it been conceived a decade later. A micro-budget film-within-a-film with science fiction pretenses, Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 – like Jean-Luc Godard’s Alphaville (1965) – has no elaborate futuristic sets nor any semblance that it actually takes place in a foreseeable future, thereupon making it one of the most clever and politically astute ‘homevideo aesthetic’ works ever made. Shot over the course of 7 days with unpaid actors, Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 – although a work seething with cynical anti-nationalist hatred hidden by satirical and often juvenile humor – is undoubtedly a labor of love that could have only been assembled by a man with a potent and penetrating vision. Predating the aesthetically and thematically similar work Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan (2006) starring Sacha Baron Cohen, Haider lebt - 1. April 2021, as well as the films, plays, and TV shows of Peter Kern’s recently deceased compatriot Christoph Schlingensiefel, are ultimately more socio-politically insightful than the popular mockumentary by the same sociopathic jackasses that brought us Brüno (2009); a work that is incidentally (or not) about a gay Austrian. Of course, like the fictional future Europe portrayed in Haider lebt - 1. April 2021, it is questionable whether Kern and Schlingensiefel will ever gain a serious cult following, which is largely due to American homogenization and imported Hollywood anti-kultur. Say what you will about Jörg Haider, but at least he would have secured a future for the Heimat-film, had he actually lived long enough to become the uncontested Führer of the Fatherland.

BLUTSFREUNDSCHAFT

Peter Kern (2009)

Undoubtedly, the Austrian neo-nazi-themed melodrama Initiation aka Blutsfreundschaft (2009) directed by Peter Kern (Crazy Boys, The Island of the Bloody Plantation) is one of the most haphazardly assembled and shamelessly clichéd films that I have seen all year, but I guess I should have expected so much after watching the trailer for it before enduring such a such an intrinsically wretched and repulsive work. Centering around a 16-year-old teenage protagonist named Axel (Harry Lampl) who randomly takes shelter in the home business of an 80-year-old homosexual laundromat owner named Gustav Tritzinsky (played by a lifeless Helmut Berger) after accidentally stabbing to death a leftist social worker in an effort to impress his new neo-nazi friend, Blutsfreundschaft is a work about an individual that has to make the crucial and totally black-and-white decision between becoming a Hitlerphile philistine or a dirty old man's personal twink-in-training. Directed by Peter Kern, who like fellow Fassbinder graduate Ulli Lommel (Adolf and Marlene, Cocaine Cowboys), went on to seemingly disown everything he learned from the German New Wave master auteur and directed a series of ludicrously lackluster exploitation films. For example, with Fassbinder cohort Kurt Raab, Kern co-directed the innately gratuitous women-in-prison flick The Island of the Bloody Plantation (1983) aka Die Insel der blutigen Plantage – a rather repellant work featuring neo-nazi commandos sadistically raping, torturing, and murdering helpless, brown savage babes – so, before even viewing fractured and monstrously mundane melodrama Blutsfreundschaft, I knew I would probably have trouble taking it seriously. Still, I was willing to put my preconceptions aside, as a film featuring Helmut Berger, sexual perversion, and Nazis couldn't be half bad as proven by The Damned (1969), but, unfortunately, Kern is no Visconti and Blutsfreundschaft is no Nicolo Donato's Brotherhood (2009), though I would be lying if I did not admit the film kept me relatively stimulated throughout, but for all the wrong reasons, sort of the same way a tension headache would.

It is beyond question that Austrian Aryan abberosexual Helmut Berger was the flaming queen of the late 1960s and 1970s European silver screen as proven by his iconic and effortlessly effete performances in such masterpieces ranging from Massimo Dallamano's exploitative Oscar Wilde adaptation Dorian Gray (1970) to Luchino Visconti's arthouse epic Ludwig (1972), but in Blutsfreundschaft, the actor's talents go to waste as he seems like a tired, old eunuch incapable of even caring about the film he is starring in. In Blutsfreundschaft, Berger plays a mostly sad and sedentary homosexual senior citizen named Gustav Tritzinsky whose only motivation in life is being the greatest remover of stains from clothes. A member of the prestigious Hitler Youth as an adolescent, Tritzinsky's world fell into shambles when his boyhood Lebensmensch was executed in a concentration camp after the two blood brothers killed a senior member of the HJ during a scuffle centering around the leader realizing the boys were more than just typical butt buddies. Tritzinsky never got over his beau boy's death and partly blamed himself for it due to squealing while under interrogation by the SS. When skinhead-in-training Axel happens to stumble into the old man's laundromat, Tritzinsky is quite shocked by the startling resemblance between the seemingly nice neo-nazi and lover of his youth he lost long ago, thus causing him to recollect the torrid tragedy of his youth. Naturally, aside from half-hearted stormtrooper Axel, all the skinheads featured in Blutsfreundschaft are one-dimensional caricatures – savage white niggers if you will – that make the swinish Aryan thugs of the Hollywood neo-bolshevik agit-prop flick American History X (1998) seem like slightly subversive gentlemen and scholars. Of course, Tritzinsky is portrayed as a somber sage of sorts who, aside from his fellow sexual inverts, is the only virtuous person featured in the entirety of Blutsfreundschaft. Assuredly, the most nefarious characters in the film are the SS officers from Tritzinsky's youth; a malicious, elderly woman (despite the fact that women, especially antiquated ones, could not join the SS!) and a pernicious pervert who hits on Tritzinsky's boy-toy seconds before putting a bullet in his brain via his trusty luger. Blutsfreundschaft also features a young tranny-in-training named Jacob Ostermann aka Christina Thürmer (Melanie Kretschmann) who lives with and is best friends with Tritzinsky. Despite having XY chromosomes, Jacob/Christina becomes sort of a love interest for fairweather neo-nazi Axel. Proving he might be halfway heterosexual after all (in between literally shaking his bare ass for a dirty old man), Axel pounds a proud skinhead byrd (who is routinely beaten and spat and pissed on by the bodacious boot boys) with his wienerschitznel. In short, Blutsfreundschaft features the sort of callow libertine family affairs that Fassbinder might be directing as eternal punishment had he been banished to hell after his untimely death.

Needless to say, although Blutsfreundschaft purports to be a serious melodrama that takes a stern stance against 'hate,' this relatively graceless, uncultured, and pathetically preachy Austrian film feels more like an ADL-sponsored afterschool special with softcore exploitation undertones than the work of a filmmaker who had previously collaborated with Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Christoph Maria Schlingensiefel, Rosa von Praunheim, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Daniel Schmid, Werner Schroeter, and Edwin Bienen, among numerous other important European arthouse auteur filmmakers. After all, Mr. Schlingensiefel spent a good portion of his artistic career decrying the shallow sentiments of German and Austrian leftists, especially in regard to the Third Reich, yet with Blutsfreundschaft, Peter Kern even outdoes world-class wimp Wim Wenders with his untermensch sniveling and brownnosing. Considering my recent watching and enjoyment of Peter Kern's less than futuristic sci-fi satire Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 (2002) – a no-budget arthouse romp filmed within seven days with nil special-effects on deplorable digital video – I cannot fathom why the clearly intelligent and inventive Austrian auteur would direct a film so unwaveringly asinine and patently propagandistic as Blutsfreundschaft; a film with cartoon nutzis that even Steven Spielberg wouldn't have the gall to glorify as the epitome of hatred and a legit threat to Occidental civilization – except that perhaps he was fulfilling the perfect fantasy for himself, as a rather rotund grand-queen seducing a fit, young Aryan twink. One can only assume that with Blutsfreundschaft, Kern was trying to tap into the international film market, most specifically the U.S, as I have never seen a European auteur embarrass himself so thoroughly and unabashedly since Werner Herzog's ethno-masochistic tribute to pre-holocaust Judea Invinible (2001). Although to the director's minor credit, at least Kern's Blutsfreundschaft has minor camp value and is consistently unintentionally entertaining due to its hysterical yet humdrum melodrama and hyper-homophilia. On his personal website, Peter Kern eloquently describes himself as, "Austrian, insane, hysterical, hypocritical and undemocratic," so I think I am somewhat willing to forgive him for his aesthetic shoddiness with Blutsfreundschaft and will leave it up to his fallen auteur comrades to sort him out whenever he kicks the bucket, presumably from a massive myocardial infarction.

In ridiculous, ugly, and all-around aesthetically repulsive times, the world certainly needs consciously ridiculous, ugly, and all-around aesthetically repulsive films that remind the everyday lemming about the absurdity of the everyday degeneracy they take for granted as normal, and who could be better than a radically rotund Austrian queer like Peter Kern (Crazy Boys, Gossenkind aka Street Kid) to school the general public on their Hollywood-lobotomized stupidity? Best known to cinephiles as an effortlessly effete character actor who starred in a number of masterpieces by New German Cinema auteur filmmakers like Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Hans W. Geißendörfer, and Wim Wenders, and best known in his homeland as an eccentric public figure who is as obese as he is bizarrely goofy, Kern has also been a film director since 1980 who has directed a number of largely unknown films, including documentaries and queer melodramas, with campy comedies indubitably being his forte. With his self-described 'Heimat film' (which is really a digital video 'neo-anti-Heimat' film) Haider lebt - 1. April 2021 (2002), Kern unfortunately demonstrated that although he is a typical leftist Jörg Haider/Austrian Freedom Party (FPÖ) hater, he also proved that he could make leftist humor strangely charming and even labyrinthine in its loony absurdity. With his sardonically satirical piece of quasi-scatological meta-cinema Mörderschwestern (2011) aka Murder Sisters aka Murder Nurses starring a very old and tired Austrian queen Helmut Berger (The Damned, Ludwig) in the against-type role of a passive doctor who becomes the victim of naughty nurses, Kern has cleverly crafted an anti-agitprop agitprop piece that keenly reflects his cultivated hatred for both the mainstream media/cinema and the film-going public in general. Partly inspired by the horrific Lainz Angels of Death murders—a series of bizarre murders committed by four nurse's aides (who were all released from prison after just 25 years!) at Lainz General Hospital in Vienna that took place between 1983 and 1989 where at least 49 (but upwards of 200) patients were killed via morphine doses and having watered forced in their lungs—Mörderschwestern is a calculatingly cruel and cynical comedy featuring anti-Heimat, hagsploitation, and Grand Guignol elements that gleefully tortures the viewer for about 70 minutes or so. A film that takes 'breaking the fourth wall' to ungodly extremes wherein a pernicious professor and a hysterically deranged homicidal nurse anti-heroine demand that the viewer ostensibly choose which character will die and how, Mörderschwestern follows in the Austrian audience-alienating/anti-Hollywood tradition of Michael Haneke's Funny Games (1997), although Kern's work is not plagued by pedantic (pseudo)intellectualism but instead opts for cinematically pissing and vomiting on the viewer with slapstick scat and intentional aesthetic dissonance and asinities.

Beginning with a scrawny troll-like Professor (Marc Bischoff of Good Bye Lenin! and Taxidermia) giving a rather bizarre lecture in the strikingly scenic Austrian countryside and declaring, “Around these druid rocks, many myths and legends exist about savage men. Many generations before us they used to convene next to the druid rocks. Today we have convened in a cinema to explore the secret rituals of the ancient Celts and the magical powers of the druid rock,” Mörderschwestern quite rudely announces that it’s not a conventional film from the get go, but instead an innately iconoclastic work that pisses on Austria, the filmgoer, and the mainstream media. Indeed, the Prof soon magically appears in a lecture hall and announces to the viewer, “We are going to tear down the boundaries of the silver screen in order to influence the events going on behind the scenes.” After the Professor quasi-molests a beautiful blond college student with an IQ of 75, Mörderschwestern anti-heroine Tabea (Susanne Wuest of the TV miniseries Carlos the Jackal)—the former ‘Angel of Death’ of Lainz hospital who has spent just 15 years in prison being raped by bull-dykes for her part in murdering numerous patients while working as a nurse—makes her rude introduction while working at an outdoor restaurant that specializes in roast pork knuckles at Prater amusement park in Vienna. Tabea injects the roast knuckles with poison and leaves it up to the viewer to decide which member of a dysfunctional Austrian family will die. Ultimately, ‘the abused girl’ (a teen that looks kind of like Anne Frank whose uncle slaps her around) is poisoned and Tabea follows her to Lainz hospital by intentionally dousing herself with boiling grease. Tabea accuses the viewer of being “weak-minded do-gooders” for allowing the ‘Abused Girl’ to survive the poisoning and then starts an argument with an audience member named ‘Josef’ (indeed, the film has a long running joke where a fictional film audience, which incessantly pops up in the right corner of the screen, interacts with Tabea), who she accuses of having a “tiny wiener.” Tabea also reveals—while absurdly wheeling around the Abused Girl in a mobile hospital bed—that regarding the fictional filmgoers, 88% of them have cheated on their lovers, three are HIV-positive, 60% are heterosexual, and an outstanding 100% are deceivers. Indeed, Tabea seems to have a low opinion of the general public and especially the viewer (aka you!).

From there, real newsreels from the Lainz Angels of Death murders are shown (including footage of an elderly man having his ass wiped by a nurse Seidl-style!) and it is revealed that four nurses were indicted on 49 murders, with a certain Waltraud Wagner (aka Tabea) being responsible for a whopping 35 of them. Of course, Tabea proclaims her innocence, declaring she and her friends were “the vanguards of a new health care system...Dispose, make room, cut costs.” Not surprisingly, it is alluded that the Angels of Death were following in the footsteps of the National Socialists by eradicating “life unworthy of life.” Tabea confesses, “15 years in prison have made me really keen. They gave me a new identity, but no new soul,” as she has only become all the more deranged over the past 1.5 decade. Indeed, Tabea became the 'prison bunny' (aka lesbian sex slave) of an elderly women while imprisoned, so now she is all the more an active enemy against society, hence her need to go back to her former place of employment and once again help eradicate unworthy life. Meanwhile, a certain Dr. Schleyer (Helmut Berger) is being drugged by a certain deranged nurse named Schwester Klara (Kathrin Beck) and Tabea proceeds to follow her every malicious move. Of course, Dr. Schleyer 'meets his maker' and some other eccentric characters face the wrath of the nasty nurses. Meanwhile, fictional audience member Josef figuratively jumps through the smashed fourth wall and attempts to stop the mayhem by pathetically pleading, "Hello and good afternoon, I am just a simple observer and don't want to disturb you any further. But if you play on, you will die. I know that, because I'm a member of your audience and I voted for your death... Stop it! Stop it right now, or you're all going to die!", as the Abused Girl is encouraged to seek revenge against her abusive uncle by nurse Klara. In the end, it is revealed that the fictional audience has voted that Tabea die, but before she is forced to commit suicide via seppuku, she vehemently shouts out these words of wisdom to the viewer, "Don't you watch every piece of crap at the movies or on YouTube? You are always going to see what I prepare for you. It wasn't you who took the decisions, it was only me. And rest assured, even if you escape today and manage to exit the auditorium unharmed, at home the TV will be waiting. And there they will show up, the powerful elites and tell you what to do. And – stupid as you are – you will choose the channel with the most crime on it."

Undoubtedly, Mörderschwestern is a film so morally repugnant, pathologically nonsensical, and proudly preposterous that it hardly can be described as a 'film' at all, but one must respect a work that is described by one of its characters as the, "worst movie of all time." Mixing Celtic mysticism with true crime, cold-blooded murder with juvenile slapstick humor, Heimat with hagsploitation, Austrian flags with roast knuckle, a pathetically passive post-twink Helmut Berger with sadomasochistic she-bitch nurses, and quasi-Brechtian audience-alienating pretense with totally trashy Troma-esque scat humor, Mörderschwestern is nothing short of an artistically reprehensible work that demonstrates that underneath auteur Peter Kern's fluffy blubber-like exterior lies a seasoned sadist who gets a kick out of torturing filmgoers, but not before heckling them for mindlessly watching sick videos on YouTube like that of a man behind mauled by a lion, which apparently received less than 6 millions (quite the number!) views as the film reveals. Directed by a man who once confessed his affinity for teenage boys in the Rosa von Praunheim documentary Rent Boys (2011) aka Die Jungs vom Bahnhof Zoo and more than demonstrated such sentiments with his pro-pederaast flick Gossenkind (1992) aka Street Kid, Mörderschwestern is ultimately a postmodern 'moralist' movie sermon from the proudly immoral and discernibly decadent (no man Kern's size who becomes so morbidly obese can blame his problem on a mere thyroid problem), which is only apt in a culturally apocalyptic age where untermenschen human trash like Kanye West and Kim Kardashian are treated by the media as an international royal family. If nothing else, one must tip their hat to Kern for directing a film that defies all cinematic conventions and traditional (and not-so-traditional) forms of good taste, as Mörderschwestern is indubitably a third-rate anti-arthouse film directed by a third rate actor-turned-auteur, yet I cannot remember the last recent comedy that I watched more than once.

OUR TRIP TO AFRICA

Peter Kubelka (1966)

After recently watching Austrian auteur Ulrich Seidl's most recent piece of pleasantly perverse cinéma-vérité, Im Keller (2014) aka In the Basement, and witnessing the almost surreal scenario of a small and stocky elderly Austrian mensch happily discussing his various hunting expeditions on the Dark Continent and how his wife once made Wiener Schnitzel out of one of the various warthogs that he had killed, I decided it was about time that I watch the legendary landmark experimental doc Unsere Afrikareise (1961-1966) aka Our Trip to Africa directed by Peter Kubelka (Mosaik im Vertrauen, Arnulf Rainer) so I could witness some of these strange Schluchtenscheisser hunters in action while in the company of mostly naked black Africans. A 12 ½ minute doc with an almost hypnotic (meta)montage structure that was very meticulously and consciously edited together over a shocking 5 year period from about ten hours of sound recordings and a few hours of footage, Kubelka's film unequivocally makes a playful mockery of the Viennese petit-bourgeois European hunters it depicts and that is surely one of its greatest strength. Although he deeply resented the hunters, Kubelka decided to work on the film because he was unemployed at the time (in fact, not until after the filmmaker came to New York City in 1966 and screened Our Trip to Africa did he receive great praise and, in turn, gainful employment as a legendary film lecturer) and very much wanted to come into contact with real negro tribesmen. Although hired by the hunters to record their exotic safari, Kubelka cinematically defecated on his boss's in a manner that was somewhat typical of his curious filmmaking career, as a mensch that thrived on being intolerably difficult and seemingly senseless in his rebellion against the people and companies the commissioned him to make films for them. Indeed, when Kubelka was hired in 1957 to create a commercial for the powerful beer company Scwechater, he senselessly shot footage with an ancient camera that lacked a finder featuring barely visible people (apparently, the director was given the opportunity to use some of the most beautiful models in his country, but he surely let that opportunity go to waste) pretentiously drinking beer out of wine glasses, only to be sued by the company that hired him and be subsequently forced to leave the country upon completing the completely commercially worthless 1 ½ minute avant-garde 'advert,' which had the ironical title Schwechater (1958). Clearly, by the time he got around to making Our Trip to Africa, Kubelka thankfully had yet to learn a single lesson from the negative backlash and personal misfortune that his iconoclastic and aesthetically nihilistic avant-garde antics and overall seemingly pathologically passive-aggressive behavior (not surprisingly, Kubelka was raised in what he described as a "matriarchal situation," which was the result of his half-Jewish father never being around) caused him and seemed apathetic about the prospect of being perennially unemployed, so he ultimately unleashed what is probably the most intricately obnoxious and schizophrenic yet strangely jolly vacation home movie ever made. Indeed, it might deeply offend certain absurdly anally retentive cinephiles to say this, but Kubelka's film is unquestionably the Africa addio (1966) aka Africa Blood and Guts of avant-garde and experimental filmmaking. As Our Trip to Africa delightfully demonstrates, when you mix Mondo Cane-esque imagery and 'Structuralist' filmmaking (or what Kubelka himself calls 'Metric Montage'), you get the most compulsively curious of results, as opposed to pretentious banality like much of Kubelka's other work.

Admittedly, I am not the greatest fan of so-called 'Structural film' or Structuralist filmmakers (notably, Kubelka has made the claim that his second film Adebar (1957), which he later turned into a 'sculpture' after damaging a frame, was the first Structuralist film ever made), especially of the seemingly aesthetically autistic sort that is peddled by the likes of Lithuanian-born NYC underground cinema/avant-garde gatekeeper Jonas Mekas and his best bud Kubelka is certainly no exception, but with Our Trip to Africa the Austrian auteur actually managed to create something that would appeal to people other than those sad souls that diddle themselves to hopelessly avant-garde works like Stan Brakhage's anti-erotic experimental birth flick Thigh Line Lyre Triangular (1961). Described by the director's fellow Slavic-blooded and deleteriously cinephiliac European homeboy Mekas as, "the richest, most articulate, and most compressed film I have ever seen," Kubelka's somewhat sardonic slice of the then-recently-decolonized Dark Continent is indubitably one of the most consciously convoluted and obsessively edited films ever made as a work where countless brief shots are juxtaposed with seemingly unrelated audio (which he calls 'sync events'), but there is certainly a sort of hermetic method to the (anti)movie madness. Like Werner Schroeter, Philippe Garrel, and Straub-Huillet and various other arcane avant-gardist who truly did not seem to care if anyone understood their films, Kubelka—an uncommonly articulate man that is more than eloquently fluent in English as his legendary film lectures demonstrate—never screens Our Trip to Africa with subtitles, which seems pretty senseless when one considers that the film loses a lot of its comedic tone when the viewer is unable to understand what the hunters are saying in Viennese gutter German. Basically, Kubelka saw it fit to juxtapose stupid things that the obscenely arrogant and buffoonish Austrian hunters said with scenes of hunting, wounded and dying animals, naked negroes, and other largely uncomfortably 'goofy' scenarios that will surely seem like conspicuous clichés to Americans and Western Europeans who have had the misfortune of learning everything that they know about Africa from Hollywood movies. Luckily, in the truly epic 232-minute documentary Fragments of Kubelka (2012) directed by Martina Kudláček (In the Mirror of Maya Deren, Notes on Marie Menken), the Austrian filmmaker not only translates the dialogue for most of Our Trip to Africa, but also gives a shot-to-shot breakdown of the entire film and its somewhat unconventional production history, thus revealing important and insightful contextual information about the footage that one could not possibly know otherwise.

As Kubelka reveals in Fragments of Kubelka regarding the genesis of Our Trip to Africa, “The plan was that I make a travelogue for the benefit of these people who had taken me on the trip. I had accepted in order to meet archaic people, so when I filmed I had not a definite plan, but they had, so many of the shots have been commissioned. All my films were commissioned films, which I then derailed into something else.” Featuring various emotionally eclectic brief juxtapositions that range from hilarious to horrific and hokey to hopeless, Kubelka’s tightly yet hysterically edited travelogue is ultimately impossible to peg with a specific central theme due to its erratic emotional range, innate abstractness, and discombobulating structure. Indeed, after watching the film, the viewer will have no idea if the safari went well, anyone on the trip got fucked or did some fucking, the slayed animals were actually eaten, or if the negroes like or disliked their strange Aryan guests. In short, the only thing one knows for sure after watching the short is that Kubelka has a tendency to take close-up shots of unclad jigboo genitals (including that of a little boy) and that the filmmaker thinks that the hunters are moronic just as the hunters think that the negroes are moronic. It should be noted that the schizophrenic emotional tone of Our Trip to Africa is completely intentional, or as Kubelka told his comrade Mekas as revealed in P. Adams Sitney’s classic text Visionary Film: The American Avant-Garde, 1943-2000 (2002), “My films have a function (this goes for the African film)—I play with the emotions and try to tear the emotions loose from the people, so that they would gain distance to their emotions, to their own feelings [...] When you see certain images or hear certain sounds you have certain emotions. So I must always cry when I see moving scenes, when I see the hero getting the first prize for the biggest round and they play the national anthem . . . I have to cry . . . or when they bury somebody, I have to cry. At the same time, I am angry at myself, because I know that it’s just the emotional mechanisms. So, with the African film. I do a lot of this, I trigger a lot of those mechanisms at the same time and create a lot of—at the same time—comic feelings, sad feelings.” Indeed, Kubelka’s film might not be as emotionally penetrating as Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi’s masterpiece Addio zio Tom (1971) aka Goodbye Uncle Tom, but it is most certainly the most emotionally involving Structuralist film that I have ever seen.

While edited in an innately non-linear fashion, completely lacking in character development (one never even hears the name of a single one of the subjects), and seemingly all but totally incoherent, Our Trip to Africa is surely guaranteed to give the viewer a nice big chuckle or two, not least of all during an oftentimes repeated shot of a stereotypically dressed white safari hunter resting his rifle on a negro servant’s shoulder while he aims at and eventually shoots a poor zebra. In Fragments of Kubelka, Kubelka notes that, if psychoanalyzed, one could argue regarding the white hunters in the film that, "They couldn't get the women, so they shot the animals." Of course, considering that he personally collects primitive Africa Venus figurines and statues (including a life-size one featuring a giant derriere, which he proudly shows off in Fragments of Kubelka), it seems that Kubelka is projecting his own fetish for dark meat onto the white hunters. After an opening shot of a white hunter aiming his weapon that the director has described as a sort of 'protagonist' (even though the viewer can never clearly see the man's face), one is exposed to various shots that are frantically spliced together involving the hunting of a hippopotamus and a zebra with shots of the Hunters, including a Viennese woman and Arab man, lazily lounging on a boat juxtaposed with one Hunter asking, "What did we shoot?" and another replying "Tell me!," which is followed by a verbal list of animals that they killed, including a wild boar. After a shot of a dying zebra's leg moving juxtaposed with a hunter saying "Let's go," the film segues into a frame from an African Muslim wedding where, to quote the director, a "very proud" young negress with "fake arrogance" provocatively moves her cloaked head during the 'Dance of Dove' where she attempts to appeal to potential male suitors with her provocative passive-aggressive glances. In a shot that is assumedly used to illustrate the 'cruelness' and 'post-colonial arrogance' of Europeans, an ostensibly wicked white Hunter rides a camel that is being lead by a servile negro guide juxtaposed to the somewhat unnerving sounds of some unseen fatally injured animal succumbing to its wounds. Of course, Kubelka makes it quite clear that there is no honor in killing beautiful exotic beasts with state of art weapons that have turned hunting, not unlike war, into a lame and reasonably safe lackluster sport as opposed to in the past when it was somewhat of an art and took a special certain talent that involved, among other things, respecting one's prey. Like with the negroes, one gets that senses that the hunters are sneering at the animals, even after killing them, so Kubelka fights fire with fire by cinematically sneering at his fellow Austrians. As the virtual all-seeing and all-knowing god of his cinematic realm, Kubelka condemns the hunters to hell while portraying the Africans as the blessed meek who will inherit the earth.

Undoubtedly, one of the most absurd aspects of Our Trip to Africa is the various shots it features of mostly smiling white hunters interacting with the largely docile and content black natives. While most of these shots feature a primitively dressed negro helping the white hunters in some glaringly slavish and undignified fashion, there is one shot in the film that is almost borderline homoerotic where an Austrian man gently lights a pipe for a grateful negro who seems excited about trying what might be described as a 'European peace pipe' for the first time. In another scene, a short white female hunter is depicted making fun of a very tall black game warden in a fairly harmless way that is made to seem almost sinister via obnoxious laughter that has been synced with the scene.

OUR TRIP TO AFRICA

Ultimately, Kubelka makes fun of the female hunter by cutting from a shot of her shooting a rifle with the help of her assumed lover to a shot of a dangling darkie dick, as if to imply that the Hunteress would love to castrate colored cocks. While many of Leni Riefenstahl's detractors attempted to accuse her of fetishizing the unclad African negro body with her best-selling 1970s photographs of the Nuba people of Sudan (in fact, Judaic dyke Susan Sontag even went so far as to absurdly describe these photos of stark-naked negroid bodies as being "fascist aesthetics," as if physical healthiness and natural pulchritude is somehow fascistic), Kubelka makes no attempts to shield the fact that he is obsessed with decidedly dark African genitals, which include relatively long close-up shots of the breasts, derrieres, and beavers of black women, as well as the swinging wild black snakes of both a man and a little boy. In fact, the film concludes with a shot of a boy's penis juxtaposed with an African stating in broken English, "I like to visit your country," which then cuts to an ironical shot of a peasant woman treading through snowy Austria synced with the same African saying, "If I find [a] chance."

Near the beginning of the less than radical documentary Free Radicals: A History of Experimental Film (2012) directed by Pip Chodorov, Peter Kubelka stoically states regarding his films, "I never made compromises and really already a long time ago, I didn't care anymore if anyone likes it or not." After examining Kubelka's shockingly small (despite being a filmmaker for well over half a century, he has only made eight short films that barely add up to an hour worth of material) yet admittedly rather singular oeuvre, I certainly have no reason to doubt the truthfulness of filmmaker's remark in Free Radicals to the point where I would argue that the 'entertainment value' of Our Trip to Africa, which is totally absent from most of his other films, is largely the result of a circumstantial fluke. While the auteur is certainly responsible for bringing highly subjective meanings to these scenes with his sync event editing technique, it was actually the hunters who demanded that Kubelka shoot the various specific shots in the film, including the ones where they make themselves seem quite buffoonish and cruel, or so the filmmaker readily admits in Fragments of Kubelka while referencing various specific shots (including a rather unflattering close-up of a hunter proudly holding up the completely lifeless head of a giraffe only a moment or so after ruthlessly killing it). Notably, in a scene towards the end of Our Trip to Africa that is as equally heartbreaking as it is humorous, a wounded lioness that was shot by one of the hunters starts heading towards the camera and tries in vain to attack Kubelka while taking one of its last gasps. In his own highly idiosyncratic way, Kubelka creates a sort of 'filmic funeral' for the lioness that tried to attack him by juxtaposing shots of the dead beast being lifted onto the roof of a large truck by half a dozen negroes with a sort of curiously jovial dirge that makes the animal's senseless death seem like a sick joke.

Surely one of the greatest aspects of Our Trip to Africa is that, despite the director's glaring disdain for his Austrian traveling companions and their decadent and destructive bourgeois ways, it is quite apparent that Kubelka had a fun and exciting trip where he got to admire both exotic wild animals and naked negroes in their indigenous habitats. Undoubtedly, I found the film infinitely more intriguing and rewarding than any of the works I have seen by frog-comie anthropologist-cum-documentarian Jean Rouch, whose ethnographic films feel rather patronizing in their depictions of Nigerian negroes (notably, native African filmmakers often criticized his films for distorting reality). Thankfully, Kubelka makes no attempts to portray himself as an expert on African tribes or tribal culture in Our Trip to Africa, thus the film has aged much more gracefully than the work of French far-leftist filmmakers like Rouch and René Vautier. Indeed, while I am not an autistic avant-garde film fanboy who rates a film on how hermetic and over-edited it is and thus would hardly describe the work as "one of cinema's few masterpieces" like the filmmaker's puffery-inclined comrade Jonas Mekas once did, I would be lying if I did not admit that Kubelka's glorified travelogue indubitably provides for a highly mesmerizing and unforgettable experience that demonstrates that there are actually filmmakers out there who have made motion pictures that are more 'compressed' and meticulously edited together than that of Guy Maddin, which is certainly no small accomplishment. As an intricately edited montage film that somewhat spasmodically cuts from scenes of dying animals, unclad negroes, and boorish post-colonial Europeans, among countless other seemingly incongruent things, without warning, Our Trip to Africa is sure to offend and discomfort contemporary whites and blacks living in the West who have been weaned on the venomous teat of post-Trotskyite political correctness, which is rather unfortunate considering that Kubelka seems like a fairly happy-go-lucky chap that does not have a single hateful bone in his body, even when he is going to strikingly extravagant lengths to cinematically mock and ridicule his fellow countryman in a film that they commissioned him to make.

DER VERLORENE

Peter Lorre (1951)

While best known as an iconic actor who starred in countless masterpieces of German and Hollywood film, including Fritz Lang's M (1931), The Maltese Falcon (1941), and Casablanca (1942), Austro-Hungarian-born Jewish actor Peter Lorre was eventually typecast as a creepy kraut villain and suffered an undignified end to his acting career as a regular in hokey Roger Corman horror flicks, though he would write, direct, and star in one rather underrated cinematic masterpiece before dying somewhat prematurely at the age of 59 as a result of a stroke after suffering for years from gallbladder trouble and a soul-crushing morphine addiction. Like many Jewish actors/directors of his time, Lorre left Deutschland in 1933 after Uncle Adolf came to town and revamped the place, thereupon eventually landing in Hollywood where he starred in masterpieces like Mad Love (1935) directed by fellow Austrian-born immigrant Karl Freund, though, unlike many of his contemporaries, the actor came back to rubble-ridden Germany after the Second World War to direct what would be his first and last film as an auteur, Der Verlorene (1951) aka The Lost One. Indeed, The Lost One is a particularly invaluable work in that it features a depiction of the Fatherland from the perspective of a Hebrew who had to leave Germany due to Nazi persecution, only to return and see the world he once knew totally destroyed and literally and figuratively reduced to rubble. Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes Lorre's decidedly dejecting directorial debut so curiously enthralling and strikingly idiosyncratic (especially for a work of its time) is that he seems to implicate himself in Germany's collective guilt regarding the Nazi era, as if he too bled from the same Aryan fratricidal/suicidal wound that forever soiled the Fatherland's reputation and reduced hundreds upon hundreds of years of Teutonic kultur to a seemingly perennial taint. Before Lorre directed The Lost One, fellow Austrian-born Jew and top expressionist character actor Fritz Kortner, who fled Germany from the Nazis in 1933 but returned to the land of the Teutons in 1949 after having a less than successful character in Hollywood, played the vaguely autobiographical leading role in the Josef von Bány flick Der Ruf (1949) aka The Last Illusion as a German Jewish professor who flees the Third Reich, returns to his homeland after the Second World War, and dies tragically after realizing that nothing has changed since the demise of National Socialism. Undoubtedly, when comparing the two films, it is not only apparent that Lorre felt more German than his contemporary, but that the post-WWII situation was more hopeless, as if all of the Germans, including the Germans of Hebraic blood, had been condemned to a sort of permanent, pathological upheaval of the soul.

Released to an unenthusiastic German public that was infatuated with sentimental Heimatfilme and wanted nothing to do with dwelling on the darker days of National Socialism and the rubble films that were quite popular immediately following the conclusion of the Second World War, The Lost One was ultimately such an economic and critical failure that it forced Lorre to return to Hollywood even though he hoped to direct a Teutonic adaptation of Macbeth set in post-WWII Germany. A reasonably audacious and aesthetically idiosyncratic work utilizing German expressionism (naturally, Lorre's performance is oftentimes compared to his role in Lang's M), film noir, Trümmerfilm ('rubble film') and Brechtian aesthetic techniques/conventions, Lorre's work's production history is as curious and as metaphysically afflicted as the film itself, as a troubled and seemingly cursed film production where the producer, Arnold Pressburger (who was also an Austrian Jew), died halfway through filming, co-star Karl John suffered an injury that resulted in an eight week delay that cost the project a lot of time and money, and where the sole finished print of the film burned up in a fire (luckily, editor C.O. Bartning somehow managed to reconstruct the entire film using a surviving negative). While I cannot say for sure as a non-German who was not born during that time, I have a feeling that The Lost One comes closer than any other film of its zeitgeist in expressing the feeling of malignant melancholy and abject hopelessness that plagued the Fatherland after it was destroyed after WWII, so it is only ironic that an opium-addled Jew known for portraying sinister yet pathetic murderers and who was paid a grave disservice by being featured in a Nazi propaganda film (an excerpt from Lang's M is featured in Fritz Hippler's 1940 Nazi propaganda flick The Eternal Jew) would prove to be arguably the most effective at cinematically expressing the post-Auschwitz Teutonic Volksgeist.

Edited in a seemingly sloppy and incoherent fashion, The Lost One is ultimately a work that intentionally makes next to nil distinction between the past and present, for there can be no forgetting of the past, especially if it is plagued by acute internal pain, lingering metaphysical torture, survivor's guilt, and—not least of all—a history of coldblooded murder of the highly personal sort. Opening with an inter-title stating that it is "drawn from factual accounts of the recent past" (apparently, the film was based on a newspaper article written by Egon Jameson, who also wrote an article that inspired Lang's M, about the dubious suicide of a 43-year-old man named 'Dr. Carl R.', who it is believed has also killed his medical assistant 'Hannes R. '), the film tells via a series of flashbacks about how an ex-Nazi scientist, who is living under a new identity in a refugee camp, became a quasi-misogynistic serial killer after his fiancée betrayed him to the enemy. A mostly Third Reich set work that is all but completely devoid of swastikas, brownshirts, blackshirts, Terminator-esque goose-stepping and passionate Sieg Heils, The Lost One is largely set during the last month of 1943 when it was fairly obvious that the Germans were headed towards a terrible defeat and a fiercely foreboding feeling was in the air that drove men to do ungodly things that seemed quite unthinkable only a couple years before. Beginning in the present in ruined post-WWII Germany, the film revolves around antihero Dr. Karl Neumeister (Peter Lorre), who works as a head doctor at a refugee camp called Elbe-D'venstett. Of course, Neumeister is not who he seems, as his real name is Dr. Karl Rothe and he only took on the alias 'Neumeister' after becoming a serial killer and faking his own death after an Allied bombing attack that destroyed his home. When a sinister stereotypically Prussian-like character from Rothe's past, Hösch alias Nowak (played by Karl John, who was popular during the Third Reich for playing rampantly heterosexual Prussian elitist types and who somewhat ironically concluded his career starring in Jewish American auteur William Friedkin's unsung masterpiece Sorcerer (1977)), shows up at the refugee camp, the ex-Nazi doctor must confront his pernicious previous life as a serial killer who began his murdering spree after strangling his own fiancée to death upon learning she had stolen and given away some of his scientific research on some sort of presumably deadly virus that was being created for the benefit of the Third Reich. When Hösch shows up at the refugee camp, he remarks to Rothe that their reuniting "couldn't be avoided," though he will ultimately come to regret this less than auspicious reunion. During the Second World War, Hösch worked as Rothe's slimy Gestapo assistant. While getting drunk and waving around a handgun that was once owned by his ex-assistant, Rothe accurately declares that, "We are the last ones" and tells through a series of flashbacks, beginning on December 8, 1943, how the doctor's then-happy life changed for the worst, stating to Hösch, "You know, it bears me down. Just think about it: Since December, the 8th 1943. With Tax. It's heavy. Wait...the strange thing is...I had it very good in the past, when you imposed your help on me." Of course, the ever conspiring assistant had less than altruistic reasons for helping Rothe, who could not have found a worst group of friends.

On December 8, 1943, Rothe learned from a conspiring Nazi colonel named Colonel Winkler (Helmuth Rudolph), who is responsible for counterintelligence for the Third Reich, that his beloved 24-year-old fiancée Inge Hermann (Renate Mannhardt) had stolen his important scientific research, which she gave to her Stockholm-based father who, in turn, gave it to the British. While talking with Winkler, Hösch describes Inge as a "slut." Ultimately, Winkler and Hösch will help to cover up Rothe's murder of his girlfriend, as the two men need the murderous doctor for his research and couldn't care less about a treacherous slut. While Winkler complains, "I can't stand to see blood, especially when it's from little defenseless animals," upon seeing blood drawn from a cute little bunny rabbit, he has much blut on his hands, though he is quite good at hiding it. After a somber dinner with Inge and her mother Frau Hermann (Johanna Hofer), Rothe confronts his deceitful lover and when she asks for reconciliation, he strangles her during an intimate moment of embrace when she least suspects it. Despite being the actual killer, Rothe feels the guiltiest about the murder of his fiancée and goes on to describe himself, Hösch, and Winkler as "bacilli," which takes on a second meaning due to the nature of their sinister scientific work. Of course, figuratively speaking, all three men are also an infectious disease that is eating away at what is left of the once seemingly invincible Third Reich. Winkler is disgusted by Rothe's guilt and berates him in a Nietzschean, automaton-like fashion by stating, "Your antiquated ethical lifestyle doesn't fit in these times [...] Keep on working and get along with the fact that you're still alive." Indeed, Winkler fully approves of Rothe's murder of Inge, stating, "We'd have had to eliminate her anyway. This way, she'll have a decent burial." Indeed, Inge's official cause of death is listed as, "a clear case of suicide by strangulation with a black leather belt." After all, Winkler needs Rothe to further his research on deleterious chemical weapons to destroy the Anglo-Saxon and Judeo-Bolshevik enemy. Of course, the Gestapo murder cover-up is so immaculately executed that not even Inge's mourning mother suspects foul play. As one can expect from a spiritually condemned man who has discovered the wonders of homicide, Rothe does not stop with Inge. Ultimately, Rothe encounters five women during the film and virtually all of them are dead by the end of the film, though not all of them are liquidated by the tiny yet strangely intimidating frog-egged Herr Doktor. Indeed, while the doctor kills some of the women, including one amidst the complete chaos of an Allied bomb raid, others, including Mrs. Hermann and a young 22-year-old teacher named Ursula Weber (Eva Ingeborg Scholz), are killed in the bombing of Rothe's apartment building. In fact, Rothe fakes his own death by listing his name as amongst those who perished in the raid. Rather interestingly, a street savvy hooker (Gisela Trowe) is the only one in the entire film that suspects Rothe of being a murderer and calls him out as such. After mindlessly staring at the bulging bosoms of a busty babe (Lotte Rausch) who comes on to him and warns him, "you don't live anymore if you are always frightened," Rothe demonstrates he is done with women and impulsively strangles her too, as if reenacting his murder of Inge (notably, none of the murders are actually depicted in the film, thus alluding to how the antihero has attempted to erase them from his mind).

Flash forward to the present, Rothe yells at Hösch for passing out drunk while telling his story and then proceeds to tell him how he planned to kill him and Winkler (who was eventually hanged), back during those events in December 1943. Rothe proceeds to say to his ex-assistant with more than a tint of survivor's guilt, "Unbelievable. The bomb night was over, thousands were dead. Thousands who wanted to live. But I, I was still alive. Unbelievable." After Hösch calls Rothe a pathetic coward and amateur due to his depression over the past and guilt over surviving the war when so many other innocent people died, the doctor kills his 'friend' and then himself by standing in front of a moving train. Needless to say, The Lost One is a decided downer any way you look at it and it could have only concluded with the death of virtually every character, especially the antihero himself. As the film demonstrates in the end, the only way for a person to truly escape their past is through a swift death.

It should be noted that after Peter Lorre fled Germany and eventually headed to the United States, he felt immense guilt over the fact that he left much of his friends and family behind and tried to compensate for it by getting actively involved in Hollywood anti-Nazi propaganda (of course, this would ultimately contribute to him being typecast as a freakish foreign villain). As described by his niece in the A&E documentary Peter Lorre: The Master of Menace (1996), Lorre was apparently advised by National Socialist Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels, who was certainly a cinephile of sorts and once offered the half-Jewish auteur Fritz Lang the job of becoming the head of filmmaking for the Third Reich, of all people to flee Germany before it was too late, so one can only assume the actor felt extra guilt due to the fact that one of the top Nazis and Jew-baiters of the twentieth-century more or less saved his life. Undoubtedly, one of the most revealing scenes of The Lost One is when Lorre's character states, "Unbelievable. The bomb night was over, thousands were dead. Thousands who wanted to live. But I, I was still alive. Unbelievable." And, indeed, it was not only the death of Jews that caused Lorre survivor's guilt, but innocent Germans as well as demonstrated by the various innocent and virginal Aryan woman that are senselessly killed in The Lost One. Whatever was going on in Lorre's head at the time, it is undeniable that he did something totally daring and seemingly inexplicable when he decided to direct a film where he also portrays a Nazi serial killer scientist instead of a sympathetic and persecuted Jew like Fritz Kortner played in Der Ruf. Ultimately, The Lost One is an exceedingly nihilistic work where not even the slightest shade of redemption is made possible, with even Rudolf Hess' failed secret peace mission to England in 1941 and the July 20, 1944 assassination attempt against Hitler being mentioned in passing as if they were futile and ultimately worthless attempts to thwart the arrival of hell-on-earth. Starring Lorre as a sort of low-key cuckold take on Josef Mengele in a role where the actor effortlessly demonstrates he is not only one of the greatest portrayers of malignant melancholy and empathetic mad men/mass murderers, but one of the suavest cigarette smokers in cinema history, The Lost One quite arguably features the Austrian-born actor at his greatest. It should also be noted that not a single one of the 'Nazis' featured in the film is portrayed as a real National Socialist 'true believer' who actually believed in the Hitlerite Weltanschauung, but instead, as innately immoral opportunists who used the new regime as a deplorable means to obtain power and carry out deplorable crimes, thus making The Lost One less an anti-Nazi work than a patently pessimistic look at the intrinsically flawed human character under precarious circumstances. Of course, one of Lorre's other greatest achievements with the film was that he managed to transcend the Aryan and Jew dichotomy to create a work that is uncompromisingly critical of humanity as a whole. Indeed, while some Germans and Jews were able to forget about the war and its post-apocalyptic aftermath, Lorre, at least in spirit, was one of the people that was left behind, hence the title 'The Lost One.'

ARENA

Peter Manoogian (1989)

Arena (1989) is the epitome of the greatness that Charles Band used to exude back in the glory years of the late 80s, early 90s when Moonbeam, Empire, and Full Moon thrived. These companies are responsible for creating absolute straight-to-video masterpieces certainly not limited to: Prison, Puppet Master 1 - 5, Prehysteria!, Jack Kirby: Time Warrior, Dolls, and Ghoulies - just to name a handful. These are pictures whose VHS racked up quite the hefty rental fee when I used to bother my mother for them each and every visit. It was never just the adults choice - I always had to have a say which probably made video rental stores the bane of my mothers existence. Lest she soothe a temper tantrum out in public, of course. I got my way and I was happy and look how well-versed in cinema I turned out to be. Exposure is critical in your younger years and Full Moon made for a wonderful gateway addiction and Arena is no stranger to that very same ethos that consumes these beautiful pieces of science-fiction wonder. Arena is a combat film first and a bit of runoff political commentary second. Don't worry about the latter of these features as Arena makes sure to shove strange alien creatures involved with martial arts right in your face, distracting from any other facet of filmmaking Arena could possibly meander about.

The year is 4038. Such an exaggerated future that there is no possible hope for us to meet and greet this specific year anytime in the 3 or 4 generations one can expect in a normal lifetime. Steve Armstrong is a spacecook in a spaceport with big dreams of relocating to Earth. This current goal greatly overshadows his teen dream of being an arena fighter in a combative sport simply known as "The Arena". After acquiring a significant amount of debt with the help of his boss, Steve Armstrong gets noticed for his fighting talent and joins The Arena with hopes to become the first human champion in over fifty years. With a plot as simple in mechanics as Arena, you'd be surprised just how far this film could have fallen. In fact, Arena surpasses every Full Moon release in quality for the past 3 years alone. In The Arena, it seems so wild that a human could even benefit from competing as its other contenders fit the profile of large, slimy extraterrestrials with a penchant for blood. Yet, Arena positions itself steadfast behind a plot device of a handicap that evens both the fighters' strength, thus making the game theoretically seem like child's play. This doesn't last long, though, until the sinister crime lord, Rogor, discovers a way to malfunction the handicap which endangers the life of Steve. As it is, Arena is that certain type of cinema that is digestible by genre fans of all persuasions. It is the Gerber baby food of science-fiction.

Another one of Arena's great strengths lies in its painstakingly created colorful aesthetic which compliments which further compliments the exclusive universe contained within the film. You could argue sources for influence as it is an Empire Picture but it never reaches far enough into its inspirations to become anything more than an homage, if that. The fighting always remains hard-hitting and engaging and the creature designs are top-notch. The previous champion, Horn, is designed as a surly beast biomechanic whose stratagem tactic of injecting off-the-books space steroids results in his repeated victories, which definitely gives Arena a competitive edge. The character of Steve Armstrong is an appreciatory nod to cookie-cutter arrogance and youthful vigor that makes for quite the lead all-American archetype. Match that with its own brand of coy science-fiction humor and you got yourself a peak success in the era where rubber alien prosthetics could do no harm. As an added bonus, Arena features not one, but two lovely ladies - the tomboyish Quinn - fighting manager and go-getting girl - and the lovely Jade - promising femme fatale and overall bombshell. There really is no need for stating the equivalences in this case, Arena IS junk food and have I got a sweet tooth.

Peter Manoogian (1992)

By now, Everyone has seen The Dark Knight. As far as pop culture goes, it's a necessity to view this. In fact, You'd owe it to your country according to pop-culture analysts and Hot Topic completists. Little did I realize that scribe David S. Goyer created the screenplay for Demonic Toys. That's quite a huge jump in the industry; Full Moon fare to Hollywood record-breaking material. It's only appropriate that I only now became cognizant of Peter Manoogian directing Eliminator, a film I plan on writing on soon. Demonic Toys destroys the basic fundamental guidelines of killer doll films. It's too true that in a film concerning murderous inanimate objects, one needn't focus on plot or early developmental stages. Golden rule being to include frequent enemy interactions and unsavory language and carnage. Demonic Toys disobeys like a good rebel but the film slightly becomes a more cluttered film despite its desperate attempt to differ itself from the crowd with a thought out plot. A pregnant cop gets caught in a satanic ritual to convert her unborn baby into a vessel of Satan's lovely child (As if anything else). This demon summons (or inhabits, it's never fully realized) a trio of iconic demonic toys to trim the already tiny potential body count trapped in a toy warehouse. Child's Play 2 featured a truly memorable scene in a toy factory. The impromptu adnexa surgery that was so horrifically drilled into our youth's brains is a scene that marks most that grew within that early 90s horror rush which produced many instant classics. Demonic Toys, being a Full Moon film, borrows heavily from the most mainstream doll film and incorporates the entire setting from the most popular scene in Child's Play 2, albeit not as adventurous and rather dreary. That character of Baby Oopsy-Daisy is portrayed as the hellish ringleader of the bunch but suffers from one-liner syndrome. The director/writer combo intended too much for this film to be an impassable force in "B horror" that they turned every line into a cheesy quip. This only halts down the given momentum thanks to the terrifying image of the evil incarnate Jack-N-The-Box. The bear however looks silly, that is until his transformation. I displease the satanic storyline as it makes every previous altercation an event in vain. Demonic Toys is definitely one of the better Full Moon catalog titles. The context of killer toys can be placed within any title for instant success. I'm still unsure of what to expect from the final product of Black Devil Doll. The trailer only makes the film look cheap and terribly unfunny but only time will tell. Demonic Toys is a stoic satanist story with enough low budget "punk rock rebel" attitude to keep most things at bay, including your social life, so please do not quote any lines from this film for your own sake.

Peter Mullan (2010)

One of my fondest memories as a child was hearing my father's adolescent fight stories. Growing up in a white working-class neighborhood during the 1960s, my father saw everyday fighting as a rite of passage that all boys enthusiastically engaged in, usually first occurring after one learned how to walk. One family story that I have always enjoyed, involves my father, at the age of 7 or 8, taking a baseball bat and smashing it against the arm of his 16 year old cousin, instantly cracking his kinsman's bone. I asked my father why he acted so violently and he explained to me that he knew his cousin was about to attack him, so he had to use whatever means he had to protect himself. My father also told me that there were no rules to street fighting, especially when battling someone that was much older and stronger. Unfortunately, I never had the opportunity to grow up in such a dangerous environment, where the possibility of dislocating a bone or losing an eye was an everyday possibility. Of course, I got in occasional fights, but I never had the opportunity to grow up in a neighborhood that contained an adolescent battlefield with armies of rock throwers, BB gun shooters, and knife wielders. After viewing the trailer for the 2010 film Neds directed by Peter Mullan, I soon realized that it had the potential to be the definitive white working-class street gang film. After eventually watching Neds, I was left galvanized and blissfully startled. To say that I was merely impressed by the gritty savagery and overall cinematic eminence of Neds would be a gross understatement.

Neds takes place in Glasgow, Scotland during the 1970s and was written/directed by Glasgow native Peter Mullan. I was not surprised to find out that Mullan has described the film as 'personal but not autobiographical', as the movie has a stark realism that could not have been contrived by even the most creative of bourgeois writers. Peter Mullan also directed the dark 2002 film The Magdalene Sisters, based on a true story regarding 'Magdalene asylums': virtual prisons for teenage girls that were seen, by their families and/or society, as falling from the grace of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Like The Magdalene Sisters, Neds is an artistic document regarding a part of United Kingdom history that has been all but ignored. Of course, English director Alan Clarke also contributed much in the way of cinematic social realism in the UK with notable films like Scum (1977) and Made In Britain (1982), yet these films lack the aesthetic prowess that gleams so stunningly throughout Neds. After all, one has to be quite the keen artist to find beauty in a white ghetto; a marvelous feat that Peter Mullan was able to triumphantly complete via Neds.

Neds is an acronym for "Non-Educated DelinquentS", which is a derogatory description for most of the characters featured in the film. The protagonist of Neds, John McGill, shows in the beginning of the film that he has the potential to rise above his birthright as a Ned. Initially, John enters secondary school as a confident and studious boy that wants nothing more than to achieve an outstanding academic career. Despite his father being a pathetic alcoholic, his mother a hopeless neurotic, and his brother a petty criminal, John is determined to eventually graduate from a university. Of course, John eventually succumbs to his miserable environment during his teenage years and subsequently follows a desolate path of criminality. Upon becoming a virulent street fighter, John's personality begins to split, resulting in a nihilistic war against himself. John is a charismatic anti-hero that you will find yourself rooting for, even after he commits the most despicable of hate-fueled crimes. Although Hollywood has produced countless films portraying the struggle of the poor black man - always making sure to empathize with his life of crime; the philanthropists of Tinseltown have rarely given a voice to the white proletarian - the melanin-deprived Negro forgotten from the beginning of time. Neds is a real achievement because director Peter Mullan transcended his less than meager background and gave an authentic voice to the voiceless, in the form of true proletarian cinematic art.

Not only does Neds feature gritty socialism; It also includes a dream sequence of John fighting with Jesus Christ in a churchyard. Although this scene is quite serious, it is slightly silly and certainly one of the few segments of the film that does not provoke a total adrenalin rush. Neds may not feature a death camp-sized body count like your latest Hollywood action film, but it will strike terror in most audience's hearts. In fact, I can imagine many people, especially of the liberal "we are the world" persuasion, being offended and ultimately repelled by the film. If you are looking for a movie that offers shallow promises of hope and the sort reconciliation that is so typical of a neatly packaged Hollywood plot, Neds is probably not kind of film for you. Love it or loathe it, Neds will leave an irrevocable impression on you.

NICK /& NORAH'S INFINITE PLAYLIST

Peter Sollett* (2008) Love is a beautiful thing. Let's talk about love, shall we? Love isn't described as a science, but rather a spiritual connection. Love is taking a female friend for a long walk on the beach. Love is that glowing feeling that bubbles in the pit of your intestines. Love is that feeling that wears thin after several years. Yes, that is love. And nowhere in Nick & Norah's Infinite Playlist, will you find any form of emotion. You might feel a couple misplaced "awes" but watching Michael Cera stumble around for an hour and a half doesn't make me giddy or promise a fulfilling film experience. Then again, I'm not an Indie slut. Much of the film's punch comes from the soundtrack which it wastes no time in boasting at the start of the credits. Yes...you are watching the film. Insert a couple lines of credits then jump to a roster including We Are Scientists, Modest Mouse, Vampire Weekend, and clever Indie product placement bands. The film has several laughs and features a human for a plot device. A drunk slut named Caroline wanders off in the midst of the Big Apple and the group plans to find her while looking for a secret show with one of their favorite bands. The film follows the boy is pining over girl, meets new girl, loses new girl for old girl, realizes how fucking dumb his decision was and goes back to new girl. This film doesn't have that mythical chemistry though and would just rather use music as an adhesive. Shit was SO INDEPENDENT! In some films, the product placement is just horribly blatant such as my recent indulging in the Rollerball remake, in which they attempted to turn it into satire. Babylon A.D. was another guilty party. Nick & Norah's was caught red-handed for having a Myspace promotion union in which they find Indie bands that most likely win a contest. Their song is then featured in this hipster rom-com to a surprisingly dull effect. All the music sounds the same. In summarization: Producer #1: Hey, I have a great idea! Let's make a film with PLAYLIST in the title so you instantly relate it to MIXTAPE which all the HIPSTERS love. Producer #2: Yeah! Hey! There's this book with that in the title. Quick, make some calls! Let's put that QUIRKY & AWKWARD guy from Juno in it so he can add QUIRKINESS to the film. Producer #1: I can see it already! We should open the trailer with him stalling on the phone and torpidly saying B-DAY while staring at a picture that says HOMIE. Oh wow, this movie is so quirky and independent. Let's throw a REBEL chick in there for good measure. Nick & Norah is a more intelligent Juno without all that "Young Mother Lifetime" bullshit clogging up what the fans of Diablo Cody really want; quirkiness. Cera has proven nothing to me. He cannot act outside his Bleeker character and until he proves to me otherwise, he will continue to be blacklisted from my taste. Excuse my harsh cynicism as I partially enjoyed this film. That is until the last quarter of the film attempted to promote punk-rock zionism and Judiasm within a 10 minute span.

PICNIC AT HANGING ROCK
PICNIC AT HANGING ROCK

Peter Weir (1975)

If there is any cinematic work that can even vaguely be described as a women-in-prison (WiP) flick in terms of themes and motifs that is an unequivocal poetic masterpiece, it is the classic Australian horror-mystery-drama hybrid Picnic at Hanging Rock (1975) directed by Peter Weir (Dead Poets Society, The Truman Show), which is ironically more erotic than any of the films that I have ever seen from the sometimes pornographic subgenre, even though it features nil nudity or explicit lesbo action. Of course, the film is far too idiosyncratic, enigmatic, whimsical and cultivated to be labeled a WiP flick, though it should be noted that Weir has experience with exploitation cinema as his debut feature The Cars That Ate Paris (1974) surely demonstrates. As a cinematic work featuring a group of nubile young girls that are ruled over by a sadistic headmistress at an all-girl college where latent Sapphic tendencies seem to be the norm, Weir's film certainly sounds like it has the basic structure and themes of a WiP trash piece, but it is really a shockingly preternatural motion picture that transcends all genres and viewer expectations in a ridiculously refreshing fashion that reminds one why they love cinema. While I had been putting off watching the film for at least a decade since I expected it to be terribly banal flowery bullshit that would make Roman Polanski's Tess (1979) seem like Vera Chytilová's Sedmikrásky (1966) aka Daisies by comparison, I recently took the plunge and can proudly say that I absolutely fell in love with the film, if not for at least partially superficial reasons that largely have to do with the almost painfully beautiful blonde quasi-lead portrayed by one-time Fanta spokesperson Anne-Louise Lambert (The Draughtsman's Contract, Somersault), who absolutely radiates a certain decidedly delectable degree of classic European pulchritude without even having to expose a single tit or pubic hair. While Lambert disappears from the film at about the 35-minute mark, her presence manages to haunt the rest of the film in such a penetrating the fashion that it made me realize that it is the greatest cinematic ghost story without a ghost. Indeed, Picnic at Hanging Rock is a film that wallows in a sort of wholly pure and organic oneiric beauty where it makes it seem as if it is the world's single greatest tragedy when a blonde virginal beauty disappears without a trace during a sunny picnic Hanging Rock, Victoria on Valentine's Day in 1900 (notably and quite intriguingly, while a teacher and two other girls also disappear, the viewer, like most characters in the film, seems only really concerned with Lambert's character's disappearance, thus underscoring her haunting and otherworldly beauty). In other words, the film makes the preposterous comic sociological phrase 'missing white woman syndrome' seem like a laughable slave-morality-ridden joke that would only concern resentful untermenschen, as no negro, abo, or mulatto actresses could have made Weir's masterful flick work as there is no replacing genetic gold in the form of pale porcelain skin and shimmering golden locks. In other words, Picnic at Hanging Rock is also a rare film that shamelessly celebrates the grand majesty of blonde Nordic beauty.

Based on the 1967 novel of the same name by Joan Lindsay that the Australian novelist has notably described as writing with great ease while in a sort of trance, the film is a mystery that, like its source material, thankfully concludes in eerie ambiguity and thus demands that the viewer ponder it for eternity, thereupon making for a cinematic work that truly keeps on giving with subsequent viewings. An early key work of the so-called Australian New Wave and arguably Australia's first international hit film, Picnic at Hanging Rock has proven over the past four decades that it is a timeless work as a result of its ambiguity, more or less seamless structure, exceedingly ethereal essence, and refreshingly unwavering embrace of true Occidental feminine beauty. Indeed, no one can watch the film without coming to the natural conclusion that Faustian woman is the most beautiful woman in the world. Additionally, the film is also notable for being a rare period piece that does not seem contrived, as the viewer truly feels like they have had the voyeuristic delight of encountering a very English late Victorian all-girls college where discipline, manners, and a strong moral compass are a must. Featuring a totally transcendental realm of perennial intrigue where the Victorian era is sort of metaphysically possessed by an enigmatic foreboding prehistoric presence that can be neither seen or heard but certainly felt, Weir's film is also arguably about a civilization on the brink of capitulation. As hinted by the fact that one can see Aborigine faces in the eponymous rock formations, one could argue that the cinematic work is, not unlike Weir's subsequent work The Last Wave (1977), a sort of post-colonial horror-thriller, though that is quite irrelevant to why the film is so great, as no one watches or enjoys it for its socio-political subtext(s) (in fact, the film also features a quasi-Dickensian subplot involving an orphan girl that is ruthlessly persecuted by a sadistic headmistress, but it is not executed in the sort of obnoxiously propagandistic fashion that would one expect from a Hollywood movie, but of course the film was directed by an authentic Anglo-Saxon as opposed to a kosher culture-distorter or spiritually castrated white liberal wimp). Indeed, Picnic at Hanging Rock oftentimes feels like the last gasps of a people and culture that is about to lose itself and succumb to cultural and social chaos of the decidedly deracinated post-industrial multicultural sort. The film also happens to be arguably the most effortlessly elegant, solacing, and charming 'horror' film ever made as an insanely soothing piece of hallucinatory celluloid where the most beautiful of living creatures is sacrificed to something that is literally quite inexplicable. Featuring an obscenely addictive musical score that ranges from two traditional Romanian panpipe pieces to classical pieces (including Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, and Tchaikovsky) to the British Royal anthem "God Save the Queen," Picnic at Hanging Rock also thankfully feels completely devoid of the necrotizing taint of modernity. Of course, it should be no surprise that the film was more aesthetically influenced by the paintings of Australian Impressionists like Frederick McCubbin and the photography of David Hamilton than other films.

Opening with the somewhat misleading prologue that made many viewers think the film was based on total fact, "On Saturday 14th February 1900 a party of schoolgirls from Appleyard College picnicked at Hanging Rock near Mt. Macedon in the state of Victoria. During the afternoon several members of the party disappeared without trace...", Picnic at Hanging Rock then juxtaposes stunning Victorian landscapes with the female heroine Miranda (Anne-Louise Lambert) quoting Edgar Allan Poe and softly stating, "What we see and what we seem are but a dream—a dream within a dream." Miranda is a shockingly beautiful college student with a completely complimentary personality who is loved by all her classmates and most of her professors. In other words, she is a natural leader that exudes warmth, beauty, empathy, love, strength, and affection, among other classic virtues. If Miranda is an absolutely magnetic personality that radiates immaculate splendor and pleasantness, Appleyard College's headmistress, Mrs. Appleyard (Welsh British New Wave diva Rachel Roberts of Karel Reisz's Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (1960) and Lindsay Anderson's This Sporting Life (1963)), is the complete opposite as a cold, callous, craven, and insufferable rotting old cunt who is mean and hateful to everyone, especially the weak and defenseless. Indeed, while Miranda treats her poor classmate with total love and respect, Mrs. Appleyard is totally ruthless with the school's most emotionally and economically impoverished student Sara (Margaret Nelson), who is an extremely sensitive orphan that seems to have almost latent lesbian feelings for her ravishing blonde friend. Somewhat ironically, by the end of the film, all three women will be gone from this world, but it is only Miranda that seems to realize this, as if she has some sort of sixth sense.

At the very beginning of the film, Miranda and her friends spend their St. Valentine's Day morning by reading Valentine's day cards to one another and helping each other get dressed, with a line of girls simultaneously tightening one another's corsets while standing in front of a window and basking in the early morning sunlight. Notably, Sara gives Miranda a card that reads, "Meet me, love, when day is ending." Rather unfortunately for all involved, Miranda will not get the opportunity to meet Sara at the end of the day. Somewhat strangely, after cherishing her card and declaring how she would love for her to meet her "sweet, funny family," Miranda attempts to warn her friend by stating to her in a deadly serious fashion, "You must learn to love someone else apart from me, Sara. I won't be here much longer," thereupon eerily foreshadowing the strange events to come. All the girls are excited about the day because they will be spending it at a local geological formation known as Hanging Rock where they plan to have a lavish and intimate pastoral picnic. Before leaving for the picnic, the girls collectively raise a phallic-like St. Valentine figure in the air in a quasi-ritualistic fashion, as if it will give them good luck in their quest for love. In an apt demonstration of her keen and calculating cruelty, Mrs. Appleyard allows every single girl attend the picnic, except poor orphan Sara, who she attempts to force to memorize and recite poetry. While Mrs. Appleyard warns the girls before they leave to not engage in “tomboy foolishness,” Miranda and her best friends ultimately fail to take heed of this seemingly petty warning, thereupon somewhat ironically resulting in their eventful downfall. When Sara attempts to recite her own poem that she has written in tribute to Valentine’s Day, Mrs. Appleyard immediately cuts her off and impulsively discounts her poetic prowess. While riding in a carriage on the way to Hanging Rock, a mathematics mistress named Miss Greta McCraw (Vivean Gray) notes that the rock formation is a million years old, which inspires a petite brunette named Irma (played by Karen Robson, who gave up on acting not long after appearing in the film and later became a Hollywood film lawyer and producer) remarks excitedly regarding the destination that it has been, “Waiting a million years just for us.” While only seemingly half-serious, Irma ultimately seems completely correct due to the bizarre and orphic things that will happen to her and her friends.

While the girls are on their way to Hanging Rock, a positively posh and somewhat prissy young Brit boy named Michael Fitzhubert (Dominic Guard of Joseph Losey’s The Go-Between (1971)) seems somewhat bored while picnicking with his elderly uncle Colonel Fitzhubert (Peter Collingwood) and aunt Mrs. Fitzhubert (Olga Dickie) in a nearby forest. When his uncle’s glaringly low-class valet Albert (John Jarratt of the Wolf Creek slasher franchise)—a former orphan whose forearms are covered with trashy primitive tattoos—generously offers him a sip of wine, Michael demonstrates his audacious anal retentiveness and keen sense of class consciousness by less than politely cleaning the cleaning the rim of the bottle before taking a small swig, thus underscoring the blatant class differences between the two young men. Indeed, while Albert is surely symbolic of the virtual white slaves and criminals of largely Irish and Scottish stock that built Australia with their sweat and blood, Michael is the kind of oh-so perfectly proper English chap that sees the country as a mere primitive colony and exotic vacation spot that is inhabited by uncultivated barbarians who have the grand misfortune of being hopelessly incapable of speaking the Queen’s English. Although they will soon become fairly good friends as a result of strange life-changing circumstances that will ultimately tie them together for eternity, the two young fellows could not be more different, with Michael having a rather romantic and even naïve view of the world and Albert, who has clearly experienced much misery and misfortune in his life, being quite disillusioned and pessimistic to the point of not wanting to take life too seriously lest he suffer more personal pain and disappointment. Indeed, one can certainly tell that happiness for Albert is simply a steady flow of cheap beer and fresh maid pussy (notably, the only people in the film depicted talking about and/or engaging in sex are peasants). Unbeknownst to Albert, his long lost sister Sara, who he has not seen since they were both little kids living in an orphanage, is one the students at Appleyard College and had Mrs. Appleyard not barred her from going to the picnic, he would have probably experienced the delight of a lifetime by being reunited with his estranged sibling by mere happenstance. Unfortunately, partly as a result of things that occur during the picnic, Albert will never see his sister again, which is quite sad when one considers how the film ends.

When the girls finally arrive at Hanging Rock, alpha-babe Miranda fittingly ushers in the grand celebration by joyously cutting a pink heart-shaped valentine cake and then the girls proceed to do wholesome girly things like examining flowers with magnifying glasses, reading books while lying in the grass, and glamorously basking in the sunlight, though not without the imperative help of lavish Victorian umbrellas. During the very feminine festivities, the youngest and most beautiful teacher of the school, Mademoiselle de Poitiers (Helen Morse)—a character that deeply cares for all her students and is naturally the total opposite of the eponymous bitch portrayed by Jeanne Moreau in Tony Richardson's somewhat underrated Jean Genet adaptation Mademoiselle (1966)—flips through an art book and comes to the conclusion that "Miranda is a Botticelli angel" after seeing an image of Early Renaissance painter Sandro Botticelli's mid-1480s masterpiece The Birth of Venus. Right after Mademoiselle de Poitiers makes this sensually spoken borderline Sapphic declaration, Miranda, Irma, Marion (Jane Vallis), and a fat and annoying four-eyed blonde human turd named Edith Horton (Christine Schuler) enter the depths of the forest in pursuit of the top of Hanging Rock. While the mostly exceedingly dainty dames are attempting to cross a small stream, they are spotted by Michael and Albert, with the latter deeply offending his posh pal by remarking in regard to Miranda, "And 'ave a go at the last one! The blonde! Oh, she'd have a decent pair of legs. All the way up to her bum." Indeed, completely sheltered hopeless romantic Michael cannot bear to hear such crude lecherous language and bitches to Albert, "I'd rather you didn't say crude things like that," to which his prole friend rightly replies, "Oh, I say the crude things. You just think 'em. Take my word for it. The sheilas are all alike when it comes to fellas. Doesn't matter if it's a bloody college you come from or the Ballarat Orphanage where me and me kid sister was dragged up." At this point, Michael develops a romantic obsession with Miranda that only grows all the more extreme when the blonde beauty and her classmates mysteriously disappear into the Delphic depths of the foreboding rock formation.

While the girls are climbing up Hanging Rock, rather rotund dork Edith incessantly complains in a remarkably obnoxious fashion, stating things like, "I never thought it would be so nasty or I wouldn't have come." Unlike Edith, who is clearly not the outdoors type, the other girls seem completely entranced by the rocks, with Irma remarking while in a seemingly ecstatic state, "If only we could stay out all night and watch the moon rise." The girls also bring up that fact that Sara has been writing poetry "all about Miranda," which inspires Irma to prophetically remark, "Sara reminds me of a little deer Papa brought home once. I looked after it, but it died. Mama always said it was doomed." After the girls take their socks and shoes off, it almost seems as if they are under the spell of some ominous supernatural force that is forcing them to head further up the rocks. Indeed, while staring down at her classmates from the top of the rocks, Marion—a blonde with glasses that somewhat looks like a nerdier version of Miranda—remarks while in a seemingly possessed state while sounding like an autistic philosopher, "Whatever can those people be doing down there? Like a lot of ants. Surprising the number of human beings [that] are without purpose. Although it is probable they're performing some function unknown to themselves." Somewhat bizarrely, Miranda calmly but seemingly impulsively replies to Marion by stating in a haunting fashion, "Everything begins and ends at exactly the right time and place." At this point, all the girls pass out as if under some sort of trance caused by the sun and eventually an iguana sinisterly passes by Miranda's body while she is lying unconscious on the ground. When the girls finally wake up from their seemingly blissful slumber, Edith declares, "I feel perfectly awful" and then asks her friends, "When are you going home?," but they do not even acknowledge her, let alone respond to her, and instead, as if trapped in an ethereal nightmare, enter into the recesses of the rock face like a parade of angels sacrificing themselves to hell. Completely haunted by what she sees, Edith screams hysterically and begins running back to her classmates. On her way back, Edith spots Miss Greta McCraw running across a plateau in nothing but her pantaloons. As it turns out, Miranda, Marion, Irma, and Miss McCraw have disappeared without a trace under most dubious circumstances that only become all the more bizarre and inexplicable as the film progresses.

Naturally, a large search party for the missing girls is eventually started and led by a fellow named Sergeant Bumpher (Wyn Roberts) and his comrade Constable Jones (Garry McDonald), but no one is found, thus completely mystifying all the local townspeople, who refuse to believe that one of their neighbors might be responsible for their dubious disappearance. When Sergeant Bumpher asks Michael why he was following the girls the day that they went missing, he replies in a somewhat scared fashion, "I was curious. In England, you ladies like that wouldn't be allowed to go walking. Not alone, anyway. But they'd gone by the time I came out of the trees, so I turned back." Not surprisingly considering she is a glaringly sexually repressed widow whose hatred seems to be largely the result of both her loneliness and lack of sexual release, headmistress Mrs. Appleyard seems especially interested to know if Edith was molested, but the local physician, an elderly fellow named Doctor McKenzie (John Fegan), gladly informs her that the fat girl is still "quite intact" (which is something he will notably repeat multiple times throughout the film). Despite the fact that he never even got the opportunity to introduce himself to the girls, Michael is especially disturbed by their disappearance, most specifically in regard to Miranda, who he seems to believe he loves. Indeed, as Michael meekly confides to Albert, "I wake up every night in a cold sweat...Just wondering if they're still alive." Of course, Michael is not too happy with Albert when he replies, "Yeah, well, the way I look at it is this: If the bloody cop and the bloody abo tracker and the bloody dog can't find 'em, well, no one bloody can. People have been bushed before today, and as far as I'm concerned, that's the stone end of it." Visibly distressed, Michael replies to the Australian peasant in an exceedingly bitchy fashion, "Well, it's not the end of it as far as I'm concerned. They may be out there dying of thirst on—that infernal rock and...you and I are sitting here drinking cold bloody beer." When Michael asks him to go with him to Hanging Rock to search for the girls, Albert initially replies, "A week in the bush, they'd be dead by now," though he ultimately decides to help out his posh pal because he probably thinks he is too big of a sheltered pansy to go on the search mission by himself.

When the two unlikely friends head to Hanging Rock to search for the missing girls, they ultimately find nothing, so Michael, who has become fanatical in his obsession with finding the little ladies, decides to stay there overnight by himself and even insults Albert for not being as concerned with finding the girls as he is (in fact, Michael insults his friend's lowly Australian peasant background, stating to him that he and his countrymen do not care enough, "Just because you lot are Australians..."). The next morning, it seems as if Michael is fighting with unseen forces while trying in vain to crawl across rocks while crying "Miranda," thus hinting at some sort of sinister supernatural presence at Hanging Rock. When Albert comes back to check up on his friend, he is shocked to find him completely broken and nearly delirious and thus immediately calls upon a rescue team who have the super sensitive bourgeois boy carried out on a stretcher. Before being driven away in a buggy, Michael, who seems to have temporarily lost the ability to speak, hands Albert a lace fragment from one of the girls' dresses in an almost conspiratorial fashion that he has clenched inside his hand, thus inspiring the rowdy Australian to quickly head back to Hanging Rock where he ultimately finds and kicks the body of Irma, who he naturally assumes is dead since she has been missing for over a week. Rather miraculously, Irma has survived and as Dr. McKenzie reports, she is still "quite intact," though is left temporarily bedridden due to exposure and dehydration, among other fairly minor health complications. Despite the fact that Irma has been found alive, headmistress Mrs. Appleyard is as bitchy and hateful as ever as parents are predictably withdrawing their daughters from the school as a result of their fear that it might be a dangerous place for their daughters to stay. A compulsively callous and craven cunt of a wicked wench if there ever was one, Mrs. Appleyard naturally takes out all of her hatred on the weakest and most defenseless girl Sarah, who she routinely threatens to send back to an orphanage if her guardian Mr. Cosgrove does not pay money that he owes the institution. Meanwhile, Michael attempts to befriend Irma, who has no recollection of what happened to her or her friends, but ultimately scares her away when he eventually demands to know what happened to the other girls (notably, director Weir excised most of this subplot from his 1998 'director's cut'). In what is indubitably the most overtly 'horror-esque' scene in the entire movie, Irma, who probably already suffers from a bad case of survivor guilt, is both physically and verbally attacked by a group of girls led by fat Edith after she goes to see them one last time before she permanently departs from the school and heads back to Europa. While Mademoiselle de Poitiers slaps the shit out of Edith and breaks up the attack, the damage is already done and Irma goes away from the experience looking quite spooked.

As the film progresses towards its less than heartwarming conclusion, Mrs. Appleyard succumbs to both full-blown dipsomania and senseless sadism. Indeed, when she is not secretly sipping liquor that she has conveniently hidden inside a desk drawer that contains items that she has confiscated from students, the horrific headmistress is forcing Sara to undergo some sort of cruel and unusual punishment, including being strapped to a wall to ostensibly "cure her terrible stooping." As a result of Mrs. Appleyard's keenly cruel behavior, a barren teacher named Miss Lumley (Kirsty Child) awkwardly resigns from the college. Of course, this pushes Mrs. Appleyard even further over the edge as indicated by the fact that she soon informs Sara that she will have to withdraw from the college permanently and go back to the dreadful orphanage. In fact, while Mrs. Appleyard lies to Mademoiselle de Poitiers and tells her that Sara left with college with her guardian Mr. Cosgrove that morning, the young girl is still there and opts to kill herself by leaping from her bedroom window instead of enduring life in an orphanage once again. Indeed, the next morning, an elderly gardener is given the shock of a lifetime when he unexpectedly finds Sara's corpse in the greenhouse. Somewhat morbidly, just before it is revealed that Sara has killed herself, Albert reveals to Michael that his long lost sister visited him in a dream and stated to him, "I've come a long way to see ya, and now I must go." In the end, a nameless/faceless off-screen male narrator states: "The body of Mrs. Arthur Appleyard, Principal of Appleyard College, was found at the base of Hanging Rock on Friday 27 March 1900. Although the exact circumstances of her death are not known, it is believed she fell while attempting to climb the rock. The search for the missing school girls and their governess continued spasmodically for the next few years without success. To this day their disappearance remains a mystery." Rather fittingly, the film concludes with slow-motion footage of the girls at the picnic at Hanging Rock, with Miranda playfully waving "good bye" to the viewer at the very end.

Notably, the female Jungian Marion Woodman once wrote while speaking of a figurative 'virgin' (aka ideal female archetype), "The women who is a virgin, one in herself, does what she does not for power or out of the desire to please, but because what she does is true," which I think is a great way to describe Miranda of Picnic at Hanging Rock. Indeed, a young virginal lady of immaculate beauty who all women want to be and all men want to be with, Miranda is nothing short of the virtual real-life embodiment of the great goddesses of classical literature and ancient myths, hence the potency of the film, which effectively relies on the singular tragedy of such of a perfect female specimen simply disappearing when she is at the unequivocal peak of her pulchritude. For me, the film had an extra personal layer, as Miranda shares a superficial resemblance to the love of my life, who also shares a sort of organic paganiſtic oneness with nature and who always makes trips to the wilderness have a more magical and whimsical quality, like a Fidus painting come to life, albeit less cartoonish and more erotic. In other words, Picnic at Hanging Rock is one of those rare films that I feel like I have fallen in love with, which was a big surprise as I expected it to be somewhat banal before I actually watched it. For me, the film was like a sort of insanely intoxicating pandemonium of foreplay, as if one were cock-blocked just before fucking their one-true-love for the first time, hence the timeless tragedy of Miranda and her friends disappearance. Of course, in a way, Miranda was sacrificed for her own beauty, as she disappeared while she was at her physical peak and thus will always be remembered as such by those that knew her, which is undoubtedly one of the things that makes Picnic at Hanging Rock so poetic. Indeed, one almost suspects that Yukio Mishima, who consciously decided to commit ritual suicide via seppuku after he reached his physical and artistic/intellectual peak, was in some way inspired by the film, but that is probably just wishful thinking (after all, the Japanese Renaissance man had very little use for beautiful women aside from as the occasional prop).

While Sofia Coppola had described Picnic at Hanging Rock as being an imperative influence on her films, especially The Virgin Suicides (1999) and Marie Antoinette (2006), Weir's masterful cinematic work somewhat ironically has a more organically feminine essence even though it was directed by a man whose other films have a fairly masculine touch to them (after all, it is somewhat hard to believe that the same man also directed Master and Commander: The Far Side of the World (2003), but I digress). Indeed, Weir's metaphysical horror-romance is certainly a singular work as a film that really can only be vaguely compared to a handful of others films, including Jaromil Jireš's Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970) and Richard Blackburn's sole feature Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973). Undoubtedly, it is somewhat curious that all of these films were made around the same time during the 1970s, as if they were a so-called reactionary response to sexual liberation and feminism, which more or less destroyed any mystique or integrity that young women once had, as their main veins went from being priceless commodities that were practically worth their weight in gold to becoming virtual toilets in the blink of an eye (indeed, unless you belong to a Mormon community, it is practically impossible to find a girl of Miranda's virtue in the contemporary Occident). As for more recent films with a similar essence, Gaspar Noé's wife Lucile Hadžihalilović's debut feature Innocence (2004) is like a darker and all the more esoteric nod to Weir's film, albeit with a rather unfortunate lack of Anglo-Saxon beauty (though Marion Cotillard makes for a worthy substitute for Helen Morse's Mademoiselle de Poitiers character). As much as I enjoy all of the films I have mentioned, none of them is quite as perfect as Picnic at Hanging Rock, which I would describe as arguably one of the most accessible 'arthouse' movie ever made, as a rare cinematic work that can bring great joy and ecstasy to both wholesome little girls and dirty old men. Arguably the sunniest piece of gothic horror ever captured on celluloid, Weir's film is also probably the only 'girly' flick that you can watch and enjoy if you're a male and not feel embarrassed about it (which says a lot since the film technically easily passes the truly lesbianic Bechdel test). Indeed, in a quite potent yet unintentional way, the film is also a reminder why the true organic Überfrau of the world is the woman with the lightest colored pubic hair. Set in an all-female world where it seems like the quite common contemporary female flaw of navel-gazing is a shameful sin and part of a woman's true beauty lies in her lack of narcissism and mindless self-worship, Picnic at Hanging Rock certainly does seem like a "dream within a dream" in more ways than one, thereupon making it shockingly refreshing for modern viewers who are used to watching unintentionally absurd gynocentric twaddle where even the most imaginary of female problems are portrayed as grave matters. In that sense, one can look at the character of Miranda's disappearance as symbolic of the tragic decline of true Anglo-Saxon femininity. Indeed, compared to Miranda, Charlize Theron seems like a soulless dyke (but I guess that is what one expects from a woman whose mother violently killed her father) and Jennifer Lawrence comes off as a completely vapid and expressionless twat who seems to have the mental maturity of a 7-year-old girl. In other words, more eroticism permeates from a single shot of Miranda wearing a Victorian dress that hangs all the way down her ankles than in all of the various leaked shaved pussy shots of Ms. Lawrence that are floating around the internet combined.

FRIENDSHIP'S DEATH
FRIENDSHIP'S DEATH

Peter Wollen (1987)

If some exceedingly effete cosmopolitan leftist art fag attempted to remake Ridley Scott's culturally pessimistic science fiction masterpiece Blade Runner (1982) as an avant-garde Brechtian chamber piece with video art elements and set it Amman, Jordan during the Jordanian Civil War instead of dystopian Los Angeles, it might resemble the asinine celluloid abortion that is British (anti)sci-fi flick Friendship's Death (1987) penned and directed by English film theorist Peter Wollen (Penthesilea, Crystal Gaze) and starring arthouse diva Tilda Swinton (The Last of England, Only Lovers Left Alive) and Bill Paterson (The Killing Fields, The Witches). Indeed, a film theorist trained in French twaddle like structuralism and critical theory who co-wrote/co-directed a number of films with his postmodern feminist film theorist wife Laura Mulvey—a rather frigid looking chick who utilizes outmoded neo-Freudian hocus pocus to complain about 'phallogentrism' and 'patriarchy' being supposedly secretly hidden in cinema—Wollen (who is the co-publisher of various journals, including one with the curious name 'New Left Review') certainly seems to have a pathologically passive 'female touch,' or so one learns whilst watching the intolerably idealistic slave-morality-laden pomo sci-fi piece Friendship's Death. The quasi-philosophical tale of an alien robot in archetypically white British female form (quite arguably Tilda Swinton at her physically finest) that somehow develops a quasi-marxist 'revolutionary' Weltanschauung and joins the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) after getting mixed up in the events of 'Black September,' Friendship's Death is so ridden with phony bleeding heart idealism of the pedantic armchair revolutionary sort that the eponymous extraterrestrial machine protagonist actually makes the absurd 'post-human' complaint, "I can't accept sub-human status simply because I'm a machine." Indeed, if you are hoping to see bold and beauteous blond beast biorobotic androids like the replicants in Blade Runner in Wollen's noble-savage-saluting arthouse agitprop piece Friendship's Death, you're going to be in for a major disappointment as the film mostly wallows in philosophizing about how innately evil humans are, especially of the Occidental sort, as well as the misery of being a person without identity and without home, so as to make the viewer's heart bleed for Palestinians and whatnot. For whatever reason, my girlfriend and I assumed that Friendship's Death would be similar to an Ulrike Ottinger film, so we were exceedingly disappointed. While my beloved could only handle 10 minutes or so of seeing Tilda Swinton sporting an Arab chador, spewing insipid intellectual masturbation, and failing to seem like anything resembling an alien robot, I braved through the entirety of Friendship's Death and must admit that 70-minute work felt much longer than watching Fassbinder's epic Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) in its entirety. Indeed, if you ever wondered why Swinton finally decided to move out of the arthouse world, Friendship's Death provides more than enough reasons.

The setting is Amman, Jordan during the 'Black September' civil war of 1970 and stereotypical white liberal British journalist Sullivan (Bill Paterson) is sympathetic to the cause of the PLO. Naturally, the Jordanians are hoping to rid the PLO from its city-centers. Sullivan is asked by members of the PLO to help identify a seemingly Anglo-Saxon woman named 'Friendship' (Tilda Swinton), who has no papers nor passport and has been captured by the Palestinian 'freedom-fighters.' For whatever reason (maybe he thinks he has a chance at bedding her?), Sullivan pretends to know Friendship and brings her to a fancy hotel, where most of Friendship's Death takes place. Friendship proclaims to be a space robot from the planet of Procryon who was heading to Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) but experienced a major malfunction during 'atmospheric entry' and somehow landed in Amman where within a matter of hours she managed to get lost in the middle of a tank attack and inevitably become captured by the PLO. After hearing Friendship's story, Sullivan makes the cynical remark, "Spectacular performance! A woman in jeopardy, a reckless act of self-destruction; it all adds up to nonsense, doesn't it?," but the literally soulless extraterrestrial super robot is not laughing. Of course, after much plying and prying for information, Sullivan eventually begins to believe Friendship's spectacular tale. Meanwhile, Friendship, who was quite disturbed to see her Palestinian tour guide taken hostage by the Jordanian army, begins to forget her mission to MIT, starts sporting typical Islamic garb, and begins sympathizing with the PLO, even though she is not human, let alone an Arab Muslim. As a 'spacey, if not severely self-righteous, chick from another planet that says a lot of pretentious things like, "I dream of succulence...the flow of carbon and acid metabolism...hunters and gathers...Hijack victims," Friendship seems like she was the victim of a liberal arts college lobotomy, but Sullivan still manages to learn things about her home plane Procryon. As Friendship explains to Sullivan, "Where I come from all the biological life-forms are extinct. After the nuclear winter, they died. Only the computer survived. Of course, they were already far more advanced than any computers you have here on earth."

Naturally, Sullivan asks about the curious creatures that used to inhabit Procryon and invented the technology that sired the femme-robot in the first place, to which Friendship replies that they were, "Genetically programmed organisms like you. I think I'd describe them as kind of giant tree shrews...a bit bigger than you. They hibernated. They had this zoom lens system in their optical vision, too...I think some spiders do here. And these heat-seeking sensors which were like a ray of sunken pods." While doing some snooping around, Sullivan finds some colorful crystals owned by Friendship in one of the few discernibly sci-fi scenes of Friendship's Death and when the rebel robot walks in on the journalist playing with them, she gives him one as a memento. Obsessed with ancient human ruins, especially those in Jordan and how they relate to events of today,

FRIENDSHIP'S DEATH

Friendship has little interest in soccer, complaining to Sullivan regarding the sport, "It's hard for me to see the attraction of it. I think I would prefer if the camera just chose one of the players and followed him. I mean, the players are more interesting than the ball, aren't they? The ball has to be the most uninteresting item of the game...totally devoid of color or expression....incapable of independent action...it's just round." Despite being an exceedingly emasculated left-wing weakling of the proudly cosmopolitan sort, Sullivan is somewhat offended by Friendship's remark and responds by stating, "What are you talking about? Britain's greatest contribution to the world; the family of balls [...] they're all British made. It makes you proud, doesn't it?," as if he were a card-carrying member of the BNP. As the days pass, the hotel the journalist and robot are staying at becomes bombarded with PLO snipers and other militants, thus making their conversations much harder to hear. Overtime, Friendship becomes increasingly misanthropic and develops a sort of Marxist-robot ideology, complaining to Sullivan, "I'm a robot, I'm a machine. Well, what replaced the machines here? Slaves. Unpaid labor. Moral dead matter. You can do what you like to a machine. It has no voice, no rights, no feelings. It's a new sphere for human cruelty. I know their vengeance and they act out of rage, but I have every reason to identify with the Palestinians," thus demonstrating her innate slave morality despite being a superior being to that of earthlings. Due to the violence of the civil war, Sullivan opts to leave Jordan and manages to snag two tickets to Damascus, but Friendship has already made up her mind to join the PLO and die in battle, stating why she has decided to abandon her original mission to MIT, "I've seen enough of earth to know that if I go to the United States I'll just be frog-marched off to some safe house somewhere in Virginia for debriefing...then when I've been squeezed dry, I'll be handed over to the engineers and the A.I. people. I'll be stripped down, cut-up, and be submitted to every kind of sadistic test they can devise." As a goodbye present, Sullivan gives Friendship a razorblade (she previously showed an interest in shaving) and she returns his kindness by kissing to "seal the gesture." Of course, Friendship presumably dies, but years later Sullivan remembers her after running into his friend Kubler (Patrick Bauchau), who is a member of the International Red Cross. With the help of his wiz kid teenage daughter, Sullivan is able to decipher the special crystal that Friendship gave to him and he learns that it is a 'digital storage system' (aka a sort of memory card) from a futuristic camera. The crystal reveals images of Amman, esoteric information, images of a human fetus, and countless other things that Friendship had recorded on her journey, thus giving Sullivan something to truly remember about Friendship.

A preposterously sanctimonious and unintentionally silly piece of hipster humanist celluloid hogwash that would only appeal to the science fiction fan who thinks Spock of Star Trek is a leftist hero and appreciate his Judaic Vulcan salute, Friendship's Death is nothing short of an archetypical bad British art-house film from the 1980s. As someone who rather enjoyed the quasi-feminist dystopian flick Closet Land (1991) directed by Indian auteur Radha Bharadwaj, I can say my disdain for Friendship's Death was not simply due to its cliché globalist humanistic 'we-are-the-world' message but mainly due to its outmoded postmodern Brechtian and conspicuously contrived directing style, grating theatrical tableaux, and almost childlike essence, as if the film was specially made for the children of left-wing MPs living abroad at boarding schools as a sort of cinematic therapy for their homesickness. Undoubtedly, director Peter Wollen is probably best known to cinephiles for his first film credit as the co-writer of Michelangelo Antonioni's The Passenger (1975) aka Professione: Reporter, which also features a deracinated journalist as a protagonist and also deals with themes of rootlessness, loss of identity, and civil war. In fact, Wollen would once state of Friendship's Death that it is a sort of "a sequel" to The Passenger, albeit more "enclosed and claustrophobic," which certainly sounds like an unappetizing prospect for a film and the British auteur certainly delivered in that regard. While I am not fan of The Passenger, it demonstrates why Antonioni was a master cinematic craftsman and Wollen is a pedantic professor of plodding pretense who approaches directing films the same way a scientist looks through a microscope, with Friendship's Death being nothing more than a failed experiment of a film theorist's hypothesis for what might make an interesting 'avant-garde sci-fi' flick. In a favorable puffery-ridden review of the film written by German film scholar Thomas Elsaesser, who is a comrade of Wollen's, he revealed that, "In the early 1990s, at a conference in Vancouver about avant-garde, modernist, anti-narrative and neo-narrative filmmaking, Peter Wollen proposed a new category: films without a passport. What at the time was may be a lassitude with labels seems in retrospect to have been a programmatic announcement. Wollen's first solo film as a director is literally about existence without a passport, and is much more an exploration of the attendant state of mind, than a psychological study of two characters or of the generic complications resulting from a sci-fi plot in a polit-thriller." Rather unfortunately, with the dissolution of European film industries and the rise of international co-productions, Wollen's warped liberal wet dream of 'films without a passport' has come true, albeit not in the way he probably imagined. Of course, Wollen has not directed a single film since Friendship's Death, thus demonstrating you cannot get too far artistically without an 'artistic passport' (i.e. serious sense of identity, kultur, and nationality). More banal than bizarre, superficial than sincere, whiny than witty, derivative than diacritic, pedantic than provocative, and cold than charismatic, Friendship's Death has confirmed that I will never dare to watch any of the other experimental films that Wollen co-directed with his wife. Featuring a pansy cuckold xenophile as a male protagonist (a stand-in for Wollen perhaps?) who cannot even manage to seal the sensual deal with the exotic extraterrestrial, as well as a truly intellectually 'out-of-this-world' fem-alien robot that tries to make an argument about the ostensible connection between the big toe and the supposed oppression of the fairer sex, Friendship's Death is guaranteed to be aesthetic torture for cinephiles and sci-fi nerds alike, which is certainly at least one achievement on Wollen's part. Indeed, if the Israelis want to scare the Palestinians out of the holy land for good they should maybe consider screening Wollen's Friendship's Death all around the so-called Israeli West Bank barrier.

I'M AN ELEPHANT, MADAME

Peter Zadek (1969)

Despite being one of post-WWII Germany's most serious and influential theater directors, even popularizing the plays of William Shakespeare among German audiences, Peter Zadek also directed somewhat lowbrow satirical comedic films meant to appeal to even the most intellectually and aesthetically disadvantaged of filmgoers, which is especially true in regard to his work The Roaring Fifties (1983) aka Die wilden Fünfziger, a semi-scatological exploitation-like satire of the Wirtschaftswunder ("Economic Miracle") that the auteur, quite blasphemously, dedicated to German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who had recently died. Undoubtedly, Zadek's The Roaring Fifties seems like a Hollywood-esque mockery of Fassbinder's BRD Trilogy, which is rather unfortunate considering the German New Cinema alpha-auteur filmmaker's respect for the elder theater director. In fact, Fassbinder had so much respect for Zadek that he gave him a cameo role in his penultimate film Veronika Voss (1982), but, even more importantly, he also dedicated one of his greatest films, The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979), to the older filmmaker. As to why Fassbinder felt the need to dedicate what is arguably his most popular flick to Zadek, he stated in an interview, "I don't do my dedications in such a way that I say, this film has a lot to do with so-and-so, who it's dedicated to, but in this case, for instance, I want to say that Zadek is one of those who shattered the ossified way of life that The Marriage of Maria Braun describes. From a certain point on, Zadek was also very important to me, as a person, as someone to talk to. It liberated me a bit to know there was someone around who was over fifty and completely set in his ways and then changed himself so totally. I find something very positive and hopeful in that. Five years ago he was a major figure just as he was, and then he changed himself totally." Indeed, born in Berlin in 1926 to a Jewish family and emigrating to London in 1934, where he would eventually cause great controversy by directing productions of works by frog queer degenerate Jean Genet, Zadek virtually lived a whole other life before he came back to Germany in 1958, but it was not until 1969 that he got to literally say "Fuck Germany" cinematically via his award-winning flick I'm an Elephant, Madame (1969) aka Ich bin ein Elefant, Madame to the nation that had rejected him and his family only a couple decades before. Winning the coveted Silver Bear award at the 19th Berlin International Film Festival, I'm an Elephant, Madame—an iconoclastic kraut counter-culture cult flick that is virtually totally unknown anywhere outside of Deutschland—is Zadek's sort of satirical and semi-surreal (anti)tribute to the German student movement (68er-Bewegung). Featuring music by the Velvet Underground (including a peculiar inter-title at the beginning of the film advertising "Andy Warhol" written in large text next to "Lou Reed & The Velvet Underground" in smaller text), I'm an Ele- phant, Madame is a film dedicated to all the children of Marx and Coca-Cola about a group of high school seniors from the Nordic northwestern German city of Bremen during the year 1968 who are itching for revolution and live to destroy German classical institutions, even if they have no truly realistic nor rational way to go about it. An aesthetically bombastic work of the Brechtian sort that brazenly blitzkriegs the fourth wall and features enough jaded jump-cuts to make the average French New Wave fan wet their panties, yet assembled in a relatively straight-forward manner that makes the film accessible to poor proles and philistines (Zadek was indubitably an equal opportunity offender!), I'm an Elephant, Madame is the post-WWII German-Jewish answer to Godard, albeit nowhere near as banal, that goes straight to the schizophrenic soul of the psychosis-ridden children of the Nazi generation.

I'M AN ELEPHANT, MADAME

Rull (Wolfgang Schneider) is the most radicalized and revolutionary senior at his classical German "gymnasium" school as a rebel without a cause who feels the need to believe he has a cause, even if he is a naughty little nihilist at heart who seems to act more than think. Not only does Rull threaten and mock his teachers with his brazenly bizarre behavior, but he almost brings misery to his friends, including his less than homely girlfriend. After deflowering his girlfriend Billa (Maja Eigen)—a butch and bitchy tomboy with a dyke haircut who hates the Fatherland just as much as her male compatriots—Rull lets everyone know about his victorious defiling of a virgin. In class, Rull gives teachers absurd reasons for failing to do his homework and gets especially irked when the class has a discussion comparing Roman philosopher Cicero with Hitler. Meanwhile, the times are changing at the Bremen school as 'progressive' liberal teachers are changing the curriculum, including a funny fellow named Dr. Nemitz (Heinz Baumann) that has the potential to be the new principal of the school, as well as a depressed English teacher who is obsessed with Donovan who gives music appreciation lectures (one on the 'Renaissance of Anglo-American Pop') on hippie rock and what not, which disgusts old school style teachers like Dr. Hartmann, who is afraid so-called 'progressives' are destroying his school and laying waste to 20 years of his life's work as a classical academic of the conservative sort. On top of digging Trotsky and Lenin, the students at the gymnasium school are digging the films of Andy Warhol, referencing the 320-minute avant-retard work Sleep (1963), a film that few Americans, let alone American high schoolers, can say they have seen. When Rull has the bright idea to spray paint a swastika on the side of a parliament building, he destroys any legitimacy regarding his revolutionary behavior, sparking a mini (and real) riot of sorts, including arguments between holocaust survivors and ex-soldiers, many of whom argue that the novice graffiti artist should be hanged and/or imprisoned for his tasteless vandalism. In the end, Rull, like many of his mixed up generation, comes out looking like a fool, which is in stark contrast to the novel The Unadvised aka Die Unberatenen written by Thomas Valentin which I'm an Elephant, Madame is based on, which portrays the angst-ridden anti-hero as an actual hero of sorts.

Featuring absurdist lines like “When it’s raining the revolution will take place in the saloon” and a perturbed far-left protagonist who feels the need to graffiti walls with swastikas to make a point about political ignorance among the general German public, I’m an Elephant, Madame is certainly not a mindless tribute to the German student movement, but a superlatively sardonic work that leaves no group unscathed, especially the degenerate generation focused on in the film, which has gone from counter-culture to the mainstream as demonstrated by the fact that Angela Merkel—the present and first female Chancellor of Deutschland—was the secretary for “Agitprop” of the communist ‘Free German Youth’ (FDJ) when she was in high school. Notably, the scene towards the end of I’m an Elephant, Madame, which was purposely shot in black-and-white, is essentially documentary footage of the cultural chaos and political confusion that had consumed Germany during the late-1960s. For the swastika scene, Zadek apparently had real people give their reaction to theatrical Rull’s swastika stunt, thus illustrating the range of sociopolitical opinion of post-WWII Germans, including a holocaust survivor who emphatically states that the graffiti artist should be hanged immediately for his stunt juxtaposed against a German that argues that more Aryans than Jews were killed in the Second World War. I personally liked a scene where a nice German fellow argues that a swastika is merely a rune and “old Germanic symbol,” but I nearly fell out of my chair laughing after hearing some leftist loser state regarding Rull’s behavior, “He acted counter-revolutionary...It’s a disgrace,” thus demonstrating the cliché and brainwashed minds of young student activists in Germany during the 1960s. In another notable scene, a newscaster questions two girls about the swastika, asking them if it has any political meaning, which they deny, as if they have never heard of the Third Reich, thus demonstrating the ‘need to forget’ and cultural amnesia among certain Teutons in regard to history.

Undoubtedly, I’m an Elephant, Madame, not unlike Jack Nicholson’s forgotten counter-culture flick Drive, He Said (1971) is best looked at today as a nice and curious little cultural oddity of a radically repellant zeitgeist best left forgotten. Featuring a scene where protagonist Rull and his boyish girlfriend Billa absurdly yell “Fuck Germany!” for no apparent reason at all, I’m an Elephant, Madame can be seen as director Peter Zadek’s celluloid “fuck you” to Germany as a Jew who left the country after the National Socialist takeover, only to come back after the Second World War and make the sort of degenerate cinematic art that would have fueled Uncle Adolf’s flatulence, hence the director’s need to conclude the film with the intertitle “Made in Germany,” as if that was not already apparent. After all, what would be a greater source of revenge for a Jewish filmmaker than to make a film about an entire generation of conflicted Teutonic youth who hate their ex-Nazi parents and seek to turn the Fatherland into some idealistic Trotskyite utopia?! Concluding with a montage of a German soldier

World War II memorial, and real stock footage of German soldiers dying on the Eastern Front and humiliated German POWs being marched by by the Soviets through the streets of Stalingrad intercut with scenes of students of the gymnasium taking their final examination, I'm an Elephant, Madame is, if nothing else, a cynical celebration of kraut cultural chaos. A sort of patently pretentious yet palatable Teutonic 68er-Bewegung equivalent to Fast Times at Ridgemont High (1982), I'm an Elephant, Madame is undoubtedly a film that has not aged gracefully, but is certainly infinitely more entertaining than virtually anything ever directed by New German Cinema ideologue and father figure Alexander Kluge and one of only a handful of German student movement themed works that might appeal to the average American filmgoer, especially pseudo-nostalgic teenagers who fetishize hippies and whatnot.

Phedon Papamichael (2008)

Hollywood has a way of mocking Christians and Christianity every opportunity it gets. Of course, it is not hard to figure out why this occurrence is so prevalent among the movie makers from the Boulevard of broken dreams, but as of recently it has gotten entirely too blatant. Whatever happened to well made blasphemous films like The Night of the Hunter (1955) or Elmer Gantry (1960) that at least had somewhat questionable religious messages. When possessed girls started shoving crucifixes in their coochies in films like The Exorcist directed by Jewish director William Friedkin, the heretical sentiments were more than obvious. Nowadays, it seems that Hollywood vomits a couple hundred anti-Christian films mainly in the horror genre but also branching out into just about every other genre. Today, a film like Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ is extremely rebellious and had better gore scenes than most contemporary horror films. Hell, Gibson even managed to piss off the kosher crew by beating them at their own game which I am sure most people can respect. This homely girl is the result of intercourse between Bruce Willis and Demi Moore. I just watched the "horror" film From Within which is part of the third After Dark Horrorfest: 8 Films to Die for film series. Out of all of the films I have seen in this series, From Within is easily the most Anti-Christian. In fact, it is so Anti-Christian that it even offends me and I am far from a saint. I grew up in a somewhat small town and was exposed to stupid superstitious rural folk. You know, the type of Jesus fans that a film like From Within portrays as blood thirsty country bumpkins looking blindly to do the lord's work. As a child, I was told by a good Christian child I was going to hell because I never went to church. I also recall a group of holy Negro children telling me that I was going to hell when I was 7 years old because I told them my favorite color was red (maybe because it's the color of the devil and blood or something?). The Christians featured in From Within are much more militant than the ones I grew up around, but it is a movie and not reality after all, isn't it? What happens when a series of suicides occur in a small Christian town in the good ole' U.S.A.? The good JC fans in From Within ignore the occurrences and cling tighter to their bibles. After some time though, the reason for the suicides becomes apparent when a nonbeliever named Aidan insults Christianity to a fanatical Christian teenager named Dylan who happens to be the son of the Pastor (who secretly likes to play buttdarts!). Aidan gets Dylan back though by stealing his virginal girlfriend and showing her why purity is boring. Of course, Dylan unleashes an angry mob (or just a few rednecks in a pick-up truck) on poor wussy pseudo-Goth boi Aiden. Aiden's mother, who dabbled in witchcraft, had her life cut short by the very same townspeople. From Within, is another one of those films that show why living in a small town where you know everyone is bad and can lead to death. From Within has all the signature anti-Christian clichés that have become ever so popular with each passing year in Hollywood. The film features hateful and self-righteous Christian psychos, Christians looking to kill nonbelievers in the name of Christ, Christians lacking a sense of humor, Christian rednecks, Gay false prophet pastors, and the ever so popular Christian irrational hostility to outsiders. As much as I hate most evangelical types that I encounter, I felt that From Within was just stupid hateful trash. The most symbolic of this stupidity is having Adam Goldberg, the whiniest Jew in movies since Woody Allen, playing a tough redneck ex-con turned Christian crusader for Christ. This type of genius casting is equivalent to having Arnold Schwarzenegger playing a Rabbi in a film where he gives prayers to liberated Jews at Dachau concentration camp in 1945. I don't know, maybe Adam Goldberg wanted to pretend he had a pair of testicles for once in his life by playing a redneck. Poor Goldie, it was impossible for him to cover up the peculiar sounds that come out of his mouth when he talks even while playing a blue collar hooligan. Kosher Commando Adam Goldberg is not fooling anyone. From Within is one of those films that just demands you to feel how badly it sucks. With the film's series of suicides, it makes one wonder if that was the act intended for the viewer by the director after watching the film. The only possible way for one to get From Within out of their mind after watching it is to end one's tainted life there afterwards. For someone that has been a nonbeliever and outspoken against the obvious hypocrisies of Christianity from an early age, I even felt like I was going to hell after watching From Within. It makes me almost wish there was a hell so that I could rest easy at night knowing that filmmakers like Steven Spielberg would be getting a pitchfork in the ass while being escorted into hell by the devil himself.

FROM WITHIN

GENERATION WAR

Phil Flora (1996)

During the late-1970s, the American television network NBC produced a kitschy sentimentalist 4-part mini-series entitled Holocaust (1978) starring Hollywood stars like Meryl Streep and James Woods that was so popular in West Germany that, as German history Alf Lüdtke wrote in his essay Coming to Terms with the Past: Illusions of Remembering, Ways of Forgetting Nazism in West Germany, no less than 20 million Teutons (or about 50% of the country's entire population) managed to see it, thereupon initiating a prevailing dialogue among post-Nazi Aryans about German culpability in the Second World War and thus ultimately demonstrating that Germans born after the war were much more susceptible to borderline tasteless propaganda of the hokey Hollywood-manufactured sort. While Holocaust more or less intrigued nearly half the entire German populous, many filmmakers associated with German New Cinema found the mini-series downright offensive, with auteur Edgar Reitz once complaining: "The difference between a scene that rings true and a scene written by commercial scriptwriters, as in HOLOCAUST, is similar to that between 'experience' and 'opinion'. Opinions about events can be circulated separately, manipulated, and pushed across desk, bought and sold. Experiences, on the other hand, are tied to human beings and their faculty of memory, they become false or falsified when living details are replaced in an effort to eliminate subjectivity and uniqueness. There are thousands of stories among our people that are worth being filmed [...] Authors all over the world are trying to take possession of their history [...] The most serious act of expropriation occurs when people are deprived of their history. With HOLOCAUST, the Americans have taken away our history." Luckily, Reitz and various other German filmmakers decided to respond by taking back their history by creating some of the greatest masterpieces of German New Cinema in what would be a reasonably successful campaign to counter carelessly contrived mythmaking works like Holocaust. Indeed, Reitz's Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984), Rainer Werner Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979), Volker Schlöndorff's The Tin Drum (1979), Alexander Kluge's Die Patriotin (1979) aka The Patriot, and Helma Sanders-Brahms' Germany Pale Mother (1980), among countless other films, demonstrated that Germans had their own unique perspective regarding the Second World War and that they had much more to say than a couple of Germanophobic Hebraic Hollywood producers who would not dare set one foot in the country of poets and thinkers, as well as blood and soil. Unfortunately, as the somewhat recently released ZDF-produced German mini-series Generation War (2013) aka Unsere Mütter, unsere Väter (translation literally meaning "Our Mothers, Our Fathers") makes quite clear, ethno-masochism and self-flagellation has only all the more engulfed the Teutonic Volksgeist since the release of Holocaust.

GENERATION WAR

Carefully marketed as a true and honest depiction of the Second World War from a supposedly 'everyday German' perspective of that time period, Generation War has been described by various moronic reviewers as everything from "pro-Nazi" to vehemently anti-Polish, yet it ultimately features much of the same sort of Zionist-produced sensational filmic feces that is routinely excreted out of Hollywood, as a work featuring a middle-aged SS officer deriving almost sexual glee from shooting a prepubescent Jewish girl for no apparent reason (in fact, the same SS man is later shown during the same episode with the kosher blood still on his neck (!), as if it was an honor for German soldiers to walk around with Jewish vital fluids on their body), as well as handsome and archetypically Aryan-looking SS officer giving his mistress a DIY abortion by punching her in the stomach as hard he can. Undoubtedly, what makes the mini-series offensive to Jews and left-wingers is that it clearly distinguishes between suavely dressed sadomasochistic Schutzstaffel psychopaths and the average and regular 'apolitical' Germans. A nearly 280-minute, three-part mini-series that tells the ostensibly dejecting story of five young adult friends—two brothers in the Wehrmacht, a novice nurse, an aspiring 'diva,' and a Jewish tailor—that meet for one last time in 1941 before going their separate ways and all experiencing a unique, if not similarly harrowing and dehumanizing, odyssey of destruction that spans a 5 year period and concludes with the capitulation of the Third Reich and the would-be-tragic deaths of two of the characters, Generation War essentially portrays the Germans as exceedingly naive human whores that were unwittingly devoured and defecated out again by a cannibalistic Hitlerite machine with a gas chamber hidden in the back. A partially fantasy-based work where all Jews are portrayed as morally pristine supporters of Germany and a dashing Wehrmacht lieutenant hangs out with his Hebraic homey in public in 1941 as if it was common for Aryans and Jews to chill together and dance with young girls while listening to degenerate jazz music at that point in the war, the mini-series certainly sometimes borders on the absurd, so of course, it features enough sentimentalism to keep the average viewer from using their grey matter. A patently pathetic pity party without any real meaning or purpose where any sort of heroism that German soldiers may have had is completely discredited and where the average SS officer is portrayed as a sinisterly satanic sicko with an unquenchable thirst for the blood of god's chosen tribe, Generation War is a complete abject mockery of the already relentlessly besmirched and reviled era of Aryans that it depicts and purports to tell truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about. Of course, the series is really just a slave-morality-ridden fantasy that delights in portraying dishonor, dehumanization, desperation, and derangement, as if those are admirable qualities or something.

Beginning in Berlin 1941 on the eve of Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, Generation War is narrated by a short Lieutenant named Wilhelm Winter (Volker Bruch) of the 'Windhund Company' of the Wehrmacht (German army) who has already seen action in both Poland and France and is about to take his equally short brother Friedhelm (played by perennial twink Tom Schilling)—a “bookworm who loves Rimbaud and Jünger” (despite the fact he is a patent pacifist and Ernst Jünger wrote Storm of Steel (1920), which is considered the rival work to pansy Remarque’s 1929 anti-war novel All Quiet on the Western Front)—to wage war on the Eastern Front. Before leaving to destroy the Bolshevik beast in the east, Wilhelm and Friedhelm have a party with their lifelong childhood friends, which include would-be-singer Greta (Katharina Schüttler), novice nurse Charlotte aka Charley (Miriam Stein), and Jewish tailor Viktor Goldstein (Ludwig Trepte). While Charlotte is desperately in love with Wilhelm and he knows it, the soldier does not want to pursue a romantic relationship with her until after the war just in case he dies. A proud race-mixer and lover of degenerate American swing music, Greta is in a relationship with Jew Viktor, who was supposed to inherit his WWI veteran father’s tailor shop, but it was destroyed during the so-called “Night of Broken Glass” (aka Kristallnacht). Ultimately, the five friends’ last night together concludes after a super Aryan Gestapo agent named Sturmbannführer Martin Dorn (Mark Waschke) shows up and states, “I got a report of swing music with Jews.” Ultimately, Hebrew-humper Greta will become Dorn’s whore, as the barmaid uses him so she can weasel her way out of an incitement charge for playing swing music and further her career as a singer. Indeed, despite developing a ‘Latin’ persona (she adopts the pseudonym ‘Greta Del Torres’), Greta ultimately sings for propaganda purposes on the Eastern Front.

Of course, it does not take long for the five friends to have their illusions regarding the 1000-year Reich destroyed. While Wilhelm is at first a highly respected lieutenant that has the complete allegiance of his men, he eventually becomes so completely disillusioned with the war after his entire platoon is eventually exterminated that he becomes a deserter, thus resulting in his arrest by Feldgendarmerie officers and sentence to death for treason, though he is eventually punished with being forced to become a member of a Strafbattalion (Penal Battalion) instead since Germany is losing the war and cannot afford to waste soldiers. Despite being initially an idealistic pacifist who hates the war and is even beaten up for cowardice and cynicism by his comrades, Friedhelm eventually becomes a cold and calculating, if not pathetic, killer, though he is almost killed at one point after being mistaken for a Russian soldier (he temporarily puts on a Red Army uniform to escape from a building that has been taken over by the Soviets). Luckily, Charlotte, who is a nurse on the Eastern Front, manages to save Friedhelm from a seemingly certain death. Believing Wilhelm is dead after being told such by Friedhelm, who could have sworn he saw his brother killed, Charlotte starts screwing the middle-aged head doctor at the field hospital she works at. After discovering that a middle-aged woman that she has hired to volunteer at the hospital, Lilja (Christiane Paul), is actually a Jew, Charlotte feels betrayed and gets the crypto-Judaic arrested. Meanwhile, Greta gets her fiendish fuckbuddy Dorn to create fake identity papers for Viktor so he can escape Germany, but the Gestapo agent betrays her and has her Jewish boyfriend shipped in a cattle car to a concentration camp, though the clever Hebrew manages to escape on the way upon learning that Jews are being slaughtered like lambs and he eventually joins up with some Polish partisans who are even more anti-Semitic than the SS, so he continues to shield his true identity. In the end, Wilhelm manages to survive the war by killing his sadistic Straf-battalion leader and heading back to Germany on foot, Friedhelm becomes an executioner/protégé of a Svengali SD officer named Hiemer (played by Sylvester Groth, who is best known for playing Goebbels in Tarantino's Inglourious Bastards (2009)) and later sacrifices himself to save a unit of Volkssturm soldiers that is largely comprised of young Hitler Youth boys, Charlotte is raped by a Soviet savage after her field hospital is overrun by bestial bolsheviks yet she manages to survive after the noble Jewess she once betrayed, Lilja, shows up as a Soviet officer and spares her life, Greta is imprisoned after telling Dorn's wife about their affair and committing 'Wehrkraftzersetzung' ("subversion of the war effort") and is later executed for her crimes, and Viktor manages to survive both the Nazis and Polish partisans. At the conclusion of Generation War, the three surviving friends—Wilhelm, Charlotte, and Viktor—meet back at the same bar they did in 1941 for a mostly melancholy reunion, with Germany being in complete ruins and American GIs occupying every corner. In a major "fuck you" to the United States and its hypocritical utilization of Nazis after the Second World War (most infamously, during 'Project Paperclip'), it is revealed that SS officer Dorn, who punched his pregnant mistress Greta in the stomach before sentencing her to death, has been hired by American GIs, who are well aware about his infamous past, to work as a bureaucrat for the new 'democratic' West German government.

Undoubtedly, you know a film is plagued by self-loathing and self-pity, meekness and weakness, and spiritual castration when an American film like Sam Peckinpah's Cross of Iron (1977), which is firmly anti-Nazi, manages to do a much better job at least portraying some Germans as stoic war heroes with titanic testicular fortitude. Indeed, Generation War seems like a pathetic plea created by a group of culturally cuckolded krauts who want to join the cult of victimhood like so many so-called minorities have. Seen by no less than 7 million German households when it premiered in 2013, this sub-middlebrow mini-series has now guaranteed that a whole new generation of Germans will go on looking at their grandparents and great-grandparents (why they absurdly decided to name the series "Unsere Mütter, unsere Väter" aka "Our Mothers, Our Fathers" is a complete mystery to me) as moronic cowards and opportunists who were easily duped into going to hell and back by a rather unimpressive dude with a Charlie Chaplin mustache. Undoubtedly, one of the worst lies associated with the mini-series is that it ostensibly does something revolutionary by depicting WWII from a reasonably objective perspective, yet this was already done many decades ago and in a much more intelligent and artistically merited fashion by auteur filmmakers associated with German New Cinema like Fassbinder, Syberberg, Reitz, and even a feminist like Sanders-Brahms and a Marxist like Kluge. What makes Generation War even more repellant than it already is, is that it feebly attempts to associate itself with the grand legacy of German history, as is especially apparent in a scene where a portrait of German expressionist master auteur F.W. Murnau appears briefly. Of course, the mini-series is really the putrid pansy production of self-loathing krauts that were bred on a steady diet of Hollywood swill growing up and have watched too many episodes of Band of Brothers (2001). Of course, the series also panders to Jews, with its token Jewish character Viktor and unflattering depiction of Polack partisans as bigger Heeb-haters than the Nazis themselves being quite blatant examples of this.

A 'major event' mini-series that is more or less as aesthetically and historically worthless as ABC's Holocaust, Generation War is just more proof that the Germans will always be consumed with guilt and will never get over the Second World War, at least not anytime during this century. For anyone who wants to see a truly epic and truly Teutonic film that takes a sincere approach to German twentieth century history and the troubled relationships between different generations of Germans, you can probably do no better than Edgar Reitz's mega-neo-Heimat movie Heimat, which begins with a shot of a boulder with the words "Made in Germany" engraved on it for good reason. Generation War, on the other hand, might as well begin with an inter-title reading, "Made in kraut cuckoldland where the spirit of Spielberg trumped Syberberg and where guilt is as good as gold." Indeed, like a German Gone with the Wind where Scarlett O'Hara opts for suicide instead of bravely fighting on, Generation War depicts the physical and spiritual annihilation of an entire people, yet begs for shallow pity and contempt in the end instead of demanding the German people fight on, which is a sentiment that no one can truly respect, not even the perennially defeated Polacks in Poland or the dying Khoisan in South Africa.

THE SIN OF NORA MORAN

Phil Goldstone (1933)

In traditional pre-globalized puritanical Amerikkka, one would most certainly be at a loss to find genuine expressions of art and themes of moral unscrupulousness in movies. Sure, even to this day, the business-minded Hollywood studios continue to refrain from creating actual cinematic art and large segments of the America populous still keeps their irrational minds firmly encased in a medieval pseudo-Nazarene ghetto, but unconventional cinema has, thankfully, managed to marginally flourish since the post-WWII era as proven by works like Kenneth Anger's iconic fetishistic masculine leather flick Scorpio Rising (1964) and Vincent Gallo's feeble foreplay-ridden blowjob diary Brown Bunny (2003). Of course, a handful of American filmmakers were able to create artistically significant libertine works like Alla Nazimova's ultra-campy Beardsley-esque production of Salomé (1923) and the reasonably Biblically-correct homoerotic avant-garde short Lot In Sodom (1933) during the Pre-Code era, but, unfortunately, most of these films were neglected up their initial releases and thus, unsurprisingly, have remained all but forgotten in a mongrelized nation that has always prided itself on its mass-man 'culture' of vile peasant supremacy. Recently, I happened to come across the uncommonly risqué avant-garde crime melodrama The Sin of Nora Moran (1933) aka Voice from the Grave directed by Phil Goldstone. Featuring premarital sexual promiscuity and high-class adultery, gross political corruption, noxious crimes of passion, and all around debauchery and criminality from prohibition era America, The Sin of Nora Moran is a film that is in the highly entertaining epicurean spirit of HBO's popular television series Boardwalk Empire. What makes the film especially interesting is that it was actually created during the era it portrays, yet, unlike most vintage Hollywood films of a similar but sapless sort created around the same time, The Sin of Nora Moran is distinctly uncompromising in its portrayal of ruling class corruption and rampant societal decadence. On top of candidly portraying the true grittiness and unwavering nihilistic hedonism of the era, The Sin of Nora Moran is an artistically ambitious and potent work that takes a totally transcendent yet agreeably mellifluous approach to storytelling, which has more in common with early European surrealist and arthouse works than the typical Hollywood crime and film noir flicks of that era.

The Sin of Nora Moran follows a sweet but tragic girl who has suffered immensely and without end during her ill-fated yet relatively far-flung life. Orphaned, raped, exploited, betrayed, and imprisoned, beautiful babyface Nora Moran (played by Banat-German-American actresses Zita Johann) is a lovely little lady who has led a life of grave contretemps, but she remains as darling and dainty as ever during her increasingly accursed personal journey. Essentially, Nora is the archetypal adversary of the typical film noir femme fatale.

While most film noir flicks portray the female lead as a conspiring succubus of sorts, Nora Moran of The Sin of Nora Moran is a natural victim who, against her somewhat strong will, becomes a virtual sex doll for men to rape, abuse, and ultimately dispose of. Although a mere quasi-burlesque circus performer trying to survive in an intrinsically ungodly world, Nora finds herself blindly climbing an ethically crooked social ladder and becoming the veiled mistress of a powerful yet disastrously irresponsible governor named Bill Crawford (played by Paul Cavanagh). When circus lion tamer Paulino (played by John Miljan) – a patently malicious man who also happens to be Nora’s personal serial rapist – finds out about the hopelessly star-crossed love affair, he naively conspires to blackmail the governor, but not without fatal results. After the accidental slaying of supreme degenerate Paulino, poor Nora, a selfless girl with seemingly no future, decides to take the blame, thus saving governor Bill and a conspiring District Attorney named John Grant (played by Alan Dinehart) from a career-shattering political scandal and a hot date with the electric chair. The short and sad story of Nora Moran is told from a variety of extravagant recollections and flashbacks-within-flashbacks and narrated by the District Attorney. Predating Christopher Nolan’s Memento (2000) and the films of Quentin Tarantino by well over half a century, Nora’s horribly hexed life story is told in a delightfully discordant manner of meticulously deconstructed chronology. The Sin of Nora Moran also features a grim glimpse inside Nora’s calamitous subconscious as she awaits her deplorable and wholly undeserved destiny on death row. Defying the fundamental plot and theme conventions of virtually every Hollywood film ever created, The Sin of Nora Moran is a daring downer that offers no happy endings nor any form of solace for the viewer; a fact the film hints at from the very beginning.

Despite its hyper doom and gloom buffet of murder, rape, and suicide, The Sin of Nora Moran is, in consummation, an abnormally gorgeous go-getter of a film that was lavishly assembled with a broken moral compass and a keen eye for artistic focus, but, of course, it has its flaws. Being a product of its era, The Sin of Nora Moran does have its share of aged-based thematic spoilage; most specifically, it’s surely outdated and modernly mundane portrayal of sin, which seems quite absurd in our present age of pronounced mass communal devolution. After all, I doubt the 1930s featured such everyday absurdities as members of the white bourgeois dressing like impoverished ghetto blacks and vice versa, and where even college professor speak colloquially and boast of sexual conquests and the need for violent social unrest. While viewing the film, I often found the District Attorney’s stoic and articulate narration to be unintentionally humorous as his once-common manner of refined ‘anglophile’ speech is now all but obsolete, henceforth linguistically deteriorating into the hooked-on-ebonics nation America is today. Naturally, the delinquent philandering antics of the manslaughtering governor seem quite tame by today’s standards as we now live in a country where a recent ex-president and ardent adulterer found great joy in showing his cigar in a husky Hebrew girl's snatch and where the current president is a literal double-bastard with anti-western Fanonian sympathies. In short, The Sin of Nora Moran is a classy, if somewhat outmoded and very slightly thematically moldy, tale of domestic transgression gone terribly awry. Combined with a spectacular nonlinear technique of mesmeric avant-garde storytelling that is comparable to F.W. Murnau's masterpiece Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) and the once-assumed-lost Preston Sturges' penned work The Power and Glory (1933), The Sin of Nora Moran is an ideally idiosyncratic work that will seem like a recovered lost treasure to any serious and adventurous cinephile. In a manner of truly brazen blasphemy, Nora Moran, an 'unclean' girl of extra easy virtue, is betrayed and sacrificed for the sins of others just as Jesus Christ was. Like his fellow Hebraic kinsmen and low-budget carny filmmaker Lloyd Kaufman, The Sin of Nora Moran director Phil Goldstone was mainly a producer and peddler of smut, but he did have his moment(s) of brilliance. Although, I cannot say that I have seen most of his films (the majority of which seem to have deteriorated in some forgotten studio vaults), which range from obscure c-grade westerns like Montana Bill (1921) to exploitative works about venereal diseases like Damaged Goods (1937), The Sin of Nora Moran is indubitably Phil Goldstone's 'Citizen Kane' (and apparently this little b-movie did inspire Mr. Welles' masterpiece).

THE CONFORMIST

Phil Mulloy (1991)

By sheer happenstance, I watched Bernardo Bertolucci's arguable magnum opus Il conformista (1970) aka The Conformist for the very first time only a couple days before the Italian auteur died. As a longtime cinephile, it might seem inexplicable that I would wait so long to watch a purported great masterpiece of cinema history, but I have always had very strong mixed feelings about Bertolucci and surely regard him as among my least favorite of the great post-WWII guido filmmakers, namely due to his idiotically expressed political views and rather 'cosmopolitan' international career. Indeed, it is no coincidence that, out of all the Italian filmmakers, Bertolucci made the most successful transition to Hollywood and the international English-language market, as if his own nation and culture meant very little to him aside from as a tiresome tool to express his insipid political views, thereupon making it all the more ironic that Pier Paolo Pasolini—a fellow poet that, despite being a gay Marxist, basked in his guidoness, whether it be high or lowbrow—was more or less responsible for jump-starting his career by hiring him to work as first assistant on his debut feature Accattone (1961) and then co-penning (with help from his protégé Sergio Citti) his directorial debut La commare secca (1962) aka The Grim Reaper. Quite aesthetically different from anything else that he would later direct and indubitably Pasolinian in terms of theme and gritty realist location and mostly lewd lumpenproletariat characters, The Grim Reaper is like a guido ghetto reworking of Akira Kurosawa's classic Rashômon (1950) that reveals very little about the auteur's political persuasion aside from a general interest in street people. It was not until I had the grand displeasure of watching his beyond bloated five-hour neo-bolshevik epic 1900 (1976) aka Novecento—a film so sinisterly stupid in its mundane Marxist agit-prop and smugly contrived displays of the grotesque that it depicts a blackshirt fascist portrayed by Donald Sutherland not only gleefully killing a kitty cat via headbutting, but also bashing in the brains of a fascist little boy that he and his overweight bitch lover just molested—that I had to write-off Bertolucci as nothing more than a petty propagandist that hypocritically utilized Hollywood cash and stars to make unintentionally cheesy commie cinematic crap, hence why it took me so long to finally take the plunge and watch The Conformist. After all, I have no problem appreciating the work of commie artists as I regard both Pasolini and Visconti as being among my favorite filmmakers, but I cannot stomach someone that is so dishonestly dehumanizing and one-dimensional in their preposterously insincere pro-prole propaganda. Somewhat surprisingly, Bertolucci's fascist era flick is great and everything that 1900 isn't in terms of being rather nuanced, ambiguous, thoughtful, and even sometimes strikingly idiosyncratic (indeed, it is probably the only film will you find that features a surreal fascist dance party comprised of blind people).

THE CONFORMIST

Luckily, despite being based on a novel by a Jewish communist by the name of Alberto Moravia—a half-heeb that had a somewhat schizophrenic genetic lineage in the sense that he had famous kosher paternal commie cousins that were murdered by Mussolini but also a fascist leader Augusto De Marsanich as a maternal uncle—The Conformist is arguably not only Bertolucci's most aesthetically complex and ambitious film, but also his most esoteric, otherworldly, and enigmatic to the point of seeming like a elliptical fascist nightmare of the perversely purgatorial sort where the emotional essence (as opposed to the historical facts) are depicted in a surprisingly poetic fashion. Naturally, a film of such a ambitious and ambiguous nature has invited varying, sometimes contradicting, theories and critiques from, rather unfortunately, mostly left-wing and communist sources. For example, in his classic text of turgid tediousness The Altering Eye: Contemporary International Cinema (1983), Hebraic film academic Robert Phillip Kolker made the rather dubious argument that, "THE CONFORMIST is one of a group of films, beginning with ROME, OPEN CITY and of which Visconti's THE DAMNED is a major example, that attempt to discuss fascism as a manifestation of perverted or misaligned sexuality. One source for this is perhaps Wilhelm Reich's THE MASS PSYCHOLOGY OF FASCISM as well as the historical realities of Nazi experimentations, eugenics, and fascism's obsessively male-centered ideology. Fascism is an ideology of denial and destruction, the romance of sacrifice and conquest brought to a climax in the abjuring of any human quality but the ability to kill and die. In truth it does not emerge from aberrant sexuality nor lead to it. Aberration occurs in its turning sexuality, as it turns any other human activity, into a thing to be used in a destructive way. Fascists are not degenerates [...] but the cause of degeneration; yet sexual perversity remains a favored means of explaining fascism or demonstrating its effects." While Reich was indeed a sexually abusive quack that rightly died in jail where all obscenely socially deleterious beings should, Kolker seems to have borrowed his understanding of fascism from Steven Spielberg, on top of completely ignoring the fact that, despite political persuasion, virtually all of the protagonists in Bertolucci's films are perverts of some sort, including the leftist ones. In fact, although surely somewhat sexually sick, the titular 'fascist' of The Conformist suffers from an understandable affliction, most notably post-traumatic stress, as a result of shooting a queer chauffeur that attempted to molest him when he was just a wee little lad, thereupon causing him to grow up into a somewhat screwed up individual that puts a premium on normalcy as a means to compensate for both his trauma and conflicted sexuality, hence his strong desire to prove himself as a fascist spy.

Simultaneously sympathetic and sickening like a perennially wounded animal that will go to any self-debasing low to soothe his seemingly perennial pain, the film's unconventional antihero, Marcello Clerici (Jean-Louis Trintignant)—the seemingly forsaken prodigy of a junky whore mother and loony institutionalized father that once had the honor of seeing Hitler stereotypically speak in a beer hall—cannot even really be seen as a true fascist as he would commit the same exact morally bankrupt betrayals for a communist regime, hence how he is able to so easily reunite with an exiled communist teacher-mentor named Professor Luca Quadri (Enzo Tarascio) that he has been hired to spy on. Not unlike Martin Ritt's John le Carré adaptation The Spy Who Came in from the Cold (1965)—a film that makes the Cold War seem like a Kafka-esque nightmare where the lunatics have taken over the asylum—the film completely destroys the silly James Bond myth and depicts spies as the ultimate unscrupulous gutter-dwelling scum-bags and shiftier snakes. Ultimately, the film not only reveals the antihero to be an abject failure as a fascist, but also as a spy. Indeed, when Marcello cannot gain the testicular fortitude to kill his professor pal, a real fascist named Special Agent Manganiello (Gastone Moschin)—a virtual caricature of fascist will-to-power prowess that literally masturbates while fantasizing about executing undesirable untermenschen and is comparable to fascist politician Roberto Farinacci in terms of making Mussolini seem like a liberal eunuch by comparison due to his extreme anti-clerical and counter-kosher stances—carries out the job with the help of his shadowy underlings, but not before declaring in the presence of the pathetic protagonist, “For my money, cowards, pederasts, Jews are all the same. If it was up to me I'd line them all against the wall. Better, kill them at birth.” Of course, this short yet powerful piece of dialogue ends any lingering sense of doubt as to whether Marcello is a true fascist or not (in fact, in a scene where his handler cynically reveals that most fascist spies are monetary-motivated, it becomes clear that few of these fascists were ‘true believer’ types). In short, like in any society, the characters of The Conformist naturally adapt to their political climate, which completely changes by the end of the film, thus underscoring this unfortunate yet not-all-that-surprising human tendency.

When Orson Welles stated in a 1958 interview, “All of the eloquence of film is created in the editing room,” he surely could have had Bertolucci's masterpiece in mind as it is a film that is seemingly immaculate in terms of narrative structure despite being depicted largely from the perspective of a mental defective of sorts. With its elliptical editing that can be compared to Henry Jaglom's much inferior debut A Safe Place (1971) and the films of the late great British auteur Nicolas Roeg (who incidentally only died a couple days before Bertolucci), The Conformist reveals a individual whose perturbed psyche acts as an ‘unreliable narrator’ of sorts. Haunted by an exceedingly epicene homo from his childhood that he incorrectly believes he killed, Marcello has a deep all-consuming fear of his own latent sexuality and thus obtains a ‘beard’ in the form of a terribly dumb yet beautiful flapper-like wife named Giulia (Stefania Sandrelli) that he openly admits he has next to nil sexual or emotional interest in. Although Marcello does fall in love with his professor's young blonde wife Anna Quadri

(Dominique Sanda), she proves to be a sexually flexible lesbian of sorts. Somewhat curiously, in two different sexually foreboding scenarios that underscore the protagonist's delicate mental state, Marcello randomly encounters Anna—or at least her archetypal doppelgänger—twice in semi-surreal situations before he ever officially meets her, including lying provocatively on the desk of a fascist official and lurking around a baroque brothel. Undoubtedly, aggressive bisexual Anna is a symbol of the ideal yet ultimately unobtainable archetypal female for the protagonist, so naturally he plays an imperative role in her grisly and ultimately completely pointless death. Indeed, like a perverse tribute to Oscar Wilde's words, "Yet each man kills the thing he loves," Marcello not only plays a (pathetically passive) role in murdering Anna, but also ultimately his own soul, hence his eventual breakdown near the very end of the film where he randomly happens upon Pasqualino 'Lino' Semirama (Pierre Clémenti)—the homosexual chauffeur that he wrongly assumed he killed as a child—and has a dangerous public freakout that really underscores the antihero's morbidly conflicted mindset. Indeed, not only does Marcello project his own crimes onto a completely bewildered Lino, who has no clue who the protagonist is, and accuse him of being the "assassin" that killed Professor Quadri and his wife Anna, but he also attacks his sole friend Italo Montanari (José Quaglio)—a blind fascist radio host—and accuses him of being a "fascist" and killer. Of course, it is hinted that the protagonist secretly resents Italo throughout the film, as he reminds him of his much loathed 'otherness.' In fact, when Italo notes they are both "different" and thus "two of a kind," Marcello becomes visibly annoyed. Clearly a fascist more out of necessity as a cripple than any sort of die-hard blackshirt, Italo also reveals he understands Marcello better than anyone else in the film by declaring to him, "It's funny though, you know? Everyone would like to be different from the others, but instead you want to be the same as everyone else." Undoubtedly, probably more lucidly than any other film that I have ever seen, The Conformist confirms C.G. Jung's wise words, "The most terrifying thing is to accept oneself completely."

While Marcello and his pathetically pathologically unhinged mind are the central focus of the film, there is no question that Bertolucci basks in exposing the deceptive beauty of the two female leads, especially Anna Quadri, who not only echoes Simonetta Vespucci in terms of her classic resplendent European beauty, but also some of the great divas of cinema history, including Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich. Indeed, as Robin Wood noted in Cinema: A Critical Dictionary (1980) edited by Richard Roud, "In the context of Bertolucci's work, Anna becomes especially interesting: her 'decadent' characteristics correspond closely to the Sternberg/Ophüls/Welles side of Bertolucci's artistic allegiances, and that side is particularly pronounced in THE CONFORMIST, the most stylistically luxuriant film he has made [...] But the stylistic wager of THE CONFORMIST is only partly to be explained in terms of superfluous rhetoric:

many scenes—one thinks immediately of the dance-floor sequence, but there is no shortage of possible examples—are brought off with the superb assurance of an artist completely caught up in what he is doing, so that any discrepancy between effect and meaning disappears. The film, whether despite or because of its confusions, remains among the most fascinating of the past decade.” While Anna seems to be the auteur’s ideal woman in terms of pulchritude of both physique and personality, Marcello’s wife Giulia—a sort of brain-dead guidette Louise Brooks—acts as Bertolucci’s idea of a sort of dangerously passive dumb broad as her contrived good-looks mask a sort of dangerous idiocy-cum-apathy towards the sort of politics that Bertolucci despises. Both painfully bourgeois and immune to the more ugly extremes of feminist degeneration, the dark-haired Giulia is in stark contrast to the ‘liberated’ Sapphic blonde Anna. Still, neither woman can be described as upholding any sort of fascist ideal, though Giulia eventually gives birth to a child. As for Anna, she is senselessly destroyed by the fascist machine because she happens to be at the wrong place at the wrong time, which is rather fitting in a film that puts a premium on the absurdity of existence, especially when it comes to human interpersonal relationships.

Not unlike ‘fascist’ padrone played Robert De Niro in his subsequent epic 1900, the titular character of The Conformist is a mentally and sexually feeble failure that manages to betray his real sole friend in the end. While I do not know all that much about Bertolucci’s tendencies toward betrayal, I think it is safe to say simply judging by his films that the auteur was a sexually degenerate pervert with a strange mind that was certainly lacking in terms of traditional male virtues and that his fascist characters were merely (possibly unconscious) stand-ins for himself. Indeed, with these fascist characters, the filmmaker projected all his own weaknesses and flaws onto the fascist enemy while celebrating an imagined neo-bolshevik ideal like the sexually potent and heroic commie peasant organizer portrayed by Gérard Depardieu in 1900. As the son of a successful Italian poet that used his padre’s connections to ignite his filmmaking career, Bertolucci was certainly bourgeois and hardly made of the same stern stuff worthy of a Giuseppe Pellizza da Volpedo painting. In fact, in his classic text Italian Cinema: From Neorealism to the Present (1983), Peter Bondanella would confirm my suspicions when he argued, “...as a coherent explanation of the birth of a Fascist, THE CONFORMIST fails just as certainly as did the theories of Wilhelm Reich in THE MASS PSYCHOLOGY OF FASCISM (1933) or of Erich Fromm in ESCAPE FROM FREEDOM (1941), works which obviously influenced Bertolucci’s adaptation of Moravia’s novel. By placing the ultimate origin of Marcello’s conformity and his desire for normality in the realm of Marcello’s unconscious (the lingering memory of a homosexual attack), Bertolucci undermines any Marxist explanation of the rise of Italian Fascism through class struggle or middle-class repression of the working class. Paradoxically, although Bertolucci asserts in a number of interviews that Marcello embodies the middle-class origins of Italian Fascism, there is no evidence in the film to support this position. On the contrary, the only milieu ever reflected in THE CONFORMIST, that of the decadent bourgeoisie, includes not only Marcello and his family but also the anti-Fascist Quadri couple as well. Anna Quadri's lesbianism, as well as her husband's obvious voyeuristic pleasure in observing her sexual escapades with members of her sex, mark the anti-Fascists of the picture as members of the same decadent class to which Marcello belongs." Needless to say, The Conformist is not the sort of film a real (lumpen)prole would direct, especially when you compare them to the bawdy flicks of real working-class auteur Sergio Citti like Ostia (1970), Casotto (1977) aka Beach House, and Due pezzi di pane (1979) aka Happy Hoboes. Incidentally, like with Bertolucci, Pasolini co-penned Citti's debut Ostia.

A sort of bourgeois bohemian, Bertolucci seems very much typical of left-wingers from his class and generation in that his politics seem to be largely inspired self-loathing as opposed to any sort of organic sense of solidarity with the working-class. Of course, such seemingly self-contradictory behavior is, historically speaking, nothing new. Indeed, as Ted Kaczynski, who spent his entire academic career surrounded by bourgeois leftist types, once rightly wrote, "Many leftists have an intense identification with the problems of groups that have an image of being weak (women), defeated (American Indians), repellent (homosexuals), or otherwise inferior. The leftists themselves feel that these groups are inferior. They would never admit to themselves that they have such feelings, but it is precisely because they do see these groups as inferior that they identify with their problems." Demonstrating that he is the sort of stereotypical leftist NPC that associates anything that is traditional and western as 'fascistic,' Bertolucci actually had the gall to state in a 1971 interview on French television, "Historical Fascism is dead, but middle class is always there, firmly in its place," thus underscoring that, like with the weaklings of antifa today, the auteur had a sort of primal fear of a sort of imagined fascist bogeyman despite never ever actually experiencing real fascism. Of course, as Uncle Ted also wrote, "Leftists tend to hate anything that has an image of being strong, good and successful. They hate America, they hate Western civilization, they hate white males, they hate rationality. The reasons that leftists give for hating the West, etc., clearly do not correspond with their real motives. They SAY they hate the West because it is warlike, imperialistic, sexist, ethnocentric and so forth, but where these same faults appear in socialist countries or in primitive cultures, the leftist finds excuses for them, or at best he GRUDGINGLY admits that they exist; whereas he ENTHUSIASTICALLY points out (and often greatly exaggerates) these faults where they appear in Western civilization. Thus it is clear that these faults are not the leftist's real motive for hating America and the West. He hates America and the West because they are strong and successful." Undoubtedly, what makes The Conformist antihero Marcello slightly more respectable than the average bourgeois degenerate (and, of course, absolutely loathsome to someone like Bertolucci) is that he opts to side with a powerful movement instead of taking the slave-morality route by identifying with a victim class.

Undoubtedly, the only reason that The Conformist manages to display any sort of empathy for Marcello due to the very fact he is an irrational failure, which Bertolucci seemed to greatly identify with (despite his later great success as a filmmaker). In fact, although eponymous protagonist of his later epic The Last Emperor (1987) is a Manchurian monarch, Bertolucci seemed to identify with this character as well for similar reasons. Even in 1900—a film that almost rivals a Michael Bay flick in terms of its fiercely one-dimensional portrayal of villains—displays a sort of disgustingly morbid empathy for the pathetic fascist padrone played by De Niro. As David Thomson speculated in his classic cinematic reference guide, The New Biographical Dictionary of Film (1975) in regard to the scene where the ‘hero’ acts passively as his lover Anna is brutally killed, “The finale is passionate, whereas the logic of the film is to show that the man without passion is symptomatic of the modern world. In part, this may be because Bertolucci’s sympathy for the cold-hearted, isolated fascist hero was too great to deny his crucial action the elements of performance. The killing was, therefore, the crab’s dance, in response to the serpentine feminine dance earlier in the film that obliquely humiliates him. The idea of THE CONFORMIST, of this natural, unveil, but detached man, was graver and more penetrating than Bertolucci’s pleasure at cinematic expression.” In short, quite unlike his previous film Partner, which is full of distancing and other then-vogue alienation techniques, The Conformist thankfully is not contaminated with too much Godard-inspired Brechtian bullshit and instead embraces a sort of morbid romantic melodrama that even NS auteur Viet Harlan could have appreciated, especially during the right darkly tragic climatic moments. Undoubtedly, hardcore avant-gardist like Jean-Marie Straub and Frans van de Staak would surely regard Bertolucci’s magnum opus as aesthetically ‘fascistic.’ After all, in terms of aesthetics and themes, The Conformist—a film where a man sacrifices love and feminine beauty for the good of a fascist regime—can be seen as a sort of post-WWII antifascist equivalent to Harlan’s classic National Socialist melodrama Opfergang (1944).

It has been rightly said by various film critics, including American film scholar Millicent Marcus, that The Conformist is a sort of allegory for the triumphant rise and pathetically catastrophic fall of Italian fascism as epitomized by the film’s hero. Led by a terribly flawed chap by the name of Mussolini—a sort of failed Machiavellian Mafioso-like type that stole his ideas from much superior men like warrior-poet Gabriele D’Annunzio who proved to be a total disaster during WWII and who accomplished not much more than being Hitler’s failed Guido bitch-boy—Fascist Italy largely seems like a catastrophic joke on retrospect. Undoubtedly, self-described “superfascist” Julius Evola—a ‘right-wing’ thinker that so impressed Mussolini with his somewhat quixotic racial ideas that he hired him to start a racial journal that ultimately blended Sorelianism with Aryo-Roman eugenics—would have provided intriguing (meta)political inspiration for a communist like Bertolucci, especially in terms of his critiques of modern Italians in comparison to their much nobler ancient Roman ancestors. Indeed, creating a dichotomy between the negative modern ‘Mediterranean’ type and the ancient ‘Roman’ type, Evola described the former as stereotypically (proudly) dishonest, noisy/loudmouthed, sentimental, overly defensive, extroverted and lecherous, and the latter as noble, stoic, self-critical, and introverted. Undoubtedly, the titular character of The Conformist seems to have a less than ideal combination of traits from both groups as a sort of autistic neurotic Mediterranean nut-job. As Evola noted, “As is well known, during the Fascist era Italy attempted to start similar developments, whose most serious concern, though it was felt only by a minority, was to increasingly transform a ‘Mediterranean’ Italy into a ‘Roman’ Italy. An adequate integrating counterpart could have been the initial separation of Italy from her ‘Latin sisters’ and a reapproach to the German people, beyond the plane of mere political concerns.” Of course, as far as Europeans go, Italians and Germans have very little in common, hence the failure of this transformation, or as Evola himself reluctantly noted in the very same exact chapter of the same exact book in regard to the common perception among his countrymen, “In a previous chapter I mentioned the part played by anti-German prejudice in some patriotic Italian historiography influenced by Masonic and democratic-liberal ideology. This prejudice is also found in the cultural domain, and especially among those who cherish the myth of the Latin world [...] Italians and Germans, it is claimed, will never understand each other. Our Latin civilization and mind-set stand in contrast with anything German.” It is also no coincidence that there is a scene in the film where the protagonist’s blind radio host friend Italo attempts to hype up the supposed “Prussian aspect” of Mussolini and supposed “Latin aspect” of Hitler, as it was ultimately a preposterous alliance between two very cultures.

Speaking of Evola, he was heavily influenced by the Austrian Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger’s classic text Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character, which, whether intentional or not (I’m going to have to assume the latter), seems to have been a bigger psychological influence on The Conformist than the sort of stereotypical anti-Occidental Judaic psychoanalysts like Freud and Reich that clearly heavily influenced Bertolucci’s lesser films like 1900. Although the film is somewhat Freudian in the sense that the protagonist is haunted by certain Oedipal conflicts that reach their peak when he takes part in the killing of a virtual ‘surrogate father’ in the form of his old professor friend, the film ultimately feels more Weininger-esque than overtly Freudian. While I do somewhat doubt that Bertolucci ever read Weininger, the romance between lead Marcello Clerici and Anna Quadri is one of the rare cinematic examples of Weiningerian sexual compatibility. Believing that all people were to some degree 'bisexual' (e.g. a butch lesbian would have about 80% masculine traits/20% feminine traits), Weininger argued that people, including homosexuals, were naturally attracted to people with opposite (yet ultimately complimentary) sexual traits (for example, a male that is 90% male/10% female would most likely be attracted to a female that is 10% male/90% female). As Weininger once wrote in regard to the tendency, "I once heard a bisexual man exclaim at the sight of a bisexually active actress with a slight hint of a beard, a deep sonorous voice, and almost no hair on her head: 'What a gorgeous woman!' To every man 'woman' means something different and yet the same; in 'women' every poet has celebrated something different and yet identical." While the film's lead Marcello, who clearly has certain latent homosexual tendencies, is totally disgusted by his wife Giulia—a woman that is a sort of degenerate version of the archetype of the highly feminine submissive yet sexually insatiable housewife type—he virtually falls in love with the aggressive bisexual (or, possibly, even lesbian) Anna at first sight and his feelings are surely reciprocated, at least to some degree. Indeed, despite being a deeply troubled latent homosexual, Marcello reacts to Anna because her aberrosexuality compliments his own (to the antihero's slight chagrin, Anna also demonstrates an attraction to Marcello's wife). Of course, aside from not completely succumbing to raunchy Reichian retardation, The Conformist is nowhere near as sexually debasing as the director's later films like 1900, which features full-frontal homosexual encounters between preteen boys and a sado-masochistic threesome of sorts involving Donald Sutherland, a fat chick, and a little boy that absurdly climaxes with the latter having his brains bashed in against a wall. Needless to say, The Conformist is not only more aesthetically ambitious than 1900, but also considerably more intellectually, psychologically, and (meta)politically nuanced. In that sense, it is no surprise that Peter Bondanella would note in his text Italian Cinema: From Neorealism to the Present (1983) that, "With his adaptation of Alberto Moravia's THE CONFORMIST, Bertolucci produced what is perhaps his most visually satisfying film, although many reviewers and critics question its ideological coherence." Only really superficially 'antifascist,' especially compared to audaciously aberrant yet idiotic agitprop like 1900, the film's (anti)hero just as easily could have been a commie, which is (arguably) one of the film's messages, hence the (arguably) ironical title.

While Bertolucci would go on to direct much bigger films with much bigger budgets, The Conformist is unquestionably his mostly aesthetically refined and most mesmerizing in terms of mise-en-scène, as if the auteur was attempting to reconcile the films of Orson Welles and Werner Schroeter for the target peasant audience of Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather (1972). Of course, it would be virtually criminal to not mention the imperative contributions of cinematographer Vittorio Storaro and production designer Ferdinando Scarfioni to the film (in fact, I do not think it is a coincidence that both men worked on Bertolucci's greatest films). A cultivated homosexual that also worked as an art designer on Visconti's Death in Venice (1971), Scarfiotti arguably deserves more credit than anyone for elevating The Conformist to the level of high cinematic art. Interestingly, the auteur once confessed in a 1972 interview with Marilyn Goldin when asked if the film was Sternbergian, "Yes, indeed. Because in [THE SPIDER'S] STRATEGY I was more influenced by life, while in THE CONFORMIST I was more influenced by movies. One could say the point of departure was cinema; and the cinema I like is Sternberg, Ophüls and Welles." Needless to say none of these auteur filmmakers directed films for peasant audiences, as they all demonstrated the very same sort of aristocratic decadence that Bertolucci decried throughout his career. Revealing his own hypocritical Oedipal tendencies, Bertolucci actually stated in the same exact interview, "My own father was anti-Fascist, but obviously I feel that the whole bourgeoisie is my father. And Fascism was invented by the petit bourgeois [...] On top of that, THE CONFORMIST is a story about me and Godard. When I gave the professor Godard's phone number and address, I did it for a joke, but afterwards I said to myself, 'Well, maybe all that has some significance. . . . I'm Marcello and I make Fascist movies and I want to kill Godard who's a revolutionary, who makes revolutionary movies and who was my teacher.'" Aside from being admirably honest in regard to his deeply personal motivations, including his sort of cringe-worthy class self-loathing, for making the film, Bertolucci's remark also reveals his longing to kill his own sort of surrogate cinematic father in a film that is ultimately dually (and even schizophrenically) Oedipal. In that sense, it is no surprise that the antihero lacks the strength to personally kill his own father figure and instead really just wants to destroy his own mind and soul in the end. Indeed, somehow I doubt Bertolucci would have been a card-carrying commie had he born a couple decades before during a time when Marxism was not vogue and the trains ran on time. Needless to say, Bertolucci would have probably been a sort of Italian Hans-Jürgen Syberberg in terms of critical and academic neglect had he demonstrated more of an affinity for someone like Evola instead of Antonio Gramsci, but I digress. As to Bertolucci's reference to wanting to kill his filmic father figure Godard, it is somewhat ironic that he would choose a Moravia novel to accomplish such an admirably lofty task. After all, not unlike Bertolucci with The Conformist, Le Mépris (1963) aka Contempt—an adaptation of Moravia's existentialist novel Il disprezzo (1954)—is oftentimes (rightly) described by critics as Godard's magnum opus.

In his classic text The Rise and Fall of Elites: An Application of Theoretical Sociology—a classic sociopolitical text that proved to be an imperative influence on Mussolini in terms of his struggle to takeover Italy—Vilfredo Pareto noted, "It is a known fact that almost all revolutions have been the work, not of the common people, but of the aristocracy, and especially of the decayed part of the aristocracy." Of course, the same can be said of revolutionary cinema, as Bertolucci's one-time hero Godard, who actually came from a family of anti-Semitic Vichy supporters, was certainly not a member of the working-class yet he dedicated a good portion of his career to defecating out mostly worthless (neo)Marxist agitprop. In the same book, Pareto argues that, "Elites often become effete. They preserve a certain passive courage, but lack active courage," which is certainly a good way to describe not only the titular character of The Conformist, but also Bertolucci himself. In fact, I would argue that in no other film does Bertolucci demonstrate that he is the politically passive-aggressive auteur par excellence, but at least in this context it works in his favor due to the antihero's conflicted psyche and incapacity to take direct decisive action. Seeing as the film concludes with it hinting that the antihero has finally 'went over to the other side' and embraced his latent homosexuality now that fascism is finally dead, one can interpret this as a sort of subtle confession by Bertolucci that anyone could have become a 'fascist' during those repressive times, including his perverted self (surely, it is no coincidence that his late era film The Dreamers (2003) is not much more than a gleefully gratuitous celebration of the sexual degeneracy of the post-WWII generation and the insipidly deleterious politics that accompanied such degeneracy). Either way, the film (unwittingly) confirms that the post-WWII era is, by definition, degenerate.

One of the most interesting aspects I discovered upon researching The Conformist is the divergent critiques and analyses of the film. Undoubtedly, one of the most interesting I found was by queer film theorist Parker Tyler, who argued in his book Screening the Sexes: Homosexuality in the Movies (1972) in regard to Bertolucci's masterpiece that, "It is a brilliantly directed and photographed film—so stylish in performance that the crypto-fascist sex syndrome it portrays seems very true yet is so subtly woven with emotional and sexual ambiguity as to block the critic who wishes to assess the precise role played by homosexuality. The hero [...] is as false a heterosexual as he is a homosexual [...] Is he cowardly and treacherous because of his sex neurosis? Moravia's antifascist purpose seems to have been to associate fascist sadism and amorality with a particular sex complex in the male. This is embodied in a fucked-up hetero who—going by the plot line—is really homo [...] Further, the director Bertolucci has contrived from all this such a smooth, flexible, fast-moving melodrama that character motivation is swept along as bright blur with incidentally piercing insights." And, of course, this is the brilliance of a film directed by an auteur that is not typically known for being subtle—whether it be the (meta)political and/or psychosexual (notably, according to, Gideon Bachmann, Bertolucci was, "rescue[d] by [Carl] Jung" right before he made the film, which might explain the almost metaphysical essence of the film). From there, Taylor complains, "After due consideration, can we avoid formulating the moral that offbeat sex is schematic in being a fated part of the contagious moral vice which fascism is widely assumed to be? That, for its part, homosexuality can also be a thing of grace, a separate field of gravity, a poet's and philosopher's privilege and even (as in the classic pastorals) a lover's peaceful pursuit, seems to have been inconceivable in Mussolini's Italy. Or so THE CONFORMIST and similar movies would have us believe; even DEATH IN VENICE, whose era is the nineteenth century and whose Homeros is very young, beautiful, and untainted, makes turncoat homosexuality a symbolic disease." Of course, it is interesting that Taylor references a film by Visconti as he conveniently forgets the auteur's classic epic melodrama The Damned (1969), reminds one in its savagely hyper homoerotic depiction of the so-called Night of the Long Knives that the NSDAP's original paramilitary outfit, the Sturmabteilung (SA)—a group led by a subversive sod by the name of Ernst Röhm that demonstrated he was more radical than Bertolucci or any of his contemporaries when he once pridefully remarked, "Since I am an immature and wicked man, war and unrest appeal to me more than good bourgeois order. Brutality is respected, the people need wholesome fear. They want to fear someone. They want someone to frighten them and make them shudderingly submissive"—was completely led by well-known homosexuals and they certainly were not stereotypical pansy poofers, but I digress. While Tyler certainly brings up some interesting points, he seems to ignore the fact that, contrary to the gatekeepers of the LGBT pink gestapo, 'gay' is not a prepackaged one-size-fits-all identity and that the film's protagonist is more a victim of childhood trauma than his sexuality. In fact, had Marcello been more comfortable in his gayness, he might have been a fairly ferocious fascist and lived a more Edmund Heines-esque existence.

Ultimately, The Conformist is less about homosexuality than the ostensible fascistic nightmare of having to live in a society that has actual standards where everyone is expected to be guided by the same moral compass, hence why Bertolucci would once remark that the film is set, "...in the present, but it's the present dressed as the past." In the very last scene of the film in what seems to allude to the present and thus the so-called sexual revolution, counterculture movement, and student protest movement, the film's protagonist is depicted with flames illuminating his face while he is literally behind bar as a completely naked street hustler lies nearby. In short, with fascism dead, Marcello can now be himself and get fucked in the ass with pride, or so Bertolucci—a supposedly heterosexual man that filled many of his films with explicit homosexual content, including of the prepubescent sort—wants you to believe. Needless to say, it is quite fitting that Bertolucci died the same year exact year that right-ring strongman Matteo Salvini—a real mensch that seems like he could be the grandson of Fascio Special Agent Manganiello—took power to repair everything that the filmmaker's generation so zealously and thoughtlessly destroyed. Indeed, despite what one might think of the film's aesthetic value as what is arguably one of the greatest and most important cinematic works of its era, there is no denying that it is a strangely mercurial reflection of a sick society and era that is in steady decline. As Pareto noted long ago in regard to the paradoxically spiritually necrotic character of privileged yet self-loathing bourgeois leftist types like Bertolucci, “Our bourgeoisie spends energy and money only to aid the enemy. Societies to help the vicious, the incapable, and the degenerate, spring up in extraordinary numbers; and among all these societies the bourgeoisie did not have the spirit to establish one, I say a single one, to defend their own rights. But then, do they have rights? It seems that they do not, for they are ashamed to speak of them. It is the owners who negate their right of ownership and donate money to the People’s Universities, which teach that everything should be taken from the owners. Viewed from a certain point, it can be said that in effect they have no rights, because they do not know how to defend them.” Like a virtual archetypal caricature of the spiritually sick bourgeois that Pareto speaks of, Bertolucci even once confessed in a 1978 interview with Jean A. Gili in regard to his film 1900, “Likewise I consider to be communist the feeling of guilt that I experience as a bourgeois—a feeling which, according to some conformists, makes the film appear to be manichean [...] As for me, the fact that I have a visceral feeling about my bourgeois origins, the fact that I accept the burden of a certain type of guilt which is not directly mine but belongs to my social class and those who support that class, is also a communist idea.” Of course, what Bertolucci’s confessions reveal to me is that, not unlike modern antifa members and trust-fund gutter-punks and squatters, he was a literal social degenerate compelled by a sort of passive Todestrieb, hence why he created socially, politically, and sexually deleterious cinematic works and never had children despite being married to no less than three different women (notably, as Max Nordau highlighted in his classic text Entartung (1892) aka Degeneration, degenerate artists tend not to reproduce and thus unwittingly solve the societal problem of their own tainted bloodlines). In that sense, I think that The Conformist, which is only superficially like Moravia’s source novel, can only be adequately interpreted as a sort of semi-cryptic schizophrenic internal dialogue by Bertolucci about what it might be like to be a fascist despite being psychologically ill-equipped and lacking the intrinsic desire for self-preservation and continuing one’s genetic line (while the antihero does have a child, it seems rather absurd that he and his wife are parents). Of course, just by directing a film of such a caliber as The Conformist, Bertolucci certainly accomplished more than most people do in their lives—whether they be Evolian neo-fascists or Limousine Marxists. Not unlike his virtual spiritual predecessors like the Marquis de Sade and Leopold von Sacher-Masoch, who also disgraced their social backgrounds, Bertolucci managed to achieve greatness in spite of his degeneracy, henceforth demonstrating that it is probably preferable to have despoiled bourgeois or noble blood to healthy peasant blood, at least if you are an artist.

ROBOT MONSTER

Phil Tucker (1953)

I recall reading some interview with Quentin Tarantino when I was a kid in which he said something to the effect of "If I screen Rio Bravo for a girl and she doesn't love it, it's over" and thinking "You fucking dweeb...if you actually managed to get a something with female sex organs into your lair, you'd show her a John Wayne movie?! AND have the temerity to declare it "over" if such a sweaty, excessively masculine flick doesn't make her swoon?" Having huge Hollywood pocketbooks to bankroll your cinematic mixtapes makes a world of difference- imagine if that deformed dork had never managed to pillage and plagiarize his way to the top- he'd have to be like the rest of us and just be happy vag-titties will tolerate our "hobby", or be eternally grateful to baby-bearers who actually share our passion, regardless of whether or not they like an old Western flick or not. Rio Bravo, man?! I wonder if he made Uma Thurman watch that shit while jerking off all over her toes. I know there is a point to this tangent...oh yeah, Phil Tucker's CLASSIC 1953 film Robot Monster. Now, I'm not saying I'd relent from facebanging a hottie if she didn't share my unequivocal love of the misadventures of fishbowl-headed, gorilla-framed Ro-Man and a small handful of humans in Bronson Canyon, but it would definitely make me sad, and might lead to major resentment over time if she is an informed film geek like yours truly and rests on the tried-and-true appraisal of Robot Monster as being one of the "worst films of all time." Do any of you lazy fuckwits who resort to laughing at this flick realize that you are just parroting that GOP fuckslut Michael Medved's opinion from his insulting Golden Turkey Awards tome from the seventies? Have you actually seen this MASTERPIECE of economical sci-fi cinema?

Yes, masterpiece, assholes. For all the talk of "ineptitude", and claims that the film's reception drove the director to a suicide attempt (in fact, it was the producers blackballing him from the industry and not being able to get a cut of the million bucks the $16,000 film ended up making at the box office...Variety even gave it a somewhat complimentary review!), Robot Monster is a brisk 62 minute approximation of sci-fi geek 10-year olds playing in a fort before supper. With scant props, locations relegated to a section of Griffith Park that will be instantly recognizable to anyone who has seen their share of B-Westerns and sci-fi cheese, some incongruous stock footage (not to mention surprisingly strong 3-D photography at his disposal), Tucker manages to wring the most of his post-post-apocalyptic scenario, as alien Ro-Man Extension XJ-2 strives to eliminate the few remaining humans left on earth with his Calcinator Death Ray, humans who coincidentally live just around the corner from the cave in which he resides. Said humans consist of a Euro-accented scientist, his frumpy wife, grating son Johnny (the appropriately annoying main character- if a kid is in some late-night channel Z classic, he SHOULD be whiny voiced and Dennis the Menace-lite, dammit...children who can actually act are doomed to drug habits and reality TV, kids who just wince and whinny will live fitter, happier lives, though off hand I can think of plenty exceptions to this nonsensical rule of my own invention, so disregard the last few sentences), equally snot-nosed daughter Carla, older babe daughter, Alice, and a younger scientist love-interest of Alice, Roy. Living in some very slightly decorate ruins that the scientist has rigged so that the Ro-Man can't hear them and thus sniff out their location (despite the apparent fact these remaining humans are immune to his Calcinator Death Ray because of antibiotic serums developed by the scientists). Anyways, Johnny, being an inquisitive little shit, stumbles upon Ro-Man Extension XJ-2, who receives transmissions from his leader (also a dude in a gorilla suit and fishbowl helmet, but with a tesla coil) on a screen and whose Calcinator Death Ray looks for all intents and purposes like shortwave radio equipment, which, when activated, emits bubbles and makes the film stock get all strobe-lighty and reverse exposed. The ruthless Ro-Man is ready to stamp out the remaining Hu-Mans when he catches a glimpse of the fetching Alice and realizes that white, silky Hu-Man skin certainly beats whatever passes for feminine on the planet Ro-Man, and begins to have a change of heart, getting into frustrating, though robotically civil arguments with his commanding officer via telescreen. It is hard not to feel for Ro-Man...he's so patently ridiculous appearance-wise, all his machinery manages to do little more than emit bubbles and stock footage of dinosaurs and earthquakes, and worst yet, he's all alone in a cave and doesn't realize he's only a hop-and-skip away from the Griffith Park Observatory, which features a fantastic view of Los Angeles (looks so much nicer in aerial than slogging around it's crusted-over, syphilitic surface) and a Planetarium show about the Big Bang that is awesome on mushrooms but hard to slog through sober and surrounded by snickering high-school students. The pathos XJ-2 generates are pretty genuine and heart-felt, and, if you're anything like me, he soon transcends his antagonist status to become the true hero of the film, especially after he strangles Johnny's younger sister (kid death, in a fifties flick no less! yes!) and gets his mits on Alice.

I'm not going to go too in-depth about the remainder of the plot (except to say that if you've seen Invaders from Mars, or most any kid-centric sci-fi/horror from this time period, how it ends ain't hard to grok)- it is easy to come across like I'm poking fun at this flick by spelling out the particulars, but anyone who sees Robot Monster with an open heart and a weary mind will find that this film is fun in and of itself, and needs no mocking robot silhouettes (and Joel) to be a perfect affirmation of the wonders of no-budget, high-imagination cinema. The acting, cloying kiddies aside, is miles above other "worst film ever" contenders like Ed Wood's oeuvre or Manos: The Hands of Fate (save John Reynolds incomparable Torgo...a truly great piece of acid-drenched performance ART)-

matinee-campy but not unbearably wooden. The location makes the most of the tiny desolate desert environs of Bronson Canyon, and the sparsity of the area and the set decorations lends it a certain air of knowing threadbare staginess that, were it done for a tenth of the budget by, say, the Kuchar brothers, would be shown in museums and praised by effete soy-fiends the world over instead of languishing in the infernal gooch of the bottom rungs of the Internet Movie DataBase. Instead, Phil Tucker is considered worthy of derision (he also directed Dance Hall Racket, written by and starring Lenny Bruce (!), which I'm making a point of watching soon) when Robot Monster has so much of the infectious, genuine SOUL that dudes like the Kuchars want to capture but can't quite nail because they are too hip and "with it" (not a knock on the Kuchars, just an observation- when you consciously try to make "outsider art", it is never quite the same as, say, Shoo-by Taylor's scatting)

So yeah, when it comes down to it, consider this review a personal ad. If you have firm B's, dark hair (shoulder length at least), tastefully applied make-up, a love of 'challenging' media, a round ass, and want to be the Alice to my cave-dwelling Ro-Man, well, yeah, you're probably too good to be true and are a cutter and will only fuck me because I remind you of your brother or something. Soiled Sinema...maybe not the best place to meet sane ladies. Which is FINE, fuck, goofing on Robot Monster might make me respect people in general just a tad bit less, or goofing on any of the art I hold dear, for that matter, but ultimately, who gives a fuck? Ass-and-titties is ass-and-titties, Tarantino, you insufferable doofus. That any woman has had to tolerate his pathetic pecker inside of her is a tragedy on par with Robot Monster's ridiculous retrospective reception.

CABARET SIN

Philip Adrian Booth (1988)

Since one of my girlfriend's favorite films is Ridley Scott's Blade Runner (1982), it was only natural that she would dig up a hardcore rip-off of the classic cyberpunk flick. Indeed, the stylishly salacious, vintage shot-on-video hardcore science fiction flick, Cabaret Sin (1987) aka X TROP, directed by one-time porn auteur Philip O'Toole, was such a hit upon its release that it was later re-edited and released in a non-pornographic cut under the title Droid (1988) a year later, with the director deciding to adopt the pseudonym 'Peter Williams' and claiming a bogus British background, as if it would make him seem more cultivated or something (of course, as far as I know, the Brits have never made a decent fuck flick, so adopting an English persona might be a wise choice for a filmmaker that is attempting to obfuscate the dubious history of their sex flick turned sci-fi flick). With about 10 minutes of extra hardcore footage and a conspicuously 'cooler' name, I naturally opted for watching Cabaret Sin over the fuck-free flick Droid. Typically, I try to stay away from any post-porn chic, shot-on-video fuck flick, especially if it seems like it was made to appeal to the banal tastes of virginal Trekkies and related sexually autistic nerds whose greatest fantasy is getting laid by Princess Leia Organa of Alderaan, yet when I saw screenshots from O'Toole's seemingly vaguely imaginative bargain bin blue movie, I could not resist. A nude neo-noir flick that seems like it was created by some sort of psychopathic pre-teen genius with easy access to an entire bordello of whores and the props of his local high school's theater department, Cabaret Sin is a strangely charming work that, due to its aesthetic ambitiousness and wanton weirdness despite its discernible lack of budget and asinine acting performances, has to be seen to be believed. Like Liquid Sky (1982) as directed by someone who does not know a god damn thing about new wave, new romanticism, or underground music/culture in general as molested by the post-apocalyptic pornographic cult classic Café Flesh (1982) directed by 'Rinse Dream' (aka Stephen Sayadian) meets countless popular 1980s Hollywood sci-fi blockbuster, O'Toole's decidedly decadent piece of eccentrically erotic dystopia ultimately defies all forms of cinematic sanity as a seemingly aesthetically apocalyptic work that combines most of the worst clichés of dystopian sci-fi cinema, the meta-kitschy essence of late-1980s music videos, and an army of perturbingly plastic would-be-pretty people sporting mullets and other forms of obscenely odious outmoded Reagan era mullets on their seemingly empty heads. Indeed, if you ever wanted to experience the worst of 1980s dystopian sci-fi in a playfully pornographic package that strives to be, orgasmically speaking, out-of-this-world but more resembles the thematically impotent and incoherent yet nonetheless endlessly enthralling fantasy of an autistic American west coast take on Mad Max Beyond Thunderdome (1985) with a nihilistically nostalgic softspot for the worst elements of Star Wars (1977), Cabaret

CABARET SIN

Sin is a pure and unadulterated cinematically spaſtic win of the third cinematic kind as a hardcore-sci-fi hybrid.

The year and setting is Los Angeles 2020 and, as he narrates in a pseudo-noirish fashion, mullet man ‘Taylor’ (Greg Derek in what is clearly his moſt ‘famous’ role)—a horrible Harrison Ford/Mel Gibson hybrid played by a clear non-aſtor who ſeems like he was randomly diſcovered by the caſting agent while working out at Gold’s Gym—is a futuristic cop called an ‘Eliminator’ who works for the government as a lone wolf aſſaſſin. Although he hates to admit it as a macho killing machine that is not ſuppoſed to have emotions (of course, this is a reference to the Replicants of Blade Runner) deſpite the fact he is a fleſh and blood human and not a robot like a good portion of the aſſaſſins around the ſuperlatively ſhitty weſt coaſt city, he is a lethally lovelorn lad who longs for his beloved whore ‘Nicola’ (played by pseudonymous German buxom brunette ‘Kriſta Lane’), who eloquently ſmokes her fag in a fashion almoſt worthy of Sean Young à la Blade Runner. As Taylor narrates about himſelf in a leſs than impassioned manner: “It’s not that I’m a good cop...I’m a tired cop...tired of this dome, this job, this planet, but I ſtill did what any good cop tried to do. Stay alive.” Unquestionably, the L.A. of 2020, not unlike the real L.A. of today (which ſeems worſe, with its apocalyptic hodgepodge of impoverished Hispanics, diſillusioned and culturally cuckolded whites, negro gangſters, Eaſt Asians, IT-inclined Indians, 711-running Arabs, and other aſſorted forms of myſtery meat) is a decadent dyſtopian hellhole of the culturally and racially mongrelized ſort ſuffering from a ſevere caſe of malignant multiculturalism as demonſtrated by the fact that rather culturally confused individuals like meaty Meſtizos wearing goofy pseudo-Japanese clothing and white Islamic towelheads sporting buſineſſ ſuits can be found everywhere. Aſide from ‘Eliminators’ like Taylor that drive goofy futuristic hovercrafts that do not ſeem to move, the L.A. of this ſalacious piece of non-celluloid sci-fi is inhabited by angry androids called ‘The Reformers’ that have flaſhing beady red lights for eyes, black helmets, and black uniforms, thus making them ſeem like a croſs between a futuristic Geſtapo ſoldier and Darth Vader. Needless to ſay, Taylor ſeems like a ſecond-rate crack-addled pop-country ſinger compared to the Reformers.

In a ſcene parroting the famous ſpace alien cantina ſcene from Star Wars, Taylor enters a ſtyliſh, eclectically themed ſtrip club with the leſs than creative name “Pleasure Dome” where he ſees a Jap geiſha (Kriſtara Barrington) doing pseudo-Kabuki theater in front of a giant bald retro Jap head. Not ſurpriſingly, the ‘maſter of ceremonies’ of the club is a creepy ſmirking midget that waddles around with an equally creepy ventriloquiſt doll affixed to his ſhoulder. While lurking around the Pleasure Dome in a moody and broody manner in the hope that he will run into one of his targets, Taylor alſo watches in ſeeming boredom as a ſuperficially amorous chick in an aethetically vulgar Ancient Egyptian outfit, Azteca (Lorrie Lovett), ſtrips and fucks for the adoring audience. When a girl goes up to Taylor, sits on his lap without permission, and asks, "Didn't I pleasure you?," he robotically replies, "Business before pleasure," but of course, as the film later reveals, the coldhearted cop is in love with naughty Nicola, who peddles her puss to a tyrannical towelhead named 'The Turk' (played by veteran Hebraic hardcore star Herschel Savage), who owns a sleazy local club.

While brooding at the Turk's club and watching a trombonist named Tammy Dorsey (Bunny Bleu) handle her instrument on stage as if it is a boner instead of a trombone in a scene that delightfully degenerates into a threesome where the fetishistic front-lady begins banging her band members for the discernibly aroused audience members, Taylor reminisces over his love for Nicola and complains to himself, "There I go again...getting all emotional...just when I thought I had forgotten her." In easily the most memorably and perversely potent segment of the film, Taylor recalls romantically slow-dancing with Nicola prom-style in a scene juxtaposed with a heated fuck session between the two jaded lovers. When Taylor finally gets the testicular fortitude to approach his beloved Nicola, she does not accept him warmly and lovingly but berates him rather viciously, complaining, "You're just like everyone else...you belong here. You're gonna die here. I'm going to do anything I can to get out of her." Indeed, as it turns out, Nicola is working for the enemy and after being nearly killed by a Reformer robot at the behest of the terrible Turk, the killer cop prepares to shoot his great ladylove with more than just good old fashioned baby batter. Of course, 'love conquers all' in the end and Taylor declares like a true punk poser, "fuck the system" after deciding that the woman he loves is more important to him than the dead-end job that he loves to hate. In the end, in the middle of Nicola sucking off Taylor in his rather hazy and almost otherworldly Greek-statue-adorned apartment, a Reformer android breaks down the door and the film concludes with the predictable inter-title: "To Be Continued..."

Of course, as one can expect from successful films, especially porn films, a sequel was made to Cabaret Sin entitled Empire of the Sins (1988), though it was directed by a dude named Kirdy Stevens (Little Me and Marla Strangelove, A Taste of Sugar) instead of Mr. O'Toole. In fact, scenes from both films were edited together to make the non-pornographic work Droid, which is vaguely more coherent than the two other films, though at the decided detriment of hopelessly 80s style hardcore debauchery. It should also be noted that both Empire of the Sins and Droid feature quasi-campy elements from the Naziploitation sub-genre. Of course, if 1980s style retrograde sci-fi is your thing, all three videos make for virtuous vices of the pleasantly post-apocalyptic sort that make the Mad Max films seem like the platitude-ridden product of an impotent Mormon mercenary. Indeed, in its own wayward way, Cabaret Sin is sort of 'outsider's art' as assembled by people with very little artistic talent who seemed to put their all into an erotic effort with eccentric tableaux that may have been made to appeal to the rather particular sentiments of virginal sci-fi nerds whose sole sexual outlet is masturbation, but was clearly made with a 'free' and 'determined' spirit that will surely act as inspiration to any aspiring filmmaker or synth-pop musician. Through its sappy and seemingly intentionally cliché melodramatic romantic subplot and reckless aesthetic and thematic theft from countless 1980s sci-fi flicks, not to mention its inclusion of a totally random scene featuring an upside Casablanca (1942) poster hanging on the wall of a futuristic fuck club in a charmingly sleazy scenario that one might describe as 'cinematic heresy' (at least to those many individuals that think Michael Curtiz's film is one of the greatest cinematic masterworks ever made), Cabaret Sin also manages to make a mockery of Hollywood history and formulaic film conventions, which is certainly something I can respect. Of course, Los Angeles has only become all the more racially, culturally, and socially apocalyptic since the film was released over a 1/4 century ago as a result of the 'Reconquista' of the city by the supposed 'Aztlán,' the general mass colonization of the United States by third worlders of every stripe and creed, and the further spread of the neo-liberal metaphysical disease, among countless other things, so I think it is only natural that a remake of Cabaret Sin should be in order, though, considering the sorry state of the contemporary porn industry, it would probably be a reeking pile of anti-erotic bile steeped in miscegenation, cuckoldry, fake lips and tits, and ugly swarthy meathead dudes with monstrous dicks. Indeed, Cabaret Sin may make the L.A. of 2020 seem like a conspicuously corrupt culturally bastardized shithole where killer robots run rampant and creepy dwarfs are considered chic, but it pales in comparison to the real dystopia that waits the so-called 'City of Angels.'

SALT, SALIVA, SPERM AND SWEAT

Philip Brophy (1988)

While I am certainly innately anti-bourgeois and always have been, I absolutely loathe commies and other leftist rabble who, not unlike Marx and pretty much any other communist icon, are really just failed resentful members of the same pseudo-culture that they purport to hate, not to mention the fact that they subscribe to an even more extreme and soulless version of materialism than their capitalist enemies, thus I am very limited when it comes to true quality celluloid bourgeoisie-bashing. Indeed, aside from Douglas Sirk, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Todd Solondz, and to a lesser extent Oskar Roehler, there are not that many filmmakers that I consider to be masters of attacking the more repugnant members of the pansy ass petit-bourgeois and virtually all of these filmmakers created melodramas, so naturally I never expected to discover a sort of metapolitical experimental horror-comedy of the scathingly sardonic and scatological sort that rips both the neo-liberal middleclass and office work a new asshole, yet thankfully such a sweetly sick celluloid work does exist. A 47-minute piece of outstandingly outlandish and obscenely offbeat Australian iconoclasm, the alliteratively titled flick Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat (1988) directed by experimental musician, composer, academic, film scholar, and sometimes filmmaker Philip Brophy, who is probably best known for his satirical slapstick biopunk horror flick Body Melt (1993), is indubitably one of the best kept secrets of Australian cinema. Somewhat unbelievably purchased in 1990 by a British TV channel for a series called Down Under that screened new Australian independent films and ultimately aired the film in a somewhat butchered form, but largely unknown outside of the Australian continent, Brophy's charmingly subversive directorial debut is one of those oh-so rare cinematic works that is truly like no other film, albeit not in a sort of ultra-hermetic avant-gardist way, as it is a perniciously playful piece that is overflowing with tasteless toilet humor that could be, at least in a superficial way, understood by an ADHD-ridden toddler and even members of Australia's illustrious aborigine community. With that being said, Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat is also a sardonically philosophical and sometimes (anti)poetic work that virtually alleviates lowbrow celluloid scatology to an abstract art form. Featuring an embarrassingly candid portrait of a languid and largely emotionally vacant loser life that is segmented into four eponymous chapters, Brophy's foully yet farcically fetishistic experiment is a sort of post-Bataille work that seems like it was directed by the bastard Aussie brood of Charles Baudelaire and Jan Švankmajer as a sort of psychopathic punk mutation of Mike Judge's Office Space (1999) that more or less does for marvelously mundane yuppie office jobs what Liquid Sky (1982) did for the 'heroin chic' NYC fashion scene and what David Blyth's punk-fueled surrealist kiwi cult classic Angel Mine (1978) did for New Zealand suburbia as a venomous satire that spares no one, especially the protagonist. An almost dialogue-less work that disseminates a sort of grotesque misanthropic philosophy via the nameless 'writer' protagonist's archaic computer monitor, Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat is also highly accentuated by a fairly idiosyncratic sound landscape that was composed by director Brophy while he was seemingly listening to too much Throbbing Gristle and watching too many Valie Export and Kurt Kren flicks. Notably, during a August 9, 1988 interview on the TV program The Movie Show, Brophy stated regarding his cinematic debut that, "I would describe it as a film about the essences of life. It's based on, let's say, everything in life condensed down into four days and it's all kind of driven into one particular character which could be anyone...and it's about experiencing all the kind of possible intensities of sex and violence—image wise, symbolically, graphically, physically—that can happen everyday to, I think, anyone's life, except this film just kind of plays with it a bit more forcibly." Luckily, Brophy's remarks downplay the true depravity of Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat, which is essentially an unwavering assault on the viewer that reminds them that Nietzsche was right when he prophesied the emergence of the spiritually bankrupt creature known as der letzte mensch.

Featuring a turd being 'birthed' from a beta-bitch's bung-hole, a little girl who proudly spells out "Clit-City" during an intense game of Scrabble, and a blonde beastess office boss who gleefully disciplines her underlings by bending them over and shoving a large dildo up their poop-shutes, among various other unforgettable unhinged things that put the best Troma flicks to abject shame, Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat is ultimately a darkly hilarious tale of collective societal cuckoldry and soul-sucking wage-slavery featuring an emotionally comatose protagonist of the all-around sexually and socially dysfunctional sort who lives to philosophize about biological fluids in a seemingly failed attempt to rationalize his magnificently meek and masochistic existence as an office drone whose only true forms of personal expression are his work computer and anus. Although the film might be the closest thing to a sort of experimental Ozploitation flick, it utilizes various cinematic techniques of both horror cinema and pornography, or as auteur Brophy stated himself on The Movie Show, "A lot of the film is close-up photography and I think a lot of the film is based on physical and material details, which is something that is very important in all horror and pornographic films where things are in such close-up and in such detail that they virtually become abstract, like blood and sweat and gore and whatnot and fluids like that that glisten and so in that sense the film is, if you're talking about the look of it, it thrusts those things upfront in an almost anatomical kind of way, so it is not a very poetic or aesthetic film in that sense, I don't think." Indeed, featuring a sort of carefully constructed 'clinical kitsch' (anti)aesthetic that epitomizes the worst of plastic 1980s preppie (pseudo)culture, Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat is an intentionally sapless piece of 16mm celluloid (with a couple scenes shot on Super-8) that somehow performs the seemingly impossible tasking of being unwaveringly entertaining, but then again I guess it is hard to make a film featuring a farcical approach to fecal fetishism and a protagonist who blows his cunt boss' brains out boring. Indeed, if you have ever had a shitty office job that you hated, Brophy's film provides an exceptionally ecstatically therapeutic experience that is the next best thing to flooding Apple headquarters with rancid feces.

In a fittingly mundane fashion, the film opens with a shot of an archaic computer monitor that reads: "These are moist times we live in. The solid has been replaced with the liquid. Nothing stands still much anymore. Everything turns to water. The ethereal has been transformed into the aquatic. Sink or swim – float if you're lucky. The signs of the times are all wet: the proximity of the sun melting the polar icecaps; the destruction of the ozone layer causing endless rain; and still the bulk of the ocean vastly unexplored. And things just keep getting wetter. As they get wetter, we become more absorbent. Soaking up anything and everything. Never dry, never thirsty, but always room for one more drink. There are no origins here: no fountain of youth; no spring of knowledge; no elixir of life; no well of contentment. All is either condensation or evaporation. An endless return to wet." These words were written by the nameless hapless protagonist, who physically resembles a sort of archetypically gawky Anglo-Saxon dork and who lives, works, and acts like an autistic automaton who merely floats through life like a rusty robot that has no control over its body. At the beginning of the film, the viewer watches as the protagonist wakes up with a discernible expression of both abject misery and apathy on his face, holds a coffee pot in his hand while staring into the camera like a melancholy zombie, and then accidentally brush his teeth with antiseptic cream before heading to work. The protagonist lives in an apartment next door to a perverted slob that sips on a juice box while delighting in a TV program that involves a man being force-fed literal shit in an aberrantly allegorical scenario that surely recalls the infamous scene in Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) where a slave girl is forced to feast on feces. Set over the course of four different days, the film depicts how the protagonist is more or less involved in the same increasingly insipid day-to-day routines that only get worse as time passes as if the character is imprisoned in a sort of perpetual dystopian temporal loop, thus inspiring the viewer to hope that he is eventually put out of his misery.

While the protagonist might be a weak and meek wage-slave who lacks the drive and passion to change any aspect of his intolerably banal life, he is at least rebellious enough to utilize his time at work to codify his own idiosyncratic fetish-based personal bio-philosophy. Indeed, immediately upon arriving at his unnervingly sterile work office, the protagonist immediately types on his computer, "The world? You're soaking in it. Saturated by its every move and every rhythm, it is the womb you were biologically prepared for. The world sprays you, drowns you, boils you, swallows you and spits you out. Still, you strive to have a presence in the world; to leave your mark upon it. Such is the old-world charm of fingerprinting: you leave your mark on the world. But now with genetic fingerprinting, your mark never leaves you. It stays in your blood, your saliva, your semen. Your identity now springs from your bodily fluids, interpreted by a photochemical scan of your DNA. In these moist times, bodily fluids become increasingly vital." As his wayward writings surely indicate, the protagonist seeks solace in defecating, especially at the graffiti-covered public restroom at his work where he oftentimes falls into a sort of narcotizing trance while sitting on the toilet. At one point in the film, a co-worker masturbates in another bathroom stall while watching the protagonist on the toilet through a peephole. As the protagonist types regarding the power of food and feces and their effects on the human body, "Our bodies are moist machines fueled by our own fluids. Everything we saturate passes through, just as we continually pass through. The end of the line is only an S-bend continuing on somewhere else. Everything turns to water. Everything is reconstituted. We are never what we eat. We are always what we just ate."

While the hopelessly hapless protagonist types, "We are always what we just ate," there is no indication that he devours semen, shit, pussy juice, menstrual blood, or any of the other bodily fluids that he seems to fancy. Indeed, while he does have a girlfriend (played by somewhat popular Australian actress/comedian Jean Kittson in an uncredited first time film role), the protagonist is never portrayed fucking or even kissing her (though his sexual disinterest in her is hinted in a scene where his girlfriend holds up a coffee mug that reads "SEX is not a four letter word" and he replies by holding up a mug that reads "But Fuck is"), which is rather curious for a fellow with a fiercely fetishistic body fluid Weltanschauung. In fact, the protagonist is more interested in playing with his girlfriend's prepubescent children than her, with the protagonist even at one point in the film fantasizing about fucking his lady love's prepubescent son after seeing the little lad's bare buttocks (somewhat humorously, the little boy is featured wearing a Blood Feast (1963) t-shirt at one point in the film). As a rather rude and violent little girl that dares to spell out "Clit City" during a game of Scrabble, the protagonist's girlfriend's little daughter has much more testicular fortitude than he does, thus arguably reflecting the emasculation of the male sex in general in a technocratic globalist society where masculine strength has become obsolete and men have been reduced to doing the same sort of abstract paper-shuffling as women as a means to support themselves. In fact, the protagonist seems somewhat perturbed by the little girl's savage Scrabble talent and later goes home and says the anti-prayer, "Eat. Shit. Die" before going to sleep. Of course, the fact that the protagonist has no family of his own and is forced to deal with the somewhat sinister spawn of a single mother who he has no interest in fucking not only reflects how much of a loser beta-boy the character is, but is also symbolic of the everyday dysfunctional social relations that are becoming increasingly common in real-life in Western nations. Luckily for the loser lead, he will eventually receive his dream of death within the next couple days, thus guaranteeing that he will never get the opportunity in embrace his assumed latent gay pederastic tendencies, though not before taking a two-foot-long rubber pseudo-schlong in his much cherished man-hole.

According to the protagonist's writings, "To become dry is to die. Dead cultures are based on dust and air, dirt and prayer. Ashes to Ashes and dust to dust – it's all just hot air. Never trust archeologists with suntans, tradesmen with dirt under their nails, preachers with parched skin. Should you come into contact with them – immediately place yourself under a running tap. (Water isn't for cleansing – it's for getting wet.)" Unfortunately, the protagonist never seems to actually get wet himself aside from when he is taking a dump and the toilet water splashes him on the ass. The closest that the protagonist ever gets to sexual wetness is when he is tediously flirting with his girlfriend in a goofy fashion, but when his blonde beastess boss catches him doing this at work, she takes him to her back office, forces him to bend over, whips out a giant dildo that she has specially placed in a fancy suitcase, and then ruthlessly reams him in the rectum with the rubber member (though thankfully this part is not actually depicted in the film). Not long after being defiled with a gigantic dildo, the protagonist types, "Listen to your body: Body holes, body parts, body fluids. A thousand-and-one triggers at the touch of a button: the body button. Touch it and it is engaged – you are activated. Eroticism is for writers and philosophers. For them, sex is up in the air. Come down to earth: the world is your orifice." While the protagonist is a writer of sorts, his sense of eroticism is, at best, autistic and, at worse, totally impotent and nonexistent. Of course, the world is not his orifice, as he is the one that is always getting fucked by the world.

At one point in the film, the protagonist decides to call a phone-sex hotline called 'Phantasy Phone' and is then subsequently depicted meekly performing cunnilingus on his lady friend while a fancy meal sits on a table in the background. By licking his (non)lover's lily, the protagonist finally for once comes into close contact with some of the precious bodily fluids that he regularly rants and raves about in his writings, though it does not seem like a particularly spectacular experience for the protagonist. As the title of the film hints, the final segment of the film is titled "Sweat" and it depicts everything that can possibly go wrong for a white bourgeois untermensch who already lives a less than auspicious existence. Aside from being rudely awakened by the less than soothing sounds of shitty generic rock music on his alarm cock (which he subsequently smashes to bits) and cutting himself while shaving, the protagonist's oh-so loving girlfriend senselessly headbutts him in the balls when he gets to work. On top of that, both the protagonist's girlfriend and bitch boss gang up on him and then proceed to take turns slapping him in the face, thus bringing him to an all-time low in terms of his already outstanding emasculation. In an assumed attempt to redeem his rather marginal manhood, the protagonist goes into his boss' office and blows her brains out with a handgun while she is working at her desk. Despite the fact that her brains are literally lying on her desk, the bitch boss somehow manages to shoot the protagonist in the back while he is walking out of her office. Ultimately, the entire shooting scenario is revealed to be a day-dream that the protagonist has while he is sitting on a toilet. Rather fittingly, when the protagonist gets off the toilet, a used tampon is revealed to be floating in the toilet. From there, the protagonist types, "These are moist times we live in. If things don't explode – they melt. One way or another, everything gets wet. Ashes to acid; dust to pus. One way or another, everything gets wet." After getting beat up by his girlfriend's kids, the protagonist goes home and is less than warmly greeted by a uniquely punk-goth fellow sporting a leather-jacket with a button reading "Life's a fucked fuck!" who shoots him in the stomach. Instead of going to the hospital, the protagonist decides to bask in his bodily fluids and bleed out. Before assumedly kicking the bucket from too much blood loss, the protagonist types, "Salt, saliva, sperm and sweat."

As the great Teutonic philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche once wrote, "All prejudices come from the intestines." Of course, considering that the protagonist of Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat seems to have a fairly weak stomach and tends to have the most fun while barfing and defecating, one can only assume that he is prejudiced against his entire life and the world in general, hence why he lets himself die in the end in the most pathetic and passive of fashions. Indeed, the protagonist lacks the gall, self-discipline, and drive to actually commit suicide, so it ironically comes as a sort blessing in disguise when some random dirty punk degenerate senselessly shoots him, but as the great frog right-wing anarchist Louis-Ferdinand Céline once wrote regarding the dilemma of continuing to live an insufferably phony existence and committing suicide, "The worst part is wondering how you'll find the strength tomorrow to go doing what you did today and have been doing for much too long, where you'll find the strength for all that stupid running around, those projects that come to nothing, those attempts to escape from crushing necessity, which always founder and serve only to convince you one more time that destiny is implacable, that every night will find you down and out, crushed by the dread of more and more sordid and insecure tomorrows. And maybe it's treacherous old age coming on, threatening the worst. Not much music left inside us for life to dance to. Our youth has gone to the ends of the earth to die in the silence of the truth. And where, I ask you, can a man escape to, when he hasn't enough madness left inside him? The truth is an endless death agony. The truth is death. You have to choose: death or lies. I've never been able to kill myself." Luckily, in the end, the protagonist of Brophy's film does not have to gather the courage or will power to off himself yet he still manages to achieve his seemingly unspoken dream of dying a bitter-sweet death while soaked in his own much beloved bodily fluids, thus one could argue that the film has a sort of cynic's equivalent to a happy ending. Speaking of Céline, who had an imperative influence on the Beat Movement, William S. Burroughs is indubitably one of the biggest influences behind Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat, which wallows in the same sort of jovially grotesque and intricately politically correct humor that was penned by the trust-fund-sponsored junky queer literary outlaw.

Notably, in his humorously titled 2004 essay My Dreadful Failure as an Australian Filmmaker, auteur Philip Brophy wrote regarding his debut feature Body Melt, “Ten years ago, I thought it would be really fun to get the then ‘Coles girl’ (Lisa McCune) to drop her placenta one month prior to child birth, then have the placenta force its way down her husband’s (Brett Climo) throat while her womb explodes. I also thought it would be a barrel of monkeys to kill a whole lot of soapie stars in a feature film. I also thought people would like it. Here in Australia, they sure didn’t. Body Melt had no ‘hero’, no ‘journey’, no ‘3-act-structure’, no ‘multicultural aspirations’, and no condescending dismissal of bogan suburbia (very important in quality Aussie comedy). Late last year Tarantino proclaimed Body Melt ‘the best Australian film of the 90’s’ - but hey, what would he know? David Stratton hit it better on the mark: ‘Pity.’” Since Body Melt, like a lot of so-called body horror films, tends to be a flick that people either love or love to hate, it should be no surprise that Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat has suffered a similar fate in terms of obtaining a dubious reputation. Indeed, in the book Censorship: A World Encyclopedia edited by Derek Jones, Irish film professor and movie producer Dr. Rod Stoneman (who via the Irish Film Board, acted as an executive producer on Peter Mullan’s The Magdalene Sisters (2002)) noted that, aside from being heavily reedited when it was screened on British TV in 1990, Brophy’s film was found to be mighty offensive by certain Scottish college students. Indeed, as Dr. Stoneman wrote in the book, “There was, however, further controversy about SALT, SALIVA, SPERM AND SWEAT at a student seminar on censorship in Glasgow University the year after its transmission. The necessary mischief involved in pushing the boundaries of British television with such a deliberately rude and shocking piece were challenged by a student audience, who thought that the desirous look from the main character to a young boy drying himself by the fire after a bath (which had been reduced from a prolonged stare to a glancing ambiguity in the cut version) was still outrageous and unacceptable. Some young people apparently felt that child sex abuse was too serious an issue to be played with in a satire about something else.”

While not exactly an unequivocal masterpiece, Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat is almost immaculate in the context of the particular preternatural cinematic universe that it inhabits, sort of like similarly unclassifiable and inexplicable quasi-artsy works like Themroc (1973) directed by Claude Faraldo and Animales racionales (1983) aka Human Animals directed by filmmaker/screenwriter Eligio Herrero. While Body Melt is undoubtedly regarded as Brophy’s celluloid magnum opus, I unquestionably prefer his first film because I found its scathing anti-bourgeois iconoclasm and post-punk anti-aesthetic to be truly unrivaled (while Body Melt is, at least to some extent, derivative and just too much like the early horror-comedies of Peter Jackson like Bad Taste (1987) and Dead Alive (1992) aka Braindead for my liking). Indeed, Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat is the film that Nick Zedd and various other dope-addled members of the Cinema of Transgression wish they had directed but lacked the sophistication, artistic prowess, and sense of cinema (to read some of Brophy's essays on film, check-out his official website). Unlike Zedd and company, Brophy understands that you have to understand the rules of cinema before you break them. If you ever needed a sort of intricate metapolitical argument as to why you should never step foot in an office and you do not feel like reading esoteric Radical Traditionalist writings or suffering the experience of working under some self-important feminist-brainwashed female boss who wishes that her clit would grow into a cock, Salt, Saliva, Sperm and Sweat should provide you with enough fiercely fucked food-for-thought to inspire you to prefer doing manual labor over shuffling papers.

AH POOK IS HERE

Philip Hunt (1994)

Ah Pook is Here is an animated short film directed by Phillip Hunt in the year of 1994. It was based off of a William S. Burroughs novel of the same title. William S. Burroughs' deadpan reading of this short was derived from his recordings on a compilation known as Dead City Radio. The result is a wonderfully cosmic tale of the last gods struggle with the deterioration of the common man. Besides, what kind of man is a man without junk? The fleshy-organic creature of Ah Pook is a deliriously unwelcome looking creation. A stitched demi-god of cataclysmic sorrow and doubt. His likeness is mysteriously similar to Nightmare Before Christmas' Oogie Boogie. Willam S. Burroughs' voice is a gravelly patch of burden stretched across this beautiful animated film. The vast complexities are endless and each viewing supplements your taste for knowledge.

"In the scattered remains of a burnt out cosmos, the last god, "AH POOK" debates with his alter ego the trembling balance between life and death. An animated stream of consciousness in Burroughs' idiosyncratically mesmeric voice breaks delivers us a requiem for the carcasses of Armageddon, nihilistic ramblings of "the last god" searching for meaning in his universe, and finally a bitter manifesto of enlightenment, and liberation." The original recording in Dead City Radio contained the line "Bryon Gysin had the all-purpose nuclear bedtime story... the all-purpose bedtime story, in fact: Some trillions of years ago, a sloppy, dirty giant flicked grease from his finger. One of those gobs of grease is our universe on its way to the floor... Splat." This line was apparently in the theatrically released edit of this short film, but for some reason, it's absent from the commercially released print replaced with "No More Hitler's, No More Stalin's".

When I become Death, Death is the seed from which I grow... Itzama, spirit of early mist and showers. Ixtaub, goddess of ropes and snares. Ixchel, the spider web, catcher of morning dew. Zooheekock, virgin fire patroness of infants. Adziz, the master of cold. Kockupocket, who works in fire. Ixtahdoom, she who spits out precious stones. Ixchunchan, the dangerous one. Ah Pook, the destroyer. Hiroshima, 1945, August 6, sixteen minutes past 8 AM. Who really gave that order? Answer: Control. Answer: The Ugly American. Answer: The instrument of Control. Question: If Control's control is absolute, why does Control need to control? Answer: Control... needs time. Question: Is Control controlled by its need to control? Answer: Yes. Why does Control need humans, as you call them? Answer: Wait... wait! Time, a landing field. Death needs time like a junkie needs junk. And what does Death need time for? Answer: The answer is sooo simple. Death needs time for what it kills to grow in, for Ah Pook's sake. Death needs time for what it kills to grow in, for Ah Pook's sweet sake, you stupid vulgar greedy ugly American death-sucker. Death needs time for what it kills to grow in, for Ah Pook's sweet sake, you stupid vulgar greedy ugly American death-sucker... Like this. We have a new type of rule now. Not one man rule, or rule of aristocracy, or plutocracy, but of small groups elevated to positions of absolute power by random pressures and subject to political and economic factors that leave little room for decision. They are representatives of abstract forces... Ah Pook picks up a double-barrel shotgun and opens the breech, where two shells are chambered. It closes the breech... who've reached power through surrender of self. The iron-willed dictator is a thing of the past. There will be no more Stalins, no more Hitlers. The rulers of this most insecure of all worlds are rulers by accident... Ah Pook is caressing the shotgun... inept, frightened pilots at the controls of a... Ah Pook puts the shotgun into its mouth, and its voice continues: ... vast machine they cannot understand, calling in experts to tell them which buttons to push. Ah Pook pulls the trigger. — William S. Burroughs

Ah Pook is Here is a specially crafted art short. It houses endless meaning within its minuscule runtime. The results are a feverishly analytical piece of the collapse of everything - the downfall of society and religion. The fallibility of God is neigh. Ah Pook is Here is everywhere near as important as any children's classic. A mandatory viewing for any fan of Burroughs or surrealist animation.

THE WANDERERS

Philip Kaufman (1979)

Films about gangs and criminals have no doubt attracted degenerate youth all across America. These are films where young gangstas find their true models and messiahs. To see this pathetic trend, one only has to go to an urban area (and most rural areas) on a busy day and see how many youths are sporting a Scarface or 50 Cent shirt. Call me crazy, but I think Tony Montana is a piece of erratic trash (that ultimately fails). I am also not sure whether or not I would even give 50 Cent the title of "Sub-Man" because he just seems much lower than that. Sadly, to the bottom feeding males of our society, criminals with money are always going to be their greatest heroes because that is as best as these individuals (that lack individuality) can strive for. I do believe, however, that all young males (no matter what type of background) form a "gang" in some form or manner, as it is natural. The "gang" members featured in the 1979 film The Wanderers are certainly of a more "mellow" nature.

The main gang featured in The Wanderers is a group of young Italian-Americans greasers known as "The Wanderers." This gang is not full of your typical dego wops, but a more "gentle" group of garlic lovers. I was looking for something more stereotypical of these gangster Italian-Americans, but they ultimately act like a bunch of whiney Jews who complain about not being able to get laid. Maybe Martin Scorsese should have directed The Wanderers instead of Philip Kaufman. Despite The Wanderers gang being the main gang in the film, I found myself more interested in the lesser shown gangs.

The Fordham Baldies is the "toughest" gang in The Wanderers. These guys are sort of proto-skinhead types that sport leather jackets to match their equally shiny shaved heads. This gang seems to be a mixture of WASP types with a token beefy Negro for good measure. Although the Baldies are much more interesting than the Wanderers, my favorite gang in The Wanderers is easily the Duck Boys. The Duck Boys are an all Irish gang of silent psychopath leprechauns that sport raggedy working-class clothes. This gang of murdering Catholics gave a new meaning to the no longer used word "mick." The other two gangs featured in The Wanderers, The Wongs (Chinese) and The Del Bombers (Black), were of really no interest.

The Wanderers was a film that obviously attempted to make something nostalgic out of early 1960s NYC gangs. Unfortunately, the film was too weak in its portrayal of that era. Still, I found The Wanderers to be a breath of fresh air in comparison to your contemporary "KILLZ EVREE MUDHA FUCKA" gang film that has become so common in Hollywood. I know the producers in Hollywood have no interest in criminal violence (only white collar stuff), so why do they find it so necessary to expose already degenerate youths to it?!?

THE REFLECTING SKIN

Philip Ridley (1990)

If the devil himself created a coming-of-age film in an attempt to lure children on a metaphysical road to hell, I believe that film would resemble Philip Ridley's 1990 film The Reflecting Skin. Despite being Ridley's directorial debut, The Reflecting Skin features the kind of attention to details and distinct artistry that you would expect from a mature auteur. The Reflecting Skin, like many great films, is ripe full of ungodly perversion and unquenchable obsession. The child protagonist of the film, Seth Dove, is naive to true darkness that has engulfed his decaying rural community in rural Idaho. Set in the 1950s, The Reflecting Skin is most likely the darkest portrayal in film history of a past era in American that is generally regarded as "The Good Old Days." Personally, I see the 1950s as the beginning of the end for traditional America. With the allies win in the second World War, came a time of prosperity in the USA that American citizens had never seen before. Of course, luxury usually breeds uncontrollable hedonism and eventually unstable decadence. In The Reflecting Skin, it is apparent that the stranglehold of the original puritan ethic is crumbling away in America. Instead of fulfilling the American dream, prosperity only ignited the surly flames of an American Nightmare. In The Reflecting Skin, God is dead, as the citizens of rural Idaho have (in their hearts) killed him - they just don't know it yet.

From the beginning of The Reflecting Skin, it is apparent that 9 year old Seth Dove is a little confused as to what is truly "Good" and "Evil" in the world. After his father commits suicide via self-immolation, Seth is left with his fanatically religious, yet morbidly neurotic religious Mother and progressive war veteran brother Cameron (played excellently by Viggo Mortensen). Before committing suicide, Seth's father introduces his son to vampire folklore. After learning about vampires, Seth is convinced that his English neighbor Dolphin, a grieving widow still in love with her departed beloved, is a bloodsucking succubus who is out to drink the blood and steal the youthful vitality of his brother Cameron. After all, Dolphin tells Seth that she is over 200 years old and disgusted by the fact that human flesh rapidly decays. Whereas Seth's cold puritanical mother physically and mentally abuses him for the smallest of infractions, the highly sensual Dolphin, who is contrary in character to every member of the puritan rural community, shows empathy for the boy's delinquency. Believing that puritanical stringency is golden, Seth can only assume that the dionysian nature of Dolphin is evil, thus vampiric. Obviously much more laidback than his kinfolk, Seth's older Cameron brother soon finds himself falling in love with the enigmatic Dolphin. Brother Cameron sees his own mother as a vampire (of the psychic non-blood-sucking sort), whose self-obsessed religious psychosis drained her own husband of his vitality. Whilst laying flowers on his father's grave, Cameron acknowledges that his Mother's vilely abusive character caused the early death of his father/her husband.

Seth's father commits suicide after being (falsely) accused of child molestation. A one-eyed Sheriff, who gives off the vibe of a secretive pederast, asks Seth (while being extra "touchy" with the frightened lad) if his father ever molested him. From the beginning of The Reflecting Skin, it is obvious that a car of leatherjacket sporting teenagers holds sole responsibility for the evil acts occurring in the community. The sheriff describes the child molesters as a "new kind of animal." Of course, with the self-worship and dedication to personal self-indulgence promoted by Hollywood after the second World War, it is no surprise that dormant pedophiles would awaken and eventually start committing their unspeakable crimes. With collective American prosperity at the end of World War II, came the opportunity for many teenagers to have a wider range of freedom via their own personal automobiles. Taking cues from 1950s Hollywood rebels James Dean and Marlon Brando, the pedo-mobile of teens in The Reflecting Skin look like they could have been extras in the teenage rebellion flick The Wild One. Obviously, most teens from the 1950s that took influence from the likes of Dean and Brando never went on to engage in child molestation, yet the philosophy of Hollywood endorsed juvenile rebel would pave the way to such perverted extremes. After all, The Reflecting Skin is a film about American puritan decay in a vacuum - portraying one communities moral degeneration in a bizarrely surrealistic, yet classically tasteful manner.

Seth's naive nature becomes most glaring when he mistakes a rotting white fetus for an angel and sleeps with it, as if it was his most cherished personal teddy bear. By the end of The Reflecting Skin, one can only speculate what will become of the tragedy-stricken little boy. I almost wish that director Philip Ridley would make a sequel to The Reflecting Skin portraying Seth's inevitable downward spiral into nihilistic oblivion. After The Reflecting Skin, Ridley directed The Passion of Darkly Moon (1995), a film about a mentally defective puritan man who develops an unwanted sexual obsession for a beautiful woman that nurses him back to health - eventually falling into the depths of madness. In 2009, Philip Ridley released his third feature Heartless, a film about a young man who makes a Faustian pact that he will soon come to regret. Despite the dark nature of his film, Ridley's cinematic intentions are quite noble, as if he is a post-Christian philosopher attempting to establish some morality in a seemingly hopeless apocalyptic world. Indeed, The Reflecting Skin is a film that accepts the death of Christianity in the Occident, yet begs the viewer to go beyond nihilism and accept elements of traditional Western morality that are still pertinent to maintaining stability in the rapidly deteriorating modern world. In one evening, I viewed Philip Ridley's small filmography in a personal movie marathon. After watching the films, I can express without hesitation that Philip Ridley is one of the most neglected auteur filmmaker of our times, as his films offer a admirable combination of philosophical insight and audacious imagery that can only be lumped in their own distinct category: The Films of Philip Ridley. At the very least give The Reflecting Skin a chance, as the film's stark imagery will even cause the skin of a cold immoralist emotional-cadaver to dance.

THE PASSION OF DARKLY NOON

Philip Ridley (1995)

Upon first viewing Philip Ridley's second feature-length film The Passion of Darkly Noon (1995), I was – at best – mildly entertained, but regrettably disheartened, yet the film never left my mind. I originally watched the work a day after I first saw Ridley's daring debut feature The Reflecting Skin (1990); a work I instantly regarded as one of my favorite films, so one could say I had exaggerated expectations before watching the director's second feature. Recently, I took it upon myself to re-watch both The Reflecting Skin and The Passion of Darkly Noon as a double-feature. Like The Reflecting Skin, The Passion of Darkly Noon proved to be a more aesthetically potent and nobly mystifying work upon subsequent viewings. Starring Brendan Fraser, Ashley Judd, and Viggo Mortensen, The Passion of Darkly Noon is a work that boasts an all-star Hollywood cast and a seemingly straightforward plot for a thriller, yet – not unlike The Reflecting Skin – it is a film that unmitigatedly transcends preconceptions one would have for such a seemingly formulaic and straightforward work. Like Ingmar Bergman's Through a Glass Darkly (1961), The Passion of Darkly Noon takes its title from passage 1 Corinthians 13 ("Now we see through a glass, darkly...") of the Bible and deals with the inevitable hopelessness of a degenerative mental disorder in an exotic rural setting. Although set in the Appalachian region of North Carolina, The Passion of Darkly Noon was actually filmed in rural Germany, thus giving the work a mystical quality comparable to that of the elysian silent German Mountains films. Akin to his previous effort The Reflecting Skin, Philip Ridley's The Passion of Darkly Noon is an audacious adult fairytale that is in good company with films like Garth Maxwell's Jack Be Nimble (1993), Nick Willing's Photographing Fairies (1997), and Jeremy Thomas' All the Little Animals (1999). Unsurprisingly, director Philip Ridley cited the child folk tales of the Brothers Grimm as a major influence on the storyline and aura of The Passion of Darkly Noon; a work of penetrating imponderabilia that is patently otherworldly from its erratic opening to its curiously hopeful (if equally tragic) ending. Like David Lynch (who Ridley is often compared to), Ridley has described his approach to filmmaking as primarily intuitive and barely intellectual, hence the quasi-spiritual nature of his work. Despite the ethereal constitution of The Passion of Darkly Noon, the film is scarcely sympathetic towards Christianity, especially of the ultra-conservative cultish sort, and, in fact, portrays an overbearing Nazarene upbringing as the nefarious and demonic source of psychosis and corrosive pathology. In part, Ridley hired the two lead actors due to their vintage all-American good looks as he felt that Brendan Fraser resembled Elvis Presley and that Ashley Judd echoed the semblance of Marilyn Monroe. While watching The Passion of Darkly Noon, it is easy to see why the director made this conscious decision, as like the character of Darkly (Fraser),

THE PASSION OF DARKLY NOON

Mr. Presley was a sexually-puritanical momma's boy and like Ms. Monroe, Callie (Judd) is an unorthodox temptress with a knack for seducing men of various creeds and ages. Indeed, The Passion of Darkly Noon is a diacritic slice of zeftful yet zany imported American pie. Of course, like all great culinary artists, Ridley has his own secret esoteric recipe.

Darkly Moon (played by Brendan Fraser) has a couple problems. He is a virgin man-child whose only close friends/family members – his parents – have been gunned down by angry town folk. Running frantically in an attempt to save his hopelessly holy life, Darkly boy somehow ends up in the forests of Appalachia and is nearly run down by a kindly coffin-transporter named Jude (Loren Dean). Seeing that Darkly is blatantly daunted and possibly deranged, Jude brings the large lad to beauteous blonde Callie's quaint and secluded forest-covered homestead. Upon nursing Darkly back to equilibrium, Callie takes an instant, if enigmatic, liking to the goofy boy and his peculiar brand of innocence. Unfortunately for both Darkly and Callie, the passive commando-for-Christ and his idle penis soon develop an overwhelming love for the tender woman that treated him so graciously. Callie is in love with a prick of a mute named Clay (Viggo Mortensen); a man that does not need words to express his pathological haughtiness and sexual prowess. To deal with his staggering sexual repression, Darkly commits the almighty sin of spilling his seeds in the moonlight, but this proves to an insufficient form of erotic deliverance for a man that has yet to penetrate and respire an actual furry flapper before his dismally weary, sad virginal eyes. Darkly also engages in masochistic behavior, torturing himself via barbed wire and even going so far as wearing an undergarment suit of bloodletting wired spikes. It is not until Darkly meets Clay's eccentric mother Roxy (Grace Zabriskie) randomly in the woods that he begins to consider that Callie may be an ill-boding conspiring witch that holds sinister supernatural sway over him. After seeing a 20-foot-long silver shoe randomly floating down the river, Clay begins to lose what is left of his Christian-lobotomized mind, but it is not until Clay sees bullet-ridden apparitions of his deceased parents that the loony lad must deal with cunning Callie and her dubious (and apparently diabolical) ways. In a fairytale realm, Darkly's visions might be seemingly genuine, but it is quite apparent in The Passion of Darkly Noon that, from the get go, the poor boy is suffering from a monumental mental disturbance that is steadily disintegrating what is left of his fragile personality. Inevitably, Darkly finally experiences an atavistic transformation, henceforth 'evolving' into a quasi-paganized red-body-paint-wearing modern day berserker of sorts who carries a spear and is immune to pain and has nil serious qualms about storming half-naked through a fire and brimstone domain of scorching flames.

Auteur Philip Ridley has described his work The Passion of Darkly Noon as, "Marquis de Sade meets Liberace" (minus the homoerotic flamboyancy) but also as a work with its own "fairytale language" and "dream logic." As a trained painter and all-around multifarious artist, Ridley has also admitted to realizing his films mostly in a visual fashion as opposed to a dialogue-driven manner. As a fan of Brian De Palma's Carrie (1976), Ridley has noted that The Passion of Darkly Noon is a work where one knows from the beginning that something awe-inspiring will inevitably befall the lead protagonist, thus leading to an impetuous climax that acts as a substitute to an actual sexual orgasm. Somewhat strikingly, Ridley considers The Passion of Darkly Noon a virtual reflective visual/thematic encyclopedia of horror cinema, as he cites everything from the films of Roger Corman to classic slasher flicks like John Carpenter's Halloween (1978) and Sean S. Cunningham's Friday the 13th (1980) as influences, but I certainly failed to consciously notice any of these (apparently) crucial and seamlessly blended works upon my initial viewing of the film. This may be due to the fact that Ridley intended these references as not pastiche nor parody, but as pseudo-spiritual allusions comparable to those made with traditional Christian iconography, thus, in a sense, The Passion of Darkly Noon is a work of eclectic blasphemy and artistically-refined horror cinema worship. On top of taking a quasi-pagan stance by portraying the eternal power of nature as the height of purity and depicting Christianity as a baneful source of aberrant inorganic abstraction, as well as making somewhat cynical references to the bible itself, The Passion of Darkly Noon begets a religion out of the almost wholly unholy horror genre, replacing Christ with fictional mass murderers Michael Myers/Jason Vorhees and mother Mary/Mary Magdalene with the archetypal seductive scream-queen, except to a more labyrinthine level. Of course, it would be superlatively misleading and disparaging to merely compare The Passion of Darkly Noon to works of traditional horror cinema, as it certainly transcends – both in aesthetic and thematic complexity – the mostly mundane formulas of the often formless genre. Ultimately, The Passion of Darkly Noon has more in common (at least visually) with the work of Ridley's painter hero Frances Bacon – the subversive Anglo-Irish figurative painter – than any kitsch horror flick created by B-movie producers just to make a quick buck, as the filmmaker is foremost an uncompromising artist and secondly, a horror fan, hence his is lack of notoriety even in the horror world. Ultimately, Philip Ridley's summed up The Passion of Darkly Noon as a tale of silver (magic, enchantment, innocence, etc) versus red (passion, blood, the darker feelings, etc), which I think is quite an apropos description, but, naturally, one will never discover the erotically-charged essence and marvelous mystique of the film unless they actually take the time to watch it and reflect on the delightfulness of Darkly's invigorated lapse with sanity and the virtual forest of hair that lays quite naturally on Ashley Judd's underarm.

HEARTLESS

Philip Ridley (2009)

Ever since I first saw his debut cult masterpiece The Reflecting Skin (1990) starring a relatively then-unknown Viggo Mortensen, I have been a rather staunch supporter of British auteur/playwright and all-around subversive Renaissance man Philip Ridley, who got his first big break in the film industry by penning the script for The Krays (1990) directed by Peter Medak. After directing two completely captivating cinematic neo-fairytale masterpieces, The Reflecting Skin and The Passion of Darkly Noon (1995), Ridley—for whatever inexplicable reason (apparently, he spent the time writing plays and children's books)—would not direct another film for another 15 years, so one can say that his most recent film, Heartless (2009), was more than a little bit long awaited, hence why it was such a big disappointment for me and many of his fans. While Ridley opted for setting The Reflecting Skin in iconic rural 1950s Idaho (although the work was actually filmed in Alberta, Canada) and The Passion of Darkly Noon in Appalachian region of North Carolina (although the work was actually filmed in Germany, thus giving it a mystical mountain film feel), Heartless would be the first film the auteur directed that was actually set in his home city of East London, thus the film naturally lacks the sort of idiosyncratic 'Amero-Heimat horror' essence of his previous works. Indeed, a curious piece of Chav and wog-infested 'hoodie-horror' in the convoluted spirit of Clive Barker's Hellraiser (1987) and Richard Kelly's Donnie Darko (2001), Heartless depicts a 'heartless' and hellish London in the decidedly decadent post-empire age of multiculturalism, globalization, miscegenation and cultural/racial chaos. A deconstructed and de-Teutonized reworking of Goethe's Faust set in one of the Occidental cities most heavily hit by the culture-distorting decay of globalization and multiculturalism, Heartless is a far cry from the sort of 'völkisch Gothic' metaphysical horror of his previous two features as a work of metropolitan horror, yet it is no less dark and foreboding in character, even if it is easily the artist's most inferior cinematic work to date. Admittedly, when I first saw Heartless, I was completely and irrevocably disappointed, but the film has slightly grown on me in subsequent viewings. Made in an pre-apocalyptic age where third world savages riot and brutally murder British soldiers in the street in tribute to some meta-megalomaniac towelhead god and where many areas of London, not unlike many modern European cities, have turned into 'no go zones' for indigenous Brits, Heartless is culturally pessimistic horror disguised as a supernatural psychological thriller that makes one really realize how the world has culturally and morally degenerated since Johann Wolfgang von Goethe first began writing Faust over two centuries ago.

Jamie Morgan (Jim Sturgess) is a troubled and introverted weirdo with a heart-shaped birthmark on his face who lives in a multicultural hellhole in East London and is thus the object of scorn and ridicule amongst the socially-decaying area's mostly brown-skinned populous. In terms of employment, Jamie is a photographer who prefers the organic aesthetic of real film over digital diarrhea and who shares a humble studio with his brother George (Timothy Spall) and wigger nephew Lee (Luke Treadaway). One day, a Slavic aspiring model named Tia (French actress/supermodel Clémence Poésy) walks into the studio and Jamie falls in love with her at first sight, but she leaves abruptly and in a rather hysterical manner after idiotic nephew Lee makes a crude sexual remark to her. Meanwhile, as reported on local television, a series of brutal murders involving dismembered body parts committed by mostly nonwhite 'youths' wearing demon masks have been occurring around East London. One day, Jamie makes the major mistake of taking photos of the hooded hoodlums—who are not wearing demon masks but are actual demons—and not long after, he is severely beaten and his beloved mother Marion (Ruth Sheen) is set on fire and killed by the hip-hop monsters. On top of that, Jamie's new friend A.J. (played by intolerable 'British' negro actor/director Noel Clarke)—an ex-gang member who has magically turned his life around—is also murdered, with his arm being the only piece of his body that is found by the police. After buying a gun from a shady mongrel to protect himself, Jamie contemplates suicide, but those plans are thwarted when he gets a cellphone call from a mysterious man known simply as 'Papa B' (Joseph Mawle of Game of Thrones fame), who invites him to his dilapidated apartment. Upon arriving at Mr. B's flat, Jamie is greeted by a little Indian girl with a traditional Hindu dot on her head named Belle (Nikita Mištry), who acts as the Mephistopheles-like man's assistant. As he reveals Jamie, Papa B killed his mother (to make him "ready" to come to him) and is a harbinger of chaos and hell-on-earth who spouts the following speech: "Man is most creative at a time of peace and calm... I don't think so. Give Mankind nothing but calm and order, and Mankind is nothing on its own but a grazing cow. Man needs to be unpredictable to feel truly alive. To progress. To create. Mother Nature knows this. That's why she gives us cyclones, tsunamis. But sometimes, just sometimes, Mother Nature, she can't do it all. So what happens then? I help" and "It's atrocity that marks the birth of a new era. Gas chambers... Hiroshima... 9/11... And I, in my humble way contribute to that process."

Ultimately, Jamie makes a seemingly rewarding Faustian pact with Papa B to graffiti city walls with "God is a stupid fuck!" once every few months in return for removing his cock-blocking birthmark. To remove all his birthmarks, Jamie dowses himself with a sort of satanic Molotov cocktail and his entire body is scorched, but he rises from the ashes of his burnt flesh like a proud phoenix. Unfortunately for him, Jamie has been lied to and instead of simply scrawling "God is a stupid fuck!" on already trashed East London buildings, he is told by a funny fellow named 'Weapons Man' (Eddie Marsan)—an employee of Papa B—that he must kill a young man in the following manner: "Heart to be cut out while victim is still alive and said heart to be placed on steps of a church, any church, your choice, by midnight.” After refusing to do it and being brutally flung around a wall by an invisible and unknown force at Papa B’s disposal, Jamie gives in and, with the strangely maternal-like help of Belle, goes hunting for a victim. Ultimately, Jamie picks up a young gay narcissistic hustler under the false pretense of buying gay sex and inevitably brutally murders him in his apartment. Meanwhile, Jamie starts a hot and heavy relationship with Tia, but he does not realize she is cahoots with nephew Lee to steal his deceased mother’s jewels to pay back a grotesque-looking gang dealer named ‘She’ (Brit negro mongrel John Macmillan), who controls all the hooded wog monsters in East London. After getting jealous over his friendship with Belle (she calls Jamie “father”), Papa B demands that Jamie kill Tia as punishment. During a struggle, Tia—who actually did end up falling in love with Jamie despite her initially dubious plans—is accidentally shot dead by Lee and Jamie kills She not long after. In the end, Jamie is chased down by hooded demons and later by Papa B, but one of the hood demons, now in human form, ultimately hits him with a Molotov cocktail and he dies in solace recalling a moment with his belated father before ascending to a bright light of sorts. As Jamie is a rather unreliable narrator, it is never clear whether or not the supernatural things he witness are real or merely the product of a damaged and seemingly schizophrenic mind.

Easily director Philip Ridley’s most commercial and contemporary and least auteur-driven work, Heartless is nothing short of an artistic failure on the filmmaker’s part, but it is not completely without merit as it allegorically depicts the very real social and cultural horrors of technocratic post-industrial London in a most uniquely unflattering way. The fact that Heartless features the perennially repulsive Noel Clarke—the star of the race-mixing pro-crime piece of celluloid shit Kidulthood (2006) and star/director of its equally excrement-ridden sequel Adulthood (2008)—only adds to the film’s curious cred as a work pre-apocalyptic horror of the mayhem-filled multi-cult sort. Interestingly, in the behind-the-scenes featurette Dynamite Sky: The Making of Heartless, auteur Ridley confesses that Heartless was partially inspired by the murder of his friend, which resulted in the filmmaker becoming a social recluse for 2-3 years like protagonist Jamie. Indeed, probably no other European city has faced such a devastating occupation from hostile ‘immigrants’ from the global south than London and Heartless is a sort of horror equivalent to Harry Brown (2009) as a rare British film that does not shy away from depicting the city as shitty as it really and revoltingly is. Of course, aesthetically speaking, Heartless seems horribly shallow and weak when compared to Ridley’s previous efforts, as if he was attempting to make a film that would appeal to jaded emo fags from the Lumpenproletariat. Featuring soulless CGI, superlatively superficial characters, and a disjointed story, Heartless certainly epitomizes the cultural joke and spiritual void that is post-WWII England. To be quite honest, after watching the film at least three times, I still had trouble wrapping my head around the fact that Heartless is a Philip Ridley flick, as if the work is a sorry celluloid symptom of the very degeneracy it negatively depicts. Still, Heartless is better and more preternatural than no less than 95% of the horror/psychological thriller flicks that come out nowadays. Of course, compared to fellow British 'hoodie horror' flick Eden Lake (2008), Heartless—with its thematic ambiguity, wimpy emo fag music (which unfortunately Ridley co-composed!), and deconstruction of horror conventions—seems like a sappy and sentimental yet strangely soulless Faustian equivalent to Bruce LaBruce's deconstructed zombie flick Otto; or Up with Dead People (2008), albeit less politically correct (which is something I can certainly respect!). Indeed, most interesting as a postmodern cinematic raping of Goethe's Faust than as a Philip Ridley film, Heartless is certainly worth seeing but will probably never develop the cult following that The Reflecting Skin did and rightfully so!

LE NÉCROPHILE

Philippe Barassat (2004)

Unfortunately, temerarious and innovative films about necrophilia are quite hard to come by, so I am always stimulated by the possibility of viewing a new work of audacious avant-garde corpse-fucking. With their wealth of films relating to jaded incestuous romances gone awry and sexually aberrant behavior galore, one would think that France would have produced a number of revolutionary man-loves-corpse epics by now, but quite regrettably, that is not the case. Naturally, when I discovered the 36-minute French short Le nécrophile (2004) directed by Philippe Barassat, I was on tenterhooks. Admittedly, as a longtime kraut-lover and loather of abstract ideas relating to culture-distorting liberty, I must admit that I am an unrepentant Francophobe of sorts who would rather watch a screening of Schindler's List at an Israeli drive-in than languish through the mundane masturbatory marxist disgorge that comes along with a Jean-Luc Godard marathon. That being said, I did not expect Le nécrophile to be as romantic nor as aesthetically-gratifying as either of Buttgereit's Nekromantik flicks, yet it certainly proved to be a more farcical work with its brief yet fulfilling buffet of jovial incestuous pedophilia, campy cannibalism, and marvelously morbid moments of exceedingly awkward necrophilia. Indeed, Le nécrophile may deal with some of the most taboo topics ever explored in cinema, but these sordid scenarios are expressed in such a merry and startlingly palatable manner that I almost forgot that I was watching a film about serial necrophilia and the long-term effects such demented behavior could potentially have on a seemingly virginal preteen girl. The film follows a loathsome lunatic who is so grotesque and patently pathetic in appearance (and character) that he looks like the ill-fated bastard spawn of Peter Lorre à la Fritz Lang's M (1931) and a mutant frog (He even has an elastic bug-catching tongue to boot) with Down syndrome. When not isolating himself from the general peasant populous of the decrepit urban ghetto he calls home, the nervous necro basks in bumping angelic cadavers in the night. This unintentionally humorous heteroclit fellow is so terribly timid that he is even unstrung whilst in the one-sided company of an inanimate corpse. When the piteous man is forced to adopt his young niece after her parents die, he must become more creative and covert in regards to probing cold-cadavers during the dead of night. When an adolescent Afro-Arab teenager falls in cross-breed puppy-love with his niece, the neurotic necro finds that his much cherished midnights of intimate necromancy are disastrously jeopardized, thus eventually culminating into dreadfully flustering results.

What makes Le nécrophile especially deathly dreary and markedly morose is not the actual moments of debauched necrophilia, but the domestic dystopian setting of the film; a discernibly decayed French ghetto inhabited by third world refugees and thoroughly mongrelized post-racial Frenchmen. While the unusually unprepossessing anti-hero resembles a bloated corpse himself and is thus symbolic of France of the old (one could argue that the corpse-fucking is an allegory for the inability of the average working-class Frenchman to respond to change) and now degenerated, the lovesick brown boy is denotative of the new 'French'; an innately hostile alien population that will ultimately replace the indigenous race(s) of France via mass illegal immigration and miscegenation. Out of all the characters featured in Le nécrophile, the necro's niece is indubitably the most seemingly pure and untainted. With her glistening golden blonde-locks and angelic fair-skin, one ultimately feels more repelled by the prospect of the colored teen defiling her than seeing the depraved necrophile manhandle an expired corpse. As one soon finds out while watching Le nécrophile, the nymphet niece is not exactly the most unsullied and immaculate of little girls, but she is a self-sacrificing mademoiselle who will do anything – and I mean anything – to safeguard her exceedingly eccentric uncle and the dubious relationship that they share, even if it involves being deflowered at a less than mature age in a most nauseous and nefarious sort of way. In the end, the little gal proves to be her Uncle's most dutiful guardian angel, despite the fact that she seems to be at an already more corrupted and unsalvageable state than a man that delights in dating and devouring the deceased. Although tragically despoiled during her early years of childhood, the bittersweet little lass is quite stalwart, stoic, and sophisticated for her age due to a short lifetime's worth of personal struggle, thus she acts as a symbol of hope for France; a once proud and invigorative nation that is now literally full of corpses (who actually make a reanimated appearance in the film) from great heroes of a long forgotten past.

Although featuring some of the most unmentionable moments ever captured on celluloid, Le nécrophile is essentially a lovesome (if ludicrous) and sentimental (without being simpleminded) tragicomedic neo-fairytale about the unbreakable bond of family ties. If the longtime decadent and irrevocably deracinated French have to make a film about necrophilia, incest, and cannibalism as a way to inspire ideas of self-preservation, nationalism, in-group loyalty, then so be it. I, for one, always wished Georges Bataille was a fascist and Philippe Barassat's Le nécrophile seems to be an undaunted expression of the next best thing.

LA CICATRICE INTÉRIEURE

Philippe Garrel (1972)

Contrary to popular belief, it was not so much the supremely popular yet wholly untalented hack Andy Warhol but rather fellow hack director, the largely unknown outside of France, Philippe Garrel, who journeyed with the statuesque Nordic beauty and 60s icon, Nico (aka Christa Päffgen) on her downward spiral—a path which would inevitably lead to her tragic descent into self-imposed uglification and heroin abuse, as well as her appearance in several of Garrel's mediocre, if not altogether uninteresting films. The father of French mainstream actor, Louis Garrel of The Dreamers (2003) fame, and director of such undistinguished, avant-garde but cherished Francophile classics as Le berceau de cristal (1976) and Liberté, la nuit (1983), Philippe Garrel has become something of a cult figure in his native France, which comes as no surprise seeing that his distinctly French films—copiously characterized by plot-less, nonsensical, black and white vignettes featuring up-close shots of not just Nico but Jean Seberg and various other malnourished muses' faces as they pretend to be suicidal with their taut, nude bodies starkly sprawled over barren floors, along with sappy, unlikely sob stories of romantic love gone awry—could only appeal to that haughty collective of pretentious, posh and prissy poofers who also apotheosize perverse visionaries like faux-French Jew musician-turned-director Serge Gainsbourg (who quite sordidly cast his own daughter Charlotte Gainsbourg in the lead role of the incestuous, pretentious and pointless Charlotte for Ever (1986), in which the budding pubescent girl traipses about the house half-nude while her father looks on wantonly, seemingly salivating at the sight of his daughter's burgeoning bosom). Indeed, while Garrel, like his equally pompous and pretentious poofer countryman Gainsbourg, is much acclaimed in the Gallophile world, it was not until his collaboration with the flaxen-turned-scarlet-turned-raven haired Nico in the lead role of The Inner Scar aka La cicatrice intérieure (1972) that he had his first stab at international fame as a seemingly bona-fide (yet ultimately rather artistically vacuous) surrealist visionary auteur, while also successfully documenting the early beginnings of the beautiful Aryanness' coup de grace.

A far cry from her youthful, sumptuously attired supermodel self as seen in her debut film, Fellini's undoubtedly most famous picture, La Dolce Vita (1960), in which she only played a minor but memorable role (if not for her Aryan good looks alone) and in great contrast to the starry-eyed, flaxen-haired bohemian chanteuse universally known from her days with Lou Reed in the Velvet Underground—of which, Paul Morrissey once noted, “the group needed something beautiful (Nico) to counteract the kind of screeching ugliness they were trying to sell, and the combination of a really beautiful girl standing in front of all this decadence was what we needed”—Nico brazenly shuns all that is beautiful in then boyfriend, Philippe Garrel's The Inner Scar starring as a rather dowdy giantess donning a drabby frock, innately unfitting dyed dark crimson hair and a presence so unpleasantly child-like and perpetually grating that it continuously impinges upon the audience in a most discomfiting and unsettling way (a dream role for Nico, as director Paul Morrissey once remarked after getting to know her better, “She liked being perceived as ugly”). Shot on location in various exotic locales, including a noisy, actively spewing volcano in Iceland, a desolate wasteland in Death Valley and near the craggy foot of Mt. Sinai in Egypt, the film begins with Nico curled into a fetal position on a rock, rhythmically rocking herself back and forth as if to sooth against some unseen, supernatural violence being perpetuated against her (perhaps the mysterious “inner scar” that the film’s title alludes to?) Philippe Garrel (apparently rather unfittingly playing the devil, as Nico goes on to refer to him) appears from out of nowhere, a decidedly unattractive, scrawny man who takes on the likeness of a strangely dull and unfebrile nutcracker—having a very stiff, almost robotic gait, sporting an unkempt unfurled mane of hair resembling that of a care-free drug addict coming down from one too many acid trips, and wearing perhaps the most ill-fitting pair of pants I have ever seen on a man (indeed, those brown leather trousers hugged his scrotum so tightly as to render him a eunuch). The next ten minutes or so entail Nico ceaselessly harassing this odd, mentally and nearly physically nullified male, and idling around the barren landscapes with him, alternating between dramatically falling to the ground in a fit of rage or yelling at him intermittently, at times seeming like an insufferable toddler in the grips of a temper tantrum, or like a petulant adolescent girl grappling with a pathological case of psychosis—stimulating premenstrual syndrome (“You’re the devil! I hate you!”). Garrel, in rather less than devilish fashion, acquiesces quite sullenly to this barrage of puerile verbal abuse, only looking down at the ground, and continuing to walk, seemingly meandering as if on a path to nothingness—in essence, representative of the direction of the film as a whole.

In the next scene, a somewhat more passive Nico delivers a somber soliloquy, entirely in German, in a dark, otherworldly underground cavern, with spires of stalagmites and stalactites stabbing at the air around her, inexplicably ending with the screen panning to the right to reveal the visage of a young, dark-skinned boy, seemingly of some Amazonian (or other nebulous third-world derived extraction) hidden among some rocks, staring penetratingly in Nico’s direction, fixed in time in what seems to be a catatonic state (this is one of many affronts to the senses and to logic, in that here, and for the remainder of the film, he continually casts characters who seem racially alien to their surroundings save for the decidedly Aryan Nico, of course). What immediately follows is perhaps one of the most memorable, surreal scenes of this all at once seemingly nonsensical, frustrating yet captivating film: Nico, atop a white horse, being led on a leash through the desert by her very own son, Ari Boulogne (then 8-years-old, the product of Nico’s affair with France’s very own James Bond, Alain Delon, who adamantly denied the child as his own) navigating around rings of flames (a most memorable scene indeed, as it is has been heavily utilized as a clip for use in pretentious, amateur home-made Youtube music videos). One of the rare highlights of this film—aside from the overall National Geographic feel driving its entire mise-en-scène—this particularly surreal flaming desert presentation is accented by music from Nico's very own and perhaps most famous, avant-garde solo album, Desertshore (1970), in which the scene is paired with "All That is My Own," which, much like the other songs on the album (also appearing at varying points in the film) sounds a bit like a medieval funeral dirge with subtle tinges of psychedelic, kraut-rock influence, which could be most aptly compared to fellow German act Popol Vuh -- whose dreamy, melodic psychedelia fueled sound provided ambiance in several of Werner Herzog's films, most notably Nosferatu the Vampyre aka Nosferatu: Phantom der Nacht (1979) and Aguirre: The Wrath of God aka Aguirre, der Zorn Gottes (1972).

The next scene cuts to a prissy (but again, dowdily dressed) Nico, seemingly having another premenstrual bitch fit, on some rocks in what appears to be the craggy desert environment of Mt. Sinai. Nico looking every bit like some world-weary, wizened pagan prophetess waxing philosophical, loudly screeches, "There is no mercy! There is no justice! The seas shall rise over your heads and drown you all!" after which, a somewhat more Mediterranean in appearance Philippe Garrel look-a-like, played by Daniel Pommereulle, wearing equally ill-fitting, sterility-inducing leather pants, makes his way toward Nico by way of a jagged, winding path, guiding an overflowing procession of goats and sheep with each step. In the background, a man on a white horse is seen, inexplicably waving a white flag, as if to signify that he is surrendering, but to what is never made known.

The remainder of the film, appearing to have been shot entirely on location in the naturally paradoxical fairy land of temperamental, ever combating fire and frost, Iceland, is perhaps the most revealing in terms of delivering any semblance of a plot to this otherwise, "art for art's sake" direction-less film. Starting off in its typically aimless manner, this segment introduces a series of vignettes featuring a rather limp-wristed, decidedly un-Icelandic, pathetic waif of a man played by Pierre Clementi, an archer—and a dead ringer for that thoroughly haughty and annoying British attention-seeking actor, Russell Brand, only about 50 pounds lighter—who traverses the dreary island via boat and horseback, most often appearing fully nude with his wang rendered so flaccid by the frigid temperature that it's barely able to wave in the wind. This dark-haired, scrawny and seemingly impotent character—which appears to be an archetype of sorts, perhaps representing man's immortal, unshakeable impetus toward self-discovery and fulfillment in spite of his futility and weakness (or perhaps I'm giving Garrel too much credit here), who obviously possesses no Scandinavian genetic make-up whatsoever—is a tremendous mismatch against the traditionally Nordic background of Iceland, as seen in this film with its frothy, frigid waters, unnaturally vibrantly blue glaciers, and fire-spewing volcanoes, all of which, at least in the schema of my mind, evoke images of flaxen-haired, muscle-bound Viking berserkers arriving as the island's first inhabitants with kidnapped crimson-haired, freckled Celtic maidens in tow. The archer (who would be a much more appropriate fit as a loin-cloth wearing or nude, dick-dangling Indian—interchangeably of dot or feather derivation—in some remote jungle of South America or the Indian subcontinent) has a series of strange interactions with the fitting indigene, Nordic Nico, who appears in one scene at the foot of a waterfall, where she brashly and peculiarly proclaims to him, “We can never be here until we’re gone.” In the subsequent, typically disjointed scene, the archer is seen standing, with his weakly muscled, bare-assed and pathetic physique shown in the foreground, against the mighty and entrancing background scenery of the booming bellowing of a vociferous volcano which, actively spewing flaming emissions, conveniently plants a flaming drop of fire at his feet, which he somehow picks up and carries with him through the darkness. And in yet another discordant cut, the proximate scene depicts a dark-haired toddler (Clementi’s son) intermittently grinning and then wincing for about five minutes while drifting afloat on a small glacier, in a bed of feathers (indeed, it is terribly difficult to make any sense of these scenes, if there was ever any intention for any kind of sense to be made of them). Toward the end of this particular segment, an unusual link between scenes is made with the archer appearing adjacent to the child, screaming in French, and then running over to Nico, who appears initially to be in an almost catatonic state, bedecked with flowers surrounding her on the ash-covered earth. She caresses the archer’s face, while uttering in an uncharacteristically softer, more passive manner, “He gave me my senses, he gave me my pride...I beg you to stay. I will give you a name, a name you can remember me by”; after which, she stands up and walks out and sluggishly walks into the distance, never giving him a name.

In the final act, and perhaps the only segment that seems to make any sense, the archer, riding a dark horse, again comes upon a spaced-out Nico, still donning her drabby pre-Christian Mesopotamian era vestment and overall look, who is gazing across the barren, ashen Icelandic wilderness, while a volcano sputters in the background. They walk together somberly and silently to the seashore, where he boards a boat and sets adrift; she subsequently begins screaming seemingly caustic remarks at him in German, like a mentally deranged adolescent girl in desperate need of a double dose of depakote. The next cut reveals Nico, once again, delivering a frustrated German soliloquy, and holding a rock in one hand; she comes upon the burnt out husk of the boat from which the archer had set adrift just minutes prior. Seemingly fearful that the archer is dead, Nico drops the rock, and is presumably frozen in a state of shock; however, her fears are assuaged in the next scene when the archer makes his final appearance. Another song from Desertshore begins at this juncture, titled “König” which helps the ending to make a little more sense. Nico, perched atop some volcanic rocks, stares felicitously over the frozen, ashen earth below her, as the archer, holding a sword, with his legs spread out so that his frozen, shrunken member is still on full display, slowly and ceremoniously raises the sword above his head, to which Nico triumphantly grabs it, signifying that she has become the king, the ultimate ruler of the cold, dreary domain, and perhaps, hopefully that she has come to have some control over her fiery, frenetic feelings. It is this final image of the film that is perhaps one of its most beautiful and entrancing, and perfectly befitting an archetype or Tarot card illustration: a Nordic ice goddess, finally exercising complete control over her frosty, yet fiery chaotic dominion, both that which exists outside and within herself.

Admittedly, even at only an hour in length, The Inner Scar initially made for a very difficult film to sit through in its entirety. On the surface, like many of Garrel’s films, it is an idiosyncratic, nonsensical piece and one can only arrive at the conclusion that it only makes sense to its creators, decidedly poofy French director, Philippe Garrel and the self-loathing, lover of all things weird, Nordic beauty Nico, who at ten years his senior, was involved in a lengthy and tumultuous personal and professional relationship with Garrel, a point at which she became heavily and inescapably addicted to heroin (seemingly almost counter-intuitively, as Warhol’s Factory was well-known for its raucous excess in terms of ‘sex, drugs, and rock n’ roll’, it was not until she met Garrel later on Nico that she really became hooked on heroin, and began a slow and steady decline in terms of deterioration of her health, overall looks, and artistic output). However, upon a subsequent viewing, and having read a great deal about Nico and her brief, tragic life (which was sadly cut short in the most pathetic way imaginable, after she had attempted to wean herself off of heroin, and suffered a minor heart attack while riding a bicycle in Ibiza with her son), the film’s odd, incoherent non-message is somewhat more decipherable: as the daughter of a German soldier who died in a concentration camp after sustaining serious brain injuries during World War II, and after having allegedly been raped by an American GI at just 15 years of age, Nico, although incredibly beautiful, was clearly afflicted by serious mental trauma during the more formative years of her life, leading her to having a proclivity for hooking up with a variety of unsavory and unsuitable male characters: Lou Reed, lead singer of the Velvet Underground who, according to Paul Morrissey, dissolved the band out of jealousy toward the eccentric German songstress, French playboy Alain Delon, who fathered a son with the erratic and unstable Nico, and who subsequently rejected the child (and whose parents eventually took the boy in so that he would not be given up to child protective services), and Philippe Garrel, who utilized her distinctive beauty and idiosyncratic nature as a focal point of one of the many chapters of the nonsensical celluloid diaries he crafted about the many women he miraculously bedded.

It is clear that Nico was a terribly tortured soul, a woman—who in spite of her immense beauty and the promise of fortune, fame, and happiness that could spring out of it—could not let go of the tragic, traumatic experiences that pervaded her life, and that reinforced the unquenchable thirst to pursue ugliness and weirdness at all costs, a seemingly nonsensical process of self-deprecation that is beautifully and surreally illustrated in Philippe Garrel's The Inner Scar, a title which very likely alludes to kind of indelible inner anguish propagated by the enemy within.

LES HAUTES SOLITUDES

Philippe Garrel (1974)

For the longest time, I absolutely could not fathom why a certain lover of mine appreciated the films of dope-addled French avant-garde filmmaker Philippe Garrel (Le Révélateur, La cicatrice intérieure aka The Inner Scar) even though she was a rare woman whose aesthetic sensibilities I could virtually always count on. Notably, this same lover had modeled for a series of photo shoots with a sleazy middle-aged scumbag that I did not particularly appreciate, as the person in the pictures did not seem like the same girl that I knew and loved. Indeed, her smiles and poses in these photos were unnervingly sincere to me as I could tell just by looking at her always entrancing eyes that she was not genuinely happy, but of course she was a girl that was quite good at wearing a figurative mask because she was a people-pleaser even though she did not really care about actually pleasing people. As a hardcore introvert with serious problems with anxiety as a result of certain traumas that she suffered during childhood, she mastered the art of being rather agreeable around people in the hope that she could completely avoid being triggered by unpleasant emotions. In fact, she was so highly sensitive to any form of anger, negativity, or hostility that I would sometimes unwittingly upset her if I was annoyed or mad about something that had absolutely nothing to do with her or her actions even though hurting her was the last thing on my mind since she was the only person that I truly loved and cared about yet she still had a hard time believing this because her reaction was innate and instinctive response to past traumas. Anyway, as a result of being with her and becoming accustomed to her sensitivities, I think I can finally understand why she had such a strong affection for Garrel's meta-minimalistic cinematic works. Quite unlike the sleazy photographer that took photos of my lover just so that he would have an excuse to ogle hot young babes while simultaneously monetarily profiting from it, Garrel had a singular talent for exposing the real essence, beauty, vulnerability, and sensitivity of the women that he directed, which is arguably the most apparent in his silent black-and-white feature Les hautes solitudes (1974) aka The High Solitudes starring tragic American actress Jean Seberg (Bonjour Tristesse, Lilith) in what would indubitably not only be the greatest, but also most revealing and poetic performance of her entire fairly uneven acting career. Forget gay arthouse auteur Mark Rappaport's kitschy and bitchy video art rant From the Journals of Jean Seberg (1995), Garrel's film might not feature any insightful historical facts or even dialogue, but you will learn more about the ill-fated screen heroine's damaged psyche and perpetual pathos by watching five minutes of the flick than by watching all of the American pseudo-biopic starring decidedly dorky Woody Allen graduate Mary Beth Hurt. Directed by an uncompromising auteur who demonstrated that he had the exact opposite approach to filmmaking to Hitchcock when he declared in an autumn 1970 interview in Af- terimage #2 that, “making the film is the most interesting [part]. What comes after it’s made isn’t very interesting,” Garrel’s sometimes devastating filmic love letter is an experiment in cinematic “collective psychosis” (or at least that is how Garrel described it) as an emotionally invasive and foreboding work that digs deep into the actress’ sad and forsaken soul and reveals her to be a hopelessly forlorn spirit that was ultimately on a path to complete self-obliteration. Indeed, certainly no one would be surprised to learn after watching her performance in Les hautes solitudes that Seberg perished under dubious circumstances that were officially ruled a suicide only five years after the film was released. If cinema can be truly prophetic and take the form of a sort of quasi-Expressionistic suicide letter, Garrel’s flick is indubitably one of the greatest and most poetic cinematic declarations of self-slaughter ever made.

In many ways, Les hautes solitudes might be described as the ultimate Garrelian film as a totally plotless and stripped down piece of sometimes suffocatingly sullen and nearly always somber celluloid that it patently cinematically primitive to the point where it even makes Andy Warhol’s Chelsea Girls (1966) seem like Kubrick’s 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) in terms of technical prowess innovation (incidentally, Garrel has compared his film to Chelsea Girls). Indeed, a completely silent work without title sequences or a musical score that was shot on bold black-and-white 16mm film stock, the film oftentimes feels like a series of avant-garde screen tests, so it should be no surprise that Garrel stating regarding his flick and lead actress Seberg’s imperative role in the making of it, “The idea was to make a film out of the outtakes of a film that never existed in the first place. So I conceived LES HAUTES SOLITUDES as outtakes, a very raw texture on her face. Her agent, her friends, everybody thought I wasn’t serious in my endeavor. I arrived every day at Seberg’s apartment with my camera and filmed her on the balcony, close to the window, for hours, with no role and no script. No-one thought that it was a real film, but she was very independent and didn’t care about this. I consider LES HAUTES SOLITUDES as much a Seberg film as mine.” To Garrel’s credit, Seberg’s performance is largely what makes the film worth watching, as one has the rather rare and wholly singular opportunity to pay witness to the strangely endearing tragedy of irreparably despoiled beauty as embodied by the forsaken blonde diva, who provides the greatest ‘performance’ of her career in an almost ghostly role where she does not even speak a single audible word, yet manages to make the viewer feel completely haunted in the end, like they have witnessed the slow and painful death of an angel that bled to death after having its wings torn off by. Arguably, the most curious and generally surprising aspect of Les hautes solitudes is that it was apparently at least partially inspired by Teutonic philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche’s penultimate book The Antichrist (1895) aka Der Antichrist which, at least upon a superficial glance, seems like describing Woody Allen’s Annie Hall (1977) as a modern adaptation of Uncle Adolf’s Mein Kampf (1925). Surely, the only superficial similarities I can see between Nietzsche's classic anti-Christian polemic and Garrel's film are the raw and visceral madness and mental derangement that they both permeate. Of course, I doubt that this ever crossed the mind of a fairly unkempt frog junky bohemian like Garrel, but there is no question that Seberg was a product and ultimately a victim of both the Nazarene spiritual sickness and Judaic decadence that Nietzsche decries in his classic iconoclastic book, thus one could argue that Les hautes solitudes is Nietzschean in a sort of accidentally subtextual fashion. Additionally, you will learn no less about Nietzsche's philosophies from Garrel's flick than you would by watching Liliana Cavani's botched biopic Al di là del bene e del male (1977) aka Beyond Good and Evil.

If a spacey dope-addled French dandy managed to obtain a couple thousand dollars, a 16mm Bolex camera and a number of rolls of film, and a couple inordinately beautiful women and attempted to remake Ingmar Bergman's masterpiece Persona (1966) in the style of an early Werner Schroeter flick, it might begin to describe the aesthetic essence of Les hautes solitudes, which mainly revolves around the glaring metaphysical misery of Seberg and the much younger and happier Tina Aumont's superficially empathetic but seemingly futile and somewhat questionable attempts to comfort and console the hapless lead while she is in one of her various melancholic states. While the two leads in Persona begin to become one in a sense, the two lovely looking ladies in Garrel's film could not be more different in terms of both appearance and character, thus there is no real union between the two. Indeed, if Aumont's enchanting smile, cutesy pulchritude, and somewhat mischievous demeanor was not there to balance out Seberg's malignant melancholy and seemingly terminal Weltschmerz, the film would probably be too excruciating to bear in its entirety. Notably, according to Garrel's own words, the film was largely Seberg's instinctive vision and not the result of calculated art faggotry or pretense, or as the filmmaker stated himself in a 1975 interview, "When I met her, we talked about Godard straight away. I found it interesting to create a piece that escaped À bout de soufflé insofar as it was still very present in the filming. And, she was passionate about the Actor Studio [method acting]. She forced me to do scenes from the Actor Studio. She said to me, 'Tomorrow, I will give you a plan, but I will only give you my plan if you act me something.' So, I had to play a thief. I had to steal a thousand francs from her bag and then leave – running. We tried to do that and then after, I was truly scared, she followed me down the stairs... Effectively, I had returned to psychoses – and quite easily. She said to me that it was like that when they worked at the Actor Studio and that it was necessary to work in that way. And so, we tried to make the film like that, to make something that uses psychodrama, and that serves to really liberate something. As she is a star, at a very specific level, even I was under observation, with regards to her work. The work had perhaps been very useful to her, because she wrote me a letter; it seemed to say that we had created a positive and important piece of work. That said, she thought the film that was completely incomprehensible.” Of course, the incomprehensibility Garrel speaks of is Seberg’s mind, which is depicted in such a completely raw and stark-naked fashion in Les hautes solitudes that no Hollywood film could ever dream of rivaling it in terms of sheer pathos. Of course, one must credit the unscrupulous exploiters and pimps of Tinseltown for helping to destroy Seberg’s mind and soul in such an irreparable manner that she could pull off such an unsettlingly penetrating ‘performance.’

Although she is only a marginal and seemingly random figure of the film that only appears at the very beginning, Teutonic diva Christa ‘Nico’ Päffgen (who was nicknamed after Greek auteur Nikos Papatakis by her German photographer friend Herbert Tobias) is featured in the opening scene of Les hautes solitudes lying on the ground while her eyes are moving in a strange and erratic fashion as if she is a tweaker that is coming down from a high. Of course, Nico was Garrel’s main diva during the 1970s and arguably the most imperative source of inspiration for him at the time, so her brief appearance in the film is, at least contextually speaking, both important and revealing, especially if you are familiar with La Cicatrice Intérieure. When Jean Seberg eventually first appears, she is depicted having a sort of anxiety-ridden panic attack while lying in bed by herself in a long static scene that involves her crying hysterically and slamming her head against a pillow like an agitated child that is throwing a temper tantrum, though she eventually seems to find some peace and then falls asleep. This first scene more or less foreshadows virtually everything that will occur for the rest of the film, as Seberg is mostly portrayed in various states of internal misery, existential crisis, restlessness, and/or melancholy, with the occasional fleeting moment of happiness. Notably, Seberg is oftentimes portrayed with a shadow covering about half her face in a fairly symmetrical fashion, as if to indicate she is a bipolar broad that has fallen into the darkness and is always on the verge of shifting back and forth between sanity and insanity, with her dark side always threatening to consume her ‘true self.’ Unfortunately, it seems that it is only a matter of time before Seberg’s entire being succumbs to total despair. Somewhat curiously, it seems that anytime that Seberg seems happy, she is wearing either a hat or hood, as if having something covering her head gives her a certain sense of psychological security because it partly shields her from the world. Seberg’s only ostensible friend in the film is Tina Aumont, who seems to be dating a perpetually depressed dude portrayed by Laurent Terzieff (of Gillo Pontecorvo’s Kapò (1960) and Luis Buñuel’s La voie lactée (1969) aka The Milky Way). While Seberg shows signs of depression and misery at least 80-85% of the time, Aumont is probably only upset about 15-20% of time and thus she naturally acts as a sort of security blanket to the protagonist, though one suspects the French Jewess might have ulterior motives as she certainly has a more sinister side.

While Aumont finds joy in simply talking to and caressing her beau Terzieff

in shadowy doorways, Seberg only seems to be truly in her element when she is doing somewhat bizarre things like taking showers while wearing tacky jewelry, as if doing such absurd things make her temporarily forget the cold hard reality of her nightmarish existence. Of course, Seberg tends to fall into her own sort of personal purgatory when she is all alone as is especially apparent in a scene where she sits on a floor in a fetal position while dressed in a nightgown. At one point in the film, Aumont walks in on Seberg at just the right moment and saves her while she is seemingly attempting to commit suicide by downing pills with alcohol. One of the ways that Aumont is able to console Seberg and put her in a temporary happy place is by combing her hair like a nurturing mother that is taking care of her daughter, as if it reminds the lead of a time in her life before she became plagued with mental illness. Indeed, Aumont might be almost eight years older than Seberg, but she is certainly the more mature and maternal person in their seemingly co-dependent relationship. There are more than a couple hints that Aumont might have unsavory intentions in regard to her friendship with mental cripple Seberg, as she sometimes makes an evil bitch smirk, especially when she is playing with a switchblade in a fairly fetishistic fashion. During one of Seberg's merrier moments, she is depicted sporting a large fancy fur-coat as if she is briefly reliving her most magical and glamorous years a famous-movie star before she suffered the disgrace of becoming the white sugar-momma whore of the black panthers and unloved wife to various sleazy and abusive Israelite types of the physically grotesque sort. If one thing is for sure, Seberg seems about twenty times as mentally unhinged and melancholic in Les hautes solitudes than Carole Bouquet's character does in Schroeter's Tag der Idioten (1981) aka Day of the Idiots. Of course, this is amazing when one considers that Seberg only had the benefit of her mere facial expressions while much of Bouquet's mental derangement is largely depicted via surrealism, Sapphic urophilia, and bizarre special effects, among other things that demonstrate that Schroeter had a profound affection for female misery and mental derangement. Certainly Garrel's film provides ample evidence that Seberg might have made a great silent era actress, as she certainly says more with her eyes than words ever could.

Although a fairly insignificant figure of the film, Slavic frog pansy Terzief is depicted at one point staring at his reflection in a table as if he is embracing the void and is totally fed up with life to the point of wanting to end it all yet lacks the drive and testicular fortitude to do so. Aumont also does the same thing, but she does not look nearly as forlorn as Terzief, who one suspects might be a victim of the cunning dark-haired dame's whimsical feminine wrath. As the film progress, Seberg and Aumont spend most of their bonding time smoking and talking to one another in a somewhat somber and even seemingly semi-apathetic fashion, as if their relationship has run its course and the two no longer find any value in one another. If anything is for sure, it is that all the characters in the film are haunted, though Seberg seems irreparably internally damaged while Aumont seems to just be going through a minor phase that probably has a lot to do with her dubious relationship with brooding beta-body Terzief. During the last couple of minutes of the film, Seberg is depicted smiling while wearing a goofy hat with a veil and flowers on it, though her happiness soon disintegrates while talking to some unseen person. In the end, the film fittingly concludes with Seberg sitting alone in the darkness where she goes from being physically violent to sobbing hysterically in only a matter of seconds. Of course, in terms of both the film and in real-life, Seberg had no one else in the end aside from the personal pandemonium of her own psyche. Not surprisingly, Seberg ultimately decided to risk it all by breaking through said pandemonium.

Although it might come as a shock to some people, Seberg actually once directed an experimental film entitled Ballad for Billy the Kid (1974), but it seems impossible to find and it was extremely poorly received upon its less than auspicious premiere. Indeed, as Jonathan Rosenbaum, who personally met Seberg a handful of times, noted in his essay Riddles of a Sphinx: From the Journals of Jean Seberg, "The only other time I ever saw Seberg in the flesh was in late 1974, and then only from a distance. I was present at what may have been the world premiere of a short film she wrote, directed, and starred in, BALLAD FOR [BILLY] THE KID, at the London Film Festival [...] It was a French hippie 'underground' effort that resembled many others of that period, and though it was embarrassingly bad, the derision of the audience seemed needlessly cruel and vindictive. I remember thinking how painful it must have been for Seberg." While I would not be surprised if Ballad for Billy the Kid actually is total garbage of the hippie leftist sort, I think with Les hautes solitudes, which was incidentally released the same year as her short film, Seberg proved that she was an 'auteur' of sorts that did have something of artistic merit to express. After all, a burnt out heroin-addled bohemian like Garrel would probably not say something like, "I consider LES HAUTES SOLITUDES as much a Seberg film as mine," if he did not truly mean it. In other words, the film would be nothing without Seberg, who is the spirit of this virtual celluloid dirge. Certainly Garrel's contribution to the film was largely passive at best, but it also epitomizes his particular and admittedly fairly preternatural brand of auteur filmmaking. Interestingly, Garrel once stated in an interview in regard his approach and artistic handicaps to directing the film, "...I took control of the camera, but I didn't know how to operate it, so it was quite disastrous technically, but, at the same time, I liked it better because it allowed me more freedom. [...] Now, I see that to take control of the camera myself is something like having an iron arm. It is like an artificial limb. There is some horror in that. That is what Welles explains. I have not known a solution to it. Maybe one day we will use a radio-controlled camera that works alone."

As someone that is somewhat familiar with Nietzsche's The Antichrist, I have no clue how the book inspired Garrel's film, yet the text certainly gives some insights in regard to Seberg's spiritual affliction and internal misery as is potently expressed in the flick. An American Nordic beauty of Swedish, English, and German extraction that was brought up in a devoutly Lutheran household, Seberg was instilled with a deep sense of terribly naive Christian altruism at an early age that consumed her entire life and indubitably led to many of the extremely poor and self-destructive choices that she made during her fairly short life. Of course, Nietzsche felt that Christianity was an intrinsically corrosive Jewish spiritual virus (in the book, he describes the "Christian" as "that ultimate of lying, is the Jew all over again—he is threefold the Jew...") that was responsible for 'taming' and ultimately weakening the 'blond beast' (aka Aryan peoples) and Seberg certainly represented the worst qualities of racially deracinated Judeo-Christian decadence. Indeed, while Seberg both funded and fucked honky-hating Black Panther leaders because she felt she was doing the Lord's work by helping the weak and meek, such self-debasing behavior is nothing short of a major Nietzschean sin as indicated by quotes from the book like, "The weak and the botched shall perish: first principle of our charity. And one should help them to it. What is more harmful than any vice?—Practical sympathy for the botched and the weak—Christianity." Nietzsche also discusses in The Antichrist how the Hebrews are historical harbingers of decadent movements and trends who used said decadent movements and trends as a sort of spiritual weapon against their enemies, or as he states in the book, "Psychologically, the Jews are a people gifted with the very strongest vitality, so much so that when they found themselves facing impossible conditions of life they chose voluntarily, and with a profound talent for self-preservation, the side of all those instincts which make for decadence—not as if mastered by them, but as if detecting in them a power by which 'the world' could be defied. The Jews are the very opposite of decadents: they have simply been forced into appearing in that guise, and with a degree of skill approaching the non plus ultra of histrionic genius they have managed to put themselves at the head of all decadent movements [...] decadence is no more than a means to an end. Men of this sort have a vital interest in making mankind sick, and in confusing the values of 'good' and 'bad,' 'true' and 'false' in a manner that is not only dangerous to life, but also slanders it." Indeed, rich Jews like George Soros do not simply fund and support black, gay, feminist, and illegal immigrant groups out of the sheer goodness of their hearts, but because they use them as weaponized pawns to undermine the white majority, who unwittingly buy into this culturally and socially corrosive garbage due to the hopelessly naïve slave-morality that they learned from Christianity, with the weak white liberal atheist being nothing more than a lapsed Christian who buys into the same slave-morality mumbo jumbo that his ancestors worshiped. As a woman that made herself the concubine of black nationalists, married at least two Jews (included kosher commie screenwriter John Berry's son), and regularly sought advice from a rabbi instead of the sort of Lutheran leaders that she was brought up with, Seberg is a great example of a white liberal useful idiot who succumbed to the two-headed golden calf of Jewish decadence and nihilist post-Christian altruism.

Indeed, not unlike super Shiksa Marilyn Monroe, Seberg probably would have never met such a grisly end had she not got involved with the Hebrews in Hollywood in the first place (notably, Seberg suffered her first major mental breakdown shortly after cheating on her first husband with an ugly French Jew named Romain Gary, who was almost the same age as her father and who she later married). When I watch Les hautes solitudes, I see a terribly forsaken female who could have anything she wanted but whose embracing of 'liberal' (translation: Cultural Marxist) degeneracy and, in turn, betrayal of her heritage and both physical and spiritual debasement at the hands of Tschandala untermensch trash, ultimately led to her complete and utter mental deterioration. Personally, in the context of Seberg's strong ties to the racially hostile Hebraic tribe, I see frog Jewess Tina Aumont's character in Garrel's film as a sort of Salome-esque femme fatale that pretends to console the lead while really pushing her over the edge, hence the scenes in the flick where she is playing with a switchblade while she has a sinister smile on her face. Naturally, there are few more effective things for destroying a woman's self-esteem than being in the presence of a much younger and more confident beautiful woman and Aumont seems to be quite confident about the fact in the film as she smiles while Seberg looks like she is on the verge of swallowing a couple bottles of pills. Of course, it is only fitting that Les hautes solitudes has a fiercely forlorn aesthetic that falls somewhere between Expressionism and cinéma-vérité, as the film bleeds a sort modern realist horror that will probably not make much sense to viewers unless they have done their research on the lead's tragic background as a tragically misguided woman whose downfall as a result of the faith-based pseudo-religion known as liberalism ultimately confirmed that Nietzsche was right in regard to the catastrophic effects of the Christian slave-morality, especially on a race of conquerors whose original pagan religion endorsed a master-morality that promoted honor, nobility, and strength, among various other imperative moral ingredients that are looked down on nowadays. While Seberg's debut performance as the eponymous lead in Saint Joan (1957) directed by Otto Preminger (who was another ruthless Judaic that emotionally abused the actress) was largely panned by critics when the film was originally released, her performance in Les hautes solitudes is probably the closest she ever came to comparing to the majesty of Renée Falconetti in Carl Th. Dreyer's silent masterpiece La passion de Jeanne d'Arc (1928) aka The Passion of Joan of Arc. Although Garrel was such a weak man and toxic lover that he had a tendency to get his lovers, including Nico, addicted to heroin, his film demonstrates an inordinate empathy for members of the so-called fairer sex, especially those of the overtly mentally imbalanced sort. Indeed, while watching

Les hautes solitudes, there is no doubt in the viewer's mind that the auteur loved and respected Seberg's vulnerability, which is quite a rare quality for a heterosexual man.

LE BERCEAU DE CRISTAL

Philippe Garrel (1976)

Admittedly, I was somewhat hesitant to view another one of patently pretentious French director Philippe Garrel's works, especially in a sober state, as his perhaps most internationally famous work, Le Cicatrice Interieure (1972), starring his beloved muse Nico in the lead role, left me with somewhat ambivalent feelings in which I found myself all at once thoroughly entranced by its surrealist scenarios against pallid, yet powerful panoramas but on the other hand gratingly annoyed by Nico's decidedly childish, whiny behavior and the all around excruciatingly difficult to follow plot (or lack thereof). But being the ever-faithful film viewer that I am, and seeing that I am also a dedicated fan of the flax-haired chanteuse Nico, even if she is an occasionally annoying actress, I decided to give Garrel another chance with Le berceau de cristal aka The Crystal Cradle (1975), and I am quite thankful I did—my only regrets being that I could not have turned out all of the lights in my humble home and found myself viewing it while plonked down on the couch surrounded in total darkness and inebriated by some blissfully mind-altering substance. Indeed, at just over an hour long, Le berceau de cristal is another aimlessly meandering and surreal yet minimalist work with the entirety of its focus on the decidedly divine Nico, Garrel's much loved opiate-abusing muse, which in much the same vein as its sister film Le Cicatrice Interieure turns a somewhat uncomfortable, angst-ridden eye to unraveling the corrupted contents of Nico's soul—with krautrock hippie composers Ash Ra Tempel providing the mellow musical score—that will either pleasantly tap into one's overly emotional, romantic inner goth or send the scintillating synapses of the drug-addled dope fiend all the more abuzz (or, for the more conventional film viewer, will render him absolutely mad and desiring only to gouge his eyes out).

Le berceau de cristal is indeed a very dark, minimalist work, the main focus of which is Nico's lovely, sculpted visage, to which the viewer is introduced with her inside a dark tomb, intermittently taking a puff of a cigarette, reading pages from a book, and applying powder to her face. Almost immediately, the smooth, ethereal music of Ash Ra Tempel aurally wisps about, as if it is invisibly accentuating something unseen in the empty, yet tenebrous atmosphere. In typical fashion, Garrel spends a lot of time (as ever, too much time, especially for the less attentive viewer) focusing on Nico's face for minutes at a time, which is perhaps testament to his languishing pretentiousness as a stereotypical Frenchman (or perhaps he was truly in love with the statuesque beauty and wanted to forever immortalize her angelic countenance, even if to a rather pedantic extent). The meandering music suddenly turns more ominous, at which point the audience bears witness to a marvelous montage of surreal images, seemingly symbols born out of Nico's imagination: first, a crescent moon against a black sky, then four cloaked female figures, sitting side-by-side in darkness, juxtaposed against the next scene of a virginal, yet maniacal nymph muttering something inaudible to herself in a sunlit forest (played by much beloved French actress Dominique Sanda). At about 20 minutes into the film, Garrel again turns to Nico's face, and she begins reading some decidedly angsty, goth-ridden nonsensical poetry (the sort of vapid stuff I'd ashamedly written during my agonizingly embarrassing adolescent years), with lines like, "I have come to lie with you. I have come to die with you. On your pallid shoulder and your golden chest, in a wilderness of glass we rest." After Nico reads a couple more lines, Anita Pallenberg, the Italian-German model and muse of the Rolling Stones appears on the screen, and starts snorting a substance off of her hand (presumably cocaine) and smiles impishly into the camera, yet never uttering a single word. Nico, in her characteristically throaty and masculine German accent, continues to read her rather puerile poetry until, at the very end of the film, while seated in a chair still within the confines of the dark tomb, she brings a small gun to her temple and proceeds to blow her brains out (pretending of course), at which point she sprawls herself across the chair in the most dramatic fashion possible, presumed a victim to her overactive, drug-addled imagination, somber soliloquies and pedantic prose.

While Le berceau de cristal is at times rather monotonous and slow and definitely nonsensical, there is a certain mysterious charm to the film that will undoubtedly enthrall and perhaps even excite the more morbidly inclined and introverted of individuals, or those who frequently partake in chemically altered states and can find themselves patiently entranced by sometimes minutes-long shots focused solely on Nico's face (especially with its achingly haunting krautrock soundtrack, also titled Le berceau de cristal by Ash Ra Tempel who presumably collaborated with Garrel in some fashion, or to whom Garrel made the work as a sort of homage, as the album's cover art featuring a naked nymph seated on a rock is also seen in the film). Compared against Garrel's more acclaimed and ambitious work Le Cicatrice Interieure, Le berceau de cristal is aesthetically underwhelming but equally nonsensical and just as thick on symbolism yet much less grating in terms of its lack of plot and virtual absence of any sort of dialogue, particularly of the puerile and/or pedantic sort. Featuring appearances by his much loved, drug-addled muses (namely Nico, and Anita Pallenberg, who both battled hellish heroin addictions themselves, with Nico later tragically dying while in recovery), and heavy on ethereal, dreamy imagery, juxtaposed against an overall minimal aura, Le berceau de cristal is testament to Garrel's lustful love for his leading ladies, and essential viewing for art fag film lovers everywhere, either of the inherently mentally moribund persuasion, or for those who can artificially render themselves stupefied and drooling in front of a tv screen (in a good way, of course).

Philippe Grandrieux (1998)

I am not a diehard serial killer fetishist or anything, but Sombre (1998)—an experimental work directed by French auteur Philippe Grandrieux (A New Life aka La vie nouvelle, Un Lac) about a violent serial killer/rapist of the perennially lonely sort who falls in love with a woman for the first time in his entire life—is easily one of the most darkly romantic and disturbingly beautiful films I have ever seen. Directed by an ex-video artist loosely associated with the so-called ‘New French Extremity’ movement, Sombre is a work of aesthetically majestic yet paradoxically minimalistic metaphysical horror depicting an innately impenetrable antihero living in a glacial zeitgeist who is provoked to rape and murder simply by being merely touched by a member of the fairer sex. Slaughtering sluts, prostitutes, and other wanton women along the frog countryside, the angst-ridden antihero of Sombre faces the most unsettling prospect of his entire life when a beautiful virgin falls in love with him and vice versa. A perturbing and penetrating love story for the foreboding age of Occidental decline, Sombre ultimately portrays the impossibility of love in our contemporary times where most Europeans think children are a nuisance and marriage is looked at as a mere business transaction. The slightly saner yet more melancholy son of Gerald Kargl’s Angst (1983) and the more cultivated yet crazed celluloid big brother of Jörg Buttgerit’s nihilistic kraut serial flick Schramm (1994), Sombre is the cinematic cream of the crop when it comes to films about sexually dysfunctional and sadistic human predators. Directed by a filmmaker who has cited the films of F.W. Murnau, Robert Bresson, Stan Brakhage, and Rainer Werner Fassbinder, as well as the writings of philosophers ranging from Marcus Aurelius to Gilles Deleuze, as major influences, Sombre is a Weltschmerz-rattled and cognitive-dissidence-straddled neo-fairytale in the lunatic libertine spirit of Michael Stock’s Prince in Hell (1993) aka Prinz in Hölleland about a serial killer who acts as a puppet-master both on and off stage and who does whatever he wants, with whoever he wants, whenever he wants, so when his power is tested by the proposition of the uncontrollable—love, human warmth, and sexual ecstasy—he must come to terms with the little bit of ‘humanity’ he has left. A delectably deranging and discombobulating cinematic work that dares the viewer to dig deep in the decidedly dark abyss of a damaged mind that is attempting to persevere in the face of undying psychological sickness and plaguing pathology, Sombre ultimately seems like a serial killer flick that was directed by an actual (and rather quite sensitive) serial killer, as a sort of esoteric arthouse celluloid equivalent to Moors Murderer Ian Brady’s book The Gates of Janus: Serial Killing and Its Analysis (2001).

Nordic frog Jean (Marc Barbé) is a man that certainly knows how to make children laugh and cheer wildly but he is also a curiously fucked fellow who knows how to make a woman scream for her life. Set in the French countryside during the Tour de France, Sombre follows the seemingly most somber man in rural frogland as he gives puppet shows to standing ovations of children, picks up prostitutes and ritualistically rapes and murders them with his bare hands, and eventually bumps into the seemingly most somber woman in rural frogland, thus offering him a rare chance at personal redemption. Jean has a very specific routine when it comes to raping and killing women that involves him making the unsuspecting victim strip bare while blindfolded and forcing them to spread their legs a couple inches from his face. Indeed, Jean stares at a woman's naughty bits as if putting 'pussy on a pedestal', but at the same time he does not seem to know what to do with it, as if he is an impotent pedantic scientist taking a theoretical approach to sex. It seems that due to impotence and pent up sexual frustration, Jean can only derive of sense of solace and sexual release by strangling sluts to death. One day, gentleman Jean's view of life, love, and humanity is forever changed when he goes driving and offers to give a ride to a chick named Claire (Romanian Jewess Elina Löwensohn) whose car has just broken down. Unlike the lecherous ladies he typically picks up, Claire is a sensitive virgin who seems to suffer from a perennial form of sadness, as if she was once internally wounded and the scars failed to heal. Claire has a sister named Christine (Geraldine Voillat) who, on top of being a pseudo-blonde bimbo, is rather extroverted, especially in comparison to her somber sis. In between strangling to death prostitutes, Jean begins hanging out with both Claire and Christine. While Christine does everything she can to grab Jean's warped gaze, including incessant skinny dipping, he only has eyes for Claire. One day whilst swimming at the lake, Jean decides enough is enough when it comes to Christine's never-ending nakedness and starts strangling the loose lady and only stops just shy of killing her, which naturally perturbs Claire. After getting involved in a bizarre failed threesome in a seedy motel room that mainly involves Jean tying up the girls in bondage and smacking them around like slaves, Claire decides to help her sister escape by her putting on a train to paris, though she stays with the serial killer as she seems to believe she can save him from himself. As two terribly lonely and decidedly damaged individuals whose 'faults' seem to complement one another, Jean and Claire inevitably fall in love and somewhat attempt to become a real couple. In fact, Jean even makes passionate love to virgin Claire and thus he also loses his 'vanilla sex' virginity. Of course, Jean and Claire cannot last as a romantic entity as the former has a lust for brutality and the latter does not want to become a victim of the former's lust for brutality. Since he truly loves her and is afraid of what he might do to her in the future, Jean rather reluctantly yet swiftly pushes Claire away by telling her to "get lost" and "vanish" after the two make passionate love, thus displaying love and mercy for another person for the first time in his loser life as god's most lonely man.

A sort of tastefully sordid postmodern neo-fairytale (in one rather symbolic scene, Claire find and puts on a 'Big Bad Wolf' costume owned by Jean) told in a purely visual and mood-driven style reminiscent of the great poetic works of silent cinema (F.W. Murnau's masterpiece Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) certainly comes to mind), Sombre is easily one of the most strangely touching and singularly romantic films I have ever seen and unlike a film like Dahmler (2002) starring Jeremy Renner, Grandrieux actually manages to work in its unflinching 'humanization' of a sadistic serial killer. Indeed, in the end, antihero Jean of Sombre seems even more genuinely pathetic than Peter Lorre did in Fritz Lang's M (1931). Additionally, Jean of Sombre does not seem like a cinematic caricature like Lorre in M, but more like a seemingly normal fellow who, if the viewer did not know any better, has something slightly off about him that one cannot quite pinpoint and that is what makes Grandrieux's work such a delectably disturbing piece of 'humanistic horror.' In the end, Sombre seems more like a romantic tragedy than anything else in its daunting depiction of two discernibly damaged soul-mates who might have been able to live a long life of mutual beauty with one another had it not been for each characters' respective 'hang-ups.' A 'thinking man's serial killer flick' that will surely bore the hell out of the sort of horror fanatic that gets an almost pornographic thrill from seeing the likes of slasher killers like Michael Myers and Leatherface in action, Sombre is a sort of Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer (1986) for those cinephiles who enjoy reading Schopenhauer over Fangoria. Such a viewer dividing work that it inspired those running the 1998 Locarno Film Festival to release the following official statement, "Half of the jury would like to call attention to Sombre. Our jury split between those who were morally offended by the film and those who saw a purpose in its darkness, and in the strength of its mise-en-scene and images," Sombre is a true love story for a pre-apocalyptic age that has become disillusioned with love, and a zestless zeitgeist where men prefer porn and whores and where women prefer careers and cuckolds to actual true love and romance. Featuring an inconspicuously complimentary score by Alan Vega (frontman of the electronic protopunk duo Suicide), as well as a strange appearance by the classic Bauhaus song "Bela Lugosi's Dead," Sombre is a fiercely foreboding work dripping with atmosphere that offers the filmgoer more than just a mere film, but an oneiric celluloid odyssey that totally transcends most people's comfort zones. Auteur Philippe Grandrieux's first 'official' feature film (though he has been making video art and installations since the 1980s), Sombre may be a majorly melancholy work that pricks and prods at the soul without mercy, but it is also ample evidence that film as an artistic medium is far from dead and that some cinematic territories have only been marginally explored. Indeed, if you thought David Fincher made the serial killer film a respectable subgenre with big budget and superficially stylized melodramatic swill like Se7en (1995) and Zodiac (2007), you have yet to be metaphysically touched by a cinematic manhunter in the way that only Grandrieux's Sombre does.

LA VIE NOUVELLE

Philippe Grandrieux (2002)

As a filmmaker that got his start working in the now-dead artistic medium of 'video art', French aberrant-garde auteur Philippe Grandrieux (Sombre, Un Lac aka A Lake) has a fairly singular visceral filmmaking style that, although can be compared to other so-called 'New French Extremity' auteur filmmakers like Gaspar Noé (I Stand Alone, Irréversible) and Bruno Dumont (Twentynine Palms, Hors Satan aka Outside Satan), is ultimately in a lethally lurid league of his own. It may be because I am a little bit wacked out but I thought Grandrieux's Sombre (1998) starring Romanian-born Jewess Elina Löwensohn (Schindler's List, Nadja) was quite possibly the most darkly romantic and touching serial killer flick I have ever had the devilishly delectable pleasure of seeing. A filmmaker far too artsy fartsy for art-antagonistic gorehounds and jaded horror fanatics, but also too dark and visceral for the sort of pseudo-cultivated cinephiles who get hard-ons from the latest box-sets released by the Criterion Collection, Grandrieux is a virtual one-man celluloid army with an unwavering scorched earth policy whose films wallow in the deepest and darkest corners of the human psyche, thus his outstanding oeuvre is in innate contrast to what everything Hollywood (and most cinema in general) stands for as you will find nil 'feel good' escapism, soulless sentimentalism, calculating quirkiness, Viagra-fueled fratboy sex, nor anti-reality happy endings in his films. As frog psychoanalyst Jean-Claude Polack stated of Grandrieux's work, "Unlike Pasolini who is really interested in the way that society is theatrically transforming the ceremony of predating into a show, there is here an experimental cinema; it is true; that is trying to register, thanks to the camera, what humans eyes would never be able to see in order to deconstruct and analyze reality. Grandrieux's films are analytical films, like a microscope, that give the viewer the possibility to see more accurately what is movement, emotion, sensation, colour, darkness and the emergence of the image (either material or thought)." Indeed, watching Grandrieux's A New Life (2002) aka La vie nouvelle aka Betrayed and Sold is like temporarily entering the irreparably debased mind of one of the female kidnapped sex slaves from Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) and facing the absolutely grueling experience of her psychological transformation from passive beauty to voracious sexual she-beast, but that is just one of the many lost souls you will be savagely molested with by the film. An uniquely unhinged, ugly, and unhappy yet paradoxically ethereal reworking of the Orpheus myth that would have caused Cocteau to have a heart attack about a sexually confused young American soldier on leave who shows up to some sinister Slavic Sodom with his discernibly deranged buddy and absurdly falls in love with an Eastern European prostitute/sex slave and decides it is solely up to him to save her from her deranging dystopian life of lechery, A New Life is a film without redemption, without love, without hope, and—most importantly—without humanity (Of course, it depends on your definition of ‘humanity’).

Set in some unmentioned post-industrial/post-communist Eastern European hellhole (it was actually filmed in Sofia, Bulgaria), A New Life begins with nightmarish unfocused shots of a group of male and female human cattle huddled together like they are about to be sent to Gulag as they await their ‘new lives’ as mafia-owned sex slaves. After having their hair cut viciously with a large knife by a real-life boogeyman named Boyan (Zsolt Nagy) who has a sinister and seemingly supernatural form of charisma, the slav(e)s are beaten and raped so they can be ‘broken in’ for sexual servitude. Focusing mainly on pretty yet psychosis-ridden prostitute-slave named Melania (French actress Anna Mouglalis), the viewer is thrown into a bottomless abyss of her physical, but especially meta-physical, slavery. When not entertaining prospective ‘customers’ by doing some exotic dancing in a seemingly possessed state at a dimly lit bar, Melania is brutally beaten and smacked around by a completely crazed and equally craven French client who, due to his sexual impotence, can only get off by brutalizing broads not only with hands, but also by singing loony lovey-dovey lyrics like, “happy is the man who dies of love...until you lose your mind” (translated from the French song “Aimer À Perdre La Raison”). When young American dork soldier Seymour (American actor Zachary Knighton, who is probably best known for his role on the ABC comedy series Happy Endings) shows up to the seemingly post-apocalyptic Eastern European warzone-without-war with his discernibly mentally damaged buddy Roscoe (played by French actor Marc Barbé as a character that the viewer never really knows if he is Seymour’s lover, father, or brother, but he seems like a composite of all three), he soon purchases Melania’s pussy for a pretty penny. Like virtually all the men that buy ‘love’ from Melania, Seymour is too impotent to get an erection when in the company of the Slavic streetwalker’s sexy unclad body, though he eventually manages to bust a load in her from behind in what is literally less than a second long sex session of the patently pathetic sort (the scene hints that Seymour is a closet-homosexual, hence his need to screw from behind, not to mention his dubious relationship with Roscoe). Despite his failure to fuck her properly, would-be-semen-demon Seymour becomes totally obsessed with Melania in a postmodern Orphic manner and somehow inexplicably believes he can save her from both physical and sensual slavery, even though the damage has always been done and there is no salvation for a waywardly wanton woman like her. Ultimately, Melania is a sub-pricey material commodity traded between all the men featured in A New Life, with malevolent Mafioso mad men Boyan being her pimp puppet master who perniciously pulls all the strings, which he does with the sadistic glee of a NKVD hangman hooked on heroin and Euro-Trash trance music. In the end, pseudo-savior Seymour unwittingly becomes the pansy protégé of Svengali-like barbarian Boyan. Brought into a stinking Slavic inferno of sexual savagery and sadism after paying Boyan for an entire night with Melania, Seymour ultimately leaves as a soulless hate-driven sexual savage who beats and rapes women with Luciferian gusto. In losing himself, Seymour also loses his best friend Roscoe to a starving pack of 'man's best friend.' In the sardonically titled A New Life, man becomes beast and beast literally and figuratively swallows man in a film where vicious circles are as prevalent as dainty dance moves and sexual impotence.

A sort of cinematic warm-up for what the Americanized Occident can expect after the world finally collapses in a coming convergence of catastrophes and we enter a new dark age where man has an atavistic awakening and reverts back to primalism, A New Life is cinema at its most viciously visceral and devastatingly disillusioned directed by a filmmaker who has dared to gaze into the abyss and has created films that gaze into the viewer in a manner that might be described as 'aesthetic terrorism' were it not for the fact that the filmmaker is clearly not trying to simply shock the viewer (otherwise, he would not make terrifyingly transcendental works with sparse dialogue for a mostly marginal audience). A true 'cinema of cruelty' for a nihilistically numbed and dumbed down age where most viewers get an almost pornographic thrill from seeing explosions and terrorist attacks in movies, A New Life is a grandly gut-wrenching and soul-stabbing cinematic work that allows no sense of detachment from the filmgoer and the character's in film. Adapted from a script written in a sort of prose poem form by auteur Grandrieux and French writer Eric Vuillard, A New Life is celluloid poetry of purity about impurity, as if the director wanted to update Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) directed by F.W. Murnau (who Grandrieux has cited as a major influence) in the setting of World War III. In attempting to describe his artistic and philosophical intent with A New Life to interviewer Nichole Brenez, Grandrieux offered the following insights: "My dream is to create a completely 'Spinoza-ist' film, built upon ethical categories: rage, joy, pride ... and essentially each of these categories would be a pure block of sensations, passing from one to the other with enormous suddenness. So the film would be a constant vibration of emotions and affects, and all that would reunite us, reinscribe us into the material in which we're formed: the perceptual material of our first years, our first moments, our childhood. Before speech. That's the impulse – the desire – which led to the film." Featuring a raging synth-driven score by French poets/performers Etant Donnés and a somber Blue Velvet-esque lounge singing solo by prostitute Melania, A New Life is a film where singing, song, and dance are the only escape for characters who live in a very real hell-on-earth and have reached a point of no return and thus completely bask in the very few real archaic sensations they can still feel. Suggested by co-screenwriter Eric Vuillard as being "a documentary on the living," A New Life is ultimately an abstract of the bestially living who have—for various reasons—discarded civilization for sensation and spirituality for mortal sin in a world where brutal impotency, hatred, and remorselessness reigns with a post-Stalinist iron-fist. A potent poetic piece of anti-pornography in an era where every male seems addicted to pornography yet cannot satisfy his girlfriend, A New Life is a corrosive collision of brutalized bodies and brains that makes Auschwitz seem like Disneyworld and Cocteau's phantasmagorical masterpiece Orphée (1950) aka Orpheus seem like a juvenile celluloid heaven-on-earth.

UN LAC

Philippe Grandrieux (2008)

Although experimenting with video art as far back as the mid-1970s, revolutionary French auteur Philippe Grandrieux (Sombre, White Epilepsy)—arguably the most innovative and idiosyncratic director associated with the so-called New French Extremity—has only directed three feature-length films. Undoubtedly, Grandrieux's first two features, Sombre (1998) and A New Life (2002) aka La vie nouvelle, are two of the most decidedly dark and viciously visceral yet unnervingly joyous works I have ever seen in my life to the point where I can safely say that it seems to me that the auteur has totally reinvented film as an artistic medium and has created his own cinematic language. Of course, the director's third and most recent feature, Un lac (2008) aka A Lake, is no less an experimental and uncompromising work, yet it is certainly a less violent and more minimalistic film that centers around a seemingly unlikely 'protagonist' for a Grandrieux; a young man with what the filmmaker described as having a pure heart. Naturally, Grandrieux's definition of a 'pure heart' might be a tad different than that of the average filmgoer as the young male protagonist suffers from epilepsy and has quasi-incestuous feelings for his own sister, so when a handsome stranger shows up and interrupts the order of things, internal tragedy strikes. Set in an unnamed snowy wooded region (apparently, the film was shot in the Swiss Alps) near an unnamed lake in an unnamed country in the North where the handful of inhabitants speak French with mostly Russian accents, Un lac, despite being directed by a frog, has a thoroughly Teutonic essence that feels like Edgar Reitz's Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984) meets the darkly romantic paintings of Caspar David Friedrich and philosophy of Martin Heidegger. Indeed, as an auteur who has named F.W. Murnau, Robert Bresson, Jean Epstein, Stan Brakhage, and Rainer Werner Fassbinder as imperative filmic influences, Grandrieux treats film as a deadly serious, if not strangely joyous, artistic medium comparable to literature and painting, even if some could argue that his films mostly fit in the horror genre. Indeed, if I had to lump Un lac into any 'genre,' I would describe it as a naturalistic and metaphysical neo-Heimat horror film, but that would be probably selling the work too short. A decidedly daunting depiction of man as beast in his most natural and instinctive habitat, Un lac can ultimately be philosophically summed up by the protagonist's words: "As is the death of the man... So is the death of the animal... One soul. Only one... No man has dominion over the wind."

Un lac opens rather intensely with a young man named Alexi (Dmitriy Kubasov) hysterically hacking away at something with great passion. Alex is a woodcutter and he is chopping down a tree as if completely one with nature and not in the sort of phony hippie environmentalist sort of way, but as someone who grew up in depths of the forest and has grown to deeply respect nature with the same care one would give to his fellow human beings. Rather unfortunately, Alexi suffers from regular horrific epileptic fits and is known to suffer body-stunning attacks whilst all by his lonesome. As depicted early on in the film, Alexi goes to his sister Hege (Natalie Rehorová) for comfort after suffering epileptic fits, but his love for his sister seems more than simply sibling based as indicated by his awkward remark to her, "You're my sister. Even so...", which she seems to intentionally ignore the meaning of. One day while working, Alexi is approached by a strange young man who seems to be around the same age as him who simply states, "I'm Jurgen. I've come to cut wood." Indeed, while Jurgen (Alexei Solonchev) has come to simply cut wood, he also comes to fall in love at first sight with Alexi's sister Hege. One day, Alexi, Hege, and Jurgen head out for a play date in the country and the newcomer and young lady seem rather close to one another despite being virtual strangers. From atop a waterfall, Alexi witnesses his sister and Hege kissing, so he runs away like a hurt little girl into the depths of the snowy forest. Eventually, Hege and Jurgen go looking for Alexi. At the dead of night, Jurgen eventually finds Alex half-frozen-to-death and does everything he can to revive him, ultimately saving the epileptic logger's life. Jurgen brings Alexi back home and the troubled woodcutter immediately embraces his blind mother Liv (Simona Huelsemann) in a most childlike manner. That night, Alexi stares at Jurgen in an almost possessed manner as he sleeps and tells his sister Hege that the stranger "must stay" as he has helped both of the siblings. After a happy day with the entire family (excluding the blind mother and missing father), Hege and Jurgen finally make love, but not before the lady demands a pre-coitus kiss from her gentleman caller. Needless to say, Hege is a discernibly changed woman after being deflowered and her incessantly lurking brother is not very happy about that, though he does not have the gall to confess such. Out of seemingly nowhere (indeed, Un lac is nothing if not a film where the viewer is left both figuratively and literally in the dark!), Alexi and Hege's father Christian (Vitaliy Kishchenko) eventually shows up and his blind wife lovingly greets him by stating, "I waited for you, Christian," to which he less than warmly replies "I'm here, Liv." Alexi also takes the time to embrace his father, hugging him at hip-level like a scared child and strangely stating to his papa, "I don't know now" as if his entire life has been rattled to the core by irreparable chaos. During a somberly lit dinner scene where the dinner table is nowhere to be seen, father Christian encourages his debutante daughter to serve newcomer Jurgen as if he is symbolically giving away his daughter. The next day, Hege sings with noticeable joy and her brother Alexi attempts to destroy this joy by jealously stating, "It's not like before...Your voice," but he cannot phase her undying feeling of love and happiness. In the end, lovelorn epileptic Alexi continues to have seizures (but this time his father, as opposed to his sister, comforts him) and without anyone in the family knowing except blind mother Liv, sister Hege leaves with Jurgen to start a new life in what is the closest thing to a

A sort of brazenly bittersweet mix of Pier Paolo Pasolini's Teorema (1968) meets Harmony Korine's Julien Donkey-Boy (1999) as directed by a man who is just as much of a sculptor and painter as he is a filmmaker, Un lac is undoubtedly as organic and traditionally themed as films come as a work that could have just as easily have been set in the middle-ages. Indeed, considering our superlatively soulless and technocratic age where more and more films resemble video games and where Hollywood makes sick flicks like The Kids Are All Right (2010) directed by kosher carpet-muncher Lisa Cholodenko depicting loony lesbos as ideal bourgeois parents, Un lac is a strikingly wholesome and family-oriented work. Despite the everyday hardships of their lives, Grandrieux depicted the family of Un lac with the utmost empathy and respect and not in the sentimentalist manner typical of old school German Heimat films. Of course, Grandrieux's sympathizes do not simply lie in man, but beast as well as demonstrated by the virtual worship the family of Un lac gives to their sole horse. Indeed, in one especially endearing scene at the beginning of the film, protagonist Alexi embraces the horse in such as deeply passionate and loving manner that most modern viewers would probably mistake the scenario for bestiality. Although I doubt Grandrieux would like hearing this, I suspect Un lac is the sort of avant-garde film one might have expected from a contemporary auteur of the Third Reich had the Teutonic empire not perished in a mere 12 years. Of course, in its innate melancholy and delightfully draining depiction of an 'unconventional' family, Un lac would probably be deemed a subversive work by a contemporary incarnation of the Third Reich, but it is also undoubtedly a work that will seem even more subversive to the typical autistic Tarantino fanboy or fervent French New Wave fanatic. A true film for all and no one, Un lac is the radical remainder that it is not cinema that is dead, but the film directors behind the cameras, with Grandrieux being a rare exception. Although I compared it to A New Life (2002) aka La vie nouvelle in a previous review, Un lac is the closest thing to a contemporary equivalent to Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) and like Murnau's masterpiece, Grandrieux's film is unfortunately wasted on most viewers. Apparently, once described by the director as the other side of the coin to La vie nouvelle, Un lac is ultimately a virtually dialogue-less family film that gets at the heart of tenderness, but not without exploring the inner torment such tenderness sires in those with a pure heart who come into contact with impurity.

COMMUNION

Philippe Mora (1989)

Even years before the premiere of The X-Files when I was a little kid that just learned how to ride a bike without training wheels, I was obsessed with extraterrestrials, UFOs, and especially Grey Aliens. Indeed, when the love of my life told me when we first met that she stopped eating red meat as a child because of alien cattle mutilations, I knew I had found my soulmate. In fact, I unwittingly developed a nearly decade long obsession simply because I randomly happened upon the iconic grey alien graphics used by the skateboard company Alien Workshop (AWS). Even with my later adult obsession with the most arcane and impenetrable of experimental and arthouse cinema, I can still say without hesitation that my favorite TV series of all time is still The X-Files, though I must admit that the last couple of seasons were rather pathetic. In fact, after recently watching the somewhat disappointing 2016 tenth season entitled 'The Event Series,' I could not help but subsequently re-watch every single episode of the entire series, which I followed up with every single episode of the somewhat underrated but nonetheless inferior NBC UFO conspiracy theory-based sci-fi television series Dark Skies (1996-1997) starring Eric Close and Megan Ward. Featuring a movie-like pilot that was directed by Tobe Hooper, Dark Skies is unfortunately plagued with unintentionally kitschy special effects that pale in comparison to those of The X-Files, yet they are still largely superior to those of the flagrantly flawed, sometimes nonsensical, and oftentimes unintentionally humorous cult item Communion (1989) directed by French-born Jewish-Australian documentarian turned horror/exploitation trash auteur Philippe Mora (Mad Dog Morgan, Pterodactyl Woman from Beverly Hills). Probably best known nowadays for the uniquely horrendous Howling (anti)sequels Howling II: Your Sister Is a Werewolf (1985) and Howling III: The Marsupials (1987), Mora might be described as a sort of Mel Brooks of Aussie horror trash, hence why Communion—a film based on the 1987 'nonfiction' novel of the same name by Whitley Strieber—is such a rather ridiculous flick as a unbelievably convoluted cinematic work with next to nil plot that attempts to take an ostensibly serious approach to the depiction of an extra neurotic and eccentric Christopher Walken receiving alien anal probes and dancing with so-called 'Little Blue Doctor' aliens, among other things.

Feeling like the marvelously misbegotten result of an atheistic nonbeliever of the UFO religion trying in vain to make a relatively realistic alien abduction drama that is supposedly based on a true story but instead siring a pseudo-psychoanalytic psychodrama featuring tons of reference to degenerate art about a wholly fictional eccentric Jewish NYC comedian type that seems nothing like the real-life Strieber who is on the brink of a total mental breakdown and attempts to blame it on rectum-reaming little green men, Communion is an unequivocal cinematic disaster that is somehow compelling due to the film's leading man Christopher Walken's singularly whacky performance, primitive pre-CGI in-camera special effects, and the overall awkward and emotionally schizophrenic tone. Notably, long before the film or the novel it was based on were ever conceived, director Mora and writer Strieber began what would become a longtime friendship after meeting each other in a sort of London beatnik scene during the late-1960s (notably, Mora also befriended the film's composer Eric Clapton around this same time). While the two apparently lost contact at some point during the next two decades, Strieber reunited with Mora in the 1980s after the latter just completed his fairly weak war drama Death of a Soldier (1986) starring James Coburn and confided in him that he believed that he had been abducted by aliens, so the filmmaker recommended that he both write about his experiences and see a psychiatrist (or as Mora stated himself, "He didn't know whether he should get a psychiatrist or publisher . . . And I encouraged him to get both."). After taking various lie detector tests and receiving extensive testing for temporal lobe epilepsy and other brain abnormalities, Strieber—a horror writer who, somewhat suspiciously, already became famous for novels like The Wolfen (1978) and The Hunger (1981), which were both eventually adapted into movies, before he was ever abducted by aliens—became thoroughly convinced that he indeed made contacts with visitors though, as Mora's movie makes quite clear, he has always been conflicted with the exact nature of his experiences (for instance, Strieber is not even sure if they were actually aliens and has hinted that he might have been a lifelong victim of government intelligence and/or military agencies).

While Mora found Strieber's claims to be somewhat dubious (as the director has noted in various places, while he does not doubt that his friend is telling the truth, he doubts the circumstances surrounding his claims), Mr. Walken—a mensch that seems far too cynical and smug to believe anything that he cannot see, buy, touch, eat, fuck, and/or kill—is a total unbeliever and in the film it totally shows. Undoubtedly, Communion seems like it was made more as platform for Walken to go wild and express his deepest and darkest emotions than to take a serious look at the reality of the alien question. In fact, Strieber, who comes off as a fairly normal and sedate WASP, saw nothing of himself in Walken's performance and was dissatisfied with the film before it was even released, not least of all because it features scenes of improvisation that sometimes resembles bad avant-garde performance art (rather revealingly, when Strieber confronted Walken with his concern that he was making him seem a little too bit crazy, the actor apparently arrogantly replied, "If the shoe fits"). Undoubtedly, it is not a bad sign when a director creates a film based on a true story about a longtime friend and that friend is completely disappointed with it. Additionally, it is not a good sign when a mainstream movie based on a longtime #1 New York Times bestseller is both a commercial and critical failure. Ultimately, Communion nion feels like a sort of preposterously pretentious psychological horror-comedy disguised as a sci-fi-cum-drama that features the novelty of a quite pompous and Jew-y NYC intellectual type with marriage problems that collects shitty overpriced modern art being abducted by aliens, but then again one could argue that the movie is really about a megalomaniacal human dildo that mentally deteriorates on the weight of his own insanely inflated ego. While Strieber apparently collects the sort of tasteless modern art that is featured in the film, he seems nothing like the sometimes insufferable and egocentrically unhinged neo-dandy dickhead that Walken portrays in the film. Of course, as a film that features the famously quirky Hollywood actor being anally probed and in a S&M-like scene where he is strapped naked to a sort of makeshift alien experiment table, Communion is indubitably both the foremost film for Christopher Walken fetishists and a potent piece of evidence that Mr. Mora might be a latent homo (after all, in his debut feature Mad Dog Morgan (1976), the filmmaker would include a scene where Dennis Hopper is brutally raped in prison).

Interestingly, in a 1951 letter to an American friend, alpha-psychoanalyst C.G. Jung—a somewhat unexpected innovator in the field aliens and UFOs studies who began collecting data on the subject as early as 1946—wrote, “I’m puzzled to death about these phenomena, because I haven’t been able yet to make out with sufficient certainty whether the whole thing is a rumor with concomitant singular and mass hallucination, or a downright fact. Either case would be highly interesting. If it’s a rumor, then the apparition of discs must be a symbol produced by the unconscious. We know what such a thing would mean seen from the psychological standpoint. If on the other hand it is a hard and concrete fact, we are surely confronted with something thoroughly out of the way. At a time when the world is divided by an iron curtain—a fact unheard-of in human history—we might expect all sorts of funny things, since when such a thing happens in an individual it means a complete dissociation, which is instantly compensated by symbols of wholeness and unity. The phenomenon of the saucers might even be both, rumor as well as fact. In this case it would be what I call a synchronicity. It’s just too bad that we don’t know enough about it.” In Mora’s Communion, there is not the faintest piece of evidence that aliens and spaceships are the product of the protagonist’s unconscious, as it is only when he has made ‘contact’ and been ‘abducted’ that his mind begins to deteriorate. Additionally, the protagonist is more petrified at the thought of being mentally ill than being experimented on by aliens, hence why he comes to almost like the extraterrestrials once he realizes that he has indeed been abducted. After all, the film is set in Reaganite America when hedonism, materialism, escapism, and Hollywood fantasy were at an all-time high and the Cold War began to cool as a result of ‘perestroika’ and ‘glasnost’ appeared in the Soviet Union, thus it should be no surprise that it fails to take a Jungian approach and explain the psychological and cultural implications of alien abduction. As a film made in the age of friendly extraterrestrial likes the eponymous alien of Spielberg's E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial (1982), the film could not have been made at a worst time, hence its abject commercial and critical failure. Despite being supposedly based on real events, Communion features completely abstract moments of darkly humorous quasi-Fellini-esque surrealism that come completely out of left field in what seems to be auteur Mora's semi-cryptic attempt to critique the entire subject of the film. While the aliens in the film have dubious intentions that involve anal play, they are quite cartoonish (for example, the grey aliens seem like they were designed for the clay animation franchise Gumby) and are hardly grotesquely sinister in physical appearance like the disgustingly erotic extraterrestrials of Xtro (1982) and Alien (1979). Featuring a protagonist that has a bizarrely intricate form of writer's block where he begins to question both his own sanity and entire life, Communion feels like what might happen if a man with the mind of Larry David and the body of Walken was abducted by perverted extraterrestrials that read too much Freud and not enough Jung, hence the film's Judaic auteur.

The year is 1985 and despite being a successful NYC writer that is rich enough to own original pieces of degenerate modern art, Whitley Strieber (Christopher Walken) is beginning to have dubious psychological problems as revealed at the very beginning of the film after he wakes up in the middle of the night as a result of feeling some sort of presence in his bedroom that he cannot quite wrap his mind around. It all starts on October 4 while Strieber is writing on his computer and it "fucks him" by crashing, thus causing him to lose a day's worth of work. Indeed, when his wife Anne (played by Lindsay Crouse, who was notably married to Zionist writer David Mamet at that time) and his young son Andrew (Joel Carlson) come home, Strieber complains with an exaggerated Yiddish accent, "oy vey what a day" and then goes on to describe how he believes "the computer turned off for a reason" because "the book I'm writing is no good." While Strieber does not know it yet, he is indeed correct as he will have an inexplicable experience that night in his cabin that will eventually lead to him writing a very different sort of novel. After firefighters arrive at his apartment as a result of him burning dinner, Strieber drives his wife, son, friend Alex (Andreas Katsulas), and Alex's lady friend to his remote cabin in the woods of upstate New York. That night while lying in bed and acting like a jackass, Strieber attempts to get his wife to say something "dirty" by asking her, "Can you say erection?," but the fun and games soon come to an end after everyone falls asleep when a bright light randomly fill the inside of cabin and the protagonist soon sees an almond-eyed 'grey' (who is actually dark yellow) peeping at him from behind a cabinet in his room. While everyone is awakened by the aliens and a grey even 'zaps' Strieber on the head with some sort of instrument, no one in the house can recollect exactly what happened the next day, though everyone seems to suspect something strange happened. As a result of he and his lady friend being completely spooked by something that they cannot quite describe, Alex, who is a sort goofy foreign Hebrew with a ridiculous fake accent, becomes inordinately belligerent and angrily demands, "Take us home, Whitley." As Strieber will eventually discover while under experimental hypnosis, he was the victim of aliens with a bunghole fetish.

While everything initially seems normal after the unexplained cabin experience, it becomes quite obvious a couple weeks later that things are not quite right when Strieber freaks out and screams at a 13-year-old girl sporting a fly mask at a Halloween party after he mistakes her for a sinister insectoid alien. Indeed, as a result of making a supreme ass of himself in front of their mutual bourgeois friends, Strieber's wife Anne berates him and declares in a fashion that reveals that she is not a fan of motherhood, "I've got one child. I don't need another." No longer acting like the Woody Allen-esque smart ass that she married, Anne also bitchily declares to Strieber, "You know, you used to be funny" after he gets extremely moody and yells at her simply because she attempts to be nice and do her wifely duties by cleaning his extremely cluttered work space. Naturally, Strieber's son Andrew also begins to realize that something is wrong with his father and eventually asks him why he is always "sad," but he lies and simply states, "I'm having a hard time, you know, with my writing." When the family goes back to their cottage right after Christmas, Strieber has another abduction experience where he begins to become convinced that he is being experimented on by extraterrestrial beings. Indeed, while in bed, Strieber is abducted by cloaked 'little blue doctor' aliens with grotesque negro-like faces while his hysterical wife looks like she is having a hellish orgasm while in a seemingly semi-paralyzed state. The next day, Strieber, who is beginning to realize what is happening to him, becomes sick and suffers a horrible migraine. Upon looking at her husband's head, Anne finds a strange mark on Strieber's head that looks like a spider bite that ultimately proves to be a scar from an alien implant. As a result of his moody and erratic behavior, Anne berates Strieber that night by mocking him for being "scared of shadows" and then demands to him, "you come back to me," as if she believes that he has totally lost his mind. Determined not to become a victim of enigmatic beings for a second night during his Christmas vacation, Strieber whips out a shotgun while his wife bitches at him, "I'm sick of this macho bullshit. You're so self-indulgent." Ultimately, Strieber almost blows a hole in his wife with his shotgun after seeing a little blue doctor hiding behind a vase in his cabin, thus leading to the family heading back to NYC so that the protagonist can get so much needed help.

When her son Andrew asks if god exists and Anne replies, "I hope so [...] but nobody knows," it becomes clear that the little boy was also visited by the aliens after he replies, "So were all alone, except for the little blue doctors. They come to the cabin. They have big black eyes. They're really scary. They said, 'We won't hurt you,' but I prayed for them to go away but they kept just shining their lights on me. God didn't make them go away." After talking to his wife, Strieber reluctantly agrees to see a psychiatrist that “specializes in rape cases” named Dr. Janet Duffy (Frances Sternhagen). Like the Strieber family, Dr. Duffy collects degenerate modern art, though she also seems to have a stereotypical white bourgeois liberal fetish for primitive tribal African art. Indeed, the various pieces of art in Dr. Duffy’s home make the place almost seem more extraterrestrial than the interior of the alien’s spaceship. When Strieber visits Dr. Duffy and she recommends that he receive hypnotic regression therapy, he initially refuses and arrogantly declares to his wife, “I’d stick pins in my eyeballs before I’d let that whacko woman fool with me [...] She should pay me.” After becoming annoyed with his irrational behavior, Anne decides enough is enough and makes the following ultimatum to her “selfish prick” husband: “I’m gonna tell you something. You’re gonna go back in that woman’s office, we’re going to find out what is wrong with you, or we’re not going to have any marriage left.” Needless to say, Strieber reluctantly agrees and soon discovers the true nature of his abduction experiences.

During his first session of hypnotic regression therapy, Strieber experiences both vivid literal flashbacks and sort of surreal nightmares that inspire him to nonsensically proclaim, “The world is blowing up. My boy is dead.” Totally unable to deal with the experience, Strieber quits the session before he really discovers anything truly insightful and proclaims to Dr. Duffy, “I don’t need this. Bad dreams.” Indeed, it is only when Strieber talks to his son about “little blue doctors” and “tall thin ones” and realizes that he is more afraid of the aliens than his little boy that he gets the testicular fortitude to once again go under hypnosis. While Andrew finds the aliens to be somewhat “scary,” he also describes them to his father as being, “soft and perfect.” While under hypnosis, Strieber recalls being anally probed by one of the little blue doctors with a high-tech vibrator that is pulled from a hole in the wall of a spaceship. Upon realizing his anal cavity is about to be assaulted by a scary shiny object of unknown origin, Strieber tries in vain to reason with the aliens by stating, “Can we talk this over? It looks like you’re gonna sing White Christmas,” but naturally the aliens have no interest in arguing with smart ass NYC intellectuals. The aliens also strap Strieber’s nude body to an operating table where they proceed to conduct dubious experiments. As a result of Strieber’s ‘successful’ hypnotic regression therapy, Dr. Duffy becomes convinced that he is indeed a genuine victim of alien abduction and invites him to become part of a support group for fellow abductees, which include a paranoid policeman and a couple whiny Jewesses. During the group session, Strieber meets a woman that claims her unborn fetus was stolen from her by aliens and talks to another that mentions that both her daughter and granddaughter were also been abducted. Eventually, Strieber begins to believe that he was first abducted when he was a little boy and that his son is also being abducted.

While dressed like a sort of culturally confused Gothic Latino pimp and seeming inordinately jubilant like a Bipolar person that is suffering from a manic episode, Strieber declares to his wife that he is going out for “a pack of cigarettes” even though he does not smoke and then heads to the woods of upstate New York so that he can confront his alien tormentors. Rather magically and inexplicably, Strieber somehow manages to effortlessly find the aliens, who are inside what looks more like an extravagant outhouse than a spaceship. Instead of being afraid, Strieber is quite friendly with the aliens and greets them with high-fives and a present in the form of a camcorder, thus inspiring the extraterrestrials to dance like autistic toddlers. Before Strieber knows it, he finds himself confronted by his doppelganger, who is dressed like a magician and who is no less arrogant than the protagonist. When Strieber remarks, “I am the dreamer and you’re the dream,” he gets somewhat of a shock when his doppelganger replies, “The only thing that matters is what I’m about to show you” and then reveals to him a partially unmasked grey alien, which has grotesque flesh that looks like something in between that of an insect and a rotting human corpse. When the doppelganger then reveals that it is not actually the alien’s face, Strieber humorously replies, “You’re not gonna let us see you. That’s a good idea.” Apparently, the alien’s true head is something like a Russian nesting doll (aka matryoshka doll) though, like with everything else regarding his abductions experiences, Strieber is not sure what is actually true. As far as Strieber is concerned, he is just glad that he is not insane.

After his eventful experience with the alien doppelganger, Strieber goes home happy as if he has experienced a massive life-changing revelation and proudly declares to his wife that he was “chosen” by the aliens. At this point, Anne seems to have finally accepted that her husband is not actually nuts and their deteriorating marriage begins to repair. Notably, the married couple go to an art museum where Strieber stands in front of a Jackson Pollock painting while his wife fittingly stands in front of a Lee Krasner painting. At this point, Strieber reveals his true feelings regarding his extraterrestrial experiences by softly stating, “It would be narcissistic of use to feel alone in the universe. People used to think the world was flat – it’s the center of things. It excludes the possibility of visitors. It’s really another kind of the same kind of thinking. The world is getting so small that it would be nice to meet someone new,” to which his wife supportively replies, “I don’t know what you saw. It doesn’t matter. It’s just god. You saw something extraordinary. There are many faces of god. Masks of god.” Anne then tells her husband he is “different” and that, in regard to the aliens, “I think they gave you a gift. You better use it.” Naturally, Strieber soon begins writing a new book, which would ultimately be what the film was adapted from. In the end, Strieber thinks that the aliens have come to visit him one night, so he more or less forces his wife and son to follow him to the top of their apartment building to greet the extraterrestrial begins, but he is ultimately disappointed when he does not find any aliens on his roof. Of course, everyone knows that aliens do not abduct people in overpopulated cities where they would be easily spotted.

For better or worse, Communion is probably the most thoughtful and abstract film that has ever been made on the subject of supposedly real-life aliens, even if it is an incoherent and singularly unintentionally humorous mess of a movie that was directed by a man that seems to have about as much interest in real-life alien abductions as Tarantino does in cinematically portraying authentic human pathos and eros. Notably, auteur Philippe Mora has described the surreal scene near the end of the film where the protagonist actively confronts the aliens as an 'ode' to Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968). Although seemingly impossible to tell while watching the scene, it should also be noted that Mora opted to have the protagonist's doppelganger dressed as a magician because he believes that any act of contact between aliens and humans would have to be a "magical" experience. Personally, I believe that this strangely zany magic act is just one of the many indications in the film that Mora does not believe that his friend Strieber was actually abducted by aliens, as if the director wanted to distance himself from the ostensible reality of his friend's experiences as much as possible lest he be labelled a UFO nutjob. Surely, it is hard for me to imagine someone watching Communion and then coming to the conclusion that Strieber is a reliable victim of alien abduction and all it entails. If I were to guess, I would assume that Strieber was more than victim of too many youthful acid trips than alien anal probes. As if to make a feeble attempt to capitalize off of the marginal cult status that his feature would eventually acquire, Mora would later go on to direct a quasi-documentary with the rather revealing title According to Occam's Razor (1999) where he spends a good portion of the time debunking UFO nuts in what is ultimately a glorified home movie that reveals more about the director's psyche than anything about the fact and fiction of extraterrestrials.

As someone that is fairly familiar with most of Mora's cinematic oeuvre, I can only assume that the only thing that the filmmaker truly believes is that Uncle Adolf was the most evil man that ever lived as indicated by his documentaries and especially his arguable magnum opus Snide and Prejudice (1998), which more or less depicts an abridged history of the Third Reich as acted out by mental patients portraying Nazi leaders and fittingly presided over by a flagrantly Jewish psychoanalyst named Dr. Cohen that indubitably acts as a stand-in for the director. Surely no novice to the subject of National Socialism, the film makes references to the more esoteric elements of Nazi history, including the somewhat enigmatic völkisch occult group the Thule Society, which acted as the genesis of what would eventually become the National Socialist German Workers' Party (aka Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei aka NSDAP). The son of a French Jewish Resistance fighter turned restaurateur and gallery owner whose first important film was the Nazi doc Swaastika (1973), Mora may have spent most of his filmmaking career directing low-camp kitsch and hokey horror trash, but Snide and Prejudice reveals that he has a striking pathological obsession with Hitler and National Socialism that seems to rival that of the average UFO conspiracy theorist. Needless to say, Mora's doc According to Occam's Razor, which has an entire segment dedicated to the Third Reich, attempts to make the dubious claim that the Nazis met aliens and that an Arno Breker statue might have been the very first depiction of a nude human body that aliens had ever seen. In short, Mora's doc unequivocally demonstrates that he believes that UFO conspiracy theories are a sad and laughable joke and that he probably only went to the effort of directing Communion to capitalize off of the great success of his friend Strieber's hit novel.

Interestingly, in his published letter On Flying Saucers, C.G. Jung wrote, "What astonishes me most of all is that the American Air Force, despite all the information it must possess, and despite its alleged fear of creating a panic similar to the one which broke out in New Jersey on the occasion of [Orson] Welles's radio play [The War of the Worlds], is systematically working towards that very thing by refusing to release an authentic and reliable account of the facts. All we have to go on is the occasional information squeezed out by journalists. It is therefore impossible for the uninitiated to form an adequate picture of what is happening. Although for eight years I have been collecting everything that came within my reach, I must admit I am no further forward today than I was at the beginning. I still do not know what we are up against with these 'flying saucers.' The reports are so weird that, granted the reality of these phenomena, one feels tempted to compare them with parapsychological happenings. Because we lack any sure foundation, all speculation is worthless. We must wait and see what the future brings. So-called 'scientific' explanations, such as Menzel's reflection theory, are possible only if all the reports that fail to fit the theory are conveniently overlooked." To quote Fox Mulder's famous poster in response to Jung's remarks, "I Want to Believe," but rather unfortunately the evidence is strangely lacking. While ostensibly depicting the real-life abduction of a mainstream horror novelist, Communion also features a semi-cryptic believer-skeptic dialectic and that is arguably the greatest and most revealing attribute of the entire film, but then again one also cannot go wrong with Christopher Walken bitching to aliens about being anally probed. In its glaring inclusion of awkward and seemingly nonsensical scenes, including Walken putting on a grey alien mask and telling his doppelganger, "I am the dreamer and you're the dream" in a segment that can hardly be described as a literal depiction of an alien abduction, Mora's film also anticipates the sort of postmodern meta elements of the more satirical episodes of The X-Files, which is surely fitting considering that both Strieber's book and Mora's movie are parodied in the classic third season episode "Jose Chung's From Outer Space," which is notable for featuring Mulder screaming with a faggoty falsetto voice upon discovering what he assumes is a dead grey alien corpse.

In his essay UFOs In Modern Painting, Jung noted in regard to what he perceived as the nihilistic apocalyptic degeneracy of modern art, "Whilst I was collecting the material for this essay, I happened to come across the work of a painter who, profoundly disturbed by the way things are going in the world today, has given expression to the fundamental fear of our age—the catastrophic outbreak of destructive forces which everyone dreads. It is, indeed, a law of painting to give visible shape to the dominant trends of the age, and for some time now painters have taken as their subject the disintegration of forms and the 'breaking of tables,' creating pictures which, abstractly detached from meaning and feeling alike, are distinguished by their 'meaninglessness' as much as by their deliberate aloofness from the spectator. These painters have immersed themselves in the destructive element and have created a new conception of beauty, one that delights in the alienation of meaning and of feeling. Everything consists of debris, unorganized fragments, holes, distortions, overlappings, infantilisms, and crudities which outdo the clumsiest attempts of primitive art and belie the traditional idea of skill. Just as women's fashions find every innovation, however absurd and repellent, 'beautiful,' so too does modern art of this kind. It is the 'beauty' of chaos. That is what this art heralds and eulogizes: the gorgeous rubbish heap of our civilization. It must be admitted that such an undertaking is productive of fear, especially when allied to the political possibilities of our catastrophic age. One can well imagine that in an epoch of the 'great destroyers' it is a particular satisfaction to be at least the broom that sweeps the rubbish into the corner." Of course, Jung's analysis, especially in regard to, "debris, unorganized fragments, holes, distortions, overlappings, infantilisms, and crudities which outdo the clumsiest attempts of primitive art and belie the traditional idea of skill," is a great way to describe the oftentimes captivating cinematic disaster that is Communion, which was not directed by the son of a degenerate artist mother and galley owner father for no reason. Additionally, it is no coincidence that the film references artistic works ranging from Giorgio de Chirico to Pollock to primitive African tribal art. Indeed, only a sick and self-destructive society with an apocalyptic death wish could glorify the infantile tribal expressions of negro savages or the glorified finger-painting of a Jewess-loving shabbos goy pricks like Pollock, just as only a troubled and disturbed world could produce mass delusions about little grey men that anally assault dumb hicks from the sticks. While I would love to believe, my cynicism tells me that Jung was probably right when he soundly speculated that the UFO phenomenon is largely the expression of post-religious Occidental man's disturbed collective unconscious. Either way, Communion is infinitely more entertaining than Spielberg's Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977) where Monsieur Truffaut makes contact with the most banally benign aliens of cinema history.

JOHAN - MON ÉTÉ 75

Philippe Vallois (1976)

As much as I hate to admit it, French fag filmmakers of the 1970s were some of the most aesthetically and thematically audacious auteur directors of their time as pissed off pansy poofs who used the artistic medium of film to disseminate an inately iconoclastic Weltanschauung, even making committed commies seem like nothing more than 'bobo' (aka bourgeois bohemians) posers in the process. Indeed, shit-stabbing filmmakers like Jacques Scandelari aka 'Marvin Merkins' (La philosophie dans le boudoir aka Beyond Love and Evil, New York City Inferno), Lionel Soukaz (Race d'Ep: un siècle d'images de l'homosexualité aka The Homosexual Century, Ixe), Philippe Vallois (Nous étions un seul homme aka We Were One Man, Haltéroflic aka Rainbow Serpent), and Stéphane Marti (La Cité des Neuf portes, Mira corpora) basically represented a celluloid army of flaming frog Rosa von Praunheims who concocted a uniquely unhinged homo universe of the cinematic sort that blurred the lines between art and pornography, fiction and nonfiction, and morality and immorality. Indeed, representing the quasi-commie cocksucking side of the counter-culture movement, queer filmmakers took a radically revolutionary stance to filmmaking that is totally at odds with the authoritarian bourgeois LGBT fag mainstream that has taken a monopoly over fagdom nowadays, with a film like Johan - Mon été 75 (1976) aka Johan, carnet intime homosexuel aka Journal intime homosexuel d'un été 75 aka Johan being the sort of Communist Manifesto of patently politically incorrect vintage French fag flicks, as a decidedly depraved piece of reflexive sodomite cinema of the quasi-Cinéma vérité sort featuring unsimulated sod sex and anal-fisting, sadomasochistic Nazi fetishism, glorification of brother-on-brother incest, interracial buggery, and a rather unflattering depiction of sexual introverts as promiscuous perverts who engage in 24-hour orgies in public bathhouses. A sort of debauched autobiographical docudrama/quasi-mockery and arthouse-porn flick set in Paris (and partially New York City) about auteur Philippe Vallois (who both plays himself, but is also depicted by no less than two other actors) as he longs for his eponymous imprisoned kleptomaniac boi toy 'Johan' so he engages in assorted, eclectic sexual affairs to find a substitute for Johan while waiting for said boi toy's release, Johan was essentially banned upon its release in 1976 due to its perverse pornographic imagery and has thus developed a sort of cult status since then despite the fact that few people had actually seen the film until relatively recently because, although the film was screened at the 1976 Cannes Film Festival, the French censors got a hold, butchered it, and the original negative was destroyed. A somewhat plot-less piece of excess-ridden aberrosexuality, Johan is like Godard meets Garrel meets a raunchy Jean Rouch as directed by Wakefield Poole's 'bottom brother' as a work that is as subversive in its direction as it is in its morality.

Paris-based filmmaker Philippe Vallois' boyfriend Johan—a cocksucking criminal who is quite keen on thievery, pathological lying, sexual promiscuity, and brother bugging—is in jail, so the auteur decides to fill his 'romantic' void by cruising for men who share his locked-up lover's apparently irreplaceable qualities. In fact, the filmmaker has the gall to write to his imprisoned boy toy, "Johan, the boy who will replace you in the film must be more than just beautiful and a dancer," but the filmmaker's search for savage sensuality will ultimately prove to be much less fruitful than he hoped it would be. When Philippe interviews the decidedly dimwitted twin brother of Johan in a gay sauna, the seemingly confused brother mumbles, "I only had sex with my twin. His name is Johan. He's in jail." Despite his absurdly obsessive love for Johan as demonstrated by comments he makes to his boy toy in letters like, "If you had been only a sex champion, I would have left you as I did the others," Philippe cannot seem to keep his trouser snake in his trousers, as if he is subconsciously tempted to sabotage his relationship so as to release him from his self-destructive prison of poof love. During his journey, Philippe candidly exposes the truly seedy hermetic homo realm that is the pre-AIDS international gay underground, proudly bragging regarding the advantages of being a cocksucker in an increasingly cosmopolitan world, "It is easy for a gay man to discover a new town. It is one of our advantages. We meet people. Gay bars, nightclubs, and finally the sauna where I stayed 24 hours until I was exhausted. The most hidden of my desires had been satisfied." And, indeed, as a raunchy rectum reamer of the innately insatiable sort, Philippe does not shy away from interracial buggery with an anonymous black buck, not to mention taking two fists in the ass (whilst he masturbates and drinks from a toilet bowl!) from a stranger that has covered his hands in Crisco. Phil also learns that regarding poppers, "it liberates a lot of people" and that a lot of sadomasochistic sodomites like to roleplay by dressing up as Gestapo dudes. Of course, being a sissy sod, Philippe is quite the sentimentalist as indicated by a nostalgic memory he wrote to Johan in a letter: "Do you remember the first time I had sex with you? We nearly didn't do it. I could not get an erection because my desire was too strong." As can be expected from two less than monogamous homosexuals, there is a certain innate darkness to Philippe and Johan's relationship as demonstrated by the filmmaker's words to his lover regarding a mutually shared STD, "Do you remember the gift you gave me or I gave you? We'll never know who was guilty...Personally, I think it was you." Despite its sometimes ominous undertones, Johan concludes on a joyous, campy, and—for lack of a better word—'gay' note with the eponymous non-hero being released from prison and being warmly greeted by Philippe and his entourage, which includes a blonde Nordic fag hag (who dreams of having a love child with poofs Philippe and Johan!) and a man with a perverted mustache dressed in drag as alpha-diva Maria Callas, a woman noted for being the gay intelligentsia's answer to Judy Garland, hence P.P. Pasolini's one-time cinematic collaboration with her.

If nothing else, Johan demonstrates how lame both gay culture and cinema have become since the film's initial release nearly 40 years ago, as a work that will probably offend contemporary politically correct poofers just as much as it would offend members of the Westboro Baptist Church. Indeed, Johan is the sort of unflinchingly depraved queer flick that laughs in the face of remarks like "God Hates Fags" as a work that takes pride in its almost demonic sexual sacrilege. In other words, Johan makes the art-porn flicks of Canadian poof Bruce LaBruce seem like the spasitic celluloid temper tantrums of a sexually abused gay toddler version of Jacques Derrida, even seeming like what might have passed through the deranged mind of frog philosopher Michel Foucault—a sexual sadist who intentionally infected unwitting partners with AIDS—as he took his last gasp whilst succumbing to gay cancer. A sort of artsy fartsy gay gonzo blue movie of the radically reflexive and embarrassingly autobiographical kind that ravages the 'fourth wall' so as to make the viewer squirm with abject disgust, Johan will ultimately appeal most to fans of auteur-pornographers like Jack Deveau (Drive, Left-Handed), Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool), and Peter De Rome (The Fire Island Kids, Adam & Yves) more than Criterion Collection-collecting fans of La Nouvelle Vague. In fact, French filmmaker/art-pornographer/film poster designer Jean-Étienne Siry (Et... Dieu créa les hommes aka And God Created Man, Un escargot dans la tête aka Snails in the Head), who penned the screenplay for Deveau's bizarre French blue movie flick Le musée (1976) aka Strictly Forbidden, has a small role in Johan, thus signifying the virtually nonexistent line between arthouse cinema and pornography in France during the 1970s. It should be noted that the uncensored version of Johan was assumed a number of decades ago, but luckily, as auteur Philippe Vallois revealed in a featurette included on a DVD release of the film, someone working at a French film archive discovered a reel with the label 'Johan' on it and of course the rest is history, with the revolutionary wanton work finally being available for viewing for the first time in a number of decades after being assumed to be lost for good. Part pseudo-documentary, part decidedly degenerate existentialist erotic confessional, part celluloid counter-culture artifact, and part arthouse work in the artful yet aimless spirit of Philippe Garrel's La Cicatrice Intérieure (1972) aka The Inner Scar, Johan is ultimately a collage of perversely poetic sexual pathology. Featuring, among other things, a mother's day celebrating Darby Crash look-alike and violent SS fetish photos, Johan is historical celluloid proof that there was a time when sodomy was synonymous with criminality. Indeed, Johan is probably one of the most flagrant examples of the Jean Genet school of filmmaking as a work that even makes Rainer Werner Fassbinder's swansong Querelle (1982) seem too bourgeois. In sum, Johan should be approached with the same caution as one might give while letting a crack-addled Detroit prostitute in their home.

WE WERE ONE MAN

The French (as well as the Dutch, British, etc.) typically hate Germans, which one can only assume is in part due to the fact that the frogs are a decidedly effete and cosmopolitan group of people who love to engage in puffery regarding their so-called “open-mindedness” while the krauts have always (or at least used to) put a premium on manliness, honor (hence why they effortlessly fucked up the rifle-droppers during the Second World War), and actually producing thoughtful and practical philosophers (as well as science, technology, music, etc.), so naturally a homosexual love story between males from each respective nation would make for an explosive and inevitably inauspicious affair. Indeed, such is the case in regard to queer fur licker Philippe Vallois’ – director of such Euro-homo classics as Johan – Mon été 75 (1976) and Haltéroflic (1983) aka Rainbow Serpent – intrinsically cockeyed cinematic tale of discordant gay love gone awry Nous étions un seul homme (1979) aka We Were One Man; a severely sordid and sometimes inexplicably sentimental melodrama where sodomite sadomasochism and German vs. French wartime hatred meet head on for the most shocking and sickening of consequences. The plot of We Were One Man is simple enough: Set during the final days of the Second World War, a half-retarded French farm boy with severe social and emotional problems and masochist tendencies discovers a blood-soaked blond beast not far from his homestead and seizes the opportunity to take the marred Aryan man home, thereupon resulting in the development of decisively deranged companionship between racial enemies that eventually devolves into barnyard butt-darting of the bellicose variety. As a sort of Brokeback Mountain (2005) meets François Truffaut’s Jules and Jim (1962) meets John Boorman’s Deliverance (1972), We Were One Man is not exactly the sort of fag flick that would be popular with modern gay audiences, but instead the sort of sadistic leather-fags of the 1970s that boxhead queen auteur Rosa von Praunheim warned the world about in his unintentionally side-splitting docudrama It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971). In other words, We Were One Man deserves recognition with such positively putrid and perverse celluloid cocksucker classics as Querelle (1982) directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Agustín Villaronga’s In a Glass Cage (1987) and The Sea (2000), Michael Stock’s Prinz in Hölleland (1993) aka Prince in Hell, and Frisk (1995) directed by Todd Verow.

One thing I noticed almost immediately about We Were One Man is it’s striking similarities with the audaciously aberrant Belgian arthouse flick Vase de Noces (1974) aka Wedding Trough aka The Pig Fucking Movie directed by Thierry Zéno. Aside from featuring a swarthy and scrawny anti-hero that spends his days and nights on the farm mentally degenerating into a vile creature who knows no restraint like Vase de Noces, We Were One Man also has a strange, foreboding, and ominous nightmarish quality to it that – despite being set largely during the sunny daylight hours – is all its own, which would also predominate in the more recent Walloon horror flick Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal directed by Fabrice Du Welz. French farm boy Guy Rouveron (Serge Avedikian) has some serious problems, the majority of which are the result of his brain-damaged mind and little does he realize when he discovers the Aryan ‘apple of his eye’ – a handsome soldier of Breker-esque strength and beauty – lying in the woods that his inner-turmoil will seem to triple. Rolf (played by Polish-born porn star Piotr Stanislas) is a stoic, strong, and restrained fellow whose father is a German officer and whose only male-to-male bonding experience was in the Hitler Youth and Wehrmacht – despite his apathy for the Third Reich – thus his by-chance acquaintance with Guy opens his eyes to the fact that not all men are secure in their masculinity and sense of self. Indeed, Guy battles with seeming schizophrenic illusions, memories of an unpleasant stay in a mental institution, and sexually servicing a girl that he does not love just so that she likes him and he can say he has a friend. Shortly after Guy rescues Rolf and nurses him back to health, the stoic German soldier attempts to leave, but his feeble-minded French admirer follows him like a scared puppy dog. Going so far as to chase the German soldier and declare that he is stronger than Rolf, Guy eventually gets the Nordic ‘deserter’ to cease to his demands, thereupon ushering in their tragic and ultimately brutal romance. As a seemingly paranoid schizzo who delusionally remarks to Rolf that, “I saw in your eyes that you hate me. I feel when people don’t like me. It doesn’t change, I’ve always been alone,” it is only a matter of time before Guy cracks, it is just a matter of how, when, and to what extent.

We Were One Man – although featuring a couple sentimental, if not quirky and queer, moments and a dimly lit expressionistic erotic scene – is fundamentally an unconventional character study about a severely demented and dangerous individual whose lack of sanity is never up for question. The title “We Were One Man” ultimately sums up the fact that Rolf – a real and confident man – enables Guy to feel like a “real man” by living vicariously through his masculinity. Needless to say, wacko gay boy Guy wants to keep Rolf all for his own and will do anything, including slaughtering a dog out of jealousy, to get what he wants. In his overall cock-sucking creepiness, grotesque gay guy Guy borders on a Dahmeresque level of depravity as a lonely individual who will stop at nothing ‘keep’ his buff beefcake; the man he always wish he could be. Indeed, We Were One Man is surely deserving of a cult audience and certainly comparable to the best works of Rosa von Praunheim, Todd Verow, Bruce LaBruce, and Marco Kreuzpaintner, and a work that totally transcends the ‘homosexual’ label in its inordinate and irksome idiosyncrasy. Naturally, We Were One Man does not make the case for gay equality, but then again director Philippe Vallois was not doing more humble homos any favors with his previous work Johan (1976) aka Johan – Mon été 75; a work featuring images of leder schwule sadomasochists adorned in swastika armbands and gestapo hats beating and mutilating one another, as well as twink twin-on-twin incest, on top of an unhealthy dose of outlandish and campy pornographic imagery. If you ever wondered how The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) might have turned out had it been a morbid melodrama set in rural France during the Second World War with a flaky, fruity, and feverish fag frog instead of cannibalistic inbred Texans as the playful predators, We Were One Man is probably your best bet.

DEAD CALM

Phillip Noyce (1989)

Having to be reminded of Billy Zane's psycho-spree dailies from a chance encounter with a mint VHS edition in the community thrift store, I set out to watch Dead Calm the day I bought, if not for Billy Zane, then surely for Sam Neill. As you know without my sentiments regarding the topic of Dr. Alan Grant, Neill has turned role after role into something intelligent and quasi-masculine, even archetypes that shouldn't drop machismo. From an insurance fraud investigator to paleontologist, Sam Neill chisels his own persona out of this generally "nerdy" classifications and brings a wit and charisma to even the most absent character given in a screen play. Dead Calm is further proof of this when John (Neill) is stranded on a sinking boat of a past crew that were slaughtered by an emotionally-imbalanced Billy Zane, who has now commandeered his vessel along with his wife and left him to die. As you can tell by my impromptu synopsis, this is a dame flick but one that does very little justice for their cries for sincerity.

Dead Calm was directed by Phillip Noyce, an Australian director known throughout for his espionage and politically charged suspense films and sadly, not for Dead Calm. Once sight breaks of an exhausted male figure adorned with a cowboy hat, Sam Neill uses his scarcely explained experience in nautical military action to navigate the "dingy" back to the ship from whence Hughie (Zane) came, even after the delirious stranger begs him not to go as all six crew members died of "food poisoning." Things turn for the worse, specifically for Jon, when he opens a sealed door and the crew floods in with their perky, bare breasts buoyant against the rushing seawater escaping; the focused subject of our voyeuristic perverted cameraman while he captures all the "action" necessary for the arousal of the more seasoned deviants of cinema.

To switch lanes completely and in such a juvenile manner, one of the reasons I found The Mist to be an excellent and effective survival-horror film might have had something to do with the harmonizing soundtrack. The quick and jarring operatic vocals in tune with the crashing waves within Dead Calm allow so much atmosphere to stick to what could just be another extra ordinary thriller with the acting talents of two of cinema's greatest leading men and a popular slut. One of Dead Calm's greatest aesthetic strengths is the music leaving much to be desired from the lonely, rocking sea. Noyce doesn't bring anything new to the table by representing our ocean mother with his existing character artistry. To personify the crashing waves and eerie emptiness might require someone who has more of a penchant for environmental manipulation and not just Harrison Ford agenda films. To spin back to the inclusion of a now-popular slut as the lead heroine, I'd like to take this otherwise simple film and tread it into even darker waters.

Many of you who have seen the film are aware of the sexual insanity of the later mark in which Rae is "seduced" by Hughie after many failed attempts at distracting him long enough to reverse the boat's direction. With hopes to save her husband from the ticking time-bomb that is a sinking ghost ship, she becomes distracted with his rippling pecs and abs and finds herself in a naked embrace on their bed. When the dog stumbles in the door and stares at her curiously, Kidman finds it in her female nature to attempt to get up with intentions to put the dog away. Hughie shushes her and scares the beast away, only for it to return moments later. As the dog stares, one could assume this as an ample opportunity to assist in leashing the hell hound and preventing the slaughter of Rae's good intentions. But as this is the movies and these films tend to carry nonfictional accounts of womanly behavior, she gives in to his pulsing libido as they form a passionate coupling. Edit this atrocious sex scene with snipes of Sam Neill fighting for his life and you got yourself a real buzz kill. Nice going, Rae. You singlehandedly killed your marriage and my respect for you.

Asides from the raw dog Straw Dogs approach to questionable lust, Dead Calm remains with a mood that the title properly instills. It's a slowly paced thriller, not one of thrilling segments involving high-velocity chase sequences, but rather a demented sociopath suffering all forms of mother issues as his sanity and true intentions slowly unfold. Nicole "Whore" Kidman brings together a nice early performance as a woman escaping from the memory of ejecting her son through the windshield in high volume traffic, probably as the result of texting her BFF. While this is never really looked back upon as the film picks up, Kidman plays the near exact role she did in Birthday Girl - quiet, melodramatic, and pretty stupid. Much of the film's frustrating moments come from either the asshole dog that you can't wait to be killed off or Kidman's inability to grab a knife or weapon. This is made increasingly agitating given that this isn't a hostage situation and the freedom Billy Zane allows her on the boat is overwhelming. Dead Calm is made possible on accounts of Billy Zane's wonderful performance and Sam Neill's persistence to save his wife who is busy bedding down with a serial killer. But hey, you can't tell me you wouldn't sleep with Billy Zane had you the chance.

Pier Giuseppe Murgia (1977)

Maladolescenza (Spielen Wir Liebe) is an extremely controversial film which was outright banned in many countries but is available with an X rating in Austria. Maladolescenza can be translated into adolescent malice and that does account for the plot. The film stars three children/teenagers who are in a bizarre love triangle. Laura is madly in love with Fabrizio. He lives in the forest behind her family's loft. She spends her summer afternoons exploring with Fabrizio on mountains and in caves. Some of the scenery is magnificent such as the "Ice Palace" which is truly a remarkable natural creation. Fabrizio is the kind of guy who likes it rough as we see in several heartbreaking scenes where he proudly humiliates Laura and makes her cry. It starts out innocent enough but then gets deadly. Sicking his German Shepard and tying her on the ground for a snake is only the beginning. Fabrizio completes his ritual of degradation and humiliation by taking her virginity in the ice palace. Shocked and confused, Laura doesn't know what to make of how much Fabrizio has changed. He begins to use her sexually until they meet Sylvia. Sylvia is the perfect example of a Barbie doll. Blond hair and blue eyes, she is a bitch in all forms whether or not her soul exists. She begins to join in this games with Fabrizio in one graphic scene where they shoot a blackbird with many arrows. The legitimacy of this scene can be argued but it looks very real. They torture Laura emotionally and have sex in front of her just to see her embarrassment and watch her heart break. No matter what happens in this film, nothing will prepare you for the ending. This film is highly frowned upon due to its child pornographic content, but if you look past all of the moral issues at hand, you will see a wonderful character study and a heartbreaking story of true love and puberty. Fabrizio's character is the most peculiar. He lives in the forest almost Peter Pan style, never wanting to grow old. You see an outer shell of malice and venom but in several scenes, we question his motives as he watches Laura's house while she sleeps. We never really understand why he treats her with such cruelty when it is obviously a mutual love between them. After making this film, Martin Loeb's (Fabrizio) career was ruined and was instantly black listed while Eva Lonesco became a star and has continued to make films. The film has a hypnotic children's theme which roots sound tribal-like and features distorted whistles to capture the menace of the dog. The characters can almost be traced on Jodorowsky's Fando Y Lis. Such captivating qualities possess each individual character. I can understand why this Lolita-esque film is under such fire to this day. It's hard being a parent and seeing what your child could be up to. Such innocence is not easy to watch be corrupted. A film that captures your attention instantly. It not only lives up to its horrid hype but is a wonderful film that clearly shows the line between art and pornography. Never before has a film captured the evil of hormones frozen in an angelic state depicted by the youth of the damned.

MAMMA ROMA
MAMMA ROMA

Pier Paolo Pasolini (1962) Mamma Roma is an Italian film written and directed by philosopher, linguist, novelist, playwright, filmmaker, newspaper and magazine columnist, actor, painter and political figure Pier Paolo Pasolini (March 5, 1922 – November 2, 1975). It came out in 1962 when World War II was still fresh in the mind of Italians and other Europeans. Mamma Roma follows the lives of a middle aged prostitute and her 16 year old son. They live in a poor area of Italy surrounded with pimps, prostitutes, and thieves. Essentially its about a single mother that is doing all she can just to support herself and her son.

Throughout the film, no one can be trusted. Mother and son truly only have each other. The son is beaten up by a gang of people that were supposed to be friends. He is also lead on and humiliated by a girl with a bad reputation. When the son finally makes friends with a group of boys, they end up being criminals that lead him into a life of theft. Eventually he is caught and imprisoned. While he's incarcerated he becomes ill and eventually dies. His poor Mother has nothing left afterwards.

Writer and director Pasolini was a Marxist and many of his films dealt with proletarians. Mamma Roma exposed that in Capitalist Italy the poor faced a life of alienation, unemployment, economic instability, and crime. People could barely live on a day to day basis without being the victim or victimizer of a crime.

Pasolini mainly casted nonactors in Mamma Roma to give it a more realistic (bordering on cinéma vérité) feel. Throughout the film the characters seemed authentic and almost documentary like. Mamma Roma is rich in a culture that is not very often exposed. Pasolini was able to give the proletarians a voice through cinema. I believe that cinema is the most effective way to get a glimpse into culture (without actually around culture) when done correctly. Pasolini was able to accomplish this due to the films realism. I'm personally against Marxism and can consider Mamma Roma among one of my favorite films. It has captured a time in history that has long past.

Communication in Mamma Roma can be unpleasant at times. Even friends turn on you in the end. Pasolini, being a Marxist and Collectivist sees Capitalism and Individualism as being deterioration of the exploited proletarian. In a world such as this, communication can be very unpredictable. Friends are constantly lying to you while talking to them. People can turn their back on you when you least expect it. Communication in poverty stricken Italy becomes completely unreliable. When communication becomes unreliable in a society, it starts to crumble. For the Mother and Son in Mamma Roma, they lose each other and everything else.

Pasolini was able to capture a varying types of communication. Whether it be the communication of dominance in a fight or men inquiring prostitutes, it generally resulted negatively. Pasolini had his own political views which influenced a lot of the negative types of communication in a Capitalist society. Despite the political agenda, I felt that Mamma Roma gave me a sense of a culturally rich ancient society. Very few films have impacted me. It has inspired me to watch more Italian films and a variety of films from around the world. When watching a foreign film, you feel like you are missing out on a part of the world. I at least felt that a culture was communicated to me after viewing Mamma Roma.

Pier Paolo Pasolini (1968)

While with his prophetically scandalous cinematic swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), Italian Renaissance man Pier Paolo Pasolini (Accattone, The Hawks and the Sparrows) decided to show EVERYTHING, including such savory scenarios as stark-naked crying girls reluctantly devouring literal fascist feces and the scalping of nice aristocratic boys by sinister sodomite stormtroopers, the auteur exposed virtually nothing, at least graphically speaking, in his film Theorem (1968) aka Teorema – a work that wallows in ambiguity and features next to nil nudity, and was promoted with the tempting tagline: “There are only 923 words spoken in “Teorema” - but it says everything!” In fact, the film’s title, which means “Theorem” in Italian, gives a rather obvious hint to Pasolini’s experimental styles with the film as an active practice of his own film theories in a work that has baffled viewers both due its arcane aesthetic and thematic nature and its ostensibly radical, revolutionary anti-bourgeois and anti-Vatican message. In fact, Teorema sparked so much confusion that it earned a special award at the Venice Film Festival from the International Catholic Film Office, only for the prize to be absurdly taken away when the Vatican complained. Indeed, a film about a mysterious “being” played by Terence Stamp—an English actor who has made a singular career playing sinisterly suave villains—who comes as a guest to the lavish, if not lifeless, home of a bourgeois Milanese family and buggers each member senselessly to the point of abject infatuation, including the somber Sicilian maid, only to leave them high and dry after bringing a wild spark into their lonely lives and thereupon resulting in the most extreme and unforeseeable consequences, it is no surprise that Teorema disconcerted a number of rather critical viewers, not least of all the upper echelons of the Catholic church, but that was Pasolini’s genius as a lifelong Marxist who surely was not a slogan-slinging, cardboard communist. A character not modeled after Jesus Christ as often assumed, Pasolini stated of Stamp as a mysterious guest: “Originally, I intended this visitor to be a fertility god, the typical god of preindustrial religion, the sun-god, the Biblical god, God the Father. Naturally, when confronted with things as they were, I had to abandon my original idea and so I made Terence Stamp into a generically ultraterrestrial and metaphysical apparition: he could be the Devil, or a mixture of God and the Devil. The important thing is that he is something authentic and unstoppable,” and “It is an Old Testament, not a New Testament, visitor.” If anything is for sure about the vivacious and sexually virile visitor, it is that he is better at persuading with his hands than with his mouth, which makes him the most holy of hustlers and a true prophet of the Pasolinian realm.

Things dramatically change for a banal bourgeois family when a handsome, humble, and hypnotic visitor shows up and reveals through his gentle touch and lecherous love that one must actually 'live' for life to be worth living, thus abandoning material possessions and social mores for embracing one's true erotic and emotional proclivities. In his first miraculous act, the visitor saves the family's melancholy maid Emilia (1970s 'Marxist diva' Laura Betti, who apparently was more involved in 'directing' Stamp than Pasolini) from suicide, for which she repays him with serene and sensual sins of the flesh. From there, the visitor works his way up to fornicating with every member of the mundane middle-class family, despite age and sex. Naturally, considering he is bunking with the teenage son of the family, Pietro (Andrés José Cruz Soublette), the Visitor sleeps with the passive prodigal son first. After becoming sexually aroused by the Visitor's chic fashion sense and fetishistically caressing a pair of his pants, the mother of the house, Lucia ("Miss Rome" 1946 Silvana Mangano, who Stamp admitted was the first woman to give him a 'wet dream' as a little lad), strips off her clothes and lures the stranger in for sensual pleasure, for which he naturally abides. When the father of the home, Paolo (Massimo Girotti, whose acting career spanned seven decades)—a factory owner with a number of disgruntled workers—falls ill from an unexplained ailment of the bedridden sort, the Visitor heals him through his mere touch by wrapping the sick man's legs around his neck in a symbolic scene of ritualistic homoeroticism that actor Terrence Stamp stated of some twenty years after his performance in Teorema, "I did not then realize that the position in which I held him, with his [clothed] legs up on my shoulders, around my neck, was one used by homosexuals in intercourse." Last, but certainly not least, the Visitor makes passionate love to the initially awkward teenage daughter of the house, Odetta (played by Princess Anne Wiazemsky, the then-wife of Jean-Luc Godard), who finally overcomes her fear of man and electro-complex-like infatuation with her father. While the Visitor saves the life of the maid, inspires individuality and artistic expression in the son, gives pleasure and emotional support to the lonely and sexually repressed mother, saves the life of the sick father in both a biological and metaphysical fashion, and makes a woman of the once-oversensitive daughter, things take a rather dramatic turn for the worse when the Visitor must leave just as casually and understatedly as he came.

In the end of Teorema, the son is a degenerate self-loathing artist who paints a canvas merely blue and subsequently urinates on it, the daughter enters a tragic comatose state, the mother becomes a militant cougar who hunts and beds young heterosexual twink prey, and the father gives away his factory business and strips off all of his clothes (and, in turn, he entire identity) at a train station (Milan Central Station) that Mussolini built and screams like a wounded animal on the brink of a horrific death. More interestingly and inexplicably, the maid Emilia, as an intuitive peasant who is lacking when it comes to the intellect, achieves a sort of sainthood that involves her hair turning green, becomes virtually mute and begins to eat raw nettles, levitates over a farmhouse in front of adoring peasants, and is lastly buried in the earth by a old peasant woman where she can weep for the world in the soil. As a card-carrying communist, director Paolo Pasolini was probably well aware that the Freudian-inspired sexualization of the public, as advocated by Judeo-Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky and Frankfurt school intellectuals like Herbert "Father of the New Left" Marcuse, was used as a technique to destroy the infrastructure and moral fabric of a society and in Teorema he cinematically carried out such a then-provocative scenario to almost supernatural extremes, albeit with a conspicuously and idiosyncratically Catholic bend. While on the set of Teorema in San Angelo Lodigiano, Pasolini even had the audacity to admit to an interviewer regarding the work, "this is the first film I have shot in a bourgeois milieu with bourgeois characters. Until now, I have never done this because I could not bear to have to live with people I could not stand for months on end, fixing the script and then shooting the film." Although Pasolini's all-consuming commie-sodomite-Catholic hatred of the bourgeois boobs was rather seething, he did admit regarding the characters in Teorema, "I chose people who were not particularly odious, people who elicited a certainly sympathy—they are typical of the bourgeoisie, but not the very worst bourgeoisie," even if he inevitably ruins these characters' lives in the process.

Ultimately, it seems like Pasolini's greatest fantasy for Teorema was having a British bad boy invade people's beds—something the director indubitably probably wanted to experience firsthand himself—as a suave savior of sodomy, quite literally bugging away the bourgeoisie in a one-cock revolution of the semi-spiritual and seemingly quasi-Satanic. As for Stamp himself, he would describe Pasolini in a somewhat recent interview featured on the 2007 BFI DVD release of Teorema as an intellectual failure of sorts, whose "philosophies went nowhere" in the long run. Additionally, in the same interview, Stamp described how he "never received a penny" for his iconic role in Teorema, stating rather unflatteringly of Pasolini, "He may have been a left-wing communist in theory but in reality he was looking after number one." Still, Stamp's 'free' performance was ultimately worth it as it would prove to be one of the most interesting and stand-out roles of his career, even if he speaks next to no words. The second film in Pier Paolo Pasolini's "Mythical Cycle," Teorema proved to be an unholy yet strikingly spiritually mismatched marriage between communism and catholic sentiments, which has enabled his films to better stand the test of time than many of his leftist compatriots, whose totally materialistic philosophies and dreams of a Marxist society have drastically devolved (which is saying a lot!) into the brain-dead, Hollywood and MTV-spoon-fed form they take today. Ironically, the bourgeoisie of today—with its middle-class cultural marxism, perverse proclivities towards xenophilia and miscegenation, feminism and LGBT lunacy, and other stamps of cultural decay—is far more decadent and degenerate than that of the family in Pasolini's Teorema. After all, I am sure Pasolini himself would have been sickened by the 'bourgeois buggerer' idea of gay marriage as it would have offended both his respect for Catholicism and his Marxist sensibilities as someone who wanted to subvert the middle-class and not the banalization of his own subversive sexual subculture. Indeed, times have certainly changed when a once-revolutionary work like Teorema seems rather tame.

Pier Paolo Pasolini (1969)

While cinematic cannibalism in Italy is almost solely associated with the so-called “cannibal boom” that lasted roughly from 1977 to 1981 and sired exquisitely exploitative films like Ruggero Deodato’s Cannibal Holocaust (1980) and Umberto Lenzi’s Cannibal Ferox (1981) aka Make Them Die Slowly, Guido poet/polymath Pier Paolo Pasolini (The Gospel According to Matthew, Teorema) preceded his less cultivated countrymen by almost a decade with his highly ambitious and somewhat impenetrable flick Porcile (1969) aka Pigsty – an intrinsically anti-capitalist and anti-fascist celluloid work submersed in semiotic scatology that centers on such taboo topics as man-on-pig bestiality, patricide, and cannibalism, among various other decidedly deplorable things that are not typically featured in arthouse films. Considered by many to be his most complex and arcane cinematic effort, Pigsty was naturally met with disapproval by discombobulated audiences during its ill-fated screening in Venice and Pasolini responded to the hopelessly confused with the following description, “To understand the film you have to have more heart than head (better yet, if there is head used so much the better): because there is to understand the desperate story of a sinner who makes of his sin his sanctity...there is to understand the ambiguous and dramatic relationship between the old capitalism and the new which concludes, even if in the tones of an almost contemplative poem, with a condemnation of them both.” Essentially two films in one (in fact, both segments originally had separate names: “Orgia” and “Porcile”), Pigsty features a dichotomous depiction of two strikingly different but thematically connected times – the first segment portraying a medieval Italian vagabond man who discovers war, battle, cannibalism, and anarchy, and the second segment portraying a fiendishly fetishistic ex-Nazi family who are now wealthy industrialists – the film manages to be part excess-ridden epic poem and part sardonic satire where shit and swine become subversive symbols of the Fatherland during the post-Nazi era of the Wirtschaftswunder (“economic miracle”). A virtual father film to his exceedingly subversive and excess and excrement-ridden, scatological cinematic swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), minus the grotesque imagery, Pigsty was Pasolini’s first attempt to “crystallize horror. To make a Petrarchan sonnet on a theme from Lautréamont” and “making the cinema aristocratic: unconsumable,” which is quite ironic for a self-proclaimed Marxist who vied for a classless collectivist society and wanted to appeal to the mindless masses (which he inevitably did with his mass culture “Trilogy of Life”). With an incriminating (Pasolini has admitted his identification with the medieval cannibal that spouts the words) tagline like, “I killed my father, I ate human flesh and I quiver with joy,” Pigsty makes for quite a potent and pessimistic work that portrays a new sort of era (as well as the “new beginning” of the old one that preceded it) following the destruction of Italy in Europa during the Second World War where ex-Nazis have now taken on the irredeemable role of their former enemy, the capitalistic Jew, as rampant materialists who cannibalize and defecate their own history and national kultur, thus committing fratricide against the Fatherland and the old perennial kultur that originally held it together.

In the first segment of Pigsty, the viewer is introduced to a destitute barbarian man (French actor Pierre Clémenti, who worked with Visconti, Buñuel, Bertolucci, Makavejev, and Cavani, among other countless great auteurs) who desperately tries to survive on infertile land around a volcano (the actor would later reprise the role of an unclad character who hangs around volcanoes in Philippe Garrel's The Inner Scar (1972) aka La cicatrice intérieure). After coming upon a battlefield featuring corpses and archaic weaponry, the unnamed man picks up a rifle and helmet and eventually comes across a soldier he stoically slays during a moment of potential mercy, thus beginning his personal war of anarchy against the state. Clearly a hungry fellow who is tired of dining on grass and snakes, the bloodlusting warrior decapitates and devours his enemy and, not long after, a goofy cannibal (Pasolini's protégé Franco Citti) comes by and joins in. Naturally, the two anarchistic anthropophagites become comrades in arms and slaughter another group of men and take a woman as a slave, thus forming a cannibalistic tribe that continues to slaughter any group of people that has the misfortune of crossing their pernicious path. After a man escapes from the bloodthirsty brutality of the cannibal crew, he notifies the local Christian law enforcement, thereupon inevitably resulting in their capture and a judicial trial where the two hedonistic head-hunters are condemned to death. While the cannibal played by baked Citti meekly begs for forgiveness before the Christian cross in a most groveling manner, the ferocious flesh-eater played by Clémenti continuously repeats, "I killed my father, I ate human flesh and I quiver with joy," while in a trance-like state as he bravely accepts death. Of course, both beasts of prey become prey of beasts as a result of their ravenous escapades, thus concluding the first segment of Pigsty. As director Pasolini wrote himself regarding the anthropophaginian anti-hero, "I identify in part with the character of Pierre Clémenti (apocalyptic anarchy, and—let us say—total contestation in the existential plane)."

The second segment of Pigsty, as written by Pasolini, "takes place in the industrialized part of Germany, at Godesberg, near Cologne, which is where Adenauer used to live, in the villa of a big German industrialist like Krupp, say—one of the old industrial families." Pathologically perverse protagonist Julian (French actor Jean-Pierre Léaud, who is best known for playing François Truffaut's filmic alter-ego "Antoine Doinel") is the son of a flagrantly evil ex-Nazi industrialist with an anachronistic Uncle Adolf mustache named Signor Klotz (Alberto Lionello). Julian is a passive nihilist and cowardly cuckold of sorts who has next to nil interest in politics, business, or women, but he likes flying kites as an intrinsically immature 'mensch' who engages in infantile escapism, yet most of all, he loves riding dirty in his father's pigpen as a pathological pig porker, but no one knows about his swinish secret. Although he has no interest in touching her, Julian has a leftist girlfriend named Ida (played by Anne Wiazemsky, who also starred in Pasolini's Teorema) who futilely attempts to get her beau involved in revolutionary politics as a member of the 1968 German student movement. After finally confessing his subversive vice for swine, Julian falls into a catatonic state and Ida and the boy's mother (Margherita Lozano) try to figure out the source of his sickness and seemingly split-personality. Meanwhile, Julian's father explains to his wife while in bed that, "The days of Grosz and Brecht aren't over...I could have been drawn by Grosz in the form of a sad pig," but the industrialist's fears are in vain as he essentially has nothing to worry about because, aside from kraut commie artists George Grosz and Bertolt Brecht being dead, the wealthy degenerate can sleep safely knowing, as he says himself, "Germany!...What a capacity to digest!...And what a capacity to defecate!...Nobody more than us Germans!...Over the heart of our Puritan sons!"

Indeed, while Mr. Klotz devours Teutonic kultur (filling his majestic mansion with antique furniture and renaissance paintings) and industry, his son stands by passively and sexually services swine. When not playing an angelic rendition of Horst-Wessel-Lied (the co-national anthem of the Third Reich) on his antique harp, Signor Klotz confides in his slavish servant Hans Günther (played by Italian auteur Marco Ferreri), a name most likely in reference to real-life National Socialist eugenicist Hans F. K. Günther, and verbally battles his arch-enemy Herdhitze – the pseudonym of a man whose real surname is Hirt and who gassed tons of Jews and collected the skulls of "Bolshevik Jew commissars" during the Second World and received "plastic surgery, Italian style" to hide his true identity. After making a toast to "Jews and Pigs," Klotz and Hirt-Herdhitze decide that their mutual blackmail schemes against each other cancel each other out, thus they agree to merge their industrial empires (a scene Pasolini stated was a reference to the merger of Montecatini chemical works and Edison electric company, which resulted in the first big Italian industrial conglomerate). After awakening like a somnambulist, Julian enters the pigsty for the final time and not long after, Signor Klotz and his compatriots get the news from a group of refined proletarians that the sole male heir to the Klotz empire has been slopped up by swine, but are told to speak, "not a word to a soul" about the young man's death-by-sow as passive and silent spectators of history. As Pasolini wrote, "I identify also with Jean-Pierre Léaud (eaten by the pigs, cannibalized rather than a cannibal)—ambiguity, fleeting identity, and everything which the boy says in that long monologue to his girl friend who then leaves."

Although seemingly anti-Teutonic in persuasion, Pigsty was described by Pasolini as follows: "The explicit political content of the film has its subject, as its historical situation, Germany. But the film is not about Germany, but about the ambiguous relationship of old and new capitalism. Germany was chosen as a way to illustrate a case. The implicit political content of the film, instead, is a desperate mistrust of all historical societies: Thus it is a film of apocalyptic anarchism." In a sense, Pigsty is Pasolini's "2001: A Space Odyssey" in that, aside from being rather arcane and exceedingly enigmatic like Kubrick's epic sci-fi masterpiece, it chronicles the (de)evolution of humanity from a cannibalistic anarchic savage to a meticulous and materialistic murderer of the authoritarian kind who has assembled an industrial line form of death and cultural destruction. Of course, where Kubrick arguably hints at a "great new beginning" for mankind with the star-child featured at the conclusion of 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968), Pasolini foresees a deleterious post-cultural dystopia where man eats man via technological industry and quite figuratively shits him out. In fact, the poet wrote the following regarding the meaning of the film: "The simplified message of the film is this: society, every society, devours both its disobedient sons and the sons who are neither obedient nor disobedient. The sons must be obedient, and that's that..." Of course, as someone whose father, Carlo Alberto Pasolini, saved the life of Benito Mussolini in 1926 when 15-year-old anarchist Anteo Zamboni's attempted to assassinate the Duce and thus incidentally securing the fascist reign for nearly two more decades, gay Marxist Pasolini was most certainly a disobedient son, yet, quite ironically, it would be his Republican partisan brother Guido who was killed by a bunch of cannibalistic Communists. Before he was executed, Guido Pasolini apparently shouted to his commie captors, "the only justice Communists knew was a bullet in the back of the head." It seems that Pier Paolo Pasolini was in denial about the fact that the political persuasion he actively promoted for what would be most of his life was responsible for more death and destruction during the the 20th Century than both fascism and capitalism combined, as well as the "horrible universe" he wrote of, but, of course, while communism has essentially collapsed in Europe, the sort of culture-distorting cannibalistic capitalism the director esoterically depicted in Pigsty has only gotten all the more piggish. In short, where is Pasolini we need him?!

Pier Paolo Pasolini (1970)

For all of my cinephiliac life, I have been pondering whether or not I think Danish auteur Lars von Trier (Europa, Melancholia)—undoubtedly one of the most interesting and relatively original filmmakers of the post-Fassbinder age—is a great artist, determined dilettante, and/or a downright fraud that simply thrives on trolling in a super sophisticated way and not much more. While I find that Howard Hampton tends to be an obnoxious writer that is oftentimes absurdly wrong, if not downright delusional, in his assertions, I could not help but agree with him when he argued in an essay featured in the writing compilation Born in Flames: Termite Dreams, Dialectical Fairy Tales, and Pop Apocalypses (2007) that, “There’s something about Lars von Trier’s prodigiously assured films that elicits indignation, as though their labyrinthine descents into the undermined of movie history were affronts to the sanctity of cinema itself.” Indeed, there’s oftentimes something unbearably insufferable about von Trier’s seemingly ambivalent, if not autistic, cinemania, as if the auteur enjoys nothing more than giving himself—and only himself—an extravagant masturbatory massage to his own cinephilia while presuming the viewer is just not on his passive-aggressively megalomaniacal level, but this is not the only problem with much of his work. After all, with his various patently pretentious manifesto/declarations—most of which are a rather loathsome combination of pretension and utter meaninglessness—and curiously drastic changes in style, it is hard not to assume that von Trier is terribly bored with cinema and that he is now mainly just engaging in a self-satisfying game of covert cinematic onanism and that he does not even take his own work that seriously, hence my suspicion that much of what he does is, at best, artistically prestigious displays of trolling and, at worst, completely emotionally counterfeit con-jobs. While von Trier even demonstrated a certain aesthetic aptitude as a child with shorts like Why Try to Escape from Which You Know You Can’t Escape from? Because You Are a Coward (1970)—a film that briefly appears in The House That Jack Built in a somewhat cryptic (and ultimately incriminating) fashion that connects the auteur’s childhood to that of the eponymous serial killer—his Weltanschauung has always been weak, shallow, and seemingly disingenuous, as if it would be too much of a struggle for the auteur to reveal anything about himself aside from being a morbidly depressed degenerate that makes superficial (meta)political statements because he lacks the capacity to commit to anything aside from acting like a little twat.

If I were to judge Herr von Trier on his latest feature The House That Jack Built (2018)—a mostly sorry Socratic serial killer flick where the auteur merely rehashes his old tricks and does for the art of murder what he did for sex in NYMPHOMANIAC (2013), albeit to a noticeably considerably less ambitious degree—I would certainly have to go with artistic fraud. After all, von Trier, who was clearly spiritually castrated after his ostensibly infamous 2011 Cannes press conference incident where he made some benign Nazi jokes, even decided to sell his soul to promote the film by following the insipid script of the Hollywood mainstream and declaring without even the slightest hint of irony, “THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT celebrates the idea that life is evil and soulless, which is sadly proven by the recent rise of the Homo trumpus – the rat king.” While Trump has certainly proved himself to be a Zionist shabbos goy stooge of sorts that talks big yet not has accomplished a single one of the nationalistic promises he originally campaigned on, von Trier, in his clear political retardation, has clearly revealed he is completely drunk on the cashmere commie Kool-Aid by expressing sentiments worthy of dumb twats like Alyssa Milano despite once being the provocative enfant terrible that directed truly subversive films like Manderlay (2005), which does a brilliant job exposing the hyper hypocrisy, racial fetishism, and disgusting disingenuous of white leftist women like Milano. In that sense, von Trier is undoubtedly more like Trump than he would like to think as they are both supreme bullshitters that talk big but really have no strong principles aside from stroking their own ludicrously inflated egos. Of course, whereas Trump has the insipid spirit of a fat fuck drag queen, von Trier is like a depressed emo girl that just wishes her parents would at least notice the superficial wounds on her wrist from another failed phony suicide attempt. Rather intriguingly, even when he still wrongly believed that he was Jewish during the early part of his filmmaking career, von Trier dared to depict a Nazi in a sympathetic light in Befrielsesbilleder (1982) aka Images of Liberation, thus one has to question his motivations which seem to be nothing more than a childish desire to provoke as if he has a pathological self-destructive need to be a twat. Featuring totally tasteless torture porn scenes that are clearly a cheap immature attempt by the auteur at shock value (when he’s already done much more maturely shocking scenes in previous films), crappy CGI imagery worthy of some shitty C grade video game, Elvis Presley’s borderline homely granddaughter having her tits chopped off, and von Trier arguably revealing his own petty resentment of handsome masculine American men by having Matt Dillon portraying a psychopathic serial killer (while also arguably attempting to live vicariously through said character despite his typical tendency towards living vicariously through bat-shit-crazy female characters, hence why the film does not work), The House That Jack Built is ultimately a pointless film where the auteur tries in vain to attempt to say about life and its supposed evil banality what Emil Cioran already said more intelligently and elegantly many decades before. Of course, I have other reasons for thinking the film is an exceedingly empty piece of shit that cannot be saved by the shock of butchered tits and dead children, as I have been recently revisiting von Trier’s earlier films and cannot help but notice the difference in terms of aesthetic maturity back when the filmmaker had more of a legitimate reason to consider himself the cinematic heir of fellow Danish auteur Carl Theodor Dreyer.

In fact, von Trier was so arrogant about seeing himself as a sort of new Dreyer that he once dared to cinematically adapt the master auteur's unused screenplay adaptation of Euripides' play Medea, thereupon forever linking himself to his artistically superior cinematic countryman. Luckily (and somewhat surprising), the film is one of the filmmaker's soberest and most aesthetically alluring, ambitious, and successfully experimental cinematic works to date, as if even a total troll like von Trier realized it would be nothing short of cinematic sacrilege to defile Dreyer with his typical masturbatory digressions and apathetic cinephiliac references. In fact, Medea (1988) looks, in many ways, as old as the long-dead director that inspired it despite being plagued by an anachronism or two in regard to the wardrobe, as if the film was recently discovered in an ancient bottle on some remote island for future generations to discover. As to why the film has such a distinct 'timeless' quality that seems to even transcend cinema history, Jack Stevenson explained in his book Lars Von Trier (2002) in regard to the auteur's filmmaking method, "He shot the film on ¾-inch video tape, readjusted color and light, transferred it to 35mm film and then copied it back to 1-inch video tape. The result of this laborious experimental process was a train of images that seemed on the verge of dissolving in murk and graininess. The classic dialogue, sounding a bit inappropriate in Danish, was then laid on post-sync." Aside from the somehow strangely enthralling Boardinghouse (1982)—supposedly the first shot-on-video horror flick ever made—I cannot think of many films that were shot on archaic video and then blown up to 35mm film, but somehow von Trier manages to make this work as Medea, quite unlike the director's Dogme 95 flicks, looks more ancient and archetypal than artificial and artless.

While it is no surprise that von Trier wanted to pay tribute to Dreyer—his nation's unequivocal cinematic master and a filmmaker that he has routinely quoted throughout his career—the genesis of the film is somewhat less personal. Originally planned by the Danish TV channel DR-TV in 1985 as a fairly normal adaptation of Euripides' play, von Trier did not even get involved in the project until after the original director Søren Iversen quit the production and the auteur was offered the project. Of course, von Trier completely changed the project and basically started from scratch, or as Stevenson explained, "Instead of faithfully adapting Euripides' tragedy for the screen, he chose to use Carl Th. Dreyer's script of the same name which the director had written in 1965-6 but had never found financing for. Dreyer's script was not a straightforward adaptation of Euripides' play, but rather an attempt to re-create the original story which might have inspired Euripides. Von Trier's film, in turn, as he states in the prologue, was not an attempt to make Dreyer's film, but rather was his personal interpretation of the manuscript. In any case, MEDEA was not purely based on von Trier's own material, and this was exceptional." Undoubtedly, von Trier's film is about as far away from The House That Jack Built as far as artistic and ideological purity is concerned as it mostly rings emotionally true, does not wallow in the provocative for provocative's sake, and arguably has the most seemingly organic and timeless aesthetic of all of the auteur's films. Despite this, the film received mixed reviews (that leaned towards the majority being negative) from Danish film critics and von Trier has himself criticized various aspects of the film. Indeed, only Danish filmmaker and film scholar Christian Braad Thomsen—a personal friend of Rainer Werner Fassbinder that has paid tribute to his cocksucking kraut comrade with both a great book and documentary—seems to have realized the film's virtual genius.

Notably, von Trier had nil interest in Euripides' play and was merely obsessed with paying tribute to his filmic forefather, or as the auteur explained to Stig Björkman in Trier on von Trier (1999), "The subject didn't fascinate me at all! I've never been interested in classical drama. I was more interested that it was something Dreyer had been involved with." Yet, according to Jonathan Rosenbaum—one of the few American film critics worth reading—von Trier's film is far from an even remotely faithful adaptation. Indeed, as Rosenbaum explained in a brief September 1997 review, "Pay no attention to the claims that this 1988 Danish video feature by Lars von Trier (BREAKING THE WAVES) is a faithful or even remotely respectful realization of the late Carl Dreyer's unrealized script, cowritten by poet Preben Thomsen. For starters, the Dreyer script, based only loosely on the Euripides tragedy, features a chorus that is omitted here, its lines grotesquely converted into printed titles when they aren't simply dropped; many of Dreyer's scenes are eliminated, scrambled, or placed elsewhere in the overall continuity, and some of von Trier's scenes and sequences are strictly his own invention. That said, this is well worth seeing as a visually inventive and highly dramatic version of the Medea story, with strong performances by Kirsten Olesen and Udo Kier. In some respects it's as striking as anything von Trier has done, but Dreyer could never have accepted this florid piece of showmanship as even a remote approximation of his intentions." While Rosenbaum review is mostly favorable, he would later take a much harsher view of the film in his anti-Trier/anti-Trump diatribe "Sad!": Why I Won't Watch Antichrist featured in the compilation Unwatchable (2019) where he somewhat venomously argues, "...my opinion of the filmmaker himself steadily plummeted as I saw the postmodernist hash he was making out of my favorite filmmaker (and his alleged role model) Carl Dreyer [...] MEDEA claims to be based on Dreyer and Preben Thomsen's unrealized screenplay adapting the Euripides tragedy, but reading the Dreyer text is all that's needed to expose von Trier as something of a con artist." Of course, to truly respect von Trier as he really is and not have any deluded expectations, one must accept that he is a sneering con artist, albeit a very talented and aesthetically enterprising one who, rather unfortunately, is unquestionably one of the most interesting filmmakers working today. Undoubtedly, Medea is arguably most notable in that one forgets while watching it that it was directed by film history's foremost #1 troll, so it does not surprise me that von Trier himself is not fond of the flick, as if it pains him to be reminded that he exposed too much of himself by not succumbing to the temptation towards shock value and dark irony.

Although Rosenbaum complains that von Trier excised a supposed 'radical feminist' subtext from Dreyer's script, it would be absurdly deluded to somehow see von Trier as more 'right wing' than Dreyer. After all, despite directing subversive cinematic works like Michael (1924)—a silent film with fairly blatant gay themes—and having a troubled childhood as the adopted bastard son of a Scanian maid that he never got to know, Dreyer was a lifelong right-winger that once stated, "Even when I was with Eksrabladet, I was conservative...I don't believe in revolutions. They have, as a rule, the tedious quality of pulling development back. I believe more in evolution, in the small advances." As the product of insanely deluded commie nudists, including a Jewish (step)father and self-described "whore" mother that let him do whatever he wanted to as a kid, von Trier hardly received any discipline as a child, let alone, a sort of traditional pre-counterculture Danish upbringing involving Christian teachings and a traditional upbringing, so it is only natural that he would dedicate his filmmaking career to virtually 'acting out' like a debauched problem child that, not matter what he does, still cannot get the attention he craves from his self-absorbed and drug-addled parents. Of course, this is why von Trier can never be great like his hero Dreyer as he still has the emotional maturity of a teenager and, as Rosenbaum noted, has glaring maniac-depressive tendencies, which is a good way to describe the behavior of the titular anti-heroine of Medea who, as a scorned cunt that cannot believe she was tricked by a man, decides that the most despicable of revenges is more important than the lives of her two young sons. While Rosenbaum has complained of von Trier's excising of Dreyer's ostensible radical feminist subtext, there is no question that the auteur sympathizes with the titular (anti)heroine as her husband is portrayed as an arrogant and idiotic fool that more or less gets what he deserves, at least in the oftentimes hysterical director's mind.

As a stripped-down adaptation of Medea that was further stripped-down by the director from Dreyer's original screenplay, von Trier's film naturally contains a very simple storyline, but of course the film is, not unlike F.W. Murnau's masterpiece Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927)—another film that manages to create a great sense of the foreboding via foggy wetlands—largely notable due to its singular aesthetic approach and atmosphere. While the eponymous lead is technically not in every scene and we briefly encounter the perspective of other characters, the film is largely an uncompromising tribute to Medea's lovelorn anguish and pathos as a brutal bipolar bitch the opts to destroy her virtual entire world and all those that wronged her once she discovers that her husband—a man whose dubious intellect is, unfortunately for him, totally overpowered by his ambition and arrogance—has betrayed her. While scant on dialogue, the film is inordinately quotable in a thankfully non-Hollywood-esque fashion as virtually every single word carries heavy meaning and manages to completely expose the essence of each character, which is rather fitting in a moody little art movie where the actors move around with a certain slow somnambulist intrigue as if von Trier was attempting to reconcile the very different acting methods of Robert Bresson and Ingmar Bergman. Indeed, from the carefully stylized acting to the amount of fog in the area, every aspect of the film seems perfectly calculated in a cinematic work that basks in the intentionally imperfect—whether it be character, cinematic technique, or historical accuracy.

To von Trier's credit, he makes his intentions perfectly clear at the very beginning of the film in an inter-title where he declares: "This film is based on a script by Carl Th. Dreyer and Preben Thomsen after Euripides' drama MEDEA. Carl Th. Dreyer never realized his script. This is not an attempt to make his film, but due with reverence, a personal interpretation and homage to the master." From there, we are introduced to Medea (Kirsten Olesen) as she meditatively marines in a shallow pool of water on the shore as she grasps at the sand beneath as the tide begins to cover her as she is on the brink of some sort of life-changing psychological break. As another inter-title then reads: "Jason built his vessel Argo and sailed to Colchis to fetch the Golden Fleece which he won with the help of Medea, the beautiful and wise, who gave him her love. Her love has now turned to hatred. Jason betrays Medea and the two sons she has borne him. Together they fled from Colchis and arrived in Corinth as outlaws. Medea left her distant country. Jason left her here." Indeed, a powerful, albeit somewhat evil, woman that practices the dark arts, Medea sacrificed everything for her selfish husband Jason (Udo Kier in probably the most 'butch' role of his career) and even plopped out two sons for him in the process but he's already decided to throw everything away because he has an unquenchable thirst for power and the female protagonist has no place in his future life. Unfortunately for virtually all parties concerned, King Creon of Corinth (Henning Jensen) wants to secure his throne and he decides to do this by having his beloved daughter Glauce (Ludmilla Glinska)—a rather nubile dame that enjoys exposing her unclad body, as if she sincerely believes that she is god's great gift to humanity—marry powerful warrior and hero Jason. To add insult to injury, King Creon banishes Medea and her sons from his kingdom because he is rightly afraid that she will use her evil powers to get revenge against him and his daughter. Unfortunately for him, King Creon naively agrees to give Medea one day to get her affairs in order before she leaves, thus giving her enough time to perfectly plot her rather ruthless revenge. Needless to say, Medea is successful as she not only kills King Creon and his daughter, but also brutally hangs both her sons so that Jason will live with the pain and shame for eternity. Before hatching her pernicious plot, Medea secures her getaway by agreeing to help King Aegeus of Athens (Baard Owe) with family infertility problems. In the end, Jason loses everything and seemingly suffers a mental breakdown while Medea—a hard bitch that rarely expresses any emotions—weeps while sailing away on King Aegeus' ship after exposing her hair for the first time in the film as if self-induced grief is the only scenario where she can express her sense of femininity. In short, everyone loses at the conclusion of this brutal tragedy, especially Medea, hence the vicious circle that accompanies being a bipolar bitch.

While the characters in Medea do not say much, the very few words that are expressed certainly reveal a certain mutual disappointment when it comes to the opposite sex and biology. For example, while the mother of two boys, Medea is not very proud of her ability to give life and even proclaims she would prefer the life of a warrior to the womb, stating, "I'd rather bleed behind a shield than bearing a man's children." As for Jason, he seems willing to forsake women altogether, declaring, "If only men could have children without the agency of women." Certainly the sort of cold cunt that would give her son autism due to her lack of nurturing qualities, Medea—an assumed closet-romantic—seems to have only had children out of her love for Jason, hence her proclivity towards prolicide. In fact, Medea hints at such a motivation when she declares, "There is no greater sorrow than love," especially after coming to the bitter conclusion that her husband's "only ambition was to be the king's son-in-law." To Medea's credit, Jason is such a cowardly self-absorbed piece-of-shit that he dares to proclaim to the heroine that his betrayal was done to benefit her and their children, thereupon also insulting her intelligence in the process. When Jason declares to her, "Your pride is your misfortune," one cannot help but sympathize with Medea when she replies, "And your pride, Jason...is your good fortune. My weakness and blindness led me to encourage your vanity. You want it to look as if I have left you. You are betraying your own children." In the end, both parents not only betray their own children, but fall victim to their own pride, thereupon causing mostly relative innocents to die in the end. Undoubtedly, if there is anything that one can learn from the film, it is that no one in a relationship is innocent as shitty people tend to choose shitty partners. Additionally, Medea and Jason are the couple from hell and it is almost fitting that the former executes sort of post-birth abortions by killing her son as if to rid the world of their demonic genes.

Notably, as the decades have passed since the film's over thirty years ago, auteur Lars von Trier has had very few good things to say about Medea. For example, in Trier on von Trier he confesses, ". . . I don't feel very happy with the film. I think that's because of all that Viking crap that I never really got a grip on. No matter what you do with things like this, the result is always a sort of fancy-dress party. It's bloody difficult to get it to look at all sensible. I don't think we've really got enough distance to all this Viking business. But when you look at what Kurosawa does with similar things, it looks impressive. Like THE SEVEN SAMURAI. But if you look at the film more closely, you can see that the helmets they're wearing are terribly badly made. Maybe Kurosawa thought his films were insubstantial. But both time and geographic distance have eroded that, so you go along with it." Aside from being someone that has always considered Kurosawa's films, especially The Seven Samurai, to be absurdly overrated, it is easier for me to embrace the 'period costumes' in von Trier's film than in big budget pseudo-prestige TV bullshit like Game of Thrones (2011-2019) and Vikings (2013-current) where mostly candy ass modern actors preposterously pretend to be medieval bad asses. Not surprisingly, at the end of the same interview, von Trier would ultimately sum up his feelings about the film as follows, "MEDEA doesn't say much to me these days. It's got some nice scenes, but only on a superficial level. MEDEA was possibly a precursor to BREAKING THE WAVES in some of its usage of melodramatic form." Of course, Breaking the Waves (1996) suffers from contrived pseudo-Dreyer-esque flourishes, an absurdly off-putting utilization of pop music, and a ridiculous pseudo-transcendental ending that completely contradicts the film's entire tone. Personally, it is somewhat hard for me to take von Trier's opinion of his own work completely seriously as he apparently regards Epidemic (1987)—an abortive mess of a movie of the masturbatory metacinematic sort—as his 'personal favorite' of his films while distancing himself from most of his other fair superior early films like his debut feature The Element of Crime (1984). I think what separates Medea from much of von Trier's oeuvre is that, out of respect for Dreyer, von Trier demonstrated some sensible restraint for the first (and probably last) time in his filmmaking career and did not succumb to the seemingly self-destruction compulsion towards juvenile troll tactics. In that sense, it is arguably the auteur's most subversive and idiosyncratic work to date and von Trier's sort of equivalent to David Lynch's The Straight Story (1999) as an understated oddity in the filmmaker's oeuvre that benefits from a sort of quasi-Bressonian simplicity.

Of course, von Trier is not the first filmmaker to tackle the timeless Ancient Greek tragedy of Medea, which is a myth that, in general, seems to appeal to more experimental and subversive filmmakers. In fact, von Trier is not even the most subversive or iconoclastic auteur to adapt it as Dutch auteur Frans Zwartjes—undoubtedly one of the most idiosyncratic filmmakers that has ever lived—directed a rarely-seen minimalistic version simply titled Medea (1982) where two actresses play all the roles. Taking the tragedy to a totally different extreme, fellow Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh's posthumously released six-episode miniseries Medea (2005) updates the story for the degenerate world of Dutch democratic politics. Arguably even more unconventional than Zwartjes' film, obscure Italian female experimental filmmaker Pia Epemian's Medea (1969) seems like the sort of film the eponymous anti-heroine might directed if she was a full-blown schizophrenic. In subversive guido auteur Marco Ferrer's delectably debauched The Story of Piera (1983) aka Storia di Piera—one of the Italian filmmaker's countless criminally overlooked films—great frog mischling beauty Isabelle Huppert portrays a young girl that learns to play the role of Medea in high school and later plays the role as adult actress in a particularly perversely preternatural film that, among other things, features the novelty of borderline mother-daughter incest, among other things. Of course, Pier Paolo Pasolini's Medea (1969) starring Greek-American opera diva Maria Callas as the brilliantly cast titular lead is probably the greatest and most revered adaptation of the Greek tragedy. Personally, in terms of sheer rewatchability, I prefer von Trier's version despite my perennial mixed feelings about its auteur and my general preference for Pasolini over the Danish auteur.

Notably, von Trier himself seriously doubts that his Dreyer tribute is actually Dreyer-esque as demonstrated by his words, "The film was supposed to be a bit Dreyerish. I felt very connected to his aesthetic. But a lot of the film is too insubstantial. And we had that model of the Viking castle where Medea lived. I can't stand that sort of thing. It looked terrible. The problem was that the budget didn't let us film the whole thing on location. We came up with several Fellini-style solutions instead." I have no idea what von Trier is alluding to as Medea is one of the least Fellini-esque films that I have ever seen, but I digress. As far as Dreyer's influence, Medea has an almost fiercely foggy oneiric and ominous essence that is vaguely comparable to Dreyer's truly nightmarish masterpiece Vampyr (1932). As far as the eponymous heroine's passion and pathos are concerned, von Trier's film sometimes feels like a sort of apocalyptic nod to The Passion of Joan of Arc (1928) with strands of Gertrud (1964). Not surprisingly, Jonathan Rosenbaum is less convinced of Dreyer's influence and sees the film as being more Wellesian, or as he stated in his review, "In fact, apart from patches of Dreyer's dialogue, MEDEA is not at all like Dreyer, occasionally a bit like Ingmar Bergman, and mostly like Orson Welles — the Welles, that is, of MACBETH and OTHELLO. I hasten to add that the two films have very different styles, starting with the studio sets and long takes of MACBETH and the disparate 'found' locations and splintered montage of OTHELLO. But von Trier, like many a postmodernist music-video maestro, never lets stylistic consistency get in the way of his stockpile of effects. Insofar as there's any kind of dramatic logic at all, Medea is usually framed like Lady Macbeth in MACBETH and Jason (Udo Kier) like Othello in OTHELLO." Indeed, von Trier's Medea is quite comparable to Welles' pleasantly peculiar adaptations of classic Western texts as experimental and even borderline avant-garde takes on these all-too-familiar stories that bring new lifeblood to the narratively necrotic. Not unlike Welles' Shakespeare adaptations Macbeth (1948), Othello (1951), and Chimes at Midnight (1965), Medea does what great cinema should do by adding something to the ancient tragedy that could never be accomplished in theater or any other medium. Of course, the fact that the film features very little dialogue yet is atmospherically hypnotic throughout underscores this fact in terms of cinema's artistic singularity.

Whereas Medea is big on aesthetic and sparse on words, von Trier's later celebrated 'USA – Land of Opportunities' trilogy films Dogville (2003) and Manderlay (2005) are absurdly aesthetically barren and overly talky as if the auteur went through a nihilistic Godardian phase where he was obsessed with destroying cinema. Indeed, these two films (the projected third and final film in the trilogy, Washington, has yet to enter production) are not much more than glorified filmed theater where von Trier virtually attempts to duplicate what Fassbinder did with his somewhat experimental obscure TV plays Das Kaffeehaus (1970) aka The Coffee Shop, Bremer Freiheit (1972) aka Bremen Freedom, Nora Helmer (1974), and Frauen in New York (1977) aka Women in New York. While it is only natural that Fassbinder would direct such films due to his theater background and experience as both an actor and playwright, von Trier has always been most focused on cinematic technique and cultivating a distinct aesthetic, thus Dogville and Manderlay seem like expressions of a tired old auteur with a contempt for cinema who has gotten incredibly bored with the medium and I say that as someone that finds these to films to be somewhat enjoyable. Of course, Medea and Dogville have one very important thing in common in that they conclude in a rather incriminating way that reveals von Trier's sort of feminine rage. Indeed, while his latest failed film The House That Jack Built plays out like some murder fantasy fetish piece, it does not ring true the way Medea does where a hypnotically harrowing deluge of resentment, hatred, and misanthropy spills out in the end, thus it is quite fitting that the titular heroine begins the film lying in water as the tide begins to engulf her body. Naturally, considering von Trier's recent uncharacteristic affliction of Trump Derangement Syndrome, I would not be surprised if he came out as gender fluid or even followed in the step of his virtual artistic nemeses, Wachowski brothers, and came out as an a full-blown autogynophile. Indeed, it is probably no coincidence that von Trier's greatest films like Medea and Antichrist (2009) involve crazy cunts that make men miserable, especially since the auteur is himself a crazy cunt that likes to make men miserable.

Undoubtedly, it is somewhat ironic that von Trier's anti-Trump turd The House That Jack Built is largely is largely about death, as it feels like the creation of someone that believes in nothing and is totally afraid of death and the uncertainty that surrounds it, especially if one considers things that von Trier has said in the past. Indeed, demonstrating once again that Dreyer is surely one of his most imperative influences, von Trier stated in a manner that even almost borders on nationalist pride, "...people are always sacrificing themselves completely in Dreyer's films—and in mine. It must be a particularly Danish characteristic! So what can we say about sacrifice? [...] someone who sacrifices himself or herself is at least giving their existence some sort of meaning—if you can see a meaning in doing something for others, for an idea, a belief. The characters in these films are struggling to bring meaning to their time on earth. It must feel easier to die if you're doing it for something you believe in." Of course, as a clearly intelligent and oftentimes iconoclastic individual, von Trier reveals that he believes in nothing, especially sacrifice, when he parrots retarded conformist anti-Trump twaddle and he will probably never become a true cinematic master until he dares to direct a film that he is willing to sacrifice his life—or some aspect of his life—for. After all, at least with Medea he at least sacrificed his ego and exposed a certain vulnerability that he has yet to duplicate in any of his other films, hence the source of its striking emotional potency. After all, I cannot think of another film where I managed to feel sympathy for a sick evil bitch that kills her own children whereas I could not wait for the painfully banal and pedantic serial killer fuck in The House That Jack Built to die so I would not listen to his pathetic pseudo-philosophical pontificating anymore.

SALÒ OR THE 120 DAYS OF SODOM

Pier Paolo Pasolini (1975)

Salò or the 120 Days of Sodom was Italian film director Pier Paolo Pasolini's last work before his murder by a male prostitute. The circumstances surrounding Pasolini's death are dubious and make one wonder if Salò had anything to do with artistic genius's disappearance from the world forever. The film is based on the book The 120 Days of Sodom by Marquis de Sade. Pasolini adapted the novel for the fascist period in Europe during the 1940s. Through explicit and almost unbearable imagery, Pasolini gets his point across about the degradation of the human body by the fascist state.

The title Salò is taken after the fascist state that Pasolini's brother Guido was killed at in an ambush during the second World War. The significance of the title alone makes one wonder if Pasolini ever got over the death of his brother. I also believe that it would be fair to say that Pasolini believed fascism to be the main culprit in his brother's death. Salò is a film that presents human beings as merely objects for manipulation and torture for by the fascist state. Like those young individuals featured in Salò, Pasolini must have felt his own brother was worthlessly sacrificed for the fascist state. A theme prevalent throughout Salò is the destruction of the family so that the state can take ownership over the individual. One girl in the film cries for her own death as she prefers the conclusion of her life over being deflowered by fascists. Her mother was killed trying to save her and she no longer wants to go on living. A fascist leader merely laughs at her and tells her that her suffering only makes him happier. The United States government has also done a great job destroying the American family. Shabbos Goy puppet and president Barack Obama intends to further the dissolution of the American family with his new "Zero to Five" big brother plan. The point of this plan is to indoctrinate child at birth with lies about "tolerance" and "altruism" so that they don't have to wait till kindergarten. After all, the gate keepers don't want children learning about individualism or respect for self. That would be against international banking and neo-Bolshevik interests.

The young people that are raped and tortured in Salò are objects of the state and can do nothing about it. The fascist leaders are obsessed with "deflowering" their young victims as they want to officially taint them. What good are slaves if they haven't had their morale broken first? The fascist leaders do what they do because they desire power. They desire power due to their inability for sexual release as demonstrated by their many acts of perversity. Whatever sexual act they engage in, they are never fulfilled. This forces the leaders to get more deranged with sexual desire until their victims are left dead. Rumor has it that Adolf Hitler enjoyed being peed on by his young niece Geli Raubal. Whether this is true or not is questionable, but one of the fascist leaders featured in Salò surely enjoys it. Also the fascist leaders featured in the film take upon themselves to dress in drag before they have a gourmet buffet of shit. It is arguable that Nazi leader Hermann Göring was a transvestite. Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels made no lie about his annoyance by Göring's effeminate behavior in his 1945 diaries. Pier Paolo Pasolini makes it clear that the archetypical fascist was not someone that was into traditional sexual activities.

Of course, being a homosexual, Pier Paolo Pasolini was also not into ordinary sex. One fascist leader in Salò states, "The act of the sodomite signifies the death of the human species." Pasolini was not a man that hid his thoughts in matters even if they conflicted with who he was. The sodomite fascist leaders make it clear in Salò that they will defile and destroy all beautiful human beings. Incapable of reproducing, they do the opposite and destroy. Another sinister looking fascist that goes by the title "the president" states, "when one prefers men, it is difficult to change one's perspective. The difference between a boy and a girl is enormous. We cannot consider one that is obviously inferior." Hence, the idea of the aesthetically pleasing Aryan superman. All victims featured in Salò also become conspirators amongst one another in the fascist state. Out of fear and desperation, each individual caught committing a "crime" against the state confesses another victim's crime. After a girl is found with a photograph of a boy by a fascist leader she cowardly tells on two girls that engage in lesbianism. The two lesbian girls tell on a fascist guard who practices miscegenation with a Negro servant girl. Like many loyal fascists, the race defiler salutes his murderers to the very end. The fascist state has completely destroyed all forms of individualism.

Although the Bolsheviks (and their international proteges) were clearly responsible for more suffering than any group in human history, the fascist world of Salò metaphorically champions the sadistic Marxist world. Pier Paolo Pasolini, an Italian communist, never made any lie when criticizing Marxism so naturally fascism was an easy target for the late director. Salò is a work so graphic and morally depraved that it encourages the viewer to be completely demoralized by its conclusion. None of the sex featured in Salò is erotic nor are any of the deaths "cool." Salò ends with the fascist leaders watching torture via binoculars inside a comfy mansion room. This scene emphasizes the sick voyeurism the viewer engages in safely through their private television set. The viewers have disassociated themselves from the horrors of the film just as many fascist (and allies) leaders did during the second World War.

DISTRICT B13

Pierre Morel (2004) District B13 is a slick and well executed French action film directed by Pierre Morel. The film is based on a story written by action auteur Luc Besson (who also acted as one of the film's producers). District B13 features real stunts (no CGI or other BS here) that compliment the film's fluidity and perfectly calculated nature. Many of the stunts are in the form of the urban art of Parkour. Individuals involved in Parkour utilize urban terrain as an obstacle based art similar to skateboarding.

I must admit that I am not the biggest fan of action films. My favorite action films are usually directed by no other than Luc Besson. District B13 takes place in the not so distant future coming upon an age where the world is nearing an apocalypse. The city of District B13 is blocked in by an apartheid wall (similar to the one Israel has around the Palestinians). The French government has decided to put a wall around the city due to its uncontrollable crime and chaotic nature. District B13 is quite reflexive of the ghettos in France today. Third world immigrants have flooded slums of France as cheap labor to make up for the physically inept French. Like the corrupt politician in District B13, French President Nicholas Sarkozy has also called third world population (directed at Muslims) "scum." Various riots have also taken place in the slums, in protest of President Sarkozy. It is no doubt that District B13 is a social commentary on the current socio-political situations occurring today in France. French President Nicholas Sarkozy "You've had enough of this gang of scum, haven't you?" said Nicolas Sarkozy to residents in a Paris suburb affected by rioting. "Well we're going to get rid of them." The two heroes of District B13, are a District B13 local and a slick cop. Their objective is to disassemble a bomb before it blows up the whole city. Of course, you can expect some surprises on the way. The cop and local have to fight a gang to get to the bomb. The gang's lead muscle is a fat wigger by the name of K2 (which he has shaved in the back of his head). Their leader is an ambiguous homosexual who has an addiction to cocaine. Expect to see some serious shit go down between the gang and its rich man's candy fueled leader. Various plot twists and turns occur in District B13 guaranteeing for a thinking man's joyride. I find it refreshing to watching an action film that actually has some thought put into it. I will be sure to follow the work of Pierre Morel and Luc Besson in the future. I just wonder whether or not Nicholas Sarkozy has seen District B13. I would love to hear his reaction.

Pierre Morel (2008)

Bare with me here. Taken (2009) is an action/revenge film in such vain of neo-classics as Death Sentence, but this time it stars Liam Neeson who plays a fluidly flat character who still manages to be creative with the kills and action. The plot essentially follows the barren yet populated philosophy that women are stupid and get themselves in heaps of trouble. Such is the plot and motivator for Taken. Liam Neeson's daughter is kidnapped by dirty Albanians into trafficking. This film was taken from a September release to a January date. Such is the woes of Hollywood. Judging from the visceral and bodily damage, one could guess that the screenwriter is Luc Besson. Such an exciting action film can only be directed by Pierre Morel, the director of politico-parkour film District B13. The same bloodless physical violence hits France yet again, this time with more nut shots and broken limbs than before. The dirty, filthy Albanian people have been cinematically mongrelized into greedy sexual dictators working in unison towards a better and more sexual France. Yet again, a film has exaggerated Eastern horrors worse than others (mainly for drug induced sexual extremes and female slavery), this time playing on the fact that Albania was known for its relentless violence during its prehistory. Liam Neeson's role in the film can feel as if he is re-enacting one of the eccentric quirky characters from Steve Martin's Pink Panther, though I must admit I haven't been quite generous in giving the film the credit it deserves. His daughter, acted by Maggie Grace (of bitch Lost fame) accidentally (whoops!) winds up in an esteemed trafficking environment where she ends up getting doped on narcotics and sold to ethnic bankers. A true misogynist work of immeasurable genius. Taken makes sure you cannot find any other excuse but to blame the naive and slutty friend couplet that winds up in this situation from, surprise, being slutty. Taken has not taken much space up on Soiled Sinema. The film is short, sweet, and infinitely piquant as a whole. It retains some emotional leverage against the misanthropist (especially misogynist) in you. The acting can be a sufferable sacrifice for Eastern European horror served at a high velocity. You like action? Liam Neeson breaks some miserable Frenchman's nose every 10 minutes. You ratio that up and it equals a film not as good as the revenge encore Death Sentence, but still pretty damn good. Now if only Dick MaSterson played the inexorable ex-CIA lead. Other women that fuck shit up.

WEIRD WEIRDO

Pierre-Alain Jolivet (1969)

One of my best friends growing up was literally the most infamous and all-around worst behaved kid in school and like many bad boys, he had a curious relationship with his mother that even seemed borderline incestuous (once, my friend and I walked by his mother's bedroom and saw her standing in front of a mirror naked, as if it was normal to get undressed with your door open while having three sons always running around the house). No matter what crime my friend committed—be it hitting the high school principal in the head with a full bottle of Gatorade or stealing expensive pieces of equipment from school—his mother still babied him as if he were the absolute epitome of baby Jesus-like purity. His mother also taught him and his friends (myself included) that all women were whores that would ruin a man's life without thinking twice, so naturally my friend did not treat his lady friends that well (even breaking one of their noses, hence one of the many reasons why I stopped hanging out with him). Although my friend is not a French mannequin-loving rapist serial killer, he certainly does remind me a bit of the Oedipal-plagued antihero of the avant-garde counter-culture frog flick Weird Weirdo (1969) aka Le grand cérémonial directed by Pierre-Alain Jolivet (Bérénice, Black Mirror). A playfully aberrant and aesthetically and thematically quasi-autistic piece of mod-art-molested artsploitation cinema that is based on a play by Spanish auteur filmmaker/Renaissance man/Panic Movement founder Fernando Arrabal (Viva la muerte, I Will Walk Like a Crazy Horse) that was once lovingly described as "Arrabal's weirdest play yet," Weird Weirdo is the sordid semi-surreal story of a wayward young man with sadistic tendencies who falls in love with an equally wayward woman with masochistic tendencies who suffers from kleptomania in a cinematic work that strangely proves that opposites attract, especially when they are sexually dysfunctional whack jobs. Directed by an obscure French auteur who is best remembered, if at all, for his rather rough yet strikingly aesthetically pleasing sadomasochistic arthouse flick The Punishment (1973) aka La punition—a work about a high-class hooker who faces sexual displeasure under pernicious patrons with exotic S&M tastes—Weird Weirdo features a strangely hypnotic hodgepodge of trashy and classy themes and aesthetics that will appeal to both Alain Robbe-Grillet and Jean Rollin fans alike, though Arrabal fanatics might find the film to be not insane enough for their liking. Indeed, while Alejandro Jodorowsky's Arrabal adaptation Fando y Lis (1968) is even crazier than its source material (Arrabal even admitted this himself), Weird Weirdo was made to be palatable for more 'general' audiences, sort of like a date movie for decidedly debauched dudes and dames as a work with a tinge of melodramatic romance, not to mention a strangely happy ending. Like Jacques Baratier's Piège (1970), Weird Weirdo also features a cameo from the playwright as an eccentric shop owner and thus should be a cult classic of sorts by now, but due to its unavailability (the print I found looks like it was found in a Mexican garbage dump), it will just have to remain in the celluloid dustbin of history.

Cavanosa (Michel Tureau) is no Casanova as a hysterical and homicidal momma's boy who thinks all women are whores and treats them as such by scooping them up at night and ditching their corpses in large boxes at a railway station. During one of his daily drop offs, Cavanosa spots a young beauty named Syl (played by Marcella Saint-Amant, who appeared on the American soap opera Days of Our Lives during the mid-1960s) being chased by an angry crowd yelling "stop thief!" because she has just stolen a purse, which she hands to the crazed young man. Later, Syl finds Cavanosa and accuses him of waiting for his mommy (indeed, he has been spending the entire day thinking of his equally mental mother trying to kiss him), but he claims that he killed her. Cavanosa's mother taught him to hate woman, so he seeks solace in semi-anatomically correct mannequins, which he seems to have hundreds of. That night, the deranged young man confesses to his insane mother (played by Ginette Leclerc, who previously starred in Henri-Georges Clouzot's 1943 masterpiece Le Corbeau: The Raven) while being tucked into bed like a toddler that he is in love with, "A very young woman. Very beautiful. Very pure." Needless to say, the Mother, who practically carries her progeny's testicles around in her purse, becomes agitated by her son's declaration of love, thus upsetting him in the process, so when Syl gives Cavanosa a bouquet of roses the next day, he flips out, rips up the flowers, stomps on the torn petals and tells his love interest "Commit suicide immediately. Here. In front of me. That's what I want," which only turns her on all the more since she is a major masochist who delights in being degraded by young dandies. When Syl begs Cavanosa to kiss her, he responds quite hysterically by stating, "You're just a whore who kisses every guy she meets [...] Me, I'm the one nobody wants to kiss. I'm doing my best to be hated. Only my mother loves me. And I killed her. And she died because of you, slut," even though his mother is clearly still alive. Ultimately, the demented dandy agrees that Syl can spend the night at Cavanosa's house so long as she lets him kill her that very same night. Meanwhile, Cavanosa's mother goes to a police superintendent and tells him that her son is the serial killer that is responsible for dropping off dead chicks in boxes at the train station, even going so far as to describe her beloved son as follows: "He's hunchbacked, he's lame, he's repulsive." On the other side of the city, Syl brings Cavanosa to meet with her (ex)boyfriend, who she tries to dump. Eventually, the tableside bizarre love triangle results in jealousy and resentment on the maniac momma's boy's part, so Cavanosa essentially tells Syl and her boyfriend to go fuck off and die.

After attempting to buy lingerie from Fernando Arrabal for his mother but forgetting her size, Cavanosa once again meets up with Syl, who has bought a whip so that he can beat her with it. Before they go back to Cavanosa's casa, the young man forces his new nubile little girlfriend to get naked in public. When Cavanosa arrives back home, his mother accuses him of losing his virginity and tells him that Syl is nothing but a dirty whore who wants to “pump a child out of you.” Cavanosa is so irked by his mother’s irrational hatred, he attempts stabbing her with a knife but chickens out at the last minute and buries his head in her crotch as if he wants to reenter her womb. Of course, Mommy Dearest lets her little boy know, “All women are whores, my darling. I’ve sacrificed my life for you.” When salacious Syl arrives at Cavanosa’s humble abode, he undresses her and makes her say the word “Volubilis” (the name of an ancient Roman city located in what is now Morocco that fell to local tribes around 285 and was never again reclaimed by the Romans as it was in an indefensible region in the southwest corner of the empire). From there, Cavanosa makes Syl wear a white dress and a crown of thorns as his mother laughs in a maniacal manner while watching them through a peephole. In a semi-foreshadowing phantasmagoric dream-sequence, Cavanosa has ditched all of his mannequins in a dump and kills Syl, but not before telling her he loves her. After the dream-sequence ends and the viewer is transferred back to some semblance of reality, we watch as Syl admires her boyfriend’s eclectic mannequin collection. Undoubtedly, the centerpiece of the life-size doll collection is a creepy black mannequin with a third eye in its forehead and a hand protruding out of the top of its cranium. When Cavanosa joins Syl in the mannequin room, the two proceed to blowtorch all of the dolls, mainly their faces, breasts, and crotch regions (aka the most important physical parts of a woman). After the pyromaniac fun is over, the Mother breaks into the room while in a seemingly demonically possessed state and irrationally accuses her son of being a bastard. Indeed, Cavanosa is such a bastard that he ties Syl to a bed and begins to violently rape her, but the little lady is not completely satisfied and tells him to do it harder. Unfortunately, Syl’s ex-Boyfriend randomly pops in to save the day before Cavanosa can sexually savage her some more. Luckily, Cavanosa beats up the ex-Boyfriend and ties him up in the bathroom and everyone else proceeds to drink tea at a small dinner table (indeed, Syl, Cavanosa, and Mother manage to all get along for a second or two). Ultimately, Cavanosa lets the ex-Boyfriend go and then puts Syl on a leash like a dog. With Syl by his side, Cavanosa decides to get rid of all his childish possessions and destroys the rest of his mannequins in a large bonfire outside. After Syl throws Cavanosa’s favorite mannequin into a lake, the two proceed to make passionate love. Later on, Cavanosa asks his lover “Do you think mommy is dead?” and Syl sets him straight by slapping him in the face like a little bitch boy. Indeed, in the end, Cavanosa has finally gotten over his mommy issues and can now go on with a normal romantic relationship, as a sadist who has found his masochist.

Apparently, Fernando Arrabal’s original play version of Weird Weirdo concludes in a less classically romantic fashion with Cavanosa finding another masochist madam in what is a biting ironic conclusion. Personally, I did not mind the somewhat unexpected Hollywood-like ending of the film, as Weird Weirdo already has enough unhinged perversion, nasty nihilism, and flagrant misogyny and misanthropy crammed into it to keep me happy. The only thing that I found somewhat outmoded and annoying about the film is a pseudo-documentary scene towards the end where a news reporter asks random strangers who they think might be responsible for killing chicks and dumping their bodies at the railway station. While one 'racist' fellow proclaims that there is no way that an indigenous French man can be capable of such crimes (he assumes an Algerian is the culprit), another man blames the cops, remarking that if the police spent less time beating up far-left student activists and focused their efforts on the killer, they would have found him by now. Of course, as a fundamentally feminist-free work featuring a female kleptomaniac who falls in love with a deranged dude of the murderously sadistic sort who incessantly threatens to kill her, Weird Weirdo is not exactly a left-wing work, at least in the traditional sense, even if it is an adamantly anti-bourgeois film. Indeed, compared to French left-wing counter-culture works of the same era like those directed by Agnès Varda and Jean-Luc Godard, among countless others, Weird Weirdo seems radically reactionary. On top of featuring a number of otherworldly and equally titillating tableaux, the film is nearly immaculately accented by an eerie and ethereal yet melodic soundtrack created by relatively unknown French composer Jack Arel (a regular collaborator of Jean-Claude Petit who co-composed the song "Psychedelic Portrait," which was featured in an episode of the British cult TV series The Prisoner). It should also be noted that the film received its English title 'Weird Weirdo' from Beat filmmaker/film distributor Antony Balch (Secrets of Sex aka Bizarre, Computer Killers aka Horror Hospital)—a collaborator of William S. Burroughs who directed the short films Towers Open Fire (1963) and The Cut Ups (1967) and produced the 1968 version of Benjamin Christensen's silent masterpiece Häxan: Witchcraft Through the Ages featuring narration from Burroughs—who bought the film and distributed it in the UK (Notably, Balch was also responsible for re-titling Joël Séria's sacrilegious cult masterpiece Don't Deliver Us from Evil (1971) aka Mais ne nous délivrez pas du mal). Indeed, for fans of surrealism, bizarre counter-culture cinema, the Panic Movement, celluloid sadomasochism, wayward misogyny and/or curious cult cinema, Weird Weirdo is certainly worth digging up and devouring with a date who does not mind a bit of sadomasochistic cinematic debauchery.

BLOOD

Piers Haggard (1971)

Although the gutter auteur's most expensive production at the time with a budget about twice as much as one of his typical features at supposedly $20,000 (Bill Landis of Sleazoid Express fame soundly speculated that the filmmaker must have spent a good portion of the money on his mortgage), the monster family melodrama Blood (1974) directed by Andy Milligan (The Body Beneath, Fleshpot on 42nd Street) runs under 60 minutes (though a 74 minute print apparently exists somewhere), was conveniently shot mostly at the filmmaker's northern Staten Island home, and as the director's friend Jimmy McDonough wrote in his excellent biography The Ghastly One: The Sex-Gore Netherworld of Filmmaker Andy Milligan (2001), the work "had all the requisite Milligan ingredients—sick family, domineering wives, limping servants—but the results are inert and, even for Andy, amateurish." Somewhat strangely, I have noticed that Blood is the film that most Milligan mongers recommend to novices, which is probably owing to the film's brief running time and fairly fast pace, especially compared to the director's more dialogue-heavy works like Guru, the Mad Monk (1970) and The Rats Are Coming! The Werewolves Are Here! (1972). Maybe it is because I enjoy watching nasty films about nasty people doing nasty things after being forced into less than ideal situations, but I have yet to see a 'bad' Milligan movie and that certainly includes this little minimalistic and misanthropic monster movie melodrama hybrid. Milligan's sort of angry yet autistic take on The Addams Family meets Roger Corman's The Little Shop of Horrors (1960) minus the intentional humor as channeled through the director's rather idiosyncratic misogynistic, sadomasochistic, and compulsively cockeyed lens, Blood was one of the few films that the filmmaker directed that was not produced and distributed by Semitic smut-peddler William Mishkin, as it was released by Bryanston Pictures, which is notable for releasing Paul Morrissey's Flesh for Frankenstein (1973) aka Andy Warhol's Frankenstein, Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), Robert Fuest's The Devil's Rain (1975) featuring Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey, John Carpenter's pre-Halloween sci-fi parody Dark Star (1974), and Ralph Bakshi's racially-charged satire Coonskin (1975), as well as being founded by Guido Mafioso boss Anthony "Big Tony" Peraino with his son Lou as a way to hide the millions of illegal untaxed dollars they made off of the porn chic crossover classic Deep Throat (1972). Although Milligan was routinely screwed over by Mishkin and his all the more repellant lawyer son, he claimed to have somehow managed to get Peraino to pay him $40,000 for Blood, which was unheard of because apparently the goombah gangster was somewhat of a penny-pincher, thus making the film one of the director's greatest financial successes. A histrionically melodramatic tale about a decidedly disharmonious marriage of monster miscegenation between the Wolf-man's cuckold scientist son and the less than charismatic queen bitch daughter of Dracula and their deleteriously loyal Christian servant who not so secretly loves the husband and hates the wife, the film will ultimately prove to be too much for most horror fiends and gorehounds due to being a minimalistic exploitation flick with an almost Gone with the Wind-esque melodramatic 'elegance' (notably, Milligan worked on an Antebellum era epic melodrama entitled House of Seven Belles (1979), but never finished it and the footage is now considered lost). A suburban anti-family melodrama disguised as a Victorian era Gothic horror costume piece, Blood bleeds profusely the sort of inter-family contempt that only a spiteful little sadistic sod like Mr. Milligan was capable of and considering that it was made around the time that the filmmaker's wife/superstar Candy Hammond (Seeds of Sin, Gutter Trash) divorced him and moved back to her hometown in North Carolina, the director's signature seething hatred, misanthropy, and misogyny seems all the more audaciously authentic.

Despite being the proud progeny of the Wolfman, Dr. Lawrence Orlovsky (one-time actor Allan Berendt) is his bitch wife's loyal bitch and he has more or less devoted his entire life trying in vain to keep his uniquely ungrateful spouse relatively comfortable. Lawrence's wife is a crippled bloodsucking cunt named Regina Orlovsky (Milligan superstar Hope Stansbury, who penned the director's first film Vapors (1965)) and like many mentally unhinged housewives, she spends most of the day bedridden, but it is not just because she is a manic depressive, as she is also a genetically degenerate vampire who happens to be the daughter of the Count Dracula. Unfortunately for her, Regina lacks the cultivated charm, wit, and subtlety of her alpha-ghoul progenitor. Due to their infamous family backgrounds, the two were forced to marry as a "duty" to their famous monster fathers and now they have a childless extended anti-family comprised solely of crippled servants who have literally dedicated their lives to serving them in the most dangerous and deleterious sort of ways. Regina hates servant Carrie (played by Patricia Gaul, who went on to have small roles in mainstream films like Kasdan's The Bill Chase (1983) and Silverado (1985)) not only because she is a practicing Christian who blesses her food each meal with a small crucifix, but also because she can tell that she and her lycanthropic hubby have a crush on one another. Orlando (Michael Fischetti, who appeared in John Huston's Prizzi's Honor (1985) and Robert Mandel's F/X (1986) is the least hated and most cuckolded of the servants and Carlotta (Pichulina Hempel) is certainly the most hideous, grotesque, crippled, and retarded, which is all a direct result of her parasitic masters' experiments. Indeed, Carlotta, who apparently used to be rather bright, was adopted while still just a little girl from a Budapest-based orphanage by the Orlovsky family, but when Regina used a little bit too much of her blood one day to quench her undying lust for sanguine fluids, it temporarily cut off the oxygen to her brain, henceforth causing her irreparable brain damage that has left her a blabbering buffoon who bungles everything she does and thus making her the perfect defenseless scapegoat for the rest of the family, who blame all their own failings on her. Changing the family surname from Talbot to Orlovsky and moving to Europe in 1869 after his father died to obscure the fact that he is the son of the infamous Wolfman, Lawrence has brought back the entire messed up anti-family to his east coast hometown of 'Mortavia' (a name Milligan previously used for the fictional medieval Slavic nation featured in Guru, the Mad Monk) because he is running out of funds and suspects that family lawyer/executioner Carl Root (rather queenish Broadway composer John Wallowitch in his first and his last film role) has been stealing his inheritance and "legacy." Of course, little does Lawrence and the rest of the family realize that the United States is still not exactly hospitable to their curious mongrel monster kind.

After shooing away a bitchy busybody realtor named Mr. Markham (Martin Reymert, who later appeared in Milligan's 1978 film Legacy of Blood)—a revoltingly effete über-queen if there ever was one who insists on showing his tenant the garden and rooms around his new home—and telling him to never come by the house again under any circumstances as he plans to mail the rent out in advance, childless patriarch Lawrence sneaks his entire eccentric family into their new less than humble abode via a backdoor. As a degenerate blood addict with an acute aversion to sunlight, Regina barely survives the trip and her face resembles that of a melted plastic baby doll head by the time she finds safety in darkness. To make matters worse, Regina needs weekly blood transfusions and overused guinea pig Carlotta's once vital blood is beginning to be not very agreeable with her highly sensitive undead body. On top of having to deal with his wife's pathological bitching and belligerent bouts of somewhat warranted jealousy, Lawrence, who has followed his father's wishes by becoming a doctor and devotes most of his life to attempting to find a cure for the ungodly family taint, spends most his time experimenting with serums, with servants Carrie, Orlando, and Carlotta also having secondary jobs as his scientific assistants. Lycanthropic mad scientist Lawrence is also experimenting with the sap of exotic and highly dangerous carnivorous plants as he hopes it will prove to be a reliable substitute to blood that will help keep his wife's eternal addiction to vital fluids in check. Unfortunately, the plants are growing rather vicious and attempt to eat anyone that happens to get too close to them. Possibly a side effect from the strange plants, servants Carrie and Orlando are suffering from a grotesque unmentioned ailment that makes their legs look like that of a malnourished concentration camp victim, albeit with the added bonus of perennially oozing puss. In fact, Orlando's leg is so warped that he has to waddle around on his knees, which is certainly symbolic of his sorry lot in life as the virtual serf of Count Dracula and the Wolfman's degenerate spawn. Of course, despite everything that her husband and servants do for her, Regina is still an ungrateful bitch who runs the house like a fascistic PMS-plagued whorehouse madam who hasn't had a good fuck in a decade. To Regina's minor credit, her husband refuses to have sex with her, even when she begs by throwing herself at him like a drunken teenage girl at a frat boy party. Indeed, when Regina tells her husband that she hates him and to "go to hell" after he rebuffs her rather pathetic sexual advances, Lawrence replies, "we're already there." Of course, compared to what he and his fucked family will experience over the next couple of days, Lawrence has yet to experience anything even remotely resembling Hades.

When Lawrence surprises his miserly lawyer Carl Root by randomly showing up at his office without notifying him that he has returned to the United States, he discovers that the swindler has sold the entire family estate without his permission and mispent the money on bad business deals, so he threatens him by remarking, "You forget that I have all my father's traits inbred in me, so take care" and eventually tries to kill the faggy swindler with his bare hands. Luckily, Lawrence's meeting with Root is not completely bloodboiling, as he gets the opportunity to meet the scumbag lawyer's beautiful young secretary Prudence Towers (Pamela Adams), who he virtually falls in love with at first sight. Meanwhile, servant Carrie's young brother Johnny (David Bevans) swings by the monster manor and it becomes immediately clear that he and his sister have incestuous feelings for one another. When Johnny checks on his sister's bad leg and sees that it is even worse than the last time he saw it, he threatens to call the authorities and demands that Carrie meet with him the next day, but of course the siblings never see each other again. Indeed, upon attempting to leave the Orlovsky home, Johnny is stopped by Regina, who kills him with a butcher knife to the noggin and subsequently melts his corpse with acid after he threatens to go to the authorities in regard to her husband's dubious experiments. When nosy realtor Markham talks to an equally nosy old obese wench in the neighborhood who mentions that the Orlovsky's are not home and complains, "you can't trust dem' damn foreigners" despite the fact they're clearly not foreigners as demonstrated by their crude hopelessly American accents, the brazen busybody decides to sneak into the house, only to discover Carrie, Orlando, and Carlotta performing experiments in a makeshift laboratory in the basement. Realizing that Markham has seen too much, Carrie and Orlando knock the realtor out and feed him to the carnivorous plants, who slowly drain the realtor of his fruity pansy blood.

Meanwhile, Regina gets so hungry that she decapitates a mouse with her beloved butcher knife in a classically cruel Milligan-esque unsimulated rodent-killing scene and eats its head while her husband Lawrence goes on a romantic date with Prudence at the cemetery where his Wolfman father, who apparently died a violent death at the hands of a hateful redneck lynch mob, is buried. After telling Prudence, "I only wish I could have been fortunate enough to meet you before I married her" and complaining about being forced into an arranged marriage with a woman he ultimately grew to love to hate, hopeless romantic

Lawrence passionately kisses his new lady friend, but the two perfectly matched lovebirds are soon interrupted by a creepy corpse-like old hag with an Eastern European accent named Petra (Eve Crosby, who later appeared in the 1999 Troma flick Terror Firmer) who rebukes them for hanging out at the graveyard after visiting hours and proclaims that the graves are “all of my children.” When Petra realizes who Lawrence really is, she warns him to go home because there will be a full moon that night, so the crypto-lycanthrope runs away as fast as he can so that he does not defile his precious new lover. Unfortunately, some other jealous monster will ultimately get to his unwitting sweetheart Prudence.

When Petra, who was apparently Lawrence’s belated father the Wolfman’s mistress for 15 years, comes by the Orlovsky home and blackmails Regina by threatening to reveal their family secret(s), the bitchy bloodsucker kills her by biting her on the neck and drinking her blood, but not before sadistically chopping her hands off by abruptly slamming the top of a treasure chest onto them. Before killing Petra, Regina learns that her husband has cheated on her with Prudence and she only becomes all the more enraged when the old hag rubs it in her face by remarking, “The wife is always the last to know.” Needless to say, Regina pays poor unsuspecting Prudence a visit and kills her by draining her of her vital fluids. Meanwhile, Lawrence comes home and tells his servants to pack everything and to get ready to go back to Europe because he killed Carl Root after turning into a werewolf and losing control of his temper. When Regina finally comes back home, she brags to Lawrence about killing his mistress Prudence, berates him for cheating on her, and projects her own thoughts by accusing him of wanting to kill her, to which he replies like a true spineless cuckold, “You’re wrong, I wouldn’t desert you after all these years.” Of course, being a hysterical and innately intemperate crazed cunt, Regina attacks Lawrence and both of them subsequently transform into their respective monster forms. While husband and wife attempt to strangle one another to death, a fire breaks out that kills every single person in the house, including the servants. In a charmingly tasteless twist ending, another exceedingly gay realtor (played by Joe Downing, who fittingly appeared in Milligan’s now-lost 1973 gay vampire flick Dragula) rents out the semi-burnt down house, which is being restored, for a cheap price to a super Teutonic-looking fellow named Baron von Frankenstein.

While plagued by crude makeup, sub-childish special effects, almost silent era style histrionic acting, and spastic direction involving the director’s signature ‘swirl camera’ technique taken to perversely pathological extremes, Blood is pure Milligan in the most complimentary sense and indeed a rather fitting introduction to the filmmaker’s oeuvre. Probably better than any of the gutter auteur’s other films, the film demonstrates the director’s unrivaled talent for maliciously molesting horror and monster movie genre conventions and molding them to fit his own wickedly wayward worldview. Indeed, for those who cherish Universal Monsters movies, Blood might prove to be an unnerving, if not uniquely unforgettable experience, as if a sub-literate American Jean Genet attempted to film a play about the forlorn children of Count Dracula and the Wolf Man in his damp, dark, and moldy basement using actors he cast from a thrift store while high on crystal meth and poppers. Pure and unadulterated celluloid sexual psychosis with the pleasantly perverse passion of 101 raving lovesick psychopaths, Milligan's film is true 'outsider art' as a completely authentic, unadulterated, and innately intemperate expression of the filmmaker's misbegotten anti-Oedipal being. Indeed, in many ways, Blood, like many of Milligan's other movies, is a rather incriminating film that would offer a virtual gold mine for any half-serious psychoanalyst, but one scene that particularly stuck out to me was when protagonist Lawrence Orlovsky states after killing Carl Root while in werewolf form, "I couldn't control my temper. I didn't want to do it." To me, that piece of seemingly insignificant dialogue seemed like a half-hearted attempt on Milligan's part to apologize (or at least an excuse) for his all around sadistic, bitchy, and callous behavior, which was probably the product of the emotional and physical abuse he suffered at the hands of his deranged and morbidly obese alcoholic mommy, who seemed to raise her son in such a cruel fashion that he ultimately grew up to become completely incapable of controlling his behavior or communicating with other people in any sort of rational, sensible, or respectful way. Certainly, filmmaking was a sort of therapy for his internal torment and as Greek-French playwright Antonin Artaud once wrote, "No one has ever written, painted, sculpted, modeled, built, or invented except literally to get out of hell." Of course, the literal and figurative monsters of Blood only get out of their personal hells after being literally burned alive, thus demonstrating the severity of Milligan's suffering and cynicism with life. Indeed, Milligan may have been one of the most technically inept auteur filmmakers who ever lived, but he understood the archetypal roots of monsters better than the modern 'masters of horror' like John Landis, Joe Dante, Tobe Hooper, Stuart Gordon, etc.

BLACK XXX-MAS

Pieter Van Hees (1999)

Feeling more like a cynical Scrooge this year than ever before, I decided to forgo my annual viewing of A Christmas Story (1983) and instead hunted for the most callously cynical and just plain fucked up Christmas film that I could find sans Santa slasher flicks, which ultimately led me to a Belgian short of all things with the blatantly intentionally trashy title Black XXX-Mas (1999) directed by Flemish auteur Pieter Van Hees (Dirty Mind, Waste Land). Judging by the title, one might assume Van Hees' film is an interracial porn parody of Bob Clark's classic Canadian proto-slasher flick Black Christmas (1974) and even though it does feature some revolting jungle fever scenarios, it is actually an absurdly grotesque and sadistically sardonic anti-avant-garde molestation of the classic European fairy tale Little Red Riding Hood featuring a nasty and rather nihilistic Nordic take on blaxploitation cinema and set in a decidedly dystopian Belgium of the near future where whites have become a sheltered and soulless minority and Santa Claus is a drunken negro robber who, instead of leaving presents, takes more than just milk and cookies on Xmas eve, especially while lurking around the nice and cozy homes of rich crackers with fireplaces. A film that was made as part of the relatively unknown Belgian film movement 'Trauma 99' that was started as a reaction against the patently pretentious Danish 'meta-realist' film movement Dogme 95 started by Lars von Trier and Thomas Vinterberg that went completely against the grain of the European arthouse world by advocating the use of gratuitous special effects whenever possible, Black XXX-Mas is pure and unadulterated celluloid trash with an aesthetically and thematically iconoclastic punch that features an intentionally artificial and plastically flashy aesthetic that makes the $100 million explosions of Michael Bay seem quite 'avant-garde.' Although I did not realize it until after watching it, I was shocked to learn that the short was directed by the same Flemish filmmaker who directed the arthouse 'folk horror' flick Linkeroever (2008) aka Left Bank, which is a fairly serious and elegantly paced work with ancient European pagan themes that hardly seems like it was assembled by the same kind of guy that would make culturally pessimistic Xmas-themed black comedies featuring kraut cannibal cops, teenage mulatto cokeheads, and a colored crook Kris Kringle. Opening with the words "Warning: An Exploitation Tale," Black XXX-Mas is the way exploitation films should be as a short and sweet assault of audacious aesthetic aberrance, unwavering moral bankruptcy, and keenly kitschy carnage in a work that exploits every unsettling social plague and rubs it in the viewer's face with the utmost malevolence, thus forcing the viewer to confront an unfortunate reality that they would never be exposed to in any Hollywood hack piece.

Opening with the Dogme-95-mocking inter-title, "This certificate proves that BLACK XXX-MAS was made according to the rules of TRAUMA 99,"

BLACK XXX-MAS

Black XXX-Mas then introduces 'God' (Manou Kersting)—an obscenely goofy-looking dude with a white leather-fag mustache that almost resembles a negro sporting 'whiteface' due to his somewhat primitive facial features—sitting on a fancy souped-up hammock in an all-white ethereal pleasure-dome playing a fairly cheap looking portable video game system (aka 'God's Gameboy'), which contains planet earth and ultimately reveals the setting of the film on its screen, the 'Urban Jungle,' where the discernibly sadistic master of the universe manipulates humans into doing mostly bad and degenerate things. From there, the viewer is introduced to 'Little Red' (Rochelle Gadd)—the mulatto progeny of a beer-chugging black career criminal and a haggard-looking old white slut that seems to suffer from estrogen deprivation—and as she narrates to the viewer with a trashy lower-class British accent in a fairy tale sort of way, "Once upon a time, there was a thing called reality. Now, in reality, there are no good guys or bad guys; there are just bad guys and guys that are worse. Well...that's what my dad says." Little Red's daddy is 'Black Santa' (Trinidadian actor Don Warrington, who appeared in Kenneth Branagh's Hamlet (1996)) and he might be a ruthless robber, but he knows that the multicultural ghetto is no place for anyone, least of all little girls, and as he tells his daughter after seeing her reflection in his beer can as she attempts to sneak out at night in a red mini-skirt, "IT'S A FUCKING JUNGLE OUT THERE!!!!" After watching some trashy TV and drinking some cheap canned beer, Black Santa heads out to rob some rich white folks on Christmas eve, which gives Little Red the opportunity to escape out of her apartment window and enter 'The Forest' (as advertised on a beat-up car) where she is sexually harassed by seriously scuzzy black and Arab gangsters while going to buy some cocaine from a slimy Chinaman. When Little Red gives the oriental dope dealer the cash, he picks it up with his teeth and then proceeds to grab the miscegenated teen's derriere as she goes to grab her bag of coke from a clothesline (!), so she gives the sneaky slant-eyed chink a nice big karate kick to the gut, aggressively declares to the yellow man, "don't fuck with me" and "the customer is always right," and goes on her merry way.

Everything seems great after Little Red gets her dope and she celebrates by lighting a big fat joint, but the one-lady party soon ends when a fascist cop with a phony German accent named Wolfgang Schutzwald (also played by Manou Kersting)—a fiendish fellow whose surname ironically translates as 'protector of the woods'—pulls up in a typically ridiculous-looking smart car and begins feeling up the poor little half-black girl after she fails to show ID. When someone takes photos of Wolfgang (or as he tells Little Red, 'Wolfy' for short) while he is grabbing Little Red's milk chocolate ass and tits, he decides to unload his service gun on them and soon discovers he killed about half a dozen female teenage tourists. After destroying the film in the dead tourists' cameras, Wolfy states to Little Red, "If you haven't seen anything tonight, I promise to stop bonking you in the ass," but she reacts rather melodramatically like blacks tend to do in such precarious situations by threatening to send him to jail and hitting him, so he rationally responds by knocking her out and eating her, stating as he begins gorging on her fingers, "Well, I'm afraid I have to remove the last body of evidence." Indeed, Wolfy is a sort of postmodern lycanthrope and he seems to have a special taste for dark meat, but unbeknownst to him, so does his wifey. Indeed, while Wolfy was eating Little Red Riding Hood in the hood, Black Santa was robbing his apartment in the white bourgeois side of town and in the middle of gathering up expensive stuff to steal, Mrs. Wolfy came out, saw the giant negro in the red suit, and got so hopelessly aroused that she decided to take off her robe and let the spade stranger do whatever he wanted to with her. Naturally, as a proud black man, Black Santa isn't about to turn down a fully willing white woman, especially when she makes it so easy for him. Unbeknownst to Mrs. Wolfy, Black Santa knocked out here prepubescent son when he had the gall to come out and ask Choco-Claus if he was Santa while the thieving soul brother was just getting started loading his sack with stolen merchandise.

When Wolfy gets home, he happily shouts "honey, I'm home," but when he notices his wife giving the big black buck in a Santa outfit a blowjob, he yells "oh my gut," pulls out his service pistol, and begins unloading bullets everywhere, symbolically shooting his wedding portrait in the process. While attempting to run away from the flying bullets, unclad Mrs. Wolfy turns around and reveals 'she' is actually a he, a s/he curiously has a cock between her legs, though Wolfgang and Black Santa don't seem to mind. In an attempt to stop her homicidal hubby from killing her new black beau, Mrs. Wolfy jumps in front of Black Santa and is ultimately sprayed with a fatal storm of bullets. While Wolfy stares with a shocked look on his face at his beloved's bloody bare-skinned corpse, Black Santa decides to take decisive action, grabs an assault rifle that is conveniently hanging over the fireplace, and literally blows the cannibalistic cop's head off after firing a single shot. Meanwhile, Black Santa's wanton old wench wife calls a male whore service and 'orders' a swarthy fellow named 'The Italian Stallion', who soon rolls to her door on roller-skates sporting assless leather-chaps and proceeds to show her some Mediterranean carnal magic. After killing Wolfy, Black Santa hears the voice of his daughter coming from inside the corpse of the dead cop, so he rips open the fallen policeman's mangled corpse and discovers his little girl Little Red inside. After telling Little Red, "I love you, darling" and groping her bloody breasts, the two head home and sing Christmas songs with Mrs. Black Santa under their Christmas tree where they have placed Wolfy's star-shaped police badge at the top in a pseudo-sentimental scene mocking the idea of a traditional 'white' Christmas. In the end, God, who has two bitches by his side, gets tired of playing his Gameboy and declares, "you know there are still people that say I don't do shit for poor people. Life is a bitch."

Personally, I have more sympathy for cannibalistic kraut cops than naughty negro robbers in ghettoized Santa Claus outfits, but I enjoyed Black XXX-Mas all the same, as it dares to depict the truly dystopian Europe of the near future and laugh about it in an ultra-cynical and culturally pessimistic fashion that lets the viewer know that auteur Pieter Van Hees has no doubt in his mind that technocracy, miscegenation, multiculturalism, and black 'culture' will not only lead to the death of the timeless European holiday of Christmas and fairy tales like Little Red Riding Hood, but his nation in general. Of course, 'death' might be too extreme a word, as it seems more like a defilement and bastardization of Xmas and European culture, just as Black Santa's daughter Little Red is the product of a mongrelization of Europid genetics and just as Black XXX-Mas is an ugly celluloid bastard that borrows cinematic ingredients from everything from old school blaxploitation flicks to the most superlatively soulless and artificial-looking action-packed CGI-ridden Hollywood blockbusters. Naturally, the difference between Van Hees' film and the mostly worthless works that it pays (anti)homage to is that the auteur intentionally utilized (or 'exploited,' hence why it is truly "an exploitation tale" as advertised at the beginning) these conspicuously crappy conventions and clichés to such an excessive and exaggerated degree that there is no doubt that the director created the film as a sort of radical and even nihilistic reaction to what he sees as the degradation of the art of cinema and culture in general as a result of a largely American/globalist influence. Indeed, with his later feature film Left Bank, Van Hees proved that he not only had the capacity to create something serious and even beautiful, but that he has a true deep sense of Flemish identity as reflected in the film's traditional European pagan themes that ultimately establish a link between the ancient past and the present in its depiction of rebirth and reincarnation, among other things. Of course, in its devilishly humorous depiction of a ruthless god who literally plays with human lives for entertainment and who less than sentimentally declares "life is a bitch," Black XXX-Mas could also be described as a piece of atheistic pomo paganism of the post-Odinist sort that reminds the viewer that traditional Christian beliefs and merry Christmases have become obsolete in an increasingly globalized multicultural world. Of course, whatever way you look at it, Van Hees' short is a fiercely funny antidote to that soulless consumerist joke that Christmas and the so-called 'holiday season' has become.

LEFT BANK

Sadly, I can't say I am too fond of many contemporary films from Europe. It seems that most films nowadays from Europa suffer from the same pathetic and bland "we are the world" globalist feeling that are so typical of Hollywood films. Sorry, but if I wanted to see an Arab wearing a turban, I don't need to see them in a French (like the wretched filthy Paris, je t'aime) or German film. An American intercity cab driver is an easier way to see this anti-cultural phenomenon. Every once in a while I will be surprised by a film from Europe that actually has some type of cultural and nationalist feel to it. The Flemish "horror" film Left Bank is one of those so rare contemporary European films that is worthy of high praise.

Left Bank follows in the wonderful horror tradition of The Wicker Man (1973) old thyme European pagan themes. Also like The Wicker Man, Left Bank follows a confused protagonist as they start to uncover the ancient beliefs and practices of their ancestors. Upon first to watch Left Bank (which I knew nothing about), I expected some type of pretentious existentialist garbage so typical of many European films today. As Left Bank unravels, the film becomes progressively engulfing and addictive. It would not be at all falt to call the film merely a "horror" film as the majority of braindead populous horror fans probably wouldn't make it 30 minutes into the film. Being from Belgium, the Left Bank also has subtitles which are guaranteed to ward off fans of something like say The Ruins or Saw V.

The protagonist of Left Bank is young competing runner named Marie who is slightly anti-social. After finding out she has to stop running and miss a much anticipated tournament in Portugal due to problems with her woman parts, Marie goes into a depression. Her emotions changed overnight, however, when she hooks up with a cool guy named Bob and they start having sex in every angle and place in Bob's fancy apartment. Marie almost instantly moves into the apartment which happens to be located in the dreaded Left Bank. Great sex can only last so long as Marie becomes obsessed with a mystery concerning a young girl who disappeared from the apartment that Marie inhabits.

Marie eventually finds out that the apartment she now lives in also happens to be located in a place where pre-Christian human sacrifices took place. Marie's eccentric mother "feels" the evilness of the apartment and naturally wants her daughter to move out. Marie, however, is stubborn and insists on uncovering the mysteries of Left Bank. Marie also receives a knee injury that gets uglier the more she realizes she has gotten herself in too deep. To say anymore about the film would be to give too much away.

Europe seems to be having a trend of quality and artistically merited horror films. The Swedish film Let The Right One In was a surprisingly good new take on the vampire film. Left Bank is an ambitious and original horror film that also deserves the acclaim that Let the Right One In has received. Unfortunately, I think that Left Bank might be a little too confusing for the typical American film goer. I am sure that the Europeans will have enough common sense to make sequels to these films unlike the typical coke snorting American producer.

THE PROTECTOR

Prachya Pinkaew (2005) Note: For Future Reference, This Review Covers the Tom-Yum-Goong Feature, Not the Heavily Cut American Version.

With the relatively small splurge of Dragon Dynasty titles being examined and reviewed, I turn my attention to one of the films that had me hyped for some time. I remember watching promo videos for The Protector on YouTube and feeling incredibly throttled, past adrenaline and Internet hype. The same synthetic boost has recrudesced in the form of a promo reel that first appeared on Twitch film. The film is Ong Bak 2 and this time Tony Jaa has moved past Pinkaew to further his name and drop the lame excuse of a lacking story. Although Pinkaew embraced the feud between the debut director Tony Jaa, even he should admire the amount of martial arts diversity that Jaa is dabbling in.

Animal companionship is a wonderful thing. I fondly recall one of my personal favorite retro video games for the Nintendo Entertainment System. The title was Blaster Master and much like The Protector, you star as a warrior on a mission to retrieve an animal very dear to you. I reminisce constantly on the ambient electronic key shifts that make up the Blaster Master opening score. The plot revolves around a Boy and his frog, who happens to jump onto a power generator and feeds off radiation thus grows to an enormous size and burrows into the ground. Once you enter the chasm, you find a futuristic space-tank waiting for you. While The Protector doesn't travel into the realms of the unreal, the source has a similar heart. Currently, Tony Jaa has subjectively been placed on a high-seated pedestal for me. While my personal love for martial arts stretches from the glories of the chambers of Shaolin and the merciless form of Wu-Tang, to Donnie Yen and Sammo Hung, that ultimately ends in guilty pleasures of Wesley Snipes in the original Blade film; I'd like to think I have a diverse taste. Hell, combat in general enralls me. I wouldn't be considered a necessarily violent person but I won't deny vicious thoughts. Tony Jaa to me is that angry rock music teenagers listen to to extinguish their angst temporarily. But for me, Tony Jaa just makes me want to kick ass even more. Reflecting his culture & religion as painfully demonstrated in Ong-Bak: The Thai Warrior, Jaa tramples his opponents while brazenly wearing and promoting symbols of his culture. He makes his traditions "cool" and "badass" by beating thugs to death with face-cracking Muay Thai moves that prove daunting even to a 6'7 man child. The effort in which he provides do defeat wave after wave can articulately recall to the side-scrolling beat-em-up series of Streets of Rage for the Sega Genesis. Now that I ponder on the thought, much of Tony Jaa's The Protector can be compared to old-school video games. Truth be told, The Protector is a step up from Ong-Bak in several distinguishable categories. For one, the fighting is more extreme and more frequent. Tony Jaa is not a household name yet. For his own brand of self-product placement included in Ong-Bak, Jaa would continuously do over-the-top stunts in slow motion just to wow you. They don't fit in with the background really but watch a man with flaming legs do intense acrobatics is a very accommodating thing. Following by foot is the orchestrated score created by none other than the hip hop guru, The RZA. For those of you who aren't blissfully educated in the subcultures of rap, the RZA is the creator of the enamorous Wu-Tang Clan and an accomplished proprietor of most Asian cinema related releases. Other than scoring martial arts films and black-themed samurai cartoons (Afro Samurai), the RZA grants many lost kung-fu films DVD releases in several box sets and bargain bin collections. For this I am eternally grateful. Sides from that, he appears in several films as a sickeningly thin black power character, ala Derailed. His performance along with Vincent Cassel's makes the film. Back to the subject of the score, other than a few popping rhythmic tunes, the rest is everyday culture-infused squabble that only bares a soul to prevent distraction. The Protector features an incredibly awkward plot point of a Thai man's love for his elephants. Given the raw Lion King treatment, The Protector features seldom emotional depth and is only accentuated by the DVD cover art showing several explosions and a bleeding shirtless man. Had they attempted to create a tender backdrop to the disc, the film would have fallen flat on its face. Expect nothing other than pleasurable violence and Tony Jaa breaking over 50 henchmen in half. The Protector is as big of an action wet dream as it sounds.

It seems with the culture-distorting and deracinating power of globalization and Americanization, India has finally caught up to the late-1960s American cinema underground, at least if one were to judge solely by the independent 'anti-Bollywood rap musical' Gandu (2010) aka Asshole directed by controversial Bengali auteur 'Q' aka Qaushiq Mukherjee (Love in India, Tasher Desh). Paraded around the world, including Yale University, the 2010 South Asian International Film Festival in New York City, and the 2011 Berlin International Film Festival, among various other places, as a revolutionary work due to its innately transgressive and subversive nature as a rare Indian film that features unsimulated sex, hardcore drug use, raunchy anti-social rap music, and various other forms of 'western' post-counter-culture cosmopolitan liberal degeneracy, Gandu is an intentionally juvenile work with a potent punk rock spirit about a young loser Bengali graffiti 'artist' and amateur rapper who lives in the trash-ridden and poverty-stricken bowels of Kolkata. Like any pretentious auteur, Mr. Q opted for shooting most of Gandu in black-and-white film stock (though he actually used a high-definition Canon EOS 7D Single-lens reflex camera), which admittedly gives the film a more gritty and timeless feel, but also makes it rather reek of deluded self-importance. In a September 2012 interview with Travis Carwford for Artsploitation films, director Q described his reasons for directing the film as follows: "GANDU was born out of a hunger that became a challenge, to make a film without the boundaries of morality that my society has built around us. To be able to go back to the basics, and make the film without virtually any support system barring my immediate resources. The idea of working on a rapper's story was on my mind for some time, and also the image of a rickshawala. I wanted to make a punk film – pungent, noisy, and dirty, something that is prohibited in Indian society." And, indeed, Q was not lying as the film was not only shot on a miniscule budget with only eight crew members and no official script, but Gandu was also banned in India, thus demonstrating that Indian cinema has come a long way since Jean Renoir directed The River (1951) aka Le Fleuve and helped launch the careers of both Indian auteur Satyajit Ray and his cinematographer Subrata Mitra. Indeed, with its lack of narrative structure/plot, decidedly degenerate social outcast protagonist and equally debased supporting characters, Cinéma vérité-like interviews with real-life folks, pointless Chelsea Girls-esque split-screen scenes, patently pessimistic depiction of capitalist urban life, and less than puritanical portrayal of sex (and mostly decadent/dysfunctional sex at that), Gandu is—for better or worse—the first anti-Hollywood/anti-Bollywood Warholian Indian flick, thus making it a truly revolutionary work worthy of cinephile attention.

Gandu aka Asshole (Anubrata Basu) is an asshole born from a loser lineage of perennial assholes (or so his enemies say) as the bastard son of a busy Bengali whore who merely wanders around his superlatively shitty city all day and starts all sorts of nihilistic ruckus, essentially acting like a social retard for social retard's sake. To financially support himself and not starve to death, Gandu steals money from his overweight mother Kamalika's (Kamalika Banerjee) boyfriend Dasbabu (Shilajeet Majumdar) while the two lurid love turds are having radically repellant sex. According to Gandu, "An asshole life is a fucking asshole life," and to keep himself semi-sane and cope with the patently pathetic nature of his gutter-bound existence, the young Bengali bastard composes a crappy musical cocktail of punk/rap with juvenile lyrics like, "In a dark corner of your room I lurk. You feel love I feel like puking. Your sins burn you, You sit up. Petrified of losing your youth. Some fuck will run away with it. I've seen a lot of swines around. I sit and think in the dark corner of your room. When will the mask FALL OFF YOUR FACE?". Indeed, Gandu is no Nietzsche, nor even a Tupac, but his angst is authentic and his art and dreams all that he has and thus he uses them to fill the gaping void in his sub-proletarian soul. One day, Gandu is walking around like a jackass and bumps into a fellow dreamer and Bruce Lee-wannabe named Ricksha (Joyraj Bhattacharya) who smacks him around like a little bitch for getting in his way and having an arrogant attitude. Gandu must be a majorly masochistic fellow because he has a dream that night about being buggered by Ricksha and the two become best friends in a mostly platonic fashion shortly thereafter. Among other things, the two chaps rap for impoverished child audiences in seemingly war-torn ghettos, smoke heroin, watch pornography, and buy bootleg Bruce Lee VCDs from China. Eventually, Gandu is caught stealing and watching his mother screwing her boyfriend, so he and Ricksha smoke some heroin and hit the road and go on a sort of drug-induced spiritual pilgrimage where they are given a strange drug by a Sadhu and a poet tells the rapper he is the star hero of a film (thus comprising a rather bizarre film-within-a-film sequence). Not long after, Gandu magically wins the '50,000 jackpot' in the local lottery and goes to find a "nice girl to fuck" aka a prostitute (portrayed Rii Sen, who plays two other female roles in the film, including the Goddess Kali), which he does in the sole color scene featured in Gandu. After gaining carnal knowledge from the amorous 'Angel,' Gandu decides to record a five-song rap demo as he dreams of one day getting a "Red Carpet welcome on the Streets of New York." With the Goddess Kali teasing and molesting him in the dark, Gandu somehow rises from the Bengali rubble and rabble and becomes a big rap/punk star; or does he?!? Indeed, in the drug-and-delusion-addled world of Gandu, nothing is as it seems.

Featuring a culturally mongrelized Bengali rap-punk soundtrack, unsimulated scenes of little Bengali boys busting little loads and a fully unclad Goddess Kali playing with young boys, and an all-around westernized take of urban Bengali living, Gandu has the grand distinction of being the most degenerate Indian film ever made, but, of course, that was auteur Q's goal. Of course, Gandu also stands out in that it is a Bengali film as opposed to Hindi flick, which director Q put in perspective when he stated in an interview, "India has hundreds of cultures, languages, religions, and philosophies. Every region, or state, has its unique history and a strong sense of identity. Hindi is technically our national language, and has northwestern Indian origins. Bengal is in the east, and has a very different approach to life. Currently, under the umbrella of India, the homogenization process has made urban life fairly similar, but the basic differences exist. It would be politically incorrect to begin this subject of difference in our cultures, because I will vehemently proclaim the Bengali culture to be the best in the world, full of ancient insight and pagan values, modern intellectual abilities and a desire to be strikingly different from anyone else, but then, I am a Bengali." Indeed, despite its anarchistic, anti-social, and iconoclastic essence, Gandu has an unmistakable 'Bengali völkisch' feel that seems to betray its overall 'message.' Indeed, as someone who has been to enough punk concerts and has seen enough erotic flicks to have nil interest in seeing such things appear in a bastardized form in an Indian film, I think that Gandu's most potent and preternatural qualities lie in its dark mysticism and surrealist imagery, especially in regard to those scenes featuring Kali. Oftentimes compared to Danny Boyle's Trainspotting (1996) and the films of Gaspar Noé, Gandu certainly does seem like a less violent Bengali take on I Stand Alone (1998), albeit with a more spiritual and, in turn, conflicted, view of the rotten third world urban hellhole it portrays. Whether looked at as a piece of locally-directed Bengali 'poverty-porn,' culturally-mongrelized punk-rap musical, Indian arthouse flick, a postmodern Indian response to Hesse's Siddhartha, and/or a revolutionary landmark in Indian cinema, it would be simply xenophilic puffery to describe Gandu as a 'masterpiece' in any sense of the word, yet it has at least inspired me to keep an eye on the future of Indian cinema, which is no small accomplishment.

Quentin Dupieux (2010)

You're just as likely to prevent a natural disaster as you are to understand the driving force behind Quentin Dupieux's Rubber. Known through and through-out as a film dictating a sentient, psycho-kinetic tire on a killing spree, Rubber is that damn iconic just from the teaser trailer alone. When I had seen the trailer around a year ago I had questioned some of the segments in the trailer. "Why are there chairs methodically placed on a desert road? Why is there a small group of people wielding binoculars?" Starting out Rubber on a high note, Quentin (Mr. Oizo to those familiar with his Lamb's Anger) simply tosses a "no reason" into our lap and throws a police officer into a trunk of an automobile and drives off into the distance. It is as simple as that, folks. Rubber takes pride in its off-kilter insanity yet it represents a force so strong that it is indeed impossible to shrug the film off, whether you enjoyed it or not. Rubber is quite potent in its form of contemporary avant-garde. Let's not forget the soundtrack created by Mr. Oizo himself with the help of Justice's Gaspard Augé. It's worthy of any Ed Banger aficionado with that rare disembodied appeal that works as not just thematic sauce for the images, but as an incredible project altogether.

I would consider myself a sizable fan of Mr. Oizo's work. Most fittingly, my favorite track that he has produced is the tentatively titled Bruce Willis is Dead. It is a track that I've committed to playing if that fateful day were ever to come. When I had heard of the film Rubber, I made no connection between a psychic tire and the French electro house producer. When it finally dawned on me, Quentin being Oizo's slave name, I was shocked and thrilled at the same time. It is always a pleasant treat watching someone excel in a particular medium only to toggle forms, no matter if it turns out to be a classic case of "Don't quit your day job." Rubber is quite the opposite and it surpasses even that when traces of the electronic eccentricity of Oizo come gasping for breath through the screen. The lead character, Robert, is a special kind of tire; brandless, the puppet master presumes. Who I refer to as the puppet master is the sheriff figure who leads the charade, the film within a film, within a film. Ties get severed and origins unnecessary as Dupieux wheels us around on an utterly insensible film. Rubber is a batty creation, incomprehensibly blind, perhaps even to its own origin. This is why Rubber rubs off with such exclusive wit and esotericism. It's the definition of a pet project and I'm amazed that something like this could even have to gall to request funding. I'd imagine that Dupieux put forth most of the money on this production. Unless of course Rubber's producer is a nerd, in which case, more power to him.

Rubber takes a strange turn once the post-post-meta elaboration begins. A group of individuals are called to a dune overlooking a Californian desert. Given binoculars, a member of the group, a small boy, quickly quips "I hope it's not a silent film!" So right off the bat normal conventions are dismissively tossed out the proverbial window and a sheen keen to absurdist methods is layered evenly. What occurs from here spreads to plots of poisoning and trope-bashing demonstrations of Dupieux's authority on set. Some of us might want Rubber to progress, maybe flesh out a tad differently from its willed path but Dupieux reminds us who exactly is in charge--for the masochist in us all. Had Rubber been a short 20 minute film like several critics suggest then the sparkling after-taste, well, wouldn't exist. It would have been an experience to sleep off while you arise, continuing about your ritualistic day of instant ramen and cheap beer. I intend to not flesh out some of the more disconcerting aspects of Rubber for the integrity of this picture means as much to it as blood does to us. No iconoclastic remarks could harm Rubber's cemented reputation as "that killer tire film" for Quentin anticipated such and placed his film firmly on high ground. Rubber is a film I recommend to every soul because whether or not they enjoy isn't the case for recommendation. It is the fact that opinion will be so bewildering and eschewed that the only relative comparison to the result would be that of a riot.

HELL COMES TO FROGTOWN

R.J. Kizer (1988)

Rowdy Roddy Piper; This name about sums up the level of seriousness in the film. This wrestler plays a character named Sam Hell. Don't be fooled, he isn't as badass as his name implies, but i didn't say he wasn't a pimp. In a world full of infertility after a nuclear attack, babies start springing up from the sexual trail Sam left behind. Forced by a government division called MedTech, Hell must journey into Frogtown to rescue female hostages and knock em' up. Hell Comes to Frogtown takes the theme of Escape from New York, with the forced government work and the consequences for saying no. This politically-sparked maneuver fits well with the controversy of the U.S. Draft. Forced labor is rarely a good thing, nor a promising one. Hell Comes to Frogtown is laden with a comic book feel. The quirkiness of the characters allows the film to stretch and pace evenly. This is all thanks to the Howard the Duck-esque special effects. Infertility is a nightmare that was recently explored in Children of Men. No doubt, Children of Men is the greater film and would be near perfect had the pregnant carrier been a Negro. That disgusting cast choice was a bold move as how the birth rate for Africans is huge. Multiculturalism is a tactic that most contemporary directors in the mainstream use in their arsenal. This project was later granted a 1.5 million dollar budget and switched to 35mm. Despite having the backings of Roger Corman, the studio execs weren't ballsy enough to have nudity or gore. What makes Frogtown so much damn fun is the backfired attempt at making Rowdy Roddy Piper into a Hollywood badass. While this film did bomb, it was resurrected as a cult classic; a title it does deserve. Frogs have never looked so slimy. They are presented with low guttural voices and a fascination for dancing white women. This individual scene has to do with a Frogman getting an erection and calls it "The Three Snakes" I can only imagine horrible images in my head so i thank god everyday that i didn't have to see that. Hell Comes to Frogtown is hilarious, ridiculous, and good-spirited. Avoid the sequels at all costs. Any sequel with Roddy Piper is trash. This film could have used some wrestling moves against Frogs though.

CLOSET LAND

Radha Bharadwaj (1991) Closet Land is a film about torture. Don't get this confused in with the pointless films that show other ethnicities torturing white devils, this one lies within the mind. The film is backed with two actors, equally amazing. There is no other characters outside the tight, limited space reminiscent to the claustrophobia of Cube.

When i think of proper political films, only a few spring to mind; Arlington Road is one of the more narcissistic ones. The plot concerns a person (Alan Rickman) confining a woman (Madeleine Stowe) who is believed to hide political propaganda in her children's books in order to subliminally mold them to resist the government. With a plot that speaks of no depth or details to it, it goes surprisingly far. It's a neat little political gem that causes you to think and pay attention to every move this sadistic interrogator makes. You are unsure of who the real victim is, most of the runtime. Whether it be Rickman or Stowe, neither of them have a say in the matter. The one thing i can truly applaud the film for, is it's incredible use of sounds. Of course, Rickman shines as the oppressor. The film ends with a blurb stating the percentage of citizens being wrongly and cruelly tortured & interrogated by their own government. Statistics like these rattle you to the core. The film speaks against propaganda, though itself can be seen as anti-government propaganda. I wouldn't put it past India-born director Radha Bharadwaj. Her feminist touch to this film shows greatly, and only weightens the serious tone down to an almost halt. The ending is one that you can never be certain. Is it just another cruel technique to make her a victim of her conscious? Closet Land is an incredibly effective and tense, brooding thriller. It showers light on inhumane torture and interrogation but relies too much on gender and it's own propaganda needs.

THE OPENING OF MISTY BEETHOVEN
THE OPENING OF MISTY BEETHOVEN

Radley Metzger (1976)

When it comes to the ‘great’ works of the Golden Age of Porn, chances are megalomaniacal Hebrew pornstar/pornographer Jamie Gillis (Water Power, New Wave Hookers) is featured in it performing some ungodly sexual act on some seemingly naïve goy gals and/or guys and such is certainly the same, at least to some extent, in regard to Radley Metzger’s The Opening of Misty Beethoven (1976) aka Misty Beethoven; a loose (in more ways than one) and lecherous erotic adaption of Irish playwright George Bernard Shaw’s play Pygmalion (1912), as well as the hokey Hollywood musical adaption My Fair Lady (1964) directed by George Cukor. A work following a psychopathically charismatic and wantonly wisecracking sexologist of the discernibly Semitic persuasion who in his unwavering narcissism believes he has the sexual skills to turn a prudish and erotically challenged wasp prostitute named Misty Beethoven (Constance Money) into the most wild, wicked, and desired whore of the posh pussy-peddling sort, The Opening of Misty Beethoven, whether intentional or not on the director’s part, as a whole, makes for an audacious allegory for the Hebraic influence over eroticizing and oversexualizing the Christian Occidental with its Semitic sexologist as the suave Svengali teacher of a neurotic Nordic babe who, quite symbolically, has the same Germanic surname as one of the greatest musical composers of human history, thus making its inclusion of three major Western cities (Paris, Rome, New York City) all the more meaningful and perversely penetrating. Directed by Radley Metzger (using the pseudonym ‘Henry Paris’), a man who got his start in the filmmaking world editing trailers for Janus films (the parent company of The Criterion Collection) of François Truffaut and Ingmar Bergman films but would become one of the greatest, if not the greatest, artsy fartsy pornographers who ever lived, and starring Jamie Gillis, the actor and director apparently had a connection that transcended the mere obsession of defiling blonde beastesses of the super sexy Shiksa sort. As Benson Hurst wrote in the liner notes of the DISTRIBPIX INC. DVD release of The Opening of Misty Beethoven, “Radley seemed to have a soft spot for Jamie. Though they hadn’t seen each other in years, they lived in the same city and would often ask after each other. They seemed content to conduct an invisible dance around each other, like two old Jewish compadres not wanting to break the magic spell of their separation.” Unsurprisingly, Constance Money (born Susan Jensen) – a woman who went from an A+ high school student and cheerleader turned a woman who had one of the most seen vaginas in the world (her stint in porn was mainly to help pay for her college tuition) – has less than fond memories of The Opening of Misty Beethoven due to the fact she made virtually nil money (she claims to have never signed a release nor got paid and hated Metzger) from starring in one of the most monetarily and critically successful porn flicks ever made, but also because she started an off-screen romantic fling with co-star Jamie Gillis that got a bit too sexually violent for her taste, thus acting in stark contrast to her character's 'last laugh' at a former sex sage turned cuckold.

As Constance Money once stated regarding her experience with starring in The Opening of Misty Beethoven, "Misty" is a good movie because it is real. The incidents in the film were happening to me at the time, especially my relationship with Jamie [Jamie Gillis]. Henry Paris [director Radley Metzger] made me that character. He told me I couldn't act, so I fit the part." Indeed, as a woman who does not know how to apply lipstick without looking like a crack-addicted ghetto drag queen and soullessly advertises that she accepts compensation for her costly cunt in the form of credit card via an especially anti-erotic American Express t-shirt, Miss Misty looks and acts like a dead dud in bed would, but things change when super suave sexologist Dr. Seymour Love (Jamie Gillis) – who clearly studied at a different university than Magnus Hirschfeld and Alfred Kinsey due to his rampant heterosexuality and hypnotic playboy personality – takes up the challenge of rigorously training her to be the most sexy and salacious streetwalker in the world after seeing her give a haphazard handjob to the Napoleon Bonaparte (whose less than bold boner is almost pulled apart, but he inevitably gets off) in a Paris movie theater. A libidinous lady's man of the dually 'cocky' and devilishly charming conman sort, Dr. Love has a feisty female assistant named Geraldine Rich (Jacqueline Beudant) to help give Misty a more female yet fiery touch in the art of love in a rather rigorous sexual training that involves facials, blowjobs, handjobs, sodomy, girl-on-girl action, and just about everything besides standard vanilla sex because, after all, The Opening of Misty Beethoven stars Jamie Gillis; a semen demon of the bisexual, sexually versatile kind. As her guru of lascivious yet loveless sensuality, Dr. Love has Misty get some practical experience of the eclectically erotic sort, including giving hope to the homosexually hopeless by helping an impotent make-up-wearing art dealer (played by fashion model turned gay porn star Casey Donovan; star of Wakefield Poole's 1971 gay porn hit Boys in the Sand) of the poofster persuasion to achieve orgasm via juicy vaginal stimulation and performing a virtual magic act by causing a trio of dapperly dressed butlers to achieve orgasms simultaneously while standing in unison. After evolving into a masterful madam of the job, be it of the blow, hand, rim or otherwise, Misty steps things up by competing in a carnal knowledge contest at a wild porn party at the home of famed pornographer publisher Lawrence Layman (played by Ras Kean aka Ras King and modeled after Hugh Hefner) so she can be creamed and eventually crowned with the glorious title of "Goldenrod Girl." Needless to say, Misty wins via her wild wantonness and develops an ego larger than the cocks she routinely polishes and thus turns the tables on Doc Love, leaving his dick in the dust as a professional playboy turned pathetic pushover who hopelessly lusts after a stupid Shiksa that he transformed into a virtual baroness of blowjobs and buggery.

THE OPENING OF MISTY BEETHOVEN

Despite being one of the most strikingly stylized and elegantly assembled porn flicks ever created, a relative 'honor' no doubt, The Opening of Misty Beethoven is oftentimes an exceedingly anti-erotic celluloid affair that would probably mostly appeal to sadomasochistic lesbians of the bourgeois persuasion, as well as cultivated cuckolds who prefer to be on the receiving end when it comes to copulation. In short, The Opening of Misty Beethoven, although flagrantly farcical, is, like a good percentage of porno flicks, a fiercely fetishistic work that, in terms of its professed 'eroticism,' will mostly appeal to the sexually dysfunctional, hence its debauched lace curtain setting among the rich and sexually powerless. Naturally, it takes a proletarian pussy to whip these blue-balled, bluebloods into shape. Probably most famous/infamous for an extraordinarily emasculating "pegging" scene involving a butch bourgeois bitch with a dyke haircut named Barbara (played by then 46-year-old Gloria Leonard), Misty, and quasi-poof publisher Lawrence Layman (it has been said by his former bunny concubines that the real-life Mr. Hefner needs a steady diet of Viagra and gay porn to "rise to the occasion"); a fellow that is apparently powerful in the pornographic print world but whose idea of a good time is being anally penetrated by a social-climbing hooker. The Opening of Misty Beethoven must have gotten some people hot and bothered, especially among passive men, as few adult films, even of the 'porn chic' sort, have developed so much prestige to the point of being the closest X-rated work to crossover into the mainstream and being taken seriously by film critics and academics. On top of Radley Metzger winning the award for "Best Director" from the Adult Film Association of America for The Opening of Misty Beethoven, along with the film winning "Best Film" (and being one of the first films to be inducted in the XRCO Hall of Fame) Jamie Gillis (who was inducted in the XRCO Hall of Fame later as an 'actor' in 1985) won the award for "Best Actor" for his performance, but apparently the greatest honor he received for his work came from a random Rebbe at a Purim party. As Benson Hurst wrote, "The sign of true success is when art penetrates popular consciousness and appears in the unlikeliest of places. Mark Jacobson, writer, journalist and esteemed chronicler of New York life, recalls attending a Purim party with Jamie somewhere in deep Brooklyn...it turned out to be way wilder than any Hebrew school grad might have imagined...Rabbis were stumbling around with empty Jack Daniels bottles, their beards sopped with vodka. Several fights broke out. Jamie was a little amazed by this. "Jews! Drunk and fighting!" he kept saying, like a New York Post headline. As they stood there, one of these orthodox types hurtled himself in their direction, his thick, Torah-studying glasses flying off his face and landing right at Jamie's feet. Jamie picked the glasses up and handed them back to the man...The rabbi adjusted his glasses, taking care to flop his paies in the proper position. Now able to see again, he took one look at Jamie and said, "You! You I know! Misty Beethoven!" Then he stumbled happily toward the door," which is quite the Hebraic honor for a Jewish man who shares the same birthday with Adolf Hitler and is, in part, best known for playing an evil enema bandit who cleaned the intestinal pipes of unsuspecting goy gals.

In its utilization of themes from works by George Bernard Shaw, Dali-esque set design, and art deco architecture, The Opening of Misty Beethoven is just as much of a sexual ravaging of European kultur as it was for Constance Money, which was created at a time where prostitution and smut-peddling had replaced empires and high art in the Occident due to the apocalyptic conditions spawned by the Second World War. After all, it is a grand tradition of conquerors to pillage the conquered people's women and take them as corrupted concubines and the same thing can generally be said in the context of art. As Jamie Gillis' onetime-roommate and fellow Judaic porn performer Robert Kerman aka R. Bolla (Cannibal Holocaust) once stated, "I hope that porn is the most unrighteous thing I do. If we go out of our way to be scumbags, that's the sin, when I do porn, I offend Shakespeare more than God," and I think it is safe to say that Mr. Shaw (incidentally, the Greek mythological figure 'Pygmalion' that inspired his play also influenced Shakespeare's The Winter's Tale) would be less than enthralled to learn that his art was turned into sensually stylized cinematic smut of the Semitic sort. Indeed, while the Hebrews certainly take the kosher cake when it comes to dominating ownership and propagandistic propagation of pornography, Aryans undoubtedly dominate when it comes to pulchritude and sexual stamina, or as the great antisemitic Semite Otto Weininger once wrote, "The Jew is always more absorbed by sexual matters than the Aryan, although he is notably less potent sexually and less liable to be enmeshed in a great passion," and the anti-climatic (at least for Dr. Love) conclusion of The Opening of Misty Beethoven, quite unintentionally I am sure, shares the same sentiment.

A MAN LIKE EVA

Radu Gabrea (1984)

“I wanna die like James Dean. You know how he died?”; or so asks a fanatical auteur named “Eva” – a fanatical filmmaker who lives, breaths, and directs films and has a hard time differentiating between the real world and the cinematic realm – to his film crew as he puts them in grave danger as he fantasizes about a subconscious suicide of sorts while driving like a perturbed maniac on the prowl in the claustrophobic cinematic work Ein Mann wie EVA (1984) aka A Man Like Eva directed by Jewish-Romanian auteur Radu Gabrea (The Secret of the Ice Cave, The Beheaded Rooster). Of course, the “Eva” (played by Eva Mattes in dyke drag) of A Man Like Eva is really supposed to be the pseudonym of Rainer Werner Fassbinder – the König of German Cinema whose own personal life paralleled the nihilistic and naked melodrama of his many cinematic efforts like no other auteur in the world before nor after him – as a work of celluloid grained in relatively, if not oftentimes obfuscated, objective biographical truth that both pays homage to the auteur yet at the same basks in the open wounds of his faults, failures, and general ugliness; terrible traits that would also provide him a positive source ‘to direct’ his tragic genius. A lifelong lover and loather of women who has been both severely criticized and revered for his uniquely unflattering but innately intimate depiction of the fierce fairer sex in groundbreaking and totally singular works like The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974), Fear of Fear (1975), The Stationmaster’s Wife (1977), and The Marriage of Maria Braun (1978), among countless others, Fassbinder would have certainly appreciated the irony behind the fact that Eva Mattes – a marvelous and monstrous movie “mean girl” who played the lead role in the director’s Jail Bait (1973) aka Wildwechsel as a seemingly sociopathic teenage femme fatale who preposterously plots to have her boyfriend kill her overprotective father so she can have more ‘freedom’ – of all Fass-bande graduates would depict him. Aside from sharing a similarly homely semi-mongoloid appearance, both Fassbinder and his former actress know how to play “queen bitch” and anyone who has seen the director’s Germany in Autumn (1978) would have to completely concur as he was not a master of misery and misanthropy-driven melodrama for nothing! Beginning with the quote, “It is better to be hated for what you are than to be loved for what you are not,” written by French pederast and Nobel Peace prize for literature André Gide, A Man Like Eva immediately lets the viewer know that the angst-ridden anti-hero is a rather unpleasant and in more ways than one. Ostensibly oneiric in tone throughout in some sort of melancholy metaphysical hell mostly contained within a mere house, A Man Like Eva is a dauntingly dispiriting work that indubitably reminds one why Fassbinder’s death was probably not solely the result of a miscalculation of how much stardust he snorted up his nose, but a preordained outcome that was a long time in the making.

As his ex-wife Ingrid Caven – his filmic Marlene Dietrich to her Josef von Sternberg – once eloquently expressed: “Rainer was a homosexual who also needed a woman. It’s that simple and that complex.” Indeed, if one were merely going on the daunting and even disgusting depiction of the filmmaker in A Man Like Eva, one would think Fassbinder was merely a furious and oftentimes flustered fag-meister whose jealous scorn would instantly incinerate even the most cuntish heated and hysterical of harlots, thereupon one could hardly describe the film as a masturbatory memorial ejaculated out by one unknown to capitalize off the posthumous infamy of another. Herr Eva is not exactly a pretty fellow due to his pudgy build and overall pitiful appearance, but that does not prevent him, despite his gayness, from getting blowjobs from his lead actress Gudrun (Lisa Kreuzer); a character that seems most in tune with Ingrid Caven, but sharing attributes of his other lead divas Hanna Schygulla, Irm Hermann, Margit Carstensen, and Barbara Valentin. Of course, blowjobs aren’t just blowjobs as it is the gender of the mouth that counts and Eva clearly prefers thin lips, no hips, and firm grips and he won’t let any beauteous bitch in his way stop him from haphazardly attempting to convert happy heterosexual men to seedy sodomy. Eva’s male ‘sex slave’ of sorts in A Man Like Eva is a genial but groveling buck negro named Ali (played by black Senegalese-Bavarian Charles M. Huber) – a character that is clearly a composite of Fassbinder’s real-life lovers Günther Kaufmann (Whity, Querelle) and El Hedi ben Salem (Ali: Fear Eats the Soul, Fox and His Friends), the latter of which would commit suicide via hanging like the character, albeit under much starker conditions. In an interview for the book Chaos as Usual: Conversations About Rainer Werner Fassbinder (2000) compiled by Fassbinder’s late-era film editor and the Fassbinder Foundation head Juliane Lorenz (Lili Marleen, Veronika Voss), German New Wave dandy auteur Werner Schroeter held his filmmaker friend partly responsible for his lover El Hedi ben Salem’s death, stating: “It was a simple story. Salem had hanged himself in jail. I blamed Rainer for that. I told him that people assume responsibilities for one another...I blamed Rainer because I felt he had let down a friend who, to a certain extent, was not his equal. Salem was not an educated person; he was not at all sure of himself,” which also characterizes Eva’s relationship with Ali in A Man Like Eva, where the blighted black boyfriend makes every attempt to get his lackadaisical lover’s attention, only to be unappreciated to the point where he sees no way out other than via suicide. Indeed, erratically evil Eva is not only an authoritarian auteur on film sets, but a demented dictator of the house that he and his incestuous film family occupy, dictating to his female actors who they may and may not sleep with (especially those he wants to fuck!) and trying to convert handsome heterosexual actors into homosexuality thus entangling his actors in fatalistic bizarre love triangles with himself at the center of it as a puppet-master of sorts. Needless to say, A Man Like Eva concludes on quite a superbly sour note that is not all that different from a Fassbinder melodrama, although more dreamlike and exceptionally eerie in its essence and dramaturgical execution.

A phantasmagorical frisk of Fassbinder's ill-fated life, A Man Like Eva is a fleeting and funereal yet fantastical film featuring an oftentimes ferocious but mostly frivolous virtual ghost of post-war German film history as the protagonist. As an old man in creepy clown makeup tells Eva after discovering the self-slaughtered body of another crude composite character named Walter/Armand (played by Werner Stocker) – a rampantly heterosexual love interest of the filmmaker – near the end of the film: "I'd prefer anything in the world to being a fool..But I wouldn't want to be you!" Indeed, if any German New Wave auteur paid for his art with literal flesh and blood, it was Rainer Werner Fassbinder; a man who lost two lovers via suicide (to which he felt overwhelming guilt about), suffered a self-annihilating drug addiction, and a chance at a financially (especially considering the sort of money he was making towards the end of career) stable bourgeois life he always claimed to abhor yet seemed to have a misguided nostalgia for, hence his failed attempt at marriage, as well as his obsession with Bavarian Catholic iconography as expressionistically depicted in A Man Like Eva. An absurdly audacious and ambitious auteur who once stated, "I would like to build a house with my films. Some are the cellar, others the wall, still others the windows. But I hope in the end it will be a house," Fassbinder's house comes allegorically alive in A Man Like Eva with his epic melodramatic period piece Effi Briest (1974) acting as the wallpaper, the fictionalized anecdotes from his life acting his bricks, and the film itself being an endearing, albeit firmly faultfinding, obituary from one of the filmmaker's most favorite actresses, Eva Mattes, and certainly one of the most strikingly singular gifts a screen diva could bestow upon a respected director, especially since she essentially owes her early success to the man (Jail Bait, Eight Hours are Not a Day, Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, Effi Briest). Naturally, A Man Like Eva is a melodramatically morose memorial that was a direct aesthetic result of Fassbinder's death as the seemingly manic-depressive man it pays tribute to certainly would have attempted to put a stop to the work had he been alive, but in the spirit of Jail Bait (1973), Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975), Querelle (1982), and countless other cinematic works, director Radu Gabrea and Eva Mattes had no interest in sparing anyone's feelings, especially those of a six-foot-under enfant terrible.

In one of Fassbinder's infamous 'misogynistic' aphorisms that was often used against him by fuming feminist detractors, he made the insightful observation that: "Women who let themselves be oppressed often are more beautiful than women who fight back." Judging by the severely sickly and estrogen-deprived appearance of most prominent feminists, it should be no surprise as to why Fassbinder hit a nerve with these often hostile and hysterical people, but if one were to judge the filmmaker's personality on the basis of Eva Mattes, who knew the man all too well, it is easy to see how he came to this revelation being a 'spiritual woman' of sorts who saw less intellectual beauties as perennial enemies that would always bed the men he could never truly satisfy as a biological man. In another aphorism by the antagonistic auteur, he wrote: "Most men simply cannot oppress women as perfectly as women would like them to." Of course, Fassbinder, who was by now means a handsome man, gave women the marvelous masochism that they inconspicuously craved, hence the spell he put over Irm Hermann, among countless other women, to the point where she seriously thought that should could convert to him to heterosexuality as she described in Rosa von Praunheim's documentary Fassbinder's Women (2000). If one learns anything from A Man Like Eva, it is that Fassbinder, as a gay man, was able to give women something they could not get from heterosexual men, but at the same time was unable to give the femininity and biological womanhood desired by straight men he swooned over, as an anomalous being that fit somewhere in between, henceforth his innate need to create an unconventional family of sorts that was brewing with chaos and destruction. That being said, A Man Like Eva is a must-see film for any self-respecting Fassbinder fan, though I doubt it would make anyone wish they had the opportunity to be a part of the hapless auteur filmmaker's descent into an abyss of loneliness and eventual self-obliteration.

PAFNUCIO SANTO

Rafael Corkidi (1977)

With his unfinished Marxist Mexican celluloid odyssey ¡Qué viva México! (1932), homo Bolshevik auteur Sergei M. Eisenstein (Battleship Potemkin, Alexander Nevsky), despite failing to fully realize his artistic vision, essentially planted the seeds for all avant-garde and largely far-left Mexican (and sometimes Spanish) films to come, especially in regard to surrealist/acid westerns like Alejandro Jodorowsky's El Topo (1970) aka The Mole and Fernando Arrabal's Long Live Death (1971) aka Viva la muerte. Undoubtedly, if any of these follows the most closely thematically to ¡Qué viva México! in terms of its anti-colonial sentiment and call-to-commie-arms sociopolitical spirit, it is surrealist quasi-western Pafnucio Santo (1977) directed by Rafael Corkidi (Angels and Cherubs, Desires aka Deseos). Best remembered today as the cleverly calculating cinematographer behind the stunning camera work in Jodorowsky's Fando y Lis (1968), El Topo, and The Holy Mountain (1973), as well The Mansion of Madness (1973) directed by Juan López Moctezuma and Anticlimax (1973) directed by Mexican Renaissance man Gelsen Gas, Rafael Corkidi and his films, which are virtually impossible to find by any legal and official means, have undoubtedly been dropped in the garbage heap of surrealist cinema history, which is indubitably a minor cinematic tragedy of sorts, if not a surprising one considering the somewhat impenetrable, compulsively artsy fartsy, and overwhelmingly non-linear nature of these works. Rather absurdly chosen as the Mexican entry for the Best Foreign Language Film at the 50th Academy Awards but ultimately not being accepted as a nominee, Pafnucio Santo—a terribly pretentious peasant pseudo-Biblical tale—is a sometimes ominous and always odd operatic hodgepodge of nauseating nudity (including unclad old men and little boys, including the director's son) and demonic erotic dances, unadulterated anti-Americanism, minor Nunsplotation, sardonic anti-Catholicism, mystifying Mexican folk hero worship, Makavejev-esque communist criticism from the left, and quasi-high-camp of the Hispanic sort. Featuring a number of characters, who are sometimes in drag and played by the same actors, lip-synching to popular opera (sometimes in German!), Pafnucio Santo is undoubtedly a work that owes much credit to arthouse camp/kitsch auteur filmmakers of German New Cinema, especially Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Der Bomberpilot), Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King, Hitler: A Film from Germany), and Ulrike Ottinger (Freak Orlando, Johanna D'Arc of Mongolia), thereupon making it a work that stands far enough apart from the films of Jodorowsky and Arrabal as a curious celluloid cultural mongrel of sorts despite its somewhat militant Mexican power message. Centering around a sort of preteen Mexican Marxist messiah/revolutionary, Pafnucio Santo follows the (un)holy 'Hispanic' hero through history as he plays stupid American football in Aztec ruins, talks to his spiritual mother Frida Kahlo, and discovers that Patty Hearst is a big bitch and nihilistic misanthrope who is not a true red Marxist revolutionary.

Told in operatic surrealist segments (journey, visitations, vespers, revolution, etc.) that vary in quality but are virtually always visually entrancing, Pafnucio Santo begins with the introduction of a dark emissary (Juan Barrón), who resembles a cross between Che Guevara and Leon Trotsky, has flames flashing from his face, and sports a militant uniform that looks like a cross between that of a fascist blackshirt and those worn by the killing squads that belonged to the Soviet Cheka. Upon running into Adam and Eve, the dark figure criticizes them for covering their genitals, thereupon criticizing the anti-life/anti-sex dogma of the Catholic Church that has spiritually castrated horny Mexican peasants. When seeing Jesus Christ die on the cross in the desert, the dark revolutionary pays him no mind, but he sneers with vile hatred when seeing a deadly crew of Klu Klux Klanners carrying a large burning cross, shotguns, ropes, and chains. The dark emissary also watches in disgust as a group of Jewish women and children are led through a gate with the infamous Auschwitz quote "Arbeit macht frei" ("work makes (you) free"), which was undoubtedly a German joke against the Jews and communists that director Rafael Corkidi certainly does not find funny as a true believer of the Gospel According to St. Marx. The black-caped emissary is here to make sure that a young football-tossing boy named Pafnucio Santo (the director's son Pablo Corkidi) aka Holy Pafnucio is able to find a Marxist anti-Mother-Mary-like woman to give birth to a new Red Messiah of the Mestizo revolution. When preteen prophet Pafnucio meets with degenerate communist artist Frida Kahlo, she sings to the little lad, "The Party ordered you to look for the mother...who has the people's struggle in her blood...because the red Messiah is about to be born. He will be, like Lenin, a great leader, a bold fight. A titan of the future!" and the boy bolshevik goes on his merry way to find the potential mother for Jesus Marx. Pafnucio also encounters Spanish Conquistador Hernán Cortés, the man who crushed the Aztec empire and helped form the mongrelized multicultural nightmare that Mexico is today, singing in a pigsty in an allegorical scene that demonstrates that the director thinks the conquistador was a pig who turned the Aztec lands into a pile of pig shit. When Pafnucio runs into a lady named 'Patty Kane' (a reference to Patty Hearst and Orson Welles' Citizen Kane, the film that defiled the heiress' grandfather William Randolph Hearst's legacy), he finds her to be a 'red fascist' (as his comrades goosiestep) and nihilistic misanthrope as demonstrated by her singing of the following lines, "I hate people, I love war! Everything makes me sick, in this world!" thereupon making her an excellent candidate for being the Mother of Mexican Marxism. Pafnucio also runs into hostility from a stereotypically Mexican folk dancer, who states hatefully after the boy compliments her Mexican hat dance skills, "The little dance that you like so much, and I've been dancing all my life, is a plague! It's what they call "nationalism", "patriotism"...and I used it to get fucked! The Jarabe Tapatío is for everyone and everything, yes sir!," which rather upsets the wee lad. Little Pafnucio also has a marvelously melodramatic time viewing a Teutonic opera performance of William Shakespeare's classic tragedy Romeo and Juliet, but only when meeting Emiliano Zapata in drag (played by Gina Morett, who plays at least two more characters in the film), who looks quite fine whilst wearing nothing more than a vest of shotgun shells, does he seem to discover his Marxist Mother Mary and is able to shed his American football uniform forever.

A work that, while retaining the original lyrics of classic opera compositions, features totally different subtitles with stupidly stereotypical revolutionary lines like "red star of gleaming red" and "Mexicans, heed the cry of war! Awaken!," Pafnucio Santo is essentially an aberrant and absurdist agitprop flick that performs a sort of reverse-colonialism, aesthetically raping and pillaging classical European culture. Considering that the largely left-wing Mexican-Americans of California elected Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger governor of California simply because he is the Terminator, it is highly doubtful that such an art-addled work as Pafnucio Santo would have entertained them, let alone inspired the everyday Jose Schmose Mexican proletarian to take revolutionary political action. Featuring American football players playing an aggressive game in ancient Mexican monuments set to musical compositions by Richard Wagner and a young revolutionary who likes to dress like a cliché brainwashed American slob with a football helmet and Mickey Mouse t-shirt, Pafnucio Santo basically takes the stance that not only did the Spanish destroy the ancient Aztec gods and indigenous culture, but that cultural colonialism still lives on today in Mexico via Americanization/globalization. Despite its superficial aesthetic and thematic similarities with the films of Jodorowsky, Pafnucio Santo is ultimately a different breed as a Heimat film for Hispanics who hate the word 'Hispanic' and dream of the return of the Mesoamerican deity of war Huitzilopochtli and the destruction of Amero-gringo hegemony.

Undoubtedly a work that derives its greatest strengths from its iconoclastic imagery and propensity for making KKK lynch mobs and Hebrew tots being led to the gas chamber seem like an exceedingly ethereal nightmare of the abhorrently aesthetically pleasing sort, Pafnucio Santo is best seen today as a failed yet oftentimes enthralling piece of novelty celluloid concept (anti)art deserving of minor cult status. More militantly idealistic than the celluloid magic tricks and jestering of Jodorowsky, Pafnucio Santo is also a work of Third World propaganda cinema that slightly rises above the level of simple commie clichés, even if the work is ridden with such vomit-inducing Trotskyites banalities. The closest thing to a Mexican Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Rafael Corkidi proved with Pafnucio Santo one can still hate a people/culture (i.e. Europeans), but respect them at the same time as demonstrated by the director's use of musical compositions by Anton Dvorak, Edvard Grieg, Antonio Vivaldi, Richard Wagner and Giacomo Puccini, as well as his curious nods to Shakespeare and Orson Welles and undeniable influence from European arthouse cinema of the late-1970s. A film that will certainly be of interest to those oh-so few 'Brown Power' cinephiles and the white nationalist cinephiles that hate them and would like to study the psyche of the enemy, Pafnucio Santo is political propaganda at its most patently perverse as a sort of bootlegged made-in-Mexico Meštizo brother film to Makavejev's Sweet Movie (1974). Described in a 1977 New York Times review as being, "a bit like a homemade backyard shrine, admirable for what it says about the builder's capacity for compassion, regrettable in its confusion of prettiness for high art," Pafnucio Santo is nothing short of amazing proof that even gringo-hating Mexicans can be pompous art fags who can have an exaggerated sense of prowess as cultural critiques. Of course, if a race war occurs in North America and Mexicans and other Amerindians either win or establish their own ethno-nationalist racial state, I hope at least that Pafnucio Santo and director Rafael Corkidi's other films are rediscovered and acknowledged as true Meštizo art, but I seriously doubt it as the film lacks a certain machismo spirit. After all, I doubt many masculine Mexicans would approve of their hero Emiliano Zapata depicted with tits and no cock, but I would say I respect Corkidi for inventing a sort of Schroeter-esque form of Cholo high-camp.

NATIONAL LAMPOON'S LAST RESORT
NATIONAL LAMPOON'S LAST RESORT

Rafal Zielinski (1994)

The two Coreys star in National Lampoon's Last Resort. This straight to VHS trash classic is virtually unknown to most movie fans (and for good reason). This was also one of the last films in which Feldman and Haim collaborated with each other. Corey Haim's brain doesn't seem as fried in Last Resort as it tragically is now. At least ¼ of Last Resort is spent making the audience aware that they are watching a movie. This reflexive tool gets old fast. Last Resort also takes a neo vaudevillian approach in tribute to Feldman and Haim's comedic pioneering ancestors. I got the feeling the Last Resort was like Forbidden Zone for special ed. Middle school kids. Soul Mates. The cartoon like quality of the film invites the viewers to just have fun. At not point does Las Resort take itself seriously. The villains of the film constantly change wardrobe and voices. Pirates and Hitler go great together. Corey Feldman also appears briefly at the end in his Michael Jackson costume. He has a true love for the king on pop. A bickering elderly Jewish couple also appear in the film. They haven't had sex in over thirty years. Unfortunately their abstinence ends at the conclusion of Last Resort. A Texan couple appears dumb and excited (for MOVIES!) in contrast to the Jewish couple. Every wack job attends Last Resort. The most interesting aspect of Last Resort is the film's set design. Purposely contrived and exaggerated, I found myself enjoying the look of Last Resort. The film also had similar cardboard cutout look to Richard Elfman's Forbidden Zone. Last Resort borders on the silly and the surreal. I remember watching the film in elementary school and thinking it was fucked. It sure beats a film like Harold and Kumar Go to White Castle (an all time low for humanity).

FLEISCH

Rainer Erler (1979)

Naturally, as an American, it is not often that I bump into late-1970s German horror films at thrift stores, so when I discovered a VHS copy of Fleisch (1979) aka Spare Parts aka Hôtel de l'apocalypse aka Carne aka Le motel rouge directed by West German TV auteur/novelist Rainer Erler (Operation Ganymed, Das blaue Palais mini-series) in a giant black case, I naturally bought it (or should I say, my girlfriend bought it for me). Exceedingly misleadingly marketed in the United States as a sexually-charged slasher flick (the Vidmark Entertainment VHS release I have features a scantily clad babe on the cover whose body parts have been dismembered as if her limbs are puzzle pieces) and featuring the somewhat ridiculous puffery-plagued tagline: "The cutting edge in medical terror!," Fleisch was produced by the German TV channel ZDF (Zweites Deutsches Fernsehen aka Second German Television) which, through its experimental feature slot 'Das kleine Fernsehspiel,' produced a number of important works by top auteur filmmakers associated with German New Cinema, including Werner Schroeter, Helma Sanders-Brahms, and Ulrike Ottinger, as well as foreigner experimental filmmakers like Raoul Ruiz and Stephen Dwoskin. Of course, Fleisch is certainly no highbrow avant-garde work, as a somewhat hokey horror-thriller with rather terrible dialogue, an absolutely abhorrent hippie-esque folk soundtrack, and a convoluted and sometimes just plain nonsensical storyline, yet the film has something about it that makes it marginally notable, especially in regard to its distinct German perspective regarding the United States. Indeed, shot in New Mexico and New York City, Erler's anti-intellectual exercise in so-called "medical terror" features an America where everything, including illegally harvest organs, has a price and people do not bullshit, especially when it comes to killing and 'kicking ass.' Indeed, sort of like the Paris, Texas of kraut quasi-exploitation cinema, Fleisch is at its greatest and most stunning when depicting the barren beauty of southwestern landscapes and unbelievably ugly east coast urban decay. Depicting a country where people are so stupid that they do not even know that Germany is a European nation and where truckers comprise a secret society of honorable, if not violent and uneducated, renegade heroes of sorts, Erler's film may be a second rate horror-thriller with conspicuously contrived dialogue and a sometimes nonsensical plot, but it offers a rare honest cinematic depiction of the ostensibly glorious United States of America and its semi-feral-like Euripid citizens.

Hot young blonde Teuton Monica (Jutta Speidel) has just married her American musician boyfriend Mike (Herbert Herrmann) and for their honeymoon, they have decided to take a whimsical road trip across the American southwest, even though they have very little money to spend. While cruising through New Mexico, the two spot a shockingly cheap motel with the strangely fitting name Honeymoon Inn that offers couples a room and free coffee for a mere $7.50 a night. When the two newlyweds drive up to the motel, they are immediately greeted by the eccentric owner (Tedi Altice), who dresses like a white trash gypsy and has a rather contrived friendliness, as if she is a big bitch suffering from constipation who is trying as hard as she can to put on a friendly front. Upon renting a motel room, the two lovers are soon bombarded with personal questions by the motel owner, who remarks to Monica, "Well, I can hear you ain't American and I can see you ain't from Mexico." After Monica remarks that she is from Germany, the motel owner absurdly asks, "Germany? Oh, is that in Europe?," to which the sensual young Aryan beauty sarcastically replies, "Yes, I'm a kraut...A Fritz, a Fräulein...Anything wrong with that?" After settling into their motel room, Monica and Mike do what newlyweds should do by making passionate love, but the fun soon ends after they finish having sex and subsequently frolic around outside in the arid desert where they soon notice a mysterious ambulance driving off-road. Monica must have supernatural powers as she instinctively runs away from the ambulance and begs her hubby to do the same, but he ignores his wife's warnings and is soon kidnapped by the two EMTs driving the vehicle. Luckily, Monica manages to get away, but when she goes to the motel owner for help, the old pseudo-gypsy con-woman pretends not to know her and seems quite apathetic to the blonde babe's pleas for help. Indeed, the motel owner is in cahoots with the mad medic kidnapppers and she calls back the ambulance to kidnap the horrified German girl, but Monica manages to get away and subsequently waves down a cynical redneck Polack trucker named Bill (Wolf Roth).

While Bill is initially annoyed by Monica's fear-based shivering and assumes she is a teenage runaway who has some sort of pathetic "sob story," he soon begins to warm up to her and realizes she is really in trouble after hearing her somewhat dubious story. Indeed, Bill is a hardworking trucker who is fueled by "uppers and a steady supply of coffee" and has no time to help anyone because he has to transport "20 tons of frozen beef to New York," but he cannot help but help a hot young half-naked Aryan babe in need. After running into the EMT kidnapppers at a diner, who eloquently describe Monica as a junky "bitch" who escaped from a mental institution, Bill begins to totally believe Monica's story and agrees to selflessly help her to find her husband Mike. With the support of his uncommonly loyal trucker comrades, Bill comes up with the plan to have Monica and himself intentionally kidnapped by the black market ambulance bandits so they can trap the malevolent medics and have them interrogated regarding Mike's whereabouts. Indeed, after the two are kidnapped at the Honeymoon Inn (Monica sports a brunette wig to obscure her identity), Bill's trucker friends chase down and trap the ambulance and attempt to interrogate the EMT goons, but the degenerate medics will not go down without a fight. After shooting and killing one of the murderous medics, Bill strips the other one naked and puts him in the meat freezer in the back of his truck in an attempt to get the pseudo-

EMT to talk. As it turns out, the ambulance is used to kidnap complete strangers who are sold at $2000 a head to sinister surgeons who run an international black market organ bank that is patronized by wealthy cripples that need organ transplants. Bill and Monica learn that a certain Dr. Jackson (played by German documentary filmmaker/actress Charlotte Kerr) is responsible for running the underground organ harvesting industry, so they decide to pose as medics and head to the hospital of horrors where the organ harvesting takes place in the hope of finding Mike.

Needless to say, Monica is rather shocked when she is randomly approached by Dr. Jackson while waiting for Bill in the ambulance and learns that the seemingly depraved doctor is actually a sophisticated and reasonably attractive woman who takes her job rather seriously, especially in regard to preserving and transplanting donor organs. Ultimately, Dr. Jackson figures out that Monica is the wife of involuntary organ donor Mike and coerces Bill and the Teutonic beauty to fly out to NYC via airplane to transport a couple of 'patients.' On the airplane ride, Monica discovers her husband Mike, who has been drugged and is strapped to a stretcher, in the back of the plane, but she and Bill are soon drugged against their will and tied to their seats. When the plane lands in NYC, Monica somehow manages to escape after abruptly jumping out of the airplane door and running through a series of abandoned buildings, but her personal crusade to help Mike and Bill now seems hopeless, so she merely waits at a dangerous park nearby the hospital where her husband and friend are imprisoned and begins to cry hysterically. When a police Sergeant (Bob Cunningham) spots Monica sitting in a dangerous part of central park, he has her detained and listens to her rather far-fetched story involving murderous medics and sinister surgeons. As it turns out, Dr. Jackson has come forward to the police and has confessed to her crimes. With the rather worthless help of the police, Dr. Jackson and Monica manage to smuggle Mike and Bill out of the heavily secure hospital, but they are chased down by the good doctor's Svengali-like male Intern (Christoph Lindert), who slicks back his hair in a rather unfashionable fashion that is not unlike Hannibal Lecter, thus giving him an ominous appearance. As Dr. Jackson reveals, she was blackmailed by the Intern into getting involved with the organ harvesting black market after she got involved in a dubious organ transplant involving her terminally ill son. When Dr. Jackson first met Monica and realized the deleterious effects she was having on people's lives, she finally decided enough was enough, or so she explains to the young Aryaness. Ultimately, Dr. Jackson manages to save Monica, Mike, and Bill by dropping them off on the street in the middle of a car chase between her and the Intern's men. In the end, Dr. Jackson becomes a martyr of sorts after she is killed in a car crash when her ambulance is run off a road by the Intern's men. Ironically, Dr. Jackson does not become an organ donor in the end, though Monica, Mike, and Bill pay their respects to her at her funeral.

FLEISCH

Undoubtedly, compared to the great works of German New Cinema being produced at the same time by ZDF, Fleisch seems like an obscenely outmoded celluloid pseudo-horror turd that has become less than fresh with age, yet if looked at as an original cinematic portrait of America and its eclectic landscapes from a depicted from a distinctly Teutonic perspective, the film is surprisingly entertaining and certainly has some minor aesthetic merit. Indeed, if you're looking for a celluloid postcard of America that does not emotionally drain and/or bore the viewer like the malignantly melancholy quasi-existentialist cinematic meanderings of Wim Wenders, Fleisch makes for a reasonably fun filmic road trip through the United States. Surprisingly, Rainer Erler's film was somewhat recently remade by South African auteur Oliver Schmitz (Mapantsula, Paris, je t'aime) as a German-SA co-production entitled Deadly Harvest (2008) aka Fleisch. Of course, there are countless other films in the same vein as Fleisch, including Michael Crichton's Coma (1978), Cardiac Arrest (1980), Larry Cohen's The Ambulance (1990), and Turistas (2006) directed by Hollywood hack John Stockwell, but one can hardly call any of these films masterpieces. Undoubtedly, Fleisch must have stricken fear into some Germans when it was first released, as a work where virtually all of the characters are either uneducated and/or hicks, New Mexican seems like seem sort of hellishly hot rural pandemonium-like wasteland, NYC looks like a grimy and even somewhat grim third world sewer, and doctors/medics target foreigners for their priceless organs. As for real-life organ harvesting, it is well documented that the Israeli's have been doing it for decades, with the government of the only official Jewish nation in the world even confessing to stealing the organs of dead Palestinians during the 1990s. With that being said, I have to admit that I would love to see Roland Klick, who directed his classic acid western Deadlock (1970) in the Negev Desert during the chaotic aftermath of the Six-Day War, get back behind the camera for the first time in decades and direct a film in the spirit of Fleisch on Israeli organ harvesting. Indeed, for fans of anti-intellectual kraut filmmmmakers from the 1970s/1980s like Klick, Roger Fritz, Klaus Lemke, Rudolf Thome, and Eckhart Schmidt, Fleisch makes for a sometimes aesthetically pleasing piece of Teuton-sired trash Americana.

THE LAST REVENGE

Rainer Kirberg (1982)

Naturally wanting to distance themselves from the legacy of the Third Reich, some young filmmakers of German New Cinema looked towards the grandfather generation for a 'legitimate' German film heritage, with Bavarian wild man auteur Werner Herzog (Stroszek, Woyzeck) being one of the most vocal proponents of this notion as a man who was mentored by German Jewish film critic/historian Lotte Eisner (author of the imperative Teutonic film history works Murnau, Fritz Lang, and The Haunted Screen: Expressionism in the German Cinema and the Influence of Max Reinhardt) and would later play the ultimate celluloid tribute to his ancestors by remaking German expressionist master auteur F.W. Murnau's masterpiece Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922) as Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979). Indeed, even the 'heart' of German New Cinema, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, looked to his grandfather generation as a man who used German Jewish novelist Alfred Döblin's novel Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929) as a template for many of his films, including his cinematically monolithic 14-part magnum opus Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980). Additionally, Fassbinder also produced and starred in Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (1973) aka The Tenderness of Wolves directed by Ulli Lommel, which is a sort of quasi-remake/tribute to Fritz Lang's expressionist masterwork M (1931) starring Peter Lorre. Undoubtedly, out of all the films of the German New Cinema era, the kraut classic Die letzte Rache (1982) aka The Last Revenge directed by Rainer Kirberg (Grottenolm, The Sleeping Girl) has to be the most literal take on Teutonic expressionism. An exceedingly eccentric and eerie yet darkly humorous work that seems like a celluloid crossbreed between Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), Fritz Lang's Dr. Mabuse the Gambler (1922) and Metropolis (1927), and Richard Elfman's Forbidden Zone (1982), The Last Revenge certainly feels like the marvelously misbegotten celluloid creation of a raving mad movie scientist with an acute aversion to anything post-expressionist. Made in collaboration with the Neue Deutsche Welle group Der Plan, whose third album "Die letzte Rache" was the soundtrack for the film and whose member Moritz Reichelt was partly responsible for the surrealist set design (not to mention member Frank Fenstermacher has a small role in the film), The Last Revenge was produced by the West German TV channel ZDF as part of their 'Das Kleine Fernsehspiel' series—a program responsible for producing important works by Fassbinder, Rosa von Praunheim, Edgar Reitz, and virtually any other important German filmmakers of the 1970s/1980s—and would develop a virtual instant cult following in Germany when it was first released and rightly so as a rare work that manages to pay apt tribute to the Fatherland's expressionist legacy yet also manages to add to the aesthetic style that auteur filmmakers like Murnau, Lang, and Wiene pioneered. Starring the criminally underrated

THE LAST REVENGE

German actor Erwin Leder—a man who valiantly portrayed the schizophrenic serial killer in Austrian auteur Gerald Kargl's criminally underrated masterpiece Angst (1983) and would go on to play eclectic roles in everything from portraying a Waffen SS officer in Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993) to playing a memorable role in the grotesque Hungarian arthouse flick Taxidermia (2006)—in the lead role, The Last Revenge is like The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari for those that cannot stomach silent film scores.

The Worldly (Erwin Leder) is a gaunt dandy-like dude who lives in a Teutonic desert where trios of singing fish heads pop out of the ground that somewhat resemble the sandworm from Tim Burton's Beetlejuice (1988) and deliver prophetic songs of truth and tragedy with a sort of sadiſtically sardonic flare. After traveling for some time on foot, Worldly reaches Water Hill, the home of the great Ruler (Gerhard Kittler, who died shortly after shooting the film), who invites the seemingly half-deranged dandy into his semi-aquatic home. The Ruler has juſt learned that his fiercely flamboyant Morrissey-esque son (Paul Adler) and quasi-dyke daughter (Anke Gieseke) are carrying on an incestuous affair, so he asks the Worldly—a man that catches the dictator's attention by ſtating, "You interest me and I will interest you"—to do as follows: "I've loſt my son. You're the Worldly. Go out into this world and look for the man who will be my heir inſtead of my son." To hide his undying shame, the Ruler decides to build a monument to cover up his perverse progeny's decidedly degenerate legacy, ſtating, "I will put up a monument for you. Yes, the failure that you were in flesh and blood ſhall be clad in iron and ſtone." Of course, the Worldly agrees to do the Ruler's bidding and declares, "You ſhan't be disappointed" to the somewhat melancholy monarch. Of course, as prophesied by a crooning trio of grotesque fish regarding the Worldly's upcoming urban expedition, "ill fortune would ſtrike, what terrible plight. Bad luck! Bad luck! He overrated his far-sight!" and indeed things do not go exactly as planned in eccentric expressioniſtic krautland. Of course, the Worldly finds his task to be rather dubious, but nonetheless finds three potential successors to the throne. The firſt is an obscenely narcissiſtic pansy fellow named 'the Beautiful' (Armin Sorg) who is, at the very leaſt, ambiguouſly gay. The ſecond potential heir is a swarthy philiſtine muscleman narcissiſt named 'the Strong' (Georg Ensermann) and the third is a neurotic and pedantic egghead named 'the Wiſe' (Richard Pleuger) who proudly proclaims, "Knowledge is my greateſt virtue. Knowledge – always ſeeking for the truth. Reason aſks the queſtion "why?", while the reſt of the world goes by," while ignoring the fact that his life is going down the drain as he ſpends all his time reading books. Of course, as can be expected from three exceedingly ſelf-centered and power-hungry gentlemen, the contenders for the throne end up ſpending more time plotting each other's demise than proving to be fit for rule, ſo the Worldly ultimately comes to the conclusion that he and only he can be the new ruler, declaring to hiſelf, "I'm wandering this world, offering his inheritance: Fortune, wealth, and power.

But what must I find: Nothing but stupidity, debility, and arrogance. He has no heir. No one is worthy. Nobody! Really nobody!," as a true opportunistic man with a Svengali-like plan.

Unbeknownst to the Worldly, a dubious Inspector (Josef Ostendorf) and his Assistant (played by Der Plan member Frank Fenstermacher) hired by the Ruler have been following him on his search and figures out his conspiratorial plan to take the throne. After giving a truly Goebbels-esque speech to the citizens of the post-industrial metropolis regarding his quest to find a new successor to the throne, the Worldly is given quite the shock when the Ruler takes the stage and gives a hysterical Hitler-esque speech denouncing him. Of course, the Worldly is imprisoned due to his treacherous plan and decides to seek revenge against the Ruler while getting all moody broody in his jail cell, declaring to himself, "The hour of retribution is near. Everything is a question of time." And, indeed, the Worldly gets his revenge when a sinister and equally insane Rotwang-esque Scientist (Volker Niederfahrenheit), who works for a huge industrial conglomerate called 'Krebs' (undoubtedly a reference to 400-year-old German dynasty Krupps that Visconti 'damned' in his 1969 masterpiece The Damned), breaks him out of prison and helps him seek his revenge against the Ruler. Rather unfortunately, in killing the Ruler, the Worldly and the Scientist unwittingly make him immortal, which was the Monarch's plan all along. In the end, the Worldly—a man who once proudly professed, "I am the dark unknown...the person nobody's heard"—must come to the realization that he is nothing more than a pawn after the Ruler says to him, "Your friend achieved something great. I will pardon your rashness which, due to my maneuvering, has borne fruit. Let me assure you, you've achieved your goal: You've killed me! But I had anticipated your imprudence. Just as you disposed of those that may have hindered me, you have now eliminated the last obstacle in my way. You've created what you wished to destroy! You thought this would be the end, instead it is the beginning. Death has become life, time has become eternity. When death hath overcome them all, as they rot and stink repulsively, 't'is I who'll stand forever tall, never to perish, divinity! Farewell my friend. You have served your purpose. You have played your role! I shall now leave you to your fate." Naturally, in the end, The Last Revenge manages to get weirder and weirder and more ludicrously labyrinthine, with the Ruler's incestuous adult children torturing their father in his immortality, said Ruler's children dying a tragic yet romantic death, and the Worldly taking on a deranged messianic-like mentality.

As for as I am concerned, no other post-WWII film that I have seen has managed to better capture the aesthetic essence of works from the German expressionist than The Last Revenge. On top of that, there is no other film of its era that manages to be so detached from the prevailing aesthetic(s) of German New Cinema, as if auteur Rainer Kirberg had been given a time machine from the evil alien from the once-lost German science fiction Algol: Tragedy of Power (1920) directed by Hans Werckmeister in the hopes of destroying the Teutonic New Wave. While I am typically skeptical of films that attempt to mimic old films from the past and see it nothing more than a needlessly novel gimmick (with the obscenely overrated Academy Award-winning French flick The Artist (2011) being a great example of this), The Last Revenge manages to transcend mere postmodern dilettantism as a work that even manages to transcend Geheimnisse einer Seele (1926) aka Secrets of a Soul directed by G.W. Pabst in terms of its wonderfully wayward celluloid idiosyncrasy. In terms of its featuring of Triumph of the Will-esque speeches from antihero the Worldly and his nemesis the Ruler, The Last Revenge also seems to mock, if not unintentionally so, the thesis put forward in kosher commie film critic Siegfried Kracauer's reductionist-ridden Teutophobic polemic From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film (1947). In fact, one of the things that makes The Last Revenge such a refreshing work, aside from its obvious audacious aesthetics and absurdist blend of storytelling, is its general lack of far-left political posturing and soulless social realism, as a work that would have certainly irked Kracauer, who vehemently bemoaned the so-called 'escapist' and aesthetic-driven essence of German expressionism. Indeed, avant-garde in a fashion on the polar opposite side of the spectrum to the aesthetically sterile works of a neo-bolshevik filmmaker like Jean-Marie Straub, The Last Revenge easily achieves what Canadian auteur Guy Maddin has merely attempted to during his entire filmmaker career as an innately provocative and strangely humorous neo-expressionist work that does not seem like it was directed by some autistic fanboy cinephile who has seen one-too-many Fritz Lang flicks.

THE LAST REVENGE

Rainer Langhans (1991)

While people tend to look at the Nazi era as the darkest chapter in 21st century German history, I personally see the late-1960s with the rise of the German student movement (aka '68er-Bewegung'), counter-culture types, and ultimately far-left terrorists to be the most decidedly despicable point in Teutonic history of the past century, even if it sired the most exciting film movement since the German expressionist period. Indeed, while National Socialism inevitably led's to Deutschland's complete and utter spiritual and physical ruin, thief and butchering of its land, annihilation of countless irreplaceable pieces of art and architecture, and the death of a good portion of the country's populous, the counter-culture put the final nail in the coffin of German culture and resulted in what Nietzsche once described as a 'Umwertung aller Werte' (aka transvaluation of all values), albeit of a decidedly degenerate slave-morality-driven sort where worship of the untermensch (i.e. aberosexuals, mostly Jewish communist revolutionaries, rock stars, third worlders, etc.) and weakness reigned and centuries of German kultur and tradition was disposed of without a second's thought due to its ostensible 'fascist' character, being replaced with xenophilia (aka 'noble savage' worship and fetishism), drug (pseudo)culture, anti-Occidental Frankfurt school twaddle and related commie theories, and polygamous communal living. Undoubtedly, one of the most central and important figures of the kraut counter-culture movement was perennial hippie Rainer Langhans, who was a founder of the (in)famous West Berlin commune 'Kommune 1' and who was known for his romantic relationship with German fashion model and bohemian sex symbol Uschi Obermaier, as the two were described as 'the most beautiful couple in Germany' (despite the fact that Langhans looks like a scrawnier and more Jew-y version of Weird Al Yankovic). Aside from being a popular hippie degenerate and all-around bullshit-ridden charlatan, Langhans was also a part-time actor who appeared in classic German New Cinema flicks like Haytabo (1971) co-directed by Ulli Lommel, World on a Wire (1973) directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, and The Hamburg Syndrome (1979) directed by Peter Fleischmann, so it should be no surprise that he eventually tried his hand at directing, with his documentary Schneeweissrosenrot (1991) aka SnowwhiteRosered, which he co-directed with Christa Ritter, offering an insightful depiction of the decadent zeitgeist of which he was an iconoclastic icon. Centering around twin German gold-diggers Jutta and Gisela Schmidt (aka Jutta Winkelmann and Gisela Getty)—two commie counter-culture/proto-punk divas of the sexually androgynous and neo-Bolshevik sort who gained fame due to their association with degenerate oil heir/kidnap victim John Paul Getty III (who Gisela married, which spawned the actor Balthazar Getty) and their association with Langhans/Kommune 1—Schneeweissrosenrot ultimately depicts a self-absorbed late-1960s/early-1970s

West Germany inhabited by narcotic-addled narcissists and delusional far-left dilettantes who reached for the sky in terms of their rather childish yet dangerously unhinged utopian dreams, only to get a rather rude awakening when they were smacked in the face with the reality of soul-destroying drug addiction, dysfunctional 'unconventional' families, and the high price of free love and so-called communal living. Featuring interviews with a number of great German New Cinema filmmakers that personally knew both Gisela and Jutta, including Werner Herzog, Wim Wenders, Alexander Kluge, and Adolf Winkelmann, as well as various famous American figures like Dennis Hopper, Leonard Cohen, Timothy Leary, and Sean Penn, Schneeweissrosenrot ultimately makes for a sometimes interesting and insightful celluloid artifact that, quite ironically (especially considering it was co-directed by all-mighty anti-bourgeois charlatan guru Langhans), deconstructs and tears apart the shallow and innately infantile idealism of the so-called 'peace and love' generation. In short, I found Schneeweissrosenrot to be a bittersweet piece of celluloid Schadenfreude in terms of its unflattering depiction of the fall of the West German fellaheen.

Opening with a semi-surreal scene of tall corpse-like twin sisters Gisela and Jutta blowing away a cardboard cutout of Dennis Hopper sporting a cowboy hat and proceeding to beat one another in what seems like jealous incestuous hatred, Schneeweissrosenrot immediately lets the viewer know that the two subjects of the documentary are less than ladylike femme fatale rebels without a cause. The prodigal daughters of a seemingly highly decorated ex-Nazi Wehrmacht officer who was already in his 50s when they were born and thus had not much of his relationship with his little girls, Gisela-Martina and Jutta Schmidt, who were born and came of age in Kassel in Northern Hesse, were spawned in the year 1949 and, like many people of their generation, they rebelled against their 'fascistic' family and Fatherland, eventually becoming middle-class Leninists and members of the KPD (Communist Party of Germany). Since West Germany became "too serious and cold for them," the twins headed to Rome after they both divorced their husbands on the same day and came to the exceedingly absurd conclusion that they were the "hottest women in the world" while living la dolce vita in the Mediterranean, where they became part of the entourage of famous Italian film figures like Federico Fellini and Carlo Ponti, among others. Eventually, the two meet 'the golden hippie' John Paul Getty III, who was kidnapped in the summer of 1973, with the kidnappers asking for a hefty ransom of $17 million, which the young man's grandfather John Paul Getty Sr. declined. After all, it is suspected that John Getty, who needed to support a rather large drug habit, was in on his own kidnapping (apparently he would often joke about being kidnapped and the twins were even temporarily arrested due to their assumed complicity in the conspiracy), but when an envelop containing the golden hippie's severed ear and hair was delivered to a popular daily newspaper, cheap grandfather Getty Sr. decided to pay up, though he was only willing to put up $2.2 million as that is the largest amount that can be tax deductible and thus son John Paul Getty II (Getty III's father) is forced to pay back the rest of the ransom at 4% interest to his cold-blooded blueblood father. Getty III was released in December 1973 shortly after the ransom was paid and, to the dismay of Jutta, he would marry Gisela in 1974 about 5 months after impregnating her with the seed that would later sire Hollywood actor Balthazar Getty. As their friends reveal in Schneeweißrosenrot, regarding the strikingly different yet complimentary characteristics of the twins, Gisela is a soft and easy going gal with dreamy ideas while her sis Jutta is a hard and aggressive dame who executes her sister's ideas. Of course, Gisela was in for a big surprise when Getty's grandpa decided to deny him his first trust fund payment of $2 million because he disapproved of their marriage, so the two lived rather uncomfortably, especially for cocaine-snorting and heroin-shooting dip-somaniacs with rather expensive drug habits. In 1981, Getty III took an almost fatal cocktail of methadone, Valium, and alcohol that caused him to have a stroke and severe liver damage that would leave him a blind paraplegic paralyzed from the neck down and who would suffer greatly for the rest of his short pathetic life. Despite his lack of sexuality potency, Gisela, who frequented Kommune 1 and carried on an affair with a much younger live-in boyfriend that is ten years her junior, stayed with Getty III—a man described by one commentator in the documentary as a “monster...but a compassionate monster”—in the hope of fulfilling her lifelong dream and cashing in on the marriage, but her handicapped hubby had the audacity to divorce her in 1993 and she only got about $1 million (after lawyer expenses, who took about another $1 million for their inflated fees) out of the deal despite hoping to make sure Gisela and her sister Jutta are set for life. Indeed, Schneeweißrosenrot goes so far as even featuring Gisela crying about the fact that her “dreams didn't come true” and ultimately wasting her life married to a cripple for nothing as her gold-digger scheme fell through, but I doubt anyone watching the documentary will feel even a smidge of sympathy for the lapsed counter-culture commie turned capitalist whore.

In terms of their relation to German New Cinema, Werner Herzog makes the claim in Schneeweißrosenrot that Gisela and Jutta won the “Grand Prize of Oberhausen” (a reference to the International Short Film Festival Oberhausen) with their short Heinrich Viel (1969), but their directing careers pretty much ended there, though Gisela would direct the documentary Tim Leary: The Art of Dying (2008) nearly four decades later. Additionally, Jutta would star in the lead female role of the Alexander Kluge flick In Gefahr und größter Not bringt der Mittelweg den Tod (1974) aka In Danger and Dire Distress the Middle of the Road Leads to Death and would appear in a couple small roles in marginal West German movies and TV shows, including the crime-comedy Peng! Du bist tot! (1987) directed by her ex-husband Adolf Winkelmann. Gisela was less active in film, though she would appear in a small role in the Wim Wenders' flick The State of Things (1982) aka Der Stand der Dinge. Quite hilariously but not surprisingly, Jutta's ex-hubby Winkelmann totally discredits the twins' involvement in filmmaking as nothing more than a novelty, stating, "We, the men, were the real doers, the thinkers, made everything possible – the girls were just there as decoration, to help us, do stuff – I think that's how we saw it." While Herzog commits a bit of puffery in regard to the historical importance of the twins in regard to New German Cinema, he certainly questions their values and morals (or lack thereof), remarking regarding when he knew them in the late-1960s, "It was a turbulent time...Both for me and for the twins. They lived near where I lived, together with a gang of car thieves. One day my car had been broken into and for a moment I suspected them but they said, no, they hadn't broken into my car." Indeed, pedantic pinko auteur Alexander Kluge states something similar about the twins' character, remarking, "I consider the two to be extremely self-sufficient. I can't separate self-sufficiency from crime or intrigue because anyone who thinks he can do it, can do it."

In one particularly notable photo collage scene featured in Schneeweissrosenrot, Jutta and Gisela are featured in various black-and-white photographs topless sporting SS hats that echo the infamous scene of Charlotte Rampling singing the Marlene Dietrich song "Wenn ich mir was wünschen dürfte" in Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974). Undoubtedly, this SS striptease acts as a sort of accidental allegory for Deutschland in the post-WWII era, especially when compared to a photo also featured in the documentary of the twins' father sporting a Nazi uniform, where discipline has been traded in for debauchery and the patriarchy has been overpowered by the matriarchy. In terms of Jutta and Gisela's supposed sex appeal, I just cannot wrap my head around how so many kraut and yank counter-culture types found these two androgynous opportunists, who resembled half-caste Chinese teenage boys, so terribly delectable, but then again, most of these effortlessly effete fellows assumedly needed a little bit of testosterone to balance out their own estrogen imbalances. Admittedly, had Rainer Werner Fassbinder—a man obsessed with doppelgangers, femme fatales, and general cruel women—not overdosed in 1982, it would have been nice to see him direct a biopic about the lurid lives of the twins, who might be best described as 'Mata Haris of Germany's counter-culture generation.' If nothing else, Schneeweissrosenrot will always be a memorable documentary for me in that David Lynch's Loft Highway (1997) will forever be all the more bizarre for me after discovering star Balthazar Getty's parents are no less debauched than the characters of the film, not to mention the fact that John Paul Getty III's kidnapping is eerily reminiscent of the one in Blue Velvet (1986); severed ear and all.

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1969)

Dramatically different in theme to his first feature-length film Love Is Colder Than Death (1969) aka Liebe ist kälter als der Tod, but similarly marvelously minimalistic (comprised mostly of extended still shots and a sterile and dispiriting mise-en-scène) and brazenly bleak (despite being shot in a stylistically discordant, over-exposed manner) in its aesthetic, Katzelmacher (1969) aka Cock Artist – the second feature film by German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder – would prove that the director behind that cinematic work had already developed a complex weltanschauung long before he became a well respected and equally scandalous figure in the Teutonic cinema world. A film version of an Anti-Theater play he had written and staged a year before that was quite successful on a local level, Fassbinder assembled Katzelmacher over the course of a mere nine days and released it only three months after the premiere of Love Is Colder Than Death, the film which enabled the filmmaker to earn almost a million marks in prizes and state subsidies, which would lead to nine more feature-length films in the next 12 months and numerous wrecked cars by Günther Kaufmann (Fassbinder's black Bavarian boy toy at the time). As Fassbinder's best friend/composer Peer Raben stated in an interview, Fassbinder, "was the first to introduce cinematographic elements into stage productions. Katzelmacher was the first major movie adaptation of a play in which actors from Action Theater performed. It was practically an adaptation of the play we had done on stage, with the same cast...Katzelmacher has a style of its own. As a movie it represented something entirely new for the screen." The film would also be the first in a lifelong career obsession of cinematically assaulting the petite bourgeoisie, thereupon tearing at the most delicate and sensitive underbelly of the middle-class' superlatively superficial soul. Starring Fassbinder in the lead role as a Greek who comes to the Fatherland in search of work, but finds himself at the center of a battle of the embittered under-sexed (and, in some cases, over-sexed) sexes, Katzelmacher gets to the root of the latent racism of young kraut degenerates who are neither sexually nor materially content, thus channeling their angst-addled hostility on an easy target; a destitute foreigner who does not understand the vernacular of the people hurling hysterical insults at him. As a sort of minimalistic avant-garde proto- Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) minus the naked melodrama and warm kaleidoscopic colors that would dominate Fassbinder's later films, Katzelmacher provides more than enough proof, at least where Fassbinder is concerned, that artistic talent is innate and cannot be developed and that a true genius only needs to refine his craft and maintain his will.

The emotionally and sexually stagnant world of Katzelmacher is a patently pathetic place full of unhealthy, useless and abusive relationships based on a damning degree of dependence and co-dependence. Beauteous babe Marie (Hanna Schygulla) is owned by bloated Erich (Hans Hirschmüller), a physically abusive fellow of an unappealing slob-like tawny appearance; semi-sadistic Elisabeth (Irm Hermann) – a queen bitch with a lazy eye – keeps decidedly degenerate Peter (Peter Moland) as a virtual slave because he hates working even more than he hates his lady; rosy-cheeked Rosy (Elga Sorbas) passively prostitutes herself to Franz (Harry Baer), and Paul (Rudolf Waldemar Brem) screws Helga (Lilith Ungerer) because he has nothing better to do, thus making up a relentless realm of lower middle-class monotony, misery, misanthropy, and mild melodrama. When Greek foreigner worker Jorgos (Rainer Werner Fassbinder in an uncredited role) comes to town, these sad and mostly sedentary post-teenage (but perennially adolescent in their ample and aimless angst) Teutons unite for once in their seething yet senseless hatred of the mild-mannered Mediterranean man from the South. Only Maria – a lonely lady who finds a kindred spirit in the swarthy (although no more swarthy than her ex-beau) Southern foreigner – finds it in her heart to accept Jorgos, so much so that she begins to fall in love with him and vice versa, despite the fact he already has a family back home. After all, according to Maria, the fact that Jorgos is a family man does not matter because, "Everything's different in Greece," or so she assumes. Elisabeth is also slightly more civil to the geeky Greek because he rents a room from her and acts as a source of cash flow, so as to make up for the unpaid rent of her deadbeat boyfriend. Assuming he is Italian for a number of days before actually discovering he is Greek, the German males of the group first begin developing a hatred for Jorgos after one of them seems him undress and notices that "his dick" is "better built" than their own, thus developing jealousy against the exotic primitive. It also does not help that their girlfriends use Jorgos as a tormenting tool of jealousy against the exceedingly emasculated men, thus further fueling the flame of race-hate and their ever swelling sexual inadequacy. Going against the grain of the German boob bourgeois, Maria refutes her friends' dubious claims regarding Jorgos, claiming that she can tell by his eyes that he is a decent person, so their relationship only gets all the more intimate when the Greek tells her she has "eyes like stars." First making the preposterous claim that Jorgos raped one of the uglier girls, their hatred is turned up another notch when a rumor is spread that the Greek is a communist because, after all, "Greece is full of communists." The male members – none of whom work thus have maximum idle time to seethe with hostility and capricious contempt – pretend to be friends with the friendly but unwitting foreigner and even openly chat about castrating the German-illiterate man right in front him, giving him a toast with their glasses not long after proclaiming their perverse plan. Naturally, the group's hatred finally reaches its zenith and they inevitably attack a rather surprised Jorgos, who cannot make sense of the cowardly collective act. Despite its rather determinedly disgusting and depressing subject matter, Katzelmacher works best as a brazen black comedy of the anarchistic avant-garde sort.

Although being a breakthrough for Fassbinder in terms of its critical and monetary success, it seems the filmmaker would grow to hate the film as he listed it, as well as two of his other early cinematic works – Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970) aka Warum läuft Herr R. Amok? and Jail Bait (1973) aka Wildwechsel – in a list he made of “The Most Disgusting” (which also included works by Hans-Jürgen Syberberg and his ex-collaborator Michael Fengler) of the German New Wave for a “Hitlist of German films” that was published in 1981. Indeed, while nearly immaculate in its minimalist direction and stark yet sardonic melodrama, Katzelmacher seems like a rather minor cinematic effort when compared to similarly themed later works like The Merchant of Four Seasons (1972) aka Händler der vier Jahreszeiten and especially Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) aka Angst essen Seele auf. Considerably influenced by the films of Jean-Luc Godard, theatre/films of Jean-Marie Straub (Fassbinder initially wrote Katzelmacher to fill up time for the filmmaker’s 10-minute-long staging of an adaptation of Ferdinand Bruckner’s Sickness of Youth), and the theories of German communist playwright Bertolt Brecht, Katzelmacher was created at a time before Fassbinder mastered his own filmmaking craft yet the formative cinematic work still displays the unmistakable essence of a born-genius. Portraying the young German bourgeois as a group of self-loathing losers suffering from sexual impotence and latent Nazi tendencies, Katzelmacher is a potent peek at Fassbinder at a time when he still bought into libelous Marxist lies, especially in regard to the ‘authoritarian personality,’ that he would later, to some extent, renounce in films like Mother Küsters’ Trip to Heaven (1975) and The Third Generation (1979) by portraying the same sort of far-leftists as narcissistic hypocrites and imbeciles who are worse than the people they claim to despise. After all, even if the characters of Katzelmacher were to join some sort of fascism movement, it would end rather abruptly due to their pathetic, nihilistic attitudes and total lack of work ethic because, although they may be the grandchildren of Uncle Adolf, the Führer had fallen before teaching them some tough love and discipline.

GODS OF THE PLAGUE
GODS OF THE PLAGUE

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1970)

Although most of them are too cool for school to know or take the effort to find out, none other than a high-strung German (there is nothing cool about being about a member of the master race!), Rainer Werner Fassbinder, is responsible for directing what is probably the most quintessential gangster hipster flick, Gods of the Plague (1970) aka Götter der Pest. A sort of monotonously melancholy and misanthropic gangster/pseudo-film noir flick for fairy-like fellows who are totally too dainty, depressed, and vehemently vogue to hold a gun, let alone actually shoot or point one at somebody, Gods of the Plague follows the miserable musings and defiantly blank yet sassy stares of a misery-addled anti-hero with an archetypal hipster appearance, including the highly fashionable American Civil War-esque mutton chops and a mustache, as well as a pathologically posturing I-don't-give-a-shit-even-though-I-spend-a-lot-of-time-preparing-my-ironically-outmoded-wardrobe-attitude that that makes the totally hip hipster seem like he would not even care if someone raped him in the ass and/or set him on fire. A sort of unofficial sequel/reworking of Fassbinder's feature-length directorial debut Love is Colder than Death (1969) aka Liebe ist kälter als der Tod, Gods of the Plague is a homoerotic Godardian/Brecht-esque deconstruction of the American gangster flick/film noir about an absurdly apathetic fellow who does not seem to care even in the slightest about the fact that he has just been released from jail and seems especially quite disinterested in his loving girlfriend, so he decides to find another chick with a similarly apathetic demeanor and ultimately falls in love with a naughty Negro criminal with the fitting name "Gorilla" who is responsible for killing his brother. The black criminal is played by Günther Kaufmann (Kamikaze 1989, Querelle) in what would be the first of many cinematic collaborations with Fassbinder who, for deeply personal and perverse reasons, fell madly in homo love with him. The first of the ill-fated filmmaker's three great loves, Kaufmann was described by Fassbinder as "my Bavarian Negro" and a paradoxical Negro who, as the director describes, "thinks Bavarian, feels Bavarian, and speaks Bavarian. And that's why he gets a shock every morning when he looks in the mirror." Of course, as a married man with two quadroon children, the biggest shock for Kaufmann was the fact that a kraut fairy fell in love with him and wanted to make him an arthouse superstar in a country that only a few decades before put a very high premium on racial purity. Also featuring Carla Aulaulu (aka Carla Egerer)—a muse/superstar of Fassbinder's celluloid compatriot Werner Schroeter, as well as future feminist filmmaker and onetime-wife of Volker Schlöndorff, Margarethe von Trotta (The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum, Hannah Arendt), in one of the leading roles, Gods of the Plague is indubitably an interesting footnote from German New Cinema history, even if it seems like hokey homo hipster celluloid heaven and features grossly gratuitous shots of Günther Kaufmann's bare black ass and an unflattering shot of star Harry Baer's limp cock and balls.

Fresh out of prison and consumed with a superlatively self-destructive case of Weltschmerz, Franz Walsch (Harry Baer) seems rather reluctant to see his diva Dietrich-esque singer girlfriend Johanna Reiher (Hanna Schygulla) perform at a dark and seedy lounge but, against his own better judgment, he does and the couple have a sort of anti-celebration at a local restaurant due to his release from prison, but when he refuses to eat a delicacy of snails, things go drastically downhill from there. After Johanna tells Franz that she loves him, he rather disinterestedly replies "I have to phone someone." Franz also visits his mother (not by chance played by Fassbinder's real mother Lilo Pempeit) with his brother Marian (Marian Seidowsky) in what will ultimately be the last visit together. Not long after, Franz accompanies Johanna to a gambling event between gay Americans, krauts, and a faggy frog. Johanna is exhilarated to win a game of blackjack, but when she goes to tell Franz, he is nowhere to be found. Franz has learned that his brother has been shot and decides to passively dump prissy and possessive Johanna and hangout with the much more laidback chick named Margarethe (Margarethe von Trotta). After successfully avoiding paying his hotel bill, Franz has the bright idea to rob a gang of vulgar Turks, who instantly capture and manhandle him after he grabs one of their bags, but luckily his deceased bro's old lady Magdalena Fuller (Fassbinder's onetime wife Ingrid Caven) pays off the hostile foreigners with a kiss and some cash. Magdalena takes Franz home and takes off his pants, but he finds the entire thing rather banal, so his penis hangs rather languidly like that of a cold corpse laying in a morgue. More than anyone, Franz wants to meet the mysterious man who killed his brother, 'Gorilla' (Günther Kaufmann), and when he does, he is not the least bit letdown. Franz respects Herr Gorilla for killing his brother and even falls in love with him. Like the Franz by Fassbinder himself of Love is Colder than Death, Franz of Gods of the Plague also has no qualms about sharing his girl Margarethe with Gorilla, so long as he is willing to disrobe in front of him. Meanwhile, jilted lover Johanna wants to get back at Franz for his abrupt abandoning of her, so she starts fornicating with a cop and ultimately sets him up to be killed. Franz, Gorilla, and older blond gangster plot to rob a supermarket, but unfortunately the black buck's porn-peddling girlfriend Carla Aulaulu (as Carla Aulaulu) has tipped off Johanna, who has in turn tipped off her new cop boyfriend. Both Franz and the old gangster are instantly killed by a cop during a raid, but Gorilla, who has been shot, manages to wobble out of the supermarket, find his girlfriend Carla, and shoots her after tying her to a chair. Before dropping dead himself, Gorilla states "Life is very precious... even right now," a line featured a countless number of times in Werner Schroeter's arthouse epic Eika Katappa (1969).

In his 1981 "Hitlist of German Films", Fassbinder not only listed Gods of the Plague as one of "The Most Beautiful" films of German New Cinema, but also as number five among his “Top Ten” list of all the films he ever directed. Personally, I cannot agree with Fassbinder regarding the film in the context of his entire oeuvre, but I have to assume the director has personal reasons for giving Gods of the Plague so much praise as it was made in at least partial dedication to the director’s “first love.” While most of the film was shot in dark interiors to the point of obscuring the faces of characters, Fassbinder made sure to shoot many of the scenes with Günther Kaufmann outside in bright sunlight, including the most expensive scene of the film of a countryside that was shot in a helicopter. Undoubtedly, a formative work from an auteur who had yet to master his craft, Gods of the Plague is a must-see work for Fassbinder fanatics as a marginally superior flick to its ‘brother film’ Love is Colder than Death. For those that find the conventions of gangster flicks to be a bit sterile, Gods of the Plague makes for a rather rude and a little bit faggy aesthetic and thematic ravaging of the subgenre. Indeed, with its sometimes campy imagery, less than inconspicuous homoerotic undertones, joyless and impassionate sex, portrait paintings of “Mad King Ludwig II” and room-size pop-art portraits, horribly hopeless and hapless ‘heroes’, gynophobia, and terribly tragic ending, Gods of the Plague is arthouse film noir with a decidedly dark and dead soul. Although I think hipsters might find the wardrobes and moods featured in Gods of the Plague to catch their fancy, the film is still sophisticated and ‘masculine’ enough to totally appeal to their mumblecore-inclined nature, even if Fassbinder himself stated that it was, “probably a homosexual film.”

LOVE IS COLDER THAN DEATH

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1970)

Undoubtedly, few directors, including great ones, successfully achieve making a masterpiece with their directorial debut and German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder (Satan's Brew, The Marriage of Maria Braun) is certainly no exception to this unofficial rule, as his first feature-length cinematic effort, Love Is Colder Than Death (1969) aka Liebe ist kälter als der Tod is a highly aesthetically derivative, albeit particularly personalized, work that owes more to classic American film and the French New Wave than any sort of Teutonic film movement, yet it is surely an auteur piece, but one plagued by the ultimately banal practice of deconstructing and reconstructing gangster films – a cinematic practice that autistic fanboy Quentin Tarantino would ultimately take to more degenerate and philistine extremes. Beginning with dedication to four of the film's influences, including Claude Chabrol, Éric Rohmer, Jean-Marie Straub, Linio and Cuncho (the final tribute being a reference to the two main characters in Damiano Damiani's 1966 film A Bullet for the General aka El Chuchó, quién sabe?), Love Is Colder Than Death is a work that ultimately owes more to the early amateurish gangster films of Jean-Luc Godard and the ex-convict protagonist Franz Biberkopf (Fassbinder's character in the film is even named Franz) of Alfred Döblin's Weimar era modernist novel Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929) than the hodgepodge of individuals Fassbinder decided to actually pay official tribute to. Even the original iconic poster of star Ulli Lommel sporting a trench coat and aiming a handgun at the viewer is inspired by Alain Delon's character from French auteur Jean-Pierre Melville's crime flick Le Samourai (1967), yet Fassbinder still managed to leave his novice auteur fingerprints in what is a German film that ripped off frog films that ripped off Yank films. In an interview, Fassbinder differentiated the character he plays in Love Is Colder Than Death from all other classic crime films with the following insight regarding his nihilistic gangster persona, "Franz doesn't have any backup—he's a loner. Not like the great loners in the American flicks, though, where it's never really clear to me why they're loners. They're just heroes, I guess. Franz is no hero. He's primitive, just wants to work for himself, doesn't want to hand over any of what he earns." Indeed, Fassbinder, a man who once described himself as a 'romantic anarchist,' essentially plays himself as a reckless renegade of the hyper alienated and antagonistic sort, even among fellow crooks, who is more interested in doing his own thing than following an established gang code and making a big name for himself, despite it ultimately having deleterious and self-destructive results. A film with a timeless title that has influenced countless post-punk/darkwave/coldwave song titles and band names, Love Is Colder Than Death – the first film in Fassbinder's early black-and-white 'Gangster Film Trilogy,' preceding Gods of the Plague (1970) and The American Soldier (1970) – is the quintessential minimalistic kraut gangster flick set in a disillusioned, post-nationalistic Teutonic zeitgeist where every man is condemned to fight alone, especially in the metaphysical sense, whether he likes it or not. As protagonist Franz learns, having a friend, especially con friends, has more cons than benefits, especially when a jealous and extremely fertile woman is placed in the middle of it all.

Criminal dilettante, petty pimp, and sometimes bank robber Franz (Fassbinder) falls into trouble when he refuses to join a multicultural organized crime enterprise called the Syndicate. A lone man of the intrinsically individualistic lone wolf persuasion, Franz is brutally beat in an anti-melodramatic Brechtian fashion after refusing to join the Syndicate as he has enough company already as he lives with his hooker girlfriend Johanna (Hanna Schygulla) – a wanton woman who wants marriage and stability despite being a lowly flesh-peddler. The Syndicate orders a stool pigeon by the name of Bruno (Ulli Lommel) to befriend Franz so he can keep tabs on him. Rather strangely, perennial loner Franz takes an instant liking to Bruno and even invites the Syndicate member to move in with him and Johanna. On top of sharing his apartment, Franz begins to share his woman with Bruno, but jealousy of the outsider taking away attention from her man, seemingly harmless cutesy girl Johanna ends up causing more trouble than the Syndicate ever could in her pernicious scheme to drive the two men apart. In between tedious trips to department stores that involve harassing a sales woman (Irm Hermann), including Fassbinder's nod to Hitchcock when his character tells the retailer that he is, "looking for round glasses like the cop in "Psycho" had," Bruno – a man who claims he killed his dad at the mere age of 12 via a vase smash to the head and became a gang leader by age 16 – commits a couple murders and pins them on his supposed pal Franz. Bruno also has plans to slay Johanna for the Syndicate, but little does he know that the quite literal femme fatale has different plans of a more elaborately evil sort. Bored with Bruno and mad at Franz for not marrying her, Johanna tips off the cops about a bank robbery that the two men have planned, thus resulting in the murder of the Ménage à trios and the death of a handsome two-faced traitor who is drunk on his own narcissism. Regarding Schygulla's character Johanna, Fassbinder stated the following in an interview, "Hanna's the key to everything. You can tell that the character she plays is totally bogged down in bourgeois values—much, much worse than all the others. That's what she wants to preserve, and that's the reason she betrays Lommel to the police, because she'd rather be alone than be part of a threesome; that she just can't handle." Of course, like Fassbinder's epic cinematic miniseries Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980), the homoerotic subtext between Franz and Bruno is the most personal key in Fassbinder's dark romantic gangland fantasy, where conspiring whores make for the most malignant force against man and his most forbidden and intangible dreams.

As a man who worked as both a pimp and hustler in real-life during his teenage years, even pimping his young, dragged-out pal Udo Kier to foreign 'guest workers,' Rainer Werner Fassbinder, unlike most filmmakers who directed similarly themed works, actually lived out the gangster lifestyle he cinematically portrayed to a degree, even if in a rather gay fashion, and he had the following to say about the underworld lifestyle, "the gangster environment is a bourgeois setting turned on its head so to speak. My gangsters do the same things that capitalists do except they do them as criminals. The gangster's goals are just as bourgeois as the capitalist's." Indeed, in the context of Love Is Colder Than Death in regard to art reflecting life and vice versa, Fassbinder is Franz and Fassbinder is Franz, albeit in a much more butch fashion than the damned director would later do in works like Fox and His Friends (1975) – a work where posh fags make for much more ruthless and wretched villains than buffoonish gangsters and flesh-flaunting femme fatales. Shot over a 24 day period in April 1969 in an ostensibly overexposed fashion on the dreary streets and in the sterile buildings of Munich, Love Is Colder Than Death premiered at the Berlin Film Festival in June 1969 and the screening concluded with a loud combination of jeers and cheers, including a number of hecklers yelling "dilettantism," yet Fassbinder approached the stage like a victorious dictator who had just conquered an enemy nation and had its leaders ceremoniously executed, thus signaling the arrival of post-WWII Germany's most important and influential filmmaker. While I am no connoisseur of gangster flicks of any persuasion (although the sort featuring Guido philistines also makes for great laughs), Fassbinder's Love Is Colder Than Death has an ingredient that makes it radically different from, say, Godard's Breathless (1960) aka À bout de souffle, which is having a soul as opposed to asinine and azoic posturing and bland Bogart fetishism. While I regard Love Is Colder Than Death as being far from one of Fassbinder's greatest works, it does make for a nice novelty in seeing a cinematic genius during his most primitive stage and how he evolved into the idiosyncratic Übermensch auteur behind Berlin Alexanderplatz – one of the most important and ambitious cinematic works in all of film history. Indeed, with the death of two of his three great loves via suicide as inspired by his own belligerent and neglectful behavior, as well as his own lonely demise a little over a decade after completing his first feature-length film, Love Is Colder Than Death has developed all the more meaning since its underwhelming premiere at the Berlinale over four decades ago.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIER

Originally planned as featuring the director's then (and thoroughly heterosexual) lover Günther Kaufmann (Rio das Mortes, Whity) and to be shot on CinemaScope in Berlin, The American Soldier (1970) aka Der amerikanische Soldat was ultimately postponed due to auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's bitter and failed love affair with the film's heterosexual black Bavarian star and would inevitably deevolve. Instead, Fassbinder decided to fly to Paris to enjoy the city of love's sodomite saunas. When The American Soldier went into production, it did not feature Herr Kaufmann and was shot with a low-budget using black-and-white film stock, thus making the film have similar aesthetic qualities to the director's two previous kraut gangster flicks, Love is Colder than Death (1969) aka Liebe ist kälter als der Tod and Gods of the Plague (1970) aka Götter der Pest. All three films would make up a kraut-fried yet Hollywood inspired gangster film trilogy, with the final chapter, The American Soldier, being arguably the most cinematically reflexive and purposely postmodern yet ultimately incoherent and avant-garde-addled. With a misleading title that is more representative of Fassbinder's Americanized love for Hollywood cinema than a true description of the film's hero, The American Soldier follows a German-born man who "flew over the great pond" to America and fought as an honorary Yank in the Vietnam war to battle the same Bolshevik plague his Teutonic brothers fought in the Second World War, only to come back to his hometown of Munich to work as a cold-blooded contract killer for a trio of corrupt gangster-movie-worshipping cops who have a naughty knack for gambling with pornographic playing cards and petty criminals' lives. Referencing to grand queen auteur filmmakers of German cinema history, F.W. Murnau and Rosa von Praunheim, the latter of which who would incidentally become an arch nemesis of Fassbinder (von Praunheim even once admitted he was relieved when he died), The American Soldier is less an homage to American gangster flicks than a film that deconstructs such works, while also criticizing the corrosive cultural hegemony of America/Hollywood on not just Germany, but also the entire world, hence why the film's protagonist, a Vietnam vet, ultimately did dirty work for the USA and has now come back to his homeland to wreak havoc and kill a couple fellow krauts along the way. By no means a cinematically immaculate masterpiece, The American Soldier is essentially a curious piece of experimental kraut crime cinema directed by a man that was destined for greater and less masturbatory things who was practically raised on Hollywood films, but would become what was indisputably post-WWII Germany's most important and prolific filmmaker and who ultimately made his celluloid works palatable to both the proletariat and the bourgeoisie, something his quasi-commie compatriots like Alexander Kluge and Jean-Marie Straub could never do as pedantic guards of the German of the far-left Ivory Tower. Of course, The American Soldier seems like it was specially tailored for left-leaning film critics and those that would love nothing more than to see the gangster flick aesthetically and thematically defiled, but it is still pure Fassbinder, even not as cultivated and more audience antagonistic.

Ricky (Karl Scheydt) alias Richard Murphy alias Richard Von Rezzori, who describes his lifetime story to a whore as follows, "It all began in Germany...Once upon a time, there was a little boy...He flew over the great pond...Damn it," is the man with the plan, otherwise known as contract killing, but the problem is that a single snitch can get him killed and killing fellow criminals for cops comes with its own number of liabilities. A seemingly stoic veteran of the Vietnam War, which he simply describes as being "loud," Ricky is more than ready to show off his imported skills as an American-manufactured killing machine. A fellow with a sadistic streak, Ricky almost scares to death a slutty chick (Irm Hermann who is credited as "hure" aka "whore") by kicking her out of his car and shooting her full of blanks. Not someone to forget an old friend, Ricky hooks up with his old comrade Franz Walsch (Fassbinder reprised his role from Lover is Colder than Death) or as he states while trying to get a hold of him over the phone, "W for "war," A for "Alamo," L for "Lenin," S for "science fiction," C for "crime," H for "hell." Ricky and Franz go for a scenic and soothing ride and the reluctant American sentimentally states to his comrade, "Nothing ever happens in Germany...I'm rather fond of old Germany, all the same." Indeed, the two boorish Bavarian buds seem to have more than enough fun drinking cheap beer and littering with the empty cans. After going to his mother (Eva Ingeborg Scholz) and Clark Gable-loving gay brother (Kurt Raab) in what turns out to be a rather uneventful family get together involving pinball and foreboding emotional coldness, Franz gets what he came back to Munich for, killing people that apparently need to be killed. The first person that is gunned down is a gay palm-reading gypsy named Tony (played by Ulli Lommel in what is very possibly his most unflattering role ever), which proves to be a rather lackluster, if not lethal, task for Ricky. Seemingly nonsensical things happen around Ricky, including the strange behavior of a maid (Margarethe von Trotta), who after describing supposed German racism against Turks that are called "Ali" (this discussion would inevitably evolve into Fassbinder's Sirkian masterpiece Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974)) and crying about her lover Pierre, stabs herself in the stomach with a butcher knife samurai-style while hanging over a stairwell railing. Of course, Ricky has bigger things to worry about than paying mind to a seeming horribly hysterical and melancholy maniac of a maid because he has fallen in love with one of his contract killing targets, Rosa von Praunheim (Elga Sorbas), the girlfriend of one of the pernicious police who hired him to do their dirty work. Of course, since they hired him to commit highly illegal and innately incriminating acts, the police also decide to dispose of Ricky, but unfortunately Franz gets in the middle of it, thus resulting in the deaths of two best friend who would have been better off dead during the Second World War, at least if one were to judge by their romantic longings for a nation that, at least in spirit, no longer exists.

Trading in the pioneering celluloid poems of Teutonic master auteur F.W. Murnau (Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror, The Last Laugh aka Der letzte Mann) for a uniquely unhealthy and culturally vapid diet of cheap carboncopy cinematic products otherwise known as Hollywood gangster films, Germany lost more than just a good percentage of its population, as well as its international reputation as a result of the Second World War and The American Soldier, like much of Fassbinder's oeuvre, is certainly a scathing symptom of that. Featuring cops who think they are gangsters after watching one too many American film noir flicks and a culturally confused protagonist who clearly loves his birth nation more than his adopted one yet seems tragically deracinated from it for whatever reason, The American Soldier is the sad, if not oftentimes sardonic, tale of a nation with a decidedly dead soul, where everyone can be bought, sold, and/or killed for the right price, which is undoubtedly an American tradition. The fact that the protagonist of the film, Ricky, who is admittedly "rather fond of old Germany," is an ostensible aristocrat who consciously made the decision to degrade himself by becoming a peasant soldier in a nation populated by Europe's rejects in a war battling communism—the very thing the German National Socialists sought to destroy on the Eastern Front—only goes to show how far Germany had fallen.

Tastelessly enough, director Rainer Werner Fassbinder would marry star Ingrid Caven during a lunch break in between shooting for The American Soldier and the director can even be seen wearing the same white suit he wore during the wedding in the film. Incidentally, Günther Kaufmann, who Fassbinder fired from starring in The American Soldier for not reciprocating his love to the director, would act as the filmmaker's best man at the wedding. While not starring in The American Soldier, Kaufmann would provide his Jim Morrison-like vocals to the film's theme song "So Much Tenderness," with the lyrics being written by Fassbinder himself and the music by Peer Raben. Fassbinder's wife Ingrid Caven, who would divorce the filmmaker in two years and inevitably become the cinematic diva of Daniel Schmid (Tonight or Never, La Paloma) sings and performs a song she wrote entitled, "With My Tears," towards the beginning of The American Soldier. The ultimately bastardized and partially aborted yet still spawned product of a project initially intended to be realized as a romantic present for a black buck Bavarian, The American Soldier practically stews in a certain pessimistic melancholy that is surely colder than death, but also relies on the pseudo-masculine Hollywood cinematic conventions promoted to profit off of the poor proletarian looking to learn how to posture themselves as imaginary American bad asses. As American as imported sauerkraut, The American Soldier is the aesthetically wacky result of what happens when a cultureless consumer consumes a real culture and is vomited out by said real culture.

THE NIKLASHAUSEN JOURNEY

Out of all the films in German New cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's extensive celluloid oeuvre, his early TV-movie The Niklashausen Journey (1970) aka Die Niklashauser Fart – a revolutionary quasi-anti-revolutionary cinematic work co-directed by Michael Fengler (Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?, Weg vom Fenster) – is easily the artistically erratic enfant terrible's most audaciously abstract, avant-garde and politically pretentious work, thus it should be no surprise that it is one of the filmmaker's most least viewed and discussed films, even among academics. Quite easy to write-off as a wretched and curiously convoluted piece of experimental celluloid trash that is most symbiotic of its decidedly defiant generation, The Niklashausen Journey still offers an intriguing and oftentimes aesthetically intoxicating look at Fassbinder at his most political as an uniquely unloyal and uncompromising anarchist disillusioned with the political trends of his zany and overzealous zeitgeist. Extra loosely based on the real-life 15th century south-central German folk hero Hans Böhm – otherwise known as “the Drummer of Niklashausen” – who after claiming to see a vision of the Virgin Mary sermonizing slave-morality-inspired words of social equality, preached the absolute abolition of forced labor, tolls, levies and other payments to the nobility, thereupon inspiring tens of thousands of peasants to revolt, was charged with heresy and burnt at the stake on July 19, 1476 on the order of the Bishop of Würzburg, The Niklashausen Journey is as audaciously anachronistic as films come. Heavily influenced by positively pedantic commie frog Jean-Luc Godard's dystopian black comedy Week End aka Weekend (1967) and Brazilian auteur Glauber Rocha's class conscious western Antônio das Mortes (1969) aka O Dragão da Maldade Contra o Santo Guerreiro – a work the German auteur would also pay tribute to with his subsequent TV-movie Rio das Mortes (1971) – as well as a number of anti-Heimat films by corrupted krauts like Herbert Achternbusch and Werner Herzog, The Niklashausen Journey is foremost Fassbinder's audacious response to the failed far-left student revolts of 1968 with the filmmaker himself playing the reflexive role of the 'Black Monk'; the dubious and cryptic mastermind of an anti-aristocratic/anti-capitalist revolution in the beautiful Teutonic countryside. Featuring music and performances by the founding Krautrock group Amon Düül II, The Niklashausen Journey is a peculiar product of its time directed by a German New Wave master who had yet to master his marvelous niche for naked melodrama and refine his particular political persuasion.

The Black Monk (played by Fassbinder in an uncredited performance) – a black-leather-jacket-sporting con-man/intellectual revolutionary – is conspiring among his equally coldhearted compatriots (a blessedly beauteous Hanna Schygulla as “Johanna” being one of them) as to how and when they will spark a peasant revolt against an extremely effete aristocratic bishop and his overweight and seemingly catatonic, panty-flashing mother. The malacious monk mastermind concludes that it will only take a handful of people (as Johanna mentions, only “3 or 4” people are needed to form the “vanguard of the party”) to make the serf revolt a rather bloody and brutal reality, so he is quite thrilled when he runs into proletarian pawn Hans Böhm (Michael König); a megalomaniacal, if not mentally feeble, hippie mystic who feels confident in his serf sermonizing and self-worshiping heroics after he claims to have been given a blessing by the Mother Mary herself to exterminate lawnmowers and the all-powerful aristocracy. Vomiting corrosive communist intellectual masturbation from Karl Marx’s Das Kapital, the plotting peasants pump themselves up for a collectivist coup d’état that is destined to fail right from the get go. Black Bavarian Günther Kaufmann – who plays the role of the “Leader of Farmers” – is also ripe for a renege revolution, especially after reading about how his black panther brothers were slaughtered like common swine by American pig police. As with every so-called ‘people’s revolution,’ the revolt is funded by a bored aristocrat, this time in the fecund form of a rich bitch named Magarethe (played by Margit Carstensen) who has the hots for sexually potent peasant hero Hans Böhm. While most of the revolutionary hippie yeomen inevitably meet a similar fate to Jesus Christ, the Black Monk lives on to spread the unholy gospel like an incurable venereal disease, infecting everyone he can with a corrupt cause with only one reward; a violent death. Featuring a trying collection of tableaux ranging from the titillating and transgressive, to the terribly trite and aesthetically tormenting, The Niklashausen Journey is, at worst, a strikingly sloppy mess of pompous political self-pollution and, at best, a bold, blunt, and beautiful expression of subversive sociopolitical cinematic art, but, at the very least, one has to admit that the film is an ambitious aesthetic affair, even if Fassbinder himself rarely, if ever, referenced the work at any point in his. If I did not know better, I would never suspected that The Niklashausen Journey was shot for a late-night slot for WDR Television’s drama unit, especially a work where the loony lead protagonist declares, “Long Live Lenin...Smash Fascism!” in a manner that was surely suppose to be sardonic and symbolic of left-wing hero-worship, at least in to Fassbinder’s politically discouraged eyes.

Undoubtedly borrowing aesthetic techniques from his friend Werner Schroeter, especially his early epic of allegorical tableau Eika Katappa (1969), even including an absurdist quasi-operatic performance from the German New Wave dandy’s muse Magdalena Montezuma (Der Tod der Maria Malibran, Der Rosenkönig), Rainer Werner Fassbinder was still indubitably a ‘work-in-progress’ as a filmmaker at the time he co-directed The Niklashausen Journey; a seriously structurally splintered, semi-surrealist and strikingly symbolic cinematic work that can easily be compared to the early films of Carmelo Bene (Capricci), Alejandro Jodorowsky (El Topo), Jane Arden (The Other Side of the Underneath), and Rafael Corkidi (Pafnucio Santo). Of course, like most of Fassbinder's films, The Niklashausen Journey ultimately has a distinctly post-war German essence of ecstatic and eccentric ethno-masochism and a need to atone for the Fatherland's National Socialist past. An individual who described himself as a "Romantic Anarchist" (which he stated 3 months before his death in March 1982) who personally knew members of the far-left West Germany terrorist group the Red Army Faction (RAF), including cinematography student Holger Meins (a bomb-maker who starved himself to death during a clearly failed prison hunger strike) yet thought their actions were stupid and their armed violence to be self-defeating, Fassbinder was one of the few individuals of the 1968 generation to upload his radical, if not severely skeptical, utopianism. In fact, the filmmaker once stated in regard to his motivation to keep on directing films, "From utopia, the concrete longing for this utopia. If this longing is driven out of me, I will not do anything else; that's why as a creative person I have the feeling of being murdered in Germany, if you would please not mistake that for paranoia....I believe this recent witch-hunt...was staged in order to destroy individual utopias...If it comes to the point where my fears are greater than my longing for something beautiful, then I'll quit. And not just quit working." Of course, Fassbinder did "quit...and not just working" when he overdosed on cocaine in 1982, but he would ultimately direct a number of politically oriented cinematic works, including (but not limited to) Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975), Satan's Brew (1976), Germany in Autumn (1978), and The Third Generation (1979) preceding the release of his most politically conscious film The Niklashausen Journey. Featuring a trio of bloody, face-painted Maenads calling for the God of War (Ares), debauched aristocratic pederasts in dire fear of peasants, Uncle Tom U.S. military police trained to kill their black soul brothers, Krautrock rockers rocking out recklessly, junkyard-based political crucifixions, and failed revolutionary leaders who are more than willing to spare endless cycles of sacrificial pleasant lambs in their struggle for the Trotskyite 'Permanent Revolution,' The Niklashausen Journey makes for an aesthetically and intellectually intriguing cinematic work, if not Fassbinder's very best.

The 'message' of The Niklashausen Journey can probably best summed up with a preacher from the film's sermon: "Nevertheless, every revolutionary uprising leads to new injustices...occasions of new unrest and inequalities...and gives rise to new disruptions...An evil may not be driven out with an even greater evil." Too bad, Fassbinder's one-time collaborator Alexander Kluge – the racially self-flagellating Frankfurt School lawyer-turned-filmmaker and personal friend of anti-Aryan Jewish-Marxist philosopher Theodor W. Adorno – never seemed to understand these words of wisdom.

WHY DOES HERR R. RUN AMOK?

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1970)

Credited as being co-directed by both German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder (In a Year of 13 Moons, Berlin Alexanderplatz) and his early mentor/eventual business partner/late enemy Michael Fengler (who also co-directed The Niklashausen Journey (1970) that same year with Fassbinder), Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970) aka Warum läuft Herr R. Amok? was also the first film shot in color associated with the Fass-bande Anti-Theater, as well as one of RWF's first big cinematic hits. While Fassbinder apparently only sketched scene outlines for the film and even credited the work more as his co-director's than his own, both he and Fengler were given a directorial award ("Film Award in Gold") for Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?—a mostly improvised work that was shot over a mere 13 day period—at the 1971 German Film prize competition. Additionally, Hanna Schygulla, who plays a supporting role in the film, said that in a 2003 interview with the Village Voice that Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? was completely directed by Fengler who, in stark contrast to Fassbinder's directing style, had the actors completely improvise their dialogue for the film, hence its almost documentary-like feel. Probably more insightful, however, is that Fassbinder listed Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? in his 1981 "Hitlist of German Films", which includes favorite and most hated films of German New Cinema, including his own, as "The Most Disgusting" among Teutonic cinema. Not one to mince words, Fassbinder also listed Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? co-director Michael Fengler and star Kurt Raab in his "Hitlist" as being amongst his "Worst Experience" working with individuals in his filmmaking career. Still, whether it is entirely the result of Fengler's almost-distinguishable direction or not, Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?, not unlike the Ulli Lommel directed and Raab penned/starring work Tenderness of the Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe certainly bares a shade or two of Fassbinder's auteur signature, which is undoubtedly the result of his irrefutable dictatorship over his Superstars and collaborators, namely those that belonged to the pre-cinema Anti-Theater that he led with a sado-masochistic iron-fist. A sort of thematic and aesthetic prototype for what would be his first domestic commercial success, The Merchant of Four Seasons aka (1971) Händler der vier Jahreszeiten, Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? follows an underappreciated middle-class cuckold of a man who is patronized by a wife he does not love and who has a little loser for a son and ultimately commits self-slaughter in the end, but not before committing total familicide, after being suffocated by too much bourgeois banality and suburban soullessness as a man whose subconscious and conscious hit head on like a runaway train into a brick-wall. A sort of proto-Dogme 95 flick with a pseudo-cinéma vérité aesthetic featuring intentionally mundane improvised dialogue, Why Does Herr R.

WHY DOES HERR R. RUN AMOK?

Run Amok? is the sick, sardonic and fiercely foreboding story of a man who is so overwhelmed by his buried negative and violent emotions and inability to express himself in any meaningful way that he hangs himself in his work restroom, but not before taking his wife and child with him.

Herr Raab (Kurt Raab) has slicked and properly parted hair that Adolf Hitler would have certainly approved of and his three-piece suit undoubtedly compliments his ostensibly professional appearance, which is quite important for an office lemming of a technical draftsman who sees it as the utter most importance to please his boss with good and honest hard work, but obtaining a promotion seems to be a somewhat impossible task. Raab's boss (Franz Maron), who is a rather swarthy and even sinister man that bears a striking resemblance to a member of the Romulan alien race from the Star Trek universe, wants him to go beyond the basic technical work and become a serious player and problem solver for the corporate team, but he always seems to be somewhere else as an innate introvert with somewhat sub-par social skills and seemingly autistic qualities. Mr. Raab gets along well with his mostly mundane co-workers, who include Fassbinder's mother Lilo Pempeit and Fass-bande regulars Peter Moland and Harry Baer (Fassbinder's main "artistic consultant" and assistant director), so his sanity, or lack thereof, is never questioned. While a respectable member of society who gets along with his coworkers and neighbors as a sort of marginally acknowledged 'non-entity', Raab has a propensity for making an unintentional ass of himself, especially in a scene where he attempts to buy a vinyl record for his wife at a local music shop featuring a song he heard on the radio, but forgets the name of the album/artist so to his humiliation and to the humor of the sales-girls that work there, he pathetically attempts to hum the tunes in a less than lackluster manner. Aside from having a patronizing wife (Lilith Ungerer, who being someone Raab apparently did not like in real-life, makes for immaculate casting) who figuratively carries around his testicles in her purse, demands that he buy every needless she wants, and provides an incessant source of noise via her busybody meanderings with friends and family members, Herr Raab has a young son named Amadeus (played by co-director Michael Fengler's real-life son Johannes Fengler) who, unlike all the kids in his class, has an incapacity to learn such hard arithmetic equations as 6X6 and 6X7 due to 'anti-social' behavior revolving around his lack of concentration and innate introverted nature, something he shares in common with his father.

Suffering from migraines and probably cognizant of the fact that it is only a matter of time before he explodes with a storm of violence, Raab tries in vain to seek help from a psychologist as the overwhelmingly prosaic nature of evening family dinners, sad Sunday walks in the park, and lonely nights watching TV programs that are just as banal as his own existence are really starting to overwhelm his unconscious and are starting to take conscious forms. The only time Raab seems to be able to fully enjoy himself and really be himself is when meeting with an old friend (played by Fassbinder's best friend/composer Peer Raben), but this only comes to all the more highlight the sheer and utter pathetic nature of his existence as the two perform an absolutely horrendous cover of a melancholy song via grating harmonica. After dealing with his wife, a woman who does not work but has the gall to complain to her hubby that "the older you get, more stupid you get, and fatter," and a nauseating neighbor (played by original Fassbinder Superstar Irm Hermann) babbling about nothing and unable to fix the reception of his television screen so as to block these whiny women out, Herr Raab finally explodes with an act of irrevocable violence, killing both women, as well as his son, rather absurdly using an ugly bourgeois ornamental candlestick in a furious and impulsive act of familicide. The next day, the police come to arrest Raab at his work and ultimately find that he has killed himself via hanging in the bathroom, symbolically one of the few places where he was able to find personal privacy and 'relief' from those individuals that ultimately helped contribute to his going over the edge and committing one of the most work acts imaginable. If nothing else, Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?, through a series of seriously monotonous scenes, does a more than sufficient job in answering why a bourgeois kraut cuckold transforms into a coldblooded killer of the spouse-sacrificing and pedigree-purging sort in a cruel celluloid climax that makes for a more potent argument against capitalism and the bourgeois than anything that kosher conman Karl Marx, himself a failed member of the bourgeois who lived off the generosity of others, ever wrote.

Despite evidence to the contrary, Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970) is still regarded and advertised as being a Rainer Werner Fassbinder film to this day, including on official DVD releases and—more importantly—on the official Rainer Werner Fassbinder Foundation website. Seeing as Fassbinder later distanced himself from directing static and minimalistic Godardian works, it is no surprise that he would later distance himself from Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? and even go so far as describing it as one of "The Most Disgusting" films in all of German New Cinema. Additionally, co-director Michael Fengler, who would ultimately make a fortune producing the German wunderkind filmmaker's films and acting as his business partner, would later go on to describe Fassbinder as "a bad, bad guy" and would get in a heated legal battle with his mother Lilo Pempeit over the ownership of the films after the Teutonic auteur's premature death in 1982, thus it is only natural that he would try to take artistic credit for any of the RWF films he could and Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? is easily the most blatant example of this. Even if Fassbinder did not physically direct the film, his quasi-incestuous and over domineering influence on the actors as the undisputed Führer of the Anti-Theater is quite apparent in Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?, a film that has the blatant essence of an early RWF work. Considering that Michael Fengler was only responsible for directing a handful of films after Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? and would totally quit his involvement with filmmaking in every context—be it as director, producer, or otherwise—shortly after his enemy/business partner's tragic death only goes to show that he was nothing without R.W. Fassbinder and certainly no artist nor 'auteur' in his own right. Assuredly an anomaly among Fassbinder's oeuvre, Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? is, at best, a revolutionary cinematic work foretelling the Dogme 95 movement and the arthouse realistic works of Gus van Sant, Larry Clark, and Harmony Korine, and, at worst, a novel experiment of cinematic improvisation with an almost direction-less direction to it, owed to the fact that the man who should have been totally responsible for creating it was all but absent from its actual production. Of course, like Tenderness of the Wolves (1973), Satan's Brew (1976), and The Stationmaster's Wife (1977), Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? would be nothing without star/production designer Kurt Raab's hypnotic, if not strikingly pathetic, charisma, thus maybe he deserves the true 'authorship' of the film, but judging by the absolute horrendous and totally trashy monetary-inclined post-Fassbinder women-in-prison (WiP) film he directed, The Island of the Bloody Plantation (1983) aka Die Insel der blutigen Plantage aka Escape from Blood Plantation, I might be giving him too much credit. Either way, Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? is Kurt Raab at his finest and the ever-so-obsessive R.W. Fassbinder at his most creatively neglectful, which made for a rather interesting and incendiary celluloid recipe indeed.

BEWARE OF A HOLY WHORE

By no means one of German New Wave auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's greatest films, Beware of a Holy Whore (1971) aka Warnung vor einer heiligen Nutte – an anecdotally embarrassing semi-autobiographical based on the filmmaker's virtual hell on foreign earth while filming the wacky and tacky kraut anti-western Whity (1971) only a couple months before – is a virtual “who's who” of New German cinema, features acting performances by Fassbinder himself, Werner Schroeter, Margarethe von Trotta, Ulli Lommel, Kurt Raab, Hanna Schygulla, Ingrid Caven, Harry Baer, Magdalena Montezuma, and countless others. Marking a break in Fassbinder's oeuvre and an unofficial start to the cinematic works associated with the director's “avant-garde” Anti-Theater (an-titeater) – the troupe of pre-film actors that the director lived with and made his original films with – Beware of a Holy Whore is probably the closest as one will ever get to understanding the “controlled chaos” of the auteur's filmic family and frenzied filmmaking process. Indeed, some of Fassbinder's collaborators have less than fond memories of the film, including celebrated cinematographer Michael Ballhaus who stated in an interview: “Some of the films we did together, such as Beware of a Holy Whore, I find pretty awful when I see them today.” Undoubtedly, I would be lying if I did not admit that Beware of a Holy Whore made me feel a bit ambivalent toward the Fassbinder family, including the director himself, as the emotionally sterile (although intentionally so) yet sin-ridden cinematic work is like François Truffaut's Day for Night (1973) aka La Nuit Américaine meets Jean-Luc Godard's Contempt (1963) aka Le Mépris from insanely inane inhospitable hell where unadulterated narcissism fuels a fickle furor of nihilistic sex, drugs, and rock ‘n’ roll that would ultimately take a tragic toll on the filmmaker behind it in the long run. As actor-turned-director Margarethe von Trotta explained in an interview regarding Fassbinder: “When we were filming Beware of a Holy Whore in Sorrento, he would go on three or four hours of sleep. Like Pasolini. There are people like that – often people who freely, almost obsessively, give rein to their sexuality, without becoming intellectually or artistically drained. They derive special spiritual and creative power from their excesses...I sometimes wonder if those people know that their lives will be short and therefore need to burn their candle on both ends, frantically living for the moment.” With its various scenes of unsanctified girlfriend-swapping, brutality against girls and girly men, brazen bisexual affairs, dubious money handling, crippling cocktail of alcoholic and other unidentified controlled substances, and all around hostile human ugliness, Beware of a Holy Whore left me with the unforgettable impression that Rainer Werner Fassbinder needed real-life manic melodrama to fuel him with enough tenacity and vigor to crack out celluloid melodramas works so quickly as a sort of king of psychic vampires of the artisti-

If any film displays the passive arrogance of post-war Germans, especially of the ostensibly anal Aryan 'artiste,' it is most certainly Beware of a Holy Whore; a work of penetrating "pornographic pretentiousness" and "narcissism-exploitation" where every single character has their head so far up their own ass that it brings a new meaning to Uncle Adolf's quote, "Those who cannot see past their own nose deserve our pity more than anything else." Of course, one will have a hard time feeling even the most measly morsel of sympathy for the most characters in the film as their film-wrecking wretchedness of douche-bag dandy decadence, shifty and seedy sexual secretion sharing, prissy prima donna pomposity, and vehement vulgarian vanity is just about enough to make a speed-driven Warhol Superstar (it should be noted that Beware of a Holy Whore has the feel of a slick and professionally directed early Factory film) feel consumed with decided disgust, but one must respect Fassbinder for having enough whorish humility to reflexively resort to the most unflattering of self-criticism and self-parody. Waiting for the patently pretentious and audaciously arrogant auteur filmmaker Jeff (played by Colombian-born actor Lou Castel whose blond boyish looks are a far cry from Fassbinder's semi-Mongolian schoolboy appearance), as well as the production money and film stock to show up and start filming, the cast and crew featured in Beware of a Holy Whore find themselves sulking in self-isolated corners of cumbersomeness, but things only get worse with the arrival of the dickhead dictator of a director who can't find happiness in cock, cunt, or caviar, hence his pathological need to create films. Only the always cool Eddie Constantine, who plays himself as the international lead star, can keep his cool around a band apart of 20-30-somethings who seem more interested in contriving poses for their contemptible contemporaries than utilizing their "method acting" for the silver screen. Indeed, tons of "whoring" goes on in Beware of a Holy Whore, pitting fag against fag hag with notable harlot heartlessness from Margarethe von Trotta who, despite being engaged to the production manager Sascha (played by Fassbinder), has no problem philandering with director Jeff; a switch-hitting softcore sadist that enjoys physically, sexually, and verbally abusing both boys and girls, especially the emotionally needy sort. Jeff also has a jealous actor boy toy named Ricky (played by Marquard Bohm) who looks like an inbred version of Mick Jagger and is plotting revenge against his deceitful dick-sucking director lover. Ulli Lommel – who would direct his first feature Haytabo (1971) around the same time as Beware of a Holy Whore using many of the same actors, including charismatic Constantine in the lead role – plays the role of a set manager that, like in real-life, dreams of becoming a director in his own right and seems to utilize any opportunity he can get for Jeff to degrade him. In one of the more standout performances, Magdalena Montezuma plays "Irm," a thinly disguised pseudonym for Irm Hermann (who seems to have dubbed her own voice for "Irm" later), who like the real woman, was deeply in love and financially supported the director during his early years of poverty as a novice filmmaker and was repaid for affection with physical and verbal brutality. In a scene that totally seems to capture his essence, Werner Schroeter plays a photographer with a graceful passivity that allows him to escape from the renegade film production rather unscathed just as he did the New German cinema scene. Although a marginal role, Kurt Raab plays a character whose grotesque yet gut-busting gayness and crude cross-dressing makes for a rare moment of comic relief in Beware of a Holy Whore that is more than needed. If Fassbinder achieved anything with the film aside from depicting the downright despicableness of everything that went on during his early film productions, it is that he was able to juggle an ungodly number of inciting idiosyncratic characters in a film that essentially takes place in a handful of rooms.

In The 120 Days of Bottrop (1997) – a work the director described as the last modern “German New Wave” film – effortlessly erratic enfant terrible auteur Christoph Schlingensiefel would go on to parody Fassbinder’s Beware of a Holy Whore with stunning sardonic sharpness that can only be absolutely approached by watching both films as a double feature. Needless to say, Schlingensiefel’s satirical scat film does not feature an inkling of the intrinsically irritating pretense that plagues Fassbinder’s flick. Although opening with the inter-title “PRIDE GOES BEFORE A FALL,” Beware of a Holy Whore really seems to be full of characters whose self-control and social sanity is the only thing that “goes.” The characters in the film are so arrogant that they make a Roman blonde beast – a tall Nordic man that looks like an albino straight out of a National Socialist propaganda poster – think that that he is “subhuman” and that they treat him “like a black” because they are all “Übermenschs” from Munich who “all belong together.” Of course, the godforsaken Guido could not be further from the truth, as these Bavarian Aryans are quite the miserable motley crew whose contrary physical appearances are only rivaled by their personal rivalries. Concluding with the Thomas Mann quote, “I tell you that I am often deadly tired to represent human kind without to participate in human kind.,” Beware of a Holy Whore certainly gets across – for better or worse – that Fassbinder was going to portray the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, thus it is no surprise that filmmaker Jeff states, “I guess I won’t be content until I know...he’s been completely destroyed,” as the very last word spoken in the film. The “he” presumably being Fassbinder himself, who inevitably destroyed himself with the behind-the-scenes chaos he dealt with on a day-to-day basis with filmmaking being the only part of life he could control, thereupon sacrificing himself for cinema. More an important artifact of his filmmaking career and his brand of filmmaking, Beware of a Holy Whore lets the viewer know that although actors may be the worst of whores, we as spectators are nothing more than passive Johns.

PIONEERS IN INGOLSTADT

Rainer Werner Fassbinder^o (1971)

Undoubtedly, even most Fassbinder fanatics will agree that Pioneers in Ingolstadt (1971) aka Pioniere in Ingolstadt is not the Bavarian enfant terrible auteur filmmaker's greatest film. In fact, Fassbinder himself thought it was an artistic failure and listed it as one of "The Most Disappointing" films of German New Cinema in a 'Hitlist of German Films' he compiled for a West German film magazine in 1981 just one year before he overdosed on a corrosive narcotic cocktail. Admittedly, when I first saw Pioneers in Ingolstadt about a decade ago or so, I was shocked by how bad it was and thought it was totally unwatchable, innately incoherent, and nothing short of an abject failure from a budding auteur who was still experimenting as a young filmmaker in his formative years, yet the film has strangely grown on me since then, or so I discovered with a recent and rather reluctant re-watching of the work. Based on the controversial 1926 play (or "comedy in 14 Scenes") of the same name written by Bavarian proto-feminist Marieluise Fleißer (1901-1974)—a naive Catholic educated protégé of kraut commie Bertolt Brecht—Fassbinder's Pioneers of Ingolstadt was ultimately an important work in the sense that it helped revive the name and work of the source writer, who also had a heavily influence on Bavarian absurdist auteur Herbert Achternbusch. Written in collaboration Brecht, the play was inspired by autobiographical anecdotes from the playwright's life and would ultimately cause her so much personal trouble that she apparently never fully recovered from the experience. Due to its frank depiction of sex and supposed sexism in small Teutonic towns, Pioneers in Ingolstadt caused a major scandal when it first premiered at the Theater am Schiffbauerdamm in Berlin in 1929, thus inspiring National Socialist scorn, the condemnation of the film by the Ingolstadt mayor (who attacked the playwright for "dirtying her own nest"), and Fleißer's own father becoming so angry that he threw her out of the family home, among other things.

Of course, Fassbinder's filmic adaptation is much more radical, pessimistic, and misanthropic than the source material as an avant-garde work that depicts a young virginal gal going from being an idealistic sweetheart who is looking to fall in love to morally degenerating into a wild and wanton whore who quite literally spreads her legs for any man that passes her salacious gaze. A decidedly damning depiction of a group of German soldiers (or 'pioneers') who come to a small Bavarian village build a bridge, only to sexually debase and humiliate every young and desperate Fräulein in town, Pioneers in Ingolstadt is a sort of avant-garde anti-Heimat film that portrays rural Germania as a cryptically decadent place where most women conspire to drop their panties for even the most boorish of soldiers. Although originally intending to update the play and feature the pioneers wearing contemporary West German army uniforms, Fassbinder decided to make Pioneers in Ingolstadt a strangely anachronistic work where the soldiers sport shabby Wehrmacht uniforms, including swastika insignia (though, for whatever reason, only a couple of the men sport the sacred swastika), yet when one (portrayed by Fassbinder's black Bavarian boy toy Günther Kaufmann) of the soldiers is black (!) for some inexplicable reason. A marvelous mess of a movie that is infinitely more interesting and provocative than an anti-Heimat classic like Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdscenen aus Niederbayern directed by Peter Fleischmann, Pioneers in Ingolstadt is classic Fassbinder in the sense that it features a rather idiosyncratic critique of Germany that does not simply wallow in far-left clichés like so many other related works of the zeitgeist.

The pioneers have come to the small Bavarian region of Ingolstadt and all the town folk are celebrating their arrival with a parade, especially the young lumpenprole debutantes of the town. While blonde babe Berta (Hanna Schygulla) is looking for love in the form of a true gentleman in uniform, her friend Alma (Irm Hermann) is a proud whore who knows how to get what she wants and will spread her legs for any man that gives her the proper attention. One calm night, Berta meets a soldier in a park named Karl (Harry Baer) and the two begin what the viewer assumes to be a classic romance, but things are not so simple and puritanical in the world of Pioneers of Ingolstadt. Meanwhile, while Alma is hunting for wild Wehrmacht cock, a third girl named Frieda (Carla Egerer) is sharing a dance with an uptight army sergeant (Klaus Löwitsch) who believes that being a sergeant makes him a "better person." Ingolstadt is run by a pompous and pathologically misogynistic bald dude named Fritz Unertl (Walter Sedlmayr) and his handsome yet arrogant and seemingly autistic son Fabian (Rudolf Waldemar Brem), who hopes to make Berta—the family servant—his loyal girlfriend. Before long, Karl begins acting cold towards Berta and even stands her up on a date, ultimately sending his horny and tasteless negro friend Max (Günther Kaufmann) to meet her instead. While talking to himself in front of a mirror, fag boy Fabian declares, "I have a car, my dear Miss Berta. As of today, I own a car. Your love is mine forever" as if the fact his daddy bought him a new blue BMW means that she will instantly fall in love with him, which of course never happens. In between acting like the most pathetic 'pickup artist' in Bavaria, Fabian attempts to blackmail the Sergeant in a rather absurd and totally nonsensical manner. Fabian wants to blow up the bridge that the pioneers are building, but he has a change of heart when the Sergeant smacks him around like a little bitch for attempting to blackmail him. In the end, Karl coldly fucks and drops Berta (who ends up allowing multiple men to fuck her brains out in the park), the Sergeant is murdered by his merry men, the pioneers brutally beat Fabian and Fabian falls in love with Alma (who goes from being a vocal whore to a settled down bourgeois prude), and the viewer never knows what becomes of the bridge. Of course, the irony of Pioneers of Ingolstadt is that instead of bringing the people together by building the bridge, the pioneers wrecked havoc in the small Bavarian town and ruin a life or two in the process.

In its libertine-like depiction of a men as sexually potent pigs who are only interested in sex and women as either emotionally hysterical morons or quasi-psychopathic calculating gold diggers, Pioneers in Ingolstadt goes to great and even quasi-exploitative extremes to unequivocally prove that both sexes are innately incompatible yet paradoxically cannot live without one another, albeit for very different reasons. Of course, being a sexual outsider of the sadomasochistic sodomite sort, Fassbinder was not exactly the most prominent proponent of heterosexual monogamy and Pioneers in Ingolstadt certainly reflects that with a certain bitterness comparable to the gay gutter melodramas of mad misogynist Andy Milligan and the early films of Andy Warhol, albeit with a certain post-WWII anti-Heimat Teuton style. For fans of little blonde beastess Hanna Schygulla, Pioneers in Ingolstadt features the usually strong diva at her most desperate and self-sacrificial as a tragically naïve girl who is looking for love, but is conned into loveless sex and debasement. Concluding with Schygulla lying on the ground in a dress with both of her legs spread wide open after being sexually serviced by a couple virile soldiers, Pioneers in Ingolstadt somewhat strangely reminded me of one of the number of degenerate high school party horror stories that I heard about as a teenager where some young girl tried to get some guy's attention and got inebriated and taken advantage of instead.

Although Fassbinder played the eponymous lead in Volker Schlöndorff's made-for-television adaptation of Baal (1970), Pioneers in Ingolstadt would be the closest the auteur ever got to cinematically adapting the work of Bertolt Brecht and as the filmmaker's Danish friend Christian Braad Thomsen revealed in his comprehensive study Fassbinder: The Life And Work Of A Provocative Genius (2004) regarding Marieluise Fleißer: "Brecht himself had encouraged her to write Pioneers in Ingolstadt, because he was impressed by her ability to characterize a small-town provincial milieu in dialogue, whose apparent naivety contained sharp criticism. Fleißer was a dialectician; her solidarity was not false and her criticism not without love. This also fascinated Fassbinder. Just as Fleißer would hardly have managed to make her breakthrough without Brecht, so the young Fassbinder would hardly have started to write without Fleißer." It should be noted that after scandal revolving around the 1929 premiere of her play, Fleißer parted ways with Brecht, got engaged to a right-wing poet, and even became a devout Catholic in her old age. Apparently, not unlike the girls in her play who fell prey to the sleazy soldiers, Fleißer was exploited by Brecht and would confess in an interview on her seventieth birthday, "Brecht destroyed something in me." Indeed, considering the intentional soulless and intellectual masturbation of Brecht's work, it is only fitting that Fassbinder would opt for adapting Fleißer instead because, like the filmmaker, her writings have a sort of rather uncommon empathy for her characters. In other words, whereas Brecht was a treacherous philo-Semitic communist scumbag who had a mostly deleterious effect on both German theatre and cinema with his anti-emotional Marxist puffery, Fleißer and Fassbinder were not afraid of emotions and gave a voice to the voiceless. Indeed, Pioneers in Ingolstadt might be an artistic failure, but it is much more interesting than any of the filmic Brecht adaptations that I have seen.

RIO DAS MORTES

Rainer Werner Fassbinder^o (1971)

Undoubtedly, if I were to name my least favorite Rainer Werner Fassbinder flick, it would most certainly be the superlatively sorry made-for-television celluloid abortion Rio das Mortes (1971), which has the distinction of being the director's eighth feature and borrowing its name from the Brazilian 'cinema novo' period piece Antônio das Mortes aka O Dragão da Maldade Contra o Santo Guerreiro (1969) directed by Glauber Rocha. A miserable mess of a movie that feels like a proto-mumblecore flick starring a bunch of exceedingly effeminate lower-middleclass longhaired dirty hippie bastards, the film would probably be considered a quirky comedy if it was actually funny, but it ultimately falls in almost every regard. Apparently based on an idea by kraut Francophile Volker Schlöndorff, Rio das Mortes is also slightly notable for being a semi-autobiographical work for Fassbinder. Like the pathetic protagonists of the film, who attempt to obtain funds for an extravagant journey to Peru to search for purported Mayan treasures, Fassbinder left no stone unturned in his attempt to get funding for his first feature Love is Colder Than Death (1969), which he eventually found in the rather unconventional form of an eccentric old widow named Hanna Axmann-Rezzori, who also played the woman that provides the hapless heroes of Rio das Mortes with the monetary means to fund their adventure in what is indubitably a true depiction of life reflecting art and vice versa. Ultimately, Rio das Mortes is a stupid movie about stupid people who are so severely stupid that they do not realize that Rio das Mortes is actually in Brazil and not Peru, despite the fact they manage to secure the funds to go there in the end. Notable only for an ultimately random and irrelevant scene where micro-diva Hanna Schygulla dances ecstatically to Elvis Presley's "Jailhouse Rock" while a flabby leather-jacket-clad Fassbinder oafishly admires her provocative dance moves in a scene the actress would later describe in the documentary Fassbinder in Hollywood (2002) as the closest she ever came to sharing mutual love with the auteur, Rio das Mortes is an excellent example of the sort bad film that every great auteur directs, as a work that seems to fall apart at the seams yet features a number of the signature ingredients the filmmaker is best known for. Undoubtedly a mostly intrinsically worthless cinematic work that I could only recommend to Fassbinder completists and the handful of people that are into kraut counter-culture crap, Rio das Mortes is, if nothing else, a testament to the fact that West Germans of the late-1960s/early-1970s were just as idiotically idealistic as their American counterparts.

Little blond Aryaness Hanna (Hanna Schygulla) is being hassled on the phone by her overbearing mother, who wants her young daughter to quit smoking on an empty stomach and to get marriage ASAP. Of course, The problem is that the little lady's boyfriend Michael (Michael König) is a hopeless dreamer of the hippie philistine sort and he has nil interest in bourgeois traditions, let alone being tied down by a woman who wants to squash dreams and aspirations. When Michael shows up at Hanna's apartments and discovers his black Bavarian friend Günther (Günther Kaufmann) there who has not seen in some time, he gives the Teutonic jigaboo an impassioned pussy punch to the face and two men begin to brawl in what is easily one of the most poorly choreographed and patently pathetic fight scenes of film history. The reason Michael attacked Günther is that he long ago betrayed his best friend and joined the navy, thereupon breaking a promise the two made together on agreeing to never join the military. Of course, after the fight, Michael and Günther get their bromance back on and soon begin plotting a dubious trip to Peru to hunt for Mayan gold. In between complaining to her boyfriend, Hanna attends feminist workshops where a gigantic cock with letters USSA is scrawled on the wall and where German dandy auteur Werner Schroeter's muse Magdalena Montezuma makes the silly declaration, "The repression of women can be best recognized in women's own behavior." Of course, the only person attempting to repress people in Rio das Mortes is high-strung Hanna. Naturally, Hanna becomes jealous of Günther almost instantly as she is a mixed-up and feminist-brainwashed college student who wants to get married and live a respectable life, yet at the same time she wants to pretend that she is an 'independent woman.' Of course, that does not stop Hanna from cheating on her braindead boy toy by having sex with the Bavarian black buck in a rather desperate and debauched attempt to destroy his plans to go to Peru with Michael. Among other things, Michael sells his prized sports car for a meager sum to a sleazy used car salesman (played by an extra sleazy and creepy Ulli Lommel) to help fund the trip, but it is only a small fraction of the amount that he and Günther need to pay for the rather pricey adventure. When Michael meets a pretentious beatnik bastard (played by prolific producer Joachim von Mengershausen, who produced Edgar Reitz's Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984) and Wim Wenders' Wings of Desire (1987), among countless other important German films)—a effortlessly effete student of Central America history—he becomes enraged, as the THC-addled fellow wants to bring girls along on the trip, which is a big no-no when it comes to big boyish dreams. As Rio das Mortes makes quite clear from essentially the get go, Michael and Günther are interested in going on a real pre-pubescent little boys' adventure and that does not include girl as they have kuddies. Eventually, an eccentric yet wealthy old lady (played Hanna Axmann-Rezzori, who gave Fassbinder 20,000 marks to make his feature Love is Colder Than Death (1969)) gives Michael and Günther the money they need to make their pilgrimage to Peru. As the two friends board the plane, Hanna watches from a distance and pulls a revolver out, but she ultimately decides not to shoot. Instead, she pulls out a tube of lipsticks and applies it to her sensual lips to prepare herself for her quest to find a new man.

RIO DAS MORTES

As Fassbinder's Danish filmmaker friend Christian Braad Thomsen (Kære Irene aka Dear Irene, Koks i kulissen aka Ladies on the Rocks) once wrote, "Rio das Mortes does not succeed as a film and is probably the only one of Fassbinder's early avant-garde films that is uninteresting. The light comedy form did not suit him..." which is certainly an apt description of the failed Fass-bande flick After all, Fassbinder's greatest excursion in comedy, Satan's Brew (1976) aka Satansbraten, utilizes sardonic slapstick of the innately anarchistic sort and can hardly be described as a being 'light.' Despite being an abject artistic failure, Rio das Mortes was a happy experience for Fassbinder's right-hand man and assistant director Harry Baer, who stated of the production's importance in an interview featured in the book Chaos as Usual: Conversations About Rainer Werner Fassbinder (2000): "In Rio das Mortes, I realized for the first time that Rainer was fully in charge as director. He stylized Hanna and Günther Kaufmann not just on film but right there in real life. The way those two acted—nobody talks that way and nobody walks that way. If finally understood that he used this artificiality as a tool. That was something special." Naturally, Fassbinder fans (myself included!) will find a thing or two to like about Rio das Mortes, but that does not change the fact that it is a painful celluloid abortion that leaves much to be desired. Of course, the image of Fassbinder dancing retardedly like a pseudo-hipster hack to Elvis Presley's "Jailhouse Rock" while admiring Hanna Schygulla's idiosyncratic grace will forever be burnt into my mind. Of course, I have to admit that I would love to see a sequel to Rio das Mortes directed by Werner Herzog featuring the two protagonists of the film slowly but surely going mad during their adventure in Peru as a result of starvation and pernicious practical jokes played by cannibalistic brown Indian men, but it is probably a little too late for that.

WHITY

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1971) Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Whity is an unflattering tribute to the American Western (and America in general). The film centers around the son of a slave master(who also is a slave). This sad fellow goes by the name of "Whity." Mulatto Whity is a very conflicting character that has no clue where he stands. He is basically an unofficial member of the Nicholson slave owner family.

The Nicholson family is comprised of Ben Nicholson (the father), his young wife Katherine, homosexual son Frank(played by Uli "shot on video horror and straight to DVD" Lommel), and retarded Davy. Whity doesn't quite fit in with his family. He is more of a tool of the family as they use him to carry out their dirty and conspiratorial deeds. They eventually even inquire Whity to kill fellow family members. Whity is most the most innocent of the deranged bunch. Whity has a very theater like look and feel (like most of Fassbinder's films). Pale white make-up makes the Nicholsons look like white ghosts. I guess whites really are dead when they can't do their own work. Although Whity has minimal set design, it effectively portrays a decayed and dead society with its lack of color. Whity is a REAL drama that tugs at all undesired emotions. Whity is truly a lost soul. Gay incest also appears in Whity. Was this one of Fassbinder's many weird sexual fantasies? Probably since Fassbinder considered Whity to be one of his most personal films. Fassbinder was without doubt one of the bravest filmmakers of the German New Wave(maybe even more so than Werner Herzog). Fassbinder at the very least was the most darkly dramatic. Whity is the ultimate anti-western. The Western is most certainly not one of my favorite genres. John Wayne was a coward that never fought it any war. I also think that Mr. John Ford was one of many overrated Hollywood directors. The Hollywood American West is one of the biggest myths about America. The slave owning element of Whity brings reality to that myth and smashes it. It makes me wonder if Fassbinder was a fan of the american "western."

BREMEN FREEDOM
BREMEN FREEDOM

Out of all the 40+ films German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder directed over the less than two decades he was active before his tragic yet undoubtedly inevitable death via drug overdose, the filmmaker's minimalistic TV-plays, which he made sporadically throughout his career and include Das Kaffeehaus (1970) aka The Coffee House, Bremer Freiheit (1972) aka Bremen Freedom, Wie ein Vogel auf dem Draht (1975) aka Like a Bird on a Wire, and Frauen in New York (1977) aka Women in New York, are the most neglected and hard-to-find works to find today, with not a single one of these films ever being released in the United States in any form for whatever reason. Most of these films are probably far too aesthetically theatrical and minimalistic, blatantly low-budget, and primitively directed to interest the layman Fassbinder fan, so it is quite doubtful whether they will ever be released in any home format, yet luckily all of these films are available to those who know where to look for them. My favorite of these uniquely understated and aesthetically revolutionary TV-plays is Bremen Freedom (1972) aka Bremer Freiheit: Frau Geesche Gottfried - Ein bürgerliches Trauerspiel aka Bremen Coffee starring Margit Carstensen (Satan's Brew, Possession). Indeed, while sassy little blonde bombshell Hanna Schygulla was Fassbinder's main and most iconic diva, the slender and statuesque Margit Carstensen was arguably the most eclectically talented actress the German auteur ever worked with, with her performance in Bremen Freedom being one of the greatest and most disturbingly passionate yet simultaneously humorous performances she ever gave as a curious counterpoint to her role as the masochistic lead of Martha (1974). Based on the 1971 play of the same name written by Fassbinder himself specifically for Margit Carstensen, Bremen Freedom is an audaciously anti-bourgeois 'period piece' rather loosely inspired by the life and time of German female serial killer Gesche Margarethe Gottfried who, not unlike most female mass murderers, passively aggressively used poison as her weapon of choice, ultimately killing 15 people, including her parents, her two husbands, her fiancé and even her children, via arsenic in Bremen and Hanover between 1813 and 1827, thus resulting in her public beheading. In Fassbinder's quasi-Brechtian Bremen Freedom, one never sees said beheading, but instead enters the macabre mind of a crafty bitch who sees coldblooded coffee murders as a form of liberation and utilizes her domestic wifely duties as a malevolent means to carry out such callous cappuccino-flavored carnage.

Oftentimes falsely described as a feminist film, Bremen Freedom is indeed innately iconoclastic, depicting Gottfried in a somewhat sympathetic, if not critical, light by presenting her as a fierce femme fatale fighter of the kraut bourgeois patriarchy, yet the work ultimately depicts her murderous act of 'female liberation' as futile and even lunatic, as she never reaches the sort of existential solace and personal freedom that she was hoping for when she started lacing her loved one's coffee and tea with arsenic. Although Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975) was the first major work where Fassbinder proved he was no blind philistine propagandist for the far-left as a work that received heavy criticism from Marxists, feminists and other degenerate middle-class rabble due to its unflattering depiction of the German Communist Party and 'bourgeois anti-bourgeois' armchair revolutionaries, Bremen Freedom proved the self-described "Romantic Anarchist" (a statement he made three months before his untimely death) was no meek pawn of Kluge and company, but a staunch equal opportunity offender who offered some of the most unwaveringly scathing and biting criticism of his degenerate generation. Featuring aesthetically rebellious sets that are all but totally empty aside from a couple pieces of antique furniture and mirrors, and soothing scenes of the ocean, harbor, and a hellish inferno projected in the background in what seems to be an archaic yet nonetheless aesthetically pleasing form of Chroma key compositing (aka blue screen), Bremen Freedom is a revolutionary work that Danish auteur Lars von Trier must have studied religiously in preparation for his mainstream anti-American avant-garde works Dogville (2003) and Manderlay (2005) as a minimalistic work about a lonely lady who only discovers more loneliness whilst in the company of others.

Geesche Gottfried (Margit Carstensen) is a virtual slave in her own household as a hysterical and highstrung yet intelligent lady who must literally wait on hand and knee for her pig of a patriarchal and majorly misogynistic husband Johann Gerhard Miltenberger (played by Ulli Lommel as a sort of 'bourgeois Svengali' figure). For the first couple of minutes of Bremen Freedom, one does not even see Geesche's face, but merely her legs and feet as she scampers wildly to appease her husband as an exceedingly annoying baby cries off-screen in the background. Johann has his wife running around the house like a diner waitress for coffee, newspapers, and schnapps, and when he can no longer think of a petty task for Geesche to do, he gets his sadistic kicks from belittling her as if she was a handicapped child. When Geesche, who is clearly sexually repressed, proclaims to her husband, "I want to sleep with you," he slaps her to the ground and demands her to say "I'm hot for you" as if she is a dog. Seeing no way out of the situation, Geesche poisons Johann's coffee and before he dies, a bloody rash appears across his face that resembles the sort of hokey monster makeup one would expect to see in one of Ulli Lommel's recent direct-to-DVD zombie flicks. When Johann croaks via death-by-coffee, Geesche decides to give superlatively soulless and sentimental institutional bourgeois love another chance and gets with a boorish ape-like man named Michael Gottfried (Wolfgang Schenck, who would later play a similar role in Fassbinder's Effi Briesst (1974)), who seems caring and respectable at first, yet ultimately proves he is no less petty and dictatorial than her first husband. Among other things, Michael hates the fact that Geesche has children from her previous marriage, stating, "I need a wife with whom I can have children on my own. I cannot bear to see another man's children in the house." When the two get into a heated argument about the status of the torrid relationship, Michael states to Geesche, "Look at yourself, how hard you are. A real woman would now be lying on the floor completely shattered and crying bitterly," as if he is shocked by her rather flat affect in the face of heated heartbreak, despite the fact that he started a romantic relationship with her shortly after her first husband Johann mysteriously dropped dead. When Michael and Geesche get married, the gorilla-like groom dies on the altar, fittingly leaving the bride to spend her honeymoon with a corpse. When announcing the deaths of both husbands, children, and parents to her crippled soldier brother Johann (Fritz Schediwy), Geesche does not express even the most remote remorse nor sorrow, even going on a proto-feminist tangent that irks her bro, hysterically stating, "I shall live my life as I wish. To live one's own life, Johann, that ought to be everybody's aim. And a woman is a human being, even if there are too few men and women who are already aware of it." Naturally, Geesche also poisons her brother Johann as he had the gall to mock her for her psychosis-ridden feminist spiel. Indeed, Geesche ultimately lives her life the way she wishes as a psychotic serial killer, but it does not last long. After her friend Luisa Mauer (Hanna Schygulla) hints at the fact she knows she is a killer, Geesche poisons her female companion and even lets her know that she has laced her beverage with arsenic before she croaks, but shortly after Fassbinder shows up and reveals that he went to a criminal court and found poison in the coffee. When Fassbinder asks Geesche why she poisoned him, she responds with, "Now I shall die" as if she is relieved by the fact she has a date with a guillotine, thus confirming she will never ever again have to suffer the absolutely hellish burden of being a bourgeois housewife.

While not actually depicted in the Brechtian (and thus anticlimactic) Bremen Freedom, the real-life Gesche Gottfried was beheaded in 1831 in what was the last public execution in the Northern German city of Bremen. Indeed, while it is rather dubious whether or not she was really a feminist freedom fighter of sorts, one must admit that being publically executed in a rather brutal manner is as far away as one can get from being a simple domestic petite-bourgeois housewife. More than anything, Bremen Freedom depicts Gesche as a tragic and misguided figure with a slave-morality in the Nietzschean sense who ironically utilized her servant duties as an ostensibly humble housewife who serves her husband coffee as a warped means to liberate herself from her figurative shackles, eventually becoming even more boldly and maliciously homicidal when the toxic spiked hot stuff did not give her the sense of freedom she expected it would, thus leading to her own predictable (and arguably self-consciously desired) self-destruction, somewhat ironically 'dying like a man' in the end. Undoubtedly, like many contemporary feminists, the more Gesche sought liberalization via murderous mocha, the more it became apparent that said liberalization was merely an intangible ideal and utopian dream that turned the once-humble housewife into a psychosis-plagued neurotic of the fatally fanatical sort who lives to kill and spout stupid slogans (“well-behaved women seldom make history” certainly comes to mind in this context!) After all, Gesche Gottfried did, indeed, make history and in a manner with which few other women can compare. Aside from Tenderness of the Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe directed by Ulli Lommel, which the auteur merely produced and had a small acting role in, Bremen Freedom stands out as Fassbinder’s sole serial killer flick, yet when it comes down to it, the simplistically yet suavely stylized TV-play is really a black comedy of the dry, witty, and severely social critical sort that spares no one, not least of all female ‘progressives.’ While conspicuously criticizing the old kraut middleclass order, Bremen Freedom more importantly attacks the new order, especially the so-called ‘women’s liberation movement,’ utilizing Gesche Gottfried as a symbol of irrational female rebellion whose macabre methods not only cannibalistically destroyed her entire extended family, but also destroyed herself as a little lady who is nothing if not her own worst enemy. As hinted in by Fassbinder in a scene in Bremen Freedom where Geesche asks for sex from her husband in a most groveling manner (only to be rebuffed and thrown to the ground), the murders possibly could have been avoided had the female anti-hero not become so frigid and sexually repressed, but such sentiments might offend the good taste of a humungous Hebraic feminist whale like Andrea Dworkin. Like Fassbinder’s later more popular works, especially The Stationmaster’s Wife (1977) aka Bolwieser and The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979), Bremen Freedom cruelly demonstrates there was a hefty price women had to pay for female emancipation, namely the loss of their souls and potential soulmates.

THE BITTER TEARS OF PETRA VON KANT

Aside from the fantastic first four feature-length freak flicks directed by kraut mischling auteuress Ulrike Ottinger (A Ticket of No Return, Freak Orlando) and the subversive scatological cyber-dyke sci-fi films of sexually ambiguous Austrian auteur A. Hans Scheirl (Flaming Ears, Dandy Dust), I cannot think of many lesbian films I can tolerate, let alone praise, but a German gentleman by the name of Rainer Werner Fassbinder – the German New Cinema master of morose melodrama – did direct a Sapphic cinematic work of sorts about lily-licker love gone awry that I cannot deny my delight for. Indeed, regarded as one of Fassbinder's greatest achievements as both a filmmaker and as a playwright, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972) aka Die Bitteren Tränen der Petra von Kant, although a film about lurid love between two women (and a third lipstick lesbian in the mix that stands sycophantically on the side) and not featuring a single male character in the film, was actually based on the homosexual filmmaker's failed romance with his black Bavarian boyfriend Günther Kaufmann; a married heterosexual man with two kids. As mentioned in the Fassbinder biography Love Is Colder Than Death (1987) written by Robert Katz (co-scriptwriter of Wolf Gremm's 1982 film Kamikaze 89 starring R.W. Fassbinder), "The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, subtitled "Real Feeling," is the story, transsexualized into a lesbian love affair, of Rainer's relationship with Günther...Rainer never challenged the view held by those closest to him that every word in the play was spoken either to or by him. But it goes much further than mere revelation or even soul-baring. A year later he would turn it into one of his most powerful films, both versions making a deep descent into the nature of love." Written by Fassbinder during a spontaneous 12-hour flight from Berlin to Los Angeles, California (that involved the filmmaker demanding that he and his Superstars skip the vacation trip and fly straight back to the Fatherland so as immediately get to work on his new script) and filmed in a mere ten days by cinematographer Michael Ballhaus (whose house was utilized as the setting for the film), The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant would prove to be one of the filmmaker's most strangely personal, if not cryptically so, works, thus brazenly and bodaciously baring his whole positively pitiful soul and hopelessly humiliating failed romance for the entire whole world to see, albeit in a more aesthetically pleasing and delectably dainty form. Like the debauched yet decorated dyke anti-hero of the film, Fassbinder would literally try to buy the love of his reluctant black beau by showering him with expensive Lamborghinis – four of which the masculine mulatto Bavarian managed to total in a mere year – while his Superstars starved for money and attention, thus resulting in a mutiny or two against filmmaker Führer. Starring damaged diva Margit Carstensen (Satan's Brew, Chinese Roulette) in her first major collaboration with Fassbinder (she previously appeared in minor roles in two of the filmmaker's two 1970 TV-movies; Das Kaffeehaus and The Niklashausen Journey) as an antagonistic, alcohol-addled aristocrat who loathes men almost as much she hates waking up before noon, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant is a decisively dispiriting and drastically dreary drama about a horrendously hateful and monstrously miserable woman of an unprepossessing personality named Petra von Kant who believes she has found true love in the form of a young beautiful lower-middleclass woman, but cannot deal with the fact that her gorgeous girlfriend still needs men to sexually service her as everyone knows that women make for a poor and patently passive substitute for a job biologically fit for a man.

Petra von Kant – a famous yet fiendish fashion designer based in Bremen who, despite her wealth and prestige, is unable to pay the bills on time – is undoubtedly a miserable cunt whose only source of solace comes from fresh female genitalia in pretty proletarian form. A sedentary sadist who has her own virtual slave/assistant named Marlene (Irm Hermann) – a mostly mute masochist who gladly endures her wicked employer's emotional abuse – Petra is a loser in every way, especially in regard to love, except when it comes to her work and propensity to plague other people with her penetrating pang and perturbing passion. When Petra's cousin Sidonie von Grasenabb (Schaake) appears early on in The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant to discuss her happy marriage of humility and honesty, the fiercely foul fashion designer reveals her unwavering, seething hatred of men. While Sidonie explains how her, "humility paid off" because her husband, "thinks he's the boss, but in the end," she gets her way, Petra firmly believes that, "marriage brings out the worst in people." Although a lecherous lesbian, Petra has been married twice; once to a 'great love' named Pierre – a handsome fellow of a fiery heart who thought he was immortal but died four months before their daughter was born via car crash, thus turning her into a young widow of a wench – and the second marriage started apparently quite lovingly but ended in utter disgust and divorce. Although a bona fide bitch with a complete and utter contempt for men, Petra displays a certain unusual fear and all-around rather odd relationship with her own mother, thus hinting at the deep-seated source of her own homosexuality and failures as a wife, mother, and female. Petra also has a hidden hostility towards her mommy that is unwaveringly unleashed when she hits rock bottom, even going so far as calling the woman who gave birth to her a "miserable little whore," right to her face. The emotionally despondent mother of an adolescent girl named Gabriele (Eva Mattes), Petra does not have to worry about nurturing her daughter nor providing her with natural motherly love because she keeps her away at boarding school, but she does make a random appearance in The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant that will ultimately scar the already dyke-like girl for life, thus perpetuating the vicious familial circle of female discontent. When it comes down to it, the only thing Petra cares about is herself, so when she falls in dubious love with a married 23-year-old blonde beauty named Karin Thimm (Hanna Schygulla) – who the infatuated fashion designer offers financial support to under the pretense that she becomes a model – things get a bit complicated over time, even if a briefly successful artistic and romantic relationship is sired, especially when the younger lady proves that she cannot be bought, nor personally possessed; a hard fact that the spoiled aristocrat who is used to getting everything she wants cannot accept. A heartless sadist who delights in dishing out heaps of hatred and relentless rejection, Petra von Kant finally learns what it is like to be on the receiving end of rejection and resentment, especially when she learns that a poor primitive Negro man of all people satisfied her femme in a manly manner that she never could.

Essentially comprised of five positively potent and penetrating acts with long over-extended scenes, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant is an exceedingly elegant and expressively stylized theatre piece of neo-baroque beauty adapted for the silver screen that, not unlike Rope (1948) directed by Alfred Hitchcock (Fassbinder even makes a 'Hitchcockian' cameo of sorts), is set in one room featuring a gigantic reproduction of Nicolas Poussin's 1629 classical baroque painting "Midas and Bacchus"; a work that is more reflective of the film's male homosexual cryptic origins than any content featured in the film itself. With the character of Marlene – Petra's masochistic assistant who stands to the side silently throughout the film and endures her master's narcissistic brutality – the viewer has an 'outsider' character to identify with, who although actually appearing in the scenes with the other characters, has no more of an influence on her malevolent master's romantic relationship than the filmgoer. Without Marlene as her meek servant and secret quasi-voyeur, Petra no longer has a constant source of energy for her sadism, hence why when the silent slave leaves without saying a word, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant concludes. At one point in the film, Karin makes a derogatory remark about Marlene and her relationship to her master, which Petra replies, "she's not screwy...she loves me!" in confidence that her groveling peon will always be there to lick her puss and paint her portrait, thus the sadistic she-devil's total abandonment by the sensitive Sappho serf comes as the ultimate surprise and lesson in modesty. Like Marlene, the viewer watches the emotional rise and fall of Petra von Kant; a woman that believes she and her girlfriend, "shall conquer the world together," yet when Karin displays will power and personal integrity that is greater than any sum of money or luxury her lezzy lover can provide, the aberrant aristocrat reaches a point of personal crisis that is so overwhelming that it is like no other pain she has endured before, not even the death of her beloved husband over a decade before. When it comes down to it, Petra von Kant – a superlatively spoiled blueblood ice queen who is used to getting whatever she wants, whenever she wants, due to her wealth and prestige – cannot deal with the fact that she does not have the godlike power to personally possess who ever she wants, hence the double-meaning of her naive remark of, "I've paid for enough," when addressing a personal threat from her cousin Sidonie. It is only when Petra accepts the fact that not all people can be bought and sold and that love is not about possessing the lover that she can begin to emerge from her personal crisis, and that her personal assistant Marlene is finally set free, thus dissolving the bitter tears of a tyrannical noblewoman of a less than noble persuasion who for the first time in her life understands the meaning and importance of humility.

A claustrophobic and sadomasochistic celluloid psychodrama of a consciously theatrical design, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant is easily one of the deepest and most daunting melodramas I have ever seen, not to mention one of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's most personal and powerful achievements as a cinematic artist who was just as great of a playwright as he was a filmmaker. Expressing himself vicariously through the fictional female character of Petra von Kant, Fassbinder revealed himself to be a man so megalomaniacal that he would denigrate someone in a dastardly manner by calling them a "rotten little rat," while in the same conversation pleading to that same person how much he loves them and how they had "stabbed" him "in the heart." Of course, as Petra's mother Valerie von Kant (Gisela Fackeldey) explains to her daughter while still disapproving of her Sapphic proclivities, love only can prevail when one is able to, "learn to love without demanding." Whether or not Fassbinder was eventually able to love without demanding remains to be seen, but we do know that two of his subsequent 'great loves' committed suicide after his foredoomed romantic relationship with heterosexual flame Günther Kaufmann fizzled out, thus making The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant and especially In a Year of 13 Moons (1978) aka In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden – a work made in tribute to his ill-fated third love Armin Meier, who committed self-slaughter shortly after the two broke up – as well as countless other films directed by the filmmaker to be the only notable and positive byproducts of his calamitous intimate affairs, which is more than most people can say about the results of severed relationships with ex-sweethearts. Eva Mattes (Eight Hours are Not a Day, Effi Briest), who played Petra von Kant's daughter, certainly did not think Fassbinder had the most fabulously fateful love life as she portrayed the star-crossed superstar auteur in full drag-king apparel for the utterly unconventional biopic A Man Like Eva (1984) aka Ein Mann wie EVA; a sensitively assembled yet shaming cinematic depiction of the film director's self-destructive tendencies, especially in the relentless realm of romance. Apparently, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant did not sit well with a number of real-life lesbians as an angry abberosexual army of muff-divers from various Sapphic special interest groups picketed the film when it played at the New York Film Festival in 1972, but as Petra von Kant learned herself, the truth hurts, especially when told from the perspective of a man-loving man that has never venerated the vag.

THE MERCHANT OF FOUR SEASONS

Rainer Werner Fassbinder^o (1972)

German New Cinema wunderkind Rainer Werner Fassbinder's first big domestic commercial and critical success, and a work almost unanimously praised by everyone who saw it—be they uncultivated members of the proletariat or pompous bourgeois snobs—The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971) aka Händler der vier Jahreszeiten was also an extremely personal film for the director who based the soul-stinging work on his own cold family and what he witnessed personally as a mere kindergartener. Centering around a likeable yet superlatively slob-like “born loser” based on the director's own favorite uncle, The Merchant of Four Seasons was described by Fassbinder himself as “a story familiar to almost everyone I know. A man wishes that he had made something other of his life than he did. His education, his surroundings, and circumstances frustrate the fulfillment of his dream.” In fact, Fassbinder's uncle was such an important influence on the director at an early age that he was a father figure (his own father, an abortion doctor, had little interest in him) of sorts or as the director's mother Lilo Pempeit described after bringing her troubled grade school son to a child psychologist, “Rainer was supposed to draw a picture of his family. Where the father belonged, he drew his uncle, my brother. This uncle became the model for the protagonist of The Merchant of Four Seasons.” The first film Fassbinder made after being melodramatically moved and totally transformed by the kaleidoscopic Hollywood melodramas of Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk (All That Heaven Allows, Written on the Wind), The Merchant of Four Seasons confirmed that the filmmaker was not merely a pretentious dilettante who had watched one too many American film noir movies and Marxist Godard flicks, but an audacious auteur who had a downright nasty knack for cinematic emotional range and expressing the darker aspects of the (in)human condition, especially in regard to those things that cannot merely be expressed with words, mundane existentialist meanderings, and pretentious psychobabble. A positively perturbing yet ingeniously simplistic post-WWII kraut tragedy about a seeming ‘everyman’ who discovers he no longer has the will to live due to his unbearable longing for love and warmth that neither his friends nor family seem decent enough to provide him with, The Merchant of Four Seasons is like a virtual celluloid suicide letter/epitaph written posthumously by Fassbinder, who inevitably suffered a similar cataclysmic fate himself, in tribute to an uncle only he seemed to understand, but being a wee and ultimately impotent lad, was totally incapable of helping. A brutally beautiful film about emotionally ugly members of the Bavarian bourgeois, The Merchant of Four Seasons is an absolutely engulfing warning to family members everywhere why love (or more like lack thereof) is colder than death. Made on an absurdly meager budget of 178,000 marks (less than $120,000) over an eleven day period, The Merchant of Four Seasons is just another reason why Rainer Werner Fassbinder was one of the most prolific filmmakers who ever lived of not just German cinema history, but cinema history in general.

In the opening of The Merchant of Four Seasons, one is introduced to unpleasantly plump philistine protagonist Hans Epp (Hans Hirschmüller) and the root of his internal sickness and perennial longing for love, warmth, and acceptance. Returning from his stint in the French Foreign Legion, Hans hopes that his mother (Gusti Kreissl), an apparently devout Catholic who has not seen her son in a year, will embrace him with warm and tender arms, but instead she callously complains “It’s just like you to arrive in the middle of the night” and “The good die young and people like you come back.” Of course, Hans will also inevitably die young and ultimately have the ‘last laugh’ in a warped sort of way, but it will not be from being penetrated by untermensch bullets nor an Arab sword, but due to his decidedly deleterious weakness for alcohol, which will eventually culminate in his prolonged suicide via intentional alcohol overdose while drinking with his friends and family, who watch on passively, at a local bar. In love with a woman who rejected him due to his undignified profession as a fruit-peddler and married to a patronizing and philandering woman named Irmgard (Irm Hermann) who he does not love but made the mistake of having a young daughter with, Hans—a rather tiny yet unflatteringly pudgy individual with a discernibly swarthy appearance—is stuck in a less than ideal domestic situation that makes him all the more bitter and depressed with each passing day. After an alcohol binge one night where he tells his friends at the bar how he was fired from his previous job as a police officer after a co-employee walked on him receiving a blowjob from a hooker looking to get out of a bad situation, Hans comes home to his angry wife Irmgard, who calls him a “rat,” which enrages the boorish born loser to the point where he irrationally physically assaults her in front of the couple’s young daughter Renate (Andrea Schober). Rather absurdly, Irmgard seeks shelter with Hans’ family, who all take turns trashing their blood relative in a remarkably vile manner in support of a genetic outsider. Only Hans’ sister Anna Epp (Hanna Schygulla) shows her brother support and points out the innate hypocrisy and seething hatred of the Epp family, especially in regard to the protagonist’s journalist brother-in-law Kurt (Kurt Raab), second sister Heide (Heide Simon), and sermonizing mother. When Hans arrives to makeup with his wife and to plead with her to come home, Irmgard calls her lawyer and asks for a divorce, which causes her husband to suffer a major heart attack, while a good portion of his family look on without lifting a finger to help him. Bedridden from the heart attack, Hans stewes in melancholy while his wanton and witchlike wife begins an affair with a random stranger named Anzell (Karl Scheydt), which leads to daughter Renate walking in on her mother engaging in carnal knowledge with the mysterious fellow. Despite her extramarital excursions, Irmgard decides to makeup with Hans and comes up with the seemingly bright idea to hire an employee to peddle fruit for them since her hubby can no longer risk overexerting himself as it might result in another, and very possibly fatal, heart attack. By happenstance, Hans ultimately hires Anzell—the man that gave his wife the sexual satisfaction he never could—for the job, which naturally stuns Irmgard, who conspires to get him fired. Luckily, Hans runs into an old friend from the legion named Harry Radeck (Klaus Löwitsch) and hires him for the job, which temporarily makes for a bright light in the failed family man's life, but all seemingly good things must come to end when you're an eternal failure.

Essentially, the final third of The Merchant of Four Seasons depicts Hans as he slowly but surely wastes away via depression and alcohol, while his friend Harry replaces him as a father, husband, and business man. While Hans' fruit business is now a monetary success and has even inspired his mother to give him the backhanded compliment, "I always felt ashamed when people asked what my son did. I got all hot under the collar. But now I'm really proud of him. You have a proper business now," he remains apathetic and continues to stew in his miserable and seemingly misanthropic melancholy. In fact, Hans no longer enjoys the all the things that made his life worth living, including his favorite music LP, which he smashes into bits, as well as his "great love" (Ingrid Caven), who he rebuffs after she undresses and approaches him for sex. Although he cannot articulate why, Hans wants to die and will use the rest of his short life to achieve this task, which ironically makes for his greatest accomplishment during his brief existence. During Hans' last night alive, he takes a shot of liquor for every single person/institution he loved/hated but was ultimately rejected by, as if accusing them all for contributing to his demise. Hans tells his best friend Harry "you're the only real human being...but you're a swine, too." Apparently, even Harry screwed over Hans during their time fighting for the legion in Morocco in 1947 when his friends voyeuristically watched him be tortured via whip by an Arab soldier (played by Fassbinder's 'second great love' El Hedi ben Salem) in a fetishistic S&M fashion and only helped him when it was apparent that the savage soldier was going to execute him. While Harry ultimately saved Hans from the Islamic savage, the born loser proclaimed to his compatriot that "You should have let me die," as if accusing him of the misery he would subsequently incur after leaving the legion. At Hans's funeral, only his "great love" seems to truly mourn him and the always-conspiring Irmgard makes Harry the inevitable offer, "You know the business. I can't manage on my own. And you get on well with Renate. You like her. I don't know what you feel for me, whether you like me but I like having you around. If we were to team up it'd be the best for everyone, I think...for you...for me...and especially for Renate." Of course, Harry, who already became the man of the Epp household by proxy long before Hans committed suicide, receives an offer from Irmgard that he cannot refuse and he assumedly lives happily ever after with his chubby chums' unhappy family.

Everything seems to work out in the end for the better, as if Hans knew all along that he was preordained to be sacrificed.

Undoubtedly, the production of The Merchant of Four Seasons was almost just as much a family feud as the film itself. Ingrid Caven (as 'Ingrid Fassbinder')—Fassbinder's then-wife and rival of virtually every other Fass-bande Superstar, be they male or female—not only played the role of 'the Merchant's Great Love,' but also acted as the production manager for The Merchant of Four Seasons. Apparently, Caven infuriated Fassbinder's perennial 'artistic consultant/assistant director' Harry Baer so much that he decided to throw her out of a ground-floor window, but Mrs. Fassbinder was not the only one that inflamed the hot-headed homo because he also apparently chased around Irm Hermann, who played Hans' bitchy and unfaithful wife, with a knife. Apparently reduced to tears a number of times by Fassbinder during The Merchant of Four Seasons in what was probably the greatest performance of her acting career, Hermann—who despite the filmmaker's homosexuality, deeply loved and financially supported him during his early poverty years—later stated of the production that she "was treated like filth." Of course, all of this makes for the greatest irony as Fassbinder once told an interviewer regarding his films, "When I show people, on the screen, the ways that things can go wrong...my aim is to warn them that that's the way things will go if they don't change their lives," yet he inevitably managed to push everyone out of his life, including The Merchant of Four Seasons stars Irm Hermann and Kurt Raab before his premature death in 1982.

An emotionally crippling tale of a chubby and somewhat cherubic cuckold who deracinates himself from his unloving family in spirit and emotion before his seemingly preordained death by drink, The Merchant of Four Seasons singlehandedly confirmed that Rainer Werner Fassbinder was a rare filmmaker of German New Cinema who could not only appeal to the stunted feelings of the bloated Bavarian bourgeois, but also poor 'plebeians' and philistines who had nil interest in the counterfeit intellectualism of directors like Alexander Kluge, Jean-Marie Straub and Wim Wenders, whose films only tended to interest those lounging in the far-left Ivory Tower. Incidentally, Wenders, who was also born in 1945 and had a doctor for a father like Fassbinder, would describe The Merchant of Four Seasons as his favorite film directed by his deceased cinematic compatriot in an audio commentary he did for a somewhat recent DVD release of the film. Fassbinder himself regarded the film highly among his oeuvre as well, citing The Merchant of Four Seasons as among "The Best" among German New Cinema, as well his tenth favorite film among his own "Top Ten of My Own Films" in a "Hitlist of German Films" he wrote in 1981. A Teutonic masterpiece of the melodramatically macabre, it is no surprise that The Merchant of Four Seasons was described by more than one film critic as the greatest and most important films of German New Cinema, even if Fassbinder would go on to direct a number of superior works. Ultimately, The Merchant of Four Sea- sons is an emotionally trying yet sensitively assembled tribute to everyone who has ever had a loser uncle (mine had the (mis)fortune of dying before I was born) or a familial black sheep who was never given their due.

WORLD ON A WIRE

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1973)

I would not describe myself as anything even remotely along the lines of a science fiction fan or a connoisseur, but I am an unwavering Rainer Werner Fassbinder fiend of sorts, so naturally I am quite keen on his sole yet immense contribution to the sci-fi genre, Welt am Draht (1973) aka World on a Wire, a 212 minute proto-cyberpunk epic shot on 16mm film that was originally released as a two-part miniseries for West German television. Nearly impossible to find until rather recently after a completely restored version appeared at the 60th Berlin International Film Festival in 2010 and was eventually released on DVD/Blu-ray by The Criterion Collection in February 2012, World on a Wire is a Teutonized, semi-futuristic celluloid adaptation of Simulacron-3 (1964) aka Counterfeit World by American science fiction novelist Daniel F. Galouye. Featuring next to nil action nor special effects yet a variety of aesthetically exquisite and quasi-futuristic and sometimes classical sets, World on a Wire is a rare cultivated thinking man's sci-fi flick for the non-autistic that is certainly a wonderful oddity among Fassbinder's work in that it is his sole experiment in science fiction, although the director would later play the lead role in his friend Wolf Gremm's darkly comedic and curiously campy science fiction work Kamikaze 1989 (1982) aka Kamikaze 89. Of course, being a fairly early work by Fassbinder, who was especially influenced by American gangster flicks and films of the French New Wave during his formative years as a filmmaker, World on a Wire is more a neo-noir epic set in an aesthetically pleasing technocratic nightmare than an emotionally vacant feeble fantasy-driven escapist piece for virginal fanboys. Featuring what seems to be the majority of Fassbinder's superstars, including Margit Carstensen, Kurt Raab, Ingrid Caven, and Ulli Lommel, among countless others, as well as a cameo from the filmmaker's friend/fellow filmmaker Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Der Bomberpilot) and his statuesque muse Magdalena Montezuma, World on a Wire is arguably the German New Cinema alpha-auteur's first great and epic masterpiece, as a sort of ambitious warm-up for his celluloid magnum opus and Gesamtkunstwerk, Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980). A culturally pessimistic work about a charming kraut Humphrey Bogart/James Bond-like character who finds himself a rather lonely yet marked man and who begins to believe the world he lives in may be virtual reality as opposed to actual reality, World on a Wire—a work predating Blade Runner (1982) by nearly a decade and The Matrix (1999) by over a quarter of a century—brings up moral questions about artificial intelligence and what happens when man's creations have more so-called 'humanity' than man himself, but also the age old questions regarding persona versus individual and how people perceive others, especially in a world that is increasingly technology-driven. Additionally, World on a Wire also happens to be Fassbinder's least 'queer' and most innately masculine cinematic work, thus making it the perfect introduction to the enfant terrible auteur filmmaker's outstanding and highly idiosyncratic oeuvre.

Things are getting rather morally dubious and just plain bizarre at the institute for cybernetics and future science (Institut für Kybernetik und Zukunftsforschung aka "IKZ"), where a new supercomputer holds a simulation program called "Simulacron one" featuring a "virtual reality" of the real world, including 9,000 "identity units" (or electronic man-made individuals with the ability to think, feel, and have memories), some of which have made the mistake of wanting to become real living and breathing human beings. Professor Henry Vollmer (Adrian Hoven), who is apparently on the brink of a major world-changing discovery that "would mean the end of the world," is the seemingly half-mad head of the Simulacron one program and after stating a number of degrading and quasi-insane things to the Secretary of State Von Weinlaub, including "you are nothing more than the image others have made of you," dies under extremely questionable circumstances that appear to be totally nonsensical after randomly collapsing. With Vollmer dead, man's man and lone-wolf Dr. Fred Stiller (Klaus Löwitsch) becomes his successor, but he seems reluctant to take the job, especially after Günther Lause (Ivan Desny), the security adviser of IKZ, mysteriously disappears without a trace after passing on a secret regarding Vollmer's apparent breakthrough. Even stranger, no one at IKZ seems to remember Mr. Lause, thus leading to the beginning of Stiller's cognitive dissonance and war against virtual reality as the "man who knew too much." In control of IKZ is a Svengali fellow named Herbert Siskins (Karl Heinz Vosgerau), who is secretly working with in a partnership with the industrial conglomerate "United Steel." When one of the contact units, a fellow named Einstein (played by Gottfried John), who happens to be the only one that knows about the simulation, manages to enter the body of IKZ scientist Fritz Walfang (Günter Lamprecht) and enters 'reality,' Stiller discovers that his world is nothing more than a simulation as well, thus ultimately leading to the good doctor's figurative and literal break with reality, but his 'delusions' and fears are not unwarranted. In between banging a number of babes, including Vollmer's daughter Eva (kraut diva Mascha Rabben) and Siskins' blonde secretary Gloria Fromm (Barbara Valentin), Stiller runs away from the threat of being involuntarily institutionalized in a nut house, packs of police, assassination attempts, and phantom German Shepherds, among other things, after he is framed in a conspiracy created by Siskins and his corporate goons for the death of professor Vollmer and the IKZ's psychiatrist Franz Hahn (Wolfgang Schenck), a man that eventually realized the corruption at the cybernetics institute. Eventually, Stiller realizes he has a true friend and not just a femme fatale in the form of Eva Vollmer, who is a human contact unit to the real world. Stiller also learns that he was modeled after a real-life human named Dr. Fred Stiller who designed an electric model of himself just for kicks. Considering the real Fred Stiller developed a sort of 'god complex' and megalomania due to his control of the Simulacron virtual world, Eva's love waned from him and she began to develop a deeper love for the sensually electronic Stiller, thus she decided to switch the bodies of both men. Despite its patently pessimistic tone, World on a Wire concludes on a rather positive note, especially for a Fassbinder flick, though it might strike fear into the typical Hollywood filmgoer due to its less than flattering depiction of the real world (as opposed to the Simulacron realm).

In 1973, director Rainer Werner Fassbinder wrote regarding World on a Wire, "This, of course, creates doubts about ourselves merely being projections, since, in that world, projections and real persons look alike...what this is about is based on an old, philosophical model which here creates a certain kind of horror." With internet social network sites like facebook changing the way people communicate and ultimately replacing real-life physical contact, Fassbinder's sentiments seem all the more pertinent today in an era where a person's internet persona typically transcends the true character of their true personality, at least in other people's eyes, or to once again quote mad scientist Henry Vollmer, "you are nothing more than the image others have made of you." For a master of oftentimes macabre and misanthropic melodrama, Fassbinder certainly made a great contribution to the realm of science fiction with World on a Wire, a cinematically epic work that manages to combine film noir, high-camp, softcore S&M imagery, a phantasmagorical Cocteau-esque use of mirrors, Sirkian set-design and melodrama, a fantastic and seemingly sardonic hodgepodge of old and new European actors (as well as counter-culture types like Rainer Langhans), music ranging from Richard Wagner's "Liebestod" to dreary counter-culture krautrock, absurdist imagery and comedy, and a soothing pseudo-futurist aesthetic for a film that is without contemporaries, although it does make for great double viewing with Stanley Kubrick's equally antagonistically 'futuristic' sci-fi A Clockwork Orange (1971). Unfortunately, world-class cinematographer Michael Ballhaus (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, Fox and His Friends), who filmed World on a Wire, later bought the rights to Galouye's Simulacron-3 (1964) and planned to film another adaptation of the sci-fi novel, but he ultimately committed cinematic blasphemy by selling them to epic kraut hack Roland Emmerich (Independence Day, Godzilla), who produced the big science fiction turd The Thirteenth Floor (1999). For me, World on a Wire is just one (but a very big one at that!) of the many reasons why Rainer Werner Fassbinder is the filmmaker whose oeuvre I must often come back to. Rather unfortunately, no scientist thought to make an "identity unit" of Fassbinder so as to prevent world cinema from being the technocratic nightmare of CGI swill, robotic emotions, and silicone tits that it is today. A delightful dystopian flick that does not wallow in technology fetishism, globalist propaganda, and senseless and soulless special effects, World on a Wire is undoubtedly one of the most enthralling portrayals of paranoia-based solipsism in cinema history.

ALI: FEAR EATS THE SOUL

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1974)

Movie miscegenation has been blatantly beaten-to-death for quite some time in Hollywood, yet the Tinseltown agents of melodramatic agitprop have yet to produce a race-mixing propaganda piece nearly as provocative, true to life, and ripe with subversive strife as German New Cinema master of melodrama Rainer Werner Fassbinder's masterpiece Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) aka Angst essen Seele auf; an uniquely uncompromising look at a decidedly doomed love affair between a lonely 60-year-old widow and a 30-something-year-old Moroccan immigrant worker of less than meager means. Part subversive homage to Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk's intensely idiosyncratic Hollywood melodramas All That Heaven Allows (1955) and Imitation of Life (1959), Ali: Fear Eats the Soul proved that Fassbinder learned much from his spiritual cinematic guru, but not without transcending the elder director's studio-system-shackled sense for cinema by giving it a revolutionary West German twist. Starring Fassbinder's then-boyfriend El Hedi ben Salem – a poor Moroccan-born immigrant who lived with his family (a wife and two kids) in a French Arab ghetto before becoming a Fass-bande Superstar – as the colored guest-worker who finds unlikely love and warmth in the form of a socially naive German widow, Ali: Fear Eats the Soul carries a certain audacious, if not exaggerated, authenticity to it that was even more brutally reflected in real-life with both actor and auteur being six feet under less than a decade after the release of the film that would prove to be their greatest collaboration with one another. While Fassbinder's friend Werner Schroeter – the greatest 'dandy' of German New Wave Cinema – held the filmmaker partly responsible for El Hedi ben Salem's death due to his belief that, "he had let down a friend who, to a certain extent, was not his equal. Salem was not an educated person; he was not at all sure of himself," the auteur certainly displayed his sensitivity to his exotic lover's precarious plight in Ali: Fear Eats the Soul; a striking cinematic work that, although coming from an ostensibly 'far-leftist' perspective, if not a rather distinctive and highly individualistic one, demonstrates that all 'forbidden loves,' especially racially mixed ones, are predestined to social ostracism and, more likely than not, inevitable obliteration. Filmed in two weeks in between shooting Martha (1974) – another early Sirk-influenced film – and the black-and-white epic period piece Effi Briest (1974), Ali: Fear Eats the Soul proved to be just another reason as to why Rainer Werner Fassbinder is probably the most prolific German filmmaker who ever lived as an absurdly active auteur who made more cinematic masterpieces in a year than most filmmakers make in a lifetime.

In an essay he wrote on Douglas Sirk, Fassbinder remarked regarding the curious conclusion of All That Heaven Allows – the film that the German New Cinema auteur loosely remade as Ali: Fear Eats the Soul – that, "Then later Jane goes back to Rock, because she keeps having headaches, which happens to all of us if we don't fuck often enough. But when she's back, it isn't a happy ending, even though they're together, the two of them. A person who creates so many problems in love won't be able to be happy later on... Human beings can't be alone, but they can't be together either. They're full of despair..." And naturally, such is the world of Ali: Fear Eats the Soul, but Fassbinder takes things to more misanthropic and even nihilistic extremes. The main difference between the younger filmmaker and his filmic father figure is probably best symbolically summed up in two different yet similar scenes from each respective filmmaker's films involving adult children and a lone television. While a TV is used as a soulless bourgeois gift so as to appease their mother, who has just broken up with her younger lover (played by Rock Hudson) and is quite lonely and melancholy, by the conspiring children in All That Heaven Allows, the son of the female protagonist of Ali: Fear Eats the Soul kicks in his mother's boobtube and another son calls her a "whore" after his mommy reveals she has married a young Arab. Working in arguably the most revolutionary period in German filmmaking history, Fassbinder was able to depict a sort of hopeless honesty in his films that Douglas Sirk never had the privilege of, at least while working somewhat servilely for the monetary-inclined money-men of Hollywood.

One rainy night after getting off after a tiring day of work, 60-year-old Emmi Kurowski (Brigitte Mira) – a widowed cleaning woman from a working-class background who was once a Nazi party member – finally decides to investigate the exotic foreign music (Al Asfourieh by Sabah) coming from a local bar that has always intrigued her on her nightly walks home, so she goes inside the somewhat seedy saloon and meets her soon-to-be-husband Ali (El Hedi ben Salem) by happenstance. Inside, she encounters a couple German women, one of which being the bar owner and Ali's sometimes-lover Barbara (Barbara Valentin), and a handful of Arab men. Ali's "cock is kaput," so he turns down the sexual offer of a haggard kraut whore, but he does agree to dance with "the old woman" Emmi after his racial compatriot tells him to do so in a somewhat heckling manner, thereupon ushering in the unconventional relationship between the ignorant, half-literate 30-something-year-old Moroccan guest-worker and the lonely widow who does not have a bad word to say about Uncle Hitler. Although Emmi and Ali face derision and denigration from the bar patrons, it is nothing compared to the virtual hell on earth they will experience from the gentle German woman's family, friends, and neighbors after getting married on a wild whim. Emmi's grown-up children essentially disown her (despite the fact that their father was a Polish foreigner himself) and her neighbors cruelly gang up on her like a bunch of conniving bitches in heat seeking to sever her soul, in part due to their jealousy of her newfound happiness, and it even gets so bad that the owner of the local grocery store refuses to serve the couple despite the weary wife's many years as a loyal patron. Initially facing seething hatred and social ostracism due to their unconventional mixed blood marriage, the extraordinary odd couple still attempts to prove “love conquers all” and Emmi theorizes that taking a long vacation will provide for a nice change of scenery and that when they come home, everything will return to normal. Magically, when the couple returns from their short sunny sabbatical, Emmi’s wish is granted and suddenly everyone has ‘accepted’ the two rare lovebirds, albeit in a most condescending, two-faced, and even parasitical sort of way. Finally relieved she has been once again accepted among the petty Teutonic proletariat, Emmi ignores the fact that they treats Ali as not an individual, but as a perennial foreigner and novelty quasi-Negro-Arab Übermensch of immense strength and sexual potency, even showing his strength off to her crudely curious friends like he is a monkey doing tricks and forcing him like a virtual slave to move objects around for her neighbors. Clearly hurt, Ali goes back to his ex-lover Barbara for sex, comfort, and couscous (a native dish Emmi now refuses to eat/cook for her homesick husband as she wants him to learn to eat sauerkraut). Emmi eventually comes to her senses, but it seems too late as Ali shuns his rather worried wife, even pretending not to know who she is when she randomly shows up at his place of employment where his work pals describe her as his, “Moroccan grandmother.” It is only when the two dance to the same song at the same bar where they initially met that the two can reconcile their differences and once again feel the particularly ‘platonic love’ (as indicated by Emmi’s remark that she does not care if over-anxious Ali sleeps with other women) that brought them together in the first place, but Ali’s health takes a turn for the worst due to a bursting stomach ulcer, thereupon leaving his body temporarily kaput. As Fassbinder once stated in an interview, “Of course, the ending’s meant to take this private story, which I’m crazy about and also happen to think is very important, and give it a thrust into reality, including in the mind of the moviegoer.”

Indeed, a lot has changed since the release of Ali: Fear Eats the Soul, but Fassbinder’s cinematic depiction of the social turmoil and cultural suicide that is globalization and “multiculturalism” – an oxymoronic word if there ever was one – has only proved to be all the more true nearly four decades after the film’s initial release. While the ‘Nazi Generation’ – Fassbinder’s mother’s generation which he many times cinematically criticized – has all but totally died out, only to be replaced by ethnomasochistic Germans with nil sense of kultur nor community, the foreign guest workers of Ali’s generation have spawned kids who are less keen on work and more prone to criminality (even making certain sectors of Germany “no go zones” for indigenous Germans) and hostility to the adopted anti-homeland that pays for their existence. It is worth noting Ali remarks to Emmi regarding kraut-towelhead relations during their first conversation, “German master...Arab dog,” because although the foreigners from the South might still be seen as unsettled savages even by ‘well-meaning’ blockhead liberals, they have now began to bark and bite while their pathetically passive Aryan masters become elderly and emaciated. After all, no matter how rich or powerful the elderly master is, he is no match when cornered in his home by a pack rabid canines who have been kicked one too many times. In real-life, Fassbinder essentially brought El Hedi ben Salem out of the ghetto and turned him into an international cinema Superstar, thereupon going from literal rags to designer clothes, only to turn his back on him when the filmmaker no longer needed/desired him. While drunk, Salem ended up violently stabbing three people and was subsequently deported to France where he killed himself by way of hanging in 1982 while in prison, thus marking the second suicide of one of Fassbinder's ill-fated lovers/stars, another to whom he would dedicate one of his films. In an interview with German auteur Frank Ripplloh (Taxi zum Klo), Rainer Werner Fassbinder – a homosexual man of many calamitous love affairs – admitted that filmmaking was a substitute of sorts for love, stating, “When I was very small I already knew I was supposed to make many films. I can only tell you that when I shot my first take it was more fantastic than the most fantastic orgasm I ever had. That was a feeling, indescribable.” With that in mind, it should be no surprise for those that have seen Ali: Fear Eats the Soul that the film is more than an imitation of life as a reflection of Fassbinder's idealized empathy for a minority lover that he could not express to any notable degree in real-life. Although Fassbinder was buggered by a seemingly non-gay brown-man from a gutter, for which he returned favor by humanizing him and his people via cinema, he ultimately kicked him to the curb just like the common latent-Nazi Germans he portrays in Ali: Fear Eats the Soul. Still, while a black Hollywood star like Will Smith does not add up to much more than an artistically-vacant Hollywood affirmative-action case on showbiz steroids, El Hedi ben Salem has been secured a place in cinema history that few melanin-strong actors can boast as the archetypical 'unknown foreigner' with strengths and aspirations, but also with flaws and failures, thus being given a 'human' form, although I am sure he was more thrilled about being the first man – be it black or white – to do a nude sex scene with buxom blonde beastess Barbara Valentin.

EFFI BRIEST

Considered a dream project of sorts by director Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Effi Briest (1974) aka Fontane Effi Briest – an ornamental and vaguely oneiric black-and-white epic period piece based on Huguenot-German novelist Theodor Fontane's 1894 novel of the same name – was a daunting project which the auteur put his heart, soul, and money into, taking about 58 days (as opposed to his usual 9 to 20 days) to complete shooting, yet the work and wealth that went into the meticulously stylized work ultimately paid-off in the long run, at least as the director and a number of critics were concerned, as it went on to be hailed as one of the ill-fated filmmaker's greatest cinematic works, henceforth winning the 1974 Interfilm Award at the 24th Berlin International Film Festival and being nominated for the Golden Bear. With the full title of the film being the absurdly long Fontane Effi Briest oder Viele, die eine Ahnung haben von ihren Möglichkeiten und Bedürfnissen und dennoch das herrschende System in ihrem Kopf akzeptieren durch ihre Taten und es somit festigen und durchaus bestätigen, Fassbinder indubitably made no lie about the fact that it was a big film for him and probably a work that he expected would be a glaring great cinematic work in the context of all of film history as a whole, which being named as one of the "Best 1,000 Movies Ever Made" by The New York Times, one can argue there is evidence to support that claim, yet as a fanatical fan of the Fass man's cinematic oeuvre myself, I cannot agree with this seemingly ridiculous assessment. Essentially Fassbinder's cinematic equivalent to the classic Hollywood civil war epic romance Gone with the Wind (1939), Effi Briest – almost entirely lacking the idiosyncratic subversive qualities and maniac melodrama that his fans know and love – is like an ostensibly highbrow melodramatic chick flick for petit-bourgeois Marxists and suburban socialists who are just as much as fascinated by and as materialistic as the society that they would love to see destroyed. Somewhat a cinematic swansong for Hanna Schygulla (who stars in the title role), in part due to the actress' disagreement over interpretations of the character and what she saw as low pay, as well the filmmaker's new diva obsession Margit Carstensen, Effi Briest would mark the last time Fassbinder worked with the itchy-bitsy (and apparently bitchy) bombshell blonde until The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979). Playing a seemingly impenetrable and dispassionate character constrained by the superficially stoic yet shallow social conventions and mores of the late 19th century Prussian aristocracy, Schygulla later admitted in retrospect in an interview regarding her purposefully plastic performance in Effi Briest, "I actually wanted to play it with more expression. I realize now that the movie is so good precisely because I was not allowed to express myself." Undoubtedly a man who had a way with words, Fassbinder would state, "I can't stand the sight of your face any more," regarding Schygulla's little revolt, but the filmmaker's remarks had totally new meaning for me after enduring her seemingly endless pathetic performance in Effi Briest; an aesthetically refined yet virtually emotionally empty epic in cultural decay, artistic dismay, and tedious Teutonic tautology.

Utilizing Theodor Fontanes's words in character dialogues, off-screen narration, and old Germanic text and letters, Effi Briest is indubitably a surprisingly fateful cinematic adaptation, especially for a Fassbinder film, as a virtual celluloid love letter to the man that wrote the source material, hence Hanna Schygulla restrained acting as the positively pretty yet physically and emotionally pedomorphic protagonist. 17-year-old Effi Briest, a naive "child of nature" and a girly ditz with a decidedly dapper exterior, probably does not make a very wise decision when she marries a man twenty years her senior named Baron Geert von Inſtetten (Wolfgang Schenck); a patently pedantic Prussian aristocrat and "art fiend" who delights in high kultur and keeping young women rather restrained. The daughter of a curious cuckold of a merchant (Herbert Steinmetz) who oddly and odiously states, "I envy her" in regard to the marrying of his daughter to a man old enough to be her father, and a severe social-climbing mommy (not coincidentally played by Fassbinder's real-life mother Lilo Pempeit), elfish Effi does not really have the opportunity to think twice about marrying a banal baron who will make her internal life an inferno, but her social and material life something of great majesty, at least in her parents' minds. Admitting to her mother that she has mixed feelings about the baron because he, "is a man of principles" and "probity," Effi – a delicate dame that is more prone to impulse than intelligence – feels somewhat pained and frightened by prospects of the future in regard to her less than handsome future husband; a man whose psychological, physical, and social dominance guarantee he will be ruling the house with a firm iron-first. Of course, gorgeous and gracefully girly girl Effi marries Geert the gentleman brute and thus their miserable marriage of monotony and failed monogamy begins. Needless to say, their marriage is less about mutual love, sex, and romance than homosexual Fassbinder's short-lived marriage to his friend/diva Ingrid Caven. On top of moving her into a home in a small Baltic town that is purportedly haunted by ghosts, thus scaring her into submission, Effi must endure Geert's blueblood passion for fine art and his blatantly bitchy servant Johanna (Irm Hermann), who won't even look the young girl in the eye because, being a cold wench, she is certainly the true soul-mate for the Baron, but lacks the social status to be with him. Things get slightly better for Effi when she hires an overweight lapsed Catholic servant named Roswitha (Ursula Strätz), but the blood in her veins does not really start pumping until Geert's associate Crampas (Ulli Lommel whose typically suave, Sven-gali like essence was snuffed out as a result of his voice being dubbed over post-production Italian style) – a major in the military – comes to town and comes in the sexually repressed girl on the seaside with his semen. Of course, Crampas, quite literally and figuratively, only comes and goes, but Effi makes the mistake of leaving around incriminating letters between the two lecherous love birds that are found by the Baron a number of years later. To maintain his social dignity and any questions as to whether or not he is a cowardly cuckold, Geert duels and inevitably kills Crampas and banishes Effi from his home, despite the fact that the mismatched married couple now have a daughter. In good Prussian aristocratic society, a mere infraction results in the complete and utter social ostracization and virtual annihilation of one's life, or so little Effi comes to learn after her erotic escapades with a dapper man she admittedly never loved, nor adored.

Assembling a seemingly asinine anti-auteur piece with not a single likeable nor empathetic character, Fassbinder admitted regarding Effi Brieß in a 1974 interview with Kraft Wetzel for the West Berlin publication Kino that, "it isn't a film about a woman, but a film about Fontane, about this writer's attitude toward his society. It's not a film that tells a story, but a film that traces an attitude." Indeed, the director even went so far as stating that Effi Brieß is, "a film that really only works in the German language," yet I seriously doubt that lost-in-translation linguistics are responsible for the ludicrously languid and lusterless lifeblood (or lack thereof) that is Effi Brieß; a periodically poetic yet profoundly prosaic epic of celluloid melodramatic impotency and insipidity. Best known for his intrinsically idiosyncratic and marvelously merciless melodramas with a sharp and scathing sociopolitical consciousness, Fassbinder inexplicably stated in the same interview with Kino that, "my personal interest is more in literary topics... The fact that I made things like EIGHT HOURS ARE NOT A DAY has to do with my having grasped certain societal mechanisms and recognizing perfectly calmly that you have to do something for the audience. And with other films like EFFI BRIEST and the earlier ones, there I was doing something for myself." Of course, considering Fassbinder named his less than masterful work Beware of a Holy Whore (1971) as his best film and Despair (1978) as his third best in a personal Top-Ten list of his films in 1981, it is quite obvious that the genius filmmaker was not exactly the most keen judge of his own cinematic oeuvre. As someone who has seen and likes virtually all of the director's films and considers no less than five of them masterpieces, I do not hesitate to state that Effi Brieß is one of Fassbinder's least worthwhile and rewarding cinematic efforts, as a sometimes admittedly aesthetically outstanding, yet ultimately uninspiring and uninventive work that is the celluloid equivalent of a piece of Victorian antique furniture that is pleasing to look at in passing but is not comfortable to sit in nor worth the price, at least for the majority of patrons. Portraying an extinct society that essentially dissolved into a much larger and more petty German middle-class, Effi Brieß is a foggy window into a cultural graveyard of the less than noble, noble living dead that was better off left resting in its cold crypt.

Sharing some similarities with Fassbinder's other films, Effi Brieß is surely a wayward (but this time rather weak) 'women's picture,' if not an unflattering one that portrays the 'fairer sex' as being nothing short of morally retarded and servile yet decidedly disloyal. As Baron Geert von InStetten – an absurdly authoritarian man but not without honor – states to his beauteous yet besotted wife Effi, “Women, of course are the first to cry for a policeman, but the law doesn't interest them.” Indeed, hopeless Effi's only admitted guilt for cheating on her husband is her lack of guilt in regard to her carnal deceit. A proud Prussian patrician, it comes as the ultimate insult that Effi philanders with a man who is half polish, bad with women, and a gambler, even if he is the “perfect cavalier.” Only when she is banished, disgraced, and has her budding child taken away does Effi admit that her big Baron beau is “petty” and “cruel” – character flaws she recognized in him long ago, but she married the mundane and monstrous man anyway solely as a means of gaining social status and piddling prestige. Judging by the petty yet pathetically pitiful problems faced by the characters in Effi Briest, one can only speculate that Fassbinder – a man personally plagued by suicidal lovers, a steady diet of narcotic drugs, and a pugnacious personality – almost longed for the much simpler times portrayed in his superlatively softcore cinematic saga of aristocratic manners and gestures. Unfortunately, it seems Fassbinder's source of solace was also a source of slumber for his viewers, at least in regard to Effi Briest; the master enfant terrible auteur filmmaker's attempt at confirming that he could direct a garden-variety film in the dispiriting spirit of classic Hollywood golden age melodramas, which, ironically, might have been the damned director's single greatest and most pernicious provocation of his career. If you ever had the compulsion to make your grandmother a Fassbinder fan, just buy a gently used copy of Effi Briest for her trusty VHS player.

Out of all of German New Cinema auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's female Superstars, slender Nordic beauty Margit Carstensen (Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven, Berlin Alexanderplatz) was undoubtedly the best at portraying nauseatingly neurotic, schizophrenic, pathetic, hysterical, and otherwise deranged women. As a calculating and cold aristocratic lesbian who learns that love is colder than death in The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), a bourgeois babe who cannot tell the difference between real sex and imagined sex in Fear of Fear (1975), and a neurotic fan-girl with no sense of self-worth who unwaveringly devotes her sad soul to her favorite writer in Satan's Brew (1976), Carstensen is one of few actresses who, despite being blatantly bewitching, was able to make herself seem totally ugly and radically repellant due to her horrifically hypnotic hysterical screen performances, but none of these film roles compare to her majestically masochistic character in Fassbinder's underrated and under-seen TV-movie Martha (1974); a sharp-as-a-stake-in-the-heart Sirkian melodrama about a relationship between a metaphysical master and self-sacrificing slave. Loosely based on themes from the short story For the Rest of Her Life by Cornell Woolrich, Martha was in limbo due to legal reasons revolving around the Woolrich estate and was not screened for some 20 years after its initial completion, thus making it rather ripe for a cult following among Fassbinder fans and more high-class horror fans alike. Of course, Martha – a film centering around a seemingly sterile bourgeoisie married couple – is not your typical late night horror show, but a malicious melodrama with curious comedic undertones that forces the viewer to sympathize with either a meek masochist who is afraid of her own shadow or a strikingly suave sadist who gets the job done, but nothing in between. Assembled right before Fassbinder's early masterpiece Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974), Martha was naturally soon forgotten, but after over four decades, it is about time that viewers catch up with the 'minor masterpieces' of a prolific filmmaker who made films faster than most people could watch them. With Martha, persecution mania has never been so cinematically marvelous, thus lucidly illustrating as to why German filmmaker Rainer Werner Fassbinder was able to beat Hollywood at their own game and did it quite gingerly by utilizing the seemingly meager medium of kraut television to do so.

Seeming like a dramatized depiction of one of the more 'conventional' case studies from Richard von Krafft-Ebing's Psychopathia Sexualis (1886), Martha was a more personal work for director Rainer Werner Fassbinder than one would assume upon a superficial glance of the film. As Austrian actor Karlheinz Böhm (Sissi, Peeping Tom) stated in an interview for the book Chaos as Usual: Conversations About Rainer Werner Fassbinder (1997), "Rainer had a very fractured relationship with his father; in Martha I practically depicted his father, and, because of that film, Rainer and I talked a great deal about the man – as a psychoanalyst, then, I would understand his homosexual excesses.” Indeed, Böhm may play an arrogant sadistic scoundrel of the delightfully dapper sort named Helmut Salomon in Martha, but a clear-cut ‘black-and-white’ depiction of human evil is nowhere to be seen in the film because in the world of reckless matrimonial relationships, it always takes two to tango. It is oftentimes said that opposites attract and that is surely the case with Martha; a frenzied filmic fairy tale of sorts about one sad virginal spinster’s subconscious conquest to be eternally enslaved or at least perish pathetically trying. Martha Heyer (Margit Carstensen) is a hysterical woman and her daily doses of Valium do little to calm her all-consuming anxiety and almost surreal social ineptitude. Needless to say, when her father (Adrian Hoven) – a man she has a rather dubious relationship with – drops dead unexpectedly in her arms and states, “Let go of me” as his final words to his daughter while meeting together on a vacation in Spain, manic-depressive Martha is all shaken up, even more so than usual, and things only get worse when she discovers that her purse is stolen by a nefarious Arab-Negro (Fassbinder boy toy El Hedi ben Salem) in the process. One soon learns that Martha’s hyper-hysterical mother (Gisela Fackeldey) – a wretched woman who spares no chance to denigrate and humiliate her daughter in between popping pills and guzzling liquor – is a large source of the 31-year-old virginal librarian’s penetrating problems. An innate introvert who sought refuge in the fantasy world of book and fictional characters at a young age, Martha essentially has the emotional and sexual maturity of a mentally perturbed preteen, thereupon making her the perfect sheep for the slaughter for a predatory psychopath with patently perverse and pernicious intentions. Although initially meeting him by happenstance during her tragic trip to Spain, masochist Martha will not talk to her sadistic future husband Helmut Salomon – a man with a malicious and malevolent master plan to enslave the weak woman of his dreams and make her his absolute odious and obsequious devil’s plaything – at a bourgeois buffet with friends and family members. Naturally, hellish Helmut makes a fool of miserable Martha in front of the dinner guests, but it is his private remark, “I don’t think you’re very beautiful...and certainly not attractive and charming. You’re too thin, almost skinny. When one looks at you, one can almost feel your bones. And I have the impression your body smells,” that really turns on the under-sexed spinster, thus resulting in the first (forced) kiss between the two loony lovers and absolute disgust from the old maid’s monopolizing mother, who faints after voyeuristically spying on the demented duo as the whole fateful event takes place. With Martha no longer the slave of her malignant mommy, Helmut now reigns supreme sadist over the forlorn fecund-free female after stoically taking her shaking hand in marriage.

Featuring some of the blackest hallucinatory humor to ever grace the silver-screen, Martha is indubitably a mischievous movie by an auteur with an unflattering and uncompromising understanding of human nature. In the end, anti-heroine Martha is a paraplegic – the inevitable result of her own devastatingly delusional mind – resigned to a wheelchair for the rest of her life as the indisputable perennial slave of suave fiend Helmet. Director Rainer Werner Fassbinder even regarded the conclusion of Martha as a ‘happy ending,’ stating, “When Martha can no longer take care of herself, she has finally gotten what she wanted all along.” Unsurprisingly, star Margit Carstensen had a different opinion and responded to Fassbinder’s statement with the remark, “I wouldn’t go that far. I really think that this is a resignation on her part.” Whatever one’s opinion of the two unconventionally complimentary companions in Martha, it would be hard to argue that – for better and certainly for worse – Martha the masochist and Helmet the sadist are an immaculate match of mental derangement that were unequivocally meant to be. The same can also be said of Fassbinder and Carstensen, whose creative relationship was not much different in spirit from the monstrous married couple featured in Martha, so much so that the clearly agitated actress described the director as, “a wretched person” during the making of the film, thus underlying how the German New Cinema auteur filmmaker’s oeuvre was a true expression of ‘life reflecting art’ and vice versa. Featuring some of the most ruthlessly lecherous ‘love’ scenes ever captured in cinema history, including sexual arousal via severe sunburn and orgasmic ecstasy via kitten-killing, Martha is nothing short of a minor masterpiece of the melodramatically macabre and horrendously humorous, as a film that accepts the absurdity of human nature for what it is; nothing more and nothing less. The next time I hear about a woman who is finally murdered by her abusive husband after going back to him time and time again after decades of abhorrent abuse, I will always remember Martha; a brutal yet beautiful antidote to feminist folly about the need for imaginary gender equality.

FEAR OF FEAR

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1975)

When it comes to the totally singular and untouchable cinematic oeuvre of German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder (In a Year of 13 Moons, Berlin Alexanderplatz), even his secondary and less revered/known works are minor masterpieces of sorts, with his made-for-television melodramatic 'women's film' Fear of Fear (1975) aka Angst vor der Angst starring Nordic diva Margit Carstensen being a perfect example of this. A semi-Sirkian melodrama with quasi-Hitchcockian undertones of the aesthetically minimalistic social realist sort, Fear of Fear is a sort of deconstructed sister film to Fassbinder's Martha (1974), which also starred Carstensen in the lead role, that centers around a hysterical housewife who is ultimately diagnosed with schizophrenia and who mentally deteriorates after her second child is born and thus gets hooked on a corrosive cocktail of alcohol, valium, and Hebraic rock n roll. A feverishly foreboding yet rather clinical and realistic work in comparison to Martha, as well as a little sister film to Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? which also concludes with Kurt Raab's suicide via hanging, Fear of Fear is based on the real-life experiences of a crazy middleclass kraut chick in her mid-30s named Asta Scheib, but also informed by Fassbinder's own mental illness and bourgeois up-bringing. Emotionally overwhelmed by two tiny tots, a semi-detached husband who is totally occupied with school and passing a math exam, a bitchy busybody mother-in-law and equally hateful sister-in-law, scheming quack doctors who are not much more than glorified drug dealers, and a horny pharmacist of the superlatively swarthy sort who is willing to break his oath to get in an Aryan middleclass goddess' panties, Fear of Fear is ultimately a remainder why living a contrived and safe life as a member of the bourgeoisie can have dangerous mental health hazards. Rather strangely, despite playing a hopelessly hysterical woman who suffers from hallucinations and has sex with men for valium, Margit Carstensen gives a rather reserved and strikingly elegant performance in Fear of Fear, especially when compared to her rather radical roles in Fassbinder classics like The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), Bremen Freedom (1972), Nora Helmer (1974), and especially Martha. Indeed, like the protagonist's drug of choice, valium, Fear of Fear is a somewhat misleadingly soothing yet ultimately dark and understated work that is rather 'softcore' in terms of Fassbinder's signature Artaud-esque naked melodrama. And while not one of the filmmaker's grand masterpieces, Fear of Fear puts phony, emotionally counterfeit, carelessly cliché Hollywood mental illness melodramas like One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1975), Girl, Interrupted (1999), The Jacket (2005), and other related celluloid swill that romanticizes and/or stereotypes mental illness to total shame in its uncompromising authenticity and sensitivity.

As a beauteous housewife with everything she could possibly need, Margot

(Margit Carstensen) would be the last person one would assume suffers from acute mental instability, but after popping out a second child she begins to lose touch with reality and becomes incapable of carrying out simple motherly duties like simply watching her children. Among other things, Margot is beginning to see things that are not there because whenever she stares at something too closely (which is oftentimes herself in a mirror), her vision begins to blur as if she is looking at the world underwater. While Margot's husband Kurt (Ulrich Faulhaber) is a man that has done more than his duty to provide for his family and is in the process of furthering his career, he sometimes ignores his wifey because he is studying for a career-changing math exam that could make his wife and children's standard of living even better. One of Margot's problems stems from the fact that her husband's brother-in-law Karli (played by Fassbinder's third and final great love, Armin Meier) loves and cares for her more than her actual hubby Kurt. As is typical of the so-called fairer sex, Margot faces the most scorn from other women, namely her hateful mother-and-law (Brigitte Mira) and jealous sister-and-law Lore (Irm Hermann), who spend a good portion of their time acting like caddy little busybodies who obsess over other people's lives because they have no real lives of their own. Meanwhile, a sad strange neighbor named Herr Bauer (Kurt Raab) of the somewhat reclusive sort makes feeble attempts to talk to Margot, who is totally disgusted by the man and rejects his pleas, but little does she realize that he is suffering from a similar sort of Weltschmerz and is looking for the same thing as her; love, acceptance, and sympathy in a banal and conspicuously contrived bourgeois world that seems to lack all three. Due to her overwhelmingly debilitating 'angst of angst,' Margot eventually goes to a doctor and is simply prescribed valium as if she were the stereotypical neurotic housewife. On top of popping pills, Margot also likes to lose herself in wine and Leonard Cohen (an unfortunate favorite of Fassbinder's!) albums.

As is predictable, Margot eventually gets addicted to valium and runs out of pills, so she tries to charm the local pharmacist Dr. Merck (Adrian Hoven) into giving her an illegal prescription refill, but he wants sex and she is not ready to give it. Of course, after facing intolerable hostility from her mother-in-law and sister-in-law—both of whom seem to think that it is a form of mental illness for a mother to display love and affection towards her children—Margot finally decides to peddle her puss for a prescription. After reaching an all-time low after becoming a virtual middleclass prostitute and starting an unwanted extramarital affair with the local pharmacist, Margot makes a feeble attempt at suicide by barely cutting her wrists and her loyal fuck body naturally Dr. Merck stitches her up. A quack doctor eventually diagnoses Margot as a schizophrenic and things begin to look rather grim. When her husband Kurt breaks down and asks her why she attempted to kill herself, Margot denies that she wanted to die and did it because, "I simply wanted to feel the pain. I wanted to take my mind off my fear." Indeed, fear proves to be Margot's greatest enemy and after her husband catches her lying in bed with her young daughter, who is totally naked, he has her put in a nuthouse where the doctor eventually declares the hysterical housewife sane. Ultimately, Margot is ordered to take medication, which will allow her to “live like any normal person.” In the end, Margot goes home, takes a job as a typist, and seems ‘back to normal.’ In the final scene, Karli reveals to Margot that the weird neighbor Mr. Bauer committed suicide, to which the hysterical housewife responds in a most monotone manner by stating, “I’m not upset. I’m so calm. I’m completely calm. You can leave me alone, really” like a drugged zombie who is merely lying to herself so as to maintain a life of seeming bourgeois normalcy, which is undoubtedly all she can expect from life considering her quite sensitive mental state. Of course, despite her hostility towards the man, Mr. Bauer was nothing sort of the male equivalent of Margot as someone suffering from melancholy who longed for love and acceptance, but never got it, hence his tragic self-slaughter.

Despite his seeming lifelong seething hatred of the Teutonic bourgeois, R.W. Fassbinder—who one must not forget came from a cultivated bourgeois family (his father was a doctor and would-be-poet and his mother was a translator)—certainly made a number of distinctly boobeise melodramas, with Fear of Fear being one of the most, if not most, obvious examples. After all, it is doubtful that many lumpenprole philistines would be able to relate to protagonist Margot’s seemingly petty personal problems. Indeed, not unlike the great self-loathing Jews of history like Otto Weininger and Jesus Christ, Fassbinder made for an excellent critic of the bourgeoisie and unlike a failed member of the bourgeoisie like Karl Marx, the filmmaker at least had a certain uncommon sympathy for members of his social class, namely bat shit crazy women. It should also be noted that the director’s mother, Lilo Pempeit, who has a small role in Fear of Fear, was a somewhat inept parent that, like the character of Margot, was known to be rather neglectful of her son, leaving him in movie theaters all day (which is actually how he developed his love of movies) and what not. Undoubtedly, Fear of Fear is deeply embedded in the Fassbinder cinematic universe as a work that is not only a sister film to Martha, but also the director’s first color film Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970). Indeed, it is no coincidence that Kurt Raab plays the role of Mr. Bauer in Fear of Fear as he essentially reprised his role from Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? as a seemingly unremarkable yet ultimately fucked fellow who is undeniably the male counterpart of Carstensen’s character Margot, albeit minus the good looks. Sort of like Fassbinder’s own take on John Cassavetes’ A Woman Under the Influence (1974), albeit nowhere near as depressing and strangely solacing, with nice little nods to Hitchcock’s Rear Window (1954) in its playful depiction of window-based voyeurism and scopophilia, Fear of Fear is a bold yet beautiful bourgeois ‘women’s film’ that reminds the viewer that there are some advantages to being a middleclass mental case, especially when compared to, say, a deranged bum, with ‘happy pills’ and a warm bed to sleep in being just some of the perks. While Fear of Fear might seem somewhat weak when compared to the dreamlike high-camp aesthetics and darkly humorous hysteria of Martha, it is still a minor masterpiece nonetheless that delicately demonstrates why so many seemingly spoiled women with relatively high living standards become unhinged and start destroying an ideal life that the majority of women in this world can only dream of. A film essentially specially tailored for all the warped preppy soccer moms in America, Fear of Fear has indubitably yet to find its true audience.

FOX AND HIS FRIENDS
FOX AND HIS FRIENDS

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1975)

Undoubtedly one of master Neuer Deutscher Film auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's most accessible and least thematically intricate films, Fox and His Friends (1975) aka Faustrecht der Freiheit – which also stars the usually fleshly filmmaker in the lead title and rather robust role – also happens to be one of his most immaculate and personal works. Created during the middle period of his filmmaking career, which is also often regarded as his most 'inner' time as a film director, Fox and His Friends was the first film in which Fassbinder portrayed an overtly homosexual love story (despite the fact that his innate gayness was a driving influence behind his artful and audaciously naked melodramas), but also a cinematic work that would cause criticism and outrage due to its less than flattering portrayal of gay subcultures, especially of the hyper-anal-retentive bourgeois bugger sort. Created in dedication 'for Armin and all the others,' Armin being Armin Meier – Fassbinder's uneducated orphan (he was a Lebensborn baby sired by the Nazi SS) lover – Fox and His Friends is an intelligent yet highly intimate indictment of opulent homos and how one gay proletarian is eaten up and spit out by a sassy sect of positively pompous, prissy, and pretentious pansies of the particularly posturing sort. Ironically, Fassbinder's Aryan Übermensch boy toy Armin Meier (who later himself was featured in subsequent Fass-bande films like Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven, Fear of Fear, Satan's Brew, etc.) – who was constantly belittled and bemeaned by the German filmmaker due to his lack of refinement – would meet a grizzly end in 1978 that was startlingly similar to that of the protagonist (ironically played by Fassbinder himself) of Fox and His Friends. Not surprisingly, Fassbinder would direct another film in tribute to Meier, In a Year of Thirteen Moons (1978) aka In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden, which like Fox and His Friends, is also quite boldly bleak and intensely personal, but aside from the fact that the protagonist is an orphan, has a proclivity towards peckers and commits suicide, the transvestite/nullo character Erwin/Elvira's (played by Volker Spengler) life bears little resemblance to that of the ill-starred man it was dedicated to. The fact that Fox and His Friends was created a couple of years before Meier's death with a strikingly slenderized Fassbinder playing the role of the lead Franz Bieberkopf aka "Fox, the Talking Head" makes the film all the more eerie, especially considering that the filmmaker figuratively walks in the shabby shoes of an exploited and degraded character he knew all too well yet subsequently gave the real mensch Meier hell, thereupon leading to his cinematically prophesized demise. Knowing Fassbinder's quasi-incestuous relationship with his group of actors, I do not think it would be a stretch to speculate that Fassbinder forecasted and even helped provoke Meier's premature demise, as well as his own in 1982, as it most certainly had to have crossed his mind as so vividly prognosticated in Fox and His Friends; a work about fair-weather fag friends and the bloodsucking emotional and financial brutality they beget.

Fox and His Friends begins with the introduction of charming yet uncultured carny Franz Bieberkopf – best known in the carnival trade as "Fox, the Talking Head" – and his even more captivating boyfriend Klaus (Karl Scheydt), the criminally-inclined carnival owner. Unfortunately for Fox, his beautiful beau is arrested for tax fraud while in the middle of one of his theatrical carny routines, so now jobless and sexless, Fox – a man of very little means and no other trades – decides to buy a lottery ticket in an overtly obsessed manner that is quite similar to that of the child protagonist from Willy Wonka & the Chocolate Factory (1971) directed by Mel Stuart. Also, like the fantasy musical penned by Roald Dahl, Fox magically buys the winning ticket, but with money he swindled out of a portly florist named 'Fatty' Schmidt (Peter Kern), thereupon winning 500,000 German marks in the process; much to his delight and child-like amazement, he soon has reasonably rich and refined Francophile, antique fetishist homosexuals swooning over him but the oftentimes crude and careless ragbag-turned-rich carney conman ultimately proves to be no match for the bombastic bourgeois buggerers' cunning and conspiring ways. Initially rejected by la-did-a-lace-curtain cocksucker Eugene (Peter Chatel) and his euphuistic entourage of sharply dressed sodomites, largely due to his indelicate humdrum demeanor, Fox is soon accepted when his prospective paramour realizes the seemingly base carny boy has just become independently wealthy. Although the exceedingly egoistical Eugene already has a personal twink of his own named Philip (Harry Baer of Fassbinder's Jail Bait aka Wildwechsel, The Third Generation aka Die dritte Generation) who is notably more pretty and polished than wild Fox, he cannot help but like the curious carny chap for his newly acquired capital and proletarian penis, although he would never have the gall and genuineness to admit so. Indeed, Fox may be a sub-literate with a decided disdain for high-camp, French restaurants, and first edition copies of Oscar Wilde and Lord Byron's works, but he is not so blind as to be somewhat aware of Eugene's vainglorious and even villainous intentions. As far as his sexual prowess is concerned, Fox – to the complete and utter offense of posh and prissy Eugene – states quite proudly that, "I am proletarian; they are more potent." Of course, Eugene – being a born materialist of the money-massaging and maliciously machinating sort – is less concerned with the size of Fox's cornholer than his cash wad and he is willing to use a variety of certainly corrupt, clandestine, and calculating methods to get it when all his inamorato wants in return is mere love and affection; two things the would-be-rich bitch has an incapacity for giving. Before he knows it, Fox is 'investing' in Eugene's and his father's business, buying an overpriced apartment and useless antiques, and paying for lavish vacations for the two, yet Eugene remains an unwavering ingrate of the most prim parasitic sort, henceforth resulting in heartbreak and even a heart attack for the lapsed carney, which his fleeting lover barely notices. Naturally, things take a turn for the worst when

FOX AND HIS FRIENDS

Fox is prescribed valium.

In the documentary Die Nacht der Regisseure (1995) aka Night of Filmmakers directed by Edgar Reitz and produced for BFI TV, Fassbinder super starlet Hanna Schygulla (The Marriage of Maria Braun, Lili Marleen) states regarding the filmmaker who launched her career prominent German actress of the New German Cinema: "But I've got to say he made some very powerful films without me... Now when I see the films from a distance I like some of them very much. For example, Fox, the Talking Head. Back when I saw it I thought, 'Oh well, he did a nice job of fashioning himself in the role of the victim.' I see it all differently today through his death." And, indeed, it is hard to imagine watching Fox and His Friends today without considering the highly personal context in which it was made, especially in regard to Fassbinder's scandalous and tragic love life. It should also be noted that Fassbinder's star-crossed Moroccan lover El Hedi ben Salem (Welt am Draht aka World on a Wire, Ali: Fear Eats the Soul) – who also committed self-slaughter in a fit of desperation like Armin Meier – also makes a most fitting appearance in Fox and His Friends as an Arab hustler, which the character Eugene treats with the most despicable disdainfulness despite his desire to be buggered by the brown chap. In Rosa von Praunheim's exceedingly enlightening documentary Fassbinder's Women (2000) aka Fassbinder Was the Only One for Me: The Willing Victims of Rainer Werner F. it is revealed that – not unlike pop-art-con-artist Andy Warhol – Fassbinder had a tendency for building up downtrodden people, especially in regard to his lovers El Hedi ben Salem and Armin Meier, only to throw them away when he got tired of them, thereupon putting these individuals in an even worse situation than they originally started with, ultimately culminating in their tragic suicides. Of course, unlike Warhol, Fassbinder had enough intelligence, sensitivity, empathy, and integrity to channel these character flaws into his film, especially in regard to Fox and His Friends and In a Year of Thirteen Moons. Like the protagonists of his films The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971), Fox and His Friends (1975), and The Marriage of Maria Braun (1978), the German New Wave auteur would inevitably learn that personal success does not always lead to eternal happiness, hence Fassbinder's lonely demise by way of extremely likely subconscious suicide in a manner not all that dissimilar from the protagonist of Fox and His Friends. That being said, if there is any filmmaker who can be described as 'dying for his art,' it is indubitably Rainer Werner Fassbinder; a man whose decisively debauched and destructive personal life was eclipsed by his only slightly more melodramatic films.

LIKE A BIRD ON A WIRE

Among the lovely leading ladies of Fassbinder's eclectic entourage, including the elegant and ethereal flaxen-haired Hanna Schygulla (whose Nordic beauty perfectly exemplified the Arno Breker ideal), the devilishly divine, waif-like, and ever erratic and neurotic norn Margit Carstensen, and the altogether charming yet somewhat homely and ever pre-menstrually-charged Irm Herman, there is but one leading lady, Brigitte Mira, who stands out not least of all because of her rather advanced age and thoroughly endearing gnome-like appearance, but because of the intense warmth, sweet naiveté and grandmotherly charm she so masterfully exudes—clearly all very natural, positive female traits which Ms. Mira carried over in a very fluid fashion into her rememorable roles in such Fassbinder classics as Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) and Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven (1974). Indeed, these very traits are precisely what made Mother Mira so very likeable as an actress in nearly every role she played, and which also granted her a very special place in Rainer Werner Fassbinder's sometimes very debauched and wicked heart; seeing that Fassbinder was a notoriously difficult director to work with, whose penchant for fierce and fiery arguments and childish, unrepentant displays of queendom, often driven by derisive and contemptuous cat-fights with his leading actresses (such as Hanna Schygulla, whom he once famously accused of “busting his balls,” and whose face he couldn't stand to see anymore after she demanded higher pay on the set of Effi Briest (1972), and with whom he would not resume work again until 1978), it comes as no surprise that the ever gentle and unassuming Brigitte Mira, with her thoroughly mild affect (even in moments of anger or frustration), would arouse even in the often faggishly flustered Fassbinder only feelings of deep feminine warmth and admiration—to such an extent that he directed his very own bizarre, yet rather winsome and fun homage to Brigitte Mira, appearing as herself in the lead role in the 45-minute made-for-television film, Wie ein Vogel auf dem Draht aka Like a Bird on a Wire (1975), in what is perhaps one of the most oddly campy autobiographical pieces ever committed to celluloid.

Named for the Leonard Cohen song “Like a Bird on a Wire” (Fassbinder apparently being a tremendous fan of the Jewish folk icon), Wie ein Vogel auf dem Draht begins with a close-up shot of Brigitte (who herself, interestingly, was the daughter of a German mother and Russian-born Jewish composer despite the fact she played small roles in National Socialist era movies) mournfully singing the German lyrics to the song, juxtaposed against Leonard Cohen's wanna-be Appalachian' kosher hillbilly blues vocals in the background. Brigitte's vividly blue eyes tremble and appear rather glassy in this beginning title scene, as if she is on the verge of tears, and combined with the rather melodramatic, melancholic lyrics, one can easily anticipate that the bulk of the film will involve the older actress reminiscing about the glory days of the Reich and how everything since has gone to shit (which it will, to some extent, but the film also, quite interestingly, “devolves” into something of a debauched, high camp musical later on). After joyously downing one too many glasses of vodka, Ms. Mira, in Fred Rogers-like fashion, welcomes the audience into the make-shift living room of her home (while also acknowledging it is a film set) and rather somberly recounts her youth as an operetta soubrette, occasionally bursting, almost seemingly schizophrenically, into songs about the trials and tribulations of her difficult love life, with intermittent breaks to describe each of the five men who have in their own unique and troubling ways left deep impressions on her (one of which was apparently a concentration camp survivor and also a hardened criminal, and yet another who was an export merchant and womanizer who very boldly brought his out-of-town girlfriends home to meet his wife). After describing in vivid and mournful drunken detail her long series of failed relationships, Ms. Mira boards a train with Evelyn Künneke (a famous German singer and actress, part of the Lili Marleen generation, who went on to make several cameo appearances in films by Rosa von Praunheim, as well as several other Fassbinder films), in which the two engage in a rather unpleasant, yet typically female—catty and passive aggressive—conversation.

The remainder of the film sees Brigitte re-live her youth as an operetta soubrette, in which she dazzlingly sings a couple of German classics, including a few songs by Marlene Dietrich and Evelyn Künneke, while on stage in a leather fag bar (with her son Ingfried Hoffmann on piano) amid dozens of ball-busting bear cubs and full-grown, hirsute biker bears dressed to the nines in leather vests, tight chaps, chain mail and military hats, and in yet another scene, Mother Mira hosts an all-ladies fashion show in which she again sings a couple of numbers while fascinatingly describing her childhood years growing up during the Reich. In the penultimate scene, in what is perhaps the most interesting act of this anything but banal film, Brigitte sees herself as the sole female focus, dressed in a glamorous blue dress with a feather boa around her neck, bedecked in elegant gemstone jewelry, prancing around and singing about diamonds amid a gym full of muscular fags—one of which includes Fassbinder favorite and one-time boyfriend who later committed suicide, Moroccan Negro El Hedi ben Salem—rather unemotionally lifting weights while flexing their abdominal muscles with their semi-turgid members resting both comfortably and conspicuously in bright orange, rhinestone-encrusted speedos (clearly, the most tantalizing of eye candy for the fanciful Fassbinder, who quite conveniently couldn't resist adding a flattering photo of himself at this jocular juncture). Indeed, this is a very enjoyable and unusual film, even coming from rather quirky and melodramatic Fassbinder, and a must-see for anyone who relishes the director's work, this film especially being a clear and lasting homage to one of his best loved leading ladies, Brigitte Mira; a wonderful woman who would return the favor by describing the oftentimes maligned filmmaker to an interviewer as, "a gentleman through and through." Featuring muscle-bound, banana-hammock wearing bodybuilders and leather fag clones galore, in effect being an alluring amalgamation of Mira's drunken soliloquies and reminiscences of her past, interspersed with a cornucopia of fetishistic gay imagery, Wie ein Vogel auf dem Draht has the unique characteristic of being a lasting, high camp tribute to perhaps not the prettiest of the Fassbinder femmes, but clearly the one who with her motherly sentimentality and always kind demeanor melted the seemingly incorrigible Fassbinder's heart.

MOTHER KÜSTERS GOES TO HEAVEN
MOTHER KÜSTERS GOES TO HEAVEN

Out of all of German New Cinema auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's films that deal with the innate hypocrisy of the radical left, especially in regard to its impotent armchair (anti)intelligentsia of the post-WWII era, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven aka Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975) aka Mutter Küsters' Fahrt zum Himmel takes the most personal and uncompromising, albeit classically melodramatic, approach against what the director saw as a disease of the soul of the self-loathing, anti-bourgeois bourgeois. Borrowing its title from one of Fassbinder's favorite films, Mutter Krausens Fahrt ins Glück (1929) aka Mother Krause's Journey to Happiness directed by directed by Phil Jutzi, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven has a message that is in stark contrast to the conspicuously com-symp film that partly inspired it, not least of all due to the fact that where the silent film portrays communism as the savior of the sub-working-class (even if the protagonist is too late in receiving such ungodly help), the Sirkian German New Cinema film portrays the Marxist doctrine as a tool used by members of the parasitic bourgeois, who in their intrinsic emotional and social sterility, still attempt to subjugate the proletariat, albeit through more pathologically patronizing, pathetic, and entirely misleading means. On top of both filmmakers cinematically adapting Alfred Döblin's novel, Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929), Jutzi and Fassbinder would both go through changes in political persuasions during their filmmaking careers, with the older Jutzi going from being a leading director of proletarian films and an active member of the Communist Party of Germany (KPD) to a National Socialist party member and strangely prolific director of short films (from 1933 to 1941, he directed 49 short films) and Nazi spy dramas, and with the younger Fassbinder going from a rather cliché quasi-commie comrade who hung out with members of the Baader-Meinhof terrorist group and made minimalistic films in the vein of Bertolt Brecht and Jean-Luc Godard attacking the supposed latent Nazism and authoritarianism of the bourgeois, to becoming a hyper-pessimist who described himself as a 'romantic anarchist' and directed a number of naked melodramas and black comedies condemning 'money-changing Marxists' and 'aristocratic Trotskyites.' What makes Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven especially effective in its condemnation of cardboard commies and antique connoisseur anarchists is that it utilizes a kindly and innocent grandma figure as the object of the bloodsucking neo-bolsheviks' exploitation. Like his rarely seen TV movie Like a Bird on a Wire (1975) aka Wie ein Vogel auf dem Draht made that same year, Fassbinder directed Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven in tribute to Brigitte Mira (Ali: Fear Eats the Soul, Chinese Roulette), who plays the title role as a working-class housewife named Emma Küsters whose world is turned irrevocably upside down after her husband runs amok and kills his supervisor and then himself. While in a state of shock and complete and utter vulnerability, the widow becomes the unwitting pawn of predatory and posh poser proponents of the proletariat who, despite claiming to be friends of the working-class, have never done a day of real work in their entire lives.

A rather naïve yet hearty woman of a limited education and even more meager monetary means, 60-something-year-old Emma Küsters faces virtual hell when her husband Hermann, a man who has worked a menial job at a tire factory for over twenty years, kills his boss and himself in an enraged moment of temporary insanity, thus leaving his wife a widow, who in turn becomes the proletarian prey of sleazy journalists and wealthy communists. As someone whose 'rebel without a care' James Dean-like son Ernst (played by Fassbinder's then-boyfriend Armin Meier) is the passive cuckold of his overweening and domineering wife Helene (played by Irm Hermann) and whose daughter Corinna (Ingrid Caven) cares more about peddling her ass on stage in a selfish yet self-exploitative attempt at establishing a fruitful dance career than her father's disastrous death, Emma naturally becomes the victim of wolves in sheep's clothing in the form of a bourgeois communist couple named Karl (Karlheinz Böhm) and Marianne Tillmann (Margit Carstensen) who, in a groveling and grotesque display of counterfeit empathy, tell her that her husband was a 'revolutionary' and victim of capitalism. While Emma initially finds the Tillmanns' propaganda to be quite dubious, not least of all because her late husband described communists as unruly troublemakers and her daughter describes West German commies as 'armchair communists' and Red East Germany as a virtual slave state where a small minority rules over the majority thus totally contradicting the idea of a classless society, she eventually concedes to the Tillmanns' wish to join the Communist Party. After all, while her daughter is now fornicating with an odiously opportunistic journalist named Niemeyer (Gottfried John) who wrote a scathing article about her husband, Karl Tillmann wrote a singularly sympathetic article of masterful and manipulative propaganda for the pink agitprop newspaper he is the proprietor of as a commie capitalist. In fact, Emma takes such an active role in the Communist Party that she even gives a speech at one of their meetings, where she later meets a nerdy revolutionary fellow named Horst Knab (Matthias Fuchs) – the sort of intemperate and anti-intellectual leftist terrorist that Fassbinder would portray in a more fiercely farcical manner in his subsequent film The Third Generation (1979) aka Die dritte Generation – who quite confidently proclaims, like a seasoned psychopath, he really and truly has her interests in mind. Fed up with the Tillmanns' tedious verbal swill, but especially their lack of action as patronizing posh pricks whose passive actions have done next to nil in clearing her husband's name, Emma joins up with cracked kook Knab and his gang of anti-everything anarchists, and is in for a big surprise when she and her new malcontent crew go to the office of the yellow press magazine Niemeyer works for and make some rather irrational demands.

MOTHER KÜSTERS GOES TO HEAVEN

To appease more fantasy-minded American viewers, Fassbinder created two radically different endings for Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven: one where Emma literally goes to heaven after a tragic showdown with the police and the second being a much happier one, to the point of absurdity, that recalls F.W. Murnau's German expressionist masterpiece The Last Laugh (1924) aka Der letzte Mann in its outstanding yet ostentatious optimism, but both conclusions thankfully express the complete and utter futility of radical left-wing action. Personally, I prefer the 'happy ending' as few filmic characters are more deserving of it and despite portraying a sort of 'fantasy reality' at the end, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven features a sweet and suitably sentimental scenario you would never see in Hollywood yet executed with an immaculate Sirkian flare that makes the Danish-German filmmaker's films like All That Heaven Allows (1955) and Imitation of Life (1959) seem ostensibly outmoded and thematically irrelevant due to Fassbinder's socio-politically astute insights as a lapsed member of the extreme left. What makes Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven especially interesting is that not for one moment in the film does Fassbinder make it seem like protagonist Emma or any other member of the working-class will "break its chains" because, as history has proven, revolutions never happen from 'below' as demonstrated by the Russian Revolution, which was, in part, funded by Wall Street and led by mostly Jewish intellectuals from bourgeois and aristocratic backgrounds who were failed members of their own privileged class backgrounds (Russian SFSR leader Vladimir Lenin was from a wealthy family and was a failed lawyer whose interest in 'revolutionary' activity was due to his deep-seated desire for revenge against the czar for having his brother executed in 1887). In a sense, the armchair revolutionaries featured in Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven are no different from the ethno-masochistic bourgeois American whites who describe themselves as "progressive" (but, at least as far as mother nature is concerned, are retrogressive) and dominate positions in mainstream academia, the media, and the government today – main difference between the two groups being that, while the kraut commies of the 1970s patronizingly 'fought' for the mostly white Teutonic proletariat (after all, there were not that many colored folks in the Fatherland back then like there are today), their contemporary Yankee quasi-commie compatriots confirm their sense of superiority over working-class whites by championing non-whites, illegal aliens, abberosexuals of every stripe, the disabled, and just about every other loser 'victim' group that confirms they are a degenerate class who has developed an inexorable slave-morality and a sickening sense of self-loathing, and epitomize the decadent elite who, in an act of social suicidal, inevitably wipes itself out as described in Italian philosopher Vilfredo Pareto's The Rise and Fall of Elites: An Application of Theoretical Sociology.

In an interview featured in the book Chaos as Usual: Conversations About Rainer Werner Fassbinder (1997), Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven star Brigitte

Mira described her experience with the film as follows, "I remember Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven: that practically caused a riot, people whistled and booed, not because the film was bad but because the subject was so controversial. I know nothing about politics and I don't feel entitled to make any judgments. Rainer always said, "you certainly know your job." That was high praise coming from him." Indeed, a film that attacks a very large portion of the audience it was created for, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven also manages to give an honest, albeit patently pessimistic, message to the working-class that the bourgeois never did them any favors in the past and they certainly are not showing them any genuine empathy and support today, sort of like how white leftists in America have only all the more crippled the majority of blacks by supporting their campaign for independence and stability via the welfare state and anachronistic programs like affirmative action. Of course, it goes without saying that the media in Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven is portrayed as no less a source of exploitation of the working-class and victims of crimes, but everyone already knows that, so it makes for a less important and interesting aspect of the film. Foretelling his own premature death, Fassbinder once admitted in an interview that his main motivation as a filmmaker was, "the concrete longing for this utopia. If this longing is driven out of me, I will not do anything else; that's why as a creative person I have the feeling of being murdered in Germany, if you would please not mistake that for paranoia... I believe this recent witch-hunt... was staged in order to destroy individual utopias... If it comes to the point where my fears are greater than my longing for something beautiful, then I'll quit. And not just quit working," and, indeed, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven, in its patent pessimism and uncompromising cynicism, seems like the work of a man disillusioned with politics and people, so it is no surprise that he would be dead seven years later as one of the few members of German New Cinema who had the gall to admit his generation had failed, but not without giving false hope to the hopeless in the process.

CHINESE ROULETTE
CHINESE ROULETTE

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1976)

German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder (The Marriage of Maria Braun, Querelle) died before he ever got the opportunity to direct a film in Hollywood, which at various points during his career he admitted he wanted to do, yet he did a direct couple films that seemed contrived and slick enough to have been assembled in Tinseltown, including Despair (1978) and Lili Marleen (1981), but indubitably the ill-fated filmmaker's tragicomic gothic psychological thriller Chinese Roulette (1976) aka Chinesisches Roulette radiates this manufactured studio essence the most, as if Alfred Hitchcock was forty years younger and had stopped in Germany to direct an international work with an all-star European cast. And, indeed, considering it was Fassbinder's first international co-production and most expensive film up until that point (at an estimated DEM 1,100,000), Chinese Roulette was indisputable proof that the director, unlike many German filmmakers of his generation, was more than willing to make cinematic works that were not just accessible to Germans and other Europeans, pretentious cinephiles, and idealistic left-wingers. Admittedly, when I first saw Chinese Roulette—a work with a seemingly marketed running time under 90 minutes, cutting edge music by German electronic group Kraftwerk, and a tightly scripted and conspicuously contrived storyline—I felt it was not much more than a neatly assembled celluloid novelty directed by an arthouse filmmaker who wanted to try his lot at creating a somewhat mainstream thriller that would give him a larger audience and my opinion has not changed much since subsequent viewings, even if the work has grown on me since then and I believe that despite the film's formulaic thriller structure, it is probably far too nihilistic and misanthropic for the everyday filmgoer to appreciate. Shot in a small castle owned by cinematographer Michael Ballhaus (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, Goodfellas) located in Stockach in Unterfranken, Germany and co-produced by Michael Fengler (who previously co-directed Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970) with Fassbinder) and Franco-Swiss auteur Barbet Schroeder (General Idi Amin Dada: A Self Portrait, Maitresse) and starring French arthouse divas, including Jean-Luc Godard's muse Anna Karina and Macha Méril (Godard's A Married Woman (1964) aka Une femme mariée, Buñuel's Belle de jour (1967)), Chinese Roulette is a sort of anti-bourgeois thriller clearly made with the bourgeois in mind as a sort of acidic aesthetic attack on the upper-middle class by taking them to task on their lives of lies and luxury, especially where it hurts most; the traditional institutions of family and marriage. Centering around a seemingly unloved yet spoiled crippled little girl who essentially unleashes an elaborate game of emotional terrorism against her philandering parents, Chinese Roulette shows what happens when a wife and husband and their extramarital lovers are unwittingly forced to stay together under one roof while their sole child plays 'mind games' with them that eventually erupts into attempted murder during a psychodramatic game of Chinese Roulette which more resembles Russian Roulette in the end.

Ariane (Margit Carstensen) and Gerhard Christ (Alexander Allerson) are a wealthy Munich couple that plan to spend their weekends on opposite ends of Europe, as the wife claims to be going to Milan, Italy while the husband plans to stay in Oslo, Norway. Of course, both Ariane and Gerhard are lying and having extramarital affairs, so things get a little strange when they both make the unwitting mistake of taking their secret lovers to their shared country home, Traunitz castle. The Christs have a 12-year-old crippled daughter named Angela (played Andrea Schober, who also starred in Fassbinder's The Merchant of the Four Seasons (1972) as a little girl who had the misfortune of witnessing her mother's infidelities) who, despite still playing with dolls, is a rather clever and even cold and callous girl who especially hates her mother Ariane, who seems to hate her deluded daughter even more. When Gerhard and his French hairdresser mistress Irene Cartis (Anna Karina) run into Ariane and her boyfriend Kolbe (Ulli Lommel), who works for her husband, at Traunitz castle by what seems to initially be happenstance, they handle the situation rather well and decide to carry on the weekend getaway as a fucked foursome. The castle is run by a bitchy housekeeper named Kast (Brigitte Mira) who absurdly describes people that cut her off while driving as "fascists" and her sexually-confused, dildo-hiding dilettante writer son Gabriel (Volker Spengler). Although a virtual slave whose life essentially consists of groveling like a dog for her servants, Kast has nothing but sheer and utter contempt for the Christ family and her opportunistic son Gabriel hopes to exploit Gerhard's work connection so he can get a writing deal. Later it is revealed that the Christ's daughter Angela designed the elaborate plan to get her parents and their lovers all under the same roof and literally caught with their pants down (Gabriel initially walks in on his wife Ariane and his employee/her lover Kolbe on the floor in embrace) while engaged in mutual infidelities. Of course, things do not really get bad until Angela makes an unsuspected arrival to Traunitz castle with her mute nanny (Macha Méril), whose name is also Traunitz.

After rhetorically asking Gabriel "Would you want to sleep with a cripple?", Angela also confesses to the servant boy, "Do you know how long Daddy has been cheating on Mother with that woman?...Eleven years. And do you know what happened 11 years ago? I fell ill 11 years ago. It's as simple as that. Everything is simple. Life itself is simple. I learned that from Traunitz," thus revealing that she believes she is responsible for the dissolution of her parent's marriage and the reason she believes her mother hates her, further adding, "In their hearts, they blame me for their messed-up lives." And, indeed, Angela seems to be right because while outside, her mother Ariane picks up a gun and locks her daughter's head in the crosshairs from an upstairs window, which naturally disturbs Gerhard, Kolbe, and Irene, the latter of whom pull the gun away from the little girl target. Naturally, Angela makes various attempts to play her parents and their lovers against one another, but terroristic tension does not reach its boiling point until the cruel cripple convinces everyone at the Traunitz castle to play a game of 'Chinese Roulette', a devilishly psychology-driven and self-incriminating game where players divide into two teams, where one group tries to guess what each individual member the other group is thinking of by asking questions like, "In the Third Reich, what would the person have been?," which is inevitably the last question asked during the game. Angela ultimately decides the members of each team, with her mother Ariane, Kasz, Kolbe, and Irene on the first team (which is clearly comprised of the people she hates most) and herself, her father Gehard, Traunitz, and Gabriel on the other team. Of course, Angela's team has picked her own mother as the member of the other team who her group is describing. In terms of what writers might have invented the person, Gerhard picks Goethe, Gabriel picks Nietzsche, Angela picks Oscar Wilde, and Traunitz picks the best of all with Satanic National Socialist horror writer Hanns Heinz Ewers. When asked "What would this person be in the Third Reich?," Angela's answer is a "Commandant of the concentration camp at Bergen-Belsen." When Ariane finally realizes her daughter has compared her to a Jew-gassing death camp commandant, she flips out, tells her she is "a horror. A dirty, revolting little beast," picks up a pistol, and shoots Traunitz (who she knows is her daughter's only friend and, as the film hints, possibly her lesbian lover). It is subsequently revealed Traunitz is ok and that she received nothing more than a superficial flesh wound. During the postgame wrap, Gabriel states to Angela, "You knew something like this would happen, didn't you?...But you wanted her to shoot you." Clearly irked, Angela responds to Gabriel by telling him that she has known for two years that he is a hack writer who has plagiarized everything he has ever written. In the last scene before the credits roll, a second shot is heard outside the house, but the shooter and victim are left up to the viewer's imagination in what is Fassbinder's psychological attack against the viewer. Undoubtedly, in Chinese Roulette, no one wins and everyone loses; it is just a matter of how much each individual loses, especially in regard to their civility and sanity.

While undoubtedly one of auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's least personal and least autobiographical works, Chinese Roulette reveals a good deal about the director's sometimes sinister, sadomasochistic, and Svengali trickster character. In fact, Fassbinder was known to play Chinese Roulette with his friend and asked/answered questions no less provocative and malicious than those of the characters in his film. It should be noted that Chinese Roulette was the last film Fassbinder collaborated with Ulli Lommel on before the actor completely changed trades and permanently moved to the United States where directed two films for Andy Warhol before starting his dwindling career as a maker of direct-to-DVD z-grade horror flicks. Lommel was apparently dating Anna Karina at the time and managed to get her to star in Chinese Roulette, thus depicting the actor-turned-director at his 'romantic playboy' prime, before he became the butt of jokes to impotent fanboys and gorehounds who have never actually seen his films. Despite its modern soundtrack (Kraftwerk's "Radioactivity" was a new single when the film was released), beautiful sets, mathematical camera angles, and contrived and precisely constructed storyline, Chinese Roulette is a brazenly brutal work of unrelenting doom and gloom and was ultimately hated by West German audiences upon its initial release, which is no surprise considering it is a blatantly bourgeois work that shows no mercy in malevolently assaulting the psyche of the bourgeois viewer.

As a man born into a cultivated but unloving Bavarian bourgeois family whose father essentially wanted nothing to do with him and whose mother had more interest in her young boyfriend than her son, Fassbinder certainly seems to side with the character of Angela in Chinese Roulette, whose hopeless undying desire for love and affection propels her into baiting her mother into trying to kill her so as to put her out of her own misery. Undoubtedly, virtually every character in Chinese Roulette is dead inside and learns nothing from their nearly-deadly game of Chinese Roulette, thus demonstrating Fassbinder's disillusionment with not only the nuclear family and bourgeois values, but post-cultural consumer-based Occidental society in general, which has only degenerated all the more since the film's release. Fitting somewhere in the writings of Harold Pinter and the films Mommie Dearest (1981) and Ingmar Bergman's Smiles of a Summer Night (1955), Chinese Roulette is a sort of more hot than hokey hagsploitation flick where the hag is a miserable MILF and connoisseur of Haute couture, thus making the film an all the more bittersweet tortuous celluloid treat to swallow. Seamlessly mixing high-camp with high-class, Fassbinder demonstrates his destructive disdain for all facets of bourgeois life with Chinese Roulette, a film about an unhinged unmother whose disdain for her sole child Angela Christ ultimately results in the second spawning of a 13-year-old antichrist who, being a seemingly suicidal cripple who is unlikely to reproduce, acts as the final genetic line of the family, just like the director himself (who was himself a sole child and a homosexual who never reproduced). Arguably the greatest director of nihilistically naked and hysterical cinematic melodramas who has ever lived, as well as a perniciously possessive poof whose actions led to the death of 2 of his 3 great loves (one of them, Armin Meier, who later committed suicide, appears in an uncredited role in Chinese Roulette as a gas station attendant), Fassbinder more than likely possessed the inner-child of a little attention-deprived girl and with Chinese Roulette he undoubtedly traps the viewer into his world of menacing mind games, but, I for one, must admit I enjoyed playing and will pray that I never have a pissed cripple for a daughter. While Chinese Roulette is easily one of Fassbinder's most fundamentally formulaic and concisely constructed works that certainly proved he could do more with less in terms of assembling a thriller than the average Hollywood for-hire hack director, the film also demonstrates that he was an absurdly audience-antagonistic man whose works would have easily offended the morals of the American filmgoer, thus it is probably for the better that he never made it to the corporate Hollywood studio system, even if he would have indubitably done damage worth noticing.

I ONLY WANT YOU TO LOVE ME

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1976)

Although originally only intended as a television production, and certainly one of his lesser-known films, Rainer Werner Fassbinder's thoroughly anti-capitalistic I Only Want You To Love Me (1976) aka Ich will doch nur, daß ihr mich liebt likely resonated with viewers, as it did with myself, not simply because of its vivid rendering of the adverse effects of unbridled capitalism and its far-reaching, sometimes deleterious effects in late 60s Germany, but more so because it so acutely portrays and diagnoses the modern archetype of pussy-whipped males (many of whom I've personally known) and the burgeoning black hole from which they can never escape (a hole that is inevitably dug deeper once an ill-thought out marriage, inevitable baby, and hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of credit card debt are thrown in the mix). Indeed, like so many of Fassbinder's films, it is very hard to not feel some excruciating, aching sense of empathy for the characters portrayed in I Only Want You To Love Me—specifically for Peter Trepper, the delusional, and emasculated main character—a man whose intense, overarching desire for love and recognition goes crushingly unfulfilled. Like Erwin/Elvira Weishaupt, the mentally nullified nullo tranny in Fassbinder's In A Year of 13 Moons (1978) and sweet, Mother Hubbard-like Emma Küsters in Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975), Peter Trepper's unwavering devotion and yearning for the acceptance of those he loves goes ever unreciprocated; but instead of opting for especially ultramodern panaceas to his problems, as is so typical of Fassbinder films—such as pursuing an irreversible sex change or joining the German Communist Party—Peter instead finds himself hopelessly seduced and ultimately destroyed by money and its often complicated relationship with human (specifically female) desires and emotions.

Told in a non-linear yet remarkably fluid, easy-to-follow manner, I Only Want You To Love Me follows the constant ups and downs in the tumultuous life of Peter Trepper, a shy, emotionally retarded and undoubtedly unpopular young man not yet in his mid-20s. Indeed, the title of this working-class melodrama, I Only Want You To Love Me, perfectly sums up Peter's on-going quandary and sole impetus behind his entire existence as the unloved son of middle-class Catholic Bavarian parents. As ever, Fassbinder's acute eye for chillingly portraying fascistic family relationships and dynamics is spot on in his portrayal of Peter's mother—a cold, distinctly unmotherly mother who psychologically castrates Peter from the time he can fit into his first pair of lederhosen, and his father, an inattentive, money-driven businessman who is so disinterested in his wife and son that he is impelled to both house and bed multiple whores in other cities, a move that results in his wife becoming pathologically jealous and vicious to all around her, least of all her young son (yet she cannot bring herself to leave Peter's father as all of her material comforts are easily provided for her).

I ONLY WANT YOU TO LOVE ME

Eventually, Peter meets his future-wife, Erika (a decidedly puggish and homely Bavarian babe, and certainly not deserving of a man of Peter's caliber, not least of all in the looks department) whom he eventually weds, erroneously believing, like so many hopeless and emasculated beta males, that marrying the first woman to give him the time of day is the magical cure-all he's been searching for all his life.

Following a lukewarm wedding reception completely void of any congratulatory tone, Peter's thoroughly antagonistic progenitors give up the home that he lovingly built for them from scratch at the beginning of the film (an especially tough blow to take considering that Peter and his young wife and future baby factory, Erika, could really use a place to hunker down as they embark on their ill-fated marriage) and are all too happy to see him set off to Munich to begin a new and promisingly lucrative, yet punishing construction job through which he hopes to support himself and his seemingly happy wife. Riding high on his success at having attained a new wife (albeit a rather stout, homely and piggish one—but the first and only woman he'll ever penetrate), a sweet new apartment in one of Germany's poshest big cities (replete with Turks and Moroccans on all sides, as even the landlord quietly admonishes), and a career in construction for which he seems to be richly rewarded (not realizing that the pipe-smoking Bavarian overlord of the construction company intends to cut his hours), Peter brazenly spends every back-breaking penny he's earned and then some, going as far as to max out credit cards and take out new loans in order to buy his never-satisfied and soon-to-be gestating wife the latest in minimalistic, IKEA-esque furniture, a factory grade sewing machine, designer clothes, and an antique gold bracelet (the latter of which being the equivalent of what is today known as a "push ring"—an extravagant and costly piece of jewelry lovingly bequeathed upon a spoiled alpha female as reward for successfully birthing a child). Of course, it is very easy to see where all of this is going—for a man such as Peter, whose wife and parents are his pathetic, sole sources of both emotional support and intense mental anguish and through which money becomes his only means of attempting to acquire the love and approval of either—his already frayed edges and fragile ego cannot help but bring him to one day snap and commit a characteristically pathetic murder.

Admittedly, I Only Want You To Love Me is much less interesting than Fassbinder's other works, (which are typically and entertainingly replete with sordid tales of homosexual liaisons, trashy tranny escapades, and debauched interracial love triangle romps), but this film is no less important than Fassbinder's other films in the respect that it again very keenly illustrates the fascistic psychological interplay that exists in male and female gender role relationships (whether documenting the denigrating mother and emasculated son, pussy-whipped husband and spoiled wife, or dominant bear daddy and twinkly boy son, etc.), in this case bringing money into play as the central, driving force of upheaval in an already meaningless or befouled relationship. Furthermore, some academics would go so far as to claim that Peter Trepper's behavior was born not out of a lack of self-esteem or confidence which drove him to spend non-existent money, but instead from a Freudian-derived sense of narcissism; such a theory seems to me like a bunch of hyper-pseudo-intellectual, meaningless claptrap because—let's face it: some men are just born with an innately submissive, overtly female essence, and Peter Trepper won't be the first or last who couldn't resist purchasing his plump, spoiled wife a brand new car for completing their first wedding anniversary (something of a feat indeed, considering the times in which we live) or bestowing her with a "push ring" for popping out a child who will most assuredly be christened Jayden, Kayden, Brayden, Aidan, or some other modern, sickeningly common variant thereof. Indeed, I Only Want You To Love Me should be required viewing for any young, emasculated male who is considering taking his girlfriend for a walk down the aisle—especially with the ever-present, unabashedly Semitic-inspired mental effluvia surrounding television programming such as Bridezilla or The Bachelor irreparably altering the already fragile, malleable minds of young girls who, in turn grow up to idolize celebrity women who intentionally leak their dispassionate sex tapes so that legions of otherwise impotent beta-males can masturbate while their celebrity-obsessed soon-to-be wives dream of subserviently sucking Kanye West's supremely sour spade blade while sporting the latest pair of Uggs.

SATAN'S BREW
SATAN'S BREW

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1976)

Although I still haven't managed to view all of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's extensive filmography, I am quite certain that his work Satan's Brew (1976) aka Satansbraten – a work assembled during a period of immense professional distress for the Bavarian-born auteur – is his greatest kraut comedy and one of his most distinguished and delightfully deranged works in general. Opening with a quote by the Greco-French schizophrenic playwright Antonin Artaud and inspired by his surrealist "theatre of cruelty" theories, Satan's Brew lacks the signature manic melodrama of Fassbinder's previous films and instead replaces it with slapstick sadism, grotesque gags, potent political nihilism, and a sardonic smidge of homosexual glorification. Centering around a philandering poet named Kranz (Kurt Raab) who spends more time finding new holes for his penis than writing verses with his pen, Satan's Brew is ultimately a work about the self-flagellating extremes a writer will go through while experiencing a chronic and mentally crippling spat of writer's block. A lapsed leftist who earned minor praise during the student movement of 1968 as a poet of the failed revolution, Kranz quite hypocritically and shamelessly sinks to the level of a full-fledged con-artist of the real-life 'role-playing' sort by "becoming" German Conservative Revolutionary poet Stefan George after unwittingly plagiarizing his poem The Albatross. On top of flagrantly and failingly attempting to steal George's physical, aesthetic, and mystical 'messianic' essence, Kranz also goes to the seemingly schizophrenic and marvelously masochistic extremes of adopting George's sodomite sexual persuasion, henceforth resulting in the most absurd of consequences. Undoubtedly one of the most insanely idiosyncratic and fiercely frolicsome cinematic works of Fassbinder's exceptionally prolific filmmaking career, Satan's Brew is a potent and oftentimes aesthetically putrid piece of laugh-out-loud lunacy that could and should be easily regarded as not only one of the greatest German comedies ever made, but also one of the most fantastic works of cinematic facetiousness ever made. Period.

To get a more thoughtful understanding and pleasurable experience out of Satan's Brew, one must indubitably at least have a rudimentary understanding of Stefan George and his influence over prominent figures of early twentieth century Germany. Before becoming very likely Germany's most eminent and important sage poet and occult teacher – an avant-garde nationalist messiah of sorts who dreamed of an esoteric Teutonic empire ruled by artistic elites – Stefan George was a decadent scribbler who cavorted with Fin de siècle French Symbolists like Arthur Rimbaud's pederast poet lover Paul Verlaine and proto-surrealist Stéphane Mallarmé. Despite his blatant high-camp persuasion – both in terms of his poetry and iconic appearance – George advocated a life of conservative celibacy for his younger protégés; members of his George Kreis literary circle. Of course, George and his arcane odist nationalistic work did not merely appeal to up-and-coming homophiles, but also many prominent Germany intellectuals and artists of his heyday, including National Socialist architect Albert Speer, whose older brother was part of the literary circle and who once described the secretive sage upon seeing him in public as having, “radiated dignity and pride and a kind of priestliness... there was something magnetic about him.” Indeed, renegade aristocrat Claus von Stauffenberg and his elder brother Berthold Alfred Maria Graf Schenk von Stauffenberg (who George dedicated his poem Geheimes Deutschland aka “Secret Germany” to) – both of whom were involved in the 20 July plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler – were also members of George’s circle and even quoted passages from the poet’s work Der Widerchrist aka The Anti-Christ to fellow members of the conspiracy. Of course, despite being barely recognized outside of his homeland of Germany, especially after his death and the conclusion of the Second World War when nationalistic sentiment in Germany became somewhat taboo, few poets in history have exercised such a formative and ultimately imperative role in shaping the mind’s of a nation’s young elite, thus to compare him to a deadbeat degenerate such as Kranz of Satan’s Brew is nothing short of an antagonistic absurdity.

Needless to say, anti-hero Kranz of Satan’s Brew has next to nil of the metaphysical aristocratic influence of Stefan George as he is a lecherous literary nonentity whose only followers are his lonely blue-blood mistress and another concubine, Andree (Margit Carstensen), from the country who suffers from an acute case of neuroticism; a wobbly weakling of a woman who substitutes the soulless lyrics of her ambivalent lover for a life of her own. On top of his faithful fans/lovers, Kranz spends his downtime bickering with his stocky wife Luise (Helen Vita) – who seems more like a controlling mother than a perennial ladylove – and playing with his seemingly autistic half-retarded brother Ernst (Volker Spengler); a distinctly perverted man-child with a pathological fetish for flies. One day, after realizing that he has subconsciously plagiarized a poem by Stefan George, subsequently deciding that, “I have the strength..to be Stefan George,” a figure he proclaims is only second to Friedrich Nietzsche in terms of the kraut written word. Soon thereafter, Kranz hysterically attempts to recapture every biographical element and character attribute of the famed Conservative Revolutionary poet, including striking George’s particularly picturesque dramatic poses (with make-up to boot) and starting a literary circle of his own, but instead of gaining fervent full-fledged fans of his own, the exceedingly pathetic poet hires male prostitutes, which he specifically states must be of mostly Latin origin with one or two “Germanic” Germans. George even goes as far as swapping his rampant heterosexuality for a visit to the tearoom, confusing a male prostitute’s cryptic-gigolo-lingo for poetry, thus making it seem that

Fassbinder is insinuating that homosexual are born-poets, forced into linguistic esotericism out of necessity out of fear of negative repercussions from good bourgeois society. A conspiring thief and constant borrower, Kranz is only able to shed his pseudo-identity as Stefan George and break his writer's block when he is maliciously manhandled by one of his creditors (a prostitute and her band of beatboys), thereupon becoming conscious of his lust for pain and inevitably resulting in the inspiration he needs for penning his best-selling novel Fascism Victorious, or No Funeral for the Führer's Dog; undoubtedly a postmodern existentialist romp of sorts.

In the end, Kranz loses all of his loser followers and most of his mistresses, including his undersexed wife, but he also earns praise from mainstream society by a recently converted fan's remark that his new written works are thankfully, "not that leftist junk you (Kranz) use to fabricate." With Satan's Brew, Fassbinder cleverly criticized and lampooned the radical leftist idealism of his youth (as he would also do with his subsequent works Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven and The Third Generation to the dismay of many of his followers), as well as the personal struggle he suffered as an auteur in an unprolific state of artistic limbo. That being said, Satan's Brew is nothing short of a dynamic declaration of his creative return and personal reinvention as a filmmaker, even if it is of the slightly self-denigrating yet strikingly scrupulous sort. The impeccable antidote to lifeless pseudo-independent Hollywood comedies like I ♥ Huckabees (2004), Me and You and Everyone We Know (2005), The Darjeeling Limited (2007) and other related self-important, would-be-philosophical existentialist excrement, Satan's Brew is a gregarious gag show for those film fanatics who have a hard time keeping from laughing jovially when confronted with words like "humanism", "xenophobia", "diversity", and other linguistic burps urped by vogue social regressive types. Stefan George and Rainer Werner Fassbinder may not have had a lot in common aside from their predilection towards tender dicks and a strong sense of 'Germanness' as expressed in their work, but they certainly could agree that youthful left-wing idealism is a dead-end street of aesthetic duplicity and pretentious posturing.

THE STATIONMASTER'S WIFE

While a number of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's films deal with miserable male cuckolds, typically of the ball-less bourgeois variety that make Scarlet O'Hara seem like a sensitive sweetheart, none of the director's other films focus on this male-castrating subject so fiercely and uncompromisingly as The Stationmaster's Wife (1977) aka Bolwieser, thereupon making it one of the tragic German auteur filmmaker's most decidedly dispiriting and melodramatically disgusting works as the sort of celluloid equivalent of having a vasectomy. Based on the novel Bolwieser: the novel of a husband (1931) written by largely forgotten Bavarian socialist-anarchist writer Oskar Maria Graf, whose works were banned in 1934 (apparently, he was offended when his books were not burned during the Nazi book burnings, so he wrote an anti-Nazi appeal in a commie newspaper to change that) and who left Europa for New York City in 1938, The Stationmaster's Wife is a sort of anti-völkisch noir-ish in the spirit of Gustave Flaubert's Madame Bovary (1856), except all the more brutal and told from the perspective of the husband as opposed to the wife, set during the pre-Hitler 1920s and centering around a Bavarian petit-bourgeois railway stationmaster who has the supreme honor of marrying his town's most conniving and conspiring whore, who destroys the protagonist's life one extramarital affair at a time. Starring actor/production designer Kurt Raab (Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?, The American Soldier) in his last Fassbinder film before the actor left the filmmaker's life on bad terms, The Stationmaster's Wife is notable in that it was largely fueled by cocaine, or as the star admitted himself, "So I took the powder every day, and Fassbinder was always ready to divide this treasure with me. He even let me take charge of the pillbox, and I used its contents as freely as sugar. During the shooting, my concentration was total. I hear nothing and nothing could disturb me. Everything was crystal clear inside me and my thoughts were unimaginably profound, knowing as I did that I was creating a marvelous Bolwieser." In a sense, Kurt Raab, who died prematurely of AIDS related causes at the age of 46 in 1988 as disturbingly depicted in the posthumously released documentary he co-directed Yearning for Sodom (1989) aka Sehnsucht nach Sodom, was Fassbinder's equivalent to John Water superstar Divine in that he was an extremely effete man-muse who was willing to do virtually anything and everything for his auteur master. Committing filicide in Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1971), going from being a disgraced far-left poet to pretending to be gay German Conservative Revolutionary poet sage Stefan George in Satan's Brew (1976) aka Satansbraten, and portraying a pederast serial killer who moonlights as a drag queen in the Fassbinder produced horror masterpiece The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe directed by Ulli Lommel, Raab was certainly willing to take one for the Anti-Theater team and in no other performance was the actor depicted so degradingly and patently pathetically as in The Stationmaster's Wife, a virtual metaphysical horror film for men that I had trouble viewing a second time due to its perturbingly pathetic portrayal of a perturbingly pathetic cuckolded man that would have probably made for the perfect masturbation aid for a weak degenerate like Sigmund Freud.

After marrying Hanni (Elisabeth Trissenaar)—the daughter of a local brewery owner and the most brazenly bitchy, conspiring slut of her Bavarian town—absurdly weak stationmaster Xaver Ferdinand Maria Bolwieser (Kurt Raab) becomes the king of the cuckolds in Southern Deutschland, ultimately becoming the sad laughing stock of his friends, family, and co-workers, who quite openly mock him to his face, even laughing collectively at his pussy passivity in the face of abject disgrace. On top of sleeping with other men right under his neurotic nose, whore Hanni has the gall to call her husband Xaver “chubby” as a nickname. Hanni is carrying on a rather conspicuous affair with a butcher named Franz Merkl (Bernhard Helfrich), who she gives her hubby Xaver’s money to in perverse payment for pounding her puss, but also to pretend she has some sort of business arrangement with her less than secret boyfriend. Like the typical self-centered psychopath, Hanni pretends to be the victim when her husband attempts to confront her about calling him “chubby” and her dubious relationship with butcher Merkl, crying, “how vile...how disgusting” after hubby Chubby questions her femme fatale-like ways. Naturally, considering everyone knows his wife is a cheating cunt and that he is a cowardly cuck who does nothing about it, Xaver’s semi-respected social status as a financially secure and important uniform-adorned stationmaster is compromised. Meanwhile, Merkl begins to blow off his malicious mistress Hanni due to local controversy surrounding their bad behavior, so she, being a pathologically lecherous lady of the hyper histrionic sort, goes looking for another man to swoon over her and inevitably finds herself in bed with a suave yet sleazy barber named Schafftaler (played lovingly and quasi-heterosexually by Udo Kier). After Schafftaler gives Hanni a Greta Garbo-inspired hairdo, the brazen bourgeois hussy finds herself immediately able to crawl back in the bed of Merkl, thus rebuffing the barber, who she just screwed minutes earlier, in the process. A self-righteous pervert who is irked by the fact that everyone in his town is gossiping about the fact that he is screwing the stationmaster’s wife, Merkl—with the equally self-deluded support of his whore Hanni—decides to sue members of the Bavarian town for slander, thus further driving Xaver into a position of disrespect, which he, being a cowardly cuckold with nil backbone nor balls, supports. In an idiotic attempt to spare his wanton wife Hanni’s dubious dignity and social prestige, Xaver lies in court and is ultimately later charged with perjury, for which he is rewarded with a four year prison sentence and the loss of his prestigious position as a stationmaster.

Before landing in prison, Xaver finally exerts his seemingly nonexistent testicular fortitude by quasi-raping her, stating whilst having bittersweet sex with his wench of a wife, “You’re...my...property. I can do what I like with you,” but his minute or two of sad sexual prowess and imaginary glory proves to be in vain as his beloved is back in bed with Schafftaler in no time. After vengeful and jealous two-faced Merkl reveals to Xaver that his wife is cheating on him with “slimy Schafftaler” in a pathetic attempt to get his mistress back, the buffoonish stationmaster, while drunk as an Irish-American NASCAR fan, decides to confront his wife, but he naturally caves in the next morning when his majorly manipulative “better half” bullshits her way out of the situation. After Hanni symbolically leaves with Schafftaler on a train to Munich so she can screw the male hairstylist in relative secrecy, lovelorn Merkl decides to pay his ex-mistress back by telling on her husband Xaver for committing perjury during the slander trial. After receiving a warrant for his arrest on the suspicion of perjury, Xaver is sent to prison, but when he is granted temporary freedom until his actual trial date, he begs like a bitch to stay in prison, confessing to the prison guard, “But I’m...I’m guilty” and complaining, “I can’t show myself in public anymore. Where on earth shall I go?” like a true cuck champ. When Xaver gets out of prison, he learns that a most moronic underling employee of his, Mangst (Volker Spengler)—a Nazi brownshirt who tells inane jokes and used to laugh in his boss’ face—has taken over his job as the stationmaster. Considering Xaver was a civil servant and thus belonging to a profession which is a pillar of Teutonic society, he is not only found guilty, but given an inordinately long sentence for his petty crime. On top of the fact she has ruined his career and destroyed his life, Hanni asks Xaver for a divorce while he is carrying out his prison sentence, which he accepts gracefully as the divorce does not require him to appear in court in his pathetic prison garb.

Kurt Raab’s sort of symbolic cinematic swansong as a Fassbinder superstar who was no less a cuckold to the filmmaker as his character Xaver is to his wife Hanni, The Stationmaster’s Wife is a devilishly disheartening film on all accounts, as if the director created it in revenge against heterosexual males, demonstrating the lunatic lows some meek men will go to appease their psychopathic wives. The fact that the film was made while both the lead actor and director were incessantly snorting coke makes it seem all the more strange as it is certainly not a cinematic work that will give anyone a rush, but send the viewer into a depression like no other cinematic period piece before nor after it. Regarding his cocaine-addled performance, Raab would go on to state regarding how he felt while shooting versus how his performance looked on screen, “That nothing of these feelings was transferred to the screen, that my acting became stiff and my movements poor was something I would only learn later. Fassbinder just left me in my dreamworld, where I had become great,” though critics like Wilhelm Roth would contradict his sentiments, even if The Stationmaster’s Wife is not exactly regarded as one of the director’s masterpieces. Originally released as a 2-part and 201 minute mini-series for West German television, The Stationmaster’s

Wife was later cut into a 112 minute movie, which was not released until 1983 due to copyright problems. Ultimately, the abridged version of The Stationmaster's Wife, which is the version I watched and the only version available to American viewers, received a certain amount of posthumous fame when it was fittingly released on the first anniversary of Fassbinder's death. Personally, I have no interest in watching the original 201 cut of The Stationmaster's Wife as the cut version was a grueling experience enough, but with the rise of cuckold porn and emasculated husbands brainwashed by feminism and wives brainwashed by Oprah in both Europe and America, the film, despite taking place in a forgotten time and being about unfashionable people, has only become all the more relevant since its release. A sort of aesthetically sinister take on F.W. Murnau's German expressionist masterpiece The Last Laugh (1924) aka Der letzte Mann in its depiction of a man who derives his self-esteem and social prestige from his uniform and who degenerates to nothing after losing it, The Stationmaster's Wife is a rare work of German New Cinema that reminds viewers how social status and prestige in pre-WWII Germany was not measured by personal wealth, but by uniform and job title, hence why the German Conservative Revolutionary philosopher Oswald Spengler argued for 'Prussian Socialism' over National Socialism in his sole political tract Preußentum und Sozialismus (1919) aka Prussianism and Socialism, arguing, "English society is founded on the distinction between rich and poor, Prussian society on the distinction between command and obedience...Democracy in England means the possibility for everyone to become rich, in Prussia the possibility of attaining to every existing rank." Of course, Fassbinder was a Bavarian and his animosity for the sort of Prussianism Spengler spoke of is an innate ingredient of The Stationmaster's Wife; arguably the only film ever made that has the potential to drive cuckolds to suicide!

WOMEN IN NEW YORK

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1977)

One of German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's greatest accomplishments as a filmmaker is that he managed outdo his hero Douglas Sirk and revitalize the old school Hollywood woman's film and make it palatable to people aside from elderly bourgeois female anglophiles and fickle old queens. Indeed, I have a rather low tolerance for busybody bitches babbling incessantly about nothing and scheming in a superlatively shadowy slave-morality-driven fashion that no heterosexual man could fathom any sane human being was capable of. Of course, Fassbinder was not a heterosexual man, even if he attempted to portray butch boys in films like The American Soldier (1970) and Whity (1971), so he was able to understand women in a rather unique fashion and he was able to transfer his personal insights on the oftentimes less fair fairer sex via his plays and films. In fact, with his early masterpiece The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), Fassbinder managed to transsexualize his own failed romantic relationship with married black Bavarian Günther Kaufmann, ultimately having Margit Carstensen portraying himself and Hanna Schygulla portraying his negro lover! Undoubtedly, Fassbinder's greatest accomplishment in terms of a 'women's picture' is his made-for-television work Women in New York (1977) aka Frauen in New York. A teutonized (anti)adaptation of American playwright turned Ambassador Clare Boothe Luce's hit play The Women (1936)—a work that was previously adapted by Yiddish queen George Cukor in 1939, made into a musical entitled The Opposite Sex (1956), and most recently updated in tasteless trash form in 2008 by Diane English—Women in New York is among one of Fassbinder's most aesthetically bizarre works (Peer Raben's discordant yet ethereal musical score only accentuates this) and also, aside from his quirky early mess of a movie Rio das Mortes (1971), sardonic self-denigrating masterpiece Satan's Brew (1976) aka Satansbraten, terrorist-themed satire Die dritte Generation (1979) aka The Third Generation, and Wirtschaftswunder-themed late-period work Lola (1981), the tragic filmmaker's only cinematic excursion in comedy. Like the original Broadway production of Luce's play from the 1930s, Fassbinder's Women in New York has the distinction of featuring an all-broad cast (40 of them!) with not a single male actor (though unseen male characters are constantly belittled by the women). Like Das Kaffeehaus (1970), Bremen Freedom (1972), and Nora Helmer (1974), Women in New York is essentially filmed theater, but unlike the previous three films, the play was shot on actual film (as opposed to archaic video) and features rather elaborate sets pieces taken from Fassbinder's actual original theater production, not to mention the fact that all the actresses from the original stage performance reprised their roles for the film. In its theatric tableaux, Women in New York is like Alfred Hitchcock's Rope (1948) meets Fassbinder's own World on a Wire aka (1973) Welt am Draht, albeit with a quasi-campy gynocentric stench and a fashion sense that anticipates the sci-fi cult classic Liquid Sky (1982). One of Fassbinder's most difficult works in the sense that one has to endure fast-talking Frauen chattering amongst one another in a shockingly sophisticated fashion, Women in New York is, as Fassbinder's Danish filmmaker friend Christian Braad Thomsen once wrote, a film that "occupies an important place in Fassbinder's work," even if only a handful of people have seen the film and it is nearly impossible to view today, at least by any official means.

WOMEN IN NEW YORK

Mary Haines (Christa Berndl) is an upper-middleclass housewife in her mid-30s living in fancy 1930s NYC who is married to a hotshot stockbroker in Wall Street named Stephen Haines. Unbeknownst to Mary, who is a rather innocent and naïve little lady (quite unlike her mostly caddy and callous friends!), her husband is carrying on an affair with a low-class hussy salesgirl in her mid-20s named Crystal Allen (Barbara Sukowa). Mary is the central figures of a cosmopolitan clique of friends who spend most of their time talking shit about other people, especially each other, so it comes as no surprise that she learns of her hubby's infidelities via her always scheming bitch friend Sylvia Fowler (Fassbinder diva Margit Carstensen in a radically repellent role). Of course, the seriousness of the situation does not hit home from Mary until she goes to get her nails done at beauty salon and the manicurist, who does not know the person she is servicing is thee Mrs. Stephen Haines, unwittingly gossips about how her friend Crystal is having an affair with a certain Mr. Stephen Haines. When Mary finally gets the gall to approach Crystal about her affair with her beloved husband, the homewrecker venomously states, "You're just an old habit to him. If it wasn't for the kids he'd left you long ago." While Mary's widowed mother tells her daughter to stay faithful to her spouse and forgive him for his extramarital indiscretions, Mr. Haines has already made up his mind and divorces his rather desperate wife so he can marry cute young cunt Crystal. Of course, Mary gets advice from various different women from eclectic backgrounds and learns that many older women, especially from working-class backgrounds, are willing to tolerate cheating and beatings from their husbands as they fear they will not be able to find a new man due to their advanced age and antiquated looks, or as one character states, "Pride is a luxury a woman in love can't afford." Meanwhile, Mary's preteen tomboy daughter is turning into a staunch bull dyke and fears growing breasts, confessing to her mother, "I don't want to be a girl anyway! I hate girls. They talk too much and they're stupid. And boys are allowed everything and girls nothing." Of course, Mary's daughter is not the only gal who resents being a woman as the divorced dame's writer friend Nancy (Angela Schmid) has decided to dedicate her life to being a stoic feminist of the frigid and seemingly lesbian sort. In the end, Mary learns to be a ruthless bitch just like her adversary and when she discovers that her ex-husband's new wife is carrying on an affair with a fellow named Mr. Buck Winston, she decides to take her swift revenge. Although not actually depicted at the conclusion of Women In New York, the viewer infers that Mary steals back her husband by telling him that his new wife has a new boy toy in what is a ultimately a pseudo-happy ending. After all, protagonist Mary has morally degenerated to the level of her rather repugnant shebitch enemies, but apparently that is the price a woman must pay with old age.

As Christian Braad Thomsen wrote in his book Fassbinder: The Life And Work Of A Provocative Genius (2004) regarding the characters of Women in New York, “The women are less puppets in a male game than puppets in their own game to catch men.” Indeed, in its uniquely unflattering depiction of women at their most pathologically vicious, conspiring, callous, and craven, Women in New York reminded me of a thematic cross between the ideas and theories expressed in anti-Semitic Semite Otto Weininger’s masterpiece of misogyny Sex and Character (1903) aka Geschlecht und Charakter meets German-American Baltimore sage H.L. Mencken’s ironically titled work In Defense of Women (1918), yet at the same time, it is a film that is meant to be devoured by women; just not the sort who think flashing their tiny tits in public is a reasonable form of political protest. As a Fassbinder flick, Thomsen perfectly summed up its importance when he wrote: “Women in New York is the only theatre production Fassbinder preserved for posterity. He had already recorded The Coffee Shop and Bremen Coffee on video and Katzelmacher and Pioneers in Ingolstadt on film, but not with exactly the same casts, the same stage sets and the same text as in the original productions for the stage. The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant was not staged by him, but by Peer Raben, nor was the film a recording of the theatre production. Garbage, the City and Death also exists as a film with the title Shadow of Angels, but under the direction of Daniel Schmid.” Indeed, in no other film does Fassbinder’s telling confession, “In the theatre I staged things as if it were a film, and then shot films as if it were theatre” become more clear than in his film version of Women in New York. Admittedly, while so-called ‘women’s films’ are not exactly my cup of tea (I would rather watch the latest Michael Bay or Eli Roth flick than endure most of these films), Women in New York ultimately proved to me that, in the right hysterical homo hands, the pseudo-genre could be somewhat palatable and aesthetically prestigious. A rather wicked work depicting the 1930s NYC female upper-class as a bunch of bickering high-class whores that derive the utmost satisfaction from seeing their friends’ lives fall into shambles, Women in New York is ultimately a film that not only incriminates the fairer sex, but auteur Fassbinder as well. Indeed, it is no coincidence that 2 of 3 of Fassbinder’s great loves committed suicide and that his female friend Eva Mattes (who portrays an unsavory pregnant housewife named Edith in Women in New York who has four children despite hating children) would depict him in the diacritic biopic A Man Like Eva (1984) aka Ein Mann wie EVA directed by Radu Gabrea. For any man looking for a reason not to get married, just watch Fassbinder's Women in New York and bask in the wild wonder of booboisie bitchiness.

DESPAIR

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1978)

Out of all of the films in German New Wave alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's cinematic oeuvre, I unhesitatingly regard Despair (1978) – a cinematic adaptation of the 1936 Vladimir Nabokov of the same name – as the director's greatest failure as a filmmaker as an ambitious and audacious work that had all the ingredients for what could have been a completely chilling yet cruelly campy S&M arthouse masterpiece, but ultimately fell short of being a piece of celluloid perfection due to language barriers and business-inspired artistic compromises, among other things. Fassbinder's most expensive film at that time, even costing more than all of his precious cinematic works combined, and funded using tax-shelter money, Despair was a rare German film of its time in that it had guaranteed international distribution from a major US studio, thus it was rather disastrously decided that the work would be shot simultaneously in English (making it the first of two films Fassbinder shot in English, preceding Lili Marleen (1981)) and German, thereupon resulting in a curiously culturally-mongrelized (in the culture-distorting Hollywood sense) and somewhat contrived high-camp work missing a soul and a bit of the filmmaker's signature auteur flare. Featuring gay English actor Dirk Bogarde (The Servant, The Night Porter aka Il Portiere di notte) – one of the stars of Fassbinder's self-professed #1 favorite film The Damned (1969) aka La caduta degli dei directed by Luchino Visconti – Despair received a less than warm reception when it played at the 1978 Cannes Film Festival and the star was so disenchanted with the film that he inevitably disowned own it, complaining that the director erratically re-cut the film during a manic moment of melancholy. Not by any means fluent in the language that Despair was widely released with it, Fassbinder would go on to describe his lost-in-translation direction of the film as follows in an interview with Gian Luigi Rondi, "It's true, there was a whole bunch of words I didn't catch... but in film it's much more important how language sounds than what its concrete content is. From my point of view, even in German the most important thing is the melody of a sentence, its tonal coloration, its modeling. And then Dirk Bogarde was in the cast. I didn't need to understand his English, any more than he needed to understand my German. During the shooting an almost extrasensory form of communication developed between us; he understood what I wanted, and I understood perfectly what he was doing." Of course, judging by Sir Bogarde's rather severe reaction to the whole ordeal, one must question Fassbinder's remark regarding the supposed 'chemistry' (Fassbinder was known for being afraid of and artistically handicapped by 'big stars') he had developed with the actor, but the filmmaker never reneged his opinion that Despair was one of the best films he had ever made, even listing it as number three in a top ten list of his personal favorites of all the films he had ever directed. Depicting the slow but steady mental disintegration of a white Russian émigré and tycoon mogul named Hermann Hermann (Dirk Bogarde) with a rather radically discordant racial persuasion (his father was German-Russian and his mother was a member of the Jewish Rothschild banking dynasty) who comes up with the dubious and duplicitous scheme of faking his own death after taking out a hefty insurance policy and killing a proletarian man he believes to be his doppelgänger (but looks only slightly like him), so he can start a new life in Switzerland, Despair is probably the closest a film has ever come to cinematically depicting the haunted German psyche during the Weimar Republic era and on the eve of the National Socialist takeover as analyzed in German-Jewish Frankfurt school film theorist Siegfried Kracauer revolutionary text From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film (1947). Needless to say, also like Kracauer's propagandistic pop psychology book, Despair sounds more delectable in its seemingly mind-fucking magnificence than it actually is.

A reasonably successful capitalist who has taken over his Russian family's chocolate company and relocated abroad in Germany due to the capitalist-killing chaos of the Russian Revolution, Hermann Hermann (Bogarde) is really nothing more than a glorified cuckold at home who can only 'rise to the occasion' with his cock (or so only one can only assume since he is always fully clothed) when engaged in softcore sadomasochism like having his lecherous wife lovingly licking his boots. A patent pushover who mistakes petty pomposity with personal prestige, Hermann passively ignores the fact that his busty and blonde yet slightly bloated wife Lydia (Andréa Ferréol of Marco Ferreri's La Grande Bouffe (1973) and The Tin Drum (1979) aka Die Blechtrommel) is carrying on a lurid love affair with her own cousin Ardalion (Fassbinder Superstar Volker Spengler of Satan's Brew (1976) and In a Year of 13 Moons (1978)), a horribly horny hack of a painter who looks like a gay and grotesque version of Vincent van Gogh, had the Dutch painter packed on 50 pounds and had a botched lobotomy. Despite the fact he has no problem telling Ardalion to his face that he is, "nothing but a Ukrainian peasant pretending to be a bohemian," Hermann does not have the gall nor the balls to be brawl with the exceedingly effete fellow who is quite blatantly bugging his wife, thus one can only assume that he is quite apathetic when it comes to penetrating his salacious spouse as she is clearly a woman he does not love and vice versa, but a trophy wife with big tits and nil brain. A nauseatingly narcissistic fellow who most naively tells people that regarding his relationship with his wife, "She needs a patronizing type like I need a patronizable woman. Were a perfect couple. I like literature...She likes trash. I'm clear thinking...she's scatter brained. We are a perfect match...Like a lock and key," hysterical Hermann eventually comes to terms that he is stuck in a demeaning and deferential dead-end marriage and is living a life of lingering lethargy and lunacy, thus he must breakthrough and develop a new identity. A forsaken fellow who is also facing bankruptcy and the loss of his glorious chocolate factory, Hermann begins to confuse the words "merger" and "murderer" as his life becomes all the more miserable. Needless to say, when a merger with another chocolate company falls through, murders begins to sound like a much better option. A typically Nabokov-esque "unreliable narrator" (or in the case of the film, a demented schizophrenic), Hermann was described by Fassbinder, who put a new spin of the character with the help of screenwriter Tom Stoppard, as follows in an interview, "The crisis experienced by the hero...who suddenly has the feeling that the rug's being pulled out from under him. You could list a whole series of reasons for that: the political, economic, and social problems of those years; but the real or, at least, the most important reason is his sudden insight that everything's pointless and that nothing has meaning anymore. Why? Because old age is approaching, the age when a person just doesn't expect anything new, when a person no longer gets satisfaction from looking for things, desiring things, coming up with ideas." A desperate man living in desperate times who already lived through the virtual hell of the Russian Revolution, Hermann comes up with a complex, albeit ultimately imbecilic, conspiracy that involves calculated coldblooded murder that will offer him one last chance to transcend the banality of his current life as a posh pansy for something more 'real,' but rather unfortunately, the batshit crazy candyman has trouble discerning between reality and his own audio-visual delusions.

While Hermann falsely believes him to be his 'double' and an immaculate doppelgänger, destitute peasant philosopher Felix (Klaus Löwitsch) – a poor but prideful man who believes that, "Philosophy is an invention of the rich. So is religion...poetry. I don't believe in love either" – could not be anymore diametrically opposed in character to the cowardly choco-capitalist. Although H.H. is a sexually and physically impotent tyrant (at least in his own mind) of a weakling who was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, has never done a minutes worth of physical labor in his entire life, lives a lavish and heedlessly hedonistic lifestyle, and generally hides inside his head as opposed to confronting the outside world, Felix is a stoic man's man who lives off the land, has a powerful body, and takes pride himself, thus the two characters represent the two extremes of Occidental man and naturally, for modernity to go on, the decadent and derailed mensch must kill his archaic comrade. While Hermann seems to have sexually repressed homoerotic feelings for Felix as especially obvious when the worker gets naked and shows off his proletarian physique, he has a pernicious plan to kill the down-and-out drifter as he believes they are physically identical, thus enabling him to fake his own death with a simple change of clothes and identities and cashing in on a new life insurance policy he has just obtained and subsequently escaping to neutral Switzerland so he can begin a new life. As a man who tells his insurance salesman, "I have neither priest nor doctor. I need them not at all. So why shouldn't I confide in my insurance consultant?," Hermann, aside from suffering from schizophrenia, also seems to be plagued by acute autism of the deracinated aristocrat sort. Of course, anyone viewing Despair knows that Hermann is hopelessly fated to fail, thus giving the character a certain vague tragicomic charisma in his feeble and feckless campaign for freedom from a forlorn life of personal failure and unfulfilling fetishism. As someone who opportunistically bought forged personal identity cards to fit in with changing political trends, including going from a blackshirt fighting reds in the white army to a “Caucasian” fighting SA brownshirts in the red army, Hermann at least has enough honesty to admit to himself (as well as a potential business client) that he is merely a, “yellow belly in a brown hat” whose life has amounted to nothing. Throughout Despair, Hermann says a lot of contradictory things about his mother who he has admitted incestuous feelings and goes from described her as a, “fat bourgeois addicted to chocolate,” to a “pure Russian of princely stock.” Of course, as a Rothschild (assuming Hermann is not lying), Hermann’s mother comes from a positively parasitic family that made its fortune by loaning money to opposing sides during all major European wars during the last couple centuries, thus the candyman was born with both blood and chocolate on his hands. Fassbinder certainly had complex and rather empathetic feelings regarding the character, stating, “What do people like Hermann Hermann usually do when it becomes clear to them that they’re at a turning point where they have everything behind them and nothing ahead of them? They pull into their shell, they resign themselves, and rather than admit that their life’s over, they’d prefer to spend the rest of it in a sea of compromises and resignation. The few who rebel, on the other hand, even if in a totally irrational way, those people achieve something, they discover something that gives them new hope. So no exoneration, but if you’re comparing him to the person who gives up in the face of life, I prefer the person who’s at least still capable of hope, even madness.”

In a writing Fassbinder did on Despair during pre-production of the film, he concluded the essay with the following sentence, “Of this despair and the painful search for something in motion, and the courage to recognize a utopia and to open yourself up to it, however poor it may be—of these things I tell in this film.” Of course, the L’Enfant terrible auteur used the artistic medium of cinema as a means to, “recognize a utopia,” albeit an innately imaginary one, with Despair being a project of potential celluloid paradise that was ultimately held down by its star power, international film crew, monetary motivated utilization of a foreign language, and big budget. Utilizing some of the sets from Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman’s commercial and critical failure The Serpent’s Egg (1977) – a work also set in pre-Nazi Germany and centering on a foreigner character (played by a foreign actor) that many people felt did not ‘work’ artistically and featured nonsensical casting (David Carradine is certainly not Bergman material) – Despair almost seems like it was a foreordained film from the very beginning. Ironically, protagonist Hermann Hermann – a man who claims the schizophrenic ancestry of, “my father was a German speaking Russian from Ravel. My mother was a Rothschild” – is a fellow who, like Fassbinder himself (especially in regard to Despair), is an idiosyncratic entity with a capacity for greatness, but ultimately fails in carrying out a meticulously constructed master plan due to cognitive dissonance and confusion. With his utilization of Dirk Bogarde instead of one of his Superstars (Kurt Raab comes to mind...) and focusing on debauched and deranged aristocrats as opposed to marginal and melancholy members of the middle-class, Fassbinder must have been trying to realize the dream of directing a Teutonized Luchino Visconti period piece of the arthouse Euro-sleaze persuasion with Despair – the first film where the director replaced a good percentage of his original film crew with professionals from all around the world, hence the too “polished and pretty” feel of the work. Sort of like the debauched and abridged blueblood equivalent to Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) in its depiction of the perturbed protagonist’s precarious personal life and plagued psyche and how it parallels the increasingly chaos of the wanton Weimar Republic, Despair ultimately seems, not unlike Effi Briest (1974), more like a fantasy project for Fassbinder where he was able to use a professional crew, nice budget, and take his directing skills to new levels in terms of technique, but unfortunately the film seems less like an intimate ‘auteur piece’ and more in the vein of a Tinto Brass big budget exploitation flick on psychosexual steroids made to appeal to both decadent bourgeoisie Americans and European alike, but no notable audience ever seemed interested in the film as a piece of smutty yet sleekly stylized S&M cinema that was not even approved of by its posh poof star Dirk Bogarde. Of course, a failure by Fassbinder is always more interesting than a supposed masterpiece by Wim Wenders or Jean-Luc Godard, thus making Despair worth seeing for fans of German New Cinema’s prodigal yet princely son. After all, what other film features odiously obese gay Austrian Peter Kern as a Nazi SA brownshirt who works for a chocolate company and whose beautiful brown uniform is described by protagonist H.H. as, “most appropriate, a chocolate-colored jacket!”

GERMANY IN AUTUMN

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1978)

It has been my experience and that of everyone I know who has spoken on the subject of anthology films (especially those where a number of filmmakers contribute an individual segment to the film) that they are almost unanimously and without fail uneven and flawed films because at least one of the individualized celluloid 'petites vignettes' will be an inferior work, thus sticking out like a Polish philosopher while juxtaposed alongside cinematic greatness. This would explain why there are so many horror movies in this format as this unofficial rule of filmmaking/storytelling is almost irrelevant when dealing with a genre that is typically innately inferior, formulaic, and rarely artistic, not to mention the fact that it is much easier to digest 30, rather than 90 minutes, of cheap sex, violence, and murder. The first segment of Flesh and Fantasy (1943) directed by Julien Duvivier, "Le tentazioni del dottor Antonio" directed by Federico Fellini for Boccaccio '70 (1962). "Toby Dammit" directed by Federico Fellini for Spirits of the Dead (1968), "Superbia - The Pride" directed by Ulrike Ottinger for Seven Women, Seven Sins (1986), "Far From Yokohama" from Mystery Train (1989) directed by Jim Jarmusch "We Fuck Alone" directed by Gaspar Noé for Distrikt (2006), and "Les souffrances d'un oeuf meurtri" directed by Roland Lethem for anachronistic compilation Incarnation - Cinema Abattoir (1967 – 2007) are just a meager handful of the anthological cinematic miscreations that are part of cinema history. Undoubtedly, as far as I am concerned, the most uneven, one-sided, and cinematically handicapped multi-director film that I have seen is Germany in Autumn (1978) aka Deutschland im Herbst; a film that, despite being coordinated by critically-revered Frankfurt school legal counselor turned filmmaker Alexander Kluge, and featuring contributions from nine different German auteur filmmakers (Alf Brustellin, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Alexander Kluge, Maximiliane Mainka, Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus, Peter Schubert, Bernhard Sinkel, Hans Peter Cloos, Edgar Reitz, Katja Rupé, and Volker Schlöndorff), owes any artistic merit it may have to one filmmaker and naturally he is also the best known and seemingly least politically-motivated. The film centers around various filmmakers' responses to the death of prominent German businessman Hanns Martin Schleyer (a former officer of the SS and NSDAP member) and the dubious suicides of three imprisoned far-left terrorists (Andreas Baader, Gudrun Ensslin and Jan-Carl Raspe of the Red Army Faction aka Baader-Meinhof Group) whose revolutionary guerrilla gang had him kidnapped and killed. Admittedly, a number of the filmmakers that contributed to Germany in Autumn I was not even familiar with upon first viewing the cinematic work and I believe that it is for good reason because aside from Fassbinder's realist but unsurprisingly melodramatic segment – which is around 25-minutes, thus making up roughly ¼ of the total film – I could have never conceived of socio-politically active kraut auteurs making the murderous mayhem of a bunch of ethno-masochistic “New Left” (influenced by Mao, Fanon, Guevara, Frankfurt school, etc) neo-marxist terrorists seem so banal. Needless to say, this review is mainly going to be focused on Fassbinder’s domestic debauchery, which is no surprise seeing that I am a fan of the Bavarian-born filmmaker’s relatively objective, thoughtful, and provocative treatment of the RAF and related leftist activists of the same zeitgeist in his previous film satirical melodrama Mother Küsters’ Trip to Heaven (1975) and his later bodacious black comedy The Third Generation (1979) aka Die Dritte Generation.

Despite being designed with the ambitious objective of being an ostensibly politically-charged cinematic work of social and historical significance, Germany in Autumn – like many of Alexander Kluge’s cinematic works in general – is mostly a rather emotionally and aesthetically sterile experience, sort of like what one would expect the soul of a dead old Bolshevik to be like, but it does not start out that way. Beginning with Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s segment set in the German New Wave king’s actual Munich-based apartment, the filmmaker’s keen contribution to Germany in Autumn is surprisingly intimate and rather revealing, so much so that I was severely shocked by the artistically vapid remainder of the film with the structure of the work being like a head without a body. Featuring Fassbinder, his then-boyfriend Armin Meier (in one of his last screen performances before his suicide that same year), his mother Lilo Pempeit (who appeared in around half of the her son’s films, usually in a minor role) and his ex-wife Ingrid Caven (who only ‘appears’ via telephone while talking to her homo ex-hubby), Germany in Autumn depicts the foredoomed filmmaker at his most naked; both literally and figuratively. Although seemingly a pure documentary of the filmmaker’s everyday life upon a superficial glance, the seriously saucy yet strikingly sentimental segment of the film is based on tightly scripted material, but that is not to say that the scenes are purely contrived without biographical basis as they do the parallel the erratic yet engrossing events of Fassbinder’s coke-fueled life in the fast lane. The segments of the filmmaker’s interaction with his beau boi Armin Meier – whose bulging bratwurst compensates for his congenitally blighted brain, in spite of his being a Lebensborn baby (somebody must have snuck a brownshirt into the program) – are especially telling, as he treats his ill-fated boyfriend as if his ignorance and lack of intelligence are so glaring that he cannot tell whether his opinions are real or the poorly performed product of sophomoric sarcasm, which is perfectly exemplified when the filmmaker asks him “You’re actually serious, aren’t you?” in regard to the live-in boyfriend’s query as to whether or not the imprisoned Baader-Meinhof Group terrorist should be “shot” or “hanged.” When the manly and meaty moron (or at least that is how he is portrayed) Meier remarks that, “if they (RAF) don’t follow the law, the state doesn’t have to either,” furious Fassbinder – dressed preposterously in leather-fag apparel that can barely contain his unflatteringly flabby physique – lunges at and physically assaults his fairy flame who is wearing nothing but a bath towel. In another particularly telling scene, Meier brings home a random frail, four-eyed nerd from a local bar, under the pretense that the gangly gay geek didn't have a place to stay for the night. Fassbinder, initially intrigued, takes one glance at the blissfully sleeping fag, then erupts into a blind rage in which he demands that Armin immediately evict the anal intruder from the premises. Clearly emotionally stirred by Meier's assumed lack of celibacy, Fassbinder curls into a ball on the floor, unleashing a pent up storm of tears, to which Armin responds by coddling him like a baby desperate for its mother's teat. By no means a physically handsome man, one can only assume that Meier – who is notably more hunky, masculine, and muscular than Fassbinder – constantly got the urge to cheat on his man with finer Aryan specimens. Naturally, when dealing with his mother Lilo Pempeit – a woman who left her son practically in the streets when he was still prepubescent – Fassbinder is much colder and matter-of-fact, so much so that he gets her to admit, "The best thing would be a kind of authoritarian ruler who is benevolent, and kind and orderly" as far as the sort of government she would like to see formed in Germany. In other words, Ms. Pempeit – a woman who lived through the Third Reich – would like to see another Uncle Adolf in charge, thereupon showing the political and philosophical divide between her epoch and that of the third generation.

During a candid interview towards the middle of Germany in Autumn, in what is indubitably one of the best examples in film history of someone who fits the "True Believer" archetype as outlined by the book of the same name written by German-American social writer Eric Hoffer – who essentially argued that political extremists rarely opt for adopting a more moderate political persuasion after shedding a previous one, but instead one that is just as, if not more, extreme – Horst Mahler, a lawyer by trade who became one of the founding members of the Red Army Faction and arguably the spiritual 'Rebbe' (as he certainly looks like one in Germany in Autumn) of the group, states in justification for the cold-blooded murder of 'capitalist pigs' that revolutionaries have, "disgust at the fact that we had fascism, state-sponsored fascist murder, the fascist extermination of other people, and that this had social cause which continue today" in West Germany. Although originally a member of the magical Maoist faith, Mahler would later have a change of heart and shift to the far-right despite being of partial Jewish ancestry, thereupon eventually resulting in his founding of the "Society for the Rehabilitation of Those persecuted for Refutation of the Holocaust" and repeated arrests for 'Volksverhetzung' ("incitement of popular hatred") and 'holocaust denial.' Mahler now has the distinct honor of serving a 12-year prison sentence for refuting the official events of the holocaust due to his unkosher, pro-Hitler rhetoric. Whatever one thinks of Mahler's political views, one has to admit – whether on the left or right – that Germany is not the 'democracy' it claims to be, ironically using Nazi-style authoritarian anti-freedom-of-speech tactics against pro-Nazi sentiments. It should be noted that Germany in Autumn was assembled at a time when the Fatherland had yet to be considered a 'stable' democracy of sorts, hence the hollow dreams of certainly leftist filmmakers that a Marxist utopia could still be realized in post-war Germany. As a liberal democracy, modern Germany offers its citizenry the right to freedom of prostitution and partaking in said bought flesh, cultural vapidness (when was the last time Germany produced a great filmmaker, let alone philosopher, novelist, painter, or composer?!), colonization from hostile elements from the continental south and east, generational indigenous population decline, the hegemony of Americanization and globalization, and a Fatherland without fathers and without a future. As much as I think the Lenfant terrible 'rock star' terrorists of the RAF were deluded nihilists (of the sort described by Albert Camus in his seminal 1951 work The Rebel aka L'Homme révolté) of the ethno-masochistic bend, at least they proved to be a generation of quasi-Faustian, foolhardy, if not foolish Germans with blood pumping through their veins. Unfortunately, I cannot say the same about most of their spiritual compatriots who contributed to Germany in Autumn; a work that is more symbiotic of the early stage of a Spenglerian "Winter" – the final, twilight stage of civilization where spiritual creativity is totally devitalized, everyday life is a grueling experience, and atheistic materialistic cosmopolitanism reigns – than that of a rich cinematic harvest.

IN A YEAR OF 13 MOONS

Rainer Werner Fassbinder^o (1978)

Typically regarded as singularly prolific Neuer Deutscher Film auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's most intimate and lugubrious film, In a Year of 13 Moons (1978) aka In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden – a foreboding work that centers around the last couple days of a suicidal transvestite – also happens to be one of the tragic filmmaker's greatest and most ambitious works. Dedicated to Fassbinder's lover of four years, Armin Meier (Satan's Brew, Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven), who committed suicide after the gay filmmaker broke up with him during a trip to New York in May 1978, In a Year of 13 Moons is hardly the biographical portrayal it pays posthumous tribute to. Apparently accused of belittling and torturing Meier, Fassbinder was attacked in the German tabloids and even received anonymous death threats for what many perceived as provoking the young man's self-slaughter. After considering being a farmer in Paraguay or a social recluse, Fassbinder finally opted to deal with the heated heartbreak of Meier's death by getting to work on In a Year of 13 Moons, a film he went on to explain, "What is important for me is that I managed to make a film which does not simply translate my emotions about the suicide. That is my pain and mourning about the fact that I may have failed in some respects in this relationship, but that I made a film...which goes far beyond this; which tells a lot more than I could have told about Armin. And for me this was a decision for life." As a product of the Lebensborn program – a National Socialist SS breeding project which allowed SS officers to sire children with random racially Nordic women – Meier is similar to the protagonist of In a Year of 13 Moons in that he spent his early childhood years as an orphan and never knew who his biological parents were, but the literal biographical similarities between Fassbinder's ill-fated beau and the fictional character essentially end there. As an average-sized mensch with a striking resemblance to James Dean as depicted in his passive yet potent performance in Fassbinder's Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975), Meier does not even vaguely physically resemble the towering Nordic transvestite played by Volker Spengler in In a Year of 13 Moons, nor did he have his penis cut off in Casablanca because a Jewish holocaust survivor treated him with romantic disdain like the character in the film. Of course, being the starkest of the filmmaker's always distressing and oftentimes nihilistic melodramas, one is better off forgetting the facts that inspired In a Year of 13 Moons and instead embrace the emotions that sparked film as Fassbinder did not title his feature-length work Love is Colder than Death (1969) for nothing. Needless to say, In a Year of 13 Moons proved to be one of the most agonizing and afflicting films I have ever seen, and I mean that in the most positive way, as no other film has provoked in me the ability to empathize with the all-consuming misery of a dick-less and suicidal tranny.

From its emotionally bombarding beginning to its harrowing yet inescapable end, In a Year of 13 Moons is an emotionally excruciating cinematic excursion that takes no prisoners in terms of its propensity to inflict shame and misery onto the viewer. Beginning with the superbly superstitious claim that, "Every seventh year is a Year of the Moon. People whose lives are strongly influenced by their emotions suffer more intensely from depressions in these years. To a lesser degree, this is also true of years with 13 new moons. When a Moon Year also has 13 new moons inescapable personal tragedies may occur. In the 20th century, this dangerous constellation occurs six times. One of these is 1978....," In a Year of 13 Moons shifts gears and reveals our humble and humiliated protagonist Erwin / Elvira Weishaupt (Volker Spengler) who is beaten by a gang of Slavic homosexuals after one of them is repulsed to find that the tall transvestite is no female but a neutered nullo nutjob. As a married man with a grownup daughter and a butcher by trade, Erwin does not seem like the sort of individual that would fall hopelessly in love with fancy rich fellows, let alone have himself castrated for the most trivial of reasons. Erwin's hooker friend 'Red Zora' (Ingrid Caven), a 'tart with a heart,' states that her full-time drag-queen friend was not even gay until relatively recently and his decision to undergo a sex change was for seemingly no reason. Of course, as you watch In a Year of 13 Moons, you learn that Erwin went through the excessive procedure in the totally delusional hope that a man he loved, Anton Saitz (played by real-life orphan Gottfried John) – a holocaust survivor turned black marketer turned prestigious property speculator – would accept him as a serious lover if he were a pseudo-woman of sorts. As an ex-butcher who had no problem mutilating live animals, an act he said gave meaning to their lives, Erwin must have seen castration as only a minor sacrifice in the conquest of true and eternal love, but unfortunately things don't go as planned and the genitally-deprived he-woman is left with nothing to show for his unspeakable suffering, including his mangled manhood. In In a Year of 13 Moons, the viewer follows the particularly perturbed protagonist as he makes a desperate attempt to pick up the broken pieces of his past, but on his fateful personal odyssey, Erwin is only met with cold rejection and disdain from those individuals that are supposed to love him the most. Erwin even revisits the Catholic convent he spent his youth in, discombobulating the nun who helped raise him, Sister Gudrun (Lilo Pempeit), with his absurd gentle giant drag queen appearance. Describing the child she knew as a 'good boy,' the now grown up Erwin reflects on the fact that it was in his youthful days in the convent that he learned to lie to others because by engaging in deceptive behavior he was rewarded, thereupon sparking the quasi-schizophrenic dichotomy between his true internal self and the role he would play until falling in love with the holocaust survivor of his dreams. As can be expected, Erwin is never able to reconcile the transformation of his former male self and his 'Elvira' persona, thus resulting in the most lamentable yet inevitable of consequences.

IN A YEAR OF 13 MOONS

In a Year of 13 Moons is an interesting and undoubtedly controversial work in that it contradicts Hollywood history, portraying a good, Aryan German of notably Nordic features as the victim of a cold, calculating and glaringly ugly Jew, who laughs at the man who purports to love him when he realizes he become a eunuch for him. In a sense, Fassbinder – who arguably tormented his boyfriend to the point that he committed suicide – is symbolic of Jew jerk Saitz in both repellant appearance and character and Meier – a lonely Lebensborn boy who was originally spawned to be one of Germany's greatest sons – is Erwin, a man that is ultimately destroyed by a life of misfortune and heartbreak. Fassbinder may have had a reputation for abusing women and drugs, but one must admit there was a certain uncompromising honesty, albeit cryptic, in his cinematic art, with In a Year of 13 Moons being one of his most striking, sensitive and artistically merited examples. German auteur Christoph Schlingensiefel would pay sardonic tribute to Fassbinder and his masterpiece of melodramatic misery In a Year of 13 Moons with his work The 120 Days of Böttrop (1997); a work also starring Volker Spengler and other Fassbinder survivors. Ultimately, Fassbinder himself would reach an end as tragic, if not more pathetic, than his lover Meier; but this is what one might come to expect for an individual who fucked virtually every cast member of his films, had a menagerie of exotic brown men at his beck and call and ultimately died alone of a cocaine overdose with his last script in hand.

THE MARRIAGE OF MARIA BRAUN

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1979)

If I were to choose one film by Rainer Werner Fassbinder to recommend to a Fass-bande virgin, it would undoubtedly be The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) aka Die Ehe der Maria Braun – the first and best film in the German New Wave filmmaker's BRD Trilogy (preceding Veronika Voss and Lola) and the director's most nationally and internationally profitable film – as this wunderbar work not only touches on many of the themes that occupy the director's extensive oeuvre – not least of all the post-Nazi German consciousness – but it is also one of his most accessible, gripping, and enthralling works. The Marriage of Maria Braun also happens to be the first Fassbinder film I ever saw about a decade ago and over the years I have realized I was right in my initial assumption that it is one of the German New Wave filmmaker's best films. Described by French New Wave founder and alpha-auteur François Truffaut (400 Blows, Fahrenheit 451) in the prestigious publication Cahiers du Cinéma as "an original work of epic and poetic qualities" in which Fassbinder "has broken out of the ivory tower of the cinephiles," The Marriage of Maria Braun is probably the single greatest cinematic depiction of life for citizens in post-war Germany and the warped and seemingly irreparable male-female gender dynamics that such chaos sowed as the sort of film Helma Sanders-Brahms wishes she could have assembled with her slave-morality-driven celluloid feminist abortion Germany, Pale Mother (1980) aka Deutschland bleiche Mutter, but lacks the artistry, sensitivity, and honesty to do so. Unlike Sanders-Brahms's film, Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun portrays both the corruption and moral degeneration of both genders of a newlywed married couple as a result of completely cataclysmic and uncontrollable circumstances that resulted at the conclusion of the Second World War during Germany Year Zero and a decade or so there afterward.

Essentially, Fassbinder's erudite equivalent to the Hollywood epic Gone with the Wind (1939), except set within the context of post-Hitler Germany instead of the American Civil War and Reconstruction era South, The Marriage of Maria Braun is quite possibly Fassbinder's greatest aesthetic and historical document of the father-less Fatherland that came to be as a result of the tumultuous and tormenting tides of war. Originally sprung from a failed made-for-TV collaboration tentatively titled The Marriage of our Parents between Fassbinder and Frankfurt school filmmaker Alexander Kluge after the critical success of their mostly aesthetically and politically odious omnibus film collaboration Germany in Autumn (1978), thankfully The Marriage of Maria Braun developed into a different celluloid creature entirely; a one with heart and soul, even if the accursed characters of their film of theirs figuratively torn out. Originally created from a rough draft assembled by Fassbinder and his filmic compatriots Klaus-Dieter Lang and Kurt Raab, The Marriage of Maria Braun was ultimately rewritten for screen by longtime collaborator Peter Märthesheimer (producer of Fassbinder's Despair and mini-series Berlin Alexanderplatz, among various other films) and his partner Pea Fröhlich, a professor of psychology and pedagogy with Michael Fengler (co-director of Fassbinder's Why Does Herr R. Run Amok?) and star-crossed Austrian actress Romy Schneider in mind for the title role. Although Schneider probably would have been most fitting as the lost lead, it would be Fassbinder Superstar Hanna Schygulla (Love is Colder than Death, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant) – arguably the greatest and most important actress of New German Cinema – who would give the performance of a lifetime for The Marriage of Maria Braun; a film that would prove to be one of the most important films of Neuer Deutscher Film, as well as German cinema history as a whole.

Right from the rough getgo of The Marriage of Maria Braun, it is most apparent that newlyweds Maria (Hanna Schygulla) and Hermann Braun (Klaus Löwitsch) are in for a rocky ride of a rather foredoomed marriage. Barely surviving their marriage ceremony as the building they get married in tumbles before them and almost crushes them during an Allied bombing raid in 1943, the two severed sweethearts only get to spend "half a day and a whole night" before Hermann – a German Wehrmacht soldier – is shipped back to the apocalyptic setting that is the Eastern front. Rather unsurprisingly for a man of his ill-fortune, Hermann fails to return to his mate Maria after an extended period of waiting for him to return randomly in a ghost train of sorts. When Maria's soldier brother-in-law Willy (Gottfried John) states that Hermann has been undoubtedly killed like most of the men of his unfortunate unit, she makes the best of things and becomes a hostess at a dilapidated makeshift bar for American Negro soldiers and eventually starts a relationship with a heavysset, middle-aged black soldier named Bill (played by American conductor George Byrd), which results in a merry mix of miscegenation and with a mulatto embryo in her white womb. Naturally, it is to Maria's grand surprise when Hermann shows up after years of captivity in a Ruskie hellhole – looking like a disheveled holocaust survivor no less – to the delight of witnessing his sweet Maria fornicating with a butterball untermensch Schwarzie. Naturally, a feverish fight ensues between heated Hermann and wild black buck Bill that is abruptly ended when the lady of the bizarre bi-racial love triangle breaks a big bottle over the head of her Negro gentlemen caller, thereupon resulting in his decisive death and a charge against the glorified callgirl for murder by American occupational forces. A stoic soldier that has already endured much shame and misery at the hands of Slavic savages, hubby Hermann takes the rap for Maria's incendiary indiscretion, thus resulting in his imprisonment. To her delight, Maria looses the little Günther Kaufmann (a real-life product of a similar coupling between an American Negro G.I. and a Aryan barbarian) in her stomach under dubious circumstances centering around a doped-up doctor that she is peddling her flesh to in return for special medical favours. With her spouse in jail, Maria takes it upon herself to become “The Mata Hari of the economic Miracle,” or as she states quite callously and sardonically yet undeniably honestly: “I am a master of disguise: A tool of capitalism by day and an agent of the working classes by night.” Assuring her humiliated husband that she is, “going to build a house for us, as you would have done” in an exceedingly emasculating manner as he stands most impotent as an imprisoned man of no means, Maria climbs up the corporate ladder by becoming the mistress of a wealthy industrialist named Karl Oswald (Ivan Desny), who inevitably falls full-fledge in love with the blond beautiful beastess named Maria Braun. Determined to keep Maria in his life, even if she refuses to marry him, loverboy Oswald makes Hermann a monetary offer that he cannot refuse and that few honest husbands would accept that results in the decidedly disgraced husband’s indefinite disappearance to Canada immediately after he is released from prison.

To rationalize post-war prostitute-like professions, Maria tells her husband Hermann, “I’ve led this life for you...for us.” To her credit, her words more or less ring true, but that does not change the damage done from her less than monogamist lifestyle. Ultimately, Maria Braun – a self-made woman who ironically flaunts and taints her flesh to obtain independence – becomes a proto-feminist ‘modern woman’ out of necessity as she emotionally de-evolves into a cold, calculating careerist without capacity for love nor empathy, but a materialist madame and lecherous lady with a propensity for loveless sex and buying expensive things she does not need to impress people she does not like, thus The Marriage of Maria Braun makes for a marvelous movie that is not only reflective of the cosmopolitan, capitalist German woman, but also Western ‘womanhood’ as a whole. Interestingly, while German women were forced into virtual prostitution (not to mention rape, abortions, and starvation) and rebuilding of their decimated nation due to the abject destruction of the German mensch via the ravages of war (both physically and mentally, from everything from death to disgrace and literal and figurative castration), American women also inevitably adopted this lifeless lifestyle of callous careerism as well despite America’s ‘progress’ after winning the Second World War, therefore, when it comes to progress of kultur and healthy living, one could argue that no one really won the war, at least where happiness is concerned, thus begging the question as to whether or not the real victims of war were the actual survivors. After all, it is no coincidence that the surname of the anti-heroess of The Marriage of Maria Braun is the same as that of Uncle Adolf’s mistress/short-lived bride, but unlike the Führer and his Fräulein – who were able to bask in the glory of self-annihilation and escape the mundane milieu of modernity (and, of course, war crimes) – the bedeviled Brauns become begotten byproducts of cosmopolitan capitalism and the banality of enterprise. Indeed, if nothing else, The Marriage of Maria Braun proves that a woman’s greatest commodity is her body which can buy her petty power and material possession as opposed to the misogynistic servitude of marriage and motherhood. As calamitously depicted in the film's crushing and crestfallen climax, economic and sexual freedom cannot buy happiness, let alone an impassioned marriage, but it can empower you to buy sexy outfits to wear needlessly around the house.

Concluding disastrously juxtaposed with the announcement that "Germany is world champion" in regard to West Germany's winning of the soccer world championship and with the final image of then-Chancellor of West Germany Helmut Schmidt, R.W. Fassbinder offered a grim premonition of the splintered Fatherland's future with The Marriage of Maria Braun. Although the Berlin Wall has fallen and the Soviet Union with it, coupled with having the European continent's biggest economy, including the world's fourth largest economy by nominal GDP and the fifth largest in terms of purchasing power, and one the highest standards of living in the world, the nation is also facing long-term indigenous population decline (lower than 1946), a devastating deluge of illegal aliens from the east and south who are mostly unskilled, uneducated, and unemployable yet commit the majority of violent crimes, the legalization of prostitution (no doubt, a most symbolic event!), and the virtual extinction of cultural creators like Fassbinder himself. I guess when you have so many designer shoes and dresses to choose from, why worry about your extincting nation?!

BERLIN ALEXANDERPLATZ

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1980)

In terms of sheer size, artistic scope, and all-encompassing ambitiousness, Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) – a 15 ½ hour film based on the 1929 Alfred Döblin novel of the same name that is considered the longest “cinematic film” ever made and was originally broadcasted on West German television in 14-parts, including 13 single chapters and an experimental two hour epilogue – was indubitably German New Cinema König Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s crowning achievement as, quite arguably, the greatest and most important filmmaker of his disillusioned and revolutionary zeitgeist as an ambivalent child of the post-WWII generation. Originally read by the director when he was only fourteen or fifteen years old, Döblin’s modernist magnum opus Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929) would be described by Fassbinder as a life-changing work of literature that, confessing in a collection of “unorganized thoughts” on the novel that he wrote, he had, “unconsciously turned Döblin’s imaginings into my life. Yet once again it was the novel that helped me to overcome the alarming crisis that resulted and to work at establishing something that could eventually become, I hope, more or less that thing one calls an identity, to the extent that’s even possible with all this screwed-up mess.” And, indeed, traces of Döblin’s crucial influence can be seen scattered throughout Fassbinder’s cinematic oeuvre, including deriving plots for two of his early films (Love Is Colder than Death and Gods of the Plague) from Berlin Alexanderplatz and constantly recycling the name “Franz” (the name of the protagonist in the novel) for a number of his films, including his debut-feature Love Is Colder Than Death (1969), Katzelmacher (1969), Gods of the Plague (1970), and The American Soldier (1970), as well as going so far as even taking the protagonist’s full-name “Franz Bieberkopf” for his highly personal work Fox and His Friends (1975). By no means a literal filmic adaptation of Döblin’s sometimes seemingly incoherent novel, Fassbinder’s Berlin Alexanderplatz is a more naturalistic work that does not wallow in montage nor the modernist Joyce-esque esotericism of its source material and features an epilogue that sums up the director’s highly and singularly personalized interpretation of the novel as a filmmaker who had a transcendent talent for synthesizing the personal with the historical and sociopolitical, thus making for a relatively accessible work, even if it infamously enraged West German viewers during its initial TV broadcast, that portrays the rampant wantonness of the rarely working, working-class of Weimar Republic Berlin during the late-1920s within a melancholy microcosm of an ex-con and his mixed-up mind, and the people that make his life all but unbearable and tediously tragic. Centering on a fundamentally flawed anti-hero Franz Biberkopf (played by Günter Lamprecht) – an ex-convict who has just been released from prison after a four year stay for killing his prostitute girlfriend in the heat of the moment – Berlin Alexanderplatz follows a man that, no matter hard he tries, has a difficult time being 'straight' and living a life without crime, especially when a Svengali creature of a man named Reinhold (Gottfried John) turns his life – and everyone around him – upside down.

While most prisoners who have not made love to a woman nor lived in a room without bars for a number of years would be nothing less than overjoyed to be released from prison and get on with their personal lives, ex-pimp Franz Biberkopf is not your average fellow, even if he fits the timeless stereotype of a loud, boorish, boastful and belligerent kraut who feeds his bloated belly with beer more than he nurtures his mind with knowledge or even common sense. After being virtually forced off the grounds of Tegel prison after becoming a free man for the first time in four years, Herr Biberkopf is quite overwhelmed with his destitute and degenerate surrounds in what seems to be a moment of temporary insanity, but he is 'nursed' back to mental health by two eccentric Orthodox Jews who have a seething Semitic hatred of one another. Not long after, big brazen bastard Biberkopf virtually rapes a woman named Minna (Karin Baal), the sister of the prostitute girlfriend he killed four years before because he correctly believed she was about to leave him. Despite witnessing Biberkopf's brutal murder of his lover Ida (Barbara Valentin), Frau Baß (Brigitte Mira), a kindly if not pathologically nosy landlady, has maintained the ex-con's studio apartment, so he need not worry about finding a place to stay. Naturally, being a jolly alcoholic who has not had a cold beer in years, Biberkopf soon goes to his favorite bar/hangout owned by his friend Max (Claus Holm) after meeting up with his best friend Meck (Franz Buchrieser) by happenstance on the seedy streets of Berlin. Taking Meck's advice that Minna is bad news, Biberkopf befriends a new love interest in the form of a young Polish gal named Lina Przybilla (Elisabeth Trissenaar). After a wild session of sex, the ex-con vows to Lina that he will go "straight" and work an honest job as opposing to going back to pimping, but such things are easier said than done in a decidedly damning depression era where even normal men commit robberies and cutesy girls peddle their flesh just to survive.

Determined to live an honorable life, Biberkopf works a number of odd jobs, including peddling tie holders on the streets and, to the dismay of an old Jewish friend, naively selling copies of the National Socialist newspaper Völkischer Beobachter while wearing a swastika armband. A rather desperate fellow with a mostly apolitical political persuasion, Biberkopf finds it all but unavoidable that he will get in a barroom fight with some old communist friends. Seconds away from beating a babyish Bolshevik brute with a chair at Max's pub, Biberkopf decides to find a new line of work and hooks up with Lina's 'uncle' Otto Lüders (Hark Bohm), a fellow ex-con who, unbeknownst to Franz, never managed to shed his criminal ways, and starts selling shoelaces door-to-door. While on the job, Biberkopf ends up cheating on Lina with a lonely bourgeois widow and Otto later robs the woman after hearing about his partner's salacious story about the lonely woman with a luxurious mansion apartment. When Biberkopf goes back to the widow's house for another game of carnal knowledge, the woman closes the door on him, thus leaving him rather distraught, so he runs away to a flophouse, where he will stay indefinitely after realizing it is quite hard to stay 'straight,' especially when working with a dishonest partner with a pathetic proclivity for robbing harmless women. After failing to locate Franz, Lina and Meck end up hooking up and the ex-con goes on a delirious drinking binge for quite a number of days.

After breaking out of his hallucinatory hooch hypnosis, Franz B. hooks up with sexy streetwalker Eva (Hanna Schygulla), who quite inexplicably, is perennially in love with the overweight ex-con as he used to be her pimp, thus holding a special softspot in the hot little harlot's heart. In fact, exquisite Eva is so in love with Herr Biberkopf that she is the one that is responsible for paying the rent at his flat when he was away at prison, thus proving her deep-seated devotion to the ex-con, even if she is a prostitute who sells her pussy to make a living. Franz also meets up with Meck again, who admits his short fling with Lina, which his friend has no problem with, but now he has moved on to much bigger things as a member of a posh fellow named Pums' criminal crew. While Pums (Ivan Desny) immediately offers Franz a job 'selling fruit,' the ex-con turns him down as he wants to stay straight. Franz also meets a stuttering sadist named Reinhold (Gottfried John), an ex-revolutionary who is part of Pums' criminal enterprise and who, for better or worse, will inevitably become the most important and influential person in the ex-cons life. Reinhold devises a dubious scheme where he passes old and now undesirable girlfriends onto Franz, which works out quite well for a while, but things go awry when Mr. Biberkopf decides he prefers to keep a cabaret singer/dancer named Cilly (Annemarie Düringer), which infuriates the stuttering girlfriend-swapper, thus inspiring him to seek revenge against what he sees as a 'disloyal' friend. A delightful chap who hates drama, Franz is eventually coerced into committing a robbery with Pums' gang, but it is not until he is actually involved with carrying out the crime that he realizes the magnitude of what sort of criminal corruption he is involved with, thus causing him to freakout on his compatriots, who don't taken kindly to his hysterics. While driving away with the loot, paranoid Reinhold accuses Franz of being a 'stool pigeon' and throws him out of the backdoor of the car into a car behind them. Although everyone believes he is dead, Biberkopf has merely lost his right arm.

Not unsurprisingly, Franz B is nursed back to health by Eva and her seemingly slavish lover Herbert (Roger Fritz) and eventually gets involved with a criminal enterprise after meeting a flamboyant Nietzschean conman named Willy (Fritz Schediwy) at a cabaret. Through Eva, Biberkopf also meets the love of his life in the form of a sweet and beautiful yet slightly dimwitted prostitute, a character that was apparently partly modeled after the character Gelsomina (Giulietta Masina) from Federico Fellini's La Strada (1954), that he 'christens' "Mieze" (Barbara Sukowa) in a symbolic act of his singular love for her. Although Mieze initially support the one-armed Franz, he gets tired of living off of a woman, so he does the seemingly unthinkable by visiting Reinhold – the Mephistopheles-like man that tried to kill him and will inevitably take him to hell and back – so that he can join up with Pums' gang again. Franz also introduces Mieze to his criminal compatriots, including Reinhold, who seems to have a rather dubious and even strangely romantic feeling for the man he once tried to exterminate and who becomes immediately jealous of his one-armed friend's seemingly immaculate relationship with the seemingly angelic girl. After learning that Mieze loves a young man and that she wants Eva to have Franz's baby since she's infertile, Biberkopf nearly beats her to death, but the two inevitably reconcile their differences and become stronger than ever after taking an amazing trip to a folkish forest in Freienwalde, but a malicious man named Reinhold has pernicious plans for the little lady so as to seek revenge against Herr Biberkopf for falling in love with a woman. After blackmailing Meck into getting Mieze to travel to Freienwalde, a special place where she and Franz originally fell in love, like a little lamb being led to the slaughter, Reinhold commits the most unholy act of lover's revenge by proxy against the intrinsically innocent flesh-peddler. With all that has happened, Franz Biberkopf still cannot seem to get Reinhold out of his heart.

The last two hours of Berlin Alexanderplatz, a surrealist epilogue entitled "My Dream of the Dream of Franz Biberkopf by Alfred Döblin," seems in rather stark contrast to the rest of the film's naturalism due to its Clive Barker-like sadomasochistic and sexually subversive imagery, not to mention its pseudo-Luciferian essence as if Goethe's Faust were set in the mind of a Weimar era mad man entering metaphysical hell. While Reinhold is in jail and is, quite reluctantly, finally embracing his latent homosexuality, Franz is in a mental institution and in a comatose like state, thus the majority of the epilogue takes place in his haunted mind, which is comprised of seemingly real phantasms of his past and present. Guided by two rather cynical yet wise and stoic, Super Aryan guardian angels named Terah (Margit Carstensen) and Sarug (Helmut Griem) that look like they came out of a Fidus painting, Franz is reunited with the dead, including Ida – the woman who has haunted his life ever since the day he beat her to death and sent her straight to hell – and Pums, who has apparently committed suicide. In a seemingly Satanic slaughterhouse dream sequence of psychosexual phantasmagoria, Reinhold raises a bloody hatchet as if he is the grim reaper over a pile of naked and immobile bodies belonging to Franz's former lovers, whom the one-armed wonder later joins after stripping off all his clothes. Franz also has a transsexual moment in preposterous pancake make-up drag where he speaks to "Reinhold Christ," a grotesque Willard-esque scene where he crawls on the floor with an army of rodents, has a surrealist boxing match with old Reinhold in the spirit of the real-life match between German heavy-weight champion Max Schmeling and American negro Joe "Brown Bomber" Louis, an attempt by old Pums to literally rip his heart out, and even becoming Jesus Christ the crucified himself in an apocalyptic Hieronymus Bosch-like scenario recalling Germany's physical and cultural destruction during both World Wars. Mr. Biberkopf also encounters bands of Nazi SA brownshirts fighting communists in scenes that vaguely echo Fassbinder's enemy Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's cinematic magna opera Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977). Indeed, like Syberberg's Wagnerian Hitler epic, Berlin Alexanderplatz is a rare example of cinema as 'Gesamtkunstwerk' and the epilogue of Fassbinder's daunting Döblin adaption, which features Richard Wagner's "Liebestod" aka "love death" ("Mild und leise wie er lächelt") from the opera Tristan und Isolde, is not only the icy, albeit darkly romantic, icing on the cake of the miniseries, but also the cinematic coda to the filmmaker's entire life as a lonely man searching for love and an identity, but only really finding both esoterically via cinema.

As Fassbinder wrote regarding the antagonistic yet hopelessly potent relationship between anti-heroes Franz Biberkopf and Reinhold in Berlin Alexanderplatz, "I read it as the story of two men whose little bit of life on this earth is ruined because they don't have the opportunity to get up the courage even to recognize, let alone admit, that they like each other in an unusual way, love each other somehow, that something mysterious ties them to each other more closely than is generally considered suitable for men." Indeed, unlike Döblin's novel, Fassbinder's adaption of Berlin Alexanderplatz makes no ambiguity of "The love that dare not speak its name" between the two strikingly different men: Franz, being an impulsive and extroverted philistine with a practical mind and a big, yet fragile heart; and Reinhold, a resentful and sadistic introvert with an intimidating intellect but without a shred of common sense who has led a life of repressing his feelings, thus resulting in violent acts sired by his sexual repression. While Berlin Alexanderplatz portrays a type of economic depression, more obvious and important to the film is the decided depression of the soul and collective unconscious of Germany, and as Fassbinder's celluloid oeuvre demonstrates, the director had incurable cases of melancholia and Weltschmerz, thus acting as the highest expression of his nation's "heart" during the post-WWII era. While Fassbinder always saw Franz Biberkopf as his 'alter-ego' of sorts, his actions and behavior demonstrate that he was more like Reinhold, so it should be no surprise that he originally intended to portray the curious character in a feature-length version of Berlin Alexanderplatz starring Gérard Depardieu (as Franz B.) and Jeane Moreau that was ultimately aborted. Just as dullard Franz was always the victim of Reinhold's psychopathic savagery, so were Fassbinder's three great true loves – Günther Kaufmann, El Hedi ben Salem, and Armin Meier – victims of the perennially miserable and malicious filmmaker's calculated cruelty, with the second two of his ill-fated boyfriends inevitably committing suicide as a result of his cruel and contemptible behavior. As contemporary German filmmaker Tom Tykwer (Run Lola Run, The Princess and the Warrior) wrote in 2007 in an essay entitled Berlin Alexanderplatz: He Who Lives in a Human Skin, “Franz’s love of Reinhold is a mystery not only to himself but also to us—and yet we know what he’s talking about. The film touches here on a collective secret knowledge that, rumbling in our subconscious, brings to mind on some strange evening of our life a confusing feeling of deepest tenderness for a person we never really thought played an important role in our life.” Of course, where Döblin’s novel ended on a rather low and anti-climatic note, Fassbinder goes full-force with Berlin Alexanderplatz – an epic celluloid tribute by the director to love and hate, life and death, and the Whore of Babylon and the Grim Reaper in the forsaken Fatherland.

Although a rather unflattering anecdote, apparently Fassbinder went from envisioning Berlin Alexanderplatz as a mere feature film to a fourteen part epic in an attempt to fund an absurdly expensive drug habit, and was described by Michael Fengler, who helped draw up the one-year shooting schedule of the film series, as detailed by Robert Katz in the Fassbinder biography Love Is Colder Than Death (1989): “He was now so heavily into drugs [Fengler recalls] that Harry Baer and I came up with a precise plan on how we would manage the whole thing. We estimated that during the filming he would spend forty thousand marks a month to satisfy his need, about half a million for the whole year. We thought it would be idiotic to leave it all to chance, so we decided to buy all the stuff ourselves in advance and sell it off to him piecemeal, without his knowing that it came from us, of course. The idea was to have some control over his habit by knowing what and how much he was getting.” As early Fassbinder collaborator Peter Berling also revealed regarding the director’s coke-fueled direction of The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979), which, despite being the most successful film of the auteur filmmaker’s career, was squeezed in as a “cheap quickie” before shooting Berlin Alexanderplatz, “Whatever combination of drugs he’d concocted, it certainly stimulated output, though once he couldn’t move or be moved for two days... To keep the engine going, Fengler hired three assistants who did nothing but fly all over Europe to get stuff for Rainer, but his thirst for cocaine alone seemed unquenchable. It grew to seven or eight grams a day.” Quite miraculously, Fassbinder ended up getting off drugs for the majority of shooting of Berlin Alexanderplatz and approached the film with the sort of fanatical professionalism that one would expect from Leni Riefenstahl’s prodigal son, only to get coked up again around the time of shooting the particularly phantasmagorical epilogue, which one could argue was to the film’s benefit due to its exceptionally ominous, oneiric, and otherworldly essence. Not unsurprisingly, Fassbinder was no different from his fictional ill-fated characters Franz and Reinhold in that regard as all three men more or less adjusted their drug intake according to their needs and, of course, it seems there was always a need as individuals who were always on the brink of existential crisis. As was probably expected by those who knew him, Fassbinder ultimately succumbed to his deleterious addiction a mere two years after completing Berlin Alexanderplatz – a monolithic magnum opus of a movie that the director probably assumed he would never be able to top. After his death, a policeman apparently told a reporter that, “Even Fassbinder’s just a man,” and, indeed, it really was only a matter of time before the filmmaker’s superhuman, stardom-charged work ethic caught up with him as a man who long ago made a ‘Faustian pact’ by sacrificing his life for his art.

Over three decades later and Berlin Alexanderplatz still seems like the virtual blueprint for popular premium cable channel shows like Six Feet Under (2001-2005) and Boardwalk Empire (2010-present), albeit Fassbinder’s work is more aesthetically and thematically intricate, morally dubious, and remarkably unforgettable that, not unlike how the German New Cinema master auteur described Döblin’s novels imperative influence on him, is for many viewers, a life-changing work. That being said, Berlin Alexanderplatz is more like an overextended, experimental melodrama recollecting Fassbinder’s entire life work as a filmmaker, and then some, as the epically melodramatic celluloid “romantic anarchist” equivalent to prophet philosopher Oswald Spengler’s final work The Hour of Decision (1934), a best seller that was ultimately banned by the National Socialists that predicted an apocalyptic scenario that involved the defeat of the Third Reich and destruction of Germany by the exact year, as well as the decline of power in the Occidental world and the rise of the Third World. In many ways, Berlin Alexanderplatz is a lovely and luxurious, if not patently pessimistic and prophetic, love-hate elegy for Germania as a lurid libertine melodrama set during the apocalyptic beginning of the end of the Teutonic Fatherland. Franz Biberkopf, a kindhearted, if not clumsy and boorish, man who may have had a much different life had he lived during a much simpler and less criminally inclined zeitgeist, is a symbol of German debasement and original sin, and whose story, as Döblin wrote in the preface of Berlin Alexanderplatz, is important because, “To listen to this, and to meditate on it, will be of benefit to many who, like Franz Biberkopf, live in a human skin, and, like this Franz Biberkopf, ask more of life than a piece of bread and butter.” As chaos rises and engulfs all of the Occident and its former colonies, one could learn a thing or two about the pathology and metaphysics of tragedy in the post-national/post-Hitler and cosmopolitan technocratic age by watching Fassbinder’s masterpiece Berlin Alexanderplatz – quite arguably the last great work of Gesamtkunstwerk of European history.

LILI MARLEEN

Undoubtedly, my least favorite films directed by German New cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder tend to be his later, more polished big-budget works for quite obvious reasons with his wartime romance Lili Marleen (1981) being somewhere in the middle of this 'least-liked' list. Loosely based on the true story of German chanson singer-songwriter Lale Anderson and her popular 1939 interpretation of the morbid yet melodious song "Lili Marleen" that especially appealed to lonely and sexually frustrated soldiers, not just among the Fatherland, but also troops among both Axis and Allied powers, Lili Marleen is ultimately a tragic and patently pessimistic tale of mismatched miscegenation gone awry and how one lady's forbidden love for a successful Swiss Semite almost sank her stupendous music career. An exceptional example of Fassbinder (almost) goes Hollywood, Lili Marleen, like the typical Tinseltown period piece, rarely resembles actual historical truth, at least where the central character's storyline is concerned, which is not exactly a bad thing as the German New Wave auteur was known to belligerently bastardize his source material to his aesthetic and thematic advantage, but when a director attempts to make an incidental 'holocaust hero' out of a beautiful blonde bombshell like Hanna Schygulla, you know a film has a certain daunting distastefulness to it. Only vaguely based on Anderson's autobiographical novel Der Himmel hat viele Farben (aka The Heavens Have Many Colors) according to the singer's final husband Arthur Beul, Lili Marleen is a marvelous but sometimes mundane quasi-musical melodrama that features the incessant replaying of the title song to the point where it almost drives the viewer insane, which was indubitably a conscious decision on Fassbinder's part as symbolized in a scene in the film where the female protagonist's Jewish lover is literally tortured by the SS via nonstop replaying of the nauseating musical number. A rare commissioned work, Fassbinder himself apparently had no interest in directing Lili Marleen, but did have the foresight and big enough of a Faustian spirit to create a film with a relatively realistic 'Nazi aesthetic' or as Schygulla said in an interview regarding the director, the filmmaker apparently said they, "were making the film from hell." Indeed, like many of Fassbinder's later works, Lili Marleen certainly had big bucks (at an estimated DEM 10,500,000 or what is today roughly $ 7,153,070.00) behind it, at least when compared to his first feature Love Is Colder Than Death (1969) or even his mid-period masterpiece Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974). Like his Vladimir Nabokov adaptation Despair (1978), Lili Marleen was shot in English despite the fact that the director did not know the language, not to mention the fact the film is based almost entirely in Germany and Switzerland. Undoubtedly, one of his most commercially successful cinematic works, Lili Marleen also enabled Fassbinder to reach a new, more philistine inclined audience due to its rather formulaic persuasion, at least for a Fass-bande film, even if it featured a less than 'happy' Hollywood ending and a conflicting moral compass. Still, Lili Marleen had enough National Socialist eye candy to keep me reasonably entertained and Hanna Schygulla never looked so blatantly bewitching as the salacious singer who inevitably uses and abuses her star-power to survive the Third Reich in relative comfort and seductive style, even if she is unable to enjoy it because her kosher companion is nowhere to be found.

Wee and wild Willie (Hanna Schygulla), a born seductress, knows how to play both sides of the game. The romantic lover of a rich Swiss Jew named Robert Mendelsson (Giancarlo Giannini) – a man whose wealthy family is deeply involved with the Jewish resistance as those that make falsified documents and smuggle assets out of Germany for their fellow Hebrews, not to mention their deeper involvement with the Jewish paramilitary terrorist organization Haganah – Willie finds herself in a peculiar position when she becomes one of the most popular singers in the Third Reich (and all of Europe). Naturally, Robert's father David Mendelsson (Mel Ferrer) – one of the richest Jews in Switzerland – finds Aryanness Willie to be a lady with most dubious intentions, with her German ancestry being "enough" to make him "suspicious" of her. Although Willie admits jokingly that she is "Aryan back to the Stone Age" in terms of racial ancestry, she is genuinely in love with Robert and vice versa, but they picked a most unfortunate time to fall head over heels for one another. Robert's father David goes behind his son's back and uses his quite questionable political influence (i.e. money) to have Willie declared a 'persona non grata' by the Swiss government and an expulsion order is declared so that Willie cannot enter the country, thereupon severing the two miscegenation-celebrating love birds' relationship, at least geographically speaking. Like Schygulla's character Maria Braun in Fassbinder's previous cinematic success The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979), Willie's separation from her Yiddish beau only strengthens her motivation to go on with her rise to fame paralleling the upsurge of wartime chaos in Europe. Needless to say, Willie displays a real 'triumph of the will' to be able to juggle her rise to Nazi fame as a fascist diva with her rebellious reputation for rabid Rassenschande ("race defilement") and rampant racial treason due to her love for Robert and behind-the-scenes activity with the Jewish resistance. Both Udo Kier (as "Drewitz") and R.W. Fassbinder (in an uncredited role as "Gunther Weissenborn"; Führer of the Jude resistance) play members of the shadowy Jewish Underground. Interestingly, upon superficial glance, there seems to be no innate difference between members of the Jewish resistance and members of the Gestapo in terms of their dapper fascistic leather-clad dress style and dubious conspiratorial actions as Willie soon learns herself, but the same can be said of the numerous unknown soldiers from both the Axis and Allied powers, who look to the song "Lili Marleen" for a few moments of solace in between bloodshed and brutality.

LILI MARLEEN

At the conclusion of Lili Marleen, it seems that only the Zionist international network has won the war with Willie's romances having withered into bitter resentment, the Jewish Mendelsson family coming out of the war completely unscathed and more prominent and powerful than ever, and with many of the 'good German' characters corpses rotting away in a far off land, Fassbinder's dark wartime romance is not an uplifting cinematic affair, thereupon putting it in bitersweet synchronicity with the song that guides the film's dispiriting essence. Although I thought absurdist German auteur Christoph Maria Schlingensief was playing another preposterous prank when he argued in the documentary Christoph Schlingensief und seine Filme (2005) that he believed Fassbinder was more influenced by the campy melodramas of Nazi filmmaker Veit Harlan than the Hollywood melodramas of Danish-German filmmaker Douglas Sirk, the aesthetic influence of the man who directed the National Socialist arthouse flick Opfergang (1944) is more than obvious in Lili Marleen, especially during the 'Strength Through Joy' party scene where determinedly decadent Nazi officers take a ride down a figurative slide of doom, not to mention the Third Reich style inter-titles and Harlan-esque set-designs featured throughout the film. Writing-off the Nazi Party itself as something akin to a big show business act of sorts as especially epitomized in a number of Riefenstahl-esque rally-like performances given by protagonist Willie, Lili Marleen is hardly the sort of World War II film you would expect Hollywood to produce, even if it is Germany's cinematic equivalent to such a fundamentally formulaic style of film, albeit riddled with Fassbinder's pronounced pessimism of strikingly Spenglerian proportions, thus it should be no surprise that the reluctant Nazi singer meets her Jewish beloved on 'Oswald Spengler Street' during a happy yet hopeless scene where the two lovebirds temporarily reunite and make love. One almost must appreciate the irony of a scene in Lili Marleen where Willie's Nazi handler mentions that despite the fact that Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels feels that the singer's popular song lacks "the spirit of National Socialism," the tragic tune was enjoyed by no less "6 million German soldiers" via Radio Belgrade.

On why Fassbinder refused to portray Jews as exclusively honorable and holy characters as Hollywood and most of modern German cinema does, he stated in an interview: "I think that the constant practice of making Jews taboo, which has existed since 1945 in Germany, can lead to an antipathy towards Jews, especially with young people who have no direct experience with Jews. As a child, whenever I met a Jew, someone whispered to me, that's a Jew, act polite, be friendly... I was never able to think that was a correct attitude... philo-Semites are anti-Semites who love Jews... I cannot say I am not unaffected about what happened to the Jews in the Third Reich. But I am absolutely more unaffected than those who are attacking me." As for why Fassbinder portrays the Jewish underground, especially those tied with the Mendelsson family, as two-faced Zio-Gangsters of sorts, a statement he made in another interview offers possible insights: “The Bourgeoisie needed the Jews in order to stop despising its own attitudes, to be able to feel proud, important and strong. The final result of such subconscious self-hatred was the mass annihilation of the Jews in the Third Reich. It was really an attempt to weed out what people didn’t want to acknowledge in themselves. This relationship means that in some way the history of the Germans and the Jews is linked for all time, not just during the period from 1933 to 1945. Something like a new original sin will be passed on to people who are born and live in Germany, a sin that is not less weighty because the sons of the murders now wash their hands in innocence.” As depicted in Lili Marleen and countless other films Fassbinder directed over the years, especially during his late period, the anti-fascist filmmaker certainly carried this supposed burden of “original sin,” albeit quite antagonistically, thus the importance of his films historically and culturally, especially when combating the one-sided kosher propaganda of Hollywood.

When I first attempted to view German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's fortieth and antepenultimate film Lola (1981)—the concluding historical chapter of the director's BRD Trilogy, following The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) and Veronika Voss (1982), which focused on the West German Wirtschaftswunder ("economic miracle") of the 1950s—I honestly could not get into it and found it hard to believe that such a seemingly soft and fluffy work is oftentimes regarded as one of the late great filmmaker's minor masterpieces. And, indeed, upon its initial theatrical release, Lola was a commercial and critical flop and inspired the producers to cut their losses by not producing Fassbinder's ultimately unrealized film project Cocaine, a drug-related work that would have been surely interesting, if not depressing, considering the way the director lived his remaining years and eventually died. Of course, like virtually every Fassbinder film—whether I liked it or not upon my initial viewing—I decided to give Lola a second look recently and, somewhat to my surprise (I don't typically change my mind about a film), I found myself simply captivated by the jovially cynical kraut 'romantic comedy' that is Lola, a festive and kaleidoscopic anti-celebration of capitalist corruption during the last years of the Adenauer era (1957-1958) set in a town with two very different yet intrinsically connected worlds: the everyday and seemingly ordinary business realm and the seedy and sleazy whorehouse that acts as the town's power elite's own personal pleasure dome. Loosely based on Josef von Sternberg's The Blue Angel (1930) aka Der blaue Engel starring Marlene Dietrich and its source novel Professor Unrat (1905) written by Heinrich Mann (Thomas Mann's older brother), Lola centers around the timeless tale of an outsider and his interaction with a new group in a new area and said outsider's transformation as a result of his ultimately life-changing experiences, which, as one can expect from a Fassbinder film, involve corruption and dehumanization of a once noble and virtuous fellow who falls not only prey to capitalistic 'birds of prey,' but also his own unchallenged weaknesses as a traditional Prussian aristocrat with a positively pristine moral compass. Of course, compared to The Marriage of Maria Braun and Veronika Voss, both of which conclude with major characters dying horrible and unnatural deaths, Lola ends on a semi-happy, if not socially deleterious, note that will be totally inexplicable to the average American filmgoer and brings validation to Fassbinder's telling claim that, "A good director can contrive a happy ending that leaves you dissatisfied. You know that something is wrong—it just can't end that way." Indeed, had it been one of Fassbinder's earlier works, the protagonist would have surely 'run amok' in the end, but far from the aesthetically static and minimalistic cinematic Godardian works of the filmmaker's formative films, Lola is a celluloid cabaret of luscious carnal colors clearly inspired by the director's #1 favorite film The Damned (1969) aka La caduta degli dei directed by Italian maestro Luchino Visconti, as well as the popular Hollywood melodramas of Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk. A quasi-nihilistic condemnation of moral corruption, social cowardliness, and corporate cronyism in post-Nazi 'democratic' West Germany, Lola is, aside from a meticulously stylized period piece, a carefully cultivated key to the past that lets the viewer know how the nation culturally devolved into the materialistic Americanized land that no longer has poets and thinkers, even if for a time they had great and groundbreaking filmmakers like Fassbinder himself.

During the first couple moments of Lola, one gets a very good indication of the film's feisty female title character and her weltanschauung, as a capitalistically wanton woman who, to quote Oscar Wilde, "knows the price of everything and the value of nothing." After her beta-male friend reads some melancholy poetry to her, Lola (played by Barbara Sukowa, who played a radically different 'angelic' streetwalker in Fassbinder's masterpiece Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980), which won the new star the German 'best young actress' Award)—the girl with the "sweetest ass in all of NATO"—complains that she does not like it because it is not funny and when her comrade remarks that "poetry comes from the soul" and "the soul is sad," she proudly and stoically states, "For me, the mind knows more than the soul" and as a professional whore who sells her flesh to every bigwig in her town, she is certainly not bullshitting. The cabaret whorehouse that Lola sings, dances, and sells her sweet sex to is owned by a certain 'construction entrepreneur' named Schuckert (played by perennial filmic 'boorish bad buy' Mario Adorf), a man who also essentially owns the young feline-like flesh-peddler and provides financial support to her mulatto bastard child, which the girl's mother raises. Not only does Herr Schuckert own Lola, who arrogantly but rightfully describes as his "private whore," and the cathouse, but he is also essentially the secret ruler of the small West German town, Coburg, that has made him rich and even tells the local mayor what to do, but his ruthless rule is ultimately threatened when an idealistic and morally pristine East Prussian aristocrat named von Bohm (Armin Mueller-Stahl) comes to the area to work as its building commissioner. Luckily for Schuckert, von Bohm basically falls in love at first sight with his Mistress Lola not knowing that his romantic interest lives a double life as a raunchy femme fatale who knows how to put a spell over any man. Unbeknownst to him, von Bohm takes residence in a home where Lola's mother's (Karin Baal) works as a housekeeper, which is also occupied by a race-mixing American negro soldier (played by Fassbinder's one-time flame Günther Kaufmann, the real-life product of a black American G.I./white German woman relations). Before von Bohm arrives in town, the only one that puts a resistance to Schuckert and his cronies' shenanigans is a cowardly cuckold named Esslin (Matthias Fuchs) who follows the writings of anarchist Mikhail Bakunin yet considers himself a "humanist" and "rejects revolution", thus he puts up no real fight at all, but that does not stop him from telling the new building commissioner about the town's parasitic power elite. A small man on the totem pole among Schuckert's crooked crew who moonlights as a drummer at the cabaret at night and who seems to love Lola too yet is too intrinsically cowardly and weak to seriously pursue her, Esslin's pseudo-subversive political persuasion seems to be more a reaction to resentment and his failure as a man as opposed to a serious form of idealism, but he gets his revenge on Schuckert and company by taking the unsuspecting von Bohm to the local whorehouse one night, where the priestly Prussian learns that not only is Lola a two-faced prostitute who led him to believe that she was a cultivated girl of class into East Asian art, but also that every member of the town's ruling class, including the mayor, is a dedicated degenerate. Von Bohm begins to lose it and openly plots revenge against Schuckert and his minions by revealing the corrupt business contracts, insider trading, and bribing of politicians that has been going on for some time, but deep down inside, his heart is screaming for Lola. Finally, Schuckert—a proud prole who got rich quick via the “economic miracle” but never lost his charmingly vulgar character—confronts Von Bohm and tells him to go to Lola and “do whatever you want. She's a whore.” A broken man with nothing to lose, von Bohm takes Schuckert's advice, goes to the whorehouse, and takes Lola to bed, but instead of sexually ravaging her, he cries like a cowardly cuck, which brings utter joy to the prostitute as she realizes he is the first man in her life to actually love her and not see her as a pricey piece of ass. In the end, von Bohm is internally eaten by the town's corruption, but finds solace in it and marries Lola, who naturally spends her honeymoon screwing her #1 customer/business partner Schuckert.

In a somewhat recent interview included as an extra feature with Criterion Collection DVD release of Lola—part of the The BRD Trilogy box-set they released—star Barbara Sukowa state of her parents' generation that they were, “Absolutely traumatized people. They had seen the films of the openings of the concentration camps...but they also themselves had incredible losses...and, uh...they were the perpetrators...and I can't even imagine what it meant to deal with all that.” Indeed, the character she played in Lola is clearly, like Maria Braun of The Marriage of Maria Braun, someone who has been irreparably spiritually and emotionally damaged by the Second World War and has traded in their femininity, humility, happiness, and even self-respect just so she could survive, which she did quite well as a sort of ‘feminist by circumstance’ who used her body, the only thing she had left to barter with, to turn herself into an almost cannibalistic businesswoman and fierce femme fatale who has learned every titillating trick of the trade when it comes to seducing men, be they dorky anarchists or old fashioned aristocrats with seemingly unconquerable moral characters. A woman whose father was killed in battle in Stalingrad during the Second World War and who birthed a bastard mulatto (one can only assume how/why this happened), Lola, like many German women of her generation, had to make the decision whether to live in desperation (or worse, simply die) or utilize her best and most highly desirable asset—the “sweetest ass in all of NATO”—to live a life of security and, albeit disgraceful and degrading, relative success. While critics have oftentimes described Fassbinder as an overt misogynist and woman-hater due to his somewhat unflattering cinematic depictions of women, it is clear while watching Lola that he empathizes with this seemingly sociopathic whore, giving her a voice without condemning or whitewashing her, but portraying her as a tragic child of circumstance who triumphed in the end, even if it was probably not the way she dreamed of as an undefiled and pre-disillusioned little girl.

Interestingly enough, the main villain of Lola, Schuckert, is not an ancestrally blessed blueblood who was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, but a proud proletarian who has no problem flaunting the fact that he loves big boobs and butts, beer, and belligerent behavior, thus highlighting the fact that the desperation in West Germany following the second World War enabled the opportunity for some of the most parasitic and barbaric individuals to profit greatly and become members of the ruling class, which also acts as an enthralling indictment on democracy and capitalism of itself. Of course, this is a common theme in much of Fassbinder's oeuvre, which probably reached its most controversial and totally taboo extreme in In a Year of 13 Moons (1978) aka In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden where a good Aryan orphan boy grows up to be a melancholy and mixed-up butcher who tragically falls in love with and has a sex-change for a rich and seemingly evil Jewish holocaust survivor turned black market bootlegger turned ‘legitimate businessman,’ who only laughs at and rejects his ‘dick-less’ ex-lover after learning of his dramatic life/body-altering operation, thus highlighting the sort of callous and cutthroat sort of individual that it takes to compete in a capitalist society, especially during a depression, but also the sort of unscrupulous and morally unhinged individual it takes to survive a concentration camp. Undoubtedly, the melodramatic and thematic genius of Lola, as well as much of Fassbinder's work, was not only to ask, but also answer the questions no one seemed even interesting in acknowledging, let alone studying, in regard to how modern day Germany came to be the economic powerhouse it is today after the nation was totally destroyed after the Second World War.

German-Jewish theatre/film director Peter Zadek (I'm an Elephant, Madame, Ice Age), who Fassbinder dedicated The Marriage of Maria Braun to and even gave a cameo role to as an old filmmaker in Veronika Voss, also directed his own pseudo-kraut comedy based on the “economic miracle.” Made in tribute to Fassbinder shortly after his premature death via drug overdose, Zadek's The Roaring Fifties (1983) aka Die wilden Fünfziger is a totally kosher Hollywood-like sex comedy featuring countless tasteless quasi-exploitation scenes of naked (and mostly ‘mature’) women and a number of scathing scatological Hebraic jokes, including a references to SS leader Heinrich Himmler's chicken farm (which the film's protagonist makes a monetary killing on!) and the Nazi fetishism of certain American politicians. Featuring Juraj Kukura—a tall, dark, handsome and totally un-Aryan Slovak Clark Gable-clone—in the lead role, The Roaring Fifties is really just a potent, but ultimately forgettable, piece of evidence regarding how Fassbinder artistically eclipsed his much older hero Zadek, a man the filmmaker once described as “one of those who shattered the ossified way of life that THE MARRIAGE OF MARIA BRAUN describes. From a certain point on, Zadek was also very important to me, as a person, as someone to talk to. It liberated me a bit to know there was someone around who was over fifty and completely set in his way and then changed himself so totally.” Although arguably the weakest chapter in the BRD Trilogy, Lola is still one of the greatest films ever made about the West German “economic miracle” as it ingeniously depicts the spirit of an entire degenerate generation via a melodramatic microcosm featuring the unlikely relationship between a morally pristine and socially respectable Prussian aristocrat that represents Germany of the old and his fateful interaction with a cute and corrupt call-girl who acts as an unflattering archetype for what is now described as a ‘modern’ and independent German woman. Ironically, as American film professor Jane Shattuc documents in her study Television, Tabloids, and Tears: Fassbinder and Popular Culture (1995), were it not for Germany’s defeat in the Second World War, triumph of democracy and capitalism in West Germany, and the subsequent Wirtschaftswunder, it is rather unlikely that someone like Fassbinder—an unrepentant, miscegenating homosexual libertine—would have been able to not only become the Fatherland’s most famous and popular post-WWII filmmaker, but be a filmmaker at all, thus making the master of Teutonic melodramatics an unpredictable consequence of the very phenomenon and political system that he spent his entire career criticizing, yet artistically and monetarily profited from greatly. That being said, Maria Braun, Lola, and Veronika Voss can be seen as not only female characters that Fassbinder could relate to, but also transsexualized cinematic alter-egos where he could cinematically live out the fantasies that he wanted to live out in real-life, but could not as an overweight biological man with acne scars and an unflattering semi-Asiatic appearance.

THEATER IN TRANCE

Rainer Werner Fassbinder° (1981)

Technically, German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's antepenultimate film was the rarely-seen documentary Theatre in Trance (1981) aka Theater in Trance aka Theatre in Trance: Ein Film In 14 Teilen, an ethereal and poetic 91-minute celluloid document covering the 1981 'Theaters of the World' (aka "Theater der Welt 1981") that took place in Cologne, Germany on the Rhine. Covering an event that included over 30 different theater/dance groups (including Het Werktheater, Squat Theater, Sombras Blancas, Kipper Kids, Jérôme Savary, Yoshi Oida, etc.) from 15 different countries who gave over 100 performances over a two week period, and told in 14 fragmented yet seamlessly woven segments, Theater in Trance is more of an avant-garde tribute to theater and a call for truly anarchic theatrical art than a simple report document of the Theaters of the World event. On top of being one of Fassbinder's rarest films (it has yet to be released in the United States in any form), Theater in Trance, which was commissioned for West German television channel ZDF and shot on a handheld 16mm camera, also has the distinction of being the only documentary the auteur made, but of course, it is by no means a conventional documentary (in fact, Fassbinder's Danish filmmaker friend Christian Braad Thomsen described it as more of an 'anti-documentary'). Featuring typically monotone narration by Fassbinder himself of excerpts from his poet/playwright hero Antonin Artaud's collection of essays The Theatre and Its Double (1938) aka Le Théâtre et son Double—an iconoclastic assault on modern Occidental theater and art that expresses the importance of Europeans to develop an atavistic awakening and recovering "the notion of a kind of unique language half-way between gesture and thought"—Theater of Trance is essentially an eclectic collection of 14 theatric tableaux that the filmmaker felt were worth preserving (and, in some instances, potentially mocking). Indeed, ranging from theatric performances of a fellow declaring that he "feels like Adolf Hitler" to primitive African dancing, Theater in Trance has a strikingly oneiric stream-of-consciousness essence where the images sometimes seem in stark contrast to Fassbinder's readings, as if the filmmaker was attempting to express his agreement with Artaud in regard to the current degenerate state of European theater and the need to destroy and rebuild it. As a work directed by a man who got his start in theater and once stated, "In the theatre I stage things as if it were a film, and then shoot films as if it were theatre," Theater in Trance acts a sort of mixed-medium esoteric celluloid metapolitical manifesto on not only theatre, but cinema and cultural politics as well. Indeed, the tone of Theater in Trance can probably be best summed in a scene where Fassbinder narrates the following words to images of naked women in what seems to be a sanatorium for the mentally deranged: "The theater, like the plague, is a crisis which is resolved by death or cure. And the plague is a superior disease because it is a total crisis after which nothing remains except death or an extreme purification. Similarly the theater is a disease because it is the supreme equilibrium which cannot be achieved without destruction. It invites the mind to share a delirium which exalts its energies and we can see that from the human point of view the action of theater, like that of plague, is beneficial for impelling men to see themselves as they are, it causes the mask to fall, reveals the lie, the slackness, baseness, and hypocrisy of our world."

Undoubtedly, Theater in Trance begins charmingly enough with a satirical scene of theater bigwigs and wine-sniffing kraut cultural bosses being served champagne and whatnot by butlers to the soothing Teutonic technocratic sounds of "Computer World" by Kraftwerk, but not before the following words are narrated, that theatre (and, in turn, cinema), "never goes so far as to ask itself whether this social and intellectual system might not be based on injustice through pure chance. But I say that this present state of society is unjust and worthy of destruction." Of course, being set during the post-counter-culture era, Theater in Trance is packed with subversive and sometimes sacrilegious theatric performance that ranges from simple nudity of the high-camp sort to all-out scatological performances of the literally infantile ass-licking-and-fingering sort. Among other things, the documentary features Jack Smith-esque diva shows, countless unmanly men in drag, bodacious negro dancing performed by muscular black broads sporting aesthetically repellant neon tights, adult women pretending to be little girls while riding mini-tricycles, pseudo-cripples being wheeled around in wheelchairs as if in a drag race, pretentious art-punk-noise performance art, and cyber-punk instillations that seem to be taken straight out of Kamikaze 89 (1982); the final film Fassbinder starred in. In one rather amusing segment, a degenerate Brit with an Uncle Adolf mustache of the theater group the Kippers Kids (co-founded by Martin von Haselberg, the husband of Bette Midler) self-righteously declares, "The reason we really came here tonight is that we want to have an intellectual discussion about what is theater and what is not theater. What is art and what is not art," only seconds after his female partner shoves an object up his ass. From there, the Kipper Kid has his ass wiped and licked by his partner and the two proceed to get messy Viennese Actionist style. Although Fassbinder mumbles words in a seemingly apathetic manner, one gets the impression he considers the Artraud's writings to be the holy writ of both theatre and cinema. This becomes especially apparent by the fact that he tends to repeat the same passages, with the following words seeming to be the most imperative text: "Either we return all the arts to a central position, a central necessity and find an analogy between a gesture in painting or in the theatre and the gesture of the lava in the catastrophe of a volcanic explosion, or we must stop painting, gabbling, writing and anything else." In the final performance of Theater in Trance in a rather wayward work entitled 'Andy Warhol's Last love' performed by a group called Squat Theatre (started by Hungarian Jewish refugees who had a hard time correctly practicing social realism), the corpse of Red Army Faction cofounder/far-left-wing terrorist Ulrike Meinhof is sexually ravaged in her jail cell by an alien and transported to a revolutionary planet where she is ordered to do the following: “The intergalactic 21st revolutionary committee sentences Andy Warhol to be shot for his merits. The sentence is to be carried out instantly. The intergalactic 21st revolutionary committee designates Ulrike Meinhof to carry out the death sentence.” Rather fittingly, the documentary concludes with Artaud’s words: “Only in the acting out of a temptation, in which life has everything to lose and the spirit has everything to gain, can the theatre regain its specific meaning.”

Aside from Theater in Trance, Fassbinder would pay tribute to his hero Antonin Artaud with Satan’s Brew (1976) aka Satansbraten, which opens with a curious quote from the playwright, as well as Despair (1978), which was dedicated to the Greek-French mad man of theater. As demonstrated by a good portion of his films, but especially World on a Wire (1973) aka Welt am Draht, Satan’s Brew, and Despair, Fassbinder was obsessed with the idea of the double/shadow/doppelganger, so it should be no surprise he included the following quote from Artaud in Theater in Trance: “Every real effigy has a shadow which is its double, and art must falter and fail from the moment the sculptor believes he has liberated the kind of shadow whose very existence will destroy his repose.” Not surprisingly considering it was the enfant terrible’s only celluloid excursion in documentary cinema, Theater in Trance is in many ways Fassbinder’s most bizarre and idiosyncratic work and probably his most revealing film in terms of expressing his particular artistic Weltanschauung, which certainly owes more to Artaud than kraut commie Brecht. That being said, the documentary is no mere completist work as I initially assumed but essential viewing for serious Fassbinder fans. Probably only comparable to his Swiss friend Daniel Schmid’s documentary The Written Face (1995) aka Das geschriebene Gesicht—a nonlinear ‘dream documentary’ about Japanese Kabuki theater—Theater in Trance is more of a hypnotic ‘experience’ than anything, but one with actual ‘intellectual’ meat to it that demands just as much visceral soul as grey matter, or as Fassbinder once stated himself, “it is not thinking but dreaming that broadens life.” Mixing the Vietnam War, Warhol, Meinhof, Kraftwerk, and art-punk, Theater in Trance holds up remarkably well today as a nonlinear document of cultural debris and it is undoubtedly all thanks to Fassbinder’s innately anarchistic yet highly personalized approach to the typically aesthetically sterile documentary form. During Theater in Trance, an unnamed female narrator speaks the following line: “The thick-skinned Germans sleep in their bottomless pride.” While that line might be an attack against an entire people, he also leaves the prophetic line for himself: “Dying is an art like everything. I can do it particularly well.”

Querelle was the last film directed by legendary German New Waver Rainer Werner Fassbinder before his too early death via cocaine and sleeping pills overdose. The film's source material comes from the novel of the same title by famous gay French writer and criminal Jean Genet. The film follows Querelle who is a sailor and gay serial killer looking for love in all the wrong places. The world that he lives in looks like a gay bar from hell, with skies of fire and phallic architecture throughout. Querelle's world doesn't feature any limp wristed faggots, but a variety of "village people" style masculinity that would make Kenneth Anger blush in excitement. Gay Sodomasochism is one of the most common events to be found in Querelle as it was in R.W. Fassbinder's real-life. The wardrobes and occupations of the men found in the film seem to take inspiration from The Wild One featuring Marlon Brando, Kenneth Anger's Fireworks and Scorpios Rising, and even Jean Genet's own short film Un Chant d'Amour. One knife fight featured in Querelle, a disgruntled lesbian feminist would undoubtedly call Phallogentric, reminded me of the one featured in Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause between James Dean's character and his revival. I find all these various influences of Querelle to be ironic as Fassbinder was known for writing and directing his own originally tragic dramas. Querelle makes for an odd film for the fatalistic director to end his career. Querelle is not the type of homosexual film that Hollywood would want the mainstream audience to see. Ang Lee's gay "taboo breaking" hit Brokeback Mountain left the impression of American audiences that most gay men are longing for love just like heterosexuals. The reality is that most gay men are mostly prone to "slutty behavior." Furthermore, they are known widely to be pathological liars, con men, and reject all forms of morality due to a natural habit of self-concealment, and leads to a stubborn self-deception about one's own gayness and it's implication, as noted in scholar Henry Makow's most recent book. Querelle presents a world very close to these subversive and sadistic characteristics. Dr. Makow's recent anti-feminist masterpiece Cruel Hoax: Feminism & The New World Order goes into depth about the Hollywood lies surrounding Homosexual "morality" and related topics. Serial Killer Jeffrey Dahmer, Nazi SA Leader Ernst Röhm, and the sick NAMBLA pedophiles that promote the infiltrating of Boy Scout groups to molest young boys for gay recruitment, aren't looking for "normal" love. All gay men aren't psychos that lack morals but it's important to acknowledge the reality of things as the Luciferians that run Hollywood so aggressively try to cover-up. I wouldn't have a problem with Hollywood if it decided to put films out like Tom Kalin's Swoon and Fassbinder's Querelle for mainstream viewing. Both of these films are masterpiece works of art that lack any type of hidden agenda. You aren't going to find a half Bavarian/half black towering homosexual sodomizing a young killer sailor in the next Hollywood gay film. Of course, with all the degeneracy so often promoted in Hollywood, a scene like this will be no big thing from American audiences. The next thing Hollywood will be trying to promote is films about pedophilia, showing it as perfectly normal and those that don't accept will be labeled "NAZI BUTCHER KILLERS!!!" Querelle is a fine art piece of sado-masochistic expression. A film that radiates both colorful sets and even more colorful(not literally) individuals. French Actress Jeanne Moreau(Jules et Jim) plays the role of a lady that runs by the name Lysiane who sings a song throughout Querelle with the lines "Each Man killing the thing he loves." These song lyrics become the most apparent theme of the overall film. A theme in which Querelle, a buffed up looking James Dean, would ultimately torture his life. The ending of Querelle is as "happy" as such of it's nature can be.

VERONIKA VOSS

Rainer Werner Fassbinder^o (1982)

New German Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's penultimate film, Veronika Voss (1982) aka Die Sehnsucht der Veronika Voss aka The Longing of Veronika Voss – a black-and-white neo-noir work that is just as much a tribute to old school UFA Teutonic melodramas as it inspired by Billy Wilder's film noir masterpiece Sunset Boulevard (1950) – is also the second film in the director's BRD Trilogy (films set in Bundesrepublik Deutschland over three decades following World War II), sandwiched in between The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) and Lola (1981). Loosely based on the tragic life of German actress Sybille Schmitz (Carl Th. Dreyer's 1932 phantasmagorical masterpiece Vampyr, the forgotten 1943 Nazi masterpiece Titanic), who as a prominent diva of the National Socialist silverscreen, was blacklisted after the conclusion of the Second World War and found it virtually impossible to obtain lead roles. Naturally, sassy Schmitz's erratic behavior and wayward affairs with both men and women only further compounded her problems with the German film industry. No longer a celebrated starlet, but more like a damned diva, Schmitz did what many non-working actors do during downtime by drowning her tears with alcohol, but things only got worse as time passed and depression weighed her down, even resulting in suicide attempts and a stay at a mental institution. Schmitz eventually found herself an 'angel of death' from Munch in the form of a criminally-inclined physician who sold her morphine at absurd prices, and when the actress could no longer fund her nasty habit, the good doctor assisted her in predictable suicide, which is ironic considering that in the last film she starred in, Das Haus an der Küste (1953), she portrayed a character who also committed self-slaughter due to all-consuming despair. Fassbinder's Veronika Voss more or less portrays a similar scenario with Fassbinder's naked and nihilistic melodrama, but what makes the film an especially standout work is that the director attempted to stylize the miserable melancholy melodrama in a manner during the UFA eras from when Sybille Schmitz worked as an actress as a mostly metaphysically macabre yet masterfully directed celluloid obituary for a bygone era in German cinema and history. In Veronika Voss, there is no question as to whether or not the star-crossed starlet will die, nor by what method, but when and where.

The year is 1955; exactly one decade after the fall of the Third Reich and the place in Munich. Veronika Voss (Rosel Zech as an 'Ingrid Caven' type), a formerly loved and glorified queen of the UFA silverscreen, is now a shunned has-been who finds herself more concerned with the magical feeling chemical of morphine than the organic high she once obtained by starring in mainstream movies as a prominent celebrity and much-desired sexual icon. During one rainy night after watching one of her old movies in a local movie theater (with Fass-binder making a cameo sitting in a chair in the row above the damaged diva) and running abruptly out of the screening after realizing her own life now mirrors that of the tragic character she once played, Voss encounters a white knight in shining armor named Robert Krahn (East German actor Hilmar Thate in one of his first West German roles); a less than handsome, short and swarthy blue collar sports journalist who does not think twice about saving the blond bombshell from the pain of the rain. Krahn has no idea that Voss is a once-famous movie star, thus the actress is extra impressed that a stranger would help her, confessing to him as they fine dine at a local restaurant, "Let me tell you it was a joy for me that someone should take care of me without knowing I'm Veronika Voss and how famous I am. I felt like a human being again." Of course, being a perennial actress, Voss is only playing a role as a crypto-drug-addict who has essentially given up on life and is now a lost cause, but that does not stop gentlemen Krahn from helping to save a woman in trouble who clearly cannot save herself. Featuring flashbacks to her past life, including the happiness she once had working on film sets with her favorite film director (Volker Spengler) and the slow but steady disintegration of her marriage with screenwriter Max Rehbein (Armin Mueller-Stahl), Voss' life, like West Germany itself, has indubitably rotted rather radically and cannot be replenished to any notable degree.

Not long into their torrid non-relationship, Krahn realizes that Veronika is the dope sick virtual prisoner as an inpatient of a naughty neurologist named Dr. Marianne Katz (Annemarie Düringer) – a lethal lesbian that, like many female sadists/serial killers, uses poison as her method of murder – who keeps the emotionally afflicted actress high on a steady diet of opiates that she also has the power to take away, which she does from time to time so as to speed up the actress' final descent into oblivion. Despite interfering with the personal life of another woman and a rich one at that, Krahn convinces his longtime girlfriend Henriette (Cornelia Froboess) to go to Dr. Katz posing as a doctor-shopping rich woman looking for a negligent physician to provide her with a prescription for morphine, thus obtaining proof of the doctor of death's criminal malpractice. Although Henriette receives the prescription for the narcotics, she makes the mistake of making a questionable phone call right outside her office, thus revealing her cover, so the demented doc has her ran over and killed. Naturally, Robert Krahn shows up with the police, but Dr. Katz has already covered up the murder and Veronika Voss goes along with her opium dealer's charade about not really knowing the sports journalist and would-be-savior. As Fassbinder told his filmmaking friend Frank Ripplow in a 1982 interview regarding Veronika Voss' passive acceptance of her own murder: "She accepts it completely because she knows in any case that the game is played out, there won't be any more variations – that's how I'd interpret it – no major opportunities for variations, and then a person can simply accept the end; there isn't anything left that interests her much."

VERONIKA VOSS

In the Fassbinder biography Love Is Colder Than Death (1987), author Robert Katz wrote: "Veronika Voss, a tight little black-and-white movie with a bite that's hard to forget, would have been, if you had to die young, the film to exit on." While I can understand Katz's reasoning, I personally prefer Fassbinder's final, posthumously released work Querelle (1982) to Veronika Voss any day, not least of all because the Jean Genet adaptation, although riddled with death and human recklessness, seems to be a work directed by a man with a desire to drive on with life, at least artistically speaking. While a sleekly stylized celluloid work that sticks out quite boldly among Fassbinder's diverse cinematic oeuvre, Veronika Voss reeks of a decidedly defeated tone as if directed by a nihilistic filmmaker who has finally accepted death. That being said, it should be no surprise that before working on Veronika Voss, Fassbinder started working on an unrealized film projectable entitled "Cocaine," which he wrote the following proposal for in 1980: "The film Cocaine, based on Pitigrilli, will most certainly not be a film for or against that drug; Cocaine will be a film about the kind of experiences (with specifics) that someone has who constantly lives under the influence of the drug cocaine... In short, the decision in favor of a short but fulfilled life or a long but unaware and on the whole alienated existence will be left entirely up to the audience. My film won't help them at all." Of course, Fassbinder personally opted for the "short but fulfilled life," much like his drug addicted character Veronika Voss, even if his own life personal/artistic life never reached the unbearable lows of the fictional character. After all, for someone who was marking absurd remarks like, "I'd rather be a streetsweeper in Mexico than a filmmaker in Germany," by 1977 – a number of years before his death and the height of his commercial/critical success as a rare famous and world renowned German director – Fassbinder could not have been a truly happy-go-lucky fellow. It should also be noted that Veronika Voss features a subplot about an elderly holocaust survivor named Mr. Treibel (Peter Lühr), who is also a patient of killer Katz, that drowns out his memories of Treblinka concentration camp with the hard stuff. Unlike Voss, who had the time of her life during the Third Reich era, the elderly Treibel is now happily married, but in the end both morphine addicts – who lived inverse lives in terms of the chronology of their chronic metaphysical pain – can no longer cope, thereupon ending up in the same self-prophesied predicament of passing over via poison prescription. Like Fassbinder himself, the two characters undoubtedly reached the point of no return. In regard to both Voss and Fassbinder, the materially-inclined bad buys come out the winners with Katz and her corrupt crew taking over the Diva's assets and Hollywood homogenizing world cinema with big budget blockbusters.

BEVERLY HILLS CHIHUAHUA

"Disney Classic" is a dying term. Since the partnership with Pixar, or maybe before that, Disney took the shortcut to making revenue and creating films for younger audiences by lowering the quality severely. It's apart of a standing theory that something you love as a child stays with you, no matter how corny or horrible it is. It's just something that happens as you age, same as your taste buds skip favorites. Thus began Operation Childhood Pillaging. We had no choice but to stand aside in the sidelines watching Disney making Lion King prequels, sequels, and dequels. Same with Little Mermaid, Sleeping Beauty, Beauty and the Beast, and every other animated masterpiece there is out there. This wretched spawn quickly clogged the Disney library with so many straight to DVD releases that I hold no respect for the company anymore. Not even The Fox and the Hound can save it. To sucker punch Disney once again, I bring to reference the race relations depicted in most of the classic films. Every one has a theme of it, subversive or not. My man Walt must have realized that in order to draw a crowd to his animations; to separate his from the others, he must paint his own caricatures of how he views Asians, Blacks, and Mexicans. In this context, Disney has returned to their ways and targeted Mexicans for this outing of Equator drama. Propaganda has never been so blatant. Mexico as well for that matter. A pristine suburbia with perfect lawns edited seamlessly to show the rolling hills of beautiful Beverly Hills then a quick comparison to the seedy and dirty Mexican landscape. Compare these two places and what you get is a place south of America that has been filmed to look like a petri dish. Sure, colorful characters were produced, but at what cost? Beverly Hills Chihuahua is stenciled in the style of Homeward Bound but with gardeners, sombreros, and burritos. The depicted lead voiced by Nick at Nite favorite George Lopez is a false hero. He isn't the protagonist nor does he have hero blood. He's nothing but a perverted Mexican (dog) who goes through no extremes while the "American" German Shepard does. In the end, the Mexican dog wins the prize he set out for while the "American" paved the yellow brick road for him. Lopez is around for a prime total of 20 minutes tops in which he lustfully mutters senorita and other Spanish nonsense. If Beverly Hills Chihuahua attempted to teach its brainwashed one thing, it's to think low of Mexicans. All stereotypes are portrayed whether it is Mariachi, creepster, Dog-fighting crime lord, or landscapers. Despite having the racial hatred that Disney Classics are so "acclaimed" for, Beverly Hills Chihuahua succeeds in no way, leaving a slimy trail behind its own rear end. One of which that smells surprisingly like Tacos. Beverly Hills Chihuahua is Legally Blonde for latino kids.

BABYLON - IM BETT MIT DEM TEUFEL
BABYLON - IM BETT MIT DEM TEUFEL

Ralf Huettner (1991)

As far as I am concerned, the only great German horror filmmaker of the 1990s was Jörg Buttgerreit (Nekromantik, Schramm) and he was an avant-gardist of sorts who only directed two features during that entire decade before giving up on filmmaking for good (though he has recently made a comeback of sorts, albeit in a somewhat under-whelming way). Of course, aside from a couple notable exceptions over the decades, kraut cinematic horror has been more or less dead since the German expressionist era of the 1920s and 30s, with the 1990s being a particularly pathetic decade for not only what German-French-Jewish film critic Lotte H. Eisner described as the 'Haunted Screen,' but Teutonic cinema in general. Indeed, while the 'socially-conscious-minded' directors of German New Cinema had little interest and use for the genre (though a couple masterpieces, including Lommel's Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (1973) aka The Tenderness of Wolves and Werner Herzog's Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979), were made during that time), the post-Fassbinder era was even worse. One of the few German horror flicks from the early 90s that I did manage to find some marginal value in is the sleekly stylized horror-thriller-drama hybrid Babylon - Im Bett mit dem Teufel (1992) aka Babylon - In Bed with the Devil directed by Ralf Huettner (Texas - Doc Snyder hält die Welt in Atem, Vincent Wants to Sea) and starring Natja Brunckhorst, who is best known for playing the eponymous teenage junky protagonist of the kraut cult classic Christiane F. - Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981). Featuring a fetishism for foul human flesh in the spirit of kosher Canadian auteur David Cronenberg, the phantasmagoric and even sometimes kaleidoscopic aestheticism of Guido giallo maestro Dario Argento, the offbeat and jazz-driven mystery and intrigue of David Lynch, and a twist ending that falls in somewhere between Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) and The Wizard of Oz (1939), Babylon certainly features an eclectic hodge-podge of cinematic influences that transcends horror and borrows everything, ranging from the meticulously stylized pseudo-softcore flicks of Zalman King to even the high-camp of Werner Schroeter, thus making the film of interest to more 'idiosyncratic' cinephiles. Make no mistake about it, Huettner's film is a piece of salacious and sleazy celluloid trash of the rather radical ridiculous sort, yet it is also a charming work of celluloid trash that acts as a reminder that some modernist horror flicks can have a semblance of class and cultivation. The sordid story of a young statuesque nurse with a Nordic build who hooks up with a suave psychopathic salesman of the semen demon sort who impregnates a number beautiful young ladies that ultimately die a miserable death when their wombs explode after the demon seed inside themselves completely fertilizes, Babylon could be described as an allegory for AIDS and other STDs in the post-sexual liberation age, but it is better not to analyze the director's intent, as the film is best enjoyed as a work of reasonably aesthetically pleasing fantasy of the female-flesh-fixating sort.

Opening with a young pregnant lady suffering some sort of complication relating to pregnancy in an opera house while her dubious boyfriend Lothar (played by Dominic Raacke of 45-year-old German TV crime series Tatort and Brian De Palma's lazy 2012 lesbo thriller Passion) checks out some sassy S&M-obsessed chick flashing her big bosoms in a nearby balcony, Babylon immediately lets the viewer know their entering a semi-surreal erotic pandemonium where every human act seems to have some sort sexual connotation. While Lothar's girlfriend is rushed to the hospital that night, she soon dies after her stomach inexplicably explodes. After walking in on a blind lesbian named Sabine Vogt masturbating to a tennis game on TV, protagonist Maria (played by Natja Brunckhorst of Christiane F. and Fassbinder's final 1982 film Querelle)—a reasonably attractive yet somehow single nurse—finds the exceedingly bloody and gore-adorned corpse of the pregnant girl. The next day, Maria goes to the apartment of the dead girl's parents to let them know about their daughter's rather bizarre death, but when she arrives there she notices a Svengali-like salesman, Lothar (Maria has no idea he is the dead girl's boyfriend), attempting to sell the parents worthless crap. The father of the deceased, Herr Czermecki (Gerd Lohmeyer), is a hyper-paranoid Slavic midget suffering from a serious case of small man's complex who accuses Lothar and Maria of being in cahoots together to swindle his family upon hearing the bad news regarding his belated daughter's mysterious death-by-exploding-stomach. In fact, Herr Czermecki completely loses it and pulls out a gun on the two guests, but Lothar manages to snatch the weapon away from the mad little mensch and helps Maria escape from the apartment unscathed. Of course, Lothar is no hero, as a lethally lecherous lady's man who knows how to appeal to women's weaknesses, especially where superficial compliments are concerned.

A rather charming (but not exactly handsome) devil with a moronic goatee in the spirit of Anton LaVey who hits on girls by asking them if they are Swedish (the film seems to insinuate that Germans see their Germanic brothers the Swedes as their racial superiors) and stating such silly things as, "I'll give you wings and fuck you to heaven, sister Maria. You want that? Or should I send you to hell? I can screw you to hell. My prick can do it all," Lothar offers Maria a ride home and before the young lady knows it, she is copulating with the satanic salesman, who pounds her pussy so hard that the raspberry-flavored condom breaks. On top of coercing Maria into sex, Lothar also convinces the nurse of compiling a list with the addresses of all the patients at her hospital so he can come by their home, so as to exploit their sorrow by selling them junk that they do not need, or as he proudly states himself, "the sick are so susceptible." Needless to say, Maria eventually feels bad about exploiting her patients and starts a fight with Lothar that concludes with the premature end of their relationship and the sinisterly suave salesman hatefully stating to the nurse upon leaving her apartment, "pity your tits are so small." Of course, Maria naturally gets pregnant as a result of her rubber-busting fling with Lothar and she eventually convinces her doctor friend Tilmann (Michael Greiling) to perform an illegal abortion on her. Before having her unborn babe vacuumed out of her womb, Maria takes Sapphic blind patient Sabine on a 'date' to an opera house to inform her that a cancerous tumor in her body has become malignant. A visually impaired lipstick lesbian, Sabine wastes no time in attempting to get into Maria's panties, but after learning about her terminal illness, she forgets about feelings for the nurse and opts for committing suicide via self-defenestration. Naturally, Maria is rather disturbed when she sees a piece of Sabine's brains on the ground near where the blind babe committed suicide.

Meanwhile, Lothar begins inseminating other young beautiful women with his deadly gentleman's relish, including Maria's blonde and big-breasted nurse friend Bibi. Lothar charms Bibi the same way he charmed Maria by asking her if she is a Swedish model, as he is a pernicious one-note-wonder of a pick-up artist who need not do much to swoon beautiful yet terribly stupid young women. When Maria finally receives an abortion from Tilmann in what is a rather grotesque scene involving the graphic vacuuming of the protagonist's womb, the mangled aborted fetus manages to escape and ends up in a garbage dump. Shortly after the abortion, Maria witness Bibi's pregnant stomach exploding while the two are driving somewhere and she blames Lothar for her friend's ghastly death. Naturally, with all of her friends dropping like flies, Maria is questioned by the police, with one of the officers even rather rudely asking her, "Are you gay? Are you a lesbian? Sabine Vogt had shaved her private part." Eventually, Maria comes to the conclusion that enough is enough and decides to waste Lothar by shooting him while he is taking a leak in a urinal, but the psychopathic salesman seems to have already succumbed to his own seemingly supernatural STD. After Dr. Tilmann, who is secretly in love with the nurse, helps Maria escape the crime scene, the young lady goes looking for her aborted fetus in a garbage dump and when she eventually finds it, she is sucked into a gigantic womb as if she is being reborn. When Maria awakes from her ostensible rebirth, she finds herself awakening in a hospital bed and being greeted by Lothar of all people. Indeed, Maria has just given birth to her husband Lothar's child and virtually everything that has happened in the film was merely a dream. Of course, Lothar is still revealed to be a scumbag, as he engages in sadomasochistic sex with another woman while talking to his wife Maria, who is still recuperating in the hospital, on the phone. In the end, Lothar states directly to the viewer: "I'm a machine...made from over 100 billion parts. I took 500 million years to mature. Can't you feel it?"

An oneiric celluloid work that is equally aesthetically orgasmic as it is ominous, Babylon may be far from a masterpiece but it is probably better than virtually every Hollywood horror movie that has been released in the two last decades or so. In its depiction of a man who kills every woman that falls in love with him and his leather lechwater, the film seems like a rather loose transexualized reworking of Satanic Teutonic Renaissance man Hanns Heinz Ewers' masterpiece Alraune (1911), which was adapted for film on at least five different occasions (the last adaptation was directed in 1952 by Arthur Maria Rabenalt under the title Alraune aka The Unnatural and starred Erich von Stroheim). Indeed, with its reversal of the gender of the quasi-supernatural sexual predator, Babylon certainly seems like it could have been informed by post-WWII feminist brainwashing, yet the film has too many gratuitous ass and tits shots for me to believe that director Ralf Huettner is some sort of sexually cuckolded cinematic warrior against misogyny and whatnot. Interestingly, leads Natja Brunckhorst and Dominic Raacke were real-life lovers at the time of shooting the film and even had a child together a year before the work was released. Personally, I find Brunckhorst rather unappealing but I barely recognized her in Babylon, as the director managed to direct her from all the right angles, including from behind in a scene featuring her unclad derriere. Of course, those looking for a cheap masturbation aid will probably be disappointed by the work, unless you're a prepubescent boy who gets aroused by seeing a mere mammary gland, as the film is far too silly and, in parts, sickening to act as a sort of celluloid aphrodisiac. Indeed, while the film features scenes that make women's bodies seem like something akin to an Arno Breker statue, Babylon ultimately makes sex and romance seem ridiculous in many respects, especially when it comes to the pathetic figure of the so-called "pickup artist" as depicted by literal sex monster Lothar. Indeed, as Huettner's film demonstrates, if a man has to use exceedingly pathetic bullshit tactics to scam his way into a woman's main vein, he is, at the very least, a disingenuous fellow and possibly a psychopath like antagonist Lothar. Of course, as a work that depicts death-by-gestation, Babylon will probably be the most horrifying to young females, especially of the pregnant sort, and probably should not be viewed by a chick that has had an abortion, as it features a somewhat graphic scene of the protagonist's unborn mutant fetus being sucked out of her womb during surgery. Indeed, a work of racy reproductive horror that is probably the closest thing to a kraut Dead Ringers (1988), albeit nowhere near as sophisticated (but arguably more stylish), Babylon is cultivated celluloid trash with a surprising amount of elegance and dark humor that ultimately reminds the viewer that there are some rare films that manage to straddle the usually fine line between cinematic crud and charm.

FRITZ THE CAT
FRITZ THE CAT

Ralph Bakshi (1972)

Fritz the Cat is the greatest animated film ever conceived via trigger-pull abortion. Robert Crumb, creator of the comic, might loathe it but that's natural during the porting of a form of printed literature to filmic properties. Alan Moore boasts his hatred as does Robert Crumb. These two men are no alike. One writes proper graphic novels lamenting political and societal importance and the other transfers his sexual deviance in the form of crude, rude drawings. Crumb is the father of underground comics while underlings attempt to catch some of his glory, namely Mike Diana. Nothing against the man but I find his artistic style dated and under the weather. After seeing his ridiculous interview in the film Affliction, I found many a bad trait within the cartoonist. With this, I begin my review of Fritz the Cat which in a way, is a review of humanity. Depressing, isn't it? I'd been warned of the pornographic nature of Fritz the Cat upon the dawning of Netflix some odd years ago. My mother told me never to watch both The Rocky Horror Picture Show or Fritz the Cat. I heard only tales of this pornographic cartoon that brought to mind visions of Felix the Cat playing with sex toys. I really didn't know what to expect and once I hit play on the DVD remote, I knew I had a real treasure at hand. The genius of Fritz the Cat is birthed from the twisted mind of fetishist extraordinaire Robert Crumb. The story plays out as Fritz, a cat, eventually tires of the "norms" and would rather live his life by inciting riots and enjoying the power plays of the 60s by consuming tons of drugs and consummating with all the animals he can find, especially Negro bitches. In this fantastical world that's not too far from the truth, there are two classes; cats and crows. Cats are whites, respectably, and crows are the Afro-American folks, obviously. In the vein of classic Disney, "dem" Negroes are portrayed as janky jive-talkers with crumbling shoes and cigars hanging out their shady beaks. Throughout his rebellious phase, Fritz begins to adopt a slave mentality while apologizing for the persecution of blacks and goes on about how he really feels for their suffering and how he loses sleep over the evils of the white man. All until he says "Hey boy!" while requesting an ale from the colored gentleman behind the bar. Just goes to show how hard most college level whites try to assimilate into city cultures. The only mistake this Bakshi directed imagining of Fritz the Cat makes is the self-label of "satire." In question, this so-called sardonic atmosphere is aided by real life scenarios. Had this film been live action, Fritz the White Male might as well have been a documentary on the gutter life of urban citizens. These cognizant depictions of a sub-segregated New York propel the brilliance of Fritz the Cat into unheard of extremes. Crumb was apparently so disappointed with this "embarrassment" of a film that he promptly killed off the character in his comic strip. This was a sad and miserable day for both cinema and comic fans seeing as Fritz the Cat is a highly likable character even if he does wind up in trouble under the wing of Neo-Nazi rabbits and Negro drug lords. To some, Fritz is even a hero of both the effort of war and peace. He ventures out into a malleable world consisting of fornication, semen, titty fucking, reefer indulging, and causing a bit of widespread panic. In his quest that equates with him becoming a fugitive, you too will feel "naughty" watching this film that was unfairly rated X. To incline this gravely important animated performance upon you, the adaptation might not be honorary to the intended theme of the comic strip but in regards to the film's lifespan, Fritz the Cat remains one of the most important films to have ever been created for the sake of racial digression and promised persuasion of prejudice.

Ralph Bakshi (1992)

Being redirected by splashes of classic memories of Cool World, I decided to revisit the sudsy noir-typed gonzo inspirations found within the vault of Ralph Bakshi's return to feature films. After Fire and Ice, it just seemed that Bakshi retired all too soon to the measly slave-tracks that is syndicated television. But before you knew it, a new film was announced to predate the repopulated live-action/animated musings of Space Jam. Cool World stars Brad Pitt before he hit the spotlight with his best roles to date (Kalifornia and True Romance) and Kim Basinger playing herself for the seductive and manipulating Holli Would; lending voice to toon and likeness to "Noid." Imagine my surprise when I discovered this magical land that filled my head with throbbing fetishes as a child turned out to be a spoiled script behind even more rotten directing, not to mention the animated population of Cool World to be less-than-Crumb fantasies of bizarre slapstick and catty chubbies with heaving breasts. Things aren't all bad in Cool World, however as life is cheap and women are even cheaper.

Taking an aimless road, Cool World opens with Frank Harris, a WWII veteran returning home to his lovely Ma with a personal gift to the both, a motorcycle. After one fateful accident minutes later, Frank Harris is thrust into an animated paradoxical world of cigarettes, twisted surreal architecture, and boozy women. Coincidentally, some 40+ years later, an animator played unconvincingly by Gabriel Byrne creates Cool World and is too sucked into some strange, incoherent wormhole that leads to the place of his creating. Funny thing about this is that this portal to Cool World opens on golden opportunities and never without plot progression in mind which connects even more wildly to the theory that Cool World is just the hidden fetishes coming to fruition within a possibly comatose Frank Harris' mind. Once we are introduced to the 3 - 4 re-occurring characters that highlight the faceless world of cool, we are met with a femme fatale blonde bombshell by the name of Holli Would, who kills the shit out of Jessica Rabbit in terms of evoking youthful sexuality to bloom prematurely. Throughout the entirety of the time spent in the radical degeneracy of Cool World, sporadic looped footage of a doodle mob parades slowly across the screen obscuring the sights and sounds that Cool World has to offer. This mental onslaught is yet another cheap tactic that Bakshi employs in what is possibly the worst in his career. The amount of zero mentality looped footage alone is staggering and impossible not to pick up on.

One of the only merits that Cool World has to offer is terrific background visuals in a wild neon mess that houses oversexualized Saturday morning cartoon fodder. The "doodles" in their reverse beat generation are all broad shouldered or teeming with unsubtle cleavage. In regards to the decade of the 90s and the video rental boom, I must digress that Cool World must have had something to do with the current generation's obsession of Japanese animated women and their almost always incestuous relationships. Cool World didn't invent the fanatical subversion of animated fantasy but it sure as hell broke it out into the mainstream by planting seeds within children's minds. For me growing up, the plot of Cool World escaped me. I simply had memories of scrambled scenes that held no continuity other than Brad Pitt smoking and bimbo cartoons. After committing myself to the institution that is Cool World, I feel that this is one of those rare occurrences in which the memories lasting within the stems of past viewings are more favorable than the current result. Re-watching Cool World certainly rotted the core of my past recollection and the only safe tiding I can manage is to envision this film as the inhibitions of a comatose soldier returned home. That certainly spices up the frequent shortcomings and inconsistencies littering this animated abortion.

As with most of Bakshi's work, there are fragments of inspired genius and Cool World is not without these brilliant minerals but treading through the run time seems like an infinite purgatory. Perhaps Bakshi had developed a lazy senility which would certainly explain the looped alienating segments of crude illustrations. Seems as if scrapped storyboards were used as a sensory overload to stimulate the mind into processing all of which this film doesn't offer. But what Cool World does offer is a terrific mondo metropolis realized by screaming and twisted branches mutating off cityscapes. Furthermore, Cool World recycles most of Bakshi's previous successful avant-garde animations e.g. Fritz the Cat and Hey Good Lookin'. Inspired so, the costumes of many-a-citizen of Cool World seemed idealized by that same whisper that Bakshi fell victim to during conception of the 50's extravagance. As it is, this is a venture into live-action/animation that I'd prefer to avoid in favor for the multicultural exploitation that is Space Jam or the more successful greasy noir that is Who Framed Roger Rabbit?. While Roger Rabbit didn't have such gratuitous and delightfully harmful sexuality, it encompassed the desperation and dinginess of film noir so much better than the shattered product of Cool World. In praise to Cool World, it was one of the few examples to reach viral hall of fame with the rare event of "desecrating" the Hollywood sign by constructing a 75 foot tall Holli on top of the letter "D". I suppose the legacy of Cool World is destined to perish among an elusive photograph of such and the bargain begging price of five dollars. To put it rather simply, Cool World is just another disappointing debacle of squandered talent - should have been reserved for art galleries and not cineplexes.

Raoul Servais (1979)

In 1979, Belgian filmmaker Raoul Servais created a short feature entitled Harpya. This little number came about to me in the guise of a friend and a forum thread pertaining to the creepiest videos one could find on the Internet. Raoul Servais has developed a film career of experimental shorts spanning 15 years and won the Palme d'Or at the 1979 Cannes Film Festival for Best Short Film. Surely the sparse acclaim must mean something? Well, in fact, Servais developed the first 35mm outburst of surrealism detracting the nature of feminine creatures. What Harpya discusses with its limpid parable is not a "mythological femme fatale" but a common mistress and the carnivorous aftermath of accepting such into your home. Dario Argento even managed to stretch his presence to encapsulate the same exact schematic for his Masters of Horror: Jenifer. This plot outline isn't exclusive to Harpya though; science fiction writer C.L. Moore brought to light the same dissent towards the parasitic womankind in Shambleau. The dreamy effect of Harpya is captured using front projection: the act of projecting the scenery onto the bodies of the actors in front of a highly reflective surface. Using what also seems to be stop-motion animation, Servais and Švankmajer must have dominated the animated avant-garde scene of the 60s and 70s.

The epicentre of the film isn't the dapper host but the insatiable hybrid of woman and bird. This mythological beast known as the Harpy is a breasted bird of thieving instincts. Within Harpya, the fellow saves the creature from an unknown man strangling her in a fountain. Saving her, he becomes fascinated at her majestic and strange figure, no doubt a victim of cognitive dissonance. The allure must have been held in the breasts, I assume because this was the case for me. After perching the beast on his armchair within his haven. Immediately succumbing to hunger, the man sets out to eat only to have the harpy appear at his side, striking a loud orchestral splurge and drastic lighting changes. The horrors of the household happen in a more subtle aspect to near every man punished with a helpless and immobile significant other. I sit back and listen to the horror stories of lazy liaisons and grin at my fortune. I never get cocky though as I could find myself in the same internal slavery and avoid kinship at most costs. Soon the man's plight grows into a more turbulent force: unable to eat his own food, leave his own house, and having to sneak around. The suffering is become unbearable, donning all 3 of his hats, the man opens his door to have the wrath of the harpy swoop down and devour his legs, a cunning metaphor for the handicap of relationships.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Unable to execute JavaScript.

Harpya is perfect in every way. Being only 9 minutes in length, every scene was exact to a blueprint of absolute narrative. Even the warnings of post-menarche rings through the film. Harpya can also be ingested both intellectually or visually. You don't necessarily have to think of the subversive nature about Harpya, you could just enjoy the feast of lucid lust. A bona fide visual vaccine to ball-and-chain relationships and the wondrous world of abjecting women.

THE WONDERFUL, HORRIBLE LIFE OF LENI RIEFENSTAHL

Ray Müller (1993)

Leni Riefenstahl is without a doubt the greatest female filmmaker to ever live. However, to look at her as merely a woman filmmaker would be a mistake as the majority of female filmmakers are mediocre to say the least. When a film like Cheryl Dunye's degenerate interracial dyke-fest The Watermelon Woman is regarded as an independent film masterpiece by film critics, it is obvious that people have to go out of their way to give female filmmakers the recognition they generally do not deserve. Leni Riefenstahl's 1934 film Triumph of the Will, despite being a ¾ of a century old, is a film of an incomparable aesthetic magnitude, set at a time and place that could never be duplicated. I can only assume that it has always been a little more than irritating for feminists and female filmmakers to realize that the greatest film directed by a woman is a National Socialist (Nazi) "propaganda" documentary. In the documentary The Wonderful, Horrible Life of Leni Riefenstahl the viewer receives an incredible portrait of an 89 year old Leni Riefenstahl and her amazing career as the world's greatest female filmmaker.

Beautiful

Athletic and Courageous

Despite being 89 years old, Leni Riefenstahl is fairly spunky and energetic in The Wonderful, Horrible Life of Leni Riefenstahl. When annoyed by the inquiries and comments of the documentary director Ray Müller, Leni has no problem telling off a man that looks to be about half her age. In fact, Ms. Riefenstahl starts shaking Mr. Müller after she becomes annoyed by his questions in regards to the first Nazi documentary she worked on, a film that was never finished. Thankfully, Leni also has no problem discussing her acquaintances with the top National Socialists. Beyond elderly Leni becomes enraged when director Ray Müller mentions that in Nazi minister of propaganda's Joseph Goebbels 1933 diary, Goebbels wrote about how Leni Riefenstahl would frequently visit the little doctor. Leni responds she never "put out" for poor Joey Goebbels, although Goebbels attempted many times to have her as his mistress. Leni Riefenstahl was a woman that could have any man she wanted and for some reason I doubt Mr. Goebbels would have been able to please Leni. After all, Leni's later lifelong partner Horst Kettner was 40 years her junior. Leni Riefenstahl should also be recognized as being the queens of the cougars.

One of the biggest complaints thrown against Leni Riefenstahl is that she has a "fascist aesthetic." Yep, you got it, some ugly weakling considers showing muscular, powerful, and beautiful bodies as evidence of visual fascism. To prove one truly has a cultural Marxist "equality aesthetic" they have to make films featuring the most hideous and deformed people in the world as everyone knows that should show a filmmakers commitment to the most important cultural achievement: DIVERSITY! Not only do critics claim that her National Socialist documentaries are “aesthetic fascism”, but they also claim her photos of the African Nubian people of central Sudan are further evidence of her criminal “aesthetic fascism.” I guess it just goes to show how ugly resentful NYC and LA film critics will make any type of pathetic attempt at discrediting the organic beauty right in front of their undeserving squinted eyes.

African Aesthetic Fascism Throughout The Wonderful, Horrible Life of Leni Riefenstahl I was very impressed with Leni’s uncompromising pride and attitude toward her long eclectic career. The only thing that annoyed me was her statement that she is unhappy that she ever made Triumph of the Will. Sure, the film may have blacklisted Leni Riefenstahl as a filmmaker for the rest of her life, but Triumph of the Will also happens to be one of the greatest achievements of cinema history. If your typical filmmaker were to even make one film anywhere near the quality of Triumph of the Will, they deserve lifelong recognition of as a cinematic master of aesthetics. It would have also been a nice “FUCK YOU” to her critics had Leni showed no regret in directing Triumph of the Will. Of course, I am sure Riefenstahl’s early German Mountain film career of Aryan Volk mysticism is enough to repel the typical anti-European critic, a part of Leni’s career that she seems to have no regrets about.

Leni directing director Ray Müller

At around three hours in length, The Wonderful, Horrible Life of Leni Riefenstahl is a long but certainly not banal documentary. The documentary is a portrait of a woman who became the greatest female filmmaker within a supposedly “misogynistic regime.” Despite the claimed sexism against women in National Socialist Germany, Leni Riefenstahl was a woman who excelled within those “misogynistic” social constraints. I can also certainly say that I have never heard of a feminist with even a drop of the talent and strength Leni Riefenstahl radiated. Of course, feminists are typically degenerate women and Leni Riefenstahl was an Aryan Superfrau.

ROSWELL ALIEN AUTOPSY

Ray Santilli (1995)

In the year 1947, a speculated UFO crash rocked the town of Roswell, New Mexico. Since then, Roswell has not only become the poster event of all conspiracies, but has become a pop culture phenomenon; spawning books, movies, a syndicated television series, and even a film. The most popular of all these is the speculated Autopsy tape of an alien being captured by the US Military. Ray Santilli is the "founder" of this archived footage and in the year 2006, revealed that it was actually a reconstruction, almost as Hideshi Hino's Flowers of Flesh & Blood was. The difference between the two is that Santilli claims that the film this is based off actually exists within the footage itself. By the time they had enough money to purchase said film, the humidity had gotten the best of it, and the only survivors were several frames, which he then spliced in the footage. While this being an outrageous claim, I cannot help but to wonder. Some scenes in this tape seem all too real. The Alien Autopsy tape is basically an E.T. Snuff film. We see two men cutting the aliens skin open, providing a glimpse at the weird organ structure of the species. The eyes are all black until later, when they peel off the film covering it to reveal eyes that inspired a creature in the Hollywood sci-fi comedy Men In Black. The set pieces are eerie and bathed in light. The reality factor of it being in black and white doesn't help it's cause considering that color was definitely an option in that year. These men are dressed as if they are going on Iskanov's set of Philosophy of a Knife, except they aren't as sinister in purpose. The skin looks partially real. Latex is visible in some scenes, but i really give kudos to the injured leg. They pull out pieces of shrapnel and debris of the extraterrestrials leg. It's almost cringe worthy. The authenticity of the film, while being said to be a hoax, is still one to ponder over. Kodak photo labs have not verified the time of the tape, however, two frames of film have been. The shots are of a staircase and an open doorway. These have been traced back to the year '47. All in all, the Roswell tape is mystifying and creepy, regardless if it is a hoax or not.

MONDO COLLECTO

Raymond P. Whalen (2006) Documentaries are perfect for documenting things. With this in mind, i will begin to explain the abomination that is this film. Most films, as horrible as they are, have some good things about them. This one has about 2, and this is not enough to notice until the after thought. This documentary slaps the title of "MONDO" on it blasphemously as there is nothing "MONDO" about this film at all. It is narrated by the director with a fez named ROCKN ROLL RAY. I can notice your brows furrowing as we speak. This man takes us through the incredible world of collecting and how boring and hypocritical it can be. Most of the collecting segments are populated by Hippie Jews and over-patriotic douche bags. We see about 5 collections and over 3 collections of nothing. The most interesting were the gun segment and the vintage action figure one. These segments are separated with GO-GO dancing ladies with wigs, ranging from attractive to bag lady. Composed with a shitty score for the scenes, it's easy to get distracted or acquire a headache from this abysmal film. Many of the scenes are viewed as "joke" material. An annoying camera man pissing off the lead singer of IMPALED or IMPALER. I cant remember. The only thing i think this film is worth is the incredible segment with Ted V. Mikels. He is truly a viking lost in time. One thing that i do laugh about when i think back to watching this, was the night where this film made me sick. The scene with the man who has a couple of 8mm films to be exact. I instantly started vomiting and was ill the next day, only to be mysteriously cured with the memory of this film vanishing. I understand this film is supposed to be strange, but it fails. Without the Phantom of Paradise and a man's strange fascination with Pez, this title is best to avoid.

THE BRUTALISATION OF FRANZ BLUM

Reinhard Hauff (1974)

Typically, a left-wing prison flick sounds like a rather revolting prospect as such works are typically created by idiotically idealistic do-gooder types sporting proverbial 'good guy' badges with a seemingly autistic understanding of human nature and who have no concept of reality nor the drastically culturally different people that they self-righteously profess to defend, yet somehow I managed to get into the quasi-commie kraut work Die Verrohung des Franz Blum (1974) aka The Brutalisation of Franz Blum directed by Reinhard Hauff, an auteur who has displayed his solidarity with left-wing activism and commie terrorists with critically acclaimed but not mostly forgotten works like Messer im Kopf (1978) aka Knife in the head and Stammheim - Die Baader-Meinhof-Gruppe vor Gericht (1986). Luckily with The Brutalisation of Franz Blum, Hauff had the help of real-life bank robber turned writer/actor Burkhard Driest (Cross of Iron, Querelle), who not only acted as the lead villain in the film, but penned the script based on his own experiences in prison, thus lending a certain visceral authenticity to the film that would escape bourgeois leftist activist types. Responsible for penning the unreleased Nazi-themed black comedy Son of Hitler (1978) starring Bud Cort and Peter Cushing and playing the pernicious gangster who belittles the title protagonist of Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977), to being accused (but vindicated) of rape in 1980 by German actress Monika Lundi, Driest is undoubtedly lived an interesting life in film and otherwise and his less than sensationalized depiction of prison life in The Brutalisation of Franz Blum seems to ring more true than most prison films. The story of a young man and educated bank employee who drove the getaway car in a bank robbery and who refused to name his co-conspirators, The Brutalisation of Franz Blum shows how a supposedly morally noble yet criminally inclined individual transforms into an authoritarian criminal mastermind as a result of his 'brutalization' via prison corruption, namely that revolving around his fellow inmates. A film that essentially makes the statement that prisons do not "reform criminals" (not shit!) but instead turns them into hard fascists who are willing to use every and any individual and/or underhanded scheme to get his way, The Brutalisation of Franz Blum, like many contemporary works of jailhouse cinema makes a mere critique, but like virtually all idealistic leftist works, offers no real solutions. Starring internationally acclaimed German actor Jürgen Prochnow of Das Boot (1981) and The Da Vinci Code (2006) in one his very first roles, The Brutalisation of Franz Blum is a raw reminder that one probably learns a great deal more about human nature from a prison sentence than from going to college to get impractical knowledge.

Franz Blum (Jürgen Prochnow) has made the mistake of being involved with a bank robbery that will ultimately result in him losing the best years of his life after he is given a prison sentence. During one of his first days in the slammer, Franz cries like a little bitch because he has a migraine and a lanky leftist lunatic intellectual named Bielich (Eike Gallwitz) gives him some aspirin to help. To express his gratitude to Bielich for being kind in an unkind place, Franz acts as a witness after Bielich is attacked by prison bully Walter 'Tiger' Kuul (writer Burkhard Driest), who is carrying on a gay relationship with a man named "Marie" (Lutz Mackensy). Being the undisputed alpha of the prison, Kuul naturally seeks revenge against Franz and beats him nearly an inch away from his life, which inspired the novice convict to make a failed attempt at suicide via slitting his wrists with his trusty razor. After learning that forming a gang can make one's time prison go much smoother, Franz, who joins up with a baker turned child molester named Goh (Karl-Heinz Merz), gets his own criminal enterprise running and in no time, he has countless minions who back him. Unfortunately, although he is not a genius, crazy Kuul is still undisputed Führer of the prison underworld. After drugging Kuul's food via tranquilizers, Franz, who has given up being fair a long time ago, is able to get enough leverage to beat up his Neanderthal-like nemesis. By dealing tobacco, coffee, and other products at a lower rate, Franz soon becomes the king of the jail house, but he soon consolidates even more power after becoming in charge of the prison's sports department. While Franz manages to get everyone on his side, Bielich finds his new behavior absolutely deplorable, that his methods are as "cynical as the system," and threatens to tell everyone about his parasitical ways. To prove he is an equal opportunist and diehard democratic, Franz gives Bielich the platform to make his plans, but the other inmates shout him down, stating things like, "what do you want weirdo?" Of course, Franz's 'scheme' works out as his prison underlings force Bielich, who has a heart condition, to run with them, which ultimately kills the noble anti-fascists. Ironically, Bielich dies in the same spot where Franz originally helped him after Kuul attacks him. Things get even more ironic when Franz is released from prison that same day for "good conduct," thus making his efforts to become the dictator in the prison all in vain.

Beginning as a supposedly sensitive and noble man who is willing to help anyone in need, Franz transforms into a tyrannical dictator who utilizes seemingly unlimited conspiratorial tactics, including screwing over formers and even murder by proxy. Of course, anyone with a shred of common sense, aside from loony liberals, knows that prisons aren't designed to rehabilitate anyone, but are rather used to punish the individual and hopefully get them 'scared straight' enough after their sentence to quit committing crimes. Naturally, being a leftist, director Reinhard Hauff goes one step further by insinuating that prison turns convicts into 'degenerate fascist cavemen' who subscribe to irrationalism, brute force, and collectivism as a form of underworld self-rule. While I certainly would not want to have a stay at the Teutonic prison featured in The Brutalisation of Franz Blum, the prison life featured in the film is not much worse than a high school environment, except with a little bit more extortion, theft, violence, and other related uncivil behavior. Indeed, while the lead antagonist attempts to force Franz to give him a blowjob (he bites his cock instead) and he gets a good beating too, there is no rape, bodily dismemberment, successful suicides, nor gangster prison guards (though they take bribes), no situation featured in The Brutalisation of Franz Blum would have realistically change the protagonist from a "good guy" into a "bad guy" unless he already had such sadistic propensities inside of himself all along, hence his involvement in the bank robbery that landed him in prison in the first place. Undoubtedly, The Brutalisation of Franz Blum is not the HBO prison drama Oz (1997-2003) where nefarious neo-Nazi's rape white alcoholic lawyers and female prison guards begin steamy romances with cons. If anything, The Brutalisation of Franz Blum is interesting because it shows less barbaric prisons, especially those in Europe, during the early 1970s than prisons of today, which are multicultural sewers owned by private companies that train crooks and thieves to turn into murders and gay rapists. The fact that writer/actor Burkhard Driest was able to leave prison and become an esteemed writer and actor and able to be involved with The Brutalisation of Franz Blum without suffering an emotional breakdown just goes to show that director Reinhard Hauff is a neo-marxist pansy who would have probably benefited from a prison stay because, if nothing else, he would have at least developed some testicular fortitude and realized his message with The Brutalisation of Franz Blum is ultimately whiny at best and ridiculously redundant at worse. Jürgen Prochnow would later star in the film Die Konsequenz (1977) aka The Consequence directed by Wolfgang Petersen playing a pederast prison inmate who falls for a 15-year-old lad in a role radically more repulsive than the one he played in The Brutalisation of Franz Blum. Needless to say, one could argue that getting softly sodomized by your elder gentleman lover could be a bit more brutal than getting the shit beat out of you. For the closest thing to a kraut equivalent to the rather underrated American cult prison flick Fortune and Men's Eyes (1971), The Brutalisation of Franz Blum is undoubtedly your best bet, minus the forced anal entry.

KNIFE IN THE HEAD

Reinhard Hauff (1978)

Like kraut Francophile Volker Schlöndorff (A Degree of Murder, The Tin Drum), Teutonic filmmaker Reinhard Hauff (Mathias Kneissl, The Brutalisation of Franz Blum) was a stereotypical left-winger of his age of the innately idealistic sort, so it should be no surprise that probably his greatest achievement as a film director was winning the Golden Bear award at the 36th Berlin International Film Festival in 1986 for his Stammheim - Die Baader-Meinhof-Gruppe vor Gericht (1986) aka Stammheim - The Baader-Meinhof Gang On Trial, a work that acts as a quasi-tribute to the mad Marxist terrorist martyrs of the Red Army Faction and portrays the judges and attorneys as nasty crypto-nazis who are bound to sire a Fourth Reich. While Hauff has never been a particularly well known filmmaker in the United States, his melodramatic celluloid polemic Messer im Kopf (1978) aka Knife in the Head, which was penned by Peter Schneider (Hauff's Der Mann auf der Mauer (1982) aka The Man on the Wall, Margarethe von Trotta's Das Versprechen (1995) aka The Promise), is probably his most well known film among the American arthouse crowd simply due to the fact that it is the only one of the filmmaker's films that has been released here (New Yorker Video released a VHS of the film in 1998). If it were not for the fact that Swiss leading man Bruno Ganz (Wings of Desire, Der Untergang aka Downfall) gave such a 'daring' performance in the film that it is worthy of being compared to his role in Wim Wenders' neo-noir The American Friend (1977), it would be hard for me to recommend anything about Knife in the Head, which not unlike Schlöndorff and von Trotta's banal Heinrich Böll adaptation The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum, or: how violence develops and where it can lead (1975), is not much more than a less than thinly veiled far-leftist rant in solidarity with the RAF and against the West German government and media. And, indeed, like The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum, Knife in the Head also stars masculine leftist pseudo-diva and filmic feminist Angela Winkler (Hunting Scenes from Bavaria, Germany in Autumn) as a bitchy broad who has rather poor taste in both men and politics and goes so far as callously cuckolding her crippled husband. In other words, Rauff is essentially a 'poor man's Schlöndorff' who never achieved the sort of international 'fame and fortune' that his cinematic compatriot did, so it should be no surprise that most of the filmmaker's films have fallen into obscurity. A film about a brainy biogeneticist who gets shot in the brain after a scared kraut cop mistakes him for a terrorist that stabbed him in the stomach, Knife in the Head is a decidedly depressing yet redundantly left-leaning story about a man who is essentially turned into an infant as a result of being in the wrong place at the wrong time and must relearn everything (i.e. walking and talking) and deal with harassment from cops who want to make him a scapegoat so as to hide their own incompetence.

KNIFE IN THE HEAD

Scientist Dr. Berthold Hoffmann (Bruno Ganz) has an annoying bourgeois Marxist 'true believer' wife named Ann (Angela Winkler) and when he goes to pick up his wife at a leftist terrorist political rally that is raided by neo-Gestapo-like police, he is mistaken for a leftist lunatic by a young cop named Schurig (Udo Samel), who was stabbed in the stomach by another terrorist, so he ends up getting shot in the head and losing all the data in his brilliant mind and is thus confined to a hospital bed for the foreseeable future. Meanwhile, wife Ann is carrying on an affair with a pansy commie named Volker (Heinz Hoenig), not to mention the fact that a prick of a policeman wants Herr Hoffmann transferred to a prison hospital, but luckily a caring doctor named Dr. Groeske (Eike Gallwitz) blocks the cop's rather absurd request. Slowly but surely, Hoffmann becomes mobile, learns a couple words, begins feeding himself, and learns to dupe the cops. In one rather repellant scene, Hoffmann, who is wheelchair-bound, is mildly manhandled by a cop and becomes disrobed as a result, so he begins playing with his prick in front of the prick policeman so as to assumedly psyche the cop out. Rather distastefully but humorously, Hoffmann also uses his disabilities as a means to get a young nurse named Angelika (played by Werner Schroeter regular Carla Egerer) to feel sorry for him and ultimately shows\ him her tiny tits. Eventually, Hoffmann gets the gall and upward mobility to escape from the hospital after going incognito in doctor scrubs. Despite being only vaguely articulate and being imprisoned in a spastic body, Hoffmann attempts to go back to work at the "Traut Institute for Genetics," but one of his co-employees notices his brain is not quite right and calls his wife, who picks him up and takes him to the country where the two feebly attempt to rekindle their rather broken relationship. When night comes, a couple cops attempt to arrest Hoffmann for fleeing the hospital, but luckily the brain-damaged biogeneticist's lawyer Anleitner (Hans Christian Blech) has solved all his legal problems already. When Hoffmann finally gets out of the hospital, he is welcomed home with cuckoldry due the fact that his wife's terrorist boyfriend Volker is now squatting there. When Hoffmann ask Volker where his knife is, the commie replies "Here. In your head" (hence, the title of the film!). Extremely irked by Volker's venomous arrogance, Hoffmann finds his trusty knife and approaches his nemesis in a threatening manner, stating, "I'm gonna stab you fucker... You'd like it best if I were dead." Of course, Angela kicks Hoffmann out of his own apartment a second later, but luckily terrorist Volker is later apprehended by the cops. In the end in what is easily the most potent scene of Knife in the Head, Hoffmann goes to the flat of the cop Schurig who shot him and asks the man why he shot him. Schurig tells Hoffmann he is "playing the idiot" and the latter responds with "maybe you were scared just scared. Like me" regarding the incident that left the biogeneticist a cripple. After that, the two men reenact the event that transpired the night Hoffmann was shot, albeit switching roles. Ultimately, Hoffmann gets some piece of mind by threatening to shoot him, smacking him over the head, and making him cry. Of course, his actions are in vain as they will not help him get his wife and job back.

In one of the most unintentionally hilarious scenes of Knife in the Head, one hears a cop read a diary entry written by Hoffmann that states as follows: "The thought of killing yourself is undoubtedly only the reversal of the wish to kill. An American in my situation would probably just shoot blindly out of the window." Indeed, judging by the series of mass-shooting sprees that have occurred in the good ol' United States of America over the past decade or so, Hoffmann's words seem to ring truer today than when Knife in the Head was released well over three decades ago, but that does not change the fact that the film is plagued with carelessly cliché leftist inanities. Of course, considering the reality of innately impotent and ultimately government-strengthening terrorist attacks committed by German terrorist groups like the RAF in West Germany during the 1970s, it seems quite hypocritical for a refined agitpropagandist like Reinhard Hauff to make such claims against America. Indeed, aside from Prussian master Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King, Hitler: A Film from Germany), Fassbinder seemed to be the only filmmaker of his generation mature enough to see the moronic antics of the RAF for what they were. On top of demonstrating that all idealistic revolutions are bound to fail in The Niklashausen Journey (1970) and depicting communist intellectuals as hypocrites who are oftentimes members of the bourgeoisie themselves (albeit, failed members of the bourgeoisie like Marx himself) in Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975), Fassbinder acknowledged with his scathing satire The Third Generation (1979) that the terrorists merely empowered not only the German government, but big evil corporations as well. Indeed, despite its anti-authority/anti-cop/anti-media message, Knife in the Head is clearly a work that was made for the bourgeois, but of course, like director Reinhard Hauff (who began as a subversive filmmaker but became a somewhat mainstream filmmaker), the same people who were part of the late-1960s German student movement (68er-Bewegung) would later become the leaders, politicians, CEOs, and mainstream media pawns of the ostensibly corrupt nation they professed to despise as depicted in the soullessly stylized mainstream German flick The Edukators (2004) starring swarthy Yerd-Teuton mutt Daniel Brühl. A rather simple yet well acted film about a man who ends up in the wrong place at the wrong time, Knife in the Head ultimately attempts to get the mainstream middle-class to give a shit about the concerns of the far-left and it ultimately fails as a work that merely preaches to the kraut quasi-commie choir. Of course, if the viewer approaches the film by looking at protagonist Hoffmann's crippling as a metaphor for not only the helplessness of everyday Germans during the RAF terrorist attacks but also as an allegory for the destruction of German identity/kultur as a result of the Second World War (think Roberto Rossellini's Germany Year Zero (1948)), Knife in the Head ultimately becomes a more poignant and less preachy work. Of course, Knife in the

BABY SITTER

René Clément (1975)

You can pretty much guarantee that when a filmmaker enters the forbidden realm of pornography, his career is more or less coming to a bitter and truly degenerate end of no return, both artistically and professionally. Indeed, aside from the rather rare exceptions like Wes Craven, who left a comfortable job as an English professor and entered the more lucrative pornographic underworld where he apparently made “many hard core X-rated films” under various pseudonyms (even working on Gerard Damiano’s 1972 crossover hit Deep Throat, though the actual role he had in the mafia-backed film is still unknown to this day) before he directed his first feature The Last House on the Left (1972), the filmmaker who begins directing porn is more or less a dead filmmaker who is whoring himself out just to pay the bills. While Guido artsploitation auteur Alberto Cavallone (Man, Woman and Beast aka Spell – Dolce mattatoi, Blow Job – Soffio erotico) did enter the final stage of his career when he began directing fuck flicks under the ‘classy’ pseudo-aristocratic pseudonym ‘Baron Corvo,’ his career is interesting in that a good number of his ‘classic’ films were released in alternate pornographic cuts well before he the director ever became a full-blown pornographer. Indeed, Cavallone’s singularly aberrant cult classics Zelda (1974), Blue Movie (1978), and Blow Job – Soffio erotico (1980) were all released at various stages with pornographic inserts, though this should be no surprise to anyone that has seen the original non-pornographic cuts of these works, as they are ultimately more subversive and perverse than the fuck flicks that were being made at the time, even if they were less sexually explicit. Indeed, while ‘subversive’ sex has always been a major theme of Cavallone’s oeuvre, the director mostly chose to depict carnal pleasure in a decidedly ‘anti-erotic’ and even deranged fashion and this is, somewhat ironically, most apparent in his straight fuck flicks. In that sense, Cavallone was a sort of poor man’s Pasolini, albeit rampantly heterosexual and much more nihilistic.

Directed under the name ‘Baron Corvo’ (a pseudonym he borrowed from gay English novelist, artist, and would-be-priest Frederick Rolfe), Il nano erotico (1982) aka Baby Sitter aka Being Captured aka Il nano e la strega aka Petites fesses juvéniles (pour membres bienfaiteurs) reflects Cavallone’s rather reluctant attitude in regard to directing his first ‘straight porn flick’ (though his previous work, the 1980 ‘erotic thriller’ La gemella erotica is assumed to have been shot ‘hardcore’), which is about as sexually appealing as syphilis as a work featuring a demented dago dwarf in a thong raping a young girl with giant dildos to meta-kitschy sounds of disco music. A sort of Guido take on the superlatively sleazy American-Danish coproduction The Sinful Dwarf (1973) aka Dværgen directed by Vidal Raski, which depicts a depressed and lonely yet equally deranged and deadly Danish dwarf running a white slavery and heroin ring with his mother,

BABY SITTER

Baby Sitter depicts the insane, if not largely inane, Italo-degeneracy that ensues when a young girl comes to work as a babysitter for a young couple, only to find that baby is really a full grown, phallus frenzied, dildo-wielding dwarf who enslaves her and dementedly defiles her. Needless to say, Cavallone's dumbfounding Dwarfsploitation flick is for initiates only. In other words, if Werner Herzog's Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) aka Auch Zwerge haben klein angefangen made you squirm with abject disgust at the sight of devilish little people doing depraved and destructive things, Baby Sitter will prove to be the ultimate anti-aphrodisiac, especially if you're a member of the fairer sex, as a nihilistically wanton work of whimsical derangement where a swarthy and perennially giggling achondroplastic dwarf pulls out a suitcase of large dildos and inserts them in the various holes of a naïve teen as if he is an Asperger-addled toddler experimenting with building blocks.

Exotic 19-year-old redheaded babysitter Sabrina (Sabrina Mastrorrenzi) loves her boyfriend Johnny so much that she gently jerks him off while riding on his Honda crotch-rocket, but she is put off by his indomitable jealousy and she questions whether he really loves her or not. Luckily, a nightmare day involving debauched dwarfs and dildos will ultimately prove to Sabrina that Johnny does indeed love her after all. After giving Johnny fellatio in a scenic field and stroking his main gear while he gives her a ride on his super cool Jap motorcycle, Sabrina is, to the chagrin of her boy toy, picked up by a wealthy middle-aged blonde babe named Dominique (Dominique Saint Claire) and her swarthy mustache adorned chauffeur in a white Mercedes so that she can carry out her latest babysitting job. As Dominique explains to her, Sabrina will be watching a little boy named 'Willy,' though little does he realized that she will be ravaged by the 'child's' Willy. Indeed, soon after Dominique leaves Sabrina at her plush countryside home that is just a couple miles outside of Rome, the baby sitter discovers she has been locked inside the house and soon after that, Willy aka 'Peeping'—a discernibly dago-like achondroplastic dwarf (Petit Loup) in a classic children's sailor outfit—abruptly appears from his baby bed and pierces the young lady with a blowdart with tranquilizer on it, thus knocking her out instantly.

When Sabrina awakes, she is tied in bondage to a fireplace and wearing nothing but a tiny thong. While she was asleep, little Willy took the liberty of stripping her of her clothes and providing her a rather unflattering thong similar to his own. After pulling out a suitcase full of various large dildos, Willy begins probing Sabrina's nether-regions in a rather perverse fashion. Meanwhile, Dominique and the Chauffeur have sex while watching Willy defile Sabrina via security footage. When Willy goes down shoving dildos in Sabrina's various flesh-wounds, he ties her to a footstool and begins whipping her in a savage fashion. Ultimately, Willy gets Sabrina to 'voluntarily' do anything he wants, so long as he agrees to let her go at the end of the night. After proclaiming, "I am very eccentric," Willy has Sabrina sit on top of him reverse-cowgirl style and jerk him off. Meanwhile, Sabrina's boyfriend goes looking for his girlfriend, as he seems to rightfully suspect that Dominique is a demented bitch with uniquely unsavory intentions. Eventually, Willy confesses to Sabrina that Dominique is his wife and in reciprocation for him allowing her to fuck any man she wants, she calls babysitting agencies and tricks stupid young girls to come to their home so that he can kidnap and defile them. Of course, one would assume that the rather odd couple would have been caught by now, but as Willy brags to Sabrina, he kills all the babysitters when he gets bored with defiling them. Indeed, Willy plans to kill Sabrina by giving her a poisonous enema, but just before he invades her anus, she hits him in the ribs and manages to escape. While the Chauffeur runs out and attempts to capture Sabrina at the demand of deranged bitch Dominique, boyfriend Johnny arrives at just the right time. In the end, Sabrina confesses to her boyfriend, "This has been an experience I will never forget" and, to the delight of Johnny, agrees that she will never babysit again.

Believe it or not, Baby Sitter was not the last XXX debauched dwarf flick that Albert Cavallone directed. Indeed, the director followed the film with the supposedly somewhat superior work, Pat una donna particolare (1982), the same year which, aside from featuring most of the same 'actors' from the previous film, also once again starred petite pervert Petit Loup. Interestingly, both of the films were shot at the same villa a couple miles outside of Rome where Rosso sangue (1981) aka Absurd directed by Joe D'Amato (as 'Peter Newton' aka 'Aristide Massaccesi') was directed the previous year. As someone with a small softspot for small people, I somehow managed to enjoy Baby Sitter more than most Cavallone fans, even if I found myself forwarding through some of the overlong sex scenes. When it comes down to it, the film is essentially a strangely humorous nihilist comedy directed by a disillusioned auteur who seemed like he wanted to take revenge against the film world by directing one of the most distinctly unsexy and just plain debasing fuck flicks ever made. In that regard, Cavallone is a lot like American artsploitation auteur Roger Watkins (The Last House on Dead End Street, Shadows of the Mind), who directed three masterful and strikingly artful, if not discernibly anti-erotic, misanthropic, and nihilistic dark blue movies—Her Name Was Lisa (1981), Corruption (1983), and Midnight Heat (1983)—under the Teutonic classical music inspired pseudonym 'Richard Mahler.' As Roberto Curti noted in his excellent 2007 essay Alberto Cavallone: Story of an Eye, Cavallone's son Giulio offered the following speculation as to why his father directed porn: "Alberto did them for money, I wouldn't say negligently, but doing things his own way, just to piss off the producer [...] You know, this is a compromise that could have made sense in Alberto's logic: 'You don't let me do the film I want to do and instead you almost force me to make shitty hardcore porn? Well, that's what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna shoot these films but I won't put my name on them, and I'm gonna do them my own way!'"

A work I can only recommend to Cavallone completists, sadomasochistic dwarfs, and/or morbidly masochistic individuals who get off to being debased by the unnatural sights of a malevolent midget defiling a young dame, Baby Sitter is nothing short of a sick celluloid joke at the expense of both pornophiles and the Italian film industry. With his purported masterpieces, Maldoror (1977)—a lost adaptation of pseudonymous French poet Comte de Lautréamont's late-19th-century proto-surrealist poetic novel Les Chants de Maldoror aka The Songs of Maldoror, which was also unsuccessfully adapted by cine-magician Kenneth Anger and successfully adapted by Japanese auteur Shūji Terayama—never being released as a result of distribution problems and a number of his other films negatively affected by everything from suicidal producers (e.g. Blow Job – Soffio erotico) to being completely aborted (e.g. Il ragazzo che fece fumare il Vesuvio aka The Boy Who Made the Vesuvio Erupt), Cavallone had every right to be aesthetically vengeful, thus one could argue that Baby Sitter and Pat una donna particolare are almost just as much 'auteur' pieces as his early works, as they reflect the filmmaker at his most incendiary, iconoclastic, and misanthropic. Indeed, what other man would take aesthetic revenge against society by making a fuck flick where a beautiful young girl is defiled by a dildo-wielding dwarf?!

MASSACRE AT CENTRAL HIGH

René Daalder (1976)

Massacre at Central High is the film quoted as "predicting punk and Columbine." Undoubtedly, these allegations are stupid as the pretension of stating that a vengeful rampage would have never existed had someone the gall to create a tempestuous attack perpetrated a dear student, and punk? The only crime this film is guilty of is predicting a lack of vision in the future of cinema based around school shootings. Besides from this inane assessment, Rene Daalder, a protege of Russ Meyer, created a film unheard of for its time. The idyllic walls lined with lockers are being governed by the "in" crowd, a group of four "jock" ruffians whose tactics of terror include severe degradation and rape. These instances of rough-housing go virtually unacted upon and have prompted the staff of students to quietly walk in fear with their tails in between their legs. That is, until the new kid arrives at Central High, name of David. David not only shares a friendly history with one of the "country club" tyrants but is owed a due equal to repose in this blistering high school environment. Soon after, David makes sure to white-knight himself to the graduating class and Mark's girl, Theresa. The unfolding of several key events lead to inciting a homeroom war that would later be heavily "borrowed" from Heathers, a teenage girl's fantasy of attitude and angst delivered with sappy-crevice young-adultisms.

The prior position of counseling is scrapped however, as David suffers a crippling blow-back from the bullies which lead to the designated title reflecting horror elements, which this film is surprisingly (and thankfully) void of. Rather than to honor of acknowledge his speakings of peace and equal mindedness, David turns to murder to exorcise the frustration and pain from his very veins, corrupting the last half of the film into a slasher-esque marathon of righteous suffering and violent sentiments to those who have wronged him or deemed unworthy of life. David's rage is arguably permitted however. Dutch filmmaker Rene Daalder spent line after line with intermittent scenes building upon David's ritualistic jog, releasing the stress necessary to retain a calm, collected attitude and foresight. When even the simplest relief is taken from a man, it's no surprise to witness an out-lash of explosive fury and mercilessness. What follows is quirky tomfoolery with sports equipment and a general misanthropy.

Strangely enough, the Italians got a hold of the initial print and edited pornographic inserts, amping up the hair, sweat, rape, and teenage promiscuity to a disturbing level. The result is known as Sexy Jeans - shock value? postmortem. The flavoring of hatefucking only really benefits to the attempted rape which is now transformed into a successful raping of both Mary and Jane. It's true that violence speaks much more when documented unflinchingly and if you're watching this film in the first place, chances are you slide into this category.

MASSACRE AT CENTRAL HIGH

Without the XXX material, the basic teenage relationships are centered around the blossoming womanhood, not that of a 12 year old girl but the transition from innocent cherub to swindling harlot. As evidenced by this strange idea known as reality and the cinema to which it reflects, romance is as silly and tumultuous as born in a school setting. The questionable freebie persona of the average experimenting lady is demonstrated in Massacre at Central High with bell-bottoms, buggies, and buggery.

An interesting addition to Daalder's undiscovered masterpiece of aggression within education is that the campus is run entirely by the students, from the library to the student lounge. Adults do not have a role until the very final scene at the annual dance and even then, their oblivious nature to the plight of education and the rise of violent crimes is staggeringly accurate still to this day. Supervision is acceptable to a point for the mind retains malleability up until your first social experiences with troublemakers and misfits. This problem leads to David's madness and his transformation into an "evil" archetype is shocking enough for the once affable eccentric. Witnessing the infectious symptoms of power turn even the warm, cynical bookworm Arthur has David even more keen to the idea of systematically slaughtering the scheming studentkind. For this, allusions to Columbine will no doubt surface. Despite the media stacking such titles as Neo-Nazis, Violent gamers, and metalheads onto the duo of Eric & Dylan, Massacre at Central High represents a justifiable (to an extent) quest of retaliation that one might expect a sided Dutch diva to preach.

Also known as the Blackboard Massacre, what sets this film apart from other bully/revenge/exploitation films is the teasing of genres it so wildly commits. First an engaging portrait of life in the 70s only to switch to a completely anarchic environment of execution, Massacre at Central High establishes itself as the prime contender for best school rampage film. Disregard entirely the residual comedy of Heathers and push aside the retrogression of van Sant's Elephant in favor for this underrated thriller worthy of global recognition, not just from the wops. David is once sympathetic and then a hero. Altered to a prophet of pain and freer of the quasi-oligarchy that existed in the sterile halls, David becomes cold and unmoving - unstoppable. The love for Theresa alone helps create a wholly complex finale with emotion enough to elevate this above the schlock of cult DVD. No doubt will this classic be misunderstood as the sensitivities of the dying West skyrocket.

René Daalder (1986)

As much as I despise musicals, especially those made during the decisively dreadful and innately soulless 1980s, I cannot help declare my forbidden love for the melodious and misanthropic dystopian punk rock sci-fi musical Population: 1 (1986) directed by Dutch auteur René Daalder (Habitat, Hysteria) and starring Tomata du Plenty, an early member of the ultra-campy psychedelic drag-queen troupe The Cockettes and singer of the seminal synthpunk band the Screamers. Although I have known for some time that Daalder is an eclectic and multitalented filmmaker due the stark contrast between his early Meyer-esque exploitation flick Massacre at Central High (1976) and his more recent documentary Here is Always Somewhere Else (2007) – a very personal work about the director's forlorn friend Bas Jan Ader – it was not until I viewed Population: 1 that I realized that the flying Dutchman should have a much more illustrious and popular filmmaking career, at least among dedicated cinephiles. Essentially, like The Decline of Western Civilization (1981) meets Liquid Sky (1982) meets Pee-wee's Big Adventure (1985) meets The Running Man (1987), except on an expertly-disguised micro-budget, Population: 1 is probably the best (and only) example of an 'arthouse punk' flick. Utilizing a surprisingly peachy pomo potpourri of utterly new and then-high-tech video technology, archived concert footage, animated nudes, and vintage silent film and newsreel clips, Population: 1 is a positively punchy postmodern punk rock musical that – when compared to the 'artistic integrity' of punk movie classics like Ulli Lommel's Blank Generation (1980), Penelope Spheeris' Suburbia (1984) and Zale Dalen's Terminal City Ricochet (1990) – seems like a misunderstood masterpiece among mindless mediocrity. Originally encountering the punk scene after his teacher Russ Meyer asked him to work on the never-made film Who Killed Bambi? (1978), a cinematic work intended as a punk rock equivalent of The Beatles' A Hard Day's Night (1964) and a quasi-sequel to Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970) that was also co-written by Roger Ebert, Daalder set-up "Sex Pistols USA" headquarters in his house in LA and eventually ended up meeting and befriending Tomata du Plenty and the two decided to collaborate on a conceptual 'music-video album' and a post-apocalyptic arthouse flick entitled Mensch in the style of German expressionist works like Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920); none of which came to fruition. Picking up the scraps from the aborted music-videos and footage Daalder filmed for The Screamers concerts at the Whisky and Roxy in LA and working fast after du Plenty was diagnosed HIV positive, the two eventually assembled the 60-minute semi-futuristic feature Population: 1, which is quite arguably the most ambitious and experimental punk film ever made and a vivid and witty piece of early video art.

Population: 1 is a virtual one-man show that stars Tomata du Plenty as the

satirically narcissistic host, a typically nauseating product of the 1980s and a positively positive (even when complaining) yet uniquely uncivil civil servant (a defense contractor) and the purported last man who earth who describes his coming-of-age as being chronicled in the novels Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884) and J.D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye (1951), and the classic Hollywood film East of Eden (1955) starring James Dean. Population: 1 essentially consists of du Plenty going on an erratic and somewhat preachy yet pleasantly peculiar spiel about his life and memories, and an iconoclastic history lesson about the United States, hence why the film features a picturesque pastiche of concert footage and old newsreel excerpts. Indeed, long before Robert Zemeckis ever chronicled the history of social change in twentieth century America through the countrified eyes of a cutesy Alabama-born mental-invalid via Forrest Gump (1994), Rene Daalder was able to superimpose images of modern actors over seemingly ancient historical film footage. Like Mr. Gump, du Plenty is a hopeless romantic at heart that that is most impassioned when speaking of his steamy love affair with his sometimes hostile girlfriend Sheela Edwards. Although not particularly beautiful nor elegant, Edwards – who looks like should could be Alla Nazimova's more vicious, long-lost great-granddaughter – is a seductive singer and a ferocious femme fatale as especially exemplified by her cover of Marion HARRISS' 1920 hit "I'm a Jazz Vampire." A proudly emasculated American male in the tradition of Rudolph Valentino, but nowhere near as attractive and charming, du Plenty sings feminist duets with Ms. Edwards and allows her to physically pummel him when not on stage, thereupon sparking mass effeminization in American males; or so he says in an awfully proud, pussified manner. Showing his dedication to the American anti-fascist cause, du Plenty, although a cowardly draft-dodger, also shares his scarlet lady with American troops during the Second World War. Of course, not all of du Plenty's memories are as fond as he would like them to be, especially in regard to his stay with fellow chosen "elites" in a New Wavish cabaret-like atomic bomb shelter. The final 1/3 of Population: 1 also happens to be one of the most interesting segments of the film, featuring appearances from Beck (then-12-years-old), Vampira (Maila Nurmi), El Duce (The Screamers, The Mentors), Penelope Houston (The Avengers), members of the Chicano rock group Los Lobos, and Dutch actor Carel Struycken ("Lurch" of The Adams Family film series), among others. On top of playing an acting role in the film, The Screamers drummer K. K. Barrett also worked as the art director for Population: 1. Barrett's spectacular work in the film must have gotten someone's attention, as he went on to be a production designer for such big name Spike Jonze and Sofia Coppola films as Being John Malkovich (1999), Lost in Translation (2003), I ♥ Huckabees (2004), and Where the Wild Things Are (2009). Needless to say, aside from being a outstandingly ostentatious and totally outlandish pioneering work of vivacious video art, Population: 1 is a virtual who's who of popular and not-so-popular American musicians and artists, thus it should be no surprise that MTV would subsequently borrow its audio/visual aesthetic from the film.

Not unsurprisingly, Population: 1 is far from every The Screemers fan's favorite film as the work is regarded as the motivating factor behind the band's messy and irreparable breakup. Originally, Tommy Gear – the keyboardist, vocalist, and co-songwriter of The Screemers – was supposed to compose the musical score for Population: 1, but he inevitably walked off the set of the film midway through its production in a most histrionic fashion after getting in a number of back-and-forth cavils with Tomata du Plenty. Some blame director Rene Daalder for this, as it has been claimed by certain individuals that he pitted the band members against one another so as to have greater artistic control over the production. Whatever the reality behind this claim, one would have a hard time denying that Population: 1, even with its many famous/infamous actors and megalomaniac lead character, is essentially an auteur-piece created by a filmmaker with a very specific and utterly uncompromising vision, henceforth it would also be misleading to describe the film as mere 'punk rock musical.' Indeed, Population: 1 has pioneering punks as actors and memorable musical numbers, but it is barely the sort of work that can be appreciated, let alone adequately gauged by the average glue-sniffing philistine with a retarded haircut.

HERE IS ALWAYS SOMEWHERE ELSE

René Daalder (2007)

In 1975, the Dutch artist Bas Jan Ader set to sea in the smallest sailboat (13 ft pocket cruiser) that ever attempted to cross the Atlantic. 10 months later, Ader's boat was found on the West South-west coast of Ireland. Unsurprisingly, Bas Jan Ader's body has never been found. In the wonderful documentary Here is Always Somewhere Else directed by friend and fellow Dutchman-turned-American Renee Daalder, the director tries to unravel the enigma surrounding the tortured soul of Bas Jan Ader and what caused the Dutch artist to take a dangerous journey across the Atlantic. As you soon find out in the documentary Here Is Always Somewhere Else, Bas Jan Ader never felt content anywhere he settled in the world, finally concluding that a voyage across God's sea might be the antidote for his deracinated restlessness.

Like my own Dutch grandfather, Bas Jan Ader and Here is Always Somewhere Else director Renee Daalder felt that America would be an ideal place to relocate to after growing up as a youth in The Netherlands during the horrors of World War II. Also like my grandfather, Ader's family fought in the resistance when Germany occupied their country during the war. Unlike many other resistance fighters (mostly Communists, Anarchists, and other anti-Nationalist dissidents) in other countries during the second World War, many of those fighting the occupation of The Netherlands were not mainly politically motivated. It should also be noted that despite being Germanic themselves, the Dutch for centuries have thought of Germans as half-civilized barbarians (centuries ago when The Netherlands was one of the most powerful/advanced countries in the world, Germany was still a bunch of scattered fiefs), on top of being fairly tolerant of Jews (The Netherlands is one of the few European countries not known to have engaged in anti-Jewish pogroms). Since the German occupation of The Netherlands during World War II, the Dutch opinion of Germans has gone from looking at them as half-educated peasants to the Dutch disdaining anything German. It is easy to tell in Here is Always Somewhere Else that director Renee Daalder is not particularly fond of Germans. The Dutch maybe the most individualistic people in the world and were certainly not going to allow other people to dictate to them how to live, especially when you consider that Germany planned to assimilate the Dutch (they were considered fellow Aryans by the SS) and make The Netherlands part of "Greater Germany." In the documentary Here is Always Somewhere Else it is revealed that Bas Jan Ader's mother and father helped save the lives of countless Jews whilst running a Dutch Calvinist ministry. My own Dutch great-grandmother saved many Jewish lives during the German occupation and she was commemorated by the entire Amsterdam Jewish community at her funeral. Unfortunately, Bas Jan Ader's minister father was not as lucky during the war and would pay the ultimate price for his selfless heroism, being executed for his role in the resistance by the Germans. The life and death of Bas Jan Ader's father would play a huge role in influencing the tragic Dutch artist.

For me, the greatest films are those that were created in war torn post-World War II Europa. From a Europe in ruins came some of the most tragic and emotionally stirring films that the world had yet to see before. Had World War II not occurred, the world would have never experienced the auteur masterworks of Fassbinder in Germany, Pasolini in Italy, Tarkovsky in Russia, Truffaut in France, and countless others. This is no surprise as World War I also influenced one of the greatest artistic and cinematic movements, the German expressionists. Those countries that did not feel the chaos and erratic nature of the first World War surely felt in the second war, the "neutral" country of The Netherlands probably being one of the best examples of this. Dutch filmmaker Paul Verhoeven has stated various times in interviews that seeing dead bodies in the street as a child during World War II played a major role in influencing his use of cinematic brutality in films like Robocop and Starship Troopers. Of course, his absurd use of violence as a condemnation of human bestiality is certainly lost on most American viewers.

Like Paul Verhoeven, Bas Jan Ader and Renee Daalder left The Netherlands in hope that they would become successful artists in the United States. Although Verhoeven and Daalder found some rooting and success working in Hollywood, Bas Jan Ader never truly felt American nor the solace he hoped for as a citizen of a new world. In Here is Always Somewhere Else, Daalder states that he feels that Ader's inability to assimilate in America is probably the result of a "love and hate" relationship ingrained in the Dutch soul from centuries of Calvinism. My own Dutch grandfather also never felt the calmness he was searching for in the United States, even taking trips back to The Netherlands despite having a less than modest income. Despite being born and raised in the United States, I have also never been felt like a true "American" nor did I ever find camaraderie with white American culture, only eventually finding a true organic soulful connection with European cinema, literature, and philosophy. The title of Here is Always Somewhere Else is taken from Bas Jan Ader's constant revisiting of The Netherlands and World War II, permanently imbedded aspects of the Dutch artist's life that he could never deracinate himself from, no matter how much he wanted to, eventually resulting in his unsuccessful solo sail across the Atlantic.

Another major influence on Bas Jan Ader was Albert Einstein's theory of relativity and that "matter did not matter." Apparently, Ader's mother discussed Einstein with her young son, something (like World War II) introduced to the artist in his youth that would play a central role in influencing artwork. Not feeling content as a professor in 1970, Ader started filming himself falling off roofs, falling out of trees, and riding bicycles into the dam of Amsterdam. In a sense, one could see him as a proto-Jackass comedian but Bas Jan Ader found nothing funny about abusing his body for art. Ader's dangerous exploits were his impossible trials at getting lost in the cosmos as he that felt he was enslaved by gravity. Ader's friend Renee Daalder would also take influence from Ader's obsession with revolting against gravity but from a more pessimistic perspective. In Daalder's highly influential High School revenge film Massacre at Central High, a student uses gravity as a deadly dismembering weapon against his classmates. It is almost hard to believe that the director of Here is Always Somewhere Else also directed Massacre at Central High but I guess that is what one could expect from the artsy protégé of artless exploitation auteur Russ Meyer.

Like Paul Verhoeven after him, Here Is Always Somewhere director Renee Daalder soon realized that if he ever wanted to make it in Hollywood, he would have to compromise his "Dutchness" and artistry for his American film efforts. In the 1970s, Daalder attempted to make a film where movies are made completely on computers, something the business in executives in Hollywood felt to be a "preposterous" idea. Of course, now it is virtually impossible to make films without the use of computers but I guess one must forgive the money-driven men that run Hollywood as a unique "vision" is not a top priority in Tinseltown. Although not being restrained by businessmen like his friend Renee Daalder when working in the art world, Bas Jan Ader found it impossible to relate to fellow artists whilst teaching art at various California artist institutes. In Here is Always Somewhere Else, an effeminate and pudgy former student of Ader discusses how he and his fellow classmates never understood Ader nor his art. Despite sounding like a giddy middle aged woman, this former student also talks about how American artists were attempting to create "masculine" works whereas they thought Ader to be effeminate (in which they confused with his European sensibility) because he took photographs of himself crying. Bas Jan Ader had also been heavily influenced by the philosophical works of Immanuel Kant and Ludwig Wittgenstein, something that dumbfounded his proud American philistine students. Of course, history has shown that all great artists are usually misunderstood by their contemporaries as Bas Jan Ader's work did not receive an onslaught in popularity until the early 1990s.

As shown in Here Is Always Somewhere Else, feeling more alienated from the American art world and with his marriage becoming more turbulent, Bas Jan Ader finally decided that he would engage in an exodus from the world as he knew it. During his remaining days on this earth, Ader was inspired by the life of Donald Crowhurst, a British businessman turned sailor who committed suicide by jumping off his boat during his last voyage. Like Bas Jan Ader, Crowhurst was also heavily influenced by Albert Einstein, writing his own theory of the universe and declaring himself a "cosmic being" before diving into the oceanic abyss forever. Bas Jan Ader was also following into his father's footsteps as a restless rube. During the early years of their marriage, Ader's father suddenly became anxious and told his wife that he would be riding his bicycle from The Netherlands to Palestine. Unlike his son, despite encountering disease on the way, Ader senior was successful in his pilgrimage to Palestine. What biting irony that Ader's Father, a man that would have saved countless Jews during World War II, would not live to see the Jews (mainly from Europe) reoccupy (through force of arms) Palestine in the form of modern day Israel.

Despite being barely feature length (at just over 60 minutes), Here Is Always Somewhere Else is easily one of the greatest and emotionally enthralling documentaries that I have ever seen. Although I have my own personal ancestral reasons for liking the film, one would be hard-pressed to find another documentary so uniquely intimate but at the same time leaves the viewer with tons of questions. As director Renee Daalder and Ader's friends/family members reveal in Here Is Always Somewhere Else, no one truly knew and understood the haunted Dutch artist. One thing friends did know about Bas Jan Ader is that he was known to set himself up for tragic endings as this heartbreaking documentary testifies to. If one looks at art history, one knows that it is not uncommon for artists to go on pilgrimages, self-imposed exile, or commit suicide. Bas Jan Ader experienced all three, finally getting lost in the cosmos, something that he always desired.

DIE HARD 2
DIE HARD 2

Renny Harlin (1990)

Die Harder.

The average Joe American icon is back played by Aryan badass god Bruce Willis, but this time he is left in a very uncomfortable situation. 2 years after the events at Nakatomi Plaza, John is in Dulles Airport waiting for his wife to land when he begins to catch suspicion of yet another terrorist job. He first catches wind when he notices another another black power Urkel-looking motherfucker enter a restricted area and began noticing them wearing army jackets. After tailing them, a shoot out appears in a baggage warehouse. Leaving the white man dead and the black man jumping fences to get out, McClane goes and talks to the airport police chief played by the awfully annoying Dennis Franz who i will continually disagree of his German heritage.

Franz is an annoying bastard in character and out. He of course tells McClane he is wrong, and well frankly, we know that McClane is never wrong. He mentions the Glock porcelain handguns which of course, do not exist. After this incident, McClane takes it up to the big dog's offices while they dismiss him too. Then all the lights go out and the communications are dead. It seems the spaghetti western legend Franco Nero plays a pissed off mercenary who is trying to get his dictator back. He refuses to turn everything back on until the dictator is safely landed and allowed to escape.

The planes that are currently in flight and will continue to circle the airport until either their demands are met, or they run out of fuel. After a couple of double crosses and the realization that McClane's wife is on one of the planes, they realize they fucked with the wrong American. So how can you get better than the original Die Hard? Well, the recipe seems to be more explosions, eye stabbing, gun shots, and snow bike chases.

Now for a fan of all cinema you will see a couple of surprises in the cast. The biggest one for me is Franco Nero who plays the coffin-dragging, gun-toting Italian bad ass Django in his collection of films. Second would be John Amos who was the owner of the McDonald's rip-off in one of Eddie Murphy's only good films, Coming To America (God Bless Arsenio Hall) and the last is the return of Reginald VelJohnson who makes a triumphant return in a really funny 3 minute scene discussing how fucking crazy McClane is. The acting is grand but what strikes you the most is the action. McClane is a poor son-of-a-bitch. This guy goes through hell and gets nothing in return. That is one of the most lovable parts of the series. Another great thing about this film is that it shows how arrogant security is and could be viewed as a horrific foreshadowing to 9/11. This film even sports the #2 most horrifying plane crash on MaximOnline's article. I am not even going to comment on the director. He made that trash Cliffhanger.

Again, the ethnicity's are pushing a little much when they expect us to believe a Wop to play a Latin-American from a fake country used in the other great action film "COMMANDO". The script for the original Die Hard was actually supposed to be Commando 2. Now that would have been interesting. The accuracies in the film have been dis proven many times such as the location of the company that manufactures Glocks and the fuel tanks on airplanes. Despite this films flaws, it does what it does best. Kick ass and take names. Die Hard 2 is a definite sequel that delivers on all fronts whether it be stabbing someone in the eye with an icicle or having a duel on the wing of a plane.

THE BLIND OWL
THE BLIND OWL

Reza Abdoh (1992)

Undoubtedly a mystifying film, most obviously due to the fact that it features no credits, no imdb.com page, no poster, and virtually nil information available about it anywhere, on top of being created by a first-time film director, The Blind Owl (1992) directed by the late Reza Abdoh – a gay Iranian-born playwright/theatre director who died at the mere age of 32, thus never really having the opportunity to develop into a distinguished auteur filmmaker – is an apocalyptic (yet seemingly apathetically so) avant-garde film set in the boiling but barely breathing bowels of Los Angeles that will make any viewer who watches the cinematic work feel proud that they don't live there if they aren't already a long-suffering resident. Extremely loosely based on Iran's foremost modern writer Sadegh Hedayat's controversial novel of the same name – a work oftentimes described as one of world literature's greatest masterpieces that was also adapted for the silver screen by Iranian filmmaker Kiumars Derambakhsh in 1974 and allegory-prone Chilean auteur Raúl Ruiz previously in 1987 – The Blind Owl as depicted by aberrant Abdoh is a gravely gut-wrenching work where skinheaded leather-fags fight and set one another on fire under bridges under the moonlight, severely disabled trannies are seedy yet sedentary sex objects, grown adopted sons buy their fathers prime ass streetwalkers, bourgeois clerks pay fag hustlers money where they wear nothing more than fishnet stockings in candid photos, Street Fighter II and real fights provide one with a constant source of adrenalin-pumping entertainment, and people get hit by cars just as often as they get their asses kicked. Like Alex Cox's punk cult flick Repo Man (1984) as directed by a mind-numbingly nihilistic Rainer Werner Fassbinder on crack and dying from AIDS, The Blind Owl (1992) is not a work for the fake or faint of heart and surely not the spiritually saved. Directed by a man whose life was cut short at the mere age of 32 via AIDS via unsafe sodomy who is best remembered as a plainly peculiar playwright/director who staged mammoth iconoclastic plays in rather unlikely places like rusty warehouses and abandoned buildings, The Blind Owl is surely engulfed by a foreordained coldness of the soul and spirit; a sardonic farewell to what was never meant to be. Apparently surprisingly minimalistic, low-fi, and low profile for a work directed by Reza Abdoh, whose plays were known to be quite antagonistic, dauntingly deranged and ADHD-driven, and high decibel, The Blind Owl does also share a lot in common with his theater of the off-off-Broadway and extra-absurd, including a curious collection of characters that would be better off dying in a nuclear holocaust, sickening human savagery, and his usual troupe of actors that made up his Dar A Luz company, including Tony Torn (the flabby, faggy son of Rip), Tom Fitzpatrick, Tom Pearl, and Juliana Francis.

Abdoh stated rather superficially but in a nonetheless insightful manner: “I’m working on a film. New ideas are coming because the experience is new. Basically my thoughts are the same. Someone said you’re always writing the same book or painting the same painting, but every time it’s so radically shifted that you can’t possibly say it’s the same thing. And in the same way, my film embodies what I’m thinking about, what I’m concerned with—not just my aesthetic but what I’m concerned with in life... And I’m finding that the film is depicting more and more that sort of a relationship in its poetics and in its language and in its politics and story.” Indeed, upon superficial glance, it would seem that The Blind Owl – a wonderfully wacked work with nothing resembling a linear plot, but absolutely anomalous Altman-esque meandering – has no serious objective, let alone sociopolitical subtexts, but from a more esoteric angle, the film has more to it than what meets the petrified and weary, turned blind eye. Essentially, The Blind Owl is a miserable and, some would say, misanthropic, if not ‘empathetically’ so, melodrama about a bunch of dorky and steadily deteriorating prostitutes who attract a virtual army of absurdly aberrant and anomalous Johns, Junkies, and Jerk-offs. Emotionally vacant anti-hero Ricky (Peter Jacobs), an 18-year-old hustler that seems like a middle-aged momma’s boy with an acute case of autism, so tragedy strikes when his mother Anna (Paulina Sahagun-Macias) collapses from an unmentioned illness that keeps her mostly bedridden for the rest of the film. Like most characters in The Blind Owl, Ricky is probably better off dead, especially as someone who makes a living getting and giving head from hysterical handicapped homos, so in a sense his madre’s slow but steady death is not exactly the saddest thing in the world considering she will finally achieve liberation of mind and body for eternity. Ricky happens to sell his flesh to the same diabetic and seemingly deranged mortician John as a young woman named Janey (Juliana Francis); a go-getter of an emotionally dead gal who often gets the shit beat out of her by her decidedly dickhead of a boyfriend. Ricky also has an unsympathetic father who slips him some cash every so often. A flabby and faggy blind man named (Anthony Torn) with a crippled and creepy transgendered ‘wife’ (played by Johnnie Baima aka Sandie Crisp aka “The Goddess Bunny”) also calls on the call-boy services of Ricky, who helps bath, read to, and feed the ocular cripple. Ricky also has a new friend from Nevada with a fucked-up haircut and art fag mustache/goatee combo named Trenn (Tom Pearl) who provides a sort of silent, phantasmagorical comic relief to The Blind Owl, especially when bashing people’s heads in with inanimate objects. In between the minimalist manic melodrama of the film, individuals ranging from prepubescent Hispanic boys to elderly old white men fall apathetically to their deaths off the same house roof.

Featuring the same regional setting, zeitgeist, similar type characters (street-walkers and morticians) and even some of the same actors (HIV-positive performance artist Ron Athey makes an appearance in his first film role) as Bruce

LaBruce's Hu$tlr White (1996), The Blind Owl has a much different essence and tone than the quasi-pornographic film that would follow it. Although I cannot say that I have read the source novel that it is loosely based on, The Blind Owl certainly falls in line with the source book's narrator's thoughts: "the presence of death annihilates all that is imaginary. We are the offspring of death and death delivers us from the tantalizing, fraudulent attractions of life; it is death that beckons us from the depths of life. If at times we come to a halt, we do so to hear the call of death... Throughout our lives, the finger of death points at us." Indeed, while nothing seems 'real' in the film due to its ostensibly oneiric, ominous, yet comically absurdist feel, the final fate of fatality seems like the only thing guaranteed in The Blind Owl; a film that feels like the 'Eraserhead of the West Coast' as directed by Harmony Korine's bastard Iranian-born cousin. The Blind Owl – a completely cynical cinematic work depicting the upper-lower-class rabble of L.A. – with a mongrelized bastard protagonist of Amero-mutt white and meszito admixture, is undoubtedly a picture of not just America, but the world of the deracinated and globalized future where prostitution, destitution, dysfunction, and destruction, both on the personal and collective level, is the norm. In a world where one's dignity is bought and sold to gender-confused cripples and embalmers of the dead, and human automatons of various colors and creeds commit suicide like lemmings falling off a cliff, one need not to worry about the future, but instead, embrace one's death. In the end of The Blind Owl, the L.A. undead walk the earth with nowhere else to go and nothing else to do. Although a choice that was not of his own, director Reza Abdoh would also ultimately have to give into death and as far as I am concerned, The Blind Owl is his last will and testament, at least cinematically speaking.

NIGHTS IN BLACK LEATHER

A couple of years back, after browsing documentaries on imdb.com featuring John Waters (who seems to be in virtually every doc) as a commentator, I discovered the documentary That Man: Peter Berlin (2005) directed by Jim Tushinski, and, in turn, discovered the rather curious 1970s gay sex icon Peter Berlin, who looks like a Tom of Finland caricature ‘cum’ to life (in fact, Tom of Finland would sketch Berlin a couple times). Among other things, I learned whilst watching That Man: Peter Berlin that Berlin was a German aristocrat born with the blue-blood name Baron Armin Hagen Freiherr von Hoyningen-Huene, yet he grew up poor after his German soldier father was tragically blown up during the remaining days of the Second World War while trying to save a comrade from a minefield. Growing up father-less and nearly destitute in the midst of post-WWII Germany, Berlin later became a designer and photographer, but in his early 30s decided to seek out fortune and fame in the fag capital of the world, San Francisco, where he created two quasi-artsy porn flicks, Nights in Black Leather (1973) and That Boy (1974), in the spirit of the gritty anti-cinema ‘collaborations’ of Andy Warhol and Paul Morrissey. Naturally, as a longtime Morrissey fan, I decided to dig up both of Berlin’s films, though I could only find Nights in Black Leather (formerly titled ‘Post HaSte HuStle’) directed by Richard Abel (under the pseudonym Ignatio Rutkowski). About 60% less-than-hardcore homo sex and 40% unintentionally hilarious self-body-worship and masculine narcissism, Nights in Black Leather is old school fagdom at its almost simultaneously unflattering yet self-flattering and thus works best today as a celluloid novelty that demands a certain commitment to fast-forwarding from the viewer (especially if you are not into gay sex featuring a dude with a ‘Dutch boy’ hairdo). Describing the film himself as “not a great piece of art” and his collaboration with Abel as follows, “There was never a script and never a big idea. He edited the film, he was doing the sound and I had nothing to do with the making of the film. I was just in front of it and telling him what to do so I sort of gave him the idea, do this shot here or make it all...” in the documentary That Man: Peter Berlin, Berlin has made it rather clear that Nights in Black Leather is a quasi-autobiographical non-narrative work, which is only all the more accented by the film’s voyeuristic cinéma vérité-like aesthetic. Originally assumed lost until a 16mm negative of the film was found in storage somewhere in Southern California somewhat recently, Nights in Black Leather now can live on as a cult piece of memorabilia of narcissistic cocksucking from Germany’s most debauched and passively misanthropic yet strikingly Nordish blueblood Übermensch. A retro gay blue movie that ironically reinforces a sort of Aryan racial superiority in its scopophilic ga(y)ze at a true German aristocrat, Nights in Black Leather is, if nothing else, one of the most bizarre promotions of eugenics and good breeding made in the

German immigrant Peter Berlin (credited as Peter Burian) is cruising around San Francisco but his days are getting more and more plagued by banality as indicated by the following words he writes to a German friend regarding his day-to-day encounters with people: "All I need to do is lie on the grass and just ignore the people. Last week I met quite a few and you know how it goes. Conversation. Hell, what's your name? Peter? You have a nice accent, where do you come from? Germany? Oh, how long you have been here? Do you like it? And after I go through this 20 times, even the faces look all the same. I naturally get tired of it because I know exactly what they really are interested in. And it all happened in San Francisco." Indeed, Mr. Berlin makes no 'bones' about the fact that he thinks he is the Übermensch and that all other people should feel privileged to admire his immaculate blueblood beauty. One night after going cruising at a gay bar apparently full of homo cowboys and Indians where he felt like he played a "part in a western movie," Peter gets a phone call from a secret admirer who proclaims his very scary love and affection for the Teutonic Über-twink. Of course, potent Peter—an unrepentant meta-narcissist who never turns down an opportunity to be admired—laps up all the pervert caller's crude compliments, even masturbating to remarks like, "You're my great pagan Nordic god! My great strong blond god." After the "pleasant diversion from a restless night," Peter candidly discusses his encounter with a homo Hitlerite, stating of the extra-erotic encounter, "I just met a young boy just as I was wearing my leather outfit who took me to his place, dressed himself up all in leather, put on a swastika armband and an iron cross. Having me stand in the corner of his room, which he had hung with floor to ceiling mirrors, and told me, 'We are both strong... We're equals... The world will bow before us.' I did not dare to tell him that I voted for the socialist in the last German elections, but he got me very excited all the same." Of course, Peter proceeds to lure in a couple young men and make them his admiring slaves. In what is quite possibly the most telling scene with regard to the protagonist's mentality, Peter goes to a party and pompously narrates, "Then, a few days later a friend invited me to a party. He told me there would be many different kinds of people there, so I decided to go because it might be interesting, although I usually don't like parties so much. Most of them turn out to be so boring...and this one was no exception." Indeed, in a Warhol-esque setting featuring drag queens and other assorted aesthetically repellant queers, Peter seems bored to death and leaves in what is only a couple minutes but ultimately seems like a lifetime. In the end, Peter writes to his German friend, "how nice it is to lay here on the grass and be alone for a while. When I think about my friends in Europe, I get lonesome. New faces are always exciting but I've seen enough for now. Yes, in nostalgic moments like this, when I look across the ocean, I know that old friends are the best," though that does not stop him from very shortly thereafter hooking up with a Peter Berlin lookalike.

While directed by the star's film school educated friend Richard Abel, Nights in Black Leather, with its amateurish direction and camera molesting the subject, is certainly a Peter Berlin auteur piece. Once described by John Waters as a "full-body genital," singularly self-absorbed Baron Berlin is notable for doing all his own iconic photography, so it should be no surprise that for his second (and ultimately final) film, That Boy (1974), he also acted as the director. While seemingly like nothing more than a brainless hunk with big junk, Berlin actually comes from a culturally distinguished family, with his paternal grandmother's side being made up of philosophers and attaches and the other side being comprised of artists and photographers, with his great uncle being American fashion photographer George Hoyningen-Huene, who also worked in Hollywood as a consultant on Technicolor for George Cukor, among other things. Despite Nights in Black Leather and That Boy making Berlin famous practically overnight, he had nil interest in making more porn flicks nor did he ever become more famous, ultimately dedicating the rest of his life to watching TV (with Oprah and Bill O'Reilly being some of his personal favorites) as he describes in the documentary That Man: Peter Berlin. Apparently, Peter Berlin has now become big with heterosexual women and lesbians, or so director Jim Tushinski would describe in the audio commentary for the dvd release of That Man: Peter Berlin. Indeed, after personally watching Nights in Black Leather, it is hard for me to believe that modern day viewers would be interested in using the film as a masturbation aid, as it now seems to work best as a black comedy, especially in the pre-apocalyptic age of pansy political correctness where heteros are almost just as effeminate as homos and a proudly gay yet simultaneously proudly male figure like Peter Berlin could never become popular.

Magic - the art of illusion. As a young adult, we all denounce any and all forms of magic (most of us, that is). The idea of rabbits and hats weigh down reality enough. But what if the truest form of magic came from your cerebrum or psychosis and dementia? That's the motif of a young Anthony Hopkins' Magic - an eerie and terrifying tale of ventriloquism and obsession. Think Night of the Living Dummy, but amped up to an extreme level of disturbing visual prose. Anthony Hopkins' greatest role was not his turn as Hannibal Lecter but as Corky; a distant magician who racks up a lot of rage and isn't very motivated. This causes him to pick the easy way out and becoming a ventriloquist. Hitting the big time, he finds himself pressured into stardom and into taking a psych evaluation. Scared of what the results might be, he escapes into a backwoods hotel only to find his high school sweetheart. Fats (His dummy) doesn't like the idea of him losing his partner so when people start dying, the real question is whether it's Corky or Fats doing the deed. I remember reading about Magic several years ago. All reactions pointed towards absolute terror incarnate. I rarely trust a film reviewer, but I felt compelled to experience this one on my own with a fresh slate. Seeing as how Dark Sky Films had recently released it, I picked up a copy myself. Magic blew me away leaving me in a defunct daze. Richard Attenborough has masterfully created a riveting suspense film with enough paranoia and romance to bide its own sweet time until the "shocking conclusion". Although I haven't gotten around to inspecting the original novel written by William Goldman, I fear that it will not house the emotional intensity that Sir Hopkins brought to the recessed role of Corky.

My experiences with Magic are one and many. During the love-making scene, aided by the musical cues from the acclaimed Jerry Goldsmith, I felt the nerves shoot throughout my body. I don't get shaken easily but Magic had found a weakness and exploited it. In an attempt to analyze the film, what you see is what you get. While being a pretty normal film by today's standards, Magic indeed has something for everybody. There's voyeurism, madness, mayhem, murder, magic, and developmental leads galore! Magic is by no means an "Art" film but it supplies an old-fashioned backdrop of a resort on the water. These settings in horror films always appear so open and spaced but when the terror picks up, these corners become tighter and tighter, allowing fewer outcomes other than an inevitable death. Magic is a glorified speech against the corruption of the modern psychological horror. With such a stellar plaque to brandish, it also serves as the most horrifying and well made film concerning a ventriloquist dummy.

L'IMMORTEL

Richard Berry (2010)

Perhaps better known within the Western continents as 22 Bullets, L'Immortel is based loosely around the real life events of Jacky Le Mat, a mafioso who was shot 22 times and left for dead. As you can most likely assume, Le Mat survived and exacted bloody revenge on his assailants. As far as I can tell, this exposure of the "Revenge of the Professional" will no doubt draw comparisons to Vincent Cassel's Mesrine crime epic but allow me to assure you that in no way, shape, or form are these two films to be connected or juxtaposed aside from the country of origin and a sweeping tale of true crime reincarnated via cinema. My hopes for L'Immortel were exceedingly substantial after seeing a true return to form from Vincent Cassel at damn near his best and I could only hope the same for the Moroccan titan, Jean Reno. Sadly, L'Immortel never fully recognizes its potential until too late, giving us a sub-par film that secures its lead actor's potential a bit too far in.

Picking up with a quiet prelude was the smart and reasonable way to open this film of a bloodthirsty retiree; bloodthirsty being implied as Charly Mattei's bloody roots are never looked fiercely upon save for a single flashback scene of a youthful assassination. As Charly picks up his son from the grandmothers house, Reno gives us the same semblance of a giddy killer as seen and recycled from Leon: The Professional. One of several reasons why the film substitutes the need for plot consistency is due to Jean Reno's quirky and charming performance as a quiet, hulking killer with a heart of euphoric gold. After enjoying the company of his son, Charly lets him out of the car to explore a festival while he parks the car. Proceeding an overture of opera, a black unmarked van pulls up and 8 masked men get out with weapons drawn. Shot after shot, bullet after bullet, is buried in Jean Reno's body with a brutality unmatched by most crime films. Facial tearing and fleshy squib, L'Immortel opens up with a lit fuse waiting for the foundation to blast open and once it does, the onslaught of incredible editing and seamless violence becomes intertwined with the frustrating and mundane.

Key scene being the surgery and in this scene we are introduced to the characters running the film and motivations, the aforementioned 22 bullets. Voltage peaks at scene of slug removal - lead like candy. Metal dish stained red delicious with a heaving mound of clinking confections. Words that come to mind when this scene takes place. I had never thought my mind would so vividly explode with imagination as it did with Jean Reno's comatose body on a hospital gurney. 22 Bullets might forever be known as the "little thriller that couldn't" but it remains a career necessity and a stunning evolution of Jean Reno as a bad ass with a heart and serves as a prime weight on his character alignment scale. While I can appreciate all forms of the man's kindness, his entries of Crimson Rivers, Empire of the Wolves, and now, 22 Bullets, really help to even out his contributions of family friendly adult entertainment including Godzilla, The Big Blue, The Pink Panther, and For Roseanna. Marketing this film to an American audience is what the split personality of 22 Bullets has in mind. France has it right with a sprawling cityscape overshadowed by a near-crippled marauding mafioso. American audiences are instead treated with the poster concept of a tacky look-alike to that of a straight-to-DVD Al Pacino machine. Vending machine quality and all. The tag-line "Revenge of the Professional" is misconstrued in an attempt to market this film to fans of Leon: The Professional and the reoccurring affinity for classical music. Hook, line, sinker?

No matter what you hear, L'Immortel is simply and ethically one of those films in which the only opinion you can holster is your own. From someone who has an endearing appreciation for all of Jean Reno's line of work and bloody crime thrillers, L'Immortel is a bittersweet film caressing the honor system supposed in most of these killers in their call of duty. Jean Reno turns over an excellent and versatile performance as a wicked murderer not to be fucked with. Within his smile and wrinkles, his face tells a tale that every movie fleshes out. Behind wise eyes lurks a terrific character actor that accommodates real life emotion with a harrowing efficiency. Sadly, L'Immortel becomes ensnared by loose ends and patented revenge devices in such a way that the only real saving grace is the keen brutality and jolting violence. To quote Uzi Joe on the subject of Jean Reno's tears, "Each tear is a thousand souls of weaker men who died trying to gain his powers." Fantasy put to the side, I believe him.

LEMORA: A CHILD'S TALE OF THE SUPERNATURAL

The idea of a mid-1970s PG-rated vampire flick about a young girl usually seems like a less than tempting prospect, but after hearing much underground praise for the film Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973) aka Lemora: The Lady Dracula aka The Legendary Curse of Lemora directed by Richard Blackburn, I finally decided to suck it up and give the film a fair and serious viewing after having a copy of the work in my possession for over a year. Lemora is probably one of the best reasons as to why one should not judge a film by its rating and marginality, as it proved to be one of the most truly virtuoso vampire flicks I have had the luxury to see and one of the most uniquely American 'horror' films ever made. Taking critical inspiration from H.P. Lovecraft (The Shadow Over Innsmouth), Arthur Machen (The White People), Mervyn Laurence Peake (Boy in Darkness), film noir, and the more unadorned aspects of 20th century American history, Lemora is a splendidly unrivaled Southern Gothic set in the depression era American south. After seeing the relative success of Count Yorga, Vampire (1970) directed by Bob Kelljan, Lemora director Richard Blackburn (rightfully) felt confident that he could direct a superior horror film due to his somewhat uncommon literate understanding of the horror story, especially those written by the likes of Lovecraft. Sticking to the southern tradition of honoring family history, Blackburn's paternal confederate ancestry would also be a crucial inspiration on the pleasantly peculiar atmosphere and themes of country fried grit, bastardized backwoods Baptist Christianity, and downright unholy repression-based perversions that are featured throughout the film. On top of providing his ½ Yankee son with inspirational stories about real-life country yokels who don't take kindly to strangers in their towns, Richard's father C.V. Blackburn also acted as executive producer for Lemora and even played a small role in the film as a seemingly drunken man urinating in public. Richard Blackburn, himself, would also play the imperative role of the Reverend; a somewhat dubious religious leader who acts as a surrogate father to the child lead Lila Lee (played by the already adult age Cheryl "Rainbeaux" Smith).

Despite her maturity in real-life, no better person was born to play the role of 13-year-old Lila Lee in Lemora than Cheryl Smith. Nowadays, Smith is best known for her roles in a variety of cult films (Caged Heat, Phantom of the Paradise, Cheech and Chong's Up In Smoke) and playing drums with alpha-dyke musician Joan Jett. Horror films are well known for their glaring lack of sufficient and believable acting, yet Cheryl Smith, with her truly sad and 'damaged' facial expressions, lent a certain authenticity to Lemora that is central to the driving emotional and visceral potency of the film. Lesley Gilb, who plays the nazi chic lesbian vampiress Lemora with unconventional witch attributes, also adds a exigent ingredient to the film as she acts as the perfect antithesis to the innocence of little lady Lila Lee, both in personality and physique. While Lila is a humble and thoroughly chaste girl with angelic blonde hair and a pleasantly petite body, Lemora is a domineering vamp with a tall stature and dark features (aside from her corpse-like skin) who does not take no for an answer, whether it be from a man, monster, or child. Lemora has a collection of loyal undead children and hopes to coherence Lila into joining her ferocious foster family by using a variety of somewhat subtle erotically driven compliments such as, "what an exciting figure you have." The male characters featured in Lemora range from degenerate criminals to active scumbags to potential molesters, yet most of the women are puritanically dressed Baptist lemmings who swoon for the handsome charlatan Reverend. Lila's father is a well dressed, pudgy gangster who did the unspeakable act of killing his wife/daughter's mother, hence why the lonely girl was adopted by the good Reverend. The Reverend himself even seems to have a hard time keeping his hands off of Lila's little lily, but through the imagined power of the lord and misinterpreting religious texts, he seems to mostly persevere, at least for most of the film. During the beginning of Lemora, Lila is summoned by her apparently dying father (under false pretenses) to meet him in the decaying feral town of Astaroth where everyone has some degree of the degenerative Lovecraftian "Astaroth look." On route, Lila's bus is attacked by barbaric lycanthropic-like vampires and is intern saved and imprisoned by the beautiful yet endlessly cunning Lemora who therein throws the young girl into a phantasmagorical tribulation where the line between reality and dreams has been illustriously ripped apart at the seams.

Lemora, not unlike Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970) directed by Jaromil Jireš and The Reflecting Skin (1990) directed by Philip Ridley, is an ominous coming-of-age flick that – while too scary, sexualized, and incoherent for the typical child (and a number of prudish adults) to view – does manages to recapture the wonder and hopeless bewilderment of childhood. As a longtime cynic, skeptic, and misanthrope (even as a prepubescent child), I was even able to tap into my "inner-child" via Lemora. In fact, I was so surprised by the impact the film had on me that I re-watched Lemora two more times the day after my initial viewing just to make sure I was not in a state of random hypnotic derangement during the night before. Seeing Lemora was the closest I have come to recapturing the singularly penetrating and totally unpredictable experience I had while randomly watching Don Coscarelli's Phantasm (1979) late one night on cable television for the first time when I was about ten years old. Lemora is one of few American horror films that has managed to combine stark surrealism, taboo religious themes, traditional horror elements, vintage Americana, and unpretentious artsy in a work that stands alone in terms of originality and sheer quality of pure entertainment. The fact that Lemora is not as well known nor as highly revered (by fans and critics alike) as films like George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968) and Sam Raimi's The Evil Dead (1981) is nothing short of a testament to the peasant-like philistine tastes of artistically-disinterested American audiences. Although some believe the obscurity of Lemora is the result of the film being banned by the Catholic League of Decency, director Richard Blackburn has voiced (on the audio commentary of the Synapse Films release of the film) that such claims are nothing short of hearsay as he has never received any form of formal notification from the organization. Thankfully, at least the French – the people who essentially invented film theory and have consistently esteemed film as a legitimate art form – have long respected Lemora as piece of exceptionally crafted cinematic design. After all, Erich von Stroheim did not spend his remaining days in France for nothing.

Lemora seems to be an all around cursed production of sorts as not only did the film fall into the unfortunate realm of uncertainty after a limited run of theatrical distribution, but the two lead actresses of the film would also meet grim fates. Cheryl "Rainbeaux" Smith, who was apparently high on painkillers throughout the production of Lemora, died in late 2002 at the age of 47 after suffering complications from liver disease and hepatitis due to a calamitous two decade addiction to heroin, which also resulted in two prison sentences and the total disintegration of her acting career. Of course, Smith was not as innocent on the real-life set of Lemora as her character seems in the movie as she apparently bragged to the film crew that she gave Dick Blackburn a bulging boner during their kissing scene; a claim the bashful director wholly denies. Lesley Gilb (aka Lesley Taplin), whose acting career unfortunately all but ended after her excellent performance as the title character in Lemora, died tragically in a car accident on highway 101 in Los Angeles, California in 2009 at the age of 62. Aside from a brief period of critical acclaim for co-writing the script for Paul Bartel's black comedy Eating Raoul (1982) and penning a couple episodes for the George A. Romero produced anthology horror TV series Tales From the Darkside (1983-1988), Lemora director Richard Blackburn's filmmaking career was also cut prematurely short. Still, few filmmakers can boast that they have assembled a work as gorgeously quaint, exemplar, and full of artistic integrity as Lemora, and for that alone, Mr. Blackburn deserves much praise. The film is a virtual confederate haunted house amusement ride in film form that never falls into banality and calculated clichés, nor preposterous pretensions, but provides the viewer with an incomparable time of very real predatory pedophilic monsters, as well as those of the imaginary bloodsucking sort. By the conclusion of Lemora, the viewer will probably question whether or not Lila's experiences were the product of reality or her dreams, which is indubitably one of the greatest strengths of a fundamentally anarchic primordial film of ceaseless ambiguity where nothing is as it seems.

CAT ON A HOT TIN ROOF
CAT ON A HOT TIN ROOF

Richard Brooks (1958)

Flaming Southerner Tennessee Williams sure had a knack for writing drama, especially America's greatest form of drama, the Southern Gothic. Despite the different director, every film I have had the pleasure of viewing with a story written by Tennessee Williams always turns out to be a work of dramatic cinema brilliance. Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1958), starring a very young Paul Newman and Elizabeth Taylor, is another brilliant work based on a play by Tennessee Williams. Watching Cat on a Hot Tin Roof makes one realize that there was actually a time when Hollywood (somewhat) justly portrayed the American South as a place that has more than superstitious religious hicks trying to give their sisters a lick. Cat on a Hot Tin Roof takes a look at a rich Southern family amidst a family tragedy involving the dying of Big Daddy, a family man and personal empire builder.

Big Daddy is big and fat, but his own self-made empire is even bigger. Unfortunately for Big Daddy, as he states himself, a man can't buy life. Big Daddy has no interest in screwing his nagging wife, but he's proud that he's willing to buy her anything she may fancy. Big Daddy also has two sons that disappoint him, one being a greedy lawyer named Gooper and the other being a 30 year old kid named Brick (Paul Newman). Big Daddy wants to hookup his lazy alcoholic son Brick with his empire, but Brick won't agree to get his hot wife Maggie the Cat pregnant because he rather screw his dead friend Skipper (when he was alive, of course). Maggie the Cat, played by a very young Elizabeth Taylor, is a woman who has curves that are practically busting out of the seams of her clothes. What a shame her homosexual husband is unwilling to tame her.

The acting chemistry between Maggie the Cat and Brick is intense to say the least. The casting director of Cat on a Hot Tin Roof certainly made the right decision when pairing Paul Newman and Elizabeth Taylor as the two leads. A wretched cunt by the name of Sister-woman was also brilliantly played in a repulsive manner by Madeleine Sherwood, a character known for shooting out many children out of her cooch. I don't think I have ever been more disgusted by an antagonist in my life and the only thing this bitch by the atrocious nickname of Sister-woman wanted was money via her father-in-law Big Daddy. Big Daddy, being the swaggering pimp that he is, knows how much of a moneygrubber Sister-woman is and thankfully treats her rude behavior accordingly. Big Daddy may not want to screw his aged wife Big Mamma, but he sure picked the right woman to keep his sons/daughter-in-laws in check. What a drama-rama in one big house in the Deep South.

With Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, it is once again proven that if you have a brilliantly written story and charismatic cast, a film can work without an auteur. Apparently mother-lover Elvis Presley turned down the role of Brick and I am certainly glad. The Aryan-looking half-Jew Paul Newman is certainly an actor that followed not too far behind in Marlon Brando's footsteps, also showing he had what it takes to play in a lead in a story written by Tennessee Williams. Although I had yet to see Elizabeth Taylor's acting skills before Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, I assumed she would be an annoying prude to see on screen due to her overblown celebrity status. I must admit that her performance in Cat on a Hot Tin Roof was one of a seductive and smooth walking/talking hot kitty.

LOOKING FOR MR. GOODBAR

Richard Brooks (1977)

As the onscreen and offscreen lover of both neurotic heeb Woody Allen and Italian stallion Al Pacino, Nordic actress Diane Keaton has certainly shown a penchant for quasi-miscegenation and seemingly mismatched romances with short, swarthy off-white fellows, but none of her real-life nor fiction love affairs compared to the ones featured in the absurdly underrated flick Looking for Mr. Goodbar (1977) directed by subversive Jewish-American auteur Richard Brooks (Elmer Gantry, In Cold Blood). Based on the 1975 novel of the same name written by Jewess novelist Judith Rossner about the real-life brutal murder of Roseann Quinn, a 28-year-old New York City schoolteacher who led a deleterious double life as a pill-popping bar whore whose wild and wanton behavior led to her grizzly and premature death, Looking for Mr. Goodbar is a dark yet sometimes humorous melodrama about an idealistic lapsed Catholic Irish-American girl who, when not teaching deaf Negro children as a brainwashed McLiberal, is screwing random Guidos and middle-aged Judaic fellows she picks up at the bar. A rare (and arguably, unintentional) depiction of the decidedly disastrous effects the so-called “new left” and counter-culture movements had on white Americans that was written and directed from the perspective of members of the chosen amongst god’s chosen, Looking for Mr. Goodbar is, not unsurprisingly, virtually unknown today and has yet to be released on dvd despite featuring such big name actors and actresses like Diane Keaton and Richard Gere. Belonging in good company with other such great culturally pessimistic celluloid works from the 1970s like Joe (1970) directed by John G. Avildsen, Death Wish (1974) directed by Michael Winner, Taxi Driver (1976) directed by Martin Scorsese, and Paul Schrader’s Hardcore (1979), Looking for Mr. Goodbar follows the moral degeneration of an Irish-American chick who, after falling in love with and being defiled by her married Jewish college professor who subsequently dumps her goy gal ass, turns into an alcohol-addled, pill-popping whore who screws sleazy philistine fellows when she is not wasting her life being a bleeding heart liberal who devotes her time to teaching deaf multicultural kids, despite essentially loathing her own family. An exceedingly enthralling, if not oftentimes infuriating, depiction of a naïve girl who essentially has a hole burnt into her soul after too much loony leftist brainwashing in college and being used as a cheap thrill by a Hebraic college professor who sees her nothing more as a sexy yet stupid Shiksa, Looking for Mr. Goodbar is like a well meaning after-school special on the ills of Marcusian madness and the ethno-masochistic and xenophiliac do-gooder white slaves and self-sacrificing nihilists it creates.

The psychologically crippling self-loathing of Irish-American Theresa Dunn (Diane Keaton) started at a young age when she developed scoliosis as a young girl and was forced to wear a rather unflattering full-body cast to help straighten her back. The daughter of a hardworking traditional Irish Catholic man (Richard Kiley) who is repelled and angered by his baby girl's would-be-rebellious leftist politics she was dogmatically indoctrinated with in college, Theresa certainly does not suffer from an Elektra complex as she falls in love with a sleazy and self-satisfied Jewish college professor named Martin (Alan Feinstein), who does not think twice about dumping the dumb girl after the school year ends. Naturally, Theresa develops a rather pessimistic and self-loathing outlook on life after the overly intellectual Israelite breaks up with her, but being a victim of a "New Left" education (symbolically taught to her by the Semitic man who literally and figuratively screwed her over), she believes she must fulfill the most holy and righteous of causes by turning poor black deaf children into intellectual heavyweights, even though she treats most of her own biological family members with disdain. An unconsciously suicidal ice queen with no real personal plans for the future aside from slaving away to the public system as a selfless servant of ghetto blacks who see her as a condescending and self-righteous nuisance, Theresa makes sure she will never have a family of her own by nonsensically having a hysterectomy, telling the doctor she wants "no kids."

Eventually, Theresa begins living a second life and becomes a regular fixture at local bars and clubs and starts a purely sexual relationship with a dumb wop named Tony (Richard Gere), who enjoys doing pushups while high on speed while wearing nothing more than a leather-fag-esque jockstrap. Theresa also begins dating a nice but nerdy welfare case worker named James (William Atherton), the sort of man she would have married and had kids with were she not so positively sexually depraved and nihilistic. While James falls in love with Theresa and will do anything for her, the McBitch just cannot get enough of rough sex with retarded Guido Tony, who is at least intelligent enough to arrive at the insight, "I don't believe it...teacher of little kids cruising crummy bars...Jesus Christ, no wonder the country is so screwed up." Naturally, Tony eventually smacks Theresa around and eventually gets her arrested for drug possession, thus leading to the inevitable end of the debauched pseudo-romantic relationship. While James does everything he can to declare his love and respect for Theresa, the Irish lass cannot help but give away her ass to degenerates at her favorite bar. One night, Theresa picks the wrong guy and it ultimately results in her being brutally raped and slashed to death. Looking to get screwed one more time before midnight on New Year's Eve, Theresa hooks up with a deranged ex-con and closet-case homo named Gary (Tom Berenger), who has just had a faggy lover's spat with his gay lover. When Gary fails to "rise to the occasion" after going back to the Irish-American gal's apartment, he goes on a seemingly pointless rant about how "in my neighborhood, if you didn't fight you were a fruit...In prison, if you didn't fight, you spread ass." Not unsurprisingly, Theresa attempts to throw psychopathic gay boi Gary out of her apartment, but it is only at this point that he is finally able to penetrate her, first with a knife and then with his penis. In the end, Theresa “lived by the dick and died by the dick,” as a result of turning her back on the important lessons she learned being brought up in the Catholic Church.

Aside from featuring the cinematic exquisiteness of LeVar Burton of Reading Rainbow fame playing a ghetto thug who literally busts Richard Gere’s balls, Looking for Mr. Goodbar also makes for a striking and stern indictment of the self-absorbed narcissism and nihilistic hedonism of the baby boomer generation, the first generation brought up on television and arguably the most spoiled generation in all of human history. Hopelessly brainwashed by the quasi-Marxist Judaic swill she was infected with in college and defiled by an arrogant and pretentious Jewish professor she clearly had deep yet delusional respect for as opposed to meeting a man of her own racial and cultural persuasion who would have treated her right and she could have started a family with, Theresa, like many people of her generation and subsequent generations of European Americans, is essentially in a state of perennial childhood as a girl who never grew up and accepted responsibility, but instead drowned her misery in cheap beer and untermensch semen. Aside from the fact it features Fellini-esque dream-sequences and avant-garde montages, a film like Looking for Mr. Goodbar could have never been made in contemporary Hollywood due to its no bullshit critique of degenerate counter-culture values and liberal education and I would not be surprised if this film has yet to be released on DVD for these very reasons. The fact that the film was penned and directed by Jews makes the motives behind Looking for Mr. Goodbar seem all the more dubious as a sort of “Annie Hall from Hell” and degenerate Philip Roth inspired melodrama with a tinge of Jud Süß (1940) swooning over a beautiful goy Shiksa who is slowly but surely spiritually, emotionally, and physically defiled by alien politics and men, both of which stunt her ability to grow into a nice Irish Catholic girl and instead lead to her demise as a victim of a self-loathing sodomite, her virtual Jungian animus, who she would have never met had she not developed a propensity for picking up perverts in seedy bars after giving up on real romantic relationships in general. Stating such pseudo-empowerment feminist vomit like, “I’m my own girl. I belong to me,” Theresa ultimately proves her idiotic independence by setting herself up on a slippery slope of soulless sex and mind-numbing drugs, with her last act of intercourse symbolically climaxing in her death. While Looking for Mr. Goodbar is a film that has been known to be quite irksome for leftist and feminist types, it certainly confirms the feminist mantra/bumper sticker, “Well behaved women rarely make history.”

MODERN VAMPIRES

Although I have never been particularly fond of Bela Lugosi's iconic portrayal of Dracula, I have always had an instinctive fondness for vampires and their charismatic and hypnotic persona's. In fact, Dracula is my favorite famous monster but I welcome the warm company of any coldblooded bloodsucker; whether it be the cunning cryptic intentions of the grotesque rat-like ghoul and rotting aristocrat Count Orlok from F.W. Murnau's pioneering silent flick Nosferatu (1922) or the distinctly suave style of Jim Morrison-esque undead shaman David (played by Kiefer Sutherland) from Joel Schumacher's The Lost Boys (1987); a still fresh and hip revamp of vampire storytelling. Unfortunately, it has been sometime since I saw a vampire film that left a deep enough impression on me to pierce my skin and draw blood. Despite being somewhat entertaining as a whole, the mostly overrated film Stake Land (2010) – a post-apocalyptic flick with vampires that are as mentally defective and undiscerning of eaters as brain-dead zombies – totally demystifies and demolishes the ancient legacy of vampires. Although apparently featuring roaming conquering armies of the fanged undead, Stake Land is as vampire-illiterate as vampire films come and unfortunately it belongs to a recurring trend. Of course, the teenage-panty-moisting Twilight series has left a completely different but equally odious garlic smell that has overwhelmed the vampire story which I will not even begin to describe. Luckily, I had the honor of recently discovering, watching, and re-watching Modern Vampires (1998) aka Revenant directed by Richard Elfman; a vampire black comedy that is both genuinely humorous and cognizant of the supernatural legend it so lovingly but lethally lampoons. Needless to say, when I discovered that the man who directed the maniacal and malevolent surrealist musical comedy Forbidden Zone (1982) sank his teeth into the age old tale of the vampyre, and reawakened it by setting it in contemporary times, I was instantly entranced and secured a copy for a mere 1 penny online; no doubt a minor but notable investment with a priceless return of infinite replay value.

Admittedly, Richard Elfman was aiming for the most philistine of audiences with some of the glaringly trashy, lowbrow scenes featured in Modern Vampires. Of course, the gutter-grade neo-vaudevillian comedy contained within the film is indubitably an imperative part of its politically incorrect appeal. The main protagonist of Modern Vampires is Dallas (played by Caspar Van Dien, an actor once described as a "perfect life-sized Ken doll"); a cigar-smoking, undead-rebel-without-a-cause who falls out of favor with the Count (the decadent "dictator" of vampires) decades ago after turning a crippled member of the Hitler Youth named Hans Van Helsing (played by Marco Hofschneider of Europa Europa) into a vampire without permission. Hans was the son of old school National Socialist Doctor Frederick Van Helsing (played by Rod Steiger); a seriously idealistic and unintentionally comical Viennese vampire exterminator whose love for the Führer has never swayed. Proving his undying commitment to the final solution of the vampire problem, Dr. Van Helsing unflinchingly murders his own son immediately upon learning that he is a vampire. Flash forward to modern times, elderly Dr. Van Helsing has traveled to the epicenter of vampire culture – Los Angeles, California; the official sin-ridden city of bloodsuckers – to kill Dallas and any other compatriot of the parasitical subspecies that he can find. As the occult leaders of the city, the decadent vampires of L.A. are stern libertines who don't take kindly to the unwarranted prudishness of mere mortals. Out of desperation due to the feebleness of a golden übermensch heart, Dr. Van Helsing (the real Steiger also had a heart attack before the film) becomes 1/2 of the ultimate comedic odd-couple when he unconventionally recruits black Crips members "Time Bomb" (played by the usually over-sensitive actor Gabriel Casseus) to help kill vampires gangsta style. Being a laidback vampire, Dallas is more interested in finding a baby vamp (who he illegally "turned" two decades earlier) named Nico aka the "Hollywood Slasher"; an intemperate female novice bloodsucker who acts as a pseudo-hooker so as to lure in her hopelessly pathetic and perverted middle-age bourgeois businessman prey. Of course, the Count wants to kill the bewitching trailer park pearl Nico due to her unofficial status as a vampire and her reckless public predacity of humans that compromises official bloodsucker secrecy. Although taking place over the course of a couple days and nights (with flashbacks from decades past), Modern Vampires feel like an unrestrained all-night nosferatu party. Paying tribute to Paul Morrissey's (not Andy Warhol's) Blood for Dracula (1974), Homo-Aryan-character-actor and sub-international-superstar Udo Kier plays the hilarious role of the first vampire to be annihilated for the greater cause of the long deceased Third Reich when he is staked by Dr. Van Helsing's loyal but initially reluctant Uncle Tom. Modern Vampires also features a notable performance from the mostly grotesque Sex and the City star Kim Cattrall as a surprisingly sexy and comical German vampire named Ulrike who quite eloquently tells Negro gang members that they are, "untermensch." Scotsman Craig Ferguson also does a superb job portraying an English vampire whose lucid lingo and mostly dry humor would undoubtedly bring warmth to the seemingly cold-heart of Queen Elizabeth. As one can expect, Modern Vampires is a postmodern take on the vampire tale where every convention of the horror subgenre is either calculatedly exaggerated or quite consciously terminated. Although on first glance seeming like a half-ass exercise in tasteless depravity, Modern Vampires is a passionate (if sometimes deplorable) homage to a perennial story that is worth any vampirephiliac's time.

Modern Vampires also antedates the somewhat similar vampire politics and hedonism of HBO's extremely popular television series True Blood by a decade. Like Modern Vampires, True Blood explores the ancient international microcosm of the coffin-hibernating cryptic vampire elite from a neoteric perspective.

Thankfully, the bloodlusting killers of Modern Vampires, unlike like those of True blood, are committed bluebloods who have no interest in joining human society and are stoically politically incorrect. Of course, like True Blood, Modern Vampires features gratuitous nudity, visceral violence, and bodacious bodily dismemberment, but (thankfully) lacks the misplaced and totally superficial melodrama of the HBO show. Unfortunately, Modern Vampires has fallen into the unideal fate of being lost in an abyss of mostly mediocre, forgotten vampire flicks, but, with the notoriety of popular series like True Blood, it does have the potential to become a somewhat revered Cult item in coming decades. It also does not hurt that Modern Vampires director Richard Elfman is the undeniably depraved, audacious auteur behind one of America's greatest Cult films; Forbidden Zone. If the idea of an 'anti-vampire' film sounds like a bloody delectable prospect to you, Modern Vampires will certainly have you feeling reasonably fulfilled. Just do not expect the film to have a charismatic Count in the tradition of Bela Lugosi and Christopher Lee as the oafish 'alpha'-bloodsucker of Modern Vampires seems more interested in smoking meatpoles and crack than focusing on seducing and turning the most beautiful living female in town.

Richard Franklin (1978)

In the 1978 Ozploitation flick Patrick, a naive nurse named Kathy develops unwarranted empathy for a comatose matricidal killer named Patrick. After killing his Mother and her lover three years earlier (whose lovemaking further perturbed poor disturbed Patty boi) - Patrick - probably caused by his incapacity to psychologically cope with his dirty derelict deeds - fell into a coma. Although Patrick is impotent as far as physical mobility goes, he has developed keen psychokinetic powers. Nurse Kathy - a fetching young lady with an inquisitive mind - finds herself fondling Patrick's genitals out of curiosity - even arousing his vegetated member. Overtime, Patrick develops an increasingly romantic obsession with hot twat nurse Kathy. Jealous of any man that enters Kathy's life, self-centered Patrick begins to manipulate events in her life from the discreet comfort of his sterile hospital bed. Like a lot of guys with mommy issues, love struck Patrick naively mistakes Kathy's kindness and sympathy for love, thus intensifying his psychokinetic wave of destruction after the cutesy nurse neglects to reciprocate his delusional feelings. Of course, Kathy eventually tells Patrick - in a fit of unrestrained rage - that on top of being a narcissistic Momma's boy who is incapable of true love - he has nothing to offer her, aside from psychokinetic scribbles on an electric typewriter. At best, Patrick is a quasi-villain who is not exactly evil, but acts more like an irrational neurotic girl whose judgment is blurred due to fluctuating hormone levels during a monthly menstrual cycle - as he always acts out violently when things do not work out in his favor. That being said, Patrick is indubitably an unconventional work of horror and a neglected cinematic gem that is guaranteed to offer the viewer a jolly old deranged time - where the monster is an immature matricidal maniac's mind, yet despite his lack of animation, he still gets your adrenalin pumping just fine.

Patrick was directed by Richard Franklin, a Hitchcock connoisseur who freely admits his psychokinetic horror film was influenced by the Ed Gein inspired masterpiece Psycho (1960). In fact, Franklin developed a real-life friendship with Hitch and would later go on to direct Roadgames (1981) - a mobile vehicle reworking of Hitchcock's Rear Window (1958) - as well as Psycho II (1983) - a surprisingly decent sequel to Alfred Hitchcock's original masterpiece. Despite taking influence from Hitchcock's Psycho, Patrick is a highly original film in its own right. Although both films feature pathetic matricidal killers who have obvious problems socializing with the opposite sex, the similarities pretty much end there. Patrick screenwriter Everett De Roche based the script on a real-life mentally unstable individual named Patrick - who jumped off a balcony after discovering his wife was sleeping with another man - becoming completely paralyzed in the process, aside from being able to spit and catch random erections (like Patrick in the film). Richard Franklin openly admitted (in a DVD audio commentary) that he had "literary pretensions" whilst directing Patrick - taking the liberty to include unreferenced quotes from William Shakespeare (The Tempest) and Oscar Wilde in the film. While girlishly arguing with Nurse Kathy via an electric hospital typewriter, Patrick psychokinetically plagiarizes Wilde's famous quote, "Yet each man kills the thing he loves." Of course, Patrick - being a neurotic maniac - self-deceptively believes that he is in love with Kathy, despite the fact that he has never physically embraced her (nor could he). The hospital's matron - Cassidy - a bitter old wench who seems to suffer from a dire case of sexual repression - has a seemingly irrational hatred for comatose Patrick - as well as an instant contempt for Kathy upon first meeting her. Cassidy - a godless realist and self-satisfied "humanistic" proponent of euthanasia - who at first seems like a vile she-bitch gatekeeper from hospital Hades - ends up coming off as one of the wisest characters by the conclusion of Patrick. Had Kathy practiced the same cold and calculated hospital procedures stringently endorsed by Matron Cassidy, she would have undoubtedly avoided Patrick's hospital bed led reign of temper tantrum terror.

Although early psychoanalysts like Wilhelm Reich and C.G. Jung (who wrote extensively on parapsychology throughout his career) attempted to study Occult phenomena - such unconventional research has now become virtually abandoned in the medical world. In fact, Jung once attended a séance performed by an adolescent girl psychic and also wrote on several clinical cases of double consciousness. Of course, as so cynically portrayed by the doctors in Patrick - the golden age of studying unexplainable psychological phenomenon is long gone. Nowadays, psychologists are only interested diagnosing individuals via brain scans and prescribing dangerous (and many times unpredictable) psychoactive drugs. Nurse Kathy encounters a doctor - who is more arrogant than charming - that freely admits he was originally interested in studying the more mysterious elements of the brain and human psychology - but is now only interested in monetary success. Only Kathy - a naive nurse who is dubious of modern medicine - finds abnormal Patrick to be of an intriguing character. What makes Patrick more interesting than most films of a similar supernatural nature is that it provokes the audience to ask questions \regarding euthanasia - as well as the validity of cold materialistic science when treating psychological blemishes of a less accurately definable sort. Richard Franklin and screenwriting co-partner Everett De Roche originally intended to make a sequel to Patrick; Patrick II: The Man Who Wasn't There, but, alas, fate did not work in their favor, thus the project never left pre-production. Additionally, in the audio commentary for the Synapse DVD release of Patrick, director Richard Franklin acknowledges his interest in remaking Patrick with modern filmmaking technology just as Alfred Hitchcock did with some of his earlier films. Unfortunately, it is now impossible for Franklin to remake Patrick as he passed away in 2007. Still, novice director Mark Hartley announced in February 2010 that he would be remaking the film - undoubtedly the (often times unfortunate) fate of all decent (and not so decent) horror films. Admittedly, it would be interesting to see a modern day Patrick who utilizes a computer and the internet as his pseudo-romantic weaponry of the third eye controlled kind. CLOAK /& DAGGER

Richard Franklin (1984) Spoilers in 5th paragraph

Cut to a winter night in a foreign land. The key irresponsible Russian guard wanders off into the parking lot. Being a sentry is never a forgivable role for a counter-terrorist. In the frosty sky, we see a patriotic parachute deploy. This marks the arrival of a modern mustachioed warrior who stops at nothing other than to tackle the poor guard out of the sky. All this, then crippling a young lady. Meet the man known as Jack Flack; a super agent, womanizer, and professional alpha male. Cloak & Dagger was a must for me to purchase. Not for the classic game nostalgia but thanks to the reality of it being apart of a double feature package - the counterpart being the obligatory Fred Savage/Nintendo vessel known as The Wizard. I can't help myself. I love The Wizard. It's so bad! (End The Wizard reference). While Cloak & Dagger is a swell thriller guised as a compatible family film, something sinister lurks behind the prissy rating. Something dark and recessive. What lies beneath is a level of psychological dementia with a child playing the part of a victim. Cloak & Dagger never really was a game to begin with. Little Davey has an imaginary spy friend who's a character in his favorite role-playing game. Davey is a seeker of thrills and has an active imagination. Throughout the course of the film, you'll be thinking to yourself words like "normal" and "acceptable". Thanks to the generation of parents turning to Ritalin for their children who never met expectations, Cloak & Dagger is an attack on the malleability of a child's mind. This film is a piece of propaganda telling you that your kid is in fact, screwed beyond repair and that the mind taking control is something that is forced by parental shunning and trauma. Director Richard Franklin isn't a sheltered fan of Hitchcock. Inspired by the master of suspense's work, Franklin helmed the needless sequel to Psycho - Psycho II. In fact, the old couple had starring roles in the original psycho including John McIntire who played Al Chambers and Jeanette Nolan who did the voice for Norma Bates. As this film being a suspense film directed towards the younger audience, I'd say that Franklin did a marvelous job at slowly shining light to the terrific terror one can feel thanks to the wonders of cinema. Individualism is cast out for the revered Atari boom. Consider this Hitchcock's ode to technology and the death to the scholarly child.

As for the multi-angled ending, one might misconstrue the endings true intention. I don't favor the idea of singling out an idea and solidifying it to be the definitive vision of said artist, but with Cloak & Dagger, it's a must. The ending summarizes with Jack Flack dying, leaving the boy with a fresh mind only to have his father seemingly die in an exploding airplane. What becomes of this is a silhouette of Jack Flack's figure changing into that of his dad. One could easily accept the PG roots and deem his father an impossibly lucky bastard but the idea of him swapping heroes at the last second and becoming a woeful orphan fits the equation so much easier. Either way, Davey will never be the same again. Whether you notice Jack Flack attempting to coerce young Davey into slaughtering people cause it's "all apart of the game" or the undeniable rip off that is Home Alone 3, Cloak & Dagger has aged extremely well. I dearly miss able child stars. I'd trade Henry Thomas over Freddie Highmore any given dawn. Cloak & Dagger is sadistic in nature and a delicious piece of Atari product placement. While Nintendo was busy fronting the "Radical!" 80s rebel attitude, Atari was catering to the bespectacled geek era. Who knew interactive technology could inspire cultures and fashions.

SOUTHLAND TALES

Richard Kelly (2007)

Richard Kelly's new film, Southland Tales, is virtually impossible to describe without bringing up the spoilers in the film, and let's be honest; they're worth the wait. Southland Tales is the newest apocalyptic film from the creator of Donnie Darko. As we noticed from his previous work, the man has the end of times on his mind and exercises his thoughts well. Southland Tales is a mind trip through the vast tyrannical face of Los Angeles. The plot concerns an almost (Damn me for saying it, but "Lynchian") look into the center story of a single person who is visited by amnesia and is involved in something a lot more complex than it seems, and when I say complex, I mean you won't have a fucking clue as to what is going on until the end. Just like Richard Kelly, he mixes amazing character depth with zany special effects. I must give the man credit for being a digital artist such as himself. He also brings out incredible performances out of mild actors; people who have normally not been seen in such an in-depth role. Justin Timberlake for example, is the narrator of the film. He probably has my favorite role, and his musical number was simply fascinating. Richard Kelly manages to include these new-wave electro songs in his films, and still maintain the quality, which to this day astounds me. I really cannot describe this film at all, due to it being a cacophony of insanity, science, failed feminism, and messianic figures. When I hear all these critics showering the film with negative remarks, it makes me smirk because it is suffering the exact same fate as his other film had dealt with. Southland Tales will prevail, just as Jodorowsky was verbally assaulted for his use of symbolism and lack of story, Kelly will too prevail in the sea of hypocritical Americans. Emotionally affecting, religion mocking, and evangelical madness. This is the near future film of the century. No one has captured something ever quite like this before. Just as Donnie Darko was the prelude to the 9/11 attacks, Southland Tales might be the opening score to a beautiful apocalypse. Part political satire, part surrealism, All American.

Richard Kern (1985)

If his films were actually in any way sensual or erotic, I would be tempted to label Richard Kern (Manhattan Love Suicides, The Evil Cameraman)—a somewhat dorky fellow that has the dubious distinction of being the most prolific filmmaker that the Cinema of Transgression movement ever produced, even though he never managed to direct a single feature-length film—a pornographer, yet the gratuitous sex and nudity of his films, which certainly seems fairly outmoded nowadays, is ultimately about as arousing as a vasectomy or used tampon. Undoubtedly, Kern is like a sort of avant-garde exploitation auteur, as he merely cuts out the pretense of a plot and character development in favor of solely focusing on all the degenerate scenes of sex and violence that are the reason people go to see exploitation films in the first place. Indeed, Kern's arguable magnum opus Fingered (1988) feels like what might happen if some morally retarded junky Mansonite creep attempted to condense Wes Craven's The Last House on the Left (1972) into a mere pseudo-snuff flick where only sleazily stylized sex and violence matters. In short, Kern's films are mere climaxes with only the most rudimentary elements of token foreplay, so it should be no surprise that the auteur would go on to be both a music video director and porn photographer for Hustler, among other things that demonstrate that the filmmaker may have a short attention span and fragmented mind as a result of all the various drugs that he fried his brain with during the 1980s. In fact, for his early work Submit to Me (1985), Kern disposed of narrative entirely to create what is a 12-minute performance (anti)art piece where about a dozen or so of his decidedly debauched friends engage in some of the things they like best like bondage, heroin, aberrant sex, and ultra-violence, among other things that will probably not seem too extreme to many contemporary viewers as overrated pseudo-artsy-fartsy mainstream films like Oliver Stone's Natural Born Killers (1994) and Darren Aronofsky's Requiem for a Dream (2000) have already surpassed them in terms of sheer graphic sexual content and gratuitous violence. Of course, what separates Kern's no-budget cinematic works from these oftentimes unintentionally hokey Hollywood films is that the degeneracy they depict is mostly genuine and reflects the real-life experiences and passion of the filmmaker and performers as opposed to the sort of phony bullshit that you would expect to be accepted by some monetary-motivated producer in Tinseltown who lives in a large mansion in Malibu. When asked in the early 1990s for an article entitled The Evil Cameraman: An Introduction to Richard Kern by Paul Anthony-Woods about how many people that starred in his films had already died, Kern replied, "Five or six people I knew have died in the last few years, three who were in the films. One was suicide, a couple were AIDS. One girl got beaten up by a drug dealer, and died afterwards. The guy who committed suicide had AIDS. People die from AIDS and OD's all the time.”

Featuring a virtual who's who of the Cinema of Transgression movement, including the director himself, filmmaker Tommy Turner, Lung Leg, and Lydia Lunch, among various others, Kern's anti-linear celluloid 'apolitical agit-prop' piece was once described by fellow Transgressive filmmaker Tessa Hughes-Freeland (Baby Doll, Nymphomania) as “an ocular assault of prurient psychopornadelia,” though the makers seem to have been more interested in heroin than acid as especially reflected in a scene towards the end of the film where a junky overdoses and his corpse subsequently begins to rot while he still has the needle in his arm. In fact, the man that portrays the junky overdosing is Cinema of Transgression auteur Tommy Turner who is notable for not only being a real-life junky, but also being a shockingly unprolific filmmaker who only managed to ever direct a handful of films, including the aborted feature Where Evil Dwells (1985) co-directed with queer artist David Wojnarowicz and the short Rat Trap (1986) co-directed with Hughes-Freeland, with Simonland (1984) being the only film he ever managed to direct all by himself (though Kern helped him out a lot by acting as his cinematographer). Undoubtedly, Turner's pathetic, cadaverous 'performance' in Submit to Me is quite indicative of the film's self-destructively autobiographical essence, with auteur Kern acting as a sort of anarchistic ringmaster to all the visceral post-punk filmic festivities. While expressing a sort of stylized realism, Kern's film is not without its schlocky cinematic influences. Aside from his first film Goodbye 42nd Street (1986) being a tribute to the exceedingly trashy horror and exploitation films that would play the infamous eponymous street, Kern revealed some of his horror influences when he stated in his interview with Anthony-Woods, “I read Tom Savini's make-up book around the time of DAWN OF THE DEAD. Later, I saw THE EVIL DEAD for the first time, and the effects really shocked me. Now, they seem more commonplace. When I came to do SUBMIT TO ME NOW, I did the effects in about six hours. It was kind of a cheap trick, submitting art movie lovers to horror movie effects.” Not unlike the films of Dutch avant-garde auteur Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento) and the early works of Aryan Kaganof (The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man, Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers), Submit to Me is 'horror' at its most direct, pure, unadulterated, visceral, and confrontational, albeit somewhat more primitive and amateurish. Incidentally, all three filmmakers have been attacked by feminists and accused of misogyny, thus proving that they all must be doing something right.

While Submit to Me was made by a real-life junky and features real-life junkies acting like junkies, Kern once stated in regard to what inspired the film's overall aesthetic, “I remembered how movies looked to me when I was fucked up on acid.” In fact, the film was originally entitled Acid Death and was routinely screened at various downtown NYC LSD parties, but many of the original performers opted to have their parts excised from the film for obvious reasons, thus resulting in Kern more or less reconstructing the entire film into something completely different and more fluidly violent. In fact, when asked about the 30-minute film Acid Death in an interview with Jack Sargeant, Kern stated, "I took all the good stuff, and put it into SUBMIT TO ME." In its depiction of people seductively staring into the camera while showing off their flagrant acts of degeneracy, the film sort of feels like a sort circle jerk where the 'characters' unload their spunk on Kern and, in turn, the viewer, hence the title of the flick. Indeed, by the end of the film, the viewer will feel like that they have been violently defiled by a collective of rabid punk squatters who live to disturb and debase, at least when they are not shooting up or sucking cock, among other things. Unlike the drug-addled fag and fag hag superstars of Warhol's films, the people in Kern's crusty cinematic work have literally nothing to say yet they demand your attention even more. In that sense, Submit to Me is like Warhol's Screen Tests (1964) series meets Blow Job (1964), albeit fueled by hatred, angst, and pernicious playfulness of the mentally and morally defective sort.

SUBMIT TO ME

Set to the less than soothing sounds of "Cherub" by the Butthole Surfers, Submit to Me fittingly opens with a high-angle shot of Kern's main diva Lydia Lunch, who initially resembles an innocent child but soon transforms into a sexual predator with a serious case of penis envy as demonstrated by the fact that she turns the end of her dress into a makeshift cock of sorts which she begins stroking while sticking out her derriere and maintaining a seriously salacious look on her would-be-seductive guidette face. Meanwhile, a seemingly anorexic chick sporting nothing but an atrocious pair of tighty whitey underwear and vinyl gloves rolls around on the ground like a spastic retard. At first, the chicks seem to only get uglier and uglier as represented by the third chick, who is an androgynous broad with a rather repellent dyke haircut who (pseudo)seductively unbuttons a white button-up shirt and shows off her somewhat unsatisfying heroin chic body. The fourth chick proves not to be a chick at all, but a small girly man in a super gay costume that makes him seem like a cross between Jim Morrison and a campy leprechaun. In a vaguely foreboding chiaroscuro scene that one might describe as a sort of Deathrock go-go-dance, Kern's one-time girlfriend Audrey Rose (of Kern's King of Sex (1986) and Submit to Me Now (1987)) dances seductively while sporting nothing but a tacky vest and a garter belt. As Ms. Rose's performance and much of Kern's photography demonstrates, the filmmaker seems to have a special affinity for deathly skinny chicks with no tits or hips.

At a little bit past the three minute and thirty second mark of the film, a series of quickly displayed inter-titles that ultimately spell-out "D-E-S-T-R-O-Y" appear on the screen and Submit to Me begins taking a somewhat darker tone, with the next 'performer' that is featured being a naked chick that is hogtied and is trying in vain to wiggle across the ground like a petrified animal that senses that it is about to be slaughtered. Meanwhile, a blindfolded man in bondage who has a rope attached from his cock to his neck in a discernibly painful fashion somewhat humorously hops around and eventually falls to the ground after predictably losing his balance. In the style of the classic 'shaky cam' scenes in The Evil Dead where the camera follows Bruce Campbell (or some other character) while he is running at warped speed in the woods, the camera comes up on a screaming woman played by Tommy Turner's then-wife Amy Turner. In the next scene, Kern's waif protégé Lung Leg sits on a disgustingly dirty floor while sporting nothing but a discernibly despoiled white slip and does fairly silly things like smearing a good portion of her lips with dark red lipstick and making goofy faces at the camera like a petulant child who is mad at her parents because they will not buy her a pony (of course, Leg would take her cutesy deranged pixie child routine to hilariously murderous extremes in Kern's (anti)classic You Killed Me First (1985)). Eventually, Ms. Leg whips out a knife she has hidden somewhat near her pussy under her dress and begins carelessly stabbing the air with it as if she is fantasizing about killing a room full of people, though she does not seem the least bit threatening as she seems to suffer from poor motor skills, not to mention the fact she looks fairly small and weak, hence her charm as a sort of preposterously pedomorphic punkette with grotesquely greasy hair who seems to believe that she is an ancient Norse Berserker. In one of the more aesthetically pleasing and ethereal scenes of the film, a naked man and woman that are completely covered in blood wrestle one another in a rather violent fashion as if attempting to ripe each other's guts apart on a white floor that they soak with vital fluids in a sinisterly sensual scenario that seems like it could be a deleted scene from Clive Barker's Hellraiser (1987). Meanwhile, Tommy Turner croaks after shooting junk into his arm while watching TV and then proceeds to rot. After Turner decays, two blackhaired goth chicks (one of whom seems like they might actually be a tranny) strangle each other to death using a piano wire that causes blood to gush out of their throats. In one of the various scenes that makes me assume that Kern is either a cuckold and/or masochist (after all, Kern depicted a man, filmmaker Charles Pinion, being simultaneously ass and mouth-fucked by two chicks sporting strap-on dildos in his short The Bitches (1992)), a menacing she-bitch leads out a man on a dog-leash that is wearing nothing but a gimp mask, puts a gun to the back of his head, and then blows his brains out. For about the final minute or so of the film, a man drenched in blood screams in agony whilst standing in a red room. The End.

It should be noted that Kern directed a sequel of sorts to Submit to Me with the fairly fitting title Submit to Me Now (1987) which more or less follows the same exact anarchistic performance-based format and features a number of the same people. Apparently, Kern intended the sequel to mark the end of both his filmmaking career and that particular chapter in his personal life, or as the auteur stated in an interview with Jack Sargeant, "SUBMIT TO ME NOW was the last thing I did before I went off the deep end on drugs – it says "The End" at the end of it.” Of course, it would be a couple more years before Kern really quit filmmaking (which he somewhat recently resumed doing, albeit in a somewhat less ambitious way), but he had pretty much disposed of all forms of narrative at that point as reflected in his later works like X Is Y (1990), Nazi (1991), and Sewing Circle (1992), thus one could argue that Submit to Me and its sequel represent his truest and most organic auteur style as a filmmaker whereas his more narrative oriented works like The Right Side of My Brain (1985) and Fingered (1988) reflect the sort of heavy influence that star and co-writer Lydia Lunch had over his work when they collaborated with one another. Indeed, it seems that, as her cinematic collaborations with Kern demonstrate, Ms. Lunch has slightly more talent than what is between her legs. Notably, a screenshot from Submit to Me of Lunch’s rival Lung Leg was used as the cover art for the Sonic Youth album EVOL (1986) by SST Records. It should also be noted that members of Sonic Youth appear in Submit to Me and Kern would be responsible for co-directing the band’s music video for Death Valley 69 (1986). One thing I certainly appreciate about Kern is that he does not overestimate the value of his ‘art’ or present it as something deeper than it actually is, which cannot be really said of his compatriot Nick Zedd, who always seems to babble on in interviews like a perennial victim about how he is some sort of tragically misunderstood artistic genius. Indeed, when Kern was interviewed by Vice in December 2012 and the interviewer noted that his Submit to Me films were “almost like moving photographs,” Kern replied by remarking like a proud philistine who does not feel the need to impress anyone, “I was looking for weirdness. Just trying to think of what weird thing can this person do. There was one guy with a really little dick and he said, ‘I really want to be in there.’ He would just bug the shit out of me. And I said, ‘Okay, you can just shave your pubes.’ Which was a weird thing back then, if you’re a guy. So he said, ‘Okay, I’ll do that.’ And it was just really weird.” Personally, I consider Kern’s films to be art in a sort of lowbrow punk rock sense as they vividly express the morally retarded, dope-addled, and sexually dysfunctional spirit of their particular innately nihilistic zeitgeist. Undoubtedly if it were not for films like Submit to Me and some of the other cinematic works directed by Kern and his compatriots, one would certainly not have any idea of the lows that American kultur had reached during the 1980s, especially considering that NYC city is oftentimes considered America’s cultural epicenter and the Cinema of Transgression movement was the closest thing that the city had to an avant-garde cinema scene at that time.

THE RIGHT SIDE OF MY BRAIN

Richard Kern (1985)

While I would not exactly describe Richard Kern (You Killed Me First, Manhattan Love Suicides) as any sort of avant-garde or arthouse auteur, his less than 30-minute black-and-white cinematic piece The Right Side of My Brain (1985) is indubitably somewhat artsy fartsy in the sense that it would bore the hell out of mainstream filmgoers even though it features an unsimulated blowjob scene and Sapphic sadomasochistic sex, among other gratingly directed debauched scenarios that are about as erotic as the women's restroom in a downtown Detroit McDonalds. More or less the somewhat predictable result of star and co-writer Lydia Lunch, who the filmmaker apparently once "worshiped from afar" (or so he stated in the doc Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier), approaching Kern and asking him to direct it, the fetishistic (anti)erotic micro-epic depicts female sexuality in a fairly unflattering fashion with its less than playfully perverse portrayal of a masochistic cum-dump degenerate who morbidly metastasizes into a full-blown sadist as a result of her brutal sexual experiences with violent long haired dudes that resemble the gringo brothers of Richard Ramirez. Indeed, if you ever desired to be drenched in the putrid festering vaginal juices of Ms. Lunch yet are averse to contracting an STD or two, The Right Side of My Brain is probably your best bet as a seedy and sleazy no-budget 'snuff chic' flick where the viewer enters deep inside the anti-diva's (sub)conscious mind and is exposed to her more intimate and vulnerable psycho-sexual realms. Additionally, the film features the very awkward scenario of seeing lapsed Black Flag frontman Henry Rollins with longhair in a would-be-rough S&M sex scene with Lunch that is somewhat botched by a petrified little boy with a knife. In other words, the film features the special novelty of two overrated so-called 'spoken word' artists engaging in savagely brutal sex where cum and vaginal secretions are nowhere to be seen. For better or worse, The Right Side of My Brain probably deserves the somewhat oxymoronic label of being an avant-garde white trash porno piece, though I cannot really imagine anyone being in any way sexually aroused by it aside from maybe a very special sort of gynophobic serial killer and/or pretentious lesbian intellectual. As mentioned in the book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant, Lunch described the film as follows: "A psycho-sexual, emotional, nymphomaniacal drama based on one poor, unfortunate girl who just gets abused throughout, and possibly on why one may want to get abused. Abuse may titillate one's imagination or emotions which could be far superior to feeling rot or ugliness. So it's just a little expose, and the possible reasons for why one girl could be led to be so distraught." Of course, as the debauched brainchild of a morally bankrupt street slut who credits her sexually predatory behavior as being the result of being molested by her own father (or as she stated in her remarkably coldly written whore memoir Para- doxia: A Predator's Diary (1997), "So twisted by men, a man, my father, that I became like one"), the film certainly has a psycho-autobiographical element to it that demonstrates that Lunch has no qualms about looking at both men and women as sexual prey even though she was once herself the prey of a pernicious pervert who also just happened to be her daddy.

Comprised of about half a dozen or so petite vignettes featuring Lunch in some sort of sexually deranged situation involving some sort of unsavory scumbag who gets a kick out of degrading women juxtaposed with annoyingly monotone narration from the female lead, The Right Side of My Brain is indubitably an ugly film about ugly people doing ugly things just to satisfy their baser instincts. Notably, after directing all the scenes for the film, Lunch watched the footage and wrote the pseudo-salacious dialogue, which is narrated in an annoyingly monotone fashion throughout and is in the style of her sleazy spoken word performances. As Lunch complains at the very beginning of the film while sounding like she wants a large throbbing cock shoved down her throat, "I felt like I was drowning...slowly, sinking...being suffocated...Sucked into an endless vacuum. A void...a place where reality was no longer necessary. I could hardly move from the bed. I didn't wanna move." In the next scene, Lunch is depicted fondling her own titties juxtaposed with the narration, "I just wanted to be left alone...To play hide-and-go-seek with my neighbors. Just me and my dreams. Just me and my nightmares. The need to feel alive was killing me...torturing me, holding me up in the ugliest of corners." As is quite apparent at this point, Lunch has an undying aching desire to have her thoroughly used and abused cunt filled by some malevolent man, or as she narrates, "Always waiting...waiting and for what? Him...that special someone...the White Knight...the Jack of Diamonds, the King of Hearts. Him" and "Him...The Gravedigger." Lunch is speaking specifically of a gawky cigarette-smoking sadist (No Wave musician Norman Westberg of Swans) with a fiercely flat affect that resembles a serial killer and carries a shotgun around like it is his cock, or as she states, "One night he came over...he was beautiful. He was a mess. He stepped out of the gutter and into my arms, or at least that's what he'd say and he was so filthy, I guess you'd believe it. But he was different...very different. One in a million." As Lunch states in regard to her experiences with Westberg, she is, "waiting to find out the difference between a crazy man and a crazy woman." At the end of the scene, Lunch states in a suspenseful fashion, "Crazy women tolerate this behavior because love is deaf and dumb and stupid and it hurts like hell and that's better than nothing," and Westberg proceeds to point his shotgun in her pussy as if he wants to make a bigger hole between her legs. Naturally, Lunch gets all hot and bothered upon having a gun aimed at her cunt to the point where she develops a cutesy expression on her face that makes her seem like a flirtatious teenage virgin. Of course, the only thing that could make Lunch's cock-chaffer even wider is a gunshot blast. Naturally, crazy men like Westberg turn Lunch on because she suffers from the delusional belief that, "...they love you so, so much...They will try to kill you."

In the second major segment of the film, Lunch narrates while lying in bed, "Dreaming...I was only dreaming, but even in sleep I saw no rest. I was beginning to lose control of my senses. I was wrestling with myself and losing. It was like someone else was pulling all the strings. I wasn't feeling like myself, at all. Something was wrong. The right side of my brain was going berserk. I couldn't possibly want what it was I thought I wanted. The anatomy of melancholy. No, I had a bad dream, that was all. I have a lot of bad dreams." After a seemingly aborted attempt to masturbate, Lunch calls some random loser (Brian Moran) and thinks to herself how good it feels to be "split in two" and "all torn up." When her loser fuck-buddy finally arrives, Lunch meekly licks his hands and fingers, which eventually enrages him to the point where he violently shoves said hands and fingers down her throat. As for the abuse that Lunch seems to wallow in, she narrates while being orally brutalized, "I just wanted to feel really, really alive...that's all. No matter what the expense." As far as lecherous Lydia is concerned, there is a "thin line between a kiss and a scream." Indeed, after pissing Mr. Moran off by aggressively grabbing his cock, Lunch gets pummeled with his fists, which turns her on so much that she later masturbates while thinking about it. Indeed, the more Lunch is beaten and brutalized, the more her masochistic tendencies grow, or as she pseudo-poetically narrates, "My every waking moment was spent trying to fend off the beasts inside me. Nothing seemed to satisfy this unquenchable monster...This unbearable longing, this yearning for everything bad and ugly and self-destructive." Of course, it is only a matter of time before Lunch begins dishing out pain and destruction.

In the next segment of the film, Lunch is depicted giving an unsimulated blowjob to her longtime Australian-born boyfriend J.G. Thirlwell, who was not only responsible for being the "soundtrack coordinator" of The Right Side of My Brain and contributing music to a number of other Kern flicks, but also composed the titular song for David Wojnarowicz and Tommy Turner's aborted Cinema of Transgression art-horror epic Where Evil Dwells (1985) with his electronic noise-rock side-project Wiseblood. During the segment, sunglasses-adorned Thirlwell rips off Lunch's top, manhandles her mammary glands, and eventually physically forces her to lip-lock his cock while she narrates things like, "It feels so good to be alive and squirming under his fists...and made to do exactly what they want you to do because that's what you want." At the end of the segment, Lunch bitches when Thirlwell forces her off his cock, "They always stopped short of giving exactly what I wanted," thus making it seem as if no man can completely fulfill her completely insatiable sexual needs. As Lunch narrates after Thirlwell abruptly leaves her all hot and bothered, "I was my own worst enemy and I liked it like that," thereupon acknowledging the fact that the sexual violence that she regularly endures is entirely voluntary.

THE RIGHT SIDE OF MY BRAIN

Maybe it is because I have read one-too-many of his books as a teenager where he incessantly complains about things like skinheads kicking his ass or why he hates everything, but it is hard for me to imagine Henry Rollins chasing after any woman, especially a wanton wench like Lunch. Indeed, in the next segment of the film, Rollins is depicted literally chasing Lunch through a forest while she narrates, "...running headlong into my own demise. Running not away from it, but to embrace it and rejoice in it with open arms." As she thinks to herself, Lunch wants Rollins to "catch me and conquer me." Of course, Rollins eventually catches and manhandles Lunch when she runs inside a house, but a problem arises when a little blond boy who is hiding behind a nearby bed becomes an unconventional cock-block of sorts. Indeed, after Rollins begins getting a little bit rough with Lunch after she violently pushes him away, the boy emerges from behind a bed with a knife, so the ex-Black Flag singer picks him up and begins shaking him like he wants to snuff him out via shaken baby syndrome. When the boy eventually manages to get free after Lunch begins attacking Rollins, the masochistic bitch switches places with the little lad and begins receiving a series of blows to her body and face while being pinned down on a bed. In a sort of twist ending to the segment, the blond boy proceeds to look under Lunch's clothing and presumably attempts to molest her after she is left unconscious as a result of the beating that Rollins doled out to her.

The final segment of the film is important in that it demonstrates that all Lunch's beatings and rapes have paid off in the long run, as she has gone from being a meek and masochistic heterosexual woman to transforming into a Saphic sadist who dishes out savage beatings to other sexually dysfunctional broads, though she is somewhat baffled about her own sexual transformation, or as she narrates, "I did not know where I was...Or where I would end up...And I didn't care. It was as if I was beside myself." Indeed, not only does Lunch graduate on to sadomasochistic lesbian affairs but she also engages in white-on-yellow miscegenation with a brutal looking East Asian chick (pussy-loving Proto-riot grrrl musician Sally Ven Yu Berg of groups like Egoslavia and SHE). While initially seeming quite timid and rather intimidated by the yellow diva, Lunch soon engages in some mutual tit-touching with the oriental dame that eventually evolves into her smacking around and beating the slant-eyed little bitch. As Lunch narrates at this point regarding her sexuality, "I wanted to feel good and throbbing and wet and real, but all I felt was filthy and dirty and cheap. That's why I was torturing myself...beating myself at my own game." After giving the chink chick a good thrashing, Lunch narrates at the very end of the film, "We'll take the bad with the bad and make it worse, ok...So if it kills me, so what." Of course, as demonstrated by the fact that she has physically deteriorated so drastically over the past couple of decades, Lunch clearly embraced this nihilistic metasexual weltanschauung in her real-life.

While ostensibly 'deep' and 'esoteric' in terms of its depiction of the more unflattering examples of female sexuality, The Right Side of My Brain ultimately has a fairly simple and easy to understand message about the vicious circle that is sexual abuse and how victims oftentimes graduate on to becoming full-blown victimizers, including star Lydia Lunch who is completely conscious of her perversions and their source yet she chooses to exercise as opposed to exorcise her all-consuming sexual demons. Indeed, one of the things that makes the film undeniably potent despite oftentimes wallowing in banality is that Lunch brings a certain aberrant authenticity to the role that demonstrates that she probably could have had a fairly lucrative career as a full-blown porn star. As Lunch described the film in the doc Blank City, "THE RIGHT SIDE OF MY BRAIN was my investigation into a specific type of female psyche. It was completely instinctual and I think Richard [Kern] just knew exactly also what I wanted." Indeed, I think Kern, who is well known for letting his actors/performers take control of his films creatively, knew to let Lunch just be herself and let her gutter lechery just drip from the screen, which it most certainly does. For better or worse, no one can watch The Right Side of My Brain without concluding that Lunch is a conniving cum-dump and proud sexual predator with a pathological need to make both men and women her servile little sex slaves and cuckolds, with Kern arguably being the latter, at least artistically speaking, as a mensch that has no problem with a woman taking over his own film.

Indubitably Kern and Lunch's subsequent collaboration Fingered (1986) is superior as it is innately more enthralling and even darkly humorous, not to mention more sexually subversive, yet The Right Side of My Brain certainly has a more ominous and foreboding tone to it that makes it fairly unforgettable, even if it is also sometimes annoying and boring. Like Fingered, the film features a sort of post-Expressionist aesthetic that almost seems to excrete a sort of erotic 'evil' as opposed to merely mimicking it, hence its strange and almost inexplicable minor degree of idiosyncratic aesthetic potency. Certainly the 'private dick' that Lunch depicted in Beth B and Scott B's Vortex (1982) seems like a naïve teenage girl compared to her 'character' in The Right Side of My Brain. In terms of visceral rawness and organic integrity, I would certainly rather watch Kern's film over Lars von Trier's epic, botched orgasm NYMPH()MANIAC (2013) starring Charlotte Gainsbourg, who makes Lunch seem like a young Sophia Loren when it comes to physical attractiveness and overall sexual appeal (even if Lunch looks like a decaying 70-year-old crackwhore nowadays). It should be noted that Lunch and Rollins would later reprise their roles as onscreen lovers in the somewhat uneventful arthouse flick Kiss Napoleon Goodbye (1990) directed by Babeth Mondini. Personally, I cannot imagine Rollins being able to fulfill Lunch's voracious sadomasochistic needs, but I guess that is the main appeal of seeing the two together. While I still would not want to touch Lunch's pussy with a ten-foot-pole even while she was at her physical peak during her Kern years, I have to give the perennial spoken word slut credit for being able to embody malignantly manipulative and unhinged 'feminine' sexuality in such a artfully sleazy way, especially in The Right Side of My Brain where she demonstrates that she is better at beating up some Asian dyke than downing the dick of her longtime beau.

YOU KILLED ME FIRST

Richard Kern (1985)

Call me old fashioned, but there are few things more lame and impotent to me than blaming one's failure in life on their parents, especially when the same culture-distorting people and institutions, like teachers and MTV, telling people to loathe their parents are also the same Occident-hating parasites that are part of the malefic mainstream entity that would love nothing more than to see the world transformed into a horribly homogenized raceless and cultureless void where everyone is 'equal' in their social enslavement, destitution, sexual dysfunction, and cultural and spiritual retardation. Indeed, the patently pathetic baby boomers—the most superlatively spoiled and pampered generation in all of human history (at least, up until that time period)—got bored with their pampered and all-too-comfortable lives and decided to mindlessly rebel against their parents and disrespect their fathers as a result of being provoked by everyone from retarded drug-addled rockers John Lennon and Mick Jagger to anti-Occidental German-born kosher commie agitators ranging from Wilhelm Reich to Herbert Marcuse, thereupon eventually resulting in the proliferation of racial and cultural chaos, the welfare state, sexual dysfunction, single-mothers and rampant bastardization, and malignant miscegenation, among various other socially and culturally apocalyptic things that had previously been quite rare and/or taboo in the Western world. Of course, a lot has changed since Reich and Marcuse penned their patently preposterous pro-pedophile psychobabble and anti-parent/anti-parent sentiment has now more or less reached the intellectual prowess of Beavis and Butt-Head as reflected by the rise of corporate 'punk' stores like Hot Topic and the popularity of pre-packaged pseudo-rebellious cum-dump pop stars like Miley Cyrus. Of course, the underground has become no less sterile and moronically generic than mainstream when it comes to pseudo(meta)political assaults against family matters. Arguably, the most unintentionally hilarious cinematic example of senseless self-pitying anti-parent sentiment is the (in)famous Cinema of Transgression short You Killed Me First (1985) directed by photographer and gutter auteur Richard Kern (Goodbye 42nd Street, Submit to Me Now). Apparently a response to President Ronnie Reagan's 1988 farewell address where he self-righteously stated, "And let me offer lesson number one about America: All great change in America begins at the dinner table. So, tomorrow night in the kitchen I hope the talking begins. And children, if your parents haven't been teaching you what it means to be an American, let 'em know and nail 'em on it. That would be a very American thing to do," Kern's truly 'reactionary' 11-minute celluloid rant is ultimately a testimony to the circular intellectual bankruptcy of the Cinema of Transgression movement and related NYC post-punk movements, yet it is also strangely endearing as a work where an AIDS-ridden queer artist, David Wojnarowicz, is given the opportunity to take out his rectal-reaming rage by enacting a sort of fairly eccentric performance art exorcism on both his abusive biological father and American cuckservative paternal figure Reagan, who he partly blamed for the proliferation of gay cancer as depicted in kraut alpha-queen Rosa von Praunheim's doc Silence = Death (1990). Sort of like a post-punk mutation of Father Knows Best as directed by the heterosexual hatechild of John Waters and Curt McDowell meets My So-Called Life as penned by the left-wing philistine stepchild of Paul Morrissey, You Killed Me First ultimately feels like an autistic agitprop flick that serves no real political purpose aside from inciting the viewer into mindlessly hating their family and ancestral origins, thus making for a work with a mind-numbingly idiotic message that is not all that different from the one spread by American public schools. Luckily, Kern's short-but-(un)sweet film is slightly more interesting and entertaining than any teacher I have ever had.

The superlatively stupid story of a discernibly dirty and unkempt proto-emo teenage skank and born-loser with seemingly slimy black hair who sadistically murders her entire family because she suffers from the delusion that they figuratively 'killed her' first due to their American pie style values, You Killed Me First unsurprisingly had its genesis in a somewhat abortive drug binge, or as auteur Kern described in an interview featured in the book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant when asked if it was originally part of an installation with David Wojnarowicz: "The whole idea was conceived when me and David went out to buy some heroin one day and we got burned, so we got back to the apartment and we shot up this stuff and got these big welts on our arms instead of getting high. I said: 'I've got some ecstasy in the other room, let's shoot that up, fuck it' and then we started talking 'we're really good friends man' [laughs]. You know how ecstasy works." Indeed, seeing Wojnarowicz portraying the less than proud conservative father of a greasy-haired teenage social outcast led me to seeing the film as the sort of Cinema of Transgression equivalent to Reefer Madness, albeit actually fairly humorous and thankfully brief. In fact, when Sargeant proposed that "YOU KILLED ME FIRST, again, to me, was a straight John Waters' style film, I think a lot of people see that as your best film," Kern replied, "That's what other people told me...that it was the most concise." Of course, the film also benefits from lacking Kern regular Lydia Lunch, though the flick's star 'Leg Lung'—a sort of short and scrawny Lydia clone with a giant round head full of messy tangled black hair that seems more than a little bit mentally challenged as indicated by her bizarre speech patterns, unnervingly fidgety behavior, and tendency to botch simple two syllable words, among other things—is not exactly much of an improvement as far as leading ladies are concerned. A kind of unintentional satire of the sort of mindlessly nihilistic suburban youth rebel archetype that became especially vogue after the release of Nicholas Ray's CinemaScope classic Rebel Without a Cause (1955), Kern's film is so shockingly stupid and childish as a result of its kindergarten aesthetic anarchism that I still cannot believe it exists and I say that as a fan of Nick Millard's Criminally Insane (1975). Naturally, You Killed Me First lacks the beautifully seductive romantic rebellious spirit of Ray's film, which has been replaced by a sort of viscerally vulgar infantilism plagued by festering blood-and-semen-stained teenage cunts and braindead glue-sniffers, among other rather repellent things that remind one why Warhol Factory filmmaker Paul Morrissey described the counterculture movement and liberalism as a "toilet culture."

Set in "New York City: 1985" as indicated by a glittery gold inter-title that seems to be in the style of the furniture that you might find at a Hebraic-owned Manhattan pawnshop, You Killed Me First opens with a stereotypical white suburban mother (portrayed by degenerate third-wave feminist 'performance artist' Karen Finley of Harvey Keith's Mondo New York (1988) and Jonathan Demme's Philadelphia (1993)) serving her seated family members a baked turkey and declaring, "It's my pleasure being a mother to do this for y'all." The 'black sheep' of the family is the youngest daughter Elizabeth (Kern regular Lung Leg) and her mother instantly rebukes her for refusing to wash her hands before eating while her father (David Wojnarowicz) complains regarding her deadbeat boyfriend, "That guy stunk from here to tomorrow" and "I don't want that slime in this house anymore." While Elizabeth's parents resent her and her unfortunate choice in men (as Elizabeth proudly explains, she found her boyfriend on the street), they love her happy overachiever sister Debra (Jessica Craig-Martin) and the "nice young man" named Nick (Nick Cooper) that she dates. For a nearly incoherent bitch that complains that her parents treat her like a prisoner, Elizabeth is allowed to get away with a lot of bombastic bullshit spewing, as she soon dominates the dinner table conversation and begins violently screaming at her parents while slurring and botching her words like an inordinately aggressive toddler with Down syndrome, "You know, you have given me nothing but pain—pain, pain—ever, ever since you were born." As demonstrated by her remarks like, "You got the nerve to pray for me...holier-than-thou [...] you're just as disgusting as I am," Elizabeth cannot stand that her parents hold her to certain generic civilized standards like bathing. Indeed, as she states, Elizabeth cannot stand how her supposedly hypocritical parents are, "pressuring me to be holy or something and you're fucking made of shit. You don't even know... You don't even know what goodness is. You're fucking as evil as sin. I hate you, I've always hated you." Being a vehemently anti-logical little lunatic, Elizabeth eventually decides that familicide will be the only way for her to cleanse herself of her family's ostensibly evasive influence. After all, one cannot tolerate family members who incessantly nag you about getting a haircut and dating nice boys.

As a perennially infantile teenager who does not seem to realize she bleeds out of her gash and should probably take a shower every once and a while, Elizabeth likes spending her free time doing curious things like sticking her tongue out at creepy stuffed animals, playing with barfing puppets, and drawing goofy pictures of demonic monsters with magic markers. When Elizabeth introduces her scumbag boyfriend 'Cheese' (Montanna Houston) to her parents, she seems less annoyed with the fact that her dad calls her beau a "son-of-a-bitch" than the fact that her mother calls her by her real name, bitching, "Hey, don't call me Elizabeth anymore. My name's Cassandra." Indeed, like most criminals and weirdos with identity issues, Elizabeth refuses to be called by her real name and spends the rest of the film bitching every time anyone addresses her by her real name. It seems that like a lot of contemporary American morons, Elizabeth confuses superficial things like haircuts, names, tattoos and personal hygiene as genuine forms of individuality, thereupon failing to realize that she is not different from the average ostensibly 'misunderstood' teenage goth or emo-fag loser. Indeed, Elizabeth is just as much of a conformist as her much hated family members, albeit she just belongs to the losing team. Of course, Elizabeth would never figure this out because she is the most fierce of petulant philistine children.

After Elizabeth shockingly allows her mother to give her a new hairdo, the giddy matriarch joyously declares, "Elizabeth, I am so happy that you're letting me do this. It is going to be the windswept look just like in Mademoiselle magazine, you know, the new wave look like Liza Minnelli," while she predictably whines, bitches, and moans. Meanwhile, Elizabeth's sibling Debra tries in vain to give her some sisterly advice by stating, "You know, Elizabeth, you should really try to be nicer to mom and dad. They're only trying to help, you know. And mom's really worried about you. She's thinks you're never going to catch a husband. Even Nick said you could be pretty if you just made a little effort to be more feminine. And, you know, no sorority in America is going to accept you the way you look now. I can't believe I have this big zit on my face for my date with Nick," but the anti-heroine does not bother to even take a single second to consider her sister's fairly reasonable point of view. When her mother buys both her and her sister new sweaters, Elizabeth reveals that she is a insufferable ingrate by immediately bitching, "how dare you buy this ugly thing for me. I don't want it. Take it back." In one of the most humorous lines of dialogue in the film, Elizabeth's mother reacts to her obscenely ungrateful attitude by stating, "That's why I got you one that was cheaper because I knew that you wouldn't like it. Why don't you cut it up and write 'fuck' or 'anarchy' on it?!" Of course, being an assumed punk rock true believer, Elizabeth probably thinks that intentionally tearing up your clothing is what posers do and probably prefers wearing authentically dirty and worn-out clothing with holes in it that she has not washed in weeks.

When Elizabeth's less than dear daddy catches her smoking cigarettes, he demands that she sit down so they can have a little father-daughter chat where he rants, "You know, I don't understand you for a minute. Elizabeth, your mother and I have given you our brain and you have made no use of it absolutely whatsoever. I mean, you constantly disregard the fine examples set by your sister, you turned your room into a zoo, you're threatening to do it to the rest of this house, and that goddamn rabbit of yours has been defecating all over this house all week long. You don't even change its water. It tries to climb into the tub while I'm taking a shower." After stoically declaring, "You need to be taught a lesson," the patriarch whips out a paper bag containing Elizabeth's strangely lifeless pet bunny rabbit and bludgeons it to death with a mallet while she screams in horror, "That's my bunny." Needless to say, Elizabeth's trauma is only the more compounded when she decides to do a little bit of investigating upon hearing her mother loudly moaning and then discovers her daddy penetrating her mommy doggy style. Of course, Elizabeth is lucky to have parents that still love one another and regularly fuck like bunny rabbits, but she does not see it that way as she hates her mother and father with a passion and cannot stand seeing them happy.

After her cutesy white bunny rabbit is beaten to death and witnessing the passionate 'primal scene' between her parents, Elizabeth decides to release some stress by handling what seems to be a sort of 'puking voodoo doll' that barfs when she squeezes it. When her father later walks in on her watching some degenerate TV show and scolds her for watching such "filth," Elizabeth retorts, "It's no worse than watching you make mom moan all night," so her daddy shuts her up by giving her a much needed smack across the face. When Elizabeth's mother dares to rip up the childish demonic monster drawings that she created with magic markers, the oh-so angsty anti-heroine finally loses what little self-restraint she has, decides enough is enough, and proceeds to retrieve a small revolver from a small dresser table in her parent's room that her father recently bought and proudly showed off by unloading a round in his living room. In the end, the film comes full circle when Elizabeth meets her family at the dinner table, says to her mother, "You're about as pretty as a donkey's ass, man," and then declares to her big sis while waving her weapon, "I'm going to get rid of you first" and "I can't believe you're alive. You don't deserve to live. I hate you." After putting bullets in the brains of both her sister and father, Elizabeth declares to her mother, "You gotta go, too." After her mother once again dares call her by her real name, Elizabeth declares with a good healthy dose of seething hatred, "My name is Cassandra. You killed me first" and then shoots her in the head, thereupon causing her brains to splatter across the wall. Although the viewer never learns what becomes of the anti-heroine, I think that it is safe to say that Elizabeth will probably hate prison or an insane asylum even more than she hated living with her parents, thus her excessive actions were certainly, at best, in vain and a great example of her mental handicaps and sheer and utter incapacity to think things through.

Somewhat unbelievably, You Killed Me First has become such an iconic influence that it has inspired a number of West Coast graffiti artists, who have tagged the image of Lung Leg aiming her weapon around various buildings in Los Angeles and Las Vegas. With that being said, it is somewhat fitting that such a stupendously stupid and senseless cinematic work would influence the most stupendously stupid and senseless of gutter artists, especially considering that Kern's film defiles the mind and spirit and so-called street artists defile their urban habitat, thereupon making for the perfect match in pre-apocalyptic aesthetic hell. Personally, I think Ms. Leg is one of the most particularly pathetic of iconic anti-heroines as a dirty dipshit chick that looks like she could possibly have a dick and makes the Manson Family chicks seem like iconoclastic scholars and deeply devout spiritual leaders by comparison. Indeed, if Lung Leg did not seem so glaringly retarded and pathetic in You Killed Me First, the film would probably be as banal as hell as most of its potency lies in its seemingly unintended humor, which David Wojnarowicz also contributes a great deal to by trying in vain to absurdly pantomime a Christian cuckservative as opposed to the AIDS-ridden junky faggot and ex-hustler that he actually was. Indeed, as is typical of people that attempt to mock another group of people, Wojnarowicz and the gang demonstrate that they lack any innate understanding of the typical American suburban family, thus exposing their own innate degeneracy as people that clearly did not have the choice to be alienated from mainstream society, which is as alien to them as Norwegian black metal is to American blacks. Speaking of American negroes, Leg almost outdoes the slave-morality-ridden Black Lives Matter beasts in terms of her hysterically hostile and obscenely obnoxious performance. In that sense, Leg's character personifies everything that is repugnant about young Americans, as anti-heroine Elizabeth is a ludicrously self-righteous, self-pitying and entitled little bitch who sneers at the thought of things like personal responsibility and accountability, among other things.

Not surprisingly, Lung Leg is apparently almost as unhinged as the character she portrayed in You Killed Me First, or so it seems if we are to believe Nick Zedd, who claimed in his work Bleed that the Cinema of Transgression diva believed that she was tortured by a "communist war goddess" named "ninny" who could transform people into folding chairs and radiators and was planning to destroy Christmas by turning it into "a German holiday" (I guess Ms. Leg does not realize that the popular Christian holiday is of largely Teutonic origins). Despite her fairly idiosyncratic brand of good old Teutonophobia, Lung apparently had an unhealthy infatuation with German musician Blixa Bargeld of Einstürzende Neubauten, or as Kern stated in an interview with Jack Sargeant, "...Lung was totally convinced that Blixa was her soul mate. She went to Germany and sought him out and found him, and I imagine had sex with him – at least once probably – and was convinced she was gonna be with him forever. Somehow it didn't work out." Of course, as her long awaited comeback role in Jon Springer's rather botched pseudo-arthouse horror flick The Hagstone Demon (2011) starring Mark Borchardt of American Movie (1999) demonstrates, Leg is far from the marginally cute art school dropout that she was in You Killed Me First.

While horrendously edited, the merrily morbid familicide flick was apparently in even worse shape before Kern had it remastered and reedited for DVD, yet some of the film's fans had the gall to complain that the new 'director's cut' was inferior because it lacked the sub-Warholian essence of the original cut, but as the filmmaker himself stated, "if anything, the remastering makes YOU KILLED ME FIRST more watchable. The movie is still very rough but the distracting problems with some of the edits and sound dropout are gone. I felt that the problems I took out constantly reminded the audience that the movie was a movie and a shittily made one at that." While I am far from any sort of Kern groupie, I think I can agree with many of his fans when I say it is easily the director's greatest film, which is somewhat ironic considering it is also one of his least sexually graphic works. Of course, aside from possibly sexually schizophrenic rapists and high school emo girls with intricate rape fantasies, I doubt many people can truly appreciate a film like Finger (1986) where an insufferable sidewalk skank like Lydia Lunch screams, "make me fucking cum, you fucking filthy cock. Do it!" while being violently finger-fucked by some longhaired tattooed degenerate that looks like the retarded blue-collar brother of Rozz Williams. Described by alpha-hipster Thurston 'Sonic Youth' Moore in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier as follows, "YOU KILLED ME FIRST was the great dysfunctional family film," Kern's thankfully unpretentious short is basically a no bullshit micro-exploitation flick that cuts all the fat and only leaves the sordid and sick elements that make people gravitate towards celluloid trash in the first place. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Kern would pay tribute to the great works of (s)exploitation with his early work Goodbye 42nd Street (1986). I think Kern summed up You Killed Me First and the rest of his oeuvre best when he stated regarding his (anti)artistic Weltanschauung, "I didn't feel I was making art. I felt like I was being a lunatic. Doing anything I wanted. Nobody could tell me what to do. Fuck you to everybody. That was the whole attitude." Indeed, while Kern's film probably deserves to be relegated to the semen-soaked urinal of avant-garde cinema history, I have to admit that You Killed Me First has more replay value than the average Godard flick.

MY NIGHTMARE

Richard Kern (1993)

My Nightmare is just one of many excellent Super 8 short films directed by the original goth Richard Kern. His style of film making serializes the transgression between extreme perversion and sado-masochism. Just one of his broad filmography conveniently packaged in a DVD collection - The Hardcore Collection - this short materializes slowly into being one of his more graphic and in-your-face short films. The non-linear plot features one man waking from a peaceful slumber. He rolls over in his nude posture and begins to vigorously masturbate in his pseudo-dream state. He dreams of a beautiful muse pleasuring him in graphic detail. These fantastical masturbatory daydreams escalate in passion and roughness. Spanking and various activities begin getting fiercer and fiercer along with his movements. He finishes, puts his pants on, walks to the door and greets the very same model he dreamed of. After numerous hopeful sexual attempts that are denied embarrassingly, it is obvious how pathetic this loner is. A vast character portrait of a man who might have taken his profession in hope for a royal lifestyle. A photographer should be swimming in women, right? This is a masterful erotic short which conveys a deep sadness relevant to all humanity. In Kern's eyes, Women exist to tease men of any soul left in their body. He creates these embarrassing, sadistic, or tortuous shorts that shouldn't arouse a normal man, but they do. Although, I would have rather seen Kern-ette Lydia Lunch in all these uncompromising situations, I cannot complain for this piece of gutter art. A must-see, along with all of his other Super 8 shorts. Except You Killed Me First. Jesus, I hate that film.

Richard LaGravenese (2007)

While I don't exactly know the racial or ethnic origins of writer/director Richard LaGravenese, it doesn't really matter too much, because Zionist propaganda is not a Jewish-exclusive technique. Freedom Writers is one of those rare films that comes along and nurtures the imagination of anyone aware of Israeli Nationalist influence on American media. Whereas most Hollywood films tend to employ various forms of globalist Jewish intellectualism in subtle ways, Freedom Writers achieves a special kind of chutzpah by taking the classic "Teacher Helps Hapless Student(s)" Hollywood subgenre, transforming it, molding it, and finally crossing the threshold into full-blown political propaganda. The legacy of this film should be remembered for decades to come as it takes the torturous tactics of the Shin Bet and turns it into Shin B.E.T. with a contrived urban atmosphere and an all-star hip hop soundtrack. Freedom Writers is not a movie about gang violence; it's a movie about Israel. The plot of the film is simple enough. After the mandated racial integration of an inner-city California high school, a woman named Erin Gruwell, played by Hillary Swank, shows up trying to seize an exciting opportunity for her as a teacher and thus live out the legacy of her father, a man who marched in the Civil Rights movement and is now an embittered curmudgeon. After dealing with the cynicisms of her faculty, she realizes that the racial hatred in the school is too overwhelming for the traditional curriculum. The turning point in the film, about a half hour into it, occurs when she encounters a cartoon portraying a black man with large lips that one of the students draws. I'd like to focus on that particular scene, because it carries the tone for the remaining hour and a half. After making a comparison of this cartoon with the cartoons of the Jews that would be published in German newspapers, she goes on to compare the National Socialist party to a gang, and describes Hitler as a man who gave the Germans "pride and identity and somebody to blame." When she asks the class to raise their hand if they know about the holocaust, the only white kid there raises his hand. This is a class comprising what looks like thirty to forty people. When she then asks the class to raise their hand if they have ever been shot at, every single person in the class other than the white kid raises his or her hand. The message thus becomes quite obvious: those who know about the holocaust stay out of gang violence and other associated forms of trouble, and those who turn their backs on the holocaust are doomed. As if the intent of the picture could not be blatant enough by this point, Swank also throws in some secular progressive propaganda for good measure (keep in mind, Zionism is an inherently secular ideology). When one of the black kids says that it's better to die for one's own people, as a warrior, Swank retorts that when you die, "you're going to rot in the ground, and people are going to go on living." She then points out that "nobody is going to want to remember you, because all you left behind is this [racist cartoon].” Leaving aside the fact that, according to her logic, the person will be rotting in the ground and unable to tell if anyone remembers him in the first place, her comment is still completely false. Clearly, she does want to remember Hitler. She really wants to remember the guy, and her mission is to educate everyone about Uncle Adolf until the savage beast in them completely disappears. In order to reshape the minds of these youngsters, Swank simply strikes at them with a barrage of intense holocaust awareness training. She teaches them about the holocaust, she has them read The Diary of Anne Frank, she organizes a field trip to the Los Angeles Museum of Tolerance (which is essentially a holocaust museum sponsored by Zionists), she introduces them to holocaust survivors, and then she flies out the woman who sheltered Anne Frank in WWII to speak with them. It is not any kind of easy task to determine exactly what the kids actually learn in this class, especially when the film makes various references to the fact that Swank brazenly defies the curriculum and merely teaches the kids what she herself deems important, but they sure seem enthused. The main purpose of the film, to promote Zionism, is enshrouded by the fact that these kids actually wrote in journals about their lives. That is, actually, the main thrust of the real-life story that this film is based on. Swank introduces the idea of journal-writing in a very understated way compared to the fury the overall film expresses regarding the holocaust, but the majority of the film then goes on to chronicle the documentation of these teenagers’ personal lives without explaining the necessity for them to write in a journal in the first place. The purpose is simply to compare the lives of struggling inner-city teenagers to the lives of Jews suffering through the holocaust. The two scenarios bear no comparison, obviously, for the simple fact that the Jews suffered under the policy of central government, whereas no such policies exist that cause gang warfare. However, despite the lack of correlation between the Jews of the holocaust and the film’s situation, the imagery is invoked to suggest a causal hypothesis stating that due to indignant European oppression, Blacks, Latinos and Cambodians are in a poor situation. Rather than combat low self-esteem and cultural irresponsibility, Freedom Writers embraces that very sense of irresponsibility and utilizes Nazi imagery as a means of pointing the finger at white privilege. Meanwhile, bad role models and harmful cultural figures like Snoop Dogg are celebrated as a means to bind the races together. To add some struggle to the plot, which has no real central conflict, Swank’s husband grows impatient with her superheroism and uncompromisingly positive outlook on life. The problem is that he is a 40-something-year-old aspiring architect who is unmotivated, lazy, and caught up in what he considers the wrong job. This entire subplot fails demonstrably, as although the man is clearly upset, the house both he and Swank occupy is extraordinarily lavish. It has plenty of space and all sorts of expensive furnishings and knickknacks – objects that could never be purchased on a teacher’s salary. The husband is clearly the breadwinner in the relationship, although the film portrays him as a nihilistic loser. It seems as though the entire point of this conflict insertion is to keep some sort of problem afloat in an otherwise mindless celebration of tolerance and Jewish pride. The technical methods of propaganda in the film are also worth mentioning, as it transcends formulaic Hollywood conventions to create something absurdly unique. The use of time-elapsing montage is employed so fiercely it becomes difficult to absorb what is actually happening. I counted a total of eleven time-elapsing montages, ten if you don't count the footage of the Rodney King riots that kicks off the film. It is difficult to count these montages because one of them includes two sub-montages within. The intent is to exasperate the audience and simplify the issues these teenagers face as problems, albeit serious, that can be easily remedied. Some of the imagery in these montages utilizes symbolism and strategic lighting, so as to literally illuminate various members of the class when they write in their journals. The use of sentimentalism is also heavily employed with various scenes relying on sappy music. Perhaps the most offensive aspect of Freedom Writers is the distinct lack of actual Jewish people in the film. Other than the holocaust survivors that show up and are mainly voiced-over, the film is made in the shadow of other people's suffering with a very limited use of those actual people. Familiarity can breed contempt, and parlaying the Jews into infallible superpeople is done exactly by not introducing them as significant characters. While the various students all undergo a great deal of suffering, as the film points out, their sympathies are directed most highly toward the Jews rather than each other, because while each of these people in Swank's class have their own shortcomings, no such admissions are made for any Jewish people. The message has nothing to do with overcoming a bad situation, but rather, the ontological superiority of Jews. In purely formalistic terms, Freedom Writers is an awful film. The main conflict of the story switches gratuitously, the subplot involving Swank and her husband makes little to no sense, all of the subplots of each class member are met with dead ends, and the facts of the real-life story do little justice to the message of the film adaptation. The ending of the movie concludes, "Many freedom writers were the first in their families to graduate high school and go to college." Not only is the weasel word "many" used, but it doesn't even apply to the actual rate of college graduation among these freedom writers. Even if they all actually graduated college, what does the message of the story say? That holocaust awareness is the chief method of success, or that it's more effective for a teacher to stay with the same class for all four years of high school with her own curriculum that has more to do with moral judgments than actual information? As a work of art, Freedom Writers fails on numerous levels. But as a piece of propaganda, one can't help but admire the cold, calculated technique that went into the creation of this monstrosity. The confusion and lack of continuity in plot juxtaposed with holocaust awareness, the only consistent recurring theme, makes for a brilliant propaganda piece that invokes the most intense suppression of logic during the Soviet era. Even the film's very title is so unabashedly patronizing that you feel as though you're really dealing with a genuine Zio-classic from beginning to end.

VISIONS

Richard Pearce (1977)

Admittedly, surrealist operatic porn seems like a superlatively stupid and patently pointless concept, but then again it also sounds quite intriguing, especially if you're a somewhat peculiar person like me who only watches old school blue movies for potential aesthetic value. As far as I know, the only somewhat operatic fuck flick that exists is the lost classic of lechery, Visions (1977) aka Larrys saftiga porrdrömmar directed by stage manager/director turned porn auteur turned 'legit' exploitation hack Chuck Vincent (Blue Summer, Roommates) under the curious Hispanic pseudonym 'Felix Miguel Arroyo.' While best known for humorous yet hot porn flicks starring sensual superstars like Veronica Hart, Samantha Fox, and Jamie Gillis, Vincent is best known for creating a seriously dark, phantasmagoric, experimental, and just plain bizarre feature with Visions, hence why he probably opted for using a pen name instead of his own, as it certainly does not seem like it was directed by the same pornographer. A sort of marginally melancholy heterosexual equivalent to Wakefield Poole's avant-garde fag fuck flick Bijou (1972) as a mostly silent film that is largely set in a sort of pitch black pornographic pandemonium featuring giant genitals and phantom butt-fuckers, Vincent's transcendently salacious piece of celluloid has been described by some reviewers as the porn film you might expect Nordic Northern American auteur Guy Maddin to make, yet the film is far too serious and 'sexually sound' to have been directed by the incest and all-around-perversion-obsessed man that directed such idiosyncratic works as Tales from the Gimli Hospital (1988) and Careful (1992). Indeed, one of the most intriguing things about Visions is that everything is played 'straight' and is never tongue-in-cheek, which is quite unusual for a man whose specialty is comedy-driven cumshots. Of course, like the equally artistically endowed auteur pornographer the Amero Brothers (Bacchanale, The Death of Scorpio), Vincent was a rampant homo who made rampantly hetero porn flicks during the great Golden Age of Porn aka 'Porn Chic' era. Indeed, a work featuring a fairy-like fellow with a prepubescent mustache performing cunnilingus on an extra-exotic flapper sitting on a swing juxtaposed to the potent yet hardly pornographic sounds of Richard Wagner's "Die Walküre" aka "The Valkyrie," as well as a watching passively as the ghost of his beloved wife sucks the cocks of jagged rock formations, Visions is a curious collection of vice-ridden Gothic and absurdist visions contained with tantalizing and oftentimes even tasteful tableaux that reminds one that there is oftentimes a rather thin line between art and pornography, for both typically wallow in ritual and fetishism.

Melancholy musical composer Larry (played by Wade Nichols of Armand Weston's 1978 pornographic Oscar Wilde adaptation Take Off and Radley Metzger's 1979 work Maraschino Cherry) cannot get over the tragic death of his lover (Susan McBain), so he spends all his free time composing music while imagining his wife dancing to his compositions. One night while practicing at a studio, Larry is approached by a philosophizing Janitor (W.P. Dremak) who asks him if he does anything aside from practice like party. Of course, as Larry explains regarding his music, "this is my party." After giving Larry a swig of liquor, the Janitor proceeds to get on his figurative soapbox and begins berating the composer's work for its lack of soulfulness, stating in bastardized American English: "Larry...I'm gonna tell ya' something. Your playin' ain't so hot. Oh now, you got all the notes right, but it's empty...you lack mystery in your music...soul...you understand what I mean? You gotta get a life-force in it. All those longhairs had to do it, like that, uh, Beethoven fellow...didn't he die of cirrhosis or syphilis or something like that? Yeah, and Mozart...MOZ-ART...now he was a wild one too. How do you think they wrote great music? By feeding great emotions! Did you ever fall in love with anybody? Really in love with them – more than yourself. I did." After Larry once again sees a vision of his dead wife, he leaves the studio room to follow her, which makes the Janitor think that he has offended him with his harsh words, so he yells to the musicians, "I think you're gonna be great one day. I really do." When Larry enters another room, he bumps into two dorky looking burglars (David Christopher and Michael Thorpe) and is soon hit over the head and knocked unconscious by one of the goons, thus transporting him to a sexually surreal netherworld of gigantic genitals and operatic orgies.

After entering the sexually surreal underworld, Larry follows his sensual somnambulist-like lover through various rather risqué orgy rooms. After a long romantic rendezvous with his lover on a fur-adorned bed in what seems to be a cave which is lit up by hundreds of cameras, Larry loses his significant other after being temporarily woken up by the Janitor, who ultimately fails to fully revive him. From there, Larry enters a vice-ridden vaudeville-themed room featuring a cunt-licking Uncle Sam with a faggy frog mustache, a swing-riding flapper with exotic make-up, a midget ringmaster (played by Luis De Jesus aka 'Mr. Short Stud'), a raunchy redhead, and a construction worker who looks like a member of the Village People. Although Larry does not really join in their somewhat sinister seeming sexscapades, he does get erotically embroiled in an angelic all-white orgy room where he is treated to a long session of skull-buggery, which is topped off with classic coitus. After suffering a heart attack after being checked by two dorky paramedics, Larry enters a hardcore hedonistic hell where he is tied to a stake and is forced to witness the sadistic torture of the two burglars that hit him over the head by big black beastess and her equally cruel Caucasoid comrade. After one of the burglars faces death via medieval sword to the chest, Larry is set free by his captors and is reunited with his lover who takes him to a dark yet fiery room where they make love and are ultimately united forever. Indeed, while the Janitor yells to Larry's corpse, "Larry, don't leave us. You can make it," the musical composer decides to stay with his love for eternity by accepting death.

Like Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger's The Red Shoes (1948) meets a heterosexual take on Kenneth Anger's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954) with a splash of gentile vaudeville, Vincent's Visions is not only a visually fantastic fuck flick that is more about phantasmagoria than frivolous fetishism, but is also a genuinely romantic porn picture that will most likely be more enjoyable to lovers than erotically-challenged losers who live with their grandmothers and are merely looking for a cheap and quick masturbation aid. Indeed, more than anything else, the film seems like the most ambitious and desperate attempt of a real creatively repressed artist who is forced to make a living as a pornographer at truly expressing express himself. Needless to say, as a work of celluloid art, Visions is a somewhat incoherent cinematic vision, but as porn, it is an unequivocal singular masterpiece that manages to reasonably successfully seamlessly combine poetry and pornography in a way that sometimes makes you forget that you're watching a woman sucking the cock of a rock.

NO MERCY

Richard Pearce (1986)

Swallowing grit, I decided to watch and review a newer Korean film from the same company that brought us the manic youth transpiring in Attack the Gas Station! Even though these films have nothing to do with each other other than country of origin, I feel that this noted was better than just jumping headfirst into discussing the wildly fluctuating events that occur within the confines of this newer Korean thriller. No Mercy, much like A Bittersweet Life, Truck, Mother, The Chaser, and Memories of Murder, is another excellent K-thriller displaying the exploitative world of Korean crime as popularized in cinema. A steadfast picture without the help of such blockbuster faces of Byung-hun Lee or Kang-ho Song, No Mercy gets right into the jugular at merely the halfway mark and never lets go, not even past the rolling credits. Even though I continue to be in a concise state of duress after my viewings of such emotionally hampering films, it appears I can still channel human emotion into an addressable manner, which is nice.

No Mercy centers around two characters and neither one of them is more important than the other to the fruition of the tale; the only questionable difference is that one of them has more to lose. Sul Kyung-gu is a top forensic investigator who now lives a quiet life waiting for the arrival of his daughter who was in the United States for reasons unexplained at the time. As he dabbles in odd cases and gives advice to the detectives in charge, this does well with establishing a very real connection to the police station and dividing him apart from these unbeatable detective heroes. Min-ho's involvement in a murder case committed by an environmental activist becomes all the more personal when he is handed an envelope while at the airport containing pictures of his kidnapped daughter. Now in order for him to ever see his daughter again, the killer demands to be released in 3 days in turn for her safe carriage. This is where No Mercy turns from typical police drama into a young, rebellious vehicle for insistent evidence tampering, which is a very cool departure from your casual search-and-seizure operations via cinema. I'm looking at you, CSI and Law and Order.

In a radical and idiotic move, No Mercy has been centering itself around its visceral climax entirely, as if to discredit the incredibly paced previous events. Heralding the ending by comparing it to Oldboy's is a blunder on their part. Giving the audience expectations and predictability is exactly what is wrong with modern cinema. Going into a film blind to what may or may not occur is a rarity these days, what, with all the suburbanites checking reviews and ratings with their fancy smart-phones. There might as well be an app for spoilers. Another critical mishap in the same vein was the shot-by-shot remake of [Rec], Quarantine, which featured the final shot of the film not only in the trailer, but as the theatrical poster. No Mercy is a film that stands true to its title, as most films seem to nowadays. Disaster Movie was a disaster, Dead Calm was a quiet thriller, The Other Guys is a film concerning people that I don't care about, and No Mercy doesn't particularly care about any character by the sudden end of this diabolical over-stylized "horror" film.

When the ending does piece itself together after some frantic rogue detective work, the results will be vicious and will incite a session of brainstorming much needed. With all the previous events that transpired, one must pause the film or to seek in retrospect, all preceding scenes and realize the gravity of the situation that these characters were lured into. While I may be considered a hypocrite for bringing to light the banal state of the industry and its pilfering of cinematic curveballs, I had no choice but to face and attack this blatant mimicry of the artistry of the photoplay. For what it is worth, No Mercy isn't one of the Korean masterpieces that I hoped it would be but due to the complexity of the "big reveal" and the chemistry between the antagonist and protagonist, this comes out as a clever, murder-charged spectacle that is easy on the eyes, as are most budgeted Korean films however. It's just a shame that the creators feel the need to reference the "shocking" ending as a selling point for their already-gifted film.

Richard Stanley (1990)

Without question, Dylan McDermott is one of the biggest and most grating human dildos to have ever graced the silver-screen and thus it is no surprise that he has starred in some of the most banal movies and TV shows oftentimes playing the unbelievable role of doctors, but there is at least one film he starred in that has some testicular fortitude and aesthetic allure. Indeed, somehow dildo McDermott played the lead role in the post-apocalyptic dystopian cyberpunk flick Hardware (1990) directed by South African auteur Richard Stanley (Dust Devil, The Theatre Bizarre). A sort of superlatively stylish The Terminator rip-off meets a poor man's take on Terry Gilliam's Brazil (1985), albeit more culturally cynical, punk rock, and bitingly acid-washed, Hardware is like a sci-fi flick for those exceedingly negative nihilists who couldn't care less if the world suffers some sort of nasty global nuclear holocaust. The debut feature film of auteur Stanley, who previously directed music videos from bands like English Gothic rock group Fields of the Nephilim and Johnny Rotten's post-Sex Pistols post-punk group Public Image Ltd (PiL), the film is no less musically-inclined as a work featuring cameos from Iggy Pop as a raunchy radio host, Lemmy of Motörhead as a taxicab driver, and Carl McCoy of Fields of the Nephilim as a somewhat sinister desert-lurking nomad of the post-apocalyptic cowboy sort, hence its mostly deserved cult status today as a sort of science fiction flick for losers, loners, born again Spenglerians and/or unrepentant recreational drug users whose brains have been turned to mush. Indeed, set in a world with deformed dickhead midget junk dealers, futuristic television broadcasts inspired by the acid house group Psychic TV, lard ass peeping toms with Hebraic surnames that get off to prank calling their neighbors, bitchy protagonists on welfare with voracious appetites for sex and drugs, and a self-regenerating and human-exterminating robot, Hardware is like Philip K. Dick on punk and psychedelics. Indeed, part unpretentious arthouse, part degenerate dystopian sci-fi, part soft core yet suave spatter flick, and part sardonic satire, Stanley's less than flattering filmic depiction of the future is undoubtedly a rare science fiction work that does not make you feel like a virginal dork for watching it. Featuring scorching red desert landscape scenes which were filmed on location in Morocco that look sort of like Wim Wenders' Paris, Texas (1984) were it set in some sort of post-Jihad hell, Hardware—a work based on the short story "Shok" from the British sci-fi-oriented comic 2000 AD about 'Strato-Bat Pilot' who buys the head of a Shok Trooper Robot and gives it to his artist girlfriend as a present for one of her projects, thus resulting in bloody murderous consequences—is also indisputable proof that you can take a mostly moronic storyline and make something truly aesthetically transcendental if you have the right flare as a filmmaker.

A Nomad (Carl McCoy) dressed in all black that looks like something in between the Grim Reaper and a post-apocalyptic cowboy digs up some robot parts, including a metallic skull, out the sand of a desert wasteland and brings it to a junk shop owned by an asshole midget named Alvy (played by Mark Northover, who is best known for his role in the 1988 fantasy flick Willow directed by Ron Howard). While Alvy is in the back of his store, a smart-ass soldier with a bionic arm named Moses "Hard Mo" Baxter (dildo Dylan McDermott) buys the robot parts from the Nomad, though he sells all the parts to Alvy except the menacing robo-skull, which he plans to give to his rather reclusive girlfriend Jill (Stacey Travis of Phantasm II (1988) and Ghost World (2001)) as a special Christmas gift. Since it has been sometime since Mo has come by to see Jill, she is somewhat reluctant to allow him in her flat, but she eventually gives in as she loves her mensch, even if he is a rather negligent boyfriend who leaves for long periods of time without contacting her. A somewhat eccentric and high-strung artist, Jill uses the robot head as the finishing piece of an 'abstract' sculpture she is creating. While Mo tries to convince his girlfriend to make more commercial-oriented works, Jill—a pathological pothead and unabashed welfare recipient who lives off the government—has no interest in 'selling-out,' as she creates her art for herself and herself alone. While Mo has given up all hope of having a child, Jill clearly wants one, but her patent pessimism and cultural cynicism makes her think it is a bad idea. Of course, as the two lovers will soon learn, the government is plotting to exterminate humans via killer robots, so it indeed might be a bad idea to bring children into this decidedly dystopian world.

While having 'make-up sex,' Mo and Jill are spied on by a grotesque fat Judaic-like neighbor named Lincoln Wineberg, Jr. (William Hootkins), who on top of being a peeping tom and all-around pathetic pervert, is also responsible for putting security in the local apartment buildings. Meanwhile, junk dealer Alvy learns that the robot parts that were brought in by the mysterious Nomad from the desert are from a robot called the 'M.A.R.K. 13,' so he tells Mo to come by his shop, but when the soldier gets there, he finds the wisecrack midget dead as a result of mysterious cytotoxin poisoning. As Mo learns after looking in the Bible, the robot is named after the quote, "No flesh shall be spared" under Mark 13:20, thus making the ex-soldier realize that the government has created a genocidal man-murdering machine. While at Alvy's place, Mo also realizes that the killer robot is capable of self-repair, though it has a strange weakness to water and humidity. Although Mo attempts to get his friend Shades (John Lynch) to go by Jill's place to protect her from the M.A.R.K. 13 robot skull, his comrade is far too inebriated on some sort of psychedelic drug. While playing peeping tom, pathetic pervert Wineberg notices a robot—the fully self-repaired M.A.R.K. 13—peeping out of Jill's place, so he goes by her place to warn her. Indeed, the robot has already attempted to exterminate Jill, who is locked in the apartment, and when wanton Wineberg shows up at her apartment, he doesn't think twice about sexually harassing her in a superlatively sleazy fashion. Of course, Wineberg does not believe Jill's seemingly far-fetched story about a murderous robot, so he is killed after not taking heed of the young lady's warning not to go near her blinds (indeed, Wineberg hoped to open the blinds so it would be easier to peep on her). After managing to flee to her kitchen, Jill manages to avoid the robot's infrared vision by hiding behind a refrigerator and ultimately does a little bit of damage to the death-bot. While Mo, Shades, and an apartment security team manage to kill the robot shortly upon arriving at the apartment, the M.A.R.K. 13 manages to come back to life and drag Jill out the window while she is embracing her boy toy. While would-be-macho Mo attempts to be a bad ass and fights in a foolish haphazard manner with the Robot, he is soon fatally wounded and dies slowly, with the security team also being exterminated as well. After hacking into the kill-bot's CPU in an attempt to malfunction it, Jill learns the M.A.R.K. 13's weakness for water, so she lures it into her bathroom and kills it with her shower. In the end, it is revealed by a radio DJ named "Angry Bob - The Guy with the Industrial Dick" that the government's Defense Department plans to mass-produce M.A.R.K. 13 Cyborgs, thus setting up Hardware for a sequel that was planned but never actually made.

Apparently, director Richard Stanley originally intended to make Hardware more of an allegorical 'anti-fascist' work that was inspired by his upbringing in Apartheid era South Africa, but luckily you would never catch that watching the film. Indeed, in its depiction of a government weapon that is capable of exterminating countless people in distant lands, Stanley's film certainly seems more relevant today in our age of unmanned drones and whatnot. Interestingly, before shooting Hardware, Stanley joined a guerrilla Muslim faction in the Soviet War in Afghanistan, which produced the documentary short Voice of the Moon (1990) and inspired the overall aesthetic of the director's dystopian flick. Featuring apocalyptic spiritual references ranging from Mark 13 to the Hindu Goddess Kali to Tarkovsky's masterpiece Stalker (1979), Hardware is, if nothing else, the greatest metaphysical punk rock sci-fi flick ever made and arguably the greatest The Terminator rip-off ever made as a sort of Future-Kill (1985) on steroids meets Blade Runner (1982) on LSD. Although Stanley never got to realize his dream of making a sequel for bureaucratic business reasons (apparently, the rights to the original film were split between various parties), he did write a complete script under the title Hardware II: Ground Zero, which would have been more 'acid western' oriented. By no means a masterpiece of any sort, Hardware is certainly one of the most decadent, degenerate, debasing, pessimistic, and even misanthropic sci-fi flickers ever made, as a work that dares to depict the overall disgusting essence of the particular zeitgeist when it was made. Indeed, with the nerdy philo-Semitism of Star Trek, it is quite refreshing to see a sick sci-fi flick were a grotesque kosher peeping tom states things like, "Taking that big dick [...] suck it dry [...] squeeze it," while masturbating while spying on his neighbor being brutally slaughtered by a Biblically-named cyborg. Of course, the soundtrack featuring music by Public Image Ltd., Motörhead, Ministry, and Iggy Pop did not hurt either. And, of course, the film would have been better without dildo McDermott, who might have fared better playing the M.A.R.K., or so one would assume after seeing his rather robotic acting performance. Indeed, I put off watching Hardware for about a decade because I knew he was in the film, but after watching the work, I have to say that I need to stop allowing myself from being deterred towards watching films because of appalling actors.

Long before there was HBO's True Detective and the viewer had the opportunity to go on a philosophical and metaphysical odyssey involving super sinister serial killers, disgruntled law men with nihilistic philosophies, deathly barren desert landscapes, and ritualistic sex murders as committed by less than savory followers of the left-hand path merely by turning on their TV and tuning in, there existed the seemingly accursed artsy fartsy South African-UK horror flick Dust Devil (1992) directed by Richard Stanley (Hardware, The Theatre Bizarre). Part Southern African Gothic, part post-apartheid allegory, part decidedly dark continent acid (anti)western, part esoteric celluloid quest, part surrealist arthouse horror show, part existential study of the death drive, part transcendental serial killer flick, part avant-garde meta-cinema, and part shockingly cultivated metaphysical crime-thriller, Stanley's film is a curious work with a production history that was just as much a journey of sorts for the auteur as it was for the protagonists of the film. Filmed in the intolerably arid and dusty deserts of Namibia (16 of the film crew's motor vehicles were ground to a halt during the seven week shoot by the extreme dust) with a dedicated crew who were apparently almost driven to the verge of insanity, Dust Devil ultimately fell prey to the pernicious anti-artist kosher predatory capitalism of the Weinstein brothers of Miramax, who cut the film to a stereotypical horror movie running time of less than 90 minutes and excised the film of all its iconic dream-sequences, surrealism, and all the more potent elements that made it such a true idiosyncratic Tarkovskyan arthouse masterpiece. It was not until well over a decade later when Stanley's cut of the film was released in the United States as a part of a now-out-of-print 5-disc DVD set put out by Subversive Cinema featuring the director's 'The Final Cut' version, the original work print, three of the director's excellent rare documentaries (The Secret Glory, Voice of the Moon, The White Darkness), and the original soundtrack by Simon Boswell (who composed the score for Jodorowsky's Santa Sangre (1989) and Stanley's debut feature Hardware (1990), among various other horror/cult classics) that the real Dust Devil was belatedly unleashed on the world.

The genesis of Dust Devil was an aborted 16mm film of the same name that Stanley attempted to direct in 1984 (Stanley and the cinematographer's conscription in the South African Defense Force and the then current Angolan Bush War put a premature end to the production) that was inspired by a dream the director had, as well as a real-life serial killer Nhadiop from Namibia that had a fetish for killing white women and was purported to have magical powers. In that sense, the film was a literal and figurative dream-project for the auteur. Although the great-grandson of famous late-18th-century Welsh explorer of Africa, Sir Henry Morton Stanley, who once wrote in his work Through the Dark Conti- ment regarding sub-Saharan Africans that “the savage only respects force, power, boldness, and decision,” Stanley was unfortunately spawned from card-carrying commies with far-left ethno-masochistic tendencies. Luckily, the filmmaker’s feminist neo-bolshevik Boasian anthropologist mother surrounded him with real-life magic, mystics, and witchdoctors as a young child, hence the highly spiritual nature of his films. Like Giulio Questi’s bizarre Gothic spaghetti western Django Kill... If You Live, Shoot! (1967) meets The Hitcher (1986) meets Wes Craven’s The Hills Have Eyes (1997) and A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984) as directed by the South African bastard cinematic progeny of Andrei Tarkovsky, Donald Cammell, Mario Bava, and Ousmane Sembène, Dust Devil is the wayward horror-art result of a reluctant white man with an undeniable Faustian spirit (among other things, Stanley roamed around Afghanistan with Mujahideen rebels during the late-1980s, became initiated in voodoo rites in Haiti in 2000, and spent a good portion of his life traveling around Europa attempting to solve the mystery of tragic Jewish SS-Obersturmführer Otto Rahn and his search for the Holy Grail) who curiously sees the foremost murderous shape-shifting demon who haunts Southern Africa as a tall, dark, and handsome Nordic mensch who is more stoic than John Wayne and Clint Eastwood but a more suave lady’s man than Marcello Mastroianni.

Dust Devil is narrated by desert negro sage Joe Niemand (John Matshikiza), who is a ‘Sangoma’ (traditional healer), mystic, and cinephile that lives near Spitzkoppe in Namibia where he used to work at a now defunct movie theater where he fondly remembers catching a double feature of Dario Argento’s Birds with the Crystal Plumage (1970) and the Hammer-Shaw Brothers coproduction Legend of the Seven Golden Vampires (1974) starring Peter Cushing. Joe is blind in one eye, which has a creepy faded bluish pigment to it. Jigaboo Joe will help guide his black South African cop friend from Bethanie, Sgt. Ben Mukurob (Zakes Mokae), who he believes is an ‘Uncle Tom’ (as demonstrated by his remark to him, “you gotta stop thinking like a white man and think like a man instead”), in his journey to hunt down an entity known as the ‘Dust Devil’ (played by Irish-American actor Robert John Burke, who is probably best known for playing the eponymous role in RoboCop 3) who hitches rides from attractive yet troubled white chicks in their 30s, seduces and has sex with them, murders them, and ritualistically dismembers their bodies. Indeed, during the beginning of the film, the Dust Devil breaks a girl’s neck named Saartjie Haarhoff (Terry Norton) just as she has an orgasm (what a way to die!), cuts up her body into dozens of pieces (keeping all her fingers except her thumbs for himself), uses her vital fluids to paint demonic Manson-esque blood murals on the walls of her home, and then burns the entire place down. Sergeant Ben first becomes aware that he is dealing with some dark entity when he investigates the Haarhoff murder and learns from a mortician at the local morgue, Dr. Leidzinger (obese German actress Marianne Sägebrect of Percy Adlon’s 1987 kraut romantic comedy Bagdad Café), that the victim's body was used in some black magic witchcraft ritual (the body sustained "evisceration, partial cremation, sexual mutilation and possibly even cannibalism" along with having a clock piece wedged in her naughty bits). Meanwhile, a young woman named Wendy Robinson (Chelsea Field) in Johannesburg, South Africa is slapped by her husband Mark (Rufus Swart) after he accuses her of having cheated on him, so she leaves her nice suburban neighborhood and heads to Namibia. Needless to say, Wendy will become the Dust Devil's victim and Sgt. Ben and husband Mark will attempt to find her before it's too late.

While driving on a highway in Namibia, Wendy sees the handsome Dust Devil, who just got done mutilating a young man in a trailer and is dressed in a sort of post-punk industrial cowboy outfit in the spirit of British Gothic group Fields of Nephilim (the singer of the group, Carl McCoy, who previously played a similar figure in Stanley's Hardware, was originally supposed to play the Dust Devil but had to turn it down) and naturally picks him up as she clearly sees him as sexually appealing. After revealing that he is headed to "nowhere," the Dust Devil describes himself as a perennial traveler who feels most comfortable on the open road. While talking to her, the Dust Devil learns that Wendy has a nihilistic philosophy as demonstrated by her hate-fueled comments, "fuck superior forces" and "when you're dead, you're dead." Naturally, hardcore atheist Wendy becomes quite disturbed when she sees a doppelgänger of the Dust Devil hitchhiking on the road despite the fact he is sitting in her passenger seat. Ultimately, the Dust Devil disappears from the car and Wendy later considers committing suicide via slitting her wrists at a motel room, but she becomes happy when the demonic cowboy appears again and they start a heated sexual romance. Meanwhile, husband Mark lands in Namibia and is soon beaten by a group of blacks at a bar after they learn he served in the South African army (interestingly but not surprisingly, Stanley revealed in the audio commentary track for the film that the black actors really did hate Rufus Swart in real-life and began to really beat him during the bar scene). Indeed, hatred for white South Africans is universal among blacks from Namibia and Mark acts as a symbol of white power and oppression. Meanwhile, Sgt. Ben is told by his boss, Capt. Beyman (William Hootkins of Star Wars (1977) and Raiders of the Lost Ark (1981))—a sort of white counterpart to the black cop who also grieves the loss of his wife (while Beyman's wife is dead, Ben's wife left him 15 years ago because their son was killed in the 'white' military)—that he will soon have to take him off the case, but that he will give him all the documents on the Dust Devil and give him one more chance. More than solving a criminal case and saving a young white chick he couldn't care less about, Ben is seeking deliverance and redemption and he hopes to obtain it by catching the killer. A somewhat weird guy who listens to whale sounds instead of music and watches footage of whales being butchered by evil white folks, Ben also suffers from disturbing nightmares, including a burnt skeleton ripping his heart out. Needless to say, Ben's dreams will not prepare him for his showdown with the Duſt Devil.

After being arrested by two stupid young white cops who get off to beating old negroes, playing with dismembered body parts, and looking at vintage homoerotic wrestling magazines, Mark is placed in a jail cell in a backward police station where he is found by Ben, who asks him if Wendy is his wife. While Mark and Ben team up to track down Wendy and the Duſt Devil before it is too late, racial tensions make their collaboration impossible. After Wendy finds a fancy case owned by her new lover containing dismembered fingers, she finds herself on the brink of being ritualistically murdered by the Duſt Devil, who walks in on her while she is fiddling with his things and tells her that his victims "wanted to die" and that he can "tell when someone's time up." Indeed, the Duſt Devil is a symbol of Wendy's 'Id' and desire, but she no longer longs for death and decides to fight back. When Wendy asks the Duſt Devil who he is, he states that he is, "from the other side of the mirror. I come from you." While Wendy manages to escape from the Duſt Devil juſt before he drives his ritualistic dagger into her after hitting him over the head, the demon uses his telekinetic powers to crash her Volkswagen into a big rig truck, so she flees into the abyss-like depths of the desert on foot without food and water. When the Duſt Devil totals Ben's truck as he and Mark are heading to find Wendy, the young white man and old black man decide to go their separate ways after the latter handcuffs the former to the wrecked automobile after he pulls a gun on him. Eventually, Wendy finds a super sandy ghost town where she eventually runs into Ben, but rejects his help. When Ben enters a ruined movie theater that is completely full of sand, the Duſt Devil messes with the cop's head by projecting a film featuring his wife and baby son, but luckily Joe somehow manages to get inside his head and tell him that it is merely an illusion like life itself, even comparing life to cinema. Unfortunately, Ben is soon killed in a rather anticlimactic fashion by the Duſt Devil, who drives his dagger into his gut, but death was what he desired all along as a broken and restless man who had nothing left to live for. Luckily, Wendy manages to get a hold of a shotgun and blows the Duſt Devil's entire head away right after he declares his love for her. In a twist ending, Wendy more or less inherits the Duſt Devil's demonic spirit and becomes a Duſt Demoness of sorts who immediately begins hunting for male prey. As for husband Mark, he is left to die in the desert by Wendy, who contemplates killing him before going on her merry way, but he does not give up hope that he will one day return to suburbia with his beloved bitch wife.

In the audio commentary for the Subversive Cinema DVD release of Duſt Devil, director Richard Stanley proudly remarks that the film was, "intended as a love letter to poſt-apartheid South Africa" and a "message to the Rainbow Nation [...] I wanted to show the way they were going to work things out." As a film where the villain is a white demonic cowboy who kills beautiful Aryan women for sport, the black cop who worked for the apartheid era police is senselessly sacrificed, a white South African ex-military man is brutally beaten by blacks merely for being white and is left to literally rot by his cheating wife, and the white female lead becomes a demon, I am not exactly sure how the film is suppose to show South Africans how to “work things out,” but then again, with the increasing number of murders of white Afrikaner Boer farmers by blacks in what has been described as the early stages of white genocide by Genocide Watch and has been intentionally ignored by the mainstream media (though, somewhat surprisingly, NBC once reported on the deplorable phenomenon, albeit in a typically biased manner that downplayed the racial aspect of it), one could argue that Stanley was certainly on to something. In its depiction of a pedophile-like white priest handing young white boys bullets and forcing them to engage in target practice, two young degenerate blond-haired cops brutally beating a kindly old negro for fun in an obscenely cartoonish fashion, and a black man telling his Uncle Tom friend to “stop thinking like a white man and think like a man instead,” Stanley certainly demonstrates what he thinks of white South Africa and the Occident in general. Ironically, the filmmaker currently resides in Montségur in southern France with the spirits of the Cathars, which does not surprise me, as I doubt he wants to deal with the social and racial chaos of his seemingly forsaken homeland. Personally, I find it quite fitting that Dust Devil—an ostensible “love letter to post-apartheid South Africa”—failed to ever receive a proper theatrical debut and almost instantaneously fell into obscurity upon its less than auspicious release, as it is somewhat symbolic of the failure of leftist utopian dreams regarding race relations and the all around abject failure of black-ruled South Africa as a whole. Unquestionably, one of the most potent scenes in the film is when the eponymous demon burns down his first victim’s home, as it acts as a sort allegory for the death of white civilization on the dark continent as is underscored by shots of colonial era vintage images of white people burning up and being reduced to ash, as if they never even existed.

Quite arguably a masterpiece that is unfortunately glaringly tainted by its half-baked quasi-commie social commentary and exceedingly ethno-masochistic depictions of black-white race relations, Dust Devil is certainly a work that, had it been created a couple of decades earlier, would have become a hit midnight movie like Alejandro Jodorowsky’s El Topo (1970) and David Lynch’s Eraserhead (1977), but as Stanley has stated in countless interviews, fate has not been too kind to him, with most of his film projects resulting in personal bankruptcy and the destruction of all his personal relationships. Of course, when one makes a film that makes liberal use of real black magic archetypes and themes, they probably should expect a little karmic blowback in their persona lives. Somewhat notably, shortly after Dust Devil finished shooting, one of the girls that worked as part of the art department for the film, Ina Roux, died after falling asleep at the wheel of her automobile one night in a manner not all that dissimilar to how protagonist Wendy does in the movie (Ina's sister Amelia, who also worked on the film, was also in the crash but managed to survive). In a kind tribute to her memory, Stanley concludes his 'The Final Cut' version of the film with a dedication to Ms. Roux, whose pointless death is surely symbolic of the negative spiritual energy that Duſt Devil bleeds in a moſt profuſe faſhion. Indeed, not unlike a Tarkovsky flick, the film is an intimidating and taxing metaphysical celluloid odyssey that certainly demands more than moſt filmgoers are willing to give, thus making it an eſpecially disappointing work for the ſtereotypical ſlasher fan, as well as jaded gorehounds who are juſt looking for a quick maſturbatory thrill. If you're looking to ſee a truly tranſcendental horror film this Halloween with a decidedly dark vibe that totally lacks the 'fun' faċtor that people oftentimes aſſociate with the genre, watch Duſt Devil and baſk in the deluge of daunting demonic energy, foreboding paranoia, racial and cultural ſchizophrenia, eſoteric murder, ſpiritual nihilism, and poſt-colonial dread that the work wallows in. Indeed, more than anything, the film ſeems like Sir Henry Morton Stanley's worſt nightmare come to life and then ſome.

THE SECRET GLORY
THE SECRET GLORY

Richard Stanley (2001)

The Secret Glory is an exceptional documentary directed by Richard Stanley on the extraordinary life of SS officer Otto Rahn. When one speaks of members of the SS, they automatically think of a devil in human form. Rahn was not your typical SS man as he was a sensitive artist that joined "the club," as he put it to a friend, "dear paul, one has to eat." SS leader Heinrich Himmler recruited Otto Rahn due to Rahn's study of ancient Germanic cultures. Rahn was also able to confirm Himmler's ancient Aryan ancestry. After watching The Secret Glory it is made clear that Otto Rahn was a loner and an individualist. Someone that certainly had no interest in supporting collectivist governments such as the National Socialists. On the other hand, like the National Socialists, Rahn wanted the great European nations to unite (including France where he did much of his research). Otto Rahn inevitably had a falling out with the SS and had the audacity to quit the cult-like organization. Otto Rahn's emotionally cold mother sewed him a sweater with an SS lightning bolt on it that he wore very often. This is quite ironic considering that Rahn's mother was Jewish. Like almost all of the major Nazis were rumored to be Jewish (and conveniently almost all of their ancestral records were destroyed after World War II), Otto Rahn, like SS founder Emil Maurice, is confirmed to be of Jewish ancestry. Otto Rahn was a homosexual as well, and this also led to his unfortunate downfall. The SS gave Otto Rahn two options: to enter a concentration camp or commit suicide. Rahn was forced to work at two concentrations camps (including Dachau) as punishment and he was well aware what was going on in them. Naturally, Otto Rahn committed suicide by taking sleeping pills and freezing to death at a mountainside in Austria. Many rumors live on today about Rahn's suicide being faked. As The Secret Glory demonstrates, Otto Rahn had a very interesting life full of many mysteries. The documentary left me with many questions that I know will never be answered. Out of all the Nazi players I have read about, Otto Rahn is without doubt one of the most interesting (if not the most interesting). He is also much more worthy of notoriety than Indiana Jones (and the overrated banal actor the plays him), the Hollywood character whose life parallels (as Nigel Graddon's recent book on Otto Rahn insightfully demonstrates) Rahn's. The Secret Glory brings up high probability that Otto Rahn believed that Lucifer was "the son of God." It is also interesting to note that Rahn never said the word "God" out loud (also a Jewish belief). He was verily an individual that had his own ideas and theories. It was only appropriate that Otto Rahn would die by his own hand. The structure of The Secret Glory is a very dark yet soothing experience. Director Richard Stanley interweaves interview footage, vintage photographs, and early films (Fritz Lang's M, Aleksandr Nevskiy, etc) in a seamless manner. The music featured in The Secret Glory is very melancholy and gloomy. This is a soundtrack that perfectly compliments the image of a timeless (and for the most part neglected) figure. Otto Rahn was an individual whom many said was always searching for something. The urge this young man had ultimately led to his death. One could say that Otto Rahn was doomed from birth, but very few could claim that they led a life as interesting as this unconventional SS man. I have yet to see a clear photograph of Otto Rahn in his black SS uniforms (if one even exists) and I find that only fitting.

THE WHITE DARKNESS

Richard Stanley (2002)

The White Darkness is a documentary examining voodoo practiced by black Haitians. The documentary was directed by Richard Stanley who claims that he has some Haitian Indian blood due to one of his ancestors fucking an indigenous individual. The documentary also takes a brief look at the slavery of black Haitians and its unfortunate legacy. The black Haitians claim that they live in the past now. That sounds like a slave mentality to me.

Richard Stanley with a voodoo goddess

Apparently voodoo was put on the black Haitians by a rich European as a joke to another European. The black Haitians don't consider voodoo a joke by any means. Brain scans have been done to prove that weird changes occur while Haitians are in a "voodoo trance." I guess one man's practical joke is another man's entire meaning of life. The Haitians also pride themselves in their denial of Christianity. Some whites want to believe that these voodoo fanatics are Catholics. One black Haitian laughs at the thought. Thankfully, some third world people haven't fallen for the anti-human and false lies of so-called Christian altruism. Despite voodoo being a joke, these black Haitians practice voodoo in a respectable and serious manner.

Naive American Christian Military Men wasting their time as usual

Although proud of their escape from slavery, the black Haitians demand that the world provide them food and living resources. One man claims that the black Haitians will always live in the past, unlike the white man. That being said, it seems as if the former slaves are uninterested in true independence as they demand some sort of reparations. Sounds like something similar going on in the United States that seems to only get worse.

Mudman Represent!

The black Haitians also hate seeing whitey on their turf and would pull a gun on them for no reason. This irrational act results in a handful of black Haitian deaths. My recommendation is that the whites cut off the blacks and just let them be. Strength comes from hardship, not from accommodating weakness. The White Darkness is an unintentionally exploitive documentary guaranteed to entertain and enlighten the viewer on third world matters.

THE MEATRACK

Richard Stockton (1970)

In my opinion, there are few forms of existence that are as patently pathetic, self-debasing, and nihilistic than that of the male hustler, yet queer filmmakers like Gus van Sant (Mala Noche, My Own Private Idaho) and Bruce LaBruce (No Skin Off My Ass, Hustler White) have dedicated their filmmaking careers to romanticizing the lives of these sad and seemingly forsaken individuals. Of course, with so many ostensibly heterosexual 'gay-for-pay' dick-peddlers out there, the hustler gives the homo the ultimate and seemingly intangible lifelong dream of being buggered by a butch boy, so it is no surprise that some gay filmmakers have depicted the young and desperate male prostitute as an almost religious figure, which began long before any sexual invert ever went to film school as demonstrated by the neo-classical boysploitation portraits of 19th-century kraut photographer Wilhelm von Gloeden. With his innovative Warhol-produced anti-counter-culture trilogy (Flesh, Trash, Heat) starring Joe Dallesandro and his post-Warhol effort Forty Deuce (1982) starring a then-unknown Kevin Bacon, proud right-wing auteur Paul Morrissey managed to demystify the hustler archetype by presenting the life of a male prostitute as being part of overall liberal 'toilet culture' and a non-life plagued by spiritual and material poverty, soul-draining drug addiction, perennial apathy, and even sexual impotence. Aside from Morrissey's work, a little know artsploitation flick from the same zeitgeist with the fitting, if not sleazily fetishistic, title The Meatrack (1970) directed by one-time-auteur Richard Stockton and directed by Joel Ensana (whose sole film credit was writing the first episode of the forgotten TV series Norman Corwin Presents (1972)) also attempted to depict the waywardly wasteful life of a gigolo in all of its unhinged unglory. A film that cannot completely decide whether it wants to be a salacious sexploitation flick, a poor man's Midnight Cowboy (1969), and/or a serious and artsy character study about the sort of damaged psyche it takes for one to peddle their ass to ugly old men that wear dresses and other sorts of unsavory sexual deviants. Directed in a cockeyed and oneiric yet gritty and realistic semi-amateurish style reminiscent of the more interesting films of sadomasochistic sodomite gutter auteur Andy Milligan (Nightbirds, Fleshpot on 42nd Street), as well as early 1970s porn chic cult flicks like The Back Row (1973) directed by Jerry Douglas and the narrative-driven works of Jack Deveau (Left-Handed, Drive), The Meatrack is ultimately a curious celluloid convergence of tasteless 42nd street celluloid sleaze and the pseudo-existentialist cocksucker blues. The tragic, if not uneventful, story of a human meatrack and dreary dead soul with nothing to lose except his loser-lifestyle-sustaining good looks, The Meatrack is a just over-an-hour-long scum-and-cum-covered 16mm peepshow of one down-and-out male prostitute's own private pandemonium.

As the incessant foggy flashback scenes in The Meatrack readily demonstrate,

THE MEATRACK

J.C. (played by David Calder, but not the classically trained English actor of the same name) is haunted by the ghosts of the past as he had a less than ideal childhood as a poor proletarian fellow who had a man-hating and low-rank money-grubbing whore for a mother (Jan Stratton, who appeared in minor roles in films like The Enforcer (1976) starring Clint Eastwood and The Great Santini (1979) starring Robert Duvall) and a philandering deadbeat father (played by one-time actor Bob Romero, who personifies the word 'Guido'). At a young and critical age, J.C.'s brazen bitch of a mother taught her son that all men are horndog assholes and that one should exploit themselves for money, stating to her son, "Aside from robbing a bank, you do anything you can to get money, you understand? Don't you waste your time fooling around with cars and girls... You just take account of what you got and you use it for all it's worth." Of course, the only thing C.J. has got is a masculine muscular build and a fuck-you rebel-without-a-cause attitude, which he is willing to sell for a rather affordable price to the most repugnant of strangers. As can be expected, most of C.J. patrons are old pansy queens who get off to being savagely sodomized by the young mensch. When some pretentious middle-aged fag arrogantly states to C.J., "Kids like you don't come cheap... but its mine, all mine," the prostitute later makes his getaway and does not have to do the dirty deed with the posh poof. C.J. temporary hooks up with a horny housewife, but her clinginess annoys the hell out of the lecherous loner, so he takes a bus to San Francisco where he hooks up with an old used-up queen of a queer named Ken (Steven Ferris) with a large bulging gut who asks the hustler if he is "hot for leather" and adds, "Myself, I like them real, real butch." Ultimately, C.J. dresses up in an Anger-esque sailor uniform à la Fireworks (1947) and brutally beats and sexually savages Ken, who is in full drag queen regalia, including an unflattering corset and an equally repellant hag wig. When Ken gives C.J. the backhanded compliment, "You know, you don't look like a hustler. Their usually pimply faced and wear dirty socks. I know you're not a bum," the unimpressed prostitute shows his complete and utter disdain for the patron by asking, "What's it to you? You got what you wanted, right?" in a rather snide fashion. Needless to say, cocksucker Ken is hurt and somberly says to C.J., "You are the most unfriendly young man. You don't talk... You don't listen... Oh, how typical, you just do what you have to do. Oh, you're all alike. Just meat... pieces of meat." Exceedingly self-loathing, Ken then says to himself, "Gay, huh, that's a laugh! It's a lonely life." From there, C.J. heads to a movie theater that is playing C-grade trash Attack of the Crab Monsters (1957) and The Scream Skull (1958) and makes the following threat to a crotch-grabbing prospective buyer of a blowjob, "I said ten bucks or I'll break your hand!" in a rather hateful yet monotone manner. While administering a much unwanted blowjob, C.J. has a childhood flashback of witnessing his mother screwing a strange man. Indeed, C.J. has major mommy issues that have resulted in one rather warped view of sexuality.

After catching a Photographer (Rodney Wheelock) sexually assaulting a young lady named Jean (Donna Troy), C.J. beats the pernicious pervert, saves the girl, and becomes a smalltime hero of sorts and demonstrates he is not a total scumbag. Jean and C.J. instantly start a seemingly intimate love affair, but their happiness is cut short when two deranged tranny criminals hold them hostage with knives and force them to star in an amateur porn film, which they shoot on an archaic 16mm Bolex camera. Naturally, Jean and C.J. decide to leave town together, but they need money. Jean has no clue that her new boy toy is a gay-for-pay hustler and when she makes a derogatory remark about queers, C.J. semi-defends gays by stating, "To me, they're like that Charlie Chaplin...funny and sad, like everything." To fund their trip, C.J. tells Jean to hangout at a movie theater and then he picks up a Leather-Fag that looks like he just walked off the set of Scorpio Rising (1964). The Leather-Fag remarks to C.J. that he caught his eye because he is, "the damned, meanest looking kid I've seen today" and the two go back to the Hustler's apartment where the patron pays to get a beating, but just as he is about to cum, Jean randomly walks in and discovers her lover is half-homo. Needless to say, Jean runs away and C.J. follows her but he is too slow and ultimately witnesses his beloved being tragically killed after being hit by a car. Somewhat depressed, C.J. goes to a screening of All the Sins of Sodom (1968) directed by Joseph W. Sarno and has a panic attack while some dude is going down on him and storms out of the theater via a backdoor emergency exit where he is then verbally assaulted by a seemingly schizophrenic Jesus Freak Preacher (Alan Dye) who yells at the hustler, "I condemn in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, I condemn you sinner." From there, C.J. keeps running into the night and a flashback of him running as a child is spliced in. C.J. also remembers a traumatizing moment from his unfortunate childhood when his loser father berated him for crying, hence his incapacity for expressing emotion. In the end, C.J. is picked up by some flaming fairy and tells the driver he does not care where he is going, thus continuing his vicious cycle of reckless wandering and prick-peddling vice.

A conspicuously culturally pessimistic work about an (at least spiritually) innately impenetrable young man on a literal and figurative road to nowhere, The Meatrack ultimately portrays the Hustler as an antisocial individual seemingly suffering from schizoid disorder who has totally given up on real-life and does as little as possible (i.e. prostitutes himself) so as not to starve to death. Of course, I am sure there are some perverted poofs and even misguided women out there that might find such a tragic and emotionally void fellow appealing, but The Meatrack will ultimately prove to be a major downer for any semi-sane person. Undoubtedly, The Meatrack is one of those rare films that made me feel decidedly dirty after watching it, as if I just passively followed antihero C.J. along on his cruising campaign and did nothing to stop him from debasing his mind and body. Indeed, while the name 'The Meatrack' makes the work sound like some old school S&M blue movie (indeed, at least one porn film has the same name), the title really says it all, as C.J. is really nothing more than a walking and (barely) talking delicacy for lonely degenerates. More entertaining than similarly themed Warhol flicks like My Hustler (1965) and more raw and realistic than Midnight Cowboy, The Meatrack is certainly an underrated work of its decadent celluloid breed that deserves a larger audience than the handful of uncultivated exploitation fans who see it as a cheap thrill. In fact, those looking for softcore pornography will most likely find The Meatrack to be hopelessly banal, if not downright insulting, as the film feels as if it gawks at the gawker in disapproval for exploiting a loser's misery. Sometimes feeling like a work of cinéma vérité due to its jerky handheld camera work and distinct voyeuristic gaze, The Meatrack ultimately makes a film like van Sant's My Own Private Idaho (1991) seem like counterfeit art faggotry directed by a misguided bourgeois queer whose romanticization for dick-peddling is quite akin to absurdly phony Hollywood films and mainstream TV shows that depict negroes as noble savages and rocket scientists. A rare film where the cipher-like star's lack of acting talent is to the film's benefit as it highlights the metaphysically dead protagonist's lack of emotion and unwaveringly apathy, The Meatrack certainly packs a mean and perturbing punch of urban celluloid slime and grime that captures the essence of those spiritually excrement-ridden times before AIDS made hustling an even more deleterious profession.

THE MISLED ROMANCE OF CANNIBAL GIRL /& INCEST BOY

Richard Taylor (2007)

The Misled Romance of Cannibal Girl and Incest Boy is a gorey yet cute “girl meets boy” short film. The short was shot on Super 8 film (one of my favorite formats) and has a quite appealing aesthetic. The Misled Romance of Cannibal Girl and Incest Boy also has Troma’s tromatic “seal of approval” and features Troma founder Lloyd Kaufman having his head appropriately stomped into a bloody mess. Any film featuring the Neo-vaudevillian antics of Lloyd deserves a look. Cannibal Girl begins her short relationship with Incest Boy after eating incest boy’s sister’s gash out to a point much rawer than any other meat curtain could be. The two lovers have sexual relations in a graveyard shortly after becoming acquainted. Cannibal Girl enjoys her ride on incest boy and his disgusting inbred mutant tail. The couple also encounters a group of lame ass looking scene people that would fit in well at a local pop punk concert. A couple that kills for each other is a couple that loves one another. The Misled Romance of Cannibal Girl and Incest Boy features an atmospheric score that surprisingly works great with the erotically bloody short. Most short films (and low budget films in general) feature shitty music that was obviously put in the film as it was the only music available or as a promise to a friend. This may be the case for The Misled Romance of Cannibal Girl and Incest Boy, but it works. Whether it be Cannibal Girl biting off a perverts cock or the two lovers embracing each others bloody hearts, the psychedelic music fits the deranged image. I give The Misled Romance of Cannibal Girl and Incest Boy an elite SS stamp of approval as it is an amateur short actually worth viewing. It borders between art and gratuitous trash. If you liked fucked up gore films and the early films of Gay Baltimore Auteur John Waters, The Misled Romance of Cannibal Girl and Incest Boy is the short for you. Supporting Super 8 Sinema is a godly act.

Richard Thorpe (1955)

Forget what you heard. Bedevilled (2010) isn't the post-revival Korean horror/thriller that it has so endearingly been heralded. Thank you for allowing me to issue that statement before starting, as if you had a choice. I had long sought out Bedevilled as similar tastes beckoned me. Hell, I find it a struggle to not enjoy a Korean thriller, the likes of which have been completely Westernized and easily appease whatever hunger my tastes crave on these late, lonely nights. What is bleak about this scenario is that originally, Bedevilled held so much promise and integrity, but at the hands of a novice director, was a spoiled effort. I don't blame Chul-soo Yang personally as this is an admirable debut attempt at what could of been a South Korean masterpiece. I won't hold his name in high esteem, at least, until he redeems the talent he hinted at briefly in Bedevilled. Much fortune was squandered with this failed attempt at storytelling, so I find it hard to commit spelling out the turbulence encountered by Bedevilled and its misapplied approach to conventional misandry.

To perfectly sum up Bedevilled, allow me to quote one of the elder wenches - "A woman's most happy with a dick in her mouth". I'd be hard-pressed to dispute this given my experience with women; such a cantankerous, rivalry-obsessed sex, hardly fairer, teeming with unbridled hostility disguised as angelic ignorance. The plot is relayed like so; an upper-class woman gets forced unto a vacation period and decides to visit her childhood friend on a secluded island. What becomes of her is all-too similar to the entrapping situation she encountered on the mainland of Seoul - witnessing a crime but keeping hush. Hae-won beholds the aggravated abuse suffered at the hands of friend Bok-nam which includes, but is not limited to: rape, objectification, abuse of both physical and emotional degrees, and extreme degradation at the hands of her peers. This all changes when a life is taken and you will watch, slowly, as a feral vengeance of forms is released out of the mousy Bok-nam. Try not to take my synopsis too close to heart as I dramatized much of the alleged impact. Bedevilled toys about with its apocalyptic battle of the sexes, so much that the intended thrilling sensation is lost due to expiration. Yes, Bedevilled is one of those offenders who is so pleased with itself that, due to its own carelessness, loses much of the intended effect.

Bedevilled is an experience I wanted to turn back on and muster kind thoughts towards. I longed to think of the episode and relive the tragedy and violence that I foresaw coming, before even viewing the trailer or hearing of the finale. The simple recommendation for die hard horror fans sold me enough because their words didn't fail me with I Saw the Devil. That, however, is an entirely different beast as Kim Jee-woon is a skilled and masterful director of suspense. Odds are, Jee-woon will deliver what the picture promises and he has done so accordingly. Bedevilled also features much of that first grade symbolism of color choices, as in the virginal lead Hae-won dons a soft white dress whereas Bok-nam wears dirty flannel. This is repeated quite often in Bedevilled, peaking when Hae-won returns to finish something she should have so long ago, wearing darker colors. This can also be noted in Aronofsky's Black Swan but exempt from backlash as the film encompasses a palette of colors and moods while Bedevilled is just a lazy rape/revenge film with ample atmosphere.

Bok-nam is a strange creature. No doubt is Seo Yeong-hie an exceptional actress, as she appeared in the superior The Chaser, but the role she is given within is so lifeless without her extended torture. What Bedevilled excels at, quite fittingly, is a rampant and erotic form of disturbing (yet arousing) sexuality. Simply watching Bok-nam's brother-in-law rape her while her husband fishes is an act of which words cannot begin to describe the enticing set-up and feminine defeat. Bok-nam had quite a good time, it would appear. Color this a similar experience as to Peckinpah's Straw Dogs in which consent can be argued. As Major Charles Rane lectured in Rolling Thunder with a philosophical line "You learn to love the rope. That's how you beat them" - Bok-nam surely applied the same strategy to regulatory bouts of rape, rape, pass. Simply replace the "o" with an "a" and this can very well be a universal mantra of survival. This is where the fun ends, sadly, as Bedevilled soon builds into a once shocking, now derivative slasher film. Once the initial falling out occurs, one cannot help but to be unmoved by the second, third, fourth slaying as it is anticipated. The events prior tease and hint towards the final solution of Bedevilled but is unable to keep its promise of excellent standards. I wouldn't call Bedevilled a terrible picture, merely of plight. It is surely a contemptuous bitch of cinema but only for the first hour of screen time, then it drips into slow-stalk hack and slash territory and never looks back. Bedevilled is different tonally, though, so much can be negated as it does feature a grassland aesthetic which boasts rich cultural properties. Much to my chagrin, however, this isn't enough to save Bedevilled from an early grave. It might display a pivotal "moral of the story" cue card by the end of the film but that won't replenish the lack of nihilism to support it throughout.

Richard Wolstencroft (1999)

Pearls Before Swine is a cinematic mixed bag directed by Australian Richard Wolstencroft. I had an interest in watching the film as iconoclast Boyd Rice stars in the lead as a subversive “intellectual” hit man. Like Boyd Rice, director Richard Wolstencroft has flirted with fascism which can get a person blacklisted instantly in any field they may be interested in working in. For the controversial dialogue featured in Pearls Before Swine, I salute (or Roman salute) Richard Wolstencroft as a director that has balls in a contemporary degenerate society where the average filmmaker is truly scared to take any chances. My main problem with Pearls Before Swine, aside from the film's blatant low-budget, is how it attempts to be “cool” with its immature “life of crime” angle. I have never been too fond of how Quentin Tarantino attempts to make films that radiate “cool.” With Pearls Before Swine, director Richard Wolstencroft's form of cool involves snorting coke and silly stylized sex scenes. What do these things have to do with rants about the beauty of Nazi film director Leni Liefenstahl's films? I perfectly understand the S&M scenes as even that putrid kosher dyke Susan Sontag, who once stated so arrogantly “the white race is the cancer of human history,” admitted that sadomasochism is fascism in sex form. Sorry, but I just can't see Joseph Goebbels and Otto Skorzeny snorting lines of coke while sporting gay ass pleather pants. My favorite parts of Pearls Before Swine involve the speeches and tangents Boyd Rice goes on throughout the film. Sorry, but I really cannot imagine Mr. Rice as a badass hit man but more of an underground professor. In fact, maybe Boyd should start his own one of a kind school that studies both fascism and the occult. Anyone that has read Standing in Two Circles: The Collected Works of Boyd Rice knows that the man has done his fair share of studying and speculating. Some of the dialogues in Pearls Before Swine, however, are almost borderline self-parodies. When Boyd Rice starts talking about how Friedrich Nietzsche went insane, it kind of had me staring at the floor. I mean come on, I am sure most people that have an interest in Boyd Rice also know a little bit about ubermensch Nietzsche.

Pearls Before Swine also features an interesting soundtrack with music by Boyd Rice and the wonderful neo-folk tunes of Death in June. In fact, Death in June front man Douglas P. plays a character in the film that sells Boyd Rice some dirty vintage magazines. Pearls Before Swine also features Douglas P. (or at least one can only assume) in one of his awesome masks that he wears for Death in June. Douglas P.'s acting seems to also be a little more “professional” than Boyd Rice's. I just wish that the two collaborators will one day find a film project that better suits them. I watched Pearls Before Swine twice and must say that the film was better in the second viewing. The reason for this is probably because I was more prepared for the film's very low production values and mediocre acting.

Pearls Before Swine is a film that is more of a small treat for those individuals that already know of the lead actors in it. Otherwise, I would not recommend the film to many other people. Even for those that are fans of Boyd Rice, I am not sure that they would enjoy Mr. Rice getting paddled in the butt by an old man. Although I respect Pearls Before Swine director Richard Wolstencroft's bold, anti-politically correct filmmaking, I hope he is better prepared for future film productions.

Rick Bota (2005)

Undoubtedly, seeing Hellraiser (1987) aka Clive Barker's Hellraiser aka Sado-masochists from Beyond the Grave directed by British queer horror novelist turned auteur Clive Barker (Nightbreed, Lord of Illusions), which I first saw during elementary school, was a life changing experience as it demonstrated to me that horror films could not only be artful, spiritual, and hermetic, but also that some wanton women are willing to commit the most ungodly of evils just to get laid, including feeding male-prey to a sexually sadistic flesh-eating corpse. Shot on a budget of a mere $1,000,000 and earning $2,000,000, Hellraiser announced to the world that Barker was not a mere passive novelist who hides in his lair and masturbates to works by the Marquis de Sade, but an aesthetically aberrant auteur who was not afraid to cinematically produce his fetishism for sadomasochism, phantasmagoric surrealism, and arthouse cinema for mass consumption. Fed up with the fact that British hack George Pavolou destroyed his literary vision with goofy b-movies like Underworld (1985) aka Transmutations and Rawhead Rex (1986), Clive Barker—who previously dabbled with directing the quasi-homoerotic esoteric arthouse shorts Salome (1973) and The Forbidden Heart (1978)—decided that he would be faithful to his own novella The Hellbound Heart (1986) and cinematically adapt it himself, thus resulting in Hellraiser; the hermetic homo horror answer to the films of Derek Jarman. In fact, the British experimental industrial group Coil, which previously composed the score from Jarman's The Angelic Conversation (1985) and later the filmmaker's swansong Blue (1993), also created a soundtrack for Hellraiser, but the group had to withdraw their music (which Barker described as "bowel churning" and which was ultimately released in isolation in 1987 as the album The Unreleased Themes for Hellraiser) after some higher-ups decided it was commercially unfitting, thus a more 'traditional' horror score by hack American composer Christopher Young (A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy's Revenge, Hellbound: Hellraiser II) was added to the film. Indeed, I almost hate to admit it, but what makes Hellraiser as successful as it is, is its seemingly aesthetically unruly combination of ominously oneiric and fiercely foreboding aestheticism with cheap classic horror conventions that trick the most Hollywood lobotomized of philistine filmgoers to devour actual celluloid art. Like The Orphic Trilogy directed by Jean Cocteau (who Barker has cited as a major influence) as reinterpreted by the sodomite serial killer(s) from William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) yet set in an ostensibly heterosexual pandemonium inhabited by lethally lecherous femme fatales and debauched sexual psychopaths, Hellraiser is nothing short of one of the finest and most important celluloid nightmares ever to reach the mainstream and a work that is only all the more relevant today with BDSM and so-called 'body modification' (as Barker has noted, the appearance of the Cenobites and the sets were influenced by gay S&M magazines that members of Coil lent to him) having become all the more trendy since the film's initial release over 25 years ago.

Beginning in Morocco—a historical hotspot for depraved Europeans in exile—a degenerate white man named Frank Cotton (Sean Chapman) is asked by a junk-peddling Chinaman, “What’s your pleasure, sir?” in what is one of the mostly unintentionally humorous scenes of Hellraiser. Ultimately, fucked Frank buys the seemingly ancient ‘puzzle box’ (aka ‘Lemarchand’s box,’ with the specific box Frank buys being the ‘Lament Configuration’ box) and needless to say, he solves the puzzle, thus resulting in his entire body being ripped into shreds by chains with hooks and the room he was occupying turning into a sort of sodomite serial killer butcher shop from hell. Flash forward to an undisclosed period of time not long after, Frank’s cuckold brother Larry (Andrew Robinson) moves into the Cotton family home with his lecherous second wife Julia (Clare Higgins), who had an affair with Frank right before she got married to her more respectable yet less than sexually virile husband. Since Frank’s teenage daughter Kirsty (Ashley Laurence) thinks her stepmother Julia is a two-faced bitch, she decides to live elsewhere somewhere near by. With ancient Asian sex statues and pornography adorning the Cotton home, it is quite apparent that Frank recently squatted there, but Larry believes his brother has fled the authorities and will not be back anytime soon. Unbeknownst to the Cottons, the butchered remnants of Frank’s corpse lie under the floorboards of the attic and when Larry cuts his hand and a drip of blood seeps into the floor, the body of the dismembered pervert is partly rejuvenated. Ultimately, Julia finds zombie-like Frank crawling around in the attic like a misbegotten, aborted fetus come back to life and since she is still in lust with him and his sexual thrust, she agrees to lure men back to the Cotton abode and kill them, so he can devour their flesh and blood so as to make his corpsy body whole again and the two sociopathic killers can rekindle their unsavory sadomasochistic romance. Frank confesses that his interest in the puzzle box came after he had experienced every sick and twisted sexual experience he could think of and heard the box offered a whole new ballgame regarding the paradox that is the connection between pain and pleasure. Of course, after solving the puzzle, Frank was introduced to the ‘Cenobites,’ grotesque and ritualistically mutilated extra-dimensional beings who described themselves as, “explorers in the further regions of experience...demons to some, angels to others.” Of course, Frank was no match for the Cenobites’ otherworldly orgasmic powers and was ripped to shreds like a wet noodle.

Ultimately, Julia becomes a Lady Macbeth-like femme fatale who becomes more beautiful and beguiling the more she kills. Meanwhile, Kirsty becomes suspicious of Julia after seeing her bring home strange men to the Cotton home and eventually walks in on Frank feeding off a corpse after following her stepmother to the attic. Naturally, Frank attacks Kirsty but she escapes with the puzzle box and collapses shortly afterward. Awakening in a hospital bed, Kirsty, like her unhinged uncle, solves the puzzle box, which summons the Cenobites. Although the Cenobites intend to give her a 'good time' in hedonistic Hades, Kirsty contests their power and explains to the lead Cenobite 'Pinhead' aka 'Priest' (Doug Bradley) that one of their initiates/victims, Frank, managed to escape. In exchange for her life, Kirsty agrees to lead the Cenobites to Frank. Meanwhile, Frank has taken over his brother Larry's body and when Kirsty comes to the Cotton home, Frank-as-Larry claims to his 'daughter' that she that has nothing to worry about as he has ostensibly killed her deranged Uncle (the flayed body of her father is used as evidence of 'Frank's corpse'). Not long after, the Cenobites show up and Kirsty attempts to run out of the house but is stopped by Frank, who reveals his true identity and attempts to engage in carnal knowledge with his niece. After Kirsty rejects his sexual charm, Frank decides to use his niece's body to fully rejuvenate himself but accidentally stabs his lover Julia instead and remorselessly suckles on her vital fluids, thus bringing his health back to equilibrium. While Kirsty eventually delivers Frank to the Cenobites as she promised and his body is ripped to shreds, the demons of debauchery renege on their deal and attempt to take her to pain-and-pleasure pandemonium. Kirsty manages to reverse the position of the pieces of the puzzle box and the Cenobites begin to disappear as a result, with her cipher-like boyfriend randomly showing up to finish the job, but ultimately the Cotton house is left in flames. In the end, Kirsty throws the puzzle box in the fire, but a Jesus-like bum comes by and retrieves the object from the flames, ultimately transforming into a winged serpent and flying away. In the end, the film comes full circle and concludes just as curiously as it began with the Chinese peddler asking someone, "What's your pleasure, sir?" thus leaving Hellraiser open for countless pointless sequels.

Admittedly, while I found the sequel Hellbound: Hellraiser II (1988) somewhat marginally entertaining, I could not stomach any of the handful of other Hellraiser sequels that I attempted to view. In the end, it is quite ironic that Clive Barker—a man who once stated regarding his reason for deciding to adapt The Hellbound Heart, "12 years ago, having survived two horrendous experiences as a screenwriter, I decided to take the jump into directing something myself"—would give birth to an exceedingly bastardized cinematic franchise with which he would not have any direct involvement after the third sequel (not to mention the fact that most of the sequels are director-to-dvd swill). Indeed, it is rather unfortunate that Pinhead and the Cenobites have now become horror clichés like Jason Vorhees, Leatherface, Michael Myers, and Freddy Krueger. Luckily, Barker revealed somewhat recently that he will be involved in writing and coordinating a Hellraiser remake, stating in a October 24, 2013 facebook post: "A few weeks ago I had a very productive meeting with Bob Weinstein of Dimension Pictures, in the course of which I pitched a remake of the first HELLRAISER film... Today I have officially been invited to write the script based upon that pitch. What can I tell you about it? Well, it will not be a film awash with CGI. I remain as passionate about the power of practical make-up effects as I was when I wrote and directed the first HELLRAISER. Of course the best make-up in the world loses force if not inhabited by a first-rate actor. I told the Dimension team that in my opinion there could never be a Pinhead without Doug Bradley, and much to my delight Bob Weinstein agreed.” Of course, Mr. Weinstein is one of the last people I would want to see producing a Hellraiser remake, but such is sorry fate of such a popular franchise.

In the decades that have passed since the initial release of Hellraiser, ordinary people, especially those of the Eurypid sort, are beginning to more and more to resemble Cenobites as if they are Pinhead’s pussy little brother, which is a sign that masochism has become innate in the Occident where pleasure and pain, especially of the masochistic sort, are beginning to become one in the same. Of course, like much of Barker’s work, Hellraiser features a sodomite subtext yet nowadays the themes are totally relevant to modern debauched heterosexual America as demonstrated by the fact that so-called ‘heteronormative’ individuals nowadays suffer from sexual dysfunction, hence the rise of miscegenation, cuckoldry, cougars, and various other forms of degenerate sexuality and paraphilia. Indeed, mainstream sex-death-art that makes palatable for the mainstream what a film like Jörg Buttgerit’s Der Todesking (1989) cannot, Hellraiser is a sort of allegorical cautionary tale that warns the viewer not to give in too deeply to their perversion or face a deplorable fate like AIDS, the clap, becoming a baby-daddy, or even a slow and agonizing death. Managing to reconcile Cocteau with Burroughs and Cronenberg, and Poe with Shakespeare, Hellraiser is more artfully merited than some might assume upon a superficial glance, but that does not really matter as it is, most importantly, one of the greatest post-German expressionist horror films ever made. The fact that the iconic image of Pinhead has transcended the popularity of Hellraiser itself in mainstream pop culture only further obscures the dilettante-like genius of Barker’s ambitious first feature, but I guess that is a small price to pay for a 1980s horror film that actually matters.

HELLRAISER: HELLWORLD
HELLRAISER: HELLWORLD

Rick Bota (2005)

What Curse of the Puppet Master did for the franchise, Hellraiser: Hellworld attempts to do for its own withering fable of the Cenobites and their excessive philosophies of pleasure and pain. While I appreciate the levelheadedness of Rick Bota, director of the last three entries, Hellraiser: Hellworld plays out as more of a psychological slasher/vengeance tale and has about as much to do with Pinhead as Friday the 13th: A New Beginning had to do with Jason Voorhees. In this adaptation of Clive Barker's characters, the Cenobites go digital as a group of "hardcore Internet gamers" rendezvous at a red-lit house party hosted by Lance Henriksen and have to fight to stay alive. Or rather, try to have sex with everyone and fall into half-assed traps. Now for someone who has experimented with online games, the Hellworld title appears to have had little or no thought put into it. A shoddy first-person door layout ala early Resident Evil titles accompanies all of the gameplay and for me, a video game enthusiast, seeing something so dreadful being taken seriously is as bad as watching two kids attempt to play FFVIII in Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle. The typical attractive teenage peril is employed as is with the rest of the slasher genre. Hellraiser: Hellworld isn't anything special but unlike some of the more wretched cash-ins, this one ain't too bad. Hellworld also does an exemplary job at usurping your wanted attention and wasting it on something as banal as an eighth entry in a series that should have ceased to exist after the second.

To start on my riffing, any recent film with Lance Henriksen is bound to be your typical straight-to-video 'sploitation title chock full of terrible unknown actors in hopes to revitalize forgotten sagas. Or the track record of sub par quality, perhaps these are all just quick money-makers catering to the horror completists. Either way, both crunch out a profit at the disdain of the intellectually challenged consumer. Now don't get me wrong, Hellraiser: Hellworld is a piece of under-produced shit but it still manages the simple task of guilty entertainment. I found the first 20 minutes to drag on as my hand slid down my face while I sporadically groaned but once the virtual inconsistencies ceased to pan out, I found myself a lot more capable of handling the latest Cenobite venture. Needless to say, the usual duo appears; Pinhead and Chatterer, along with several converted characters. I have always found myself so disappointed in any incarnation of Chatterer past the first two Hellraiser films. The clicking of the ghoulish creature's bicuspid ground my nerves down to chalk in the same fashion that the White Rabbit's bite in Svankmajer's Alice did. I haven't seen most of the "unofficial" Hellraiser films but I'm making it a personal goal to wrap viewing them all up within the next month. Clive Barker emerged with a vision, as demented and hellish as it was, and it exploded with flavor. While it was a bitter and cruel experiment on film, the ideas of which he presented were entirely his own. Past the second film, plot devices and similar tortures are just retreaded. The neck wound on the Female cenobite is repeated in almost every film as I can see and the similar chain effects are thrown in for good, nostalgic measure. Only the short film No More Souls dared to provide "new flesh" to Clive Barker's masterful carving of a puzzle box and the entities that lie within. For directors to mold artistic inspiration into something as simple as psychosexual philosophical musings shouldn't be too hard but in today's day & age, this fact seems quite impossible. As I have said, Hellraiser: Hellworld is a pile of rubbish that didn't leave me with regrets, but I'm quite sure some of the other entries will. Until then, a capable time-waster.

MANUFACTURING DISSSENT: UNCOVERING MICHAEL MOORE

Rick Caine (2007)

Slob megalomaniac Michael Moore is your stereotypical American liberal. A physically and mentally weak childlike pseudo subversive bent on messianic authoritarianism. He preaches about the evils of the Republican “other” yet practices the same strategies (at a shallow, vain, and powerless level). Moore does more good for the Republican party than harm. He discredits, confuses, and manipulates American democrats to the point of helplessness. Like all uneducated and lazy propagandists, Moore utilizes comedy as a means of brainwashing control. He fears that people will see through his bloated gut and it’s lines of lies (make them laugh and they won’t think). Moore is a firm and unapologetic fact manipulator disinformation “guy” for the big guys. Michael Moore, in essence, is the embodiment of lethargic white liberal hedonism and the self-interest it fulfills. Manufacturing Dissent: Uncovering Michael Moore is a low budget documentary looking at the lies and manipulations practiced by that flaunting “lower middleclass” cosmopolitan. The documentary features interviews with former friends, associates, and other relations to Michael Moore (and his “documentaries”). You learn about a couple of the manipulations and out right lies Moore has used in some of his films. He comes out of Manufacturing Dissent looking as a hateful weasel willing to use any type “strategy” possible to get his unflattering image plastered on American billboards. Michael Moore gives the American audience entertainment as that’s what they really want (thinking is boring). I didn’t really learn anything new watching Manufacturing Dissent. I doubt the documentary has helped very much to change people’s opinion on Moore (not many jokes). You just have to look at Michael Moore to tell that he’s up to no good. He probably got beat up a good number of times growing up. He doesn’t want those evil white folks having guns!

BAD BOYS

Rick Rosenthal (1983)

It is becoming harder and harder from me to find the cinematic equivalent of junk food. Like junk food, I am very particular about the kind of trash cinema I further indulge in after my initial consumption. Last night, I had a jolly good time watching Bad Boys (1983) starring a very young and humble (despite portraying a violent criminal) Sean Penn. I originally discovered the existence of Bad Boys after seeing a tasteless trailer for it on my treasured dvd copy of Class of 1984. I figured if Bad Boys was exploitative enough to be advertised next to the cult classic dystopian high school film Class of 1984, the least I could do was give the vintage prison film a serious viewing. I can happily report that Bad Boys was an extremely enjoyable experience, certainly a film worth revisiting periodically, in a similar fashion to self-destructively clogging up my arteries after an occasional (about yearly) trip to Burger King.

I can say with pride that I have never had the misfortune of watching Bad Boys, the directorial debut of abhorrent Hollywood hack Michael Bay, starring uncle Tom duo Will Smith and Martin Lawrence. That being said, I believe that the only film with the title Bad Boys that deserves to be acknowledged by film going audiences is the film directed by Rick Rosenthal. In Bad Boys, Sean Penn plays an American mick by the name of Mick O'Brien. O'Brien surely does not hold the mythical luck of the Irish as he accidentally kills a young hispanic boy during a wild car race with a couple men in blue. Mickey the mick's luck also proves to be in the negative when he realizes that the swarthy boy he killed was the brother of rival gang leader Paco Moreno. Bad Boys is a film that does not play the misleading game of political correctness like most modern day Hollywood features as the gangs featured in the film are racially segregated. Thankfully, director Rick Rosenthal (whether consciously or subconsciously) decided not to give any type of preachy social commentary as to the racial divisions featured in the film.

Director Rick Rosenthal fittingly makes a cameo in Bad Boys as the judge that obnoxiously sentences Mick O'Brien to his stay at a juvenile detention center. Upon entering the teen penitentiary, O'Brien soon learns the dirty politics of an inmate duo-dictatorship run by a blonde beast known as Viking and an uncouth Negro nicknamed Tweety. Mick shares a prison cell with a deranged miniature Israelite appropriately named Barry Horowitz. Barry looks and acts like art house auteur Harmony Korine as he did (before heroin when appeared on Letterman in 1995) during his teenage skateboarding years. Barry earned his stay at the juvenile detention center after attempting to blow up up a building containing a couple bullies (Barry admits that he ended up killing 3 innocent people, leaving the bullies unscathed) that had beat him up earlier. I hate to say it but blowhard Barry (he admittedly loves to converse) is easily the most charismatic and interesting character in Bad Boys. Although Sean Penn does a decent job playing a juvenile jailbird in the film, it is hard to imagine after watching Bad Boys that he would later play a ridiculously retarded father in I am Sam. The quality of Penn's performance in Bad Boys fits in somewhere between his role as Spicoli (his greatest performance) in Fast Times at Ridgemont High and his role as a post-virginal retard in I am Sam (his most embarrassing performance).

Not too long ago I watched Felon (2008), another film that shows the absurdity of racial diversity when humans are forced to stay in the most savage of manmade concrete habitats. Although I enjoyed Felon to a certain notable degree, I have no interest in watching the film ever again. For me, Bad Boys was no doubt a different kind of experience as I plan on revisiting the film sometime in the foreseeable future. Like Class of 1984, Bad Boys radiates a certain kind of vintage gritty charm that cannot be duplicated in modern films. The film opens with photos of innocent looking grade school, before they were exposed to the utter depravity of urban jungles and turned into metropolitan manimals themselves. Like many Hollywood prison films, Bad Boys ends with an asinine sentimental message of hope. It has been nearly 30 years since the film was released and there is no sign of decreasing crime but that does not deduct from the (albeit redundant) message of the film. The main moral intendment of Bad Boys is that no matter how bad of an environment one grows up in, everyone makes a conscious decision regarding the actions that will play a big role in dictating their future. Admittedly, I do not support rational decisions for every set of circumstances. I was certainly glad when Barry attacked the prison official with a golf club (easily the funniest scene in the movie) in Bad Boys after he was condemned to solitary confinement (a one man ghetto for a Judaic certainly cannot be a pleasurable experience) for the remainder of his penitentiary sentence. As the film Bad Boys testifies to, most individuals receive jail time by making deficient decisions usually in a pathetic attempt to prove their uncivilized pseudo-masculinity. I have seen some of my childhood friends go down this downward spiraling road and there was certainly no absurd 'rehabilitation' during their caged prison stay. Bad Boys may not scare aspiring criminals straight but it is without fail when it comes to engrossing cinematic recreation.

BLADE RUNNER

Ridley Scott (1982) Ridley Scott's Blade Runner may be the most overanalyzed film on college campuses. No surprise here considering modern academia's obsession with postmodernism. These theories reflect a soulless society that is only able to reflect and unable to innovate. These postmodernists are content with the end of culture and essentially civilization. They are also the same scholars that have a fetish for Marxism and Globalization. But when you mix men in a blender you get quite a mess.

Blade Runner does successfully attempt to reflect the future of the world. The environment is shit, the majority of people look like they sleep in a dumpster, third world immigrants flood the streets, and people like Harrison Ford are cops. This is a much scarier world than any apocalyptic film George A. Romero would make. The future looks bleak for man.

Harrison Ford is in his most suited role as a unemotional asshole cop. Aside from Vince Vaughn, Ford is my most hated actor. The fact that he mainly plays the "good guy" in films reflects the true evils of Hollywood. The manmade "Aryan" replicant (played by Dutchman Rutger Hauer) has much more human in him than Ford probably does in real life. Of course, "more human than human" is one of the main themes of Blade Runner. It makes you wonder if ideologist protesters are already planning ahead for replicant rights.

Blade Runner is another one of the great Neo-Noirs (Polanski's Chinatown being my personal favorite). But how good do Neo-Noirs get? Probably not as good as the German expressionist films that inspired the original Film Noir's before it. Could Blade Runner ever compare to Fritz Lang's M? It probably doesn't matter seeing as most of the old masterpieces are getting buried under horrible hacks like Richard Linklater and his existentialist garbage.

A couple things were changed when Blade Runner was adapted for the screen (from Philip K. Dick's Do Androids Dream Of Electric Sheep?). The original name of the Tyrell corporation was the Semitic Rosen. I have read various articles on Blade Runner trying to parallel the film to American slavery, Nazis, and other mean stuff. I even read one essay on the film that compared the scientist who invented replicants to SS scientist Josef Mengele. Well lets take a look at Blade Runner from a more simple and realistic perspective. The world is shit in Blade Runner because of internationalism (Bolshevism or Globalization, same shit different piles) and the evil corporation is called "Rosen." I don't think Philip K. Dick was a fan of Marxist schools of thought. The Rosen corporation name change happened for obvious reasons. The film that postmodernists hold so dear to their hearts was most likely written by Philip K. Dick in complete contempt. Most of these "scholars" can't get passed fundamentally flawed contemporary schools of thought. They claim to be thinking "outside" the box when they aren't even aware it exists.

BLADE RUNNER

Blade Runner's best asset is its costume and set design. The film is a fairly aesthetically pleasing experience. Dwarf robots with Kaiser helmets can also be quite interesting. Like most of Ridley's Scott's films, visuals seem to be his main focus. Of course this is his insurance that people will see his films. People need to be impressed by cool looking stuff. I was. I just wish I could steal some of inventor J.F. Sebastian's toys.

The femme fatales of Neo-Noir Blade Runner aren't typical of past she-devils. The most vicious of the femme bots is killed within minutes of being on screen. She was also the only one to bare her body (and not at all worth seeing). I guess Ridley Scott would have been considered misogynistic if he had created the standard femme fatale. The femme fatales in Blade Runner are more cutesy than dangerous. Ridley Scott is one dangerous cinema convention breaker! Over the years Blade Runner has become more and more recognized as a masterpiece. I would agree with this to some extent. I find myself going back to it at least once a year. Its beautiful film to watch. I just wouldn't get too wrapped up in trying to analyze it for a deeper meaning. Hollywood isn't interested.

THE COUNSELOR

Ridley Scott (2013)

In my opinion Sir Ridley Scott (and to a greater extent, his belated little brother Tony) epitomizes what one might describe as an 'artisan filmmaker,' as a director who is clearly a master of technique and calculatingly constructing films as if he were a carpenter of celluloid, yet lacks a true personal vision (after all, the only film he ever wrote a screenplay for was for his early short Boy and Bicycle (1956), which was made when he was a photography student) and thus cannot be described as a real auteur (after all, how could one ever compare someone like Ridley to real cinematic artists like Pasolini, Fassbinder, Herzog, Syberberg, etc.?!). That being said, it seems that the quality of Scott's films relies heavily on the script that he decides to use for a film and there is probably no better example of this than his most recent celluloid effort The Counselor (2013), which was penned by contemporary Southern Gothic novelist Cormac McCarthy (Blood Meridian, No Country for Old Men) in what was ultimately the writer's first attempt at writing a film screenplay. Until recently, as far as I was concerned, the last great film Scott made was Blade Runner (1982) as he seems to have been constructing absurdly asinine and insipid eye-candy ever since, with his pseudo-pre-sequel to Alien (1979), Prometheus (2012), being the height of the famed filmmaker's action-packed and slickly stylized soulless celluloid products, yet The Counselor proved to a welcomed shock for me, if not a visually irrelevant one. As with any highly literary and philosophically inclined work with an unhappy ending and a tasty tinge of political incorrectness underscored by decidedly depressing unpopular human truths, The Counselor has been largely panned by both mainstream film critics and filmgoers alike as a work that was clearly made for an undeserving and proudly uncultivated audience that also creamed their panties for Martin Scorsese's 3+ hour music video tribute to American Hebraic psychopathy, The Wolf of Wall Street (2013). A sort of pre-North American Civil War Breaking Bad (in fact, Dean 'Hank Schrader' Norris has a small role in the film as a rich coke buyer) with the tragic poetic eloquence of Shakespeare, the penetrating pessimism and scathing cynicism of Schopenhauer, and the tastelessly charming cracker sociology of Jim Goad, The Counselor is a somewhat delightful downer of a mainstream movie that unequivocally proves that pretty plastic Hollywood people can appear quasi-sophisticated if given the right lines to read. A nasty and even nihilistic Southwestern Gothic where wimpy white collar lawyers, ruthlessly murderous Mestizo drug cartels, naïve Catholic girls, ferocious car-fucking femme fatales, head-decapitating-wires, and snuff films collide in a celluloid cultural clash made in the Armageddon-stirring age of globalization and 'Reconquista' of the Aztlán by brown hordes with nothing to lose, The Counselor is the sort of film that slaps the viewer in the face and then proceeds to bugger their body, hence the work's lack of acceptance among the escapism-humping American public. A film that essentially depicts a white collar criminal's worst night, The Counselor tells the aesthetically and thematically torrid tale of a relatively young and handsome hotshot lawyer enslaved to love who becomes immersed in an intricate one-off drug deal with a Mexican drug cartel that goes terribly wrong as a result of bad luck and a lethally lecherous female fatale whose 'naughty bits' are described by her Brian Grazer-look-alike boyfriend (Javier Bardem) as having suction properties equivalent to that of a bottom-feeder fish.

A charming statuesque lawyer simply known as 'The Counselor' (played by rather talented Irish-German actor Michael Fassbender) wants to pop the question to his nice and loving yet terribly naïve long-distance girlfriend Laura (Penélope Cruz), so he decides to woo her by flying all the way to Amsterdam (the Dutch capital city is home to Coester Diamonds, one of the oldest diamond polishing factories in the world, thus demonstrating the Counselor's desire to buy only the best for his girlfriend) to buy a nice sized rock from a Sephardic Jewish Diamond Dealer (ironically played by Bruno Ganz, who is best known around the world for portraying Hitler in Downfall (2004) aka Der Untergang). On top of buying a nice and expensive engagement ring for his beloved Latina, the Counselor is given a nice and long free-of-charge rant from the Diamond Dealer about the superiority and corrosive power that is the international Hebrew nation and how, "Every country that has driven out the Jews has suffered the same fate." Naturally, Laura accepts the Counselor's rather awkward wedding proposal, but the lawyer is also strapped for cash as a result of buying the wedding ring so he rather reluctantly decides to get involved in a major one-time coke deal with his party boy MeStizo friend Reiner (Javier Bardem)—a legit entrepreneur and club owner who moonlights as an underworld drug kingpin and who lives a lavishly lecherous lifestyle, hence his need for greed—but little does he realize that his friend's psychopathic girlfriend Malkina (Cameron Diaz) has plans of her own. A wickedly wanton woman whose 'pussy power' literally scares her boyfriend Reiner (who tells the Counselor a story about how she freaked him out after she fucked his car and drenched his windshield with her girl juices), Malkina (a name derived from 'Grimalkin' which means an evil looking female cat) is a fierce femme fatale of the sociopath-chic variety who has cheetah print tattoos and literally gets sexually aroused by the sight of her two pet cheetahs (Raoul and Silvia) "bringing down jackrabbits at 70 miles an hour" and uses all people, including her friends and boyfriend, for her own personal gain. Left an emotionally brutalized bastard at the age of 3 after her parents were apparently thrown out of a helicopter into the Atlantic Ocean and eventually working her way up in the world as a seductive stripper, Malkina disguises her internal pain with her stunning beauty and by flashing around her dubiously obtained wealth. When the Counselor makes the unwitting mistake of helping a client, a Mexican murderess named Ruth (Rosie Perez), by bailing out her crotch-rocket-riding son—a high level member of a drug cartel known simply as ‘The Green Hornet’ (Richard Cabral) who likes freaking out white girls by telling them he is on a steady diet of dog food—he basically marks himself, his girlfriend, and all his business partners as dead men.

If the Counselor had taken the advice of wise-ass middleman dealer named Weſtray (Brad Pitt)—a cynical fellow who might have been a philosopher and/or a monk had he lived in a less decadent age—regarding not getting involved with the drug cartel, which is responsible for sex slavery and snuff films, the meta-tragic route his life inevitably takes could have been easily avoided. Seemingly more knowledgeable about her boyfriend’s drug business (and, in turn, the Counselor’s) than he is, Malkina hires a sinisterly stoic dude known as “The Wireman” (Sam Spruell) to kill drug runner Green Hornet (who is carrying a key to a sewage truck containing barrels with $20 million dollars worth of cocaine) to steal the very same drug supply that the Counselor and his friends are tied to. Naturally, after the drug cartel realizes that the Counselor bailed out the Green Hornet from jail, they doubt the timing was a coincidence and assume the lawyer was the one responsible for killing their comrade and attempting to steal their cocaine. Eventually, two drug cartel members dressed as cops kill the Wireman and take back the drugs, thus Malkina’s scheme falls through. In no time, Reiner is accidentally killed while attempting to flee from members of the drug cartel and the Counselor’s fiancée is beaten and kidnapped. Meanwhile, Weſtray takes a plane to London in an attempt to evade the wrath of the drug lords. When the Counselor attempts to reach out to a high-ranking member of the cartel named Jefe (Rubén Blades) in a desperate attempt to save Laura, he is told there is nothing he can do and that he must be a man and accept his unfortunate fate as a marked man who made an unwise decision long ago that cannot be changed. In an act of complete impotence, the Counselor goes to Mexico to find Laura, but ends up doing a lot of drinking and crying instead due to his undying guilt. Meanwhile, Malkina, who is determined to get rich quick since her prior scheme fell through and her sugar daddy Reiner is dead, decides to track down Weſtray (who she apparently previously had an affair with and knows how to manipulate) in London and uses a stunning hired slut (Weſtray’s admitted sole weakness is women) played by Natalie Dormer to steal his bank codes and social security number. Weſtray is ultimately killed when Malkina pays a hired goon to throw a so-called ‘bolito’ (a mechanical device with a battery-operated motor that wraps a wire around the victim’s neck until their carotid arteries are severed and, in some cases, their head pops off) around his neck. Meanwhile, the Counselor receives a mysterious DVD-R with “Hola!” written on it, which assumedly features a snuff video of Laura being executed (the next scene features Laura’s decapitated body being dumped in a landfill). In the end, queen bitch Malkina is victorious and tells her banker (Goran Višnjic) about her plans to head to China and convert all of her money into diamonds. After all, diamonds are a girl’s best friend, especially when you're a cross between Ted Bundy and Marilyn Monroe.

In one of the more philosophical scenes early on in The Counselor, the old Jewish diamond dealer delivers the following spiel to the eponymous protagonist of the film in regard to the cultural wasteland that is modern Spain and the historical legacy of world Jewry: "There's no culture save for the Semitic culture there. The last known culture before that was the Greek, and there will be no culture after. Nothing. The heart of any culture is to be found in the nature of the hero... In the classical world, it is the warrior, but in the Western world it is the man of God. From Moses to Christ. The prophet, the penitent. Such a figure is unknown to the Greeks. Unheard of, unimaginable...because there is only a man of God, not a man of gods, and this god is the god of the Jewish people. There is no other god. We see him—what is the word? Uh...purloined. Purloined in the West. How do you steal a God? The Jew beholds his tormentor dressed in the vestments of his own ancient culture. Everything bears a strange familiarity. But the fit is always poor and the hands are always dripping blood." Indeed, one would assume from the old Heeb's rant that the sorry state of the miserable and cultureless Mexico depicted in The Counselor was Sephardic revenge for the ancient execution of Marrana Jew Francisca Nuñez de Carabajal in 'New Spain' (aka Spanish colonial Mexico) in 1596 during the Inquisition. Indeed, with his previous effort American Gangster (2007) where Australian goy Russell Crowe plays a Hebrew hammer of a detective who proudly sports a Star of David gold chain, as well as his upcoming Biblical epic Exodus (2014), flagrant philo-Semite Ridley Scott has never shied away from expressing his career-securing solidarity with the self-described chosen amongst God's chosen and The Counselor is no different, but luckily the film is as culturally pessimistic as Hollywood films come as a work that depicts Mexico as a rabid mongrel beast with the brain of a demented demon that would love nothing more than to slowly torture and dismember pussy America to its bloated jelly-filled Judaic core. After telling the rather humorous joke, "you want to know why Jesus wasn't born in Mexico? He couldn't find three wise men or a virgin," criminal sage WeStray warns the Counselor with the following words regarding the true motivation of the Mexican drug cartels: "Hey Counselor, here's something else to consider: The beheadings and the mutilations—that's just business. Gotta keep up appearances. It's not like there's some smoldering rage at the bottom of it. Let's see if we can guess who it is they really want to kill. You, Counselor. You." Indeed, savagely snuffing out white collar, white lawyers must be a rather refined delicacy when you live in a country where running water is a luxury and you can purchase dismembered teenage girls for less than a pretty penny.

On top of frying criminally organized beaners to the point of seeming like the most uniquely ugly and unhinged, radically repellent, and decidedly perverted people in the world, The Counselor features a number of 'misogynistic' aphorisms in the spirit of Weininger (albeit, of the dime store sort) like, "Women have funny ideas about sex. They're supposed to be so modest. Yeah (chuckles). Let me tell you, when they get it in their heads how they want to fuck, they're like a freight train." And, indeed, the sexually sadistic she-bitch played by Cameron Diaz quite openly admits that she believes that sexuality and sadism are not mutually exclusive but inherently connected, as she sternly professes that the weakness of humans when compared to that of natural predators (aka her pet cheetahs) of the wild is as follows: "It is our faintness of heart that has driven us to the edge of ruin. Perhaps you won't agree, but nothing is crueler than a coward. And the slaughter to come...is probably beyond our imagining." Needless to say, the mayhem-splattered Mexico of The Counselor has a big black heart flowing with cheap tequila, cocaine and, most importantly, pure and unadulterated hate and bloodlust. Indeed, as a country that has been left relatively unscathed by virtually all of the major wars of the last century and is populated by a nation of superlatively spoiled people (even the poor live like kings in the good old USA!) who absurdly believe their nation is invincible and is exempt from the sort of poverty and chaos that plagues the majority of the world, America certainly has no idea what is in store for it is if the Mexican drug cartels take control and/or the North American continent enters a racial civil war. Of course, the coward of The Counselor, aside from America in general (indeed, it is no coincidence that Diaz's character snidely states to a semi-morally-minded young lady, "You know what I like about Americans? You can depend on them."), is the Counselor as demonstrated by his dubious actions in the face of fear and a telling remark made by a bitter ex-client: "the Counselor here has a way of sullin' up like a possum when he don't get his own way. I'm gonna say you probably noticed it. And that ain't really the problem. The real problem is, is his thin skin makes it okay in his eyes for you to wind up under the bus." Indeed, aside from the scheming femme fatale played by Diaz, it is ultimately the Counselor's shifty behavior and cowardice that lead his fiancée and friends to the slaughter. While featuring the aesthetic prowess of the latest sportscar commercial, The Counselor at least has enough patently pessimistic food-for-thought to keep the most culturally pessimistic of Blade Runner fans reasonably happy. That being said, one can only assume that The Counselor receives the prestige that Blade Runner would eventually achieve after a decade or so, but somehow I doubt it as Americans are only getting stupider and stupider as their country goes to the untermensch dogs and international moneychangers.

FRITT VILT
FRITT VILT

Roar Uthaug (2006)
aka Cold Prey

Heard some rumors breezing through the grapevine about the so-called savior of slashers. Upon watching, I now feel that prominent horror writers are brainless apes as this isn't a rebirth at all, more of a proper horror film of a vengeful figure with the similar "strangers in an unfamiliar area getting killed with ridiculous weaponry" story arch. Ever seen Extreme Ops? Neither have I but judging from a synopsis comparison, these two films are one and the same but with a tad bit more snowboarding involved on the opposite end. Despite what people seem to narrate this towards, Cold Prey is a lot like The Descent in a snowy wasteland. The sequel to Cold Prey even goes in similar fashion with the upcoming Descent sequel though I'm sure Fritt Vilt II will be superior in every aspect. A group of entirely likable characters go to an uncharted rolling mountain area paved with snow for extreme fun. Upon acquainting with the Ron Weasley-lookalike and the fashionable males and females with their perfectly feathered hair, the extreme(!) sports play soon takes off winding down with the compound fracture suffered by the ginger known only as Morten Tobias. Leaving his wand at home in his well-kept dorm room, they have no choice but to take refuge in an abandoned hotel that unknowingly has earned the title of "Hotel of Evil" some many odd years ago. After a while the predominant tension finally gives way and explodes and sputters until most everyone dies by way of the "snowman." Cold Prey surprised me on many levels that I will begin to explain switching from sardonic interfaces which can be interchanged with a more serious tone. That's the best way to approach over hyped horror films; it keeps a fresh grab bag of thoughts and quibbles safe from the wary eyes of cynicism and unappreciative ideas. For what Cold Prey succeeds in deserves a keen eye for imagery, settings, and character development; Cold Prey has all these plus more but never fully takes off towards greatness due to a forgettable plot shift and expendable characters that should have stood a chance but were killed off in unimpressive ways to trim fat from the real prize - survival. The pickax mayhem was glamorized with real terror in My Bloody Valentine and later emblazoned with more of the "red stuff" in the 3D remake of My Bloody Valentine. The usage in Cold Prey doesn't really differ or stand out with any inventive murders but the hulking figure of the Snowman sets the playground for some surprising scares and jump out moments. Cold Prey might not be revolutionary but it is damn good fun and nonchalantly stylish to boot. For the annual role of spirited feminist survivor, Ingrid Bolsø Berdal performs flawlessly as Jannicke. She's boyish, peppy, and desirable. Plus she looks grand covered in snow and blood. Two color extremes and opposite elements fit the role of a horror movie with a flare of passion. Switching from camera-friendly aspects, I turn my attention to love depicted in film. I have an ideal mindset for youthful love and sacrifice. That one key scene in the Stan Winston funded remake of How to Make a Monster struck a right chord with the daring portrayal of a doomed male emasculating his ego to tell a woman that he never had a chance, only to be slain several scenes later. A similar tale of "love" is woven in Cold Prey, breaking down barriers of standards and stifling the blood flow to create "user-generated" emotions using this defined contemporary version of "cold horror" as a vessel. Who cares if the starlets brains are butterscotch? In the long run, Cold Prey tramples much of what I've seen from the horror community over the years. It's no messiah but a disciple of taking old-school terror and mixing it with the new school expertise of cinematography. Unlike most "trapped" films, the environment really allows for a fit of helplessness with no aid of magically locked doors. For a solid villain plagued with writers block and a precise unraveling of events, Cold Prey will do you no shame in its irregular piecing together of a surefire hit. It might not live up to your morbidly high expectations but I dare you to hate this film. Double dog dare you. And what's more strange to come is a sequel that if looked at in the proper light, succeeds over the predecessor.

Rob Cohen (1996)

A disaster film installed within the boundaries of reality, Daylight isn't your exaggerated planet-in-peril film that we're by now accustomed to. No earth shattering nuclear warhead or enormous asteroid hurtling towards our blue planet, just a simple and avoidable disaster that jeopardizes and kills but a large handful. I repeat, not a world-killing event. Starring in this chancre-sore of claustrophobia is Sylvester Stallone who continues his embarrassing trend of adopting wildly perverse names such as Marion Cobretti, Lincoln Hawk, and in this case, Kit Latura. Daylight couldn't normally be considered a "special" film in any universe but ours. But since we're the special case, the denizens of a wholly hostile race, these scenes of hopelessness, persecution, and intense disaster terror in what might be the greatest explosion scene recorded on video, Daylight manages to progress into a stellar action/suspense film with a quick-to-twitch narrative.

Daylight sure had the innards of a summer blockbuster and a fine one at that. Electing the maiden of this voyage underground is a chance encounter of a bunch of two-bit punks and a convoy of trucks containing barrels of explosive, toxic materials. As fate would have it, the punks in the stolen car swerve and crash right into one of the payloads resulting in an extravagant explosion. This explosion scene is not only ambivalent in its miniature comic genocide but appalling in its graphic depiction of irreversible structure damage. To take this film as humor is a cinema sin though and should not be disregarded as a tablet of disposable meat. Each of the "survivors" highlighting this film is a real person, over the top or not. The narcissistic young delinquent is Sage Stallone, co-founder of exploitation DVD company Grindhouse Releasing and son of Sylvester Stallone, in one of his very few acting roles. Only in Chaos was he allowed to vent and portray the attitude of these venomous films he so lovingly wishes to restore and distribute. After this initial explosion, ex-EMS chief Latura, now cab driver, is mere feet from the tunnel as it explodes. He watches the structure outside of the Holland tunnel crumble violently, showering debris on top of its fleeing commuters.

Deciding to aim for redemption of a failed previous job that left him with a suicidal conscience and a bizarre fetish for martyrdom, Kit aims to find a way within the smoldering ruins to assist the survivors in escaping before the toxic fumes cause the humans to succumb to infinite silence. To reach the inner tunnel walls, Kit must descend through a series of oxygenating fans that are on a time delay. This introductory scene between Stallone and tunnel reinstates that hypnotic paranoia of fans that has been leeching on me since viewing *Alien*³ as a child. After near-escaping, our lone hero is vaulted into a vacuum tunnel and blasts a seal into the tunnel. This alone is the precursor to Kit Latura's odyssey that proves Daylight to be pretty rogue when it comes to characters fate selection. The inescapable nihilism of a catastrophe weighs solid with exploding racial tension. After Madelyne follows screams for help and traces the callback to a prison transport with a giant Negro gripping the bars screaming, she regresses the idea of helping them. After some lurid discouragement by way of "rape eye," Madelyne decides to release them from their cage. Some support that unleashed, the bullish black man does nothing but to impede upon escape attempts in his chronic hyperventilation.

Despite the unusual assortment of characters trapped between the rubble and the Hudson river, they never stay too muddled in the confines of cliché. To prove this, might I bring up the whiny and selfish love interest in Madelyne. This woman is established in the beginning of the film as a worthless being with gypsy dreams. After being dumped or cheated on, she packs her bags and leaves her low rent apartment with dreams of grandeur in New Jersey. Being caught in this mess taught her nothing about selflessness and when a wooden plank collapses, dropping her into a rapidly flooding room, she begs and screams for them not to leave her. She wishes for the world and she will never have it. This right here is true-to-life character sketching, as slimy and obtrusive as can be. One of the greatest feats of Daylight is presenting a disaster epic in which plausibility is a heavy factor. Laden with incredible special effects and seat-squirring tension, Daylight is a film that was a warm and enthralling experience in retro 90s adventure cheese. Definitely the high point in Rob Cohen's filmography.

HOWL

Rob Epstein* (2010)

It has been a while since I saw a film that left me in a state of revulsion-based inebriation. The 2010 film Howl, based on the 1957 obscenity trial regarding Allen Ginsberg and his putrid poem Howl, indubitably induced an acute case of cinematic nauseousness in my otherwise healthy body. It has been a couple days since I had the displeasure of watching this piece of excrement entertainment; which gave me enough time for my health to once again reach equilibrium. To get over the cinematic sickness created by Howl, I consumed the 2010 documentary William S. Burroughs: A Man Within, a wonderful tribute to the greatest mind of the Beat Generation. In the documentary, Allen Ginsberg narcissistically (in a completely pointless and petty manner) questions W.S. Burroughs about the former love he had for the obnoxious poet. In Howl, James Franco (who plays the young Allen Ginsberg) somehow manages to capture a very similar type of repellent narcissism that the real Ginsberg so shamelessly flaunted. Despite watching uncountable horror films last week; Howl was the only movie that left me in shock, conjuring up what I can best describe as the cinematic equivalent to AIDS.

In 2001, James Franco somehow was able to capture the troubled spirit of Jimmy Dean in the biographical TV movie James Dean. Mr. Franco must be a meticulous method actor, as he was also able to capture the all-encompassing ugliness of Allen Ginsberg in Howl. Throughout the film, Franco recites the perverted poetry of Hebrew Marxist Allen Ginsberg. Despite the fact that it is taboo nowadays to associate Jews and Marxism as two heads of the same unholy kosher beast; Ginsberg synchronized these two seemingly different identities within his poetry. Howl reaches a peak in putridity when James Franco recites the following line from the poem: "Where you accuse your doctors of insanity and plot the Hebrew socialist revolution against the fascist national Golgotha." Of course, Howl is more like a conglomerate of perverted Judeo-Marxist psychobabbling, and far from a howl of hallucinating poetry. James Franco must have put in his complete vigor as an actor whilst attempting to duplicate the distinct accent, sporadic speech patterns, and peculiar pantomimes of Kaddish-obsessed Allen Ginsberg.

Like most good Jewish boys, Allen Ginsberg took after his mental Marxist mother. In Howl, it is revealed that Ginsberg's Mommy exposed him to Communism and unhappy stays at mental institutions. To Ginsberg's credit (as well as the directors of Howl), his poetry makes more sense when you put it in context with his upbringing. I certainly have no doubt that Ginsberg was truly expressing the psychosis-ridden spirit of his subconscious/conscious mind, thus resulting in authentic personal art. After all, art is subjective and relative to the eye of the beholder. Of course, I found it hilarious when various literary experts in Howl de-construct Ginsberg's poem as being without artistic merit. The Beat generation writers (especially William S. Burroughs, Jack Kerouac, and Allen Ginsberg) successfully popularized literary libertinism in America. William S. Burroughs was surely a sagely teacher of Occult studies whose influence seems infinite. I cannot say the same about Ginsberg. As expressed (whether the filmmakers were conscious of this or not) in the film Howl, it seems that Ginsberg was only talented in regards to offending decent folk. Although Howl portrays the 1957 obscenity trial as a triumph over American Puritanism; the event really just signified an all-time low for American art. Howl portrays Allen Ginsberg as heroic rebel, yet the 1957 obscenity trial was probably the best publicity outlet that the word-shitting poet ever had. In style and form, Howl certainly compliments the anti-linear lunatic lyricism of Allen Ginsberg. It is without question that James Franco deserves an Oscar for the relentless struggle he took up in portraying Allen Ginsberg; the retarded Rebbe of nonsensical poetry.

STAND BY ME

Rob Reiner (1986)

Most coming of age films are pretty lame, especially when you “come of age.” One coming of age film that I can say that I still have an appreciation for is Rob Reiner’s Stand By Me. As a child, I thought the film was the “deepest” and “coolest” of films about kids. I also felt as a 12 year old, searching for the dead body of a fellow kid would be quite the adventure. Whether people want to believe it or not, looking for a dead body is something that every adolescent male would participate in with his friends if he got the opportunity.

Most of my friends from when I was 12 years old are now criminals and aimless high school dropouts. Unfortunately, I have even heard some of them have had kids. The narrator of Stand By Me mentions that you have your best friends at age 12 and believe that to be true. It’s the time in your life when things start to get exciting and very few friends have pretensions. It is also a time when you still don’t have to take life too seriously and you feel as if you’re invincible. The young men featured in Stand By Me get involved in more than a few dangerous things. The boys in Stand By Me also encounter a group of high school criminals that have a greaser style. Kiefer Sutherland leads this gang of petty hoodlums with a soft spoken voice of sadism. The difference between the young boys and older boys is obvious. When you get to the age of the high school boys, the subversive games become serious. The older boys never really grow up and just end up degenerate criminals.

River Phoenix stars in the film as the tough 12 year old Chris. A campfire confessional between Chris and Gordie foreshadows a gay campfire confessional with River Phoenix and Keanu Reeves in My Own Private Idaho some years later. Stand By Me is one of few coming of age films that brings up somewhat serious issues between 12 year old boys. Corey Feldman also appears in the film as an eccentric kid named Teddy whose father tried to burn his ear off. I am sure everyone has known a kid in their life with similarly odd behavior.

One of the most stand out scenes in Stand By Me involves a leech in a place it shouldn’t be. When I first saw this scene as a child, I was almost traumatized. Another great scene is when Gordie tells his story about a kid named Lardass who pays his whole town back via projectile vomit. Stand By Me is full of many memorable scenes with equally memorable characters. Sadly, today’s youth are probably only exposed to politically correct feel good garbage.

THE AFTERMAN

Rob Van Eyck (1985)

From the depths of Belgian cinema comes a strange post-nuke cult sexcapade, The Afterman. Directed by Rob Van Eyck, The Afterman is what I'd imagine Carlton Mellick's novella, Razor Wire Pubic Hair, to be stripped of its futuristic and blasphemous overtones. Inside my own circuit of friends is a long-lasting joke that anything with rape, I'll condone. As true as this has turned out to be, I wasn't prepared for the molestation within this near-silent classic. The Afterman is no exception of rape as it features sexual assault that titillates, not in erotic conventions such as nudity. No, nudity has nothing to do with the arousing spectrum The Afterman embraces. Opening to a bearded man, mute and feral, having just had sex with a frozen corpse, whom I believe to be a lover in past, The Afterman quickly thrusts our "hero" into a situation of forced physicality. In fact, everything about The Afterman is forced. When a computer timer slowly ticks down, the man, who can no longer read or write, begins to panic. After this, we assume that this bunker he's been holed up in evacuated him to survey the condition of the earth he once grazed.

Misleading theatrical poster.

After several minutes, the man notices a small group of men at the top of a nearby hill. Excited to see other lifeforms, with animation even, the man greets them with intentions of communion. Thrown to the ground and pinned, the man, our lead character, is raped by a group of men. Already The Afterman establishes itself as a film that doesn't concern nor care for any of the characters within. A brash and unspeakable odyssey of sex with-lasting, The Afterman is one of the few films I can say takes no prisoners. After this event, which would scar any self-respecting male, the man continues his journey. It seems without any social construct, the idea of rape has vaporized completely and what's left is nothing more than that of a canine searching and subduing a bitch in heat. This over-sexed Dystopian film is bold with crisp sound effects, almost deafening against the silent backdrop of a mysteriously plagued Earth. As with most conventional post-apocalyptic films, the condition is never described or prescribed.

Stumbling upon a patch of farmland, our lead witnesses a sullen, bruised woman bending over and tilling the soil for what crops the climate could possibly let thrive. As she is bent over, a husky bald man glances for his wife. Noticing he is alone, he approaches the beauty and lowers his pants, forcing himself upon her in a scene that rivals most pornography. With the same flair as Women In Prison films but hardcore compared to the rather tame lesbian antics, The Afterman provides exciting smut, degradation and experimentalism in the same package. It's a film you can endorse because of its maverick roots and a film you'll find yourself hiding in your closet for the contents are a divine mélange of hyper-sexuality that hits home, well, for me it is. The minimalism of The Afterman is also intoxicating. Van Eyck proves that digitally destroyed settings are not necessary for a tale of absence. But in this simplicity is a tale of bizarrokink, proven by applying its deviant standards to all forms of fetishism, whether religion takes hold of ones head to force fellatio or man/women - man/man rape grips your fancy.

Soon the woman demonstrates Stockholm Syndrome, or the breakdown of key psychological components of the same, and accompanies the overweight man as he journeys towards oblivion. After housing in a shack, a cult of sex-crazed maniacs bludgeon the man, who has proven himself a pussy, and the woman abducted to their lair of sexual humiliation. While spying, the man notices the bizarre actions of these degenerates which includes and is not limited to, throwing a woman bareback onto a dining table and slathering her body in gravy and stringy meat. Surely The Afterman is before its time and would more likely be appreciated in any civilization other than ours. After escaping into a religious sect of occultism(?), forced sodomy is had, much to my shock, and the couple is on their way again. This key scene of Monk cock sucking brings Bataille to mind while I mentally revisit the Story of the Eye. In a world gone mad, this couple demonstrates the necessity for some sort of foundation. A world without morals, without laws, is a scary world indeed. This unlikely coupling of beauty and beast softens the blow of what is left up to the imagination. The only negative aspect I can slander The Afterman with is its jumping significant periods of time with no indication whatsoever. Surely this is a world my cock would benefit in, but would my mind reside comfortably? The Afterman provides these questions and leaves the answers up to you - society or sex?

AFTERMAN 2: A KISS TO THE DEVIL

Rob Van Eyck (2005)

Call me crazy, but I highly doubt that neo-nazis and towelhead Islamic terrorists would unite as one to control Europa as some degenerate Islamic National Socialist Fourth Reich, nor do I think a bunch of lipstick lesbos with bad bleach and boob jobs would make for fervent 'freedom fighters' of the sexually and spiritually ennobled sort, but such is the ludicrous scenario presented in the sardonic dystopian cult flick Afterman 2 (2005) aka Afterman 2: A Kiss to the Devil directed by iconoclastic Flemish auteur Rob Van Eyck (De aardwolf, Blue Belgium). A worthy and all the more wanton and just plain wacky, if not innately inferior, sequel to distinguishably debauched director Van Eyck's most internationally renowned celluloid work The Afterman (1985), Afterman 2 follows the 'Afterman' (once again played by Flemish Expressionist painter Jacques Verbiest, who has gotten all the more chubby and cherub-like after some two decades) as he leaves exile in Mother Russia after his beauteous beloved drops dead and heads back to Belgium, only to learn that his homeland, as well as the rest of Europe, has turned into a demented Islamofascist-National Socialist dystopian dictatorship run by Osama Bin Laden that has enslaved most people in poorly constructed, easily escapable concentration camps that would send the average so-called 'asylum seeker' (aka illegal alien from the third world) scoffing in fits of laughter. Following a curious cuckold of an anti-hero who was anally raped, fed on muskrats, and was forced to give mad sodomite monks head in the original film The Afterman, many excerpts of which are revisited via a number of flashback scenes, Afterman 2 is about a man who has already dealt with love, loss, and bisexual sodomy yet who consciously decides to reenter a wild world of the anarchically neo-barbaric libertinage, lethality, and lunacy for the viewer's sick pleasure. A sadomasochistically moral-free 'black comedy' of the no-budget Euro-cult variety (as opposed to the totally worthless and disposable 'Euro-sleaze' variety) with nods to old school 'women in prison' (WiP) flicks, Afterman 2 is director Rob Van Eyck's exceedingly eccentric and all the more pessimistic and misanthropic update on the decidedly degenerating state of Europa since The Afterman, where the continent has become entirely 'multi-cultural' and full of militant Muslims, thus, had he seen it, making the cult film possibly Anders Behring Breivik's favorite, or at least a 'guilty pleasure,' which is also how I might describe the film.

As indicated at the introduction of Afterman 2, "The year is 2012... After the September 11, 2001 tragedy and the subsequent wars and economical depressions, Europe became a self sustaining fundamentalist right-wing regime controlled by all kinds of fascistic militias." Of course, the main menace in the film is a National Socialist-fetishizing Hitlerite Osama Bin Laden, who has an equally sex-obsessed Saddam Hussein, as well as a bunch of less than handsome neo-SS men, at his disposal, who have put most of Europe's population into archaic concentration camps that make Auschwitz seem like some sort of technocratic super-prison from the somewhat distant future. As semi-literally written towards the beginning of Afterman 2, "Meanwhile, in far-away Russia, The Afterman decides, after the death of his wife, to go back to his European Fatherland." Undoubtedly, the Afterman is much more slob-like, rotund, and pussy-crazed since his debut in The Afterman some twenty years earlier, but he also seems much wiser and more stoic, and when he notices an elderly female lover hang herself when he leaves Russia, he pays her no mind nor pity. On his way out of Rusland, the Afterman is stopped by a Stalinist-like female guard, who notices the big bulge in his pants and forces him to allow her to aggressively suck him off. After swallowing Afterman's big business, the raunchy Russian guard lets him know that in regard to his destination of Antwerp, Belgium that, "They deported everybody from there... Too much radiation!" The Afterman arrives in Europa in what seems to be a couple paces, even kicking over a pervert priest who is about to anally pork a naughty nympho nun in the process, but he is quite disturbed when he notices neo-fascist troops and tyrannical towelheads shooting and enslaving his people, so the post-apocalyptic hero starts killing the soldiers and saving big breasted babes. Eventually, the always affable Afterman hooks up with a group of semi-sadistic Sapphic revolutionaries called simply "The Women Rebels" who run a large beer brewery and one of the ostensibly gay gals, a broad name Britt (Frida Farrell) who magically speaks English (despite everyone else in the film speaking Dutch, French, etc.) falls in love-at-first sight with him after noticing his bulging 'horsedick' and gives him a sensual bubble bath, as the hero—being an unfortunate product of the post-apocalyptic age—has never had the luxury of bathing before. Of course, Britt's lesbo lover freaks on her due to the burlesque bubble bath, for which she stoically responds, "So the fuck what?!... He's never had a bath... he's never seen soap... he's such an old man, what could he do?" Meanwhile, Bin Laden becomes sexually-obsessed with Britt and her big tits, declaring, "I want the blond with the big hooters! Her big juicy jugs are perfect to put my kingssize cock in between!," so his SS Henchman plot to get her.

Meanwhile, the Afterman and his Britt are attacked by fascist EMT ambulance crew, which leaves the boorish hero beaten and bruised and his babe kidnapped by Bin Laden's fresh crew. Naturally, the Afterman hooks up with the Women Rebels to get Britt back, even if she has already been sexually defiled by a big wig towelhead like Bin Laden, who enjoys reading the morning paper whilst loudly defecating on his luxury houseboat. Posing as classy caterers, the Afterman and the combat carpet-munchers manage to rescue Britt on Bin Laden's luxury yacht and the two lovers sail away on a shitty ship that is ironically named "Poseidon" in a pseudo-romantic moment parodying epic celluloid garbage like James Cameron's disaster turd Titanic (1997). Recalling a flashback from The Afterman where the hero watches a ritzy lesbo drowning a girl during poolside cunnilingus, the Afterman dreams of strangling to death said lethally lecherous lesbo with a gigantic red dildo. The Afterman and Britt eventually make it back to his radioactive Fatherland of Antwerp, which is still occupied by the same cult of medieval cocksuckers that forced the hero to give him head in The Afterman. The cult forces Afterman and Britt to share in eating the tiny heart of an innocent child they have just ritualistically sacrificed. Unbeknownst to them, Bin Laden, the SS men, and Britt's ex have caught up with them and take Britt prisoner once again, but luckily the Women Rebels want revenge and they have the hospitable help of Afterman. Rather unfortunately, one of Bin Laden's jealous SS men, who is in cahoots with Britt's butch ex, gives Britt to a maniacal Mengele-esque Nazi butcher, who makes mincemeat of the little lady. After the Afterman and the Women Rebels exterminate the SS man and Britt's ex, they discover a cooler with the label "Britt - Age 26" containing the organs of the apocalyptic hero's great love. In a heartwarming farewell, the Afterman and the blond leader of the Women Rebels spread Britt's ashes in a river and cross the border for Rusland. In the end, the Afterman man comes full circle, going from Russia to Antwerp to Russia again, but picking up a butch bleach blonde lesbo Führer on the way.

A scathing, if not intentionally stupid, scatological satire of modern day Europa and the world in general, Afterman 2 totally lacks the vague 'arthouse' element of The Aftermath, thus making it a work that will more likely appeal to philistine exploitation fans more than anyone else, which is sad considering the film's lack of political correctness because, if anything, cultivated cinephiles and art fags need to be rid of their archaic leftist politics. Featuring the real voice of Osama Bin Laden dubbed into scenes with falsely translated subtitles about his "horsedick" and need to screw "blondes," Afterman 2 is not exactly a film that was made to appeal to the 'cultural sensitivity' of European and American 'social cuckolds' who feel a need to cater to any swarthy untermensch that happens to be illegally squatting in their nation. As for Rob Van Eyck's deranged dystopia where Islamic terrorists and neo-nazis unite as depicted in Afterman 2, such is nothing short of farcical fantasy because there is not a single nationalist group desperate enough in Europe to align themselves with tribes of towelheads in Europe, even if both groups are common perennial enemies of the Hebrew/Zionist. If the world ends with militant bull dykes waging hell against a Muslim National Socialist dictatorship, that still beats the more probable fate where Africans and Asian from the global south turn Europa into a third world sewer as is happening today, thus one could argue Afterman 2 makes the future seem brighter than it really is. Apparently director Rob Van Eyck has decided not to wait another two decades for another sequel as Afterman 3, a work about a global warming disaster, just recently premiered at the Cannes Film Festival. Needless to say, I cannot wait to see who rapes the Afterman in the ostensibly final chapter in the

Afterman trilogy.

HALLOWEEN

Rob Zombie (2007)

I really wasn't offended when I heard Rob Zombie was planning to remake John Carpenter's Halloween. I grew up watching Halloween and the Halloween franchise. They entertained me and nothing more. I don't hold Halloween as a sacred film not to be tampered with. The countless sequels did enough in destroying the films so-called "legacy." Rob Zombie created a fanboy jerk off epic (a 2 hour long slasher film?) with his remake of Halloween. Zombie couldn't help but fill in all the little details that are absent in the original, which gave it it's power. I remember as a child dreaming out scenarios for the missing aspects of Halloween. Wondering what Michael Myers did in the mental hospital all those years, what psychological elements caused young Michael to kill his sister, and other predictable "childish" thoughts. At over 40 years of age, Rob Zombie's fan boy fantasies have come true. He managed to destroy one of his favorite films. Rob Zombie obviously has dreams of being considered the "Quentin Tarantino" of the horror genre. Watching countless horrible horror films, learning their simple conventions (and how to break them), assembled fragments of those horror films (as evidence of horror knowledge and trivia), have countless "famous" actors and actresses, and then stylizing the film for the new film generation of unprogressive fans. Post-modernism long ago reared it's ugly head and has given us what we have already seen. Rob Zombie's Halloween is another attempt at making an "art" piece of post-modernism. PURE EVIL! The first good half of Halloween follows Michael Myers into his route of sociopathic mental deterioration. None of the Myers "back story" is necessary (it is Zombie's fan boy soul unleashed). The rest of the film follows a somewhat similar plot to the original Halloween. Since House of 1000 Corpses and The Devil's Rejects, Rob Zombie has picked up a couple skills in shot composition, editing, and overall construction of the entire film. He once again decided to put in "hip" music (another nod to Tarantino) to give the film a "timeless" feel. Michael Myers somehow grows into a seven foot tall giant in the mental hospital. He looked more like a fake wrestler from the WCW than a slasher killer. Unsurprisingly, Rob Zombie committed to such a lame and unoriginal idea. I hope the upcoming remake of A Nightmare on Elm Street doesn't feature an eight foot tall tranny Freddy Krueger. Rob Zombie's Halloween features Halloween franchise child actress Danielle Harris all grown up and topless (covered in blood). I really hope this wasn't some sick fantasy of Rob Zombie's. In the mid 1990's Harris was the victim of an obsessed stalking fan (I assume Halloween fan). The lonely fellow made threats that he would kill her. Nonetheless, Harris decided to flaunt her blood covered boobies for the remake. Her performance's in Halloween 4 and 5 must have been a real eye opener for Rob Zombie. His morbid wish has finally come true. Halloween 4: Return of Michael Myers Era Danielle Harris Lady

HALLOWEEN

Danielle Harris in Rob Zombie's Halloween Halloween also updates American suburbia with modern degeneracy. In the original Halloween, Michael Myers seemed to come from the typical American wholesome suburban background (which made him "scarier"). Rob Zombie's Michael Myers is a white trash child with a stripper mother (Zombie once again whores out his wife) and a foul mouthed trailer park stepfather. Although this Myer family may better reflect contemporary American "family values," it added nothing to the "power" of the film. The end of Rob Zombie's Halloween turns into a dark underexposed mess. Zombie needs to learn the basics innovated by the pioneers in cinema and their abilities to utilize shadows to their cinematically gothic benefit. Rob Zombie simply makes scenes dark to make them "spooky." What comes out is a bunch of scenes that are underexposed and almost unwatchable. I figured that Rob Zombie could have bought himself a nice lighting crew but shadows are just too artsy! Rob Zombie's Halloween is a sometimes entertaining "update" of the original films for today's apathetic American audience. It offers a couple interesting new cheap elements and a whole entourage of embarrassing ones. Zombie's Halloween is a fan boys dream turned nightmare. May Jesus Christ accept his forgiveness.

FIGHT FOR YOUR LIFE

Robert A. Endelson (1977)

While the superlatively sleazy exploitation flick Fight for Your Life (1977) aka Blood Bath at 1313 Fury Road aka Getting Even aka Held Hostage aka I Hate Your Guts aka The Hostage's Bloody Revenge aka Hostage Staying Alive has been described by countless film reviewers as one of the most racist and politically incorrect films ever made (for example, the dorks at AllMovie.com described the work as “amazingly racist”) due to its depiction of a conspicuously white trash fugitive killer terrorizing a black bourgeois family and saying some not-so-nice things about negroes, the reality is that it is one of the most overtly anti-white (or, more like ‘anti-white proletarian’) pieces of Hebraic agitprop ever dreamed up by a bunch of scheming Semitic smut-peddlers, though that does not mean it cannot be enjoyed by the good, the proud, and the racially insensitive members of white America. Indeed, directed and co-produced by Jewish pornographer turned dentist Robert A. Endelson (Filthiest Show in Town), penned by Hebrew hack Straw Weisman (who, most recently, acted as an executive producer on his young kinsman James Franco’s 2014 Faulkner adaptation The Sound and the Fury), and produced by Judaic sexploitation mogul William Mishkin (who, among other things, was responsible for producing most of gutter auteur Andy Milligan’s films), Fight for Your Life is as shameless as films get as an unsubtle piece of majorly moronic race-hate that was clearly made to appeal to the more base instincts of both blacks and whites, the former being mostly depicted as dignified saints and the latter as a combination of law abiding morons who question nothing, resentful white trash scum, and nigger-loving whores. A work that, despite being about a cracker con that ‘tortures’ a nice negro family, only features whites being killed (including a prepubescent boy and a beautiful teenager girl), Fight for Your Life, not unlike the also Judaic directed mess Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff (1979) is just one sick Semitic fantasy where the Jew is nowhere to be seen and the white man is the authoritarian puppet master who wallows in torturing so-called ‘people of color.’ Starring mainstream actor William Sanderson (who is best known for his role as ‘J.F. Sebastian’ in Ripley Scott’s 1982 sci-fi masterpiece Blade Runner) in an exceedingly embarrassing role as a raving redneck rapist killer whose favorite words are “nigger” and “coon” and featuring a less than subtle “black power” message that rejects the Christian message of “turning the other cheek” (in one literally heavy handed scene, the redneck villain repeatedly smacks a negro patriarch on both sides of his cheeks with a bible), Fight For Your Life is the sort of film that makes it quite clear the Hebrews did their damndest to fan the flames of white hate.

While traveling through Manhattan in a prison van en route to Sing Sing, southern fried white trash sadist alpha-con Jesse Lee Kane (William Sanderson) and his two slavish colored comrades—a sexually depraved East Asian named Ling Chow (Peter Yoshida) and a stereotypically coke-addled and flashy dressing Puerto Rican named Chino (Daniel Faraldo)—manage to escape after the automobile crashes and they murder the prison guards. Luckily, the fucked fugitive trio do not have to look far to find a car, which they steal from a typically effeminately dressed negro pimp, whose flashy clothes Chino steals. Meanwhile, an atypically cultivated negro family named the Turners headed by a self-declared pacifist Christian patriarch named Preacher Ted (Robert Judd) and his much more aggressive wife Mrs. Turner (Catherine Peppers) congregate at a dinner table and disagree with one another in a respectful fashion regarding their feelings on evil white folks and black unity. Unquestionably, the toughest member of the Turner tribe is wheelchair bound Grandma Turner (Lela Small), who, to the chagrin of pussy peacemaker Ted, proudly proclaims to her preteen grandson Floyd (played by Reggie Rock Bythewood, who went on to become a director/producer/screenwriter who has directed big budget black cinema garbage like Biker Boyz (2003) starring Laurence Fishburne), “Black Power...that’s where it’s at.” Mrs. Turner is not exactly a fan of crackers either and, unfortunately for her, her daughter Corrie (Yvonne Ross) is friends with her dead son’s white girlfriend Karen (played by Bonnie Martin and who she blames for the death of her son), who is invited to eat with the family. Of course, Karen will never make it to dinner, as sexually depraved chink Ling Chow will find her, molest her, and murder her, before she gets to the front door. Indeed, while on the run, Jesse Lee Kane and his multicultural minions make it to the Turner home and torture the family à la The Last House on the Left (1972), albeit in a bawdy and bigoted Blaxploitation fashion.

As killer Kane and his seemingly half-retarded comrades torture the Turner family to perform degrading Stepin Fetchit-esque routines, a humorous and uptight cop named Lt. Reilly (David Cargill)—a seemingly emotionally vacant fellow who so mindlessly follows the law that he got his own best friend’s son imprisoned in a horrendous jail due to a meager marijuana charge—begins looking for the three outlaws. A somewhat impulsively unhinged maniac, Kane makes the mistake of killing a liquor store owner not far from the Turner home, thus eventually leading cop Reilly and a bunch small-town hick police to the fugitives, but before then, the trashy criminals have their fun at the expense of the dignity of some rather dapper darkies. Indeed, Kane likes calling preacher Ted things like “black ass coon” and “black ass bugger.” In tribute to a MLK Jr. portrait hanging on the wall of the Turner home, Kane also says “Martin Luther Coon” a couple times. Unquestionably, Ling is the most depraved of the three fugitives, as he not only molests and murders blonde teen Karen when he catches her walking to the Turner home through the woods, but he also beats in the skull of Floyd’s white friend and “blood brother” (David Dewlow), who also happens to be the son of the local Sheriff, who makes it a personal mission to take out Kane and his followers when he discovers his brutally murdered progeny.

Of course, like most post-WWII screen racists, Kane is depicted as a loser with an inferiority complex who gets a self-esteem boost by torturing poor little 'minorities.' In fact, Kane's persecution-complex is so transparent that he more or less confesses to his victims that he was raped in prison while still just a teenager. Going from victim to victimizer, Kane rapes Mr. Turner's virginal teenage daughter Corrie, which infuriates the patriarch so much that he finally gets the testicular fortitude to fight back against his torturer. Indeed, the last ten minutes or so of the film feature a racially-charged showdown between Kane and Mr. Turner, but before that, Chino is fatally wounded by a bullet to the balls by the Turner family and Ling commits accidental suicide when he attempts to make a great escape out of a window and is fatally wounded by broken glass. After listening in on the radio and learning that Corrie was raped, uptight lawman Lt. Reilly decides to break the law for the first time and throws a handgun to Mr. Turner so he can have a showdown with Kane, who is using Mrs. Turner as a hostage and has a gun to her head. After Kane states to Mr. Turner during their showdown, "Ain't gonna be a fair fight, boy...everyone knows whites are naturally superior," the spade preacher accuses the fugitive of being a faggot who was raped by negroes in jail, even stating, "Is that what happened to you Kane...some big black boogeyman stick it to you, boy? I knew you weren't a man." By this point, Kane begins losing more than just his cool and screams at Mr. Turner in a hysterically hateful fashion, "I hate you...You just like the black man my momma run off with." Of course, Turner shoots Kane dead, thus spreading the message to black audience members to never accept pacifism when dealing with racist whites.

In its depiction of a poor white redneck who uses an East Asian and Latino to persecute a noble middle class negro family, Fight for Your Life seems to spread some audaciously absurd allegorical message about the state of America that borders on science fiction. If the film had been about a heinous Hebraic banker who, with the help of an East Indian, a Chinaman, and a deracinated white liberal WASP, kidnapped and tortured a white Christian middle class family while demanding a pound of flesh, it would probably best reflect the current socio-political climate of America today. In fact, Fight for Your Life was made and advertised to incite blacks, which it did, or so was described by Bill Landis and Michelle Clifford in Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002). Indeed, as the authors wrote regarding the experience of watching the film with a largely black audience: "When the pacifist Turner finally shoots Cain, the Empire crowd broke into cheers: "Fuckin' cracker deserved it!" White patrons tried to leave the theater as unassumingly as possible [...] The whole freakish racist hallucination is distinguished by William Sanderson's idiosyncratic fireball performance as Cain, which inflamed the Empire audience into booing, hollering "cracker" and "honky," and flinging any handy object at his image on the screen. Even little kids with their parents joined in the act. Sleazoid Express never witnessed an audience so enraged and unified against what was going on on the screen.”

Unquestionably, Fight for Your Life makes the perfect double feature along with the somewhat strange anti-Anglo Blaxploitation Bone (1972) directed by kosher cult director Larry Cohen, which depicts an arrogant slick-talking black buck thief torturing an white upper-middle class married couple. Of course, while white racist Kane is depicted as a purely despicable monster in Fight for Your Life, the eponymous black racist Bone is treated as a hero who gave two hypocritical bourgeois honkies just what they deserved, thus reflecting the rather transparent agenda among Jewish exploitation filmmakers during the 1970s, which is not all that different from the Hebrews that run Hollywood today. I certainly cannot think of a National Socialist propaganda film that is so hateful in its one dimensional propaganda that it depicts a Jew putting a gun to the head of a infant, but that is just one of the many cartoonish things one sees the redneck racist do in the Fight for Your Life, which does for American exploitation cinema what Judeo-Bolsheviks Leon Trotsky and Ilya Ehrenburg's writings did in terms of siring irrational hatred for the dreaded Nordic race. Ironically, Fight for Your Life was also made to appeal to the very same racist rednecks it criticizes, thus demonstrating the truly ungodly lengths a Hebraic hack will go to just to make a shekel.

NEIGHBOR

Robert A. Masciantonio (2009)

Such a sweet and welcoming face; beauty of that sexual caliber could be no more devious than any of the other bitches of the world, as Gualtiero Jacopetti should have titled La donna nel mondo (Women of the World). Continuing forward with the guise of a flawless clothed body, indie horror welcomes a new gore starlet with America Olivo. She teems with slutty class and a giggle that will melt your heart - and she's a serial killer. And so the ball has been dropped and no heads are turning. I wonder why that is? Oh, it's because this isn't new and worst off, it isn't good. Neighbor aka Robert A. Masciantonio's Neighbor is an awful film and a prime offender of gore-for-the-sake-of-gore. Switch sights to disappointment because this is solid proof that eye candy only goes as far as unstimulated entertainment; eye candy and moving pictures should never be mixed. Just look at the prime examples of D.O.A. - Dead or Alive, Bandidas, Tomb Raider, Onechanbara, Attack Girls' Swim Team vs. Undead, or many of the other countless titles with the mirrored modus operandi. Any film that occupies matter over mind has a general success rate of single digits and proves to be as intimidating and infuriating as the prices they charge for cinema feces. The film on trial here opens with a beautiful woman listening to music and dancing around a very nice kitchen. She eats a bowl of cereal and presumes her joyous shuffle without an air of menace other than the knowledge of this film's primary genre alignment. As she goes upstairs and opens a door, flash to two beyond mutilated bodies tied up in chairs. The woman screams and when the trauma passes, she laughs. Such a tedious opening for a film, and to think Masciantonio actually attempted to "psyche" us out with juvenile playground tactics. Had this been a mind game of a film or implemented in a later stage of story progression, I might have been fooled but we're not in Kindergarten and what I watched was too stupid for words. With the plot in concern, the film adopts a simple tale of a new girl in town who begins a spree of murder that disconnects a tight-knit community of friends. But between you and me, none of this really happens. Almost no mention of her moving into town recently was exchanged between cast, time just churns up into fine dust as the run time is squandered by America Olivo in skimpy clothes torturing dude-bros. While this rendition of horror might seem appealing, it could only be so to the next Evil Dead memorabilia sporting metal-head who would appreciate something for the effects of violence and brutality towards unsuspecting victims. While I appreciate a nice scene of mayhem and murder as much as the average consumer of oddities, I enjoy it to be wrapped nicely in something called continuity and story archs, not a film centering itself around tits and blood, which we don't get none or much of either. Now to flip planes sharply, America Olivo is a great actress for what she's done. She was beautiful in Bitch Slap however no amount of good looks could have made that film palpable for me and she turns a nice psychotic turn in Neighbor which is presumably a natural talent. Neighbor just isn't equipped with really much of anything other than a circle of guys drinking in a bar planning a party. That's the key set up for the brutal shenanigans to take place, only it never does all in part to "The Girl" kidnapping our lead protagonist and torturing him and his girlfriend to soak up the rest of the time necessary for "feature length." Also, he later presumes he's dreaming during a slow purging from existence in an effort to channel An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge vibes of post-Jacob's Ladder discord. I find it very discomforting that I can only praise the level of stark violence in Neighbor. I'd really like to be able to proclaim something in this abscessed project to have value or meaning but it's misplaced as a skin flick but doesn't aspire to be anything but cock-teasing on celluloid. You'd think they could fit a nice shower scene in the midst of Neighbor, I mean, with all the scenes of home invasion on display here that equate to little or nothing. Neighbor is a mess of a film; the kind that you are embarrassed to have watched. While some idiots can mistake the context of cruelty and splatter to be "camp", I cannot accept this travesty for something that it isn't - tolerable. While America Olivo is an attractive female who isn't afraid to bare all for us in Playboy, she's just a face - a body composed of tissue, muscle, bone, and fluid who will inevitably perish and rot. She and I will never amount to anything because time destroys all. Neighbor is a pitiful excuse for a horror movie; a two-tone wall of off-whites painted by someone with scarce knowledge of real horror. The revelation that life is precious...and I actually wasted 2 hours of my life on this fetid shit.

EMPEROR OF THE NORTH

I've visited the cinematic subject of homeless folk several times in the last month. It seems that every corner I turn houses some film spanning many genres with homeless people as either key character pieces or undesirable pawns and deus ex machina's. When I read a summarized plot regarding an epic battle on a train, the action fan in me squealed and throbbed. After finally watching a film I'd never go out of my way to see, my view on classic period cinema was been shaken to the core. With a name like Sam Peckinpah's attached, you know you're in for a treat. Sadly, he didn't see the potential that we saw and jumped ship. The project was then picked up by Robert Aldrich who you may know from The Dirty Dozen. There's no doubt that Peckinpah would have created a bold and sadistic masterpiece, but I'd rather not chance time or fate and settle with this Western cult film of its own status. Originally titled Emperor of the North Pole, the film was quickly re-titled after the name turned out to be synonymous with Christmas. Little did the general audience know that they were missing out on a hellacious masculine viewing experience which is above any modern language. Simply put, I've never seen a film quite like Emperor of the North. It is a deep seated film relaying historical events with the lifestyle of a hobo. This being of such critical importance as how our economy is in the middle of a meltdown situation. Now there is a huge difference betwixt a homeless person and a hobo. A hobo (on screen) has the charisma to survive. He is armed with the will to steal and a sharp personality to boot. Homeless people are shown (and interact) as a sluggish, begging force that lacks any method of motivation. A lamprey, if you will. This film makes me appreciate the old times in which every man worked for his own, even if he had nothing to work towards. I hope if our current business climate plummets, that I'd be given the chance to hitch on trains.

Lee Marvin turns tables and heads as the legendary bum A-No. 1. This drifter is the greatest bum around. Ernest Borgnine plays Shack, a ruthless and sadistic train conductor who cherishes a threatening reputation of murdering any hobo that hitches his train without a ticket. Too bad old Shack meets his match when he crosses wits with A-No. 1. Both Lee Marvin and Ernest Borgnine bring their exquisite personalities to the big screen in this film. I'd always admired Borgnine after he said the key to his long life was his frequent masturbation. It takes a gutsy character such as himself to boast something so bravado and impromptu as that. He might be a familiar face thanks to his role as Ted Denslow in BASEketball. A role that might have won his infinite favorings thanks to his ability to humor us so well. Trust me, after watching him act Shack's character, I like seeing him smile instead of snarl. In a film that equates into a 10 minute long testosterone slinging death fest, Emperor of the North has anything that is apart of a daily breakfast. I'd like to imagine Peckinpah's credits stapled to the film, but this is a film best left untouched. A film preserved by its own natural contents, Emperor of the North is mandatory viewing for anyone interested in the history of film. Not only a rustic masterpiece, but a masterpiece with an extremely high replay value.

THAT COLD DAY IN THE PARK

Robert Altman (1969)

“New Hollywood” auteur Robert Altman (M*A*S*H, Nashville) is a filmmaker who has directed a number of films that I like to some degree for varying reasons, but his pre-fame work That Cold Day in the Park (1969)—a box-office disaster upon its release—is my personal favorite work of his and, along with his British-American psychological thriller Images (1972), arguably the darkest and most unsettling idiosyncratic work in the filmmaker’s entire oeuvre. An American-Canadian production shot on a rather small budget of $500,000 based on the novel of the same name written by American actor/screenwriter Peter Miles (who wrote it along with the bad b-movie They Saved Hitler’s Brain (1968), under the less than inconspicuous pseudonym Richard Miles), That Cold Day in the Park is part moody maniac melodrama, part psychological horror-thriller, part callous leftist criticism of the British Columbian bourgeois, part creepy and even borderline campy comedy, and part dichotomous class/character study and is most like a post-The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971) Fassbinder melodrama minus sympathy for its lunatic spinster lady lead and a certain dark and shadowiness that echoes gothic horror. Shot by Hungarian cinematographer László Kovács, who got his start working on no-budget works like The Incredibly Strange Creatures Who Stopped Living and Became Mixed-Up Zombies!!? (1964) and would go on to shoot Easy Rider (1969) and Five Easy Pieces (1970) and was a pioneering member of the American New Wave, but would go on to directing less artistically merited big blockbusters like Steven Spielberg’s Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977) and Ghostbusters (1984), That Cold Day in the Park is an intentionally claustrophobically shot ‘chamber piece’ about a sexually repressed and fiercely frigid old maid who lives as a self-imprisoned slave in her lonely and dreary apartment, but discovers a sort of bright white light in the form of a young and seemingly melancholy teenage boy sitting on a bench all by his lonesome on a rather rainy day. Advertised with the superlatively sensationalized tagline, “HOW FAR WILL A WOMAN GO...to possess a 19 year-old boy?,” That Cold Day in the Park is ultimately a foreboding and shuddersome celluloid tale of a uniquely unhinged babe somewhat past her physical prime who would probably have been vaginally penetrated by her high school sweetheart, but instead locked herself away in a neo-Victorian nightmare of ‘proper play dates’ with elderly men and women who happen to belong to the same pseudo-ritzy social clique as her morbid widow mother did. A chamber piece-sized work with an unsettlingly anti-erotic clash of social classes between a figurative princess who has locked herself in a tower and the figurative pretty boy knight she takes it upon herself to assign to save her but ultimately winds up locked away with her, That Cold Day in the Park is one of the most delightful yet equally depressing diacritic depictions of repressed horniness-gone-homicidal

Middle-aged spinster Frances Austen (Oscar-award winning theater/film actress Sandy Dennis of Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? (1966) fame) lives in an elegant, if not uniquely ugly and mundanely minimalistic Vancouver apartment that might be occupied by a living and breathing woman, but has the unmistakable metaphysical feeling of death and lack of all vitality. Against the better judgment of some brazen bourgeois bitch who invokes the beyond-the-grave scorn of the old maid's dead mother, frigid Frances decides to invite a seemingly lonely and visibly wet and cold teenage boy she spots from her window to come and stay inside her apartment. The boy (played by actor turned college history professor Michael Burns) in question, whose real name is never mentioned, agrees to follow Frances back to her apartment, but he does not do this verbally as he pretends to be mute and somewhat dumb, but ultimately proves to be a delightful and entertaining guest to a woman who wants some wantonness in her life, but lacks the experience and social ease to attain it. The first thing Frances does to make the boy feel at home is give him a seemingly sexually-charged but ultimately anticlimactic bubble bath that ultimately proves to be the most sensual and unclothed moment 'sexual' moment they share with one another during their radically ridiculous pseudo-relationship. Sort of like a bourgeois woman-child who has never grown up nor did a day's work in her entire patently privileged yet less than joyous life, Frances will do anything to keep the lost-but-not-found twink boy she snatched up from outside, so she has the creepily childish idea to lock him in the guest bedroom that she allows him to sleep in. Of course, Frances is not a total monster, just a socially retarded one, as she supplies the boy with decent food, clothes, shoes, luxurious shelter, and neverending and hopelessly hysterical chatter that is quite indicative of her intensely introverted and largely insipid, brain damaged mind. Of course, the boy has a life outside his new hermetic home with Frances, so he sneaks out the window in his locked prison window to be with his bitchy big sister and her wild war veteran boyfriend.

When the Boy leaves Frances' apartment to go meet his big sis Nina (Susanne Benton), he walks in on her screwing her boyfriend Nick (David Garfield), but does not seem the least bit shocked as the two seem to share a quasi-incestuous relationship. The Boy tells sister Nina and her boy toy about how Frances has a "strange attitude toward sex" and makes a "big deal about it," but prefers living with her because he has his own room and board. As the viewer learns, the Boy originally intended to meet his sister and her boyfriend on 'that cold day in the park' that sparked the by-chance meeting with seemingly fickle Frances. When Frances unlocks the Boy's door and surprises him with a hearty breakfast in bed, she notices he is gone and is crushed. Naturally, when the Boy shows up later that day at her door, she is quite jubilant and welcomes him in. Not long after when Frances goes to a gynecologist to get contraceptives, lying to the vag doc that she is single but getting married (sexual protection was not so easy to get back in those days), in a rather dramatic attempt to prepare herself for sharing her novice carnal knowledge with the Boy, the Boy's sister shows up to the apartment and demands a free bath, complaining, "I have told you, I do not take a bath everyday...what kind brat would deprive his sister of a bath?!" The Boy's sister pulls him into the bath and even attempts to seduce him, seductively stating, "Imagine if I was not your sister," in a whorish fashion. Of course, the Boy is not the only one who gets unwanted sexual attention as Frances has an elderly doctor friend named Dr. Stevenson, who has been trying to get in her panties for years, but she is decidedly disgusted by him and his lecherous longings, especially after visiting the gynecologist and having her naughty bits fiddled with in a sterile fashion. When Frances enters the Boy's bedroom, unwittingly believing he is sleeping under the covers with only his blond hair showing (he is really hanging out with his big sis), she reveals her affection for him and declares "I want you to make love to me," so when she finally realizes it is a toy doll under the covers, she has a momentarily paused but ultimately hysterical freakout and shrieks as if she found a mutilated dead body. After discovering Frances has nailed his bedroom window shut, thus making him unable to enter the outside world, the Boy reveals to his conspiring non-lover that he is not deaf and dumb, stating, "Don't think I can't get out of here...I can get out anytime I want...And if you think by keeping me here I am going to get in bed with you or anything like that, you're wrong...If I want a girl or anything I'll just go out and get one myself...And I might not come back." Clearly a cracked chick with nothing to lose, especially in regard to her dignity, Frances takes the Boy's statement deathly serious as a sort of ultimatum and responds to him not long after by confessing, "I'm sorry, so so sorry. I don't want you to be angry with me. I want you to stay here...I want things to stay the way they are...You can understand that, can't you?! I can't let you go...Not now." To solve the strange sexual situation or lack thereof, Frances has the bright idea to buy the boy a prostitute and bring her back to the apartment. After a failed attempt to coerce an aggressive Amy Winehouse-look-alike of streetwalker to come home with her, Francis is approached by a pimp and finally procures a haggard hooker (Linda Sorenson, who played villain Stegman's mother in Mark L. Lester's Class of 1984 (1982)) that she brings back to her apartment for the Boy. Rather unfortunately, Frances becomes insufferably jealous and homicidally infuriated by said haggard hooker when she hears her would-be-wonder-boy making love to her and drives a butcher knife into her heart in a manner that would have probably be like Norman Bates' mother. That Cold Day in the Park ends in slight ambiguity, though Frances' insanity has surely reached a totally new level of nastiness.

Sort of like The Collector (1965) starring Terence Stamp meets Misery (1990) starring Kathy Bates, except with a pleasantly foul 'Gothic Canadian' flavor, That Cold Day in the Park is undoubtedly a underrated celluloid work that has yet to get its due, though thankfully some have taken notice of Robert Altman's lost minor masterpiece. For example, Canadian homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce's debut feature-length film No Skin Off My Ass (1993) is a satirical remake of That Cold Day in the Park that replaces the bourgeois spinster with a homopunk hairdresser and the Boy with a neo-nazi skinhead, which is all the more interesting considering that the Peter Miles novel that Altman used as the source novel originally centered around a repressed homosexual longing after a lonely hustler. Robert Altman would later utilize theater actress Sandy Dennis' distinctive acting talents for his film Come Back to the Five and Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean (1982), but, in my humble opinion, the actress never again gave a screen performance as hauntingly hypnotic as in That Cold Day in the Park. Incidentally, actress Sandy Dennis become a 'cradle robber' in real life when she started a relationship with actor Eric Roberts—a man nearly two decades her junior—that lasted from 1980 to 1985, on top of being a 'spiritual spinster' of sorts, vocally admitting she never wanted children, stating in a 1989 interview with People magazine regarding a miscarriage she had in 1965, "if I'd been a mother, I would have loved the child, but I just didn't have any connection with it when I was pregnant ... I never, ever wanted children. It would have been like having an elephant." Ironically, Dennis died childless at the premature age of 54 from ovarian cancer, a disease that is more likely to affect women who have never had children, though the deranged would-be-superman Christopher Dennis featured in Confessions of a Superhero (2007)—a documentary about people who dress up in superhero outfits at the Hollywood Walk of Fame and beg for tips—claims to be the bastard son of the actress, though her family denies it. Either way, Sandy Dennis was undoubtedly born to play Frances Austen of That Cold Day in the Park, a film that, in its depiction of bourgeois bitch frigidity and prole sexual virility, makes for the closest thing to a Marxist-Freudian Gothic melodrama, albeit being nowhere near as annoying, superlatively soulless, or aesthetically retarded as it sounds. Indeed, Robert Altman was sort of a leftist prick who played an imperative role in popularizing M*A*S*H with his absurdly overrated 1970 film of the same name and made a bunch of others films about improvised nothingness, but That Cold Day in the Park, as well as Thieves Like Us (1974), Short Cuts (1993), and a couple other films, stops me from despising the filmmaker outright as a glorified TV director posing as a serious auteur and cinematic artist.

BREWSTER MCCLOUD

Robert Altman (1970)

Love him or loathe him (I feelings of a little bit of both), belated auteur Robert Altman (Nashville, Gosford Park) is one of the few American filmmakers in Hollywood history to rarely play it safe as a mensch that thrived on taking both professional and artistic risks. For example, when Altman—a stubborn old chap that spent over two decades slaving away in the industrial film and television world before really getting noticed—first achieved great commercial and critical success with the sardonic antiwar flick M*A*S*H (1970), the filmmaker decided to follow it up the same year with what is arguably the most innately anarchistic, idiosyncratic, and inexplicable flick of his entire career. Indeed, although a flawed flick with a somewhat incoherent plot, Brewster McCloud (1970) aka Bird Shit aka Brewster McCloud's (Sexy) Flying Machine is, at least in my opinion, one of the most strangely sophisticated and underrated films of Altman's entire career as a sort of experimental neo-fable where bird shit and serial killing collide in a quixotically liberating fashion that really underscores the rebellious filmmaker's untamable spirit and commitment to inordinate celluloid assholery. The great-grandson of a German Catholic Forty-Eighter rebel that fled Schleswig-Holstein, Germany after the failed leftist Revolutions of 1848, Altman was indubitably born with rebellion in his blood and his fucked little flick is a fiercely farcical attack on both America and American culture that was fittingly set in the same state that JFK was assassinated only a couple years as a scathingly cinematic work that effortlessly assaults and molests all forms of authority. The story of a young virginal serial killer with both a strangling and bird fetish that dedicates his entire life to achieving his rather lofty dream of being able to fly by building special wings with the help of a beautiful blonde fallen angel, the film is ultimately a uniquely unhinged allegory for Altman's own weltanschauung of total personal freedom in an oppressive realm plagued by bureaucratic stupidity, cultural and moral retardation, carny hustler capitalism, nihilistic materialism, and necrotizing (post)Puritanism. In that sense, Altman's film has a similar spirit to cinematic works as diverse as Terry Gilliam's dystopian masterpiece Brazil (1985) and Werner Herzog's classic doc Little Dieter Needs to Fly (1997) in terms of its overtly allegorical depiction of flying as the ultimate symbol of personal freedom and transcendence. Starring Bud Cort in an underrated pre-fame performance as a vaguely similar role to his eponymous character in Hal Ashby's Harold and Maude (1971) where he also breaks down the fourth wall by making goofy faces directly at the camera, Brewster McCloud probably should be a more readily worshiped cult item due to its director and lead actor, yet it strangely seems to be considered a minor work even among certain Altmanphiles. Personally, I rather re-watch the film over Altman's best respected classics like M*A*S*H and Nashville any day, but then again I probably find the sight of freshly splattered bird shit on the face of an elderly female corpse to be more humorous than the average person.

Somewhat humorously, Altman was so dissatisfied with Brewster McCloud screenwriter Doran William Cannon's script that he was quite critical about it to the press, even once telling the writer over the phone that "It was crap." As to why Altman—a filmmaker well known for severely irking screenwriters by using their screenplays as mere superficial guidelines as opposed to the holy writ—would opt to use Cannon's supposedly super shitty script, he once simply explained to Mitchell Zuckoff in Robert Altman: The Oral Biography (2009), "I forget what the writer's name was, but he has sole screen credit. Cannon, yeah, Cannon. It was just a dreadful piece, I thought. But it was a kid flying, a gem of an idea I could work off." Indeed, one can only assume Altman performed something nothing short of cinematic alchemy when he turned the turd of a screenplay into a surreal scatological satire that both literally and figuratively shits on authority and that brutally attacks both uptight politicians and sexually liberated hippie cunts alike with equal savagely scathing glee. As a cinematic work directed by a lifelong left-wing pothead with a mild degree of negrophilia, the film naturally features a number of grotesque white and redneck caricatures but these caricatures are mostly strangely charmingly lovable and have some of the best lines. Indeed, the film has a number of great scenes of racial hilarity, including an old bitch bitching at a black crow "Get out, you nigger bird!" and a corrupt cop complaining while at a zoo to his long suffering wife, "If I want to see some monkeys, I'll go over to niggertown." While Altman might have had a retarded political sense that is typical of many people that work in Hollywood, he was thankfully no social justice warrior faggot and certainly more a cultivated cynic and mirthful misanthrope than some sort of staunch leftist ideologue. Surely, Brewster McCloud has the capacity to trigger the more spiritually castrated of white liberals and 'biological Marxists,' which is indubitably part of its pleasantly peculiar charm. In fact, Altman was known to 'racially taunt' certain 'minority' friends, or as Hebraic producer Peter Newman (O.C. and Stiggs) once stated, "I was quoted once saying Bob called me 'the Jew with the money.' Bob was totally irreverent. First of all, I didn't have any money. More important, some people saw an implication that it was anti-Semitic. Nothing could be further from the truth. God knows he wasn't anti-Semitic. He was just outrageous."

Over the years, my opinion of the celebrated pop film critic Roger Ebert has slightly changed somewhat and has become a little bit more nuanced, as I have come to the conclusion that he tended to be either completely right or completely wrong when it came to assessing the value of a film. Indeed, Ebert seems to have written the most intellectually sound and insightful review of Brewster McCloud when it was first released in late 1970. For example, Ebert concluded his 3.5 out of 4 star review with the following words: "I'm not sure it's about anything. I imagine you could extract a subject from it, and I'll try that the next time I see it. But I wonder if the movie isn't primarily style; if Altman doesn't have a personal sense of humor and wants his directing style to reflect it. One could, of course, get into a deep thing about birds and wings and freedom, but why?" While Ebert might be right and it is probably pointless to attempt to analyze the film, one cannot deny that the film itself is an expression of freedom as work of scatological slapstick sardonicism that tests the bounds of both good taste and wickedly frolicsome comedic storytelling. In other words, the film's very existence legitimizes its own central theme as an experimental comedy that Altman jeopardized his newfound post-M*A*S*H fame and professional reputation in Hollywood by making, as such an absurdly antisocial and playfully anti-American flick could only have been an abject disaster commercially speaking, which it was.

Altman's most overtly Fellini-esque cinematic work to the point where the film's epilogue seems like a party-cum-tribute to the Italian maestro's somewhat more obscure work I clowns (1970) aka The Clowns, Brewster McCLOUD is probably the director's most overtly 'cinophile' oriented film. Somewhat unexpectedly, the film even pays anti-tribute to Bullitt (1968) via an arrogant San Francisco police detective and a fairly long and bizarre chase scene that concludes with said police detective blowing his brains out after crashing his ugly sports car. Altman had somewhat dubious moral reasons for loathing the famous Bullitt chase scene, or as he explained himself to David Thompson, "I felt that was a really irresponsible scene, because you weren't supposed to care about any of the people who got killed as a result of his driving. I had my cop commit suicide." Needless to say, the Bullitt anti-homage has caused the film to age somewhat less gracefully, yet still manages to inspire some nervous laughs. Notably, the most obvious and frequent cinematic reference in Altman's film is The Wizard of Oz (1939), including Margaret 'Wicked Witch of the West' Hamilton portraying a negrophobic old socialite that is murdered while sporting a pair of iconic ruby rhinestone slippers that a bird shits on. Additionally, commie Midnight Cowboy (1969) screenwriter Waldo Salt's daughter Jennifer Salt appears at the end of the film holding a Todo-esque dog while dressed like Dorothy Gale. Of course, The Wizard of Oz is a quite cleverly fitting film to reference in Brewster McCLOUD as the film undoubtedly takes a rather hostilely ironic approach to the famous Dorothy quote, "There's no place like home." Indeed, aside from depicting Houston as a sort of hick dystopia populated by low-class perverts and wanton weirdoes and ruled over by a senile pseudo-aristocracy and protected by insanely incompetent lawmen, the film's titular 'antihero' dreams of nothing more than literally fleeing the nest and flying away for good so that he will no longer have to suffer the soul-draining collective stupidity and compulsive closed-mindedness of his fellow citizenry, hence his need to kill. On the other hand, Altman's flick surely makes for a wayward tourist advert that probably makes

Houston seem infinitely more exotic and intriguing than it actually is. Of course, you know the film depicts much simpler and more racially homogeneous times in that it does not feature a single Mexican, Muslim, or transgender sexual cripple. Indeed, the film might depict the superlatively shitty southeastern Texas city in a singularly unflattering fashion, but the aesthetically displeasing metropolis seems like a majestic utopia compared to the real-life 'multicultural' Houston of today.

Beginning with no less than three different opening scenes that reveal that Altman has a keen fondness for 'trolling' his audience in a manner that is even sometimes obnoxious, Brewster McCloud first begins with the introduction of a quack 'Lecturer' (played by René Auberjonois, who was named after his paternal Swiss post-Impressionist painter grandfather)—a mostly repugnant and ironically pedantic figure that Altman used as a form of "punctuation" for the film—that proceeds to lecture to both the viewer and an unseen class, stating in a pseudo-profound fashion, "Flight of birds, flight of man, man's similarity to birds, birds' similarity to man. These are the subjects at hand. We will deal with them for the next hour or so, and hope that we will draw no conclusions, otherwise the subject shall cease to fascinate us and, alas, another dream would be lost. There are far too few." In seemingly unintentional tribute to Altman's Teutonic roots, the almost insufferably zany Lecturer then proceeds to quote Goethe, stating, "The desire to fly has been ever-present in the mind of man, but the reality has been long in coming." Not surprisingly, the loony Lecturer is featured at various times in the film as he pedantically recites dry academic ornithological information that more or less parallels what is going on in the life and world of quasi-autistic protagonist Brewster McCloud (Bud Cort). A strange young man that lives an odd owl-like existence in the fallout shelter of the Houston Astrodome where he devotes most of his time to learning how to fly and building a very special set of wings, McCloud seems to be a bastard without a family, but luckily a beautiful blonde MILF named Louise (Sally Kellerman)—a sort of seductive fairy godmother that used to have wings as revealed by the curious sight of two large glaring scars on her back—provides him with all the emotional, philosophical, and criminal support he needs. Indeed, whenever McCloud needs help stealing something or committing a crime, Louise and her black raven companion are always there. Likewise, anytime that someone hassles the protagonist, they soon find themselves strangled to death and covered in bird shit in what is like an unhinged form of 'divine punishment,' though it is never clear as to who actually commits these shit-stained strangulations. Indeed, the only thing that is ever really revealed is that McCloud considers himself guilty of the grisly crimes and greatly fears prison time. As he ultimately reveals at the end of the film, McCloud rather brave death than be imprisoned inside the slammer.

mately strangely rewarding job as the personal chauffeur of a rich evil old fart named Abraham Wright (underrated actor Stacy Keach in relatively effective old fart makeup). Old Abe is a mean miserable miser that has no problem sexually groping young dago dames and verbally assaulting old negroes from the comfort of his wheelchair while doing his rounds picking up the monthly rent from the various ghetto apartment buildings and sanatoriums that he rules over with a firm iron-fist as a proud old school authoritarian slumlord. Naturally, Abraham thinks McCloud is nothing short of “deplorable” and a “goddamn faggot” and even aggressively tells him as much while simultaneously mocking his driving abilities. Additionally, Abraham suspects that the elderly negroes at one of his sanatoriums are “dirty pinko” parasites that are plotting against him and thus plots to have them removed from his dilapidated buildings. Being an old fart that seems like he is too lazy to even wipe his own ass, Abe also has problems with his bowels and even shits his pants at one point and then playfully quips, “I just dumped a steamer through the hoop.” Although it takes the viewer some time become completely aware of this fact due to the somewhat convoluted nature of the film, the only reason McCloud goes to work for Abe is because he is the brother of aviation pioneers Orville and Wilbur Wright and thus owns an ancient aviation book that was given to him by his famous siblings. Naturally, McCloud not only steals the book, but also ruthlessly liquidates Abe after he has gotten what he needs. Indeed, in what is arguably the most timelessly hilarious and bizarrely iconic scene of the entire film, Abe’s strangled wheelchair-bound corpse causes a number of car crashes after it is pushed down a major highway in a merrily morbid scene where Altman is certainly at his most wonderfully wicked.

As a result of McCloud being involved in the death of a politically-connected old bitch conductor-cum-soprano-socialite named Daphne Heap (Margaret Hamilton) that makes the ultimately fatal mistake of calling Louise’s loyal raven a “nigger bird,” a bigwig Houston politician named Haskell Weeks (William Windom)—a soft, sleazy, and effete capitalist pig that may or may not be a twink-loving queer—hires a “San Francisco super cop” with “piercing blue eyes” named Detective Frank Shaft (Michael Murphy) to solve the mystery of the local strangler, thus leading to potential problems for the protagonist. Aside from the milky white bird droppings found on the heads of the strangling victims, Detective Shaft—a pretentious prick and fast-talking narcissist that immediately develops a great disdain for Weeks and local law enforcement—has no leads in murders aside from the basic modus operandi of the killer(s), so he even seriously considers hiring a professional “scatologist.” While he seems to think he is a too-cool-for-school Anglo-American Übermensch of the Steve McQueen-esque variety, Detective Shaft is more of a raging queen and a tragicomic cipher of a character who’s completely random death invites big laughs from the viewer. Indeed, Detective Shaft ultimately decides to blow his brains out after losing a fairly long chase with a dumb dame and crashing his car. Somewhat curiously, before committing self-slaughter with his own service revolver, one of Shaft's blue eyes turns shit brown in a scene that really seems to underscore the supreme superficiality and fragility of his handsomeness and ostensible martial prowess. In short, I doubt Altman was a big McQueen fan, even though both men seemed to have a similar affinity for drugs and debauchery.

As a deceptively beautiful and dapper defrocked 'fallen angel' that ruthlessly marches to the beat of her own drum, McCloud's virtual fairy godmother Louise—a true light-bringer of rebellion that might be a literal 'exterminating angel' and always sports a trench coat (with nothing underneath)—is a virtual female Lucifer though, instead of seducing the protagonist out of Eden like with Adam and Eve, she seems to lead him away from a 'forbidden fruit' of sorts. Indeed, Louise loathes sex and its all-too-human implications and tries desperately to steer McCloud clear of it as indicated by remarks like, "People like Hope accept what's been told to them. They don't think that they can be free. They don't even believe they can be free. Their is the closest thing they have to . . . flying [...] Something happens to them as they grow. They turn more and more toward earth. When they experience sex, they simply settle for it and procreate more of their own kind. So you must never be tempted. Don't ever let anything take away your full concentration from your work." Hope (Jennifer Salt) is a dumb chick that enjoys visiting McCloud in his subterranean lair and flirting with him to such a masturbatory degree that she manages to have ecstatic orgasms just by being in his mere presence, but the protagonist could care less as he is a rare virginal young man that thinks more about flying than fucking. Unfortunately, McCloud eventually meets a girl that does catch his fancy, thus leading to his senseless betrayal of Louise and ultimately his own devastating demise. Indeed, if one did not know that Brewster McCloud was directed by Robert Altman, one might assume it was created by some warped anarchistic Puritan, as the film contains a less than flattering depiction of sex and sociosexual issues.

Although he seems to have nil interest in the opposite sex, McCloud somehow manages to fall hard for an anti-cute creature named Suzanne (Shelley Duvall in her very first film role), who is unquestionably the homeliest and most harebrained whore in all of Texas. Indeed, upon attempting to steal her car—an orange and black Plymouth Road Runner that she herself stole from a redneck that tried to rape her—McCloud finds himself immediately attracted to the exceedingly dumb and insufferably extroverted twat Suzanne who, although an Astrodome usher that gives unintentionally obnoxious tours, proudly proclaims to be a race car driver. In fact, initially Suzanne unwittingly saves McCloud from prison by beating Detective Shaft in a police chase with her Plymouth Road Runner that ultimately results in the stud SF super cop committing via blue hara-kiri, but she will also mindlessly cause the hero's literal and figurative downfall. Indeed, when McCloud opts to succumb to carnal desire and sacrifice his chastity by sleeping with super slut Suzanne, Louise meekly whimpers like a fragile wounded animal and decides to leave him for good. While McCloud accuses Louise of lying to him regarding sex and she attempts to defend herself by stating, "That girl almost got you called. I asked you not to see her again. You only have one friend, Brewster: Me. I'm the only one that cares about you [...] I am the only one that has never lied to you," he is in complete denial about his precarious situation and retorts, "It's not like you said it would be at all, Louise. Susan is nothing like you said." Seemingly blinded by Suzanne's beaver and tiny boobs, McCloud even ignores the serious implications of a rather revealing post-coital conversation where his moronic beloved discusses finding a lawyer for his flying device and even confesses that she is "afraid" of flying. While Suzanne wants to stay put in town and ignores him when he says she will have to "fly-away" with him, McCloud—a boy that has dedicated his life to attempting to escape from where he lives—still seems oblivious to the glaring fact that he has found a piss poor match for a mate.

When McCloud makes the absurd mistake of confiding in his stupendously dopey dame Suzanne that he needs to leave town because, to quote the protagonist regarding the police, "They'll put me in a cage" and then reveals "all the people that died" are the result of his own absurdist strangling campaign, Suzanne secretly decides to betray him by snitching on him. Indeed, Suzanne ultimately decides to call her failed artist ex-boyfriend Bernard to tell him that she has "been dating this really weird boy" and then hysterically remarks while acting like a poor little victim, "I think he is crazy. He thinks he can fly. And I think he's the one that's been strangling all those people." Unfortunately for McCloud, Bernard is the personal bitch boy of local bigwig Haskell Weeks, who is determined to catch the strangler so that he can bring back good ol' banal order back to Houston. Needless to say, Suzanne not only betrays McCloud by snitching on him, but she also cheats on him with her ex-beau Bernard—an ambiguously gay chap that used to do abstract etching on old cider bottles—who somewhat ironically refuses to have sex before marriage despite the (anti)heroine's rather sexually aggressive behavior. In the end, Mr. Weeks is thankfully strangled and police invade the Houston Astrodome while McCloud, who is completely heartbroken because he has just discovered Suzanne has betrayed him, takes the dangerous risk of making his first flight with his rather preposterous work-in-progress wings, but unfortunately the protagonist suffers a fate similar to Icarus and falls to his death after only a couple moments of truly transcendental freedom. In short, McCloud certainly falls short of finding his figurative Holy Grail and instead succumbs to a lethal form of lovelorn despair. Although the film concludes on a less than uplifting note with a decidedly dispiriting allegorical scenario where Altman seems to more or less express his belief that even the most rebellious and idiosyncratic of individuals are hopelessly imprisoned by society and thus are doomed to fail if they attempt to get rid of their figurative shackles, the uniquely unhappy ending is followed by a strangely joyous Fellini-esque circus credits scene featuring all the lead appearing in goofy sideshow outfits, including Shelley Duvall dressed as a Raggedy Ann doll and Jennifer Salt dressed as Dorothy Gale.

In terms of low-class Lone Star state lunacy, it is hard to imagine that there would be a The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 (1986) without Altman's Brewster McCLOUD. In fact, I wonder if Tobe Hooper was somewhat influenced by the film when he made his original masterpiece The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), as the wheelchair-bound monster Abraham Wright certainly seems like he could be a bourgeois kinsman of Leatherface's beloved grandpa, not to mention the fact that Altman's film depicts its Texas metropolitan location as a spiritually necrotizing and culturally decaying void inhabited by relatively grotesque subhuman characters that reflect the worst in retrograde post-JFK redneck retardation. In short, Altman's film is like an urban companion to the darkly comedic rural raunchiness and grotesque caricatures of Hooper's TCM films. Indeed, Brewster McCLOUD might be a farcical fantasy and quasi-arthouse neo-fairytale of sorts that Bob Altman seemed to allow his subconscious to run wild on (aside from movie and biblical references, the film is also vaguely Arthurian), but I think it is ultimately a visceral and innately intuitive depiction of the death of America, especially in regard to the Euro-American founder's decidedly decadent descendants. After all, it is no surprise that the 'victims' of the film include an old spinster heiress, the cutthroat capitalist miser brother of the Wright brothers, and effete political bigwig, as these characters symbolize everything that is sick, decrepit, and senile about American (while the Wright brothers symbolize everything that is great about the nation as self-made pioneers that completely changed history in a manner that is completely unrivaled). Of course, as a virtual lifelong overweight pothead, gambler, and dipsomaniac, Altman somewhat ironically symbolizes the other side of the coin of this cultural degeneracy. It also goes without saying that the 'bad guys' of Altman's film seem rather benign in comparison to the corrupt politicians and malignant multicultural mess of Houston today (in fact, it is now a so-called 'minority-majority' city where a good portion of the inhabitants don't even speak English). It should also be noted that, although many of the murdered 'victims' of the film are big bad evil racists, many of the great American pioneers of the twentieth-century, including industrialist Henry Ford and Charles Lindbergh, were racially-conscious patriots that vocally warned of many of the problems that plague America today, especially in regard to kosher culture-distorters. Whether he was conscious of it or not, Altman was a sort of shabbos goy spreader of the 'culture-disease' that now plagues America, but his films still have a certain cynical Euro-American sensibility that cannot be ignored. One also cannot forget that Altman directed The Long Goodbye (1973), which features arguably the most grotesque Jewish gangster caricature in cinema history as played by Hebraic Hollywood filmmaker

Mark Rydell.
